without the requirement of having to prove the existence of a criminal offence (for more detail, see Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Karakatsanes], art. 57, no. 6; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 914, no. 35 and Karakostas, Prosopikotita kai tipos, 55). All people, even children and those of unsound mind, bear this interest worthy of legal protection (Karakatsanes, loc. cit. no. 6). In the context of publications in the press, a distinction is made between statements of fact and value judgements; the impact of the publication on the party in question, the extent of its circulation, the reason for it, and the motives of its author (information of general interest; deliberateness of harm) are drawn upon in the overall consideration, in order to take account of the freedom of press (Karakostas, loc. cit. 56 et seq.; CA Athens, 9975/1986, EllDik 27/1987, 299). Just like the Law on the Mass Media no. 2328/1995 art. 4(10), Law no. 1178/1981 on the Civil Liability of the Press, art. 1 provides for a minimum threshold sum for the reparation of non-pecuniary losses (cf. CFI Thessaloniki 26488/2001, Arm 2003, 931: minimum liability set at 10,000,000 Drachma). This provision does not violate the Greek Constitution (A.P. 1043/2001, NoB 50/2002, 1108).

37. Though admittedly PORTUGUESE CC art. 483 does not expressly list "honour" as an interest worthy of legal protection, on the one hand it still falls under the "rights" protected by this provision and on the other it is the subject-matter of a protective law in the sense meant in this provision, namely of CP art. 180, which regulates the criminality of affronts to honour. It is conceivable that false information about one person will affront the honour of a third party close to this person, cf. e.g. STJ 26 February 2004 (National newspaper reports in a major exposé on the alleged frivolities and adultery of a married woman; also an affront to the husband's honour). However, in recent case law, there has been a clear retreat from the legal protection afforded for affronts to honour; there is talk of an "erosion" of the protection of honour (Faria Costa, Direito Penal Especial, 104), cf. especially CA Guimarães 27 April 2006 (where someone is held up to ridicule, this constitutes merely bad conduct, not however a tort); CA Porto 7 December 2005 (no affront, if someone is called maluco – crazy); CA Porto 19 April 2006 (no affront, where it is said of a priest "he was not a priest, he was not anything") and CA Porto 11 January 2006 (assassino "murderer" of an animal; no affront).

38. DUTCH CC art. 6:106(1)(b) enumerates injuries to honour among the torts in which the tortfeasor will be held liable for non-pecuniary losses. CC art. 6:106(1)(c) provides a special rule for the reparation of non-economic damages in the case of the denigration of a deceased's remembrance. ESTONIAN LOA § 1046(1) expressly counts the "defamation of a person" among its list of torts. In contrast, LITHUANIA and LATVIA lack a corresponding regulation.

39. The SWEDISH Law on Damages chap. 2 § 3 imposes liability in damages on a person who "grossly affronts someone else through the commission of a crime, which includes an attack against his person, his freedom, his ability to live peacibly or his honour". This corresponds to the FINNISH Law on Damages chap. 5 § 6(1) (as of 1 January 2006); a criminal offence and an affront are also required here. In contrast, DANISH Law on Damages § 26(1) omits the requirement of a criminal affront to honour in the establishment of civil liability.

40. The situation in ENGLAND is quite complex. The Common Law traditionally distinguishes between libel and slander. Libel is an affront to honour in fixed (typically, but not necessarily, written) form, while slander is an affront to honour in transient, typically spoken form. The prerequisite element for a claim in defamation is fulfilled in both cases by anything that is seen as holding the relevant party up to public hate, contempt or ridicule (Parmiter v. Coupland (1840) 6 M & W 105; 151 ER 340), see e.g. R. v. Adams (1888) 22 QBD 66 (letter sent to a young woman of modest virtue inviting her to name her price for surrender of her virginity). The threshold question remains to this day: "Would the words tend to lower the plaintiff in the estimation of right-thinking members of society generally … or would cause him to be shunned or avoided?" (Sim v. Stretch (1936) 52 TLR 669, per Lord Atkin). Libel is at the same time a crime, slander just a tort. The criminal and private law concept of libel are, however, not identical. For example, under English criminal law a libel which is true may nonetheless amount to an offence at common law, if the defendant cannot show that publication was for the public benefit (Libel Act 1843, s. 6), whereas under English tort law the justification of the libel will provide a complete defence. Nor is it possible under English tort law to libel an indeterminate class of persons, although the same libel may constitute an offence under criminal law if calculated to provoke the members of that class to commit a breach of the peace. The ability to defame a public corporation in tort is also more limited than in the criminal law of libel: see Derbyshire CC v. Times Newspapers Ltd. [1993] AC 534. A further extension of the protection of the criminal law of libel is that a deceased person can be defamed, if the libel would tend to provoke living persons such as members of the deceased's family, although the same libel will not give rise to tort law liability.

41. In IRELAND, although one's right to a good name is expressly protected by Const. art. 40.3.2° and defamation is governed under the Defamation Act 1961, defamation takes much the same format as the approach in England (in regard to the libel and slander distinction and the definition of the concept of "defamation" itself). Defamation is committed by the wrongful publication (i.e. to a third party, cf M'Laughlin v. Doey (1893) 32 IrLR 518 (Ex. D)) of a false statement about a person, which tends to lower that person in the eyes of right-thinking members of society or tends to hold that person up to hatred, ridicule or contempt, or causes that person to be shunned or avoided by right thinking members of society (Quigley v. Creation Ltd. [1971] IR 269; Berry v. Irish Times Ltd. [1973] IR 368). Once the defamatory nature of the statement is proven, its falsity is presumed. Vulgar abuse does not amount to defamation – the gist of the action is injury to reputation and if the remarks are made in an abusive way or in anger so that they injure only the pride of the plaintiff rather than his reputation no action lies at common law (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 34.85). Libel is actionable per se, whereas slander requires proof of special (actual) damage, unless it falls under one of four categories of slander. They are: (i) slanders which impute unchastity or adultery to any woman or girl (Defamation Act 1961 s. 16); (ii) slanders affecting a person's official, professional or business reputation (Defamation Act 1961 s. 19); (iii) slanders imputing a criminal offence punishable imprisonment (cf Ruckley v. Kiernan (1857) 7 ICLR 75; McCabe v. Foot (1866) 11 Ir.Jurist (ns) 287; Dempsey v. Wall & Co. Ltd. (1943) 78 ILTR 73; Coleman v. Keanes Ltd. [1946] Ir Jur 5; Corcoran v. W. & R. Jacob & Co. Ltd. [1945] IR 446); and (iv) slanders imputing a contagious disease which tends to exclude the sufferer from society (Bloodworth v. Gray (1844) 7 Man & G 334, 135 ER 140; Milner v. Reeves (1617) 1 Roll Abr 43 pl. 3; Taylor v. Perkins (1607) Cro Jac 144, 79 ER 126; Villers v. Monsley (1769) 2 Wils KB 403, 95 ER 886). Reform of defamation is imminent in Ireland, with the publishing of the Defamation Bill 2006 (in tandem with the Privacy Bill 2006 – see above, Note III29). The main proposals of the Bill are: (i) the present torts of libel and slander will cease to be so described and are henceforth to be collectively described as the tort of defamation (s. 5); (ii) an offer of apology shall not be construed as an admission of liability (s. 23); (iii) provision is made for new remedies which a court may grant in addition to damages; (iv) a correction order is envisaged (s. 28); (v) the defence of fair and reasonable publication on a matter of public importance is created (s. 24); (vi) the common law position with regard to the liability of distributors for defamatory material is being given a statutory basis (s. 25); (vii) bodies corporate are to be allowed to sue for defamation irrespective of whether financial loss has occurred (s. 11); (viii) a limitation period of one year will apply in relation to the bringing of defamation proceedings unless a court directs otherwise where the interests of justice so require (s. 37); and (ix) although there is no provision for a defamation action to be taken in the name of a deceased plaintiff, the Defamation Bill provides that where a defamation action is pending in court, the cause of action will survive for the benefit of the estate of a person who dies before the actual hearing/determination of the matter.

42. In SCOTLAND a person has a legally recognised interest in the preservation of his own self-esteem and honour from unjustifiable attacks, and this has come to be extended to include an interest in his own public reputation and good name in the eyes of others (Walker, Delict[2], chap. 23). A claim for solatium, of the nature of an actio injuriarum, accordingly lies against another who unjustifiably impugns a person's honour and self-esteem, and a claim for patrimonial loss lies in addition, where his public reputation has been impugned as well (Walker loc. cit. 749). Although the wrong has been variously called verbal injury, convicium, defamation, slander and libel in books and cases, the position has emerged that verbal injury and convicium (if indeed there is a distinction between these two, discussed below at Note I14 under VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another) are in fact detached from defamation. Marking a distinction from the position in England (and currently in Ireland), in Scots law libel and slander are frequently used interchangeably for each other and for defamation, with no distinction between written and oral communication. Defamation is "the wrong or delict which is committed when a person makes an injurious and false imputation, conveyed by words or signs, against the character or reputation of another" (Cooper, Defamation and Verbal Injury[2], 1). There are three requisites which must be proven: (i) there must be a false statement made, of and concerning the pursuer; (ii) the statement must be defamatory (or libellous or slanderous); and (iii) there must exist malice on the part of the defender in making the statement or communicating the idea (Walker loc. cit. 742). It is possible to defame by innuendo or other than by express communication (Cooper loc. cit. 29). While the fact of communication must be proved, it is not necessary that the statement be communicated to a third party, i.e. anyone other than the pursuer himself (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], para. 35.04), just that it was as such capable of deeply hurting the pursuer's feelings. This element underlines the character of the claim as one of solatium for hurt feelings and not of reparation. Defamatory statements include statements against the moral character, the trade, business, or occupation, profession, or office, and the public character of another; and statements attributing insanity or obnoxious physical defects to persons, and verbal injuries" (Cooper loc. cit. 33). Allegations of certain sexual conduct may be, for example that a man has associated with a known prostitute (Dwek v. MacMillan Publishers Ltd. [2000] EMLR 284), but an allegation of homosexuality is probably not now defamatory (Quilty v. Windsor 1999 SLT 346). There is a material distinction between private individuals and public figures, critics of the latter being allowed a wide latitude in the public interest (Gloag and Henderson loc. cit. para. 35.05); a person's status as a public figure is not, however, a defence to an allegation of defamation (Bennett v. Guardian Newspapers Ltd. (No. 1) [1997] EMLR 625). Although in the abovementioned prevailing formula for defamation, the defamatory nature of the statements is the second requisite (after the falsity of the statements), this is in fact the primary and central requirement because once the statements are proved to be defamatory, there is a presumption of malice (Norrie, (1984) JurRev 163, 168)) and a presumption of the falsity of the statement, though the defence under the maxim veritas convicii excusat is open to the defendant. The following other nine defences are also open to the defender (see Gloag and Henderson loc. cit. 35.07): (i) that the words founded on were not used by the defender; (ii) that the statement did not refer to the pursuer and could not reasonably construed as referring to him; (iii) that the words used were not reasonably capable of bearing the alleged defamatory meaning ascribed to them; (iv) that the slander was unintentional, coupled with an offer of amends (under the Defamation Act 1996); (v) that the pursuer expressly or impliedly assented to the statement being made (Friend v. Civil Aviation Authority (No. 1) [1998] IRLR 253); (vi) absolute privilege; (vii) qualified privilege; (viii) fair retort; (ix) fair comment (for more detail, see below at Note II25 under VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another)).

VI.–2:204: Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another Loss caused to a person as a result of the communication of information about that person which the person communicating the information knows or could reasonably be expected to know is incorrect is legally relevant damage.

COMMENTS

A. General

Liability for misinformation instead of protection of honour. This Article is based on the notion that one can hardly dispute liability for misinformation, whereas liability for "injury to honour" can easily open up a source of endless disputes and the exertion of influence by lobbyists (e.g. through the press). The concepts of honour or reputation therefore only play a role within the scheme of these rules to the extent that they are also applicable as part of national law: see VI.–2:203(2) (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy) and the Comments on that Article. Moreover, in an open society a rule which simply characterised injury to reputation as a legally relevant damage would be too imprecise. The assertion that someone belongs to a political party or has subscribed to a particular school of thought is anything other than an imputation of dishonour. At the same time such assertions, if they are false, may inflict substantial damage on that person's progress in life. The same applies to the assertion that a given Catholic priest supports abortion. It would also be less productive to have to resolve the question whether an athlete's honour is injured when it is falsely asserted that he or she takes drugs. All of these cases turn only on the point that the information was false.

Protection of the media. From the perspective of the media too it can hardly be maintained that there is a fundamental problem with press freedom when the published information is false. False assertions are as a matter of general principle not within the protection of press freedom. Incorrect assertions which cast the person concerned in a more favourable light than they are really entitled to, however, will as a rule not result in damage.

Personal honour need not be affected. It follows from the approach chosen here that the incorrect information need not affect the injured person's personal honour at all. It suffices, for instance, that the incorrect information causes doubt about the injured person's credit-worthiness. If, however, the false information also adversely affects the injured person in the pursuit of a profession or trade, as is likely to be the case e.g. if information is addressed to customers or suppliers, the requirements of VI.–2:208 (Loss upon unlawful impairment of business) may also be satisfied.

Persons. The text makes no distinction between natural and legal persons. A "person" within the meaning of this provision includes (according to the general rule, see VI.–1:103(b) (Scope of application)) legal as well as natural persons. Deliberately omitted from this provision, however, is the protection of personality after death: see Comments under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) and VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy).

Defences. The general grounds of defence in Chapter 5 have application in relation to VI.–2:204 as they do in relation to other instances of legally relevant damage. However, VI.–5:203 (Protection of public interest) takes on a special significance here. Furthermore, regard must also be had to VI.–6:102 (De minimis rule) – in particular in relation to the legal relevance of non-economic losses. (See the Comments on those Articles.) Moreover, liability in consequence of VI.–2:204 (or indeed any other Article under this Chapter) will be excluded where it would conflict with constitutional rights, such as rights of freedom of expression, which are enshrined in the national laws: see VI.–7:101 (National constitutional laws). National constitutional law may, for example, come into play to protect the fundamental right to marriage and family life with the consequence that confidential information communicated between spouses can never give rise to liability and in particular therefore when information about a third party which is known to be false is communicated by one spouse to the other.

B. Communication

Communication and dissemination distinguished. The element of communication of the information does not require a "dissemination" in the sense of either communication to a determinate or indeterminate group of persons or a chain or repetition of communications to a number of persons (multiple simultaneous or serial communications). A "one to one" communication can fall within the Article and likewise a communication on a single occasion suffices. It is not essential that communication should take the form of a wide publication of information directed to the public at large. Depending on the circumstances, it may suffice that the information has been passed down the telephone line to a single individual. VI.–2:204 is therefore in no way confined to the dissemination of false news in the media. It may also apply to false information communicated among business persons or even private contacts (who turn, for example, to the press, or the employer or school of the individual concerned) where, however, according to the general rules on accountability, different standards of care are imposed.

Internet communication. The position is the same where false information about another is incorporated into a web page on the internet. As regards publications in the internet, it will always be necessary to ascertain precisely who is the person who "ought to know" that the information is incorrect. As far as intermediary service providers are concerned, this issue is specifically addressed and conclusively resolved by Directive 2000/31/EC of the European Parliament and the Council of 8 June 2000 on certain legal aspects of information society services, in particular electronic commerce, in the Internal Market ('Directive on electronic commerce') (OJ L 178 of 17 July 2000, pp. 1-16), s. 4 ("Liability of intermediary service providers"), arts. 12-15.

Repetition of incorrect information. The person communicating the misinformation need not be the person who has created or formulated it. The repetition of incorrect information which has been obtained from another will amount to a communication; there is no requirement of 'first dissemination' in VI.–2:204. In the context of transmission of false information in this manner, however, note must be taken of the element of accountability. If publishers have repeated in good faith information obtained from a source in whom it would be reasonable to place reliance (such as communications from public authorities within their sphere of activities) and where it would be unreasonable to expect the publishers to examine the matter in any depth for themselves without repeating it (because, on its face, it has an innocent character), there may be no legally relevant damage.

Telling lies. On the other hand, VI.–2:204 does not mean that a person is liable per se for having told a lie. Making a misstatement, even intentionally, does not by itself give rise to liability. Only when additional elements besides the mere falsehood of the information are present does a right to relief arise under this Article. The misstatement must be "about another" and it must result in either a disturbance to that person's life or economic loss. Trivial damage is not legally relevant (VI.–6:102 (De minimis rule)). It is the consequences – the prejudice caused to another in consequence of the misstatement – which generates the claim under this Article and not the mere fact of the misstatement.

C. Incorrect information

Facts and value judgements distinguished. Information within the meaning of VI.–2:204 is an assertion of fact and does not extend to mere expressions of opinion or value judgements. The borderline between these two basic categories is not always easy to draw, but it is conceptually clear because only assertions of fact are susceptible to proof of veracity. Information is incorrect when it does not correspond with the truth. Information which is hearsay must be disclosed as such in order to correspond with the truth: someone who in that manner communicates information, making it clear that it is not known whether the reported assertion is correct, does not generally communicate false information unless this caveat serves only as a blind to escape liability (e.g. because it is sham and the information is relayed not merely to report that another has made such an assertion, but rather to imply also that the assertion is correct). The same applies when the information communicated contains the pointer that the assertion is made on the basis of only limited investigation.

> Illustration 1
> In the course of divorce proceedings, in order to further his position, a husband asserts that his wife "cheated" on him with another man. This is an assertion of fact.

> Illustration 2
> A theatre critic writes of a singer and actress that her voice and acting are so bad that she belongs not on the stage, but at the cash register in a self service restaurant. This is a value judgement.

Information about a person. VI.–2:204 concerns false information about a "person"; it does not extend to false information about a product or service.

> Illustration 3
> The assertion that electronic organs are completely unsuitable for use in churches falls outside VI.–2:204 and consequently does not provide the manufacturer of such organs with a claim to reparation of legally relevant damage under this rule, even where the statement was reinforced by concrete (but false) assertions of fact: it does not pertain to information about the manufacturer's person.

Burden of proof. The provision refers to information which is "incorrect". Starting from the proposition that the claimant must make out all the elements necessary to support the cause of action, this Article has the effect of placing on the claimant the burden of proving that the information communicated was "incorrect". However, in contrast to burden of proof (which is a material aspect of the rule), the standard of proof required will remain a procedural matter not governed by these rules. The same holds true for the question whether any alteration in the rules governing the standard of proof are considered appropriate so as indirectly to ease the onus placed on the injured person.

D. The mental state of the responsible person

Carelessness in relation to the incorrectness. As regards the mental state of the injuring person, negligence is always sufficient. That is so as much in relation to the act of communication or publication (which is governed by VI.–3:102 (Negligence)) as in regard to the fact that the injuring person ought to have known that the information was incorrect (which is governed by this Article). The Article therefore provides for liability when, for want of reasonable thoroughness or accuracy in research, the injuring person has communicated the false information. This will entitle the claimant to any appropriate remedy, including compensation. Conversely, where false information is published without negligence, because the information was communicated with every good reason (in the light of scrupulous research) to suppose that it was correct, there will be no liability, notwithstanding that the publication of false information may make a detrimental impact.

E. Relationship to other provisions

VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy). However, the fact that there is no liability under VI.–2:204 (and therefore no right to a correction of the falsehood as reparation for damage under this Article either) does not mean that the party innocently injured is entirely without redress. Precisely because the publisher has injured another by actions (albeit without liability), the publisher may in given circumstances be under an obligation to publish a correction in order to eradicate or ameliorate the prejudice or detriment generated. Such a positive obligation to rectify may arise out of the duty not to infringe an individual's right to respect for dignity implied by VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy). A failure to respond to the plea of an affected individual, whom one has significantly maligned or prejudiced by one's own (innocent) act, to salvage that individual's reputation may amount in some cases to such a failure to treat the other person with the minimum respect which a fellow member of society merits as to infringe the right to personal dignity. This specific damage falling under VI.–2:203 makes it unnecessary to fall back on the wider argument to the same effect under the general residual rule on damage in VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage), at any rate where the person adversely affected is a natural person.

Reporting suspicions. VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy) may be of particular relevance in relation to the reporting of suspicions. Where a report is made that someone is suspected of wrongdoing or circumstances are detailed which pinpoint a given individual as a plausible suspect for the wrongdoing, there will as a rule be no scope for liability under VI.–2:204. That is for the simple reason that the reported information is correct so far as it goes (i.e. there is a suspicion, there is no good reason to assume that the suspicion is wrong or ill-founded, and the circumstances are as narrated).

> Illustration 4
> A newspaper reports about a letter in which A informs B that he (A) suspects a third party (C) of being guilty of electoral malpractice and having committed a criminal offence which should be reported to the police. Since the newspaper correctly reproduced the contents of the letter, without passing the contents off as its own, and since there was a public interest in the publication of the news, the report does not cause legally relevant damage in the sense of VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy) or VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another), even if C is later acquitted of the charge.

Freedom of expression and the right to respect of dignity. However, depending on the precise circumstances of the case, it is conceivable that reporting of the suspicion itself in this way, while communicating correct information, could nonetheless be subject to the competing right of the individual to respect for personal dignity. This must necessarily be the case because reporting (truthfully) a suspicion so as to expose a given individual to the negative attention of others may in some contexts amount to placing an individual on trial in a forum in which there is no means of defence against the more or less explicit accusation. This may easily overstep the bounds of fair treatment of the individual and thus amount to a denial of the right to respect for personal dignity. No definite guidance can be given here, since the matter will be one for the courts to elaborate in the context of the inescapable conflict of interests between freedom of expression and a right to be treated with dignity. However, even where reporting a suspicion does infringe a person's right to respect for personal dignity, this will be subject to the defence of public interest, that is to say a justifiable ground for publishing the suspicion (see further VI.–5:203 (Protection of public interest)). This will clearly be the case, for example, where a newspaper acts responsibly in publishing descriptions or images of persons wanted for questioning in respect of serious crimes. Quite aside from that defence, it may well be that an infringement is not so profound as to justify compensation, as opposed to some other remedy which serves directly to remove the stigma or prejudice which reporting the suspicion generated (such as a right to have published further details which will make manifest the individual's innocence). In every case the remedy must be appropriate to the injury caused: see VI.–6:101(2) (Aim and forms of reparation).

VI.–2:205 (Loss upon breach of confidence) and VI.–2:207 (Loss upon reliance on incorrect advice or information). Liability arising under VI.–2:204 in respect of communication of information to another's prejudice is further flanked by the rules in VI.–2:205 (Loss upon breach of confidence) (where there is a breach of confidence) and VI.–2:207 (Loss upon reliance on incorrect advice or information) (where false information is communicated in the course of business to one who relies on it).

VI.–2:208 (Loss upon unlawful impairment of business). In a few cases there may be an overlap with the scope of application of VI.–2:208 (Loss upon unlawful impairment of business) – for instance where false information about a competitor is "spread" to customers in order to ruin the competitor.

NOTES

I. Liability for Misinformation

1. All European legal systems recognise the basic rule that the dissemination of false assertions of fact results in liability for a person's ensuing losses. However, in each respective system it is to be found in entirely different quarters. In BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG it is a part of the general tort law clause of CC arts. 1382 and 1383. It is settled case law that the spreading of lies about another amounts to a faute leading to a claim in damages when it causes pecuniary or non-pecuniary losses (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats, no. 1645; CFI Brussels 5 December 2000, AM 2001, 409). Of particular note in this context is the fact that in France the right against unfair competition likewise has its roots in CC arts. 1382 and 1383. Therefore, these provisions also govern cases of discrediting competitors and their products (JClCiv [-Courtieu], arts. 1382 à 1386, fasc. 132-1 (1998) no. 43).

2. In SPAIN the basis for liability for misinformation, at least in so far as it concerns press publications, is mostly extracted directly from the constitution (arts. 18(1) and 20(4)) and transposed into civil law through Law 1/1982 on the Civil Protection of Honour, Sphere of Intimacy and Control over the Reproduction of One's Image. Journalists are under an obligation of accurate research. False assertions, however, may not be avoidable in every circumstance; thus the press does not assume a guarantee of truth. Of course, freedom of press neither protects the spreading of mere rumours, nor complete fabrications or malicious insinuations. However, it protects the dissemination of carefully surveyed information, even where it should later turn out to be false (TC 21 January 1988, BOE no. 31 of 5 February 1988. See also TS 5 July 1999, RAJ 1999 (3) no. 5898 p. 9197; TS 20 November 1999, RAJ 1999 (5) no. 8293 p. 13010 and TC 31 January 2000, BOE no. 54 of 3 March 2000). This is only different where the information has been presented in an undignified way (TS 17 April 2000, RAJ 2000 (2) no. 2567 p. 3985) or otherwise infringes the right to the protection of one's sphere of privacy (TC 10 May 2000, BOE no. 136 of 7 June 2000). Misinformation supplied to customers about a competitor is subject to the law on unfair competition (TS 11 July 2006, BDA RAJ 2006 no. 4977).

3. ITALY makes liability for the publication of false assertions of fact dependant upon the incidentally occasioned infringement of an interest protected under tort law (Bianca, Diritto civile V, 614). It is not of course necessary that the infringement of an absolute right is at issue. The false reproduction of a lawyer's forename in a telephone book, with the result that he loses clients after moving office even suffices (Cass. 6 December 1994, no. 10457, Foro it. 1995, I, 3258), likewise for false information by a television journalist about alleged harmful substances in a type of food (Cass. 4 February 1992, no. 1147, Foro it. 1992, I, 2127).

4. HUNGARIAN Law deals with false assertions of fact using a whole range of legal instruments. Among them is the protection of personality, which according to CC § 78(1) also extends to good name and reputation. CC § 78(2) adds that damage to reputation is to be especially inferred "if someone intimates or spreads a false injurious statement in relation to another or allows a true fact to be released, which represents them in a false light." An untrue statement is only "injurious" if it may engender in the minds of others negative prejudice against the party in question (for a more detailed account of this and what follows, see in particular Gellért (-Zoltán), A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 286-291). Different from false assertions of fact, which in principle do not fall under the scope of protection of freedom of opinion (Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog I[2], 182/5-182/8), negative value judgments only lead to an affront to personality if they injuriously abase the party without any grounds. False assertions of fact in the media may be combated under CC § 79(1) with the claim for the release of the text within eight days (or in the next issue), from which it is to emerge, which assertion was unfounded. CC § 83(3) additionally grants particular rights, e.g. to correction of an entry in a register.

5. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 177 consolidates very similar principles in the following way: "(1) Any person that defames another or asserts or disseminates untrue statements on the past, knowledge or capability of another, even thought the former knows or should have known that they were untrue, and thereby inflicts material damage on the latter must reimburse such damage. (2) However, any person that reports anything untrue about another without knowledge that such was untrue shall not be liable for the damage inflicted if there was a genuine interest in so doing for the former or the person to whom the report was made."

6. In the GERMAN CC an express rule of liability in relation to the publication of false assertions of fact only surfaces in § 824. This concerns the basic fact situation of "jeopardising credit-worthiness". Under CC § 824(1) liability accrues to "a person who asserts or disseminates a fact contrary to the truth that is apt to put the credit-worthiness of another in jeopardy or occasion other detriment to his spending power or advancement". If the communicator was not aware of the untrue nature, he is absolved of liability "where he or the addressee of the communication had a legitimate interest in it" CC § 824(2). There is a special regulation in CC § 839a for expert witnesses called by the court. Incidentally, extra-contractual liability for false assertions of fact requires in principle the infringement of one of the rights enumerated in CC § 823(1), the infringement of a protective law (CC § 823(2)) or an affront to public morals (CC § 826). See also BGH 24 January 2006, BGHZ 166, 84, 108.

7. Express reference in the AUSTRIAN CC (in § 1330(2)) is also confined only to the basic fact situation of jeopardising credit-worthiness. Hereunder, liability for patrimonial losses is incurred by a person who spreads incorrect facts that jeopardise the credit-worthiness, spending power or advancement of another, as long as the communicator of the asserted facts was aware of their untruth or must have been aware of such. Proof of actual damage is not required; damage to economically significant relationships through assertions contrary to fact suffices (OGH 14 November 1963, SZ 37/146). From a systematic point of view, CC § 1330(2) was inserted into the part above the class of damages awarded for affronts to honour, however it equally does not require an affront to honour (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht II², 174).

8. The basic fact situation of so-called adverse effects on credit-worthiness (ofensa do crédito ou do bom nome) is also to be found in PORTUGAL (CC art. 484). However, some commentators here find it superfluous because the interests protected under this regulation – good name and reputation – already fall under the scope of application of both Const. art. 26(1) and CC art. 70(1) (Capelo de Sousa, O direito geral de personalidade, 305; Gouveia de Andrade, Da ofensa do crédito, 28). A claim under CC art. 484 is open not only to natural, but also to legal persons (STJ 15 June 1994, BolMinJus 438 [1994] 383; STJ 24 February 1960, BolMinJus 94 [1960] 107; Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 517). Conversely, the point on the admissibility of exceptio veritatis (the defence of truth) is extraordinarily contentious (for the proponents' arguments, see e.g. Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 517 and Menezes Leitão, Obrigações I[4], 285; and for those of the opponents, see Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 548 and STJ 3 October 1995, BolMinJus 450 [1995] 424). In relation to the omnipresent conflict between the right to the free expression of one's opinion and the protection of good name, a practical concordance is suggested (Cardoso da Costa, BolMinJus 396 [1990] 5, 16; STJ 14 May 2002; STJ 2 March 1995). In cases of doubt, however, freedom of opinion shall be given precedence (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 226; STJ 26 February 2004; STJ 5 December 2002).

9. ESTONIA also deploys the concept of jeopardising credit-worthiness in LOA § 1047(1). LOA § 1047(2) and (3) regulate the cases where the communication of information is not unlawful; subs. (4) provides for the legal remedies. See Supreme Court 3-2-1-161-06, RT III 2006, 23, 209. Under GREEK CC art. 920 "a person who knowingly or with a culpable lack of knowledge alleges or disseminates untruthful messages that put the credit-worthiness, occupation or advancement of another at risk" is likewise liable for damages.

10. In DUTCH Law the situations addressed in VI.–2:204 correspond to CC art. 6:162(2), because the spirit of this provision deals with the breach of a right or obligation

(through an action that infringes unwritten norms of social interaction). Under the latter aspect, accusations are in any event more seriously unlawful when they are not demonstrably true (Onrechtmatige Daad IV [-Schuijt], chap. VII, note 37, pp. 442 et seq.). So, for instance, if a stockbroker is accused of introducing an untrustworthy person to his acquaintances but it cannot be proven that the stockbroker knew of the untrustworthiness, if damage is suffered, this grounds liability (CFI Amsterdam 17 December 1974, reproduced in HR 30 January 1976, NedJur 1977 no. 106 p. 397). The incorrectness of an assertion alone does not always establish its unlawfulness, for instance where mistakes or discrepancies of minor significance are at issue or if the statement in question was not made recklessly (Schuijt loc. cit. 477-478).

11. Comprehensive provisions for the regulation of the problem of liability for harm through false information do not exist in the NORDIC countries either. Consequently, the general norms are drawn upon, in SWEDEN thus on Law on Damages chap. 2 § 2. However, individual special laws occasionally offer clarification and precision, in Sweden especially the Law on Credit Information [kreditupplysningslag (1973:1173)] § 21, which provides for the liability of persons who administer credit information on a commercial basis (loc. cit. § 1(1)), as well as for pecuniary and non-pecuniary losses (for more detail, see Kleineman, Ren förmögenhetsskada, 501 and – for the previous position – HD 26 January 1962, NJA 1962, 31). Negligence is rebuttably presumed. FINNISH Law on Personal Data (personuppgiftslag) § 9(2) first sentence obliges the respective registrar (and hence also commercial credit agencies) to use only data that is up-to-date and correct; § 29(1) first sentence prohibits the relaying of incorrect data and obliges the person from whom the original incorrect data came to re-register. Violations of the law found claims to pecuniary and non-pecuniary damages (loc. cit. § 47). This corresponds to the DANISH Law on the handling of Personal Data (lov om behandling av personoplysninger of 31 May 2000 no. 429) §§ 5(4), 24 and 69. Here also liability for rebuttably presumed fault is concerned. Another area for which there is specific regulation is the Law on Liability for False Information through the Press and other Media, cf. for SWEDEN Freedom of the Press Act (tryckfrihetsförordningen [1949:105]) chap. 7 § 4 nos. 14 and 15 in conjunction with chap. 11 (liability on the basis of a criminal offence) as well as the provisions of the Fundamental Law on Freedom of Expression (yttrandefrihetsgrundlag [1991:1469], cf. RH 1994:14); for DENMARK the Statutory Proclamation on the Law on the Liability of the Media (lovbekendtgørelse af medieansvarsloven of 9 February 1998 no. 85) §§ 29-33 (connection to the existing elements of the criminal offence through the respective mass medium); and for FINLAND the Law on Freedom of Expression in Mass Communication (lag om yttrandefrihet i masskommunikation of 13 June 2003 no. 460) § 14 (liability according to the rules under the Law on Damages).

12. In IRELAND, this issue falls under the torts of defamation (???see above, Note IV41 under VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy)), injurious falsehood and negligent misstatement. The term injurious falsehood, coined by Salmond (Torts, 1st ed., 1907, § 149), is used in preference over "slander of title", "slander of goods" or "malicious falsehood" and covers false statements calculated to injure a person in his trade or, more broadly, even damaging falsehoods of a non-commercial nature (e.g. Sheperd v. Wakeman (1662) 1 Sid 79, 82 ER 982 – loss of marriage; cf. Irish Transport & General Workers Union v. The Transport & General Workers Union [1936] IR 471). The essence of this tort is that the falsehood deceives others about the plaintiff (Schulke & Mayr U.K. Ltd. v. Alkapharm U.K. Ltd. [1999] FSR 161) so as to cause loss to the plaintiff (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 35.26). It consists of the publication or communication to a third person, of false statements concerning the plaintiff, his property, or his business, which cause him pecuniary loss. The tort differs from defamation in that the falsehood may reflect well on the plaintiff whilst nonetheless causing loss to him (Jones v. McGovern IR 1 CL 100 at 103-104, and cf Irish Toys & Utilities Ltd. v. "The Irish Times" Ltd. [1937] IR 298); however, as is noted in commentary (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 35.26), sometimes the difference between the two torts is a narrow one. Thus, injurious falsehood does not require the lowering of reputation or holding the person up to ridicule, hatred or contempt, with the focus rather being on injurious statements reflecting on tangibles or services (for more detail on the distinction, see McDonald, Irish Law of Defamation[2], 23-26). The requisites for a claim under injurious falsehood were set out by Lord Davey in Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Wright Crossley (1901) 18 RPC 95 at 99 (1901), stating that "to support such an action it is necessary for the plaintiff to prove (i) that the statements complained of were untrue; (ii) that they were made maliciously – i.e. without just cause or excuse; (iii) that the plaintiffs have suffered special damage thereby." Hence, the burden of proof in relation to the falsity of the statements is on the claimant here (unlike where the statements are proven to be defamatory) and at common law special damage must also be proven (in contrast to libel and instances where slander is actionable per se, see above ???in Note IV41 under VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy)). There is no uniform view on the definition of "malice", with some courts following Lord Davey's "without just cause or excuse" approach and others requiring that some indirect, dishonest or improper motive be established (London Ferro-Concrete Co. v. Justicz (1951) 68 RPC 261; Serville v. Constance [1954] 1 WLR 487). It is clear that an honest belief in an unfounded assertion will not make a defendant liable (Loudon v. Ryder (No 2) [1953] Ch 423; Spring v. Guardian Assurance plc. [1995] 2 AC 296; Greers Ltd. v. Pearman & Corder Ltd. (1922) 39 RPC 406; Cooke v. McGuigan (1927) 61 ILTR 45; Malone v. McQuaid [1998] IEHC 86). Carelessness will also be insufficient to mount a claim here, although in this case the plaintiff may raise the claim in the form of negligent misstatement; recklessness in the sense of gross negligence, however, may provide a basis for liability for injurious falsehood (Malone v. McQuaid loc. cit.; cf. Sherriff v. McMullen [1952] IR 236). Under common law, actual damage must be proven and it is also of note that only damage of a monetary nature is actionable; non-financial damage as injured feelings may not be compensated (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 35.29). However, the common law position has been changed somewhat by Defamation Act 1961, s. 20(1), which provides that it is not necessary to allege or prove special damage (i) if the words on which the action is founded are calculated to cause pecuniary damage to the plaintiff and are published in writing or other permanent form (including radio and television broadcasts, loc. cit. s. 20(2)), or (ii) if the words are calculated to cause pecuniary damage to the plaintiff in respect of any office, profession, calling, trade or business carried on by him at the time of the publication.

13. In SCOTLAND, a claim may be mounted under the guise of defamation (see above Note IV42 under VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy)), verbal injury or indeed negligent misstatement of the Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] AC 465 variety. Verbal injury (sometimes referred to as malicious falsehood, see Trapp v. Mackie 1977 SLT 194, Trapp v. Mackie 1979 SLT 126) is seen as an alternative to defamation (contrary to the views of Walker, Delict[2], 730-732, who sees the notion of verbal injury as the umbrella term for the whole class of injury), with certain commentators seeing verbal injury as being restricted to the aspect of the wrong which is concerned with solatium for insult only (see, e.g., Smith, Short Commentary, 726-727). Verbal injury as an independent claim was first recognised in Paterson v. Welch (1893) 20 R 744, in which Lord President Robertson concluded that the attribution to the pursuer of certain unpopular statements, though not slanderous could amount to an action in damages if it could be shown that: (i) the statement made by the defender was false; (ii) it was made with a design to injure; and (iii) it did in fact injure. Thus, the distinction with defamation is in the lack of the defamatory or slanderous nature of the statements. If the words are slanderous, then malice and falsity are presumed, whereas if the words are not per se slanderous, then malice and falsity are not presumed but will have to be proved (North of Scotland Banking Co. v. Duncan (1857) 19 D 881; see Lord Deas' dissenting judgment). At common law, in cases of malicious falsehood or other verbal injuries some damage had always to be averred and proved (Norrie, Defamation and Related Actions in Scots Law, 35). However, this situation has been changed by Defamation Act 1952, s. 3 (as applied to Scotland by s. 14), which provides that in actions for verbal injury it is not necessary to aver and prove special damage if the words founded on are calculated to cause pecuniary damage to the pursuer. As with defamation, it suffices that the statement be communicated to its subject alone (where solatium may be granted for affront or insult suffered), not only where it is published to third parties (where economic losses occasioned to the pursuer may also be recovered). Broader than the rule contained in VI.–2:204, which is restricted to communications concerning the person himself, and not his products or services (Comment C), slander of title, property or business is committed when a person maliciously communicates to a third party some falsehood about the pursuer's property (see Hamilton v. Arbuthnot (1750) Mor 13923, Bruce v. J. M. Smith (1898) 1 F 327 and Argyllshire Weavers v. A Macaulay (Tweeds) Ltd. (No. 3) 1965 SLT 21) or title to property (Philip v. Morton (1816) Hume 865) or his business (Parlane v. Templeton (1896) 4 SLT 153; Lamond v. Daily Record (Glasgow) Ltd. 1923 SLT 512) in a manner intended to cause and with the result of causing loss (invariably economic) to the pursuer (Norrie loc. cit. 44). Under an action known as "third party slander", the law even extends relief to instances where another person is the subject of the communication (see Lord Deas' judgment in North of Scotland Banking Company v. Duncan loc. cit. 887, where, inter alia, the example is given of an injury to credit being suffered by the pursuer on the basis of a statement being "spread abroad" that his factor or agent has defrauded him and absconded with his funds). If an attack on another can reasonably be read as an attack on the pursuer, he may sue in defamation (Bradbury v. Outram & Co. (1903) 11 SLT 71), and in verbal injury if it can be shown that by attacking another person the defender is intending to cause loss to the pursuer and actually did so (Cooper, Defamation and Verbal Injury[2], 1). However, there is no case in the Scottish law reports in which such an action has been successfully pursued, and some dicta seem to strike out actionability on this basis (Norrie loc. cit. 58). Any person, natural or legal, who is capable of suffering the loss complained of has title to sue for defamation or verbal injury, and will have an interest to do so if the loss is actually suffered; although, for instance, it is clear that solatium for hurt feelings may not be claimed by a body corporate, for such an entity has no feelings that the law recognises as capable of being hurt (Norrie loc. cit. 63). If neither the hurdles of defamation nor verbal injury can be surmounted, for instance where the defence of qualified privilege may be validly invoked, which in turn requires malice to be proven (and it is lacking), then the claim of negligent misstatement is open to the pursuer (see Spring v. Guardian Assurance plc. [1995] 2 AC 296, where liability for economic loss was imposed for a negligently inaccurate reference given by the defendant [the claimant's ex-employer] to a third party; the majority of the House of Lords adopted the two-stage test [of proximity and policy] laid down by Lord Wilberforce in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] AC 728).

II. Distinction between assertion of fact and value judgment

14. The distinction between an assertion of fact and a value judgment is relied upon in most legal systems and is also enforced for the most part according to the same criteria. In FRANCE it plays a role primarily because it is acknowledged that any person who circulates "critical" information is under an obligation de prudence concerning the content, to ensure that the disseminated facts correspond to reality. The dissemination of in principle correct information only founds a faute in exceptional cases. The main examples of where this occurs stem from the law against unfair competition. It may even be that the impartation to a competitor's customers of information that is true constitutes a concurrence déloyale, due to the concomitant circumstances under which it is carried out (Cass.civ. 12 October 1966, Bull.civ. 1966, III, no. 393 p. 345).

15. Under the case law of the SPANISH Constitutional Court (TC 104/1986 of 17 July 1986, BOE no. 193 of 13 August 1986; TC 160/2003 of 15 September 2003, BOE no. 242 of 9 Oktober 2003) and the Supreme Court (e.g. TS 11 December 2003, RAJ 2003 (5) no. 8653 p. 16209) the subject matter of freedom of expression includes thoughts, ideas and opinions, i.e. value judgments of every kind. The subject matter of freedom of the press is the dissemination of relevant facts. Great importance is attached to the distinction between thoughts, ideas and opinions on the one hand and the dissemination of facts on the other. Different from facts, the accuracy of an opinion or value judgment may not be proven; however, the two streams frequently intermingle (TC 160/2003 of 15 September 2003 loc. cit.; critical Balaguer Callejón, Los derechos fundamentales al honor, 111). In such cases, it is helpful to consider each concept's focal point of emphasis. Freedom of expression is only limited by the concept of an affront, whereas constraints are placed on freedom of press through the criterion of truthfulness (TC 240/1992 of 21 December 1992, BOE no. 17 of 20 January 1993; TS 14 November 2001, RAJ 2001 (5) no. 9303 p. 14707). The civil courts also employ these criteria where the interests of the person affected and the communicator have to be balanced (e.g. TS 8 March 2002, RAJ 2002 (1) no. 1882 p. 3129; TS 10 July 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 4624 p. 8851).

16. In ITALY the point of departure is similar. This is because here the distinction between an assertion of fact and a value judgment predominantly plays a role in the assessment of infringements of personality rights and then within this framework, it in turn has a role in the balancing of the interests involved. Thus, the liability of the press hinges on overstepping the right to free reporting, the frontiers of which are staked out not only by the pertinenza (the social relevance of the piece of news) and the continenza (the moderateness in the sense of formally correct, inoffensive portrayal), but also by the verità del fatto (the truth of the asserted fact). Here the content of the information, as well as the existence of the information as such (where it is merely forwarded) are open to be proven true (Cass. 26 July 2002, no. 11060, Giust.civ.Mass. 2002, 1365). What is important is that the facts were carefully researched and fully portrayed (Cass. 13 February 2002, no. 2066, Giust.civ. 2002, I, 1880). Assertions of fact found in official documentation may be presumed to be true (Cass. 24 May 2002, no. 7628, Foro it. 2002, I, 2322). Tort law protection against defamation requires the circulation of an assertion of fact, i.e. communication to third parties (Cappellari, RCP 2000, 1061).

17. HUNGARIAN Law also draws a line of distinction between assertions of fact and value judgments, see above Note I4. The expression of an opinion, a value judgment or a critique only result in the establishing of an affront to honour or dignity in the sense of CC § 76, where by its nature, the expression is unreasonably injurious, offensive or abasing. A negative value judgment in itself does not occasion the infringement of a personality right, even where an erroneous, unsuitable or inappropriate opinion lies behind it (BH 2001/468). Only false assertions of fact and not erroneous expressions of opinion found a right to a counterstatement (BH 1999/357; Gellért [-Zoltán], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 294, 298; Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog I[2], 182/8-183, 186).

18. For GERMAN Law the differentiation between assertion of fact and value judgment is primarily important, because the conclusive rule contained in CC § 824 is only applicable to the dissemination of untrue facts, whereas recourse to CC § 823(1) may be had where the facts and value judgments that are circulated are true (BGH 24 January 2006, ZIP 2006, 317). Furthermore, the right to a counter statement, regulated by the federal states' press laws, only relates to assertions of fact. "Assertions of fact are characterised by the objective relationship between comment and reality, whereas the communicator's subjective connection with the content of his statement is the hallmark of value judgements and expressions of opinion. ... To be classified as an assertion of fact, it is accordingly essential whether the statement is open to examination for accuracy with the aid of verification. This excludes value judgments and expressions of opinion because they are denoted by the element of opinion and point of view and therefore are not susceptible to being proven true or untrue" (BGH 24 January 2006 loc. cit. 323).

19. Under AUSTRIAN Law value judgments are comments that are based on one's own thinking and convey the purely subjective opinion of the communicator; they consequently escape objective examination. Facts are, in contrast, circumstances, events or attributes with an identifiable content that is cognisable to third parties and capable of being examined for accuracy with the aid of definite or definable criteria by them. Comments are assertions of fact, where their accuracy may be verified, viz. where they can be adjudged to be true or false; otherwise value judgments are at issue (OGH 18 December 1991, SZ 64/182). The term assertion of fact is interpreted broadly; as long as their objective accuracy is examinable, evaluative appraisals equate to assertions of fact (Rummel [-Reischauer], ABGB II², § 1330 no. 8). Indeed examples of what has been qualified as a value judgment include the description of comic strips as inferior reading material that vulgarises youths and incites them to criminal activity (OGH 14 November 1962, SZ 35/113), the comment that a particular political party could never become a liberal party (OGH 30 November 1987, SZ 60/225) or the assertion "only a camel walks miles for a cigarette" (OGH 13 September 1988, SZ 61/193). Conversely, an assertion that an undertaking was afflicted with organisational deficiencies, the wrong product mix policy and high personal drawings, was deemed an assertion of fact (OGH 31 August 1977, SZ 50/111), the same is true for the allegation that someone functions as a "guerrilla in a tree" (OGH 29 October 1979, JBl 1980, 481: the assertion contained the allegation of unlawful felling of trees), the allegation that a political party was solely made up of bar-room politicians (OGH 30 November 1987, JBl 1988, 174), the assertion that a particular report in a newspaper was a "disgrace" (OGH 9 Jan 1990, SZ 63/2), the description of an academic painter as an "amateur painter" (OGH 19 March 1975, SZ 48/28) and the description of an innkeeper as a "whore" (OGH 13 November 1957, JBl 1958, 233).

20. In GREECE there is also the distinction between assertions of fact and value judgments, especially where the liability of the press for affronts to personality is concerned. It is often immediately added, however, that the distinction is problematic because in many cases factual statements and value judgments are intertwined (Karakostas, Prosopikotita kai tipos, 57). A specific action for a correction order may be brought against untrue offensive assertions of a factual character. Negative value judgments only amount to an affront to personality if they go over and above the limits of reasonable criticism and offend the dignity of the person in question (Karakostas loc. cit. 58). The distinction between value judgments and assertions of fact plays a further role in the context of CC art. 920 (placing credit-worthiness in jeopardy), because value judgments are not "news" in the sense of this provision. However, CC art. 920 is also applied where untrue items of news are circulated, which are accompanied by value judgments (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Vosinakis], art. 920 no. 3).

21. In PORTUGAL the distinction between assertions of fact and value judgments is even accorded constitutional significance in the context of Const. art. 37 (for more detail, see Carvalho Rebelo, A responsabilidade civil pela televisão, 36; in case law they are not as sharply distinguished as in commentary, cf. e.g. CA Lisbon 20 June 1994, CJ XIX [1994-4] 117 and CA Coimbra 3 July 1993, CJ XVIII [1993-4] 71). It is also stated here that assertions of fact – as distinct from expressions of opinion – are open to verification (Carvalho Rebelo loc. cit. 38). The basic fact situation of placing credit-worthiness in jeopardy in CC art. 484 is likewise geared towards assertions of fact. The provision protects the "credit-worthiness or the good name and reputation of a natural or legal person". Expressions of opinion that rest upon false assertions of fact are covered (for more detail, see Gouveia de Andrade, Da ofensa do crédito, 70-72). The form in which the fact is disseminated is immaterial. This can also concern the publication of a picture in the context of a report about criminals (cf. STJ 27 June 1995, BolMinJus 448 [1995] 378; Vasconcelos Abreu, FS Magalhães Collaço II, 472), especially where the newspaper was aware, due to official sources, that the person affected was no longer suspected of the offence (STJ 24 February 1999, CJ (ST) VII [1999-1] 118).

22. DUTCH law distinguishes both in criminal and civil law between harm to reputation and honour through assertions of a factual character and affronts by disparaging value judgments. The line of demarcation is once again drawn with the aid of the criterion of proof; here one relies on the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR 8 July 1986, NedJur 1987 no. 901 p. 2992; ECHR 24 February 1997, NedJur 1998 no. 360 p. 2026). It depends in the respective case on whether a comment was founded upon a kernel of fact or not (cf. e.g. Gemeenschappelijk Hof Nederlandse Antillen en Aruba 4 May 1999, NedJur 1999 no. 545 p. 2971 on the one hand and CA Amsterdam 19 October 2000, www.rechtspraak.nl, LJN-no. AA 7654 on the other: the description of a doctor as a "kwakzalver" [quack(salver) or charlatan] contains an assertion of fact).

23. In SWEDEN the distinction between assertions of fact and value judgments can assume importance in the context of the Law on Damages chap. 2 § 2, where and to the extent that it is interpreted under the corresponding criminal norm referred to by the cited norm of liability. Among these criminal norms is especially CP chap. 5 § 1 (defamation). Under this provision a true statement can, however, in exceptional cases amount to defamation if it lacks a basis for making it. This can in turn lead to problems of co-ordination with Eur.Conv.Hum.Rights art. 10, cf. ECHR 19 January 2006, Albert-Engelmann-Gesellschaft mbH v. Österreich, ECHR 19 January 2006, App. no. 46389/99.

24. Again in SCOTLAND, the comment (statement of opinion) and assertion of fact distinction assumes relevance primarily in the field of defamation where after the defamatory nature of the statement has been affirmed, the defender wishes to raise the defence of fair comment; this defence would equally apply to verbal injury (though its invocation would be unlikely) and perhaps appear dressed in different robes under negligent misstatement. The defence is not open to statements of fact, liability for which can only be escaped through the means of veritatis (truth), privilege or other miscellaneous defences. It has been noted that in flowing from the right of free speech, "the right to make comment is a right that attaches equally to everyone, and the publisher or broadcaster has no greater or higher right to do so than a private individual" (Norrie, Defamation and Related Actions in Scots Law, 135). The authoritative appraisal of the defence emanates from the case of Archer v. Ritchie & Co. (1891) 18 R 719, where Lord McLaren enunciated that "[t]he expression of an opinion as to a state of facts truly set forth is not actionable, even when that opinion is couched in vituperative or contentious language" (Archer v. Ritchie & Co. loc. cit. 727). In order to succeed with the defence of fair comment, the defender must establish (i) that the statement complained of is a comment on fact or facts; (ii) that the facts upon which the comment is made are truly stated; and (iii) that the facts concern some matter of public interest (Norrie loc. cit. 139). The judge has the task of deciding whether the statement can be understood as containing both fact and comment. If the conclusion is drawn by him that there is no doubt that only fact or only comment exists then the defence cannot be put to the jury (London Artists v. Littler [1969] 2 QB 375, 394 per Edmund-Davies LJ; Waddell v. BBC 1973 SLT 246, 249 per Sherriff Principal Walker; Fairbairn v. Scottish National Party 1979 SC 393, 397 per Lord Ross). If the statement is reasonably capable of being considered as comment, then it is for the jury to establish whether it is indeed comment or fact (London Artists v. Littler loc. cit. 199 per Lord Denning MR; Telnikoff v. Matusevitch [1992] 2 AC 343, 351 per Lord Keith of Kinkel). If the jury decides that the statement contains both fact and comment, then it must go on to consider whether the comment is fair and on a matter of public interest (Norrie loc. cit. 141). It is for the pursuer to prove lack of fairness (in the sense of being irrelevant to the facts being commented upon or not warranted by the facts) once the defender has established that the statement complained of is a comment on facts. The truth of the comment itself is inconsequential (Wheatley v. Anderson & Miller 1927 SC 133, 147 per Lord Anderson; Broadway Approvals v. Odhams Press Ltd. [1965] 1 WLR 805, 817 per Sellers LJ).

25. In IRELAND the distinction between assertions of fact and value judgments takes on importance under the heading of defamation in that here the defence of fair comment on matters of public interest is open to the defendant (the term "comment" is used, though as with the term "value judgment", an expression of opinion is meant). To establish this defence, the defendant must show: (i) that the comment was made on a matter of public interest; (ii) that what he said was comment as opposed to fact; and (iii) that the comment was fair in the sense of being honest (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 34.201). The distinction is important here because facts must be proved to be true (or privileged) whereas comments need only be shown to be fair and honest. However, the comment must also be based on facts (proven to have been) truly stated (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 34.205). The facts if given or accessible must be shown to be true if they are to support the comment. If the facts on which the comment is based are not given and not available to the public, then the defence of fair comment is not available and the defendant must justify the comment or show that the occasion was privileged (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 34.207). There are no fixed rules in distinguishing between fact and comment (McDonald, Irish Law of Defamation[2], 212). The courts currently rely on a variety of circumstances, such as the language used and its arrangement, the person who makes the statement, and the way he conducts his case (see Campbell v. Irish Press Ltd. (1955) 90 ILTR 105 and London Artists v. Littler [1969] 2 QB 375). The sole principle that has emerged is that "if what is intended to be comment appears in the guise of a fact, and there is nothing to show on what it is based, then it must be treated as a statement of fact … but [not as a comment]" (Crawford v. Albu [1917] 1 AD 102 at 105). In the realm of defamation, from the victim's point of view, the overall significance of the distinction between the two is muted by the fact that defamatory statements can either take the form of a factually untrue assertion or indeed of indirect derogatory language. The object of such derogatory language may well find himself or herself shunned but those who do the shunning may be unclear as to precisely what fact is being alleged by the stigmatised person (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 34.209). In commentary, one may see the traditional distinction being drawn between factual assertions and value judgments founded on the accepted idea that factual assertions may be validated and refuted and thus may be characterised as true or false, while expressions of value judgments are incapable of validation or refutation (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. 34.210); however, there is no Irish case law on this point. Resorting to first principles, this recognised distinction begs the question of why the defence of comment per se (i.e. without the qualification of "on a matter of public importance") is not argued when, from a theoretical standpoint, aside from issues of freedom of expression (which would tend to reinforce it), this simple argument should relieve the defendant of liability since a sheer comment (as an expression of opinion) itself is not capable of being proven true or false, thus logically undermining the abovementioned presumption of falsity where defamation is concerned and thwarting a plaintiff's assertion of falsity in attempting to fulfil Lord Davey's first requirement of a claim in injurious falsehood (see above in Note I13). However, from the foregoing requirements of fair comment it would seem that the answer lies in the reality that for the most part a comment (or expression of opinion) only assumes legal relevance where it is based on facts proven true (a naked, unsupported statement is not considered a comment). This also muddies the waters when one tries to distil the de facto distinction between the two. Due to this mist which shrouds the distinction between facts and comments, defendant's lawyers have adopted at common law a form of pleading known as the "rolled-up plea", which in effect asserts both the truth of any factual assertions and the fairness of any comments. The new Defamation Bill 2006 proposes to introduce the defences of honest opinion (s. 18, replacing fair comment) and fair and reasonable publication on a matter of public importance (s. 24). Under s. 19, in distinguishing between a statement consisting of allegations of fact and a statement consisting of opinion, a court is to have due regard to: "(a) the extent to which the statement is capable of being proved; (b) the extent to which the statement was made in circumstances in which it was likely to have been reasonably understood as a statement of opinion rather than a statement consisting of an allegation of fact; and (c) the words used in the statement and the extent to which the statement was subject to a qualification or disclaimer or was accompanied by cautionary words".

III. Reporting Suspicions

26. Under French Law the question of whether it is permitted to report on a mere suspicion depends on the person who is the subject of the report and in what manner it is carried out. For instance, a concurrence déloyale can lie in pointedly informing a competitor's customers of an existing suspicion against this competitor. Incidentally, CC art. 9-1 is to be heeded, according to which "everyone has the right to respect of the presumption of innocence. Where, before any sentence, a person is publicly shown as being guilty of facts under inquiries or preliminary investigation, the court, even by interim order and without prejudice to compensation for injury suffered, may prescribe any measures, such as the insertion of a rectification or the circulation of a communiqué, in order to put an end to the infringement of the presumption of innocence, at the expenses of the natural or juridical person liable for that infringement". The requisites of this provision shall only be fulfilled, however, where the publication contains the journalist's prejudice that the person in question is guilty (Cass.civ. 12 July 2001, Bull.civ. 2001, I, no. 222 p. 139). The publication of the name of an accused of full age is permitted in principle (Cass.civ. 20 June 2002, Bull.civ. 2002, II, no. 142 p. 113). Infringements of the presumption of innocence no longer depend on CC art. 1382; CC art. 9-1 is exclusively applicable (Cass.civ. 8 March 2001, Bull.civ. 2001, II, no. 46 p. 31). In BELGIAN case law it has been pointed out that a journalist is indeed free to disseminate information. This must however be accurate, thorough and objective. The journalist must act with the utmost caution in collecting and circulating his information; he may only rely on information that he has fairly examined, with regard to its ramifications. The presumption of innocence places particularly high demands on objectivity and impartiality (CFI Brussels 16 February 1999, AM 1999, 282).

27. The SPANISH Constitutional Court opines that the spreading of mere rumours is not shielded by the protection of freedom of press (TC 158/2003 of 15 September 2003, BOE no. 242 of 9 October 2003). The publication of a suspicion does not automatically result in an affront to honour. TS 7 June 2001, RAJ 2001 (3) no. 5535 p. 8476 rejected, for instance, the liability of a newspaper that had truthfully reported on a letter in which the claimant was accused by a third party of having committed a criminal offence. TS 31 May 2001, RAJ 2001 (3) no. 5529 p. 8465 clarified that neither the lodging of a complaint to the police nor the report thereof, amount to an affront to honour per se. It rather depends on the circumstances of each individual case. For example, people in the public eye have to put up with more with reference to their position than private persons under comparable circumstances (TC 297/2000 of 11 December, BOE no. 14 of 16 January 2001).

28. Under HUNGARIAN Law criminal proceedings may be truthfully reported upon, also that someone was justifiably suspected, charged or convicted at first instance. It is against the law, however, to later conceal the fact that the accused was acquitted or that the judgment does not yet have force of law (see further Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog I^2, 178/2, 182/6, 182/8, 186; Gellért [-Zoltán], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 300-301). CC § 80(3) states additionally, that the picture and a voice recording of a person who was prosecuted for a severe crime may be used freely on the basis of cogent public interest reasons or a particularly appreciable private interest upon the authorisation of the authorities.

29. GERMAN CC § 824 protects the commercial esteem of persons and enterprises, so-called "commercial honour", from adverse effects that are brought about by the assertion or circulation of untrue facts about them (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[65], § 824 no. 1). Expressing a suspicion can fall hereunder (BGH 20 June 1978, NJW 1978, 2151), where the unbiased recipient of the communication gets the impression that it is an - even hidden - assertion of fact (BGH 26 January 1951, NJW 1951, 352). The factual prerequisites of CC § 824 BGB are met where the train of thought of a report does not arrive at any other destination than that of wrongdoing (BGH 12 May 1987, NJW 1987, 2225; see also BGH 8 July 1980, BGHZ 78, 9, 14 and BGH 20 May 1986, NJW 1987, 1398, 1399). However, when inferring such hidden assertions particular restraint is advised, in order to take account of freedom of opinion. It is to be accordingly decided, whether the author himself draws his own conclusions or leaves that solely to the reader (BGH 8 July 1980, loc. cit. 15). Liability for infringements of the general right of personality (CC § 823(1)) remains unaffected; conversely, liability for encroaching on the right to private enterprise takes a back seat as subsidiary to CC § 824 (Erman [-Schiemann], BGB II[11], § 824 no. 1). Cases of reporting on the suspicion of a criminal offence remain under the protection of personality rights. This requires a minimum amount of verificatory facts that maintain the truthful substance of the information and thereby afford it "public value" (CA Dresden 27 November 2003, NJW 2004, 1181, 1182; BGH 7 December 1999, BGHZ 143, 199, 203; BGH 26 November 1996, NJW 1997, 1148, 1149). The demands on the cautiousness of the media are higher, the more severely and permanently the estimation of the person in question is curtailed. The portrayal may not contain any prejudgment and must take into account the facts and arguments presented in defence of the accused. The decisive factor is that a pressing need for information in the general public justifies the publication (BGH 7 December 1999 loc. cit.; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[65], § 823 no. 103). Naming the accused is only admissible in cases of severe criminality or criminal offences that particularly stir the public (BGH 7 December 1999 loc. cit. 207; Sprau loc. cit.).

30. AUSTRIAN Law on the Media (BGBl 1981/314, of 12 June 1981) § 7b(1) provides a claim to reparation of non-pecuniary damage, where a person who has been suspected of a criminal offence but not yet convicted with full force of law, is portrayed by the media as having been convicted or found guilty or as the perpetrator of this criminal offence and not merely described as a suspect. The amount of liability is limited to € 14,535. Permitted will be, inter alia, a truthful report on a judgment of a criminal court of first instance, as long as it is expressed that the judgment does not yet have force of law (Law on the Media § 7b(2)).

31. GREEK commentary points out that in reporting on persons who are suspected of having committed a criminal offence, a balance must be drawn between the public interest in the information and the interest of the suspect in not appearing in the media. The rule of never publishing the name or picture of a suspect before he has been arrested has even been mooted. The protection of personality and the presumption of innocence would even counter the inference that someone who has been arrested automatically becomes a person of celebrity, meaning that every report about him must come off reservedly and may only be carried out for informational purposes. As soon as the case goes to trial, the name and image of the accused may be published, at least for severe crimes, because here the public interest in the information prevails (for more detail on this whole issue, see Paparigopoulou-Skorrini, NoB 25 [1977] 278).

32. Under PORTUGUESE CP art. 180 it is criminally punishable to insult another by disseminating false assertions of fact or false suspicions. A violation of this rule also leads to civil liability. The same holds true for the spreading of suspicions with the aim of discrediting a competitor (Industrial Property Code art. 317(b)). Journalists are subject to the general duty to examine the truthful substance of the information they disseminate in a reasonable fashion. They are not allowed to invent news, spread mere rumours or to blaspheme others in their writings (Carvalho Rebelo, A responsabilidade civil pela televisão, 39). In this context the Portuguese courts also ascribe great importance to the protection of rights of personality (Vasconcelos Abreu, FS Magalhães Collaço II, 472; see e.g. CA Lisbon 18 May 1988, CJ XIII [1988-3] 180; CA Lisbon 14 May 1998, CJ XXIII [1998-3] 101; STJ 14 February 2002). For instance, a television station is not permitted to claim without sufficient evidence that an international company had installed wire-tapping devices in a law enforcement agency in order to be able to spy out on-going investigations there (STJ 17 October 2000, CJ (ST) VIII [2000-3] 78). Where in a press conference, a football manager repeats his previously expressed, but unsubstantiated suspicion that a colleague was the anonymous author of a threat to sabotage the clubs' upcoming league game, he also commits a severe affront to personality justifying damages (STJ 27 June 1995, BolMinJus 448 [1995] 378). It is a defence to prove either the truth of the assertion or at least having been convinced of the truth and therefore disseminating it bona fide (CP art. 180(2); STJ 8 April 1999).

33. In DUTCH case law it is underscored that a suspicion may only be published if it is founded on facts (HR 27 January 1984, NedJur 1984 no. 802 p. 2859). Any person who spreads information but does not want to divulge its source because, e.g. he is subject to an occupational duty of maintaining confidentiality, bears the risk of not being able to show probable cause for the accuracy of his accusations by other means (President CFI Groningen 26 June 1996, KG 1996 no. 238; Onrechtmatige Daad IV [-Schuijt] Chapter VII, note 39, pp. 501-502).

34. In SCOTLAND, any repetition of a defamatory communication is actionable against a person, other than the original defamer, responsible for repeating the defamation, publishing it, or otherwise putting it in circulation (Hayford v. Forrester-Paton 1927 SC 740). However, the publisher or broadcaster will usually be less culpable than the original framer of the defamatory idea and might indeed be entirely innocent (Morrison v. Ritchie & Co. (1902) 4 F 645). The defence of innocent dissemination (see below, under Note IV44) is normally regarded as limited to situations in which the distributor cannot be aware of the defamatory content of the material being distributed. It is no defence for a newspaper or broadcaster to say that a story it publishes is merely a rumour or that someone else alleged it, for "the existence of a slanderous report, or its prevalent currency, is no justification for repeating it. Each repetition is a new injury to the party slandered" (Marshall v. Renwick (1835) 13 S 1127, 1129 per Lord President Hope). "The injury to the pursuer is exactly the same, whether the writer himself affirms the truth of the story, or whether he says that some lawyer or other person has affirmed it" (Pope v. Outram 1909 SC 230, 235 per Lord McLaren; Fairbairn v. Scottish National Party 1979 SC 393, 397 per Lord Ross). For a newspaper or magazine to report that a certain rumour is current while stating that it is untrue is usually considered not to protect the defender if the rumour is defamatory (Norrie, Defamation and Related Actions in Scots Law, 30). Though such a disclaimer does not negative the defamatory nature of the communication, it may serve to mitigate any damages awarded (Macculloch v. Litt (1851) 13 D 960; Morrison v. Ritchie & Co. loc. cit. 652 per Lord Moncrieff). While the general rule is that a person who repeats or republishes a defamatory statement is as liable as the original utterer, there are some circumstances in which newspaper reports of parliamentary or judicial proceedings will be protected by qualified privilege (which may be defeated by the pursuer with proof of malicious intent to injure). In Richardson v. Wilson (1879) 7 R 237, 241 Lord President Inglis stated that "[t]he publication by newspapers of what takes place in Court at the hearing of any case is undoubtedly lawful; and if it be reported in a fair and faithful manner the publisher is not responsible though the report contains statements or details of evidence affecting the character of either of the parties or other persons". In the Outer House decision of Cunningham v. The Scotsman Publications Ltd. 1987 SC 107, 116, Lord Clyde affirmed the recognised proposition that "[t]he Scottish cases disclose the general principle that a fair and accurate report of what takes place in court may be protected by qualified privilege". Comment on the report is not privileged (Drew v. Mackenzie & Co. (1862) 24 D 649), though the independent defence of fair comment might be available (see above, Note II25). The report is to be read as a whole, and if a headline gives a misleading impression then the report as a whole might not be held to be fair and accurate (Clive, Watt and McKain, Scots Law for Journalists[5], 186, Carter-Ruck, Libel and Slander[4], 141).

35. In IRISH scholarly legal writing, reference has been made to the general policy of defamation law of rejecting the views of the suspicious and unreasonable (McDonald, Irish Law of Defamation[2], 248 f). Again in the context of defamation, under the heading of the defence of justification, if the defendant makes the statement that "X is helping the police with their enquiries" in a criminal investigation and the context would also support the innuendo that X is under suspicion, then the defendant must, to succeed in the defence of justification be prepared not only to show that the police interviewed X, but they suspected him also (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 34.131). To prelude a defamatory statement with the clause "It is rumoured that…" or "It is suspected that…" (or some similar phrase) will not protect the defendant who can only prove that such a rumour or suspicion existed; the law will also oblige him to prove the content of the rumour before it allows him a defence (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 34.133). In the area of defamation dealing with instances in which slander will be actionable per se (see Note IV41 under VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy)) and specifically with the case of slanders imputing a criminal offence punishable by death or imprisonment, the Law Reform Commission in its Consultation Paper points out that "the imputation must be that the plaintiff actually committed the offence, and not merely that he is under suspicion of having done so" (Consultation Paper on the Civil Law of Defamation, 1991, http://www.lawreform.ie/publications/data/volume8/lrc_61.html, para. 42), though from the foregoing it is logical to conclude that the latter will found a claim in the lesser degree of slander where special damages can be proven (or indeed in libel). Statements that a person had in the past been convicted of an offence and served a term of imprisonment were held actionable in themselves (Gainsford v. Tuke (1620) Cro Jac 536, 79 ER 460) or where the person had been pardoned, or whose prosecution was time barred (McDonald loc. cit. 84 f). This subject is also relevant in relation to the defence of qualified privilege where a person may in certain circumstances be absolved of liability for making a defamatory statement in self defence. It has also been noted in commentary that such a statement should not be based only on rumours, or fear of a suspicion of wrongdoing that might arise because a person is a member of a group, one or all of whom is suspected of wrongdoing (McDonald loc. cit. 146). Under common law, the defence of qualified privilege (which may be countered by proof of malice) is available for fair and accurate reports of judicial proceedings, howsoever published or whether or not published contemporaneously with the proceedings. However, according to the Law Reform Commission: "the courts have consistently refused to recognise an interest or duty on the part of the press to report matters of public interest to the public sufficient to constitute an occasion of privilege. There is therefore no media qualified privilege as such" (loc. cit., para. 111). Certain reports are privileged under Defamation Act 1961 s. 24. The Second Schedule sets out a lengthy list of matters the reports of which enjoy qualified privilege. This list represents the range of subjects of which the media are entitled to make fair and accurate reports, which does not include anything relating to suspicions or accusations made in the period before judicial proceedings are initiated, pointing to the conclusion that anything reported during this time will not enjoy privilege and may only escape liability by means of the abovementioned defence of justification where the suspicions can be substantiated.

IV. Liability of Internet Providers

36. Liability of so-called access providers (who enable the user to access the internet) and above all, of so-called host providers (who offer internet users storage space, e.g. for setting up a so-called homepage) is, as is stated above (Comment B) the subject matter of Directive 2000/31/EC of the European Parliament and the Council of 8 June 2000 on certain legal aspects of information society services, in particular electronic commerce, in the Internal Market ('Directive on electronic commerce') (OJ L 178 of 17 July 2000, pp. 1-16). FRANCE implemented the Directive with Loi n° 575 du 21/6/2004 pour la confiance dans l'économie numérique, BELGIUM with Loi du 11 mars 2003 sur certains aspects juridiques des services de la société de l'information, thereby likewise replacing the previously applicable system of liability in CC arts. 1382 and 1383 (on this, De Groote, in: Privaatrecht in de rëele en virtuele wereld, 657, 677). The SPANISH implementing law is Law 34/2002 of 11 July 2002 on Services of the Information Society and E-commerce (Ley 34/2002, de 11 de julio, de servicios de la sociedad de la información y de comercio electrónico). In general, no liability accrues where the host providers were not aware of the unlawfulness of the information, in the absence of culpable hesitation to do what was necessary to remove the information or to make access to it impossible (arts. 16 and 17 loc. cit.).

37. In ITALY the directive was implemented by Legge Delega no. 39/2002, for which further executing stipulations have been enacted. The system of liability broadly follows the general tort law ethos of CC art. 2043 (for more detail, see Cassano and Cimino, Giur.it. 2004, 671-675). HUNGARIAN Law no. CVIII from 2001 on particular Issues of E-commerce Services and Services in the Information Society predominantly adopts the Directive word for word, but supplements it with regulations on material which lies outside the scope of the latter (e.g. on the possibilities of the how facilitators of search engines may be discharged of liability). For GERMAN Law it was decided in BGH 23 September 2003, MDR 2004, 92, that liability of the host provider for the infringement of the general right of personality (CC § 823(1)) only comes into focus where the requirements under the Law on the Use of Teleservices (TDG) in its version from 22 July 1997 (BGBl I 1870) § 5(2) are also fulfilled.

38. AUSTRIA regulates the accountability of access providers and host-service providers in its E-Commerce Law (ECG, BGBl I 2001/152, in force since 1 January 2002) §§ 13-19. However, this law brought no new and independent system of liability, relying rather on the general rules of the CC and supplementing them through individual caps on liability in relation to the storage of external texts and contents (§ 16 loc. cit., cf. OGH 6 July 2004, RIS-Justiz RS0118525). Prohibitory injunction (no-fault liability) actions arising out of CC § 1330(2) remain unaffected (OGH 19 February 2004, RdW 2004, 536).

39. PORTUGAL likewise distinguishes between various internet providers. The so-called content providers are clearly liable for the unlawfulness of the content of material they place on the internet (Vasconcelos Casimiro, A responsabilidade civil pelo conteúdo da informação, 53); CP art. 183(1), with effect from 24 November 2005 even regulates the details of the criminal prosecutability of such behaviour). Causing particular debate is the question of whether someone who has a link to pages with unlawful content is thereby liable for the text to which he has referred (as argued by Vasconcelos Casimiro loc. cit. 55), or whether such liability is only affirmed where the referrer identifies himself with the referred text (according to Menezes Leitão, in: Direito da sociedade da informação III, 147, 163; similarly in Vasconcelos Casimiro loc. cit. 58). A content provider can become contractually liable to the access provider where he feeds illicit content onto the web (Vasconcelos Casimiro loc. cit. 62). The access provider is however not liable to third parties, unless he knew of the illegal content and did not block it according to art. 12(3) of the Directive (Vasconcelos Casimiro loc. cit. 24; Menezes Leitão loc. cit. 159). The TV services providers are jointly liable with those responsible for the broadcast of previously recorded television shows (Television Act art. 70(2).

40. GREECE implemented Directive 2000/31/EC by Presidential Ordinance 131/2003. The rule of liability in this Presidential Ordinance (arts. 11 et seq.) corresponds nearly verbatim to the provisions of the Directive (arts. 12 et seq.). A person who merely provides access to external information, without having had an influence on its content, is placed in more ameliorating circumstances than content providers; they are subject to the general tort law (Alexandridou, To dikaio tou ilektronikou emporiou, 101).

41. Likewise DUTCH Law refrained from introducing strict liability and left the liability of internet providers up to the open-ended system of its law on civil offences (Onrechtmatige Daad I [-Jansen], art. 162, note 7 p. 73). The question of whether host providers are liable owing to an infringement of copyright law when the host's customers violate the rights of third parties in using the storage space it has provided, was answered in the negative by CA The Hague 4 September 2003, NedJur 2003 no. 664 p. 5102. CA Amsterdam 7 November 2002, NedJur 2003 no. 54 p. 374 required a provider to block access to a site, on which information was to be found on how best to sabotage the rail system of Deutsche Bahn (Germany's rail operator). The provision of compensation in kind would also have been in the picture. Comparable case law also exists on the deletion of domain names (CFI Arnhem 3 December 2002, KG 2003, 20).

42. SWEDISH Law on Liability for electronic Message Boards (lag [1998:112] om ansvar för elektroniska anslagstavlor) relates to all services in the electronic transfer of communications with the exception of the communications of authorities, emails and publications through the mass media falling under the protection of freedom of the press (loc. cit. §§ 1 and 2). Liability is concentrated on those who provide the service (loc. cit. §§ 4 and 5); it complies with criminal accountability (loc. cit. §§ 6 and 7 in conjunction with Law on Damages chap. 2 § 2). The system of liability of Directive 2000/31/EC was implemented in Sweden by the Law on E-commerce and other Services of the Information Society (lag [2002:562] om elektronisk handel och andra informationssamhällets tjänster §§ 16-18), in FINLAND by the Law on the Provision of Services in the Information Society (lag om tillhandahållande av informationssamhällets tjänster of 5 June 2002, no. 458, §§ 13-15) and in DENMARK by the Law on Services in the Information Society with particular Provision for E-commerce Transactions (lov om tjenester i informationssamfundet, herunder visse aspekter af elektronisk handel of 22 April 2002, no. 227, §§ 14-16) in conjunction with the general culpa rule (Karnov [-Latrup-Pedersen], E-handelsloven, nos. 70 and 83).

43. In SCOTLAND (as with the rest of the UK) the Electronic Commerce (EC Directive) Regulations 2002 were brought into force on 21 August 2002 through S.I. 2002 No. 2013. Ss. 17-19 follow the wording of arts. 12-14 of Directive 2000/31/EC virtually word for word, relieving internet service providers of liability for "damages or for any other pecuniary remedy" in relation to either being a "mere conduit" for information, "caching" it and "hosting" it respectively, where the internet service provider has a purely passive role in the relaying or storing of information and would be otherwise liable. Under the common law in Scotland before the aforementioned regulations, Lord Anderson held that innocence was a defence pleadable by "mere messengers", or the mechanical instrument by which the slander was published (Gibson v. National Citizens' Council (1921) 1 SLT 241). Defenders who are not responsible for the form or content of the material in which the defamation is contained will be prima facie liable for defamation but may use this defence as an escape hatch from liability if they can show that they did not know that the material contained a libel and that this ignorance was not due to any negligence on their part. A library is not expected to check every single book that it possesses and cannot therefore be held to be aware of the contents of them all (Weldon v. "The Times" Book Co. Ltd. (1911) 28 TLR 143). However, it is no excuse for a distributor to say that the mass and volume of its business precludes it from checking the material it distributes (Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada v. W. H. Smith & Son Ltd. (1933) 150 LT 211). The net result of Morrison v. Ritchie & Co. (1902) 4 F 645 does not read well for initial publishers or broadcasters of information provided by third parties. In this case, the defence of innocent publication did not apply since the newspaper (as the initial publisher) was held responsible for whatever appeared in its own columns and was therefore expected to take care to ensure that it printed nothing defamatory.

44. In IRELAND the European Communities (Directive 2000/31/EC) Regulations 2003 were brought into force on 24 February 2003 by S.I. No. 68 of 2003. "The Regulations create an exemption from liability for intermediary service providers (persons whose business consists in the connection of persons to the Internet) where certain activities are performed and in certain circumstances" (Explanatory Note to S.I. No. 68 of 2003, available at http://www.irishstatutebook.ie/ZZSI68Y2003.html). Ss. 16-18 of S.I. no. 68 of 2003 follow a near-identical format and wording to arts. 12-14 of the Directive, under which purely passive and anonymous intermediary service providers that transmit, cache and host information are relieved of liability for misinformation. At common law, persons who are in the final stage of the distribution process of a libel such as newspaper vendors, booksellers and others may avail themselves of an exception to the rule that each time another person becomes aware of a defamatory statement there is actionable publication (innocent dissemination). Provided that, as persons carrying on their business properly, they neither knew nor ought to have known that the paper or book contained a libel, they are not deemed to be publishers at all (Fitzgibbon v. Eason & Son Ltd. (1910) 45 ILTR 91; Ross v. Eason & Son Ltd. [1911] 2 IR 459; O'Brien v. Eason & Son (1913) 47 ILTR 266; McDermott v. Eason & Son (1913) 48 ILTR 1; Vizetelly v. Mudie's Select Library Ltd. [1900] 2 QB 170; Bottomley v. F. W. Woolworth & Co. Ltd (1932) 48 TLR 521). The onus is on the defendant to establish he or she is innocent and comes within the exception (Ross v. Eason & Son Ltd. loc. cit.; McDermott v. Eason & Son loc. cit.).

VI.–2:205: Loss upon breach of confidence

Loss caused to a person as a result of the communication of information which, either from its nature or the circumstances in which it was obtained, the person communicating the information knows or could reasonably be expected to know is confidential to the person suffering the loss is legally relevant damage.

COMMENTS

A. General

Source of inspiration. The provision takes its inspiration from the rules on liability for breach of confidence originating in the Common Law. Loss suffered as a result of a breach of confidence amounts to damage recognised in the law on non-contractual liability. Liability, however, only arises if all the other requirements of VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) (i.e. causation and accountability) are satisfied as well.

Relationship to other rules. In a few situations, the damage described in this Article may coincide with injuries or losses that already amount to legally relevant damage under other provisions. According to the general rules, the claimant then has multiple causes of action, but of course can only have the total damage satisfied once. Since VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another) relates to false information while the present Article, in contrast, deals with correct (but confidential) information, each rule's scope of application is clearly separate from the other. It is readily conceivable, however, that a breach of confidence may cause e.g. damage to mental health in the sense of VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss) – for instance, where a doctor breaches doctor/patient confidentiality and consequently an already psychologically fragile patient becomes severely depressed. Moreover, cases of absolute confidentiality may fall to be addressed under the right to privacy whose infringement constitutes a breach of the right to respect for personal dignity (VI.–2:203 (Infringement of personal dignity, liberty and privacy)). Nonetheless, despite such overlaps, it cannot be assumed that VI.–2:205 is superfluous. In the first place, VI.–2:203 is confined to protecting a natural person's right to personal dignity, whereas VI.–2:205 also provides protection for the confidences of legal persons. And secondly, the confidential information may not be of a 'private', that is to say, personal nature: an individual's sensitive commercial information would fall for protection primarily under this Article, rather than as an aspect of privacy.

II.–3:302 (Breach of confidentiality). II.–3:302 (Breach of confidentiality) governs a special case of so-called culpa in contrahendo. The Article imposes on a party who has obtained confidential information from a contractual partner in the course of the contractual negotiations a duty neither to disclose that information nor to use it for the party's own ends. Provision is made for compensation for damage suffered and restitution of the benefit received where this duty is breached. Thus VI.–2:205 and II.–3:302 (Breach of confidentiality) in part cover like situations. Their relationship to one another is determined by the general rules for cases of conflicting regulations set out in VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraphs (c) and (d). Due to VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation) paragraph (4) it is conceivable that liability under II.–3:302 extends further than liability under general non-contractual liability law. In this case, according to VI.–1:103(d), contractual liability for the committed culpa in contrahendo prevails. Conversely, VI.–2:205 is the basis for a claim where the parties neither concluded a contract nor even engaged in any contractual negotiations.

A informs B about A's idea for a new carpet grip with express reference to the confidentiality of this information. Without the conscious intention of plagiarism, B further develops this idea and exploits it for commercial ends. B is liable to A in damages even where B and A were not in contractual negotiations.

Relation to Chapter 3, Section 1. The subject matter of VI.–2:205 are all those circumstances establishing an obligation to respect the confidentiality of information. This extends beyond cases of actual knowledge of confidentiality to cases in which there is an absence of knowledge only because the injuring person has been careless in appreciating the circumstances. All questions relating to the mode of breach of duty, however, are the subject matter of Chapter 3, Section 1. The breach of duty consists in the communication of the confidential information. To be capable of establishing liability the communication must either be intentional or negligent within the meanings of VI.–3:101 (Intention) or VI.–3:102 (Negligence).

B. Communication of confidential information

Communication. The provision, like VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another) which invokes the same concept of "communication" of information, presupposes a communication of the information to a third party. What types of act constitute such a "communication" must be established on a case by case basis in harmony with the development of that concept within the parameters of the preceding Article. It is not a ground of defence that the information is true, but furtherance of a public interest (see VI.–5:203 (Protection of public interest)) may play a role here too as a ground of defence.

Information. The expression "information" in the context of VI.–2:205 has the same meaning as in the context of VI.–2:204. It embraces assertions of fact, not mere value judgements. The subject-matter of VI.–2:205, however, consists of true assertions of fact (since only true assertions of fact can be confidential), and, in contrast to VI.–2:204, it need not necessarily relate to information about the injured person. It may concern information about third parties or other circumstances e.g. a commercial transaction or a business concept (as in illustration 1).

Third parties. Liability arising on the basis of VI.–2:205 only affects those who communicate the confidential information. Third parties who exploit for their own purposes a breach of confidence by those to whom the information was entrusted do not come within this provision. Conceivably, however, such persons may be liable under the rules of unjustified enrichment in respect of the benefits derived from making use of this protected 'asset' of the victim.

Absolute and relative confidentiality. The provision embraces not merely cases in which the recipient of the information has obtained the information when sworn to silence, but also cases in which the information is relayed when the recipient knew or ought to have known that the information was confidential and not for further communication. The injuring person need not positively have known that confidential information was involved; it is enough that the confidentiality of the information ought to have been recognised and that the information is communicated merely negligently. Thus the confidentiality protected may be either 'relative' or 'absolute' in character. The former is concerned with information which is made confidential only by the manner in which it is transmitted (typically, where it is made explicit that the information is to be treated as a matter of confidence). This certainly addresses cases in which information is directly imparted by the person affected in explicit terms of secrecy, but it also extends to cases where the information is received directly, provided the recipient ought to know from the manner of communication that the information is confidential to someone other than the intermediary (e.g. because the intermediary has repeated the explicit requirement of secrecy) or has 'eavesdropped' on the original communication and in that way learned that the recipient must treat the information as confidential. The latter is concerned with cases where the information has in some other manner become available to the injuring person and it is the very obvious sensitive nature of the information itself, rather than the manner in which it is come by, which signals or ought to signal the confidential character of the information. Classic examples would be the discovery of another's medical records or private journal.

Illustration 2
An employee of a health authority passes on information to a reporter, which, if published, would be sufficient to identify two doctors as suffering from AIDS. The doctors can claim an order (under VI.–1:102 (Prevention)) to restrain publication.

C. Legal consequences

Reparation and prevention. As long as the other prerequisites of VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) are present, in particular causation and intention (or negligence), the usual legal consequences arise. Thus reparation may be demanded for both non-economic and economic losses (VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (1)). In cases involving VI.–2:205, preventative legal protection (VI.–1:102 (Prevention) and Chapter 6 Section 3 below) as well as the rule in VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation) paragraph (4) assume particular significance. The latter provision allows damages to be assessed according to the amount of profit realised by the injuring person .

NOTES

1. Damage resulting from the unauthorised disclosure of confidential information is dealt with by the various European tort law systems in varying systematic contexts. However, the outcomes respectively attained only marginally diverge from each other. In FRANCE and BELGIUM certain emphasis is placed upon the law of breach of professional secrecy, which is accorded criminal liability under French NCP art. 226-13 and Belgian CP art. 458 and therefore also civil liability under CC arts. 1382 and 1383. Criminality of conduct is not, however, a prerequisite for civil liability. Non-pecuniary damage caused by the breach of a professional duty of secrecy or discretion is as recoverable as pecuniary damage caused by same (CFI Brussels 25 February 2000, TBH 2001, 860, note Buyle and Delierneux: negligent breach of banking confidentiality; since the recipient of the information had not made use of it, there was solely non-pecuniary damage). A breach of confidence may in some situations further constitute a violation of the right to respect for one's private or family life (French CC art. 9; Belgian Const. art. 22) (JClCiv [-Ravanas], art. 9, fasc. 10 no. 30; de Theux, Ann. Louv. 2002, 287, 296). In French doctrine it is additionally alluded to, that where in the course of contractual negotiations confidential information is disclosed to a contracting party by the other side, he has a duty of discretion, and indeed even where confidentiality is not expressly agreed upon (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats (2004/2005) no. 3710-1).

2. In SPAIN there is extensive overlap between the criminal norms on the spying out and divulgement of secrets (CP arts. 197 et seq.; CP art. 200 extends its protective purpose to legal persons also) and the matters that ground liability under Law 1/1982 of 5 May on the Civil Protection of the Right to one's Honour, Sphere of Intimacy and Control over the Reproduction of one's Image, art. 7 (Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 49). Within the scope of application of Law 1/1982, the civil law consequences of a criminal offence are subject to the rules of this law alone and not those of CP (loc. cit. art. 1(2)). Express enumeration is provided for, inter alia, the unauthorised publication of letters, memoirs or other private personal writings (loc. cit. art. 7(3)). The relevant criminal and civil law norms are interpreted as flowing from the fundamental rights protection of secrecy of communication (TS 23 October 2000, RAJ 2000 (5) no. 8791 p. 13632), this being a strand of the fundamental right to the protection of one's sphere of privacy (TS 14 May 2001, RAJ 2001 (2) no. 2719 p. 4370). Against this backdrop, TS 7 December 1995, RAJ 1995 (5) no. 9268 p. 12329 granted e.g. the adoptive children of a prominent couple non-pecuniary compensation because a newspaper had published information on the children's biological descent; in applying Law 1/1982 art. 9 the estimated profit of the newspaper was included in the amount of damages. In the context of this and similar decisions, the protection offered by the law on liability for exposing "family secrets" is ultimately at issue, i.e. the confidentiality of facts that relate to the family and are known only by its members (TC 231/1988 of 2 December 1988, BOE no. 307 of 23 December 1988; TC 197/1991 of 17 October 1991, BOE no. 274 of 15 November 1991; TC 134/1999 of 15 July 1999, BOE no. 197 of 18 August 1999). Breach of professional secrecy is likewise relevant for both the civil (loc. cit. art. 7(4)) and criminal (CP art. 199) law. The term professional secrecy is interpreted broadly (Yzquierdo Tolsada, in: Reglero Campos (ed.), Tratado de responsabilidad civil, 1113). Even a nanny who worked at a prominent couple's house is bound to secrecy by the aforementioned provisions (TC 115/2000 of 10 May 2000, BOE no. 136 of 7 June 2000). Furthermore, liability is founded where after finding out in the course of her work at a public hospital that one of her patients had had two abortions, a doctor tells her (the doctor's) mother about it, who in turn spills the beans to a relation of the patient, who shares the same home town (TS 4 April 2001, RAJ 2001 (2) no. 2016 p. 3292). Further special rules of liability relate to the protection of confidential personal data (Gesetz 15/1999, of 13 December, über Datenschutz [Ley Orgánica 15/1999, de 13 de diciembre, de Protección de Datos de Carácter Personal] arts. 10 and 19) and the protection against premature publication of secret information in patent registrations (CP art. 277).

3. In ITALY the first question in the firing line is whether a specific duty of secrecy has been breached. Typical cases relate to the unauthorised disclosure of professional secrets (CP art. 622) and the breach of duties of loyalty arising out of an employment relationship (CC art. 2105; see Cass.sez.lav. 9 May 1996, no. 4328, Giust.civ.Mass. 1996, 696). A breach of confidence leaves in its wake fallout for primarily criminal, employment and administrative law, and founds civil liability where it occasions danno ingiusto, i.e. harm to a subjective legal position (Cass.sez.pen. 13 January 1999, no. 2183, Riv.giur.pol. 1999, 480). In any event, the only decisive point for private law is of course whether the prerequisites of CC art. 2043 are fulfilled and it is readily conceivable that after taking all the circumstances of the individual case into consideration and affirming the existence of danno ingiusto, liability will be also declared where the breach of a specific duty of secrecy is absent. To date, case law on this point seems to be non-existent.

4. In the central and southern European countries, as in all civil law countries, an independent head of liability for "breach of confidence" is lacking. However, functional equivalents are to be found in every system. Under HUNGARIAN CC § 81(1) a violation of another's right of personality is committed by anyone who e.g. interferes with secrecy of postal correspondence, comes into the possession of private or business secrets and publishes them without authorisation or misuses them in another way. In 2003, a more precise definition of the term "trade secret" was adopted into law through CC § 81(2)-(4). In contrast, there is no corresponding legal definition of the term "private secret". It is said that private secrets are facts that are known only by few people and to the non-disclosure of which the person affected has a justified claim because his personality would be injured if the fact were to reach the public (Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog I[2], 190/3). A certain amount of effort is therefore required of the affected party in shielding the secret. Private secrets may be simultaneously "professional secrets"; particularly prominent examples are offered by doctor/patient and lawyer/client confidentiality (Gellert [-Zoltán], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 313; cf. in case law also BH 1999/156 [along with doctors, other hospital workers are under a duty of discretion in relation to patients' medical information and indeed even after their treatment is concluded] and BH 1995/87 [a hospital violates a patient's personality rights where it refuses to issue him the documents relating to his treatment and operation]). CC § 80 brings additional claims against the misuse of a person's image or utterances into play, CC §§ 86 and 87 guarantee the protection of intellectual creations, among which e.g. particular business knowledge ("know how") is also counted. A greater number of criminal law norms supplement the private law bases; where any person acts contrary to these criminal provisions and damage is occasioned, this person is as a rule also civilly liable. Among those enumerated are for example CP § 177(1) (breach of private secrets); CP § 177/A(1) (protection of personal data); CP § 178(1) (breach of postal secrecy) and CP § 178/A(1) (spying out of private secrets through trespass to property or the use of technological devices).

5. In GERMANY the general right of personality (CC § 823(1)) also safeguards against the disclosure of personal secrets worthy of protection (MünchKomm [-Rixecker], BGB[4], appendix to § 12, no. 107). A distinction is drawn between one's sphere of individuality, privacy and intimacy (for more detail, see Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[65], § 823, no. 87; BVerfG 15 December 1999, NJW 2000, 1021; BVerfG 7 May 1997, NJW 1997, 2669). A violation of the general right of personality was seen e.g. in secretly taken photographs (BGH 10 May 1957, BGHZ 24, 200), in a detailed press report on a person's sex life (BGH 24 November 1987, NJW 1988, 1984), as well as in the television broadcast of a naked photograph of a person who had only consented to its publication in a biology book (BGH 22 January 1985, NJW 1985, 1617). Other forms of betraying confidentiality are covered by criminal laws (in particular CP §§ 201 et seq.: breach of oral confidentiality and highly personal living space through the taking of photographs; breach of postal secrecy; spying out of data, as well as of corporate or trade secrets; breach of doctors', lawyers', administrations' etc. duty of confidentiality) that, for their part, are protective laws in the sense of CC § 823(2). Additionally, the provisions of the Federal Data Protection Law is counted as a protective law (Staudinger [-Hager], BGB[13], § 823, no. C 172). Corporate secrets, under further specific requisites, are singled out, even advocated, as belonging among the "other" absolute rights of CC § 823(1) (BGH 25 January 1955, BGHZ 16, 172, 175; Soergel [-Zeuner], BGB[12], § 823, no. 145); however, that may not be the prevailing opinion (see further Erman [-Schiemann], BGB II[11], § 823, no. 40; MünchKomm [-Wagner], BGB[4], § 823, no. 158; BGH 18 March 1955, BGHZ 17, 41, 51; BGH 9 March 1989, BGHZ 107, 117, 122).

6. AUSTRIAN Law also does not work with an independent head of liability for breach of confidence. It systematically covers the corresponding potential for social conflict by other means. Of particular note are the rules on affronts to honour (CC § 1330(1)) and on the violation of the right of personality. An infringement of the right of personality takes place e.g. where the right to respect for one's sphere of secrecy is disregarded. It protects privacy of the person and his or her utterances that are not intended for the public (Rummel [-Aicher], ABGB I³, § 16 no. 24, with further references to the concretion of this principle in specific laws). The right to observance of one's sphere of privacy embraces the protection against the penetration of one's sphere of secrecy, as well as the protection against the publication of legally obtained secrets (OGH 24 October 1978, SZ 51/146). A breach of professional secrecy will also typically fulfil the requisites for the violation of a protective law.

7. In GREECE the right to respect for private life is interpreted as a facet of the general right of personality (Karakostas, Prosopikotita kai tipos, 62). The latter is violated where details from a person's private life are published, even where true statements are concerned (Karakostas loc. cit. 64 and 76). The "right to privacy" is infringed, for instance, where hitherto secret bodily imperfections are dragged into the public domain. The secret zone of one's private life is very generally protected by CC art. 57 (Kapsalis, Persönlichkeitsrecht und Persönlichkeitsschutz nach griechischem Privatrecht unter Berücksichtigung des deutschen Rechts [The Right of Personality and its Protection under Greek Private Law, with due Regard for German Law], 106). Infringements of postal (CP art. 370) and professional secrecy (CP art. 371; e.g. doctors) are criminally punishable; in such cases civil liability flows from CC art. 914 (Alexiades, Eisagogi sto Iatriko Dikaio, 28).

8. In PORTUGAL the basis for tort law protection of secrecy is CC art. 70(2) (Injury to personality). It is stated that all the thoughts, opinions, feelings, events, actions, omissions or characters that an individual recognizably hides, thus manifesting their will not to reveal them, are interests of personality worthy of legal protection where the person affected has a legal and socially acceptable interest in maintaining the respective secret (Capelo de Sousa, O direito geral de personalidade, 335). A civil wrong is committed under CC arts. 75(1) and 77 particularly where someone publishes the private letters or confidential diary entries and memories of another for their own gain; the situation is of course different where the affected party personally makes this and other personal data accessible to the public (Carvalho Rebelo, A responsabilidade civil pela televisão, 80). CC art. 79(2) provides for specific limitations in the case of persons of contemporary celebrity. However, that does not give the press a carte blanche. For instance, it is not permitted to publish details on the private home of a famous football player (STJ 14 June 2005). Special rules have been developed for data protection, especially for information on the religious affiliation, membership in political parties, state of health and sex life of the affected party (1999 and 2001/2003 reports of the activities of the Comissão Nacional de Protecção de Dados, http://www.cnpd.pt/bin/relatorios/anos/relat99.htm).

9. DUTCH Law addresses the problematics of "breach of confidence" first and foremost in the context of privacy protection (cf. Const. art. 10), among which the right to personally determine whether personal data may be collected, saved and viewed is counted. This in turn encompasses the right to personally decide on the relay of such information (Verheij, Vergoeding van immateriële schade, 192; Onrechtmatige Daad IV [-Schuijt] chap. VII, note 101 pp. 1387-1410). Whether a breach of confidentiality will constitute a civil wrong is decided either according to whether a protective law (particularly a provision of the criminal code on professional duties of secrecy) is infringed, or if such a criminal offence is lacking, whether the breach of confidentiality contravenes "codes of practice for commercial dealings based on unwritten law" (CC art. 6:162(2)(third alternative)). The aspects to be taken into consideration within the framework of this assessment are manifold (severity of infringement, type and degree of intimacy of the information, duration of the adverse effects, meaning and recency of the information's content, the affected party's personal living circumstances, the reason for and circumstances of publication, the character of publication medium and the expense that was necessary in order to obtain possession of another's personal data: Onrechtmatige Daad IV [-Schuijt] loc. cit. note 104, pp. 1412-1414). Liability for breach of professional secrecy is subject to the respective contract regime. The internal rules set down by the profession itself and even disciplinary decisions of the respective professional bodies can be considered in the assessment of liability, but are not of decisive significance for its result (Onrechtmatige Daad IV [-Huijgen] chap. VI.2, note 18 pp. 24-25; note 31 p. 47 and notes 118- 119 pp. 240-241). The ESTONIAN LOA contains no provision similar to VI.–2:205. However, the disclosure of confidential information may give rise to an obligation to compensate for damage if the unlawfulness can be established on some basis, e.g. the confidentiality duty of providers of health care services (LOA § 768) and the confidentiality duty of parties to precontractual negotiations (LOA § 14(4)).

10. In SWEDEN, on top of Law on Damages chap. 2 § 2, criminal law (e.g. CP chap. 4 §§ 8-9c [secrecy of communication and data] and chap. 20 § 3 [professional secrecy]) often also provides the framework for civil liability, provided the result of the infringement committed falls within the scope of protection of the respective norm (Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 86). A breach of confidentiality with a subsequent injury to personality entails additional liability for compensation for insult (Law on Damages chap. 2 § 3; Bengtsson and Strömbäck loc. cit. 62); it may also concern damage to health (Conradi, Brottsskadelagen, 27: the "nervous disorder" of a woman after an employee of a hospital spoke freely about her abortion). Several specialised laws come to the table with their own criminal norms and occasionally even their own systems of liability, e.g. Law on the Protection of Corporate Secrets (lag [1990:409] om skydd för företagshemligheter) §§ 5-10; Law on Banking and Financial Efficacy (lag [2004:297] om bank- och finansieringsrörelse) chap. 1 § 10(1) and (3) (on its significance for civil liability, see further Prop 2002/03:139 pp. 472, 477) as well as Law on Electronic Communication (lag [2003:389] om elektronisk kommunikation) chap. 7 § 15(1). In chap. 38, FINNISH CP (strafflag of 19 December 1889 no. 39) lists an array of criminal offences from the area of breach of secrecy, the commission of which can simultaneously trigger civil liability (Law on Damages chap. 5 § 1). Further basic requisites for criminal offences in this context are to be found in CP chap. 24 § 8 (dissemination of information that infringes on privacy), chap. 24 § 5 (unauthorised eavesdropping) and chap. 24 § 6 (unauthorised observation). Additionally, the Law on Improprietous Commercial Conduct also applies to the protection of corporate secrets (lag om otillbörligt förfarande i näringsverksamhet of 22 December 1978 no. 1061) §§ 4 and 10, cf. Supreme Court 15 March 1984, HD 1984, II, 43. The duty of discretion of credit institutions is to be found in Law on Credit Institutions (kreditinstitutslag of 30 December 1993 no. 1607) § 94. DANISH CP (Bekendtgørelse af straffeloven of 27 September 2005) § 152 (Duty of Discretion in the Civil Service), § 263, § 264 (Postal, Telephone and further Secrets) and § 264c(2) (Trade Secrets) become civilly operative in the context of the general culpa rule. On the protection of corporate secrets, see also Law on Merchandising (lov om markedsføring of 21 December 2005 no. 1389) §§ 19 and 117 (Banking Secrecy). Other injuries to personality are subject to general tort law, cf. e.g. Eastern CA 23 October 1990, UfR 1991, 194 (a doctor publishes photos from an operation in which the applicant was having liposuction done; the applicant's face remained recognisable in the picture; liability under Law on Damages § 26).

11. In IRELAND, the exact basis for the protection afforded against misuse of confidential information is not easy to identify, with elements of contract, equity, property law, tort and constitutional law evident in the leading cases on the subject (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para 37.21). It is sometimes stated that the courts are "asked to enforce what is essentially a moral obligation" (House of Spring Gardens Ltd. v. Point Blank Ltd. [1984] IR 611, 663 (SC) [Costello J. in the High Court, O'Higgins C.J. in the Supreme Court]; Oblique Financial Services Ltd. v. The Promise Production Co. Ltd. [1994] 1 ILRM 74, 77 [Keane J.]). In the case of Seager v. Copydex Ltd. (No. 2) [1969] 1 WLR 809, Lord Denning MR and Winn LJ supported the argument that what is hereunder concerned is akin to the tort of conversion of a proprietary interest. However, this approach has been criticised in commentary wherein the proprietary nature of most intimate confidences is questioned (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 37.22; Lavery, Commercial Secrets, chap. 2). In Coco v. AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd. [1969] FSR 415; [1969] RPC 41, Megarry J. stated the three elements of breach of confidence: "First, the information itself…. must have the necessary quality of confidence about it. Secondly, that information must have been imparted in circumstances importing an obligation of confidence. Thirdly, there must be an unauthorised use of that information to the detriment of the party communicating it" (loc. cit. 419-420). In order to fulfil the first requirement, the information "must not be something which is public property and public knowledge" (Lord Greene MR in Saltman Engineering Co. Ltd. v. Campbell Engineering Co. Ltd. [1978] 65 RPC 203, 215). The obligation under the second requirement can arise as a term of contract, express or implied, or "by imposition of the law" (Gurry, Breach of Confidence, para. 2-24); this includes relationships such as those between employer and employee (Lavery loc. cit. chap. 7), doctor and patient (Tomkin and Hanafin, Irish Medical Law, chap. 4; Mason and McCall Smith, Law and Medical Ethics[7], chap. 8), accountants (Parry-Jones v. Law Society [1969] 1 Ch 1), lawyers (Gurry loc. cit. chap. 18), bankers (Donnelly, The Law of Banks and Credit Institutions, 147-166; Tournier v. National Provincial & Union Bank of England [1924] 1 KB 461) and their clients, intimate personal relationships (Argyll v. Argyll [1967] Ch 302; Stephens v. Avery [1988] Ch 449) and other situations where confidences have been relied upon for a particular limited purpose. A general test for such obligation was suggested by Megarry J. in Coco v. AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd. [1969] FSR 415; [1969] RPC 41, 48, namely that "if the circumstances are such that any reasonable man standing in the shoes of the recipient of the information would have realised upon reasonable grounds the information was being given to them in confidence, then this should suffice to impose upon him the equitable obligation of confidence". Remedies for breach of confidence range from injunctions, Anton Piller - or "search and seize" - orders (House of Spring Gardens Ltd. v. Point Blank Ltd. [1984] IR 611; Toulson and Phipps, Confidentiality, para. 10-15), orders for delivery up or destruction (Franklin v. Giddins [1978] Qd R 72; Robb v. Green [1895] 2 QB 315; Peter Pan Manufacturing Corp. v. Corsets Silhouette Ltd. [1964] 1 WLR 96), an account for profits (House of Spring Gardens Ltd. v. Point Blank Ltd. loc. cit.; Peter Pan Manufacturing Corporation v. Corsets Silhouette Ltd. loc. cit.; A-G v. Guardian Newspapers Ltd. (No. 2) [1990] 1 AC 109), restitutionary (Lavery loc. cit. 253-254; Toulson and Phipps loc. cit. paras 10.06-10.08) or declaratory (Malone v. Metropolitan Police Commissioner (No. 2) [1979] Ch 344) relief and - most controversially - damages (Lavery loc. cit. 244-252; Toulson and Phipps loc. cit. paras. 2.06-2.11, 10.09-10.13). It must also be noted that Ireland has not seen the tendency apparent in the UK to expand the equitable breach of confidence action and use it as a panacea for claims involving privacy, nor have any concrete indications been evident from case law (Report of the Working Group on Privacy, 31 March 2006, para. 2.44, http://www.justice.ie/en/JELR/WkgGrpPrivacy.pdf/Files/WkgGrpPrivacy.pdf). It is stated in scholarly writing (Cassidy, (2004) 98 (5) LSG 14) that this lack of expansion is due to the recognition of a general right of privacy in 1987 (Kennedy & Arnold v. Ireland [1987] 1 IR 587) and the statement in the High Court in 1992, that the constitutional right to privacy was co-extensive with the common law right to confidentiality (Desmond & Dedeir v. Glackin (Minister for Industry and Commerce, Ireland) & A-G (No. 2) [1993] 3 IR 67: confidential information obtained from the Central Bank).

12. SCOTLAND also recognises the wrong of disclosing information in breach of confidence, of an implied undertaking or obligation not to do so (Walker, Delict[2], 709), with Megarry J.'s three requirements from Coco v. AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd. [1969] FSR 415; [1969] RPC 41 (see above, Note 12) also applicable in the aftermath of the case (though the requirement of the obligation of confidence was whittled away by cases such as Francome v. Mirror Group Newspapers Ltd. [1984] 1 WLR 892; Stephens v. Avery [1988] Ch 449; Barrymore v. News Group Newspapers Ltd. [1997] FSR 600; A-G v. Guardian Newspapers Ltd. (No. 2) [1990] 1 AC 109; Shelley Films Ltd. v. Rex Features Ltd. [1994] EMLR 134 and Hellewell v. Chief Constable of Derbyshire [1995] 1 WLR 804). The traditional action centres around the issue of whether the circumstances were such as to impose a duty on the defender to keep confidence and maintain secrecy about the information which had been disclosed to him. Here the absence of an express contractual prohibition on disclosing secrets is not fatal to a pursuer's claim (Printers & Finishers Ltd. v. Holloway (No. 2) [1965] 1 WLR 1), being an implied term for persons of "professional standing" (Walker loc. cit.). An obligation also exists where there was no contract of employment, e.g. where information would be divulged to a clergyman by a parishioner making confession or seeking advice (Broad v. Pitt (1828) 3 C & P 518, 172 ER 528). The duty of confidence in this sense also probably exists in any case where one person communicates information to another with the request that the latter do not publish it further, agreement to this becoming contractual if the second person does not demur to receiving the information (Walker loc. cit. 710). It seems that case law (Douglas v. Hello! Ltd. (No. 1) [2001] QB 967; Venables and Thompson v. News Group Newspapers Ltd. [2001] Fam 430; Theakston v. Mirror Group Newspapers Ltd. [2002] EWHC 137 (QB), [2002] EMLR 22; A v. B plc. [2002] EWCA Civ 337, [2003] QB 195; Campbell v. Mirror Group Newspapers [2002] EWHC 499 (QB), [2002] EMLR 30; rev'd [2003] QB 633 (CA); Douglas v. Hello! Ltd. (No. 3) [2003] EWHC 786 (Ch), 3 All ER 996 (Lindsay J.); X, A Woman formerly known as Mary Bell v. O'Brien [2003] EWHC (QB) 1101; [2003] EMLR 37) has recently cross-bred breach of confidence in the UK with the rights contained in ECHR arts. 8 and 10. This has resulted in an overarching cause of action, thus casting the net beyond merely cases of breach of confidence, reeling in breach of privacy wholesale, and thereby - through its protection of privacy - rendering any apparent (necessity for) recognition of a free-standing right to privacy virtually immaterial. The two main extensions of the law of breach of confidence have been summarised thus: "(1) the scope of the information recognised as confidential has broadened and the assessment of this includes the impact of the form of the proposed publication, the test being whether the disclosure would be highly offensive to a reasonable person of ordinary sensibilities and would shock the conscience…; and (2) there may be an obligation of confidentiality even although the information was not really imparted in a relation of confidence" (MacQueen, (2004) 8 Edinburgh LRev 249). The second extension is particularly relevant to the amalgamation with breach of privacy and is a significant departure from the statement that "[t]he law of confidentiality proceeds on the basis of the existence between confider and confidant of an obligation of confidence" (Bonnigton, (1992) SLT 289, 290) existing before the information has been imparted. In its current form, the "basis" of breach of confidence is no longer to be found; this is since, in the cross-over cases mentioned above involving the serruptitious taking of photographs, the information is not willingly or voluntarily imparted in confidence, rather the information is seized by or comes into the possession of the defender, resulting in the situation that in fact no confidence or trust ever existed at all. This means that the obligation of confidence is imposed because of the very seruptitious "gathering" of private information and not (as was traditionally so) due to an obligation based on information confided by the pursuer and so carrying the essential ingredient of trust and confidence, with the defender's conscience binding him not to relay the information to a party external to this relationship of trust.

VI.–2:206: Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession

(1) Loss caused to a person as a result of an infringement of that person's property right or lawful possession of a movable or immovable thing is legally relevant damage.

(2) In this Article:

(a) loss includes being deprived of the use of property;

(b) infringement of a property right includes destruction of or physical damage to the subject-matter of the right (property damage), disposition of the right, interference with its use and other disturbance of the exercise of the right.

COMMENTS

A. General

The Article in overview. This Article takes as its subject-matter loss caused by an infringement of another's property right or lawful possession (paragraph (1)). Paragraph (2) explains what is meant by "loss" and "infringement" of property. The definition of "loss" in VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) remains unaffected by this; VI.–2:206(2)(a) is concerned with extending, not restricting, that general definition.

Accountability. Under these rules, the infringement of a property right and infliction of legally relevant damage thereby occasioned do not automatically result in liability. As with all the Articles in Chapter 2, VI.–2:206 pertains only to the question of what constitutes legally relevant damage. Whether someone is then liable for it, is only decided in the Chapters that follow: the injuring person must have caused the damage deliberately or negligently or be otherwise responsible for its causation and have no defences available.

Loss as legally relevant damage. VI.–2:206(1) makes it clear that an infringement of a property right is not damage per se (injury as such). Rather the existence of a legally relevant damage depends on the existence of an economic or a non-economic loss.

N has cultivated land belonging to L without L's permission or other authority. The pleasant decorative effect as well as the investment of plants has added considerably to the value of the land. Since N has made use of L's land and modified its appearance, N has infringed L's property rights in respect of the land and L may have a right to prevent further acts of gardening, infringing his property rights, under VI.–1:102 (Prevention), but N's interference has not necessarily caused L any legally relevant damage. Indeed, so far from causing L an economic loss, N's activity has conferred on L a valuable benefit if L is not correspondingly liable to N (under the law of unjustified enrichments) for the full value of the improvement to the land. Unless L can show that the use of the land has interfered with his (L's) plans (e.g. because L will now incur a cost in having to clear the land of trees and shrubs to make way for a building) or that he has suffered some other loss as a result of the infringement of his property rights, L will have suffered no legally relevant damage.

Illustration 2

A ship damages a disused and worthless quay. Damage to property, in the sense of a violation of ownership rights, it may be, but legally relevant damage it is not. The latter would require a financial loss on the part of the quay owner.

Relationship to other regimes. Consideration must also be given to the fact that in relation to title to things some special statutory regime may apply and will then take precedence over VI.–2:206 (see VI.–1:103(c) (Scope of application)) as far as its purposes so require. That will be of significance in particular in relation to infringements of property rights within a so-called owner-possessor relationship (see below Comment B).

Remedies. VI.–2:206 must be read in conjunction with the provisions on remedies contained in Chapter 6. Particularly of Note in this context are VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation) paragraph (3), VI.–6:104 (Multiple injured parties) and VI.–6:201 (Injured person's right of election). VI.–6:101(3) concerns cases in which the costs for the repair of a thing exceed their value. VI.–6:104 in its main thrust addresses the question who among several holders of property rights in relation to a given thing can demand reimbursement of expenditure on repairs. Finally, it falls within the framework of VI.–6:201 (Injured person's right of election) to consider whether it is one or the other holder of a property right or only both of them together who is or are authorised to decide whether the compensation provided is to be invested in reinstating the property to its former condition or whether it should be applied for other purposes.

B. Property rights and questions arising from property law

Terminological difficulties. Hitherto, the private law systems of the European Union neither boast a unified concept of "ownership" nor a uniform notion of "lawful possession". Thus, it may be that in the course of further deliberations on a European private law it will prove necessary to adjust the formulation of VI.–2:206 in line with more recent developments. On the other hand, it appeared to be untenable not to expressly rank losses resulting from an infringement of ownership or lawful possession under the "Particular Instances of Legally Relevant Damage" solely because of apparent terminological and conceptual difficulties that are still tied to both those notions. The law of property's inconsistent terminology does not call into question the general core content of the values underlying non-contractual liability law.

Property rights. VI.–2:206 expressly relates only to property rights in movable or immovable things. However, this provision is not limited to any specific type of property right. Generally any proprietary right will suffice. It is not necessary that the claimant affected be the owner of all interest in the property. "Infringement of property" within the meaning of the provision may also be suffered by one who is admittedly not the holder of all the rights of an owner in the property, but who holds some of the property rights which make up ownership (e.g. a mere pledge). What rights are in point of fact "property rights" can only be answered, at the current stage of European legal development, by dipping into the respective applicable national law. An example is provided by the question of whether one who has acquired subject to the seller's reservation of title is to be regarded as a holder of a property right (i.e. of a so-called Anwartschaftsrecht). The answers to this question may turn out differently, without thereby putting in doubt the principle that VI.–2:206 seeks to express.

Nuisance. In order to ascertain whether there is damage under VI.–2:206, which turns on the infringement of a property right, it will be necessary to look to property law to ascertain the boundaries of any right: the act of the injuring person must be an incursion on another's rights of property. As has already been noted, this interrelation between the law in this Book and the law of property (on which European rules remain to be developed) will be of particular significance in relation to nuisance. While the cause of action arises in this Book by virtue of damage suffered within the meaning of VI.–2:206, to establish that the injuring person's conduct infringed the injured person's rights as landowner will depend on showing that the injuring person exceeded the bounds of enjoyment determined in property law for the use of the land. What levels of noise from neighbours, for example, must be tolerated by a landowner, and what can be objected to, will be part and parcel of the demarcation of the limits of property rights as between neighbours. Such intangible boundaries are as much a part of property law as the physical divide between different land holdings. A similar point may be made in relation to rights of property in movables. Those rights may be limited by social mores and accepted conventions, so that in given circumstances, quite aside from questions of whether the injury is so trivial as to preclude the grant of redress, it may be that as a matter of property law there is no infringement of a property right and therefore no damage under this Article. Questions of this sort must also be resolved on the basis of national property law.

The owner-possessor relationship. However, this does not exhaust the property law dimension. In particular, it is important to recognise that VI.–2:206 may be ousted by special rules in the various jurisdictions (until now often collated in a self-contained part of a civil code) governing the so-called owner-possessor relationship. There are two difficulties here arising from the fact that many (but by no means all) jurisdictions allow the claim of acquisition in good faith from transferors to succeed where the acquirer obtains title being 'merely' (as opposed to grossly) negligent as to the seller's title. Thus, for example, a purchaser of a car from a person who presents a log book with a falsified entry may acquire good title from the unauthorised transferor, even though the falsification could have been ascertained if the log book had been scrutinised with more care. The first implication of this proposition of property law is that the transferee can acquire property in circumstances of bare negligence. That means that if, without more, the non-contractual liability law provisions on infringement of property rights were applicable, it could be supposed that the transferee causes damage to the owner negligently when acquiring ownership in such circumstances since the owner's title is destroyed by the (negligent) good faith acquisition. Such a non-contractual liability law rule, however, would serve no purpose, of course, because while property law would assure ownership of the good faith acquirer, non-contractual liability law would impose an obligation to make reparation and therefore to transfer it back to the previous owner. Burdening the new owner with such an obligation would in large measure frustrate the aim of the property law rule. It must therefore be taken as implicit that such cases will not give rise to non-contractual liability. This is encapsulated by the rule in VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (c) which disapplies the provisions of this Book where they would contradict the purpose of other rules of private law.

Stolen goods. The second problem arising from the possibility of acquisition of property in good faith in the absence of gross negligence is the exception sometimes made which completely excludes the possibility of acquisition in good faith where the property is stolen or has otherwise gone astray. Without an adjustment to the non-contractual liability law provisions one would arrive on the basis of such property law at the contradictory notion that a person who by mere negligence failed to appreciate the transferor's lack of title, but neither knew nor should have known that the property had been taken from the owner, will be liable for destroying or damaging it, whereas such a person would become owner if the property has not been stolen, and would consequently not be liable for its subsequent destruction, this being the destruction of the person's own property. The different outcome for the two cases is determined solely by whether the property is stolen (about the existence of which state of affairs the acquirer was not grossly negligent). Given that the acquirer's state of mind is the same in both cases, there is a necessity to treat the two cases alike from a non-contractual liability law perspective. This involves extending to damage of stolen property for non-contractual liability law purposes only the protection granted by property law to the 'merely' negligent good faith acquirer of non-stolen property. VI.–1:103(c) (Scope of application) in turn ensures that there is no resulting contradiction between non-contractual liability and property law.

Property rights in corporeal things. VI.–2:206 applies to immovable as well as movable property. Plots of land, houses and corporeal movable objects are "things" within the meaning of the Article. It does not, however, apply to incorporeal property. Intellectual property rights (copyright, patents, etc.) are subject to special legal regimes in all the Member States of the EU which are unaffected by these rules. The same is true for rights embodied in an instrument. The right "to" a bond is ownership in property within the meaning of VI.–2:206; the right "from" a bond is not.

Mere contractual or other relative rights excluded. Mere contractual or other relative rights are also excluded from the provision. That does not mean, though, that such rights are not capable of enjoying legal protection under the law on non-contractual liability. Rather it means only that the question whether one is faced with a legally relevant damage must be decided in the absence of a special regime (e.g. in VI.–2:211 (Loss upon inducement of breach of obligation)) according to VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (1)(c). Here again it can depend in particular on whether the injuring person acted intentionally or merely negligently. The practical result differs little from a concept whereby the presence of an infringement of a property right is assessed differentially based on whether the injuring person acted intentionally or negligently.

Illustration 3
A operates a hairdresser's salon in house which is damaged by T with a lorry. Of necessity the business must be closed for a period. Two of A's employee hairdressers sue on account of their loss of wages. They have neither suffered an infringement of any "property right" of theirs nor suffered an infringement of lawful possession in regard to the hairdresser's salon nor become the victim of an inducement of their employer to fail to perform obligations towards employees. Had T however acted to cause loss intentionally – for example, by an act of vandalism – then the employees too would have suffered a legally relevant damage, though not under this Article or VI.–2:211 (Loss upon inducement of breach of obligation), but instead on the basis of VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage).

Illustration 4
A construction company carrying out road works negligently cuts through a subsurface electricity cable. Legally relevant damage is suffered as a result by the electricity company, which is the owner of the cable, but not by a business at whose head office work is consequently temporarily interrupted. The negligent impact on its contractual relationship with the electricity company does not establish legally relevant damage. The situation is different where as a result of the power cut, property is damaged or destroyed, e.g. heated metal cools down or (in a private household) the contents of a freezer are spoiled.

C. Lawful possession

Possession. For the purposes of VI.–2:206 "property rights" do not include lawful possession of corporeal things. For that reason lawful possession is given separate mention in paragraph (1). Possession as such is a mere state of affairs, not a right and thus not a property right. If, however, possession is reinforced by a right to possession, then in accordance with paragraph (1) it likewise amounts to an interest protected by this rule.

Detention included. Mirroring the hitherto lack of a common European notion of ownership, there is to date no uniform European concept of lawful possession. In a range of legal systems the notion of possession only encompasses so-called "proprietary possession" (or, in relation to immovables, "owner occupation") and thus only cases in which someone possesses the thing "as his own". In these systems, therefore, even a lessee is not a possessor; but only a so-called detentor. In contrast, the category of detention is completely unknown in other legal systems. They use the term "possessor" also of a person who possesses "for another". Consequently in these legal systems the complete opposite prevails: – a lessee is seen as the prototype of a possessor. VI.–2:206 does not seek to take a stand on this difference of views in property law; as stated above, the provision must therefore be adjusted at a later point in time to take on board more recent developments, as the need arises. Here it is only necessary to clarify that the notion of possession deployed by VI.–2:206 is to be understood as including detention. This readily follows from the protective aim of the rule: a proprietary possessor (i.e. a "possessor" in the sense of systems that distinguish between possession and detention) is either entitled to claim as an owner or falls completely outside this rule because the possessor would be a thief and would not have lawful possession.

Lawful possession. VI.–2:206 is not concerned with possession as such, but rather the right to possession. A thief does not fall within the provision's scope of protection. The same goes for a possessor to whom the thing is unlawfully sub-let by its lessee; in any such case the sub-lessee has no right to possession as against the owner.

Several possessors. The legal protection which several possessors (or detentors) of the same thing are to enjoy in their relations to one another must be determined on the basis of the applicable national property law.

Property law protection of possession remains unaffected. It follows from VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (d) that VI.–2:206 does not affect remedies available on other legal grounds. Thus, to the extent that legal protection of possession is also provided for by property law and the injured person is equipped with a more favourable course of action under that regime, this will not be impinged upon by the parallel provisions of non-contractual liability law. The same is of course equally true for protection of ownership under property law, as the case may be.

Loss caused by infringement of lawful possession. Legally relevant damage within the meaning of VI.–2:206 is only loss resulting from the infringement of a right to possession of the thing. While that normally includes loss of use, it does not encompass loss resulting from harm to the thing's substance.

Illustration 5
If a business traveller's hired car is stolen, he has a claim against the thief to reparation of damage arising from having to hire another car. By contrast, however, the business traveller does not suffer legally relevant damage where someone damages the vehicle without adversely affecting its roadworthiness. It is the owner who is entitled to reparation on account of the property damage.

Illustration 6
A renovates B's apartment in an unauthorised fashion, despite the fact that B is not at all in agreement with this. B therefore restores the apartment to its previous state. The costs of restoration constitute recoverable damage.

D. Infringement

The concept. Paragraph (1) invokes a broad concept of infringement of another's property right. Another's property right is infringed where a person uses the property in a manner solely befitting the holder of the property right. The most important cases of infringement of a property right are enumerated in paragraph 2(b). The cases listed there are not, however, exhaustive ("includes").

Illustration 7
A accepts B's request to bring a picture bought by B in London back to Munich – the place of residence of both A and B – on A's return journey. A carelessly leaves the picture unattended at the airport and it is stolen. A has infringed B's property right (by omission), although A has neither damaged the picture, nor disposed of it, nor occasioned an interference with use or other disturbance of the exercise of B's right.

Defences. The concept of infringement operates independently of the existence of a defence. It is based on a "factual" concept to that extent. Someone who is attacked by another's dog and injures the dog in self-defence "infringes" the property rights of the dog owner, but is not liable to the dog owner (VI.–5:202(1) (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity)). The same is true for an insurance fraudster who, with the assent of the owner, drives the latter's car in order to stage an accident: VI.–5:101 (Consent and acting at own risk) does not change the fact that this concerns property damage.

E. The most important modes of infringement of another's property right (paragraph (2)(b))

Damage to property. Typical infringements of property rights consist of the destruction or damaging of the subject-matter to which the property right relates. The wording of the text therefore employs for this purpose (and solely for this purpose) the expression "property damage", to which reference is made in later Articles. This relates in particular to VI.–3:202 (Accountability for damage caused by the unsafe state of an immovable) and VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions), from which it follows that the "strict liability" regulated there is not tailored to infringements of property rights of every kind, but only to infringements of property rights in the form of damage to property.

Ineffectual products. Property damage can also be the result of an ineffectual protective measure and in particular an inoperative product.

Illustration 8
A obtains for use on fruit plantations a fungicide which should prevent the natural fungal infestation of apples. It does not do what it says on the tin. The apples get worse and prove to be unmerchantable. This is loss resulting from property damage.

Self-contained damage in defective products and buildings. One case of property damage which is excluded from this Article, though not alluded to in the text, is where damage results to the entirety of a product or spreads to other parts of a product as the result of a defect within it. As regards strict liability, the matter is governed exhaustively by the EU directive on product liability to the effect that strict liability is excluded (see VI.–3:204(1) (Accountability for damage caused by defective products)). With regard to negligence-based liability the matter will reside exclusively within contract law. That follows from VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (c). The provisions of non-contractual liability law do not apply if they would contradict other rules of private law. That would be the case in respect of damage to the product itself because the application of VI.–2:206 would have the effect of displacing or making inroads on contract law rules on liability. Consequently, VI.–2:206 will only apply where the impairment to property caused by a defective product is damage to property other than the defective product itself.

Sale of land. Comparable problems can also arise in regard to the sale of land. They concern the same general problem of concurrence of actions in relation to the law of contract and the law on non-contractual liability and they must therefore be resolved likewise on the basis of VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (c).

Disposition of the right. An infringement of property rights can of course also occur where the thing itself remains undamaged. An important example of this type of case relates to the disposition of another's property. This is because a disposition of the property may amount to its destruction in economic terms if, as a result of a third party's acquisition of title in good faith, this brings about a loss of ownership. The position is quite similar where, as a result of the injuring person's disposition, a third person acquires a limited right in rem in respect of the owner's property.

Illustration 9
A acquires goods from B under reservation of title. B does not consent to their resale or consents only under certain conditions, such as A transferring to B his claims to payment from his sub-purchasers. A does not comply; his sub-purchasers acquire title in good faith. Besides a non-performance of a contractual obligation, there is also the causation of damage relevant to the law on non-contractual liability. B therefore (under certain circumstances) also has a non-contractual (but not a contractual) claim to damages directly against C, the managing director of A, a legal person.

Illustration 10
A hired an item from B and pawned it to X, to whom it is handed over. In view of her good faith assumption as to A's title, X has acquired a security right burdening the property which is also effective against B. A has caused an infringement of B's ownership.

Law of unjustified enrichment. Concurrent liability under the law of unjustified enrichment remains unaffected by non-contractual liability for damage under this Book: see VI.–1:103

(Scope of application) sub-paragraph (d). This is of particular significance where the disponer neither acts intentionally nor negligently disregards the owner's title.

Interference with use. An infringement of a property right is also made out when the owner's use of property is disturbed. This is obvious for immovable property (see Comment B above), but it also occurs frequently in cases of movables.

Illustration 11
Destroying the ordered system of an archive, warehouse, stamp collection or files in an office does not amount to property damage because the individual items remain undamaged and because, in any event under most legal systems, there is no property in the archive (etc.) as such. However, there is an infringement of a property right in the form of a detrimental interference with use.

However, transient interferences with use of the sort that permanently occur in daily life will not suffice. That follows from VI.–6:102 (De minimis rule).

Illustration 12
Where a person parks a vehicle in a city for a short time in such a way that another vehicle is hemmed in, no infringement of property is committed. The situation is different where a car is blocked for days on end or where a ship (which docked for unloading) cannot leave a canal harbour for over half a year due to the collapse of a negligently and inadequately secured retaining wall.

Deprivation of use: infringement and loss distinguished. Paragraph 2(b) states that interferences with use amount to an infringement of property rights; conversely, paragraph 2(a) takes up the loss of use resulting from an infringement of a property right. Both aspects are to be differentiated. Paragraph 2(a) requires an infringement of a property right, regardless of the kind of infringement. Property damage provides the typical example. Paragraph 2(b), in contrast, makes it clear that interference with use as such can constitute an infringement of the property right of another. See also Comment E below.

Other disturbance of the exercise of the right. Other disturbances of the exercise of property rights, which do not take the form of property damage, the loss of a right or an interference with use but nonetheless amount to infringements of property rights, are equally numerous. Frequent examples include thefts, misappropriation and trespass.

Illustration 13
A, the owner of historical castle grounds, forbids visitors from taking photographs in the interior, as she wants to make a small additional income from the sale of postcards and the like. It is to be used for the upkeep of the site. A commercial photographer does not comply with the ban and subsequently offers his own postcards for sale to tourists. The photography of the rooms constitutes an infringement of property rights.

F. Loss

General. VI.–2:206(1) makes it clear that losses which result from an infringement of a property right constitute legally relevant damage. Typically these take the form of costs of repair, the subject-matter of the property right having been physically damaged, and a loss of profit because the claimant has been deprived of the opportunity to exploit the property commercially. These losses are already covered by the general rule in VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (1) in conjunction with (4)(a), and the same holds true for a reduction in the value of property. If a thing is damaged, then the property right which subsists in relation to that thing loses value. (The case differs only if, for example, the thing affected is a building which is standing empty and destined for demolition and damage arises through children throwing stones to break the window panes, see Comment A above.)

Depreciation in merchantable value. A not uncommon case is where a complete repair or restoration will not in fact eradicate entirely the loss of value which has arisen. In such cases there must be compensation for the residual loss of value in addition to the repair costs.

> Illustration 14
> A's vehicle is damaged in a traffic accident. While it can be fully repaired, it nevertheless loses value because a so-called "accident damaged car" will sell for less on the used car market than an otherwise identical, but accident-free car. This so-called "depreciation in merchantable value" is recoverable loss, which must be compensated in addition to the repair costs.

Non-economic loss. As regards non-economic losses, it equally follows from the general rule contained in VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (1) that they are also recoverable in principle, as long as the other requisites of liability under VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) are fulfilled. The affirmation of legally relevant damage in the form of non-economic loss caused by an infringement of property rights is particularly self-evident where there is an intentional infringement of property rights, which was orchestrated purely to inflict mental pain on the owner. An example would be where a person intentionally shoots another's pet, whose death causes distress to the pet owner. VI.–2:206 is not of course restricted to such cases. It is not necessary that the injuring person should want to inflict mental suffering on the owner. Instead liability for non-economic losses as a rule falls to be considered whenever an intentional infringement of property has taken place. Whether or not the injuring person intended to cause mental suffering will not affect liability, provided the injuring person intended to cause the infringement of the claimant's property right (the act of destruction) whose consequential loss constitutes the damage, meaning to inflict that property damage on the owner. A case in point would be where a burglar disrupts possessions in the dwelling which he has broken into and it is this violation of the home owner's rights which causes distress: the burglar, intent on finding and stealing any valuables he finds, means to infringe the owner's property rights when he disturbs the owner's belongings; he need not intend to cause distress, but it suffices that this is the result of his intentional infringement. Conversely, in cases of purely negligent infringements of property rights, a precise assessment is to be carried out as to whether the alleged non-economic losses have actually occurred. Such liability is not ruled out in these cases, but a more precise analysis of the consequences of the infringement of property rights is demanded. A run-of-the-mill traffic accident involving physical damage to a standard vehicle cannot be seen as the cause of non-economic loss (see VI.–4:101 (General rule [on causation]).

Deprivation of use (paragraph 2(a)). However, other forms of loss beyond the ones already mentioned may also arise. Of these one form is explicitly mentioned in paragraph (2)(a), namely, a deprivation of the benefits of using or being able to use property. This constitutes a loss and thus a legally relevant damage. Withholding property from another or preventing others from using their property, in other words, can constitute both an "infringement" (sub-paragraph (b)) as well as a "loss" (sub-paragraph (a)).

Illustration 15
Consider the case where property (in particular a motor vehicle) is damaged and not available for use during the period of repair. In that case damage is not merely present when the person affected must procure a substitute and must incur the expense of using public transport. Rather the loss of potential use – the loss of the benefit which the property right would otherwise have assured - is in itself a legally relevant damage. It does not matter that the use which would have been made of the vehicle would have been for pleasure, rather than for business. That avoids a differential treatment of property which is not deployed by the owner in a profit-earning capacity. If a taxi is damaged, the owner can naturally claim the profit foregone during the period of repair or the cost of procuring a new vehicle; a private individual ought to have a corresponding claim on account of the loss of the opportunity to make use of the car whenever so desired, which necessarily looks towards the latter of these two measures of loss. Given the absence of actual economic loss of profit, the measure of the loss referred to in paragraph (2)(a) will generally be a substantial part of the cost of hiring a substitute vehicle (even if that is not done), because that approximates the value of the use of which the injured person was deprived. However, it is of course a requirement that the claimant wanted to make use of the property right or was at least able to do so.

Illustration 16
Youths occupy an empty house in a university town. They infringe the property rights of the house owner (paragraph 2(b)) and occasion loss to the owner in the amount of the estimated rental value of the house; they are still liable even if the owner cannot prove that during their period of occupancy a tenant willing to pay rent was dissuaded from renting.

Cable cases. In other words sub-paragraph (a) concerns situations in which it cannot be said that there is legally relevant damage simply on the basis of VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (4)(a). VI.–2:206(2)(b) on the other hand does not provide any clarification as to the concept of a loss. Rather VI.–2:206(2)(b) describes the forms of infringement of property rights and makes the (essentially obvious) point that a deprivation of use is numbered among them.

Illustration 17
The so-called cable cases (see illustration 4 above) were not concerned with either an infringement of property within the meaning of paragraph (2)(b) (the owner of the machine is admittedly cut off from electricity, but is not hindered in the use of it or otherwise disturbed in the exercise of the right) nor with loss in the sense of paragraph 2(a) (which would need to be assessed if, for example, property damage were caused as a result of the interruption in power supply). The loss lies in the expense of repair, a fall in value and lost profit, not in the loss of use as such.

NOTES

I. Tort law protection of property rights

1. "Ownership" within the meaning of FRENCH, BELGIAN AND LUXEMBURGIAN private law is an absolute, exclusive and perpetual right (CC art. 544; Cornu, Droit civil[11], 440) in material objects; according to conventional (Cass.req. 25 July 1887, S.

1888, I, 17, note Lyon-Caen), albeit now no longer indisputable opinion (see further e.g. Carbonnier, Les biens III[19], nos. 250-251 pp. 388–391 and no. 254 pp. 392–394, as well as Van Neste, in: Het Zakenrecht, 511–537) "intellectual" property is not counted among property in the sense of civil law. The owner's monopoly position entitles him to prohibit any action of any third person which amounts to laying a claim to one of his property rights (namely jus utendi, jus fructuendi and jus abutendi) and indeed independently of whether the interference would cause actual loss or not (Bergel/Bruschi/Cimamonti, Les biens, no. 95 p. 99; Hansenne, Les biens I[1], no. 632 pp. 585–586). Along with the actions en révindication and en bornage the general tort law action is also open to the owner of property. In relation to the latter, there is the peculiarity in France that a claim in damages is already made out where an infringement of a droit de possession flowing from property rights is established; in such a case there is no requirement of actual loss (Cass.req. 6 March 1934, D.P. 1937, I, 17, note Blaevoet). However, Belgian law does not follow suit. The infringement of a right is neither a necessary nor a sufficient requisite for proof of damage, according to Belgian opinion (Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, 18). For both countries it is to be noted that an infringement of property rights implies a violation of CC art. 544 and that such a violation of a law is assessed ipso iure as a faute; atteintes à la propriété constitute fautes contre la légalité (from which it is additionally concluded in France, as is stated, that they themselves would amount to dommages et interest, independently of proof of damage: le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats (2006/2007), no. 6746). The use of a foreign historical building (Cass.civ. 10 March 1993, Bull.civ. 1993, I, no. 87 p. 58; D. 1999 jur. 319, concl. Sainte-Rose, note Agostini) or ship (Cass.civ. 25 January 2000, Bull.civ. 2000, I, no. 24 p. 16; D. 2000 I.R. 61; JCP éd. G. 2001, II, 10554, note Tenenbaum) for the marketing of photographs of these objects has even been occasionally qualified as an infringement of property rights grounding liability (on its limits, see Cass.civ. 2 May 2001, Bull.civ. 2001, I, no. 114 p. 74; D. 2001, 1973, note Gridel: no infringement of property rights by the depiction of a private island in a state's tourist advertising campagne). The assemblée plénière of the court of cassation corrected this case law, however, to the extent that in such cases a claim for a prohibitory court order or in damages required a severe interference, a trouble anormal (Cass.ass.plén. 7 May 2004, Bull.Ass.plén. 2004 no. 10 p. 21). Damage that arises due to the fact that someone temporarily cannot sell or otherwise dispose of his item of property, is recoverable (Cass.civ. 23 June 1993, Bull.civ. 1993, III, no. 102 p. 66); likewise for the depreciation in value of a plot of land due to the fact that an overhanging boulder from a neighbour's land threatens to come crashing down (Cass.civ. 17 May 1995, Bull.civ. 1995, II, no. 142 p. 81). It is fully self-evident that theft and receiving stolen goods also amount to torts relevant for private law (e.g. Cass. 13 October 2004, Pas. belge 2004, no. 476 p. 1558).

2. The starting point in SPANISH law is CC art. 348, according to which "ownership … [is] the right to dispose of a thing and enjoy it without prejudice to further statutory restrictions". As in France, protection of ownership is served first and foremost by the action to vindicate title, which is complemented by an action to establish title (TS 12 June 1976, RAJ 1976 (1) no. 2699 p. 2003). The tort law action in damages is not actually a claim for the protection of absolute rights; however the owner, like every other injured party, is entitled to draw on it when damage eventuates. In general, one can therefore say of Spain that an infringement of a right of property results in liability to the owner for the damage thereby occasioned to him, and indeed on the basis of CC arts. 1902 et seq. or on the basis of CP arts. 109-112 (Díez-Picazo, Sistema II[9], 546). The special rules of Law 40/2002 of 14 November (Ley 40/2002, reguladora del contrato de aparcamiento de vehículos) apply with regard to damage to vehicles in public car parks. They relate to the non-negotiable duty on the car park operator, to return the vehicles stored there in the same state as when they were parked there (loc. cit. arts. 3(1)(c) and 5(1)). This would involve strict liability; the only disputed point is whether a vis major or happenstance relieves liability (see further Carrasco Perera, Actualidad Jurídica Aranzadi no. 557, December 2002, p. 2 and Álvarez Lata, InDret 2/2003, 12). Liability ensues in any event for theft (CA Madrid 28 November 2000, BDA JUR 2001/73233; CA Asturias 26 July 2002, BDA JUR 2002/253857) and the "unexplained disappearance" of a parked vehicle (CA Barcelona 22 April 2002, AC 2002, no. 1137). Where any person destroys or damages the property of another, evidently an infringement of property rights is committed and liability to that other in damages results therefrom. The same also applies to someone who broadens the bandwidth of the electric masts and circuits aboveground without the consent of the land owner and in this way lays claim to more ground than he had been entitled to (CA Girona 6 February 2006, AC 2006 (5) no. 341 p. 750 [however, no damages for use of the claimant's private roadways by an electricity company's vehicles, as the value of using the road could not be expressed in numbers]). An infringement of property rights resulting in liability in damages was further seen e.g. in the delayed return of an item of property (CA Huesca 8 March 2006, AC 2006 (5) no. 374 p. 836). TS 5 November 1998, RAJ 1998 (5) no. 8404 p. 12363 indeed granted the affected telecommunications company compensation for costs of repair in a "cable case", but no compensation for lost profit because the company had been able to (at least provisionally) repair the cable.

3. Under ITALIAN law ownership is an absolute right and is as such protected by tort law. This has been attested to by the jurisprudence in numerous decisions, particularly in the context of actions against the public administration (e.g. Cass. 5 May 2005, no. 9361, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 5; Cass. 3 May 2005, no. 9173, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 5; Cass.sez.un. 20 April 2005, no. 8209, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 4; Cass. 4 March 2005, no. 4797, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 4; Cass.sez.un. 7 December 2004, no. 22891, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 12; Cass.sez.un. 29 November 2004, no. 22490, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 11. S. ferner ECHR 12 January 2006, Sciarrotta and others v. Italy, ECHR 12 January 2006, App. no. 14793/02, Resp.civ. e prev. 2006, 834 and the Presidential Decree thereupon enacted [DPR] 327/2001 of 8 June 2001, no. 327 [Suppl. ordinario no. 211 alla Gazz. Uff., 16 August, no. 189] Testo unico delle disposizioni legislative e regolamentari in materia di espropriazione per pubblica utilità, art. 43). Difficulties are however posed by the determination of the relationship between the general tort law action in damages and the claim in damages under CC arts. 948-949, which is built upon the action for vindication of title and the property law action for a prohibitory court order (see further Gambaro, Il diritto di proprietà, 894). Damages in tort (CC art. 2043) done to the whole building by a co-owner fall due to the other co-owner (Cass. 18 May 2001, no. 6849, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 1007), likewise for damage to a neighbour's land resulting from carelessly carried out building projects (Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 568).

4. HUNGARY also interprets the right in ownership as an absolute material-oriented right, which affords its holder extensive powers (Petrik [-Sárközy], Polgári jog I^2, 231); in contrast, so-called "intellectual property" does not amount to property in the sense of civil law (see further and with references to diverging opinions Gellért [-Petrik], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 348). The right of ownership is comprised of the right to possession (CC § 98), the right to use and reap the benefits of an asset (CC § 99) and from the right of disposition (CC § 112(1)). Unauthorised dispositions of foreign property constitutes a tortl. The owner can claim damages from the unauthorised disposer, where the transferee acquires title to the property under the provisions of the law of property (Lenkovics, Dologi jog, 132-134).

5. CZECH and SLOVAK CC § 415 expressly enumerates the infringement of the property rights of another as a ground of liability for loss resulting therefrom. While SLOVENIAN LOA arts. 131 and 132, as well as POLISH CC art. 415 refrain from an express mention for infringement of property rights, the loss flowing therefrom is still of course legally relevant damage.

6. GERMAN CC § 823(1) protects the right to ownership in objects (CC § 903). Naturally, material harm (destruction, damage, defacement) is covered. The deprivation of and interference with the possibility of another's use of his or her property also constitutes an infringement of property rights (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[65], § 823, no. 7; Erman [-Schiemann], BGB II[11], § 823, no. 25). Therefore, the alienation of another's property to a bona fide transferee triggers a tort law obligation to pay damages (BGH 12 March 1996, NJW 1996, 1535, 1537) (the - even negligent - bona fide transferee is clearly not liable: BGH 14 February 1967, WM 1967, 562, 564). Furthermore, an infringement of property rights will not only be affirmed in cases of short term (BGH 18 November 2003, NJW 2004, 356, 358) interferences with the designated use of property (BGH 21 December 1970, BGHZ 55, 153, 159; BGH 2 July 1959, BGHZ 30, 241). An infringement of property rights will also be inferred where the systematic order or an arrangement of items (stamp collection, library, archive) is destroyed (BGH 26 February 1980, BGHZ 76, 216). No infringement of property rights shall occur in relation to a standstill in production resulting from an interruption of energy supply (BGH 9 December 1958, BGHZ 29, 65), unless property damage simultaneously eventuates (BGH 4 February 1964, BGHZ 41, 123).

7. AUSTRIAN CC §§ 1331-1332a relate to the compensation of damage to personalty, to which all rights in assets also belong. Although the aforementioned provisions only apply to legal consequences of damage to personalty, it is undisputed that ownership and all restricted rights in rem enjoy tort law protection (Schilcher and Kleewein, in: v. Bar (ed.), Deliktsrecht in Europa, Österreich, 35). "All that appertains to a person, all of his corporeal and incorporeal objects, equates to his property" (CC § 353). According to CC § 285, on top of corporeal "objects", energy, rights and especially intellectual property rights, as well as prospective objects, as long as they are dealt with by a law or juridical act as such (e.g. rights of expectancy, CC § 1276). According to CC § 354, ownership in property in a subjective sense is the discretionary control over the subject matter and use of an object and the power to exclude any other person from such. Animals indeed belong to one's property, but are not objects (CC § 285a). Along with the actions in property law for establishment of title, recovery of property, prohibitory and mandatory restorative court orders (CC §§ 372, 366, 523, 364), claims for damages in tort also arise (CC §§ 1295 et seq.; for more on the relationship of these claims to one another, see OGH 20 June 1962, JBl 1963, 320). Every culpable interference with rights of ownership and possession, which at the same time occasions damage within the meaning of CC § 1294, grounds liability (OGH 10 January 1968, SZ 41/2; OGH 13 December 1988, SZ 61/270; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 293). CC §§ 1331-1132a provide more detailed regulations on the scope of the duty to compensate. The very exposure to harm of another's property is prohibited (OGH 18 September 1975, ZVR 1976/229). Infringements of property rights are not only encountered in the guise of the destruction and deprivation of an object. The distribution of trail maps with incorrect markings, which cause hikers to trespass on another's property (OGH 29 August 1995, SZ 68/145) and the "occupancy" of a building site by anti-power plant protestors (OGH 25 May 1994, SZ 67/92; see also OGH 25 March 1999, ZVR 1999/56) also constitute modes of behaviour that found liability. In contrast, "indirect" production outages resulting from the damage to an electricity cable that is not owned by the injured party are not compensable (OGH 8 July 1976, SZ 49/96; OGH 4 March 1982, RZ 1982/68), indeed even where strains of bacteria are thereby destroyed (OGH 18 June 1975, JBl 1976, 210) or electronic appliances are damaged (OGH 1 December 1977, RZ 1978/31; OGH 20 August 2005, 1 Ob 117/05w). CC § 367 second sentence clarifies that a bona fide acquisition of title does not ground liability in damages.

8. In GREECE it is likewise a given that the right to ownership and restricted rights in rem enjoy tort law protection as absolute rights (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 914, no. 36; Georgiades Ap., Enochiko Dikaio, geniko meros, 597; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 484; A.P. 1110/1996, EllDik 38 [1997] 1045). Interference with rights of ownership is not only represented by property damage (A.P. 1110/1996 loc. cit.) or destruction (A.P. 38/1996, EllDik 38 [1997] 41), but also by e.g. the unlawful disposition of another's property (e.g. CFI Trikala 201/1962, NoB 11 [1963] 1154: an authorised execution of foreclosure; auctioning of items not owned by the debtor). Case law is at times criticised in scholarly writing for not always drawing a sufficiently trenchant line between pure economic loss and economic loss resulting from interference with property rights (Georgiades loc. cit. no. 37; see also Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, geniko meros, 597).

9. In PORTUGAL it is derived right back from Const. art. 62 that private tort law must also cater for the reasonable protection of property rights (Miranda, Manual de Direito Constitucional IV, 467). CC art. 483 accordingly lays out liability in damages for all culpable infringements of rights; infringements of property rights belong among them (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[8], 505). The claims in tort law accompany the property law claims for establishment of title, recovery of property and a prohibitory court order (CC arts. 1311 and 1314; STJ 4 April 2006). The destruction or damaging of things is not the only manifestation of an infringement of property rights. Such an infringement also occurs, e.g. where entry to land is hampered due to a neighbour's construction work (STJ 3 February 2005) (the situation is different where a tenant builds a fence in order to prevent intrusion by strangers: STJ 24 February 2005) or where rubbish is left on land (STJ 23 September 2004 and 18 March 2004). In case of conflict between the owner's interest in use and the health interests of his neighbours, the latter is given preference (STJ 6 May 1998, CJ [ST] 1998-II, 76; STJ 9 January 2006).

10. DUTCH CC art. 6:162(2) (first alternative) is counted among the civil wrongs expressed in terms of interferences with another's rights. Title in property is evidently one such "right". Along with the general requisites for a civil wrong, the claimant must prove his title in the property and the "interference"; however, CC art. 3:119 accommodates him with the presumption of title in favour of the party who holds the property as his own (for more detail, see Onrechtmatige Daad I [-Jansen], art. 6:162(2), nos. 44, 45, 108, pp. 452-453, 1159-1203). According to CC art. 5:1(2) "the owner [is entitled] to freely use the item of property to the exclusion of all others, provided that this use does not infringe the rights of others and restrictions in relation to statutory provisions and rules of unwritten law are adhered to". This limitation of the right to private property can have significant consequences for tort law, cf. e.g. CFI Middelburg 1 October 1980, NedJur 1981 no. 374 p. 1243 (empty houses in a trouble hotspot are temporarily "occupied"; an interference with property rights is affirmed, however a civil wrong is denied) and HR 12 January 1923, NedJur 1923 p. 307 (raising an embankment without the consent of the owner of the land; no infringement of ownership) as well as CC arts. 5:37 et seq. (limitations under the law concerning the respective interests of neighbours) and 3:13 (abuse of right). An interference with the right to ownership principally occurs where another engages in conduct peculiar to the owner or hinders the exercise of his powers (Jansen loc. cit. nos. 52-53 pp. 479-501). An "interference" with the right of another is only typically spoken of in cases of direct, immediate infringements. Acts and omissions further down the chain of causation are mostly not deemed "interferences", but are analysed under different aspects, particularly the issue of whether the party claimed against has breached a statutory duty or conducted himself otherwise than "unwritten rules of social interaction", i.e. the general precept of care, demand of him (Jansen loc. cit. nos. 56-57 pp. 528-559). Ownership is not infringed when a purchaser acquires land from a seller which is already contaminated at the time of transfer of title (HR 4 March 2005, JOL 2005, 142; RvdW 2005 no. 36 p. 331).

11. ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(1)(v) sets out that the occasioning of damage is inter alia unlawful where "the damage is caused by violation of the right of ownership or a similar right or right of possession of the victim". The details of the damages are, however, regulated in LOA § 128(3) and (4). LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.263(2) likewise enumerates the infringement of the right to ownership as a civil offence grounding liability.

12. SWEDISH Law on Damages chap. 2 § 1 distinguishes between personal and material damage; the calculation of compensation for material damage is the subject-matter of chap. 5 § 7. The owner is the first in line for the entitlement of compensation, without it being expressly stated; others indirectly harmed only exceptionally come into the picture as claimants (for more detail, see HD 27 October 2004, NJA 2004, 609; Sandstedt, VersRAI 2005, 38; Andersson, Pointlex 2004-12-20). Physical damage to corporeal objects, i.e. to moveable and immoveable objects, is in any event understood as property damage. However, aesthetic changes as well as the removal or reduction of the functional capabilities of a thing and its loss (e.g. by theft) are interpreted as property damage (Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 98; Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 43 and 319; Radetzki, Skadeståndsberäkning vid sakskada, 11 fn. 1). A further case is that of impairment of use (Hellner and Johansson loc. cit 98 and 429; Hellner, Om obehörig vinst, 229; Bengtsson and Strömbäck loc. cit. 319; Agell, in: Familjerätt, skadeståndsrätt och annan förmögenhetsrätt, 197, 205 and 211). HD 28 February 1990, NJA 1990, 80 has deemed the impregnation of a thoroughbred dog by a mongrel as property damage, HD 20 February 1996, NJA 1996, 68 affirmed property damage in a case in which the purchaser of a defective item had welded it to another new one; it comes down to the adverse effects on the functionality of the latter, not to its physical alteration. The FINNISH rule on property damage (Law on Damages chap. 2 § 1) is to be similarly interpreted to its Swedich counterpart, despite not entirely identical wording. In DENMARK, under the term property damage (tingsskade), not only the physical harm to corporeal objects, but also consequential losses (e.g. production outage: von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 9). In the course of the claimant's investigation, drawing a distinction between property law entitlements and those under the law of obligations is not first and foremost on the agenda, this position is assumed by the "power of disposition" (rådighedsretssynspunktet). In a case in which an electricity cable was severed, Danish Supreme Court 22 June 2004, UfR 2004, 2389 denied damages in favour of a business; the disadvantage suffered did not lie in the property damage, but purely in the interruption of work and therefore did not constitute legally relevant damage.

13. In ENGLAND the law on the tort of conversion has been criticized for its enduring uncertainty and the lack of definition in the ways it may be committed: Douglas, LMCLQ, 129. The traditional principle (derived from the fiction underpinning the historical form of the action in trover that the chattel was lost by the plaintiff and found by the claimant) has been that the tort is confined to chattels (Douglas, LMCLQ, 129).

14. In IRELAND, as with other common law jurisdictions, torts have developed centring on the concept of possession rather than of exclusive or absolute ownership. Due to the stronger gravitational pull of the torts of conversion, detinue and passing off towards affording protection against infringements of property rights (of ownership) they are dealt with under this heading (for infringements of other property rights with more affinity to those in possession, see below Note II26). Conversion consists of any act relating to the goods of another that constitutes an unjustifiable denial of his or her title to them, or the wrongful assertion of dominion over them (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 30.01). Conversion may be committed by the wrongful taking possession of the goods where the defendant deals with the goods in a manner inconsistent with the right of the true owner, abusing possession already acquired (by pawning another's goods: Parker v. Godin (1728) 2 Strange 813, 93 ER 866; sale or delivery of them: Hollins v. Fowler (1874-75) LR 7 HL 757; Haggan v. Pasley (1878) 2 IrLR 573; Magee v. D'Arcy (1879) 4 IrLR 312; or where the chattel is wilfully destroyed: see Heald v. Carey (1852) 11 CB 977, 138 ER 762); or otherwise denying the title of the other person to them, whether or not possession has been acquired (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit.). One may be guilty of conversion of any corporeal personal property (Allen v. Sharp (1848) 2 Ex. 352, 154 ER 529), including papers and title deeds (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para 30.19). Money can be converted (Dillon v. O'Brien (1887) 16 Cox CC 245); Fitzpatrick v. Dunphy (1851) 1 ICLR 366; Shield Life Insurance Co. Ltd. v. Ulster Bank Ltd. [1995] 3 IR 225; cf. Hennerty v. Bank of Ireland, HC 5 July 1988, unreported) as may negotiable instruments (Alsager v. Close (1842) 10 M & W 576, 152 ER 600; Liston v. Munster Leinster Bank Ltd. [1940] IR 77), title deeds (Plant v. Cotterill (1860) 5 H & N 430, 157 ER 1249; Curry v. Rea [1937] NI 1 (CA)) and realty when severed (Mills v. Brooker [1919] 1 KB 555; Quinn v. Pratt [1908] 2 IR 69). Animals and birds may also be converted (cf. Wymes v. Tehan [1988] IR 717; Toome Eeel Fishery (Northern Ireland) Ltd. v. Cardwell [1966] NI 1). A plaintiff may maintain an action if, at the time of the defendant's act, he had either (i) ownership and possession of the goods; or (ii) possession of them; or (iii) merely an immediate right to possess them, unless the defendant can prove that the title to the goods is in some other party (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 30.20). The measure of damages for conversion is generally the value of the article converted at the date of the conversion (Allibert SA v. O'Connor [1982] ILRM 40). Where the converted article would have been put to profitable use – such as being hired out – losses for this use may also be recovered (Fleming, Law of Torts[9], 77-78). Copyright and Related Rights Act 2000 chap. 9 contains provisions prescribing remedies for infringement of copyright in this context. These include actions for damages (s. 128) and for orders for delivery up (s. 131). The copyright owner also has the right to seize infringing copies, articles or devices (s. 133). The essence of the tort of detinue (abolished in England by means of the Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977, s. 2(1)) is the wrongful refusal by the defendant to deliver up to the plaintiff a chattel after demand has been made by the plaintiff to do so, whereby a detention is not wrongful unless the defendant's possession is adverse to or in defiance of the plaintiff's right (Spackman Spackman v. Foster (1882-83) 11 QBD 99; King v. Walsh [1932] IR 178; Treasure Island Ltd. v. Zebedee Enterprises Ltd., HC 29 May 1987, unreported; see also e.g. Webb v. Ireland [1987] IESC 2, [1988] IR 353 and McKenna v. Commissioner of An Garda Síochána [1993] 3 IR 543). The action may lie even where the chattel is no longer in the defendant's possession (Morgan v. Maurer & Son [1964] Ir Jur 31). One of the advantages of the action for detinue over that of conversion lies in the range of remedies available to the plaintiff (on the role of restitutionary remedies in this context, see the dicta of Kinlen J. in Hanley v. ICC Finance Ltd. [1995] IEHC 5, [1996] 1 ILRM 463, with reference to Denning L.J. in Strand Electric & Engineering Co. Ltd. v. Brisford Entertainments Ltd. [1952] 2 QB 246, 255, and for a comprehensive analysis of the subject see O'Dell, Submission to the Law Reform Commission on Damages in the Restitution Measure for Tort and Breach of Contract (1999)). Three possible forms of judgment exist: (i) for the value of the chattel as assessed and damages for its detention; (ii) for the return of the chattel or its value as assessed in damages; (iii) for the return of the chattel and damages for its detention (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 29.10). Despite statutory regulation of trade marks (Trade Marks Act 1996), copyright (Copyright and Related Rights Act 2000) and industrial design (Industrial and Commercial Property (Protection) Act 1927), the tort of passing off remains a means of common law protection of the plaintiff's proprietary interest in his goodwill (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 31.03). Although it has its roots in the concept of deceit (Clark and Smith, Intellectual Property Law in Ireland, chap. 24), the requirement of fraudulent intent fell away (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 31.02). The essence of the tort is that one trader represents its goods or services as those of another (thus "passing them off" as those of that other), so as to be likely to mislead the public and involve an appreciable risk of detriment to the plaintiff (Polycell Products Ltd. v. O'Carroll & others [1959] Ir Jur 34; Player & Wills (Ireland) Ltd. v. Gallagher (Dublin) Ltd., HC 26 September 1983, unreported).

15. In SCOTLAND, an action for interdict or damages lies for any unjustifiable interference with or infringement of any interest which a person has in any heritable property (Walker, Delict[2], 936). Corporeal moveable property – including a wide range of things, all having a corporeal tangible corpus capable of physical possession and the interests which may subsist in such things, viz. ownership and possession – may be infringed in many different ways, by taking away from the legitimate owner or possessor, by withholding or failing to return, by selling by mistake, by damaging deliberately or carelessly etc. (Walker loc. cit. 1002). Incorporeal moveable property includes all those kinds of proprietary rights which consist in legal rights or claims only, conferring no right to actual possession or control of any corporeal moveable subject (Walker loc. cit. 1023) and is protected in this context. Of the above interests, ownership in property is protected, inter alia, under the following headings: (i) title of ownership in heritable property; (ii) trespass - a temporary intrusion into property owned by another without the permission of the owner, e.g. playing football in the owner's field or taking a short cut through his garden (Thomson, Delictual Liability[3], 19-20); (iii) withdrawal of or interference with support - it is wrongful to conduct operations on one's land so as to interfere with the support afforded to adjacent or superincumbent land or buildings without a contract agreement thereto (Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], § 965); (iv) abstraction of water (Walker loc. cit. 951); (v) interference with servitudes (Walker loc. cit. 954); (vi) malicious damage to lands or buildings; (vii) misuse of land leased; (viii) incorporeal heritable rights (London Midland & Scottish Railway v. McDonald 1924 SC 835: interdict granted to restrain an infringement of the right to ferry); (ix) damage to animals; (x) damage to ships by other ships; (xi) the infringement of interests in incorporeal moveable property (including claims of debt or damages, company shares, stock in public funds, life insurance policies, negotiable instruments, goodwill, patents, trade marks, literary copyright, copyright in industrial designs and plant breeders' rights – see Walker loc. cit. 1023).

II. Infringement of other rights in rem and of lawful possession or detention

16. In FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBURG the general point of departure is that anyone who has personally suffered "sure" damage can claim in tort. Any person whose lawful use of the thing in question is impaired belongs to this category. The precise basis for the right of use, however, is inconsequential: it might be title to ownership, a restricted right in rem or a mere entitlement under the law of obligations, like for instance a rental relationship. Even mere bona fide natural possession suffices (Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 152 p. 301). The borrower of an object, from whom a thief takes the borrowed object, is also entitled to a claim in damages (JClCiv [-Maistre du Chambon] arts. 1382 à 1386, fasc. 220, no. 9). Property law (but not tort law) draws a distinction between possession and detention. Both possession and detention are additionally protected by other possible specific actions (actions possessoires) (CC arts. 2255, 2279; French CCP arts. 1265 and 1266). Their relationship with the material tort law is of course, especially in France, extraordinarily difficult to define. BELGIUM allows actions for the protection of possession only for the protection of immoveable objects (Gerechtelijk wetboek/Code judiciaire arts. 1370-1371).

17. In SPAIN it is likewise beyond question that where the object is e.g. destroyed or damaged, such damages that are not suffered by the owner, but by the holder of another right in rem, are relevant for tort law (Díez-Picazo, Derecho de daños, 307). Apart from that, several decisions of the Supreme Court confirm that the tenant of a building which is destroyed or damaged has his/her own claim against the third person (TS 13 March 1976, RAJ 1976 (1) no. 1324 p. 966; TS 28 February 1983, RAJ 1983 (1) no. 1079 p. 815; TS 16 December 1988, RAJ 1988 (6) no. 9471 p. 9311).

18. Infringements of restricted rights in rem also trigger liability in damages in ITALY under the general requisites (for a case of easement, see further 23 May 1985, no. 3110, Giust.civ.Mass. 1985, fasc. 5, and for one of beneficial use, see Cass. 11 August 2000, no. 10733, Giur.it. 2001, 898, note Tommasi). Further, a bona fide possessor who is deprived of possession can claim damages under the provisions of tort law (Cass. 6 February 1984, no. 889, Giust.civ.Mass. 1984, fasc. 2; Cass. 21 July 1980, no. 4776, Giust.civ.Mass. 1980, fasc. 7; Cass. 28 February 1989, no. 1093, Giust.civ.Mass. 1989, fasc. 2). Damage arising out of the temporary deprivation of use is recoverable, as well as any other loss which is causally connected to the infringement of possession. The free standing tort law action falls into line alongside the action for restoration (CC art. 1168) and preservation of possession (CC art. 1170) (Cass. 16 March 1988, no. 2472, Giur.it. 1989, I, 1, 510). Therefore, the grant of damages should also be possible where the object has been destroyed or alienated (see further Gambaro, Il diritto di proprietà, 895). Tort law protection extends to the lawful detentor (Cass. 30 October 1986, no. 6394, Giust.civ.Mass. 1986, fasc. 10; Monateri, Manuale della responsabilità civile, 167). In principle, the possessor is not entitled to compensation for the value of the item, but only to damages due to the loss of possible use (for an exception to this, see Cass. 12 May 1987, no. 4367, Giust.civ.Mass. 1987, fasc. 5).

19. Under HUNGARIAN law the holders of restricted rights in rem and of lawful possession can claim damages according to the general rules of tort law where they are seen as injured parties and the disadvantages they suffered are deemed tortiously relevant damage. Where a rented object is destroyed, the rental agreement is brought to an end (CC § 430(2)). In such a case the renter can also claim compensation for his damages (see further Besenyei, A bérleti szerződés, 49-50). The situation is the same where an object is destroyed, in which there lies a beneficial interest, cf. CC § 163. As to the relationship between the owner and the holder of a restricted right in rem, issues of damages are subject to the respective property law regime.

20. GERMAN CC § 823(1) sees only so-called "absolute rights" – namely rights that (in contrast to choses in action) are to be observed by all – as falling under "other rights". Belonging to this category are also restricted rights in rem, rights of expectancy in property (RG 1 July 1942, RGZ 170, 1, 6; BGH 11 November 1970, BGHZ 55, 20; BGH 5 April 1991, BGHZ 114, 161), public easements (hunting and fishery rights: BGH 30 October 2003, NJW-RR 2004, 100; CFI Trier 21 June 2005, NJW-RR 2006, 894; BGH 3 January 1968, BGHZ 49, 231; BGH 5 April 1968, BGHZ 50, 73; BGH 21 July 1969, VersR 1969, 928) and lawful possession (RG 25 October 1917, RGZ 91, 60, 65; BGH 26 March 1974, BGHZ 62, 243, 248). However, the extent of the protection of possession is a much debated issue (see further Soergel [-Zeuner], BGB[12], § 823, no. 58; MünchKomm [-Wagner], BGB[4], § 823, no. 151).

21. In AUSTRIA it is likewise undisputed that along with the right of ownership, all restricted rights in rem enjoy tort law protection (Schilcher and Kleewein, in: v. Bar (ed.), Deliktsrecht in Europa, Österreich, 35). Herein included are prospective entitlements to property (like e.g. the prospective entitlement of a purchaser under retention of title: Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht II², 31, 34). Possessors and detentors (e.g. a renter or leaseholder) enjoy absolute protection in the context of CC § 372 (Rummel [-Spielbüchler], ABGB I³, § 372 no. 5); consequently they may enforce their own claim against the tortfeasor where there is property damage (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[11], 246; OGH 20 June 1990, JBl 1991, 247, note Rummel). The same goes for a lessee if in relation to the owner, he bears the costs of repair (OGH 24 May 1995, JBl 1996, 114 note Lukas, OGH 29 April 1997, SZ 70/85, 627). Conversely, any person who, without such an internal rule on bearing the costs of damage, solely has a relationship with the owner under the law of obligations, does not have his own personal claim in compensation (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 298, discussing a cable case). Therefore, a person who borrows a car and has to rent a replacement car because of an accident which was the fault of another does not suffer any recoverable damage (CA Innsbruck 2 December 1992, ZVR 1994, 28).

22. The situation in Austria mirrors that of GREECE in all essential aspects. Alongside the right in ownership and restricted rights in rem, possession and protected detention also count among the interests worthy of tort law protection here (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 914, no. 38; Filios, Enochiko dikaio II[2][3], 29). In the case of property damage the possessor is consequently entitled to a claim in damages. It exists independently of the owner's claim and covers the loss of use and the costs to be borne by the renter. Damages for depreciation in value and (in case of the object's destruction) for material damage are, in contrast, only open to the owner (A.P. 983/1986, NoB 36 [1988] 339). The right of expectancy of a purchaser under retention of title also enjoys tort law protection. The purchaser under retention of title indeed already has his own claim in damages in view of the infringement of his detention. Moreover, in his capacity as the holder of a right, he also has a claim to material damages, bestowed upon him by CA Athens 1554/1996, EllDik 39 (1998) 602, where the object is destroyed. Conversely, in academic writing, the opinion prevails, that in such a case the purchaser under retention of title as well as the vendor under retention of title could claim damages, however only in a manner in which both claim payment communally. This is supported by an analogy to CC arts. 495, 11 second sentence, 1180 first sentence and 1253 (Kritikos, note under CA Athens loc. cit.).

23. PORTUGUESE law equips the lawful possessor of a thing with legal protection against impending or current interferences with use (CC arts. 336, 337, 1276-1286 and 1277; cf. CA Oporto 3 April 1984, CJ [1984-2] 225; CA Lisbon 2 April 1973, BolMinJus 226 [1973] 262; STJ 15 May 2006; STJ 3 November 2005; STJ 8 May 2001, CJ [ST] 2001-2, 57). In some cases statute also extends this protection on equitable grounds to a mere detentor (CC arts. 1037 no. 2, 1125 no. 2, 1133 no. 2 and 1188 no. 2; CA Evora 29 July 1987, CJ [1987-4] 289). Under tort law (CC art. 483), the leaseholder of an agricultural site can therefore claim damages for lost profit from a township that builds a street on a piece of his land without his authorisation and without a compulsory purchase order (STJ 20 January 2005). On the other hand, a renter is not liable for the normal wear and tear of the rented item (STJ 27 April 2005; CA Oporto 30 June 2005).

24. Despite some reservations, in DUTCH law, it has been derived from arts. 3:107(1) and 3:125 that not only restricted rights in rem (like e.g. a land easement [CC art. 5:70], fee farm [CC art. 5:85], usufruct [CC art. 3:201], residential property [CC art. 5:106] and right of abode [CC art. 3:226]), belong among the "rights" within the meaning of CC art. 162(2), but also lawful possession (distinct from detention) (Onrechtmatige Daad I [-Jansen], art. 6:162(2), no. 15 pp. 142-143). Holders of restricted rights in rem can consequently enforce their own claims in damages, especially in the case of property damage by a third party (CA Amsterdam 27 October 1938, NedJur 1939 no. 242 p. 380; Jansen loc. cit. no. 21 pp. 168-188). The legal position is the same under ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(1)(v).

25. Though the action for compensation of property damage in SWEDEN lies first and foremost with the owner, it is recognised that others may have interests worthy of protection in the damaged property. Therefore, in analogy to insurance law provisions, compensation for value (not: compensation for consequential loss) can be granted particularly to the holders of real securities as well as of a heritable building right, and further those who bear the risk of the property's destruction (Sandstedt, VersRAI 2005, 38, 43; Andersson, Trepartsrelationer i skadeståndsrätten, 137; similarly for DENMARK Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 295 as well as [with a detailed compilation of case groups] von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 251 and for FINLAND Insurance Contract Act [Lag om försäkringsavtal] §§ 62, 65(2) and 66). However, the basic rule is that only the directly injured party is entitled to recover in tort. Those indirectly harmed must show "concrete and proximate interests" in the object (Andersson, loc. cit. 20, 179 and 184; SWEDISH HD 4 April 1966, NJA 1966, 210; cf. HD 27 October 2004, NJA 2004, 609). HD 18 December 1972, NJA 1972, 598 granted the renter of a cottage in which he kept chickens, damages for their freezing to death when the electricity cable which belonged to the owner had been negligently damaged by a third party. HD 7 March 1988, NJA 1988, 62 denied damages for a breakdown in production resulting from a power outage but granted compensation for destroyed materials and materials to be disposed of, although this also concerned damage to a third party (the cable did not belong to the injured party). FINNISH Supreme Court 12 December 2003, HD 2003:124 denied damages for breakdown in production in a case where someone had intentionally shot at power supply lines. Cf. further Finnish Supreme Court 6 October 1994, HD 1994:94. DANISH Supreme Court 5 July 1988, UfR 1988, 878 deemed a sport fishing club eligible for recovery of damages for the destruction of a fish stock resulting from water pollution, although it had no real fishery right. An action for compensation of higher maintenance costs for ships as a result of damage to a bridge was turned down (HD 16 November 1939, UfR 1940, 117); in contrast, a rail operator that had a real right in the overpass was granted compensation in a similar case (HD 7 April 1960, UfR 1960, 932).

26. In IRELAND the torts of trespass to land and trespass to goods protect rights of possession, with nuisance protecting against "any interference with a person's use and enjoyment of his land" (Redfont Ltd. v. Custom House Dock Management Ltd. [1998] IEHC 206, per Shanley J.). In Farrell v. Minister for Agriculture and Food, HC 11 October 1995, unreported, Carroll J. observed that the tort of trespass to goods "consists of wrongfully and directly interfering with the possession of chattels". A number of aspects of the tort are uncertain in the absence of clear Irish authorities in point (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 28.03). The interference may consist of taking the chattel out of the possession of another (Brewer v. Dew (1843) 11 M & W 625, 152 ER 955; Gahan v. Maingay (1793) Ridg L & S 20; Conway v. Archdall (1826) 1 Batt 182; Wilson v. Lombank Ltd. [1963] 1 WLR 1294), moving it from one place to another (Kirk v. Gregory (1875-76) 1 Ex. D 55), or doing damage to it (Fouldes v. Willoughby (1841) 8 M & W 540, 151 ER 1153, 1157; Deering v. Mahon (1851) 2 ICLR 25; M'Cormick v. Ballantine (1861) 10 ICLR 305). The interference must be direct (McDonagh v. West of Ireland Fisheries Ltd., HC 19 December 1986, unreported, Blayney J). In commentary the general consensus is that trespass to goods is actionable per se (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para 28.07), but the judicial authorities are less than compelling on this issue (Leitch & Co. Ltd. v. Leydon [1931] AC 90, 106 [Lord Blanesburgh]). As in the case with trespass to land the tort of trespass to goods is "founded on possession" (Ward v. Macauley (1791) 4 T. R. 489, 100 ER 1135) and not ownership. To be actionable a trespass must be either wilful or negligent (M'Cormick v. Ballantine loc. cit.). The defendant will however be liable even where he did not appreciate that the interference was wrongful (Farrell v. Minister for Agriculture and Food loc. cit.; M'Mullan v. Bradshaw (1916) 50 ILTR 205). Thus, the deliberate use of a chattel in the mistaken belief that it is one's own will constitute a trespass (Wilson v. Lombank Ltd. [1963] 1 WLR 1294). In some circumstances an action that would otherwise constitute a trespass to goods may not be tortious because the actor has lawful authority to do the action (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 28.14). Trespass to land is defined by Shanley J. in Royal Dublin Society v. Yates [1997] IEHC 144, as consisting "in any unjustifiable intrusion by one person upon land in the possession of another", noting that the "intrusion may be intentional or it may be negligent: in either case, it is actionable in the absence of lawful justification". Where persons have lawfully entered land in the possession of another, they will commit a trespass if they remain there after their right to stay has ended (Wood v. Leadbitter (1845) 13 M & W 838, 153 ER 351; Duffield v. Police [1971] NZLR 381; Carson v. Jeffers [1961] IR 44; Irish Shell & B. P. Ltd. v. John Costello Ltd. [1984] IR 511). It is trespass for a person to place any chattel (including animals) on the land of another or to cause any object or substance directly to cross the boundary of another's land, or even to reach the boundary (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 23.29). Where the plaintiff establishes an act which physically constitutes a trespass, the onus is upon the defendant to show that he was neither negligent nor acted intentionally (Electricity Supply Board v. Hastings & Co. Ltd. [1965] Ir Jur 51; Royal Dublin Society v. Yates loc. cit.). The tort is not generally available to persons out of possession at the time of the intrusion (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para 23.41). Nuisance may be broken down into public nuisance and private nuisance (O'Higgins C.J. in Connolly v. South of Ireland Asphalt Co. Ltd. [1977] IR 99). Public nuisance is a crime, the essence of which is injury to the reasonable comfort and convenience of the public or a section of the public (Re Article 26 and the Employment Equality Bill 1996 [1997] 2 IR 321 [SC] and Truloc Ltd. v. District Judge McMenamin & Donegal County Council [1994] 1 ILRM 151). Only where a person has suffered 'particular' or 'special' damage over and above that suffered by other members of the public may he or she take civil proceedings (Coppinger v. Sheehan [1906] 1 IR 519, 522-523). It has been stated in commentary that private nuisance is "really a field of tortuous liability rather than a single type of tortuous conduct: the feature which gives it unity is the interest invaded – that of the use and enjoyment of land" (Salmond and Heuston on the Law or Torts[21], 53). In Hanrahan v. Merck, Sharpe & Dohme (Ireland) Ltd. [1988] ILRM 629, Henchy J. stated that it was "clear from authorities on the law of nuisance that what an occupier of land is entitled to as against his neighbour, is the comfortable and healthy enjoyment of the land to the degree that would be expected by an ordinary person whose requirements are objectively reasonable in all the particular circumstances" (loc. cit. 634). With three notable exceptions, private nuisance is not generally actionable per se, and actual damage must be proven; the damage may consist in (i) physical injury to land, (ii) a substantial interference with the enjoyment of land, or (iii) an interference with servitudes, where the disturbance constitutes a substantial interference with the plaintiff's rights (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. chap. 24).

27. In SCOTLAND, possession is protected under the heading of various different delicts, including: (i) ejection and intrusion; (ii) molestation; (iii) encroachment; (iv) nuisance; (v) use of land in aemulationem vicini; and (vi) spuilzie. Ejection is where someone enters on to lands and removes another or stays on when his right to stay there has expired (Stewart, Delict[3], para. 2.10). Intrusion is sneaking on to the subjects when the possessor holds animo (by will) rather than corpore (in person): "[ejection and intrusion] differ in this; that intrusion is the entering in possession, being for the time void, without consent of the parties interested, or order of law … but ejection … is not only the unwarrantable entering in lands, but the casting out violently of the then possessor" (Stair I, ix, 25). The remedies for these nominate delicts are: (a) summary ejection; (b) violent profits, being the greatest profit the pursuer could have made if in possession; and (c) actual compensatory damages (Stewart loc. cit.). Molestation is a possessory action, now disused, for determining "to which of two coterminous tenements some disputed part or pertinent pertains, so as to prevent the pursuer being further molested or troubled in his possession of the lands claimed; the modern remedy is by way of declarator or interdict" (Walker, Delict[2], 938). Encroachment consists in the permanent usurpation by another in some portion of a man's lands, which deprives him of the free use of it for the future (Walker loc. cit. 944). Examples of encroachment include a building projecting over the property of another (Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland, §§ 941, 967; Graham v. Greig (1838) 1 D 171; M'Intosh v. Scott & Co. (1859) 21 D 363; Leonard v. Lindsay & Benzie (1886) 13 R 958 or a pipe running through a neighbour's property (Galbreath v. Armour (1845) 4 Bell 374) or by trees overhanging the neighbour's garden (Wedderburne v. Halkerston (1781) Mor. 10495), or by the roots of trees penetrating the ground beyond the boundary (McCombe v. Read [1955] 2 QB 429; Davey v. Harrow Corp. [1958] 1 QB 60). The term nuisance is used loosely to cover any use of property which causes trouble or annoyance to neighbours (Walker loc. cit. 955). Scotland does not follow suit with the distinction drawn in England and Ireland between public and private nuisance, with Scots law taking its own tripartite approach, distinguishing between common law nuisances, statutory nuisances and conventional nuisances (Walker loc. cit.). In Scots law use of land which is otherwise lawful may be actionable as wrongful if the predominant motive for the use in question is the harm of a neighbour, the gratification of spite, or the oblique motive: this is termed "use of the land in aemulationem vicini" (Walker loc. cit. 993-995). Spuilzie both describes: (a) the act of interfering with property, namely spoliation; and (b) a remedy known to the law of Scotland in respect of such actions (Stewart loc. cit. para. 2.21). It is committed by a person who takes away moveables without the consent of the possessor or without order of law – it is not even necessary for the pursuer to establish ownership of the property so long as there is a right of possession or custody (Stair, I, ix, 16). There is liability for property destroyed, property of another taken, property of another used without permission and property detained (Stewart loc. cit. para. 2.22).

III. Loss, in particular, recoverability of non economic losses and loss of use

28. Under BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBURGIAN law every loss following from the destruction, loss, damaging or depreciation in value of an object constitutes damage recoverable under tort law, without there really being any differentiation in principle between these different heads of damages (Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], no. 251-1 p. 19). Where a new car is damaged, according to French doctrine (the situation in Belgium has yet to be definitively clarified) not only costs of repair, but also the depreciation in market value of an accident damaged car are to be made good (Cass.civ. 6 October 1966, D. 1967, jur. 5). Loss of use (the temporary impossibility of being able to use an object) amounts to recoverable damage in both legal systems (Viney and Jourdain loc. cit. 20; Schryvers and Ulrichts, Schaderegeling in België[5], 34-37); it is even granted where animals are injured (e.g. a riding horse: CFI Nijvel 3 February 2003, RGAR 2004, no. 13927). Up to the delivery of the new car, the owner of a car that is written off has a claim to compensation of the costs of a reasonable rental car, and furthermore a claim to compensation for the fact that he has lost the advantage of free servicing on the old car (CFI Charleroi 7 May 2001, RGAR 2002, no. 13575). If it is established that the atteinte au bien has caused dommage moral, this is also to be compensated (JClCiv [-Bertolaso], art. 1382 à 1386, fasc. 110, no. 18; Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 175 pp. 327-328). The principle of objective and complete reparation applies generally: the state in which the injured party would have found himself, had the injurious event not occurred, is to be restored (Simoens loc. cit. no. 152 p. 300).

29. In SPANISH academic writing there is debate on whether non-economic losses, which the owner of a thing suffers as a result of its destruction or damage to it, are also recoverable (for those in favour, see e.g. Albaladejo [-Santos Briz], Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales XXIV, art. 1902, 217; verneinend dagegen Díez-Picazo, Derecho de daños, 328). CA Álava 18 June 1999, AC 2000 (1) no. 118 p. 204 granted non-economic compensation to a house owner when her front door was damaged by the defendant company and as a result she could not close it for a time, meaning that she had lived in constant fear of intruders. Every crease in relation to tort law recoverability for damage resulting purely from loss of use has not yet been ironed out, viz. the question of whether the abstract possibility of using an object amounts to economic value per se. It is affirmed here and there, see e.g. Albaladejo (-Santos Briz) loc. cit. art. 1902, 231; CA Ciudad Real 12 February 1998, BDA AC 1998/3435 (amount of damages assessed at 20% of the costs of public transport); CA Pontevedra 10 October 1995, BDA AC 1995/1949 (damages for loss of use affirmed but only for the time in which it was actually being repaired in the workshop); CA Soria 15 February 2000, BDA JUR 2000/113208 (same); CA Zamora 1 February 2001, BDA JUR 2001/123000 (damages for loss of use affirmed for an apartment, although the owners did not live in it consistently); CA Barcelona 24 November 2000, BDA JUR 2001/63518 (in the case of a car being used for professional purposes, no compensation for time during public holidays). Also Catalan CC art. 546-14 points in a similar direction with its rule on damages (for the position before codification see further Martín Vida, VersRAI 2005, 57-63; VersRAI 2006, 5-8). In the same way, the overwhelming number of appellate court decisions (clarifying words of the Supreme Court are absent) constantly insist on the existence of actual loss, thereby granting no compensation of abstract damages for loss of use. See for instance CA Guadalajara 22 March 2006, BDA JUR 2006/140758 (no compensation for the mere loss of potential use); CA Baleares 13 February 2006, BDA JUR 2006/84138 (water leak caused by neighbour, no damages for the deprivation of the use of the house during the period of repair because the house was a second home, not designated for renting purposes); CA Caceres 6 May 1998, BDA AC 1998/5721 (no damages for the deprivation of the use of a car during the period of repair because the plaintiff did not manage to prove any loss); CA Zamora 1 February 2001, BDA AC 2001/229 (no compensation for the deprivation of the use of two hotel rooms during repair works because there was no full booking and thus no relevant damage); and CA Barcelona 15 January 1999, BDA AC 1999/2960 (no compensation for the deprivation of the use of an apartment because there was no tenant).

30. In ITALY non-economic damage as a result of damage to property or destruction thereof is not recoverable (CC art. 2059; for a revision of this traditional viewpoint Conti, Danno e resp. 2006, 237). Conversely, the situation in Italy in relation to damages flowing from loss of use is not completely clear. If another's land is illegally occupied, the assessment of damages takes its cue from the rental value (Cass. 4 November 1995, no. 11524, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, fasc. 11). The damage is in re ipsa, since the dispositional authority of the dominus can be injured and the utilitas (= the civil fruits, namely the rent) can no longer be drawn (Cass. 11 March 1995, no. 2859, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, 583). An estimated amount is granted, a danno figurativo. Recoverability of accident damage to cars had been denied some few years ago; the owner must at least have proven that he would have actually used the car, if it did not have to be repaired and that he could no longer work or was forced to use public transport (so-called danno da fermo tecnico, see particularly from case law: Cass. 19 November 1999, no. 12820, Giust.civ.Mass. 1999, 2295). In more recent decisions, however, is has been stated that danno da fermo tecnico is to be compensated independently of particular proof of damage according to the free discretion of the trial judge, in order to compensate frustrated expenses (general running costs of the car) and depreciation in value (Cass. 13 July 2004, no. 12908, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 7-8; Cass. 14 December 2002, no. 17963, Giust.civ.Mass. 2002, 2202).

31. Under HUNGARIAN CC § 355(4) loss in value occasioned to the assets of the injured party (BH 1996/196) and proprietary advantages that fail to come to fruition (BH 1984/401; the claim in this case was denied due to factual reasons, however) are to be compensated, as are, furthermore, all costs that are necessary to reduce or eradicate the injured party's economic and non-economic detriment. Where an apartment is flooded, the costs of repair are consequently to be compensated; moreover, compensation for the restriction of the use of the apartment – as lost profit – is to be provided. In contrast, the fact that a family get-together could not take place to a respectable degree in the apartment in question was not deemed severe enough to make out a further claim in non-economic damages (BH 2002/482). If someone misses a business appointment due to a traffic accident for which another is at fault, the loss is recoverable flowing from the fact that a contract failed to be concluded as a result (BH 2001/273); the same goes for lost profit as a result of the destruction of an ice cream parlour (BH 1997/332). The consequential costs of an interference with possession are also recoverable (BH 1999/202: restorative building work as a result of the unauthorised renovation of an apartment). Where someone expertly repairs her/himself, s/he can account for the market price of such repairs (BH 1996/313). Further, e.g. the rental costs of a replacement vehicle during the period of repair may be compensable (BH 1984/499, relates to a locomotive). In contrast, the recoverability of damages for non-material loss for damage to property is denied, see Vékás, FS Boytha György 2004, 332. BH 2002/482 follows the view that non-economic damages only fall due for infringements of personality rights. See also BH 1996/358 (the right to property does not belong among personal rights, which is why a claim in non-economic compensation does not come into the picture where a thing is merely confiscated by a judge for an amount of time that exceeds the lawful period). The proposed scheme for a new CC tends in the same direction (Herpai, VersRAI, 2005, 46).

32. Under GERMAN law non-economic damage as a result of an infringement of property rights is not recoverable (CC § 253(2)). More often than not, this throws up the question of which disadvantages are to be qualified as economic and which as non-economic. BGH 9 July 1986 (Grand Senate for Civil Matters), BGHZ 98, 212) inferred that where objects are used on the operations side of business, the lost possibility of use is to be qualified as lost gains. If private use is at issue, compensation only comes into focus in cases of commercial goods of basic necessity; however, even a "normative supplementation" of the calculation of the differential under the law of damages is imperative here. The loss of use in elementary necessities (automobile, abode, necessary fixtures) is qualified as economic, the loss of use in luxurious goods (private swimming pool, fur coat, private jet) as non-economic damages (see further Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[65], preliminary observations to § 249, nos. 20, 25 and MünchKomm [-Oetker], BGB[4], § 249, no. 58).

33. It is also true for AUSTRIA that for property damage, compensation in kind (repair) falls due first and foremost. Compensation of value in the amount of the value of reconstruction is payable in cases of the destruction of a thing due to slight negligence (CC § 1332), in cases of gross fault, lost gains are additionally recoverable (CC § 1331 first sentence) and for malice also non-economic damages (CC § 1331 second sentence: "particular sentimental value"; the so-called "sentimental interest"). Furthermore, the so-called drop in market value is recoverable (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VII², § 1323 no. 20), not however pure loss of use (thus no reparation of so-called "notional car rental costs": OGH 3 March 1969, SZ 42/33, Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I³, no. 2/108). There is, however, a claim to the compensation of frustrated expenses (tax, insurance, garage rental) during the period of repair (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[11], 287). On the other hand, the cancellation fee for a boat, which the claimant had rented for his holidays but could not take due to an accident, is not compensable; in reality this type of frustrated expenses is concerned with non-economic loss (CFI Salzburg 10 April 2004, 22R34/04k). Pure loss of the possibility to use a thing is also not recoverable (OGH 9 October 1986, SZ 59/165; OGH 17 June 1993, JBl 1994, 121; OGH 4 June 1987, SZ 60/102), which is why e.g. so-called 'notional rental costs' (illustration 15 above) are qualified as irrecoverable non-economic loss (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 287). Things are different where deprivation of use brings with it a real loss of assets (OGH 14 August 1996, EFSlg 81.472; OGH 16 December 1992, ecolex 1993, 379).

34. In GREECE, just like in Austria, but not in Germany, the opinion prevails that a so-called "abstract loss of use" is not recoverable damage; it lacks a loss of assets in the sense of the method of calculating damages whereby the disparity of assets between the situation before and after the injurious event is sought to be remedied (Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2], 540; Sourlas, NoB 33 [1985] 728, 743). The additional expenditure of time, the discomfort and effort on the part of the injured party are, however, recoverable as non-economic damages in the context of CC art. 932 (Stathopoulos loc. cit. 541). During the period of repair of a damaged car, frustrated expenses are additionally compensated (Stathopoulos loc. cit.; CFI Athens 3053/1978, NoB 27 [1979] 106; critical, Sourlas loc. cit. 736); to this extent, the situation corresponds with that in Austria.

35. In PORTUGAL the question of the recoverability of damage resulting from loss of use has to date remained unanswered (details in Abrantes Geraldes, Indemnização do dano, 6). It seems that previously in relation to vehicles, it was predominantly affirmatively answered (Mesquita, RLJ 125 [1992/93] 159; Menezes Leitão, Obrigações I, 297; STJ 6 June 2006; STJ 9 May 1995, BolMinJus 457 [1995] 325), of late it tends mostly to be answered in the negative (STJ 8 June 2006; STJ 12 January 2006; STJ 4 December 2003; CA Oporto 8 July 1997, BolMinJus 469 [1997] 663; see also CA Coimbra 4 October 1994, BolMinJus 440 [1994] 554). The illegal occupancy of land, however, shall even ground liability where the owner cannot prove that he would have rented it for this period (CA Lisbon 11 March 2003, CJ 2003-II, 70). Evidence of actual loss is therefore unnecessary here (STJ 29 June 2004). It is self-evident that the expense of having to rent a car during the period of repair of one's own car is recoverable (Abrantes Geraldes loc. cit., 33; STJ 5 March 2002). In the context of lost use even compensation for non-economic losses has been granted (STJ 23 January 2001; CA Evora 26 March 1980, CJ 1980-II, 96), however, that is not done as a rule (denied by e.g. STJ 4 December 2003 and CA Coimbra 4 October 1994 loc. cit.).

36. In DUTCH Law the rule that the party liable in tort is automatically in default (CC art. 6:83(b)) and therefore must pay statutory interest on his liability in damages from the moment the tort is committed, is transferred to the situation of the detention of a thing. Bedrijfsschade (loss of operation) and gebruiksderving (loss of use) are spoken of here. Compensation for such a loss of use is concretely calculated; the value of the real lost use is authoritative, not a mere abstract possibility of use (for more detail and references to diverging views, see Salomon, Schadevergoeding, no. 21 pp. 45-50). A claim in compensation of non-economic losses will only lie where the person responsible had the intention of inflicting such damage (CC art. 6:106(1)(a)). The provision foresees cases in which an object is destroyed or damaged with the purpose of inflicting mental pain on the owner, thus injuring his "sentimental interest" (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 378-380). The intention must also cover this advanced purpose; it is not sufficient that it "only" relates to the property damage as such (Schadevergoeding II [-Lindenbergh], art. 6:106, nos. 20-21, pp. 134-145).

37. ESTONIAN LOA § 134(4) follows a very similar, if not perfectly identical approach ("In the case of destruction or loss of a thing, the aggrieved person has, taking into account exceptional circumstances, the right to claim a reasonable amount of money as compensation for non-patrimonial damage in addition to compensation for patrimonial damage regardless of the usefulness of the thing if the person had a special interest in the destroyed or lost thing primarily for personal reasons"). The compensatory obligation in relation to patrimonial damages is elaborately regulated in LOA § 132. In the case of destroyed things, the point of departure is the principal of compensation of value (paras. (1) and (2)); in the case of property damage, the costs of repair are to be met (para. (3)). Loss of use is the subject-matter of the rule in § 132(4): "If a thing damaged was necessary or useful for the aggrieved person, in particular, for the person's economic or professional activities or work, compensation for the damage shall also cover the costs of using a thing of equal value during the time in which the damaged thing is being repaired or a new thing is being acquired. If the person does not use a thing of equal value, the person may claim compensation for loss of the advantages of use which the person could have benefited from during the time in which the thing is repaired or a new thing is being acquired". On this provision see Supreme Court 3-2-1-137-05, RT III 2006, 3, 26.

38. SWEDISH Law on Damages chap. 5 § 7 states: "Compensation for property damage encompasses compensation for (i) the value of the thing or the costs of repair and depreciation in value, (ii) other costs resulting from the damage, (iii) lost income or interference with commercial activity." This extensively corresponds with FINNISH Law on Damages chap. 5 § 5. The DANISH Law on Damages is silent on the issue of property damage. For all three legal systems, see also the Notes under VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation). In a case in which someone felled six large old trees on neighbouring land, DANISH Supreme Court 12 September 1994, FED 1994.995V expressly also compensated the non-pecuniary damage. The "other costs" enumerated in SWEDISH Law on Damages loc. cit. may refer to wholly different headings. In particular what is meant are costs for the transportation of the damaged thing, costs of inspection (restricted, however, by HD 5 June 1989, NJA 1989, 251), of an expert valuation and for expenses for the mitigation of damage. Furthermore, so-called "standstill compensation" (pure loss of use in the case of vehicles) and the recoverability of the cost of keeping a reserve are also recognised (a transportation company's precaution of keeping by a replacement vehicle in case of an accident); compensation of costs on a pro rata basis) (HD 6 February 1932 and 14 October 1939, NJA 1939, 481; HD 4 June 1945, NJA 1945, 295; HD 27 September 1950, NJA 1950, 409; cf. HD 8 February 1993, NJA 1993, 13). Compensation has even been granted for the impossibility of using a damaged yacht during the holiday season (HD 5 October 1945, NJA 1945, 440), the same goes for three lost days of vacation resulting from damage to a car and caravan (HD 10 April 1992, NJA 1992, 213) and for the reward paid by the insurance company after a theft (HD 6 May 1994, NJA 1994, 283). DANISH case law grants compensation for increased maintenance costs as a result of property damage (Supreme Court 12 April 1960, UfR 1960, 932) and for the loss of use during repair and the waiting period until repurchase (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 251).

39. It is apparent that in IRELAND, apart from rulings in connection with car accident damage, there is near sole reliance on English rules due to the former's dearth of case law on this subject (for the case of car accident damage, see Hayes v. Callanan [2000] 1 IR 321: a case involving a road traffic accident where a previous action between the parties had come before the District Court and damages for loss of use and depreciation of the plaintiff's car, along with travelling expenses, were granted; subsequent proceedings were brought for personal injuries, the admissibility of which constituted, inter alia, the subject-matter of the case coming before the High Court in this reported case). As far as its significance for Ireland is concerned, reported case law and commentary in England on the recovery of damages for loss of use seems to be restricted to where the plaintiff would have derived direct commercial benefit (more easily transferable into a monetary sum) from its use, as is noted above in the context of conversion (under Note I14): where the converted article would have been put to profitable use – such as being hired out – losses for this use may also be recovered (Fleming, Law of Torts[9], 77-78). In an action for detinue the scope is broader (see above, Note I14), with damages for the chattel's detention also recoverable, under which damages for rental costs (General & Finance Facilities Ltd. v. Cooks Cars (Romford) [1963] 1 WLR 644, quoted with approval by Blayney J. in Webb v. Ireland [1987] IESC 2, [1988] IR 353) and the depreciation in value of the chattel between the date of the defendant's refusal to deliver the chattel (up to the plaintiff) and its actual return also fall (Rosenthal v. Alderton & Sons Ltd. [1946] KB 374, 378, per Evershed J.; see also Hymas v. Ogden [1905] 1 KB 246, where damages were awarded for the wrongful detention of the plaintiff's running dog). In General & Finance Facilities Ltd. v. Cooks Cars (Romford) loc. cit. Diplock L.J. referred to the damages awarded under conversion as being "for a single sum of which the measure is generally the value of the chattel at the date of the conversion together with any consequential damage flowing from the conversion and not too remote to be recoverable in law" (loc. cit. 649). In Egan & Sons Ltd. v. Sisk & Sons Ltd. [1986] ILRM 283 (where the plaintiff's warehouse was flooded due to the negligence of the first named defendant and brochures stored there to be used in connection with their mail order business were destroyed), the plaintiffs recovered loss of profits on anticipated sales, Carroll J. stating that "if a defendant through its negligence injures property in a warehouse, it must take the responsibility for damaging whatever goods are there… It is also foreseeable that because a warehouse is part of the world of commerce, there will be economic loss and possible loss of profits. If the goods can be replaced at cost, so much the better for the defendant; if the goods cannot be replaced, then the economic loss, including loss of profits, is foreseeable."

40. In SCOTLAND where a car is damaged in a road accident, the owner is entitled to loss of use of the damaged car while it is being repaired or replaced (Thomson, Delictual Liability[3], 253). The reasonable cost of hiring a car while the damaged vehicle is off the road is the yardstick drawn upon here. Accident car hire companies or credit hire companies that do not require a debit or credit card 'up front' (going against the grain of the normal practice of charging the pursuer's card first, with damages then eventually recovered by the pursuer from the defender) partake in the practice of assessing the merits of the motorist's case when he seeks a replacement car; if satisfied that the claim is unanswerable, the company provides a car and then pursues the motorist's claim against the defender's insurer, charging an additional fee beyond the so-called 'spot rate' for simple car hire (Thomson loc. cit.). In Dimond v. Lovell [2002] 1 AC 384 the House of Lords held that compensation for loss of use of a damaged car was restricted to the spot rate for hiring a car from a company other than an accident or credit hire company, i.e. the additional fee element charged by an accident or credit hire company was not recoverable. In Lagden v. O'Connor [2003] UKHL 64, [2004] 1 AC 1067, however, the House held that where the motorist was not in a pecuniary position to fund the cost of hiring a replacement car from a car or credit hire company himself, his loss could be assessed taking account of the accident or credit hire company's charges including the additional fee. The majority held that the impecuniosity of the plaintiff should be taken into account, with the effect that Lord Wright's opinion in Owners of Dredger Liesbosch v. Owners of Steamship Edison [1933] AC 449 (that a claimant's lack of means should not be taken into account when assessing the loss) was no longer to be followed. In the context of ejection and intrusion, an owner kept out of possession by a tenant may claim damages for loss resulting from that person's failure to remove and wrongful retention of possession, and possible also violent profits, which are penal damages instituted as a special deterrent against taking the law into one's own hands (Walker, Delict[2], 937). In the case of encroachment, the invasion of the pursuer's exclusive rights in the property is sufficient to justify an action, and no damage or loss need be proved (Colquhoun's Trustees v. Orr Ewing & Co. (1877) 4 R 344). In an action of spuilzie, the "action lies against the delinquent, not only for restoring to the former possessor the goods or their value, but for all the profits he might have made of these goods had it not been for the spuilzie. These profits are estimated by the pursuer's own oath … and get the name of violent, because they are due in no other case than of violence or wrong" (Erskine, II, 7, 16).

VI.–2:207: Loss upon reliance on incorrect advice or information

Loss caused to a person as a result of making a decision in reasonable reliance on incorrect advice or information is legally relevant damage if:

(a) the advice or information is provided by a person in pursuit of a profession or in the course of trade; and

(b) the provider knew or could reasonably be expected to have known that the recipient would rely on the advice or information in making a decision of the kind made.

COMMENTS

A. General

Policy considerations. As a general principle there is no liability for advice, recommendation and information. Any such liability would go too far to be workable for daily life and would burden every interpersonal communication with an unbearable risk of liability. The case is otherwise only when the recipient of the information has special cause to rely on the correctness of the information and the provider of the information knows or should know about this special situation in which the recipient of the information is placed. Typical cases concern information about credit-worthiness provided by banks and faulty valuations or certifications. Further instances would be instructions on use which a producer encloses with a product for the guidance of the end consumer or where a certificating authority issues digital signatures. However, the provision can also have effect in the realm of legal liability of doctors and other professionals.

European community law. As regards the special rules for internet service providers see Comment A and Notes IV37-45 under VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another). In contrast to the Directive on Electronic Commerce (2000/31/EC), the Directive on the prospectus to be published when securities are offered to the public or admitted to trading 2003/71/EC (OJ L 345 of 31 December 2003) has left the civil liability of the publisher of the prospectus unaffected (loc. cit. art. 6).

Relationship to contractual liability. Like all rules in this Book, VI.–2:207 is related to non-contractual liability. In some of the cases covered by VI.–2:207 a liability in contract may also arise. See further Book IV Part C. (Services). It is possible that contract law may undergo further developments whose effect will be to buttress or overlap with VI.–2:207 to a not insignificant extent. Whether in a particular case a parallel liability in non-contractual liability ought to be excluded must then be determined by contract law (VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (c)). However, the text proceeds on the basis that in cases comparable to the English decision in Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] AC 465 (concerning a credit reference provided by a bank in response to the third party's inquiry whether the bank's customer would be in a position financially to discharge obligations under a prospective transaction) a contract solely containing an obligation of the bank to be liable in the event of the information being incorrect would not arise. That is because there is no unilateral promise.

Relationship to VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another). Whereas VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another) governs legally relevant damage in case of incorrect information communicated to a third party, VI.–2:207 governs damage in case of incorrect information communicated to the recipient. VI.–2:207 thus concerns the question when does a recipient of false advice or information suffer a legally relevant damage if suffering loss by relying on that advice or information. It does not concern the situation in which false information is given about the claimant to a third party.

Illustration 1
If in deciding to make a (detrimental) tax-privileged capital investment a dentist relies on the incorrect information which an accountant and tax consultant has given the dentist orally, in a letter or in a brochure, the resultant loss will be legally relevant damage within the meaning of VI.–2:207. If it is reported that the dentist is evading tax, the matter falls within the ambit of VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another).

B. The circle of protected recipients of the information

Professional advice or information. Not every provision of information and advice which is defective and relied on by the recipient to the recipient's detriment can lead to liability under this Article. The damage must be caused by provision of information "in pursuit of a profession or in the course of trade". So-called 'kerbstone' advice falls outside those terms because provision by a professional is not enough; what is required is provision of the defective information or advice in the course of carrying out the profession. In the usual case this will mean in the context of a business activity, albeit irrespective of whether that is remunerated and whether there is a pre-existing contractual relationship with the recipient.

"The" recipient, not "a" recipient. The recipient of the information may be either a private individual or a person engaged in a business, trade or profession and may be either a natural or a legal person. The provision does not apply, however, to just any incidental recipient of the information who happens to rely on the correctness of the message that has come to that recipient's attention. The matter does not turn on whether the person communicating the information knew or ought to have known that somebody at least would rely on the information. What is essential is rather that that person must have had a definite circle of persons in view (sub-paragraph (b)). The person who gives the information or advice certainly need not know the actual recipient. An anonymous recipient suffices. Nor is it necessary that the recipient received the defective information or advice from the provider directly. An indirect recipient who obtains the information through intermediate third parties may equally have a claim. However, in both such cases the claimant must belong to the class of potential recipients of the information whose members the provider of the information knew or ought to have known would be dependent on the corrections of that information in coming to a decision of substantial significance and would rely on it. A person who does not reach a business appointment due to an incorrect traffic congestion report does not suffer legally relevant damage.

C. Reliance

Reasonable reliance. The existence of relevant damage for the purposes of the law on non-contractual liability arises crucially out of the disappointment of a legitimate reliance. It does not suffice that the recipient of the information actually relied on its correctness. This must be accompanied by the element that in the circumstances and in relation to the decision to be made, the recipient might reasonably rely on the information. A reasonable reliance on the accuracy of the information or advice is missing if one has trusted the utterances of a fortune teller, astrologist or similar charlatan. The recipient of information may also not rely on it if the recipient knows or should know that the provider of the information does not wish to vouch for the correctness of the communication.

Illustration 2
The element of justifiable reliance is therefore missing if the providers of the information makes it explicit that they do not or cannot accept responsibility for the correctness of the information (e.g. by making use of a "without obligation" clause or similar formulation).

Foreseeability of reasonable reliance. The requirement that the provider should have foreseen reasonable reliance on the advice or information provided (sub-paragraph (b)) will also operate to qualify implicitly the types of decision which can result in a loss relevant to VI.–2:207. The claimant must show that the provider ought to have foreseen that (i) the injured person would have made a decision of the type in fact made and (ii) would make such a decision in reliance on the information or advice provided. It is inherent in the foreseeability of such (reasonable) reliance on the information or advice that a decision of the sort made will be a significant one. The more serious the decision, the more the recipient's need for expert insight and correspondingly the greater opportunity for dependence on another's provision of expertise because of the informational imbalance between the parties. Conversely, the more trivial the decision, the less the grounds for supposing that the recipient would depend on the information given and the greater the reason for assuming that the recipient would not be strongly influenced by it. An information provider can safely expect others to make trivial decisions under their own steam and not to act parasitically on the guidance of others.

Illustration 3
Representatives of a regional agency of an association pour l´emploi dans l´industrie et le commerce hold an information session on the terms of early retirement annuities in the rooms of the claimant's employer. The claimant relies on this information; the damage that is caused to her as a result of her leaving the working world on the basis of too generous statements of her prospective pension is legally relevant damage. The association is liable if negligence is attributed to its representative. Contributory fault on the part of the claimant leads to a reduction in the claim to reparation.

D. Incorrect advice or information

An inseparable composite term. The subject-matter of VI.–2:207 is loss as a result of decisions that are attributable to "incorrect advice or information". This term does not denote two separate events (either advice or information), but rather a single activity in which an assertion of fact blends with a recommendation to make a decision based thereon. Mere advice ("travel by train, not by car") taken on its own lends itself just as little to being qualified as "right" or "wrong" as a mere value judgement. The advice must be based on a core of fact. On the other hand, a pure assertion of fact is likewise no sufficient basis for ascribing decision-making to that assertion. Instead a combination of both elements, for instance the (false) statement that the required planning permission for a piece of land had been given, coupled with at least the implicit recommendation to opt for the acquisition of that land. Mere conjecture is no assertion of fact.

Causation. VI.–2:207 operates with a two-pronged requirement for causation. The incorrect advice or information must have been a cause of the affected party making the relevant decision and this must in turn be seen as a cause of the loss. In each case, so-called "psychological causation" is in issue, which can be ascribed to an omission by the party responsible.

Illustration 4
A firm of accountants negligently overlooks considerable book losses while auditing a company's balances. Relying on the report, private persons invest in the audited company, which shortly afterwards goes into liquidation. The firm of accountants is liable to the investors for the price paid for the shares.

Accountability. VI.–2:207 relates only to the question of the prerequisites for the affirmation of legally relevant damage. As with all the provisions of this Section, it does not constitute a complete norm of liability. In particular it remains to be examined, whether the provider of the information acted negligently and whether contributory fault may be attributed to the recipient of the information in not having verified the information.

NOTES

1. In cases of erroneous information to the detriment of a contracting party, FRENCH and BELGIAN contract law first and foremost differentiate according to whether the person who has to furnish the information is to assume an obligation de moyens or an obligation de résultat (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats 2004/2005, nos. 5379-5381; CA Antwerp 2 May 1995, RW 1996-1997, 302 [upon request of a customer, a bank provides trade information; liability for its incorrectness only where breach of duty is present]). Against the backdrop of an extra- or precontractual relationship, in both systems it depends on the existence of a faute causing damage (Cass.soc. 5 November 1999, Bull.civ. 1999, V, no. 430 p. 318; CFI Bergen 26 September 1994, TBH 1995, 1035). Any person who declares himself as being willing to provide information has the duty to sufficiently inform himself beforehand (Cass.civ. 19 October 1994, Bull.civ. 1994, II, no. 200 p. 115; Raad van State/Conseil d´État 28 March 1996, RW 1996-1997, 435, note Lambrechts [false information by a borough on the competent court of review; liability for the claimant's procedural costs]).
2. The SPANISH CC likewise contains no general provision on liability for damages resulting from erroneous information or advice; jurisprudence on the extracontractual side of this problem field seems to be absent to date. In academic writing, reference is made to suggestions from English law (particularly Frades de la Fuente, La responsabilidad profesional frente a terceros por consejos negligentes, 1999; also Del Olmo García, ADC, 2001, pp. 257-368). De Ángel Yágüez, Responsabilidad por informar, 171, 188 opines that extracontractual liability for erroneous information would in principle not be made out by mere negligence. This is of course not on all fours with CA Barcelona 31 July 2000, BDA JUR 2000/306843 (following an erroneous audit report in which considerable book losses had been overlooked, liability of the relevant accountancy firm was affirmed not only to the client and contractual partner, but also to later investors, who lost their investment as a consequence of the insolvency of the audited company).
3. The situation in ITALY corresponds to the rule in VI.–2:207. Case law only allows a tort law claim for erroneous information where it reaches the stage of qualified contact between the participants in the context of an economically relevant decision-making-process. Anyone who has requested the information must have relied on the specialist skills and knowledge of the person who has provided the information (Cass. 9 June 1998, no. 5659, Foro it. 1999, I, 660 and Cass. 10 October 1998, no. 10067, Resp.civ. e prev. 1999, 404; cf. for information from a public authority, also Cass. 9 January 2004, no. 2424, Resp.civ. e prev. 2004, 731 [liability in casu denied because of a lack of negligence]). Most cases concern the liability of banks for erroneous information on the financial status of one of their customers (Cass. 9 June 1998 loc. cit. [emphasising the legally protected interest in informed decision-making]; Cass. 10 October 1998 loc. cit.; Cass. 1 August 2001, no. 10492, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 1517) and the liability of governmental posts to private persons (see, along with Cass. 9 January 2004 loc. cit., e.g. also Cass.sez.lav. 9 April 2001, no. 5247, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 751 [inflated details of paid social insurance contributions]; Cass.sez.lav. 18 November 2000, no. 14953, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 2373 [similar facts; claim however qualified by contract]; Cass.sez.lav. 31 January 2003, no. 1104, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, 173 [erroneous information on a pension claim apparently already obtained; liability for the remaining outstanding payments]). In academic commentary it is disputed, whether cases of this type concern liability in tort or contract law, cf. on one side Busnelli, Contr. Impr. 1991, 561 (tort law; the ingiustizia of the damage lies in the innocent reliance of the recipient of the information which is cognisable by the other party) and on the other Castronovo, La nuova responsabilità civile[3], 492 and Scognamiglio, Giur.it. 1995, IV, 356 (contract law; liability for the breach of a duty of care, which is to be derived from the fact that the recipient relied on the professional qualifications of the other party).

4. In HUNGARIAN law the point of departure is the general presumption of fault in CC § 339(1) second sentence. It can be expected of those gainfully employed in the relevant area, that the information provided by them is correct (BH 1996/471). In principle, it is also true in Hungary that pure words of advice or suggestions do not trigger liability; the recipient may decide whether or not to follow them himself (BH 1993/425). However, CC § 6 places the grant of damages at the discretion of the courts where someone bona fides and with cogent reason allows himself to be guided towards certain behaviour by another, through which he innocently harms himself. What is in issue here is a rule of liability, which is neither of a tortious nor contractual nature, since the conduct of the party proffering the recommendation or encouragement is not unlawful (Gellért [-Vékás], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 56-63; Bíró and Lenkovics, Magyar Polgári Jog, 194-199). Practically speaking, CC § 6 only plays a minor role because personal fault on the part of the party affected is mostly inferred. It would also be expected of entrepreneurs that they should not rely on the statements of their negotiating partner uncritically and without their own personal assessment under normal market practices (BH 1990/64). Furthermore, CC § 6 is to be distinguished from liability due to culpa in contrahendo, which is in any event subject to the general tort law, where the conclusion of a contract between the negotiating partners has not been arrived at (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 766-767). Where stocks and bonds are issued on the basis of false information, the contract is invalid; the duty to compensate is subject to Law No. CXX/2001 on the Capital Market § 29(1) (EBH 2001/544). Apart from that, it is conceivable that erroneous information is deemed as an affront to personality (BH 2004/235: invalid indenture with the consequence of a disruption of the affected party's career). Reference is also ultimately made to CC § 210(2), whereunder a contract can be avoided due to a mistake of law, where the mistake was essential and was attributable to misinformation that had been furnished to both parties by a legal expert.

5. GERMANY deals with liability for pure economic loss through erroneous information predominantly with the aid of contract law constructs. In the context of tort law, essentially only CC § 826 is at hand. "Immoral" within the meaning of this provision is e.g. providing information, the incorrectness of which is known to its communicator (RG 18 October 1917, RGZ 91, 80, 81; RG 9 March 1938, RGZ 157, 228, 229; BGH 22 June 1992, NJW 1992, 3167, 3174) or which the communicator recklessly confers as a "shot in the dark", despite its content being of recognisable importance to the recipient and the communicator reckoning with possible harm to the recipient (BGH 22 June 1992 loc. cit.). This can assume practical significane, e.g. where banks administer information on the solvency and credit-worthiness of their customers to the latter's contractual partners and default on their claim upon the insolvency of the customer (BGH 20 February 1979, NJW 1979, 1599; BGH 6 December 1983, NJW 1984, 921, 922). However, more frequently case law falls back on the inference that despite the rule in CC § 675(2), a contract for information is implicitly concluded between the requester and provider of information, for the breach of which damages fall due in the case of negligence. The prerequisites are simply that (i) the information is of considerable commercial importance to the recipient, (ii) he wants to make use of it as the basis for essential decisions and (iii) the provider of information either has particular expertise at their disposal or has a personal commercial interest in the provision of the information (BGH 29 October 1952, BGHZ 7, 371, 374; BGH 22 March 1979, BGHZ 74, 103, 106; BGH 17 October 1989, NJW 1990, 513; BGH 16 October 1990, NJW 1991, 352; BGH 7 July 1998, WM 1998, 1771). Even the Supreme Court of the Reich argued thus (RG 27 October 1902, RGZ 52, 365, 366; RG 3 June 1913, RGZ 82, 337, 339). Where a credit institution provides an incorrect attestation to his pecuniary circumstances and where this is submitted in accordance with stipulations to a third party, who in reliance on its correctness makes economic arrangements, the bank is liable for the resulting damages. This is likewise under the guise of an implicitly concluded contract for information (BGH 7 July 1998, WM 1998, 1771). Only where one of the aforementioned requisites are absent is there therefore still a current need for recourse to CC § 826. Similar developments are emerging for the liability of accountants as well as for the liability of evaluators and experts (for more detail, see MünchKomm [-Wagner], BGB[4], § 826, no. 54; Erman [-Schiemann], BGB II[11], § 826, no. 38).

6. Under AUSTRIAN CC § 1300 (first sentence) an "expert" is liable when he provides advice or information "for remuneration" and thereby acts with at least slight negligence (CC § 1299). Everything that is not done out of "pure courtesy" and "selflessness" is done "for remuneration" (OGH 11 July 1990, JBl 1991, 249; OGH 27 March 1995, SZ 68/60; Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI[3], § 1300 no. 2). "Selflessness" is lacking where the advice is given in preparation of a transaction for remuneration (Harrer loc. cit.). Even trade unions and interest groups do not act selflessly (OGH 27 March 1995, SZ 68/60: liability of the medical association for omitting to advise of an imminently expiring claim under the law on prescription of claims), this is not so for banks that gratuitously provide credit information (OGH 28 March 2002, ÖBA 2002, 937, note Koziol). Even in such cases a contract for information implictly comes into existence (OGH 17 November 1970, SZ 43/208). Liability for advice and information can also be based on public law relationships of duty (OGH 27 May 1980, SZ 53/83; OGH 14 November 1984, SZ 57/172). Hence, false information provided by authorities or courts can ground liability (of the state) (Harrer loc. cit. no. 36). If information is indeed provided "for remuneration" in this wide sense and yet gratuitously, individual factors mitigating liability may come into question (see further Welser, Die Haftung für Rat, Auskunft und Gutachten, 36). In principle, only the person to whom the advice is administered is entitled to claim, unless a contract for the protective benefit of the injured third party is in issue. The latter is inferred where the information was recognisably directed at a third party so that the third party could rely on it and make it the basis of his decision (Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Karner], ABGB, § 1300 no. 3; OGH 20 November 1996, SZ 69/258 [evaluation of land submittable to a bank]). In contrast, it does not suffice if the provider of information must solely notionally reckon with the relaying of the information to third parties (OGH 27 June 1994, SZ 57/122). Where a specific relationship of proximity between the parties is absent, liability only comes into focus if the provider of the information acted with the intention to harm and with knowledge of the erroneousness of the advice or information (CC § 1300 second sentence); dolus eventualis is sufficient (OGH 15 June 1978, MietSlg 30.246; OGH 14 November 2000, ÖBA 2001, 819). CC § 1300 second sentence relates to everyone, not only "official experts". The provision essentially has the function of founding liability also for pure economic losses, since cases of the infringement of absolute rights and interests worthy of legal protection remain within the scope of the general rules (OGH 13 July 1964, SZ 37/105: persuasion to make a mountain trip with the untruthful claim that this was completely safe). Liability for omissions also comes to this table (OGH 4 November 1959, SZ 32/144), but not however for denying being able to bear a child with the conscious knowledge that it was untruthful (OGH 27 January 1994, SZ 67/17).

7. In GREECE the cases covered by VI.–2:207, particularly the liability of banks to third parties, are categorised under tort and not contract law (Kotsiris, Arm 38 [1984] 601, 615; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 144). While the tort law protection does not in principle extend to property in general, there are still exceptions thereto in the context of specific duties of care (Eleftheriadou, Die Haftung aus Verkehrspflichtverletzung im deutschen und griechischen Deliktsrecht, 124). CC art. 729 does not alter any of this; the application of tort law remains imperative where the information or recommendation no longer turns upon everyday affairs due to its recognisable significance for the recipient and due to the occupation of the provider (Truli, Dienstleistungshaftung, 200; see also again ErmAK [-Kapodistrias], art. 729 nos. 21, 28). CA Athens 4486/1989, ArchN 1991, 206 affirmed liability of a newspaper for errors in the publication of boat connections to a holiday island. Today, along with CC art. 914, also 2251/1994 art. 8 (as amended by Act no. 3587/2007) is deemed a basis for liability (Truli loc. cit. 201 and 203: banks and official experts).

8. PORTUGUESE CC art. 485(1) – like German CC § 675(2) and Greek CC art. 729 – takes the irrelevance of advice, recommendations and information to the law of liability as its point of departure. According to CC art. 485(2), however, a duty to compensate damages emerges in the case of fault, where liability for the damage was assumed and where there was a contractual or statutory duty to provide the advice, recommendation or information (for more detail, see Carneiro da Frada, Uma terceira via, 66 and STJ 4 April 2006). In the cases where contractual or statutory duties to provide information are infringed, liability only accrues in principle as against the entitled recipient of the information (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I^4, 487; CA Lisbon 22 May, CJ 1993-III, 188). However, a mediator can also become liable to persons who were not party to the mediation contract (CA Oporto 29 May 2003). Further, participants of a course for learner drivers who receive false information on the legal prerequisites for self-employment are entitled to compensation for economic and non-economic damage where they had reason to rely on its correctness (STJ 28 February 2002). Conversely, an assistant of a clerk of court who rendered erroneous information to a party to suit against express instructions given by the lawyer of the latter is not liable (STA 3 November 1988, BolMinJus 381 [1988] 358).

9. In DUTCH law the starting point is the third alternative in CC art. 6:162(2), according to which conduct constitutes a wrong when it "contravenes unwritten norms of social interaction" (see further Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[12], nos. 32-33 p. 42). Counted among these "unwritten norms" are also general norms of care for the protection against pure economic losses; usually this would concern the requirements of care in such groups of occupations that take care of others' property (Hartkamp loc. cit. nos. 45 and 51, pp. 59 and 69; Onrechtmatige Daad I [-Jansen], art. 6:162 paragraph 2, no 86.2 pp. 884-885). The particular details are left up to jurisprudence, which generally recognises the liability of expert officials for information, on the correctness of which the recipient could rely (see from the cases of the court of first instance e.g. CFI Assen 24 March 1992, Prg 1997, 4771 and CFI Leeuwarden 20 August 1987, NedJur 1992 no. 803 p. 3456). HR 11 April 1997, NedJur 1998 no. 236 pp. 1231-1245 inferred that a bank that executes against the owner of land may rely on the information through his consultant without having to directly contact the owner once again. Conversely, a bank is liable for erroneous or insufficient information on the credit history of one of its customers, which was provided to the latter's contractual partner (HR 10 December 1993, NedJur 1994 no. 667 p. 3192; HR 22 December 1993, NedJur 1994 no 668 p. 3206). HR 19 May 1967, NedJur 1967 no. 261 p. 705 accepted a clause excluding liability in a case in which on its own initiative and in good faith a bank had advised the purchase of particular shares in a company, which immediately lost their value.

10. ESTONIAN LOA § 1048 corresponds in large part to VI.–2:207. It provides: "The behaviour of an expert is deemed to be unlawful if the expert provides incorrect information or an incorrect opinion to another person in a financial matter or, regardless of receiving new knowledge concerning the matter, fails to correct the information or opinion already provided, and if the expert enjoys particular trust due to his or her professional activities and the person who was given the information or opinion could expect to rely on such trust." LOA § 1048 thus expressly clarifies that the omission to correct incorrect information can give rise to liability if the person providing the opinion or information becomes aware of new circumstances. See further Tammiste, Juridica 2005, 385–395.

11. SWEDISH law provides compensation for pure economic losses only under quite strict requirements; this also applies in view of extracontractual liability for false information (on contractual liability in this context, see e.g. HD 14 April 1992, NJA 1992, 243). It only comes into focus in "quasi-contractual" relationships (Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 76; Kleineman, Ren förmögenhetsskada, 439-469). Occasionally it has even operated with a type of artificial contractual liability, like in Germany (e.g. HD 14 July 1980, NJA 1980, 383: false information on financial figures of one of the parties to proceedings by a representative of an authority). Later, liability (first in the context of a false expert appraisal) was then grounded on the justified reliance of the injured third party (HD 14 October 1987, NJA 1987, 692; affirmed on this point by HD 19 December 2001, NJA 2001, 878, cf. Kleineman, JT 2001-02, 625, 632). Liability under the Law on financial Advice to Consumers (lag [2003:862] om finansiell rådgivning till konsumenter) § 1 also oscillates between tort and contract law, which likewise rests upon the principle of justified reliance (Swahn and Wendleby, Lagen om finansiell rådgivning till konsumenter, 31). In DENMARK it is said that no clear line can be drawn between contract and tort law for liability for professional information (Ulfbeck, Erstatningsretlige grænseområder, 7). In any event, culpable behaviour (culpøst) as against a third party, so not only as against the contractual partner, is a prerequisite of liability (Samuelsson and Søgaard, Rådgiveransvaret, 88). Specific laws can impose on individual occupational groups such duties directed towards third parties; occasionally they have also been developed by jurisprudence (Ulfbeck loc. cit. 36, 46, 60), e.g. for accountants (Supreme Court 9 April 2002, UfR 2002. 1444 and 25 June 2002, UfR 2002, 2032 [liability of an accountant for false information to a bank providing credit]).

VI.–2:208: Loss upon unlawful impairment of business

(1) Loss caused to a person as a result of an unlawful impairment of that person's exercise of a profession or conduct of a trade is legally relevant damage.

(2) Loss caused to a consumer as a result of unfair competition is also legally relevant damage if Community or national law so provides.

COMMENTS

A. Purpose and scope

Purpose. The purpose of this provision is to make it clear that loss resulting from an unlawful interference with another's business or profession constitutes a recognised damage for the purpose of the law on non-contractual liability. It concerns losses as a result of prohibited interferences with competitors' access to the market. Falling outside its remit, therefore, is the question whether and under what circumstances a consumer too can claim reparation from an undertaking that has caused him or her a loss by an unfair competitive practice (paragraph (2)). This problem area is the subject-matter of a self-contained branch of law in many (if not in all) European legal systems; today, only exceptionally is it still located in the general law on non-contractual liability.

Prevention. In the situations covered by this Article, it is not only compensation for losses suffered which plays a role. Preventative legal protection is also of great practical significance here. For that reason particular regard is to be given to VI.–1:102 (Prevention) and VI.–6:301 (Prevention in general).

Scope. The Article borrows in part from the concept developed in German non-contractual liability law of a "right to form and operate a business enterprise" (or "right to enterprise"), but does not correspond with its scope of application in every regard. In particular, VI.–2:208 is narrower because it is silent on the legal liability arising from unauthorised forms of labour disputes: see VI.–7:104 (Liability of employees, employers, trade unions and employers associations). Due to VI.–7:104, all cases of "harassment" of fellow-employees also remain unaffected by VI.–2:208. The so-called "jeopardising of credit-worthiness" recognised in many legal orders is covered by VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another). VI.–2:211 (Loss upon inducement of breach of obligation) provides for another special rule for legally relevant damage arising from inducing non-performance of a contractual obligation. On the other hand, VI.–2:208 markedly goes beyond the concept of the "right to form and operate a business enterprise" referred to above in so far as the provision also gives effect to the general proposition that a market participant's losses as a result of any unauthorised competitive behaviour of a competitor constitute legally relevant damage.

Groups of cases covered. Cases which may fall under VI.–2:208(1) may, therefore, involve industrial espionage, boycotts and (other) activity in contravention of competition law including the law against cartels or the abuse of dominant positions, and the law against unfair commercial practices such as wrongful advertising. True assertions about a competitor can also fall under VI.–2:208 if they have no intrinsic connection to the substance of the competitor's commercial activity and therefore are only made in order to scare away potential or current customers. Of further note are e.g. product piracy and cases of unlawful warning to a rival or a rival's customers with the false claim that the rival's products infringe an industrial property right of the person giving the warning.

Illustration 1
Company X asserts that the sanitary fittings manufactured by company Y are infringing its three-dimensional trademark and seeks a court order prohibiting Y from marketing the fittings. In the ensuing trademark law dispute, X's trademark is deleted from the trademark registry with retroactive effect for lack of any distinctiveness. The losses that Y suffers as a result of the temporary discontinuation of the marketing of their sanitary fittings represents legally relevant damage, which must be compensated if X acted intentionally or negligently.

Infringement of EU competition law. Under VI.–2:208 legally relevant damage is also constituted by losses that are inflicted upon an undertaking through a competitor's breach of EU competition law. According to the case law of the ECJ, Member States must provide for such a claim for reparation. Even a person who was party to the anti-competitive agreement may invoke the protection of Community Law, unless this would amount to rewarding it for its own unlawful conduct (Courage Ltd. v. Bernard Crehan and Bernard Crehan v. Courage Ltd. and Others, ECJ 20 September 2001, C-453/99, ECR 2001, I-6297). The legal discussion as to whether such a claim for reparation should depend on fault or be independent of fault has just begun (Commission of the European Communities, Green Paper – Damages actions for breach of the EC antitrust rules, COM(2005) 672 final). Under these rules, negligence is required as a minimum according to the general rules (VI.–3:102 (Negligence) in conjunction with VI.–1:101 (Basic rule)).

B. Unlawful impairment of profession or trade

Profession or trade. The cause of the damage is an unlawful impairment of another person's exercise of a profession or conduct of a trade. The formulation "profession or trade" ensures that not only trading companies (regardless of their legal form), but also other working persons, whether they engage in trade or not, fall within the provision's scope of protection.

Illustration 2
A company offers medical services without the necessary governmental licence. It calls its business "Polyklinik" and advertises in a catalogue of an international travel operator with a logo similar to the Red Cross with the slogan "medical aid wherever it is needed, first line of human assistance day and night." The advertisement violates the legislation of all the countries in which the company operates its business. The doctors who work in the vicinity of the "Polyklinik" may seek a court order prohibiting the business and the advertisement. The advertising material must be withdrawn.

Exercise of a profession. The term "exercise" of a profession was chosen in order to make it clear that the provision protects not merely existing professional activities but also a person who has not yet commenced a professional activity but is unlawfully hindered in doing so.

Illustration 3
In applying for a position, a doctor claims credit for a scientific study carried out by someone else, as a result of which a competing applicant loses out. The competitor suffers legally relevant damage. The competitor's non-economic loss is also recoverable.

Impairment. An "impairment" of another's exercise of a profession or conduct of a trade is sufficient because it is the unlawful harming of business which is at stake; its complete destruction or obstruction is not essential.

Illustration 4
The personnel of several tugboats are incited not to tug out of the harbour the claimant's tankership which sails under a flag of convenience. There is an unlawful impairment of the claimant's business..

Unlawful impairment. The interference must be unlawful, i.e. contrary to either statutory provisions or established practice, the latter including rules of correct conduct developed by the courts. "Unlawful" incorporates into the draft the benchmarks of both European Community law and the relevant individual jurisdictions in the Member States. An interference directed at the business or occupational activity of the claimant is required. It must involve an impairment of either the right to access the market or the right to compete on the market under fair conditions for customers. Purely accidental (even if possibly severe) consequences of an act which, according to its nature, is not directed at another's freedom of business is insufficient.

In the so-called "cable cases" (see illustration 4 under VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession)), an unlawful impairment of another's business is absent even where production is at a complete standstill for some time.

Unfair competition to the detriment of competitors included. An unlawful impairment of another's business within the meaning of paragraph (1) is also present in cases of unfair competition to the detriment of a competitor. Account has been taken of the fact that there is at present no common concept in Europe of what is "unfair competition". In addition, some legal systems operate in this area, for want of a special regime, with the general law on non-contractual liability, while others have addressed this field either completely or partially with special statutes. It did not therefore seem appropriate to exclude the law of unfair competition with regard to business to business relations from the Article's scope of application. However, wherever specific rules intend to provide an exclusive regime for the law against unfair competition they have priority of application over VI.–2:208(1). That follows from VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (c).

Unfair competition to the detriment of consumers excluded. Paragraph (2) follows the approach adopted for VI.–2:203 (Infringement of personal dignity, liberty and privacy) paragraph (2). A loss which a consumer suffers due to the unfair competition of a business is only a legally relevant damage according to these rules if Community or national law so provides – in other words, if the consumer (and not merely competing businesses) come within the scope of protection of the law on unfair competition. Consequently, the Article does not address the question whether consumers or consumer associations can assert claims on the basis of a business's unlawful anti-competitive acts. This question remains to be answered by national (substantive or procedural) law.

NOTES

1. The action en concurrence déloyale in FRENCH law is nothing further than a specific case of the application of the general tort law clause in CC arts. 1382 and 1383 (Cass.com. 29 May 1967, Bull.civ. 1967, III, no. 209 p. 200). It provides claims against other commercial competitors who wish to procure unfair advantages on the market. It is irrelevant whether the competitors involved are commerçants; it is only important that both pursue an activité professionnelle (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats 2004/2005, no. 7014) and are in direct competition with one another. Where such a situation de concurrence is lacking, the unfair conduct – as an agissement parasitaire – may still be relevant for tort law. Many seek to furthermore distinguish between concurrence déloyale and concurrence interdite (where the very competitive activity as such is prohibited, not solely the means applied), whereas others, and particularly the majority of jurisprudence, opine that every statutory breach is automatically déloyale (see further le Tourneau loc. cit. no. 7020 or 7012 and Serra, Rép.Dr.Com., v° Concurrence déloyale [1996] no. 41). For the action en concurrence déloyale, proof of a faute, damage, and causation between faute and damage is necessary (Reinhard and Chazal, Droit commercial[6], no. 226 p. 174). A faute commerciale lies in the infringement of statutory requirements and in the breach of trade practices (Ripert/Roblot/Vogel, Traité de droit commercial I(1)[18], no. 729 p. 595); negligence is sufficient. Conceivably little demand is placed on proof of damage (e.g. Cass.com. 9 February 1993, Bull.civ. 1993, IV, no. 53 p. 34); on the other hand, the action en concurrence déloyale is subsidiary to contract law and property law, including intellectual property law (Cass.com. 3 October 1978, Bull.civ. 1978, IV, no. 208 p. 176; le Tourneau, Le parasitisme, no. 250-254 pp. 195-199).
2. BELGIUM had already consolidated the rules on the combatting of "dishonourable trade practices" by the beginning of the 1970's in a specific law - Loi sur les pratiques du commerce (LPC) – which in 1991 was superseded by the Loi sur les pratiques du commerce et sur l´information et la protection du consommateur (LPCC of 14 July 1991). This regulates consumer information, indications of sources, advertisements, methods of sale, and the prohibition of illicit clauses in contracts for the sale of goods and supply of services. Thereupon, LPCC arts. 93-94*bis* bring two general clauses with the prohibition of dishonourable trade practices, through which competitors or consumers are or can be harmed (see further Verougstraete, in: Stuyck and Wytinck (ed.), Nieuwe wet handelspraktijken, 129-147).
3. With Law 3/1991 of 10 January 1991 on Unfair Competition (Ley 3/1991, de 10 de enero, de Competencia Desleal, LCD), Spain also has a specific piece of legislation over this terrain in its arsenal. "Any conduct, which objectively proves to offend against requirements of good faith, is unfair", loc. cit. art. 5. Thereafter, this general clause is concretised by a range of specific regulations. Provisions on denigration (art. 9; on this complex, see the previously cited TS 31 March 1930, RAJ 1930-31 [1] no. 816 p. 303) and inducing breach of contract (art. 14) also fall hereunder. It only respectively depends on the involvement of a market-related act; a relationship of competition between the parties is not necessary (arts. 2 and 3(2)). The claim in damages requires fault (intention or negligence), which is, however, rebuttably presumed where a civil wrong is objectively present (TS 10 July 1985, RAJ 1985 [2] no. 3965 p. 3338; Wirth, Das neue Recht des unlauteren Wettbewerbs in Spanien, 180). The provisions of the Law on Competition (LCD) are in free competition with the provisions of the Law Against Restrictions of Competition (Ley 15/2007 de Defensa de la Competencia, LDC). Both pursue the same aim. Therefore, it is unproblematically accepted that the Law on Competition e.g. in art. 16 (prohibition of discrimination) and art. 17 (selling below cost price) regulates material that is dealt with in other countries by the anticartel aspect of the law rather than the law prohibiting unfair behaviour (Berg, Das neue spanische Gesetz gegen den unlauteren Wettbewerb von 1991, 156).

4. ITALIAN law regulates questions of unfair competition in CC arts. 2598-2601. This is accompanied by the so-called Legge Antitrust of 10 October 1990, no. 287 (Gazz. Uff. 13 October 1990, no. 240) on the protection of competition and the market. CC art. 2598 regulates the requisites of unfair competition, CC arts. 2599-2600 its legal consequences. Compensation for damages requires fault; however negligence is rebuttably presumed (CC art. 2600(3)). The relationship between the claim in damages arising out of CC art. 2600(1) and out of CC art. 2043 (the basic tort law norm) is disputed. Jurisprudence still seems to regard CC art. 2043 as ancillarily applicable (Cass. 11 April 2001, no. 5375, Danno e resp. 2002, 288; Giur.it. 2002, I, 1, 1010: where a relationship of competition was absent, recourse could be had to CC art. 2043), provided of course, that it is an interest protected by the general tort law that is injured (Cass.sez.un. 15 March 1985, no. 2018, Foro it. 1985, I, 1663). In contrast, the voices in commentary that wish to see a special rule displacing tort law in CC art. 2600(1) are multiplying (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve, art. 2043, no. 42). Injury to commerical reputation, often in the form of the unlawful raising of an act of protest (e.g. Cass. 3 April 2001, no. 4881, Giur.it. 2001, 1657), and further the so-called "bullying" of fellow employees (Frati/Montanari Vergalli/Di Luca, Riv.it.med.leg. 2003, 533) are subject to general tort law.

5. In HUNGARY, as long as special laws do not step in, the problem field dealt with by VI.–2:208 likewise belongs within the context of the general tort law clause there. The right to pursue an occupation or trade undisturbed is a personal right; therefore, its unlawful disturbance "undoubtedly" amounts to a wrong. In the case of considerable infringements, a claim to the compensation of non-ecnomic damage also comes into focus (CA Baranya 1. Pf. 20 574/2001/3: economic and non-economic compensation for the scheduled disruption of water supply to a chemist over a period of two months). Incidentally, Competition Act § 2 provides a general clause on the prohibition of unfair competition; it also facilitates the grant of non-economic damages (BH 2004/479). Loc. cit. § 3 not only prohibits the assertion or dissemination of untrue facts, but also true facts presented "in a false light". Numerous further concretions of the general clause ensue, inter alia, rules on the incitement to boycott (§ 5), passing off (§ 6), public tenders (§ 7; cf. BH 2005/364), cartel contracts (§§ 11-17) and breaches of the prohibition of the abuse of a dominant position on the market (§ 21). The consequences of breach of the Law on Competition flowing from the law on damages are normally subject to general tort law; however, in all cases which are not covered by §§ 2-7 of the Law, a breach of competition must have been first established by the Office of Commercial Competition (BH 2004/151). Liability requires a damage caused by the breach of competition law and a failure to prove an exemption (BH 2001/73).

6. According to settled case law in GERMANY, the so-called "right to form and run a business enterprise" (or more simply put: "right to enterprise") counts among the "other rights" within the meaning of CC § 823(1). This construct fills gaps in legal protection, particularly in the area of commercial protection of rights (BGH 21 June 1966, BGHZ 45, 296, 307; BGH 10 December 2002, NJW 2003, 1040, 1041). At the beginning of the development there was the vexatious notice of infringement of trademark law, against which neither the avenues under competition law, nor CC §§ 824 and 826 could offer a sufficient remedy (RG 27 February 1904, RGZ 58, 24, 29: RG 19 December 1918, RGZ 94, 248; see furter RGRK [-Steffen], BGB[12], § 823, no.

36). The vexatious notice of infringement of trademark law has remained a significant field of application to this day (BGH 17 April 1997, NJW-RR 1998, 331, 332; BGH 19 January 1979, NJW 1979, 916; BGH 15 July 2005 [Grand Civil Senate], BGHZ 164, 1). Further case groups have long since taken up their seat at this table: blockading business (BGH 30 May 1972, BGHZ 59, 30, 34; BGH 4 November 1997, BGHZ 137, 89, 97), illegal strike action (BAG 4 May 1955, BAGE 2, 75; BAG 20 December 1963, BAGE 15, 174), incitement to boycott without a competitive aim (BVerfG 26 February 1969, BVerfGE 25, 256, 266), the circulation of true facts damaging to business (e.g. by sending "blacklists" with the names of defaulters [BGH 28 November 1952, BGHZ 8, 142, 145; cf. also CA Rostock 21 March 2001, ZIP 2001, 793], value judgments damaging to business but not necessarily offensive, without a competitive aim (BGH 21 June 1966, BGHZ 45, 296, 310; BGH 9 December 1975, BGHZ 65, 325, 333) and the publication of insufficiently verified product testing (BGH 2 July 1963, NJW 1963, 1871, 1872; BGH 20 March 1986, NJW 1987, 1082, 1083). It is generally the case that such a gap-filling exercise only comes into question when existing statutory law on the fact situation is not already at the ready (RG 21 April 1931, RGZ 132, 311, 316; BGH 16 June 1977, BGHZ 69, 128, 138; BGH 21 June 1977, NJW 1977, 2264, 2265; BGH 23 October 1979, NJW 1980, 881; BGH 10 December 2002, NJW 2003, 1040, 1041). Furthermore, a "business-related" interference is required, hence direct impairment of the business enterprise itself (BGH 15 November 1982, BGHZ 86, 152, 156) or the commercial decision-making freedom of its proprietor (BGH 10 December 2002, NJW 2003, 1040; BGH 18 November 2003, NJW 2004, 356; BGH 11 January 2005, NJW-RR 2005, 673). Mere inconveniences or socially usual hindrances are not sufficient (BGH 21 April 1998, BGHZ 138, 311, 317; BGH 29 January 1985, NJW 1985, 1620). The illegality of the interference is established on the basis of balancing the respective legally protected rights and intersts in each individual case (BGH 21 April 1998, BGHZ 138, 311, 318). Where German and European antitrust law is breached, in addition to CC § 823(1) and (2), Restraints on Competition Act (GWB) § 33(3) itself grants a claim in damages.

7. Under AUSTRIAN Federal Law against Unfair Competition 1984 (UWG) § 7(1) "degrading a business" in competition by means of factual assertions that are not demonstrably true about the undertaking, its propritor's or manager's person and about his goods or services is forbidden. "Degrading" is that which is apt to harm the business' operations or the credit-worthiness of its proprietor. The injured party is entitled to a strict liability claim in damages (OGH 31 August 1983, SZ 56/124), or further, a claim to a prohibitory court order, to a retraction of the statement(s) and to the publication of the retraction; other circumstances only apply to (like under CC § 1330(2) third sentence) confidential communications, in which the communicator had a vested interest. Damages covers lost earnings (§ 16(1)) as well as a reasonable sum of money for the reparation of suffered illnesses or other personal detriment (loc. cit. para. (3)). Alongside this, CC § 1330(2) remains applicable, according to which any person is liable in damages where they disseminate facts, which place the credit-worthiness, the purchase-power or the advancement of another in jeopardy, when he was aware or ought to have been aware of their falsity. In practice the general civil law (disfavourable to the claimant) also plays a role if the statement is not made "for competitive purposes" and therefore gives no room for the application of the law on fair practices (OGH 19 May 1987, RS0031715, 4 Ob 391/86) or if the deadline under which a claim arising from the law on fair practices may lawfully be brought has already expired (loc. cit. § 20(1): six months from knwoledge, three years at the longest). Comparative advertisement is permitted when it is substantively justified

(loc. cit. § 2(2)). The dissemination of true facts can constitute a civil wrong when it is made without sufficient grounds and can only be explained with the intention to offend or harm the persona affected (OGH 26 April 2001, RIS-Justiz, 6 Ob 69/01t; OGH 23 October 1990, RS0031783, 4 Ob 143/90). The spying-out of commercial and trade secrets is prohibited (UWG § 11) and results in liability (§ 13); the same applies for the betrayal of such secrets by employees (§ 12(1)) and the exploitation by the recipient (§ 12(2)). The damages side of violations of the Federal Law against Cartels and other Restrictions of Competition (BGBl 2005 I no. 61/2005) is subject to CC § 1311 (violation of a protective law, see further Stillfried and Stockenhuber, WBl 1995, 301 and OGH 16 December 2002, RS0117115, 16 Ok 10/02). Vexatious notice with reference to alleged patency protection (see illustration 1 above) results in liability, as long as the person whose patency protection was invalidated had culpably misjudged the inventive value lacking in his idea (OGH 21 September 1982, SZ 55/131).

8. The ever-noted "right to enterprise" in Germany is only received by few commentators in GREECE (e.g. Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II[2][3], 28). Predominantly however, this construct is deemed superfluous because interferences with commercial activity in any event fall under CC art. 914 (see further Eleftheriadou, Die Haftung aus Verkehrspflichtverletzung im deutschen und griechischen Deliktsrecht, 125). Thereunder a claim in damages is enjoyed by e.g. a kiosk owner, if a neighbour blocks off the pavement by the erection of a site fence (CA Athens 217/1967, NoB 16 [1968] 859; similarly also CFI Athens 6541/1961, NoB 10 [1962] 920). Incidentally, Law 146/1914 on Unfair Competition has created a specific tort law regime under which, along with competitors, consumer interest groups, though not individual consumers, are also protected (see futher Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], preface 52 to arts. 914-938).

9. PORTUGAL likewise has an extensive specific piece of legislation on the law on the restriction of competition and fair practices (Act no. 18/2003 of 11 June 2003 and DL no. 370/93 of 29 October 1993 as amended). Practical cases relate to e.g. unauthorised legal advice (CA Oporto 16 March 2006; CA Lisbon 14 April 2005); the importation of piratic merchandise (CA Oporto 29 March 2006 and 7 January 2004), software piracy (CA Oporto 16 June 2004) and the unlawful increase of charges by the public telephone service (STJ 7 October 2003). In the general tort law (CC art. 483) it is inferred that an unlawful impairment of business at least in severe cases grounds a claim in damages (Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 93 (1960) 11; Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 83; STJ 19 March 2002, CJ (ST) X (2002-I) 139), particularly where an abuso de direito is concerned (Carneiro da Frada, Uma terceira via, 50). The right "to set up and run a business enterprsie", long-since a part of the furniture in German law (see Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade por conselhos, 206, fn. 102) has not, however, found general recognition in Portugal (dos Santos Silva, ERPL 2006, 836). Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court has stated on one occasion that the Constitution also guarantees the right to form an enterprise and that therefore the direito à empresa is protected as a fundamental right (TC 12 July 1990).

10. The DUTCH law against unfair competition (ongeoorloofde mededinging, previously oneerlijke mededinging) is fundamentally buttressed by the general tort law norm in CC art. 6:162 (specific rules are to be found in CP art. 328*bis* and – for false advertising – in CC arts. 6:194-196). In relation to conduct between competitors, the applicable point of departure is freedom of trade and business (HR 1 November 1991, NedJur 1992, no. 423 p. 1697 and HR 1 November 1991, NedJur 1992, no. 424 p. 1707; Onrechtmatige Daad I [-Jansen], art. 162[2], no. 38 pp. 337-379). Liability therefore requires either the breach of a duty or right. Such duties can also be the result of standardisation by public law organisations (so-called PBO's) for specific occupational sectors (Onrechtmatige Daad IV [-van Nispen], s. 2, no. 22-26, pp. 1-13). In the instance of a breach of statutory duties, the assessment is made whether the claimant falls under the category of persons that the statute seeks to protect; if that is not the case, the test is then whether he can rely on a breach of an "unwritten rule of social interaction" (Onrechtmatige Daad II [-van Maanen], art. 6:163, no. 10 pp. 71-93). In the assessment of the further necessary fault for a claim in damages, a very strict standard has been set in place (CFI `s-Hertogenbosch 15 February 1982, NedJur 1984, no. 603 p. 2096; CA `s-Hertogenbosch 11 November 1986, NedJur 1987, no. 841 p. 2778).

11. ESTONIAN law corresponds to VI.–2:208 on all essential points. According to LOA § 1045(1)(vi) "the causing of damage is unlawful if … the damage is caused by … interference with the economic or professional activities of a person". LOA § 1049 specifies "[i]t is deemed unlawful to cause a complete or partial halt in the economic or professional activities of another person for a significant period if the halt is caused by interfering in the activities by means of an unlawful threat or a prohibited boycott, demonstration or strike, or in another manner aimed specifically at halting the economic or professional activities of the person". It is conceivable that LOA § 1049 is narrower than VI.–2:208 in so far as the former requires a "halt" in the business activities of the person concerned. Unfair competition is prohibited under the Competition Act § 50(2). Where a consumer suffers loss resulting from unfair competition, the consumer may claim compensation under the provisions of the CC. Unlawfulness can be established relying on the violation of the relevant provisions of the Competition Act as violation of duties arising from law within the meaning of LOA § 1045(1)(vii). On competition law in LITHUANIA see Eisfeld, WiRO 2006, 225-230.

12. While SWEDISH Law on Damages chap. 5 § 7 no. 3 indeed expressly states that compensation for "property damage" also embraces compensation for "loss of income or interference with an economic activity", there is still only little illustrative material on the explanation of this provision. Intended first and foremost are obviously the consequential losses of an integral injury (e.g. lost gains after the total write-off of a ship: HD 4 March 1955, NJA 1955, 119), not interferences with commercial activity as such. Furthermore, the provision does not nullify the rules on the restriction of compensation for third-party damages (see the Notes under VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession)): where a machine is damaged, employees who consequently lose the performance-related part of their wages have no claim to compensation. However, a not-so-insignificant role is played by Law on Competition (konkurrenslag [1993:20]) § 33 (which establishes a duty in damages due to particular restrictions of competition), Law on Marketing (marknadsföringslag [1995:450]) § 29 (which foresees a duty to compensate for unfair competitive practices primarily as against the consumer; see further Sandstedt, VersRAI 2007, ??) and Law on the Protection of Commercial Secrets (lag [1990:409] om skydd för företagshemligheter) §§ 5-10 (on this issue, ???see above, Note 10 under VI.–2:205). The FINNISH Law on Improper Conduct in the Economy (Lag om otillbörligt förfarande i näringsverksamhet) of 22 December 1978 no. 1061 operates with a general clause (§ 1 [1]), which in conjunction with Law on Damages chap. 5 § 1 establishes a claim in damages. Loc. cit. § 4 safeguards commercial secrets; loc. cit. §§ 2-3 are directed at individual unfair marketing strategies. Supreme Court 29 September 2005, HD 2005:105 saw a tort to the detriment of a competitor in the vexatious notice to the competitor's buyers of a supposed existing copyright. The Law on Restrictions of Competition (lag om konkurrensbegränsningar) of 27 May 1992 no.

480 and the Law on Consumer Protection (konsumentskyddslag) of 20 January 1978 no. 38 contain likewise no stand-alone rules on damages, but at the same time do not rule out the application of the Law on Damages. DANISH Law on Marketing (Lov om markedsføring of 21 December 2005 no. 1389 §§ 1 and 20(2), through their reference to the "general rules" of Danish law, include a duty of reparation (D-Karnov 2005 IV [-Skovbo], Markedsføringslov, no. 156). Supreme Court 8 August 1994, UfR 1994, 785 denied an interference with another's freedom of commercial activity when that other's trawler could no longer sail after his partner's ship, the only person with whom he could fish, had been damaged.

VI.–2:209: Burdens incurred by the state upon environmental impairment

Burdens incurred by the State or designated competent authorities in restoring substantially impaired natural elements constituting the environment, such as air, water, soil, flora and fauna, are legally relevant damage to the State or the authorities concerned.

COMMENTS

A. Pure ecological damage

Directive 2004/35/EC on environmental liability. VI.–2:209 latches on to the autonomous legislation of some of the Member States, while at the same time inserting two core messages of Directive 2004/35/EC of the Council and the European Parliament of 21 April 2004 on environmental liability with regard to the prevention and remedying of environmental damage (OJ L 143, 30 April 2004, pp. 56-75) into the structure and language of these basic rules: (i) ecological damage is legally relevant damage. It is, however, (ii) not legally relevant damage to the individual in the sense that each citizen can claim reparation for it. Environmental impairments may – depending on the point of view – also infringe individual rights to the environment, but as a matter of the law on reparation they are only recoverable in their capacity as damage to a legally protected interest, to which all citizens are entitled indivisibly. Hence only public authorities can claim compensation for such damage (under the general prerequisites of VI.–1:101 (Basic rule)). This accords with recital no. 14 to that Directive which reads: "This Directive does not apply to cases of personal injury, to damage to private property or to any economic loss and does not affect any right regarding these types of damages." Incorporating this, Directive 2004/35/EC art. 3(3) specifies: "Without prejudice to national legislation, this Directive shall not give private parties a right of compensation as a consequence of environmental damage or of an imminent threat of such damage." Consequently, Directive 2004/35/EC art. 8 only grants a claim for recovery of costs to the "competent authority" and not to private parties. This formulation is also to be found in VI.–2:209. Under Directive 2004/35/EC art. 19, the Member States are obliged to implement the Directive by 30 April 2007.

Public and private law. This Article lies on the border between private and public law. Its characterisation as a creature of public law stems from the element that pure environmental damage becomes legally relevant solely from the perspective of the public – the state or a competent authority (and so therefore only the state can enforce a claim to reparation). On the other hand, the rule also has the exact opposite function in saying that private law subjects do not normally suffer any legally relevant damage from detriment resulting from pure environmental damage (e.g. the loss of quality of life springs to mind, but also, for instance, for hotels or petrol stations, the absence of tourists). This second statement in the Article is certainly one of private law. Ultimately, however, the question of characterisation must remain open here. This is so not only because to date there are no criteria accepted across Europe for the theoretically "correct" demarcation between public and private law, but also because in this instance the question is wholly irrelevant. Rather the critical point is that compensation for the expense of redressing environmental damage follows categories of civil liability and not those of public order. In other words, the Article is formulated as if it related to a normal private law claim under non-contractual liability law. This is shown not just by the prerequisites for a claim, but also by the defences to it (such as e.g. force majeure, see VI.–5:302 (Event beyond control) or Directive 2004/35/EC art. 4) and the applicability of the rules on causation and compensation.

B. Legally relevant damage and accountability

Damage to individuals and damage to the society at large. The object of this Article is, as already mentioned, to assert that so-called "pure ecological damage" constitutes legally relevant damage. This is a damage suffered by the public at large, rather than by particular individuals. However, the Article is not concerned with damage which natural persons or legal persons constituted under private law may suffer as a result of an impairment of the environment. Such forms of damage constitute legally relevant damage if (but only if) the conditions of the preceding Articles of this Chapter are fulfilled. From the individual's point of view it is a matter of indifference whether a personal injury or property damage, for example, has been caused by some run-of-the-mill incident such as a road accident or by an environmental catastrophe. Infringements of property rights and bodily injury invariably remain legally relevant damage to the individual, regardless of how they are caused. Conversely, genuine environmental damage is collective damage; this Article is concerned exclusively with the latter.

Environmental organisations. The Article also makes it clear that the collective damage it covers is not legally relevant damage to the detriment of environmental protection organisations constituted under private law or any other associations. Notwithstanding the fact that they have devoted themselves to environmental protection, no legally protected interest of their own is affected. This does not exclude national arrangements under which authorities at least partially cede the pursuit of environmental interests to such organisations (cf. Directive 2004/35/EC arts. 11(3) and 12(1)). On the other hand this very possibility shows how difficult the demarcation between public law and private law is within this overall matrix.

Relationship to VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions). As regards accountability for damage a special rule has been formulated in VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions). In contrast to VI.–2:209, which only specifies that expenses for the elimination of pure environmental damage are legally relevant damage, VI.–3:206 relates to the attribution as well as the causation of both individual and collective forms of damage within the meaning of VI.–2:209. Naturally, the State can also assert a claim under VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) in conjunction with VI.–3:206 in its capacity as the holder of an individual right (e.g. as the owner of a forest); that it has sustained a legally relevant damage results in such cases from VI.–3:206 in conjunction with VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession) and not from VI.–3:206 in conjunction with VI.–2:209.

VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage). With regard to the issue of attribution (independent of legally relevant damage), reference should also be made to VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage) sub-paragraph (b): as soon as all Member States have implemented Directive 2004/35/EC, attribution will first and foremost follow the national laws implementing the Directive.

C. Other matters

Expenditure incurred by private persons. The Article is silent on the issue of whether a private person (or a legal person constituted under private law, i.e. a NGO) who (or which) has for good reason incurred expenditure in order to eliminate environmental damage, can claim compensation from the person who is responsible for the environmental damage. From the point of view of non-contractual liability law, this question will usually be answered in the negative, whether that be due to the lack of legally relevant damage, or a denial of causation because the affected party deliberately incurred exposure to the risk of loss or injury. The answer is thus to be sought in the law on benevolent intervention. This relates, for example, to the costs of cleaning prompted by environmental damage before the responsible public body or professional services are able to intervene. The advantage of this solution is that the claim to reimbursement of expenditure is linked in this way to the general requirements of the law on benevolent intervention in another's affairs. That in turn means that a right to reimbursement is excluded in respect of rash or unreasonably extensive intervention.

Environmental impairment. Directive 2004/35/EC art. 2(1) defines what is to be understood by the term environmental damage. VI.–2:209 refers to this definition by means of a mere summary of the essential elements of that definition in a language tailored to these rules.

The State or designated competent authorities. The text also draws on the Directive with the formulation that the damage described in VI.–2:209 is legally relevant damage "to the State or designated competent authority". However, it appeared inexact to rely only on the "competent authority", as the Directive does, because mostly it is not the authority, but rather the representative regional administrative body, that will suffer the damage.

Burdens incurred and loss in preventing damage. "Burdens" are expenditure for the redress of environmental damage. Thus, the cost of restorative measures is at issue. On the other hand, expenditure made before the injurious event occurred and frustrated by the injurious event is in principle non-recoverable damage. Examples here would be the high costs of the renaturalisation of a particular species of animal whose population is wiped out once more. Frustrated expenditure may, however, serve as an indicator for the assessment of the amount of restorative costs (in this case: the resettlement of the animals). The costs of preventing further threatening environmental damage are subject to the general rule in VI.–6:302 (Liability for loss in preventing damage).

NOTES

I. Implementation of the Directive

1. To date (as of August 2008), Directive 2004/35/EC has been implemented in the following Member States: FRANCE (Law no. 2008-757 of the 1st August 2008, relative à la responsabilité environnementale et à diverses dispositions d'adaptation au droit communautaire dans le domain de l'environnnement), this law will be incorporated in Code de l'environnement (Environmental Code); SPAIN (Environmental Liability Act 2007 [Ley 26/2007, of 23 October 2007, de responsabilidad medioambiental, BOE no. 255 of 24 October 2007]); ITALY (Decreto Legislativo 3 April 2006, no. 152 [Suppl. ord. no. 96 to Gazz. Uff. of 14 April, no. 88] - Norme in materia ambientale, in particular arts. 300, 306 and 318); POLAND (Ustawa z dnia 13 kwietnia 2007 r. o zapobieganiu szkodom w środowisku i ich naprawie [Dz. U. 2007, no. 75, poz. 493, in particular art. 23, which contains the basis of the state authority's cause of action]); GERMANY (Gesetz über die Vermeidung und Sanierung von Umweltschäden [Umweltschutzgesetz] of 10 May 2007 [BGBl 2007 I 666]); SWEDEN (lag (2007:660) om ändring av miljöbalken, 20 June 2007); BELGIUM (arrêté royal of 3 August 2007 concernant la prévention et la réparation des dommages environnementaux lors de la mise sur le marché

2. Preliminary governmental drafts are also existent in DENMARK (2006-07 - L 175 [forslag til lov om ændring af miljøbeskyttelsesloven og forskellige andre love og] and 2006-07 - L 176 [forslag til lov om undersøgelse, forebyggelse og afhjælpning af miljø-skader (miljøskadeloven)]) and FINLAND (Regeringens proposition om verkställighet av Europaparlamentets och rådets direktiv 2004/35/EG om miljöansvar för att förebygga och avhjälpa miljöskador). Furthermore, a draft law is extant for LUXEMBOURG. For commentary on the Directive, see incidentally, inter alia, Garcia-Bragado Manen, [2006] 13 ILT, 220-224; Hager and Leonhard, FS Stoll, 167-184; Hager, ZEuP 2006, 21-44; Wagner, VersR 2005, 177-189.

II. Collective damage relevant to the environment in other national law

3. Since in the case of environmental impairment - which affects the general public – an individual often lacks an intérêt personnel pour agir, FRENCH Code de l´Environnement arts. L 142-1 and L 142-2 provide accredited environmental organisations with the right to lead certain proceedings in administrative courts or tribunals. Where the requisities of an offence under environmental criminal law are fulfilled, these organisations are also hereunder equipped with the right to appear as a civil law joint claimant in the criminal law proceedings and claim damages in their own name (which must be then invested to further the registered aims of the organisation, i.e. the protection of the environment). The Code de l´Environnement provides further specific rules for individual forms of environmental impairment, e.g. in arts. L 571-1 to L 571-26, which give the "competent authorities", inter alia, the right to take measures against unlawful noise pollution. In relation to BELGIUM, it is bemoaned that a clear definition of the term "ecologische schade" is still lacking (Deloddere, NjW 2004, 38). An attempt is made to distinguish between damage to things serving the public interest, and yet ownerless, and then on the other hand things that lie within the realm of private property. Damage solely to the first group of things constitutes ecological damage (Deloddere loc. cit. no. 4). Damage resulting from environmental impairment to things under private ownership are subject to the general rules of private law, and is thus recoverable particularly in the case of a faute of the respondent (e.g. CA Antwerpen 2 December 2002, NjW 2004, 56: the liability in damages of the constructor of a sewer for damage flowing from the subsidence of the ground water level on his neighbour's land). There are specific statutory regulations – often susceptible to swift change - for many forms of environmental pollution. Décret relatif au Livre II du Code de l'Environnement constituant le Code de l'Eau (of 27 May 2004, JO 23 September 2004) art. 410 provides that the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions makes an application against the polluter for a judgment for the repair of the harmed natural resource.

4. SPANISH Const. art. 45 expressly authorises public authorities to make a claim against polluters of the environment for damages or reparation of the costs of preventative measures taken (see further Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 314). The duty to pay damages for ecological collective damage has been formulated in a more detailed format by a multitude of individual statutory regulations; an all-encompassing regulation at the level of a general standard law is not in existence to date. Counted among these specific regulations are praticularly Law on Water (Real Decreto Legislativo 1/2001 of 20 July, por el que se aprueba el texto refundido de la Ley de Aguas) art. 118; Law on Coastal Areas (Ley 22/1988, of 28 July, de Costas) arts. 95(1) and 100; Law on integrated prevention and inspection of contaminations (Ley 16/2002, of 1 July, de prevención y control integrados de la contaminación) art. 36; Nature Reserve and Flora and Fauna Act (Ley 42/2007, del Patrimonio Natural y Biodiversidad, of 13 December 2007) art. 37; Law on Waste (Ley 10/1998, of 21 April, de Residuos) art. 36; and Law on genetically modified organisms (Ley 9/2003, of 25 April, por la que se establece el régimen jurídico de la utilización confinada, liberación voluntaria y comercialización de organismos modificados genéticamente) art. 38. Conversely, damage to the individual is further subject to the general rules of civil liability (CC arts. 1902 and 1908).

5. ITALIAN Law of 8 July 1986, no. 349, on the establishment of a Ministry for the Environment and regulations on envoronmental damage (Istutuzione del Ministero dell'ambiente e norme in materia di danno ambientale) art. 18 attaches an obligation to "any intentional or negligent act in contravention of a law or of regulations enacted on the basis of a law, which endangers the environment in its infliction of damage thereto, its alteration, impairment or its partial or complete destruction thereof… obliging the originator of the act to pay damages to the State". Fault-based liability is in issue here; an amelioration of the State's burden of proof is not provided for (Comai, in: Ponsanelli [ed.], La responsabilità civile, 101-102). It is also necessary to prove the breach of a statutory provision or of a regulation enacted on the basis of a statutory provision (Cass. 3 February 1998, no. 1087, Foro it. 1998, I, 1142). This follows the model of the basic tort law norm in CC art. 2043. Law 349/86 art. 18(6) provides the judge with the authority to evaluate in relation to the amount of damages where precise indications are not possible. Some even see a form of compensation of non-economic losses here (Castronovo, La nuova responsabilità civile[2], 741). In any event an impairment of the environment as such is what is involved (Comai loc. cit. 95), not the sum of the damage to its component parts (Cass. 1 September 1995, no. 9211, Giur.it. 1996, I, 1, 950). The action is to be brought before a (civil) court of law (Cass.sez.un. 25 January 1989, no. 440, Foro it. 1990, I, 232); the Italian State and the relevant regional statutory corporations constitute the actively legitimate claimants. The judge can decree that the State itself, but at the cost of the injurer, may arrange for the reconstruction of the former state of affairs (loc. cit. art. 18(8)). An element for consideration is the fact that under loc. cit. art. 18, a proprietor who himself harms his own immoveable property can also become liable as against the State (Castronovo loc. cit. 750, 756). In relation to the general bases of liability for collective environmental detriment, the courts also often refer to the Constitution (Const. arts. 2, 3, 9, 41, 42) and use it to substantiate the existence of a danno ingiusto to a non-economic interest vested in the public (e.g. Cass. 19 June 1996, no. 5650, Foro it. 1996, I, 3062). Cass. 1 September 1995, no. 9211, Giur.it. 1996, I, 1, 950 accordingly emphasised that Law 349/86 art. 18 only applies to environmental damage as such; damage to individual legally protected interests remains in the realm of the ordinary civil liability in CC art. 2043.

6. HUNGARY also fuses the general rules of tort law (particularly CC § 345(1): strict liability of undertakings endangering the environment for damage to the individual) with its rules on liability for purely ecological damage. Law no. LIII of 1995 on the general rules of environmental protection (as amended) § 103(1) verweist auf CC

§§ 345 and 346 (strikte Haftung für umweltgefährdende Tätigkeit). Loc. cit. § 4 defines the following as elements of the environment: earth, air, water, the biosphere as well the man-made environment and its respective components; these "elements of the environment" and their systems, processes and structures constitute 'the environment'. Loc. cit. § 103(2) further provides that in all cases in which the injured party would not wish to enforce his claim against the originator of the damage, the Minister for the Environment - on the basis of the injured party's corresponding declaration - can pursue the claim for the benefit of the State treasury under the chapter "Restricted Allocation of Environmental Protection Funds". According to § 109(2), in relation to the (not necessarily criminally punishable) endangerment of the environment, the state attorney is also justified in bringing an action in damages. Law no. LIII of 1996 on the preservation of nature § 3(2) refers to the provisions listed in Law no. LIII of 1995 on the general rules on environmental protection, but also additionally contains its own regulation in § 60(2) on the role of the state attorney in the enforcement of compensation claims and a definition of damage in § 81(2). Also falling due for recovery are, inter alia, the non-economic damages following from the harm to the natural environment and its natural features and the non-economic damages due to the deterioration of the living conditions of society, its groupings or its individual members. The claim in non-economic collective damages due to the deterioration of the living conditions of society, its groupings or its individual members is enforced by the state attorney's office (§§ 81(4) and 60(2)) in favour of the state environmental protection fund mentioned.

7. Under the autonomous GERMAN civil law, the duty of the injuring party to compensate depends on the infringement of the individual right or legally protected interest of another party. The Law on environmental protection § 1 makes no exception to this; it requires personal or property damage. The protection of collective interests in the environment is simply a side-effect of this rule of liability. It materialises through the duty to remove such ecological damage that is directly linked with the damaged property (CC § 251[1]; Staudinger [-Hager], BGB[13], § 823, no. B 186). The occasionally raised claim, to recognise a (supplemental) "right in the environment" in the context of CC § 823(1) has not gained currency. However, in connection with the duty to compensate for damage to the individual, Law on liability for harming the environment § 16 states that where nature or the countryside is impaired through the harming of a thing, expenses for the restoration of the previous state of affairs is not to be seen as disproportionate within the meaning of CC § 251(2) solely on the basis of the fact that the cost of such restoration exceeds the value of the thing. Additionally, a similar rule is to be found in Law on genetic engineering § 32(7).

8. AUSTRIA has already attempted in 1994 to enact an exhaustive Law on liability for impairment of the environment, though this plan was foiled at that time. The applicable law leaves the matter predominantly to the federal criminal (CP §§ 169 et seq.) and state-level Law on the protection of nature. Thus, for instance, Viennese Law on the protection of nature § 17, along with its express prohibitions on impairing the environment, provides for a duty to make good the environmental damage caused. The other federal states also have similar rules at their disposal. Federal law is acquainted with similar provisions only in the form of specific regulations on the protection of individual environmental resources (Law on the water and waterways; Law on raw mineral materials). Private law provides a general action for defending against emissions (CC §§ 364[2], 364a), in which some commentators are inclined to see a basis (albeit flawed) for "private claims resulting from environmental impairment" (Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Eccher], ABGB, § 364, no. 1). The currently discussed draft of a new Law on damages in Austria only provides for civil claims for compensation in the case of damage inflicted on the individual (§§ 1334 et seq.). Claims of the State or of the competent regional corporation for the compensation of purely ecological damage remain factored out; anticipating the implementation of the Directive was not desirable (Hinteregger, in: Griss/Kathrein/Koziol [ed.], Entwurf eines neuen österreichischen Schadenersatzrechts, 122). Moreover, such claims are referred to public law (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB[3], Pref. to §§ 1293 et seq., no. 42).

9. In GREECE a distinction is drawn between so-called "liability for environmental impairment" and civil liability for causing damage to the environment (Tzimapiti, Prolipsi kai apokatastasi tis perivallontikis simias, http://www.nomosphysis.org). The general "liability for environmental impairment" relates to matters in the (not yet implemented) Directive, viz. pure ecological damage. In the case of civil liability for causing damage to the environment, damage to an individual's health, property and other interests resulting from harming the environment are in issue. Where such damage to the individual is compensated in accordance with either CC art. 914 or Law 1629/1986 on the protection of the environment art. 29 ("Any natural or legal person who occasions pollution or other impairment to the environment is liable for damages, unless this person can prove that the damage is attributable to a vis major or is the result of the culpable conduct of a third party acting intentionally") (on this point, see further Karakostas, Perivallon kai Astiko Dikaio, 104), the restoration of "the environment" is thus solely an indirect consequence of civil liability. In contrast, liability as against the State for pure ecological damage is hitherto not yet in existence. However, doctrine and jurisprudence proceed on the basis that contaminating things dedicated to general use (like, for example, the beach) also injure the individual citizen in his or her personality, if he or she is affected in the right to use this thing. Along with claims to reparation of patrimonial damage, in such cases a claim for the compensation of non-economic loss also comes into focus (Karakostas, Perivallon kai Astiko Dikaio, 71). In relation to liability for environmental impairment, it is to be noted that the Directive has not yet been implemented.

10. PORTUGUESE Basic Environment Act (Lei de Bases do Ambiente, Act no. 11/87 of 7 April 1987*)* art. 40(4) provides all "citizens who are indirectly threatened or injured in their right to a healthy and ecologically balanced social living environment" with the right "under general laws" to seek a prohibitory order or to claim damages. For "particularly dangerous activities" occasioning considerable damage to the environment, art. 41 provides for strict liability in damages. Art. 48 clarifies that the impairment of the environment is to be put to an end and the previous state of affairs is to be restored, as far as possible. On the other hand, Water Quality Act (Lei da qualidade da água, DL no. 236/98 of 1 August 1998) art. 73 provides that any person who intentionally or negligently harms the environment by impairing the quality of the water is laible to "the State" in damages. This latter claim in damages in favour of the State (see STJ 14 January 1999, cited in Cunhal Sendim, Responsabilidade civil por danos ecológicos, 12) is deemed an exception today. This is because in principle every citizen is seen as being justified in claiming compensation as much for the environmental damage inflicted individually on him as well as collectively, the latter in the form of an actio popularis (acção popular, see Const. art. 52(3), Popular Action Decree Law art. 12 and Basic Environment Act art. 41(6)). The right to bring such an actio popularis claim is also enjoyed by environmental protection agencies. The Portuguese system, it is stated, is thus based on a vision of "environmental democracy". It is not believed that "the environment is a public good and the damage to the environment is a damage to the State-community". The infringement of rights of the State are not involved here, but the infringement of private rights in the environment (Cunhal Sendim loc. cit. 55; Sousa Antunes, FS Almeida Costa, 643, 659). In practical terms, this means that in an action for damages, private law entities (including environmental protection organisations) may not only plead their own personal (economic and non-economic) losses, but also additionally and in the same proceedings, damages in favour of the local authority and the State (CA Guimarães 17 November 2004 [re: a claim of land owners]). To date there is of course a general dearth in jurisprudence on these issues.

11. Under DUTCH law, along with the legal remedy in CC art. 3:299 (prohibitory order), the State is also equipped with the claim to damages resulting from a civil wrong (CC art. 6:162). While admittedly CC art. 3:303 indeed requires a "sufficient interest" in order to be enforceable before the court, this does not mean, however, that the State would have to pursue its own private law interest; a relevant interest in the environment is sufficient (T&C Vermogensrecht[3] [-Stolker], art. 3:303 no. 1 p. 1368). Redress for costs within the parameters of the law on liability for environmental impairment on the basis of CC art. 6:162 only comes into the picture where the polluter of the environment had to have reckoned on the State taking care of the restoration (HR 9 Februar 1990, NedJur 1991 no. 462 pp. 1973-1990). Furthermore, the courts assess whether the State is overstepping an existing rule of public law in an unacceptable manner when it avails itself of private law remedies. This is the doctrine of onaanvaardbare doorkuising. Private law may only be drawn on by the State when public law leaves the State no reasonable opportunity to pursue its interests (HR 26 January 1990, NedJur 1991 no. 393 p. 1657). Environmental protection organisations shall also be entitled to damages within the framework of their registered aims (CFI Rotterdam 15 March 1991, NedJur 1992 no. 91 p. 304: damages in favour of an asscoaition for the protection of birds following oil pollution). The extent of the damages is assessed on the basis of CC arts. 6:95-110 and 6:184 (in relation to preventative measures). In the event that it is no longer possible to restore the situation that existed before the environmental damage, varying methods of calculating the level of damages are weighed up (see further Kottenhagen-Edzes, Onrechtmatige daad en milieu, 79). Jurisprudence on this matter seems to still be absent, however.

12. Under ESTONIAN LOA § 133(1), where damage is caused by environmentally hazardous activities, reparation related to the deterioration in environmental quality also falls due. Expenses relating to preventing an increase in the damage and to applying reasonable measures for mitigating the consequences of the damage, and the damage arising from the application of such measures are also subject to compensation. FINNISH Law on compensation for impairing the environment (lag om ersättning för miljöskador of 19 August 1994, no. 737) § 6(1)(ii) entitles public authorities to compensation for the cost of reasonable and proportionate measures that they have put in place in order to avert imminent environmental damage or to restore the impaired environment to its previous state. Comparable provisions are to be found for the protection of inland water and waterways in the Law on environmental protection (miljöskyddslag of 4 Februar 2000, no. 86) §§ 66 and 67. Where the party liable to compensate is not in a financial position to do so or the originator of the environmental damage can not be established, insurance against environmental damage steps in (Law on insurance against environmental damage [lag om miljöskadeförsäkring of 30 January 1998, no. 81] § 1(1)(i-ii)); pollution of the environment by oil is subject to a specific regime to this extent (Law on funds for oil damage [lagen om oljeskyddsfonden of 30 January 2004, no. 1406]). While SWEDEN does not boast a clear cause of action in favour of the State for the compensation of pure ecological damage, it arrives at essentially the same destination after taking a detour through the (public law) rule on recovery of costs in the Environemental Code (miljöbalk [1998:808]) chap. 26 §§ 17(1) and 18(1) in conjunction with § 9(1) and chap. 10. Loc. cit. chap. 10 contains rules on (in addition to chap. 2 § 8) key issues of responsibility under environmental law and of private law liability in damages. So-called "costs of after-treatment" are also within its scope. Regarding the claims of the State, in the recorded reasons (Prop 1997/98:45 p. 757) for placing the rule on damages in chap. 10 § 3, the observation is to be found that it was about "regulating" the responsibility of the land owner as against the "general public". Chap. 26 ("Surveillance") §§ 17-18 refer accordingly, inter alia, to chap. 26 §§ 9-13. Chap. 26 § 9(1) in turn empowers the competent public authority to pass ordinances and prohibitions in order to achieve the aim of the Law. Remedial measures at the expense of the responsible party under civil law rules are also counted hereunder (cf. Prop 1997/98:45 p. 909). Where the said party is not in an economic position to fulfill this obligation or where he can not be identified, insurance steps in (chap. 33 §§ 1 and 3).

13. On the duty to compensate for damage to the individual, see the Notes under VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions).

VI.–2:210: Loss upon fraudulent misrepresentation

(1) Without prejudice to the other provisions of this Section loss caused to a person as a result of another's fraudulent misrepresentation, whether by words or conduct, is legally relevant damage.

(2) A misrepresentation is fraudulent if it is made with knowledge or belief that the representation is false and it is intended to induce the recipient to make a mistake.

COMMENTS

A. The legally relevant damage

General. This Article contains the proposition – essentially self-evident for all non-contractual liability law systems – that losses as a result of fraudulent misrepresentation are legally relevant damage. In practice, however, claims for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation ('actio de dolo') do not arise very often in most jurisdictions. This is because fraudsters are in many cases economically incapable of fulfilling their obligation to compensate and personal liability insurance does not provide cover in cases of intentionally committed wrongs.

Relationship to VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another). The present Article operates "without prejudice to the other provisions of this Section", thus leaving especially VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another) and VI.–2:207 (Loss upon reliance on incorrect advice or information) unaffected. VI.–2:204 addresses losses resulting from the communication of false information about the injured person to third parties. Overlap with the present Article is less likely here. However, both Articles may apply in one and the same case for the benefit of different injured parties.

> Illustration 1
> In order to prevent a competitor B from "remaining in business" with a mutual customer C, A tells B that C is embroiled in a bribery scandal. B consequently refrains from concluding a contract with C, as originally planned. The losses B suffers are legally relevant damage within the meaning of the present Article, while C suffers legally relevant damage within the meaning of VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another).

VI.–2:207 (Loss upon reliance on incorrect advice or information). The present Article differs from VI.–2:207 (Loss upon reliance on incorrect advice or information) essentially on the point that the present Article relates to losses caused by misinformation outside professional or trade activity. In private life, false advice and misinformation remain in principle without consequence in the law of liability. It is only actual deception which gives rise to liability. The latter also naturally applies to working life. As a result, it can arise that one and the same loss constitutes legally relevant damage within the meaning of these two Articles. Of course, as always in such cases, this does not alter the fact that the injured person can only have the damage satisfied once.

Loss. The legally relevant damage within the meaning of this Article will often take the form of so-called "pure economic loss", i.e. loss which is independent of injury to the person or damage to property and which is equally independent of an infringement of some other right.

Pure economic loss in this sense is suffered by any person who is induced by a fraudulent misrepresentation to enter into a disadvantageous contract. The fact that rules on the compensatory consequences of such deceit are to be found in ???* DCFR II.–7:214 (Damages for loss) does not conflict with a concurrent application of non-contractual liability law: the fraudster has no claim to protection by insistence on a rule of contract law which is potentially more favourable: see VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (c).

Non-economic losses. The Article is not, however, restricted to specific forms of loss; consequently, non-economic loss in particular constitutes legally relevant damage within the meaning of this provision. That relates not only to cases of deception, causing suffering on the part of the victim, but to all intentional infliction of detriment through fraudulent misinformation for the purpose of inducing a mistake on the part of the affected party.

> X, having a peculiar sense of "humour", knocks on his neighbour N's door and informs her that her husband has had a severe accident and is in the intensive care unit of the hospital. N makes her way to the hospital with great anxiety, where she is told that her husband is not there. Nothing at all had happened to her husband; X has taken the liberty, as he says, of making a "joke". N has suffered not only economic loss due to the travel expenses, but also primarily recoverable non-economic loss arising out of her anxiety, and this is so even where the requisites of VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss) paragraph (2)(b) are not fulfilled (i.e. she has not suffered a mental condition requiring medical treatment).

Damage and accountability. The Article produces an appreciable proximity between legally relevant damage and the basis for accountability. This lies in the nature of the beast and is therefore unavoidable. However, one must still distinguish between these two aspects. This is evident in all cases in which a claim is brought against an employer on the ground that an employee has fraudulently deceived the injured person (see VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives)). The distinction between legally relevant damage and the basis of accountability of course also remains important where the person causing the damage and the person sued are the same person. This is because the person causing the deception need not have acted with intention as regards causing the loss of the deceived party. While under the conditions of this Article this may indeed very rarely not be the case, deviating case structures are certainly conceivable.

> Illustration 3
> A bank (B) makes a credit guarantee to one of its customers (X) dependant on proof that goods sold have also actually been delivered to X's buyers. Upon X's request, one of his buyers, Y, accordingly signs a receipt, although Y knows that the goods have not yet been delivered. Y merely wishes to speed up the process of B's obtaining credit, having no cause to suppose that X could be in financial difficulty, nor thus that it was not an everyday transaction with B which was at stake. B's claim against X for the repayment of the loan proves worthless. Y has caused B's loss negligently, even though Y fraudulently deceived B and thereby caused B's loss. Causing the loss negligently suffices for liability (VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) in conjunction with VI.–3:102 (Negligence)).

B. Fraudulent misrepresentation

Misrepresentation. The Article relates to causing loss through misrepresentation. The formulation takes its cue from ???* DCFR II.–7:205 (Fraud) which, however, speaks of fraudulent 'representation'. Both texts consciously avoid technical concepts of particular national legal systems, especially those of criminal law (e.g. Betrug or 'obtaining something by deception'). The misrepresentation, moreover, can take place in any conceivable manner, thus "by words or conduct". As regards the latter aspect, a fraudulent misrepresentation through omission is conceivable where a duty to provide information exists.

> Illustration 4
> A does not inform B before they enter into marriage that he is impotent. B is entitled to claim against B for reparation of non-economic loss suffered. The family law repercussions (divorce, post-marital maintenance) do not conflict with the award of reparation.

'Fraudulent' misrepresentation. According to VI.–2:210(2) a misrepresentation is "fraudulent" under two (cumulative) conditions: (i) it must be made with knowledge or belief that the representation is false, and (ii) it must be intended to induce the recipient to make a mistake. With the formulation "made with belief that the representation is false" those cases are addressed in which the person making the representation was not sure that the information was false but made it in the hope and assumption that it was false. If the information was in actual fact true, what we have is merely an attempt, irrelevant for private law; there is then no 'misrepresentation' within the meaning of section (1).

Intention to induce the recipient to make a mistake. The second element of a fraudulent misrepresentation lies in the intention to induce the recipient to make a mistake; furthermore, the latter must actually make a mistake, since otherwise the misrepresentation cannot have been causative of the loss. The term "intention", so far as it relates to the causation of the loss, is defined in VI.–3:101 (Intention). In VI.–2:210(2) it is the intention to induce a mistake which is in issue. It is not every ill-considered statement capable of inducing error which justifies liability. What is required in this context is rather that the deceiver's mind is directed towards the causation of the victim's error. The aim of the misrepresentation must be to induce an error; it is not sufficient that the person making the misrepresentation merely willingly reckons with an error on the part of the deceived person.

> Illustration 5
> B, a board member of a company intentionally falsely informs a broker that after exploratory drilling the company has not found any oil reserves. In doing so B wanted to protect the interests of the company. He was not, however, concerned with inducing the shareholders to infer that their shares were likely to become worthless and therefore should be sold as soon as possible. B did not fraudulently deceive the shareholders.

NOTES

1. Under FRENCH and BELGIAN law any person who knowingly deceives another is liable under tort law (Cass.civ. 28 June 1995, D. 1996 jur. 180, note Mouralis). However, a tortiously relevant faute may also be committed by someone who negligently and unintentionally misleads another (Cass.civ. 19 October 1994, Bull.civ.

1994, II, no. 200 p. 115; Arbitragehof Gent 27 December 1999, RW 2000-01, 168). Falling under this category is also the French jurisprudence, according to which a bank that opens an account for a new customer without carrying out sufficient checks can be made liable for damage as against a third party for the damage the latter incurs due to the new customer's fraudulent use of the account, e.g. by writing out cheques which cannot be honoured (see further JClCiv [-Grua], art. 1382 à 1386, fasc. 335-10 [2001], nos. 80-85).

2. While SPANISH CP art. 248 defines criminal fraud (special forms thereof are to be found in CP art. 251; including the disposal of a thing while concealing rights of third parties therein), CC art. 1269 defines the civil law equivalent: deceit. This is present "where the deceitful words or underhanded dealings of one of the contractual partners leads his or her counterpart to conclude a contract which he or she would otherwise have not concluded". Fraudulent intent (the mala fides, intentional malice, the dolo civil) is nowhere presumed; even in a purely tort law context (CC art. 1902), it must be always fully proven (TS 21 May 1982, RAJ 1982 [1] no. 2586 p. 1775). The dolo civil consists of malice and outward conduct. The latter objective element is a question of fact, with its subjective counterpart being a question of law. Dolo, as is stated, is frequently accompanied "by artfulness and dishonest scheming" (TS 28 February 1969, RAJ 1969 [1] no. 1034 p. 759); furtiveness, mala fide concealment and exploiting another's naivety are other indicators of the existence of dolo (TS 15 June 1995, RAJ 1995 [3] no. 5296 p. 7097). There is an ambiguous line of demarcation between civil law deceit and criminal fraud (Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 40). When utilised by the wrongdoer in misleading the victim, the following are deemed in jurisprudence as the cornerstones of criminal fraud: deceptiveness, falsehood, trickery, craftiness, swindle and mendacity (TS 5 October 1988, RAJ 1988 [5] no. 7669 p. 7526). On the question of when a breach of contract fulfils the requisites for fraud, see TS 16 June 1992, RAJ 1992 (3) no. 5397 p. 7070.

3. Under ITALIAN Law fraud per se constitutes a wrong (Alpa, Trattato di diritto civile IV, 235; Bianca, Diritto civile V, 574-575). In some other cases the dolo is a necessary prerequisite for the presence of a wrong in the sense of (civil) tort law. Vexatious actions (CCP art. 96(1)) and "enticement through the promise of marriage", which falls under CC art. 2043 provide examples of such (Cass. 8 July 1993, no. 7493, Giust.civ.Mass. 1993, 1135) (further cases in which intention is a requisite of liability are cited in Visintini, Fatti illeciti II^2, 382). Dolo in the sense of fraud is often deemed a necessary prerequisite for the affirmation of a delictual wrong within the arena of contractual negotiations (Alpa loc. cit. 236-239). Cass. 9 February 1980, no. 921, Giust.civ.Mass. 1980, fasc. 2 passed judgment against an Italian vendor for full damages in tort (reparation of depreciation and lost profit), who tricked the buyer into thinking that the sale price of the real property was below the market value and that there were high returns in the form of rent. Cass. 18 December 1987, no. 9407, Giur.it. 1989, I, 1, 537 awarded damages against a third party who had strung along the bailee in mala fides in relation to his (the third party's) debts as against the bailor and in relation to the bailor's things, which were in the possession of the third party.

4. In HUNGARIAN Law fraudulent misrepresentations likewise fall under the general tort law norm (CC § 339(1)). Where the injuring party acts with malicious intent, within the meaning of this provision, he or she also always acts "objectionably". It also includes claims to compensation of pure economic losses (as long as they, as with all other economic losses, are sufficient for the definition of damage in CC § 355(4)). The general provision of CC § 6, which relates to so-called "damages resulting from incitement or fomentation" also comes to the table of tort liability here. Hereunder, the court can impose the payment of full or partial compensation on persons whose intentional conduct induces with cogent reason a bona fide person to engage in behaviour causing damage to him- or herself through no fault of his or her own. However, CC § 6 is not a tort law norm due to the fact that the provision (i) does not consider the conduct an unlawful act and (ii) the grant of damages lies with the discretion of the court (Gellért [-Vékás], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 56-63; Bíró and Lenkovics, Magyar Polgári Jog, 194-199); where the "incitement" occurred with intention to harm, this is not a case for CC § 6, rather a tort under CC § 339 (Vékás loc. cit. 56, 58, 60-61; Légrádi, Polgári Jogi Kodifikáció 2003-4, 20-27). Incidentally, fraudulent misrepresentation of course constitutes a ground of contractual avoidance (CC § 210(1) and (4)) and – as fraud – a criminal act (CP § 318(1)). Criminal conviction for fraud at the same time provides evidence of the existence of a deceit in civil proceedings (BH 1996/200; BH 1996/253).

5. CZECH and SLOVAK Law handle cases of harm through fraudulent misrepresentation in CC § 424, whereunder "a person who caused damage by intentional conduct offending good morals shall be liable for such". ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(1)(viii) and LATVIAN CC art. 1641 (which states that "every intentional harm shall be understood as wrongful intent") deal with these matters in the same way.

6. Under GERMAN law liability for causing so-called pure economic losses through criminal fraud (CP § 263) results from CC § 823(2) (e.g. BGH 14 October 1971, BGHZ 57, 137: deceit in the purchase of a used car; BGH 5 March 2002, NJW 2002, 1643: incorrect details in a contract of sale for a freehold apartment; BGH 17 September 2001, NJW 2001, 3622: subsidy fraud). Moreover, liability under CC § 826 for intentionally and immorally inflicted damage is incurred by any person who knowingly deceives another e.g. in order to conclude a contract with the latter (in such cases the corresponding right to avoidance flows from § 123). This applies particularly to untrue information on subject matter essential to the contract. Even concealing such details (e.g. about personal insolvency) can constitute fraudulent misrepresentation (for more detail, see e.g. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[65], § 826, no. 20). It is widely believed that where one contracting partner fraudulently wards off his counterpart from the necessary form of a juridical act, in order to be able to rely later on formal defects, the deceived person shall at the same time have a claim to fulfillment of the contract, and not arising out of the contract, but out of tort law (CC § 826; Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[65], § 125, no. 22).

7. AUSTRIA has rules on fraudulent misrepresentation at its disposal in contract law, as well as in tort law. The deceived party can avoid his or her statement of intent to contract (CC § 870) and also claim damages for pure economic losses (CC § 874). Criminal fraud is not required. Any unlawful, intentional misrepresentation suffices for the existence of "deceitfulness" ("List") within the meaning of CC § 870; the intention must not also extend to the occurrence of damage (Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Bollenberger], ABGB, § 870, no. 1). Incidentally, even dolus eventualis is sufficient. Fraudulent misrepresentation can also be committed through the concealment of facts that are obliged to be disclosed (Bollenberger loc. cit. no. 1). Information, advice or a recommendation known to be false likewise results in liability in tort because such acts are immoral within the meaning of CC § 1295(2). Hereunder, however, the intention must also cover the infliction of damage.

8. In all cases in which criminal fraud is present, under GREEK CC art. 914 civil liability also ensues (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 914, no. 53). Fraudulent misrepresentation furthermore grounds liability under CC art. 919 because it has the immoral and intentional infliction of harm at its core (Eleftheriadou, Die Haftung aus Verkehrspflichtverletzung im deutschen und griechischen Deliktsrecht, 65). Examples are provided by intentionally giving false advice out of self interest (CA Athens 4172/1982, NoB 31 [1983] 822; Georgiades loc. cit. art. 919, no. 5) and the conclusion of a contract as a result of a fraudulent misrepresentation (Georgiades loc. cit. art. 919, no. 25). Further, CC art. 919 imposes liability in damages on any person who fraudulently induces the formal invalidity of a juridical act and then relies on this invalidity (CA Athens 414/1972, Arm 26 [1972] 519; CA Crete 138/1965, EEN 33 [1966] 366).

9. Contrary to the opinions of Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 85 (1959) 243 and 335-342, the PORTUGUESE Civil Code did not formulate the actio de dolo in a separate provision (v. Bar, The Common European Law of Torts I, 52). Recourse may only be had to CC art. 334 ("abuso de direito") in few exceptional situations; according to the prevailing opinion, the provision does not even constitute a protectionary law within the meaning of CC art. 483 (dos Santos Silva, ERPL 2006, 834; CA Coimbra 14 December 1993, CJ XVIII [1993-5] 48). Therefore, in the context of tort liability for fraudulent misrepresentation outside the realm of contractual dealings (the concept of liability for culpa in contrahendo [CC art. 227] is available in this case: v. Bar loc. cit. 36; Carneiro da Frada, Uma terceira via, 96; Almeida Costa, Responsabilidade civil pela ruptura, 98) usually criminal fraud (CP art. 217) is required (CC art. 483(1)). The fraud in turn requires astúcia, namely an act of deception, without which merely an irrelevant reserva mental is concerned (CC art. 244) (CA Oporto 3 May 2000, CJ XXV [2000-3] 223). Any person who has shares transferred to him, after he has previously instructed a bank not to honour a cheque issued as counterperformance, commits fraud (STJ 20 March 2003); on the other hand, any person who does not pay the purchase price for delivered goods is, in the absence of certain circumstances, not criminally liable (STJ 3 February 2005).

10. For the purposes of the law on contractual avoidance, DUTCH CC art. 3:44(1) art. 3:44(3) defines fraud (bedrog) in the following manner: "Fraud takes place where someone induces another to engage in a particular juridical act, either by means of giving information known to be false and with the intention of bringing about this result, intentional concealment of a fact for his own ends, which the concealing party was under a duty to communicate, or by way of another act of deception. Instructions in general language, even where they are untrue, treated on their own do not constitute fraud." Fraud within the meaning of this provision is at the same time a civil wrong under CC art. 6:162 (Boukema, Samenloop, no. 30, p. 65). The victim can enforce the corresponding claim in damages additional to his right of avoidance in CC art. 3:44 (HR 2 April 1993, NedJur 1995, no. 94 p. 385; Boukema loc. cit. no. 9, pp. 17-18). This is primarily important because of the longer proscription period in tort law and because of the damage that is not yet eliminated upon avoidance (Onrechtmatige Daad III [-van der Wiel], s. II.3, no. 72 pp. 64-71; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht II[12], no. 204 p. 200).

11. Damage caused by fraud can be compensated under both ESTONIAN LOA § 1048 and § 1045(1)(viii). In addition, compensation for damage caused by misrepresentation can also be claimed under LOA § 14(1)(second sentence). If the aim of the fraud is to induce a person to enter into a transaction, compensation can be claimed also under GPCCA § 101(1). SWEDISH Law on Damages chap. 2 § 2 in conjunction with CP chap. 9 § 1 sets down civil liability for criminal fraud (which requires the making of profit by the wrongdoer); it also encompasses pure economic losses. Under Parental Code chap. 9 § 7(2)(first sentence), liability is incurred by the parents of minors who commit an act of deception when concluding a contract (which is ineffectual as against them). Similar provisions are to be found in DANISH Law on Supervision (værgemålslov of 14 June 1995, no. 388) § 45(2) and (3) and FINNISH Law on the Function of Guardians (lag om förmyndarverksamhet of 1 April 1994, no. 442) § 28(3). Further regulations that relate to liability for fraudulent misrepresentation are to be found in the Scandinavian Law on Contract § 30 (se further Grönfors and Dotevall, Avtalslagen[3], 187-190 and Gomard, Obligationsret I[4], 143) and, for the special case of the liability of the falsus procurator, in § 25.

12. Deceit is counted among the "malicious torts" of the COMMON LAW (Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] AC 465). To establish deceit, the plaintiff must establish, inter alia, misrepresentation, scienter, intent, reliance and damage. Thus the defendant must make a respresentation that is not true. This must be done knowingly, without belief in its truth or carelessly as to the truth (scienter). There must be intention in order to induce reliance, the representation must have materially influenced the detrimental reliance of the plaintiff, who must have suffered a damage or a loss in order to maintain an action. However since the Statute of Frauds Amendment Act 1828 in ENGLAND AND WALES, such represenation must be made in writing in order for the tort to succeed. See generally McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 967-979.

VI.–2:211: Loss upon inducement of non-performance of obligation

Without prejudice to the other provisions of this Section, loss caused to a person as a result of another's inducement of the non-performance of an obligation by a third person is legally relevant damage only if:

(a) the obligation was owed to the person sustaining the loss; and

(b) the person inducing the non-performance:

(i) intended the third person to fail to perform the obligation; and

(ii) did not act in legitimate protection of the inducing person's own interest.

COMMENTS

A. The Article in overview

Inducing non-performance of an obligation. Inducing non-performance of a contractual obligation gives rise to non-contractual liability in all parts of the European Union. In classical Roman law this was one of the recognised groups of cases of the actio de dolo, which even today – often as "intentional causation of damage contrary to good morals" – still features in many civil codes. Where this specific basis of claim is missing, inducing non-performance of a contractual obligation is either subsumed within the basic non-contractual liability law norms or (as in the Common Law) constitutes an independent basis of non-contractual liability in itself.

Intention required. Inducing non-performance of a contractual or other obligation necessarily requires intention. Legally relevant damage is not caused by a third party to the contract when that third party merely exploits the conduct of another party in non-performance of a contractual obligation or causes it through negligence. This Article therefore has a direct intrinsic connection with VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (1)(b) and (c). These provisions give expression to the general (and essentially self-evident) rule that "relative" rights can in principle only be infringed by persons who owe a corresponding obligation to the holder of the right to render the relevant performance. Were this not so, the right would cease to be "relative" in character. However, if a person is intentionally induced not to perform contractual or other obligations to a third party, the third party who thereby suffers loss may claim reparation from the person inducing the non-performance.

Illustration 1

A and B conclude a contract for the production of a film. A assists with approximately 25% of the production costs and in return is to get a share of the expected net profit. A considerable part of the remaining costs are financed by B on credit, including a loan from company X. In order to secure its loan and despite knowledge of the agreements (under partnership law) between A and B, X has all of B's rights over the subsequent film distribution assigned to it. X induced B to breach the contract with A.

Illustration 2

The organiser of an opera production (A) persuades a famous female opera singer (S) not to honour her contract with a competing opera production B and instead to sing with A. A is liable to B to compensate for the damage this causes. A would not be liable to B, however, if A had merely brought S on a ski trip, during which she broke her leg and was unable to perform for B; that remains so even if A had known that the contract with B forbade S from such recreational activities during the period of her contractual engagement to B.

Damage and accountability. The relationship between legally relevant damage and accountability in this Article is no different from how it is under VI.–2:210 (Loss upon fraudulent misrepresentation). Thus, an intentional inducement of the non-performance of a contractual obligation or other obligation is all that is involved (VI.–2:211(b)(i)). In contrast, it is not necessary that the loss resulting from it was also intended or was at least willingly reckoned with (VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (2)). However, in the context of the present Article the two aspects can for the most part scarcely be separated from one another. This is because any person who induces another to fail to perform an obligation also invariably does so conscious of the fact that this harms the creditor. It remains to be considered in the context of this Article that an employer can be liable for an employee's inducement of a non-performance of an obligation .

Loss. As in VI.–2:210 (Loss upon fraudulent misrepresentation), "pure economic losses" are what are mostly in issue in this Article, but it is not limited to such losses. Non-economic losses are also recoverable. For harm of other kinds, overlap with previous provisions of this Chapter will also occur, e.g. where the supplier of a service is bribed to damage the item to be repaired. VI.–2:208 (Loss upon unlawful impairment of business) stretches beyond the scope of the present Article. This is because undertakings which are in a competitive relationship with one another may be subject to more stringent obligations under competition law to respect others' contractual relationships than is the case under the general rule in this Article .

The entitled claimant. According to sub-paragraph (a) only the person whose entitlement (within the law of obligations) is interfered with suffers a legally relevant damage. The person who is induced not to perform the obligation, by contrast, is expected to withstand temptation and, on failing to do so, to must suffer the consequences of the non-performance (vis-à-vis the creditor). That person will not be able to invoke this Article to pass the burden of any resultant liability to pay damages for non-performance of the obligation to the person inducing the non-performance. Nor is there any solidary liability, in relation to the third party, between the person inducing the non-performance of the obligation and the non-performing party (which would in effect provide the inducing person with a right of recourse vis-à-vis the non-performer). In cases in which the person who is to be induced is subjected to physical or mental pressure, that person has a preventative recourse on the basis of VI.–1:102 (Prevention) in conjunction with VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage).

Illustration 3
X, formerly a member of a religiously active sect (S), has since become an employee in an ecclesiastical undertaking. The contract of employment prohibits X from membership in associations of a type like S. Nevertheless, S threatens X with considerable disadvantages if he does not pay his membership fees to the sect and serve its interests. Membership in the community is for life, the sect insists. X has a claim against S for prevention of the pressure.

B. Non-performance of obligation

Contractual and other obligations. The Article is not restricted to inducing non-performance of a contractual obligation. In practice that may be the most important type of case, but there is no reason in principle why contractual rights should be treated differently from rights to the performance of other obligations. Hence this provision embraces claims in respect of non-contractual obligations, including alimentary obligations. Moreover, where the obligation arises out of a contract, the fact that the contract may be avoided does not prevent a right to reparation under non-contractual liability law.s.

Illustration 4:
M, operator of a hamburger restaurant, wishes to enlarge the business and to cease using the premises hitherto used in favour of larger restaurant premises in direct proximity. He enters into negotiations with company P, surrendering to P his former premises because P assures him that it will operate an art gallery there, thus not intending to compete with M. In reality, at the time of the negotiations, X had attained a decisive influence over P (through an acquisition of shares effected in secrecy). X instructs P, as planned from the beginning, to open a hamburger restaurant in M's former premises. Shortly afterwards, P gets into financial difficulties. Although M can avoid the contract with P due to fraudulent misrepresentation, M also has a claim to reparation directly against X, who induced P to breach its agreement with M.

Obligation 'owed to the person sustaining the loss'. As already noted, the obligation in question must always be owed to the injured person by the party induced to fail to perform (sub-paragraph (a)). It does not suffice that the obligation is owed to another person. Conversely, the Article does not require that the identity of the injured creditor was known to the deceiver.

Breach of conjugal obligations. According to its wording, interferences in another's marriage, and in particular the inducement to commit adultery also fall under this provision. In this context, however, regard must be had to VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (c), and thus the question is raised whether the applicable law on marriage strives to regulate such cases conclusively. That would usually be the case in the matter of adultery: cf. above: illustration 5 under VI.–1:103. If the adulterous spouse does not become liable under non-contractual liability law, the third party who commits adultery with him or her cannot be held liable either. Otherwise the third party could have recourse against the spouse as a joint injuring person in their internal relationship as joint debtors and thereby circumvent the conclusiveness of the rule provided for by family law.

Non-performance. Legally relevant damage is only ever present where the respective loss is the consequence of a non-performance of an obligation on the part of the claimant's debtor. Thus, if e.g. an employee is poached from an employer due to the poacher's offering the employee a higher salary, then as long as the latter terminates the existing employment relationship and changes employment, inducement to non-performance of a contractual obligation is not in issue. The situation is the same if a competitor approaches the customer of another undertaking with the purpose of doing business with the customer in the future. Where unfair means are used in these and other types of cases, it may be a case concerning VI.–2:208 (Loss upon unlawful impairment of business). Typical situations for VI.–2:211 by contrast consist of the inducement to breach a prohibition against competition contained in the contract between the party induced to breach and the injured third party and inducements to terminate contractual relationships unlawfully.

During the owners' general meeting, certain apartment owners of a multi-storey building instigate the dismissal of the building's supposedly inefficient caretaker, using false facts as a pretext, after having accepted payment from the prospective replacement caretaker as remuneration for "being instrumental" in procuring the new job. The caretaker who is dismissed suffers legally relevant damage under VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another), as well as under VI.–2:208 (Loss upon unlawful impairment of business) and the present Article.

C. Intentional inducement

Intentional inducement. According to paragraph (i) the person inducing the non-performance must have "intended" the third person to fail to perform the obligation. As in VI.–2:210 (Loss upon fraudulent misrepresentation), the requirement of "intention" is thus related not to loss, but to the failure to perform. The concept of "intention" is therefore once again not identical with that of VI.–3:101 (Intention), which is linked to the causation of the damage. What is required in the context of the present Article is rather that the inducing person's mind is directed towards the non-performance. The non-performance itself must be intended; it does not suffice that the inducing person acting merely willingly reckoned with it as a side-effect or exploited a non-performance which had already occurred. Only in the case of acts of infringement to the detriment of competitors may this be different, as noted above, due to the application of standards of competition law. That case is within the scope of application of VI.–2:208 (Loss upon unlawful impairment of business).

Absence of legitimate interest. Legally relevant damage within the meaning of the Article is also absent under sub-paragraph (b)(ii), if the inducing person acted "in legitimate protection" of the inducing person's own interest. A person is not bound to allow a fortuitous legal opportunity to go to waste, solely because by grasping it detriment would be caused to a third party.

Illustration 6
Before her death, an old lady (L) gives away the same piece of land to two different donees consecutively. The second donee (X) effects a registration in the land registry and in this way acquires ownership under the applicable land law because the prior donee (Y) did not carry out registration. At the time the conclusion of the contract of donation was offered to her by L, X did not know anything of the contract with Y, but X found out about it before the registration in the land registry was effected. X merely pursued her legitimate interests. She did not induce L to breach her contract with Y; consequently, X has no non-contractual liability to Y.

NOTES

1. FRENCH Law goes over and above the principle opted for in VI.–2:211. This is owing to the reality that it corresponds with settled case law whereby any person who knowingly aids another in breaching the latter's contractual obligations, commits a tortious faute in relation to the party who is affected by this breach of contract. The principe d´opposabilité des conventions aux tiers holds true (Cass.civ. 17 October 2000, Bull.civ. 2000, I, no. 246 p. 161). Not only incitement, but even the abetting of a breach of contract grounds a faute. It suffices that the third (non-contractul) party had knowledge of the existence of the contract. Business people are often even required to provide information on whether and what form of contractual relationship their business associate has with third parties (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2004/2005], no. 977). This is in conformity with the reality that French jurisprudence solves issues of unfair competition drawing on general tort law (???see above Note 1 under VI.–2:208). Special regulations for labour law are to be found in Code du travail art. L 1237-3. Hereunder the new employer and the employee are solidarily liable for reparation of the damage which the old employer suffers through the unlawful termination of the contract of employment, effectuated by the employee, as long as some participation therein on the part of the new employer is proven. In tandem with this, the general tort law action remains applicable, for instance where a non-compete obligation is intentionally breached (a clause de non-concurrence), which the employee had signed in favour of the previous employer (Cass.com. 5 February 1991, Bull.civ. 1991, IV, no. 51 p. 34).

2. In BELGIAN case law it is also recognised that a tortious faute is committed by any person who knows or must know that he is assisting another's breach of contract (see the seminal case of Cass. 22 April 1983, Pas. belge 1983, 944). However, it is necessary that the the third party knew of the existence of the contract in question and knew or must have known that he was playing his part in a breach of contract, i.e. taking part in it (see further Stijns, in: Wéry (ed.), Le droit des obligations contractuelles et le bicentenaire du Code civil, pp. 189, 214-221, nos. 41-50).

3. According to SPANISH Law 3/1991 of 10 January 1991 on unfair competition (Ley 3/1991, de 10 de enero, de Competencia Desleal, LCD) art. 14(1) it is unfair "to induce employees, suppliers, customers and other creditors to breach essential contractual duties owed to competitors". Conversely, "inducing the customary cessation of a contract or exploiting a breach of an extrinsic contract for the benefit of oneself or a third party" is only unfair under art. 14(2) where either a betrayal or exploitation of an industry or trade secret is in issue or where deceit, an intention to oust the other party or other scheming is in play (see further Berg, Spanisches Gesetz gegen den unlauteren Wettbewerb, 279). The mere exploitation of a breach of an extrinsic contract, poaching customers or enticing away employees through the submission of a better offer are inconsequential to competition law as long as no special circumstances arise (CA Málaga 23 October 1995, RGD 1996, 4753). This is down to the fact that according to Spanish doctrine, contracts only generate effects on the contracting parties (CA Sevilla 21 June 1993, AC 1993-II no. 1270). When in doubt, an "essential contractual duty" (LCD art. 14(1)) is breached, where the conduct is severe enough to warrant the aggrieved party being given the right to terminate the contract (CA Madrid 1 July 1996, AC 1996-III no. 1942 p. 394). Any person who, e.g. pays extraordinarily high premiums or who expresses their readiness to take on a potential duty in damages on the part of the party in breach of contract, "induces" a breach. Overall, Spanish jurisprudence holds back from affirming an incitement to breach of a contract carrying liability, see e.g Tribunal de Defensa de la Competencia 6 February 1995, AC 1995-I, no. 889 p. 1498 and 7 July 1995, AC 1995-II no. 1500 p. 962. Immaterial damage suffered by a spouse as a result of the adultery of the counterpart is not recoverable (TS 22 July 1999, RAJ 1999 [3] no. 5721 p. 8929 and TS 30 July 1999, RAJ 1999 [3] no. 5726 p. 8933). However, a tortious wrong shall occur where it has been kept from a man for years that the three youngest of his four children are actually from another man (CA Valencia 2 November 2004, AC 2004-XXI no. 1994 p. 1069).

4. Under ITALIAN law the party injured by an "incitement to non-fulfillment" (induzione all'inadempimento) is equipped with a tortious claim for damages against the third party (Bianca, Diritto civile V, 605-607). Therefore, e.g. the second buyer of immovable property is liable to the first buyer under CC art. 2043 where the second buyer planned the harm to the first buyer (loss of title in ownership due to the registration of title of the second buyer) and participated in the vendor's breach of contract (from a long line of case law, see inter alia, Cass. 9 January 1997, no. 99, NGCC 1998, I, 17; Cass. 18 August 1990, no. 8403, Foro it. 1991, I, 2473; Cass. 17 December 1991, no. 13573, Giust.civ.Mass. 1991, fasc. 12; Cass. 15 June 1988, no. 4090, Foro it. 1989, I, 1568; Cass. 20 October 1983, no. 6160, Giur.it. 1984, I, 1, 439; Cass 8 January 1982, no. 76, Riv.Dir.Civ. 1983, II, 678; CFI Ivrea 16 May 2003, Giur.it. 2004, 778; CFI Verona 4 March 1991, Giur.mer. 1992, 569). However, it is a bone of contention whether the mere knowledge of a contract with the first buyer suffices (rejected by Castronovo, La nuova responsabilità civile[2], 113). Cass. 25 October 2004, no. 20721, Giur.it. 2006, I, 1, 486 rejected it in a case of where the same gift was given to two people and disallowed the action due to the lacking intention to harm. The principles on liability for incitement to sell the same thing to two parties also hold true where merely two preliminary contracts are involved (Cass. 20 October 1983, no. 6160, Giur.it. 1984, I, 1, 439). Furthermore, the purchaser of a plot of land, who in collusion with the vendor infringes the previous owner's right to repurchase (Cass. 9 January 1997, no. 99, Giur.it. 1998, 928) and an acquirer who through de facto acts prevents a third party from exercising the azione revocatoria with which he is furnished under CC art. 2901 (Cass. 13 January 1996, no. 251, NGCC 1998, 104). The first buyer injured as a result of the "double sale" would suffer pure economic losses and not consequential losses flowing from an infringement of the title in ownership (Castronovo loc. cit. 109). Acts for purposes relevant to competition law may additionally be appraised under CC art. 2598(3) and accordingly be subject to more stringent requirements.

5. HUNGARY covers the inflicting of damage through inducement to breach of contract under civil law by means of its general tort law clause (CC § 339(1)): inducements to breach of contract may be "objectionable" within the meaning of this regulation. The inducer and inducee are liable solidarily as against the injured obligee (CC § 344). This is due to the fact that solidary liability even rears its head under Hungarian law where the contributory causes are independent of one other and occur after each other from a temporal perspective (see further Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 64-65; Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1238-1240; Petrik [-Harmathy], Polgári jog II[2], 581-582; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 75-80). In competition law inducements to breach of contract are subject to Law No. LVII from 1996 on the prohibition of unfair market behaviour and restriction of competition (Law on competition, Tpvt) § 5. Hereunder it is forbidden to call upon others in an unfair manner to discontinue their contacts with third parties or to refrain from taking up new commercial contacts. Tpvt § 5 does not require that the call for a boycott comes from a competitor. Of course it is not yet unfair to advertise to new potential customers by offering more favourable conditions.

6. The POLISH Civil Code leaves the actio de dolo undecided in its general tort law clause (CC art. 415). CC art. 422 adds as a general clause that "not only the person who directly caused the damage shall be liable, but also any person who has induced or helped another person to cause the damage, including those who consciously took benefit from a damage caused to another person". On the other hand, CZECH and SLOVAK CC § 424 deal with the inducement to breach of contract in a general provision on intentional and immoral infliction of damage. Things are the same in ESTONIA (LOA § 1045(1)(viii)).

7. In principle, GERMAN CC § 823(1) excludes tortious liability for third party interference with a contractual relationship existing between two others: contracts do not generate absolute, but merely relative rights, which thus cannot be enforced against third parties (e.g. Medicus, Bürgerliches Recht[20], no. 610; same author, Schuldrecht II[12], no. 842). However, under CC § 826, inter alia, as long as they are caused intentionally and immorally, liability ensues for pure economic losses, which are - from a German understanding - losses that are not the result of the infringement of an absolute right. The inference of an immoral act requires special circumstances. In the case of a double sale, for instance, the second purchaser's mere knowledge of the vendor's breach of contract in itself will usually not suffice (Medicus, Schuldrecht II[12], no. 842). Immorality only comes into focus in the case of an active inducement to breach of contract. The inducement to breach of contract is immoral where the inducer exhibits a particular measure of recklessness or in other words: when he behaves in such a manner that is incompatible with the basic necessities of good faith in the legal sense (BGH 24 February 1954, BGHZ 12, 308, 317; BGH 23 April 1999, NJW-RR 1999, 1186 and BGH 19 October 1993, NJW 1994, 128). This shall also be the case where e.g. the second purchaser promises the vendor that he will release him from all the claims of the first buyer (BGH 2 June 1981, NJW 1981, 2184, 2185; ähnlich BGH 19 October 1993, NJW 1994, 128, 129). The finding of immorality can also result from the fact that the third party caused the breach of contract (or the non-performance of another obligation: BGH 1 April 1992, NJW 1992, 2152, 2153) through deceit or unlawful threat or from the fact that he co-operated with the vendor based on a plan (cullusion) (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[65], § 826, no. 23). For instance, where in collusive co-operation with the recipient of the credit, a bank clerk carries out a forged transfer order, without prjudice to his claims against the bank, the debited account holder also has a claim in damages against the recipient of the credit under CC § 826 (BGH 31 May 1994, NJW 1994, 2357). The inducement to breach of contract for purposes relevant to competition is always immoral (Sprau loc. cit. no. 24). Moreover, conscious exploitation of the abuse of the representative authority of another or the fraudulent co-operation of a contractual partner with the representative of his contractual counterpart is also immoral in this sense (BGH 26 March 1962, NJW 1962, 1099). Head-hunting workers and "pinching" customers are per se not immoral. Immorality can however be established with the aid of accompanying circumstances, particularly by a plan of action under the accpeptance of a contractual penalty or by exploiting or impairing an employer or supplier (Erman [-Schiemann], BGB II[11], § 826, no. 29).

8. AUSTRIA likewise treats inducement to breach of contract as a subset of the immoral inflicting of damage (CC § 1295(2); OGH 9 November 1982, 4 Ob 562/82). Where a third party induces the injured party's contractual partner to breach the contract, jurisprudence even dispenses with the requirement of special evidence of intention to harm (necessary per se under CC § 1295(2)) (OGH 28 April 1998, 1 Ob 186/97b). Of the not so numerously reported judgments, most relate to inducements to the double sale of things that have already been sold. Instead of monetary damages, the injured party can claim damages in kind, namely the return of the thing (OGH 29 May 2001, 5 Ob 259/00z). In another case the inducement to pay membership fees to a frozen account was in question (OGH 12 December 2002, 6 Ob 62/02i, RdW 2003, 314). The case groups that are particularly economically relevant – the head-hunting of employees and the inducement to breach of contract to the detriment of competitors – are decided according to the rules of competition law and not general private law (OGH 18 February 2003, 4 Ob290/02d, SZ 2003/12). Any person who exploits an external breach of contract – i.e. a contract to which he was not party - for his own ends, will not be liable (compilation of the relevant cases in RIS-Justiz RS0107766).

9. Inflicting damage by inducing a third party to breach a contract fulfills the requisites of GREEK CC art. 919 (A.P. 2169/1958, NoB 7 [1959] 195 [= illustration 5 above]; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 919, no. 5 [with the example of an inducement to double sale by offering a higher price for a thing which is already sold, but not yet transferred]).

10. The point of departure in PORTUGUESE law is CC art. 406(2), under which "in relation to third parties, the contract only produces effects on the cases and terms specially provided by law". According to CC art. 490, while as well as the wrongdoer, the inducer and abettor are also liable, this is only so in cases where the principal wrongdoer commits a tortious (and not just contractual) wrong. Consequently, it is said, in cases of inducement to breach of contract in principle only the inducee, and not also the inducer is liable (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em Geral I[10], 179); the injured party has only the possibility of attaching himself to the rights of the inducee as against the inducer (CC art. 794). Jurisprudence occasionally draws upon other techniques for justifying liability (e.g. STJ 18 December 2003: where a bank debits an account held with it, though knowing that the signature of a second manager was also necessary for this (and was not provided), it is liable to him due to the infringement of his good name). The principle of relativity of contractual obligations should be open to exceptions, according to some commentators (pointers in Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 82 and 83; Antunes Varela, loc. cit. 175). The proponents of this thesis particularly want to attain the position of where inducement to breach of contract is recognised as a tort (Galvão Telles, Obrigações[7], 20 and Menezes Cordeiro, Obrigações, 251). Prevailing opinion (e.g. Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 85 [1959] 345; Antunes Varela loc. cit. 176; Almeida Costa loc. cit. 81) and more importantly case law (CA Coimbra 20 January 2004; STJ 19 March 2002, CJ [ST] [2002-1] 139; CA Lisbon 21 February 1991, CJ XVI [1991-1] 165; see also STJ 25 October 1993, BolMinJus 430 [1993] 455) have hitherto not followed this viewpoint, however. Due to CC arts. 406(2) and 1306(1) liability for inducement to breach of contract only comes into play on other bases, in particular under the heading of competition law (Antunes Varela loc. cit. 177; Alarcão, Obrigações, 84) (for an example of such, see STJ 29 September 1995, BolMinJus 449 [1995] 374).

11. Under DUTCH law it is a civil wrong to intentionally induce another to breach his obligation existing as against a third party, as long as it is apparent that the third party will suffer detriment thereby and as long as a justificatory reason for the inducement is lacking (Onrechtmatige Daad III [-van der Wiel], s. II.3, no. 122; Onrechtmatige Daad IV [-van Nispen], nos. 209 and 230). HR 18 June 1971, NedJur 1971 no. 408 p. 1226 related to e.g. the sale and transfer of a plot of land in breach of a preemptive right to purchase of the leaseholder; the purchaser of the plot of land is also liable to the latter. Incidentally, even unlawful assistance with another's breach of contract can constitute a civil wrong. Moreover, the unlawfulness of the interference with another's right of claim can also result from other circumstances, e.g. from the abuse of a relationship of trust and confidence (HR 3 January 1964, NedJur 1965 no. 16 p. 65: purchase of immovable property already sold to a third party). Reparation in cases of inducement to breach of contract can also take the form of the return of the thing, e.g. where the second purchaser transfers title in ownership to the first buyer. In this case what arises is a so-called aangepaste veroordeling, a "customised award" (HR 28 June 1974, NedJur 1974 no. 400 p. 1105; Verkade, in: FS van der Grinten, 561-576). The ESTONIAN LOA does not contain provisions similar to VI.–2:211.

12. In the NORDIC Countries, so-called pure economic losses are in principle only compensated under tight requirements. The most important case is the violation of a criminal law. However, there are a range of exceptions thereto. Among them is the recoverability of damages – at this stage recognised in principle everywhere – which result from an inducement to breach of contract (see for SWEDEN HD 12 September 2005, NJA 2005, 608 [above, illustration 4; see Bernitz, JT 2005-2006, 620 and Sandstedt, VersRAI 2007, 44]; for DENMARK HD 16 September 1947, UfR 1947, 1005 [on this issue Gomard, Obligationsret II, 146]; for FINLAND Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 74 and for NORWAY Hagstrøm and Aarbakke, Obligasjonsrett[2], 816). Where a second purchaser induces the vendor to re-sell him the thing already sold to another, the doctrine of bona fide acquisition of title of the second purchaser fails under Nordic law due to his mala fides (SWEDEN: Law on the bona fide acquisition of title in moveables [lag (1986:796) om godtrosförvärv av lösöre] § 2(1); Code on Immoveable Property [jordabalk (1970:994)] chap. 17 §§ 1-2; DENMARK: Elmer and Skovby, Ejendomsretten (1)[4], 193; FINLAND: Ccom chap. 1 § 5; Code on Immoveable Property [jordabalk of 12 April 1995, no. 540] chap. 13 § 3). Where a damage is lacking, issues of liability in such cases have to date not arisen.

CHAPTER 3: ACCOUNTABILITY

Section 1: Intention and negligence

VI.–3:101: Intention

A person causes legally relevant damage intentionally when that person causes such damage either:

(a) meaning to cause damage of the type caused; or

(b) by conduct which that person means to do, knowing that such damage, or damage of that type, will or will almost certainly be caused.

COMMENTS

A. General

Intention as ground of accountability. Intention, like negligence, is a ground of accountability (VI.–1:101 (Basic rule)). What is to be understood by the notions of intention and negligence is defined in this Section. Liability arising from intentional acts and liability arising from negligence follow in part different rules: see e.g. VI.–2:101(3) (Meaning of legally relevant damage), VI.–5:103 (Damage caused by a criminal to a collaborator) and VI.–5:401 (Contractual exclusions and limitation of liability). Moreover, the differentiation plays a role in the rule on reduction of claims due to contributory fault: see VI.–5:102 (Contributory fault and accountability). The question whether the causation of damage occurred intentionally or negligently can also be crucial, however, in other contexts – for example, within the field of causation.

A ten year old child drops a stone from a bridge over a motorway and as a result cause the death of a passenger in a bus. The passenger's surviving dependents make a claim against, among others, the undertaking responsible for the motorway on the basis (well-founded in the circumstances) that it has failed to adopt the required safety measures and has thus acted negligently. The causal connection between that negligence and the damage is only broken if the child brought about the death of the passenger intentionally. Assuming the child was not focused on killing another (VI.–3:101(a)), the matter turns on whether, according to the child's individual's stage of development, the child knew that with the greatest probability a death would result from the action of dropping the stone. In the case of a ten year old, that will be answered in the negative if there any is doubt on the issue.

Natural and legal persons. The provisions of this Section are not restricted to natural persons; the general rule of interpretation applies whereby "person" is to be understood as including legal as well as natural persons (see Annex 1). Legal persons are as capable of causing damage intentionally (or negligently, as the case may be) as natural persons. The intention of the legal person is found by establishing the state of mind of natural persons acting as its governing organ (see VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (b) and Comments on that Article).

B. Intention

The need for a definition. The Article effects a definition of the concept of intention in relation to the causing of damage. Such a definition is indispensable for various reasons. In the first place, European private law currently lacks a uniform definition of intention. Secondly, under these rules, the presence (or absence) of intention can play a role in a not insignificant number of cases. Thirdly, liability for intentionally causing damage is, as a rule, not insurable. For that reason such liability affects the liable person in a direct and potentially ruinous way. The inclination of private law therefore ought to be towards invoking a somewhat narrow concept of intention.

Intention to do the act required but not sufficient. The Article does not adopt the notion of 'intention' invoked in the English law of trespass where a mere intention to do the act suffices, it being established that the act interferes with another's rights. A person only acts intentionally in the sense of this Article if that person (i) acts as he or she meant to act, and (ii) either means to cause legally relevant damage (sub-paragraph (a)) or recognises that it is as good as certain that such damage will be the consequence of the conduct and nonetheless does not desist from that conduct (sub-paragraph (b)). The reference point for intention for present purposes is thus always the causation of a legally relevant damage.

> A damages or destroys the property of another, believing that it belongs to him. A acts negligently if he ought reasonably to have known that it was not his property, but there is no intentional causation of legally relevant damage. That is because the destruction of one's own property does not constitute a legally relevant damage.

On the other hand, a person does not act intentionally if the person does not know what he or she is doing (e.g. a patient at a hospital who unconsciously hits out in sleep or under the influence of medication), or, while so aware, is unable to act differently (e.g. because of duress or because a sudden impairment of certain cerebral functions temporarily deprives that person of the ability to control the conduct).

C. Sub-paragraph (a)

Deliberate causation of legally relevant damage. A person acts intentionally when the causation of the legally relevant damage is deliberate. The concept of legally relevant damage is established by Chapter 2. The liable person therefore must know the elements of the applicable concept of damage and have intended to bring these about. It is not essential, of course, that the person acting recognises that the damage about to be caused would be characterised in law as "legally relevant". On the other hand, the person must be conscious of doing wrong; in other words, the lay person must anticipate that civil legal consequences are to be reckoned with. Where the person acting has made a mistake about the circumstances or the wrongful nature of the conduct, the ground of accountability (if any) will be negligence rather than intention.

Breach of a statutory rule of behaviour. Equally, a person who deliberately and knowingly infringes a given statutory rule of behaviour (e.g. by driving faster than traffic regulations permit), but who in no way means to cause an accident by doing so, will not act intentionally.

Omissions. The same applies to cases of omission. Someone who is obliged to intervene and who is also aware of that, but does nothing to avert the impending damage, only acts intentionally if he or she remains inactive precisely in order that the damage may occur. Intention always relates to the incidence of damage, and the infringement of a norm of behaviour does not constitute per se a damage (only per se negligence). Where a woman who knows she is obliged in the morning to clear the snow and black ice from the pavement in front of her house, resolves nonetheless to stay in bed, and a neighbour slips and suffers a leg fracture, the neighbour's injury is caused negligently and not intentionally.

By contrast, a drunken car driver, who suddenly steers his vehicle towards two pedestrians in order to terrify them and in doing so runs them over, causes death intentionally by an omission if, although he knows that one of them is particularly badly injured and is unlikely to be helped by a third party at that time of night, simply drives on, leaving the pedestrian to bleed to death.

Causation. On the other hand, those who witness a situation in which they are not obliged to intervene and do not intervene, although capable of doing so, because they take delight in the impending damage, act intentionally, but they do not cause legally relevant damage intentionally.

Illustration 4
A sees that in the house belonging to her neighbour, whom she has always hated, a fire has started to burn. She does not inform the fire service because she hopes that the whole building will be destroyed. A acts intentionally, but she has not caused the loss of the house. A would only have caused the damage by her omission to act if she had been under a duty towards her neighbour (and not only to the public at large) to intervene.

"Damage of the type caused". To establish intention it is sufficient that the person meant to cause damage of the type in fact brought about. If the person is mistaken about circumstances which are immaterial for the qualification of a damage as legally relevant, the conduct remains governed by the regime for liability for intentional causation of damage.

Illustration 5
A intends to damage B's car and vandalises a car which formerly belonged to B. A did not know that B had recently transferred the car to C. The property damage suffered by C was caused intentionally. A knew that he was causing damage to the property of another and meant to do so. The situation is the same in the textbook case where A means to shoot B, but in the darkness shoots C by mistake.

D. Sub-paragraph (b)

General. Sub-paragraph (b) concerns cases on the border between intention and negligence. A person causes legally relevant damage intentionally (and not merely negligently) when that person acts as he or she means to act and at the same time knows that in doing so he or she will cause legally relevant damage. The present Article (in conformity with these rules generally) does not adopt the formulation of PECL art. 1:301 under which "[a]n 'intentional' act includes an act done recklessly". Nor does the Article use the concept of "recklessness" (defined in Annex 1 as follows – "[a] person is "reckless" if the person knows of an obvious and serious risk of proceeding in a certain way but nonetheless voluntarily proceeds without caring whether or not the risk materialises"). That concept is helpful for the purposes of contract law (see, e.g., III.–3:501 (Scope and definition) and III.–3:703 (Foreseeability)), but not for those of the law on non-contractual liability for damage. It was important for the latter that a simple structure of grounds of accountability be maintained and thus merely to distinguish between intention and negligence and not between intention, negligence and recklessness. However, first and foremost the decisive question for the purposes of non-contractual liability should not be whether a person 'could not care less' whether or not the damage concerned will result from conduct, but rather whether the person knows that the damage will be a well-nigh certain consequence of the conduct. A person who hopes desperately that damage will not result, but who knows that the hope is completely unrealistic in the circumstances, brings about that damage intentionally.

Illustration 6
A drives at high speed in the outside lane round a blind bend in the road. Houses by the side of the road hide the headlights of an oncoming car. A head-on collision results. The damage is not caused intentionally. Had A, however, seen the oncoming car before he began to overtake and it was evident to him that an accident was highly probable and unavoidable if he did not pull back into the inside lane, the damage caused by carrying on in the outside lane is intentional. Intention in such a case is not excluded simply because the person acting hoped at the time that 'everything would turn out all right'.

Dolus eventualis. Sub-paragraph therefore equates extensively, but not perfectly, to the traditional notion of dolus eventualis which in some legal systems is defined exactly as Annex 1 defines "recklessness". However, sub-paragraph (b) excludes conscious carelessness from the notion of intention. Furthermore, a person does not act intentionally when causing damage simply through gross negligence, whether or not that person is aware of the carelessness.

Illustration 7
A construction company which undertakes excavation work on another's land and is aware of a cable laid there causes damage intentionally, when it slices the cable, if it made no inquiries as to the position of the cable and knew that, in view of the size of the machine being deployed and the small size of the plot of land, it was well-nigh impossible that the machine would miss the cable. On the other hand, a person who negligently fails even to contemplate that there might be cables laid beneath the soil acts merely negligently.

Gross negligence. Gross negligence is an unreasonable or extraordinary want of care (see Annex 1 – "There is 'gross negligence' if a person is guilty of a profound failure to take such care as is self-evidently required in the circumstances") and therefore does not amount to intention. See also VI.–5:102(2)(c) (Contributory fault and accountability).

"by conduct which that person means to do…". A person causes legally relevant damage intentionally only when he or she meant to act in the way in which he or she has in fact acted. This excludes from the notion of intention, therefore, not just acts under duress, but also unintended incorrect responses. A guest whose lit cigar falls from his hand and damages the carpet in his host's flat does not cause that damage intentionally. While he means to smoke, he does not mean to drop the cigar.

"… knowing that … damage … will almost certainly be caused". Crucial for the demarcation between intention and negligence is, however, the question of whether the person acting knew that legally relevant damage would be caused by the conduct. The assured knowledge that such damage will arise is placed by sub-paragraph (b) on the same footing as cases in which the person acting knew that legally relevant damage would "almost certainly" be caused. This gives the judge a certain amount of discretion in order to do justice in the circumstances of each individual case. Where the abnormally high likelihood of damage occurring would be obvious to everyone and there are no special circumstances present which would justify the inference that the person in question was not aware of this well-nigh certain likelihood, then this suffices for the inference of intentional harm, even in the case of an omission. Once again, it is not necessary that the perpetrator should have foreseen the exact causal chain of events and the concrete damage arising. The foresight need only have related to damage of this type.

Illustration 8
A as owner carries the responsibility for a dilapidated old building. It is empty and ought to be torn down to make way for a new one. Children are in shorts playing soccer in the building. A watches this and is aware that in light of the countless glass shards lying around, it is impossible that this will "end well" if he does not intervene immediately. Nonetheless he does nothing about it. Assuming that A is obliged to undertake preventative measures in respect of the dangers facing the children and supposing also that A is conscious of this obligation, A will have acted intentionally in relation to the later injuries to the children even though his main reason for doing nothing might have been to save money.

Illustration 9
A person who fires at a jeep from a distance of a few short metres and knows that the passengers of the car may be killed by the shots, kills intentionally even where the primary motive was to injure the victim in order to satiate a need for revenge.

NOTES

1. FRENCH CC arts. 1382 and 1383 distinguish between faute intentionnelle and faute non intentionnelle. Nowadays it is seldom argued that there is substantial difference between liability for intention and liability for negligence, for the most part there is universal agreement that it does not involve a (Mazeaud and Chabas, Obligations[9], no. 444 p. 451); summa divisio (see further e.g. Brun, Responsabilité civile extracontractuelle, no. 363 pp. 187-188 also Lévy and Castaldo, Histoire du droit civil, no. 640 p. 917). The faute intentionnelle is based on the wrongdoer's intention to cause the legally relevant damage.(Brun, loc. cit. no. 364 p. 188). It provides that the wrongdoer must deliberately act or omit to act, and intend to cause damage unlawfully. In comparision the faute lourde and the faute inexcusable do not require an intention to cause damage (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[11], no. 110 pp. 109-110). Making the distinction remains, in spite of the clear criteria, occasionally difficult, especially where the wrongdoer, must have known that his actions would cause damage to another person, (näher Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 727 p. 711). Persons who are not capable of distinguishing between right and wrong cannot act intentionally, in the sense of faute intentionnelle (Brun loc. cit.; Flour/Aubert/Savaux loc. cit. no. 101 p. 103). The distinction between faute intentionnelle and faute non intentionnelle acquires practical importance above all in insurance law, owing to the fact that personal liability insurance does not provide coverage in cases of intentional infliction of damage (Code des assurances art. L. 113-1(2). Intention presupposes here «la volonté de causer le dommage» that is, a mere intent to create a situation of damger will not suffice.(Cass.civ. 10 April 1996, Bull.civ. 1996, I, no. 172 p. 120). Moreover not only do the courts appear to award higher amounts of compensation in these cases, (Carbonnier, Droit civil IV[21], no. 226 p. 389; Flour/Aubert/Savaux loc. cit. no. 111 p. 111), they also settle for applying a lesser standard of proof of causation.(Carbonnier loc. cit.).

2. In contemporary BELGIAN doctrine, faute intentionnelle is on occasion defined as the deliberate infringement of a legal rule or general standard of care; decisive is the intent to infringe a particular standard of conduct. Initially the faute dolosive additionally required the intention to cause damage to another (Cornelis, Responsabilité extra-contractuelle, nos. 96-97 pp. 178-180). However, the distinction between faute intentionelle (CC art. 1382) and faute non intentionnelle (CC art. 1383) in Belgium is only exceptionally decisive, since the gravity of the fault has no impact on the legal consequences.(Vandeputte, Het aquiliaans foutbegrip, nos. 16-17 p. 22). A special case of this kind is to be found, for example, in the rule, according to which contractual clauses seeking to limit liability cannot exclude liability for a faute intentionnelle (Kruithof, TPR 1984, 233, 269-272 [no. 31]). Other commentators continue to regard this (unwritten) rule as applying only to cases of faute dolosive (Cornelis loc. cit.).

3. The SPANISH CC is silent on the issue of intentional inflictional of damage and consequently does not contain any definition of intent (Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 236). This exclusion of an express reference to intent has been traditionally explained on the basis that the distinction between dolo und culpa is a meaningless one for the law on extra contractual liability; the concepts culpa o negligencia (CC art. 1902) are to be read in such a manner, that they also embrace the dolo (Lacruz and Rivero, Elementos II(2)[4], 471-472; Díez-Picazo, Derecho de daños, 351; Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños[3], 60). However, the distinction between liability arising from intentional acts and liability arising from negligence plays an important role within the area of insurance law. Liability arising from intentional acts is excluded from liability insurance (Insurance Contract Act art. 19) (it is only unclear as to whether the insurer can rely on this against the plaintiff, if the plaintiff claims against the insurer in a direct action; see loc. cit. art. 76 as well as Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic Act art. 7). The distinction between intentional and negligent infliction of damage can also play a role in family law; at any rate it appears that the courts will not allow themselves to be satisfied with proof of mere negligence in order to guarantee compensation, for loss or damage between close family members (Salvador/Ramos/Luna, InDret 3/2000, p. 9; Ferrer i Riba, InDret 4/2001, p. 12; see also TS 22 July 1999, RAJ 1999 (3) no. 5721 p. 8928 [no right to damages in cases of adultery, when it was not committed with the intent of inflicting damage] and CA Valencia 2 November 2004, AC 2004 (21) no. 1994 p. 1069).

4. ITALIAN CC art. 2043 expressly provides that every fatto doloso o colposo grounds an obligation to pay damages; therefore it brackets together both pillars of fault based liability without actually defining them (in respect of a number of exceptional provisions, where only proof of intention suffices to establish liability, see Alpa and Mariconda [-Alpa] Codice civile commentato, sub art. 2043, IV, § 14). Nowadays the concept of intent is not defined in an identical manner throughout the legal order. In the area of private law intentional behaviour presupposes willed action, the intention to cause damage, knowledge of the wrongfulness of the damage, (der ingiustizia) absence of grounds of defence as well as the capacity to commit fault on the part of the wrongdoer. However the the aim of acting does not have to be synonymous with the infliction of damage; dolo eventuale suffices in this regard (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, arts. 2043-2059, 110). Negligence is affirmed CP art. 43(1)), if the damage, although forseen, was not intended by the actor, rather it was the product of inattentiveness,carelessness, or solecism (so-called colpa generica) or was the result of breach of a statutory rule of behaviour (commonly called. colpa specifica). Whether the defendant acts in an intentional or merely negligent manner, may also be relevant in establishing whether the claimant suffers a compensatable damage, for example in cases of procuring a breach of contract, in cases of boycott or defamation cases (Cass. Pen. 5 November 2004, no. 46311, Giur.it. 2005, I, 1, 2385).

5. The basic norm of HUNGARIAN tort law, (CC § 339(1)) deliberately does not refer to the concepts of "intention and negligence"; these concepts receive as a result little attention from academics. These concepts are instead superceded by the concept of "blameworthiness" in Hungarian civil law, (Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1231-1232; Lábady, A magyar magánjog (polgári jog) általános része, 308-309; Bíró, A kötelmi jog és a szerződéstan közös szabályai[6], 466), which is objectively assessed and is differentiated from fault by its individual graduations (Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 48-51). It is also employed in attributing liability to legal persons (Kemenes loc. cit. 1226-1227). Intention and negligence are however encountered in some special provisions. The concept of intent is used in CC § 6 (see above Note 4 under VI.–2:207), in CC § 342(1) (Inoperativeness of contractual clauses which limits or excludes liability for intention or gross negligence)), in CC § 360(4) (limitation period for willful infliction of damage), in CC § 581 (liability of the donor) and above all in insurance law. As regards property insurance CC § 556(1) provides that the insurer is exempt from its payment obligation, upon proof that the damage was intentionally or in a grossly negligent manner, caused by the insured person or by certain persons with whom he is associated with. Proof of intentional or grossly negligent conduct on the part of the insured person does not exempt the insurer from its payment obligation under liability insurance to the injured party, however the insurer has in these circumstances a right to seek reimbursement from the insured person (CC § 559(3)). A similar position is adopted by POLISH tort law. The notion of intention does not appear expressly in the basic rule of CC art. 415, but it is universally recognised that the term "fault" invoked there encompasses both intentional fault and unintentional fault (negligence) (Czachórski, Zobowiązania[9], 212). The distinction between liability arising from intentional fault and liability arising from negligence is vital, as many CC provisions are confined to cases of damage caused intentionally, e.g. CC art. 473 § 2 (invalidity of contract terms excluding liability for damage caused to a creditor intentionally), CC art. 757 (liability of a negotiorum gestor for damage caused trying to save another's property limited to cases of intention or gross negligence), CC art. 827 § 1 (insurer's liability exluded where the insured caused the damage intentionally). The Civil Code avoids defining intentional fault (wina umyślna). In doctrine and case law it is understood as embracing cases where unlawful conduct was aimed at causing the damage (dolus directus) as well as where the tortfeasor did not aim at causing it, but knew that damage would result (dolus eventualis) (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 197). In BULGARIAN tort law, in contrast to negligence, intention is not presumed, (LOA art. 45(2)); proof must be adduced (Konov, Osnovanie na grajdanskata otgovornost, 131; Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast, 373). In cases of intentional fault, a higher compensatory sum will usually be awarded for causing non-economic damage than in cases of simple negligence (Takov, Obzor na deliktnoto pravo na Bulgaria, no. 61 p. 8). The employee is only personally liable to an unlimited monetary extent for damage caused to their employers if they acted in an intentional manner (Labour Code art. 203(2); in all other cases the extent of financial liability is restricted to not more than three times the monthly renumeration (loc. cit. art. 206 no. 1). Other special statutes require (e.g. Ccom art. 631a: Liability for error in filing for insolvency) intention or negligence for the attribution of liability.

6. "Fault" under GERMAN law is comprised of Intention and negligence (CC § 276). However the components of intention are not statutorily defined. It is generally stated that intention connotes knowledge and desire to bring about an unlawful result.The distinctions that are made between intention, dolus directus und dolus eventualis in the criminal law are meaningless in tort law (Medicus, Schuldrecht I[16], no. 306); in tort law dolus eventualis suffices. It is said that a person acts with conditional intent, when he/she accepts the unlawful result as a possible consequence of his act or omission. Advertent or conscious negligence exists when the actor trusts that the damage will not ensue (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[65], § 276, no. 10; Erman [-Westermann], BGB I[11], § 276, no. 7). Intention need only relate to the infringement of another's rights, it is not necessary that it correlate to the economic or non economic loss that results from the infringement of those rights (the "damage" under German law.); CC § 826 provides an exception to this rule (Heinrichs loc. cit.). Intent in civil law presupposes an awareness of the wrongfulness of the act. Therefore, a mistake in law as well as factual error precludes the existence of intent (Heinrichs loc. cit. no. 11). However, special criteria apply, where liability is based on the violation of a protective criminal law (CC § 823[2]) (in this case the law relating to criminal intention is also applicable for private law purposes) (BGH 26 February 1962, NJW 1962, 910; BGH 10 July 1984, NJW 1985, 134, 135). Moreover in order to establish liability under CC § 826, it is not a prerequisite that the defendant acted with the knowledge that his act was morally culpable; knowledge of the factual circumstances which make his actions morally culpable in the eyes of the law is sufficient (BGH 26 March 1962, NJW 1962, 1099, 1100; BGH 13 September 2004, NJW 2004, 3706, 3710). Within the framework of CC § 823(2) a problematic question is whether a person acts intentionally, if he /she wants to violate a protective law but does not intend the subsequent injury. The predominant view is that only the intentional transgression of the protective law is relevant (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 823, no. 60; BGH 20 March 1961, BGHZ 34, 375, 381).

7. The AUSTRIAN CC § 1294 distinguishes between damage which is caused by "malicious intent" and damage caused by "oversight". In interpreting these concepts the courts have strictly adhered to the definitions of "intention" and "negligence" which are found in CP §§ 5(1) and 6(1). Accordingly a person acts intentionally, when he/she wants to bring about a certain state of affairs which corresponds to the ingredients of a tortious cause of action, in this case it suffices that the wrongdoer seriously considers that the realisation of this state of affairs is possible and approves of this result. According to CC § 1294 malicious purpose (intent) is given when the damage is caused knowingly and wilfully. "The knowledge must relate to the unlawfulness as well as to the possibility of occurrence of the harmful result, whereas the wilfulness must only relate to the latter." (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 5/25). As regards CC § 1295(2) (Liability for intentional infliction of damage considered a violation of public morals) it is regarded as sufficient, that the wrongdoer forsees the occurrence of the result and approves of it.(dolus eventualis) (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI[3], § 1295, no. 146; OGH 20 May 1992, SZ 65/76). A person who hopes that the damaging result will not occur, acts negligently (Koziol loc. cit. no. 5/27). Since the decision of OGH 1 January 1951, SZ 24/5 regarding the violation of a protective law, fault only has to relate to the transgression of the norm and not to the harmful result. As regards the violation of public morals it is deemed sufficient that the wrongdoer has knowledge of the circumstances that would entail an infringement of public morals (Bydlinski, JBl 1986, 631). In contrast, according to a decision of OGH 31 August 2005, 9 ObA 16/05a the intentional violation of occupational health and safety provisons in social security law will not suffice to deprive the employer of its privileged position as to liability by categorising it as intentional damage; rather it is necessary that the harmful result be intended. Incidentially other situations where intent has been deemed to be present include, a car dealer who was found to have acted with intent in respect of the purchaser and the bank which financed the buyer's purchase, where he prevaricated about the year of manufacture of the vehicle, the longer prescription period under CC § 1489(2) applies in respect of the damages resulting from the loan default (OGH 30 June 1987, WBl 1987, 273).

8. The GREEK CC regards intention as a pillar of fault, intention is, however, not defined. For a long period, two competing doctrines were championed in academic teaching. According to one exposition, the question of whether intention exists ought to depend on whether the wrongdoer foresaw the unlawful result and nonetheless continued to act, the alternative view propounded is to regard as decisive the question of whether the wrongdoer wished or intended the prohibited result. The current prevailing view is that intention is given, if the wrongdoer has forseen the unlawful result and has assimilated its occurence into his will; it is not necessary that he intends the unlawful result (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 330, nos. 13-14). In particular Greek law distinguishes between the following different forms of intention. Dolus directus is given when the wrongdoer recognises the unlawful result as the necessary consequence of his actions; on the other hand dolus eventulais arises when the wrongdoer envisages the occurrence of the unlawful result merely as possible and approvingly accepts it. It is important for the affirmation of intent in each case that the wrongdoer acts knowing that his acts or omissions are prohibited (Stathopoulos loc. cit. no. 21; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 158): the existence of a factual error as well as an error as to the prohibited nature of the act preclude the existence of intention (ErmAK [-Michaelides-Nouaros], art. 330, no. 18

9. The PORTUGUESE CC art. 483(1) also differentiates between intentional and merely culpable tortious acts (meramente culposos). The former are characterised by virtue of the intent to cause damage (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 506-507). Intention is a manifestation of the culpa grave. It features in many contects- also in the context of civil law, but especially in connection with the quantum of damages owed- (CC arts. 494, 497(2), 506(2), 507(2) and 570(1); see Almeida Costa loc. cit. 496-497, 507-508, 534-535; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 568-569; Pessoa Jorge, Ensaio sobre os pressupostos da responsabilidade civil, 361, 364). Exceptions from the basic principle, that intentional as well as negligent tortious acts establish a right to damages are found in CC arts. 814(1), 815(1) and 1681(1). However these provisions concern issues of contract law and family law and do not concern tort law. The knowledge of acting in an unlawful manner is a prerequisite for the affirmation of intention (Almeida Costa loc. cit. 533), as a consequence the mistaken belief that there was an emergency or some other justifiable ground for acting precludes the existence of intention. A distinction is made in Portugal also between dolo directo, dolo indirecto und dolo eventual, cf. CP art. 14(1)-(3); Almeida Costa loc. cit. 533; Antunes Varela loc. cit.; Pessoa Jorge loc. cit. 322). Dolus directus was affirmed in the following cases e.g. a person, who removed the boundary stone from a plot of land and thereby claimed that the boundary was incorrectly constituted (STJ 18 April 2006). The Portuguese understanding of dolus indirectus (dazu Almeida Costa und Pessoa Jorge loc. cit.; CA Coimbra 18 January 2006) largerly corresponds to the rule anchored in VI.–3:101(b);

The comprehension of dolus eventualis is more akin to the definition of under the DCFR (see above for Comment D10 and also CA Evora 18 June 2002).

10. DUTCH law regards intention (opzet) und negligence (onachtzaamheid) as mutually exclusive polar opposites. In particular civil law differentiates between numerous graduations of fault (for an in-depth consideration cf the contributions in Haak and Koot, Bewuste roekeloosheid in het privaatrecht): opzet (Absicht), grove Schuld (gross negligence) or. roekeloosheid („recklessness“ in the sense of carelessness.), voorwaardelijk opzet (dolus eventualis) und lichte schuld (slight fault). Opzet in a criminal law context does not necessarily have the same meaning as that prevailing under private law (Haak and Koot loc. cit. 1-11). It is unclear and is matter of contention in which area of private law opzet is actually required. It has even been suggested that the various categories of wrongful acts found in CC art. 6:162, also adhere to varying requirements at the level of the imputation of liability, such that the "infringement of a right" can only invariably be given in the case of an intentional act. This view is held because in the case of negligent actions liability is imputed under the alternative heading in CC art. 6:162(3) "according to generally accepted standards" (van Maanen, Onrechtmatige Daad, 210-213; otherwise by Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[12], nos. 69-73 pp. 92-95). Of course, the distinction between opzet and mere negligence does not attain practical importance under this rubric (this area is concerned solely with therotical questions), rather at the stage where causation is investigated (CC art. 6:98; see the Notes under VI.–4:101 (General rule) in conjunction with this topic),within the framework of curtailing claims on the grounds of contributory negligence (CC art. 6:101), liability for immaterial damage (CC art. 6:106) and within the area of the claim to recourse on the part of the social insurance authority (CC arts. 6:108 and 6:109).

11. ESTONIAN LOA § 104(5) provides: "Intent is the will to bring about an unlawful consequence upon the creation, performance or termination of an obligation". Of course it is propounded that this definition is solely concerned with the dolus directus; the dolus indirectus was deliberately left undefined, because the strategy was adopted of leaving conceptual elucidation to academic erudition and case law (Lahe, Fault in the Law of Delict, passim; Lahe. Juridica 2002, 30–36. LATVIAN CC art. 1641 sagt: "As wrongful intent shall be understood every intentional harm".

12. In the NORDIC Countries intention and negligence are, from the perspective of the provisions concerning liability, are placed in principle on the same level. Following the expansion of the traditional borders of tort law, it is now easierto determine the components of the intent to cause intentional damage than for negligent causation of damage. For example in Swedish case law, decisions have been handed down regarding compensation for the pain and suffering of relatives and on liability as to the procurement of a breach of contract (see above, Note 12 under VI.–2:211 (Loss upon inducement of non-performance of obligation)). Of further importance is the fact that according to DANISH Damages Act § 19(2) a private individual is only be liable for damage to an insured thing, if intention or gross negligence are present. The criminal and civil legal concept of intention should be regarded as identical contentwise (in any event according to Swedish Literature: Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 124; Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 46 and 58; see also HD 12 September 2005, NJA 2005, 608). The understanding of direct and indirect intent coincide with the definitions contained in VI.–3:101(a) and (b); in respect of the second alternative in lit. (b) („knowing that such damage … will almost certainly be caused“) one speaks of an intent based on indifference, a concept which is espoused in the stead of the former socalled dolus eventualis (S-Karnov 2005/06 [-Rekke], Brottsbalk, no. 2 p. 2502). Apart from direct and indirect intent, Danish law recognized the socalled intent based on probability (which depends on what the wrongdoer recognised as a preponderant possibility) along with the intention based on risk, which can be likened to dolus eventualis (D-Karnov 2004 IV [-Elmer], Straffelov, no. 86 p. 4952; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 52)

VI.–3:102: Negligence

A person causes legally relevant damage negligently when that person causes the damage by conduct which either:

(a) does not meet the particular standard of care provided by a statutory provision whose purpose is the protection of the person suffering the damage from that damage; or
(b) does not otherwise amount to such care as could be expected from a reasonably careful person in the circumstances of the case.

COMMENTS

A. General

Scope. This Article defines negligence as a ground of accountability for the purposes of the present Book. It is not a question of creating a self-standing "tort of negligence" but rather (as has been done for intention in the preceding Article) of fleshing out the notion of negligence referred to in VI.–1:101 (Basic rule). The present Article is only concerned with negligent or careless conduct. Consequently, it does not address cases in which liability is derived from infringement of a statutory duty which does not revolve around a requirement to exercise care. Where liability is exclusively based on the fact that the level of safety demanded by statute has not been achieved (as may be the case, for example, in respect of certain statutes concerned with accidents at work), one has left the realm of negligence and is concerned instead with a specific form of liability without (intention or) negligence, see VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage).

"by conduct". Negligence requires conduct controlled by will. An unconscious act, for instance movement while asleep, under narcosis or under the influence of a sudden apoplectic seizure, is not "conduct" within the meaning of VI.–3:101 (Intention) or the present Article. The same goes for an omission in a situation in which the affected party could not have recognised or removed the danger even when exercising all due care.

Illustration 1
On a foggy winter evening a boat capsizes on a lake. The occupant calls for help but the fog is too dense for his cries to be heard. It cannot be said of a woman walking along the shore - who does not hear the calls and therefore does not act - that she "omitted" to undertake a rescue effort; in fact there was no "conduct" at all on her part in relation to the person drowning.

Illustration 2
However, the situation is different where an old man who is hard of hearing is shovelling snow from the pavement and without hearing the warning cry of a passer-by approaching him from behind, hits her across the face with the shovel. His bad hearing does not alter the fact that the motion with the shovel was conduct relevant to the danger and controlled by will. Due to the fact that the man was aware of his bad hearing, he even acted negligently: he should have been aware of the danger and should have looked behind him before swinging the shovel..

Sources of duties of careful conduct. This rule mirrors the two sources which in every Member State generate the duties of careful conduct in relation to the interests of another protected by the law on non-contractual liability for damage: statutory provisions (sub-paragraph (a)) and the general precept of not harming another (neminem laedere, sub-paragraph (b)). A general duty of care is implied here. Previous generations formulated it by referring to the conduct expected of a bonus paterfamilias or reasonable man.

Positive acts and omissions. The Article relates – in both alternatives – as much to omissions as it does to positive acts. This follows from the use of the word "conduct" (see Annex 1 – conduct includes "not doing something"). A person who omits doing something acts negligently if he or she either does not take the preventive measures that must be taken in the interests of the injured person under statutory provisions or where he or she does not do something that a reasonably careful person in the circumstances of the case would have done to protect the injured person. It is not possible to draw a clearly-defined line between positive acts and omissions. The draft therefore deals with both forms of conduct in principally the same fashion.

Persons under eighteen. In relation to the requirements of due care to be placed on youths and children under sub-paragraph (b) of the Article, special rules are to be found in VI.–3:103 (Persons under eighteen) paragraph (1). While children who have not yet attained their seventh year may indeed likewise be capable of acting negligently, the consequences of such action will not be imputed to them under VI.–3:103(2).

Mentally handicapped persons. In cases concerning mentally disabled persons, who cannot distinguish between right and wrong as a result of their disability, there is a different starting point. Such persons may also readily deviate from the standard of care, which according to VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by children or supervised persons) is to be observed in principle by everyone. The only requirement is that it is "conduct" controlled by will. Under the circumstances in VI.–5:301 (Mental incompetence), for which the party claimed against bears the burden of proof, a mental disability is a defence that, depending on the circumstances of the case, can lead to a reduction or exclusion of liability. The rule relates mainly to mentally disabled adults, but can also be of benefit to mentally disabled adolescents, who fall short of the behavioural standard for their age group. Of course, the relief from liability only embraces cases where intention or negligence is the source of accountability, and not a possible basis of responsibility within one of the particular situations governed by the second Section of the third Chapter of these basic rules.

> While sitting at the steering wheel, X suddenly and unforeseeably suffers a brain haemorrhage. While he remains conscious and realises that he is steering the car into the middle of a lane of traffic, he is no longer capable of doing anything to stop this due to the brain haemorrhage. X acts negligently within the meaning of VI.–3:102. He is also not entitled to any defence under VI.–5:301 (Mental incompetence), since he fully recognises that he is acting improperly. Conversely, had X been rendered unconscious, under VI.–3:205 (Accountability for damage caused by motor vehicles) he would only be liable for the subsequent accident if he was not merely the driver, but also the owner of the vehicle.

Physically disabled persons. Physically disabled persons are subject to the same requirements of due care as physically able persons, to the extent that they are aware of their physical disability, and their conduct must be adjusted accordingly, see Illustration 2 above. A person who must anticipate sudden but short-lived losses of vision due to a chronic circulatory disorder is not permitted to sit at the wheel of a car.

B. Duties of care required by statute (sub-paragraph (a))

Statutory provisions. A person acts negligently where they do not behave as prescribed by statute in a given situation, if a danger is realised thereby, the prevention of which is the aim of the law for the protection of the injured person. The meaning of a "statute" under VI.–3:102 is not elucidated by these rules. Read with VI.–7:102 (Statutory provisions), the term "statute" in this article has the meaning given to it in the relevant applicable law. However, it should be emphasised that "statute" covers not only primary legislation, but also secondary legislation made by central and regional governments (regulations, etc.) and by local authorities (e.g. bye-laws). On the other hand, guidelines issued by social insurance bodies for the prevention of accidents are, as a rule, not "statutory" provisions.

Criminal law provisions. If the statute is part of the criminal law, it is sufficient that the person liable objectively failed to behave in the manner required by the statutory norm. It is not necessary that the person can also in fact be punished for an offence. It may well be, for example, that in that particular jurisdiction criminal responsibility commences only at the age of 16 or that criminal prosecution depends on circumstances that have nothing to do with the reparation of damage in civil law.

Mere references to the duty to act with reasonable care. From the perspective of the law on negligence one must differentiate four types of statutory provision. There are, first, statutory provisions which merely involve a general requirement to take care not to violate the physical integrity, rights or interests of another. Provisions of this type are irrelevant for the purposes of sub-paragraph (a) because they do not say more than is already to be found in sub-paragraph (b). In other words, statutory provisions of this type set down no "particular" standard of care. For instance, provisions that state no more than that "negligent bodily injury" is criminally punishable belong to this group.

Provisions reducing the standard of care. Secondly, there are provisions whose effect is that in defined situations or for defined persons (e.g. parents and children or spouses in their relation to each other) compliance with a lower standard of care than the general one suffices. Typically, such provisions prescribe liability for damage caused only in cases of gross negligence (and of course in cases of intention). They take priority over the general requirement of care by constituting special regimes. That is taken care of in VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (c). To the extent that employees are also personally liable vis à vis third parties under the applicable law only in the case of grave fault, in particular only where they are charged with gross negligence, VI.–7:104 (Liability of employees, employers, trade unions and employers' associations) is to be taken into account.

Provisions requiring a higher standard of care. A third class of statutory provision is one which requires persons undertaking defined activities to comply with a higher standard of care than the general standard. The failure to reach the stipulated higher standard then amounts to negligence. Of course, such provisions must have the establishment of duties of care as their subject-matter; they must not impose on their addressees an obligation to ensure that a particular state of affairs (a particular outcome) occurs. This is because provisions of the latter type do not refer to the notion of care at all. They are therefore, as mentioned earlier, excluded from this Article and dealt with in VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage). One thinks, for example, of provisions relating to safety equipment for machines which are operated by workers. It is indeed correct that the borderline between the protective laws embraced by sub-paragraph (a) of the present Article and by VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage) is not always easily drawn, either in theory or in practice. This is because there may be statutory rules capable of being subsumed under both provisions. For instance, a statutory rule might prescribe that for certain operations a second heart-lung machine must be available in the operating theatre. Such duties of conduct have a double function because they indeed specify a special standard of care in relation to the protected interest, and simultaneously call for a certain state of affairs. As a result, in such a case the injured person can invoke two grounds of accountability. However, this does not greatly affect the practical result. This is down to the fact that VI.–5:302 (Event beyond control) also applies to VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage).

Provisions particularising the general duty of care. Fourthly, a number of statutory provisions have as their function a particularisation or concretisation of the general duty of care for a defined situation. They are the focus of the rule in VI.–3:102. Typical examples are provided by provisions of building and planning law and of commercial law, by rules on earning a livelihood, by provisions on health protection and by the rules in road traffic regulations.

Adherence to the provision does not automatically exclude liability in negligence. Provisions of this type, however, are not a carte blanche for acting negligently in a given case. Where the average person under the circumstances must recognise that adherence to a specific statutory safety requirement is insufficient in a given situation and where statute leaves a corresponding discretion to act, then a person in that situation must use the discretion as a reasonably careful person in the circumstances of the case would have done.

A regulation on the protection of woods requires farmers burning stubble in their fields in autumn to observe a minimum distance of 300 metres from the nearest wood when igniting the stubble. B complies with that requirement. However, on the day in question an exceptionally strong wind prevails and B ought to have appreciated that the minimum distance laid down in the statute would not suffice under these weather conditions. The wood catches fire. B has acted negligently according to sub-paragraph (b). Compliance with the statutory provision does not relieve B from the need to comply with the general standard of care.

Illustration 5
Things are of course different where statute practically prohibits taking reliable safety measures. For instance, one thinks of provisions for the protection of buildings of historic importance and natural monuments, like for example a medieval tree of justice, which may not be felled although this would be the only available safety measure for the protection of passers-by.

Prohibitory norms and norms of care. Where statute merely provides for a prohibition, but does not articulate any specific duties of care, then the issue of negligence is judged according to the rule in sub-paragraph (b), which of course does not rule out considering the values of the prohibitory norm in the context of the general norm of care.

Illustration 6

A road traffic sign which indicates a one-way street and accordingly prohibits entry into the street from the exit is masked by a parked lorry. As A does not know this area and there are no other indications by which she might recognise that the road is a one-way street (as would be the case if there were indicative road markings or the cars on her side of the road were all parked against her direction of passage), she does not act negligently if she turns into the road and an accident results. That does not exclude the argument, however, that the level of care required in recognising traffic signs will be rather high.

The purpose of the statute. The purpose of the statutory norm of care infringed must be to safeguard the injured person from the legally relevant damage, which he has actually suffered. Hence the purpose of the statute must not simply be either the assurance of protection in general or predominantly of the public interest, or the protection of the injured person from a damage other than the one which has in fact occurred.

Illustration 7

A, B and C are witnesses to an accident in which X is badly injured. It would have been an easy matter for them to render first aid to X and to alert the emergency services. They neglect to do that. A, B and C are not liable under these rules if, even though breach of that duty to render first aid at the place where the accident has taken place constitutes a crime, the duty to render assistance existed solely for reasons of public interest. This is the practice in most Member States.

Illustration 8

There exists a statutory obligation to keep animals transported on the deck of a ship caged up. The purpose of this statute is to prevent the transmission of disease amongst animals. Its purpose is not to prevent the animals from falling overboard, though it has that collateral effect. In regard to the statutory provision at least, therefore, there is consequently no negligence when a failure to cage animals leads to their loss when they fall overboard. That of course does not exclude the possibility of recognising, aside from the statute, a breach of the general duty of care under sub-paragraph (b).

C. The general duty of care (sub-paragraph (b))

An objective standard. Sub-paragraph (b) deals with the second form of negligence. Conduct is negligent when it does not satisfy the care which must be exercised under the circumstances of the case by a reasonably prudent person. The standard is an objective one. It does not turn on the individual abilities of the person acting, rather it is based on what can be reasonably expected of that person: a dentist cannot escape liability by claiming to be a slow learner and very forgetful. Persons commencing their professional lives must likewise live up to the standard of the competent professional (and likewise the newly qualified driver must reach the standard of the more experienced), although it would be wrong to measure them by the standard of the most capable.

Conclusive list of deciding factors impossible. The question of what reasonably careful conduct means under the circumstances of each individual case is affected by several factors which are beyond conclusive enumeration. On the one hand, maintaining concentration is necessary because this facilitates the awareness of danger. Whoever turns a blind eye to the foreseeable negative consequences of actions can only be saved by sheer luck from harming others.

Illustration 9
Where a construction company lays underground pipelines for drinking water, it must not only obtain the plans from the other utility companies on the exact location of their cables and pipes, in fact it must also check whether the site plan specifications are accurate.

What actually has to done does not ultimately hinge on a weighing up of the costs and benefits of prevention. The type and extent of the imminent damage serve to dictate the type and extent of the measures necessary for its prevention. In some cases information to the public or a simple indication of a particular source of danger will be sufficient, in others the source of danger itself must be confronted. Also relevant is whether there was a particular close relationship or a relationship of trust between the person acting and the injured party, since fiduciary duties and similar factors can raise the degree of necessary care. Other relevant factors may be whether risks of private or commercial life are involved, whether children or only adults are to be anticipated as being in proximity to the source of danger, whether the relevant risk was known or arose for the first time etc. The conceivable situations are unlimited. The assessment of negligence in particular cases must therefore remain with the courts, whose assessment of what constitutes careful conduct or conduct without due care in a given set of facts may quite properly change over time. Generally it is of course to be borne in mind that the requirements of necessary care may not be arbitrarily raised. This would not only diminish the distinction with "strict" liability, but also emphatically hinder human activity; people would scarcely be able to move freely, constantly in fear of possibly encountering liability.

Illustration 10
During the warm-up before a volleyball game a ball is inadvertently hit high into the tiers of spectators, where it hits a visitor so hard in the eye that she is blinded. The distance and arrangement of the spectator area by the club was in conformity with the structural safety measures; neither the player nor the organising club ought to have perceived any need for further measures. No negligent physical injury exists.

Organisational defects. A particular form of negligence is seen in the notion of what is sometimes termed defective organisation. It is not only the specific safety risks associated with events with mass attendance which are involved here. Here, emphaisis is particularly placed on the duty of all large organisations to arrange their work processes in such a way that third parties are not endangered by problems of internal communication, the hierarchy of authority or decision-making. In practice legal persons in particular bear the burden of such organisational duties. They are subject to them independent of the organisational duties to which the natural persons acting on their behalf are subject.

NOTES

I. The concept of negligence in general

1. According to the concept of negligence under FRENCH law, a faute d´imprudence ou de négligence (CC art. 1383) is established if the defendant makes a mistake which a very prudent person (a homme très diligent) would not have made under the same circumstances,: a faute is given even in the case of the slightest fault (culpa levissima)

(Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 728 p. 711). Whilst the standard of care is indeed abstract, in that, the defendant's conduct will be judged against the standard of a bon père de famille, consideration will also be given, where appropriate, as to how the bon père de famille would have acted, in the event that he, for example, had the same occupation or was of the same age as the defendant and found himself in the same situation (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats (2004/2005), no. 6707). However, there is no exoneration from liability on the grounds of lack of capacity (CC art. 489-2). In this respect, no differentiation is made between adults and minors, nor is one made in respect of a person suffering sous l'empire d'un trouble mental (Terré/Simler/Lequette loc. cit. no. 733 pp. 715-716) be it merely temporary or permanent. Needless to say, the prerequisite of liability for this class of individuals remains the identification of faute (Cass.civ. 24 June 1987, Bull.civ. 1987, II, no. 137 p. 78). The faute d'imprudence ou de négligence in civil law is more wide ranging than the faute non-intentionnelle in criminal law: In spite of the fact that the criminal law judges have expressly rejected the latter, the judges of the civil law still remain free to rely on the former (Cass.civ. 30 January 2001, Bull.civ. 2001, I, no. 19; JCP 2001, I, 338, obs. Viney). Moreover CP art. 121-3(4) has appreciably modified the former prevailing doctrine that the concept of faute is uniform in both the civil law and criminal law.

2. The test taken to establish negligence in BELGIUM revolves around the assessment of whether a person acted in a manner contrary to that expected of the ordinary prudent person acting with foresight (the bonus pater familias), (van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 298), who finds himself in the same situation as the defendant (Cass. 30 April 1976, RW 1976-77, 1709). More specifically, a distinction is made between external and internal factors. However, only the external circumstances are taken into account. They include, for example, the time and place of the occurence, the prevailing weather conditions and the social status and education of the defendant. The internal factors include age, sex, intelligence, character and temperament (van Gerven loc. cit. 300). A faute is committed only by a person with capacity to commit the tort and to whose act or ommissions tortious liability can be imputed. This is known as the subjective element of faute (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene, TPR 2000, 1551, 1688). The capacity of children is determined in each individual case, for adults suffering from a mental impairment CC art. 1386*bis* provides for an obligation to compensate where it is just and reasonable.

3. Under MALTESE CC art. 1032(1) "a person shall be deemed to be in fault if, in his own acts, he does not use the prudence, diligence, and attention of a bonus paterfamilias".

4. In SPAIN, culpa o negligencia (CC art. 1902) is defined, by reference to the notion contained in CC art. 1104, as the infringement of a duty of care.(z.B. TS 9 April 1963, RAJ 1963 (1) no. 1964 p. 1217; Reglero Campos, Responsabilidad civil[3], 235; Peña López, La culpabilidad en la responsabilidad civil extracontractual, 443). The applicable standard of care is defined in a corresponding manner by case law and legal scholarship by recourse to CC art. 1104(2), which requires that a person acts in the same manner as a buen padre de familia would have acted in the circumstances of the case. The standard of care is determined abstractly according to objective criteria (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Badosa Coll], Código Civil II[2], 41; Díez-Picazo, Derecho de daños, 360). The judiciary has however heightened the required standard of care on many occasions (see TS 8 April 1992, RAJ 1992 [2] no. 3187 p. 4202 and Albaladejo [-Santos Briz], Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales XXIV, 433). This was realised essentially by three steps: by case law which cut away the possibility of escaping liability within the regime of CC art. 1903 (liability for others) by proof of an absence of culpa in eligendo or culpa in educando (e.g. TS 26 January 1990, RAJ 1990 (1) no. 69 p. 115), by case law which permitted exculpation from liability in cases of an increased situation of danger only by proof of an "exhaustion of carefulness" so that even in the context of CC art. 1902 ultimately only force majeure remained as a ground of defence (e.g. TS 20 May 2005, RAJ 2005 (5) no. 6693 p. 14224; see von Bar, The Common European Law of Torts II, nos. 360-363), and by case law which clearly enlarged CC art. 1908 beyond its literal terms and at the same time reconstruing it as concerned with a "strict liability"(TS 14 March 2005, RAJ 2005 (2) no. 2226 p. 4747). In this manner the field of application for culpa clásica was dramatically narrowed (an important scope of application remain, however, injuries arising in sport and leisure time, see e.g. TS 9 March 2006, RAJ 2006 (2) no. 1882 p. 4474 and CA Pontevedra 11 May 2006, BDA JUR 2006/158510). In one case (TS 22 September 2004, RAJ 2004 (4) no. 5681 p. 11634) in which a fire had resulted in a loss of jobs the Supreme Court upheld liability for non-economic loss which the employees suffered in consequence on the basis of "a sort of strict liability" and even stressed that "the notion of fault [has] been widened to embrace [voluntary] acts which ... are done carefully and lawfully, but entail a damaging outcome that results in deprecation of the whole act". As regards risky occupational or commercial activities, the yardstick of the bonus paterfamiliasis is not decisive, rather a higher standard of care is imposed, measured according to the conduct of a member of a relevant group of experts in each case (e.g. TS 9 April 1963, RAJ 1963 (1) no. 1964 p. 1217; TS 28 April 1992, RAJ 1992 (3) no. 4466 p. 5917; TS 23 March 1993, RAJ 1993 (2) no. 2545 p. 3291; TS 3 May 1997, RAJ 1997 (2) no. 3668 p. 5546).

5. Under the rubric of negligence ITALIAN law differentiates between (CP art. 43(1)) colpa generica (causing damage through inattentiveness, carelessness or solecism) and the colpa specifica (causing damage which results from breach of a statutory rule of beahaviour). Colpa generica postulates the forseeability of resulting damage and the possibility of its avoidance and both are decisive. The test for forseeability is based on the knowledge of the average citizen and on the special knowledge of the defendant which extends beyond the former. It is sometimes propounded that, in individual cases, allowances can be made for below average knowledge or ability (Alpa, Trattato di diritto civile IV, 246; Bussani, La colpa soggettiva, 1-25). From a theoretical viewpoint, this proposition is not easily reconciled with the prevailing objective definition of negligence which legal scholarship is equally inclined to endorse (Bianca, Diritto civile V, 576; Alpa, loc. cit. 240).

6. One of the basic principles in the HUNGARIAN CC § 4(4) is formulated to require that, in the context of private law, unless this statute imposes stricter requirements, a person must conduct him- or herself in a manner that can be generally expected in the given situation. No person should benefit from his own blameworthy conduct; but such conduct does not per se preclude a claim in damages against another who for his or her part acted in a blameworthy manner. An autonomous theory of negligence has not developed. Even in academic commentary the concept of negligence is only rarely defined (e.g. by Lábady, A magyar magánjog (polgári jog) általános része, 309). The reason for this is that Hungarian tort law utilises the concept of the objectively assessed "blameworthiness" instead of intention and negligence. The defendant must prove the absence of blameworthiness (CC § 339(1)). Nonetheless, it is also propounded that the wording in CC § 4(4) epitomises the Hungarian equivalent to the bonus et diligens paterfamilias or reasonable man which are features of other European legal orders (Lábady loc. cit. 144-145; Bíró and Lenkovics, Általános tanok, 98-101) and accordingly, this provision has to be drawn on in order to interpret CC § 339(1) (Lábady loc. cit.). Under POLISH tort law negligence (wina nieumyślna, niedbalstwo) is tied to the notion of due care. Some commentators consider conduct is negligent, if it does not meet the required standard of care and is reproachable in the circumstances of the case. Whereas the compliance with the required standard of care is judged by reference to the objective or abstract touchstone of the careful person (careful driver, careful doctor, etc.), disregarding strictly personal characteristics of the person, reproachability depends on those personal characteristics, e.g. the state of mind (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 197-198). Other writers simply equate negligence with lack of due care in the particular circumstances of the case, subject to a reservation for the general requisites for fault such as age or soundness of mind (Czachórski, Zobowiązania[10], 238-240). The required standard of care is set out in CC art. 355 § 1, according to which the debtor is obliged to take the care generally required in such circumstances; CC art. 355 § 2 raises the standard of care as it provides that the due care of a debtor pursuing a business activity is to be determined having regard to the professional character of the activity. Despite the use of the term "debtor" the majority of commentators as well as the case law treat the rule as applicable also to tort liability (Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 197; Pietrzykowski [-Safjan], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 355 p. 847). Art. 6 of the SLOVENIAN LOA displays cognate tendencies The remaining codifications in Central and Eastern Europe also avoid a statutory definition of negligence and also forgo a definition of the required standard of care. However, here it is also commonplace to define negligence according to objective criteria (for a detailed exposition e.g. for BULGARIA Konov, Osnovanie na grajdanskata otgovornost, 133).

7. Under the GERMAN CC § 276(2) a person acts negligently if he or she disregards the standard of due care expected in the circumstances. The decisive yardstick is not typical care; rather it must be emphasised that due care must be taken. In contrast to the criminal law, an abstract objective yardstick is utilised (BGH 21 May 1963, BGHZ 39, 281, 283; BGH 17 March 1981, BGHZ 80, 186, 193; BGH 26 January 1989, BGHZ 106, 323, 330; BGH 20 October 1987, NJW 1988, 909; BGH 11 April 2000, NJW 2000, 2812; BGH 13 February 2001, NJW 2001, 1786). Consequently, in principle, it does not depend on the care that the individual defendant can muster up (Medicus, Schuldrecht I[16], no. 309). Special knowledge or skills of the defendant raise the required standard of care to a higher plane. Moreover, pursuing a particular occupation, belonging to a particular age group and level of education are significant factors in determining the standard of due care, as are legal provisions (for example, road traffic legislation), regulations pertaining to prevention of accidents, technical norms and even rules of sport, if the latter can assist in concretising the concept of negligence (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[66], § 276, no. 15). Important elements of the test of negligence are: forseeability and avoidability of the unlawful result (Erman [-Westermann], BGB I[11], § 276, no. 13). Forseeability relates to the injury, not to the damaging consequences.(Heinrichs loc. cit. no. 20). An error as to the prohibited nature of an act can equally ground liability in negligence. A gradual differentiation is made between gross, mere or slight negligence. Gross negligence denotes conduct which has deviated, to an unusually high degree, from the required standard of care i.e, there is a disregard of circumstances which would have been clear to anyone in the same situation (BGH 11 May 1953, BGHZ 10, 14, 16). In addition CC § 277 recognises "the care, that the defendant would have customarily exercised in his own affairs" (the diligentia quam in suis rebus adhiberi solet).

8. AUSTRIAN law also recognises that intention and negligence are constituents of fault (CC § 1294); negligence is established when an objective standard of due care is subjectively flouted on the wrongdoer's part (OGH 1 March 1988, ZVR 1989/64, RS0022399). The requirements of care as developed in case law are, comparatively speaking, lenient (z.B. OGH 10 April 1997, ZVR 1998/92, RS0107618 und OGH 26 March 1987, ZVR 1989/28, RS0023787). In respect of a number of discrete professions, for which particular expertise is required, stricter standards of care are imposed, (CC § 1299); for example for lawyers (OGH 11 November 1971, EvBl 1972/124, RS0038663 and for medical consultants (OGH 4 February 1959, JBl 1960, 188, RS0026598: the skill and knowledge of a general practitioner is not measured against that of a consultants.).

9. GREEK CC art. 330 tallies with the German CC § 276(2). A person, who disregards the standard of due care, is negligent. An objective standard of care applies (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 330, no. 30). The care required to be complied with, is that which an average member of the profession or average citizen would exercise as the case may be.(Stathopoulos loc. cit. no. 33; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 160).

10. PORTUGUESE law also defines negligence as the disregard of the standard of due care (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 533; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 573; STJ 2 February 2006). There is a distinction made between culpa consciente und culpa inconsciente. "Conscious" negligence is established when an individual, who knows that he or she behaves in an improper manner but owing to carelessness or over confidence does not amend his or her behaviour accordingly. In contrast, "unconscious" negligence is given when a person, owing to carelessness or inattentiveness, does not realise that he or she will probably cause damage to another by the conduct (Antunes Varela loc. cit. 573; Pessoa Jorge, Ensaio sobre os pressupostos da responsabilidade civil, 331). The extent of the required standard of care is derived from CC arts. 487(2) and 799(2); the decisive factor is the question of what a good father would have done or would have omitted to do, if he found himself in the same situation as the tortfeasor (STJ 19 September 2006). A slight degree of negligence suffices (STJ 27 May 1997, BolMinJus 467 [1997] 565). Ordinary care is not a determining factor, rather the pertinent question is what measures were necessary in the circumstances to avoid causing the damage (Antunes Varela loc. cit. 574; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], art. 487(2) no. 2; STJ 23 September 1998, CJ (ST) VI [1998-3] 32; STJ 12 February 2004 and STJ 30 October 2002). Nevertheless, and notwithstanding the special care requirements in particular occupations, if a doctor acts according to what is customary in the practise of surgery but the results of his performance were harmful to a patient, this will not be a case of medical negligence (CA Lisbon 27 October 1998, CJ XXIII [1998-4] 130). In respect of the standard of care of lawyers see STJ 10 May 2001.

11. In DUTCH law while the distinction between intention and negligence is not a facet of the basic norm of tort law (CC art. 6:162), the disparity between the two grounds for the attribution of liability plays a decisive role in an array of other regulations, e.g. in the context of CC art. 6:98 (Definition of the nature of damage for which liability to pay compensation arises), CC art. 6:101 (reduction of damages owing to contributory negligence), CC art. 6:106 (Liability for non-pecuniary loss), CC art. 6:108 (Right of the social insurer to initiate an action for contribution) and CC art. 6:109 (reduction in liaibility in the case of slight fault). The Code only uses the term negligence (nalatigheid) in company law (CC arts. 2:9, 2:138 and 2:48), and not in tort law. The concept remains undefined under company law.

12. ESTONIAN LOA art. 104(3) adopts a contrasting position ("Carelessness is failure to exercise necessary care") and CC art. 104(4) ("Gross negligence is failure to exercise necessary care to a material extent"). A person is negligent, if he or she does not conduct himself or herself as a reasonably careful person would have acted in the given situation. LOA art. 1050(2) adds that liability cannot be attibuted to individuals, who lack capacity to recognise the wrongfulness of their actions, unless they had put themselves in this position as a result of their fault. Legal scholarship derives from this the premise that the concept of negligence is subjective and therefore it is argued that account should be taken of the personal characteristics of the actor (Lahe, Fault in the Law of Delict, passim; Lahe, Juridica International 2004, 108; Lahe, Juridica 2002, 30; Lahe, Juridica International 2001, 125. LATVIAN CC art. 1644(1) provides: "If a person inflicts harm upon another without wrongful intent, if such person is at fault for the wrong, then he or she acted negligently". A differentiation is made between gross and ordinary negligence (CC arts. 1644(2), 1645 and 1646). Ordinary negligence suffices for the imposition of liability in tort (CC art. 1649(1)). "Ordinary negligence shall be considered to be that lack of care and due diligence as must be observed by any reasonably prudent and careful person" (CC art. 1646). LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.246(1) differentiates as per VI.–3:102 between statutory specifications of negligence and the "general duty of care".

13. In the NORDIC countries, there is no statutory definition of negligence. Nonetheless, there is consensus that negligence should be defined objectively, therefore, in principle, no account is taken of the personal characteristics and abilities of the wrongdoer (Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 45; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 61; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 55). In respect of straightforward activities SWEDISH case law appears to make an exception (e.g. Swedish HD 14 August 1948, NJA 1948, 489 [illustration 2 above: negligence denied; in more detail e.g. Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 138 and Vinding Kruse loc. cit. 128] as well as DANISH Western CA 16 October 1967, UfR 1968, 133). Apart from this state of affairs, it will depend, in the abstract, on how a reasonable person would have acted in the same situation. In clarifying the concept of negligence, recourse is also had to statutory provisions, public policy, customs and prior case law (Bengtsson and Strömbäck loc. cit. 46). If the wrongdoer knew that an accident had already occured on an earlier occasion, it is expected that he or she take particular care in acting (FINNISH Supreme Court 17 June 1981, HD 1981 II 84). In an overall weighting, account is taken of the probability of damage, the type and extent of the probable damage, the avoidability of the damage and the recognition of the respective dangers for wrongdoer and victim (Hellner and Johansson loc. cit. 130; SWEDISH HD 4 June 1981, NJA 1981, 683; HD 9 March 1967, NJA 1967, 164 and HD 14 April 1987, NJA 1987, 222). Socially desirable conduct is treated less strictly than anti-social behaviour (Swedish HD 25 June 1958, NJA 1958, 461; (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 44; Vinding Kruse loc. cit. 52).

14. IRELAND IRISH law also differentiates between negligence (or carelessness) as a pillar of fault and the (independent) tort of negligence. According to recent case law especially following the Supreme Court cases of Glencar Explorations plc. v. Mayo County Council (No. 2) [2002] 1 IR 84 and Fletcher v. Commissioners of Public Works [2003] IESC 13, [2003] 1 IR 465, Irish law has adopted, in principle (again) as that prevailing in English law

15. Liability for negligence under SCOTTISH law is also derived from Donoghue v. Stevenson (no. 14 above), cited as M'Allister v. Stevenson.

II. Negligent omissions

16. In all legal orders of the Member State it is nowadays self evident that negligent conduct can also also encompass omissions and not merely connote a positive act. This truism is only expressly anchored in a number of Civil Codes (e.g. in AUSTRIAN CC § 1294, MALTESE CC art. 1033, SPANISH CC art. 1902, PORTUGUESE CC art. 486 and LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.246(1)). Others have left it to special provisions, which stipulate an obligaton to supervise defined individuals or things in a number of given situations. Initially, therefore, liability for negligent omissions had to gradually carve out a position for itself under the basic norms of tort law. This is a valid assertion for e.g. FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG. CC arts. 1382 and 1383 speak of faute, imprudence und négligence. Based on the wording of the provision, it cannot be conclusively asserted, that these concepts are exclusively confined to positive acts. Nonetheless the present guiding principle, namely that tort liability can arise from an act as well as from an omission, was contentious for a long time. It became firmly entrenched only after World War 2 (see. for France Cass.civ. 27 February 1951, D. 1951, 329; for Belgium Dalcq, Responsabilité civile. I[2], nos. 356-366 and for Luxemburg Cour 23 December 1971, Pas. luxemb. 22 [1972] 93).

17. In contrast, as already mentioned, the text of the SPANISH CC art. 1902 does not leave any room for doubt, given that any person "who by action or omission causes damage to another by fault or negligence is obliged to compensate the damage caused". Of course this does not preclude a differentiation between the discrete variant types of omissions and subjecting them to different rules. In any event, some commentators see a fundamental difference between omissions arising as a consequence of an antecedent positive act and the socalled "pure" or "simple" omission (de Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 257; Lacruz and Rivero, Elementos II(2)[4], 466). TS 9 March 2000, RAJ 2000 (1) no. 1183 p. 1861 is an example of the first category (Liability of a doctor who omitted to inquire of his patient whether he was allergic to the drug which was eventually administered). In this case no special requirements would apply. However, in respect of "pure omissions" intention is a prerequiste (de Ángel loc. cit.). This theory is however by no means undisputed and is possibly also not prevailing legal scholarly opinion (Lacruz and Rivero loc. cit.; Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 110). Other voices surmise that it depends on whether the defendant was subject to a particular obligation to act prior to the ensuing result (Albaladejo [-Santos Briz], Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales XXIV, 103). If such an obligation is missing, the omisson must either flow from the intention to inflict damage or otherwise not correspond to what could have normally been required from the defendant in the circumstances of the case (Lete del Río, Derecho de obligaciones II[3], 187; Lacruz and Rivero loc. cit. 466; de Ángel Yágüez loc. cit. 257).

18. The principle that an unlawful act can be established, either as a result of a positive act or omission is also the approach adopted in ITALIAN law. A distinction is made between an omissione propria (the violation of an express statutory obligation in respect of a positive act) and an omissione impropria (the infringement of a general duty of care, which is linked with CP art. 40(2), whereby causation is established when a person fails to hinder a result although he was legally obliged to do so Castronovo, La nuova responsabilità civile[3], 319). The judiciary examine in the first instance whether a statutory duty to avoid the damaging result existed, the violation of the duty then makes the application of CC art. 2043 possible. However, the judiciary also regard as sufficient the violation of a duty to act postively which is based on a legal transaction or if the defendant did not adhere to a duty of protection which was compelling in the given circumstances of the case (Cass. 29 July 2004, no. 14484, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, 7-8; Cass. 1 December 2004, no. 22588, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 1; Cass. 23 May 2006, no. 12111, Danno e resp. 2007, 163; Alpa, Trattato di diritto civile IV, 265-267).

19. It is contended in HUNGARY, that an omission is, in principle, only unlawful if the debtor was under a statutory or contractual duty to act (Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1227 and 1230). Liability for omissions arises only if there was a positive legal duty to act which was violated (Marton, A polgári jogi felelősség, 128-129). Certainly, in this context, an omission is causal for the resulting damage (Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 65; Marton loc. cit.; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 51-52, 63; Bárdos, Kárfelelősség a Polgári Törvénykönyv rendszerében, 52-53; Szalma, Okozatosság és polgári jogi felelősség, 76). The duty to act positively does not have to be subject of a specific statutory provision, rather such an obligation can be derived from the general axiom to respect the interests of others, cf the extensive case law on the subject; e.g. BH 2003/152; BH 2002/435; BH 2002/266; BH 2002/227; BH 2002/185; BH 2000/445; BH 2000/198; BH 1998/131; BH 1996/530 (in casu action denied) and BH 1994/596. In POLAND too there is no doubt that an unlawful omission may give rise to tortious liability. An omission is unlawful if it constitutes a breach of a statutory duty (SN 19 February 2003, LEX no. 121742). Whether unlawfulness may result also from a breach of a duty of action stemming from the principles of community life (zasady współżycia społecznego) is controversial (see in support Czachórski and Ignatowicz, System prawa cywilnego III, 1, 534; contra Pietrzykowski [-Banaszczyk], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 415 p. 1092, arguing that the principles are not precise enough).

20. In GERMANY, similar principles apply. The factual elements of a tort can also in this jurisdiction be fulfilled by either a positive act or an omission (Erman [-Schiemann], BGB I[10], § 823, no. 13). However, an omission is then only unlawful if the wrongdoer has breached a legal duty to act (Palandt [-Thomas], BGB[66], § 823, no. 35). The duty to act can derive from: statute, contract, an antecedent act which increased the risk of danger, a close relationship in the sense of family law, initiation of contractual negotiations, or above all, from the general principle that every person who within the scope of his responsibility, creates a source of danger or allows it to continue, must do everything necessary in the circumstances of the case to prevent the realisation of the danger. Via this concept of liability for the violation of a so-called Vehrkehrspflicht, the duty to be observed in various situations of social interaction, which is a creature of case law, the statutory obligations to act CC §§ 823(2), 831-838) which are of themselves narrowly defined have expanded greatly. In essence the only remaining question is whether the general duty of care (CC § 276) requires a postive act (von Bar, Verkehrspflichten, passim; see the very extensive case law on the subject) e.g. BGH 8 November 2005, NJW 2006, 610 (regarding the *Verkehrspflich*t of the proprietor of a theater in respect of a shot fired in the air by an actor during a performance). The Verkehrssicherungspflichten are special instances of the duty to be observed in various situations of social interaction and comprise of the duty to take appropriate measures to ensure safety on property to which the public have access.

21. AUSTRIAN CC § 1294 expressly provides that damage can be caused by acts as well as omissions. However, liability in respect of the consequences of an omission only arises when the defendant was under a legal duty to prevent the damage (v. Zeiller, Commentar III, 702 [no. 2 under CC § 1294]; see OGH 13 December 1966, SZ 39/170 and OGH 15 January 1986, SZ 59/7, RS0022458). An affirmative duty may derive from statute (CC § 1311; on this point see OGH 16 September 1999, JBl 2000, 113, RS0112533, note Fötschl, VersRAI 2001, 24), from contract or from an antecedent act aggravating risk (Ingerenz) (Rummel [-Reischauer] ABGB II², § 1294 no. 4).

22. In GREECE, legal scholarship and the judiciary are equally at one on the following issue, namely, that omissions can also connote relevant conduct under tort law in the sense of CC art. 914; the fact that the provision is silent on this issue is of no account. Affirmative legal duties are again derived from statute, contract or from the tenets of Ingerenz (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 914, nos. 27-30). Moreover in Greece, the principle applies that every person who creates a dangerous situation or allows it to persist is obliged to take all necessary measures to ensure that others are not harmed (e.g. A.P. 250/1956, ArchN 7 [1957] 451; A.P. 343/1968, NoB 16 [1968] 943; A.P. 854/1974, NoB 23 [1975] 479; CA Athens 1773/1982, Arm 37 [1983] 215; CA Athens 46/1985, EllDik 26 [1985] 511). In addition it is accepted that a positive duty to act can also be derived from the tenets of good faith and the prevailing precepts of a generally accepted social standard (see essentially A.P. 510/1959, NoB 8 [1960] 251; A.P. 343/1968, NoB 116 [1968] 943 and A.P. 854/1974, NoB 23 [1975] 479; more recent case law e.g. CA Athens 12263/1990, NoB 39 [1991] 583; CFI Athens 9286/1985, Arm 40 [1986] 501 and A.P. 81/1991, EllDik 32 [1991] 1215). In both cases, similar to the German position, there is talk of duties to be observed in various situations of social interaction and duties to ensure safety of third parties (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II(2)[4], 35; Eleftheriadou, Die Haftung aus Verkehrspflichtverletzung im deutschen und griechischen Deliktsrecht, passim).

23. PORTUGUESE CC art. 486 provides that, "the simple omission" can only be compensated, independent of other statutory prerequisites, if it can be derived from a statute or derived from a legal transaction which contained an affimative duty to act. A positive duty to act under tort law can thereby arise particularly under ancillary contractual obligations, e.g. a duty to ensure safety of fans attending a football match (CA Lisbon 17 October 2002, CJ XXVII [2002-4] 97) or the duty of a hospital to ensure that a mentally impaired patient who absconded was brought back to the in-patient treatment centre. STJ 25 July 1985, BolMinJus 349 [1985] 516; see also STJ 22 September 2005). Also DUTCH CC art. 6:162(2) expressly differentiates between acts and omissions, however, in substance, it treats both forms of conduct as equivalent in principle. "Saving grounds for justification, the following acts are deemed to be wrongful, the infringement of a right, an act or omission violating a statutory duty or conduct contrary to the standard of conduct seemly in society". The aforementioned corresponds in all essential points to the LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.246(1).

24. The NORDIC legal orders proceed from the premise that omissions do not ground liability and thereafter define numerous exceptions to this rule. A positive duty to act can be derived, in the first instance, from statutes (Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 106). Such statutory obligations to act are found in, for example, the Swedish criminal code (negligent manslaughter, the consequence of an omission HD 26 May 2005, NJA 2005, 372), in statutes relating to the countryside and rights of way [väglagen (1971:948)] § 26; statutes pertaining to the control of pollution [renhållningslagen (1979:596)] §§ 18 and 19 and in the Parental Code [föräldrabalk (1949:381)] chap. 6 § 2(2)(iii). Moreover it is said that duties to act can also be contractual (e.g. HD 9 September 1932, NJA 1932, 457 [landlord fails to remove ice from the tenant's tap, the tenant slips on the icy patch] and HD 19 December 1995, NJA 1995, 720 [failure to adhere to promise to lay waterpipes, damage resulting to neighbour; see Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 47]). Finally it is recognised that a duty to act can be created by virtue of a prior act which aggravates risk, the wrongdoer is obliged to take appropriate measure against the danger which has arisen (HD 14 December 1935, NJA 1935, 636). The same is true of DENMARK (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 111, 117; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 69 and HD 9 April 1975, UfR 1975, 504 [liability of organisers of events]) and of FINLAND (Supreme Court 10 October 1991, HD 1991:138 [road maintenance; failure to signify the existence of a pit]; Supreme Court 6 October 1997, HD 1997:151 [build up of ice on the street following a burst water pipe, no warning sign was displayed nor was salt placed on the roads] und Supreme Court 4 October 1996, HD 1996:117 [a 13 year old girl was found not to be liable in negligence when she failed to prevent her playmate from negligently setting fire to a building and failed to warn the property owner]).

25. IRISH law on liability for negligent omissions is the same on all essential points to that of England A positive duty to act in tort law can be derived from an employer-employee relationship, for example see on this point the duty to protect an employee from bullying by colleagues (Quigley v. Complex Tooling & Moulding [2005] IEHC 71).

III. Breach of statutory duty

26. Under BELGIAN, FRENCH und LUXEMBURGIAN law the breach of a statutory standard of conduct only grounds per se the existence of a faute provided that the defendant commits the breach librement et consciemment (Cass. 3 October 1994, Pas. belge 1994, I, no. 412 p. 788; Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], no. 448 pp. 327-330). Prevailing legal opinion has rejected the socalled theory of relativité aquilienne, according to which the breach of a statutory standard of behaviour only establishes a causal faute when the aggrieved party is a member of the class which the provision is geared towards protecting (see further Ghestin, Les conditions de la responsabilité, 157 and 318 and Cornelis, Responsabilité extra-contractuelle, 65; cf. also Cass.civ. 27 October 1975, GazPal 1976, I, 169, note Plancqueel).It is even understood as a special feature of CC art. 1382 ,since this provision establishes a general protective norm for every person who suffers damage because another did not adhere to the law, irrespective of whether the applicable statute was designed to protect the injured party or otherwise (Ravarani, La responsabilité civile[2], 711).

27. In contrast, legal position in SPAIN corresponds to VI.–3:102 (a): namely the breach of a particular standard of care as provided by the statutory provision only grounds the charge of negligence when the purpose of the breached provision was the protection of the injured party from the damage suffered (Díez-Picazo, Derecho de daños, 360; TS 27 April 1992, RAJ 1992 [2] no. 3414 p. 4519). On the other hand the compliance with defined statutory specifications does not automatically entail that the observance of the general duty of care is always regarded as given. Rather, the Tribunal Supremo has pronounced in numereous decisions that CC art. 1902 requires not only the care and attention as prescribed by the specific statute, moreover it also always requires that measures are taken which the bonus paterfamilias would have taken in the circumstances of the case (TS 3 May 1997, RAJ 1997 [2] no. 3668 p. 5546; TS 24 December 1992, RAJ 1992 [5] no. 10656 p. 13899; TS 19 December 1992, RAJ 1992 [5] no. 10703 p. 13990).

28. The ITALIAN civil law abstains from defining negligence and therefore, as starting point, resort must be had to CP art. 43(3). According to this provision a criminal offence is committed in a negligent manner when the result was not desired by the wrongdoer, but was the product of inattentiveness,carelessness, or solecism or resulted from a disregard of Acts, Regulations,Statutory Orders or Rules. This proposition holds true even if the result may have been foreseen by the wrongdoer. In the first instance a colpa generica is established, in the second (breach of Acts etc.) colpa specifica. As regards the colpa specifica it is emphasised that it can only arise under provisions which have as their purpose, the avoidance of certain damage. Only under these conditions can one speak of a colpa per inosservanza di leggi which is relevant for liability (Visintini, I fatti illeciti II[2], 62; Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, 127). If these prerequisites are given, then it is said that negligence in re ipsa is established (Cass. 9 June 1995, no. 6542, Giur.it. 1996, I, 1, 191; Cass. 13 May 1997, no. 4186, Giust.civ.Mass. 1997, 722 [each time unlawful administrative acts]; Cass.sez.un. 29 July 1995, no. 8300, Giur.it. 1996, I, 1, 328, note Musy [Violation of CC art. 844]). The breach of a statute as such already constitutes negligence because the legislator has already statutorily clarified questions of forseeability and the required standard of care. Nonetheless the existence of a causal nexus betwenn the breach of the norm and the damage sustained needs to be examined (Franzoni loc. cit. 127; Cass. 4 September 1981, no. 5051, Giust.civ.Mass. 1981, fasc. 9; Cass. 20 March 1998, no. 2980, Giust.civ.Mass. 1998, 626; Cass. 26 Januar 1990, no. 480, Giust.civ.Mass. 1990, fasc. 1). In order to establish causation the question has to be asked whether the purpose of the breached statutory provision was to protect the injured person from the damage suffered (Visintini loc. cit. 63).

29. The starting point under HUNGARIAN tort law is that the infliction of damage is prohibited by law and that therefore every infliction of damage is unlawful unless otherwise provided by law. It is envisaged that this principle will be expressly adapted in the new Civil Code (http://www.parlament.hu/irom38/05949/05949.pdf). A provision along the lines of VI.–3:102(a) is thereby unnecessary. Moreover the theory of the protective purpose rule (under which only damage, which the violated statute was designed to hinder, is recoverable) has not taken root. A causal nexus in respect of the damage inflicted suffices in principle to ground liability. Of course related questions can implicitly arise in the analysis of causation and above all concerning the question as to whether the defendant can relieve himself of liability by arguing a lack of blameworthiness (Petrik [-Harmathy], Polgári jog II[2], 570; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 49). Nothing in the general formula of POLISH CC art. 415 corresponds to VI.–3:102(a). Some scholars take the view that in principle every infringement of a statutory rule is unlawful (subject to exceptions such as self-defence) irrespective of whether the injured party or the damage sustained falls within the protective range of the rule (Czachórski, System prawa cywilnego, III, 1, 533-534; Safjan, FS Maksymilian Pazdan, 1329; SN 22 February 2006, OSNC 2006, poz. 123). Liability arises if the other party is at fault (i.e. breach of the statutory rule resulted from negligence) and the infringement and the damage are causally linked. On the other hand, a large number of commentaries adhere to the concept of so-called “relative” unlawfulness, according to which an act or omission is unlawful vis-à-vis an injured person only if the person belongs to the group for whose protection the rule had been made (and the same applies to the type of inflicted damage – see Szpunar, Glosa, 381-382; Kasprzyk, Stud.Prawn. 1988, 149, 150-151, 165, 171; SN 27 April 2001, OSNC 2001, poz. 161).

30. GERMAN CC § 823(2)(i) provides that the violation of a law which has as its aim the protection of another is one type of unlawful act. Therefore, a person who violates a statute, is liable under this provision only when the statute was geared towards protecting the person injured from the damage suffered. To illustrate ,for example legal provisions concerning clearways near construction sites are not geared towards protecting building contractors from loss of earnings (BGH 18 November 2003, MDR 2004, 274). On the other hand numerous provisions of the Civil Code have been recognised as socalled Schutzgesetze (z.B. CC §§ 226, 618, 858, 906-909 and 1004). Further archetypes of protective laws can be found in the Criminal Code (e.g. CP §§ 123 [trespass to property], 185 [Defamation], 263 [Fraud], 266 [breach of trust] und 306 [Arson]) and in the Road Traffic Ordinance (e.g. provisions relating to maximum speed limits, keeping a minimum distance behind vehicles, prohibition on overtaking et al.) (see further MünchKomm [-Wagner], BGB[4], § 823, no. 357). CC § 823(2) does not regard the violation of a protective law as a manifestation of negligence, rather as a manifestation of unlawfulnesss. Liability under CC § 823(2)(ii) therefore depends on whether the violation of the statute was a consequence of negligence or intention..

31. Under AUSTRIAN CC § 1311 second sentence a person is liable, who culpably infringes a law which seeks to prevent „incidental injuries“ (OGH 26 April 1977, ZVR 1978/42; OGH 6 July 1978, SZ 51/109),. However, the wrongdoer's fault is presumed in cases of the violation of a protective law. This presumption can be rebutted (OGH 6 July 1978 loc. cit.; OGH 31.8.1984, SZ 57/134; OGH 14.1.2004, 7 Ob 276, 03v), however in practice, although possible in theory, adduced exculpatory evidence hardly ever succeeds (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI[3], § 1311 no. 36). The concept of a protective law is given a very broad interpretation. It is not exclusively confined to parliamentary legisltion but encompasses all types of legal norms. Even an administrative act can fall within ist remit (Bescheid, siehe OGH 25 February 1982, ZVR 1983/35)The decisive question is whether the applicable legal provision pursues, contentwise, a protective aim for the benefit of private individuals.(OGH 17 April 1969, ZVR 1969/330; OGH 15 October 1978, ZVR 1979/283). Contentwise, protective laws comprise of a prohibition on conduct which is abstractly dangerous, the aim of these prohibitions being to safeguard certain individuals or class of individuals against an infringement of their legal interests (Harrer loc. cit. no. 9; OGH 22 August 1996, SZ 69/188). Liability is restricted to the damage which the protective purpose norm was intended to avoid. Discrete provisions of the Civil Code can also constitute in themselves protective laws (e.g. CC § 154(3)). For further examples see for instance OGH 15 February 1983, JBl 1983, 373; OGH 21 October 1987, 8 Ob 29/87; OGH 20 September 1978, ZVR 1979/203 and OGH 21 December 1982, ZVR 1984/46.

32. In GREECE the violation of a statutory provision can likewise constitute a species of unlawful act. However it is accepted that in order to ground liability it is simply not enough to violate simply any statutory provision, rather the provision must either establish an absolute subjective right or it must safeguard a legally relevant interest (Georgiades, FS Larenz 1983, 175, 184; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 914, no. 32; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 484, 487). As regards the second classification it is necessary to examine whether the affected interest is within the scope of the violated provision. Not every provision containing a duty to act or a duty to refrain from acting are inevitably protective laws (Georgiades loc. cit. no. 50). The question as to whether the infringed provision has to-at a minimum-safeguard a private interest is to be ascertained by means of interpreting the provision at hand, (Kornilakis loc. cit. 487). This question was answered affirmatively in respect of e.g. offences under the Criminal Code pertaining to fraud, embezzlement, handling of stolen goods, perjury and false criminal accusations.(Georgiades loc. cit. no. 53). CC art. 281 also constitues a protective law along these lines (Prohibition on abusive exercise of a right: Georgiades loc. cit. no. 56 gegen Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II(2)[4], 33). In contrast, offences relating to for example espionage and treason are exclusively concerned with the wider public interest (Georgiades loc. cit. no. 54).

33. PORTUGUESE Law CC art. 483 proceeds from a starting point which evinces cognate considerations to that outlined above. If the injured party can prove that the defendant violated a legal provision geared towards safeguarding the interests of the injured party, then a (rebuttable) presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant arises (STJ 10 March 1998, BolMinJus 475 [1998] 635; STJ 13 December 1990, BolMinJus 402 [1990] 558). In contrast, proof of negligence must be postively adduced in the case of, for example, a road traffic accident, if it cannot be successfully proven that a provision of the Road Traffic Ordinance was violated (STJ 13 December 1990, BolMinJus 402 [1990] 537). On many occasions the courts have considered that the infringement of a legal provision suffices per se as proof of negligence (e.g. STJ 16 February 1993, BolMinJus 424 [1993] 635 [concerning conduct at railway level crossings]). For particularly dangerous places, a higher degree of care may be required under statutory provisions (e.g. CA Coimbra 26 October 2000, CJ XXV [2000-4]) 132: Safety on the corridors of a hospital]).

34. Breach of statutory duty (be it in the commission of an act or omission) under the DUTCH CC art. 6:162(2) is subsumed into the category of wrongful acts. A breach of a statutory duty does ground an obligation to pay compensation, however only if the additional prequisites of tort law are fulfilled. Therefore, the damage must be encompassed by the protective purpose of the violated rule and must result from a breach of the statute, breach of which can be imputed to the wrongdoer. „Statutory Duties "in the sense of CC art. 6:162(2) are found in the Civil Code itself as well as in special civil or public law statutes. As regards the latter it is however necessary to examine precisely whether the statute was solely designed to safeguard the public interest (TM, Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 675; Onrechtmatige Daad I [-Jansen] art. 6:162(2) nos. 67-71 pp. 600-635; see also HR 20 November 1924, NedJur 1925, 89). If the breach of a statute is identified, it is rebuttably presumed that the defendant was at fault. However, as against the infringement of the statute, the fault element remains a separate issue of determination (Jansen loc.cit. para. (3) no. 7.3 pp. 48-68 and no. 57 pp. 910-911).

35. The legal position in the NORDIC Countries corresponds largely to that covered by VI.–3:102(a)). For instance in DENMARK numerous statutory provisions are of direct significance when it comes to determining culpa. The general doctrine of culpa is not permitted to negate the specific of legal regulations, for example Road Traffic Ordinance or Regulations pertaining to the Health and Safety of Workers (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 62; HD 26 June 1950, UfR 1950, 746). The damage actually suffered must be encompassed by the protective purpose of the rule (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 65; HD 12 December 1966, UfR 1967, 72). In addition, the contravention of an administrative order is qualified as a relevant factor for establishing culpa (Eastern CA 8 December 1988, UfR 1989, 353). Similarly in SWEDEN many statutory provisions are judged to be relevant for tort law, provided that the damage suffered is embraced by the protective purpose of the rule. The more precisely the direction to act is formulated, the less discretion is left for an independent determination of culpa according to the general tenets of culpa (Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 125; HD 11 June 1976, NJA 1976, 379 [pedestrian on signposted cycle path]). Conversly, however, it is not enough to blindly adhere to certain statutory or administrative standards, namely a general duty of care may require in addition an appreciation of risk (HD 20 December 1977, NJA 1977, 788 und HD 5 November 1991, NJA 1991, 580).

VI.–3:103: Persons under eighteen

(1) A person under eighteen years of age is accountable for causing legally relevant damage according to VI.–3:102 (Negligence) sub-paragraph (b) only in so far as that person does not exercise such care as could be expected from a reasonably careful person of the same age in the circumstances of the case.

(2) A person under seven years of age is not accountable for causing damage intentionally or negligently.

(3) However, paragraphs (1) and (2) do not apply to the extent that:

(a) the person suffering the damage cannot obtain reparation under this Book from another; and

(b) liability to make reparation would be equitable having regard to the financial means of the parties and all other circumstances of the case.

COMMENTS

A. The Article in overview

Matters covered. This Article deals with issues of intention and negligence on the part of persons under eighteen. The provision thus leaves all grounds of accountability in Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence) unaffected. Those grounds do not hinge on intention or negligence. It is the objective criteria for accountability which are far more crucial under that Section; for the most part it turns on the liable person's capacity as a keeper of a thing or an animal.

Purpose. The purpose of paragraph (1) is to particularise the general standard of care in VI.–3:102 (Negligence) sub-paragraph (b) for children between seven and seventeen years of age. The provision relates to the personal liability of children in relation to third parties. The liability of parents for the misconduct of their children is the subject of VI.–3:104 (Accountability for damage caused by children or supervised persons). Paragraph (2) clarifies that children who have not yet attained their seventh year are in principle liable for neither intention nor negligence. Paragraph (3) provides a counter-exception for the case in which the relief for persons under eighteen provided for in paragraphs (1) and (2) would lead to unjust results, in particular in view of the financial circumstances of the parties involved.

Persons under eighteen. The Article does not use the expression "minor", rather speaking of persons under eighteen. The reason for this is that while persons who have attained the age of eighteen are indeed of full age everywhere in the EU, this proposition is not capable of being inverted. It may be, for example, that married persons attain the legal status of an adult before that age. They also benefit from paragraph (1).

B. Intention; violation of a statutory norm of conduct

Intention. Paragraph (1) provides clarification that this provision only involves the concretisation of the general duty of care in relation to minors. Thus, liability in negligence in the form of a violation of a statutory norm of conduct, as well as liability for intention, remain unaffected. Apart from paragraph (2) there is no special rule for the latter. Its definition in VI.–3:101 (Intention) is determined consistently by reference to "subjective" elements. For that reason the definition appears equally fitting in relation specifically to persons under eighteen. It is decisive that "intention" depends on the person who acted wanting to do exactly what was done, rather than it being clear to him or her that their conduct would almost certainly inflict legally relevant damage on another. This will be often lacking in children in their early school years. Conduct which for adults would have to be readily qualified as intentional, can be merely negligent for young persons, whether because they could not clearly anticipate the danger due to lack of experience or because their desire to play relegated all other concerns to the background.

Illustration 1
In order to scare their detested neighbour, several ten-year-olds inform her in conscious knowledge of its falsity that her husband is severely injured in a traffic accident and is lying in hospital. Children of this age are not normally aware of the danger of severe mental harm. Therefore, they do not cause the damage to the neighbour's mental health intentionally

Illustration 2
Two children aged seven and ten throw stones at moving vehicles from a motorway bridge. The boys are not in a position to comprehend what they are doing; the tragic death of a driver, whose windscreen is smashed by one of the stones, was not intentionally caused by them. In contrast, in the case of an adult who throws stones at the windscreen of a moving car, there is usually dolus eventualis in respect of the driver's death.

VI.–3:102 (Negligence) sub-paragraph (a). Neither does the present Article lay down a special rule in respect of VI.–3:102 (Negligence) sub-paragraph (a) (failure to meet a statutory standard of care). This is because there is no need for such a rule. If a statute lays down a specific duty of care for a defined area of life (e.g. for road traffic), that standard must be met by everyone – including minors. Most of the standards of care stipulated by statute are in any case not directed at activities undertaken by young persons. In fact they typically pertain to working, business and professional life, and hence to matters which are not generally accessible to minors anyway.

C. The general standard of care for persons under eighteen (paragraph (1))

A group-specific standard of care. Paragraph (1) has the aim of assessing the conduct of children and juveniles aged seven to seventeen by only using a standard of care which takes into consideration their youth and thus their lesser experience compared with adults. A twelve-year-old girl need only behave as can be expected of a girl of this age in the circumstances and a fifteen-year-old boy, as may be expected from a boy of this age. The older children become, the more the care which can be expected of them approaches the care expected of adults.

Illustration 3
A 16-year-old boy, who grew up in the mountains, chooses a dangerous route for an excursion with a group of other minors, during which one of the party is severely injured due to the difficult terrain. The age and experience of the 16-year-old allow him to comprehend and foresee the danger to which he would expose others. Consequently the route planning was negligent.

Illustration 4
During their stay at a holiday camp, five youths aged between twelve and sixteen buy two bottles of caustic acid and a roll of cooking foil in the campsite shop in order to carry out an experiment with a bottle of Coke with the aim of causing an explosion. After the experiment, they hide one of the bottles containing the chemicals in a small house at the edge of the campsite, where it is found by smaller children aged below ten. One of them throws the bottle against the wall of the house, smashing it. Some of the fluid splashes in the eye of one of the small children involved, causing blindness. The two 12-year-olds, who had participated in the experiment, could neither anticipate the dangerousness of their actions nor withstand the influence of the older members of the group. The latter ought however to have reckoned with endangering younger children at the campsite. They are solidarily liable with the parents who breached their supervisory duty. In the internal relationship with the other solidarily liable parties, the liability of the 16-year-olds is however reduced to zero due to their very slight fault.

D. Children below the age of seven (paragraph (2))

No liability in principle for intentional or negligent infliction of damage. Paragraph (2) provides for an age limit whereby children under seven years of age are not accountable for causing damage intentionally or negligently. The provision opts for a normative proposition that, for the purposes of VI.–1:101 (Basic rule), children under seven years of age are not capable of causing damage either intentionally or negligently (although, from a purely factual point of view, the contrary notion may certainly be entertained). Hence, this involves neither a presumption of the incapacity to commit fault, which the claimant may rebut, nor a rule allowing children to prove that they do not yet have the ability to distinguish right from wrong. The provision cuts out all issues of this type. This appeared to be the most effective means of protecting children from premature liability. Such protection is indispensable in order to prevent minors from later entering adulthood with a burden of debt, which makes future considered life choices impossible. The age limit of seven years seemed realistic because the development of a true-to-life standard of care for children under this age is scarcely possible., This age restriction does not create a chasm in liability because, in the case of harm by small children, usually (if not always) the parents incur liability; see VI.–3:104 (Accountability for damage caused by children or supervised persons).

Strict liability remains unaffected. The liability of children due to one of the fact situations set out in Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence) remains unaffected by VI.–3:103(2). Of course, children of this young age will rarely be the keepers of a dangerous animal or thing. They can however be the owners of a thing occasioning damage, e.g. a building.

E. Liability according to equity and fairness (paragraph (3))

Purpose of the rule. A significant aim of the rule in paragraph (2) is to safeguard children from premature financial burdens through liability for damage caused by them. However, in special, rather rare individual cases this purpose can be dropped for purely factual reasons. It can exceptionally turn out that a child (e.g. as a result of an early inheritance) is readily in a financial position to provide reparation for damage done, whereas the injured person may be in a position of financial difficulty and may be unable to bear the burden of the damage alone. In such a case equity and fairness demand reasonable reparation of the damage. Paragraph (3) adopts a legal idea which is to be found in many (but by no means all) European legal systems.

Situations covered. Liability according to equity and fairness represents a counter-weight to the rules of both the preceding paragraphs. It corrects where necessary not only the effect of paragraph (2) (children under seven years of age), but also the effect of paragraph (1) (age-specific standard of care). Therefore, there is also room for liability according to equity and fairness where an adolescent satisfies the standard of care for his or her age group, but did not behave as would have been expected of an adult under the circumstances. In practice, the second group of cases can even be more important than the first.

Subsidiarity of liability according to equity and fairness (sub-paragraph (a)). There is no room for personal liability of small children according to equity and fairness where the injured person can obtain damages by other means. This is again typically the case where parents or other persons who are obliged to supervise the child cannot prove that they reasonably performed their supervisory duty, see VI.–3:104 (Accountability for damage caused by children or supervised persons) paragraph (4). There are also other conceivable situations, e.g. where a six-year-old in collaboration with a 10-year-old, throws stones at windows, for which the 10-year-old is readily responsible under the law on liability. A third party's ability to pay reparation must of course always be taken into account along with the legal responsibility; where the ability to pay is lacking, then the injured person simply cannot "obtain reparation" from another. The third party must ultimately have been liable "under this Book". The issue of what influence existing insurance cover has on the liability according to equity and fairness is not a question of its subsidiarity, rather a question of its other requisites.

Liability to make reparation must be equitable (sub-paragraph (b)). What matters is an overall assessment of all the circumstances of the individual case, among which the financial circumstances of the parties (the child and the injured person, not infrequently also a child) are particularly significant, while not necessarily solely decisive. It will also be relevant whether e.g. there was "inherently" harmless infantile behaviour or deliberate harm. Another relevant factor is whether there was contributory fault on the part of the injured person, as this normally rules out a claim according to equity and fairness. The insurance cover of the parties involved is a factor in the assessment of their financial circumstances. Where the injured person is sufficiently insured through personal insurance cover, equity and fairness do not justify pursuit of the child; the child is also not liable to an uninsured injured person if the family indemnity insurance of the parents also encompasses their children – in this case, indemnification for the parents' liability according to equity and fairness. Ultimately, equity and fairness must also justify the reparation of the damage actually claimed. This justification may be absent, e.g. where, in cases in which major physical harm or injury to health is concerned, reparation of non-economic losses is also claimed.

VI.–5:301 (Mental incompetence). Children are not placed on the same level as mentally disabled adults. VI.–5:301 (Mental incompetence) is therefore, as a rule, of no relevance to infants. However, it is conceivable that an adolescent who suffers from a mental disability could rely on this provision. Such an adolescent has the same defences available as fellow sufferers who are adults.

NOTES

I. Personal Accountability of Persons under eighteen

1. In the interests of victim protection FRANCE subjects minors to a more rigorous regime of liability than that evinced by VI.–3:103. Since the Cass.ass.plén. 9 May 1984, JCP 1984, II, no. 20256 (two judgments with a note by Jourdain) the tort liability of minors does not depend on their ability to understand the wrongfulness of their acts. This capacity is not generally a prereqisite for tort liability. The relevant standard of care determinative in ascertaining a faute, is nonetheless as before lowered to take account of the age of the tortfeasor.(le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2004/2005], no. 6707). The latter rule contradicts at least the policy direction exhibited in the above mentioned judgments of the Court of Cassation. However this rule was confirmed by the same court in Cass.civ. 7 March 1989, JCP 1990 éd. G, II, no. 21403, note Dejean de la Bâtie (see, illustration 3). Moreover, account should be taken of recent French case law which has developed a theory of strict liability for parents for damage caused by their children; with the result that only on rare occasions will the personal liability of children be determinative (cf. the Notes under VI.–3:104).

2. In contrast, in BELGIUM it is still the case that capacity is a prequisite for liability for faute under CC arts. 1382 and 1383. Children are regarded as having the capacity to commit fault only if they have reached an age when they can appreciate the distinction between good and evil, namely when they have attained the jaren des onderscheids. A child must appreciate what he or she is doing and must forsee the consequences of his or her actions. Whether a child has attained the "age of discernment" does not hinge on whether the child has reached a legally defined minimim age. This is a fact to be determined in each individual case, based on an assessment of the individual child and on the concrete circumstances of the case (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene, TPR 2000, 1551, 1688, no. 36).

3. No specific age is mentioned in the SPANISH Civil Code, after which a minor would be personally liable for tortious acts. Hence, the view is also taken that the applicable yardstick in each individual case is the determination of whether the minor can be held accountable for his or her acts (Reglero Campos [-Gómez Calle], Responsabilidad civil[3], 479). In more concrete terms this entails that the minor must be able to distinguish between good and evil and must appreciate what it means to cause damage to another (Pantaleón Prieto, CCJC 1983, 452; TS 27 January 2006, BDA RAJ 2006 no. 615). In general the liability of minors is subject to the general rules anchored in CC art. 1902. In particular, it is important to note that, therefore, the liability of minors is not displaced by parental liability (but another view is submitted by a number of academic commentators, e.g. Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 230 and Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema I[10], 229). The Tribunal Supremo approved this proposition on many occasions (e.g. TS 22 September 1992, RAJ 1992 [4] no. 7014 p. 9220; TS 30 December 1992, RAJ 1992 [5] no. 10565 p. 13807; TS 9 July 1998, RAJ 1998 [3] no. 5547 p. 8208 and TS 8 March 2002, RAJ 2002 [1] no. 1912 p. 3178). According to arts. 1(1) and 61(3) of Organic Law 5/2000 which pertains to the criminial responsibility of minors (Ley Orgánica 5/2000, Reguladora de la Responsabilidad Penal de los Menores of 12 January 2000) minors are criminally responsible and therefore also have capacity under civil law from the age of 14. As regards children under the age of 14, liability remains to be judged according to the precepts of the Código Civil (Act 5/2000, art. 3).

4. The ITALIAN CC also does not contain a provision which regulates the personal liability of children. The starting point for any examination for attributing liability for the act causing damage is first and foremost the question of capacity (CC art. 2046). If the defendant lacks capacity, then the court will proceed to examine whether a person charged with supervision is liable (CC art. 2047). On the other hand if a minor is found to have capacity, a concrete assessment for each individual child is required to be undertaken; liability is then subject to the general provisions of CC art. 2043. The court takes account of, inter alia, age, the physical and mental maturity of the child and all other circumstances relevant to his actions.(e.g. Cass. 19 November 1990, no. 11163, Giust.civ.Mass. 1990, fasc. 11). There is a concurrence of liability, namely that of personal liability of the minor and the liability of parents, guardians, teachers and tutors (CC art. 2048; Cass. 3 March 1995, no. 2463, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, 513; Cass. 13 September 1996, no. 8263, Giust.civ.Mass. 1996, 1278); the former is an independent liability, not merely a subsidiary one (Cass. 1 August 1995, no. 8384, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, 1455).

5. The HUNGARIAN Civil Code does not contain special provisions concerning the personal accountabilty of minors (defined in CC §12) nor does it contain special provisons pertaining to the liability of their parents. Therefore, they fall under the scope of CC § 347, which states that individuals lacking capacity are not liable for reparation. A person lacks capacity under CC § 347(1) first sentence, if he or she cannot appreciate the wrongfulness of his or her act or can do so only to a limited extent (see further Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II, 598, 603; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 124). This concept applies equally to persons evincing a mental impairment and to small children. A stipulated legal minimum age of responsibilty exists only under criminal law, not under civil law. However, a person who has attained the age of criminal responsiblity can also be held accountable for his acts under the civil law. De facto the courts appear to work mostly with an age limit of 12 in respect of children who have developed normally. However, it is important to note that here a fixed rule has not been laid down; divergences from the rule can be found in both directions (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1284). If a minor can understand the wrongfulness of his or her act, then, theoretically, it is not necessary to continue to differentiate according to age and type of fault. However, it appears that these factors are already taken into consideration in the examination of fault or capacity. For example, a nine year old boy ought to be liable for his actions if he intentionally breaks his neighbour's window pane, but he ought not to be liable when he does the same thing unintentionally when playing football (Benedek loc. cit. 1282). According to POLISH CC art. 426 a minor under thirteen years of age is not accountable for causing damage. He can be liable only on equitable grounds (CC art. 428). The accountability of minors over thirteen is controversial. Where the damage has been caused by a minor between thirteen and eighteen years of age, courts and some commentators consider that the plaintiff must prove the minor had obtained sufficient intellectual maturity to be reproachable for the negligence (SN 11 January 2001, OSPiKA 2002, poz. 2; Czachórski, Zobowiązania[10], 240). Others opt for a factual presumption of sufficient maturity in such cases, which can be rebutted by the minor (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 196).

6. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 137(1) resembles VI.–3:103(2). According to LOA art. 137(2) "minors aged seven and over but under fourteen shall not be liable for damage, unless it is shown that they are capable of accounting for their actions when the damage was inflicted". Upon attaining the age of 14, minors are subject to the general provisions of tort law (LOA art. 137(3)). The proposed draft with a view to reforming the ROMANIAN Civil Code openly displays quite similar policy considerations;

however, it does not provide for a fixed minimum age limit of seven (CC-Draft art. 1105). In contrast, the CZECH and SLOVAK CC § 422(1) again forgo a fixed minimum age limit for the accountability of a minor under tort law. The decisive factor is merely whether he or she "was able to govern his or her conduct and consider its consequences".

7. Under the GERMAN CC § 828(1) children under seven years are not liable for damage caused by them. Furthermore, up to this age their conduct cannot be capable of amounting to contributory negligence justifying a reduction in the apportionment of damages (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 828, no. 2). In respect of minors who have attained the age of seven but have yet to reach the age of 18, it is necessary to examine whether they had the capacity necessary to recognise that they are responsible for their acts (CC § 828(3)). In this case, the examination of intention and negligence must be kept strictly separate (CC § 276) (BGH 14 November 1978, NJW 1979, 864, 865). As regards the ascertainment of tortious responsibilty, it will depend on the particular minor's capacity to appreciate the dangerousness of his actions and his awareness that he is responsible for his action. However, according to case law, the individual's capacity for self-control, i.e. the ability to conduct oneself according to one's appreciation of the dangerousness of one's actions and in the awareness that one is responsible for one's actions, is not relevant (BGH 30 November 2004, NJW 2005, 354, 355). The minor has the burden of adducing evidence and proving the lack of appreciation of the wrongfulness of his acts (Erman [-Schiemann], BGB II[11], § 828, no. 6). The examination of negligence,- in contrast to the question of tortious capacity- will not depend on the ability of the particular minor to forsee the dangerousness of his actions and conduct himself so as to avoid the danger; the decisive factor is rather the capacity of a child of the same age and normal development (Sprau loc. cit no. 7). Children up to the age of ten years are exempt from liability for negligently caused motor vehicle or railway accidents on the basis of CC § 828(2). As a general rule children who have yet to attain this age are not able to recognise the specific dangers of vehicles on roads or specific dangers of rail traffic and therefore cannot behave accordingly (Sprau loc. cit. no. 3). The major significance of this provision in practice is that it also has the effect that minors up to this age are not guilty of contributory negligence. According to CC § 828(2)(ii) in the case of intentional conduct, liability remains governed by the provisions in CC § 828(3).

8. According to the AUSTRIAN CC § 1308 "minors", that is, persons who have not attained the age of 14 (CC § 21(2)) are generally not accountable for the damage that they cause. They may be accountable only under the rules relating to liability on the basis of equity and fairness (CC § 1310). Under GREEK CC art. 915 children, once they reach the age of ten, can be liable in tort. Only once the age of ten is reached are they viewed as possessing the necessary intellectual maturity in order to comprehend the significance of their actions (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 916, no. 1). Juveniles who have reached the age of ten, but who have yet to reach the age of fourteen, are liable under the general tort law provisions unless in exceptional cases they lack the capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of their act (CC art. 917). It is debatable whether the ability to appeciate the wrongfulness of one's actions also requires knowledge in order to be liable in damages (answered in the negative by Georgiades loc. cit. art. 917, no. 4; answered in the affirmative Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II(2)[4], 48; CA Athens 2494/1978, NoB 26 [1978] 387). The lack of a pre-existing capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of one's actions and the ability to conduct oneself accordingly ought to not to preclude tortious responsibilty but should exclude the existence of negligence (Georgiades loc. cit. no. 5).

9. PORTUGUESE CC art. 488(1) exempts from liability, individuals who lack the capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of their act and persons who lack the ability to control themselves at the time of the unlawful act (see further Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 563; Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 68 (1957), 13, 89). In respect of children who have yet to attain the age of seven (CC art. 350(2)), there is a rebuttable presumption that they are not responsible for their tortious acts (CC art. 488(2)). Once they have reached this age, the presumption is inverted and the onus of proof rests on the child (Antunes Varela loc. cit.; Pessoa Jorge, Ensaio sobre os pressupostos da responsabilidade civil, 332; Neto, Código Civil Anotado[14], 540).

10. According to DUTCH CC art. 6:164 once the age of fourteen is reached, a minor can be held accountable for unlawful acts. This rule is tenable on policy grounds given that it is supplemented by a provision which provides that parents can be held strictly liable for the tortious acts of children who have yet to reach the age of fourteen (CC art. 6:169(1)). Another factor which led to the fixing of the age of fourteen was the insurability of the risk of damage to a third party caused by children (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 645, 652, 678; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 84 p. 93). Children who have attained the age of 14 are subject to the general provisions contained in CC art. 6:162(3). In principle, mental impairment or physical disability are not grounds of defence (CC art. 6:165). However the required standard of care is defined by reference to age, Where liability depends on knowledge of particular circumstances, unlawfulness may not be established owing to the defendant's young age, if this knowledge could not have been expected from a juvenile. CC art. 6:164 does not exempt a child from strict liability; the child is responsible for causing a certain source of danger under CC arts. 6:169-184, i.e. liability is not excluded when the child is in possession of a moveable thing, (CC art. 6:173), a building or other construction (CC art. 6:174) or an animal (CC art. 6:179) which causes damage. This conclusion is derived from CC art. 6:183(1). However, CC art. 6:183(2) immediately adds that the parent or guardian of a child who has not reached the age of fourteen, is liable in the place of the child for damage caused by the thing or animal, (CC arts. 6:173 and 6:179 unless they were used in the course of carrying on a business (see further Hartkamp loc. cit. no. 85 p. 94).

11. The prevailing legal position in ESTONIA corresponds to that of the Netherlands. According to the law pertaining to liability, responsibility for unlawful acts can be attributed once the age of fourteen is attained. LOA § 1052(1)). A similar situation prevails also in LITHUANIA (CC arts. 6.275 and 6.276). For minors who have reached the age of fourteen, the age of the wrongdoer is taken into account when ascertaining the required standard of care (LOA art. 1050(2)).

12. SWEDISH Damages Act chap. 2 § 4 provides that, a person who, prior to reaching the age of eighteen, causes damage to a person or thing, causes pure economic loss or pain and suffering, only has to pay damages to the extent that this is reasonable. The criterion of reasonableness is determined by an examination of a range of factors. These factors include the age and maturity of the minor, the nature of his actions alongside a consideration of the individual's economic circumstances especially a consideration of whether the individual is covered by liability insurance. There is no fixed minimum age limit either generally or under current insurance policies (Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 265). However, HD 3 February 1977, NJA 1977, 186 rejected a claim against a child who was three years and two months old on the grounds that it was not yet possible to speak of fault in a child of this age. There is a dearth of more recent case law on the personal liability of minors. It appears that the problem is largely disposed of via the rules pertaining to parental liability and insurance coverage. The FINNISH Damages Act chap. 2 § 2 largely corresponds to the Swedish provisions but it does not contain any reference to existing liability insurance. In the Supreme Court 12 February 1991, HD 1991:73 damages were awarded against a fifteen year old girl who encouraged her boyfriend of the same age to set fire to a rubbish bin, which led to a building catching fire. The DANISH Damages Act § 24a permits the court to reduce damages on equitable grounds in favour of minors who have yet to attain the age of fifteen. The existence of insurance coverage is a factor relevant to the assessment of whether an equity to reduce damages exists. The Damages Liability Act § 24a only concerns liability for fault and has no relevance for strict liability (Møller and Wiisbye, Erstatningsansvarsloven[6], 486), § 24 of the Damages Liability Act provides that damages can be reduced in a case of strict liability (Møller and Wiisbye loc. cit. 502, 517). For the remainder the principle applies that, being below the age of eighteen does not make an individual, as a rule, immune from liability; age will ,however, be taken into account when it comes to assessing the standard of required care in the circumstances of the case (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 89). The courts have, on many occasions, awarded damages against four and five year olds (see for sources von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 93). The Insurance Contract Act (Forsikringsaftaleloven) is of practical importance in this regard. According to § 19(1), liability insurance also guarantees coverage for damage which was intentionally caused by children under the age of eighteen (see further Møller and Wiisbye loc. cit. 515). SWEDEN and FINLAND have the same provision regarding children who have yet to attain the age of twelve, (Insurance Contracts Act chap. 4 § 9(1)(ii) and in FINLAND Insurance Contract Act § 36).

13. According to CYPRUS Civil Wrongs Law s. 9 “no action shall be brought against any person in respect of any civil wrong committed by such person when such person was under the age of twelve years.” Civil Wrongs Law s. 8 enacts the following rule derived from the case of Jennings v. Rundall (1799) 8 TR 335, 101 ER 1419 (see I13 above) that a person under the age of eighteen years may, subject to the provisions of s. 9 of this Law, be sued in respect of a civil wrong, provided that no action shall be brought when such wrong arises directly or indirectly out of any contract entered into by such person. Under MALTESE CC art. 1035 minors under the age of nine are exempt from liability und children who have yet to attain the age of 14 are only liable for their acts in tort law if they “have acted with a mischievous discretion”.

II. Billigkeitshaftung

14. FRANCE, SPAIN and LUXEMBURG do not recognise liability based on equity and fairness. BELGIAN CC art. 1386*bis* envisages such liability only for persons with a mental impairment (irrespective of age), and not for children or young adults of normal development. In contrast, in all essential points the MALTESE CC art. 1036 resembles the situation contemplated by VI.–3:103(3).

15. ITALIAN CC art. 2047(2) provides that the court can award compensation as deemed appropriate in the circumstances, against a child to whom liability can not yet be attributed on account of age, upon consideration of the financial means of the injured person. However, in order to award compensation, it must not be possible to obtain compensation from the person whose duty it was to supervise the child. In end effect it involves in the same manner as VI.–3:103(3) a liability which is subsidiary. Within this framework the court not only has to decide whether compensation should be awarded but must also determine the measure of compensation according to equitable discretion (CFI Macerata 20 May 1986, Foro it. 1986, I, 2594).

16. This corresponds to the legal position under the HUNGARIAN CC § 347(2). A wrongdoer who cannot generally be held responsible for tortious acts, is exceptionally liable in whole or in part according to judicial discretion, if this is clearly necessary in the circumstances of the case and upon consideration of the financial means of the parties involved. Here, it must also be proven that the wrongdoer either does not have a supervisor at all or that the responsibilty of the person whose duty it was to supervise the child for the ensuing damage cannot be established. Under POLISH CC art. 428, where a person is not accountable for the inflicted damage due to their minority or mental or physical state, and either there are no persons obliged to supervise the person or they are not able to make good the damage, the injured person may claim reparation in whole or in part from the person who caused the damage if this is equitable in the circumstances of the case, in particular having regard to the parties' financial means.

17. The GERMAN CC § 829, AUSTRIAN CC § 1310, PORTUGUESE CC art. 489, ESTONIAN LOA § 1052(3) and GREEK CC art. 918 resemble on all essential points VI.–3:103(3). The liability of a child on the basis of fairness and equity in Greece is predicated on the absence of another means of compensating the party who has suffered loss. Insurance policies are taken account of in the assessment of whether there is another method of compensating the claimant (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 918, no. 11). In assessing whether there are equitable grounds to award compensation, the economic means of the parties is not the only focus: the gravity and permanence of the injury, the contributory negligence of the injured party and the intellectual development of the wrongdoer are all taken into account (Georgiades loc. cit. no. 16). The court can award full or partial compensation against a wrongdoer; moreover, it can judge the claimant not liable to make reparation (Georgiades loc. cit. 918, no.19).

18. In the NORDIC Countries provisions which reduce damages as outlined above in I12 fulfill a comparable function. The Common Law in ENGLAND und IRELAND sas well as SCOTTISH Law does not recognise liability on the basis of fairness and equity.

VI.–3:104: Accountability for damage caused by children or supervised persons

(1) Parents or other persons obliged by law to provide parental care for a person under fourteen years of age are accountable for the causation of legally relevant damage where that person under age caused the damage by conduct that would constitute intentional or negligent conduct if it were the conduct of an adult.

(2) An institution or other body obliged to supervise a person is accountable for the causation of legally relevant damage suffered by a third party when:

(a) the damage is personal injury, loss within VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death) or property damage;

(b) the person whom the institution or other body is obliged to supervise caused that damage intentionally or negligently or, in the case of a person under eighteen, by conduct that would constitute intention or negligence if it were the conduct of an adult; and

(c) the person whom the institution or other body is obliged to supervise is a person likely to cause damage of that type.

(3) However, a person is not accountable under this Article for the causation of damage if that person shows that there was no defective supervision of the person causing the damage.

COMMENTS

A. General

Subject matter of the rule in VI.–3:104. While VI.–3:103 (Persons under eighteen) relates to the personal liability of minors, the subject matter of the present Article is liability of persons (natural and legal) who are obliged by law to provide parental care. It concerns not only liability for damage caused by persons under eighteen, but also, in paragraph (2), liability for damage caused by certain adults. Paragraph (1) regulates the liability of parents (and others subject to a duty to provide parental care) for harm caused by children who have not yet attained the age of fourteen (The present Article does not contain a specific provision for damage caused by older children; to this extent such damage remains within the general rule in VI.–3:102 (Negligence)). Paragraph (2) of the present Article provides a rule of liability for institutions inhabited by persons (under or over eighteen) who might inflict personal injury or property damage on third parties if unsupervised. Issues of personal liability of mentally disabled persons are specifically addressed in VI.–5:301 (Mental incompetence).

The regime of liability. Under paragraph (1) of the present Article persons who are obliged by law to provide parental care for a child under fourteen years of age have the liability for damage caused by the child which would have been imposed on the child, had the child already attained the age of eighteen when the harm was occasioned. Paragraph (2) contains a similar rule for cases where persons requiring supervision cause legally relevant damage to a third party, for which damage they are responsible under the general rules or, in so far as youths are involved, would have been responsible had they been subject to assessment under the standard of care for adults. Paragraph (3) clarifies that in both cases the ground of liability is insufficient supervision. Therefore, the person under the supervisory obligation has the opportunity to provide evidence proving that reasonable supervision was carried out in relation to the person causing the damage.

No strict liability. From this and from the very positioning of VI.–3:104 in the Section 1 (Intention and negligence) of the this Chapter, it follows that these rules do not propose the imposition of strict liability on parents: having children is not a sufficient basis of liability. The protection of the family under fundamental rights prohibits socialising the advantages brought by children with one hand and individualising the disadvantages with the other. The basis of parental liability lies in that most primary right and resulting duty to take care of and supervise the child. Where the child occasions harm to a third party, then the presumption of failure to supervise takes hold. As a result the parents are obliged in such a case to present and prove that in spite of the damage, they satisfied their supervisory duty.

B. Liability for children under fourteen (paragraph (1))

The risk covered by liability. The point of liability for parents is that they carry the risk (but only that risk) which arises out of the circumstance that children are unable to muster the maturity and care of an adult. Such liability therefore presupposes conduct on the part of the child which, assessed according to the standards of a careful adult, amounts to negligence. Whether the child was in fact personally capable of recognising the harmfulness or at any rate the perilousness of his or her behaviour plays no role. Conversely, the mere fact that the child occasions legally relevant damage to a third party does not suffice. Where liability would not be imposed on an adult who, in the position of the child, would have done exactly as the child did, then the child's conduct does not trigger any parental liability.

> Illustration 1
> Children are playing in a sandpit. A boy throws sand into a playmate's face. This results in an eye injury. The boy may well not have been at all conscious of the dangerousness of his act, but it nonetheless leads to parental liability. This is because an adult acting in the same manner as the child would naturally have been liable.

> Illustration 2
> A holiday resort organises a water polo match for children in a designated children's swimming pool. A mother comes to the edge of the pool to take a photograph. A ball volleyed by a player hits the camera which is knocked into the water. Playing water polo in the pool was permitted; an adult exercising reasonable care would have behaved no differently from the children in the pool. Consequently, no parental liability arises. The further question of contributory negligence on the part of the mother does not come into issue.

Various age brackets. Paragraph (1) of this Article relates to harm by children under fourteen years of age. The age bracket in VI.–3:103 (Persons under eighteen) paragraph (2) (attainment of the age of seven) plays no role here. It is also irrelevant for the purposes of paragraph (1) whether the damage was caused by a child capable of comprehending the consequences of actions or one who is still incapable of such comprehension. In fact what is consistently crucial is only that the child, gauged using the standards of an adult, caused the damage negligently or in any way intentionally. The possible strict liability of a minor does not trigger parental liability. For children who have attained the age of fourteen, the injured person will again have to provide evidence of a breach of supervisory duty. Whether parents in this phase of life are in turn subject to a supervisory duty will for the most part depend on the applicable family law. Under the general rules parents can also be subject to a supervisory duty in relation to adult offspring who are still living with them.

Persons liable. Liability under paragraph (1) affects "parents or other persons obliged by law to provide parental care". Thus, in so far as only the two parents are entitled to parental care it makes no difference whether the child lives in the shared family household or grows up with one of the parents, or whether the parent claimed against is responsible for taking care of the household duties or pursues gainful employment. On whom the parental care and with it the supervisory duty rests in the case of broken families or unmarried parents, is decided by relevant applicable family law. "Other persons obliged by law to provide parental care" are, for instance, guardians and adoptive parents. On the other hand, stepparents remain under VI.–3:102 (Negligence), in so far as nothing different results from the applicable family law. Babysitters, nannies or childminders who take care of the child on a contractual basis do not fall under VI.–3:104(1). Of course, occasional temporary helps (neighbourly help, grandparents, etc.) are not obliged "by law", "to provide parental care".

Relationship to VI.–3:103 (Persons under eighteen). In principle, the liability under the present Article operates independently of the liability of a child under VI.–3:103 (Persons under eighteen). Where the requisites of liability of both Articles are fulfilled, the child and parents are in principle solidarily liable (VI.–6:105 (Solidary liability)). In their relationship to each other, liability usually of course solely rests with the parents.

Children as victims. If children are harmed by third parties, they must indeed live with their claim being reduced for personal contributory fault under the criteria in VI.–5:102 (Contributory fault and accountability), not however for a contributory supervisory failure on the part of their parents. This follows from an argumentum e contrario to VI.–5:102 (Contributory fault and accountability) paragraph (3), which refers exclusively to VI.–3:201 (Accountability caused by employees and representatives), not, however to VI.–3:104. Where children are harmed though a failure to supervise on the part of their parents or others subject to the supervisory duty, the claim to reparation follows the general rules or, to the extent that they are more beneficial, the rules of applicable family or contract law. If children are the victim of the actions of a third party as well as a breach of duty of their own parents, then the third party and parents are solidarily liable to the child.

C. Liability of institutions (paragraph (2))

Policy considerations. Paragraph (2) provides for liability of institutions and other bodies, which are under a duty to supervise persons who are a danger to third parties. The provision mirrors a legal situation which is to be found in a similar or at least comparable way in many of the Member States' legal orders. Whether the persons to be supervised are under or over age makes no fundamental difference. What is far more crucial is that the institution concentrates in one area persons who require particular control. This heightened potential for danger justifies the rebuttable presumption of defective supervision in case of harm (see paragraph (3)). However, it seems appropriate to limit liability to corporeal damage, that is to say, personal injury and property damage (paragraph (2)(a)).

The duty to supervise. The duty to supervise covered here has its legal basis in the general rules on liability for omissions. It can also therefore follow from specific statutory regulations, have its basis in a contract or quite simply result from the fact that the institution, through its assembly of persons with certain problems, has created a particular source of danger which must be kept under control according to VI.–3:102 (Negligence).

Institution or body. These rules do "not govern the liability of a person or body arising from the exercise or omission to exercise public law functions" (VI.–7:103 (Public law functions and court proceedings)). Therefore, e.g. prisons from which criminals escape do not fall under paragraph (2); the same goes for State hospitals or similar institutions catering for those who would have been convicted of a crime but for mental incapacity. Also damage caused by juvenile delinquents who have escaped from a public institution (so-called "borstal boys") does not fall under paragraph (2) because of the effect of VI.–7:103 (Public law functions and court proceedings). Examples of the operation of paragraph (2) are provided by private playschools and private schools and boarding schools, old peoples' homes in relation to demented inmates and psychiatric clinics with severely ill private patients.

Persons likely to cause personal injury or property damage. Persons of whom it ought to be assumed that they are likely to injure others or cause property damage if they are not supervised need not have criminal proclivities of any kind. The examples given in the previous paragraph themselves show that the issue may arise in relation to persons who are ill or children and youths who lose their inhibition to harm others when they are in a group.

Illustration 3
A depressive hospital patient jumps out of an upper storey window in order to commit suicide. He brings a pedestrian with him to the grave. The hospital is liable to the pedestrian's survivors to the extent that it cannot prove that it properly supervised the patient.

Illustration 4
A man accommodated in a public institution for the mentally disabled sets the forest of a married couple (C) alight while unsupervised on day release. The institution is responsible for the fire damage under VI.–3:104(2).

Requisites personal to the direct injurer. As with paragraph (1), in the framework of paragraph (2) the conduct in question must be such that it would be qualified as intentional or negligent were it the conduct of an adult of sound mind. A possible incapacity to comprehend the nature of one's actions on the part of the person directly causative of the damage is irrelevant to this extent (cf. VI.–5:301 (Mental incompetence)). In fact, such persons require particularly special supervision.

D. Defective supervision (paragraph (3))

General. In relation to both paragraph (1) and paragraph (2), it is open to the potentially liable person to prove that the damage sustained by the third party was not the consequence of defective supervision of the person causing it. The concept of "defective supervision" set out here draws on the notion of what is "defective" invoked by the Product Liability Directive (cf. VI.–3:204 (Accountability for damage caused by defective products) paragraphs (1) and (7)) and thus takes as its basis an objectified and - in comparison with VI.–3:102 (Negligence) - higher standard. It hinges on the fact that the person who was the immediate cause of the damage was inadequately supervised. It does not depend on whether this inadequate supervision was a breach of an obligation or could have been prevented by a reasonable and prudent person in the circumstances. A child who manages to wander off from its parents' premises or play school when the parents' or teacher's attention is absorbed by more pressing problems with other children is nonetheless defectively supervised.

Illustration 5
An infant succeeds in leaving the premises of a play school for reasons later inexplicable. She walks out on to the road, where a driver manages to prevent a collision but suffers severe injury himself because he steers his car into a roadside ditch in order to save the child. The play school is liable to the driver. In contrast, the parents of the child are not liable under VI.–3:104(1) since they did not breach their supervisory duty, even using the yardstick of an objective standard. Vis à vis the parents, only a claim under V.–3:103 (Right to reparation) comes into the picture.

Supervision of children. With regard to the supervision of children, for the same reason, it makes no difference which parent was responsible for the defective supervision in the concrete case. To this extent, it only depends on the result – inadequate supervision of the child. If the father goes to the zoo with the child, the mother who stays at home is just as liable, and it is the same in the reverse situation of the father sitting in his office when the mother inadequately supervises the child. However, where supervision on the part of both persons entitled to custody is factually impossible (e.g. because the child lives in a boarding school far away), paragraph (3) opens up to both the possibility of being discharged of liability. It does not come down to a parental failure.

Supervision of high-risk groups. Matters are dealt with correspondingly for the case of the supervision of high-risk groups in permanent or temporary accommodation. The injured person is not obliged to single out individual employees or clarify the circumstances which led to the accident. It is sufficient that a person requiring supervision remained unsupervised and caused the damage while supposed to be under supervision.

NOTES

I. Liability of the individual who is required to exercise parental care

1. According to the FRENCH CC art. 1384(4) (as slightly modified by the Law of 4 March 2002) and (7) the predominant view for a long period of time was that, as regards liability of parents for harm caused by a minor, a twofold présomption de faute existed which could be rebutted; it was presumed that the child was either badly brought up or badly supervised (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[11], no. 193 p. 195). Since the decision of the Cass.civ. 19 February 1997, Bull.civ. 1997, II, no. 56 p. 32 (arrêt Bertrand) it is now accepted that parents are only relieved from liability upon proof of force majeure or a faute de la victime. In essence, for liability of the parent to be affirmed, four prequisites have to be fulfilled, namely (i) the existence of parental authority (autorité parentale), (ii) the fact that the child is a minor (iii) that the child is living with the parent(s) (cohabitation) and (iv) the fait causal, namely, that the child caused the damage. The concept of cohabitation is given a very broad interpretation, see for instance, Cass.crim. 8 February 2005, JCP 2005, II, no. 10049 (13 year old child had lived with his grandparents from the age of one; this was nonetheless regarded as cohabitation with his parents). Since Cass.ass.plén. 13 December 2002, Bull.ass.plén. 2002, no. 4 p. 7 (two decisions), it is moreover accepted that the liability of parents is not based on the faute of the child. The conclusion drawn is that the fact that the damage was directly caused by the child suffices, even if no mistake on his part occured (similarly Cass.civ. 10 May 2001, Bull.civ. 2001, II, no. 96 p. 64). This parental liability is ancillary to the personal liability of the child; it does not replace it (Flour/Aubert/Savaux loc. cit. no. 198 p. 203). Given the very strict regime operating in respect of the liability of parents the Court of Cassation suggested in its end of year report for 2002 that to avoid the prospect that the parents do not have liability insurance the legislator should either make insurance mandatory for parents or set up a guarantee fund. At the time of writing, the legislator has not yet reacted to these calls.

2. A less harsh liability regime operates under BELGIAN law. Liability arising under CC art. 1384(2) is based on a rebuttable presumption (CC art. 1384(5)), that there has been a dereliction of parental or supervisory duty (Cass. 28 September 1989, Pas. belge 1990, I, no. 63 p. 117). The parents must adduce evidence to exonerate themselves on both fronts (Cass. 23 February 1989, Pas. belge 1989, I, no. 356 p. 649), even where, at the time, the child was under the supervision of another individual(s) or institution, for example, if the child was in school (Cass. 23 February 1989 loc. cit.;for a different view Cass. 22 September 1978, Pas. belge 1979, I, 108). Cass. 20 October 1999, Pas. belge 1999, no. 549 p. 1360 regarded CC art. 1384(2) not merely as a présomption de faute, but qualified it as a présomption de responsabilité. This entails that there is a rebuttable presumption that the damage was caused due to the fault of the parents (Tilleman and Claeys [-Fagnart], Buitencontractuele aansprakelijkheid, 172, 200). Even when the minor is incapable of fault, he or she must commit un acte objectivement illicite. This means that the minor must have done something which would constitute fault in an adult of sound mind (Fagnart loc. cit. 199). The liability of the parents is additional to the personal liability of the minor (compare the case of minors with a mental impairment and the relationship to CC art. 1386*bis* Cass. 18 October 1990, Pas. belge 1991, I, no. 90 p. 171).

3. In SPAIN a distinction is drawn between the regime of the Código Civil and the rules on damages anchored in the Criminal Code and in more specific statutes pertaining to criminal law (especially the Organic Law on the criminal responsibility of minors [Ley Orgánica 5/2000, Reguladora de la Responsabilidad Penal de los Menores] of 12 January 2000, in force since 13 January 2001). Liability for damage which is caused by non-criminal acts of minors is dealt with under the laws pertaining to liability of parents and guardians under CC art. 1903. The basis for liability, according to this provision, is a presumed dereliction of parental or supervisory duty (a culpa in vigilando or educando), see e.g. TS 24 March 1979, RAJ 1979 (1) no. 919 p. 741; TS 11 March 2000, RAJ 2000 (1) no. 1520 p. 2368; TS 8 March 2002, RAJ 2002 (1) no. 1912 p. 3178 and TS 13 September 2002, RAJ 2002 (5) no. 8828 p. 16172. According to prevailing legal opinion CC art. 1903 is not a strict liability provision, owing to the fact that the parents can exonerate themselves from liability upon proof that they acted with all due care to avoid the harm caused by the child (Díaz Alabart, ADC 1987, 795, 803, 819; Gómez Calle, Responsabilidad de padres y centros docentes [3]. 1234, 1237). In practice, this transpires to be a purely theroetical possibility, given that the courts have glossed the Code, no longer accept such proof of exculpation and state that CC art. 1903 concerns a quasi strict liability (TS 17 June 1980, RAJ 1980 (1) no. 2409 p. 1874; TS 10 March 1983, RAJ 1983 (1) no. 1469 p. 1128; TS 22 September 1984, RAJ 1984 (2) no. 4332 p. 3326). In more recent times CC art. 1903 has been openly classed by the Tribunal Supremo as a case of where liability is based on risk (TS 22 January 1991, RAJ 1991 (1) no. 304 p. 333; TS 7 January 1992, RAJ 1992 (1) no. 149 p. 174; TS 30 June 1996, RAJ 1996 (3) no. 5272 p. 7064; TS 28 July 1997, RAJ 1997 (3) no. 5810 p. 8942; TS 11 March 2000, RAJ 2000 (1) no. 1520 p. 2368; for criticism see Gómez Calle loc. cit. 1236). The liability of parents has been –sporadically- qualified as subsidiary to the personal liability of the minor (confirmed by TS 24 May 1947, RAJ 1947 nos. 631 and 631*bis* p. 407; see also TS 22 January 1991, RAJ 1991

(1) no. 304 p. 333). However this view does not correspond to current understanding (Gómez Calle loc. cit. 1049, 1238; Díaz Alabart loc. cit. 876; Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños[3], 94); parents and children are solidarily liable (TS 14 April 1977, RAJ 1977 (1) no. 1654 p. 1230; TS 30 December 1992, RAJ 1992 (5) no. 10565 p. 13807; TS 28 July 1997, RAJ 1997 (3) no. 5810 p. 8942; TS 8 March 2002, RAJ 2002 (1) no. 1912 p. 3178). In general, similar to VI.–3:104, the liability of parents depends on the child acting in such a manner, that if an adult had been found to be acting in that way, the conduct would at least constitute negligence (Gómez Calle loc. cit. 1239; see also TS 10 June 1983, RAJ 1983 (2) no. 3517 p. 2738 and TS 4 May 1984, RAJ 1984 (2) no. 2396 p. 1792). The defendant must furthermore have parental authority, but they do not have to live with the child (Gómez Calle loc. cit. 1242).

4. Where the act commited by the minor amounts to a criminal act, resort is had to the Spanish Criminal Code and the abovementioned Organic 5/2000 pertaining to the criminal responsibility of the minor. Minors who have yet to attain the age of fourteen cannot be held criminally liable. They are instead subject to the rules relating to liability of parents under CC art. 1903. In respect to minors who have attained the age of fourteen, Organic Law 5/2000 art. 61(2) provides that, they are (in the following order) "solidarily liable with their parents, guardians, foster parents or persons charged with legal supervision or who as a matter of fact have them in their supervisory care" for the damage which results from the criminal act. If the named individuals do not promote the conduct of the minor either intentionally or in a grossly negligent manner, the court can decide "to reduce responsibility". Liability is strict (loc. cit. art. 61(3)), Therefore, it arises independent of any existence of culpa in vigilando or educando (Gómez Calle loc. cit. 1266; Durany Pich, FS Díez-Picazo II, 1749, 1762; CA Asturias 19 June 2003, BDA JUR 2003/184176; CA Asturias 6 May 2004, BDA JUR 2004/259497, CA Asturias 24 February 2005, BDA JUR 2005/90985; CA Asturias 4 March 2005, BDA JUR 2005/90490; CA Lleida 11 March 2002, BDA JUR 2002/118814; CA Jaén 28 November 2002, BDA JUR 2003/14953; CA Sevilla 3 June 2004, BDA JUR 2004/216620; CA Badajoz 25 January 2005, BDA AC 2005/333). The injured person can also bring a civil action against the parents before a judge of the children's court with jurisdiction to hear the criminal matter.

5. ITALIAN CC art. 2048 establishes direct liability of the parents and other persons charged with supervision of the child, if they fail to prove that they could not have hindered the conduct of the child which led to the damaging event (CC art. 2048(3)). The ground of liability is usually declared to be a presumed fault in relation to the parental and/or supervisory duty (Cass. 29 May 2001, no. 7270, Nouva giur. civ. comm. 2002, II, 326; Cass. 10 July 1998, no. 6741, Giust.civ. 1998, I, 1809; de Cupis, Il danno II[3], 134-137; Alpa, Trattato di diritto civile IV, 672-673), for which the yardstick is an upbringing which would, as a general rule, enable an individual to conduct himself correctly when socially interacting with others (Cass. 11 August 1997, no. 7459, Danno e resp. 1998, 251; Alpa loc. cit. 672). In order to establish liability it must be shown the child's conduct if committed by an adult, would fulfill all conditions to establish liability (Cass. 26 June 2001, no. 8740, Foro it. 2001, I, 3098).

6. HUNGARIAN CC § 347 employs the wide ranging concept of the "curator", a term which encompasses the parents as well as other individuals entrusted with the supervision of the child. The liability of the curator is imposed in place of liability of persons who are incapable of appreciating the wrongfulness of their acts (CC § 347(1)(ii)) while the curator is solidarily liable with the minor who is liable on the grounds that he has sufficient capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of his acts (CC § 347(4)). In the former case, liability is based on a rebuttable presumption of fault, while in the second case the fault as to the defective supervision requires positive proof (BH 1995/214). The defective suprevision is manifested by a failure to supervise adequately and can also be attributed to an inadequate upbringing (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1286-1287, 1290; Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II[2], 600; BH 1980/129). A curator is defined as a person who as a matter of fact supervises the individual and is in a position to control and guide their behaviour or who is obliged to control and direct their behaviour as the case may be. Normally, parents with whom the child shares a household, are curators. If the parents do not live together, the curator is the parent with whom the child actually resides or who supervises it. Curators are, moreover, the child's guardian and all persons (relations, friends) or institutions (Kindergarten, schools and hospitals) who merely temporarily and factually take on the supervision of the child. Depending on circumtances this may not impact on the qualification of the parents as curators. Schools and parents are solidarily liable, when, for example, the child causes damage at school and the cause for this lay in the lack of supervision or a failure of the parents to ensure proper upbringing. Natural persons, who have the task of supervising a child as part of their conditions of employment, e.g teachers, nurses, tutors, social welfare workers and trained educational staff are not curators. Here, only the curator is the employer (Benedek loc. cit. 1285-1287; Wellmann loc. cit. 599).

7. Under CZECH and SLOVAK CC § 422 persons with a duty to supervise are liable; this liability is based on a rebuttable persumption of fault. The liability is solidary if the child is adjudged to be personally liable. According to POLISH CC art. 427, someone who is bound under a statutory duty (such as a parent, teacher, or doctor in a psychiatric institution) or a contractual obligation (e.g. a babysitter) to supervise another, who is not reproachable for fault due to their age or mental or physical state, is accountable for the damage caused by that person, unless he or she had discharged the duty of supervision or the damage would have been occasioned notwithstanding due supervision. The rule applies also to persons who without any statutory or contractual obligation in fact permanently exercise supervision over such persons (e.g. relatives or neighbours). It in effect introduces a rebuttable presumption of culpa in custodiendo as well as a rebuttable presumption of the causal link between improper supervision and the damage (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 203; Czachórski, Zobowiązania[10], 253). It is now widely recognised that culpa in custodiendo must consist of specific acts or omissions and may not be inferred solely from the general social maladjustment of a child (Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit.) in the form of a general educational neglect (Czachórski loc. cit.; Pietrzykowski [-Safjan], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 427 p. 1208). The application of CC art. 427 is precluded if the conduct of the minor (or mentally disabled person) was not objectively unlawful (Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 204; Safjan loc. cit. 1206). Furthermore, the rule does not apply where the damage is caused by a person under supervision who may be accountable on the basis of fault. In that case the basic rule of CC art. 415 applies, so that a person supervising improperly may be jointly liable if at fault (Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 202). However, it falls to the injured person to prove all the requisites of the claim (Safjan loc. cit. 1205). SLOVENIAN LOA art. 142(1) envisages strict liability for parents, whose child has yet to attain the age of seven. This liability is not imposed if "if the damage occurred while the child was entrusted to another and such person was liable therefore" (loc. cit. para. (3)). In addition LOA art. 145(1) introduces a "special parental liability", whereby parents are liable for a failure to educate their child properly if this failure materialises at a time when the child was under the supervision of another. The parents are solely liable, the person exercising the supervision excapes liability (loc. cit. para. (2)).

8. GERMAN CC § 832 is the applicable provision governing liability of persons who, are either legally or contractually obliged to supervise other persons, namely due to their being under the age of majority or on the grounds of a mental or physical disability. This relates to a liability which is based on a presumption of fault. The loss recoverable is that which was inflicted on a third party by the person who was under supervision. A duty to supervise is imposed by law on those who are responsible for the care, custody and upbringing of a minor, as a general rule the parents (CC §§ 1626, 1671, 1757 and 1765), but also guardians and carers (§§ 1793, 1797, 1800, 1909f, 1915). A further prerequisite for liability is the unlawful infliction of damage by the person who was to be supervised. An unlawful act must have been committed (CC §§ 823-826); according to the wording of the applicable legal provisons, fault is irrelevant in this respect. It is possible for the person with the legal duty to supervise to prove that this duty was not breached. It is also possible to prove that, if there was such a violation of duty, this neglect of duty did not cause the damage which was sustained. It is becoming more difficult to rebut this presumption (Bernau, FamRZ 2007, 92).

9. AUSTRIAN CC § 1309 governs the liability for the acts of minors and individuals with a mental disability. The liability impacts on those with a duty to supervise; it also embraces cases of self inflicted harm by the individual who was under supervision (CA Innsbruck 11 March 1985, ZVR 1986/114 p. 274). Although CC § 1309 refers to "minors" (according to CC § 21(2) persons under 14), liability extends to older minors who are aged fourteen and above.(OGH 27 January 1971, SZ 44/8; OGH 29 November 2006, FamZ 2007/35). The basis for liability is the intentional or negligent breach of a supervisory duty; the burden of proof rest on the claimant (OGH 6 October 1961, SZ 34/137). The duty to supervise can arise under a statute or a contract (OGH 24 April 1968, EvBl 1968/379). In the first instance, the duty to supervise rests with the parents, (CC §§ 144, 146), then grandparents (CC § 145(1)) and foster parents (OGH 14 October 1970, EvBl 1971/74). The requirements of the supervisory duty are comparatively modest (see further Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI^3, § 1309 no. 1). The decisive question is what a reasonably prudent parent would have done in the concrete circumstances of the case in order to prevent damage resulting to a third party as a consequence of their child's conduct (OGH 26 August 2004, 3 Ob 128/04a). The situation of the parents is also taken into consideration (Harrer loc. cit. no. 11). A typical case where liability would be affirmed is where smaller children are permitted to play with dangerous toys and then left to their own devices (OGH 24 January 1968, EvBl 1968/379; OGH 22 November 1938, SZ 20/241; OGH 11 January 1967, JBl 1967, 431).

10. GREEK CC art. 923 differentiates between persons who are under a statutory duty to supervise (para. (1)) and those under a contractual obligation (para. (2)) .In both cases, a rebuttable presumption arises that the person whose duty it was to supervise breached their duty either intentionally or negligently and this breach caused the resulting damage (Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 549; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 923, no. 1; CA Athens 6492/1998, EllDik 39 [1998] 1645; A.P. 1173/1994, EllDik 37 [1996] 79). CC art. 923 is geared only towards protecting third parties, not the person who required supervison, who will have to base any claim that they might have as regards damage that they have suffered on applicable family law provisions or contractual law provisions (e.g. CC arts. 335 et seq, 380 et seq) (Kornilakis loc. cit.). The criteria used to determine the content of the supervisory duty include, in particular, age, maturity and degree of development of the minor. Furthermore, the forseeability and the dangerousness of the conduct which caused the damage are important factors (Kornilakis loc. cit. 550; Georgiades loc. cit. no. 6; A.P. 1173/1994, EllDik 37 [1996] 79). The task of a person charged with the duty to supervise is to steer the person who requires supervision towards socially accepted conduct and to point out to him or her the dangerousness of particular objects and conduct (Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 195). Minors are persons who require supervision (CC art. 127). Parents when exercising parental care have a duty to supervise. A prerequisite of liability under CC art. 923 is that the minor's conduct objectively fulfils the requirements of a tort, Whether the presence of fault on the minor's part is required is debatable (see further Georgiades loc. cit. no. 13). According to CC art. 932(2) persons who have a contractual duty to supervise are also liable. An implied contractual assumption of a duty to supervise will arise where the minor resides for a long period of time with relatives. However, if the duration of stay is short or where an individual cares for a child as a favour to the parents, the duty is denied (Georgiades loc. cit. no. 10).

11. In a similar manner, according to PORTUGUESE CC art. 491 liability is imputed to a person who has a statutory or contractual duty over a person incapable of fault. The latter concept does not exclusively pertain to minors (Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 101 [1960] 15, 124). The statutory supervisory duty of parents arises under CC art. 1878(1), that of a guardian (tutor) under CC art. 1935 (Sottomayor, BFD LXXI [1995], 403, 405). Once the age of sixteen is reached, minors become criminally responsible. From this point onwards CC art. 491 is no longer applicable, given that it is not possible to regard minors who are criminally responsible for their acts as "naturally incapable" under the terms of this provision (CA Lisbon 15 October 2002; another view taken in a decision which has not been followed since in STJ 20 March 1991, BolMinJus 445 [1991] 220). CC art. 491 does not apply when the claim of the injured child is at issue (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 493; Sottomayor loc. cit. 411; STJ 17 January 1980, BolMinJus 293 [1980] 308;otherwise CA Oporto 10 October 1996). The basis for liability is a culpa in vigilando (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 590; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela loc. cit. 492; Sottomayor loc. cit. 411, 456 and 466; STJ 3 June 2004; CA Oporto 6 June 2001). There is a rebuttable presumption that the supervision was defective (CC art. 491(2); see Antunes Varela loc. cit. 491). In the context of adducing proof, exonerating the parent from liability, it is necessary to prove that the standard of the bonus paterfamilias was adhered to (STJ 13 February 1979, BolMinJus 284 [1979] 190; STJ 15 October 2002). The requirements appear to have become more rigid in recent times (e.g. STJ 17 January 1980, BolMinJus 293 [1980] 308). The courts also require proof of an absence of culpa in educando, and in this requirement go beyond the wording of the statutory provision (Sottomayor loc. cit. 424; STJ 18 May 1999; STJ 20 March 1991, BolMinJus 405 [1991] 220; CA Lisbon 17 March 1987, BolMinJus 366 [1987] 550). If the parents live apart then, in principle, the parent, who is responsible for the exercise of parental care has the supervisory duty. The duty to supervise is only imposed on the other parent when the child pays a visit (Sottomayor loc. cit. 443). However a duty to supervise should be borne by a stepfather given his capacity as head of the family (Sottomayor loc. cit. 406, note 7).

12. DUTCH CC art. 6:169(1) provides that: "the parents or guardians of a child are liable, in respect of the damage that is suffered by a third party, caused by the acts of a child, who has not yet attained the age of fourteen, if these acts would have been imputable as an actionable tort to the child if its age would not have prevented this imputation". According to this provision the parents are vicariously responsible. In respect of children who have attained the age of fourteen but who have yet to reach sixteen, according to CC art. 6:169(2) there is a rebuttable presumption that the parents are liable, on the basis that the child was inadequately supervised. The age limits were fixed based on the insurabilty of the respective risks.(Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 84 p. 93; Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 645, 652, 678) In both cases, the defendant must either exercise parental authority or be the guardian of the child; it is not necessary that the child act in an intentional or negligent manner If the child can invoke a defence or adduce a ground which excludes fault, and this ground of defence or justification is not age related, then the parents can also rely on this defence or justification (Onrechtmatige Daad II [-Oldenhuis], art. 6:169, no. 4 p. 66, no. 14 p. 197, no. 18 p. 241). Both parents are responsible for the exercise of parental authority (CC art. 1:125(1)); consequently both parents are solidarily liable even when the child only lives with one parent. Judicial separation (Hof ´s-Hertogenbosch 25 February 1997, NedJur 1997 no. 659 p. 3595) and divorce do not, in principle, impact on the continuity of the exercise of parental care; they are relieved from their duty only when a court pronounces on the matter (CC arts. 1:266 and 1:269). Even when a child welfare agency is appointed guardian of the child, (voogdij-instelling), the parents remain liable (Oldenhuis loc. cit. nos 5-6, p. 66). The use of the formula that the conduct of the child must amount to an act, serves to indicate that the parents are not liable if their child fails to warn another of an impending danger or otherwise omitted to do something to safeguard a third party.(Oldenhuis loc. cit. no. 12, pp. 156-197).

13. ESTONIAN LOA § 1053(1) is similar to VI.–3:104(1). The liability of parents for defective supervision is based on fault once the child has attained the age of fourteen. Liability can no longer be imposed, when the child reaches the age of nineteen (LOA § 1053(2)

14. In SWEDEN the liability of parents, while anchored in the general culpa-rules, has however been extended by chap. 6 § 2(2)(third sentence) of the Parental Code which was enacted in 1993 (Föräldrabalk [1949:381]). According to this provision "a person who exercises care and custody over a child is required to ensure that the child is supervised or other appropriate measures are adopted, in order to prevent the child inflicting damage on another". This provision has noticeably tightened the liability of the parents (Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 270; Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 54; contrast the older decisions of HD 8 November 1949, NJA 1949, 617 and HD 29 October 1954, NJA 1954, 450). Under FINNISH law the liability of parents is still determined by reference to the general culpa-liability under the Damages Act chap. 2 § 1, cf. Supreme Court 16 January 1976, HD 1976 II 1 (no liability was imposed for damage, which was intentionally caused by an intoxicated fourteen year old), Supreme Court 7 October 1981, HD 1981 II 124 (a reduction in liability for a sixteen year old who, while unsupervised, fired shots at objects owned by a third party), and Supreme Court 12 April 1983, HD 1983 II 41 (seven year old child threw a dart at a five year old child, liability was imposed on the parents). Similarly, DANISH law does not have special regulations pertaining to the liability of parents and other persons (guardians, childminders, Kindergarten, schools, holiday camps). As regards defective supervision, recourse is had to the general fault based liability (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 123; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 100).

II. Liability of other persons and institutions for damage caused by others

15. According to the FRENCH CC art. 1384(6), teachers and craftsmen are liable for damage caused to a third party by their pupils or apprentices while under their supervision. CC art. 1384(8) provides that the claimant has the burden of proving that the instructor (instituteur) acted in a negligent manner, thereby displacing the presumption of fault which had held sway until 1937 (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2004/2005], no. 7472). The liability of teachers in public schools is displaced by State liability (Code de l´Éducation art. L 911-4). Such teachers are liable only via their internal relationship with the State. There is a rebuttable presumption of fault as regards the liability of craftsmen (artisans) towards a third party (CC art. 1384(6) and (7)), but nowadays this liability is of little practical significance. This is due to the fact that it is no longer customary that apprentices live with their masters (Brun, Responsabilité civile extracontractuelle, no. 561 p. 289). The Napoléonic Code does not explicitly recognise a general rule pertaining to liability for other individuals (fait d´autrui) (compare. Cass.civ. 15 February 1956, JCP 1956, II, 9564, note Rodière). Nonetheless, the Cass.ass.plén. 29 March 1991, Bull.ass.plén. 1991, no. 1 p. 1 (arrêt Blieck) introduced a fundamental change in direction. This is grounded in the Court of Cassation's confirmation that an institution responsible for the care of the mentally disabled was liable for damage suffered by a third party, the result of arson, which was inflicted by a mentally disabled person under the care of the institution. The basis of liability was CC art. 1384(1), namely, liability was based on the general strict gardien-liability. It remains a subject of debate, whether the court thereby created a new principe général de responsabilité du fait d´autrui or created merely a new special head of vicarious liability (see on the one hand Malinvaud, Droit des obligations[9], no. 584 p. 370 und Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[11], no. 223 p. 239 and on the other Brun loc. cit. no. 566 p. 292). According to current case law CC art. 1384(1) is applicable, if (i) a natural or legal person has the garde over another or (ii) an institution had assumed control over the acts of another person. A garde d´autrui in the sense of arrêt Blieck is established, if a natural or legal person holds le pouvoir d´organisation, de direction et de contrôle du mode de vie over the person requiring supervision. The second category can be traced back to Cass.civ. 22 May 1995, Bull.civ. 1995, II, no. 155 p. 88 (2 decisions) whereby sports clubs, established for the purpose of organising, managing and controlling the activities of their members in sporting events, are liable under CC art. 1384(1) for damage caused during this time by their members. Both decisions affirmed liability of a rugby club for injuries inflicted on the opposing team, as the player who inflicted the injuries could not be identified. The basis for liability is the contrôle de l´activité d´autrui (Flour/Aubert/Savaux loc. cit. no. 227 p. 245). In later decisions this was used as a basis to extend liability to other clubs (e.g. Cass.civ. 12 December 2002, Bull.civ. 2002, II, no. 289 p. 230). It remains uncertain whether liability can be broadened in scope to encompass other legal persons and institutions (Flour/Aubert/Savaux loc. cit. no. 227 p. 247). Moreover, it is also unclear whether, in order to ground liability, it is necessary to have at the very minimum the existence of an (objective) faute of the person who directly caused the damage

16. According to BELGIAN CC art. 1384(4) there is a rebuttable presumption that teachers and craftsmen are liable, either intentionally or negligently (CC art. 1384(5)) for damage caused to a third party by a pupil or apprentice who was under their supervision at the time. The word "teacher" is broadly interpreted (Cass. 1 December 1986, JT 1987, 196). Craftsmen are subject to the provisions of CC art. 1384(4), once the apprentices whom they are training are under a contract of training. At the same time, the craftsmen concerned are also employers in the sense of CC art. 1384(3), but CC art. 1384(4) has precedence as a special norm (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene, TPR 2000, 1551, 1827, no. 118). It is a prerequisite for liability that the pupil or apprentice commits a faute or in the case of a youth who is not able to appreciate the wrongfulness of his act that an acte objectivement illicite is committed (Tilleman and Claeys [-Fagnart], Buitencontractuele aansprakelijkheid, 172, 204, nos. 80-82). Teachers who are also employees under the Act of 3 July 1978 can rely on art. 18 of that Act which provides that employees have a privileged position as far as liability is concerned. A general liability for *fait d´*autrui is not a feature of Belgian law Cass. 19 June 1997, Pas. belge 1997, I, no. 284 p. 700, concl. Piret).

17. SPANISH CC art. 1903(5) establishes that the governing body of a school is liable for damage caused by a minor, during the time that he or she was under the supervision of the teaching staff of the institution The governing body is relieved from liability when it adduces proof that it used the standard of care of a bonus paterfamilias in order to prevent the damage occuring. The governing body can only seek redress from the teacher, if the teacher acted intentionally or in a grossly negligent manner (CC art. 1904), In practice this right of redress is rarely exercised (Roca i Trias, ADC 1998, 7). The Tribunal Supremo exonerates the school from liability more willingly than it exempts parents from liability (which today is practically impossible to achieve; see above at I3), see e.g. TS 8 March 1999, RAJ 1999 (2) no. 2249 p. 3575 and TS 27 September 2001, RAJ 2001 (4) no. 8155 p. 12833). CC art. 1903(5) is only applicable to private schools; it does not extend to state owned schools, because the latter are subject to a special regime within administrative law (Gómez Calle, Responsabilidad de padres y centros docentes[1], 1098), providing for strict liability for damage caused by civil servants and other public service employees. On the other hand, private schools are also liable under CC art. 1903(5), when the tort committed by the pupil also amounts to a criminal act (see further Gómez Calle loc. cit. 1315; Vaquer Aloy, La Ley 2001, I, 1635; cf. CA Álava 27 May 2005, BDA AC 2005/1062). CC art. 1903(3) also establishes the liability of guardians (tutores). Whether the liability under CC art. 1903 can be extended to other persons or institutions not specifically alluded to in the provisions is debatable. The prevailing opinion of legal scholarship is that the provision contains a numerus clausus list that cannot be extended or applied analogously (Lacruz and Rivero, Elementos II(2)[4], 524; de Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 329; Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños, 95; TS 16 October 2003, RAJ 2003 (5) no. 7392 p. 13834). Other commentators would extend CC art. 1903(3) to embrace the "factual carer" e.g. apply the provision correspondingly to psychiatric clincs or holiday camps (Gómez Calle loc. cit. 519). It is undisputed that such institutions could be liable according to the general clause of CC art. 1902 (Miquel González, ADC 1983, 1501, 1505).

18. ITALIAN CC art. 2048(2) provides that persons responsible for educating children and persons who are responsible for training of apprentice craftsmen or training in a particular trade, are liable for the damage caused by an unlawful act of their pupils or apprentices while under their supervision. Persons responsible for the education and training supervisors can exonerate themselves from liability by proof that they could not prevent the unlawful act (CC art. 2048(3)). Persons reponsible for the education of minors are teachers who are employed to teach on a regular basis by virtue of their civil service position or a private contractual duty. This establishes the duty to supervise (Cass. 18 July 2003, no. 11241, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, fasc. 7-8; Visintini, Trattato breve della responsabilità civile, 745; Bianca, Diritto civile V, 699; Monateri, Manuale della responsabilità civile, 315). The liability of public school teachers is subject to a special public law regime, which essentially entails that those teachers are not liable vis á vis third parties and are only liable as against the State if they acted in an intentional or grossly negligent manner (as to the constitutionality of the provision, see Corte Cost. 24 February 1992, no. 64, Giur. it. 1992, I, 1, 1618). Individuals and institutions which conduct sports training on a private basis are also liable under CC art. 2048(2) (Cass. 22 October 1965, no. 2202, Giur.it. 1966, I, 1, 1281; CFI Monza 13 September 1988, Resp.civ. e prev. 1989, 1200), as are educational institutions charged with supervising minors (Cass. 7 December 1968, no. 3933, Giur.it. 1969, I, 1, 2187), organisers of a hoilday camp (CA Genova 11 July 1962, Arch.resp.civ. 1962, 192) and even school caretakers.(Cass.sez.un. 3 February 1972, no. 260, Giur. it. 1972, I, 1, 1310). In contrast, the liability of those charged with the responsibility for training trade apprentices or trainee craftsmen is no longer of practical significance, owing to changing social perceptions. The vicarious liability of employers for employees has emerged in its stead (Visintini loc. cit. 748). The content of the duty to supervise is proportional to the age of the minor, namely, the more mature the minor, the less need for constant supervision on the teacher's part (Cass. 23 June 1993, no. 6937, Giust.civ.Mass. 1993, 1065). In respect of adducing proof to relieve liability (CC art. 2048(3)) the decisive factor is whether the damage was forseeable; since only that which is forseen can also be avoided (Cass. 2 December 1996, no. 10723, Stud.Iuris 1997, 314). Moreover, persons responsible for the education of children can also exonerate themselves upon proof that the necessary precautionary organisational measures were taken, in order to rule out the possibility of the injury occuring (Cass. 3 February 1999, no. 916, Giust.civ.Mass. 1999, 244).

19. The HUNGARIAN Special law pertaining to public schools (Statute Nr. LXXIX of 1993) § 77, in principle, renders pupils subject to the rules of liability anchored in the Civil Code. However, the extent of liability (graduated according to intention and negligence) is restricted to the amount of damages that can be awarded. Loc. cit. § 77(3) constitutes strict liability for Kindergarten, schools, boarding schools and the "organisers of practical schooling". It is possible to be relieved of liability (departing from the general provisions of the Civil Code) only if the defendant institution can prove that the damage was caused by an unavoidable occurence outside the scope of their activities (BH 2003/62; BH 1996/310; BH 1996/148). Furthermore, the provisions pertaining to the liabilty of parents (above at Note I6) are also applicable to the liability of other institutions and bodies, provided that they are only "curators" according to the meaning of the statute. A sanitorium or any other institution which assumes a factual duty of supervision can be regarded as a curator. A person who has a duty to supervise because of their status as employee is not a curator (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1286; Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II[2], 599). The same rule (liability of the institution, not the employee) is also found in the CZECH und SLOVAK CC § 422(3). For POLAND see note I7 above. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 144 provides: "(1) The guardian, school or other institution shall be liable for damage inflicted by a minor while under the supervision of the guardian, school or other institution unless it is shown that the supervision was conducted with due care or that the damage would have occurred even under careful supervision. (2) If the minor is also liable for damage, they shall be jointly and severally liable":

20. According to the GERMAN CC § 832 a duty to supervise those entrusted in their care (particularly arising under a contract) can be imposed on persons and institutions, notwithstanding the fact they are not exercising parental care and custody, e.g. in schools, Kindergarten, educational institutions and nursing homes as well as hospitals (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 832, no. 5). However, the foregoing provision only concerns private institutions. In respect of civil service employees of state institutions, CC § 832 is displaced by the public law rules on state liability for the wrongs of public servants (Const. art. 34 in conjunction with CC § 839). A duty to supervise under CC § 832 is no longer imposed on masters and other job training instructors (Bundesbildungsgesetz [BBiG] § 6); older case law (e.g. BGH 24 June 1958, VersR 1958, 549, 550) is thereby rendered obsolete by the more recently enacted statute. Those persons with responsibility for training could nonetheless be liable as employers under CC § 831 (Soergel [-Krause], BGB[13], § 832, no. 11). Guardians, (CC § 1896) are only obliged to supervise their (adult) wards, if their sphere of supervision includes a statutory obligation for care and maintenance of the person cared for or if they were specifically appointed to supervise him or her.

21. Under AUSTRIAN CC § 1309 liability of other persons and institutions for damage caused by minors and mentally disabled adults follows the rules on the liability of parents. The supervisory duty can be established by contract (Kindergarten: OGH 11 February 1997, 10 Ob 2441/96k, RS 0107494; au pair: OGH 26 June 1901, GlUNF 1483) as well as in statutory provisions (e.g. for teachers and the management of youth custody centres: OGH 29 November 2006, FamZ 2007/35). Liability was affirmed in the following case of a dangerous mentally ill patient who absconded from a psychiatric clinic (OGH 24 November 1998, JBl 1999, 325).

22. In GREEK legal literature, it is postulated that CC art. 923 should be used analogously for cases where a natural or legal person assumes a contractual duty to supervise an individual in need of supervision owing to a psychosomatic condition or mental disability. It is contemplated that the duty would be imposed on e.g. the director of a psychiatric clinic or a self employed nurse (Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 551). The liability of state schools and teachers employed in the schools, is subject to a special regime of state liability (Kornilakis loc. cit.; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 923, no. 9).

23. PORTUGUESE CC art. 491 essentially follows the model of the German Civil Code § 832. However, it should be noted that the two provisions are not identical. CC art. 491 subjects every person who "by virtue of law or by virtue of a legal transaction is under a duty to supervise those who are naturally incapacitated" to liability based on a rebuttable presumption that the supervision was defective. The contractual duty to supervise can impinge on a large number of individuals, particularly teachers and proprietors of all types of educational institutions (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 590). The supervision of children on holiday in non-residential and open camps is specifically regulated by statute (DL no. 304/2003, DR 283/2003 I-A (revised by DL no. 109/2005 of 8 July 2005, DR 130/2005 I-A), art. 10). If a duty to supervise is imposed on more than one person (parents, teachers) then they are jointly and severally liable (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 492). "Natural incapacity" is not identical in meaning to being incapable of understanding and controlling one's acts. Consequently it can also arise that the person requiring supervision and the person whose duty it was to supervise can be solidarily liable (CC art. 497; Sottomayor, BFD LXXI (1995), 403, 409). If a seven month old baby is left unsupervised for a moment in a Kindergarten and suffers injury in this time, the management of the Kindergarten is liable to the child according to the general rules of liability (STJ 25 November 1998, BolMinJus 441 [1998] 470; also compare CA Lisbon 16 February 1995). In another case, a different approach was taken. Here a child pilfered explosives from his father and gave them to his playmate. Despite the fact that at the time of the accident the child was under the supervision of a holiday camp, the father was found liable (CA Oporto 23 March 2006). A contractual assumption of a supervisory duty, e.g by grandparents, can also be implied, provided that they assume the duty to bring up the child (STJ 15 October 2002; CA Oporto 14 February 2002, CJ XXVII [2002-1] 14; CA Oporto 28 February 2002). It will not suffice if the child was supervised merely as a favour to the parents (Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 85 [1959] 381, 409; Sottomayor loc. cit. 409; STJ 14 December 1994). Furthermore, the Supreme Court confirmed a decision from the Court of Appeal of Lisbon (of 28 January 2003, CJ XXVIII [2003-1] 79), which held that a clinic violated its contractual duty of supervision of a mentally ill in-patient who, during the night, severely injured another patient (STJ 22 September 2005).

24. According to DUTCH law, liability is imposed under the general rule of CC art. 6:162 on a person who exercises a supervisory duty but does not exercise parental control (toezichthouder). The requirements imposed are stricter when the supervison is exercised in a professional capacity (HR 12 May 1995, NedJur 1996, no. 118 p. 561). CC art. 6:162 applies also in respect of the liability of teachers (CA Amsterdam 17 July 1997, VR 1998, no. 187 p. 378). Here also, the prerequisite for liability is that, judged objectively, the child committed an unlawful act, namely that the child violated a norm of social behaviour. The liability of schools for the breach of the teacher's supervisory duty arises under the general rules pertaining to the liability of employers (CC art. 6:170). Moreover, a school can also be liable for defective organisation under CC art. 6:162 (Onrechtmatige Daad II [-Oldenhuis] art. 6:169, nos. 58A-58C, pp. 447-469).

25. ESTONIAN law does not recognise an express statutory regulation along the lines of VI.–3:104(2) but the prevailing legal position is largely identical (see Tampuu. Juridica 2003, 464–474.)

26. In SWEDEN, individuals, who supervise children but do no exercise parental control, are not subject to the special rules pertaining to liability of parents anchored in the Parental Code chap. 6 § 2(2)(third sentence) (above at I14). They are subject solely to the general c*ulpa*-liability (Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 272; HD 9 November 1984, NJA 1984, 764 [liability of a recreational facility operated by a local authority]). The same also holds true for DENMARK (Møller and Wiisbye, Erstatningsansvarsloven[6], 516 ; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 122) and FINLAND (Supreme Court 10 January 1994, HD 1994:1 A local authority was found liable for injury to a pupil inflicted during school sport. Liability was imposed on the basis that the teacher failed to clamp down on a game that was too boisterous; but damages were reduced because the injured party participated in the game]). Liability in damages on the grounds of defective supervision can also be imposed on those entrusted with the care of a mentally disturbed individual; although this liability will affect mostly state institutions (Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 54; HD 20 October 1939, NJA 1939, 501 and cf. Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 422). A special public law regime, namely an Act on correctional treatment in penal institutions exists in Sweden to deal with injuries inflicted by prisoners (Lag [1974:203] om kriminalvård i anstalt).

Section 2: Accountability without intention or negligence

VI.–3:201: Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives

(1) A person who employs or similarly engages another is accountable for the causation of legally relevant damage suffered by a third person when the person employed or engaged:

(a) caused the damage in the course of the employment or engagement; and

(b) caused the damage intentionally or negligently, or is otherwise accountable for the causation of the damage.

(2) Paragraph (1) applies correspondingly to a legal person in relation to a representative causing damage in the course of acting as such a representative. For the purposes of this paragraph, a representative is a person who is authorised to effect juridical acts on behalf of the legal person by its constitution.

COMMENTS

A. The Article in overview

Instances of strict liability for others. This Article addresses instances of liability for others. Liability under this provision is "strict"; it does not depend on the intention or negligence of the liable person. Paragraph (1) is concerned with liability for employees and auxiliary persons placed on an equal footing to them; paragraph (2) gives effect to a structurally quite similar liability of legal persons for their representatives. The premise that employers' liability for their personnel ought to be independent of personal fault on the part of the employer is currently representative of the legal conception in the vast majority of Member States. Even where the text of the respective codification clings to the requirement of a failure to supervise on the part of the employer, the courts have consistently attached such high requirements to the proof necessary to escape liability that, although theoretically possible under these provisions, such escape is practically a dead letter.

Liability of legal persons for their representatives. Legal persons can only act through their board members and, since the legal persons themselves simply cannot supervise liability tied to the negligent supervision by the legal person of its representatives is discarded on "technical" grounds. In other words the rule in paragraph (2) follows from the nature of the beast. It expresses a well-nigh unanimous European value judgement. A further rule on the liability of legal persons was not required. This is because VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (b) already clarifies that in principle all provisions of this Book apply in equal measure to natural and to legal persons. Under the general rules, legal persons are consequently already liable for civil wrongs which they themselves commit; see Comments on VI.–1:103 (Scope of application), on VI.–3:101 (Intention) and on VI.–3:102 (Negligence). Legal persons, just as much as natural persons, are liable under paragraph (1) of the present Article for those they ordinarily employ.

Public sector bodies. The Article applies to all employers and legal persons, including the state and public sector bodies. However, where the exercise of a public law function is at stake, this Book has no application, see VI.–7:103 (Public law functions and court proceedings).

"Legally relevant damage…". The Article covers liability for legally relevant damage of all types. Thus, although the provision declares strict liability, it is not limited bodily injury and property damage but applies to all kinds of legally relevant damage listed in the catalogue in the second Chapter. This corresponds to the legal situation in all Member States of the Union. A restriction of liability to personal injury and property damage only comes into the picture for certain forms of liability without intention or negligence (see the following Articles of this Section), not, however, in the context of employer's liability. On the other hand, the present Article still requires that the injured person has suffered some form of legally relevant damage within the meaning of the second Chapter of this Book. As a result, in particular liability for "ordinary" non-performance of a contractual obligation lies outside its scope of application. Cases which have to deal with a non-performance of a contractual obligation as well as non-contractual liability for damage are conversely again subject to the general conflicts rules in VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraphs (c) and (d).

"… suffered by a third person". Both paragraphs of the Article exclusively pertain to harm of "third parties". Harm of the employee or the representative by the employer or legal person remains out of the equation, as does the reverse, viz. harm of the employer or legal person by an employee or representative. The same result follows to a great extent also from VI.–7:104 (Liability of employees, employers, trade unions and employers' associations), however, only VI.–7:104, not VI.–3:201, expressly clarifies that harm of an employee by another employee in the same company is not embraced by this Book (and that it does not make any proposals on the fashioning of personal liability of employees as against third parties).

Defences. Every defence in Chapter 5 is applicable to the liability under this Article. If such a defence is not open to the employer (or legal person) personally, but to the employee (or representative), then this likewise exonerates the employer (or legal person). This results from the fact that it is not a basis of liability simply to employ someone. The basis of liability under the present Article lies in the fact that someone has duties carried out by others. Consequently, the liable person must indeed submit to everything that would have had to be submitted to had the duties been carried out personally, but only to that precisely. Where there would have been no liability had the employer done (or omitted to do) exactly what the employee did (or did not do) then the delegation of duties has not become effective for the law on liability; as a consequence, there is no room for employer's liability.

B. Employer's liability (paragraph (1))

Employees. The Article provides first and foremost for liability for employees, i.e. persons who have a normal relationship of employment with their employer. However, in conformity with almost every Member State's legal system, the provision does not lay down any liability for independent (sub-) contractors and their operatives. The requisite for liability for another is always the minimum abstract possibility of directing and supervising their conduct through binding instructions. That is not the case with independent subcontractors. Liability under VI.–3:102 (Negligence) remains of course unaffected by this.

> Illustration 1
> In an aeroplane accident, the flying instructor and two student pilots are killed. One of the two students had been flying the plane; the flight instructor had not properly fulfilled his instructional and inspectional duties. The company which runs the flying instruction centre is liable for the flight instructor's error, although he was not its employee and in fact issued personal receipts for the flying lessons. This is because the flight instructor continuously worked in the framework of the instruction centre and had been subject to the directions of the school's operator. It was furthermore subject to the very high requirements of the duty to carefully select and monitor the instructors working at the school.

Illustration 2
A Bulgarian company obtained an arbitral award against an Italian debtor from an arbitral tribunal instituted by the Bulgarian Chamber of Industry and Trade. However, the arbitral tribunal was guilty of such gross procedural defects that the Bulgarian claimant could not obtain executory title in Italy. The Chamber of Industry and Trade is not the employer of the arbitral tribunal; it does not matter that the Chamber had published lists with the names of persons whom the parties could select as arbitrator.

Illustration 3
A sailing club rents a crane in order to bring its members' boats to land. The crane firm also provides the operating personnel. As a result of the negligence of the operating staff, a harness is broken and a boat is damaged. The specialist crane company is liable for the damage, not the sailing club.

"Similarly engages". The Article is, however, not confined to the liability of employers. Even where the liable person and the person whose actions are in question are not connected through an employment relationship in the technical sense, the requisites of the provision may be fulfilled. The only decisive factor is that there is a relationship of instructional dependence (or superiority and inferiority), out of which flows an authority on the part of the liable person to control the conduct of the relevant acting party. Therefore, the Article also applies e.g. where without being detected, the employment relationship was invalid or where it has been avoided with retroactive effect at the time of the injury. A contract for service (e.g. with a lawyer) can also suffice under certain criteria, namely where a lawyer is retained for a concrete task with a precisely specified line of approach and without room for personal discretion. It is not even a requirement for the application of this Article that the person acting is gainfully working for the liable person.

Illustration 4
While standing on a ski slope, a woman is hit by a toboggan driven by a first aid relief worker. The company which operates the ski slope is liable for the accident, although it does not employ the driver of the toboggan on the basis of an employment contract. A local law stipulates in detail that operators of ski slopes must arrange a transport service for injured persons. This suffices for the inference that the questionable first aid service was employed within the scope of the organised commercial activity of the ski slope operator. The fact that the aid-worker was working voluntarily and without payment does not affect this result.

A hospital is liable for the errors of its chief physicians, as long as it has the authority to determine their area of activity and to have an influence over their working hours. Where the chief physician is a member of the board, the hospital's liability then follows from paragraph (2).

Illustration 5
The negligence of a gynaecologist causes blindness to a newborn child. The private hospital is liable for this where there is a relationship of instructional connection and dependence between it and the doctor; it does not depend on the existence of an employment contract.

In the case of temporary agency workers, in principle liability falls on the company who contracts out, or supplies, the workers. If however the agency worker is integrated into the client company over a longer period of time and this is externally documented (e.g. through wearing its work uniform), then such agency workers are as "similarly engaged" (in the sense of this Article) by the client company as its own workers.

Illustration 6
An oil company is in need of an extra truck and driver for transporting oil during a few months, due to capacity constraints. The oil company contracted a transportation firm for this purpose. The driver from the firm was given an educational course by the oil company. The driver negligently caused damage to a third person when delivering oil. This is not within the work sphere of the transportation company but rather of the oil company on account of the driver having the same tasks as the company's own drivers; he was integrated into the general organisation of the company, the latter also being his supervisor and instructor. Even though the driver was hired and paid by the transportation firm, he was to be seen as a natural integrated operator of the oil company which was familiar with, and de facto supervising and instructing, the driver's work and hence was familiar with the risk.

Illustration 7
A bystander loses an eye from a chipping thrown up in the course of excavation work. The driver of the mechanical digger responsible was subject to the instruction of the construction company, although from a technical legal perspective he was an employee of a third party. The construction company is liable for the error of the driver of the mechanical digger, even though the relationship between the two parties was not permanently laid out. It suffices that the construction company insured the work of the driver and had instructional authority over him.

Temporary relief workers. The duration of engagement plays no role in the operation of this Article. A temporary worker responsible for looking after children for a couple of hours also falls under this provision. However, a contractual or quasi-contractual relationship between the party liable and the relevant person acting must always be at issue. A spontaneous favour in everyday life does not suffice.

Illustration 8
A housewife asks a guest to carry a pan of hot soup from the kitchen to the dining table, in the course of which the soup is inadvertently emptied over the trousers of another guest. The housewife is not liable under VI.–3:201 for the damage caused.

In the course of employment or engagement (sub-paragraph (a)). Liability only takes hold where the person engaged caused the damage "in the course of the employment or engagement". The demarcation depends on whether the person acting was working within the employer's sphere of influence or was exclusively pursuing personal aims.

Illustration 9
Where a doctor is on holiday far away from home and helps a fellow holiday-maker, harming her through negligence in the process, this does not ground any liability on the part of the doctor's employer.

The risk of harm to a third person must have had its basis in the employment relationship. Therefore, intentional damage through employees is in principle included in the liability – this expressly results from sub-paragraph (b). Damage only lies outside the context of accountability (i.e. it only does not occur in the course of the employment or engagement), where the employee pursues entirely personal interests on occasion.

Illustration 10
A legal apprentice who is assigned to a lawyer under a civil law contract provides advice to a terminally ill woman who wishes to draw up her will. The information given by the apprentice on the requirements for formal validity is wrong; the will is void. The lawyer is liable under VI.–3:201 in conjunction with VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) in damages to the "heirs" now left empty-handed. The fact that advice in testamentary matters was not part of the duties that the lawyer had allocated to the apprentice, so that the latter consciously acted contrary to instructions, does not alter the result under the law governing liability.

Illustration 11
The doorman of a nightclub is beaten up by guests. He manages to flee. He runs back to his nearby apartment and gets a knife, hurries back and pursues one of the guests, now fleeing themselves, and severely injures him. The act occurs "in the course of the employment". This is because the doorman had been employed for the purposes of removing riotous guests, using force where necessary.

Employees excluded from service. An employer is not liable under VI.–3:201 for employees who have already been excluded from service at the time of the injury; under special circumstances only liability under VI.–3:102 (Negligence) is otherwise conceivable, for instance because the third person should have been warned and this warning was not given.

The manager of a pizzeria, the franchisee of a large chain, is shot and severely injured by a former employee of the franchisor; the latter had been dismissed by the manager. The franchisor is not liable for the shooting injury under the present Article or under VI.–3:102 (Negligence). Possible faults in the dismissal process would not have been causative of the damage; the intentional act interrupted the chain of causation.

Personal requisites of the person acting (sub-paragraph (b)). The liability of the employer arises if the employee causes legally relevant damage intentionally, negligently, or is otherwise accountable for its causation. The liability of the employer is not intertwined with the personal liability of the employee, rather that the latter acted intentionally or negligently within the meaning of VI.–3:101 (Intention) and VI.–3:102 (Negligence) or is responsible for damage due to one of the grounds enumerated in Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence). That is not the same. This is because it may be that under the applicable law employees are quite generally only personally liable under special requirements, e.g. only where they are guilty of qualified fault (intention; gross negligence), see VI.–7:104 (Liability of employees, employers, trade unions and employers' associations) sub-paragraph (a). In such a case the liability of the employer is already triggered by simple negligence on the part of the employee. The same goes for a mentally disabled employee. The mental disability exonerates the employee personally under the criteria in VI.–5:301 (Mental incompetence), but not the employer.

"…is otherwise accountable for the causation of the damage". Liability under this Article arises not only where the employee harms the third person through intention or negligence, but also where the employee is responsible for the damage arising due to an objective ground of accountability. This can be of practical importance particularly where the responsibility of the employee personally as a keeper is at issue, for instance as the keeper of an animal (VI.–3:203 (Accountability for damage caused by animals)) or as the keeper of a motor vehicle (VI.–3:205 (Accountability for damage caused by motor vehicles)). In the case of animals or motor vehicles used by an employee professionally in the interests of the employer, it is often questionable who the keeper is. Paragraph (1)(b) relieves the injured person from the necessity of explaining in detail the internal operational circumstances relevant to the determination of who is the keeper. The employer is also liable even if in the individual case not the keeper of the thing causing the damage.

Solidary liability. According to its basic system, liability under this Article does not displace the personal liability of the employee; rather it is added to it. Thus, where the employee as well as the employer are liable under the rules of this Book or under the applicable law (VI.–7:104 (Liability of employees, employers, trade unions and employers' associations) sub-paragraph (a); see above), then there is solidary liability (VI.–6:105(1) (Solidary liability)). Conversely, the internal relationship between employer and employee is usually determined by a special regime of labour law, which according to VI.–7:104sub-paragraph (a) displaces the general rule in VI.–6:105 (Solidary liability) paragraph (2).

C. Liability of legal persons for their representatives (paragraph (2))

Purpose of the rule. Paragraph (2) provides for liability of a legal person for damage caused by its representatives. This rule appears necessary because a representative is not always also an employee. Incidentally, the requisites of both paragraphs in VI.–3:201 are of course identical. As a result the operation of the Article is not strained by the occasionally problematic differentiation between a "simple" employee and a representative. As long as it is certain that the person acting is to be allocated to either one or the other category, the liability of the legal person for the harmful conduct of the person acting is fixed.

Representative. The second sentence of paragraph (2) defines a representative as a person who is authorised to effect juridical acts on behalf of the legal person by its constitution. It is for the terms of the latter (charter, memorandum and articles of association, etc.) to determine the persons who are its representatives. That constitution is of course subject to the statutory rules of the legal system to which the legal person owes its existence. Paragraph (2) also applies where the representative in turn is a legal person.

NOTES

I. Employers' liability and liability for independent contractors

1. Under FRENCH CC art. 1384(5) masters (maîtres) and employers (commettants) are liable for the damage caused by their servants (domestiques) and employees (préposés) during the course of the performance of their functions of employment. The term commettant encompasses the epithet of the maître, likewise the term préposé embraces the concept of the domestique; consequently it suffices to speak of liability of an employer for their employees (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[11], no. 203 p. 209). Originally the personal liability of the employee was 'cumulated' with that of the employer, however, since the decision of Cass.ass.plén. 25 February 2000, Bull.ass.plén. 2000, no. 2 p. 3 the former is only relevant if the employee exceeds the scope of his duties assigned to him by his employer. CC art. 1384(5) requires a rapport de préposition between employer and employee and this is based on a relation d´autorité, i.e. authority to give directions. In respect of this authority, a legal basis ought not to be required. It is sufficient that this authority derives from the actual prevailing state of affairs in the individual case (Flour/Aubert/Savaux loc. cit. no. 211 p. 217). In the majority of cases, an employment contract provides the basis for the relation d´autorité (Brun, Responsabilité civile extracontractuelle, nos. 535-536 pp. 270-271). Furthermore, as derived from the wording of CC art. 1384(5) the only additional requirement is that the préposé caused the damage. At least, according to the prevailing rule, damage caused by the employee in his capacity as gardien of a thing (CC art. 1384(1)) should therefore not be taken into account in this context because it is not possible to be simultaneously préposé and gardien (Flour/Aubert/Savaux loc. cit. no. 214 pp. 221-222). The employer is regarded as the gardien of the thing which is utilised by the préposé in the course of his employment. This state of affairs entails the result that the employer is directly liable under CC art. 1384(1). This issue is, however, the subject of contentious debate. A number of influential voices argue that liability under CC art. 1384(5) should be not only based on a faute des préposé, and argue that strict liability ought to suffice, in order to trigger the liability of the employer which is understood as a liability which does not depend on fault (Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[3], no. 807 p. 1010). The final requirement is that the damage must have been caused within the functions for which the employee was employed. Drawing the line of demarcation is not always straightforward. It is however incontrovertible that the employer is not liable, when an employee commits a faute, which does not bear any relation to the performance of his duties and responsibilities (Cass.civ. 23 November 1961, D. 1962 Som. 85). The borderline cases are usually discussed under the heading abus de fonction. On this point Cass.ass.plén. 19 May 1988, Bull.ass.plén. 1988, no. 5 p. 7) has clarified that, le commettant s´exonère de sa responsabilité à la triple condition que son préposé ait agi hors des fonctions auxquelles il était employé, sans autorisation et à des fins étrangères à ses attributions. Independent contractors are personally liable for injuries suffered by a third party and are moreover liable when the unlawful act ensued during the course of performing duties on the instructions of the principal (CC art. 1992; Cass.civ. 20 April 1977, Bull. civ. 1977, I, no. 181).

2. BELGIAN CC art. 1384(3) corresponds to French CC art. 1384(5): Masters and employers are liable for the damage caused by servants and employees in the functions for which they have been employed. Therefore, it is also necessary in Belgium to have a relationship of appointment/subordination which is largely derived from a contract of employment. However it can also be grounded on a de facto state of affairs (van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 320-321). The premise adopted is that a person should solely have the ability to exercise a power of control or direction in one's own affairs (Tilleman and Claeys [-Fagnart], Buitencontractuele aansprakelijkheid, 172, 186, no. 38). Furthermore, there must be grounds for imposing liability on the préposé, namely that either a faute or requires another factor triggering liability (Fagnart loc. cit. no. 42 pp. 187-188). The employee's lack of necessary tortious capacity has no bearing on the liability of the employer (van Gerven loc. cit. 323). Finally the préposé must have caused the damage in the course of performing the functions for which he was employeed. The courts have interpreted these criteria in a pro-plaintiff manner. It suffices that the conduct ait été accompli pendant le temps de la fonction et soit, même indirectement et occasionnellement, en relation avec ladite fonction. Consequently the employer can only excuplate himself from liability upon proof that the employee acted outside the scope of his functions, sans autorisation, et à des fins étrangères à ses attributions (Cass. 26 October 1989, Pas. belge 1990, I, no. 123 p. 241). In Belgium, the liability under CC art. 1384(3) is also strict; it is not open to the employer to exonerate himself by proving that he was not at fault in either the selection or supervision of the employee or that he could not have either foreseen or hindered the conduct of the employee (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene, TPR 2000, 1551, 1867, no. 138). Employees may be liable under art. 18 of the Law of 3 July 1978 concerning employment contracts, for damage inflicted on a third party during the course of their employment, if they acted in an intentional or grossly negligent manner (faute lourde). Employees are only liable in ordinary negligence (a faute légère if such conduct was a regular occurence. In respect of independant contractors the legal rules in Belgium and France are identical (CC art. 1992). The principal is however, liable for culpa in contrahendo on the part of his contracting agent against a third party which is not simultaneously a tort (Cass. 20 June 2005, no. JC056K5_2, no. de rôle C030105F; Cass. 16 February 2000, no. JC012G2_2, no. de rôle C990477Nt).

3. SPANISH CC art. 1903 provides, that (1) Liability for damages does not solely arise "on the basis of personal acts and omissions", but also for the acts of those persons for whom they are responsible for ... (4) Owners or directors of companies or establishments are liable for the damage caused by their employees in the services of the branches in which they are employed or on account of their duties ... Liability referred to under this article ceases when the persons referred to therein prove that they employed all the assiduity of a good father of a family to prevent the damage from occuring. ". CC art. 1904 permits an unqualified right of recourse on the part of the person incurring liabilty under CC art. 1903 against the employee (in the case of a a teacher, the right of seek indemnity from the employee is restricted to cases where the teacher acted with intention or gross negligence). The prerequiste of liability under CC art. 1903 are as follows (i) a relationship of subordination or dependence between the person who directly caused the damage and the person incurring liability (ii) fault on the part of the principal (which connotes a presumption of fault which can be rebutted, however this argument rarely succeeds in relieving liability before the Tribunal Supremo, see e.g. TS 9 June 1998, RAJ 1998 (2) no. 3717 p. 5368; TS 10 March 1997, RAJ 1997 (2) no. 2483 p. 3786; TS 29. März 1996, RAJ 1996 (2) no. 2203 p. 2993), and (iii) a fault on the part of the employee. Also.under this rubric ,the courts lean towards a iuris tantum presumption of fault unless the employee belongs to a particular occupation, in respect of which, especially in the case of doctors, a reveral of the burden of proof would not othewise occur.(Rodríguez y Rowinski, Die Haftung für Hilfspersonen im spanischen Recht, 79). In practical terms the employer can only escape liability along these lines, if he can prove that the employee acted beyond the scope of his duties of employment (TS 18 March 1986, RAJ 1986 (1) no. 1268 p. 1238; TS 2 July 1990, RAJ 1990 (5) no. 5766 p. 7471) or when the employee had caused intentional damage or in breach of the orders or instructions received (TS 13 April 1981, RAJ 1981 (1) no. 1637 p. 1337; TS 29 November 1982, RAJ 1982 (3) no. 7217 p. 4769). According to the wording of art. 1903 owners and directors of establishments and companies can also incur liability (dueños o directores de un establecimiento o empresa). "Directors"are all altos cargos (Managing Directors CEO or Executive Directors on the Board of Directors, chief operating officers,Head of administration) under the Employment Contracts Act (Estatuto de los Trabajadores, Real Decreto Legislativo 1/1995 por el que se aprueba el texto refundido de la Ley del Estatuto de los Trabajadores of 24 March) art. 2 (Real Decreto 1382/1985 por el que se regula la relación laboral de carácter especial del personal de alta dirección of 1 August), however middle management are not embraced by this term. They are classed as dependientes. A relationship of dependence to company is given when an individual is subject to its control, direction or supervision (Barceló Domenech, Responsabilidad del empresario, 216). In respect of independent contractors, liability does not arise under CC art. 1903 (Pantaleón Prieto, Responsabilidad por hecho ajeno, 5957; Salvador Coderch and Gómez Ligüerre, InDret 3/2002, 15; TS 14 May 2001, RAJ 2001 (3) no. 6204 p. 9535; TS 18 June 1979, RAJ 1979 (2) no. 2895 p. 2353; TS 4 January 1982, RAJ 1982 (1) no. 178 p. 117; TS 9 July 1984, RAJ 1984 (2) no. 3801 p. 2902). On the other hand, liability may arise, if the main contractor retains the authority to supervise, control or instruct the personnel of the sub contractor. It has not as yet been comprehensively clarified, whether and on what grounds a person commissioning construction work is liable for the unlawful acts of the building firm and its employees under CC art. 1903(4); cf. on this issue TS 26 May 1989, RAJ 1989 (3) no. 3890 p. 4420; TS 12 November 1986, RAJ 1986 (4) no. 6386 p. 6231; TS 31 October 1984, RAJ 1984 (3) no. 5159 p. 4054; TS 5 July 1979, RAJ 1979 (2) no. 2931 p. 2390; TS 18 June 1979, RAJ 1979 (2) no. 2895 p. 2353). The general principle holds that an employer will only escape liability for the damages inflicted on a third party by the acts of his employees, if he can adduce proof that there is no connection between the damage caused and the duties assigned to the employee (TS 19 November 1991, RAJ 1991 (6) no. 8412 p. 11517; TS 26 November 1984, RAJ 1984 (3) no. 5992 p. 4715). In contrasst to CP art. 120 nos. 4 and 5 the liability of the principal under CC art. 1903 is not subsidiary to the personal liability of the employee (TS 16 March 1987, RAJ 1988 (6) no. 10213 p. 10001; TS 8 February 1989, RAJ 1989 (1) no. 756 p. 785); rather a joint and several liability arises (TS 14 February 1964, RAJ 1964 (1) no. 749 p. 453; TS 7 February 1986, RAJ 1986 (1) no. 446 p. 409; TS 2 February 1987, RAJ 1987 (1) no. 673 p. 580). For a consideration of the prequisites for liability in damages for employers governed by the Código Penal please see Rodríguez y Rowinski loc. cit. 105).

4. According to the ITALIAN CC art. 2049 masters and employers incur direct and strict liability (Alpa, Trattato di diritto civile IV, 673); the courts view the grounds for liability in the „operating risk" of the defendant (Cass. 18 July 2003, no. 11241, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, fasc. 7-8). CC art. 2049 requires a rapporto di preposizione and a rapporto di occasionalità necessaria between the unlawful act and the duties assigned to the employee. The actual duration of the relationship of subordination is not relevant. The decisive issue is whether the actor was factually under the control of another and acted on that other's account (Cass. 24 May 1988, no. 3616, Giur.it. 1989, I, 1, 99). The criterion of factual control can effect the result that the employer in the labour law sense, is not liable under CC art. 2049, rather liability is borne by the individual with day to day responsibility for supervision and assignment of tasks (Cass. 19 December 2003, no. 19553, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, fasc. 12). The necessary connection to the duties carried out is present when the assigned task facilitates the commission of the illicit act or renders the performance of it easier; it is not relevant that the employee did not adhere to the instructions given to him by the employer (Cass. 10 December 1998, no. 12471, Giur.it. 1999, 2031; Cass. 20 March 1999, no. 2574, Danno e resp. 1999, 1021; Cass. 9 June 1995, no. 6506, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, fasc. 6). The master is liable when the servant fulfills the requirements for the commission of a tort. However, masters are also liable for the servants who lack tortious capacity (Cass. 12 November 1979, no. 5851, Giust.civ.Mass. 1979, fasc. 11) and for torts committed in an emergency (Cass. 24 July 1951, no. 2095; Monateri, Manuale della responsabilità civile, 353). CC art. 2049 has also been held to apply to employers of employees who are minors (Cass. 10 May 2000, no. 5957, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 980) and to state adminstration for the acts of civil servants (Cass. 9 February 2004, no. 2423, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 2). Employer and employees are joint and severally liable.(CC art. 2055; see Cass. 9 November 2005, no. 21685, Foro it. 2006, I, 1454).

5. HUNGARIAN CC § 348(1) establishes strict liability for employees (and also for members of a cooperative). When an employee causes damage to a thrid party in connection with his employment, in the absence of a conflicting statutory provision, the employer is liable to the injured party for the damage caused. However, if the injured person is not a third party but another employee of the same employer, CC § 348(1) does not apply (BH 2008/59). The employer can only exonerate himself from liability if the employee could also adduce grounds to exculpate himself from liability. However, proof that the employer acted with care in the selection and supervision of the employee will not suffice (Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II[2], 606/1; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 137). The conduct of the employee who directly caused the damage must satisfy the requisites laid down under CC § 339 and it must occur in connection with the employment (BH 1988/239).Accidents with vehicles of the employer are governed by the provsions relating to the liability of keepers under CC § 345, thereby not encompassed by CC § 348. An employer is also keeper of a vehicle, which, although it belongs to the employee, was financed as working equipment by the employer (BH 1991/148). CC § 348 is employed in respect of interns and apprentices (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1293-1294). The link with a relationship of employment is not necessarily interrupted by the employee not adhering to instructions (BH 2001/526; BH 1986/230; BH 1983/443). The employer's right to claim of compensation/indemnity from the employee is covered by the Labour Code (CC § 350(5)), which restricts the claim according to its merits and amount (Labour Code, Law no. XXII/1992, §§ 166-168). As regards „borrowered" workers, responsibility must be borne by both „employers" (Labour Code § 193/C). Likewise, the liability of civil servants is governed by special rules (CC § 349(1)). CC § 350(1) establishes liability based on a refutable presumption of fault on the part of the principal for contractually authorised representatives and „agents". However, this article does not apply in respect of individuals who perform harzardous activities. In respect of permanent agency or if the principal and agent are companies, the court can also apply CC § 348 (CC § 350(2)). As regards the internal relationship, principal and agent are individually liable. CC § 350(1) only governs principal-agency relationships, it does not impinge on a contract for services or contracts of carriage (Benedek loc. cit. 1308). If the agent can exonerate himself, then the principal is also exculpated (Benedek loc. cit.; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 164). The regulation of POLISH CC on damage occasioned by a person in the course of activities entrusted to them by another is not uniform. The Civil Code distinguishes between an activity entrusted (on a contractual or even factual basis) to an independent person (CC art. 429) and one entrusted to a dependant person, who remains under the direction of and subject to the instructions of the person entrusting them with it (CC art. 430). In the first case the employer is accountable for culpa in eligendo – the fault is presumed – and may escape liability by showing that he was not at fault while choosing the employee or that he entrusted the activity to one who carries out this activity professionally. Whether the employee acted negligently is irrelevant; however, liability arises only when the conduct is unlawful (Pietrzykowski [-Safjan], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 429 p. 1213). The second scenario is a case of liability without fault; the employer is accountable for the damage only if the employee was at fault while causing the damage. CC art. 430 applies mostly to damage occasioned by employees, whose personal liability vis-à-vis third persons is excluded by Labour Code art. 120. However it is equally applicable in other cases where the person causing the damage is under statutory duty (e.g. in the army), a contractual duty, or even a factual duty (e.g. in family relations) to comply with the instructions of the person entrusting the activity (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 207; Czachórski, Zobowiązania[10], 257). In the current law the relation of dependence between the person entrusting the activity and the one to whom it is entrusted is interpreted in a rather extensive way. An organisational dependence suffices as is the case between a person operating a hospital and physicians working there who are actually independent within the field of medical treatment (Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit.; Czachórski loc. cit.; Safjan loc. cit. art. 430 p. 1217).

6. Pursabt to GERMAN CC § 831(1)(first sent.) a person, who employs another to do any work is bound to compensate for any damage which that other unlawfully causes to a third party in the performance of his work. The employer or master has the possibilty, derived from the wording of CC § 831(1)(second sent.), of exculpating himself. According to this provision, the duty to compensate does not arise if the employer has exercised the necesasry care in the selection of the employee/servant and also exercised the necessary care in the event that he had to supply appliances or equipment or supervise the work, or if the damage would have arisen, notwithstanding the exercise of care. A person is employed to do work when assigned duties by another, and is integrated into that person's sphere of influence and is,to a certain extent, dependent on that person (BGH 12 June 1997, NJW-RR 1998, 250, 251). It suffices that the employer/master can restrict the duties of the actor at any stage or can relieve them from their duties, or can delineate the duration and extent of those duties (BGH 30 June 1966, BGHZ 45, 311, 313). As a consequence, independent contractors are not employees/servants (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 831 no. 5). The damage suffered by a third party in the execution of tasks during the course of employment, when a direct intrinsic connection exists between the damaging act and the function of the assigned duty (BGH 6 October 1970, NJW 1971, 31; BGH 14 February 1989, NJW-RR 1989, 723, 725); his conduct should not exceed the scope of the duties entrusted to him (BGH 13 July 1977, WM 1977, 1169). The servant/employee acts "wrongfully" when his conduct objectively fulfills one of the requirements of CC §§ 823 ff and a ground of justification is not extant. The fault of the employee/servant ought not to be relevant (Sprau loc. cit. no. 8). An extremly high bar has been set regarding the proof sufficent to relieve the master/employer of liability and is accordingly rarely successful. Moreover, in order to evade this requirement, the courts have had covert resort to quasi contractual constructions. The courts have also developed a very strict general supervisory duty derived from CC § 823(1). The practical significance of the latter lies in the fact that independent contractors can thus be incorporated within its scope (Medicus, Schuldrecht II[13], no. 859).

7. The point of departure in AUSTRIAN law is “of itself” CC § 1315. The prequisite of liability under this provision is that the employer appoints dangerous (knowing that that person is dangerous) or an unfit person to carry out appointed functions. The restrictiveness of this provision is viewed as an unsatisfactory, therefore the courts and academics increasingly resorted to devices which attempt to circumvent the application of the provision. One such avoidance strategy is the extending the application of CC § 1313a, which, in its original manifestation, was conceived to cover contractual liability (strict liability for principals for all misconduct of person employed to perform an obligation), to embrace all types of legal obligations. Utilising the concept of culpa in contrahendo and the rules in respect to contracts with a protective purpose in favour of third parties reinforces this strategy. From a systematic viewpoint, CC § 1313a connotes an exception to the general rules of CC § 1313, according to which a person is generally not responsible for the unlawful acts of another. As regards relationships arising under the law of obligations, extant prior to the occurance of the damaging event, the appointment of the person employed to perform an obligation should not lead to the creditor being disadvantaged (CC § 1313a; OGH 30 May 1994, SZ 67/101). The same also holds true, if the person appointed (helper) avails himself of additional helpers (OGH 2 March 1955, SZ 28/61; OGH 24 May 1972, JBl 1973, 151). The prerequisite for liability is the fault of the person appointed (negligence or intention: OGH 26 April 2000, ZVR 2000/102 p. 423; OGH 25 November 1959, SZ 32/153; OGH 7 Ob 400/97t, RdW 1998, 459) and that when performing, he acted within the scope of the duties assigned to him by his employer (OGH 26 April 2000 loc. cit.). In determining whether the conduct was either intentional or negligent, the decisive factor is if the performance of the conduct had been ordained by the employer (OGH 7 September 1988, JBl 1989, 175; OGH 24 April 1991, JBl 1992, 31; OGH 6 October 2000, SZ 73/151). If, at the very minimum, there is a lack of a special legal relationship akin to contract between employer and the party who causes the damage, the sole remaining possibility for the creditor is a cause of action under CC § 1315. In this context, the determining factor is the presence of fault in selecting the employee/servant. According to case law defective supervision will also suffice. The concept of “helper” has been given a broad interpretation, namely the term can also encompass a contractor, provided that the necessary integration in the management and organisational fields has taken place (OGH 28 February 1968, JBl 1968, 473; OGH 25 April 1995, SZ 68/79); the decisive factor is whether the contractor is bound to abide by any instructions given (OGH 28 October 1975, SZ 48/110). However, there are also a number of ad hoc provisions which extend far beyond CC § 1315 and ordain strict liability,(e.g. EKHG § 19(2); AtomHG § 17; ForstG § 56(2)). Against this backdrop the courts have developed the tenet that keepers of dangerous things are vicariously liable for the gross fault of persons whom they have appointed to perform an obligation (OGH 2 April 1958, JBl 1958, 550; OGH 20 October 1981, JBl 1982, 150).In addition, legal persons are liable not only for the damages caused by their organs, liability is extended to embrace all types of representatives (OGH 17 July 1997, SZ 70/150; OGH 28 February 2000, ZVR 2000/90 p. 376; OGH 20 December 2000, JBl 2001, 525). In the interim, this “liability for representatives” has also been employed and is has been used to the detriment of natural persons.(OGH 20 May 1998, JBl 1998, 713 [Liability of a building firm for engineers in executive positions]; OGH 12 September 2002, ZVR 2003/108 p. 394).

8. GREEK CC art. 922 refers in an old fashioned manner to “masters” and “servants”, however the current meaning given to this provision has transcended the problems associated with this formulation. The provision implements a genuine objective liability for damage which is inflicted on a third party by a subordinate employee (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 922, nos. 3, 11, 38; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 533). According to the wording of the provision, an unlawful act of a subordinate is sufficient to invoke liability; fault on his part is not required. However, prevailing legal opinion considers this state of affairs amount to a legislative blunder which was influenced by German law. Therefore, legal scholarship only dispenses with the minimum requirement of negligence on the part of the employee, if the legal provision infringed by the employee also dispenses with the requirement of fault (Stathopoulos loc. cit. no. 23; A.P. 156/1953, NoB 1 [1953] 192; A.P. 1125/1977, NoB 26 [1978] 934; CA Thessaloniki 522/1990, EllDik 31 [1990] 1331; otherwise Michaelides-Nouaros, EllDik 29 (1988), 1641). The prequisite of liability under CC art. 922 is the existence of a relationship of subordination between the master and person appointed to perform a duty (ErmAK [-Michaelides-Nouaros], art. 334, no. 17; A.P. 651/2001, Arm 45 [2001] 1475; A.P. 248/1992, EllDik 34 [1993] 1312; Areopag 385/1988, NoB 37 [1989] 258). The search for a concrete line of demarcation has proven to be difficult (Georgiades, FS Larenz 1983, pp. 175, 185, 192). The courts have taken an increasingly relaxed approach to the relationship of subordination. It has been affirmed in e.g a case between a company and independent contractor, where the company had reserved the right to instruct and supervise the contractor (A.P. 942/1976, NoB 25 [1977] 359; Areopag 300/1980, NoB 28 [1980] 1723, 1724). Damage is caused "in the course of performing his duties" if the conduct of the employee is intrinsically connected to the task that he has been assigned (Stathopoulos loc. cit. no. 33). The fact that the damage occurs merely on the occasion of the duty should not break the connection.(A.P. 380/1979, NoB 27 [1979] 1437). It is suggested, that for cases in which the employee has not adhered to the instructions given, a distinction should be drawn between typical and abnormal dangers. Theft, or acts of revenge on the part of the employee cannot ground liability of the employer, unless, the risk that such torts would occur was increased owing to the employee's engagement.

9. PORTUGUESE CC art. 500 has, in a similar fashion, established vicarious liability for employers. The prequisites of liability under this article are that (i) the person appointed to perform the duty (comissário) is tortiously liable and (ii) the act was commited in the course of performing the duties assigned to him by his employer, even in the event that the act causing damage was intentionally committed or occurred because the employee failed to adhere to the instructions of the employer (comitente). Employer and employee are jointly and severally liable to the third party (CC arts. 497(2) and 500(3)); in respect of their internal dealings, the employer has a right to seek indemnity from the employee, provided that he himself was not at fault (CC art. 500(3); see Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 639). The employee must have acted either intentionally or negligently in order for the liability of the employer to arise (CC art. 500(1) in fine; STJ 26 October 1978); presumed fault which is not refuted suffices (CC arts. 503(3) and 506(1)), however, a mere objective liability on the part of the employee will not be sufficient (CC art. 503(1) and (3); see Antunes Varela loc. cit. 644; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 513; see also Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 569). The employer is only liable for damage caused by the comissário when exercising the function to which he was entrusted (CC art. 500(2); Almeida Costa loc. cit. 567). The relation of "representation" (CC art. 500(1)) consists of the execution of material or legal acts which are part of a task or function entrusted to someone other than the comitente (Pessoa Jorge, Ensaio sobre os pressupostos da responsabilidade civil, 148), a mere temporal or spatial connection with the assigned duty will not suffice (Antunes Varela loc. cit. 642; STJ 14 October 1987, BolMinJus 370 [1987] 519). In this respect, a cleaning contractor will not be held liable under CC art.500 for the theft of a credit card by staff (STJ 2 March 2006), similarly a football club ought not to be liable for a player who poleaxes a referee (CA Coimbra 13 December 2000). On the othe hand, the operator of a mine will be liable for errors of his employees in dealing with explosive substances (STJ 26 October 1978).

10. DUTCH CC art. 6:170(1) is a legislative measure which places the risk liability of the employer on a statutory footing. According to this provision, an employer is liable for damage caused to a third party by his subordinates. The prerequisites for liability are as follows (i) misconduct on the part of the actor, (ii) a relationship of superiority/subordination, and (iii) a functional relationship between the tasks assigned to the subordinate and his wrongful conduct. CC art. 6:170(1) consequently requires liability on the part of the employee, which entails that the employer is entitled to rely on all applicable defences and grounds of justification, which the employee would be entitled to assert (Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk (-Lankhorst), T & C Burgerlijk Wetboek, art. 6:170 no. 2 p. 2350). Injuries which were caused by the employee under the influence of a physical or mental defect, will not be attributed to the employer, if the conduct of the employee constituted a positive act (otherwise: in respect of an omission, CC art. 6:165) (Onrechtmatige Daad II [-Oldenhuis], art. 6:170, no 35 p. 126). The concept of "subordinate" (ondergeschikte) is given a broad interpretation. The core idea is found in the existence of a juridical relationship of authority. The existence of an employment contract is not the decisive factor here, rather that a person either gives instructions and has the power of control or receives instructions and must adhere to them (Oldenhuis loc. cit. no. 8 p. 41; HR 28 May 1999, NedJur 1999 no. 564 p. 3109 [Commune in their relations with a primary school,teacher]]; HR 2 March 2001, NedJur 2001 no. 649 p. 4809 [hospital doctor]). With respect to the functional relationship between the act of the employee and the employment, the basic principle holds that the employer is always liable if the employment relationship has increased the liklihood that such an error would materialise. This requirement is relatively easy to prove (e.g. CFI Utrecht 25 September 2002, NedJur 2002 no. 592 p. 4373 und HR 12 April 2002, NedJur 2003 no. 138 p. 920). In addition, the courts also examine whether the employer has the authority to prohibit the conduct in question. Demonstrating that the employer had in fact prohibited the questionable conduct, and that, in spite of this prohibition the employee continued to act in defiance of the instructions does not relieve the employer from liability (HR 1 February 1957, NedJur 1957 no. 175 p. 311; CA The Hague 19 April 1963, NedJur 1964 no. 407 p. 975; CA Amsterdam 2 February 1961, NedJur 1961 no. 190 p. 398; Oldenhuis loc. cit. nos. 38-39 pp. 137-153). If the employee commits a crime, independent of any duty which was assigned to him by the employer, the employer is not liable. Questions of demarcation are resolved by balancing all of the relevant consideration, namely, a consideration of the type of damage, the time and place of the act causing damage and the resources used to commit the act (Lankhorst loc. cit. no. 2c p. 2350). As regards damage caused by persons working outside of the business or profession of the employer (e.g. housekeeper or Babysitter) CC art. 6:170(2) mitigates the liability of the employer; above all, the employer is only liable if there is a close relationship between the event causing damage and the duty that the employee has been assigned to carry out (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 715). In contrast in the commercial world CC art. 6:171 introduces liability for principals for torts committed by independent contractors employed by him.: "if a person who is not a subordinate/servant performs duties on the order of another person, in the exercise of that other person's business, and a tort is committed by the non servant during the course of the performance of these duties, the commissioning person is also liable for the damage suffered by the third party." This regulation is based on the rationale that the injured party should be able to regard all activities generated by the operations of the defendant as indivisible (Parl. Gesch. VI, 712, 728-729; Oldenhuis loc. cit. art. 6:171 no. 3 p. 13). CC art. 6:171 is not applicable when the independent contractor is only liable under a tort ofstrict liabilty and this tort does not involve questions of vicarious liability.

11. ESTONIAN LOA § 1054(1) establishes strict liability of an individual who engages another person to carry out financial or professional activities on their behalf "on a regular basis". LOA § 1054(2) is also a strict liability provision, governing the liability of a person who avails himself of the services of another in performing his duties, similarly according to LOA § 1054(3), a strict liability provision, governing the liability of an individual who calls on another to perform a service for him. Liability only arises if the person performing the service acts in an intentional or negligent manner and commits an unlawful act (Supreme Court 3-2-1-53-06, RT III 2006, 33, 283; Tampuu, Juridica 2003, 464–474.

12. In SWEDEN Damages Liability Act chap. 3 § 1 provides for the liability of persons engaging employees in their undertaking, with regard to damages caused by employees in the course of their engagement for that employer. The employer is accountable for (i) personal injuries and damage to property, where the employee was 'wrongful or negligent'; (ii) pure economic loss, where the employee committed a crime; and (iii) damage to incorporeal personality rights (as defined in chap. 2 § 3), where the employee was 'wrongful or negligent'. The concept of employer's vicarious liability is generally known as principalansvar. The particular requirement for accountability, including both intentional and negligent acts or omissions, - 'wrongful or negligent' – under the above mentioned heads of liability are intended to make the assessment more objective, whereby the employer is not excused from liability due to particular circumstances related to the individual employee (inexperience etc.). However, the case-law does not make any particular distinction (HD 20 December 1979, NJA 1979, 773 [operator of an excavator caused damage, but was not found negligent due to his youth and inexperience, instead the employer was held liable for his negligence of selecting such an operator, i.e. for culpa in eligendo]; see also HD 26 September 1974, NJA 1974, 476). A particular employee must not be identified as negligent. It is sufficient for negligence to be attributed to the employer's workforce in general (so-called anonymous and cumulated negligence, see Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 80-82). Damage must be caused in the course of the employee's engagement which requires a sufficient link between the act or omission and the engaged person's duties at the employer's enterprise. Damage caused during the engaged person's free time, outside the office or due to acts of a private nature are thus generally excluded. However, it is not necessary that the act causing damage is specifically part of the employee's duty to his employer or in the latter's interest. In HD 15 November 1977, NJA 1977, 639, a group of workers assigned to clear the area under power lines from trees, also cut down trees in the near vicinity on the request of neighboring property owners, which still was considered in the course of the workers' engagement. Liability for pure economic loss requires a closer connection to the employer's enterprise and is related to the latter's possibility of preventing the criminal act (HD 13 July 2000, NJA 2000, 380; HD 4 December 2000, NJA 2000, 639; Kleineman, JT 2000-01, 924). In all cases a subordinate relation to the employer, who supervises the worker, is regarded as an indication for a person being an employee. However, persons with supervisory or controlling functions may also be regarded as employees (Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 5). Even persons without formal employment, such as a house caretaker who sporadically manages house property or a functionary of a non-profit sports association are regarded as employees

(Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 157). However, a person is generally not liable for other independent subcontractors or their operatives (Bengtsson and Strömbeck loc. cit. 79). Certain statutory duties may not be passed on by engaging an independent contractor though ('non-delegable duties', such as the duty of clearing ones roof from snow for public safety: Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit.166), and if a certain type of enterprise is regulated under a strict liability regime, this also usually encompasses liability for subcontractors or leased services. Leges specialis may also extend the scope of vicarious liability, such as the Maritime Code providing liability of the ship-owner for the pilot, and Environmental Code chap. 32 providing vicarious liability for persons engaging independent subcontractors for excavation and activities dangerous to the environment. Some cases involve difficulties as to who the liable employer is, especially when a person engages workers from independent subcontractor. This must be decided on a case-by-case basis, where the question of who controls, instructs and supervises the professional will be decisive (HD 20 December 1979, NJA 1979, 773; HD 8 January 1992, NJA 1992, 21). FINNISH Damages Liability Act chap. 3 § 1, based on the Swedish regulation, provides that the employer is liable for damage caused by his employee, or a person comparable to an employee, through 'wrongful or negligent' conduct. Furthermore, it is provided that such liability also covers independent contractors if they "can be regarded as employees", having regard to the duration of the engagement, the nature of the work and other circumstances of the particular case. The notion of accountability – 'wrongful or negligent' – makes it, as in Sweden, possible to establish liability even if negligence cannot be traced to an individual employee (Finnish Supreme Court 24 August 1982, HD 1982 II 120). The principle of 'non-delegable duties' is codified under this provision, whereby liability is vicarious regarding activities which are prescribed by law, even if they are carried out by independent contractors (see e.g. Finnish Supreme Court 20 October 1992, HD 1992:142). In DENMARK, the basis for employers' vicarious liability is derived from a provision of the ancient Danish Code (1683), § 3-19-2, providing that the house master answers for his servant (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 105-120, Trolle, Risiko & Skyld[2], 222-257). The liability is vicarious as to persons involved in entrepreneurial activity, but also to persons with a comparable relationship such as parents and baby-sitters, house owners and self-employed gardeners – the rationale being that persons who carry out work which is being instructed, supervised and controlled are encompassed (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 107; Eastern CA 15 February 1958, UfR 1958, 628). The presence of a formal employment relationship (involving a contract, certain duration, or even salary) is not decisive (HD 29 June 1937, UfR 1937, 785). Negligence or intent of the employee must be established. However, as in Sweden and Finland, the fault or negligence may be 'anonymous' or 'cumulated' (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 110). Further, some connection to the engagement is required for vicarious liability; the employer does not answer for abnormal acts, such as sexual harassment (Western CA 6 December 1993, UfR 1994, 215) or a fight during the break (HD 30 November 1951, UfR 1952, 73). By contrast, liability was established for a harbor worker who put out his cigarette on the goods which he was unloading (SH 5 August 1965, UfR 1967, 664). Like in Sweden, in principle, independent contactors are accountable for themselves (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 107). Problems arise when several employers are involved, especially situations involving the temporary engagement of workers in one firm from another, and typically a person leasing equipment together with an operator. The general contention is that less importance is placed in who's interest work is being done, and more regard is had to who instructs and supervises the worker (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 112, Trolle loc. cit. 256, Selvig, Såkalte husbondsansvar, 168; SH 2 August 1983, UfR 1983,1065; HD 13 December 1990, UfR 1991, 106). However, there are situations where the engaging person is held liable for an independent subcontractor (see e.g. Western CA 10 March 1981, UfR 1981, 564: land owner engaged an independent contractor for spraying his fields with chemicals, neighboring crops were damaged; the land owner was held liable because the spraying was part of the general caretaking of the land; see further (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 134-148). In DENMARK, liability is not passed on to the employer if the employee only answers for strict accountability (Eastern CA 29 September 1970, UfR 1970, 940). Correspondingly, in SWEDEN strict accountability is also not passed on (Bengtsson and Strömbeck loc. cit. 80), and the same holds for FINLAND (Supreme Court 21 September 1993, HD 1993:114).

13. In SCOTLAND whether a principal is vicariously liable for the delicts of an agent on the same basis as employers are for the delicts of their employees remains to be definitively determined: cf. M. v. Hendron [2007] CSIH 27 at [131], 2007 SLT 467 at 497 (Lord Osborne, reserving his opinion on that issue).

II. Liability of legal persons for their representatives

14. According to FRENCH case law, fault on the part of a decision-making body acting on the behalf of a legal person is regarded as the fault on the part of the legal person itself (already detailed in this regard Cass.civ. 15 January 1872, D.P. 1872, 1, 165). The decision-making body is the legal representive of the legal person (Cass.com. 8 December 1981, Rev.soc. 1981, 351, note Bouloc). In this context, a single individual can constitute the competent body as can a class of individuals can also be a competent organ (le Tourneau and Cadiet, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2006/2007], no. 1373). The decision-making body and the legal person are liable in solidum (Ghestin, Les conditions de la responsabilité[3], no. 855). The legal position in BELGIUM is identical. In the event that there is fault on the part of the decision-making body but this fault cannot be qualified as a tort, the courts have recourse to CC art. 1992 (Cass. 20 June 2005, no. JC056K5_1, no. de rôle C030105F).

15. In SPAIN, liability of a legal person for the wrongful acts of a decision-making body acting on its behalf is subject to the rules anchored in the basic norm, CC art. 1902. Liability is not attributed on the basis of the provisions concerning the liability of employers under CC art. 1903. The decision-making body and the legal person are regarded as one single entity Correspondingly, for the large part in academic scholarship there is a tendency to differentiate between damage caused by a decision-making body and damage caused by a mere representative, only in the latter case is liability governed by CC art. 1903(4) (Albaladejo and Díaz-Alabart [-Capilla Roncero], Comentarios al Código Civil y Compilaciones Forales I(3), 865; Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema de Derecho Civil II, 556-557). The courts have also rountinely adopted this bifurication (TS 29 September 1964. RAJ 1964 (2) no. 4097 p. 2522; TS 3 July 1968, RAJ 1968 (2) no. 3610 p. 2426; TS 23 January 1986, RAJ 1986 (1) no. 113 p. 124; TS 19 February 1985, RAJ 1985 (1) no. 561 p. 464; TS 25 October 2000, RAJ 2000 (5) no. 9588 p. 14895; TS 27 May 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 3930 p. 7257 [on each occasion, the direct liability of a legal person under CC art. 1902 was affirmed]). However, it is not a seldom occurance that there is a lack of more specific detail concerning the representative and their fault, and even in the exceptional case where CC art. 1903 is, for once, cited, the legal person is treated as if they had directly caused the ensuing damage (e.g. TS 29 June 1984, RAJ 1984 (2) no. 3443 p. 2619). Tortious liability of unincorporated associations and companies not endowned with legal personality is also recognised, e.g an informal joint venture (TS 29 April 1988, RAJ 1988 (3) no. 3326 p. 3299).

16. Similarly in ITALY, CC art. 2043. is relied upon to attribute liability to a legal person for the acts of a natural person. The tort of a natural person is imputed to the legal person directly on the basis of the relationship between the decision-making body and the legal person (Alpa, Trattato di diritto civile IV, 199). The legal person and the relevant member of the board of directors are solidarily liable (Bianca, Diritto civile V, 631). In respect of unincorporated associations, individuals who act in its name and on the account of the association are (personally) solidarily liable (CC art. 38). Likewise, members of charitable committees are (personally) solidarily liable (CC art. 41). The inquiry as to who in fact acted on the committee's behalf is extraneous (Cass. 12 January 1982, no. 134, Foro it. 1982, I, 385). The "simple partnership" (società semplice) is itself liable and is solidarily liable together with the partner who acted on its behalf (particulars in CC art. 2267). Companies with a share-holding are directly liable on the basis of CC art. 2043; the directors' liability to the company is governed by CC arts. 2392 et seq.

17. In HUNGARY the liability of legal persons for the injuries suffered by third parties caused by members of the board of directors of the company is governed by CC § 350 in conjunction with the rules on agency contained in CC §§ 29(2), 219 and 220; if the representative is also an employee of the company, then CC §§ 348 und 349 must also be taken into account. § 30(1) of Law no. IV/2006 on Business Associations also ordains that a company is liable for damage inflicted on a third party by a representative in an executive position in the course of exercising his authority. § 16(3) and (4) loc. cit. provide further clarification in respect of companies before incorporation, the liquidation phase is dealt with in loc. cit. § 50(1)-(2). In POLAND cases where the damage is occasioned by a person acting as a statutory representative of a legal person do not fall under either CC art. 429 or CC art. 430 (Pietrzykowski [-Safjan], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 430 pp. 1215, 1218). The fault of the decision-making body is deemed a fault of the legal person itself. In such cases CC art. 416 applies, according to which a legal person is obliged to make good the damage caused by fault of the decision –making body. The legal person and the natural persons acting as its competent body are solidarily liable (Pietrzykowski [-Banaszczyk], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 416 p. 1097). In the case of decision-making body consisting of several persons, the fault of one of the members taking part in harmful activity (usually the taking of a decision), is sufficient (Banaszczyk, loc. cit.). In the context of liability of legal persons, case law and legal writing often refer to the concept of so-called anonymous fault, according to which in a case of objective conflict with the required standard of care within the structure of a legal person it is not necessary to establish who precisely among the members of the decision-making body was at fault (SN 11 May 2005, LEX no. 151668; Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 201). The application of CC art. 416 is expressly confined to the liability of legal persons. Whether the rule governs the liability of organisations without legal personality is disputed (see, opposing its application, Banaszczyk loc. cit.).

18. GERMAN CC § 31 governs the liability of legal persons for damage which a third party has sustained, where the damage was caused by its decision-making body in the course of acting in the discharge of the functions with which it was entrusted and the damage gives rise to a liability in damages. The provision imputes liability to the legal person, given that the decision-making body is itself liable on the basis of another provision (BGH 13 January 1987, BGHZ 99, 298, 302). Therefore, it is a matter of some debate, whether it suffices that the duty violated was exclusively a duty owed by the legal person or whether the duty violated must always be one owed by the decision-making body as well. The courts appear to want to sidestep the issue, by invariably qualifying the obligations of the legal person as embracing also the obligations of the authorised representative who is internally appointed to discharge the obligations (BGH 5 December 1989, BGHZ 109, 297). CC § 31 has been held to apply to all types of legal persons, not just associations and legal persons under public law (CC § 89). as the wording and context of the provision might imply (MünchKomm [-Reuter], BGB[4], § 31, no. 11) In order to overcome the manifold difficulties associated with CC § 831, the courts have extended CC § 31 to govern liability for representatives. Going beyond the wording of the provisions, the courts have imposed liability on individuals who are not strictly speaking constitutional bodies of the companies, but who "through the general operational and management rules, have been appointed to autonomously carry out significant and core functions associated with a legal person and have been allocated sole responsibility regarding the discharge of those functions, with the result that those individuals represent the legal person in legal transactions." (BGH 5 March 1998, NJW 1998, 1854, 1856; BGH 30 October 1967, BGHZ 49, 19, 21). In addition, liability can also be imposed on legal persons under the heading of 'shortcomings' in the organisational structure of the legal entity. Under this rubric, liability arises when no constitutionally appointed representative in the sense of CC § 31 has been appointed to deal with important tasks which the board of directors cannot perform. Legal persons are regarded as having a duty to organise their fields of activity in such a way, with the result that a decision-making body or representative in the sense of CC § 31 is responsible for each area of importance. If this obligation is not adhered to, then the legal person is treated as if it were a constitutionally authorised person or a servant of the decision-making body. In this manner the possibility of exculpation under CC § 831 is cut off and this is referred to as the legal fiction of liability for defective organisation (see further BGH 10 May 1957, BGHZ 24, 200, 213; BGH 5 March 1963, BGHZ 39, 124, 129; BGH 8 July 1980, NJW 1980, 2810, 2811; BGH 5 March 1998, NJW 1998, 1854, 1857).

19. AUSTRIAN CC § 26 places natural and legal persons, in principle, on an equal footing vis à vis third parties (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht II², 375). However, legal persons are not, of themselves, regarded as being capable of fault. In fact, they are liable for the tortious acts of their executive bodies and the representatives of the decision-making bodies, to which an autonomous sphere of influence has been assigned (e.g. OGH 25 January 1995, SZ 68/14=RS0009102) (Liability of a cooperative for a member of the supervisory board with auditing responsibilities who made a false allegation of theft against an employee.). It is conceiveable that in a given case, only a duty of the legal person has been breached, in this case liability is solely attributed to the legal person. It is only when the representative of the decision-making body himself is guilty of the commission of a tort that the natural person, besides the legal person, is also capable of being sued (OGH 15 October 1985, JBl 1986, 184; OGH 28 March 2000, RS0009105).

20. GREEK CC art. 71 establishes liability of legal persons for damage inflicted on a third party by their decision-making bodies (CC arts. 65, 67-69, 74), this damage being committed during the discharge of functions which they were appointed to carry out, where this act gives rise to a liability in damages. It is apparent that, here, we are dealing with the same construction as in German CC § 31 (Arxaniotakis, I astiki evthini tou nomikou prosopou idiotikou dikaiou, 106.) Going beyond CC art. 71, legal persons are held accountable for the acts of natural persons, when the duties of the natural person are laid down in the company's constitution. This is the case even where that natural person has not been empowered to represent the competent body (Papantoniou, Genikes Arches tou Astikou dikaiou, 151). Contemporary legal scholarship suggests that, with reference to developments in German law, that the concept of decision-making body should encompass all persons who, through the general operational rules and management structure, have been appointed to autonomously carry out significant and core functions associated with a legal person and have been allocated sole responsibility regarding the discharge of those functions, (Arxaniotakis loc. cit. 204; Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II(2)[3], 73). The liability of the legal person does not hinge on the existence of fault in the selection of a representative (Papantoniou loc. cit. 152). CC art. 71 is not solely confined to claims for damages but is also employed in unjustified enrichment claims (CC art. 904) and applies in claims for mandatory relief (CC arts. 57, 59) (Papantoniou loc. cit.; Arxaniotakis loc. cit. 189).

21. According to PORTUGUESE CC art. 165 liability is attributed in civil law to legal persons for the acts or omissions of their representatives (representantes), agents (agentes) and mandataries (mandatários) under the same prerequisites, by which an employer or master/principal (comitente) is liable under CC art. 500 (see above Note I9) for the acts or omissions of his employees/servants (comissários). Corresponding regulations are found for partnerships under the Civil Code (CC art. 998) and for the State or other corporations under public law insofar as they pursue a private law activity (CC art. 501) (see further Hörster, Parte geral, 391), such as where a state owned company operates a railway (CA Lisbon 21 May 2005; see. previously Procuradoria-Geral da República 19 June 1975, BolMinJus 252 [1976] 69). Representantes can include individuals who act temporarily for the legal person (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 640; STJ 12 July 2001, CJ [ST] IX [2001-2] 27; CA Lisbon 18 May 2004).

22. DUTCH CC art. 6:162 does not differeniate between natural and legal persons; it is also possible for the latter to commit an unlawful act (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 155 p. 153) and in this regard the imposition of liability does not hinge on whether a natural person who is in the service of the legal person has committed an unlawful act (President CFI Zwolle 2 September 1992, KG 1992 no. 327; Onrechtmatige Daad II [-Oldenhuis], art. 6:170 no. 4A p. 23). A legal person is liable for the acts of its decision-making bodies according to CC art. 6:170 (see above Note I10), provided that they acted on the basis of an employment contract. However (above Note I10), independent of any employment contract, the conduct of the competent body is generally regarded as the conduct of the legal person itself. Consequently CC art. 6:162 applies. In respect of larger organisations, it may be necessary to aggregate the conduct of different representatives of the decision-making body in order to constitute the unlawful act of the legal person. Staff changes, which have the effect of rendering it impossible to discover the identity of the natural person who was responsible for acting, have no impact on the imposition of liability on the legal person (HR 8 January 1982, NedJur 1982 no. 614 p. 2138; Oldenhuis loc. cit. art. 6:170 no. 30 p. 119).

23. In ESTONIA GPCCA § 31(5) expresses the basic principle that the actions of a decision-making body of a legal entity are attributed to the legal person as though they were committed by the legal person itself, and hence, the liability for the representative of does not equate to employer's vicarious liability. However, if the representative of the decision-making body commits a tort, the representative and the legal perso are solidarily liable, cf. Saare, Juridica 2003, 673–683 and Saare, Juridica 2000, 203–211.

24. In SWEDEN it is generally recognised that a legal person may per se be held accountable, under the same basic statutory provisions of the Damages Liability Act which apply to natural persons. Hence, damage caused by representatives of a legal body, where the representative acts or omits something in the place of the legal body, the legal person encompassing that body is held directly accountable. This embraces representatives for a limited company, associations, deceased's estate, or other legal person, acting as a body of the legal person (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 142, 151). In FINLAND legal persons are similarily accountable for board members and other representatives (Supreme Court 21 May 1992, 1992:66; Supreme Court 9 August 2001, 2001:70; Kurkela, JFT 2003, 40-56). In DENMARK, the Swedish notion of liability for bodies of legal persons does not exist. Nevertheless, the Danish rule for liability of employees and representatives is widely defined and non-formalistic, and thus also including the liability for e.g. the board of a limited company (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsreten[5], 188). However, formal legal representatives such as liquidators do not fall within its scope (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 107, fn. 7).

VI.–3:202: Accountability for damage caused by the unsafe state of an immovable

(1) A person who independently exercises control over an immovable is accountable for the causation of personal injury and consequential loss, loss within VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death), and loss resulting from property damage (other than to the immovable itself) by a state of the immovable which does not ensure such safety as a person in or near the immovable is entitled to expect having regard to the circumstances including:

(a) the nature of the immovable;

(b) the access to the immovable; and

(c) the cost of avoiding the immovable being in that state.

(2) A person exercises independent control over an immovable if that person exercises such control that it is reasonable to impose a duty on that person to prevent legally relevant damage within the scope of this Article.

(3) The owner of the immovable is to be regarded as independently exercising control, unless the owner shows that another independently exercises control.

COMMENTS

A. The legal policy

Liability for the unsafe state of an immovable. This Article imposes strict liability for personal injury and property damage caused by the unsafe state of an immovable. It is not confined to damage which has its cause in the poor state of construction or maintenance of buildings and other man-made structures, and it is not confined to damage which results from parts of these structures falling off, coming apart or entirely collapsing. In fact, the Article pertains to all types of dangers on immovables. Furthermore, it relates both to damage sustained on the land or in the building itself and damage suffered by persons or property in the vicinity of the immovable concerned, but not actually on it or in it. Liability attaches to anyone who exercises control over the property independently and without being subject to instructions; in cases of doubt, this is the owner (paragraph (3)).

Liability is strict. Liability is "strict" in the same sense as it is strict under the Product Liability Directive: the injured person only has to show that the immovable was unsafe (in the language of product liability: "defective"), according to the criteria set out in paragraph (1),. This is most clearly demonstrated by considering cases of defective construction of a building which the occupier has taken over from another (e.g. inherited). The decisive issue is not whether the occupier as such could have arranged for greater safety. Rather the decisive issue is simply whether it had been ensured that the required safety precautions were actually in place. The operator of a supermarket is accountable for the causation of damage if, in its vegetables department, foliage which has fallen to the floor and created for customers a danger of slipping is not removed and results in injury: the floor must be kept safe at all times and not merely (as would be the case if resort were had to the general standard of care) at regular intervals. Everything of course depends on the exact circumstances of the individual case: the owner of a wild wood is not obliged to ensure the safety of paths through the wood vis-à-vis recreational users; someone who operates a nature reserve for commercial purposes and attracts visitors to that end is bound to ensure their safety.

Policy considerations. The Article corresponds to the current legal situation in several Member States of the EU, but in many respects goes beyond the present state of legal development there. To the extent that this is the case, the justification is the protection of the victim, taking into account that the owner of an immovable should in any case have reasonable insurance cover and that in many situations there are no sufficient grounds for distinguishing between damage through defective products and damage through unsafe immovables: if a customer in a supermarket has a right to damages if a bottle of mineral water explodes on being picked up, then the customer also ought to have a right to damages if injured by stepping on a glass shard in the drinks section. A further argument in favour of the solution opted for in the Article, is the fact that even in those legal systems which have at least theoretically held on to liability for immovables connected with negligence, the borders between liability for, and without, negligence no longer lend themselves to being authoritatively defined; quite apart from the other fact that numerous reversals of the burden of proof have further contributed to the situation that adherence to the so-called "fault principle" has increasingly taken on the features of mere lip service. The solution in the present Article is further supported by the consideration that the injured person is often left with no other choice than to go on to another's property, without being able to deal sensibly with hidden dangers present there. In contrast, it must normally be expected that the person responsible for the property should be aware of these dangers and should deal with them in a reasonable manner. The way in which paragraph (1) is phrased takes account of the fact that this argument does not apply to undeveloped land in the open countryside. Finally, it would not be consistent with present-day legal understanding to distinguish in principle between, on the one hand "constructs" (man-made structures), and on the other hand "natural" dangers of an immovable (falling trees; black ice on the way to the front door); this is just as weak as distinguishing for the purposes of the law on liability between, on the one hand, matter that falls downwards and, on the other, unevenness in the ground or an excavated pit.

Legally relevant damage. In conformity with all the provisions of Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence), the liability under this Article is limited to cases of death, personal injury and property damage (as defined in VI.–2:206(2)(b) (Loss upon infringement of property and lawful possession)). Only damage of this kind is within the protective purpose of liability due to the realisation of dangers on immovables. In relation to liability for all other types of damage, the necessity for intention or negligence remains.

Public roads excluded. Excluded from the scope of application of the present Article is the liability of the State and its organs, in so far as they attend to or omit to attend to public law duties in relation to public roads. This follows from VI.–7:103 (Public law functions and court proceedings).

Relationship to VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions). The present Article concerns the liability of the person who is responsible for the dangerous state of the land or building. VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions) relates to the liability of those who are responsible for dangerous substances or installations which release or discharge substances or emissions dangerous to the environment. VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions) is concerned essentially with dangers arising from an enterprise or undertaking, whereas the present Article is concerned with "static" dangers which are inherent in an immovable. It is conceivable that in exceptional cases the requirements of both provisions may be satisfied simultaneously (in which case the claimant may rely on whichever regime is the more advantageous), but they remain clearly distinct in their tenet. The present Article is solely geared to the unsafe state of an immovable ("state" including both the condition of the immovable and its features). Furthermore, it is directed at risks for persons “in or near the immovable”; that is not the case for VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions) (which also covers mobile installations).

Only this Article (and not VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions)) is relevant if someone is injured by a roofing shingle which falls from a roof or if a customer of a bank with access to a safe suffers a shock after a door slams to behind him, locking him in, because no emergency call system has been installed. On the other hand, it is only VI.–3:206 (and not the present Article) which is relevant if the danger in question arises not from the state of the land or a building, but from the use of a building in a particular way. A building is not unsafe merely by reason of the fact that fireworks are stored there; a public house is not unsafe simply because it runs a disco.

Relationship to contract law. The relationship between liability under this Article and liability under contract law is subject to the general rules of VI.–1:103 (Scope of application). A lessee, for example, can invoke the present Article unless the relevant law governing leases contains provisions which would lose their effect were the rules of non-contractual liability applied. By the same token, the rules in the present Article leave unaffected not only the general non-contractual liability for negligence, but also a basis of claim in contract that is more favourable to the lessee.

X rented rooms in Y’s building for the pursuit of a tailoring business. A fire breaks out in the storage room; items belonging to X are burnt, along with items of clothing that belong to his customer C. The fire can be traced back to the accumulation of soot in the chimney, which had ignited, causing an explosion, which itself left a hole in the wall. X and C have a claim against Y under VI.–3:202 for the damage suffered to their respective property; the building was clearly in an unsafe state. Y cannot exonerate himself by proving that he contracted a chimney-sweeper for the regular cleaning of the chimney. X can also base a claim for damages in contract law (VI.–1:103(d) (Scope of application)), which can be more favourable to him because (i) it compensates for the lost profit that results from the temporary standstill in business operations and (ii) the fire is not attributable to force majeure (see III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment)). Also, in relation to the issue of whether X can have recourse against Y for the damage that X suffers because he must replace C’s burnt suits under the applicable contract law (which may be assumed here), it would be more beneficial for X to claim damages under contract law. This is because under the law on non-contractual liability for damage this element only constitutes legally relevant damage (VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage)) where Y had acted negligently. However, this is lacking here.

Defences. The defences in Chapter 5 of this Book also apply to claims under the present Article. Of particular practical significance is VI.–5:302 (Event beyond control), which can rule out liability for the realisation of dangers on immovables as a consequence of extreme weather conditions.

B. The risk embraced by liability

Basis. The liability under VI.–3:202 relates to personal injury and property damage which arises because an immovable does not come up to standard of safety which persons who find themselves on it or in it or in its vicinity may reasonably expect. The type of hazard plays no role. The Article can cover cases where parts of a building or structure become detached, where a gravestone falls over in a cemetery, where the floor of a house is slippery from being over-polished and a corresponding warning to the public is lacking, where a tree falls over, where an icy footpath is not treated with grit and there is no corresponding sign, where a pit has not been secured or where the water extraction system in a swimming pool is set so high that children who are caught by its suction when diving cannot free themselves from its pull.

Sloped premises are unsafe where frequent torrential rainfall occurs in the area and the water drainage system does not function properly, so that walls on a neighbour's property situated below break under the pressure from a mudslide.

Immovable. "Immovable property" is defined in Annex 1 as "land and anything so attached to land as not to be subject to change of place by usual human action." This clearly covers buildings, permanent bridges and similar structures. The term immovable is not further defined for the purposes of this Article. This appeared neither possible nor necessary because the Article does not depend on technical issues. In fact it usually suffices for the term immovable as used in this Article to equate it in a natural sense with "premises". Where the goals on a football field designed for competitive sport fall over from even light contact, this sports ground is unsafe for its users regardless of whether the goals formed an essential part of the football field or not.

"Other than to the immovable itself". In cases of property damage, accountability under this Article is limited to damage to other items of property than the premises themselves. This restriction has been formulated following the corresponding rule in the Product Liability Directive (see VI.–3:204(1) (Accountability for damage caused by defective products)). It seemed necessary in order not to disturb the numerous special regimes of landlord and tenant law and residential property law.

A chimney jutting high above the roof of a block of apartments collapses; stones break through the roof into an apartment situated below. Its owner cannot hold the owners of the other apartments accountable under VI.–3:202.

"In or near the immovable". It makes no difference to the liability under VI.–3:202 whether the harm comes about on or in the premises or outside the premises but near to them: the owner is liable for the damage caused by parts of a building falling away or a tree falling over, regardless of whether the victim is hit while on the premises or on a footpath belonging to someone else or in a public car park.

"Such safety as a person … is entitled to expect". The test decisive for liability is whether the premises lacked the safety which the injured person could reasonably have expected under the circumstances. The test is an objective one, to be applied from the standpoint of the injured person in or near the immovable. Quite what is "safe" depends on the particular circumstances. The concept is based on the notion of what is 'defective' adopted in the product liability defective.

Illustration 5
An adventure playground for children may well involve some risks because it otherwise would not be an adventure playground.

Illustration 6
In contrast, a ski slope is unsafe if it has an integrated liftmast whose sharp edges are not padded by bails of straw or by other means.

The nature of the immovable (paragraph (1)(a)). It is in the nature of the matter that the safety which can be expected from an immovable depends on all the circumstances of the particular case. Among these circumstances is the kind of land or the kind of premises involved and the kind of danger which is present. A person who strolls around private gardens open to the public can expect a different type of safety to someone collecting mushrooms in the forest, who can at most reckon with warning signs in particularly dangerous spots and this only in a recreational area close to urban life.

The access to the immovable. It is also important to identify whether the case involves land or premises on to which people have been invited by a person entitled to do so or land or premises on to which people may come against that person's will. In the latter case the standard of safety which the public can expect is much lower than in the former. Someone who is in an area of danger without authority can naturally expect less safety (the matter may be otherwise in relation to children) and a thief or another person who violates the sanctity of the home cannot basically expect any safety at all.

Costs. Only such a standard of safety can be ultimately expected as can be produced with reasonable cost under the circumstances. Therefore, often warnings of certain dangers must suffice; to this extent, of course, everything depends on the circumstances of the individual case. Where a pit is excavated in the course of construction work, it must be fenced in and the fence must be lit up at night; a mere warning sign is certainly insufficient here. Furthermore, the amount of expenditure must be in reasonable proportion to the type of risk. More must be done to protect against dangers to life and limb than to protect against dangers to property.

Illustration 7
Subsequent to an accident in the outside lane of a motorway, the passenger of the vehicle attempts to seek safety from the fast-moving traffic by leaping over the crash barrier. Between this and the crash barrier on the opposite carriageway there is a dangerous twenty metre drop, into which the passenger plunges to her death. The drop between the carriageways was not discernible in the darkness. The structure of the elevated motorway was unsafe at this point. The operator of the motorway is liable under VI.–3:202., However the person causing the car accident is not liable because the fatal plunge is no longer to be qualified as a consequence of the accident, see VI.–4:101 (General rule [on causation]).

C. Persons liable

Policy considerations. There is no uniformity between the various European legal orders as to the question on whom the liability should be imposed. Essentially the owner, the person possessing for himself or herself (in contrast to a mere detentor) and the occupier come into focus. Against this backdrop, the Group proposes a compromise. Under VI.–3:202 the basic rule is that the liability is that of the person "who independently exercises control". In relation to the victim, however, it is (rebuttably) presumed that the owner of the immovable is the person who independently exercises control (paragraph (3)). In order to prevent an amicable solution to the problem of liability for an immovable collapsing (so to speak) simply because of the different concepts of "ownership" in relation to immovables in the various jurisdictions, it is left to national laws to determine what is meant by an owner of an immovable. In the countries that have land registries at their disposal, for the most part this does not present a problem; here the owner of the premises is also the person whom the injured person may identify most easily and thereby minimise the procedural risk. This fact also justifies the policy decision behind paragraph (3).

Paragraph (2). Paragraph (2) furnishes an additional clarification as to the persons who may be liable because they are exercising independent control. The primary source of inspiration for paragraph (2) is the definition of "occupier" in the Irish Occupiers' Liability Act 1995, s. 1(1). Despite its partial circularity it expresses all the essential elements. In any given case the outcome of this criterion will depend on all the circumstances. In the case of larger residential property it may be that different persons are occupiers in relation to different parts of the property. A tenant of a flat is capable of being an occupier of the rented area. During the building phase, the construction company is liable for the safety of the building site and the stability of the scaffolding erected by it.

Occupier and keeper. The definition of the person who independently exercises control ("occupier") was restricted to immovables because the policy question of who is to be burdened with liability for damage caused by an unsafe immovable cannot in all cases be satisfactorily addressed by a purely factual assessment as in the case of keepers of motor vehicles, animals and substances in determining whether there should be accountability without intention or negligence. The situation for immovables is distinguishable from that of motor vehicles or animals because with immovables (e.g. large buildings) different parts may be under the control of different persons. The concept of a keeper is not designed to cover such situations.

Paragraph (3). Under paragraph (3) the owner can show "that another independently exercises control". In such a case liability does not attach to the owner, but to the third person. A person who has leased out a large complex of commercial premises is not responsible for the state of the commercial units within the complex; a person who lets out an apartment is not responsible for the quality of the carpet laid by the lessee. The owner of an empty house is not faced with liability for damage which has its basis in its neglect if youths occupy the house and the police are afraid to cause a stir by initiating a move to evacuate the house. However, in such a case the owner must do everything possible to put the occupation of the house to an end; otherwise there may be liability for negligence.

Abandonment. Under VI.–3:208 (Abandonment) a person who abandons an immovable remains accountable for it up until the time when another person exercises independent control over it. For further details see the Comments on that Article.

NOTES

1. According to FRENCH CC art. 1386 the owner of a building is responsible for damage which is caused by the building's collapse provided that the cause of the collapse was due to a lack of maintenance or a structural defect. The concepts of "building" and "collapse" have been broadly interpreted by the courts (see further le Tourneau and Cadiet, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2004/2005], nos. 8028 and 8030); the fact that a a brick or a slate in the roof has become dislodged is sufficient. A faute on the part of the de facto owner is not necessary. For many years, CC art. 1386 was construed as a lex specialis provision which superceded the general gardien-liability anchored in CC art. 1384(1) (Cass.civ. 17 December 1997, Bull.civ. 1997, II, no. 323 p. 190). However, Cass.civ. 23 March 2000, Bull.civ. 2000, II, no. 54 p. 37 permitted a suit against a gardien who was not the landowner on the basis of CC art. 1384(1),. In its report for the year 2000 the same Court suggested to the legislature that CC art. 1386 should be repealed (Rapport Annuel de la Cour de Cassation 2000, http://www.courdecassation.fr/_rapport/rapport.htm). In its 2005 annual report (http://www.courdecassation.fr/_rapport/rapport05) the Cour de cassation renewed its recommendation and, moreover, submitted that CC art. 1384(2) ("However, a person who possesses, regardless of the basis thereof, all or part of a building or of movable property in which a fire has originated is not liable towards third parties for damages caused by that fire unless it is proved that the fire must be attributed to his fault or to the fault of persons for whom he is responsible") should also be repealed. CC arts. 1384(2) and 1386 contradicted the judicially created system of gardien liability for all manner of things (see further Depadt-Sebag, D. 2006, 2113).

2. According to BELGIAN CC art. 1386, similar to the French position, the owner of a building is liable for the damage, which was caused by the collapse (ruine) of the building. Again, similar to the position adopted in French law, the collapse must have been due to defective maintenance or must result from a structural defect. The owner of the building is liable, even where he is not the gardien of the building concerned (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene, TPR 2000, 1551, 1781, no. 89). The term "building" encompasses all building constructions which are attached to land (house, bridge) or structures covered by water (swimming pool, piers etc) (van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 341-342). The use of the word "collapse" does not simply dennote that the entire building must cave in, the dislodgement of other building materials can connote a "collapse" (Cass. 18 April 1975, RW 1975-76, 159). The fact that the owner is not at fault is not a grounds of defence; CC art. 1386 establishs an irrebutable presumption of liability to the prejudice of the owner (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene loc. cit. 1789-1791, no. 96).

3. Similarly, under the SPANISH CC art. 1907, liability is imposed on the owner. The predominant view in legal scholarship is that the liability for faulty maintenance (not, however, defective construction) of a building structure should be extended to the occupiers that have accepted a duty to ensure the repairs (Albaladejo [-Santos Briz], Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales XXIV, arts. 1907-1909, p. 623; Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños[3], 270). It is, however, far from clear whether the liability of an occupier excludes the liability of the owner (e.g. Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-de Ángel Yagüez], Código Civil II[2], arts. 1905, 2040 and CA Alicante 9 February 2005, BDA JUR 2005/80628) or whether both owner and occupier are jointly liable vis-à-vis third parties (in this respect Herbosa Martínez, La responsabilidad extracontractual por ruina de los edificios, 113 and, implicitly, Santos Briz loc. cit.). When the damage caused by the collapse of a construction is not due to the lack of repairs, but to a mistake in the construction of a building, CC art. 1909 – which entitles the victim to address his or her claim to the architect or the builder – applies (TS 29 March 1983, RAJ 1983 (1) no. 1652 p. 1295; TS 29 November 1990, RAJ 1990 (7) no. 9059 p. 11543). Where a building is threatening to collapse CC art. 389 applies, whereas, when the collapse has already occurred, CC arts. 1907 and 1909 apply. CC art. 1907 is often qualified as a form of liability which derives from a rebuttable presumption of fault, in respect of the necessitated repairs which were not carried out (Albadalejo, Derecho Civil II[12], 966). However, some authors consider that it is a strict liability provision (Lacruz and Rivero, Elementos II(2)[4], 535; Puig Ferriol/Gete-Alonso/Gil Rodríguez/Hualde Sánchez [-Asúa González], Manual de Derecho Civil II[3], 514) or, at least, a 'liability based on risk' (Santos Briz, La responsabilidad civil II[7], 774; Herbosa Martínez loc. cit.). Court decisions follow the trend set by prevailing legal doctrine and consider that liability under CC art. 1907 arises from negligence (TS 25 April 1986, RAJ 1986 (2) no. 1999 p. 1941; TS 9 March 1998, RAJ 1998 (1) no. 1269 p. 2039; TS 29 October 1999, RAJ 1999 (4) no. 7628 p. 12042; TS 22 November 1999, RAJ 1999 (5) no. 8296 p. 13016; TS 8 June 2006, BDA RAJ 2006 no. 3207 [dismissing a claim as there was 'no negligent action of the defendant']). A "building" within the meaning of CC art. 1907 is any kind of man-made 'construction' (see CC art. 389: "building, wall, column or whatever other construction"; de Ángel Yagüez loc. cit. 2045; Roca i Trias loc. cit. 269; TS 25 February 1987, RAJ 1987 (1) no. 736 p. 668: damage caused by the fall of a 'column'; TS 9 March 1998, RAJ 1998 (1) no. 1269 p. 2039: damage caused by the fall of a 'post'). CC art. 1907 does not apply to other dangers or risks associated with immovables, for example flooding of a neighbour's land (TS 3 April 1996, RAJ 1996 (2) no. 2880 p. 3822, obiter; see also TS 6 April 2001, RAJ 2001 (2) no. 3636 p. 5582; TS 22 July 2003, RAJ 2003 (4) no. 5852 p. 10961).

4. According to art. 2053 ITALIAN CC art. 2053, the owner of a building or other man made structure is liable for damage which ensues from the collapse of the construction, unless he can adduce proof that the collapse cannot be ascribed to construction or maintenance defects. Prevailing legal opinion considers the provision to be one of strict liability (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, 622; Monateri, Manuale della responsabilità civile, 414; de Cupis, Il danno, 206); in case law occasional reference is made to a legal presumption that the owner of the property is liable, which in end effect achieves the same result.(Cass. 12 March 2004, no. 5127, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 3). CC art. 2053 is a lex specialis in relation to CC art. 2051 (Franzoni loc. cit. 623; Cass. 8 September 1998, no. 8876, Giur.it. 1999, I, 1, 1822). CC art. 1669 governs the right of the owner to claim compensation from the construction company. "Buildings or structures" CC art. 2053 dennote man made constructions which are, at a minimum, temporarily attached to land (Monateri loc. cit. 416). The terms structure connotes a river dam, (Cass.sez.un. 14 December 2001, no. 15875, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 2165), the basin of a river (CFI Città di Castello 13 November 1964, Foro pad 1966, I, 120, obiter), a footbridge for pedestrians (CFI Parma 25 January 1960, Arch.resp.civ. 1961, 218), an advertising billboard which was brought onto a balcony (CFI Taranto 15 March 1977, Giur.it. 1978, I, 2, 296), an audience tribune (CA Firenze 3 April 1963, RCP 1963, 205), a funicular railing at the entrance to a building site (CA Rome 19 May 1958, Monateri loc. cit. 416, fn. 32) and a window (CFI Roma 30 November 1967, Giur.it. 1968, I, 2, 436), even debris is embraced by the term (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[6], sub art. 2053, II), however, snow, trees and paving are not within its scope (Cass. 31 October 1961, no. 2530, RGI 1961, note R.C. no. 27). The term "collapse" also encompasses parts of the buildings which have become dislodged. Apart from the owner, responsibility is attributed to those individuals who have rights over an immoveable, conferring a power of control. The holder of a right to use and enjoy the property will be occassionally held to be solely liable (Monateri loc. cit. 423-424; Bianca, Diritto civile V, 762; Gazzoni, Manuale di diritto privato[11], 707), however the usual case is that this party is held liable in addition to the owner (Cass. 7 May 1957, no. 1533, Foro it. 1958, I, 1310; Franzoni loc. cit. 628). Whoever accepts an inheritence is liable for the medio tempore resulting damage, because the acceptance has an ex tunc effect (Cass. 24 August 1954, no. 2987, Resp.civ. e prev. 1955, 190). CC art. 2053 also applies when building is owned by the public adminstation (Cass. 11 November 1977, no. 4898, RGI 1977, voce R.C. no. 20, 21). The defendant can exculpate himself from liability upon proof of a caso fortuito or a forza maggiore (Cian and Trabucchi loc. cit. V). The lines of demarcation are difficult to draw in respect to the general custodia-liability anchored in CC art. 2051 (cf. Cass. 6 October 2005, no. 19474, Danno e resp. 2006, 642: damage caused by a mudslide, by- product of construction of motorway; Liability of contractor and person who commissioned the contract affirmed under CC art. 2051).

5. HUNGARIAN CC § 352(1) establishes the liability of an owner for damage suffered by another, which is caused by falling objects or other defects of the building. The owner can however escape liability upon proof that the current regulations pertaining to maintenance and construction of buildings were not infringed and furthermore, that the measures necessary to prevent damage occurring were adopted. Liability for falling objects which had been affixed to the building (for example, flags, billboards, illuminated advertsing hoardings, street lighting affixed to buildings), is imposed on the individual, whose interest was served in attaching the object to the building (CC § 352(2)). In respect of damage ensuing from objects which were thrown out of, dropped or emptied from a dwelling or other premises, the tenant or the user of the premises is liable and liability is strict (CC § 353(1)); if the tenant can identify the person who was responsible for causing the damage, he remains liable as surety unless he can prove that the person who caused the damage was not authorised to stay in the dwelling (CC § 353(2)). Under CC § 352(1) a person in a contractual relationship with the individual responsible for the damage is not entitled to claim under CC § 352(1) (Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II[2], 624/3; Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1316-1317; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 215-216). The term "building" emcompasses all types of building structures (CC § 686), for example, garages, basements, churches, factory chimney, and audience tribunes. Construction defects typically embrace defective roofs, lack of barriers, unsecure terrain and steps or crumbling waterpipes. The courts have interpreted dropped objects to include heavy snowfall from the roof (BH 1979/236). Liability is strict, insofar as the owner cannot escape liability upon proof that the mistake was already committed by the previous owner and could not be discerned by the new owner. In respect of damage which materialised during construction work, the construction firm, not the owner, is liable (Wellmann loc. cit.; Benedek loc. cit. 1317-1319). The person which is responsible according to these rules can claim reimbursement from the person which actually caused the damage (CC §§ 352(3), 353(4)).

6. Under POLISH CC art. 434 the person in direct possession of a structure (samoistny posiadacz) is accountable for damage caused by parts of that structure falling off or by its collapse, unless the collapse or falling off did not result from an improper maintenance of the structure or defects in construction. This is a case of liability without fault, although the risk for the possessor is limited to improper maintenance and construction defects (Pietrzykowski [-Safjan], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 434 p. 1226). The possessor may be accountable despite exercising required care and in ignorance of construction defects (e.g. where the property has been recently inherited or acquired). Liability of the possessor arises even if he or she entrusted the maintenance of the structure to a professional, who failed to exercise his duties properly (SN 13 September 1988, OSN 1990, poz. 55; Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 231). The possessor may escape liability only by proving that the damage resulted from something other than improper maintenance or construction defects (and some scholars consider this constitutes a rebuttal of the presumption introduced by the rule: Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit.; Safjan loc. cit. 1229). The notion of the structure is interpreted broadly and covers any man-made construction connected, even if temporarily, with the soil (such as buildings, towers, bridges, monuments, and street lamps; Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 230; Safjan loc. cit. 1228). The parts of the structure are usually its essential parts (chimney, balcony, and balustrade). CC art. 433 regulates separately the actio de effusis vel ejectis: "The person who occupies premises shall be liable for the damage caused by the ejection, effusion or falling off of any object from those premises, unless the damage arose out of force majeur, solely through the injured party's fault or through the fault of a third person for whom the occupier is not responsible and whose action he or she could not prevent". It is also a case of strict liability. The occupier is a person who exercises factual control over the premises in their own interest (Safjan loc. cit. art. 433 p. 1224). If an object falls from premises dedicated to the common use of all inhabitants, the possessor of the building incurs liability (Safjan loc. cit.). There has been an enduring discussion in the commentaries whether the flood of a lower flat due to a plumbing defect in the upper flat falls under CC art. 433 (pro Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 229 and Safjan loc. cit.; contra SN 5 March 2002, OSPiKA 2003, poz. 5). Two provisions of the SLOVENIAN Civil Code also deal with dangers associated with immoveables. LOA art. 159 establishes strict liability for the "keeper" of an immoveable in respect of falling objects, whereas LOA art.106 corresponds in many respects to the Polish CC art. 434. The keeper of the immoveable can however adduce proof that he "did everything to avert the danger."

7. GERMAN CC § 836 governs the liability of the owner of an immoveable. This provision is supplemented by the rules anchored in CC §§ 837 and 838 pertaining to the liability of occupier of a building and person who is under a duty to maintain the building. In each case, liability is attributed on the basis of a refutable presumption of fault. CC § 836(1) pertains to the collapse of a building or other structure which is attached to the land or any part of the building which becomes detached from the building. The tortfeasor is liable for bodily injury and damage to property. The term "building" connotes an immoveable and generally enclosed structure which is firmly attached to the ground, into which people can enter (Erman [-Schiemann], BGB II[11], § 836 no. 2; MünchKomm [-Wagner], BGB[4], § 836 no. 8). Liability can also arise in respect of parts of the building, for example for balconies (BGH 11 December 1984, NJW 1985, 1076), roof slates (CA Düsseldorf 20 December 2002, NJW-RR 2003, 885) or roofing felt (BGH 23 March 1993, NJW 1993, 1782). Destruction or damage does not entail that the structure forfeits its categorisation as a building. Consequently building ruins and derlict or demolished buildings are also embraced by CC § 836 (Wagner loc. cit.). "Other structures attached to the land" include, for example, fences, scaffolding, monuments and gravestones (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 836 no. 3). A building is constructed in a defective manner, if the requirements necessary to ensure that the life and health and safety of others are not placed in jeopardy have not been satisfied. An element of the duty of maintenance is the examination of the structural and physical condition of the building (Sprau loc. cit. no. 8). In principle, the person who suffered damage must prove the presence of a structural defect or that the structure was inadequately maintained and must proved a causal nexus between the damage suffered and the structural defect or the inadequate upkeep. However the rules pertaining to prima facie-proof are often of great assistance to him (however, these rules will not apply in cases of extraordinary natural occurrences: BGH 23 March 1993 loc. cit. 1783; BGH 27 April 1999, NJW 1999, 2593, 2594). Exculpation, while still theoretically possible, is subject to stringent requirements which have been established by the courts (BGH 23 March 1993 loc. cit. 1783; BGH 27 April 1999 loc. cit.). Liability is imposed on the owner-occupier (CC § 836(3)); this concept is defined in CC § 872. Liability does not depend on the ownership structure. Under certain prerequisites, liability may be imposed solely on former owner-occupiers (CC § 836(2)). The successor becomes owner-occupier immediately, upon succession (CC § 857), this is the case even when he has no knowledge of the inheritence. A lack of knowledge may be a relevant factor in the question of exculpation (Wagner loc. cit. no. 27). The liability of the owner-occupier under CC § 837 supplants liability in CC§ 836 (BGH 29 March 1977, NJW 1977, 1392), liability of the person under a duty to maintain the building under CC § 838 is joined to the liability under CC §§ 836, 837 (Sprau loc. cit. § 838, no. 1).

8. AUSTRIAN CC § 1319 governs liability for damage which is caused by the collapse or dislodgment of parts of a structure. The liability of the occupier of a dwelling is the subject of a separate regulation, CC § 1318. Structures in the sense of CC § 1319 are all man made buildings, excavations or other artifical structures on the ground or terrain (OGH 29 November 2001, JBl 2002, 463; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 342). CC § 1319 has been deemed to apply analogously to trees, (OGH 31 March 1970, EvBl 1970/294) and even to heavy snow sliding from a roof (Koziol and Welser loc. cit. 343; Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI[3], § 1319 no. 16; Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Danzl], ABGB, § 1319 no. 2). The damage must be attributable to the defective condition of the building, damage which is caused by typical dangers associated with a man made structure suffices (OGH 12 February 1998, JBl 1998, 715 note Koziol). The person responsible can exonerate himself from liability upon proof that he exercised reasonable care to prevent the danger materialising. e.g. in that he adopted sensible precautionary measures (OGH 20 March 1951, SZ 24/78; OGH 8 July 1986, SZ 59/121). Therefore it is unclear whether, as regards liability, CC § 1319 provides for a rebuttable presumption of fault (still of this view OGH 30 July 1963, SZ 36/103) or whether it is a strict liability provision (According to recent perception: OGH 25 June 2002, ZVR 2003/37, p. 130; Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht II², 400). According to the wording of CC § 1319, liability is imposed on the "holder" of a building or structure. According to case law, this concept is not identical to the concept of possessor under property law. Holding in the sense of CC § 1319 requires a link to a building or structures "which enables appropriate preventative measures to be taken to avoid the danger" (OGH 17 February 1954, SZ 27/37). This interpretation is similar in many respects to the interpretation given to the concept of keeper in modern law (OGH 8 April 1997, ZVR 1997/124 p. 356). Therefore, this approach entails that a tenant can also be a holder under CC § 1319 (OGH 7 February 1968, EvBl 1968/192).

9. GREEK CC art. 925 provides that an "owner or occupier" of a building is liable for damage which is suffered by a third party owing to the collapse of the building. Owners or occupiers can escape liability upon proof that the collapse could not be ascribed to either defective construction or inadequate upkeep of the building. Nonetheless, according to prevailing legal opinion, this provision triggers objective liability; the presence of fault on the part of the owner or occupier is not required (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Vosinakis], art. 925 no. 1; Balis, Genikai Archai[8], 453; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 565; its qualification as liability based on a rebuttable presumption of fault is advanced only by Zepos, Enochikon Dikaion II(2), 802). The term "building" connotes any man made construction which is attached to the land, even where the structure is incomplete or is derelict. "Other structures" include walls, fences, scaffolding as well as installations used for the production, relaying and use of electricity and gas (Vosinakis loc. cit. no. 5). Plants and rocks are not included within its scope (Kornilakis loc. cit. 566). There is a rebuttable presumption that the collapse was the result of defective construction or maintenance. Only damage which ensues from the realisation of risks typically associated with a collapse is recoverable, therefore e.g. the damage suffered by a passer-by, who stumbled over rubble from the building was not recoverable (Kornilakis loc. cit. 567). According to the wording of the statutory provision, either the owner or occupier may be held liable. This is understood to mean that liability will only be imposed on the owner if he is simultaneously an occupier. Otherwise, the occupier is held solely liable (Kornilakis loc. cit. 568; Vosinakis loc. cit. no. 9). As regards liability, the tenant is privileged in that he can choose between claiming under contract (CC arts. 575 ff) or tort law. The tort claims are more favourable because CC arts. 579 ff are not applicable under tort law (Kornilakis loc. cit. 568; CFI Athens 30/1980, Arm 35 [1981] 471).

10. PORTUGUESE CC art. 492(1) similarly provides, that the owner or possessor of a building or other construction (obras) is liable for damage which ensues from the partial or complete collapse of a structure, provided that the collapse was caused by inadequate upkeep of the structure or resulted from a structural defect. The individuals responsible can, however, escape liability. upon proof that they exercised reasonable care or prove that the damage would have resulted in any event even if they had exercised reasonable care (STJ 17 March 1977, BolMinJus 265 [1977] 223). In cases involving the inadequate upkeep of a building, the individual, who is under a legal or contractual duty to maintain the building is liable in the place of the owner or the occupier (CC art. 492(2)). Liability in each case is based on a rebuttable presumption of fault, liability is not strict. The prerequisite needed to trigger the presumption of fault is proof of a collapse which was the consequence of defective construction or inadequate upkeep (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I^{10}, 592; STJ 6 February 1996, BolMinJus 454 [1996] 697; CA Lisbon 6 June 1995, CJ XX [1995-3] 127; STJ 28 April 1977, BolMinJus 266 [1977] 161). CC art. 492 is also applicable to constructions connected to the soil or attached to the building (e.g. bridges, columns, wells and water pipes [STJ 6 February 1996, CJ (ST) (1996-1) 77]) but neither to movables without such a connection (e.g. a vase on the window-sill) nor to natural products connected to the soil (trees etc.) (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I^{4}, 493, note 3 to art. 492; Antunes Varela loc. cit. 592). The "collapse" can be total or partial (tiles falling down) (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela loc. cit.). Liability is attached to ownership or possession. The owner of a flat in which a water pipe breaks is liable vis-à-vis the owner of the flat below (CA Oporto 18 March 1999; CA Lisbon 9 March 2002). During execution works, the master-of-works (empreiteiro) and not the owner of the building or construction will be liable, as it is the former who has the effective direction of the work (STJ 14 April 2005; STJ 26 April 1988, BolMinJus 376 [1988] 587).

11. According to the DUTCH CC art. 6:174(1) liability is predicated on the basis that a structure "does not correspond to established standards" and consequently "presents a danger for persons or things" Liability is imposed on the basis of the unsafe state of the building, however, liability is not premised on a structural defect as is the case under VI.–3:202. The former is established when, for example, software which is used to control a lift does not function properly. In respect of buildings owned by the state, the unsafe state of the building is more readily affirmed than in the case of a privately owned building (Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk (-Lankhorst), T & C Burgerlijk Wetboek[4], art. 6:174, no. 4a p. 2361; Onrechtmatige Daad II [-Oldenhuis], art. 6:174, no. 6 p. 69 and nos. 73-74 p. 216). Liability arises independent of the question whether the owner/occupier recognised the defect (Oldenhuis loc. cit. no. 93 p. 357, Parlementaire Geschiedenis Inv. VI, 1378). "Structures" are buildings and other structures which are permanently, either directly attached to the land or indirectly via the linkage with other buildings or structures (CC art. 6:174(4)). Therefore, gravel on roof cladding, (CFI The Hague 16 November 1977, BR 1978 no. 89), a linoleum flooing which is too smooth (CA ´s-Hertogenbosch 5 February 2002, VR 2003, no. 139 p. 310), doors, lifts and houses which are in the process of being built, fall within the scope of CC art. 6:174, in similar manner also the cables which are found in the building (CC art. 6:174(2)). However, temporary works put in place by a building firms do not fall within CC art. 6:174 (HR 6 December 1963, NedJur 1965 no. 9 p. 33). The concept "structure" includes, inter alia, fences, (CFI Rotterdam 8 January 1917, NedJur 1917, 754), walls (CA Amsterdam 21 June 1956, NedJur 1957 no. 261 p. 462), bridges (CFI Amsterdam 27 March 1956, NedJur 1956 no. 281 p. 641), equipment on a playground, boat bridges, oil tankers, monuments and aerials on a building (Oldenhuis loc. cit. nos. 42-43 pp. 143-167). Special rules govern underground structures (CC art. 6:174(3)).Liability under CC art. 6:174(1) is imposed, in principle, on the owner/occupier (Definition in CC art. 3:109); CC art. 6:174(5) supplements this provision by providing for a presumption that, whoever is registered in the Land Registry as owner, is also owner- occupier for the purposes of CC art 6:6174. Joint occupiers are jointly and severally liable. In the event that a construction is used in the course of a business, the operators are solely liable (CC art. 6:181).In each case, liability is imposed only for bodily injury or physical damages to things (as regards the former law, see for comparative purposes HR 13 June 1975, NedJur 1975 no. 509 p. 1619).

12. According to ESTONIAN LOA § 1059 a landowner is liable for structures which are attached to the land. If a structure was built by a person exercising a real right over the land, liability is imposed on the holder of that right (cf. Supreme Court 3-2-1-64-06, RT III 2006, 26, 241). Liability attaches solely to the property or to the ownership of the right, liability does not hinge upon the question of the exercise of factual control. In both cases, liability is strict, only proof of force majeure or "of an act of the victim" will exclude the imposition of liability. Additionally liability of the owner for a "dangerous structure or thing" arises under LOA §1058. This provision is concerned with the production, storage or transmission in the structure of energy or hazardous materials. Moreover, LOA § 1056(1) establishes liability of an operator of a "major source of danger".

13. Apart from a small number of exceptions, liability for the unsafe state of buildings in the NORDIC Countries is premised on the general principles of liability for negligent omissons; in general, the exceptions pertain to the law regulating relations between neighbours and interests of owners of adjoining properties (SWEDEN: Land Code § 3 and Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 329; DENMARK: Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 135, 248-258; FINLAND: Hakulinen, Obligationsrätt, 312) and to environmental liability law which has been constructed on the basis of "neighbour law" and -in the meantime- has even supplanted it to some extent (Swedish Environmental Code chap. 32 [see further under VI.–3:206 below]). The point of departure is the basic rule, according to which liability for omissions is exceptional (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 111; Karlgren, Skadeståndsrätt[5], 31; Vinding Kruse loc. cit. 111-124; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 41). The imposition of liability for the unsafe state of property must therefore be based upon the principle that a person has a duty to avert an antecedent act which increases risk of danger or must derive from the fact that an individual infringed a specific statutory or contractual duty to act (Vinding Kruse loc. cit. 117, Danish HD 7 December 1976, UfR 1977, 75; Hakulinen loc. cit. 256). In exceptional cases, pure omissions have also been deemed by the courts to ground liability, however, strict liability has been rejected by the courts. In order to establish negligence, the general rules are followed; namely, forseeability, probability and avoidance of the damage are guiding criteria (Swedish HD 16 October 1996, NJA 1996, 564; Swedish HD 24 June 1975, NJA 1975, 319; Swedish HD 9 September 1969, NJA 1969, 375; Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 134; Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 268; Danish HD 15 April 1953, UfR 1953, 519; Finnish Supreme Court 26 August 1982, HD 1982 II 123; Saxén loc. cit. 10). Occassionally however, extremely strict requirements are placed on the standard of care (see e.g. für Sweden HD 17 April 1934, NJA 1934, 227; HD 26 June 1973, NJA 1973, 365 I and II; and for Denmark von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 72). The specific purpose and risks associated with a particular device may lead to a stricter assessment. If an incident of the type previously occurred, without causing damage, negligence is affirmed in respect of the failure to adopt appropriate remedial measures in respect of the cause of the incident (Swedish HD 3 April 1985, NJA 1985, 269; Danish Eastern CA 2 December 1974, UfR 1975, 463; Danish HD 24 Novermber 1982, UfR 1983, 55). In respect of property which is designated to be accessed by the public, a similarly high standard of care (albeit unrealistic: Swedish HD 8 April 1976, NJA 1976, 196) is imposed (Swedish HD 22 February 1979, NJA 1979, 129; Swedish HD 6 April 1973, NJA 1973, 141; Danish HD 30 January 1980, UfR 1980, 205; Finnish Supreme Court 10 October 1991, HD 1991:138). The current occupier of an immovable will also be held liable even if the unsafe state results from an activity of a previous occupier (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 168). The duty to act is imposed, depending on the circumstances of the individual case, on the owner or the occupier of the property (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 113). In constrast, at least under Danish law, liability is practically strict as regards the landlord- tenant relationship, (HD 25 October 1984, UfR 1984, 1098; Trolle, Risiko & Skyld[2], 78). Finnish Supreme Court 6 October 1997, HD 1997:151 placed the burden of proof for taking sufficient precautionary measures on the defendant owner of a building, from which water had pored down on the street; the plaintiff slipped during the night when passing the building as the water had frozen. In all three countries, liability in respect of trespassers who enter the zone of danger, depends on the circumstances of the individual case (Karlgren loc. cit. 36).

VI.–3:203: Accountability for damage caused by animals

A keeper of an animal is accountable for the causation by the animal of personal injury and consequential loss, loss within VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death), and loss resulting from property damage.

COMMENTS

A. General

Strict liability for animals of all types. The Article provides for strict liability for animals of all types, without distinguishing between animals kept as household pets or for business purposes, between domestic and wild animals, or between native and foreign species. The provision thus follows the prevailing approach of the Member States' legal systems. Even where individual groups of animals have been excluded from strict liability in principle, such special rules are today frequently met with considerable political criticism. Liability for the realisation of the dangers inherent in animals should lie with their keepers independently of personal negligence (or the negligence of their workers). This is widely acknowledged in Europe today and represents the applicable law.

Animals living in the wild excluded. Liability only arises, however, in respect of animals which are "kept". Wild animals, living in the wild, are therefore not within the scope of this rule. Damage caused by game is generally subject to its own regime. Its idiosyncrasies are not covered by the present Article, see VI.–3:207(a) (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage).

Legally relevant damage; relationship to contract law. As with all cases within Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence), liability under VI.–3:203 only relates to death, personal injury, health injuries (e.g. infection with a disease) and property damage. On the other hand, the scope of protection also encompasses a person who temporarily exercises control of the animal, without being its keeper, e.g. someone who takes another's dog for a walk or who rides another's horse. Where a contract for the care of the animal was concluded between the victim and the keeper, liability depends on whether the regime of contract law demands primacy of applicability (VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (c)).

> Illustration 1
> K, who runs a home for cats and dogs, takes a sheepdog which had been left with her for a few days out for a walk. The dog recognises a place where it has the opportunity to run free and pulls so fiercely on the leash that K falls and breaks her wrist, which leads to prolonged pain and inconvenience. The applicable law of contract provides for liability of a person who, providing payment, temporarily gives over an animal for care only where negligence is present. This interpretation results in the situation that the stipulation under contract law seeks to provide a conclusive rule. Since there is no negligence evident, K is not entitled to a claim in damages.

Defences. The defences in Chapter 5 also apply in relation to the liability of the keepers of animals. In the area of equestrian sport, the rider's claim in damages against the keeper of the horse will therefore often fall at the hurdle of VI.–5:101 (Acting at own risk) paragraph (2).

Where one animal injures another, VI.–5:102 (Contributory fault and accountability) paragraph (4) is of particular note.

Illustration 2
A dog belonging to Carlos but whose possessor and keeper is his sister Esther enters the injured person's rabbit farm and causes the death of 73 'mother rabbits', the miscarriage of 12 other 'mother rabbits' and the death of several baby rabbits. Esther, not Carlos, is liable for this damage. Due to the fact that the owner of the farm had left open the gate to the area in which the rabbits were kept and that the damage would not at all have arisen had the gate been properly closed, the damages are reduced to approximately 80%. A further reduction as a consequence of the fact that there was also strict liability for the rabbits, does not, however, come into play. This is because there was no danger inherent in the rabbits.

Illustration 3
K's dog, who is off the lead, fights with another dog (kept by B), likewise not on a leash. K attempts to separate them but is permanently injured by B's dog in the process. K did not accept the risk of injury solely because she let her dog walk around without a leash. However, she must face a reduction in her claim because her own dog was actively involved in the occurrence of the accident.

B. Damage caused by animals

Animal. The notion of an animal is not necessarily being used here in a biologically exact sense. Rather it is the conventional notion of ordinary language which forms the basis of all rules on the liability of a keeper of an animal. Consequently, bacteria (and in any case viruses) are not animals within the meaning of VI.–3:203. That proposition also follows from the fact that VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions) paragraph (2) envisages a special regime for micro-organisms. The practical outcome is that the smallest animals in the sense invoked by VI.–3:203 are insects.

Causation by the animal. In keeping with the preponderant majority of the existing statutory rules, VI.–3:203 does not (i) single out particular modes of causing damage or (ii) confine liability to the realisation of dangers specific to animals. The criterion of causation in VI.–4:101 (General rule) is flexible enough to avoid absurd outcomes (e.g. a cat does not "cause" damage if it is thrown by someone at the victim, who is thereby injured). The rule proceeds on the basis, however, that animals (as is also the case for things) are capable of "causing" damage. The concept of causation in the draft is not confined to human conduct. See further VI.–1:101 (Basic rule).

Notion of keeper. The concept of a "keeper" is of general significance for the entire law on non-contractual liability. It is invoked in these rules not only within the framework of liability for animals, but also in the regimes under VI.–3:205 (Accountability for damage caused by motor vehicles) and VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions). The meaning is always the same: a keeper, in relation to an animal (motor vehicle or substance), is the person who has the beneficial use or physical control of it for that person's own benefit, and who exercises the right to control it or its use. The rules deliberately avoid invoking the concept of "possession": "possession" is a concept of property law and has or may have a meaning which differs from jurisdiction to jurisdiction.

Examples. A person who rents a horse to ride at stables is not its keeper. A short-term loan by a keeper to another for that other's use does not mean that the existing keeper will lose the status of keeper. Conversely, a stable which competes at tournaments and to which a horse is rented for use in tournament events for two years is a keeper during this time. Employees who take care of their employer's animals (non-self-employed shepherds; circus workers etc.) are not the keepers of the animals. Animals which are not desired are not even "kept" at all (fleas are not "kept" – unless in a flea circus – because the individual afflicted is an involuntary carrier). Also not bearing the characteristic of keeper of an animal is an association for the protection of animals, which temporarily takes dogs and cats knocked down on the road into care in order that they are given back to their owner as soon as possible after care.

V is bitten by a pit-bull terrier. X's adult daughter is the owner of the dog. For two years the daughter has lived on the third floor of an apartment building. In order that she does not have to go up and down so many flights of stairs with the dog every day, the dog lives on the first floor with X, who feeds it, cares for it and pays for the dog tax and insurance. X is the keeper and in this capacity is liable for the damage caused by the bite.

Ownership. Ownership of an animal is an important indicator of the presence of a right to control and enjoy beneficial use, but it is not ultimately decisive. There are many cases in which someone other than the owner is the keeper: examples are where an animal is acquired under retention of title or leased or where a valuable horse is loaned out under a long-term arrangement. Moreover, there are cases in which, despite someone being owner of an animal, there is no keeper: for example, wild animals may belong to the state or another public body, but, unless fenced or caged in, the state does not "keep" them.

Children. Children are as a rule not the keeper of things which belong to them. Rather it will be the children's parents as a rule who are the keeper because they enjoy the right to exercise control.

Several keepers. It is possible for an animal to have more than one keeper. In that case, they will be liable as solidary debtors. The same applies where several animals of different keepers occasion the same damage or if it cannot be established which of these animals has caused the damage, see VI.–4:103 (Alternative causes).

Illustration 5
At a beekeeping demonstration, bees from hives belonging to several beekeepers have been disturbed and are flying about aggressively. X is severely stung by many bees. Among the bees flying about near X were bees belonging to Y, but it is not possible to establish whether X was actually stung by Y's bees. Y is liable under VI.–3:203 in conjunction with VI.–4:103 (Alternative causes).

Illustration 6
X suffers damage to her vehicle when she reverses into a flock of sheep, which are being herded on the road. There are sheep of various different owners in the flock. Since they have all caused the source of danger (VI.–4:101) (General rule), it is not only the owner of the sheep who happens to be walking at the back of the flock who is liable (VI.–6:105(1)) (Solidary liability).

Illustration 7
A victim bitten by a dog suffers severe injuries. The dog belongs to a partnership; its keepers are three brothers, each of whom is a partner. The three brothers are solidarily liable for the damage (VI.–6:105(1) (Solidary liability)).

Thieves. As a rule a thief may be a keeper. It is not possible, however, to state in general whether the former keeper's status as keeper terminates as a result of the theft. In any event the former keeper may remain accountable for damage caused by the animal on the basis of negligence if the former keeper has not taken reasonable precautions to prevent the theft: see VI.–3:102 (Negligence) sub-paragraph (a).

NOTES

1. According to FRENCH, Belgian and Luxemburgian CC art. 1385 the owner of an animal or the person using it, and who was using it when damage occured, is liable for the damage which the animal has caused. Liability is triggered, independent of the fact whether the animal was, at the relevant time, in the custody of the person responsible, whether it had strayed or had escaped. Liability is imposed only for animals that have an owner, CC art. 1385 is not applied in respect of damage caused by game (Cass.civ. 4 June 1997, Bull.civ. 1997, II, no. 166 p. 99). Liability is imposed on the gardien of the animal, i.e. the person who exercises pouvoirs de direction, de contrôle et d´usage (le Tourneau and Cadiet, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2004/2005], no. 7958). If the animal has a gardien, and this person does not own the animal, the latter is only liable when the requirements listed in CC arts. 1382-1383 are satisfied; however, in contrast to the owner, the gardien cannot escape liability by proving a lack of faute (le Tourneau and Cadiet loc. cit. nos. 7959 and 7985).
2. The legal position in BELGIUM is, in all essential matters, identical to that prevailing in France. CC art. 1385 establishes an objective liability, which presupposes an "act" of the animal as well as damage resulting from that act. Liability in Belgium does not hinge upon a faute des gardien (Weyts, RW 1998/99, 930, 932, no. 7). Incidentially, liability can be imposed upon the gardien of the animal in question (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene, TPR 2000, 1551, 1758, no. 73). A non owner is gardien, if, at the time of the damaging occurence, he had la maîtrise de l´animal, comportant un pouvoir de direction et de surveillance, sans intervention du propriétaire, et un pouvoir d´usage égal à celui de ce dernier. It is not necessary that the gardien exercises this power for his own account (Cass. 18 November 1993, Pas. belge 1993, I, no. 472 p. 970). Similarly, in Belgium, wild game does not fall within the scope of the provisions pertaining to the liability of the keeper of an animal (van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 338).
3. SPANISH CC art. 1905 provides that "the possessor of an animal, or the person who makes use of it, is liable for the damage that it causes, although it had escaped or got lost. This liability shall only cease if damage results from force majeure or fault on the part of the victim". This provision is one of strict liabiliy; absence of negligence does not connote a ground of defence (Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños[3], 225; Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 308; TS 3 April 1957, RAJ 1957 (1) no. 1944 p. 1284; TS 26 January 1972, RAJ 1972 (1) no. 120 p. 119; TS 15 March 1982, RAJ 1982 (1) no. 1379 p. 1380; TS 31 December 1992, RAJ 1992 (5) no. 10662 p. 13907; TS 10 July 1995, RAJ 1995 (3) no. 5556 p. 7492; TS 21 November 1998, RAJ 1998 (5) no. 8751 p. 12913; TS 12 April 2000, RAJ 2000 (2) no. 2972 p. 4630; TS 10 October 2002, RAJ 2002 (6) no. 9978 p. 18515; TS 29 May 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 5216 p. 9730; TS 24 November 2004, RAJ 2004 (5) no. 7248 p. 14697). No distinction is drawn between domestic and wild animals; the decisive factor is that the animal is the object of possession (for example, a swarm of bees: CA Guadalajara 10 December 2004, BDA JUR 2005/29458), because liability attaches to possession and not to ownership (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema I[10], 570; Roca i Trias loc. cit. 225). According to case law, liability is imposed nonetheless on the owner, if he fails to aver that he is not the possessor of the animal or that he did not have the beneficial use of the animal (TS 12 April 2000, RAJ 2000 (2) no. 2972 p. 4630). Legal doctrine and the courts concur that the notion of possessor does not include the servidor de la posesión, i.e. a person who possesses in someone else´s name (CC art. 431) (such as employees: TS 2 November 2004, RAJ 2004 (5) no. 6864 p. 13956). Where several persons have the beneficial use of an animal they are solidarily liable (TS 29 May 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 5216 p. 9730). Minors appear to be capable of possessing animals (CC art. 443) and are thus also liable under CC art. 1905 (Gómez Calle, La responsabilidad civil de los padres, 193).

4. ITALIAN CC art. 2052 provides that the owner of an animal or the person who makes use of it, the liability of the latter being confined to the period of use, is liable for the damage which is caused by the animal, irrespective of the fact that, at the relavant time, the animal was not in his/her custody, had strayed or had escaped. The owner is permitted to adduce proof of a caso fortuito. Consequently, the liability underpinning the provison is an objective one (Cass. 4 December 1998, no. 12307, Foro it. 1999, I, 1938; Cass. 9 January 2002, no. 200, Resp.civ. e prev. 2002, 1390; Monateri, Manuale della responsabilità civile, 405). The owner's liability is excluded, if he has accorded a third party a right to use the animal and this right encompasses the authority to have the beneficial use of the animal (Cass. 4 December 1998 loc. cit.; Cass. 17 October 2002, no. 14743, Foro it. 2003, I, 1175). "Animals" in the sense of. CC art. 2052 are all types of animals, including bees (CFI Torino 4 December 1956, Giur.it. 1957, I, 2, 1001), but not microbes (Monateri loc. cit. 407). Animals which have their natural habitat in the wild are embraced by CC art. 2052, regardless of the fact that they belong to the State. Consequently, liability is predicated on the presence of a fault (CC art. 2043; Cass. 14 February 2000, no. 1638, Danno e resp. 2000, 398; Cass. 24 June 2003, no. 10008, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, fasc. 6). In general, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove the causal nexus between the damage suffered by him and the "fatto" of the animal (Cass. 29 October 2003, no. 16226, Danno e resp. 2004, 612; Cass. 9 January 2002, no. 200, Resp.civ. e prev. 2002, 1390). The animal must have played an active part in the event which caused damage (liability was denied under CC art. 2052, when a shop customer tripped over a sleeping dog:1965, 264; of a different view Alpa, Trattato di diritto civile IV, 702). As regards infections with disease contracted from an animal, it is unresolved whether they are goverened by CC art. 2052 or by CC art. 2043 (so Cass. 10 April 1970, no. 1004, RGI 1970, voce R.C. 143). A caso fortuito (proof of which can relieve the defendant of liability) connotes an extraordinary, unforeseeable and unavoidable event (Cass. 30 March 2001, no. 4742, Nouva giur. civ. comm. 2002, I, 412) Grave fault on the part of the person who suffered damage leads to the exclusion of liability (Alpa loc. cit. 703; CFI Pordenone 10 April 1989, Foro it. 1989, I, 2950; Cass. 23 February 1983, no. 1400, Resp.civ. e prev. 1983, 632; Cass. 26 June 1981, no. 4160, Giust.civ.Mass. 1981, fasc. 6; CFI Rome 27 March 1997, Resp.civ. e prev. 1997, 1215). There is an obligation to take out liability insurance in respect of dogs belonging to a particularly agressive breed. This obligation derives from the ordinanza issued by the Department of Healthdes of 12 December 2006 (Gazz. Uff. 31 January 2007).

5. HUNGARIAN CC § 351(1) sets out that liability is imposed on a person who keeps animals, "in accordance with the general provisions, for damage caused by the animal to another person." In contrast, the liability of a keeper of a wild animal is governed in the same manner as the liability of a person who pursues an activity involving a considerable hazard (CC § 351(2)). Game is subject to the special provisions of Hunting Act (Law of. LV/1996 for the protection of game, game management and hunting § 75(1)-(3)). A keeper of an animal connotes a person who has the animal in his possession and under his control. Aside from the owner a keeper of an animal is, in particular, a person who has control over the animal grounded in a legal relationship (agency, hiring of animal), in this case the principal and agent are solidarily liable (CC §§ 350(1), 344). Thieves can also be keepers of an animal, as can a person who takes in a stray animal. The employer is liable for animal minders (CC § 348(1)). The liability for damage caused by animals under CC § 351(1) is not conceived as one of strict liability; the basic norm of CC § 339(1) remains applicable. Only CC § 351(2), which makes reference to CC §§ 345-346, channels strict liability. The concept of "wild animals" does not have an identical meaning to game: many zoo and circus animals and, for example, snakes and scorpions which are kept in dwellings are considered to be "wild animals". However, hares and deer are not embraced by the term. CC § 351(2) signifies animals which are volatile in nature and therefore represent a danger for persons and things. Special provisions qualify particular (attack) dogs as dangerous and therefore they are classified as "wild" under the civil law.

6. Under POLISH CC art. 431 § 1 "whoever keeps or uses an animal shall be obliged to redress the damage it caused regardless of whether it was under his care or went astray or ran away, unless he or the person for whom he is responsible is at fault". This is liability based on culpa in custodiendo (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 228). The rule reinforces the legal position of the injured party by introducing a rebuttable presumption that the damage resulted from the keeper's fault (Pietrzykowski [-Safjan], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 431 p. 1221). A keeper is a person who for his own purposes (which may be non-pecuniary), with or without legal title, takes care of the animal over a longer time, providing it with shelter and food (Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 226). On the other hand temporary use of the animal may be sufficient to give rise to liability. The rule applies only if an animal caused the damage on its own initiative; if it is directed by a person (e.g. a dog is set on another), the general rule of CC art. 415 applies. CC art. 431 does not apply to damage caused by wild animals; such cases are partially subject to special regulations (e.g. under Hunting Law art. 50 the State is liable for damage occasioned by the animals used in the chase which are under yearlong protection). CC art. 431 § 2 stipulates that compensation may be awarded on equitable grounds for cases in which the keeper can exculpate himself, but the financial means of the parties justify partial or full compensatation for the damage inflicted. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 158 differentiates between "dangerous animals" and "domestic animals". Liability for the former is consonant with strict liability (para. (1)), liability for the latter is based on a rebuttable presumption of fault (para. (2)).

7. GERMAN CC § 833 provides for a bifurcation of liability for the keeper of an animals, depending on whether an individual is the keeper of, on the one hand, so-called "luxury animals" (first sentence), under which risk-based liability arises and on the other hand, liability is based a rebuttable presumption of fault in respect of the keeper of domestic animals (second sentence). In principle, the term "animal" encompasses all creatures; no distinction is drawn between tame, wild, animals with a vicious prospensity or goodnatured animals (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 833 no. 4). Insects also belong to this classification (RG 19 November 1938, RGZ 158, 388; BGH 24 January 1992, BGHZ 117, 110), according to prevailing, yet not uncontentious, opinion, micro-organisms are not embraced by the term (MünchKomm [-Wagner], BGB[4], § 833, no. 5). CC § 833 second sentence refers only to domestic animals which are used for a certain purposes. In contrast to "wild" animals (CC § 960), domestic animals are animals which are tame by nature, horses, cattle, pigs, horses and cats are regarded as domestic animals.. They must, in fact, be put to use as domestic animals (that is, they must not be used in scientific animal testing experiments). In addition, the domestic animal must have been intended to serve the occupation, business or livlihood of the keeper. According to prevailing legal opinion, the damage caused by an animal must have resulted from a typical danger inherent in the animal. The damage must have ensued from inherent, unpredictable and autonomous behaviour associated with the animal (BGH 20 December 2005, NJW-RR 2006, 813, 814). In contrast, CC § 833 does not apply, if the animal obeyed the commands of his instructor and thereby the individual concerned is the sole cause of the damage suffered (see for line of demarcation, BGH 20 December 2005 loc. cit.). In addition, the impact that the animal caused must have been unlawful, the requirement of unlawfulness may not be satisifed in, for example, pollination of flowers by bees kept by a neighbour (BGH 24 January 1992 loc. cit.). In each case, liability is imposed on the keeper. Possession and ownership serve as indicators for the categorisation of the individual as a keeper; however, they are not pre-requisites. The decisive factors are the ascertainment of who had the power of control, who was burdened with the expenses associated with keeping the animal, who had the benefit and use of the animal and who bore the risk of the loss of the animal. A temporary loss in possession or loss of the ability to exert control over the animal (e.g in the event that the animal runs away) does not impinge on the classification as keeper. In addition to the liability of the keeper of an animal under § 833, liability is also imposed on the minder of the animal pursuant to CC § 834. Liability is conceived in terms of a rebuttable presumption of fault and no differentiation is made between wild animals and domestic animals.

8. AUSTRIAN CC § 1320 (first sentence) provides for conventional fault based liability for diverse forms of misconduct in respect of all types of animals (OGH 4 July 1983, ZVR 1985/45 p. 86). The keeper of the animal is liable, provided he does not adduce proof that he took care to arrange for the custody and supervision of the animal (loc. cit. second sentence). According to current prevailing legal opinion, this provision is not one of strict liability nor one which is based on fault but connotes a liability which is imposed for an unlawful omission (OGH 10 July 1996, SZ 69/162). The provision is considered to be in need of reform (Schwimann [-Harrer] ABGB VI[3] § 1320 no. 32). A keeper is a person who exercises the factual control over the animal and can decide, on his own account, how the animal should be kept and supervised.(OGH 12 March 1964, ZVR 1964/201 p. 241; OGH 15 March 1953, SZ 26/121); ownership is not the decisive criterion (OGH 15 January 1986, EvBl 1986/111; OGH 22 June 1972, ZVR 1973/157 p. 216). If there is more than one keeper, they are jointly and severally liable (OGH 11 April 1962, SZ 35/45; OGH 29 April 1982, SZ 55/62). The question whether the animal was kept in an appropriate manner will depend on the circumstances of the individual case (OGH 10 July 1996, JBl 1997, 99; OGH 27 March 2003, 2 Ob 40/03a). Entrusting the animal to the safekeeping of reliable individual, can entail that the keeper of the animal has fulfilled his obligations, in this case the keeper is liable for this person only under the prerequisites of CC § 1315 (OGH 2 April 1962, ZVR 1964/200 p. 240).

9. GREEK CC art. 924 also differentiates between liability of the keeper of a domestic animal (para. (2)) and liability of a keeper of other animals.(para. (1)). In respect of the latter, liability is strict, namely as liability does not hinge upon the establishment of fault in the supervision of the animal (Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 556). The situation is different where domestic animals are concerned pursuant to the provisions of CC art. 924(2); the keeper, however, has the possibility of excuplating himself. This has been criticised on policy grounds. The provision is regarded as antiquated when viewed in the light of current prevailing economic and social standards (Kornilakis loc. cit.; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Vosinakis], art. 924 no. 3). "Animal" in the sense of this provision connotes that it must be possible for humans to control the animal, because otherwise the animals would not be capable of having keepers (Kornilakis loc. cit. 557 [who also counts micro-organisms cultivated in a lab in this category.]; Vosinakis loc. cit. no. 4). Similarly, under Greek law, in order for a keeper to be held accountable for the damage caused by the animal, it is necessary for a specific danger inherent in the animal to be realised, i.e. autonomous action on the part of the animal (Kornilakis loc. cit. 558). The concept of "keeper" in the sense of CC art. 924 denotes a natural or legal person, who uses the animal for his own account and not on a short term basis. A person who uses the animal typically holds the factual control over the animal, namely in the sense that he determines who cares for and determines the life span of the animal. If the control over the animal and the benefical use are segregated, then whoever has the benefit (benefical use) of the animal is the keeper. Ownership and possession merely serve as prima facie indicators that a person is a keeper (Kornilakis loc. cit. 561).

10. In PORTUGAL a distinction is drawn between the strict liabilty of the keeper of an animal and (CC art. 502) and liability of the animal minder; liability of the latter is based on a rebuttable presumption of fault (CC art. 493(1)), see Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 573; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 511, art. 502 no. 1).In respect of the damage caused, once again, it must pertain to the realisation of a specific danger inherent in the animal. This was even affirmed, for example, in a case where a 600 strong herd of sheep broke through their enclosure and ran onto a train track, the keeper was found liable and it was adjudged that the keeper was obliged to compensate the damage which accrued to the train (STJ 17 June 2003). On the other hand, a danger inherent in an animal will not materialise, if the damage can be attributed to human behaviour asssociated with the animal e.g. where a team of oxen were driven on the streets at night without any appropriate lighting (Almeida Costa loc. cit. 574; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 593; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela loc. cit. art. 493 no. 5; Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 86 [1959] 21, 41; CA Coimbra 13 January 2004). CC art. 493(1) pertains to individuals who have assumed the control over an animal, (bailee, herdsman, cattleman, a person who appraises/tests/tries out an animal before buying, etc.: Antunes Varela loc. cit. 653, fn. 3; CA Oporto 7 July 1997); in contrast CC art. 502 only concerns those persons who use an animal for their own benefit (STJ 17 June 2003; STJ 9 March 1978, BolMinJus 275 [1978] 191). Both heads of liability – that arising under CC art. 493 and that under CC art. 502 – can coincide in one and the same case- (Almeida Costa loc. cit. 574-575), e.g. in cases concerning the hire of an animal (CA Oporto 3 February 1997).

11. DUTCH CC art. 6:173(3) expressly stipulates that (strict) liability of keepers of animals does not arise under CC art. 6:173 (liability for moveables), but is deriven from CC art. 6:179. In principle, any kind of damage caused by an animal suffices (e.g. an accident which was caused by crossing the street???: Onrechtmatige Daad II [-Oldenhuis], art. 6:179, no. 6 p. 70). However, damage caused by an infection which does not stem from the conduct of the animal are excluded from the ambit of the provision (HR 24 January 1984, NedJur 1984, no. 415 p. 1518: a farmer drove a sick pig which had run away onto his meadow, in the wrongly held belief that it was one of his own; no liablity was imposed on the keeper of the sick pig for the consequences resulting from the infection of the other animals). A contrasting approach is adopted, for example, in a case where the infection results from a bite, the infection can be atttributed to the conduct of the animal and the unpredicitability of the animal (HR 24 January 1984 loc. cit.). Wild animals as well as domestic are embraced by art. 6:179, but game are not governed by this provision (but are subject to the provisions of hunting law). Micro-organisms are also excluded from the ambit of CC art. 6:179 (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 763); they are dealt with under CC art. 6:175 (dangerous substances), in certain circumstances they could fall to be dealt with under CC art. 6:186 (defective products: Oldenhuis loc. cit. art. 6:179, no. 32 pp. 142-143). Liability under art. 6:179 is imposed on the owner-possessor (bezitter). If the animal is used for professional purposes, then the proprietor of the business is liable (CC art. 6:181(1)), if the benefit of the animal is obtained from hiring the animal out, for commercial purposes, to other businesses, then the liability is imposed on the latter (loc. cit. para. (2)). In defining the term "owner-posessor", recourse must be had to the general rules contained in CC arts. 3:107-109. Therefore, for example, a managing director not acting upon instruction, carriers, custodians und operators of boarding facilities for animals and animal homes are not liable under CC art. 6:179. The parents of children who have yet to attain the age of fourteen are liable in their stead, unless the circumstances pertain to an animal which is used in the course of a commercial enterprise (CC art. 6:183(2)). Liability is strict in all cases. The person responsible can only relieve himself/herself of liability upon proof that s/he could not avoided the damage if he had the animal under his control, for example, in self defence, the defendant set his/her dog on an assailant.

12. ESTONIAN LOA § 1060 succinctly provides that: "The keeper of an animal shall be liable for damage caused by the animal". Consequently, under this provision, liability is similarly strict. Only the damage stipulated in LOA § 1056(1) is recoverable.This corresponds to the regulation contained in VI.–3:203. According to the consonant provision of LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.267(1) liability for the keeping of all animals is strict; however, game conotes an exception and is the subject of a special regime (para. (2)).

13. In SWEDEN, several statutes regulate the liability for the keeping of animals. Law (1943:459, replaced by 2007:1150) on supervision of dogs and cats § 6 (now § 19) introduces strict liability for the owner of a dog and introduces solidary liability, in the event that another individual uses or keeps the animal (see e.g. HD 10 December 1947, NJA 1947, 594 and HD 28 February 1990, NJA 1990, 80). The owner is only liable to the keeper in the case where he is at fault (HD 28 February 1996, NJA 1996, 104). Cats (and also dogs) have to be supervised by their owner, in order to prevent them causing damage (loc. cit. § 1). Law (1933:269) on peaceful enjoyment of property § 47 subjects the owner as well as the keeper of the animal to strict liability for cattle causing damages to other persons' crops. Byggningabalken (the ancient Land Code) chap. 22 § 7 establishes strict liability for damage caused by cattle to another's cattle, and loc. cit. § 8 regulates the liability for damage caused by game. DENMARK also does not recognize any general liability for the keeping of animals (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 179). Dog Act (Hundloven) § 8 provides for strict liability of the dog's possessor; it covers all types of damage (see Western CA 21 January 1931, UfR 1931, 356 and Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 201-203). Law on peaceful enjoyment of land and roads (mark- og vejfredsloven) § 3 provides for strict liability of the possessor of a domestic animal, for damage caused to other domestic animals, crops or other agrarian property; other damage remains however within the realm of the general culpa rule (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 180). Danske

Lov (the ancient Danish Code) 6-10-2 establishes strict liability for the possessor of cattle which is outside of his immediate control (Western CA 19 April 1994, UfR 1994, 573; see also Western CA 15 December 1997, UfR 1998, 502 and HD 19 June 1974, UfR 1974, 692). Personal injuries may also be compensated under this head (Western CA 19 April 1994 loc. cit.). Loc. cit. 6-10-4 and 5 also provide for strict liability for damage caused to another's cattle and for damage caused by wild animals. On the notion of „possessor" within Dogs Act § 8 see Eastern CA 31 January 2007, UfR 2007, 1169. Under FINNISH Hunting Act (jaktlagen) § 87 compensation for damage caused by wild animals, domestic animals and cattle may be sought from the state. Byggningabalken chap. 22 § 8 provides for strict liability of the owner of dangerous, but not domestic, animals (see in more detail Hakulinen, Obligationsrätt, 311). For other types of animals, the general culpa rule applies (Supreme Court, HD 1951 II 154). Damage caused by animals to another's crop are also subjected to the rules on negligence (Hakulinen loc. cit. 312).

14. In ENGLAND AND WALES statute provides for a keeper's strict liability for damage caused by an animal in certain demarcated categories of case, although judicial interpretation has tended to give a broad scope to the provisions based on a keeper's choice whether to run the unavoidable risks of keeping the animal and whether to insure against them: cf. * Mirvahedy v. Henley [2003] UKHL 16, [2003] 2 AC 491 (Lord Walker), approved in Welsh v. Stokes [2007] EWCA Civ 796 at [47], [2008] 1 WLR 1224 at 1239 (Dyson LJ). The Animals Act 1971, s. 2(1), provides for a strict liability of a keeper of an animal for damage caused by that animal if the animal belongs to a "dangerous species", defined by s. 6(2) as a species which is not commonly domesticated in the British Islands and whose fully grown animals, if not restrained, are likely to cause severe damage or may cause damage which, if it occurs, is likely to be severe. If the animal belongs to a dangerous species, it does not matter whether the particular animal was dangerous or tame or whether the keeper knew the species was dangerous: Clerk and Lindsell (-Dugdale/Jones), Torts[19], 22-03. For damage caused by animals belonging to a non-dangerous species, a keeper is liable if three conditions are satisfied: (a) the damage is of a kind which the animal, unless restrained, was likely to cause or which was likely to be severe if the animal caused it; (b) that likelihood was due to characteristics not normally found in animals of that species (e.g. the animal is abnormally aggressive) or only at particular times or in particular circumstances (e.g. a horse with a particular fear of farm machinery:  Flack v. Hudson [2001] QB 698); and (c) those characteristics were known to the keeper, a servant of the keeper in change of the animal at the time, or, for the head of a household, another keeper under the age of 16 within that household: s. 2(2). A propensity to cause injury is sufficient without the need for proof of any vicious tendency of the animal: Clerk and Lindsell (-Dugdale/Jones), Torts[19], 22-05, citing  Wallace v. Newton [1982] 1 WLR 375. Nor must the characteristic of the animal which renders (severe) damage likely in particular circumstances be one which is abnormal for that species, even though this interpretation renders the second condition of liability otiose in most cases and creates strict liability for normal behavior of animals of non-dangerous species: Curtis v. Betts [1990] 1 WLR 459; Cummings v. Granger [1977] QB 397 (where an Alsatian guard dog, acting normally for such dogs, attacked a trespasser), approved in Mirvahedy v. Henley [2003] UKHL 16 at [43], [2003] 2 AC 491 (collision with a bolting horse – normal for a horse to panic when frightened). The characteristic giving rise to danger may thus be a natural, yet unusual one: Welsh v. Stokes [2007] EWCA Civ 796 at [47], [2008] 1 WLR 1224 at 1239 (where a frightened horse, instead of turning and fleeing, reared and fell on its rider). However, such a characteristic must be one which is only found in the animal in particular circumstances: irvahedy v. Henley [2003] UKHL 16, [2003] 2 AC 491 (Lord Nicholls giving the example of a large and heavy cow stumbling and falling on a person – such danger is attributable to a characteristic normally found in cows at all time, namely their size and weight). The precise degree of "likelihood" of damage required is not settled: contrast Smith v. Ainger (1990) Times, 5th June ("material risk" sufficient) and Mirvahedy v. Henley [2003] UKHL 16, [2003] 2 AC 491 (damage need not be "probable", but must be "reasonably to be epected" and more than a mere possibility). It seems that actual knowledge of the animal's propensities is required; it is not enough that the keeper (or servant or minor) merely ought to have known of this fact: Clerk and Lindsell (-Dugdale/Jones), Torts[19], 22-08. However, proof of a keeper's knowledge of the normal behaviour of animals of the particular species in question suffices to establish the keeper's knowledge of the characteristic of the animal in question where its normal behavior has caused the damage: Welsh v. Stokes [2007] EWCA Civ 796 at [71], [2008] 1 WLR 1224 at 1244 (Dylon LJ). Recoverable damage expressly embraces personal injury (including fatal personal injury) (s. 11), but the unrestricted wording of s. 2(1) ("any damage") implies that recovery is not apparently confined to particular types of damage and would thus extend to property damage: Clerk and Lindsell (-Dugdale/Jones), Torts[19], 1279 n 15 and 17. The damage need not be severe: Clerk and Lindsell (-Dugdale/Jones), Torts[19], 1279 n 17. It would also seem that to be recoverable damage need only be causally related and need not be reasonably foreseeable:  Behrens v. Bertram Mills Circus Ltd. [1957] 2 QB 1, 17 (Devlin J). Nor must the damage result directly from a characteristic of an animal which renders it dangerous; there is sufficient causation when a person is injured in fleeing from the danger, e.g. by falling over or suffering a heart attack: Behrens v. Bertram Mills Circus [1957] 2 QB 1, 17 (Devlin J); Chauhan v. Paul [1998] CLY 3990. The Animals Act 1971 also provides for the strict liability of a keeper of a dog which causes damage by killing or injuring livestock (s. 3), but not if the livestock strayed onto land whose occupier permitted the dog's presence (s. 5(4)). A person is a keeper if he owns the animal or has it in his possession: s. 6(3)(a). However, a person does not become a keeper merely by taking into and keeping possession of an animal for the purpose of preventing it from causing damage or restoring it to its owner: s. 6(4). If the animal is owned or possessed by a member of a household under the age of sixteen, both that person and the head of the household are keepers: s. 6(3)(b). Furthermore, under s. 4 a person who has possession of livestock is strictly liable for damage done by the livestock to land, or property on land, in another's ownership or occupation onto which the livestock strayed, unless it strayed from a highway where its presence was lawful. Residual liability for damage caused by animals rests on establishing a breach of a duty of care in common law negligence: Draper v. Hodder [1972] 2 QB 556 (defendant liable for failure to take reasonable precautions to prevent foreseeable risk of a pack of terriers attacking a child); Smith v. Prendergast (1984) Times, 18 October (liability for damage resulting from attack by stray Alsatian dog, which had taken up residence in the defendant's scrapyard three weeks earlier, as the defendant was negligent in not controlling the dog or checking whether the dog was aggressive); Hole v. Ross-Skinner [2003] EWCA Civ 774 (no liability for injury to a user of the highway caused by collision with the defendant's escaped horse straying onto the highway as the fence had been cut and a gate opened by an unkown third party). Alternatively there may be a breach of duty under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957. Liability may also be founded on trespass (e.g. driving animals onto another's land) or nuisance, whether public (e.g. where animals obstruct the highway) or private (e.g. stench from farm animals): Clerk and Lindsell (-Dugdale/Jones), Torts[19], 22-19.

15. The IRISH law on liability for injury or damage caused by animals relies on special rules of strict liability (which, unlike ENGLISH law, remain largely matters of common law), supplemented by the general rules of the law of tort: McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 27.01. Under the scienter principle, the owner of an animal is strictly liable in respect of damage which it causes if the animal had a vicious propensity to cause the damage of the type caused and the owner knew this: 27.15. The vicious propensity and the owner's knowledge is irrebuttably presumed for animals of a dangerous class, so that the owner of a wild animal which is kept is strictly liable for damage which it causes; proof of the propensity and knowledge is only required for tame animals: ibid, 27.15. For other animals, proof of past display of aggressive behavior is sufficient to establish an animal's viscious propensity; there is no necessity to show that actual harm had previously resulted: Duggan v. Armstrong [1992] 2 IR 161, 164-165 (McCarthy J) (where a dog had growled and run at children, but had not hitherto bitten one). The requirement of the owner's knowledge may be established by showing the knowledge of another family member: Duggan v. Armstrong [1992] 2 IR 161, 165 (McCarthy J) (where a child's knowledge was imputed to a parent). As regards general rules, liability may be founded on trespass (ibid, 27.07), nuisance (ibid, 27.05-27.06), negligence (ibid, 27.03-27.04) or Rylands v. Fletcher (ibid, 27.08). Liability on the latter basis will be in practice be rare since liability presupposes an escape of a "dangerous thing" and a "non-natural" user of the land (e.g. keeping an unreasonable number of animals): ibid. Liability under the Occupier's Liability Act 1995 is also probably arguable if, in the circumstances, the presence of the animal can be regarded as "a danger due to the state of the premises" (within the meaning of s. 1(1)): ibid, 27.09-27.14 and cf. Duggan v. Armstrong [1992] 2 IR 161 (breach of common law duty of care [superseded by Act] in permitting a large mongrel Alsatian dog with a known vicious propensity towards children to run free within the premises in an area where a large number of guests, including children, congregated). Equally, a hotel proprietor may be in breach of the duty of care under the Hotel Proprietors Act 1963, s. 4: Duggan v. Armstrong [1992] 2 IR 161.

16. The law in SCOTLAND on liability for injury and damage caused by animals closely resembles that in ENGLAND AND WALES with specific statutory rules providing for strict liability in defined cases (though not in terms identical to those enacted earlier for the sister jurisdiction), supplemented by the residual application of general (fault-based) principles of delictual liability: see generally Stair (-Clifford), The laws of Scotland II, para. 161. Under the Animals (Scotland) Act 1987, s. 1, a keeper of an animal is liable for injury or damage caused by an animal if the animal belongs to a species whose members generally are, by virtue of their physical attributes or habits, likely (unless controlled or restrained) to injure severely persons or animals or to damage property to a material extent. The injury or damage must be directly referable to the physical attributes or habits of the animal which rendered it likely to injure or damage: s. 1(1)(c). It is irrebuttably presumed that dogs and certain dangerous wild animals are likely to injure severely by biting or otherwise savaging, attacking or harrying (s. 3(a)) and that (among others) cattle, horses, sheep, pigs, goats and deer are likely, in the course of foraging, to damage land or its produce to a material extent (s. 3(b)). However, liability for disease is excluded if it is transmitted by means unlikely to cause severe injury other than disease: s. 1(4). Besides strict liability, an owner or keeper of an animal may be liable under the rules relating to negligence if his breach of a duty of care caused actual harm: Clelland v. Robb 1911 SC 253; Stair (-Clifford), The laws of Scotland II, para. 163 (setting out the various judicially recognized duties of care). Culpa-based liability may also arise under the Occupiers' Liability (Scotland) Act 1960: Hill v. Lovett 1992 SLT 994 (occupiers liable to window cleaner attacked by their pugnacious dog). Equally there may be liability for intentionally causing harm, such as setting a dog on another (Stair (-Clifford), The laws of Scotland II, paras. 160 and 164) or deliberately riding a horse at a pedestrian (Ewing v. Earl of Mar (1851) 14 D 314), or under the rules relating to nuisance (Stair (-Clifford), The laws of Scotland II, para. 162).

VI.–3:204: Accountability for damage caused by defective products

(1) The producer of a product is accountable for the causation of personal injury and consequential loss, loss within VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death), and, in relation to consumers, loss resulting from property damage (other than to the product itself) by a defect in the product.

(2) A person who imported the product into the European Economic Area for sale, hire, leasing or distribution in the course of that person's business is accountable correspondingly.

(3) A supplier of the product is accountable correspondingly if:

(a) the producer cannot be identified; or

(b) in the case of an imported product, the product does not indicate the identity of the importer (whether or not the producer's name is indicated), unless the supplier informs the person suffering the damage, within a reasonable time, of the identity of the producer or the person who supplied that supplier with the product.

(4) A person is not accountable under this Article for the causation of damage if that person shows that:

(a) that person did not put the product into circulation;

(b) it is probable that the defect which caused the damage did not exist at the time when that person put the product into circulation;

(c) that person neither manufactured the product for sale or distribution for economic purpose nor manufactured or distributed it in the course of business;

(d) the defect is due to the product's compliance with mandatory regulations issued by public authorities;

(e) the state of scientific and technical knowledge at the time that person put the product into circulation did not enable the existence of the defect to be discovered; or

(f) in the case of a manufacturer of a component, the defect is attributable to:

(i) the design of the product into which the component has been fitted; or

(ii) instructions given by the manufacturer of the product.

(5) "Producer" means:

(a) in the case of a finished product or a component, the manufacturer;

(b) in the case of raw material, the person who abstracts or wins it; and

(c) any person who, by putting a name, trademark or other distinguishing feature on the product, gives the impression of being its producer.

(6) "Product" means a movable, even if incorporated into another movable or an immovable, or electricity.

(7) A product is defective if it does not provide the safety which a person is entitled to expect, having regard to the circumstances including:

(a) the presentation of the product;

(b) the use to which it could reasonably be expected that the product would be put; and

(c) the time when the product was put into circulation, but a product is not defective merely because a better product is subsequently put into circulation.

COMMENTS

A. General

Council Directive 85/374/EEC. This Article reproduces Council Directive 85/374/EEC of 25th July 1985 on liability for defective products (as amended by Directive 1999/34/EC art. 1). Since the liability regime under the product liability Directive undoubtedly constitutes a cornerstone of the European law on liability for damage, it did not appear sufficient simply to make reference to the Directive in the text of the Article. Rather it seemed necessary to spell out its effects in these rules.

Detailed commentary unnecessary. To the extent that the Article coincides with the Directive this text can dispense with a more detailed commentary. Reference can be had for that purpose to the voluminous literature devoted to this topic to be found in each Member State.

Restriction to consumer protection. In keeping with the fundamental legal policy adopted by the Directive, VI.–3:204 is restricted to matters of consumer protection. For that reason it deliberately refrains from extending strict liability to "business to business" relationships. Such a step would depart from the Directive's purpose of consumer protection and entail a wide-ranging interference with freedom of contract – quite apart from the fact that to date there have been no audible demands in the business sector that a corresponding liability regime be established. Rather the complete opposite is the case. The European Commission, which posed the question whether product liability should be extended to business property in its Green Paper of 28 July 1999 (COM(1999) 396 final, p. 31), stated in its report of 31 January 2001 on the application of the product liability Directive (COM(2000) 893 final, p. 25) that the tenor of responses was "in general negative" and "[o]n the basis of data available it does not seem appropriate to amend the Directive on this point".

Burden of proof in relation to damage to business property. Given this background, VI.–3:204 likewise does not provide for a reversal of the burden of proof to the detriment of the producer of the sort adopted in a few of the legal systems not just for "B2C" cases, but also for "B2B" cases. Such rules have the effect of presuming negligence to the producer's detriment if one of the products causes damage to another's business property. Where those rules are to be found in the law currently in force, their practical effect is barely distinguishable from a strict liability.

No contractual exclusion or restriction of liability. VI.–3:204 must be read in conjunction with VI.–5:401 (Contractual exclusion and limitation of liability) paragraph (3). By virtue of the latter Article, liability under VI.–3:204 can neither be restricted nor excluded before the occurrence of the damage. This, too, follows from the product liability Directive (art. 12). The nullity of an exclusion of liability relates both to personal injury and damage to consumer property.

No punitive or aggravated damages. The draft does not provide for punitive damages in general and the law on product liability does not constitute an exception. Since VI.–3:204 is concerned with strict liability and no element of fault is required, the introduction of punitive damages in this context must be completely out of the question.

Primary agricultural products and game. Since Directive 1999/34/EC art. 1(2) came into force, Directive 85/374/EEC no longer permits Member States a decision-making power in regard to whether or not primary agricultural products and game should be subjected to strict liability. VI.–3:204 reflects this legal development. Products of this type are included in its scope of application.

Liability for development risks. The draft follows the Directive also in its approach to liability for so-called "development risks". Under VI.–3:204(4)(e) there is no strict liability if the producer shows that the state of scientific and technical knowledge at the time that person put the product into circulation did not enable the existence of the defect to be discovered. That rule must, however, be read in conjunction with VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage) sub-paragraph (c) which, like Council Directive 85/374/EEC art. 15(1)(b), leaves to the national legal systems the option not to introduce this ground of defence into their law. The various jurisdictions do not asses in a completely uniform way, however, the conditions under which it may be said that the risk which has realised is merely a 'development risk'. The ECJ in its judgment of 29 May 1997 in Commission of the European Communities v. United Kingdom, ECJ 29 May 1997, C-300/95, ECR 1997, I-2649 at para. 29 defined in the following terms how the concept deployed by the Directive is to be understood: "the producer must prove that the objective state of scientific and technical knowledge, including the most advanced level of such knowledge, at the time when the product in question was put into circulation was not such as to enable the existence of the defect to be discovered. Further, in order for the relevant scientific and technical knowledge to be successfully pleaded as against the producer, that knowledge must have been accessible at the time when the product in question was put into circulation." In so doing the court essentially adopted the Opinion of Advocate-General Tesauro.

Policy considerations. The question whether product liability should also embrace liability for development risks has been and remains a matter of controversial discussion at the level of legal policy in many Member States. According to a study in 2003 by the Fondazione Rosselli compiled for the European Commission the argument that the risk concerned was a development risk has only rarely been successful. To date it has been pleaded as a defence primarily in proceedings relating to blood products and their derivatives, medicines and vaccines, foodstuffs and chemicals (For further information see http://europa.eu.int/comm/enterprise/regulation/goods/liability_de.htm). The study concludes by advocating the retention of the development risk defence. One of the reasons put forward is the difficulty of finding a reasonable cover for the risk on the insurance market, an aspect which the European Commission also emphasises in its report referred to in the third paragraph of this Comment. Moreover, mention is also made of the concern that the propensity to innovate and the range of industrial products might otherwise diminish.

Further considerations. These rules consider – in agreement with the studies referred to – that the current regime in the Directive is a balanced one. It does not appear to have caused difficulties in practice or gaps in liability which cannot be easily accommodated. It is sufficient to leave the decision as to maintenance or abolition of the development risk defences to the national legal systems. They (i) enjoy as a result the freedom to define the concept in a manner which appears to them to be reasonable and (ii) retain the freedom to abolish the defence only for defined products with special potential for hazard (blood products, medicines, genetically modified produce) and to create the necessary insurance framework.

Application of the general provisions. In accordance with Council Directive 85/374/EEC art. 13, VI.–3:204 leaves other causes of action unaffected. Product liability based on the law on non-contractual liability for negligence and on contract (see VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (d)) remains applicable. That is of practical significance in particular in reference to damage to property of businesses or professionals. Compensation for damage to property (as a result of a defective product) which a business causes to another business is consequently (as already indicated) only obtainable under the rules on non-contractual liability if the injured person can prove that the person causing the damage did so intentionally or negligently.

Duty to warn of development risks. The exclusion of strict liability for development risks does not then simultaneously mean an exclusion of liability for negligence. Such liability can arise in this context if the producer breaches duties to warn in relation to the realisation of development risks that have only become apparent after the product has been put on the open market and of which the consumer would have been made aware by a producer monitoring its products with reasonable care.

Deviations from the Directive; options left to discretion of Member States. VI.–3:204 departs from the Directive on one point (there is no excess provision for consumers suffering property damage) and VI.–3:204 also proposes that the options left by the Directive to the Member States in respect of non-economic losses and the introduction of a quantitative ceiling on liability be superseded by solutions which are in harmony with the general approach of these rules).

B. Damage to consumer property

Deviation from the Directive. Departing from the Community law currently in force (Product Liability Directive art. 9(b)), VI.–3:204 proposes to extend the strict liability of a producer in favour of consumers to damage to property which amounts to less than €500 (The Directive originally provided for an excess of 500,- ECU. Council Regulation EC/1103/97 of 17 June 1997 on certain provisions relating to the introduction of the euro [OJ L 162, 19 June 1997, p. 1] art. 2 converted that sum into € 500). It may well be that for such small levels of damage solutions outside of the court system ought to be found. The Commission report referred to in paragraph 3 of these Comments mentions this topic, but does not go into any detail.

Policy considerations. A primary explanation for the excess for consumers in relation to property damage which has been given is that producers, insurers and the courts ought not to be burdened with proceedings in respect of trivial sums and, furthermore, that a limit of this nature reduces transaction costs. However, tending against the rule are the facts not only that it constitutes a rather singular 'foreign body' within Community law, but that in a predominant number of the legal systems of the Member States it is practically an empty shell because both contract law and the law on non-contractual liability have developed mechanisms in the law of evidence which in terms of practical outcome cut out the producer's defence of an absence of fault. Furthermore, in all cases of property damage which exceed the minimum limit for liability the rule leads to an unjustifiable difficulty for the consumer in the conduct of proceedings; the claim must be based in such cases on different causes of action. The rule also contributes towards new legal differences in European product liability partly because the character of the rule as a general excess is liable to fall into disrespect, but also because the Directive originally expressed the excess in terms of ECU and the Euro has not yet been introduced in all Member States. Fluctuations in currency values consequently have the effect that the amount of the excess varies not inconsiderably from country to country. Finally, a want of justice is inherent in the excess: it seems anomalous that damage to property of less than €500 is to be withdrawn from just one regime of strict liability, but to allow such damage to be compensated in all other cases (a property damage of, say, €450 is certainly not within the notion of "trivial damage" within the meaning of VI.–6:102 (De minimis rule)). The same goes for damage to property which exceeds €500 in value. From the point of view of legal policy it is hardly a convincing standpoint that if there is a damage of, for example, €20,000, compensation will only amount to €19,500, and one may speculate that in judgments for which (as is often the case) the quantum of damage depends on an estimation, the excess will be 'reckoned in' before the level of compensation is set.

C. Liability for non-economic losses; no maximum limit to liability Liability for non-economic loss and injury as such. The definition of damage in the Directive is "without prejudice to national provisions relating to non-material damage" (art. 9, second sentence). Since the rules in this Book do not generally distinguish between economic and non-economic loss, the term "loss" consequently embracing loss of a non-economic nature (see VI.–2:101(1) (Meaning of legally relevant damage), VI.–3:204 too will provide a platform for a claim for reparation for such losses. The same applies to the claim for compensation for the injury as such. The reparable nature of non-economic loss within a strict liability regime corresponds with the current position in the legal systems of most EU Member States.

No maximum limit to liability. VI.–3:204 likewise corresponds with the majority of the legal systems in the EU Member States in not proposing an upper limit to liability (cf. Council Directive 85/374/EEC art. 16). Such limits are not an appropriate instrument to structure issues of strict liability, including product liability.

NOTES

I. Implementation of the Directive

1. The product liability directive 85/374/EEC, as amended by Directive 1999/34/EC, has been implemented in all Member States. See for FRANCE the Loi no. 98-389 of 19 May 1998 (= CC arts. 1386-1 - 1386-13); for BELGIUM the statute of 25 February 1991 (BS of 22 March 1991); for LUXEMBURG Products Liability Act of 21 April 1989 (Mémorial of 28 April 1989); for MALTA the Consumer Affairs Act (Act XXVII of 1994, supplemented by Act V of 1995, Act XIX of 1996, Act XXVI of 2000 and Act VI of 2001) part VII; for SPAIN the Consumer Protection Act and related statutes (Real Decreto Legislativo 1/2007, of 16 November, que aprueba el texto refundido de la Ley General para la Defensa de los consumidores y usuarios y otras leyes complementarias) book III chaps. 1 and 2; for ITALY Legislative Decree of 6 September 2005 no. 206 (Suppl.ord. no. 162 alla Gazz. Uff. no. 235 of 8 October) (arts. 114-127); for HUNGARY Products Liability Act (Act no. X of 1993 as amended); for POLAND Act of 2 March 2000 (Dz. U. no. 22, poz. 271) (= CC Book III, title VI[1]); for the CZECH Republic Act 59/1998 of 5 March 1998 on Responsibility for Damage Due to Defect of a Product as amended by Act 209/2000; for the SLOVAK Republic Act of 2 November 1999 on Product Liability; for SLOVENIA the Consumer Protection Act 1998 (Official Journal 20/1998, amended by the statutes 23/1999, 110/2002, 51/2004); for BULGARIA Consumer Protection Act of 9 December 2006 (DV no. 99), which repealed the Consumer Protection and Trade Rules Act of 2 April 1999 (DV no. 30) commenced on the 10 June 2006; for ROMANIA Act no. 240 of 7 June 2004 on Product Liability (OJ Part I no. 552 of 22 June 2004); for GERMANY the Product Liability Act of 15 December 1989 (BGBl I 1989, 2198) as amended (BGBl I 2002, 2674); for AUSTRIA Products Liability Act of 21 January 1988, amended in 1993 and subsequently (BGBl I 1988/99, 1993/95, 1999/185, 2001/98); for GREECE the Consumer Protection Act no. 2251/1994 (as amended by Act no.3587/2007); for PORTUGAL Decree-Law no. 383/89 of 6 November 1989 on Liability for Defective Products as amended by Decree-Law no. 131/2001 of 24 April 2001; for THE NETHERLANDS CC arts. 6:185-193; for ESTONIA LOA § 1061; for LITHUANIA CC arts. 6.292-6.300; for LATVIA Law on Liability for Defective Goods and Deficient Services of 5 July 2000; for DENMARK the Products Liability Act of 7 June 1989/371 (lov om produktansvar); for FINLAND the Products Liability Act of 17 August 1990/694 (produktansvarslag); for SWEDEN Products Liability Act of 23 January 1992 (Produktansvarslag 1992:18); for the UNITED KINGDOM the Consumer Protection Act 1987, Part I (ENGLAND AND WALES, SCOTLAND) and the Consumer Protection (Northern Ireland) Order 1987, Part II (NORTHERN IRELAND); for IRELAND the Liability for Defective Products Act of 1991; and for CYPRUS the Defective Product (Civil Liability) Laws of 1995 to 2002.

2. FRANCE has reacted to the condemnation of the ECJ 14 March 2006, JCP 2006 éd. G., and has enacted Law no. 2006-406 of 5 April 2006 and reformulated CC art. 1386-7(1) accordingly, prompted by the requirement to ensure conformity with the Directive. The ECJ in its judgment of the 10th of January 2006, C-402/03, Skov Æg v. Bilka Lavprisvarehus A/S, ECJ 10 January 2006, C-402/03, ECR 2006, I-199 clarified that the Directive must be interpreted as (i) "precluding a national rule, according to which the supplier is subject to a non fault based liability, beyond the cases which are exhaustively listed in art. 3(3), which the Directive ….burdens the producer with, and (ii) as not precluding a national rule, according to which the supplier is accountable without restriction for the producer's fault based liability."

II. Liability for Damage to Property

(1) Damage to things intended for private use

3. The commonly called lower threshold for property damage claims of consumers is mandatorily prescribed in community law (ECJ 25 April 2002, Commission of the European Communities v. French Republic, ECJ 25 April 2002, C-418/00 and C-419/00, ECR 2002, I-3969, Commission of the European Communities v. Hellenic Republic, ECJ 25 April 2002, C-154/00, ECR 2002, I-3879). In spite of this, provisions effecting its transposition have only been found since the beginning of 2005 in all the legal orders of the Member States. Even today (writing as of January 2007) the threshold amounts under national laws vary considerably; moreover many issues have been left undecided, namely, how the damage, the extent of which exceeds the stipulated amount, is to be regulated. On this and on many other policy grounds, the threshold has come in for heavy criticism.

4. FRANCE did not transpose the threshold amount envisaged by the Directive and was consequently condemned for omitting to do so by the ECJ.(see previous Note). The French legislature thereupon amended CC art. 1386-2 by the Law no. 2004-1343 of 9 December 2004 CC art. 1386-2, under which the heading pertaining to product liability is only applicable to injury to persons (para. (1)) and to damage to property which exceeds a particular amount to be fixed by decree (para. (2)). This sum was set at € 500 (Décret no. 2005-113 of 11 February 2005, JO 11 February 2005, 2408). BELGIUM transposed the threshold amount at an early stage in the form of a deductible excess (Products Liablity Act art. 11: € 500); there is also case law pertaining to this provision (e.g. CFI Brugge 30 October 2000, RW 2001-2002, 1182: damage inflicted to an electrical applicance by a too high electrical voltage), however it is emphaised throughout that, in respect of such "minor" damage, the general (and to some extent rules which also operate on a strict liability basis) contract and extra contractual rules on liability remain applicable (CFI Brugge loc. cit.; CFI Hasselt 8 November 1999, RW 2001-2002, 100, note De Boeck; Debaene and Soens (-Verlinden), Aansprakelijkheidsrecht. Actuele tendensen, 31-32. LUXEMBURG has also fixed the threshold at € 500 (Products Liability Act art. 2(2)).

5. MALTA has fixed the lower threshold amount at Liri 200,- (ca. € 510), however, at the same time, the Minister responsible was given the power to alter the sum (Consumer Affairs Act art. 61(b)), should the need arise. As of the time of writing, no use has been made of this authorisation.

6. SPANISH ConsProtA art. 141(a) (formerly Products Liability Act (LRCP) art. 10(1)(a)) provides for a lower threshold (deductible) amount of € 390,66. Damage caused to property used for private purposes is thereunder not completely recoverable but can always only be recovered following deduction of this fixed amount (Lasarte Álvarez, Manual de protección, 295-296). Also in Spain, this regulation is highly controversial on policy grounds (de la Vega García, Responsabilidad civil derivada del producto defectuoso, 63; see otherwise also Salvador Coderch, Green Paper – Civil Liability for Defective Products, 21, who points out the danger of class actions, if the lower threshold amount was abholished). In addition, it is also recognised in law that damage to property falling below the stipulated lower threshold amount can be recovered under general contract and tort rules, in practice this leads, in most cases, to the result that the provision is drained of any effect (Instituto Nacional de Consumo, Green Paper, 59). Up to now, it appears that the amount was actally deducted in two reported judgments, both cases dealt with more significant damage (namely CA Burgos 13 February 2003, BDA Civil, JUR 2003 no. 122404 and CA Jaén 22 October 2002, BDA JUR 2003 no. 118952.

7. The ITALIAN Consumer Protection Code (Note 1 above) provides in art. 123(2) ,that damage to property is only recoverable if it exceeds the sum of € 387. The Act makes clear that the provision provides for an excess, the "first" 387 Euro, therefore are irrecoverable. Italian consumer organisations have trenchantly criticised this regulation (e.g. the Associazione Italiana Difesa Consumatori e Ambiente, http://europa.eu.int/comm/enterprise/regulation/goods/docs/liability/1999-greenpaper-replies/002.pdf) and das Comitato Consumatori Altroconsumo CCA Milano, http://europa.eu.int/comm/enterprise/regulation/goods/docs/liability/1999-greenpaper-replies/002.pdf).

8. HUNGARY, before its accession to the European Union, only provided for a lower threshold amount of 10.000 Forint (ca. € 40), then, reluctantly however, enacted the Products Liability Act (§ 1(4)(b)) providing for an amount in Forints as converted by the official conversion rate on the date that the damage occurred, corresponding to € 500. In SLOVENIA comparable developments transpired. In spite of a comparably low standard of living, the lower threshold amount was increased in 2004 to 100.000 Tolar (ca. € 418) (Consumer Protection Act § 2(4) as amended by Act of 3 May 2004).

BULGARIA has adopted a lower threshold amount of 500 Lewa (€ 255) (Consumer Protection Act art. 131(1) no. 2). POLISH CC art. 449^7 § 2 provides that reparation of the damage caused by a defective product is not available, if the property damage (other than damage to the product itself) does not exceed the value of 500 euro. Academic writing takes the view that if the damage exceeds 500 euro, it is to be compensated fully (i.e. the sum of 500 euro is not to be deducted: Pietrzykowski [-Banaszczyk], Kodeks cywilny I^4, art. 449^7 p. 1343). Damage below this limit may be compensable under general rules (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 275).

9. According to the GERMAN Product Liability Act § 11 a consumer must "in the event of damage to property ... bear the loss of up to 500 Euro". Therefore, until this threshold is exceeded, the manufacture is not liable under the strict product liability regime, and in respect of damage to property exceeding that amount, the manufacturer is only burdened with the remaining amount (BT-Drucks. 11/5520, 16). In practice, the provision is regarded as largely devoid of effect, due to the fact that, according to prevailing legal opinion, the regime has no bearing on the general liability under tort law grounded in CC § 823(1). In order to combat this, the courts have reversed the burden of proof in respect of the negligence of a producer. In practical terms, this approach is not inferior to "real" strict liability or, may be, at the most, only in peripheral areas (Erman [-Schiemann], BGB II^{11}, § 11 ProdHG, no. 1; MünchKomm [-Wagner], BGB^4, § 11 ProdHG, no. 2).

10. Originally the AUSTRIAN Products Liability Act 1988 § 3 no. 2 provided for a threshold amount of 5.000 Schilling (ca. € 363), however this amount was increased to 7.900 Schilling (ca. € 749) upon accession to the European Economic Community and was reduced again to € 500 on the 1 January 2002. Damage to property under this threshold is subject to the general tort law regime or the rules of contract law dealing with the rights of third parties (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II^{12}, 355; Welser and Rabl, Produkthaftungsgesetz[2], § 2 no. 11); Products Liability Act § 14 makes clear that the general civil law remains unaffected by the regulation pertaining to the threshold amount.

11. Originally, the GREEK Consumer Protection Act no. 2251/1994 did not provide for a threshold amount. In 2002, only following the condemnation of Greece by the ECJ in a judgment pertaining to the incorrect transposition of a Directive (detailed above, see Note A3) a threshold amount of € 500 was intorduced by legislation (Act no. 2251/1994 art. 6(6) as amended; on this please see Karakostas, Dikaio prostasias tou katanaloti, 231; Rokas, Evthini gia ta proionta, 260; Alexandridou, Dikaio prostasias tou katanaloti, no. 168).

12. Originally the PORTUGUESE Products Liability Act art. 8(2) provided that "damage to property is only compensated if it exceeds 70,000 escudos". This provision was repealed by a decree- Law131/2001 of 24 April 2001 and was replaced by a new article 9, which increased the amount to € 500. This provision also specified that damage to goods intended for private use could only be compensated, "in so far as they exceed the sum of 500 €". This wording, similarly, led to problems of interpretation. Calvão da Silva, Responsabilidade civil do produtor, 701 opines that, that art. 9 must be read in the sense of a general deduction to the extent of the stipulated amount. This approach, however, does not yet entail that only the "first" € 500 are only recoverable, if the person suffering damage can prove fault on the part of the manufacturer under the general regime of liability under CC art. 483 as, namely, the consumer can base his action on the strict liability regime under the Consumer Protection Act 24/96 of 31 July 1996 art. 12(5).

13. DUTCH CC art. 6:190(1) (b) states that liability for any damage to property intended for private use arises, "upon application of a franchise of € 500". The legislature was of the opinion that the text of the Directive permitted a socalled "threshold franchise" (drempel) which would be fully recoverable because the property damage incurred was beyond that amount as well as a "deductible excess" (aftrek). Against this backdrop, the Dutch expressly opted for the "threshold franchise" (Onrechtmatige daad III [-Stolker], art. 6:190, no. 11 p. 14; for criticism of this solution, see Snijders, Produktenrecht, 83-84). In the Netherlands, therefore, this entails that damages of (e.g.) € 750 are fully recoverable and not replaced by a sum of € 250 (cf. MvA, Kamerstukken II 1987/88, 19636, no. 6 pp. 27-28). In respect of minor damage under the € 500 threshold, the consumer can, in any event, make a claim against the vendor based on the strict liability provision contained in CC art. 7:24(2)(c) (Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk (-Lankhorst), T & C Burgerlijk Wetboek[4], art. 6:190 no. 3 p. 1943; Jongeneel, Koop en consumentenkoop[3], 65). The limits placed on liability set out in the Product Liability Directive as thereby practically thwarted. Accordingly, legal commentators have clamoured for the repeal of the franchise (see for an opposing view Dommering-van Rongen, Produktenaansprakelijkheid, 141). Even the restriction of the ambit of liability to damage to goods intended for private use has been heavily criticised (e.g. Knottenbelt, Hoofdstukken produktenaansprakelijkheid, 74-75).

14. ESTONIAN LOA § 1061(2)(iii) guarantees damages for damage to property intended solely for private use, "if the extent of the damage exceeds an amount equal to € 500". This wording alludes to the fact that damage which is in excess of this amount is fully recoverable. No liability is generally imposed on damage caused to the product itself by a defect (LOA § 1061(3), see further Tampuu, Juridica 2003, no. 3, 161–168.

15. Similarly, the rules on the threshold amount are not uniform in the NORDIC Countries DENMARK has opted for a sum of 4000 dkr (Products Liability Act § 8; ca. € 527); FINLAND 2.350 finnische Mark (Products Liability Act § 8; ca. € 395) and SWEDEN 3.500 Kronen (Products Liability Act § 9; ca. € 375).The DANISH Products Liability Act § 8 and the SWEDISH Products Liability Act § 9 expressly provide that, when ascertaining the compensation of damage to property, the relevant sum will be deducted. In contrast, the FINNISH Products Liability Act § 8(2) is expressed in terms that the obligation to compensate "ceases to apply" when the damage to property is valued at under 2.350 (finnische) Mark. Damage which exceeds this sum is 100 % recoverable.

16. In the UNITED KINGDOM the Consumer Protection Act 1987, s. 5(4) and the identically worded Consumer Protection (Northern Ireland) Order 1987, art. 8(4) provide that no damages are to be awarded in respect of any loss or damage to property if the amount to be awarded apart from any liability for interest does not exceed £ 275 (ca. € 403). A claim for amounts which fall under that threshold may still be made on the basis of negligence (Nelson-Jones and Stewart, Product Liability, 56; Clerk and Lindsell [-Tettenborn], Torts[18], para. 9-63). The provision is regarded as only setting out a threshold, so that a claim which exceeds it may be recovered in full – i.e. without deduction (Clark, Product Liability, 129 [implicitly]; Geddes, Product and Service Liability, 28). This is thought by some at least to be an incorrect implemention of the directive on the basis that art. 9(b) of the latter requires that the first € 500 will always be irrecoverable (Clark loc. cit.). Since the exclusion under the statute is tied to the amount of compensation actually to be awarded, a claimant will fall foul of the provision and recover nothing if his claim is above the threshold, but reduced below it by the effect of a defence based on the claimant's own contributory negligence (Nelson-Jones and Stewart loc. cit. 56; Tettenborn loc. cit. para. 9-63 no.

54). Literature recognises that the purpose of the rule is to discourage small claims (Nelson-Jones and Stewart loc. cit.), but criticises its tendency to produce fortuitous results (Clark loc. cit.).

17. Similarly in IRELAND, it is also discussed whether the Directive provides for a threshold or excess franchise (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 280). The Irish legislature has plumped for the second alternative. Liability for Defective Products Act s. 3(1) provides "where, but for this section, damages not exceeding € 500 in respect of any loss of or damage to, or destruction of, any item of property other than the defective product itself would fall to be awarded by virtue of this Act, no damages shall be awarded, and where, but for this section, damages exceeding that amount would fall to be awarded, only that excess shall be awarded." Thus IRELAND has a two pronged approach – the loss must be greater than € 500 and then € 500 will be deducted from the compensation awarded.

(2) Damage to business property

18. Liability for damage to property used in the course of business lies outside the scope of the Directive. The corollary is that there are not inconsiderable differences in this respect between the various legal orders of the Member States.

19. FRENCH CC art. 1386-1 initially clarifies that the producteur is also liable under the subsequent provisions pertaining to extra contractual liability, if he has a contractual relationship with the victim; the principle of non cumul des responsabilités is therefore not applicable here (le Tourneau and Cadiet, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2006/2007], 8404-8405). The law pertaining to product liability is understood as a typical case of the théorie de la risque (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[11], no. 300 p. 303). Therefore, even subsequent to the transposition of the Directive, a distinction is still made under French law between damage to property used for private purposes and damage to property used in the course of business (le Tourneau and Cadiet loc. cit. 8406; Rép.Dr.Civ. [-Caillé] IX[2], no. 30). The revised CC art. 1386-2(2) has not made any modifications. However, CC art. 1386-15 enables businessmen to contractually exclude liability for damage to property in their dealings with one another.

20. In contrast to the France, in BELGIUM, damage to business property is only be recoverable upon application of the general rules (contractual or extra contracual) on liability law (Act of 25 February 1991 [Note 1 above] art. 11). These provisions determine whether and under which circumstances this liability is strict or whether the imposition of liability depends on the presence of a faute. An identical situation prevails in LUXEMBURG (Products Liability Act art. 2(1) no. 4).

21. Similarly, according to the SPANISH ConsProtA art. 129(1) (former Products Liability Act art. 10(1)), the sole beneficiaries of a strict liability regime in relation to damage to property are consumers (CA Toledo 16 March 2000, AC 2000/959 [liability was not imposed on the proprietor of a restaurant due to an interruption in the supply of electricity]; similarly CA Alicante 8 January 2002, BDA JUR 2002/48487; compare. in addition CA Burgos 13 February 2003, BDA JUR 2003/122404 [no liability imposed under the Products Liability Act for fire damage to a hairdressing salon caused by a techinal defect in an applicance; strict liability was only imposed in respect of the damage accruing to the private property of the staff and customers]). Product Liability for damage to business property is therefore subject to the general contract or tort law regimes of the CC (e.g. CA Navarra 22 September 2003, BDA JUR 2004/112848: no analogous application of the Products Liablity Act where defective property was acquired; strict liability was not imposed on a manufacturer in respect of a purchaser's loss of profits; furthermore no liability for risk under general tort law precepts).

22. ITALIAN Consumer Protection Code art. 123(1)(b) clarifies, that the Code is not applicable to damage to property intended for use in the course of business or for professional purposes. Therefore, for example, damage resulting from a disruption in production or damage flowing from the sale of the defective product to customer, who thereupon took their business elsewhere, is only recoverable under the general rules of contract or tort law (loc. cit. art. 127(1); see also Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, sub art. 2056, p. 846). In conjunction with the general liability for negligence in tort law contained in CC art. 2043, regard must, above all, be had to the strict liability provisions of CC arts. 2049 and 2050. Additionally, damage which results from defective production of a vehicle is also subject to the strict liability regime anchored in CC art. 2054(4) (Alpa and Mariconda [-Alpa], Codice civile commentato IV, art. 2054, VI, no. 11).

23. In a similar manner, the HUNGARIAN Products Liability Act § 1(4)(b) recognises a strict product liability for damage to property only in the consumer's favour. Under POLISH CC art. 449^2 the producer of the dangerous product is accountable only for the damage to the property designated for personal use if that property had in fact been mostly used for personal purposes. Damage to "business" property may only be compensated under general rules.

24. While the GERMAN Products Liability Act § 1(1) second sentence also only provides for strict liability in favour of consumers for damage to property, under the general provisions of tort law (CC § 823(1)) a special case must be taken note of, namely, that also in respect of business undertakings that have suffered damage, there is a rebuttable presumption that the manufacturer of a defective product acted illegally and was at fault (fundamentally BGH 26 November 1968, BGHZ 51, 91). However, it is debatable whether this situation as it stands can be reconciled with the stated objective of the Directive as a regulation providing for the complete harmonisation of the liability for defective products (Langenbucher [-Riehm], Europarechtliche Bezüge des Privatrechts, 202-203).

25. Originally the AUSTRIAN Products Liability Act § 2 (old version) also included businessmen in the protective strict liability regime for damage to property, however this legal position was changed in 1993 in the course of the preparations for accession to the EU (§ 2(2) (new version)). Der OGH has since then repeatedly confirmed that in respect to damage to property, only consumers fall within the protective scope of the provisions, not "everyone" can avail of the protection proffered by the Act (OGH 26 November 2002, ecolex 2003, 161; OGH 22 February 2005, RS 0117224). As far as damage to business property is concerned, liability falls to be determined under the general provisions pertaining to fault based liability under the CC.

26. In GREECE, only goods intended for private use or consumption were subject to the regime of the Consumer Protection Act (art. 6(6); the term employed there, namely "items of property" ought to mean the same as "thing": Karakostas, I evthini tou paragogou gia elattomatika proionta, 82). After the amendment of the Consumer Protection Act by Act no. 3587/2007, the notion "items of property" includes the right to use environmental "goods". The strict liability regime has no application to things which have been acquired for use in the course of business even where, in the concrete case at hand, they were actually used for non commerical purposes (Karakostas, Dikaio prostasias tou katanaloti, 228; for a different view see Baltoudis, I evthini apo ta elattomatika prioionta, 310). However, business operators can rely on the judically created rules pertaining to the reversal of the burden of proof in respect of the property damage suffered by them (Karakostas, I evthini tou paragogou gia elattomatika proionta, 82).

27. Equally the PORTUGUESE Products Liability Act art. 8(1) confines strict liability for damage to property to things inteneded for private use. The sole recourse of business operators is under the general rules of fault based liability under the CC (STJ 27 April 2004, Proc. 04B44057, Relator Ferreira de Almeida; CA Lisbon 9 July 2003, Proc. 3635/2003-6, Relator Lúcia de Sousa). This situation also corresponds to that prevailing under the DUTCH CC art. 6:190(1)(b), under DANISH Products Liability Act § 2, under FINNISH Products Liability Act § 1(1) and under SWEDISH Products Liability Act § 1(2) or where appropriate under the culpa-rules of the common Scandinavian tort law.

28. Finally, the situation is the same in the UNITED KINGDOM (Consumer Protection Act 1987, s. 5(3); Consumer Protection (Northern Ireland) Order 1987, art. 8(3)) and in IRELAND (Liability for Defective Products Act 1991 s. 1(1)). Loss of or damage to property will only fall within the ambit of liability if the property is of a type ordinarily intended for private use or consumption – thus commercial usage will be excluded. Any liability in the latter case will be on the basis of the general rules of the tort of negligence.

III. Liability for non-economic loss

29. The Directive on Product Liability leaves it to the Member States to decide whether they wish to provide that non peecuniary loss should also be recoverable under the strict liability regime. The majority of Member States have answered this question in the affirmative.

30. According to FRENCH, BELGIAN, LUXEMBURGIAN and SPANISH Law [compare. the latter's ConsProtA art. 129(1) (former Products Liability Act art. 10(2))] it is indisputable that non material damage is recoverable under the strict product liability regime. This proposition is self- evident. In ITALY damage of this type was irrecoverable for a long period of time (e.g. CFI Milan 31 January 2003, Resp.civ. e prev. 2003, 115), however, in the interim, recovery is assured, following a change in approach in the decisions of the higher courts as to the recoverability of non pecuniary loss (e.g. CFI Rome 4 December 2003, Danno e resp. 2004, 52; CFI Rome 3 November 2003, Danno e resp. 2004, 529 and CFI Brescia 31 March 2003, Danno e resp. 2004, 666).

31. Moreover, recovery of non economic loss is guaranteed by the PORTUGUESE (Products Liability Act art. 8(1); see Calvão da Silva, Responsabilidade civil do produtor, 678 with the additional reference that liability is also directed at "bystanders" according to the CC art. 496), the HUNGARIAN (Products Liablity Act § 1(4)(a)), the POLISH (CC art. 449^1 in conjunction with art. 445 § 1); the ROMANIAN (Products Liability Act art. 2(3)); the GERMAN (Products Liability Act § 8 second sentence), the BULGARIAN (Consumer Protection Act art. 131(2)), the IRISH (Liability for Defective Products Act 1991 s. 1(1), defining "personal injury" as including "any disease and any impairment of a person's physical or mental condition") and the UNITED KINGDOM Law (Geddes, Product and Service Liability, 25-26; Clerk and Lindsell [-Tettenborn], Torts[18], para. 9-63; Clark, Product Liability, 130-131; Nelson-Jones and Stewart, Product Liability, 53). In the Nordic countries, it is similarly recognised that non economic loss can be recovered. In SWEDEN recovery of such damage is permitted, based on the rationale anchored in the general rules of the Damages Liability Act chap. 5 § 1(3), namely that the product liability regime was not designed to restrict the entitlement of the victim, rather is geared at broadening the entitlement of the victim (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 317). DANISH Products Liability Act chap. 6 § 13, provides that the Act does not limit the plaintiff's possibilities of attaining compensation under the general rules of contract or tort. A corresponding provision can be found in FINNISH Products Liabilty Act § 11.

32. In contrast, non pecuniary damage was previously considered to be irrecoverable under the GREEK strict product liability regime. The Consumer Protection Act (2251/1994) referred, in respect of such damage, to the general tort law rules. Prevailing legal opinion interpreted this cross reference to mean that a claim for compensation in respect of non- pecuniary loss could only be asserted in circumstances where there was fault on the part of the manufacturer (Karakostas, I evthini tou paragogou gia elattomatika proionta, 196; CA Thessaloniki 3141/2002, XrID 2003, 135; CA Athens 5298/2001, DEE 2002, 1137; unclear CA Piräus 301/2001, DEE 2001, 1147, note Karakostas; see for an opposing view especially Eleftheriadou, PHI 1999, 102, 107 and Baltoudis, I evthini apo ta elattomatika prioionta, 312). However, Act no.2251/1994 art. 7 was amended by Act no.3587/2007 which now provides for the recoverability of non-economic losses.

IV. Liability for development risks

33. The question, whether a producer can relieve himself of liability by asserting a development risk defence, resulting in the materialisation of a development risk outside the scope of his control, is, in spite of its minor importance, one the most debated policy questions of the European Product Liability regime. In this regard, not only is it necessary to assess two opposing camps, but furthermore within both camps there are varying degrees of differences in detail.

34. According to the FRENCH CC art. 1386-11(1) no. 4 a producer is liable, unless he can prove that the defect was not discoverable according to the state of scientific and technological knowledge existing at the time that the affected product was put into circulation. Accordingly, the risk of a development defect materialising is borne, in principle, by the consumer. CC art. 1386-12(2) attenuates this point of departure by providing that: "A producer may not invoke the exonerating circumstance provided for in art. 1386-11(4) and (5), where, faced with a defect which has revealed itself within a period of ten years after the product has been put into circulation, he did not take the appropriate steps to avoid its damaging consequences". If, within ten years of putting the product into circulation of the product, new findings emerge in respect of the development risks, the producer is under an obligation to warn about or recall the product as the case may be (see further le Tourneau and Cadiet, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2006/2007], 8425). Even though this provision has been deemed by the ECJ to infringe community law (ECJ 25 April 2002, Note 3 above), the French legislature has not as yet seen fit to introduce an amendment to the provision.

35. BELGIAN Products Liability Act art. 8 lit. e has remained true to the wording of the Directive. A parliamentary initiative proposing to strike out the development risks defence was unsuccessful (Parl. St. Kamer, Zittingsperiode 1999-2000, 0480/001 and Parl. St. Kamer, Zittingsperiode 2000-2001, 0966/003, p. 6). However, the adoption of a restrictive approach to this ground of defence has been advanced in academic literature (Van de Gehuchte, De aansprakelijkheid voor producten, 84; Debaene and Soens [-Verlinden], Aansprakelijkheidsrecht. Actuele tendensen, no. 24 p. 44). Similarly, MALTA permits exculpation in the case of the realisation of a development risk (Consumers Affairs Act art. 62(e)). In contrast, according to LUXEMBURGIAN Law the producer bears the development risk (Ravarani, Pas. luxemb. 2000, 393, no. 511).

36. SPANISH ConsProtA art. 140(1)(e) (formerly Products Liability Act art. 6(1)(e)) enables the producer, in principle, to adduce proof that, "the state of existing scientific and technical knowledge at the time when the product was put into circulation did not allow to find out the existence of the defect", however, art. 140(3) (formerly Products Liability Act art. 6(3)) provides that this exception is disapplied in the case of medicines, food and food products for human consumption. Further special legislation introduced additional exceptions from the basic rule for cases where the State is the defendant (Law 30/1992, art. 141(1)). Following the introduction of special rules particular to this area, there does not appear to be any further cases, in which the development risks exception has been successfully invoked.

37. According to the ITALIAN Consumer Protection Code art. 118 lit. e the producer is exempted from liability if the state of scientific and technological knowledge at the time when he put the producer into circulation was not such as to enable the presence of the defect to be ascertained. Up to now, it appears that, also in Italy, no action has failed because the defence was asserted.

38. The SLOVENIAN Consumer Protection Act § 10(5) indeed accepts that the materialisation of a development risk can amount to an defence which leads to exculpation, however the wording of the Act differs from that of the Directive by expressly providing that proof must be adduced that the state of scientific and technological knowledge "worldwide" was not such as to enable the defect to be discovered. However, it has been submitted that this formulation, contentwise, does not deviate from the Directive (Siegel, Produkthaftung im polnischen, tschechischen und slowenischen Recht, 127). HUNGARIAN Products Liability Act § 7(1)(d) and BULGARIAN Consumer Protection Act art. 137(1) no. 5 have adhered to the text of the Directive. Furthermore, the development risks defence is also espoused by the ROMANIAN Products Liability Act art. 7(1) lit. e and POLISH CC art. 449^3 § 2 second sentence.

39. The development risks defence is also recognised by the GERMAN Products Liability Act § 1(2) no. 5; however, this defence does not apply in respect of medicinal products liability (Arzneimittelgesetz § 84) and also to products which contain genetically modified organisms or is composed of such organisms (Gentechnikgesetz § 37(2) second sentence). According to case law, the Products Liability Act § 1(2) no. 5 is only applicable to design defects and not to manufacturing defects (BGH 9 May 1995, BGHZ 129, 353, 358).

40. In a similar manner, the AUSTRIAN Products Liability Act § 8 no. 2 excludes liability for development risks. A development risk is defined as a danger resulting from the nature of the product which could not have been detected according to the current stare of scientific and technological knowledge at the time the product was put into circulation (OGH 8 April 1997, SZ 70/61; OGH 24 October 2001, RS0107608). Extremely exacting criteria have been placed on the requirement regarding the discoverability of the defect. Liability is only excluded upon proof that it was impossible to view a certain attribute of the product as a defect, the defence will not apply when it was impossible to ascertain the defectiveness of a rogue product (in German literally "runaways", e.g. a defect in material) (OGH 22 October 2002, ecolex 2003, 46). There does not appear to be cases, where the producer was relieved from liability because of the existence of a development risk (compare e.g. OGH 6 September 2000, ZVR 2001/36 p. 127 [a flanged wheel of a cable care broke off, the site of rupture could have been detected by X-ray.]; OGH 8 April 1997, SZ 70/61 [the cap of a bottle of mineral water exploded due to excess pressure] and OGH 28 June 1995, JBl 1996, 188 [contamination of hydraulic oil resulting in the collapse of a hydraulic hoist]).

41. The legal position under the GREEK Consumer Protection Act art. 6(9) lit. e and under the PORTUGUESE Products Liability Act art. 5 corresponds in all essential matters to the prevailing legal position in Austria. In legal commentary, the provisions have been to some extent, subjected of sharp criticism (Alexandridou, Dikaio prostasias tou katanaloti, nos. 219-221; Rokas, Evthini gia ta proionta, 224-225; Alves, A responsabilidade do produtor: soluções actuais e perspectivas futuras, 44). The same holds true for the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:185(1)); similarly in this jurisdiction (as far as can be ascertained) there is a lack of decided case law where the development risks defence has been successfully argued.

42. FINNISH Products Liability Act § 7 does not recognise a development risks defence. Accordingly, the Finnish legal position can be distinguished from the legal position prevailing in DENMARK (Products Liability Act § 7 no. 4) as well as that prevailing in SWEDEN (Products Liability Act § 8 no. 4). Above all in Denmark, it appeares that the focal point of attention was in choosing a regulation that had been adopted by the majority of the remainder of the Member States (Bloth, Produkthaftung, 48). In Sweden the regulation was the subject of heated political debate. The issue that tipped the scales at the end was the desire to ensure that Swedish industry was not placed at a competitive disadvantage (Bloth loc. cit. 49).

43. Unsurprisingly (since inclusion of the defence was insisted upon by the UK before it would accept the directive) the development risks defence has been adopted in the UNITED KINGDOM (Consumer Protection Act 1987, s. 4(1)(e); Consumer Protection (Northern Ireland) Order 1987, art. 7(1)(e)), though in terms formulated more generous to the producer than the directive (Nelson-Jones and Stewart, Product Liability, 69). The defence, which is seen as principally applicable to advanced technologies (aerospace, pharmaceuticals, chemicals), is regarded as by some commentators as leaving a significant gap in the network of strict liability for defective products (Nelson-Jones and Stewart loc. cit. 68). That claimants in cases of a 'thalidomide nature' (one of the mainsprings leading to the directive and the implementing statute) may continue to go uncompensated is seen as the price for safeguarding industrial innovation and technological progress which might otherwise be inhibited (Nelson-Jones and Stewart loc. cit.). Another primary reason is to keep down insurance costs. However, the need for and correctness of the defence (even as formulated in the directive) is doubted by some commentators (Clark, Product Liability, 183-184).

44. Similarly in IRELAND, the difficulties attending the development risks defence has given rise to heated policy discussions (Pelly, [2002] 20 ILT, 9, 12; McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 290). In the end, it was decided to strictly adhere to the wording of the Directive (Liability for Defective Products Act 1991, s. 6(e)). At the time of writing, there des not appear to be any decisions concerning the applicable section relating to the development risks defence.

V. Financial ceiling on liability

45. The Member Statees have reacted differently to the question as to whether they wished to provide for a financial cap on liability. The following Member States have decided to abstain from adopting such a regulation: FRENCH CC; BELGIAN Products Liability Act; LUXEMBURG Products Liability Act; MALTESE Consumer Affairs Act; ITALIAN Products Liability Act; SLOVENIAN Consumer Protection Act; HUNGARIAN Products Liability Act (see § 13(2)); POLISH CC, BULGARIAN

Consumer Protection Act; ROMANIAN Product Liability Act (see art. 3); AUSTRIAN Products Liability Act; GREEK Consumer Protection Act 2251/1994 (which repealed an earlier financial ceiling); PORTUGUESE Products Liability Act (since the 2001 reform); ESTONIAN LOA, LITHUANIAN CC, LATVIAN Defective Products and Deficient Services Act; DUTCH CC; The Product Liability Acts of all the NORDIC Countries, the UNITED KINGDOM Consumer Protection Act 1987 and Consumer Protection (Northern Ireland) Order 1987; the IRISH Liability for Defective Products Act 1991 and the CYPRUS Defective Products (Civil Liability) Law.

46. In contrast, the Acts in Spain and Germany have introduced a financial ceiling on liability. SPANISH ConsProtA art. 141(e) (formerly Products Liability Act art. 11) restricts the monetary extent of liability for personal injury to € 63.106.270,96. In contrast, no financial limits have been placed on the liability for damage to property. On many occasions, the abolishment of the financial ceiling (which has yet to attain a practical relevance) has been recommended (Instituto Nacional de Consumo, Green Paper, 62). Products Liability Act art. 11 concerns only cases where the personal injury suffered, has been caused by "identical products with the same defect". This regulation raises numerous questions of interpretation (de la Vega García, Responsabilidad civil derivada del producto defectuoso, 129). In addition, the liability regime under the Civil Code remains applicable, with the result that it is, in end effect, possible to circumvent the financial ceiling on liability by resorting to the provisions of the Civil Code (de la Vega García loc. cit.).

47. The GERMAN Product Liability Act § 10(1) essentially corresponds to the Spanish regulation. However, the damages cap in Germany is 85 Million €. The ceiling only covers damage flowing from personal injury, it does not apply to damage to property. It was primarily Germany which insisted that the Directive should allow the Member States the possibility of introducing a cap on damages (MünchKomm [-Wagner], BGB[4], § 10 ProdHG, no. 1; Taschner, NJW 1986, 611, 612). However, the Product Liability Act § 10(1) deviates from the authorisation conatined in the Directive, in that the financial ceiling is also applicable to major damage caused by a single product (e.g. by a plane or train). Similarly, the Product Liability Act § 10(2),which provides for a proportional reduction in damages payable to several injured parties in the case that the maximum rate is exceeded, is not a feature of the Directive.

VI.–3:205: Accountability for damage caused by motor vehicles

(1) A keeper of a motor vehicle is accountable for the causation of personal injury and consequential loss, loss within VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death), and loss resulting from property damage (other than to the vehicle and its freight) in a traffic accident which results from the use of the vehicle.

(2) "Motor vehicle" means any vehicle intended for travel on land and propelled by mechanical power, but not running on rails, and any trailer, whether or not coupled.

COMMENTS

A. The concept of the rule

Formulation of the principle; no detailed rules. Liability for damage by motor vehicles is in many Member States the subject matter of an elaborate and detailed special regime of legislation, which for its part is flanked by a plethora of rules of the law on insurance, mainly indemnity insurance. The comprehensive legal matters which are the subject matter of this legislation did not lend themselves to being portrayed in detail in the context of these rules. On the other hand, the rules would have suffered from a considerable lacuna if they had remained silent on the law governing traffic accidents: traffic is still generally one of the most significant causes of damage. Therefore, this Article formulates the two principles crucial to the law on liability, but goes no further. These principles are: liability for personal injury and property damage caused by motor vehicles (i) is strict, and (ii) lies with the keeper of the vehicle. A strict liability for keepers of a motor vehicle is nowadays almost a common feature within Europe. In the few countries which do not provide for it, there are insurance solutions or a raising of the standard of care which in practice more or less produce the same outcome.

VI.–3:207(a) (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage). The present Article must be read in conjunction with VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage) sub-paragraph (a). This is because under the present Article there is liability only for motor-driven vehicles and not for other dangerous machines (e.g. a crane, or a concrete mixer or a shredder making tree branches into wood chips). These rules do not themselves propose strict liability for such machines and the same goes for vehicles like bicycles which are not motor-powered. The Member States' viewpoints are simply too far apart from each other to be able to devise an acceptable common proposal for all of these areas. These rules do not therefore contain the proposal to again forego the regime of liability already existing in the areas enumerated; through VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage) the Group in fact clarifies that it could not arrive at a unified stance on these issues.

Insurance. Where insurance solutions limit the liability of the keeper (or any other person responsible for the damage caused), those rules will have priority by virtue of VI.–7:105 (Reduction or exclusion of liability to indemnified persons). Issues of direct liability of insurers or insurance funds are not the subject-matter of this Book. Issues of this kind belong in insurance law, not in the general law on non-contractual liability for damage. This follows indeed from VI.–1:101 (Basic rule). Solutions provided by insurance which operates independently of personal liability on the part of the keeper or the originator of the damage (including insurance remedies which leave it up to the injured person to pursue rights against the insurer or against the injuring person) remain likewise unaffected. The same applies to claims against funds, in particular in cases in which the identity of the person causing the damage cannot be established due to the driver fleeing the scene of the accident. Both follow from VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (d).

Legally relevant damage. As with all the strict liability cases in Chapter 3, Section 2, the present Article relates only to personal injury and property damage. The specific risk which is of concern to the liability of keepers of motor vehicles only manifests itself in personal injury and property damage. For all other damage, only in the case of intention or negligence on the part of the person acting is the damage legally relevant and thus recoverable; the keeper qua keeper is not involved here.

> Illustration 1
> On the spur of the moment, a frustrated lover locks his girlfriend, who wants to break up with him, in the boot of an acquaintance's vehicle. The acquaintance is not responsible for the false imprisonment merely because he is the keeper of the vehicle.

Property damage. The damage caused due to the use of the motor vehicle must have been done to something other than the vehicle or its freight. In regard to damage to the vehicle itself there is no strict liability of the keeper vis-à-vis the owner of the vehicle. The liability of the keeper aims at protecting third persons and not the property interests of persons who have rights in the vehicle (e.g. a seller who has retained ownership of the vehicle until full payment of the price). Also excluded from the keeper's liability is any commercial freight transported using the vehicle. Damage to it is subject to a special regime of transport law. However, liability for property damage suffered by persons transported is included, e.g. damage to clothes or a mobile phone carried with them.

Personal injury. As regards personal injury, by contrast, there are no restrictions on the range of persons entitled to claim reparation. In particular, individuals are not deprived of the protection of this Article because they were passengers in the vehicle or driving it at the time. Persons who are active in the operation of the vehicle also have a claim in damages against the keeper in the case of personal injury.

Defences. The general defences in Chapter 5 also apply to the liability of keepers under VI.–3:205. However, VI.–5:102 (Contributory fault and accountability) paragraph (2)(c) deserves particular mention because under it, in road traffic cases, only considerable contributory fault (gross negligence) on the part of the victim is to be taken into account. The provision expressly relates only to personal and health injury.

B. Details

Motor vehicles and trailers. The Article, as mentioned, provides for strict liability to the detriment of keepers of motor vehicles. What "motor vehicles" are is defined by paragraph (2). That definition is in turn taken from Directive 72/166/EEC ([First] Directive on Insurance against Civil Liability in Respect of the Use of Motor Vehicles). The strict liability under VI.–3:205(1) thus relates to motor-driven vehicles of all types, including slow-moving vehicles (such as tractors, bicycles with an auxiliary motor, and sit-on lawnmowers, which, depending on their construction, may not be capable of more than 20 km/h). Trailers are also "motor vehicles" according to the Directive, even where they are not connected to the towing vehicle at the time of the accident. Railway vehicles (including trams and underground railway), aeroplanes and ships are excluded; they are consistently subject to special regimes of liability, which remain unaffected by these rules (VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage) sub-paragraph (a)).

Keeper. The term keeper in the context of this Article also follows from the general rules (see above Comments under VI.–3:203 (Accountability for damage caused by animals)). Thieves and others who use the vehicle against the keeper's will are themselves made keepers. However, the "real" keeper's liability in negligence remains potentially applicable in such cases; it takes hold where the keeper in breach of duty omitted to reasonably secure the vehicle against unauthorised use.

No special liability for drivers. The Article channels the liability to the keeper (or the keeper's insurer). In contrast, the liability of a driver who is not at the same time the keeper is subject to the general rules. In the case of professional drivers there may even be specific relief from liability provided for in the national legal systems, see VI.–7:104 (Liability of employees, employers, trade unions and employers' associations) sub-paragraph (a). To subject private drivers to a particularly intensified liability (in the form of either strict liability or liability for presumed misconduct) seemed unreasonable against this background. The strict liability of the keeper, coupled with compulsory insurance and a direct claim against the insurer, suffices for the requirements of victim protection.

Traffic accident resulting from the use of the vehicle. Liability is confined to those cases where the damage has been caused "in a traffic accident which results from the use of the vehicle". Damage in connection with a parked car is therefore only within the scope of the Article if the vehicle has been parked on a road or area open to traffic or the public. In other words, the Article relates only to situations in which the vehicle is used on a public road or on a road accessible to the public, and in which an "accident" in the sense of a sudden occurrence, typically a collision, occurs.

X, renter and keeper of a tractor, drives home from a field with a trailer full of bales of hay. Not noticing that the hay has caught fire, he causes fire damage to the adjoining fields, which are likewise currently being harvested. X is liable due to a negligent breach of property rights, not however in his capacity as keeper of the tractor and trailer. A traffic accident is not at issue here.

Illustration 3
Someone illegally parked causes a traffic jam. This does not involve a traffic accident.

Causation. In relation to causation, the general rules in Chapter 4 apply. Thus, it must be possible to say of the relevant personal injury or property damage that it is to be regarded as a consequence of the use of the relevant vehicle, see VI.–4:101 (General rule). A vehicle properly parked at the side of the road is not to be regarded as the cause of the injury suffered when someone drives against this vehicle due to carelessness or drunkenness. The same applies to a car, which is at the front of a queue, into which the third person in the queue pushes the second vehicle. The use of the vehicle at the front did not cause the damage to the second and third vehicles. It is not sufficient that the vehicle (the parked car or vehicle number one) was "involved" in the accident; in fact it is decisive whether its use has caused the relevant accident within the meaning of VI.–4:101 (General rule).

Illustration 4
A collision between two vehicles occurs, leaving them stationary on the road with the consequence that a subsequent vehicle can no longer brake and drives into them. Here the person causing the first accident also caused the second accident.

NOTES

1. In FRANCE the law governing the legal liability for traffic accidents is anchored in the Law no. 85-677 of 5 July 1985 tendant à l´amélioration de la situation des victimes d´accidents de la circulation et à l´accélération des procédures d´indemnisation; it has even been asserted of the regulations contained therein that they amount to an d'ordre public (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[11], no. 320 p. 337). Loc. cit. art. 1 the law is designed at compensating the victim of a traffic accident in which a landborne motorised vehicle is "involved" (impliqué). All types of trailers are embraced by the law, however track bound vehicles (trains, trams etc.) are excluded from its scope. Whether the victim found himself/herself inside or outside of the vehicle or whether the victim was conveyed on the basis of a contract or otherwise is irrelevant. The term "accident" denotes every event which has resulted in the damage occurring (Flour/Aubert/Savaux loc. cit. no. 324 p. 341).The concept of a "landborne" motor vehicle has also be given a broad interpretation (e.g. Cass.civ. 24 June 2004, Bull.civ. 2004, II, no. 308: lawnmower with traction drive). A car becomes "involved" in an accident when it, as a matter of fact, becomes implicated in an accident (e.g. Cass.civ. 29 April 1998, JCP 1998 éd. G., IV, 2342 [A motor vehicle, which is involved in a collision, is involved in the accident, at all times and independent of whether it was being driven or was stationary.] and Cass.civ. 24 June 1998, Bull.civ. 1998, II, no. 205 p. 121 [In a collision involving a number of vehicles, each one is involved in the accident, independent of the question of the role it played leading to the collosion occurring.]). The requirement of involvement (implication) does not denote a causation criterium, the mere coïncidence of the events is sufficient (Favre Rochex, GazPal 1998, doctr., 355). Only when the affected vehicle did not play any role whatsoever in the accident can it be said that the vehicle was not involved in the accident (detailed in Lambert-Faivre, Droit du dommage corporel[5], no. 473 p. 632 und Fabre-Magnan, Les obligations, no. 299 p. 804). The concept of "traffic accident" entails that the pertinent vehicle engaged in traffic at the point of time of the accident. It is not necessary that the vehicle was in motion, as accidents involving parked or stationary vehicles also connote, as a rule, traffic accidents (e.g. Cass.civ. 22 November 1995, JCP 1996, II, 22656, note Mouly: traffic accident affirmed, when a fire which originated in a parked car, spread to a building and other vehicles.) However, an accident is not given where damage was intentionally inflicted (Cass.civ. 12 Dezember 2002, D. 2003, I.R., 468). The statute establishes claims can be made against the driver and the gardiens of the vehicle involved in the accident. If an accident results between a motorised vehicle and a pedestrian or a cyclist, the liability of the latter (e.g. in respect of damage to the vehicle) continues to be subject to the droit commun (Cass.civ. 19 January 1994, Bull.civ. 1994, II, no. 28 p. 15). Act no. 85-677 art. 2 defines the persons liable as the driver (conducteur) and the keeper of the vehicle involved in the accident; the outcome of this is that the "appropriate" insurance can be determined (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 960 p. 931). Drivers and gardien can invoke neither force majeure nor the acts of a third party against the victim; if the driver is the victim, the same holds true for the gardien. Victims who are not drivers, can recover damages for personal injury (loc. cit. art.

3(1)); these damages cannot be recovered if the sole cause of the accident is a faute inexcusable of the person injured. Victims who are younger than 16 or who are older than 70 Jahre or who have suffered at least an 80% reduction in earning capacity, this ground of defence remains inapplicable (loc. cit. art. 3(2)). Effectively, their claims for compensation are only excluded in the event of a suicide or in an attempt to commit suicide (loc. cit. art. 3(3)). If the driver of the vehicle is the victim, his/her claim to damages will be reduced to take account of his contributory negligence, loc. cit. art. 4. In respect of damage to property, the contributory negligence of the person who has suffered injury may lead to a restriction or even exclusion of liability (loc. cit. art. 5(1)). An exception under this head exists for medically prescribed items and apparatus; they are subject to the rules applicable to bodily injury. In respect of damage to the vehicle itself, the owner of the vehicle must be able to assert fault on the driver's part against the gardien of the vehicle and his insurance; however, in such an event, the owner has a direct right of recourse against the owner (loc. cit. art. 5(2)).

2. According to the BELGIAN Loi relative à l'assurance obligatoire de la responsabilité en matière de véhicules automoteurs of 21 November 1989 art. 29*bis* § 1(1) insurers, who provide coverage in respect of the liability of owners, the driver, or the détenteurs of a vehicle which has been involved in a traffic accident, are jointly and severally obliged to compensate personal injury (death, bodily injury), resulting from the accident. The foregoing also remains applicable, when the driver of the vehicle intentionally caused the damage. All types of damage to property are expressly excluded from the ambit of the provision, (exceptions: prostheses and other similar aids [wheelchairs, guidedogs, baby seats: Simoens, RW 2000-01, 1577, 1584, no. 27]) and damage to the clothes of the injured parties as well as bodily injury suffered by the driver of the vehicle which was implicated in the accident, furthermore personal injury suffered by victimes who are older than 14 and who intentonally caused the accident is also exempted (loc. cit. art. 29bis §1(6)). The term "motor vehicle" denotes all véhicules destinés à circuler sur le sol et qui peuvent être actionnés par une force mécanique sans être liés à une voie ferrée (loc. cit. art. 1). Motorised vehicles are placed in the same bracket as trailers, in so far as they meet the standards of the appropriate royal decree and were designed to transport persons or things. Motorised wheelchairs are not embraced by the term motorised vehicles (loc. cit. art. 29*bis* § 3). Under art. 29*bis* § 1(2) owners of a track bound vehicles are also liable. In every case where a collision occurs, the relevant vehicle is "involved" in an accident. If the victim does not come into contact with the other party's vehicle, it must be proved that this vehicle played a role of some type in causing the accident (Simoens loc. cit. 1580, no. 15). Only traffic accidents occuring on public streets or in areas which are either freely accessible to the public or to a certain number of indivduals fall within the scope of the application of the statute (loc. cit. art. 2 § 1 in conjunction with art. 29*bis* §1(1)). The driver excepted, claims can be asserted by all victims and their descendents (loc. cit. art. 29*bis* § 2; please see also for an analysis of the concept of " driver" Simoens loc. cit. no. 21 p. 1582); Drivers can only acquire compensation, if two requirements are met, namely that they are the descendent of the victim and did not intentionally cause the damage. If the damage resulting is not dealt with by the provisions of the statute, it can be recovered under the general civil law precepts (loc. cit. art. 29*bis* § 5); this particularly concerns damage to property and the personal injury claims of the driver.

3. SPANISH Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic Act art. 1(1) provides that "the driver of motor vehicles is liable, by virtue of the risk created by their driving, for the damage caused to persons or to property in the course of traffic". In so far as bodily injury and death are concerned, liability is strict for the realisation of the risk that is linked with the use of a motor vehicle (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II, 574); in contrast, damage to property remains subject to the general regime of the art. 1902 of the CC (Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic Act art. 1(1) and (2)). The scope of application of the Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic Act is governed by the concepts 'fact of traffic' (hecho de la circulación) and 'motor vehicle' (vehículo a motor). Reglamento on Road Traffic Liability (Real Decreto no. 1507 of 12 September 2008) art. 2 provides that a hecho de la circulación is every fact occurring as a consequence of the risk created by the driving of motor vehicles, including those occurring in garages and car parks, and no matter whether they happen on a public or private road. No such hechos are: (i) accidents occurring in sport competitions and on circuits specially designed or adapted for such use; (ii) accidents occurring in the course of industrial or agricultural activities, unless they happen on a road; and (iii) the use of a motor vehicle as an instrument to commit an intentional crime. The definition of a "motor vehicle" in Reglamento art. 1 is based on Directive 72/166/EEC. Damage which ensues from exposure to farm machinery does not connote a traffic accident (TS 10 February 1998, RAJ 1998 (1) no. 752 p. 1178; TS 7 May 1998, RAJ 1998 (2) no. 3238 p. 4723) nor does carbon monoxide posisoning of children in a garage (TS 4 July 2002, RAJ 2002 (4) no. 5900 p. 10483). According to the Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic Act art. 1(1) liability is imposed on the driver. Loc. cit. art. 5(1)(i), however, provides that, along with the driver, the owner of the vehicle shall also be strictly liable, if the driver, in the sense of CP art. 120(5), is an employee of the owner and commits a criminal act (see further Gómez Calle, Los sujetos de la responsabilidad civil[3], 524). If the conduct of the employee which causes damage does not amount to a criminal act, the liability of the owner is based on CC art. 1903 (Díez-Picazo, Derecho de daños, 130; Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños[3], 247). Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic Act art. 5(1)(i in fine) provides that the liability of the owner shall cease if the owner proves that he or she acted as buen padre de familia to prevent the damage. This provision accords with CC art. 1903, not with, however, the CP, which provides for strict liability which is subsidiary. At this juncture it cannot be conclusively asserted, how this tension is to be resolved (see further Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 294 and Gómez Calle loc. cit. 525-527). There are no statutory regulations pertaining to the liability of the custodian; this state of affairs has been frequently criticised (Reglero Campos, Responsabilidad civil, 913). TS 30 December 1992, RAJ 1992 (5) no. 10565 p. 13807 refused to find a company liable liability, where the company had placed a company car at the disposal of an employee. The employee, for his part, permitted his son to use the car (without the permission of the company); the son caused a traffic accident; the company was not liable, owing to the fact that it did not have any control over the use of the car. Liability under the Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic Act is curtailed by force majeure and fault on the part of the victim (art. 1(1)(ii)); caso fortuito is not admitted as defence (TS 22 December 1992, RAJ 1992 (5) no. 10639 p. 13873; TS 17 November 1989, RAJ 1989 (6) no. 7889 p. 9187; TS 8 February 1992, RAJ 1992 (1) no. 1198 p. 1516). Contributory negligence on the part of the victim leads to the exclusion of liability if it was sole cause of the accident; in other cases it leads to an appropriate reduction in the award of damages (loc. cit. art. 1(1)(iv)).

4. Under the ITALIAN CC art. 2054(1) "the driver of a vehicle which is not track bound……is obliged to compensate loss accruing to persons or property caused by placing the vehicle into traffic circulation, unless s/he can prove that s/he did everything in his/her power to avoid the damage". Passengers in the vehicle may also assert a claim for compensation, independent of inquiry into the reason as to their carriage. In respect of transport for a fee, contractuals claims (CC art. 1681) compete with extra contractual liability. A “vehicle” denotes every machine in circulation on public streets or their equivalent, which is capable of transporting persons or property. It can be mechanically propelled or propelled by animals and human power. All types of bicycles and trolleybuses are therefore “vehicles” Art (Cass. 7 January 1991, no. 57, Giust.civ.Mass. 1991, fasc. 1), however motorised wheelchairs and aber motorgetriebene Rollstühle und skis are not encompassed by this term (Cass. 30 July 1987, no. 6603, Arch.Giur.circolaz. 1988, 863). The term “circulation” is understood to mean driving, being stationary in traffic and parking (Cass. 5 July 2004, no. 12284, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 7; Cass. 28 November 1990, no. 11467, Giust.civ.Mass. 1990, fasc. 11; Cass. 24 July 1987, no. 6445, Riv.giur.circ.trasp. 1988, 100; Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, 647-648), vehicles on the areas designed for use by public transport, also if these are owned privately (Cass. 3 February 1987, no. 965, Giust.civ.Mass. 1987, fasc. 2). Whether liability under CC art. 2054(1) is based on a presumption of fault (according to Monateri, Manuale della responsabilità civile, 433-438; cf. also de Cupis, Il danno I, 208) or must be constued as being strict (Franzoni loc. cit. 668-669; Visintini, Trattato breve della responsabilità civile, 681), remains theroretically contentious. The courts rely on the avoidability of the event causing as providing a basis for exoneration from liability (Cass. 7 August 2000, no. 10352, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 1732). According to CC art. 2054(2), in the case where two vehicles collide, unless proved otherwise, it is presumed that each driver contributed to the same extent to the damage caused to the individual vehicles. According to the Corte Cost. 29 December 1972, no. 205, Giur.it. 1973, I, 1, 708; Foro it. 1973, I, 1 the provision remains operative, if one of the vehicles implicated in the accident is in itself not damaged. In practice, CC art. 2054(2) for the most part boils down tot he result that each of the drivers concerned must bear half of the damage caused by another (Monateri loc. cit. 441). CC art. 2054(3) provides that the owner of the car or the holder of a usufructuary right, the hire purchaser jointly and severally liable with the driver, unless they can prove that the vehicle was used ahgainst his or her will. The exact legal nature of this provision is contentious (see further Visintini loc. cit. 684). The ability to adduce exculpatory evidence is subject to stringent criteria (Cass. 21 June 2004, no. 11471, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 6: proof of theft alone will not suffice). A person who leaves his car in a company’s custody is relieved of liability (Cass. 27 January 1995, no. 981, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, 198; Cass. 29 August 1987, no. 7118, Giust.civ.Mass. 1987, fasc. 8-9). Finally, CC art. 2054(4) imposes strict liability on drivers, owners and on other persons enumerated in CC art. 2054(3) in the event that the accident was caused by a manufacturing or maintenance defect in the vehicle. Only proof that there was no causal nexus between the defect and the accident will exclude lthe attribution of liability (Cass. 9 March 2004, no. 4755, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 3; Visintini loc. cit. 686).

5. In HUNGARY, liability for damage caused by motor vehicles is dealt with under the extremely comprehensive regime of strict liability for dangerous activities (CC § 345(1)); only proof that the damage occured for an unavoidable reason, unconnected with the dangerous activity can provide relief from liability (e.g. natural phenomenon; also uinevitable damage caused by animals). Contributory negligence on the part of the victim will be taken account of and will lead to the abridgment of the claim for compensation (para. (2)), a contractual disclaimer of liability will in principle be disregarded (para. (3)). For example, a defective tyre which could not have been forseen or a sudden indisposition of the driver are deemed to be connected with the dangerous activity (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1263-1268; Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II, 590-592), no longer in contrast the explosion of a bomb which was placed on the defendant’s bus by a third party and detonated (BH 2000/200). A parked car does not partake in traffic and therefore does not signify a hazardous activity; the same holds true for a bus which stopped and was waiting at a bus stop in accordance with its timetable, however the opposite conclusion was drawn in the case of a car stopped at a traffic light, even when the engine was turned off (Benedek loc. cit. 1245-1246; Wellmann loc. cit. 586-587). The keeper is deemed to exercise the dangerous activity; the driver is only liable under the general civil law precepts. Ownership and registration merely serve as an indicators as to the existence of custodianship. It is possible to have more than one keeper (e.g. married couple who both use the vehicle); permission use of the vehicle temporarily does not alter the custodianship (Benedek loc. cit. 1250-1253, 1255; Wellmann loc. cit. 587-590). As regards the convergence of "danagerous activities", typically therefore the collosion of vehicles, liability based on a presumption of fault according to the general rules governing liability are applicable in the stead of strict liability (CC § 346(1)). In the absence of fault of both sides if an "irregularity" is ascertained in one of the vehicles, liability is imposed solely on the keeper of this vehicle (CC § 346(2)). Examples under this rubric include the sudden indisposition of the driver, the unforseeable flat tyre, the dispersal of a stone which hits another car, (EBH 1999/99; BH 2000/348) and the sudden swerve to avoid hitting an animal of one of the vehicles involved in the accident (BH 2003/500). If such an irregularity is attributable to both parties or is lacking on both sides and each party can exculpate itself, each party is responsible for its own loss (CC § 346(3)). In relation to accidents involving passengers, the strict liability regime under extra contractual liability is employed in practice, even when the accident is the result of a violation of contractual obligations, unless a special regulation is applicable (Benedek loc. cit. 1280-1281). The proposed new Hungarian Civil Code envisages that the regime of liability pertaining to dangerous substances will remain for the foreseeable future essentially insitu (http://www.parlament.hu/irom38/05949/05949.pdf).

6. POLISH CC art. 436 governs liability for damage caused by the movement of a "mechanical means of conveyance". Liability is strict and is primarily imposed on the independent possessor; if the means of conveyance is transferred to a dependent possessor, the dependent possessor is liable (CC art. 436 § 1 second sentence). The existence of a causal nexus between the use of the means of transport and the resulting damage is all that is required (CC art. 361; see Supreme Court 28 December 1981, IV CR 465/81, OSNCP 1982, nos. 5-6, poz. 88; Pietrzykowski [-Safjan], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 436, no. 12). According to prevailing legal opinion, the concept of "conveyance" comprehends the entering and alighting from the vehicle as well as stopping on the way (Supreme Court 14 April 1975, II CR 114/75, OSNCP 1976, no. 2, poz. 37). A car crashed in a car accident is in the movement in the legal sense as long as it remains on the public road (SN 7 April 2005, LEX no. 151656; Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 236). The term "means of conveyance" embaraces all vehicles which are propelled by an engine, therefore the term denotes not only cars but also aeroplanes, motorboats, street trams and motorbikes etc (Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 234). Proof of force majeure as well as exclusive fault on the party of the person who suffered damage or of a third party, the exception being where the possessor of the vehicle is responsible for the third party, operates to exclude the imposition of liability (CC art. 435 § 1 in fine in conjunction with. CC art. 436 § 1). The liability regime reverts back to liability based on fault in two instances, namely: in the case of collision between mechanical means of conveyance and in the circumstances where a person is conveyed as a courtesy (CC art. 436 § 2). However, driving into a stationary vehicle does not connote a "collision" under the statutory provison (Supreme Court 4 March 1958, 1 CR 154/56, OSPiKA 1959, no. 10, poz.

257; Safjan loc. cit. art. 436, no. 24). The possessor is accountable also for damage caused to the car driver (Czachórski, Zobowiązania[10], 288). Particularities pertaining to liability insurance can be found in the law of the 22nd May 2003 on Compulsory Insurance, Guarantee funds and the Polish Motor Insurers Bureau (Dz. U. no. 124 poz. 1152 as amended).

7. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 150 establishes strict liability for keepers of all types of dangerous objects; a rebuttable presumption exists in respect of their potential to cause damage (LOA art. 149). An individual who steals a dangeous object (e.g. a car), is liable in the stead of the keeper, provided that the latter was not at fault as far as the theft is concerned (LOA art. 151). Cases involving the collision of vehicles are the subject of a standalone regulation (LOA art. 154). It amounts to a liability based on fault, proportionate to the number of keepers involved; if there is an absence of fault, then each party is liable, in principle, for the half of the total loss. According to BULGARIAN law, the driver of a motor vehicle is liable if he is at fault in causing the accident (LOA art. 45(1)). If the driver was e.g employed at a transport company or as a chauffeur, the employer is also liable (LOA art. 49; Burov, Grajdanska otgovornost za vredi, prichineni pri avtomobilna zlopoluka, 35).The owner and the keeper of the motor vehicle are jointly and severally liable for damage resulting from a hidden defect in the motor vehicle (a unforseen failure of the brakes) which can not be attributed to the fault of the driver (LOA art. 50). The differences between the two liability regimes are, of course, minor, owing to the fact that liability under LOA art. 45(1) is constructed as liability based on a presumption of fault (LOA art. 45(2)); where the distinctions exist, they only become relevant if the vehicle is owned by the driver. If the driver is simultaneously the owner and the accident can be attributed to fault on his part, then if there is more than one owner of the same vehicle, they will not be liable for the ensuing loss. The liability will not be imposed on the owner, if the accident can be attrbuted to force majeure, to the exclusive fault of the person who has suffered damage or to the third party intervention (e.g. theft) (Decree no. 7 of the Supreme Court of 30 December 1959, Plenum, no. 10).

8. GERMANY has constructed the liability for damage caused by the operation of motor vehicles in the Road Traffic Act (Straßenverkehrsgesetz, StVG) § 7 in the form of a strict liability imposed on the registered user of the vehicle. Liability is based on the special danger present for other users in motorised traffic which inheres in every vehicle, regardless of the circumstances of the individual case (Greger, Haftungsrecht des Straßenverkehrs[3], § 7 StVG, no. 2). This liability is also imposed on the keeper of a trailer which is designed to be carried along by a motor vehicle. According to StVG § 1(2) “motor vehicles” are all land motorised vehicle propelled by engine power, with the exception of vehicles running on tracks. The vehilce must be capable of reaching a minimum speed of 20 km/h (StVG § 8). The “user“ of the vehicle is assessed not predominantly by legal means but also by assessing factual and financial circumstances. A user connotes a person who uses the motor vehicle or trailer on his own account and who, in addition, exerts the factual control with is connected with the use of the vehicle (BGH 3 December 1991, NJW 1992, 900, 902). Ownership serves as an indicator for the custodianship, but not a required element (Geigel [-Rixecker], Der Haftpflichtprozess[24], chap. 25, no. 36 p. 863; Hentschel [-Hentschel], Straßenverkehrsrecht[37], § 7 StVG, no. 14). If a father donates a Go kart with the capacity to achieve 40 km/h, despite the change in ownership, the father remains the keeper of the go-cart if he solely continues to exert power of disposal, bears all running costs associated with the operation of a go-cart and determines when the go-cart can be used (CA Koblenz 26 April 2004, NJW-RR 2004, 822). Liability is triggered, if, in the course of operating the vehicle, a person is killed, or personal injury, damage to health, or damage to property ensues (StVG § 7(1)). A motor vehicle is "in operation" when it is used in the area of public traffic. The "operation" begins when the engine is started up and finishes once the motor is turned off outside the area of public traffic (Hentschel loc. cit. no. 5). Operating the vehicle must have caused the loss which resulted. Liability is precluded when the damage results from force majeure (StVG § 7(2)). "Force majeure" denotes an extraordinary external event, which is caused by a supervening natural event or by the actions of third parties (external) which, according to human perceptions and experience amounts to an unavoidable event. This event cannot neither be avoided by exercise of the utmost care to be expected under the circumstances and employing commercially viable means nor could be predicated on the basis of its frequency of occurrence (Hentschel loc. cit. no. 32). Liability of the keeper is excluded, if a third party uses the vehicle without the knowledge and permission of the keeper. The unauthorised person using the vehicle is is liable instead of the keeper. The keeper is liable in conjunction with the unauthorised user, if it was the fault of the keeper that the unauthorised person could use the vehicle (StVG § 7(3)). However, the keeper remains liable if the user if the vehicle is an employee or if he gave the vehicle to the user. The liability of the keeper is restricted in amount (StVG §§ 12, 12a and 12b), however, it also encompasses non pecuniary loss (StVG § 11 sent. 2).

9. Damage, resulting from the operation of a motor vehicle, are subject to the provisions of the AUSTRIAN Traffic Liability Act (EKHG) § 5 which provides for a strict liability in respect of keepers. It also encompasses damage which occurs upon entering and alighting, dangerous parking of the case or damage which is caused by a leakage of oil. A keeper is not liable to those persons, who use the motor vehicle without the permission of the keeper (loc. cit. § 6), and no liability exists in respect of individuals who are employed to operate the motor vehicle (loc. cit. § 3(1)). Keeper denotes anyone, who, at the time of the accident, used the vehicle for his advantage and had the ability to avert the danger. Ownership merely serves as an indicator of custodianship, it is not however a prerequisite (the hire purchaser, in particular, is a keeper). In conjunction with the keeper, his/her insurer is jointly and severally liable (KHVG 1987 § 22), the person who has suffered loss may make a direct claim against the insurer. The concept "motor vehicles" denotes all vehicle powered by an engine which can attain a speed greater than 10 km/h erreichen (therefore e.g. snow grommers are not emcompassed by the concept: Barta, Zivilrecht II^2, 639) and can be regarded as road vehicles (fon these grounds e.g. lawnmowers are not subject to the strict liability regime: OGH 19 December 1996, ZVR 1998/18 p. 47). Liability is excluded, when the cause of the accident has its roots in an unavoidable event (EKHG § 9(1)), therefore e.g. in the conduct of the person who has suffered damage (person committing suicide), caused by a third party or an animal (loc. cit. § 9(2)). The driver must exercise all due diligence according to the circumstances of the case. The prequisites of the EKHG § 9 were not established where e.g the mistake on the driver's part resulted from an insect sting to the eye (OGH 30 September 1965, ZVR 1966/87 p. 104). Furthermore, a sudden unconsciousness of the driver does not lead to exculpation from liability because the classification as an unavoidable event must be triggered by an external influence (OGH 30 March 1978, SZ 49/20). The sphere of legally relevant damage corresponds to the rule contained in VI.–3:205. Disclaimers of liability are inoperative. However, there are limits placed on the compensation that can be awarded (loc. cit. §§ 15 and 16); in respect of the loss which exceeds these limits, it may be recoverable under the general liability regime under the ABGB (EKHG § 19).

10. GREEK Road Traffic Liability Act (Law of 4/5 December 1911 on the criminal and civil liability in respect of moto vehicles) introduced at an early stage a strict liability regime for damage caused by motor vehicles (Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio I, 688; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 674). Liability is imposed on the driver, the owner (provided he is not the keeper but in this case only up to the extent of value of the motor vehicle: loc. cit. art. 4) and the keeper. The term "keeper" denotes a person who, at the time of the accident, was the owner of the vehicle or who held the vehicle under a contract and used it in his own name. Furthermore the term encompasses every person who without permission acquires possession of the motor vehicle and uses it in some manner (loc. cit. art. 2(2)). A person who rents out a motor vehicle for commercial purposes, is or remains the keeper of that vehicle (Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio I, 690; A.P. 3/1987, NoB 36 [1988] 71); the property law notion of possession is not decisive (A.P. 558/1990, EllDik 1990, 1000). An employee who uses the vehicle in the course of his employment is not the keeper of the vehicle (A.P. 682/1983, NoB 32 [1984] 276). "Motor vehicles" also connote according to the definition contained in the Road Traffic Liability Act art. 2(1) motorbikes, mopeds and tracked vehicles (Georgiades loc. cit. 689).The Act does not apply to military or emergency response vehicles. Only "third parties" are entitled to assert a claim, i.e individuals who were not in the vehicle (Georgiades loc. cit. 689); an exception is carved out for bus passengers (Act 48441/1930 art. 45). Damage can be caused "while the vehicle is in operation" when the engine is switched off. Liability can be avoided once proof of "force majeure" (for an analysis of this concept see Georgiades loc. cit. 693 and CA Thessaloniki 274/1980, Arm 34 [1981] 462) and fault of a third party is adduced (Road Traffic Liability Act art. 5). In respect of the victim's contributory negligence, today only CC art. 300 remains a point of reference and can effect a reduction in the extent of liability. However, the fact of the victim's contributory negligence does not lead to an automatic exclusion of liability (as was orginally envisaged by the Road Traffic Liability Act) (Kornilakis, I evthini apo diakindinevsi, 174; Livanis, I efarmogi tou arthrou 300 is to pedion tis antikimenikis evthinis, 140; Georgiades loc. cit. 693). However, it will be presumed that the person who suffered injury was partly at fault, if the driver, unlike the injured party adhered to the rules of the Road Traffic Liability Act (Road Traffic Liability Act art. 50); if the injured party bases his claim on CC art. 914, this presumption does not apply (A.P. 1618/1987, EllDik 1988, 1375). The driver can exonerate himself by proving that the accident was caused by a defect in the motor vehicle which he could not have discovered (Road Traffic Liability Act art. 5(2)). The extent of damages to be awarded is limited to a "reasonable amount of compensation". In measuring the amount of compensation to be awarded, assessment of fault is of paramount consideration (loc. cit. art. 9; see further Georgiades loc. cit. 691). According to these principles, non pecuniary loss is also recoverable (CA Patras 257/1984, NoB 32 [1984] 1567; A.P. 516/1967, NoB 16 [1968] 94; A.P. 997/1983, NoB 32 [1984] 649). Damage which results from the collision of vehicles cannot be recovered; in such a case, the mutual claims of the drivers fall to be dealt with under the general provisions pertaining to liability based on fault (loc. cit. art. 10). Meanwhile, the objective liability of the owner and keeper remains untouched by this (CA Athens 1019/1988, EllDik 1990, 360; CA Athens 11768/1986, EllDik 1987, 1338; A.P. 683/1983, NoB 32 [1984] 276).

11. According to the PORTUGUESE CC art. 503(1) strict liability for the damage caused to "land bound vehicles" is imposed on the person who holds the effective control (direcção efectiva) over the vehicle and uses the vehicle for his own benefit. even if this person is merely an employee (commissário). Liability may also lie with the keeper of the vehicle (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 656; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 513; Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 578; STJ 12 May 2005), however not necessarily with the owner (STJ 9 July 1998). CC art.

503(1) is applicable to all types of land bound vehicles and also applies to track bound vehicles.(STJ 18 May 2006; STJ 27 June 2002; STJ 5 February 1971, BolMinJus 204 [1971] 138) and also to vehicles without a motor, for examples bicycles.(Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 90 [1959] 5, 102). Only damage, (material and non pecuniary: CA Oporto 14 September 2006; STJ 17 March 2005; CA Lisbon 17 November 2005), which "emanantes from a danger inherent in the vehicle even if this vehicle was not involved in traffic". It is irrelevant that the accident occured on public or private terrain (Antunes Varela loc. cit. 667; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela loc. cit. 514; CA Oporto 11 April 2005; STJ 26 April 1974, BolMinJus 236 [1974] 147).

12. According to the DUTCH Road Traffic Act (Wegenverkeerswet of 1935 as amended) art. 185 strict liability is similarly imposed, in the first instance on the keeper; The owner becomes liable only in the event that there is no keeper of the motor vehicle. Liability is attched to "motor vehicles driven on a public road".The damage that is recoverable is that which results from a traffic accident to the prejudice of a person or property which was not transported in the vehicle itself. According to the Road Traffic Act art. 1 a motor vehicle is defined as "any vehicle intended to be moved, other than on rails, propelled totally or partially by mechanical power on or in the vehicle itself or by electrical traction with power supplied from elsewhere". Consequently, damaged vehicle being towed for repairs are encompassed by this term (HR 14 December 1965, NedJur 1966 no. 360 p. 966) as well as mopeds; however, bicycles are excluded from the scope of application, as are (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 215 p. 235) switched off vehicles, which are not running. The concept of "traffic accident" no longer requires a collision to occur (the position was otherwise under an earlier law, see for comparasion in so far as relevant HR 4 February 1937, NedJur 1937 no. 489 p. 659); e.g. it suffices that a vehicle catches fire or that the vehicle takes a wrong turn thereby so discomfiting a cyclist that he falls (see further van Dam, VR 2005, 301). Injury to passengers of the vehicle is only recoverable under the general rules, i.e. under CC arts. 6:162, 6:170 and under contractual law provision; in respect of person who were conveyed out of courtesy, further limitations on liability have been debated and their adoption has even been deemed imperative (see further Onrechtmatige Daad III [-Bouman], no. 221 p. 46; HR 3 December 1971, NedJur 1972 no. 144 p. 433; HR 11 April 1975, NedJur 1975 no. 373 p. 1131), it has been suggested that CC art. 6:109 (reduction of liability on the basis of fairness and equity: Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12] no. 429 p. 358) should be applied. No liability exists in resepect of "stowaways" (HR 27 January 1984, NedJur 1984 no. 536 p. 1855). Liability is excluded in a case of force majeure. CA Arnhem 4 April 2006, VR 2006 no. 107 p. 253 affirmed the existence of force majeure in a case where the driver of a recumbent bike, who drove directly in front of the vehicle of the defendant, thereby in disregard of the rules on who had the the right of way.

13. Similarly ESTONIA has constructed liability for damage caused by motor vehicles along the line of strict liability. According to LOA § 1057 liability is imposed on the "direct possessor" of the vehicle. However, strict liability can also be imposed for damage caused by a motor vehicle under LOA § 1056, which applies in respect of all things constituting "a major source of danger" (Supreme Court 3-2-1-48-06, RT III 2006, 25, 228). The extent of damage recoverable is ascertainable according to the regulation anchored in VI.–3:205 (LOA § 1056(1)). The concept of "motor vehicle" is defined by the Estonian Traffic Act § 12, according to which a motor vehicle is a vehicle powered by an engine. Motor assisted cycles, mopeds and power-driven rail-borne vehicles are not deemed to be power-driven vehicles.

14. In the NORDIC COUNTRIES compulsory insurance schemes provide compensation regardless of whether or not a natural or legal person is liable for the accident. If such a liability exists, while the injured party can proceed directly against the the person responsible for the causing the loss, this way of proceeding is not compulsory. Consequently, in practice, the latter claim is rarely asserted. In a similar manner to all cognate Nordic Acts, the SWEDISH Traffic Damages Act (Trafikskadelag [1975:1410]) permits the person who has suffered damage to claim traffic insurance compensation for personal injury and property damage directly from the other party's insurer, independent of any question into liability (see further Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 279-282). An insurer, who has compensated the victim of a traffic accident has a right of recourse agsinst the person who caused the damage, provided that this person was at least negligent in causing the accident. The amount of compensation obtainable under the scheme of traffic insurance is constructed along the lines of general laws pertaining to liability, i.e. according to the provisions of the Damages Liability Act. The prerequisite for claiming traffic insurance compensation is, namely, that the damage was "caused in the course of traffic involving a motor vehicle". "In the course of traffic" has been given a broad interpretation; even an accident occuring in a repair shop (CA for Skåne och Blekinge 4 May 1961, NJA 1962, 172), an injury to a front-seat passenger by the hurried slammed closure of the front door of the car by the driver (HD 29 April 1988, NJA 1988, 221) and loss of balance while alighting from the vehicle (HD 15 November 1974, NJA 1974, 616) are embraced by this term (see for further examples Nordenson, Trafikskadeersättning, 579). Drivers, passengers, pedestrians and cyclists are entitled to assert a claim for damages in personal injury cases, even in cases where there were negligent; this claim can only be reduced in cases of contributory gross negligence (intention, gross negligence) (Traffic Damages Act §§ 10-12). Compensation for damaging the motor vehicle of another and the load transported on it will only be granted under traffic insurance, if the driver of the vehicle which caused the damage conducted himself in a negligent manner (loc. cit. §§ 10-11). The traffic insurance will not compensate damage to the insured person's vehicle. In contrast, damage to the property of other individuals involved (e.g. cyclists) is recoverable, irresepctive of whether the driver was at fault; the claim will be reduced correspondingly if the person who suffered damage has contributed negligently to his damage (loc. cit. § 12). DANISH Traffic Act (Færdselslov, lovbekentgørelse 14 November 2005, no. 1079) § 101 provides for a strict liability for personal injury, loss of maintenance and loss resulting from property damage caused by motor vehicles from a traffic accident, explosion or fire. Liability is on the owner (ejer) or, if he shows that another person used it, on the user of the motor vehicle (loc. cit. § 104; see in more detail von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 163). However, Traffic Act § 105 provides for compulsory insurance, under which the injured party may seek compensation directly from the insurer (loc. cit. § 108), regardless of whether or not the person causing the damage paid the insurance premium (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 155). Injury and other damage to the policyholder himself or herself are excluded from the insurance cover (HD 1 September 1998, UfR 1998, 1626; HD 15 November 2003, UfR 2003, 339), unless they are caused by a collision with another motor vehicle. In the latter case any damage to the owner, user or driver is to be compensated under the basic rule in Traffic Act § 101 which requires that the damage resulted from the "use" (see on this notion HD 9 August 2002, UfR 2002, 2432) of a motor vehicle. Furthermore, according to loc. cit. § 101 the damage has to be caused on a road for public use, and must be the consequence of a traffic accident, an explosion or fire. The notion of "traffic accident" is a very broad concept. It covers, for example, damage caused by objects which fall from the vehicle and hit other road users following behind (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 161). If the prerequistes of loc. cit. § 101 are not satisfied, then the liability of the person reseponsible for the vehicle is governed by the general culpa rule (loc. cit. § 102). The "person responsible for the vehicle" is the owner or user;the liability os the driver remains unaffected by this and is, likewise, governed by the general culpa rule (loc. cit. § 104). FINNISH Traffic Insurance Act (Trafikförsäkringslag 26 June 1959/279) § 1 provides that a personal injury or a loss resulting from property damage, suffered in the course of using a motor vehicle in traffic, shall be compensated from the traffic insurance of the vehicle. The vehicle's owner or permanent user is obliged to insure the vehicle (loc. cit. § 15). Compensation is awarded in accordance with the rules of the Damages Liability Act (loc. cit. § 6). The party suffering the loss or injury thus has a direct claim on the insurance company, regardless of another person's liability (loc. cit. §§ 4 and 11). Compensation is also awarded even if there is no valid insurance contract, except for losses or injuries caused by the owner or driver to him- or herself (loc. cit. § 10). A right to claim damages from the owner, driver or passenger who caused the damage is available on the basis of the general culpa rule, if the insurance company may deny compensation (loc. cit. § 12). Personal injuries of the policyholder caused to him- or herself are covered by the compulsory insurance, but not property damage (loc. cit. § 5; see Supreme Court, HD 1976 II 10). Personal injury compensation can be adjusted in cases of contributory gross negligence, and be excluded in cases of illegal use of the vehicle or driving under severe influence of alcohol or drugs. The vehicle need not be in motion (Supreme Court 1990:159) but must be on a public road at the time of the accident (Supreme Court 1991:169; Hakulinen, Obligationsrätt, 309). Damage caused during car repairs are excluded (loc. cit. § 2).

VI.–3:206: Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions

(1) A keeper of a substance or an operator of an installation is accountable for the causation by that substance or by emissions from that installation of personal injury and consequential loss, loss within VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death), loss resulting from property damage, and burdens within VI.–2:209 (Burdens incurred by the State upon environmental impairment), if:

(a) having regard to their quantity and attributes, at the time of the emission, or, failing an emission, at the time of contact with the substance it is very likely that the substance or emission will cause such damage unless adequately controlled; and

(b) the damage results from the realisation of that danger.

(2) "Substance" includes chemicals (whether solid, liquid or gaseous). Microorganisms are to be treated like substances.

(3) "Emission" includes:

(a) the release or escape of substances;

(b) the conduction of electricity;

(c) heat, light and other radiation;

(d) noise and other vibrations; and

(e) other incorporeal impact on the environment.

(4) "Installation" includes a mobile installation and an installation under construction or not in use.

(5) However, a person is not accountable for the causation of damage under this Article if that person:

(a) does not keep the substance or operate the installation for purposes related to that person's trade, business or profession; or

(b)shows that there was no failure to comply with statutory standards of control of the substance or management of the installation.

COMMENTS

A. A strict regime for environmental liability

Structure of the regime. This Article relates to liability for damage arising from dangerous substances or emissions. The provision establishes a strict environmental liability for businesses (paragraph (5)(a)). Paragraphs (1) and (5) clarify the ground of accountability, while paragraphs (2)–(4) add clarity as regards certain concepts which are invoked by paragraph (1): substance, emission, and installation.

Relationship to VI.–2:209 (Burdens incurred by the state upon environmental impairment). VI.–2:209 (Burdens incurred by the state upon environmental impairment) only regulates the question of what constitutes a legally relevant damage (of the state) in the circumstances set out there. It says nothing about the ground of liability or accountability. The latter aspect, even in relation to the "pure ecological damage" detailed in VI.–2:209 (Burdens incurred by the state upon environmental impairment), is only taken up in the present Article.

Illustration 1

Cyanide which has been used in the process of extracting gold escapes from a gold mine. The River Tisza is polluted; an entire region suffers ecological damage. The State concerned may demand reparation from the business operating the mine by virtue of VI.–3:206 and, if the infringement of safety and maintenance rules can be established, VI.–2:209 (Burdens incurred by the state upon environmental impairment) in conjunction with VI.–3:102 (Negligence).

Legally relevant damage. Apart from this "pure ecological damage", only injury to the body or health of an individual, detriments sustained by that individual's relatives, and losses consequential to property damage are legally relevant in the context of the strict liability under the present Article. All other forms of damage are legally relevant only on the basis of liability for intention or negligence or in the context of national law (VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage) sub-paragraph (b)). The contamination of land by emissions amounts to property damage sustained by the owner.

Illustration 2
Fluorine used in the processing of bauxite leaks from an aluminium plant. The toxic substance pollutes the surrounding agricultural estates, which as a result of the emission lose 90% of their earning potential. The company operating the plant is liable to the farmers for this damage independent of whether they can show that it was negligent in controlling the chemicals.

Illustration 3
Clouds of dark foul-smelling particles escape from a factory and settle on the roofs of houses in the locality. This is property damage for which there is strict liability under VI.–3:206.

Policy considerations. The Article is based on the observation that the predominant number by far of the EU Member States have shaped the core of environmental liability within private law – liability for injury to health and damage to property as a result of impairment of the ecosystem – in terms of strict liability. However, there still exist such substantial differences in detail between the national legal systems that it did not seem either sensible or indeed possible to formulate the rule in the manner of a proposal for maximum harmonisation. This Article therefore confines itself to expressing what, according to the appraisal of the comparative legal survey of the laws of the Member States, proved to be the "common denominator" of the preponderant number of the EU's legal systems. Those marginal areas which do not lie within this intersection thus remain to be dealt with by reference to the applicable national law (VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage) sub-paragraph (b)).

A large accident occurs at a chemical plant, as a result of which steam containing dioxins is released into the atmosphere. The local population has to keep windows and doors closed and cannot leave their homes for 36 hours. Under these rules the restriction on freedom of movement for the individuals affected which has been caused by the air pollution is only a legally relevant damage (VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy) paragraph (1)) if the operator of the chemical plant can be shown to have been negligent or if the applicable law provides for a strict liability for infringements of liberty.

Illustration 5
Following a fire at a business's warehouse, substances containing oil mix with the water used to extinguish the fire and flow into the nearby river. A few kilometres downstream company X operates open air swimming baths, which it is forced to close for several days. X sustains a loss of income, but no property damage. The question whether such a "pure economic loss" falls within the protection of a strict regime of environmental liability is determined exclusively by national law (VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage)); under these rules X does not suffer legally relevant damage which is caught by the strict liability envisaged in VI.–3:206.

B. The persons liable

Keeper of a substance and operator of an installation. Liability under VI.–3:206 attaches to persons who independently exercise control over a substance or an installation, i.e. to the "keeper" of a substance and the "operator" of an installation. The "keeper" of a substance is liable for damage which is caused by the substance; the "operator" of an installation is liable for emissions. The concept of "keeper" follows the general rules. The term "operator" (Betreiber) designates the person (as a rule, a legal person) to whose business assets the installation belongs.

Private use excluded (paragraph (5)(a)). Liability does not arise under paragraph (1) if the relevant person does not keep the substance or operate the installation for purposes related to that person's trade, business or profession (paragraph (5)(a)). An owner-operator's private oil tank constitutes an "installation", but strict liability by reason of VI.–3:206 is not imposed on the owner-operator. Depending on their properties, pills and other medicines may be dangerous substances within the meaning of paragraph (1) and the same may be true of chemicals which are used for household cleaning or weed control. A general strict liability in such cases does not seem appropriate; it ought to arise only in respect of industrial production or commercial storage of these or similar chemicals, not least because in such cases entirely different quantities are involved. However, private individuals are subject to a particular duty of care if they possess or operate substances or installations of the type referred to in this Article. Moreover, the more dangerous a substance is, the more probable it is that there are prohibitions on private possession or at least public law rules to ensure the safe storage of such substances. The infringement of such rules is by itself negligence within the meaning of VI.–3:102 (Negligence) sub-paragraph (a). The same applies for the operation of installations with a potential environmental impact.

Other legal bases for a claim remain unaffected. Paragraph (5)(a) does not allow any room for doubt as to the fact that it is only liability "under this Article" which does not apply to private individuals. All other bases for a claim therefore remain unaffected. That applies not only to the claims just mentioned on the grounds of intention or negligence but also to claims for some other legal reason, e.g. property law claims between owners of neighbouring land (VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (d)) and claims based on public law duties to eliminate dangers to public safety.

C. The risk within the scope of the strict liability

Causation of damage by dangerous substances and emissions (paragraph (1)(a)). The potential danger which is intended to be covered by this Article is paraphrased in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) of paragraph (1). Strict liability is not envisaged for every kind of substance or emission, but only for those which, viewed in the abstract, inherently pose a high risk for the environment (VI.–2:209 (Burdens incurred by the state upon environmental impairment)), for people and for property. The test question is whether it is "very likely" that the stored substance or emitted material will cause damage to health, property or the environment if it is not taken care of in an appropriate manner. Whether in an individual case appropriate care was in fact taken is not decisive; what is decisive is merely the fact that the dangerous characteristics of the substance or material make special precautions necessary. That is an objective test; the issue does not turn on the actual or constructive knowledge of the keeper or operator.

Dangerous quantity. The risk which is inherent in the relevant substance must be identified by having regard the quantity and its specific characteristics. For example, water is, as such, completely harmless. However, when held in large volumes, it constitutes an obvious danger for people and property unless it is secured against leakage either above ground or subterraneously: a dam can burst and the base of a reservoir can be permeable. Even large quantities of grain or milk powder can be dangerous due to the risk of spontaneous combustion. Pure and therefore easily ignited alcohol can also be a dangerous substance if stored in larger quantities. If, on the other hand, it is merely used to disinfect a wound, liability under this Article can be excluded for several reasons.

> Doctors disinfect a patient prior to an operation, using chemicals containing alcohol. At the same time they use an electronic scalpel which produces a spark that ignites the alcohol in the chemicals. As a result the patient suffers severe burns. The liability of the hospital (VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives)) turns on the negligence of the doctors, not on the present Article. At the point in time that the injuries occurred, the hospital was not keeper of the chemicals; nor could it be said that it was "very probable" that "if not adequately controlled" those chemicals, in that small amount, would cause damage of that type. Nor is the electronic scalpel an "installation" within the meaning of this Article.

Relationship to VI.–3:202 (Accountability for damage caused by the unsafe state of an immovable). The relationship between this Article and VI.–3:202 (Accountability for damage caused by the unsafe state of an immovable) has already been explained in the Comments on VI.–3:202. The rule in that Article embraces, for example, damage as a result of a burst water pipe. If, on the other hand, corrosive material is transported through a defective pipe, reparation for the damage will be recoverable on the basis of both provisions because the case involves a dangerous substance.

Dangerous attributes. Substances which pose a particular danger to persons and property due to their specific attributes are, for example, substances which ignite, explode or oxidise easily, poisonous and radiating materials of every sort and corrosive chemicals. Danger for the environment (though not necessarily for the health of individuals) is associated with, for example, genetically experimental breeding, but equally with mere liquid manure which is stored in the tanks of a large-scale agricultural concern. The number of dangerous substances is in fact so large that they cannot be exhaustively listed here. A good indicator of the dangerousness of a substance is the obligation to use hazard signs when transporting such materials by road. Many European legal systems, moreover, have special regimes in which particular substances are characterised as dangerous for persons, property or the environment. This Article refers to such regulations implicitly.

Realisation of the risk establishing liability (paragraph (1)(b)). The strict liability for dangerous substances and emissions only arises if the damage results from the realisation of the risk which is specifically associated with the substance or emission. The danger which justifies a strict liability for the storage of a large volume of water in a reservoir is not that someone swimming in the reservoir might drown, but that the dam might burst and people or animals may be killed or injured as a result or that damage may be caused to premises in the neighbourhood.

Illustration 7
The owner of an estate constructs a water reservoir on his land. The contractor entrusted to undertake the work overlooks the fact that tunnels run under the reservoir, linking the land to a mine whose seams consequently fill up with water. The owner of the mine has a claim to reparation against the owner of the estate under this Article.

Causation. The damage must have been caused by the dangerous substance or emission. The test of causation is subject to the general rules of Chapter 4. Issues of the law of evidence and thus also questions of alleviation of the burden of proof (such as, for example, rules on prima facie evidence) remain matters for the law of evidence and procedure.

Illustration 8
A fish farming company loses a substantial part of its stock. The fish have been poisoned by substances which got into the ground with the effluent from X's plant and from there passed into the river whose waters transported the toxins into the company's breeding tanks. The death of the fish has been caused by the substances from X's plant. That the natural flow of the river has played a role in the causation of the damage does not detract from that.

Substance (paragraph (2)). The concept of 'substance' does not presuppose any particular physical condition. It may be solid, liquid or gaseous in form. The damage may be brought about by particles which are transported by the wind, by disposal of effluent, or by vapours. Micro-organisms as well as chemicals are substances. The former, however, are not animals within the meaning of VI.–3:203 (Accountability for damage caused by animals).

Emission (paragraph (3)). It follows from paragraphs (2) and (3) that the concept of an emission extends further than the concept of a substance. While substances (in whatever form) are also capable of being emitted, the notion of an emission equally embraces the conduct of electricity, heat, light and other radiation, noise and other vibrations and other incorporeal impact on the environment which is not referable to some substance. The concept of an emission always connotes a negative impact on the environment. In order to ascertain what is meant by "impact on the environment" in paragraph (3)(e) reference can be had to VI.–2:209 (Burdens incurred by the State upon environmental impairment).

Installation (paragraph (4)). Paragraph (4) extends the liability of the operator of an installation to its construction phase. The provision also makes it clear that the mere closure of an installation will not preclude liability. In contrast to a "plant" an "installation" also embraces a mobile installation.

No failure to comply with statutory standards. Paragraph (5)(b) makes it possible for the potentially liable person to escape liability by proving that control of the substance was not defective or, as the case may be, that there was no mismanagement of the installation. That does not detract from the strict liability character of the rule because, as in the case of liability for products, only objectively defective control or management is in issue. However, such a provision is necessary – for example, in order to enable the operator of an installation to establish that the statutorily prescribed emission levels were not exceeded. Such statutory rules which lay down the extent of permitted emissions may be found in either Community law or national legal provisions.

Other defences. The defences in Chapter 5 are also applicable in the context of this Article. In particular VI.–5:302 (Event beyond control) is unaffected. In applying this provision, however, it is always necessary to assess whether it was really an external risk which materialised or whether, despite the influence of, for example, adverse weather conditions, it was in truth a risk on account of which the present Article envisages strict liability.

Illustration 9
In an agricultural concern rapeseed is sprayed with pesticides. As a result of torrential rainfall, the pesticide residues are transported on to neighbouring land where they cause the death of fish in a pond. The rain has not interrupted the chain of causation. It is not an event beyond control within the meaning of VI.–5:302 (Event beyond control), so as to excuse the farmer from liability. It does not excuse liability because it was the materialisation of a risk for which the farmer must bear responsibility under the present Article.

NOTES

1. The constructs of FRENCH law relating to environmental liability is based on many pillars, namely, on the théorie des troubles anormaux de voisinage, on the liability for faute (CC arts. 1382-1383), on a number of special regimes dealing with certain hazardous substances and on the liability du fait des choses under CC art. 1384. A requisite of the latter is that the thing, which is in the keeping (garde) of the defendant has caused the relevant damage. It is not an essential requirement that the thing be inherently dangerous (le Tourneau and Cadiet, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2004/2005] nos. 7729-7731). The notion of a thing is given a broad interpretation (e.g. Cass.civ. 10 February 1967, Bull.civ. 1967, II, no. 66 p. 47: condensated water vapour which froze leading to black ice on a street). In order to constitute a fait de la chose, there is no requirement fort he existence of direct contact between the thing and the person who has suffered damage nor is it a requirement that the thing be in motion. It is only necessary that the thing plays a rôle actif, with the result that it becomes an instrument du dommage. A person is regarded as having garde, if the person exercises a pouvoir d´usage, de direction et de contrôle over the thing (Cass.ch.réun. 2 December 1941, D.C. 1942 jur., p. 25, note Ripert); the term garde denotes (also when it is merely temporary) actual control over the thing (pouvoir de fait). A person will be relieved of liability solely upon proof of cause étrangère which cannot be attributed to the gardien (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[11], no. 269 p. 290). There are no special statutory regulations in respect of an array of dangerous substances. The strict liability imposed on hospitals is included in this classification (private doctors‘ practices are however excluded: Mistretta, JCP 2003 éd. G, I no. 57, 165) as regards infections nosocomiales under Code de la Santé Publique (CSP) art. L 1142-1, I(2). In this regard, what the law is concerned with is, the responsibility for illnesses which are caused by micro organisms typically associated with hospitals (Lambert-Faivre, D. 2003, 361, 362). Liability is supplemented by a compulsory liability insurance provided for by statute (CSP art. 1142-1). In the case of permanent dimunition of earning capacity of more than 25% a state scheme then intervenes (CSP art. 1142-1-1), which the hospital can have recourse to, in the event of gross negligence (CSP art. 1142-17). A further example of a special staututory regime can be found in the Code minier arts. 75-1 ff in respect of the liability of mining operators for damage resulting from mining operations. Strict liability for troubles anormaux du voisinage becomes relevant in cases for example, of water pollution (Cass.civ. 2 March 1966, Bull.civ. 1966, II, no. 279; Cass.civ. 12 February 1974, JCP éd. G 1975, II, 18016, note Despax; Cass.civ. 15 February 1989, JCP éd. G 1989, IV, 142). It is a matter for the discretion of court of first instance to determine whether an emission can be characterised as normal or abnormal (le Tourneau and Cadiet, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2006/2007], no. 7180 and 7184).

2. Similarly, in BELGIUM, the point of departure is generally CC art. 1384(1). In Belgium this regulation only becomes applicable, if the damage originated owing to a defect in the thing (in the stead of many Tilleman and Claeys [-Baudoncq and Debaene], Buitencontractuele aansprakelijkheid, 83, 88; van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 329). The definition of the gardien is largerly identical to the French definition (e.g. Cass. 24 January 1991, Pas. belge 1991, I, no. 276 p. 500); however, in contrast to the prevailing law in France, it must be possible to impute the legally relevant act to the defendant. A thing is defective if it exhibits an abnormal characteristic which renders it susceptible, in the circumstances of the case, to causing injury to a third party; the defect can be transitory, it is, furthermore, not essential that the defect be an inherent attribute of the thing (Cass. 3 September 1992, Pas. belge 1992, I, no. 585 p. 985).

3. The SPANISH law on liability for environmental damage is governed by a number of disparate regimes. The rule contained in CC art. 1908(1) is among their number. According to this article, the owner shall be liable for damage caused “by explosion of machinery that had not been maintained with due care”, and for damage caused “by the ignition of explosive materials that had not been put in a safe and appropriate place”. Prevailing legal opinion asserts that this regulation is a special case of liability based on fault. The same opinion is professed in respect of CC art. 1908(4), according to which the owner is liable for damage caused “by emissions from sewers or deposits of infecting substances that had been built without the preventive measures that were appropriate according to the place where they were located” (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 572). Loss which falls within the scope of both of these statutory provisions, is, therefore, treated by the courts as generally falling within CC art. 1902 which enables the application of the risk theory devised under this norm which pertains to liability as well as the application of the doctrine of culpa cuasi-objetiva (see above, Note I4 under VI.–3:102 (Negligence)) (e.g. TS 18 November 1998, RAJ 1998 (5) no. 8814 p. 13018; TS 20 May 2005, RAJ 2005 (5) no. 6693 p. 14224; TS 28 January 2004, RAJ 2004 (1) no. 153 p. 305). In contrast, it is not necessary for the courts to resort to such a “circuitous route” in the event that the damage is encompassed within the scope of application of CC art. 1908(2). This is due to the fact that this provision already provides for strict liability (Díez-Picazo and Gullón loc. cit.; Álvarez Lata, La responsabilidad civil por daños al medio ambiente[3], 1917; TS 15 March 1993, RAJ 1993 (2) no. 2284 p. 2958; TS 24 May 1993, RAJ 1993 (2) no. 3727 p. 4743; TS 14 March 2005, RAJ 2005 (2) no. 2236 p. 4747). Liability is imposed on the owner for damage caused “by noxious fumes that are harmful to persons or property”. The disputable issue is, however, whether this liability can be extended to any kind of emission or whether it must remain restricted to ‘noxious fumes’. In general, the courts do not hesitate to apply this provision analogously to other emissions (e.g. TS 29 April 2003, RAJ 2003 (2) no. 3041 p. 5720; CA Valencia 26 March 2004, A.C. 2004 (2) no. 890 p. 248 [both on noise]; CA Alicante 15 March 2002, BDA JUR 2002/140080 [electromagnetic radiation]; CA Baleares 21 February 2005, BDA JUR 2005/118262 [humidity]). In contrast, views are split in legal commentary (in favour of an analogous application e.g. Cabanillas Sánchez, ADC 1993, 1957, 1969-1974; Moreno Martínez [-Algarra Prats], Perfiles de la responsabilidad civil en el nuevo milenio, 639; Martín Vida, InDret, 2/2005, p. 3; against e.g. Santos Morón, in FS Díez-Picazo II, 3015, 3022). Among the regulations pertaining to liability external to the Civil Code to which a certain importance has been conferred, include, inter alia, the Law on Civil Protection of the Rights to Honour, to Private Life and to one´s own Image. This is due to the fact that a number of courts have had recourse to its provisions regarding the protection of personality rights, in order to establish liability for excessive noise (TS 29 April 2003, RAJ 2003 (2) no. 3041 p. 5720). In addition, a specific regime of liability can be found in the Nuclear Energy Act (Ley 25/1964, de 29 de abril, reguladora de la energía nuclear, BOE no. 107, 4 May 1964). Moreover, regard must be had to the CATALAN CC arts. 546-13 and 546-14, which provide for liability for damage caused by wrongful emissions. Generally speaking, Spanish statutory law does not formally use the concept of 'keeper of the dangerous thing'; rather it tries to connect this sort of liability to ownership or possession. TS 20 May 2005, RAJ 2005 (5) no. 6693 p. 14224, however, applied CC art. 1902 to circumvent the wording of CC art. 1908 and to impose strict liability on a tenant for damage caused by the ignition of dangerous substances. According to case law of the Supreme Court, the observance of duties imposed by statute is no defence in the area of liability arising out of damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions (TS 24 May 1993, RAJ 1993 (2) no. 3727 p. 4743; TS 14 March 2005, RAJ 2005 (2) no. 2236 p. 4747).

4. The point of departure of ITALIAN law in respect of liability for environmental damage is the legislative scheme contained in Law of 8 July 1986, no. 349, establishing a Ministery for the Environment and laying down provisions pertaining to environmental damage (Istituzione del Ministero dell'ambiente e norme in materia di danno ambientale) art. 18 (see above Note II5 under VI.–2:209 (Burdens Incurred by the State upon Environmental Impairment)). This provision governs liability in respect of damage caused to the environment by a violation of a statutory provision, the tortfeasor must provide redress to the State. Tortious liability owed to private individuals remains unaffected by this Law; in other words loc. cit. art. 18 governs only "pure ecological damage" (see further Castronovo, La nuova responsabilità civile[3], 747). Both liability regimes can be applied cumulatively, in the event that damage is caused to the specific legally protected interests of the individual as well as to the environment (Cass.sez.un. 21 February 2002, no. 2515, Resp.civ. e prev. 2002, 385; 726; Cass. 3 February 1998, no. 1087, Danno e resp. 1998, 495). Apart from CC art. 2043, CC art. 2050 could provide another basis for the imposition of liability in respect of environmental damage. According to this provision "whoever causes injury to another in carrying out an activity which is inherently dangerous or by reason of the instruments employed to carry it out, shall be obliged to pay compensation unless he can prove that he took all the necessary measures to avoid the damage occurring". The notion of "dangerous activity" under CC art. 2050 connotes that the means employed to carry out the activity must be continous and organised, however it does not connote business organsation in the sense of commercial law? (Cass. 24 February 1983, no. 1425, Giust.civ.Mass. 1983, fasc. 1). Liability arising from injuries resulting from peaceful nuclear activities is governed by the Laws of the 31st December 1962, no.

1860; of 30 December 1965, no. 1704; vom 19 December 1969, no. 1008 and a number of supplementary Presidential Orders.

5. HUNGARIAN CC § 345(1)(third sentence) expressly states that the strict liability provided for in this provision (liability for dangerous activities) is also applicable to individuals, "who cause damage to other persons through activities that endanger the human environment". Handling hazardous substances or operating an installation from which dangerous emissions could escape, are examples denoting a dangerous activity under this provision (see further Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II[2], 596/2). Liability for damage in the field of nuclear energy is governed by the Law no. CXVI of 1996, liability for losses arising out of the mining operations is governed by Law no. XLVIII of 1993. "Dangerous operations" or "activities" under CC § 345(1) include inter alia, power stations, structures, mines, water works, gasworks, electricity power stations, electricity supply installations, handling explosions, radioactive substances and poisonous substances (unless small amounts, used only for household purposes, are involved; spraying fields with pesticides is considered to be a dangerous activity, of course, in particular, if this is carried out from an aeroplane: BH 1983/203 and BH 1987/437; Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II[2], 585-586; Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata I, 1246-1250, 1256-1257; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 109-111). However, medical radiation therapy is subject to the general rules pertaining to liability (Wellmann loc. cit. 585). Use of an open flame does not of itself denote a dangerous activity, (BH 1988/183), the use of a pyrotechnical device is by all means a dangerous activity (BH 2000/349; BH 1991/314). Furthermore, spread of corrosive substances through a supermarket is dangerous (BH 1993/678); the keeper of a helicopter is liable for noise (BH 1984/114). Further cases emerging from the extensive case law on the subject include cases where liability was imposed on an installation for vibrations (BH 1981/15), in respect of dangerous pesticides (BH 1981/413) and for excessive dust particles (BH 1973/71).

6. Under POLISH CC art. 435 § 1 a person operating on its own account an installation driven by natural forces (steam, natural gas, electricity, liquid fuels, etc.) is accountable for personal injury or damage to property, occasioned to anyone by the movement of the installation, unless the damage resulted from force majeur, the sole fault of the injured person or of a third person, for whom the person who runs the enterprise is not responsible. The same applies to installations producing or using explosives. This is a case of strict liability (Pietrzykowski [-Safjan], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 435 p. 1231) incurred usually by legal persons (not necessarily the owner, e.g. a lessee, Safjan loc. cit. 1233) operating a large installation such as operators of electric plants and transportation or building companies. The movement of the installation is interpreted broadly; it covers among other things cases of air pollution, piping off sewage (even below the norm – see SN 7 April 1970, OSPiKA 1971, poz. 169; Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 235), and noise pollution. The application of CC art. 435 is extended to mining installations (with some modifications – see Geological and Mining Law arts. 93 ff) and installations which, due to the quantity or quality of accumulated dangerous substances, create a danger of a serious industrial breakdown (even if the installation is not driven by natural forces and even if its activity is exercised on the basis and within the confines of an administrative decision: Protection of the Environment Law arts. 324 and 325). Where the damage was caused by the latter type of installation, the aggrieved party (in the case of damage to the environment as a common good: the State, local government or an ecological organisation) may claim from the person liable inter alia in respect of taking preventive measures; if those measures are impossible or excessively difficult he may claim cessation of the dangerous activity (loc. cit. art. 323). Liability for nuclear damage is regulated separately by Atomic Law arts. 100 ff. A special regime for prevention and reparation of damage to the environment caused by an activity creating the risk of such damages is established by Prevention and Repair of Damages to the Environment Law arts. 1 ff. BULGARIAN Environmental Protection Act art. 170 contains a general principle that damage to the environment, which is culpably inflicted by the State, local authorites or private (natural or legal) persons, must be compensated. According to § 1 nos. 5 and 6 of the supplementary provisions of the Environmental Protection Act damage that is recoverable encompasses damage that appears as a result of physical, chemical or biological processes. Damage which occurs despite compliance with statutory reglations is also encompassed within this provision. The notion of "damage to the environment" connotes a change to the ecological balance in the area, leading to the impairment of the standard of living, leading to a poorer biological diversity or leads to a lasting adverse impact on the natural ecological system. The damages claim is supplemented by injunctive relief (mandatory and prohibitory) (Environmental Liability Act art. 171).

who must generally tolerate emissions emanating from a neighbouring property, may be entitled to claim compensation from the user of that property, provided that the emissions unreasonably interfere with the common use of the land at that location or the income that he derives from the property. The Federal Emission Control Act § 14 second sentence permits the owner of property to claim damages, provided that a number of additional requisites are satisified in the case that the detrimental impact emantes from an installation on a neighbouring property, where the licence to operate has become final. In the context of a cause of action under CC § 823(1), the courts try to accomodate the interests of the claimant, in they have relaxed the requirements in respect of the allocation of the burden of proof. This relaxation of the rules of evidence also has import for the question of causation, for example, significant in a decision where the defendant polluter exceeded the emission and immission limits (essentially BGH 18 September 1984, BGHZ 92, 143, 147).

8. In the mid 1990s, proposals were advanced advocating the adoption of an Austria Environmental Liability Act, yet these recommendations did not herald concrete legislative action. Consequently, the Austrian legal position remains governed by the provisions of the Civil Code and a number of additional specific statutes. According to CC § 364(2) an owner of property can prohibit emissions (liquid effluents, smoke, heat, smells, noise, vibrations and other emissions of comparable impact) emanating from a neighbouring property, if and to the extent that they exceed the amount that is customary for that area and significantly impair the use of the land that is customary in that location. CC § 364a adds, that, in the event that a licence to emit has been granted, the claimant is only entitled to damages. Based on this, the inference is drawn that under CC § 364 the claimant is entitled to assert a claim to prohibitory injunctive relief as well as a claim for damages and this claim is actionable regardless of the presence of fault (Jabornegg, ÖJZ 1983, 365 and Gimpel-Hinteregger, ÖJZ 1991, 145). An array of special Acts pertaining to liability for particularly dangerous activites and Acts geared towards protecting particularly important environmental interests complete the regime (e.g. Act on the Liability for Nuclear Facilities Act § 11, Forestry Act § 54, Mining Act § 185, Act relating to Water Use § 26 and Aviation Act § 148). These specific Acts in turn are regarded as being suspectible to analogous application; corresepondingly they have been deemed to apply in cases where the damage is caused by comparable dangerous activites (essentially OGH 28 March 1973, SZ 46/36; see further OGH 25 July 2000, SZ 73/118). An operation is “dangerous”, if the operator is permitted, in the collective interest, to conduct operations, which would of themselves be prohibited, if sole regard was had to the legal interests of another at risk from the operation (OGH 24 October 1985, JBl 1986, 525), e.g. igniting a firework (OGH 28 March 1973 loc. cit.), operating a munitions factory or high voltage equipment (OGH 2 April 1954, SZ 25/84), and operation of plants and installations where harmful gasses and matter are generated (OGH 20 February 1958, SZ 31/26 [magnesite plant]; OGH 16 July 1998, SZ 71/126 [chlorine-hydrocarbon plant]). However, it should be noted that not every industrial or manufacturing operation is per se “dangerous” (OGH 25 July 2000, SZ 73/118 [Hotel]).

9. According to GREEK Law 1650/1986 art. 29 “every natural or legal person who pollutes or otherwise damages the environment is liable to pay damages unless he can prove that the damage could be attributed to force majeure or occured due to the intentional culpable act of a third party”. This provision is one of strict liability (Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Diakio III, 365; Dimopoulou, Evthini apo diakindinevsi, 240; Karakostas, Perivallon kai Astiko Dikaio, 334). The concepts of “pollution” and “damage to the environment” are defined in loc. cit. art. 2. According to prevailing Greek academic opinion, the damage must be capable of being attributed to a source of danger which poses a particularly high risk to the environment. Extending beyond the wording of the statutory provision, an additional requirement is that damage resulted from a danger typically associated with the possession or operation of a potential source of pollution or damage (Dimopoulou loc. cit. 242; Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio I, 702). Every person who suffers injury to their person or damage to property is entitled to assert a claim. The State also has a claim for the costs involved in remedying environmental damage (Dimopoulou loc. cit. 241; Georgiades loc. cit.). In addition, CC art. 57 (Protection of Personality) and the fundamental basic norm of tort law (CC art. 914), together with the law pertaining to the respective interests of neighbours (CC art. 1003) are of considerable relevance. In respect of oil pollution at sea, the owner of the ship is strictly liable under Law 314/1976. Similarly, harm caused by the peaceful use of nuclear energy is governed by a special regime of liability operating to the detriment of the operator of the relevant nuclear facility (Legislative Decree 336/1969, amended by Law 1758/1988; on this point Dimopoulou loc. cit. 252).

10. PORTUGUESE CC art. 493(2) establishes liability for damage which is caused by a dangerous activity; liability is grounded on a rebuttable presumption of fault. Dangerous activity? is denoted by e.g. the manufacture of explosives, the treatment or examination of patients with short waves or X-rays, transporting oil or petrol (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 595; CA Oporto 9 February 2006; STJ 12 February 2004), conveying high tension energy supply via overland pipelines (STJ 25 March 2004; CA Oporto 3 February 2004; STJ 10 July 2003) and lighting a firework (STJ 17 June 2004). The keeper (detentor) can excuplate himself of liability if he proves that in the circumstances of the case all due diligence was exercised to prevent the onset of the damage (Antunes Varela loc. cit.). In contrast, CC art. 509(1) does not permit any investigation of fault and provides that "a person who has the effective direction of an installation aimed at conducting or delivering electric energy or gas, and utilises it in their own interest, is accountable for damage which may arise from the conduction or delivery of electricity or gas, as much as for damage resulting from the installation itself, except if at the time of the accident the latter is in accordance with the binding technical rules and in a perfect maintenance state". This provision is not simply concerned with damage resulting from the supply of energy or gas (on this point Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 92 [1960] 139; STJ 25 March 2004; CA Lisbon 22 October 1973, BolMinJus 230 [1973] 155), it also governs damage which results from the generation of electricity or gas or from its storage (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 599; CA Lisbon 8 January 1975, BolMinJus 243 [1975] 318; see, however, CA Coimbra 15 January 1991, CJ XVI [1991-1] 47). The operator of the installation incurs liabilty (Almeida Costa loc. cit.); he can exonerate himself from liability under the same prerequistes as those detailed under VI.–3:206(5)(b) (see further Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 525, note 1 under art. 509; Vaz Serra loc. cit.; STJ 18 April 1996, CJ [ST] IV [1996-2] 26; see also STJ 25 March 2004 [where, however, liability was confirmed due to the infringement of a statutory safety regulation]). An additional ground providing a defence to the imposition of liability is force majeure (CC art. 509(2)): an example would be the uprooting of a pylon on account of entirely exceptional stormy conditions (Almeida Costa loc. cit. 600; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela loc. cit. note 2; see STJ 5 June 1985, BolMinJus 348 [1985] 397). Liability under CC art. 509 will not be imposed on consumers who have errected electrical installations for their private use; this corresponds to the regulation in VI.–3:206(5)(a) (see further Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela loc. cit. note 3 under art. 509; Antunes Varela loc. cit. 713). Strict liability (however, solely strict liability) is capped (CC arts. 510 and 508(1)). There is a specific regulation in CC art. 1346 in respect of relations between neighbours. This provision governs emissons which endure for some time and are of a particular intensity (Mesquita, Direitos Reais, 143-145; STJ 3 December 1992; STJ 7 April 2005).

11. DUTCH CC art. 6:175 imposes strict liability on the keeper of a substance (see further Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 192a, p. 206). The concept of "substance" in liability law extends beyond the legal definiton of "thing" under property law (Memorie van Toelichting, Tweede Kamer 1988-1989, Kamerstukken no. 21202, p. 13; Onrechtmatige Daad II [-Oldenhuis], art. 6:173, no. 28 p. 95). Together with solid substances, the provision also regulates gasses and fluids. The substance could be a basic element, adjuvant substance, crude oil, finished product or waste material. Radiation and electricity are not regarded as substances (the latter is incorporated within the concept of product): Oldenhuis loc. cit. art. 6:174 no. 25 p. 117). Similarly, blood plasma, ampules and intravenous liquids are governed by product liability and are not subject to the rules governing liability in respect of dangerous substances (CC art. 173(2)); Bacteria and virus cultures are regulated by the latter. "Dangerous substances" are substances of which is is known that they possess properties which pose a particular danger of a serious type for persons or things. The Law on Substances Dangerous to the Environment provides guidance, (Stb 1985, 639) art. 34(3); CC art. 6:175(1) incidentially, mentions explosive, oxidative, flammable and poisonous substances. In any event a substance is "known" to exhibit dangerous properties, if the substance is statutorily classified as dangerous (CC art. 6:175(6)). Substances, which are carried by pipes are subject to an independent regime (CC art. 6:174; on this point see CFI Utrecht 30 January 1998, NedJur (kort) 1999, no. 29). The defences to liability (force majeure and comparable situations, including mandatory statutory regulations) are governed in CC art. 6:178.

12. Under ESTONIAN law, strict liability for environmental damage is based primarily on CC § 1058 in conjunction with CC § 1056. The former provision, however, does not adhere to the approach of imposing liability on the possessor or operator. Rather, CC § 1058 imposes strict liability on the owner of a dangerous structure or thing. Furthermore, this liability makes no distinction between private and commercial use. In contrast the specifications in, on the one hand CC § 1058(1), and on the other VI.–3:206(2) and (3), are largely similar. CC § 1058(4) corresponds largely to VI.–3:206(5)(b).

13. It is impossible overlook the legal provisions relating to liability for environmental damage in the NORDIC Countries. SWEDEN Environmental Code chap. 32 provides for liability for personal injury, loss resulting from property damage and pure economic loss (§ 1) caused by (§ 3) pollution of water areas, pollution of groundwater, changes in the groundwater level, air pollution, land pollution, noise, vibration, or other similar disturbances, such as heat, strong light, bacteria, insects. It has been held that a pure economic loss suffered from the restriction of access to a business during construction work is repairable damage (HD 1 November 1996, NJA 1996, 634). In another case damages were awarded, where excavation work was carried out to avert the torrent of water from one property during heavy rainfall, causing flooding on another property (Environmental Appellate Court 22 December 2006, MÖB M 1785/06). Environmental Code chap. 32 §§ 4-5 provide for claims for damages for loss or injury caused by blasting or excavating work. Loc. cit. chap. 10 entails rules on strict liability of the operator, and, subsidiarily, of the property owner, for environmental clean-up, including costs incurred by the state. Damages for loss or injury suffered from electric currents are regulated under Electricity Act (1997:857) chap. 10, providing strict liability for the operator of the electrical installation from which the electricity last came. Nuclear Liability Act (1968:45) § 5 provides for strict liability of the operator of a nuclear installation. Liability under Environmental Code chap. 32 requires that an activity (see on this notion e.g. Environmental Appellate Court 11 January 2007, MÖB M 9741/05) on immovable property caused loss or injury to its surroundings (loc. cit. § 1), thus excluding e.g. damage to the owner himself caused by his tenant (HD 3 October 2003, NJA 2003, 384). The source of the emission must have a connection with an immovable (noise from airplanes flying low over a suburban area falls outside the scope of loc. cit. chap. 32; it covers however noise from a nearby airport: Environmental Appellate Court 8 November 2002, MÖD 2002 DM 92; Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 330). Where the Environmental Code does not apply, other regimes may fill the gap, such as the Act concerning liability for damages in the course of aviation (1922:382) (see HD 11 May 1945, NJA 1945, 210: strict liability for noise from an airplane causing damage to animals); the Traffic Act (1975:1410) (e.g. oil spills from a truck causing damage) and the Maritime Code (oil pollution: chap. 10). If no such special regime applies, damages may be sought under the general culpa rule or under the more general rules on strict liability for 'dangerous activities' (Hellner, JT 1991/92, 646-650; Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 181; Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 36). Unless intent or negligence can be attributed to the causation of the loss or injury, all claims for damages are subjected to a test of whether the emission should be tolerated by the claimant with regard to local conditions or the general presence of the emission under similar circumstances (Environmental Code chap. 32 § 1(3); see HD 20 March 1975, NJA 1975, 155; HD 30 June 1977, NJA 1977, 424; HD 26 July 1988, NJA 1988, 376 and HD 14 June 1999, NJA 1999, 385). Instances involving intent or negligence, whereby this test does not apply, may inter alia include unauthorized activities, non-compliance with an authorization for an activity, emissions which could have been prevented through relatively inexpensive measures, emissions which were brought to the defendant's attention, although the mere fact that the defendant was aware of the emission does not per se imply negligence (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 333). Specific rules facilitate the proof of causation (loc. cit. § 3), whereby a damage shall be deemed to have been caused by a disturbance if, in view of the nature of the disturbance and its adverse effects, other possible causes and any other circumstances, the balance of probability indicates that the disturbance was the cause (see HD 29 December 1992, NJA 1992, 896). An insurance scheme exists under Environmental Code chap. 33 for cases where liability under chap. 32 exists but cannot be executed, e.g. due to insolvent or unidentifiable defendants.

14. DANISH Environmental Damage Liability Act (lov om erstatning for miljøskader) § 1 provides for strict liability for personal injury, loss resulting from property damage, pure economic loss, and costs for preventing damage or restoring the environment, caused by pollution of water, air, soil, underground, or interferences from disturbance, vibrations or similar emissions (Pagh, Miljøansvar, 34, 145). Damage must be caused in the course of a commercial or public activity of a certain specified type (the Act enlists eleven categories). This is intended to create a transparent strict liability regime for activities carrying a high risk for the environment (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 193). An emission must not be insignificant, having regard to what normally or reasonably can be expected to be tolerated under similar circumstances (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 196). The defendant has a defence, if the damage is caused by an activity which was exercised in accordance with compulsory prescriptions ordered by a public authority (loc. cit. § 3(2)), the mere permission of a certain type of activity does not itself amount to such defence. Proof of causation follows general principles. Liability rests with the operator. An insurance scheme has not been enacted. Recent case law has primarily dealt with polluters' and property owners' non-statutory liability for environmental clean-up costs incurred by public authorities, where strict liability was consistently rejected (HD UfR 1991, 674; UfR 1995, 505; UfR 1998, 549; UfR 2001, 1709). The current Environment Protection Act (lov om miljøbeskyttelse) however has introduced strict liability also towards the public authorities in regard of their clean-up costs (§§ 69-70). Soil Pollution Act (lov om forurenet jord) § 41 also provides for strict liability for costs incurred by the public authorities. It targets all commercial or public activities regardless of their nature, and also other persons if negligence or stricter accountability under another statute can be attributed to them. These regulations concern public enforcement, based on injunctions and reimbursements of the authorities' costs. The Environmental Damage Liability Act thus only concerns damage or injury to private persons. Other statutes may also provide for a (specific) strict liability regime, e.g. Maritime Act (søloven) § 191, Traffic Act (faerdselloven) § 101, Aviation Traffic Act (luftfartsloven), Nuclear Liability Act (atomskadeloven) and Electrical Power Act (lov om elektriske stærkstrømsanlæg og elektrisk materiel). A sort of strict liability may also come into play under the law concerning neighbours (e.g. HD 8 February 1996, UfR 1996, 661; HD 1 December 1998, UfR 1999, 360; HD 14 February 2005, UfR 2005, 1551). Non-statutory strict liability has also been established for certain specific activities, in particular for excavation work and similar activities (HD 10 January 1968, UfR 1968, 84, HD 24 June 1983, UfR 1983, 714; Gjerulff, UfR 1968 B, 333; Pontoppidan, UfR 1984 B, 50) and for damage caused by the breaking of main water, gas and sewage pipes (HD 18 August 1983, UfR 1983, 866; HD 2 September 1983, UfR 1983, 895; HD 23 May 2000, UfR 2000, 1779; Gomard, Moderne Erstatningsret, 74, Hellner, JT 1991/92, 646-650); in contrast strict liability was rejected in HD 13 November 1987, UfR 1988, 19 for a gas explosion caused by a small gas installation in a private summer house. The scope for non-statutory strict liability is however limited; there is no general principle on strict liability for 'dangerous activities' (Gomard loc. cit. 83)

15. FINNISH Environmental Damage Compensation Act (737/1994) § 5 provides for strict liability for personal injury, loss resulting from property damage, pure economic loss (if it is not insignificant), and also other environmental damage caused by water, air or soil pollution; noise, by vibration, radiation, light, heat or smell, or by any similar disturbance. Prevention and clean-up cost of public authorities or other organisations may also be compensated (loc. cit. § 6). The notion of emission includes e.g. dust from a sand-blasting operation causing damage to a parked car and personal injury to its driver (Supreme Court 13 December 1999, HD 1999:124). Emissions must relate to an activity on a specific area, causing damage to its surroundings (loc. cit. § 1), implying a link to immovable property although the activity must not necessarily be of a long-lasting nature (Wetterstein, SvJT 1993, 737). Other activities may trigger strict liability under e.g. Maritime Act (1994/674) chap. 10 (Wetterstein, JFT 2007, 119), the Traffic Insurance Act (1959/279), the Air Traffic Act (1995/281) and under Water Act chap. 11 § 2 (strict liability for activities causing damage due to a defective installation). The Act Concerning Certain Respective Interests of Neighbours (1920/26), although subsidiary to the Environmental Damage Compensation Act, covers certain less significant disturbances. Electricity Safety Act (1996/410) chap. 7 and the Nuclear Liability Act (1972/484) constitute leges specialis. Accidents caused by breaks in sewage and water pipes have also in Finland given rise to non-statutory strict liability, with force majeure as defence (Supreme Court 21 February 1980, HD 1980:20; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 238). Damages under the Environmental Damage Compensation Act are only awarded if it is considered unreasonable to tolerate the disturbance, unless it was caused by intent or criminal behaviour; the counter-exceptions being personal injury and property damage of a not insignificant extent (§

4; see Supreme Court 20 September 2004, HD 2004:87). Environmental Damage Compensation Act § 3 facilitates proof of causation. The Environmental Damage Insurance Act (81/1998) guarantees full compensation for environmental damage in cases where the liable person is either insolvent or cannot be identified.

VI.–3:207: Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage

A person is also accountable for the causation of legally relevant damage if national law so provides where it:

(a) relates to a source of danger which is not within VI.–3:104 (Accountability for damage caused by children or supervised persons) to VI.–3:205 (Accountability for damage caused by motor vehicles);

(b) relates to substances or emissions; or

(c) disapplies VI.–3:204 (Accountability for damage caused by defective products) paragraph (4)(e).

COMMENTS

A. Policy considerations

Wide-ranging national law on strict liability; international treaties. The laws of the Member States on non-contractual liability for damage adopt differing standpoints on the issue of which matters should be the subject of accountability without intention or negligence. Hence the Articles under Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence) which have so far been discussed only contain rules for those matters which according to the predominant European legal view ought to be subject to a regime of strict liability. Beyond this, matters must be left to the national legal systems. That is equally true for the issues of liability which have already become the subject of international treaties unifying the law. Their myriad details and minutiae cannot be reproduced in model rules such as these. The rules could not address and do not aspire to address those matters of liability law which are unified by international treaty. A further consideration supporting this reticence is that for some matters, namely those of environmental liability law (e.g. in the area of oil pollution at sea) insurance and liability have been so closely tied up that a separate liability rule on these matters would not seem sound. In yet other areas of the law of reparation unified by international treaty the question may well be asked whether they actually form part of the law of non-contractual liability for damage. The law on the liability of innkeepers for things brought on to the premises is an example of that. In these rules this question is dealt with in Book IV, Part C in connection with contracts for storage (see IV.C.–5:110 (Liability of the hotel-keeper)).

Overview. This Article gives expression to the basic principle that a person is also accountable under these rules without intention or negligence if that person is subject to strict liability according to the applicable national law of a Member State. The word “also” makes it clear that one is concerned here with the causation of damage in circumstances in which there is no strict liability under VI.–3:201 to VI.–3:206. The relevant national non-contractual liability law must of course be applicable according to the private international law rules of the forum. That appeared so self-evident that it has not been mentioned expressly. On the other hand, it was necessary to spell out that the rules which this draft itself establishes for accountability without intention or negligence ought basically to be conclusive for the matters they address. Without this restriction it would be senseless to extend these rules to matters of strict liability. So the present Article circumscribes the referral to national law. It is only to be effective in three groups of cases, namely (i) where it is the realisation of a source of danger which is not already covered by VI.–3:104 (Accountability for damage caused by children or supervised persons) to VI.–3:205 (Accountability for damage caused by motor vehicles) which is at stake, (ii) where questions of environmental liability law are concerned, and (iii) where national product liability law recognises strict liability for development risks.

Legally relevant damage; national law. The provisions of Chapter 2 determine what is to be understood as a legally relevant damage in the context of this Article. The referral to "national" law includes a referral to national implementations of internationally unified liability law since international treaties as such bind the ratifying states. National implementation of Directives of the European Community are also "national law".

B. Details

Sub-paragraph (a). The rules in VI.–3:104 (Accountability for damage caused by children or supervised persons) are also conceived as being exhaustive for their field of application. In other words these rules adopt the position that there is to be no strict liability of parents (VI.–3:104(3)). They do not regard the fact that people have children as being a sufficient ground of liability. The reference to VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives) has the effect, for example, that there can be no going behind the proposition implied there which rules out a strict liability for the conduct of employees who cause damage other than "in the course of their employment". It follows from the references to VI.–3:202 to VI.–3:205 that the strict liability set out there may not be extended to damage which is only legally relevant in cases of intention or negligence.

Examples. Dangers which are not addressed by the Articles referred to in paragraph (a) include, for example, the danger envisaged by the rule in Council Directive 2004/113/EC of 13 December 2004 implementing the principle of equal treatment between men and women in the access to and supply of goods (OJ L 373/37 of 21 December 2004). The Directive makes provision regarding unwanted conduct related to the sex of a person with the purpose or effect of violating the dignity of a person (art. 2(c)). VI.–3:207 sub-paragraph (a) also embraces those cases in which the liable person (from a purely objective point of view) has infringed a statute which requires compliance with a certain standard of safety (e.g. in respect of safety of machinery in a factory) independent of any considerations as to want of care, and liability for the accident turns only on the fact that the required measure of safety was not in place. "Breach of statutory duty" in this specific sense is not negligence, but rather a form of strict liability. The source of danger which is at issue in VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives) is labour under the control of the person accountable. Consequently there remains scope under sub-paragraph (a) of the present Article for a strict liability for independent contractors or sub-contractors and for mere casual helpers. Similarly VI.–3:205 (Accountability for damage caused by motor vehicles) relates to the dangers arising from motor vehicles but is silent as regards other dangerous vehicles and machines (e.g. a crane, or a concrete mixer or a shredder making wood chips out of tree branches). Railways, aircraft and watercraft are expressly excluded from the scope of that Article by its second paragraph. Consequently the present Article creates scope for strict liability in those fields under the applicable national law. That applies even for movables which cannot even be described as a "machine" (e.g. weapons of all sorts) and it applies also for movables which are not inherently dangerous (such as, for example, bicycles, tables or items of sports equipment).

Sub-paragraph (b). There is also broad scope for supplementary strict liability under national law by virtue of sub-paragraph (b). The provision gives expression to the proposition that VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions) only covers the core component of rules on environmental liability. Beyond that core it neither intrudes into special regimes (nuclear civil liability, oil pollution at sea, etc) nor purports to develop a conclusive set of rules for legally relevant damage in the context of liability without intention or negligence.

Sub-paragraph (c). Finally, sub-paragraph (c) translates into the language of these rules the principle in Council Directive 85/374/EEC art. 15(1)(b): see Comments under VI.–3:204 (Accountability for damage caused by defective products).

1. For an earlier consideration of the differing positions adopted by the national legal orders with respect to the forms of accountability without intention and negligence, see the comparative legal note prefacing this Chapter,as regards the gardien-liability of FRENCH law please see also Note II15 unter VI.–3:104 (Accountability for damage caused by children or supervised) and Note 1 under the previous Article. Given the previous analysis, the ensuing notes only deal with a number of ancillary matters.
2. As regards SPAIN, note must be taken of an array of additional strict liability provisions. CC art. 1910 imposes liability on the head of the household for damage caused by things that fall down or are thrown from there. Negligence on the part of the defendant is not a requirement (TS 14 April 1984, RAJ 1984 (1) no. 1958 p. 1490; TS 20 April 1993, RAJ 1993 (2) no. 3103 p. 3975; TS 26 June 1993, RAJ 1993 (3) no. 5383 p. 6869). The expression "head of the household" has been broadly interpreted; for example ,the possessor/occupier of a night club is also liable under CC art. 1910, if a client loses his eye owing to an object being thrown at him by an unknown assailant (TS 21 May 2001, RAJ 2001 (4) no. 6464 p. 10039). CC art. 1908(3) imposes strict liability on the owner of a tree located in areas of passage, see e.g. TS 17 March 1998, RAJ 1998 (1) no. 1122 p. 1783. Hunting Act (Ley 1/1970 of 4 April 1970, BOE no. 82 of 6 April 1970) art. 33(5) imposes strict liability on hunters, see CA Palencia 9 October 1996, AC 1996 (3) no. 1838 p. 246 ("quasi-strict liability"). ConsProtA art. 148 introduces an additional strict liability regime (former Ley 26/1984 of 19 July para la defensa de consumidores y usuarios) art. 28. This provision retains significance, even following the transposition of the Product Liability Directive, especially for specific medical services (see Reglero Campos [-Asua González], Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 1219-1226) and transport law (Reglero Campos [-Álvarez Lata] loc. cit. 1961, 1979-1980). To conclude, mention must also be made of the specific regime of nuclear liability under the Nuclear Energy Act (Ley 25/1964 of 29 April reguladora de la energía nuclear, BOE no. 107 of 4 May 1964).
3. ITALIAN tort law adopts a divergent approach to these Principles, namely in that it has codified a discrete basis for liability in respect of the carrying out of a dangerous activity under CC art. 2050. According to this provision, liability is imposed on a person who causes loss to another in the exercise of an activity which of itself or by reason of the means employed to carry it out is considered dangerous unless that person proves that all necessitated measures were adopted to avoid the damage occuring. For example, organising a premier division football game connotes a dangerous activity, when rampaging fans and throwing of smoke bombs are, (CFI Torino 11 November 2004, Danno e resp. 2006, 767), likewise CA Rome 7 March 2005, Danno e resp. 2005, 641 marketing of cigarettes. CC art. 2051 prescribes further that a person is liable for damage arising from things in his custody, unless he proves that the damage derived from a chance event. A person having the actual factual control over the thing is regarded as custodian of the thing (Cass. 18 February 2000, no. 1859, Danno e resp. 2000, 390; Cass.sez.un. 11 November 1991, no. 12019, Giur.it. 1992, I, 1, 2218). The range of potential defendants under CC art. 2051 include e.g. the rail operator who is liable for dangers on the platform or footbridge caused by inclement weather conditions (Cass. 10 July 2005, no. 14091, Giur.it. 2006, I, 1, 1378).

4. In a similar manner HUNGARIAN strict liability law also harnesses the categories of liability for dangerous operations and liability for dangerous activities (CC § 345). Consequently, in Hungary, a further festoon of activies are subject to a regime of liability which does not depend on the presence of intention or negligence (blameworthiness); these activities cannot be exhaustively enumerated owing to the broad formulation of CC § 345 which is cognate to a general clause (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1242; Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II[2], 584-586; Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért[7], 102-104; Marton, A polgári jogi felelősség, 196-197; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan, 106-110; see in case law BH 2002/306 and BH 2005/251). For example, all types of motorised appliances and a whole arrray of tools (apart from household applicances and medical devices: Benedek loc. cit. 1242 and 1246; BH 1996/199), are subject to the regime of strict liability, furthermore the handling of weapons and explosives are subject to a strict liability regime, furthermore covering roofs, felling trees as well as errecting buildings and civil engineering works (Benedek loc. cit. 1249-1250; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 112). A whole array of specific statutes complement the provisions in the Civil Code, e.g. the Nuclear Energy Act, the Law pertaining to the Protection of Game, Game Managment and Hunting Act and Public Education Act.

5. According to POLISH CC art. 433 the occupier of a premises is liable for damage caused by the ejection, effusion or falling of any object from the premises. See also VI.–3:206, Note 6. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 156 imposes strict liability on the State or on those who should have prevented the damage, in the event that a person sustains personal injury arising from an act of terrorism or during the course of a public demonstration; in respect of the latter, the organisers are also liable (see further Juhart and Plavšak [-Pensa], no. 1 under art. 156, p. 903). Organisers of all types of mass events are subject to a strict liability regime in respect of personal injury arising from an "extraordinary occurrence" (panic outbreak; rush of spectators climb and traverse unchecked the crowd control fence at football grounds: Pravno mnenje občne seje VS RS, 21, 22 December 1987, Poročilo VS RS 2/87, 13) (LOA art. 157). In ROMANIA, large swaths of environmental liability law have been placed subject to a regime of objective liability under the Emergency Ordinance 68/2007 on environmental liability. The Nuclear Energy Liability Act (Act no. 703/2001) art. 4(1) is also an example of a provision laying down objective liability. Moreover, where judicial error forms the basis for tort liability (or does it signify an actual miscarriage of justice not sure here) (CCrimProc arts. 504-507) and as regards liability for unlawful administrative action (or misfeasance in public office?) the liability imposed is also objective, see Notes under VI.–7:103).

6. In GERMANY, a rail operator or operator of an elevated railway will be strictly liable for fatal or personal injuries or damage to property arising in connection with the operation of a railway (Liability Act § 1), in a similar fashion the keeper of aircraft incurs strict liability (Air Traffic Act § 33 (LuftVG)). According to the Medical Preparations Act § 84 a pharmeuctical untertaking incurs liablity, if the use of product placed in circulation causes death or causes substantial personal injury to another. A further specific regime in respect of game is contained in § 29 of the Federal Hunting Act.

7. With respect to the prevailing law in AUSTRIA please see the previous discussion in Note 8 under VI.–3:206. Alongside the actio de effusis vel ejectis . CC § 1318 provides for the imposition of strict liability for dangerously placed objects if these items fall from a dwelling (examples include an advertising board, flower pot etc.). CC § 1318 is correspondingly employed for water damage (defective dishwashers or washing machines, cracked aquariums). A number of important provisions in specific Acts place strict liability for certain fields of activity on a statutory footing and are found in the Nuclear Energy Act § 11, Forestry Act § 54, Mining Act § 185, Water Rights Act § 26, Aviation Act § 148 and Pipeline Act § 10. Austrian federal law is also familar with such ad hoc statutes, regulation of hunting being one such example.

8. GREEK law provides for further forms of strict liability in the field of air transport law. The Air Transportation Code [Law 1815/1988] art. 106 provides for liability of the air carrier for personal injury incurred by passengers aboard domestic flights (see Dimopoulou, I evthini apo diakindinevsi, 121); loc. cit. art. 117 sets forth a corresponding claim for persons who are on the ground (see Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio I, 696). Employer's liability for work related accidents of employees is also a case of strict liability and is regulated in Law 551/1915 (Dimopoulou loc. cit. 136); however, a social security scheme was implemented to cover this field of liability (Georgiades loc. cit. 698). Law 314/1976 pertaining to oil pollution at sea, nuclear energy law (Dimopoulou loc. cit. 251) and the Law 563/1977 concerning liability for damage caused by space objects (Dimopoulou loc. cit. 257) are further instances of ad hoc strict liabilty provisions.

9. Similarly, a copious number of strict liability provisions remain to be considered under PORTUGUESE law (i.e. ancillary to those provisions already examined in the Notes pertaining to VI.–3:201-3:206), to some extent integrated within the Civil Code, otherwise can be found in various ad hoc statutes. Under CC art. 1347(3), the owner of constructions, installations or deposits of corrosive substances is liable independent of fault for damage caused by them. It is important to note that CC art. 493(2) (on liability for dangerous activities, see Note 10 under VI.–3:206) has been given a wide scope of application. For example, this provision has been held to apply to the organisers of large sporting events (STJ 17 November 2005). Further strict liability regimes can be encountered in numerous specific statutes which have not been integrated within the Civil Code, inter alia the Labour Code arts. 120g, 239, 281, Hunting Act art. 33(1) (see STJ 10 October 2002) and Ultra-light (non-motorised) Aircraft Decree Law art. 14(1). DUTCH CC arts. 6:176 and 6:177 are discrete provisions where strict liability is attached to the operation of dumping grounds and drilling holes. Additionally, by virtue of CC art. 7:658(1) a strict liability regime exists to render the employer liable for damage arising from an unsafe work environment (see further HR 10 December 1999, NedJur 2000 no. 211 p. 1376; HR 17 November 2000, NedJur 2001, no. 596 p. 4376; HR 26 January 2001, NedJur 2001, no. 597 p. 4393; HR 15 December 2000, NedJur 2001, no. 198 p. 1306; HR 4 May 2001, NedJur 2001, no. 377 p. 2814 and HR 29 June 2001, NedJur 2001, no. 476 p. 3556).

10. Likewise, further additional expositions of strict liability can be found in the NORDIC countries. They include regulations pertaining damage arising in the course of transport by plane, rail and ship (in respect of SWEDEN please see the Act concerning liability for damage caused in the course of aviation [1922:382], Railway Traffic Act [1985:192] chap. 5 § 1 and Maritime Code chaps. 7 and 10; for DENMARK Aviation Traffic Act (luftfartsloven), Railway Act (jernbaneloven) chap. 7 and Maritime Act (søloven) § 191; and for FINLAND Air Traffic Act [1995/281], Railway Traffic Liability Act [1999/113] and Maritime Act [1994/674] chaps. 7 and 10). The general tenor of liability for individual loss arising from damage to the environment in SWEDEN and FINLAND can have a considerably more wide ranging reach than these Principles, in particular in that pure economic loss is captured (e.g. Swedish Supreme Court 1 November 1996, NJA 1996, 634). It may also be noted that, in a number of cases, the FINNISH Environmental Damage Compensation Act § 7 allows for liability to be imposed on the natural person which is controlled by the legal person, this entails that the natural person incurs liability when the relevant installation is formally operated by the legal person (Finnish Supreme Court 22 March 2001, HD 2001:61). Moreover, the trinity of Nordic Countries have developed rules of strict liability for damage arising from excavations and similar construction work. There is also a special regime in respect of damage arising from fractured water and sewage pipes.

VI.–3:208: Abandonment

For the purposes of this Section, a person remains accountable for an immovable, vehicle, substance or installation which that person abandons until another exercises independent control over it or becomes its keeper or operator. This applies correspondingly, so far as reasonable, in respect of a keeper of an animal.

COMMENTS

A. First sentence

Purpose of the rule. This Article adds a clarification for the purposes of VI.–3:202 (Accountability for damage caused by the unsafe state of an immovable), VI.–3:203 (Accountability for damage caused by animals), VI.–3:205 (Accountability for damage caused by motor vehicles) and VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions). The point in time for which status as owner, keeper or occupier is material is essentially the moment when the event causing the damage occurs. This Article makes an exception to that basic rule. No-one should be able to avoid responsibility as owner, keeper or occupier simply by abandonment.

Abandonment. "Abandonment" presupposes an intentional and voluntary act which is directed towards giving up control of the thing. The unintended loss of a thing is not an abandonment. Nor is there an abandonment when another's property is returned properly, e.g. when a motor vehicle is parked by its temporary keeper at a given car park, as agreed with the owner, in order that the latter can drive it away from there later. Equally the correct disposal of a thing or substance is not an abandonment because in such a case the thing or substance passes without hiatus into another's control. By contrast, a person who simply leaves an old, but still fully functional, vehicle at the side of the road or lets an installation or plant become derelict without taking measures to safeguard it or who tips dangerous substances on to a rubbish dump, buries them somewhere in the countryside or lets them sink into a pond, remains responsible for that thing, even if no longer its keeper at this point in time.

B. Second sentence

Animals. The same starting point applies also to animals, but requires qualification by a reasonableness test. This is necessary to take account, for example, of wild animals which have been raised in captivity, but with a view to their reintroduction into the wild, and animals which have run away and can no longer be recaptured.

NOTES

1. Pursuant to FRENCH law "abandoned" objects (res derelictae) are things which are ownerless or without a keeper; consequently, no person can be made accountable for the ensuing damage (le Tourneau and Cadiet, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2006/2007], no. 7695). The feasibility of renouncing ownership is derived from an analogous application of CC arts. 656, 699, 917 and 2172, culminating in a release from obligations tied to ownership (Zenati and Revet, Les biens[2], no. 202 p. 242). This premise essentially applies also in respect of liability for animals pursuant to CC art. 1385. In general property in ownerless things accrues to the State (CC arts. 539 and 713; Code général de la propriété des personnes publiques art. L. 1122-1 and 1123-1).

There is a scarcity of case law in respect of the liability for res derelictae. Cass.civ. 18 June 1997, Bull.civ. 1997, II, no. 197 p. 116 concerned an abandoned warhead in a mine which had not been operated in eight years. The claimant picked it up and succeded in manipulating it in such a manner that it denotated, resulting in severe injury. It was held that while the quarry belonged to the commune, it could not be said that the commune was the gardien; on the contrary the injured party himself was its gardien. Similary, according to the prevailing view in BELGIUM res derelictae are, as a general rule regarded as res nullius, i.e things which do not have a keeper (Dalcq, Responsabilité civile I^2, no. 2090). As a consequence liability is excluded pursuant to CC art. 1384(1) (Dalcq loc. cit. no. 2042).

2. In SPAIN the basic rule provides that a person who has legally abandoned a thing and therefore renounced their property right no longer has the duty of care that ownership requires or involves (Albadalejo, Derecho Civil, III[1]^8, 231-232). That implies, for instance, that the owner or possessor of an animal, once the animal was abandoned, will not be liable for damage caused by the latter under CC art. 1905 (Albaladejo [-Pantaleón Prieto], Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales VIII[1], art. 610 p. 187). Nevertheless, damage caused by a thing which was abandoned may be attributed to the conduct of the former owner or former possessor under the general rule on non-contractual liability (CC art. 1902, see Albadalejo loc. cit. 232, fn. 5; Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Miquel González], Código Civil II^2, 1232). In respect of waste, some provisions within the autonomous legislation of the regions establish a specific liability regime (see, for instance, Ley Comunidad de Madrid 5/2003 of 20 May de residuos de la Comunidad de Madrid, BOE of 29 May 2003, art. 25(6) [producers of waste substances remain liable for damage caused as long as they possess these substances] and Ley Parlamento de Galicia 10/1997 of 22 August de residuos sólidos urbanos art. 10 [all urban waste substances shall always have a keeper]). It must be stressed, however, that abandonment of a substance does not seem to play any significant role when determining liability (see e.g. TS 8 March 2006, RAJ 2006 (1) no. 1076 p. 2795: parental liability under CC art. 1903(2) for dangerous substances in a bottle which was probably abandoned by their children). Of course a distinction must be drawn beween moveable and immoveables. If ownership of an immoveable is renounced, then ownership then accrues (escheats?) to the State by virtue of law (Act on assets of the Public Administration [Ley 33/2003 of 3 November de patrimonio de las Administraciones públicas, BOE of 4 November 2003]) art. 17. Thus, the competent public administration becomes strictly liable for damage caused by an immovable that has been abandoned (loc. cit. art. 139).

3. Similarly in ITALY a differentiation is made betweem moveables and immoveable property. It can be educed CC art. 923(2), that ownership of a moveable can be renounced by means of a derelictio and hence acquires teh status of a res nullius. This circumstance alone does not alter the fact that a derelictio can also in the individual case simulataneously amount to a tort in particular cases which entails that the renounciation of ownership is not effected. This is the case e.g., if rubbish is not correctly disposed of or where it is sold illegally (Gambaro, Diritto di proprietà, 862-863). The liability of a person in ist capacity as custode of the thing ends as soon as the person relenquishes control over the thing. In respect of immoveables, italian law recognised what is commonly called abbandono liberatorio (CC arts. 888, 1070, 2858). This doctrine permits the owner to absolve himself of particular encumbrances or obligations in a number of defined circumstances. Naturally the property does not become ownerless but ownership is immediately vested in the new owner (e.g. in the case that the owner of a servient estate renounces ownership in favour of the owner of the dominant estate). In a case of abbandono semplice, as can be inferred from CC art. 827, ownerhip is immediately vested in the State (Gambaro loc. cit. 867-868).

4. Similarly, HUNGARIAN law takes cognisance of the derelictio, however its application is precluded in the case of registered land (CC § 112(2)). Incidentially there is no corresponding provision to VI.–3:208 in the Civil Code. Law no. LIII/1995 on the General Rules of Environmental Protection §§ 102(4) and 104 set forth specific provisions on liability for environmental damage for a company's legal successor. POLISH CC art. 340 provides that a temporary loss of possession will not interrupt the continuance of possession, hence this has an impact on all strict liability provisions which relate to the possession of a thing (CC arts. 434, 436 § 1). There is a presumption that possession endures continously. The possessor cannot excuplate himself from tortious liability by claiming that he assigned the running of the business to another (CC art. 429). The application of CC art. 431 § 1 extends the liability of the keeper to animals which have strayed. Derelictio is possible only in respect of movables (CC art. 180) in the form of an abandonment (an intention to abandon is required) which entails the loss of possession having an effect on all provisions of strict liability which are based on possession of a thing (CC arts. 434, 436 § 1). It is accepted within the framework of the provisions pertaining to the keeper's liability under ROMANIAN CC art. 1000(1) that the owner does not via derelictio forfeit his status as keeper, until another party acquires actual control and a congruent right of control over the thing (Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 187). There is correspondence between these provisions and the provisions dealing with liability for animals under CC art. 1001 (Lupan loc. cit. 221).

5. Pursuant to GERMAN Law ownership of land (CC § 928) as well as ownership of moveable property (CC § 959) can be renounced, hence the property becomes ownerless. As a general rule, the voluntary abandonment of goods is bound up with the relinquishment of the attribute of keeper. However, the argument has been advanced that pursuant to § 7(1) of the Road Traffic Act the former keeper retains responsibilty because the motor vehicle is not permitted to be keeperless in operation (Greger, Haftungsrecht des Straßenverkehrs[4], § 3, no. 274). The Environmental Liability Act § 2(2) provides, in respect to dangers posed to the environment by installations that liability will be incurred by the previous operator provided that the impact to the environment derives from a hazard, and the basis for the danger posed by the installation was already in place prior to the cessation of operations.

6. In AUSTRIA ownership of moveable property can be relinquished by a voluntary renouncement of possession (CC § 349); renouncing the ownership of rela property requires the deletion of the land registry entry (CC § 350). Renouncing ownership does not entail that any previous incurred obligation to pay damages or obligation to remove the harmful consequences is nullified (OGH 31 October 1968, JBl 1968, 568; Ertl, JBl 1974, 281, 342) nor does it follow that the defendant is relieved of his obligations in respect of the fulfillment of specific protective duties owed to the general public (Rummel [-Spielbüchler], ABGB I[3], § 387 no. 2). This holds true, e.g. in respect of the duty of the landowner to maintain and keep the property in proper condition. Ad hoc statutes, in particularly environmental statutes, clarify that the last keeper or proprietor remain liable, and hence cannot abdicate responsibility simply by means of voluntary renouncement of posession (e.g. Waste Management Act § 18).

7. Within the framework of the derelictio, a similar distinction is made in PORTUGAL between movable and immovable property. The ownership of animals and other movables abandoned by their owners can be acquired by occupation (CC arts. 1316, 1317(d), 1318 and 1323(2)); if the freehold is renounced then ownership accrues ex lege to the State (Const. art. 89; Menezes Cordeiro, Direitos Reais, 484- 485). If someone abandons a vehicle he loses "effective direction" (CC art. 503(1)) over it and is therefore no longer strictly liable. As far as dangerous substances are concerned, the same holds true for the point of departure under CC art. 509(1). However, the failure to properly dispose of such substances could amount to a dangerous activity in the sense of CC art. 493(2). When building works are completed, a duty is extant in respect of the removal of waste and other rest matter from the area (Urbanisation and Construction Decree Law art. 86; Public Contracts Code art. 177(2)). A commune which fails to remove the charred part of a building which resulted from a fire in a palace owned by it, hence causing damage to neighbouring property, is liable under the general tenets of tort law (CA Oporto 6 January 2003; STJ 8 July 2003). If wild or stray animals stray onto a motorway owing to a failure to secure a fence which ringed them in and their keeper cannot be ascertained, recent case law has held that the person licensed to operate the motor way is liable for accidents caused in this manner (STJ 22 June 2004; CA Lisbon 15 May 2007; CA Evora 25 January 2007). According to DUTCH Law the scope of application of the regulation contained in VI.–3:208 corresponds to CC art. 6:176(1), whereupon the operator of a dumping ground is also liable for damage which is caused by air, water of ground pollution, even if it originates following the closure of the dumping ground. Ownership of ownerless property accrues to the State (CC art. 5:24).

8. In the NORDIC countries the issue addressed by VI.–3:208 is rarely broached. In the first instance, liability for omissions could be regarded as providing a basis for liability for an abandoned object. This stems from the fact that the relinquishing the object could entail a prior positive act increasing the risk of danger, which according to general tort law rules would ground a duty to proactively obviate the ensuing danger (see further Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 114; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 111; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 41). Swedish HD 14 December 1935, NJA 1935, 636 held e.g. that a man was liable to pay damages, who left a piece of quick lime in a bucket, after pouring water on it, which later exploded, injuring some bypassing children. DANISH Eastern CA 12 February 1931, UfR 1931, 598 confirmed the liability of a tenant who had moved away from his apartment and left an accumulator in it, which later started leaking acid causing damage to the tenant occupying an apartment below. Furthermore Finnish HD 1954 II 66 affirmed the liability of a man who wished to dispose of some chemical waste by burning it on another person's property, subsequently causing damage to the latter's animals. For Sweden, the prepatory works to the Environmental Code confirm that a person who secretly disposes of substances on another person's property is liable for damage caused by those substances (NJA 1986 II, 141). At the same time, it is necessary to take note of the fact that conceptually, the Environmental Code chap. 32 employs a very extensive meaning of an installation posing a danger to the environment or an activity dangerous to the environment (e.g. a person who acquires real property is liable for substances which pose a danager to the environment, which had been left on the land by the previous operator of an installation without the knowledge oft he new owner : HD 3 September 1983, NJA 1984, 602; Supreme Administrative Court 16 January 1997, RÅ 1997, 12 I; S-Karnov 2006/07 [-Karlsson], Miljöbalk, no. 347 p. 2385). It is uncertain that this position prevails in Denmark and Finland; however actual and constructive knowledge of dangerous substances leads the new owner being made accountable (Danish Western CA 24 May 1994, FED 1994, 537; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 190; Finnish Environmental Damage Compensation Act § 7(1-3)).

CHAPTER 4: CAUSATION

VI.–4:101: General rule

(1) A person causes legally relevant damage to another if the damage is to be regarded as a consequence of:

(a) that person's conduct; or

(b) a source of danger for which that person is responsible.

(2) In cases of personal injury or death the injured person's predisposition with respect to the type or extent of the injury sustained is to be disregarded.

COMMENTS

A. General

Scope. Paragraph (1) contains a general rule on causation. It relates to both the causation of damage by human conduct and the causation of damage in cases in which the ground of accountability is not human conduct, but rather a person's responsibility for a source of danger. In the latter case the legally relevant damage must have been caused by the source of danger. The Article is linked to VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1), under which causation constitutes one of the three indispensable pillars for liability under this Book (alongside legally relevant damage and accountability). Paragraph (2) of the present Article contains a special rule for the case of the injury or death of a person who already, prior to the accident, suffered from an infirmity or illness which contributed to the severity of the physical injury.

Policy considerations. Notwithstanding the many questions connected with the concept of causation, it is an undisputed cornerstone of all European legal systems of liability - including Community law - that the legally relevant damage must have been "caused" either by the liable person or by another person or a material source of danger for which that person bears responsibility. Although causation alone is never sufficient for liability - apart from some regional exceptions in the law on traffic accidents - civil liability in damages never comes into the picture without it. This branch of the law does not impose liability for damages simply for moral or general political reasons. It is not the "duty defaulter", the "rich person" or the "insured party" who is made liable, but rather a person to whose sphere of control the subsequent mishap may be traced back. Where sufficient evidence of this causal link is lacking, while a person may be exposed to responsibility under criminal or insurance law or may incur other sanctions, there is no liability under this branch of the law. In the Europe of today, a mere attempt to harm no longer grounds civil liability in damages in any jurisdiction. Wrongful conduct that is apt to occasion damage, but has not yet done so, may, however, be prevented by means of a prior restraint order (VI.–1:102 (Prevention)).

A claim in damages does not materialise where the dishonest competitive conduct of A did not cause the subsequent loss of profit of competitor B, because the lost profit had been attributable to a dip in sales due to a slow-down in the economy. B can, however, obtain protection from further dishonest anti-competitive behaviour on A's part where there is a threat of a further setback in profits because of it.

The term causation. The term "causation" is used in all European systems of legal liability, but is nowhere defined. Provisions giving some indication of how causation is to be determined are encountered, but only infrequently. As can be seen from this Article and from VI.–1:101 (Basic rule), this Book regards causation as the necessary link between (a) the intentional or negligent conduct of the person who is to be held liable or a source of danger for which that person bears responsibility and (b) legally relevant damage. It must be possible to say of the damage that it is to be regarded as a consequence of the liable person's conduct or of a source of danger for which that person is responsible. The Article builds on Chapters 2 and 3 and makes it clear that causation can follow differently nuanced rules depending on the attributive cause and the legally relevant damage.

Causation by conduct. Paragraph (1)(a) governs the case in which a person has caused the relevant damage by that person's own conduct. "Conduct" has the same meaning here as in the context of VI.–3:102 (Negligence). See the comments on that provision.

Causation by omission. The Article makes no distinction between positive action on the one hand and passivity or omission on the other. The cause of legally relevant damage as a matter of law under these rules may well be an omission. This follows the pattern set in the context of negligence, where the draft also avoids differentiating between positive acts and omissions (see comments to VI.–3:102 (Negligence)). It would contradict that approach to adopt a different line in relation to causation. The only possibility for a precise separation of positive acts from omissions would presumably be a test of whether a person had physically acted or not. Such a criterion is, however, not legally usable. For example, a driver who fails to stop at a red light and consequently injures a passenger would have to be regarded as having omitted to act (by omitting to remove the foot from the accelerator and apply it to the brake pedal) rather than as having positively done something which ought not to have been done. That would scarcely be in line with normal conceptions of the basis of liability. An omission by a person is a cause of damage when (a) the person had the opportunity to intervene and was under a duty to use that opportunity and (b) the damage is to be regarded as a consequence of the failure to intervene.

Illustration 2
A doctor fails to tell the hospital of a patient's high risk of suicide. However, the hospital was already aware of this danger. The omission to inform was thus not causative of the death of the patient.

Illustration 3
Two acquaintances go fishing together. For that they use electric power – as they have done on previous occasions – which one of them (A) feeds into the river with the aid of an insulated cable from a public power supply line, while from the riverbank the other (B) drags a long wooden rod with a wire net on it through the water. B suddenly falls into the river. A sets about getting him out of the water but abandons his attempt when he feels the electricity in the water. First of all, he disconnects the cable from the supply line, which costs him a lot of time. B's deceased body is later taken from the water. It turns out that he was already dead when he fell into the water. The cause of B's death was not A's omission to rescue him, but a circulatory failure (resulting from a so-called stance tension caused by the splay of his legs while fishing). Conversely, while A's joint action with B in relation to the fishing was indeed causative of B's death, the latter acted at his own risk when he got involved in such a dangerous activity (VI.–5:101(2) (Consent and acting at own risk)).

Causation by a source of danger. Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence) sets out the situations in which a person is liable although that person may have behaved entirely correctly and not caused the damage by conduct. While in these cases liability also requires causation, the damage will not have been caused by the person liable. Precisely because this is so, in most cases of this nature it is only the causing of particular types of damage which will lead to liability. In other words, in the context of this type of attributive cause, only certain types of damage are legally relevant. Two basic situations must be distinguished.

Vicarious liability. In the first group of cases – often and imprecisely termed "vicarious liability" – the damage has been caused by a person for whom the person liable must take responsibility. The main example is to be found in VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives). The damage is actually caused by, for example, the employee and not the employer. The mere hiring of an employee is insufficient to qualify as a cause of damage because such conduct is allowed and even desired (It would be different where the employee is hired for a job which is manifestly beyond the employee's capabilities; here the employer is acting in breach of duty). In contrast, the case of a parent's liability (VI.–3:104 (Accountability for damage caused by children or supervised persons)) has to do with a double test of causation because the wrongdoing of the child as well as the parent's failure to supervise will be causative of the damage.

Damage caused by animals and things. In the second group of cases the damage has been caused by the realisation of a danger from a source for which the liable person is responsible. The text does not therefore proceed from the proposition that only humans are capable of being the "cause" of damage. Rather the cause of a legally relevant damage might equally be an animal, the condition of land or premises, motor vehicles, products, substances or the like. In such cases the rules set out in VI.–4:103 (Alternative causes) might also apply..

Connection between legally relevant damage, attributive cause and causation. Paragraph (1) of the Article sets out the connecting link – necessary for the law on liability - between legally relevant damage and attributive cause (intention, negligence, source of risk). The formulation has been deliberately kept flexible ("is to be regarded as a consequence…") so as to ensure that, in the context of causation, differences between individual attributive causes and legally relevant damage can be taken into account. In a legal setting there is no "one-size-fits-all" general test for causation. Rather, considerations relevant to causation may be different depending on which ground of liability and which kind of legally relevant damage is in focus. If the person causing the damage has acted intentionally, it will be easier to characterise a legally relevant damage as the consequence of the conduct than if the matter is one of misjudgement or minor carelessness. Similarly, if the damage takes the form of personal injury, causation may be more readily affirmed than would be the case with damage to property or a pure economic loss. For the cases of liability without intention or negligence the provisions of Chapter 3, Section 2 contain specific rules which are also important for the test for causation. This is because their underlying feature is that liability depends on whether the risk which justifies the imposition of the strict liability is realised in the damage which has occurred.

Special rules. A few special rules supplement the general rule in paragraph (1) of the Article. Paragraph (2) expresses the idea that a wrongdoer "must take his victim as he finds him", thus precluding the argument that the injury is in reality attributable to a condition or affliction from which the victim already suffered and not to the conduct of the wrongdoer. VI.–4:102 (Collaboration) may be regarded as a rule which clarifies in a specific case the application of the doctrine of "psychological" causation. VI.–4:103 (Alternative causes) governs the special case of so-called "alternative" causation. In contrast, VI.–6:103 (Equalisation of benefits) proceeds on the basis that issues of so-called benefit equalisation are not to be qualified as a matter of causation, but as a question of the extent of the reparation which is to be provided. However, there is no provision in this Book which would render the members of a group (e.g. participants in a protest march willing to resort to violence) liable solely because of their participation in the activities of the group. Incidentally, that would also be a rule which would have to be conceived as a norm of accountability (liability for the causation of legally relevant damage by others), not of causation. The question of liability for loss of a chance would be a question concerning legally relevant damage, not causation; of course the differences of opinion on this issue confirm that these two elements of liability (legally relevant damage and causation) partially intersect.

B. Particulars

Cause in fact and cause in law not distinguished. Many jurists are inclined to make questions of causation the subject of fundamental and philosophically elevated treatment. It is not the function of paragraph (1) of this Article to attach itself firmly to a defined theoretical position within the broad spectrum of opinion. The width and complexity of the subject do not speak in favour of a precise rule on causation. Paragraph (1) therefore only establishes the basic principle on which all juristic considerations of causation rest: a conduct or a source of danger causes a legally relevant damage if the damage is to be regarded as a consequence of that conduct or source of danger. Consequently, the provision does not distinguish between a cause in fact and a cause in law. The Article rather leaves it for further discussion whether and to what extent such a distinction will stand up in theory and in turn lend itself to be being put into practice.

No reduction to a "conditio sine qua non" formula. This is in turn the reason why paragraph (1) does not reduce the test for causation to a "but for" or "conditio sine qua non" test. This would have merely put a "factual" or "scientific" concept of causation into words. Numerous exceptions and expansions would have been necessary, even at this level, without there being any real prospect of exhaustively covering the subject-matter. Just as important is the point that the "but for" test alone cannot separate consequences falling within the perimeter of relevant liability from consequences falling outside this perimeter and not giving rise to liability. This process of separation takes place well-nigh unavoidably on the basis of a value judgement, of what might be called a "legal" or "normative" test for causation. Incidentally, in the context of these rules, the decisive factor is not whether a random event is the cause of another random event, but rather whether there is a link of cause and effect between an intentional or negligent conduct or a source of danger on the one hand and a legally relevant damage on the other. The jurist does not ask the question e.g. whether someone who gets up in the morning five minutes earlier and was therefore earlier at the scene of the accident has caused the accident solely by virtue of this fact, because the very breach of duty is already lacking. The question would be just as pointless as the question whether a person injured by an assault caused the injury through mere presence at the site of the incident.

Illustration 4
An accident occurs on a straight road. Through lack of attention, A drives into B's car, which is at the side of the road fully in accordance with traffic regulations. Neither the damage to B's vehicle nor the damage to A's car is the consequence of negligent conduct on the part of B; nor are they a consequence of the use of B's car.

Elements of assessment. The factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a particular legally relevant damage is to be seen as a consequence (even if it is not the only one) of particular wrongdoing or of a particular source of danger do not lend themselves well to being conclusively listed nor to being given a relative weighting in relation to each other. Each individual case can make a new calibration necessary. Aspects of probability and foreseeability come into play but so too do the type of the attributive cause and the type of damage. Also relevant are the protective aim of the norm of social behaviour which has been infringed and (occasionally) general policy considerations. In European legal doctrine there are numerous formulations on this topic – for instance that the damage arising must be an "adequate" consequence of the act breaching a duty, that it may not be "too remote" or that through it, an individually specified risk must have been realised. These doctrinal approaches are neither confirmed nor challenged by the Article.

Break in the chain of causation. Only through carefully evaluated considerations of the type mentioned may a solution be found to questions like whether the damage incurred is to be deemed a consequence of a particular person's conduct or whether it is to be attributed in whole or in part to the conduct of an intervening third party or even to the conduct of the victim. While the intentional intervention of a third party typically breaks the chain of causation or liability, it depends on the circumstances of each individual case whether or not the damage is to be seen as a consequence of a particular person's conduct.

Illustration 5
While having a rest, a hunter (A) leaves a loaded rifle leaning against a tree contrary to regulations. B lifts the rifle; it lets off a shot and C is killed. A's conduct in breach of duty was causative for the death of C if the shot went off by accident when B was holding the rifle or if B indeed intended to fire the rifle and then mistakenly hit C. In contrast, C's death can no longer be seen as a consequence of A's not unloading the weapon if B took the rifle for the purpose of killing C, unless A had set up the scenario in order to facilitate this deed.

Illustration 6
A is responsible for a road accident. The scene of the accident must be closed off for a spell. Impatient drivers drive around the accident scene and so damage the bordering cycle lanes and pedestrian pathways. This is no longer a consequence of A's wrongdoing, through which the road accident occurred.

Illustration 7
A and her life partner B are accosted by D and E when leaving C's discotheque. After an exchange of words between C and D, B is beaten up. A attempts to get help but is then struck herself by E and severely injured. C (who is sued by A because he alone has a deep pocket) is also liable to A for her damage. The intervention of E does not break the chain of causation because life experience shows that when someone out of a group begins a brawl, it easily leads to uncontrollable complications.

Self-harm of the victim; contributory fault. Where the intervening person is later the victim, two questions must be kept apart. The first question is always whether the person alleged to be liable also caused (along with the victim) the victim's conduct and subsequent damage. This is typically answered in the affirmative if the victim's act or omission was provoked by the person's wrongdoing, i.e. where it was probable that the victim would react in this way. Only when this question has been answered in the affirmative does the further question arise whether the injured person's right to compensation under VI.–5:102 (Contributory fault and accountability) is to be reduced because of contributory fault.

Illustration 8
A suffers a head injury in a traffic accident and then develops a tendency to attack women. He is rendered liable in damages to the women and demands compensation from B, who was responsible for the traffic accident. However, the liabilities to pay damages are not to be regarded as a consequence of the accident; they are to be regarded as the consequences of A's own criminal acts.

Illustration 9
In the course of an operation, A's daughter's only kidney is culpably removed; A's mother then decides to donate one of her kidneys. An easily understandable and obvious decision is what is at issue here; consequently, the doctor is liable as against the mother.

Illustration 10
Following the theft of several vehicles and their retrieval, an insurance company pays a finder's reward. The vehicle thief must compensate the insurance company for this because even the insured party, whose claims to insurance were passed over, would have had to pay a finder's reward. The latter is a consequence of the theft.

Illustration 11
A tram driver is stopped by an inspector and summoned to pay a fine. The driver jumps up and runs through the opening door of a train just arriving at the stop. The inspector follows, falls and breaks a leg. This is still deemed a consequence of the conduct of the tram driver, unless the tram driver did not know of the pursuit and would have had no reason to infer this.

Causation of a legally relevant damage. The Article is concerned with the causation of legally relevant damage. What exactly constitutes a legally relevant damage is determined by Chapter 2. It may take the form of a mere injury, but equally it may consist in a particular loss. In the latter case, strictly considered, there are two issues of causation in the majority of cases. In a case involving VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession), for example, the conduct must have caused physical damage to the thing and that in turn must have resulted in a loss. However, the considerations as a legal matter of causation are in the two cases fundamentally the same. The same arguments apply in relation to those provisions in Chapter 2 which refer to a loss arising "as a result" of a given injury, infringement of a right or physical damage.

Burden of proof. In this context, the decisive element is the determination that the legally relevant damage suffered is to be deemed a consequence of a person's conduct or the realisation of a source of risk, for which a person bears responsibility. Therefore, under paragraph (1) there is no room for specific provisions on the burden of proof, and particularly no room for the reversal of the burden of proof in special situations. After all the relevant circumstances have been weighed up in an individual case, the conclusion that the damage is to be deemed a consequence of the relevant conduct or source of danger is based on a legal assessment. If the matter goes to court, the judge is afforded a certain amount of discretion which may and must be exercised. The facts upon which a judgment will be based are to be proven by the claimant according to general provisions (possibly including the res ipsa loquitur rule, depending on the applicable law of evidence). Whether the existence of a cause-and-effect relationship between the wrongdoing and damage can be drawn from them, is not something which seems to be amenable to the allocation of the burden of proof. Particularly in the frequently very complex situations of cause and effect with which the law on liability for environmental pollution has to struggle, the assessment of causation must be undisturbed in relation to probability assessment. Where for instance rays of a certain kind very frequently lead to a cancerous disease of the relevant kind and the victim lives in the vicinity of the emitting entity and belongs to a special risk group, there is no reasonable ground for the inference that the disease is not a consequence of the rays.

"Egg shell skull" (paragraph (2)). Under paragraph (2), in cases of personal injury or death, the injured person's predisposition with respect to the type or extent of the injury sustained is to be disregarded. In principle, any person who injures another should not be exonerated because the victim's health was previously unsound or because the victim suffered from a physical or mental affliction. Injury to body or health, and death, in cases caught by paragraph (2) in conjunction with paragraph (1) must be seen as a consequence of the relevant conduct. A person who injures a victim in weak health cannot demand to be put in the position which would have existed if the victim had been healthy; also, in cases of psychological injury, the injury is in principle attributable to the person who inflicted the injury despite the injured person's particular vulnerability. However, depending on the situation in each case, it is conceivable that some pre-existing harm might be regarded as relevant to a reduction of the amount of compensation owed.

Illustration 12
Following an accident for which X is responsible, malignant tumour tissue in the victim's head is torn open and she dies three weeks later. Her hitherto unknown cancerous disease would have ended fatally in any event. However, the accident sped up the process; as a result, the death was a consequence of the accident. The compensation due to dependants for lost maintenance (VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death) paragraph (2)(c)) is limited to the period of time the victim would have probably lived had it not been for the accident. When calculating the non-economic losses suffered by third persons as a result of the death, the pre-existing cancerous disease is also to be taken into account.

Illustration 13
As a result of the severe injury of both parents, a child suffers nervous shock, requiring medical treatment. The fact that the child had a pre-existing illness and even a hereditary affliction changes nothing vis à vis causation.

NOTES

I. General Theory of Causation

1. The requirement of causation is a feature common to all European tort law regimes. However, it is very often the case that its precise constitutents cannot be easily discerned from statutory sources. This is true of the FRENCH CC. The only uncontentious issue is that, in order for tortious liability to arise, there must be a causal connection between the fait générateur and the resulting loss (Cass.civ. 27 October 1975, GazPal 1976, I, 169, note Plancqueel). Legal scholarship differentiates between two main (alternative?) theories of causation: the doctrine dite de l´équivalence des conditions and the théorie de la causalité adéquate. The doctrine of equivalent conditions provides that every circumstance which was instrumental in the damage occurring is to be regarded as the cause of the whole extent of the damage; every conditio sine qua non is causal (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2006/2007], no. 1715). Conversely, the doctrine of adequate causation sets forth that an act is only causal when, objectively and a posteriori considered, it seems generally capable of bringing about the resulting damage (le Tourneau loc. cit. no. 1716). Both doctrines have been utilised in jurisprudence; it cannot be conclusively asserted that one theory prevails over the other, compare. e.g. in respect of the adequacy doctrine Cass.civ. 24 February 2005, Bull.civ. 2005, II, no. 53 (the children of a man who was injured in an accident long before their birth, sued the defendant on the grounds of préjudice moral, on the basis that they never could establish a normal affectionate relationship with their father; the court held that there was no lien de causalité between the accident and the loss suffered by the children) and as regards the theory of equivalence Cass.ass.plén. 24 June 2005, Bull.ass.plén. 2005, no. 7 p. 16 (occupational accident; it was sufficient that the employer's faute inexcusable was a cause nécessaire for the accident, even where, other fautes, could have contributed to the damage occuring).

2. Conversely, the majority of courts in BELGIUM tend to favour application of the conventional test commonly known as the theory of equivalence of conditions (but for test) (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene, TPR 2000, 1551, 1876, no. 144; Dalcq and Schamps, RCJB 1995, 663, 696 no. 126); it is frequently very strictly applied. It suffices that, but for the act of the defendant, the harm would not occured in the manner that actually transpired (Cass. 13 October 2004, Pas. belge 2004, I, no. 476 p. 1558). Every condition or event, without which the concrete damage would not have occured in the manner that it did occur, is regarded as one of the causes of the damage (Cass. 23 February 1994, Pas. belge 1994, I, no. 90 p. 196; Cass.ch.réun. 1 April 2004, JT 2005, 357, note Estienne). The trial judge hypothetically reconstructs the chain of events leading to the damage: causation will only be denied in the event that, the damage would have occured anyhow, had the defendant behaved in a rightful (non-tortious?) manner (Bocken, TBBR 1988, 268, 273, no. 8). However, it remains to be said that the Cour de cassation has not always strictly abided by these criteria. In several decisions, the courts have had recourse to the socalled doctrine of "rightful alternative behaviour" (the issue that presents itself here is that the damage can be attributed to the wrongful behaviour of the defendant, even if he had acted lawfully, the damage would have resulted nonetheless) (Cass. 25 September 1979, Pas. belge 1980, I, 111; Cass. 8 September 1983, RW 1983-84, 2033; Cass. 19 November 1987, RW 1987-88, 1125). This approach has not been well received in academic circles, (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Geelen/De Coster, TPR 1987, 1255, 1522, no. 164) and the decision of the Cass. (audience plénière) 25 March 1997, Pas. belge

1997, I, no. 161 p. 405 does not fully clarify whether the courts will continue to observe this jurisprudential direction. In any event, there are further indications that the Cour de Cassation has departed from the strict application of equivalence theory, thereby, ceding some scope to the adequacy theory (Cass. 14 June 1996 and Cass. 5 November 1996, Pas. belge 1996, I, nos. 413-414 p. 1070, see illustration 4 above; Cass. 10 May 1994, Pas. belge 1994, I, no. 228 p. 455; Beysen, VersRAI 2004, 10).

3. Generally, SPANISH courts rarely delve into questions of causation. However, it can be asserted that given that the Supreme Court refers so frequently to the criterion of "adequate causation" (TS 15 March 1993, RAJ 1993 (2) no. 2284 p. 2958; TS 9 October 1999, RAJ 1999 (4) no. 7245 p. 11381; TS 16 January 2002, RAJ 2002 (1) no. 8 p. 24; TS 5 December 2002, RAJ 2002 (6) no. 10427 p. 19300; TS 27 June 2005, RAJ 2005 (3) no. 4438 p. 9337; TS 9 March 2006, RAJ 2006 (2) no. 1882 p. 4474), that it has matured into a point of departure under prevailing law. TS 24 May 1993, RAJ 1993 (2) no. 3727 p. 4743, however, applied the 'preponderance evidence criterion'; the causal nexus was affirmed owing to the fact that it was highly improbable that harm was not caused by the defendant's emissions. TS 10 February 2006, RAJ 2006 (1) no. 675 p. 1617 u (at FJ3) expressly distinguished between causation in fact and causation in law; factually the damage was caused by the defendant but legally the damage was caused by the injured party itself. Older decisions were based simply on the buen sentido, "common sense" (e.g. TS 18 April 1985, RAJ 1985 (1) no. 1770 p. 1511 and TS 4 March 1988, RAJ 1988 (1) no. 1553 p. 1497), furthermore, until recently, the doctrine of 'effective cause' was frequently utilised (causa eficiente)(TS 11 February 1993, RAJ 1993 (1) no. 1459 p. 1836; TS 3 December 2002, RAJ 2002 (6) no. 10414 p. 19277). The First Chamber of the Tribunal Supremo recently applied the 'general risk of life' criterion in order to exclude the liability of a gardening company for the damage caused to a passer-by who fell down because of a hose that lay in the pavement (TS 2 March 2006, BDA RAJ 2006 no. 5508) or to exclude the liability of the owner of a building for damage caused to the tenant after its collapse (TS 5 January 2006, RAJ 2006 (1) no. 131 p. 320). It also excluded liability of a hotel owner for damage caused by a fire that had started in the hotel kitchen but spread rapidly due to explosive substances deposited by a third person in the hotel (TS 11 March 1988, RAJ 1988 (2) no. 1961 p. 1925). A break in the chain of causation was conversely denied if the intervening third party did not act in an intentional or grossly negligent manner (TS 27 January 2006, RAJ 2006 (1) no. 615 p. 1486). In order to establish causation, the courts sometimes have recourse to the reliance principle, namely, where the injured party could have relied on the absence of a particular risk (TS 9 March 2006, RAJ 2006 (2) no. 1882 p. 4474); in contrast, causation was denied whre the wrongdoer was not able to appreciate the source of danger (TS 23 February 2001, RAJ 2001 (2) no. 2549 p. 4071). Furthermore, if an infringement of a statutory provision is at issue, the courts will inquire into the protective purpose of the norm (TS 8 October 1998, RAJ 1998 (4) no. 7559 p. 11113).

4. The ITALIAN civil courts apply the same principles governing causation under the criminal law (CP arts. 40 and 41) to what is commonly known as "causation which founds liability", i.e. a link must be found to exist between the act or the omission involving a breach of duty (to act? Is this necessary) and the primary damage incurred. These provisions are regarded as an expression of general legal principles. The Italian courts tend to predominantly abide by the conditio sine qua non formula, however, conduct will no longer be considered as causing the harmful event, if the ensuing damage constitutes a departure from the normally expected course of events (regolarità causale) (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, sub art. 2043, p. 95; cf. E.g. Cass. 7 December 2005, no. 26997, Resp.civ. e prev. 2006, 862: night-time car accident on the left lane of motorway; the passenger in the car attempted to save himself by jumping over the middle crash barrier but precipitated into an abyss through a hole which was not visible in the darkness and died; the operator of the motorway was found liable; the person who caused the accident did not incur liability based on causation grounds).

5. HUNGARIAN CC makes reference to the requirement of causation in several provisions (e.g. in §§ 339(1), 345(1) and 347(4)). The test usually applied is that the damage must either be caused by a wrongful and culpable/blameworthy act of the defendant (Petrik [-Harmathy], Polgári jog II[2], 568; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 64; Bárdos, Kárfelelősség a Polgári Törvénykönyv rendszerében, 50; Szalma, Okozatosság és polgári jogi felelősség, 52) or derive from that fact that the defendant pursued an activity bound up with an increased potential for danger (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1241, 1259; Szalma loc. cit. 50, 70); if causation is not given, then no liability is incurred (BH 2005/364; BH 2004/409; BH 2002/186; BH 1996/255; BH 1993/ 355; BH 1992/637). Causation is also of significance in determining the extent of the damage and in the determination of the compensation that can be obtained as, namely, under Hungarian law, losses are only compensated, if a causal nexus exists between the loss suffered and the damage caused (Marton, A polgári jogi felelősség, 122; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 60). Finally, the question of the unlawfulness of the defendant's behaviour falls to be considered under the causation heading, because once damage is caused, it is qualified as unlawful (Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 56). A causal connection between the conduct and the damage ought to be given, if the damage would not have occurred but for the conduct of the defendant, the conduct can be imputed to the defendant and his behaviour can be influenced by the threat of sanctions (Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 62-63; Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1230). The question of liability for indirect causation is of significance especially in the sphere of liability for others and for objects (see further Marton loc. cit. 129-130; Bárdos loc. cit. 53-54); here the courts factor in the forseeability of the damage as well as the extent of fault on the part of the defendant (Marton loc. cit. 178-179; Petrik loc. cit. 66-69).

6. According to POLISH CC art. 361 § 1 the person obliged to make reparation is responsible only for the "normal consequences" of an act or omission, out of which the damage arose. The yardstick of "normal consequences" determines also the extent of losses (including loss of profits) which are to be compensated (CC art. 361 § 2). On these grounds legal writing and case law consider that the causal link fulfills two functions: it is a prerequisite of liability and it determines the amount of reparation (Radwański [-Dybowski], System prawa cywilnego III(1), 247; Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 86). The assessment of the consequence as "normal" is a two step process: first, the test of conditio sine qua non is applied, determining whether there was any causal link between the act or omission and the damage. If that is answered in the affirmative, the second test is whether the consequence is normal, i.e. whether such an act or omission is generally (in particular, statistically) conducive to the occurrence of such a consequence (Dybowski loc. cit. 251, 257; Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 87-88). According to the dominant legal opinion objective connections are decisive; whether the tortfeasor knew or should have known of this connection is irrelevant (Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit.; Dybowski loc. cit. 247). An omission may be regarded as causing damage if there was a duty to act, possibility of action and typically that action would have prevented the damage (Dybowski loc. cit. 269). BULGARIAN LOA art. 51(1) first sentence provides that "there is an obligation to make reparation for all losses which are the direct of indirect result of a damaging act." A loss is direct or indirect (these expressions are read as synonyms, they not meant to represent discrete categories of damage: Staneva, Otgovornost za vredi, prichineni ot deza i nesposobni, 115) according to the Bulgarian interpretation of the adequacy theory, if it is the typical or usual result of an event establishing liability (Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast, 360). "Consequential" or indirect damage encompasses the idea of damage which, if anything, unexpectedly occurs and is not necessarily causally linked to a tortious act; this damage consequently arises as the typical and usual result of a separate event (Kojucharov, Obligazionno pravo I, 278). According to ROMANIAN CC art. 1086 (however, this provision is only directly pertinent to contract law), the damage is required to be a direct and necessary consequence of the injury that transpired. There are two co-existing doctrines of causation, namely, the doctrine of "necessary cause" (sistemul cauzalităţii necesare) and the theory of the indivisible unity of all causes and conditions (sistemul unităţii indivizibile dintre cauză şi condiţii); the courts conventionally favour the latter (Adam, Drept civil, 296; Dogaru and Drăghici, Drept civil, 242-245; Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 94-95). However, an intervening act of a third party or an intervening voluntary autonomous act on the plaintiff's part will break the chain of causation. Therefore, the theft of property from a vehicle involved in a traffic accident cannot be attributed to the party who caused the accident. Likewise, the fact that the victim of accident contracted hepatitis while recuperating from the accident cannot be ascribed to the defendant who caused the accident (for accompanying case law see Lupan loc. cit. 363-364).

7. A tenet of GERMAN tort law holds that, in order to succeed in a claim for damages, a claimant is required to establish that the damage can be imputed to the defendant. A distinction is drawn between causation which founds liability (haftungsbegründene Kausalität) and causation which determines the ambit of liability (haftungsausfüllende Kausalität). Under the rubric of "causation founding liability" the usual requirement is to demonstrate the existence of an adequate causal nexus between the conduct (an act or an omission) and the breach of law, and secondly, it calls for further examination into whether the ensuing damage is encompassed within the protective scope of the rule that has been infringed (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 823, no. 2a). Causation determining the ambit of liability concerns the causal link between the basis for liability (breach of law) and the ensuing damage (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[66], Pref. to § 249, no. 56). The theory of equivalence lays down minimum requirements pertaining to Haftungsbegründung und –ausfüllung harnassing the conditio-sine-qua-non formula. Accordingly, an event causes damage, on the basis that were it "assumed away", the concrete damage would not have occured. The conditio-sine-qua-non approach is complemented by the adequacy theory, which operates to reduce the scope of liability. According to this exposition, an event is an adequate cause of the damage, if it is generally suitable to cause the damage that ensued. An event is not an adequate cause of the damage, if it could engender the damage in question only under particularly unique, improbable circumstances which would have been disregarded had events followed their usual course. The adequancy theory is premised on an assessement of probabilities and is supplemented by the "scope of rule" theory. This postulates that an obligation to make reparation will only arise, if the damage claimed, according to its type and its origin, stems from a sphere of danger which the infringed norm was enacted to protect against (Heinrichs loc. cit. no. 57 with extensive examination of case law).

8. Similarly, AUSTRIAN CC fails to particularise the exact constitutents of the notion of causation. The answer to the question of when damage is "caused" or "inflicted" by the damaging party must therefore be derived from legal teaching and from case law. Consensus exists on the conventional approach to be adopted, namely, a distinction is made between metaphysical and legal causation, the latter being decisive. Therefore, arguments have been tendered that one should refer to "imputability of damage" as opposed to employing the term "causation" (e.g. Barta, Zivilrecht II[2], 590). The so-called causation doctrine or doctrine of imputability of damage differentiates between the equivalence theory or but for test and the theory of adequate cause. The first step under the adequacy theory based on CC § 1311, is the examination of the question of whether if the defendant's conduct was assumed away, the same result would not have eventuated. Thereafter, the identified causes of the damage are narrowed down by further control mechanisms regarding the imputation of liability, the most important of these being adequate cause. An event is regarded as the adequate cause of the damage if the conduct of the tortfeasor (either a positive act or an omission) appears to be generally apt to bring about the result that has occured. This approach has the effect of excluding abnormal causal effects. A person will not be held accountable for damage over which no judicious control can be exercised (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], nos. 8/2 and 8/3). A more expansive approach has been adopted in the case of intentional torts as opposed to negligence torts (Koziol loc. cit. no. 8/16). For example, an adequate causal nexus was affirmed between leaving a loaded weapon unattended and damage which eventuated from unauthorised use of same (OGH 16 January 1952, SZ 25/14); similarly, between a child in peril and an injury sustained by the rescuer who rushed to the child's assistance (OGH 23 June 1967, ZVR 1968/87 p. 193); between a grave permanent injury and an attempt at suicide while in a depressed state (OGH 12 June 1991, JBl 1992, 255; for further comparisons see OGH 30 January 2003, ZVR 2004/37 p. 128) and for an ensuing drug addiction (OGH 28 October 1993, ZVR 1995/73 p. 181). OGH 27 March 2001, JBl 2001, 656 determined that "a voluntary act of a third party does not necessarily preclude a finding that damage is an adequate consequence". At this juncture. the decisive point is to determine whether the conduct of the third party lay outside the realm of every possibility. Only "sheer unforseeable" intervention of a third party will have the effect of breaking the chain of adequate causation. The adequacy criterion as a means of restricting accountability is of no effect, if a law is violated and the purpose of the enactment was directed against preventing the occurence of the kind of damage that eventuated. Remote or improbable damage is included within its scope (as e.g. in any case falling under CC §§ 460, 996, 979 and § 1311); this is because, in these circumstances, sole recourse is had to the doctrine of the protective purpose of the violated rule (Koziol loc. cit. no. 8/18).

9. Similarly, under GREEK law, it is a self evident proposition that causation is a prerequisite of liability (Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio, 468; Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 139). Within the framework of CC art. 914, an examination is conducted to determine whether a causal relation exists between the unlawful culpable conduct and the ensuing damage (Stathopoulos loc. cit. 469; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], arts. 297-298, no. 41), The theory of equivalence and the theory of adequate cause are employed for this purpose. Within the scope of the doctrine of "rightful alternative behaviour" there is a tendency to deny the presence of a causal link ; the unlawful conduct is not the cause of the damage (Stathopoulos loc. cit. no. 49; Georgiades loc. cit. 141). The theory of adequate cause has been recognised for decades (Stathopoulos loc. cit. no. 50). The theory of "the purpose of the rule" is increasingly espoused in both academic commentary and case law,(Stathopoulos loc. cit. no. 60; for an in- depth analysis of the relationship between the theory of adequate cause and the purpose of the rule doctrine, see Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2], 491 and Georgiades loc. cit. 144).

10. The PORTUGUESE CC also defines the basis (CC art. 483(1)) and the ambit of liability (CC art. 563) by reference to the causation criterion. The approach adopted in case law is to split the requirement of causation into factual and legal strands (STJ 27 January 2005; STJ 12 October 1999). The determination of whether a cause is legally imputable is assessed according to the principles of the theory of adequate cause (Menezes Cordeiro, Obrigações II, 335; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 578; Galvão Telles, Obrigações[7], 404, 409; CA Lisbon 17 June 2006; STJ 7 April 2005). However, this theory is only capable of filtering out a relatively small number of cases on the basis that the causal nexus was "inadequate" (see e.g. CA Oporto 10 February 2000, CJ XXV [2000-1] 215; CA Oporto 4 October 2006 and STJ 11 October 2005 [in respect of a multiple car pile up on the motorway, the first accident was regarded as causing the subsequent accidents that ensued]). A textbook example of where adequate cause is not given, is where a landlord attempting to collect his rent from a recalcitrant tenant is hit by a whirlwind (Galvão Telles loc. cit. 404). It is certain that omissions, e.g. failure to warn can be causal (CA Oporto 31 October 2006; STJ 12 December 2002; RL 9 May 2002, CJ XXVII [2002-3] 69 and 70). A break in the chain of causation is affirmed, if one adequate cause is superimosed on another (CA Oporto 4 October 2006; Pereira Coelho, O problema da causa virtual, 38, 109; Galvão Telles loc. cit. 413); a break in the chain of causation can arise via the voluntary act of a third party (also on the part of the State: STJ 25 March 2003) and can be due to the conduct of the injured party itself (e.g. CA Lisbon 17 June 2006 and CA Coimbra 4 April 1995, CJ XX [1995-2] 31).

11. DUTCH CC art. 6:98 states that damage is only recoverable when "it is related to the event giving rise to the liability of the debtor and that, having regard to the nature of liability involved and that of the damage, the damage can be imputed to the debtor as a result of this event". Dutch law has recanted from the earlier prevailing Adequatie doctrine and has fixed upon a test of imputability, whereby other questions, apart from general forseeability, play a decisive role (Schadevergoeding I [-Boonekamp], art. 98, no. 26 p. 79). The type of damage and the gravity of imputation of fault are of decisive importance; the graver the fault is, the more likely it will be that damage is imputed (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 434 p. 367; see also Boonekamp loc. cit. no. 29.4 p. 94). A wrongdoer who acts with intent will be answerable for all damage which is capable of being embraced by the scope of his intent, provided that there is a conditio-sine-qua-non relation between his conduct and the damage that ensues. The argument has been advanced that the conditio-sine-qua-non-test is to be found in CC art. 6:162 as opposed to CC art. 6:98 (Boonekamp loc. cit. no. 26 p. 79).

12. ESTONIAN LOA § 127(4) defines causation in a quite similar fashion to VI.–4:101(1): "A person shall compensate for damage only if the circumstances on which the liability of the person is based and the damage caused are related in such a manner that the damage is a consequence of the circumstances (damage)".

13. In the NORDIC countries, the common core of causation is generally considered to consist of the conditio sine qua non test and the test of adequacy (Dufwa, Flera skadeståndsskyldiga, 2401; Schultz, Kausalitet, 375; Karlgren, Skadeståndsrätt[5], 37). There are no general statutory rules on causation, except for certain relaxations of the burden of proving the causal link. In SWEDEN, case-law and legal doctrine consider the conditio sine qua non-test as starting point for any inquiry into causation (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 197; Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 290; Agell, in Festskrift Ekelöf, 1; Hellner, 40 Scandinavian Studies in Law 2000, 119). An additional requirement is that the defendant's conduct was a sufficient? cause of the damage suffered. On this doctrinal basis, the HD 21 October 1987, NJA 1987, 710 affirmed that an individual who hired a room to a band was liable for theft of the musical instruments by an unknown third party because he had wrongly assured the band that there was an alarm system in place. Conversely, the HD 23 September 1983,

NJA 1983, 606 found that the keeper of a hunting dog was not liable for an accident occuring between an elk and a car, because it could not proved that the dog had a decisive influence on the elk's behaviour. HD 29 December 1998, NJA 1998, 893 articulated the adequate cause test as follows, "that the damage should have appeared to a person with the knowledge of all the circumstances as a foreseeable and to a certain extent typical consequence of the harmful conduct". The two-stage assessment – one of natural causation (cause-in-fact) and one of adequate causation is also applied in the other Nordic countries. The DANISH HD 22 November 1995, UfR 1996, 245 denied the liability of a lawyer who had failed to file a claim in time, on the grounds that he would have, in any event, lost the case. FINNISH Supreme Court 23 January 1991, KKO 1991:13 refused to find an auditor liable to a creditor of the company for which he had prepared accounts. The Court reasoned that the creditor would not have read the report in any case; similar arguments have been advanced by the Finnish Supreme Court 18 November 1992, KKO 1992:167 and the SWEDISH Supreme Court HD 13 January 1983, NJA 1983, 3. A multitude of alternative causation theories have been propounded in recent academic exegesis. The four step test as advanced by Peczenik, Causes and Damages, passim and Schultz's empirical theory Schultz loc cit. can be counted among their number. A great deal of attention is devoted to cases involving multiple causation or 'competing causes' (e.g. see Hellner and Radetzki loc cit. 213; Peczenik loc. cit. 100; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 237 and Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 330). If the damage can be attributed to multiple contemporaneous causal factors, then the parties responsible are jointly and severally liable (Dufwa loc. cit. 2498; Saxén loc cit. 342); however, if the damage can be attributed to a non - tortious cause, then the outcome is uncertain; it is widely accepted that the individuals responsible for the event grounding liability are jointly and severally liable and based on his/her contribution to the ensuing damage, each defendant would pay a percentage of the total damage (Hellner and Radetzki, loc cit. 215; von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 239; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 145; Iversen, Erstatningsberegning i kontraktsforhold, 813; Saxén loc. cit. 340). If two consecutive causal factors have contributed to the damage, the person who caused the initial harm will be held liable for the entire damage, provided his conduct increased the risk of the subsequent injury (see e.g. Swedish HD 15 February 1957, NJA 1957, 139: the first accident was causal for the victim being run over twice). Swedish HD 19 December 1950, NJA 1950, 650 concerned a personal injury sustained from a traffic accident, but the plaintiff also later on sustained a gastric ulcer, whereby two independent sufficient conditions competed. Three different opinions were delivered, but the leading rationale was based on the principle that no damages were to be awarded for the time that the gastric ulcer was a sufficient condition for work disability. Some Danish case-law supports this view (Eastern CA 18 June 1925, UfR 1925, 769).The Danish HD 18 May 1961, UfR 1961, 574 reduced the quantum of damages awarded following the bursting of a dam and ensuing damage. The court surmised that the land would have flooded as quickly even if the dam not burst. Other cases involve two separate conditions which start working in different timeframes but render an undividable damage. Cases involving a pre-existing illness that also may have contributed to the harm are of particular interest. In Swedish HD 31 July 1961, NJA 1961, 425 the plaintiff had been assaulted, sustaining a head injury, and a few years later he also sustained a head injury in a car accident with the second defendant. It was held that, since it could not be distinguished to what extent each condition had contributed to the final injury, both defendants should be jointly liable for the total damage (similarly HD 25 November 1992, NJA 1992, 740 I and II). In comparable cases under Danish and Finnish law, the courts ruminate on whether the precepts of fairness and equity should intervene in order to attentuate the extent of incurred liability (e.g. Danish HD 6 December 2001, UfR 2002, 519 and 15 August 2002, UfR 2002, 2458; Finnish Supreme Court 13 July 1995, KKO 1995:129).

II. Founding liability and determining the ambit (limits) of liability

14. The distinction between the basis of liability and determining the ambit of liability and thereafter the treatment of causation under both of these headings is a particularly pronounced feature of legal orders which place the infringment of a right or legally protected interest at the focal point of their system of tort law. The distinction between causation as a fount of liability (causal link between the conduct and the main damage) and causation which determines the extent of liability (causal link between the primary damage and consequential loss) is, for this reason, unknown to both French and Belgian tort law systems.

15. Occasionally, SPANISH legal commentators espouse adopting such a differentiation (e.g. Albaladejo [-Santos Briz], Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales, XXIV, art. 1902, 263); in general, in so far as such an issue is broached, there is consensus that no distinction exists between causation extablishing the grounds of liability and causation which acts as a determinant on the scope of liability under Spanish law (recently, once again Luna Yerga, La prueba de la responsabilidad civil medico-sanitaria, 406). The courts merely emphasise that conduct and damage are questions of fact, not of law. Therefore, pursuant to CCP art. 477 a cassation cannot be based on these concepts (TS 26 November 1990, RAJ 1990 (7) no. 9047 p. 11522).

16. Conversely, it is said, that the twin objectives of the causation requirement under ITALIAN law are: attributing the commission of tort to the wrongdoer and determining the extent of compensation to be awarded (Cass.sez.un. 26 January 1971, no. 174, Giur.it. 1971, I, 1, 680). Therefore, the causal nexus between the conduct of the actor and the unlawful event as well as the causal link between the unlawful result and the consequences that derive from that result are the subjects of examination (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, arts. 2043-2059, p. 89*).* The first phase entails an inquiry underpinned by the principles contained in CP arts. 40 and 41: conditio sine qua non and regolarità causale (i.e. that there was no divergence from the normal course of events leading to the damage: Alpa and Bessone [-Carbone], La responsabilità civile I, 64-65). Pursuant to CC arts. 2056 and 2057 the second step involves an assessment of the direct or primary damage that has resulted. CC art 1225 is only applicable within the remit of contract law. It is of no irrelevance to tort law. This provision restricts the obligation to make reparation to losses which were foreseeable at the time that the contract was concluded.

17. The HUNGARIAN legal theory emphasises that the causation requirement fulfills twin functions. On the one hand, there needs to be a causal nexus between the tortious conduct or wrongfulness and the damage (Petrik [-Harmathy], Polgári jog II[2], 568; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 64; Bárdos, Kárfelelősség a Polgári Törvénykönyv rendszerében, 50; Szalma, Okozatosság és polgári jogi felelősség, 52; Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1220, 1230); on the other hand, causation is significant in determining the extent of the damage and thereby also the recovery of damages, owing to the fact that the liable person will only bear those losses which can be attributed to his tortious conduct (Marton, A polgári jogi felelősség, 122; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 60; Fuglinszky, Mangelfolgeschäden im deutschen und ungarischen Recht, 17 and 260). In POLAND the distinction is not drawn. Unlawfulness of an act or omission occurs in the case of infringement of statutory or moral rule; the infringement of rights or interests is not necessary. The consistent position is that the existence of an adequate causal link is to be considered only as regards the relationship between the occurrence for which a person is accountable and the damage suffered by the injured party (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 86; Radwański [-Dybowski], System prawa cywilnego III(1), 247). A coherent bifuricated classification of the causation requirement does not underpin BULGARIAN tort law, principally; it is simply examined whether the defendant caused the resulting loss. The proposition, namely, that the determination of causation envisages a two step assessment, is sporadically advanced. According to this approach, it is submitted that the first step involves the assessment of the nexus between the conduct and the result, the second step entails examining the connection between the result and the damage.(Konov, Osnovanie na grajdanskata otgovornost[2], 60). Auch dem RUMÄNISCHEN Deliktsrecht ist die Unterscheidung zwischen Haftungsbegründung und Haftungsausfüllung fremd. Kausalität wird zwischen der rechtswidrigen Handlung und dem Schaden geprüft.

18. This distinction is habitually drawn under GERMAN law and is particularly acute under CC § 823(1). An obligation to make good the damage which the tortfeasor has caused underlies this provision. The "basis for liability" requirement is a systematic feature of the German tort law system (CC §§ 823 ff), whereas the "determining the scope of liability" requisite is subsumed under the general law of obligations (CC §§ 249 ff). An identical situation prevails in Portugal (arts. 483 ff and arts. 562 ff). The converse is true of Austria where the general consensus is that this distinction is of no relevance for prevailing law (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I³, no. 3/12).

19. Greek legal teaching views the distinction drawn in German law between casuation as a basis for liability and causation as a determinant of the ambit of liability as a corollary of the manner in which German CC § 823(1) is structured and regards such a distinction as superfluous to Greek law (Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2], 473-474; Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 139; anders aber Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II(2)[4], 52).

20. Similarly, DUTCH law also adopts a distinction between liability itself (CC arts. 6:162 ff) and the limits of liability, the latter is employed to discern the scope of the damage (CC arts. 6:95 ff). Causation is examined under both of these headings. The courts first proceed by examining whether a causal link is extant in respect of the primary damage (personal injury, damage to property). An evaluation then takes place as to whether the actual loss and the ensuing financial losses can be causally linked (occasionally the terms primary and secondary causation are employed: Schadevergoeding I [-Boonekamp], art. 6:98, no. 4). It is well nigh universally accepted that a conditio sine qua non- link suffices to meet the test of primary causation (T&C Vermogensrecht[6] [-Lindenbergh], art. 6:162(1), no. 1; see also below). The assesment of the extent of the obligation to pay damages hinges on the test of imputability (CC art. 6:98). Within its confines, particular significance is accorded to the type of liability and to the purport of the infringed statutory rule of behaviour (see further Lindenberg loc. cit.; T&C Vermogensrecht[6] [-Oosterveen], art. 6:98, nos. 1-10; Boonekamp loc. cit.). Intermittently, it is espoused that CC art. 6:98 should also be relevant in assessement of whether primary causation is given (advanced by Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 432 p. 363 and no. 437 pp. 380-381 as well as van Schellen, Toerekening naar redelijkheid, 15, 32-33); this does not, however, correspond to prevailing academic opinion (see Schut, Onrechtmatige Daad[4], 83-91; Hijma and Olthof, Compendium van het Nederlands Vermogensrecht[3], no. 396 p. 268 und Lindenbergh loc. cit.).

21. In the NORDIC legal orders, this distinction is relevant, at the very least due to the mulitiude of statutory provisions facilitating a reduction of the extent of recovery on the grounds of equity and fairness, on this point see the notes under VI.–6:202 (Reduction of liability). Generally, great weight is not accorded to this differentiation.

III. Burden of proof

22. A basic tenet of tort law holds that the burden of proving that a causal nexus exists between the tortious conduct and the ensuing damage rests on the claimant. This is also the case in FRANCE (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[11], no. 164 p. 162). There are no restrictions on the evidence admissible to adduce proof and resort may also be had to evidential presumptions (Cass.civ. 24 May 1978, Bull.civ. 1978, II, no. 139 p. 111), thereunder to a "negative" presumption, according to which causation is established by ruling out all other probable causal factors other than the defendant's fault (Cass.civ. 10 June 2004, Bull.civ. 2004, II, no. 293 p. 247: a wave, which swept the claimant's husband out to sea, could have only come from the defendant's ship, given that proof that other ships were in the area at the time could not be adduced).

23. Similarly, in BELGIUM, the general rule holds that the onus of proving causation rests on the claimant (Cass.ch.réun. 1 April 2004, JT 2005, 357, note Estienne; see also Fagnart, RGAR 2006, 14080 no. 29). It is not sufficient that the trial judge has ascertainined that a causal link exists between the faute and the ensuing damage is highly probable. This link must be legally certain (Cass. 17 September 1981, Pas. belge 1982, I, 90; compare also Cass. 19 June 1998, Pas. belge 1998, I, no. 324 p. 763). Reservations surrounding the establishment of certain causation cannot be overcome by recourse to the theory of perte d´une chance (Cass.ch.réun. 1 April 2004 loc. cit. 356); as, namely, this analysis is only of relevance in respect of the quantification of damages (CA Mons 10 October 2005, JT 2005, 717).

24. SPANISH law does not recognise a reversal of burden of proof in the law of causation, in contrast to the law of negligence; according to the general rules, the onus is on the claimant to prove that there is a causal link between the defendant's conduct and the resukting damage (CCP [Ley de Enjuiciamiento Civil 1/2000] art. 217). The Supreme Court stauchly adheres to this analysis (e.g. TS 25 September 1999, RAJ 1999 [4] no. 7275 p. 11445; TS 30 June 2000, RAJ 2000 [3] no. 5918 p. 9083; TS 8 February 2000, RAJ 2000 [1] no. 1235 p. 1946). According to CCP art. 217(6), the claimant may be relieved of the burden of proof, in some circumstances, by virtue of the principles of kommt dem Kläger disponibilidad (availability/disposability) and facilidad (easiness/ facilitation?). This is of particular relevance in cases where the parties respective knowledge of the circumstances relevant to establishing the causal link is imbalanced and where, in complying with the evidentiary requirements would render the claimant subject to extraordinary financial expense, for example in medical negligence cases (TS 10 June 2004, RAJ 2004 [3] no. 3605 p. 7445; TS 29 November 2002, RAJ 2002 [6] no. 10404 p. 19265). Within the confines of medical neglience claims and a number of other areas, the courts have recourse to evidentiary presumptions. Particular significance is accorded to the socalled theory of disproportionate or extraordinary result" (resultado desproporcionado). This presumption entails that e.g. an inference is drawn that exceptional negative results from a course of treatment, in the absence of proof to the contrary, are regarded as having been caused by the initial surgical procedure (TS 18 March 2004, RAJ 2004 [2] no. 1823 p. 3435; TS 2 April 2004, RAJ 2004 [2] no. 2607 p. 5215; TS 7 October 2004, RAJ 2004 [5] no. 6692 p. 13644; TS 17 November 2004, RAJ 2004 [5] no. 7238 p. 14674).

25. In ITALY, HUNGARY, and POLAND, the onus is on the injured party to prove that a causal nexus exists between the alleged cause of the damage and the damage itself (Cass. 11 January 1982, no. 103, Giur.it.Mass. 1982, fasc. 1; Petrik [-Harmathy], Polgári jog II[2], 568; Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1230-1231; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 68; Czachórski, Zobowiązania[10], 251, for an exception see above Chapter 3, VI.–3:104, Notes, I 7). The same holds true for ROMANIA (CC art. 1169).

26. When compared with other European legal orders, SLOVENIAN LOA art. 149 derogates significantly from the norm in allocating the burden of proof. Within the framework of rules governing the liability for danagerous things and activities, this provision ushers in a general reversal of the burden of proof of causation: "Damage in connection with a dangerous object or dangerous activities shall be deemed to originate from the dangerous object or dangerous activities unless it is shown that such was not the cause."

27. According to GERMAN CC § 823, the onus generally lies on the injured party to prove the two prong test of causality. The possibility is however open to the claimant to rely on the rules governing prima facie evidence and in exceptional circumstances s/he can also benefit from reversal in the burden of proof in respect of causation which founds liability, which is of particular significance, if it is established that the defendant violated a protective law or statutory duty of care. This was the case where the defendant, a licensed operator of a facilty, constituting an environmental hazard, exceeded emission values laid down by adminstrative rules and by state authorities (BGH 17 June 1997, NJW 1997, 2748). Other illustrations are furnished by infringements of statutes aimed at accident prevention. The burden of proof is also shifted in cases of serious malpractice, namely, in cases where healthcare professionals breach their obligations (doctors, midwives) (BGH 27 March 2007, NJW 2007, 2767, 2769; BGH 27 April 2004, BGHZ 159, 48, 53; BGH 16 May 2000, NJW 2000, 2737). If an infraction of a protective law (CC § 823(2)) is established, then making out a prima facie case that this violation caused damage will suffice, provided that the enactment in question was aimed at avoiding the onset of a typical source of risk and if, subsequent to the violation, the type of damage which the protective law was devised to protect against, has ensued, subsequent to the violation (BGH 4 October 1983, NJW 1984, 432, 433; BGH 19 April 1991, NJW 1991, 2021, 2022; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 823, no. 80). Rules governing a reversal in the burden of proof in respect of causation are occassionally envisaged by statute (see. In particular the Environmental Liability Act [Umwelthaftungsgesetz] §§ 6 and 7).

28. In AUSTRIA the burden of proof lies on the claimant to prove that the defendant's conduct caused the ensuing damage (CC § 1296; vgl. Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 16/11). This general principle is harnessed in contract la was well as in field of tort law. However, this is only the prevailing tenet of general tort law. Exceptions to this basic premise can be found in a number of ad hoc statutes. These special regimes either employ rebuttable presumptions regarding causation (e.g. Genetic Engineering Act § 79a; Nuclear Energy Act § 12(1)) or a right to request information against the likely wrongdoer is conceded to the plaintiff. The judge can overcome difficulties in assessing the extent of recoverable damage by reverting to the rules governing loss appraisal (CCP § 273).

29. According to GREEK CCP art. 338, the onus of proof in respect of causality rests on the claimant. In legal commentary, the issue of the difficulty of discharging the burden of proof, particularly in medical negligence cases is adverted to, however, the solution to this problem remains with the remit of the legislature (Foundedaki, EllDik 35 (1994) 1226, 1230). Liapis, DEE 9 (2003) 138, 147 submits that, in respect of negligent representations in a prospectus, a socalled "typified causation" ought to suffice. The claimant is not required to prove that he had knowledge of the initial prospectus that was issued. It is sufficient that the issuing of the prospectus created a favourable selling climate for the financial product in question.

30. DUTCH courts have tried to accommodate the interests of the claimant by adulterating the burden of proof requirements in the field of causation. The obligation to keep records plays a significant role in cases of professional negligence. If the defendant cannot substantiate his arguments by reverting to his records, it is conceivable that his submissions on this point will be thereby rendered immaterial and disregarded by the court (HR 20 November 1987, NedJur 1988 no. 500 p. 1852; HR 13 January 1995, NedJur 1997 no. 175 p. 881; HR 10 January 1997, NedJur 1999 no. 286 p. 1521). The courts have even reversed the burden of proof requirement in a number of discrete fields. This shift is particularly prominent in cases where specific rules precribing conduct or (health and) safety regulations are infringed, and the ensuing damage falls within the protective remit of the violated norm (HR 16 November 1990, NedJur 1991 no. 55 p. 228; HR 23 June 1995, NedJur 1995 no. 730 p. 3718; HR 21 October 1994, NedJur 1995 no. 95 p. 396). In the interim, the courts have also reversed the burden of proof in cases dealing with the departures from standard practice (HR 26 January 1996, NedJur 1996 no. 607 p. 3388; HR 19 January 2001, NedJur 2001 no. 524 p. 3805; HR 16 June 2000, NedJur 2000 no. 584 p. 4079). The defendant is required to introduce evidence and prove that the damage would have ensued in any event, had the breach of duty not occured (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 434a p. 367; Sieburgh, WPNR 2001 no. 6450 p. 588). A particularly manifest application of the regulation of this general principle can be seen in CC art. 7:658(2), which governs injuries to employees resulting from the employer's contravention of Health and Safety Regulations. If the risk of damage was precipitated by the violation, and if damage of this kind materialises, then it is presumed that there is a causal link between the violation of the Health and Safety Regulations and the resulting damage (HR 17 November 2000, NedJur 2001 no. 596 p. 4376).

31. The general rule in SWEDEN is that the plaintiff has to prove causation. However, where there are two or more possible causes of damage the plaintiff will in most cases succeed if he can make his causal explanation "clearly more probable" than any other explanation, provided the plaintiff's explanation is probable in itself (HD 13 April 1977, NJA 1977, 176; HD 29 April 1981, NJA 1981, 622; HD 21 July 1982, NJA 1982, 421; HD 28 December 1993, NJA 1993, 764; HD 31 October 2001, NJA 2001, 657). Although there are still some doubts as to the groups of cases to which this rule applies (see in more detail Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 37), it is beyond dispute that it requires a probability which exceeds 51 per cent (Dufwa, Flera skadeståndsskyldiga, 2658; Nygaard, 41 Scandinavian Studies in Law 2001, 421). A reversal of the burden of proof is only rarely accepted. One exception is HD 4 May 1988, NJA 1988, 226, where the burden of proof was reversed to a person in possession of stolen property (not the thief), which was damaged, but it was disputed when the damage occurred. It was presumed that the damage had occurred in the hands of the defendant (see further Peczenik, Causes and Damages, 316). Also in DENMARK, the general rule is that the plaintiff has the full burden of proof; the probability test (under which proof of a probability exceeding 51 per cent suffices) has not been accepted (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 221; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 143). Nevertheless, several cases of intentionnally or grossly negligently inflicted bodily harm display a tendency to facilitate proving causation (see e.g. HD 16 April 2002, UfR 2002, 1496; von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 222; Gomard, Juristen 85 [2003] 132). In a tort based case concerning severe professional negligence of a lawyer, causation was even rebuttably presumed (HD 14 June 2002, UfR 2002, 2000). In HD 14 August 2002, UfR 2002, 2443, however, strict liability for the unsafe state of a passage in a warehouse was rejected for lack of proof of causation. In FINLAND, as in Sweden, it often seems sufficient for the plaintiff to show that his explanation of the causal link is more probable than any other possible explanation; the burden of proof then passes on to the defendant (Saxén, Skadestånd vid avtalsbrott, 133; Supreme Court 8 June 1993, HD 1993:80; Supreme Court 2 April 1990, KKO 1990:42). Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 58 draws attention to the difficulties which are affiliated with proving causation in cases involving omissions, contending that where an omission corresponds to the non-compliance with a statutory regulation, causation should be presumed. Proof of causation by proving a probability of at least 51% is sometimes explicitly recognised by statute (e.g. Swedish miljöbalken [Environmental Code, SFS 1998:808] chap. 32 § 3(3); Finnish lag om ersättning för miljöskador [Environmental Damage Compensation Act 19 August 1994/737] § 3 [here even mere "probability" suffices]; Swedish patientskadelag [Patient Injury Act (1996:799)] § 6; Finnish patientskadelag [Patient Injury Act of 25 July 1986/585] § 2; Danish lovbekendtgørelse of 24 March 1997 no. 228 om patientforsikring [Patient Insurance Act] § 2).

IV. The so-called egg shell skull-rule

32. A particular prédisposition de la victime does not have the effect of interrupting the chain of causation under FRENCH law. The general premise is that if a vulnerable plaintiff, would not have ended up the condition that he now finds himself in but for the conduct leading to liability, then this conduct also caused this loss (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[11], no. 179 p. 179). However, it is conceivable that the predispositions of the injured party will have an effect in the assessment of recoverable damages (Cass.civ. 28 November 1974, Bull.civ. 1974, II, no. 317 p. 261: accident ruptured maligant tumour tissue); the same also holds true, in the case that mutiple cause of the injury are present, the claimant's predispoition being one of those causes (CA Rouen 13 March 1986, GazPal 1987 Som. 136: Husband suffering from depression commited sucicide following the death of his wife in an accident). Victims, who suffered from a disability prior to the accident, have generally only a damages claim based on the aggravation of their pre-existing condition (Cass.ass.plén. 27 November 1970, Bull.ass.plén. 1970, no. 6 p. 9). However, it has been held that a defendant is liable for the full extent of a claimant's incapacity to work which only occurred following the loss of the claimant's remaining good eye in a hunting accident (Cass.civ. 19 July 1966, D. 1966, 598).

33. Similarly, the prevailing law in BELGIUM deems that the victim's predisposition does not break the chain of causation: the duty to make reparation extends to both foreseeable damage and to loss that is actually suffered (Ronse [-De Wilde, Claeys and Mallems], Schade en Schadeloosstelling I[2], p. 191 no. 255; Cass. 14 June 1995, Pas. belge 1995, I, no. 298 p. 630). An exception exists where the predisposition would have, in any event, caused the same injury as was caused by the defendant's wrongful conduct. In this case, the victim's damages are reduced. Legal scholarship postulated, in respect of the classical example employed in teaching, namely, the case of the one - armed man who loses his other arm as the consequence of an accident, that 100% recovery in respect of the incapacity to work would not be allowed (van Gerven [-Stijns], Verbintenissenrecht II[8]. 334). A converse position is adopted in France. In the light of CFI Turnhout 8 November 1994, Turn. Rechtsl. 1994-95, 40 it is not apparent that this approach correspond to that adopted by the courts.

34. The rule contained in VI.–4:101(2) appears to be the accepted rule in SPAIN (see CA Madrid 4 April 2005, BDA JUR 2005/106828 and, implicitly, also CA Baleares 19 September 2001, BDA JUR 2001/322667). An identical position prevails in ITALY.

As a general rule, pre-existing ill health on the victim's part prior to the accident is regarded as being immaterial. This state of affairs by itself is considered to amount to an inadequate concurrent cause of the ensuing damage (Cass.sez.pen. 1 March 1989, Cass. Pen. 1990, I, 838; Cass.sez.pen. 24 March 1986, Cass. Pen. 1986, 1924=Riv.it.med.leg. 1988, 612). The judge is furthermore precluded from reducing the amount of damages. The premise is as follows; either it is espoused that a wholly inadequate consequence is concerned (Busnelli, Il danno biologico, 202; Bona, Danno e resp. 2005, 353), that, simulataneously, a forza maggiore is implicated which has the effect of precluding the imposition of liability, or that the defendant is liable to compensate the full extent oft the damage (Cass. 2 February 1991, no. 981, Nouva giur. civ. comm. 1991, I, 797; Cass. 9 April 2003, no. 5539, Resp.civ. e prev. 2003, 1074; Cass. 4 November 2003, no. 16525, Giur.it.Mass. 2003, fasc. 11).

35. At the time of writing, the rule anchored in VI.–4:101(2) has been the subject of occassional discourse in HUNGARY. It seems that the matter is viewed with some sceptism. Loss is only recoverable if it was foreseeable under normal circumstances. Therefore, for example, liability will not be imposed, if a person who previously underwent brain surgery, succumbs to his/her death because of a small slap in the face (Bárdos, Polgári Jogi Kodifikáció, 2004, issue 5-6, p. 5). In the other words, the wrongodoer may not be liable to pay damages, if s/he would not be capable of recognising the serious medical condition of the aggrieved party. However, the courts will more readily assume foreseeability in the case of an intentional act than where a loss is attributable to a negligent act (Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 69-70).

36. POLISH legal writing and case law do not devote particular attention to the issue. Some scholars consider that where an act causes a personal injury due to the abnormal predispositions of the victim, the damage, although inevitable, is not to be regarded as an adequate consequence (Radwański [-Dybowski], System prawa cywilnego III(1), 259). This position seems to be adopted by the case law too. In SN 22 June 1972, OSNCP 1973, poz. 46 the court denied the liability of the employer for the mental disease of a dismissed employee on the ground that the disease resulted from his particular psychological predispositions. A similar position was taken in SN 21 June 1976, OSPiKA 1977, poz. 106. The court recognised that the suicide of a schoolgirl might constitute a normal consequence of her consultation with the doctor, in the course of which the doctor expressed the suspicion she had contracted a venereal disease, unless the suicide resulted from the mental abnormality of the victim. To date, the ROMANIAN Supreme Court has determined that where a plaintiff's pre-existing illness was exacerbated by nervous shock of great magnitude sustained in an accident, the defendant could be made accountable for this course of events (Tribunalul Suprem, decision no. 1589/1974, cited by Adam, Drept civil, 290).

37. According to GERMAN law, similarly, the attribution of responsibility will not be forestalled owing to some inherent factor in the victim's constitution which makes him/her more susceptible to injury and which facilitates the actual damage caused or amplifies it (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[66], Pref. to § 249, no. 67; MünchKomm [-Oetker], BGB[4], § 249, no. 133; Erman [-G. Kuckuk], BGB I[11], before § 249, no. 51; Staudinger [-G. Schiemann], BGB [New Edition 2005], § 249, no. 35). A person who injures a person in ill health or person with a frail constitution, cannot expected to be treated in the same manner, as far as the asssessment of liability is concerned, as if s/he had injured a person in optimal health (BGH 29 February 1956, BGHZ 20, 137, 139; BGH 30 April 1996, BGHZ 132, 341, 345; BGH 19 April 2005, NJW-RR 2005, 897, 898). Attribution of responsibility is not excluded on the basis given that, apart from the event giving rise to the duty to compensate, there may be other factors contributing to the damage that has occured (Heinrichs loc. cit. no. 66; BGH 10 May 1990, NJW 1990, 2882, 2883). The case is otherwise, if a course of events takes a wholly unexpected turn (BGH 3 February 1976, NJW 1976, 1143 [minor defamation leading to cerebral haemorrhage]; BGH 6 June 1989, NJW 1989, 2616 [stroke resulting from an altercation concerning who was responsible for a traffic accident]). In the case of a victim, who, owing to an earlier accident, is predisposed to injury, and who sustains injury in a subsequent accident, the party responsible for the earlier accident is liable for further loss sustained by the victim, provided that the preceding accident either established the victim's vulnerability or at the very least increased the plaintiff's sensitivity (BGH 20 November 2001, NJW 2002, 504; cf. also BGH 16 March 2004, NJW 2004, 1945). In general, the same reasoning is employed to deal with pre-existing psychological conditions (CA Hamm 2 April 2001, NJW-RR 2001, 1676). However, exceptions exist for cases of socalled "compensation neurosis", where the expectation that damages will be awarded impedes recovery (BGH 29 February 1956, BGHZ 20, 137, 142; BGH 8 May 1979, NJW 1979, 1935, 1936).

38. A basic tenet of AUSTRIAN law holds that the tortfeasor has to take his victim as he finds him. The risk that the injury could bring about consequence of varying degrees in persons with different states of health, is allocated to the wrongdoer (OGH 19 June 1973, 8 Ob 110/72; OGH 12 June 2003, JBl 2004, 111, 112). Furthermore, even if the magnitude of the ensuing injury can be attributed to the predisposition of the plaintiff, in legal terms the injury remains wholly attributavle to the conduct of the wrongdoer (OGH 7 February 1974, 2 Ob 6/74). The victim's vulnerability is only of relevance to cases which concern the socalled superseding causation. This entails that the wrongdoer is capable of adducing proof that the damage which occured would have resulted in any event without any action taken on his part (OGH 15 December 1992, JBl 1993, 663). In these cases, the wrongdoer will not be required to answer for the full extent of the damage, merely for the acceleration of its occurence (OGH 25 March 1999, SZ 72/55; OGH 22 May 2002, 7Ob 86/02a).

39. As a general rule, GREEK courts have rejected the notion that the victim's vulnerability can break the chain of causation (CA Athens 9835/1984, Arm 39 (1985) 118; ErmAK [-Litzeropoulos], Pref. to arts. 297-298, no. 60; Foundedaki, EllDik 35 (1994) 1226, 1230; Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2],, 507 [this issue is examined futher in the context of the protective purpose of the rule doctrine]).

40. The principle contained in VI.–4:101(2) is, apart from the law pertaining to occupational injury, rarely considered in Portugal. It has been propounded by some legal scholars that it is prima facie unjust that to alone tortfeasor alone is burdened with the risk that he might injury a person with physical or psyhological abnormalities. Special case must be excerised in respect of the latter as regards the participation in general dealing with others by virtue of CC art. 570(1) (Contributory negligence) (Brandão Proença, A conduta do lesado, 192 and 199). Moreover, it follows from the general doctrine of adequate causation that the tortfeasor should not be held accountable for unusually grave consequences deriving from a minor injury (Galvão Telles, Obrigações[7], 404; Almeida Costa, Obrigações[10], 764; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[8], 629). In medical negligence cases, the predispositions of the victim operate to reduce damages claims. The classical example employed in teaching is that of where the victim loses the use of his only functioning eye (Esperança Pina, A responsabilidade dos médicos[3], 125). The Labour Code art. 287(1) and (2) represents a deviation from the general principles (STJ 4 June 2003, Proc. 02S3304) and provides that the "pathological predisposition of the accident victim does not exclude the right to full compensation except when such predisposition was concealed. When the injury or illness following the accident is worsened by prior injury or illness, or when the latter is worsened by the accident, the incapacity will be determined as if it had all resulted from the accident, unless the victim had already been compensated for the prior injury or illness". CA Coimbra 1 June 2006, Proc. 478/06 applied the exception anchored in art. 287(1) to the employee's disadvantage, who, while sustaining a diabetic shock, was injured by a machine.

41. DUTCH cases, in which, in contrast to the normal run of events, the resulting damage, owing to certain physical or psychological predispostion of the victim, is amplified, primarly encompass post traumatic disorders, from which the victim has never fully recovered from. According to decisions of the Hoge Raad, the wrongdoer must answer for all oft he consequences flowing from the physical injury. The fact that the damage partly arose owing to a preexisting condition on the part of the victim, save for an exceptional turn of events, is immaterial. However, the predisposition will have an impact on the measure of damages, and will operate to restrict the amount of damages awarded (HR 8 February 1985, NedJur 1986 nos. 136 and 137 pp. 497-514). In a similar manner to other European jurisdictions, the prevailing principle in the Netherlands holds that the wrongdoer must take his victim as he finds him and that the victim's predispostions do not have the effect of breaking the chain of causation (van Wassenaer, Eigen Schuld, 213).

42. There is no ESTONIAN statute in force that recognises a corresponding rule to that contained in VI.–4:101(2). Howver, legal scholarship is in favour of such a rule. At the time of writing, there was no decided case law on the issue (Lahe and Tampuu, Training Guide for Judges 2006).

43. In the NORDIC Countries the 'egg shell skull' rule is generally acknowledged, and sometimes coined as "one finds the plaintiff in the state as he or she is" (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 208; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 243; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 143; Danish HD 20 August 1996, UfR 1996, 1334; Swedish HD 25 November 1992, NJA 1992, 740 I and II; Finnish Supreme Court, HD 1950 II 240).

VI.–4:102: Collaboration

A person who participates with, instigates or materially assists another in causing legally relevant damage is to be regarded as causing that damage.

COMMENTS

Purpose. This Article establishes the rule that persons who collaborate in causing legally relevant damage are to be regarded as causing the damage. Normally the question at issue here is liability for intention – on the part of the main actor and the persons with a contributory role. In cases of liability without intention or negligence collaboration is not conceivable. That is because in those cases no conduct of the liable person is required. In cases of instigation or assistance, all parties act intentionally. Where accomplices are involved, it is conceivable that as a consequence of an intentional antecedent wrong, merely negligent consequential harm then comes about, for which all accomplices are solidarily liable, even where their participation was not active. Several thieves can also become collective holders of a stolen vehicle; they are already liable under VI.–3:205 (Accountability for damage caused by motor verhicles).

> Illustration 1
> A, B and C have stolen a car and wish to bring it to a safe place. A sits at the wheel, B in the passenger seat and C in the back seat. Through a driving error during the nervous getaway, A causes damage to the car or to property belonging to a third party. B and C are also liable for this because the theft and getaway rested upon a common resolution of intent and a common plan. This liability results from the present Article. Liability as holder of the vehicle under VI.–3:205 (Accountability for damage caused by motor verhicles) remains unaffected.

Scope. This Article relates to the causation of damage by participants, instigators and accessories or aiders. It concerns situations which may be described as ones of "psychological causation". This is because the issue here is responsibility for having either brought about the resolution of intent of the person acting directly or having spurred that person on in the relevant conduct. Since all three classes of persons are treated alike, no precise differentiation among them is required. Hence the wording of the rule deliberately avoids the use of terminology from criminal law.

Relation to VI.–4:103 (Alternative causes). The present Article requires a conscious and wilful co-operation of the participant in the causation of damage. If this is present every person acting causes the damage. In contrast, VI.–4:103 (Alternative causes) deals with cases in which multiple occurrences are possible alternative causes of the damage – where, in other words, it is an open question whether one person or another has caused the damage but where it is clear that either the one or the other caused it. Where a case falls under VI.–4:102, there is consequently no room for the application of VI.–4:103; this is because under the former Article it is already given that each collaborator is regarded as causing the damage. Moreover, VI.–4:103 may also come into play in cases of strict liability, whereas VI.–4:102 presupposes a liability for some misconduct.

Relation to VI.–6:105 (Solidary liability). VI.–4:102 must be read in conjunction with VI.–6:105 (Solidary liability). Participants, instigators and accessories are solidarily liable with the (principal) wrongdoer.

At a public meeting, a son reads the text of a speech drafted by his father, which contains serious defamatory attacks on the personal and professional reputation of another. The media report on this event and on the defamatory allegations made in the speech. Both father and son are looked upon as the cause of the third party's damage; they are solidarily liable.

A, B, C and D had drawn up a plan to poach X's customers through the provision of false information on X's supposed infringements of copyright law. A drafts and (alone) signs the relevant letter. B, C and D have also caused X's damage (see VI.–2:208 (Loss upon unlawful impairment of business)).

Collaboration. VI.–4:102 only relates to cases in which several persons collaborate to cause one and the same damage. This applies e.g. to the thief and the receiver of stolen goods in relation to the owner. Conversely, where collaboration is absent, the case is then one of so-called concurrent wrongdoers. Such persons, who act independently of each other or are independently responsible for different sources of danger, are solidarily liable under VI.–6:105 (Solidary liability) where the same damage is attributable to each of them, for instance, where liability results from the positive act of one party and the omission of another or where an employee is liable for intentionally inflicted damage and he employer is subject to strict liability for the same damage.

Members of a group. During the preparation of this Book, intense discussion took place on the issue of whether a further rule should be adopted in addition to this Article. Under this mooted rule, where a member of a group intentionally causes a third party a legally relevant damage, other members of that group would be liable for the damage in so far as the risk of intentional occurrence of damage of that type was foreseeable and those members should have abstained from participating in the group. It was also discussed whether this liability should rest only upon those who were present at the scene of the wrong and whether their liability should only come into play in a subsidiary fashion. This suggestion was, however, rejected as being too far-reaching. The main objection was that such a rule, which would forego the requirement of collaboration and would be based solely upon "membership" in a group, would not be capable of being brought into harmony with the freedom to demonstrate.

Participants. "Participants" in the sense of the Article are those persons who either play a part in carrying out an overall plan (one person breaks into a house in order to make away with items from it, the other stands at the door and keeps a look out or waits in the getaway car), or persons who indeed do not participate in the actual act of wrongdoing themselves, and yet stay "in the background" maintaining command or co-command over the course of events. Injurious conduct of the primary acting party going beyond the original common plan will be attributed to them as a consequence of their own participation in the act, unless there are extraordinary circumstances.

Instigators. Instigators cannot make the excuse that the acting party wished to carry out the act and did so intentionally. Rather, the Article makes it clear that this does not break the chain of cause and effect between the incitement and the legally relevant damage. The decisive point is that the instigator has provided the party acting with an additional reason to take action. It is not necessary that the instigator was the person who first put the idea into the acting party's mind.

Illustration 4
Students have occupied an empty house in order to draw attention to what in their view are indefensible machinations of local property dealers, who are apparently raising the price of property by reducing the availability of accommodation. The police attempt to clear the property and an affray with the students breaks out on the ground floor. On the floor above other students call out heated encouragement to their colleagues below. The students in the upper storey have caused damage to the police officers even if the students below would have initiated the affray without their calls to arms. On the other hand the students in the upper storey are not causally connected if, in the tumult below, their encouragement could not be heard.

Accessories. Accessories or aiders support the person acting directly in carrying out the act, but have no influence over whether it actually comes about or not. The requirement is that the aider knows of the general outline of the primary act and wishes to assist in it. There is no negligent assistance; the same goes for assistance with a negligent act.

NOTES

1. The point of departure in FRANCE is CC art. 1202. By virtue of this provision, there is no presumption of solidary liability (solidarité). However, heretofore Cass.civ. 11 July 1892, D. 1894, I, 561, note Levillain determined that, in the event that loss to the injured party is caused by the faute of several (concurrent?) wrongdoers, the duty to compensate for the entire loss sustained by the plaintiff falls individually on each debtor, provided that there is a direct and immediate (notwendig, is this what is meant here?) causal nexus between each faute and the resulting damage. In such cases, liability is said to be incurred in solidum. This type of liability sets forth that one single (or the same) damage is caused by several faits générateurs. Nowadays, no distinction is made between gardien liability and liability which derives from a faute (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 864 p. 839). Liability in solidum does not arise, if several coauteurs have caused different damage and the respective causes of the damage can be independently apportioned (Cass.civ. 19 April 1956, JCP 1956 éd. G., 9381). On the hand, there is no requirement that the faits générateurs be contemporaneous (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats (2006/2007), no. 1741). A coauteur, who has paid the entire compensation, is entitled to recover contributions in proportion to the part in the loss sustained played by the other coauteurs (CC art. 1251(3)). The same principle applies, if the insurance company is to pay for the loss (in respect of the latter (Code des Assurances art. L121-12.) If the claimant renounced his/her claim against one of the coauteurs, the remaining tortfeasors, despite the rule anchored in CC art. 1251 can initiate a recourse action against the co-debtor who would have otherwise, if sued, have been liable (Cass.civ. 7 June 1977, Bull.civ. 1977, I, no. 266 p. 210).
2. The starting point in BELGIUM pursuant to CC art. 1202 is identical to that prevailing in France. Similarly, the consistent position adopted by the Cour de Cassation has been that whenever damage is caused by fautes concurrentes of several debtors, each is liable, in solidum, for the whole of the damage (Cass. 26 April 1996, Pas. belge 1996, I, no. 138 p. 392). However, the courts have displayed a tendency, whenever intentional fautes and negligent fautes concur to disregard the latter in this context (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene, TPR 2000, p. 1917 no. 166). As regards concurrent criminal offences, in this case, by virtue of CP art. 50, solidary liability is incurred. In contrast to France, it can be of significance in Belgian law to ascertain the exact constitutents of the fait générateur in the instant case. It is true to state that, the faute of a third party will not, in principle, operate to exclude the imposition of liability on the gardien for a defective thing (CA Gent 8 June 1994, R.W. 1996-97, 1063), however, in the context of where liability is imposed on the keeper of an animal (CC art. 1385), the faute of a third party can operate to break the chain of causation, if the third party was responsible for the fait de l´animal (Cass. 19 January 1996, Pas. belge 1996, I, no. 41 p. 85). Incidentally, the rules governing the bringing of recourse (contribution?) actions against (fellow concurrent wrongdoers? (co-debtors) has developed along the same lines as in France (CC art. 1251(3); Cass. 9 March 1992, Pas. belge 1992, I, 607).

3. Within SPANISH tort law it is beyond doubt that if several persons participate under a common agreement with the purpose to cause a damage, they all are jointly liable, even if it clear that only one of them materially caused the damage (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Pantaleón], Código Civil II[2], 1983; Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños[3], 143; TS 20 February 1981, RAJ 1981 [1] no. 756 p. 610). The same rule applies if damage is caused by crime (CP art. 116(2)). The rationale for the rule is namely, that the existence of a plan formulated by the tortfeasors would have to entail that each of them is liable for the whole of the damage caused (TS 11 July 2006, BDA RAJ 2006 no. 4977; Pantaleón loc. cit.; Gómez Calle, in Reglero Campos (coord.), Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3]. 499).

4. The ITALIAN Civil Code does not contain a corresponding provision to VI.–4.102 (CC art. 2055 corresponds to VI.–6:105 (Solidary liability); see the notes following this rule), however, collective participation in the commission of a tort entails that each individual wrongdoer is jointly and severally liable, provided that s/he contributed to creating the risk that damage would ensue (Bianca, Diritto civile V, 648; De Cupis, Il danno, 273-275). It is widely accepted in case law and legal commentary that the rule contained in CP art 113 (criminal liability for collaboration in a crime of negligence) is also applicable in the private law context (De Cupis loc. cit. 275; Monateri, Manuale della responsabilità civile, 141; Cass. 18 October 1982, no. 5425, Giur.it.Mass. 1982, fasc. 9). Seemingly, there is no requirement that the parties be aware that their individual actions converged to amount a single joint action (Visintini [-Capecchi], I fatti illeciti III, 52; Cass. 15 January 1996, no. 268, Danno e resp. 1996, 521). CFI Rome 3 February 2003, Giur. romana, 2003, 291, held that the organisers of an event were liable as "instigators" and were obliged to compensate damage caused by an angry mob. The crowd's wrath was vented because the entry tickets sold exceeded the seats available.

5. HUNGARIAN CC § 344 provides for solidary liability in the case that two or more defendants "jointly" cause damage. The notion of "jointly causing damage" has been broadly interpreted. It is not a prerequisite that the defendants acted with a common purpose in mind. The fact that, viewed objectively, they acted in concert will suffice to make them solidarily liable (Petrik [-Harmathy], Polgári jog Kommentár a gyakorlat számára II, 581-582; Gellért [- Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata I, 1238-1240; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan, 75-80; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 93-95; Bárdos, Kárfelelősség a Polgári Törvénykönyv rendszerében, 54-55). Whether the exertion of psychological influence will be regarded as (not causal) mere advice or as (causal) instigating the decision to commit the [tortious] act will be determined by the courts upon examination of the circumstances of the individual case (Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 64-65). In the context of private law, no sharp distinction is drawn betweeen joint enterprise, incitement, and aiding and abetting a crime/tort. All three categories entail that the parties are "jointly" responsible for causing the damage compare e.g. BH 1980/471. The thief and receiver of the stolen goods are jointly and severally liable to the victim (BH 2004/145), furthermore, the person who negligently facilitated the commission of an intentional offence is solidarily liable with the immediate tortfeasor (BH 2008/118, BH 2000/198; compare. also EBH 2000/199). This dovetails with the legal position prevailing in BULGARIA. According to LOA art. 53 e.g all co- principals involved in the theft of a car are solidarily liable for damage to property directly caused by person who was driving the car, (Supreme Court 10 May 1978, decision 1207 in civil matters no. 116/1978, first chamber). In ROMANIA, the courts reach the same result by adverting to the general doctrine of causation (Tribunalul Suprem, decison no. 1769/1982 in criminal matters, cited by Adam, Drept civil, 296); it is proposed under the Draft Civil Code that this rule will be codified in art. 1107 (Proiectul Noului Cod civil, 217). SLOVENIAN LOA art. 186(2) conforms in all essential points to VI.–4:102. VI.–4:102 corresponds to POLISH CC art. 422, according to which liability for damage is incurred not only by the person who directly caused the damage, but also by one who induced or helped another to cause it and by one who knowingly took advantage of it. The general view is that the rule is based on the so-called normative relation between the act and the damage; in such a case the question whether there was an adequate causal link is irrelevant (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[7], 89; Radwański [-Dybowski], System prawa cywilnego III(1), 271).

6. GERMAN CC prescribes solidary liability for the event that several persons are responsible for damage deriving from a tortious act. CC § 830 governs three discrete cases of participation, namely the joint commission of a tortious act, (Abs. 1 Satz 1) its instigation and when the tortfeaor aids and abets in ist commission (Abs. 2). The legal consequences are identical in each case. Each tortfeasor is jointly liable for the whole of the damage. It is not a prerequisite to prove that the defendant directly caused the damage (BGH 7 November 1978, BGHZ 72, 355, 358). Joint enterprise where several persons collaborate to cause the same damage, instigation and aiding and abetting are notions which derive from criminal law and the meaning given to these terms pursuant to CP §§ 25-27 has been transposed into the civil law. Accordingly, joint enterpise denotes a deliberate and willed collaboration on the part of the participants to achieve a certain result (BGH 11 May 1971, NJW 1972, 40, 41). Under this framework, the contributions of the parties concerned are imputed to each tortfeasor (BGH 24 January 1984, NJW 1984, 1226, 1228; BGH 4 November 1997, NJW 1998, 377, 381 f.). A prerequisite as far as secondary particiption (incitment and aiding and abetting) is concerned is that the tortfeasor deliberately assisted in the commission of an intentional act by a third party. "Instigation" denotes that the tortfeasor procured the commission of the act giving rise to damage by the principal tortfeasor. "Aiding and abetting" denotes every assistance that is intentionally rendered, i.e. conduct that encourages the tortious conduct of the principal wrongdoer, which strengthens his resolve to commit the act, which facilitates the commission of the act. For these purposes, mere psychological encouragement will suffice (see further Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 830, no. 3; MünchKomm [-Wagner], BGB[4], § 830, nos. 9 and 19).

7. AUSTRIAN CC § 1301 speaks of joint participants in the commission of a tortious act, instigators and accessories (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 14/5). "Joint" commission of the tortuous act pursuant to CC § 1301 is not only established if there is a common understanding amongst the tortfeasors to inflict t damage. It is sufficient that the tortfeasors were in agreement that they would collaborate to achieve a certain purpose and in so doing, damage was inflicted negligently on a third party (OGH 12 February 1998, SZ 71/22; OGH 21 October 1999, SZ 72/156), for example, within the scope of a common demonstation (OGH 25 March 1999, SZ 72/55). In respect of harm that is inflicted intentionally, the parties are solidarily liable. Conversely, in respect of damage that is inflicted negligently, solidary liability is only imposed if the respective individual contributions to causing the damage cannot be iascertained (CC § 1302). In the following decision by the OGH, it was held that all three wrongdoers were jointly and severally liable for damage inflicted on the claimant, who, when he attempted to obtain assistance for his companion mishandled by two oft he wrongdoers, was set upon and injured by the third (OGH ZVR 1998/6). It is possible for a joint tortfeasor who is found liable to seek contributions from the co-debtor. The size oft he share to be contributed by the other parties in the internal relationship will depends on the extent of their input in causing the damage and the degree of respective fault (OGH 23 February 1999, SZ 72/35). In cases of doubt, the parties in the internal relationship are liable to pay equal shares (Koziol and Welser, II[13], 327).

8. Pursuant to GREEK CC art. 926, solidary liability is imposed in the case that the ensuing damage was caused by the colloborative action of several parties. Any contribution to the unlawful act of another which can be regarded as causal for damage that resulted, will suffice (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 926 no. 5; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 572; a narrower interpretation is adopted in Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II(2)[4], 92). Intention is not a prerequisite. It is sufficient, for example that, independently of each other, two individuals omitted to adopt necessary preventative safety measures. Joint enterprise, instigation, aiding and abetting are self evident components of CC art. 926. Further, cases of the socalled direct contemporaneous causation (which occurs when damage is caused solely by the convergece of two acts;namely, one act on its own would not have been sufficient) and "double causation" (each single act was sufficient, taken on its own to cause the entire damage) (Georgiades loc. cit. no. 10; Kornilakis loc. cit. 573). It has been espoused that CC art. 926 should be applied, even in constellations where a certain act contributes to the perpetuation of the damage (For example: the stolen goods are hid by a third party: Georgiades loc. cit. no. 12; Kornilakis loc. cit. 574).

9. PORTUGUESE CC art. 490 corresponds in all essential elements to VI.–4:102. Each participant in the commission of a tortious act is solidarily liable (CC art. 497). This is also true for those who steal and those who receive stolen goods, (STJ 29 March 1989, BolMinJus 385 [1989] 379) or for the author of a defamatory text and the person who reads it out loud in public (CA Oporto 10 March 2005). CC art. 490 does even have a intentional colloboration as a prerequisite. Negligent co-participation will suffice (STJ 11 March 1999; Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 101 [1960] 121).

10. For each participant (deelnemer), the DUTCH CC art. 6:166 precludes the possibilty to assert that his contribution to the commision of the tortious act was not causal. Members of a dangerous "group" are already liable for the fact that they joined the group (TM Parl. Gesch. VI, 662; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], nos. 93-94 p. 114-116; T&C [-Lindenbergh], art. 6:166, no. 1 p. 2340): Reliance is no longer placed on the parties' individual contributions to causing the damage because participation in the activities of a group that one should not, in the first place, have joined, suffices for liability to be imposed. A prerequsite is conscious and willed collective conduct, whereas there is no requirement that a common purpose to inflict damage be extant (Hartkamp loc. cit.). It must be possible for the participation to be imputable according to the general rules of tort law and the person who is responsible for directly causing the damage mus have committed a tort in the sense of CC art. 6:162 (Lindenbergh loc. cit.; Hartkamp loc. cit. no. 93 p. 115). It can be derived from CC art. 6:102 that the members of the group are solidarily liable.

11. ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(4) tallies with this Article.

12. Similarly in the NORDIC countries if several persons collaborate in causing damage or injury it is generally accepted that they are jointly liable for the damage caused (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 216; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 149, 307; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 342). The concept of 'psychological causation' allows the question as to who of the collaborators actually initiated the chain of causation to be disregarded (Vinding Kruse loc cit. 150). In Swedish HD 15 December 1980, NJA 1980, 670 a school pupil brought (A) staples with him to school and distributed them. It was common practice that the pupils would fire pieces of papers tied with rubber bands, however, now they stepped it up a notch and began using the staples. A classmate (B) injured a another pupil (C). A and B were solidarily liable for the damage inflicted to C.

VI.–4:103: Alternative causes

Where legally relevant damage may have been caused by any one or more of a number of occurrences for which different persons are accountable and it is established that the damage was caused by one of these occurrences but not which one, each person who is accountable for any of the occurrences is rebuttably presumed to have caused that damage.

COMMENTS

Loosening requirements for establishing the chain of cause and effect. The aim of this Article is to facilitate the establishment of a causal link between legally relevant damage and conduct in breach of duty or flowing from a source of danger even in certain cases where such a link would have to be denied under VI.–4:101 (General rule) paragraph (1) or under VI.–4:102 (Collaboration). Where under the rule in VI.–4:101(1), a legally relevant damage is to be seen as the consequence of either the wrongdoing (etc.) of A or the wrongdoing of B (or of C, etc.) but it is not possible to conclusively say that it was the consequence of A's behaviour or of B's behaviour, the effect of the present Article is that the damage is presumed to be the consequence of the conduct of A as well as of B (and of C etc.). Each is free, however, to prove facts from which it may be gathered under VI.–4:101(1) that his or her conduct in breach of duty was not part of the causal chain.

Policy considerations. Such a special rule requires justification. This is to be found in a general consideration of justice. A person who breaches a duty owed to the injured person or exposes that person to a greater risk should not be exonerated from liability solely because another person also breached a duty owed to the injured person and it is no longer possible to say which of the breaches of duty caused the damage. The corresponding risk of inexplicability must be borne by those in breach of duty and not by the injured person.

> Solidary liability falls on the operators of two mountain coal-mines, in which the injured person worked under conditions of exposure to an unreasonably high health risk; even if it can no longer be determined in which of the two work places the person contracted the illness. The position would be different if a social insurance scheme for accidents at work provided a different solution for such cases (VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) and VI.–7:104 (Liability of employees, employers, trade unions and employers' associations)).

General requirements. The Article aims to relieve the victim of an undue necessity to prove facts from which a court, under VI.–4:101 (General rule) paragraph (1), would have drawn the conclusion that the legally relevant damage suffered by the victim is to be regarded as a consequence of a particular person's intentional or negligent conduct (or a source of danger for which that person is responsible). It is not intended to do more. The victim must therefore, as before, prove the existence of a legally relevant damage and that the other person would be liable for the damage suffered if the causality of that person's contribution is supposed. The victim must also establish that the other person belongs to that circle of persons of whom it can be said with certainty that one caused the damage. On the other hand the Article is not intended to provide the victim with an additional person against whom a claim can be made. If it is clear that a particular person is fully responsible for the damage, but that person is not financially capable of making full reparation, there is no reason why the victim should have the windfall benefit of other persons to sue. The same holds true where it is clear that two persons have respectively caused different damage.

Illustration 2
In a traffic accident, for which T is responsible, O is thrown from a bicycle on to the tarmac. T stops, but is not able to prevent a following vehicle (driven by F) from hitting O. It is not clear which injuries O had sustained before the second collision. T is liable for the full damage because T's conduct was causal in relation to the subsequent accident and the injuries it entailed. F is not liable for the full damage; but is at most liable for a share of the damage to be assessed on the basis of the rules of civil procedure (If no such assessment is possible, F is not liable at all.) The situation would not be different if T failed to stop and left the scene unidentified. As regards the share for which F is liable, T and F are solidary debtors. The case is not one for the application of VI.–4:103.

Illustration 3
An employee A suffers a lung disease. It is not clear whether this disease is triggered by a single proximate exposure to a particular chemical or an accumulation of such exposures. Successive employers of A in breach of their duty failed to protect A from the hazard posed by this chemical. It is therefore uncertain whether only one (and, if so, which one) of these breaches of duty has caused A's damage or whether both have. The causation by each of these breaches of duty is presumed; VI.–4:103 dispenses with A's difficulties of proof.

Illustration 4:
Two hunters discharge their weapons at the same time and in the same direction. A third party is hit and injured, once in the left leg and once in the right. Weapons specialists can say, however, from which weapon each relevant shot was fired. Each hunter is liable solely for the consequences of his shot; the case does not fall under VI.–4:103. It would be different where the victim had only been injured by one shot, and it could no longer be established from which of the weapons the shot in question had come.

Different persons must be accountable. In relation to the claimant's legally relevant damage, the Article requires that the various parties fulfill the requisites of liability of VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) (except for causation) and that at the least it is established that the damage is the consequence of the intentional or negligent conduct of one of the persons or the consequence of the realisation of a source of danger for which one of these persons bears responsibilty. It is thus not necessary that these persons, assuming causation in each case, have acted culpably or that their liablility arises out of the same attributive cause.

Illustration 5:
Cows from two different herds which graze on the same pasture attack a man and fatally injure him. It is later no longer possible to say whether just one cow caused the fatal injury or whether it was more than one and it is also no longer possible to determine, to which of the two herds the cow(s) belonged. Both of the respective keepers of livestock are solidarily liable. Persons who, without being livestock keepers themselves, were to supervise the animals and neglected to carry out the supervision necessary under the circumstances are likewise solidarily liable (VI.–3:102 (Negligence)).

The damage must be caused by one of two or more occurrences. It is, however, necessary that "it [be] established that the damage was caused by one of these occurrences". This is not the case where it is unclear whether one of the occurrences brought about the damage at all. VI.–4:103 particularly does not bring in any market-share-liability, thus no pro rata liability for damage from products of an ambiguous origin attributed according to the market share of their manufacturers.

Illustration 6
The claimants' mothers had during their pregnancy taken medication, which was marketed in the same chemical formula under different brand names by competing companies. This medication caused the claimants to suffer from cancer of the uterus years later. They cannot say, however, which brand of medication the mothers bought at the time, nor even whether the medication taken came from any one of the companies which they now seek to hold liable; the medication may well have come from a company which does not exist any more. VI.–4:103 does not help the claimants' with either of these difficulties. An "occurrence" within the meaning of VI.–4:103 is lacking. This is because even if all of the companies were active and present in the market, the claimants could not prove that each had unleashed a danger on their mothers. In other words, it is not even ascertained that any one of the mothers took medication from different companies. The people involved simply cannot remember who brought about the cause of damage. This does not suffice for VI.–4:103.

Defences. Each person accountable for one of the occurrences may not only prove a lack of responsibility for the damage due to factual reasons, but may also show that another defence from Chapter 5, including the possible contributory fault of the injured person, is available.

Illustration 7
Several children throw stones in the injured person's direction. It is no longer possible to establish which child hit the injured person's eye with a stone. The parents of one of the stone throwers can prove, however, with the aid of a witness who happened to be at the scene, that in any event the only stone thrown by their child went in a different direction. Only the other parents are liable.

Illustration 8
The injured person, X, was consecutively employed by several employers and was exposed to asbestos dust at the workplaces. The severe lung disease that X contracted can be caused by even a single inhalation of particular asbestos particles. It is consequently unclear whether the disease was contracted when X worked for employer A or employer B; it is clear only that both acted negligently. A and B are solidarily liable. If contributory fault is attributed to X because of a failure to wear the necessary protective clothing, X's claim is to be correspondingly reduced, and this holds true whether the contributory fault occurred during the period of employment with A or with B. In contrast, if X had occasionally pursued the same occupation in a self-employed capacity, so that the cause of the illness could have been due to that independent exposure during the same time period, VI.–4:103 does not apply. In such a case it cannot even be established that either A or B caused the damage.

NOTES

1. A number of older French decisions declined to impose liability in theset of circumstances enumerated by VI.–4:103. This disinclination was rooted in a strict application of the conditio sine qua non test.(e.g. Cass.civ. 4 January 1957, D. 1957 jur. 264: two men fired contemporaneously in the direction of a fellow hunter, resulting in him suffering hand and facial injuries; his claim was rejected by the courts because it could not be clarified which weapon fired the shot). However, subsequently, the Cour de Cassation veered in a more claimant friendly direction and decided that the solidary liability of the defendants who had possibly caused the damage was grounded either on the assumption that participation in the dangerous activity was capable of being qualified as a common faute (so Cass.civ. 6 March 1968, Bull.civ. 1968, II, no. 76 p. 52: a group of seven youths threw stones at other adolesecents, one person was hit but the actual perpetrator could not be identified; all seven members were held to be solidarily liable because they had collectively participated in the dangerous activity), or on the assumption that all of the participants were gardiens of the object which caused damage.(of this view Cass.civ. 13 May 1975, Bull.civ. 1975, II, no. 88 p. 73: two hunters fired simultaneously in the same direction and generated a cloud of pellets thereby injuring a third hunter; solidary liability was imposed, based on the implicit rationale that both hunters were collectively gardiens of the "cloud of pellets").
2. If it is determined that the cause of the damage must be attributed to at least one member of a group but the actual offender's identity cannot be established, then similarly in BELGIUM all of the members of the group are regarded as having collectively committed a causal faute, provided that they had hitherto reached an understanding that they would collectively bring about the dangerous situation. In such a case, proof that the direct cause of the damage emantated from another member of the group will not serve to excuplate the other members from liability. In contrast, if the fautes of several parties coincide purely by happenstance and it remains unclear who was concretely responsible for causing the damage, then according to prevailing legal doctrine, the claim must be dismissed (Bocken and Boone, TPR 2002, 1625, 1665, nos. 41-43).
3. With the exception of an ad hoc regulation in the SPANISH Hunting Act (Ley 1/1970 of 4 April) art. 33(5)(ii) (which imposes strict liability on all the participants to a hunting party for the damage caused while hunting, when the author of the damage remains unknown), there is not, within the scope of Spanish tort law, any general provision dealing with the issue of alternative causes. Most legal writers consider that all members of the group should be solidarily liable unless they are able to show that they did not cause the damage (de Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 877-888; Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños[3], 143; Díez-Picazo, Derecho de daños, 167-168; contra, however, Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Pantaleón], Código Civil II[2], 1984). The Supreme Court follows the opinion of the prevailing doctrine, see e.g. TS 8 February 1983, RAJ 1983 (1) no. 867 p. 602 (several children were playing by throwing different objects; one of these objects caused injury to another child; solidary liability of all parents of the children that were throwing objects); TS 13 September 1985, RAJ 1985 (1) no. 4259 p. 3591; TS 11 April 2000, RAJ 2000 (2) no. 2148 p. 3316; TS 2 November 2004, RAJ 2004 (5) no. 6864 p. 13956 (illustration 5 above). There are of course a number of decisions, in which there was a refusal to impose liability along the lines of VI.–4:103 on the basis that proof of causation had not been established. see TS 2 April 1996, RAJ 1996 (2) no. 2984 p. 4005 and in TS 26 November 2003, RAJ 2003 (5) no. 8354 p. 15639.

4. Similarly the ITALIAN Zivilgesetzbuch does not contain a provision which corresponds to 4:103; the absence of such a provision was criticised, without success, before the Constitutional Court.(Corte Cost. 4 March 1992, no. 79, Foro it. 1992, I, 1347, note Ponzanelli). It is suggested in legal writing that a finding that the members of a group are solidarily liable will not be precluded in any event, if the individual culprit cannot be identified, provided that the ensuing damage emananted from a group acting in a collective manner, for example, from a riotous group of people who broke into a licensed premises and smashed up corporeal moveables. Otherwise, it is, of course, necessary to identify the instigator of the damage; it will not suffice to prove that the defendant had involved himself in a group where, within the parameters of the group, there was a number of possible contenders for causing the damage (Bianca, Diritto civile V, 648). The premise is as follows, namely that solidarily liability should only be imposed on several parties, if those parties all played a role in causing the ensuing damage (Cass. 13 May 1989, no. 2204, Giur.it.Mass. 1989, fasc. 5; Cass. 4 June 1977, no. 2294, Arch.Giur.circolaz. 1977, 261).

5. The question of alternative causation is rarely a matter of deliberation under Hungarian legal doctrine; statute law is silent on this issue. However, case law has arrived at a pratically identical result as that contained in VI.–4:103, see e.g. BH 1995/214 (woodscrews were thrown from a group of primary school pupils; a fellow student suffered an eye injury as a result; the courts imposed solidary liability on all those who were involved in throwing the screws, even though it was unclear who actually succeeding in hitting the injured pupil) and BH 1991/314 (damage caused by firecrackers used by members of a music ensemble; liability of all the members was affirmed; the initial step of inquiry did not relate to who threw the firecracker).

6. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 186(3) embodies the same rule as that contained in VI.–4:103. There is no rule under POLISH law corresponding to VI.–4:103. The majority of scholars contend that where there are two or more dangerous occurrences which could have caused the damage and it has been established that the damage was caused by one of them, but not which one, all the persons accountable for these occurrences are solidarily liable, as they all caused the dangerous state (Radwański [-Dybowski], System prawa cywilnego III(1), 264). Solidary liability has been accepted by the Supreme Court where two persons were “strictly” liable for one damage (one as the possessor of the construction – CC art. 434 – and the other as the operator of an installation – CC art. 435) and neither could prove facts allowing them to escape liability (SN 4 July 1985, LEX no. 8724).

7. According to the GERMAN CC § 830(1) second sentence, where several “participants” are involved in causing damage, each participant is liable for the damage caused, if it cannot be conclusively ascertained which party’s conduct was actually responsible for the damage caused. The purpose of this provision is to overcome the evidential difficulties which a claimant is confronted with, if it is unclear, when more than one person is involved, which party was the culprit responsible for the damage caused, or, if it transpires that the individual role that each party played in causing the ensuing damage can indeed be established, however the actual share of damage attributable to each individual involved cannot be calculated with any degree of success. The premise is that a damages claim, in the event that the damage has been caused by several parties, ought not to fail due to the fact that the “real” culprit cannot be conclusively ascertained (BGH 15 December 1970, BGHZ 55, 86, 88). The prerquisites for such a claim are as follows (i) that, causation excepted, each party involved acted in a manner which would serve to ground tortious liability (ii) that, at any rate, one of the parties involved has caused damage and (iii) it cannot be conclusively ascertainined which of the participants was directly responsible for the damage that ensues (BGH 12 July 1996, NJW 1996, 3205, 3207; BGH 23 May 2006, NJW 2006, 2399; BGH 7 November 1978, BGHZ 72, 355, 358). The claim does not hinge upon whether the liability is based on fault, presumed fault or on the creation of a risk (strict liability?) (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 830, no. 7; Staudinger [-Belling and Eberl-Borges], BGB [New Edition 2002], § 830, no. 72; BGH 15 December 1970, BGHZ 55, 96, 98; BGH 22 July 1999, NJW 1999, 3633, 3635). Parties are only "involved", if their conduct is factually, spatially and temporally connected to the damage, i.e .constitutes a homogeneous event (BGH 15 November 1960, BGHZ 33, 286, 291). Each party involved can refute the presumption of causation in his/her favour (Sprau loc. cit. no. 11; BGH 23 March 1999, NJW 1999, 2895). If it is ascertained that one party is the culprit and thereby responsible for the entire damage caused, then the other parties, who only potentially caused the damage, are not not liable (BGH 22 June 1976, BGHZ 67, 14, 20; BGH 18 December 1984, VersR 1985, 268, 269). Even if only one involved parties can rely on a ground of defence, this entails that the other involved parties are also exonerated from liability (BGH 17 December 1952, LM no. 2 under § 830 BGB). The other parties are also relieved of liability if the injured party was also an " involved party" (BGH 8 May 1973, NJW 1973, 1283; BGH 30 January 1973, BGHZ 60, 177).

8. GREEK CC art. 926 (second sentence) corresponds in all essential points to VI.–4:103. Examples, apart from hunting accidents, include where a passer- by falls victim to a street affray, or car collisions where a cyclist suffers injury but cannot conclusively prove which car struck him (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 926 no. 17). It is a matter of some dispute whether CC art. 926 (second sentence) can be applied to cases corresponding to illustration 2 above (in favour Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 580; in opposition Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II(2)[4], 97).

9. An earlier decision of the PORTUGUESE courts dealing with inconclusive alternative causation declined to make a finding that the parties involved wer solidarily liable. This conclusion was reached on the basis that there was a failure to establish proof of causation (STJ 9 December 1959, BolMinJus 92 [1959] 301). This approach of the courts continues to be supported in contemporary legal commentary (Pereira Coelho, O problema da causa virtual, 24 fn. 5). Within the framework of preparatory materials which led to the introduction of the Portueguse Civil Code, Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 84 (1959) 138 strongly advocated the adoption of a cognate provision to that of VI.–4:103. However, CC art. 493(2) only introduced a rebuttable presumption to the detriment of the person who inflicted damage on another owing to the nature of the dangerous activity exercised or owing to instrument employed to carry out the activity (see further on this point Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 617). The issue of causation is not dealt with under CC art. 493(2); therefore the matter remains to be tackled under the general rules of tort law.

10. If the damage that ensues may have be caused by any one of a number of occurences for which differents persons are accountable for and if it is determined that that the damage was caused by at least one of these occurences, then, pursuant to DUTCH CC art. 6:99, each of these persons is liable. The onus of proof in respect of causation is reversed in such cases (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 346). The legal basis of liability is irrelevant; liability can be imposed on the basis of fault or strict liability (Schadevergoeding I [-Boonekamp], art. 6:99, no. 3 p. 11). There has been much discussion of late whether the case law of Supreme Court dealing with DES-pharmaceutical product case (HR 9 October 1992, NedJur 1994 no. 535 p. 2474) is compatible with the Product Liability Directive (of this view Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht I[12], nos. 441a-b p. 388-392). According to the judgment of the Hoge Raad, CC art. 6:99 is, in any event, also applicable if the contribution of one involved party to causing the damage is uncertain whereas in respect of the other involved party it is beyond doubt that they played a role in causing the damage .(HR 31 January 2003, NedJur 2003 no. 346 p. 2777 [dealing with two successive arson attacks]; see Boonekamp loc. cit. no. 4 p. 12; Hartkamp loc. cit. no. 441b p. 391; Akkermans, WPNR 6043 [1992] 249).

11. ESTONIAN LOA § 138(1) corresponds in all essential points to VI.–4:103. LOA § 138(2) permits each party involved to exculpate themselves by adducing proof that they did not cause the damage. Pursuant to LOA § 138(3) liability is assessed in proportion to the probability that the involved party caused the resulting damage.

12. In SWEDEN, as noted above under VI.–4:101, the plaintiff must make his causal explanation "clearly more probable" than any other possible explanation, provided, the plaintiff's explanation is probable in itself (HD 28 December 1993, NJA 1993, 764; HD 31 October 2001, NJA 2001, 657). HD 21 July 1982, NJA 1982, 421 concerned personal injury from pharmaceutical drugs used during x-ray examinations. The defendant pharmaceutical company claimed that the injury was sustained by another company's drugs which were also used during the examinations. Each of the drugs were considered as probable causes, but the defendant's not as the 'clearly more probable' one, so that the claim was dismissed (this case met with much criticism, however, see Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 201; Dufwa, Flera skadeståndsskyldiga, 2659, 3007; Schultz, Kausalitet, 494). The result is that a special provision concerning solidary liability in the event that alternative tortfeasors are at work has not been enacted (Dufwa loc. cit. 3008). However, HD 31 July 1961, NJA 1961, 425 previously affirmed solidary liability in a case where it could not be conclusively ascertained in the case of two competing torts, what share of the damage can attributed to each tort. In contrast to Sweden, in the interim, it appears that in FINLAND (see Supreme Court 14 June 1990, KKO 1990:78 and Supreme Court 11 April 1990, KKO 1990:47) and in DENMARK in (of a different view Eastern CA 15 June 1914, UfR 1914, 897) it is universally accepted that where alternative causes are involved, unless proved otherwise, all the parties involved are solidarily liable (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 151-152; Westen CA 30 December 1948, UfR 1949, 439 [a girl was injured by two boys who fired sling shots in her direction; both boys were held jointly liable]; Western CA 2 July 1894, UfR 1894, 1042 [three hunters fired in the same direction; all three were held to be solidarily liable, although it was not clear which of them was direcly responsible for injuring the victim]; contra, however, von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 239) (HD 22 October 1982, UfR 1982, 1111 concerned a gas explosion which had killed several persons, the leak could either be attributed to A or B. A, who was sued, was held to be the considerably more likely source).

CHAPTER 5: DEFENCES

Section 1: Consent or conduct of the person suffering the damage

VI.–5:101: Consent and acting at own risk

(1) A person has a defence if the person suffering the damage validly consented to the legally relevant damage and was aware or could reasonably be expected to have been aware of the consequences of that consent.

(2) The same applies if the person suffering the damage, knowing the risk of damage of the type caused, voluntarily takes that risk and is to be regarded as accepting it.

COMMENTS

A. Chapter 5 in overview

The notion of defence. The subject-matter of this Chapter is the defences open to a person against whom a claim is made under this Book. Even where the requisites of VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) are fulfilled, such a person is relieved of liability where and to the extent that one of the defences in this Chapter is available (see VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (a)). It is to be assumed that, under the general rules of evidence, the factual prerequisites for a defence are to be presented by the person founding on them and where contradicted must then be evidenced. A defence can extinguish liability but may also, depending on its type and on the circumstances, be used to reduce the level of damages.

Five Sections. The five Sections in the Chapter are structured not according to dogmatic categories, but according to predominantly factual aspects. In particular, they are not based on the distinction known to some legal systems between "justificatory" and "exculpatory" grounds. This is because technically speaking the category of "justificatory grounds" requires "unlawfulness", which is not actually one of the requisites of liability for these model rules (VI.–1:101 (Basic rule)). Section 1 contains those defences that are derived from consent or other contributory conduct on the part of the injured person, like consciously incurring danger or participating in a criminal act. Cases of justifiably serving one's own or another's interests are the subject-matter of Section 2, with Section 3 handling situations where the damage-causing risk was uncontrollable. Section 4 deals with contractual terms excluding or limiting liability and Section 5 deals with a particular problem in the area of damage suffered by family members.

Further defences. Further defences may result from Book III (in particular Chapter 7 (Prescription)) and indirectly also from such rules of national law as are mentioned in Chapter 7 of this Book (Ancillary rules). This is because these model rules are silent on issues that permeate the law on extra-contractual liability from other legal quarters. Thus, further defences may be derived from e.g. the fundamentally protected rights to freedom of opinion and of the press or from the special protection of marriage and the family which is constitutionally guaranteed (see VI.–7:101 (National constitutional law)). Judges and lawyers may enjoy certain privileges in relation to the law on liability (see VI.–7:103 (Public law functions and court proceedings)), and employees are often not personally liable for damage that they inflict on other persons in the course of their employment unless very strict conditions are satisfied (see VI.–7:104 (Liability of employees, employers, trade unions and employers' associations)). This Book leaves these issues (and their corresponding defences) completely untouched. Apart from such matters the list of defences in the present Chapter is formulated conclusively. The Group saw no adequate grounds for having more rules on exceptions than are here mentioned.

B. Consent (paragraph (1))

The basic principle. Paragraph (1) expresses a rule which is to be found in all European systems of law on non-contractual liability for damage, although it is only rarely codified expressly: any person who inflicts damage (that is legally relevant, within the meaning of Chapter 2) on another with the latter's previous consent, commits no civil wrong. It would have been possible to formulate the rule so as to provide that damage which is occasioned with the consent of the victim is not legally relevant vis à vis the latter party, but that would have lost the element that the person committing the injury must make out the requisites for (effective) consent. Of course, this does not rule out the reality that there are cases in which the previous consent of the injured person to certain conduct also leads to the situation under these rules that the very existence of legally relevant damage is to be denied. Such situations no longer involve paragraph (1) of the present Article.

> A theft (and consequently an infringement of property rights) is not committed by a person who takes another's property with the owner's permission; a breach of confidence is not committed by a person who is authorised by the relevant person to publish the entrusted information. Upon approval, it ceased to be "confidential" within the meaning of VI.–2:205 (Breach of confidence).

The injured person. Paragraph (1) covers legally relevant damage of every type. An "injured" person is therefore not only someone who suffers a bodily injury (for fatal injuries, see VI.–5:501 (Extension of defences against the injured person to third persons)), but also any person who has consented to damage of another type, e.g. property damage. (See also the definition of "injured person" in Annex 1.) On the other hand, paragraph (1) assumes that in principle one can consent to an infringement of one's own bodily integrity, e.g. to an operation, a tattoo, to the cutting of hair or to certain sexual practices that are connected with the infliction of pain.

Non-contractual liability and contract. The consent can be part of a contract (e.g. a contract with a construction company on the demolition of a building or a contract for medical treatment). It can also constitute counter-performance for some payment or other performance by the other party (permission, in exchange for payment, to exploit a copyright or to build over the border between two pieces of land). Issues such as whether the consent in such cases is to be qualified as the acceptance of an offer for the conclusion of a contract or as the fulfilment of a contractual obligation and whether the contract law regime displaces the law on non-contractual liability, are questions to be answered solely by contract law. In principle, contractual and non-contractual liability freely compete under these rules, see VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (c).

> Illustration 2
> X commissioned Y to chop down trees in X's nursery and shred them. A dispute emerges as to whether X had also instructed Y's workers to chop down lime trees and oak trees to the left and right of a path. Y has the burden of proving this instruction. This affects X's claim in damages against Y as well as Y's (possible) claim for payment from X under their contract.

Consent, acting at own risk and contributory fault. Consent and acting at one's own risk will rule out a claim in damages. Where contributory fault alone is in issue the claim may also be completely precluded under special circumstances; but this is not the case as a rule. In a case where contributory fault is present, the claim is typically only partially reduced (VI.–5:102(1) (Contributory fault and accountability)).

An employee of a farm-owner transports an inebriated man on a tractor trailer, together with a large amount of wood. Soon after the driver starts to travel with excessive speed and the passenger is thrown from the trailer and crushed by its wheels, suffering severe bodily injury. The employer of the tractor driver is liable for the damage because the passenger did not consent to the harm or voluntarily expose himself to the risk of injury in such a manner that it must be inferred that he accepted it. The injured man is, however, subject to 50% contributory fault.

Consent. The previous agreement of the injured person is what is to be understood under the term "consent". Subsequent agreement ("approval") can have the effect of waiving a claim in damages but does not take away the unlawful character of the behaviour. The situation is different only in cases in which the approval transforms an originally unlawful act into a lawful benevolent intervention in another's affairs, see V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) paragraph (1)(b) and VI.–5:202 (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity) paragraph (2). Consent need not be expressly given; it may result from the circumstances thus it is implicitly conferred. The person giving consent decides on the scope of the consent; a mistake by the other person on the extent of the consent given may exclude negligence, depending on the circumstances of each individual case.

By way of a clearly visible sign, the owner of a car park warns persons who store their vehicles on her premises without authorisation that she will demand a release fee. In order to enforce it, she puts a wheel clamp on the claimant's car. The claimant in this case gave implied consent to this infringement of property rights.

Illustration 5
A, an actress, is involved in a photo reportage. This implies agreement to publication, but not to the publication of any random photo, where it is clear under the circumstances that A wants to examine the selection in order to avoid the situation where pictures are released that in her view have not turned out well.

Consent as a defence against purposeful conduct. The defence of consent under paragraph (1) requires purposeful conduct on the part of the other person. "Consent" to inattention is excluded; such cases come under the rules on the acceptance of a risk in paragraph (2). In the case of the latter, the person accepting the risk knows that there is a specific danger and accepts it but then hopes that it will not transpire. Conversely, in consent cases, typically both sides envisage that the primary injury will occur. Of course, in such cases consent also rules out liability under Chapter 3, Section 2 (Liability without intention or negligence).

Illustration 6
A and B plan an insurance fraud. A drives A's worthless vehicle into B's already damaged vehicle, with B hoping to be able to shift the previous damage on to A's third-party insurance. B has neither a claim under VI.–3:101 (Intention) nor a claim under VI.–3:205 (Accountability for damage caused by motor vehicles) for the second damage and indeed not even where it is not A, but C who is the owner of the other vehicle.

Valid consent. Only valid consent will preclude liability. Paragraph (1) does not, however, specify the requirements for "valid" consent. Life is too multi-faceted and legal structure-requirements too complex for a detailed rule on this issue. The typical grounds of invalidity of consent are: lack of capacity of the injured person; the absence of sufficient information before the consent was given; and illegality or immorality.

Lack of capacity. Valid consent requires that the person giving consent be of sound mind. A person who, while completely inebriated, agrees to allow a similarly drunk contemporary to drive her home, does not confer valid consent and does not validly accept the risk of an accident. For persons under age, however, no general rule could be stated, because European rules for minors are not yet in existence (see I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(a). The issue of minors' capacity to consent must therefore be developed from the Member States' general law on minors. Where the consent has the disposition of property as its contents or consequence, then it rests on the corresponding rules of the relevant applicable contract or property law. Often special rules apply to consent to medical operations. However, it can be said that even with the approval of the parents, curative medical operations against a minor's will are no longer admissible where the minor has attained a sufficient degree of maturity to make the decision not to be operated upon.

Informed consent. Consent is valid only where the person giving consent knows or at least has a general idea of what the other party plans to do and what consequences this conduct will have or could have, in the event that things turn out unfavourably. Therefore, paragraph (1) links this defence to the requisite that the person giving consent "is aware or could reasonably be expected to be aware of the consequences of that consent". The rule thereby seeks to express the recognised rules on the requirement of "informed consent". Its main field of application lies in the law on curative medical operations, for which – as long as they result from a contract – further elaboration is to be found in the commentary under IV.C.–8:108 (Obligation not to treat without consent).

Illegality. Consent can also be invalid because it contravenes the law or is incompatible with basic ethical values of the legal system. Of course, on a more specific level, the more pertinent question to be posed in each case is why a law prohibits certain behaviour (even making it criminally punishable) even in the case where the party injured expresses agreement with it. Where the prohibition does not serve the protection of the individual, but the protection of the public interest, then consent further rules out civil liability.

Benevolent interventions in another's affairs. Where effective consent is lacking or where the consent granted does not extend to the actual concrete events, then the defence of benevolent intervention in another's affairs in particular also comes into focus for the originator of the damage. Of course, the prerequisites for this must all be satisfied.

C. Acting at own risk (paragraph (2))

The basic idea. Paragraph (2) expresses a general consideration of justice. A person cannot complain about damage if that person has voluntarily incurred exposure to the danger of it arising and thereby indicated acceptance of the risk of damage occurring. The rule's main practical field of operation lies in the realm of participation in martial arts or dangerous sports, but it is not confined to that. In principle its application is conceivable for all fields of the law on liability, e.g. as a defence against product liability, vehicle liability or liability for animals and as against liability for the unsafe condition of land, which would arise in its absence.

Systematic considerations. The rule also has the purpose of providing the defence of acting at one's own risk with a self-contained and independent place in the overall system of liability. The circumstance that the claimant freely accepts the risk that is then realised can play a role in several contexts. Usually, the first test is whether the other person acted negligently under the circumstances. In football, for instance, physical contact is a part of the game and the higher the division, the higher the contact. Therefore, certain behaviour is allowed on the pitch that is prohibited in normal life, and even an infringement of the rules of the game does not necessarily lead to the inference of negligence. This is because not only do the rules of the game not equate with legal rules, they also frequently serve a different purpose than the protection of players. Even in combat sports, the defence of voluntary assumption of risk is only brought to bear where negligence on the part of the opponent or team-mate is established. Conversely, where the acceptance of a risk is in issue, there is no more room for a test of contributory fault; the acceptance of a risk rules out liability. This also applies where from the outset there is no room for a test for negligence because the basis of liability is the liability of a keeper within the meaning of Chapter 3, Section 2. Further, there is a certain proximity between the assumption of a risk and the contractual exclusion of liability. The defence of the voluntary assumption of a risk is not, however, bound to the restrictive prerequisites of VI.–5:401 (Contractual exclusion and limitation of liability).

Knowing the risk of damage of the type caused. Paragraph (2) requires that the injured person was aware of the type of damage risked. The amount or magnitude of the damage is not at issue here, but rather its type, thus e.g. personal injury, property damage, or economic loss.

> Illustration 7
> During a sailing regatta, a collision occurs, resulting in the death of one of the sailors. There is no room for the defence of voluntary assumption of risk because it did not relate to risking one's life.

Voluntary exposure to and acceptance of the risk. The decisive point is that the injured person voluntarily incurred exposure to the risk and that a neutral bystander would come to the conclusion that the injured person did indeed accept the risk (if not also the damage). To this extent, everything hangs on the circumstances of each case. One of the factors to be considered is the distinction between a mere leisure activity and a sporting exercise governed by rules; only in the latter case do the participants typically accept the dangers inherent in the sport because only then can it be said that it ultimately depends on the mere chance of "whom it will hit today". The form of the cause of damage is also to be considered, as well as why the injured person incurred the exposure to the risk.

Illustration 8
A football player kicks an opponent out of anger, leaving the opponent severely injured. At this point the ball is no longer near the incident because the flow of the game had shifted long before. There is no acceptance of this risk.

Illustration 9
A sixteen-year-old girl embarks on a trip with a female friend and two young men. The friend and one of the men split off from the group. In order to get home that evening (the last bus has already left), the girl sits in the other young man's passenger seat, although she knows that he only has a provisional driving licence. In an effort to show off, he drives too fast, causing an accident. The girl did not voluntarily accept the risk.

NOTES

I. Consent

1. In FRANCE, while it is indeed true that the maxim volenti non fit iniuria is generally recognised, however, that a person can legally consent to the infliction of bodily injury is the matter of some controversy. A number of exceptions to this principle are extant. This is particularly the case in respect to operations which are deemed to be medically necessary (CC art. 16-3; see further Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10], no. 131 p. 60-61; on liability for cosmetic procedure further Cass. 22 November 2007, JCP G 2007 no. 51). If the expressed consent to a particular course of action of the other party results in a contract (as is often the case of consent to an operation, cf. for BELGIUM Vansweevelt, De civielrechtelijke aansprakelijkheid van de geneesheer en het ziekenhuis, 48), then the contractual liability law supercedes tort law; the principle of non cumul des responsabilités applies. Liability will be imputed for a failure to fully disclose the medical risks associated with the operation (CA Mons 27 September 2005, Rev.gén.Ass.Resp. 2007 no. 14323), if the failure to fully inform was causal for the resulting damage (which was rejected e.g. in CA Liège 25 September 2006, Rev.gén.Ass.Resp. 2007 no. 14324 wurde).
2. Likewise, in SPAIN a distinction is required to be drawn depending on whether pecuniary interests or non pecuniary interests are involved. The consent of the owner of pecuniary goods is legally effective (see further Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 353). The legal status in respect of non pecuniary goods is more complex i.e. in respect of personality rights because they are regarded as comprising of inalienable rights. Consent can be given to infringements to the rights of protection one's honour, the right to protection of a sphere of intimacy and right to control the reproduction of one's own image given that there is an express statutory mechanism providing for the effectiveness of consent (Law 1/1982 on Civil Protection of the Right to Honour, to a sphere of intimacy and a right to control the reproduction of one'e image art. 2(2)); the consent can be revoked at any time (loc. cit. art. 2(3)). Furthermore, the Tribunal Supremo regards consent to infringements oft he right to honour as legally binding (TS 7 March 1990, RAJ 1990 [2] no. 1677 p. 2228; TS 1 July 1992, RAJ 1992 [4] no. 6499 p. 8488; TS 30 November 1992, RAJ 1992 [5] no. 9458 p. 12411; TS 19 July 2000, RAJ 2000 [4] no. 6753 p. 10329). In contrast, consent to death and consent to infringements of bodily intergrity is generally ineffective (Yzquierdo Tolsada loc. cit. 351). Consent to medical procedures connotes an exception to this rule (see further G 41/2002 of 14 November, on Patient Autonomy and on Rights and Duties in respect of Information and Medical Records [Ley 41/2002 básica reguladora de la autonomía del paciente y de derechos y obligaciones en materia de información y documentación clínica] arts. 2-5 and 8-11).

3. In ITALY, the defence of consent under private law is prinicipally governed by the criminal law, more specifically by CP art. 50 (Cass. 24 February 1997, no. 1682, GCM 1997, 303). The defence also pertains to infringements of bodily integrity as governed by CC art. 5, therefore, in particular medical procedures (Cass. 15 November 1999, no. 12621, Foro it. 2000, I, 3588; Cass. 8 November 1994, no. 9261, GCM 1994, fasc. 11). The rules on legal capacity govern consent to breaches of corporeal rights (CC art. 2).The same holds true for consent to the collection and storage of personal data (Decreto legislativo 30 June 2003, no. 196, Codice in materia di protezione dei dati personali, Suppl.ord. no. 123 alla Gazz. Uff. of 29 July, no. 174). For the remainder, it depends on whether the injured party can lawfully dispose of the right. It is not possible to lawfully dispose of the right to life (CP art. 579). CC art. 5 probits the lawful disposition of rights of bodily integrity if the disposition has the effect of creating a permanent physical impairment or if on other grounds it would contravene the basic values of the legal order or would be contra bonos mores (Cass.pen. 11 July 2002, no. 26446, Foro amm. CDS 2003, 2902). As far as medical procedures are concerned, a distinction is drawn between procedures which are deemed medically necessary and cosmetic surgery. There is not an unfettered application of CC art. 5 as far as medically necessary procedures are concerned; occasionally the courts have rejected the applicability of the defence in this area (Cass. 15 January 1997, no. 364, Riv. it. med. leg. 1998, 345). It is requirement that the patient be informed about the significance and risks entailed with the operation. If the patient is not in a position to consent, then a relative can consent in the patient's stead (Cass. 8 November 1994, no. 9261, Giust.civ.Mass. 1994, fasc. 11). If a close relative cannot be reached, then the operation can be justified on other grounds (in an emergency; exercise of an activity permitted by law). Difficulties arise in repect of justifying a merely cosmetic procedure (see further e.g. Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[6], sub CC art. 5). Organ transplants or partial organ transplants are the subject of special regulations in an array of statutes (Kidneys: Legge 26 June 1967, no. 458 [Gazz. Uff. 27 June, no. 160, edizione straordinaria] Trapianto del rene tra persone viventi; cornea: Legge 12 August 1993, no. 301 [Gazz. Uff. 17 August, no. 192] Norme in materia di prelievi ed innesti di cornea; Liver: Legge 16 December 1999, no. 483 [Gazz. Uff. 20 December, no. 297] Norme per consentire il trapianto parziale di fegato; Bone marrow: Legge 6 March 2001, no. 52 [Gazz. Uff. 15 March, no. 62] Riconoscimento del Registro nazionale italiano dei donatori di midollo osseo; Taking of blood and removal of specific cells: Legge 4 May 1990, no. 107 [Gazz. Uff. 11 May, no. 108] Disciplina per le attività trasfusionali relative al sangue umano ed ai suoi componenti e per la produzione di plasmaderivati).

4. HUNGARIAN CC § 342(2) makes clear that compensation can be recovered if the damage was caused with the assent of the injured party and the damage caused does not endanger or cause harm to any social (public) interest. Harm is caused to a social interest e.g assent is given to the destruction of an object to which is endowned with public importance e.g. a valuable painting, a building, it can also even comprise of a field given over to the production of grain (Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 53). Consent is not effective if the result is to endanger third party interests, e.g. consent to laying of a fire (Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 35). Further, CC § 75(3) provides that the rights to bodily integrity, health and life are not regarded as having been infringed if the holder of the right consents to the infringement provided that the assent does not entail that the a social interest is transgressed or endangered. Therefore, consent to medical surgical procedures is valid provided that an appropriate steps are taken to properly inform the patient about the nature of the proposed operation – of its risks and the consequences should treatment be refused (Szalma, Okozatosság és polgári jogi felelősség, 91, 151; Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1238; BH 2000/536). Even in the case of terminally ill patients, euthanasia is not permitted; it is not possible for a person to consent to conscious termination of one's own life (Kemenes loc. cit. 1237; Petrik loc. cit. 35-36). Further, ROMANIA recognises consent as a ground of defence. This defence contemplates an agreement between the parties and legal capacity and a right to dispose oft he relevant right are prerequisites of this accord. In particular, this encapsulates consent to infringements of corporeal rights; the defence of consent can be invoked in respect of physical injuries resulting from partaking in sports and in respect of medical procedures (cf. CC art. 998; further Adam, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, 288; Dogaru and Drăghici, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, 238; Romoşan, Vinovăţia în dreptul civil român, 85). The Draft of the new Civil Code contemplates in arts. 1136 und 1137 comprehensive regulations on the validity of consent and on the waiver of liability before the putative tortious event (Proiectul Noului Cod civil, 223).

5. SLOVENIAN 140(1) provides that "any person that allows another person to do something to the former's detriment may not demand from the latter the reimbursement of the damage that the latter thereby inflicted". However, one cannot validly consent to an unlawful action (LOA art. 140(2) in conjunction with arts. 14 und 86). Consent is a unilateral legal transation and the rules pertaining to declaration of intention apply (Obligacijski zakonik s kommentarjem [-Pensa], I, 817-818). In POLAND, an individual's consent renders the putative tortfeasor's conduct lawful (Supreme Court 11 April 2006, I CSK 191/05, OSNC 2007, no. 1, pos. 18, p. 111). The defence of consent is however not expressly regulated under the Civil Code (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[5], 183; Pietrzykowski [-Banaszczyk], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 415 no. 27), however, numereous provisions regulating special cases are found elsewhere (e.g. CP art. 27 § 2 [Consent to participation in an experiment]; CP art. 192 [medical treatment without consent]; Law on Mental Health [Official Journal 1994.111.535] arts. 21, 22, 26 and 28 [Consent to psychiatric treatment]). A It is always necessary to prove that the victim had a right of disposal over the legal interest (Przybylska, MoP 2003/16/740, LEX no. 38745; Bieniek [-Bieniek][5], art. 415 no. 5). Jehovahs witnesses have the right to refuse a blood transfusion prior to an operation, even where that decision could endanger their life (Supreme Court 27 October 2005, III CK 155/05, OSNC 2006, nos. 7-8, pos. 137). Consent is partly classified as a unilateral juridical act and is governed by the general rules on declaration of intent (so Supreme Court 27 October 2005 loc. cit.), and partly categorised as an act which has connotations of a legal transaction but to some degree has a different status (see further Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit.; Pietrzykowski and Banaszczyk loc. cit. no. 30). In BULGARIAN legal doctrine, similarly it is universally recognised that consent operates to vitiate the unlawful conduct of the tortfeasor (Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast, 347). It is yet to be clarified whether under the private law, consent to an act can be operative, if that act contravenes the law or is contra bonos mores (Takov, Bulgaria).

6. Likewise, a general proposition under GERMAN law is that consent, validily given, renders lawful the violation of the legal interest lawful (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 823, no. 38). Consent does not amount to a jurdical act (Medicus, Schuldrecht II[13], no. 765; Erman [-Schiemann], BGB II[11], § 823, no. 147; MünchKomm [-Wagner], BGB[4], § 823, no. 666; Soergel [-Spickhoff], BGB[13], § 823, no. 119), however, in order to flesh out its contours, the general principles on the interpretaion of juridical declarations of intent may be drawn upon (BGH 18 March 1980, NJW 1980, 1903; BGH 3 December 1991, NJW 1992, 1558, 1559). Consent that is elicted because of force, duress, pressure or fraud is vitiated (BGH 2 December 1963, NJW 1964, 1177, 1178), further, consent to an unlawful act or to an act which is contra bonos mores is also not a valid consent (Sprau loc. cit. no. 39). Legal capacity is not a prerequisite; the individucal who consents must, however, understand the import of the encroachment (BGH 5 December 1958, BGHZ 29, 33, 36). Therapeutic medical procedures also require the patient's consent (BGH 14 March 2006, NJW 2006, 2108; BGH 9 December 1958, BGHZ 29, 46). The patient must at least be aware of the nature and major risks of the medical procedure, which in turn entails that the doctor is obliged to impart the information to the patient in a timeous fashion, the current state of scientific knowledge being the diagnostic benchmark (BGH 23 September 1980, NJW 1981, 633; BGH 25 March 2003, NJW 2003, 2012, 2013). It is necesary to disclose the facts which are of decisive import for the informed decision oft he patient; if grave consequences are a potential result of the treatment, then a particularly comprehensive disclosure is required (BGH 17 December 1991, BGHZ 116, 379: Hepatitis- or AIDS-infection acquired via a blood transfusion), the same holds true for cosmetic procedures (BGH 6 November 1990, NJW 1991, 2349) and blood donations (BGH 14 March 2006, NJW 2006, 2108). Implied consent may establish a ground of justification, in circumstances where deferaal of the operation is not possible and close relatives or a person who acts as proxy to the unconscious patient cannot be asked for their consent (BGH 10 March 1987, NJW 1987, 2291, 2293; BGH 25 March 1988, NJW 1988, 2310; BGH 16 January 1959, BGHZ 29, 176, 182, 185). The burden of proof regarding proof of procurement of consent rests on the injuring party; this also applies in the case of a contract of repair where the nature and extent of the oblugation to perform is dispute and the claimant has recourse to a tort law claim of infringment of property rights (BGH 19 October 2004, VersR 2005, 282).

7. The point of departure in AUSTRIA is identical: conduct which would otherwise be unlawful is justified by procuring the consent oft he injured party, if he has a right of disposal over the impaired legal interest (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 4/90). This is true for both property rights (CC § 354) as well as consent to violations of the right to bodily integrity. The latter dispositions cannot be contra bonos mores (CP § 90(1)), and this is adjudicated by balancing the respective interests involved (OGH 26 January 1978, JBl 1978, 385). For consent to be operative in the case toof grave physical injury, it must be deemed necessary to promote the recognised interests of the injured party or of a third party.(Koziol loc. cit. no. 4/92). Conversely, consent cannot render permission to kill permissible (CP § 77), however, it is possible to consent to risk-carrying medical procedures, e.g transplants. Legal capacity is a prerequisite for an operative consent. Moreover, the declaration of consent must be imparted with knowledge of possible risks (OGH 26 January 1978 loc. cit.). The medical practitioner is required to inform the patient of the nature and consequences of the procedure, the consequences of electing not to undergo the procedure and alternatives prior to beginning treatment. Otherwise, liability will be triggered even in the case of, in all other respects, correctly adminstered treatment (OGH 23 January 1986, SZ 59/18 p. 71; OGH 7 February 1989, SZ 62/18). The Act on Patients' Rights 2006 governs the validity of declarations which a person makes in the case s/he is no longer able to make a judgment or express consent in emergencies and in case of illness. The circumstance that the injured party factually consented but the consent is not legally operative, can be of significance because on this ground, it may be possible to reduce the amount of compensation payable (CC § 1304).

8. Im GREEK law, it is accepted that consent embodies a ground of justification; volenti non fit injuria (Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2], 819; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 505). The provisions pertaining to juridical acts correspondingly govern such declarations (Stathopoulos loc. cit.; Kornilakis loc. cit.). As a consequence, a consent is inoperative if it contravenes the law or is contra bonos mores (CC arts. 174 and 178; Stathopoulos loc. cit.; Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 603). Consent to ciolations of property rights are generally unproblematic; in contrast, consent to infringements of personality rights are generally regarded as contra bonos mores, at any rate, if it amounts to a serious violation (Stathopoulos loc. cit.). A divergent approach is only adopted where the infringement was necesary to protect an elevated legal interest (on this basis, operations which are deemed medically necessary are permissible, whereas mere cosmetic procedures are not Kornilakis loc. cit. which are deemed tob e uunlawful even where consent is given; however, see also Fountedaki, Astiki iatriki evthini, 256: only in respect of dangerous cosmetic surgery does consent not amount to a ground of justification). In the case of damage or dstruction to property, consent is inoperative if e.g a rare painting was involved. Consent to therapeutic medical treatment is only operatibe if the patient was fully informed of the risks and advantages associated with the procedure (Fountedaki loc. cit. 174; Agalopoulou-Zervogiani, in FS Litzeropoulos I, 27). Consent, which does not have the effect of rendering the infringement lawful, remains relevant under the heading of contributory negligence (Stathopoulos loc. cit. 819-820).

9. PORTUGUESE CC art. 340(1) provides that violations of the rights of other are not unlawful of the holder of the right consent to their violation; similarly, at this juncture, the maxim volenti non fit iniuria applies (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 528; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 560). The courts appear to favour a strict application (STJ 23 September 2004: Consent to the storage of construction materials in a backyard precludes a claim for damages, even in respect of chemicals and fecal matter which was left behind). The validity of consent is ascertained according to the general rules on declarations of intent. Special provisions govern medical law (Dias Pereira, O consentimento informado, 214). Consent is required to be given voluntarily and is required to be an informed consent (Const. arts. 1, 25 and 26; CP arts. 156 and 157; CC art. 70; Vaz Rodrigues, O consentimento informado para o acto médico, passim). If the procedure was carried out in the interests of the affected party and corresponded to his or her presumed will (CC art. 340(3)). Cases involving unconscious patients provide important examples for the above mentioned principle; in essence, we are talking of cases concerning a benevolent intervention in another's affairs (see further Almeida Costa loc. cit.). Procedures which are not deemed necesary from a medical point of view (as, for example, cosmetic surgery, experiments, consent to organ removal) require an express declaration of consent; an implied consent here will not afford a defence (Dias Pereira loc. cit. 478 and 626; Clinical Trials on Medicinal Products for Human Use Act art. 6(1)(d) and before the Clinical Trials on Human Beings Decree Law art. 10(1)). Consent to illegal conduct or conduct which contravenes "good practice" is inoperative (CC art. 340(2)). An example is provided by a case where a professional football transfer of the right to control the reprodution of his image in its entirity to his club (CA Evora 24 February 2005; see also STJ 8 November 2001, CJ [ST] IX [2001-3], 113), consent of a sixteen year old to live in de facto cohabitation with a man denotes another example (STJ 21 November 1985, BolMinJus 351 [1985] 429).

10. The following principle is derived from DUTCH CC art. 6:162(2), namely that an unlawful act is rendered lawful, if the tortfeasor can aduce a ground of justification. Consent affords a ground of justification e.g. consent to an operation carried out lege artis (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 455 p. 414). ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(2) adheres to teh same conceptual understanding. The consent of the injured party renders the damaging conduct lawful provided that the consent was legally operative. The injured party must be aware of the consequences of that consent, i.e. that s/he knew the consequences or could have reasonably ben expected to know of them. In addition, the consent cannot be unlawful or contra bonos mores.

11. Similarly, in the NORDIC countries, the defence of consent is occasionally discussed in connection with the theory of "wrongfulness" (rättsstridighetsläran) and it is said that a valid consent renders the damaging act lawful gesagt, aus (Ussing, Retstridighed, passim; Karlgren, Skadeståndsrätt[5], 67). At any rate, in SWEDEN (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 62; Agell, Samtycke och risktagande, 67; Conradi, SvJT 1989, 225-234) and in FINLAND (Taxell, JFT 1944, 367-387; Hakulinen, Obligationsrätt, 237), in the interim also in wohl aber DENMARK (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 30; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 44) there are hardly any remaining proponents oft he theory of wrongfulness. This does not have any impact on the fact that an express or implied consent affords a defence to liability; only a presumed consent will not generally be enough (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 124; von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 51; Taipale, Accept af risiko, 385). Consent to a particular type of damage will also not suffice if the actual damage that has occured is atypically more serious than was previously contemplated (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit.; von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 52; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 112; Hakulinen loc. cit. 265).

II. Acting at own risk

12. Questions in connection with the contentious principle of acting at one's own risk raise a mutitude of not inconsiderable systematic difficulties in national legal orders and under EU law. In conjunction with art. 2(1) of the Second Council Directive 84/5/EEC of 30 December 1983 on the approximation of laws of the Member States relating to insurance against civil liability and art. 1 of the Third Council Directive 90/232/EWG of 14 May 1990 on the approximation of laws of Member States relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles, the ECJ held in a judgment handed down on 30 June 2005 – C-537/03, Candolin v. Vahinkovakuutusosakeyhtiö Pohjola, EuZW 2005, 593, it amounted to a contravention of community law to deny a passenger of a motor vehicle, who was also the owner of the vehicle, the right to be compensated by the the driver's third party liability insurance on the grounds that the injured party must have recognised the driver's drunken condition.

13. In respect of the legal consequences of an acceptation des risques, in FRANCE, a distinction is made between liability for faute and the objective liability. In the first category of cases, namely the responsabilité du fait personnel, it is acknowleged that the fact the victim voluntarily accepts the risk does not have the effect of either reducing or exempting the liability of the tortfeasor (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10], no. 180 p. 172), unless, the assumption of risk amounts to contributory negligence (Cass.ch.mixte 28 January 1972, Bull.ch.mixte 1972, no. 1 [passenger injured; here the claim was reduced by 25%, because the victim knew that the driver was drunk]). An acceptance of risk where there is no underlying fault can impinge on the question of whether the injuring party actually acted with fautivement: a person who injures another in a combat sport where the rules were observed, does not commit a faute vis á vis the injured party (Cass.civ. 5 December 1990, Bull.civ. 1990, II, no. 258 p. 133 [Boxing] and Cass.civ. 23 September 2004, Bull.civ. 2004, II, no. 435 p. 369). In respect of the second category (objective liability) consensus exists at any rate on the point that an acceptation des risques generally entails that individuals injured while participating in a sporting activity cannot rely on the gardien-liability under CC art. 1384(1). How this conclusion is be rationalised on a dogmatic basis is a bone of contention. A number of legal writers contend that it can be regarded as a legal consequences of a faute de la victime (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats (2004/2005), no. 1894), other commentators consider the assumption of risk amounts to a mutual agreement to absolve each other from liability (Flour/Aubert/Savaux loc. cit. no. 262 p. 267, insbes. fn. 5). The theory of the acceptation des risques only comes to the fore in competitive sporting events, it is inapplicable in the case of a non-competitive or impromptu sporting meetings (Cass.civ. 28 March 2002, Bull.civ. 2002, II, no. 67 p. 54) or during youth sports training (Cass.civ. 4 July 2002, D. 2003, 519, note Cordelier).

14. In BELGIUM, the doctrine of risicoaanvaarding or. acceptation des risques is typically exemplied by the case of travelling in a vehicle with a driver in a recognisably drunken state (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene, TPR 2000, 1551, 1673, no. 30). Indeed, assumption of risk " of itself" is not tantamount to a ground of justication leading to the exculpation of tort liability, (Cornelis and Claeys, TBBR 2003, 586, 595 no. 46), however, it may be classifed as contributory negligence leading to an apportionment of liability (CA Gent 21 March 1995, RGAR 1996, no. 12557). In other words, the injured party is required to have breached a duty of care (CA Gent 22 January 1999, RGAR 2000, no. 13.200). Therefore, the theory of assumption of risk is only relevent if the victim did not breach any other legal norms (e.g. provisions relating to the compulsory wearing of a seat-belt) (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene loc. cit. no. 31).

15. The SPANISH Supreme Court has, on many occassions, approved the theory of assumption of risk (see further Orti Vallejo, Responsabilidad en la explotación, 1357; for a critical exposition, see Solé Feliu, FS Díez-Picazo II, 3097-3123), see e.g. TS 10 February 2006, RAJ 2006 (1) no. 675 p. 1617 (no liability vis-à-vis a man who took part in a bullfighting festivity; the plaintiff assumed the risk) and TS 31 May 2006, RAJ 2006 (3) no. 3494 p. 8007 accident between racing cyclists; however, the race organisers were liable for inadequate safety on the cycle route). The assumption of risk doctine was deemed inapplicable to operators of a golf course in a case where the ball of one player hit another player while he was searching for his golf ball; operating a golf course does not constitute a dangerous activity which was a prerequisite for the imposition of strict liability (CA Pontevedra 11 May 2006, BDA JUR 2006/158510; see also TS 9 March 2006, RAJ 2006 (2) no. 1882 p. 4474). Similarly, the basic tenet in respect of all kinds of combat sports is that injuries that habitually crop up in these sports must be tolerated and therefore, such injuries must be reckoned with see TS 22 October 1992, RAJ 1992 (5) no. 8399, p. 11045; TS 20 March 1996, RAJ 1996 (2) no. 2244 p. 3058; TS 16 October 1998, RAJ 1998 (4) no. 8070 p. 11793. The organisers are liable to the participants only where proof of fault can be adduced (CA Valladolid 21 September 1994, AC 1994 (2) no. 1397 p. 1030; CA Vizcaya 15 March 1999, AC 1999 (2) no. 881 p. 83; TS 14 April 1999, RAJ 1999 (2), no. 3140, p. 481; TS 29 December 1997, RAJ 1997 (5) no. 9602 p. 15314 [Non fulfillment of safety obligations]; TS 30 October 1992, RAJ 1992 (4) no. 8186 p. 10736 [negligent organisation]); a judgment following different lines TS 17 September 1998, RAJ 1998 (4) no. 7282 p. 10711 is is apparently still in force (liability was imposed on the organisers of a bullfight solely on the grounds of the creation of an increased risk). The theory of assumption of risk is even applied in the case of accidents occuring during public entertainment spectacles (Big wheel etc.) (CA Guadalajara 27 Juli 1994, AC 1994 (2) no. 1190 p. 715; CA Segovia 14 February 1997, AC 1997 (1) no. 254 p.

447; CA Córdoba 16 December 1997, AC 1997 (3) no. 2417 p. 1200; however, of a differnt view, CA Granada 3 February 1998, AC 1998 (3) no. 1696 p. 63; CA Granada 11 May 1999, AC 1999 (1) no. 470 p. 665; CA León 9 April 1999, AC 1999 (2) no. 1387 p. 820), it does not apply in the case of accidents in public swimming pools (TS 23 November 1982, RAJ 1982 (3) no. 6558 p. 4358; TS 14 June 1984, RAJ 1984 (2) no. 3242 p. 2471; TS 10 April 1988, RAJ 1988 (2) no. 3116 p. 2956; TS 2 April 1993, RAJ 1993 (2) no. 2986 p. 3820). A distinction, not always a sharp one, has been drawn in case law between a lack of negligence, contributory fault and assumption of risk.

16. In a similar fashion, the ITALIAN courts apply the following rule to competitive sporting activities, namely, the participants waive their damages claim against each other owing to their voluntarily assumption of risk (the accettazione del rischio), provided that the injury remains within the boundaries of a typical risk associated with a sport of this nature and the injury is not linked to failure to abide by the rules, was not deliberate or was the result of the exercise of disproportionate force (Cass. 27 October 2005, no. 20908, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 10; Cass. 20 February 1997, no. 1564, Resp.civ. e prev. 1997, 669; Cass. 8 August 2002, no. 12012, Danno e resp. 2003, 529 = Foro it. 2003, I, 1,168).

17. In HUNGARY, it is assumed that sporting injuries are governed by CC § 342(2) and therefore consent is presumed (Petrik [-Harmathy], Polgári jog II[2], 580), unless the rules of the sport were flagrantly disobeyed or the organiser did not adhere to health and safety obligations (Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog I[2], 178/1; Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1327). An implied consent can only be invoked in respect of tthose injuries which are necessarily comprehended by the relevant sporting activity, therefore, implied consent will not afford a consent in cases e.g of deliberate infliction of injury. Commonplace infringements of the rules governing a particular sport are classified as coming within the risk associated with the particular sport provided that the infringement was not intentional (Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 35 et seq; Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 52). The legal postion in SLOVENIA appears to correspond in nearly all respects to the Hungarian situation (Cigoj, Teorija obligacij, splošni del obligacijskega prava, 179). However, that the injury must have come to pass while abiding by the rules of the game (Supreme Court of Yugoslavia 21 November 1984, Poročilo VSS 2/84, 20). A person does not act at their own risk if they sustain injury while attempting to rescue another (Cigoj loc. cit.). Under ROMANIAN Civil law, it appears ther is no distinction between consent and acting at one's own risk.

18. Under POLISH law, the theory of acting at one's own risk is considered to render lawful what would otherwise be unlawful. It is not unusual for the same substantive considerations to be employed in the context of contributory negligence, as regards causation and within the framework of rules on implied consent (see further Pietrzykowski [-Banaszczyk], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 415 no. 32; Bieniek [-Bieniek][5], art. 415 no. 5). As regards the field of sports, there is some leewas here as competitive athletes are under a duty to insure themselves against an accident (Qualified Sports Act [Dz. U. 2005.155.1298], art. 29(1)). Similarly, the concept of assumption of risk is a familar one to BULGARIAN law (Goleva, Pravna misul 1985 [4] 46-56) It primarily comes to the fore in the context of dangerous sports (football, boxing) and is deployed in cases where an individual allows himself or herself to be transported in a vehicle driven by a recognisably drunk driver or recognisably dangerous vehicle and the ensuing accident is caused by these dangers (Goleva loc. cit. 48). The doctrine of voluntary assumption of risk is deemed to be inapplicable in cases where a person sufferes injury while attempting to rescue another (Supreme Court 19 August 1972, decision no. 2031, case no. 967/72 in civil matters, first chamber).

19. In GERMANY, for the most part, consent justifying an exemption from liability is only recognised in the case of markedly dangerous sports (boxing; motorsports) (BGH 14 March 1961, BGHZ 34, 355, 363; BGH 5 November 1974, BGHZ 63, 140, 144; BGH 5 March 1963, BGHZ 39, 156, 161; however, see also BGH 1 April 2003, NJW 2003, 2018, 2019). In the context of other competitive sports (e.g football), where even full compliance with the rules or minor infringements carries a potential risk of injury to both sides, it is assumed that each participant has accepted the consequences, even if grave, of injuries that cannot be avoided in sports of this nature. If a claim were to be asserted against the injuring party, this would constitute inconsistent behaviour (venire contra factum proprium) and therefore, such a claim is precluded. Consent is not contemplated hereby, because e.g. every football player plays in the hope that he won't sustain injury (BGH 5 November 1974, BGHZ 63, 140, 144; BGH 1 April 2003, BGHZ 154, 316). The rules governing the assumption of risk are not deployed in the context of sporting events which are not subject toa hard and fast set of rules are (BGH 7 February 2006, NJW-RR 2006, 672, 674). Occassionally, the assumption of risk is reinterpreted to connote implied consent.(CA Karlsruhe 19 March 2004, NJW-RR 2004, 1257: Segelregatta).

20. In AUSTRIA, implied consent is held to be extant where an individual sustains injury while partaking in a sporting activity despite the rule having been fully observed or where the injury was the result of a commonplace violation (OGH 24 September 1981, SZ 54/133 p. 660; OGH 22 September 1987, SZ 60/176 p. 219); divergent principles to the rules usually governing the infliction of physical injury, apply in the context of injuries sustained in competitive sports (OGH 24 September 1981 loc. cit.). If the transgression goes beyond a typical breach of the rules, liability, governed by the general tort law principles, is triggered (OGH 22 September 1994, EvBl 1995/74). This is the case e.g., if a football player extends out his leg and strikes his opponent's leg, deliberately bringing him to the ground (OGH 22 September 1994 loc. cit.). A duty to compensate was held to exist where in contravention of the rules, a racing driver was guilty of overtaking during the race and by doing so killed a track attendent. The rules which have developed for competitive sports are also valid for games which involve physical contact and where it is required to at least comply with a minimum number of rules or conventions (OGH 22 March 1983, ZVR 1984/92 p. 89; OGH 25 November 2004, JBl 2005, 380). The above mentioned rules are deemed not to apply to the detriment of a rescuer who sustains injury during the rescue attempt (OGH 17 March 2005, ÖJZ 2005, 713).

21. In GREECE, it is said that wrongfulness is nullified if the injured party is deemed to have assumed the risk of injury bound up with a particular activity. The most important case of application for this doctrine is participation in competive sports. One requisite of this defence is that there is adherence to the rules of the sport. A further requirement is that the harm caused is regarded as a typical risk associated with sports of this type (Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 506; Georgiades and Stathopoulos[-Georgiades] assert that such cases should be solved by utilising the consent mechanism, art. 914, no. 59).

22. Similarly, in PORTUGAL, the doctrine of assunção do risco also represents a ground of defense (in depth Brandão Proença, A conduta do lesado, 615; Ribeiro de Faria, Direito das Obrigações, 525; Calvão da Silva, Responsabilidade civil do produtor, 735). This defence is seldom invoked in the law pertaining to traffic liability (Brandão Proença loc. cit. 626: passengers who were given a free lift), it is largely significant in determining liability under sports law. Here, it serves to impute consent to players of competitive sports in respect of the realisation of risks which are synonymous with their sport (Brandão Proença loc. cit. 613, 631 and 632; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 562; Hörster, Parte geral, 269). Implied consent to contact is excluded if the injury was caused intentionally or resulted from a serious breach of the rules (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 529).

23. Under DUTCH law, there is no overall consensus on how to order a risico-aanvaarding within the Civil law system. On these grounds, nor is there agreement on the legal consequences flowing from an assumption of risk. The law on consent, the implied waiver of liability, contributory negligence and negligence all feature in the discussion (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 454 p. 413); at any rate, assumption of risk is not tantamount to an autonomous ground of justification (HR 28 Juni 1992, NedJur 1992 no. 662 p. 2546; T&C Property Law [-Lindenbergh][4], art. 6:162 p. 1861; Hartkamp loc. cit.). A person, who was transported gratutiously, does not impliedly waive a potential damages claim; a person who permits himself to be driven by a driver in a recognisably drunken state must reckon with a reduction in damages owing to contributory negligence (HR 28 September 1990, NedJur 1992 no. 619 p. 2530; HR 20 October 1990, NedJur 1992 no. 620 p. 2535). A reduction in liability on the basis that risk was assumed can also be attained in other instances by reverting to CC art. 6:109 (Hartkamp loc. cit. nos. 456-456a p. 416).

24. Similarly, there is no corresponding express regulation in ESTONIA which is comparable to VI.–5:101(2). If acting at one's own risk canno be regarded as consent, then recourse is had to the rules on contributory negligence (LOA § 139) (Lahe, Juridica 2003, 83–91).

25. The universal consenus in the NORDIC legal writing is that acting ot one's own risk does not lead to complete exculpation from liability but is classified as contributory negligence (see e.g. for SWEDEN HD 6 April 1973, NJA 1973, 141; HD 22 February 1979, NJA 1979, 129 and HD 6 April 2000, NJA 2000, 150) which will only result in a reduction of the extent of liability (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 124; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 53; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 112; Bengtsson, Skadestånd vid sport, lek och sällskapsliv, 62; Agell, Samtycke och risktagande, 12 and 176; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 45; Hahto, JFT 2005, 250, 265). Closer analysis reveals a distinction is drawn between personal injury and physical damage to property. In the case of bodily injury, considerable hurdles under the Swedish Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 1 and Swedish Traffic Damages Act § 12 must be surmounted before a reduction of liablity will be entertained; even where the injured party was guilty of gross negligence, the hurdles are not always overcome (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 224). Therefore, acting at one's own risk remains a line of argument that only comes to the fore in cases leaving no room for doubt and where the defence self-evidently applies. It is of particular relevance in the sports law context (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit.; Bengtsson, SvJT 1976, 593, 613; Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 50). Today, assumption of risk is classified as contributory negligence in DENMARK, (it is, therefore, no longer characterised as acting at one's risk operating to exclude the imposition of liability), for example, where a individual permits himself or herself to be transported by a driver in a recognisably drunken state (Traffic Act § 101(2)). As a general rule, the damages claim is reduced by a third (Jensen, UfR 1988 B, 383-389; HD 15 November 2003, UfR 2003, 339; Western CA 15 May 2007, UfR 2007, 2275). In FINNISH Supreme Court 28 November 1980, KKO 1980:126 a guest on a sail boat was injured in the course of helping to get the boat off a shoal: he was not deemed to have acted on his own risk and received full compensation. In Supreme Court 5 September 1980, KKO 1980 II 89 pedestrians walked through a dark residential court yard and fell into a hole; they were regarded as acting with contributory negligence. In Supreme Court KKO 1979:99 a person diving from an unfamiliar deck was injured by hitting his head on a raft lying in water, invisible from the deck; he was considered to have acted at his own risk. In a similar vein, passengers, who travel with a recognisably drunken driver, must, on the grounds of their contributory negligencem, reckon with a reduced damages claim (Supreme Court 6 March 1996, KKO 1996:24); if they also encourage the driver to particularly risky driving behaviour, then the damages claim is reduced to nothing (Supreme Court 6 September 1999, KKO 1999:93). Acting at one's own risk in respect of physical damage to property has more potential as a successful defence (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 125; Taipale Accept af risiko, 385). Decisions on this point amount to a rara avis (see e.g. SWEDISH HD 8 April 1993, NJA 1993, 149: a golfer's ball hit a car in the parking lot of a golf course; no acceptance of such risk by the owner of the car). In DANISH HD 22 January 1959, UfR 1959, 160 an airplane, being transported on a public road was negligently damaged by another truck; compensation was reduced due to the extraordinary transport, its value and its fragile nature.

VI.–5:102: Contributory fault and accountability

(1) Where the fault of the person suffering the damage contributed to the occurrence or extent of legally relevant damage, reparation is to be reduced according to the degree of such fault.

(2) However, no regard is to be had to:

(a) an insubstantial fault of the person suffering the damage;

(b) fault or accountability whose contribution to the causation of the damage was insubstantial; or

(c) the injured person's want of care contributing to that person's personal injury caused by a motor vehicle in a traffic accident, unless that want of care constituted profound failure to take such care as was manifestly required in the circumstances.

(3) Paragraphs (1) and (2) apply correspondingly where the fault of a person for whom the person suffering the damage is responsible within the scope of VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives) contributed to the occurrence or extent of the damage.

(4) Compensation is to be reduced likewise if and in so far as any other source of danger for which the person suffering the damage is responsible under Chapter 3 (Accountability) contributed to the occurrence or extent of the damage.

COMMENTS

A. General

Contributory fault, contributory fault of auxiliary persons and contributory sources of danger. Strictly speaking, this Article features three defences. Paragraphs (1) and (2) involve the personal contributory fault of the person suffering the damage. Paragraph (3) clarifies that the injured person is also to be imputed with the contributory fault of an employee or representative for whom the injured person is responsible and paragraph (4) relates to the circumstances in which compensation is to be reduced because of the injured person's own responsibility for a contributory source of danger. The legal basis of liability on the part of the injuring person does not matter; this Article relates both to those situations in which liability is based on intention or negligence and those in which liability is strict.

Reparation. This provision is applicable to all forms of reparation, not only to compensation (i.e. reparation by means of monetary payment: VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation) paragraph (2)). Admittedly this will only rarely be practically relevant, but it is conceivable, e.g. where damages are to be rendered in natura in the form of the carrying out of work and this can be confined to a part of the necessary repairs.

Contribution to the occurrence or extent of the damage. The Article refers throughout to contributory responsibility on the part of the injured person for the materialisation of the damage as well as to contributory responsibility for the extent of the damage. This corresponds to III.–3:704 (Loss attributable to creditor), which the present Article concretises and (partially) modifies for the purposes of the law on non-contractual liability. Where both points of view coincide (contributory responsibility regarding the materialisation of damage as well as with respect to the extent of the damage) then account must be taken of both together.

Type of damage. The type of legally relevant damage makes no fundamental difference. However, paragraph (2)(c) provides a special rule for bodily injury resulting from traffic accidents.

The mirror principle. In essence (and apart from some exceptions mentioned below) this Article is built upon what might be called the "mirror principle": everything which can go towards establishing accountability and thus liability on the part of one party for a legally relevant damage can (wholly or partially) reduce liability when the roles are reversed and it is the injured person's conduct or source of danger which is under scrutiny. This approach did not cause controversy. The legal order is not allowed to be "blind in one eye": whatever is advantageous for the injured person, as regards the law of liability, should also act to the injured person's disadvantage in the reverse situation. The injured person's claim indeed remains in principle preserved (if not ruled out by another defence), but its amount is reduced. The claim is entirely cut down ("reduced to zero") only in cases in which it may be said that the injured person's contributory fault outweighs the injuring person's responsibility to such an extent that there is no more room for liability on the part of the latter. Of course, in cases of this type, negligence of the injuring person or the realisation of a risk justifying liability will often already be absent.

Exceptions. The mirror principle is only capable, however, of being the starting point for the formation of the rule. It is not without its limitations, from a theoretical standpoint, as well as from a policy point of view. Neither "intention" nor "negligence" within the meaning of VI.–3:101 (Intention) and VI.–3:102 (Negligence) can be given their normal meaning in relation to the victim and, in a nutshell, the policy question is invariably to what extent the protection of the victim will be deemed reasonable and necessary; to this end, paragraph (2) of the Article presents a number of compromises.

Fault. It is common ground that so-called "contributory fault" does not hinge upon negligence. This is because any person who harms himself or herself (or who co-operates in doing so) does nothing forbidden and consequently occasions no legally relevant damage. The issue is not that the injured person injures the liable person through the former's conduct, but rather that the injured person must accept the consequences of having been careless with that person's own rights and assets. The claim is reduced because the injured person has shown through the relevant behaviour that the protected personal interests were not in fact so important. The expression "contributory negligence" is therefore an unfortunate one. It is better to speak of "contributory fault", not only because the injured person does not cause any harm to another person, but also because it better reflects why the claim is to be reduced, namely the adoption of a personally neglectful position towards one's own interests. Consequently, in contrast to accountability, paragraph (1) (and, as far as the employee is concerned, also paragraph (3)) comes into operation only if there is genuine "fault" on the part of the injured person, that is to say, conduct which is improper or reprehensible or at least may be criticised in a moral or ethical sense.

Children and mentally handicapped people. For persons who are incapable of "fault" (such as small children and the mentally incapacitated) no such reduction of their claim can therefore arise. In the case of older children, account is taken of their immaturity and their incompletely developed capacity for reasoned deliberation. For the purposes of this Article children are not imputed with the contributory fault of their parents or supervisors. This is because children are not liable for their parents; rather, in the case of a failure to supervise, typically they are entitled not only to a claim against the third person causing injury but also a concurrent claim in damages against their parents. (The finer details of the latter claim may be specifically regulated by family law, however; this Book leaves such rules unaffected I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(c); VI.–1:103(c) (Scope of application)). In the case of preponderant fault on the parents' part, the third person causing the injury must therefore bring in the parents under the mechanism of solidary liability in damages. It is conceivable, however, that the wrongdoing of a person who is taking care of the child (regardless of whether it is the parents or someone else) heavily tips the balance so much on one side that it causes the third person's contribution to the cause or to a source of danger for which the third party is responsible to completely fade into the background.

A fifteen-month old baby has died. Instead of giving him medication for relieving inhalation difficulties, his grandmother had given him a chemical product which removes toilet lime scale. The medication and the chemical product were next to each other in the closet. Indeed the chemical product had not been correctly packaged and labelled but, under the circumstances, that alone does not suffice to render the manufacturer liable for the child's death. The parents and grandmother have behaved in such a grossly negligent way that the death of the child can no longer be deemed as having been caused by the packaging and labelling defects.

Paragraph (2). In the interest of protecting the injured person, paragraph (2)(a) and (b) provide that immaterial contributory fault and an insignificant contribution to the cause are to be disregarded. Less care is necessary when dealing with one's own personal interests than in dealing with those of another; a bicycle thief cannot use the argument against the victim of the theft that the bicycle was not locked. In the "normal" cases of the negligent infliction of damage, it is also to be considered that liability - though this is considerably less so for the economic consequences of contributory fault - is insured against or insurable. Paragraph (2)(c) allows for the special dangers of road traffic and takes up a widespread tendency in European general liability law in affording more robust protection for traffic accident victims than for those who are injured in other areas of life, e.g. when playing sport or in their free time.

B. Contributory fault (paragraph (1))

Fault contributory to the materialisation of the damage. Paragraph (1) contains the basic rule on contributory fault: a person who, through fault, is a contributory cause of the damage must accept a reduction in compensation, depending on the degree of this fault. "Fault" means intentional or neglectful harm to one's own interests. Where the injured person intentionally caused the accident, the liability will usually be reduced to zero. The dependants of a person who commits suicide by jumping in front of a car do not even have a claim against the driver, cf. VI.–5:101 (Consent and acting at own risk) and VI.–5:501 (Extension of defences against the injured person to third persons). A reduction of the claim due to the intentional contributory fault of the injured person mostly crops up in cases in which that person intentionally and unreasonably refuses to minimise damage that has already occurred. Even in cases where grossly negligent fault contributes to the materialisation of the damage, a reduction of the claim to zero is by no means rare; cases of this type often border on the defence of an inescapable event (VI.–5:302 (Event beyond control)).

Illustration 2
The claimant was bitten by X's dog, but had ignored a clearly visible sign saying "Beware of the dog". The claimant must accept a reduction in the claim for damages.

Illustration 3
A law, which seeks to protect gamblers from the dangers of an addiction to gambling and the detrimental effects it can have on one's life, requires casinos not to admit certain gamblers. A casino which has breached this duty cannot defend itself with the argument that the claimant is guilty of contributory fault by not respecting the ban.

Illustration 4
A patient admitted to a psychiatric clinic jumps out of the window and kills himself. The personnel of the clinic were aware of the danger of suicide but did not deal with it. The family members' claim (cf. VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death)) is not to be reduced (see VI.–5:501 (Extension of defences against the injured person to third persons)).

Reduction of liability. The claim is to be reduced according to the degree of contributory fault on the part of the injured person. The result is mostly a division of liability; the proportions will depend on the circumstances – for instance one third to two thirds or one fifth to four fifths. In appropriate cases – where contributory fault is overwhelming – reduction of the claim can even mean a complete denial of compensation.

Co-responsibility for the extent of the damage. The contributory fault of the victim is still relevant to mitigation of the claim where it relates not to the materialisation of the damage, but to its extent or amount. In principle, this requirement to minimise damage is independent of the type of damage occasioned. Under paragraph (1) it also relates to the minimisation of patrimonial consequences of a bodily injury. However, the injured person is only required to take or permit reasonable measures; there is no requirement to take new risks.

Illustration 5
A local newspaper had falsely reported that the claimant had been caught having sexual intercourse with another man during the wedding breakfast. Subsequent to this, the national press also reported on the story. The claimant's lawyers first made the issue "properly public" through their request to her to hold a large press conference on the day after the wedding. This made the damage worse; the claimant's claim in damages against the media is to be reduced by approximately one third.

Illustration 6
A woman and her daughter are seriously injured in an accident. The woman must close her butcher's shop for several years. When she is fit for work again, the machines are outdated and she has lost her customers; the business has become worthless. In fact the woman had the opportunity of continuing the business in between with staff, but did not want to do this. Her claim in damages due to the loss of business is to be reduced by a high fraction.

C. Exceptions (paragraph (2))

Insubstantial fault and causation. Paragraph (2)(a) contains a clarification in relation to paragraph (1): very minimal contributory fault is not to be taken into account. This means that it is left out of account altogether. A reduction of the claim by merely nominal percentages is not to be undertaken; the minimum threshold is usually set at 10%. This corresponds to widespread court practice, saves work for the judiciary, is in line with the considerations that support the defence of contributory fault and reflects in this area the rule of liability in VI.–6:102 (De minimis rule). Paragraph (2)(b) contains a comparable rule for cases in which the injured person's causal contribution is negligibly low, regardless of whether it concerns the causal contribution of the fault or the causal contribution of a source of danger for which the injured person is responsible. However, there is an intrinsic relationship between the reason for the claim and the issue of whether the victim's contributory fault is inconsequential or substantial.

> Illustration 7
> A postal worker, P, steals credit cards out of letters sent by banks. Using the cards, P is able to withdraw money from the injured parties' accounts at an ATM. P obtains the necessary PIN numbers from the bank's customers by posing as the bank official who is investigating the whereabouts of the credit cards. In light of P's elaborate criminal scheme, what is involved here is merely negligible inattention on the part of the customers; their claim against P and P's employers is not reduced.

Traffic accidents. Paragraph (2)(c) contains a special rule for traffic accidents. In cases of bodily injury as a result of a traffic accident, contributory fault only gives cause for reducing the claim if it constitutes a gross disregard of one's own safety. This rule reflects a widespread tendency of European systems of liability – namely affording special protection to victims of traffic accidents. Encountering road traffic constitutes an unabatedly high risk. Slight breaches of the rules happen every day and are a reality of life. The originator of the damage is normally insured against liability; conversely, a pedestrian or cyclist affected outside the course of employment can only rarely shift the pecuniary consequences of contributory fault to an insurer. This lack of balance is at least partially remedied by paragraph (2)(c). This provision pertains to contributory fault in the materialisation of the damage, not a failure to minimise the damage. It only affects damage that falls under the scope of application of VI.–3:205 (Accountability for damage caused by motor vehicles). Where on an icy winter's day a person wearing slippery leather shoes walks on an ungritted pavement, a reduction under paragraph (1) ensues; it is only traffic accidents caused by a motor vehicle which are covered by paragraph (2)(c).

Policy considerations. Due to varying conceptions on the form of contributory fault on the part of traffic accident victims which should be afforded consideration (in relation to its capacity to reduce the claim), on who is to be deemed the "weaker candidate" enjoying a claim to special legal protection and on the type of damage that should be covered by this protection, paragraph (2)(c) suggests a middle ground: where bodily injury is at issue, everyone is affected in a special way and is at the mercy of the dangers of road traffic. Therefore, it did not seem advisable to include further distinctions between the various categories of persons. On the other hand, with property damage, the usual care in dealing with one's own goods can also be required where traffic is concerned; in the case of contributory fault, it would not be reasonable to allow virtually the entire weight to be shifted on to the risk borne by the other party's indemnity insurance.

Gross negligence. As far as bodily injuries are concerned, where the injured person has behaved in a grossly negligent manner, the limit of the special rule in paragraph (2)(c) has been reached. Depending on the grounds for the liability, in such cases the claim is to be reduced or even ruled out altogether. Gross negligence is a profound failure to take such care as is manifestly required in the circumstances. Standard examples include not buckling one's seatbelt, drunkenness at the wheel or driving through a red light.

D. Extension of the mirror principle to the law of strict liability (paragraphs (3) and (4))

Contributory fault of employees. Paragraph (3) concerns cases in which employers must accept a reduction in their claim to reparation on account of the contributory fault of their employees.

> Illustration 8
> Small children are gathered around X's company car; using a screwdriver, they want to see whether they can succeed in putting a scratch in the paintwork. The company's employees follow the goings-on, but do not intervene. Liability to the company on the part of the parents does not arise because the company's employees willingly allowed the damage to occur.

Contribution of a source of danger. When considering the injured person's contribution, it is not only contributory fault in the sense of intentional or careless harming of one's own interests which follows from the mirror principle; in fact, another element is to be weighed up: where in an individual case, a source of danger - for which the injured person would be liable under Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence) - contributes to the accident or to its consequences, it would be that person's role as an injuring party which is at issue. That is the content of paragraph (4). This rule is of particular importance where the strict liability of the two parties collide, but it also has significance where the injuring party must be deemed contributorily responsible for the accident due to negligence and the injured person is also seen in such a light, but owing to an objective ground; both cases have the restriction that the intervention of the injuring party does not constitute an unavoidable occurrence from the perspective of the injured person (mirrored application of VI.–5:302 (Event beyond control)). It is worth noting that in the context of paragraph (4), paragraph (2)(b) remains applicable: an insubstantial contribution to the causal element is not deemed capable of reducing the claim. Where necessary, in the case of the collision of two strict liabilities, an amendment to the result is to be made with the aid of VI.–6:202 (Reduction of liability).

> Illustration 9
> An accident between two vehicles occurs in the middle of a road consisting of two lanes going in opposite directions. It is no longer possible to establish which of the vehicles had crossed over the line in the middle of the road. A's vehicle, a larger and more expensive car, has suffered damage to the extent of €20,000; B's vehicle, a budget-priced "student car", has suffered damage to the extent of €2,000. Each of the owners bears half of the damage to each car; A has a claim against B for €10,000, from which €1,000 will be deducted in the course of the setting-off calculations.

> Illustration 10
> A drives into B's vehicle, which was correctly positioned in the traffic. The contribution of B's vehicle to the cause is so slight that B's claim against A is not reduced.

> Illustration 11
> Messenger pigeons get caught up in the jets of an aeroplane set to land, leaving it considerably damaged as a result of the collision with the birds. The owner of the messenger pigeons is still ascertainable. Here the basic rule is again that each of the owners involved (supposing that the liability of the owner of the aeroplane is also strict, see VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage)) bears half of the other party's and half of its own damage. However, account is to be taken of the fact that aeroplanes are far more dangerous and it must be expected that their owners can draw on insurance premiums, in the context of VI.–6:202 (Reduction of liability). In the case of a private pigeon keeper, the liability is even to be reduced to zero due to considerations of equity and fairness.

NOTES

I. Contributory fault in causing the damage

1. Under FRENCH law both liability based on faute and strict liability yield to force majeure (see the notes under VI.–5:302 (Event beyond Control)). There is equally no liability as a rule if the injured party has committed faute intentionelle and the person causing the damage has merely acted negligently (Cass.civ. 16 October 1984, Bull.civ. 1984, I, no. 266 p. 225). A typical faute of the injured party which has in part contributed to causing the damage normally results in a reduction of liability, even when the claim to reparation is based on CC art. 1384 (Cass.ass.plén. 6 April 1987, JCP 1987, II, 20828, with a note by Chabas). Parents who are liable for the conduct of their children may invoke the negligent faute of the injured party in order to obtain a reduction in liability (Cass.civ. 29 April 2004, D. 2005, 188, note Denis Mazeaud). The reduction is proportionate to the comparative gravity of the fautes concerned (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10], no. 176 p. 168). In BELGIUM the law likewise proceeds from the precept that the injured party's own faute results in a reduction of liability if there is a causal connection between that faute and the damage; here too this principle applies to both faute-based liability and strict liability under CC art. 1384 (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene, TPR 2000, 1551, 1907, no. 158). The proportionate reduction in liability is determined by the gravity of the fautes in issue (Cass. 29 November 1995, Pas. belge 1995, I, no. 517 p. 1087). The more serious the faute of the victim is, the greater is the scope for the supposition that the causal connection between the conduct of the injuring party and the damage has been broken (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene loc. cit. 1913-1915 no. 163).

2. In SPAIN it is concerned self-evident that a detriment which is sustained as a result of one's own fault is not damage in a legal sense: quod quis ex culpa sua damnum sentit, non intelligitur damnum sentire (Medina Alcoz, La culpa de la víctima, 158). The statutory basis from which this ground of defence is derived is, however, a matter of dispute. Aside from exceptional instances where it is possible to resort to a more specific statutory regime, it is CC arts. 1105 (according to which no one is to be liable for an unforeseeable or unavoidable incident) and 1103 (the rule on liability for negligence) in particular which are the suitable candidates. Specific statutory provisions on contributory fault are to be found in amongst other statutes: the Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic Act, art. 1(1)(ii) and (iv); Atomic Energy Act, art. 45(2); Consumer Protection Act art. 145 and CP art. 114. The Tribunal Supremo has on many occasions confirmed in relation to CC art. 1105 that the responsabilidad objetiva (or responsabilidad por riesgo) is disapplied in the case where damage is exclusively the fault of the victim; such fault breaks the causal nexus (e.g. TS 14 October 1957, RAJ 1957 no. 2865 p. 1921; TS 26 May 1969, RAJ 1969 (1) no. 2864 p. 1978; TS 1 October 1985, RAJ 1985 (3) no. 4566 p. 3818; TS 1 February 1989, RAJ 1989 (1) no. 650 p. 703; TS 29 May 1999, RAJ 1999 (3) no. 4382 p. 6739; TS 21 November 1985, RAJ 1985 (3) no. 5624 p. 4783 and TS 11 July 1990, RAJ 1990 (5)

no. 5852 p. 7579). Among other requirements for damage to be attributed exclusively to the fault of the victim, the party causing the injury must have behaved correctly and the injured party must have been mentally competent (TS 31 December 1997, RAJ 1997 (5) no. 9195 p. 14688); it is not necessary, however, for the victim to have injured himself deliberately since negligence suffices (see further Reglero Campos [-Reglero Campos], Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 431; Medina Alcoz, La culpa de la víctima, 144). The terminology is admittedly not uniform in those cases in which the party causing the damage is also at fault (TS 16 January 1991, RAJ 1991 (1) no. 297 p. 320 disapproves of the widespread use of the expression compensación de culpas on the basis there is no "compensation of fault", only an end reduction in liability; see further Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 207 [concurrencia de concausas is a suitable expression]; Reglero Campos [-Reglero Campos], Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 443 and Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños[3], 144 [concurrencia de culpas] as well as Martín Casals, FS Díez-Picazo II, 2472 [concurrencia de culpa de la víctima]). Nonetheless the legal position is unequivocal in so far as case law based on CC art. 1103, reduces the quantum of liability in accordance with the extent of the contributory fault (e.g. TS 22 February 1985, RAJ 1985 (1) no. 739 p. 585; TS 5 February 1991, RAJ 1991 (1) no. 992 p. 1190; TS 20 April 1993, RAJ 1993 (2) no. 3103 p. 3975; TS 3 February 1995, RAJ 1995 (1) no. 737 p. 971; TS 12 September 1996, RAJ 1996 (4) no. 6561 p. 8801; TS 15 December 1999, RAJ 1999 (5) no. 9200 p. 14491). It has been mooted, however, that the same outcome can be achieved on the basis of CC art. 1902 because the reduction in liability is not a mere matter of equity, but rather one of of accountability (e.g. Pantaleón, ADC 1991, 1042; Díaz Alabart, ADC 1988, 1168-1169; Montés Penadés, FS Díez-Picazo II, 2591, 2627; TS 14 June 2007 (BDA RJ 2007/5120,TS 29 December 1998, RAJ 1998 (5) no. 9980 p. 14596; Medina Alcoz loc. cit. 224). Where the fault of the person causind the damage is substantial and that of the victim is minor there is no reduction in liability (TS 18 January 1936, RAJ 1936 no. 86 p. 41; TS 10 July 1943, RAJ 1943 no. 856 p. 481; TS 8 July 1999, RAJ 1999 (3) no. 4766 p. 7360); generally it seems that the injured party's claim is also not reduced if either the person causing the damage acted intentionally (TS 8 June 1995, RAJ 1995 (3) no. 4563 p. 6101) or the fraction of contributory fault on the part of the victim is less than 10% (Solé Feliu, ADC 1997, 874, 896). A court will take account of contributory fault on its own motion; it is not necessary for the defendant to plead the defence (TS 22 April 1987, RAJ 1987 (2) no. 2723 p. 2546; TS 7 June 1991, RAJ 1991 (4) no. 4431 p. 6072). As regards injuries to children, a contributory fault of their parents is only taken into account where the parents' own damage is at stake (TS 1 February 1989, RAJ 1989 (1) no. 650 p. 703) and not it seems – the issue has not yet been settled by case law – to the extent that it is the child's own damage which is in issue (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Pantaleón], Código Civil II[2], art. 1902 p. 1998; Solé Feliu loc.cit. 879).

3. ITALIAN CC art. 1227(1) expressly extends to non-contractual liability law (CC art. 2056). If the event causing damage is also causally attributable to the injured person, the claim to reparation is to be reduced in accordance with the "severity of the fault" and "the extent of the resultant consequences". If the injured party is not capable of being at fault or there is only an objective (i.e. strict) ground of accountability on his or her part, then regard is hard to the causal contribution to the damage instead of fault (Cass. 10 February 2005, no. 2704, Giur.it.Mass. 2005, fasc. 2; Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, sub art. 2056, 776-777; Cass. 20 July 2002, no. 10641, Danno e resp. 2002, 1201). A claim will also be reduced under CC art. 1227(1) for reasons of strict accountability (z.B. aus CC art. 2051, siehe Cass. 20 July 2002, no. 10641, Danno e resp. 2002, 1201 und CFI Bologna 25 September 1988, Danno e resp. 1999, 560: customer ran too quickly to an exit and thus ran into an unsafe pane of glass in the shop front).

4. The HUNGARIAN CC addresses the so-called "apportionment of damage" in § 340(1) and, so far as strict liability for dangerous enterprises is concerned, in § 345(2). CC § 340(1) places the injured party under an obligation when averting or mitigating the damage to proceed as could generally be expected in the circumstances. The other party is not obliged to compensate damage which arises from the non-performance of this duty. The injured party is also burdened by the defaults of persons for whose conduct he or she is responsible (CC § 340(2)) – for example, an employee or a person who is not capable of being held responsible for their conduct (Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1235). The party causing the damage is therefore not liable for that part of the damage which has resulted from the negligent conduct of the victim or an employee or other auxiliary of the victim. In a particular case the claim to reparation can also be reduced beyond that provided for by § 340 under CC § 339(2), which enables a court to relieve the person responsible for the damage partially from liability on the basis of extraordinary circumstances. Under CC § 345(2) damage caused by a dangerous enterprise (typically a vehicle) need not be compensated in so far as it arises from reproachable conduct of the party sustaining the damage. CC § 345(2) therefore does not apply if the injured party is incapable of being held responsible for their conduct; a fault of a parent does not operate as a contributory fault so as to reduce a child's claim (Opinion of the Civil College of the Supreme Court PK 39; BH 1980/90; Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1270f; Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II[2], 592; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 124ff,; cf. BH 1998/381[on the liability of a keeper of animals]). The apportionment of liability is a matter for the discretion of the court, which is based on the relative degree of reproachability or the extent of the contribution to causation of the damage (e.g. a 60%/40% split in BH 1995/27 or a 20%/80% split in BH 1992/242 because the injured passenger had thoroughly disturbed the driver or a 20% (passenger-victim), 80% (driver) split in BH 2008/61 in case of not fastening the seat-belt).

5. According to POLISH CC art. 362, where the plaintiff's conduct contributed to either cause or heighten the injury that was sustained by him/her, the damages recoverable by the injured party are reduced having regard to the circumstances and in particular having regard to the degrees of fault of both parties. This provision is employed in both contractual and extra-contractual damages claims (Supreme Court 23 June 1999, I CKN 57/98, OSNC 2000, no. 1, pos. 13; Bieniek [-Wiśniewski][5], art. 362, no. 3; Pietrzykowski [-Banaszczyk], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 362 no. 2). Difficulties arise when it comes to the conceptual understanding of "contribution of the injured party" to the ensuing harm. Some commentators intrepret it to signify a case of adequate contributory causation, other writers additionally require objective misconduct, some opine that subjective fault is requires whereas a fourth view distinguishes between the various grounds of liability: only where, the injured party is held liable for fault, can it be said that s/he similarly culpably contributed to causing the damage; on the other hand, if the injuring party is liable on the basis of strict liability, then solely objective misconduct on the part of the injured party will lead to a reduction in the amount of damages recoverable (see further Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[5], 96 no. 250; SystPrCyw [-Dybowski] III, 298; Wiśniewski loc. cit. nos. 5 and 7). The question as to which approach is favoured by the Supreme Court does not allow a definite answer. The victim's response to fear will not amount to contributory negligence, even if this response is objectively wrong (Supreme Court 16 August 1956, NP no. 11-12/1956, p. 181; Wiśniewski loc. cit. 11, Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 97 no. 254). Contributory fault, while it does reduce the extent of the injuring party's liability, will not serve to nullify it Banaszczyk loc. cit. no. 13). Objective misconduct of persons who lack torious capacity will also operate to reduce liability (Supreme Court 20 September 1975, III CZP 8/75, OSN 1976, no. 7-8, pos. 151; Banaszczyk loc. cit. no. 18). Further, contributory negligence of his or her auxiliary (CC arts. 417, 427, 430, 474) is imputed to the injured party (Banaszczyk loc. cit. no. 24; Wiśniewski loc. cit. no. 10).

6. Similarly, under BULGARIAN LOA art. 51(1) the amount of compensation can be reduced if the damage is not only attibutable to the tortious conduct oft he injuring party but also to the victim's contributory negligence; only the exclusive fault of the injured party affords a complete defence. The employer's duty to compensate only completely falls away, if the victim intentionally brought about the accident at work or the illness (Labour Code art. 201(1)). If the injured partyis deemed to be incapable of fault, then the tortfeasor can rely on negligence of the victim's supervisor, especially on the parent's failure to adequately supervise their child (Interpretative judgment no. 88 des Obersten Gerichtshofs of 12 September 1962, full civil chamber). According to SLOVENIAN LOA art. 171(1), contributory fault results in reducible damages, provided that the injured party contributed to the event giving rise to damage or contributed to an aggravation of that damage. The conduct of the injured party must be the care that a sober-minded individual would take. Whether a minor is contributory negligent is determined on a consideration of age, experience and intellectual development (Juhart and Plavšak [-Plavšak], Obligacijski zakonik I, art. 171 p. 964; VSS II 28 June 2001, Ips 190/2000). Contributory fault also results in a reduction in claims based on strict liability (LOA art. 153(2)). An express regulation on contributory fault is absent from the ROMANIAN Civil Code. The courts and academic teaching present nonetheless a united front on this issue and the victim's contributory fault is relevant in the assessment of the award of damages (Adam, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, 301, 310-311; Dogaru and Drăghici, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, 250; CSJ 26 March 1992, secţia penală, decision no. 818; CSJ 2 June 1993, secţia penală, decision no. 937; both in Culegere de practică judiciară pe anul 2003 [2004]). The draft of a new Romanian Civil Code envisages an array of reformative measures under arts. 1109 und 1125(3), which for the most part correspond to VI.–5:102 (cf. Proiectul Noului Cod civil, 221).

7. GERMAN CC § 254(1) reduces the extent of the tortfeasor's duty to compensate, if fault on the part of the victim contributed to the cause of the injury. A blameworthy transgression of the duty to appropriately safeguard one's own interests, "fault committed against oneself" is intended hereby (BGH 18 April 1997, NJW 1997, 2234, 2235; MünchKomm [-Oetker], BGB[5], § 254, no. 3). CC § 254 is also operative in respect of claims arising under strict liability regimes (Oetker loc. cit. no. 7; Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[66], § 254, no. 2). CC §§ 827–829 is deemed to apply analogously to individually who are deemed incapable of committing a fault. The victim's contributory fault must amount to an adequate cause of the ensuing damage; further, the doctrine on the protective scope of the rule is also directly relevant in this regard. A doctor who gives a patient the wrong treatment cannot raise the argument that the patient was at fault in requiring the treatment (BGH 21 September 1971, NJW 1972, 334, 335). The extent to which damages are reduced depends on the particular circumstances of the case, an especially weighty factor is the degrees of fault the respective parties. This evaluation generally results in an apportionment of damages in proportion to the percentage of fault attributable to each party. This assessment can exceptionally result in the duty to compensate being obviated or indeed there may be no curtailment of liability at all (Heinrichs loc. cit. nos. 59 and 66).

8. Similarly, in AUSTRIA, the doctrine of the protective scope of the transgressed norm is also relevant in connection with the examination of the presence of contributory fault. OGH 21 December 2004, ecolex 2005, 204 held e.g, that a provision which provided that pathological gambers must be refused entry to casinos constituted a protective law, the purpose of which was to safeguard gamblers (pathological) from the lure of games of chance which threatened their very existence. Therefore, the fact that the gambler continued to partake in the game and did not voluntarily request to be barred from participation is not of decisive weight in assessing contributory fault. see also on the extent of liability in such a case OGH 17 February 2005, 8 Ob 134/04w, RS 0117007 T1 and T2.

9. If the injured party's "own fault" contributed to cause the damage, then the claim for compensation can also be reduced or even negated altogether according to the GREEK Civil Code. "One's own fault" connotes that the conduct of the injured party did not adequately protect his own interests (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 300, no. 5). While it is true to assert that the injured party's fault must have contributed to the damage, chronologically, this conduct can occur prior or subsequent to the act of the injuring party (Stathopoulos loc. cit. no. 9; ErmAK [-Litzeropoulos], art. 300, no. 5). The extent to which the claim is reduced will depends on the circumstances of the individual case, in particular, emphasis is placed on the detrmination of whether one party can be regarded as the primary cause of the damage (Stathopoulos loc. cit. no. 12).

10. According to PORTUGUESE CC art. 570(1), the courts determine the legal consequences of fault of the injured party which has contributed to the damage or has operated to aggravate it; in the light of the fact that there is a degree of negligence on both sides, contributory fault may operate to reduce or obviate liability or on the other hand full damages may be recoverable. CC art. 570(2) adds that contributory fault on the part of the victim will operate to negate liability in all cases where the injuring party's fault rests on a mere presumption of fault. It can thereby be concluded that the victims's contributory fault must operate to exclude claims arising under strict liability provisions (Menezes Leitão, Obrigações I[3], 332; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral, I[10], 677). Contributory fault on the part of an employee or legal representative are attributed to the injured party, CC art. 571; the same holds true for the parents of minors (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], art. 571 no. 1). The burden of proving contributory fault on the part oft eh victim rests on the injuring party; however, there is no need for him to expressly invoke this defence in order for it to afford a defence (CC art. 572).

11. Under DUTCH law, the injured party's "own fault" connotes that, in the circumstances of the case, the victim failed to deal carefully with his own interests (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 448 p. 399, 409; Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 351). In cases where contributory fault oft eh victim is of overwhelming preponderence, then, according to CC art. 6:98, the necessary causal nexus between the conduct of the defendant and the ensuing damage may be absent. CC art. 6:101, according to which there may be a curtailment of liability, provided that the damage is caused by an event (s) which can be attributable to the injured party, only comes to the fore once the requisites of CC art. 6:98 are established (HR 1 Juli 1977, NedJur 1978 no. 118 p. 371). Since the judgment of the HR 4 February 1916, NedJur 1916, 450, the fact that fault on the part of the injured party operates to reduce his damages claim constituted well-entrenched judicial principle. CC art. 6:101 had the effect of codifying this judicial principle. The decisive feature of this provision is that the damage suffered is caused by the injured party himself or herself (Hartkamp loc. cit. no. 450 p. 402). That part of the damage for which compensation cannot be recovered, is imputed to the claimant according the general precepts of CC art. 6:162(1) and (3) aswell as art. 6:163; therefore the claimant must have been at fault or the cause is regarded as being encompassed within his sphere of risk according to law or social convention (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 69 p. 81).

12. ESTONIAN LOA § 139(1) und (2) correspond to VI.–5:102(1) in all essential points. The enumerated provisions do not refer to contributory fault, rather they refer in general terms to contributing to a risk which the injured party is deemed to be reponsible for. See Supreme Court 3-2-1-38-06, RT III 2005 (18) 187. A provision similar to VI.–5:102(3) does not feature in the LOA.

13. Similarly, in the NORDIC countries, contributory fault of the claimant is regarded as a mirror image of the other party's liability, although it is stressed that contributory fault does not constitue a breach of duty (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 320, 323; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 319; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 108; Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 222, 228). The various countries adopt clearly divergent approachs as far as further particulars are concerned. from each other. SWEDISH Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 1 differentiates between bodily injury and other harm; only gross negligence and intention on the part of the injured party leads to a reducible damagesowing to contributory negligence. FINNISH Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 1 merely contains a general rule, according to which damages may be reduced as to what is reasonable. On the other hand, the DANISH Damages Liability Act (EAL) does not contain any general regulation on the issue of contributory negligence. Nonetheless, the precept that contributory fault results in a reduced damages claim is generally recognised; the axiom can be indirectly derived from EAL § 24. Contributory negligence can only operate to reduce a compensation claim in respect of physical injury sustained in a traffic accident if the injured party is at a minimum guilty of gross negligence. In general, Incidentially, other general propositions in this area include the precepts that contributory fault leads to a proportional reduction in liability and that a minor fault of the injured party will be disregarded; as a general rule, damages claims are seldom reduced by less than one-third (Karlgren, Skadeståndsrätt[5], 219; Vinding Kruse loc. cit. 318; Saxén loc. cit. 125). In SWEDEN and DENMARK the considerations for reduction include, primarily, the degree of contributory fault, but also in certain instances the dangerousness of the activity of each party, the risk-allocations of the parties through insurance schemes, and in exceptional cases the economic situation of the parties (Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 340; von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 319; see also EAL § 24). Conversely, the position adopted in FINLAND appears to concentrate solely on the contributory fault of the injured party; at any rate, it is a matter of some dispute whether other factors are permitted to flow into the equitable assessment (Hahto, JFT 2005, 267; Saxén loc. cit. 124). The regulation in SWEDISH Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 1, according to which damages claims for physcial injury can be reduced in the event that the injured party was grossly negligent is, comparably speaking, rarely employed. Examples are provided, inter alia, HD 22 February 1979, NJA 1979, 129 (headfirst dive into shallow water in public swimming pool; the claim was reduced by 50%), in HD 1 December 1995, NJA 1995, 661 (Robber shot by victim of robbery; claim reduced by two-thirds) and in HD 6 April 1973, NJA 1973, 141 (a man who trepassed onto construction site at night fell into a unsecured manhole; claim reduced by a third). Conversely, reduction in claims in cases involving bodily injury are a common occurence in FINLAND (Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, Tillägg till Skadeståndsrätt, 407; Hahto, JFT 2005, 267-8; see e.g Supreme Court 25 June 1980, KKO 1980 II 72; Supreme Court 20 August 2003, KKO 2003:70; Supreme Court 13 August 2003, KKO 2003:67 and Supreme Court 31

August 1994, KKO 1994:74). In DENMARK the courts appear to requires (and not only in the case of traffic accidents) an increased acuteness of contributory fault, in order to reduce liability in cases of physical injury; see e.g HD 4 October 1979, UfR 1979, 964; HD 24 November 1981; UfR 1982, 50; HD 25 October 1984, UfR 1984, 1098; Western CA 30 August 2002, UfR 2002, 2546 and HD 6 December 2002, UfR 2002, 519). Sucide attempts do not automatically result in an exclusion of liability (SWEDISH HD 11 July 1983, NJA 1983, 522 II; FINNISH Supreme Court 5 March, KKO 1985 II 30; Bengtsson and Strömbäck loc. cit. 333; DANISH Western CA 7 June 1993, UfR 1993, 785). In each of the three Nordic countries, contributory fault of children and mentally disabled adults is subject to a special judically created regulatory regime (Bengtsson and Strömbäck loc. cit. 346; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 120; von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 322. In SWEDEN, the "normal" rules apply with regard to physical damage to property and pure economic loss, whereby ordinary (not gross) negligence will suffice to support a claim for the reduction of liability (Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 1(2); see in more detail Bengtsson and Strömbäck loc. cit. 340). The failure of an employer or the State to insure their property can amount to contributory fault (Damages Liability Act chap. 3 § 6); the courts have displayed a reluctance to extend this provision analogously to other cases (e.g. HD 29 October 1991, NJA 1991, 567; see Bengtsson, Om jämkning av skadestånd, 103). The DANISH courts, in particular, tend to regard the failure of a property owner to adopt appropriate measures to safeguard particularly valuable property or property which is prone to damage, thereby exposing that property to risk of damage, as amounting to contributory fault (Trolle, Risiko och Skyld[2], 445; von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 332; HD 28 January 1941, UfR 1941, 291; HD 10 November 1952, UfR 1953, 12; Eastern CA 18 March 1955, UfR 1955, 607; HD 6 June 1956, UfR 1956,742; Eastern CA 10 December 1969, UfR 1970, 407; HD 15 April 1981, UfR 1981, 415 and Western CA 19 January 1994, UfR 1994, 304).

14. In ENGLAND the defence of contributory negligence extends to claims based on strict liability arising under the Animals Act 1971: see s. 10 of that Act. Where the claimant has sustained damage in attempting to avert or minimise loss or injury, the claim for reparation is likewise subject to the defence of contributory negligence: Sayers v. Harlow Urban District Council [1958] 1 WLR 623 (where the claimant, who had been locked in a lavatory cubicle due to the defendants' negligence and attempted to climb out, was 25% to blame for her injuries in precariously resting her weight on the toilet roll when, realising that it was impossible to climb out, she abandoned the attempt). To the required standard of care see The Genua (1936) 55 Lloyd's L. Rep 139, 147 (Langton J: "ordinary [nautical] skill"). A mere error of judgment is not regarded as contributory negligence: S.S. "Baron Vernon" v. S.S. "Metagama" 1928 SC (HL) 21, 27 (Viscount Dunedin) and 32 (Lord Phillimore), (who both, however, considered the claimant's "supine inaction" amounted to negligence). The burden of proving the claimant's contributory negligence rests on the defendant: S.S. "Baron Vernon" v. S.S. "Metagama" 1928 SC (HL) 21, 25-26 (Viscount Haldane) and 29 (Lord Shaw), explained in The Genua (1936) 55 Lloyd's L. Rep 139, 144 (Langton J). However, if the contributory negligence is established the burden of proof as regards the extent to which this has or has not exacerbated the claimant's damage has been said to rest on the claimant: S.S. "Baron Vernon" v. S.S. "Metagama" 1928 SC (HL) 21, 27 (Viscount Dunedin), but contrast 33 (Lord Blanesburgh: act of negligence must be regarded as otiose unless it is shown that damage would in ordinary course flow from it).

II. The Duty to Mitigate Damage

15. In two decisions, the FRENCH Cass.civ. 19 June 2003, Bull.civ. 2003, II, no. 203, cases no. 930 and 931 principally rejected the argument that the victim has a duty to mitigate his or her damage under tort law; la victime n´est pas tenue de limiter son préjudice dans l´intérêt du responsable. Prior to this, the Cass.civ. 19 March 1997, Bull.civ. 1997, II, no. 86 p. 48 already formulated the specific principle that the victim has a right to refuse medical treatment and this refusal can therefore not be characterised as a faute Many legal writers point out that these decisions cannot be interpreted to connote that the tortfeasor is under a duty to compensate such consequential damage which the victim could have simply avoided and fails to do this in a grossly careless manner. Furthermore, there is no bar in characterising conduct which aggravates the damage caused as a faute on the part of the victim, If this is the case, then liablity is principally split (Jourdain, RTD civ 2003, 716). In contrast, under BELGIUM the traditional view that every victim of tort has a duty to mitigate the damage, is still adhered to. However, the victim is not required to resort to anything more than a mesures raisonnables (Cass. 14 May 1992, Pas. belge 1992, I, no. 478 p. 798). The criterion employed is whether a homme raisonnable et prudent would have had recourse to appropriate measure in the case at issue. Acadameic teaching regards the duty to mitigae or reduce damage as emanating from the general tort law duty of care (Ronse [-De Wilde/Claeys/Mallems], Schade en schadeloosstelling I^2, p. 325 no. 464).

16. In SPAIN, there is universal consensus on the principle that an injured party is required to take all suitable measures to reduce the damage. This deber de mitigar los daños finds its rationale in the general principle of good faith (CC art. 7(1); TS 29 November 1995, RAJ 1995 (5) no. 8361 p. 11143). It does not imply disproportionate sacrifices or the confrontation of the victim with new risks (Díez-Picazo, Derecho de daños, 322). In the other hand, reduction in liability claims as a consequence of a failure to mitigate damage are not confined to physical injury or damage to property; e.g. an injury of incorporeaö personality rights can also be counted among their number (see TS 23 April 1999, RAJ 1999 (3) no. 4248 p. 6542: a report in the local press where it was alleged that the claimant had sexual intercourse with a man other than her husband at her wedding reception, was elevated to a national news story as the claimant called a press conference the next day to speak about the issue; the damages claim was reduced by approximately one -third).

17. According to ITALIAN CC art. 2056, CC art. 1227 is also applicable to tort law claims. CC art. 1227(2) introduces a rule for the reduction of a liability claim in cases where the injured party did not act in a sufficiently careful manner subsequent to the damaging event in order to contain its impact (Cass. 13 March 1987, no. 2655, MFI 1987, 2655). The compensation claim is reduced, if the ensuing damage cannot be regarded as a normal consequence in the chain of causation set in motion by the tortfeasor (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, sub art. 2056, 785-786). CC art. 1227(2) is employed e.g where the victim of an accident claimed disproportionally high repair costs (see CFI Genova 8 April 1983, Arch.Giur.circolaz. 1983, 775; CFI Forlì 9 March 1994, Arch.Giur.circolaz. 1994, 1073; CA Genova 6 May 1985, Giust.civ. 1986, I, 2257) or where a victim unnecessarily sought medical treatment in a private clinic instead of at a state run hospital (CFI Trieste 14 January 1988, Dir. economia assicur. 1988, 539). A further example for CC art. 1227 is provided by a decision in which a shopkeeper failed to move goods threatened by floodwaters into storage which was not threatened therefrom (Cass. 9 February 2004, no. 2422, Giur.it.Mass. 2002, fasc. 2). CC art. 1227 also crops up in a case of an employee, who was at first unfairly dismissed, then reinstated to his position where that employee failed to exercise himself to find another position during the period of unemployment (Cass.sez.lav. 21 September 2000, no. 10859, Stud. Iuris 2001, 217).

18. In order to supplement the analysis for HUNGARY above in note I4 above, it is necessary to advert inter alia to BH 1996/38 (whereby the failure to mitigate damage resulted in the victim incurring further costs, the tortfeasor's insurer was not required to compenates these additional costs), BH 1987/450 (according to which the duty to mitigate damage cannot impose an undue burden on the injured party; its purpose is not to exculpate the tortfeasor from liability) and BH 1984/197 (according to which the tortfeasor is only required to compesnate those costs which would have arisen, if the injured party had fulfilled his duty to mitigate damage in an appropriate manner). Similarly, under BULGARIAN LOA art. 83(2) the debtor is not liable for damage which an honest creditor could have avoided. However, he cannot be expected to resort to measures which would generate more costs than the prevention of the damage, in addition, s/he cannot be required to resort to unlawful measures or to measures contra bonos mores nor be expected to employ means that have the effect of injuring his good reputation (Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast, 389). According to SLOVENIAN LOA art. 171(1) a breach of the duty to mitigate damage results in a reduction of claims for compensation for pecuniary and non-pecuniary loss (art. 185) (VSS II 25 January 1996, Ips 423/94: refusal to consent to an operation performed under general anaesthetic). The injured party is not obliged to resort to extaordinary measures nor act as a sacrifical lamb (VSS II 14 March 1996, Ips 652/94). ROMANIAN statute law currently does not recognise any duty to mitigate damage; however, this duty ought to achieve statutory recognition in the proposed Civil Code (Entwurf art. 1109(1); Proiectul Noului Cod civil, 217).

19. GERMAN CC § 254(2) makes explicit what in actual fact already follows from CC § 254(1), namely, that contributory fault on the part of the injured party can also stem from a failure to point out an extraordinary risk that extensive damage will result or may derive from a failure to prevent the damage occuring or failing to take measures that minimise the impact of the damage. Three duties are imposed on the injured party, namely, a duty to warn, a duty to avoid damage and a duty to take appropriate measures to reduce the extent of the damage. The injured party is guilty of contributory fault if s/he violates the duty to act in good faith by failing to take those measures that a ordinarily careful and reasonable person would take in the circumstances to safeguard his or her interests (BGH 13 December 1951, NJW 1952, 299, 300). It is incumbant upon a person who is seriously injured to take it upon themselves to seek medical treatment and to follow doctors's orders (Medicus, Schuldrecht I AT[16], no. 675); he is even obliged to consent to an operation, if it can be regarded as a safe routine procedure, recovery is not particularly painful, there is a excellent chance of recovery or the operation offers a prospect of considerable improvement (BGH 15 March 1994, NJW 1994, 1592, 1593). The injured party is also under a duty, within reasonable bounds, to utilise his remaining working capacity to avoid or reduce a loss of earnings and if necessary to undergo training in this regard (BGH 13 May 1953, NJW 1953, 1098; BGH 9 October 1990, NJW 1991, 1412, 1413). The tortfeasor must compensatte the injured party for expenditure incurred while fullfilling the duties outllined above (BGH 1 April 1993, NJW 1993, 2685, 2687). The duty to warn is only extant when it was possible for the injured party to have recognised the high potential for harm or s/he should have recognised this risk (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[66], § 254, no. 38; Erman [-Kuckuk], BGB I[11], § 254, no. 56; BGH 1 February 1965, VersR 1965, 484, 487). A warning is not required, in circumstances where the tortfeasor and injured party are in a similar position as far as recognising the risk is concerned (Staudinger [-Schiemann], BGB [Neubearbeitung 2005], § 254, no. 75). If the tortfeasor in any case, would have failed to heed the warning had it been given, then the causation requirement is not established for the presence of contributory fault (BGH 26 May 1988, NJW 1989, 290, 292; vgl. auchBGH 19 September 1995, VersR 1996, 380, 381). However, it will suffice for the tortfeasor to assert that had he been warned, he would have resorted to approrpriate measures, even in a case where it was not certain that this course of action would have prevented the ensuing harm (BGH 1 December 2005, NJW 2006, 1426, 1428; BGH 1 December 2005, NJW-RR 2006, 1108, 1110). The risk of unusually extensive damage was e.g. approved in a decision where a daily loss of € 11.500 was accrued where a printer valued at € 14.400 broke down (CA Hamm 17 June 1996, NJW-RR 1998, 380); loss resulting from a translating error, which amounted to 40 times the fee charged (CA Hamm 28 February 1989, NJW 1989, 2066) and in respect of a risk of losing a particularly favourable financial investment (RG 29 October 1910, JW 1911, 35; however, the BGH 18 February 2002, NJW 2002, 2553, 2554 was critical of this decision).

20. Pursuant to AUSTRIAN law, an injured party violates his duty to mitigate damage when s/he culpably (OGH 30 May 1974, SZ 47/69 p. 301) fails to act as the ordinary person would have done to avert or minimise the ensuing damage (OGH 28 March 2000, 1 Ob 9/00f). The measures that the injured party is expected to adopt fall to be decided on a case by case basis., (OGH 30 May 1974 loc. cit.; OGH 26 February 2002, 1 Ob 24/02i), and will also hinge on whether the such protective measures were necessary was common knowledge (OGH 10 October 1983, ZVR 1984/122 p. 116; OGH 7 July 2005, 2 Ob 135/04y: cyclist failed to wear a helmet; did not amount to contributory fault). Refusal to undergo therapeutic medical treatment or an operation may constitute contributory fault (OGH 12 March 1963, SZ 36/37 p. 104; OGH 30 May 1974 loc. cit.; OGH 12 February 1981, ZVR 1982/113 p. 86), as may the failure to pursue a occupation that can be reasonably expected of one (OGH 25 June 1998, ZVR 1999/25 p. 91; OGH 7 December 2000, ZVR 2002/5 p. 13) or allow repairs to be carried out (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 12/104). A Von Jehovah‘s witness is not required to accept a blood transfusion (OGH 25 June 1998, ZVR 1999/25 p. 91). As a general rule, a person cannot be reasonable expected to consent to serious or even potentially life- threatening surgery (OGH 30 May 1974 loc. cit.). The tortfeasor bears the burden of proving that the injured party breached the duty to mitigate his loss (OGH 8 November 1984, ZVR 1985/114 p. 212; OGH 26 November 1992, JBl 1994, 331).

21. GREEK CC art. 300(1)(second sentence) makes explicit that an injured party can be guilty of contributory fault in failing to point out the risk of the occurence of unusually extensive damage or failed to avert the damage or take steps to minimise it. It will depend on whether the injured party has infringed the duty to act in good faith or remained inactive, thereby in contravention of social conventions (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 300, no. 10). A textbook example is provided by the failure to quench a fire in the expectation that the arsonist would have to pay anyhow and refusing to consent to a routine unproblematic medical treatment or operation (Stathopoulos loc. cit. no. 11).

22. PORTUGUESE CC art. 570(1) confers a discretion on the courts to reduce damages if the injured party culpably failed to hinder an aggravation of the damage, see note I10 above; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 588, note 2 under art. 570 and Brandão Proença, A conduta do lesado, 101. This state of affairs can occur if the victim of accident sspurns medical treatment befitting the circumstances where it might be generally expected that such consent would be forthcoming.

23. In a similar fashion, the DUTCH CC art. 6:101(1) requires victims to take measures to contain the damage within reasonable bounds (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 351; Schadevergoeding I [-Lindenbergh] art. 6:96, note 172 p. 768; HR 24 January 1997, NedJur 1999 no. 56 p. 224). This provision is supplemented by CC art. 6:96(2), according to which the injured party is entitled to claim for reasonable expenditure incurred in his or her attempt to avert or minimise the loss. The courts determine reasonableness by reference, inter alia, to the relation between the impending damage and the costs of containing it as well as examining the risk incurred by the injured party in adopting these containment measures (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 335).

24. The duty to mitigate damage is universally recognised in the NORDIC countries (Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 338; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 245; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 122). At the same time, while it is indeed conceded that this duty is related to the doctrine of contributory fault, the duty to mitigate is usually only mentioned under the heading of adequate causation (Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 479; Radetzki, Skadeståndsberäkning vid sakskada, 158; Peczenik, Causes and Damages, 246). We are concerned here with the extent of the damage once part of it has already occured whereas contributory negligence concerns the occurrence of the damaging event itself. Compensation is restricted to the loss which the injured party could not have adverted by resorting to appropriate measures (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 334; Andersson loc. cit. 480; Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 417; Saxén loc. cit. 117, 122). "Appropriateness" is measured according to an evaluation of the particulars of the individual case, inter alia, the courts have regard to the basis for liability and the nature of the loss sustained (Andersson loc. cit. 482; Radetzki loc. cit. 159). The injured party is required to seek medical treatment, if he cannot have failed to have realised the seriousness of his injury or illness (Swedish HD 19 July 1909, NJA 1909, 369 and HD 15 December 1939, NJA 1939, 601); he is also required to undergo an operation to which he could reasonably be expected to consent as it was not particularly risky nor were any other reasons extant to justify a refusal to consent (Jørgensen, Erstatning for personskade og tab af forsørger[3], 467; Danish HD 23 June 1969, UfR 1969, 682). A further requirement is that proactive measures are adopted in respect of reintregration into the workforce (Swedish Damages Liability Act chap. 5 § 1, Finnish Damages Liabaility Act chap. 5 § 2a, Danish EAL chap. 1 § 5(2); see also Swedish HD 4 December 1991, NJA 1991 662. In general, physical damage to property damage and pure economic loss are treated the same as physical injury. For example, if a fire breaks out, the plaintiff must attempt to rescue the livestock (Danish Western CA 25 February 1942, UfR 1942, 560), and moor vehicles must be brought promptly for repair so that loss of earnings and damages resulting from loss of use can be contained Fa (Swedish HD 20 April 1938, NJA 1938, 147; HD 31 May 1965, NJA 1965, 165; HD 12 April 1978, NJA 1978, 207). Of course, it is not per se inappropriate to charge a vet to take measures that cost more than the animal itself (Swedish HD 22 February 2001, NJA 2001, 65 I-II; Danish Eastern CA 14 September 1981, UfR 1981, 1074; Vinding Kruse loc. cit. 334; Andersson loc. cit. 484; Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 416; Saxén loc. cit. 122, 280). As far as pure economic loss is concerned, e,g a break down in operations, it may be necessary in exceptional circumstances to make employees redundant (HD 11 November 1959, NJA 1959, 552) or to take out a bank loan to get the production up and running again (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 245); it may also be required to restructure costly working practices (Danish SH 7 April 1960, UfR 1960, 932; Danish HD 24 June 1983, UfR 1983, 714).

III. Contributory Fault in Road Traffic Accidents

25. In FRANCE, compensation for traffic accidents is governed by the socalled. Loi Badinter (des Gesetzes of 5 July 1985). These rules, in so far as they are apply, have precedence over the general rules on liability (Bénabent, Obligations[9], no. 647 p. 428); the latter are only employed when the Loi Badinter no longer applies (Cass.civ. 4 March 1999, Bull.civ. 1999, II, no. 36 p. 27: liability of a pedestrian vis á vis a motor cyclist). The victim of a traffic accident has a compensation claim against the driver of the gardien of the involved vehicle and this claim does not require proof of fault. Drivers and gardien cannot rely on either force majeure or argue that it was a case fait d´un tiers (loc. cit. art. 2). A distinction is drawn between bodily injury and physical damage to property in cases where the victim was guilty of contributory fault. The defence of a faute inexcusable can only be asserted gainst a victim, who is not the driver of the vehicle, and only when the cause of the accident could solely be attributed to the victim (loc. cit. art. 3(1)) and the victim was not younger than 16, older than 70, or has a degree of permanent disability or incapacity to work of at least 80 % (loc. cit. art. 3(2)). Liability will not be imposed on a defendant in cases of suicide or attempted suicide (loc. cit. art. 3(3)). If the driver sustains injury, than his or her contributory negligence generally reduces the liability of the gardien by 50%; in serious cases liability can be reduced by up to 100% (loc. cit. art. 4); that the driver contributed to the cause of the accident (under the influence of alcohol; driving too fast) is always a prerequisite fort he reduction of liability (Cass.ass.plén. 6 April 2007, Bull.civ. 2007, no. 5 p. 11; Cass.ass.plén. 6 April 2007, Bull.civ. 2007, no. 6 p. 12). Article 4 regulates physical damage to property and is also relevant vis á vis injured party who were not the drivers of the vehicle (loc. cit. art. 5(1)).

26. In BELGIUM, compensation for victims of traffic accidents is governed by the Law of 21 November 1989. Loc. cit. art. 29*bis* §1(1), governs the liability of the insurer of the owner, driver and keeper of a motor vehicle involved in an accident for death or bodily injury to someone other than the driver. Persons, over the age of 14 or those who intend the occurence of the accident and intend its consequences cannot rely on this provision (loc. cit. (6)). SPANISH Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic Act art. 1(1) 4 provides that in the case that the driver is at fault, the victim's claim is reduced in proportion tot he extent that s/he contributed to the cause of the damage. This rule applies to both physical injury and economic loss (loc. cit. art. 4(3)). The wording of the statutory provision has attracted criticism, however, legal commentators have given a broad welcome to the clarification that the rules on contributory fault also apply in the context of a traffic accident (Reglero Campos [-Reglero Campos], Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 933-934). Loc. cit. art. 1(2) contributory fault on the part of a person to whom fault cannot generally be imputed is treated no differently the fault of every other victim of a traffic accident (see CA Ciudad Real 25 February 2002, BDA JUR 2002/117158; critical on policy grounds Medina Alcoz, La culpa de la víctima, 297.

27. ITALIAN CC art. 1227 applies also to traffic accidents. Not wearing a seat belt is an orthodox example; if a front-seat passenger fails to wear a seatbelt, then, up to a certain percentage amount which is assessed on the circumstances of the case, the driver can also be held responsible (compare Cass. 11 March 2004, no. 4993, Foro it. 2004, I, 2108 und 3129: here, failure to wear a seat-belt contributed to the cause of the accident by 50%; 30% of liability was apportioned to the injured party, 20% to the driver). Further, pedestrians must reckon with a reduction in their claim for damages pursuant to CC art. 2054(1) if they can be deemed to have conducted themselves in a dangerous manner and displayed a want of care (Cass. 10 August 2000, no. 10352, Giur.it.Mass. 2000, 1732; Cass. 16 September 1996, no. 8281, Danno e resp. 1997, 252). In the event that two vehicles collide, according to CC art. 2054(2), " until there is evidence to the contrary, it is presumed that each driver contributed in equal measure to the cause of the damage sustained by the respective vehicles..

28. In BULGARIA, the general rules on contributory fault govern traffic accidents. A passenger is not deemed to have contributed to the cause of the accident where, for example, subsequent to the accident, where a car travelling at too high a speed spun around, sprang out of the window and was thereby fatally injured (Supreme Court 22 September 1983, decision no. 590 in criminal matters, case no. 599/83). On the other hand, a pedestrian was found guilty of contibutory fault which has the effect of reducing liability, where he traversed a zebra crossing without watching out for oncoming traffic (Supreme Court 19 August 1980, decision no. 846 in criminal matters, case no. 756/1980*). According to case law*, individuals who are deemed to be incapable of committing a tort (e.g. minors) are required to either know the rules oft he road or at all times are required to be accompanied (Supreme Court 16 October 1979, decision no. 1082 in criminal matters, case no. 956/79). Proof of contributory fault must be established; it is not possible to derive a presumption of contributory fault from an analogous application of LOA art. 45(2) (Burov, Grajdanska otgovornost za vredi, prichineni pri avtomobilna zlopoluka, 158).

29. Strict liability of the keeper of a mechically propelled vehicle under POLISH CC art. 436 § 1 cannot be imposed if, the accident was exclusivley caused by the injured party or by a third party, for whom the injured party bore no responsibility (Bieniek [-Bieniek][5], art. 436 nos. 17 and 21; Pietrzykowski [-Safjan], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 436 no. 14). This "exclusive fault" must be the sole cause of the accident (Radwański [-Olejniczak], Zobowiązania - część ogólna[5], p. 226 no. 576; Bieniek loc. cit. art. 435 no. 33; Safjan loc. cit. art. 435 no. 21; Supreme Court 18 December 1961, 4 CR 328/61, NP no. 11/1962, p. 1523: in spite of defendant's warning, the claimant stepped onto a moweing machine which was running at the time). If the injured party does not commit an "exclusive" fault, rather is guilty of a "common" fault, then his or her claim will be reduced according to the criteria contained in the general rule under CC art. 362 (Bieniek loc. cit. art. 436, no. 19; ; Bieniek [-Wiśniewski][5], art. 362 no. 6; Safjan loc. cit. art. 435 no. 25 and art. 436 no. 14; Supreme Court 2 December 1985, IV CR 412/85, OSPiKA 1986, no. 4, pos. 87; Supreme Court 6 June 1997, II CKN 213/97, OSNC 1998, no. 1, pos. 5: travelling with an intoxicated driver following joint alcohol consumption).

30. A rule governing the reduction in recovery of damages to the detriment of the victim of an accident can be derived from GERMAN CC § 254(1). This rule comes into operation if the victim does not observe traffic regulations or was responsible for operating a vehicle with an inherent danger (BGH 9 January 1959, BGHZ 29, 163, 171; BGH 30 January 1979, NJW 1979, 980). It is certainly true that CC § 254 only impinges on a relatively minor number of cases of loss sustained in traffic accidents. If the damage is caused by more than one vehicle or if the keeper of one vehicle sustains loss which is caused by the other, then Road Traffic Act § 17(1) is applicable; however, this provision fully corresponds with CC § 254(1) (Erman [-Kuckuk], BGB I[11], § 254, no. 35). The duty to mitigate damage pursuant to CC § 254(2) is left unaffected by the Road Traffic Act § 17 (MünchKomm [-Oetker], BGB[5], § 254, no. 13). Children who have yet to attain the age of ten are not liable for damage that they unintentionally inflict on another party in a trsffic accident (CC § 828(2)); consequently, they do not have to reckon with a reduction in recovery.

31. AUSTRIAN CC § 1304 also operates to govern road traffic accidents. It is also applicable to cases where the injured party bases his claim to recovery on the defendanrt being strict liable (EKHG § 7). Special rules solely arise in the context of a breach of a duty to wear a seat-belt or in the contxt of motorcycles, a failure to wear a helmet (see note I8 above). An individual will be deemed to have committed a contributory fault, for example, where s/he agrees tob e carried by a recognisably a drunken driver (OGH 10 December 1970, SZ 43/231 p. 813) by employing CC § 1310 in a corresponding manner, the courts affirmed the contributory fault of a child who was capable of distinguishing between right and wrong who suddenly jumped out from behind a parked car and ran onto the road (see further Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Karner], ABGB^{2} § 1310 no. 7).

32. GREEK CC art. 300 (note I9 above) also applicable to road traffic accidents (Kritikos, Aposimiosi apo trochaia avtokinitika atichimata, 34 und 460). As far as minors who have yet to attain the age of ten are concerned, it is questionable on the grounds of CC art. 915 whether their claims can be reduced on teh grounds of contributory fault. The majority view in legal commentary submits that the question should be resolved by employing CC art. 918 in a corresponding manner: it then hinges on whether the minor should be deemed liable upon application of the rules on equitable liability, if he himself did not sustain injury but caused loss to a third party (ErmAK [-Litzeropoulos], art. 300, no. 22; Kritikos loc. cit. 36; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 300, no. 8; Dimopoulou, Evthini apo diakindinevsi, 39). Road Traffic Liability Act art. 6 does indeed contain a provision, liability of the injured party is completely excluded under this Act is precluded, however, this provision is regarded as having been rendered obsolete by the subsequent enactment of CC art. 300, (Kornilakis, I evthini apo diakindinevsi, 174; Livanis, I efarmogi tou arthrou 300 is to pedion tis antikimenikis evthinis, 140; s. auch Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 694).

33. PORTUGUESE CC art. 505 makes explicit that the rules on reduction of liability on the grounds of contributory fault (CC art. 570) are also valid in cases where the keeper is deemed strictly liable pursuant to art. 503(1). Incidentially, liability is only excluded where the victim alone or an act of a third party causes the accident or if the gardien invokes force majeure, which does not arise in connection with the operation of a motor vehicle (see further Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I^{10}, 676). For the cases governed by CC art. 505, the realisation of a risk, for which CC art. 503 affixes strict liability, should be absent. Cases, where both the driver and the injured party contributed to the cause of the accident remain governed by art. 570 (see e.g. CA Evora 17 April 1997, BolMinJus 466 [1997] 610 and STJ 6 July 1971, BolMinJus 209 [1971] 102). The driver is exempt from liability, if and insofar as the accident can be attributed to the misconduct of an individual not capable of committing a fault. In the event that two or more vehicles collide, the following distinction is required to be drawn: CC art. 570 is applicable, if both sides are at fault. If neither one of the drivers is at fault, it will then depend on the degree to which the inherent operating risk present in the respective vehicles contributed to the cause of the accident (CC art. 506(1)). In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the inherent operational risks of both vehicles, and if it is ascertained that fault was present on both sides, then liability is equally apportioned (CC art. 506(2)).

34. As a general rule, DUTCH CC art. 6:101 (see I11 above) is also applicable to road traffic accidents. However, the prerequiste that a reduction in liability must meet the requirements of fairness, is attibuted a particular significance in this area. It has been noted that the courts display a tendency to protect the interests of weaker road user even in the event of a breach of traffic and safety regulations and the courts curb the use of CC art. 6:101 in this context (see further Onrechtmatige daad III [-Bouman] Part III.7, nos. 253-254 pp. 97-118; Schadevergoeding I [-Boonekamp], art. 6:101, no. 12.1, p. 38). As far as injury ti children who have yet to attain the age of 14 is concerned, it is accepted that full damages can be recovered from the individual who caused the dangerous situations. This rule is only diverged from if it can be proved that the child acted with a lack of due care and require express justification (HR 8 Dezember 1989, NedJur 1990 no. 778 p. 3248). Furthermore, cyclist and pedestrians enjoy a measure of special protection, namely, provided that they neither acted in an intentional or careless manner, such plaintiffs are entitled to recover a damages award of at least 50% from the keeper of the motor vehicle (HR 28 Februar 1992, NedJur 1993 no. 566 p. 2117).

35. ESTONIAN LOA § 139(1) confers a discretion on the judge, enabling him/her to disregard an insignificant fault of the injured party. VI.–5:102(2)(b) resembles LOA § 139(3), however, the latter provision is not confined to regulating road traffic accidents, it impinges on all types of personal injury.

36. Please see also the note following under IV for a detalied examination of the situation prevailing in the NORDIC Countries. SWEDISH Traffic Damages Act § 12 corresponds to the general rule govening general tort liability (see note I13 above), according to which liability for personal injury may only be reduced where the victim acts intentionally or in a grossly negligent manner. An identical situation prevails under the DANISH Traffic Act § 101(2) and FINNISH Traffic Insurance Act chap. 2 § 7. The SWEDISH Act additionally provides fort he possibility that liability can be reduced tot he detriment of a drunken driver, who negligently contributed to causing his own damage (see HD 6 April 2000, NJA 2000, 150). The situation in DENMARK (HD 15 November 2002, UfR 2003, 339) and FINLAND (loc. cit.) is similar. An individual who permits himself to driven by a driver who is recognisably under the influence is grossly negligent. Ordinary (not gross) contributory fault on the part of the injured party suffices to reduce a liability claim in cases of damage to property (SWEDISH Traffic Damages Act § 12(2); DANISH Traffic Act § 101(3); FINNISH Traffic Insurance Act chap. 2 § 7(2)). In the event of a vehicle collison, the respective degree of fault and other determining factors (such as the existence of other risks that contributed to the cause of the accident) are taken account of by the courts when weighing up all the circumstances of the case (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 228, 235; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 167; Lyngsø, Færdselsansvar[3], 73; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 256).

IV. Reduction in Liability where the strict liability of the injured party contributes to the cause of the accident

37. The notion that liability can be reduced on the basis of the injured party‘s objective fault is not recognised under FRENCH and BELGIAN law. Each party is obliged to fully compensate the other, unless the injured party contributed to the cause of the damage (Cass.civ. 11 Februray 1976, D 1976 Jur. 609, note Larroumet).

38. In SPAIN, the defence of contributory fault operates in cases of fault based liability as well as in cases of strict liability (e.g. Reglero Campos [-Reglero Campos], Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 446; see also Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic Act art. 1.1(4)). Initially, in cases involving motor vehicle collisons, the Tribunal Supremo deemed the strict liability regime to be inapplicable and that liabilty was tob e apportioned along the respective lines of fault (TS 6 March 1992, RAJ 1992 [2] no 2397 p. 3245; TS 15 April 1992, RAJ 1992 [2] no. 3306 p. 4368; TS 29 April 1994, RAJ 1994 [2] no. 2983 p. 4029). However, the courts of first instance have decided that each party must compensate 50% of the loss of the other party in cases, where the facts resemble those contained in illustration 9 under VI.–5:102, provided that the respective degrees of fault and contributions to the cause of the accident cannot be definitively ascertained (CA Islas Baleares 12 September 2006, BDA JUR 2006/279403; CA Islas Baleares 2 February 2006, BDA JUR 2006/155482). CA Barcelona 19 January 2006, JUR 2006/112784 reduced the claim of each party by a half, without having determined the presence of a concrete fault on the part of either of the drivers. In a collision between a car and motorbike CA Barcelona 2 March 2006, JUR 2006/232076 reduced the car drivers's claim by 75 % (because he had overlooked a traffic sign), and the motorbiker's claim by 25 %. In line with VI.–5:102(2)(a) and (b), courts seem to disregard an insubstantial contributory fault or accountability (CA Barcelona 23 October 2006, BDA JUR 2007/149; CA Madrid 28 September 2006, JUR 2006/268555; CFI Barcelona 16 May 2007, La Ley 18 July 2007 no. 6758). The prevailing legal doctrine also favours a reduction of compensation when two sources of danger mutually contribute to the occurrence or the extent of the damage (Reglero Campos loc. cit. 447). It goes without saying that the contributory fault of an employee is imputed to his/her employer and operates to reduce liability (TS 9 March 1995, RAJ 1995 [1] no 1847 p. 2431).

39. The rational of ITALIAN CC art. 1227(1) is interpreted as connoting that the injured party must bear his or her share of the entire damage that s/he contributed to cause. Consequently, this provision also applies where one or both the parties concerned are strictly liable or where fault is presumed (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, supplement to arts. 2043, 2056-2059, sub art. 2043, p. 41, 46). For example, in a case involving a motor vehicle and an animal, the extent of the relevant liability (CC arts. 2052 und 2054(1)) is determined with reference to the circumstances of the individual case (Cass. 9 December 1992, no. 13016, Giust.civ.Mass. 1992, fasc. 12; Cass. 27 June 1997, no. 5783, Giust.civ.Mass. 1997, 1077). If the animal caused the driver of the motor vehicle to suffer a loss and affirmative proof cannot be aduced that the latter did everything in his power to avoid the loss occuring, (CC art. 2054(1)), this hast he effect of reducing his damages claim upon application of CC art. 1227(1) (Cass. 9 June 2002, no. 200, Resp. civ. e prev. 2002, 1390). In the event that a "collision of motor vehicles" occurs, then pursuant to CC art. 2054(2) "unless contrary evidence is adduced, there is a presumption that the drivers of the vehicles are jointly and severally liable for causing the damage". Therefore, it is incumbant upon each party to bear 50% of the damage that s/he has sustained and each party is bound to compensate 50% of the other party's loss. This corresponds to the rule anchored in VI.–5:102.

40. If two considerably hazardous activities (e.g two motor vehicles) meet head on, then, according to HUNGARIAN CC § 346(1), first and foremost, the "classical" rules pertaining to fault based liability govern the relationship to one another. If fault is absent, and the cause of the damage can be attributed to an "irregularity" inherent in one of the vehicles involved, then liability is imposed on that party (CC § 346(2)). However, if such an irregularity was present in each vehicle or it cannot be positively affirmed in respect of any of them and fault is absent, then each party has the burden of bearing his or her own loss (CC § 346(3)); in this case, a solution entailing that each party is to compensate the loss of the other is regarded as "absurd": Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 118ff. If a dangerous activity collides with a non hazardous activity and damage is also incurred by the dangerous activity, then the claim of that party is reduced according to the extent that the inherent operating risk contributed to the cause of the damage (Opinion of the Civil College of the Supreme Court PK 38 Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata I, 1271f; Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II, 593f). Likewise, CC § 346 applies to cases where a road traffic accident is caused by wild game. That game turn up on highways is not regarded as an " irregularity", however, individuals holding a hunting permit are liable for game which venture onto motorway and for game that do not behave as expect on highways (Benedek loc. cit. 1278; BH 2003/237; BH 2000/401; cf. also Wellmann loc. cit. 596; BH 2000/402). Similarly, in ROMANIA, the courts and prevailing legal opinion operate on the assumption that liabilites which collide operate to cancel each other out so that systematically, it falls to be governed by the generally rules pertaining to fault based liability (Romoşan, Vinovăţia în dreptul civil român, 177-178). BULGARIAN law does not recognise a reduction in liability on the grounds of strict liability of the injured party which contributes to the cause of the acccident. The courts simply declare that objective liability for animals and property is dispenseed with in cases where the cause of the accident can be exclusively ascribed to the fault of the injured party (Supreme Court 26 November 1960, decision no. 799 in civil matters, case no. 6940/60, fourth chamber). Pursuant to SLOVENIAN LOA art. 154(3), as a general rule both parties are liable for road traffic accidents which were not caused by the fault of either of the involved parties, unless achieving an equitable result necessitates a different apportionment of liability. Above all, consideration of the dangerous state of the respective vehicles flows into this equitable assessement (see further Juhart and Plavšak [-Pensa], Obligacijski zakonik I, art. 154 p. 882).

41. The issue of confining the scope of a damages claim in cases where there is no actual contributory fault on the part of the injured party, however, strict liability of that party operates to contribute to the cause of the damage is the subject of intense discussion in POLAND (for further analysis e.g. Szpunar, Rejent no. 2001 (6) 13; Granecki, PiP 2003 (1) 68; Radwański [-Olejniczak], Zobowiązania - część ogólna[5], 96, no. 249; SystPrCyw III [-Dybowski], 298; Pietrzykowski [-Banaszczyk][4], art. 362 no. 5). The majoritarian view in teaching and jurisprudence appears to favour an approach where it hinges on the grounds for which liability was imposed on the defendan: if fault liability is at issue, then only the contributory fault of the injured party will operate to reduce his damages claim; conversely if strict liability is involved, then the strict liability of the injured party will operate to reduce his claim (Olejniczak loc. cit. no. 250; Dybowski loc. cit. 298; Bieniek [-Wiśniewski][5], art. 362 nos. 5 and 7; Supreme Court 7 October 1977, I CR 366/77, OSNC 1978, no. 7, pos. 118; Supreme Court 13 October 1998, II UKN 259/98, OSNP 1999, no. 21, pos. 698; Supreme Court 6 October 2000, II UKN 27/00, OSNP 2002, no. 10, pos. 249). In the case of a venicle collison, according to CC art. 436 § 2, the general rules pertaining to fault based liability prevail over the strict liability rules, with the result that if fault is absent, then, in end effect, each party bears his or her own loss (for an interpretation of the concept of collision, see Supreme Court 4 March 1958, 1 CR 154/56, OSP 1959, no. 10, pos. 257; Supreme Court 2 January 1976, III CZP 79/75, OSNCP 1976, nos. 7-8, pos. 155). Of course, strict liability (and joint and several liability) endures vis à vis third parties (Supreme Court 19 May 1970, II CR 137/70, OSPiKA 1971, no. 5, pos. 90).

42. According to GERMAN law, an operational risk or an inherent danger in tangible propertyon the part of the injured party which contributed to cause the damage has the effect of reducing his or her claim and whether the damaging party is liable under contract or tort law is irrelevant for these purposes (BGH 9 June 1952, NJW 1952, 1015; BGH 30 May 1972, NJW 1972, 1415). According to case law, the operating risk inherent in the injured keeper's motor vehicle is taken account of in the assessment of damages for non-pecuniary loss (BGH 13 April 1956, NJW 1956, 1067; BGH 18 November 1957, NJW 1958, 341; cf. CC § 253(2)). The factor is, however, disregarded in cases involving a claim of the keeper vis á vis the driver (BGH 30 May 1972, NJW 1972, 1415). The principle that a risk inherent in a thing or an inherent operating risk which contributes to cause the damage sustained, operates to reduce a claim for reparation is not applicable in cases involving the liability of an animal keeper (BGH 6 July 1976, NJW 1976, 2130), to cases pertaining to the liability for damage caused by aircraft (BGH 18 November 1999, NJW-RR 2000, 549) nor even to certain areas of environmental liability law (BGH 13 December 1994, NJW 1995, 1150, 1151).

43. The mirror image principle (in Austria it is known as principle of equal treatment) is also valid in AUSTRIA. Consequently, it follows that liability will be reduced, in the event that the inherent operational risk in the injured party's vehicle (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 12/1) or another reason for imposing strict liability (as e.g. strict liability under the Product Liability Act § 11) operated to contribute to the cause of the damage sustained.

44. The position under GREEK law conforms to the aforementioned. CC art. 300 is also applicable to cases if an inherent risk in a thing or operational risk or other ground for imposing strict liability contributes to cause the loss sustained (Dimopoulou, Evthini apo diakindinevsi, 33). Therefore, for example, a claim will be reduced to the prejudice of e.g the owner, if a dog is killed as a result of a road traffic accident (for which strict liability under CC art. 924 is imposed; for further analysis see Dimopoulou loc. cit. 36)

45. PORTUGUSE CC art. 506(1) makes a distinction for the case where there is a motor vehicle collison which is not to due to fault of either one of the drivers, on the basis whether only one of the vehicles may be regarded as the cause of the accident (e.g. because the brakes of that vehicle malfunctioned), or whether both are involved (e.g. because both skidded on an imperceptible patch of oil), see Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 683, Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], art. 506 no. 1 p. 519). In the first case, the keeper of the vehicle that caused the accident is liable, in the second case, it depends on the degree of gravity of the risk of fault with which both vehicles contributed to the cause of the accident; in the case of doubt, it is generally assumed that both parties are equally at fault (CC art. 506(2). For example, in a case involving a collision between a van and a moped, liability of the keeper of the small van was apportioned at 75% and the driver of the moped was deemed to be responsible for 25% of the entire damage (CA Oporto 28 February 2005, Proc. 0550692). However, in addition, whether the general contributory fault rules regulation contained in CC art. 570(1) could be applied analogously to the case where the strict liability of the injured party contributes to the cause of the accident is a matter of some contention. Academic teaching is predominantly in favour of this solution (Brandão Proença, A conduta do lesado, 170, 174-175; Vaz Serra, RLJ 111 [1978/1979] 281 and Almeida Costa, Obrigações[10], 641). STJ 9 March 1978, RLJ 111 [1978/1978] 276 rejected the analogous application of CC art. 506(2) in respect of the liabilityof the keeper of an animal.

46. Prevailing legal opinion deems that DUTCH CC art. 6:101 (claim will be reduced, if the damage is also the result of circumstances which may be imputed to the injured party) is not only applicable in cases where the injured party was guilty of contributory fault, but may be also employed in cases where circumstances which belong in his sphere of risk contributed to the cause of the accident. Risk based liability imposed by statute or imposed on the basis of social convention which contributes to cause the accident will also be taken account of by the courts (Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 450 p. 402; Schadevergoeding I [-Boonekamp], art. 6:101, no. 5 pp. 14-20; HR 27 April 2001, NedJur 2002, no. 54 p. 383; HR 2 December 2005, NedJur 2006, no. 444 p. 4241).

47. VI.–5:101(4) largely corresponds to ESTONIAN LOA § 139(1); similarly, according to this provision, the extent of damages may be reduced if the damage was caused partly as a result of a risk for which the injured party is liable (Lahe. Juridica 2003, 83).

48. In a claim for damages is only diminished in cases of direct physical injury and injuries to health if the injured party acted intentionally or was grossly negligent; the injured party's strict liability which contributed to the cause of the accident does not therefore impinge upon his damages claim (Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 1(1); Traffic Damages Act § 12(1)). The legal solution is conversely unsettled where physical damage to property is at issue. Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 1(1) only stipulates contributory fault as a reason for reducing a liability claim ; the authors of the provision, however, had their sights set on enacting a general principle of tort law, pursuant to which the injured party would be required to rekon with a reduced damages claim in the event that s/he was strictly liable (Prop. 1975/76:15, 84). In the period following, the aforementioned principle has been embraced by a majority of legal commentators (Dufwa, SvJT 1979, 401; id., JT 1990-91, 456; Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 579; Bengtsson, Om jämkning av skadestånd, 111; Agell, FS Grönfors, 9-28; see also Dufwa, Flera skadeståndsskyldiga II, 4440; for a critical viewpoint, above all Hellner, JT 1991-92, 252) and by the courts (HD 11 April 1985, NJA 1985, 309 and HD 1 October 1990, NJA 1990, 569 [collison between a car and a bicycle; the cyclist was solely negligent; the claim of the driver of the car was nonetheless reduced by a half]; HD 10 November 1987, NJA 1987, 749 [collison between a car and a construction vehicle; only the latter was negligent; claim of the driver of the car was reduced by a quarter]; HD 14 October 1988, NJA 1988, 495 [a hound attacked a goat and was shot by their owner ; the owner of the dog claim was reduced by one third, owing to the fact that strict liability on his part contributed to the cause of the accident]). In the interim, the Traffic Damages Act § 18(2) has been amended and it now provided that damages may be reduced, if the inherent operational risk of the damaged vehicle contributed to the cause of the road traffic accident; therefore, an " automatic" reduction no longer takes place. Furthermore, the explanatory note to this amendment deliberately leaves undecided the issue as to whether the mirror principle can be regarded as a general tort law principle (NJA II 1999, 393, 395-396). At the time of writing, it is unclear whether it will continue in force (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 114; Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 52). In a number of special statutory provisions, the following approach has been adopted, namely, in the case involving a motor vehicle, where both parties are jointly responsible for the collison which " of itself" is usually subject to the rules of strict liability, is once again admitted to the ranks of the general tort liability regime (Traffic Damages Act §§ 10(2) and 12(2); Railway Traffic Act chap. 5 § 3(3); Maritime Code chap. 8 § 1 [with the addendum that if negligence of neither party can be ascertained, then each side must bear 50% of the entire damage] and Act concerning liability for damage in the course of aviation [1922:382] § 2(2)). If, the contributory fault of a third party for whom the injured party was liable contributed to cause the accident, then the question is raised whether in conjuncton with an aktiv, a passiv identifikation should also take place. In turn, under the general principles of tort law, this submission is generally refuted in the event that personal injury is at stake, whereas it is approved of, if physical damage to property eventuates (see in more detail Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 229; Bengtsson loc. cit. 157; Dufwa, Flera skadeståndsskyldiga, no. 4066; HD 26 February 1955, NJA 1955, 102 (Judge Walin); HD 24 May 1984, NJA 1984, 420).

49. In DENMARK a general mirror principle with regard to the injured party's strict liability was supported in the literature (Ussing, Erstatningsret, 191; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 329; cf. Trolle, Risiko og Skyld[2], 424). This principle has not, as yet, been approved by the courts (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 327). Where personal injury is sustained by passengers and drivers, it is submitted that a claim may only be reduced, where the accident could be also ascribed to the driver's negligence and the defendant was a non-motorist (prepatory works Betænkning no. 1036/1985, 47). Conversely, in the event that physical damage to property has occurred, the mirror principle remains applicable (Vinding Kruse loc. cit. 213), unless the damaging party acted in a grossly negligent manner (Eastern CA 2 February 1987, UfR 1987, 587: an intoxicated pedestrian ran onto the street) (if the damaging party was only gulity of ordinary negligence and the injured party is insured, then private individuals are not at all liable: Damages Liability Act § 19). If a dog's death is due to a collision between that dog and a car, then strict liability of the owner of the dog will operate to reduce his or her claim (HD 13 January 1961, UfR 1961, 170); in the case where two dogs attack each other causing mutual injury and causing damage, then, save where special circumstances exist to justify a departure from the rule, each keeper is required to bear half of the other party's loss (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 184; Eastern CA 18 December 1941, UfR 1942, 412). In the case of a collision between two motor vehicles, claims for personal injury are only reduced if intention and gross negligence were extant (Traffic Act § 103, § 101 (2)). If neither party is guilty of negligent conduct, then both parties share the costs of the damage (Vinding Kruse, loc. cit. 327). Cases where the values of the property and the risks involved are clearly dissonant (e.g. Eastern CA 17 June 1938, UfR 1938, 972: dog ran into the propeller of a plane which was just starting its engines), then the outcome can be corrected by having recourse to the Damages Liability Act § 24. Similarly, in FINLAND, a reduction in damages with reference to the injured party's strict liability is advocated (Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 110). It is possible to avail of this possibility in cases of personal injury and physical damage to property (Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 1; Saxén, Tillägg till Skadeståndsrätt, 407). Personal injury which derives from a road traffic accident, a reduction is not exclusively imposed in cases where the injured party acted with intent or was grossly negligent (Traffic Insurance Act § 7). Exceptional circumstances may generate a reduction of liability on equitable grounds (Damages Liability Act chap. 2 § 1 (2)).

VI.–5:103: Damage caused by a criminal to a collaborator

Legally relevant damage caused unintentionally in the course of committing a criminal offence to another person participating or otherwise collaborating in the offence does not give rise to a right to reparation if this would be contrary to public policy.

COMMENTS

Ex turpi causa non oritur actio. The maxim ex turpi causa non oritur actio is known to many, but not all, of Europe's legal systems. It is sometimes restricted to the law of unjustified enrichment but in some other systems is a well-established part of the law on non-contractual liability. This Article follows the latter model. The defence not only partially overlaps with the defences of contributory fault and acting at one's own risk, but also adds new dimensions to the question of whether a person has acted negligently at all. However, in none of these three systematic categories can the true character of this idea be unqualifiedly expressed, namely that an injured person may lose a claim to compensation through particularly dishonourable conduct.

> Illustration 1
> Two young men steal a car; A drives, B sits in the passenger seat. A negligently causes an accident, through which B is injured. B has no claim in damages against A. The reason for this under these model rules is not that A did not owe to B a duty of care, nor that B was guilty of contributory fault, nor that he acted at his own risk. The reason for the exclusion of liability is the participation of the injured person in the theft and the inevitable getaway.

> Illustration 2
> The position is the same where other things, apart from a car, are stolen, and as a consequence of drunkenness in the undertaking of the crime or the subsequent getaway, an accident occurs. The injured person sitting in the back seat has neither a claim against the driver nor a claim against the owner who was sitting in the front passenger's seat.

Illegality. A further argument in favour of the rule in this Article is that it would not be plausible if, as the case may be, an unjustified enrichment could not be retained due to illegality (see VII.–6:103) (Illegality)) but the claim in damages were to stand (see VI.–6:101 (Aims and forms of reparation) paragraph (4)).

Burden of proof. Technically speaking, what is involved is a defence because the person seeking to escape liability must prove that the rule's requirements are in fact met. Indeed, this is not entirely unproblematic, because public ends are also served by the maxim ex turpi causa non oritur actio; however, this is unavoidable in the law of civil procedure.

Damage must be caused unintentionally. It does not flow from the recognition of the maxim ex turpi causa non oritur actio that the injured person is stripped of all rights. It is not about denying an injured person all legal protection, but about avoiding the absurdity of a legal system developing standards of care for the conduct of criminals vis à vis each other. The provision therefore only excludes those rights to reparation which one participant in a crime unintentionally confers on another participant in the very same crime.

Collaborator. The Article covers only damage to a participant in a criminal act by a fellow participant. The term collaborator or collaboration has the same meaning as in VI.–4:102 (Collaboration).

Illustration 3
While fleeing the scene of the crime, a young delinquent is shot dead by an over-zealous security guard, whose job was merely to call the police in the event of the threat of theft. The victim's parents do not lose their claim by virtue of this Article.

Illustration 4
A thief steals from a narcotics dealer money which the dealer has earned from his illegal trade. The thief does not have a defence under this Article to the dealer's claim arising out of the infringement of his property rights in the money: the thief is not a collaborator in the dealer's unlawful activity.

Reparation must be contrary to public policy. Collaboration in a criminal act should not automatically defeat a right to damages against another participant. In view of the multi-faceted nature of everyday life, it seems to be preferable to once again subject the outcome to a test of justice and fairness. The Article incorporates such a control mechanism through the criterion that a right to damages is only to be excluded where awarding it would be contrary to public policy. Ultimately this decision depends on the circumstances of each individual case, particularly on whether the injured person is injured in a manner that is directly connected to the participation in the criminal act.

Illustration 5
A and B are involved in a brawl and are thus criminally punishable. In full knowledge of his physical superiority, the younger of the two, A, who was provoked by B, hits B so hard that he fractures his skull. Even where it can be inferred that A did not intentionally inflict this injury to B, VI.–5:103 does not stand in the way of B's claim.

NOTES

1. The legal orders of Europe are divided on the question on whether to recognise ex turpi causa- as a general defence under tort law. The majority of jurisdictions answer this question in the negative; however, this does not preclude the possibility of the legal policy behind it appearing in another dogmatical guise. This ground of defence is not recognised in FRANCE (Cass.civ. 22 June 2004, D. 2005, 189, note Denis Mazeaud; Roland and Boyer, Adages du droit français[4], 487), ITALY, ROMANIA, GERMANY, GREECE, the NETHERLANDS nor SPAIN (CA Las Palmas 1 March 2002, BDA JUR 2002/126749 and CA Jaén 1 September 2003, BDA JUR 2003/242232 does indeed mention the principle of ex delicto or iniuria ius non oritur, however, derived no concrete legal consequence therefrom). HUNGARIAN BH 1980/471 imputed contributory fault to an intoxicated victim who suffered injury as a passenger in a car accident on the grounds that she stole the car together with similarly intoxicated driver. In AUSTRIA, it can even transpire that an injured party who contributes to cause the commission of a criminal offence will be denied a remedy on the basis of contributory fault (OGH 19 May 1994, ZVR 1995/41 p. 108 [illustration 1 above]). Other legal orders make available the general prohibition on abuse of legal procees (PORTUGUESE CC art. 334; POLISH CC art. 5) or a general rule permitting the reduction of liability on equitable grounds (e.g. CZECH and SLOVAK CC § 450).

These provisions are also valid for tort law. MALTESE CC art. 1051A(5) contains a special rule which governs cases of corruption. For SWEDEN see illustration 4 above.

2. In contrast, the ex turpi causa defence is recognised in LATVIA (CC art. 1642) and in the COMMON Law jurisdictions.

Section 2: Interests of accountable persons or third parties

VI.–5:201: Authority conferred by law

A person has a defence if legally relevant damage is caused with authority conferred by law.

COMMENTS

General. A person who is exercising an authority conferred by law and who remains within the bounds of this authority does not incur non-contractual liability, even where the conduct harms another. The present Article formulates this universally accepted principle as a defence. This is because the person seeking to found on the rule has the burden of proving the factual prerequisites for its application.

Applicable to private persons only. The Article relates only to private persons and not to public bodies or other persons, such as police officers, exercising public law authority. That follows from I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2) as well as from VI.–7:103 (Public law functions and court proceedings). Liabilities arising out of the performance of public law functions are altogether excluded from these model rules.

Relation to other defences. The defence provided by the Article is a residual defence, which helps to slot this Chapter neatly into the overall legal order. It refers to the authority which the law grants to the injuring person in a different, separate arena (i.e. outside this Book). While it could indeed be argued that further defences in this Book confer legal authority to harm another, there is still the systematic consideration that these defences are not at issue here or – and this boils down to the same result – take priority over this Article as leges speciales. The defences in VI.–5:202 (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity) are prominent members of this group. Furthermore, the present Article is focussed on, and more heavily justified by, the injuring person's standpoint rather than the victim's predicament.

Scope. The Article covers a wide range of situations. It covers such disparate cases as the lawful arrest of a criminal by private individuals pending the arrival of the police, damage to the environment based on special statutory or regulatory permission, the authority to report the suspicion of criminal activity to the police, the authority to enter another's land while hunting, the authority to take water from a river, and even the relatively "harmless" case of rules governing rights of neighbours, whereby proprietors may cut back vegetation protruding on to their land from the adjacent property.

> Illustration
> A woman harassed by a sex offender follows him in her car. She cuts across his getaway car with her own car in order to stop him and to allow him to be arrested by the police, whom she herself has notified. The woman is not liable for the damage to the getaway car on the basis of intention nor on in her capacity as keeper of the car causing the accident.

Authority. "Authority" within the meaning of this Article is held only by those authorised by law to interfere with the rights of others or to inflict damage on them in another manner. Therefore, it is particularly pertinent in the law governing liability for environmental impairment that there is exact examination into whether merely permission to carry out certain operations is concerned, which leaves the rights of third parties unaffected or takes from them only certain specific legal remedies (e.g. the right to demand that the operations be restrained, leaving the right to damages unaffected), or indeed whether the content of the permission is really the right to harm others or the environment without any consequences in terms of liability. It is comparatively rare for this type of permission to be given.

Conferred by law. The Article relates only to authority conferred "by law". Thus, it does not apply to authority which has its basis in a contract or in the agreement of the affected party (in cases of a benevolent intervention attributable to an alleged agreement on the part of the affected person, the categorisation is naturally more difficult, but precisely because of this, these situations are also specifically regulated). Rather the Article is concerned with authority which results directly from the law as such. Conferred "by law" does, of course, not necessarily mean "conferred by statute". It suffices that a legal norm allows the intervention in the form which occurred. The same applies to authority conferred on a person by an individual decision of a governmental body, which is based on a legal norm.

Limits. While the Article provides a defence against all forms of liability (thus, also against liability under Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence)), it does not allow an abuse of rights. It was not necessary to individually express this in the text of the model rule because it is an inherent component of the term "authority conferred by law": no legal system confers authority to act in abuse of the law.

NOTES

1. Ordre de la loi and commandement de l´autorité légale rank among the grounds of defence (faits justificatifs) explicitly regulated under FRENCH criminal law (CP art. 122-4). The aforementioned are also valid within the rubric of tort law (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2004/2005], no. 1969); whatever the law decrees or authorises, establishes a cause d´irresponsabilité (Malaurie/Aynès/Stoffel-Munck, Les obligations, no. 120 p. 51). To take an actual decision as an example, where a man sexually harrassed a woman and thereafter, in her endeavours to apprehend him, she succeeded in injurying him, such damage is embraced by this defence (C.proc.pén. art. 73; Cass.civ. 10 June 1970, D. 1970 jur. 691). However, it should be noted that legal authority does release one from the obligation to exercise the legal authority conferred with due care when dealing with the legal interests of other persons (le Tourneau loc. cit. no. 1970). The aforegoing analysis also represents the current legal position in BELGIUM (Tilleman and Claeys [-Claeys], Buitencontractuele aansprakelijkheid, p. 1, 38-39 nos. 61-63).
2. Similarly, pursuant to SPANISH Law, a ground of justification may exist in respect of the infliction of damage on another if it is exercised in furtherance of a subjective right and the relevant legal boundaries are respected (qui suo iure utitur næminem lædit: Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 115; Díez-Picazo, Derecho de daños, 303). The prohibition of abuse of legal right (CC art. 7; TS 14 February 1944, RAJ 1944 no. 293 p. 160; TS 25 November 1960, RAJ 1960 no. 3766 p. 2431; TS 10 June 1963, RAJ 1963 (2) no. 3596 p. 2298; TS 12 February 1964, RAJ 1964 (1) no. 688 p. 418; TS 5 January 1977, RAJ 1977 (1) no. 6 p. 13; TS 14 February 1986, RAJ 1986 (1) no. 674 p. 651) is an example of the limits to the extent of the exercise of this right. To illustrate, an abuse of right can arise, where a person brings a suit against another, although s/he is positively aware that his or her claim was unfounded (De Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 264; Yzquierdo Tolsada loc. cit. 118). In such a case, there is absence of any iusta causa litigandi with the einer Schadenersatzpflicht des Klägers (TS 4 April 1932, RAJ 1932-33 (1) no. 991 p. 430; TS 20 April 1933, RAJ 1932-33 (1) no. 1633 p. 668; TS 5 January 1977 loc. cit.; TS 15 December 1992, RAJ 1992 (5) no. 10496 p. 13708; TS 4 December 1996, RAJ 1996 (5) no. 8810 p. 12171; TS 20 May 1998, RAJ 1998 (2) no. 3379 p. 4915). An authority conferred by law to cause damage is found in an array of statutory provisions. Statutory provisions which are particularly noteworthy in this regard include: the Civil Protection of Honour, Personal and Family Privacy and One´s Own Image (Ley Orgánica 1/1982, of 5 May, de protección civil del derecho al honor, a la intimidad personal y familiar y a la propia imagen) art. 2(2) in conjunction with CC art. 184 (pertaining to the authority to publish a missing person's photo; see Medrano, El derecho fundamental a la propia imagen, 164); Catalan CC art. 546-14 (which governs immissions legítimes, "permitted emissions"); Copyright Act (Texto Refundido de la Ley de Propiedad Intelectual of 1996) arts. 31(2), 31*bis*(2) and 32 permission to make photocopies of copyrighted material for private use or for the benefit of disabled persons ; permission to cite for scientific purposes).

3. The legal ground of justification namely conferring authority to commit an offence if it is in pursuance of the exercise of a right, codified in ITALIAN CP art. 51 is also applicable in the following manner within the context of the civil law, namely, that having evaluated all the relevant circumstances, the damage is regarded as having been inflicted secundum ius (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, sub. art. 2043, p. 192; Cass. 16 October 2001, no. 12617, Danno e resp. 2002, 321). A number of statutes already provide for atto lecito dannoso e.g in cases of CC arts. 843, 924 and 925. It goes without saying that the legal justification of exercise of a right is of special significance for public authorities (e.g. Cass. 16 May 1996, no. 4561, Danno e resp. 1997, 119), but may also benefit private citizens who act in the public interest (reporting a crime: CFI Naples 11 December 1997, Dir.fam.pers. 2000, 1096; Cass. 13 January 2005, no. 560, Giur.it.Mass. 2005, fasc. 1). Furthermore, it plays a particularly significant role within environmental liability law (Cass.sez.un. 18 November 1992, no. 12316, Giur.it.Mass. 1992, fasc. 11) and in the context of hunting (Cass. 28 July 2004, no. 14241, Giur.it.Mass. 2004, fasc. 7-8).

4. HUNGARY also recognises the legal ground of justification contained in VI.–5:201; it is irrelevant that this defence is not expressly mentioned in the Civil Code. According to Hungarian law damage is unlawful unless permitted by law (cf. Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 49). Damage, which results from an exercise of a right in accordance with the terms of the law is also permissible. This category includes e.g. the exercise of rights of use and exercise of rights vis á vis neighbours (Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 53; Ujváriné loc. cit. 58). According to CC § 100 a landowner is obliged to refrain from doing anything which would disturb his neighbours unnecessarily or jeopardise the exercise of their rights (see further BH 2006/184, EBH 2001/408, and BH 1993/161). If a right is not exercised according to law, then it amounts to an abusive exercise of that right (CC §§ 2(2) und 5). Similarly, under SLOVENIAN and under ROMANIAN law, a person will not incur liability, if that person is entitled to encroach on the legal interests of another pursuant to a licence from the relevant authority (Cigoj, Teorija obligacij, splošni del, 179; CSJ 17 July 2001, secţia comercială, decision no. 4718).

5. Similarly, under BULGARIAN law, no liability is generally imposed on a person pursuing a "legally regulated activity". The justification that the damage was authorised by law may be invoked, for example, by individuals who detain a suspected criminal until the arrival of the authorities and use force to combat resistance (CP art.

12a). The duty to compensate is also countermanded if the cause of the damage is due to honest and legal advertising practices of a competitor (Takoff, Obzor na deliktnoto pravo na Bulgaria, 23). An important departure from the abovementioned principle (no liability) arises under the Agricultual Enterprises' Protection Act art. 30(1): There is a duty to compensate the landowner for damage to agricultural enterprises caused by air, soil or water pollution, even if the polluter adhered to the relevant legal standards; however, there may be a reduction in the quantum of damages awarded, given that the injuring party acted according to the governing regulations.

6. Similarly, under GERMAN law, there is a whole array of provisions in existence which authorise an individual to encroach in the rights or legal interests of another. Provided that the person thus entitled confines himself or herself to acting with the parameters of the authorisation thus conferred, then according to German law, his conduct is justified and s/he does not have to fear that tort law consequences will ensue. CC § 229 (Self -help), CC §§ 859 and 860 (Self-help by the possessor) as well as CC § 910 (Right of self-help by the owner) serve as illustrations of the foregoing. CP § 193 (Safeguarding legitimate legal interests in the context of torts involving expression or criticism is also of considerable importance for the realm of tort law, see further Erman [-Schiemann], BGB II[11], § 823, no. 148). CCrimProc § 127(1) confers a right on every citizen to provisionally arrest a person who is caught in the act or being pursued, even without a judicial order, if there are grounds for suspecting that this person might take flight or if his or her identity cannot be immediately established. A parental right to physically chastise their children is no longer in force (CC § 1631(2)). In contrast, it is not impermissible for a person who acts in good faith during court or other official proceedings to introduce or pursue untrue claims, if s/he does not knowlingly or carelessly do so even if those claims turn out to be unjustified, and this results in prejudice to the other party extending beyond the immediate proceedings (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 823, no. 37).

7. In AUSTRIA, the defence of self- help is understood to mean an exceptional legal (not: contractual) right which is permitted to be exercised in order to secure or bring about a situation that is in line with the law (CC §§ 19, 344 und 422). A prerequisite for the successful invocation of the defence is that assistance from authorities could not obtained in time and that the parameters of the defence were not exceeded, those same parameter also apply to self- defence. However, self-help can be invoked in respect of interests which are excluded from the scope of self-defence, provided that the concrete act manifests itself as lawful following an assessment of all of the interests involved (OGH 11 July 1989, SZ 62/132 p. 22). Private citizens are permitted to pursue criminals offenders where assistance from the authorites would come too late provided that the frontiers of the defence must not be traversed (OGH 19 September 1996, SZ 69/214 p. 426; OGH 9 October 1991, SZ 64/137 p. 230).

8. Similarly, under Greek law, where the plaintiff is entitled to redress the harm himself amounts to a ground of justification which excludes the imposition of liability (Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2], 818; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 507). A requisite of CC art. 282 is that an actionable entitlement under private law is put at risk and assistence from the authorities in enforcing this entitlement could not be obtained in time (Karakostas, AstK, art. 282, no. 1811; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Tabakis], art. 282, no. 7). The measures taken for the purposes of exercising self-help must not exceed that permitted to defend oneself against the impending harm (CC art. 283). Special cases where self –help is lawful are regulated in CC arts. 985, 986 (Protection of posssession) and in CC arts. 1008, 1079 (Rights vis á vis neighbours; bees in flight); the defence of self-help under criminal law, anchored in CP art. 367 can also be of relevance in a civil law context (Kornilakis loc. cit.).

9. The regular exercise of a right also constitutes a ground of justification in PORTUGAL and operates to exculpate the putative tortfeasor from liability, see Const. art. 271(2) and (3) and CP art. 31(2)(b). Examples found in academic teaching include entry onto land without a licence in pursuance of an entitlement to hunt or where the owner of land located on higher ground extracts water, thereby causing prejudice to the owner of the property located below (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 552). Regard must also be had to CC art. 335 and the doctrine of abuse of a right (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 568; STJ 15 May 2003).

10. DUTCH CP art. 42 provides that an act is not punishable under the criminal law, where that act is carried out in furtherance of a statutory obligation or pursuant to legal authority. The aforegoing is also a valid ground of justification under the private law (For examples, see Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 63 p. 77, Onrechtmatige daad I [-Jansen], art. 6:162 lid 2 no. 152.1 p. 1661). It may be indeed be difficult to distinguish between the two alternatives contained in an actual case, however the result does not depend on a clear cut distinction being made. For example, statutory provisions pertaining to getting into the correct traffic lane are regarding as constituting a duty as well as conferring statutory authority (HR 8 November 1957, NedJur 1958, no. 1 p. 5). A person who abides by an administrative order (ambtelijk bevel) acts in futherance of a statutory obligation (Jansen loc. cit. no. 152.2 p. 1662). A prerequisite for the successful assertion of the claim that on acted pursuant to statutory duty or administrative order depends naturally on the validity of the relevant statute invoked to underpin that claim (HR 22 March 1946, NedJur 1946, no. 206 p. 289-292; HR 20 April 1990, NedJur 1991, no. 53 p. 214); in addition, the act carried out, in its exact manifestation, must fall within the scope of the statute.

11. ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(2) corresponds with VI.–5:201. The causation of damage is not unlawful if the authority to cause such damage arises from law.

12. In the NORDIC countries it has been been held that a "legal" exercise of a right can a fortiori not be deemed wrongful (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 50). The classical defences are consent (and acting at own risk), self-defence, state of emergency (Notstand), and official duty. There may be, however, further defences (see e.g. Swedish HD 20 October 1915, NJA 1915, 511 [no liability of a man violently removing a person disturbing a church service]; HD 21 December 1960, NJA 1960, 670 [no liability of a concert pianist practicing in his apartment, disturbing other tenants]; HD 1 March 1990, NJA 1990, 71 [no liability because the defendant had a right to trim the hedge]). A particular explicit authority conferred by Swedish Consitution chap. 2 § 18(3) and Finnish CP chap. 28 § 14 is the right to enjoy nature, to a certain extent even on another private person's property (see Swedish HD 27 September 1996, NJA 1996, 495). No authority conferred by law allows for chicanery; chicanery is a tort in itself (see e.g. Finnish Act concerning the respective interest of neighbors [lag angående vissa grannelagsförhållande of 13 February 1920] § 13; Hakulinen, Obligationsrätt, 259; Karlgren, Skadeståndsrätt[5], 86; Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 71, 128; Kleineman, Ren förmögenhetsskada, 245; Ussing, Erstatningsret, 62).

The illustration is taken from Cass.civ. 10 June 1970, D. 1970 jur. 691.

VI.–5:202: Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity

(1) A person has a defence if that person causes legally relevant damage in reasonable protection of a right or of an interest worthy of legal protection of that person or a third person if the person suffering the legally relevant damage is accountable for endangering the right or interest protected. For the purposes of this paragraph VI.–3:103 (Persons under eighteen) is to be disregarded.

(2) The same applies to legally relevant damage caused by a benevolent intervener to a principal without breach of the intervener's duties.

(3) Where a person causes legally relevant damage to the patrimony of another in a situation of imminent danger to life, body, health or liberty in order to save the person causing the damage or a third person from that danger and the danger could not be eliminated without causing the damage, the person causing the damage is not liable to make reparation beyond providing reasonable recompense.

COMMENTS

A. Three grounds of defence

Overview. This Article gives effect to two "classic" grounds of defence, namely self-defence (paragraph (1)) and necessity (paragraph (3)), and, in paragraph (2), to the ground of defence based on justified benevolent intervention in another's affairs. The second sentence of paragraph (1) contains a clarification in regard to self-defence against children. Paragraphs (1) and (2) lead to a complete defence. Paragraph (3) has as its main consequence a reduction of liability to what is under the circumstances a reasonable recompense.

B. Self-defence (paragraph (1))

Protecting personal rights and interests and those of another. The law must not yield to injustice. Therefore, every Member State's legal system recognises the right to self-defence. Precisely speaking, it is broken up into two characteristics: self-defence in the strict sense and the defence of others, namely protecting the rights and interests of another against danger from a third party. In contrast, self-defence against self-defence is not possible: such a protective measure would not be reasonable (as is required by paragraph (1) of the Article).

> Illustration 1
> A is attacked by B with a blunt object. A defends herself by attempting to destroy the weapon. B in turn defends his property. The latter is without good reason and may therefore be overcome by A by force, as long as B's attack continues.

Endangerment. The defence of self-defence requires, first, the actual endangerment of a right or legally protected interest (see VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage)). An endangerment can lie in a person, a thing or an animal. Paragraph (1) is not limited to attacks by people.

> Illustration 2
> A is attacked by a dog whose keeper and owner is B. A is only able to defend himself by striking the dog with a slat which he tears from a wooden fence belonging to C. In relation to B, A acts in self-defence; the situation would only be different if B was the owner, but not the keeper of the dog (in which case paragraph (3) would apply in relation to B). In relation to C, it is paragraph (3) which applies. A is not liable to C under the general rules on non-contractual liability in this Book, but he is liable nonetheless to make reasonable compensation. On the other hand, C cannot defend himself against the intervention by A in accordance with paragraph (1). That is because A is not responsible under this Book for the property damage, nor would he be responsible for it if C had tried but failed to hinder it by force. B in turn is unequivocally liable for the damage to the fence under VI.–3:203 (Accountability for damage caused by animals) in conjunction with VI.–4:101 (General rule [on causation]); a break in the chain of causation by A's conduct is to be denied.

Reasonable protection. A person who relies on this defence must also demonstrate, and if necessary prove, that the acts were done with defensive intent. Moreover the person must have opted for a means of defence that was reasonable under the circumstances. That will be so only where the means chosen were apt and necessary to fulfil the intended aim. Furthermore, the act of self-defence must not have been out of all proportion to the interest under threat – even if there was no other possibility of defence.

Illustration 3:
The owner of a cherry tree may not shoot at children who are stealing cherries and refuse to budge despite the owner's protests – even if the owner is confined to a wheelchair and has no other means to defend the property.

Self-defence against children. The second sentence of paragraph (1) clarifies that self-defence may as a matter of principle be exercised against children (provided that the act of self-defence is reasonable). A corresponding rule in relation to the mentally disabled is not necessary because, in principle, mental incapacity in the context of a ground for liability is not afforded any consideration. It only comes into focus as an independent defence (see VI.–5:301 (Mental incompetence)); self-defence is therefore also possible against attacks from mentally disabled or intoxicated perpetrators.

Putative self-defence and excessive self-defence. Paragraph (1) does not come into operation where a person misreads the situation and wrongly believes there is an attack (so-called putative self-defence), nor where there is indeed an attack but the person resorts to an unreasonable method of defence (so-called excessive self-defence). In both situations, the issue of liability is decided solely under VI.–3:102 (Negligence). Where the mistake was avoidable, negligence is present; where it was unavoidable, liability is absent.

Illustration 4
A strikes B, who has acted threateningly towards him and claims to have a weapon in his bag with A in mind. Since B is in truth not carrying any weapon in his bag, A is not acting in self-defence; however, he is not liable because he did not negligently infer an instance requiring self-defence.

Illustration 5
An employee of a security firm is attacked by an intruder, who threatens to kill him. A fight ensues, during the course of which the security guard shoots at the intruder and in an ironic turn of events ends up actually killing him. Under the circumstances, a non-fatal shot to the leg would have sufficed to defend himself. The widow has no claim where the security guard cannot be blamed for being negligent for over-reacting in a life-threatening situation.

C. Benevolent intervention in another's affairs (paragraph (2))

Benevolent intervention as a defence within the framework of the law on non-contractual liability. Interfering in the affairs of another under the prerequisites of V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) and V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty) is quite allowed and indeed desired. Where the principal is harmed thereby, the intervener is equipped with a defence in the context of the rules in this Book, see the Comments under V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) and illustration 3 there. Expressing that is the aim of paragraph (2) of the present Article.

Without breach of the intervener's duties. However, benevolent intervention is only a ground of defence if the intervention is carried out with all care due in the circumstances. Where the intervener breaches a duty of care vis à vis the principal's rights and interests, the intervener remains liable under the conditions set out in V.–2:103 (Reparation for damage caused by breach of duty).

D. Necessity (paragraph (3))

Situations covered. Paragraph (3) closes a gap in the law governing self-defence. It deals with situations in which a defence against a direct threat to life, body or freedom is possible only by making use of another person's property. Given the serious discrepancy between the legally protected interests in play here, the owner of the property must endure this interference and cannot block the original self-defensive action by in turn defending the property against it. A person who uses the property of another in legitimate self-defence does not commit a legal wrong. However, in so far as the owner is not responsible for the danger arising and can regard it as "none of his business", the owner has a right to reasonable recompense. Thus, paragraph (3) follows the maxim "endure, then claim". This "imperative endurance" is a part of the law on non-contractual liability for damage, the granting of a right to reasonable recompense is strictu sensu not. In actual fact, of course both parts of the rule are inextricably entangled; they are dependent on each other.

Precedence of the interest defended over the legally protected interest. Paragraph (3) covers only situations where there is a clear legal discrepancy between the values of the conflicting interests. This is a question not of economic comparison but of weighing-up moral values. The rule assumes that, in the situations mentioned, property rights, possessions and money cede to life, body and freedom. For conflict situations within both groups, a general defence cannot be formulated. Such situations have to be solved by reference to the general rules on liability for intention or negligence. In some cases recourse to VI.–6:202 (Reduction of liability) may be possible.

> Illustration 6
> The victim of a kidnapping is locked inside a stolen car or is detained in the rooms of a bank by the kidnappers, with a view to extracting a ransom. The kidnapped person may damage the car or the windows in the bank in order to flee. The same applies where a third party rescues the victim.

> Lady A is out and about in an expensive designer dress; Lady B is wearing jeans and a T-shirt. The difference in value of the clothes does not give Lady A the right to wrench Lady B's umbrella from her, after it has suddenly begun to rain.

Imminent danger. The special authority to interfere with the property of another arises only in cases of imminent danger to the life, body or freedom of the person in danger. Only dangers for which one cannot reasonably prepare and with which one cannot reckon are meant here. If it were otherwise, it would be possible to tackle the dangers without inflicting the damage.

Illustration 8
Where homeless people have not arranged a place to stay for the cold winter months in a timely fashion, paragraph (3) does not give them the right to break into houses, even where they are empty.

Liability. Under the law on non-contractual liability for damage, liability falls naturally on the negligent or intentional causer of the dangerous situation or the person who must account for the source of danger according to objective criteria. However, there will not always be such a person principally responsible (e.g. if the dangerous situation is attributable to natural events) and even where there is, the question remains as to who should bear the risk that that person will be unable to pay the damages or will be unidentifiable. Paragraph (3) decides this issue in favour of the owner and to the detriment of the person who resorted to self-defence: the latter must bear the risk of not being able to recover damages from the principally responsible person, because the person resorting to self-defence, and not the owner, was the pro-active party.

Reasonable compensation. Equally, there often remains the delicate task of coming up with a solution to compensate for the damage which adequately serves the interests of the two parties. On the one hand, paragraph (3) provides for strict liability of a person acting in an emergency situation requiring self-defence, but then limits this liability, depending on its extent, to a reasonable compensation. The rule gives a certain amount of discretion to the court as regards the evaluation. It is not necessary to compensate the full damage; in fact a balance of values is more appropriate. The amount payable turns upon the time and market value of the damaged thing; in contrast, general damages are not recoverable, i.e. compensation for lost profit and losses of a non-pecuniary nature.

NOTES

I. Self-defence

1. The specifics of légitime défense are regulated in FRENCH CP arts. 122-5 and 122-6; these provisions, with appropriate adaptations being undertaken, also apply in the sphere of private law (Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], no. 563 p. 503). Self defence can only be legitimately exercised if there was aggression directed towards the involved party which rendered it necessary to act with immediate effect. A prerequiste for the success of the defence is the existence of a real danger to the person himself, or another person or to their legally protected goods. Self- defence is only permitted to obvert an unlawful attack and a further precondition is that the act of self-defence must be proportionate in the circumstances (Viney and Jourdain loc. cit. nos 563-1 – 564-1 pp. 503-506). The successful invocation defence of légitime défense also precludes liability even where an objective liability, which arises independent of fault is present on the side of the actor (Cass.civ. 22 April 1992, Bull.civ. 1992, II, no. 127 p. 62). The foregoing analysis corresponds to the legal position in BELGIUM. However, in this jurisdiction, it is stressed that lawful self-defence can only constitute a fait justificatif, if the reaction which caused injury was not disproportional in the circumstances, namely the question which is asked is whether un homme normalement prudent et raisonnable would have reacted in the same manner in the circumstances of the case (Cornelis, Responsabilité extra-contractuelle, no. 20 p. 34).

2. Although the SPANISH Código Civil expressly mentions neither self-defence (legítima defensa) nor the defence of necessity (estado de necesidad), there is universal agreement that self-defence constitutes a ground of justification operating to preclude the imposition of liability (de Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 284; Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 113; Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 554; Santos Briz, La responsabilidad civil I[7], 36). It is expressly envisaged for civil liability which has its roots in the commission of a criminal offence únder CP art. 118 in conjunction with art. 20(4). The following prerequisites are listed therein, namely, (i) an unlawful attack (ii) necessary act of self-defence using proportionate force and (iii) an lack of serious provocation on the part of the person exercing self-defence. An acquittal under the criminal law does not bind the civil law courts; if, the civil courts determine that the person who exercised self-defence was negligent, then the courts are permitted to require him or her to pay damages even after the wrongdoer has been acquitted pursuant to the criminal law (TS 28 June 1996, RAJ 1996 [3] no. 4905 p. 6421; however, in casu liability was refuted).

3. ITALIAN CC art. 2044 provides that a person is not liable, "for causing damage in self- defense or in defense of others". CC art. 2044 is augmented by CP art. 52. According to this provision, a person will not be punished for conduct, which was necessited in order to defend his own rights or the rights of another against an imminent danger of an unlawful attack, provided that means of self –defence employed was proportionate to the attack, see further Alpa/Cuffaro/Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 2044, II, no. 6; Cass. 24 February 2000, no. 2091, Danno e resp. 2000, 877). This provision was modified by Legge 13 February 2006, no. 59 modifica all'articolo 52 del codice penale in materia di diritto all'autotutela in un privato domicilio (Gazz.Uff. 2 March 2006 no. 51) which added two further articles to CP art. 52, providing that in certain defined constellations, the proportionality of the act of self-defence is presumed. Legittima difesa excludes the ingiustizia of the damage (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, sub. art. 2044, p. 289). It is also possible to exercise self-defence against a person not endowed with legal capacity as well as in respect of things and animals, for which the other party is strict liable. It is said that the reaction of the person attacked must be necessitated, unavoidable and proportional (Franzoni loc. cit. 291; Alpa/Cuffaro/Mariconda loc. cit. sub art. 2044, III, nos 16-17). If the person attacked intentionally created the risk, then, that person cannot invoke a legittima difesa. In cases of putative self-defence, the person attacked may not be regarded as having committed a fault. In such cases, according to prevailing legal opinion, the damage is apportioned along equitable lines between the parties concerned, either, by applying CC art. 1227(1) with appropriate adaptations (provision on contributory negligence, see Franzoni loc. cit. 294) or CC art. 2045 (provision on necessity, see Cass. 6 April 1995, no. 4029, NGCC 1995, I, 1137 and Cass. 12 August 1991, no. 8772, Giur.it. 1992, I, 1, 734).

4. According to HUNGARIAN CC § 343 damage, which is caused to an aggressor in order to avert an unlawful attack or threat suggesting that an imminent unlawful attack would be carried out, need not be compensated, provided that the person acting in self-defence did not adopt excessive measures to stave off the attack. Self-defence operates to negate the unlawfulness of the damage inflicted (Petrik [-Harmathy], Polgári jog II[2], 580f; Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 50f). Excessive self–defence or putative self-defence remains unlawful (Marton, A polgári jogi felelősség, 138); its presence or absence is judged according to CC § 339(1) (BH 2001/574). Whereas exceeding the parameters of self- defence need not result in liability under criminal law, the imposition of liability under civil law in such circumstances lies in the discretion of the court (Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 38; Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1238; BH 1980/128). However, the contributory negligence of the injured party usually leads to a reduction in liability in cases of this type (Marton loc. cit.). It is also permitted to exercise self-defence vis á vis individuals who are deemed not to be responsible for their actions under the civil law. If a person exerting self-defence injures somebody other than the aggressor, it is not quite clear whether the former only has a claim against the aggressor or whether, by applying CC § 107 (Necessity) with appropriate adaptations, s/he can also claim against the person who exercised self-defence (see further Petrik loc. cit. 39).

5. The conceptual understanding of self-defence under BULGARIAN LOA art. 46(1) is that it connotes a ground of justification, thereby precluding the imposition of liability. A precondition for the valid invocation of this defence is that the actor does not exceed the measures deemed sufficient to repel the attack (Plenum of the Supreme Court, ordinance no. 12 of 29 November 1973, case no. 11/1973 in criminal matters). In the event that the self-defence exerted is excessive, then even where the actor was influenced by fear or fright and is, therefore, immune for criminal liability, civil liability will be incurred (Supreme Court loc. cit.). POLISH CC art. 423 provides: "Whoever acts in necessary defence by repelling a direct and unlawful attempt against any interest of his own or another person shall not be liable for the damage caused to the assailant". The foregoing also corresponds to ROMANIAN CP art. 44(2), which is also relevant in the civil law context. Excessive self-defence does not serve as a ground of justification, however, it can operate to release the actor from liability on the grounds that the actor was not guilty of negligence (Adam, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligațiilor, 285). According to SLOVENIAN LOA art. 138(1), a person who acts in self-defence, is not liable for damage caused to the agressor, unless the limits of the defence were negligently exceeded. The elements of this defence are derived from CP art. 11(2) which is also pertinent in the civil law context. There must be an unlawful and imminent attack; in addition, the means taken to avert the attack must be proportionate to the attack itself (Juhart and Plavšak [-Pensa], Obligacijski zakonik I, art. 138 p. 809). A person who uses bodily force in response to a verbal attack does not act in self-defence (VSS II Ips 718/94).

6. Similarly, under GERMAN CC § 227(1), an act prompted by the need to defend oneself is not unlawful. Self-defence denotes a defence which is required to ward off an unlawful imminent attack oneself or another (CC § 227(2); see further CP § 32). It is said that the law is not required to yield to an unlawful action (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[66], § 227, no. 1). The notion of "attack" connotes solely an attack coming from a person (not: that emanating from an animal or thing) where there is an imminent threat of attack to a legally protected interest; it does not depend to any extent on the fault of the aggressor. The attack must be unlawful and imminient: this requirement is not fulfilled if the act is completed The act of self-defence must be accompanied by a subjective element, namely the requisite intent to defend oneself. The actor is required to employ the least dangerous means or the means calculated to cause the less damage when warding off the attack; however, the law does not require that the person exercising self defence risks that the act of self defence would prove ineffectual to repel the attack (BGH 23 September 1975, NJW 1976, 41, 42; BGH 5 October 1990, NJW 1991, 503, 504). The prohibition on abusing one's rights which derives from CC § 242 may entail that an act of self defence cannot be exercised against children or those suffering from a mental disability or that the act of self defence must be employed in a suitably restrictive manner. If there is a glaring disparity between the defence of the legal interest and the damaged legal interest, then in a similar fashion, an abuse of right may be given (BGH 23 September 1975 loc. cit.). There is no right to self-defence, if the person attacked provoked the situation where s/he found himself or herself having to act in self-defence (BGH 7 June 1983, NJW 1983, 2267; see also BGH 14 June 1972, NJW 1972, 1821, 1822; BGH 15 May 1975, NJW 1975, 1423, 1424). Cases of excessive self-defence and putative self-defence hinge upon whether the actor was negligent (BGH 23 September 1975 loc. cit.).

7. According to AUSTRIAN CC § 19, an act is not unlawful, if the offendor acted in self defence. According to CP § 3 self-defence is given, if a person avails of an act of self-defence which is necessary to repel a real attack or an imminently threatened unlawful attack on one's life, health, bodily intergrity, liberty or property or that or another. This definition is also applicable in the private law context (OGH 29 June 1989, JBl 1990, 104). An act of putative self-defence only eliminates the obligation to compensate if the injured party conduted himself in such a manner which engendered on the part of the person exercising self-defence a belief that s/he was about to be attacked and therefore reacted accordingly. Negligently misjudging the situation has no impact on the existence of liability (OGH 19 January 1972, EvBl 1972/219, 433). The same rules apply when excessive self-defence is exercise (OGH 17 September 1964, SZ 37/121 p. 348).

8. Similarly, pursuant to GREEK CC art. 284, an act of self-defence negates unlawfulness; the concept of self-defence is identical under the criminal and civil law (Karakostas, AstK, art. 284, no. 1823; ErmAK [-Gafos], art. 284, no. 3; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Tabakis], art. 284, no. 1). The same notion as that existing under German law is employed. In Greece, the successful invocation of self defence also hinges on the existence of an attack which originates from a person; a threat of attack by an animal will not connote an attack for the purposes of this provision (Karakostas loc. cit. no. 1827; Tabakis loc. cit. no. 7). The prohibition on abuse of rights (CC art. 281) is also relevant for self-defence. For example, a person can be guilty of an abuse of rights where a trenchant act of self-defence is employed to stave off an attack to property of minor value, and this attack emanates from a minor or from a person who is deemed not to be responsible for his or her actions under tort law (Karakostas loc. cit. no. 1834).

9. According to PORTUGUESE CC art. 337(1), an act of self-defence which is employed to avert a present (see further STJ 6 January 1993, BolMinJus 423 (1993) 342) and unlawful attack serves as a ground of justification, if it was not possible to parry the attack by utilising "normal means" and further, if "the loss occasioned by the act of self-defence is not manifestly higher than that that would have been caused by the attack". According to CC art. 337(2), excessive self-defence which resuls from "confusion or fear on the part of the actor which was not negligent in the circumstances" is also justified. The ground of justification of excessive self-defence is not given, where a person, in response to verbal provocation, used an axe to hit the offender on the head (STJ 4 January 2006; see, also, 2 July 2003). Conversely, self-defence has been successfuly invoked in a case, where a man, in order to defend his right of way, threatened to physicaly harm the person who was about to set out to destroy the right of way (CA Porto 14 June 2006). There is no requirement that the aggressor be at fault (Pessoa Jorge, Ensaio sobre os pressupostos da responsabilidade civil, 234). If putative self-defence is employed, then the person employing such force, comes under a duty to compensate, "if the mistake cannot be excused", CC art. 338. For example, a person is excused, if that person knocks down a putative attacker because the latter ostensibly threatened him with a weapon concealed under his coat (STJ 1 February 1996). The President of a Public Limited Company does not act in self –defence, if, in response to third party statements endangering the company's credit, he made defamatory statements in public concerning that other party. It follows from the principle of proportionality that the right of reply and the defence of honour do not justify a new act of defamation (STJ 14 October 2003).

10. DUTCH CP art. 41(1) precludes the imposition of criminal liability where an act is exercised in noodweer. According to this provision, self-defence has five prerequisites in order for it to be legimately invoked: there must be (i) a present and (ii) unlawful attack. The attack must be directed (iii) at the body, the or property of the person attacked or those of a third party The act of self defence must have been (iv) necessary and (v) apt and proportionate to avert the attack (Onrechtmatige Daad I [-Jansen], art. 6:162(2), no. 167 p. 1737; HR 10 December 1999, NedJur 2000, no. 9 p. 82; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 62 p. 76). A person remains liable if the self defence exercised is excessive, namely, the parameters of a legimate act of self-defence were culpably exceeded, cf. CP art. 41(2). Thus, liability may not be incurred, because the contrbutory negligence of the attacker clearly outweighes the culpability of the person acting in self-defence (CC art. 6:101; Jansen loc. cit. no. 170 p. 1780).

11. ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(2) states tersely, an act exercised in self-defence is not unlawful. LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.269(1) is to the same effect. CC art. 6.269(2) adds that "the aggrieved person can claim from the person against whose unlawful actions defence was used, i.e. from the assailant, to compensate for the damage occurred".

12. In the NORDIC countries self-defence in private law is governed by the same rules as in criminal law (SWEDISH CP chap. 24 § 1; DANISH CP § 13 and FINNISH CP chap. 4 § 4). Where criminal liability is excluded civil liability is also excluded. However, in cases of excessive self-defence and putative self-defence, the actor remains liable (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 120). An attack, emanating from an animal or property are not embraced by this defence but are governed by the laws on necessity, which can require that stricter preconditions are met than in the context of self-defence (see HD 14 October 1988, NJA 1988, 495: goat keeper held liable for shooting a valuable hunting dog which attacked some goats; see also Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 38). If a third party is injured or suffers a loss from the action of self-defence, liability is attributed to the original attacker (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 120; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 49; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 172; HD 13 December 1947, NJA 1947, 626 [a group of persons assaulting a person, who in self-defence fired a shot hitting a by-passer, was found solidarily liable for the by-passer's personal injuries).

13. British Isles [missing] Under the Animals (Scotland) Act 1987, s. 4(1)(a)(i), a person who kills or injures an animal has a defence if he proves he acted in self-defence. A person also has a defence if he proves that he killed or injured the animal in acting to protect another person: s. 4(1)(a)(ii). Additionally, a person who proves he killed or injured the animal in acting for the protection of livestock has a defence if he is (a) a keeper of the livestock, (b) the owner or occupier of the land where the livestock is present, or (c) authorised by a keeper or by the owner or occupier of the land to act for its protection: s. 4(1)(iii), (3). Each of these defences requires that the animal attack or be about to attack the person causing the damage or the person or livestock being protected (or have attacked a person or livestock and remained in the vicinity) and that there were reasonable grounds for believing there was no other practicable means of ending or preventing the attack (or a further attack): s. 4(4). Each is subject to the proviso that the killing or injury is reported to the police within 48 hours (s. 4(1)(b)) and is excluded if the damage is caused in furtherance of criminal activity or at or near a place where that person was present for that purpose (s. 4(2)).

II. Benevolent Intervention

14. On the issue of liability of a lawful but carelessly performed act of benevolent intervention, see the notes under PEL Ben.Int. Art. 2:103???*. A benevolent intervention in another's affairs which was lawfully undertaken and carefully carried out, does not lead to liability in any legal order which recognise this legal institute, not even if the intervention results in bodily injury, property damage, or loss of rights to the principal's detriment. This result is either rationalised on the basis that there is a lack faute or fault or on the basis that the fact that the benevolent intervention was justified constitutes a defence.

15. Cf. e.g. for SPAIN CA Jaén 2 July 1999, AC 1999 (3) no. 1950 p. 452 and CA Alicante 7 March 2005, BDA JUR 2005/132762; for ITALY Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[6], sub art. 2028, no. 4; for HUNGARY CC § 485(1) (from whence, it can be inferred that a person who appropriately intervenes in another's affairs without authority does not act in a culpable manner according to § 339); for GERMANY Medicus, Schuldrecht II[13], no. 760; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], Pref. to § 677, nos. 5, 11; Larenz and Canaris, Schuldrecht II(1)[13], § 57Ib and Staudinger [-Bergmann], BGB, Pref. to §§ 677 ff., no. 243; of a different view MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[4], Pref. to § 677, no. 16); for PORTUGAL CC art. 340(3) (legal fiction that consent has been obtained to a lawful benevolent intervention in another's affairs, see Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 85 [1959] 13, 108-109 and Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 248); for GREECE Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 506; Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 604 (ground of justification); for the NETHERLANDS Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 617 und Onrechtmatige Daad I (-Jansen), art. 6:162(2), no. 233 p. 6100 and for ROMANIA Adam, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, 182 as well as Dogaru and Drăghici, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, 358.

16. At any rate, in AUSTRIA, intervening in another's affairs in order to avert an emergency (CC § 1036) constitutes a ground of justification (CC §§ 1311 and 1312; Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Koziol], ABGB², § 1036 no. 7). That the same ought to hold true for the mere "benevolent" intervention in another's affairs (CC § 1037), has been refuted by recent legal commentary (Koziol loc. cit. § 1037 no. 1; Meissel, GoA, 119, 135). In any event, this issue is not ascribed with any considerable practical importance as, in the latter case, for liability to be incurred, depends on the existence of fault. Liability of the intervener under ESTONIAN LOA § 1022(1) and (2) is also dependent on the existence of fault. In BULGARIA, it appears that the submission that a lawfully exercised benvolent intervention in another affair's can operate to exculpate from liability has not been discussed.

17. Within the NORDIC countries in DENMARK negotiorum gestio is explicitly referred to as a separate defence, whereby the intervener has a defence if the principal is harmed (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 41; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 51). However, the issue of the intervener causing damage to the principal or another has also been dealt with in SWEDEN (Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 139) and FINLAND (Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 173). See in more detail PEL/von Bar, Ben.Int., Introduction I53-57.

III. Necessity

18. Under FRENCH CP art. 122-7 "a person is not criminally liable if, confronted with a present or imminent danger to himself, another person or property, he performs an act necessary to ensure the safety of the person or property, except where the means used are disproportionate to the seriousness of the threat." A person finds themselves état de nécessité, a condition which serves to justify the commission of a damaging act, if they are threatened by a danger of the kind mentioned above and employ proportionate measures to counteract it. The interest violated must always lie below the preserved interest in the hierarchy of competing values; for example, it is permitted to sacrifice the property of another, however not his life, in order to rescue one's own property. A person whose property is damaged in an act done under necessity has a claim under enrichissement sans cause for recompense against the person who either saved himself or was rescued by another (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2004/2005], nos. 1973-1976). The prevailing legal position in BELGIUM is similar. It is said, that a justficatory état de nécessité would particularly lie, if the actor or a third party found himself in a situation of danger, which is so concrete that it compels the actor to react in a specific manner. The endangered interest and the violated interest must, at a minimum, be of equal value. In addition, the defence is not available to an actor who himself brought about circumstances, whereupon it was then incumbent upon him to exercise the defence of necessity (Tilleman and Claeys [-Claeys], Buitencontractuele aansprakelijkheid, 1, 34-37, nos. 55-59).

19. In SPAIN, necessity negates criminal liability; however, it does not operate to cancel out the civil liability which is triggered by the commission of the criminal offence (CP arts. 118(3) and 20(5)). This affects the person who benefitted from its exercise (even where the conduct done under necessity was unsuccessful) and also affects a person who did not personally exercise the defence. The relative values of the protected interest and the damaged interest serves as a basis for the assessment of damage; if, this approach is not feasible, then the judge is conferred with an equitable discretion. Necessity, pursuant to provisions of the aformentioned article of CP, is established, if (i) the damage inflicted is not greater than that which was threatened; (ii) the circumstances giving rise to necessity were not deliberately instigated by the actor; and (iii) it was not incumbent upon the person benefitting to sacrifice himself owing to their occupation or an office held by him. The same critieria apply in the context of civil liability (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 554). In contemporary legal theory, the submission has been made that CP art. 118(3) concerns a recompense for lawfully inflicted damage, in other words, that it is not connected with genuine tort liability. The proposition tendered is that the law should solely seek to preclude that the person who benefits from the defence should be unjustly enriched (Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 115; de Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 285; Díez-Picazo and Gullón loc. cit.). The law pertaining to benevolent intervention in another's affairs is also of relevance in determining the basis of the duty of the person benefitting to make reparation (CC art. 1893(2)) (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Pantaleón], Código Civil II[2], art. 1902 p. 1986; for a discordant view e.g. Busto Lago, La antijuridicidad del daño, 412). CATALAN CC art. 546-12 ushers in the following clarification for the scope of application of the defence of necessity, namely, that the owner of assets which are utilised in a situation of danger, must tolerate such interference. However, the former can demand appropriate compensation to offset the damage caused.

20. ITALIAN CC art. 2045 provides: "If a person causes damage and that act was compelled by a situation of necessity, in order to save himself or another from an immediate danger of sustaining grave personal injury and this danger was not deliberately created by the person exercising the defence of necessity nor was it possible to employ other means to avert the danger, then the injured party is entitled to compensation, the extent of which is determined equitably be the court". CC art. 2045 corresponds, for the most part, at least in so far as the prerequisites of the defence of necessity are concerned, with CP art. 54(1). That a threat of "grave personal injury" must be extant is always a precondition. Relying on Const. art. 2, this concept has been interpreted to connote not only a person's bodily intergrity but also extends to incorporeal personality rights (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, sub art. 2045, p. 296). The interim period which lies between the perception of the danger and reacting to it as well as between the reaction and damage caused, must, each time, bear a proportionate relation (Franzoni loc. cit. 303-305; Cass. 21 December 2004, no. 23696, Giur.it.Mass. 2005, fasc. 1). The obligation to compensate is anchored in the fact that the actor was conscious of, and deliberately resolute in his actions (Cass. 3 April 1980, no. 2206, Arch.Giur.circolaz 1980, 743). A discretion is conferred on the courts regarding the determination of the quantum of compensation. It can fix a duty to compensate on either the actor or the person profiting from the exercise of the defence (Franzoni loc. cit. 314).

21. HUNGARIAN CC § 107 imposes a duty on the owner of property to tolerate interference with their property, if the life or bodily integrity or property of another is in immediate danger and that danger cannot be averted in any other manner. However, if, merely, the property of another is endangered, then the owner is only obliged to tolerate interference with his or her property, if the forseeable damage accruing to the other party would considerably outweigh the damage likely to be caused to the former by the exercise of the defence of necessity. However, the owner can demand compensation from the endangered person; the owner can assert a claim for reparation against the person who causes an unjustifiably large amount of damage in order to dispel the emergency in respect the additional damage. If more than one person is affected by the state of emergency, then they incur liability in proportion to the extent of their involvement. To date, the defence is contained within the confines of property law, but the draft for a new CC also refers to the situation of emergency as a matter which negates unlawfulness (http://www.parlament.hu/irom38/05949/05949.pdf). In ROMANIA, recourse is had to the provision on necessity in CP art. 45(2) which also applies in the civil law context. The duty to compensate the party whose property has been used by the person in protection of his legal interests in order to elimate a state of emergency is partly derived from the provisions pertaining to Benvolent intervention in another's affairs and partly anchored in the law on unjustified enrichment (Adam, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, 286; Dogaru and Drăghici, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, 236).

22. Similarly, BULGARIAN LOA art. 46(2) provides for the obligation to compensate for damage caused to another's property, if it was used to ward off a state of emergency, however, it does not indicate exactly who owes the duty of compensation. The Supreme Court has opted for a socalled "cascade liability": namely, the person who caused the situation of emergency primarily incurs liability. If, this state of emergency was brought about by an animal or a thing, then its owner or keeper is liable. Finally, the person benefitting from the exercise of the defence of necessity is subsidiarily liable (Supreme Court, ordinance no. 4 of 30 October 1975, Plenum). Under SLOVENIAN LOA art. 138(2), the injured party may bring a claim either against the person responsible for bringing about the dangerous situation or against the person whose legal interest were endangered, "but may not request compensation from the latter greater than the benefit they had therefrom". Under LOA art. 138(3) any person that incurs damage when the risk of damage is averted from another shall have the right to demand therefrom the reimbursement of the damage to which the latter was reasonably exposed.

23. The GERMAN Civil Code distingusihes between defensive (CC § 228) and aggressive necessity (CC § 904); both afford a ground of justification. CC § 228 permits property of another to be damaged if it was necessary to avert danager and the danger emanated from this object; CC § 904 confers the right to interfere with the property of another, if it was necessary to utilise that property in order to defend oneself. Both provisions are predicated on the concept that, in a state of emergency, a lesser legally protected good may be sacrificed in order to preserve a higher ranked interest. Moreover, CP § 34 is also relevant to the private law context, as it (to some extent, under more rigourous prequisites than those contained in CC § 228) allows interferences with legal interests which are personal to the individual such as interference with health and liberty. Pursuant to CC § 228, a thing owned by another must present an immediate actual danger to the rights or legal interests of the actor (necessity) or to another (assistance in an emergency). This thing may be damaged or destroyed, in so far as the damge caused was not a disproportionate response to the danger threatened. If the actor himself brought about the dangerous situation, then s/he must recompense the damge caused. If, in order to ward off the danger, it is necessary to interfere with the property of an uninvolved third party and the danger threatened is disproportionally great when compared to the damage caused to the owner by the interference, then the owner must tolerate the interference under the provisions of CC § 904. However, the owner may demand compensation from the owner and this claim does not hinge upon whether the latter was subjectively at fault or otherwise.

24. AUSTRIAN CC § 1306a regards a state of emergency as given, if a person can only save himself from a dangerous situation, which is not directly occassioned by an unlawful attack, by interfering in another's legally protected interests. Necesssity is treated the same as aid given to another in an emergency (another person's interests are endangered) (OGH 10 May 1979, ZVR 1980/277, 280). Necesity and aid given to another in an emergency constitute grounds of justifications if the relevant conduct was directed at safeguarding a legally protected interest, and following an examination of all the circumstances, the conduct is classified as proportionate and was confined to causing the least amount of harm (OGH 13 December 1988, SZ 61/270 p. 509). The actor comes nonetheless under a duty to compensate the injured party according to equitable precepts (see further Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Karner], ABGB², § 1306a no. 4).

25. According to GREEK CC art. 285, an act which is occassioned by necessity is justified (Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 507; Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 603). In the event that there is a conflict of interests, a legally protected interest which is accorded less value in the eyes of the law must cede to the protection of a higher interest (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Tabakis], art. 285, no. 1). CC art. 285 solely governs interference with someone else's property, it does not concern (like CP art. 25) the violation of personality rights. However, the approach adopted by the majority of legal commentators is that CP art. 25 also applies in the context of the civil law (see further Tabakis loc. cit. no. 5).There is no requirement that the danger, against which CC art. 285 is geared towards preventing, emanates from the same object which is utilised to fend off the attack (Karakostas, AstK, art. 285, no. 1841; Tabakis loc. cit. no. 6). Assistance in an emergency in support of another is possible (Karakostas loc. cit. no. 1842; Tabakis loc. cit. no. 9). The damage averted is required to be disproportionately greater than that which is occasioned by exercising the defence of necessity. The actor comes under a duty to compensate, if s/he was at fault in creating the state of emergency i.e the danger (CC art. 286(first sentence); see further Tabakis loc. cit. art. 286, no. 2). In all other cases, a discretion is conferred on the courts to require the person exercising the defence of necessity to pay a reasonable amount of damages (CC art. 286(second sentence); see further Karakostas loc. cit. no. 1850).

26. PORTUGUESE CC art. 339(1) contains a regulation which governs the defence of "aggressive" necessity (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 527). According to this provision, it is permitted to damage or destroy the property of another, in order to ward off an immediate threat of considerably more severe damage accruing to oneself or to another. The danger may originate from any source and operate to threaten the person or legal interests of the actor or a third party (CA Lisbon 12 May 2005). A person who causes damage to property or even its destruction is liable in damages to the owner, if he culpably provoked the threatening danger (see further CA Porto 25 September 1997); in all other cases, the court is conferred with an equitable discretion to determine recompense, whereupon (in turn according to the court's discretion) the actor or the person profitting from his actions or indeed both may come under a duty to compensate the owner's loss (see further Pessoa Jorge, Ensaio sobre os pressupostos da responsabilidade civil, 260). The following case will serve to illustrate, whereby the driver of a vehicle swerved to prevent an accident occurring (STJ 17 June 1999); if the driver had provoked the dangerous situation by failing to observe the Rules of the Road, then conversly s/he alone would be liable to pay compensation (STJ 19 April 1988, BolMinJus 376 [1988] 602; STJ 3 March 1990, BolMinJus 395 [1990] 534; different view CA Coimbra 20 March 2001).

27. Under DUTCH law, noodtoestand is conceptualised as a particular manifestation of overmacht ("force majeure"). It concerns a case of competing obligations: the legal obligation not to commit an unlawful act must cede to a superior interest. The example employed in legal textbooks to illustrate this maxim pertains to breaking into a house to rescue another. Also, local authority would act in accordance with law if it refused to hand over meat endangering human health to its owner (HR 3 May 1934, NedJur 1934, 1549; see also CFI Arnhem 22 June 1950, NedJur 1951, no. 290 p. 558 and Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 60 p. 76). The defence always concerns cases where immediate action is necessitated (Onrechtmatige Daad I [-Jansen], art. 6:162(2), no. 176.2, p. 1875). The state of emergency must not derive from circumstances which may be imputed to the actor (HR 19. March 1943, NedJur 1943, no. 312 p. 417 and HR 20 June 1986, NedJur 1987, no. 35 p. 152 [harbour workers' strike]). An act which is necessitated to ward of actual damager is lawful and, therefore, does not trigger the imposition of liability pursuant to CC art. 6:162. However, upon application of the rules governing unjustified enrichment, a reasonable compensation may be mandated (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 617; Hartkamp loc. cit. no. 359 p. 362).

28. Under ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(2) and (3) it is not unlawful to cause damage in necessity. Necessity is defined in GPCCA § 141(1). However, the fact that the act was justified does not obviate the duty to pay a reasonable recompense. This obligation is incurred by the actor (GPCCA § 141(2)) as well as the person profiting from his or her actions (loc. cit. § 141(3)). LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.274 confers a discretion on the courts regarding the determination of the obligation to compensate. It can require the person in whose favour the defence was exercised to compensate the damage in whole or in part.

29. In the NORDIC countries the notion of necessity implies that another's patrimony is sacrificed in order to rescue a person, property or a legitimate interest protected by law under imminent danger. This defence is codified in criminal law (SWEDISH CP chap. 24 § 4, DANISH CP § 14 and FINNISH CP chap. 4 § 5) and reflected in the law of civil liability. Within the latter, however, the person who has rescued his property by damaging another's property will, as a rule, be held liable (HD 19 October 1929, NJA 1929, 542 concerning the owner of a dam who due to heavy rainfall had to open the flood gates, causing damage to other premises). If there is a tortfeasor who created the danger, he shall primarily bear the liability. Otherwise, the person who was endangered is liable for the consequences of the rescue measures. If a third person has taken action in another's interest, liability shall fall upon the latter (Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 171; Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 122; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 50). Necessity requires an imminent danger. The protective measure must be legitimate, whereby the value of property serves as a natural reference, but regard is also to be had to the severity of the danger (HD 14 October 1988, NJA 1988, 495). However, if a less valuable thing is used to rescue a more valuable one that cannot foreclose the right of the owner of the former to be compensated (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 40).

31. In SCOTLAND neither the defence of self-defence, nor either of the defences of protection of another or of livestock under the Animals (Scotland) Act 1987, s. 4(1), (see Note 13) is expressly confined to the case where the claimant would be liable for the damage which the defender, killing or injurying the animal, has sought to avert (although, given the strict liability regime provides for in s. 1 of the Act, this may often be the case). To that extent the defences may be regarded as defences of necessity in the sense of paragraph (3).

VI.–5:203: Protection of public interest

A person has a defence if legally relevant damage is caused in necessary protection of values fundamental to a democratic society, in particular where damage is caused by dissemination of information in the media.

COMMENTS

Purpose of the rule. This Article grants the originator of the damage a defence where the damage was caused in necessary protection of values fundamental to a democratic society. It gives effect to a principle which is rarely clearly visible in the black-letter law of the Member States, but is encountered in the jurisprudence on the law on non-contractual liability virtually everywhere. The Article should reduce the necessity to rely on VI.–7:101 (National constitutional laws). The latter provision cannot be expected to serve as a panacea for all problematic cases.

Protection of public interest. The primary significance of the rule lies in giving the press and other forms of media a defence in cases in which the person who is the subject of a report suffers legally relevant damage under the criteria set out in VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy), VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another) and VI.–2:205 (Loss upon breach of confidence). The person must put up with such damage if the prerequisites of VI.–5:203 are satisfied. Very frequently there is a particular public interest in reporting on celebrities or leading personalities in political life. This also applies to the latter in relation to such news about their private lives as concerns their integrity and therefore is relevant to voters in deciding whether or not to vote for them. Moreover, the public interest in certain information can make particularly speedy reporting necessary, in the context of which the full accuracy of the disseminated news cannot always be guaranteed. Nor can it always be expected in such circumstances that the publisher or the organ of the press authoritatively assesses all the associated legal issues. Of course, the Article protects neither invented stories nor the reckless publication of untrue facts or mere rumours. However, in the case of journalistic investigations deemed to be of a reasonable intensity under the circumstances, it may be permissible to publish information which later proves to be partially false. Where the report is corrected upon learning the truth, no liability arises. For accuracy's sake, of course everything depends on the conditions of each individual case; weighing-up the interests involved must be left to the courts.

Fundamental to a democratic society. If the Article is to apply, the mere existence of any arbitrary public interest does not suffice. Rather, basic values of a democratic society must be at issue, and the protective measure taken must be necessary. Included among the basic values of a democratic society are particularly freedom of expression and freedom of assembly. The Article can therefore be important in relation to the freedom to demonstrate. The participants in a large demonstration, for instance, are not liable for the fact that private persons cannot use their vehicles for a certain period of time or that delivery vans cannot reach a factory which the demonstration passes. Also the mere participation in the demonstration itself is not a ground for liability where under the circumstances it may be expected that rather violent people will join the demonstration. Certainly, the Article does not provide carte blanche for irresponsible carelessness in the planning and organisation of such processions, but seeks to ensure that the exercise of fundamental rights is not made factually impossible by the consequences of civil liability.

NOTES

1. The FRENCH courts strive to attain a balance between freedom of the press and the right to respect for private and family life (CC art. 9). Publications, containing hyperbole which the reader does not require to know in order to inform himself, cannot be justified by invoking the function of the press as affording a vehicle of information (Cass.civ. 23 April 2003, Bull.civ. 2003, I, no. 98 and D. 2003, 1854, note Bigot; JCP 2003, II, 10085, note Ravanas and GazPal 2003, IV, 2403, note Amson [two judgments delivered on the same day]). A person, against whom criminal proceedings have been instituted, cannot be portrayed as guilty in the media prior to the handing down of the court's decision (Conseil d'Etat 14 March 2005, AJDA 2005, 576; Cass.civ. 6 March 1996, Bull.civ. 1996, I, no. 123; D. 1997, Somm. 72, obs. Dupeux; Cass.civ. 29 April 1998, Bull.civ. 1998, II, no. 141). The presumption of innocence is ranked higher than the freedom of the press to report news (CFI Nanterre, 22 June 1996, GazPal 1996, II, 559). Conversely, a published report which merely mentions that the dead victim was married and was the father of two children and which correctly depicted the circumstances which surrounded the discovery of the body must be tolerated (Cass.civ. 20 November 2003, Bull.civ. 2003, II, no. 354; GazPal 2005, II, 1224, note Guerder). Furthermore, infringements of the right to one's own image can be justified if higher ranked legal interest is involved e.g. artistic freedom (CFI Paris 9 May 2007, D. 2008, 57; CFI Paris 25 June 2007, D. 2008, 58). Claims regarding an abuse of press freedoms may only be based on CC art. 9, CC art. 1382 is no longer applicable in this regard (Cass.civ. 27 September 2005, Bull.civ. 2005, I, no. 348; Dreyer, D. 2006, Chron. 1337), this remains the case even in the light of Criminal Law of 29 July 1881 on Press Freedom which expressly refers to both of the aforementioned provisions.
2. The BELGIAN Cour de Cassation (Cass. 14 January 2005, no. JC051E4_1, no. de rôle C030622N) permits restrictions on press freedom, with the proviso being added that these restrictions must be necessary in a democratic society in that they meet a compelling social purpose. Moreover, in order for the restrictions to be justified. a proportionate relationship must be extant between the means employed and the strived for purpose and a cogent and satisfactory reason must exist for the restriction. When freedom of the press and the right to respect for private life collide, the courts try to strike a balance between the competing values. The courts examine, making full use of all the circumstances of the individual case, whether the intereference with journalistic freedom exceeds what is necessary to vindicate the individual rights of the person affected (CA Brussels 5 February 1999, no. JB40966_1, no. de rôle 98/AR/425). It is possible that preventative legal measures may be granted to check impending press publications (Cass. 25 September 1969, Pas. belge 1969, I, 89).
3. SPANISH Const. arts. 18(1) in conjunction with 20(4) is also directly employed in the private law context; these provisions ground and abridge the right of freedom of expression and freedom of the press. According to jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, it is indeed incumbent on journalists to carefully verify the correctness of the asserted claims; however, there is no requirement that every aspect of the claim has to be substantiated. The legal system affords protection if the information is carefully collated and disseminated, however, the law does not afford protection in the event that there is a careless distain for the truth, spreading of rumours, fabrications or spiteful intimations (TC 21 January 1988, no. 6/1988, BOE 1988 no. 31 of 5 February; see also TS 5 July 1999, RAJ 1999 (3) no. 5898 p. 9197; TS 20 November 1999, RAJ 1999 (5) no. 8293 p. 13010 and TC 31 January 2000, no. 21/2000, BOE 2000 no. 54 of 3 March). In addition, making false statements of fact will not result in liability being incurred for infringing a person's honour, if, prior to making these claims, appropriate measures were adopted by the journalist concerned to verify the truth of these statements and the report was characterised by an absence of insults and disrespectful terms were not employed (TS 17 April 2000, RAJ 2000 (2) no. 2567 p. 3985). Of course, it is conceivable that liability may be incurred for a breach of the right to protection of family life and right to a sphere of intimacy, in the event that no public interest was served by the article (TC 10 May 2000, no. 115/2000, BOE 2000 no. 136 of 7 June). According to the jurisprudence of the Spanish Constitutional Court (TC 17 July 1986, no. 104/1986, BOE 1986 no. 193 of 13 August; TC 15 September 2003, no. 160/2003, BOE 2003 no. 242 of 9 October; TS 11 December 2003, RAJ 2003 (5) no. 8653 p. 16209), thoughts, ideas and opinions are embraced by the right to freedom of expression, whereas the dissemination of relevant facts is the subject matter of the freedom of the press. Thus, above all, this distinction acquires significance under the civil law in respect of the burden of proof in respect of the correctness of the factual assertion as it generally behoves the person who makes those claims to prove their accuracy (see further on this delineation and on the many cases which mix freedom of expression and assertions of claims of fact TC 21 December 1992, no. 240/1992, BOE 1993 no. 17 of 20 January; TS 14 November 2001, RAJ 2001 (5) no. 9303 p. 14707). The Organic Act on the Civil Protection of Honour, Personal and Family Privacy and One´s Own Image (Ley Orgánica 1/1982, de 5 de mayo, de protección civil del derecho al honor, a la intimidad personal y familiar y a la propia imagen) art. 2(2) also pertains to the primacy accorded to the protection of the public interest. According to this provision, the breach of a legally protected right is not regarded as unlawful if a historical, scientific or cultural interests prevails over it.

4. The Italian courts have developed a number of criteria in order to tackle the collision between constitutionally protected rights (as, for example, the clash between the right to freedom of information or freedom of expression and personality rights of the person involved). The ingiustizia of the damage is a factor which flows into this determination. The media are permitted to publish reports which represent a legitimate exercise of their diritto di cronaca (right to broadcast news). Here, the report must have been true, there must be a legitimate public interest in acquiring the pertinent information (socalled. pertinenza), and the report must appear in a suitable format (known as continenza). A "close relationship" must exist between the newsworthy event and the subsequent report. This is necessary in order to meet the requirement that the public interest was served by the report (Const. art. 21) (Cass. 4 February 2005, no. 2271, Giur.it.Mass. 2005, fasc. 2; Cass. 13 January 2005, no. 559, Giur.it.Mass. 2005, fasc. 1; Cass. 15 December 2004, no. 23366, Giur.it.Mass. 2004, fasc. 1). The subject matter of the diritto di critica is the publication of a subjective opinion (in contrast to the diritto di cronaca) and not the report on the newsworthy event. The diritto di critica is ranked below the continenza. It can only be exercised to the extent that it is justified as being in the public interest. Furthermore, negative value judgments which affect the reputation or honour of the affected party must be properly accounted for (Cass. 11 January 2005, no. 379, Giur.it.Mass. 2005, fasc. 1). The publication of negative value judgments and criticism must be based on circumstances which the public have an interest in knowing about (Cass. 11 January 2005 loc. cit.).

5. Similarly, in HUNGARY, clashes between, on the one hand, freedom of expression, freedom of the press and right of freedom of information (Const. § 61) and, on the other hand, protection of the affected party's personality rights,(Const. §§ 54 und 59) are resolved by balancing the respective interests in individual cases (cf. Petrik [- Petrik], Polgári jog I[2], 178/2). Print Media Act § 3 makes clear that the freedom of the press is abridged in that the media may not commit a criminal offence, incite the commission of a criminal offence or breach the precepts of public morality or violate personality rights. § 4 imposes a duty on public authorities to give the press information which is of importance for the general public. CC §§ 76, 77, 78, 80, 81, 82, 83 and 85(3) und (4) provide for extensive protection of incorporeal personality rights which are once again safeguarded by the general clause contained in CC § 75(1); please see the notes above under VI.–2:203 (Infringement of personal dignity, liberty and privacy) and VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another). Under the civil law, in the event that there is a clash between the aforementioned competing rights, the court, in attempting to strike a balance between those rights may have recourse to CC § 2(2) (according to which the law ensures that all persons "can freely exercise the rights to which they are entitled in accordance with the social intent of these rights") as well as to CC § 5(1) and (2). CC § 5(1) prohibits an abuse of rights; CC § 5(2) provides that the exercises of a right which is directed at a goal which is incompatible with the social intent of the right may be regarded as an abuse of a right, particularly if it harms the national economy, results in a person being harassed, or leads to an impairment of their rights or legal interests, or results in the acquisition of undue advantages. According to continual jurisprudence of the Supreme Court of ROMANIA, the law absolutely protects incorporeal personality rights against untrue claims and injurious statements (CSJ 24 September 2003, secţia civilă, decision no. 3623; CSJ 30 September 2003, secţia civilă, decision no. 3733). Persons, holding public office must accept that there will be a commensurate public interest in undisclosed information (CSJ 28 November 2001, secţia civilă, decision no. 5435).

6. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 177(2) affords a ground of defence to any person who acts in ignorance of the falsity of information in respect of another which s/he has disseminated, provided that the precondition is met that the injuring party or the recipient of the information has a justifiable interest in the disclosure of that information. It is incumbent upon the injuring party to prove that this criterion is met (Juhart and Plavšak [-Pensa], Obligacijski zakonik I, art. 177 p. 1018). POLISH Supreme Court 14 May 2003, OSPiKA 2004, no. 2 p. 87 ruling bears out VI.–5:203. This judgment concerned allegations about the President which appeared in a press article, namely that in 1997 he conspiratorially met with former KGB agents. The Plaintiff claimed an apology and non-pecuniary damages corresponding to € 600.000, which were to be paid to the Polish Red Cross. The Supreme Court pointed out that the mere fact that a statement is not true does not, without more, give rise to liability of the press. Liability for the infringement of a right to respect for personality rights depends on the unlawfulness of the infringement. Although the unlawfulness of such infringement is presumed under CC art. 24, this presumption may be rebutted inter alia by proving that the infringement aimed at the protection of a legitimate social (or public) interest. Supreme Court 18 February 2005, OSNC 2005 nos. 7-8 p. 1 is to the same effect: "a journalist's proof that in collecting and using press material he acted in defense of a legitimate public interest with all reasonable care and diligence excludes the unlawfulness of his activity. However, if the allegation turns out to be untrue the journalist is obliged to withdraw it". Under BULGARIAN Const. art. 41, a person may disseminate information provided that it does not infringe the rights or reputation of another citizen and further, that it does not endanger national security, constitute a breach of public order, harm public health or infringe against public morals. The Court of Cassation no. 891 of 7 June 2002, civil matters 183/2002 held that an article must contain true facts and must convey information, which is the public's interest to know.

Further, information which owing to is incompleteness engenders a false impression in the mind of the recipient, is regarded as false and, thus, does not enjoy constitutional protection.

7. See note 6 under VI.–5:201 (Authority conferred by law) for a treatise on the ground of justification of safeguarding a legitimate interest under GERMAN law. Interests personal to the individual and, moreover, the wider public interest are recognised as pertinent in this regard (BGH 22 December 1959, BGHZ 31, 308, 312). It is universally recognised (also on the basis of Const. art. 5(1) second sentence) that the press are authorised to safeguard the interests of society. Naturally, this authority is not boundless. The press have a duty to carefully examine the information that they intend on publishing; false allegations about an individual may not be published without due care being taken. In addition, the press must attempt to achieve a respectful balance between the relevant interests, namely, it has to examine whether the detriment that accrues to the affected party is outweighed by a substantial and justifiable public interest in the disclosure of the information (see further Soergel [-Spickhoff], BGB[13], § 823, no. 131). The criteria developed to govern the publication of articles also apply to the publication of images (BGH 6 March 2007, BGHZ 171, 275). Additionally, conduct which is unlawful can be rendered lawful by invoking the fundamanetal right of freedom of assembly (Const. art. 8). The unintentional, yet inevitable side-effects of a demonstration (as e.g. obstructions to traffic or impeding access) must be tolerated (Spickhoff loc. cit. no. 133).

8. A comparable regulation to VI.–5:203 can be found in the AUSTRIAN Media Act (BGBl 1981/314) § 6(2)(iv) which affords a ground of justification. According to this provision, a claim for damages for injury to feelings may not be made if the report concerns an accurate quotation of a statement made by a third party and there was a prevailing public interest in knowing about statement concerned (see further Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI³, § 1330 no. 49). The making of political statements may be justified on the basis of ECHR art. 10 (OGH 14 December 2000, SZ 73/198 p. 546; Harrer loc. cit. no. 48). Conversely, the right of freedom of assembly does not constitute a ground of justification in respect of the interference with third party rights. The frontiers of this right are reached when the exercise of the right results in an interference with the rights of a third party; each exertion of force against persons or things is, also in the context of assemblies, unlawful (OGH 25 May 1994, SZ 67/92 p. 531; OGH 25 March 1999, SZ 72/55 p. 337; Harrer loc. cit. § 1301 no 60).

9. GREEK Gesetz no. 1178/1981 on the Civil Liability of the Press provides that strict liability will be imposed on the owner of a newspaper in respect of publications which operate to breach an individual's personailty rights; as far as damages are concerned, minium amounts are fixed which depend on the newspaper circulation and these amounts were raised again by Law no. 2243/1994. Law 1178/1981 also applies to other forms of mass media (Gesetz no. 2328/1995 on the legal status of private television and radio art. 4(10)); the aforementioned Act provides for minimum amount of damages for violations also in the field of television and radio. Howver, the damages awarded by the courts frequently tend to considerably exceed these amounts (e.g. CFI Thessaloniki 26488/2001, Arm 2003, 931; A.P. 788/2000, EllDik 42/2001, 162; CFI Athens 6472/2003, XrID 4/2004, 120). In Greece, owing to these minimum fixed amounts of damages, in the context of breaches of right to honour by the press, a particular manifestation of the problem arises concerning the clash, on the one hand, between freedom of expression and freedom of the press and, on the other, safeguarding personality rights of the person affected. CA Athens 9975/1986, EllDik 28/1987, 299 stressed, in this context, that the press have a legitimate interest in sharply criticising public personae; the article at issue in this case was, when objectively examined, untrue, however was the only means available of obtaining the truth. A.P. 167/2000 EllDik 41/2000, 772 tends in the same direction. However, prior case law shows that the courts do not always attempt to strike a careful balance between all of the interests involved; therefore, in recent times, Greece has been brought before the European Court of Human Rights on this very point.

10. PORTUGUESE courts generally resolve conflicts between freedom of expression and freedom of the press, on the one hand (Const. arts. 37 and 38 and the rights to good name, reputation and protection of intimacy of private life (Const. arts. 25 and 26) on the other, according to the same rules employed by the rest of the European courts. Freedom of expression and freedom of expression only have precedence over the individual's interest in safeguarding enumerated incorporeal personality rights, if a public interest is involved and the disclosure does not exceeed what was necessary to vindicate the public interest (CA Evora 8 February 2001, CJ 2001-1 [XXVI] 267; STJ 29 October 1996, BolMinJus 460 [1996] 686; STJ 5 March 1996, CJ (ST) IV [1996-1] 122). A person acts to vindicate a public interest, for example, if he informs the relevant authorities about the workshy ethic of the manager of a public health centre, whose job it was to introduce particular procedures to pave the way for the establishment of further healthcare agencies, where the situation endured for over a year (STJ 3 March 2005). The same holds true for an article which reported about financial irregularities in the books of a state hospital and the ensuing issuance of reprimands against the Minister for Health; of course, such information is required to be reported in an objective manner and should be not contain barbs leading to the infringement of a person's honour (STJ 18 April 2002; CA Lisbon 27 April 1978, BolMinJus 276 [1978] 170). No public interest is given, where an article reports on a woman's premarital sex life, in the event that she is not a public figure (CA Evora 8 February 2001 loc. cit.). Likewise, there is no public interest in seeing photos of a world famous footballer together with his wife on the buidling site where their future family home was being constructed (STJ 14 June 2005).

11. Under DUTCH law, within the parameters of noodtoestand it can happen that the actor invokes the protection of algemene belang (a public interest). The justification for this is reasoned on the basis that the community's welfare is more deserving of protection than the competing private interest. For legal persons under the civil law to successfully invoke the public interest defence in order to justify their actions, their actions must meet a societal function which is directed at preserving the public interest. The function of the press is relevant here as is e.g consumer agencies which inform their members about the quality of a particular product (see further Onrechtmatige Daad I [-Jansen], art. 6:162(2), no. 178 pp. 1900-1926; HR 24 June 1983, NedJur 1984, no. 801 p. 2849; HR 27 January 1984, NedJur 1984, no. 802 p. 2859; HR 27 January 1984, NedJur 1984, no. 803 p. 2870; HR 19 April 1968, NedJur 1968, no. 263 p. 865 [a consumer agency is permitted to warn the public about selling methods in respect of the marketing of particular pressure cookers]). The ground of justification of safeguarding the public interest is of particular relevance in the arena of torts committed by the press. In addition, CC art. 6:168 permits the opening of the following avenue, namely that the courts may award the plaintiff damages, however, may refute his claim for an injunction prohibiting the defendant's conduct, on the basis that there was a profound public interest opposing the grant of an injunction (see further Onrechtmatige Daad II [-van Nispen], art. 6:168, no. 1 p. 2). An example for the application of this provision is provided by claims asserted at short notice by environmental organisations (see further van Nispen loc. cit. no. 7 p. 21-22).

12. ESTONIAN Law of Obligations Act does not contain an article along similar lines to VI.–5:203. However, the public interest is taken into account in cases which concern the breach of an incorporeal personality right (LOA § 1046(2)). The public interest is also pertinent in the context of LOA § 1045(2)(i).

13. In SWEDEN, the liability of the relevant medium which is channelled through the editor, is governed by two Acts which are regarded as having constitutional status, namely, the Freedom of the Press Act (Tryckfrihetsförordningen [1949:105], chap. 11) and the Fundamental Law on Freedom of Expression (Yttrandefrihetsgrundlag [1991:1469], chap. 8) and depends on whether particular criminal provisions have been infringed. A jury is sworn in to try the accused in the criminal proceedings. Liability for defamation (Freedom of the Press Act chap. 7 § 4(14)) is excluded if the communication of the information was justifiable and if the information was either correct or if there was a reasonable basis for the assumption that it was correct, the burden of proof being on the editor. The issue of "justifiability" is determined by the courts striking a balance between the public's need to know and safeguarding the individual's private sphere (HD 15 April 1987, NJA 1987, 285; HD 5 December 2003, NJA 2003, 567; HD 16 November 1994, NJA 1994, 637; Svea CA 21 February 2002, RH 2002:39 [see further ECHR 19 September 2006, White v. Sweden, ECHR 19 September 2006, App. no. 42435/02]). Under special circumstances it may even be justifiable to disseminate untruthful and unfounded information (HD 14 December 1966, NJA 1966, 656, concerning a report on already disseminated incorrect information). Persons who in confidence give information to the media for the purpose of making that information public, have a right to remain anonymous; revealing that kind of source amounts to a crime (Freedom of the Press Act chap. 1 § 1(3), chap. 3; Fundamental Law on Freedom of Expression chap. 1 § 2). DANISH Media Liability Act (Medieansvarslov) identifies the persons who can be held liable, under civil and criminal law; civil liability, however, is grounded on general principles. Under Damages Liability Act § 26 the latter does not depend on the existence of a crime. Liability for defamation is excluded if the information is correct or if it was disseminated in good faith for a significant public interest. In that context special regard is had to ECHR art. 10 (HD 28 October 1998, UfR 1999, 122; HD 6 January 1999, UfR 1999, 560; HD 2 July 2002, UfR 2002, 2398; HD 18 December 2002, UfR 2003, 624; Eastern CA 24 September 2004, UfR 2005, 123; Werlauff, Juristen 2002, 1). FINNISH Damages Liability Act chap. 5 § 6 (amended in 2006) remsembles the Swedish regulation. Likewise, the editor or the person who is the head of programming is deemed liable (Freedom of Expression in Mass Communication Act [lag om yttrandefrihet i masskommunikation 460/2003] § 14) and, the imposition of civil liability is predicated on the commission of a criminal offence. CP chap. 24 § 9 excludes liability for defamation in respect of criticism directed at someone's conduct in, inter alia, politics, business, or similar 'public' services, and which does not clearly transgress what may be considered justifiable (Supreme Court 22 August 1980, KKO 1980 II 86; Supreme Court 28 March 2000, KKO 2000:45; Supreme Court 7 January 2005, KKO 2005:1). Under CP chap. 24 § 8 it amounts to a crime, and thus a tort, to disseminate information that violates private life, with a defence regarding public persons if the information relates to that person's official duty and is of public interest (see Supreme Court 26 September 2001, KKO 2001:96; Supreme Court 25 August 2000, KKO 2000:83; Supreme Court 11 June 1997, KKO 1997:80; Supreme Court 25 June 2002, KKO 2002:55; see Sisula-Tulokas, JFT 2000, 634).

Section 3: Inability to control

VI.–5:301: Mental incompetence

(1) A person who is mentally incompetent at the time of conduct causing legally relevant damage is liable only if this is equitable, having regard to the mentally incompetent person's financial means and all the other circumstances of the case. Liability is limited to reasonable recompense.

(2) A person is to be regarded as mentally incompetent if that person lacks sufficient insight into the nature of his or her conduct, unless the lack of sufficient insight is the temporary result of his or her own misconduct.

COMMENTS

A. Policy considerations and overview

Options. In Europe, there is no prevailing uniformity on the issue of how harm caused by mentally disabled persons (typically, but not necessarily mentally incompetent adults) is to be dealt with reasonably by the law on liability. As a result, there were several options available. The rule could have been (i) formulated in such a way that a mental disability was either not considered in any respect or in any event did not come into consideration in the field of liability for negligence. It could also have been formulated in the exactly opposite manner, namely (ii) upon the principle that a mentally disabled person was, without exception, never liable for damage caused, or (iii) a middle ground between the two could have been taken up. That is the solution opted for in the Article.

The preferred solution. The Article takes as its starting point the consideration that a balancing of the interests of the injuring person and the injured person is necessary. The legal system should lose sight neither of the protection of the victim nor of the adverse circumstances of the injuring person who cannot be held responsible for his or her condition. A person who, due to mental illness, cannot distinguish between right and wrong (see paragraph (2)), does not act "intentionally" within the meaning of VI.–3:101 (Intention); this is because such a person is not in a position to differentiate between arbitrary and legally relevant damage. On the other hand, the liability of a mentally disabled person in cases covered by the Chapter 3, Section 2 of this Book solely depends on whether - under the circumstances - he or she can be qualified as a "producer", "keeper" or "occupier". In the standard case that will usually be answered in the negative. However in the case of a sudden onset of mental illness exceptions are conceivable (see illustration 3 under VI.–3:102 (Negligence)). Therefore, the actual problem area is liability for negligence. Under VI.–3:102 (Negligence), deviation from the standard of care which can be expected from a reasonably careful person under the circumstances of the individual case is sufficient. Conduct caused by illness may constitute such a deviation; something like the average "care" taken by a mentally disabled person does not exist. As a consequence, in the terminology of these model rules a person with mental incapacity is "accountable" for negligently occasioned legally relevant damage under the same prerequisites as for someone of sound mind. However the present Article restricts the normal effects of this accountability in three different respects. Liability can (i) only lie in the duty to pay a sum of money from available assets; due to the nature of the situation, rendering compensation through reparation in kind is excluded from the outset. Liability lies (ii) not in the payment of the full monetary damages ("compensation"), but in a reasonable recompense ("recompense"). Hence, VI.–5:301 draws on the concept which has already been presented in VI.–5:202(3) (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity) for the reparation of loss in an emergency situation necessitating self-defence. Both cases exhibit certain similarities. Even liability for reasonable monetary compensation under VI.–5:301, however, (iii) only remains justifiable where it conforms to equity and fairness under the circumstances, as might be the case if the liability could easily be borne by the liable person because of his or her favourable financial situation. On this point, the model of liability in VI.–5:301 is in accord with several (but in no way all) of the European legal systems. The considerations are similar to those relating to VI.–3:103 (Persons under eighteen) paragraph (3) on the personal liability of children. Of course the liability of children is subsidiary (VI.–3:103(3)(a)); the liability of mentally disabled adults is not.

B. Mental incompetence

Lack of insight. According to the definition in paragraph (2), a natural person is "mentally incompetent" if he or she is not in a position to grasp the nature of his or her conduct (act or omission), i.e. to foresee its possible consequences and to understand how society judges it in general. Typically the issue is that the person in question in not in a position to differentiate between right and wrong. A person who has this ability, but is not able to fashion his or her behaviour accordingly, is not mentally incompetent within the meaning of VI.–5:301, see illustration 3 under VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives). Also other physical disabilities, which do not have an effect on a person's mental capacity, do not fall under VI.–5:301. They can only be taken into account in the context of VI.–3:102 (Negligence), depending on the circumstances of each individual case (see comments under that Article).

Temporary lack of insight. The lack of sufficient insight can be either temporary or permanent. However, where the lack of sufficient insight is only temporary, the conduct of the person concerned must be considered in order to determine whether the temporary lack of insight can provide a defence. Consideration must be given to what that person has done to bring about the condition and whether this amounts to misconduct. Thus an alcoholic who has suffered brain damage and has a permanent deficiency of insight into his or her conduct will fall under VI.–5:301, whereas a mentally fit and healthy individual who embarks on a one-off "bender" and so puts himself or herself beyond proper self-control will not have a defence under this Article for damage caused during the drunken escapade.

Instinctive reflex actions. VI.–5:301 does not extend to bodily movements while in a state of unconsciousness and to the mere instinctive reflex actions of mentally competent persons. Such reflex actions do not constitute "conduct" within the meaning of this Book, see comments under VI.–3:102 (Negligence). In such a case there is no liability at all. The situation is different only where the injuring person should have anticipated having such episodes or reflex actions as a consequence of a physical problem and therefore should have refrained from the activity in question in advance.

Illustration 1
A dancer falls and to steady herself she reaches out to another dancer, who is pulled down and injured. That is not "conduct".

Illustration 2
In the course of an operation, a doctor loses consciousness. If the loss of consciousness is attributable to a sudden and unforeseeable drop in blood pressure, the doctor is not liable for the harm caused to the patient; conversely, where the doctor should have been aware of the risk of such a loss of consciousness, then the doctor should not have been allowed to operate at all in the first place.

C. Recompense according to equity and fairness

Parallel comments. According to VI.–5:301(1) second sentence the originator of damage is liable for reasonable monetary recompense, subject to the proviso of equity and fairness. The concept of liability subject to equity and fairness has already been explained in comments under VI.–3:103 (Persons under eighteen) paragraph (3) and the concept of liability for a reasonable monetary recompense in comments under VI.–5:202 (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity). Thus, reference can be made to both here.

Illustration 3
A suffers from schizophrenia. He notices that someone has turned off the light in his apartment. He takes a hunting rifle and shoots at two men, who are standing near the electricity meter: his father and an electrician. Both are killed. A comes from a wealthy family and commands a great personal fortune. The electrician's dependants have a claim to reasonable monetary compensation. However, A must meet the necessary means for the maintenance of himself and his mother, who is financially dependent on him.

1. According to recurrent jursiprudence of the FRENCH courts, the presence of culpability on the part of the injuring party is not a prerequisite for the determination of faute to under tort law (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10], nos. 99-101 p. 96-99). This premise derives from an amendment to the Civil Code in 1968 which led to the insertion of CC art. 489-2 which provides that "a person who has caused damage to another when he or she was under the influence of a mental disorder is nonetheless liable to compensation". The absence de discernement (the inability to distinguish between right and wrong) will not afford a defence.
2. The approach adopted in BELGIUM stipulates that faute comprises of a subjective element which takes account of the tortfeasor's personal characteristics (fault or culpabilité oder imputabilité) and an objective element which is comprised of an objective element which refers to the behaviour (onrechtmatigheid or illicéité). Consequently, the principle that tortious capacity is a requisite is firmly adhered to (Tilleman and Claeys [-Claeys], Buitencontractuele aansprakelijkheid, p. 1, 7, no. 7; Cass. 3 October 1994, Pas. belge 1994, I, no. 412 p. 788). This also holds true for gardien liability which derives from CC art. 1384(1); only a person in full control of his/her faculties can be a gardien (Tilleman and Claeys [-Baudoncq and Debeane] loc. cit. p. 83, 89 no. 8). Mentally disabled persons may be subject to the imposition of a liability in equity under CC art. 1386*bis*. This article confers a discretionary power to the courts to award compensation, either in full or in part, against the class of persons enumerated in this provision, having regard to the financial position of the respective parties (CA Bruxelles 21 April 2006, Rev.gén.Ass.Resp. 2007, no. 14313). An analogous application of ths provision to other groups of persons . in particular, to small children (who have developed normally) is however precluded (Cass. 24 April 1980, Pas. belge 1980, I, p. 1055, concl. Dumon). A person lacks tortious capacity if that individual is not aware of the damaging nature of his/her act or acts and it is not possible to reproach that person for voluntarily bringing about a condition in which they could lose control over their actions. A person lacks tortious capacity where at the time of the commision ofthe tort, s/he could not distinguish between right and wrong (van Gerven (-Covemaeker), Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 302).

3. SPANISH CC art. 1902 requires culpa or negligencia, these terms, according to the professed views of many commentators connote that civil legal reponsibilty is a pre-condition for the imposition of liability (Reglero Campos [-Gómez Calle] Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 461, 479). Legal responsibility connotes that an individual is in a position to understand the implications of his or her behaviour and forsee the possible results thereof and act on the basis of this knowledge (Gómez Calle loc. cit. 406). However, apart from the proposition that lack of legal repsonsibility entails that the putative tortfeasor is absolved from liability (so e.g. Albaladejo, Derecho Civil II(2)[10], 490), it is also espoused that the tortfeasor who lacks tortious capacity should at least be secondarily liable in order to protect the interests of the victim, if the person whose duty it was to supervise was unavailable or was bankrupt or could adduce grounds for exculpation under CC art. 1903. This submission is backed up by arguments based on comparative legal research, which are inter alia deduced from CC art. 3(2) (Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 230; see also de Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 308). The regulation, which was previously contained in CP(old) art. 20 m ties in therewith. However, CP art. 118(1) likewise contains a special rule for the case that a criminal offence is committed by a person who has reached the age of majority but who cannot be deemd to be responsible fir his actions according to the criminal law. Accordingly, parents, legal guardians or persons who were under a duty to supervise, may “also” be civilly liable on an equitable basis, provided that they can be held accountable for their negligence. This liability which is joint and several, arises in conjunction with the liability of the person who directly causes the damage who remains civily, if not criminally, responsible (Yzquierdo Tolsada loc. cit. 259); further particulars remain the matter of some dispute (please see the discussion in Reglero Campos [-Gómez Calle] Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 1234, 1251-1252). If the tort is committed by a person who has attained the age of legal majority, who however, remains under the care of his or her parents of legal guardian and who nonetheless is criminally responsible, then the parents or legal guaridan, with whom the tortfeasor lives with, are secondarily liable, based on a corresponding application of CP art. 120(1), if negligence can be imputed and the tortfeasor who is of full age is insolvent (TS 22 April 2004, RAJ 2004 (3) no. 3992 p. 8236). All in all a much criticised twofold regime governs the liability of the primary tortfeasor: if his act does not amount to a criminal offence, then civil liability under CC art. 1902 is ruled out; conversely, if a criminal offence is involved, then the perpetrator is liable under CP art. 118(1). The court has been imparted with an equitable discretion to curtail liability (Gómez Calle loc. cit. 1286).

4. According to ITALIAN CC art. 2046 a person is not liable for the consequences of a damaging act if, at the time of its commission, that person lacks torious capacity unless the lack of tortious capacity can be attributed to his or her culapbilty. CC art. 2047 provides that in such an event, the person under a duty to supervise is liable to pay compensation unless it was not possible to forestall the conduct of tortfeasor lacking capacity. If the injured party cannot obtain compensatation from the person who was under a supervisory duty, then the court can award an equitable compensation against the instigator of the damage, having regard to financial circumstances oft he respective parties. According to case law, the same holds true if a person exercising a supervisory duty was absent (Cass. 28 January 1953, no. 216, Giur.it. 1953, I, 1, 496). Tortious capacity is ascertained on an individial basis; the Civil Code does not furnish any criteria wth which to measure tortious capacity (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, sub art. 2045, p. 317; Visintini, I fatti illeciti II[2], 1 ff; Cass. 18 July 1975, no. 2425, Giur.it. 1976, I, 1, 1587). The socalled capacità di intendere e di volere is based on the ability to realise the consequences of one's conduct and to act according to this insight (Cass. 27 March 1984, no. 2027, Giur.it.Mass. 1984, fasc. 3-4). Whether tortuous capacity is encompassed within the concept of fault or whether it is divorced from this concept is a matter of some controversy (see further Salvi, La responsabilità civile[2], 106; Bianca, Diritto civile V, 656). As far as minors are concerned, the ability to exercise self determination, the recognition of the impact that one's conduct has on third parties, mental and physical development and strength of character are factors which influence the adjudication on the presence or absence of tortious capacity (Cass. 26 June 2001, no. 8740, Giur.it.Mass. 2001, 1270).

5. According to HUNGARIAN CC § 347(1)(i) the inability to distinguish between right or wrong operates to exclude the imposition of liability. An exception to the foregoing, which is deemed to be warranted on equitable grounds, is contained in CC § 347(2). Insofar as compensation cannot be extracted from the person upon whom it was incumbant to exercise a duty of supervision, and the circumstances of the individual case and the financial positions of the parties justify it, the court may award damages (in full or in part) against the tortfeasor lacking tortious capacity. According to prevailing legal opinion, every natural person is endowed with tortious capacity, if that person can forsee the possible consequences of their actions and is able to grasp that society in general would condemn such conduct (Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 66). Accordingly, the court then examines whether the damaging party was capable of comprehending the wrongfulness of his actions and the forseeable detrimental consequences oft hat conduct (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1282; Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II[2], 598; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 139). Of course, a wrongdoer cannot invoke lack of tortious capacity if self-induced (CC § 347(3)) and cannot aduce a ground for exculpation (for further analysis, please see Ujváriné loc. cit. 124-126). POLISH CC arts. 425 and 428 and SLOVENIAN LOA arts. 136 and 146 correspond with the aforementioned in all essnetial points. Conversly, CZECH CC §§ 422 and 423 do not recognise a liability which is imposed on equitable grounds.

6. BULGARIAN LOA art. 47(1) generally precludes those persons who are incapable of committing a tort from incurring liability, unless this condition was self induced. A person, deemed by the criminal courts to lack the ability to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct, is also regarded as incapable of committing a tort (Supreme Court 9 October 1964, decision no. 1046, criminal case no. 924/1964). Conversely, a person possesses the capacity to commit a tort, if, although s/he was under the control of a court appointed guardian or supervisor, at the time of acting, that person was in actual fact legally capable of committing a tort (Supreme Court 8 October 1973, decision no. 2469, civil case no. 1410/73). Moreover, a person who suffers from a socalled "impaired capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of his or her actions" which induced the damaging act, possesses tortious capacity (Supreme Court 28 June 1995, decision no. 190, criminal case no. 48/1995). According to ROMANIAN law, as a general rule, person is only liable, if s/he has the ability to appreciate the wrongfulness of their conduct; however, this precept is the subject of a formal statutory provision solely in the context of criminal law (CP art. 48). There is a presumption in force in respect of persons who have attained the age of fourteen, whereby it is presumed that such persons possessed the ability to appreciate the wrongfulness of their actions, it must be positively ascertained in respect of persons below this age limit. However, according to case law, persons not possessing tortious capacity (adults and minors) can be deemed liable on equitable grounds (for citations of relevant case law, please see Adam, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, 306; Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 376). There is a proposal contained in the Draft Civil Code which envisages that liability based on equitable considerations will be the subject of specific statutory provision (art. 1106).

7. Under GERMAN CC § 827 first sentence, a person is not liable for damage which s/he caused to another, while in a state of unconsciousness or in a state of pathological mental dsiturbance which operated to preclude the exercise of free will. If this condition precluding the exercise of free will was temporal and self-induced, then CC § 827 second sentence provides that liability will be imposed as if that person was guilty of negligence at the time of committing theact; consequently, the wrongdoer comes under a duty to compensate, if the remaining prequisites for imposing liability are satisified. CC § 829 provides that a person who, for the above cited reasons contained in CC § 827 is deemed not responsible for the damage which s/he has caused, must, nonetheless, compensate the damage sustained, if equity demands that damages should be awarded in the circumstances of the instant case. Particular regard is had to the financial means of the parties involved and further, the wrongdoer is not deprived of financial resources required to meet legal maintenance obligations or s/he would be bereft of funds needed for reasonable maintenance. The duty to compensate is subisidiary to the liability of persons with a duty of supervision (CC § 832). Thus, liability under CC § 829 only comes to the fore, where there was no duty to supervise the wrongdoer or compensation cannot be obtained from that person for either factual or legal reasons.

8. Similarly, pursuant to AUSTRIAN CC § 1306, damage which is caused by an involuntary action is not generally compensatable. On the other hand, the duty to compensate endures, wherethe damging party voluntarily creates a state of self induced disorientation (CC § 1307). However, if the injured party, by his or her own (contributory negligence) gave rise to the commission of the act by the mentally impaied person, then again, the latter escapes liability (CC § 1308). Aside from this special instance, the injured party can pursue the person who culpably breached his or her obligation to supervise for damages (CC § 1309). A subsidiary equitable liability may be imposed on the persion incapable of committing fault under CC § 1310. The court may also decide to award partial damages. In detemining if equitable grounds exist for awarding damages, the courts have regard to all the circumstances of the individual case, including the available insurance coverage (Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Karner], ABGB², § 1310 no. 8).

9. GREEK CC art. 914 includes fault among the prequisities for the imposition of tortious liability. A person can only commit a fault if that personis endowed with tortious capacity (CC art. 915). Thus, the actor must possess intellectual maturity and must not suffer from impaired mental health. These qualities are indispensible in order for the person concerned to recognise the significance and reach of his or her own actions (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 915, no. 1). This ability is generally extant; exceptional cases are caught by CC art. 915 (CC art. 915(1) which was amended by Law no. 2447/1996). According to this provision, a person will not incur liability, if he was unconscious at the time of acting or was in a mentally disturbed state, which had the effect of considerably restricting the exercise of his power of judgement and the exercise of his or her free will. An exception to the foregoing arises when the wrongdoer himself (e.g via alcohol) culpably and voluntarily brings about the required impairment of mental faculties (CC art. 915(2)). CC art. 915(1) is augmented in CC art. 918 by a subisidiary liability imposed on gronds of equity and fairness.

10. Pursuant to PORTUGUESE CC art. 488(1), a person is not responsible for the damaging effect of their conduct, if they are, for whatever reason, not capable of "understanding or desiring" those effects, unless this condition was self induced (STJ 25 July 1978, BolMinJus 279 [1978] 160) and only temporal in nature. It is rebuttably presumed that minors under the age of seven and persons who are subject to court protection owing to their mental illness are incapable of committing a tort (CC art. 488(2); Hörster, Parte geral, 351). Tortious capacity comprises of two limbs, namely an intellectual and a willed component (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 384; STJ 13 January 1998, BolMinJus 473 [1998] 78). Furthermore, a person who is not capable of conducting himself or herself according to his or her knowledge or experience, is considered to be incapable of committing a tort. However, a person who is deemed not to possess the capacity to commit a tort may, under CC art. 489, come under an obligation to pay damages (in whole or in part) if the requirements of equity so demand. This, in turn, which is incurred on equitable grounds, constitutes a subsidiary liability; this entails that it can only be invoked if no liability exists in respect of a breach of a duty to supervise or it cannot be realised. Apart from the existence of capacity to commit a tort, all (other) prequisites for the imposition of tort liability as enumerated under CC art. 489 are required to be extant. In Portugal, the assessment which is based on the individual circumstance of the case at hand, takes account of the financial positions of the respective parties (Antunes Varela loc. cit. 565). Pursuant to CC art. 489 e.g. it was held that a man suffering from paranoia was liable to pay damages for conduct following his release from a relevant institution, where he attempted to murder 3 people, including his wife (STJ 13 January 1998 loc. cit.). The same holds true for a case where a man suffering from schizophrenia shot his father and an electrician who were present in his apartment. The wrongdoer came from an extremly wealthy family, following his death, the family of the electrician found themeselves living in very straightened financial circumstances (STJ 31 January 1996, BolMinJus 453 [1996] 205).

11. DUTCH CC art. 6:162(3) clarifies that an unlawful act may be imputed to the wrongdoer, in the absence of fault if it results from a cause which is allocated to his sphere of risk by law. CC art. 6:165 is a case in point for the application of this provision. The former lays down that a wrongful act (not however, omission) can also be imputed to person aged 14 or older, even if the act came about under the influence of a mental deficiency. Mental impairment does not alter the fact that the act was unlawful nor does it operate to affect the existence of civil responsibility (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 661; Onrechtmatige Daad II [-Jansen], art. 6:165, nos. 3-5 pp. 2-24; CA 's-Hertogenbosch 3 February 1998, VR 1999, no. 63 p. 114). However, the quantum of the damages owed may be reduced on equitable grounds (CC art. 6:109; Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 449; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], nos. 86-89 pp. 105-108). The concept of "mental deficiency" is given a broad interpretation. It encompasses not only illness, intoxication but also embraces somnambulism and self inflicted injury caused in a state of unconsciousness (CFI Zwolle 13 November 1991, VR 1992, no. 111 p. 253 [doctor falls in a state of unconsciousness during the course of an operation; liability affirmed]; Jansen loc. cit. no. 6 pp. 24-44).

12. ESTONIAN LOA § 1052 corresponds in all essential matters to VI.–5:301(1). The law, however, does not refer to the notion of 'mental incompetence', rather in terms where a person could not understand the meaning of activity or could not direct it. The liability based on equity and fairness under LOA § 1052(3) is not limited to a reasonable compensation; it is necessary to adjudicate on the circumstances of the instant case whether an award of full compensation would be fair. A perso who culpably induces a state which renders him or her incapable of committing a tort, remains liable (LOA § 1052(2); see Lahe, Juridica 2002, 391–400).

13. In the NORDIC countries, legal capacity is not counted among the prerequisites necessary for the establishment of negligence or culpa. Psychological or other "internal" characteristics of the actor are, in principle, not taken into account (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 108, 140; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 66; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 104; Rodhe, Obligationsrätt, 310). Conversly, physical infirmity is by all means taken into consideration, see SWEDISH HD 14 August 1948, NJA 1948, 489 (hard of hearing); DANISH Western CA 16 October 1967, UfR 1968, 133 (blind person stepped on a guitar which was lying on the ground; contributory negligence of the owner prevailed entirely) and Western CA 11 January 1995, FED 1995, 108 (a person who suffered an unforeseeable epilectic seizure stumbled against another person; no "act", no liability). However, under SWEDISH Damages Liability Act chap. 2 § 5 the liability of the mentally disabled may be mitigated on equitable grounds. A person who, while suffering from a mental illnes or impaired intellectual development, causes injury to a person or physical damage to property, is obliged to make reparation for the damage, however, "only to the extent that this would be an equitable result having regard to the actor's mental state, the nature of the act, whether liability insurance was extant and the economic positions of the parties as well as other relevant circumstances of the case at hand". The same holds true, if a person causes such damage while suffering from impaired mental activity which was not voluntarily brought about and was not only of a temporary nature" Similar rules exist under DANISH EAL § 24b and FINNISH Damages Liability Act chap. 2 § 3. The general rule therefore connotes that mentally disabled persons are liable for the damage that they cause; howver, this liability may be reduced if equitable grounds exists for its mitigation (Swedish HD 15 April 1992, NJA 1992, 541; Swedish HD 24 September 1979, NJA 1979, 581; Swedish HD 17 June 1999, NJA 1999, 441; Danish HD 26 March 1926, UfR 1926, 380; Danish Western CA 4 February 2004, FED 2004, 177; Danish HD 20 January 2005, UfR 2005, 1259; FINNISH Supreme Court 19 June 1980, KKO 1980 II 67). It is important to note that the insurer cannot invoke the defence that the person insuredsuffered from a mental disorder (Swedish Insurance Contracts Act; Danish Insurance Contracts Act § 19; Finnish Insurance Contract Act chap. 4 § 36). Drunkenness or consumption of other intoxicating substances does not amount to a "mental disorder" under the aforementioned regulations governing tort liability.

VI.–5:302: Event beyond control

A person has a defence if legally relevant damage is caused by an abnormal event which cannot be averted by any reasonable measure and which is not to be regarded as that person's risk.

COMMENTS

A. General

Event beyond control as a defence in the framework of strict liability. This Article deals with the defence of an event beyond control. Under these model rules, this is only significant for the law on liability without intention or negligence. This is because where an uncontrollable event has caused the damage, then it is already a certainty that, to this extent, the person could not have acted negligently. Where an uncontrollable natural occurrence was, however, foreseeable and where the consequences of it could and should have been avoided by taking anticipatory measures, then under the criteria set out in VI.–3:102 (Negligence), negligence is to be affirmed. There is no room for VI.–5:302 here; the two provisions preclude each other.

Accountability without intention or negligence. This Article can also be important in the realm of employers' liability (VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives)) – however, only where the employee's liability does not depend on negligence.

> Illustration 1
> While dismantling his market stall, a trader leaves his unsold goods (items of clothing), packed in plastic refuse sacks, unattended behind his stall. Third parties unknown to him carry the bags to the side of the street. On their daily route, the local refuse collectors take the plastic bags with them; the pieces of clothing are mixed with domestic waste in the bin truck and are irreparably damaged. The refuse collectors did not act negligently (VI.–3:201(1)(b) (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives)). Their employer would not be liable even where it transpired that one of them was the owner of the truck: the defence in VI.–5:302 would not only be of benefit to the refuse collector, but also to the employer.

B. Event beyond control

Notion. An event beyond control is an abnormal occurrence which cannot be averted by any reasonable measure and which is not to be regarded as the realisation of a risk for which a person is responsible under Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence). As far as possible and reasonable for the purposes of the law on non-contractual liability, this definition follows the corresponding rules provided by CISG art. 79(1) and III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment) for contract law.

Two elements. An event beyond control is thus characterised by two elements – a factual one and a normative one. On the factual plane it is marked by the fact that the cause of damage would not have been discovered or precluded even if as much care had been taken as could possibly be expected in the circumstances. On the normative plane, damage must not have resulted from the realisation of the very risk on account of which liability is rendered strict. The Article does not address the distinction between "force majeure" and an "inescapable event". This distinction is not prevalent in many Member States' private law systems and, even where it is recognised, the boundary between force majeure and inescapable event is often drawn by reference to different criteria. The defence under the Article does not depend on whether the actual cause of the damage is a natural occurrence or human behaviour (that of a third party or the victim), but on the fact that even where extraordinary care and prudence is exercised, it could not have been foreseen or, though foreseeable, could not have been avoided.

Abnormal event. The defence of an event beyond control only comes into play where an abnormal event was causative of the damage. Damage from the continuous operation of equipment would rarely constitute such an abnormal event. Nor would injury to health caused by the regular noise of low-flying aircraft. Everyday events do not lend themselves well to being termed events beyond control.

An abnormal event would be where a bolt of lightning causes a sudden power cut, which in turn leads to an electrical cable being broken and a house being set on fire. Conversely, such an abnormal event is lacking where the power cut and subsequent cable breakage occur because birds have sat on a power line and momentarily connect it with another power line, so that a short-circuit occurs.

'Not to be regarded as that person's risk'. The predominant field of application for the defence is naturally that of strict liability. The purpose of the Article is not, however, to reduce the strict liability of keepers, occupiers, owners, producers or operators "through the back-door" to mere liability for negligence. Its sole purpose is to keep strict liability within the borders of the risk for which it exists.

Illustration 3
Where a terrorist ignites a bomb that has been deposited on a bus, the danger normally lying in vehicles is no longer an issue. From the point of view of the bus driver, this is an event beyond control exonerating him or her from liability.

Illustration 4
During the night, martens nibble at the brake cable of a car parked in a town. The conduct of the martens is "beyond any control", but the risk that the car brakes do not function as the result of such an event must be borne by the keeper of the car.

Illustration 5
A fire breaks out in a train station because an extraordinarily strong gale throws a tree on to the electricity line and breaks it. The railway operator is not liable under VI.–3:202 (Accountability for damage caused by the unsafe state of an immovable) or under VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage).

Relationship to contributory fault. In contrast to the defence of contributory fault, the defence of an event beyond control always leads to a complete exclusion of liability and never merely to an apportionment of damage. Where the victim's contributory fault is totally dominant the result can, however, be the same because a reduction of liability "to zero" will then also come about by the application of VI.–5:102 (Contributory fault and accountability).

Illustration 6
The facts are the same as in illustration 1, with the only difference that it is not third parties who place the refuse sacks filled with goods at the side of the street, but the market dealer himself. His contributory fault is so extensive that it is indistinguishable from an event beyond control.

NOTES

1. In FRANCE, whether force majeure is given depends on the presence of three cumulative criteria, namely the extériorité, the imprévisibilité und der irrésistibilité of the harmful event (Malaurie/Aynès/Stoffel-Munck, Les obligations, no. 195 p. 96; le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2004/2005], nos. 1807-1824). The most important characteristic is the irrésistibilité, i.e. that it was impossible to avoid the event occurring and or to take measures to resist its occurence (Malaurie/Aynès/Stoffel-Munck loc. cit.). The irrésistibilité of an occurence is assessed in abstracto; an event will only be qualified as force majeure if the average person in the same position of the defendant could not have avoided its occurrence (le Tourneau loc. cit. no. 1808). The precise connotations of imprévisibilité requirement were equivocal for a period of time. Whereas the Second Chamber of the Cour de cassation adhered to the view that the presence of this criterion was indispensible, the remaining Civil Chambers were inclined to regard irrésistibilité as sufficient to qualify an event as force majeure (see further le Tourneau loc. cit. no. 1813). However, Cass.ass.plén. 14 April 2006, JCP éd. G, 2006 no. 194 p. 835 made clear that the approach of the second Civil Chamber must be followed, i.e. that the irrésistibilité as well as the imprévisibilité are required to be extant in order for an event to qualify as a force majeure event. The extériorité characteristic (cf. for contract law CC art. 1147) denotes that the relevant event was not within the sphere of control of the person invoking the defence of force majeure (le Tourneau loc. cit. no. 1816). A case will serve to illustrate this requirement, a company providing water supply services could not invoke the defence of force majeure/overmacht, which was under a contractual obligation de résultat in regard of the supply of drinking water; the water had to be free of nitrate and pesticide residues (Cass.civ. 30 May 2006, D. 2006, 1705). If it is ascertained that the damage is based on force majeure, then the liability of the putative tort feasor is completely denied (le Tourneau loc. cit. no. 1803). This rule is valid in the arena of liability for fait personnel as well as in the field of liability for fait d´autrui and for fait des choses (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10], no. 168 p. 160 und no. 228 p. 233). A faute on the part of the tortfeasor or strict liability under CC arts. 1384-1386 is also denied, if the faute of the victim which was causal for the damage, exhibits attributes of force majeure (Cass.civ. 25 June 1998, Bull.civ. 1998, II, no. 238 p. 141; Cass.civ. 11 July 2002, Bull.civ. 2002, II, no. 174 p. 138; CA Poitiers 18 May 2005, JCP 2006, IV 2302; Cass.ass.plén. 14 April 2006, D. 2006, 1577, note Jourdain [Suicide; force majeure for the rail company]). However, as regards liability for road traffic accidents, the "Banditer Act" (Loi Badinter) art. 2 provides that it is not open to the driver or gardien of a motor vehicle to invoke the defence of force majeure or rely on a fait d´un tiers vis á vis the victim (see above the notes under VI.–3:205 (Accountability for damage caused by motor vehicles)).
2. In BELGIUM, for the most part force majeure/overmacht is defined as an event which occurs independent of the will of a person, is unforseeable and unavoidable. In contrast to France, the extériorité of the event does not count as a prerequisite for the establishment of force majeure/overmacht. Similarly, in Belgien, the main focus is on the issue of the unavoidability of the event. A forseeable event which is unavoidable can qualify as a force majeure/overmacht event. Naturally, the successful invocation of this defence, is contingent, of course, on whether the alleged tortfeasor herself caused the force majeure/overmacht-event (Tilleman and Claeys [-Claeys], Buitencontractuele aansprakelijkheid, 1, 16-17, nos. 21-22). Force majeure/overmacht results in a complete denial of liability in the field of liability faute as well as in areas governed by strict liability (Claeys loc. cit. p. 24 no. 38).

3. According to SPANISH CC art. 1105, a person is not liable for an event which was unforseeable or for a foresseable event which could not have been avoided. A different approach is adopted only if a law or contract provides otherwise. CC art. 1105 is also employed in the realm of extra contractual liability (TS 16 February 1988, RAJ 1988 (2) no. 1994 p. 1966; TS 5 February 1991, RAJ 1991 (1) no. 991 p. 1188; TS 4 April 2000, RAJ 2000 (2) no. 2506 p. 3887). Consequently, the resulting damage cannot have been intended, forseeable or avoidable (TS 31 May 1995, RAJ 1995 (2) no. 4106 p. 5467; TS 20 July 1995, RAJ 1995 (3) no. 5717 p. 7654). The burden of proof rests on the person who caused damage (TS 2 February 1989, RAJ 1989 (1) no. 657 p. 713). However, the terminology employed in the Civil Code is vacillatory. Occasionally the concept of caso fortuito (CC arts. 1096(3), 1891) is utilised, in other areas fuerza mayor (CC arts. 1784, 1905 and 1908(3)), other governing provisions employ either both concepts (CC arts. 1602, 1625), however, here and there completely different expressions are used (e.g. CC art. 484: siniestro o caso extraordinario [Misfortune or extraordinary event]; CC art. 499: acontecimiento no común [extraordinary event] and CC art. 1561: causa inevitable [unavoidable cause]). In general, the following holds true, a debtor is deemed not to be responsible for an "absolutely unavoidable" event, i.e. events that, in the best case scenario could be resisted with "excessive" and therefore unreasonable efforts (prestación exorbitante) (TS 9 November 1949, RAJ 1949 no. 1245 p. 750; TS 7 April 1965, RAJ 1965 (1) no. 2118 p. 1295). Case law inclines to the view that a fuerza mayor must constitute an unforseeable event which is completely outside the debtor's activities, whereas a caso fortuito connotes an unavoidable event, which is connected with the debtor's activities (TS 15 February 1968, RAJ 1968 (1) no. 1082 p. 733; TS 30 September 1983, RAJ 1983 (2) no. 4688 p. 3594 und TS 3 March 1999, RAJ 1999 (1) no. 1400 p. 2235). The distinction between caso fortuito and fuerza mayor is primarily of relevance within the context of (strict) state liability, because the State is only permitted to raise the case of fuerza mayor as a defence. The presence of a caso fortuito will not lead to a denial of liability (see further TS 31 May 1999, RAJ 1999 (4) no. 6154 p. 9656; TS 15 February 1968 loc. cit. and TS 28 July 1986, RAJ 1986 no. 4451 p. 4279). However, TS 30 September 1983 loc. cit. stressed that within the context of CC arts. 1784 (liability of custodian) and 1905 (liability of animal keeper), a distinction must be drawn between fuerza mayor and caso fortuito, because in both cases only a fuerza mayor will operate to absolve the putative tortfeasor from liability. In addition, most of the laws which impose strict liability, either refer solely to fuerza mayor (e.g. Hunting Act [Ley 1/1970, of 4 April, de Caza] art. 33(5); Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic Act art. 1(1)(i); Social Insurance Act [Real Decreto Legislativo 1/1994, of 20 June, por el que se aprueba el texto refundido de la Ley General de la Seguridad Social] art. 115(4)(a)), or the Acts expressly list the events that qualify as a fuerza mayor (e.g. Nuclear Energy Act [Ley 25/1964, of 29 April, sobre Energía Nuclear] art. 45(3)). Aviation Act (Ley 48/1960, of 21 July, sobre Navegación Aérea) art. 120 expressly provides that a caso fortuito does not constitute a ground of exculpation; a fuerza mayor must be established. Fuerza mayor "or" caso fortuito was affirmed in a case where, as a result of a storm (92 km/h), a tree fell against an electricity power line which in turn caused a fire at a railway station; the electricity supply company was not liable for the damage (TS 12 September 2002, RAJ 2002 (5) no. 8555 p. 15592). The same result was reached in a case involving a minor who was killed by a falling electricity cable, owing to the fact that the accident was due to extraorinary weather conditions (TS 15 December 1996, RAJ 1996 (5) no. 8979 p. 12495).

4. ITALIAN jurisprudence has also applied the contractual regulation contained in CC art. 1218 analogously in the field of tort law. This provision concerns damaging events which stem from insurmountable and unforseeble natural phenomenona or in unavoidable and unforseeable acts of a third party (Cass. 5 December 1967, no. 2897, Rep.Giur.it., voce Resp. civ. 165; Cass. 7 September 1966, no. 2333, Rep.Giur.it. 1966, voce Resp. civ. 232; Cass. 22 Mai 1998, no. 5133, Danno e resp. 1998, 945). No distinction is drawn in tort law between (in contrast to the criminal law) caso fortuito and forza maggiore; indeed, the courts often use this terms interchangeably (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, sub art. 2051, p. 575). Ultimately, such cases are regarded as connoting that there is a lack of a causal nexus between the damage and the tortfeasor's act or the source of danger for which s/he was responsible for (Cass. 13 April 1989, no. 1774, Giur.it.Mass. 1989, fasc. 4; Cass. 8 January 1981, no. 170, Giur.it.Mass. 1981, fasc. 1). Caso fortuito is the defence typically invoked in the context of strict liability e.g within the framework of CC art. 2051.

5. HUNGARIAN CC § 339(1) bases the its tort law on a system whereby the onus is generally on the damaging party to prove that s/he acted in a manner that can be generally expected in the given situation". In a number of special provisions (e.g. CC § 352(1) [liability for buildings]) the abovementioned formula crops up again. A stricter benchmark applies in the strict liability context (CC §§ 345-346). According to CC § 345(1) a person who carries on an activity imbued with considerable hazards will only be released from liability if s/he can adduce proof that the damage arose due to an unavoidable event which did not arise in connection with the carrying out of the hazardous activity. This corresponds to VI.–5:302 in all essential matters. Vis maior can constitute such an unavoidable reason pursuant to CC § 345(1); however, it could also be envisaged that the injured party himself or indeed a third party could furnish the unavoidable cause. For example, an avoidable reason was deemed to be present which operated to relieve a bus operator from liability, where a third party deposited a bomb in a bus and subsequently detonated it (BH 2000/200). The unavoidable criterion is only given, when, viewed objectively, it was impossible for the damaging party to prevent the damage occurring (Wellmann loc. cit.; Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 106-107). The following occurrences are not outside the tortfeasor's sphere of responsibility: unforeseeable tyre blow-out, defective brakes or the sudden indisposition of the driver (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1263-1268; Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II[2], 590-592). In ROMANIAN Civil law, a distinction is drawn between forţa majoră and cazul fortuit. Force majeure is a complete defence to liability. Force majeure connotes an extraordinary external event which was neither forseeable nor could have been avoided (CC arts. 1082 und 1083; CSJ 27 January 2000, secţia comercială, decision no. 414). Ground frost during the winter naturally does not amount to force majeure (CSJ 4 February 1999, secţia comercială, decision no. 403). Conversely, extraordinary natural events do amount to force majeure, as do wars and insurgences. A "happenstance" could on the one hand, be regarded as stemming from internal factors, for example, the hidden defect or an animal's fear; happenstance begins where fault ends. In a similar fashion, happenstance generally excludes the imposition of liability; however, in some fields, it is expressly deemed to be inapplicable (Nuclear accidents, damage caused by airplanes etc.). Furthermore, the only defence to the imposition of strict liability under CC arts. 1000(1), 1001 and 1002 is force majeure (Romoşan, Vinovăţia în dreptul civil român, 99; Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 368 with citations from case law).

6. BULGARIAN case law adheres to the distinction between casus fortuitis and force majeure (Overview in Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast, 274). Casus fortuitis is composed of an unforseeable and thereby blameless event, force majeure denotes the consequences of an event which even if they were forseeable could not be eluded; the typical case is a natural catastrophe (Kalaydjiev loc. cit. 276). Casus fortuitis premits an excuplation from liability (only) within the framework of fault based liability; force majeure alone is a defence in a case of strict liability (Tassev, Nepozvoleno uvrejdane, 172). Consequently, the operator of a mine remains liable if, owing to an imperceptible crack, rock blasting causes an unforeseeable avalanche resulting in personal injury (Supreme Court 10 December 1960, decision no. 868, case no. 7466/60 in civil matters). According to the Labour Code art. 200(2), an employer is liable to his employee for work accidents even in the case of force majeure (on this matter critical Tassev loc. cit. 173, who suggests that this result should be corrected by judicial intrepretation). POLISH CC art. 435 § 1 restricts the strict liability of a person, who runs on his own account an enterprise or business set in motion by natural forces (steam, gas, electricity, liquid fuels etc.) via the defence of force majeure. Similarly, the SLOVENIAN Law of Obligations Act does not contain a general defence of an event beyond control. However, LOA art. 153(1) releases the keeper of a dangerous thing from liability "if it is shown that the damage originated from any cause outside the object whose effect could not be foreseen, avoided or averted".

7. For the most part, under GERMAN law only höhere Gewalt (force majeure), see e.g. Road Traffic Act § 7(2); Liability Act (Haftpflichtgesetz) §§ 1(2) and § 2(3)(iii); Environmental Liability Act (Umwelthaftungsgesetz) § 4; Water Budget Act (Wasserhaushaltsgesetz) § 22(2)(ii) affords a defence to the imposition of strict liability. Sporadically, the caso fortuito, the unabwendbare Ereignis (unavoidable event) (Road Traffic Liability Act § 17(3); Liability Act § 13(3)) can operate as a defence, however, these criteria typically only come to the fore within the framework of the internal relationship between keepers who are jointly and severally liable and their obligation to make contribution. Höhere Gewalt in the context of liability of keepers of motor vehicles connotes an extraordinary, external cause, which arises from elemental forces of nature or is caused by the acts of third parties and viewed from human experience and knowledge connotes an avoidable event which cannot be prevented by resorting to reasonable financial measures nor by exercising extreme care that would be expected in the circumstances (Hentschel [-König], Straßenverkehrsrecht[39], § 7 StVG, no. 32). A typical case concerns unforseeable natural events (sudden flooding, lightening, earthquake, landslide, avalanche, squalls). Conversely, gross violations of regulations do not come within the scope of force majeure (infringing rules pertaining to the right of way, misconduct of children), see further König loc. cit. no. 34). An unavoidable event connotes an event which cannot be avoided even if extreme care is adopted. The primary way in which it can be practically distinguished from force majeure is in the fact that one is permitted to trust that other road traffic user will refrain from grossly violating the rules of the road (König loc. cit. nos. 22 and 31).

8. According to AUSTRIAN EKHG § 9, the keeper of a motor vehicle duty to compensate is denied, if the accident was caused by an unabwendbares Ereignis i.e. if the accident could not be avoided, despite the taking of all imaginable precautions and care (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht II², 546). The following case will serve to illustrate. A keeper is therefore not liable for damage which a stone lying on navigated street causes, after the motor vehicle accidently (OGH 21 January 1959, SZ 32/10). In particular, an event is deemed to be unavoidable according to EKHG § 9(2), if it can be attributed to the conduct of the injured party, to a third party who was not operating the vehicle or an animal and if the keeper or driver had observed the due care that was necessary in the circumstances of the case. Conversely, if, in connection with the operation of a vehicle, a risk (if also extraordinary) is realised, then liability ensures (e.g. OGH 30 September 1965, SZ 38/152: insect sting to the eye of the driver). Forestry Act § 53 no. 4 corresponds to EKHG § 9. In sporadic cases, höhere Gewalt operates as a defence to liability (Nuclear Liability Act § 9; Act on Pipelines § 12; further references and details in Koziol loc. cit. 430 and 578).

9. Traditionally, force majeure also provides a defence to liability in GREECE. However, the exact particulars of force majeure is the matter of some debate and subject matter of an array of theories (in-depth Kornilakis, I evthini apo diakindinevsi, 175 ff). It is submitted that the concept ought to be capable of possessing. The defence of force majeure is expressly mentioned in, inter alia, an Act of 1911 concerning the liability for traffic accidents art. 5 (further examples can be found in Dimopoulou, Evthini apo diakindinevsi, 62). Only unforeseeable and unavoidable events, which occur even after taking the greatest amount of care and do not connote a typical risk associated with the operation of a motor vehicle fall within the scope of the defence of force majeure (Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 693; CA Thessaloniki 274/1980, Arm 34/1980, 462). A particularly dangerous slippy patch on the motorway does not amount to force majeure (CA Thessaloniki loc.cit.), even where it was caused by an oil spill (CFI Drama, EsingD 1992, 96).

10. Similarly, PORTUGUESE law employs the concepts caso de força maior and caso fortuito. Both concepts describe an unforseeable and unavoidable event (Prata, Dicionário jurídico, 184; Melo Franco and Antunes Martins, Dicionário de conceitos, 151). A different view regards force majeure as defined by the unforseeability element, whereas caso fortuito is characterised by the unavoidable factor (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[10], 586; Prata loc. cit.). Of course, force majeure is the only available defence to the imposition of liability which is not based on fault. For example, CC art. 505 precludes the imposition of liability under CC art. 503 (on strict liability for accidents caused by vehicles), if the cause of the accident can be attributed to the injured party or a third party or if it can be ascribed to force majeure, which does not arise in connection with the vehicle's operation. Whether an unavoidable loss of control over the vehicle (as a consequence of an oil spill or black ice on the motorway) amounts to force majeure, has been the subject of differing judicial pronouncements (in the affirmative e.g. STJ 11 December 1970, BolMinJus 202 [1970] 190; in the negative CA Oporto 2 June 2005 and STJ 9 January 2003; in a similar fashion Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], art. 505 note 4, p. 519 and Almeida Costa loc. cit.). A controversial topic is also whether the sudden unconsciousness of the driver can be regarded as falling within the scope of force majeure (of this view Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 668 and Almeida Costa loc. cit. 645; of an opposing viewSTJ 10 Febuary 2005 and STJ 27 July 1971, BolMinJus 209 [1971] 120). Liability for damage casued by electricity cables and gas pipes is excluded pursuant to CC art. 509(2) if the damage is due force majeure, whereby "force majeure connotes every external cause which is not connected to the operation or use of a thing". In this context, force majeure is given, when a ray provokes an electrical discharge which leads to the break of a high-tension wire which causes a fire (STJ 3 October 2000, CJ (ST) X (2002-3) 77). Conversely, force majeure is not established where an electric cable came into contact with another cable after a bird rested on it, leading to it short circuiting, falling and causing death (CA Coimbra 15 January 1991, CJ (1991-1) XVI 47). Finally, Labour Code art. 291(1) relieves the emloyer from liability if an occupational accident is caused by force majeure. Force majeuere under this provision solely connotes an event "which due to unavoidable forces of nature, independent from human intervention, does not constitute a risk created by the conditions of work nor occurs during performance of the services expressly ordered by the employer in conditions of obvious danger".

11. In ESTONIA, an event beyond control (LOA § 103(2)) is primarily understood to mean that it has the effect of breaking the chain of causation. If, in exceptional circumstances, this is not the case, then, as a general rule, imposing liability for fault is nonetheless precluded (see further Lahe, Juridica 2003, 236–242). The imposition of strict liability for dangerous activities (such as, the operation of motor vehicles, machines, utilising electrical or nuclear energy and the use of explosives or poisonous substances) under LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.270(1) is subject to the proviso that the damage was not caused force majeure. The defendant bears the burden on proof.

12. While DUTCH CC art. 6:162(2) does indeed provide that the prerequisite for an unlawful act is the absence of a ground of justification; the provision fails to fill out the particulars of the ground of justification, owing to the fact that its exact constitutents can be determined by referring to the criminal law, which is also applicable in the civil law context. CP art. 40 ("A person is not liable for an act under criminal law if that act was compelled by force majeure [overmacht]") is of analogous application. This includes all situations of compulsion which are impossible to check (Onrechtmatige Daad I [-Jansen], art. 6:162(2), nos. 171-172 p. 1782-1783; Schrage, Van delict tot onrechtmatige daad, 71; see on necessity the previous note III28 under VI.–5:202). Overmacht connotes a sudden extraordinary situation which has eventuated, which could not have been foreseen and which left the act in question unavoidable (Jansen loc. cit. no. 173 p. 1786-1826). If a vehicle remains at a standstill, this is regarded as a case of force majeure. Of course, this state of affairs will not therefore preclude the imposition of liability for a subsequent accident because the driver failed to secure the place where the accident sufficiently. Only where, and this argument is rarely successful, the defendant could not be expected to reckon with the actual behaviour of the other road users will the imposition of liability be precluded (Verbintenissen uit de wet en Schadevergoeding [-Hartlief] no. 157 p. 142; Jansen loc. cit. no. 175 p. 1830-1850).

13. In the NORDIC Countries, force majeure is not a generally recognised defence within strict liability, and it plays only a minor role in defining the scope of that liability (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 177; Hellner, in: In memoriam Jean Limpens, 53, 59; cf. Rodhe, Obligationsrätt, 540; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 149; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 215 ; Sandvik, JFT 1998, 544, 550). Force majeure is explicitly provided for as a defence only in legislation which has its origin in international conventions (such as strict liability for nuclear installations, maritime and railway traffic). Conversely, it is not expected that the courts will accept the defence of force majeure in the context of environmental liability (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit.; Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 339, 342; Sandvik loc. cit.). The general question is raised whether and in what manner the concept of adequate causation could apply in the strict liability context; a thorny issue here would be that the issue does not depend on (or not essentially on) probability and foreseeability of the relevant harm (Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 105). At any rate, it is required that the risk, at which the strict liability provision is directed, materalises (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 176; Andersson loc. cit. 396; Saxén loc. cit. 216). As regards strict liability regimes which have their basis solely in judge-made law (and not in statute), the courts tend to consider the entry of extraordinary circumstances as nullifying liability (e.g. Swedish HD 16 October 1997, NJA 1997, 684 [Flooding, after very heavy rainfall, forced a dam to burst]; Swedish HD 10 March 1983, NJA 1983, 209 [force majeure explicitly accepted in a quasi-contractual context]; Danish HD 18 August 1983, UfR 1983, 866 and 2 September 1983, UfR 1983, 895 [broken water pipes; no strict liability for "unforeseeable" damage]; Danish HD 12 February 1987, UfR 1987, 258 [flooding of a sewage installation caused by extraordinary amounts of rainfall; no defective construction of the pipe systems]); see further Hornslet, UfR 1987 B, 288-291; von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 160 and Sandvik, loc. cit. 556.

14. Under ENGLISH law there is no defence of act of God against strict liability under the Animals Act 1971: Clerk and Lindsell (-Dugdale/Jones), Torts[19], paras. 22-10 and 22-15.

Section 4: Contractual exclusion and restriction of liability

VI.–5:401: Contractual exclusion and restriction of liability

(1) Liability for causing legally relevant damage intentionally cannot be excluded or restricted.

(2) Liability for causing legally relevant damage as a result of a profound failure to take such care as is manifestly required in the circumstances cannot be excluded or restricted:

(a) in respect of personal injury (including fatal injury); or

(b) if the exclusion or restriction is otherwise illegal or contrary to good faith and fair dealing.

(3) Liability for damage for the causation of which a person is accountable under VI.–3:204 (Accountability for damage caused by defective products) cannot be restricted or excluded.

(4) Other liability under this Book can be excluded or restricted unless statute provides otherwise.

COMMENTS

A. Exclusion and restriction of liability

Pre-emptive exclusion of liability. This Article relates exclusively to the validity of a pre-emptive exclusion or restriction of liability. It is not concerned with agreements on liability after the event giving rise to the damage. Once liability arises, any agreed absolution from that liability is a transaction relating to an existing debt. That is not an 'exclusion' of liability. Ex post facto agreements as to liability are therefore subject to no special restrictions; nobody is obliged to exercise a right (apart from cases where a person is bound in some such capacity as a guardian to make a claim on behalf of a ward.)

Exclusion and restriction of liability. The Article covers both contractual arrangements for the complete exclusion of possible subsequent liability and arrangements under which the materialisation of such liability is made dependent on certain circumstances (e.g. no liability in cases of slight negligence) or its level restricted. Included are all agreements which put the subsequently injured person in a worse position than if there were no rules on non-contractual liability.

Implied exclusion of liability. An exclusion or reduction of liability does not have to be expressly agreed upon. A contract with this effect can come into existence implicitly.

> Illustration 1
> Where help is provided out of courtesy in rescuing a lorry which is stuck, an implied exclusion of liability for slight negligence is to be inferred in all events where the rescue is risky due to the surrounding local conditions and available aids.

Contractual exclusions. Agreements as to liability require a valid contract between the injuring person and the injured person. This in turn is subject to the general rules, particularly the provisions on concluding a contract, and the invoking of standard terms and their validity. In a range of cases, the restriction of liability by contractual terms is already struck at under II.–9:411 (Terms which are presumed to be unfair in contracts between a business and a consumer) paragraph (1)(a). These provisions remain unaffected by VI.–5:401, see VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (c).

Unilaterally imparted information. Unilaterally imparted items of information do not constitute agreements restricting or excluding liability within the meaning of this Article. Their significance for the law on liability lies in other fields. So, for example, a remark by the provider of information that "no liability is accepted" for the accuracy of the information imparted can lead to the recipient of the information having no reasonable ground to rely on the accuracy of the communication within the meaning of VI.–2:207 (Loss upon reliance on incorrect advice or information) paragraph (1); see Illustration 2 under that Article. Often the very wording of unilaterally provided items of information does not contain a statement as to liability, but rather draws attention to a particular source of danger ("During snowfall and icy weather, this path will not be cleared", or "Beware of biting dog"). Then, depending on the circumstances, it may have to be decided whether the information justifies the inference that there was no negligence, that the piece of land was not in an unsafe state or that overwhelming contributory fault is to be ascribed to the injured person because that person proceeded, without good reason, into a situation known to be dangerous.

Freedom of contract. The Article stems from the principle of freedom of contract. This allows the parties to set precautionary stipulations in relation to non-contractual liability possibly arising between them in the future. Paragraph (4) reflects this principle.

Basis. The rationale behind the extension of the principle of freedom of contract to non-contractual liability is not self-evident. Under these model rules it follows primarily from the principle of free concurrence of contractual and non-contractual claims ('cumul des responsabilités'), which is set out in VI.–1:103 (Scope of application). Even at the level of the law governing the exclusion and restriction of liability, this demands a greater synchronisation of the two regimes than would be necessary had these model rules proceeded on the basis of the opposing principle of mutual exclusivity of contractual and non-contractual liability ('non-cumul des responsabilités').

> Where a person leaves a suit at the cleaners and it is returned damaged, (where there is negligence as to its cleaning) there isn't only a claim for damages for non-performance of a contractual obligation, but also a claim for damages under the law on non-contractual liability. Where and in so far as it is possible in such cases to limit the contractual liability to a pre-agreed multiple of the amount to be paid for cleaning a suit, it must also be possible to come to a corresponding agreement for parallel liability under this Book; the agreement to restrict liability would be pointless otherwise.

Exceptions. However, no Member State's legal order (nor Community Law) handles the law on the exclusion and restriction of non-contractual liability without having a large number of exceptions to the principle of freedom of contract. After long and controversial discussion, VI.–5:401 strives for a middle ground, which (as with the law on liability without negligence or intention, above; see VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage)) partially operates with references to the respectively applicable national law. The principles are as follows. (i) An exclusion or restriction of non-contractual liability for damage should generally not be permitted if it relates to the intentional causation of legally relevant damage of any type. (ii) An exclusion or restriction of liability should likewise not be permitted if it relates to grossly negligent causation of legally relevant damage and if either the latter consists of personal injury or, where other types of legally relevant damage occur, the exclusion would be illegal or immoral. (iii) Producers' liability for damage caused by a defective product under VI.–3:204 (Accountability for damage caused by defective products) cannot be excluded or restricted. (iv) Although, in all other cases, the general principle of freedom of contract prevails, it remains subject to statutory limitations in the applicable national law. In this way paragraph (4) provides room for certain "isolated solutions" to regional and precisely defined sectors of the law on liability. Conversely, paragraph (2)(b) contains a special rule applicable only to damage caused by gross negligence and to this extent grants the law of contract precedence over the law on non-contractual liability.

B. No exclusion of liability for damage caused intentionally (paragraph (1))

Policy considerations. Paragraph (1) contains a rule which is widely regarded as axiomatic: agreements waiving liability in the case of future intentional damage are essentially the prototype for an immoral contract, since this boils down to rendering oneself defenceless against another. Agreements with such content are invalid, regardless of the type of damage.

Employers' liability. Paragraph (1) does not rule out the situation in which an employer excludes or restricts liability for eventual intentional wrongs on the part of personnel, e.g. for thefts. If contained in standard terms, however, usually such an exclusion or restriction of liability will fail under the fairness test and, in relation to physical injury already falls under II.–9:411(1)(a) (Terms which are presumed to be unfair in contracts between a business and a consumer).

Line of demarcation with consent and acting at own risk. The impossibility of contracting out of subsequent liability for the intentional infliction of damage does not affect the defences of consent and acting at own risk (see VI.–5:101 (Consent and acting at own risk)). The difference lies in the fact that consent relates to a concrete event and acting at own risk pertains to an occurrence which by its nature is foreseen, while the exclusion of liability for intentionally caused damage would include acts that do not remain within the context of something agreed in advance between the injuring person and the injured person.

C. Exclusion of liability in cases of gross negligence (paragraph (2))

Personal injury (sub-paragraph (a)). In accordance with the position adopted in an overwhelming number of European legal systems, and in line with the policy of placing a high value on protecting body and health, paragraph (2)(a) rules out the exclusion of liability for personal injuries caused by gross negligence. In any event, the rule only has significance for individual agreements; in standard terms between businesses and consumers, every term in a contract is presumed to be unfair if it "excludes or limits the liability of a business for death or personal injury caused to a consumer through an act or omission of that business", see II.–9:411 (Terms which are presumed to be unfair in contracts between a business and a consumer). Both rules ensure that the rights of dependants and (in the case of fatal injuries) the surviving dependants are immune from a contractual exclusion of liability.

"Gross negligence". Paragraph (2) does not explicitly invoke the concept of "gross negligence" as such. Instead it provides an immediate definition: gross negligence consists of a profound failure to take such care as is manifestly required in the circumstances.

Other types of legally relevant damage (sub-paragraph (b)). Where damage of another type is at issue (e.g. damage to property), an exclusion of liability for causing such damage through gross negligence is invalid where it is illegal or offends against the precepts of good faith. Hence, paragraph (2)(b) is linked to the rules in II.–7:301 and in II.–7:302 (Infringement of fundamental principles or mandatory rules) and refers to the rules of the applicable contract law. An exclusion of liability for property damage caused by gross negligence is thus impossible where the national applicable national law stands in opposition to it, e.g. because the law governing the exclusion of liability deals with intention and gross negligence in principle in the same way. Alongside this, VI.–5:401(2)(b) is based on whether, under the circumstances of each individual case, it is to be deemed an offence against the principle of good faith for a personally grossly negligent injuring person to invoke an equivalent contractual exclusion of liability. An implied waiver of liability is to be denied without exception in cases of gross negligence. A contractual exclusion of liability is in any case contrary to good faith even where the injuring person is reasonably insured against the risk of liability for causing damage through gross negligence.

D. Product liability (paragraph (3))

No contractual exclusion of liability. Paragraph (3) adopts the corresponding rule of the product liability directive (Directive 85/374/EEC, art. 12). A contractual exclusion of liability for negligently caused damage to commercial property remains possible. This is not addressed by VI.–3:204(1) (Accountability for damage caused by defective products).

E. Paragraph (4)

Exclusion of liability in cases of ordinary liability in negligence. Paragraph (4) expresses the principle that a pre-emptive exclusion or restriction of liability is possible in all remaining cases. What is essentially involved here is the exclusion of liability in cases of ordinary negligence and the exclusion or restriction of liability without intention or negligence. In turn, II.–9:411 (Terms which are presumed to be unfair in contracts between a business and a consumer) is to be observed here. Liability for damage to body and health caused by slight negligence is also immune from being contractually excluded in standard terms. Of course, the same does not apply to liability without intention or negligence. This is because II.–9:411 requires an "act or omission" on the part of the business and this is lacking in the cases covered by Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence). Where a person is liable without having "done something wrong", that person is liable for neither a positive act nor an omission; but is liable regardless of conduct.

Unless contrary to statute. Also under paragraph (4), an exclusion or restriction of liability is invalid where such a contractual stipulation contradicts the applicable national law. Thus, these model rules leave room for regional statutory rules for individual fields of activity, e.g. for the prohibition of the contractual exclusion or restriction of vehicle owners' liability or for a prohibition of the contractual exclusion or restriction of liability for certain professional groups that are subject to the duty to take out indemnity insurance and have arranged such insurance. In the Member States there is such a large spectrum of such "isolated solutions" specific to certain activities, for which various insurance practices and duties provide the basis, that it did not seem possible to reduce them all to a general concrete principle. An example of paragraph (4) from Community Law is to be found in Council Directive 2004/113/EC of 13 December 2004 implementing the principle of equal treatment between men and women in the access to and supply of goods (OJ L 373/37 of 21 December 2004) art. 8(2), which provides: "Member States shall introduce into their national legal systems such measures as are necessary to ensure real and effective compensation or reparation … for the loss and damage sustained by a person injured as a result of discrimination within the meaning of this Directive, in a way which is dissuasive and proportionate to the damage suffered. The fixing of a prior upper limit shall not restrict such compensation or reparation."

NOTES

1. FRENCH jurispridence regards contractual agreements which attempt to exclude liability for torts committed in the future as null and void. The same holds true for agreements which do not impinge on the grounds of liability but solely affect the ambit of liability (immutable line of jurisprudence since Cass.civ. 17 February 1955, JCP 1955, II, 8951, note Rodière). Extra contractual liability constitutes an d'ordre public. Conversely, an agreement which impinges on the contractual partner's respective rights and obligations following the onset of damage is valid (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2004/2005], nos. 1054-1058).

2. In contrast to France, in BELGIUM, the view is adopted that an injured party is capable of agreeing to a waiver of the (potential) damaging party's liability both prior to and following the onset of damage. This result is possible owing to the fact that the rules on tort liability are neither mandatory nor constitute an d'ordre public (Cass. 4 January 1993, Pas. belge 1993, I, no. 1 p. 1; Cass. 15 February 1993, Pas. belge 1993, I, no. 92 p. 171). In general, an "aquilianische Befreiungsklausel" is therefore effective. It is only ruled out in the case of causing intentional damage and where the law expressly provides that a waiver of liability is deemed to be ineffective (Vandenberghe/Van Quickenborne/Wynant/Debaene, TPR 2000, 1551, 1702, no. 45). The (at a later stage) injured party is required to, at the very least, have impliedly consented to the waiver of liability (CA Antwerp 16 January 1996, RW 1995-1996, 1417).

3. In SPAIN, it is a contentious issue whether prospective tort liability can be excluded or resticted by contractual agreement. Prevailing academic opinion refutes this suggestion (Lacruz and Rivero, Elementos II(2)[4], 515; Cavanillas Múgica and Tapia Fernández, La concurrencia de responsabilidad contractual y extracontractual, 56-57; Santos Briz, La responsabilidad civil I[7], 37-38; Álvarez Lata, Cláusulas restrictivas de responsabilidad civil, 108). Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 370, currently adopts a converse approach, and justifying it, inter alia, by adverting to CC art. 1255 which guarantees freedom of contract within the boundaries of the law and public morals. Similarly, however, this author is of the opinion that the constitutional protection afforded to basic fundamental rights also features among the legal boundaries in CC art. 1255 and the aforementioned author derives the following from this state of affairs, namely, that, for example, a hospital cannot hope to restrict or exclude liability for medical negligence by contract means (Yzquierdo Tolsada loc. cit. 346). According to law, liability for intentional acts cannot be premptively restricted (CC art. 1102). Occasionally, intention is equated with gross negligence (TS 2 July 1992, RAJ 1992 (4) no. 6502 p. 8492), on ocassion, it is not (TS 25 April 1984, RAJ 1984 (1) no. 1969 p. 1501). ConsProtA art. 86(2) classifies clauses which purport to exclude or restrict liability of professionals for personal injury as an abuse of law. Such contractual provisions are null and void (ConsProtA art. 83(1)). As far as we can tell, the Supreme Court has only dealt with the issue of contractual waivers of extra contractual liability on two occasions. TS 4 July 1953, RAJ 1953 (1) no. 2017 p. 1305 held that a contractual stipulation of a railway company was against public policy and therefore void, which sought to exclude the liability of the railway for passenger's death. Conversly, TS 5 March 1992, RAJ 1992 (2) no. 2390 p. 3232 deemed valid an arrangement between a bank and an employee, who had embezzled money from the bank, which had the means of making amends as its focus.

4. According to ITALIAN CC art. 1229(1), contracts are null and void which purport to restrict or exclude in advance the liability of the debtor for intention or gross negligence. According to CFI Rome 11 July 1979, Giur.it. 1980, I, 2, 611, this also pertains to waivers of tort liability. It is debatable whether liability for "normal" or ordinary negligence can be contractually modified. This proposition is mostly refuted on the grounds that extra-contractual liability belongs to the realm of the ordre public (Alpa, Trattato di diritto civile IV, 346-348; Visintini and Cabella-Pisu, L'inadempimento delle obbligazioni IX(1)[2], 289-290); naturally, there are strong views in literature and (older) jurisprudence which favour the validity of such arrangements (Bianca, Diritto civile V, 66; Cass. 3 July 1968, no. 2240, Giust.civ. 1968, I, 1121). Ponzanelli, Le clausole di esonero della responsabilità civile, 204 regards a clause disclaiming liability as possible for property damage but conversly deems it unacceptable in the context of personal injury. Of course, disclaimers of liability are ineffective which infringe an express statutory provision. An example would be product liability.

5. HUNGARIAN CC § 342(1) states that contracts are void which attempt to restrict or exclude tort liability for intentional or grossly negligent infliction of damage. The same applies for causing death, bodily injury, injury to health and for consequences of a criminal act. CC § 314(1) is worded in practically the same manner and regulates contract law. During the debate on reform, a proposal was made to repeal CC § 342(1), on the grounds that the provision is systemically out of place and is expendible (Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 82-85), but the proposal is not adopted in the current draft.

6. Similarly, pursuant to BULGARIAN LOA art. 94(1), it is possible to contractually exclude liability for damage which has not been intentionally caused or caused in a grossly negligent manner; however, it is also contentious whether this regulations governs tort liability as well as contractual liability (refuting this e.g. Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast, 343 and Kojucharov, Obligazionno pravo I, 261; of a differnt view and supporting this approach Mousseva, Dopustima li e avtonomiyata na volyata pri nepozvoleno uvrejdane spored bulgarskoto mejdunarodno chastno pravo, Suvremenno pravo, H. 6/2003 and Supreme Court 16 January 1970, decision no. 47, case no. 780/69 in criminal matters). The view that the frontiers of in LOA art. 94(1) generally include the possibility of disclaiming tortious liability is supported by reference to Consumer Protection Act art. 139, where it is provided that product liability cannot be the subject of a contractual disclaimer. The provision would otherwise be superfluous. The same conclusion can be deriven from POLISH CC art. 437 which provides that liability under arts. 435 und 436 (pertaining to dangerous activities) cannot be excluded or limited in advance.

7. In GERMANY, contractual stipulations exempting or restricting tort liability are generally permissible (BGH 28 April 1953, BGHZ 9, 301, 306; Staudinger [-Hager], BGB[13], Pref. to §§ 823 ff, no. 41; Soergel [-Spickhoff], BGB[13], Pref. to § 823, no. 99). However, liability for intentional acts cannot be restricted in advance (CC § 276(3)). Many strict liability provisions cannot be the subject of a disclaimer (e.g. Product Liability Act § 14; Liability Insurance Act § 7, Road Traffic Act § 8a; Aviation Act § 49c); additionally, a clause disclaiming liability cannot infringe public policy or be contrary to good faith (e.g. RG 24 April 1908, RGZ 68, 358, 367; CA Stuttgart 7 December 1977, NJW 1979, 2355, 2356; BGH 25 September 1952, BGHZ 7, 198, 207). According to CC § 309 no. 7 a stipulation in standard terms and conditions which purports to exclude or restrict liability for death, personal injury injury to health which was culpably inflicted and clauses which purport to exclude liability for all types of damage which was caused in a grossly negligent manner are ineffective. If general disclaimers are deemed effective, then clauses which attempt to restrict the amount of compensation due are also valid (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[67], § 276, no. 35) as well as stipulations which shorten the prescriptive period within which to bring a claim (CC § 202(1)). It is also possible for an implied restriction of liability for intention and gross negligence to be valid. However, adequate pointers must exist for an implied restriction to be effective (Staudinger [-Löwisch], BGB, § 276, no. 118; Heinrichs loc. cit. no. 37; CA Koblenz 11 October 2004, NJW-RR 2005, 1048). CA Dresden 27 June 1996, VersR 1998, 1027 held that an implied disclaimer of liability for ordinary negligence was valid in a case which involved assistence rendered gratitously in a risky attempt to salvage a LKW which had gotten stuck.

8. AUSTRIAN case law shows a tendency to qualify an exemption from liability for bodily harm in general contract terms as grossly disadvantaging the other party and therefore void even if merely liability for slight negligence is excluded (OGH 24 March 1998, SZ 71/58 p. 336). Liability for property damage, on the other hand, can be excluded in standard terms and conditions, at any rate for cases of slight negligence, and, within the framework of individual agreements in the domain of courtesy relationships, even to the extent of gross negligence, see Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 18/35 p. 558). For the remainder, it is accepted that nobody can withdraw from legal liability by means of a one-sided declaration. One-sided declarations can destroy the basis of trust and reliance, however, which in an individual case may be the basis of liability, for example with reliance on information or where the public is granted entry into certain premises, the dangerousness of which is pointed out (see also CC § 1319a which restricts liability for the unsafe state of paths and roads to gross fault).

9. In GREECE, restrictions and exclusions on liability are, in principle, permitted (Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2], 343). However, liability for intention and gross negligence cannot be excluded in advance (CC art. 332). Since the amendment CC art. 332 in 2002, every contractual disclaimer of liability is void (even in cases of slight negligence), if the injured party was a servant of the debtor or liability arises from the operation of a business which has been granted a prior concession by a relevant authority wenn der Geschädigte im Dienst des Schuldners steht oder die Haftung aus dem Betrieb eines behördlich konzessionierten Unternehmens entsteht. A contractual disclaimer of liability cannot be effected by incorporated within standard terms and conditions; moreover, in individually negotitated agreement, a disclaimer of liability be invalidated if there is an attempt to use this as a vehicle for the restriction or exclusion of liabilty for corporeal and incorporeal personality rights. Special statutes ordain that clauses excluding liability are void under product liability law or under the law pertaining to the liability of service providers (see further Stathopoulos loc.cit. 335). It is a matter of interpretation as to whether a clause disclaiming liability pertains to contractual or tortious liability; if there is any doubt, the view taken is that the exclusion of extra–contractual liability was intended (Stathopoulos loc.cit. 343; Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 255).

10. In PORTUGAL parties to a contract can in advance agree on the amount of compensation or its maximum limit (Pinto Monteiro, Cláusulas limitativas e de exclusão de responsabilidade civil, 91; STJ 25 March 2004; STJ 13 February 2001; see also the notes under VI.–6:202). CC art. 809 is intrepreted by a number of legal writers to solely govern the validity of exemption of liability for intention or gross negligence (Pessoa Jorge, BolMinJus 1978 [281] 5, 9 and 18; Pinto Monteiro loc. cit. 237; unclear STJ 9 July 1991, BolMinJus 409 [1991] 759). It is the matter of some dispute whether CC art. 809 may even be applied in the context of extra-contractual liability. Pessoa Jorge loc. cit. 22 is of the view that it may be applied, however, subject to the caveat that liability cannot be excluded in the case of personal injury and in cases which concern damage which flows from the commission of a criminal offence; such contracts are contrary to public policy. Liability for auxiliaries can generally be excluded unless these persons infringe obligations imposed by norms of public order (CC art. 808(2)). Consequently, it is even possible to exclude liabilities for intentional acts of auxilaries (Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 72 (1958) 287-289; Pessoa Jorge loc. cit. 31; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado II[3], note to art. 800; critical, on this point Pinto Monteiro loc. cit. 245, 264). Similarly, in Portugal, it is not possible to exempt liability for product liability (Decree-law 383/1989 art. 10). Such clauses are regarded as "not having been drafted".

11. In a similar fashion, DUTCH Law generally adopts the possibilty of a exempting liability by contractual means as a starting point., however, restricts it via an array of mandatory statutory provisions (e.g. CC arts. 6:192 [product liability], 7:24 und 7:6 [Purchase by consumer], 7:463 [medical assistance], 7:658(3) [liability of employers] and 7:762 [liability of construction company]). However, CC art. 7:463 does not preclude an exemption of liability pursuant to CC art. 6:109 (Onrechtmatige Daad IV [-Slabbers] chapter VI.3, note 18 p. 261; Stolker, AA 1995, 13; de Vries, AA 1995, 186-192). According to CC art. 7:508, tour operators are not permitted to exclude or restrict liability for death or personal injury of their clients. The aforementioned only applies to damage to property if this damage was caused in an intentionally or grossly careless manner (CC art. 7:509). However, it is possible to exempt liability for the intentional or grossly negligent actions of subordinates (CC art. 6:170) (HR 26 March 1920, NedJur 1920, 476 und HR 3 June 1938, NedJur 1938 no. 920 p. 1290; the reform of the law has not impinged on this state of affairs). This is only precluded in the context of standard terms and conditions (CC arts. 6:233, 6:237(f)). The acts of the directors of a company are deemed to be the acts of the legal person itself (HR 20 February 1976, NedJur 1976 no. 486 p. 1418; HR 31 December 1993, NedJur 1995 no. 389 p. 1719 und HR 12 December 1997, NedJur 1998 no. 208 p. 1086), with the result that the rules pertaining to subordinates do not apply. Mandatory tort law can also be found in ad hoc statutes e.g. in the Act concerning Liability for Oil Tankers (Wet van 11 juni 1975, tot uitvoering van het op 29 november 1969 te Brussel tot stand gekomen Internationaal Verdrag inzake de wettelijke aansprakelijkheid voor schade door verontreiniging door olie) art. 10. Disclaimers must meet the requisites of general contractual provisions, therefore, one contratual partner is not permitted to grossly disadvantage the other and disclaimers must not contravene public policy. The latter is established if there is an attempt to exclude liability for intention or gross negligence (see further Compendium Vermogensrecht volgens het nieuwe BW [-Hartkamp] note 274a pp. 266-267).

12. ESTONIAN LOA § 1051(2) corresponds to VI.–5:401(1). While there is no provision that equates to VI.–5:401(2), the same result is frequently achieved by resorting to contractual legal norms which govern the nullity of contracts which contravene law or public policy. VI.–5:401(3) corresponds to LOA § 1067. The regulation in VI.–5:401(4) is derived from the general principles on freedom of contract.

13. SWEDISH Damages Liability Act chap. 1 § 1 and FINNISH Damages Liability Act chap. 1 § 1 expressly provide that the following provisions of that Act only apply in the event that nothing else has been contractually agreed. On the other hand, DANISH EAL § 27 provides that the parties are not generally permitted to deviate from the statute; thus contractual arrangements providing for such a scenario are generally ineffective. However, by means of this regulation, contractual stipulations providing for an exemption of liability are generally not prohibited because the statute only governs the consequences of liability and not the foundation of liability (Møller and Wiisbye, Erstatningsansvarsloven[6], 585). The Nordic countries generally adhere to the principle of free concurrence of claims. However, contractual restrictions on liability also operate in the realm of extra-contractual liability unless they are solely designed to govern contractual liability (then extra-contractual liability remains untouched and this plays a significant role especially in the context of occupational liability Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 95; Gomard, Forholdet mellem erstatningsregler i og uden for kontraktsforhold, 40; id. Obligationsret II, 143; Ulfbeck, Kontrakters relativitet, 94; Langsted, Rådgivning I, 153; Hakulinen, Obligationsrätt, 230). Consumer protection law aside, contractual and tortuous exemptions from liability run parallel to each other: liability that can be effectively excluded under contract law, can also be exempted under tort law (Kleineman, JT 2001-02, 625, 634). It is not possible to exempt liability for intention or gross negligence, at any rate, in the contextof personal injuries (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 91; Danish Eastern CA 22 November 2002, UfR 2003, 500; Hakulinen loc. cit. 231). Further, it is not possible to exclude the liability of an employer, if this hast he effect of extending the personal liability of an employee (Danish EAL § 27; Finnish Damages Liability Act chap. 7 § 1; Swedish Contracts Act § 36); therefore, employer's liability can be regarded as a category where it is not possible to exempt future liability. On the other hand, liability for damage by to intellectual property rights by products can be validly exempted or restricted (Ulfbeck, Professionsansvar og produktansvar, 171, 198). An important area for disclaimers of liability is pure economic loss which results from incorrect advice or incorrect information (HD 14 October 1987, NJA 1987, 692; HD 19 December 2001, NJA 2001, 878; Kleineman loc. cit. 625-635).

Section 5: Loss within VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death)

VI.–5:501: Extension of defences against the injured person to third persons

A defence which may be asserted against a person's right of reparation in respect of that person's personal injury or, if death had not occurred, could have been asserted, may also be asserted against a person suffering loss within VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death).

COMMENTS

Aim. This Article contains the rule that every defence which is available to the injuring person against the directly injured person, may also be asserted against the latter's dependants or surviving dependants (VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death)). This corresponds to a consideration of justice that is widely acknowledged in Europe: where the injured person could not have brought a personal claim, or at any rate must bear a reduction of its extent, the same applies to the detriment of persons who derive rights from the injury or death of that person.

Examples. The Article pertains to every defence in this Chapter. Third party claims are e.g. excluded where the injured person validly consents to treatment or had participated in a team sport having accepted the risks. They are likewise ruled out where the person directly affected has been killed or injured in an emergency situation requiring self-defence or had validly agreed to a contractual exclusion of liability. Even contributory fault is not an exception. Where the injured person is ascribed half of the fault for the mishap, the claims of family members and surviving dependants are reduced to 50% of the amount of damages to which they are otherwise entitled.

NOTES

1. According to FRENCH law, a person will be partly relieved of liability, if it can be established that fault on the part of the victim contributed to the cause of the damage. This is a valid proposition when the primary victim seeks compensation and also if a secondary victim asserts a claim for damages for the death or injury of another and in this manner seeks to enforce his or her own claim for damages. The subject matter of the secondary victim's claim is different to that of the primary victim (this remains the case even if the secondary victim is the primary victim's successor in title); however, both claims arise from the same set of facts (Cass.ass.plén. 19 June 1981, D. 1981. I, 641, note Larroumet; D. 1982, Jur. 85, concl. Cabannes, note Chabas; JCP 1982, II, 19712, rapport Ponsard; GazPal 1981, II, 529, note Boré; RTD civ 1981, 857, obs. Durry). The same rule applies in BELGIUM (and also in the context of Gardien liability: Cass. 30 September 2004, Pas. belge 2004, I, no. 444 p. 1437) and in SPAIN (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Pantaleón Prieto], Código Civil II[2], art. 1902 p. 1998; TS 18 July 2006, BDA RJ 2006/4952; TS 8 July 2005, RAJ 2005 (7) no. 9577 p. 20268 [reduction of the damages awarded to the widow of the deceased because of his contributory fault in the accident which occurred in a bullfighting festivity]). In the event that the contributory fault of the injured or deceased primary victim completely overshadows that of the defendant, then his dependants' claim for compensation is consequently excluded (TS 26 May 2006, RAJ 2006 (3) no. 3786 p. 8795).

2. If a person is killed or injured and the actor relies on a ground of justification, then the *antigiuridicit*à is excluded also in respect of the claim asserted by the secondary victim; therefore, in a similar fashion, the latter is not entitled to assert a claim for compensation under ITALIAN law (Navarretta, Diritti inviolabili e risarcimento del danno, 210; Gozzi, Der Anspruch iure proprio auf Ersatz des Nichtvermögensschadens wegen der Tötung eines nahen Angehörigen in Deutschland und Italien, 134-135). The same holds true with respect to contributory negligence of the de cuius. It results in a reduction in the ambit of the claims of close relatives (CC arts. 2056 and 1227; Cass. 25 July 1957, no. 3143, Rep.Foro it. 1957, voce Resp. civ. no. 308; Cass. 20 March 1959, no. 849, Giur.it. 1959, I, 966). The jurispriudence of the Corte di Cassazione leaves no room for doubt that contributory negligence on the part of the primary victim can work to the disadvantage of dependants if they wish to assert a claim iure proprio. The reduction in the claim is a consequence of the primary victim's conduct (Cass. 18 February 1971, no. 430, Rep.Giur.it. 1971, voce Resp. civ. no. 117 and no. 311; Cass. 29 September 1995, no. 10271, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, 1689; Cass. 6 October 1999, no. 11137, Giust.civ.Mass. 1999, 2079; Gozzi loc. cit. 153-154).

3. HUNGARY does not have an express statutory provision which corresponds to VI.–5:401. As far as we can tell, the subject matter of the latter has not been considered further. However, the general norms concerning the legal effect of grounds of defence permit the conclusion to be drawn that the general legal position does not deviate from that contained in VI.–5:401. In BULGARIA, it is recognised that the secondary victim can also avail of grounds of defence that are at the disposal of a primary victim. According to the rules governing assignment, this also applies if the claim of the injured party passes to its insurer (Decree no. 7 of the Supreme Court of 4 October 1978). This corresponds to the current legal position in ROMANIA (Adam, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, 260; Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 88).

4. Where a plaintiff seeks to assert their own claim for damages for loss caused owing to the death of another under CC §§ 844 und 845, under GERMAN CC § 846, the contributory fault of the deceased person will operate to reduce the plaintiff's claim for compensation. The same holds true in the case of an operational risk which contributed to the cause of the damage (CC § 254 applied with appropriate adapations). Similarly, in so-called nervous shock cases, the contributory fault of the injured primary victim will be imputed to the secondary victim who has suffered psychiatric injury. This can be adduced from CC § 242 (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[67], § 254, no. 57; Erman [-Kuckuk], BGB I[11], § 254, no. 82; BGH 11 May 1971, NJW 1971, 1883, 1885). The foregoing equates to the legal position in AUSTRIA (loss of maintenance: EKHG § 7(2); Koziol, JBl 1997, 207; damages for grief and nervous shock: OGH 23 September 2004, ecolex 2005, 112).

5. In PORTUGAL, while there is no express statutory provision on this issue, case law does set forth that the defences which may be asserted against a person's right of reparation may also be asserted by a third person who suffers a loss subsequent to another's personal injury or death. If the primary victim's contributory fault prevails, then, consequently, the secondary victim has no claim for compensation (STJ 19 October 2004), and this is even the case if the primary victim is a child (STJ 28 January 1992, BolMinJus 413 [1992] 554; STJ 21 June 1994; CA Oporto 5 April 2001). Of course, the primary victim's wrongdoing must have, at the very least, contributed to cause the accident; if this prerequisite is not met, then a reduction of the extent of the claim will not take place (STJ 17 October 2006; STJ 11 January 2007).

6. DUTCH CC art. 6:107(2) makes clear that a tortfeasor can avail of the very same defences in action against a secondary victim as would have been available in a personal injury action initiated by a primary victim. CC art. 6:108(3) contains the same regulation for accidents which result in death. CC art. 6:184(2) echoes these principles in connection with the reparation for measures adopted to avert or reduce the damage. ESTONIAN Law also does not feature an express regulation governing this matter, however, an implicit rule can be derived from the internal logic of the law on liability which is in force there. A person who does not act in an illegal manner towards the primary victim must therefore also be capable of asserting the same grounds of justification in the action initiated by the secondary victim.

7. According to SWEDISH Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 1, a claim for compenstion for personal injury as a result of contributory fault may only be reduced in extent if the injured party contributed either intentionally or in a grossly negligent manner to the cause of his injury; this ground of defence may not be exerted against third parties (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 227). A different approach is only adopted in the case of a suicide, however, it should be noted that even this exception is subject to restrictions imposed on equitable grounds (HD 14 October 1981, NJA 1981, 920; see Dufwa, Flera skadeståndsskyldiga, nos. 4354-4355; and Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 226). While Sweden genereally rejects “principle of identification” on the basis of victim protection, the law in DENMARK corresponds to that which is governed by VI.–5:501 (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 376; HD 6 October 1958, UfR 1958, 1119), and this is also true for the law governing road traffic accidents (Traffic Act § 101(2), see HD 15 November 2002, UfR 2003, 339 [gross contributory fault of a mother who was killed in an accident, led to a reduction of the claims of her children to the same extent as her claim would have been reduced had she been had lived]; Western CA 9 June 1993, UfR 1993, 785 and HD 29 October 1999, UfR 2000, 197). In FINNISH legal writing, there are calls for restraint when dealing with the principle of identification (Saxén, Tillägg till Skadeståndsrätt, 407). There is, however, no basis in law for this assertion and the courts have not hesitated to reduce the claims of surviving dependants on the basis that the deceased played a major contributory role in the cause of the accident (Supreme Court 25 June 1980, KKO 1980 II 72; Supreme Court 23 April 1998, KKO 1998:46).

CHAPTER 6: REMEDIES

Section 1: Reparation in general

VI.–6:101: Aim and forms of reparation

(1) Reparation is to reinstate the person suffering the legally relevant damage in the position that person would have been in had the legally relevant damage not occurred.

(2) Reparation may be in money (compensation) or otherwise, as is most appropriate, having regard to the kind and extent of damage suffered and all the other circumstances of the case.

(3) Where a tangible object is damaged, compensation equal to its depreciation of value is to be awarded instead of the cost of its repair if the cost of repair unreasonably exceeds the depreciation of value. This rule applies to animals only if appropriate, having regard to the purpose for which the animal was kept.

(4) As an alternative to reinstatement under paragraph (1), but only where this is reasonable, reparation may take the form of recovery from the person accountable for the causation of the legally relevant damage of any advantage obtained by the latter in connection with causing the damage.

COMMENTS

A. Chapter six in overview

Reparation, compensation, prevention. This Chapter deals with the legal consequences of non-contractual liability. Section 1 provides rules for all forms of reparation. Section 2 provides special rules for the monetary reparation of damage ("compensation"). Section 3 addresses issues of damage prevention. Claims for the costs incurred in the prevention of imminent damage also fall under this Section. Section 1 applies in principle (i.e. as far as possible with due regard to the nature of the thing) to all remedies, Section 2 only to monetary damages, and Section 3 solely to the preventive protection of rights.

Overlap between reparation and prevention. In certain special cases there can be an overlap between reparation and prevention. Here the injured person can choose which of these remedies to claim.

> Illustration 1
> A man has sexually abused a minor for two years. Then he has the portrait of the boy tattooed on his chest. The boy claims the removal of the tattoo, which is a constant affront to his personal dignity. This claim is as much a claim in damages (VI.–6:101(1) and (2)) as a claim under VI.–1:102 (Prevention) in conjunction with VI.–6:301 (Right to prevention).

Relationship to Chapter 2. This Chapter applies only where the claimant has suffered legally relevant damage or where such damage is imminent. Chapter 2 states what legally relevant damage is. This Chapter is concerned with the liable person's obligation to provide compensation for causing such damage. The answers to such questions as what is meant by "loss" are therefore to be found not in this Chapter, but in Chapter 2 (see e.g. VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (4), VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss) paragraphs (1) and (2), and VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons)).

Substantive law, not procedural law. This Chapter deals exclusively with questions of substantive law. Matters relating primarily to procedure or enforcement are beyond the scope of application of these model rules (I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(h)). Rules on the assessment of damages are regarded for this purpose as being of a procedural nature, as are such questions as whether and to what extent appellate courts may review decisions taken by courts of first instance charged with establishing the facts.

B. The Article in overview

Aim and forms of reparation. The Article relates to the aim and forms of reparation. Paragraph (1) expresses the general principle that a person who is obliged to make reparation must reinstate the situation which would have existed if the event giving rise to liability had not occurred. This general principle applies to the type as well as the extent of compensation. The question of how the damage is to be made good is answered by paragraph (2), which states that reparation must be made in a manner that best befits the type and measure of damage in the circumstances of the case. Paragraph (3) provides special rules on the amount of compensation payable where things are harmed and animals injured. Finally, paragraph (4) opens up the possibility of claiming the profit gained from the wrongful activity, instead of restoration of the previous situation.

C. Restoration of the previous situation (paragraph (1))

The principle of restitution in kind. The injuring event should be "undone" as far as possible by the obligation to provide damages. Therefore, in principle the injuring person has to restore the situation which would have existed had the harm not been occasioned. This is the principle of restitution or restoration in kind. How the original situation is restored is another question. It can be done in various ways. The injuring person can perform the necessary work, or commission a third party to do so or pay the injured person money, so that the latter can eliminate the damage, either personally or in turn through a third party commissioned to do so. Where the injured person undertakes the removal of the damage personally or has it done by another, the claim in damages is for the costs incurred.

Restitution in kind and full restitution. Restitution in kind indeed means restoration of the situation that would have existed were it not for the injuring event, but not necessarily restoration through the injuring person's personal work or through the work of someone who is commissioned to do so. Damages in the form of the payment of money (compensation) can also be restitution in kind or be in furtherance of it. In this case the principle of restitution in kind has the task of contributing towards concretising the amount of money falling due. It is subject to the principle of full restitution: in the case of compensation the amount of money which is necessary for the complete elimination of the damage falls due, no less, but also no more.

> Illustration 2
> A is the owner of items of clothing specified for sale. B soils the goods. They can be cleaned; however, after they are cleaned, they are no longer suitable to be sold as new. The payment of cleaning costs does not provide total restitution for the damage; the overall loss in value is what is in fact to be compensated.

Illustration 3

The wooden floorboards in a house are damaged. It proves to be impossible to even partially repair them; the entire flooring must be re-laid. The owner must incur a "new for old" deduction; without such a deduction, the laying of completely new flooring would lead to an unjustified enrichment on the part of the injured person, in that it would exceed the target for full restitution.

No punitive damages. The punishment of wrongdoers is a question for criminal law, not private law. Under these model rules, punitive damages are not available. They are not consistent with the principle of restitution in kind or with that of full restitution.

D. Damages in money or by other means (paragraph (2))

General. Paragraph (2) concerns the question how reparation is to be made. The answer is: in money ("compensation") unless another form of reparation ("reparation in kind") is better suited to the nature and extent of the damage. While paragraph (2) does not expressly give normative precedence over other forms of reparation to monetary compensation, the provision of damages is still, purely "statistically", the most reasonable form of reparation. In cases of injuries to body and health - apart from minor wounds occurring in everyday life - every other type of reparation, practically without exception, is inapplicable and in cases of property damage or loss of property of another kind (e.g. as a consequence of false information) things are no different.

Reparation not in money. There are of course cases in which only a claim for reparation in kind (i.e. not in money) can carry into effect the basic principle formulated in paragraph (1). The claim in damages against a thief, for instance, is first and foremost directed at the return of the thing; if this were different, the practical result under the law on damages would be to aid and abet an obligatory sale of property. The main field of application of reparation in kind is without doubt the law on infringements of incorporeal personality rights. The retraction of a statement about another is a common example, but not the only one. Moreover such a retraction is often not sufficient to make good the damage. Paragraph (2) can therefore also justify the right to demand the publication by the injuring person of a corrective judicial decision in the same manner as the incriminating comments were published.

Forms of reparation not mutually exclusive. Damages are not necessarily always to be performed either exclusively in the form of a payment of money or in the form of reparation in kind; it may be that the damage suffered can only be completely removed by the payment of money and a certain de facto act.

A construction company causes damage to the claimant's house and removes the damage using its own people. That does not change anything with regard to its obligation to pay the cost of renting a replacement apartment, into which the claimant must move until the repair work is finished.

E. Economic total loss (paragraph (3))

An exception to paragraph (1). It follows from paragraph (1) that the entire damage is to be compensated; as stated, the principle of full restitution applies. Where a thing is harmed and the necessary expense of repairing it exceeds its value, the question arises of what "full restitution" means in such a case. Under paragraph (1) it is arguable that it does not depend on the value but on the amount of the repair costs. This is because the protection of property rights also means that the integrity of concrete assets is protected and their restoration is only possible by the (albeit costly) repair of the damaged thing. In many situations, however, that would lead to the result that an unreasonable burden is placed on the liable person. Consequently, paragraph (3) limits the extent of reparation in accordance with the majority of the Member States' legal systems. Where the repair costs are disproportionately high in relation to the loss in value of the thing, compensation is restricted to the loss in value. It is not possible to give a single answer to the question of when the repair costs will exceed the loss in value in an unreasonable fashion. In the normal case, especially cases of vehicle damage, a scale of 30% may serve as a guideline, but that is nothing more than a general figure. Where things not only have a material value, but also a non-material value to the owner for understandable reasons, increased repair expenses may also be reasonable.

Animals. The second sentence of paragraph (3) provides an exception for animals, according to the purpose for which they are kept. Where normal production animals are at issue (e.g. a farmer's cows) the reparation falling due remains limited to their market value (plus a marginal amount in excess of that for veterinary treatment, as the case may be); in the case of domestic animals kept by families, such a limit does not correspond to the legally protected interest of the owner.

F. Recovery of profit instead of compensation of loss (paragraph (4))

Siphoning-off of profits. Not being concerned with reinstatement, paragraph (4) provides another exception to paragraph (1). It involves infusing into the law on damages the principle that the profits made from a civil wrong should not be retained by the wrongdoer.

Systematical issues. Paragraph (4) clarifies two systematical issues. The recovery of profits has not been assigned to the law on benevolent intervention in another's affairs nor solely to the law on unjustified enrichment. The law of benevolent intervention in these model rules is confined to genuine and justified intervention in and conducting of another's affairs (see V.–1:101 (Scope of application)).

Relationship to the law of unjustified enrichment. Paragraph (4) bears a very close resemblance to the situations that are the subject-matter of VII.–4:101 (Instances of attribution) sub-paragraph (c) in the Book on unjustified enrichment. That rule pertains to enrichments as a result of the interference with another's rights and interests, i.e. enrichments through actions, which usually constitute a civil wrong as well. VII.–4:101(c) indeed goes beyond the law on non-contractual liability to the extent that it denies a bona fide person the advantages of exploiting another's goods and interests and deems such a person liable to surrender the fruits even where and so far as the entitled party did not want to exploit the goods or interests personally and thus suffered no loss (or damage). Notwithstanding that, paragraph (4) seemed indispensable because although this provision has an unjustified enrichment "varnish", it is solely concerned with following the intrinsic logic of the law on non-contractual liability for damage caused to another. Potential wrongdoers are warned that there is no profit to be made from a civil wrong. Furthermore, paragraph (4) is intended to ease the burdens on the courts, sparing them from carrying out another, separate unjustified enrichment test in addition to the one under this branch of the law. In many cases the law of unjustified enrichment and the law on non-contractual liability through their separate means of reasoning will reach the same or at least similar results. This is because the cases dealt with here will usually concern people acting in bad faith and they will not only be liable under the law of unjustified enrichment for the fruits of the exploited benefit but will also not typically have the defence of disenrichment (VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment) paragraph (2)(b)). To the extent that the wrongdoer satisfies the claim under paragraph (4) of the present Article, concurrent liability under the law of unjustified enrichment is then extinguished (VII.–7:102 (Concurrent obligations) paragraph (1)(b)).

Commercial trademark rights and copyright. Paragraph (4) is of particular significance in the law governing the infringement of incorporeal personal interests worthy of legal protection. Under the law on liability for commercial trademark rights and copyright, the claim to recovery of profits has been particularly moulded by a range of special laws (see e.g. Directive 2004/48/EC of 29 April 2004 on the enforcement of intellectual property rights art. 13(1)(a)); the same is true for the law against unfair competition. These provisions are not affected by VI.–6:101(4); as long as they conclusively govern the subject-matter they enjoy precedence of application over the general law on non-contractual liability (VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) paragraphs (d) and (c)).

Right of choice. Paragraph (4) provides the injured person with a right to choose between a claim to reparation of the actual loss occasioned and a claim to the recovery of the injuring person's profit, i.e. another method of quantifying the claim to reparation due to the detriment suffered. The claim to recovery of the injuring person's profit proceeds from the fiction that the injured person would have been able to exploit the relevant rights in the same way and with more or less the same economic success as the injuring person. Only where such a fiction is entirely inappropriate in the circumstances of the case can the court reject the exercise of the right of choice as abusive.

NOTES

I. Nature and Extent of the Compensation

1. According to FRENCH law, a claim for reparation of damage caused by a faute civile enjoys constitutional protection (Conseil constitutionnel 22 October 1982, D. 1983 jur. 189, note Luchaire; le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2006/2007], no. 2438). The responsabilité civile is directed at restoring the victim in as far as possible to the same position as s/he would have been in, had the damaging event had not occured (Cass.civ. 7 December 1978, Bull.civ. 1978, II, no. 269 p. 207). The victim should not be enriched nor be burdened with a loss (Cass.civ. 23 January 2003, Bull.civ. 2003, II, no. 20 p. 16: ni perte ni profit). The reparation can take the form of a réparation en nature (unwavering jurisprudence since Cass.req. 6 December 1869, D. 1871, I, 56) or réparation par équivalent. By means of réparation en nature, the status quo ante is restored; the réparation par équivalent is achieved by the payment of a sum of money. Réparation en nature is of particular importance in the context of physical damage to property; conversely, the latter principle is not applicable in the context of personal injury and is only exceptionally granted in the case of a dommage morale (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[11], no. 385 p. 411). The duty imposed on the damaging party in respect of the payment of the victim's costs incurred while attempting to rectify the damage is regarded as a particular manifestation of the réparation en nature (Cass.civ. 19 November 1975, RTD civ 1976, 550, note Durry; see further le Tourneau loc. cit. no. 2447). As a general rule, réparation en nature is not only granted when the wrongdoer himself performs the necessary work but is also available if s/he pays or must pay for its performance by another (Cass.civ. 9 July 1981, GazPal 1982, jur., 109, note Chabas). The decision on whether compensation is to be made on the basis of réparation en nature or réparation par equivalent is generally taken by the court of first instance at their discretion (Cass.com. 5 December 1989, Bull.civ. 1989, IV, no. 307 p. 207). However, the Court of Cassation supervises the exercise of this discretion on the following point, striving to ensure that the cost of repairing a thing does not exceed the cost of its replacement (Cass.civ. 7 December 1978, Bull.civ. 1978, II, no. 269 p. 207). Only when its replacement is impossible, then, exceptionally, the cost of repairs greatly exceeding the value of the thing may be awarded (CFI Créteil 26 May 1981, JCP éd. G 1982, 19745, note Chabas).

2. Similarly, in BELGIUM, the prevailing maxim holds that purpose of reparation is to restore the injured party to the position that s/he would have been in, had the damage not occurred (Cass. 13 April 1995, Pas. belge 1995, I, no. 201, p. 423). The victim has a claim for reparation of the entire damage, not more and not less (van Gerven [-Covemaeker], Verbintenissenrecht II^{2}, 456). Similar to the position adopted in France, a distinction is drawn between herstel/réparation en nature and vergoeding/réparation en équivalent, namely, between the actual restoration of the status quo ante and its monetary equivalent (Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 33 p. 64). The injured party can request restitution in kind, if this is feasible and the redress sought does not amount to an abuse of law (Cass. 26 June 1980, Pas. belge 1980, I, 1341). A commonly used example is the return of a stolen article (Cass. 8 May 1952, Pas. belge 1952, I, 570). The reparation awarded for repairing a damaged good may not exceed the market value of that good (Cass. 23 October 1986, RW 1986-87, 54). Réparation en équivalent is always owed if restitution in kind is impossible; it falls to the court to decide on the amount of reparation and it decides this matter by reference to the concrete circumstances of the case at hand and, if necessary, ex aequo et bono (Covemaeker loc. cit. 457-458). If the injured party took it upon himself to rectify the damage because he was legally or contractually obliged to do so, then no claim for reparation can be made on the grounds that either the aforementioned obligation broke the chain of causation (so Cass. 28 April 1978, RW 1978-79, 1695, note Dumon [the city of Antwerp was not able to claim the costs of salvaging a sunken ship from the person who caused the ships to collide because the city was statutorily bound to undertake a salvage operation] and Cass. 26 September 1979, Pas. belge 1981, I, 119) or the assumption is justified that there was no legally relevant damage (according to more recent jurisprudence which rejected the claims of the State to continued payment of wages and social security contributions where a civil servant was injured: Cass. 19 February 2001, Pas. belge 2001, I, no. 97 p. 322, no. 98 p. 327, no. 99 p. 329 and no. 100 p. 332 as well as Cass. 20 February 2001, Pas. belge 2001, I, no. 101 p. 334). To conclude, restitution in kind is also a feature of LUXEMBOURGIAN law (CFI Luxemburg 27 March 1954, Pas. luxemb. 16 [1954-1956] 181).

3. Similarly, under SPANISH law, a distinction is drawn between compensation in money (indemnización) and restitution in kind; the latter is described in the following terms, namely restitución, resarcimiento or indemnización en forma específica, occasionally, it is also designated as reparación en especie or reparación in natura (Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 477; Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II^{9}, 559; Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños^{3}, 181; Carrasco Perera, Aranzadi Civil 1996, II, 51-68). Restitution in kind is the basic rule; indemnización is the exception to the rule and is utilised in cases where restitution in kind is not possible (Albaladejo [-Santos Briz], Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales XXIV, art. 1902, p. 188; Lete del Río, Derecho de obligaciones II^{3}, 211; Lacruz and Rivero, Elementos II(2), 512; Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Instituciones de Derecho Civil I, 837). This can be deduced from CC art. 1096 and from CP art. 110. CP art. 110 provides, however, for three ways of reparation: (i) restitution; (ii) reparation in kind, and (iii) compensation of economic and non-economic losses. Reparation in kind also plays an important role within the scope of protection of incorporeal personality rights, see Law on Civil Protection of the Rights to Honour, to Private Life and to one´s own Image art. 9(2) (which e.g. lists the publication of a judgment as a possible form of compensation) and Ley Orgánica 2/1984, of 26 March 1984, reguladora del derecho de rectificación (which allows any natural or legal person to obtain the correction of any information which is inaccurate and potentially harmful). A claim for monetary compensation is, however, not precluded by these other means of making reparation (Salvador Coderch [-Martín Casals], El mercado de las ideas, 383-384). In comparative terms, the Spanish courts frequently order the remedy of the publication of the judgment (e.g. TS 25 January 2002, RAJ 2002 (1) no. 31 p. 51). The choice between the various types of redress is controlled by the courts (TS 22 October 1932, RAJ 1932-33 (1) no. 1245 p. 526; TS 24 March 1952, RAJ 1952 no. 1209 p. 862; TS 3 March 1978, RAJ 1978 (1) no. 954 p. 829; Lacruz and Rivero loc. cit. 513; Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[8], 181). In the context of physical damage to property, restitution in kind (performed by the injured party or paid by him/her) or *resarcimiento por equivalente (compensation for lost value)*. The latter is then the sole form of reparation if restoration of the status quo ante is impossible or unreasonably expensive (Lacruz and Rivero loc. cit. 553; Lasarte, Principios de Derecho Civil II(2), 432; Yzquierdo Tolsada loc. cit. 478; Roca i Trias loc. cit. 181). The property owner is not obliged to choose the alternative that would have the least impact on the damaging party's pocket (Albaladejo (-Carrasco Perera), Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales XV(1), art. 1106, p. 669). In the absence of an application to the contrary, the courts favour restitution in kind (Luna Yerga, InDret 2/2002; CA Badajoz 2 March 1998, AC 1998 (1) no. 406 p. 584; CA Álava 12 September 1996, AC 1996 (3) no. 2482 p. 1326; CA Badajoz 3 September 1996, AC 1996 (2) no. 1512 p. 1083). This corresponds to the regulation contained in CP art. 111(1)(i). Whether the current market price of a vehicle constitutes the the upper limit of repair costs that can be recovered is contentious (of this view TS 30 October 1997, RAJ 1997 (5) no. 8563 p. 13711 and CA Pontevedra 21 July 2006, BDA JUR 2006/216508; rejecting this approach, TS 3 March 1978, RAJ 1978 (1) no. 759 p. 671; TS 9 July 1987, RAJ 1987 (3) no. 5213 p. 4973; CA Cantabria 5 November 1993, BDA AC 1993/2307; CA Baleares 10 October 2006, BDA JUR 2006/278350 and many others). A number of courts do not take the current market value as a benchmark, instead they look to the value in the use of the car (valor de uso oder valor de reposición), which connotes approximately 20 to 30% of the current market value of the car before the accident occurred (CA Huesca 11 January 1994, BDA Civil 1994/39; CA Asturias 1 December 1994, BDA Civil 1994/2129) (even 50% CA Cuenca 18 September 1997, BDA Civil 1997/1794; CA Cáceres 31 March 1997, BDA Civil 1997/502; CA Badajoz 25 February 1998, AC 1998 (1) no. 142, p. 216). Frequently, a deduction "new for old" (deducción nuevo por viejo) is made (CA Asturias 9 January 1998, BDA Civil 1998/2967; CA Cantabria 1 March 1999, AC 1999 (1) no. 656 p. 917).

4. In ITALY, compensation (risarcimento del danno) is achieved through the payment of a sum of money (risarcimento per equivalente) or restitution in kind (riparazione oder risarcimento in forma specifica; reintegrazione in forma specifica; risarcimento in natura). The injured party can request that s/he be restored to the position that s/he would have been in had the event giving rise to liability not occurred, provided and insofar as this is possible (CC art. 2058). The court can however order compensation by payment of a monetary sum if reinstating the status quo ante would prove to be an unreasonable burden for the debtor. Risarcimento in forma specifica does not only comprise oft he reinstatment of the creditor's earlier position but is also extant when the debtor pays the sum of money necessary to reinstate the status quo ante (di Majo, La tutela civile dei diritti III[4], 269; de Cupis, Il danno II[2], 307). Nonetheless, teh creditor is not obliged to apply this sum to restore his earlier position (de Cupis loc. cit. 337). According to judicial pronouncements, the distinction between risarcimento in forma specifica und risarcimento per equivalente lies in the fact that, in the first category, the extent of the reparation is assessed on the basis of the costs of restoring the status quo ante, in the second case, it is assessed on the basis of the loss of value suffered (Cass. 3 July 1997, no. 5993, Giust.civ.Mass. 1997, fasc. 1128; Cass. 4 March 1998, no. 2402, Giur.it. 1999, 255; critical, on this point, Castronovo, La nuova responsabilità civile[3], 824). A very controversial issue is whether the costs of repair may exceed the market value of the damaged property. In the opinion of many commentators, the market value always represents the upper limit of the recoverable damage (e.g. Castronovo loc. cit. 828; Salvi, Il danno extracontrattuale, 40; Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, 1126). The deduction "new for old" will take place, if the repair has the effect of increasing the value of the property (Cass. 4 March 1983, no. 1636, Giust.civ.Mass. 1983, fasc. 3). Generally, the injured party may choose to opt for either risarcimento in forma specifica or risarcimento per equivalente (Cass. 25 July 1997, no. 6985, Giust.civ.Mass. 1997, 1280). If no particular application is filed, then compensation per equivalente will be awarded. Of course, an order of risarcimento in forma specifica does not preclude a claim of compensation per equivalente for the period of time that the damaged good (Cass. 20 August 1981, no. 4958, Giust.civ.Mass. 1981, fasc. 8). In the context of personal injury of a permanent character, the courts may award compensation in the form of an annuity (CC art. 2057).

5. HUNGARIAN CC § 355(1) provides that a person who is liable for causing loss must restore the status quo ante. Only when this is impossible or for cogent reasons, is not desired by the injured party, will there be an award of compensation for economic and non-economic loss. Compensation is awarded for the depreciation in value accruing to the injured party's patrimony, economic benefits foregone as well as costs necessary to reduce or eliminate the economic and non-economic losses sustained (CC § 355(4)) The civil law in ROMANIA adopts the principle of integral reparation as its point of departure (CC arts. 998, 1073, 1084). The entire damage that flows from the injury is recoverable. Reparation can take the form of payment of a sum of money or may lie in the performance of an act, such as by publishing or making a public apology or even doing both of these. The primary form of compensation is restitution in kind. The return of a dispossessed item and the repair of a damaged thing serve as illustrations; if it is unclear whether they are still in existence, then, the courts may alternatively award damages to the extent of its value (Adam, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, 273-275; Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 247-248). Conversly, in the context of personal injury, restitution in kind is not possible. Here, monetary compensation is awarded.

6. The distinction between restoring the status quo ante and monetary compensation is also a familiar one to BULGARIAN law (Kojucharov, Obligazionno pravo I, 286). While it is true to state that the basic principle that the injured party should be restored to the position that he would have found himself in, had the damaging event not occured is only codified in the contractual law provisions of LOA art. 79(2), according to the view of some legal writers, this principle can be applied analogously in the tort law context (Antonov, Nepozvoleno uvrejdane, 193; Kojucharov loc. cit. 287). In a similar fashion, under tort law restitution in kind has precedence over monetary compensation; in respect of the latter, the injuring party does not come under any obligation, provided and to the extent that restitution in kind is possible. The analogous application of LOA art. 79(2) in the realm of tort law is rejected by Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast, 392 and Supreme Court 27 September 1955, decision no. 1787, civil case no. 5611/55. Kalaydjiev was of the opinion that restitution in kind was not possible within the frameworkl of extra-contractual liability. The Supreme Court held that the injuring party was not obliged to procure a thing of the same type and quality as the damaged item, nor did h/she obliged to repair it. The following should not be regarded as a form of compensation, namely, if the injuring party, following the accident, e.g attends to the needs of the injured party by, e.g., delivering the latter's belongings from the scene of the accident to the hospital of to the injured party's place of residence (Supreme Court 25 March 1972, decision no. 786, civil case no. 5/72). Pursuant to SLOVENIAN LOA art. 164(1), while the principle of resitution in kind does indeed prevail, the creditor can, however, always seek monetary compensation unless important grounds would necessitate a different result (LOA art. 164(4)). Additionally, only monetary compensation may be claimed if restitution in natura is impossible or, in the discretion of the court, is deemed inequitable (LOA art. 164(3)). Restitution in kind is, for the most part, impossible in the context of non-pecuniary loss (see LOA art. 178). The correction of a false portrayal in the media constitutes an exception to this general rule (Media Act art. 26). Restitution in kind can be deemed inequitable, e.g if the costs of repair exceed the current market value of a damaged vehicle (Juhart and Plavšak [-Plavšak], Obligacijski zakonik I, art. 164 p. 926).

7. Similarly, GERMAN law draws a distinction between restitution in kind and compensation. The modalities of restitution in kind are described in CC § 249. The first sentence concerns restoring the situation that would have existed, had the event giving rise to liability not occurred. In the context of personal injuries or damage to property, the second sentence confers a right on the creditor to claim "monetary compensation in lieu of restitution in kind". CC § 251 governs compensation; the focus is placed on safeguarding the value of the claimant's assets (Medicus, Schuldrecht I[17], no. 589). Priority is generally accorded to restitution in kind (CC § 251(1)): the person with a duty to make reparation is only obliged to pay compensation, provided that and insofar as restitution in kind is impossible or deemed to be inadequate to compensate the creditor. Moreover, CC § 251(2)(i) permits the debtor to pay monetary compensation if restitition in kind is only possible with disproportionate expenditure (with respect to animals, CC § 251(2)(ii) postulates an exception to the general rule which corresponds to 6:101(3)(ii)). The "disproportionality" of the expenditure is usually assessed by comparing the costs of restoring the orginal position – occasionally employing a deduction "new for old" (BGH 8 December 1987, NJW 1988, 1835) – and the monetary compensation due under CC § 251. In the context of damage to motor vehicles, the courts have developed the following rule, namely that the costs of repair cannot exceed the replacement value of the vehicle by more than 30% (BGH 15 October 1991, NJW 1992, 305; BGH 17 March 1992, NJW 1992, 1618; BGH 15 February 2005, NJW 2005, 1108, 1109). Other ceilings may apply in the context of other things (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[67], § 251, no. 7). Together with costs of repair, replacing the thing damaged with a thing of the same value is also a form of restitution in kind (BT-Drucks. 14/7752, 13, 23; BGH 23 March 1976, BGHZ 66, 239, 247; BGH 15 October 1991, BGHZ 115, 364, 368; BGH 15 October 1991, BGHZ 115, 375, 378; BGH 20 June 1972, NJW 1972, 1800, 1801; BGH 4 March 1976, NJW 1976, 1202, 1203; BGH 6 April 1993, NJW 1993, 1849, 1850; BGH 7 June 2005, NJW 2005, 2541, 2542). The damaging party is permitted to elect the most favourable form of redress (BGH 7 June 2005, NJW 2005, 2541, 2542). The injured party who decides to carry out the repairs himself upon may claim the higher costs of repair as estimated by an expert to the extent that those costs do not exceed the value of its replacement (BGH 29 April 2004, JR 2004, 23).

8. According to AUSTRIAN CC § 1323 (first sentence), the injuring party is obliged to do "everything in his power to restore the status quo ante or, if this is not possible, it is incumbant upon him to reimburse the estimated value of damaged good". Therefore, priority is given to reparation in kind: monetary compensation is a subsidiary claim (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 9/1). Generally speaking, the same holds true for other obligations to pay compensation which are contained in other statutes, extraneous to the Civil Code. However, a number of these (including the Insurance Contracts Act which is of significant practical relevance) expressly exclude restitution in kind. Restitution in kind denotes reinstating a situation which is similar to and on a par with that in existence before the damaging event occured (OGH 26 February 2002, 1 Ob 15/02s; OGH 14 October 2003, SZ 2003/119 p. 293). Restitution in natura is understood to connote not only reparation by the damaging party itself but is also understood to mean that a commensurate sum of money may be paid to a third party who is capable of reinstating the s*tatus quo ante*. In the context of property damage, the procurement of a thing which is commensurate to and is of equal value to the damaged thing constitutes restitution in kind (Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Danzl] ABGB[2], § 1323 no. 4). With respect to payments of money, the basis for calculating the expenditure necessary to cover the cost of repairs is not, as distinct to monetary compensation, the deterioration in value resulting from the damage to property. A claim for restitution in kind can be made if, "an economically minded person who had to bear the costs of the damage himself, would have also incurred such expenditure" (OGH 18 April 2003, JBl 2004, 657). If the costs of repair only negligibly exceed the market value of the thing, then, repairing the item can be considered justifiable from an economic point of view (OGH 9 July 1974, ZVR 1975/79 p. 116; Danzl loc. cit. 7). Fixed percentage rates are not endorsed; rather, it will depend on the individual circumstances of the case at hand (Koziol loc. cit. no. 9/19). Nonetheless, a tendency to draw the line at around 10% of the eclipsed market value can be observed (Danzl loc. cit. no. 7, Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI[3], § 1323 no. 43). If it is only possible to partially recompense the damage caused by means of restitution in kind, then the remainder of the damage is compensated in money; restitution in kind and monetary compensation can coexist (Koziol loc. cit. no. 9/1). A person is liable to pay monetary compensation if reinstating the status quo ante proves to be factually impossible or economically unviable (OGH 25 November 2004, 6 Ob 139/04s; OGH 25 January 1978, SZ 51/7 p. 24). The leading example in this area is socalled total loss, whereby the costs of repair considerably exceed the market value (Danzl loc. cit. no. 7). In this case, the difference between the market value of the damaged property and the projected value in its undamaged state is recoverable (Danzl loc. cit. no. 8). As a general rule, the injured party may claim compensation if the injuring party defaults in the performance of his obligations under the restitution in natura head (OGH 18 November 1964, SZ 37/165 p. 471). CC § 1323a is applicable in respect of animals. According to this provision, the actual costs incurred in treating the animal are also recoverable if those costs would exceed the cost of the animal, subject to the condition that a reasonable animal keeper would have also incurred these costs. Punitive damages are not recognised under Austrian law (Harrer loc. cit. Pref. to §§ 1293 ff, no. 4).

9. GREECE distinguishes between restitution in kind and monetary compensation (Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 158). Monetary compensation is the basic rule (CC art. 297 first sentence; see ErmAK [-Litzeropoulos], art. 297, no. 2; Georgiades loc.cit.); the courts only award restitution in kind if the particular circumstances of the case render its award justifiable (CC art. 297 second sentence). In this respect, the Code refers to the "restoration of the status quo ante". For this requirement to be met, it is sufficient that an approximately equivalent situation is restored, e.g. this could be achieved by repair or procuring a similar type of thing or paying the costs of medical care directly to the hospital (Balis, Enochikon Dikaion, Geniko meros[3], 124; Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2], 77). Restitution in kind connotes that the injuring party is required to bring about an actual result (Stathopoulos loc.cit.). CA Athens 97/1965, NoB 13 (1965) 502 opined that a claim for repair costs was a form of restitution in kind (therefore, not tantamount to compensation), on the grounds that the sum of money served to effect an actual result. If repairing the damaged property would lead to unreasonably high costs, then the injured party is only obliged to make reparation to the extent of the costs of replacement (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[2], 267).

10. Pursuant to PORTUGUESE CC art. 562(1) it is incumbant upon the injuring party to restore the (hypothtical) position that would have existed had the damging event not occured (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 905; STJ 23 October 2003; STJ 18 September 2003), it contains therefore, the princípio da reposição or princípio da reconstituição natural (Antunes Varela loc. cit. 904; STJ 9 December 2004, CJ (ST) XII (2004-3) 137). In conjunction with the reconstituição natural, forms of reparation also envisaged comprise of (in CC art. 566) monetary compensation or (in CC art. 567) compensation in the form of an annuity. Restitution in kind is accorded priority (CC art. 562); compensation is always constituted in money, if restitution in kind is impossible, further, if this remedy will not serve to completely rectify the damage caused or if it would result in the debtor being unreasonably burdened (CC art. 566(1)). There is no right of election between forms of redress; the forms of reparation are determined by the court. In the case that property is destroyed, lost or damaged, the injuring party is required to procure property of the same quality (or similar in all essential points: CA Oporto 16 December 1997, BolMinJus 472 [1998] 564) or to carry out repairs at his or her own cost; in the context of personal injuries, he is liable for the necessary medical treatment costs and nursing expenses (Antunes Varela loc. cit.) and in the context of infringements of the right of honour, there may be publication of the judgment (Vasconcelos Abreu, A violação de direitos pela comunicação social, 472). Frequently, restitution in kind will not suffice to completely remedy the damage caused, e.g it may cover only the costs of repairing a vehicle, however, it does not encompass the loss of use, or only covers medical costs but does not embrace compensation for pain suffered (Antunes Varela loc. cit. 905; Abrantes Geraldes, Temas da responsabilidade civil I[2], 95-113 [with a summary of cases on deprivation of use]). The assessment of compensation principally addresses the interesse, namely, the difference between the existing state of affairs and the situation prevailing before the event generating liability occurred (CC art. 562(2); Antunes Varela loc. cit. 907); this includes compensation for losses due to inflation (CA Évora 19 February 1987, CJ XII (1987-1) 308; CA Lisbon 21 February 1985, CJ X (1985-1) 69). This difference is assessed according to the principle of replacement value, in the event that restitution in kind would be "excessively burdensome" for the debtor (CC art. 566(1); STJ 7 July 1999, CJ (ST) VII (1999-3) 16). The leading example concerns the extent of expenditure necessary to repair an older car model. CA Évora 12 February 1987, CJ XII (1987-1) 300 refused to award the costs of repairing a used car which, following an accident, was rendered practically worthless, on the grounds that such an award would represent economic folly as the repair costs would have been twice as high as the value of the car prior to the accident. However, this does not entail that the courts will never award the costs of repairing an older car; because a small award of compensation for lost value can entail that the injured party will not be able to afford a suitable mode of transport any more (STJ 7 July 1999, CJ (ST) VII (1999-3) 16; STJ 29 April 2003, CJ (ST) XXVIII (2003-2) 28). Whether restitution in kind would be "excessively burdensome" for the injured party depends on an assessment of the individual circumstances of the case. This can also connote that, in the event that a pet is injured, that the injuring party must pay the veterinary costs of treating the animal, even if those costs considerably exceed the value of the animal (Pessoa Jorge, Ensaio sobre os pressupostos da responsabilidade civil, 422)

11. The point of departure of DUTCH CC art. 6:103 is indeed the general principle that the notion of compensation connotes the payment of a sum of money, however, a caveat is added to this provision which provides that upon application by the injured party the courts may award another form of reparation; if this decision is not complied with timeously, then the injured party again acquires the right to claim monetary compensation. A grant of compensation which takes a different form to that of the payment of money includes an order to render actual performance as well as an order to render a legal act (see further Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 411 p. 331; Spier, Schadevergoeding: algemeen, deel III, no. 22 p. 44-45). ESTONIAN LOA § 127(1) tallies with VI.–6:101(1). The basic rule provides that compensation takes the form of a monetary payment and namely, in a lump sum (LOA § 136(1)). Other forms of reparation are not expressly excluded (LOA § 136(5)). There is no special provision concerning animals.

12. SWEDISH statute law almost exclusively concentrates on monetary compensation (e.g. Damages Liability Act ch. 5 § 7 no. 1: Reparation in the context of property damage). A distinction is drawn between the cost of replacement and the costs of repair; the injuring party is generally liable for the lowest amount in each case. However, in the context of injury to domestic animals and damage to things possessing special qualities (e.g. a rare car), the courts will consider conferring a right of election on the injured party (Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 488); at any rate, in the context of cases dealing with pets, an analysis of case law shows that the courts have accepted that treatment costs which exceed the market value of the animal can be claimed (HD 22 February 2001, NJA 2001, 65 I-II; similarly, for DENMARK Eastern CA 14 September 1981, UfR 1981, 1074). Awarding compensation which takes another form to that of a monetary payment plays a relatively ancillary role. It can be encountered e.g. clothed in the garb of restitution claims in property law (Karlgren, Skadeståndsrätt[5], 194, 206) and in the area of protection of the right to honour. In this context, the most important example pertains to the award of costs in respect of the publication of judgments in one or more newspapers (Damages Liability Act ch. 5 § 6). Moreover, FINNISH Damages Liability Act ch. 5 clearly postulates that monetary compensation denotes the normal rule. A statutory exception to this rule can be found in CP ch. 27 § 7, which provides that person who violates the right to honour, and this infringement amounts to a criminal offence, an order granting publication of the judgment may be granted. This corresponds to the position in DENMARK (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 348 bzw. CP § 273(2)). In the context of total loss, the amount of monetary compensation is generally directed at the cost of replacing the thing to its state immediately before the damaging event occurred (Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 321; Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 420; Swedish HD 7 May 1991, NJA 1991, 269; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 247; see also Swedish Insurance Contracts Act ch. 6 §§ 1-2 and Danish Insurance Contracts Act § 37). If replacement is precluded, then the assessment hinges on the market value of the thing. In the case of partial damage, two methods are used. If considerable damage is caused, this is governed by the net realisable value method, whereby the compensation awarded is the difference between the market value and the residual value of the damaged object (Hellner and Johansson loc. cit. 423; Swedish HD 7 April 1971, NJA 1971, 126; Bengtsson and Strömbäck loc. cit. 324; von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 249). In contrast, if the damage is minor, the actual costs of repair provide the basis for calculation, provided that this method is more favourable for the injuring party when compared to the net realisable value method (Danish Eastern CA 14 September 1981 loc. cit.); the reduced market value of a vehicle damaged in an accident is still recoverable (Hellner and Johansson loc. cit.; Danish Western CA 9 May 1972, UfR 1972, 809 and 23 April 1997, UfR 1997, 969). The same holds true for loss of value to land which ocurred after a neighbour mistakenly allowed six mature trees to be felled onto the land (Danish Western CA 12 September 1994, FED 1994, 995). Conversely, in the context of repairs which have the effect of increasing the value of the thing, a deduction "old for new" is carried out (Swedish HD 16 March 1955, NJA 1955, 89 II; von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 249; Vinding Kruse loc. cit. 350).

II. The injuring party's gains as a basis for recovery

13. In principle, "profit-erasing" is not recognised by FRENCH or BELGIAN liability law. The profits which a wrongdoer has generated by way of his wrong may be taken into account when the courts come to assessing the extent of an award of compensation to which a victim who has sufferred dommage moral is entitled, cf. e.g. CA Paris of 4 January 1988, D. 1989 somm. 92, note Amson (unlawful publication of private nude images of a woman who subsequently became famous). Some see in this developement a gateway ushering in the notion of punitive damages (Carval, La responsabilité civile dans sa fonction de peine privée, no. 29 p. 31).

14. SPAIN has a number of special statutes which expressly provide that, upon application by the claimant, the measure of compensation may be assessed on the basis of the enrichment obtained by injuring party's from his wrong (inter alia Copyright Act art. 140, Trade Marks Act art. 43; Patents Act art. 66; Law 1/1982 of 5 May 1982 on Civil Protection of the Right to Protection of Honour, Intimate sphere and Right to One's Own Image art. 9(3) and (4)). Moreover, it is important to note that Spain regulates the relationship between law on delict and law on unjustified enrichment in a different manner to France. This is of major significance if the prescription period for making a claim pursuant to CC art. 1902 has expired; given that the limitation period for a claim under unjustified enrichment is fifteen years (TS 5 October 1985, RAJ 1985 (3) no. 4840 p. 4085). It is also relevant where the benefit acquired by the wrongdoer through the commission of a tort is greater than the loss that the victim sustains. In such cases, it can turn out to be more favourable for the victim to assert a claim under unjustified enrichment, directed at erasing the profits of the wrongdoer (Álvarez-Caperochipi, El enriquecimiento sin causa[3], 119). For years, the Tribunal Supremo has repeatedly confirmed that both claims subsist independently from each other, i.e. the claim under delict and the unjustified enrichment claim. The tort law claim requires a culpable wrongful act in contradistinction to the prerequisite of a successful unjustified enrichment claim which requires an increase to the estate of the defendant, without a legal basis and at the claimant's expense, but no more (TS 12 April 1955, RAJ 1955 (2) no. 1125 p. 602; TS 5 May 1964, RAJ 1964 no. 2208 p. 1380). In conjunction with the foregoing, Spanish legal writers, influenced by German legal doctrine refer to a Eingriffskondiktion or condictio por intromisión (Díez-Picazo, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 116). A tortfeasor is not only obliged to make reparation for the damage caused but is also obliged to compensate for the value of the increase which has accrued to his assets, in particular in the cases dealing with the use of another's property and the exploitation of another's intellectual property. With respect to cases dealing with the exploitation of another's reputation and for all other cases concerning infringements of another's personality rights, a presumption relating to the presence of damage is contained in Law 1/1982 of 5 May 1982 pertaining to the Civil legal protection of the right to honour, a sphere of intimacy art. 9(4). Consequently, it is only necessary to prove an unlawful infringement of these rights. Additionally, in the context of the calculation of the measure of compensation, the courts take account of an enrichment which the infringer has obtained from the commission of a tort (loc. cit. art. 9(3)). In this way, the claim for non-pecuniary damages and the restitution claim indivisibly merge together to emerge in the delta of one single claim. Moreover, the extremely wide margin of discretion conferred by Spanish law on the courts of first instance in the field of the assessment of compensation is of practical importance (Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 173; Carrasco Perera, ADC 1987, II, 149). Incidentially, an attempt has been made to base a general tort law doctrine which would be directed at erasing the enrichment obtained on the theory of the bilateralisation of loss profits (bilateralización de lucro cesante), whereby a loss of profits tends to connote the same to the injured party as profits which are actually obtained by the wrongdoer (Bercovitz [-Carrasco Perera], Comentarios a Ley de propiedad intelectual, 1796). Similarly, TS 11 July 2006, BDA RJ 2006/4977 could be explained on this basis.

15. According to ITALIAN CC art. 2042, while an unjustified enrichment claim is subsidiary to a claim initiated under tort law, frequently, this provision does not clearly provide an adequate answer to solve the problem of concurrence of tort law and unjustified enrichment actions. At any rate, jurisprudence and academic teaching lean towards permitting the injured party to assert a claim, directed at erasing the unlawful profits which the wrongdoer has obtained (Sacco, L'arricchimento ottenuto mediante fatto ingiusto, passim). This primarily impinges on dispositions of another's property, which are then effective against the holder of the right (Trimarchi, L'arricchimento senza causa, 55; Sacco loc. cit. 99; Gallo, Arricchimento senza causa e quasi contratti 44; Cian andTrabucchi, Commentario breve[8], note X under art. 1153), and breaches of incorporeal personality rights of another (CFI Monza 26 March 1990, Foro it. 1991, I, 2862) and intellectual property right infringements (Intellectual Property Code art. 125). Within this framework, when calculating the reparation due, account is taken of all the circumstances of the individual case, including the benefits that the injuring party has obtained. In addition, reparation for loss of profits which is a feature of the total sum awarded, may not fall below the sum which the infringer would have had to pay for a licence permitting him to use the right (loc. cit. art. 125(2)). Of course, the general civil law basis for claiming the profits which the injuring party has obtained from his wrongdoing remains contentious, some commentators contend that this claim is not anchored in tort law, rather, that it is tantamount to an unjustified enrichment claim, which, because tort law does not recognise such claims, therefore, does not fall foul of the principle of subsidiary (see further de Cupis, Il danno II[3], 16; Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, 665-666; Castronovo, La nuova responsabilità civile[3], 648-654).

16. HUNGARIAN tort law does not contain a rule comparable to that contained in VI.–6:101(4). However, a number of statutes governing the protection of intellectual property and copyright confer a right on the holder of a right to claim back the advantage which the injuring party acquired through the commission of the infringement (Act no. XXXIII/1995 on Protection of Inventions by Patents §35(2)(e); Law no. XI/1997 on Protection of Trademark and Geographical Indications § 27(2)(e); Act no. LXXVI/1999 on Copyright § 94(1)(e)). Unjustified enrichment claims which are aimed at restituting profits are also taken into account in the context of using another's property for economic gain (BH 2005/143: publishing unauthorised photos of a house with an architecturally interesting roof; redress conceivable under CC § 361(1), as an exploitation of the owner's right of use and right to fruits, but awarded on the facts under the Copyright Act which protected the roof's design). In the context of a breach of incorporeal personality rights, the courts determine the extent of compensation for non-pecuniary loss according to a discretion which is exercised according to the equitable precepts; it cannot be affirmatively stated that the profits garnered by the infringer are taken account of when it comes to assessing compensation. In addition, decisions on the unlawful appropriation of the reputation of another in an advertisement do not express an opinion on this point (BH 2002/261; BH 1995/509). Legal commentary on the reform of the Hungarian Civil Code tend to leave resolution of the problematic issue of disgorgement of profits to the law on unjustified enrichment out of concern that it would otherwise not be possible to keep out the notion of punitive damages from tort law (Vékás, FS Boytha György, 331, 351-355; Vékás [-Vékás], Szakértői Javaslat az új Polgári Törvénykönyv tervezetéhez, S. 1144).

17. BULGARIAN tort law also does not recognise a claim to restitution of the enrichment obtained by the infringer. The compensation claim only embraces the compensation of the injured party's lost profits. This also applies in patent law (Patents and Registration of Useful Designs Act art. 28(1)(no.2)); in this context, however, the loss of profits is calculated on the basis of lost licence fees (Supreme Court 18 November 2004, decision no. 669, civil case no. 1907/2003). According to copyright law, the profits realised by the injuring party also constitutes a relevant basis for the assessment of compensation (Act on Copyright and similar rights art. 94(3)). A method of calculating damages which takes account of the enrichment accruing to the injuring party can also be found in ROMANIAN Copyright Act art. 139(4).

18. While GERMAN CC § 252(sent. 2) does indeed the injured party to assert a claim for recovery of lost profits, the provision fails to stipulate anything about clawing back the profits obtained by the injuring party by his wrong; the statutorily regulated damages law is also silent on this issue (MünchKomm [-Oetker], BGB[5], § 252, no. 52). In the context of intellectual property infringements or infringements of other positions protected by the law on unfair competition, the courts confer a "right of election" on the injured party. The latter can either claim the recovery of lost profits which can be postively adduced or payment of a reasonable licence fee (without having to adduce an actual loss of profits) or the recovery of the gain actually realised by the wrongdoer (BGH 2 November 2000, BGHZ 145, 366, 375; BGH 6 October 2005, NJW-RR 2006, 834, 835; BGH 27 February 2007, MittDtPatAnw 2007, 317; BGH 21 September 2007, WRP 2007, 533). In the field of copyright law, the later claim is expressly regulated in Copyright Act § 97(1)(ii). This right of election is also conferred in cases of socalled slavish imitation of products and the unlawful exploitation of trade secrets (see further Oetker loc. cit. no. 53). In the context of calculating non-pecuniary reparation for infringements of incorporeal personal rights, the injuring party's share of the profits can be taken into consideration. The general rule is that a claim for restitution of profits can only be based on a special construction of the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs which for its part, has intention as a prerequisite to any successful claim (CC § 687(2)).

19. In AUSTRIA, while the principle that a wrongdoer may not gain any profit from his wrongful action is indeed recognised, the corresponding claim of the the injured party is classified as one anchored in the law of unjustified enrichment and is not regarded as a tort law claim; the causes of action under tort law and unjustified enrichment are concurrent (Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Koziol] ABGB, § 1041 no. 4). If the victim's loss and the injuring party's gain coincide in amount, then a claim for compensation will indeed arise; if, however, there is no loss of profits, then only a claim under unjustified enrichment will arise. Thereby, every opportunity of making use of or exploiting [the asset] which the injured party has been deprived of and which has passed to the injuring party is regarded as an "enrichment" (OGH 13 July 1953, ÖBl 1953, 52; OGH 15 September 2005, SZ 2005/130 p. 181). Special statutory regulations governing the claim to restituting the profits that the injuring party has derived from his wrong are found in the Unfair Competition Act (UWG § 9) and under intellectual property law (Patents Act § 150; Trademark Protection Act § 55; Copyright Act § 87), for the rest, "profit-erasing" is governed by CC § 1041. It should be noted that the "restitution of profits" claims under competition law and intellectual property law, despite their classification as an unjustified enrichment claim, require fault on the part of the defendent (Torggler and Kucsko, GRUR Int 1980, 282, 284) and that the gravity of the injury calibrates with the legal sanctions. The current legal position is not in dispute; de lege ferenda it is proposed the profits garnered by the injured party should be recognised as a general principle of liability (Koziol, FS Bydlinski, 175, 194).

20. A claim for disgorgement of profits obtained by wrongdoing is also not a feature of PORTUGUESE tort law.

21. Pursuant to DUTCH CC art. 6:104, upon application by the injured party, the judge can calculate the damages so as to include, completely or in part, the profits wrongfully obtained by the injuring party. HR 24 December 1993, NedJur 1995 no. 421 p. 1942 held that this claim did not constitute claim to resitution of the profits, rather it connoted the exercise of a "discretionary power of the court." CC art. 6:104 is construed as a form of abstract method of calculating loss. The injuring party's gain is regarded as a good benchmark to measure the loss actually suffered. The provision's scope of application is confined to contract and tort law; it is not applicable in the context of the law on unjustified enrichment. With respect to infringements of personality rights by the media, the profit obtained are incorporated in the determination of the measure of non-pecuniary damages (Memorie van Antwoord II Inv. Parlementaire Geschiedenis, 1267; HR 4 March 1988, NedJur 1989 no. 361 p. 1236; Schadevergoeding II [-Deurvorst], art. 6:104, no. 5 p. 11 and no. 7 p. 14). Special statutory provisions which expressly provide for claims of restitution of profits, are primarily found in intellectual property law (see further Deurvorst loc. cit. no. 6 p. 12 and HR 14 April 2000, NedJur 2000 no. 489 p. 3267).

22. Similarly, ESTONIAN tort law does not contain a provision similar to VI.–6:101(4). The injured party can assert a claim against the injuring party under unjustified enrichment (see in particular LOA § 1037(1)) (see further on the relationship that exists between these two causes of action RKTKo 3-2-1-70-06 – RT III 2006, 32, 274). As a general rule, one claim excludes the other.

23. The principle expressed in VI.–6:101(4) is not generally recognised in NORDIC tort law. However, instances involving unauthorised use of another's property may be subsumed under the principle of unjustified enrichment, and compensation can be awarded regardless of the plaintiff proving a loss or negligence (Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 232; Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 421; Agell, in: Familjerätt, skadeståndsrätt och annan förmögenhetsrätt: valda skrifter, 197-239; HD 2 July 2007, NJA 2007, 519; Vinding Kruse, Restitutioner, 363; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 264; Hakulinen, Obligationsrätt, 368). Furthermore, in cases concerning someone selling another's property without authorisation, compensation corresponding to the actual sale price may be awarded regardless of the actual value (Hellner loc. cit. 241;

Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 414). Compensation for infringement of incorporeal property rights (such as trade name [firma], trademark, patent and copyright) share similar enrichment characteristics; reasonable compensation is due even for infringements made in good faith (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 421; Monsen, Berikelsekrav, 330). However, the notion of assessing damages according to the enrichment of the infringer is rather unknown to the nordic countries (Koktedgaard and Levin, Immaterialrätt[7], 454; Skovbo, Erstatning for uphavsretliga krænkelser, 238). With the implementation of Directive 2004/48/EC, the profit of the infringer is explicitly listed in SWEDEN and DENMARK in the relevant statutes as a condition to be taken into account when assessing damages (SWEDISH proposal Ds 2007:18 Civilrättsliga sanktioner på immaterialrättens område - genomförande av direktiv 2004/48/EG; DANISH Copyright Act § 83 (The FINNISH Government Bill RP 26/2006 did not consider it necessary to explicitly mention enrichment in the relevant statutory amendments). SWEDISH HD 16 November 1994, NJA 1994, 637 concerned a photo montage. A porno magazine stuck the heads of celebrities onto the heads of persons featured in the magazine who were depicted in compromising positions. When it came to the assessment of damages, the fact that the plaintiffs were in the public eye plus the fact that but the fact that "financial considerations" were the reason for the publication served to ground the unusually high award of compensation (see further Axberger, JT 1994-95, 716, 726). In DENMARK (Eastern CA 20 December 2004, UfR 2005, 1131) and FINLAND (Supreme Court 12 April 2000, HD 2000:54; Supreme Court 24 November 1997, HD 1997:185; see Sisula-Tulokas, JFT 2000, 634, 637; id., Contract and tort law: twenty cases from the Finnish Supreme Court, 121) it is possible to find quite similar decisions.

24. Directive 2004/48/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 29 April 2004 on the enforcement of intellectual property rights art. 13(1) provides that the Member States are obliged to ensure that when the courts calculate damages in respect of the culpable infringement of rights under the Directive, that account is taken of the profits that the injuring party derives from the wrong. The Member States are also permitted to provide for legal sanctions which do not depend on the commission of a fault by the injuring party (loc. cit. art. 13(2)). The ECJ has held that: "Community law does not prevent national courts from taking steps to ensure that the protection of the rights guaranteed by Community law does not entail the unjust enrichment of those who enjoy them". Case-law: Ireks-Arkady GmbH v. European Economic Community, ECJ 1 July 1981, C-238/78, ECR 1891, 1723, paragraph 14, Hans Just I/S v. Danish Ministry for Fiscal Affairs, ECJ 27 February 1980, C-68/79, ECR 1980, 501, paragraph 26; Joined Cases *Kapniki Michaïlidis AE v. VI.–6:102: De minimis rule Trivial damage is to be disregarded.

COMMENTS

Policy considerations. This Article provides that trivial damage does not lead to a claim for reparation or to a claim to preventive legal protection. The idea is that trivial damage must be accepted in highly civilised society as a socially acceptable interference not warranting reparation; and actions for damages should be prevented if they do not primarily involve making good a loss, but rather involve harming the other party through the burden of having to bear the costs of legal proceedings. The rule of leaving trivial damage without a corresponding claim to compensation can also prevent class actions or other collective actions in which ultimately it is only the lawyers who profit or the organisations to which the relevant rights to reparation have been assigned. Trivial damage remains trivial even where it is suffered by many simultaneously.

Trivial damage. On the issue of whether damage is trivial, economic considerations are not decisive, but rather the legally protected interests of those involved, the type of grounds for attribution and the other conditions of damage causation. It is not trivial where a child's old and almost economically worthless doll is destroyed or taken away, and it is also not trivial when the dog of an old lady living alone is killed; even if the amount of compensation in such a case were to be at the lowest level, it would not fall under the present Article as trivial damage. Intentionally inflicted damage can hardly ever be categorised as trivial. However, it would be trivial to complain about a medically notified and correctly carried out injection, solely because one is subsequently made aware of the fact that one had not been sufficiently briefed by the hasty nurse. The situation is of course different where a complication arises as a consequence of the injection: serious consequences of minor individual damage are not trivial. Minor inconveniences of everyday life are also socially acceptable and thus trivial: a banal infection (a head cold) that one contracts in a packed airport shuttle bus does not provide a basis for a claim in damages against the fellow passenger, entering a room which one inadvertently thinks is one's own guest room does not ground liability in damages for the infringement of another's privacy.

Products liability. Departing from the Community law currently in force (Product Liability Directive art. 9(b)), VI.–3:204 (Accountability for damage caused by defective products) proposes to extend the strict liability of a producer in favour of consumers to damage to property which amounts to less than €500. This proposition does not contradict the tendency of VI.–6:102. Quite apart from the fact that losses of several hundred Euros are not, on any view, trivial, VI.–6:102 in no way depends on such quantifications.

NOTES

1. Under FRENCH liability law, an inclination on the part of the courts can be observed to disregard trivial damage (Roland and Boyer, Adages du droit français[4], 151). Cass.civ. 4 April 1991, Bull.civ. 1991, I, no. 127 p. 85 e.g. confirms that an appeal court may derive from the determination of caractère insignifiant du fait invoqué that there is no recoverable damage. However, this does not preclude an award of nominal damages in the particular case of non-material loss which is not trivial as such (cf. for BELGIUM e.g. CFI Brugge 7 February 2005, NJW 2005, 316, note Boone: damages of € 1 to compensate the non-material loss of an elderly lady whose dog was killed).

2. In SPAIN, the de minimis rule mainly comes to the fore in the context of the violations of incorporeal personality rights. In exceptional cases, a number of courts have only awarded nominal damages (e.g. TS 23 February 1989, RAJ 1989 [1] no. 1250 p. 1334 [Catholic priest defamed a medical doctor who was a proponent of abortion; 1 peseta as compensation]; TS 31 December 1993, RAJ 1993 no. 9918 p. 12834; CA Barcelona 12 December 2000, BDA JUR 2001/130964; CA Granada 20 December 2004, AC 2005 [1] no. 63 p. 150 [Meeting of joint property owners; one co-owner was accused of failing to discharge his obligations; damages of € 1 as the injury was "minimal"]). This line of jurisprudence has been sharply criticised; on the grounds that an award of nominal damages is not a salient feature of Spanish law (Martín Casals, Notas sobre la indemnificazión del daño moral en las acciones por difamación de la LO 1/1982, 1231, 1263; Salvador Coderch [-Salvador Coderch], El mercado de las ideas, 183 [espousing an application of the 'de minimis non curat iudex' principle within the law of defamation]). TS 14 December 1993, RAJ 1993 no. 9886 p. 12784 picked up on this criticism and denied the existence of legally relevant damage where a plaintiff would normally have had merely an action for nominal damages; TS 18 November 2002, RAJ 2002 (6) no. 10261 p. 19070 und TS 28 April 2003, RAJ 2003 (2) no. 3548 p. 6541 endorsed this approach. Naturally, this course of action has been censured (in particular by Carrasco Perera, CCJC 1993, 1105-1117). The de minimis rule is not merely relevant in the law governing breaches of incorporeal personality rights but is also pertinent in the field of environmental liability law. In the latter context, only significant damage is recoverable (Reglero Campos [-Álvarez Lata], Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 1912-1913; see also CFI Bilbao 11 October 2005, AC 2006 [1], no. 60 p. 124 [playing of a piano in a neighbouring apartment]).

3. In ITALY, in each particular case, it will depend on whether the party concerned has suffered a danno ingiusto. Whether this is extant is decided by striking a balance between the interested parties' conflicting interests (Cass.sez.un. 22 July 1999, no. 500, Foro it. 2000, III, 481; Cass. 17 May 2004, no. 9345, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 5). Occasionally, it can be derived from law that a particular detriment does not constitute a danno ingiusto (see e.g Cass. 28 July 2004, no. 14241, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 7-8 [re damage to farm occasioned by wild animals]; CC art. 924 [bee flight]; further examples can be found in the statutory rules regulating the liability of the postal service). Apart from the aforementioned cases regulated by statute, the de minimis non curat praetor rule has not permeated other fields, however, it should be noted that CC art. 2059 can be read in this light. Even today, non-pecuniary loss, the recovery of which is not expressly provided for by law, will only be redressed, if it stems from a breach of a constitutionally protected position and is not restricted to trivial damage (Zivic, Resp.civ. e prev. 2007, 517, 526).

4. HUNGARIAN law does not contain a rule governing trivial damage. Claims for the recovery of non-material damage are nonetheless dismissed by the courts, if there is merely a trivial violation of the affected interest (e.g. BH 2002/482: Water damage in an apartment; no compensation for non-pecuniary loss for the forced cancellation of a family celebration).

5. Similarly, BULGARIAN civil law does not recognise a general principle of non-recoverability of trivial damage. However, it can be increasingly gauged from case law dealing with non-material harm, whereby, in a case of trivial damage, permitting recovery is deemed inequitable (see further Supreme Court 9 April 1981, decision no. 1102, civil case no. 623/ 81).

6. Likewise, the GERMAN courts dismiss claims for the recovery of non-material damage, if the damage is trivial, if the injured party's well-being is merely temporarily, and to an insignificant extent, affected (BGH 14 January 1992, NJW 1992, 1043; BGH 27 May 1993, NJW 1993, 2173, 2175); an exception is allowed for cases of intentionally inflicted harm (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[67], § 253, no. 15). The legislature has approved of this judically created de minimus ceiling, however, it did not deem it necessary to expressly restrict claims for compensation for pain and suffering by means of a de minimus threshold (BT-Drucks. 14/8780, 21). A special case regulated by statute precluding recovery of trivial damage is the threshold operating to a consumer's disadvantage in the context of property damage under product liability law (Product Liability Act § 11). Moreover, it is generally recognised that socially acceptable interferences must be tolerated. This principle is derived from an analogous application of CC § 906, e.g. discomfort occasioned by overcrowded public transport. Even the circumcision of young boys in a family has been deemed to be socially acceptable, however, of course this criterion will not be met in a case where an eleven year old boy who was residing with his mother but was forced, during a visit to his father to undergo a circumcision without his mother's consent (CA Frankfurt/Main 21 August 2007, FamRZ 2008, 785).

7. The point of departure in AUSTRIA is the same: neither statute nor the courts recognise a general rule precluding the recovery of trivial damage. However, a number of discrete statutory provisions provide that the prejudice caused must have been "material". CC § 364a(2)(first sent.) provides a salient illustration, providing that marginal interference caused by emissions must be tolerated. This rule is derived from the principle of minima non curat praetor (OGH 3 February 2005, 2 Ob 11/05i). The qualification marginal is e.g. given where an interference with the use of the claimant‘s property led to damage which amounted to a maximum of € 2; nor will it justify an award of an injunction (OGH 23 March 1983, 1 Ob 6/83). However, it should be noted that this line of jurisprudence dealing with legal relations between neighbours has not led to the creation of a general prevailing principle governing the entire law on liability. Therefore, trivial damage generally grounds a claim for recovery. However, a plea of legal chicanery by the defendant can stand in the way of a valid assertion of this claim. If the purpose of the claimant's action was solely to cause prejudice to the other party (e.g. with the aim of burdening it with the legal costs), then, a tort claim may be given pursuant to CC § 1295(2)(second alt.). An award of damages for pain and suffering can be ruled out where the interference with bodily integrity is regarded as insignificant, e.g. minor skin abrasions, bruises or temporary discomfort (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI[3], § 1325 no. 83). Trivial damage in the context of the socalled ‘mercantile decrease in value of vehicles involved in an accident is also disregarded (OGH 26 January 1977, ZVR 1977/298 p. 370; OGH 2 September 1982, ZVR 1983/280 p. 311).

8. In PORTUGAL, it is said that the duty to pay compensation requires not only a certain loss and that it results from an injury, but also that the loss is sufficiently grave (Prata, Dicionário jurídico, 311). In light of the fact that an insignificant deviation by the debtor from the terms of the contract does not amount to a breach of contract, it must therefore be possible to derive from this, the principle that a trivial loss is not worthy of compensation (Pessoa Jorge, Ensaio sobre os pressupostos da responsabilidade civil, 387 who uses the example of damage to a stalk of corn or causing a minor scratch to an old vehicle). This principle is derived from the canon of good faith and from CC art. 398(2), according to the latter, compensation "shall correspond to an interest of the creditor worthy of legal protection" (Pessoa Jorge loc. cit.). Payments which only serve to satisfy the the creditor's capricious demands, do not connote a legally protected interest (Pereira Coelho, Obrigações, 8; cf in relation to CC art. 398(2) also Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 73). Additionally, CC art. 496(1) makes clear that damages for non-material loss can only be recovered, if the loss is regarded as sufficiently grave to merit legal protection. The gravity of the damage should be serious enough to justify the grant of a pecuniary satisfaction (Antunes Varela loc. cit. 605-606; Neto, Código Civil Anotado[14], 498). Mere inconvenience or annoyance and the suffering or grief resulting from an abnormal sensitivity do not, as a rule, justify a compensation for non economic loss. The same holds true for sadness and concern caused by redundancy (STJ 14 March 2007; STJ 22 March 2006). A contentious issue relates to the actual constitutents of the de minimus ceiling, for example, this occured in a case where a woman was falsely accused in a restaurant of attempting to pay with counterfeit money (STJ 19 September 2006). In addition, the de minimus threshold can be exceeded in a case of repeated- even in cases concerning damage of an insubstantial nature–infringements (Pessoa Jorge loc. cit. 388). Moreover, de minimus ceilings can be found in both substantive and procedural law (CCP art. 822(c)).

9. Under DUTCH law, CFI Arnhem 21 September 2005, LJN no. AU5454 dismissed a damages claim based on an infringement of copyright on the grounds that the prejudice suffered was trivial; an award of compensation would have been disproportionate to the insignificant loss suffered. However, a de minimis rule comes close to the rule contained in CC art. 3:303, which provides that a person does not have a right of action where "he lacks sufficient interest". Not every trifling damge will ground such an interest. However, the legislator and courts proceed from the assumption that the claimant is pursuing a sufficient interest; the defendant is obliged to rebut this by proof to the contrary (Parlementaire Geschiedenis III, 915-916; HR 17 September 1993, NJ 1994, no. 118 p. 462; HR 9 October 1998, NedJur 1998, no. 853 p. 4904; T&C Vermogensrecht[4] [-Stolker], art. 3:303, pp. 1468-1469). There is no corresponding provision to VI.–6:102 under ESTONIAN law.

10. In the NORDIC countries a rule that generally bars a claim based on the damage's nominally or substantively trivial nature does not exist. However similar concerns may be identified. Under SWEDISH Environmental Code chap. 32 (similarly the FINNISH Environmental Damage Compensation Act), which entails a rather wide understanding of emissions under a strict liability regime, damages for pure economic loss do not necessarily require a criminal offence (as is the general rule under the Damages Liability Act); however, damages are only awarded if the damage is of some significance (see in more detail Bengtsson, 21 uppsatser, 53, 65). With regard to other types of damage or loss no such requirement exists. However, compensation is subject to the general rule which requires a reasonable balance between the competing interests, e.g. as to what must be tolerated with regard to local conditions or the general presence of emissions of the relevant type. The same applies to disputes between neighbours (Swedish Land Code chap. 3 § 1). HD 1 March 1990, NJA 1990, 71 concerned a damages claim for 100 kr. [10 EUR] against a neighbour who had cut down the plaintiff's hedge, which was dismissed as the latter had disregarded his obligations to his neighbour of taking reasonable consideration; see also FINNISH Supreme Court 10 February 1981, KKO 1981 II 10. Furthermore, a prerquisite for the recovery of damages under SWEDISH Damages Liability Act chap. 2 § 3 in the context of a breach of incorporeal personality rights is a "great anguish. One is consequently not entitled to recover damages for trivial infringements (Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2]; 62; HD 21 September 2007, NJA 2007, 584). Furthermore, under FINNISH Damages Liability Act chap. 5 § 6, a prerequisite for an award of damages for non-pecuniary loss is a "serious" breach of personal integrity or dignity. The restiction of actions for trivial breachs of incorporeal personality rights also helps to explain why Swedish law habitually requires the commission of a criminal offence in this context (Government Reports [Ds] 2007:10, Skadeståndsfrågor vid kränkning, 36).

11. ENGLAND: Not every impact on or physiological change to a person's body is regarded as a personal injury (see e.g. for pleural plaques Rothwell v. Chemical & Insulating Co Ltd [2006] EWCA Civ 27, [2006] 4 AllER 1161).

VI.–6:103: Equalisation of benefits

(1) Benefits arising to the person suffering legally relevant damage as a result of the damaging event are to be disregarded unless it would be fair and reasonable to take them into account.

(2) In deciding whether it would be fair and reasonable to take the benefits into account, regard shall be had to the kind of damage sustained, the nature of the accountability of the person causing the damage and, where the benefits are conferred by a third person, the purpose of conferring those benefits.

COMMENTS

General. This Article deals with the problematic question of so-called "equalisation of benefits" (compensatio lucri cum danno). It concerns cases in which the behaviour of the wrongdoer caused not only detriment to the injured person but also some (mostly) economic advantage, especially because third parties provided payment or are liable for such payment to the injured person due to the damage suffered. The question is thus always whether such advantages may be set off against the liable person's obligation to pay damages or whether such a mitigation of liability is to be denied, with the result that the injured person (provided the wrongdoer is in a position to satisfy the claim) may be entitled to multiple payments by reason of the damage suffered. The answer is that in principle the latter holds true and a mitigation of liability only comes into the picture if it is fair and reasonable under the circumstances (paragraph (1)). Paragraph (2) lists the criteria that are important in the context of this fairness test.

Policy considerations. The basic rule (no set-off) seems to be substantively imperative due to the variety of insurance systems and provisions on sick pay resting upon the model that the insurer or a party performing a comparable service acquires the injured person's rights against the injuring person in the amount of the performance rendered. Such an acquisition of rights would be impossible if the right to damages were to be reduced. Naturally, only an existing right can be assigned. In other words, the basic rule is required and confirmed by insurance law. However, it also follows from considerations of justice inherent in the present branch of the law. In principle, the acts of third parties benefiting the injured person are no concern of the liable person; the fact that others are looking after the victim does not free the liable person of personal responsibility.

Causation. It is a general prerequisite of the equalisation of benefits that there be a causal link between the injuring event and the subsequent advantage. The tighter this link is, the easier it is for an equalisation of benefits to come into focus; the looser it is, the more susceptible to exclusion such an equalisation becomes.

> Illustration 1
> Trader T's claim is frustrated as a result of erroneous information as to the solvency of T's customer (C) provided by the bank. C is insolvent. T's claim against the bank is to be correspondingly reduced only where the bank can prove that it was solely the proceeds of reselling the delivery, the payment for which remained outstanding, that enabled C to satisfy another debt of long standing to T.

VI.–7:105. VI.–7:105 (Reduction or exclusion of liability to indemnified persons) remains unaffected by the present Article. The rule in VI.–7:105 does not involve issues of benefit equalisation, but provisions of national law, which channel the de jure liability to an insurer, a fund or another institution with the consequence that the originator of the damage does not even come "face to face" with the liability in the first place. It is correct, however, that, at least in the economic result, this is close to an equalisation of benefits.

Several liable parties. Situations in which several persons are liable to the injured person under this Book for the same damage are to be strictly distinguished from the cases covered by the present Article. In cases of the former type a double payment of damages is ruled out without exception; this would constitute an unjustified enrichment. Therefore, the rule only applies to the case where, along with the damages to be satisfied by the injuring person, another advantage based on a different legal basis accrues to the injured person.

Case groups. Precisely speaking, two different basic fact situations are to be distinguished. In the first (and less frequent) case, the advantage is a direct consequence of the event giving rise to liability; in the second, compensation payments or other economic benefits accrue to the injured person from third parties.

Kind of damage. In both types of case, it is first of all the type of damage suffered which plays a role. This is because in the case of solely economic detriment and also in the case of property damage, an equalisation of benefits in relation to the material losses comes into play more frequently than in the case of bodily injury and death. This results from the fact that in the case of the latter, it would be cynical and anything but "fair and reasonable" to say that the loss of someone close had also brought with it monetary benefits. Furthermore, such benefits are normally to be deemed a consequence of certain provisions of the law of succession and family law, not as a consequence of the wrongdoer's behaviour.

Examples. A textbook example of one situation in which an equalisation of benefits would exceptionally be seen as fair and reasonable, is the destruction of a house with the consequent discovery of treasure trove on the owner's land. The following are more true to life:

> Illustration 2
> A lorry driver drives into the claimant's house, which is so badly damaged that it has to be completely demolished. By this very occurrence, the piece of land goes up in value enormously; a new urban development plan allows economically far more attractive forms of development. The owner exploits this increase in value by auctioning off the piece of land on very beneficial terms. The claimant's claim in damages is, as far as it concerns economic detriment, to be reduced according to the extent of the increase in value, perhaps even to zero. However, the non-economic damage of the claimant remains unaffected by this; the claimant did not vacate the house voluntarily, but merely made the best of the situation.
>
> Illustration 3
> An equalisation of benefits also comes into play if a vehicle has to be repaired over a lengthy period and there are savings as a result of the fact that there would otherwise be wear and tear on the vehicle during that time.
>
> Illustration 4
> A child is killed. The parents' claim in damages for the non-economic damage they have suffered is not to be reduced by the argument that their nerves and finances, which would have been expended in raising the child, have been "spared".

Illustration 5
A father, who financially supported his children's education, dies in an accident. The children's claim to compensation for their loss of maintenance is not be reduced for the reason that, as a consequence of their father's death, they were able to inherit his estate earlier. As long as the accident was neither caused through intention nor appreciable negligence, it could however be fair if the considerable income from interest gained due to the prematurely inherited assets were to be counted as reducing the claim when calculating the level of damage due to loss of maintenance.

Nature of the accountability. In assessing whether an advantage accrued is to be set against liability, the basis of liability is also of great significance. In particular, there will be no reduction in liability where the liable person caused the damage intentionally.

Performance by a third party. Most issues in relation to a possible equalisation of benefits are raised in the context of benefits performed for the injured person by third parties by reason of the harm. Under paragraph (2) the result depends on the aim of these benefits, i.e. on whether alleviating the position of the injuring person was or was not an objective. In the normal case there will be no such purpose, which once more confirms the rule (no setting off). In special circumstances it can even occur that third party expenditure not only does not mitigate the liable person's obligation to pay damages but also increases it: see VI.–2:201(2)(a) (Personal injury and consequential loss).

Examples. As already stated, the most important examples relate to insurance payments to injured persons and continuation of pay by employers (to injured and therefore absent workers). Other examples are donations from third parties (not being participants in the causation of damage) and increased income as a result of a change in career necessitated by injuries sustained. Such benefits are generally not to be taken into account to reduce compensation. If there is no assignment by operation of law of the injured person's right to compensation, the injured person may effectively recover twice over. The position is different only where the aim of the contribution from the third party was also to benefit the injuring person. The other criteria of the fairness test also hold true in cases involving benefits from third parties, especially the rule that a wrongdoer who acted intentionally will in principle not be entitled to any relief.

Illustration 6
At a major football event a police officer from the host nation is beaten up and very severely injured by hooligans from a participating nation. There is extensive media coverage of the event. People from the country from which the hooligans come are ashamed of their fellow countrymen and donate large sums for the benefit of the police officer. This does not reduce the hooligans' liability.

NOTES

1. The point of departure of FRENCH law is the principle that the injured party is to be restored to the position that he would have been in had the damaging event not occurred; the injured party is not permitted to suffer a loss or obtain a benefit (Cass.civ. 23 January 2003, Bull.civ. 2003, II, no. 20 p. 16). Therefore, claiming cumulative recovery for overlapping items of damage is, as a general rule, excluded (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2006/2007], no. 2546). A divergent approach is only adopted if the collateral source of benefit does not evoke connotations of indemnification (Cass.crim. 17 December 1970, D. 1971 Somm., 41 [compensation awarded to the widow of a farmer; the widow's legal right share was not taken into account in the computation of damages under CC art. 1382]; Cass.crim. 1 June 1999, JCP 2000 éd. G, I, 197, no. 7, note Viney [no reduction in compensation for children's claim for loss of support following the accidental death of their father on account of their fixed right to a share of the latter's estate]).

2. According to BELGIAN legal doctrine, in this context, a differentiation must be made between distinct groups of cases (on the following, see Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 48 p. 92). (i) Collateral benefits directly arising from an event grounding liability are taken into account in the assessment of damages (textbook example: the destruction of a house leads to a treasure trove being unearthed). (ii) However, involuntary (undesired) savings in expenditure are disregarded (textbook example: parents who have a lost a child are spared the financial costs of rearing that child). (iii) Moreover, there is no set-off in respect of benefits arising consequent upon the rectification of the damage and which are unavoidable (textbook example: a damaged vehicle is repaired by using new parts). (iv)Benefits, which can be attributed to the injured party's initative, are only set off in the event that his actions could be reasonably expected of him. If, in the course of a limiting his possible loss, the victim goes over and above his obligations and through this secures a benefit, here, no corresponding set off in damages as against benefits will be entertained (Cass. 7 September 1982, Pas. belge 1983, I, p. 19). (v) The most pervasive difficulty in this field arises in cases where compensation is paid by a third party. The general rule propounds that, in this case, cumulative recovery is permitted, if the legal basis and the purpose of the collateral subvention paid by the third party is not identical with the tortfeasor's duty to make reparation (Cass. 28 April 1992, Pas. belge 1992, I, no. 452 p. 761 [no set off of unemployment insurance contributions against the delictual damages claim]). The focus of professional legal discourse is on the issue as to whether the third party can seek to recoup his payment from the tortfeasor. If this were indeed the case, then the upshot of this is that the third party's payment stemmed from the same legal basis and fort the same purpose as the tortfeasor's duty to make reparation (van Gerven [Covemaeker], Verbintenissenrecht², 480).

3. SPANISH TS 15 December 1981, RAJ 1981 (2) no. 5157 p. 4131 held, in connection with the doctrine of compensación de beneficios (or compensatio lucri cum damno), that benefits arising from the damage caused, which the tort victim obtains as a result of the incident, must also be taken account of when it comes to computing damages (a heavy goods vehicle drove into a building, which, as a result had to be torn down. However, as the land had been rezoned, the demolition led to an enormous increase in the value of the property; critical, on this point Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Pantaleón], Código Civil II[2], art. 1902, p. 1989-1990). However, an exception is made for cases for payments arising under a contract of insurance CHECK (TS 27 November 1965, RAJ 1965 (2) no. 5534 p. 3387); in such cases, at any rate, the losses are first of all frequently taken care of by the insurer and should the injured party advance a claim against the tortfeasor, the former is liable to his insurer under the principles of unjustified enrichment (Insurance Contract Act 1980 art. 26). Legal commentary postulates that a model which espouses that collateral benefits should be set-off against damages would only be relevant in cases where the benefits received are a direct consequence of the damaging event and stem from the same cause (Díez-Picazo, Derecho de daños, 320; Roca i Trias, FS Albaladejo, 4255; see also Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 498). Where damage is caused by terrorist attacks, the State is thereupon obliged to compensate the victim of such attacks; the State is thereby subrogated to victim's claims against the offender (Act on Solidarity with the Victims of Terrorism [Ley 32/1999, de solidaridad con las víctimas del terrorismo]); the same rule is found in the law governing the compensation of victims of crime (Act on Allowances and Assistance to the Victims of Violent Crimes and Crimes against Sexual Liberty [Ley 35/1995] of 11 December 1995) and in the Regional regulations governing compensation of HIV infected patients. In the socalled 'colza oil case', collateral benefits conferred by the State were set off against the delictual compensation owed by the State. Both subventions arose from the same catastrophe (TS 24 May 2001, RAJ 2001 [3] no. 5442 p. 8342). Previously, cumulative recovery was allowed in respect of payments made under an occupational injury insurance scheme and tort damages (TS 27 November 1993, RAJ 1993 no. 9143 p. 11794; TS 19 February 1998, RAJ 1998 [1] no. 986 p. 1564). However, recent case law of the social chamber of the Tribunal Supremo demonstrates that this trend has waned and such benefits must be brought into account in the calculation of damages (see, instead of many, TS 10 December 1998, RAJ 1998 [5] no. 10501 p. 15488). In the interim, this approach has been approved by the Civil Chamber (TS 21 July 2000, RAJ 2000 [3] no. 5500 p. 8397; TS 8 October 2001, RAJ 2001 [4] no. 7551 p. 11863).

4. While there is no express statutory basis for compensatio lucri cum damno in ITALY, in principle, it is, however, recognised (Salvi, La responsabilità civile[2], 251). This postulates that an injured party is not permitted to profit from the unlawful act. A prerequisite for setting off benefits against damages is that both the benefit and the damage are an immediate and direct consequence of the same occurrence (as e.g. in Cass. 22 June 2005, no. 13401, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 6: damage caused to a salt production plant; the plant was fitted out with new and therefore, more valuable machines; 40% of the costs had to be borne by the injured party; cf. also Corte dei Conti reg. Basilicata, sez. giur., 2 February 2005, no. 14, Riv. Corte dei Conti 2005, fasc. 1, 234: employee fraudulently secured his position by submitting bogus qualifications; benefits derived from the part of job which did not require a professional qualification taken into account).

5. Furthermore, in HUNGARY, the operative assumption is that an award of compensation should not lead to the enrichment of the injured party. Consequently, benefits received by the plaintiff which are immediately derived from the damaging event will factored in the computation of damage leading to a reduction in the award. A deduction "new for old" takes place in the cases where vehicles are repaired by using new parts (see further Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1363). In the context of insurance benefits, a distinction is drawn between socalled "indemnity" policy of insurance (such as liability insurance) and socalled fixed sum insurance (such as life insurance or accident insurance). Benefits deriving from a compensatory insurance are deducted from the compensation; the corresponding claim of the victim against the tortfeasor is subrogated to the insurer. By contrast, a cumulation of benefits is permitted in respect of the collateral benefits obtained under a fixed sum insurance policy and grant of compensation (Benedek loc. cit. 1364-1367; Petrik [-Köles], Polgári jog II, 632 et seq; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 235 et seq; Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 157 et seq). In cases concerning the death of a person, the expenses incurred by the deceased dependents in connection with the administration of the estate do not amount to recoverable damage, however, the benefits obtained from the inheritance do not operate to reduce the award of damages; tort law and the law on succession are kept strictly separate from one another (Köles loc. cit.).

6. Similarly, the principle of compensatio lucri cum damno does not find statutory expression in BULGARIA. Nonetheless, it is deemed operative in a number of constellations (see further Tzachev, Zakon za zaduljeniyata i dogovorite I[2], 201; Kojucharov, Obligazionno pravo I, 271). The tortfeasor's liability will only be reduced by a collateral benefit if a causal nexus exists between the benefit and the unlawful act (Kojucharov loc. cit.). This criterion is not met e.g where a donation is made by a third party or in cases of assistance rendered following an accident. Life insurance or accident insurance payouts to the injured party will not operate to reduce a tortfeasor's liability (see Insurance Code art. 238(2)). According to the (older) jurisprudence of the Supreme Court, the same does not hold true for disability pensions (Supreme Court 23 December 1968, Decree no. 4); however, a complicated model has been adopted which distinguishes between varying degrees of disability. Typically, where payments are property insurance payouts, the insurer becomes subrogated to the injured party's right to assert a claim against the damaging party (Insurance Code art. 213(1)). The economically realisable vestiges of a damaged thing are set-off against damages, i.e, e.g. the fur of an animal which was killed (Kojucharov loc. cit.). In ROMANIA, social security benefits supplant the injured party's recovery under tort law; however, the claim is subrogated to the insurer who has paid the loss. Benefits obtained from third parties, the purpose of which was not to redress the damage caused but were merely furnished as a means of providing support, do not operate to reduce the extent of the damages claim (Adam, Drept civil. Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, 268-272; Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 78-82, 342).

7. The drafters of the GERMAN BGB (old) expressly left the problem of set-off to the courts and legal teaching (Mot. II 19). However, the drafters did consider its dimensions in a number of instances and either expressly ordained that a set off would take place in a number of isolated provisions (e.g. in CC § 642(2) [contract for work and services; breach of contract by the person ordering the work, expenditure that is saved by the contractor]) or that there was a bar to the right of set-off (as in CC § 843(4) [no set-off of maintenance payments provided by a third party as against the injured party's damages claim]). Great practical importance is ascribed to the provisions governing cessio legis, namely the automatic passing of the injured party's rights to the insurer who has made a payment to the insured (especially Social Security Code [SGB] X § 116 and Insurance Contract Act [VVG] § 86). A requirement of these provisions is the denial of a right to set-off as otherwise, the insurer cannot be subrogated to the rights of the insured person against the tortfeasor. Moreover, there is no prevailing general rule; the outcome will depend upon an assessment of the individual circumstances of the case at hand (see further Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[67], Pref. to § 249, nos. 122 and 125; Staudinger [-Schiemann], BGB, § 249, nos. 140 and 145). A generally recognised principle is the deduction "old for new" in the context of repairing things (Schiemann loc. cit. no. 175; Medicus, Schuldrecht I[17], no. 607). Further, one has to make do with a general rule of thumb, which provides that (i) there must be an adequate causal nexus between the damaging event and the benefit accrued (BGH 15 November 1967, NJW 1968, 491, 492; BGH 13 July 1981, NJW 1982, 32, 33; BGH 16 January 1990, NJW 1990, 1360), and (ii) an unreasonable burden must not be imposed on injured party by the set off and, the tortfeasor taking unreasonable advantage of the collateral benefit is not condoned (BGH 15 January 1953, NJW 1953, 618, 619; BGH 17 May 1984, NJW 1984, 2457, 2458; BGH 6 June 1997, NJW 1997, 2378; BGH 17 November 2005, NJW 2006, 499).

8. In turn, it has been espoused in AUSTRIA that the injured party is to be restored as far as is possible to the position he would have been in. had the event generating liability not occured, however, the award of damages must not represent a profit for the claimant (OGH 16 February 1955, SZ 28/46 p. 109). The principle that all benefits are to be set-off against damages is derived from this (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no.

10/33; Rummel [-Reischauer], ABGB II[3], § 1312 no. 2). Deductible benefits can consist of cost savings, availability of manpower, earnings, and any third party dispositions (Reischauer loc. cit. no. 5). However, the prerequisite for a deduction of benefits is a causal nexus between the damaging event and the subsequent benefit. In addition, a temporal and objective congruity between the damage and the ensuing benefit is required (OGH 2 April 2003, 7 Ob 298/02b, RIS-Justiz 0114259; OGH 28 September 2000, ÖJZ 2001, 268). This criterion is not met if the injured party nets a higher wage following vocational retraining which was prompted by injuries which he sustained in the accident (OGH 28 September 2000 loc. cit.) or where a person is "spared" household expenses given that they are lying in a hospital bed (OGH 23 November 1971, ZVR 1972/154 p. 299; cf. also OGH 27 September 1978, ZVR 1979/277 p. 334). If it was incumbent on the person who was killed to provide maintenance to the dependants who were the successors in title to the deceased's estate, the causation requirements for a valid set-off will not be met if the person concerned would also have inherited in the event that the deceased succumbed to a natural death (Koziol loc. cit. no. 10/48); therefore, claims for loss of support may only be reduced by the advantages derived from the accelerated availability of the inheritance (OGH 5 November 1965, SZ 38/186 p. 567; OGH 5 December 1968, SZ 41/169 p. 532). The current earned income from the inheritance reduces the damage of the survivors. There is no causation in respect of the death and subsequent funeral expenses as the successors in title would have had to bear those costs in any event (CC § 569). In general, the acceleration of this claim for reimbursement is offset by the early receipt of the inheritance (Koziol loc. cit. no. 10/51). Third party payments are not included in the set-off if it is deemed that the damaging party should not have the benefit of them (Reischauer loc. cit. no. 3a; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 331). This will depend on the content of the statutory obligations of the third party which can be ascertained by examining the statutory purpose underpinning the norm, voluntary payments are contingent upon the intention of the provider (Koziol loc. cit. no. 10/38). In case of doubt, it is presumed that the purpose of the disposition was not to alleviate the plight of the damaging party (Reischauer loc. cit. no. 4a). This is true e.g. for compulsory insurance pay-out and for maintenance payments (OGH 18 December 1969, ZVR 1970/150 p. 205), for emergency payments by the Social Welfare (OGH 29 April 2004, 6 Ob 260/03h), for charitable donations (OGH 15 April 1980, SZ 53/58 p. 265) and for all other dispositions made with the solidarity of the injured party in mind (OGH 4 February 1965, ZVR 1965/283 p. 335; CA Wien 1 December 1993, ZVR 1994/130 p. 314). However, in many instances, the problem of set-off is solved by subrogation of the claim (e.g. Social Security Act [ASVG] § 332; Insurance Contract Act [VVG] § 67). Whether pain "spared" can be set off against pain actually suffered is questionable and at any rate is only conceivable once very restrictive pre-conditions have been satisfied (see further OGH 13 January 2004, ZVR 2005/28, p. 95).

9. In GREECE, the tenet holds that the injured party should receive full reparation, however should not be enriched by his loss and therefore, for the most part by relying on CC art. 930(3), professional legal opinion favours deduction benefits obtained from the award of damages (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], arts. 297-298, no. 89; Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2], 546). The criterion of adequate causation is promoted in this context in an attempt to circumvent of charges of unfairness. An adequate causal nexus must be extant between the damaging event and the subsequent benefit; only if this is given, will the benefit be deducted. Additionally however, the courts occasionally simply refer to the principle of good faith to justify the non-deductibility of benefits (CC art. 288; see Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 154 and A.P. 523/1995, NoB 45 [1997] 966, note Stathopoulos). Voluntary payments made by a third party, which are intended to benefit the victim and not release the damaging party from its obligations (Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2], 556). By contrast, a deduction "new for old" takes place in the context of repairs (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], arts. 297-298, nos. 97, 114).

10. In PORTUGAL, the appositeness of compensação de lucros com danos (or compensação de vantagens) is inferred from CC art. 568 which provides that, under certain circumstances, a person who is under a duty to pay damages, can require the injured party to relinquish his rights vis á vis a third party; moreover, reference is made to CC art. 803(2) (commodum de representação) and CC art. 566(2) in this regard, whereby the assessment of damages hinges on the difference between the injured party's current financial situation and the financial situation which would have probably existed had the accident not occurred (Pessoa Jorge, Ensaio sobre os pressupostos da responsabilidade civil, 379, 413, 416). There must be a causal link between the damage and the ensuing benefit; a mere coincidence will not suffice in this regard (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], note 2 under art. 568, p. 586). For example, if, a person is not permitted to sit his driving instructor exams, despite having secured guarantee from his training school assuring the claimant that his application would not fail on the basis of his failure to meet a number of statutory requirements, it then followed that the advantage that he secured from these lessons, which were indeed of help to him in passing his exams which he had taken once the necessary changes in the law had been made, could not be deducted from his award of damages (STJ 28 February 2002). By contrast, in a case concerning the cause of action of a manager pertaining to his loss of employment at a charitable foundation which functions had been transferred to the State, his salary earned as an employee of another State institution was set off against the damages (CA Lisbon 12 May 2005). It appears that the philosophy of the compensatio lucri cum damno is primarily drawn upon in connection with the breach of a pre-contractual obligation, namely, where the complainant subsequently saves costs as a result of the failure to realise the contract (Prata, Notas sobre a responsabilidade civil pré-contratual, 180; STJ 11 January 2007).

11. If same damaging event causes the injured party to suffer damage and at the same time causes him to obtain a benefit, then, according to Dutch Civil Code CC art. 6:100 this benefit will be set off against the compensation, however, only insofar "as it is reasonable to do so". The "benefit" could be anything that reduces the extent of the damage suffered (savings in expenditure; increase in assets; continued payment of salary even though no work is performed; payment of a pension; tax savings). Non-material benefits are only relevant in the context of calculating compensation for non-pecuniary loss (HR 21 February 1997, NedJur 1999, no. 145 p. 837: wrongful birth). Set-off of benefits as against damages does not take place in the context of payments derived from indemnity insurance; the victim's claim against the tortfeasor is subrogated to the insurer. In the context of a pay-out under a fixed sum insurance policy (e.g. life insurance), it still appears to be the case that amount paid out on the death of the assured is set off against the dependent's claim for loss of support (CC art. 6:108) if these payments are a means of subsistence for the dependants (HR 19 June 1970, NedJur 1970, no. 380 p. 1066; HR 4 February 2000, NedJur 2000, no. 600 p. 4155). Continuation of salary during protracted illness (CC art. 6:107a) and in a number of other situations is the subject of special statutory regulations. At any rate, a set –off will not be "reasonable" pursuant to CC art. 6:100 if there is not a sufficient causal nexus between the damaging event and the benefit obtained therefrom (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 348; Schadevergoeding I [-Lindenbergh], art. 6:100, no. 4 p. 10, nos. 7-8 pp. 13-24; Salomons, Schadevergoeding, no. 19 p. 34).

12. ESTONIAN LOA § 127(5) proceeds from the principle that every benefit obtained from a injuring event will operate to reduce the quantum of damages. However, it should be noted that the set-off may not run contrary to the purpose of an award of damages

13. The principle of compensatio lucri cum danno is generally recognised in the NORDIC countries. It is, however, referred to only in a limited number of cases. Equalization of benefits should be reserved for obvious advantages which have a clear causal link with the injuring event (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 368; Rodhe, Obligationsrätt, 476; cf. Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 163). Others rely on a general reasonableness test (Bengtsson, Ersättning vid offentliga ingrepp II, 234; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 269), a number of commentators point to the a formula whereby the protective scope of the reparation is examined (Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 459), other rely on the concept of adequacy (Radetzki, Skadeståndsberäkning vid sakskada, 184; critical on this point, however, Rodhe loc cit. 476 and Iversen, Erstatningsberegning i kontraktsforhold, 734). In DENMARK, stress is placed on the tenet that an award of damages should not operate to enrich the injured party (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 285; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 342). Therefore, e.g. living expenses saved during hospitalisation are set off against the compensation claim (HD 13 March 1959, NJA 1959, 181), whereas donations, prompted by the accident, made by a third party are disregarded (HD 4 December 1947, NJA 1947, 586; Andersson loc cit. 459; similar for FINLAND Saxén loc cit. 320; cf. Møller and Wiisbye, Erstatningsansvarsloven[6], 371). In SWEDISH HD 3 December 1990, NJA 1990, 705 a municipality had recommended a house owner to install a special heating system, as the municipality wrongfully claimed that a nuisance was at hand due to high radon levels. The municipality was held liable for the cost of the instalment of the heating system, and no reduction was made, as the municipality had argued, with reference to that the plaintiff would not have installed the system unless mislead by the recommendation and furthermore no economic benefit to the plaintiff had been proven by the defendant such as cost savings or a sustaining increase of property value. In HD 21 December 1993, NJA 1993, 753 a person carrying out excavation work negligently damaged ancient remains enjoying statutory protection, necessitating archeological examination for which costs the defendant was liable, who claimed equalisation due to the benefit of knowledge which the national heritage agency gained through the examination. The Court dismissed that defence, as the advantage had no commercial value, and the agency should be free to freely decide which sites to examine. Generally speaking, cumulative (double) compensation is not allowed in the Nordic countries. Most deductions, however, are not based on the principle of compensatio lucri cum danno, but rather follow from principles and rules on the assessment of damages (Hellner and Radetzki loc cit. 418; von Eyben and Isager loc cit. 291). Swedish Damages Liability Act chap. 5 § 3 ordains e.g that, in the context of assessing damages arising out of a claim for loss of income and support, benefits arising from the compulsory social security insurance, industrial injury insurance and other benefits paid for by the employer are to be deducted. Subrogation of the victim's claim to the relevant insurer does not take place. By contrast, benefits obtained from insurance privately taken out does not led to a reduction in damages (Hellner and Radetzki loc cit. 388; Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 248). Similarly, according to Danish EAL §§ 2 and 7 compensation flowing from social security and industrial injury insurance is deducted from the damages claim. This also includes pay-outs under private health insurance. A right of subrogation (to the employer) is only envisaged for continuance of salary in cases of illness and for other employee benefits (von Eyben and Isager loc cit. 331; Møller and Wiisbye loc. cit. 370 and 597). There is not right to subrogation (by the insurer) in respect of damage caused to insured property; a private individual who was merely negligent in causing such damage does not incur liability (EAL §§ 19 and 22). In Finland, payouts made under social security compensation (sick pay) as well as industrial injury insurance compensation are generally deducted from the victim's damages claim (lag om sjukföräkring, 21 December 2004, chap. 12 § 2; lag om olycksfallsförsäkring, 20 August 1948/608, § 61), however, the insurer has a right to recoup the payment from the tortfeasor. Special regulations exist to govern damage caused by a criminal act (e.g. lag om sjukföräkring § 7). Incidentially, for all of the Nordic countries, the principle holds that payouts under a fixed sum insurance (summaförsäkring) are not deductible; therefore the damages claim and insurance payout may be cumulatively recovered, the victim's rights are also not subrogated to the insurer

14. IRISH Civil Liability (Amendment) Act 1964 sec. 2 provides that "[i]n assessing damages in an action to recover damages in respect of a wrongful act (including a crime) resulting in personal injury not causing death, account shall not be taken of (a) any sum payable in respect of the injury under any contract or insurance, (b) any pension, gratuity or other like benefit payable under statute or otherwise in consequence of the injury." By operation of this section a plaintiff may receive double compensation for the same loss. Social Welfare (Consolidation) Act 1993 secs. 75(1) states that, not withstanding sec. 2 of the 1964 Act, in an action for personal injuries there shall in assessing damages be taken into account, against any loss of earnings or profits that has accrued or probably will accrue to the injured person from the injuries, the value of any rights that have accrued or will probably accrue to the injured person therefrom in respect of injury benefit (a weekly benefit payable where a person is unfit for work on account of an accident at work or an occupational disease) or disablement benefit (payable to a person who suffers a loss of physical or mental faculty as a result of an occupational injury or disease while in insurable employment) for the five years beginning with the time when the cause of action accrued. Section 237(1) of the 1993 Act provides that, notwithstanding sec. 2 of the 1964 Act, in assessing damages in any action in respect of liability for personal injuries not causing death relating to the use of a mechanically propelled vehicle, there shall be taken into account: "the value of any rights arising from such injuries which have accrued, or are likely to accrue, to the injured person in respect of disability benefit … or invalidity pension under Part II [of the Act] for the period of five years beginning with the time when the cause of action accrued." Judicial disapproval has been expressed for this legislative policy (O'Loughlin v. Teeling [1988] ILRM 617 [HC] per McKenzie J). In its Report on Section 2 of the Civil Liability (Amendment) Act 1964: The Deductibility of Collateral Benefits from Awards of Damages (LRC 68-2002), the Law Reform Commission made radical recommendations for changes in the law of collateral benefits. The Commission proposes that double recovery should be barred in respect of permanent health insurance [para 1.49]. Where a plaintiff has paid the entirety of the insurance premiums payable under a personal accident insurance policy, directly and independently and in his or her own name, the Commission recommends that the plaintiff should be allowed to make double recovery (para 1.56). It is recommended that, in general, charitable benefits should not be deducted from an award of damages (para 2.05) and that occupational pensions should not be subject to deductibility. It is also proposed that sick pay should be deductible from the award of damages against the wrongdoer, "save that no account shall be taken where the sick pay gives rise to a legally enforceable debt or where the sick pay is a charitable debt or where the sick pay is a charitable donation" (para 4.36). The Commission also recommends that the principle of deductibility apply across the board to social welfare payments (para 5.016). It is recommended by the Commission that the two statutory exceptions to the general rule against deductibility contained in Social Welfare (Consolidation) Act 1993 ss.75 and 237 apply equally to all types of accident. It proposes (para 5.054) that social welfare payments, which arise in consequence of injury and compensation for loss of earnings or profits, should be deducted but only from damages for loss of earnings or profits. Finally, the Commission recommends (para 5.110) that the Department of Social and Family Affairs give consideration to the setting up of a reimbursement system under which the amount by which a compensation award has been reduced, by virtue of the payment of social welfare payments including health allowance, should be reimbursed by the defendant to the Department or a Health Board, as is appropriate. In O'Neill v. Electricity Supply Board (unreported, High Court, July 31, 2002), Finnegan P. made no reduction under the rule in Reddy v. Bates, where the plaintiff, aged 52 at the time of the accident in 1999, had been an employee of the defendant since 1965. In view of the plaintiff's security of employment, Finnegan P. stated that he thought that a reduction would be inappropriate. In contrast, in Boyne v. Bus Átha Cliath (unreported, High Court, 11 April 2002), Finnegan P. made a 10% reduction on the basis of Reddy v. Bates where the plaintiff, prior to the accident, had had two fairly long bouts of unemployment. The general concerns about the employment market over time which were expressed in Reddy v. Bates do not need to find foundation in a plaintiff's pre-accident history but such history will no doubt strengthen the argument for the application of the rule in a particular case (Byrne and Binchy, Annual Review of Irish Law 2002, 523). In Hogan v. Steele & Co. Ltd. [2000] 1 ILRM 330 (HC), the High Court held that that it was not possible to set off the voluntary salary continuance against the employee's damages claim against the person who caused the accident; however, the damages must be remitted to the employer.

VI.–6:104: Multiple persons suffering damage

Where multiple persons suffer legally relevant damage and reparation to one person will also make reparation to another, Book III, Chapter 4, Section 2 (Plurality of creditors) applies with appropriate adaptation to their rights to reparation.

COMMENTS

Reparation to one person will also make reparation to another. This Article relates to a problem which arises relatively frequently in the law on non-contractual liability. It concerns the question of who can claim damages (or as the case may be, who can claim which part of the damages) where the injuring person has inflicted a legally relevant damage on several persons and the making good of one of these damages results in the simultaneous reparation of all others; this meaning in turn that the injuring person must only satisfy the damages once in total. The most frequent case in practice is that of damaging a thing in which various different people hold a property right. The repair of the thing or the compensation of the necessary repair costs remedies the consequences of several separate legally relevant damages.

> Illustration 1
> B has purchased goods from S who enjoys a reservation of ownership. T damages this property negligently. Although there is legally relevant damage both to S's ownership and to B's property right in the goods (if such a property right, e.g. an Anwartschaftsrecht, exists under the applicable law), T is in any case never liable as regards the repair costs (the position will be different, for example, as regards an additional loss of income for B during the time of repair) for more than 100% of the expense.

Damage and damages. In these cases it is important as a first step to distinguish between determining the existence of a legally relevant damage for a given interested party and, on the other hand, the appropriate remedy which responds to that claim. VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession) is concerned solely with the ascertainment of a legally relevant damage. By contrast, the questions of (i) the mode, (ii) the quantum and (iii) the appropriate recipient of reparatory legal redress which may be claimed belong in the law of remedies. The present Article addresses the third of these questions. This provision does not, however, apply where the same conduct has caused several separate legally relevant damages and they can only be made good separately and independently from their counterparts.

> A operates a hairdresser's salon in a house which is damaged by T's lorry. Of necessity the business must be closed for a period. O, the owner of the building, and A have each suffered loss, O as a result of the infringement of his property right and A as a result of the infringement of her right to lawful possession of the salon. O has a claim to compensation for the repair costs; A has an independent claim to compensation for the loss of business income during the time in which it was not possible to operate the salon. The fact constellation required in VI.–6:104 is not present here.

Reference to Book III. The Article deals with the question by making reference to the rules in Book III, Chapter 4, Section 2 (Plurality of creditors). Within these rules, III.–4:202 (Solidary, divided and joint rights) distinguishes between these different types of right; III.–4:203 (When different types of right arise) paragraph (1) stipulates that whether a right to performance is solidary, divided or joint depends on the terms regulating the right, and paragraph (2) of the same Article provides that the default rule is that the rights of co-creditors are divided.

Significance for the rules in this Book. These basic rules also apply to situations which may arise in the law on non-contractual liability. In view of the variety of possible case constellations, a more precise rule could not be formulated. The point of departure may nonetheless be set down, namely that in principle the damages must accrue to the person who in actual fact suffers a loss due to the property damage. This is because such a loss is a prerequisite for the fact that a person has suffered a legally relevant damage according to the rules of Chapter 2. The mere breach of a right is not sufficient for this except in those specific situations in which the very breach itself is expressly qualified as legally relevant damage.

Illustration 3
T, driving too fast, loses control of a lorry on a bend and damages a house owned by O. The land on which the building stands is burdened with a security in favour of the B bank. Both O and B suffer an infringement of their property rights. The quantum of loss in each case, however, depends on the circumstances of the particular case. Depending on the creditworthiness of O, the width of the security (i.e. whether it extends to O's right to reparation and any proceeds of it) and the extent of their (other) securities, the bank may suffer only a limited loss or perhaps none at all. In the latter case, despite the infringement of its property right, B suffers no legally relevant damage.

Illustration 4
The facts are the same as in illustration 1. If B performs the obligations under the contract with S, as agreed, and continues to pay the instalments of the price, a case of default does not arise. S has no loss; B alone is entitled to the damages. Things are different where at the time of the accident B has already stopped performing the obligations under the contract of sale. In case of doubt, B is entitled to the part of the claim in damages that correlates to the percentage of the cost price which has already been paid off and S to the other part. That is so, in any event, where the car is a total loss. Conversely, where lesser damage is involved, which can still be reasonably removed by repair, both of the injured parties are entitled as joint creditors to the claim to reparation for repair costs and the claims due to loss of use and loss in value of the now damaged car; this is in the case where the security interest matures. The issue of equalising the interests between them is an issue that should not burden the action for damages following from the accident. As a consequence, each creditor may only demand performance to both collectively (see III.–4:202 (Solidary, divided and joint rights) paragraph (3)).

1. In FRENCH tort law, this problem is seldom discussed; apparently, whoever has paid the costs of repair is entitled to compensation. At any rate, the relevant damage must be immediate, ascertained and personal (Cass.civ. 23 May 1997, GazPal 1977, II, 677). A damages claim can only be asserted by a person who has actually suffered damage (Mazeaud/Mazeaud/Tunc, Traité théorique et pratique de la responsabilité civile délictuelle et contractuelle[6], no. 272 p. 359). If more than one person is affected by the same act, it is not possible that they suffer the same damage. This is the case e.g. where a person is killed, where the extent of liability essentially turns on how many family members survive the deceased (Savatier, Traité de la responsabilité civil II, no. 559 p. 125). Each person concerned is entitled to assert their own individual claim, each person has a right to claim compensation for the damage that they suffer, this compensation is assessed on a discretionary basis by the court of first instance (Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[3], no. 291 p. 120). Consequently, a partner in a commercial firm who suffers economic loss following the death of one of the other partners can bring an action for his individual loss which results out of the diminution in the value of the business (Cass.crim. 16 May 1979, JCP 1979, IV, 237).

2. As far as BELGIUM is concerned, it has been pointed out that it is invariably the case that whenever several persons hold a property right in a damaged thing (or a right to it), the claim to compensation of one holder of a property right restricts the claim of the other. At any rate, owners of property and tenants of a house that has sustained damage cannot claim a higher sum in total than what would have been due to the landlord, had he not rented the house (Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 152 p. 301).

3. In SPAIN, each holder of a joint right, independently and in his own name, is permitted to pursue the matter on behalf of the rest of community of right holders; as a general rule, the judgment which is handed down also operates in favour of the other rightsholders (TS 31 January 1973, RAJ 1973 [1] no. 100 p. 74; Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Miquel], Código Civil II[2], 1077). Most notably, special rules can be discovered in the Intellectual Property, Patents and Utility Models Act (Ley 11/1986, de patentes de invención y modelos de utilidad, of 20 March 1986) art. 72 states that: "(1) Where a patent application or patent already granted belongs to a number of persons in undivided parts, the resultant co-ownership shall be governed by agreement among the parties or, in its absence, by the provisions of the present Article, or, ultimately, by the common law provisions on joint ownership. (2) However, any one of the parties alone may […] (d) bring civil or criminal action against third parties who in any way injure the rights conferred by the joint application or patent. The party exercising such action shall be obliged to notify the other parties of the action taken so that they may also take part". A similar provision can be found in Trade Marks Act (Ley 17/2001, de marcas, of 7 December 2001) art. 46(1). According to the legal doctrine, the co-owners of a trade mark or patent right are to be regarded as solidary creditors of the obligation that arises from the infringement of the right and therefore the debtor of the obligation to compensate damages (i.e. the infringer of the right) is entitled to pay to any of the solidary creditors; but where only one of them has brought the tort law suit, the debtor is obliged to pay to that creditor (CC art. 1142; Reglero Campos [-Reglero Campos], Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 2207 and, concerning patents right, TS 13 May 1996, RAJ 1996 [2] no. 3903 p. 5054). The assessment of the amount of damages will depend on the share of ownership. However, the assessment of damages seems to be more difficult within the scope of the relationship between rightholder and licensee of intellectual property rights. It is usually admitted that where the licensee is an exclusive one, the damage is basically sustained by the licensee and although both the rightholder and the licensee are entitled to claim (Patents Act arts. 62 and 124(1)) the right to compensation belongs to the licensee. Therefore, if the plaintiff is not the same person who has the right to compensation, he/she has to reverse in the internal relationship the compensation to that other person (Portellano Díez, La defensa del derecho de patente, 112). In case the rightholder also sustained a damage by the infringement (for instance, the loss of reputation of the patented invention: Patents Act art. 68), it should be assessed in the internal relationship who is entitled to the compensation (Portellano Díez loc. cit.).

4. Under ITALIAN law, only a buyer, and not a seller retaining property in the goods under a retention of title clause has a right to claim reparation against the person who caused damage to the thing. The rationale for this is the damage is only suffered by the buyer as s/he alone used the thing (Cass. 30 May 1981, no. 3541, Giur.it.Mass. 1981, fasc. 5; Tribunale Superiore delle Acque 16 January 1995, no. 3, Cons. Stato, 1995, II, 122). The seller is confined to asserting a claim against the buyer (Carpino, Obbligazioni e contratti III, 319). A similar state of affairs can be observed without the framework of a contract for the lease of goods. The right to reparation devolves upon the lessee because the damage occurs in his legal sphere (Bianca, Diritto civile V, 597). The legal position is not as clear -cut if the thing that is damaged or destroyed is burdened with a proprietary security right. The claim of person holding the security right in the property is denied, partly on the basis of the argument that the security interest also comprises part of the former's compensation claim (CC art. 2742(1)), with the result that the secured creditor does not suffer a legally relevant damage (Bianca loc. cit.). In addition, CC art. 2743 also confers upon the creditor a right to demand that the debtor provide something else as security if the originally encumbered asset was destroyed or becomes worthless. The counter argument that is made is, namely, that the proprietary interest as such must be protected by tort law on the grounds that the claim arising under CC art. 2743 could be rendered worthless in some cases (see further de Cupis, Il danno II, 61-62). The predominant view in legal writing is that the right to assert a claim iure proprio is conferred upon the holder of a lien owing to the fact that s/he exercises factual control over the thing (Cendon [-Realmonte], Commentario al codice civile VI, sub art. 2789 p. 333). If ownership and possession diverge, then each person concerned has the right to assert a claim for the damage that he has sustained (Sacco, Il possesso, 309; Cendon [-Gaudino] loc. cit. IV(2), sub art. 2043, § 20.1 p. 2016). The same holds true for the relationship between owner/detentor (Cas. 10 June 1977, no. 2420, Rep.Giur.it. 1977, voce Resp. civ. 185; Cass. 22 July 1971, no. 2410, Foro it. 1971, I, 2482; Cass. 23 October 1976, no. 3815, Foro it. 1977, I, 2763). Therefore, the lessee may claim compensation for the loss of use of a leased good, the claim for compensation on the grounds of the diminished value of the good falls to be asserted by the owner (Cass. 27 July 1998, no. 7337, Giur.it. 1999, I, 1, 1601; Cass.sez.un. 30 March 1972, no. 1008, Foro it. 1972, I, 880; Cass. 24 February 1981, no. 1131, Giur.it. 1981, I, 1, 1586).

5. In HUNGARY, the following distinction is made. If there are several co-owners of the same thing, then they are co-creditors of the claim to reparation (cf CC § 139(1)). Within the internal relationship between the co-owners, the compensation is allocated in proportion to their share in the ownership (CC § 141). If several persons hold different rights in rem over the same thing then, as a general rule, the owner is regarded as the injured party vis á vis the injuring party (arg. e CC § 99) if it relates to property damage and reparation to one person will also make reparation to another (cf Marton, A polgári jogi felelősség, 136). According to property law provisions, s/he must then grapple with the holder of the security right in the property (e.g. CC §§ 159(3) and 163 [usufruct] and § 260 [lien]). A similar situation prevails in the context of a lease: the owner is regarded as the injured party who, for his part, must contend with the lessee under the provisions of the law relating to the lease of goods (CC §§ 424(1), 430(2)). Where title is retained in goods that are destroyed or damaged, the tenet, derived from an analogous interpretation of the passing of risk provisions under CC § 368(3) which deals with immoveable property (for further analysis of this analogy, please see Kisfaludi, Az adásvételi szerződés, 183-185; Bíró [-Bíró], Szerződési Alaptípusok, 51-53) is that the reparation claim may be asserted by the buyer.

6. BULGARIAN legal writing does not provide any pointers on this issue. If the seller retains title, then, in the case of loss or damage to the good, the risk passes to the buyer (LOA art. 205(1)). Whether the claim to reparation (in exceptional cases) can be directly asserted by the buyer or whether he is forced to tackle the seller has not been determinatively resolved.

7. In GERMAN law, the question as to who is entitled to assert a claim is a polemical one. A judgment handed down by RG 1 July 1942, RGZ 170, 1, 7, which, even today, is followed by a number of legal writers (z.B. Müller-Laube, JuS 1993, 529, 534), ordains that a buyer on reservation of title terms is solely entitled to assert a damages claim; namely, s/he is the holder of a proprietary right (the socalled Anwartschaftsrecht). However, BGH 11 November 1970, BGHZ 55, 20, 31 took a different approach and divided the indemnity between the owner and purchaser in proportion to the values held. The buyer's damages will not run to the extent of the full value of the good (plus damages for loss of use); this is because the remaining outstanding payments in respect of the good are to be deducted from this amount. The remainder must be asserted by the owner. Another approach proclaims that solely the seller under a reservation of title clause is entitled to assert a damages claim, however, s/he can only demand that the buyer receive performance (Flume, Allgemeiner Teil des Bürgerlichen Rechts II[3], 741). In reliance on CC §§ 851 and 1281, a fourth view advocates employing, with appropriate adaptations, the rules which govern several creditors of an indivisible performance (CC § 432) (Baur and Stürner, Sachenrecht[17], 761; Larenz and Canaris, Schuldrecht II(2)[13], 393; MünchKomm [-Wagner], BGB[4], § 823, no. 146; Staudinger [-Hager], BGB[13], § 823, no. B 155). Comparable problems of concurrence exist in the context of the relationship between the owner and creditor with a right of lien or the person in possession of the property. With the aim being to avoid the damaging party being hit with a twofold claim for compensation, the majority view among legal practitioners is to commend an analogous application of CC § 1281 BGB. This entails that the injuring party is only obliged to effect performance to the owner and to the other entitled persons jointly and indeed may only do so. Other commentators favour a solution which is derived from CC § 428 (joint creditors of an indivisible performance) or rely on the concept of restitution in kind (see further Wagner loc. cit. no. 144 and Medicus, Bürgerliches Recht[20], no. 609).

8. According to AUSTRIAN CC § 1295, a person has a right to claim compensation for damage which another has inflicted on him. This means that the person who is directly injured, namely, every person whose rights are infringed. Other persons holding a proprierty right as well as the owner (or co-owner) are included within the provision's scope. Within the internal relationship, The coowners' right to pursue a claim for reparation and the distribution of damages are governed by the rules relating to co-ownership or partnership law. In contrast, if damage is not only caused to the person of the owner but, at the same time, the financial status of a person standing in a contractual relationship with the owner who primarily suffers harms, is also compromised by the injuring event, then the rules governing recovery of compensation on account of damage sustained by third parties. This deals with the problematic case, where the primary victim does not suffer a detriment or, at any rate, only a minor one on the grounds that the risk of financial loss was already contractually shifted to a third party (Rummel [-Reischauer], ABGB I[3], § 1295 no. 27). However, the latter has only suffered (as a general rule, irrecoverable) pure economic loss. This is regarded as being incorrect (OGH 22 November 1978, SZ 51/164 p. 725; OGH 26 June 1991, JBl 2003, 379). Consequently, the defence, namely that the third party was merely a secondary victim, may not be availed of by the injuring party. Therefore, the former can require that s/he receive the same extent of compensation as the owner would have been entitled to, had there not been a passing of risk (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 13/24). The most important case of application for this doctrine is where the goods being sold are destroyed after the passing of risk; however, it is, inter alia, also employed within the framework of transactions on a commission basis and cases concerning the continuance of salary payments (Bollenberger, JBl 1997, 284). The rules governing recovery of compensation in respect of damage sustained by a third party can also impinge on other fields of law (OGH 18 February 1986, JBl 1986, 468), for example, if a leased business premises are culpably destroyed and, as a result, the lessee who merely has contractual rights, suffers damage (Koziol loc. cit. no. 13/5; Harrer, Schadenersatzrecht, 67).

9. For an analysis of the legal position in GREECE see above note II22 under VI.–2:206. Under PORTUGUESE CC art. 1405, as a general rule, co-owners can pursue claims against third parties on their own behalf (the exception being rei vindicatio) (Neto, Código Civil Anotado[14], 1156, note 4 under art. 1405) and, therefore, the compensation claim is proportionate to their share in the co-ownership (CA Oporto 4 June 1981, CJ [1981-3], 143). Under procedural law, we are dealing with a litisconsórcio voluntário. The holders of the right may elect to pursue the claim alone or jointly with the other co-owners. If they choose the second path, then the court will only award them a sum of damages in proportion to the share of ownership, insofar as this is permitted by the nature of the claim (CCP art. 27; see STJ 27 June 1995, BolMinJus 448 [1995] 309-313; Neto loc. cit. 1157, note 15 under art. 1405).

10. DUTCH CC art. 6:15(1) provides that, if a performance is owed to two or more creditors, each creditor may pursue claim to an equal share provided that no other result can be derived from law, custom or other juridical act. By contrast, the creditors have a joint single claim where an indivisible performance is concerned or the right to assert the claim is held jointly. In the context of co-ownership, CC art. 3:170(2) provides that the co-owners may only proceed with a joint claim for compensation against a third party (see further T&C Vermogensrecht[4] [-Valk] art. 6:15, pp. 2133-2134; Verbintenissenrecht I [-Busch] art. 6:15, nos. 3-8 pp. 2-12). ESTONIAN LOA §§ 73-75 contains a number of general rules governing the plurality of creditors.

11. In the NORDIC countries damages for the mere loss of value of damaged property may be awarded to either the owner or other property right holder, or to both, but the total liability of the tortfeasor has to remain unaffected (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 362). This may also be derived from the Insurance Contract Acts of SWEDEN (chap. 9 § 1), FINLAND (chap. 9 § 62) and DENMARK (§ 54) which provide for compensation by a property value insurance to third persons, such as the holder of an usufruct, a security right holder, or a person who carries the risk for the property in connection with the transfer of ownership in it. In a similar fashion, these provisions do not specifically lay down what share can be recovered by each of the respective claimants; only the fact that more than one claimant does not entail an increase in the damages will awarded, is not surrounded by doubt (Radetzki, Skadeståndsberäkning vid sakskada, 60; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 293). The following rule is of general applicability, namely, the person who, following the conclusion of a contract (already concluded or still to be concluded) bears the risk of loss, may also assert a damages claim against the injuring party (Radetzki loc cit. 62; Andersson, Trepartsrelationer i skadeståndsrätten, 148-151). Holders of limited property rights who exercise control over the property may in some (so far not very clearly specified) cases have an own right to claim damages (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 298; Andersson loc cit. 137).

VI.–6:105: Solidary liability

Where several persons are liable for the same legally relevant damage, they are liable solidarily.

COMMENTS

A. Solidary liability of multiple liable persons

Common European law. This Article expresses a rule which is part of every Member State's legal system and is also to be found in Community Law (primarily in Council Directive 85/374/EEC of 25th July 1985 on liability for defective products art. 5): if several persons are liable to the injured person for causing the same damage, they are solidarily liable. This rule has also prevailed (with some minor differences in the details) in a notable fashion where, under the wording of the legal authorities, another solution (separate liability) would have been more obvious.

Policy considerations. The principle formulated in the Article is justified by a range of policy considerations. Each of the liable persons has caused the entire damage and so is therefore liable to the victim for the reparation of the entire damage. It should not become a "defence" against the victim – so far as the economic result is concerned - that another person has also caused the same damage. The victim should not be expected to establish the respective shares of liability; this issue must be ironed out by the liable persons between themselves. It would be unfair to require the injured person always to sue each and every liable person and dispute with them all and it would be especially unfair to require the injured person to bear the risk of personal insolvency of one of the liable persons. The injured person should in fact have the option of pursuing the person from whom reparation can probably be obtained most quickly and most easily. Along with economic reasons (inability to pay), legal and tactical considerations may also play a role here. One claim might be more difficult to establish than another or it may seem desirable not to bring an action against a particular person, in order to remain free to call that person as a witness (e.g. the employee of the liable employer).

Terminology. The Article invokes the terminology of III.–4:102 (Solidary, divided and joint obligations), which states: "An obligation is solidary when each debtor is bound to perform the obligation in full and the creditor may require performance of any of them until full performance has been received". The present Article provides an answer for one situation for the purposes of III.–4:103 (When different types of obligation arise) paragraph (1) and simultaneously establishes the principle of solidary liability of several liable persons in the law on non-contractual liability. Furthermore, the present Article is confirmation of the general rule in III.–4:103 (When different types of obligation arise) paragraph (2), second sentence, according to which the liability of several persons for the same damage is solidary in cases of doubt.

Scope of application. The Article covers all cases in which at least two persons are responsible for the same damage under the rules of this Book. "The same damage" may relate to only a part of the overall loss of the victim. The Article then applies to this part. The basis of the liability of the individual liable persons plays no role in relation to the injured person. Accessories are just as liable under solidary liability as accomplices, and as persons whose contribution to the chain of causation is presumed under VI.–4:103 (Alternative causes) and who cannot rebut this presumption. It is possible for liability due to a positive act and liability due to an omission to converge; the same goes for fault-based and strict liability (e.g. in the case of liability of employees and employers), and in the same way it can happen that two bases of strict liability may concur and ground solidary liability.

Illustration
At 5.30 am, horses of different owners are standing out on a dark roadway. The horses have broken out of their paddock. A man rides into the group of horses on his motorbike and is fatally injured as a result. Through hair follicles from a mare and a gelding found on the motor bike, forensic scientists can identify the owners of the two horses. The two owners are solidarily liable to the widow.

B. Internal allocation of liability

III.–4:106 (Apportionment between solidary debtors). VI.–6:105 does not deal with the internal allocation of liability between the solidarily liable parties. This is already adequately dealt with in III.–4:106 (Apportionment between solidary debtors). Paragraph (2) of that Article sets out the basic rule that in their internal relationship each of the co-debtors is burdened with the same share of the debt. However, superimposed on that basic rule is a reasonableness test. Deviations from liability in per capita shares may be justified for a multitude of reasons which are not susceptible of being comprehensively listed. From the point of view of the law on non-contractual liability the most important factors are the extent of the fault of the participants and the extent of the realisation of a danger for which Chapter 3, Section 2 of this Book imposes strict liability. However, contribution between the debtors may also be affected by matters which are not related to the law on non-contractual liability – in particular those which derive from a contractual relationship between the co-debtors. It may be, for example, that a person has contractually agreed with an owner to keep the latter's building safe. In such a case the contractor alone will be liable in a question with the owner. As regards contribution between an employer and an employee in cases in which both are liable as solidary debtors to a third party, VI.–7:204 (Liability of employees, employers, trade unions and employer's associations) applies. Questions relating to employment law are not addressed by this Book.

NOTES

1. FRENCH CC art. 1202 consecrates the following principle, namely that solidary liability will not be presumed. However, at an early stage, the Cass.civ. 11 July 1892, D. 1894, I, 561, note Levillain held that where damage is caused by the fautes of two or more persons, each comes under an obligation to make reparation for the full extent of the damage. This is termed the socalled liability in solidum. Today, the only prerequisite remaining is the several faits générateurs cause the same damage; no distinction is drawn between liability which is based on faute and the gardien liability (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 864 p. 839). By contrast, if the several coauteurs cause different damage and the particular damage caused can only be attributed to one specific coauteur, then s/he is solely liable (Cass.civ. 19 April 1956, JCP 1956 éd. G., II, 9381). If the faits générateurs do not occur at the same time, this state of affairs will not hinder in solidum-liability will not be hindered (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2006/2007], no. 1741; see also Cass.civ. 25 January 2007, JCP 2007 éd. G, no. 10 p. 29, note Radé [in solidum-liability of blood transfusion services and injuring person for AIDS infection]). If the wrongdoers are liable in solidum, then a coauteur who has satisfied the entire claim, can recover a contribution, based on the respective share of liability from the other solidary tortfeasors in the internal relationship (CC art. 1251(3)). The shares of liability are apportioned on a discretionary basis by the court (Cass.civ. 11 January 1979, Bull.civ. 1979, II, no. 19 p. 14). Above all, the court examines the gravity of the faute committed by each of the relevant parties (Cass.civ. 3 April 1973, GazPal 1973 jur. 559; Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[11], no. 173 p. 172). If the insurer of one of the coauteurs pays the compensation owed, then the insurer is subrogated to the insured's right to claim contribution against the remaining tortfeasors (Code des Assurances art. L121-12). If the injured party decides not to proceed in his claim against one of the coauteurs, the latter remains nonetheless liable to the other coauteurs within the internal relationship (Cass.civ. 7 June 1977, Bull.civ. 1977, I, no. 266 p. 210).

2. Similarly, despite the rule in CC art. 1202, the Belgian courts presume a in solidum-liability if several persons cause the same damage (Cass. 2 April 1936, Pas. belge 1936, I, 209; Cass. 10 July 1952, Pas. belge 1952, I, 738). Here, no distinction is drawn between liability which is based on fault and strict liability. In solidum-liability will even arise if the court can determine the part played by each of the parties in events giving rise to the damaging occurence and their share of liability in respect to that damage (van Gerven and Covemaeker, Verbintenissenrecht[2], 556). If the tortfeasors have acted intentionally, then a true in-solidum liability under CC arts. 1200 et seq arises (Cass. 3 May 1996, Pas. belge 1996, I, 410). The right of the debtor in solidum, who has already paid off the plaintiff's entire claim, to seek contribution from the remaining tortfeasors is primarily derived from CC art. 1251(3) (Cass. 17 June 1982, Pas. belge 1982, I, 1221), occasionally, however, the rules on enrichissement sans cause govern this situation (Cass. 21 October 1965, Pas. belge 1966, I, 240) or CC art. 1382 may apply (Cass. 17 June 1982, Pas. belge 1982, I, 1221). The amount that can be recovered under a contribution claim essentially depends on the magnitude of respective fault and on the degree to which each of the separate torts contributed to cause the damage (van Gerven and Covemaeker loc. cit. 434-435).

3. In a similar fashion, the SPANISH CC art. 1137 also adopts the principle of divided liability as a point of departure, not that of solidary liabilty. Case law has, however, made the exception the general rule in many legal areas and has, inter alia, pronounced "solidary liability is the general rule" for all contractual law cases (TS 11 July 2006, BDA RAJ 2006/4977 at FJ 7; see also TS 31 October 2005, RAJ 2005 (5) no. 7351 p. 15730). A specific rule on plurality of debtors is absent in the tort law regulations of the CC. However, several special statutes ordain a system of solidary liability (e.g. Air Navigation Act [Ley 48/1960, de navegación aérea, of 21 July 1960] art. 123; Nuclear Energy Act [Ley 25/1964, reguladora de la energía nuclear, of 29 April 1964] art. 52; ConsProtA art. 132; Construction Act [Ley 38/1999, de ordenación de la edificación, of 5 November 1999] art. 17(3); Press and Printing Act [Ley 14/1966, de prensa e imprenta, of 18 March 1966] art. 65 [on this, see further TS 17 March 2004, RAJ 2004 (2) no. 1927 p. 3697]), and the rules on the imposition of civil liability for the commission of criminal offence also proceed from the assumption that solidary liability applies (CP art. 116). According to prevailing view practitioners, that the principle of solidary liability is operative can be derived the abovementioned provisions. If it is possible to ascertain precisely the contribution made by each of the tortfeasors to the damage caused, only then will the issue of solidary liability not arise (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 557-558; Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños[3], 174; Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Pantaleón], Código Civil II[2], art. 1902, p. 2001; for the applicability of CC art. 1137 in a tort law context, see, however Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Caffarena], Código Civil II[2], art. 1137, p. 120). The courts had long determined that several tortfeasors causing the same damage, are solidary liable (TS 3 December 1998, RAJ 1998 (5) no. 9703 p. 14187; TS 15 July 2000, RAJ 2000 (4) no. 6885 p. 10573; TS 13 February 2001, RAJ 2001 (4) no. 853 p. 10573; TS 10 March 1994, RAJ 1994 (1) no. 1736 p. 2323; TS 15 December 1999, RAJ 1999? (5) no. 8908 p. 13978). Here, the only prerequiste is that the degree to which the defendant contributed to cause the damage cannot be precisely determined (TS 27 June 2001, RAJ 2001 (3) no. 5087 p. 7758; TS 31 October 2003, RAJ 2003 (5) no. 7978 p. 14953). The Tribunal Supremo would not affirm solidarity when it is possible to precisely individualise the liability of each of the torfeasors (TS 3 April 1987, RAJ 1987 (2) no. 2485 p. 2327; 23 January 2004, RAJ 2004 (1) no. 1 p. 17). The rationale for the validity of the principle of solidary liability is based on the notion of victim protection. In this connection, the Supreme Court often refers to the emergence of solidaridad impropia ('improper or sui generis solidarity'), namely because, in this context, soliday liability does not result from either under a contract or pursuant to a statutory regulation (TS 7 November 2000, RAJ 2000 (5) no. 9911 p. 15406; TS 29 May 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 5216 p. 9730). The most important legal consequence of this is that it enables the injured party to take action against anyone of the concurrent tortfeasors (TS 1 July 1986, RAJ 1986 (3) no. 4559 p. 4416; TS 22 January 2004, RAJ 2004 (1) no. 207 p. 384). The issue of whether an interruption in the running of the presecription period operates in favour of the remaining tortfeasors does not appear to have been definitively determined (in favour inter alia, TS 17 December 1979, RAJ 1979 (2) no. 4363 p. 3532 und TS 14 April 2001, RAJ 2001 (2) no. 3640 p. 5587; against TS 21 October 2002, RAJ 2002 (5) no. 8770 p. 16021 and TS 14 March 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 3645 p. 6729). That a concurrent wrongdoer who has paid the entire compensation may assert a claim for contribution against the remaining tortfeasors is derived from CC art. 1145(2). In case of doubt, concurrent tortfeasors are liable for the same share of the damage caused (CC art. 1138).

4. ITALIAN CC art. 2055 which is operative in the tort law context, provides that where several tortfeasors are responsible for the same damage, they are liable in solidum. Each concurrent wrongdoer must have contributed to cause the damage (Cass. 4 February 1992, no. 1147, Foro it. 1992, I, 2127) and each of them must have violated the same interest (Cass. 18 July 2002, no. 10403, Giust.civ. 2003, I, 2876). CC art. 2055 is also applicable in the strict liability context, furthermore, if, in the concrete case at hand, one tortfeasor is at fault, whereas the other is not fault but is strictly liable (Alpa, Trattato di diritto civile IV, 330; Salvi, La responsabilità civile[2], 235). Each injured party may claim the entire compensation from any one of the concurrent wrongdoers; among the concurrent tortfeasors, the right to claim contribution remains intact (Cass. 17 November 2003, no. 17372, Giust.civ. 2004, I, 637). Generally, the claim is asecertained by examining the magnitude and the degree to which the tortfeasors contributed to the accident; in case of doubt, it is presumed that the respective degrees of faults are equal (CC art. 2055). If a concurrent tortfeasor is liable under strict liability, the widespread view is held that fault is replaced by an examination of the extent of contribution to the damage caused (Salvi loc. cit.).

5. HUNGARIAN CC § 344 corresponds to VI.–6:105. If several persons cause the same damage, then they are solidarily liable; the extent of their liability towards each other is fixed in proportionate to their degree of blameworthiness. Here, the courts can take into account the fact that one of wrongdoers has obtained a particular benefit from the commission of the tort (Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 95-99; Petrik [-Harmathy], Polgári jog II[2], 582). If there is any doubt about the degree of blameworthiness, liability is divided in equal proportions among the concurrent tortfeasors. However, according to CC §

344(3), the courts are entitled to refrain from imposing a liability which is joint and several and may instead impose liability on the tortfeasors in proportion to their contributions if (a) this will endanger or significantly delay the award of compensation, or if (b) the injured party also contributed to cause the damage or was remiss in asserting his claim and could adduce no cogent ground to excuse the delay. A reform of this provision is to be expected. Incidentially, solidary liability also arises even if each of the tortfeasors is liable on different legal grounds (Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 79; Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1238-1240).

6. Similarly, according to BULGARIAN LOA art. 53, solidary liability arises when the same damage is caused by multiple persons. This principle is, however, subject to some exceptions which can be discovered in specific statutes. The exceptions concern liability for damage to ship and cargo following a ship collison (Commercial Shipping Code art. 314(1)(first sentence): In the context of divided liability, responsibility is apportioned according to the degree of fault). However, in the context of this exception, solidary liability continues to apply if personal injury is caused (loc. cit. art. 314(2)). If the concurrent wrongdoers are held to be co –principals in the commission of a crime by the criminal courts, that judgment of the criminal court binds the civil court when apportioning the responsibility of those solidarily liable (CCP art. 300). ROMANIAN CC art. 1003 makes clear that solidary liability arises where "a tort or quasi-tort can be imputed to several persons". The most frequent example that crops up in practice concerns the solidary liability of employees and employers to a third party (CC art. 1000(3); Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 358-359). Persons who jointly cause damage also liable in solidium under SLOVENIAN LOA art. 186(1). The same holds true for instigators, accessories and persons who attempt to conceal the identity of the injuring party (LOA art. 186(2)). Likewise, tortfeasors, who, although acting independently cause the same damage, are liable in solidum, unless their precise causal contribution can be ascertained (LOA art. 186(3)). The parties to a building contract will be liable in solidum to a third party for damage caused during the course of construction of the building (CC art. 187).

7. According to GERMAN CC § 840(1), if several persons is responsible for damage arising from the commission of a tort, then those persons are solidary liable. CC § 840(1) does not denote an independent cause of action (BGH 7 November 1978, BGHZ 72, 355, 358), rather it is regarded as a basis for structuring the tortfeasors' liability to the injured party and the internal legal relationship between the tortfeasors.. The concept of "unlawful act" is given a wide interpretation and embraces all types of extra contractual liability. In particular, it also extends to strict liability (which is the subject of specific regulation in various ad hoc statutes, see further Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 840, no. 1; Erman [-Schiemann], BGB II[11], § 840, no. 2). Each solidary tortfeasor is liable to compensate the claimant for the entire damage, the claimant, however, is only entitled to recover compensation once. The tortfeasors among themselves are liable in equal shares unless otherwise determinable (CC § 426(1)(first sentence)). Statute can "determine otherwise" (e.f. CC § 840(2) and (3)), as can a pre-existing legal relationship between those responsible or it simply follows from the circumstances (Sprau loc. cit. no. 7).

8. In AUSTRIA, solidary liability can either arise where multiple wrongdoers contribute to cause the same damage and this damage can be imputed to them, or if a tortious claim to compensation coincides with a claim based on another legal ground (e.g. in unjustified enrichment). In both cases, of course, the injured party will not be compensated twice over. With respect to the first case, (plurality of tortfeasors), CC §§ 1301 and 1302, most notably, provide that solidary liability is to arise; these provisions also apply outside the confines of fault based liability, unless, the relevant special statutes contain specific regulations to the contrary (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 14/7). Notwithstanding the wording of both provisions, the prevailing interpretation of CC §§ 1301 and 1302 is that the existence of a common plan is not a prerequisite for solidary liability to arise. Instead, solidary liability is said to arise if several persons independently cause the same damage (Koziol loc. cit.). However, CC § 1302 provides that divided liability will arise if (i) the respective degrees of contribution to the entire damage can be determined and that it concerns (ii) damage that was caused through negligence (CC § 1302 second sentence). By contrast, tortfeasors acting together will not be able to avail of the advantages conferred by divided liability, on the grounds that each wrongdoer is in any event liable for the entire damage and therefore, what holds for one concurrent wrongdoer must hold. dass jeder von ihnen ohnehin auf den gesamten Schaden hafte und nicht deshalb begünstigt werden solle, weil dasselbe auch noch für einen anderen Nebentäter zurifft (Koziol loc. cit. no. 14/11). Since the injured party, ordinarily has no knowledge of the course of events which led to the commission of the tort nor does he have any idea about the respective causal contributions to the damage, it is considered that s/he deserves the protection of a claim based solely on the fact that a possible contributor to the injury may have caused it (Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Karner] ABGB[2], § 1302 no. 3). Solidary liability also arises where it is not possible to identify the tortfeasors' respective separate shares in causing the damage or where the injury has been caused intentionally (CC § 1302 second sentence). Acting in concert to carry out the forbidden intent will, in itself, be sufficient (see further Karner loc. cit. § 1301 no. 3). Joint tortfeasors are even liable solidarily under CC § 1302, if the respective shares in causing the injury can be established affirmatively (OGH 14 April 1957, SZ 27/103; OGH 2 September 1970, SZ 43/141; against Koziol loc. cit. no. 14/10). Internally, the right to seek contribution in order to apportion the loss is regulated by CC § 896.

9. GREEK CC art. 926 first sentence ordains solidary liability in the event that the damage is the result of joint action by several persons. The notion of "joint acton" is broadly interpreted; it is sufficient that several persons make a causal contribution to commit the tort (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 926, no. 5; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 572). Employer and employee or supervisor and supervisee are liable in solidum, in a similar fashion, the owner of a newspaper, the editor and all other persons listed in the Media Acts are solidarily liable for defamatory publications (A.P. 635/2001, EllDik 42 [2001] 1639). Each concurrent wrongdoer is liable for the entire amount of the plaintiff's claim, the plaintiff is not, however, permitted to obtain double recovery (A.P. 119/1999, NoB 48 [2000] 478). Liability of the concurrent tortfeasors to each other essentially depends on the respective degree of fault (CC art. 927); in the case of doubt, they share responsibility equally. As regards the respective magnitude of fault, the respective degree of causal contribution is also taken into account in apportioning liability (Georgiades loc.cit. art. 927, no. 10), which permits CC art. 927 to be applied correspondingly if the tortfeasors commit two independent strict liability torts which coincide to cause the same damage (Georgiades loc.cit. no. 15).

10. PORTUGUESE CC art. 497(1) makes clear that multiple tortfeasors are solidary liable. Solidary liability is also of great importance in the law regulating traffic accidents (CC art. 507(1)). The concurrent tortfeasor right to recover contribution from his fellow concurrent tortfeasors is determined by the magnitude of respective fault; in case of any doubt, the concurrent tortfeasors share liabilty in equal proportions (CC art. 497(2)). The general rules on solidary liability (CC arts. 512 et seq) are applied. CC art. 497 governs all types of delictual liability, it therefore embraces e.g. instigators and auxiliaries (CC art. 490; STJ 13 September 2006; STJ 29 March 1989, BolMinJus 385 [1989] 379; Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 85 [1959] 115, 139), principals/employers (CC art. 500; STJ 14 September 2006; CA Oporto 22 April 1972, BolMinJus 216 [1972] 199; STJ 12 January 1984, BolMinJus 333 [1984] 413), supervisors (CC art. 491; STJ 21 September 2006), owners and possessors of a building (STJ 12 June 2003), and the State (CC art. 501; Const. art. 22; STJ 14 September 2006; STJ 20 January 2005). CC art. 497(1) does not concern the causal contribution made by the injured party; this issue is mentioned in connection with contributory negligence (CC art. 570; STJ 2 November 1971, BolMinJus 211 [1971] 276; Neto, Código Civil Anotado[14], 515). An array of special statutes governing the liability of specific persons and cases also provide for the imposition of solidary liability; in in contrast, consorts (the members of an unincorporated joint venture) are only subject to a regime of proportionate liability (Decree-law no. 231/81, of July 28, art. 19(3); see Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 607, note 2). In the internal relationship amongst the concurrent tortfeasors, if one tortfeasor was at fault, and, in contrasdistinction to this, the other was strictly liable and did not commit a fault, then, the former bears the entire loss (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], note 1 under art. 497, p. 502; Almeida Costa loc. cit.; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 697; see also CC arts. 507(2) and 497(2)). If both wrongdoers were strictly liable, then the apportionment of liability will depend on the respective causal contributions to the injury. In the context of liability for motor vehicles, it will depend on the extent of the benefit that each party obtained from using the vehicle (CC art. 507(2); Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela loc. cit. note 2 under art. 507). If one co-owner only used the vehicle for two months in the year, and the other co-owner used it for ten months, then the liability will be apportioned based on their respective aforementioned usage (see further Antunes Varela loc. cit. 698; see also STJ 18 May 2006). The same applies if several vehicles caused the same damage (Antunes Varela loc. cit. 697). Solidary liability will not arise if several separate acts have accumulated to result in the aggregate damage (RL 17 November 1983, CJ VIII (1983-5) 118: shipping company was fined for smuggling carried out by various crews of the same ship; liability of the crews involved to the company was divided, the liability of natural persons within the respective crews was solidary in respect of that crew's contribution to the damage).

11. DUTCH CC art. 6:102(1) reads: "Two or more persons who are each obliged to repair damage for the same damage are solidarily liable. In order to determine their contribution as amongst themselves pursuant to article 10, the damage shall be apportioned amongst them by corresponding application of article 101 [of Book 6] unless the law or a juridical act requires a different apportionment". Solidary liability also arises if the liabilities of the debtors are mixed (e.g. one debtor is liable under tort, another for non-performance of a contract, another under benenvolent intervention in another's affairs and another debtor is strictly liable: Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 354). The sole decisive criterion is that they are responsible for causing the same damage (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], nos. 458-460, pp. 419-421). The legal consequences of solidary liability are governed by CC arts. 6:6 et seq; of particular note, is, namely, that the injured party can claim reparation for the entire damage from any of one of the concurrent tortfeasors. As regards the right of contribution amongst the concurrent tortfeasors, dictates of equity are of considerable importance under CC art. 6:102. This provision is supplemented by CC art. 6:165(2) which provides that persons with a duty to supervise, where they failed to look after the child properly, have to bear the entire damage in the internal relationship with the other injuring parties. By relying on CC art. 6:109 (reducing compensation on equitable grounds), the foregoing result can also be taken into account when the courts come to assess the extent of compensation owed to the child (Hartkamp loc. cit. no. 21 pp. 25-27 and no. 90, pp. 98-99).

12. ESTONIAN LOA § 137(1) corresponds to VI.–6:105. Whether the concurrent wrongdoers are liable pursuant to the same cause of action or commit independent torts is of no particular relevance (RKTKo 3-2-1-48-06 – RT III 2006, 25, 228). The right to seek contribution is regulated in LOA § 137(2).

13. The principle of solidary liability is also in force in the NORDIC countries. Only SWEDEN (Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 4) and FINLAND (Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 2) have enacted an express statutory regulation to this effect; With DANISH EAL § 25, the Danish legislature have contended themselves with a rule regulating the apportionment of loss amongst the concurrent tortfeasors. The imposition of solidary liability does not hinge on any requirement that same grounds for imposing liability are extant (e.g. negligence and strict liability, see Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 238; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 387; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 323), instead, liability depends on whether the concurrent tortfeasors cause the "same damage" (In Denmark, the doctrine of 'primary cause' occasionally results in a departure from this principle: von Eyben and Isager loc cit.). Similarly, employer and employee can, in principle, be held to be liable in solidum; however, the employee enjoys special privileges as regards his liability vis á vis the victim (Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 361; Hellner and Radetzki loc cit. 271; D-Karnov 2006 [-von Eyben], Erstatningsansvarsloven, no. 113 p. 5645) (Finnish Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 2(2) even provides that an employee can only be held liable for reparation which cannot successfully be sought from the employer). According to Swedish Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 4, solidary liability is restricted, if one person's liability is reduced pursuant to the numerous adjustment clauses which reduce damages on equitable grounds. In the event of such a reduction taking place, solidary liability is then restricted to that reduced amount of compensation; the excess is a matter of sole liability of the tortfeasor who does not have the benefit of the adjustment clause (HD 16 December 1993, NJA 1993, 727; Finnish Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 2(2); von Eyben and Isager loc cit. 388). Moreover, difficult issues arise when it comes to coordinating the contributory negligence rules with those governing solidary liability. In this context, the following contentious issue arises, namely whether the extent to which the victim was guilty of contributory negligence is compared against all the concurrent tortfeasors as a unit or whether it has to assessed against each individual separately (Dufwa, Flera skadeståndsskyldiga, 4031; Hellner and Radetzki loc cit. 240; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 310; Bengtsson and Strömbäck loc cit 362). Amongst the concurrent tortfeasors themselves, only the Finnish Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 3 and Danish EAL § 25 regulates this issue statutorily. How loss is apportioned in the internal relationship will depend on an assessment of all the circumstances of the individual case, including an assessment of the magnitude of fault and the degree of respective causal contribution to the damage. Additionally, Danish EAL § 25(2) provides that the existence of liability insurance is to be taken into account: a concurrent tortfeasor who is not covered by liability insurance and who did not act intentionally or in a grossly negligent manner, is not liable to the other concurrent tortfeasors. Exceptions to this rule exist in respect of public bodies, business operators and the statutorily regulated regime of strict liability. In Sweden, it is generally accepted that an person who is strictly liable, always has a right of contribution against the multiple wrongdoers who were negligent in causing the same damage (critical on this point Hellner and Radetzki loc cit. 247).

VI.–6:106: Assignment of right to reparation

The person suffering the damage may assign a right to reparation, including a right to reparation for non-economic loss.

COMMENTS

General. This Article provides that non-contractual rights to reparation are freely assignable (and hence, depending on the applicable law of succession, also transmissible on death to heirs or successors). There is no exception for rights to the reparation of non-economic loss. From the perspective of the law on non-contractual liability for damage, it is not necessary that the right has been made the subject of a court action or recognised by the liable person before the death of the injured person; it is not even necessary that the injured person clearly declared a wish to pursue the claim if in a position to do so. In contrast, a valid waiver of the right to damages brings about its extinction; in the absence of an existing right, there is no room for assignment or succession.

Policy considerations. The ability to assign (and with it to bequeath) rights to reparation for economic damage is for the most part unproblematic. More heated policy debate continues to centre on the ability to assign or bequeath rights to reparation for non-economic loss. This Article adopts the position that such rights should not be treated any differently from rights to reparation for economic loss. This corresponds to the equation – in principle – of economic and non-economic damage, which finds expression in VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) and it is in conformity with the majority of legal systems and the trend of more recent statutory law-making.

Moral reservations obsolete. Earlier moral reservations against such a rule should nowadays be regarded as obsolete. It would unreasonably diminish the legal position of the surviving injured person if that person could not personally decide upon the means of realising the rights held. Conversely, the issue of the ability to bequeath a right to compensation for non-economic losses is indeed in principle an issue of the law of succession and as such not the subject-matter of these model rules (I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(b)). However, where the applicable law of succession is built on the principle that only those rights can be bequeathed which can be transferred in one's lifetime (thus are not of a highly personal nature and therefore do not disappear upon the death of their holder), VI.–6:106 also has an indirect effect in succession law. This is desired. There is little force in the argument that the law should not allow third parties (especially the heirs) to be "enriched" by the suffering of the deceased. The sole concern here is the post-mortem realisation of interests which the person concerned was not able to realise while alive: a dying person should at least be aware that the law will not close its eyes to the pain endured in the fight for life.

Assignability in specific cases. The Article leaves it to the injured person to decide how to realise a right to damages; it need not necessarily be exercised personally, but can be sold or donated. This applies to rights to damages of all types, even those directed at compensating for the loss of a right which would not have been assignable itself. Such a case is conceivable e.g. in the situation set out in VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death) paragraph (2)(c): the fact that the right to maintenance in question may not have been assignable under the applicable law does not mean that the right to damages for its loss should be unassignable. That may also be justified by the fact that reparation will itself often take the form of lump sum compensation and that the corresponding right should not be less freely available than a lump sum already paid.

NOTES

1. According to FRENCH law, (CC arts. 1689 ff), the general rule is that all types of claims may be assigned; exceptions only exist in respect of maintenance claims (créances alimentaires) and claims to particular social benefits (see further Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 1278 p. 1217). The view has been advanced in legal scholarship that an action en réparation d´un préjudice moral must also constitute a claim which is not capable of assignment. It is said that this claim is personal to the injured person: an assigment of a right to reparation is only permissible in cases of préjudice matériel (Mazeaud and Chabas, Obligations[9], no. 608 pp. 705-706). However, this analysis is no longer supported by the jurisprudence of the courts. Instead, it is accepted,that, in the event that the victim dies, claims for reparation of préjudice moral may be asserted by the victim's survivors (Cass.ch.mixte 30 April 1976, D. 1977 jur. 185, note Contamine-Raynaud), and indeed, this encompasses claims based on the loss of a close relative (Cass.ch.mixte 30 April 1976 loc. cit. note Contamine-Raynaud [2ème espèce]; RTD civ 1976, 556, obs. Durry; GazPal 1976 jur. 459 [for example, a claim based on pain and suffering consequent upon the death of his son in an accident,that the deceased could have brought, prior to his death, will also be vested in his survivors]; see. also Cass.civ. 11 March 1981, GazPal 1981 Pan. 240, noted. Chabas und Cass.crim. 9 October 1985, D. 1987 jur. 93, note Breton). A claim for compensation for non-pecuniary loss is also vested in the survivors even in the event that the victim of accident did not feel any pain in the short space of time prior to his death (Cass.crim. 28 October 1992, D. 1993 Som. 203, note Pradel). In BELGIUM, the general principle is that all claims are freely assignable, unless, that assignment is prohibited by law or is of a personal character dem stünde ein gesetzliches Verbot oder die persönliche Natur der Forderung entgegen (de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge III[3], no. 382 p. 368; van Gerven and Covemaeker, Verbintenissenrecht[2], 565). As far as we can tell, the issue relating to restrictions placed on the assignment of tort claims has not been broached.

2. In SPAIN, only a small minority of legal writers, mainly citing moral reservations, speak out against the assignment of tort claims (Martín Villa and Blanco, Revista de Derecho Privado 1992, 663). The legal opinion that entirely prevails regards such claims as assignable (Roca i Trias, Derecho de daño[s3], 173; Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 389; Reglero Campos [-Gómez Calle], Tratado de responsabilidad civi[l3], 461, 478), a view which finds statutory confirmation the Regulation for the Implementation concerning cover of the risk of nuclear damages (Decreto 2177/1967, reglamento sobre cobertura del riesgo de daños nucleares, of 22 July 1967) art. 29 which deals with this special case. The general principles in the Civil Code relating to cesión de créditos do not expressly regulate this issue; CC art. 1112 merely states that "every right which is acquired by virtue of an obligation is assignable according to the legal norms, unless something else is stipulated". Three grounds of non-assignability of claims are derived from this provision: (i) legal prohibition; (ii) pactum of non cedendo, and (iii) where the nature of the claim implies its non-assignability (Pantaleón Prieto, ADC 1988, 1031, 1096). Tort claims do not fall under either of these classifications; they belong to the patrimonio of the victim (Roca i Trias loc.cit.). This is only contentious in respect to claims for reparation for non-economic loss. These claims are occasionally characterised as personalísima (highly personal) (Gómez Calle loc.cit.; also apparently Roca Trias loc.cit. 174). It is difficult to find a rationale for this assumption (compare. Yzquierdo Tolsada loc.cit. 390), in particular, because the Act on Solidarity with the Victims of Terrorism (Ley 32/1999, de solidaridad con las víctimas del terrorismo, of 8 October 1999) art. 8 (see also art. 6 and Annex I to the Act) expressly provides that the victim's claim for non-economic loss against the wrongdoer may be assigned to the State. ausdrücklich einen Übergang auch der immateriellen Ansprüche des Verletzten gegen den Täter auf den Staat vorsieht.

3. According to ITALIAN CC art. 1260(1), all claims are assignable. The exceptions to the rule are claims of a highly personal character or where the assignment would contravene a statutory prohibition. Claims for compensation are not encompassed within either of these categories (Cass. 21 April 1986, no. 2812, Giust.civ.Mass. 1986, fasc. 4 [while the case deals only with contract law, the propositions enunciated in the cases are of general validity]).

4. HUNGARIAN CC § 360(3) refers to the general rules on assignment of claims CC §§ 328-331; they are applied correspondingly to the assignment of claims for reparation. According to CC § 328(2),inter alia, claims which are of a personal nature cannot be assigned. According to BH 1998/379 and BH 2000/197 (dealing with the same case), an injured party‘s compensation claim for breach of his personality rights and other damage which he had suffered due to an unlawful criminal proceeding initiated against him, falls under the aforementioned exception.

5. According to POLISH CC art. 445 § 3 and art. 448(second sentence), claims for compensation of non-pecuniary loss for infringment of corporeal and incorporeal personality rights are only on transmissable on death to the injured party's survivors during the lifetime of the former, s/he had either filed a claim or the injuring party acknowledged that claim in writing. This corresponds to the legal position prevailing under the SLOVENIAN LOA art. 184(2). The ROMANIAN Civil Code does not (yet) contain a similar regulation; however, it should be noted that de lege lata, the question as to whether a claim for compensation for "moral" damage can be the subject of an inter vivos assignment, remains unresolved. The new Draft Civil Code proposes that such claims may only be assigned if they are accepted in writing or have become final; the heritability of such claims is organised in a similar fashion to arts. 445 and 448 in the Polish Civil Code (Proiectul Noului Cod civil, 223: arts. 1131(3) and (4)). According to BULGARIAN law, claims cannot be assigned if the assingment is precluded by claw, by contract or by the nature of the claim (LOA art. 99 (1)). It appears that claims for the compensation of non- pecuniary loss fall into the third category (Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast, 433); it is said that they are of a highly personal nature and, therefore, are only form part of the estate if the testator, during his or her lifetime, enforced them in court proceedings (Supreme Court 5 August 1969, decision no. 829, criminal case no. 730/1969).

6. The special rules that dealt with assignment of claims and succession to thos claims contained in GERMAN CC § 847(1)(ii) (old version) were repealed in 2002 by the reform of law on damages, with the result that there are no restriction placed on the transmissibility of compensation claim (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[67], § 253, no. 23).

7. Similarly, under AUSTRIAN CC § 1393, the general rule is that compensation claims are assignable. The injured party can even be legally obliged to assign such claims (OGH 27 May 1992, SZ 65/83 [Leasing]). Many special statutes contain a subrogation claim in favour of a third party who has already performed (such as insurer, employer). The only problematic issue that arises under the rubric of claims that are inherently personal (CC § 1393) regards the assignability of claims for loss of maintenance (CC § 1327) and compensation for pain and suffering. In end effect, prevailing legal scholarship and the courts are united on the issue and consider that these claims can also be assigned (claim for maintenance: OGH 15 March 1989, SZ 62/44; OGH 25 November 1992, EvBl 1993/106; Schwimann [Heidinger], ABGB VI[3], § 1393, no. 6; Schmerzensgeld: Heidinger loc. cit. no. 13 with further citations). Notwithstanding the wording of CC § 1325, more recent jurisprudence has held that claims for compensation for pain and suffering may also be transferred on death and the ability to transfer these claims does not hinge on whether the victim enforced this claim during his lifetime (OGH 30 September 1996, SZ 69/217; Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI[3], § 1325 no. 91; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 323).

8. According to GREEK CC art. 933, the claim for compensation for pain and suffering (CC art. 932) is not assignable and upon death, is not transmissible to the deceased survivors, unless the claim forms part of a contract or the testator enforced the claim in court proceedings.

9. PORTUGUESE law regulates numerous cases where a third party is subrogated to another's statutory compensation claim where that third party (e.g. insurer or the State) has compensated the victim. Contractual assignment of a claim is permissible insofar as it is not precluded by law or by contract or conflicts with the highly personal nature of the claim. For example, maintenance claims (CC art. 2008(1) cannot be assigned; see Ribeiro de Faria, Direito das Obrigações II, 512) and neither can the so-called "litigious rights" (CC art. 579(3)). There is no rule precluding the assignability of claims for reparation; it is also conceivable that compensation claims for pain and suffering may be assigned.

10. Pursuant to DUTCH CC art. 3:83, all claims are assignable unless an assignment is prohibited by law. Claims for compensation for non-pecuniary loss cannor be assigned or pledged, unless, the claim is acknowledged in a contract or enforced in court proceedings. In order to esure the transmissibility of the claim to the deceased's survivors, it suffices that the deceased, during his lifetime, informed the defendant that s/he wished to enforce the claim (CC art. 6:106(2); näher Goederenrecht [-Snijders], no. 309 p. 278, no. 311 p. 280; T&C Vermogensrecht[4] [-Oosterveen], art. 6:106, no. 9 p. 2240). This largerly corresponds to the legal position under the ESTONIAN LOA §§ 164(1) and 166(1).

11. SWEDISH Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 3 as well as FINNISH Damages Liability Act chap. 7 § 3 proceed from the assumption that claims for compensation for non-material loss are extinguished upon the victim's death, if he himself made no attempt to enforce the claim. The deceased may have instigated the claim himself or someone on his behalf, such as an insurance company; at this stage, there is no requirement that the extent of the claim have been estimated Anspruch muss der Höhe nach noch nicht beziffert worden sein. By contrast, it is possible to freely assign claims for the reparation of economic loss (Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 359; Karlgren, Skadeståndsrätt[5], 231). DANISH EAL § 18(1) provides that compensation claims for personal injury and loss of maintenance cannot be assigned, unless the claim and its quantum have been established by a court, except for loss of income. By contrast, compensation claims for personal injury, including non-economic loss, may be inherited; it is not necessary that the deceased, during his lifetime, sought to enforce the claim, dass der Verstorbene sie noch zu Lebzeiten geltend gemacht hat. Compensation claims arising from an interference with the enjoyment of property are freely assignable (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 434).

Section 2: Compensation

VI.–6:201: Right of election

The person suffering the damage may choose whether or not to spend compensation on the reinstatement of the damaged interest.

COMMENTS

General. The rules of Section 2 of this Chapter relate only to monetary damages ('compensation', see VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation) paragraph (2)). This Article begins with a clarification: the fact that damages are intended to restore the circumstances that would have prevailed had the event causing damage not occurred (see VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation) paragraph (1)), should not lead to the inference that a sum of money received for the reparation of the damage must be actually invested by the injured person in the restoration of the previous state.

Property damage. The Article relates primarily to property damage. The injured person can claim the cost of repair even if having no intention of repairing the damaged thing or having it repaired. The injured person is freely entitled to invest the money received for the reparation of the damage in another way. However, if the repair is not carried out then no value added tax falls due; the reparation of VAT which might have been payable had there been an actual restoration is consequently unnecessary.

Other cases. So too, in other cases neither the court nor the liable person may dictate to the injured person how the compensation is to be used. Furthermore, the award of damages may not be made subject to a condition that it be used in a certain specified way. Depending on the applicable procedural law it may indeed be possible that, upon application by the claimant, the court orders payment directly to a third party (e.g. in the case of the infringement of the personal dignity of a well-known politician who requests that the compensation due for non-economic losses be transferred by the liable person directly to a named charity); however, such a decision may not be made against the will of the claimant.

NOTES

1. Under FRENCH law, the "compensation creditor" is free to dispose of the money that he receives. A court cannot direct that a creditor pay part of the award of compensation to a third party (e.g to a nursing home where the victim is forced to reside) (Cass.crim. 22 February 1995, JCP 1995 éd. G, I, 3893, no. 22, note Viney), nor can additional conditions be attached to the disposal of an award of compensation (Cass.civ. 8 July 2004, Bull.civ. 2004, II, no. 391 p. 329 [for example, an award of compensation for damage to property will not be contingent upon the presentation of a receipt detailing the costs of repair; the victim has a right to full compensation which includes VAT]; see also Cass.civ. 21 October 1987, Bull.civ. 1987, II, no. 207 p. 116). This corresponds to the legal position in BELGIUM (Cass. 28 May 1996, JT 1996, 757). VAT must be paid, not only in the case where the victim has not carried out repairs himself, but also where the victim repairs the damage himself (Cass. 23 December 1992, Pas. belge 1992, I, no. 812 p. 1406).

2. The guiding principle contained VI.–6:201 was confirmed in SPAIN by TS (criminal chamber) 28 April 1989, RAJ 1989 (3) no. 3567 p. 4025 (traffic accident with terrible consequences for a 12 year old girl; damages of 60 million pesetas were awarded and it was expressly stated that the award was not predicated on "any restriction in the enjoyment and disposition [of it] inter vivos or mortis causa"). The calculation of compensation for property damage is generally based on the costs of repairs; however, there is no requirement that repairs be actually carried out (see further, critical in some parts, Carrasco Perera, Aranzadi Civil 1996, II, 51, 55). By contrast, a point for discussion is whether compensation awarded for a violation of the reputation of the deceased must be invested in measures directed at restoring the good (post-mortem) reputation of the latter, if the person entitled to compensation has not personally suffered any loss (a proponent of this view; Salvador Coderch [-Salvador Coderch], El mercado de las ideas, 202).

3. The rule in VI.–6:201 is the same as in ITALIAN (de Cupis, Il danno II, 337), BULGARIAN (Supreme Court 1 September 1989, decision no. 447, civil case no. 420/89 [top up of compensation ordered for the employment of a nurse, whose employment was deemed, in the circumstance of the case, to be objectively necessary, even although the accrued costs of that employment were not documented]), in ROMANIAN (here, it is conceivable that the court may impose restrictions on how the award of compensation is spent, given that restitution in kind is accorded priority) and HUNGARIAN law (Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 152); it should, however, be noted that the issue of contributory negligence could arise in connection with a claim for loss of profits, where a payment in respect of property damage is not used to acquire a replacement machine (BH 1997/332).

4. The GERMAN courts have used CC § 249(2) as a basis to sanction an abstract (or "fictive") calculation of damages. The "requisite sum of money" in the sense of this provision is that which is calculated by an expert witness, i.e the sum that would have been paid to a garage in order to carry out repairs. The injured party can even claim this amount if he or she fails to repair the thing (as a general rule, a motor vehicle), if the work is carried out "off the books" or he or she repairs it himself or herself (BGH 19 June 1973, NJW 1973, 1647; BGH 29 October 1974, NJW 1975, 160, 161; BGH 23 March 1976, NJW 1976, 1396; BGH 30 January 1985, NJW 1985, 1222; BGH 29 April 2003, NJW 2003, 2085). This "notional" assessment of damages is even permitted, if the repairs were actually carried out by a garage and the amount invoiced is considerably lower than that estimated by the expert witness (BGH 20 June 1989, NJW 1989, 3009). If a converse result is reached, namely, the actual costs accrued are lower than the notional valuation, then the injured party may request the court to adopt a "concrete" calculation of damages, provided that the claimant did not irretrievably bind himself to the "fictive" calculation of damages (BGH 17 October 2006, NJW 2007, 67). However, sales tax may only be recovered if it has actually been accrued (CC § 249(2) (second sentence)).

5. Under AUSTRIAN law, the injured party may generally choose between restitution in kind and monetary compensation (OGH 29 May 2001, 4 Ob 118/01h), unless, the choice made is detrimental to one of the legitimate interest of the injuring party (OGH 12 October 2004, 1 Ob 264/03k). Whether the injured party can make use of this right of election in the case that he or she does not use the award of compensation to reinstate the damaged interest, is contentious. Indeed, the courts have proceeded from the assumption that they are free to calculate the damages on the basis of the sum of money which is deemed necessary to reinstate the damaged interest, even if the injured party does not intend to use the award of compensation for this purpose. A number of legal commentators have asserted that, in the context of compensation for economic loss, the injured party is only entitled to claim reimbursement of expenditure incurred, if restitution in kind is possible and is actually carried out (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 10/13). If the financial resources of the injured party do not permit restitution in kind, then he can claim an advance payment or require that the costs are borne by the defendant (Koziol loc. cit. no. 9/11); "Fictive" manufacturing costs cannot be compensated (Koziol loc. cit. no. 10/19; Apathy, ZVR 1981, 261). A number of commentators hold an opposing view and argue that a victim is entitled to spend an award of compensation as he or she chooses (e.g. Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Danzl], ABGB[2], § 1323 no. 10). In recent times, the Supreme Court, has in turn, on numerous occasions, awarded "notional" repair costs, but limited the award of damages to the amount awarded to compensate the diminution of the value of the damaged thing (OGH 28 October 1987, JBl 1988, 249; OGH 29 March 1989, JBl 1990, 718; OGH 23 March 1990, SZ 63/46; OGH 29 May 1995, SZ 68/101; concurring Danzl loc. cit. no. 11). If no repair work is carried out, then, a claim may only be made for compensation for the depreciation in the value of injured party's patrimony. At the same time, it follows from this that sales tax is only be recoverable if it was actually paid by the injured party (OGH 7 June 1978, SZ 51/7; OGH 23 March 1990 loc. cit.; a different approach is seen in OGH 10 July 1975, JBl 1976, 44). A contentious issue is, as before, whether costs of medical care, which, from an objective point of view, the incurrence of which would be considered appropriate, are recoverable if those costs have not actually been incurred. Initially, the recovery of these costs was endorsed, e.g. where the injured party did not purchase the required medication (OGH 12 January 1955, JBl 1955, 305) or did not consent to cosmetic surgery which was reasonable for him to undergo in the circumstances of the case (OGH 19 October 1977, ZVR 1978/179 p. 215; critical on this point Apathy, Aufwendungen zur Schadensbeseitigung, 82 und Rummel [-Reischauer] ABGB II[2], § 1325 no. 18). However, following more recent jurisprudence emerging from the Austria courts on the issue of recovery of "fictive" repair costs in the context of damage to property, the decision of OGH 23 October 1987, SZ 70/220 (see further OGH 21 January 1993, ZVR 1994/22 p. 52) completed a jurisprudential shift in the context of the recovery of notional medical costs. If it is determined that the injured party has not undergone medical treatment, then it now follows that it doesn't have to be paid for (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI[3], § 1325 nos. 12-13). By contrast, it appears that, today, it is still possible to claim for "notional" nursing costs. If a dependent cares for the injured party, then that carer can recover his or her actual expenditure as well as the costs that would have been incurred, had a professional carer been employed (OGH 25 November 1992, 2 Ob 60/92; OGH 26 May 1999, ZVR 1999/109 p. 375; OGH 10 December 1999, ecolex 2000, 120; OGH 27 April 2006, 2 Ob 176/05d; critical Harrer loc. cit. no. 15; different approach. OGH 10 September 1998, SZ 71/146).

6. In PORTUGAL, it appears that this issue has not been discussed. It has been observed that the injured party may freely invest his award of compensation in anything that facilitates enjoyment of life or makes his life easier (e.g. Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral[10], 602; Almeida Costa, Obrigações[10], 599; Ribeiro de Faria, Direito das Obrigações I, 488).

7. According to DUTCH CC art. 6:103, if requested by the claimant, the judge can award compensation in form other than a payment of a sum of money. If this result is not carried into effect within a reasonable time, then the injured party once again acquires the right to demand monetary compensation. Conversely, it is conceivable, that the (compensation) creditor may be guilty of contributory fault if he or she rejects the offer of reparation in kind or an offer to cover the costs of repair proffered by the injuring party (Schadevergoeding II [-Deurvorst], art. 6:103, nos. 7-11 pp. 25-35; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12],nos. 410-411 pp. 330-332). Under ESTONIAN law the injured person is not required to spend compensation on the reinstatement of the damaged interest.

8. In the NORDIC countries, the alternative method for evaluating property damage is guided by the cost of reparation (as opposed to the replacement cost), which is applied to less significant damages to property and based on the condition that the injured party keeps the property although an explicit requirement with regard to the spending of the damages does not exist. It should be noted, that the injured party may not elect the most advantageous method of calculating damages; this choice is made by the court having regard to the reasonableness of each method (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 415; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 287; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 276). An issue both related to the principles of quantifying damages and the injured person's right of election, is the value compensation method applied for property damage (see notes under VI.–6:101). In that context the injured party's intention to sell the property is to be disregarded (e.g. HD 7 May 1991, NJA 1991, 269). The notion of the injured person's right of election is also to some extent interrelated with the question of whether a lump sum or periodical payment are awarded, as the latter delimits the injured person's factual freedom to spend the compensation.

VI.–6:202: Reduction of liability

Where it is fair and reasonable to do so, a person may be relieved of liability to compensate, either wholly or in part, if, where the damage is not caused intentionally, liability in full would be disproportionate to the accountability of the person causing the damage or the extent of the damage or the means to prevent it.

COMMENTS

A rule subject to policy debate. The reduction clause contained in this Article is a particular bone of contention in the Member States. Opinion is divided. The idea behind the reduction clause has as many resolute supporters as it has adversaries. It is rejected in systems which hold that the extent of damages should depend only on the extent of the damage suffered; it is supported in systems which hold that the basis of liability can also play a role in the assessment of the reparation to be made, where this appears to be fair and reasonable in the circumstances of the individual case. The Article follows the latter approach.

No reduction of liability where damage is intentionally inflicted. Where damage is intentionally inflicted, a reduction of liability under this Article is excluded. This is in line with the general convictions of all Member States' legal orders.

Grounds for and prerequisites of a reduction of liability. In all remaining cases a policy decision is ultimately required between the two alternatives. The deciding ground for the solution chosen here is mentioned in the Article itself. Such abnormal discrepancies between the basis of liability and the extent of the damage may arise as to make it seem intolerable to let the liable person bear liability for the entire damage. There should therefore be an instrument available to allow a final check of the decision against general considerations of justice and fairness. This is mainly significant where a slight oversight or a technically negligent but morally unobjectionable act leads to damage, the reparation of which would disproportionately burden the injuring person, there being other possibilities for reparation open to the injured person. The rule can play a role in certain emergency situations requiring self-defence and it may also be the only way of achieving a reasonable result in cases coming under Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence).

Illustration 1
Children aged eight and nine are playing in the barn of a farm. They light a "campfire"; the entire premises are burnt down, after hay stored nearby caught fire and the children had fled in panic. The insurer, to whom the farmer's claim in damages is assigned, sues the children personally, in order to be able to execute the judgment as soon as they (many years later) begin gainful activity. As long as the parents' indemnity insurance does not have to step in, until their middle age the children would have no prospect of earning more money through personal initiative than the limit set for them that is free from whatever form of execution is used by the insurer. Their lives would be ruined before they have even begun. A reduction of the extent of their duty to render compensation is fair and reasonable.

Illustration 2
A water pipe bursts in A's apartment. As a result, a very valuable archive in B's apartment (directly below A's) is damaged. B had specifically insured the archive with his household insurance. The liability of A is to be reduced so that the discrepancy between the grounds of liability (A could not have discovered the fault and is thus liable only under VI.–3:202 (Accountability for damage caused by the unsafe state of an immovable)) and the extraordinary risk of damage can be balanced out.

The reduction clause in the overall system of these model rules The Article also helps usefully to reduce the distinctions between contractual and non-contractual liability. III.–3:703 (Foreseeability) restricts the extent of damages for non-performance of a contractual obligation to the foreseeable loss of the other party. The law on non-contractual liability does not have a corresponding rule. The resulting differences are, however, diminished by VI.–6:202, so that it becomes less significant whether certain conduct between contractual parties is at the same time to be qualified as a civil wrong giving rise to non-contractual liability. There is also a reduction clause in the rules on benevolent intervention (see V.–2:103(2) (Obligations after intervention) and V.–3:104 (Reduction or exclusion of intervener's rights)) and it diminishes the importance of VI.–7:105 (Reduction or exclusion of liability to indemnified persons), a provision, which, inter alia, refers to legal orders which provide that private persons are not liable for property damage caused through negligence in so far as the injured person is indemnified by an insurer.

Scope. The Article covers all non-intentionally caused damage. It is therefore applicable not only in the context of liability for negligence, but also in the context of strict liability. In this latter area the availability of such a reduction mechanism can be particularly important if reasonable solutions are to be possible.

Illustration 3
While an aeroplane is landing, X's messenger pigeons get caught in the air duct of the propellers. The owner of the aeroplane claims compensation from X, as the keeper of the pigeons, for the damage, which amounts to several hundred thousand Euros. It would be inequitable to allow X - who is not insured against such cases - to incur unlimited liability even for the portion of the damage remaining after the application of VI.–5:102 (Contributory fault and accountability) paragraph (4). As long as X was not negligent, X's liability is to be reduced to zero.

Extent of the reduction. Illustration 3 shows not only that in exceptional cases a reduction of liability to zero is possible under this Article, but also that the formulation "liability in full" means "reparation, so far as due". In other words, even liability which has already been reduced for other reasons (such as contributory fault) can be reduced again under this Article.

NOTES

1. In FRANCE, the sole basis for determining the extent of the duty to compensate remains the damage sustained; the courts are not permitted to take the financial resources of the injuring party into account when it comes to assessing compensation (Cass.civ. 21 July 1982, Bull.civ. 1982, II, no. 109 p. 80). Moreover, the magnitude of faute and the personal circumstances of the injured party may also not be taken into consideration (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats (2006/2007), no. 2522). The same principle applies in BELGIUM. Tort liability law is so conceptualised in the Code Civil to entail that even a culpa levissima will serve to ground an obligation to compensate in full (Ronse [-de Wilde/Claeys/Mallems], Schade en schadeloosstelling I[2], nos. 267-269 pp. 200-269). However, CC art. 1386*bis* contains an exception, according to which the court, may reduce the extent of a mentally disabled person obligation to pay compensation, should equity and the circumstances of the case so require.

2. Similarly, SPANISH law does not, it is said, permit the courts to reduce compensation on equitable grounds (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Pantaleón], Código Civil II[2], art. 1902, p. 1971, 1998-1999). However, Organic Act on Criminal Liability of Minors (Ley Orgánica 5/2000, de responsabilidad penal de los menores, of 12 January 2000) art. 61(3) in fine provides that, in the event that the individuals listed under a supervisory duty and are therefore, solidarily liable with the minor "have not promoted the conduct of the minor with intention or gross negligence, courts shall be able to moderate their liability according to the circumstances of the case". This possibility to reduce liability is of major practical significance; liability is usually reduced by 50% (e.g. CA Asturias 4 March 2005, BDA JUR 2005/90490; CA Badajoz 25 January 2005, Aranzadi Civil 2005 (1) no. 333 p. 741; CA Córdoba 20 February 2004, BDA JUR 2004/105382 [concerning a mother who had quit her job because of the drug addiction of her child and had tried to help him constantly]). Above all, the Supreme Court has conceded that CC art. 1103 (which allows damages to be adjusted in the event that a negligent breach of contract arises) permits liability to be reduced in the realm of extra-contractual liability (e.g. TS 13 October 1981, RAJ 1981 (2) no. 3734 p. 3018 and TS 20 June 1989, RAJ 1989 (4) no. p. 5438). Equidad is regarded as providing the rationale for an analogous application of CC art. 1103. This result remains, however, a bone of contention in legal commentary (Díaz Alabart, ADC 1988, 1133, 1222; Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 234; TS 29 September 2005, RAJ 2005 (5) no. 7155 p. 15272). TS 20 April 1993, RAJ 1993 (2) no. 3103 p. 3975 concerned a water pipe which burst, in the process damaging an usually valuable archive contained in the dwelling below. The owner of the archive received a pay-out under his house insurance; the insurer's recourse claim against the tenant of the dwelling above who was responsible for the damage was reduced by a half.

3. In ITALY, a functional equivalent to VI.–6:202 can be seen, at most, where the court is conferred with a discretion to determine the extent of compensation (such as e.g within the framework of CC arts. 2056 in conjunction with 1226 und 1227). However, note should be taken of Codice delle Assicurazioni private (Decreto Legislativo of 7 September 2005, no. 209 [Suppl.ord. no. 163 alla Gazz. Uff. of 13 October 2005, no. 239]) art. 140(1), according to which the claims of several injured parties against the motor insurer are to be reduced on a pro-rata basis if the claims exceed the amount insured.

4. HUNGARIAN tort law, as a rule, adopts the principle of full compensation as its point of departure, however, CC § 339(2) allows the court to reduce liability in exceptional circumstances. This provision is confined to tort law, it is not a valid proposition for contract law (CC § 318(1)). According to CC § 339(2), the court can partly relieve the person responsible for the causing the damage "from liability" on equitable grounds in extraordinary circumstances. According to prevailing legal opinion, the extent of compensation is reduced (Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 73 et seq). The Code fails to particularise the exact grounds permitting a reduction of liability, instead leaves this to the discretion of the judge. The courts take account of the wrongdoer's financial position, the degree of fault and other relevant personal factors (Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 83 et seq). It is not possible to reduce liability to nil (Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1223; Petrik loc. cit. 84); liability cannot be reduced where a wrong is intentionally committed (Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 168 et seq; cf. auch Petrik loc. cit. 85). However, in practice, CC § 339(2) is rarely cited (Petrik [-Harmathy], Polgári jog II[2], 575). Instead, the courts avail of the provisions governing contributory fault and by this, achieve the same result (Ujváriné loc. cit. 74 et seq). Generally, it is possible that CC §§ 340(1) and 339(2) may be cumulatively applied (Ujváriné loc. cit.). Under the proposed reform of the Hungarian Civil Code, it is submitted that this damages adjustment clause should be retained with some modifications (http://www.parlament.hu/irom38/05949/05949.pdf) Similarly, SLOVENIAN LOA art. 170 allows an exception to be made to the principle of full compensation on equitable grounds. In particular, this comes to the fore if the injuring party is guilty of simple negligence and only has meagre funds at his or her disposal (LOA art. 170(1)) or if the injuring party wanted to actually do something benefical for the injured party and in this way observed a standard of care which he would have observed had he been dealing with his own affairs (diligentia quam in suis), and did not act in a grossly negligent manner (LOA art. 170(2)).

5. BULGARIAN law does not contain an independent provision permitting an adjustment of liability. A possible reduction of liability on the grounds of equity and fairness therefore only comes to the fore where, at the outset, the measure of compensation was determined by the courts on equitable grounds, as in the case of reparation for non-economic loss under LOA art. 52. For example, pursuant to this provision, a wife will not be able to obtain compensation for non-pecuniary loss in the event that at the time of his death, she no longer had either marital relations or an emotional connection with her husband who died in a car accident (Supreme Court 15 November 1979, decision no. 1235, criminal case no. 1125/79). ROMANIAN law also does not feature a provision equivalent to Art des VI.–6:202. The financial resources of the parties concerned has no influence on the measure of compensation (Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 242, 341, 347).

6. Similarly, under GERMAN law, the principle of full compensation applies; even in cases of the slightest degree of negligence, the injuring party is obliged to make reparation in full. The principle also applies in the event that the obligation to pay compensation would clearly overextend the financial resources of the injuring party (Palandt [-Heinrichs] BGB[67], Pref. to § 249, no. 5). Pursuant to CC § 828, only children under 10 in cases involving motor vehicle or train accidents, are, as a rule, exempt from liability (exception: intention). In essence, only the rules on contributory fault operate to extenuate the impact of premise “everything or nothing” which is inherent in the principle of full compensation (CC § 254); there was a conscious decision not to adopt a provision permitting damages to be adjusted (Medicus, Schuldrecht I[17], no. 585). Generally the compensation that can be obtained under strict liability provisions is fixed by statute (e.g. ProdHG § 10, StVG § 12, UmweltHG § 15).

7. In AUSTRIA, the extent of liability depends on the degree of fault. Whereas simple negligence may only be recovered in cases of “positive damage” (the economic loss that has actually eventuated), in cases of intent and gross negligence, the injuring party must also compensate loss of profits. Additionally, note must be taken of provisions in supplementary statutes, providing for a reduction of liability in cases where the degree of fault is slight or very slight (e.g. DHG § 2, ForstG § 176, KMG § 11). From this, it follows in the reverse that there is, as yet, no general damages adjustment clause in Austria law (critical on this point Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 6/24). The examples mentioned in the comments to VI.–2:202 are nonetheless the subject matter of special rules, see for example, under CC § 1306a (emergency; liability may be reduced to nill) and under CC § 1307 (pertaining to the liability of minors). The liability of children who have yet to reach the age of 14 remains governed by the subsidiary liability based on equity and fairness under CC § 1310 (see further OGH 1 December 1927, SZ 9/257; CA Vienna 3 December 1996, ZVR 1998, 68 p. 166; OGH 9 July 1996, SZ

69/156 and OGH 30 March 1999, SZ 72/59 [affirmed that it was permissible to take account of the existence of liability insurance policy when determining liability based on equity and fairness]). Equitable considerations may also feature at the assessment of damages stage (CC § 1325; Koziol loc. cit. no. 11/24). The notion that the financial resources of the injuring party may justify a reduction in liability is the rationale behind strict liability provisions which limit liability to a predetermined amount (e.g. RHG § 7; EKHG §§ 15 and 16; AtomHG §§ 15 und 29). This system which is perceived as inflexible is due for reform; the proposal for reform envisage an expansion of CC § 1317 to include a reduction clause.

8. GREECE adheres to the principle of full reparation; the injuring party is obliged to compensate damage in full, irrespective of the degree of fault (Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 151; A.P. 698/1992, EllDik 35 [1994] 1503). The socalled "everything or nothing" principle applies (Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2], 515). A rule according to which the judge can measure the extent of compensation according to the circumstances of the case, where, particular, account is had to the degree of fault or a rule permitting the judge to reduce the extent of recoverable damages has not been adopted under the Greek Civil Code which the judge Regelung des Inhalts, dass der Richter den Schadenersatz nach den Umständen des Einzelfalles, insbesondere nach der Schwere des Verschuldens bemessen kann oder dass der Umfang des ersatzpflichtigen Schadens reduziert werden kann, ist in das griechische Zivilgesetzbuch nicht aufgenommen worden (Stathopoulos loc.cit.). Exceptions to the rule of full compensation can be encountered only in the strict liability provisions in special statutes which fix the extent of liability to a predetermined amount, and in those provisions which ordain that an " equitable" compensation must be paid die sich in einigen Spezialgesetzen zum Recht der strikten Haftung finden, und in solchen Vorschriften, die die Pflicht zur Leistung eines "billigen" Ersatzes anordnen (e.g. CC art. 286 [causing damage in a situation of emergency] and CC art. 918 [liability of person not deemed to possess tortious capacity in equity]).

9. According to PORTUGUESE CC art. 494, the duty to compensate may, on equitable grounds, be reduced to an amount lower than that which would have been necessary to make full reparation for the damage caused. The foregoing amounts to an exception to teoria da diferença in the law of damages which is based on CC art. 566 (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[10], 779; STJ 19 February 2004; STJ 17 January 2007). Liability may only be reduced in cases of negligence (negligência or. mera culpa), not in cases of intent (critical, on these grounds CA Evora 13 March 1986, BolMinJus 357 [1986] 512); the slighter the degree of negligence, the more probable the reduction in liability (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], note 2 to art. 494, p. 497; STJ 19 November 2002). The factors relevant in the equitable assessment were deliberately not enumerated in statute (Galvão Telles, Obrigações[7], 211, fn. 1). Legal writing and the courts consider that, in conjunction with the degree of fault, above all the financial positions of the injured and injuring party to be relevant (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela loc. cit.; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 913; STJ 5 July 2007; STJ 8 March 2007). CA Lisbon 6 May 1999, CJ XXIV [1999-3] 88 reduced to half the compensation owed by the driver and owner of a personal watercraft ("JetSki") due to the fact that they were both minors and students without personal income. According to contemporary prevailing legal opinion, CC art. 494 can also be applied within the framework of the responsabilidade pelo risco (Almeida Costa loc. cit. 780; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela loc. cit.; Antunes Varela loc. cit. 914; STJ 4 April 2002; STJ 21 March 2000, CJ [ST] VIII [2000-1] 138; the courts held a different view up until CA Lisbon 16 February 1979, CJ IV [1979-1] 163).

10. DUTCH CC art. 6:109(1) provides that the judge can reduce the legal duty to pay compensation if imposing full liability in the circumstances, would lead to unacceptable results. Factors taken account of include, inter alia the nature of liability, the legal relationship existing between the parties and their ability to pay compensation. This reduction in amount may not be less than that amount that is covered by the debtor's insurance or should have been covered (CC art. 6:109(2)). Generally, the presence of intention or gross negligence preclude the applicability of the clause permitting the extent of liability to be reduced (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 404 and 452; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 498 p. 459). The type of damage caused is also of relevance: CC art. 6:109(1) is employed far less in cases of bodily injury than in cases of property damage (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 450; Hartkamp loc. cit. no. 499 p. 460). ESTONIAN LOA § 140(1) contains a similar provision.

11. In the NORDIC countries particular regimes on the reduction of liability exist. They are based on considerations of equity, channelling of liability, and the injured party's interest in full compensation. However, special circumstances are required for applying these regimes; their relevance in practice should not be overestimated. In all the Nordic countries, the extent of children's and mentally incompetent persons' liability is assessed under separate heads of the respective Damages Liability Acts. The general rule on reduction of liability in SWEDISH Damages Liability Act chap. 6 § 2 requires that the liability is unreasonably burdensome with regard to the tortfeasor's economic situation; however, the injured party's need to receive compensation and other circumstances are also taken into consideration (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 425; Bengtsson, Om jämkning av skadestånd, 231). If liability is covered by a liability insurance reduction generally does not come into play. The same applies to a tortfeasor who has omitted to obtain appropriately available liability insurance, although this shall only apply with regard to legal persons. The 'deep pockets' of the injured party may not per se render reduction. A poor economic situation of the injured party may on the other hand encumber a reduction even if liability would be burdensome for the tortfeasor. Another factor which may be taken into account is the degree of the tortfeasor's fault. Damage caused intentionally shall only be reduced in exceptional circumstances (e.g. HD 3 April 1986, NJA 1986, 193 and HD 16 December 1993, NJA 1993, 727 [young offenders]; HD 21 April 1987, NJA 1987, 376; HD 25 November 1992, NJA 1992, 660; see generally Kleineman, JT 1993-94, 789). It has been submitted that protective purpose of strict liability as a rule militates against permitting a reduction in liability, but that a reduction may take place in exceptional cases (Hellner and Radetzki loc cit. 426; Bengtsson loc cit. 285). Similarly, DANISH EAL § 24 focusses on the financial resources of the parties responsible which also entails examining whether liability insurance was extant. Factors taken into consideration include, the seriousness of fault, the extent of the damage and the injured party's interest in obtaining indemnification. The courts will only reduce liability where equity so requires (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 415). Where damage has been inflicted intentionally, even through criminal conduct, reduction may in exceptional cases take place with regard to humanitarian and social concerns (HD 2 April 1996, UfR 1996, 862). Legal persons hardly ever benefit from a reduction in liabilty (Western CA 9 September 2004, FED 2004, 1804; HD 16 August 2005, UfR 2005, 3151). FINNISH Damages Liability Act chap. 2 § 1 adheres to the same principle (Saxén, Skadestånd vid avtalsbrott, 245; id., Skadeståndsrätt, 162). In the context of intentional acts, it is expressly provided that a reduction in liability may only take place where such a result is necessitated by the dictates of equity; as a result, such a claim is generally rebuffed by the courts (e.g.

Supreme Court 19 June 1985, KKO 1985 II 101 and Supreme Court 18 March 1999, KKO 1999:41).

VI.–6:203: Capitalisation and quantification

(1) Compensation is to be awarded as a lump sum unless a good reason requires periodical payment.

(2) National law determines how compensation for personal injury and non-economic loss is to be quantified.

COMMENTS

The Article in overview. This Article relates to two different issues. Paragraph (1) provides that damages are in principle to be paid as a lump sum. Payment in the form of an annuity is to be exceptional and is to require special grounds. Paragraph (2) clarifies that this Book does not deal with the actual quantification of monetary damages in the case of personal injury and non-economic loss: that is left to national laws.

Paragraph (1). Monetary damages have as their purpose the restoration of the circumstances which would have prevailed if the event causing the damage had not occurred. In the normal case, viewed statistically, this purpose is best served by the payment of damages in the form of a lump sum. This has the beneficial side-effect that no protracted legal relationship persists between the injuring person and the injured person, during which new difficulties arising could be used as a reason for new conflicts and further court proceedings. In the case of property damage and damage to other assets there is therefore practically no alternative to the payment of damages by way of a lump sum. This is also true for damages for the reparation of lost profit, or losses flowing from a misguided investment and a decrease in turnover.

Good reason. The situation is different in the case of death or personal injury. In cases of this kind every European legal system provides for the possibility of ordering the liable person to make recurring periodic payments; most systems even prefer annuity payments as the general rule in this type of case and therefore require a good reason for ordering payment of a one-off lump sum. Apart from tax aspects, which can sometimes play a role, the main consideration in favour of granting annuity payments is that in cases of death or personal injury they are better suited to ensuring (as far as possible) the maintenance of the quality of life enjoyed before the accident. This is because a lump sum can often not protect against the danger of future underprovision; money is fleeting and is subject to the risk of inflation. Furthermore, the damage to be made good is often the loss of a regular periodic income and precisely this loss is then to be compensated for under the general rules of VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation) paragraph (1). This is particularly apparent where the damage in question is the death or disabling injury of a person who provided the claimant with maintenance, see VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death) paragraph (2)(c). The question whether there is a good reason for ordering the wrongdoer to make periodic payments is decided by the court; to this extent it does not depend on an agreement of the parties. Of course they are always free to contractually agree on the amount of damages and methods of payment.

Heads of compensation. The payment of an annuity may be useful not only for the compensation of economic damage. In the case of severe personal injury this mode of reparation may also be appropriate in relation to continuous non-economic losses. A combination of both types of damages is possible, e.g. a basic lump sum and subsequent annuity payments. The duration of periodic payments is geared according to the extent of the damage suffered; the frequency (usually every month) is set by the court. Conversely, in the case of an infringement of incorporeal patrimonial rights there will only rarely be a good reason for not using a lump sum.

Procedural issues. This Article does not deal with questions of a procedural nature. In particular, it does not deal with the issue of whether a non-contractual claim in damages must be litigated once and for all or whether, in the interests of minimising the risk associated with bringing proceedings, a claimant is permitted to claim only a partial amount of the entire damage and then claim the rest before the court when the preceding action has been won.

Paragraph (2). This Book also makes no statement on the issue of whether in the case of personal injury fixed sums of money are to be set as reparation for individual injuries (e.g. for the loss of one's right arm) or disadvantages (e.g. for each day which the injured person had to spend in bed) or whether in these cases an individual quantification of the monetary compensation is to be carried out. This Book likewise refrains from addressing the problem of whether for the case of the infringement of non-economic personal rights, a minimum monetary sum for the reparation of the non-economic damage is to be set (see, however, comments under VI.–6:204 (Compensation for injury as such)). It also abstains from proposing an approach to the very variable high sums of money awarded for the compensation of non-economic loss. It seemed just as impossible to submit precise proposals for the quantification (in table form) of compensation of biological damage (see VI.–6:204 (Compensation for injury as such)). The question of whether such tables of damages are desired at all was not discussed. They are established practice in many countries, in some even statutorily set out; by contrast, in others they are strictly rejected. Even if an understanding had been achieved on such tables for certain issues, the specification of figures would have been impossible. Paragraph (2) of the present Article also counts compensation for bereavement among non-economic losses. The basic decision of this Book not to make provision for punitive damages remains untouched by this rule.

NOTES

1. Under FRENCH law, compensation can take the form of a lump sum (capital) or be awarded in the form of a recurring periodical payment (rente). The courts of first instance are conferred with a discretion with respect to this and, in this regard, are not bound to defer to the claimant's request (Cass.crim. 19 June 1996, GazPal 1996, Chron. de droit criminel, 190 [lifetime annuity, although the claimant had requested that compensation be partly paid in the form of a lump sum]). The measure of compensation is not affected by the modalities of compensation payment. An award of a rente may not exceed the lump sum payment that the claimant would have received (Cass.civ. 3 February 1960, Bull.civ. 1960, II, no. 89 p. 58), furthermore the measure of compensation may not be reduced because a lump sum compensation payment is awarded (Cass.civ. 20 December 1966, D. 1967, 669, note Le Roy). The quantification of damages for non-economic loss resulting from bodily injury is accorded great significance. This is because the social security institutions and other tiers payeurs cannot exercise a right of recourse in respect of this element of reparation; irrespective of any possible payments made by the social insurer, the victim alone is entitled to receive compensation for dommages moraux (Viney and Jourdain, Les effets de la responsabilité[2], no. 142 p. 259). Essentially, it concerns compensation for souffrances physiques et morales, for préjudice esthétique and for préjudice d´agrément. In order to determine the level of the award, the courts, without mentioning this expressly (on the grounds of CC art. 5) often have recourse to tables which appear in special publiciations on an on-going basis. Of course, the courts are not bound by these tables (see further le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2006/2007], no. 2516). In order to quantify the préjudice d´agrément (definition found in Cass.ass.plén. 19 December 2003, Bull.ass.plén. 2003, no. 8 p. 21) the courts routinely ascribe a certain monetary sum to each degree of permanent incapacity which is expressed in percentage terms, which, in turn, derives from the jurisprudence of the court having jurisdiction over the case or case law from a group of courts (Le Roy, L´évaluation du préjudice corporel[17], nos. 136-1 - 142 pp. 52-54). The monetary value alloted to such a percentage can vary according to the age of the injured party and the severity of his or her incapacity; the younger the victim and the greater the incapacity, the greater the amount allocated to that percentage value (Le Roy loc. cit. p. 67 with actual examples of quantification of damages). As regards the classification of souffrances physiques et morales a table featuring a scale of seven classes of damage (ranging from very slight to very serious) developed by Thierry is mostly followed (cf. Viney and Jourdain loc. cit. no. 148 pp. 273-275). The extent of compensation awarded per damage class can vary extensively from court to court (Le Roy loc. cit. no. 148 p. 60). In the context of an assessment of damages for préjudice esthétique, in conjunction with the severity of the deformation, the courts take account of the victim's sex, age, marital status and occupation. An award of damages can lie anywhere between € 500 and tens of thousands of euro (Le Roy loc. cit. nos. 149-151 p. 61). This disparity termed loterie judiciaire has been strongly criticised in legal scholarship (Viney and Jourdain loc. cit. no. 152 p. 279).

2. Similarly, in BELGIUM, the courts are at liberty to decide between an award in the form of a capital sum or an award of periodical payments; the courts are not bound by the claim filed by the plaintiff: they can also decide that the sum should be divided into two parts, namely party lump sum, part periodic payment (Ronse [-de Wilde/Claeys/Mallems], Schade en schadeloosstelling I^2, no. 313 p. 225). As a rule, a capital sum is awarded (Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 97 p. 184). For the first time, in 1995, the indicatieve tabel of the Working Group of the Union nationale des magistrats de première instance and the Union royale des juges de paix et de police were published. Since then, they have been reissued and updated on a regular basis. These tables contain guidelines and fixed sums for the assessment of damages. As well as the variant manisfestations of property damage, these tables primarily concern material and non –material damage as a consequence of bodily injury (including the loss suffered by dependents). Despite garnering (not inconsiderable) criticism in academic literature, these tables have acquired great significance in judicial and extra judicial practice dealing with the meting out of compensation (see Van den Bossche, NjW 2004, 614, 615 no. 2). Insurance companies are said to decide 90% of all of the cases involving compensation that don't make it to court on the basis of these tables (Van den Bossche loc. cit. 621 no. 25).

3. The guiding principle that the judge is conferred with a discretion to decide the nature and extent of compensation is also recognised in SPAIN (cases which fall under the law on Liability Insurance and Motor Liability Insurance form an exception to this rule [Texto Refundido de la Ley sobre Responsabilidad Civil y Seguro en la Circulación de Vehículos de Motor], Real Decreto Legislativo no. 8/2004 of 29 October 2004) (e.g. TS 22 April 1983, RAJ 1983 (1) no. 2118 p. 1613; TS 10 July 1987, RAJ 1987 (3) no. 5318 p. 5079). Although Spanish courts award usually a lump sum (indemnización a tanto alzado or capital) the award of periodical payments (rentas periódicas) is, particularly in cases of permanent personal injuries, also common court practice. A life annuity (renta vitalicia) is regarded as an efficient remedy to assess certain damages (Pintos Ager, Baremos, seguros y derecho de daños,

193) and may therefore be awarded instead of a lump sump (TS 5 June 1997, RAJ 1997 (4) no. 5945 p. 9184; Medina Crespo, La valoración civil del daño corporal III(1), 283). Even though courts were initially reluctant to award periodical payments (see e.g. TS 2 February 1980, RAJ (1) 1980 no. 743 p. 579; TS 13 June 1984, RAJ 1984 (2) no. 4374 p. 3365; TS 28 April 1989, RAJ 1989 (3) no. 3567 p. 4025), this technique has been increasingly applied by courts and has been explicitly acknowledged both (i) within the scope of liability of legal persons subject to public law (Ley de Régimen Jurídico de las Administraciones Públicas y Procedimiento Administrativo Común art. 141(4)(ii) within the scope of damage arising out of traffic liability (Road Traffic Liability Act [Ley de responsabilidad civil y seguro en la circulación de vehículos a motor] Annex point 8). Courts may even award a life annuity when the plaintiff claims a lump sum (TS 5 June 1997 loc. cit.; TS 17 March 1998, RAJ 1998 (1) no. 1122 p. 1773; contra, however, CA Castelló 1 March 2005, BDA JUR 2005/131696 and CA Castelló 8 February 2005, BDA JUR 2005/118706).

4. According to ITALIAN CC arts. 2056 and 1226, damage, the extent of which cannot be definitively ascertained, is determined by the court on an equitable basis. Pursuant to CC art. 2057, in the context of compensation for permanent bodily injury, the courts, having regard to the conditions of the parties and the nature of the injury, may ordain the payment of a life annuity. The matter of the quantum of compensation for personal injury, in particular, danno biologico, is left solely to the judge's discretion, however, a practice has developed whereby the courts tend to resort to indicative tables to assist them to quantify the level of damages. The values contained in these tables are predicated on the average level of compensatory amounts calculated on the averaawarded in court decisions of precedential value. These amounts are based on the archetypal consequences of injury sich auf die durchschnittlichen Beträge bezieht, die in Präzedenzfällen auf der Grundlage von Typisierungen der Verletzungsfolgen ausgeurteilt wurden. It should be noted that the courts are not bound by these tables. Personal injury compensation claims deriving from traffic accident are governed by arts. 137-139 of the Decreto Legislativo 7 September 2005, no. 209, Codice delle assicurazioni private, which provide that special tables are to be devised for this area.

5. Similarly in HUNGARY, compensation may either take the form of a lump sum or a recurring periodical payment. In particular, an annuity may be awarded in cases concerning claims for loss of support or claims for supplementary assistance (CC § 355(3)), therefore in the context of death, bodily injury and injury to health (Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 190 et seq; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 238 et seq). The courts also award an annuity in order to compensate the permanent special needs of the victim (Petrik loc. cit. 236f.; Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1355). The courts are not bound by the request filed by the victim; the decision regarding the form of the award, is left to the discretion of the court. The payment of an annuity to compensate a victim of an accident for his or her restricted ability to work is regulated in CC §§ 356-357 is directed at compensating loss of earnings. CC § 358 governs a dependent's claim for an annuity payment following the death of the bread-winner in an accident. Moreover, compensation for non-pecuniary loss can take the form of an annuity payment (for an overview of case law, please see Lábady, A nem vagyoni kártérítés újabb bírói gyakorlata, 201-212, 229-234). The cases affected are primarily those involving a very young victim or where the future medical prospects are inconclusive. Nowadays, it is possible to award a settlement that combines a lump sum award and periodical payments (Lábady loc. cit. 67 et seq; Ujváriné loc. cit. 218 et seq; Benedek loc. cit. 1334 et seq, 1356). Alimony, life annuities and accident compensation must be paid in advance (CC § 280(3)). The Code is silent as regards the quantification of compensation for non-pecuniary loss;

CC § 355(1) und (4) merely make clear that such loss is, in principle, recoverable. The determination of the measure of compensation is left to the discretion of the court (see Herpai, VersRAI 2005, 43, 45-46) (Bárdos, Kárfelelősség a Polgári Törvénykönyv rendszerében, 43 et seq; Petrik [-Köles], Polgári jog II^{2}, 634/2; Benedek loc. cit. 1333). Generally, the courts may not resort to actuarial tables. Legal practitioners seek direction from previous court cases, in particular relying on those cases handed down by the Supreme Court. Nonetheless, the awards vary greatly; overall, the awards seem to be increasing in keeping in line with society that is becoming increasingly prosperous (Lábady loc. cit. 63 et seq, only with citations up to 1992).

6. BULGARIAN LOA art. 51(1)(second sentence) expressly provides that compensation may take the form of as a once off capital sum or that of a periodical sum. Annuities are generally come to the fore in cases where the main bread-winner dies or in cases of loss of capacity to work (Kojucharov, Obligazionno pravo I, 292). The court can adjust the amount at a later stageto take account of medical developments and any other effects that the disability has on the ability to work; the legal validity of previous decisions does not hinder the handing down of this adjustment judgment (LOA art. 51(3)). In all essential terms the legal position in ROMANIA is similar (Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 263-264, 346 with citations from case law). If there is a possibility that the injured party may leave the jurisdiction or otherwise sich sonst seiner Zahlungspflicht entzieht, wird er zu Kapitalzahlung verurteilt; Rentenzahlungen können aber auch wegen des Inflationsrisikos als ungeeignet erscheinen (Lupan loc. cit. 265).

7. The point of departure of GERMAN CC §§ 249 et seq is that compensation usually takes the form of an award of a lump sum; an annuity payment is only awarded in exceptional cases (RG 27 May 1908, RGZ 68, 429, 431; Erman [-Schiemann], BGB II^{12}, § 843 no. 1; Soergel [-Beater], BGB^{13}, § 843 no. 1; Staudinger [-Vieweg], BGB^{13} [2007], § 843 no. 2). CC § 843(1) accommodates such an exception: in the event that, as a consequence of bodily injury or injury to health. capacity to work is impaired or there are increased needs, then in these cases an annuity must be generally paid unless cogent grounds justify the award of a capital sum (CC § 843(3)). CC § 843 is germane to cases involving permanent injury; once-off outlays, especially medical expenses, are governed by the general regime anchored in CC §§ 249 and following provisions (Beater loc. cit.; Vieweg loc. cit. nos. 4 and 9). However, within the framework dedicated to governance of permanent injury, an even more precise distinction must be drawn between permanent and constant increased needs (CC § 843) and once -off expenditure (CC §§ 249, 251) (BGH 12 July 2005, NJW 2006, 1271, 1273). the rationale behind the award of an annuity is to relieve the injured party of the burden of adducing and proving that the expenditure incurred was necessary; moreover, the reasoning is that the claimant should not have to pay the necessary expenditure in advance out of his of her own pocket (RG 11 June 1936, RGZ 151, 298, 302; Beater loc. cit.). An array of supplementary statutes contain corresponding rules or refer to CC § 843 (HaftPflG § 8; ProdHG § 9; StVG § 13; UmweltHG § 14).

8. The AUSTRIAN CC is silent on the modes of reparation. While the payment of compensation in the form of annuity is recognised, it is confined to exceptional cases and can have disadvantageous tax repercussions for the injured party (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI^{3}, § 1325 no. 94). Damages for pain and suffering are chiefly awarded in the form of a lump sum which is designed to compensate the entire non-material loss sustained (OGH 20 January 1977, ZVR 1977/169 p. 210; OGH 27 February 1979, ZVR 1980/159 p. 159; Harrer loc. cit. no. 87). Periodic payments geared towards compensatig non-material loss are only awarded where cogent grounds are established justifying such an award, for example, in cases of grave personal injury with severe (or not compeletely negligible) permanent consequences (OGH 21 November 1968, SZ 41/159; OGH 20 January 1977 and 27 February 1979 loc. cit.; OGH 10 September 1985, ZVR 1986/50 p. 141; OGH 11 June 1987, ZVR 1988/66 p. 142; OGH 8 August 2002, ZVR 2002/95 p. 385) or in cases where it is foreseeable that the injured party will be afflicted by considerable bodily pain or psychiatric illness for the duration of his life (OGH 13 March 1976, JBl 1976, 539; OGH 8 August 2002 loc. cit.). furthermore, annuity payments are awarded in cases of disfigurement (CC § 1326) and in order to compensate loss of earnings (CC § 1325; see OGH 21 November 1974, ZVR 1975/198 p. 277); in cases of this kind, a lump sum will only be awarded if a good reason exists justifying such an award (OGH 26 January 1988, ZVR 1989/107 p. 179: award of a lump sum in order to zur Umstellung eines landwirtschaftlichen Betriebs) and, taking account of his or her financial resources, it is reasonable to require the wrongdoer to pay a lump sum (OGH 26 April 1973, SZ 46/45). It is said that an "abstract annuity" arises where the de facto reduction in income has not yet occured but will probably materialise in the future and is awarded in order to make it possible for the injured party to put funds aside to buffer a future loss of employment (OGH 21 November 1968 loc. cit.; OGH 5 June 2002, JBl 2003, 242). Similarly, compensation for loss of maintenance of dependents deriving from the death of the main breadwinner, principally takes the form of an annuity payment (CC § 1327; for an exceptional case, see CA Linz 11 January 2002, ZVR 2002/68 p. 274).

9. In GREECE, compensation for non-pecuniary loss is statutorily fixed to at least the amount stipulated in a number of supplementary statutes (for a case involving unlawful junk mail , see, e.g. CFI Piräus 2061/2005, NoB 53 [2005] 1469 on Act 2472/1997 art. 23: Minimum liability to the extent of 2 Mio Drachma).

10. Similarly, in PORTUGAL compensation is, as a rule, to be awarded as a lump sum. However, according to CC art. 567(1), if requested by the claimant, the court may choose to grant a periodic payment, either entirely or in combination with a capital sum, in order to compensate permanent physical injury and the consequent heightened needs of the injured party; in this case, the court must make the necessary arrangements in order to guarantee the payment. The extent of the annuity is determined by the court freely exercising their discretion; this does not alter the fact that life annuity payments are often calculated by adverting to acturial tables which take account of inflation tabellarischen Inflationsindices (CA Lisbon 5 July 2001, CJ XXVI [2001-4] 76 and 77; STJ 12 September 2006; STJ 3 June 2003; STJ 8 March 2005; STJ 20 June 2006). CC art. 567(1) governs immediate and future damage including loss of profits (CA Lisbon 5 July 2001 loc. cit.); in an individual case, it is possible for an award to combine an annuity payment and payment in the form of a capital sum (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], note to art. 567, p. 585). Similarly, loss incurred by dependents can be compensated by the award of an annuity payment, this will occur in particular where minors are concerned (STJ 20 June 2006). An annuity payment will only be awarded if a request to that effect is made by the claimant;the court is not conferred with a discretion in this regard (STJ 6 July 1971, BolMinJus 209 [1971] 102; critical Vaz Serra, RLJ 105 [1972] 154). Subsequently, each party can return to court to seek adjustment of the award if their situations change substantially (CC art. 567(2)); this possibility is precluded in the case of claims for reparation of non-material loss (CA Lisbon 5 July 2001 loc. cit.).

11. According to DUTCH CC art. 6:97, the judge calculates damage in a manner most compatible with the nature thereof; if the extent of damage cannot be precisely ascertained then it will be estimated. The court is also conferred with a discretion in this regard unless there is an upper ceiling placed on the award of damages (e.g. CC art. 6:110) or where a statute sets the relevant parameters Unter DUTCH CC art. 6:97 bemisst der Richter den Schaden auf die Weise, welche seiner Art am besten entspricht; kann der Schadensumfang nicht präzise festgestellt werden, so wird er geschätzt. Dem Gericht kommt ein weiter Ermessensspielraum zu, es sei denn, es ist an eine Obergrenze (z.B. CC art. 6:110) oder an andere gesetzliche Vorgaben gebunden. There are no rules governing the capitalisation of an award of damages; the decision lies with the court (Schadevergoeding I [-Lindenbergh], art. 6:97, nos. 19-20 pp. 99-144, no. 2728 pp. 147-158; Verbintenissen uit de wet en Schadevergoeding [-Hartlief], nos. 206-211 pp. 195-201). By contrast, a corresponding regulation to VI.–6:203(1) is found in the ESTONIAN LOA § 136(1). Compensation by periodical payment is further regulated by LOA § 136(2)–(4). Compensation for bodily injury is regulated by LOA §§ 130 and 134(3). The special conditions for compensation for non-economic loss are set out in LOA § 134.

12. Each year, DENMARK fixes the level of reparation that can be awarded for non-pecuniary loss (EAL §§ 3 and 15). The is also the case with regard to compensation for permanent disability, loss of ability to work and compensation of the loss suffered by surviving dependants (EAL §§ 4, 7, 13-15; see further Møller and Wiisbye, Erstatningsansvarsloven[6], 333). In SWEDEN, the quantum of damages for pain and suffering is set at a fixed amount; the Supreme Court approved the adoption of the Traffic Accident Compensation Board (trafikskadenämnden) tables as a guide (HD 3 March 1972, NJA 1972, 81). However, it is possible to depart from these tables in special circumstances and in these types of cases, the court is conferred with a discretion to determine the level of compensation (HD 14 June 2000, NJA 2000, 278; HD 4 April 1990, NJA 1990, 186; Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 185). Tables issued by the Traffic Accident Compensation Board are also relevant for assessing compensation for permanent disability (lyte eller annat stadigvarande men). The indexes listed in these tables are structured along a sliding scale; a percentage of invalidity is allocated a corresponding monetary amount; the greater the disability and the younger the victim is, the higher the level of compensation (see further Bengtsson and Strömbäck loc. cit. 197). In FINLAND, the recovery of compensation for non-material loss is assessed on an individual basis; particular account is had to the severity of the injury and the wrongdoer's degree of fault (Supreme Court 5 July 1994, HD 1994:62; Supreme Court 10 October 1980, HD 1980 II 98). As far as the form the compensation payment is to take (capital sum or annuity) it has been asserted that the award of a capital sum is the preferred solution, because the injured party is then completely free to use the award as he sees fit and it ensures that the wrongdoer's future insolvency will not affect the injured party; moreover, another advantage is that an award of a capital sum creates less administrative costs. The advantage of an annuity payment lies in the fact that it ensures that the injured party has a regular income. Swedish Damages Liability Act chap. 5 § 4 confers a wide discretion on the courts: "Reparation for future loss of future earnings or loss of maintenance is awarded in the form of a life time annuity or in the form of a capital sum or a combination of both. If the reparation is of major importance for the conntinous maintenance of the injured party, a lifetime annuity will be awarded unless particular circumstances dictate that another result should be reached. The award of an annuity for life can be converted into a capital sum, either entirely or in part, if cogent reasons exist for such a conversion". However, the parties are free to reach an agreement on this issue (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 386; Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen[2], 262). Essentially, Finnish Damages Liability Act chap. 5 § 7 follows the rules. In Denmark, however, compensation is always awarded in lump sums. Annuity payments are regarded as too complex and uncertain, the injured party may retain the economic value of the capital sum by careful investment; in this regard, he or she does not depend on the injuring party (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 423).

VI.–6:204: Compensation for injury as such Injury as such is to be compensated independently of compensation for economic or non-economic loss.

COMMENTS

Injury as such. This Article is a corollary to VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss) paragraph (1) and VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy) paragraph (1). In both of these Articles (and, under certain conditions, in VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage)), certain injuries are qualified as legally relevant damage even where they have caused neither economic nor non-economic loss. Violations of bodily integrity or injuries to a person's health or incorporeal personality rights are already as such legally relevant damage; it is not just (as is otherwise the case) the loss flowing from them which counts as legally relevant damage. These rules only take effect in conjunction with the present Article. "Injury as such" is to be compensated not only where there is an absence of any economic or non-economic loss, but also where the injured person also suffered such losses. In the latter case compensation for the injury as such will be independent of and additional to compensation for those losses.

A new concept. A rule in this form is not found in any national civil code or other national legislation. Its substance, which has been essentially adopted from Italy, is however recognised in the laws of several Member States and in others enjoys increasing acceptance. Frequently the courts act upon this idea even without an express statutory basis. In some legal systems minimum thresholds of liability laid down by the law fulfil the same function, at least in the field of the infringement of incorporeal personality rights.

NOTES

1. SPANISH Road Traffic Liability Act (Ley de responsabilidad civil y seguro en la circulación de vehículos a motor), Annex art. 1(7) expressly provides that, in the context of personal injury (as in Italy), the daños psicofísicos suffered denotes a separate item of redress. Moreover, the Supreme Court has, on numerous occasions, distinguished between daño biológico, daño moral and economic loss (TS 21 January 1998, RAJ 1998 (1) no. 350 p. 568; TS 21 April 1998, RAJ 1998 (2) no. 4045 p. 5903; TS 27 July 2006, BDA RAJ 2006/6548); as can be seen from the case law of the courts of first instance, it has long been common practice for the daño biologica to operate as a separate compensatable head of damages (e.g. CA Madrid 10 July 2006, BDA JUR 2007/16767; CA Sevilla 18 May 2006, BDA JUR 2007/28095; CA Madrid 4 May 2006, BDA JUR 2006/192847; CA Madrid 7 July 2005, BDA JUR 2006/12356; CA Madrid 6 September 2005, BDA JUR 2006/70043; CA Madrid 20 June 2006, BDA JUR 2007/41433). In the context of a breach of incorporeal personality rights "the existence of injury shall be presumed, whenever the illegitimate intrusion is proven" (Organic Act 1/1982, of 5 May 1982 [Ley Orgánica 1/1982, de 5 de mayo, de protección civil del derecho al honor, a la intimidad personal y familiar y a la propia imagen] art. 9(3)). This presumption only arises in the context of non-economic loss (Casas Vallés, RJC, 1989, 49; Salvador Coderch [-Martín Casals], El mercado de las ideas, 382, 385). According to case law, this presumption is a presumption iuris et de iure, i.e. an irrebuttable presumption (TS 9 March 2006, RAJ

2006 (4) no. 5413 p. 11866; TS 7 March 2003, RAJ 2003 (2) no. 2900 p. 5410)), (an opposing view, shared by a not insignificant number, can be discovered in legal writing: Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema I[11], 355; Reglero Campos [-Yzquierdo Tolsada], Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 1333, 1393) um

2. See with respect to the quantification of the damages for danno biologico which is based on indexes in tables under ITALIAN law, inter alia, Cass. 11 August 2000, no. 10725, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 1782; Cass. 22 May 2000, no. 6616, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 1078; Cass. 20 October 1998, no. 10405, Giust.civ.Mass. 1998, 2130; Cass. 16 September 1996, no. 8286, Giust.civ.Mass. 1996, 1283; Cass. 8 October 1996, no. 8784, Giust.Civ.Mass. 1996, 1386 sowie Gozzi, Der Anspruch iure proprio auf Ersatz des Nichtvermögensschadens, 208 et seq). More minor injuries of a permanent nature arising from a traffic accident are governed by Act of 5 March 2001, no. 57 (Gazz. Uff. 20 March, no. 66 - Disposizioni in materia di apertura e regolazione dei mercati) art. 5(2)-(6). Danno biologico is defined in this Act as "an interference with the psychological and physical integrity", "which can be ascertained by reference to medical criteria" and for which "compensation should not be linked to any influence the injury may have on the injured party's ability to work". Originally, the assessment of damages for all cases was based on variable percentages of invalidity (punto variabile) corresponding to a monetary amount and to the age of the injured person which were fixed by statute (and regularly adjusted to take account of inflation). Since the 1st of January 2006, a new rule was introduced by the coming into force of Codice delle assicurazioni private (Suppl.ord. no. 163 alla Gazz. Uff. of 13 October 2005, no. 239) arts. 138 und 139. The foregoing solely govern damage which arises from a traffic or maritime accident and in this context, a distinction is drawn between severe (macropermanenti) and minor injuries (micropermanenti). In a similar fashion, tables are employed to liquidate the damages, the aim being to establish a uniform system, used countrywide, for the assessment of compensation for macropermanenti. It is argued that this new regulation may not compatible with the Constitution (see futher Chindemi, RCP 2006, 549-569; Zivic, Resp.civ. e prev. 2006, 641-646).

3. To date, in HUNGARY, a mere infringement of rights will not suffice to ground a damages claim; there must be an additional material or non material loss (Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog I[2], 201-203; Petrik [-Köles], Polgári jog II[2], 634/2; Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1325, 1328, 1344; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 74, 258 et seq; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 216 et seq; Vékás, FS Boytha György, 331, 332; BH 2002/24; BH 2001/110; BH 2001/12 and BH 1997/435). Whether the injured party has suffered a non-material loss is determined by the courts exercising their discretion (Lábady, A nem vagyoni kártérítés újabb bírói gyakorlata, 51 et seq), but nonetheless a specific justification is given for a finding of non-material loss. Even the loss of a kidney appears not to be enough of and in itself to ground a claim for compenstion of non-pecuniary loss. What is decisive in this context is that the claimant is forced to alter his or her way of life and to live in a way whch does not endanger the remaing kidney. The position is similar in the context of facial burns and, in this context, the non-pecuniary loss is found in the fact that the claimant's life is made more difficult (see further with citations from case law Petrik [-Petrik] loc. cit. 204). In contrast, adducing proof of a particular non-pecuniary loss is not necessary in the context of illegal deprivation of liberty (jail) (BH 2002/186); the illegal detention imports non material damage per se. By contrast, a person, whose facial lacerations have healed completely, does not suffer non-material damage (Benedek loc. cit. 1330). An award of compensation for non-material loss was rejected in a case which concerned a woman, who having been forced to her knees and had a leg pressed to her back, had her hair was forcibly cut (Lábady loc. cit. 54). This extremely restrictive approach which is called the "liability law theory" appears to have ceded ground to the "personal rights theory" in the discussions surrounding the reform of the Civil Code. The latter rationale holds that breach per se of a subjective right will suffice for an award of reparation (see further Boytha, Polgári Jogi Kodifikáció 2003, 3-6 and Petrik, Polgári Jogi Kodifikáció 2003, 6-8). There is a proposal to abolish a claim for compensation for non-material damage while introducing a claim for satisfaction in the form of damages for pain and suffering in the part dealing with the vindication of the rights of the individual. It is proposed to introduce an irrebutable presumption that all infringements of personality cause non-material loss (http://www.parlament.hu/irom38/05949/05949.pdf)

4. In ROMANIAN legal writing, it has been observed that every personal injury imports damage (Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 73) but no positive outcome, with respect to the creation of an actionable head of redressable damage, can be gleaned from this statement

5. On the basis of CC §1293, a distinction is drawn under AUSTRIAN law between "real" and calculable damage (Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Karner], ABGB^{2}, § 1293, no. 1). The real damage means the adverse impact accruing to the legally recognised interest; the calculable damage corresponds to the pecuniary quantification of that damage. Reparation is only exceptionally awarded in cases where no calculable damage has (at least not yet) materialised e.g. in the shape of an "abstract annuity" in cases of reduced earning capacity. This annuity is geared at compensating the dimished prospects on the jobmarket. In this context, there is no need to adduce that this has already eventuated (OGH 22 September 1983, ZVR 1984/325 p. 347; OGH 20 January 2002, JBl 2003, 242; for a discussion on the parameters of this claim, see also OGH 15 July 1987, SZ 41/157). The view has been expressed in legal commentary that the claim is one for the recovery for non-pecuniary loss (Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III^{3}, no. 14/9). Moreover, a type of compensation for "injury as such" may be seen in the heatedly discussed cases which deal with 'compensation for pain and suffering without pain being felt' (e.g. OGH 26 July 2006, ZVR 2006/202 p. 498: a paraplegic woman, who was wheelchair bound, was injured in her right knee where she could feel no pain). In contrast to earlier decisions, nowadays reparation is awarded in cases of this kind, and not only in cases where the inability to feel pain is a consequence of the injury suffered but also in cases where this inability was already extant. This stance of the courts has been criticised (Schwimann [Harrer], ABGB VI^{3}, § 1325, no. 80; Huber, ZVR 2000, 221). Moreover, mention should be made of recovery of socalled "fictive" nursing costs. The injured party can claim the costs of professional care that would have been required in the event that his or her relatives voluntarily care for him or her (OGH 26 February 1998, ZVR 1998/128 p. 373; OGH 21 June 2001, 2 Ob 148/01f). For the remainder, compensation for pain and suffering is always awarded as a lump sum and should not be commuted to a daily rate (CA Linz 11 January 2002, ZVR 2002/68 p. 275; Kossak, ZVR 2001, 227). Legal practioners use works referring to comparable cases as a guide ("Schmerzensgeld" tables), but the courts are not bound by these tables and they merely act as an evaluative guide. There is no fixed upper limit on the compensation that can be awarded for non-material loss (OGH 20 February 1975, RZ 1975/68).

6. In PORTUGAL, dano corporal, dano funcional and dano biológico are all used synonymously and defined as the somatic and psychological devaluation of the person (CA Oporto 3 May 2007; CA Oporto 29 June 2006; STJ 29 November 2005; Álvaro Dias, Dano corporal, 99). A number of authors are inclined to adopt the view that such damage imports non-material loss (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I^{10}, 601; Sousa Dinis, RPDC XIII [2004-14] 9). Other authors consider this damage a tertium genus; namely, an amphibious creature which cannot be classed as either pecuniary or non-pecuniary damage (Álvaro Dias, RPDC X [2001-11] 37, 47; id., RPDC IX [2000-10] 71, 86). The courts appear to vacilliate between classifying such damage as non-material harm (so CA Lisbon 12 June 2006; CA Coimbra 26 April 2005; CA Oporto 7 April 1997, CJ XXII [1997-2] 205; STJ 8 March 1979, BolMinJus 285 [1979] 290) and qualifying it as future pecuniary loss (so STJ 5 July 2007; STJ 17 November 2005; STJ 22 September 2005; STJ 6 May 1999). At any rate , it is clear that grave personal injury in and of itself, independent of any economic loss or pain, grounds a claim for redress (Álvaro Dias, RPDC X [2001-11] 37, 47, 53; STJ 17 November 2005; STJ 10 October 2002; STJ 14 October 2004; STJ 29 April 2004; STJ 6 May 2003; STJ 22 September 2005; STJ 16 January 2003).

7. Statutory rules which fix a minimum threshold for an award of compensation for the infringement of incorporeal personality rights can be encountered in GREECE (see note 9 under VI.–5:203 and note 9 under VI.–6:203).

8. In the NORDIC countries, while the notion of "injury as such" is unknown, parallels, at least in part, can be drawn between that notion and the concept of reparation for grave violations to the rights of personality of the injured party. FINNISH Damages Liability Act chap. 5 § 6 provides that, e.g. causing great anguish to and vilifying another, grounds a claim for compensation. Such damage is not placed within the receptacle of compensation for pain and suffering but is a separate compensatable head of damage. This remains the case even if the damage has its roots in the violation of the victim's bodily intergrity. Similarly, the corresponding SWEDISH provision on violations of human dignity is based on an objective assessment of the damage (see e.g. HD 6 July 2007, NJA 2007, 540 [sexual abuse of a sleeping child]). An affront to dignity is sufficient; the cause of action does not depend on subjective pain or suffering (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 392). Similarly, DANISH EAL § 26 provides that a grave violation in the context of an unlawful deprivation of liberty, violation of the honour or person of another is a separate compensatable head of damage.

Section 3: Prevention

VI.–6:301: Right to prevention

(1) The right to prevention exists only in so far as:

(a) reparation would not be an adequate alternative remedy; and

(b) it is reasonable for the person who would be accountable for the causation of the damage to prevent it from occurring .

(2) Where the source of danger is an object or an animal and it is not reasonably possible for the endangered person to avoid the danger the right to prevention includes a right to have the source of danger removed.

COMMENTS

Prevention is better than cure. This Article is a corollary to and a concretisation of VI.–1:102 (Prevention). Both rules must be read together. The underlying idea is that someone faced with imminent damage must be able under the law on non-contractual liability (and not only if the requisites of other branches of the law, for instance the law of property, are satisfied) to take positive action to prevent the damage from happening. Prevention is better than cure. Moreover a person who simply lets the damage happen and then claims reparation may be exposed to a plea of contributory fault and consequently to a reduction of compensation.

Forms of prevention. Damage prevention can take various forms. The person under threat can resort to self-help and then try to recover the costs from the person responsible for the threat (see VI.–6:302 (Liability for loss in preventing damage)). Alternatively, the person under threat can require the person responsible for the threat to remove or neutralise the source of danger. This latter type of claim is the subject-matter of this Article. (On the relationship to VI.–5:202 (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity) see the Comments under VI.–1:102 (Prevention)).

Paragraph (1). The right to oblige another to perform a positive act in order to protect the interests of the claimant can only exist within certain narrow borders; otherwise, it would lead to intolerable restrictions of personal freedom. This is to be weighed up against the security interests of potential injured parties and in doubt takes priority over the latter. Therefore, it is not only required (in VI.–1:102 (Prevention)) that the claimant is under threat of imminent danger but it is also made clear that the claimant is entitled to claim positive action to prevent the damage only where a subsequent claim for damages would not be a sufficient remedy and where it is reasonable to impose the burden of removing the source of damage on the other person. The right to become personally active in the prevention of damage and then claim the costs incurred from the other party remains unaffected by this. Its requisites are dealt with in VI.–6:302 (Liability for loss in preventing damage).

Reparation not an adequate remedy. Whether reparation, especially monetary reparation, is a sufficient alternative remedy, depends on the circumstances of each individual case. First and foremost, it depends on whether damage irreparable by other means is imminent, on the type and measure of the imminent damage, on how high the probability of its materialisation seems to be from a factual and a legal perspective and whether the other person will be in a financial position to repair it.

Illustration 1
Neighbour X has built a swimming pool on her land. After it has been filled, the swimming pool starts to leak; the escaping water causes damage in the garden of Neighbour Y. Along with monetary reparation the latter requests precisely described measures for repair so that such an occurrence cannot recur. However, under the circumstances of the case the risk that another water leak will occur is rather slight. A right to have specific repairs carried out has not been established

Illustration 2
Politician P requests Publishers A to stop the printing of a publication that contains information on P damaging to his reputation. Due to the short time span, it is not possible to check to a sufficiently precise degree whether A has a defence at his disposal; in particular it is unclear whether the requisites of VI.–5:203 (Protection of public interest) are met. P does not have a claim under VI.–1:102 (Prevention).

Illustration 3
The facts are the same as in illustration 1 under VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation). The abused boy can also request of his abuser that he not appear in public with a naked torso until the removal of the tattoo. During this period, monetary reparation would not be a sufficient remedy.

Paragraph (2). Paragraph (2) ensures freedom of activity for those persons who might potentially occasion damage. The abatement of the source of danger through positive action may be claimed only where it does not burden the potential injuring person unreasonably. A cricket club may only be required to fence in the playing field for the purpose of protecting the neighbourhood from "flying balls" to a degree which guarantees stability against collapse in case of a storm and does not unreasonably burden the club financially; anything else would amount to banning the game of cricket completely. The remaining risk must be borne by the neighbours. The manufacturer of a certain product may not be compelled by ultimate consumers to carry out certain improvements to the product, in order to mitigate the risk of damage; the producer must be left the freedom to decide on suitable measures. This even applies where the claimant wants the product for personal or professional reasons. In contrast, it is reasonable for a house owner to be required to secure loose roof tiles which are in danger of falling on to a neighbour's land. The measure is simple, there is no sensible alternative and it is directed at a precisely defined class of persons, whose fear of considerable harm is justifiable (consequently, it would be unreasonable if every random street user were able to pester the owners of the adjacent houses with the argument of being under threat when passing the house).

NOTES

1. An action to end a continuing disturbance is recognised under FRENCH and BELGIAN tort law, therefore an injured party may file a claim requiring the suppression de l´illicite (le Tourneau and Cadiet, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats, nos. 2441-2446; Ronse [-de Wilde/Claeys/Mallems], Schade en schadeloosstelling I^2, nos. 302-303 pp. 223-224). French CC art. 9(2) additionally, contains a general preventative remedy to protect against every atteinte à l´intimité de la vie privée. Incidentially, the person concerned may only claim an interim injunction to ward off the threat of imminent damage pursuant to the measures contained in the Code of Civil Procedures dealing with procédures de référé (CCP arts. 809(1), 849(1)). Furthermore, in Belgium, once stringent requirements are satisfied, the courts may prescribe measures geared towards anticipating the commission of immediate damage (Dirix, Het begrip schade, no. 62 p. 51).

2. The orthodox view in SPANISH tort law is that the function of tort law is not a preventative or punitive one; it is solely compensatory (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Pantaleón], Código Civil II^2, art. 1902 p. 1971-1972). More recent legal scholarship points out that modern tort law can no longer dismiss the appropriateness of a remedy geared towards preventing the commission of an unlawful act, either from the viewpoint of efficiency or protection of the individual (Llamas Pombo, FS Díez-Picazo II, 2203, 2211). CCP arts. 721 et seq govern the tutela inhibitoria cautelar. It entitles the plaintiff to obtain an interim ruling from the court that obliges the defendant to perform a positive or a negative act in order to prevent the occurrence of a damage. However, this remedy is regarded as inadequate as it does not give rise, of itself, to a general independent claim to prohibitory injunctive relief (Llamas Pombo loc.cit. 2219). Moreover, tort law does not permit such a claim. A tutela inhibitoria del daño is restricted by law to a number of specific cases, namely: safeguarding possession; preventative legal protection in respect of a threat emanating from neighbouring land (CC art. 389 in conjunction with CCP art. 250(6); preliminary proceedings in order to obtain judgment for the "demolition of constructions, buildings, trees or columns or analogous objects that are ruinous and threat to cause damage to the plaintiff"; see CA Huelva 23 September 2005, BDA JUR 2006/30245 and Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Pantaleón], Código Civil I^2, art. 389 p. 1064) and to the acción negatoria which is recognised under environmental law (Salvador and Santidumenge, PJ 1988, no. 10, 117; TS 3 December 1987, RAJ 1987 (5) no. 9176 p. 8507; CATALAN CC art. 546-14). A claim for prohibitory injunction can also be encountered in CC art. 7(2) (abuse of right), in Act 1/1982 on the protection of honour, privacy and one´s own image art. 9(2) and under intellectual property law (Copyright Act art. 139; Patents Act art. 63; Trademarks Act art. 41). On numerous occasions, the Supreme Court has stated that a claim of a prohibitory injunction to prevent the realisation of an imminent danger is the "logical and legal" corollary of a damages claim and this rationale provides the basis for the claim for injunctive relief (e.g. TS 16 January 1989, RAJ 1989 (1) no. 101 p. 102 and TS 15 March 1993, RAJ 1993 (2) no. 2284 p. 2958). CA Murcia 13 July 2006, BDA JUR 2006/258763 concerned a dispute between neighbours which centred on a leaking swimming pool. The claim which was directed at requiring the owner to undertake repairs was rejected on the grounds that it was based on tort law and it could not be proven that there was a probability of future damage .

3. Similarly, under ITALIAN law, the use of the tutela inibitoria preventiva is restricted and it is employed to vindicate a number of legally protected interests, in particular, property interests (CC art. 949), possession (CC art. 1170), servitudes (CC art. 1079, actio confessoria) and the right to one's own name or one's own image (CC arts. 7 and 10). According to CC art. 844, a court is permitted to grant an order directed at the cessation of emissions which, upon examination of local conditions, exceed reasonable limits (see further, Cass.sez.un. 15 October 1998, no. 10186, Giust.civ.Mass. 1998, 2086). Pursuant to CC art. 1172, neighbours can require that the other adopt preventative measures to, inter alia, protect against buildings in danger of collapse. Further claims to prohibitory injunctive relief can be found in regulations geared towards protecting intellectual property rights (Codice della proprietà industriale art. 124), consumer protection in the context of unfair contract terms (CC art. 1469sexies?), the protection of businesses against unfair competitive practices of their competitors, and finally, protection of trade unions against employers (Statuto dei Lavoratori [Act of 20 May 1970, no. 300, Gazz. Uff. 27 May 1970, no. 131] art. 28). That these individual provisions permitting prohibitory injunction relief pave the way, by analogy, for a general claim (or an "atypical" one) to a tutela inibitoria, while not uncontroversial, nowadays appears to be the prevailing legal view (Di Majo, La tutela civile dei diritti III[4], 142-143; Cass. 25 July 1986, no. 4755, Giust.civ.Mass. 1986, fasc. 7).

4. A remedy, directed at preventing damage from occurring is recognised under HUNGARIAN tort law, namely in CC § 341. However, this provision only entitles the person whose rights are threatened to seek relief before a court. The court can call a halt to the dangerous activity or can order the person responsible to adopt appropriate measures to eliminate the threat and, if necessary, provide security. CC § 341 is based on the preventative function accorded to liability law. This claim does not depend upon blameworthiness; the only necessary requirements is that the damage is imminent and the person endangered requires protection. Typical fields of application for this claim include environmental law and competition law (CC § 341(2)). However, there is a dearth of case law on CC § 341 (Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1236; Petrik [-Harmathy], Polgári jog II[2], 579; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 86-88). BH 1990/424 made clear that CC § 341(1) may only be invoked against a person from whom the threat emanates; BH 2005/103 held that CC § 341(1) claim could also be raised in the contractual law context. In turn, a special type of prohibitory injunction can be found in property law and law on possession (CC §§ 115(2), 190(1)), as well as in relation to particular property rights (e.g. CC § 161(2), (3) [usufruct]). Numerous other provisions require, based on their wording, that the injury has already been inflicted; here, the claim for prohibitory relief is geared towards the prevention of further injury (e.g. CC § 84(1)b [personality rights]; Act no. LVII/1996 on the Prohibition on Unfair Competitive Practices and Restrictions on Competition § 86(2)b; Patent Act [Act no. XXXIII/1995] § 35; Trademark Act [Act no. XI/1997] § 27; Copyright Act [Act no. LXXVI/1999] § 94). The interlocutory injunction is a feature of administrative law and is regulated in CPC § 156. CC § 341(1) has largely been left untouched by the reform of the Hungarian Civil Code; however, it is proposed to repeal CC § 341(2) (http://www.parlament.hu/irom38/05949/05949.pdf)

5. BULGARIAN law does not recognise a general tortious clam permitting injunctive relief. However, claims for prohibitory injunctions which are directed towards ending unlawful activity, are regulated in a large number of supplementary statutes (e.g. Competition Act art. 7(1)(viii); Copyright Act art. 95(1)(ii); Patent Act art. 28(1)(iii)). Recourse is had to the actio negatoria in order to protect against breaches (also of a temporary nature) of property rights. This largely corresponds to the legal position in ROMANIA (Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 70). CPC art. 581 governs the particulars of the jurisdiction under administrative law conferred on the President of the Court, enabling the award of an interloctury injunction in respect to pending proceedings.

6. GERMAN CC § 908 permits an injunction to be granted in order to compel the adoption of necessary protective measures,in the event that there is a threat that a neighbouring building will collapse or there is a danger that parts of a neighbouring building will become detached. There is no need to wait for damage to occur; the mere threat of danger entitles a claimant to injunctive relief (see further Soergel [-Baur], BGB[13], § 908, no. 6; Erman [-A. Lorenz], BGB II[12], § 908 no. 5; BGH 8 February 1972, NJW 1972, 724). According to CC § 1004(1)(ii), an owner is entitle claim a prohibitory injunction requiring the defendant to cease interfering with his property. This entails that the defendant must ensure that the threatened breach does not materialise (Staudinger [-Gursky], BGB[13], § 1004 no. 211), which also connotes that he or she may be required to adopt positive measures if this is the only means by which the damage can be prevented (BGH 12 December 2003, NJW 2004, 1035, 1037). In contrast to the express wording of the provision, contemporary legal scholarship and the courts consider that the owner has a general claim to injunctive relief under CC § 1004(1)(ii) in the case of a mere initial threat of damage and therefore, this claim is not only confined to cases where there is a risk that the damage will reoccur (Gursky loc. cit. no. 213). Several other prohibitory injunction claims can be found in supplementary statutes outside the confines of the Civil Code, for example, provisions which safeguard against unfair competitive practices and those that afford protection against breaches of intellectual property rights. The Civil Code contains provisions which afford a claim for a prohibitory injunction in cases concerning the protection of the rights to one's own name (CC § 12), possession and an array of limited proprietary rights. A general claim to prohibitory injunctive relief exists for the protection of every enumerated absolute right contained in CC § 823(1).

7. According to AUSTRIAN law, a distinction must be drawn between three legal remedies: the prohibitory injunction, (abatement of a nuisance i.e the claim for the removal or elimination of a source of disturbance and self-help being the ultima ratio (CC §§ 19, 344, 1101 and 1321). A threat to an absolute right grounds a claim for prohibitory injunctive relief (OGH 13 April 1983, SZ 56/63; OGH 28 March 2000, SZ 73/57). If the breach is already extant, then only the danger of recurrence and the need for legal protection are required, whereby the danger of recurrence is presumed in a case invovling a breach of an absolute right (OGH 23 June 2005, 6 Ob 84/05d). There is no general statutory provision governing prohibitory injunctions regulation; it is expressly envisaged that this remedy will only come to the fore in certain defined cases (OGH 5 December 1978, SZ 51/171), e.g. in CC §§ 43, 339, 364 and 523; Ccom § 37(2) and UWG § 14). The question, whether, nowadays, it remains worthwhile to continue to draw a distinction between the remedial injunction as such (which comes to the fore where the breach has already been initiated) and a preventative prohibitory injunction (in the context of a threat of a breach) is increasingly doubted (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI[3], Pref. to §§ 1293 no. 39). Whether a successful claim for a prohibitory injunction requires a fault on the part of the defendant was unclear for a long period of time (see OGH 23 July 1997, ecolex 1998, 124 and OGH 31 August 1983, SZ 56/124; see further Hirsch, JBl 1998, 541). Today, for the most part, this question is answered in the negative (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 4/10; Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III[3], no. 13/15; OGH 18 October 1991, 8 Ob 612/91; OGH 26 January 2006, 6 Ob 273/05y).

8. PORTUGUESE CC art. 1350 provides that "if a building or other construct threatens to collapse in part or in full and the collapse could result in damage to neighbouring property, the owner is entitled in accordance with art. 492 to demand the person responsible for the damage to take the measures necessary to eliminate the danger". This provision is based on German CC § 908 (note 6 above) (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado III[2], note 2 under art. 1350). For the remainder, a general rule governing the duty to prevent the realisation of a danger is abset but there is an array of specific norms which give voice to this line of thought (STJ 8 July 2003 mentions, although these norms predominantly govern liability, inter alia, CC arts. 492, 493, 502, 1347-1350 and 1352). The notion that civil liability should not be simply confined to its compensatory function (função reparadora) stems from environmental law, namely, on the principle of prevention (princípio da prevenção) which is contained in the Framework Law on the Environment (Lei de Bases do Ambiente, Gesetz no. 11/87 of 7 April 1987) art. 3(a) (see further Meira Lourenço, A função punitiva da responsabilidade civil, 323). Loc. cit. art. 40(4) confers a right on every citizen, whose right to a healthy and ecologically sound environment is directly breached or where there is a threat of such a breach, to require the removal of the damaging cause and claim compensation. Where a breach of corporeal or incorporeal personality rights is threatened, CC art. 70 provides for diverse remedies, which can be carried into effect under administrative law by availing of CCP arts. 381 et seq, i.e. by means of procedimento cautelar comum, see CA Lisbon 20 January 2005, CJ XXX (2005-1) 97.

9. According to DUTCH CC art. 3:296 in conjunction with art. 6:168(1), a judge is conferred with a discretion to "reject a claim for the prohibition of unlawful conduct, on the grounds that this conduct must be tolerated in the interests of a countervailing public interest"; the injured party retains his or her claim for damages (see further T&C Vermogensrecht [-Lindenbergh], art. 6:162, note 6 and art. 6:168 notes 1-2). Similarly, ESTONIAN LOA § 1055 does not recognise a general claim for injunctive relief under tort law. LOA § 1055(2) largely corresponds to VI.–6:301(1)(a); there are no express rules regulating the content of VI.–6:301(1)(b) and VI.–6:301(2). However, the right to remove a source of danger may arise from necessity (LOA § 1045(2) and (3)).

10. The NORDIC legal orders do not recognise a general right to claim prevention. According to the SWEDISH Code of Judicial Procedure chap. 15 § 3 injunctive relief can be obtained inter alia for the protection of one's real and intellectual property rights (e.g. HD 14 October 1982, NJA 1982, 633). FINNISH Code of Judicial Procedure chap. 7 § 3 contains a similar provision. In a similar fashion, in DENMARK, claims for injunctive relief belong to the realm of administrative law. CCP § 641(1) concerns the protection of every "right" of the claimant. For example, this embraces landlord-tenant disputes and disputes arising between neighbours (HD 5 December 1980, UfR 1981, 362), moreover, labour (HD 28 October 1929, UfR 1930, 142) and intellectual property law (HD 24 February 1994, UfR 1994, 397), see in more detail D-Karnov 2005 III (-Rothe), Retsplejelov, § 641 no. 2487. According to CCP §§ 642 and 643, a claim for an injunction must be rejected: if the general sentencing rules and rules governing damages claims afford adequate protection; if the defendant provides sufficient security, or if granting the injunction would be amount to a disproportionate measure. The initiation cermonies of the Freemasons are regarded as a "private matter" (CP § 264d) of this organisation, therefore, it was possible for them to restrain a television station from broadcasting on this matter (HD 3 June 1982, UfR 1982, 750).

VI.–6:302: Liability for loss in preventing damage

A person who has reasonably incurred expenditure or sustained other loss in order to prevent that person from suffering an impending damage, or in order to limit the extent or severity of damage suffered, has a right to compensation from the person who would have been accountable for the causation of the damage.

COMMENTS

Fundamentals. A person, who is active in averting imminent damage in a reasonable manner or restricting its extent is exercising a right under VI.–1:102 (Prevention) and therefore has a right to reparation of the costs incurred. This basic rule is affirmed in every Member State. It is also an indirect consequence of VI.–5:102 (Contributory fault and accountability). This is because VI.–5:102 is based on the idea that a person who has not looked after his or her own affairs with sufficient care may not request full reparation. Conversely, a person who actually does look after the preservation of his or her goods and interests when they are threatened by another person must then be able to claim reparation for the costs of doing so. They have been ultimately caused by a danger for which the other person bears responsibility.

Systematic significance. Beyond its material content, this Article in fact has inherent systematic significance. With its insertion into this Book, the character of the rule as part of the law on non-contractual liability is underscored. What is involved here is not a rule which belongs in the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs or one whose results could also be achieved with the instruments of this branch of the law. This is because a person who makes expenditure for the avoidance or mitigation of personal damage does not act or in any case does not primarily act for the purpose of benefiting the potential injuring person (see V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another)); the person in fact wants to help himself or herself. VI.–6:302 has further significance for the general rule of causation in VI.–4:101 (General rule): the intervention described in VI.–6:302 does not break the chain of causation between the conduct of the potential injuring person and the loss (which in this case lies in the expenditure incurred to avoid an otherwise threatening damage). The present Article is to be distinguished systematically from VI.–2:209 (Burdens incurred by the state upon environmental impairment) by the fact that under the present Article a damage within the meaning of Chapter 2 must not yet have arisen; by contrast, VI.–2:209 (Burdens incurred by the state upon environmental impairment) clarifies that the expenditure (which is more precisely described therein) constitutes a legally relevant damage.

Illustration 1

P parks her vehicle directly in front of the entrance to G's garage and goes off to a hairdresser's. G needs the use of his car. After inquiring at neighbouring properties without success as to the whereabouts of the person in charge of P's vehicle, G telephones a recovery service which tows P's vehicle across to the opposite side of the road. The costs of this undertaking are less than if G had hired a taxi or a rented car in order to reach the distant airport from which G is due to fly. G cannot demand compensation under the rules of benevolent intervention in another's affairs because he acted predominantly in his own interest and was not acting in pursuit of an overriding public interest. However, he does have a claim to compensation under VI.–6:302. By acting as he did G has avoided a loss resulting from an infringement of his property rights. Whether P was agreeable to the measure or not plays no role.

Reasonably incurred expenditure. The expenditure incurred must be reasonable in relation to the threatened damage. Therefore, it is limited to the amount which would have resulted in damages, had the damage actually arisen or been exacerbated in the manner feared. The right to compensation does not however depend on the success of the measures taken. VI.–6:302 consciously follows the formulation in V.–3:101 (Right to indemnification or reimbursement). There as here, all that matters is that a reasonable neutral observer would have acted as the claimant did under the circumstances. If the claimant acted carelessly in the course of a reaction which in itself was sensible and reasonable then it may be that the claim will fall to be reduced under the rules on contributory fault.

Upstream, large quantities of water plants up to 12 metres long are cut-back and simply thrown into the water by a company responsible for the maintenance of clean waters. They float downstream to an aqueduct connected to a hydroelectric power station, threatening to block it. The company which operates the station removes these plants. While it cannot base its claim for reparation of the costs incurred on the argument that it benevolently intervened for the maintenance company, it has a good claim under VI.–1:102 (Prevention) read with the present Article, if the company would have been liable in negligence for the imminent (considerable) damage.

Illustration 3
An abnormally large, long and recognisably unsound tree on X's land falls down, knocking over electrical power lines on its way down. The power lines supplied electricity to a drying facility for tobacco on the neighbouring land. In order to limit the extent of the damage, the company operating the drying facility arranges for the installation of provisional electric cables. Along with the damages for the tobacco rendered unusable and for the destroyed cables, it is also entitled to reparation for the costs of the provisional solution.

Illustration 4
In a poster campaign, an advertising business, X, created the impression that a competitor would work together with it under its direction. In reality, the competitor had ended the co-operative work a long time ago due to a dispute and had prohibited X from using its name. At the same time as bringing an action, the competitor placed advertisements in several daily newspapers in which it corrected X's misleading indications. It did this because it had been constantly quizzed about X's advertisement at a conference of all the advertising businesses in the country and loss of turnover was imminent; customers' reactions had been so emphatically negative that a slow-down of orders had become highly likely. The requested judgment would have been granted even if the advertisements had not been published in time to be able to effectuate prevention. The competitor can claim reparation from X for the costs of the advertising campaign, which were reasonable.

NOTES

1. In FRANCE and BELGIUM the question of liability for expenditure in the course of preventing damage is barely the subject of analysis. That is explained by the fact that in such cases a legally relevant damage is recognised in any case. That the loss is actually caused by the injured party seeking to avert an impending damage only becomes relevant if the injured party commits a faute in doing so: see e.g. CA Brussels

June 1998, Tijdschrift voor Aansprakelijkheid en Verzekering in het Wegverkeer 1999, 225 (the injured party, confronted with the tortfeasor's bad driving, reacted so ineptly in taking evasive action as to turn his vehicle over; claim reduced by 50%).

2. In SPAIN too the issue of compensation for loss in preventing damage is hardly addressed as such. Such expenditure is as a rule damage within meaning of CC art. 1902 and as such recoverable in tort law (e.g. CA Cáceres 6 November 2006, BDA JUR 2007/46155: the collapse of an enormous tree which was located on the defendant's land, caused severe damages to the plaintiff's power line that affected the dry place where the plaintiff treated tobacco for commercial purposes. In order to limit the extent of his losses, the plaintiff installed a provisional power line; the costs of that installation were included in his heads of damage).

3. In ITALY reparation for the cost of averting a (greater) damage seem to depend on the existence of a precedent damage: CC art. 2056 in conjunction with art. 1227. However, in Cass. 12 April 1980, no. 2331, Giust.civ. 1980, I, 2226 a company which as a result of profound chemical changes to the water was compelled to opt for a more expensive bridge construction was entitled to compensation for the additional costs as against the party responsible for the pollution; a greater loss would have been sustained if the work had been suspended.

4. HUNGARIAN law has detailed rules on reduction of claims in the case of contributory fault (CC § 340), but does not have a rule on the obligation to bear the costs in those cases in which the creditor discharges his duty to mitigate damage. Such a rule does not appear necessary here either because such costs can be considered damage within the meaning of the general norm on tort law liability. That view is supported by CC § 355(4), under which the party causing damage is obliged to reimburse the costs which are necessary for diminishing or eliminating the injured party's economic and non-economic loss. The legal position in ROMANIA is unclear because the claim under tort law to reparation possibly fails for the reason that the costs of averting damage are not regarded as a direct consequence of the tortious conduct. CZECH and SLOVAK CC § 419, on the other hand, correspond with VI.–6:302: "A person who averted threatening damage shall be entitled to a compensation of usefully spent costs and of damages suffered therein; this right may be exercised even against the person in whose interest he acted; the compensation shall be given maximally in the extent corresponding to the damage that was averred".

5. Under GERMAN CC § 249(2)(i) in the case of personal injury and property damage the injured party instead of claiming reinstatement of the status quo ante can claim the monetary sum necessary to achieve that. That includes reparation for his expenditure (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[67], Pref. to § 249 no. 82). The duty to make reparation under CC § 249(1) also embraces expenditure of the injured party so far as that was necessary in the circumstances (BGH 6 April 1976, BGHZ 66, 182, 192; BGH 24 April 1990, BGHZ 111, 168, 175). The obligation to compensate for expenditure extends to costs which are incurred to prevent a specific impending damage or to minimise it if compensation for the damage which that expenditure was to prevent or minimise would itself have been recoverable (BGH 30 September 1993, BGHZ 123, 303, 309; MünchKomm [-Oetker], BGB[5], § 249 no. 172; Staudinger [-Schiemann], BGB[13], § 249 no. 57). Expenditure arising in connection with measures taken to fulfill one of the duties to mitigate arising under CC § 254 (Contributory fault) must even be compensated in the event that those measures were unsuccessful though not due to the fault of the injured party (Oetker loc. cit. no. 69). In the German Supreme Court case dated 13 November 2003, BGH Report 2004, 305, the operator of a hydroelectric plant removed a large number of aquatic plants washed up ashore, up to 12m in length which should have been cut down by the defendant further upstream. A claim for expenditure based on benevolent intervention in another's affairs was rejected; howeve. a tort law claim was regarded as feasible in principle but was rejected on the facts of the instant case.

6. According to AUSTRIAN law, costs incurred to prevent damage from occuring are regarded by legal scholarship (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], no. 2/21; Rummel [-Reischauer], ABGB II[2], § 1293 no. 10 and § 1304 no. 45) and constant jurisprudence of the courts (OGH 8 March 1994, SZ 67/35; OGH 16 March 2004, SZ 2004/36) as constituting a so-called "positive damage", provided that they serve a purpose. These costs may be recovered even if the measures adopted are unsuccessful. The test is what a reasonable person would have done in the same circumstances (OGH 11 January 1927, SZ 9/10 [however, the ratio of this case is based on benevolent intervention in another's affairs]; OGH 10 February 1960, EvBl 1960/161; OGH 30 August 1988, JBl 1989, 46). The recoverability of socalled contingency costs and reserve costs is contentious. Contingency costs encompass costs incurred to prevent probable damage (video cameras, store detectives). Such claims will fail for lack of causation (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 310). For example. a wife's claim against her violent husband (soon to be ex-husband) for the costs of an alarm system, security locks and an ex- directory number because of a failure to establish the requisite causation (OGH 28 April 1998, JBl 1999, 49; for criticism see Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI[3], Pref. to §§ 1293 no. 41). By contrast, claims for pro-rata share of the costs associated with the maintenance, purchase and upkeep of replacements, the so-called Reservehaltungskosten (as a rule the costs incurred by passenger transport companies for keeping a spare vehicle in reserve in order to tide them over if one of their vehicles is involved in an accident) are resolved according to the law on benevolent intervention (OGH 9 April 1987, JBl 1988, 319; OGH 6 December 2001, 2 Ob 272/01s; Reischauer loc. cit. § 1323 no. 11a; Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Danzl], ABGB[2], § 1323 no. 18).

7. Pursuant to GREEK law, whether expenses incurred directed at averting an impending damage are recoverable depends on whether, having regard to provisions on contributory fault (CC art. 300) such expenditure may be deemed to have been necessary (Kalavros, Perivallon kai idiotiko dikaio, http://www.law.uoa.gr/epaek/perivallon_kai_idiotiko_dikaio). The recovery of costs, spent as a precautionary measure in order to prevent loss accruing to the claimant's patrimony is controversial. For the most part, the view held is that such a claim will fail for lack of causation. (Kalavros loc.cit.). If, in the context of environmental damage, measures are taken to avert future damage occurring, then, in this case, liability arising under the rules governing benevolent intervention in another's affairs (CC art. 736) should be considered by the courts (Kalavros loc.cit.).

8. DUTCH CC art. 6:96(2) expressly provides that "reasonable costs incurred to prevent or mitigate damage, the incurrence of which could have been expected, having regard to event founding liability" is a compensatable head of damages (see further inter alia. Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 414 p. 335). ESTONIAN LOA does not contain a similar rule. Nonetheless, the incurrence of such costs may be recovered under tort law provided that there is proof of causation.

9. The issue of the recoverability of costs incurred to avert impending damage appears to have only been rarely discussed in SWEDEN. HD 22 February 1947, NJA 1947, 82 which concerned costs incurred by a buyer of cattle when he discovered an infectious outbreak in his herd. The costs associated with the measures taken to contain the infection to a section of the herd were regarded as recoverable (see Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 144, 150). HD 31 December 1946, NJA 1946, 758 I-II held that the costs associated with the slaughter of vixens who as a result of noise generated by military exercises killed their pups, were recoverable. The general view that they were no longer suitable for breeding prompted the slaughter of the vixens. The Court held that these costs were recoverable even though the view held by the breeders was not borne out by scientific evidence (see further Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 489). FINNISH Environmental Damages Liability Act (Lag om ersättning för miljöskador of 19 August 1994, no. 737) § 6 confers a right to claim the costs of measures taken by the claimant which were necessary to prevent damage occurring. Measures includes carrying out necessary investigations. This corresponds in all essential points to the DANISH Act on the Compenstion of Environmental Damage (lov om erstatning for miljøskader of 6 April 1994, no. 225) § 2 no. 4.

10. Under ENGLISH law the expenses of averting imminent danger of probable damage for which another would be responsible in tort law can be obtained before the damage is averted where a court awards damages, quantified as the cost of preventing the potential danger, in lieu of a quia timet injunction to prevent the tort (and thus the [more costly] damage) occurring: see Hooper v. Rogers [1975] Ch 43 (where the defendant had excavated a track on a slope and resultant soil erosion threatened removal of support to the claimant's farmhouse). After the event a claim for loss sustained with a view to minimising possible future damage is generally subsumed within the basic rules on liability in tort (including the requirement of a causal link) and are regarded as a correlative of the duty to mitigate loss, though typical losses such as medical expenses or hiring substitutes are rarely considered in this light: cf. Charlesworth and Percy (-Cooper), Negligence[11], para. 4-36; McGregor, Damages[17], paras. 2-049–2-050. The approach of IRISH law is fundamentally the same: see McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 2.47. Such loss can be claimed under the common law from the person who would be responsible in tort law for the damage, provided the claimant's act is not "extraneous or extrinsic" so as to break the chain of causation and render the damage too remote: Clerk and Lindsell (-Burrows), Torts[19], para. 29-10; McGregor, Damages[17], para. 6-061; and for IRISH law Hogg v. Keane [1956] IR 155, 158 (Maguire CJ: the plaintiff, who injured herself fleeing from a parked car when the defendant in his vehicle negligently collided with it, would be entitled to damages if she could connect her injuries with the accident by showing her fright was reasonable). The claimant can thus recover reasonable expenses incurred in preventing (further) damage: see, for example, Dee Conservancy Board v. McConnell [1928] 2 KB 159 (costs of raising and removing the defendant's boat which sank due to the defendant's negligence and was obstructing navigation of the river for which the claimants were conservators). A claimant may recover even if his conduct is ultimately based on a mistaken judgment; an unsuccessful attempt to avert or mitigate loss which actually aggravates the damage sustained by the claimant will not amount to a novus actus interveniens, provided it was reasonable conduct of the claimant to avoid (further) loss: Charlesworth and Percy (-Cooper), Negligence[11], para. 4-36; Burrows, Remedies[3], p. 127; McGregor, Damages[17], para. 6-061; Sayers v. Harlow Urban District Council [1958] 1 WLR 623 (claimant could recover damages for injury sustained in attempting to climb over the door of a lavatory cubicle after the defendants negligently locked her in); Lloyds & Scottish Finance Ltd. v. Modern Cars & Caravans (Kingston) Ltd. [1966] 1 QB 764, 782 per Edmund Davies J (in the context of contractual, rather than tortuous, liability, but approving the general proposition set out in the contemporary edition of McGregor, Damages). SCOTS law on these issues is similar (see Walker, Delict[2], 217-218). In particular, recovery is possible where the pursuer's reasonable, but mistaken conduct has exacerbated the damage: see Walker loc. cit. 217, and S.S. "Baron Vernon" v. S.S. "Metagama" 1928 SC (HL) 21, 25-26 (Viscount Haldane: no breach of the duty to minimise damage if there is a mere error of judgment in difficult circumstances) (dicta equally authoritative in English law).

CHAPTER 7: ANCILLARY RULES

VI.–7:101: National constitutional laws

The provisions of this Book are to be interpreted and applied in a manner compatible with the constitutional law of the court.

COMMENTS

Chapter 7 in overview. Chapter 7 provides ancillary rules, which essentially clarify that certain legal issues in the field of non-contractual liability are not the subject matter of these model rules. The interaction of these matters with the law on non-contractual liability is partially too complex and also partially too sensitive from a policy perspective to be able to pronounce on them in model rules. Therefore, issues of the involvement of constitutional law - especially fundamental rights - in the law on non-contractual liability remain out of the equation (VI.–7:101). Further, the model rules of this Book do not themselves define the term "statutory provisions" (VI.–7:102) (Statutory provisions), they are silent on questions on the liability of the State (VI.–7:103) (Public law functions and court proceedings), do not probe into labour law (VI.–7:104) (Liability of employees, employers, trade unions and employers associations) and do not pronounce on issues that result from the interplay between insurance law and the law on liability (VI.–7:105) (Reduction or exclusion of liability to indemnified persons). In so far as they do not already fall outside the subject field of the model rules due to I.–1:101 (Intended field of application), of course other matters are intentionally not enumerated in Chapter 7. In particular, the working teams did not find a sufficient reason for including in the catalogue of exceptional rules further privileges from liability for individual professional groups.

VI.–7:101. This Article picks up the rule in I.–1:102 (Interpretation and development) paragraph (2) for the purposes of this Book. Strictly speaking, this is perhaps unnecessary. However, the influence of fundamental rights on the law on private liability is particularly strong, which is why an express statement and a somewhat more definite formulation appeared helpful. Not only are the rules of this Book to be interpreted in the light of the respective applicable constitutional law, in fact their application falls under the general proviso that they are congruent with the constitutional protection of fundamental rights. This is not only a constitutional statement, but also one of the law on non-contractual liability. It becomes particularly clear in connection with the evaluation of infringements of personality rights by the press. Here, like everywhere else, it is a self-evident aspect of the present branch of the law that it seeks to protect fundamental rights (like freedom of press) and not infringe them.

NOTES

1. The precise details of the impact that constitutional rules have on civil liability cannot be depicted here in their entirety. A number of pointers will have to suffice. According to FRENCH law, the principle that every person who suffers damage as a consequence of a faute civile is entitled to compensation enjoys constitutional protection (Conseil constitutionnel 22 October 1982, D. 1983 jur. 189, note Luchaire). BELGIAN Const.

art. 25 is one of those provisions which exert a strong influence over the private law, in that, in the context of torts committed by the press, it provides that liability must be imposed on defendants in a particular sequential order. For SPAIN, ever since the Constitution came into force in 1978, it is beyond doubt that the principle that statutes must be construed in manner that is compatible with the constitution is one of the tenets of CC art. 3(1) (Organic Act on Judiciary Power [Ley Orgánica 6/1985, del poder judicial, of 1 July 1985] art. 5; Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Salvador], Código Civil I[2], 25). The practice of assessing the compensation of victims of traffic accidents by adverting to actuarial tables was deemed compatible with the Constitution. This ruling does not impinge upon the fact that the right to claim compensation where corporeal and incorporeal personality rights are culpably infringed is guaranteed by the Constitution (TC 29 June 2000, no. 181, BDA RTC 2000/181). This constitutional protection is also afforded to claims for compensation for non-pecuniary loss for breaches of the right to an intimate sphere committed by the press (TC 17 September 2001, no. 186, BDA RTC 2001/186). It remains to be said that the presumption of innocence is only a feature of criminal law and is not a feature of private law (TC 13 December 1993, no. 367, BDA RTC 1993/367; TS 19 June 1997, RAJ 1997 (3) no. 5420 p. 8287; TS 13 February 2003, RAJ 2003 (1) no. 1045 p. 1998).

2. See notes II16 und V36 under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) on the constitutionally inspired re- orientation under ITALIAN law in the field of liability for non-economic loss. With respect to GERMANY, the BVerfG 18 January 2001, NJW 2001, 1639 held that requiring a media company to pay damages for the publication of an article which had the knock-on effect of impinging on its economic basis did not infringe on the freedom of the press. AUSTRIAN CC § 1330 confers a right on the person concerned to claim compenstion if the claimant's right to honour is infringed by a defamatory statement. However, this right may be abridged by the right to freedom of expression (Const. art. 13; ECHR art. 10) which may, to a certain degree, justify exaggerated or provocative statements (OGH 14 March 2000, JBl 2000, 664; OGH 18 August 2004, SZ 2004/127; OGH 28 November 1997, ÖJZ 1997, 956).

3. In SWEDEN, as in other countries, state liability has been extended for violations of the ECHR. The courts accepted an independent claim flowing from the Convention itself, granting a right to claim non-pecuniary damages for state violations of the Convention regardless of a statutory basis under national law (HD 9 June 2005, NJA 2005, 462; HD 21 September 2007, NJA 2007, 584). The Convention does not, however, apply between two private parties. The Supreme Court rejected the claim of a private individual, based on the ECHR initiated against her insurance company who had subjected her to covert surveillance (HD 29 October 2007, NJA 2007, 747). By contrast, the NORWEGIAN courts are more inclined to rely on the ECHR when they are called upon to determine a claim between private individuals involving a breach of the right to respect for private life (HD 7 May 2007, Rt 2007, 687; HD 10 April 2008, HR-2008-647-A).

VI.–7:102: Statutory provisions

National law determines what legal provisions are statutory provisions.

COMMENTS

The Articles of this Book use the expressions "statute" or "statutory provisions" on many occasions (see VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death) paragraph (2)(c), VI.–3:102 (Negligence) sub-paragraph (a), VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions) paragraph (5)(b)and VI.–5:401 (Contractual exclusion or limitation of liability) paragraph (4)). In each case, statutes in a material sense are what is meant by "statutes", not necessarily parliamentary statutes (see Comments under VI.–3:102 (Negligence)). Such norms, which are binding for all, take a diverse spectrum of outward forms. Their detailed classification and distinction from individual regulations on the one hand and sets of rules without normative character on the other (the usual of example of which would be the safety regulations of public insurance or maintenance bodies), cannot be provided by these model rules. Clarifying this is the aim of the present Article.

NOTES

1. Most of the Member States differentiate between different types of law-making, between Acts in the strict sense and Laws in a wider sense (including Public General Acts and Measures, secondary legislation and recognised rules of customary law). The FRENCH approach regards Law in the wider sense as connoting a legal norm emanating from the State, the breach of which entails some legal sanction (Carbonnier, Droit civil I, p. 13 no. 5). A law in the wider sense must be in writing, may not be ad hominem and must be an expression of the general will (Déclaration des droits de l'homme et du citoyen of 1789, art. 6); it is abstract, general and permanent. Acts in the strict sense are parliamentary enactments; they can also be stem from a referendum. Acts in the strict sense are not necessarily Laws in the wider sense (Ghestin, Traité de droit civil, Introduction générale[4], no. 244; Chabas, Lecon de droit civil I(1)[12], no. 66), because the former may solely be directed at a specific person. Regulations made by central and local government (règlements) and International Conventions can be only Laws in the wider sense. As regards Regulations, a distinction is drawn between règlements autonomes (Const. art. 37) and règlements d'exécution or règlements administratifs. Règlements d'exécution are made by Ministers, while decrees made by Prefects and Mayors are designated arrêtés. In the BELGIAN hierarchy of norms (detailed by Hansenne, Introduction au droit privé, no. 34) the Constitution ranks before Acts; below these are the décrets of the Conseils des Communautés et des régions (which in the region Bruxelles-Capitale are designated ordonnances). Décrets and ordonnances have the same effect as an Act in the strict sense for the localities in which they operate.
2. SPANISH CC art. 1(1) sets out the following hierarchy of legal sources: (i) law (ley), (ii) custom (costumbre) and (iii) general principles of law (principios generales del Derecho). According to current understanding, the concept of ley includes (Gordillo Cañas, ADC 1988, 469-515) the Constitution as well as the decisions of the Tribunal Constitucional on the constitutionality of a statute ranked below the Constitution. Ley also embraces an enactment of the national parliament (Cortes Generales) as well as an enactment emanating from the (regional) Autonomous Parliaments (Parlamentos autonómicos), furthermore it encompasses regulations and other legal norms, which may be enacted by the central government and automonous regions once particular requirements are met. In the context of private law, regional law is becoming increasingly significant. Whilst legislative competence principally lies exclusively with the national legislature, those automonous regions which traditionally have their own civil law are permitted to 'conserve, modify and develop' the state private law (Const. art. 149(1)(no. 8a). In a similar manner, ITALIAN disp. prel. art. 1 designates Acts, Regulations and Custom or usage as sources of law. Laws of a constitutional character? regulate the issue of governmental decrees having the force of law (disp. prel. art. 2).

3. In HUNGARY, statutes may only be enacted by parliament. The competence to regulate a particular area derives from the Constitution. CC § 685 is numbered among the "statutory provisons" in the sense of the terminology employed in the Civil Code alongside Acts, governmental regulations and legislation made by automonous adminstrative bodies under the authority conferred on them by law. According to ROMANIAN Const. art. 73(1) Acts in the strict sense are Constitutional Acts, Acts to amend and supplement the Constitution and ordinary Acts of the legislature (legi ordinare), and moreover include Parliamentary Resolutions which only pertain to a particular case. By virtue of Const. art. 115, the central government, if authorised by an enabling statute, may issue an ordinance (ordonanţă); the government also has the power to issue ordinances in a situation of emergency (ordonanţă de urgenţă) (Const. art. 115 (4)). Matters involving great technical detail may be regulated by governmental decrees (Hotărârea Guvernului) and orders (Ordin); this method is utilised, for example, in the context of the law on motor liability insurance. A number of decrees and decree laws stemming from the time prior to change in the system of government remain in force, e.g. Decree 167/1958 on Limitation Periods .

4. According to GERMAN EGBGB (Introductory Law to the Civil Code) art. 2, the concept of "statute" for the purposes of private law is defined as "every legal norm". GREEK CC art. 1 arrives at the same result, as it provides that "legal norms are contained in statutes and rules of custom and usage." In a similar fashion, AUSTRIAN Law differentiates between Acts in a strict sense (Acts of Parliament) and Law in a wider sense. Laws in a wider sense embrace every general abstract norm and include all norms, which are made on the basis of a authority conferred in primary legislation. Laws in a wider sense also include protective laws in the sense of CC § 1311. Even technical guidelines can also be included within this rubric provided that they were declared as binding in an Act in the strict sense or in a Regulation (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI^3, § 1311, no. 9). The notion of "statutory provision" (disposição legal) under PORTUGUESE CC art. 483(1) embraces, according to CC art. 1(2) all general provisions which stem from the competent state body. These include Acts of Parliament, Ordinances and regional legislative decrees (Const. art. 111(1)). Statutes emanating from the Assembleia da República are called leis, the government issues decretos-lei. Leis and decretos-lei have the same normative effect (Const. art. 112(2)). The government is conferred with an independent legislative competence in all matters which are not exclusively accorded to the parliamentary domain (Const. art. 164). As regards the civil law, the precise demarcation of competences may be derived from Const. arts. 161(c) und (d), 198(1).

5. According to DUTCH Const. art. 81 statutes shall be passed jointly by the government and the Staten-Generaal. If the Constitution refers to "statute", it always refers to Acts in the strict sense. Laws in the wider sense can also be passed by other competent bodies, provided that they are empowered to do so by the Constitution or by an Act in a strict sense; if the same perequisites are satisfied, this competence can be delegated further. Laws in the wider sense embrace, in particular, algemene maatregelen van bestuur (generally binding governmental regulations established by Royal Decree [Const. art. 89]); ministeriële regelingen (generally binding Minsterial Orders); provinciale verordeningen (generally binding regulations of the provinces); gemeentelijke verordeningen (generally binding regulations of municipalities) and Regulations of water boards and public bodies.

6. In the NORDIC countries the term "statute" (or "statutory provisions") refers to all enacted legal instruments, whether by parliament, the government, municipalities or public authorities. Therefore, when it comes to ascertaining the extent of the duty of care in negligence, recourse may be had to a large spectrum of special statutory rules on the protection of the interest concerned; reliance may also be placed on rules of custom (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 128; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 66; Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 15; Hagstrøm, TfR 1980, 292-366).

VI.–7:103: Public law functions and court proceedings

This Book does not govern the liability of a person or body arising from the exercise or omission to exercise public law functions or from performing duties during court proceedings.

COMMENTS

Relationship with I.–1:101(2). This Article absorbs the rule in I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2), concretising and extending it for the purposes of the law on non-contractual liability. This Book neither concerns itself with issues of liability for the erroneous exercise of sovereign power nor with questions of liability for damage in connection with conducting court proceedings. The same applies to matters relating primarily to procedure or enforcement (I.–1:101(2)(h)).

Person or body exercising public law functions. Remaining excluded from the scope of application of this Book is the liability of the State and its institutions as well as the personal liability of its office holders for the exercise or the failure to exercise sovereign power in breach of duty.

> Illustration
> X, a prison inmate and perpetrator of violence, is let out on parole on many occasions and, after a period of time, even let out for one year. During this time, he abducts a woman and forces her to perform sexual acts. Neither the issue of whether the State is liable for the wrongful omission of its officials, nor the question of whether one of them is personally liable, is governed by these rules.

What exactly is to be understood under the exercise of public authority is to be decided in conformity with the criteria developed on EC Treaty art. 45(1). Remaining borderline cases must be left to the respective lex fori for demarcation; whether it is possible for uniform criteria on the demarcation between the realisation of public functions on the one hand and private law (fiscal) duties on the other, could not be verified.

Performing duties during court proceedings. Moreover, this Book contains no statement on the liability of judges or the liability of lawyers and expert witnesses for their activities in court. In this area of their professional activity, all three professional groups typically enjoy privileges from liability, which remain unaffected by the rules of this Book. The term “court” includes arbitration tribunals, see I.–1:103 (Definitions) paragraph (1) in conjunction with Annex I, keyword “Court”.

NOTES

1. Die Haftung des Staates, seiner Einrichtungen und Beamten unterliegt in vielen Mitgliedstaaten einem eigenen Regime und nicht selten auch einer eigenen Gerichtsbarkeit. In FRANCE entscheiden grundsätzlich die Verwaltungsgerichte; über die von Fahrzeugen verursachten Schäden aber die Zivilgerichte (Gesetz of 31 December 1957). Der Staat haftet für jedes, nicht nur für ein schweres Verschulden, das er bzw. ein Beamter in Ausübung seiner Kompetenzen begeht (CE 7 February 2003, no. 223882, Secrétaire d’Etat au logement v. SNC Empain Graham). Unter dem

Verfassungsergänzungsgesetz no. 79-43 of 18 January 1979 ist der Staat auch für ein persönliches Verschulden seiner Richter und Staatsanwälte verantwortlich; er kann sie in einem speziellen Verfahren vor der Zivilrechtsabteilung des Kassationshofes in Regress nehmen (Ordonnance no. 58-1270 of 22 December 1958, art. 11-1; Cass.civ. 5 March 1980, Bull.civ. 1980, I, no. 79, RTD civ 1980, 771, obs. Durry; Cass.civ. 5 May 1982, D. 1983, I.R. 1956, obs. Julien; Cass.civ. 30 January 1996, D. 1997, 83, note Legrand). Den Richtern und Staatsanwälten stehen insoweit die Beamten der Kriminalpolizei gleich (Cass.civ. 9 March 1999, Bull.civ. 1999, I, no. 84), nicht aber die Laienrichter, für die besondere Regeln bestehen. Ein persönliches Verschulden liegt vor bei Rechtsverweigerung, Vorsatz, Betrug, Gebührenüberhebung und einem schwerwiegenden beruflichen Fehler (Code de l'organisation judiciaire art. L. 141-1; CA Versailles 27 July 1989, JCP éd. G 1990, II, 21450, note Estoup; Cass.civ. 3 July 1990, JCP éd. G 1990, IV, 336; Cass.civ. 10 May 1995, I.R. 1995, 143). Schärfere Regeln bestehen für Fehler in Vormundschaftssachen (CC art. 473). Rechtsanwälte haften nach den allgemeinen Regeln (Gesetz no. 71-1130 of 31 December 1971 art. 26; sie müssen sich gegen Haftpflicht versichern [loc. cit. art. 27]).

2. In BELGIUM muss für den Bereich der Staatshaftung zwischen den drei Gewalten unterschieden werden. Für die Exekutive gilt das Prinzip der Einheit der faute, wonach die öffentliche Hand in ihrem Bereich denselben Anforderungen genügen muss, wie jeder andere in seinem (Leclercq, concl. under Cass. 25 October 2004, R.W. 2006-07, 1486). Eine Verwaltungsbehörde oder ein sonstiger Träger von Exekutivgewalt begeht folglich eine faute i.S.d. CC arts. 1382 und 1383, wenn sie bzw. er bei einer Entscheidung die allgemeine Sorgfaltspflicht oder eine gesetzliche Vorschrift verletzt, ohne sich auf einen besonderen Haftungsausschlussgrund (z.B. auf einen unvermeidlichen Irrtum) berufen zu können (Cass. 14 January 2000, R.W. 2001-02, 1096, note Van Oevelen). Jede gesetzwidrige Auslegung oder Anwendung einer Norm durch die Exekutive verpflichtet den Staat zur Haftung für hierdurch einem Dritten verursachte Schäden. Seit Cass. 19 December 1991, Pas. belge 1992, I, 316 trifft den Staat zudem aus CC arts. 1382 und 1383 auch eine Haftung für Schäden résultant d'une faute commise par un juge ou un officier du ministère public lorsque ce magistrat a agi dans les limites de ses attributions légales ou lorsque celui-ci doit être considéré comme ayant agi dans ces limites, par tout homme raisonnable et prudent. Dies gilt allerdings nur, wenn die fehlerhafte Entscheidung wegen Verletzung einer Rechtsnorm durch eine andere, rechtskräftige Entscheidung aufgehoben oder vernichtet wird und wenn die fehlerhafte Auslegung oder Anwendung des Rechts eine faute konstituiert (Cass. 26 June 1998, www.cass.be). Eine Staatshaftung kann schließlich auch für Fehler in der Ausübung der gesetzgebenden Gewalt enstehen (grundlegend Cass.ass.pl. 1 June 2006, R.W. 2006-07, 213, concl. De Swaef, note Van Oevelen). Cass. 28 September 2006, no. de rôle c020570F hat eine Staatshaftung sogar mit dem Argument bejaht, die Legislative habe dadurch eine faute begangen, dass sie die Justiz nicht mit den erforderlichen Finanzmitteln ausgestattet habe, um Zivilverfahren in angemessener zeitlicher Frist zu bewältigen. Zahlreiche Einzelheiten der Staatshaftung sind mit Gesetz of 10 February 2003 (Loi relative à la responsabilité des et pour les membres du personnel au service des personnes publiques, Monit. belge 27 February 2003) neu geregelt worden, insbesondere finden über loc. cit. art. 3 die allgemeinen Regeln der Arbeitgeberhaftung (CC art. 1384(3)) auch auf die Staatshaftung Anwendung. Richters und Staatsanwälte haften persönlich nur im Falle von Rechtsbeugung (prise à partie, Code judiciaire arts. 1140-1147), betrügerischem Verhalten und Rechtsverweigerung. Rechtsanwälte haften nach den allgemeinen Regeln (CFR Brussels 27 February 1986, no. JB00131_1; CA Brussels 3 March 1987, RGDC 1987, 1869).

3. Unter LUXEMBURGIAN Gesetz of 1 September 1988 über die Haftpflicht des Staats und der öffentlichen Körperschaften art. 1(1) haften der Staat und die übrigen öffentlichen Körperschaften im Rahmen ihrer Verwaltungstätigkeit für alle Schäden, die ihre Ursache in einem Fehler ihrer Gerichts- oder Verwaltungsbehörden haben (näher Ravarani, La responsabilité civile[2], no. 120). Die Staatshaftung folgt also den Regeln des allgemeinen bürgerlichen Rechts der Haftung für faute (Ravarani, La responsabilité civile[2], p. 414 no. 500). Unter besonderen Umständen tritt zudem eine Haftung auch ohne den Nachweis eines Fehlverhaltens ein (loc. cit. arts. 1(2) und (2)). Richter und Staatsanwälte haften persönlich nur unter sehr engen Voraussetzungen; das gilt auch für die Haftung im Regresswege gegenüber dem Staat. Die Rechtslage deckt sich weitgehend mit der in Belgien. Dasselbe gilt für die Haftung der Rechtsanwälte (näher Ravarani loc. cit. no. 258).

4. In SPAIN extracontractual liability of public administration is governed by Act on the general regime of Public Administrations (Act 30/1992, de régimen jurídico de las Administraciones Públicas y procedimiento administrativo común, of 26 November 1992 [as amended] - LRJ-PAC) arts. 139-146. Loc. cit. art. 139(1) provides that "individuals shall be entitled to compensation by the relevant Public Administration for all damage sustained to any of their goods and rights", if the damage is the result "of the normal or abnormal functioning of the public services". The rule applies to all public law bodies and it embraces all sorts of activities of the Public Administration, even if in a private law relationship (loc. cit. art. 144); only the liability arising from court proceedings has its own regime (see below). All natural and legal persons are protected, including civil servants and (other) bodies exercising public law functions. The liability is direct in the sense that the civil servant or public employee that caused the damage cannot be taken to court, unless either he/she was criminally liable or he/she caused the damage with intention or gross negligence. In the latter case the Public Administration may seek reimbursement under loc. cit. art. 145(2), in the former its liability is of a subsidiary nature (TS 19 November 2001, RAJ 2002 (2) no. 2775 p. 4806; Reglero Campos [-Busto Lago], Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 1721). The civil servant's conduct must be 'in the exercise or on the occasion of public functions' (TS 25 June 1997, RAJ 1997 (3) no. 5834 p. 8983). Liability is strict (loc. cit. arts. 139-146), the only defence being force majeure. Const. art. 121 states that "damage caused by either a judicial mistake or by the abnormal functioning of the Public Administration of Justice shall entitle [the victim] to a compensation by the State". Organic Act on Judiciary Power (Ley 6/1985, Orgánica del Poder Judicial, of 1 July 1985 [LOPJ]) art. 252 develops this provision further. Advocates are not within that regime, unless appointed by the State. Zur persönlichen Haftung von Richtern des Verfassungsgerichtshofes see TS 23 January 2004, RAJ 2004 (1) no. 1 p. 17. Damage caused by an Act of Parliament may also be compensated under LRJ-PAC arts. 139-146. A typical case would be an infringement of EC law (e.g. TS 12 June 2003, RAJ 2003 (5) no. 8844 p. 16562).

5. ITALIAN Const. art. 28 bestimmt, dass die Angehörigen des öffentlichen Dienstes nach Maßgabe des geltenden Straf-, Zivil- und Verwaltungsrechts für Amtspflichtverletzungen persönlich haften. Die zivilrechtliche Haftung erstreckt sich in solchen Fällen auch auf den Staat oder die Körperschaft, in deren Dienst der betreffenden Beamte oder Angestellte steht (Alpa and Mariconda [-Alpa and Mariconda], Codice civile commentato IV, sub art. 2043, XIII, § 62, p. 2398). Es gelten die Regeln des allgemeinen Deliktsrechts, soweit sie nicht mit der öffentlichrechtlichen Natur des Beklagten unvereinbar sind (Cass. 7 February 1974, no. 330, Giur.it. 1974, I, 1, 1158; Cass. 29 November 1973, no. 3245, Giur.it. 1974, I, 1, 1343). Die Haftung setzt eine schuldhaft (Cass.sez.un. 22 July 1999, no. 500, Foro it. 1999, I, 2478; Cass. 29 March 2004, no. 6199, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 3; Cass. 23 July 2004, no. 13801, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 7-8) unrechtmäßige Ausübung des öffentlichen Amtes (z.B. Cass. 10 February 2005, no. 2705, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 2), Kausalität und ein Handeln im Rahmen der institutionellen Zwecke des Staates oder der Körperschaft voraus (Cass. 17 September 1997, no. 9260, Foro it. 1998, I, 1217; Cass. 18 March 2003, no. 3980, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, 538). Auch Vorsatztaten können dem Staat zugerechnet werden, wenn zwischen der Tat und der öffentlichen Aufgabe des Beamten oder Angestellten ein nesso di occasionalità necessaria besteht (Cass. 14 May 1997, no. 4232, Giust.civ.Mass. 1997, 732). Der Staatsdiener haftet persönlich neben dem Staat, dem er im Innenverhältnis ggflls. Regress schuldet. Für einige Ausbildungsberufe, die in Staatseinrichtungen ausgeübt werden, gelten Sondergesetze mit teilweise abweichenden Regelungen. Act 13 April 1988, no. 117 (Gazz. Uff. 15 April 1988, no. 88) Risarcimento dei danni cagionati nell'esercizio delle funzioni giudiziarie e responsabilità civile dei magistrati regelt den Ersatz der in der Ausübung von Gerichtsfunktionen verursachten Schäden und die zivilrechtliche Haftung der Richter und Staatsanwälte. Die Staatshaftung tritt hier bei Vorsatz, grober Fahrlässigkeit und Rechtsverweigerung ein. Nichtvermögensschäden werden nur im Falle der Freiheitsentziehung ersetzt (loc. cit. art. 2(1)). Richter und Staatsanwälte haften (im Regresswege) nur gegenüber dem Staat (loc. cit. art. 7); anders ist das nur, wenn sie sich einer Straftat schuldig gemacht haben (loc. cit. art. 13).

6. HUNGARIAN CC § 349(1) regelt die Haftung für Schäden durch die öffentliche Verwaltung; auf durch Richter oder Staatsanwälte verursachte Schäden ist die Regelung entsprechend anzuwenden (CC § 349(3)). Die Haftung tritt nur ein, wenn der Schaden nicht durch ein ordentliches Rechtsmittel abgewendet werden konnte. Haftungsschuldner ist das jeweilige Organ (die jeweilige Körperschaft), der das Verhalten der handelnden natürlichen Person zugerechnet wird; CC § 349(1) enthält letztlich also nur eine Sonderform der Arbeitgeberhaftung (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1296; Petrik [-Wellmann], Polgári jog II[2], 606/3; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 141). Die Haftung setzt nach den allgemeinen Regeln (CC § 339) Vorwerfbarkeit voraus. Hier wird geprüft, ob so verfahren worden ist, wie es unter den konkreten Umständen im Allgemeinen erwartet werden konnte. Die fehlerhafte Auslegung einer Rechtsvorschrift genügt für sich genommen ebenso wenig wie eine fehlerhafte Beweiswürdigung; es wird vielmehr eine offensichtliche und schwerwiegende Rechtsverletzung verlangt (Benedek loc. cit. 1304; Wellmann loc. cit. 608; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 170). Under BULGARIAN law haften Verwaltungs- und Justizbeamte nur im Falle von Vorsatz und grober Fahrlässigkeit.

7. ROMANIAN Const. art. 52 gibt i.V.m Gesetz no. 554/2004 über die öffentlichrechtliche Streitigkeit art. 1 jedermann einen Anspruch auf Ersatz seiner materiellen und immateriellen Schäden, wenn er durch die öffentliche Verwaltung in einem seiner Rechte (nicht: in einem bloßen Interesse) verletzt wird. Es handelt sich um eine strikte Haftung; der jeweilige Funktionsträger haftet persönlich aber nur im Falle eines vom Geschädigten zu beweisenden Verschuldens (loc. cit. art. 13(1)). Für Justizirrtümer in Strafverfahren besteht ein Sonderregime (Const. art. 52(3) i.V.m. CCrimProc arts. 504-507. POLISH CC arts. 417, 417^1, 417^2 and 418 regeln Fragen der Staatshaftung unmittelbar im Anschluss an die deliktsrechtliche Grundnorm (CC art. 415). Under art. 417(1) the State Treasury, territorial self-government unit or another legal person exercising public authority by virtue of law shall be liable for damage inflicted by unlawful activity or cessation thereof which occurred in exercise of such authority. Die Haftung für gesetzgeberisches Unrecht ist Gegenstand einer ausführlichen Regelung in CC art. 417^1.

8. GERMAN CC § 839 regelt nur die persönliche Haftung von Beamten im staatsrechtlichen Sinn, allerdings ohne Unterschied, ob sie im hoheitlichen oder im fiskalischen Bereich tätig werden (BGH [Great Senate in Civil Matters] 19 December 1960, BGHZ 34, 99, 104). Es handelt sich um eine abschließende, alle anderen auf dem Verschuldensprinzip aufbauende Haftungsregeln verdrängende lex specialis (Soergel [-Vinke], BGB[13], § 839, no. 12). CC § 839 begründet einerseits auch eine Haftung für reine Vermögensschäden, enthält aber auch spezifische Haftungsbeschränkungen (CC § 839(1)(ii) [Subsidiarität], § 839(2) [Richterprivileg] und § 839(3) [Schadensabwendungsobliegenheit durch Gebrauch eines Rechtsmittels]). Von der persönlichen Haftung des Beamten ist die Haftung öffentlich-rechtlicher Körperschaften unter Const. art. 34 zu unterscheiden. Sie umfasst nur hoheitliche Tätigkeiten, tritt in diesem Bereich jedoch an die Stelle der persönlichen Beamtenhaftung (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 839, nos. 1, 12). Der Beamte haftet im Anwendungsbereich von Const. art. 34 nur gegenüber dem Staat, nicht auch gegenüber dem Bürger, und gegenüber dem Staat auch nur im Falle von Vorsatz oder grober Fahrlässigkeit. Const. art. 34 erweitert den Kreis der Personen, für welche die Staatshaftung eintritt, auf alle von der jeweiligen Körperschaft mit hoheitlichen Aufgaben betraute Personen (näher Medicus, Schuldrecht II[14], no. 913; BGH 23 November 1995, BGHZ 131, 200, 203); es handelt sich um eine gesetzliche Schuldübernahme, durch welche die persönliche Haftung der Handelnden im Außenverhältnis erlischt.

9. Under AUSTRIAN Amtshaftungsgesetz (AHG) § 1 haftet die jeweilige Körperschaft (Bund, Land, Gemeinde) nach den Bestimmungen des bürgerlichen Rechts für Schäden am Vermögen oder an der Person, welche die als ihre Organe handelnden Personen in Vollziehung der Gesetze einem Dritten rechtswidrig und schuldhaft zufügen. Das betrifft sowohl verwaltungsbehördliches als auch richterliches Handeln, nicht aber legislatives Unrecht (OGH 15 October 2004, SZ 2004/148). Geschuldet ist grundsätzlich nur Geldersatz (im Gegensatz zur Naturalrestitution); eine Haftung für entgangenen Gewinn setzt ein grobes Verschulden voraus. Einige Spezialgesetze verzichten für ihren Bereich allerdings völlig auf das Verschuldenserfordernis (zur rechtswidrigen Freiheitsentziehung siehe z.B. OGH 18 June 1975, SZ 48/69). Die Haftung für fehlerhafte Rechtsprechung ist vielfach begrenzt, eine Haftung für höchstrichterliche Entscheidungen ist gänzlich ausgeschlossen, falls sie darauf hinausliefe, dass ein Untergericht die Entscheidung eines Obersten Gerichtshofs überprüfen müsste (AHG § 2(3); see OGH 25 August 1993, SZ 66/97 and OGH 25 February 1997, SZ 70/32). Eine Haftung des Staates für fehlerhafte untergerichtliche Entscheidungen, die nicht mehr mit einem Rechtsmittel bekämpft werden können, setzt materiell die Abweichung von einer klaren Gesetzeslage voraus. In Kindschaftssachen kann sie auch aus einer unzureichenden Überwachung eines beteiligten Rechtsanwaltes folgen (OGH 14 July 1992, SZ 65/108). Vorschriften über die Haftung wegen legislativen Unrechts, insbesondere infolge fehlender oder magelhafter Umsetzung von Gemeinschaftsrecht, gibt es bislang noch nicht.

10. Rechtsanwälte fallen nach der neueren Rechtsprechung (A.P. 18/1999, EEN 67/2000, 230 = EllDik 40/1999, 1290 = DEE 11/1999, 1172) nicht in den Anwendungsbereich der strikten Haftung von Dienstleistungserbringern unter GREEK Law 2251/1994 (as amended by Act no. 3587/2007) . Das wird mit der besonderen Stellung des Rechtsanwaltes, der ein Amt ausübe, begründet. Folglich unterliegt seine Haftung weiterhin den Vorschriften in Introductory Act to the Civil Procedure Law art. 73.

11. PORTUGAL verfügt mit Gesetz no. 67/2007 “Civil liability of the State and other public corporate bodies” of 31 December 2007 über eine umfangreiche Regelung des Staatshaftungsrechts. Hinzu kommt CC art. 501, der eine strikte Haftung des Staates und anderer juristischer Personen des öffentlichen Rechts bei Ausübung privatrechtlicher Tätigkeiten vorsieht. Under Law no. 67/2007 art. 11 the State and other public corporate bodies are liable for "special and abnormal losses resulting from specially dangerous administrative services or things", es sei denn, der Schaden beruht auf höherer Gewalt oder einem Verschulden des Geschädigten oder eines Dritten.

12. In the NETHERLANDS folgt das Recht der Haftung für unerlaubtes Staatshandeln (onrechtmatige overheidsdaad) grundsätzlich den allgemeinen Regeln des CC art. 6:162. Allerdings beansprucht das Verwaltungsrecht in einigen Fallgruppen Anwendungsvorrang. Die Zivilgerichte dürfen in ihrem Zuständigkeitsbereich verwaltungsbehördliches Handeln am Maßstab "der allgemeinen Grundsätze angemessener Verwaltung" prüfen (HR 27 March 1987, NedJur 1987 no. 727 p. 2454; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], nos. 266-271c; Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 1347). ESTONIA hat die Regeln der Staatshaftung in einem State Liability Act zusammengefasst.

13. SWEDISH Damages Liability Act chap. 3 § 2 provides for state (and municipal) liability for personal injuries, property damage, pure economic loss and violations within chap. 2 § 3 (infringements of human dignity etc), if caused by negligence in the course of exercising duties of a public authority. Der Fahrlässigkeitsstandard ist gegenüber den normalen Regeln des Privatrechts objektiviert; personal characteristics of individual public servants are irrelevant. Negligence may be "anonymous": der Geschädigte muss weder die Fahrlässigkeit eines einzelnen Beamten beweisen noch beweisen, dass er oder sie von dem Verhalten eines anderen Beamten Kenntnis hatte. Negligent conduct may be found based on separate actions or omissions by several servants or authorities which in total amounts to negligent conduct. The requirement that the damage must have been caused in the course of exercising public authority has caused several difficult questions of delimitation (see e.g. HD 20 July 1987, NJA 1987, 535. Damages Liability Act ch. 3 § 3 extends state liability to pure economic losses caused by negligently given information or advise (see in more detail Bengtsson, Det allmännas ansvar enligt skadeståndslagen, passim; Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 443). State liability for infringements of the Eur.Conv.Hum.Rights is exclusively based on the Convention itself and includes liability for non-economic losses (e.g. HD 9 June 2005, NJA 2005, 462; HD 21 September 2007, NJA 2007, 584; Crafoord, ERT 2000, 519-547; Andersson, JFT 2007, 377-414). FINNISH Damages Liability Act chap. 3 § 3 corresponds to Swedish Damages Liability Act chap. 3 § 2; a specific rule on liability for wrongful information or advise does not exist, however. On the rules governing state liability in DENMARK see Gomard, UfR 2004 B, 383-390. In all the Nordic countries public bodies share the same vicarious liability as other employers (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 128; Swedish Damages Liability Act chap 3 § 1; Finnish Damages Liability Act chap. 3 § 1).

14. ENGLAND hat die frühere Immunität von Barristers und Solicitors für fahrlässiges Verhalten im Zusammenhang mit der Führung eines Prozesses (Rondel v. Worsley [1969] 1 AC 191; Saif Ali v. Sydney Mitchell & Co. (a firm) [1980] AC 198) abgeschafft (Arthur J. S. Hall & Co. (a firm) v. Simons [2002] 1 AC 615). Es herrscht aber nach wie vor große Zurückhaltung gegenüber der Annahme, ein Anwalt habe fahrlässig gehandelt (Moy v. Pettman Smith [2005] UKHL 7; [2005] 1 WLR 581). Die Rechtslage in IRELAND ist nicht ganz klar; es scheint eine Neigung zu bestehen, sich dieser neueren englischen Rechtsprechung anzuschließen (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], no. 14.167). Besondere Immunitäten genießen in beiden Ländern die Staatsoberhäupter (für ausländische Staaten, Regierungsvertreter, Militärs etc. siehe den englsichen State Immunity Act 1978 bzw. den Visiting Forces Act 1952).

VI.–7:104: Liability of employees, employers, trade unions and employers associations

This Book does not govern the liability of:

(a) employees (whether to co-employees, employers or third parties) arising in the course of employment;

(b) employers to employees arising in the course of employment, and

(c) trade unions and employers' associations arising in the course of industrial dispute.

COMMENTS

1. General. This Article is another example of the application of I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2). Issues on the border between the law on non-contractual liability and individual and collective labour law are removed from the scope of application of this Book. This is an area of great sensitivity in legal and social policy, to whose great complexity justice cannot be done by these model rules.

Individual labour law. Therefore, on the one hand, all issues remain excluded from these rules which relate to the personal liability of employees for damage caused by them in the course of their work. This applies to harming colleagues from the same establishment, as well as to damage to the detriment of the employer and of third parties, whether they are employees themselves or not (sub-paragraph (a)). The reason for remaining silent on the liability between members of the same enterprise is to be primarily found in the circumstance that in many legal systems this problem area is subject to a specific regime of occupational accident insurance, which for its part demands priority of application over the general law on non-contractual liability. Issues on the relationship to third parties remain out of the equation because the field covering the personal liability of employees vis à vis external parties is (i) very controversial from a general policy perspective and because they (ii) are not capable of consistent development without considering the internal relationship between the employer and employee, which is subject to the rules of the law on labour contracts. Therefore, issues of joint and several liability shared between employer and employee also fall under this exclusionary rule in cases in which the personal liability of the employee for damage occasioned to third parties results from the applicable law. Sub-paragraph (b) follows the same philosophy for the reverse situation (claims of the employer against the employee). The qualification of the relevant legal issue as falling under either non-contractual liability law or labour law is not decisive here.

Collective labour law. Sub-paragraph (c) covers issues of non-contractual liability in connection with industrial disputes. Thus, it covers not only liability for the consequences of a strike, but also liability for counter-measures (including lock-outs) on the part of the employer in the context of disputes over working conditions and pay.

NOTES

1. According to the jurisprudence of the FRENCH Court of Cassation, an employee's personal liability vis á vis a third party is only triggered under CC art. 1382, if his faute bears no relation to his duties of employment (Cass.soc. 9 November 2005, pourvoi 04-14419). The same holds true where injury is caused to a work colleague. Under Code du travail art. L1234-9 harcèlement moral (workplace "bullying") is considered a crime. Therefore, superiors are personally liable to their subbordinates if they repeatedly subject them to such practices (Cass.soc. 21 June 2006, Bull.civ. 2006, V, no. 223 p. 212); presumably, the same applies in the context of intercollegial relations. An employee only incurs personal liability vis á vis the employer if they were gravely at fault in causing the damage (a faute lourde) (Cass.soc. 11 March 1998, Bull.civ. 1998, V, no. 135 p. 100; Cass.soc. 12 June 2002, pourvoi 00-41954); a faute grave will not suffice. The existence of a faute lourde is usually only given in cases where the employee intended to cause damage (Cass.soc. 5 December 1996, Bull.civ. 1996, V, no. 424 p. 306). An employer is not liable for damage which the employee causes to a third party in the course of the performing his functions (not: outside those functions; see. above), if the former has not exceeded the limits of his mandate and does not intentionally commit a criminal offence or other faute d'une particulière gravité (Cass.ass.plén. 25 February 2000, Bull.ass.plén. 2000, no. 2 p. 3; SemJur 2000 II 10295, concl. Kessous, note Billiau; Resp. civ. et assur. 2000, 4, note Groutel; Rev.jur.soc. 2002, Chron. 711-718, note Desportes; see also Mouly, D. 2006, 2756 and Großerichter and Rageade, ZEuP 2002, 611-628). Conversely, employers are subject to a contractual obligation de sécurité de résultat in respect of their employees physical and mental health (Cass.soc. 21 June 2006, pourvois 05-43.914 - 05-43.919, no. 1733; Cass.soc. 29 June 2005, D. 2005, 2565, note Bugada; Bull.civ. 2005, V, no. 219), however, this is only of practical effect, if, under the Act of 9 April 1898 on Work Accidents, the employee cannot exceptionally solely on claim under his social insurance. Employers enjoy immunity from civil liability; claims of employees are only admissible in cases where damage is caused intentionally, clandestine employment and workplace and commuting accidents connote exceptions to this rule (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats [2006/2007], no. 76). However, the social insurer can take recourse agaisnt the employer's liability insurer under the provisions of the Code de sécurité sociale art. L452-3(3) (see further Cass.civ. 17 April 2008, pourvois 07-13592 and 07-13593). The compensation entitlement under social insurence provisions will be increased if it can be established that the employer is guilty of a faute inexcusable (inexcusable fault; see for an analysis of this notion, in particular Cass.ass.plén. 24 June 2005, D. 2005, I.R. 1881; JCP éd. E 2005, no. 1201, note Morvan und Cass.soc. 31 October 2002, Bull.civ. 2002, V, no. 336); conversely, compensation will be lowered if the employer is guilty of such fault (le Tourneau loc. cit. nos. 3565-3566). Liability for damage occasioned by strike action (on this concept, cf. Cass.soc. 2 February 2006, Bull.civ. 2006, V, no. 52 p. 46) is only of relevance in cases where a faute lourde is committed (Cass.soc. 7 July 1983, pourvois 81-40191 und 81-40194; CA Reims 23 October 2002, pourvoi 01/00290). Trade unions are only liable for their fault and are not liable for fault committed by their members (Cass.civ. 26 October 2006, pourvoi 04-11665). A lock-out is qualified as an unlawful act, as a rétorsion illicite (Cass.soc. 25 September 2001, pourvoi 99-43628; however, on the temporary shutdown of factory, see Cass.soc. 4 July 2000, Bull.civ. 2000, V, no. 262 p. 207; Cass.soc. 22 February 2005, pourvoi 02-45879).

2. BELGIAN Act of 3 July 1978 on Contracts of Employment, provides, under art. 18(1), that an employee, who in the course of performing his contractual duties causes damage to his employer or a third party is only liable for intention or gros negligence; ordinary negligence only grounds a liability claim if it involved a error which was habitually committed (loc. cit. art. 18(2); see further Cour de travail Brussels 22 November 2005, JTT 2006, 218). Employers are not legally insulated by this regulation; they are then liable under CC art. 1384(3), if the employee is not personally liable under the provisions of loc. cit. art. 18 (Cass. 18 November 1981, RW 1982-83, 859). A special rule governs the liability of civil servants and other public service employees. According to the Act of 10 April 1971 on Occupational Accidents art. 46, an employer will only incur liability vis á vis his employees, once very restricted prerequisites are met; in essence, the cases covered are grave fault, occupational and commuting accidents and damage to property. Liability may be imposed for strike involvement if a criminal offence is committed (socalled voies du fait); in principle, a lock-out is permitted (Cass. 7 May 1984, JTT 1984, 292; RW 1984-85, 2194; Pas. belge 1984, I, 1092.

3. According to LUXEMBURGIAN Code du travail of 31 July 2006 art. L 121-9, an employee is only liable for damage that he causes to a third party, other employees or to his employer in the event of gross negligence. In the context of occupational accidents, the employer is liable for intentional or criminal acts vis á vis his employees; in all other cases, the employee's social insurance is responsible for a compensation pay-out (Code des assurances sociales arts. 92 ff, CA Luxembourg 9 November 2004, pourvoi 363/04), the exception that the damage is caused by a vehicle which is covered by liability insurance. The social insurer has a recourse action against the employer in cases where the latter would be directly liable to the employee (see further Ravarani, La responsabilité civile[2], no. 1215).

4. According to SPANISH CC art. 1903(4), employers are liable for damage which an employee inflicts on a third party. Parallel to this, the employee's personal liability (under CC art. 1902) remains unaffected (Reglero Campos [-Gómez Calle], Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 461, 497; CA Pontevedra 9 March 2006, BDA JUR 2006/127086). Whether issues which concern the liability of an employer vis á vis his employees fall to resolved by civil or labour courts remains contentious, despite a provision in the Act on Labour Procedure art. 2(a) and LOPJ art. 9(5) which would appear to have come down in favour of exclusive jurisdiction of the Labour Courts in these matters (in favour of labour Court jurisdiction TS [4th chamber] 10 December 1998, RAJ 1998 (5) no. 10501 p. 15488; in favour of jurisdiction by the civil courts TS [1st chamber] 4 March 2002, RAJ 2002 (3) no. 5242 p. 9227; TS 31 December 2003, RAJ 2004 (1) no. 367 p. 661). The practical consequence of this can be seen primarily in the context of the set-off of the recovery of tort damages against benefits derived from a collateral sources, in particular, social benefits which are off-set against the damages in tort damages (see e.g. TS 9 March 2006, RAJ 2006 (2) no. 1882 p. 4474; see further the notes to VI.–6:103 (Equalisation of benefits) and VI.–7:105 (Reduction or exclusion of liability to indemnified persons)). Strike and lock out in the course of industrial disputes are permitted (Const. art. 37(2)). Organic Act on trade-union freedom, of 2 August 1985 art. 5 makes clear that trade unions are liable for torts commited by them, however, they ae not liable for the delictual acts of their memebers. Royal Decree 17/1977 of 4 May 1977 art. 7 provides for a definition of lawful strike. Courts seem to be reluctant to find trade unions liable in tort (e.g. TS 14 February 1990, RAJ 1990 (1) no. 1088 p. 1288; TS 30 June 1990, RAJ 1990 (5) no. 5551 p. 7196; TS 6 July 1990, RAJ 1990 (5) no. 6072 p. 7843); CC art. 1902 does in any event not apply to a lawful strike, unless there is an abuse of the right to strike (TS 3 April 1991, RAJ 1991 (3) no. 3248 p. 4394; TSJ Galicia 26 April 2005, RAJ (TSJ y AP) 2005 (2) no. 1548 p. 2987).

5. Pursuant to ITALIAN Presidential Decree of 30 June 1965, no. 1124 (Testo unico delle disposizioni per l'assicurazione obbligatoria contro gli infortuni sul lavoro e le malattie professionali, Suppl.ord. alla Gazz. Uff. 13 October 1965, no. 257) art. 10(1) the employer is exempt from from personal liability towards his employees; delictual liability gives way to mandatory insurance against work related accidents. Exceptions to the rule (essentially envisaged for the commission of criminal offences) are specified individually; the insurer is also liable in these instances, however, can seek contribution from the employer (loc. cit. art. 11). Pursuant the reform heralded by Decreto legislativo 23 February 2000, no. 38 (Gazz. Uff. 1 March 2000, no. 50) art. 13(1) and (2), today, the social security carrier will also compensate the danno biologico, if a certain degree of severity of injury is attained; the extent of compensation to be awarded is specified in tables.

6. Pursuant to HUNGARIAN CC § 348, the employer is liable for damage inflicted on a third party that his employee causes in connection with his employment; according to CC § 350(5), the employer's claim to contribution is governed by Labour Code provisions (Act no. XXII/1992). The provisions of the latter set forth that employees are liable to their employers for damage which is intentionally or negligently caused by violating employment related duties (loc. cit. § 166(1)). The employer bears the onus of proof (loc. cit. § 166(2)). In the event that the employee has been merely negligent, the quantum of damages is restricted to half the average monthly wage. Collective wage agreements or the contract of employment may provide otherwise (loc. cit. § 167). If the employee acted with intent to cause damage, then s/he is subject to unrestricted liability (loc. cit. § 168). Special rules apply in the case particular professions and employees in supervisory roles (loc. cit. §§ 169-173, § 192/A). In contradistinction the aforementioned, employers are subjected to a strict liability regime with respect to their liability towards their employees (loc. cit. § 174(1)), unless the employer proves that the damage was caused by an unavoidable event which lies outside the employer's field of activity or by conduct of the employee which the employer could not prevent (loc. cit. § 174(2)). The employee's contributory fault operates to reduce liability (loc. cit. § 174(3)). Employers who do not employ more than ten are permitted to exculpate themeselves from liabilityby proving an absence of fault (loc. cit. § 175). Act no. VII/1989 on Strikes § 1(1) provides for a right to strike and abuse of this right is naturally proscribed (loc. cit. § 1(3)).

7. GERMAN CC § 276 does indeed proceed from the assumption that liability will be incurred for intention and all manifestations of neglience, however, important exceptions to this general rule are envisaged for employment relationships (Palandt [-Weidenkaff], BGB[67], § 611, no. 152). Employees are not answerable for cases of slight negligence vis á vis their employer, in contradistinction to this, employees are, in principle fully liable, for gross negligent and intentional conduct (see further e.g. Staudinger [-Richardi], BGB [New Edition 2005], § 611, no. 588). In the context of "medium" negligence, loss is apportioned between the employer and employee based on an evaluation what is fair and reasonable in the circumstances of the case (BAG 27 September 1994, NJW 1995, 210; further particulars Erman [-Edenfeld], BGB I[12], § 611, no. 340). Factors are taken into consideration include the intensity of fault, above all the dangerousness per se of the activity carried out, the extent of damage caused, the insured risk, the position of the employee in the company and the salary that he received (BAG 27 September 1994 loc. cit.; BGH 11 March 1996, NJW 1996, 1532). If the employee injures a third party during the course of his employment, the general tort law liability pursuant to CC § 823(1) governs this state of affairs (BGH 19 September 1989, BGHZ 108, 305; BGH 21 December 1993, NJW 1994, 852; critical on this point Katzenstein, RdA 2003, 346). However, the employee may claim a right tto be exempted from liability as against his employer, if and insofar as the former would not be liable vis á vis his employer for the same damage (see further e.g. Edenfeld loc. cit. no. 344). The same holds true for the case that an employee causes damage to the property of a work colleague (Weidenkaff loc. cit. no. 154). Personal injury is covered by the statutory accident insurance; employers are only liable to their employees or vis á vis the social security carrier in exceptional circumstances (Social Security Code Book VII §§ 104-105, 110-111).

8. According to AUSTRIAN law, the liability of employers and employees to third parties is determined by general civil law prinicples liable to third parties. The internal relationship between employee and employer is, however, specifically governed by the Employees' Liability Act (DHG) § 2. An employee is not liable towards his employer for damage which is caused as a result of slight misbehaviour (culpa levissima). In all other cases of negligent infliction of damage, the judge can reduce the amount of compensation if the circumstances of the case so require. Conversely, the employer's liability vis á vis the employee and his or her dependents is only triggered in cases of intentional conduct (General Act on Social Insurance [ASVG] § 333). In all other cases, the social security carrier takes the place of the employer. The justification for this insulation from liability lies in the fact that the accident insurance is financed by employers, however, the privilege extends further than the actual payments made by the latter, which, in this respect leaves the injured party without any rights (OGH 22 December 2004, ÖJZ LSK 2005/125 [compensation for pain and suffering; dependant's compensation for pain and suffering]; OGH 11 November 2004, ÖJZ 2005, 390; OGH 21 May 2005, SZ 2005/58).

9. Under GREEK law, according to the general civil law rules, the employee (in addition to the employer, see CC art. 922) is personally and direct liable for damage which they cause to a third party. The employer and employee are jointly and severally liable (Vrellis, in: von Bar [ed.], Deliktsrecht in Europa, Griechenland, 19; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 922, no. 41). The internal relationship between employee and employer is governed by the terms of the contract of employment, which generally gives the employer who performs in advance a right to seek contribution from the employee. If this right is not regulated in the contract, the employer has a claim against the employer under CC art. 927 (Stathopoulos loc.cit. no. 44).

10. As a general rule, the mutual obligations of employer and employee in the NETHERLANDS are derived from CC art. 7:611 (duty to act with act), a standalone cause of action has emerged therefrom, which even envisages that claims can be made for non-pecuniary loss (CFI Utrecht 29 June 1994, JAR 1994 no. 182 [employer vs employee]; HR 26 Juni 1998, JAR 1998, no. 199 [employee vs employer]). The employee will only incur liability in cases of intent and conscious negligence. The foregoing is also true for cases where the employee is delicually liable to a third party. CC art. 6:170(3) supplements this insulation from liability by providing for a rule which sets forth that the employer can only seek contribution from his employee in cases where the latter has acted with intent or conscious negligence. The onus of proof rests on the employer (CFI Zwolle 8 November 1995, JAR 1996, no. 59; HR 10 May 1996, JAR 1996, no. 131; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 139 p. 161; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 342 p. 261). The employer continues to be strictly liable for occupational accidents vis á vis his employee under CC art. 7:658; however, the former may adduce proof that the damage, inter alia, was a product of the negligence of the employee (see HR 9 January 1987, NedJur 1987, no. 948 p. 3258) or that he exercised the " required care " in order to meet the obligations under the employment relationship (HR 24 June 1994, NedJur 1995, no. 137 p. 574). Additionally, in this context, general tort law provisons continue to apply (Hartkamp III[12] loc. cit.; id. I[12], no. 451c p. 407). Legal strikes are protected under the European Social Charter art. 6(4). In contrast, under national law, delictual liability for occupation of the works may be incurred if this action was unlawful (HR 19 April 1991, NedJur 1991, no. 690 p. 2967).

11. According to SWEDISH and FINNISH Damages Liability Act chap. 4 § 1, an employee is only liable for damage caused by him through error or through an omission during the course of performing his duties of employment to the extent that special grounds are extant which justify the imposition of liability. In this context, regard is had to the nature of the act, the status of the person causing damage, the interests of the injured party and all other relevant circumstances. Liability may be imposed if e.g. the employer lacks insurance and is insolvent and there is a pressing interest for the injured person to receive damages (Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 271; Saxén, Skadestånd vid avtalsbrott, 159). Liability may also be triggered in the case of intention (Diebstahl) or gross negligence. DANISH EAL § 19(3) provides that the employee is not liable for property damage which is covered by the injured party's or the employer's insurance, unless gross negligence or intent is at hand. In other instances the employer may seek recourse from the employee if it is considered reasonable, having regard to the accountability, the position of the employee and other circumstances (EAL § 23 (1)). As a general rule, the employee is not liable vis-à-vis his or her employer. Liability towards third parties is subject to a judicial power to reduce liability (EAL § 23(2)), which refers to the factors listed in EAL § 23(1); in addition, once the same pre-requisites are met, the employee can seek contribution from his employer, in the event that the employee is liable to pay compensation to a third party. Whether the same can be said of the employer's right to seek contribution from his employee is likewise contingent upon the application of an equitable balancing test governed by EAL § 23(1) (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[6], 129). In all the Nordic countries an employee who suffers personal injury at work may seek compensation from the general public social insurance scheme as well as the special social insurance scheme for industrial injuries. Employees often also enjoy protection under a private collective industrial injury insurance scheme. In Sweden and Finland they may also seek a tort law based compensation, from which, however, compensation received under the aforementioned insurance schemes is deducted (Hellner and Radetzki loc cit. 291); tort law based liability is only excluded by the Danish Work Injury Insurance Act (Lovbekendtgørelse 2006-03-07, no. 154, om arbejdsskadesikring) (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 335).

12. The liability of trade unions and employers' associations is regulated in labour law. Liability for collective actions by trade unions has traditionally been practically inexistent, save for collective actions which amount to a criminal offence (Hellner and Radetzki loc. cit. 71; Kleineman, Ren förmögenhetsskada, 267). Gustafsson v. Sweden, ECHR [GC] 25 April 1996, App. no. 15573/89, refused to find that SWEDEN violated ECHR art. 11, where an employer was unable to avail of a measure of protection under national liability law where an attempt was made, by means of an all-out blockade of his business, to force him to sign a collective labour agreement with a trade union (Laval un Partneri Ltd. v. Svenska Byggnadsarbetareförbundet et al, ECJ 18 December 2007, C-341/05, ECR 2007, I-11767, however, decided in a similar case, in favour of a Latvian company that this connoted an unlawful discrimination). In addition, Evaldsson and others v. Sweden, ECHR 13 February 2007, App. no. 75252/01, refused to find that there was a violation of the freedom of disassociation (i.e the right not to be forced to join a trade union) where a number of employees who were not trade union memebers were forced to pay fees to a trade union, this right to receive fees was derived from the collective labour agreement with the employer; however, it should be note that this forced contribution was deemed to fall foul of the guarantee of property. The DANISH trade union practice requiring employers to only employ trade union members did not withstand the Convention (Sørensen and Rasmussen v. Denmark, ECHR [GC] 11 January 2006, App. nos. 52562/99 and 52620/99. For FINLAND see Supreme Court 16 March 1999, KKO 1999:39 (a trade union publically called for a boycott of a hotel because the cleaning firm employed by the hotel chain refused to enter into a collective labour agreement. The Supreme Court held that the trade union was not liable. The boycott was not unlawful nor did it infringe against public policy, moreover, no unlawful means had been employed).

13. ESTONIA has regulated issues of liability arising inconnection with industrial relations primarily in the Employment Contracts Act and other labour legislation. The ENGLISH and Scottish law confers an extensive immunityfrom civil action on trade unions and those empowered to carry out their functions where industrial action is taken (Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, s. 20). In respect of causes of actions giving rise to liability which are not enumerated in the Act, the amount of damages awarded is restricted commensurate with the number of members, unless proceedings for personal injury or a number of other torts, expressly particularised in the Act, are brought (loc. cit. s. 22). Additionally, a restriction is also placed on the enforcement of awards against certain property (loc. cit. s. 23), which also operates to the benefit of employers' associations (loc. cit. s. 130). Under IRISH law, within the framework of industrial action, a far-reaching restiction is placed on tort actions against trade unions and employer's associations (Industrial Relations Act 1990, s. 13).

VI.–7:105: Reduction or exclusion of liability to indemnified persons

If a person is entitled from another source to reparation, whether in full or in part, for that person's damage, in particular from an insurer, fund or other body, national law determines whether or not by virtue of that entitlement liability under this Book is limited or excluded.

COMMENTS

Channelling of liability. This Book ultimately leaves untouched those rules of national law which displace the rules of civil liability in certain spheres by way of an insurance regime under which the injured person loses the claim to damages under the law on non-contractual liability and in its place receives a claim against an insurer, a fund or another institution. Thus, this does not involve situations in which a right to reparation passes to an insurer by operation of law. This is because in these cases the right remains preserved and it is solely a change of creditor which takes place. Cases of mere de facto channelling of liability to an insurer (by which it is open to the injured person to decide between a claim against the injuring person and a claim against the insurer) are also not in issue here. In fact, VI.–7:105 only pertains to the de jure channelling of liability by rules that relieve the injuring person of liability where and because the injured person is indemnified by a third party, in particular by an insurer.

Examples. To the extent that such rules relate to the law on occupational accidents, they are already covered by VI.–7:104 (Liability of employees, employers, trade unions and employers associations). However, they are in no way restricted to this branch of the law; in fact, they may also be encountered in other matters, for instance, liability in the health sector, liability for road accidents or quite simply where liability between private persons for negligent damage to property is excluded if and in so far as the owner is insured against the damage or destruction of the thing. It is also conceivable that rules might provide, for example, that a claim cannot be made against the keeper of a motor vehicle on the basis of strict liability and that the victim must instead obtain redress from the keeper's insurer because it would be regarded as an abuse of law to go against the keeper directly and personally. VI.–7:105 also encompasses such rules as channel liability de jure to a legal entity, where for example the liability of teachers in a private school is channelled to the State.

NOTES

1. Under the FRENCH Education Code (Code de l'éducation), art. L 911-4, the liability of the State is substituted for the personal liability of teachers at public and semi-private schools; recourse may not be had to the teachers themselves (e.g. Cass.civ. 13 December 2001, Bull.civ. 2001, II, no. 189 p. 133; Rev.trim.dr.civ. 2002, 312, with a note by Jourdain). Similar rules exist for damage arising from a faute in the process of appointing a guardian (tutelle) under CC art. 473. Reparation due as a result of a road accident is provided under the statute of 5 July 1985 (the so-called. loi Badinter) by a compulsory insurance of the vehicle. Case law has repeatedly emphasised that the rules of this statute are d'ordre public (Cass.civ. 13 January 1988, Bull.civ. 1988, II, no. 15 p. 8; D. 1988 jur. 293, with a note by Groutel; Cass.civ. 20 April 1988, Bull.civ. 1988, II, no. 87 p. 45; D. 1988 jur. 580, with a note by Lambert-Faivre; Cass.civ. 5 July 1989, Bull.civ. 1989, II, no. 144 p. 73; Cass.civ. 6 December 1989, Bull.civ. 1989, II, no. 213 p. 111; see Viney, L'indemnisation des victimes d'accidents de la circulation, no. 10), from which it may be deduced that a personal liability of the gardien of the vehicle is precluded. For liability arising out of accidents at work see the notes to the preceding Article.

2. In SPAIN some state and regional provisions provide for social benefits to patients infected with HIV or with haemophilia and other congenital diseases related to blood coagulation. These laws normally contain as a requirement a previous waiver of any claim against any public health administration or against their staff (see, for instance, the Act on social benefits for persons with haemophilia and other congenital diseases related to blood coagulation who have developed hepatitis C as a result of medical treatment within the scope of the public health system [Ley 14/2002 of 5 June 2002] art. 3(5)). GERMANY provides for a substitution of liablity by insurance protection only in relation to compensation for damage sustained in workplace accidents. Employers and fellow employees in the same company are not liable for the losses sustained by the insured person, his dependants and his next of kin (Social Security Code, Book VII §§ 104 and 105). Their claims are directed against the body responsible for the statutory accident insurance unless the damage is caused intentionally. A right of recourse for the insurance against the person causing the damage requires the latter to have acted intentionally or with gross negligence (Social Security Code, Book VII §§ 110, 111). AUSTRIA is another country in which claims to reparation as between employees are cut away because the damage is covered by a social insurance of the injured party; the person causing the damage is also not liable to the social insurance fund in a case of mere negligence. In the context of liability on equitable grounds under CC § 1310 regard is had to whether the injured person can obtain compensation from another source. If that is the case because, for example, the damage which has occurred is covered by fire insurance, liability may be disapplied (OGH 30 March 1999, SZ 72/59). Art. 64 (1) lit. a of the PORTUGUESE Motor Insurance Liability Decree Law provides that claims arising out of a road accident can only be asserted against the other party's compulsory liability insurance if they do not exceed the maximum limits that compulsory insurance will cover; if the person responsible does not have insurance, then according to art. 62, claims must be asserted against the Fundo de Garantia Automóvel and person incurring civil liability. Under the ESTONIAN LOA § 140(1) the extent of the reparation may be reduced on grounds of equity and as part of those considerations insurance coverage is to be taken into account.

3. All the NORDIC countries rely on far-reaching insurance schemes for specific areas. However, they differ on the issue of whether to allow or exclude parallel claims in tort (for a general overview see von Eyben, ScandStudL 41 [2001] 193-232; Hellner, AmJCompL 34 [1986] 613-633; Ussing, AmJCompL 1 [1952] 359-372). DANISH law predominantly adopts the latter approach. One example among many is to be found in EAL § 19(1). The provision excludes a claim to reparation for damage to property to the extent that the damage is covered by property insurance or a loss-of-use insurance. However, liability is excluded only for the benefit of private individuals (i.e. not also for the benefit of businesses or public bodies) and if the property damage did not result from intentional or grossly negligent conduct. In the two other countries, by contrast, the basic rule is that although persons are not in general obliged to seek compensation through tort law in order to benefit from the insurance scheme, they may also opt out of the alternative insurance scheme and seek damages under tort law. However, the option to invoke the tort law claim is often of limited practical importance: enforcing claims under the relevant insurance scheme is typically less expensive and more promising because the requirements for substantiating the claim are less demanding.

BOOK VII

UNJUSTIFIED ENRICHMENT

CHAPTER 1: GENERAL

VII.–1:101: Basic rule

(1) A person who obtains an unjustified enrichment which is attributable to another's disadvantage is obliged to that other to reverse the enrichment.

(2) This rule applies only in accordance with the following provisions of this Book.

COMMENTS

A. General

Overview. Paragraph (1) provides for a non-contractual obligation. Its effect is that a person who has obtained an unjustified enrichment is obliged in certain circumstances to restore it or transfer it or pay its money equivalent to the person at whose disadvantage the enrichment was obtained. Paragraph (2) makes it clear that this basic rule must be read in conjunction with the following provisions of this Book. They determine the circumstances in which such an obligation arises, the meaning of "enrichment" und "disadvantage", the measure of liability, the existence of any defences, and the relationship of this norm to other legal rules with the same or a similar effect.

A single general norm. Paragraph (1) sets out a rule of general application which provides the only foundation of a claim under this Book. In this regard the structure is comparable to that adopted in the Book on non-contractual liability for damage (DCFR Book VI), where there is also a single basis for liability rather than a multitude of separate heads of liability for distinct torts or delicts.

Scope. Paragraph (1) gives effect to a basic norm which is comprehensive in nature, embracing all liabilities arising out of the autonomous law of unjustified enrichment. It is immaterial for these purposes whether the enrichment claim arises out of a performance under a failed contractual arrangement (in other words: where the parties have failed to conclude a valid and unimpeachable contract) or some wrongdoing such as taking or using without the consent of the entitled person. The basic rule applies both to enrichments conferred by the claimant and enrichments not conferred by (i.e. enrichments extracted from) the claimant. The basic norm is accordingly phrased in wide terms so as to encompass what in the present European legal systems is often addressed by several complementary discrete rules, sometimes encroaching on other areas of law.

Operation only in conjunction with the other provisions of the Book. Paragraph (1) of the Article is not free-standing. The application of the basic rule is fleshed out and qualified by later provisions. Paragraph (2) makes it clear that the basic rule cannot be applied in isolation from the other Chapters of the Book. The meaning of the basic rule is thus anchored by the later provisions and its manner of application can only be determined by a consideration of the ensuing Articles. These define or amplify the various elements invoked by the basic rule, such as "unjustified", "enrichment", "disadvantage", and "attributable". In so doing they render its application to specific cases more certain (a particularising function) and control its sphere of operation (a constraining function).

Elements of the basic rule. The basic norm sets out all the elements which must be present to support a claim in the law of unjustified enrichment, leaving their content to be determined in the subsequent Chapters. Thus in order for a claim to arise under this Book, the following conditions must be satisfied. First, there must be a "person" who is the debtor and "another" who is the creditor of the enrichment claim (see B below). Second, the potential debtor of the claim must have 'obtained' some benefit (see C below). Third, the enrichment must be "unjustified". Whether an enrichment is justified or unjustified is determined by the rules set out in Chapter 2 (When enrichment unjustified). Fourth, the benefit obtained by the potential debtor must amount to an "enrichment". Fifth, the potential creditor of the claim must have sustained a "disadvantage". These two matters are governed by the rules in Chapter 3 (Enrichment and disadvantage). Finally, the enrichment must be "attributable" to this disadvantage. This last aspect is addressed by the rules in Chapter 4 (Attribution).

Content of the obligation; defences. If all the elements of the basic rule are established and the matter is not affected by defences (as to which see Chapter 6 of this Book), the debtor in the enrichment claim is obliged, in favour of the creditor of the claim, "to reverse the enrichment". The manner in which this liability to reverse the enrichment is to be discharged as well as the extent of that liability is governed by the provisions in Chapter 5 (Reversal of enrichment). Finally, Chapter 7 (Relation to other legal rules) contains (among others) provisions which restrict the scope of application of the basic rule.

How the basic rule works. In each case in which a liability under unjustified enrichment might be considered to arise it must be determined whether the elements of the basic norm are satisfied, whether there is a defence and, if that is not the case, what is the content of the liability. The following illustrations indicate how this functions in relation to typical groups of cases.

> Illustration 1
> By mistake a purchaser P makes a second bank transfer of the purchase price to V, the vendor, an employee of P's having already effected a bank transfer of the purchase price the day before. V is enriched because he has obtained a right against his bank B to payment of the sum credited to his bank account (VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) paragraph (1)(a)). (That enrichment is justified in relation to B, but in relation to P it is not justified because V did not have any right against P to this (second mistaken) payment and P did not intend to make a gift to V. The matter turns on the (missing) ground of justification in relation to P (VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(a) and (b)). That V's enrichment (in the form of the credit to his account) is justified in relation to V's bank does not affect the matter. P has sustained a disadvantage because P's bank has (correctly) deducted the corresponding amount from P's account (VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage) paragraph (1)(a)). The enrichment of V is attributable to the disadvantage of P: P transferred part of its patrimony to V (VII.–4:101 (Instances of Attribution) paragraph (a)). Technically speaking, of course, P did not transfer its claim against its bank to V, but the precise technical arrangements for the bank transfer are not material here: from the economic and legal standpoint the banks in this case have only served as machinery for effecting a cashless method of payment which can be equated with a cash transfer. (Had P deposited cash at V's bank to the credit of V's account, the case would have come within VII.–4:101 (Instances of attribution) paragraph (d)). The subject-matter of V's enrichment is a transferable asset: bank account credits can be reversed by bank transfer. Consequently V is obliged to P to transfer back the second payment (VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment) paragraph (1)).

Illustration 2
A debtor D intends to pay a debt due to D's creditor C by means of an electronic funds transfer. By mistake D enters into the on-screen formula the wrong bank sorting code which results in the money being credited to the account of X, a person completely unknown to D: at the bank branch with the sort code which D entered by mistake X has an account with the same number as C's account number at C's bank. D has a claim against X to re-transfer of the money. This follows from the same reasoning as in Illustration 1.

Illustration 3
A is constructing a housing estate for B on the latter's land. A commissions a sub-contractor C to supply and install all the electric cookers and hot water tanks for the houses. C performs his contract with A. However, as A has become insolvent in the meantime, C demands payment from B. Under the applicable property law, B has become owner of the appliances and has thus been enriched by acquiring property rights in them (VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) paragraph (1)(a) and (b)). C is disadvantaged correspondingly: (VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage) paragraph (1)(a) and (b)). The enrichment of B is not justified in relation to C under VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(a) because the acquisition of ownership by operation of law only creates a right of title (i.e. a right to retain the thing) and not a right to be able to retain the thing without having to make a compensatory payment. However, the enrichment of B is nonetheless justified in relation to C (and not just in relation to A: see VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) (1)(a)) under VII.–2:102 (Performance of obligation to third person). That C made a mistake as to the solvency of A when he rendered the contractual performance does not change the situation: a mistake of this type does not destroy the ground of justification (see VII.–2:103 (Consenting or performing freely)).

Illustration 4
Contrary to a prohibitory rule, X, who lacks the professional qualification required by statute for providing legal services, advises Y in a legal matter in return for payment. Y is enriched by being advised; X is correspondingly disadvantaged by rendering a service (VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) paragraph (1)(b) and VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage) paragraph (1)(b)). The enrichment of Y is unjustified (VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (2)). It may be assumed that the contract between X and Y for the remunerated provision of legal advice is void (II.–7:302 (Contracts infringing mandatory rules)). Nor can a justification be found in the law on benevolent intervention in another's affairs (VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(a)). Y is therefore seemingly obliged to pay to X the agreed price or, if this is less than the agreed price, the objective value of such unqualified legal advice (VII.–5:102) (Non-transferable enrichment)). However, the purpose of the prohibition of unqualified remunerated legal advice is the protection of those seeking legal advice, and the market for provision of legal advice, from persons who have omitted to satisfy the requirements of legal training. Consequently X has no claim at all to recompense (VII.–6:103 (Illegality)).

Illustration 5
E, who operates a radio station, publishes advertising material for its station featuring a prominent (manipulated) photograph of D, a Formula One Grand Prix world champion, listening to a portable radio on which the radio station's logo is clearly visible. The evident intent of the publication is to encourage the view that D is an avid listener to and an endorser of E's radio broadcasts. E is enriched by making use of an asset of D (VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) paragraph (1)(c)) – namely D's right of personality. As D would have a right to prevent E using a photo of himself for its commercial purposes without his consent (see VI.–1:102 (Prevention)), D would be entitled to permit commercial use of his image and reputation in this manner in return for a fee; such rights have the quality of an "asset". D is disadvantaged correspondingly (VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage) paragraph(1)(c)). The case is one of infringement by E, to E's commercial advantage, of D's rights (VII.–4:101 (Instances of attribution) paragraph (c)). E's enrichment is unjustified since D's disadvantage in suffering the use of his right of personality was sustained without his consent (VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b)).

Illustration 6
In an advertisement X uses a photograph of a famous politician, Y, who has recently resigned a ministerial position after only a short time in office following a disagreement with the premier on policy. The image is in a series of fifteen other photographs which depict the members of the cabinet who are still in office. The picture of Y is crossed through. The accompanying slogan reads: "We also lease cars to staff on probation." Under the general rules on protection of rights of personality the claimant Y must accept that his image be used for the purposes of such satire. No right of Y has been infringed; Y has suffered no legally relevant damage (cf. VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy)). Consequently Y has suffered no disadvantage; there has been no use of a right of Y (cf. VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage) paragraph (1)(c)). Hence Y has no claim to recompense under the law of unjustified enrichment.

B. Parties: "a person"; "another"

General. The basic rule envisages two parties, one of whom has obtained an unjustified enrichment and the other of whom has sustained a disadvantage to which the enrichment is attributable. The effect of the rule is to bind those parties one to another in a relationship of legal obligation, the enriched party being obliged to reverse the enrichment and the disadvantaged party having a corresponding right to the reversal. The only necessary connection between them is the obligation to reverse the unjustified enrichment arising ex post facto from the circumstance that the one has obtained an enrichment without justification at the other's expense.

Absence of need for prior connection. It may be the case, but need not necessarily be so, that before the enrichment was obtained the parties were connected by a contractual or other legal relationship. An enrichment claim may arise between persons who are connected to one another merely as a result of the transfer of benefit which has generated that claim.

Illustration 7
D, a bank, is instructed by its customer X to make a payment to the credit of E's account at another bank. D carries out the bank transfer, but as a result of its own mistake D subsequently repeats the transfer payment so that E is paid a second time. D has a claim against E under this Book for the reversal of E's enrichment arising out of the second (mistaken) transfer. It is immaterial that there was no pre-existing legal relationship between D and E.

Absence of need for direct transfer. Equally it is immaterial whether the unjustified enrichment was directly conferred by the creditor of the enrichment claim on the debtor (or directly extracted by the latter from the former) or whether instead the enrichment is mediated through a third party (as where an act of a third party results in a transfer of ownership from claimant to enriched person) or the result of a chain of transactions where the claimant's enrichment of a third party is linked to that third party's enrichment of the ultimately enriched person. Third party situations are further explained in the Comments to VII.–2:102 (Performance of obligation to third person).

Illustration 8
D is entitled to the estate of a deceased person, which includes a claim against X, a debtor of the deceased. Nonetheless E succeeds in obtaining a certificate of inheritance for that estate and on the strength of the certificate collects payment of the debt from X. Because of the special effect of a certificate of inheritance, X is regarded as a matter of law as having discharged the debt to the deceased's successor, even though E was not entitled to the debt. E is enriched by obtaining the payment from X (VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) paragraph (1)(a)). D is disadvantaged by losing the right to performance from X, which D has inherited from the deceased creditor (VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage) paragraph (1)(a)). E's enrichment is attributable to D's disadvantage under VII.–4:103 (Debtor's performance to a non-creditor; onward transfer in good faith) because X's payment to E extinguished D's right to performance. The enrichment is unjustified under VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1) because E had no entitlement to the payment in relation to D (only in relation to X, by virtue of the certificate of inheritance) and D did not consent to the loss of the claim against X.

Illustration 9
Following a divorce, A makes a holograph change to his will to benefit C in place of B, his ex-wife. Under the applicable law the automatic consequence of this change is that B also loses the right to the proceeds of A's own life insurance with the insurer X; that right passes to C. X, however, is not informed of the change in the will and therefore pays the lump sum under the life insurance to B; the payment discharges X's liability under the life insurance contract. C has a claim against B on the basis of unjustified enrichment. The reasoning is the same as in illustration 8.

Natural persons and legal persons. Precisely because the terms are not qualified in the basic rule, the disadvantaged claimant ("another", i.e. another person) and the enriched party ("a person") may be either natural or legal persons. The same holds for other parties referred to in the subsequent provisions, be it a "third person", "representative" or "intervener".

Persons without full legal capacity. Equally, the terms enriched or disadvantaged "person" (and correspondingly "third person", "representative" and "intervener") are not in any way restricted to persons having full legal capacity. Model cases for the possible application of the law of unjustified enrichment will involve enrichments conferred by or on under age persons. By reason of their minority, they lack full contractual capacity and therefore may easily come to enrich another or be enriched by another in the absence of a binding legal obligation justifying the enrichment. The same is true for the reversal of transfers by legal persons acting beyond the powers contained in their founding instrument (such as a gift for purposes or in circumstances not contemplated by that instrument).

C. Mode of enrichment: "obtains"

Application to both active and passive enrichment. The term "obtains" is intended to have a neutral meaning and to denote merely that the relevant benefit has reached the patrimony or person of the potential debtor in the enrichment claim. It therefore includes cases of wilful appropriation, but does not necessarily imply any positive act of acquisition. Passive receipt, absorption, or enjoyment of an enrichment is equally an 'obtaining' for the purposes of the article. Thus the enrichment may be conferred by the claimant or a third party entirely without the enriched person's knowledge (e.g. where funds are transferred to another's bank account by mistake or goods are deposited on another's publicly accessible premises). However, if the other elements of the enrichment claim are established, the manner in which the enrichment is obtained – and in particular whether or not the enriched person consented to their enrichment – could be material in determining the extent of the enriched party's liability. That is because if the enrichment cannot be reversed by a transfer, an innocent enriched person who would otherwise be compelled to pay for an enrichment which they never requested is worthy of protection. This aspect is addressed in VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment).

No requirement of wrongful enrichment. Equally it is immaterial for these purposes whether the enrichment is wrongful or not – whether it is the result of the enriched person's own wrongful act or the wrongful intervention of a third party who has passed the benefit to the enriched person. The term "obtains" is not qualified and therefore as a matter of principle no distinction is drawn as to the lawfulness of the mode of acquisition. Whether the acquisition was wrongful plays a role, however, in so far as it may be material to other elements of the enrichment claim – in particular in determining whether, as between the parties, the enrichment is justified or not, whether the enrichment is attributable to the disadvantage, and whether the enriched person has a defence. See further VII.–2:103 (Consenting or performing freely), VII.–4:101 (Instances of attribution) paragraph (c), VII.–4:105 (Attribution resulting from an act of an intervener) and VII.–6:103 (Illegality).

D. Content of liability: "obliged to reverse the enrichment"

Transferable and non-transferable enrichments. The basic rule creates an obligation to reverse the enrichment. As already indicated (see A above), the manner in which and the extent to which an enrichment is to be reversed is determined by subsequent provisions. The starting proposition is that enrichments which are transferable (e.g. things) are to be restored in natura, while non-transferable enrichments are to be reversed by paying their objective value. In relation to used items, both aspects may apply in relation to one and the same thing.

Illustration 10

A is supplied by B with a motor vehicle. Due to a latent disagreement, no valid contract of sale has been concluded. B has a claim against A for a return of what A has received by virtue of the supply of the car, i.e., depending on the applicable law of property and in particular transfer of title, possession of the vehicle or possession and ownership of the vehicle (VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment) paragraph (1)) and, moreover, recompense for use of the car. The obligation to pay in respect of the latter arises from VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) if A has not acquired ownership of the vehicle. If, on the other hand, A was also owner during the period of possession of the vehicle, she is only liable to pay in respect of the benefit of using what became her own vehicle if she was in bad faith or if she has made a saving (VII.–5:104 (Fruits and use of an enrichment)).

Personal and proprietary claims. The basic rule confers on the disadvantaged person a personal right to reversal of the enrichment. Whether the enrichment claim ought to have a quasi-proprietary effect, whereby the claimant obtains priority over the enriched party's others creditors in the event of bankruptcy, for example, is not determined in this Book. The matter is left open: see VII.–7:101 (Other private law rights to recover) paragraph (2). A disadvantaged person who has retained ownership of the asset whose possession constitutes the other's enrichment may be able to proceed against the enriched person to recover possession on the basis of proprietary rights. That possibility is left open in VII.–7:101 (Other private law rights to recover) paragraph (3). This Book does not limit those rights to vindicate property in any way.

NOTES

I. Bereicherungsrechtliche Einheitsmodelle vs. einzelne Rechtsbehelfe

1. Zu den nationalen Konzepten von "Bereicherungsrecht" see PEL Unj.Enr. Introduction B8-40. Dort ist auch näher beschrieben, welche Rechtsordnungen der Mitgliedstaaten der EU mit einem bereicherungsrechtlichen "Einheitstatbestand" arbeiten und welche dem entgegengesetzen Modell folgen, also den Stoff auf eine Vielzahl von einzelnen Rechtsbehelfen verteilen. Für die zweite Gruppe von Jurisdiktionen ist dort gleichfalls dargelegt worden, ob sie mit mehreren bereicherungsrechtlichen Rechtsbehelfen operieren oder ob sie den überwiegenden Teil des in diesem Buch behandelten Rechtsstoffes anderen Rechtsgebieten zuordnen und welche das sind.
2. Hinsichtlich der Verbreitung des bereicherungsrechtlichen Subsidiaritätsprinzips in den Jurisdiktionen der Europäischen Union darf gleichfalls auf die Landesberichte in PEL Unj.Enr. Introduction B8-40 verwiesen werden. Weitere Einzelheiten finden sich in den notes under VII.–7:101 (Other private law rights to recover).

II. Voraussetzungen des allgemeinen Bereicherungsanspruchs

3. In den Rechtsordnungen des Code Napoléon ist zwischen der (gesetzlich geregelten) action en répétiton de l´indu als Rechtsbehelf zur Rückgängigmachung einer ungeschuldeten Zahlung und der (richterrechtlich geschaffenen) action de in rem verso als Rechtsbehelf zur Rückgängigmachung einer enrichissement sans cause zu unterscheiden. Die Letztere setzt nach FRANZÖSISCHEM und nach BELGISCHEM Recht (i) eine Bereicherung des Beklagten, (ii) eine Verarmung des Klägers, (iii) einen kausalen Zusammenhang zwischen diesen beiden Ereignissen und (iv) die Abwesenheit einer cause (eines rechtlichen Grundes) für den Vermögenszuwachs voraus. Außerdem darf eine Klage aus enrichissement sans cause (v) nicht an ihrer Subsidiarität scheitern. Die seit Cass.req. 15 June 1892, D.P. 1892.1.596; S. 1893.1.281, note Labbé in Frankreich und seit Cass. 27 May 1909, Pas. belge 1909, I, 272, concl. Terlinden in Belgien anerkannte action de in rem verso wird als eine quasivertragliche Rechtsfigur gedeutet und auf Gerechtigkeit und Billigkeit (équité) zurückgeführt (z.B. Bénabent, Les obligations[10], no. 482 p. 331). Seit Cass.civ. 18 October 1898, D. 1899, I, 105 steht auch für Frankreich fest, dass die action de in rem verso nicht irgendeine Bereicherung, sondern eine Bereicherung ohne rechtfertigenden Grund (sans cause légitime) voraussetzt, und seit Cass.civ. 12 May 1914, S. 1918.1.41, note Naquet, dass es sich um eine lediglich subsidiäre Klage handelt (näher z.B. Aubry and Rau [-Ponsard and Dejean de la Bâtie], Droit civil français VI[7], no. 317 p. 477; Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Droit civil II[9], no. 41 p. 36; Marty and Raynaud, Les obligations I[2], no. 394 p. 410). Für das Verhältnis zwischen der Verarmung des Klägers und der Bereicherung des Beklagten genügt nach herrschender Auffassung ein lien de causalité, also der Nachweis, dass sich die Bereicherung nicht ohne die Verarmung zugetragen hätte (Ponsard and Dejean de la Bâtie loc. cit.; Romani, Enrichissement sans cause, nos. 67-69; Starck/Roland/Boyer, Obligations II[6], no. 2194 p. 770; Delebecque and Pansier, Droit des obligations[3], no. 475 p. 244-245; Carbonnier, Droit civil IV[21], no. 307 p. 510). Mit dieser Kausalitätsformel werden nicht nur die Zweipersonenverhältnisse unmittelbarer, sondern auch die Dreipersonenverhältnisse mittelbarer Bereicherungen erfasst, also Situationen, in denen die Bereicherung auf ihrem Weg zum Bereicherten bereits ein oder mehrere andere Vermögen durchlaufen hat. Allerdings soll, so wird gesagt, die Bereicherung solchenfalls meistens in der Beziehung zu dem Dritten eine cause légitime finden (Ponsard and Dejean de la Bâtie loc. cit. no. 317 p. 478; Romani loc. cit. no. 70). Im Schrifttum wird auch vorgeschlagen, statt von einem lien de causalité von einem lien de connexité zu sprechen, um klarzustellen, dass es genügt, dass ein und dasselbe dritte Ereignis sowohl die Verarmung als auch die Bereicherung verursacht haben (Flour/Aubert/Savaux loc. cit. no. 41 p. 36; Marty and Raynaud loc. cit. no. 400 p. 420; Ponsard and Dejean de la Bâtie loc. cit. no. 317 p. 477; ähnlich auch Cass.civ. 26 January 1972, Bull.civ. 1972, III, no. 65 p. 47 und Cass.civ. 12 July 1994, Bull.civ. 1994, I, no. 250 p. 181; D. 1995 jur. 623, note Tchendjou; RTD civ 1995, 373, obs. Mestre; RTD civ 1995, 407, obs. Patarin). In der Praxis jedenfalls scheitern Klagen aus enrichissement sans cause nur selten an fehlender Kausalität zwischen Verarmung und Bereicherung (z.B. Cass.civ. 25 May 1992, Bull.civ. 1992, I, no. 165 p. 113; JCP éd. G. 1992, IV, 2129; JCP éd. G. 1992, I, 3608, obs. Billiau; RTD civ 1993, 580, obs. Mestre).

4. Nach der Rechtsprechung der SPANISH Gerichte setzt eine Bereicherungsklage voraus: (i) dass der Beklagte einen Vermögensvorteil erworben hat, mit dem (ii) eine entsprechende Verarmung auf Seiten des Klägers korreliert, (iii) dass zwischen Bereicherung und Entreicherung eine zureichende kausale Verbindung besteht, und dass es (iv) an einem die Bereicherung rechtfertigenden Grund fehlt (z.B. TS 5 December 1980, RAJ 1980 (2) no. 4736 p. 3802; TS 28 January 1956, RAJ 1956 (1) no. 669 p. 418; TS 15 June 2004, RAJ 2004 (3) no. 3847 p. 7922). Das noch in früheren Entscheidungen aufgestellte Erfordernis der Bösgläubigkeit des Bereicherten (z.B. TS 5 July 1948, RAJ 1948 no. 1117 p. 633) ist schon im Jahre 1951 fallengelassen worden (TS 6 June 1951, RAJ 1951 no. 1877 p. 1281). Zwischen Bereicherung und Verarmung muss ein Kausalzusammenhang bestehen: der Vorteil des Beklagten muss eine Folge des Nachteils oder des Schadens sein. Ursprünglich wurde “eine perfekte Verbindung der Bereicherung und der Entreicherung aufgrund einer unmittelbaren Vermögensverschiebung vom Kläger in das Vermögen des Beklagten“ verlangt (TS 28 January 1956 loc. cit.; TS 27 March 1958, RAJ 1958, no. 1456 p. 940), später jedoch eine “zureichende“ Verbindung für ausreichend angesehen (TS 30 March 1988, RAJ 1988 (3) no. 2570 p. 2472). Ein Kausalzusammenhang darf folglich, wie unter französischem Recht, auch dort bejaht werden, wo eine “indirekte“

Bereicherung ihren Weg zunächst durch das Vermögen anderer nimmt, bevor sie sich im Vermögen des Beklagten niederschlägt, also z.B. dort, wo ein Dritter Schulden des Bereicherten tilgt. Kein Kausalzusammenhang zwischen Nach- und Vorteil besteht dagegen dort, wo der Marktpreis für günstig gekaufte Ware nach ihrem Erwerb dramatisch ansteigt (TS 23 September 1953, RAJ 1953 (2) no. 2277 p. 1458). "Nicht [ungerechtfertigt] bereichert" ist schließlich, "wer aufgrund eines legalen Vertrages erwirbt, der nicht ungültig geworden ist, oder aufgrund eines legitimen Rechts, das ohne Missbrauch ausgeübt worden ist, oder aufgrund eines Urteils", und es sind auch nicht die infolge einer gesetzgeberischen Entscheidung "indirekt Begünstigten ... ungerechtfertigt bereichert" (TS 28 January 1956 loc. cit.). Die Bereicherungsklage dient dazu, den Vorteil des Schuldners abzuschöpfen, darf aber weder über diesen Vorteil noch über den Nachteil des Klägers hinausgehen; maßgeblich ist der jeweils niedrigere Maßstab (TS 25 November 1985, RAJ 1985 (3) no. 5898 p. 4988; TS 5 October 1985, RAJ 1985 (3) no. 4840 p. 4085). In Zweifelsfällen greift man zur Lückenfüllung auf Analogien zu bestehenden gesetzlichen Regelungen anderer Rückabwicklungsregime zurück, insbesondere auf das Recht der condictio indebiti (CC arts. 1895 ff; näher z.B. Albaladejo, Derecho Civil II(2)[10], 917 und Puig Brutau, Compendio II[2], 619). Geschuldet wird grundsätzlich Wiederherstellung in Natur, hilfsweise Wertersatz. Letzterer muss auch Wertsteigerungen einer Sache zwischen dem Zeitpunkt ihres Empfanges und der Verurteilung zur Ausgleichszahlung berücksichtigen (TS 1 December 1980, RAJ 1980 (2) no. 4732 p. 3796). Mehrere Bereicherte haften gesamtschuldnerisch (TS 10 November 1981, RAJ 1981 (2) no. 4471 p. 3352). Der Bereicherungsanspruch verjährt in fünfzehn Jahren (CC art. 1964; TS 5 May 1964, RAJ 1964 (1), no. 2208 p. 1380; TS 12 April 1955, RAJ 1955 (1) no. 1126 p. 602).

5. Der Bereicherungsanspruch des ITALIAN law findet sich in CC arts. 2041 und 2042. Er hat nach CC art. 2041(1) vier Voraussetzungen: (i) eine Bereicherung (arricchimento), (ii) einen Schaden (danno), (iii) den Kausalzusammenhang zwischen Bereicherung und Schaden und (iv) das Fehlen einer giusta causa für die Bereicherung des einen und den Schaden des anderen. Außerdem darf dem Kläger – dies folgt aus CC art. 2042 - keine andere Klagemöglichkeit zur Verfügung stehen als die aus CC art. 2041 (s. zu alledem Cass. 8 November 2005, no. 21647, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, 11). Bereicherung und Schaden müssen ihren Grund in demselben fatto generatore haben (Cass. 8 November 2005 loc. cit.); nur dann „entspricht" i.S.v. CC art. 2041 der Schaden der Bereicherung. Problematisch sind, wie überall, die Fälle der sogen. indirekten Bereicherung (arricchimento indiretto), weil sie stets die Frage aufwerfen, ob sich der Verarmte an seinen Vertragspartner halten muss oder im Wege der Direktkondiktion unmittelbar gegen den tatsächlichen Empfänger des Vermögensvorteils vorgehen kann (siehe zu den unterschiedlichen Grundpositionen einerseits z.B. Trabucchi, Arricchimento (azione di), 52, 75; D'Onofrio, Dell'arricchimento senza causa[2], 593; Cass. 18 February 1987, no. 1753, Giust.civ.Mass. 1987, fasc. 2 und andererseits z.B. Trimarchi, L'arricchimento senza causa, 43-44, 79, 107-109; Breccia, L'arricchimento senza causa I[2], 1009; Cass. 10 January 1993, no. 1686, Giur.it. 1994, I, 1, 626 und 1860; Cass. 17 February 1984, no. 1189, Giust.civ.Mass. 1984, fasc. 2; Cass. 22 May 1982, no. 3137, Giust.civ.Mass. 1982, fasc. 5). Sind die Bereicherung und der Schaden unterschiedlich hoch, dann kommt es auf den jeweils niedrigeren Betrag an (D'Onofrio loc. cit. 589). Viel diskutiert wird, anhand welcher Kriterien die Abwesenheit einer giusta causa zu ermitteln ist (Übersicht über die Diskusssion bei Cian and Trabucchi [-Zaccaria], Commentario breve[6], sub art. 2042, V 1). Umstritten ist bereits, ob die giusta causa in Bezug auf den Vorgang der Vermögensverschiebung oder allein in Bezug auf das Resultat zu prüfen ist (für Letzteres D'Onofrio loc. cit. 591; vgl. zu dieser These Breccia loc. cit. 985). Andere meinen, es komme nur darauf an, ob es an einem wie auch immer beschaffenen schutzwürdigen Interesse an dem Behaltendürfen des Vorteils fehle (Bianca, Diritto civile V, 818). Wieder andere formulieren, eine Vermögensverschiebung habe dann eine giusta causa, wenn ihre Modalitäten den Grundsätzen der Rechtsordnung genügen (Nicolussi, Lesione del potere di disposizione e arricchimento, 449-450). Die Rechtsprechung drückt sich konkreter dahin aus, dass es dann nicht an einer iusta causa fehle, wenn die Bereicherung ihren Grund in einem wirksamen Vertrag oder einem anderen Schuldverhältnis (Cass. 30 March 2001, no. 4722, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 634; Cass. 9 November 1992, no. 12076, Giust.civ.Mass. 1992, fasc. 11; Cass. 8 October 1990, no. 9859, Giust.civ.Mass. 1990, fasc. 10) oder im Gesetz hat (Cass. 22 June 2000, no. 8481, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, fasc. 1372; Cass. 18 December 1981, no. 6714, Giust.civ.Mass. 1981, fasc. 12). Der Begriff des danno des CC art. 2041 ist im Übrigen enger als in der deliktsrechtlichen Generalklausel des CC art. 2043. Denn in CC art. 2041 bedeutet er stets eine Vermögensverminderung (Zaccaria loc. cit. V 3).

6. Auch in AUSTRIA ist zwischen verschiedenen "Bereicherungs"ansprüchen zu unterscheiden. Zu den Regelungen über die Rückforderbarkeit einer irrtümlich geleisteten Nichtschuld (CC §§ 1431-1434), die im Zentrum des dortigen Bereicherungsrechts stehen, treten an verstreuter Stelle weitere Fälle der Rückforderbarkeit von Zuwendungen hinzu (näher Schwimann [-Honsell and Mader], ABGB VII², Vorbem zu §§ 1431 ff, no. 6). Das ABGB folgt insoweit den verschiedenen Kondiktionen des römischen Rechts. Das erschwert zwar den Überblick, doch mildert CC § 1437 die Abgrenzungsschwierigkeiten zwischen den einzelnen Anspruchsgrundlagen erheblich: hier werden die Rechtsfolgen grundsätzlich aller Kondiktionen einheitlich in einer einzigen Regelung zusammengeführt. Obwohl das ABGB selber den Ausdruck "Bereicherungsrecht" an keiner Stelle verwendet, ist es für Rechtsprechung (statt vieler z.B. OGH 18 September 1991, JBl 1992, 594) und Schrifttum (z.B. Schwimann [-Mader], ABGB VII^3, Vorbem zu §§ 1431 ff; Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB II(3)^3, Vor § 1431 no. 1) doch ganz selbstverständlich, all diese verschiedenen Anspruchsgrundlagen unter jenem Begriff zu diskutieren. Gemeinsam ist ihnen, dass sie auf Rückführung eines ungerechtfertigt durch Leistung oder auf Ausgleich eines durch Verwendung erlangten Vorteils gerichtet sind und keinen Schaden des Benachteiligten (des Verkürzten) voraussetzen. Außerdem werden alle diese Fälle dadurch zusammen gehalten, dass entweder der Benachteiligte aus besonderem Grund rechtlich schutzwürdig ist oder dass die Rechtsordnung die Zuwendung mißbilligt (Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Koziol], ABGB, Vor § 1431 no. 1). Diese allen Kondiktionen gemeinsamen Prinzipien werden als analogiefähig angesehen; CC §§ 1431 ff werden folglich von Lehre und Rechtsprechung auch als "allgemeines Bereicherungsrecht" bezeichnet (z.B. OGH 18 September 1991 loc. cit.; Rummel [-Rummel] ABGB I^3, § 877 no. 5).

7. PORTUGUESE CC art. 473(1) umfasst sämtliche Fälle ungerechtfertigter Bereicherungen. Der Umstand, dass die in CC art. 473(2) erwähnten Beispiele für die obrigação de restituir por enriquecimento sem causa nur Fälle der Leistungskondiktion betreffen, ändert nichts daran, dass CC art. 473(1) auch die sogen. Nichtleistungskondition einschließt (STJ 6 December 2006, CJ [ST] XIV [2006-3] 154; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I^4, note 1 under art. 473, p. 435; Almeida Costa, Obrigações^{10}, 490, fn. 1; Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa^2, 663). Die einzelnen Rückforderungsrechte werden bereicherungsrechtlich nicht getrennt; auch die condictio indebiti ist weder eine autonome Klage noch an spezifische Voraussetzungen geknüpft (STJ 11 May 2000, CJ [ST] VIII [2000-2] 54; STJ 18 June 1996, BolMinJus 458 [1996] 347 [mit Hinweisen zu CC arts. 476-478]). CC art. 473 nennt drei Voraussetzungen für eine erfolgreiche Bereicherungsklage (acção de enriquecimento sem causa). Es bedarf (i) einer Bereicherung (enriquecimento) des Beklagten, die (ii) auf Kosten eines anderen (à custa de outrem) geschah und für die es (iii) an einem rechtfertigenden Grund fehlt (sem causa justificativa). Eine Bereicherung besteht in einem beliebigen Vermögensvorteil (STJ 24 June 2004, Processo 03B3105). Eines Schadens oder einer Verarmung der anderen Seite bedarf es nicht (Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 383, 402 mit Nachweisen aus der neueren Rechtsprechung; anders noch STJ 14 January 1972, BolMinJus 213 [1972] 214). Zwar wird im Rahmen der Leistungsbereicherung eine solche Verarmung nach wie vor wie selbstverständlich festgestellt (STJ 2 July 1976, BolMinJus 259 [1976] 206; CA Oporto 4 March 2002, CJ XXVII [2002-2] 176; STJ 22 May 2001, CJ [ST] IX [2001-2] 95), doch ist für die Eingriffsbereicherung (enriquecimento por intervenção) inzwischen klargestellt, dass es nur darauf ankommt, dass die Bereicherung "auf Kosten" des Klägers erfolgte, nicht darauf, dass er einen Vermögensschaden erlitt (STJ 24 February 2005, Processo 04B460; STJ 24 June 2004, Processo 03B3105). Was unter einer causa zu verstehen ist, sagt CC art. 473 nicht. Sicher ist jedoch, dass es sich um die Frage handelt, ob die Bereicherung gerechtfertigt war oder nicht (näher STJ 29 May 2007, Processo 07A1302). Große praktische Bedeutung kommt allerdings auch in Portugal dem Prinzip der Subsidiarität des allgemeinen Bereicherungsanspruchs zu (CC art. 474). Er steht dann nicht zur Verfügung, wenn es das Gesetz dem Benachteiligten ermöglicht, auf anderer Grundlage Ersatz oder Rückerstattung zu verlangen. Sind die Voraussetzungen einer anderen Anspruchsgrundlage (Delikt, Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag, Vindikation, Nichtigkeitsrecht) erfüllt, dann scheidet ein Anspruch aus Bereicherungsrecht aus. Das Subsidiaritätsprinzip ist von der Rechtsprechung häufig bestätigt (z.B. STJ [Assento] 28 March 1995, BolMinJus 445 [1995] 67; STJ 20 September 2007, Processo 07B2156), aber auch häufig kritisiert worden (z.B. STJ 23 March 1999, CJ [ST] VII [1999-1] 172, BolMinJus 485 [1999] 396; dazu Menezes Leitão loc. cit. 992-993). Unter CCP art. 469 wird allerdings auch ein auf Bereicherungsrecht gestützter pedido subsidiário für zulässig gehalten, wonach das Gereicht den subsidiären Klagantrag prüft, wenn dem Hauptantrag nicht stattgegeben werden kann (STJ 18 December 2002, Processo 02B4011; STJ 30 October 2003, Processo 03B2593; STJ 29 May 2007, Processo 07A1302).

8. Zu den Voraussetzungen des allgemeinen Bereicherungsanspruchs under GERMAN law siehe die Angaben in PEL Unj.Enr. Introduction, nos. B21, C52, 72, 89, 108 and 124.

9. Der allgemeine Bereicherungsanspruch aus GREEK CC art. 904 hat (i) das Bestehen einer Bereicherung zur Voraussetzung. Der Bereicherte kann eine juristische oder eine natürliche Person sein, volljährig oder minderjährig (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 4; Georgiades Ast., Enochiko Dikaio I, 351; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 26). Jede Verbesserung der Vermögenslage stellt eine Bereicherung dar, gleich, ob es sich um eine Mehrung der Aktiva oder um eine Minderung der Passiva handelt (Stathopoulos loc. cit. no. 5; CA Athens 1101/1996, Arm 50 [1996] 1329; CA Athens 8350/1993, NoB 42 [1994] 86; A.P. 1095/1973, NoB 22 [1974] 777; A.P. 560/1974, NoB 23 [1975] 147). Die Bereicherung muss (ii) zu Lasten einer anderen Person erfolgt sein. Inhaber des Anspruchs aus CC art. 904 ist derjenige, "aus dessen Vermögen oder zu dessen Schaden" die Bereicherung erfolgte. Diese alternative Formulierung bereitet allerdings insbesondere in Dreipersonen-Verhältnissen Probleme, weil hier die Bereicherung aus dem Vermögen einer anderen Person als der geschädigten stammen kann (näher Stathopoulos loc. cit. no. 19; Deliyannis and Kornilakis loc. cit.). Maßgeblich ist dann das Kriterium des Schadens (Stathopoulos, Axiosis adikaiologitou ploutismou, 194; Mantzoufas, Triprosopoi enochikai sxeseis, 98 und 155). Der Begriff des "Schadens" wird im Bereicherungsrecht weiter verstanden als im Deliktsrecht. Es genügt bereits eine Rechtsverletzung bzw., wie man sagt, ein "abstrakter" Schaden; ein realer Verlust ist nicht Anspruchsvoraussetzung (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 20; Deliyannis and Kornilakis loc. cit. 28; CA Athens 2073/1987, NoB 35 [1987] 1067). Zwischen Bereicherung und Schaden muss (iii) ein ursächlicher Zusammenhang bestehen (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 25; ders., Axiosis adikaiologitou ploutismou, 205; Litzeropoulos, Stoicheia Enochikou Dikaiou II, 385; Kavkas and Kavkas, Enochikon Dikaion II(2)[7], 636). Die Bereicherung darf (iv) nicht mit rechtlichem Grund erfolgt sein. Ein Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen der Bereicherung kann sich natürlich schon aus dem Gesetz ergeben. Solch einen gesetzlichen Rechtsgrund stellt z.B. CC art. 1041 (ordentliche Ersitzung) dar, nicht dagegen nach herrschender Meinung CC art. 1036 (gutgläubiger Erwerb vom Nichtberechtigten), bei dem freilich in der Regel ein anderer Behaltensgrund gegeben sein wird (Stathopoulos, Axiosis adikaiologitou ploutismou,63). Als gesetzlicher Rechtsgrund wird auch der "allgemeine Geist der Rechtsordnung" genannt (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 61 mit Beispielen). Gerechtfertigt ist eine Bereicherung aber vor allem, wenn sie auf dem wirksamen Willen der Person beruht, zu deren Lasten der Vermögensvorteil erworben wurde (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 29; Georgiades Ast. loc. cit. 353). Anfechtung und Rücktritt beseitigen diesen Rechtsgrund (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 35). Rechtfertigend wirkt auch die Einwilligung in einen rechtlichen Nachteil; eine konkludente Einwilligung durch die Entgegennahme einer Gegenleistung für die eigene Leistung genügt (z.B. Stathopoulos, Axiosis adikaiologitou ploutismou, 101). Haben beide Parteien eines nichtigen synallagmatischen Vertrages ihre Leistungen bewirkt, kann aber eine Seite das Empfangene nicht mehr zurückgegeben, darf die andere Seite das ihr Bewirkte folglich behalten; zu einer Rückabwicklung kommt es nur, wenn beide Parteien zu ihr rechtlich in der Lage sind (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, nos. 42 and 88). Schließlich und (v) setzt der allgemeine Bereicherungsanspruch aus CC art. 904 nach in der Rechtsprechung vorherrschender Auffassung die sogen. "Unmittelbarkeit der Vermögensverschiebung" voraus. Es wird mithin verlangt, dass der Bereicherungsschuldner seinen Vorteil unmittelbar aus dem Vermögen des Bereicherungsgläubigers erlangt hat (Deliyannis and Kornilakis loc. cit. 31). Das Unmittelbarkeitserfordernis soll eine Rolle sowohl im Rahmen des Bereicherungsausgleichs in Mehrpersonenverhältnissen als auch in Fällen spielen, in welchen es in Leistungsketten und ähnlichen Situationen nacheinander zu mehreren nichtigen Verträgen kommt (A.P. 629/1974, NoB 23 [1975] 175; A.P. 665/1975, NoB 24 [1976] 59; CA Athens 4704/1979, NoB 27 [1979] 1000; CA Athens 5339/1979, Arm 34 [1980] 28; CA Athens 268/1980, NoB 28 [1980] 863; CA Thessaloniki 392/1989, Arm 43 [1989] 129; CA Athens 4388/1987, EllDik 31 [1990] 383; CA Thessaloniki 2516/1995, EllDik 38 [1997] 926). Im neueren Schrifttum regt sich hieran allerdings zunehmend Kritik; man verweist auf den Text des CC art. 904, der das Kriterium der Unmittelbarkeit der Vermögensverfügung nicht enthalte, und auf die Rechtslage in anderen Ländern (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II(2)[3], 173; Deliyannis and Kornilakis loc. cit. 34; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 67; ders., Axiosis adikaiologitou ploutismou, 213; ders., Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2], 286; Georgiades Ast. loc. cit. 352).

10. HUNGARIAN CC § 361(1) formuliert den allgemeinen (und subsidiären) Bereicherungsanspruch in ähnlicher Weise wie VII.–1:101 (Basic rule): "Wer zu Lasten eines anderen ohne rechtlichen Grund einen Vermögensvorteil erlangt, muss diesen Vorteil zurückerstatten". Der Anspruch setzt also einen rechtsgrundlosen Vermögensvorteil (eine Bereicherung ohne rechtlichen Grund) voraus, der auf Kosten eines anderen zustandegekommen ist (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1387). Andere formulieren, der Bereicherunganspruch habe vier Voraussetzungen: einen Vermögensvorteil des Bereicherungsschuldners, einen Vermögensnachteil des Bereicherungsgläubigers, einen Kausalzusammenhang zwischen Vor- und Nachteil und das Fehlen des rechtlichen Grundes (Petrik [-Bíró], Polgári jog II[2], 650). Eine Bereicherung liegt nur im Falle eines Vermögensvorteils vor. A person is enriched by acquisition of property or other "in rem" rights, claims or rights of remainders, by recruitment of already existing rights, by being spared expenses, by being made free from obligations or liabilities, by having work done. Disadvantage is not only a decrease in assets, but also the loss of expected profit (Bíró loc. cit. 651; vgl. auch BH 1997/590 [Disadvantage durch Anspruchsverlust infolge unberechtigter Aufrechnung]). Die Bereicherung des einen muss sich weder der Art noch der Höhe nach mit dem Nachteil des anderen decken (Benedek loc. cit. 1391). Der Anspruch zielt (nur) auf Herausgabe des erlangten Vermögensvorteils; es spielt keine Rolle, dass er geringer ist als der Nachteil des Gläubigers (Bíró loc. cit.). If the enrichment is independent from the loss suffered by the other person or with the loss of one person the other one does not gain anything or the person's enrichment does not constitute a loss for anybody the unjustified enrichment attributed to another`s disadvantage cannot be ascertained. The enrichment is without justification if the enriched person does not have any legal rights to keep the advantage (Benedek and Bíró loc. cit.).

11. POLISH CC art. 405 enthält eine mit Hungarian CC § 361(1) nahezu wortidentische Formulierung: "Whoever without legal grounds has gained a material benefit at the expense of another person shall be obliged to return that benefit in kind and, if that is impossible, to return its value." Ähnlich wie VII.–1:101 (Basic rule) enthält CC art. 405 vier Anspruchsvoraussetzungen: eine Bereicherung einer Person, einen Nachteil einer anderen Person, einen Zusammenhang zwischen der Bereicherung und dem Nachteil und die Grundlosigkeit der Bereicherung (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[2], 218; Pietrzykowski (-Pietrzykowski), Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 405 no. 4). Jeder Vermögensvorteil stellt eine Bereicherung dar. Sie kann z.B. in dem Erwerb eines Rechts, in dem Erhalt einer Dienstleistung oder in der Befreiung von einer Schuld bestehen. In der Person des Bereicherungsgläubigers hat man es dagegen mit einer Minderung von Vermögensgegenständen oder einer Mehrung von Verbindlichkeiten zu tun (Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit.; Pietrzykowski loc. cit. no. 7). Zwischen Bereicherung und Nachteil muss kein kausaler Zusammenhang bestehen; es genügt, dass sie beide ihre Ursache in demselben dritten Ereignis haben (Supreme Court 18 December 1968, I CR 448/68 [unpublished]; Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 219; Pietrzykowski loc. cit. no. 9, Radwański (-Ohanowicz), System prawa cywilnego III(1), 485). "Ohne rechtlichen Grund" erfolgt eine Bereicherung, wenn sie nicht durch Rechtsgeschäft, Verwaltungsakt, Gerichtsentscheidung oder Gesetz gerechtfertigt ist (Supreme Court 17 November 1998, III CKN 18/98 [unpublished]; Bieniek [-Kołakowski], I[5], art. 405 no. 6, Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 219-220). Ein Sonderfall einer ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung ist der Empfang einer nicht zustehenden Leistung (CC art. 410).

12. Auch SLOVENIAN CC art. 190(1) entspricht weithin VII.–1:101 (Basic rule). Jede Person, die ohne rechtlichen Grund auf Kosten einer anderen bereichert worden ist, muss ihr entweder das Erlangte in Natur herausgeben oder, falls das nicht möglich ist, seinen Wert ausgleichen. CC art. 190(2) fügt hinzu, dass die Bereicherung auch im Wege einer Leistung erfolgt sein kann. Das Gesetz führt also die Leistungskondiktion und den Versionsanspruch in einem einheitlichen Tatbestand zusammen. In der Lehre werden sie freilich weiterhin unterschieden. Als Schulbeispiel der Versionsklage gelten Fälle, in welchen die Bereicherung nicht auf einer Handlung, sondern auf einem von außen kommenden Ereignis, z.B. einem Naturereignis, beruht. Unter BULGARIAN CC art. 59 hat der allgemeine Bereicherungsanspruch vier Voraussetzungen: (i) die Bereicherung einer Person auf Kosten einer anderen, (ii) eine der Bereicherung entsprechende Verarmung des Anspruchstellers, (iii) die Rechtsgrundlosigkeit der Bereicherung und (iv) die Abwesenheit einer anderen Klagemöglichkeit zum Schutz des Verarmten. Es ist nicht erforderlich, dass die Bereicherung durch die Verarmung des Anspruchstellers verursacht wurde. Eine Bereicherung erfolgt rechtsgrundlos, wenn es an einem spezifischen Grund zu ihrem Behaltendürfen fehlt. Solch ein Grund kann sich aus einem Rechtsgeschäft, aus einem Verwaltungsakt, aus einem gesetzlichen Schuldverhältnis oder unmittelbar aus Gesetz ergeben (Takov, FS Apostolov, 424). Wer einen ihm aus anderem Rechtsgrund zustehenden Anspruch verjähren lässt, kann nicht auf den allgemeinen Bereicherungsanspruch zurückgreifen (Anordnung no. 1 des Obersten Gerichtshof of 28 May 1979, Plenum, P. 9).

13. Für den Bereicherungsanspruch des DUTCH Law gelten dieselben grundsätzlichen Voraussetzungen: Bereicherung, Schaden (oder Verarmung), Kausalität zwischen Bereicherung und Schaden sowie die Rechtsgrundlosigkeit der Bereicherung (Scheltema, Verbintenissenrecht II, art. 212, no. 3 p. 14-24; van Maanen, Ongerechtvaardigde verrijking, 11-19). "Wer auf Kosten eines anderen ungerechtfertigt bereichert ist, ist, soweit dies angemessen ist, verpflichtet, dessen Schaden bis zum Betrag seiner Bereicherung zu ersetzen" (CC art. 6:212). Die mit einer "juristischen" Bereicherung normalerweise verbundene "wirtschaftliche" Bereicherung muss rückgängig gemacht werden, wenn es für die Letztere an einer Legitimation aus dem gesetzlichen System fehlt (Nieskens-Isphording, Het fait accompli in het vermogensrecht, 1991, zitiert nach van Maanen loc. cit. 19).

14. In the NORDIC countries dient "Bereicherungsrecht" nur zur Füllung von Lücken im Gesetz. A statutory "basic rule" does not exist, und es ist sogar fraglich, ob sich ein Anspruch überhaupt auf das Prinzip der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung stützen lässt (verneinend insbesondere Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 165, 170, 182; kritisch auch Vinding Kruse, Restitutioner, 145; id., Erstatningsretten[5], 268 and Gomard, Forholdet mellem Erstatningsregler i og uden for kontraktsforhold, 437; bejahend aber Karlgren, Obehörig vinst och värdeersättning, 19; Ussing, Erstatningsret, 229; Ussing, UfR 1950 B, 137-159; Hakulinen, Obligationsrätt, 358). Das Konzept der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung (berigelsekrav in DENMARK, obehörig vinst in SWEDEN) scheint zwar in einigen Anspruchsgrundlagen als Begründungselement auf (z.B. im Rahmen der condictio indebiti und in den Fällen des unrechtmäßigen Gebrauchs fremden Eigentums), doch sieht man bislang keine Notwendigkeit, es zu einem eigenständigen Rechtsgebiet auszubauen (Hellner, JFT 1982, 483-487; Hult, Condictio indebiti, 59). Das wird unter Hinweis auf die insoweit abweichende Rechtslage in Deutschland u.a. mit der Abwesenheit des Abstraktionsprinzips begründet. Auch bedürfe, so wird gesagt, das Recht der Rückabwicklung unwirksamer Verträge feinerer Instrumente als sie das Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung anbieten könne; insbesondere sollten "Zwischenlösungen" auf der Grundlage allgemeiner Billigkeitserwägungen möglich sein (Grönfors and Dotevall, Avtalslagen[3], 177). Klagen aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung gegen vertragsfremde Dritte wären mit allgemeinen vertragsrechtlichen Prinzipien unvereinbar (Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(2)[4], 127; dagegen aber Ulfbeck, Kontrakters relativitet, 185).

15. In ESTONIA ist gesagt worden, ein Zweck des Bereicherungsrechts bestehe darin, die Ungerechtigkeit zu beseitigen, die entstehe, wenn jemand zum Vorteil eines anderen etwas tue, wozu er weder aus Vertrag noch aus Gesetz verpflichtet sei (Supreme Court 13 December 2005, judgement no. 3-2-1-133-05 in civil matters). Das Bereicherungsrecht ist Gegenstand von LOA chapter 52. LOA § 1027 stimmt weitgehend mit VII.–1:101 (Basic rule) überein. LOA § 1027 ist aber nicht als selbständige Anspruchsgrundlage, sondern als Ausdruck eines allgemeinen Prinzips konzipiert. Die nachfolgenden Vorschriften regeln drei verschiedene Fallgruppen. Es geht um ungerechtfertigte Bereicherungen infolge (i) der Erfüllung nichtexistenter oder erloschener Verpflichtungen, infolge (ii) der Verletzung fremder Rechte und infolge (iii) von Verwendungen oder sonstiger Vorteile für die bereicherte Person, darunter die Bezahlung von deren Schulden. Für jede dieser Fallgruppen stellt das Gesetz eigene Anspruchsvoraussetzungen auf. Der Begriff der Leistung (sooritus) steht für jede bewusste und gewollte Mehrung fremden Vermögens (Tampuu, Juridica 2002, 455). Die Voraussetzungen eines Anspruchs aus Leistungskondiktion nennt LOA § 1028: der Bereicherte muss "etwas" erlangt haben, das Erlangte muss ihm zur Erfüllung einer gegenwärtigen oder zukünftigen Verbindlichkeit zugeflossen sein, und es muss hierfür an einem Rechtsgrund fehlen. Die Bereicherungshaftung wegen Rechtsverletzung (LOA § 1037) setzt neben dieser Verletzung (z.B. des Rechts auf Eigentum) eine Bereicherung auf Kosten des Rechtsinhabers voraus. LOA § 1041 regelt die Bereicherungsansprüche im Falle der Erfüllung einer fremden Schuld; im Wesentlichen kommt es darauf an, dass die Schuldtilgung ohne Rechtsgrund erfolgte. LOA § 1042 bringt sodann noch Einzelheiten zur Verwendungskondiktion. Bereicherungsrechtliche Spezialregelungen finden sich auch noch in anderen Gesetzen, insbesondere im Bancruptcy Act and im Civil Enforcement Act. LITHUANIAN CC arts. 6.237-6.242 regeln einzelne Fälle der Rückforderbarkeit ungeschuldeter Zuwendungen und anderer Vermögensvorteile. CC art. 6.242(1) ("unjust enrichment") schließt diesen Abschnitt mit folgender Formulierung ab: "A person in bad faith who has enriched himself without any legal cause at the expense of another must indemnify the latter for his damages in the amount of the unjust enrichment." LATVIAN CC arts. 2369-2392 folgen derselben Regelungstechnik. CC art. 2391 gewährt "a general reclaim on grounds of enrichment". Die Vorschrift lautet: "(1) No one has the right to unjustly enrich himself or herself at the expense of another person. (2) If a person has suffered losses therefrom, he or she may demand the return of that by which or the amount whereby the other person has been enriched".

III. Voraussetzungen spezifischer Rückforderungsansprüche, insbesondere der condictio indebiti

16. Die Rechtsordnungen des Code Napoléon unterwerfen den allgemeinen Bereicherungsanspruch dem Subsidiaritätsprinzip. Er wird insbesondere durch die action en répétition de l'indu verdrängt; außerdem unterliegt die Rückforderung von Ware und Geld, die aufgrund eines später mit Wirkung ex tunc angefochtenen und für nichtig erklärten Vertrages geleistet wurden, in FRANCE dem Anfechtungsrecht, in dessen Rahmen allerdings nötigenfalls die Regelungen über die Zahlung des Nichtgeschuldeten lückenfüllend herangezogen werden. Die Voraussetzungen einer Klage wegen paiement de l´indu sind in France und in Belgium weitgehend identisch. Es bedarf sowohl in Frankreich als auch in Belgien (i) einer "Zahlung", und es muss diese Zahlung (ii) ungeschuldet sein. FRANCE verlangt (iii) für den Fall des indu subjectif zusätzlich, dass die Zahlung irrtümlich erfolgte (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Droit civil II[11], no. 26 p. 25). In BELGIUM dagegen ist der Irrtum keine materiellrechtliche Anspruchsvoraussetzung. Er spielt vielmehr nur dann eine Rolle, wenn es sich darum handelt, das Ungeschuldetsein der Zahlung nachzuweisen (Cass. 18 September 1970, Pas. belge 1971, I, 48).

17. Auch SPAIN verfügt über ein selbständiges Regime der Zahlung des Nichtgeschuldeten. Der Rückforderungsanspruch aus CC art. 1895 hat nach allgemeiner Auffassung drei Voraussetzungen: Es muss sich (i) um eine Zahlung handeln, d.h. der "Zahlende" (der solvens) muss solvendi causa or solvendi animo geleistet haben (TS 30 January 1986, RAJ 1986 (1) no. 341 p. 291; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[5], 515; Albaladejo, Derecho Civil II[12], 909). Die Zahlung muss sich (ii) auf eine nicht existierende Schuld bezogen haben. Die Lehre pflegt insoweit drei Arten des indebitum zu unterscheiden (z.B. Gullón Ballesteros, FS Batlle Vázquez, 367, 368-371): das indebitum ex persona (wo zwar eine Schuld besteht, der Schuldner jedoch an eine andere Person als den Gläubiger leistet), das indebitum ex re (wo das Geleistete entweder nicht oder nicht in der entsprechenden Höhe [TS 21 November 1957, RAJ 1957 (1) no. 3632 p. 2420] geschuldet ist) und das indebitum ex causa (bei dem es sich um Leistungen auf einen nichtigen Vertrag handelt). Für den zuletzt genannten Fall (indebitum ex causa) steht mit CC art. 1303 allerdings eine eigene Anspruchsgrundlage zur Verfügung. Schließlich ist (iii) erforderlich, dass sich der solvens über das Bestehen einer Schuld irrt (TS 10 June 1995, RAJ 1995 (3) no. 4914 p. 6589; Díez-Picazo loc. cit.; Gullón Ballesteros loc. cit. 369 and 372). Es macht freilich keinen Unterschied, ob es sich dabei um einen Tatsachen- oder um einen Rechtsirrtum handelt (Albaladejo loc. cit.). Hinsichtlich des Anspruchsumfanges unterscheiden CC arts. 1896 and 1897 zwischen gut- und bösgläubigen Empfängern. Ein bösgläubiger accipiens haftet nach CC art. 1896 nicht nur auf die Rückgabe der empfangenen Sache bzw. die Erstattung ihres Wertes, sondern auch auf Herausgabe der Früchte bzw. der Zinsen, auf Ersatz für die Verschlechterung oder den Verlust der Sache (was freilich nur bei individuellen Sachen eine Rolle spielt, weil andernfalls die Maxime genus numquam perit eingreift: Gullón Ballesteros loc. cit. 376) und auf Ausgleich weiterer Schäden des solvens. Ein gutgläubiger accipiens haftet dagegen nach CC art. 1897 für die Verschlechterung oder den Verlust der Sache "oder dessen, was zu ihr gehört" nur insoweit, als er noch bereichert ist (z.B. deshalb, weil er für die Beschädigung der Sache von einem Dritten Ersatz erlangt hat.

18. Das ITALIAN Zivilgesetzbuch unterscheidet (wie Rechtsprechung und Literatur in France) zwischen dem indebito oggettivo (CC art. 2033) und dem indebito soggettivo (CC art. 2036). Eine objektive Nichtschuld liegt vor, wenn die Leistung aufgrund eines nicht existierenden oder unwirksamen Rechtstitels erfolgt. Bei einer subjektiven Nichtschuld liegt zwar ein Rechtstitel vor, jedoch nimmt der Leistende irrtümlich an, selber der Schuldner zu sein. Die Unterscheidung zwischen den beiden Formen lässt sich nicht stets einfach durchhalten (vgl. z.B. einerseits Cass. 10 March 1995, no. 2814, Giur.it. 1995, I, 1, 228 und andererseits Cass. 20 September 1971, no. 2611, Foro it. 1972, I, 1, 1818). Für CC art. 2033 (objektive Nichtschuld) genügen eine "Zahlung" und die Abwesenheit eines den Erwerb tragenden Rechtsgrundes, einer causa adquirendi (Cass. 13 April 1995, no. 4268, Rep.Giur.it. 1995, voce Indebito no. 7; Cass. 4 February 2000, no. 1252, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 242; Cass. 1 August 2001, no. 10498, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 1519). Nicht erforderlich ist ein Irrtum des Leistenden; folglich kommt es auch weder auf die Entschuldbarkeit eines tatsächlich vorliegenden Irrtums (Cass. 27 February 1998, no. 2209, Rep.Giur.it. 1998, voce Lavoro (Rapporto di) nos. 606, 707) noch darauf an, ob der "Zahlende" wenigstens mit animus solvendi, d.h. in dem Bewusstsein leistete, Schuldner zu sein (Cass. 15 November 1994, no. 9624, Rep.Giur.it. 1994, voce Indebito no. 4; Cass. 14 June 1967, no. 1339, Foro it. 1967, I, 1390 = Giur.it. 1968, I, 1, 576, note Moscati [betr. Zahlungen zu dem alleinigen Zweck, eine Strafe zu vermeiden]). Für die Zahlung einer subjektiven Nichtschuld wird dagegen verlangt, dass der Leistungsempfänger tatsächlich Gläubiger einer solchen Forderung ist und dass der Leistende aufgrund eines entschuldbaren Irrtums meint, ihr Schuldner zu sein (Moscati, Riv.Dir.Civ. 1975, I, 3114; Cass. 4 May 1978, no. 2078, Foro pad. 1978, I, 100). Der Rückforderungsanspruch ist ausgeschlossen, wenn sich der Gläubiger gutgläubig der Schuldurkunde entledigt oder die zu seinen Gunsten für die Forderung bestellten Sicherheiten aufgibt (CC art. 2036 verdrängt CC art. 2033: Levi, Il pagamento dell'indebito, 117-118); in diesem Fall tritt allerdings der Leistende in die Rechte des Gläubigers ein (CC art. 2036(2)). Für den Irrtum trägt der Leistende die Beweislast; der Irrtum gilt als ein wesentliches Begründungselement des Anspruchs auf Rückforderung einer subjektiven Nichtschuld (Levi loc. cit. 120; Cass. 20 September 1971, no. 2611, Giur.it. 1972, I, 1, 1818). Denn der Gläubiger, so wird gesagt, erhält, was ihm zusteht, und gewöhnlich ist unerheblich, wer die Schuld erfüllt. Auch Dritte sind grundsätzlich befugt, fremde Schulden zu tilgen. Der Irrtum darf schließlich nicht unentschuldbar sein. Entschuldbar ist er, wenn er nicht auf grober Fahrlässigkeit beruht (de Cupis, Giur.it. 1984, IV, 70). CC art. 2037 bringt sodann Vorschriften über die Rückgabe einer "bestimmten Sache" (einer cosa determinata). Der bösgläubige Empfänger haftet nach dieser Vorschrift auch dann auf Wertersatz, wenn die Sache ohne sein Verschulden untergegangen ist; der gutgläubige Empfänger haftet dagegen, selbst wenn Beschädigung oder Untergang auf sein Verhalten zurückgehen, nur im Umfange einer ihm noch verbliebenen Bereicherung. CC art. 2038 handelt von der Veräußerung der unberechtigterweise erhaltenen Sache.

19. AUSTRIAN CC § 1431 hat die Leistung einer Nichtschuld und den Irrtum über das Bestehen des Leistungsgrundes zur Voraussetzung. CC § 1432 schließt von der Rückforderbarkeit aus: Leistungen auf eine verjährte Schuld, auf eine Schuld, die nur wegen eines Formmangels unwirksam war, Leistungen auf eine bloße Naturalobligation und (dies folgt freilich schon aus CC § 1431) wissentliche Zahlungen einer Nichtschuld. Für Personen, die nicht voll geschäftsfähig sind, gelten diese Einschränkungen nicht (CC § 1433). Der Nichtschuld steht die "noch ungewisse Schuld" gleich (CC § 1434: Leistung auf eine bedingte Forderung vor Bedingungseintritt); allerdings kann eine Zahlung vor Fälligkeit nicht wieder zurückgefordert werden (loc. cit. second sentence). CC § 1435 betrifft die Kondiktion wegen nachträglichem Wegfall des Leistungsgrundes; ein Irrtum ist nicht erforderlich. Die Vorschrift wird analog auf Fälle angewandt, in denen es um einen nicht eingetretenen Leistungszweck geht (z.B. bei Dienstleistungen außerhalb eines Vertragsverhältnisses). CC § 1435 relativiert durch seinen Verzicht auf das Irrtumserfordernis die Bedeutung der CC §§ 1431-1434. Im Rahmen von CC § 1431 kann sich der Irrtum auch auf die Person des Gläubigers beziehen (OGH 31 January 1985, SZ 58/19; OGH 27 November 1968, SZ 41/163).

21. Auch dem HUNGARIAN law ist die Zahlung des Nichtgeschuldeten als selbständiges Rechtsinstitut fremd. Die condictio indebiti gehört zu den Kernmaterien des Bereicherungsrechts. Vorrang vor ihm beanspruchen allerdings die Regeln der Vertragsungültigkeit, welche die Rückabwicklung nichtiger bzw. angefochtener Verträge regeln (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1388). Die beiden Regime unterscheiden sich im Wesentlichen dadurch, dass nur das Bereicherungs-, nicht aber auch das Ungültigkeitsrechts den Einwand des Wegfalls der Bereicherung zulässt (Weiss, A szerződés érvénytelensége a polgári jogban, 113-114; Vékás, JbOstR XIX [1978], 249). Dadurch wird es notwendig, zwischen Leistungen auf nicht existierende und Leistungen auf ungültige Verträge zu unterscheiden. Nur die ersteren unterliegen dem Bereicherungsrecht (Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog II[2], 409; Kisfaludi, Az adásvételi szerződés[2], 127-128; BH 2001/168 und BH 1975/86). In die erste Gruppe gehören z.B. Leistungen auf wegen eines Dissenses tatsächlich nie zustandegekommene, in die zweite Leistungen auf mit ex tunc Wirkung angefochtene Verträge (näher zum Begriff der ungültigen Verträge Kemenes, A szerződés érvénytelensége, 64).

22. POLISH CC art. 410 regelt die "nicht zustehende Leistung" als einen Sonderfall des Bereicherungsrechts (Serda, Nienależne świadczenie, 45; Ohanowicz, Niesłuszne wzbogacenie, 248; Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania - część ogólna[2], no. 658 p. 220); die Voraussetzungen des allgemeinen Bereicherungsanspruches aus CC art. 405 müssen folglich auch hier gegeben sein. Eine Leistung steht jemandem gemäß CC art. 410 § 2 in vier Fällen nicht zu: (i) wenn derjenige, der sie erbracht hat, zu ihr allgemein oder gegenüber demjenigen, dem er sie erbracht hat, nicht verpflichtet gewesen ist (condictio indebiti), (ii) wenn der Rechtsgrund der Leistung entfallen ist (condictio causa finita), (iii) wenn der mit der Leistung beabsichtigte Zweck nicht erreicht worden ist (conditctio causa data causa non secuta), und (iv) wenn das zur Vornahme der Leistung verpflichtende Rechtsgeschäft nichtig gewesen und auch nach Erfüllung der Leistung nicht wirksam geworden ist (condictio sine causa) (Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit.). CC art. 411 regelt vier Fälle des Ausschlusses des Rückgewähranspruches, darunter in no. 1 den Fall, dass der Leistende wusste, dass er nicht zur Leistung verpflichtet ist. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 86 sieht vor, dass rechts- und sittenwidrige Verträge nichtig sind. Nichtig sind auch Verträge, deren Gegenstand objektiv unmöglich zu verwirklichen oder unbestimmt und unbestimmbar ist. LOA art. 87(1) knüpft daran die Rechtsfolge, dass alles, was aufgrund einer solchen Vereinbarung geleistet wurde, von der anderen Seite in Natur, oder, falls das unmöglich ist, dem Wert nach herausgegeben werden muss. LOA art. 96 sieht dieselbe Rechtsfolge für Leistungen vor, die auf einen wegen arglistiger Täuschung, Irrtums oder Gewaltandrohung angefochtenen und aufgehobenen Vertrag erbracht wurden. Im BULGARISCHEN Recht gehört die condictio indebiti zu LOA art. 55(1) (rechtsgrundlose Leistung) und LOA art. 56 (irrtümliche Erfüllung einer fremden Schuld) (näher Goleminov, Neosnovatelno obogatyavane, 39). LOA art. 55(1) setzt voraus, dass das Nichtgeschuldete vom Bereicherten aufgrund einer in Wahrheit niemals existenten, einer nichtigen oder einer durch Anfechtung vernichteten Rechtsbeziehung empfangen wurde. LOA art. 56 handelt von Fällen, in welchen der Anspruchsteller irrtümlich in der Meinung leistet, eine eigene Schuld zu begleichen, sei es auch nur in der Annahme, hierzu als Bürge verpflichtet zu sein. Der Irrtum muss nicht entschuldbar sein (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 590).

23. Neben den allgemeinen Bereicherungsanspruch stellt DUTCH CC art. 6:203 das Recht der "ungeschuldeten Zahlung". Die entsprechende Forderung zielt auf die Rückabwicklung von Leistungen (der Begriff der "Zahlung" umfasst die Hingabe von Ware, Geld, Rechten und Dienstleistungen), die objektiv ohne rechtfertigenden Grund (sine causa) erbracht worden sind. Es ist nicht erforderlich, dass die Leistung (Zahlung) irrtümlich erfolgte; auf den Leistungswillen der zahlenden Person kommt es nicht an (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 804-805; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[12], nos. 321-322 p. 340-342; Scheltema, Onverschuldigde betaling, 11, 31-34). Nicht voll geschäftsfähige Personen sind nur insoweit zu Rückgewähr, Herausgabe von Früchten, Aufwendungs- und Schadenersatz verpflichtet, wie ihnen das Empfangene tatsächlich genützt hat (CC art. 6:209).

24. In the NORDIC countries condictio indebiti constitutes an independent regime pertaining to the restitution of mistaken payments. Es umfasst Zahlungen an einen falschen Empfänger, double-payment, and overpayment. Das Recht der condictio indebiti wird meistens nicht als ein bloßer Anwendungsfall von Bereicherungsrecht, sondern als ein selbständiges Gebiet verstanden (siehe für SWEDEN Hult, Condictio indebiti, 52, und für DENMARK Vinding Kruse, Restitutioner, 203; anders für FINLAND aber Hakulinen Obligationsrätt, 365; siehe auch Serlachius, TfR 1903, 137-174 and Roos, JFT 1992, 75). In SWEDEN a general rule is asserted, that a mistaken payment shall be restituted. However, an assessment is made in the individual case with regards to the good faith of the recipient, possible negligence on the part of the performing person and other factors. Bei einer freiwilligen Zuwendung in Kenntnis der Abwesenheit einer Leistungsverpflichtung fehlt es an einer irrtümlichen Zahlung. Also, the payment of a prescribed claim cannot be subject to condictio indebiti (Hult loc.cit. 73; Rodhe, Obligationsrätt, 688). Auch kann einem gutgläubigen Empfänger zugestanden werden, das Empfangene zu behalten, wenn er sich darauf eingerichtet (HD 31 May 2001, NJA 2001, 353) oder es verbraucht hat. Das gilt jedenfalls bis zu dem Zeitpunkt, zu dem ihm die leistende Partei über ihren Irrtum aufgeklärt hat. Liegt zwischen der Leistung und der Information nur eine kurze Zeitspanne, the recipient can normally not claim to have accommodated to the payment. Generell gilt, dass der Empfänger durch die Pflicht zur Rückgewähr nicht schlechter gestellt werden darf, als er stünde, wenn er die irrtümliche Leistung niemals empfangen hätte (HD 30 December 1970, NJA 1970, 539). Arbeitnehmer und Verbraucher genießen oft einen besonderen Schutz vor Rückabwicklungsansprüchen (Swedish Labour Court 8 November 2006, AD 2006, no. 105; HD 12 April 1984, NJA 1984, 280). In die Gesamtabwägung werden aber auch noch weitere Faktoren eingestellt, etwa das Vertrauen des Empfängers darauf, dass seine Forderung mit der Zahlung endgültig beglichen ist, und die Frage, welche der beiden Parteien die beste Übersicht über die der Zahlung zugrundeliegenden Modalitäten hatte. So kommen Fahrlässigkeitserwägungen und die Frage ins Spiel, welche Partei das Risiko einer Fehlzahlung tragen sollte (Karlgren, SvJT 1940, 330, 339; Hult loc.cit. 83; HD 10 February 1933, NJA 1933, 25). Dieser Ansatz kommt auch in Fällen zum Tragen, in welchen Banken bei der Durchführung von Überweisungen im Kundenauftrag ein Fehler unterläuft, see HD 30 March 1994, NJA 1994, 177; HD 17 September 1999, NJA 1999, 575; Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 205; id., JT 1999-2000, 409-415). In DENMARK wird selbst die Aufstellung einer allgemeinen Regel vermieden, wonach irrtümliche Zahlungen zurückverlangt werden können. Stattdessen wird auf die Umstände des jeweiligen Einzelfalls abgestellt, was am Ende zu ganz ähnlichen Ergebnissen führt wie in Sweden. Wesentlich sind vor allem die Frage nach der Gutgläubigkeit des Empfängers und der Fahrlässigkeit des Leistenden, um zu entscheiden, wer das Risiko der irrtümlichen Zahlung tragen soll (Vinding Kruse loc. cit. 206; Gomard, Obligationsret III, 171; von Eyben/Mortensen/Sørensen, Obligationsret II, 137; Ravnkilde, Betalningskorrektioner, 89; HD 4 May 1982, UfR 1982, 580). Es wird dagegen nicht darauf abgestellt, ob sich der Empfänger auf das Behaltendürfen des Geleisteten "eingerichtet" hat; however, passivity of the performing party may be seen as an indicator of the recipient's good faith (Eastern CA 27 February 1975, UfR 1975, 648). In FINLAND stellt die Rechtsprechung demgegenüber einen direkten Zusammenhang zwischen unjustified enrichment and condictio indebiti claims her (e.g. Supreme Court 8 October 1986, KKO 1986 II 126). Das Konzept der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung dient allerdings auch hier mehr zur theoretischen Erklärung der entsprechenden Regel als zu ihrer tatbestandlichen Präzisierung. Es scheint, als habe sich das finnische Recht allmählich dem schwedischen angenähert und jedenfalls auf der Basis eines allgemeinen Vernünftigkeitstests zunehmend Einzelfallabwägungen Raum gegeben (Roos loc. cit.). The obligation to reverse the payment can be reduced. The grounds for such a reduction include the good faith of the recipient, the parties' economic and social circumstances, the purpose of the payment, and the passivity of the person performing it.

IV. Terminology

25. In den Mitgliedstaaten der EU fehlt es bislang auch an einer einheitlichen Terminologie; die Begriffe für die an dem Schuldverhältnis beteiligten Personen, für den Vor- und den Nachteil und für den erforderlichen Nexus zwischen diesen beiden Elementen des bzw. der bereicherungsrechtlichen Ansprüche variieren von Land zu Land. FRENCH bzw. BELGIAN and LUXEMBURGIAN CC arts. 1376-1381 (paiement de l´indu bzw. onverschuldigde betaling) verzichten auf begrifflich präzise Vorgaben zur Bezeichnung sowohl des Empfängers der Zahlung (z.B. CC art. 1376: celui qui reçoit) als auch des Zahlenden (z.B. CC art. 1377: une personne qui a acquitté une dette). Rechtsprechung und Schrifttum weichen deshalb für ihre Zwecke zumeist auf das Begriffspaar solvens und accipiens aus (Bénabent, Les obligations[10], no. 468 p. 318; van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 224); manchmal ist aber auch moderner von payeur und payé die Rede (Malaurie/Aynès/Stoffel-Munck, Les obligations, no. 1042 p. 540). Im Rahmen der enrichissement sans cause bzw. der verrijking zonder oorzaak nennt man die Parteien l´appauvri und l´enrichi (bzw. verarmde und verrijkte). Auch die Formulierung für den fehlenden Rechtsgrund ist in den beiden Rechtsgebieten unterschiedlich: indu bzw. onverschuldigd und sans cause bzw. zonder oorzaak. Der Nachteil des Klägers ist im Rahmen der enrichissement sans cause die "Verarmung", im Rahmen des paiement de l´indu im Begriff des paiement enthalten: "Paiement" ist eine Leistung zugunsten eines anderen. Das umfasst den Nachteil des solvens. Unterschiede zwischen Frankreich und Belgien existieren insoweit nicht; auch in Belgien bezeichnet der Begriff der Zahlung nicht nur die Übergabe von Geld oder von einzelnen Sachen, sondern z.B. auch falsche Buchungen auf Bankkonten, Aufrechnungen oder die Überlassung immaterieller Werte (Roodhooft [-Roodhooft], Bestendig Handboek Verbintenissenrecht V, no. 2207; Leclercq, JT 1976, 105, 106 no. 10).

26. Der SPANISH CC hat, wie dargelegt, ebenfalls kein eigenes Bereicherungsrecht ausgebildet. Es wurde erst von Lehre und Rechtsprechung entwickelt, die sich hierbei auch auf die mittelalterlichen Partidas stützten, welche das Verbot der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung – verblüffend modern – bereits dahin formuliert hatten, dass sich niemand ohne Grund auf Kosten eines anderen bereichern darf (Nadie puede enriquecerse sin causa a costa de otro; zitiert nach Núñez Lagos, El enriquecimiento sin causa en el Derecho español, 9; siehe ferner TS 28 January 1956, RAJ 1956 (1) no. 669 p. 418 und, allerdings mit einer nicht ganz identischen Fassung der Partidas, Álvarez-Caperochipi, El enriquecimiento sin causa[3], 18). Für den fehlenden Rechtsgrund verwendet das moderne Schrifttum eine Vielzahl von Formulierungen: enriquecimiento injustificado, enriquecimiento sin causa, enriquecimiento injusto (näher Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 36, 43). Die Terminolgie der CC arts. 1895 und 1896 zur condictio indebiti wird als nicht ganz glücklich empfunden (Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez loc. cit. 114-116). Die Abschnittsüberschrift spricht von cobro de lo indebido ("receipt" of what is not owed). CC art. 1895 lautet demgemäß: "If a thing is received when there was no right to claim it and which, through an error, has been without any reason delivered, it arises the obligation to restore it". The concept of
