58. In THE NETHERLANDS the Hoge Raad ruled that patients who turn to a regular doctor who also provides ‘alternative’ medicine, may expect that such a doctor does not neglect what is necessary for a medically sound diagnosis and treatment. The ‘alternative doctor’ therefore has to live up to the normal standard of care. HR 6 December 1996, NedJur 1998, 543, note F.C.B. van Wijmen (B./Inspecteur Gezondheidszorg Utrecht en Flevoland). See also Roscam Abbing, Alternatieve beroepsuitoefening, p. 287, with references to case law of disciplinary courts. For providers of other medical services, the notion of ‘a reasonably acting and reasonably competent’ provider applies, either on the basis of CC art. 7:453 if the contract is to be qualified as a treatment contract, or on the basis of CC art. 7:401 in so far as the more general rules on services in general apply. In essence, the notion in both articles amounts to the same. The criterion is the reasonably acting and reasonably competent provider of that specific service.

59. Assuming that the unconventional treatment is provided by a doctor, the same standard of care applies under POLISH law. In such a case, if the risks associated with the treatment are higher, the doctor is obliged to inform the patient about it and obtain a written consent of the patient for the treatment.

60. As unconventional treatment is not regulated by law in PORTUGAL there is a risk that the standard of care would be assessed by courts in the light of sound conventional medical practice. However, a reform proposal (Projecto de Lei no 27/IX, 23 May 2002, BE, not approved), art. 11/4 suggested that the standard of care ought to be assessed within the leges artis of the actual unconventional discipline.

61. In SCOTLAND where the doctor has no normal practice to go by, the general test of Hunter v. Hanley 1955 SC 200 continues to apply, and the duty is to reach a rational and responsible decision in a careful and measured way after weighing up all the possibilities (Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, para. 173).

VII. No-fault compensation etc.

62. As noted above, there is under DANISH law a no-fault compensation system for treatment performed in public hospitals.

63. In the UNITED KINGDOM the Royal Commission on Civil Liability and Compensation for Personal Injury [1978] decided against recommending the introduction of a no-fault compensation system in the UK, leaving open the possibility that the decision could be reviewed in the future in the light of the experience of such systems in other countries.

64. The FINNISH PSL establishes a no-fault system.

65. In FRANCE a part of the legal doctrine is in favour of imposing an obligation of result on the doctor in particular situations at least (Mellenec, Rev.dr.sanit.soc, 271. Especially, Penneau, Faute et erreur en matière de responsabilité médicale, no. 392). The arguments taken into consideration are the progress of medical science, the use of sophisticated devices and the need to compensate the victims. These arguments led the case law to impose in some situations an obligation of result on a doctor or a hospital. (Cass.civ I, 4 January 1974, Bull.civ. no. 4; RTD civ 1974, 822 obs. Durry). For easy operations very often performed, such as an injection, see Cass.civ I, 17 June 1980, Bull.civ. I no. 187, RTD civ 1981, 165 obs. Durry; CE 23 February 1962, Meier, Leb. p. 122; CE 22 December 1976, Dame Derridj, JCP 1978.II.18792, note J.-M. Auby. For diseases contracted in the hospital, see above. For the quality of a prosthesis, see Cass.civ I, 15 November 1972, D. 1973, 342; RTD civ 1974, 160, obs. Durry; Cass.civ I, 22 November 1994, RTD civ 1995, 375 obs. Jourdain; for a denture. A debate is taking place on whether or not it is desirable to compensate the "aléa thérapeutique". This can be defined as damage which is foreseeable but uncertain in its incidence and not preventable by the doctor. For example, there is always a tiny chance of contracting AIDS in spite of rigorous screening at blood transfusion centres; there is always a chance that anaesthesia will go wrong even in the absence of any fault on the part of the doctor. Should the patient be compensated in these situations in which the doctor committed no fault? The legal doctrine is divided and the positive law does not have a general approach to this issue. If the "aléa thérapeutique" is compensated in the case of transmission of AIDS by blood products (Cass.civ I, 12 April 1995, JCP 1995.II.22467, note P. Jourdain; CCC 1995, chr. no. 9, L. Leveneur; D. 1996, 610, note Lambert-Faivre; CE 26. 05. 1995, N´Guyen, Jouan, cons. Pavan, JCP 1995.II.22468, note J. Moreau; RFDA 1995, 748, concl. S. Daël.), the other situations are less clear. More generally, the Conseil d´Etat (the supreme administrative Court) ruled in 1993: "When a medical act, necessary to the diagnosis or the treatment of the patient, involves a known risk but the realisation is exceptional and if there is no reason to consider that the patient is particularly exposed, the hospital public service is liable if the performance of the medical act is the direct cause of the damage which has no connection with the initial situation of the patient or the foreseeable evolution of it and is of an extreme seriousness" (CE, Ass., 9 April 1993, Bianchi, D. 1993, 313, concl. H. Legal; JCP 1993.II.22061, note J. Moreau). By that case the Conseil d´Etat established the conditions of compensation of the aléa thérapeutique. Those conditions are quite restrictive. The Cour de cassation has rejected this same position (Cass.civ I, 8 November 2000, Bull.civ. I, no. 287; JCP 2001.II.10493, rapp. Sargos, note Chabas), Even if lower civil Courts did follow the position of the Conseil d´Etat (CA Paris 15 January 1999, JCP 1999.II.10068, note L. Boy). The solution is now to be found in article L. 1142-1 II of the Code de la santé publique. In the hypothesis of the Bianchi case, the damage is compensated not by the treatment provider but by health insurance (réparation du préjudice au titre de la solidarité nationale).

66. There is no objective liability of the doctor under ITALIAN law (Alpa, Riv.it.med.leg. 1999, fasc. 1 (February), p. 24), although in the case of routine medical procedures the liability is very close to being objective.

67. A no-fault system exists in ICELAND: Act on Patient Insurance no. 111/2000

68. In 1989, the then National council for public health advised against introducing a Swedish-type no-fault system in THE NETHERLANDS. It was argued that it would be too costly and that it could lead to a lesser commitment of the health provider if claims were made not against the health provider but against a public authority. Moreover, it was argued that such a system led to standardised compensation instead of full damages. Cf. Bijl. H.TK. 2001-2002, no. 14 (Parliamentary proceedings regarding the governmental discussion paper 'Choosing with care' (Met zorg kiezen), pp. 26-27. Since then opinion has slowly become more favourable towards the no-fault system. In 1990, Aerts, De Zweedse no-fault verzekering ter vergoeding van medische schade, pp. 271-272, considered the advantages of a no-fault-system to be evident, since it gives patients easier access to damages and it leads to a simple, orderly and speedy procedure, as well as being cost-efficient system. In 1994, in the course of the parliamentary proceedings on a law on the right to complain for clients in the care sector, it was agreed that research regarding the consequences of a no-fault-system was needed. In a 1995 report by the National Ombudsman on the infection of haemophiliacs with HIV, a no-fault compensation system was held appropriate for defective blood products. The Minister for Public Health, supported by a 1997 report from the then Board on Blood Transfusion, announced in 1999 that she did not think that there was justification on principle to introduce a no-fault system only for the victims of defective blood products. She therefore requested ZorgOnderzoek Nederland (ZON) to do comparative legal research on the advantages and disadvantages of such a system and of the existing system. Cf. Bijl. H.TK. 2000-2001, 27 436, no. 1, pp. 13-14. The report of ZON has not yet been published. On 26 March 2002, the Second Chamber of Parliament accepted a motion, claiming that such a system could lead to a fairer and affordable system of compensation, that requested the government to examine various variants of a no-fault-system and to report back to Parliament before the summer of 2002. Cf. Bijl. H.TK. 2001-2002, 27 807, no. 8 and H.TK. 60-4082.

69. NORWAY has a no-fault compensation system (Lov 15 juni 2001 no. 53 om erstatning ved pasientskader).

70. Until 2001 (when the Constitutional Tribunal repealed POLISH CC art. 419) compensation regarding medical accidents in a situation when there was no possibility to attribute fault to the doctor or to the hospital could be granted on the basis of rightness. At the moment it is uncertain whether the new CC art. 417^2 could be used as the basis for liability for medical accidents on the basis of rightness

71. There is strict liability in PORTUGAL in the case of experimental treatment (art. 14/1, DL 97/94, 9/4). Cf. de Oliveira, O direito do diagnóstico pré-natal[2], p. 199; use of equipment hazardous by nature (e.g. X-Ray equipment).

72. In SPAIN there is a move towards imposing objective liability in accordance with the General Consumers Act. (TS of 1 July 1997, RJ 1997/5471 and TS 21 July 1997, RJ 1997/5523) This approach is very generally accepted when there is a medical institution involved, in order to guarantee that the patient is indemnified. The majority of the doctrine rejects such objectivity when the claim is against the doctor or medical treatment provider personally.

73. The SWEDISH system is in principle a no-fault system. It is for example sufficient that the damage could have been avoided through the choice of another method of treatment, even if the treatment actually chosen was performed perfectly.

IV.C.–8:105: Obligation to inform

(1) The treatment provider must, in order to give the patient a free choice regarding treatment, inform the patient about, in particular:

(a) the patient's existing state of health;
(b) the nature of the proposed treatment;
(c) the advantages of the proposed treatment;
(d) the risks of the proposed treatment;
(e) the alternatives to the proposed treatment, and their advantages and risks as compared to those of the proposed treatment; and
(f) the consequences of not having treatment.

(2) The treatment provider must, in any case, inform the patient about any risk or alternative which might reasonably influence the patient's decision on whether to give consent to the proposed treatment or not. It is presumed that a risk might reasonably influence that decision if its materialisation would lead to serious detriment to the patient. Unless otherwise provided, the obligation to inform is subject to the provisions of Chapter 7 (Information and Advice).

(3) The information must be provided in a way understandable to the patient.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article deals with the treatment provider's obligation to inform the patient or whoever takes decisions on the patient's behalf. Information is to be disclosed in order to allow the patient an informed choice regarding treatment and obtain informed consent.

With regard to the patient's autonomy, the treatment provider is under an obligation to disclose, in a clear and understandable way, all the information regarding the patient's health status and his or her illness as well as the proposed treatment. The information about the proposed treatment that must be disclosed to the patient consists of several elements. The patient must be informed of the risks of the proposed treatment, about alternative treatment techniques as well as the risks of them and, finally, the prognosis of the patient's health if the patient decides to agree to the proposed treatment, to do without it or to do without any treatment. In particular, the consequences of not having treatment, as well as the potential benefits to be expected from treatment must be made very clear to the patient. Thus, the patient will be in a position to make an informed choice as regards the treatment strategy.

A patient considers undergoing laser eye surgery in order to correct myopia. The ophthalmologist informs her of the risks and potential benefits of having surgery performed, in particular the (low but existent) risks of blindness, as well as those of refraining from surgery (myopia will gradually advance, lenses will be thicker, risk of eventual total loss of sight). He informs the patient of alternative treatment, like traditional eye surgery, but points out that the risks are higher and the post-surgery period more difficult. The patient is now in a position to make an informed choice on whether or not to undergo surgery.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The patient has a right to be informed, to make an informed choice in regard to treatment, and to consent in regard to his or her bodily security and right to self-determination. The treatment provider has an obligation to inform, but how thorough must the information be? A very thorough obligation to inform is costly, as its performance takes more time, fewer patients can be treated and expenses rebound against the patient or the healthcare system.

It can be argued that all risks must be disclosed, however slight the chance of their materialisation. However, it might be excessive to require the treatment provider to inform the patient of very unlikely possibilities. In any treatment, there exist known risks the materialisation of which is rare. Disclosing them to the patient might deter the patient from undergoing a treatment which would be beneficial. Too much information that the patient cannot reasonably process may lead to situations where the patient cannot make an informed choice or makes an unreasonable decision.

> The medical literature mentions only one case where the use of a certain drug in combination with another specific drug resulted in toxic delirium. As this is a very rare adverse reaction, there is no need to inform the patient of it.

Another relevant factor is urgency. The more urgent the treatment is, the less information needs to be provided. When a patient needs immediate treatment, information will be scarce in the pre-treatment phase; when immediate treatment is not required, the extent of the information to be disclosed will be greater. Another criterion, the necessity criterion, requires that the obligation to inform will be more stringent when (from a purely medical point of view) treatment is less necessary.

Another debate concerns the scope of the alternatives to be mentioned, in particular as to the mentioning of unconventional treatment alternatives. Unconventional treatment (such as acupuncture, homeopathy, osteopathy, Chinese traditional medicine, etc.) is becoming more and more popular, presenting in some circumstances effective alternatives that conventional medicine cannot offer. The question is whether the traditional health-care provider is under a duty to inform the patient about unconventional treatment alternatives. It may be argued that the duty to inform only applies to alternatives offered by the same scientific field, and that an MD cannot be expected to know the therapies existent in other treatment techniques. On the other hand, as a healthcare professional is not he or she expected to have a broad knowledge of all sound treatment techniques? Then again, what constitutes a sound treatment technique if it is not accepted in medical practice?

A related issue concerns the form in which information is to be provided. It is common hospital practice to provide a patient with a form containing general information, in correct medical jargon, and space for the patient's signature, who thus gives consent. However, should the information not be tailored to the specific patient and be conveyed personally by the treatment provider in a way which the patient can understand?

> A virtuoso opera singer is informed that a certain treatment entails a 0,1 per cent possibility that the vocal cords will be slightly injured, thus causing the loss of the ability to sing in the correct pitch in some octaves. A manual worker needing the same treatment is not informed of that risk. If provided with a form explaining the most significant risks of the treatment, stated in medical jargon, the patient would probably not understand exactly the stakes involved. Also, such standardized information would not point out a risk that would not be relevant to a normal patient, but whose materialisation would be detrimental to this opera singer.

C. Preferred option

The preferred option is to provide that only risks which may reasonably influence the patient's decision on treatment must be disclosed. It is presumed that such risks will influence the patient's decision if their materialisation would lead to serious detriment to the patient (death, disfigurement, permanent disability). This presumption does not exclude other criteria for the determination of the relevant information to be disclosed, such as the rate of the risk's materialisation, subject to standard rules regarding the burden of proof. Thus, the obligation to inform consists in telling the patient what he or she reasonably needs to know in order to make an informed choice. Also, the less urgent treatment is, the more detailed the information must be, as some time can be allocated for the exploration of alternatives and weighing the risks and benefits.

The patient's interests regarding autonomy are safeguarded, as well as the hospital's and the professional's interests regarding organisation of time. This also reduces the risk that a patient is deterred from undergoing treatment owing to information overload.

Serious and sound relevant alternatives, even if offered by unconventional medicine, are to be disclosed to the patient in so far as the standard of care so requires. This approach gives patients the possibility of choosing between different alternatives available.

The treatment provider is to present the information in a personalised, direct way. The information should be adapted to the situation of that specific patient and expressed in a way which is understandable by the patient. If information is provided through a form stated in medical jargon, however thorough the content of the information may be, an average patient will not be able to understand it. On the other hand, if tailor-made information is disclosed personally, by a health-care professional, in a briefing session and in language understandable to the patient, then that patient will be adequately informed. The treatment provider must make a reasonable effort to help the patient understand the information. This is the best way of respecting the patient's autonomy.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. The treatment provider's obligation to inform the patient about the patient's existing state of health, the nature of necessary treatment, its potential benefits, risks, alternatives and the consequences of refraining from any treatment is recognised in all of the analysed countries: AUSTRIA, ENGLAND, FINLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY, GREECE, ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL, SCOTLAND, SPAIN and SWEDEN.
2. In all analysed countries the treatment provider is under an obligation to inform the patient of the risks posed by the treatment. However, there are different solutions about which risks must be disclosed. In ENGLAND the treatment provider is traditionally bound to disclose the information that an average, reasonable physician should disclose, though after Bolitho v. City and Hackney HA [1997] 4 All ER 771 the treatment provider is considered to be bound to inform the patient about all significant risks. In FRANCE all risks must be disclosed. In ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL, SPAIN the treatment provider must inform the patient of foreseeable and serious risks. In GERMANY the treatment provider must inform the patient of frequent risks, as well as of rare risks which, if they materialised, would seriously affect that specific patient.

3. In AUSTRIA, FINLAND, THE NETHERLANDS and SWEDEN the treatment provider is under a duty to inform about all realistic alternatives. In GERMANY the treatment provider enjoys a freedom of choice of the treatment, and the scope of the duty to inform about alternatives to the proposed treatment depends upon the urgency of starting the execution of the treatment.

4. The burden of proof of having informed the patient falls on the treatment provider in AUSTRIA, FRANCE, GERMANY, ITALY, PORTUGAL and SPAIN. In ENGLAND the burden of proof falls upon the patient if the claim is brought on grounds of the tort of negligence, though it is unclear who bears the burden of proof if the claim is brought on grounds of the tort of battery. In SCOTLAND the onus of proof is on the treatment provider to establish that the patient consented in cases of assault (treatment without patient's consent) but in negligence claims in general the onus is on the patient (Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, para. 249). In THE NETHERLANDS, though as a general principle the patient bears the burden of proof, through interpretation the burden of proof can be shifted. In addition, the treatment provider is under a duty to help the patient substantiate the claim. In DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN, due to the facilitated access to compensation under the no-fault patient insurance schemes, a breach of the duty to inform the patient is not of much relevance. In addition, in the no-fault schemes, the case is investigated by the patient insurance consortium. Finally, as noted above, in Denmark and Sweden, if an alternative treatment existed, and had it been carried out instead of the one that caused the injury, the patient is entitled to compensation, irrespective of having been informed or not of the risks of the chosen treatment.

II. Obligation to inform in general

5. The obligation to inform plays an important role in the area of medical treatment under AUSTRIAN law. The courts tend to impose an increasingly stricter liability for failing to inform the patient: the Supreme Court ruled that doctors could be held liable despite a state-of-the-art treatment if they did not inform their patients about all the risks inherent in such a procedure (OGH 6 Ob 126/98f.).

6. In ENGLISH law, in cases based on negligence, the duty to inform is considered as part of the general standard of care, the test being whether a responsible body of doctors would have considered that the information should have been given. See for example, Sidaway v. Board of Governors of the Bethlem Royal Hospital [1985] AC 871. In order to avoid liability on grounds of the tort of battery (see below), the doctor must inform only about the nature of the treatment. It is thus not necessary to inform about attendant risks.

7. In FINLAND art. 6 of the Constitution assures the right to self-determination. The patient has a right to be informed about his or her state of health, the significance of the treatment, as well as alternatives to it. Cf. Section 5 of the Act on the Status and Rights of Patients (no. 785, 17 August 1992). Cf. Pahlmann et al., Three years in force: has the Finnish act on the status and rights of the patients materialized? Medicine and Law, 3; Lahti, Towards a comprehensive legislation governing the rights of patients, 207. Information must be provided in a way the patient can understand. The breach of a duty to inform is not relevant in compensation claims, as avoidable injury is compensated regardless.

8. In FRANCE the treatment provider must inform the patient about his or her state of health, any examination proposed, the proposed treatment, its advantages, consequences and normally predictable, frequent or serious risks, the alternatives and the consequences of not having treatment. Cf. art. L. 1111-2 CSP. This obligation was discovered by case law before its codification. It is generally admitted that the codification simply implement the solutions found in case law (Pinna, The Obligations to Inform and to Advise, no. 194; Pinna, Lex Medicinae, 2004, p. 83).

9. The obligation to inform is one of the pillars of the GERMAN medical liability system. Liability can be non-contractual under CC § 823 (BGH NJW 1980, 1905) or can arise from non-performance of a contractual obligation to inform (BGH NJW 1990, 2929). The patient must be informed about the illness, its seriousness, the process of treatment, its risks and side effects, so that the patient can decide whether or not to undergo the proposed treatment (Gehrlein, Leitfaden zur Arzthaftpflicht, p. 125; Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 63; BGH NJW 1972, 335; BGH StV 1998, 199)

10. Under GREEK law there is an obligation to inform the patient of risks and alternatives so that the patient can give informed consent to the treatment in question. This is of paramount importance in the contract for the provision of medical services because such services invariably lead to a significant involvement with the personality and physical integrity of a human being. Failure of the doctor to comply with this obligation does not render the provision of the treatment service faulty, but it rather creates an independent source of liability (Androulidaki-Dimitriadi, The duty to inform the patient, pp. 119 and 131). The issue whether the obligation to inform is a primary obligation or a secondary obligation of the treatment contract does not seem to have been dealt with in the practice in any significant way but has been discussed in academic writing (Androulidaki-Dimitriadi, The duty to inform the patient, p. 130). Failure to perform the obligation to inform indicates that the treatment lacks the necessary informed consent. Disregarding whether the patient would or would not have consented to the treatment, in case the treatment has been performed in a state of the art manner, a claim for damages for failing to inform the patient arises independently and separately. Notwithstanding that the patient may lack a cause of action on the basis of a medical error, the non-performance of the obligation to inform forms an independent claim. In effect, the successful medical treatment does not cure the earlier non-performance. But the opposite also seems to be true, failure to inform does not seem to render the provision of state of the art medical treatment wrongful. If on the other hand the medical treatment did not live up to the required standards, the patient may claim damages for non-performance of both obligations, namely the obligation of skill and care and the obligation to inform.

11. Under ITALIAN law the obligation to inform is an autonomous and specific obligation of the treatment provider. Its violation is per se a source of liability (Santosuosso, Sentenze e rapporto tra medici e pazienti, 4, 53). The obligation to inform plays a fundamental role in doctor-patient relationships, having a direct impact on the consent of one of the parties. The patient (normally devoid of relevant technical knowledge) cannot control the activity of the professional to whom he or she entrusts delicate personal interests. Therefore, the treatment provider has to inform the patient about the treatment, the connected difficulties, the consequences, the possible risks, so as to enable the patient to by balance advantages and disadvantages and decide whether to proceed or not. Information must be tailored to the patient and the nature of the ailment (de Caprio, Riv.it.med.leg 1998, fasc. 6 (December), I, p. 922; Fiori, Riv.it.med.leg 1998, fasc. 6 (December), I, p. 1150).

12. The DUTCH CC art. 7:448, para. 1, 1st sentence, obliges the doctor to inform the patient in a clear manner and, if requested, in writing. The obligation to inform covers the intended examination, the proposed treatment and the developments in the examination, the treatment and the medical condition of the patient. This general obligation to inform is elaborated in para. 2. The doctor should be led by what the patient reasonably needs to know with regard to: the nature and the purpose of the examination or treatment deemed necessary and the required procedures; the consequences and risks that can be expected; other methods of examination or treatment that need to be considered and the state of and the prospects for the patient's health as far as the examination or treatment are concerned. It is clear the doctor is obliged to inform the patient both of the risks of the treatment and the alternatives to it. However, the duty is limited to what the patient reasonably needs to know, which differs from one individual case to another. Cf. Roscam Abbing, Het recht op informatie, p. 20; Sluyters and Biesaart, De geneeskundige behandelingsovereenkomst, p. 20; Sluyters, Gezondheidsrecht, ad CC art. 7:448, note 3. The information is to be given to enable the patient to make a sound decision. The doctor will have to make sure this patient understands the information that is being given. Therefore, the information has to be tailored to the individual patient and has to be given in plain language when this is necessary to ensure the patient understands what is being said. Cf. Sluyters and Biesaart, De geneeskundige behandelingsovereenkomst, p. 18.

13. Generally, in POLAND, the patient has a right to information about his or her health condition (art. 19 of the act on the medical care institutions) and this right corresponds to the doctor's obligation to provide information to the patient (art. 31 of The act on the profession of a doctor). The doctor is obliged to inform the patient or the patient's statutory guardian in an understandable way about the patient's health condition, the diagnosis, the proposed and possible diagnostic methods, the treatment methods, the predictable consequences of their use or non-use, the results of the treatment and the prognosis (art. 31 para. 1). The doctor may provide this information to other persons only with the consent of the patient (art. 31 para. 2). On the request of the patient the doctor does not have to provide the information to the patient (art. 31 para. 1.) The doctor is obliged to provide information to persons over 16 (art. 31 para. 5). If the patient is under 16 the doctor is obliged to provide information in the scope and form necessary for the correct conduct of the diagnostic and therapeutic process. In such a case the doctor should take into account the opinion of the patient (art. 31 para. 7). If the patient is under 16, unconscious or incapable of understanding the meaning of the information, the doctor should inform the patient's statutory guardian, and – if there is no statutory guardian or there is no possibility to contact him or her – the factual guardian of the patient (art. 31 para. 6).

14. Under PORTUGUESE law the treatment provider must inform the patient on the objective, nature, consequences, benefits, costs, risks and alternatives of diagnosis and treatment, as well as of delay or refusal of the proposed treatment. If a recent technique is proposed, that fact must be disclosed to the patient. Information must be provided in simple and clear language tailored to the patient. Art. 5 CHRM, ratified by Decreto 1/2001 (Presidente da República), DR 2, 1 série A, 3/1; art. 157 CP; Base XIV, 1, e, Lei 48/90, 24/8; art. 38 CD. The objective is to uphold human dignity and allow the patient an informed choice regarding treatment. 15. On the duty of medical practitioners to inform in SCOTTISH law see Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, paras. 181, 242-263.

16. A general obligation for medical treatment providers to inform is formulated in the SPANISH General Act on Healthcare of April 25th 1986 (Ley General de Sanidad), developed by the Patient's Autonomy Statute (Ley 41/2000) that in its arts. 4-6 states that the users of the health service and their families (if the patient gives the consent to inform the family) have the right to be provided with comprehensive, complete and continuous oral and written information about their medical situation, including diagnosis, prognoses and possible alternative treatments. This regulation is based on previous provisions of a constitutional nature: the right to healthcare (art. 43) the right to dignity (art. 10.1), the right to live, the right to physical and moral integrity (art. 15) and the right to be informed (art. 20). Specific obligations to inform have been included in specific Acts and administrative provisions on different medical fields. See Ley 30/1979 (organ removal and transplantation), Ley 14/2006 (assisted reproduction), Ley 14/2007 (human embryos, foetus donation, use of tissues and organs or parts of them); Ley 29/1980 (clinical autopsy). The Supreme Court considers that the obligation for doctors to inform is an essential requirement of the "lex artis ad hoc" (TS 2 October 1997, RAJ 1997/7405; 13 April 1999, RAJ 1999/2583) and part of the obligation of means assumed by the professional (TS 25 April 1994, AC 1994/3073 ; TS 11 February 1997, RAJ 1997/940). See also TS 7 May 1997, RAJ1997/3874. Courts have not yet reached a clear position on the causation problem which arises when the non-fulfilment of the duty to inform would not have changed the patient's intention. See as to this problem Dominguez Luelmo, Derecho sanitario y responsabilidad médica, 157 ff and Galán, Responsabilidad civil médica, 251 ff).

17. In SWEDEN patients are entitled to individually adapted information about their health condition and the treatment methods available. Compensation for a breach of the duty to inform is not possible under the PL if no compensation can be claimed for faulty treatment. Possibilities of compensation under the Tort Act are limited: cf NJA 1990, 442.

III. Obligation to inform about risks

18. In ENGLISH law it has been concluded that the physician must disclose all information about significant risks which the patient needs in order to determine which course he or she should adopt. (Lord Woolf MR in Pearce v. United Bristol Healthcare NHS Trust (1999) 48 BMLR 118; in the aftermath of the impact of Bolitho v. City and Hackney HA [1997] 4 All ER 771. Cf. Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 694.

19. In GERMANY a treatment provider must inform the patient about the risks of complications, side effects, and the consequences of failure if their seriousness can affect the decision of the patient whether or not to undergo treatment. Frequently materialising risks must be disclosed, as well as rarely materialising risks which could seriously affect that specific patient (BGH NJW 1980, 1333; BGHZ 77, 74, NJW 1980, 1901; BGH NJW 1992, 1241; Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 64).

20. Under the FINNISH act on Patient's Rights s. 5, a patient must be given information about his or her state of health, the significance of the treatment, various alternative forms of treatment and their effect and about other factors related to the patient's treatment that are significant when decisions are made. Healthcare professional should try to give the information in such a way that the patient can understand it. If the healthcare professionals do not know the language used by the patient or if the patient because of a sensory handicap or speech defect cannot be understood, interpretation should be provided if possible.

21. Under FRENCH law the obligation to inform covers the risks of the treatment: indeed this is usually the essence of this obligation. The Cour de cassation has ruled that a doctor must mention even risks whose materialisation is exceptional if the materialisation would involve serious consequences (Cass.civ I, 7 October 1998, JCP 1999.II.10179, concl. J. Sainte-Rose and note P. Sargos; CE Sect., 5 January 2000, Consorts Telle ; 5 January 2000, Assistance Publique-Hôpitaux de Paris, JCP 2000.II.10271, with note J. Moreau). This solution is now to be found in Article L. 1111-2 CSP. See, however, Pinna, Lex Medicinae 2004, p. 83.

22. The patient is entitled, under ITALIAN law, to be informed about the risks of the treatment offered (CFI Milano, 14 May 1998, Resp.civ. e prev. 1998, fasc. 6 (dicembre), p. 1625, with note of B. Magliona). The patient must be informed about serious potential dangers to his life deriving both from an intervention and a non-intervention. The obligation embraces foreseeable risks, not anomalous outcomes, which almost constitute a fortuitous event. The treatment provider has to find a balance between the obligation to give full information and the need to avoid putting a patient off the treatment merely because of some remote possibility. The obligation to inform includes also specific risks in determinate alternative choices. The patient, thanks to the technical-scientific help of the treatment provider, can opt for the one or the other, by means of a conscious evaluation of related risks and advantages (Alpa, Riv.it.med.leg. 1999, fasc. 1 (February), p. 30).

23. In THE NETHERLANDS the view is taken that to be able to make a sound decision, the patient needs to be informed about the normal, foreseeable risks of the treatment. Cf. Stolker, Aansprakelijkheid van de arts voor mislukte sterilisaties, p. 48; Sluyters, Gezondheidsrecht, ad CC art. 7:448, note 3. Generally speaking, the duty to inform is more stringent in the following situations: if the nature of the risk is more serious; if the general incidence-expectation of the risk is higher; if the intended procedure is of a lesser degree of urgency or necessity; if one or more alternatives exist; if the risk is less known to the public at large; if the materialisation of the risk can, under the given circumstances, be expected and if the treatment is experimental or irregular. Cf. Dekkers, De patiënt en het recht op informati, p. 119; taken from Sluyters and Biesaart, De geneeskundige behandelingsovereenkomst, p. 22; Legemaate, Verantwoordingsplicht en aansprakelijkheid in de gezondheidszorg, p. 100. There is no obligation to inform of risks which are public knowledge. Cf. Kastelein, TvG 1998, p. 138. With regard to the frequency of risks, an obligation to inform exists in any case where the chance of materialisation is over 5 per cent. Cf. Kastelein, TvG 1998, p. 138. Stolker, Aansprakelijkheid van de arts voor mislukte sterilisaties, p. 53 mentions percentages varying from 5 to 8 per cent. However, the trend is to lower the percentage below which no obligation to inform exists: Legemaate, Advocatenblad 1999, pp. 197-200, mentions a percentage of only 1 per cent. Moreover, the obligation also exists if materialisation of the risk would have radical consequences. Cf. Stolker, Aansprakelijkheid van de arts voor mislukte sterilisaties, p. 54. If the procedure is not medically necessary or experimental, the obligation to inform is far-reaching. It is also stricter if the patient indicates a wish not to run any risks or puts relevant questions to the doctor. Cf. Legemaate, Advocatenblad 1999, p. 98. In this respect, Barendrecht and Van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, no. 212, draw attention to the fact that most people are inclined to avert risks, even if materialisation of the risks is relatively rare. This suggests that there ought to be a duty to mention even small risks since people apparently are influenced profoundly by such information in deciding whether or not the give consent to a proposed treatment.

24. In POLAND the doctor is obliged to inform the patient, in an understandable way, about the risks connected with the treatment (The act on the profession of a doctor art. 31 para. 1), in order to allow the patient to make a well-informed decision about giving consent for the treatment (Judgment of the Supreme Court of 17. 12. 2004, II CK 303/04, OSP 2005, no. 131, poz. 11). If the risks are high the doctor is obliged to obtain written consent from the patient (art. 34 para. 1).

25. The treatment provider must inform the patient of serious risks as well as frequent risks of the proposed treatment under PORTUGUESE law. All significant risks must be disclosed, as well as the risks of delaying or refusing treatment. A risk is deemed significant if it is serious, frequent, unnecessary from a medical point of view, or if the attitude or physical characteristics of the patient increases the magnitude of the risk (obesity, addictions, heart problems, etc.) Cf. CA Lisboa, 4 July 1973; Dias Pereira, BFD LXXVI (2000), 446; Dias Pereira, O consentimento informado, p. 244; de Oliveira, O direito do diagnóstico pré-natal[2], 67; Figueiredo Dias (-Costa Andrade), Comentário conimbricense do Código Penal, art. 157, p. 397.

26. In SCOTTISH law the patient should be warned of the nature and extent of any substantial medical risk associated with the treatment (Moyes v Lothian Health Board 1990 SLT 444).

27. Doctrine and jurisprudence differentiate between typical and atypical risks under SPANISH law (TSJ Navarra 27 October 2001, RJ 2001/1079). In principle, only those risks which are foreseeable and which frequently materialise in a specific situation (typical risks) need to be disclosed. Risks which are unforeseeable or exceptional (atypical risks) need not be disclosed. However, there has been some criticism of this simplistic division on the ground that some risks which are not typical should be disclosed if they could influence the decision of the patient whether to continue the treatment or not. It has been held that in a highly risky operation the mother of the minor should have been informed accordingly (TS 23 April 1992 RJ 1992/3323). The absence of disclosure implies that the medical providers assumed the risks of the operation themselves. Cf. TS 25 April 1994, RJ 1994/3073, TS 11 February 1997, RJ 1997/940, TS 28 December 1998, RJ 1998/10164.

28. In SWEDEN the provisions in this area are intentionally vague, due to the fact that medical treatment always involves risks, and the duty to inform can thus lead to a situation of conflict between the doctor and the patient and hinder the doctor from giving adequate treatment (Johansson and Thoren, FS Sturkell, p. 136). Therefore the obligation to inform must be assessed on a case to case basis, taking into account the patient's views, the patient's state of health, the treatments available and the gravity of the disease. Even if the patient has not been sufficiently informed about risk, this does not automatically mean that he or she is entitled to compensation. Cf. RH 1999:115.

IV. Obligation to inform about alternatives

29. Under AUSTRIAN law there is no need to inform about all the possible alternatives; information about the adequate treatments and the pros and cons of those alternatives is sufficient. Cf. Dittrich and Tades, ABGB[35], art. 1299, E 234, 236). In practice some hospitals use illustrated information leaflets to inform their patients. These brochures describe and explain the different operations in detail. Then doctors discuss the issues raised in the leaflets one by one with their patients, offering a possibility for further questions. Finally, the patient declares by signing that he or she has understood the information and has been able to ask all the questions he or she wanted to. Thus, the leaflets serve a twofold purpose. First, they guarantee sufficient information. Secondly, doctors might use them as evidence in possible lawsuits.

30. In FRANCE the treatment provider is obliged to mention alternatives (CSP art. L. 1111-2). Specific case law on this issue was not found.

31. In principle, the physician has the freedom of choice of the treatment under GERMAN law (BGH NJW 1982, 2121 NJW 1988, 763; BGH NJW 1988, 1516). However, the less urgent the treatment is from a medical point of view, the more far-reaching is the obligation to inform. In this type of case, the obligation to inform may encompass alternatives to the proposed treatment. Cf. Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 64.

32. Under ITALIAN law the treatment provider has to tell the patient about the possible alternatives (art. 30 of the medical Deontological Code) in order to enable him or her to decide what is best. Even in case of grave error in the therapeutic process, the information provided to the patient has to be absolutely complete (Conti, Riv.it.med.leg 1998, fasc. 6 (December), I, 1171). This is essential, especially before taking further clinical decisions which may present dramatic alternatives.

33. In THE NETHERLANDS the doctor is obliged to mention all realistic alternatives, including those he or she personally does not favour. Cf. Legemaate, Verantwoordingsplicht en aansprakelijkheid in de gezondheidszorg, p. 100.

34. In POLAND the doctor has an obligation to inform about the available treatment methods and the predictable consequences of using them or not using them. (The act on the profession of a doctor, art. 31 para. 1).

35. The treatment provider must, under PORTUGUESE law, inform the patient about the availability and comparative advantages of alternatives to the proposed treatment: Figueiredo Dias (-Costa Andrade), Comentário conimbricense do Código Penal, art. 157, p. 458; Dias Pereira, O consentimento informado, p. 257.

36. In SCOTTISH law the patient should be informed of any other reasonably practicable options unless there are very clear medical reasons for denying the person that choice (Moyes v Lothian Health Board 1990 SLT 444).

37. In SPAIN too the patient should be informed about alternative treatments. See further, note 50 below.

38. In SWEDEN the treatment provider must inform the patient of any alternative treatment which is in accordance with medical science and reliable experience (HSL art. 3a).

V. Burden of proof

39. In AUSTRIA the burden of proving that the patient has been given sufficient information is on the provider. Cf. (Dittrich and Tades, ABGB[35], § 1299, E 239, 240). The provider can prove either that the patient was sufficiently informed or that he or she would have consented to the treatment anyway. That demonstration is subject to quite strict requirements. However, the patient has to demonstrate that he or she would have been faced with a serious conflict of decisions if informed properly. It is not sufficient that he or she simply argues that the treatment would have been rejected.

40. Breach of the duty to inform is irrelevant to compensation of injury under the DANISH PF. All relevant information and evidence is acquired ex officio by the Patient Insurance Consortium.

41. In negligence the client bears the burden of proof, according to standard rules of civil procedure under ENGLISH law. In the tort of battery, the position is unclear, see Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 582, stating that consent as a defence to battery should be proved by the defendant and supporting that view with case law from various Commonwealth countries.

42. Breach of the duty to inform is irrelevant to compensation of injury under the FINNISH PSL. All relevant information and evidence is acquired ex officio by the Patient Insurance Consortium.

43. Under FRENCH law it is up to the treatment provider to prove that the obligation to inform was duly performed (Cass.civ I, 25 February 1997, Bull.civ. I, no. 75, Defr. 1997, p. 751, CCC 1997 no. 76, with obs. L. Leveneur, RTD civ 1997, p. 924; CE Sect., 5 January 2000, Consorts Telle; 5 January 2000, Assistance Publique-Hôpitaux de Paris, JCP 2000.II.10271, with note J. Moreau). This view had previously been proposed by Fabre-Magnan, who asserted that the obligation of information was an obligation of result Cf. De l´obligation d´information dans les contrats, nos. 541 ff. The opposite solution would have obliged the patient to prove a negative fact, the lack of information, which is almost impossible to do. The solution now favoured has a very strong preventive role, instigating the doctor to effectively perform the obligation to inform. It is up to the patient to prove the damage suffered, but in practice this does not lead to serious problems. It is also up to the patient to prove causation. A lack of information is the cause of the damage only if the victim proves that, had he or she been correctly informed, the treatment would have been refused, because the victim has to prove beyond doubt that the damage would not have occurred. Of course this fact is most of the time impossible to prove. To protect the patient and compensate the damage, the case law appeals to the theory of the loss of a chance (perte d´une chance). The Cour de cassation does not require the proof of the performance of the obligation to inform by a written act and says that this proof can be done by any means, even by testimony (Cass.civ I, 29 May 1984, Bull.civ. I, no. 179; Cass.civ I, 4 April 1995, D. 1995. I.R. p. 120; and after the reversal of the line of the case law concerning the burden of proof, Cass.civ I, 14 October 1997, Bull.civ. I, no. 278; JCP 1997.II.22942, rapp. Sargos; RTD civ 1998, 100, obs. J. Mestre; RDSS 1998, 68, note Harichaux). It is obvious that in the absence of a written document it will be very difficult for the provider to prove the performance of the obligation. Such rules are now codified in Article L. 1111-2 CSP (On this issue, see Pinna, The Obligations to Inform and to Advise, nos. 158-165).

44. In GERMAN law the physician bears the burden of proof that he or she disclosed all the relevant information to the patient, and that the patient consented to the treatment (BGH NJW 1992, 2351).

45. The burden of proof falls on the provider of the service under ITALIAN law. The doctor has to prove that he or she informed the patient in a complete and exhaustive way about all risks connected to the treatment.

46. In principle, in THE NETHERLANDS, the burden of proof lies on the client. In cases where the client has to prove a negative fact – the non-receipt of certain information, the courts may decide that the provider of the service is under a duty to substantiate the claim that the information was given. In the case of treatment contracts, the situation is slightly different. From CC art. 7:466 para. 2 it follows that consent to treatment is presumed to have been given if the treatment is a ‘minor procedure’.

Giesen, Bewijslastverdeling, p. 37, correctly concludes from this provision that in other situations consent may not be presumed to have been given and must be proved to have been given. From that it follows that the burden of proof is on the doctor: he or she will have to prove that informed consent has been given. Distributing the burden of proof in another way would deprive CC art. 7:466, para. 2, of its meaning, Giesen argues. However, consent may sometimes be tacitly implied, cf. Rb Rotterdam 20 August 1993, NedJur 1995, 18 (Algemeen Psychiatrisch Ziekenhuis 'De Grote Rivieren'/X). With regard to the causal link between the breach of the duty to inform and the damage, in principle, the burden of proof lies on the client. Cf. Giesen, Bewijslastverdeling, p. 49; Barendrecht and Van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, nos. 446-447. For medical cases, it is, however, accepted that the patient would have acted upon the information or advice, especially if the illness was life-threatening and an effective cure is available. In other words, the German doctrine of 'Entscheidungskonflikt' is more or less adopted. As regards the proof of the damage that is caused by the breach of the duty to inform, the Hoge Raad is more restrictive. It recently decided that the duty to inform is meant to enable the patient to make an informed decision on whether or not to consent to the suggested treatment. A breach of that duty brings the risk that the patient cannot exercise the right to self-determination, i.e. the risk that the patient makes a choice he or she would not have made otherwise. The duty to inform is therefore not as such meant to protect the patient from the occurrence of a medical risk, but (only) to prevent the risk of the loss of the opportunity to properly choose. Cf. HR 23 November 2001, case C99/259HR, Landelijke Jurisprudentienummer (LJN) AB 2737, and case C00/069HR, LJN AD 3963, published on www.rechtspraak.nl.

47. In POLAND the burden of proof that the required information has been provided lies on the doctor. The Supreme Court has clearly stated that in its judgment of 17. 12. 2004 (II CK 303/04, OSP 2005, no. 131, poz. 11.) The doctor should prove not only that the information was given to the patient, but also that it complied with the statutory requirements.

48. The healthcare provider bears the burden of proof of information and consent under the PORTUGUESE CC art. 340 para. 2; Dias Pereira, BFD LXXVI (2000), 454; Figueiredo Dias and Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade médica na europa ocidental, p. 39; Figueiredo Dias (-Costa Andrade), Comentário conimbricense do Código Penal, art. 157, p. 458).

49. In SCOTLAND the onus of proof is on the treatment provider to establish that the patient consented in cases of assault (treatment without patient's consent); but in negligence claims in general the onus is on the patient to establish the grounds of the action; the treatment provider may be able to defend it by proving that information was provided and consent given (Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, para. 249).

50. The medical service provider must prove compliance with the obligation to inform under SPANISH law (TS 28 December 1998, RJ 1998/10164; TS 13 April 1999, RJ 1999/2583 and TS 19 April 1999, RJ 1999/2588). The medical provider possesses the information, thus it is easier for him or her to prove that the information was given than for the patient to prove the negative. Cf TS 31 July 1996, RJ 1996/6084. The obligation to inform the patient must be performed prior to obtaining his or her consent to the treatment and should include: the information about the consequences, the typical risks, the risks related to the personal or professional life of the patient and the contra-indications of the intervention (art. 10 of the Patient's Autonomy Statute).

51. The duty to inform is not essential for obtaining damages under SWEDISH law, as mentioned above. Therefore there is not much information available on this topic. However in NJA 1990 p. 442 and in RH 1999:115, the courts found a breach of the duty to inform, mainly because the doctors could not say for sure that they had informed the patients sufficiently. A long time had passed and the doctors had performed many operations and could therefore not tell exactly how they had informed the patients. The courts therefore followed the patients' opinion that they had not been properly informed. However, in disciplinary rulings the patient has the burden of proving the lack of information. See Hedman, Ansvar och ersättning vid medicinsk verksamhet, p. 58 f. The patient always has to prove the damage. See here the reasoning of the court Cf. RH 1999:115, where the court dismissed the patient's statement that he would not have gone through with the operation, considering the seriousness of his medical condition and the low probability of complications.

IV.C.–8:106: Obligation to inform in case of unnecessary or experimental treatment

(1) If the treatment is not necessary for the preservation or improvement of the patient's health, the treatment provider must disclose all known risks.

(2) If the treatment is experimental, the treatment provider must disclose all information regarding the objectives of the experiment, the nature of the treatment, its advantages and risks and the alternatives, even if only potential.

(3) The parties may not, to the detriment of the patient, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article describes the extent of the obligation to inform when experimental or unnecessary treatment is concerned. Experimental treatment consists in treatment which is still in a research stage and may be of benefit to the patient, treatment which departs from approved practice and may be of benefit to the patient or treatment of a kind which has not been yet fully developed and does not meet the standard of approved medical practice. In this type of treatment, there are unexpected risks as the treatment technique is still in an experimental stage or its risks are not yet fully known.

Illustration 1
A patient suffering from an incurable illness is invited to participate in the clinical trial of a drug that has not yet been tested before on humans. This drug can potentially have a beneficial effect on the patient. This is a case of experimental treatment.

A patient suffering from cancer is informed that there is a novel technique, not yet fully tested, that can potentially be life-saving. This is also a situation of experimental treatment.

Unnecessary treatment here means treatment which is not intended to improve the physical health of the patient; it is rather treatment which a patient can choose to have for other reasons. Examples might be plastic surgery, sterilisation or active organ donation. This does not mean, however, that such treatment may not have therapeutic effects from a medical point of view.

A 23-year-old woman had a car accident, and as a result acquired severe burns on her cheeks. Two years after the accident, the woman consults a plastic surgeon to have the burns removed. This is a case of unnecessary treatment, in the sense that there is no reason, from a strictly medical point of view, for the woman to undergo surgery.

This illustration shows how difficult it is to define the term 'unnecessary treatment', as having the burns removed may have a positive effect on a person's mental health, as the appearance of the burns may have caused loss of self-confidence as well as adverse social circumstances detrimental to the woman's mental health.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Patients are particularly in need of protection in experimental treatments. Thus, there is a need of a reinforced information regime. The argument here is that two cost-benefit analyses are to be made, not just one. The first concerns the personal risk-benefit assessment, i.e. the balance between the potential benefits to the patient's health and the risks involved in the experimental treatment. The second is the 'altruistic' risk-benefit analysis, i.e. the balance between the benefits to medicine and other patients and the risks the patient will run. The patient undergoing experimental treatment has an interest in being informed about the nature of the experimental treatment, the relevance of the trial to medical science and the potential benefit, if any, to his or her health. It is also important for the patient to be informed about the possibility of being placed in the control group if there is one, i.e. a group that will be administered a placebo instead of the drug being tried. The patient has also a manifest interest in being informed about any health risks in the experiment. On the other hand, it may be in the medical researcher's interest to disclose as little information as possible for research secrecy's sake.

> A patient suffering from an incurable illness is invited to participate in the clinical trial of a drug that has not been tested before on humans. The patient will be interested in being informed about the nature and objective of the experiment, the risks involved in the experimental treatment, the potential benefits to his health as well as to the advance of medicine, and the chances that he will be assigned to the control group, and thus will not be exposed to the risks nor enjoy the potential benefits of the trial. On the other hand, the researcher and the promoter of the experimental treatment will not want to disclose too much information on the technical and scientific aspects of the experimental treatment.

In relation to novel treatment techniques, the patient will be interested not only in the normal information as regards the proposed treatment, but also in information on alternatives and on the risks involved in such techniques. The patient needs information to enable him or her to ascertain whether the benefits of the novel treatment technique outweigh its risks compared to the risks and benefits of treatment techniques already accepted by medical practice.

It is often argued that, in unnecessary treatment, the duty to inform is more stringent as there is no urgency in its performance and it differs from the risk-benefit analysis in normal medical treatment where, if all risks are disclosed and regardless of the low probability of their materialisation, there is a possibility that the patient overestimates that risk vis-à-vis the potential benefits of the treatment needed. It is argued that if treatment is unnecessary from a strictly medical point of view, all risks should be disclosed as the patient has the option of foregoing treatment without significant detriment to his or her health. This is the necessity criterion, pushing for a specific, more stringent duty to inform. Likewise, according to the urgency criterion, the absence of any need for immediate treatment means that there is plenty of time for protracted decision making and engaging in a more thorough risk–benefit assessment.

C. Preferred option

Like the laws of all the countries analysed, the Article opts for requiring fuller disclosure in the case of experimental or unnecessary treatment. This Article adapts the intensity of the duty to inform of the preceding Article to circumstances where the treatment to be performed is experimental (including in this term novel techniques not yet fully tested) or is unnecessary from a strictly medical point of view. The rule in this Article is mandatory in favour of the patient (paragraph (3).

NOTES

I. Overview

1. If treatment is of an experimental nature, the patient must be informed of the experimental nature of the treatment and given an explanation of the potential risks. In ENGLAND, lack of information about the experimental nature of the treatment renders the treatment provider liable in the tort of battery. In GERMANY, ITALY, FRANCE and SPAIN the duty to inform is more stringent, including an exhaustive disclosure of the risks, as well as information on the aims and benefits of the clinical trial. In addition, in Germany the patient must be informed about the cost-benefit analysis and of the existence of compulsory insurance. In PORTUGAL, where strict liability exists, full disclosure is demanded. In France, if the treatment is unnecessary from a strictly medical point of view, the treatment provider must fully disclose to the patient all potential risks, no matter how minor they are. Similarly, in Germany, the less urgent or needed treatment is, the more extensive is the information to be disclosed.

II. Obligation to inform in case of unnecessary and experimental treatment

2. Under ENGLISH law, if a patient undergoes experimental treatment, he or she must be informed of this. Otherwise the treatment provider will be held liable under the tort of battery. Cf. Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 1710.

3. According to the FRENCH CSP art. L.1122-1, the patient must give express written consent to an experimental treatment. This article also details the particular information which the patient must receive. Concerning unnecessary treatment, such as cosmetic surgery, case law holds that the patient must receive complete disclosure of all risks involved, even if the consequence of their realisation is minor and the frequency of their realisation is exceptional. Cass.civ I, 17 February 1998, Bull.civ. I, no. 67; RTD civ 1998, 681 Jourdain, for a case stating that the inconveniences of the cosmetic treatment must also be disclosed.

4. Under GERMAN law the patient must be informed of the experimental nature of treatment and its risks, as well as of the regime of the compulsory insurance. Data on the objective of the experiment, such as its benefits to the community and a risk-benefit assessment must be disclosed (Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], nos. 65, 130). Both in experimental and unnecessary treatment, the scope of the duty to inform is more far reaching the less urgent the treatment is, according to the Kriterium der Dringlichkeit (BGH NJW 1982, 2121; Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 64).

5. In ITALY as regards experimental treatments, the patient has to give consent in writing in a free and conscious way, after prior and exhaustive information not only on the aims, benefits, and connected risks, but also on the patient's right to withdraw consent at any stage.

6. If the procedure is of an experimental nature, the duty to inform is more stringent than normal under DUTCH law. Cf. Legemaate, Verantwoordingsplicht en aansprakelijkheid in de gezondheidszorg, p. 100.

7. There are special rules in POLISH law concerning the obligation to inform in the case of an experimental treatment (The act on the profession of a doctor, art. 24). Before the treatment, the patient should be informed about the aims and methods of the experiment, the expected benefits, the risks and the possibility of withdrawing at any stage (art. 24 para. 1). The doctor is obliged to inform the patient if an immediate disruption of the experiment could cause danger for the health or life of the participant (art. 24 para. 2). The participant must consent in writing (art. 25).

8. Full disclosure is compulsory in PORTUGUESE law. Strict liability is imposed in the case of experimental treatment, covered by compulsory insurance (DL 97/94, 9/4 art. 14/1,). Cf. de Oliveira, O direito do diagnóstico pré-natal[2], p. 199.

9. The matter has not been directly considered in SCOTTISH law but it is thought that in principle the patient should be informed and have given consent before experimental treatment would be lawful (Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, pares 243, 246-248).

10. The SPANISH Act 29/2006 on Medicines (Ley del Medicamento), arts. 58-62 relates to the experimental investigation of a substance or medicine, when applied to human beings, in order to find its appropriateness for future medical treatments. Art. 60 para. 4 requires the prior consent (in writing or in front of witnesses) of the patient, after being given information about the nature, importance and risks of the experiment. The medical treatment provider must ensure that the patient understands the information provided. Moreover, the patient's consent may be revoked at any time, without any obligation to justify it. In the case of persons who are not able to consent, permission must be given by their legal representatives, although it will also be necessary to obtain the consent of the person under representation if this person is able to comprehend the importance and risks of the experiment. By Royal Decree 223/2004 the requirements for clinical testing experiments are further developed. Any damage caused to the patient subject to the experimental investigation during the treatment or in one year after it finishes, must be indemnified, even when no negligence or fault is found (art. 8 RD 223/2004 and Gómez Jara, La responsabilidad profesional sanitaria, p. 139)

IV.C.–8:107: Exceptions to the obligation to inform

(1) Information which would normally have to be provided by virtue of the obligation to inform may be withheld from the patient:

(a) if there are objective reasons to believe that it would seriously and negatively influence the patient's health or life; or

(b) if the patient expressly states a wish not to be informed, provided that the non-disclosure of the information does not endanger the health or safety of third parties.

(2) The obligation to inform need not be performed where treatment must be provided in an emergency. In such a case the treatment provider must, so far as possible, provide the information later.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article covers the exceptions to the obligation to inform. The first exception, in paragraph (1)(a), is the so-called therapeutic exception. In some circumstances, disclosure to a patient may result in serious consequences for his or her life, health and treatment. For example, the truth may, given the patient's known disposition, cause a dangerous shock liable to provoke mental instability.

A patient is suffering from a severe cardiac disease. She needs to undergo bypass surgery. The situation is very delicate, and any shock or strong emotion entails the risk of a fatal stroke. The treatment provider decides to withhold information from the patient about her health status and to perform surgery. This is a situation of therapeutic exception to the duty to inform.

It should be noted that the therapeutic exception will not, by its very nature, apply in the case of the information required to be disclosed under IV.C.–8:106 (Obligation to inform in the case of unnecessary or experimental treatment).

The second exception, in paragraph (1)(b), concerns the 'right not to know'. Respect for the patient's autonomy implies that the patient has the right to decline to be informed, unless disclosure is necessary in order to protect the health status of third parties or the public interest, as is often the case with genetic and infectious diseases.

A patient is admitted to a hospital, suspected of having cancer. The patient states expressly that he does not want to be informed of anything; he just wants to be treated in whatever way the treatment provider finds most appropriate. The patient is entitled not to be informed.

Paragraph (2) of this Article provides for yet another exception. If, owing to an emergency or temporary mental impairment of the patient, it is impossible to inform him or her and if it is not possible to obtain informed consent from someone entitled to take decisions on the patient's behalf, treatment may be carried out. However, the treatment provider must inform the patient (as required by IV.C.–8:105 (Obligation to inform)) as soon as possible. Subsequent treatment depends on renewed information and consent.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The therapeutic exception is a debated topic. According to the Hippocratic paradigm, the patient had but a passive role in treatment, being guided blindfolded as it were by the physician throughout treatment. No information whatsoever was provided, as it would only harm and confuse the patient. As health care became more easily accessible in developed countries and patients became better informed, this paradigm started to collapse in the twentieth century and the principle of patient autonomy developed.

It is often argued that no information should be withheld from the patient, as it enhances the patient's autonomy and self-determination. However, the role of the mind and suggestion in the success of treatment should not be underestimated; according to psychology, information can needlessly interfere with treatment or cause needless suffering. However, empirical studies suggest that treatment providers often abuse the vagueness of the therapeutic exception to shirk the duty to inform the patient. Other specialists argue that the therapeutic exception should only exist in so far as the life or health of the patient is at risk, and even then only in very serious circumstances, such as psychiatric or cardiac illnesses where the impact of the information might lead to shock causing the patient's death or serious deterioration of the patient's state of health.

On the one hand, the autonomy of the patient demands that health care professionals inform patients adequately. On the other hand health-care professionals, owing to the time and effort needed to provide information, professional pride and other cultural and economic factors, are reluctant to inform the patient. This 'tug-of-war' explains the tendency of treatment providers to evade the burden of providing information by invoking the therapeutic exception freely.

The right not to know is another corollary of patient autonomy. The decision of the patient not to want to know must be respected. It is argued that the treatment provider is allowed to disclose information to the patient against the patient's will if otherwise the health of third parties or public health would be jeopardised.

> A patient is diagnosed as having hepatitis B after being admitted to hospital because of a persistent flu and yellow skin. The patient declares she does not want to be informed, invoking her right not to know. As hepatitis B can be transmitted through sexual intercourse, the attending physician decides to inform the patient nevertheless in order to protect the health of the patient's sex partner or partners.

In situations where the patient is unconscious and treatment must be performed immediately, it is not possible to provide information. The literature and case law overwhelmingly agree that informing the patient can be deferred to a later time.

C. Preferred option

The preferred option is that the therapeutic exception under paragraph (1)(a) should only be invoked if the treatment provider has very serious and decisive arguments to support it, in situations where the information would have a negative impact on the patient's life or health. This is especially the case with cardiac or mental diseases, where the shock and emotional stress resulting from the information might entail serious risks to the life or health of the patient. It should be noted, however, that the information should not be withheld from the patient's close family or parties authorised to take decisions on the patient's behalf. Another limit to the therapeutic exception is that it no longer applies when the objective circumstances on which the decision to withhold information from the patient was based cease to exist. In this case, the patient should be informed a posteriori.

The right not to know – paragraph (1)(b) – is recognised in so far as the lives, health and safety of third parties as well as public interest are not endangered by non-disclosure. The justification for this option lies in the autonomy of the patient.

Finally, if a patient is not able to consent to urgent treatment owing to unconsciousness or sensory impairment, the provision of information can be postponed until a later time when the patient is able to receive it, after treatment. People or institutions legally entitled to take decisions on behalf of the patient should be promptly informed. This is justified by practical considerations and it is a preliminary condition for consent to be given, as follows from IV.C.–8:108 (Obligation not to treat without consent) paragraph (3).

D. Burden of proof

The treatment provider will have to prove that exceptions to the obligation to inform existed and, in the case of paragraph (1)(a), to substantiate the existence of the objective conditions leading to the decision to withhold information under the therapeutic exception.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. The doctrine of therapeutic exception is not recognized in ENGLAND, as treatment providers are allowed to exercise appropriate discretion while choosing which information to disclose, according to the information that would be disclosed by a reasonable average treatment provider. In AUSTRIA, FRANCE, PORTUGAL and SCOTLAND treatment providers can withhold information from the patients, if that information would be detrimental to the health or life of the patient. The same principle applies in GERMANY, GREECE and SWEDEN, though the therapeutic exception only applies in exceptional cases and is interpreted in a very strict fashion. In THE NETHERLANDS the therapeutic exception is accepted if the information would cause serious detrimental consequence to the patient, but the physician must consult with another physician in order to ascertain whether or not to disclose that information to the patient. Finally, in SPAIN, if the treatment provider invokes the therapeutic exception, the family of the patient should be informed instead of the patient.

II. Therapeutic exception

2. AUSTRIAN case law indicates that the extent to which a doctor has to inform the patient has to be assessed against the well-being of the patient in the first place. Only afterwards do considerations as to the right to self-determination come into play. It follows from that that the doctor has to evaluate the patient's personality in order to establish whether there is a risk of unsettling the patient. Such a risk might lead to a rejection of the treatment and ultimately to severe adverse consequences. Applying those considerations to very timid persons could even lead to minimum information of risks. The new understanding of the duty to inform leads to another issue worth discussing: the dangers inherent in giving too detailed information to the patient. Even though that might sound absurd at first sight the arguments put forward do make sense. A patient might be made insecure by the overflow of information and might not be willing to consent to an operation for fear of remote consequences mentioned by the doctor. That in return burdens the doctor with a nearly impossible mission: on the one hand to inform about all the typical risks and on the other to convince the patient to consent to the treatment.

3. The doctrine of therapeutic privilege is not necessary in ENGLAND, as the doctor is allowed to exercise appropriate discretion in choosing what information to disclose (Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 701).

4. According to the FINNISH Act on Patient's Rights s. 5 information must not be given against the will of the patient or when it is obvious that it would cause serious hazard to the life or health of the patient.

5. Under FRENCH law, the Code of medical ethics (Decree 6 November 1995, art. 35(2) and (3)) allows the doctor to conceal a bad diagnosis or prognosis if the recovery of the patient requires it. More precisely it is ruled that, in the interest of the patient and for legitimate reasons, a patient can be kept in ignorance of a serious diagnosis or a prognosis, with the exception of those diseases which involve a risk of infection. A fatal prognosis cannot be revealed without circumspection but a person close to the patient must be informed, unless the patient has forbidden this in advance.

6. In GERMANY the treatment provider can only withhold information on the basis of the therapeutic exception, and then exceptionally, if that information can seriously endanger the life or health of the patient. The case law of the BGH is very strict and inflexible on this issue. Cf. Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 65; BGHZ 29, 46, 56 = NJW 1959, 811 = JR 1959, 418; BGHZ 29, 176, 182.

7. A therapeutic exception is possible depending on the particular circumstances of the case under GREEK law. Though there seems to be strong evidence to support an unmistakable obligation of the doctor to inform and an equivalent right of the patient to be fully informed, there also seems to exist space for a therapeutic exception. This can be the case where from all the circumstances it becomes clear that to inform the patient would either result to a significant deterioration in the patient's health or render the treatment ineffective. This may be the case particularly in psychological treatment. In cases of physical treatment, one could envisage such an exception only in very limited circumstances.

8. The therapeutic exception is accepted in THE NETHERLANDS (CC art. 7:448, para. 3). However, the exception is restricted to cases where the information would clearly have serious detrimental effects for the patient. Before withholding the information the doctor must consult another doctor. If this is in the patient‘s interest, the provider of the service needs to give the information to a person other than the patient. The information is given to the patient as soon as the detrimental effects subside. The need to consult another doctor has met with criticism in legal doctrine, e.g. Sluyters and Biesaart, De geneeskundige behandelingsovereenkomst, p. 28.

9. In POLAND, in exceptional situations, when the prognosis is bad for the patient, the doctor may limit the information about the patient's health and the prognosis, if according to the doctor's judgement not revealing the information is in the best interest of the patient. In such a case the doctor should inform the statutory guardian of the patient or a person nominated by the patient to receive the information. However, on a request of the patient the doctor is obliged to give the patient the required information (art. 31 para. 4). In such a case the patient's right to information prevails over the judgement of the doctor about what is beneficial for the patient.

10. Therapeutic privilege can be invoked as a defence under PORTUGUESE law in so far as disclosure would have been clearly harmful to the patient (de Oliveira, O direito do diagnóstico pré-natal[2], p. 97). This is the case when disclosure would be a risk to the life of the patient, or would cause serious damage to physical or psychical health (CP art. 157, this provision is used in the civil law). Dias Pereira, O consentimento informado, 290 holds that therapeutic privilege should be interpreted in a restrictive way and recognised only when some cardiac or psychiatric illness could be aggravated by disclosure.

11. SCOTTISH law has long recognised a principle of therapeutic privilege 'albeit in a low profile way' (Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, para. 263). Cases accept that it may in exceptional situations be sound medical practice not to subject a patient to alarm, anxiety or distress if that would render the treatment more difficult. But it seems not to go so far as to allow the treatment provider to substitute his or her judgement for the patient's.

12. In SPAIN if the information could cause grave damage to the health of the patient, the doctor is relieved from the obligation to inform, but not from the obligation to inform the patient's family, close friends or legal representative (Patient's Autonomy Statute, art. 5.4). In such situations, the provider is confronted with a conflict between the patient's right to health and the right to freedom. The former prevails (Cervilla Garzón, La prestación de Servicios Profesionales, p. 49). However, this conclusion cannot be presumed when the patient is in a terminal situation (diagnóstico fatal). The doctor is obliged to inform the patient about the terminal situation unless the patient has expressly indicated a wish not to be informed about it or unless the information could cause serious damage to the health of the patient or could endanger the treatment (Peces, Cuadernos de Derecho Judicial, 1994 T. XVIII, p. 128; Sánchez Caro, La Ley 1993 (3), pp. 946 ff). If the patient expresses a wish not to be informed, this wish should be respected. Nevertheless, this right is limited by the characteristics of the case, the treatment and the interest of the third parties. Therefore, a patient's wish not be informed should be respected, but a consent to treatment should be obtained anyway (art. 9.1 Patient's Autonomy Statute). Spanish law lacks provisions on the need for information in case of emergency, as it could be included in the cases when the patient's health may be damaged. However, art. 9.2 of Patient's Autonomy Statute expressly relieves the doctor from seeking the consent of the patient to proceed with the treatment in case of emergency.

13. In some rare cases information can be kept from the patient in SWEDEN if it would counteract the treatment. According to the Ethical Council the right to self-determination for the patient is very important, but more important is life itself.

IV.C.–8:108: Obligation not to treat without consent

(1) The treatment provider must not carry out treatment unless the patient has given prior informed consent to it.

(2) The patient may revoke consent at any time.

(3) In so far as the patient is incapable of giving consent, the treatment provider must not carry out treatment unless:

(a) informed consent has been obtained from a person or institution legally entitled to take decisions regarding the treatment on behalf of the patient; or

(b) any rules or procedures enabling treatment to be lawfully given without such consent have been complied with; or

(c) the treatment must be provided in an emergency.

(4) In the situation described in paragraph (3), the treatment provider must not carry out treatment without considering, so far as possible, the opinion of the incapable patient with regard to the treatment and any such opinion expressed by the patient before becoming incapable.

(5) In the situation described in paragraph (3), the treatment provider may carry out only such treatment as is intended to improve the health condition of the patient.

(6) In the situation described in paragraph (2) of IV.C.–8:106 (Obligation to inform in case of unnecessary or experimental treatment), consent must be given in an express and specific way.

(7) The parties may not, to the detriment of the patient, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article deals with one of the obligations of the treatment provider under a contract for the provision of treatment. It therefore presupposes the existence of such a contract. The obligation is a negative one but a crucially important one – not to carry out treatment without the informed consent of the patient. The obligation is a corollary to the obligation to inform. There would be no point in giving the patient all the required information if treatment could then be imposed on the patient in any event. The obligation protects the patient's right to self-determination. It is such a self-evident obligation in cases involving capable and conscious patients that it is difficult to think of examples where it would be deliberately ignored.

Having concluded a contract for the treatment of his prostate cancer, a patient is informed that there is a 10 per cent chance of impotence after prostate surgery. The patient decides not to have surgery but to have drug treatment instead. It is obvious that the treatment provider cannot proceed with surgery without the patient's consent.

The contractual obligation not to proceed without the informed consent of the patient is reinforced by the fact that there would usually be non-contractual and possibly criminal liability for invading a person's bodily integrity without that person's consent. Here, however, we are concerned only with the contractual obligation.

Another issue covered by this Article is the right of the patient to withdraw consent at any time (paragraph (2)). Even if the patient has previously provided consent for treatment, and treatment has already started, the patient can decide to withdraw consent at any given time. Consent does not usually require a specific form and may be withdrawn freely at any time (CHRB art. 5 (General Rule)). This is a corollary of patient autonomy: regardless of the consequences, the directions of the patient must be followed.

After prostate surgery, it appears that the patient has prostate cancer. He consents to radiotherapy and chemotherapy – which prove to have nasty side effects. After two months of reduced life quality due to constant discomfort because of vomiting, nausea, hair loss, etc., the patient decides to withdraw his consent to these treatments. He is free to do so.

The rule also deals with circumstances where the patient is not able to express consent (paragraph (3)); in such a case, a third party entitled to decide on behalf of the patient may give consent to the treatment. Depending upon the legal system concerned, this third party may be the parent of a minor, a guardian, a family counsellor or an administrative or judicial body. Specific procedures may exist in some jurisdictions. Also treatment may be given without consent or going through the necessary procedural steps if the treatment must be provided in an emergency. However, in all these cases the wishes of an incapable patient must be taken into account so far as possible, as well as any views expressed by the patient prior to the onset of incapacity. Such views may have been expressed in a formal document such as an advance Directive. Paragraph (5) provides that, if a third party must give consent on behalf of an incompetent patient, this consent can only be given to necessary treatment, not to optional or unnecessary treatment. Only treatment necessary to improve the health situation of the incompetent patient is allowed.

A 12-year-old child has an illness that can be treated by surgery. There are some risks involved, but also substantial benefits. Under the relevant national law it is up to the child's parents to give consent, but at this age the child already can understand the question and decide. In some jurisdictions, it can be necessary for a court or another judicial or administrative body to make the decision on behalf of the incompetent patient. The opinion of the incompetent patient must be taken into account, though it is not binding.

Advance Directives, so-called living wills and previously expressed wishes must be taken into account whenever the patient will no longer be able to provide, or withdraw, consent to treatment. A patient can issue a set of instructions containing its preferences regarding its self-determination in case it loses at a later moment the capacity to decide Cf. CHRB art. 9 (Previously Expressed Wishes).

Before undergoing a very delicate and high-risk operation, a patient declares that he refuses to be given life support if, as a consequence of the operation, he falls into a coma which appears to be permanent. The treatment provider must bear this preference in mind when deciding what to do.

The Article establishes a specific, more stringent regime for experimental treatment in paragraph (6), establishing that consent must be expressed and specific.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The patient has the right, derived from his or her autonomy, to have treatment performed only in so far as he or she consented to it. Likewise, it is in the treatment provider's best interests to obtain consent, usually in the form of a document, in order to have a defence in the case of potential malpractice claims in the future. There is no controversy regarding the necessity of the patient's consent to treatment in normal circumstances.

The interests of patients who lack the capacity, because of either a permanent or temporary impediment, to decide and give consent must be safeguarded, as they are vulnerable. From a bioethics point of view, they should be given extended protection in order to prevent abuse or mistreatment: the treatment should be carried out only for their direct benefit (see CHRB arts. (Protection of persons not able to consent) and 7 (Protection of persons who have a mental disorder). Direct benefit will consist in treatment that will, from an objective medical point of view, improve or maintain the state of health of the vulnerable patient, thus excluding optional or unnecessary treatment such as cosmetic surgery or sterilisation. Treatments such as euthanasia should not be allowed. This may, however, be too restrictive in end of life situations (e.g. dysthanasia), and so the rule should be open-ended enough to encompass the latest developments in bioethics.

> A patient has been in a coma for a long period. He is kept alive by means of a life-support system. There are no reasonable prospects for recovery. Should this patient be kept on artificial life support for the rest of his life? This poses a complex ethical and legal problem. It is usually decided by the ethics committee of a hospital.
> A 15-year-old girl is prescribed the contraceptive pill. Such treatment can be considered unnecessary from a medical point of view.

In situations where the incompetent patient is not totally unable to understand the information provided, and to process it and decide on the basis of it, the accepted view in bioethics is that his or her wish or opinion be taken into account. A problematic issue is, however, the extent to which the opinion of such patients should be taken into account. Recorded statements of the patient's wishes before the onset of incapacity pose the same problems.

It is also accepted in bioethics that consent to scientific research must be given expressly and specifically, and be documented (CHRB art.16 (v) (Protection of persons undergoing Research)). Consent should not be implied; it must be specific as regards that particular type of experimental treatment and be adequately documented in the clinical records, preferably in the patient's handwriting. It may, however, be argued that the requirement of written consent is too formal from a contract law point of view. Competent patients should be able to give their consent to clinical trials according to more stringent conditions aimed at protecting them.

Finally, there is a controversy about the right of the patient to refuse or withdraw from treatment. On the one hand, the patient's autonomy and right to self-determination should not be jeopardised. On the other hand, it is argued that the mission of the health-care provider is to heal, and therefore to impose treatment on the patient against his or her will if treatment will benefit the patient. So it is often argued by health-care practitioners and some sectors in society that treatment providers should override irrational, potentially self-destructive decisions of the patient which would be contrary to any objective medical recommendation.

C. Preferred option

Whenever capable patients are concerned, it is broadly accepted that their consent is essential for the treatment to be performed upon them. This is obviously right. So the general principle in paragraph (1) establishes that the treatment provider has an obligation not to perform treatment unless the patient has expressed his or her consent, after being provided with the necessary information. The expression of consent is the final phase of informed consent, and establishes the informed choice of the patient regarding treatment.

Consent does not require a specific form, and it can be withdrawn at any time (paragraph (2)) irrespective of whether, from an objective medical point of view, the decision is wrong or irrational. Although withdrawal may have a serious detrimental impact on the patient's health, this position is the only one coherent with the patient's right to self-determination in health matters. This right to withdraw from or to refuse treatment can, however, be limited by lex specialis of a public law nature in particular situations, such as compulsory vaccination, mental health regulations, compulsory treatment of highly infectious diseases which pose a public health problem (tuberculosis, leprosy, SARS, etc.) and other circumstances where the public interest prevails over individual rights.

According to paragraph (3), if the patient is incapable of giving consent, persons or institutions legally entitled to take decisions on behalf of the patient may give consent instead. Consent is to be given according to local rules and procedures applicable to such situations. Treatment may always provided where this is necessary in an emergency. In so far as the patient has a limited ability to understand the circumstances in which treatment is to be performed, the patient's views and opinion about the treatment must be, so far as possible, be taken into account (paragraph (4)). Although in this case the opinion of the patient is not binding, it is relevant in so far as reasonable. The rule is open-ended in this aspect, as the relevance of the opinion of the patient can vary according to the concrete situation. The same reasoning applies to the decisions and preferences stated by patients before becoming incapable of giving informed consent.

The protection of vulnerable patients requires that the rule allows treatment to be performed on them in so far as it is presumed to be necessary for the improvement of their state of health. This prevents the potential abuse or mistreatment of patients who are in especially vulnerable situations (paragraph (5)). End-of-life issues are outside the scope of the civil law, and should be dealt with by public law regulation.

Regarding paragraph (6), although consent in a case of experimental treatment must follow a more stringent regime in order to protect patients, a written form is not deemed necessary unless it is required under public law rules or regulations. Consent in these circumstances must be express, specific for that experimental treatment and carefully documented (IV.C.–8:109 (Records)).

Finally, the parties may not, to the detriment of the patient, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effect (paragraph (7)). The mandatory nature of the rule is justified by the fact that it is related to the protection of patients.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. In the case of patients who are capable of giving informed consent it is universally accepted that the treatment provider must not proceed to treatment without the patient's consent.
2. In the case of patients below the age of legal capacity (which differs from country to country) consent must, and may, normally be given by their legal representative, normally a parent. However, the opinion of an adolescent minor is taken into account, according to the minor's intellectual capacities and maturity in FINLAND, GERMANY, SWEDEN. In FRANCE, in the latter situation, consent must be obtained from the minor and not from the legal representative. The same applies in PORTUGAL, where the age of consent to medical treatment is 14, in SCOTLAND where it is 16 (although a child below that age can give consent if in the opinion of the treatment provider the patient is in fact capable of giving informed consent to the treatment in question) and in THE NETHERLANDS, where the age of consent is 16. In ENGLAND, only a court of law is competent to decide on behalf of the minor in case of some unnecessary types of treatment, such as sterilisation.
3. In the case of adults who are incapable of giving informed consent, there is no clear solution in ENGLAND where sometimes the treatment provider is allowed to take decisions on behalf of the patient or in ITALY. In FRANCE, SPAIN and THE NETHERLANDS the legal representative of the patient, or the closest of kin if none is appointed, is entitled to give consent on behalf of the patient. In SCOTLAND a legal guardian with the necessary powers can give consent and if there is no legal guardian there are special procedures and safeguards to enable the treatment to be given without consent.
4. In FINLAND, FRANCE, ITALY, PORTUGAL and SCOTLAND consent from the patient or a legal representative is not necessary in an emergency. In THE NETHERLANDS and SPAIN consent is presumed.
5. No consensus appears to exist in the analysed countries about the effect of advance directives, living wills and previously expressed wishes. In THE NETHERLANDS and PORTUGAL they must be taken into account, but are not binding on the treatment provider.

II. Consent and incapable patients

6. In ENGLAND parents can act as a proxy in the best interests of a minor child (Children Act 1989). Cf. Re J (A Minor) (Wardship: Medical Treatment) [1991] Fam 33, 41. Regarding adults, no formal proxy exists which causes legal problems. In Re F (Mental Patient: Sterilisation) [1990] 2 AC 1 the House of Lords granted the doctor performing treatment on an incompetent adult the status of 'quasi-proxy'. In some forms of treatment, the court has the exclusive right to decide on behalf of the incompetent patient (minor or adult) (Cf. Re D. (A Minor) (Wardship: Sterilisation) [1976] 1 All ER 326).

7. According to the FINNISH Act on the Rights of the Patient, s. 6, the legal representative or a family member or other close person has to be heard before making an important decision concerning treatment if an adult patient because of mental disturbance or mental retardation or other reason cannot decide on the treatment. If this matter cannot be assessed, the patient has to be given a treatment that can be considered to be in accordance with the patient's interests. The opinion of a minor patient has to be assessed if it is possible with regard to the patient's age or level of development. If the minor patient cannot decide, the patient has to be cared for in mutual understanding with the patient's guardian or legal representative (ARP s. 7).

8. In FRANCE, the obligation on the treatment provider not to proceed without consent still exists when the patient is mentally incompetent. (CC art. 16-3). However, the content and the presentation of the information must be adapted to the particular intellectual situation of the patient. Regarding patients who are legally incapable to enter into a contract, such as minors, art. L. 1111-4(5) provides that the consent of the patient must be obtained if the patient is intellectually capable of taking a decision. If such is not the case, members of the patient's family may take the decision.

9. In ITALY the treatment provider cannot act (unless in cases of extreme situations) without the consent of the patient (of full age, capable of understanding and deciding) or without the consent of those who have parental authority in the case of minors (for a complete overview see Santosuosso, Il consenso informato). In fact, in so far as the patient is incapable, the legal representative has to express the informed consent (art. 32 Const.). The same principle is also expressed by the deontological code, which requires the treatment provider to obtain the consent from a person who is formally entrusted to decide. Problems arise with old people. In some situations one could argue that the patient is not in a condition to fully understand the information given, even if in principle still capable. In adopting the traditional division of the process of giving informed consent (information, understanding, capacity of understanding and deciding, freedom, conscious choice), one immediately understands that in the geriatric field problems arise in relation to various levels (de Caprio, Riv.it.med.leg 1998, fasc. 6 (December), pt. 1., p. 910). It may be difficult to evaluate and take into account, in the right measure, the capacity and competence of a subject of whom one has still to respect the auto determination. This issue is strictly connected to the issue of the living will, and the possibility of giving anticipated directions (see infra).

10. In GERMANY if the patient is a minor, consent is provided by the parents (CC §§ 1626 I; 1627; 1629 I) or legal proxy (CC § 1909) Cf. BGH NJW 1984, 1807; 1989, 1538; Gehrlein, Leitfaden zur Arzthaftpflicht, 153. In the case of adolescents, their opinion must be taken into account in so far as they can understand the nature, risks and consequences of treatment (BGHZ 29, 33; BGH NJW 1972, 335; Katzenmaier, Arzthaftung, p. 339.

11. The normal age of consent applies in GREECE. The legal representatives replace the incapable person for the purpose of expressing consent. Informed consent is required for all procedures in the course of a treatment. However, in the case of minor procedures which do not interfere with the physical and mental integrity of the patient and where a separate procedure of obtaining consent would impede the efficiency of the doctor's task, consent may be presumed. This is reinforced if the patient has already provided informed consent with regard to major procedures of the treatment.

12. In THE NETHERLANDS a distinction needs to be made between legally incompetent patients (minors, persons under legal guardianship) and patients who are physically incompetent to give consent. With regard to the first category, the following can be said. According to CC art. 1:233, a person under the age of 18 who is not married nor a registered partner, and has never been married or a registered partner, is a minor. According to CC art. 1:234, a minor is not capable of concluding contracts without the legal representative's permission, unless the law states differently. With regard to treatment contracts, the law indeed states differently. According to CC art. 7:447(1), a minor of 16 or 17 years old is capable of concluding a treatment contract pertaining to his or her own person. As a result, his or her consent is necessary according to the lead provision of CC art. 7:450(1). Moreover, this implies that the consent of others, such as parents, is not required. If the patient has reached the age of 12, but not the age of 16, the patient's consent is also necessary, as follows from CC art. 7:450(2). However, in this case the patient's consent is in principle not enough: the legal representative needs to give consent as well. However, the legal representative's consent is not necessary if the procedure is necessary to avoid serious detrimental effects for the patient, and if, even though the legal representative refuses the consent, nevertheless continues to want the procedure to take place (CC art. 7:450(2)). If the patient has not yet reached the age of 12, his or her consent is not necessary, as follows a contrario from CC art. 7:450(1) and (2). In that case, the doctor needs the consent of the legal representative (CC art. 7:450 in conjunction with art. 7:465). From a case, decided by the District court of Rotterdam (Rb Rotterdam 20 August 1993, NedJur 1995, 18, Algemeen Psychiatrisch Ziekenhuis 'De Grote Rivieren' v. X), it follows that the representative's consent may be tacitly implied. The court ruled that from the fact that a minor of 15 years old voluntarily stayed for almost 4 months in a psychiatric hospital with her parents' knowledge but without their express consent, it could be deduced that the parents presumably gave their consent to the treatment. If the patient is incapable of expressing consent (the second category), the doctor needs the consent of the legal or 'mandated' representative or, if none has been appointed, the patient's partner or a member of the patient's family (CC art. 7:450 in conjunction with art. 7:465(3)).

13. In POLAND if the patient is a minor or incapable of giving a conscious consent, the consent of the statutory guardian is required or, if the patient does not have a statutory guardian, the consent of the guardianship court (art. 32(2)) or the factual guardian (art. 32(3)). In the case of completely incapacitated persons the consent should be given by the statutory guardian. If the patient has enough discernment to be able to express an opinion regarding the treatment, the patient's consent is also required (art. 32(4)). If the patient is over 16 the patient's consent is required (art. 32(5)). If a minor who is over 16, an incapacitated person or a mentally handicapped person, who has sufficient discernment, disagrees with the treatment, apart from the consent of the statutory or the factual guardian or in the case when they do not want to give their consent, the consent of the guardianship court is required (art. 32(6)). The consent of the abovementioned persons may be given orally or by any behaviour which beyond any doubt expresses consent to undergo the treatment (art. 32(7)). If the incapable patient does not have a statutory or factual guardian, or communication with them is not possible, the consent of the guardianship court is required (art. 32(8)).

14. In PORTUGAL the age of consent is 14 years (CP art. 38(3)). The parents can provide proxy consent, as of CC arts. 1878 ff.

15. In SCOTLAND a person aged 16 or over can give consent. A person under the age of 16 can consent to treatment if, in the opinion of the doctor, he or she is capable of understanding the nature and possible consequences of the treatment (Age of Legal Capacity (Scotland) Act 1991 ss. 1(1) and 2(4)). If a child under 16 does not, in the opinion of the doctor, have that level of factual capacity then the legal representative, normally a parent, is the person qualified to give consent. In the case of adults who lack the capacity to give consent, consent may be given by a guardian or welfare attorney (a mandated representative) with the necessary powers or by a person appointed by a court for that purpose. If there is no such person available then the medical practitioner primarily responsible for the patient's treatment has authority (subject to a system of certificates and safeguards and exceptions) to do what is reasonable in the circumstances to safeguard or promote the physical or mental health of the patient. In rare cases it may happen that the responsible medical practitioner thinks that a certain treatment would be in the interests of an incapable patient but the guardian or welfare attorney refuses consent, perhaps from dubious motives. There are provisions to enable such situations to be resolved, via second medical opinions and court orders if necessary, in the patient's interests. See generally the Adults with Incapacity (Scotland) Act 2000, ss. 47 to 50 and Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, paras. 264-280.

16. The treatment provider in SPAIN, in the case of patients who according to the treatment provider's criterion are not capable of understanding the information because of their mental or physical state, is under an obligation to inform the patient's family or legal representative. Patient's Autonomy Statute art. 5.3, LGS art. 10.6(b) (Cervilla Garzón, La prestación de Servicios Profesionales, p. 280).

17. For children, in SWEDEN, the consent of the parents is necessary until the child reaches an age where he or she is mature enough to take responsibility for his or her own situation. This is expressed in Föräldrabalken (FB) the Book on Parents art. 6:11, which states that concurrently with the child's growing age and development more and more consideration must be taken of the child's own opinion and wishes. The parents are however responsible for the child until the age of 18 years and must ensure that any necessary medical treatment is provided. In practice these rules operate in such a way that the normal child who has reached the teens takes more and more responsibility for his or her own medical care. (Sverne and Sverne, Patientens rätt[3], p. 38.) A special situation arises in relation to teenage pregnancies. It is considered that the girl always has the right to choose abortion on her own. The medical personnel furthermore have no right to inform the parents if the girl refuses. They must however inform the girl adequately and offer to inform the parents for her. (Sverne and Sverne, Patientens rätt[3], pp. 38 ff).

III. Consent in emergency situations

18. Under FINNISH law (APR s. 8), a patient has to be given treatment necessary to ward off a hazard imperilling the patient's life or health even in case it is impossible to assess the patient's will because of unconsciousness or other reason. However, if the patient has earlier steadfastly and completely expressed his/her will concerning treatment must not be given against the patient's will.

19. Under FRENCH law treatment can always be carried out in an emergency when neither the patient, nor members of the family, can promptly consent (CSP L. 1111-4).

20. In ITALY in any case of emergency and danger to the life of a person who cannot express a contrary will, the treatment provider has to provide assistance and indispensable care. The behaviour of a treatment provider who has the possibility to calmly evaluate the case is judged in a different way from that of one forced to take decisions in an emergency (Conti, Riv.it.med.leg. 1998, fasc. 6 (December), I, 1174). In this latter case, the doctor did not have enough time to carry out all the necessary examinations and consultations.

21. In THE NETHERLANDS in any case of emergency, consent is still necessary, but is presumed to have been given. Cf. Roscam Abbing, Het recht op informatie, p. 25; Pitlo [-du Perron], VI[9], p. 273.

22. Treatment without the consent of the patient is allowed in POLAND if the patient requires immediate medical assistance and cannot express consent, and there is no possibility to contact the patient's statutory or factual guardian (art. 33(1)). In such a case, if possible, the doctor should consult another doctor (art. 33(2)), and the special circumstances should be mentioned in the patient's records (art. 33(3)). If, during an operation or a medical or diagnostic treatment, certain circumstances appear, and not taking them into account may cause death, grave bodily injury or severe health disorder and there is no time to obtain the consent of the patient or the statutory guardian, the doctor is entitled, without such consent, to change the scope of the operation or method of the treatment or diagnostics so as to take the new circumstances into account. If possible, the doctor should consult another doctor in such a case (art. 35(1)). The circumstances should be mentioned in the medical record of the patient and the patient, the statutory or factual guardian and the guardianship court should be informed about them (art. 35(2)).

23. Consent is not necessary in PORTUGAL in an emergency situation, if a delay in treatment would be life-threatening or would lead to an aggravation of the patient's health condition: CP art. 156(2). From a civil law point of view, this is considered as benevolent intervention: Cf. Dias Pereira, O consentimento informado, p. 353.

24. In SCOTLAND it is accepted that treatment can be given without consent in an emergency (Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, paras. 267-268; cf. ibid, para. 248).

25. In SPAIN, according to art. 9.2 sub a of the Patient's Autonomy Statute , informed consent by the patient is required unless there is an emergency situation where there is an immediate and serious risk to the patient's physical or psychic integrity and it is impossible to obtain the patient's consent. This solution is based on the theory of presumed consent. According to this doctrine, the doctor must presume that the patient, if able to do so, would have given consent to the treatment. Some authors argue that the doctor must intervene without consent when there is only one possible treatment, but not in cases where several alternatives are possible. In the latter case, the doctor must obtain informed consent from the family or legal representative of the patient (Cervilla Garzón, La prestación de Servicios Profesionales, p. 279).

26. In SWEDEN there are some exceptions concerning the consent of the patient, especially when it comes to operations. Firstly the operation can be performed in case of emergency when the patient is very ill or gravely injured and cannot give consent because unconscious or in a similar state. If there is time, the patient's family should be asked about the hypothetical opinion of the patient concerning the treatment (Hedman, Ansvar och ersättning vid medicinsk verksamhet, pp. 24 ff). The same applies if the patient is otherwise incapable of expressing consent: consent will then be presumed.

IV. Advance directives, living wills and previously expressed wishes

27. In FRANCE the patient can designate a person (member of the family, friend, habitual treatment provider), who will be informed and will be able to consent to treatment when the patient cannot express a choice (CSP art. L. 1111-6).

28. In ITALY there is no common view as to the value to attribute to advance directions of the patient. There are extreme views which deny any relevance to such documents, putting the accent on the fact that the consent has to be up to date. On the other hand there are those who believe that such advance directives are indeed binding because they are the expression of the autonomy of the patient. It still seems to be the prevailing view that the decision of the patient, expressed in documents containing advance directives, does not bind the treatment provider (de Caprio, Riv.it.med.leg. 1998, fasc. 6 (December), I, p. 914).

29. In THE NETHERLANDS if a patient of 16 years of age or older cannot express consent, the doctor and the patient's legal or mandated representative or mentor have to follow the patient's written decision to refuse treatment expressed at a time when the patient was capable of expressing consent. However, the doctor can deviate from that decision if, in his or her opinion, good grounds to do so are present (CC art. 7:450(3)). From this article it follows that in principle, consent is necessary. If no written decision is available, the consent from an informal representative is required (CC art. 7:465).

30. Under POLISH law the doctor should follow any advance directive of the patient, even if that may cause death or suffering for the patient.

31. Living wills must be taken into account by the treatment provider in PORTUGAL, but are not binding (CHRM art. 9).

32. In SPAIN, if the aim behind the obligation to inform is to allow the patient to consent, with complete knowledge of the facts, to any medical intervention on the patient's body, it is logical to think that any previous indications of the patient's views (given before becoming incapable of giving a valid consent) regarding the treatment must be taken into account. However, it could also be argued that at that moment the patient may not have had all the information necessary to decide whether or not to give consent.

IV.C.–8:109: Records

(1) The treatment provider must create adequate records of the treatment. Such records must include, in particular, information collected in any preliminary interviews, examinations or consultations, information regarding the consent of the patient and information regarding the treatment performed.

(2) The treatment provider must, on reasonable request:

(a) give the patient, or if the patient is incapable of giving consent, the person or institution legally entitled to take decisions on behalf of the patient, access to the records; and

(b) answer, in so far as reasonable, questions regarding the interpretation of the records.

(3) If the patient has suffered injury and claims that it is a result of non-performance by the treatment provider of the obligation of skill and care and the treatment provider fails to comply with paragraph (2), non-performance of the obligation of skill and care and a causal link between such non-performance and the injury are presumed.

(4) The treatment provider must keep the records, and give information about their interpretation, during a reasonable time of at least 10 years after the treatment has ended, depending on the usefulness of these records for the patient or the patient's heirs or representatives and for future treatments. Records which can reasonably be expected to be important after the reasonable time must be kept by the treatment provider after that time. If for any reason the treatment provider ceases activity, the records must be deposited or delivered to the patient for future consultation.

(5) The parties may not, to the detriment of the patient, exclude the application of paragraphs (1) to (4) or derogate from or vary their effects.

(6) The treatment provider may not disclose information about the patient or other persons involved in the patient's treatment to third parties unless disclosure is necessary in order to protect third parties or the public interest. The treatment provider may use the records in an anonymous way for statistical, educational or scientific purposes.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

According to this Article, the treatment provider has an obligation to create, keep and keep up to date adequate records concerning the clinical history of the patient. This obligation aims at ensuring the correct performance of treatment, securing elements that may be important as evidence and promoting accountability. The reference to "adequate records of the treatment" assumes that the records will cover the anamnesis, the present health status of the patient, the way the illness developed, the therapeutic procedures followed, the medication, the obtaining of consent, the treatment performed, the names of the health-care professionals involved, etc. One reason for having an obligation to keep adequate records is that a patient may be seen by a number of different people at different stages and it is important that at each stage the treatment provider should know what has happened at earlier stages.

A patient is admitted to a hospital after a skiing accident. Upon admission, a record will be created, and the time of admission noted down. The patient is taken to a physician in the emergency ward who is responsible for the assessment of the health status of patients and who refers them to specialists if necessary. The physician makes an initial diagnosis concluding that the patient has suffered a femoral fracture. The physician makes an initial diagnosis, concluding that the patient has suffered a femoral fracture. The physician notes down this information. The patient is taken to the orthopaedic ward, where a specialist orthopaedist proceeds to make a more thorough diagnosis. The orthopaedist confirms the initial diagnosis and orders an X-Ray examination. The X-Ray examination is done, the radiation exposure is recorded and the radiologist's name noted down. Next, the orthopaedist examines the X-ray films, which are attached to the records. She informs the patient that the leg is to be immobilised by means of a splint for one month and that she will prescribe anti-inflammatory and painkilling drugs to be taken during the first three days. The splint is put on by a nurse. The patient leaves the hospital, and is to return after one month. All these data are noted down in the clinical record, which also contains an account of the materials used and their costs for the processing of the invoices.

The Article also covers the patient's right to have full access to the records and to require the treatment provider to give reasonable assistance with their interpretation (paragraph (2). This last point is important as records may use medical terms or abbreviations.

Paragraph (3) contains a specific presumption for treatment contracts. It applies when a patient has suffered injury and claims that it is a result of poor treatment. If the patient asks to see the medical records and the treatment provider does not provide them as required, it is presumed that the treatment provider failed to perform the obligation of skill and care and that there is a causal link between this non-performance and the injury. It is then up to the treatment provider to prove the reverse.

Records are to be kept for a reasonable time, according to paragraph (4), depending upon their usefulness.

The treatment provider is bound to secrecy concerning the records (paragraph (6)), with exceptions for cases where disclosure is necessary for the protection of third parties or the public interest. Likewise, anonomized data can be used for statistical, teaching or scientific purposes.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Records are very important in order to be able to check the adequate performance of the contractual obligations. Apart from their methodological usefulness in the provision of treatment, records serve other purposes. They are important in the process of disclosure of information to the patient, especially in circumstances where the patient will want to evaluate the provision of the treatment. The medical records may also constitute the only source of information on which to base a lawsuit over malpractice, and will be of capital importance if a patient wishes to seek a second opinion or to be treated by another health-care professional.

It is generally recognised that the patient has the right to have access to his or her medical records as well as to obtain co-operation (even in the case of a claim against the treatment provider) from the treatment provider in their interpretation, according to applicable procedural rules. The records will be very important in order for the patient to assess the quality of treatment, and if necessary, essential elements in the substantiation of legal claims in case of non-performance of the obligations under the treatment contract.

It is debated whether the patient should have access to the entire record or only to the objective information included in it - that is, with the exception of notes of a personal, subjective nature. The latter may be highly prejudicial to the health-care provider in the context of a lawsuit. Another debate is whether the patient should have open access to the records or access only through a physician. It is argued, on the one hand, that a normal patient will not be able to understand the records and that full disclosure may not be to the advantage of the patient. On the other hand, it is argued that the patient should be granted full disclosure of all the records regarding his or her treatment and that involvement of a health-care professional and suppression of subjective notes by the treatment provider derive from a lack of transparency, paternalism and corporatism in health care.

Records may also be important in the future, serving as a basis for treatment to be performed on a patient. They may even be useful for several generations into the future (e.g. as regards genetic traits presenting a risk).

The issue of the quality of the records is very important. First of all, how detailed should the records be? Secondly, how accurate should they be? It is in the interest of the patient that they be thorough and accurate. Lack of thoroughness or accuracy may lead to non-performance of the contractual obligations.

> A patient is diagnosed as having a severe insufficiency of the renal function; her left kidney needs to be removed. The surgeon operating on the patient removes the right kidney owing to lack of clarity of the record created by the physician responsible for the diagnosis. In this case, the poor quality of the records contributed to the non-performance of the contractual obligation.

Even though accuracy is important, there is a price to pay: extensive record-keeping can be a difficult task for the treatment provider for time-management, organisational and budgetary reasons, whereas the possible gain for the patient may not always very clear.

> A patient is treated for a toothache. The treatment itself takes 15 minutes, recording its details will take 30 minutes if every wad of cotton used in the administering of the treatment is to be accounted for. If such were the case, the costs of the health-care provision of health care would skyrocket.

So far as sanctions are concerned, records are the decisive element in the context of a claim for non-performance of the obligation of skill and care. In such circumstances, it may be argued that the treatment provider should be expected to provide the patient with sufficient information. If no records, or only incomplete records, are produced it may be argued that non-performance of the obligation should be presumed. This provides a powerful sanction for the keeping of adequate records. The lack or incompleteness of the medical record may be said to justify the reversal of the burden of proof in a liability claim. It may be argued, however, on the other hand that it is unrealistic to expect the treatment provider to act in such a way, as it would be against his interests.

A debated topic is the intensity of the obligation of the treatment provider to answer reasonable questions concerning the records. This obligation may affect the organisation of an institution, taking time away from more important duties. On the other hand, such information is important for the patient.

Another issue is during what period the treatment provider is to keep the records. It would be burdensome to keep records for a very long time, and there are costs involved in keeping them as well as providing information related to the records. So it is not to the advantage of the treatment provider to require the records to be kept for a lengthy period. On the other hand, it would be in the patient's interest that they are kept for as long as possible, in order to enable future reference to be made to them or in order to judge the quality of treatment when an injury manifests itself after a long time. In some circumstances, the period would be very long indeed (as regards genetic information, for instance). A balance should be struck.

The treatment provider is under an obligation to keep the records secret. While this does not apply to third parties entitled to decide on behalf of the patient, doubts arise whether the treatment provider should be allowed to use or disclose data for statistical, educational or scientific purposes. On the one hand, the treatment provider and society have an interest in the development of medical science; on the other the patient's privacy and the privacy of other persons involved in the treatment (e.g. data obtained from family or friends that are needed for the treatment of the patient) are important considerations.

It is debated whether the treatment provider should be allowed in some circumstances to breach privacy and disclose information to third parties. It is argued that in situations where privacy could affect the life or health of third parties in a detrimental way, or in situations of public interest, those interests prevail over the patient's privacy. Examples might be the potential transmission of infectious diseases to third parties, or the suspicion of a criminal act being related to treatment performed on a person.

Problems may also arise in cases where an insurance company or an employer enters into a treatment contract with a doctor on behalf of the patient. The disclosure of medical data may be seriously disadvantageous to the patient.

C. Preferred option

The obligations to keep and maintain adequate records and make them available to the patient are recognised in the legal systems analysed, as is the obligation of confidentiality. The differences are in the subsidiary aspects of the obligations, such as the extent of disclosure required, the sanctions, and the exceptions to the obligation of confidentiality. The preferred option is to follow this general approach and to oblige the treatment provider to create adequate records, of a quality and thoroughness of which conform to the standard of care of the profession. It is also thought appropriate to oblige the treatment provider to disclose the records to the patient and to enable the patient (or a court of law or the relevant institution investigating and deciding upon malpractice claims) to interpret them. This is the general principle.

The presumption in paragraph (3) prevents a situation where the patient would be precluded from assessing the quality of treatment, and possibly from substantiating a claim, because the treatment provider had not performed the obligation to keep records or withheld information. Without records, it is virtually impossible for the patient to successfully claim a remedy for non-performance of the obligation of skill and care under these rules. This rule also has a deterrent role, as it prevents the treatment provider from being lax as regards the obligation to keep records where it serves purposes other than securing evidence.

The treatment provider need only answer reasonable questions from the patient regarding the records. This prevents wasting the treatment provider's time and effort, while providing the patient with the information needed in order to evaluate the quality of performance of the obligations under the treatment contract.

As regards the time during which the treatment provider is to keep the records, the obligation under paragraph (4) varies according to the circumstances. Ten years is set as the reasonable minimum period, but a treatment provider may be required to keep the records for a longer time. In exceptional circumstances, where it may be important to keep the records for a longer time, the treatment provider is obliged to keep them. It is of no importance whether their prolonged keeping is of medical interest or otherwise serves the patient's interests or the general interest.

> An employee of a construction company is hospitalised because of a possible exposure to asbestos. The physician examining the patient cannot find evidence of any detrimental effects at that time. However, exposure to asbestos may lead to the development of malignant mesothelioma (a specific type of lung cancer attributed solely to sustained exposure to asbestos) decades later. Thus, the employee has an interest in the records being kept for a very long period, in order for him to be able to prove that exposure took place in the past, information which he will need to file a claim against his employer.

When the treatment provider ceases its activities, the records must either be deposited with another treatment provider or competent organisation or delivered to the patient or his heirs or representatives. This solution is a balanced one, and is justified by the possible importance of that information for the patient or relevant third parties even after an eventual action is time-barred.

Finally, it seems reasonable to allow the treatment provider to use or disclose the information contained in the records for statistical, educational or scientific purposes, in so far as they are used in an anonymous way. The treatment provider can also disclose information in order to protect third parties or the public interest in limited exceptional cases. The limit consists of the protection of the life or health of third parties that would otherwise potentially be endangered if disclosure did not take place. Disclosure is, however, not allowed to protect paternalistic interests of third parties, as these are not serious enough to warrant the sacrifice of secrecy, and such a breach might cause serious detriment to the patient (e.g. the loss of a job if data are disclosed to the employer).

The provisions of paragraph (1) to (4) are mandatory. Of course, the patient or the person or the institution entitled to take decisions on behalf of the patient may opt not to exercise or to waive the rights under paragraphs (2) or (4) but that is a different matter.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. It is accepted in all the analysed countries that the treatment provider is under an obligation to create and keep adequate clinical records about the treatment. It is regulated by specific public law regulations in: AUSTRIA, ENGLAND, FINLAND, FRANCE, SCOTLAND and SWEDEN.

2. In FRANCE, ITALY and SWEDEN, if the treatment provider does not keep records, disciplinary sanctions may follow. In AUSTRIA, GERMANY, THE NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL and SPAIN the consequence of not keeping records is the facilitation of the patient's burden of proof, or even a shift of the burden of proof to the treatment provider. In ENGLAND the treatment provider is under a procedural duty to disclose all information relevant for litigation. In GREECE it is an autonomous ground for a liability claim.

3. In all of the analysed legal systems, the patient has a right of access to the clinical records. However, in some systems some of the information can be withheld from the patient. Evaluative information and personal remarks can be withheld from patients in GERMANY and PORTUGAL: the patient is only entitled to access to objective data and facts logged on the records. In UNITED KINGDOM data likely to cause serious harm to the physical or mental health of the patient is exempted from the duty to disclose. Following a similar reasoning, in Portugal patients can only have indirect access to the clinical records through a physician. In THE NETHERLANDS information that could breach the privacy of third persons is not disclosed.

4. In all the analysed legal systems clinical records are considered as confidential information. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the duty of confidentiality emerges from a general duty of confidentiality in the common law. Also in GREECE it emerges from the general right of personality enshrined in the Constitution. In GERMANY the confidentiality in the treatment-provider/patient relationship emerges from criminal law. In FINLAND, FRANCE and SPAIN the secrecy of clinical records emerges from statutes regulating healthcare. In THE NETHERLANDS a specific provision exists in the CC.

5. While in FRANCE no exceptions to the duty of confidentiality appear to exist, in other legal systems confidentiality can be waived in certain specific circumstances. (a) Serious public interest in disclosure outweighing the right to privacy of the patient is accepted in ENGLAND, FINLAND, GERMANY, THE NETHERLANDS, SCOTLAND and SPAIN. (b) A threat to the life or health of third parties is recognised in England, The Netherlands, Spain, Italy and Germany. (c) Disclosure to other healthcare professionals for operational reasons is accepted in Germany; The Netherlands and Spain. (d) Legal representatives of minors and incompetent patients can get access in England, Italy, The Netherlands and Spain. (e) Anonymous use of data for medical research is recognised in Germany and The Netherlands. (f) Authorisation by the patient of disclosure.

II. Duty to keep records

6. In the field of public hospitals the KAKuG regulates the duty to keep records in AUSTRIA. § 10(1) regulates what the records should contain; imposes an obligation to keep the files for at least 30 years and states who is responsible for keeping the records. Likewise, the law on doctors regulates the issue in § 51, imposing a duty to keep the records for at least 10 years (para. 3). In sum, keeping written records is an important ancillary duty of the doctor which entails the patient's right to view them as well.

7. Doctors must keep records as a part of the care owed to the patient in ENGLAND: National Health Service (General Medical Services) Regulations 1992, Schedule 2, para. 36. Cf. Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 990.

8. The duty to keep records is established in the FINNISH Act on Patient's Rights Chap. 4.

9. An obligation to create clinical records exists in FRANCE (CSP art. R. 1112-2). This article also details the types of information which must be included in the clinical record. The treatment providers may, with the consent of the patient, store clinical records with trusted third parties, Art. L. 1111-8 CSP.

10. According to unanimous case law and literature, the treatment provider has an ancillary duty, emerging from the treatment contract, of creating complete and dutiful records of treatment measures in GERMANY (Dokumentationspflicht). Cf. BGHZ 72, 132, 137; Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], 443. Records must cover all of the phases of treatment: anamnesis, diagnosis, therapy, medication, information given, surgery logs.

11. The provider of the service is under an obligation to keep records of the medical history of the patients in GREECE. It is a secondary obligation under the contract of treatment. To the obligation of the doctor corresponds a right of the patient to access these records. Recent legislation on the protection of the individual from databases – implementing a European directive- reinforces the right of the patient to have unlimited access to such records.

12. All medical operations, clinical data and observations on the patient have to be recorded in ITALY. The giving of informed consent is a precise stage in the relationship between doctor and patient. It requires, like other stages, an accurate and documented procedure (Flores and Buzzi, Resp. civ. e prev., 1998, fasc. 1 (February), p. 1297). It has to be configured not as an act, but as a process: it cannot be only a subscription by the patient of a form, not necessarily understandable (Portigliatti Barbos, Riv.it.dir.proc.pen. 1998, p. 894).

13. According to the DUTCH CC art. 7:454(1), the doctor is obliged to keep records of the medical condition and the treatment of the patient – even if the patient does not want some data to be recorded. Cf. Sluyters and Biesaart, De geneeskundige behandelingsovereenkomst, p. 63. The patient does not have a right to have data corrected. However, on the patient's request, the doctor does have to record statements, made by the patient, with regard to the records, and to which procedures of a far-reaching nature the patient has given consent. Cf. CC arts. 7:451 and 7:454 para. 2, respectively. See further Van Wijmen, Geneeskundige behandelingsovereenkomst, p. 168. Moreover, on request of the patient, the health provider is required to lay down in writing to which procedures of an important nature the patient has consented (CC art. 7:451). In such a document the patient or the health provider may also indicate to which procedures the patient has not consented. The health provider is free to include other notes in the records. The limitation of the patient's right to demand a written recording to procedures of an important nature is meant to prevent an excessive formalisation of the relations between the health provider and the patient too much. Cf. Sluyters, Gezondheidsrecht, note to CC art. 7:451.

14. Under POLISH law the doctor is obliged to keep individual medical records of the patient (Act on the profession of a doctor, art. 41(1). Additionally, the medical care institutions are obliged to keep records of the patients (Act on the medical care institutions, art. 18).

15. The doctor is under an ancillary duty to keep adequate records under the PORTUGUESE CC arts. 573 and 575. Cf. Dias Pereira, O consentimento informado, p. 328; Figueiredo Dias and Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade médica na europa ocidental, p. 42.

16. Doctors must keep records as a part of the care owed to the patient in SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, para. 324).

17. In SPAIN an obligation to keep clinical records of the patient's medical history is provided by art. 14 of the Patient's Autonomy Statute.

18. There is in SWEDEN an obligation for the health and medical service as well as for the dental service to keep records (Law on patient records (1985:562), art. 1). Records must be kept of treatment and examination, and there are detailed rules on the content.

III. Consequence of not keeping records

19. In AUSTRIA a non-performance of the obligation to keep records has consequences as regards the question of evidence. Since the patient's position is adversely affected by the non-performance the patient will be granted a facilitation of evidence in order to re-establish balance. In addition to that the provider might face penalties of an administrative nature. Both the KAKuG and ÄrzteG are public law statutes and might therefore trigger public law sanctions.

20. Under ENGLISH law the treatment provider is under a duty to disclose all relevant information in litigation: CPR rule 31, Cf. Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 1021.

21. There is no treatment of this question in case law or legislative act in FRANCE. This is a disciplinary offence. In application of general contract law, the treatment provider is in breach of an obligation and will be liable to pay compensation for damage sustained by the patient if any.

22. The ITALIAN penal Code states an obligation of medical report in art. 365.

23. Under GERMAN law one of the aims of the obligation to keep adequate records is conservation of evidence and as a consequence failure to perform this obligation can affect the burden of proof of negligence and causation. The burden may be lightened or shifted to the treatment provider: BGH NJW 1972, 1520; BGH NJW 1978, 2337; BGH NJW 1983, 332; BGH NJW 1985, 2193; BGH NJW 1987, 2300; BGH NJW 1988, 762; Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 446.

24. In GREECE the doctor is under an obligation to keep records. Non-performance of that obligation may give the patient a claim for damages.

25. In THE NETHERLANDS a non-performance of the obligation to keep records gives rise to disciplinary sanctions. It may also have consequences with regard to liability. The Hoge Raad decided in 1987 that the doctor has to supply sufficient information to justify his or her rejection of the patient's claim, in order to provide the patient with a starting-point to prove the claim. Cf. HR 20 November 1987, NedJur 1988, 500, note WLH (Timmer/Deutman). If the doctor has lost or destroyed the original records or simply failed to keep record in a satisfactory way, the non-acceptance of the patient's claim cannot be justified. As a result, the burden of proof will shift to the doctor, who will probably be unable to meet it due to the absence of records. Cf. Giesen, Bewijslastverdeling, p. 40. However, the mere fact that a medical advice is not registered in the medical records does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that the advice has or has not been given. Whether the absence of the mentioning of the advice leads to negative consequences for the doctor, therefore depends on the circumstances of the case: in HR 10 April 1998, NedJur 1998, 572 note F.C.B. van Wijmen, the Hoge Raad, following the Court of Appeal's evaluation of the situation, found that there was insufficient reason to shift the burden of proof to the doctor. What and how much data and detail the doctor must provide, also depends on the time which has passed since the treatment: the doctor cannot be expected to remember every detail of an operation which took place years ago. This has been recognised as well by the Hoge Raad in its ruling of 7 September 2001, NedJur 2001, 615 (R. and B. v. Stichting Ignatius Ziekenhuis).

26. In POLAND not keeping the records may trigger the liability of the persons obliged.

27. Lack or incompleteness of records may lead to a shift of the burden of proof to the treatment provider under the PORTUGUESE CC art. 344 para. 2.

28. Failure to keep records has not been a basis of action in SCOTTISH cases.

29. In practice, under SPANISH law the absence of medical reports will lead courts to presume liability of the medical treatment provider because of the damage inflicted to the patient (TS 2 December 1996, RJ 1996/8938). There may also be administrative sanctions (doctor as a civil servant, institutions within the Public Health Service) for non-compliance with a statutory obligation.

30. If the medical personnel in SWEDEN do not keep records or, as is more usual, do not fulfil the requirements as to the content of the records they can be subjected to disciplinary sanctions.

IV. Patient's right to have access to the records

31. The AUSTRIAN KAKuG§ 5a Z 1 provides for the right of the patient to view records corresponding to the obligation set forth in art. 10. The law on doctors regulates that issue in art. 51 together with the obligation to keep records (see above).

32. Patients are entitled to access to medical records under the provisions of the UNITED KINGDOM Data Protection Act 1998, Access to Medical Reports Act 1988, and Access to Health Records Act 1990. However, data likely to cause serious harm to the physical or mental health of the subject is exempted from disclosure (s.5 (1)). Cf. Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 1023; Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, paras. 326-333. Note also the Freedom of Information Act 2000 and the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002.

33. The key provision in FRENCH law is CSP art. L.1111-7. The obligation to disclose such information to the patient is provided by article L. 1112-1 para. 1.

34. In ITALY the doctor has to make relevant medical records available to the patient or to the legal representatives or doctors and institutions indicated by the patient in writing (Medical Deontological Code art. 21). Especially where the doctor works in a team there is a de-personalisation of the relationship and therefore there is a demand for enhanced information for the client. This means that the client must have access to the information and the doctor must disclose all information necessary. See Alpa, Riv.it.med.leg. 1999, fasc. 1 (February), p. 27.

35. The right of access to medical records in GERMANY can be based on CC §§ 259, 260, 810. Disclosure is limited to objective scientific concrete data in the records (Medication, surgery logs, examinations, ECG, EEG, etc.). Personal records or subjective evaluations recorded by the doctor are exempted from disclosure. Cf. Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 449.

36. According to the DUTCH CC art. 7:456, the patient has the right to view the records and to obtain a copy of the documents included in the records, unless the privacy of a third party is at stake. A therapeutic exception to the right to view the records has not been accepted. Cf. Sluyters and Biesaart, De geneeskundige behandelingsovereenkomst, pp. 93-94; Van Wijmen, Geneeskundige behandelingsovereenkomst, p. 170. The access is to be provided free of charge. In principle, the treatment provider is required to co-operate with a second request for access, which normally is to be provided free of charge again, unless, in the circumstances of the case, this would be unreasonably onerous for the treatment provider, given the costs the treatment provider incurs in order to comply with the request. Cf. Rb. Eindhoven 23 May 2002, Prg 2002, 5903 (psychiatrist Van der Beek v. patient S.).

37. In FINLAND the patient's general right to check his or her own clinical records is regulated in the Personal Data File Act ss. 26-28.

38. The patient or the patient's statutory guardian has a right of access to the patient's medical records under the POLISH Act on the medical care institutions, art. 18(3) (1).

39. In PORTUGAL access to clinical records is only possible indirectly, through the mediation of a physician Lei 67/98 of 26/10 art. 18 (3)(1) and Lei no. 94/99 of 16/7. This does not contravene art. 10 para. 3 CHRM. Only objective records must be disclosed, subjective remarks from the physician are excluded. Cf. Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade por Conselhos, p. 427; Dias Pereira, O consentimento informado, p. 332.

40. It is the right of the patient (whom failing that of his or her family, close friends or legal representatives) in accordance with the SPANISH Patient's Autonomy Statute, art. 18 to access the clinical history and to receive a clinical discharge report when the patient is discharged from a medical centre (art. 20). The Royal Decree 1030/2006 on the organisation of the medical services regarding the National Health System gives patients a right to receive proper information and clinical documentation (art. 10). imposes on the "Service of medical information and documentation" an obligation to provide a patient, upon request, with a copy of his or her medical records.

41. The patient has a general right to read his or her own records in SWEDEN. Because of this right, the medical personnel are obliged to formulate the records clearly and to as large an extent as possible in a way understandable to the patient (Law on patient records (1985:562), art. 5).

V. Secrecy of clinical records

42. There is a duty of confidentiality in ENGLISH law: A-G v. Guardian Newspapers Ltd. (No. 2) [1990] 1 AC 109. Remedies may consist of an injunction or damages: W. v. Egdell [1989] 1 All ER 1089, W. v. Egdell [1990] Ch 359. Cf. Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 1047.

43. According to the FINIISH APR s. 13, the information in patients' medical records is confidential.

44. Clinical records are considered to be confidential information under FRENCH law (CSP art. L. 1112-1(5)).

45. In ITALY the doctor has to protect the privacy of personal data and documents regarding people even when they are entrusted to codes or computer systems. Health information is considered highly sensitive. Only specialised institutes can collect such data, with the consent of the patient, and they can be disclosed only upon the request of a professional (usually the family doctor). In scientific publications of the clinical data and observations relating to a single patient the treatment provider has to guarantee that the patient cannot be identified.

46. The doctrine on confidentiality in a medical setting was developed by the criminal law in GERMANY (StGB arts. 203, 204). The treatment provider is under a duty to keep secret the data gathered in the patient-doctor relationship. Cf. Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 506.

47. The above Article on the secrecy of clinical records and the relevant exceptions corresponds to GREEK law. The right to privacy of the clinical records stems from the wider constitutionally protected right to personality (see CC art. 57).

48. The secrecy of clinical records has been recognised in the DUTCH CC art. 7:457. The provision requires the health provider to keep information about the patient confidential and not to give third parties access to or copies of documents included in the records, unless this has been approved by the patient. If and in so far as the health provider is authorised to provide information, to give access or to give copies of documents, that right is restricted in so far as necessary for the protection of the privacy of others.

49. In POLISH law the medical care institution is obliged to protect the data collected in the medical records (Act on the medical care institutions, art. 18(2)). In addition, the doctor owes a duty to keep secret all the data related to the patient acquired as a result of performance of the doctor's obligations (Act on the profession of a doctor, art. 40).

50. There is a general obligation of confidentiality in SCOTTISH law which is applicable in the medical treatment context (Stair, The Laws of Scotland XVIII, para. 1451-1492; Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, paras. 282-323). Disclosure may be prevented by interdict or remedied by claims for damages or enrichment.

51. In SPAIN the obligation to keep medical records confidential is based upon the relation of confidence that arises between the patient and the medical treatment provider, who has access to information regarding the patient's private life. The obligation of secrecy is included in the Spanish medical code of conduct of 1990. Moreover, the Personal Data Protection Statute (Ley 15/1999) provides that data regarding health are especially protected. Only authorised persons may access such data. According to art. 43, the obligation is inherent to the medical profession and aims at guaranteeing the security of the patient. This obligation is mandatory for every doctor and covers all information that reaches the doctor while providing the treatment, not only information directly given by the patient, but also other information (art. 44). The doctor must ensure that the support staff know about the obligation of secrecy and that they comply with the obligation. Confidentiality turned into a statutory obligation when codified by the General Act on Healthcare of 1986, arts. 10.1 and 10.3, and developed by the Patrient's Autonomy Statute, art. 7. Part of the doctrine argues that the obligation to keep confidentiality is a question of public order. Thus, it is not in the interest of the patient but in the interest of society that the doctor has to maintain secrecy. According to this approach, medical secrecy is to be kept even when it goes against the will of the patient. Most of the doctrine argues that the obligation of secrecy is grounded in the protection of the right to privacy and intimacy of the patient, as well as in the constitutional right to dignity and privacy (art. 10.1). Thus, the patient could authorise the doctor not to keep information confidential, in so far as such behaviour does not have a negative impact on third parties. The latter is the most accepted theory because it allows the doctor not to comply with the obligation of secrecy when other interests deserve higher protection.

VI. Exceptions

52. In ENGLAND there are some exceptions to the duty of confidentiality, such as disclosure in the framework of parental responsibility in treatment of children: Re Z (A Minor) (Freedom of Publication) [1997] Fam 1; public interest in disclosure X Health Authority v. Y [1988] 2 All ER 648 (QBD); danger to the health of others: W. v. Egdell [1989] 1 All ER 1089, W. v. Egdell [1990] Ch 359. Cf. Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 1076.

53. In the FINNISH APR s. 13, the exceptions are regulated strictly and in detail.

54. There seem to be no exceptions in FRANCE.

55. There are some circumstances where the duty is waived in GERMANY. This can be the case of duties to notify health authorities when established by law, military doctors, anonymous data in medical research, insurance doctors, suspects of child abuse, other doctors and medical staff, or protection of another person's life or health (e.g., disclosing the sexual partner in the case of AIDS infection: CA Bremen MedR 1984, 112; CA Hamburg NJW 1989, 1551).

56. In ITALY, apart from specific law provisions (mandatory certifications, reports, notifications, etc.), a just cause of disclosure is: a) a request or authorisation of the patient, with a previous specific information on the consequences and opportunity of such a disclosure; b) the need to safeguard the life or health of the patient or third parties, in the case where the patient is not in a position to give consent because of physical impossibility, incapacity to act or incapacity to understand and decide; c) the need to safeguard the life or health of third parties, even against the expressed wish of the patient, but with a previous authorisation of the Authority responsible for the protection of personal data.

57. In THE NETHERLANDS also there are a few exceptions. The first exception is if the therapeutical exception regarding the obligation to inform applies (CC art. 7:448 para. 3) and the patient's interests require the health provider to give the information to a specific third party (CC art. 7:448(3) sent.2 and CC art. 457(1)). Secondly, persons who are directly involved in the performance of the obligations under the contract and a person who replaces the health provider are not to be considered a 'third party' for whom the secrecy exists, in so far as they need the secret information in order to perform their tasks (para. 2). The health provider therefore does not need the patient's consent to provide these persons with information or to give them access to the documents or copies of documents included in the records. Para 3 contains a third exception, which applies with regard to the person(s) whose consent to the treatment is required on the basis of CC art. 7:450 (in the case of minors and legal guardians of mentally incapable persons) or CC art. 7:465 (family of a person who is not or is no longer able to evaluate the situation but is not represented by a legal guardian). Such persons have access to the information or records, unless the health provider would be acting contrary to the required standard of care by giving access. Furthermore, in case law it is accepted that the secrecy of the records does not apply if there are sufficiently concrete indications that such secrecy would damage other weighty interests, and these interests outweigh the interest in keeping the records secret. Cf. HR 20 April 2001, NedJur 2001, 600 with note W.M. Kleijn and F.C.B. van Wijmen (Adriaensen/St. Sint-Elisabethshuis). One such opposite weighty interest is the fear that the patient was not compos mentis when having a testament drawn up. However, that fear must be substantiated by sufficiently concrete indications to that effect. Cf. HR 20 April 2001, NedJur 2001, 600 with note W.M. Kleijn and F.C.B. van Wijmen (Adriaensen/St. Sint-Elisabethshuis). Another such opposite weighty interest is the right of a health provider to mount a defence against a claim for malpractice instigated by the patient. Yet, if such a claim has been dismissed irrevocably, the health provider no longer has sufficient interest in viewing the medical records of the (former) patient. Cf. Hof Amsterdam 16 December 1999, KG 2000, 50. Finally, CC art. 7:458 para. 1 provides that without the patient's consent information may be provided to third parties for statistical or scientific research in the field of public health, provided that (a) it is not reasonably possible to ask for permission to do so and the patient's privacy is not disproportionately damaged by the execution of the research, or (b) it is not possible to ask for permission given the nature of the research and the health provider has taken care that the data provided cannot be traced back to the patient. Moreover, para. 2 adds that the provision of information on the basis of this article is allowed only if the research is in the public interest, it cannot be executed without the required information and the patient has not explicitly objected to such provision. If information is provided in accordance with para. 1, this is to be included in the patient's records (para. 3).

58. In POLAND the medical care institution may give access to the records only to persons indicated in art. 18 para. 3 of the Act on the medical care institutions, which include for example another medical care institution if it is necessary for continuation of the treatment, courts, prosecutors, certain public offices or insurance institutions. Access to the medical records is also granted (art. 18 para. 4) to universities and research institutions, for research purposes. In such a case, however, names and other data that could allow identification of the patient should not be disclosed. The doctor is released from the duty to keep the records secret (art. 40 para. 2 of the Act on the profession of a doctor) if (1) the law so provides (2) the patient or the patient's statutory guardian agrees to the disclosure; in such a case the patient or the guardian should be informed about any negative consequences of disclosure, (3) maintaining secrecy could cause danger to the life or health of the patient or other people, (4) the medical examination was conducted at the request of certain public institutions; in such a case the doctor is allowed to inform only the institution, (5) there is a necessity to provide information to another doctor, (6) it is necessary for teaching purposes or (7) the information is to be used for scientific purposes.

59. For when confidential information may be lawfully disclosed under SCOTTISH law see Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, paras. 307-321. Examples include sharing amongst the health-care team, disclosure for clinical audit, disclosure required by law or authorised by the patient's consent, disclosure required in connection with litigation. There are also rules on disclosures relating to children under 16 or to adults with incapacity. Best practice rules exist on disclosure to appropriate authorities where the treatment provider becomes aware that the patient is a victim of familial neglect or abuse.

60. In SPAIN medical secrecy is grounded in the patient's interest in privacy and intimacy. This interest may conflict with others which in the specific circumstances deserve higher protection. On this basis, the doctor may not be under an obligation to maintain confidentiality in the following circumstances: when the patient authorises the doctor to disclose; with regard to the family or legal representative of the patient when the patient is incapable of communicating with the doctor; with regard to medical personnel who co-operate with the doctor (nurses, support staff); when the law imposes the obligation on the doctor to disclose the information: expedition of medical certificates, obligation to report criminal behaviour (Penal Procedural Law art. 262), cooperation in judicial proceedings; when there are reasons of public welfare: such is the case with epidemics or contagious diseases; scientific and academic research (LGS art. 61), provided the identity of the patient is kept secret; and when the interest of the doctor deserves higher protection, for example, when the doctor has to prove in a judicial proceeding that the treatment was carried out with the due diligence, but not when the doctor merely wants to claim the price for the treatment. The Spanish Medical Code of Conduct also mentions exceptions to the obligation of secrecy – under art. 45 the doctor could use the medical records in medical publications, provided this is done in such a way that the patient cannot be identified; under art. 46 the doctor is not in breach of the obligation of secrecy if compelled to disclose the information by legal imperative, although the doctor must still be cautious and must assess whether there are still some particulars which should not be disclosed; under art. 48 if the doctor discovers during the treatment that a minor or any incapable person have been subject to physical or mental assault, the doctor should do what is needed to protect such persons, even by communicating the situation to the competent authorities.

IV.C.–8:110: Remedies for non-performance

With regard to any non-performance of an obligation under a contract for treatment, Book III, Chapter 3 (Remedies for Non-performance) and IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate) apply with the following adaptations:

(a) the treatment provider may not withhold performance or terminate the contractual relationship under that Chapter if this would seriously endanger the health of the patient; and

(b) in so far as the treatment provider has the right to withhold performance or to terminate the contractual relationship and is planning to exercise that right, the treatment provider must refer the patient to another treatment provider.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The normal remedies for non-performance of an obligation provided by Book III, Chapter 3 apply in the case of obligations under a contract for treatment. The remedies include withholding of performance, damages, price reduction and termination of the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance. The remedy of enforcing specific performance would also be available in theory but would be of restricted application in practice because of the personal nature of the obligations under a treatment contract. It could not be used, for example, to force a patient to undergo treatment (by enforcing the obligation to co-operate) but could be used by the patient to enforce an obligation to provide treatment if the patient so wished.

The right provided by IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate) also applies in the context of a contract for treatment and enables the patient to terminate the contractual relationship at any time.

This Article contains two adaptations of the normal rules. The treatment provider may not withhold performance or terminate the contractual relationship or if doing so would cause serious harm to the health of the patient. Even if the treatment provider exercises these rights, there is an obligation to refer the patient to another treatment provider. In practice the only situations in which the treatment provider would be likely to withhold performance or terminate the contractual relationship would be where the patient was not performing the obligation to co-operate or had repudiated the contract by stating in advance that there would be no payment.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

It is debated whether the treatment provider should be allowed to terminate the contractual relationship or withhold performance if the patient fails to perform reciprocal obligations under the contract – normally the obligations to co-operate and pay. On the one hand, it is argued that this right should not be exercised if that fact would, from an objective point of view, seriously endanger the health situation of the patient. On the other hand, not allowing the treatment provider to terminate the relationship or to withhold performance would excessively bind the treatment provider to the contract, not even allowing termination for a repudiation or fundamental non-performance by the patient. This could seem particularly hard in those cases, such as cosmetic surgery, where termination would not affect the patient's health.

In several legal systems, there are restrictions on the treatment provider's right to terminate the contractual relationship. It is generally accepted that the patient can terminate the relationship at any time and with no reason.

C. Preferred option

The preferred option is to limit but not remove the treatment provider's remedies of withholding performance or terminating the contractual relationship. The treatment provider is not allowed to exercise these remedies if the health of the patient would be seriously endangered by the consequences, i.e. the suspension or cessation of medical care administered by that specific treatment provider. The physical integrity of the patient is considered to be more important than the contractual freedom of the treatment provider and as such prevails. Even where the treatment provider is allowed to withhold performance or terminate, there is an obligation to refer the patient to another provider. The patient should not simply be left without anywhere to go.

No adaptations are considered necessary in relation to the patient's right to terminate the contractual relationship at any time under IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate). The normal restitutionary effects will follow. This means, among other things, that the patient would normally have to pay for any examinations or tests already carried out. The patient would not be allowed to obtain these for nothing and take them to another treatment provider. Under IV.C.–2:111 paragraph (3) the client who terminates without any ground to do so may be liable to pay damages for any loss suffered by the service provider. However, in the case of a treatment contract there is unlikely to be any such liability for damages because performance of the contractual obligation to treat would have been dependent in any event on the client's consent.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. While in FRANCE general contract law governs the question of termination by the treatment provider, in THE NETHERLANDS, and SWEDEN termination is restricted, and only allowed for important reasons. In Sweden this is the case of the lack of cooperation from the patient with the treatment provider while treatment is carried out. In addition, in The Netherlands the end of the fiduciary relationship between the treatment provider and the patient, fundamental disagreement about the treatment and geographical mobility of the patient are considered serious reasons for termination. In SPAIN termination is possible, but the treatment provider must give a term of notice to the patient, and cannot stop carrying out the treatment until the patient has found another treatment provider.
2. All the systems analysed agree that the patient can terminate the contractual relationship at any time, without needing to justify the termination. In SPAIN, however, though the termination is always effective immediately, if the patient did not give the treatment provider an adequate term of notice, good faith demands that the patient indemnifies the treatment provider.

II. Termination by the treatment provider

3. In FRANCE general contract law applies.

4. Termination of the contractual relationship by the health provider is possible in THE NETHERLANDS only for 'important reasons' (CC art. 7:460*)*. Termination is, for instance, possible if the provider of the service has developed personal feelings for the patient which hinder a proper performance of the contractual obligations, if the provider of the service retires from the profession, if the patient has moved outside the geographical area covered by the physician (especially if the physician is a General Practitioner) or if the necessary fiduciary relationship between the parties is lost due to a fundamental disagreement about the treatment. Cf. Sluyters, Gezondheidsrecht, ad art. 7:460.

5. In POLAND the doctor may not withdraw from providing the treatment if this could cause death, grave bodily injury or severe health disorder (Act on the profession of a doctor, art. 38(1)). If the doctor is about to withdraw, he or she is obliged to inform the patient sufficiently early about this intention and indicate to the patient a real possibility of obtaining treatment from another doctor (art. 38 (2)). If the doctor acts as an employee, he or she may refuse to treat or withdraw from providing the treatment only for important reasons, after obtaining the consent of the employer. The doctor must indicate the fact of withdrawal and the reasons for it in the medical records of the patient. Based on similar principles a doctor may refuse treatment which is contrary to his or her conscience (art. 39).

6. In SCOTLAND general contract law applies but this must be seen in context. Most medical treatments are carried out under the national health service. Termination of a private doctor/patient relationship would not leave the patient without the normal right to treatment under the national health service. Moreover a sudden cessation of treatment likely to place the patient in danger or cause the patient suffering would probably give rise to contractual or non-contractual liability for failure to exercise the required degree of skill and care.

7. The provisions of the SPANISH CC regarding the contract of services do not say whether the professional may cancel the relationship with the client. The rules on the contract of mandate (CC art. 1733) are deemed appropriate to apply to these cases by way of analogy. The medical service provider must notify the patient of the intention to bring the relationship to an end but is obliged to continue providing the service until the patient is able to adapt to the new situation (e.g. find another specialist to continue the treatment) in accordance with CC art. 1737 (mandate). Such a rule derives from the type of activity carried out by medical service providers. The Medical Code of Conduct establishes in art. 10 that when the patient refuses to follow a treatment the doctor deems necessary or when the patient requires the doctor to provide a treatment deemed inadequate or unacceptable by the doctor due to scientific or ethical reasons, the latter is exempted from the obligation to provide assistance.

8. In SWEDEN if the patient refuses a certain kind of measure, for instance refusing blood transfusion at an operation, then the doctor is entitled to refuse to perform the operation (Sverne and Sverne, Patientens rätt[3], p. 20).

III. Termination by the patient

9. In FRANCE the consent to the treatment can be withdrawn at any time (NCH article L. 1111-4 para. 3).

10. Termination of the contractual relationship by the patient is regulated in the DUTCH CC art. 7:408 para. 1 (in the Chapter on Services in General). It provides that the client may terminate the relationship at any time. The parties may not derogate from this provision to the detriment of the patient (cf. art. 7:413 para. 2).

11. In principle, the patient is allowed to terminate the treatment at any time in POLAND.

12. In SCOTLAND normal contract law applies but the facts that the consent of the patient is required for any intervention and that specific performance would be unavailable mean that the patient has considerable freedom to repudiate a treatment contract without liability.

13. In SPAIN the service contract concluded between doctor and patient is regarded as similar to the contract of mandate (CC art. 1733), a contract where mainly the interest of the patient is protected. Therefore, if the interest of the patient in continuing the relationship disappears, he or she can bring it to an end. Part of the doctrine justifies this prerogative in the theory of the "prevalent interests" whilst other authors argue that it is justified by the principle of confidence (CC art. 1732 para. 1). There is no need to justify the termination but the professional has to be informed about the decision. Notification of termination may be given expressly or tacitly (e.g. when the patient has recourse to another specialist to treat the same illness). If the professional is not aware of the termination because the patient has not given notice, and thus continues providing treatment, the patient must pay for such treatment. The declaration of termination is always effective, with or without notification, although in some cases good faith requires the patient to notify the doctor or pay compensation.

14. Generally the patient may cancel at any time in FINLAND and SWEDEN. There are however exceptions, for instance in the case of compulsory institutional care for the mentally ill or addicts.

IV.C.–8:111: Obligations of treatment-providing organisations

(1) If, in the process of performance of the obligations under the treatment contract, activities take place in a hospital or on the premises of another treatment-providing organisation, and the hospital or that other treatment-providing organisation is not a party to the treatment contract, it must make clear to the patient that it is not the contracting party.

(2) Where the treatment provider cannot be identified, the hospital or treatment-providing organisation in which the treatment took place is treated as the treatment provider unless the hospital or treatment-providing organisation informs the patient, within a reasonable time, of the identity of the treatment provider.

(3) The parties may not, to the detriment of the patient, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

It commonly happens in some countries that health-care professionals without an employment contract with or a functional link to a hospital are allowed by that hospital to administer treatment on its premises. This situation may result in uncertainty about the legal rights of patients. The idea underlying this Article is that a treatment-providing organisation, such as a hospital or an asylum, should make its own position clear and should inform the patient of the identity of the treatment provider. If the treatment provider cannot be identified the organisation will be treated as the treatment provider.

Illustration

A patient has light surgery in a hospital. A doctor within the premises of the hospital attends him. The surgery leaves an ugly scar. The patient seeks an explanation, but the hospital declines any responsibility as the patient did not conclude the contract with the hospital, but with an independent doctor acting within its premises. The patient demands to be informed about the identity of the doctor, but the hospital administration has no information and the patient cannot remember the doctor's name, as he was convinced that he was an employee of the hospital. This Article applies.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Many cases of failure to perform obligations under treatment contracts arise in the context of a complex treatment-providing organisation, such as a hospital or an asylum. Health-care professionals who are not employed by the organisation very often perform treatment on its premises, and uncertainties may arise because of that. Similarly, non-performance of the treatment obligations is often caused by problems in the administration and organisation of such institutions or by defects in their equipment or premises.

From the patient's point of view, it would be highly desirable if there was no need to be bothered by organisational issues of which he or she could not reasonably be expected to be aware. On this view, the patient should be able to bring a claim for non-performance against the hospital or asylum regardless of whether that hospital or asylum is the contracting party itself or only the place where the independent treatment provider operates. It can be argued that, for the sake of certainty and patient protection, such a regime would be desirable. The difficulties of identifying the professional involved and sorting out responsibilities if various causes contributed to the non-performance make it extremely difficult for the patient to bring a claim. So a rule imposing central liability on the organisation could directly benefit patients. Another advantage of such a rule might be to enhance prevention, as the hospital or other similar institution would engage itself actively in the organisation and supervision of the activities of its professionals. The financial problems posed by such a regime to small treatment-providing organisations could possibly be overcome or alleviated by compensation funds pooling.

On the other hand it is argued that such a stringent regime would have serious financial consequences for hospitals which to a great extent rely on freelance health-care professionals. Insurance premiums would probably rise.

Another position is that such a rule should not operate automatically, but only if the liable freelance professional cannot be identified in a similar way to what is provided by Article 3(3) of Directive 85/374/EEC of the European Council regarding liability for defective products.

Implementing full-fledged central liability of treatment providing organisations is not deemed desirable; such central liability would have too high an economic impact on small hospitals. Moreover, this would lead to conceptual problems regarding the extension of liability to an institution which was not a party to the contract, albeit that it benefited from that contract and permitted the contractual party to act within its premises.

However, in balancing the interests involved, it seems not unreasonable to provide that the patient who suffers from a non-performance of obligations under the contract is entitled to some assistance from the treatment-providing organisation in identifying the party liable for the non-performance. The preferred option is therefore to oblige the treatment-providing organisation to indicate, at the patient's request, who is the contracting party. If it fails to provide the patient with the identity of the individual treatment provider within a reasonable time after being so requested, it is regarded as being the contracting party and may be held liable for non-performance.

Moreover, the patient is entitled to know who the contractual counterpart is before the contract is being performed. Paragraph (1) of the present Article therefore requires the treatment providing organisation to make clear to the patient that it is not the contractual party, and that treatment will be performed by an independent, autonomous healthcare professional acting within its premises.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. Rules of the type provided in the Article, or going further and imposing central liability, are found in only some systems. Most countries have no such rules. In some countries the problems do not arise because of the way the health care system is organised.

2. In THE NETHERLANDS, a provision of the CC establishes a central liability of hospitals, i.e. if treatment is carried out in a hospital that hospital is liable for injury caused to a patient, even if that hospital is not the contractual party. If the injury is caused by an independent healthcare professional who has a contract with the patient, the hospital in whose premises treatment is performed is liable for the damages suffered by the patient. This is also the case in SPAIN and in public hospitals in FRANCE and ITALY. In AUSTRIA and GREECE the hospital is not liable for the acts of independent practitioners working in its premises, unless the institution contributed to the non-performance of the treatment obligations. In FINLAND and SWEDEN it is not important to know who is responsible for the damage, as it is the patient insurance consortium which compensates patients. In addition, in this country, hospitals only allow their own employees to act within their premises.

II. Central liability of hospitals

3. In AUSTRIA one has to distinguish between contracts for treatment concluded with doctors and ones between the patient and a hospital. In the latter case, the treating doctors are employed by the hospital and in no contractual relationship with the patient themselves. Thus they are considered assistants in performing the obligations pursuant to § 1313a. The hospital, or rather the legal entity running the business is contractually liable for any faults committed by its employees in relation to the patient. The treating person (doctor, assistant, nurse, etc.) can only be held liable delictually which will not be very relevant for the aggrieved patient since he or she will rather seek damages from the more powerful party, that is the legal entity behind the hospital. If the treating doctor is not employed by the hospital, the patient concludes a contract with the doctor who then uses the facilities of a hospital to carry out the operation. It is quite clear that the doctor is now primarily the person who is contractually liable. The interesting question is to what extent the doctor is responsible for misconduct on the part of employees of the hospital who provide necessary assistance. Here, it is accepted that those persons assisting the treating doctor are to be seen as his or her assistants as well according to § 1313a.

4. Two situations have to be distinguished in FRANCE. If the doctor acts in the framework of a hospital, the latter is liable only if there is a labour contract with the doctor (Cass.crim. 5 March 1992, Bull.crim. no. 101; JCP 1993.II.22013, note F. Chabas; RTD civ 1993, 137, obs. P. Jourdain). In this situation the patient concluded a medical contract directly with the hospital. On the other hand if the doctor acts as a liberal professional, he or she is the only person responsible, even if the medical act has been performed in a hospital. The doctor is also liable for the fault of any auxiliary he or she chooses (anaesthetist, nurse, etc.) The solution is different if the treatment takes place in a public hospital. The latter is in any case liable for the malpractice of the doctors. The fault of the doctor is always a fault of the administrative service (faute de service) and the personal fault of the doctor is not detachable from his or her functions (For more information about these concepts of administrative law, see Chapus, Droit administratif général I[11], nos. 1523 ff).

5. The question whether and to what extent treatment institutions, such as hospitals and private clinics, bear the responsibility for a medical fault is not a straightforward one under GREEK law. A lot depends on the agreement between the parties, i.e. patient and doctor and the institution, and the relevant circumstances (Foundedaki, Medical liability in civil law, p. 200). If the patient concludes on a personal basis a contract for the provision of medical services with a doctor who is an external associate of the institution where the service is carried out, the institution is liable for the provision of the adequate infrastructure and paramedical care. Thus, it cannot be held liable for any medical fault. The same view is held with regard to doctors that are not just external associates but employees of the institution in question, in case the patient enters into an agreement with the doctor on a personal basis. However, case law seems inclined to acknowledge liability of the hospital for medical fault in the previous types of cases on the basis of CC art. 922 (A.P. 241/1954 EEN 21, 949; A.P. 1893/1984 NoV 33, 1955; A.P. 1270/1989, EllDik 1991, 765). On the other hand, if the patient enters into an agreement for the provision of medical services with an institution, without a personal agreement with a particular doctor, the institution undertakes the whole liability, i.e. for medical and other associated services. The institution is liable for the fault of its medical staff on a contractual (CC art. 334) as well as delictual (CC art. 922) basis. Also, if the patient can opt for a particular doctor and the doctor agrees to act, then there is in addition a contractual bond between patient and doctor.

6. In ITALY the first question is whether there is a direct liability of the organisation towards the patient. A second question is whether such a liability is contractual or non-contractual. The questions are closely related. If it is a case of contractual liability, due to the contractual relationship between the patient and the hospital, it is a case of direct liability. This is true both when it is a private hospital (on the basis of CC art. 1228) and when it is a public one. In this latter case, the liability is inherent to the provision in CC art. 2049, and is related to special provisions governing the Public Administration. As regards the nature of the liability, while there is no doubt about the contractual nature in the case of a private hospital or other organisation, there has been debate about the nature of the liability in the case of a public one. The most recent case law tends to favour contractual liability (Alpa, Riv.it.med.leg. 1999, fasc. 1 (February), p. 40). Even where it is impossible to identify the doctor who should have fulfilled the duty to inform, there is a direct responsibility of the Public Administration for the illicit act of the employee (Cass. 24 September 1997, no. 9374, Riv.it.med.leg., 1998, fasc. 4-5 (October) I, with note F. Introna, Consenso informato e rifiuto ragionato. L´informazione deve essere dettagliata o sommaria?, pp. 825-830). This occurs as long as a link of causality between the behaviour of the employee and the damage to the patient has been proved.

7. If the performance of the obligations under the treatment contract takes place in a DUTCH hospital (see below) the legal person on whose premises the service is executed is liable for the faults of the person who performs the obligations. Liability can be based on either of the following grounds. 1. If the hospital (the legal person) is the contracting party (and thus ‘the provider of the service’ under CC art. 7:446), it is liable for faults of the person who actually performs the contractual obligations: according to CC art. 6:76, a party is responsible for the acts of a person whose services it uses in the performance of the obligation. Liability is then based on the normal rules regarding non-performance and it does not matter whether the person who actually performs is employed by the hospital or not. 2. If the hospital is not a party to the contract (because the contract is concluded by a doctor in person, who is then to be considered ‘the provider of the service’), the hospital is liable as though it were a party to the contract. Liability of the hospital is then directly based on CC art. 7:462, para. 1, which states that if in the process of performance of obligations under the treatment contract activities take place in a hospital that is not a party to the contract, the hospital is jointly and severally liable for a failure in the performance as if the hospital were a party to the contract. Therefore, due to CC art. 7:462, para. 1, for the patient it is not very important to know with whom he or she has concluded the treatment contract: in either case the patient can hold the hospital liable for the faults committed by a doctor. CC art. 7:462 therefore gives the patient a ‘central address’ to which a liability claim can be directed. Because of that, the hospital’s liability is called the ‘central liability’.

Cf. Hondius, Ontwikkelingen in de civielrechtelijke aansprakelijkheid van arts en ziekenhuis, pp. 64-65; Pitlo [-du Perron], VI[9], pp. 278-279; Sluyters, TvG 1996, p. 7; Legemaate, Verantwoordingsplicht en aansprakelijkheid in de gezondheidszorg, 1996, p, 45-46. It should be noted that the notion of 'hospital' includes a nursing home, a home for the mentally handicapped, an abortion clinic or a dental institution (CC art. 7:462, para. 2), but not a private clinic, cf. Hondius, Ontwikkelingen in de civielrechtelijke aansprakelijkheid van arts en ziekenhuis, p. 65. Hondius rightly criticises this. If the hospital is the contracting party, the doctor who committed the fault may be held personally liable if his or her actions amount to an unlawful act within the meaning of CC art. 6:162 (which will probably be the case). If the doctor is the contracting party, his or her personal liability is of course based of non-performance of the contractual obligations.

8. On the basis of the SPANISH CC art. 1903, para. 4 (culpa in vigilando or in eligendo), the medical institution is responsible for the behaviour of the medical treatment providers who act in the framework of the institution, even when there is no contractual relationship between the patient and the institution. The medical centre is directly (and not subsidiarily) liable, thus it is not necessary for the claimant to sue the medical provider. There is a presumption of fault on the institution, which may be rebutted by proving that the institution acted with due diligence (TS 21 September 1993 RJ 1993/6650; TS 11 March 1995 RJ 1995/3133; TS 11 March 1996 RJ 1996/2415; TS 15 October 1996 RJ 1996/7110; TS 7 April 1997, RJ 1997/2742). The current tendency moves towards imposing an objective liability on the medical centres in order to guarantee that the victim will be indemnified.

9. Since all professional actors within the health and medical service are obliged to be insured under the FINNISH Patient's Injury Act s. 4 and the SWEDISH PL art. 12, it is not so important who is responsible for the damage, since in the end, it is the insurance company which pays. Even in the rare cases when this duty to be insured has been neglected, the patient can still get compensation from the Patient Insurance Association (Sverne and Sverne, Patientens rätt[3], p. 88). Generally, hospitals let only their own personnel act within their premises. The hospital will always be liable for its own personnel.

PART D. MANDATE CONTRACTS

CHAPTER 1: GENERAL PROVISIONS

IV.D.–1:101: Scope

(1) This Part of Book IV applies to contracts and other juridical acts under which a person, the agent, is authorised and instructed (mandated) by another person, the principal:

(a) to conclude a contract between the principal and a third party or otherwise directly affect the legal position of the principal in relation to a third party;

(b) to conclude a contract with a third party, or do another juridical act in relation to a third party, on behalf of the principal but in such a way that the agent and not the principal is a party to the contract or other juridical act; or

(c) to take steps which are meant to lead to, or facilitate, the conclusion of a contract between the principal and a third party or the doing of another juridical act which would affect the legal position of the principal in relation to a third party.

(2) It applies where the agent undertakes to act on behalf of, and in accordance with the instructions of, the principal and, with appropriate adaptations, where the agent is merely authorised but does not undertake to act, but nevertheless does act.

(3) It applies where the agent is to be paid a price and, with appropriate adaptations, where the agent is not to be paid a price.

(4) It applies only to the internal relationship between the principal and the agent (the mandate relationship). It does not apply to the relationship between the principal and the third party or the relationship (if any) between the agent and the third party.

(5) Contracts to which this Part applies and to which Part C (Services) also applies are to be regarded as falling primarily under this Part.

(6) This Part does not apply to contracts pertaining to investment services and activities as defined by Directive 2004/39/EC, OJ L 145/1, as subsequently amended or replaced.

COMMENTS

A. General

The present Article indicates the scope of the Part on Mandate Contracts. The first paragraph makes it clear that the Part applies to three types of situation. The first such situation is direct representation, where the agent is authorised and instructed to directly affect the legal position of the principal in relation to a third party, typically by concluding a contract between the principal and the third party. The second situation is indirect representation, where the agent is authorised and instructed to conclude a contract with a third party, or do another juridical act in relation to a third party, on behalf of the principal but in such a way that the agent and not the principal is a party to the contract or other juridical act. And the third situation is brokerage and similar activities, where the agent is authorised and instructed to take steps which are meant to lead to, or facilitate, the conclusion of a contract between the principal and a third party or the doing of another juridical act which would affect the legal position of the principal in relation to a third party, but without actually concluding a contract or doing the other juridical act for the principal. A typical example of this last situation would be an estate agent who is asked to find a buyer for a property, or a property for a buyer, but not to actually conclude a contract. The reason for including this last type of contract is that it is very closely linked to the other types and to exclude it could enable principals to deprive agents of protections provided by this Part.

Because the scope of the Part extends beyond direct and indirect representation, the word "representative" would not here be appropriate to designate the party who acts for the principal. The term "mandatary" could have been used but as that is sometimes associated exclusively with those acting gratuitously and is, in any event, not a common word in everyday speech, it has not been chosen. A compound term such as "representative or intermediary" or "representative or broker" could have been used but that would have been cumbersome. The term "agent" has therefore been chosen. In ordinary language the term "agent" also covers agents who are instructed to do non-juridical acts, such as making enquiries, which have nothing to do with the conclusion of contracts. So it is only certain types of agent who are within the scope of this Part. Essentially it is concerned with mandates for representation, negotiation or intermediation in relation to the conclusion of contracts or the doing of other juridical acts.

The location of the provisions which now appear in this Part was debated within the Study Group. One argument was that they belonged most appropriately as a Chapter in the Part on Service Contracts, because they were essentially concerned with contracts for the provision of representation or intermediation services. Another argument was that they were sufficiently distinctive to merit separate treatment. Mandates were very often unilateral acts. The focus of the provisions was more on what was authorised and instructed than on what the mandatary as a service provider undertook to provide. In relation to contracts for representation there was something special about the situation where one person could affect another's legal position. The second argument prevailed.

The fact that contracts for the provision of representation, negotiation or intermediation services are dealt with in a separate Part does not, however, mean that their character changes. They are still contracts for the provision of services. An estate agent or an employment agency or a solicitor, for example, provides services. So provisions elsewhere in the DCFR which refer to the provision of services (as is the case for example with many of the pre-contractual information duties in Book II, Chapter 3) will, unless otherwise stated, apply to such contracts.

B. Authorisation and instruction

The characteristic elements of a mandate contract are that the agent is both allowed (authorised) and required (instructed) to conclude a contract between the principal and a third party or to do any of the other acts covered by the Article.

In the case of direct representation, the fact that the agent is authorised to act on behalf of the principal implies that the exercise of a mandate and the legal consequences in the external relationship are based on the free will of the principal: by authorising the agent the principal consents to the agent concluding a contract on the principal's behalf or otherwise affecting the principal's legal position. The authorisation also implies that where the agent respects the limits indicated in the mandate and acts in accordance with the provisions in this Part, the agent may not be held liable for concluding a contract with the third party which turns out to be detrimental to the principal: the principal assumes that risk.

The fact that the agent is also required to act on behalf of the principal indicates that the agent is under a legal obligation to at least attempt to complete the mandated task. By concluding the mandate contract the agent therefore undertakes an obligation to act.

C. Application to contracts without obligation to act

The rules on mandate normally apply to contracts by which the agent is not only authorised, but also required to act on behalf of the principal. Paragraph (2) extends the scope of this Part to contracts in which the agent is authorised but not required to act on behalf of the principal. Obviously, this provision is of relevance when the agent indeed acts on behalf of the principal.

D. Application to remunerated and gratuitous contracts

Paragraph (3) indicates that the present Part applies to all mandate contracts by which the agent is to be rewarded but also applies to gratuitous mandate services. Adjustments may be necessary in order to take into account that the agent was acting gratuitously. In the case of gratuitous mandate contracts, one could for instance imagine that the standard of care and skill expected under IV.D.–3:103 (Obligation of skill and care) will be lower and the obligation to inform the principal of the progress of the performance of the mandate contract and the obligation to give account are more restrictive than would be the case for a remunerated mandate contract. Moreover, IV.D.–2:103 (Expenses incurred by agent) paragraph (2) in particular applies where the parties have agreed upon the mandate contract being performed gratuitously.

Paragraph (6) excludes the application of these rules to investment services contracts.

E. External relationship not covered

Paragraph (4) provides that this Part is concerned with the contractual obligations between the principal and the agent only. This Part does not relate to the question whether or not the 'prospective' contract with the third party is valid or invalid: that question is governed by Book II, Chapter 6 on Representation. As is indicated in II.–6:101 (Scope) (paragraph 3), Chapter 6 of Book II only deals with the relationship between the principal and the third party (external relationship); it explicitly leaves the internal relationship between the principal and the representative to the Part on Mandate (see II.–6:101 Comment C).

F. Prospective contract or other legal effects

This Part will typically apply to mandates for direct representation in which the representative is mandated to conclude a contract on behalf of the principal, the second contract being referred to as 'the prospective contract', as defined in IV.D.–1:102 (Definitions) subparagraph (d). However, occasionally the representative will not be mandated to conclude a contract, but to otherwise affect the legal relations of the principal.

Illustration

A lawyer is instructed to file a lawsuit against another party for damages in tort. In this particular situation, when filing the lawsuit the representative actually does intend to affect the legal relations of the principal with the third party, but not by concluding a contract with that third party. Such mandate contracts are covered by the present Part.

G. Mixed contracts

Many mandate contracts will involve also the provision of services – for example, information or advice services or investigatory services. Paragraph (5) provides that such cases are to be regarded as falling primarily within this Part. The effect is to bring into operation paragraph (4) of II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts) so that the rules applicable to mandate contracts apply to the contract and the rights and obligations arising from it. However, the services rules will apply with any appropriate adaptations so far as is necessary to regulate the services elements and provided they do not conflict with the rules applicable to mandate contracts.

H. Investment services and activities not covered

Paragraph (6) indicates that mandate contracts are nevertheless exempted from the application of this Part if they pertain to investment services and activities. The reason for the limitation of the scope of the Part in this respect is that these mandate contracts are regulated by specific legal instruments, which are of a very different nature and to a large extent introduce public law requirements and supervision. These mandate contracts therefore differ so much from ordinary mandate contracts that application of the provisions of this Part would be restricted to extraordinary situations for which the public law regulation would not provide a solution, which would make the application of this Part merely accidental. In case there were such a need, a court could of course apply this Part by way of analogy, but these rules do not claim application by themselves.

I. Contracts for the administration of affairs not covered

Traditionally, contracts for the general administration of affairs are covered by provisions on mandate contracts. In the case of these 'general mandate contracts', the agent is not necessarily instructed to conclude, negotiate or facilitate a prospective contract, but merely to administer the affairs of the principal. Such contracts can therefore not be considered mandate contracts in the sense of this Part; they fall within the scope of the Part on service contracts and may occasionally be governed more specifically by the Chapter on storage (Book IV.B, Chapter 5) and possibly by the Chapter on processing (Book IV.B, Chapter 4). However, in the performance of such a contract, the service provider often has to affect the legal relations of the principal, e.g. when property belonging to the principal must be sold to safeguard the principal's interests. Where in the course of a contract of administration the service provider is required to buy or sell goods, or do any other juridical acts on behalf of the principal, the present Part may be applied by virtue of the rules on mixed contracts.

NOTES

I. Rules applicable to mandate contracts for direct representation

1. The AUSTRIAN legal system draws a distinction between the different activities of the direct and the indirect representative. Direct representatives have power to bind and entitle their principals contractually. They act 'in the name of' their principal. The mandate for direct representation covers cases where the third party knows that the counterparty is dealing as a representative for a named principal. Indirect representatives deal with the outside world as parties but internally owe the duties of an agent to their (disclosed) principals. The Civil Code deals expressly only with the mandate for direct representation, namely in CC §§ 1002 et seq. Where the representative acts within the scope of the express or apparent authority as defined by CC §§ 1027-1029, 1033 and Ccom § 56, the acts bind the principal and the third party directly and the representative drops out. The general rules established by the Civil Code are often modified by canons of professional ethics – the conduct rules (Berufsordnungen) of solicitors and notaries, e.g. statutory tariffs regulating the remuneration. The commercial regulations of Ccom §§ 383 et seq. and 407 et seq. also deal with the mandate for direct representation.

2. In BELGIUM the legal relation between the parties to a contract for representation is governed by the legal rules on mandate (with some particularities), i.e. the legal relation between the principal and the commission-agent (Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 182; Van der Perre and Lejeune, Droit commercial I, no. 42), between the principal and the prête nom (CA Brussels 22 Feb 1927, Pas. 1928, II, 153 and Rev. prat. not. 1928, 648; de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 476; Deckers, Le mandat, 13; Paulus und Boes, Lastgeving, 23; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 94-95) and between the principal and the mandatary acting in his or her own name (Cass. 17 Apr 1848, Pas. 1848, I, 387 and BJ 1848, 758; CA Brussels 10 Dec 1958, JT 1959, 225; CA Brussels 28 Jan 1820, Pas. 1820-21, II, 30; de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 436; Laurent, 61; Paulus und Boes, Lastgeving, 134; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 305; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 277; Van der Perre and Lejeune, Droit commercial I, no. 166; Wéry, Le mandat, 152 and 259).

3. In the BULGARIAN law of obligations, a differentiation is made, on the one hand, between a mandate contract (Договор за поръчка) and a unilateral legal act of authorisation (Пълномощно), and, on the other hand, between direct representation (Пряко представителство) and indirect representation (Косвено представителство). According to some commentators, so called "indirect representation" is not an actual representation, but a separate legal institute different from direct representation (Horozov, SP 1996/6, 26, 32; Stavrou, TP 2006, 325, 343). The general mandate contract is regulated in arts. 280-292 of the Law on Obligations Act. According to the legal definition in LOA art. 280, a mandate is a contract "under which the agent assumes the obligation to perform, on behalf of the principal, the acts for which he is assigned by the latter". Although in the relevant rules it is not explicitly stated, it is unanimously considered in legal writings (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 20; Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 17; Vassilev, B., Spezialna chast, 92) and in case law (Supreme Court, Judgment no. 31, 4 Apr 1995, Civil Case 2453/1993, V; Supreme Court, Judgment no. 1511, 6 Oct 1995, Civil Case 2551/1994, V) that by virtue of a mandate contract the agent is mandated only for legal assignments, i.e. conclusion of contracts or performance of other juridical acts that affect the legal sphere of the principal. The agent can act either in the name of the principal (direct representation) or in his or her own name (indirect representation), but in any case acts on behalf of the principal. The same rules (LOA arts. 280-292) are applicable to both direct and indirect representation. In order to act in the name of the principal and to affect directly the principal's legal position, the agent has to obtain, from the principal, authority for representation. This authority is granted by means of a unilateral legal act of the principal under which the principal authorises the agent to act in the principal's name and to affect the principal's legal sphere (Vassilev, L., Grajdansko pravo^2, 368). The legal act of authorisation is also regulated in LOA arts. 36-43, which articles are applicable to direct representation as well.

4. The most important DANISH statutory rules on agency law are Part II of the Contracts Act on agency, the Factors Act and the Commercial Agents and Travellers Act. These rules are general rules governing all kind of civil agency not governed by special ruling.

5. The relevant rules in ENGLISH law are the common law rules of agency, which are of a general nature and apply to a wide variety of agents (estate agents, travel agents, insurance brokers, company directors etc). An agency relationship refers to the branch of law under which 'one person, the agent, may directly affect the legal relations of another, the principal, as regards yet other persons, called third parties, by acts which the agent is said to have the principal's authority to perform on his behalf, which, when done are in some respects treated as the principal's' (Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[18], no. 1-003). Because the agent has the power to affect the principal's legal relations with third parties, the internal agency relationship, i.e. the relationship between the agent and the principal, is regarded as a fiduciary relationship. In addition to normal contractual obligations, the agent is also bound by fiduciary obligations, imposed by equity. An agent who merely negotiates the terms of a contract for a principal, such as a solicitor, is also regarded as an agent and the traditional common law rules will therefore apply.

6. In ESTONIA contracts governing the internal relationship between the agent and the principal are regulated by the rules on contracts for services (mandate). The Estonian Law of Obligations Act contains a separate part on 'Contracts for Provision of Services' (part 8, §§ 619-916). There are two general types of the 'services contracts': the (general) contract for services (sometimes also translated as 'mandate contract' or 'authorisation agreement') and the contract of works. These two main types are distinguished by the nature of the obligations rising under the contract. Under the contract of works, the service provider is under a duty to guarantee the result envisaged by the contract, whereas under the (general) services contract the service provider is only under a duty of care. Any agreement on a provision of services that is not a contract of works (i.e. by which the service provider does not guarantee a specific result) comes under the contract for services. The LOA does not specify which services come under the (general) contract for services. In principle, any agreement by which representation or intermediation is provided comes under the scope of the general contract for services. Specific forms of representation or intermediation may, however, come under the scope of a specific services contract such as the contract of agency (Handelsvertretervertrag), brokerage contract (Maklervertrag) or a commissionaire agreement. The general rules of the contract for services apply also for its sub-types as far as their regulation does not contain a more specific provision.

7. The FINNISH Contracts Act contains general rules on mandate contracts in chapter 2. These rules are applicable when the authorisation includes a mandate to conclude contracts on behalf of the principal. The Law of Contract applies to all such contracts, unless otherwise provided in another Act. Further, chapter 18 of the Commercial Code includes general rules on authorisation concerning the relation between the principal and the agent. These rules, too, are only applicable if not otherwise provided in another Act. The Commercial Agents and Salesmen Act, based on EC directive (86/653/EEC), is applicable when the agent has undertaken continuously to promote the sale or purchase of goods on behalf of the principal by obtaining offers for the principal or by concluding sales or purchase contracts in the name of the principal. In addition, there are rules on specific types of authorisation in legislation, e.g. chapter 15 of the Code of Judicial Procedure, the Attorneys Act, the Real Estate Agent Act and the Insurance Agent Act. Otherwise the general principles of Contract Law are applicable as well as analogous interpretation of other legislation in the area of Contract Law. Of general importance are, for instance, the Sales of Goods Act and the Consumer Protection Act.

8. Mandate contracts are governed by the FRENCH CC arts. 1984-2007. Some contracts involving mandate are the subject of special rules, particularly for estate agents (Law 2 Jan 1970), commercial agents (Ccom arts. L. 134-1 s.), insurance agents (Insurance Code arts. L. 520-1 s.), barristers and solicitors (L. 31 Dec. 1971).

9. GERMAN law has a number of groups of rules which are to be applied, depending on the characteristics of the contract at hand. (a) The first such group is on Mandate (Auftrag, CC §§ 662-674). By accepting a mandate the mandatary (Beauftragter) enters into an obligation to do something for the principal (Auftraggeber) without remuneration (CC § 662). The provisions on mandate are thus not restricted to constellations in which the task of the mandatary is to conclude a contract or execute a juridical act; the task envisaged can essentially be anything. As a mandate by definition is a contract under which the mandatary acts without being paid for, the importance of CC §§ 663-674 primarily results from the fact that other provisions in the Civil Code make reference to them. (b) The most important contract in the sense just mentioned is the agency contract (Geschäftsbesorgungsvertrag, CC § 675), i.e. a contract for services by which one party undertakes to look after the interests of the other party for a remuneration. CC § 675 will thus cover the (practically much more important) contracts in which the agent is paid for the actions taken on behalf of the principal (e.g. lawyer, estate manager, administrator of property etc.). CC § 675 does not stipulate the specific rules applicable to a Geschäftsbesorgungsvertrag, but rather says that CC §§ 663, 665-670, 672-674 and, under certain circumstances, § 671(2) (i.e. rules on mandate) apply. In addition, the provisions on either contracts for services (CC §§ 611 et seq.) or contracts for works (CC §§ 631 et seq.) apply. (c) CC §§ 675a-676h contain specific provisions for special types of banking contracts (largely introduced because of EC directives).

10. Mandate for direct representation (άμεση αντιπροσώπευση, amesi antiprosopeusi) is regulated in the GREEK CC arts. 211 et seq. In order for the principal to be bound by the juridical acts of the agent, the latter must have acted in the name of the principal, i.e. to have disclosed to the third party both the existence and the identity of the principal. The disclosure may be express or tacit, i.e. it may be indicated from the surrounding circumstances (tacit mandate) (Supreme Court decision no. 752/1987, NoV, 1426; CA Athens decision no. 9826/1989, EllDni 1991, 1631). That is the situation where the agent reveals the existence but not the identity of the principal (Kerameus and Kozyris, Introduction^2, 70). The Greek term for 'procuration' or power of attorney (πληρεξουσιότητα, plirexousiotita) signifies both the juridical act by which a person confers agent authority to another, and the authority conferred thereby. According to CC art. 216, a mandate is to be conferred by a deed drawn up for this purpose. A mandate is to be given by means of a declaration addressed to the attorney or a third party with whom the deed is concluded (CC art. 217).

11. In the HUNGARIAN CC, the rules of representation (external relationship – authority of agents) can be found among the general rules on obligations (arts. 219-225). For this reason, the technique of representation is not bound to any special contract type. If one party represents the other, the contract is usually qualified as agency (CC arts. 474-483) but employees bound by an employment contract may also represent the employer towards third parties. In this last case, the rules of labour law apply (Act XXII of 1992 on the Code of Labour (CL)). The rules of the 'agency' contract type do not focus on services for representation but apply to all contracts where the debtor (agent) has the obligation to do something according to the instructions and according to the interests of the creditor (principal) without the duty to 'create a result achievable by work'. CC art. 474(1)-(2) establish that '[u]pon an agency contract the agent has the obligation to carry out the matters entrusted to him. An agent must fulfil the agency according to the instructions and interests of the principal'. See Supreme Court Pfv. V. 20. 876/1994, in BH1995. 571; Supreme Court Pfv. VIII. 21.147/2006, in BH2007. 86; Supreme Court Mfv. II. 11.035/2001, in BH2003. 386; Supreme Court Mfv. I. 10.945/2001, in BH2003. 213; Supreme Court Legf. Bír. Gfv. X. 32.294/1995, in BH1997. 302; Supreme Court M. törv. II. 10 978/1991, in BH1992. 736; Supreme Court Gf. II. 30 521/1986, in BH1987. 174; CA Csongrád Megyei Bíróság 1. Gf. 40 079/1999/2, in BDT2000. 185; CA Fővárosi Ítélőtábla 5. Pf. 21 230/2005/3, in BDT2007. 1598.

12. In IRELAND, the primary rules are to be found in the terms of the agency contract. The normal rules of construction will apply to give effect to the intentions of the parties, when interpreting this contract. Further, at common law, the law of agency imposes various rights and obligations on the parties to the agency contract. In particular, an agent is given three basic rights: to remuneration, to an indemnity and to a lien. The common law traditionally regarded agents as independent businesses and took the view that the agent was in the stronger position than the principal. Hence, the principal was in need of protection. As a result, the common law imposed on agents extensive duties, partly because of the fiduciary nature of the agency relationship. In addition, many representation/agency contracts are also subject to the EC (Commercial Agents) Regulations 1994 (SI No. 33/1994) and 1997 (SI No. 31/1997), which partly codify and partly modify the common law and were passed to implement the EC Directive on self-employed commercial agents (Directive 86/653/EEC, [1986] OJ L 382/17).

13. In ITALY if the agent's main obligation under the contract is to represent the principal, the rules governing mandate apply, and in particular CC arts. 1388 et seq. The rules governing the contract of mandate (mandato) also specifically apply, i.e. CC arts. 1703 et seq. See Cass. no. 5582/1993, Foro It. Mass., 1993, 4070, no. 6; Cass no. 1329/1983, Foro It. Mass., 1983, 4070, no. 2.

14. In the NETHERLANDS rules on mandate contracts have been established in the CC arts. 414-424. According to CC art. 7:414, mandate contracts imply that the agent undertakes an obligation to the principal to perform one or more juridical acts in the name and on account of this principal (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 5; Haak and Zwitser, Opdracht aan hulppersonen, 153-154.). If no specific rules on certain legal issues that relate to mandate contracts have been established, the general rules that apply to contracts for professional services apply (CC arts. 7:400-413).

15. In POLAND, the internal relationship between the agent and the principal is regulated by the rules on the contract of mandate (CC arts. 734-750) while the relationships between the agent and third parties are regulated by CC arts. 95-109. The representation under the contract of mandate may be both direct (the agent acting in the principal's name) or indirect (the agent acting in the agent's own name). If the parties have not agreed otherwise the representation is presumed to be direct (CC art. 734(2)).

16. The rules of agency in SCOTLAND are general in nature and apply to a wide range of situations and agents (for example, solicitors, estate agents, directors of companies). An agent has been described as 'a person who has authority to act for and on behalf of another (called the principal) in contracting legal relations with third parties; and the agent representing the principal creates, alters, or discharges legal obligations of a contractual nature between the latter and third parties' (Smith, Laws of Scotland, 774) but in ordinary language the word "agent" is also employed to cover agents without authority – i.e. those (such as inquiry agents or, often, estate agents or law agents) who are authorised and instructed to do something for the principal other than affect the principal's legal position. The word "mandate" is traditionally reserved for a gratuitous contract of agency.

17. In SLOVAKIA the external relationship is covered by the General Provisions of the Civil Code (Act 40/1964 Coll. as amended). CC § 22(1) defines a representative as "anyone who is authorised to act for another person in the latter's name". This regulation is applicable both to contractual and legal representation and to civil and commercial relations. Regarding the regulation of the internal relationship between the principal and the agent, a distinction should be made between civil and commercial relationships. Ccom §§ 566-576 provide that the agent undertakes either to arrange a certain business matter by effecting certain legal acts in the name of and on account of the principal, or to arrange another matter at the principal's request, and the principal undertakes to pay remuneration for the services. Specific contracts are the Mandate Contract (CC §§ 724-732: the agent (or mandatary) undertakes to arrange a certain matter or to perform some other activity for the principal (or mandant) and its subtype Contract for Procurement of a Thing (CC §§ 733-736: the agent undertakes to procure a certain thing for the principal; "thing" is used in the meaning of "matter"). These contracts may cover both direct and indirect representation. A mandate may also come under the scope of the commercial representation contract (Ccom). The rules on mixed contracts are applicable in the case of intermediation (e.g. a brokerage contract mixed with an obligation to represent; see Supreme Court decision, No. 72/2004, legal decisions book 5, 16, 5 Cdo 65/03). The Act on Advocacy (586/2003 Coll as amended) contains rules for advocates.

18. Mandate is regulated in the SPANISH CC arts. 1709-1739. There is not a substantial distinction between mandate and representation; furthermore, the mandate is "naturally" a representation contract (CC art. 1717, Diez-Picazo, La representación, 65 ff), though indirect representation is also allowed as a possible content of the mandate (CC art. 1717 II) and similarly for a commercial mandate (commission) (Ccom arts. 245-247). The mandate rules serve as a basic model for most of the special regulations concerning the accomplishment of services on another's behalf. The main reason for that is that the mandate contract in Spanish law is not as such a contract with a content limited to the instruction of a third party to do "juridical" acts: the juridical nature of the agent's behaviour is not of the essence of the contract (CC art. 1709). So there exists a wide "grey area" in which mandate and service contracts overlap with each other (Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II(2)[4], 224, 228). Anyway, the mandate rules prevail, because legal provisions on services contracts scarcely exist in Spanish law.

19. SWEDISH law does not distinguish a particular set of contract law rules specifically relevant for the supply of services. In addition to general contract law rules, only a few old and general rules on mandate contracts for direct representation can be found in chapter 18 of the Swedish Commercial Code (HB). When appropriate, the Act regarding Factors (KommL), the Commercial Agency Act (HaL), the Sale of Goods Act (KöpL) and the Consumer Services Act (KTjL) can be used by way of analogy. More specific rules can be found in e.g. the Estate Agents Act (FmL) and the Financial Advisory Services to Consumers Act (Lag (2003:862) om finansiell rådgiving till konsumenter). The external relationship between the agent and the third party is governed by rules in Part II of the Contracts Act (AvtL).

II. Rules applicable to mandate contracts for indirect representation

20. The AUSTRIAN Ccom §§ 383 et seq. (commission agents) and Ccom §§ 407 et seq. (forwarder) apply to the contract between the agent (commercial agent/forwarder) and the principal. If the internal relationship between the principal and the agent rests on a mandate, the regulations of CC §§ 1002 et seq. apply for the contract between the agent and the principal (see Rummel (-Strasser) ABGB I³, § 1002, no. 8) though the underlying contract in the case of an indirect representation is not a contract of representation pursuant to CC § 1002 (Bevollmächtigungsvertrag).

21. For BELGIUM see Note 2 above.

22. In the BULGARIAN law of obligations, the same rules (LOA arts. 280-292) are applicable to both direct and indirect representation. Apart from these rules, there are also applicable to indirect representation some provisions on benevolent intervention (LOA arts. 60-62), commercial agency (Ccom arts. 32-48), the commission contract (Ccom art. 348-360) and the forwarding contract (Ccom arts. 361-366) (Stavrou, TP 2006, 325, 343).

23. In DENMARK when the agent is required or allowed to conclude the prospective contract in the agent's own name, the principal will not be bound towards the third party (unless the principal accepts the contract concluded).

24. In ENGLAND, at common law, the agent is not required to disclose to the third party that he or she is acting in the name and on behalf of the principal. When the existence of the principal is not revealed to the third party, it is referred to as an 'undisclosed agency'. In such circumstances, there is nevertheless an agency relationship between the principal and the agent since the principal authorises the agent to act for the principal on the basis that the agent will act in the agent's own name. The consequences of an undisclosed agency are as follows: the internal aspects of the internal relationship are the same: the principal appoints the agent to represent the principal; the agent is a fiduciary and the principal owes the agent commissions and indemnity for expenses etc. There is, a priori, no external feature since the agent does not create privity between the principal and the third party since the agent acts as a principal towards the third party. Initially, the contract is therefore between the agent and the third party. The principal still authorises the agent to represent the principal towards third parties but the principal remains hidden. Providing that the agent has actual authority to act on behalf of the principal towards the third party, the principal can intervene on the contract with the third party (Siu Yin Kwan v Eastern Insurance Co Ltd [1994] 1 All ER 213), i.e. can sue and be sued, but only if the agent acted with the principal's prior authority (Keighley Maxsted v Durant [1901] AC 240). The effects of an undisclosed agency are as follows. (a) Because the principal is not disclosed, the agent acts in his or her own name and is therefore liable on and can enforce the contract made with the third party. Vice versa, the third party can enforce the contract against the agent. This is so, provided that the principal has not intervened. (b) Technically, the law considers that the agent has contracted with the third party but the principal can also intervene on the contract. However, once the existence of the principal is revealed to the third party, the third party can elect whom to enforce the contract against. Once a choice has been made, the third party cannot try to enforce the contract against the other (Clarkson Booker Ltd v Andjel [1964] 3 All ER 260). (c) The principal can intervene on and enforce a contract made by the undisclosed agent with prior authority of the principal (Siu Yin Kwan v Eastern Insurance Co Ltd [1994] 1 All ER 213). The principal's right of intervention is subject to certain restrictions in order to protect the interest of the third party: (i) The principal cannot intervene if the contract expressly (UK Mutual Steamship Assurance Association v Nevill [1887] 19 QBD 110) or impliedly excludes such intervention (Siu Yin Kwan v Eastern Insurance Co Ltd [1994] 1 All ER 213). The difficulty is to see whether the contract impliedly excludes the intervention of the principal. As the privy council decision in Siu Yin Kwan shows, the fact that the agent signed the contract as the 'insured' does not prevent the principal from intervening in the contract. It seems that if the agent is identified in the contract as a contracting party, this does not prevent the principal from intervening. (ii) The principal cannot intervene if personal factors are important (e.g. the third party wanted to contract with the agent or would not contract with the principal).

25. As a rule, in ESTONIA, such a contract would be the 'commissionaire agreement' (komisjonileping), regulated in LOA §§ 692-702. The commissionaire agreement is a specific type of the (general) contract for services; therefore, in addition to specific rules contained in LOA §§ 692-702, the general rules applicable for the (general) contract for services (LOA §§ 619-634) apply to the relationship between the agent and the principal. If the specific rules of the commissionaire agreement do not apply, the contract would be a (general) contract for services, for which the law does not distinguish between acting in one's own name and acting in the name of the principal.

26. In FINLAND commission trades and other mandates by which the agent acts in the agent's own name but on behalf of the principal and concludes contracts are not regulated in legislation, but governed merely by general principles of contract law and by analogous interpretation of the rules applicable to the other types of mandate contract.

27. The rules of the 'commission contract' (agent with usually undisclosed principal, who is acting in the agent's own name) will apply in FRANCE. This is regulated by Ccom arts. L. 132-1 s. The rules of the 'command contract' (purchase agent acting for an undisclosed principal, specifically in the case of sale of goods) can also apply in this specific case. To simplify, the relations between the principal and the 'commission agent' are mainly regulated by the specific rules of the mandate contract, and the relations between the 'commission agent' and the third party are then governed by the specific rules relating to the contract that they have concluded between them.

28. The GERMAN Ccom §§ 383-406 provides a set of rules on commission agents, i.e. persons who professionally undertake to buy and sell goods or securities in their own name for the account of another (Ccom § 383(1)). Apart from Ccom §§ 383-406, there are no rules specifically tailored to contracts for indirect representation, and thus the rules generally applicable to mandate contracts apply (MünchKomm (-Häuser), HGB, § 383 no. 28).

29. In GREEK civil law the applicable rule of CC art. 212 to mandates for direct representation is a rule of interpretation: if it is impossible to ascertain that a person acted in the name of another it shall be considered that such person has acted in his or her own name. That rule refers to the external aspects of the relationship vis-à-vis third parties, whereas the internal relationship between the principal and the agent may be based on a contract such as mandate (CC arts. 713-729). The notion of a mandate for indirect representation is in fact no mandate in the meaning of the rules of mandate for direct representation (CC arts. 213 et seq.) at all, since the effects of the juridical act of the agent who acts in his or her own name flow directly to the agent rather than to the undisclosed principal (Kerameus and Kozyris, Introduction^{2}, 70; Georgiadis and Stathopoulos (-Doris), Art. 211, no. 24). The agent merely incurs an obligation from the internal relationship based on a contract such as mandate to convey these effects to the principal through a separate juridical act, as in the mandate for indirect representation no relation is created between the undisclosed principal and the third party (Supreme Court decision no. 752/2003, NoV 2004, 238; CA Athens decision no. 12756/1987, EllDni 1989, 1195).

30. In HUNGARY if the agent concludes a contract in the agent's own name but for the principal, the rules of the contract type 'commission agency' apply (CC arts. 507-513). CC art. 507 establishes that '[u]nder a commission agency contract the commission agent is obliged to conclude a sales contract in the agent's own name, in favour of the principal in return for a commission'. CC art. 513(1) prescribes that '[a] contract in which a commission agent assumes an obligation to conclude a contract other than a sales contract shall also be deemed a commission agency contract'. According to CC art. 513(2), '[u]nless otherwise provided by this Chapter, the regulations governing agency must be applied to commission agency'. See Supreme Court Pfv. V. 20. 876/1994, in BH1995. 571.

31. In IRELAND where an agent concludes a contract in the agent's own name this is referred to as an 'undisclosed agency' and the principal is described as an 'undisclosed principal'. Alternatively, an agency may be disclosed (i.e. the third party knows that the agent is acting for another, either named or unnamed). At common law, an agent is not required to disclose to the third party that the agent is acting in the name and on behalf of the principal. The distinction between disclosed and undisclosed agencies is important in terms of the legal effects of the agent's actions on the principal and other third parties. But, in terms of the relationship between the agent and the principal, the distinction between disclosed and undisclosed agency is not relevant – i.e. the same law of agency applies. Under the doctrine of undisclosed agency, where an agent contracts with a third party without disclosing the agency, the contract is initially between the agent and the third party and each may enforce the contract against the other. However, if the third party discovers the undisclosed principal's existence, the third party may enforce the contract against either the agent or the principal. Moreover, provided that the agent acted with actual authority, the undisclosed principal can intervene and enforce the contract against the third party. This doctrine operates as an important exception to the doctrine of privity of contract. Therefore, where an undisclosed agent buys a painting in his or her own name, but on the account of the principal, the principal (a complete stranger to the third party) can intervene and enforce the contract with the third party. There are limitations, at common law, to the principal's right of intervention. For example, (i) an undisclosed principal can only intervene if the principal was in existence and had the legal capacity to make the contract at the time it was made; (ii) an undisclosed principal can only intervene if the agent had actual authority to conclude the contract (Keighley Maxsted & Co v Durant [1901] AC 240); (iii) an undisclosed principal cannot intervene if such intervention is prohibited by the contract, either expressly or impliedly; (iv) an undisclosed principal may be prevented from intervening if it can be shown that the third party contracted with the agent for personal reasons; (iv) in some cases, it has been said that an undisclosed principal cannot intervene where the third party has personal reasons for not contracting with the principal (e.g. Said v Butt [1920] 3 KB 497).

32. In ITALY the contract by which the agent is required to represent the principal in his or her own name but for the principal's account is regulated by CC art. 1705(1), according to which 'an agent acting in the agent's own name acquires the rights and assumes the duties arising from transactions made with third persons, even if the latter had knowledge of the mandate'. However, the principal may replace the agent by exercising directly rights arising from the execution of the contract concluded between the agent and the third party, since these claims are considered as automatically transferred to the principal. A distinction has to be made with respect to real rights (rights erga omnes): if the agent acquires a movable item, the agent can take action to demand the property of the good, whereas if the agent acquires immovable property in his or her own name and on the principal's account , the agent must transfer the ownership to the principal immediately (CC art. 1707; cf. also Cass. no. 202/1974, Foro It., 1974, I, 2739; Cass. no. 2301/1994, Giust. civ., 1994, I, 1887). Prior to this the principal may not vindicate the asset because the principal cannot be considered the owner of the immovable.

33. In THE NETHERLANDS the contract according to which one party, the agent (commissionair), undertakes an obligation to the other party, the principal (committent), to buy or sell movables, shares, or securities in the agent's own name and at the expense of the principal is recognised. However, this type of contract is not a specific type of mandate contract.

34. The POLISH rules on mandate cover both direct and indirect representation.

35. SCOTTISH law recognises the concept of the agent who acts for the undisclosed principal (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', nos. 147-163; Meier v Küchenmeister (1881) 8R 642 at 646, per Lord Young). This allows an agent to act in the agent's own name and conclude a contract on behalf of the principal without disclosing to the third party either the existence or the identity of the principal. The principal can 'intervene' in that contract at a later stage in order to enforce the contract against the third party (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', nos. 150-151). After the principal has been disclosed, the third party must elect to sue either the principal or the agent, but cannot sue both (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', nos. 155-156). The principal's right to intervene is unlimited, and is not triggered by factors such as non-performance by the agent or the agent's insolvency. The concept is subject to certain limiting factors, for example, the principal's ability to act in this way may be excluded as a matter of interpretation of the contract with the third party (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', no. 153). A more debatable restriction is that which prevents the principal from acting in this way where the concealment is a deception (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', no. 154).

36. In SLOVAKIA the general regulation of the mandate contract can be found in CC §§ 724-732 and of the contract for procurement of a thing in CC §§ 733-736. The contract for arranging the sale of a thing, under which the agent is bound to take from the principal a certain thing determined for sale and to make the necessary arrangements for its sale, is specifically regulated in CC §§ 737-741. In this case, the agent acts in the agent's own name and on account of the principal. Under the commission agent contract, the commission agent undertakes to conduct in the agent's own name but on account of the principal a certain business affair for the latter, and the principal undertakes to pay the agent a commission. This type of contract is regulated in Ccom §§ 577-590.

37. In SPANISH law, representation is regulated as a substantial effect of the mandate as such. In fact, the main body of rules as to representation law ought to be drawn from the chapter on mandate. However, indirect representation is also contemplated as a voluntary effect of the mandate. If this is the case, the mandate brings about as a rule no direct relationship between the principal and the third party (CC art. 1717 and Ccom 245-247).

38. The SWEDISH Act regarding Factors provides a set of rules on commission agents, i.e. persons who professionally undertake to buy and sell goods, securities and personal property in their own name for the account of another. The Act regarding Factors is also used by way of analogy in cases of commission in a broad sense. Thus, agents of different kinds and stevedores are inter alia considered to be commissionaires if they act in their own name. See Tiberg and Dotevall, Mellanmansrätt[9], 87.

III. Rules applicable to contracts to represent in conclusion of juridical act other than a contract or to do non-juridical acts or a mixture of acts

39. In AUSTRIA the same rules apply when the agent is not required to conclude a contract but to execute another juridical act (OGH EvBl 1953/136; OGH GesRZ 1980, 95; Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I³, § 1002, no. 40). In the case of mixed contracts, the rules governing the underlying contract or the performance of this other service apply.

40. In BELGIUM the rules on mandate apply as well when the agent is not required to conclude a contract but to execute another juridical act (Tilleman, Lastgeving, 64; Wéry, Le mandat, 81 ff; in particular for a lawyer who is required to bring a claim into court, see Herbots/Stijns/Degroote/Lauwers/Samoy, TPR 2002, 57, no. 884; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 25). In relation to mixed acts the rules on the qualification of mixed contracts) apply. Claeys, Samenhangende overeenkomsten en aansprakelijkheid, 203; Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux, 594; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 34-35; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 14; Wéry, Le mandat, 105-107) if the representative's main obligation under the contract concerns the conclusion of a juridical act as representative of the principal and if the obligations concerning the performance of other non-juridical acts are only accessory. The rules of the dominating legal relation (mandate) apply in accordance with the 'absorptive theory' (e.g. Labour Court Antwerp 23 Nov 1989, Pas. 1990, II, 110). If on the contrary the obligations concerning the performance of non-juridical acts are dominating, the rules on 'hiring of services' (huur van werk) apply, also in accordance with the absorptive theory (e.g. CA Luik 18 Jun 1981, RGEN 1982, 286). If neither the juridical acts, nor the non-juridical acts are dominating, the rules of both contracts apply cumulatively, as far as possible, in accordance with the 'cumulative theory' (e.g. the rules on mandate, combined with the rules on a building contract (e.g. CA Bergen 22 Jan 1990, Pas. 1990, II, 145)). If a cumulative application is impossible because of contradictory rules, the contract will be qualified as a contract sui generis, to which only the general contract law applies.

41. The same rules in BULGARIA (LOA arts. 280-292) are applicable to both the mandate contract for the conclusion of a prospective contract and for the performance of a juridical act other than a contract.

42. In DENMARK when the agent's main obligation under the contract is not to represent the principal but to perform another service, the scope of the duties of the agent will be governed by the agreement concluded between the principal and the agent. If under this representation in legal steps is to be undertaken by the agent, Part II of the Contracts Act on agency will apply.

43. In ENGLAND providing that the agent has been authorised by the principal to perform a given task, e.g. an architect representing the principal at the reception of the house, the architect still performs a task on behalf of the principal and is therefore still regarded as an agent and the rules of agency will consequently apply.

44. In case of the so-called mixed contract in ESTONIAN law, the different parts of the contract may be governed by different sets of rules (LOA § 1(2)). As far as the contract contains an obligation to represent the principal, that part of the contract would be governed by the rules of the specific contract of services (e.g. the rules of the contract of works) and also by the rules of the (general) contract of services as far as there is an obligation to represent the principal.

45. In FINLAND as long as the authorisation contains a mandate to represent the principal, the mentioned rules on mandate contracts are applicable. The rest of the contract between the parties should be governed by separate rules applicable to the specific activity in question.

46. The rules for the mandate contract in FRANCE will apply to mandates to do other juridical acts since they cover the conclusion of any legal act in the name and for the account of the principal, whether it is a contract or other juridical act.

47. In GERMANY the rules applicable to mandate contracts pertaining to the conclusion of a prospective contract apply also to contracts to represent in the conclusion of other juridical acts.

48. With regard to the object of mandate GREEK legal theory distinguishes between juridical and non-juridical acts. It is accepted that only in case of juridical acts is the institution of mandate required, whereas non-juridical acts are as a rule not subject to mandate. That means that the external relationship created by mandate is only needed when the object of the internal relationship which is based on a contract of mandate (CC arts. 713 et seq.) is a juridical act. If the agent's main obligation is to represent the principal at the moment of the reception of a work which constitutes a juridical act, the rules of mandate apply to the external relationship and the rules of mandate to the internal relationship (decision no. 12086/1988, legal journal, 1989, 125). The same rules that apply when the object of the mandate is a contract are applicable when the agent is required to execute another juridical act. That means that in such cases the rules of mandate (GREEK CC arts. 211-235) apply to the external aspects of the relationship. With regard to the internal relationship the applicable rules depend on the contract which binds the parties, such as mandate (CC arts. 713-729). In case of procedural acts an attorney may be granted the express authority to perform such acts for the principal. The power of an attorney to represent a litigant is known in the Greek procedural system as judicial mandate and is regulated in CCP arts. 94-105.

49. In HUNGARY the same rules apply when the agent is to execute another legal act than the conclusion of a contract (Supreme Court Pfv. V. 20. 876/1994, in BH1995. 571).

50. In IRELAND where an agent has authority or power from the principal to affect the principal's legal relations with others, whether in contract or otherwise, the same general law of agency will apply.

51. In ITALY when the agent is granted the authority to represent the principal in the execution of a juridical act other than a contract, the general rule is that the mandate should have the formal requirements of the act which has to be concluded. According to CC art. 1392 '[a] mandate has no effect unless it is conferred with the formalities prescribed for the contract which is to be made by the agent'. If the agent is required to bring a claim in court, the rules governing legal representation apply (in particular CPC arts. 83 and 84) which consists in the defensive activity carried out by the attorney in court proceedings. According to CPC art. 83 the attorney representing the principal in court must have a power-of-attorney, which may be granted either by means of a public deed or of a private act, provided that the signature is certified by a notary. If a power-of-attorney is granted in the same document of the judicial brief the signature shall be certified by the attorney. According to Art. 84 CPC the attorney may perform all acts of the proceeding and receive all the communications pertaining thereto. However, unless specifically authorised by the principal, he cannot dispose of the rights which are subject matter of the litigation. So far as mixed contracts are concerned, according to the principle of party autonomy, under ITALIAN law the parties to a contract may regulate their relationship as they prefer, even by entering into a contract which is not specifically regulated by the law ('unnamed contracts'). Mixed contracts, characterised by the concurring presence of the elements of two or more different types of contracts, may be included among the unnamed contracts above. In this case, according to some scholars, mixed contracts are regulated by the provisions governing the type of contract whose elements are prevalent. According to the prevailing opinion, however, the different sets of rules governing each type of contract involved jointly apply.

52. In the NETHERLANDS service providers in general are covered by the rules that apply to contracts for professional services, CC arts. 7:400-413. If the performance of juridical acts is not the main element of the contract, there is no mandate contract. For instance, if an architect occasionally performs juridical acts on behalf of the client, not the mandate contract but the general contract for professional services applies (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 5). This also applies to contracts with lawyers or notaries (Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3088).

53. The rules on the mandate contract apply to other contracts of service in POLAND (CC art. 750) unless the parties have decided to exclude them. CC arts. 95-109 (regulating relations between the agent and the third parties – liability etc.) always apply and cannot be excluded by contracting parties.

54. In SCOTLAND the rules applying to the conclusion of contracts by an agent apply also to the doing of other juridical acts.

55. In SLOVAKIA the rules on mandate also apply when the agent is not required to conclude a contract but to execute another juridical act. The scope of the Mandate Contract (and its subtypes) is so broad that it also includes arranging other matters than the conclusion of a contract by the agent. The same applies to commercial contracts.

56. The wording in the SPANISH CC art. 1709 provides for a broad scope as to the object of mandate relationships. It says that one of the parties undertakes the obligation to perform a service or to do something on behalf of the other party. The TS (STS 27 Nov 1992) and the literature (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII[1], 905; Lete del Río, Derecho de obligaciones III[4], 401; Lasarte Álvarez, Principios de derecho civil III[7], 344) have specified that it refers to juridical acts. The conclusion of a prospective contract is one of the possible juridical acts. Lete del Río indicates that this is the factor that differentiates mandate from other types of services contracts (Lete del Río, Derecho de obligaciones III[4], 401).

57. In SWEDEN the same set of rules applicable to mandate contracts for direct representation is applicable, with appropriate adaptations, to contracts to represent in conclusion of a juridical act other than a contract.

IV. Rules applicable to general mandate contracts?

58. The rules of the BULGARIAN LOA arts. 280-292 are applicable to general mandate contracts. These rules are considered to be general provisions. Apart from them, there are special provisions for some specific types of mandate contract – for commercial representation Commercial Act (CA) arts. 21-51; for the commission contract Ccom arts. 348-360; for the forwarding contract Ccom arts. 361-366; for insurance agents Insurance Code (IC) art. 162; for advocates Bar Association Act (BAA) art. 36. In so far as no specific provisions exist for these types of mandate contract, the general mandate provisions, with appropriate adaptation, are applicable (Ccom art. 348(2), art. 361(2); Supreme Court, Judgment no. 20, 5 Jun 1995, Civil Case 800/1994).

59. In DENMARK when two parties are involved in a case before a court, they will usually be assisted by lawyers (advokater). Advokater are procedural agents and not parties themselves. According to Danish law (the Administration of Justice Act), an advokat has no authority to settle an agreement without the consent of his principal.

60. The ENGLISH law of agency recognises two categories of agents: general and special agents. The distinction is relevant on the question of the nature and the extent of the authority granted by the principal. A general agent will have authority to act for the principal in a particular trade or class of transactions. A special agent will only have authority to act in one given transaction. The distinction nowadays seems less important in relation to the notion of usual or customary authority. In addition to the express actual authority of the agent as defined by the terms of the contract (express actual authority), the agent also has an implied actual authority to bind the principal. One category of implied authority is that of usual or customary authority: an agent appointed to a position will have all the authority which an agent in that position would usually have, unless the principal expressly excludes it from the contract (Panorama Developments (Guildford) Ltd v Fidelis Furnishing Fabrics Ltd [1971] 2 QB 711). The courts decide what amounts to the usual authority of a particular kind of professional by referring to expert evidence as to the practice of a particular trade or profession.

61. As a rule in ESTONIA, a contract by which the agent is not required to conclude a contract but to execute another juridical act would be the (general) contract for services (the service provided under the contract for services can be the conclusion of the contract or the performance of any other (juridical) act. In the rare cases where the agent is not merely under a duty of care in executing the juridical act but (also) guarantees its proper execution, the contract is a contract of works. LOA Est § 635(2) stipulates that specific rules governing the (general) contract for services are (additionally) applicable to a contract of works where the object of the contract is the execution of a transaction (i.e. of a juridical act).

62. In FINLAND the general mandates are mainly governed by the same legislative basis as mandates intended for single transactions. Nevertheless, it may have interpretative importance in application of general principles if the mandate is general. The Commercial Agents and Salesmen Act includes specific rules on continuous representation.

63. The rules for the mandate contract in FRANCE will apply to general mandate contracts (CC art. 1987).

64. The same constellation of rules applicable to mandate contracts pertaining to the conclusion of a prospective contract apply to general mandate contracts in GERMANY.

65. In HUNGARY the rules on mandate contract apply to the situation of a general mandate. See Supreme Court Pfv. VIII. 21.147/2006, in BH2007. 86; Supreme Court Gf. II. 30 521/1986, in BH1987. 174; CA Fővárosi Ítélőtábla 5. Pf. 21 230/2005/3, in BDT2007. 1598.

66. In IRELAND, the law of agency recognises two categories of agents: general and special agents. A general agent will have authority to act for the principal in a particular trade or class of transactions. A special agent will only have authority to act in one given transaction. The distinction may be relevant to the question of the nature and the extent of the authority granted by the principal. However, this distinction is no longer as significant as it once was. Otherwise, general and special agents are bound by the same general rules of agency.

67. In the NETHERLANDS service providers in general are covered by the rules that apply to contracts for professional services (CC arts. 7:400-7:413). In the case of mandate contracts, the rules established in CC arts. 7:414-7:424 apply. If the agent is not required to conclude a contract but to execute another juridical act, the rules on mandate contracts apply.

68. In SCOTTISH law agents providing services of a specific nature are governed by the law of agency. There is a distinction between 'general' agents and 'special' or 'limited' agents (Gloag, The Law of Contract[2], 150; Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', nos. 55-56). General agents (e.g. solicitors) are employed to carry out all the business of the principal, or all the business of the principal of a particular type. Special or limited agents are employed to carry out a particular transaction. The main force of this distinction is that only general agents can operate with apparent or ostensible authority. The specific example of the architect who has a very limited authority simply to represent the principal at the moment of reception of the house is likely to be classed as a special agent. Other than the exclusion of special agents from the category of agents who may act with apparent authority, special agents are bound by the same general rules of agency as apply to any other agent. In Scotland an agent instructed to raise a claim in court is likely to be a solicitor, to whom the normal rules of agency apply. If the claim is to take place in the higher courts, namely the Court of Session or House of Lords, then the principal may be represented either by a solicitor advocate (a solicitor who has passed specific exams which give to rights of audience in the higher courts) or an advocate. The advocate's contract has traditionally been classed as one of gratuitous mandate rather than agency (see generally Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', nos. 26-28). It was thought to be impossible to place a value on the services rendered by such professionals. The advocate would, of course, receive a fee, but this was classed as an honorarium (Batchelor v Pattison and Mackersy (1876) 3 R 914).

69. The SPANISH civil code refers to general mandate contracts in art. 1712 (mandato general). The general mandate comprises all the principal's affairs, as opposed to special mandate contracts (mandato especial), which concern one or more of the affairs of the principal. General mandate contracts in CC art. 1712 are to be differentiated from what the civil code calls "mandate in general terms", regulated in CC art. 1713. A mandate in general terms regards the nature of the acts which are to be concluded, which according to CC art. 1713 are the acts of administration, but not acts which are concerned with the acts to dispose of the goods of the principal. Acts of administration are those which are meant to maintain the quality of the administered assets or to obtain the normal benefits produced by the assets (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII[1], 921).

70. In SWEDEN the same set of rules applicable to mandate contracts for direct representation also applies to the situation where the agent has been given a general mandate.

V. Rules applicable to contracts for administration of the principal's affairs

71. In AUSTRIA the rules on the mandate for direct representation also apply to the situation of a 'general mandate' (CC § 1006; RAO § 9). When the authority is meant for a series of juridical acts (CC § 1006; §§ 383 et seq. and 407 et seq. regulate the rights and obligations of commercial agents and forwarders. (Schwimann (-Apathy) ABGB V[3], no. 1.)

72. The BELGIAN CC art. 1987 distinguishes a specific mandate (only concerning a specific affair or a multiplicity of affairs of the principal) on the one hand, and a general mandate (concerning all affairs of the principal) on the other hand (see Herbots/Stijns/Degroote/Lauwers/Samoy, TPR 2002, 57, no. 882; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 142-148; Wéry, Le mandat, 89-90). The rules on mandate apply to both.

73. In BULGARIA the agent may be authorised and instructed to perform general administration of the principal's affairs, with the exception of juridical acts that have to be performed by the principal personally (e.g. marriage, divorce suit, testament) (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 20). Different rules are applicable depending on the legal capacity of the principal. When the principal is not a merchant, the general mandate contract rules (LOA arts. 280-292) are applicable and the agent can be granted a general power of attorney to act in the name of and on behalf of the principal (LOA arts. 36-43). When the principal is a merchant, there are special rules for both the internal contractual relationship between the agent and the principal-merchant and the power of attorney of the commercial agent (Ccom arts. 21-48). In so far as no specific provisions exist for this internal relationship, the general mandate contract provisions, with appropriate adaptation, are applicable. There are three different types of commercial agents that can perform general administration of the principal's business affairs: the commercial procurator (Ccom arts. 21-25), the commercial representative (Ccom arts. 26-31) and the commercial agent (Ccom arts. 32-48). The commercial procurator is a natural person commissioned and authorised by a merchant (principal) to manage its enterprise in exchange for remuneration (Ccom art. 21(1)). He or she is authorised to perform any acts or transactions related to carrying out the principal's business activities, to represent the principal, and to authorise third parties to perform specific acts (Ccom art. 22). The procurator may not alienate or encumber any real property of the principal, except when expressly authorised by the principal. The parties may only restrict the authorisation of the commercial procurator to the business of a single branch; other restrictions have no legal effect for third parties (Ccom art. 22). The commercial representative can be either a natural person or a legal entity, commissioned and authorised by a merchant to perform, in exchange for remuneration, the acts stipulated in the power of attorney. By contrast with the commercial procurator, the limits of authority of the commercial representative are defined by the principal (Gerdjikov, Komentar na Turgovskiya zakon I, 111; Goleva, Turgovsko pravo I, 78; Kazarov, Turgovsko pravo[4], 135). Unless otherwise stipulated, the commercial representative is deemed to be authorised to perform all acts related to the merchant's usual business (Ccom art. 26). For alienating or encumbering real property of the principal, accepting bills of exchange, obtaining a loan, or for a court representation, the commercial representative needs explicit authorisation. Any other restrictions on his power of attorney can have legal effects for a third party only if this party knew or should have been aware of such restrictions (Ccom art. 26). The internal relationship between the commercial representative and the principal is regulated by either a mandate contract or a labour contract (Gerdjikov, Komentar na Turgovskiya zakon I, 121). The commercial agent is a merchant: a natural person or a company, who independently and in the course of his own business is assisting the business of another merchant. The commercial agent may be authorised to perform transactions and conclude contracts in the name of the merchant or in the agent's own name but always on behalf of the merchant (Ccom art. 32).

74. In DENMARK no specific rules govern the situation where the agent is given a general mandate.

75. The agency rules in ENGLAND also apply to contracts for the administration of the principal's affairs. The principal may authorise the agent to do whatever is necessary for the task at hand, so the rules of representation also apply to services of administration of the principal's affairs. Whether the agent can dispose of the goods belonging to the principal will depend on the extent of the authority granted within the contract. If the principal has not given the agent express authority to dispose of property, the principal can still be bound by the act of the agent under the notion of apparent authority.

76. Generally the law of ESTONIA does not distinguish between a general mandate and contracts where the agent is required to execute a specific juridical act. However, such arrangements could fall under the specific regulation of the contract of agency LOA (§§ 670-691). If the agent acts in the agent's own name, the contract would be the commissionaire agreement. In addition to the rules contained in LOA §§ 692-702, certain specific rules governing the contract of (commercial) agency apply to the relationship between the commissionaire and the principal (LOA § 692(3)).

77. In FINLAND when the general mandate is based on contract, the mentioned rules on mandate contracts are in principle applicable.

78. The rules on representation under FRENCH law apply to services of administration of the principal's affairs, but where there is a general mandate, the powers of the agent are restricted as to the type of legal acts which may be accomplished. These are only acts necessary for the preservation of the subject matter of the contract or its management (CC art. 1987). On the other hand, the agent with a general mandate may not sell or dispose of the goods belonging to the principal (CC art. 1988). For that purpose, it will be necessary to obtain a specific authority to sell or dispose of the subject matter (even though academic writers do accept certain exceptions, particularly in the case of perishable goods).

79. In GERMANY the same rules applicable to mandate contracts pertaining to the conclusion of a prospective contract apply to contracts for the administration of the principal's affairs. If need be, the agent may dispose of goods entrusted to the agent. Unless there are contractual arrangements, no specific conditions apply. Of course, the agent has to act without negligence when disposing of the goods (there is no specific provision to this end, but CC § 662 in conjunction with CC § 280 apply and may give the principal the right to claim damages).

80. According to the GREEK CC art. 216 the mandate is to be conferred by a deed drawn up for this purpose (power of attorney). The general mandate to represent the principal for a series of juridical acts can be either explicit or be concluded from the general and abstract formulation of the deed or from the nature of the internal relationship based on a contract such as mandate. By a contract of mandate the agent undertakes to conduct the affair in question (CC art. 713), which can require the execution of a series of juridical acts (Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Karasis), Art. 713, no. 15).

81. In HUNGARY the same rules of agency apply to contracts for administration of the principal's affairs.

82. In IRELAND where an agent has authority or power from the principal to affect the principal's legal relations with others, whether in contract or otherwise, the same general law of agency will apply. Therefore, where an agent is appointed for the administration of the principal's affairs, the law of agency will apply.

83. The same rules apply under ITALIAN law both to a general and to a specific mandate. However, the following distinction may be made: if the agent is granted the authority to conclude specific acts, the authority includes not only those specific acts, but also all the acts necessary to conclude the preceding ones (CC art. 1708). These different acts may consist in factual or juridical activities, if complementary to perform the mandate. When a general mandate is granted, the agent can conclude all the acts of ordinary administration even if not exactly specified in the contract. In this case, in order to validly conclude acts of extraordinary administration a special mandate granting the authority to the agent is necessary towards third parties.

84. In the NETHERLANDS the rules on mandate contracts also apply to general mandates. The mandate may be for the doing of one or more specific juridical acts, but the mandate may also be described in a general way (Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3088). Therefore, it seems that the rules on mandate also apply to services of administration of the principal's affairs.

85. In POLAND the rules on the mandate contract apply to other contracts of service (CC art. 750), including the contract to manage the principal's affairs.

86. In SCOTLAND the general rules of agency apply to the situation of a general mandate. A 'general' agent is authorised to transact all the principal's business of a particular kind (Gloag, The Law of Contract[2], 150; Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', nos. 55-56). The general agent can be contrasted with the 'limited' or 'special' agent employed to complete a particular transaction. The same general rules of agency apply to both types of agents, apart from the fact that the special agent cannot act with apparent or ostensible authority.

87. The rules on the SLOVAKIAN Mandate Contract also apply to a general mandate. The general provisions of the Civil Code on representation under a Power of Attorney (external effects) only stipulate the condition that the Power of Attorney must be conferred in writing if it concerns more than one specific legal act.

88. In SPAIN the mandate may be issued as a particular or general mandate (CC art. 1712). The general mandate "embraces every affair (negocio) of the principal". The distinction is important in commercial matters (Ccom art. 281), because there are special rules concerning people who run alien business as a general administrator (factores mercantiles). In civil matters the distinction between general and special mandate does not have any importance in practical law.

89. In SWEDEN there are no specific rules concerning contracts for administration of the principal's affairs. The same set of rules applicable to mandate contracts for direct representation applies to the situation where the agent has been given a general mandate. If a contract for administration of the principal's affairs is made general and at the same time irrevocable it may not also be exclusive, because a person can only put himself under "curatorship" within a determined and limited sector of that person's sphere of interests (see Grönfors and Dotevall, Avtalslagen[3], 134).

VI. Authority to dispose of goods

90. In AUSTRIA mere entrusting of the possession of goods does not confer apparent authority upon the receiver to dispose of them. There must be something more, e.g. the fact that the agent is a person having a usual authority to dispose of goods (auctioneer or broker), or the transfer of additional indicia of title or mandate to sell. A commission agent, e.g., is an agent entitled with the possession and control of goods and securities to be sold for the principal (Ccom §§ 373-406 et seq.; Straube (-Griss), HGB I³, § 383, no. 4; OGH in Arb 9466).

91. In BELGIUM a mandate in general terms only gives authority to perform acts of administration. To have authority to dispose of goods belonging to the principal, an express mandate is necessary, specifying the act(s) of disposing as falling within the authority of the agent.

92. Under ENGLISH law, the question whether the agent can dispose of the goods belonging to the principal will depend on the extent of the authority granted within the contract. There is no problem if the principal has given the agent express authority to dispose. However, even if the principal has not done so, the principal can still be bound by the act of the agent under the notion of apparent authority.

93. Whether, under ESTONIAN law. the agent who administers a principal's affairs has the authority to dispose of the principal's goods is a question that has to be answered according to the general rules that govern the authority of agents, i.e. the external relationship between the agent and the third parties (General Part of the Civil Code Act §§ 115-131). Here, the Estonian law distinguishes, as the German law, between the mandate (Vertretungsmacht) and the right to dispose (Verfügungsmacht). In most cases this distinction only has theoretical importance. However, the authority to dispose of goods of the principal may also derive from the contract forming the internal relationship between the agent and the principal.

94. In FINLAND the agent is, in general, entitled to dispose of goods only if this has been agreed. Such an authorisation is, however, often based on legislation or on a mandate given by a court (e.g. to trustees of bankruptcy estates or administrators of an estate of someone deceased).

95. In GERMANY, the same constellation of rules applicable to mandate contracts pertaining to the conclusion of a prospective contract apply to contracts for the administration of the principal's affairs. If need be, the agent may dispose of goods. Unless there are contractual arrangements, no specific conditions apply. Of course, the agent has to act without negligence when disposing of the goods (there is no specific provision to this end, but CC § 662 in conjunction with CC § 280 apply and may give the principal the right to claim damages).

96. In GREEK law under the notion of administration of the principal's affairs falls also the disposal of goods belonging to the principal such as the sale or renting of a house. The mandate for the purpose of administration of the principal's affairs such as the disposal of goods can be also conferred to a broker, who is not considered to be agent of his principal if no mandate is granted to him (Supreme Court decision no. 58/1975, NoV 1975, 879; Georgiadis and Stathopoulos (-Karasis), Art. 703, no. 12).

97. In ITALY, unless otherwise agreed by the parties, the agent does not have the authority to dispose of goods of the principal. This means that in the case of an estate agent in charge of renting the apartment of a principal, the estate agent cannot put the apartment on sale without the principal's specific mandate.

98. In SCOTLAND the question whether the agent has authority to dispose of the goods of the principal depends on the extent of the authority granted. A general power to administer would not normally be interpreted as conferring a power to dispose. Mere entrusting of the possession of goods does not confer apparent authority to the receiver to dispose of them.

99. In SLOVAKIA for the specific contract subtype "a contract for arranging the sale of a thing", the CC §§ 737-741 provide that the agent is bound to take from the principal a certain thing determined for sale and to make the necessary arrangements for its sale. In this case, the agent acts in the agent's own name and on account of principal.

VII. Rules applicable to gratuitous mandate contracts

100. In AUSTRIA the same rules apply to gratuitous and remunerated mandates for direct representation (CC § 1004). Ccom § 396 (para. 1) and § 409, HVertrG §§ 8, 24 et seq., and RATG §§ 1 ff, § 19 deal with the question of remuneration. In the absence of agreement, lawyers are entitled to remuneration according to the RATG; commission agents, forwarders and commercial agents are entitled to remuneration in accordance with local custom or, in the absence of such custom, to reasonable remuneration. Their right to commission can only be extinguished in very limited circumstances (e.g. when it is established that the contract between the third party and the principal will not be executed for a reason for which the principal is to blame).

101. In general, in BELGIAN law, the same rules apply no matter whether the agent is compensated or not, except with regard to the contractual liability of the agent, which is less severe for a non-remunerated agent than for a remunerated agent (CC art. 1992; Wéry, Le mandat, 143).

102. The general mandate contract is in principle a gratuitous contract, if not agreed otherwise, in BULGARIA (LOA art. 286; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 20; Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 51; Vassilev, B., Spezialna chast, 131). The special types of mandate contract are in any case non-gratuitous contracts (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 40; Vassilev, B., Spezialna chast, 131). They are regulated by distinct provisions – for the commission contract Ccom arts. 348-360; for the forwarding contract Ccom arts. 361-366; for the commercial agent Ccom arts. 32-48. The general non-gratuitous mandate contract is regulated by the rules for the general mandate contract (LOA arts. 280-292).

103. As for the 'ordinary agent' no specific rules of remuneration will apply according to DANISH legislation. In contrast the Factors Act and especially the Act of Commercial Agents and Travellers contain a detailed non-mandatory regulation of the agent's right to commission. Where a contract for which, in principle, the intermediary (factor, commercial agent, broker etc) is entitled to receive commission is not performed, the agent's claim for commission will lapse if the principal can prove that the failure to perform is not due to circumstances within the control of the principal. Most instances of non-performance will naturally be due to the particular third party's incapability to perform obligations under the contract and thus the risk of the third party's insolvency will be on the agent.

104. In ENGLAND an agency can be created by agreement, whether it is remunerated or not. An agent who acts gratuitously can still affect the principal's relations with third parties. A gratuitous agent is therefore also subject to fiduciary obligations. However, when the agent is gratuitous, 'the internal position between the agent and the principal is imperfectly enforceable' (Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[18], para. 6.026). Since there is no contractual liability, the agent cannot be liable for failing to do what the agent undertook under no consideration. However, the agent can still be liable in tort since the gratuitous agent owes a duty of care to the principal. The agent can therefore be liable, in tort, for a failure in due care and diligence. The standard of care for gratuitous agents is however lower than that for paid agents since the standard of care is that care that the agent would have taken in the agent's own affairs (Chaudry v. Prabhakar [1988] 3 All ER 718).

105. Generally the rules applying to an ESTONIAN contract governing the internal relationship between the agent and the principal do not differ according to whether the contract is gratuitous or not. The general assumption is that the professional agent is entitled to a price for the services rendered. Special rules for gratuitous contracts exist only as far as the entitlement of the agent for reimbursement of expenses is concerned.

106. In FINLAND there are no specific written rules on gratuitous representation. In principle, the general rules are applicable. The requirements to be met when carrying out the mandate are, however, generally lower if the representation is gratuitous.

107. The FRENCH Civil Code's provisions regarding the mandate contract (CC arts. 1984-2007) apply both to remunerated and gratuitous mandates (CC art. 1986), although the liability of the agent will be diminished if there is no remuneration (CC art. 1992(2)).

108. According to the legal definition in the GERMAN CC § 662, a 'mandate' is a gratuitous contract, and the general rules on mandates (CC §§ 663-674) are based on this assumption. By way of the reference in CC § 675(1), remunerated contracts are subject to the same rules as gratuitous contracts (mandates), with the following exceptions (i.e. those provisions among CC §§ 663-674 not listed in CC § 675(1)): (a) CC § 664: Under a remunerated contract, it is generally admissible for the agent to have the representation performed through a third person. Under gratuitous contracts, CC § 664 declares this to be inadmissible ('when in doubt'), as mandates are often based on a relationship of personal trust between the parties. It has, however, been held that an analogous application of CC § 664 to remunerated contracts is possible in situations in which a relationship of personal trust exists between the parties. (b) CC § 671 governs the right to revoke a mandate and gives each party the right to revoke the contract at any time, although the agent has to revoke in a manner that will allow the principal to reasonably arrange for the business to be taken care of otherwise. Should the agent not live up to this obligation by revoking at an inappropriate time, the agent is liable for damages. (c) CC § 671 is generally inapplicable to remunerated contracts; the question of revocation is governed by the rules on contracts for services or works. CC § 671(2), however, is applicable whenever the remunerated contract allows the agent to revoke the contract at any time (CC § 675(1)).

109. In GREEK law, the award of a price depends on the internal relationship which binds the agent and the principal. If the internal relationship is based on a contract of mandate, the agent undertakes to conduct without remuneration the affair entrusted to the agent by the principal (CC art. 713). An exception to the rule of gratuitous mandate is explicitly regulated in the Code of Attorneys, which provides for the obligatory remunerated mandate between the lawyer and the principal. Regarding intermediation, a person who promises a fee for the procurement of a contract or for information of the opportunity of making a contract is bound to pay the fee only if the contract is concluded in consequence of such procurement or indication. If, in consequence of such procurement or indication, an agreement containing a promise of contract was concluded but the final contract is frustrated, only one half of the fee may be demanded (CC art. 703(1)). If the contract is concluded subject to a condition, the fee may not be demanded until the condition is fulfilled (CC art. 704).

110. In general, in HUNGARY the same rules apply whether the agent is remunerated or not. CC art. 478(1) provides that '[t]he principal shall pay an appropriate fee, unless the circumstances, or the relationship between the parties suggest that the agent has assumed the agency without any consideration'. However, according CC art. 483(3), '[i]f the agency is cancelled without substantial grounds, the damages that are caused shall be indemnified, unless the agency is gratuitous and the period of notice is sufficient for allowing the principal to handle the matter.'

111. The position in IRELAND is essentially the same as that for England, described above.

112. Under ITALIAN law there is a general presumption of onerousness with respect to representation (CC art. 1709). This means that unless otherwise provided by the parties the agent is entitled to a compensation. In general terms, the rules are the same even if no price is agreed by the agent and the principal. However, in case of remunerated representation the agent's liability for breach of contract is valued more seriously than in case of gratuitousness (CC art. 1710(1)), because the economic and financial consequences for the principal are graver when a consideration is payable to the agent. See Cass. no. 3233/1982, Foro. It. Mass., 1982, 4, 4070.

113. In the NETHERLANDS in the case of professional agents, the principal will have to pay remuneration. In the case of non-professional mandate contracts, for instance in the case of occasional, one-off juridical acts (e.g. one agrees with a friend to arrange an appointment with a service station regarding the repair of the friend's car), the agent may not be entitled to representation and the mandate is gratuitous. It will depend on the exact content of the agreement between both parties whether the rules on mandate contracts apply. According to CC art. 7:405 it seems that the non-professional agent is only entitled to representation if this has been explicitly established. If the gratuitous mandate may be defined as a mandate contract, the same rules apply as to normal mandate contracts. However, according to literature one should be careful with treating gratuitous mandates as mandate contracts. This often depends on the internal agreements between the two contracting parties. See Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 10.

114. The same rules on the mandate contract apply in POLAND regardless of whether the service is provided for remuneration or gratuitously.

115. In SCOTTISH law a distinction is made between remunerated representation (agency) and gratuitous representation (mandate). The rules of mandate were discussed by the Scottish institutional writers Stair (Institutions I[10], 12), Erskine (III, 3, 31-38) and Bell (Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], 216-218). Mandatars (agents who are not remunerated) may previously have been subject to a higher standard of care compared to agents (agents receiving remuneration) but this no longer seems to be the case (Stair, Institutions I[10], 12, 10; Erskine, III,3,36-37; Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], 218, 212; Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', no. 23; Stiven v Watson (1874) 1 R 412; Copland v Brogan 1916 SC 277).

116. A mandate may be gratuitous or remunerated in civil relations in SLOVAK law. Commercial contracts (mandate and commission agency contracts) are always remunerated. The provisions on liability for non-conformity of performance do not apply to a gratuitous mandate.

117. In SPAIN the provisions in the civil code apply, with appropriate modifications, to both gratuitous and remunerated mandate contracts: (CC art. 1709 ff). CC art. 1711 indicates that mandate contracts are presumed to be gratuitous, unless the parties provide otherwise. The difference between the regimes of gratuitous and remunerated contracts is explicitly emphasised in CC art. 1726, which indicates that the responsibility of the agent for fault will be determined by the courts depending on whether the mandate is remunerated or not.

118. In SWEDEN the rules applicable to mandate contracts for direct representation are applicable, with appropriate adaptations, to gratuitous mandate contracts.

COMMENTS

A. General

As with any set of rules, in this Part specific legal concepts are used in order to set out the rules contained in these provisions. The most important concepts used in this Part are defined in the present Article. The Article itself does not contain any substantive rules.

B. Some related concepts defined elsewhere

Book II Chapter 6 on Representation contains definitions of concepts – including "authority" and "representative" - that are relevant to the external relationship between a principal and a third party, see II.–6:102 (Definitions).

C. Definitions in this Article

The definitions in this Article are, it is hoped, self-explanatory. The only one which requires explanation is the definition of "third party".

The concept of 'third party' as such is not defined under II.–6:102 (Definitions). Paragraph (5) of that Article merely provides that where the representative (as a representative) concludes the prospective contract between the principal and himself or herself in a personal capacity, for the purposes of Book II, Chapter 6, the representative is to be regarded as the 'third party'. The same would apply under paragraph (1)(g) of this Article.

The word “agent” is not defined here. It is a very general term which embraces anyone who acts for another. (See the Annex.) This Part deals with only certain types of agent – namely those acting under mandates for direct representation, those acting under mandates for indirect representation and those acting as brokers or intermediaries. The common factor is that they are engaged in relation to the conclusion of other contracts or the doing of other legal acts.

NOTES

As the national Notes throughout this Part will make clear, the definitions in the present Article correspond to similar techniques and concepts in most national systems.

IV.D.–1:103: Duration of the mandate contract

A mandate contract may be concluded

(a) for an indefinite period of time;
(b) for a fixed period; or
(c) for a particular task.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article provides a classification of mandate contracts from the point of view of their duration. Three types of contracts are distinguished: contracts for an indefinite period, contracts for a fixed period and contracts for a particular task. In the mandate contract it may be indicated that the contractual relationship is to terminate at a specific moment in time irrespective of the individual will of the parties, i.e. a contract for a definite period. That specific moment for termination may be a fixed date agreed upon by the parties (sub-paragraph (b)) but may also be the moment at which the particular task that the agent has to fulfil has been achieved (sub-paragraph (c)). Where no such specification exists, the mandate contract is concluded for an indefinite period of time (sub-paragraph (a)).

B. Mandate for a fixed period: tacit prolongation

Under III.–1:111 (Tacit prolongation) any contract which provides for continuous or repeated performance of obligations for a definite period may be tacitly prolonged if the obligations continue to be performed by both parties after that period has expired and the circumstances are not inconsistent with the parties' tacit consent to such prolongation. The contract then becomes a contract for an indefinite period and the contractual relationship can be terminated by either party by giving a reasonable period of notice (III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (2).) This provision may find application in relation to contracts for mandate but, as the general rules suffice, no special regulation in this Part is required.

C. Specificities of mandate contracts for a particular task

Contracts for a particular task are regarded in the present Part as contracts for a definite period because the parties agree that their mandate relationship terminates when the particular task the agent was to fulfil has been achieved. However, differing from mandate contracts for a definite period in which a fixed date is agreed, in contracts for a particular task it may be uncertain when the envisaged result will be achieved or even whether it will be finally achieved. This implies that in the case of a mandate contract for a particular task, the parties may de facto be linked in a mandate relationship for an indefinite period.

NOTES

I. General

1. These three types of mandate contracts are known in all legal systems although, as will be seen later, not all attach the same consequences to the different types.

II. Tacit prolongation

2. In BELGIUM there is no specific rule on tacit prolongation regarding the contract of mandate. General rules of contract law will apply.

3. In BULGARIA there is no explicit provision stating that continued performance after the elapse of the definite period is considered an implicit extension of the contractual duration. The parties are free to stipulate so in their contract. A special rule is applicable to the commercial agency contract: if, after the elapse of the definite period both parties continue to perform their contractual obligations, the contract is considered concluded for an indefinite period of time (Ccom art. 47(4); Kassabova, TP 2006, 159, 169-170).

4. In ENGLAND there does not seem to be any agency case dealing with this specific issue. However, relying on contract law principles, if the parties continue to perform the contractual obligations after the period has elapsed, the contract is treated as having tacitly been renewed. It is not clear whether the contract would be deemed to be for a fixed or an indefinite duration. This would depend on the circumstances surrounding the case and its interpretation by the courts.

5. In ESTONIA if the parties continue performance of the obligations under the mandate contract after the period for which the contract was concluded has elapsed, they may be treated as having tacitly agreed upon the extension of the duration of the mandate relationship. In such cases the mandate contract would be treated to be tacitly agreed to be for an indefinite period.

6. In FRANCE there is no specific rule regarding the mandate contract on this point; general rules will apply (extension of the duration of the contract if both the principal and the agent act as if the contract had not ended; 'gestion d'affaires' if only the agent does so).

7. If the law on service contracts is applicable to a remunerated Geschäftsbesorgungsvertrag by virtue of GERMAN CC § 675(1), CC § 625 provides that the relationship is considered as extended for an indefinite period of time if performance by the agent continues and the principal knows about it. In other constellations, the parties might be viewed as having tacitly derogated from the contractual time limit.

8. In HUNGARY if the parties have continued performance of the obligations under the mandate contract after the original period for which the contract was concluded has elapsed, they are treated as having tacitly agreed upon the extension of the duration of the mandate relationship.

9. In IRELAND where a fixed term agency has terminated due to effluxion of time and performance continues, it is usually treated as an indefinite agency, terminable by notice.

10. In the NETHERLANDS if the contractually agreed period for performance of the obligations under the mandate contract has elapsed, the contracting parties are treated as having concluded a contract for an indefinite period (Asser (-Kortmann), De Vertegenwoordiging I[8], no. 96; Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 51).

11. In POLAND continued performance does not lead to automatic prolongation of the agreement.

12. In SCOTLAND the agency relationship may continue on the tacit agreement of the parties where it was general in nature, in other words where the agent is classed as a general agent. It may not so continue where the original agency relationship was entered into for a specific purpose which has now been achieved (Bell, Commentaries I[7], 526; Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 537).

13 In SLOVAKIA there is no explicit regulation on this issue. The continued performance may be regarded as an implicit agreement of the parties to extend the contract.

14. The principle of tacit prolongation has been upheld in SPANISH law for agency contracts (art. 24.2 Agency Law) and the analogy would seem to hold for other similar cases.

15. In SWEDEN if the parties continue performance of the obligations under the mandate contract after the definite period of performance has elapsed, they are considered to have tacitly agreed upon an extension of the mandate relationship. If nothing else follows from the contract or from the circumstances, the extension is considered as being for an indefinite period of time.

IV.D.–1:104: Revocation of the mandate

(1) Unless the following Article applies, the mandate of the agent can be revoked by the principal at any time by giving notice to the agent.

(2) The termination of the mandate relationship has the effect of a revocation of the mandate of the agent.

(3) The parties may not, to the detriment of the principal, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects, unless the requirements of the following Article are met.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article makes it clear that the principal is free to revoke the mandate given to the agent at any time by giving notice of revocation (paragraph (1)).

The parties may not agree to exclude this right of the principal, unless the exceptional circumstances set out in IV.D.–1:105 (Irrevocable mandate) are met.

B. Notice of revocation always effective

As a general rule, the principal is free to decide that the agent is no longer to be authorised to act on the principal's behalf. The principal may revoke the mandate at any time by giving notice to the agent, even if the mandate contract was concluded for a fixed period or a particular task.

C. Revocation by termination of the mandate relationship

If the relationship terminates, the mandate of the agent also comes to an end. As follows from Chapters 6 and 7, termination may take place by notice, but also when the mandated task is completed or when a fixed period expires or when the agent dies. Termination therefore does not always imply that notice of termination is given.

D. Revocation is not a breach of the principal's obligation to co-operate

The revocation of the mandate implies that the principal effectively prevents the agent from performing the obligations under the mandate contract and thereby from earning any stipulated remuneration. As such, this could be considered as a non-performance by the principal of the obligation to co-operate (with the possibility of the agent claiming specific performance of the right to continue to affect the legal effects of the principal). However, as paragraph (1) explicitly gives the principal the right to revoke the mandate, this cannot be seen as the proper consequence of the revocation. The present Article, in this respect, therefore derogates from the general obligation to co-operate under III.–1:104 (Co-operation).

E. Conditions to be observed only relevant to liability in damages

Revocation of the mandate of the agent implies termination of the mandate relationship. The conditions that are to be fulfilled by the principal when terminating the relationship, namely to have an extraordinary reason to revoke which justifies immediate termination and to observe a reasonable period of notice, are to be observed when the principal wants to revoke. These conditions are not necessary for a revocation to be effective, but are relevant as to the determination of the liability in damages of the principal.

NOTES

1. In AUSTRIA the principal can revoke the granted authority at any time, CC § 1020. It is not relevant whether the agent acted in the principal's name or in the agent's own name if the contractual relationship between indirect agent and principal is that of a mandate in terms of CC §§ 1002 et seq. If the principal concludes the prospective contract personally, the agent is entitled to a proportional part of the price, to incurred expenses and to indemnity for any losses sustained.
2. According to the BELGIAN CC art. 2004, a principal can always revoke the authority to represent ad nutum, i.e. without a motive and without a period of notice (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 460-462; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 301-305; Wéry, Le mandat, 267-273). No formal requirements apply. As a unilateral juridical act, the revocation does not have to be accepted by the agent to be effective (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 462-463; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 281 and 290-291). The revocation will only be effective at the moment the (revoked) agent takes note or ought to have taken note of the revocation (see for a specific application: CC art. 2006). According to CC art. 2005, the revocation can only be invoked towards third-parties after they have taken note of it.
3. In BULGARIA the principal has the right to revoke the mandate at any time (LOA art. 288; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 29). This revocation is followed, as a legal effect, by the end of the contractual relationship (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 29; Goleva, Obligazionno pravo^2, 239; Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 170). The relationship is considered ended from the moment when the agent gets to know about or could have been aware of the revocation (LOA art. 290; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 30). This unilateral withdrawal from the principal's side does not deprive the agent of remuneration (if such has been stipulated) or the reimbursement of expenses (LOA art. 288(1)).
4. In ENGLAND the principal can revoke the agent's actual authority at any time regardless of whether the agent was disclosed (acted in the principal's name) or was undisclosed (acted on behalf of principal but in the agent's own name) This is so unless the grant of authority is irrevocable.
5. In ESTONIA the parties can agree (for their internal relationship) that the mandate relationship cannot be terminated (other than by termination for a fundamental breach). The principal may conclude the prospective contract personally even in the case of an irrevocable mandate, but the parties can agree otherwise. For the external relationship a general rule applies that the parties may exclude revocability of the authority (the power of attorney), but even in such case the law allows for revocation upon an important ground as a mandatory rule (§ 126(3) General Part of Civil Code Act).
6. The FRENCH Civil Code gives the principal the possibility of terminating the agency ad nutum, in other words at any time (there is no need of a notice of reasonable length), without specific reason and without any right to compensation (CC art. 2004). The precise moment at which termination occurs is not regulated by statute law, but case law considers that the mandate ends when the agent is aware of the revocation by the principal (Cass.civ. 3^e, 28 Feb 1984, JCP éd. G 1984, IV, 146). The termination may even occur as a result of notice to the agent of the appointment of a new agent for the same transaction (CC art. 2006). The principal does, however, have to inform any possible third party contractors of such revocation in order to give them binding notice (CC art. 2005).

7. In GERMANY a gratuitous mandate may be revoked by the principal at any time (CC § 671(1)). The unilateral revocation of a remunerated Geschäftsbesorgungsvertrag by the principal is, on the contrary, generally not allowed, as CC § 675(1) does not refer to CC § 671(1). Under remunerated mandate contracts, the principal may merely terminate the contractual relationship according to the rules provided by the law on contracts for services or contracts for works. The rules on contracts for services allow termination by the principal but provide for a termination period which depends on the time frame according to which the service provider is paid (CC § 621). Contracts for services under which payment is not made after particular time periods can be terminated at any time. Additionally, the principal has the right to terminate irrespective of any termination period where there is an important reason which makes it unacceptable to continue (CC § 626). Furthermore, termination is possible at any time even without an important reason where the contract calls for services 'of a higher kind which are usually assigned on the basis of particular trust' (CC § 627(1)). This will often be the case where a contract for representation is concluded.

8. In IRELAND the principal can revoke the agent's authority and terminate the agency at any time (though this may constitute a breach of contract), unless the agency is irrevocable.

9. In the NETHERLANDS, in the case of a revocable mandate, the principal is allowed to end or revoke the mandate (CC art. 7:408(1) and 7:422(1)). See also CFI 's-Hertogenbosch, NJ 1988, 550 and HR 17 Nov 1978, NJ 1979, 96.

10. In POLAND the principal may revoke the mandate at any time by giving notice (CC art. 746). The agent is entitled to partial remuneration and reimbursement of expenses. If the mandate was revoked without a valid reason, the principal is also liable for the losses incurred by the agent. The principal's right to revoke for valid reasons is a ius cogentis provision and the parties may not derogate from it (Radwański/Panowicz-Lipska (-L. Ogiegło), System Prawa Prywatnego VIII).

11. In SCOTTISH law the principal may revoke the mandate unilaterally unless this is excluded by the contract (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', no. 183) or unless the mandate is irrevocable because both parties have an interest in its performance (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', no. 25).

12. In SLOVAKIA the principal is always entitled to revoke a mandate for representation without any conditions. The authority of the agent ends if the principal revokes it. Until the moment the agent knows or must have known of the revocation of authority, the agent's acts in law have legal consequences as if the authority continued to be effective. If an agent informs a third party that the agent has authority to perform specified acts for a certain principal, the revocation of this authority may be put forward as a defence by the principal only if the principal informed the third party of the revocation before the agent's negotiations with this third party, or if the third party knew of the revocation at the time of the negotiations (CC § 33(b)(4) and (5)). If the mandate has been terminated by revocation, the principal is obliged to compensate the agent for all expenses incurred before the revocation and for the damage suffered and if any remuneration is due for work that agent performed, for such work or part thereof. This also applies when completion of mandated negotiations was frustrated accidentally through no fault of the agent (CC §732).

13. In SPAIN the CC art. 1733 states that the principal may revoke the mandate at any time. See also Ccom art 279. The rationale is that the mandate relationship is based on the confidence of the principal in the agent, and only the principal may evaluate when this confidence is no longer there (Lete del Río, Derecho de obligaciones III[4], 413; Lasarte Álvarez, Principios de derecho civil III[7], 345). Revocation can be explicit or implicit. Implicit revocation implies the carrying out of an act which unambiguously indicates an intention to revoke – for example when the principal concludes the prospective contract personally (STS 4 Jan 1991) or appoints another agent to carry out the task entrusted to the agent (CC art. 1735). Revocation will be effective from the moment the agent knows about it. This requirement is imposed in CC art. 1735 for implicit revocation and in CC art. 1738 for explicit revocation (Lasarte Álvarez, Principios de derecho civil III[7], 345). Acts concluded by the agent without knowledge of the revocation are valid and have effect regarding third parties who have contracted with the agent in good faith (CC art. 1738). Notice of revocation will lead in any case to the termination of the relationship, but, if the principal abuses the right, that is, when the purpose is to damage the interests of the agent or when the revocation is based on illegal reasons, then the agent can claim an indemnity (Lete del Río, Derecho de obligaciones III[4], 413). The STS 3 March 1998, RJA 1998/1129 held that the principal was not entitled to freely terminate the mandate where a price for the services and a definite time have been agreed. In any case, the agent cannot seek specific performance, and damages is the only relief available. See for further discussions, Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Gordillo Cañas), Código Civil II, 1584-1585.

14. In SWEDEN the principal is free to revoke the granted authority at any time without giving reason for such revocation (Bengtsson, Särskilda avtalstyper I[2], 153). This may be a breach of contract towards the agent.

IV.D.–1:105: Irrevocable mandate

(1) In derogation of the preceding Article, the mandate of the agent cannot be revoked by the principal if the mandate is given:

(a) in order to safeguard a legitimate interest of the agent other than the interest in the payment of the price; or

(b) in the common interest of the parties to another legal relationship, whether or not these parties are all parties to the mandate contract, and the irrevocability of the mandate of the agent is meant to properly safeguard the interest of one or more of these parties.

(2) The mandate may nevertheless be revoked if:

(a) the mandate is irrevocable under paragraph (1)(a) and:

(i) the contractual relationship from which the legitimate interest of the agent originates is terminated for non-performance by the agent; or

(ii) there is a fundamental non-performance by the agent of the obligations under the mandate contract; or

(iii) there is an extraordinary and serious reason for the principal to terminate under IV.D.–6:103 (Termination by principal for extraordinary and serious reason); or

(b) the mandate is irrevocable under paragraph (1)(b) and:

(i) the parties in whose interest the mandate is irrevocable have agreed to the revocation of the mandate;

(ii) the relationship referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is terminated;

(iii) the agent commits a fundamental non-performance of the obligations under the mandate contract, provided that the agent is replaced without undue delay by another agent in conformity with the terms regulating the legal relationship between the principal and the other party or parties; or

(iv) there is an extraordinary and serious reason for the principal to terminate under IV.D.–6:103 (Termination by principal for extraordinary and serious reason), provided that the agent is replaced without undue delay by another agent in conformity with the terms regulating the legal relationship between the principal and the other party or parties.

(3) Where the revocation of the mandate is not allowed under this Article, a notice of revocation is without effect.

(4) This Article does not apply if the mandate relationship is terminated under Chapter 7 of this Part.

COMMENTS

A. General

Under the preceding Article the general rule is that mandates are freely revocable at any time. However, there may be situations where either the agent or other parties have a legitimate interest in the irrevocability of such a mandate. This question is dealt with in the present Article. It sets out the circumstances in which a mandate, in derogation of the normal situation as set out in IV.D.–1:104 (Revocation of the mandate) may be irrevocable.

B. Possible situations for irrevocability

The fundamental right to revoke a mandate is based on the right of the principal not to be made bound by a prospective contract (or other juridical act) if the principal no longer wishes to become bound. However, in certain cases there are also legitimate interests of other parties at stake. These interests may conflict with the principal's interest not to be bound by a prospective contract or other juridical act.

This provision differentiates two situations in which the interests of other parties justify the existence of an irrevocable mandate. In the first case, the mandate serves to execute a legitimate interest of the agent. Irrevocability may be needed to safeguard that interest. The irrevocability thus exists towards the agent. In the second case, the mandate is to serve the interests of several 'principals' and irrevocability is needed to safeguard the interests of the principals towards each other. These situations have in common that they are the result of an underlying relationship between the principal and the agent or other interested parties.

C. Mandate given in the interest of the other party

In the type of case covered by paragraph (1)(a), the underlying relationship may give rise to an irrevocable mandate where the mandate serves an interest of the agent.

> Illustration 1
> A bank is willing to award a credit contract to a consumer, provided that it is secured by a mortgage on the house of the consumer. In the credit contract the consumer agrees to give an irrevocable mandate to the bank to establish the mortgage.

D. Mandate given in the interest of several 'principals'

In the situation covered by paragraph (1)(b) several parties agree that in the interest of an efficient and effective representation of their interests or in the interest of solving a common problem, a mandate is to be given to one of them or to a third party to act as an agent on behalf of all of them. In this case, on the basis of their common relationship, the 'principals' are bound towards each other not to revoke the mandate. In the relationship between each principal and the agent, this may lead to the irrevocability of the mandate.

> A group of music composers (principals) agree that in their common interest an organisation of music composers (agent) will be mandated to act on their behalf with regard to the exploitation of their intellectual property rights.

> Illustration 3
> Two co-owners of a car mandate each other to sell the car to an interested third party. Here, both co-owners may act independently on their own behalf and that of their fellow co-owner.

In these examples, irrevocability does not follow from the relationship between the co-owners. Therefore, the parties must agree thereupon.

> Illustration 4
> A buyer and a seller (principals) disagree as to whether the delivered goods conform to the contract. They appoint an arbitrator (agent) to decide who is right.

In this illustration the common interest of the principals consists of solving their conflicting interests and the solution is to be achieved by a third party. If this is the case, the agent necessarily must be somebody else. It follows from the nature of the relationship between these parties that the mandate of the agent must be irrevocable: a party who is dissatisfied with the intermediate decision of the arbitrator should not be able to revoke the arbitrator's mandate and thus escape from a negative outcome of the dispute. As the arbitrator is 'to affect the legal relations of the principal', the contracts between the arbitrator and the two principals fall under the definition of a mandate contract.

E. Exceptions to irrevocability

Only when the reason for irrevocability of the mandate under the underlying relationship no longer exists may the principal revoke the mandate of the agent. In this sense, the 'irrevocability' is relative.

Irrevocability in the interests of agent. Even when the mandate is irrevocable and the period of irrevocability has not yet elapsed, the agent is still required to act in accordance with the mandate, to act in the best interests of the principal and to act in accordance with the standard of care that may be expected. The irrevocability of the mandate should not go so far as to prevent the principal from terminating the mandate relationship for fundamental non-performance by the agent of the obligations under the mandate contract (paragraph (2)(a)(ii)). The mandate can also be revoked if the relationship from which the legitimate interest originates is terminated for non-performance by the agent (paragraph (2)(a)(i). Finally, the principal may revoke the mandate if there is a serious and extraordinary reason to terminate the mandate relationship (paragraph (2)(a)(iii)).

Irrevocability in the interests of other principals. If the principals agree that the mandate may be revoked (paragraph (2)(b)(i)) or if the underlying contractual relationship has terminated (paragraph (2)(b)(ii)) or if the agent commits a fundamental non-performance (paragraph (2)(b)(iii)), the principal is free to revoke the mandate of the agent. The principal may also revoke the mandate if there is a serious and extraordinary reason to terminate the mandate relationship (paragraph (2)(b)(iv)). In these latter cases, the agent is to be replaced without undue delay by another agent in conformity with the contract between the principal and the other party or parties.

F. Consequences of irrevocability

To the extent that the mandate is irrevocable, a notice of revocation by the principal remains without effect (paragraph (3)). It does not end the authority of the agent to represent the principal, and therefore the mandate relationship is not terminated.

G. Termination under Chapter 7 leads to revocation of mandate

If the mandate relationship terminates because one of the situations under Chapter 7 occurs, i.e. the contract is concluded, the fixed period expires or the relationship is terminated because the agent dies, the rules on irrevocability no longer have effect. This is also the case when the principal dies and the successors of the principal or the agent terminate the contractual relationship on the basis of an extraordinary and serious reason.

NOTES

1. In AUSTRIA though an agent's authority is normally revocable at any time (CC § 1020) without prejudice to the right to damages for breach of contract, there is an exception if the authority is coupled with an interest outside the contract for mandate, the irrevocability is stipulated and the contract is for a definite period of time. In such a case the authority is irrevocable (Schwimann (-Apathy), ABGB V[3], § 1020, no. 7; Straube (-Griss), HGB I[3], § 383, no. 13).

2. The parties can validly agree upon irrevocability of the contract for representation in BELGIUM (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V[2], 463-464; Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux, 640-641; Wéry, Le mandat, 275-283).

3. In BULGARIA the general rule is that the principal can revoke the mandate at any time (LOA art. 288(1)), but the parties can explicitly stipulate otherwise. Irrevocability of the mandate can also be implied, e.g. if both the principal and the agent or the principal and a third party have a legitimate interest in the mandate (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 170). Legal doctrine distinguishes between absolute and relative irrevocability of the mandate and the authority (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 171). In case of absolute irrevocability, the principal's withdrawal from the mandate or the authority does not have any legal effect. In case of relative irrevocability, the principal can end the mandate and the authority with unilateral notice to the agent, but will be liable for damages. According to legal writings, the irrevocability of the mandate contract is always relative (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 171).

4. According to DANISH law the parties can validly agree that the mandate cannot be revoked. There are no statutory rules on this matter. According to case law a general mandate (general power of attorney) cannot be irrevocable.

5. In ENGLAND, it is possible in certain circumstances for the parties to agree that authority cannot be revoked, but this is only where the notion of agency is used as a legal device for a different purpose from that of normal agency, i.e. to confer an interest or a security on the agent. In such situations, the agent is regarded as using agency not for the benefit of the principal but for the agent's own benefit (Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[18], 555-556). There are essentially two situations where the agent's authority may be irrevocable. First, the authority of the agent cannot be revoked when the agent's authority is coupled with an interest, e.g. if the principal owes money to the agent and appoints the agent to sell property in order to pay the debt to the agent. However, this is only valid when the interest exists at the time that the principal gives the agent authority; the mere right to earn commission is not regarded as an interest (Doward, Dickson & Co v Williams & Co (1890) 6 TLR 316). Second, when a mandate is given to secure a proprietary interest of, or some obligation owed to, the donee, it cannot be revoked without the consent of the donee (Powers of Attorney Act 1971, s. 4).

6. In ESTONIA, the parties can agree that the contract cannot be terminated (other than for a fundamental breach). The principal may conclude the prospective contract personally even in the case of an irrevocable mandate, but the parties can agree otherwise.

7. In FINLAND, it is generally thought that an irrevocable grant of authority is not possible.

8. In FRANCE, the rule entitling the parties to freely terminate the mandate or agency is a matter of mandatory public policy and the parties cannot validly agree that the agency is irrevocable. In practice, there are clauses in contracts entitled

'irrevocabilité', but these are interpreted as simply giving rise to compensation for the agent (Civ. 1ère 5 Feb 2002, Bull. civ. I, n° 40), and do not prevent the principal from carrying out the transaction personally (Civ. 1ère 16 Jun 1970, D. 1971, 261).

9. Under GERMAN law, which strictly distinguishes between the authority and the contractual relationship between agent and principal, this is largely a matter of the law of authority (as the parties want to make sure that the agent can continue to conclude contracts with the third party) – CC § 168 implicitly anticipates that the parties may exclude revocability of the authority and the courts have long upheld this possibility (since RGZ 109, 333).

10. In GREEK law an irrevocable mandate for representation can be agreed on if the mandate also concerns the interest of the agent or of a third party (CC art. 724). According to CC art. 218 an irrevocable grant of a mandate can be agreed only if the mandate also concerns the interest of the agent or of a third party (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Doris, Art. 218-221 GCC nr. 9). In such cases of irrevocable mandate a revocation by the principal is void and the agent is entitled to conclude the prospective contract for which the representation was granted (Supreme Court decision no. 197/1983, EEN 1983, 714). In the area of intellectual property rights there are specific rules with regard to the contracts entrusting the administration of copyright to an 'organisation of collective administration'. In such contracts an analogous application of the principal of free revocation of the mandate (CC art. 724) is not accepted. A free revocation does not comply with the nature of those contracts which require stability and continuance of the contractual relationships between the parties.

11. The HUNGARIAN CC art. 223(2) establishes that '[a] mandate shall be valid until withdrawn, unless otherwise provided; its withdrawal that concerns a bona fide third person shall be operative only if he has been informed thereof. The right of withdrawal cannot be validly waived'. Concerning the authority of the agent, CC art. 483(4) establishes that '[a]ny limitation or exclusion of the right of cancellation shall be null and void; however, the parties shall be entitled to agree on the limitation of the right of cancellation with regard to continuous agencies'. In case of commission agency, CC art. 512(2) provides that '[a]ny limitation or exclusion of the right of rescission shall be null and void'.

12. In IRELAND agency may be irrevocable where e.g. (i) the agent is given a 'power with an interest', that is, where an agent is given power and has a personal interest, as where the principal owes the agent money, and appoints the agent to sell property of the principal and thereby raise funds to pay the debt; or (ii) where a power of attorney is expressed to be 'enduring' or irrevocable under the Powers of Attorney Act, 1996. It should be noted regarding (i) where the agent is given 'power with an interest', that this is not a 'true' agency but agency being used as a device. In these cases it is intended that the agent use the 'power' not for the benefit of the principal but for the agent's own benefit.

13. In ITALY, the parties can validly agree on an irrevocable mandate. However, even in this case the principal may revoke the mandate, but, unless there is a just cause, is liable for damages vis-à-vis the agent (CC art. 1723(1)). Representation contracts which are also in the interest of the agent or of a third party (in rem propriam) are considered irrevocable ex lege (CC art. 1723(2)).

14. In the NETHERLANDS, the parties may agree that the agent will act in the agent's own name and with exclusion of the principal's authority to act personally. If this is agreed, even as regards third parties the principal is not entitled to conclude the prospective contract; the exclusion of the principal's power to conclude the prospective contract can however only be invoked if the third party knew or should have known of the exclusion (CC art. 7:423(1)). Specific provisions apply if the agent is an organisation which has as its statutory purpose to act on behalf of the joint interests of principals by exercising their rights collectively (CC art. 7:423(2)). Such organisations exist specifically in the area of intellectual property rights.

15. In POLAND the principal's right to revoke may be limited, but the principal will always retain the right to revoke the contract due to "important reasons" (CC art. 746(3)).

16. SCOTTISH law does recognise an irrevocable mandate, known as a procuratory in rem suam (e.g. Premier Briquette Co Ltd v Gray 1922 SC 329; Stair, Institutions I10, 12, 8). It arises where the authority has been granted to the agent to achieve an outcome in which the agent has an interest. This concept has benefited from very little analysis in Scottish legal writing. It is described as 'absolute,' suggesting that it may not be revocable even in cases of material breach by the agent (Black, para. 551; Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 536). In cases where the agent has no interest in performance, there would seem to be nothing to prevent principal and agent from agreeing between themselves that the agency will be irrevocable.

17. In SLOVAKIA the principal cannot validly waive the right to revoke the authority granted (CC § 33(b)(3)), nor validly agree that the relationship under a contract for representation may not be terminated; an irrevocable granting of authority is void.

18. In SPAIN, the parties can validly agree on an irrevocable mandate (CC art. 1733; STS 31 October 1987; 11 May 1993, 19 Nov 1994, and 20 Jul 1995; see also Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII^{2}, 514; Lete del Río, Derecho de obligaciones III^{4}, 414). However, even in this case the principal may revoke the mandate, but, unless there is a just cause, is liable for damages vis-à-vis the agent. Representation contracts which are also in the interest of the agent or of a third party (in rem propriam) are considered irrevocable (any purported revocation being ineffective) when the irrevocability serves the underlying protected interest as a device to reach the purpose intended by the parties (SSTS 20 April 1981, RJA 1981/1658, 3 September 2007, RJ 2007/4709; 30 January 1999, RJA 1999/331; Diez-Picazo, La representación, pp. 305 ff; Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Gordillo Cañas), Código Civil II, 1585).

19. In SWEDEN there are no special rules on irrevocable grants of authority. A mandate is considered to be revocable in nature since the commission is a type of contract that rests on personal trust. An irrevocable grant of authority is, however, considered allowed to the extent it is due to another underlying legal relationship between the parties and aims at a determined part of the principal's financial sphere and circumstances (Bengtsson, Särskilda avtalstyper I^{2}, 54 and Grönfors and Dotevall, Avtalslagen^{3}, 134). A general mandate can always be revoked.

CHAPTER 2: MAIN OBLIGATIONS OF THE PRINCIPAL

IV.D.–2:101: Obligation to co-operate

The obligation to co-operate under III.–1:104 (Co-operation) requires the principal in particular to:

(a) answer requests by the agent for information in so far as such information is needed to allow the agent to perform the obligations under the mandate contract;

(b) give a direction regarding the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract in so far as this is required under the mandate contract or follows from a request for a direction under IV.D.–4:102 (Request for a direction).

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This provision is a specification of the general rule in III.–1:104 (Co-operation) which imposes on the parties an obligation to co-operate with each other when this can reasonably be expected for the performance of the other party's obligations. Under the present Article, the obligation to co-operate requires the principal, in particular, to provide the agent with information and directions in order to allow the agent to perform the obligations under the mandate contract.

B. Reasonable requests by agent for information

This provision does not impose on the principal an obligation to voluntarily provide information to the agent. The principal may not always know what information the agent needs. The principal is only obliged to answer requests by the agent for information when it is reasonable to expect that such information will enable the agent to perform the obligations under the mandate contract.

C. Obligation to give directions

According to the present provision, the principal is obliged to provide "subsequent" directions to the agent as to the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract or the content of the prospective contract in two cases: when such an obligation is imposed in the mandate contract, and when the agent is obliged to ask for a direction, (as regulated in IV.D.–4:102 (Request for a direction) paragraph (1)). If the agent is obliged to ask for a direction in order to find out the position of the principal on the issue pertaining to the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract or the content of the prospective contract, it is a logical consequence that the principal is obliged to answer such requests.

D. Consequences of failure to provide answers to request for information

If the principal is under a contractual obligation to answer the requests of the agent, the failure to provide such answers would constitute a non-performance of the obligation. The principal could be required to compensate the agent for any damage sustained as a result (e.g. the loss of the profit of the performance of another contract, as the performance of this particular contract has taken more time than expected). However, such damages do not solve the agent's problem completely, as the agent does not know how to further perform the obligations. It could therefore be useful to allow the agent to proceed and base performance on the expectations, preferences and priorities a normal principal would have.

In so far as the principal's interests are not communicated to the agent and the agent could not be expected to be aware of these interests otherwise, the agent cannot be expected to take them into account. Not taking these interests into account therefore does not lead to non-performance of the obligations under the mandate contract by the agent. This therefore constitutes a defence for the agent.

E. Consequences of failure to provide directions

The consequences of a failure to provide directions are regulated extensively under IV.D.–4:103 (Consequences of failure to give a direction).

NOTES

I. Duty to inform agent when asked

1. In AUSTRIA, each party to the contract for mandate is to act dutifully and in good faith. The principal is to provide the agent (commercial; Straube (-Griss), HGB I[3], § 384, no. 5; forwarder: Krejci, 308) with the necessary documentation relating to the goods concerned. The principal has to inform the agent of the content of the prospective contract to be negotiated and to obtain for the agent any information necessary for the performance of the obligations under the contract for mandate. The principal is thus required to volunteer information, independent of the principal being a consumer or entrepreneur.
2. In BELGIUM, the principal is required to inform the agent, if this information is necessary for the agent to fulfil the mission. Like every other party to a contract, the principal is bound by a duty to perform the contractual obligations in good faith (CC art. 1134(3)) and more specifically to a duty of collaboration. A specific application of the duty of collaboration is the duty to enable the agent to fulfil the mission. This entails the obligation to hand over all information and all documents necessary to fulfil the mission (Wéry, Le mandat, 220).
3. In BULGARIA according to legal writings, the principal has the right to give directions to the agent for the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 24; Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 237). Since the general rules on the mandate contract do not contain a specific provision on this subject, the general rules on the performance of obligations apply. These rules require the parties to perform their contractual obligations in conformity with good faith and not to obstruct the other party in performing its obligations in the same manner (LOA art. 63(1)). If information and directions from the principal are necessary for the proper performance of the obligations of the agent, the principal has to co-operate. A duty to give all relevant information regarding the performance of the agent's obligations is explicitly provided only for the principal-merchant towards the agent-commercial agent (Ccom art. 34(1); Gerdjikov, Komentar na Turgovskiya zakon I, 159; Kassabova, TP 2006, 159, 163).3.
4. In DENMARK, under a rule covering all types of civil contracts, the principal, prior to the conclusion of the contract of representation, is required to inform the agent of the principal's interests and needs as regards the proper performance of the contractual obligations or the content of the prospective contract to be negotiated or concluded by the agent. If the principal fails to fulfil this basic obligation, the agent will not be liable in damages for any loss caused by the negligence on the part of the principal. The principal must spontaneously provide the agent with all necessary information.

5. In ENGLAND, when the principal appoints an agent, the principal wants the agent to perform certain tasks. The needs and the interests of the principal will be apparent from such tasks and the instructions the principal will have given the agent pursuant to the contract (actual express authority). The instructions of the principal must be as precise as possible. Once again, the distinction between contractual and non-contractual agents must be made. When the agency is contractual, the agent is under an obligation to carry out the instructions that the principal has given as to the performance of the required tasks. When the principal gives clear and unambiguous instructions, the agent must perform such instructions as defined or be liable for breach of contract (Turpin v Bilton (1843) 5 Man & G 455). If the principal fails to give the agent clear and unambiguous instructions, the agent will not be liable if the agent acts fairly and honestly on a reasonable interpretation of the instructions and the principal will be bound by the agent's interpretation even if such interpretation was not the one the principal envisaged (Ireland v Livingstone (1872) LR 5 HL 395). However, nowadays, because of easy methods of communications, there is probably a duty on the agent to obtain clarification of instructions (Reynolds, 101; Woodhouse AC Israel Cocoa Ltd SA v Nigerian Produce Marketing Co Ltd ([1972] AC 741). If that is the case, it seems that the principal is not required to volunteer information but must do so when asked by the agent. When the agency is not contractual, the agent is consequently under no duty to act, and so cannot be liable for doing nothing. However, a failure to act may give rise to a liability in tort (Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] AC 465; White v Jones [1995] 2 AC 207; Henderson v. Merrett Syndicates Ltd. (No. 1) [1995] 2 AC 145).

6. In ESTONIA, the law does not contain a specific rule which stipulates that the principal, prior to the conclusion of the contract, is required to inform the agent of interests and needs as regards the performance of the contract.

7. In FINLAND, it is a general principle that a party has a duty of disclosure before entering into a contract. The principal ought to give sufficient information to the agent in order to ensure that the agent is able to complete the contractual performance in the required way (ACAgentsS § 8). It depends on the circumstances whether the information should be given voluntarily or not (e.g. which of the parties knows the area of activity better). When the principal is a consumer, the agent is generally required to take the initiative in investigating the interests and needs of the principal more than in pure business relations.

8. There is in FRANCE no specific obligation on the principal to provide information, whether spontaneously or at the request of the agent. The same principles apply under the Civil Code and under consumer law, except with regard to the relationship between the commercial agent and the principal, which is 'subject to an obligation of fair dealing and a reciprocal duty of information. The commercial agent shall perform its mandate as a proper professional, and the principal shall enable the commercial agent to perform its mandate' (Ccom art. L.134-4). Otherwise, the law contains no specific obligations for the principal to spontaneously provide information.

9. In GERMANY, the principal is not required to inform – either when asked or spontaneously – the agent of interests and needs as regards the performance of the contractual obligations or the content of the prospective contract to be negotiated or concluded by the agent. However, as the agent only has to take into account interests of the principal that can be known of, the principal takes the risk that the contract concluded or arranged will not meet the principal's (hidden) interests. The principal would to that extent be barred from claiming non-performance by the agent. However, the agent can be under an obligation to warn the principal. In German case law, such obligations have been assumed in expertise cases, in particular where relationships between banks and their customers were involved.

10. In GREECE, good faith requires that the principal informs the agent of the principal's interests and needs regarding the performance of the mandate. A principal who fails to do so cannot claim a deviation from the limits set in the mandate (CC art. 717). The principal can either provide information voluntarily or when asked to do so.

11. In HUNGARY the clear consent of the agent requires that the agent has the necessary information about the interests and needs as regards the performance of the contract or the content of the prospective contract to be negotiated or concluded. In this sense, CC art. 205(2) establishes that '[i]t is fundamental to the validity of a contract that an agreement is reached by the parties concerning all essential issues as well as those deemed essential by either of the parties. The parties need not agree on issues that are regulated by statutory provisions'. Moreover, the parties are under an obligation to cooperate, including the obligation to inform each other of all important circumstances affecting performance of the contract (CC art. 277(4)-(5)). On the basis of CC art. 474(2), '[a]n agent must fulfil the principal's instructions and represent his interests regarding the authority conferred upon him'. Naturally, the agent cannot be liable for the failures and damages caused by the lack of information that the principal should have given, but according to CC art. 476, '[i]f the principal issues imprudent or incompetent instructions, the agent shall call the principal's attention to the matter. If the principal insists on the instructions despite the warning, he shall be liable for the damages sustained on account of the instructions'.

12. In ITALY, under the provisions regulating the mandate there are no specific rules governing the principal's duty to inform the agent of the principal's interests and needs, whether as volunteered information or when asked. However, on the basis of CC art. 1719 ('In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the principal is bound to furnish the mandatory with the means necessary to perform the mandate and to fulfil the obligations which the mandatory has undertaken in his own name') it can be argued that the principal has to provide the agent with all relevant information which is necessary for the execution of the mandate. With respect to the more specific issue concerning the existence of a duty of information prior to the conclusion of the contract, it should be noted that the general rules of the Civil Code on precontractual liability apply also to representation agreements. According to CC art. 1337, 'the parties, in the conduct of negotiations and the formation of the contract, shall conduct themselves according to good faith'; in addition, according to the general clause of good faith, '[t]he debtor and the creditor shall behave according to rules of fairness' (CC art. 1175). Furthermore, CC art. 1338 provides that 'a party who knows or should know the existence of a reason for invalidity of the contract and does not give notice to the other party is bound to compensate for the damages suffered by the latter in relying, without fault, on the validity of the contract'. There are no particular rules of consumer protection on this specific issue; however, if the principal is a consumer his or her position will be evaluated differently by the courts. Since the consumer may not be in a position to establish what information is relevant for the agent (a professional) in order to perform the mandate (information asymmetries), it is mostly the agent who has a duty to inquire as to the exact interests of the principal.

13. In SCOTLAND the position is similar to that described for England in Note 4 above.

II. Consequences of failure to inform agent

14. In AUSTRIA, a principal who fails to inform the agent as required cannot found on any resulting non-performance by the agent. The agent is required to warn the principal of this consequence.

15. In BELGIUM, an agent who is not able to fulfil the mission because of a lack of information which should have been provided by the principal can claim damages (in general: Wéry, Le mandat, 224).

16. In DENMARK, it is part of the principal's obligation towards the agent to answer a request for information by the agent. In carrying out this obligation the principal must act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. If non-performance of the contract is due to failure of the principal to provide information, the agent cannot be held responsible. The agent must warn the principal of such consequences. However, the consequences will mostly appear when it comes to an evaluation of the prospective contract.

17. In ENGLAND, the principal must answer the requests for information by the agent. Should the principal fail to answer such queries, then the agent will not be liable for any consequences following such failures, or for the reasonable interpretations the agent has made of the instructions.

18. In ESTONIA, if the principal's failure to answer the request of the agent leads to negative consequences for the principal, the principal will most likely not be in a position to found on any non-performance by the agent if the latter has acted with the normal diligence. Whether a duty to warn exists can only be determined according to the specifics of the case.

19. FRENCH law is silent on the consequences of a failure to provide information, but it is undoubtedly the case that a refusal to reply to questions raised by the agent would exclude the liability of the agent where the mandate failed or was improperly performed. The agent could, however, remain liable to any third party contractor (see Cass. 1re civ., 13 Nov 1997, Bull. Civ. I no. 308). There is no obligation for the agent to inform the principal of the consequences of the refusal to provide the information requested.

20. In FINLAND, if the principal fails to inform the agent, the omission may reduce or eliminate the agent's liability in cases where the prospective contract (or the performance of the agent otherwise) does not correspond to the (undisclosed) needs of the principal. Further, if the agent suffers losses due to the non-disclosure of the principal, the agent may be entitled to damages (including loss of profit where the mandate contract is valid).

21. In GERMANY, the position is as stated in note 9 above.

22. Under GREEK law, if the principal does not provide information although is asked to do so, the agent has the right to refuse to perform the mandate and the principal is placed under notice according to CC art. 351 (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis III, Art. 713 GREEK CC nr. 19). Furthermore, the principal cannot found on any non-performance of the mandate in so far as this is due to the failure to provide information (CC art. 717). The agent is not required to warn the principal of such consequences. However, in the case of the obligatory remunerated mandate between a lawyer and a principal, good faith (CC art. 288) requires the lawyer to warn the principal of the consequences.

23. In HUNGARY, in the case of failure to provide information, the general rules of obligations apply, especially CC art. 277(4)-(5), which places the parties under an obligation to co-operate in the performance of contractual obligations, including the obligation to inform each other of all important circumstances affecting performance. Co-operation is especially important in the case of agency, as CC art. 477(1)-(2) provides that '[t]he agent shall inform his principal of his activities and the state of affairs upon request or, if necessary, even without a request, particularly if employment of another person has become necessary or if the instructions need to be changed due to the occurrence of new circumstances. The agent shall be entitled to depart from the principal's instructions only if it is essential for the principal's interest and if there is no time to notify the principal in advance. In such a case the principal shall be notified without delay'. Furthermore, according to CC art. 476, '[i]f the principal issues imprudent or incompetent instructions, the agent shall call the principal's attention to the matter. If the principal insists on the instructions despite the warning, he shall be liable for the damages sustained on account of the instructions'.

24. In IRELAND, at common law, there is no express duty to inform placed on principals. However, an agent is required to follow the lawful instructions of the principal. It has been held that where instructions are ambiguous an agent will not be held liable where the agent acts on a reasonable interpretation of the instructions (Ireland v Livingstone [1872] LR 5 HL 395), though an agent should seek clarification, where possible (Woodhouse AC Israel Cocoa Ltd SA v Nigerian Produce Marketing Co Ltd [1972] AC 741 at 772 per Lord Salmon; European Asian Bank AG v Punjab & Sind Bank [1983] 2 All ER 508 at 517 per Goff LJ).

25. In ITALY, the principal is required to answer requests for information by the agent on the basis of the good faith principle and on the basis of the duty of co-operation between the parties to a contract. A principal who fails to answer such requests is barred from eventually seeking damages against the agent if the damage could have been prevented, had the principal responded to the agent's requests for information. In general terms, the agent is not required to warn the principal of such consequences. However, if the principal is a consumer, the agent has a more intensive duty to investigate the principal's interests, which would often mean that if the principal neglects to answer a first request, the agent would ask for the required information again and eventually warn the principal of the consequences of silence (usually in the form of a 'disclaimer').

26. In the NETHERLANDS according to literature, the principal may be obliged to provide the agent with information which is necessary for the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract. However, there is no specific duty for the principal to inform the agent. Usually, the contracting parties will agree in the individual mandate contract on the principal's duty to inform the agent. Furthermore, the principal may have certain duties to inform the agent based on the principle of reasonableness and fairness. See Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 17.

27. The POLISH CC contains no specific rules on the principal's duty to provide information to the agent.

28. In SCOTTISH law the principal is subject to very few duties towards the agent, in contrast to the numerous duties which the agent must fulfil towards the principal. At common law, there is no general duty on the principal to act towards the agent in good faith (although such a duty will apply in situations of commercial agency governed by the Commercial Agents (Council Directive) Regulations 1993 (SI 1993/3053, reg. 4(1)). Whilst no obvious expression of the principal's duties at common law exists, individual duties are identifiable in the case-law concerning the agent's duty of care

(Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 87). Thus, a delay by the principal in giving instructions, or the giving of defective instructions, constitutes a breach of the agent/principal contract which will result in the principal losing the right to damages from the agent for defective performance (Mackenzie v Blakeney (1879) 6 R 1329). Looked at from the principal's perspective, this could constitute a duty to provide clear instructions.

29. According to the SLOVAKIAN General Law of Obligations, the creditor (here the principal) is in default when the creditor, contrary to the contract, fails to cooperate with the debtor (here the agent) to enable the latter's performance. Furthermore, Ccom § 568(2) provides that the principal is bound to provide to the agent with all necessary things and information for performing the latter's obligation to arrange a certain matter, unless it ensues from the matter that the agent is to obtain what is necessary personally.

30. In SPAIN the principal has to determine how the mandate is to be performed by giving the directions and instructions which the principal deems necessary for the successful performance of the mandate (Lasarte Álvarez, Principios de derecho civil III[7], 346). Beyond that there are no rules as to the duty to inform the agent. Properly speaking, the mandate is a unilateral contract and the principal's obligations only arise as indemnity duties when the contract is ended (CC arts. 1728, 1729). This basic scheme is modified where the agent acts on a commercial basis. In this case, the general rules on bilateral contracts apply. Accordingly, the duty to inform should be deduced from the general duty to act in good faith (CC art. 1258).

31. In SWEDEN the principal has a duty to be loyal and co-operate towards the agent. This includes a duty to answer requests for information in order for the agent to be able to perform according to the contract. The scope of this duty is somewhat uncertain due to a lack of precedents (see HaL § 7; Hesser, 64; Ramberg, 246; Hellner, 114).

III. Consequences of failure to inform agent

32. In AUSTRIA due to the duty of care, the principal is to obtain for the agent the information necessary for the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract. If the principal fails to inform the agent of, the principal cannot argue that there has been non-performance by the agent. The agent is required to warn the principal of this consequence.

33. In BELGIUM if the agent is not able to fulfil the mission because of a lack of information, the agent can claim damages (in general: Wéry, Le mandat, 224).

34. In BULGARIA when the agent, in order to perform the contractual obligations, needs information or directions from the principal, the latter has a duty to co-operate. This is not an actual obligation, which can be enforced, but rather a legal burden or requirement (Тежест, Obliegenheit). Therefore if the principal does not assist, either voluntarily or at the agent's request, there is no breach of contractual obligations, but a case of mora creditoris (LOA art. 95; Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 110; Апостолов, Облигационно право[2], 331). In such a case, the agent can terminate the contractual relationship and claim expenses due to mora creditoris (LOA art. 98; Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 111; Кожухаров, Облигационно право[2], I, 352; Supreme Court, Judgment no. 209, 4 Jul 1999).

35. In DENMARK it is part of the principal's obligation towards the agent to answer a request for information by the agent. In carrying out this obligation the principal must act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. If non-performance of the contractual obligations is due to failure of the principal to provide information, the agent cannot be held responsible. The agent must warn the principal of such consequences. However, the consequences will mostly appear when it comes to an evaluation of the prospective contract.

36. In ENGLAND the principal must answer requests for information by the agent. Should the principal fail to answer such queries, then the agent will not be liable for any consequences following such failures, or for the reasonable interpretations the agent has made of the instructions.

37. In ESTONIA if the principal's failure to answer the request of the agent to give information as to principal's interests leads to negative consequences for the principal, the principal will most likely not be in a position to argue that the agent is in breach of its duties and has not performed with the normal diligence. Even if the breach exists, the agent can avoid liability as the breach is attributable to the principal (LOA § 101(3)). Whether a duty to warn exists can only be determined according to the specifics of the case.

38. In FINLAND if the principal fails to inform the agent, the omission may reduce or eliminate the agent's liability in cases where the prospective contract (or the performance of the agent otherwise) does not correspond to the (undisclosed) needs of the principal. Further, if the agent suffers losses due to the non-disclosure of the principal, the agent may be entitled to damages (including loss of profit where the mandate contract is valid).

39. In FRANCE the law is silent on the consequences of a failure to provide information, but it is undoubtedly the case that a refusal to reply to questions raised by the agent would exclude the liability of the agent where the mandate failed or was improperly performed. The agent could, however, remain liable to any third party contractor (see Cass.civ. 1re, 13 Nov 1997, Bull. civ. 1997 I, no. 308). There is no obligation for the agent to inform the principal of the consequences of the refusal to provide the information requested.

40. In GERMANY as the agent only has to take into account those interests of the principal that the agent can be aware of, it lies in the principal's best interest to provide all necessary information to the agent. Should the principal fail to do so and the contract concluded or arranged does not meet the principal's (hidden) interests, the principal is to that extent barred from claiming non-performance by the agent.

41. In GREECE if the principal does not provide information when asked to do so, the agent has the right to withhold performance of the obligations under the mandate contract and the principal is placed under notice according to CC art. 351 (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis III, Art. 713 GREEK CC nr. 19). Furthermore, the principal is not entitled due to the failure to provide information to claim a deviation from the limits set in the mandate (CC art. 717). The agent is not required to warn the principal of such consequences. However, in the case of the obligatory remunerated mandate between a lawyer and a principal, good faith (CC art. 288) requires the lawyer to warn the client of the consequences.

42. In HUNGARY in the case of a failure to provide information, the general rules of obligations apply, especially CC art. 277(4)-(5), which place the parties under an obligation to cooperate in the performance of contractual obligations, including the obligation to inform each other of all important circumstances affecting performance. The agent is not liable for any consequences which result from the fact that the principal did not provide information about an important circumstance. Furthermore, according to CC art. 476, '[i]f the principal issues imprudent or incompetent instructions, the agent shall call the principal's attention to the matter. If the principal insists on the instructions despite the warning, he shall be liable for the damages sustained on account of the instructions'.

43. In IRELAND while there is no express duty to inform placed on principals, it has been held that where a principal fails to answer queries from the agent, the agent will not be liable for any consequences following from such failures, or for the reasonable interpretations the agent has made of the instructions from the principal (Ireland v Livingstone [1872] LR 5 HL 395).

44. In ITALY the principal is required to answer requests for information by the agent on the basis of the good faith principle and on the basis of the duty of cooperation between the parties to a contract. If the principal fails to answer such requests the principal is barred from eventually seeking damages against the agent if the damage could have been prevented, had the principal responded to the agent's requests for information. In general terms, the agent is not required to warn the principal of such consequences. However, if the principal is a consumer, the agent has a more intensive duty to investigate the principal's interests, which would often mean that if the principal neglects to answer a first request, the agent would ask for the required information again and eventually warn the principal of the consequences of silence (usually in the form of a 'disclaimer').

45. In the NETHERLANDS it seems that if non-performance of obligations under the mandate contract by the agent is due to the principal's failure to provide information, the agent is not liable for this non-performance.

46. Since the POLISH CC contains no specific provisions on the duty to provide the agent with any information, there are also no rules on the consequences of a failure to provide such information. If the agent does not carry out the contract properly because the principal refused to reveal required information, the agent will not be liable for breach of contract.

47. In SCOTLAND a delay by the principal in the provision of instructions, or the giving of defective instructions, constitutes a breach of the principal/agent contract, which will result in the principal losing the right to damages from the agent for defective performance (Mackenzie v Blakeney (1879) 6 R 1329).

48. In SLOVAKIA in civil relations, the agent can ask for compensation for damages (e.g. adjustment of the price when payment of the price is related to the achievement of the client's expected result). The agent may also always terminate the contractual relationship. The agent is not required to warn the principal of such consequences. In commercial relations, the agent may demand from the principal the performance of the obligations to provide information and/or compensation for damages. As for the possibility to terminate the contractual relationship: an agent can only terminate the contract in case of a fundamental breach by the principal and if the agent informs the principal without undue delay.

49. In SPAIN there are no special rules on this point. The natural consequence, however, is that the agent is not liable for any harm suffered by the principal as a result of the principal's own failure to provide information. Where the mandate is a bilateral contract, and the agent has an economic interest in carrying out the affair and being paid, damages may be appropriate.

50. In SWEDEN if the principal fails to answer a request for information from the agent and the agent suffers damage due to this fact, such failure could amount to a non-performance for which the principal could be liable to pay damages to the agent unless the principal can show that the failure is not due to negligence (HaL § 34).

IV.D.–2:102: Price

(1) The principal must pay a price if the agent performs the obligations under the mandate contract in the course of a business, unless the principal expected and could reasonably have expected the agent to perform the obligations otherwise than in exchange for a price.

(2) The price is payable when the mandated task has been completed and the agent has given account of that to the principal.

(3) If the parties had agreed on payment of a price for services rendered, the mandate relationship has terminated and the mandated task has not been completed, the price is payable as of the moment the agent has given account of the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract.

(4) When the mandate is for the conclusion of a prospective contract and principal has concluded the prospective contract directly or another person appointed by the principal has concluded the prospective contract on the principal's behalf, the agent is entitled to the price or a proportionate part of it if the conclusion of the prospective contract can be attributed in full or in part to the agent's performance of the obligations under the mandate contract.

(5) When the mandate is for the conclusion of a prospective contract and the prospective contract is concluded after the mandate relationship has terminated, the principal must pay the price if payment of a price based solely on the conclusion of the prospective contract was agreed and

(a) the conclusion of the prospective contract is mainly the result of the agent's efforts; and

(b) the prospective contract is concluded within a reasonable period after the mandate relationship has terminated.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article provides that a professional agent is normally entitled to a price for the services rendered, even if the parties neglected to explicitly regulate the matter. This does not apply however if it can be proved that the principal expected the contract to be gratuitous and that it was reasonable in the circumstances to think so. The Article further provides that, as a default rule, payment of the price is due only after the mandated task (e.g. the conclusion of a prospective contract) has been completed and the agent has so informed the principal (paragraph (2).

Paragraph (3) regulates the payment of the price where the agent has not managed to complete the mandated task during the mandate relationship but the parties have agreed on a payment for services rendered. Such payment is due when the agent has given an account to the principal.

Paragraphs (4) and (5) concern the consequences as to the right to payment for the agent when, despite the efforts made by the agent in concluding the prospective contract, it is eventually concluded by the principal or another agent appointed by the principal. Under paragraph (4) the prospective contract is concluded during performance, whereas under paragraph (5) the prospective contract is concluded when the mandate relationship is no longer in force. Paragraph (4) indicates that the agent retains the right to be paid, whether fully or partially, if the conclusion of the prospective contract can be attributed in full or in part to the agent's performance of the obligations under the mandate contract. Under paragraph (5) the agent has to show that the contract was mainly the result of the agent's efforts. In addition, the contract must have been concluded within a reasonable period after the relationship is terminated.

B. Price for professional party

Traditionally, the mandate relationship was considered to be of a gratuitous nature. However, the gratuitous nature is in modern practice no longer self-evident. Especially where professional agents are involved, the performance of the mandate – i.e. the service the agent provides – is nowadays normally for a price. This provision in the first half of paragraph (1) reflects the normal situation in practice: an agent who has entered the mandate contract in a professional capacity is entitled to payment, unless the parties have agreed otherwise.

C. Unless principal may reasonably expect no charge

Paragraph (1) also provides, however, an exception to the normal rule. No price will be payable if the principal expected the agent to perform the contract gratuitously and it was indeed reasonable to have such an expectation.

> Illustration 1
> A hotel (agent) advertises that a tour could be arranged without any indication as to the price for its service. A client (principal) thought it would be arranged for free (just as a service). Even though the hotel is acting in its professional capacity, it is rather common that these services are offered free of charge, unless the hotel explicitly mentions the opposite. Under these conditions, the hotel guest could reasonably expect that the hotel would be willing to perform this service gratuitously because it is interested in getting positive reports from guests or has hopes of being able to sell other (paid) services.

D. When price payable

Specific rule provided. Under III.–2:102 (Time of performance) paragraph (1) when the parties have not agreed differently, performance of an obligation, and therefore also payment by the principal, is due 'within a reasonable time after the conclusion of the contract'. This does not give the parties much guidance in the case of a mandate relationship, which may, but not always does imply that the agent is to perform the obligations within a certain period of time. In fact, many mandate relationships are long-term contracts or their performance by the agent at least may take some time, if it is successful at all. This Article provides a specific rule as to the time of performance of the obligation of the principal to pay the agent. According to paragraph (2), the price becomes due only after the agent has performed successfully the main obligations under the mandate contract and has given account of that to the principal under IV.D.–3:402 (Accounting to the principal) paragraph (1).

Price for services rendered agreed upon. In the case where the parties had agreed upon payment of a price for services rendered, the agent is also entitled to payment if the mandate relationship has terminated but the mandated task has not been completed (e.g. a prospective contract is ultimately not concluded). In such a case, the agent has already rendered some services. In that case, paragraph (3) provides that the price is payable when the agent has given account of what has been done in the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract under IV.D.–3:402 (Accounting to the principal) paragraph (3).

Balance of interests. This solution is justified because it best satisfies the interests of both parties. It provides a good incentive for the agent to give account of the way the mandate has been carried out, as no payment will be due otherwise. Requiring the agent to give account first means that the principal is able to evaluate whether or not the agent has properly performed the obligations under the contract. Moreover, this rule has the benefit of establishing a moment when the price becomes due which is clear to both parties at that moment, as the parties have been in contact with each other. This rule therefore stimulates communication between the parties.

E. Price when prospective contract is not concluded by agent

Agent entitled to payment. Paragraph (4) deals with the question whether, where the mandate is for the conclusion of a prospective contract, the agent is entitled to be paid if the prospective contract is concluded by the principal personally or by another agent in contracts in which no exclusivity was granted to the agent. When the agent was not allowed exclusivity, payment should be due only for the services rendered. This provision contains an in-between solution according to which the agent is entitled to the price, or part of it, if the services rendered have contributed to the conclusion of the prospective contract.

> A principal mandates an agent to sell the principal's car. The agent negotiates with a third party, but the third party refuses the offer made by the agent. The third party then contacts the principal directly and they conclude the sales contract. In this case, as the services of the agent have undoubtedly contributed to the conclusion of the sales contract, the agent would be entitled to the price (in full or in part).

No exclusivity granted. The situation which is described in paragraph (3) is to be differentiated from the situation in which the agent was awarded exclusivity but the principal nevertheless concluded the prospective contract personally or had it concluded by another agent. In such a case the principal is in breach of contract and is liable in damages. If that is the case, the agent would have to be put as nearly as possible into the position which would have prevailed if the principal had respected the exclusivity clause. This would imply that the principal would have to compensate the loss which the agent has suffered and the gain of which the agent has been deprived. In other words, the agent would receive the expectation interest.

F. Price if prospective contract is concluded after termination, but is mainly the result of the efforts of the agent

Agent entitled to payment. Paragraph (5) deals with the situation where (a) the mandate is for the conclusion of a prospective contract (b) the principal's obligation to pay arises only on the conclusion of the prospective contract ("no result, no pay") (c) the mandate relationship is terminated and (d) the principal or somebody acting on the principal's behalf subsequently concludes the prospective contract. In this situation the agent retains the right to payment if the contract concluded was mainly the result of the agent's efforts in the performance of the mandate and if it is concluded within a reasonable time after the mandate relationship is terminated.

Balance of interests. In this type of contract, there is a substantial risk that the principal will try to evade the obligation to pay by terminating the mandate relationship just before the principal concludes the prospective contract. In order to protect the interests of the agent, the principal should therefore be required to pay the price even though the mandate relationship had already terminated. On the other hand, it does not seem fair to require the principal, under all circumstances, to pay the full price if the agent did not conclude the prospective contract after all. Therefore the obligation to pay remains only when certain conditions are fulfilled. This is therefore a balanced solution where the interests of both the agent and the principal are safeguarded.

A principal mandates an agent to sell the principal's car. The agent negotiates with a third party and comes to an agreement, subject to approval by the principal. The principal does not give the approval, terminates the mandate relationship, and subsequently concludes the sales contract on (almost) the same terms with the third party.

A principal mandates an agent to sell the principal's car. They agree on a mandate contract with a duration of 3 months. The agent negotiates with a third party and comes to an agreement, subject to approval by the principal. The principal waits until the 3 months period has ended and subsequently concludes the sales contract on (almost) the same terms with the third party.

In both cases it is clear that the principal has terminated the contractual relationship (Illustration 3) or waited for the fixed date to expire (Illustration 4) in order to prevent the agent from concluding the contract with the third party.

A principal mandates an agent to sell the principal's car. The agent negotiates with a third party. The principal, not satisfied with the progress the agent makes, terminates the mandate relationship and appoints another agent. The new agent ends the negotiations successfully and concludes the sales contract.

In this case, the first agent's efforts have contributed to the conclusion of the prospective contract, but they did not mainly result in the conclusion of the contract with the third party: the services of the second agent were equally necessary. In this case, the agent is not entitled to payment of the price.

Similar to regime for commercial agency contracts. It should be noted that paragraph (4) is worded in a similar manner as IV.E.–3:302 (Commission after the agency has ended), where the commercial agent under certain conditions is entitled to commission for contracts concluded after the commercial agency has terminated.

NOTES

I. Professional agent entitled to price

1. In AUSTRIA if there is a custom or usage of the particular trade regulating the payment of remuneration, there is a presumption, in the absence of any express or implied agreement to the contrary, that the parties contracted for the payment of the remuneration in accordance with this custom or usage (CC § 1004; Apathy, § 1004 Rz 1). Solicitors are to be remunerated for their services (RATG and the subsidiary regulations of CC §§ 1002 et seq.). The commercial regulations (Ccom §§ 345, 354, 396 et seq.; HVertrG §§ 8, 24 et seq.) provide similar rules for cases when there are no express contract provisions.
2. According to the BELGIAN CC art. 1986, a mandate is as a rule non-remunerated, unless the parties agreed expressly or impliedly to the contrary. A tacit clause on remuneration is presumed in favour of a professional agent (Tilleman, Lastgeving, 103; Wéry, Le mandat, 211).
3. In BULGARIA as a general rule, mandate is a gratuitous contract. According to LOA art. 28, "the principal shall pay remuneration to the agent only if it has been negotiated". It makes no difference whether the agent acts in a professional capacity or in the course of a business – the remuneration is due only if it is explicitly or implicitly stipulated. Special provisions for some types of mandate contract provide for compulsory remuneration, e.g. Ccom art. 36(1) for the commercial agent, Ccom art. 356(2) for the commission contract, Ccom art. 361(1) for the forwarding contract and BAA art. 36 for a contract between an advocate and a client. A common feature of these special mandate contracts is that the agents act in the course of their business. In legal doctrine the mandate contract with an agent acting in a professional capacity is presumed to be non-gratuitous (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 52).
4. In DENMARK, there are no rules providing that the professional agent is entitled to a price for the services if the contract is silent about this. However, many contracts contain clauses by which the professional agent is entitled to claim a price.
5. In ENGLAND, there is a presumption in a commercial contract that when the principal requests a professional agent to act, the agent will be remunerated for the services. It is however a simple presumption and it can therefore be rebutted (Miller v Beale (1879) 27 WR 403).
6. In ESTONIA, the rule that the agent who acts as a professional party is entitled to a price is expressly stipulated for the (general) contract for services: 'In the case where the amount of remuneration payable has not been agreed upon in the contract for services, remuneration shall be paid if it can be reasonably presumed that the service would only be performed for remuneration, above all if the service provider performed the service for the purposes of his professional activities.' (LOA § 627(1)). The same principle applies to the brokerage contract (LOA § 664-665), contract of agency (LOA § 680(1)) and the commissionaire agreement (LOA § 701(1)), all of which are non-gratuitous by definition.
7. In FINLAND, the agent is, unless otherwise agreed, entitled to a reasonable remuneration (Ccom § 18:5 and analogous interpretation of the SaleGA § 45). The real estate agent is, however, only entitled to the remuneration if the sales contract is executed, unless otherwise agreed between the principal and the agent (REstateAA § 20). The ACAgentsS §§ 10 and 11 contain specific rules on remuneration and its amount.

8. Under FRENCH law, in principle, the mandate is supposed to be a contract without any payment (CC art. 1986), but case law has decided that where the agent is in business and the contract is silent, the agent is entitled to remuneration (Cass. 1ère civ., 10 Feb 1981, Bull. civ. I no. 50.; Cass. 1re civ., 6 Jun 1998, Bull. civ. I no. 211). This will be determined by the judge, depending on the extent of the services rendered. In certain cases, the statutes do specifically allow remuneration (e.g. commercial agents: Ccom art. L.134-5(3)), whereas in other cases the statutes will indicate otherwise (e.g. estate agents: L. 2 Jan 1970 art. 6).

9. In GERMANY the professional agent is entitled to a price for the services if the contract keeps silent about this on two separate counts: under the law on contracts for services (CC § 612(1)) and for works (CC § 632(1)), which applies in the framework of CC § 675. A price is deemed to be agreed upon if, under the circumstances, the service or work can only be expected to be rendered for a price. Under the rules on mandates, no specific provision for the situation addressed exists. However, a dated court decision has relied on an analogous application of CC § 1835(3), thus granting the mandatary a price if the act(s) performed under the mandate form part of the mandatary's profession (RGZ 149, 121, 124). This approach is also followed by a number of scholars, but usually under the additional condition that the act performed was not specifically anticipated when the contract of mandate – which in general requires the mandatary to act gratuitously – was concluded (Seiler, § 670 para. 21).

10. In GREECE, the question as to the price does not arise due to the gratuitous character of mandate. In the case of the obligatory remunerated mandate between lawyer and client, an agreement regarding the remuneration of the lawyer is always required for the validity of the contract (Kapodistrias, Art. 713 GREEK CC nr. 20; Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 713 GREEK CC nr. 10). In the case of intermediation, if the contract keeps silent about the remuneration of a professional broker, CC art. 705 is applicable: 'A remuneration shall be deemed to have been tacitly agreed if the intervention or the indication is in the usual circumstances only made for a remuneration or if the task has been assigned to a professional broker. If the amount of remuneration has not been fixed, the remuneration due is determined by the rates in force or in the absence of such rates the remuneration which is usual in the locality' (the locality of the conclusion of the contract of brokerage: Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 705 GREEK CC nr. 2; Supreme Court decision no. 710/1986, EEN 1987, 148). A contractual agreement contrary to this rule is permitted (Supreme Court decision nr. 1565/1986, NoV 1987, 1044).

11. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 478(1), '[t]he principal shall pay an appropriate fee, unless the circumstances, or the relationship between the parties suggest that the agent has assumed the agency without any consideration'.

12. In IRELAND in general, an agent is only entitled to remuneration if that has been agreed with the principal. In a commercial context, it is rare that an agent would agree to act gratuitously. Importantly, the agreement as to remuneration can be express or implied. A right to remuneration will be implied on the same basis that other terms can be implied into contracts. For instance, such a right would probably be implied where the agent is acting in the course of a profession or business (Miller v Beale [1879] 27 WR 403), and would more easily be implied where the services have been provided.

13. In ITALY, the general rule is that if the contract keeps silent the agent is entitled to payment. If the agent is a professional the presumption is even stronger.

14. In the NETHERLANDS as there is no specific stipulation on the agent's remuneration in the case of a mandate relationship, the rules on the general contract for professional services apply. If the agent performs the service in the course of a profession, the principal is held liable to pay remuneration (CC art. 7:405(1)). However, the contracting parties may agree differently (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 9). The contracting parties are allowed to jointly determine the payment of the agent. It will often occur that the exact remuneration is not been specified in the contract. Therefore, if the agent is entitled to payment, but the contracting parties have not specified the exact remuneration, the principal is held liable to pay remuneration as usually charged, or if there is no such measure, fair remuneration (CC art. 7:405(2)). For instance, customs that apply in certain branches of trade have to be taken into account (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 17). An agent who is not a professional party cannot make a claim to any remuneration for the services (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 17).

15. The agent, under POLISH law, is entitled to remuneration even if the mandate contract is silent on this matter, unless the parties have agreed that the service will be performed without remuneration (CC art. 735). The CC makes no distinction between professional and other agents in this respect.

16. In SCOTLAND, if the agent is a professional party and the contract is silent on the issue of remuneration, a rebuttable presumption in favour of remuneration exists. Case law suggests that such remuneration is due where the work involved constitutes the agent's livelihood (Mackersy's Executors v St Giles Cathedral Managing Board (1904) 12 SLT 391; Campbell v Campbell's Exrs (1910) 47 SLR 837). The court will consider evidence of established custom and trade in order to decide whether remuneration is due, and, if so, how much. Where the agent is not a professional person, remuneration is due on a quantum meruit basis (Kennedy v Glass (1890) 17 R 1085). These general rules apply inter alia to a solicitor, who need not stipulate for payment, because the mere employment is sufficient to allow remuneration to be claimed at the ordinary rate (Begg, 117).

17. The SLOVAKIAN CC § 730 provides that the principal only has to pay remuneration when it was agreed on or when it is customary in particular with regard to the agent's profession. If the agent's professional activities include making such arrangements, it is presumed that some remuneration has been agreed on (Ccom § 566(2)).

18. In SPAIN the mandate contract is presumed to be gratuitous unless the parties have agreed otherwise (CC art. 1711; confirmed in STS 30 April 1993). The agent has to prove that there is an agreement between the parties, explicit or tacit, as to the remunerated character of the contract (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII^2, 453). There is an exception to this rule: if the agent exercises professionally the type of activities which are the object of the mandate contract, then the mandate is presumed to be remunerated (CC art. 1711(2)). See also, Ccom art. 277. However, the agent needs to prove that that the activities are indeed those which are exercised in the agent's daily professional activities (SSTS 7 Apr 1979, 21 Feb 1995). If there is no price agreed, then it will be established in accordance with professional tariffs, usages, or eventually the determination of the court (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII^2, 454).

19. According to the SWEDISH HB 18:5 the agent is entitled to a reasonable price. If the parties have not agreed on a price it follows by analogy from KöpL § 45 that the price is what is reasonable considering the circumstances. In certain categories of agents business practice has developed. Thus, trade agents, commissionaires and real estate agents are entitled to a percentage commission on contracts concluded with a third party (see HaL § 9, FmL § 21 and KommL § 27).

II. When payment of price due

20. In AUSTRIA, in the absence of an express agreement, payment of the price is due when the task is fulfilled (Apathy, § 1004 Rz 5). Rendering of accounts is no precondition. Where the commercial regulations apply, payment of the price is due on results (Ccom §§ 383, 409).

21. As a rule in BELGIUM the payment of the price is due at the moment of accounting by the agent. An exception is made for long term contracts for representation or contracts with successive performances. For these contracts, parties can agree on intermediate payments (RPDP, v° Le mandat, no. 737; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 111; Wéry, Le mandat, 214).

22. In BULGARIA there is no specific provision regulating when the remuneration stipulated in the mandate contract is due. When the mandate contract is silent, local custom is applicable. In the absence of a custom, the remuneration is due when the agent has performed the contractual obligation, i.e. has concluded the prospective contract or performed the juridical act on behalf of the principal (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 54). Unless otherwise stipulated in the contract, rendering of an account is not a necessary precondition for payment of the remuneration (Supreme Court, Judgment no. 922, 7 Oct 1993, Civil Case 2050/1993, V). According to the special rule of Ccom art. 38 the remuneration of the commercial agent is due in monthly payments (Gerdjikov, Komentar na Turgovskiya zakon I, 156). The parties can agree on a different term of payment, but no later than the end of the month which follows the three-months-period during which the prospective contract was concluded (Ccom art. 38).

23. In DENMARK, unless otherwise expressly agreed upon between the parties, the payment of price and reimbursement will fall due as soon as the agent has fulfilled the mandate for representation. A claim for reimbursement will normally be needed to fix the exact amount of the expenses.

24. In ENGLAND when the agent is entitled to receive commission on the happening of a given result or event the agent must show that the result or event in question has actually occurred and that the agent was the effective cause of it.

25. In ESTONIA a specific rule applies for a contracts for services which obliges the service provider (the agent) to execute a juridical act: the remuneration is payable after the execution of the juridical act (if not agreed otherwise).

26. In FINLAND, unless otherwise agreed, the payment is usually due in reasonable time after the fulfilment of the agent's contractual obligations and after a demand by the agent. The price is not payable until an account is given, if such is required. The agent is usually not entitled to an advance payment. This is, in general, not the case in long-term mandates where periodical payments may take place. The ACAgentsS §§ 10 and 11 contain detailed rules concerning the time of payment.

27. In FRANCE when the contract is silent, the remuneration is due at the end of the mission, although the Civil Code does not specify the exact moment of this payment. Frequently, the agency contract specifies that remuneration is due only if the mission has been successfully completed. French case law seems to consider that an agent who does not successfully perform the contract may not receive any remuneration (despite CC art. 1999(2), which considers that payment may always be due to the agent except where the agent has been guilty of a failure – but authors do not agree on this point). However, if the termination of the mandate is caused by reasons that are independent of the parties, the French courts consider that the remuneration normally due may then be limited to the part of the contractual obligations which have already been performed or the agent may only receive an indemnity. An indemnity may also be due to the agent when the contract could not be performed because of the principal's or a third party's failure.

28. Payment of the price is due under GERMAN law after the service has been rendered (CC § 614) or the work has been finished and (possibly tacitly) accepted by the other party (CC § 641(1)).

29. In GREECE in case of intermediation, payment of the price is due after the conclusion of the prospective contract as a result of the intervention or indication of the broker.

30. In general, according to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 478(4), '[f]ees shall be payable at the time a contract is extinguished'. Contrary to the general rules, in case of commission agency, '[t]he commission agent shall be entitled to receive a commission only if the sales contract has been performed' (CC art. 511(1)).

31. IRISH case law has addressed some particular questions as to when remuneration is earned or payable (leaving many other questions yet to be addressed). For example, it has been held that where a commission is earned by an agent on bringing about a result, the agent will only be entitled to payment if the agent is the effective cause of that result (Millar, Son & Co v Radford [1903] 19TLR 575; Judd v Donegal Tweed Co Ltd [1935] 69 ILTR 117; Stokes & Quirke Ltd v Clohessy [1957] IR 84). Another question which has been addressed by case law is, where an agent is to be remunerated by commission, whether the principal may prevent the agent from earning commission, for instance, by refusing to perform a contract negotiated, or concluded, by the agent. In the absence of any express provision in the agency agreement, this depends on whether an appropriate term may be implied into the agency contract. For example, in Cusack v Bothwell [1943] 77 ILTR 18, an auctioneer was instructed to find a buyer for lands at a certain price. The agent was to receive a commission of 5 per cent. He introduced a buyer but the seller refused to sell and pay the commission. The court awarded the auctioneer a sum equivalent to 5 per cent because he had done what was required of him. This ruling goes against some earlier English case law (see e.g. Luxor (Eastbourne) Ltd v Cooper [1941] AC 108 and French & Co v Leston Shipping Co Ltd [1922] 1 AC 451) but appears to be supported in more recent case law (Alpha Trading Ltd. v Dunnshaw-Patten Ltd. [1981] QB 290).

32. In ITALY, the agent, unless otherwise agreed by the parties, has a reporting obligation to be performed without delay towards the principal (CC art. 1712 and 1713). In particular, upon conclusion of the mandate the agent must communicate to the principal the performance of the contractual obligations, and must further report on the activities carried out and render to the principal all and any profits acquired in the performance of the obligations. The agent must also state the expenses incurred in the performance. Only then does the agent have the right to claim the payment of the price and reimbursement of expenses.

33. In the NETHERLANDS, payment of the price is due after the service has been performed.

34. In POLAND too, unless the parties have agreed otherwise, payment of the remuneration is due after the service has been rendered by the agent (CC art. 744). However, the agent is entitled to receive some money in advance if a need to incur expenses arises (CC art. 743).

35. In SCOTLAND it is difficult to identify a general rule on the point at which remuneration becomes due. The issue will probably be determined as a matter of interpretation of the contract (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 533). If the contract stipulates that the agent's remuneration is dependent on achieving a result, remuneration is payable if the result is achieved and if it is attributable to the agent's efforts. Otherwise, the matter is likely to be governed by general practice in a particular trade or profession. It is clear, for example, that a solicitor need not necessarily wait until the work to be carried out has been completed before issuing an account to the principal. Interim fees are possible, provided that the principal's consent to these is obtained (Paterson, no. 9.04.9). Although the solicitor may debit such fees from the principal's account, this may be done only with the principal's consent or at least where the principal has been informed (Solicitors (Scotland) Accounts Rules 2001 rule 6(1)(d)). The interim fee must be fair and reasonable in the light of the work carried out to date (Paterson, no. 9.04.4).

36. The SLOVAK CC provides that in the case of a mandate contract, payment of the price is due one day after the mandate was performed or the contractual relationship was terminated and the agent called on the principal to pay; in the case of a contract for procurement of a thing, after procuring the thing without undue delay; and in the case of a contract for arranging the sale of a thing, once the entrusted thing has been sold. The Ccom stipulates that the agent is entitled to the remuneration once the activity stipulated in the mandate has been duly carried out, regardless of whether it has led to the expected result or not (unless the mandate contract provides otherwise) and the commission agent is entitled to remuneration when the duties are fulfilled (Ccom § 587(2)).

37. In SPAIN the price is due from the moment the mandate has been performed. There is no need to wait until the agent has given account to the principal of the activities performed (STS 9 Jul 1991; Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII[1], 917; Valenzuela, in Cuesta-Contratos Mercantiles, I, 2001, p. 288).). This is only an accessory obligation which can be performed later on. Performance does not imply success. The agent has a right to payment even when the performance did not lead to the aim pursued by the principal, unless the agent acted negligently in the performance of the obligations (STS 29 Jan 2001; Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII[2], 453). A proportional payment may be justified even in cases where the agent performs partially, because the principal has a partial benefit (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII[2], 453).

38. In SWEDEN unless otherwise agreed or flowing from accepted practice in a particular line of business, payment is due when the task is fulfilled. If the agent has a duty to give account of the task the principal is not obliged to pay until such account is given.

III. Adjustment of excessive price by court

39. In AUSTRIA a court can, in case of avoidance of the contract (on the grounds of error, lesion, usury, violation of bonos mores), adjust the price (CC § 1336; CC § 879 applies for commercial transactions (Krejci, 37 f.)).

40. According to established BELGIAN case law, a court can, upon request of one of the parties, set aside the principle of pacta sunt servanda and reduce the salary of the agent when the court considers the salary to be excessive in proportion to the performances (see Supreme Court 14 Oct 2002, RW 2003-04, 1297; Supreme Court. 19 Sep 1985, RW 1985-86, 2638; Supreme Court 6 Mar 1980, Pas. 1980, I, 832, concl. CHARLES 1982, 519, note E. DIRIX; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 113-123; Wéry, Le mandat, 216). The court must consider the salary excessive in proportion to the performance. There are no further specific conditions (e.g. that the principal abused the inferior position of the agent (Tilleman, Lastgeving, 114)). In order to decide if the salary is reasonable in proportion to the performances, the court can take into account e.g. the time spent on the execution of the contract for representation, the complexity of the mandate, the liability risk and the expenses incurred by the agent (Tilleman, Lastgeving, 114-116).

41. In BULGARIAN law the general contract law rules are applicable. The price stipulated in the mandate contract can be adjusted by a court when it has become excessive after the conclusion of the contract as a result of unforeseen circumstances. The contract has then become excessively burdensome for one of the parties and to insist on performance according to its terms would not be in conformity with good faith and justice (Ccom art. 307). If these conditions are not fulfilled, the court is not entitled to adjust the stipulated price (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 53).

42. In DENMARK according to section 36 of the Contract Act (the 'general clause' in contract law) the court can adjust the price and other conditions of the contract: 'An agreement may be amended or set aside wholly or partly if it would be unreasonable or contrary to proper conduct to allow it to stand. The same applies to other legal acts. (…) [R]egard will be had to the circumstances prevailing at the formation of the contract, contents of the contract and subsequent events'. This principle is frequently invoked and widely accepted by the court, especially in consumer cases.

43. Technically, ENGLISH courts cannot at the request of a party adjust the price. In fact, if the right to remuneration arises from an express agreement, the courts will not interfere even if the exact amount of remuneration is left to the principal's discretion (Kofi Sunkersette Obu v Strauss (A) & Co Ltd [1951] AC 243) where the contract stipulated that the agent's remuneration was left to the principal's discretion. However, there are some exceptions to this rule of non-interference from the courts. For instance, if the agent performs services which are outside the obligations for which the contract makes express provision, the courts can exceptionally imply that a reasonable remuneration be paid. Moreover, if the contract expressly or impliedly stipulates that a 'reasonable sum' should be paid to the agent, the courts can determine what a 'reasonable sum' should be (Way v Latilla [1937] 3 All ER 759). Furthermore, if the contract remains silent, the courts can imply a term following the normal rules of construction. The courts will only imply a term to that effect in the contract if they are satisfied that the parties intended the agent to be remunerated (Reeve v Reeve (1858) 1 F&F 280). Payment to be made must be reasonable according to the circumstances (usually on a quantum meruit basis; see however Withy Robinson (A firm) v Edwards (1985) 277 Estates Gazette 748; to compare and contrast with London Commercial and Land Co Ltd v Beazer Lands Ltd [1990] CLY paragraph 107). The courts can also infer that payment was intended from a trade usage or a custom of the area of the agent. However, no term can be implied where the term would contradict the express term of a contract (Kofi Sunkersette Obu v Strauss (A) & Co Ltd, [1951] AC 243).

44. Generally, in ESTONIA, agreements on the price for the performance of contractual obligations cannot be controlled or adjusted by the courts. The courts have no jurisdiction to rule on the equilibrium of the mutual rights and obligations of the parties and adjust agreements on the contract price, with the general exception of clausula rebus in LOA § 97.

45. Adjustment of the price in FINLAND is possible in accordance with Contracts Act § 36 under the condition that the mandate contract is unfair or its application would lead to an unfair result. In determining what is unfair, the entire content of the contract is taken into consideration, along with the positions of the parties, the positions prevailing at and after the conclusion of the contract, and other factors.

46. A FRENCH court may adjust the price (Cass. req., 12 Dec 1911, DP 1913, 1, 129), but the principal must demonstrate why the remuneration which was promised is excessive by reference to the service effectively rendered by the agent (Cass. 1re civ., 24 Sep 2002, CCC, 2003 no. 3). Such judicial adjustment is not possible after any discharge has been given to the agent or where the remuneration has been agreed on completion of the mandate.

47. A GERMAN court may, upon request of one of the parties, adjust the price under brokerage contracts according to CC § 655, but only if the brokerage contract called for the solicitation of a contract for services and the price agreed upon by the parties to the brokerage contract is disproportionately high.

48. In GREECE in the case of a brokerage contract if the agreed remuneration of the broker is disproportionately high it may be reduced by the Court to the appropriate level at the request of the debtor (CC art. 707). The debtor can either bring an action for the adjustment of the price or raise an objection to the action of the broker demanding payment of the price (Supreme Court decision no. 206/2004, NoV 2004, 1744). The objection for adjustment of the price to the appropriate level can be raised at every stage of the trial because the rule of CC art. 707 is considered to be a rule concerning ordre public (CA Thessaloniki decision no. 2880/2002, Arm 2003, 1423). Criteria for the proportional measure of the remuneration are the work of the broker, the expenses if these are not separately paid, the method of intermediation, the time invested and the benefit that the principal has gained (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis III, Art. 707 GREEK CC nr. 1; CA Athens decision no. 3790/1985, EllDni 1985, 943; CFI Athens decision no. 16004/1983, EllDni 1984, 1603).

49. In general in HUNGARY, the price determined by the parties cannot be adjusted by a court. Nevertheless, according to CC art. 201(2), '[i]f at the time of the conclusion of the contract the difference between the value of a service and the consideration due, without either party having the intention of bestowing a gift, is grossly unfair the injured party shall be allowed to contest the contract'. CC art. 241 provides that '[t]he court may amend a contract when it is injurious to any substantial rightful interest of one of the parties in consequence of a circumstance arising in the long-term relationship of the parties following the conclusion of the contract'.

50. In IRELAND there is no general provision for an adjustment of the price. There is a specific provision for the adjustment (or taxation) of solicitors' fees however.

51. In general, in ITALY, the determination of the price is subject to party autonomy. However, upon request of the parties, a judge may be called to fix the price in the absence of any specific agreement of the parties. CC art. 1709 provides a hierarchical list of criteria to follow in the determination of the price the agent is entitled to. Unless otherwise agreed by the parties, the price can be determined by reference to the professional fees if the agent acts as a professional, or by reference to usages. In the absence of these criteria, the price can be determined by a judge on the basis of an equitable judgment, having regard to the nature, the quantity and the quality of the activity executed by the agent. If the evidence produced by the professional is incomplete or insufficient as to the amount and lacking any tariffs or usages, the judge determines the compensation on the basis of the kind of activity performed and of the profits thereby achieved by the principal (CC arts. 1709 and 2225; Supreme Court 18 Sep 1995, no. 9829, Arch. civ., 1996, 477).

52. In the NETHERLANDS a payment for the agent that is extremely high or low is not against the law (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 17).

53. In POLAND in the case of an extraordinary change of circumstances, the price may be adjusted by the court (CC art. 357). This is a general provision that may be applied to all contracts; there are no specific provisions on adjustment of the remuneration under a mandate contract.

54. There is no general power vested in a SCOTTISH court to adjust an agent's contractually agreed remuneration. Where the contract is silent, a court can be called upon to assess a reasonable fee or a fee which would be usual in a particular trade or profession (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 109). In the specific case of solicitors, courts are empowered to adjust the fee charged. This process, known as 'taxation,' involves the assessment of a reasonable fee based on the circumstances of the case by an independent auditor attached to the court (Begg, 163-177; Paterson & Ritchie, no. 185, footnote 28). The process can be instigated by either solicitor or client. The auditor has considerable discretion and may increase the account, although this will happen only rarely (Begg, 175; Reeve v Dykes 7 S 732). The court will not normally interfere with the auditor's taxation except on questions of principle (Begg, 176).

55. In SLOVAKIA it is not possible to have an excessive price adjusted by a court. If the price was so excessive that it constituted a serious breach of bona mores, there could be the exceptional possibility to declare the contract void.

56. In SPAIN there is no rule on this point and, in general, no adjustment can be made to the remuneration due under an the agency contract. Exceptions exist only in regulated professions, such as that of a barrister.

57. In SWEDEN according to AvtL (Contract Act) § 36 a court can adjust the price if it is found to be unreasonably high considering the circumstances at the time of or occurring after the formation of the contract or due to other circumstances. The rule is accepted by the courts in consumer relations in particular. In business-to-business relations the courts have adopted a restrictive approach.

IV. Contingency fee allowed?

58. In AUSTRIA, the parties can agree to a price calculated on a 'no result, no pay' basis (Strasser, § 1004 Rz 9; Krejci, § 879 Rz 209; Straube (-Griss), HGB I[3], § 383, no. 13; Schütz, 407 HGB Rz 45).

59. In BELGIUM, the parties can agree on a 'no result, no pay' price (Paulus und Boes, Lastgeving, 115; RPDB, 782; Wéry, Le mandat, 213). Only lawyers are forbidden to calculate on this basis.

60. In BULGARIA payment on a "no result, no pay" basis is generally allowed, with an exception for advocates' remuneration in criminal cases (Regulation of Minimum Amounts of the Advocates' Fees, art. 17).

61. The principle of 'no result, no pay' is valid according to DANISH law.

62. In ENGLISH law, the parties can agree to a 'no result, no pay' clause. In fact, this is the norm for estate agents since a normal estate agency contract is considered to be unilateral in nature (Luxor v Cooper [1941] AC 108, per Lord Russell of Killowen, no. 124). This means that, usually, the mandated task is not completed until a binding contract for the sale of a property has been concluded.

63. In ESTONIA, the parties can agree to a price calculated on a 'no result, no pay' basis

64. In FINLAND, in general the parties can agree to a price calculated on a 'no result, no pay' basis. Estate agents are only entitled to remuneration if the prospective contract is concluded, unless otherwise agreed (REstateAA § 20).

65. In FRANCE there is complete freedom of contract and the parties can agree on payment on a 'no result, no pay' basis. This is, in fact, the solution imposed on estate agents who are not entitled to any remuneration if the contract envisaged has not been concluded.

66. There is no rule to the contrary in GERMAN law. A specific exception applies to legal services: according to § 49b(2) of the Federal Act on the Regulation of Attorneys it is illegal to agree on a 'contingency fee'.

67. In the case of intermediation a payment on a no result, no pay basis is regulated in GREEK CC arts. 703 and 704. According to CC art. 703(1), '[a] person who has promised remuneration to somebody for the latter's intervention or for the indication by him of an occasion for the conclusion of a contract shall only be bound to pay the remuneration if the contract was concluded as a result of such intervention or indication. If an agreement containing a promise of contract was concluded but the final contract has been frustrated only one half of the remuneration is due.' From that rule it is implied that causality must be proved between the procurement or indication and the conclusion of the contract (Supreme Court decision no. 701/1995, EEN 1996, 601; CA Pireos decision nr. 855/1993, EllDni 1994, 1708). According to CC art. 704, '[i]n case of a contract subject to a suspensive condition the remuneration of the broker shall be paid if the condition has been fulfilled. In case of a contract concluded subject to a resolutive condition the remuneration shall be payable upon the conclusion of the contract.'

68. In HUNGARIAN law parties are free to agree to a price calculated on a 'no result, no pay' basis. Special rules are established for the commission agency where the agent concludes a contract in the agent's own name but for the account of the principal: according to CC art. 511(1), '[t]he commission agent shall be entitled to receive a commission only if the sales contract has been performed'.

69. In IRELAND in line with the principle of freedom of contract, parties are free to agree as they wish and therefore a price can be calculated on a 'no result, no pay' basis. In some professions, there may be regulatory rules on pricing. For example, in contentious work, solicitors cannot set their fee based on a percentage of damages awarded, though they can work on a 'no foal, no fee' basis.

70. In ITALY, in general terms the issue of payment of a price is subject to party autonomy. However, in some cases special rules apply in favour of the agents (e.g. commercial agents and attorneys at law).

71. In the NETHERLANDS according to the CC art. 7:426 the "no result, no pay" rule applies to mediation contracts (cf Graan Management B.V./PeHa Holding c.s. (NJ 2003, 518)). This implies that if the realisation of the contract fails, the commissionee is not entitled to payment. However, contracting parties may deviate from this basis. Although this reasoning applies to mediation contracts it seems also important to mandate contracts since the payment of the agent in mandate contracts is often related to the realisation of the transaction that is subject to the mandate. The agent is not entitled to remuneration if the transaction is not accomplished. The remuneration is usually related to the transaction's 'price' (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 17).

72. In POLAND the parties may agree on a "no result, no pay" clause on the basis of freedom of contract. Such clauses are forbidden in certain codified ethical rules of legal professions, but those sets of rules are not law.

73. In SCOTLAND it is common for principal/agent contracts to provide that agents are only entitled to remuneration where they achieve a specific result (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 533). Many estate agents' contracts take this form. Solicitors too commonly enter into so-called 'no result, no pay' agreements. Although this principle tends to be expressed in the context of the solicitor's litigation work, it is clear that it is not limited to litigation (Paterson & Ritchie, no. 9.05.2).

74. In SLOVAKIA for mandate contracts, "no result, no pay" is allowed (CC and Ccom). In the contract for arrangement of the sale of a thing, this is the essential characteristic of the contract type.

75. In SPANISH Law, the parties can agree on a 'no result, no pay' price (art. 272 Ccom and art. 19 Agency Law).

76. Payment on this basis is also allowed according to SWEDISH law.

V. Payment if principal concluded prospective contract personally

77. In AUSTRIA, if the principal concludes the prospective contract personally, the agent is entitled to a proportional part of the price, to reimbursement of expenses incurred and to damages for losses suffered.

78. A distinction has to be made in BELGIAN law. If the only purpose of the clause of irrevocability is to guarantee exclusivity (and remuneration) to the agent, then the principal is entitled to conclude the prospective contract personally and will have to indemnify the agent by paying the price on which they agreed. If the clause of irrevocability is on the contrary a modality to deprive the principal of the right to conclude the prospective contract personally, then the principal must leave the matter entirely to the agent (Foriers, 90; Wagemans, 193).

79. In BULGARIA in legal doctrine the conclusion of the prospective contract by the principal is interpreted as a revocation of the mandate (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 176). In such a case, the agent is entitled to payment of the remuneration agreed upon in the contract (LOA art. 288(1)).

80. A DANISH contract for representation does not deprive the principal of the right to conclude the prospective contract personally. This will apply whether the agent is entitled to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal. The agent is entitled to the price whether the agent or the principal concludes the prospective contract. According to the Danish Act on Estate Agents the parties can agree to a clause according to which the agent is entitled to the price even if the principal concludes directly the contract with a third party presented by the agent.

81. In ENGLAND when an estate agent is granted an exclusivity by being appointed 'sole agent', if the principal then appoints another agent who earns the commission that the first agent should have earned, then the sole agent is entitled to damages (Milsom v Bechstein (1898) 14 TLR 159). When the agent is appointed as an 'exclusive agent' or the agency is described as a 'sole selling agency' (Brodie Marshall & Co (Hotel Division) v Sharer [1988] 1 EGLR 21), then the principal is also prevented from selling the property as the irrevocability then is in the interest of the agent. Should the principal nevertheless do so, the principal would be liable for commission to the agent (Snelgrove v Ellringham Colliery Co (1881) 45 JP 408).

82. In FINLAND in general the agent is not entitled to a price for prospective contracts concluded by the principal, unless otherwise agreed. According to ACAgentsS § 10 the agent is entitled to a commission where the transaction has been concluded as a result of the agent's action as well as where the agent has been entrusted with a specific geographical area or group of clients and the transaction has been concluded with a party belonging to that area or group of clients.

83. In GREECE the consequence of an exclusivity clause is that in case of breach of that contractual obligation the principal is liable for damages for any loss suffered by the exclusive broker due to violation of the clause of exclusivity (CFI Athens decision no. 4029/1982, EllDni 1984, 848).

84. In general, according to HUNGARIAN CC art. 478(2), '[t]he agent shall be entitled to demand remuneration even if his actions brought no results.' For this reason, the price is due to the agent regardless of who concluded the prospective contract effectively.

85. In IRELAND in Murphy, Buckley & Keogh Ltd v Pye (Ire) Ltd [1971] IR 57, the seller of a factory appointed auctioneers as 'sole agents' in the sale. However, the seller arranged a sale himself without telling the auctioneers. The auctioneers claimed a commission but lost in the High Court. It was held first, that the sole agents had not effected a sale and hence were not entitled to commission. Secondly, it was held that although the auctioneers were the sole agents this did not prevent the seller from effecting a sale himself, merely from appointing any other agents. Hence, where an agent is appointed 'sole agent' to effect a contract, the principal commits a breach if a second agent is appointed; if the second agent then concludes a contract, the first agent would be entitled to damages, equal to the amount of lost commission for breach of that term (see e.g. Bentall, Horsley and Baldry v. Vicary [1931] 1 KB 253). Moreover, it has been held that where an agent is appointed with 'the sole right to sell', the principal is in breach of contract if the principal sells in person (Brodie Marshall & Co v Sharer [1988] 19 EG 129).

86. The ITALIAN CC art. 1748(2), governing commercial agency, states that '[t]he commission is due also for the transactions entered into by the principal with third parties that the agent had previously acquired as principals for transactions of the same kind or pertaining to the area or category or group of principals reserved to the agent, unless otherwise agreed'. Accordingly, even if the contract grants an exclusive right to the agent, the principal keeps the right to conclude the affairs personally in the relevant geographical area; however the agent keeps the right to receive the full price agreed under the contract without any reduction. See Supreme Court 22 Aug 2001, no. 11197, Contratti, 2001, 1106, with comments by Venezia.

87. In the NETHERLANDS it seems that in the situation where the mandate contract ends because the principal has concluded the prospective contract personally, CC art. 7:411(2) applies. According to this article, the agent is entitled to full payment taking into consideration the specific circumstances. However, more specific rules on this topic have not been established.

88. The POLISH Civil Code contains no provisions regulating this issue.

89. In SCOTLAND where the principal has granted 'exclusive rights' to the agent, if the principal subsequently concludes a contract with a third party directly, this could constitute a breach of the principal/agent contract. The case of the procuratory in rem suam also requires special consideration in this context, given the potential for the principal to conclude such a contract on terms which are inconsistent with the agent's interests. Because very little authority on the procuratory in rem suam exists, it is not possible to provide a definitive answer to this question. It is suggested, however, that the principal would not be entitled to conclude such a contract without first obtaining the agent's consent.

90. In SLOVAKIA agents are entitled to their remuneration if they have duly performed their activities. Conclusion of the prospective contract by the principal may not be a ground for refusing to pay the price or a proportional part of it. More precise regulation is in Ccom §§ 652-672 with regard to the Commercial Representation Contract.

91. This is regarded in SPAIN as an implicit revocation by the principal. As a consequence, the contractual relationship terminates from the moment the agent is informed. The effects of the revocation as to the right of payment are not regulated in the civil code, most likely because the typical situation when the civil code was written regarded gratuitous contracts. However, the CC art. 1733 indicates that the principal may revoke the contract at any time. The mandate needs to be performed for the right to payment to arise (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII^2, 453). If the principal concludes the contract personally then the principal is not obliged to pay the remuneration but will be obliged to pay the expenses (CC art. 1728), the damages suffered by the agent as a result of the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract (CC art. 1729) and the damages suffered by the agent as a result of the unilateral termination. It seems that parties must have agreed upon the existence of a right of payment to continue even though the contractual relationship has otherwise terminated.

92. In SWEDEN the agent is entitled to compensation for the work and effort put into the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract. This is regardless of whether it is the principal or the agent who concludes the prospective contract. A real estate agent is according to FmL (Estate Agents Act) § 21 only entitled to compensation if the conclusion of the contract is due to the efforts of the real estate agent. A real estate agent who has been appointed as an exclusive agent is entitled to compensation even if the contract was concluded without the agent's efforts.

VI. Price in case prospective contract concluded after termination of mandate relationship

93. Special provisions exist only regarding the principal-merchant and the commercial agent (BULGARIAN Ccom art. 40). The commercial agent is entitled to a compensation upon termination of the contract when the principal continues to enjoy benefits from the clientele established by the agent, unless: (a) during one year after the end of the contract the agent does not claim for such compensation; (b) the termination is on account of the agent's fault; (c) the agent has substituted another person as the agent in the contractual relationship (Ccom art. 40(1),(3)). The compensation is to be equal to the agent's annual remuneration, estimated on the ground of average remuneration for the entire duration of the contract with the principal, but no longer than 5 years (Ccom art. 40(2)).

94. According to the DANISH Act on Estate Agents the parties can agree to a clause according to which the agent is entitled to the price even if the principal concludes directly the contract with a third party presented by the agent.

95. In ENGLAND unless the contract expressly provides for such a possibility, no commission is payable after termination (Nayler v Yearsley (1860) 2 F&F 41). However, more recently, it seems that in case of repeat orders, commission may be payable after termination if, on construction of the contract, it is the intention of the parties (Sellers v London Counties Newspapers [1951 1 KB 784).

96. In ESTONIA if the contract is concluded after termination of the mandate relationship, the agent is not entitled to a price except in case of the brokerage agreement, provided that the agent (the broker) can show that the conclusion of the contract was attributable to the information and services rendered by the broker (LOA § 661(3)). In case of other agreements under which representation or mediation of an agreement is owed a general rule applies under which the agent is entitled to a price proportionate to the services rendered, if the relationship was terminated prematurely and the termination is attributable to the principal (LOA § 629(1)). In cases where the termination is attributable to the agent, the agent is entitled to a proportionate price only if the services rendered prior to termination are of interest to the principal (LOA § 629(3)). This would mainly be the case if the principal is able, based on the agent's actions, to conclude the intended contract personally after termination of the mandate relationship.

97. In FINLAND, the agent is generally entitled to the agreed fee if the termination is not based on a non-performance of the agent. If a concluded prospective contract or some other action is a prerequisite for the fee, the agent is usually not entitled to remuneration if such contract or other action has not been concluded or taken at the time of termination. The agent is entitled to a compensation for expenses.

98. In FRANCE where the contract is not concluded due to the attitude of the principal and where the agent has sufficiently performed the contractual obligations, the agent may be entitled to payment of the price. Thus, an estate agent will be entitled to remuneration if the contract has been entered into between the principal and a third party introduced by the agent (Cass. 1ère civ., 17 Nov 1993, Bull. civ. I no. 323).

99. Under brokerage contracts in GERMAN law (CC § 652(1)), the termination of the contractual relationship between principal and broker does not affect the broker's right to demand payment of a price if the prospective contract with a third party is later concluded: The broker is entitled to a price when the contract between principal and third party was concluded due to the services that were rendered by the broker while the brokerage contract was still in force, and the fact that the prospective contract was only concluded after termination of the brokerage contract is of no relevance (BGH, NJW 1966, 2008; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 652 no. 47).

100. In HUNGARY, in general, the salary of the agent does not depend on the conclusion of the contract because according to CC art. 478(2), '[t]he agent shall be entitled to demand remuneration even if his actions brought no results.'

101. In IRELAND remuneration may be payable after termination of the agency, depending on the terms of the agreement.

102. In POLAND there are no specific rules on this matter.

103. In SCOTLAND as a general rule, and in the absence of contractual agreement to the contrary, the right to commission normally falls on termination of the agency (Gardner v Findlay (1882) 30 SLR 248). However, an agent is entitled to commission where a contract is concluded which is attributable to the agent's efforts (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 112; Walker, Donald & Company v Birrell, Stenhouse & Co (1883) 11 R 369). Thus, the agent may retain an entitlement to commission even where, at the moment of conclusion of the contract between principal and third party, the agent is no longer involved.

104. In SLOVAKIA where the principal concludes the contract directly, the agent is entitled to the price only if the conclusion of the contract is the result of the agent's effort (see Ccom § 651 for the Brokerage Contract; Ccom § 671 for the Commercial Representation Contract).

105. In SPAIN, with some adjustment, an analogical application of the commercial agency rules (arts. 12 and 13 Agency Law) may be proposed.

106. In SWEDEN the agent is entitled to compensation for the work and effort put into the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract. According to KommL § 27 and HaL § 10 a commissionaire or a trade agent has a right to compensation (efterprovision) even if the prospective contract was concluded after termination of the mandate relationship. This is the case when the prospective contract was concluded due to the efforts of the commissionaire or trade agent.

IV.D.–2:103: Expenses incurred by agent

(1) When the agent is entitled to a price, the price is presumed to include the reimbursement of the expenses the agent has incurred in the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract.

(2) When the agent is not entitled to a price or when the parties have agreed that the expenses will be paid separately, the principal must reimburse the agent for the expenses the agent has incurred in the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract, when and in so far as the agent acted reasonably when incurring the expenses.

(3) The agent is entitled to reimbursement of expenses under paragraph (2) as from the time when the expenses are incurred and the agent has given account of the expenses.

(4) If the mandate relationship has terminated and the result on which the agent's remuneration is dependent is not achieved, the agent is entitled to reimbursement of reasonable expenses the agent has incurred in the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract. Paragraph (3) applies accordingly.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

In the traditional view of a mandate relationship as a gratuitous service, it is logical that expenses should be reimbursed. However, nowadays, mandate relationships are typically remunerated contracts. The present Article regulates the reimbursement by the principal of the expenses incurred by the agent in the performance of the obligations under remunerated mandate contracts. Paragraph (1) indicates that, as a general rule, the price agreed by the parties in mandate contracts includes the expenses that the agent has to incur in the performance of the mandate. In cases where the parties agree that the expenses are to be paid separately or where there is no price to be paid, paragraph (2) establishes that the principal has to pay only the reasonable expenses, i.e. in so far as the agent acted reasonably when incurring the expenses.

B. Expenses included in the agreed price

Typically, the parties make explicit contractual arrangements as to the reimbursement of the expenses. This provision regulates the situation where the contract is for a price and the parties remain silent about the matter of expenses. Paragraph (1) states that the principal – whether a consumer or a business – may reasonably rely on the price encompassing both the profit the agent seeks to gain from performing the contractual obligations and all the costs the agent will incur in carrying out the mandate.

If the default rule did not consider the expenses included in the price, the agent would have no incentive to perform as efficiently as possible, as higher expenses would automatically have to be reimbursed by the principal. If the agent wishes to have the expenses reimbursed separately, this ought to be made clear to the principal by a provision in the contract. The chosen default rule therefore also promotes communication between the parties.

C. Reasonable expenses only

If the expenses are not included in the price, i.e. when on the basis of an express contractual agreement the expenses are to be paid separately or when the mandate is gratuitous, the principal is required to reimburse the agent for the expenses incurred, but only if the agent acted reasonably when incurring the expenses (paragraph (2)) .

D. When expenses payable

If and in so far as the agent is entitled to reimbursement of the expenses, the reimbursement only becomes due when the agent has given account of the performance of the mandate, as paragraph (3) of the Article expresses. The reasoning behind this is that the principal need only reimburse the agent for the expenses that were incurred reasonably, and the principal can only evaluate the reasonableness when the agent has provided the means of doing so. The present rule therefore has the advantage that the principal is given an effective instrument to obtain sufficient information in order to evaluate the reasonableness of the expenses incurred.

E. Expenses still due when no entitlement to price because result not achieved

Where the mandate relationship is terminated before the result is achieved on which payment of remuneration is dependent (typically the conclusion of the prospective contract), the agent is left without payment, unless the parties had agreed upon payment for services rendered. In this respect, the agent is required to reach the envisaged result (typically the conclusion of the prospective contract) or lose the right to payment. This should, however, not mean that the agent then also has to bear the expenses incurred in attempting to carry out the mandate. For that reason, paragraph (4) explicitly provides that the agent is entitled to recovery of the expenses. This provision also prevents an a contrario reasoning on the basis of paragraph (1) of the Article.

NOTES

I. Expenses presumed to be included in price

1. In AUSTRIA in the case where the (commercial) agent is entitled to a price and the contract keeps silent about the reimbursement of expenses, the agent may claim both a price and a reimbursement of the expenses made (CC § 1014 Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I³, no. 3; Straube (-Griss) HGB I³, § 396, no. 1, 9-14; Straube (-Schütz) HGB I³, § 409, no. 6).
2. In BELGIUM because the obligation to pay a salary and the obligation to repay the expenses cover different items, in case of silence of the contract about the reimbursement of expenses, the agent is nevertheless entitled to both a price and the reimbursement of expenses.
3. In BULGARIA as a general rule, the mandate is a gratuitous contract. A clear distinction is made between the obligation of the principal to pay the remuneration (if stipulated) (LOA art. 286) and his obligation to reimburse the expenses incurred as a result of performance of the mandate (LOA art. 285). For special non-gratuitous mandate contracts, there is no presumption that the expenses are included in the price and explicit provisions regulate the reimbursement of costs apart from payment of the remuneration (e.g. Ccom art. 39 for the commercial agent, Ccom art. 356(2) for the commission contract and Ccom art. 361(2) for the forwarding contract).
4. In DENMARK normally the price agreed upon between the principal and the agent will be presumed to cover the expenses. In other words, the agent is not entitled to claim extra remuneration for the expenses incurred in performing the obligations under the contract.

5. In ENGLISH law, agents have a right, in addition to the right to be remunerated for their services, to claim reimbursement of expenses incurred in performing the obligations under the contract. However, many professional agents such as auctioneers and estate agents are not usually entitled to expenses in addition to remuneration (Murdoch, 14148, as cited by Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[18], no. 7.061).

6. For non-gratuitous mandate contracts the ESTONIAN LOA § 628(2) stipulates the presumption that the price covers the agent's expenses.

7. In FINLAND it depends on the circumstances (e.g. nature of the contract, parties, the area of business practice etc.) whether the expenses are included in the price or not. In most cases typical expenses are considered to be included in the price. According to Commercial Agents and Salesmen Act art. 18, the commercial agent is entitled to a special compensation for costs incurred by measures necessary for the proper execution of the mandate contract. No compensation shall, however, be payable if the costs are incurred as the result of the customary activities of the commercial agent. The regulation in Commercial Agents and Salesmen Act may, in this respect, have some wider importance through analogies.

8. FRENCH law distinguishes clearly between remuneration and reimbursement, which is subject to distinct rules. Where the contract is silent, the provision for remuneration does not include the reimbursement of expenses incurred, which are always due (CC art. 1999). For some cases there are specific rules; the remuneration of a real estate agent always includes the expenses incurred in order to perform the task.

9. As the GERMAN CC § 675(1) also makes reference to CC § 670, this would speak for the expenses not to be covered by the price (to which the agent is always entitled within the sphere of CC § 675(1)). However, some authors point out that CC § 670 should not be applied when the agent can claim a price (which should be considered to cover expenses), and accordingly argue that – if in doubt – expenses should be construed to be covered by the price under any remunerated contract (Heermann, in: Münchener Kommentar zum BGB[4], § 675 no. 20; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 675 no. 8). Under a brokerage contract, the situation is explicitly regulated by CC § 652(2) stipulating that the broker cannot demand reimbursement of expenses unless otherwise agreed.

10. The obligation of reimbursement of expenses is explicitly regulated in the GREEK CC art. 722.

11. In the case where the agent is entitled to a price and the contract is silent about the reimbursement of expenses, the HUNGARIAN CC art 479(1) applies according to which '[c]osts that arise in connection with the handling of a matter shall be borne by the principal. The agent shall not be obliged to advance any costs.' Contrary to the general rules of agency, in the case of commission agency, '[t]he commission shall include the expenses usually involved with consignment, but it shall not include expenses related to carriage' (CC art. 511(2)). Nevertheless, '[t]he commission agent shall be entitled to demand reimbursement for those of his necessary and useful expenses that are not included in the commission; however, he shall be entitled to demand those substantiated expenses otherwise included in the commission only if the sales contract has not been performed due to reasons within the sphere of interest of the principal' (CC art. 511(3)).

12. In IRELAND an agent's claim to (i) remuneration and (ii) an indemnity for expenses are treated as separate rights at common law. Therefore, an agent may be entitled to claim both remuneration and an indemnity, separately and cumulatively. However, a contract can provide otherwise. So, for example, it could be agreed that an auctioneer's advertising costs would be included in any commission earned.

13. In ITALY the price the agent is entitled to has nothing to do with the reimbursement of expenses. Unless otherwise specified in the contract, any and all reimbursements are due in addition to the price agreed by the agent and the principal.

14. In the NETHERLANDS the reimbursement of expenses of the agent is governed by CC art. 7:406. According to this article, the principal is liable to compensate the agent for the expenses that are related to the performance of the service, unless these expenses are included in the agent's remuneration (CC art. 7:406(1)). In professional mandate contracts, the principal for the most part will not have to compensate for these expenses because they are included in the agent's remuneration. Often the reimbursement of expenses occurs in case of gratuitous mandate contracts. In that case, the expenses to be reimbursed have to be fair. These expenses do not include only out of pocket expenses. The agent may also, for example, claim expenses for the use of his or her own car (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 17).

15. In POLAND unless the parties have agreed otherwise, the agent has the right to reimbursement of expenses, regardless of whether the service is remunerated or not. If the parties have not agreed otherwise, the expenses are not included in the price.

16. In SCOTLAND this matter is likely to be governed by custom or practice in the particular commercial context. There appears to be no general rule. In the case of a solicitor, where the contract is silent, there is no presumption that the expenses are included in the price. In other words, the solicitor is entitled to claim both the price and reimbursement of expenses.

17. In SLOVAKIA in the case of a mandate contract, the agent may claim both a price and reimbursement of expenses incurred, whereas in the case of a contract for procurement of a thing, contract for arranging the sale of a thing and commission agent contract, it is presumed that the expenses are included in the remuneration (CC § 728, Ccom § 572). The principal is bound to reimburse the agent for all expenses that the agent necessarily and purposefully incurred when performing the obligation, unless it follows from the nature of the expenses that they are included in the agent's remuneration (Ccom § 572).

18. In SPAIN the obligation to pay a price or fee and the obligation to reimburse the expenses cover different issues. Therefore in case of silence of the contract about the reimbursement of expenses, the agent is nevertheless entitled to both a price and the reimbursement of expenses (CC art. 1728). The matter is regulated expressly for the commercial commission, arts. 277 and Ccom 278.

19. In SWEDEN normally the price is presumed to cover the expenses (Hesser, 58 and Hellner, 211). Sometimes, however, the agent can claim reimbursement of expenses in addition to the price (HB 18:5 and Tiberg and Dotevall, Mellanmansrätt[9], 34). A distinction could be made between expenses of a common nature which are to be considered to be included in the price and unforeseen expenses which are not included (Bengtsson, Särskilda avtalstyper I[2], 170). If the contract is silent, the question of reimbursement of expenses could be determined by reference to accepted practice, when applicable, in a particular line of business or the circumstances of the particular case.

II. Right to reimbursement of expenses if no price or not included in price

20. In this situation, in AUSTRIA, the agent is entitled to reimbursement of reasonable (necessary and useful) expenses incurred in performance of the obligations under the contract (CC § 1014).

21. According to the BELGIAN CC art. 1999, the agent is entitled to reimbursement of the expenses incurred in performance of the mandate (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V[2], 423-431; Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux, 625-626; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 123-124; Wéry, Le mandat, 203 et seq.). CC art. 1999 states furthermore that if the agent is not in breach, the principal cannot refuse to reimburse the expenses, even if the mandate failed. Neither can the principal reduce the amount of the expenses under the pretext that they could have been lower. As a rule, the principal therefore cannot escape the (integral) reimbursement of the expenses by stating that the mandate could have been accomplished in a cheaper way.

22. In BULGARIA even when the remuneration has not been stipulated in a general mandate contract, the principal is obliged, upon a request from the agent, to reimburse the expenses incurred in the course of performance of the contract together with interest (LOA art. 285). Unless otherwise agreed upon in the contract, the commercial agent is entitled to reimbursement of usual costs incurred in the course of the activity (Ccom art. 39). The commissioner (Ccom art. 356) and forwarder (Ccom art. 361(2), referring to Ccom art. 356(2)) are entitled to reimbursement of expenses for the performance of the obligations under the contract.

23. In DENMARK according to general acknowledged custom, the agent is entitled to reimbursement of the ordinary expenses incurred in performance of the contractual obligations. Normally the claim for reimbursement will be accepted by the court only when the agent has acted reasonably in the effort to perform the obligations. A principal who wishes to avoid paying the expenses has the burden of proving that the agent did not act reasonably.

24. In ENGLISH law, the agent has, generally, a right to be reimbursed for all expenses incurred in the execution of the task. In addition, the agent has a right to claim indemnity which covers all liabilities incurred or payments made by the agent whilst performing the agency duties. The agent's right to indemnity therefore covers all payments which the principal and the agent are liable to make (e.g. Adams v. Morgan & Co. Ltd. [1924] 1 KB 751). The right of the agent to claim expenses or indemnity varies depending on whether the agency is contractual or not (see generally Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[18], nos. 7-058 and 7.059). When the agency is contractual, unless expressly excluded in the contract, a term – express or implied – will define the conditions of reimbursement of expenses of the agent. The agent cannot claim (a) expenses incurred for an unauthorised transaction which has not been ratified by the principal; (b) expenses incurred when performing the principal's illegal instructions providing that the agent knows that it is illegal or where the transaction itself is unlawful (e.g. Re Parker (1882) 21 Ch D 408, Ex p Mather (1797) 3 Ves 373, Smith v. Lindo (1858) 5 CBNS 587, Adamson v. Jarvis (1827) 4 Bing 66, 130 ER 693); (c) expenses incurred in relation to wagering transactions (Gaming Act 1892, s 1); or (d) expenses incurred by being negligent, insolvent, by acting in breach of duty or by defaulting (e.g. Lage v. Siemens Bros & Co Ltd (1932) 42 Ll Rep 252). When the agency is not contractual, the claim of the agent does not cover the full indemnity since it is restitutionary in nature and consequently narrower than for contractual agencies. In such cases, the agent's claim is restricted to the reimbursement of payments for which the principal has the ultimate liability, which were made by the agent under compulsion of law and from which the principal obtains a benefit by the discharge of a liability (Brook´s Wharf & Bull Wharf Ltd. v. Goodman Bros [1937] 1 KB 534), Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[18], no. 7.059.

25. For the (general) contract for services under ESTONIAN law, the service provider (in this case, the agent) is entitled to reimbursement for 'reasonable' expenses unless such expenses are covered by the price (LOA § 628(2)). Where the contract is gratuitous, reimbursement of expenses can therefore always be claimed. For non-gratuitous contracts LOA § 628(2) stipulates the presumption that the price covers the expenses which are usually incurred by performance of such contract and the expenses which the service provider would have incurred even without entering into the contract. Specific rules apply for the contract of agency: an agent may demand reimbursement of reasonable expenses if so agreed upon or if this is usual under the circumstances, regardless of whether the agent has the right to receive an agency fee (§ 684 LOA).

26. In FINLAND the agent is, unless otherwise agreed, entitled to a compensation for reasonable expenses (Ccom chapter 18 art. 5). The burden of proof usually lies on the agent.

27. The agent is entitled to reimbursement of expenses under FRENCH law (CC art. 1999).

28. In GERMANY where the mandate contract is gratuitous, the agent is entitled to reimbursement of the expenses incurred in performance of the contractual obligations (CC § 670).

29. In GREECE the right of the agent to reimbursement of the expenses incurred in performance of the contractual obligations depends on the internal relationship based on the contract of mandate. According to CC art. 722 a principal is bound to reimburse the agent for everything the latter has spent to achieve an orderly performance of the mandate. The parties can deviate from that rule and agree to a restriction or enlargement of the required expenses (Kapodistrias, Art. 722 GREEK CC nr. 23; CFI Chalkida decision no. 563/2002, NoV 2003, 1271).

30. In a case of agency, according to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 479(1), '[c]osts that arise in connection with the handling of a matter shall be borne by the principal. The agent shall not be obliged to advance any costs'. Contrary to the general rules of agency, in the case of commission agency, '[t]he commission shall include the expenses usually involved with consignment, but it shall not include expenses related to carriage' (CC art. 511(2)). Nevertheless, '[t]he commission agent shall be entitled to demand reimbursement for those of his necessary and useful expenses that are not included in the commission; however, he shall be entitled to demand those of his substantiated expenses otherwise included in the commission only if the sales contract has not been performed due to reasons within the commission agent's control' (CC art. 511(3)).

31. In IRELAND at common law, an agent is entitled to be indemnified against any reasonable expenses and liabilities, necessarily incurred on behalf of the principal in performance of the agency duties when acting within the scope of the actual authority, or, if actions are later ratified, or if the agency is one of necessity (see Notes under IV.D.–3:201 (Acting beyond mandate). Where the agent's actions are unauthorised, no right to indemnity arises. Where the agency is contractual the right to indemnity will be an implied term of the contract; where the agency is gratuitous the right will be restitutionary. The right to indemnity does not cover any expenses or liabilities incurred due to the agent's own fault, nor any expenses or liabilities with regard to acts that the agent knew to be unlawful or illegal (Re Parker [1882] 21 Ch D 408). The right to indemnity may also cover payments made by an agent even where there was no legal obligation to pay, where there is strong moral and professional pressure to pay (Rhodes v Fielder, Jones and Harrison [1919] 89 LJKB 15).

32. The agent is entitled under ITALIAN law to reimbursement of expenses incurred in performance of the contractual obligations (CC art. 1720). The principal has to reimburse any advances on the expenses made by the agent as well as the interest accrued thereupon since the day of payment (e.g. an advance on the final price owed by the principal as purchaser to the third party).

33. In POLAND the principal is obliged to reimburse all expenses incurred by the agent (as long as they are "reasonable") regardless of whether the service is remunerated, and the expenses are presumed not to be included in the remuneration (CC art. 742).

34. In SCOTLAND the agent is entitled to be reimbursed expenses so far as these are properly incurred (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 534; Annan v Marshall (1887) 25 SLR 94). It is an implied term of the contract entered into between a solicitor and principal that authorised, or impliedly authorised, outlays incurred in pursuing the principal's case will be reimbursed (Paterson & Ritchie, no. 4.04; Begg, 120-1).

35. In SLOVAKIA unless otherwise agreed, the principal must provide to the agent, at the latter's request, the appropriate funds for the performance of the mandate in advance and reimburse the agent subsequently for all necessary and expedient expenses incurred in performing the mandate, even if the result was not attained. After performance of the mandate, the agent must present an account of costs or expenditure to the principal (CC § 728 and Ccom).

36. Under SPANISH law the agent is entitled to reimbursement of expenses (CC arts. 1728, 1729). Moreover the principal is obliged to advance a payment to the agent if the agent asks for this in order to be able to perform the mandate contract. If the principal does not make this advance payment, then the principal will be obliged to reimburse the agent for the costs incurred by the latter to perform the contractual obligations (CC art. 1728). The principal does not have to pay the costs if the agent is liable for the non-successful performance of the contract.

III. Reasonable expenses only

37. In AUSTRIA the agent has to act reasonably when incurring expenses and bears the burden of proving this (OGH SZ 7/29; 11/239; 29/40; OGH EvBl 1963/309). The commercial regulations provide similar rules if there is an express promise (Ccom § 396(2) for commission agents, Ccom § 440 for forwarders, HVertrG § 13 for special expenses of commercial agents).

38. In BELGIUM if expenses were incurred because of a fault of the agent (e.g. superfluous, exaggerated or ill-timed expenses), the court can reduce or refuse these expenses (Tilleman, Lastgeving, 124; Wéry, Le mandat, 206-207, no. 163). CC art. 1999 asserts that only clearly exaggerated expenses can lead to a reduction or a refusal. The legislator wanted to exclude discussions on small possible savings (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 425-426; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 124). The principal bears the burden of proof (Wéry, Le mandat, 206).

39. In BULGARIA only necessary expenses justified by the contractual performance have to be reimbursed (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 27). The agent bears the burden of proof regarding the existence and amount of the expenses (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 159). There are special rules for the commercial agent: if such an agent is a professional agent acting independently in the capacity of a merchant, all underlying expenses connected with the business (e.g. office rent) are on the agent's own account, unless otherwise stipulated. The commercial agent is entitled, however, to reimbursement of usual costs incurred in the course of the activity for performance of the obligations under the contract with the principal (Ccom art. 39; Gerdjikov, Komentar na Turgovskiya zakon I, 158-159).

40. In DENMARK normally the claim by an agent for reimbursement of expenses will be accepted by the court only when the agent has acted reasonably in trying to perform the agency obligations. If the principal does not want to pay the expenses, the burden of proving that the agent did not act reasonably lies on the principal.

41. In ENGLAND as mentioned earlier, for the agent to be entitled to claim indemnity, the agent must have acted reasonably (see Pettman v Keble [1850] 9 CB 701), i.e. must not have acted beyond the authority conferred, negligently or unlawfully.

42. In ESTONIA in cases where the agent is entitled to reimbursement of expenses, the agent bears the burden of proof that they were reasonably incurred.

43. In FINLAND the agent is, unless otherwise agreed, entitled to reimbursement of reasonable expenses (Ccom § chapter 18 art. 5). The burden of proof usually lies on the agent.

44. According to the FRENCH CC art. 1999, even where the principal has proved that the agent could have incurred less expenditure in the performance of the mandate, the expenses must be reimbursed. The only limit is where there has been a breach of the contract or negligence: where the expenses incurred are such that there has been a mismanagement. The agent could then be ordered to indemnify the principal in that respect. Damages will therefore compensate the payment of the excessive expenses. The principal has to prove the existence of such mismanagement.

45. The agent is entitled, under GERMAN law, to reimbursement of those expenses that the agent 'could consider to be necessary under the circumstances' (CC § 670). The agent has to prove the facts on the basis of which the expenses were considered to be necessary (e.g. a direction the principal gave) (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 671 no. 7).

46. In GREECE the agent is obliged, if there is no agreement to the contrary, to incur only the necessary expenses required for the performance of the mandate taking into consideration the aim and the extent of the mandate, the interests of the principal and all the conditions which will lead to the successful performance of the mandate (CC art. 722; Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, art. 723 GREEK CC nr. 4-5). If the agent brings an action for the reimbursement of expenses, the agent bears the burden of proving the extent and the necessity of the expenses incurred in order to achieve an orderly execution of the aim of the mandate. If the principal counterclaims that the expenses were not necessary the principal bears the burden of proving this claim (CA Athens decision no. 8183/1989, EllDni 1991, 210).

47. As the HUNGARIAN CC art. 277(4) prescribes that '[t]he obligor shall act to perform the contract in the manner that can generally be expected in the given situation, while the obligee shall promote performance in the same manner', only reasonable expenses are to be reimbursed by the principal.

48. In IRELAND at common law, an agent is entitled to be indemnified against any reasonable expenses and liabilities, necessarily incurred on behalf of the principal in the performance of the duties when acting within the scope of actual authority, or, if actions are later ratified, or if the agency is one of necessity.

49. In ITALY the principal is not obliged to reimburse expenses which derive from irresponsible behaviour of the agent (who thereby acted in breach of contract). On the other hand, the principal cannot refuse reimbursement for the sole reason that the concluded contract turns out to be unsuccessful: the principal's refusal to pay is justified only in the case of negligent conduct by the agent. According to the general rules on evidence, the claimant has to prove the facts the claimant relies on.

Consequently, the onus of proof that the agent acted reasonably and diligently is borne by the agent who seeks reimbursement of expenses.

50. In the NETHERLANDS generally, the expenses to be reimbursed have to be fair. This implies that the agent is entitled to reimbursement of expenses if they were reasonably incurred for the performance of the mandate contract. (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 17).

51. Under POLISH law only reasonable expenses required to properly carry out the mandate contract have to be reimbursed (CC art. 742).

52. In SCOTLAND an agent is only entitled to recover expenses which have been properly incurred (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 534; Annan v Marshall (1887) 25 SLR 94). A solicitor is not entitled to recover expenses which are either unreasonable or manifestly unnecessary unless they have been expressly authorised by the principal (Begg, 121).

53. In SLOVAKIA the agent is entitled to reimbursement of reasonable expenses. The relevant question is whether the agent acted reasonably, necessarily, and purposefully. The agent has to render a statement of account to the client. The client may prove that the agent did not act reasonably.

54. A "reasonableness" cap to the right to reimbursement is unknown in the SPANISH law

55. In SWEDEN the agent is entitled to reimbursement of expenses under the condition that the expenses were necessary when performing the contract or that the agent has reasonably considered the expenses to be necessary (Bengtsson, Särskilda avtalstyper I^2, 170). If the agent ought to have been aware that the expenses were unnecessary the agent will not be able to claim reimbursement.

IV. Time when reimbursement of expenses due

56. In AUSTRIA in the absence of an express agreement, payment of expenses is due immediately when the expenses are incurred (CC § 1014 Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I^3, no. 7; OGH Miet 33.117; 35/10; 36.073; 45.044; ImmZ 1992, 263). Rendering of accounts is not a precondition. Where the commercial regulations apply, reimbursement of the expenses is due when the account is rendered (Ccom § 384).

57. In BELGIUM as a rule the reimbursement of expenses is due at the moment of accounting by the agent, i.e. at the end of the contract for representation. An agent is permitted to ask for an immediate reimbursement, in case of deficiency (Wéry, Le mandat, 205).

58. In BULGARIA reimbursement of expenses is due at the request of the agent (LOA art. 285). The principal is obliged to reimburse even when the mandate relationship has been terminated as a result of withdrawal by the principal or when the performance has become impossible (LOA art. 288).

59. In DENMARK unless otherwise expressly agreed upon between the parties, the payment of price and reimbursement will fall due as soon as the agent has fulfilled the contract of representation. A claim for reimbursement will normally be needed to fix the exact amount of the expenses.

60. In ENGLAND reimbursement is due as soon as the agent can prove that the expenses have been incurred and that such expenses comply with the conditions defined earlier.

61. The reimbursement is due, in ESTONIA, once the expenses have been incurred (LOA § 113(3)).

62. In FINLAND unless otherwise agreed, payment is usually due within a reasonable time after the fulfilment of the agent's contractual duties and after a demand by the agent. The payment need not take place until an account is given, if such is required. The agent is usually not entitled to an advance payment. This is, in general, not the case in long-term mandates where periodical payments may take place. The Commercial Agents and Salesmen Act arts. 10 and 11 contain detailed rules concerning the time of payment.

63. In FRANCE the agent may claim immediate reimbursement of expenses incurred. In effect, the law provides that the principal must pay the agent interest in respect of the sums which have been incurred for the performance of the mandate as soon as such expenses have been incurred (CC art. 2001). It should be noted that since the law is silent on the subject, the indemnification of losses incurred by the agent in performance of the mandate will occur at the end of the mandate.

64. In GERMANY reimbursement of expenses is due once the expenses have been incurred.

65. The reimbursement of expenses in GREEK law (CC art. 722) is due after the performance of the mandate or after the termination of the contractual relationship (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 722 GREEK CC nr. 5).

66. In IRELAND in the absence of express agreement, it seems that the expenses are due as soon as the agent can prove that they have been incurred and that they are lawful and reasonable.

67. The agent, under ITALIAN law, unless otherwise agreed by the parties, has a reporting obligation to be performed without delay towards the principal (CC arts. 1712 and 1713). In particular, upon conclusion of the mandate the agent must communicate to the principal the performance of the contract, report on what has been done and render to the principal all and any profits acquired in the performance of the contract. The agent should also demonstrate the expenses sustained for the performance of the contract. It is only then that the agent has the right to claim remuneration and reimbursement.

68. In the NETHERLANDS it seems that payment of the expenses is due at the moment the agent renders an account of the performance. If the principal fails to pay, the agent may be entitled to interest according to CC art. 6:119(1) (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 17).

69. In POLAND the agent is entitled to the recovery of the expenses after the service has been performed.

70. In SCOTLAND there is no rule which governs the point at which agents are, in general, entitled to reimbursement of expenses. The issue may be governed by custom and practice in a particular trade. This issue is governed by specific rules in the case of solicitors, who are entitled to interim fees subject to obtaining the prior consent of the client (Paterson & Ritchie, no. 9.04.09). Such fees may be debited from the balance of funds held by the solicitor on the client's account provided again that the client's consent is obtained (Solicitors (Scotland) Accounts Rules 2001 rule 6(1)(d); Paterson & Ritchie, no. 9.04.4). An interim fee must be fair and reasonable in the light of the work which has been carried out to date (Paterson & Ritchie, no. 9.04.4).

71. In SLOVAKIA in the case of a mandate contract, in civil relations expenses should be reimbursed after the matter is finished and the account is given; in commercial relations the agent is entitled to the remuneration once the activity stipulated in the mandate has been duly carried out, regardless of whether it has led to the expected result or not. Under a commission agent contract, the reimbursement of expenses is due at the same time as the remuneration.

72. In SPAIN the agent may claim immediate reimbursement of expenses incurred. The law provides that the principal must pay the agent interest in respect of the sums which have been incurred for the performance of the mandate as soon as such expenses have been incurred (CC art. 1728 III).

73. In SWEDEN unless agreed otherwise the payment of the price as well as the expenses are due in arrears (Hellner, 225). If the agent has a duty to give an account of the performance, the principal is not obliged to pay until such account is given.

V. Right to advance for expenses

74. In AUSTRIA the agent is entitled to an advance to cover expenses which will have to be incurred in order to perform the mandate (CC § 1014; Straube (-Griss) HGB I³, § 396, no. 14; Straube (-Schütz) HGB I³, § 409, no. 10). The same rule applies to commission agents (Ccom § 396(2)) and forwarders (Ccom § 409).

75. In BELGIUM the agent is entitled to an advance (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 425; Wéry, Le mandat, 206).

76. In BULGARIA upon a request from the agent, the principal has to supply all means necessary to perform the mandate (LOA art. 285). In legal doctrine it is considered that the principal is obliged to give the agent an advance for covering expenses for the contractual performance. The agent has the right to refuse performance until the advance has been paid (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 27).

77. In DENMARK the agent is not entitled to an advance to cover expenses unless this is agreed upon with the principal.

78. In ENGLAND there does not appear to be any specific case law on this topic. Provided that the principal has agreed to provide the agent with an advance on the reimbursement of expenses, this should be possible.

79. The ESTONIAN LOA § 628(4) provides for the (general) contract for services that the service provider (the agent) has the right to demand an advance payment in a 'reasonable amount' of the remuneration and the expenses to be reimbursed before commencing performance (if the parties have not agreed otherwise).

80. In FINLAND in general the agent is not entitled to an advance to cover the expenses, if not otherwise agreed.

81. In FRANCE the agent is not entitled to an advance to cover expenses and cannot require any advance. The parties may, of course, provide for this in a specific clause of the contract. It should be recalled that the agent is entitled to immediate repayment of expenses incurred.

82. In GERMANY the agent is entitled to an advance to cover necessary expenses (CC § 669).

83. In GREEK law, in the case of a mandate contract a principal is bound to pay in advance the expenses required for the performance of the mandate (CC art. 721). A principal who refuses to pay in advance is placed under notice according to CC art. 351: 'A creditor shall be placed under notice if upon being invited by the debtor the creditor has not proceeded with the completion or has not cooperated for the conclusion of an act without which the debtor cannot furnish the performance.'

84. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 479(1), in general, the agent is not obliged to advance any costs.

85. In IRELAND the common law right to be indemnified for expenses operates ex post, so that any claim to cover expenses in advance would have to be provided for in the contract.

86. In ITALY the principal has to supply the agent with the means necessary to conclude the affair or the prospective contract, unless otherwise agreed (CC art. 1719). This obligation of the principal may also include the obligation to give the agent an advance to cover the expenses that the agent will need to incur in order to perform the obligations under the contract.

87. In the NETHERLANDS generally, the agent is entitled to wages and reimbursement of expenses made during the performance of the mandate. There is no information available on whether the agent is also entitled to an advance.

88. In POLAND the agent is entitled to receive an advance for future expenses (CC art. 743). The principal is only obliged to give an advance if the agent asks for it.

89. In SCOTLAND there appears to be no specific rule governing the agent's entitlement to an advance to cover payment of expenses. The issue may be governed by custom and practice in a particular trade. In the case of a solicitor, the principal is bound, if required by the solicitor, to supply funds for expenses (Begg, 120). There is nothing to prevent such a request being made in advance.

90. In SLOVAKIA in civil relations, unless otherwise agreed, the principal must pay to the agent presumed expenses at the latter's request (CC § 728). In commercial relations, if it may be anticipated that substantial expenses would be incurred in arranging a certain matter on the principal's behalf, the agent may request an appropriate advance payment (Ccom § 571(2)). According to the rules on the commission agent contract, the agent is not entitled to an advance, but the parties may agree otherwise.

91. In SPAIN, the agent is entitled to get advances needed for performance (CC art. 1728 I).

92. In SWEDEN the principal is not obliged to pay any expenses in advance, unless the parties have agreed to do so or it follows from the circumstances (Hellner, 224).

CHAPTER 3: PERFORMANCE BY THE AGENT

Section 1: Main obligations of agent

IV.D.–3:101: Obligation to act in accordance with mandate

At all stages of the mandate relationship the agent must act in accordance with the mandate.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The agent is performing a service for the principal. The service to be provided is determined by the authorisation and instruction of the principal, i.e. the mandate granted to the agent. The agent is therefore required to act in accordance with this mandate. The principal determines how the agent is to perform the contractual obligations and, where a prospective contract is to be concluded, what its contents are to be.

B. Authorisation, instruction and subsequent directions

The mandate granted to the agent, which consists of the authorisation, initial instruction and any subsequent directions of the principal, provides the information pertaining to the performance of the mandate and to the contents of any prospective contract which is to be concluded. This means that the agent undertakes the obligation to act in accordance with the power granted by the principal (authorisation) and within the guidelines given by the principal, both at the time the contract is concluded and subsequently during the performance (instruction and subsequent directions).

I. Act in accordance with mandate

1. In BELGIUM the agent is – in general – under a duty of care (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V[2], 407). They must act as a bonus pater familias (Paulus und Boes, Lastgeving, 90; Wéry, Le mandat, 148). For specific aspects of the agent's duties, there is a duty to guarantee the result, e.g. the duty to follow imperative instructions of the principal or the prohibition on exceeding the limits of the authority granted.
2. In BULGARIA the obligation to perform in accordance with the mandate and within the power of attorney (if granted) is the main obligation of the agent (BULGARIAN LOA art. 281; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 23-25; Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 117).
3. In ENGLAND it is essential, in every agency relationship, that the agent acts in accordance with the authority given by the principal (express or implied). See Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[18], no. 6.002.

4. In GERMANY the agent has to act in accordance with the mandate and has to exercise due care in doing so (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 662 no. 9). Under very narrow circumstances, the CC § 665 entitles the agent to deviate from the mandate if the agent may assume that the principal would under the given circumstances agree with the deviation and generally only after informing the principal and waiting for instructions (see Seiler, in: Münchener Kommentar zum BGB[4], § 665 no. 9 indicating that CC § 665 also covers deviations from the mandate contract itself, although this provision only speaks of deviations from 'instructions').

5. In IRELAND at common law, an agent is obliged to follow the lawful instructions of the principal, which would include acting within the authority given. Where an agent exceeds the authority given, this is a breach of contract.

6. In the NETHERLANDS the agent is bound to act in accordance with the mandate and is under the general duty of care incumbent on all service providers (CC, art. 7:401).

7. In SLOVAKIA this is a general contractual obligation.

8. The agent, under SPANISH law, cannot act beyond the limits established by the principal in the mandate contract (CC art. 1714). The basic obligation of the agent to act within the limits of the mandate comprises: (a) carrying out the legal acts which are the object of the contract; (b) exercising due diligence; (c) acting within the limits established by the principal; and (d) following the instructions of the principal on how to carry out the mandate (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII[2], 460-461). The limits within which the agent has to act are not established by the law but by the principal; these limits are to be determined by interpreting the will of the principal (STS 2 Feb 1976). It is therefore a problem of interpretation of the will of the principal. It is for the agent to interpret what the will of the principal is (STS 30 Jan 1963), by following the rules on interpretation (the truthful intention of the principal, in light of the nature and finality of the mandate). If the agent acts beyond the mandate but, as a result, the principal has a better position than the one the principal initially wanted, then this is not to be considered as going beyond the limits established by the mandate (CC art. 1715). This refers both to an economic advantage but also to avoiding damage to the patrimony of the principal (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII[1], 926).

9. In SWEDEN according to HB 18:2 the agent has to act in accordance with the power granted. Regarding the internal relationship there is no general rule governing the agent's responsibility in the case of acting beyond the mandate (Bengtsson, Särskilda avtalstyper I[2], 157) but this would be a breach of contract.

II. Agent free to act in own name or in name of principal

10. In AUSTRIA if the contract does not provide otherwise, the agent is not free to decide whether to act in the principal's name or in the agent's own name.

11. In BELGIUM in the absence of express instructions, a (civil law) agent is presumed to have been instructed to act in the name of the principal. The principal and the agent are mutually bound to an obligation of loyalty. A first aspect of this obligation of loyalty under Belgian law is the 'transparency requirement'. This requirement obliges the agent to reveal the identity of the principal at the moment of the conclusion of the contract by acting in the name of the principal (Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 305-306; Wéry, Le mandat, 151). In the absence of express instructions, a (commercial law) commission-agent on the contrary is – according to trade customs – presumed to be instructed to act in the agent's own name (Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux, 611; RPDB., v° Commission, no. 132; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 511; Van der Perre and Lejeune, Droit commercial I, no. 92; Van Ryn & Heenen, 21).

12. In BULGARIA, unless agreed otherwise, the agent is not free to decide whether to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal. In order to act in the name of the principal and to directly affect the principal's legal position, the agent has to obtain an authority for representation from the principal (power of attorney), given separately from the conclusion of the mandate contract. This authority is granted by means of a unilateral legal act of the principal giving the agent the power to act in the principal's name and to affect the principal's legal sphere (Vassilev, L., Grajdansko pravo[2], 368). Without authority for representation, the agent is only allowed to act in the agent's own name. The default rule is that the commission agent and the forwarding agent always act in their own names (Ccom art. 348(1), art. 361(1)).

13. In DENMARK if the matter has not been regulated by the parties the agent is free to decide whether to act in the principal's or in the agent's own name.

14. In ENGLAND there does not appear to be any authority on this issue. Whether the agent is to act in the agent's own name (undisclosed) or in the name of the principal (disclosed) seems a crucial term in the contract, especially from the viewpoint of the principal. Considering the fiduciary nature of an agency relationship, if the principal does not make it clear whether the agent is to disclose the agency or not, it seems that the agent would not be entitled to decide independently whether to disclose the agency or not to third parties.

15. In ESTONIA the agent is free to decide whether to act in the principal's name or in the agent's own name if the parties have not decided the matter in the mandate contract.

16. In FINLAND the agent is not allowed to decide independently whether to act in the agent's own name or in the principal's name. Unless agreed otherwise, the mandate entitles the agent to act solely in the principal's name.

17. In FRANCE the agent is not free to decide whether to act as agent or as 'commission' agent (indirect mandate). Where there is a difficulty, the agent has every interest in requesting the principal to confirm which type of agency has been agreed, because if there is a dispute, the judge will have to decide which of the two types of agency should apply, depending on the terms of the contract and the evidence. If it appears that the agent has made a mistake concerning the type of agency, the agent will be liable for the consequences.

18. In GERMANY if the parties have not regulated whether or not the agent is to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal, the agent is free to decide how to act.

19. In GREECE if a mandate contract is silent about the authority of the agent to act in the principal's name or in the agent's own name the agent is free to decide on that matter (CA Pireos decision nr. 278/1988, NoV 1989, 1451). In case of a contract of commission the nature of that contract requires that the agent act in the agent's own name.

20. In HUNGARY the agent can act in the principal's name only if the principal has authorised that (CC art. 222).

21. In IRELAND there is no direct case law on this point. At common law, an agent must obey the principal's lawful instructions. It has been held that where instructions are ambiguous (e.g. where it is not clear from the principal's instructions whether the agent is to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal) an agent will not be held liable if the agent acts on a reasonable interpretation of the instructions (Ireland v Livingstone [1872] LR 5 HL 395), though an agent should seek clarification, where possible (Woodhouse AC Israel Cocoa Ltd SA v Nigerian Produce Marketing Co Ltd [1972] AC 741 at 772 per Lord Salmon; European Asian Bank AG v Punjab & Sind Bank [1983] 2 All ER 508 at 517 per Goff LJ).

22. In ITALY if the parties have not regulated whether the agent should act in the agent's own name or in name of the principal, and if a solution to the issue cannot be derived from an interpretation of the contract, the agent can decide how to act. Depending on whether the agent acts in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal, the liability incurred towards the third parties will be different. Usually, the agent acts in name of the principal. In this case the effects of the contract are produced directly in the juridical and financial sphere of the principal. The contract by which the agent is required to represent the principal in the agent's own name but for the principal's account is regulated by CC arts. 1705 and 1706, according to which the agent acquires the rights and assumes the duties arising from transactions made with third persons, the principal can claim movables acquired for the principal's account by the agent without prejudice to the rights of the third persons as a result of good faith possession, and if the things acquired by the agent consist of immovables or movables inscribed in public registers, the agent is under an obligation to transfer such things to the principal. In case of non-performance, the provisions relating to the enforcement of the obligation to enter into a contract apply.

23. In the NETHERLANDS the agent has to derive authority to act in the principal's name from the mandate contract. In professional mandate contracts the agent will usually be supposed to act in the agent's own name (HR 11 March 1977, NJ 1977, 521).

24. In POLAND if the contract is silent on whether the agent should act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal, the agent should act in the name of the principal (CC art. 734(2)).

25. In SCOTLAND if the principal fails to stipulate whether the agent is to act in the name of the principal or in the agent's own name, the agent is probably not entitled to decide this issue independently. On ordinary principles of interpretation, a mandate to act as a representative of a principal (i.e. to "affect the legal position of the principal in relation to a third party") would normally be construed as a mandate to do so overtly and in such a way as to affect the legal position of the principal directly. However, much would depend on usages and practices in particular fields of activity. The agent is under an obligation to act in good faith towards the principal and, in the absence of guidance from the contract or binding usages or practices, to decide whether to act in the representative's own name or in the principal's without first seeking the principal's instructions would probably amount to a non-performance of this obligation.

26. In SLOVAKIA this question is not regulated directly. If the parties have not decided whether the agent is to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal, the agent may not make this decision independently (CC § 32). Unless it ensues from a certain act in law that someone acts on behalf of another person, the person acts in the agent's own name. Mandate and commission agent contracts in commercial relations are not concluded without clear indication in whose name the agent is obliged to act. If the agent has to effect legal acts in the name of the principal, a written granting of authority is required (Ccom § 568).

27. In SPAIN the agent is not free to decide whether to act as agent or as commissioner in its own name. In any case of doubt, direct representation is compulsory (see CC art. 1725). However, the commercial agent not specially instructed may decide how to act (Ccom art. 245).

28. In SWEDEN if the parties have not regulated whether the agent is to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal and it does not follow from other circumstances, the agent is free to decide the matter. However, an agent who chooses to act in the agent's own name runs the risk of being considered a party to the prospective contract as it is presumed that when you act in your own name you also act on your own behalf and account (Ramberg & Ramberg, 50).

III. Liability of agent acting in own name in breach of contract

29. In AUSTRIA the agent is liable for non-performance if the agent acted in the agent's own name whereas the contract required acting in the principal's name.

30. In BELGIUM if the agent acts in the agent's own name whereas the contract required acting in the principal's name, the agent is liable for non-performance of the obligation of loyalty and in particular the transparency requirement (Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 306; Wéry, Le mandat, 152 and 259). A principal who suffers damage by this non-performance, can claim damages (e.g. CA Brussels 28 Jan 1820, Pas. 1820-21, II, 30).

31. In BULGARIA when the agent is authorised and instructed to act in the name of the principal and nevertheless acts in the agent's own name, this is considered a breach of the mandate contract (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 19). The agent is liable in damages to the principal for any loss caused by this deviation from the mandate (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 25), unless the deviation was necessary for the protection of the interests of the principal and it was impossible to obtain the principal's consent (LOA art. 282).

32. In DENMARK if the agent acts in the agent's own name whereas the contract required acting in the principal's name, this constitutes a non-performance. The principal will be entitled to claim damages for any loss suffered as a consequence of the agent's deviation from the contract. Normally the principal will be entitled to terminate the contractual relationship, pleading that the agent has failed to perform in a proper way (lack of trust).

33. In ENGLAND the agent who acts in the agent's own name when asked by the principal to act in the principal's name, is committing a breach of contract and is liable for it. An agent who has acted in breach of authority will not be entitled to claim remuneration or expenses. Whether the principal is entitled to terminate the agency depends on whether the breach is regarded as repudiatory. The question seems to have created controversy amongst academics. At the centre of the debate is the question whether in such a situation, the agent can still bind the principal to the third party on the basis of the doctrine of undisclosed agency. In such a situation, the agent has acted in breach of authority and since undisclosed agency only applies when the agent acts within the authority granted (Keighley, Maxsted & Co. v. Durant & Co. [1901] AC 240), it seems that the principal cannot be bound by the acts of the agent.

34. In ESTONIA any deviation from what is required by the contract would lead to a breach. In specific situations, deviation from the directions of the principal will not amount to a breach by the agent. In case of non-performance by the agent, the principal may choose which remedies to pursue (legal remedies for non-performance of an obligation are regulated in the general part of the LOA, see LOA §§ 100-126). Such remedies include specific performance, damages, price reduction or the right to terminate the contractual relationship (if the breach is essential).

35. In FINLAND the agent is liable for non-performance and the principal can claim damages. The principal is entitled to terminate the contractual relationship if the non-performance is essential. Price reduction is, in general, possible as well.

36. In FRANCE the agent who acts in the agent's own name instead of the name of the principal will incur liability for non-performance, where loss or damage was incurred by the principal. The principal may decide to unilaterally terminate the mandate (which is always possible, even in the absence of any breach) and the principal may reduce both the remuneration and the repayment of expenses incurred by the agent (CC art. 1999(2) a contrario).

37. In GERMANY the agent is liable to the principal because of non-performance of an obligation under the contract. The principal can claim damages under CC § 280.

38. In GREECE if the mandate contract includes the explicit requirement that the agent is to act in the principal's name and the agent acts in the agent's own name, the agent may be liable for a defective performance of the mandate (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 717 GREEK CC nr. 2-5). According to CC art. 717, '[a] representative may only deviate from the limits set in the mandate if he found himself in the impossibility to notify the principal and it is at the same time obvious that the principal would have allowed the deviation if he had knowledge of the circumstances that prompted such deviation.' The principal can in case of an unjustified deviation of the limits set in the mandate deny the performance and claim damages due to a defective performance of the mandate on the part of the agent (CC art. 714). The principal can also refuse the reimbursement of the expenses regarding the defective performance of the mandate (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 717 GREEK CC nr. 5). On the other hand, the principal has the discretionary power to approve the deviation from the limits of authority set in the mandate (Kapodistrias, Art. 717 GREEK CC nr. 13; Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 717 GREEK CC nr. 5)

39. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 277(1), '[c]ontracts shall be performed as stipulated, at the place and time set forth and in accordance with the quantity, quality, and range specified therein'. If the agent acts in the agent's own name whereas the contract required acting in the principal's name, it is a kind of non-performance according to the circumstances. In a case of non-performance, if it is possible, the principal can demand correct repetition of the performance (CC art. 311/A). Moreover, CC art. 478(2) establishes that 'the principal shall be entitled to reduce the remuneration or refuse to pay it if he is able to prove that success was not achieved in part or in whole for a reason for which the agent is responsible.' The agent is liable for damages resulting from non-performance (see CC arts. 310 and 318(1)).

40. In IRELAND at common law, an agent must obey the principal's lawful instructions. And where the agency is contractual, the agent is liable for breach of contract if the agent fails to act as instructed. Therefore, where an agent is instructed to act in the principal's name and in fact acts in the agent's own name, the agent will be liable for breach of contract. The remedies available following a breach of contract depend on a number of factors including the classification of the term breached and, sometimes, the seriousness of the consequences of the breach. For example, where the term breached is a condition of the contract, the innocent party i.e. the principal can terminate the contractual relationship and sue for damages for any resultant loss. Whereas, if the term breached is only a warranty, the innocent party (i.e. the principal) cannot terminate the contractual relationship but damages for loss may be sought. Moreover, it seems that an agent who has committed a serious breach of contract loses the right to remuneration and expenses.

41. In ITALY in general terms the agent who does not perform the contractual obligations correctly is liable for non-performance. Accordingly, if the agent acts in the agent's own name whereas the contract required acting in the principal's name, the agent acts in breach of contract and the principal is entitled to exercise the remedies provided for by the law (i.e. seek either performance or termination). However the remedy of termination is not available if the non-performance of one of the parties has slight importance with respect to the interest of the other (CC art. 1455). In any case of breach, 'the party performing the contract can choose to demand either performance or dissolution of the contract, saving, in any case, compensation for damages' (CC art. 1453). Accordingly, and depending on the specific circumstances of the case, the principal may claim damages, if any, for breach of contract, if the agent acts in the agent's own name whereas the contract required acting in the principal's name (CC art. 1460).

42. In the NETHERLANDS, an agent who is in breach of contract towards the principal is liable in damages according to the general CC art. 6:74(1).

43. In POLAND the agent is liable for any loss to the principal under the normal rules on contractual liability (breach of contract) (CC art. 471).

44. In SCOTLAND if an agent acts in the agent's own name where the contract requires acting in the principal's name, this would constitute a breach of the agency contract. As a result, the principal would be entitled to claim damages from the agent. If the breach constituted a material breach, the principal would have the right to terminate the agency for non-performance and claim damages.

45. In SLOVAKIA in civil relations, everybody is liable for damages caused by breaching their legal or contractual obligations, unless they prove they did not inflict the breach. In commercial relations, the general rule is that whoever breaches an obligation arising from a certain contractual relationship must provide compensation for damage thus caused to another party, unless it is proven that the said breach was caused by circumstances excluding the liability.

46. If an agent acted in the agent's own name, when the contract provided for execution in the principal's name, this would constitute in SPANISH law an infringement of contractual duties (CC art. 1718). Probably, also, the principal may claim recovery of the acquired asset as an equitable holder (CC art. 1717 III).

47. In SWEDEN if the agent acts in the agent's own name whereas the contract required acting in the principal's name the agent could be held liable for non-performance. A principal who suffered loss due to this non-performance would be entitled to damages. The principal is also entitled to terminate the contractual relationship if the non-performance is fundamental.

IV. Liability of agent acting in name of principal in breach of contract

48. In AUSTRIA where a party contracts ostensibly as agent, but in excess of actual or ostensible authority ('falsus procurator'), and with the result that no principal is bound by the contract, the party will, as a rule, incur personal liability (CC §§ 1019 et seq.), but the nature and extent of that liability will depend on the circumstances of the case. Within the scope of commercial transactions, CC §§ 1019 applies for such a falsus procurator as well (Ccom-CC §1019 Krejci (-Schauer), no. 1. The principal may cure the defective contract by approving subsequently or by accepting the advantages of this contract.

49. In BELGIUM when the contract requires the agent to act in the agent's own name, then the agent has an obligation to keep the existence and identity of the principal secret from the third party (see for the contract of prête nom: Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux, 611; see for the commission contract: CA Luik 6 Nov 2001, JT 2002, 544 and JLMB 2002, 1575; Comm. C. Brussels 1 Feb 1911, TBH 1911, 201; Comm. C. Antwerp 14 Jun 1856 and CA Brussels 17 May 1858, Pas. 1859, II, 168 and BJ 1859, 406; Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux, 611; RPDB, v° Commission, no. 132; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 191-194; Van der Perre and Lejeune, Droit commercial I, no. 92; Van Ryn & Heenen, 21). An agent who nevertheless acts in the name of the principal, violates this secrecy obligation and therefore risks a contractual liability claim for non-performance (see for the contract of prête nom: Poncet, 135; see for the commission contract: Fredericq, 269; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 192; Van Ryn & Heenen, 21 and 22).

50. In BULGARIA when the agent acts in the name of the principal when obliged to act in the agent's own name, this constitutes a breach of the mandate contract and the agent is liable for any loss caused to the principal (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 25). General rules on the non-performance of contractual obligations are applicable (LOA art. 79-94). The external relationship with the third party is regulated by LOA art. 42 concerning acts performed without authority for representation. For commission contracts, a special rule is applicable: all legal effects of a contract concluded by a commission agent with a third party in the course of performance of a commission contract occur in the legal sphere of the agent, regardless of whether the agent communicated the name of the principal to the third party (Ccom art. 349(1)).

51. In DENMARK if the agent acts in the name of the principal whereas the contract required acting in the agent's own name, this constitutes a non-performance. The principal will be entitled to claim damages for any loss suffered as a consequence of the agent's deviation from the contract. Normally the principal will be entitled to terminate the agency on the ground that the agent has failed to perform in a proper way (lack of trust).

52. In ENGLAND if the agent was required to act in the agent's own name but has acted in the principal's name, the agent has acted in breach of authority and should be liable for that breach towards the principal. This breach is serious and therefore would probably be regarded as repudiatory, allowing the principal to terminate the contractual relationship and claim damages.

53. In ESTONIA any deviation from contractual obligations would lead to a breach and the normal remedies would be available see LOA §§ 100-126. Such remedies include specific performance, damages, price reduction or termination (if the breach is essential).

54. In FINLAND the agent is liable for non-performance and the principal can claim damages. The principal is entitled to terminate the contractual relationship if the non-performance is essential. Price reduction is, in general, possible as well.

55. In FRANCE the agent who acts in the name of the principal instead of in the agent's own name will incur liability for any failure in the performance of the contract, where loss or damage was incurred by the principal. The principal will, in effect, be personally liable towards the third party, contrary to the principal's intention to have the commission agent act in the agent's own name, which may cause loss to the principal.

56. In GERMANY the agent is liable to the principal because the agent failed to perform an obligation under the contract. The principal can claim damages under CC § 280.

57. In GREECE if the mandate contract includes an explicit requirement that the agent act in the principal's name and the agent acts in the agent's own name, the agent may be liable for a defective performance of the mandate (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, art. 717 Greek CC nr. 2-5). According to CC art. 717, '[an] agent may only deviate from the limits set in the mandate if he found himself in the impossibility to notify the principal and it is at the same time obvious that the principal would have allowed the deviation if he had knowledge of the circumstances that prompted such deviation.' The principal can in case of an unjustified deviation of the limits set in the mandate deny the performance and claim damages due to a defective performance of the mandate on the part of the agent (CC art. 714). The principal can also refuse reimbursement of the expenses regarding the defective performance of the mandate (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 717 GREEK CC nr. 5). On the other hand, the principal has the discretionary power to approve the defective performance of the mandate by approving the deviation from the limits of authority set in the mandate (Kapodistrias, Art. 717 GREEK CC nr. 13; Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 717 GREEK CC nr. 5).

58. In HUNGARY if the agent did not have authority to act in the principal's name but did so whereas the contract required use of the agent's own name, in the internal relationship, it is a kind of non-performance according to the circumstances. If it is possible, the principal can demand correct repetition of the performance (HUNGARIAN CC art. 311/A). Moreover, 'the principal shall be entitled to reduce the remuneration or refuse to pay it if he is able to prove that success was not achieved in part or in whole for a reason for which the agent is responsible' (CC art. 478(2)). The agent is liable for damages resulting from non-performance. CC art. 310 prescribes that '[a]part from guarantee rights, creditors shall be entitled to demand reimbursement for damages resulting from lack of conformity under the rules of indemnification'. Moreover, 'the provisions of tort liability shall be applied to liability for breach of contract and to the extent of indemnification, with the difference that such indemnification may not be reduced, unless otherwise prescribed by legal regulation' (CC art. 318). Moreover, according to CC art. 221(1) and (2), 'A person who transgresses the scope of his authority to represent in good faith or who has concluded a contract in the name of another person without having the right to represent and the person in whose name he has proceeded does not approve his action, such shall pay compensation to the other contracting party for damages incurred in result of the conclusion of the contract.' 'A mala fide false agent shall be liable for full recompense.'

59. In IRELAND acting contrary to the requirements of the contract would be a breach of contract and the normal consequences of such a breach would follow.

60. In ITALY in general terms the agent who does not perform correctly is liable for non-performance. Accordingly, if the agent acts in the principal's name whereas the contract required use of the agent's own name, the agent acts in breach of contract and the principal is entitled to exercise the remedies provided for by the law. Accordingly, and depending on the specific circumstances of the case, the principal may claim damages for the loss, if any, caused by the breach of contract. If the damages do not exceed the price, a price reduction can be a prompt and factual remedy for the principal (CC art. 1460).

61. In the NETHERLANDS the agent is liable because this is a breach of contract (CC art. 6:74).

62. In POLAND too the agent is liable for any loss suffered by the principal under the normal principles of contractual liability (CC art. 471).

63. In SCOTLAND if an agent acts in the name of the principal when instructed to act in the agent's own name, this constitutes a breach of the agency contract. As a result, the principal would be entitled to claim damages from the agent. If the breach is material, then the principal has the right to terminate the agency for non-performance and claim damages.

64. In SLOVAKIA if a person acts in someone else's name without authorisation, this means that, in the internal relationship between the agent and the principal, there is a breach of a contractual obligation.

65. In SPAIN , if the agent acts in the principal's name whereas the contract required acting in the agent's own name, the agent acts in breach of contract and the principal is entitled to exercise the remedies provided for by the law for such breach. Moreover, as the agent lacked any authority to act in another's name, the principal is not bound by the contract, unless ratification occurs (CC art. 1259).

66. In SWEDEN if the agent acts in the principal's name whereas the contract required acting in the agent's own name the agent could be held liable for non-performance. A principal who suffers loss due to this non-performance is entitled to damages. The principal is also entitled to terminate the agency if the non-performance is fundamental.

IV.D.–3:102: Obligation to act in interests of principal

(1) The agent must act in accordance with the interests of the principal, in so far as these have been communicated to the agent or the agent could reasonably be expected to be aware of them.

(2) Where the agent is not sufficiently aware of the principal's interests to enable the agent to properly perform the obligations under the mandate contract, the agent must request information from the principal.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The agent is authorised and instructed, i.e. mandated, by the principal to affect the principal's legal position. When the agent accepts the mandate granted by the principal, the agent undertakes the obligation to act in accordance with the mandate (IV.D.–3:101 (Obligation to act in accordance with mandate)) but also the obligation under the present Article to act in the interests of the principal. In order to do so, the agent will need to know the interests of the principal. This provision indicates that the agent must act in accordance with those interests of the principal of which the agent should be aware, either because these have been communicated by the principal or because the agent could be expected to know of them otherwise.

Illustration 1
A principal mandates a solicitor to appeal a court decision with which the principal fundamentally disagrees. In this case, the interests of the principal are sufficiently clear and no further information is needed for the solicitor to be able to perform the task.

Illustration 2
A principal authorises and instructs an agent to buy "a vintage car". As the agent does not have more information, it will be necessary to ask the principal what the maximum price is to be and whether there are specific types of vintage cars, or cars of a specific period (e.g. the 1920s or 1950s) in which the principal is particularly interested.

B. Agent's obligation to obtain necessary information on the principal's interests

Most of the principal's interests are explicitly communicated to the agent. Other interests should be known to the agent because they could be inferred from the contract, the authority, the instructions, the subsequent directions of the principal and any other sources of information. In some cases, however, the agent may have to seek further information from the principal about the principal's interests. The agent may, for example, have to ask the principal direct questions pertaining to the content of the prospective contract and the principal's preferences and priorities. For these reasons, the agent may be expected to take active steps to obtain information from the principal in order to be able to carry out the mandate properly.

I. Act in accordance with communicated interests of principal

1. In AUSTRIA an agent owes fiduciary duties to prefer the principal's interests to the agent's own interests. These duties are based on the contract between principal and agent (CC §§ 1009 S 1 and 1013 S 2; Ccom §§ 384(1) and 408; for commercial agents: OGH in ecolex 1992, 317)). The commission agent has to make proper efforts to discharge the tasks, e.g. to buy or sell as soon as possible for a good price. The commercial agent is required to take other interests of the principal into account when performing the act, e.g. the duty not to disclose confidential information (Griss, § 384 no. 3 (commission agents); Hügel/Viehböck, 204 (commercial agents); Schütz, § 408 Rz 2-5)
2. In BELGIUM there are no specific rules in this field, but it is likely that the obligation of fair dealing in the performance of the agency obligations will require that the agent take account of all the interests of the principal of which the agent was aware.
3. In BULGARIA the mandate contract establishes a fiduciary relationship between the parties. The principal trusts the personal skills, qualifications and features of the agent and expects the agent to perform the mandate with proper care for the principal's interests (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 20; Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 237). Hence, every mandate contract is considered concluded under the implied condition that the agent is obliged to act in accordance with the interests of the principal, in the best possible manner under the existing circumstances (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 120).
4. In DENMARK if the agent is aware of facts concerning the prospective contract the existence of which are unclear or unknown to the principal, the agent must contact the principal to make sure that the principal is aware of the position and the possible consequences arising from these facts.
5. In ENGLAND as previously mentioned, since the agent acts on behalf of the principal, the agent is in a fiduciary position towards the principal. Therefore, as a fiduciary, the agent must always act in the best interest of the principal when performing the agency duties. Fiduciary duties arise in equity and apply regardless of whether the agency is gratuitous or not. The principal will have communicated the principal's interests to the agent. Failing this, the agent who is not sufficiently aware of the interests of the principal should ask clarification.
6. In ESTONIA the law does not prescribe which specific interests the agent must consider. LOA § 621(3) merely stipulates that in the case where adherence to the instructions of the principal would be likely to cause unfavourable consequences for the principal, the agent shall comply with the instructions only after having called the principal's attention to such consequences and if the principal fails to modify the instructions.
7. In FINLAND the agent is required to take all relevant and foreseeable interests of the principal into account.
8. In FRANCE there are no specific rules in this field, but it is likely that the obligation of fair dealing in the performance of the agency will require that the agent take account of all the interests of the principal of which the agent was aware.
9. In GERMANY when acting under the mandate contract, the agent must take the financial and economic interests of the principal into account. A possible particular expertise of the agent is important in determining this obligation, which may require the agent to warn or inform the principal.

10. In GREECE the agent is required to take into account the principal's legal, economic, ethical and social benefit (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 713 GREEK CC nr. 15).

11. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 474(2), '[a]n agent must fulfil the agency according to the instructions and interests of the principal.' Moreover, CC art. 477(1) prescribes that 'The agent shall inform his principal of his activities and the state of affairs upon request or, if necessary, even without a request, particularly if the employment of another person has become necessary or if the instructions need to be changed due to the occurrence of new circumstances'. For this reason, the agent has to act in compliance with all the interests of the principal known to the agent.

12. In IRELAND beyond any duties imposed by the contract, the law imposes a variety of duties on an agent, largely with a view to protecting the principal. In general, agents stand in a fiduciary position to their principals and hence quite onerous duties are imposed on agents in this position. Fiduciary duties derive from equity and arise independently of any contract. They are imposed on the fiduciary automatically, as a matter of law, by virtue of the position held. Agents are normally subject to fiduciary duties because agents have the power to affect the legal position of their principals in relation to third parties and principals normally place trust and confidence in the agent in the exercise of that power. In the past, fiduciaries of all types tended to be treated similarly. More recently, in England, and arguably in Ireland, there has been a tendency to reduce the force of fiduciary duties between parties in an essentially commercial relationship, with the result that the relationship of agency does not necessarily give rise to a fiduciary relationship, or, the scope of the fiduciary duties, although they arise in equity, can be modified by contract (e.g. Carroll Group Distributors v G & J F Burke [1990] ILRM 285 at 288, per Murphy J). The core duties of a fiduciary are those of loyalty and fidelity. These core duties have several aspects and an agent's fiduciary duties can be divided into four headings: to avoid conflicts of interest; not to make a secret profit; not to accept a bribe; and to account. Because these duties arise from the fiduciary nature of the relationship, independently of any contract, they may survive the termination of the contract, unless expressly or impliedly excluded by the contract. Where an agent is in breach of these fiduciary duties, a variety of remedies is available: proprietary or personal, at common law or in equity.

13. In ITALY the agent is required to act in the principal's best interest, so that the agent has to do all that is possible to satisfy the principal's expectations. This could lead the agent, when performing the contractual obligations, to take into account further interests than those directly involved in the affair. However, any interests which are in conflict with those of the principal and may prejudice the satisfaction of the principal's expectations may not be taken into account by the agent unless the principal authorises this.

14. In the NETHERLANDS, generally, the agent is to observe due care (CC art. 7:401). For instance, the agent is required to obey timely and well considered directions of the principal (CC art. 7:402(1)) and keep the principal informed of what is being done regarding the performance of the service (CC art. 7:403(1)). Furthermore, the agent is accountable to the principal (CC art. 7:403(2)) (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 14).

15. The POLISH CC does not contain rules more specific than the general duty of every contracting party to act in good faith, with due care and to take into consideration the other party's interests (CC art. 355).

16. In SCOTLAND the relationship of agent and principal is described as a fiduciary one, characterised by trust and good faith. The agent is therefore subject to far-reaching duties towards the principal (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', paras. 84-101). At its most basic level, this duty would require the agent to act in accordance with the communicated interests of the principal.

17. In SLOVAKIA in civil relations, there is a general duty to act in accordance with the contract and good faith. In commercial relations, the agent is bound to perform the activity undertaken in accordance with the principal's instructions and interests of which the agent is aware or must be aware and to inform the principal of all circumstances ascertained while arranging the matter and which may result in a change of the principal's arrangements or instructions (Ccom § 567(2)). The commission agent must protect the principal's known interests, and keep the latter well informed of all circumstances that may lead to a change in the instructions (Ccom § 579). The advocate is obliged to protect and assert the principal's rights and interests (Act on Advocacy § 18).

18. In SPAIN the agent has to act in the interests of the principal (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII^2, 472), in accordance with the will of the principal. The obligation to act in the interests of the principal does not justify deviation from mandatory instructions of the principal. The interests of the principal will govern the performance of the agent as regards the application of the non-mandatory instructions. If the agent uses the power granted by the principal to pursue an interest which contradicts the interests of the principal, this is seen as an abuse of power (STS 5 Feb 1964; Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII^2, 465). According to Ccom art. 255, the agent should ask the principal for guidance, when no special instructions were given. But, if it is not possible to resort to the principal for instructions, the agent should act as if the affair were its own.

19. In SWEDEN the mandate relationship is considered to be a fiduciary relationship and it follows from general contract law and the duty of loyalty and care that the agent must always act in the best interest of the principal. The parties have a precontractual as well as a contractual duty to inform each other of important issues. Thus, the principal has a duty to communicate interests and needs and the agent must act in accordance with the communicated interests of the principal.

II. Professional insurance required?

20. In AUSTRIA the canons of professional ethics require the agent to take out insurance for professional liability (e.g. CCBE 3.9).

21. The BELGIAN CC does not contain an obligation to take out insurance for professional liability. The agent is therefore not required to take out insurance for professional liability, unless special rules for certain professions (e.g. legal) apply.

22. In BULGARIA agents are not obliged to take out insurance for professional liability, except for advocates (BAA art. 50(1)) and insurance agents (IC art. 165(2)).

23. In DENMARK normally the agent is not required to take out insurance for professional liability. In certain trade and commercial relationships custom may have developed an obligation for the agent to take out this kind of insurance. In specific areas (e.g. solicitors and accountants) insurance is mandatory.

24. In ENGLAND there does not seem to be any specific authority on this, but most professional agents will probably be required to take out insurance for professional liability. Solicitors have to for instance.

25. In ESTONIA generally the agent is not required to take out insurance for professional liability. However, special conditions apply for some professional agents such as lawyers.

26. In FINLAND generally, the agent is not required to take out insurance for professional liability. However, real estate agents, insurance brokers and lawyers (only members of the bar) are required to have professional liability insurance.

27. The FRENCH Civil Code does not contain an obligation to take out insurance for professional liability since the agency is, in principle, not remunerated. On the other hand, certain specific rules require professional agents to take out insurance, e.g. estate agents (Law 2 Jul 1970, art. 3-3°), insurance agents (Insurance Code art. L. 530-1), barristers and solicitors (Law 31 Dec 1971, art. 27).

28. In GERMANY the agent is not required to take out insurance for professional liability, unless special rules for certain professions (e.g. legal) apply.

29. In GREECE in the case of a mandate contract, the agent is not generally required to take out insurance for professional liability due to the gratuitous character of the mandate.

30. In HUNGARY the agent is not required to take out insurance for professional liability except for some special cases, e.g. attorneys at law (Act XI of 1998 on Attorneys art. 10(2)).

31. In IRELAND an agent per se, is not required to take out professional liability insurance. However, certain professionals are so required. For instance, every solicitor must as a pre-requisite to private practice in the State possess professional liability insurance from an insurer recognised by the Law Society (Solicitors Acts 1954-1994).

32. In ITALY as a general rule, there is no duty on the agent to take out insurance for professional liability. However, depending on the specific professional area of the agent, the taking of insurance is widespread in practice (e.g. lawyers, accountants).

33. In the NETHERLANDS generally, the agent is not required to take professional liability insurance. However, for professional service providers, such as architects, engineers, lawyers, and accountants, several specific laws require them to be sufficiently insured for their professional liability.

34. In POLAND certain professionals are required to have insurance for civil liability (e.g. lawyers, stock brokers).

35. In SCOTLAND whilst agents who are members of distinct professions are, in fact, obliged to carry professional indemnity insurance (e.g. solicitors), it is not possible to say that, as a general rule, every agent who is also a member of a profession is similarly obliged to take out such insurance. The answer to this question will vary depending upon the profession in question.

36. In SLOVAKIA as a general rule, there is no duty on the agent to take out insurance for professional liability. However, depending on the specific professional area of the agent, the taking of insurance is widespread in practice (e.g. advocates, accountants).

37. In SPAIN, professional insurance is not required as a general rule.

38. In SWEDEN some categories of agents are required to take out insurance for professional liability, such as lawyers, real estate agents and insurance agents (e.g. FmL § 6).

III. Agent's obligation to inquire about interests of principal

39. In AUSTRIA the agent's duty of care requires that the agent make proper efforts to discharge the agency tasks (CC § 1009 Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I³, no. 14; OGH wbl 1987, 212; RdW 1983, 106), to communicate to the principal all the necessary information and to inquire what the principal's interests and needs are as regards the content of the prospective contract; otherwise the agent is liable for the loss the principal suffers (CC § 1009 Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I³, no. 9, 14; CC § 1012

Rummel (-Strasser) I³, no. 18. The professional agent has to meet an even higher standard of care. For example, lawyers are obliged to give detailed information about the legal consequences of proposed acts (CC § 1009 Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I³, no. 10; OGH AnwBl 1991, 51; RdW 1990, 340). Commercial agents owe the diligence of a prudent businessperson (Ccom § 347).

40. In BULGARIA there is no explicit rule obliging the agent to inquire about the interests of the principal. Such an obligation can, however, follow from the obligation to act in the best possible manner in accordance with the interests of the principal.

41. In DENMARK if the agent is aware of facts concerning the prospective contract the existence of which is unclear or unknown to the principal, the agent must inform the principal. The agent may be held responsible for any failure in this respect.

42. In ENGLAND the principal will usually indicate, in the instructions, what is needed. Should such instructions be unclear, the agent must seek clarification. Failing to do so, a reasonable interpretation will bind the principal. Moreover, the agent, as a fiduciary, must always act in the best interest of the principal. If the agent, when negotiating a prospective contract on behalf of the principal, is not certain whether such a contract serves the interests of the principal, the agent should probably voice these concerns. However, if the agent only has authority to negotiate on behalf of the principal, the latter will not be bound by the agent's negotiations until the contract is concluded. Should the agent fail to act in the interest of the principal by not checking whether actions serve the principal's interests, the agent will be in breach of fiduciary obligations and liable to the principal.

43. In ESTONIA the duty to act in the interest of the principal (LOA § 620(1)) will require the agent, in most cases and in particular where the agent possesses particular expertise, to actively acquire the information that is necessary to establish the interests of the principal in order to comply with the standard of diligence of a good agent (LOA § 620(2)).

44. In FINLAND in general the agent has to pay attention to the interests of the other party. This duty includes an obligation to ensure in a sufficient way that the performance corresponds to the interests of the principal. Should the failure be due to negligence of the agent, the agent is liable for any loss the principal suffers.

45. In FRANCE there is no specific obligation for the agent to inquire about the specific requirements of the principal, but in certain marginal cases, the failure to do so could be considered as negligence or breach of contract, involving the agent's liability (e.g. Cass.civ. 1re, 3 Jun 1997, no. 95-17111). On the other hand, the professional agent has a duty to inform the principal about the contract which the agent envisages concluding (e.g. CA Versailles, 11 Feb 1993, JCP éd. G 1993, IV, 1262).

46. In GERMANY an obligation to inquire can exist under certain circumstances, in particular where the agent possesses particular expertise. The CC § 666 imposes a (very general) obligation to inform the principal where 'necessary'. If this obligation is breached, it can lead to a claim for damages under CC § 280(1).

47. In GREECE in a contract of mandate the agent is required to inquire about the principal's interests and needs. The agent is specifically required to ask explanations for unclear instructions or to notify the principal about all the circumstances that require a deviation from the instructions (CC art. 717; Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 717 GREEK CC nr. 3). Furthermore, the agent must provide information to the principal about the affairs entrusted to the agent (CC art. 718). Failure to do so amounts to non-performance and establishes the right to damages for any loss due to such failure (CC art. 714; Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 718 GREEK CC nr. 2).

48. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 477(1), '[t]he agent shall inform his principal of his activities and the state of affairs upon request or, if necessary, even without a request, particularly if employment of another person has become necessary or if the instructions need to be changed due to the occurrence of new circumstances'. Moreover, CC art. 476 prescribes that '[i]f the principal issues imprudent or incompetent instructions, the agent shall call the principal's attention to the matter. If the principal insists on the instructions despite the warning, he shall be liable for the damages sustained on account of the instructions'. In this respect the general rules of obligations also apply, especially CC art. 277(4), according to which '[t]he parties shall be under obligation to cooperate in the performance of a contract. The obligor shall act to perform the contract in the manner that can generally be expected in the given situation, while the obligee shall promote performance in the same manner'. The agent is liable for any loss resulting from non-performance (CC art. 310). See Supreme Court Pfv. VIII. 22.351/2005, in EBH2006. 1410.

49. In IRELAND it is arguable that in order to obey instructions, or to exercise reasonable skill and care, or avoid conflicts of interest, an agent might, before and during performance of the contract, have to inquire about the principal's interests and needs as regards the content of the proposed contract to be negotiated or concluded by the agent. Failure to do so could result in a breach of duties.

50. In ITALY before and during the agent's performance of the contract, the latter is required to inquire what the principal's interests and needs are, since this is functional to the satisfaction of the principal's interests and therefore to the correct performance of the agent's obligation. A failure in doing so would amount in most cases to a breach of the duty of care and may therefore consist in a breach of contract. Consequently, the principal may claim damages for any loss arising out of the breach and seek termination of the contractual relationship, provided that the breach is not irrelevant.

51. In the NETHERLANDS the agent in general is obliged to inform the principal about the activities regarding the fulfilment of the assignment (CC art. 7:403(1)). There does not seem to be a specific obligation to inquire about the principal's exact needs and wishes.

52. In POLAND the agent has no duty to inquire about the interests of the principal.

53. In SCOTLAND the agent is bound to perform in accordance with the instructions (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 84; Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 530) and is also bound to act in the best interests of the principal (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 97). Such duties are far-reaching, and it is likely that they would extend to requiring the agent to request information from the principal where such information was required for the proper performance by the agent of the obligations under the agency contract. Failure to do so would probably constitute a breach of the agent's fiduciary duty for which the principal would be entitled to recover damages.

54. In SLOVAKIA there is no specific duty to inquire, but such a duty may be considered as implied in the duty of the agent to act in accordance with the interests of the principal and to inform the principal about all issues that may have an influence on the principal's directions (Ccom § 567(2)).

55. In SPAIN this duty is expressly provided for in Ccom art. 255.

56. In SWEDEN the agent is considered to have a duty to inquire about the principal's interests and needs in order to be able to perform in accordance with the mandate contract. The agent also has a duty to inform the principal of matters and circumstances of which the agent becomes aware and which are of importance for the performance (Ramberg, 246-247; Hellner, 225; HaL § 5; KommL § 7).

IV.D.–3:103: Obligation of skill and care

(1) The agent has an obligation to perform the obligations under the mandate contract with the care and skill that the principal is entitled to expect under the circumstances.

(2) If the agent professes a higher standard of care and skill the agent has an obligation to exercise that care and skill.

(3) If the agent is, or purports to be, a member of a group of professional agents for which standards exist that have been set by a relevant authority or by that group itself, the agent must exercise the care and skill expressed in these standards.

(4) In determining the care and skill the principal is entitled to expect, regard is to be had, among other things, to:

(a) the nature, the magnitude, the frequency and the foreseeability of the risks involved in the performance of the obligations;
(b) whether the obligations are performed by a non-professional or gratuitously;
(c) the amount of the remuneration for the performance of the obligations; and
(d) the time reasonably available for the performance of the obligations.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article sets out general criteria to determine the standard of skill and care expected of an agent. It is similar in content to IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care) for service contracts.

B. Determination of standard of care for agents

The default rule is not that the agent guarantees that a result will be achieved (for example that the prospective contract will be concluded or that a buyer for a property will be found): in the absence of provision to the contrary in the contract the obligation is only to perform in accordance with the skill and care that the principal is entitled to expect. Paragraph (4) provides an indicative list of factors to be taken into account in determining the standard of skill and care that the principal is entitled to expect from the agent.

C. Specific standard of care

Paragraphs (2) and (3) deal with situations in which the agent is obliged, in view of the specific circumstances, to observe a specific standard of skill and care. Paragraph (3) refers to the case in which the agent professes a higher standard of skill and care, whilst paragraph (4) refers to the standard of skill and care expected of agents who belong to a certain group of professional agents. Obviously, the standard of skill and care that may be expected from an agent falling under paragraphs (2) or (3) will also have to be measured against the criteria set out under paragraph (4), taking into account the (purported) higher expertise of such an agent.

NOTES

Standard of care for agents

1. In AUSTRIA an agent must exhibit such a degree of skill and diligence as is appropriate to the performance of the duties accepted. In carrying out the duties with reasonable care, the agent must act with the care and diligence of a person of ordinary prudence in the line of the employment. Thus the agent is under a duty of care, not under a duty to guarantee the result expected by the principal. Even a professional agent does not guarantee that what is done will have the expected effect. The professional agent only warrants that the allotted task will be carried out with the skill generally possessed by fellow professionals (CC § 1299; CC § 1012 Schwimann (-Apathy), ABGB V³, no. 2). Solicitors, notaries and tax advisers are liable for blameworthy ignorance of the law (CC § 1012 Schwimann (-Apathy), ABGB V³, no. 2). Commercial agents must exhibit the diligence of a prudent business person (Ccom §§ 347 and 394, § 5 HVertrG).

2. In BULGARIA the agent has to perform the obligations under the mandate contract with the diligence of "a good householder" (diligentia boni patris familias) (LOA art. 281), i.e. the care that a reasonable person would consider necessary to be taken under the same circumstances (Апостолов, Облигационно право[2], 248). This is the standard of diligence for both gratuitous and non-gratuitous contracts and it is higher than the diligence used by an agent for his or her own affairs (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 24). The standard is even higher for professional agents: they are required to act with the care of "a prudent businessman" (Ccom art. 33(1) for commercial agents, Ccom art. 350(1) for commission agents and Ccom art. 361(1), referring to Ccom art. 350(1), for forwarding agents; Kazarov, Turgovsko pravo[4], 413).

3. In BELGIUM, apart from the exceptional case where the agent does not execute the mandate at all, the agent is – in general – under a duty of care (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V[2], 407). In relation to specific aspects of the agent's tasks, there may nevertheless be a duty to guarantee the result, e.g. the duty to follow imperative instructions of the principal or the prohibition against exceeding the limits of the authority granted. The agent must act as a bonus pater familias (Paulus und Boes, Lastgeving, 90; Wéry, Le mandat, 148).

4. In DENMARK the parties can agree to a 'best-efforts-clause', but normally a clause like this does not involve a duty to guarantee the result expected by the principal.

5. In ENGLAND the default rule is that the agent must perform with due care and skill. As long as the agent acts bona fide and in the best interest of the principal, the agent cannot guarantee the result expected by the principal. The standard of care is determined by reference to what is usual for an agent in the particular line of business or professional activity. In Metropolitan Toronto Pension Plan v Aetna Life Assurance Co of Canada ((1992) 98 DLR (4th) 582) it was stated that 'if he is an agent following a particular trade or profession (…) he must then show such skill as is usual and requisite in the business for which he receives payment' (Ibid, at 597 per Rosenberg J.). To establish whether or not the agent has met the required standard of care, one usually looks at the terms of the contract and the specific circumstances of a given case. The standard of care of a professional agent is higher than that of a gratuitous agent (Chaudry v Prabhakar [1988] 3 All ER 718).

6. As a default rule in ESTONIA, the agent is under a duty of care (LOA § 620 for the general contract for services; the same rule also applies for specific contracts of mandate such as the contract of agency, brokerage agreement and commissionaire agreement). The parties may, of course, agree that the agent guarantees the result expected by the principal; in that case, the contract for mandate is a contract for works by type. If the agent is under a duty of care, the standard of care is determined according to LOA § 620 (as a default rule). It distinguishes between the professional and the non-professional service provider. Generally, the service provider (the agent) is obliged to perform the services to the maximum benefit of the principal in the light of and according to the agent's best knowledge and abilities and must prevent any damage to the property of the principal (subjective standard). The service provider who is a professional is obliged to apply the generally recognised skills of the relevant profession (objective standard).

7. In FINLAND the agent is under a duty of care during the whole performance but, unless otherwise agreed, is not under a duty to guarantee the result expected by the principal. The standard of care varies. It depends, among other things, on such factors as the area of activity in question, the professional character of the agent's activities, etc. The standard is usually highest in consumer agreements. In certain areas of activity the standard has been specified in regulations, e.g. for lawyers (CConduct), estate agents (REstateAA) and commercial agents (Commercial Agents and Salesmen Act). The duty of care cannot be set aside.

8. In FRANCE depending on the situation, the agent may be subject to an obligation of means or may be obliged to achieve a specific result. This will depend on the nature of the conditions affecting the success of the agency. Where the agent is subject to an obligation of means, the judge will require reasonable performance of the normally prudent and diligent agent, without taking account of the specific personal capacities of the agent. Where the agent has not reasonably performed the contract, the agent will be liable to the principal.

9. The agent is required to exercise due care under the general rule of GERMAN CC § 276. Liability thus occurs when the agent has breached this standard of care intentionally or negligently (CC § 276(1)).

10. In GREECE in the case of a contract of mandate, the agent is obliged to a diligent performance of the mandate. According to CC art. 714, an agent is responsible for any fault, which means that the agent is also liable for every kind of negligence. The required standard of care is found in CC art. 330: 'A debtor shall be responsible for any default in the performance of his obligation resulting from fraud or negligence imputable to the debtor or to his legal agent. There is negligence when the care required in the carrying out of business was not furnished'. In the case of brokerage or intermediation, good faith requires a diligent performance of the brokerage contract (CC art. 288). The broker is not under a duty to guarantee the result expected by the principal.

11. In HUNGARY, the agent is not normally under a duty to guarantee the result expected by the principal, because CC art. 478(2) establishes that '[t]he agent shall be entitled to demand remuneration even if his actions brought no results'. Contrary to the general rules, in the case of a commission agent, '[t]he commission agent shall be responsible to the principal for performance of all of the obligations that are undertaken by his contracting partner in the contract' (CC art. 509(2)). CC art. 511(1) sets forth that '[t]he commission agent shall be entitled to receive a commission only if the sales contract has been performed'. The general rules of the law of obligations determine the standard of care, especially CC art. 277(4): '[t]he obligor shall act to perform the contract in the manner that can generally be expected in the given situation, while the obligee shall promote performance in the same manner.'

12. In IRELAND as a default rule, all agents are required to act with reasonable care. (This is one of the duties which arise at common law). Where the agency is contractual, a term to exercise reasonable care will normally be implied in the contract, at common law. Where services are provided in the course of a business, a term to exercise reasonable care is implied by statute (Sale of Goods and Supply of Services Act 1980, s.39). Where the agency is non-contractual, the duty to exercise reasonable skill and care arises in tort only. Hence, a contractual agent may be subject to concurrent duties in contract and tort unless either is modified or excluded by the contract. It appears that an agent's contractual and tortious duty of care can be limited or excluded by the agency contract. However, clear words are needed to exclude liability for negligence. The standard of care required is what is reasonable in the circumstances. This will vary depending on the particular facts of the case. In general, the supplier of services, such as agency services, is expected to exercise 'the ordinary skill of an ordinary competent man exercising that particular art'. Where a supplier of a service claims any particular skill, expertise or specialism, that claim may raise the standard of care expected of the service provider. There are various authorities illustrating what is reasonable in a particular trade or profession, in particular circumstances. For example, it has been held that the general duty owed by a solicitor to the client is to show the degree of care to be expected in the circumstances from a reasonably careful and skilful solicitor (Roche v Peilow [1986] ILRM 189 per Henchy J at 196-7). Usually a solicitor will meet this standard if the solicitor follows a common practice among the members of the profession (Daniels v Heskin [1954] IR 73). But where the common practice has inherent defects, which ought to be obvious to any person giving the matter due consideration, the fact that the practice is shown to have been widely and generally adopted does not make the practice any the less negligent (O'Donovan v Cork County Council [1967] IR 173 at 193). The standard of reasonable care may be lower where the agency is gratuitous, though not necessarily (Chaudrhy v Prabakhar [1988] 3 All ER 718).

13. In ITALY as a default rule, the agent has a duty of care towards the principal. The agent has to act in the principal's best interest and try to meet the principal's expectations with respect to the prospective contract. The agent does not have a duty to guarantee a specific result and accordingly cannot be held liable for non-performance when the activity turns out to be unsuccessful or when the contract turns out not to be a beneficial one. The required standard of care is due diligence or reasonable care. Whether or not the agent acted diligently has to be established on a case-to-case basis having regard to the specific circumstances, and depending on whether or not the agent is a professional (in the latter case the standard of care is higher). See Cass., 23 Dec 2003, no. 19778, Mass. Foro Italiano, 2003, 4070, no. 19; Cass., 08 Aug 2003, no. 11961, Mass. Foro Italiano, 2003, 4070, no. 20; and Cass., 25 Feb 2000, no. 2149, Mass. Foro Italiano, 2000, 4070, no. 9.

14. In the NETHERLANDS generally, the agent is to observe due care (CC art. 7:401). For instance, the agent is required to obey timely and well considered directions of the principal regarding the assignment (CC art. 7:402(1)) and keep the principal informed of activities regarding the performance of the service (CC art. 7:403(1)). Furthermore, the agent is accountable to the principal regarding the performance of the assigned task (CC art. 7:403(2)) (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 14). If the agent is, or purports to be, a member of a group of professional agents, the agent must exercise the care and skill of 'a reasonably competent and reasonably acting member of this group' and if a relevant authority has set standards for such a group of agents, the agent must exercise the care and skill expressed in these standards (Asser-Kortmann, 5-III, nr 60).

15. The agent is required to exercise due care under the general rule of POLISH CC art. 355. The professional agent is expected to act with the skill, knowledge and care that may reasonably be expected from professionals (art. 355(2)).

16. In SCOTLAND the agent's normal duty of care has traditionally been described as similar to that of 'a prudent man in managing his own affairs' (Erskine, III,3,37; Bell, Commentaries I[7], 516; Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], no. 221). This can be contrasted with the lower duty which applies to a gratuitous agent, who need only show reasonable care (Kay v. Simpson (1801) Hume 328; Grierson v. Muir (1802) Hume 329). The standard is, however, higher in the case of a professional agent. Such an agent must meet the standard of a reasonably careful and competent member of that profession (Cooke v Falconer's Agents (1850) 13 D 157, per Lord Fullerton at 172; Beattie v. Furness-Houlder Insurance (Northern) Ltd 1976 SLT (Notes) 60. In the case of solicitors see Rennie, nos. 3.02 et seq.). The agent's duty of care may vary depending upon the particular trade or activity in question, on a prior course of dealing between the parties, or on the circumstances of the case (Hastie v Campbell (1857) 19 D 557 per Lord President McNeill at 561, and per Lord Curriehill at 564 and 565; Alexander Turnbull & Co v. Cruikshank and Fairweather (1905) 7 F 101). The conduct of the principal is also relevant to the agent's duty of care. Delay by the principal or the giving of defective instructions may mean that the principal loses the right to sue the agent (Mackenzie v. Blakeney (1879) 6 R 1329). The principal may also be required to reimburse the agent for any expenses incurred by the agent as a result of the principal's actions (Dougall v. National Bank of Scotland (1892) 20 R 8). Only agents acting as del credere agents guarantee the result expected by the principal. This is thought to be relatively rare (see Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], no. 286; Lloyd's Exrs v. Wright (1870) 7 SLR 216). In the normal case, agents do not give such guarantees.

17. In SLOVAKIA in civil relations, the standard of care is determined as "a duty to act according to the agent's ability and knowledge." In commercial relations, the agent is bound to proceed with professional care when arranging a certain matter on the principal's behalf (Ccom § 567(1)) and the commission agent is bound to negotiate the principal's affairs with professional care in accordance with the principal's instructions (Ccom § 578).

18. In SPAIN the diligence expected from an agent is the diligence of the bonus paterfamilias (CC art. 1104). The level of diligence is to be determined in each case according to the particular circumstances: the nature of the affair, the skill required by commercial and professional usages, simple rules of prudence, and so on (CC arts. 1719 CC and Ccom 255). The agent typically has an obligation of means (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII[2], 472).

19. In SWEDEN the agent has a general duty of care, based on general contract law rules, during the performance of the commission. The duty also includes a duty to conclude the task within a reasonable period of time. The duty of care depends on the character of the commission and the mandate contract. One can distinguish a difference between the requirements of the work in its entirety and the responsibility for specific measures. Regarding work in its entirety the principal can only claim non-performance when the work considerably deviates from the standard which can be expected. The requirements for specific measures on the other hand are often high. In particular this concerns measures regulated by law such as observance of time limits or to examine public registers when this is called for. Also, high requirements apply on accuracy as regards information based on facts provided by the agent. If the agent is a professional the duty of care is higher. A professional agent is required to timeously inform the principal about important issues and also to make sure the principal understands and is able to evaluate the information. The agent is also required to act in accordance with good business practice when applicable. See HB 18:1, KommL § 7 and HaL § 5.

Section 2: Consequences of acting beyond mandate

IV.D.–3:201: Acting beyond mandate

(1) The agent may act in a way not covered by the mandate if:

(a) the agent has reasonable ground for so acting on behalf of the principal;

(b) the agent does not have a reasonable opportunity to discover the principal's wishes in the particular circumstances; and

(c) the agent does not know and could not reasonably be expected to know that the act in the particular circumstances is against the principal's wishes.

(2) An act within paragraph (1) has the same consequences as between the agent and the principal as an act covered by the mandate.

COMMENTS

A. General introduction to Section

This Section does not deal with the external consequences of the fact that the agent has acted beyond the mandate. Whether or not a contract with a third party has been concluded by the agent by acting beyond the mandate, is determined by Book II, Chapter 6 (Representation). Nor does it deal with the question whether the principal may avoid being bound to the prospective contract by a timely limitation or revocation of the authority of the agent. That, too, is governed by Book II, Chapter 6 (Representation). This Section, as has already been made clear by IV.D.–1:101 (Scope) paragraph (4), deals only with the internal consequences of an acting by the agent beyond the scope of the mandate. Where the agent does so act, a prospective contract with the third party may or may not be valid, as there may have been (apparent) authority under Book II, Chapter 6 (Representation). In the internal relationship between the agent and the principal, however, the fact that the agent has acted beyond the mandate will normally imply that the agent has failed to perform the contractual obligations towards the principal and will therefore be liable for the non-performance, unless this Section provides otherwise.

B. General idea of Article

Normally, as has been seen, the agent must act in accordance with the mandate, i.e. the authorisation and instruction given by the principal. If the agent acts outside the boundaries determined by the principal, then the agent is normally liable for non-performance of the contractual obligations. Hence, in the event of new developments the agent is required to contact the principal and ask for guidance. However, there may be situations in which the agent has to take immediate action in order to safeguard the interests of the principal but has no time to contact the principal. In such a case, the agent is allowed to act beyond the mandate if certain requirements are met. This is the situation regulated in the present Article.

C. Conditions for acting beyond mandate

Paragraph (1) provides that the agent may act beyond the mandate (without incurring liability for so doing) only when certain cumulative requirements are met. These requirements are meant to limit the agent's discretion to act beyond the mandate to those situations where no reasonable principal could be expected not to agree to grant permission, taking into account all the circumstances that the agent is aware of or could reasonably be expected to be aware of, including the principal's expressed or implied interests.

First, the agent needs to have a reasonable ground for acting beyond the mandate, which means in practice that the agent can only do so if this is necessary to safeguard the principal's interests, e.g. if it is necessary to accept an offer which expires before the agent is able to contact the principal. Secondly, the agent must not have a reasonable opportunity to discover the principal's wishes in the particular circumstances. Finally the agent must not know that the act in the particular circumstances is against the principal's wishes (or be in a situation where such knowledge could reasonably be expected).

D. Relation to benevolent intervention

The present Article starts from the idea that if the agent complies with the criteria which would allow action to be taken as a benevolent intervener - in which no contractual relationship exists - under the rules of V.–3:106 (Authority of intervener to act as representative of the principal), then the agent is also deemed to be in a situation in which acting beyond the mandate is permissible. Accordingly the conditions that the agent has to meet in order to be able to act beyond the mandate are basically the same as are required under Book V to act as a benevolent intervener (see V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another)). These are as follows. (a) The benevolent intervener has reasonable ground for acting on behalf of the principal. (b) The benevolent intervener does not have a reasonable opportunity to discover the principal's wishes. (c). The benevolent intervener does not know and could not to know that the intervention is against the principal's wishes. If these requirements are met, under V.–3:106 (Authority of intervener to act as representative of the principal) the benevolent intervener may conclude a contract or otherwise affect the legal relations of the principal.

Obviously, the third requirement will cause some difficulty when applied to mandate relationships, as the principal may argue that the agent ought to have known that the intervention is against the principal's wishes, as the mandate granted to the agent itself indicates that the principal does not want the agent to go any further. However, this may not always be true. Especially when unforeseen circumstances manifest themselves, a situation may arise which the parties had not taken into consideration when the power was granted. In such a situation, the agent may need to exceed the mandate in order to achieve the result as indicated in the mandate contract.

E. Obligation to act beyond mandate not regulated

The question whether or not the agent may be required to act beyond mandate is not regulated in this Article. Whether or not that is the case, must be determined from IV.D.–3:102 (Obligation to act in interests of principal) and IV.D.–3:103 (Obligation of skill and care).

NOTES

Exceeding mandate allowed in certain circumstances?

1. In AUSTRIA the agent is not allowed to exceed the authority granted even if this seems to be in the interest of the principal (Strasser, § 1016 Rz 23a).

2. The BELGIAN CC art. 1989 provides that the agent may not exceed the limits of the authority granted. (See Wéry, Le mandat, 145). If the agent exceeds the limits of authority, there may be liability for non-performance of a contractual obligation. To exceed the limits of authority in itself is nevertheless not sufficient to hold the agent contractually liable. The principal must prove the existence of loss and causality. Often the principal will not suffer any loss, because the principal is not bound by the contract concluded by the agent with the third party in the case of an unauthorised performance (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 406-407; Wéry, Le mandat, 145). However, the obligation to respect the limits of authority is not absolute. The agent is allowed to perform all acts necessarily related to the entrusted mission, with the exception of acts of disposing. Those acts are considered to be part of the mission (CFI Brussels Feb 1990, RRD 1990, 517; Jassogne, 608; Kluyskens, 631; Wéry, Le mandat, 145). In some cases the agent even has the duty to perform acts of this kind (CFI Brugge 6 Jul 1874, BJ 1874, 1307; Wéry, Le mandat, 145).

3. In BULGARIA as a general rule, the agent must perform within the limits of the mandate determined by the principal or be liable for any loss incurred as a result of the deviation (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 24). Nevertheless, the agent is allowed to exceed the limits of the mandate under two conditions: first, the deviation is necessary for the protection of the principal's interests, and second, it is impossible to obtain the principal's consent (LOA art. 282). The agent bears the burden of proving the existence of these conditions (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 24). Special provisions exist for the commission agent: if the agent has bought goods for a higher price or sold goods for a lower price than stipulated, the principal must immediately be informed, and if the latter does not reject the prospective contract immediately, it is presumed to be ratified (Ccom art. 351(2)). The principal may not reject the prospective contract if the commission agent bears the price difference (Ccom art. 351(3)) or proves that it was impossible to contract under the stipulated price conditions and that the action taken has prevented the principal from significant loss by contracting for a different price (Ccom art. 351 (4)).

4. In DENMARK the agent is liable for non-performance if the agent exceeds the limits of the authority granted. According to Danish law there is little room for the agent to exceed the mandate even if this seems to be in the interest of his principal.

5. In ENGLAND the agent will be liable for damages for exceeding the limits of the authority granted. This is because one of the first fiduciary duties of the agent is to perform under the terms of the contract and not exceed the authority (Turpin v Bilton (1843) 5 Man & G 455). This general rule is very strictly applied by the courts: provided that the instructions are clear and unambiguous, the agent must follow them to the letter or be liable for damages (Volkers v Midland Doherty Ltd (1985) 17 DLR (4^{th}) 343). The agent is not entitled or required to exceed the authority even if such an action is perceived to be in the principal's best interests (Fray v Voules ((1859) 1 E&E 839). However, the strictness of the rules can be mitigated. If the authority granted allows this, the agent can exercise a certain discretion (e.g. Re Newen ([1903] 1 Ch 812)).

6. In ESTONIA as a general rule, the agent is liable for non-performance if the limits of the mandate are exceeded. However, the agent is allowed and in certain circumstances even obliged to deviate from the instructions of the principal if this is perceived to be in the best interests of the principal. This is the case if adherence to the instructions would be likely to cause unfavourable consequences for the principal (LOA § 621(3)). In such cases, the agent must inform the principal and wait for further instructions as a rule. The agent is only entitled to deviate from the instructions without consulting the principal if the circumstances do not allow for delay (LOA § 621(2)-(3)).

7. In FINLAND the agent is liable for non-performance if the limits of the mandate are exceeded. In general, this applies even when it is in the interests of the principal. However, if exceeding the authority is clearly necessary to protect the interests of principal, the agent is, in general, allowed to exceed the authority granted (Ccom § 18:10).

8. In FRANCE the agent is not authorised to exceed the limits of the authority granted, even if this seems to be in the interest of the principal and even in case of emergency. However, the principal may ratify the agent's acts.

9. In GERMANY the agent may exceed the limits of the mandate if this is perceived to be in the interest of the principal and if it could be assumed that the principal would tolerate this step if aware of the circumstances. The agent is required to inform the principal about the impending acts in excess of authority, unless hesitation might result in danger (CC § 665).

10. In the case of a mandate contract in GREEK LAW an agent may deviate from the limits set in the mandate only if it is impossible to notify the principal and obvious that the principal would have allowed the deviation if aware of the circumstances that prompted such deviation (CC art. 717). The agent must prove that these requirements exist. Exceptionally, good faith (CC art. 288) may require the agent to exceed the limits of authority if the principal would have permitted or imposed such a deviation from the limits set in the mandate (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 717 GREEK CC nr. 4). In case of an unjustified deviation from the limits set in the mandate the principal can claim damages due to a defective performance of the mandate on the part of the agent (CC art. 714). However, the principal has the discretionary power to approve the unjustified deviation from the limits of authority set in mandate (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 717 GREEK CC nr. 5).

11. In HUNGARY if the agent exceeds the limits of authority, this is normally a kind of non-performance and the agent will normally be liable for any loss resulting from the non-performance. CC art. 477(2) provides that '[t]he agent shall be entitled to depart from the principal's instructions only if it is essential for the principal's interest and if there is no time to notify the principal in advance. In such a case the principal shall be notified without delay'. In the internal relationship, if the agent exceeds the limits of the authority granted, this might sometimes be considered as a case of benevolent intervention according to CC art. 484, which sets forth that '[a] person proceeding in a matter on behalf of another person without being authorised thereto by agency or otherwise shall be obliged to handle the matter as required by the interest and probable intent of the person in whose favour he has intervened'.

12. In IRELAND an agent must obey the principal's lawful instructions. Where the agency is contractual, the agent is liable for breach of contract for failings to act as instructed. Therefore, an agent must follow, but not exceed, the limits of the authority. Where an agent exceeds the authority this can be remedied where the principal later ratifies the agent's conduct (in which case the agent is treated as if was authorised in the first place). Alternatively, where an agent exceeds the authority this can be remedied under the doctrine of agency of necessity, which is rather similar to benevolent intervention. Under this doctrine a person may have authority to act on behalf of another in certain cases if faced with an emergency in which the property or interests of that other person are in imminent jeopardy and it becomes necessary, in order to preserve the property or interests, so to act. Agency of necessity can operate to extend an agent's authority or to give authority to someone not already an agent. There are four preconditions for agency of necessity to arise: (1) it must be shown that A could not get instructions from P; (2) A must have acted in P's interests and bona fide; (3) A's actions must be reasonable; and (4) there must have been some necessity or emergency which caused A to act as he did. The traditional example of an agent of necessity is the master of a ship who acts in an emergency to save the ship or the cargo (Hawtayne v Bourne [1841] 7 M&W 595 at 599, per Parke B). Developments in modern communications mean that the first requirement will rarely be satisfied (see The Choko Star [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep 42; and Surrey Breakdown Ltd v Knight [1999] RTR 84). Therefore, the doctrine is of limited application today. Where the requirements for creation of agency of necessity are fulfilled, two consequences follow. First, the agent has power to bind the principal to transactions entered into with third parties, and secondly, the relationship of principal and agent is constituted between the principal and the agent if it did not already exist, so that the agent is entitled to the rights of an agent.

13. In ITALY, the agent may not exceed the limits of the authority granted. With respect to the internal relationship between the agent and the principal, if the agent exceeds the limits of authority this may or may not constitute a breach of contract depending on the specific circumstances of the case. In some cases this behaviour could satisfy the best interests of the principal, e.g. in the case of new circumstances which were unknown and unforeseeable by the principal at the time the authority was granted, provided that these cannot be reported to the principal for instructions, and provided that it can reasonably be held that the principal, if aware of the circumstances, would have granted a wider authority to the agent. The agent is then allowed to exceed the limits of authority and may even be required to exceed them. However, in most cases exceeding the limits of authority amounts to a breach of contract.

14. In the NETHERLANDS there is no special rule on the question whether an act of the agent not covered by the mandate may nevertheless be regarded as covered. Dutch law leaves the answer to this question to the requirements of reasonableness and equity (CC, art. 6:248).

15. In POLAND the agent may act contrary to the way the mandate was agreed to be carried out if (1) contacting the principal is not possible and (2) considering the circumstances it is reasonable to believe the principal would have agreed to the different performance. If those conditions are not met, the principal may still approve a contract in excess of the limits of authority. The agent is liable for all the loss caused to the principal under the normal rules on contractual liability (CC art. 471).

16. In SCOTLAND the agent will be liable to the principal for breach of the agency contract if the agent exceeds the authority granted. There is no general rule which allows the agent to exceed authority if this is perceived to be in the interests of the principal.

17. In SLOVAKIA the situation where an agent exceeds authority is not specifically regulated for the internal relationship; the general rules on liability for loss caused by non-performance of a contractual obligation should be applied.

18. SPANISH law does not generally allow the agent to exceed the limits of the mandate (CC arts. 1714 and Ccom 256). The principal is not bound to the third party where those limits are exceeded, whether or not the third party was aware of that (CC art. 1727).

19. In SWEDEN the agent is liable for non-performance if the agent exceeds the limits of authority. If required by the circumstances, the agent has a duty to deviate from the limits of authority and act as is necessary considering the circumstances. The agent should seek the principal's instructions prior to such deviation unless the matter is of immediate urgency. See AvtL 25 § and KommL § 8.

IV.D.–3:202: Consequences of ratification

Where, in circumstances not covered by the preceding Article, an agent has acted beyond the mandate in concluding a contract on behalf of the principal, ratification of that contract by the principal absolves the agent from liability to the principal, unless the principal without undue delay after ratification notifies the agent that the principal reserves remedies for the non-performance by the agent.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Under the preceding Article, the agent may under strict conditions act beyond the mandate. Where not allowed to do so, the agent may be liable for non-performance of the contractual obligations.

This provision regulates the consequences as to the liability of an agent who acts beyond the mandate if the principal subsequently ratifies the contract concluded by the agent. The ratification by the principal implies that the liability of the agent for having acted beyond the mandate is excluded. If the principal nevertheless wants to retain the right to exercise remedies for non-performance, this must be explicitly indicated without undue delay.

B. Conditions for acting beyond mandate not met

If the agent acts beyond the mandate in circumstances not covered by the preceding Article it may still be the case that the principal is prepared to accept the contract so concluded.

> Illustration
> A principal asks an agent to purchase from the principal's regular supplier of cheese and tomatoes 1000 kilos of cheese for a price of €750. The principal intends to use the cheese in the production of pizzas. The agent informs the supplier of these instructions. The supplier then tells the agent of a special offer available for tomatoes. The agent knows that this would normally be considered a very good deal and buys a quantity of tomatoes. To keep relations with the regular supplier smooth, the principal ratifies the contract with the supplier, even though the principal intended to buy the tomatoes from another supplier at an even lower price.

In this Article, it is assumed that the ratification does indeed indicate that the principal tolerates the agent's actions – in which case the principal would not be interested in a possible claim against the agent for acting beyond the mandate – but it is left to the principal to indicate otherwise.

C. Retention of remedies

If the principal ratifies the prospective contract even though the agent acted beyond the mandate, the liability of the agent is, in principle, excluded. In order not to burden the agent with too much uncertainty, the principal would have to notify the agent without undue delay of an intention to retain remedies for non-performance.

NOTES

Consequences of ratification of prospective contract for liability of agent

1. In BULGARIA a person in whose name a contract has been concluded without authorisation may ratify it (LOA art. 42(2)). There is no explicit rule for ratification by the principal of prospective contracts concluded and juridical acts performed beyond the mandate. In legal doctrine it is considered that the ratification absolves the agent from liability to the principal, unless the principal, explicitly or implicitly, has reserved remedies for the non-performance by the agent (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 157).
2. In ESTONIA the law does not contain a clear provision on the circumstances in which ratification of a transaction performed by the agent beyond the scope of the mandate can release the agent from liability towards the principle. This should be determined according to the specifics of the case. It can however be presumed that at least in cases where the ratification is declared to the agent this can be interpreted as a release from the liability under the mandate agreement.
3. In FRANCE there is no specific provision on this topic. The Civil Code just provides that the principal will be engaged by the contract only if the principal ratifies it (art. 1998); nothing is said about the consequences. Ancient case law considers that the agent will not be liable if the principal ratifies the prospective contract, unless the principal lets the agent know that the possibility of claiming damages is being retained (Cass.civ., 9 mai 1853, D.P. 1853 I, 293).
4. The consequences of the ratification of the prospective contract are addressed in the GERMAN CC § 684 as part of the rules on benevolent intervention. Generally, the ratification will absolve the agent from liability for having acted outside the limits of the mandate contract. It is a different question whether the ratification also absolves the agent from liability that arises not from the fact that the mandate has been exceeded, but from the fact has the agent has violated another standard of care when doing so – this depends on the interpretation of the ratifying act (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 684 no. 42.
5. In IRELAND where a principal ratifies the previously unauthorised actions of an agent, the effect is retrospective and it is as if the agent was authorised at all times.
6. There are no specific POLISH CC provisions regulating the consequences for the agent of ratification of the agent's actions by the principal.
7. In SCOTTISH law the principal's ratification of the agent's unauthorised actions binds the former in contract with the third party, with retrospective effect, binding the principal from the moment the agent entered the contract. There appears to be no case where a ratifying principal has also reserved or made a claim against the agent for resultant losses.
8. In SLOVAKIA the consequences of ratification for the internal relationship between the principal and the agent are not covered. There are no known cases dealing with this problem.
9. In SPAIN, ratification renders the agent's act binding to the principal (CC art. 1259). The law is silent as to whether the ratification also amounts to a waiver of claims based on the agent's non-performance. Probably the rule stated in the present article should apply.
10. In SWEDEN, according to general contract law rules, the principal may ratify the prospective contract if the agent has acted in excess of authority when concluding it.

Ratification does not deprive the principal of the right to hold the agent liable for breach of contract.

Section 3: Mandate normally not exclusive

IV.D.–3:301: Exclusivity not presumed

The principal is free to conclude, negotiate or facilitate the prospective contract directly or to appoint another agent to do so.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The present Article starts from the presumption that the principal remains free, despite the mandate contract with an agent, to conclude, negotiate or facilitate the prospective contract personally or to appoint another agent to do so. The parties may, however, agree otherwise by awarding the agent exclusivity.

B. Conclusion of prospective contract by principal or by another agent in case of irrevocable mandate

According to IV.D.–7:101 (Conclusion of prospective contract by principal or other agent), the conclusion of the prospective contract by the principal or another agent appointed by the principal will terminate the mandate relationship if the mandate was solely for the conclusion of a specific contract. That will have the effect of a revocation of the mandate (IV.D.–1:104 (Revocation of the mandate) paragraph (2). In the case where the agent is awarded an irrevocable mandate, this usually implies that the agent is also awarded exclusivity. This then implies that the principal may no longer conclude the prospective contract personally or by means of another agent.

This may, however, not always be the case.

> Illustration
> The successors of the former owner of a car decide that the car is to be sold for a good price. They mandate two of them to execute their decision independently of each other, agreeing that the car is to be sold for a price of more than €10,000 and that the first who sells the car accordingly receives payment of 1% of the sale price, whereas the other will not be rewarded. As one of the successors has a fickle nature and might all of a sudden change his mind, the successors decide to make both mandates irrevocable. In this case, the irrevocability is not combined with exclusivity.

It is therefore necessary to determine whether the parties to the underlying legal relationship, when agreeing on an irrevocable mandate, have intended to grant the agent exclusivity. However, this will normally be the case.

NOTES

I. Exclusivity not presumed

1. In AUSTRIA the parties to the contract for mandate can validly stipulate that the principal is not allowed to appoint another agent (CC § 1011).

2. In BULGARIA since there is no explicit rule to the contrary, exclusivity clauses are considered to be valid (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 28). For commercial agents there is a special rule: if the principal has appointed a commercial agent for a certain region, he is not allowed to authorise another one for the same territory (CA art.46(2)).

3. In BELGIUM the parties can agree to a clause by which the agent is awarded exclusivity (Wéry, Le mandat, 277-278).

4. In DENMARK the parties can validly agree that the principal is not allowed to appoint another agent. An exclusivity-clause of this character will be respected in practice and in court.

5. In ENGLAND exclusivity clauses are possible, especially for estate agents. When an estate agent is granted an exclusivity by being appointed 'sole agent', if the principal then appoints another agent who earns the commission that the first agent should have earned, then the sole agent is entitled to damages (Milsom v Bechstein (1898) 14 TLR 159).

6. In ESTONIA the parties can agree to a clause by which the agent is awarded exclusivity.

7. In FINLAND the agent may, in general, be awarded exclusivity, unless the public interest (e.g. the Competition Law) provide otherwise.

8. In FRANCE the mandate may be exclusive.

9. In GERMANY the parties can validly stipulate that the principal is not allowed to appoint another agent. Case law has applied restrictions in the field of brokerage contracts (CC § 652) containing an exclusivity clause, which are subjected to control under CC § 307(2) when contained in standard conditions.

10. In GREECE in the case of intermediation the parties can validly agree to a clause by which the broker is awarded exclusivity. According to that clause the conclusion of the contract is limited to the exclusive broker and a conclusion of the same brokerage contract with third parties is prohibited (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 703 GREEK CC nr. 21). The consequence of such a clause is that in case of breach of that contractual obligation the principal is liable in damages for loss caused to the exclusive broker by the violation of the clause of exclusivity (CFI Athens decision no. 4029/1982, EllDni 1984, 848). No specific rules of consumer protection are applicable, but if the principal in a brokerage contract can be considered as a consumer according to art. 1 of the law nr. 2251/1994 (Government Gazette A 191/16.11.1994) about consumer protection, the clause of exclusivity may fall under the notion of abusive standard clauses (art. 2; Pitsirikos, p. 35).

11. In HUNGARY the parties to the contract for representation can validly stipulate that the principal is not allowed to appoint another agent, but in this respect CC art. 207(3) applies: 'Should a person waive his rights in part or in full, such a statement cannot be broadly construed'. In case of a consumer contract, according to CC art. 207(2), '[i]f the contents of a consumer contract cannot be clearly established …, the interpretation that is more favourable to the consumer shall be authoritative'.

12. In IRELAND, in line with the principle of freedom of contract, and following Murphy, Buckley & Keogh Ltd v Pye (Ire) Ltd ([1971] IR 57), the parties can validly stipulate that an agent is awarded exclusivity.

13. In ITALY the parties to a contract for representation may validly stipulate that the principal is not allowed to appoint another agent (i.e. exclusivity clause). Indeed, it is a typical clause in most distribution contracts.

14. In the NETHERLANDS the principal is allowed to give the agent exclusivity regarding the mandate. In that case, the principal is not allowed to appoint another agent (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 13).

15. In POLAND exclusivity may be granted to the agent on the basis of freedom of contract. It will not be presumed.

16. It is possible in SCOTTISH law for the contract between the principal and the agent to stipulate that the agent is an exclusive agent. However, exclusivity is not the general rule and would require an express clause to this effect in the contract (Graham v United Turkey Red Co Ltd (1882) SC 533).

17. In SLOVAKIA the parties can validly stipulate that the principal is not allowed to appoint another agent. For the commercial representation contract, specific regulation of the exclusivity clause can be found in Ccom § 665 (exclusive commercial representation).

18. Like an agency contract subject to the SPANISH Agency Law, any kind of mandate may be agreed as exclusive

19. In SWEDEN exclusivity is not presumed but the parties can agree to an exclusivity clause.

II. Principal entitled to conclude prospective contract personally

20. In AUSTRIA apart from the possibility of an irrevocable mandate, the principal is entitled to conclude the prospective contract personally. The mandate contract does not take away this right. It is the same with commercial agents. The employment of an agent on the terms that a commission is payable on results does not deprive the principal of the freedom to take any step which results in the agent being deprived of the opportunity to earn commission, unless there is an express promise or trade custom to the contrary, or unless a promise to the contrary must be implied to give efficiency to the contract or otherwise to give effect to the intention of the parties. This can be explained on the basis that a person (the principal) is entitled to freedom of action in dealing with property and conducting business affairs. The principal can in fact revoke the granted authority at any time. It is not relevant whether the agent acted in the principal's name or in the agent's own name if the contractual relationship between indirect agent and principal is that of a mandate in terms of CC §§ 1002 et seq. If the principal concludes the prospective contract personally, the agent is entitled to a proportional part of the price, to incurred expenses and to reimbursement of any losses suffered.

21. In BELGIUM as the principal can always revoke the authority to represent, the principal is entitled to conclude the prospective contract personally. The conclusion of the contract by the principal is considered to be a tacit revocation (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 462).

22. In BULGARIA as a general rule, the authorisation of an agent to conclude a certain contract does not deprive the principal of the right to conclude the contract personally or to appoint another agent to conclude the contract; the same goes for other juridical acts (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 28). Ccom art. 46(2) provides an exception for commercial agents (see under 1). If the principal concludes the prospective contract personally, the principal thereby implicitly revokes the mandate (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 176).

23. In DENMARK a contract for representation does not deprive the principal of the right to conclude the prospective contract personally. This will apply whether the agent is entitled to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal. The agent is entitled to the price whether the agent or the principal concludes the prospective contract.

24. In ENGLAND a distinction must be made according to the type of exclusivity which has been granted. When the agent is appointed as a 'sole agent', this does not preclude the principal from negotiating the contract personally (Bentall, Horsley & Baldry v Vicary [1931] 1 KB 253). In such a case, the agent will not be entitled to commission if the principal contracts directly with the third party. When the agent is appointed as an 'exclusive agent' or the agency is described as a 'sole selling agency' (Brodie Marshall & Co (Hotel Division) v Sharer [1988] 1 EGLR 21), then the principal is prevented from selling the property personally. Should the principal nevertheless do so, the agent would still be entitled to the agreed commission (Snelgrove v Ellringham Colliery Co (1881) 45 JP 408).

25. In ESTONIA as a rule, the contract of mandate will not deprive the principal of the right to conclude the prospective contract personally. The parties may of course agree otherwise. Specific rules apply for commercial agents. LOA § 675(2) stipulates that if the principal has nominated an agent for a certain area or for specific clients, it is presumed that the agent has an exclusive right to conclude contracts in that area or with the clients (unless agreed otherwise in writing).

26. In FINLAND in general the mandate contract does not deprive the principal of the possibility to act personally. The parties are, however, allowed to agree that the principal is not entitled to conclude a prospective contract. This may also follow from exclusivity of the agent's mandate.

27. In FRANCE granting an agency does not, in principle, deprive the principal of the right to enter into the envisaged contract directly and personally, whether the agent is to act in the name of the principal or in the agent's own name. If the contract is directly entered into by the principal, the agent will be entitled to repayment of expenses incurred up to that date. As regards the envisaged remuneration, this is not due, in principle, where the mandate has not been fulfilled, e.g. where the contract has not been concluded for any reason independent of the wishes of the parties (Cass. com., 21 Dec 1981, Bull. Civ. IV no. 450). The situation will be different where the contract is not concluded due to the attitude of the principal and where the agent has sufficiently performed the contract. Thus, an estate agent will be entitled to remuneration if the contract has been entered into between the principal and a third party introduced by the agent (Cass. 1ère civ., 17 Nov 1993, Bull. civ. I no. 323).

28. GERMAN courts have held that it is impossible to grant an authority which excludes conclusion of contracts by the principal (BGHZ 3, 358; BGHZ 20, 364), and the literature agrees (Schramm, § 167 para. 114). Therefore, even in the case of an exclusivity clause, the principal may still conclude the prospective contract personally. If the principal does so, under a brokerage contract the agent is entitled to a price when the contract is concluded due to the service rendered by the broker (CC § 652(1)).

29. In GREECE in case of a mandate contract the principal is not deprived of the right to conclude the prospective contract personally (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Doris, Art. 211 GREEK CC nr. 11). In this respect it is irrelevant whether the agent is entitled to act in the agent's name or in the name of the principal. If the principal concludes the contract the question whether the agent is entitled to the price depends on the internal relationship on which the mandate is based. In case of a true mandate contract that question does not arise at all due to the gratuitous character of mandate. In case of intermediation the principal also has the right to conclude the contract without the intervention of the broker (CA Athens decision no. 12896/1988, NoV 1989, 1226). In such a case the broker is not entitled to payment according to CC art. 703 which obliges the principal to pay remuneration only if the contract was concluded as a result of the broker's intervention or indication (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Doris, Art. 703 GREEK CC nr. 21). If an irrevocable mandate has been granted it is accepted that the person represented is still entitled to conclude the prospective contract or to execute the prospective other juridical act personally because irrevocability does not mean exclusivity (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Doris, Art. 218-221 GCC nr. 13).

30. In HUNGARY if the principal did not expressly renounce the right to conclude the prospective contract personally (without the intervention of the agent), the principal is entitled to do so. In general, according to CC art. 478(2), '[t[he agent shall be entitled to demand remuneration even if his actions brought no results.' For this reason, the price is due to the agent irrespective of who concluded the prospective contract effectively.

31. In IRELAND whether the principal is entitled to conclude the prospective contract personally depends on the nature of the agency contract and, in particular, the terms of the agent's appointment. For example, in Murphy, Buckley & Keogh Ltd v Pye (Ire) Ltd [1971] IR 57, the seller of a factory appointed auctioneers as 'sole agents' in the sale. However, the seller arranged a sale without telling the auctioneers. The auctioneers claimed a commission but lost in the High Court. It was held that although the auctioneers were the sole agents this did not prevent the seller from effecting a sale personally, merely from appointing any other agents. Hence, where an agent is appointed 'sole agent' to effect a contract, the principal commits a breach if a second agent is appointed; if the second agent then concludes a contract, the first agent would be entitled to damages, equal to the amount of commission lost, for breach of that term (Bentall, Horsley and Baldry v Vicary [1931] 1 KB 253). Moreover, it has been held that where an agent is appointed with 'the sole right to sell', the principal is in breach of contract if the principal sells in person (Brodie Marshall & Co v Sharer [1988] 19 EG 129).

32. The possibility for the principal to conclude the prospective contract directly is expressly recognised in ITALIAN CC art. 1748(2): 'The commission is due also for the transactions entered into by the principal with third parties that the agent had previously acquired as principals for transactions of the same kind or pertaining to the area or category or group of principals reserved to the agent, unless otherwise agreed'. Accordingly, even if the contract grants an exclusive right to the agent, the principal keeps the right to conclude the affairs in the relevant geographical area; however the agent keeps the right to receive the full price agreed under the contract without any reduction. Also the fact that the contract is irrevocable does not affect the fact that the principal is entitled to conclude the prospective contract personally. The irrevocability does not imply that the principal renounces the right to act directly to conclude the contract. This may be inferred from the text of CC art. 1724 which provides that '[t]he appointment of a new mandatory for the same transaction, or the completion of the transaction by the principal, implies a revocation of the mandate and takes effect from the day on which the agent has been notified thereof'.

33. In the NETHERLANDS though the principal remains free vis-à-vis third parties to conclude the contract personally (cf HR 29 September 1989, NJ 1990, 307 and CC art. 7:423(1)) for an exception), the parties to a mandate contract may stipulate that such an act constitutes a breach of contract within their internal relationship.

34. In POLAND the principal retains the right to conclude the contract personally even if exclusivity is granted, since one may not limit one's own legal capacity to conclude contracts and if the contracts concluded by the principal were to be void, it would endanger third parties' interests. However, breach of an exclusivity clause would be a breach of contract and would entitle the agent to a claim for damages.

35. In SCOTTISH law the grant of authority to an agent does not involve the divesting or limitation by the principal of any legal capacity or freedom to act. As a result, the principal would remain entitled to conclude a contract personally notwithstanding the authorisation of the agent to carry out that task. It makes no difference to the answer to this question whether the agent acts in the name of the principal or in the agent's own name. Whether the agent would remain entitled to a price might depend on the factual scenario. If the agent was unaware that the principal had concluded such a contract, and had expended efforts concluding a contract, for example, for the same goods from another source, there would be no reason why the agent would not be entitled to a fee in the normal way. The fee might take the form of commission on the contract which the agent had concluded on the principal's behalf, unaware that the principal had already bought other goods. Alternatively, if the agent was either made aware by the principal that a contract had already been concluded, or became aware that this was the case, the agent might be prevented from concluding a contract, and thus from earning either fee or commission. Depending upon the terms of the contract between the principal and the agent, this might constitute a breach on the part of the principal, for which the agent could claim damages. The applicable measure of damages would be the expectation interest, or the net profit which the agent would have expected to gain from proper performance of the contractual obligations.

36. In SLOVAKIA the mandate contract does not deprive the principal of the right to conclude the prospective contract personally.

37. In SPAIN the principal can always revoke the authority to represent, being therefore entitled to conclude the prospective contract personally. The conclusion of the contract by the principal is considered to be a tacit revocation (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Gordillo Cañas), Código Civil II, 1589)

38. In SWEDEN a mandate contract does not deprive the principal of the right to conclude the prospective contract personally (Adlercreutz, 203).

III. Exclusivity clause allowed, but no effect on validity of prospective contract in case of breach by principal

39. In AUSTRIA if the principal is in principle entitled to conclude the prospective contract personally, the parties can validly stipulate that the principal is not allowed to do so. Such a stipulation would make the principal liable for damages but would not deprive the principal of the possibility to transact with a third party.

40. In BELGIUM the parties to the contract for representation can validly stipulate that the principal is not allowed to conclude the prospective contract personally, by inserting a clause of irrevocability (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 463). If the clause only aims to award the agent an indemnification, the principal can still conclude the prospective contract. The clause obliges the principal only to indemnify the agent, e.g. by paying the agreed remuneration. If the clause, on the contrary, aims to deprive the principal of the right to conclude the contract, the principal can no longer conclude the contract personally (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 463; Foriers, 90; Wagemans, 193).

41. In BULGARIA the parties are free to stipulate that the principal is prohibited from concluding the prospective contract personally. If the principal nevertheless concludes the prospective contract, this constitutes a breach of the mandate contract and the principal is liable for the loss suffered by the agent (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 28). Apart from this compensation, as the conclusion of the prospective contract under such circumstances is considered to be an implicit revocation of the mandate contract, the agent is entitled to receive stipulated remuneration and reimbursement of expenses incurred (LOA art. 288).

42. In DENMARK the parties to the contract for representation can validly agree to a clause according to which the principal is not allowed to conclude the prospective contract personally. According to the Danish Act on Estate Agents the parties can agree to a clause according to which the agent is entitled to the price even if the principal concludes the contract directly with a third party presented by the agent.

43. In ENGLAND whether the principal is entitled to conclude the prospective contract personally or not depends on the type of exclusivity that the agent has been given in the agency contract. In addition, it is thought that outside such exclusive agency, it is still possible for provisions to be made in the contract that commission is payable when the principal concludes the prospective contract personally (Tredinnick v Browne (1921) cited in Bentall, Horsley & Baldry v Vicary.

44. In ESTONIA the parties can validly stipulate that the principal is not allowed to conclude the prospective contract personally.

45. In FINLAND the parties are allowed to agree that the principal is not entitled to conclude a prospective contract. This may also follow from exclusivity of the agent's mandate.

46. In FRANCE the parties may decide to prevent the principal from entering into the envisaged contract personally, but such prohibition will not affect the validity of the contract entered into. The parties are not only free to provide that the remuneration of the agent will be due (this is a standard clause in contracts with French estate agents), but they may go further by providing for liquidated damages (except where there is a specific legal prohibition: see the Decree of 20 Jul 1972, art. 76 applicable to estate agents).

47. In GERMANY if the principal concludes the prospective contract although an exclusivity clause provides otherwise, this does not affect the validity of the contract concluded, as it is legally impossible to grant an authority which excludes conclusion of contracts by the principal (BGHZ 3, 358; BGHZ 20, 364; Schramm, in: Münchener Kommentar zum BGB[5], § 167 no. 114). In the case of brokerage contracts, if the principal concludes the contract personally with a third party presented by the agent, the agent is entitled to the price (CC § 652(1)).

48. In GREECE in case of intermediation the parties can validly stipulate that the broker is awarded exclusivity with regard to the conclusion of the contract. In such a case the principal does not have the right to conclude the contract personally. If the principal violates that clause of exclusivity it is considered in such a case that the contract is concluded due to the intervention of the broker (fictitious causality between intervention and conclusion of the contract) and the principal is obliged to pay remuneration (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 703 GREEK CC nr. 21).

49. In HUNGARY if the principal is in principle entitled to conclude the prospective contract personally, the parties to the contract for representation can validly stipulate that the principal is not allowed to do so (i.e. the parties agree to a clause by which the agent is awarded exclusivity in this respect).

50. In IRELAND whether the principal is entitled to conclude the prospective contract personally or not depends on the type of exclusivity that the agent has been given in the contract.

51. In ITALY according to the principles of freedom of contract and party autonomy, the parties may agree upon any clause they deem fit, provided that it is not in conflict with mandatory rules and is not contra bonos mores. In the exercise of party autonomy it cannot be excluded that the parties validly stipulate that the principal is not allowed to conclude the prospective contract personally.

52. In the NETHERLANDS the contracting parties seem to be allowed to agree upon a clause in the contract according to which the principal is not allowed to conclude the prospective contract personally (CC art. 7:423(1)). See also Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3098.

53. In POLAND even if the parties have agreed in the mandate contract that the agent will be granted exclusivity, the contract concluded by the principal will not be void. However, the principal will be liable for the breach of the mandate contract.

54. In SCOTLAND it would be open to the principal and the agent to insert a clause in the contract which would bind the principal not to conclude the contract personally. Should the principal breach this clause, the principal would be liable to the agent in damages. The contract concluded by the principal with the third party in breach of this clause would, however, be valid.

55. In SLOVAKIA the parties can validly stipulate that the principal is not allowed to conclude the contract personally. Such a stipulation would make the principal liable for damages if it were breached but would not prevent the conclusion of a valid contract with a third party.

56. In SPAIN the parties may decide to prevent the principal from entering into the envisaged contract personally, both by stipulating an exclusivity clause or by rendering the mandate irrevocable, but such prohibitions will not affect the validity of the contract entered into. Normal remedies for non-performance apply.

57. In SWEDEN the parties can agree to insert a clause stipulating that the principal is not allowed to conclude the prospective contract.

IV.D.–3:302: Subcontracting

(1) The agent may subcontract the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract in whole or in part without the principal's consent, unless personal performance is required by the contract.

(2) Any subcontractor so engaged by the agent must be of adequate competence.

(3) In accordance with III.–2:106 (Performance entrusted to another) the agent remains responsible for performance.

COMMENTS

General idea

In principle, the agent may entrust the performance of the agent's obligations under the mandate contract to a third party. This Article particularises the rule in III.–2:107 (Performance by a third person), which makes performance by a third party possible unless the contract requires personal performance. When a third party is involved in the performance of the contract, the party that entrusts the performance to this third party is still responsible for the performance under III.–2:106 (Performance entrusted to another). The rules of the present Article do not change this; they merely add an obligation for the agent - to select adequately the subcontractors involved in the performance of the service. The Article is in conformity with the corresponding provisions in the Book on Service Contracts, IV.C.–2:104 (Subcontractors, tools and materials) paragraphs (1) and (2).

NOTES

I. Subcontracting allowed but agent liable for performance by subcontractor

1. In AUSTRIA an agent cannot, except with the express or implied assent of the principal, delegate the authority, and the principal will not be bound by the act or contract of a sub-agent whose appointment is not thus sanctioned (CC § 1010; Ccom § 384 (Straube (-Griss), HGB I[3], § 384, no. 4; Schütz, § 407 nos. 27-31); Ccom § 407 (Strasser, § 1009 no. 8 and § 1010 ABGB; Straube (-Griss), HGB I[3], § 384, no. 4; Schütz, § 407 no. 28; Krejci, 306f)). The normal effect of delegation is that the sub-agent is responsible to the agent; there is no privity of contract between a principal and sub-agent merely because delegation has been authorised. The agent remains liable to the principal (for non-performance and compensation) for the sub-agent's breaches of duty when the sub-agent is appointed without the principal's knowledge (Strasser, § 1010 nos. 4, 5; Koziol/Welser, 364). The agent remains liable to the principal for culpa in eligendo (for a poor choice of a sub-agent when the sub-agent is appointed with the principal's knowledge (Strasser, § 1010 no. 4; Apathy, § 1010 no. 5)). The sub-agent has no direct claim towards the principal for payment of the price.
2. In BELGIUM for the majority of the authors, subcontracting is permitted if the agency contract is silent on the issue, unless the contract is intuitu personae to a high degree (Wéry, Le mandat, 182-185). According to CC art. 1994(1), in the legal relation between the parties to the original contract for representation (i.e. the original principal and the original agent), a distinction is made depending on whether subcontracting is permitted or forbidden. The permission to subcontract can be express or implied (Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux, 612-613; Foriers, 476 and 478; Van der Perre and Lejeune, Droit commercial I, no. 117). If subcontracting is permitted, the original agent obtained authority to subcontract and can therefore choose between personal performance or a performance by another person. If the choice is to subcontract, the agent concludes a new contract for representation with the sub-agent to act in the name and on behalf of the original principal. The original agent does not guarantee the good performance by the sub-agent towards the original principal, unless in case of culpa in eligendo (choice of a clearly incapable or insolvent sub-agent). If subcontracting is forbidden, the original agent has no authority to subcontract. The original agent exceeds the limits of the authority by concluding a new contract for representation and remains liable for the sub-agent's acts. According to CC art. 1994(2), the original principal has in any case a direct claim towards the sub-agent. If subcontracting is permitted, this direct claim is based on the effect of representation. The original agent has granted authority to the sub-agent to act in the name and on behalf of the original principal; not only does the original principal have a direct claim towards the sub-agent, but also the other way around (Claeys, Samenhangende overeenkomsten en aansprakelijkheid, 281; de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 415; Foriers, 476; Laurent, 494). But there is no direct action in the technical meaning; the rules on non-invocability of defences, typical for a direct action, therefore do not apply (Foriers, 63). If subcontracting is forbidden, the authority to represent the original principal fails. The original agent has exceeded the limits of the authority by concluding a new contract for representation with the sub-agent. Therefore only a legal relation between both the agents is effected (Foriers, 478). The direct claim of the original principal cannot be based any longer on the effect of representation, but must originate from other rules of the general contract law. Some authors try to explain the direct claim by stating that the sub-agent, by accepting the subcontracting, has become a party to the original contract for representation by unilateral action of the will (Supreme Court 17 Sep 1993, Arr. Cass. 1993, 705, Pas. 1993, I, 700, RW 1993-94, 752, RHA. 1994, 23, note and TBH 1994, 533, note C. DIERYCK; Dirix, 56; Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux, 618). For other authors, the sub-agent is liable by accepting the subcontracting without checking the authority to subcontract of the original agent. The direct claim sanctions the prohibition of subcontracting (Dekkers , 720). This analysis leads to the conclusion that only the original principal has a direct claim against the sub-agent, but not the other way round (Foriers, 478).

3. In BULGARIA as a general rule, the mandate contract is considered to be intuitu personae (Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 238; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 24; Supreme Court, Judgment no. 942, 7 Apr 1978, Civil Case 2668/1977, I) and the agent has to personally perform the contractual obligations (LOA art. 283(1)). Nevertheless, subcontracting is allowed when: (a) it has been permitted by the principal; or (b) it is necessary to protect the principal's interests and without it the principal would incur damage (LOA art. 283(2)). Having appointed a subcontractor, the agent is obliged to immediately communicate this to the principal (LOA art. 283(3)). If subcontracting is allowed, the agent will only be liable for culpa in eligendo, namely for the appointment of an unskilled and an incompetent person. If subcontracting is not allowed, the agent will be liable for actions of the subcontractor in the same manner as for the agent's own actions (LOA art. 283(4); Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 25). As to direct claims of the principal towards the subcontractor and vice versa, legal doctrine considers that these are only possible if the agent acted in the name of and on behalf of the principal when subcontracting (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 134-143).

4. The main rule in DANISH law is that a contract according to which the agent has agreed to represent a principal is personal. In certain sectors, e.g. representation by lawyers or real estate agents, practical reasons may validly legitimate that an employee or a staff member of the firm to which the designated agent belongs, takes over the representation. However, the parties can validly stipulate that the agent is not allowed to appoint another agent. An exclusivity clause of this character will be respected in practice and in court. It follows that subcontracting normally will presuppose that the parties in the contract of representation have agreed upon this as a possibility. If subcontracting is allowed by the contract, but the contract is silent on whether the original agent will remain liable, the original agent will still be liable with respect to the non-performance of the obligations under the contract for representation. Unless otherwise agreed upon in the contract, the sub-agent will not have a direct claim towards the principal for payment of (a part of) the price, because the principal does not have a contractual relationship with the sub-agent.

5. In ENGLAND a contract of agency is a personal contract since the personal characteristics of a given agent are important, the general position under the fiduciary obligations is that the agent must not delegate by appointing a sub-agent unless there is express or implied authority to do so. The agent is entitled to delegate where (a) delegation is the usual practice in the trade the agent is involved in (Solley v Wood ((1852) 16 Beav 370); (b) the act delegated is purely ministerial such as digging a grave or ringing a bell (St Margaret's Rochester Burial Board v Thompson ((1871) LR 6 CP)) or giving a notice to quit (Allam & Co. Ltd. v. Europa Poster Services Ltd. [1968] 1 All ER 826); (c) the act delegated is strictly necessary (De Bussche v. Alt (1878) 8 Ch. D 286); (d) delegation is necessary due to unforeseen circumstances; (e) at the time of the creation of the agency agreement the principal was aware of the agent's intentions to delegate and the principal did not object. Even when delegation is authorised, the main agent remains liable to the principal for the acts of the sub-agent (Mackersys v Ramsays, Bonars & Co ((1843) 9 C&F 818)). To know whether the sub-agent can have a direct claim for commission against the principal raises the question of whether there is privity arising between the principal and the sub-agent. This depends on the precise facts of a given case. In general, just because the agent has authority to delegate, that does not mean that privity is created between the principal and the sub-agent. The rule nowadays is that privity between the sub-agent and the principal requires precise proof (Calico Printers' Association v Barclays Bank ((1931) 145 LT 51); de Bussche v Alt ((1878) 8 Ch D 286), where privity was created between the sub-agent and the principal, is now regarded as an exception; see also Prentis Donegan & Partners Ltd v. Leeds & Leeds Co Inc ([1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep 326 per Rix J at 334). Because there is only privity between the sub-agent and the principal in an exceptional case, none of the normal consequences of an agency relationship apply: the principal is not liable for remuneration to the sub-agent (Schmaling v Tomlinson ((1815) 6 Taunt 147)). Similarly, the principal cannot recover money from the sub-agent (Calico Printers Association v Barclays Bank Ltd ((1931) 145 LT 51, CA)). Even if there is no direct agency relationship between the sub-agent and the principal, the sub-agent may still owe a duty of care to the principal in tort under the general principles of negligence (Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd ([1994] 3 WLR 761)). Moreover, the sub-agent still owes fiduciary duties to the principal and will be liable to the principal if a secret profit is made from the position (Powell & Thomas v Evans Jones & Co[1905] 1 KB 11).

6. In ESTONIA as a default rule, it is presumed that the agent is obliged to perform the obligations in person; nevertheless, the agent is entitled to use the assistance of third parties in performing (LOA § 622). If the parties ruled out the possibility to subcontract, the agent will be liable for the acts of the sub-agent and the sub-agent does not have a direct contractual claim towards the principal. In the (rare) cases where the agent is not under a duty of care but guarantees a result, a different rule applies: it is presumed that a contractor is not required to perform the obligations arising from the contract in person (LOA § 635(3)).

7. In FINLAND in general, the agent is not allowed to have the contract performed by another party. Subcontracting is possible only when the mandate is not personal (the parties have agreed on subcontracting, or the circumstances show that the agent is entitled to subcontract). The original agent remains liable in contract towards the principal. The direct claim is generally not applicable.

8. The FRENCH CC art. 1994 allows the agent to freely appoint any other person to accomplish all or part of the mandate. No permission is required from the principal, unless the agency agreement was clearly entered into taking account of the personal nature of the agent. The agent is not, however, relieved from obligations by having recourse to a third party: where there is no authority to subcontract the obligations, the agent remains fully liable for the acts of the sub-agent. On the other hand, where the agent has been authorised to subcontract the obligations, the Civil Code will only render the agent liable towards the principle for a possible inappropriate choice of sub-agent, where the sub-agent is 'unable to perform or insolvent'. However, case law has extended the liability of the agent in the latter case towards the principal by considering that the agent, having been authorised to subcontract, remains subject to an obligation of supervision as regards the sub-agent for the proper performance of the mandate (Civ. 1ère 29 May 1980, Bull. civ. I, no. 163). The sub-agent may act directly against the principal for payment of remuneration or repayment of expenses (Civ. 1ère 27 Dec 1960, Grands arrêts de la jurisprudence civile, 11ème éd. Dalloz , no. 268), notwithstanding the fact that CC art. 1994 only provides for a direct right of action of the principal against the sub-agent. This action is possible in all cases, whether the substitution of a sub-agent has been authorised or not.

9. If the contract is a 'mandate contract' under GERMAN law (i.e. gratuitous), 'when in doubt' the agent is not allowed to subcontract (CC § 664(1)), because mandates are often based on a relationship of personal trust between the parties. Under a remunerated contract according to CC § 675(1), it is generally admissible for the agent to have the representation performed through a third person. It has, however, been held that sub-contracting under remunerated contracts is not possible in situations in which a relationship of personal trust exists (RGZ 78, 310, no. 313; BGH, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 1993, 1705.). The original agent remains liable in contract (CC § 664(1)). The sub-agent does not have a direct claim towards the principal for payment of the price, but only a claim towards the agent as the contracting partner.

10. In GREECE unless the contract provides otherwise, an agent is not entitled to substitute another in the performance of the mandate, except if forced by the circumstances or if a substitution is usual (CC art. 715). If an agent has proceeded with the substitution without being entitled to do so, the agent is responsible for faults of the substitute (CC art. 716(1)). If the agent has appointed a substitute while being entitled to do so, the agent is liable only for the faulty choice of the substitute and for the instructions given to the substitute (CC art. 716(2); Supreme Court decision no. 25/1995, EEN 1995, 158). In both cases of substitution, either permitted or not, the principal may directly bring actions against the third party which the agent has against the third party (CC art. 716(3)). From that rule it is concluded that the relationship between the principal and the agent is treated as an assignment of claims, in which the principal holds the position of the assignee and the agent the position of the assignor

11. According to HUNGARIAN CC art. 475(1), '[t]he agent shall proceed in person; he shall, however, be entitled to employ other persons if the principal has agreed thereto or if it is implied by the nature of the agency. An agent shall be liable for the persons he employs as if he himself had carried out the matter entrusted to him'. Moreover, CC art. 475(2)-(4) establish that '[t]he agent shall also be entitled to employ other persons if it is required in order to protect the principal from sustaining injury. In such cases, the agent shall not be liable for the persons employed if he is able to prove that he has acted in a manner that can generally be expected in the particular situation in respect of choosing, instructing, and supervising such persons. If the agent has not been authorised to employ other persons, he shall be liable for damages that would not have occurred without the employment of such person. If a person employed by the agent has been selected by the principal, the agent shall not be responsible for this person if he is able to prove that he has acted in a manner that can generally be expected in the particular situation with regard to instructing and supervising the person'. Because of the lack of contract between the sub-agent and the principal, the sub-agent does not have a direct claim towards the principal for payment of the price.

12. In IRELAND one of the agent's three duties which arise, at common law, is the duty to perform personally. Since an agent is often chosen for his or her personal qualities the general rule is that the agent must perform personally and cannot delegate performance (delegatus non potest delegare) unless delegation is authorised by the principal. In practice, delegation is quite common. For example, in relation to a company where the authority to act on behalf of the company is vested in the board of directors, the board usually delegates authority to individual directors, who in turn delegate to senior executives, who in turn delegate to junior executives and other employees. Accordingly, a long chain of delegation and authorisation can link the individual acts of a junior employee (such as a shop-assistant) back to the board of directors, thereby legally binding the company. Where delegation is authorised and the agent (A) employs a sub-agent (S), the agency agreement must be construed in order to determine whether the relationship of principal and agent is created between the principal (P) and S. The key is the agent's authority: is A authorised to create privity of contract between P and S? Just because the agent has authority to delegate to S, does not mean that there is authority to create privity of contract between P and S. Generally, where delegation is authorised S will be the agent of A, so that there will be no legal relationship between P and S; A will remain liable to P for performance of the duties (Lockwood v Abbey [1845] 14 Sim 437; Calico Printers' Association v Barclays Bank Ltd [1931] 145 LT 51). However, A can be authorised to create privity between P and S, as in De Bussche v Alt [1878] 8 Ch D 286, where P engaged A to sell a ship in India, China or Japan. A had no offices in Japan and so obtained P's consent to the appointment of a sub-agent, S, who had a presence in Japan. The Court of Appeal found that the delegation was authorised and that A was given express authority to create privity between P and S. In such circumstances, S has a direct contract link with P, and therefore could pursue P directly for the price, for instance.

13. In ITALY, in general terms, the agent may have the contract performed by another party, provided that certain circumstances are met. The CC art. 1717(1) provides that '[an] agent who, in the performance of the mandate, substitutes others to himself without authorisation or when not necessary for the nature of the task to be performed, is responsible for the activities of such substitute'. It is therefore not forbidden for the agent to grant authority to another (sub)agent to execute the original contract of representation. However, this is only possible if the following conditions are met: firstly, the submandate must not prejudice the principal's interests; secondly, this possibility must not be excluded by the original contract of mandate. In consideration of the specific circumstances of the case and having regard to the specific kind of activity to execute, in some cases it could also be considered necessary for the agent to appoint a subcontractor. See Supreme Court 05 Aug 2004, no. 15000, Mass. Foro italiano, 2004, 4070, no. 4; T. Roma, 20-03-2000, Giur. it., 2001, 104. In spite of the sub-mandate, the original agent remains liable for the execution of the contract vis-à-vis the principal. This means that the original agent is liable for breach of contract if the subcontractor fails to perform the mandate as a consequence of defective instructions given by the original agent (CC art. 1717(3)). As a rule, the sub-agent does not have a direct claim towards the principal for payment of the price. Indeed, the principal may not be considered in breach of contract by paying only the original agent. See Supreme Court 02 Oct 1991, no. 10263, Mass. Foro italiano, 1991, 4070, no. 11.

14. In the NETHERLANDS mandate contracts may include the agent's personal service performance (CC art. 7:404). However, the agent may be allowed to delegate (parts of) the performance of the mandate contract to a sub-agent. Such delegation is allowed if the mandate allows the agent to have others perform the mandate contract under the agent's responsibility (CC art. 7:404). In this situation, the legal act that is the subject of the mandate contract is not performed in name of the agent, nor in name of the principal. If the contracting parties have not made an explicit agreement on this delegation in the mandate contract, the mandate's nature is a decisive factor. Furthermore, reasonableness and fairness are important as well (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 15). The agent who delegates (parts of) the mandate to a sub-agent remains fully liable for the acts of this sub-agent (CC art. 6:76) if the sub-agent fails in complying with the mandate (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 16).

15. In POLAND under the contract of mandate the agent may appoint a subagent only if (a) the mandate contract allows the subagent to be appointed, (b) it is a custom to appoint a subagent for the task given by the principal and (c) the agent is forced by specific circumstances to use a subagent (CC art. 738).

16. In SCOTLAND in accordance with the maxim delegatus non potest delegare, delegation is, as a general rule, excluded (Robertson v Beatson, McLeod & Co Ltd 1908 SC 921; Knox & Robb v Scottish Garden Suburb Co Ltd 1913 SC 8721 (distinguishing Black v Cornelius (1879) 6 R 581)). This is an application of the general rule of contract law that where a contracting party has been chosen for a particular skill, the choice of that party rules out performance by another party. The general rule is subject to many exceptions (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 530) and two of the institutional writers suggested that, where the task was one which did not involve any particular skill, delegation was possible (Stair, Institutions I^{10}, 12, 7; Erskine, III,3,34). Delegation is permitted where this is consistent with practice in a particular trade (Erskine, III,3,34; Bell, Commentaries I^{7}, 517). Whether the original agent remains liable depends upon whether, in actual fact, sub-contracting has occurred or whether, instead, the new agent has merely been substituted for the old one. The latter is a form of novation, and would require the consent of the principal. If this consent has been properly obtained, the obligations of the original agent would not survive. If the consent of the principal was not obtained, then only sub-contracting would be possible. In this case, the obligations of the original agent would survive. Where novation rather than sub-contracting has occurred, the principal will have expressly agreed to be liable for the new agent's fees (Robertson v Beatson, McLeod & Co Ltd 1908 SC 921 at 928, per Lord McLaren). Where, by contrast, the principal has not consented to the delegation of the work, the original agent will be absolutely liable for the fees of the new agent (Erskine, III,3,34).

17. In SLOVAKIA the general rules for direct representation provide that the agent may grant to another person authority to act in the agent's place in the name of the principal (a) if this is expressly authorised by the terms of the power of attorney or (b) if the agent is a legal entity. The principal is directly bound by acts in law undertaken by the substitute agent. See CC § 33(a). In case of a contract for procurement of a thing, the agent has the right to procure the thing through another person in order to achieve the result (CC). In commercial relations, the agent is bound to arrange an agreed matter personally only if it is stipulated in the mandate contract (Ccom § 568). Under a commission agent contract, unless the contract provides otherwise, the agent may make use of other persons to perform the obligations arising from the contract with the principal if the agent is unable to perform these obligations personally. The agent remains liable for their performance.

18. The SPANISH CC art. 1721 allows the agent to freely appoint any other person to accomplish all or part of the mandate, unless the contract excludes this. Despite the silence of the law, there is probably another restriction where the agency agreement was clearly entered into taking account of the personal condition of the agent. The agent is not, however, relieved from obligations by virtue of sub-contracting to the third party: where there is no authority to subcontract the obligations, the agent remains fully liable for the acts of the sub-agent. On the other hand, where the agent has been authorised to subcontract the obligations, the Civil Code will only render the agent also liable towards the principal for a possible inappropriate choice of sub-agent, where the sub-agent is 'unable to perform or is insolvent'. This note does not deal with the question of a transfer of the agent's whole contractual position to another agent, with the consent of the principal, which is a different question.

19. According to SWEDISH law a person representing a client in court is not allowed to subcontract this task without specific consent from the client. The same is considered to apply regarding other commissions based on trust. However, it is to some extent considered allowed to subcontract a minor and limited part of the task without prior explicit consent from the client. In particular, this applies when the agent lacks expert knowledge or if measures are to be performed at a different locality. The agent possesses a greater freedom to perform the task in the case of company representation. If the agent has subcontracted the task or a part of it the agent still remains liable in contract for damage caused by the sub-agent's negligence.

II. Nomination by principal of specific person designated to perform the contract

20. In AUSTRIA the principal can require the agent to have the contract for mandate carried out by a specific person, if the parties agree on this. It is just a matter of construction of the contract. The principal has to make this wish known to the agent before the conclusion of the contract.

21. In BELGIUM the original principal can give permission to subcontract, with indication of the sub-agent's name.

22. In BULGARIA the principal is allowed not only to permit subcontracting, but also to specify third persons who may be appointed by the agent as subcontractors (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 135). Under the mandate contract between a law firm (the agent) and a client (the principal), the latter is entitled to ask for appointment of a particular advocate to perform the assigned legal task (BAA, art. 77(2)).

23. In DENMARK, if the parties contractually agree upon having the representation carried out by a specific person, this agreement is a valid and for the parties binding disposition. In principle, the wish to have a particular person as an agent may be communicated by means of a direction. The principal, however, must be prepared to renegotiate the contract for representation. If the principal's wish does not match the general policy of the agent, e.g. a company, the direction may legally be refused.

24. In ENGLAND the principal is free to choose a specific person for the carrying out of the work entrusted to the agent. The principal can do so provided that this wish is clearly indicated before the agency contract is created; it is probably not sufficient to communicate such a wish as a direction.

25. In ESTONIA a principal can require the agent to have the mandate carried out by a specific person. This is relevant where the agent (i.e. the agent as the party to the contract, forming an internal relationship) is a legal person (if the agent is a natural person, it is presumed that the agent has to perform in person). In case of a legal person, any employee or any other person acting permanently in the undertaking of that legal person can be nominated to perform the contract. If the principal wants a particular person to perform the contract, this wish must be made known to the agent before the conclusion of the contract.

26. In FINLAND the parties can agree that the mandate contract will be carried out by a specific person. Such agreement may also be based on mutual consensus. When this is not agreed (in advance or during the mandate period), the agent in general is not obliged to follow the principal's directions concerning the specific person who will do the work.

27. In FRANCE the principal can require that the mandate be performed by a specific person and the principal may validly prohibit expressly the agent from subcontracting or, on the contrary, appoint the sub-agent personally (CC art. 1994). In principle, such a possibility would be expressed on conclusion of the agency agreement, but it is probably possible that an agreement could be reached on this at a later stage during performance of the mandate, if clearly expressed and where this decision does not involve any difficulty or additional cost for the agent.

28. In GERMANY, if the agent is a legal person, then all the principal can demand is that this agent performs the contract and not a person outside this legal person (GERMAN CC § 664). The wish to have the representation carried out by a specific person from 'inside' the agent does not pertain to the question who performs, but how the performance has to take place. In this respect, the agent is free to decide, unless: (a) the principal has demanded handling of the matter by one specific person when concluding the contract, as in this case the obligation under the contract (CC § 662) is so defined and thus binding on the agent; (b) the principal subsequently issues a direction (CC § 665), which the agent has to follow – if the direction is unacceptable, the agent can always terminate the relationship (CC § 671(1)).

29. In GREECE the principal can require that the contract for mandate will be carried out by a specific person. It is irrelevant in this respect whether the principal has expressed such a desire before the conclusion of the contract or by means of a direction.

30. In HUNGARY there is no obstacle to a request of the principal that the contract for representation will be carried out by a specific person. Agency is imbued with intuitus personae, as is expressed in CC art. 475(1): 'The agent shall proceed in person; he shall, however, be entitled to employ other persons if the principal has agreed thereto or if it is implied by the nature of the agency'. At the moment of the conclusion of the contract for representation, the wish that the contract be carried out by a specific person can be relevant in respect of the content of the agent's consent. CC art. 205(2) establishes that '[i]t is fundamental to the validity of a contract that an agreement is reached by the parties concerning all essential issues as well as those deemed essential by either of the parties'. After the conclusion of the contract, the principal may require that the contract for representation be carried out by a specific person, but the consent of the agent is needed; a simple instruction of the principal is not enough to change the content of the contract in this respect. Usually, such problems do not occur as the principal can easily terminate the relationship at any time.

31. In IRELAND the principal can nominate a specific person to perform the contract.

32. In ITALY the principal can indicate a specific person to perform the task in substitution for the agent (or exclude this possibility outright). If the principal has not made such a wish known to the agent before the conclusion of the contract it may be communicated by means of a direction thereafter, provided that this is not in contrast with the activity already performed in good faith by the original agent. If, on the contrary, the principal authorises the substitution without specifying the person to carry out the contract of representation, the agent is entitled to choose a person and is liable towards the principal in case of fraudulent or negligent choice (culpa in eligendo). See CC art. 1710.

33. In the NETHERLANDS the principal can require that the mandate will be performed by a specific person. If so, this person is obliged to personally perform the activities under the mandate contract. See CC art. 7:404.

34. The agent is obliged to follow the principal's guidelines to both how and by whom the mandate is to be carried out (POLISH CC art. 736).

35. In SCOTLAND if the principal wanted the contract for representation to be carried out by one specific person, then it would be possible for a term to that effect to be inserted into the contract for representation. It would then become one which would fall within the general class of contracts affected by delectus personae. In other words, the choice of that one person because of a particular skill would rule out performance by another party. Given the importance of this requirement, it is likely that it would require to be inserted into the contract as a specific contractual term and that it could not be communicated by a direction only. This latter view is also supported by the fact that the exceptions to the general prohibition against delegation appear to be larger than the rule itself.

36. In SPAIN the principal can require the agent to have the mandate carried out by a specific person, if the parties agree on this. It is just a matter of construction of the contract, and it deserves no special mention.

III. Subcontracting if specific person was designated to perform the mandate contract

37. In AUSTRIA if the authority to represent has been granted to the agent with consideration to a specific person, this agent cannot, except with the express consent of the principal, delegate the authority (CC § 1010; Ccom §§ 384 and 407).

38. In BELGIUM if the authority to represent has been granted to the agent with consideration to a specific person, this would seem to be a case of implied prohibition to subcontract. Note that subcontracting is not involved if the contract for representation is executed by a 'préposé' of the agent or by an organ of a corporation-agent. The 'préposé' and the organ identify with the agent (Wéry, Le mandat, 179).

39. In BULGARIA if a specific person is designated by the principal to perform the mandate contract, the agent is not allowed to subcontract the performance to another person. If the agent nevertheless does so, the agent commits a breach of contract and may be held liable for damage caused. The agent is not liable for actions of the subcontractor designated by the principal, unless the latter has become notoriously incapable to perform after the designation (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 136).

40. In DENMARK if the contract calls for a specific person to represent the principal, this specific person is not allowed to let another person represent the principal.

41. In ENGLAND the general rule is that an agent may not delegate authority unless there is express or implied authority to do so (De Bussche v Alt (1878) 8 Ch D 286). Such authority would be difficult to imply if a specific person had been designated to perform the obligations under the contract.

42. In ESTONIA the service provider (the agent), though obliged to perform in person, or the specific person required to perform the contract by the principal, is entitled to use the assistance of third parties in performing the contract (LOA § 622). Therefore, only specific duties and not the mandate as a whole can be transferred.

43. In FINLAND, if the principal and the agent have agreed that all possible actions, whether technical in nature or not, are undertaken by a specific person, the agent is not entitled to pass any of the tasks on to another person.

44. In FRANCE if the agency agreement has been concluded based on personal qualities of the agent or if it contains an express appointment of a sub-agent by the principal, the agent must comply with the wishes of the principal. The agent would be contractually liable to the principal if the agent subcontracted all or part of the mandate to a third party not approved by the principal (improper performance of the mandate). In any event, the agent would be liable to the principal for any mismanagement by the sub-agent (vicarious liability, CC art. 1994(1)).

45. In GERMANY if the contract called for performance by the specific person only (a matter of interpretation of the contract), the agent or that specific person may not have the contract for representation carried out by another person under the responsibility of the specific person.

46. In GREECE the agent or the specific person is entitled to have the contract for mandate carried out by another person under the responsibility of the specific person. In such a case the specific person is responsible for a fault of the person employed (CC art. 334; Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 715-716 GREEK CC nr. 1; Supreme Court decision no. 25/1995, EEN 1995, 158).

47. In HUNGARY if the authority to represent has been granted to the agent with consideration to a specific person, the agent or that specific person is not entitled to have the contract for representation carried out by another person under the responsibility of the specific person, because CC art. 475(1) provides that '[t]he agent shall proceed in person; he shall, however, be entitled to employ other persons if the principal has agreed thereto or if it is implied by the nature of the agency. An agent shall be liable for the persons he employs as if he himself had carried out the matter entrusted to him'. CC art. 475(3) establishes that '[i]f the agent has not been authorised to employ other persons, he shall be liable for damages that would not have occurred without the employment of such person'. However, according to CC art. 475(2), '[t]he agent shall also be entitled to employ other persons if it is required in order to protect the principal from sustaining injury. In such cases, the agent shall not be liable for the persons employed if he is able to prove that he has acted in a manner that can generally be expected in the particular situation in respect of choosing, instructing, and supervising such persons'.

48. In IRELAND in general, an agent may not delegate authority unless the agent has express or implied authority to do so (De Bussche v Alt [1878] 8 Ch D 286).

49. In ITALY if the authority to represent has been granted to the agent with consideration to a specific person, this usually excludes the possibility for the agent or that specific person to have the contract for representation carried out by another person. However, this also depends on the kind of mandate. If it is reasonable, for instance, that a certain activity be performed by the specific agent with the aid of auxiliaries, this would not be considered to be contrary to the choice of the principal.

50 In the NETHERLANDS according to CC art. 7:404(2), contracting parties may agree that a person other than the agent will perform the mandate activities, for instance in case of illness of the agent.

51. There are no specific POLISH CC provisions on this subject. However, if the contract is carried out by a different person than previously agreed, the agent may be liable for breach of contract.

52. In SCOTLAND if the contract provided that the work was to be carried out by a specific individual, then if the work was carried out by another individual, this would be a breach of the contract which might result in an award of damages for the principal. Much would, however, depend on the interpretation of the contract. A provision that the work was to be carried out by X would not normally be construed as precluding X from being assisted by assistants of a kind normally used in the trade or profession concerned.

53. In SPAIN, this is a question of construction of the will of the principal. When the "delegation" only amounts to the appointment of auxiliaries, no problem arises.

Section 4: Obligation to inform principal

IV.D.–3:401: Information about progress of performance

During the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract the agent must in so far as is reasonable under the circumstances inform the principal of the existence of, and the progress in, the negotiations or other steps leading to the possible conclusion or facilitation of the prospective contract.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

During performance of the obligations under the mandate contract the agent must keep the principal informed about the performance. This Article opts to impose on the agent – who is aware of all relevant information and who may be in need of sufficiently detailed instructions – the obligation to actively keep the principal informed rather than requiring the principal – who may not know what to ask or what information the agent would be in need of – to ask for information.

B. Volunteer information in so far as is reasonable under the circumstances

An obligation for the agent to keep the principal informed all the time would be unreasonably burdensome for the agent. It is simply not feasible to keep the principal informed about every detail of the agent's actions. Moreover, an obligation which would be too far-reaching could even be counterproductive as the principal might be inclined to intervene with the details of the agent's services and thus slow down the actual fulfilment of the mandate (typically the conclusion of the prospective contract) and the emergence of the agent's right to payment. Accordingly, in the text of the present Article, the obligation of the agent is limited by the requirement of 'reasonableness'. The agent is under an obligation to volunteer the information which would allow the principal to be in a better position to give directions as to the performance of the mandate. This would enhance the chances that the performance (and, in a case of representation) the content of the prospective contract) is in accordance with the true needs of the principal.

NOTES

1. In AUSTRIA due to the duty of care the agent has to report the existence of, progress in or absence of negotiations to keep the principal constantly informed; otherwise the agent is liable for damages (Strasser, § 1012 Rz 18; SZ 27/211; Straube (-Griss), HGB I[3], § 384, no. 6; Schütz, § 408 Rz 24). It is not relevant whether the agent acted in the principal's or in the agent's own name, if the contractual relationship between principal and indirect agent is that of a mandate in terms of CC § 1002.
2. The duty to account (BELGIAN CC art. 1993) obliges the agent to inform the principal about the results of the performance (Wéry, Le mandat, 162-163). This duty applies also to the indirect agent. Account should be given as soon as possible (Wéry, Le mandat, 163).

3. In BULGARIA the agent is obliged to notify the principal about the performance of the mandate (LOA art. 284(1)). It seems that the information has to be supplied not only upon a special request from the principal, but also voluntarily. According to legal writings, the agent is under the obligation to supply the principal with relevant information about the progress of the actions intended to conclude the prospective contract and about the conclusion itself (Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 238).

4. In DENMARK although there does not seem to be a rule stating that the agent is obliged to give notice to the principal of the conclusion of the prospective contract, it is considered a normal and natural obligation for the agent to inform the principal as soon as the conclusion of the contract has taken place. In this respect it is irrelevant whether or not the agent is entitled or required to act in the name of the principal or in the agent's own name. If the contract for representation orders the agent to inform the principal of the conclusion of the contract, the agent must fulfil this obligation within the agreed time. If no exact time for this information is agreed upon in the contract for representation the customary rule will probably be that the information must be given within a reasonable (short) time after the conclusion of the contract. In case the information is given too late the principal may, in principle, cancel the contract for representation. However, it will not be considered good practice on the part of the principal to cancel the contract for representation before having informed the agent that time for giving the information in question has run out.

5. In ENGLAND following the agent's obligation to use due skill and care when fulfilling the obligations towards the principal, the agent is also under an obligation to keep the principal informed of all relevant developments. An agent, for instance, must inform the principal of any contracts entered into on the principal's behalf (Johnson v Kearley [1908] 2 KB 514). On failing to inform the principal with reasonable dispatch, the agent will be guilty of a breach and may be liable for damages to the principal.

6. The ESTONIAN LOA § 624(1) provides that the service provider (the agent) is obliged to inform the principal of all relevant (important) facts relating to performance of the obligations under the contract, above all of facts which may cause the principal to modify the instructions, and, at the request of the principal, must provide the principal with information on the performance.

7. In FINLAND the agent is required to inform the principal of the existence of, progress in or absence of, negotiations for the conclusion of the prospective contract (Ccom § 18:1), irrespective of whether the agent is required to act in the agent's own name or in the name the principal. The intensiveness of such a duty of disclosure is, however, substantially dependent on circumstances.

8. In FRANCE the agent and the commission agent are under a general obligation to provide accounts, which, according to legal academic writing, includes all information concerning the performance or failure of the mandate. No time limit is imposed by law to provide such information. A failure to inform the principal could be considered as a breach of contract by the agent (see Civ. 1ère 11 Jul 1983, Bull. civ. I, no. 202 ; Com. 5 Jul 1962, Bull. civ. III, no. 344).

9. The GERMAN CC § 666 requires the agent to inform the principal about the state of affairs (but only upon request of the principal) and, more generally, to give the 'necessary information'. There is no general rule when the obligation must be fulfilled; it depends on the circumstances (Sprau, § 666 para. 2). If the conditions of CC § 280(1) are fulfilled (notably fault by the agent), the principal has a claim for damages if the obligation to inform is breached (Sprau, § 666 para. 1).

10. In the case of a gratuitous mandate contract under GREEK law, an agent is bound to furnish information to the principal about the conduct of the entrusted affairs (CC art.

718), which includes all necessary information about the conclusion of the prospective contract or of the fulfilment of the task entrusted to the agent. The time within which this must be done depends on each case, but it has to be as soon as possible. The consequence of not informing the principal in due time is that the principal will have a claim for damages for any loss caused by such failure (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 718 CC nr. 2).

11. In HUNGARY the agent is required to inform the principal of the existence of, progress in or absence of negotiations for the conclusion of the prospective contract within a reasonable time. The agent is liable for damages resulting from defective performance (see CC art. 310 and 318(1)).

12. In IRELAND the common law does not comprise detailed rules as to the agent's duties, as are outlined in the black letter rules. Instead the agent's duties are described in more general terms and illustrated by case law. An express duty to inform the principal about progress does not exist at common law, but would probably come within the agent's duty to exercise reasonable skill and care, or the wider fiduciary duties owed to the principal.

13. According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1712(1), 'the agent shall without delay give the principal notice that the mandate has been performed'. The ratio of this rule consists in the possibility for the principal to evaluate the activity of the agent (see Supreme Court 9 Feb 2004, no. 2428, Mass. Foro. Italiano, 2004, 4070, no.1). The agent has to inform the principal of the conclusion of the contract 'without delay'. The law does not provide for a specific term within which the agent is required to inform the principal about the conclusion of the prospective contract. Accordingly the meaning of 'without delay' depends on the particular circumstances of the case and on the usages, if any, in the specific business sector. See Supreme Court 25 Nov 2002, no. 16575, Mass. Foro It., 2002, 4070, no. 15; Supreme Court 18 Mar 1997, no. 2387, Contratti, 1997, 559, with comments by Zappata; Supreme Court 06 Feb 1982, no. 693, Mass. Foro. Italiano, 1982, 4070, no. 9; and Supreme Court 18 Jun 1982, no. 3732, Arch. civ., 1982, 981. If not informed in due time of the conclusion of the contract the principal may claim damages against the agent, if any loss is caused by the delay.

14. In the NETHERLANDS according to the CC art. 7:403(1), the agent is bound to inform the principal about the progress of the agent's activities regarding the mandate contract. Furthermore, the agent is bound to immediately notify the principal of the completion of the contract if the principal is unaware thereof. The scope of this duty to inform the principal depends on the specific agreements in the individual mandate contract. If these specific agreements are lacking, the mandate's nature and the circumstances of the case are important. According to literature, providing the principal with brief information will generally be sufficient (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 14).

15. The agent is obliged to inform the principal about progress under the POLISH CC art. 740; the principal should be provided with all the "necessary" information.

16. In SCOTLAND the question whether the duty to act with skill and care would extend as far as obliging the agent to keep the principal informed of the progress of performance is not clear. Certainly, it is unlikely that the agent would be bound to keep the principal constantly informed. It is suggested that the duty of skill and care may bind the agent to provide the principal with updates on the progress of performance at reasonable intervals. But much would depend on usages in particular lines of activity.

17. In SLOVAKIA in civil relations, where the principal so requests, the agent is obliged to present all information regarding progress in the performance of the mandate (CC § 727). In commercial relations, the agent is required to inform the principal of all circumstances which may result in a change of the agent's management of the matter and the instructions (Ccom § 567(2)). The commission agent must inform the principal of the negotiations in the manner stipulated in the contract or as requested by the principal (Ccom § 579(2)).

18. In SPANISH law, giving or providing an account to the principal is an explicit legal duty of the agent, during and after carrying out the affair (CC art. 1720). In the Spanish language, this expression also encompass the giving of accurate information (León, Comentario, p. 1550).

19. In SWEDEN the agent is required to inform the principal of the existence and progress of negotiations for the conclusion of the prospective contract upon the principal's request. If the principal suffers any loss due to the agent's untimely information and this is due to the agent's negligence the principal has a right to damages for non-performance. See HB 18:1, KommL § 7, HaL § 5 and Bengtsson, Särskilda avtalstyper I^2, 164.

IV.D.–3:402: Accounting to the principal

(1) The agent must without undue delay inform the principal of the completion of the mandated task.

(2) The agent must give an account to the principal:

(a) of the manner in which the obligations under the mandate contract have been performed; and

(b) of money spent or received or expenses incurred by the agent in performing those obligations.

(3) Paragraph (2) applies with appropriate modifications if the mandate relationship is terminated in accordance with Chapters 6 and 7 and the obligations under the mandate contract have not been fully performed.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The agent is required to inform the principal of the completion of the task which the agent was instructed and authorised to perform – typically the conclusion of the prospective contract and to give account of the manner in which contractual obligations have been performed. This information is meant, first of all, to enable the principal to assess whether or not the obligations were performed properly (i.e. in accordance with the mandate, in the interests of the principal and with the due standard of care). On the other hand, the agent also has an interest in performing the obligations under this Article, as their performance is a prerequisite for payment of the price (IV.D.–2:102 (Price) paragraphs (2) and (3)) or reimbursement of expenses (IV.D.–2:103 (Expenses incurred by agent) paragraph (3)). Where the mandated task is not to conclude a contract but to find a person (e.g. a potential buyer or seller or tenant or employee or employer) with whom the principal may wish to conclude a contract it is even more important that the principal should be informed promptly when one is found so that the principal will be able to take the matter forward.

B. Without undue delay

The agent must inform the principal without undue delay of the completion of the mandated task (e.g. the conclusion of the prospective contract). This is important especially in cases where the agent is not awarded exclusivity and the principal could also conclude the prospective contract personally.

Illustration

A principal has commissioned an agent with the sale of her pied-à-terre for a price of €200,000. She has informed the agent of the fact that she is aware of the interest of neighbours in the purchase of the house and that she may decide to sell them the house herself. The agent, who realises that the house is in popular demand and that it will be necessary to work fast in order to obtain a price for services rendered, succeeds in selling the house after two days of work only. If the agent does not report this success without undue delay, there is a substantial risk that the principal will sell the house herself as well. In that case, the house would be sold twice, leading to liability for the principal for non-performance of obligations under either the first or the second sales contract.

C. Giving account if mandate relationship is terminated before tasks have been completed

The obligation to give account on how the obligations were performed is particularly relevant if the agent has not been successful in completing the tasks – for example, concluding the prospective contract or finding a potential buyer; in such cases the agent may not volunteer information as to the manner in which the obligations were performed because the agent may not be going to receive payment in any case. The termination (for any reason) of the mandate relationship in cases where the agent has not been successful in completing the instructed tasks (such as finding a potential buyer or concluding the prospective contract) does not exclude the obligation to give account to the principal on the manner in which the obligations under the mandate contract have been performed and the money spent or received or expenses incurred by the agent in performing those obligations.

D. Giving account during mandate relationship

It is certainly not in the interest of either party that the agent is required to inform the principal of every step taken in the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract. Such a general obligation would, in fact, make the performance unreasonably burdensome for the agent without any substantial gain for the principal. It may, however, be different in the situation where the parties had anticipated that the prospective contract would be concluded, for instance when negotiations appeared to be leading to the conclusion of such a prospective contract. Under these circumstances, it may follow from IV.D.–3:102 (Obligation to act in interests of principal) and IV.D.–3:103 (Obligation of skill and care) that the agent is required to inform the principal promptly about the collapse of these negotiations. Similarly, it may follow from these Articles that the agent is required to inform the principal of the (lack of) progress in the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract when the principal inquires about this progress and such a request for information could be considered reasonable.

NOTES

I. Obligation to inform about completion of mandated task

1. In AUSTRIA the agent has to inform the principal about the conclusion of the prospective contract immediately or be liable for damages (Strasser, § 1012 Rz 18; Ccom § 384; Apathy, § 1009 Rz 4). The agent has the duty to provide to the principal the records of transactions effected as agent. This duty subsists notwithstanding termination of the authority. Commission agents and forwarders have to report the finished performance of the contract immediately (Ccom § 384 (Straube (-Griss), HGB I[3], § 384, no. 6; Schütz, § 408 Rz 24)).
2. In BELGIUM when an important event ('un fait majeur') occurs, the agent must take the initiative to inform the principal. In the absence of a fait majeur, the principal may ask for information at any time, without an obligation for the agent to inform the principal spontaneously (Wéry, Le mandat , 160-162). This duty is part of the general duty to give account and also exists for the indirect agent.
3. In BULGARIA the agent is under an obligation to communicate to the principal the progress of the performance of the mandate, including the conclusion of the prospective contract (LOA art. 284(1). There is no general rule regulating time limits for this information duty. Commercial agents are required to immediately inform the principal about every concluded prospective contract (Ccom art. 33(1)).

4. In DENMARK although there does not seem to be a rule stating that the agent is obliged to give notice to the principal of the conclusion of the prospective contract, it is considered a normal and natural obligation for the agent to inform the principal as soon as the conclusion of the contract has taken place.

5. In ENGLAND even an agent who has no power to enter into a contract with the principal, must nevertheless keep the principal informed of all relevant information. For instance, an estate agent must notify the principal of all the offers received up until a contract is exchanged with a third party (Keppel v Wheeler [1927] 1 KB 577). The contract may stipulate precise times at which the agent must pass relevant information to the principal. If the contract does not expressly stipulate such times, the agent must do so as and when relevant with reasonable dispatch. Failing to do so, the agent will be in breach and may therefore be liable for damages.

6. The ESTONIAN LOA § 624(1) provides that the service provider (the agent) is obliged to inform the principal of all important facts relating to performance of the contract, above all of facts which may cause the principal to modify his instructions, and, at the request of the principal, shall provide the principal with information on performance of the contract. That would include information on the progress of negotiations. As a general rule, LOA § 82(3) provides that '[i]f the time for the performance of an obligation is not set and is not determinable from the nature of the obligation, the obligor shall perform the obligation within a reasonable period of time (…) after an obligation has arisen (…), taking into particular account the place, manner and nature of the performance of the obligation.' The consequences of not informing the principal in due time would be the same as with any other breach by the service provider: the principal could choose between the general remedies for non-performance of an obligation provided for in LOA § 101(1).

7. In FINLAND the agent is required to inform the principal within a reasonable time about the conclusion of the prospective contract and more generally about the fulfilment of the tasks (Ccom § 18:1). The consequences of not doing so depend on the harm caused to the principal. In general, the principal is entitled to compensation for loss suffered due to negligent omission on the part of the agent.

8. In FRANCE the agent and the commission agent are under a general obligation to provide accounts, which, according to French legal academic writing, includes all information concerning the performance or failure of the mandate. No time limit is imposed by law to provide such information. A failure to inform the principal could be considered as a breach of contract by the agent (see Civ. 1ère 11 Jul 1983, Bull. civ. I, no. 202 ; Com. 5 Jul 1962, Bull. civ. III, no. 344).

9. The GERMAN CC § 666 requires the agent to inform the principal about the state of affairs (but only upon request of the principal) and, more generally, to give the 'necessary information'. There is no general rule when the obligation must be fulfilled; it depends on the circumstances (Sprau, § 666 para. 2). If the conditions of CC § 280(1) are fulfilled (notably fault by the agent), the principal has a claim for damages if the obligation to inform is breached (Sprau, § 666 para. 1).

10. In GREECE in the case of a gratuitous mandate contract an agent is bound to furnish information to the principal about the entrusted affairs (CC art. 718), which includes all necessary information about the conclusion of the prospective contract or of the fulfilment of the task entrusted to the agent (including the existence or absence of negotiations). Within how much time the agent is required to inform the principal depends on each case, but it has to be as soon as possible. The consequence of not timeously informing the principal is that a claim for damages may be available (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 718 GREEK CC nr. 2).

11. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 477(3), '[t]he agent shall notify the principal as soon as he fulfils his agency'. The agent is required to inform the principal of the conclusion of the prospective contract and more generally of the fulfilment of his task within a reasonable time.

12. For IRELAND see Notes under IV.D.–3:401 (Information about progress of performance).

13. In ITALY the agent is required to inform the principal about the existence of progress in or absence of negotiations. This obligation derives from the general duty to inform the principal about every circumstance which is relevant to the conclusion of the prospective contract. Since the duty to inform is not specifically regulated by the law but derives from the general duty of good faith, no specific term is set for the fulfilment of the information obligation. The timeliness of the information is evaluated on the basis of the specific circumstances and the principle of good faith. The principal may claim damages from the agent if any loss is caused by the delay.

14. For the NETHERLANDS see Notes under IV.D.–3:401 (Information about progress of performance).

15. In POLAND the agent is obliged to provide the principal with a report and account after the contract has been concluded. There are no specific rules as to when those documents should be provided or whether the agent is liable for failure to provide them or to inform the principal about the conclusion of the contract immediately.

16. In SCOTLAND it is likely that a failure to inform the principal of the conclusion of a contract within a reasonable time would be a breach of the agent's duties of skill and care which would result in the agent's liability to the principal in damages.

17. In SLOVAKIA in civil relations, the agent is required to inform the principal of the conclusion of the prospective contract, as it is part of the obligation to give a report on the progress of the performance. In commercial relations, informing the principal is a condition for entitlement to the price (Mandate). After execution of a certain affair, the commission agent must provide the principal with a report and an accounting (Ccom § 584(1)).

18. In SPAIN the agent has a duty to give account to the principal on how the contract has been performed (CC art. 1720(2)). There is no specific rule relating to the conclusion of the prospective contract, probably because this is a self evident application drawn from the main obligation of the agent.

19. In SWEDEN the agent is required to inform the principal of the conclusion of the prospective contract as well as more generally of the fulfilment of the mandated task "within a reasonable time" or "without delay" (HB 18:1; KommL § 7; HaL § 5).

II. Duty to give account of performance of obligations under mandate contract

20. In AUSTRIA the agent is required to give account to the principal of the manner in which the agent has performed the obligations under the contract for mandate; otherwise the principal could not be aware of possible breaches of contract (Apathy, § 1012 Rz 5).

21. In BELGIUM a first aspect of the agent's duty to give account (CC art. 1993) is the duty to give account of the way the mandate has been performed (Wéry, Le mandat, 160-162). This rule also applies to a commission contract (Supreme Court 21 Jun 1968, Arr. Cass. 1968, 1285, Pas. 1968, 1212 and RHA 1972, 309; de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V[2], 371; Foriers, 68; Pand. b., v° Commission (contrat de), no. 166; RPDB, v° Commission, no. 151; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 186-188; Van der Perre and Lejeune, Droit commercial I, no. 128-129; Van Ryn & Heenen, 24), a prête nom-contract (Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 95) and a mandatary acting in the agent's own name (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V[2], 436; Paulus und Boes, Lastgeving, 134; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 306; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 277-278; Van der Perre and Lejeune, Droit commercial I, no. 166; Wéry, Le mandat, 152 and 259).

22. Giving account of the performance is one of the main obligations of the agent in BULGARIAN law. (LOA art. 284(2)). It may consist of: (a) calculation of expenses for performance of the mandate contract; (b) transfer from the agent to the principal of all legal effects of the prospective contract and other juridical acts; and (c) delivery to the principal of all goods and documents, received by the agent in the course of the contractual performance. The content of the obligation differs depending on the type of representation. In the case of direct representation, the agent has acted in the name of and on behalf of the principal and all legal effects of the concluded contracts and other performed juridical acts occur directly in the legal sphere of the principal. In this case, giving account only means giving an account of expenses and delivery of goods and documents. When the agent has acted in the agent's own name and on behalf of the principal, the agent is under the obligation to transfer all rights and obligations under the concluded prospective contracts to the principal (Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 238; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 26; Horozov, SP 1995/3, 37, 38-43).

23. In DENMARK the agent must exercise due diligence to inform the principal about the manner in which the obligations under the contract for representation have been performed.

24. In ENGLAND as part of the obligation to exercise due skill and care when performing the agency duties, the agent must keep the principal informed of all the material facts. The agent must do so promptly so that the principal can react accordingly: Proudfoot v Montefiore (1867) LR 2 QB 511.

25. The ESTONIAN LOA § 624(2) provides that upon performance of the services, the service provider (the agent) is obliged to give account to the principal with an overview of the expenditure and revenue relating to performance of the services together with the documentation, which is the basis for the account.

26. In FINLAND the agent is generally required to give account of the manner in which the obligations have been performed (Ccom § 18:1), irrespective of whether the agent has acted in the agent's own name or in the name the principal.

27. In FRANCE the agent must render an account to the principal in connection with the performance of the agency duties (CC art. 1993). This obligation may only be avoided where the parties expressly or impliedly decide to do so (e.g. in a family context). The agent must keep the principal informed of the performance of the mandate, the difficulties encountered, the state of advancement of any research and the outcome, whether positive or negative. The commission agent, who acts in the agent's own name and for the account of the principal, is, in principle, subject to the same obligation to account (customary rule, except in certain cases; see Collart Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 664).

28. In GERMANY the agent is required to give account to the principal of the manner in which the obligations have been performed (CC § 666).

29. In GREECE in the case of a gratuitous mandate contract an agent is bound to furnish information to the principal about the entrusted affairs and to render account to the principal upon termination of the relationship (CC art. 718). The lawyer is also obliged to keep the client informed about the progress of the case being handled (CFI Pireos decision no. 607/1985, ArchN 1985, 328).

30. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 477(1), '[t]he agent shall inform his principal of his activities and the state of affairs upon request or, if necessary, even without a request, particularly if employment of another person has become necessary or if the instructions need to be changed due to the occurrence of new circumstances'. Moreover, '[a]t the time the contract is extinguished, the agent shall be obliged to settle his accounts and give the principal everything that has been acquired for the purpose of fulfilling his agency or as a result of doing so, except for what he has lawfully used in the course of his agency' (CC art. 477(2)). The obligation of the agent to give account to the principal also covers the manner in which the obligations under the contract for representation have been performed. The agent is liable for damages resulting from defective performance (see CC art. 310 and CC 318(1)).

31. For IRELAND see Notes under IV.D.–3:401 (Information about progress of performance).

32. In ITALY the agent is required to give account to the principal of the manner in which the obligations under the contract for representation have been performed (CC art. 1713).

33. In the NETHERLANDS according to CC art. 7:403(1), the agent is obliges to inform the principal about the progress of the agent's activities regarding the mandate contract (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 14).

34. In POLAND the agent is obliged to give an account after carrying out the mandate contract or after the contact is terminated by either side (CC art. 740). The remuneration will be due after the account has been given.

35. In SCOTTISH law, the agent's duty of good faith has been expressed as follows. 'An agent is bound to maintain the most entire good faith, and make the fullest disclosure of all facts and circumstances concerning the principal's business.' (Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], no. 222). This duty is probably sufficiently wide to oblige the agent to provide the principal with an account of the manner in which the obligations under the contract have been performed. What is clear is that the agent is bound to provide the principal with a record of all transactions entered into by the agent on the principal's behalf (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 531).

36. In SLOVAKIA in civil relations, the agent is obliged to give a report. In commercial relations, giving account of the way the agent has performed is a condition for entitlement to the price. As for the commission agent contract, after execution of a certain affair the agent must provide the principal with a report and the related accounting of the results of the arrangements made. In the report, the agent must name the person with whom the contract was concluded.

37. In SPANISH law, accounting to the principal is an explicit legal duty of the agent, during and after carrying out the affair (CC art. 1720) The accounting should cover the outcome and the economic balance of the service made (CC arts. 1720 and Ccom 263).

38. In SWEDEN the agent is required to give account of the manner in which the obligations under the mandate contract have been performed. This is applicable regardless of whether the agent has acted in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal (HB 18:1, KommL § 7).

III. Duty to give account of money spent or received in performance of obligations under mandate contract

36. In AUSTRIA the agent is required to give account of any money spent or of any money received in the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract (CC § 1012, Ccom § 384(2); Ccom § 408 (Straube (-Griss), HGB I[3], § 384, no. 7; Schütz, § 408 Rz 13); HVertrG § 5).

37. Under BELGIAN law the second aspect of the agent's duty to account (CC art. 1993) is the duty to submit accounts showing all incomings and outgoings (Wéry, Le mandat, 163-171).

38. In BULGARIA the duty to give account also entails giving account of money spent or received in the course of performance of the obligations under the mandate contract (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 126-133).

39. In DENMARK whether the agent is required to give account for money spent during the course of the performance of the task depends on the wording of the contract for representation. When the contract is silent about these matters, it is a common (customary) rule that the agent will periodically produce a statement of account on the amount of money spent.

40. In ENGLAND the agent is under a general duty to account to the principal for all property or money received from the principal or from a third party for the principal's account and any money spent while performing the agency obligations. This is another fiduciary duty and is therefore applied strictly by the courts. The agent must keep accurate accounts of all the transactions entered into on behalf of the principal during the agency relationship. It is especially important that the accounts keep the agent's money and the principal's totally separate. The agent must be able to produce such accounts at all times. In the case of Gray v Haig ((1854) 20 Beav 219), Romilly MR held that when the agent fails to keep an accurate account of all transactions, the court may feel 'compelled (…) to presume everything unfavourable to him' (Ibid, per Romilly MR at 226). The agent must also be able to produce all records and documents relating to the affairs of the principal and such records must be available even after termination of the relationship (Yasuda Fire & marine Insurance Co of Europe Ltd v Orion marine Insurance Underwriting Agency Ltd [1995] QB 174). On termination, the agent is required to surrender to the principal all books, accounts, documents etc given by the principal or that the agent prepared during the agency relationship. This obligation is subject to the lien that an agent may have over such documents in order to secure payment from the principal. This general fiduciary duty to account to the principal is a personal one and arises independently of any contract between the principal and the agent. The contract between the agent and the principal may modify the extent of the duty but clear words are needed. Fiduciary duties apply to paid and gratuitous agents alike but the standard of care owed by a gratuitous agent may be lower than that of a paid agent (Chaudry v Prabhakar [1989] 1 WLR 29).

41. The ESTONIAN LOA § 624(2) provides that upon performance of the services, the service provider (the agent) is obliged to give account to the principal with an overview of the expenditure and revenue relating to performance of the services together with the documentation, which is the basis for the account.

42. In FINLAND the agent is generally required to give account of the money spent or received in the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract (Ccom § 18:1).

43. In FRANCE the agent is required to render an account for all sums received and expended in the performance of the mandate. No specific form is required by statute or by case law, but the agent must in all events record all sums held 'even though he may have received sums which are not due to the principal' (CC art. 1993). The agent should comply with accounting rules, particularly if a professional agent. Rendering accounts also means returning to the principal all sums which are due to the principal and any sums that the principal remitted to the agent to perform the mandate, as well as sums received from any third party (Civ. 1ère 8 Jul 1975, Bull. civ. I, no. 226). The agent would commit the crime of fraud (abus de confiance) if the agent applied such sums or other property to the agent's own benefit. CC art. 1996 provides also that the agent is liable to pay interest on any sums used for the agent's own purposes and the sums which are due to be remitted to the principal as of the date where the agent has received formal notice to do so.

44. Under the GERMAN CC § 666 the agent must give account for all sums received and expended in the performance of the mandate. The form of the accounting is governed by CC §. The obligation to give account also exists where there is no claim for reimbursement (BGHZ 109, 260, no. 266).

45. In GREECE in the case of a gratuitous mandate contract the agent is obliged to give account of any money spent or of any money received during the performance of the mandate (CC art. 718). In case of a failure of the agent to render account to the principal, a claim for damages due to such a failure can be established or the principal can refuse to reimburse the agent's expenses (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 719 GREEK CC nr. 2). An agent must return to the principal everything the agent had received for or has acquired from the performance of the mandate (CC art. 719). If an agent has used money belonging to the principal for the agent's own benefit, the agent must pay interest on that money as from the date the use began (CC art. 720).

46. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 479(2) '[a]t the time the contract is extinguished, the agent shall be obliged to settle his accounts and give the principal everything that has been acquired for the purpose of fulfilling his agency or as a result of doing so, except for what he has lawfully used in the course of his agency'. Furthermore, '[u]pon termination of contract the principal shall exonerate the agent from obligations assumed against third persons on the basis of the agency and shall reimburse his necessary and useful expenses' (CC art. 479(3)).

47. In IRELAND a duty to account for monies is part of an agent's fiduciary duties. In this regard, an agent must account to the principal for all property (including monies) of the principal received in the course of the agency. The agent must therefore keep the agent's own monies and property separate from those of the principal, unless mixing is authorised. As part of this duty, an agent must keep complete records of transactions entered on the principal's behalf and make them available for inspection to the principal (Pearse v Green [1819] 1 Jac & W 135). A court may make adverse inferences where the agent fails in this regard (Gray v Haig [1855] 20 Beav 219). On termination of the agency, the agent must deliver up to the principal all books, accounts and other documents provided by the principal or created in the course of the agency unless the agent is entitled to exercise a lien over them (Gibbon v Pease [1905] 1 KB 810). Moreover, because the duty to account arises from the fiduciary nature of the relationship, independently of any contract, it survives the termination of the agency, unless expressly or impliedly excluded by the contract (Yasuda Fire and Marine Insurance Co of Europe Ltd v Orion Marine Insurance Underwriting Agency Ltd [1995] QB 174).

48. In ITALY the agent is required to give account of the money spent or received in the performance of the contract for representation (CC arts. 1713 and 1714). As a rule, it makes no difference whether or not the contract for representation is for a price and whether or not the agent claims reimbursement of expenses. Of course, if the agent claims reimbursement of expenses it will be necessary to prove the expenses.

49. In the NETHERLANDS according to CC art. 7:403(2), the agent is held to account for the money spent or received during the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract. According to literature, the principal may make ask for a specification of costs and delivery of documentary evidence, which will enable the revenues and expenditures to be evaluated (Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 14).

50. In SCOTLAND although the agent is under a duty to give account of any money spent or received in the performance of the obligations under the contract, it is possible for this accounting to be verbal only where this is consistent with the contract (Russell v Cleland (1885) 23 SLR 211).

51. In SLOVAKIA, in civil relations, the agent is bound to present an account (a statement of costs and expenditure) to the principal; this obligation generally corresponds with the obligation of the principal to reimburse the agent's expenses, but the parties can agree otherwise (CC § 727). In commercial relations, it is relevant whether the agent claims reimbursement of expenses; if the expenses are included in the price, it is not necessary to give an account. On the other hand, if the agent obtained payment in advance for substantial expenses, the agent will probably give an account of spending. Under the commission agent contract, after execution of a certain affair, the agent must provide the principal with a report and the related accounting of the results of the arrangements made; this is a condition for entitlement to remuneration (commission) and reimbursement of expenses.

52. Under SPANISH law the agent must give account for all sums received and expended in the performance of the mandate; see STS April 1982, RJA 1982/1932 and Ccom art. 263.

53. In SWEDEN after performance of the obligations under the mandate contract the agent is required to give account of money spent and of money received during the performance (HB 18:1; KommL § 7; HaL § 5; Hellner, 223; Bengtsson, Särskilda avtalstyper I^2, 164).

IV.D.–3:403: Communication of identity of third party

(1) An agent who concludes the prospective contract with a third party must communicate the name and address of the third party to the principal on the principal's demand.

(2) In the case of a mandate for indirect representation paragraph (1) applies only if the agent has become insolvent.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The present Article obliges an agent who has concluded a contract with a third party for and on behalf of the principal, to communicate the name and address of the third party to the principal, on the principal's demand, in a situation where the principal is not aware of that name but needs to know the name in order to exercise rights against the third party. This is one of those obligations which is intended to survive the termination of the mandate relationship as it may often fall to be performed some time after the prospective contract has been concluded. The effect of paragraph (2) is that this obligation is very largely confined to agents acting under mandates for direct representation.

Illustration 1
A representative buys a car from a third party in the name and on behalf of the principal. As the car is defective, the principal wishes to exercise her remedies under the sales contract. The representative is required to inform the principal of the name and address of the seller of the car.

B. Limited obligation to communicate name and address in case of indirect representation

In the case of indirect representation – a situation where the agent has acted on behalf of the principal but in such a way that the agent is the party to the juridical act done – no contractual ties exist between the principal and the third party.

An agent has bought a car from a third party in the agent's own name but on behalf of the principal. As the car is defective, the principal wishes to exercise her remedies under the sale contract. As she does not have a sale contract with the seller of the car but only a mandate contract with the agent, she will have to exercise her remedies against the agent. It is up to the agent to subsequently sue the seller of the defective car on the basis of the sale contract.

However, if the agent becomes insolvent the principal has an option to take over the agent's rights under the contract with the third party. See III.–5:401 (Principal's option to take over rights in case of agent's insolvency). In this situation the principal has the right to obtain the third party's name and address.

I. Obligation to inform about identity of third party in case of direct representation

1. In BELGIUM an obligation to inform the principal about the identity of the third party would seem to be regarded as a logical consequence of the agent's duty of loyalty and duty to give account to the principal (CC art. 1993).
2. In BULGARIA in view of the fact that the agent is obliged to inform the principal about the performance of the mandate, the former appears to be under an obligation to also communicate personal data of the third party with whom the prospective contract has been concluded.
3. In ENGLAND the agent must act for the best interest of the principal and must pass on to the principal any material information, i.e. information which is important to the principal. This would no doubt include the identity of the third party.
4. In ESTONIA the law does not prescribe a specific obligation to inform the principal about the identity of a third party. Such an obligation can however, at least in cases of a direct representation, be derived from the general obligation of the agent to inform the principal of all important facts related to the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract (LOA § 624(1)).
5. There are no specific rules or cases on this point in FRENCH law. The duty to give account to the principal (CC art. 1993) possibly includes the duty to inform the principal about the identity of the third party, as the principal must be informed about all important points of the contract with the third party.
6. The general information duty in the GERMAN CC § 666 requires the agent to inform the principal about the name and address of the party with whom the prospective contract has been concluded (Seiler, in: Münchener Kommentar zum BGB[4], § 666 no. 5).
7. In IRELAND the common law does not comprise detailed rules as to the agent's duties, as are outlined in the black letter rules. Nevertheless, an agent's common law duty to obey instructions would probably include a duty to communicate the identity of any third party on the principal's demand.
8. In the NETHERLANDS the general rule that applies here is CC art. 7:403 on the general duty to inform the principal. According to CC art. 7:420(3) this general rule does not imply that the agent is obliged to inform the principal about the identity of the third party, however. Only in the situations mentioned in CC art. 7:420(1) and (2), does the agent have to inform the principal about the identity of the third party – for instance, if the agent, who has concluded a contract with a third party in the agent's own name, does not fulfil the agent's obligations towards the principal. See Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3091-91.
9. A duty to inform about the identity of the third party is not regulated in the POLISH CC provisions on mandate. The parties may decide to include such a duty in the contract; otherwise the agent is not obliged to do so.
10. While there is no specific duty in SCOTTISH law corresponding to the rule in the Article, its content is obviously of practical significance and is embraced within the agent's fiduciary or good faith duty to disclose to the principal all facts and circumstances concerning the latter's business (Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], § 222).

11. In SLOVAKIA after execution of a certain affair, the commission agent (indirect representation) must provide the principal with a report in which the agent names the person with whom the contract was concluded.

12. SPANISH law is silent as to this subject matter, due probably to the self evident nature of the rule.

13. In SWEDEN in order for the principal to be able to exercise rights under the prospective contract with the third party, the agent has a duty to inform about the identity of the third party.

II. No obligation to inform about identity of third party in case of indirect representation

14. In BELGIUM a commission-agent has, as a rule, a right of secrecy as to the third party's identity towards the principal (RPDB, v° Commission, no. 133; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 188-190; Van Ryn & Heenen, 21). This right of secrecy however is not absolute. According to jurisdiction, in certain exceptional cases, the right of secrecy can be overruled by the principal's legitimate interest to know the third party's identity (CA Gent 18 May 1876, Pas. 1876, II, 372; Comm. C. Brussels 1 Feb 1911, TBH 1911, 201; RPDB, v° Commission, no. 134; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 189-190). The bankruptcy of the commission-agent is one of these exceptional cases.

15. In BULGARIA both direct and indirect representatives appear to be obliged to communicate personal data of the third person to the principal.

16. There is no such thing as indirect representation in ENGLISH law. The closest notion is that of undisclosed agency. However, even in such a case, the agent must still act for the best interests of the principal. Therefore there would still be an obligation on the agent to pass the identity of the third party to the principal if requested.

17. In ESTONIA in the case of indirect representation the obligation to inform about the identity of a third party can be derived from the general obligation of the agent to inform the principal of all important facts related to the performance of the mandate agreement (LOA § 624(1)). Such duty requires the agent to disclose information if the principal has a justified interest in the disclosure. In a case of indirect representation such interest could exist only if knowledge of the identity of a third party would be necessary in order to exercise the rights acquired by the agent under the contract with the third party and against such party for the benefit of the principal, e.g. in case of the commission agent (s. LOA § 700(1) 3) which provides that the commission agent is liable for the performance of the contract with the third party if the agent does not disclose the identity of the third party to the principal).

18. In FRANCE despite the lack of any specific rule on this point, there is no duty to inform about the identity of the third party in case of indirect representation ('commission contract') in practice.

19. According to the GERMAN Ccom § 384(2) and (3), a duty to inform the principal about the name and address of the contracting partner also arises in cases of indirect representation, namely for commission agents (BGH, WM 1984, 931).

20. In IRELAND where the agency is undisclosed (the closest situation to indirect representation) the same duties apply and hence an agent's common law duty to obey instructions would probably include a duty to communicate the identity of any third party on the principal's demand.

21. For the NETHERLANDS see Note 8. There is no specific rule on indirect representation.

22. There is no rule to this effect in SCOTTISH law.

23. There is no rule as to this issue in SPANISH law. Whether the agent should or should not give notice of the identity of the third party will depend on the nature of the relationship.

24. In SWEDEN in case of civil commission the agent has a duty to inform about the identity of the third party. In case of trade commission the agent has no duty to inform about the identity of the third party unless the principal is to take over claims against the third party due to e.g. delay of the third party or bankruptcy of the agent (KommL § 7).

CHAPTER 4: DIRECTIONS AND CHANGES

Section 1: Directions

IV.D.–4:101: Directions given by principal

(1) The principal is entitled to give directions to the agent.

(2) The agent must follow directions by the principal.

(3) The agent must warn the principal if the direction:

(a) has the effect that the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract would become significantly more expensive or take significantly more time than agreed upon in the mandate contract; or

(b) is inconsistent with the purpose of the mandate contract or may otherwise be detrimental to the interests of the principal.

(4) Unless the principal revokes the direction without undue delay after having been so warned by the agent, the direction is to be regarded as a change of the mandate contract under IV.D.–4:201 (Changes of the mandate contract).

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article indicates that the principal is the 'master of the contract': the agent is required to follow directions given by the principal after the contract is concluded, even if the agent disagrees with them (paragraph (2)). However, where the agent thinks that the direction is detrimental to the interests of the principal, the agent must warn the principal accordingly (paragraph (3)). Paragraph (4) requires the agent to wait to see whether the principal, after having been warned that the given direction may be detrimental, wants to revoke it. If the principal nevertheless holds the agent to the direction, there is a change in the mandate contract – a matter regulated in IV.D.–4:201 (Changes of the mandate contract).

B. Principal's right to give subsequent directions

The mandate of the agent consists of the authorisation, initial instructions and subsequent directions of the principal, i.e. the decisions of the principal given during the mandate relationship as to the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract or the contents of the prospective contract (see IV.D.–1:102 (Definitions)). The principal is therefore entitled to give subsequent directions (paragraph (1).

The right of the principal to provide directions voluntarily is to be differentiated from the situation in which the principal has an obligation to give directions under IV.D.–2:101 (Obligation to co-operate) paragraph (2)(b). This obligation arises when the contract so provides, or when the principal is requested by the agent to give a direction (IV.D.–4:102 (Request for a direction).

C. Agent's obligation to follow subsequent directions

The agent is obliged to act in accordance with the mandate granted (IV.D.–3:101 (Obligation to act in accordance with mandate)). The mandate of the agent consists of the initial authorisation and instructions and any subsequent directions. Accordingly, the agent is obliged to follow the subsequent directions of the principal.

D. Obligation to warn in case of unreasonable direction

Paragraph (3) has the effect of imposing on the agent an obligation to warn the principal if a direction is unreasonable. "Unreasonable" is here a shorthand way of referring to directions perceived by the agent to be contrary to the interests of the principal – in particular those which have the effect that the performance of the agent's obligations would become significantly more expensive or take significantly more time than agreed upon in the mandate contract or those which are inconsistent with the purpose of the mandate contract or may otherwise be detrimental to the interests of the principal (paragraph (3)(a) and (b) respectively).

Illustration

If an agent is first authorised to sell a house owned by the principal for a price of €400,000 or more, but the principal later changes the limit to €450,000, which is above the market price, it will take the agent more time to sell the house and there is a serious risk that it will not be possible to conclude the prospective contract.

E. Upholding an unreasonable direction leads to change in the contract

If the principal, on being warned that a direction is unreasonable, does not revoke it within a reasonable time, then it is to be considered a change to the mandate contract. The consequences of such a change are regulated in IV.D.–4:201 (Changes of the mandate contract).

F. Warning excludes liability of the agent

Whether the direction in fact makes it more difficult to achieve the result envisaged by the principal or not is not the agent's concern, as long as the agent warns the principal of this possible consequence of a direction perceived not to be in the interest of the principal. Obviously, an agent who has duly warned the principal of the consequences of following the direction cannot be held liable for non-performance if the end result does not meet the principal's expectations: that merely shows that the agent was correct in the warning. It would be different if the agent, on the basis of the obligation to exercise due skill and care, could be required in the given circumstances to terminate the mandate relationship.

I. Principal's right to give direction

1. In BULGARIA there is no explicit rule granting the principal the right to give directions to the agent. Nevertheless, in legal doctrine such a right is derived from the counter obligation of the agent to act in accordance with the principal's instructions. These instructions may be given either at the time of conclusion of the mandate contract or subsequently (Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 237; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 24). Subsequent directions may neither significantly alter the given mandate nor make its performance more burdensome for the agent (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 119).

2. In ENGLAND since the agent acts not on the agent's own behalf but on behalf of the principal, the latter will give instructions to the agent. Such instructions must be reasonable.

3. In FRANCE the principal has the right to give directions during the course of performance of the contract, according to French legal academic writing.

4. The principal's right to give directions to the agent is expressly laid down in the GERMAN CC § 665.

5. In IRELAND there is no such express right at common law but in effect this right exists because an agent must obey the principal's lawful instructions.

6. In the NETHERLANDS according to CC art. 7:402(1), the agent is bound to obey timely and well considered directions regarding the performance of the contractual obligations. This stipulation seems to imply that the principal is allowed to give the agent directions.

7. In SCOTTISH law the focus lies on the agent's duty to follow the principal's instructions, on which see below, rather than on the principal's right to provide instructions. It goes without saying that the principal has a right to provide instructions.

8. In SLOVAKIA the principal's right to give directions is in all related contract types implied in the agent's duty to follow the principal's directions.

9. In SWEDEN the principal has a right as well as a duty to give directions in order for the agent to be able to perform in accordance with the mandate contract.

II. Agent's obligation to follow direction

10. In AUSTRIA the agent has to comply with reasonable instructions (CC § 1009; Ccom § 385(1); Ccom § 408 (Strasser, § 1009 Rz 14; Straube (-Griss), HGB I^3, § 385, no. 1; Schütz, § 408 Rz 7.)). The agent must inform the principal if the agent does not or will not follow the direction (OGH in EvBl 1959/261; Strasser, § 1009 Rz 16; ZAS 1985, 170), especially when the agent, by following the direction, may not achieve the result envisaged by the principal (OGH in EvBl 1959/261; Strasser, § 1009 Rz 16; ZAS 1985, 170). The agent has to wait for the principal's decision and comply with the new instructions or terminate the mandate relationship (Apathy, § 1009 Rz 4; Straube (-Griss), HGB I^3, § 385, no. 1). In case of imminent danger the agent may disregard the directions (Apathy, § 1009 Rz 13; Straube (-Griss), HGB I^3, § 385, no. 2.). A professional agent's qualifications may set a limit to the principal's right to give directions, e.g. concerning the solicitor's tactics during legal proceedings (OGH in ZBl 1928/3; Strasser, § 1009 Rz 14; Apathy, § 1009 Rz 13).

11. In BELGIUM as a part of the agent's general duty to perform the mandate properly, the agent is required to follow the principal's instructions (Wéry, Le mandat, 144). A distinction is made between an imperative and a facultative mandate. In case of an imperative mandate, the principal has given precise instructions on the way the obligations under the contract for representation have to be performed. Imperative instructions must be followed carefully. As a rule no deviation is permitted. Only unforeseen circumstances can permit, or even oblige, the agent to deviate from the instructions (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 405; Paulus und Boes, Lastgeving, 90; Wéry, Le mandat, 146). A facultative mandate is silent on the way the obligations under the contract for representation have to be performed. Such a mandate must be performed in the best interests of the principal, taking into account the nature of the act, the circumstances of the case and any applicable customs.

12. In BULGARIA as a general rule, the agent is obliged to follow the directions of the principal. However, in some cases the agent is entitled to refuse to comply with new directions and even to terminate the mandate contract, e.g. if the agent has a reasonable ground to disagree with the instructions or if they are too burdensome or even dangerous (Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 237; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 24; Kassabova, TP 2006, 159, 162). The agent is also allowed to refuse performance of illegal or immoral directions (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 22).

13. In DENMARK in general, the agent must follow (legal) directions given by the principal on how to perform the obligations under the contract. This is a consequence of the agent's being 'subordinate' to the principal. An agent who does not want to follow the instruction given by the principal must immediately give the principal notice to this effect.

14. In ENGLAND the agent must always act in the principal's best interest. As a result, the agent is under a general duty to follow the instructions given by the principal. However, the agent is not obliged to follow instructions which would require the agent to act illegally (see Cohen v Kittell (1889) 22 QBD 680). Moreover, the agent is under a duty to warn the principal of any risks and dangers inherent in such instructions. The duty of a professional agent to obey instructions can also be limited by rules of conduct of a given profession: it may be that the agent cannot be required to perform acts which are contrary to such rules (Hawkins v Pearse (1903) 9 Com Cas 87). An agent who fails to follow legal instructions can be liable for damages for breach of contract (Turpin v Bilton (1843) 5 Man & G 455). The rule is strict and the agent will be liable for not following the instructions even if the agent thought this action was in the best interest of the principal (Volkers v Midland Doherty Ltd (1985) 17 DLR (4^{th}) 343). However, the rule of strict performance can be limited if an actual implied authority allows the agent some discretion. If there is such an actual implied authority, the agent may have a duty to warn the principal of any risks or dangers which are inherent in the instructions, i.e. that the principal may suffer loss if the agent follows such instructions. The agent may also have a fiduciary obligation to warn the principal (Clark Boyce v Mouat [1994] 1 AC 428).

15. Under the ESTONIAN LOA § 621(1) the agent is generally bound by the instructions of the principal. It will not make a difference if the agent, by following the direction, may not achieve the result envisaged by the principal. However, the principal is not allowed to give specific instructions concerning the manner or conditions of performance of the duties of the agent in the case where the agent is expected to perform duties based on specific professional skills or abilities (LOA § 621(1)). In that case, the agent is free to decide on the specifics of the performance. In all other cases the agent may deviate from the instructions of the principal only if adherence to the instructions of the principal would be likely to cause unfavourable consequences for the principal (in which case the agent must comply with the instructions only after having called the principal's attention to such consequences and if the principal fails to modify the instructions; LOA § 621(3)).

16. In FINLAND the agent is required to follow the principal's reasonable directions, but this depends on the circumstances (type of mandate etc.). In general, the agent is not required to follow directions if they are unreasonable, illegal or against good practice (e.g. if the directions are harmful for a third party). In some cases, e.g. where the principal is a consumer and in the case of lawyers, the agent is not generally entitled to follow unreasonable directions. A lawyer is required, or at least entitled, to withdraw from the mandate relationship if the principal continuously gives unlawful or unreasonable directions (CConduct § 15). The agent should inform the principal if the agent is not going to follow the directions.

17. In FRANCE in the case of an agency contract, the agent is obliged to comply with the instructions given by the principal, whether given at the time of conclusion of the contract or subsequently. If the instructions given by the principal to the agent result in a possible failure of the performance of the mandate, the agent is nonetheless required to follow such instructions, but in the case of a professional agent, the latter will be required, in order to satisfy the duty of advice, to inform the principal about such risks. The sole limit is when the directions given by the principal are contrary to law.

18. In GERMANY the agent is required to follow directions by the principal (CC § 665) and must always inform the principal before deviating from directions, unless time does not permit this as 'danger' is ahead. The agent will only be allowed to ignore directions if it may be assumed that the principal would tolerate this step if aware of the circumstances. If the principal (after having been advised and warned) insists on a direction that the agent considers to be inappropriate (or even stupid), the agent has the choice between following it or terminating the mandate relationship. The may not impose another assessment of the situation upon the principal.

19. In the case of a mandate contract, GREEK legal theory and court practice distinguish between binding and indicative directions. The agent is obliged to strict compliance with binding directions from the principal, even if the former has doubts about the necessity of those directions or if the performance of the mandate requires the specific knowledge and experience of the agent (Kapodistrias, Art. 713 GREEK CC nr. 33; CA Athens decision no. 10148/1987, EllDni 1988, 353). With regard to indicative directions, the agent is free to make decisions, express doubts about the necessity of the directions and give advice to the principal (Kapodistrias, Art. 713 GREEK CC nr. 34). Furthermore the agent is required to deviate from the limits set in the mandate, if such a deviation is required by good faith (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 717 GREEK CC nr. 4). The duty of the agent to notify the principal about deviation from the limits set in the mandate is regulated in CC art. 717: 'An agent may only deviate from the limits set in the mandate if he found himself in the impossibility to notify the principal and it is at the same time obvious that the principal would have allowed the deviation if he had knowledge of the circumstances that prompted such deviation.' From that rule it is implied that if it is possible for the agent to notify the principal about the intended deviation, the former is required to wait for further directions from the latter for the performance of the mandate. If it is impossible for the agent to notify the principal about the deviation from the directions, the agent is required after the performance of the mandate to inform the principal about the necessity of the deviation and the impossibility of notification (CC art. 718); otherwise, the principal may claim damages (CC art. 714; CA Athens decision no. 10148/1987, EllDni 1988, 353).

20. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 474(2), '[a]n agent must fulfil the principal's instructions and represent his interests regarding the authority conferred upon him'. CC art. 476 establishes that '[i]f the principal issues imprudent or incompetent instructions, the agent shall call the principal's attention to the matter. If the principal insists on the instructions despite the warning, he shall be liable for the damages sustained on account of the instructions'. Moreover, CC art. 477(2) establishes that '[t]he agent shall be entitled to depart from the principal's instructions only if it is essential for the principal's interest and if there is no time to notify the principal in advance. In such a case the principal shall be notified without delay'. In case of commission agency, CC art. 508 establishes that '[i]f the commission agent concludes a sales contract under better conditions for the principal as defined in the commission agency contract, the benefit originating therefrom shall be due to the principal. If the commission agent makes a sale for a price below the one specified in the commission agency contract, he shall reimburse the principal for the difference, unless he is able to prove that the sales contract could not have been concluded at the stipulated price, that by making the sale he saved the principal from losses, and that he was not able to notify the principal in time. If the commission agent substantially departs from the conditions stipulated in the commission agency contract, the principal shall be entitled to reject the sales contract, unless the commission agent has effected purchase at a higher price than stipulated but agreed to reimburse the difference.'

21. In IRELAND at common law, an agent must obey the principal's lawful instructions. Moreover, a professional agent may be under a duty to warn the principal of any risks or dangers inherent in the instructions given.

22. In ITALY, as a rule, the agent is required to follow the directions given by the principal. In cases where a departure from the directions may be justified (e.g. if the agent, by following the principal's directions, may not achieve the result envisaged by the principal), the agent must inform the principal of the intention and explain the reasons justifying a departure from the principal's instructions. In particular, the agent has to inform the principal of the (new) circumstances that may justify the extinction or an alteration of the obligations under the contract of representation (CC art. 1710(2)). See Supreme Court 11 Dec 1995, no. 12647, Foro it., 1996, I, 544; Supreme Court 18 Mar 1997, no. 2387, Corriere giur., 1997, 903, with comments by Stella.

23. In the NETHERLANDS according to CC art. 7:402(1), the agent is bound to obey timely and well considered directions regarding the performance of the contract.

24. In POLAND the agent should follow the directions of the principal. If there are no directions given, the agent is free to choose how to best carry out the obligations. However, it is not clear whether the principal may give binding directions only when the contract with the agent is concluded or at any time.

25. In SCOTLAND, in a gratuitous mandate, the agent's most fundamental duty was said to be to follow the principal's instructions (Erskine, III,3,35; Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], no. 220). Erskine also indicated that an agent was bound to obey the principal's instructions even if the agent considers that an alternative course of action would be 'more rational.' (Erskine, III,3,35). In modern agency law, as in gratuitous mandate, the agent's principal duty is to follow the principal's instructions (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 84). It is likely therefore that the agent would not have the right to depart from the principal's instructions simply because the agent considered that they were unlikely to achieve the desired object of the agency relationship. Failure to follow the principal's instructions would be a breach by the agent rendering the agent liable to the principal in damages. The agent will not, however, be liable to the principal for any losses suffered by the principal as a direct result of the ambiguity of the principal's instructions (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 84; Ireland v Livingston (1872) LR 5 HL 395).

26. In SLOVAKIA the agent is required to follow the principal's directions. In civil relations, the agent may diverge from the principal's instructions only if it is required by the latter's interest and if the agent cannot obtain the principal's consent in time. Otherwise the agent will be liable for damages (CC § 725). In commercial relations, the agent may depart from the principal's instructions only if it is necessary and in the interest of the principal, and if it is impossible to receive the principal's approval in time, except if it is prohibited by the mandate or by the principal (Ccom § 567(3). The agent has to inform the principal about all of the issues that may have an influence on the principal's directions (Ccom § 567(2)). The commission agent may depart from the principal's instructions only if it is in the interest of the principal and if the agent unable to obtain the latter's consent in time.

27. In SPAIN the agent must, as a rule, follow the instructions of the principal (CC art. 1719). These can be given at the time the contract is concluded or later on (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII[2], 461 and 473). According to the STS of 26 May 1964, instructions can be mandatory, which means that the agent is compelled to follow them and cannot deviate from them even when acting in the interests of the principal would require such deviation, or non-mandatory, which are those which leave much discretion to the agent to act according to the interests of the principal. In cases of the latter type, where a departure from the directions may be justified with a view to the achievement of the commission, the agent must inform the principal of the intention to deviate and explain the reasons justifying a departure from the principal's instructions (Ccom art. 255 II). In particular, the agent has to inform the principal of the new circumstances that may justify the extinction or an alteration of the obligations under the contract of representation

28. In SWEDEN the agent is required to follow the principal's directions but only if they are reasonable. All circumstances of the case should be considered when determining whether directions are reasonable or not. The principal's directions must be in accordance with good business practice. Directions contrary to law are considered unreasonable (Tiberg and Dotevall, Mellanmansrätt[9], 117).

III. Obligation to warn

29. For AUSTRIA see Note 10 above.

30. In BELGIUM when an important event (un fait majeur) intervenes, the agent is obliged to inform the principal in advance to enable the principal to change or revoke the instructions (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V[2], 405; Paulus und Boes, Lastgeving, 90; Wéry, Le mandat, 146-147). A professional agent may not follow the instructions blindly. When the performance of the mandate according to the principal's instructions entails a risk, the agent has a preliminary duty of advice and information (CFI Bergen 9 May 1996, RGAR 1998, n° 12.911; CFI Antwerpen 6 Oct 1992, RW 1994-95, 885; Herbots/Stijns/Degroote/Lauwers/ Samoy, TPR 2002, 57, n° 906); Wéry, Le mandat, 147).

31. In BULGARIA every mandate contract is considered to be concluded under the implied condition that the agent must act in accordance with the interests of the principal in the best possible manner under the existing circumstances (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 120). Hence, the agent is deemed obliged to warn the principal if the agent thinks observance of the given directions will not result in conclusion of the prospective contract or will bring about significant expenses or extra time, etc., and to ask for new instructions (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 121). If the principal does not revoke the directions, the agent has two options: (a) to continue the contractual performance following the directions; (b) to terminate the mandate contract (Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 237).

32. In DENMARK in general, the agent must follow (legal) directions given by the principal on how to perform the contract. The agent may, of course, query the wisdom of a direction. If the principal insists, the agent must at any rate warn the principal of the consequences of upholding the direction. If the task proves to be (essentially) more difficult than initially envisaged by the parties, the agent will normally be entitled to claim a higher price; the terms of the contract will likely be renegotiated under such circumstances. If no such renegotiation takes place, the agent must warn the principal that the costs will be higher if the new instructions are to be followed.

33. In ENGLAND the agent is not obliged to follow instructions which would require the agent to act illegally. Moreover, the agent is under a duty to warn the principal of any risks and dangers inherent in such instructions, especially if the agent can be said to have some discretion due to an actual implied authority. The agent may also have a fiduciary obligation to do so (Clark Boyce v Mouat [1994] 1 AC 428). Finally, the obligation of a professional agent to follow instructions may be limited by the professional rules of conduct of the given profession of the agent.

34. In ESTONIA in all cases where the agent wishes to deviate from the instructions of the principal, the agent must so inform the principal and wait for the principal's decision, unless a delay would be likely to cause unfavourable consequences for the principal and if it may be presumed under the circumstances that the principal will approve of the deviation.

35. In FINLAND if the directions are still within the limits of the agreed mandate, the agent is generally required to follow them, even if it makes the fulfilment of the contract somewhat more difficult. However, the agent is not required to follow unreasonable directions. Unless expressly agreed otherwise or when the circumstances do not show otherwise, the agent is not entitled to an additional price for extra work. The question of price is, however, somewhat unclear and depends highly on circumstances. The agent is usually required to inform the principal that the price will be higher (as described above, this often means that the agreement has to be altered).

36. In FRANCE if the principal's instructions might lead to the failure of the mandate, the agent is nonetheless required to follow such instructions, but has to inform the principal in order to comply with the duty to give advice as a professional agent. On the basis of a general obligation of fair dealing, which applies to the agent, the latter should inform the principal of any possible additional expense involved by new instructions, and ensure that the parties agree on such additional expenses. The French courts have accepted that the remuneration set out in the agency contract may be revised if the mandate carried out does not correspond to the remuneration initially envisaged.

37. In GERMANY the agent must warn the principal if a direction is problematic. The existence and scope of such an implied duty depend upon the circumstances of the case, primarily on the particular expertise of the agent: Courts have imposed a duty to warn e.g. on attorneys and banks (see Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 665 no. 9).

38. In GREECE in case of a gratuitous mandate contract, the agent is required to follow the directions given by the principal even if that would make the task more difficult to fulfil and would cause more expenses for the principal. However, the agent is required by good faith (CC art. 288) to warn the principal that the expenses will be higher if the directions are followed. If the agent decides not to comply with the directions of the principal the former is obliged to inform the latter of non-compliance with the directions. Due to the gratuitous character of the mandate, the question of the right of the agent to a higher price arises only in the case of services of agency offered by a lawyer. In such a case, the lawyer is required by good faith (CC art. 288) to warn the principal that there is no obligation to follow the principal's directions and that if they are followed the price will be higher.

39. In HUNGARY CC art. 476 establishes that '[i]f the principal issues imprudent or incompetent instructions, the agent shall call the principal's attention to the matter. If the principal insists on the instructions despite the warning, he shall be liable for the damages sustained on account of the instructions'. Furthermore, '[t]he agent shall be entitled to depart from the principal's instructions only if it is essential for the principal's interest and if there is no time to notify the principal in advance. In such a case the principal shall be notified without delay' (CC art. 477(2)).

40. In IRELAND at common law, a professional agent may be under a duty to warn the principal of any risks or dangers inherent in the instructions given.

41. In ITALY the agent has to inform the principal promptly if the agent intends not to follow the directions received in order to obtain the principal's authorisation. According to the good faith principle the agent has to warn the principal that the price will be higher if the directions are followed. The agent would otherwise be liable for non-performance because of exceeding the limits of the mandate (CC art. 1711). See T. Milano, 16-02-1989, Giur. it., 1989, I, 2, 628.

42. In the NETHERLANDS if the agent is reasonably unwilling to perform the mandate contract according to the principal's directions, the agent may terminate the contractual relationship for serious cause if the principal nevertheless keeps to the directions (CC art. 7:403(2)). However, there is no specific duty of the agent to warn the principal.

43. In POLAND a duty to warn for bad directions could be derived from the general duty of taking due care in contractual relations (CC art. 355).

44. In SCOTLAND an obligation to warn in the circumstances indicated in paragraph (3) of the Article would follow from the agent's duty of good faith and obligation of skill and care. If the principal insisted on the direction, the result would depend on the contract, on the nature of the direction and on the application of general rules. Often the agent would be not only bound, but also content, to follow the direction - e.g. if the contract provided for payment for any extra work or expenses or if the direction, although detrimental to the interests of the principal, would not increase work or expenses. But if the agent perceived the direction as an unacceptable attempt by the principal to change the contract (e.g. by demanding considerably more work for the same fixed price) then the position would usually resolve itself into renegotiation or termination.

45. In SLOVAKIA the rule that the agent must act in the interest of the principal and the good faith principle should be the ground for the agent's duty to warn the principal if the instructions are bad. If the principal does not change the instructions, the agent will be obliged to follow them, or terminate the relationship. Advocates are obliged to follow the principal's directions unless they are unlawful, in which case the advocate must inform the client.

46. In SPAIN the agent must warn the principal if the following of a direction is problematic. As far as this direction has and could not have been contemplated by the parties when agreeing on the price, the agent will be entitled to compensation for additional expenses. However, in no case is the agent entitled to proceed against the principal's upholding of the old instructions (Ccom art. 256). The agent is not bound to follow instructions when that ought to be regarded as a change in the content of the mandate. Finally, the agent may in such a situation withdraw due to good cause (CC art. 1735).

47. In SWEDEN the agent is required to follow the principal's directions as long as these are not unreasonable. Hence, the agent has to follow directions even if these make the task more difficult. The agent is entitled to a higher price (additional price) in case the direction involves additional work or if a rise in price is due to circumstances on behalf of the principal and which the agent could not have foreseen at the time of conclusion of the contract. A duty to warn the principal follows from the main duty to act in the interest of the principal.

IV. Principal may revoke direction

48. In AUSTRIA the principal is entitled to revoke the direction when informed of the consequences (Strasser, § 1009 Rz 14; SZ 4/51; Stanzl, 815; Straube (-Griss), HGB I[3], § 384, no. 3; Schütz, § 408 Rz 11).

49. In BELGIUM the principal may revoke the instructions (Wéry, Le mandat, 161).

50. In BULGARIA there is no explicit rule. As the principal is considered "master of the mandate contract", the principal would appear to be entitled to revoke given directions at any time.

51. In DENMARK if the agent has not yet revealed the new instructions towards any third party, the principal is entitled to revoke the direction.

52. In ENGLAND if there is an obligation on the agent to warn the principal of the potential dangers for the principal if the agent follows the instructions strictly, the principal is free to follow the advice of the agent and to modify the instructions accordingly.

53. In ESTONIA the principal is entitled to revoke the direction when warned by the agent.

54. In FINLAND the principal is entitled to revoke the directions.

55. In FRANCE the principal may, having been informed of additional costs or detrimental effects, cancel the instructions previously given to the agent.

56. In GERMANY the principal may at any time revoke the direction. Otherwise, there would not be a need for an obligation to warn.

57. In GREECE in case of a gratuitous mandate contract, apart from an irrevocable grant of directions, the directions that the principal has given to the agent are revocable until the performance has been completed (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 717 GREEK CC nr. 4). The same applies in case of intermediation.

58. The HUNGARIAN CC art. 476 provides that '[i]f the principal issues imprudent or incompetent instructions, the agent shall call the principal's attention to the matter. If the principal insists on the instructions despite the warning, he shall be liable for the damages sustained on account of the instructions.'

59. In IRELAND a principal may revoke any directions.

60. In ITALY as a rule, the principal is entitled to revoke the directions given to the agent if informed of new consequences that have an impact on them. According to CC art. 1723, '[t]he principal can revoke the mandate but if it was agreed that the mandate should be irrevocable, he is liable for damages, unless revocation is made for a just cause. A mandate which is given also in the interest of the agent or of third persons is not extinguished by revocation by the principal, unless it is otherwise agreed or unless there is a just cause for such revocation; it is not extinguished by the death or supervening incapacity of the principal'. A just cause for revocation may lie in malicious and negligent behaviour of the agent (CC art. 1218) or the fact that the agent does not respect the instructions received by the principal (CC art. 1711).

61. In POLAND the principal is free to give directions when the contract is concluded. It is not clear whether the principal may give new directions or change given directions after the agent has begun to act.

62. In SCOTLAND the principal could revoke a direction and one situation where this might be done would be where the agent had drawn attention to the fact that it could have detrimental effects.

63. In SLOVAKIA there is no specific rule, but in principle, the possibility to revoke the direction depends on the progress of the performance and on the possible effects to third parties.

64. In SPAIN, though there is no special rule, it is clear that the instructions to be followed are the ones addressed at the time of the contract as well as new instructions given by the principal (León, Comentario, p. 1549).

65. In SWEDEN the principal may revoke a direction by a new direction unless such new direction is unreasonable. The agent is entitled to a higher price (additional price) in case the new direction involves additional work.

IV.D.–4:102: Request for a direction

(1) The agent must ask for a direction on obtaining information which requires the principal to make a decision pertaining to the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract or the content of the prospective contract.

(2) The agent must ask for a direction if the mandated task is the conclusion of a prospective contract and the mandate contract does not determine whether the mandate is for direct representation or indirect representation.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Under this Article the agent is obliged to ask for directions from the principal in two main situations: (1) when the agent needs a decision of the principal pertaining to the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract or the content of the prospective contract and (2) when the agent needs the direction of the principal as to whether the mandate is for direct or indirect representation.

B. Direction as to performance of obligations or as to contents of prospective contract

The situation regulated here is where the agent has received information either from the principal or from another source, which indicates that it may not be possible to perform the mandate (typically to conclude the prospective contract) as stated or envisaged by the principal at the time of conclusion of the contract, or that the conclusion of the prospective contract may become significantly more expensive or take significantly more time than agreed upon in the mandate contract. The same would of course apply if the conclusion of the prospective contract could damage other interests of the principal of which the agent knows or could reasonably be expected to know. In this respect, it would not matter whether the danger stems from a defect or inconsistency in the mandate of the agent (be it in the mandate contract itself or a subsequent direction) or from the occurrence of other expected or unexpected events. One such event could be the development of the negotiations with the third party. It can easily be envisaged that during such negotiations the agent may realise that in order to conclude the prospective contract, it would be necessary to act beyond the mandate. Where there is time to contact the principal, the agent is required to do so in order not to breach the contractual obligations, as on the one hand the agent may not exceed the mandate, but on the other hand is required to act in the best interests of the principal. Paragraph (1) of this Article indicates what the agent then has to do: ask for a direction. The principal subsequently is required to give such a direction under IV.D.–2:101 (Obligation to co-operate) paragraph (2)(b).

C. Direct or indirect representation

Typically the parties to a mandate contract calling for the conclusion of a contract by the agent for the principal indicate expressly or implicitly whether the agent is to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal. If that is the case, the agent will be required to act in such manner, as follows from IV.D.–3:101 (Obligation to act in accordance with mandate). It should be remarked that even if the parties have not expressly indicated how the agent is to act, this may follow from custom or usage. In such a case, the parties will have implicitly chosen to follow the rules dictated by custom or usage.

The present Article clearly indicates that it is the principal who decides how to be represented, i.e. by way of direct or indirect representation. The principal may indicate that when the mandate contract is concluded or afterwards by way of a direction, cf. IV.D.–4:101 (Directions given by principal) paragraph (1). When the principal does not (expressly or tacitly) indicate how the agent is to act, the agent must ask for clarification on this point (paragraph (2)).

NOTES

I. Agent's obligation to ask for direction if direction needed for performance of mandate contract

1. In BELGIUM when an important event (un fait majeur) intervenes, the agent is obliged to inform the principal in advance to enable the principal to change or revoke the instructions (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V[2], 405; Paulus und Boes, Lastgeving, 90; Wéry, Le mandat, 146-147).
2. In BULGARIA an agent who thinks that the prospective contract cannot be concluded at all or under the conditions determined by the principal, is obliged to ask for further directions, unless there is not enough time for this (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 120-121).
3. In ENGLAND there does not seem to be any specific case dealing with this specific situation. English law only seems to cover the situations when authority given by the principal is ambiguous. In such a situation, any reasonable interpretation of such authority done in good faith by the agent will be binding on the principal, even if this is not what the principal had intended (Ireland v Livingston [1872] LR 5 HL 395). It is suggested that since nowadays it is easier to obtain clarification, an agent who fails to do so would be liable (Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[18], no. 3.016). In relation to the specific scenario at hand, considering that the agent is under an obligation to exercise skill and care when performing the mandate, and act for the best interest of the principal, should the agent fail to ask directions when direction was needed, the agent would no doubt be in breach of such obligations.
4. In ESTONIA no such specific duty is prescribed by law. As far as the agent is under a duty to act in the best interest of the principal (LOA § 620(2)), such duty could require the agent to ask, in specific situations, for directions if the interests of the principal are unclear. The agent is under the duty to warn the principal and ask for directions if an existing direction could have an apparent adverse effect to the interests of the principal (LOA § 621(3)).
5. In FRANCE there is no specific duty for the agent to ask for directions, but it may result from the general duty to comply with the mandate contract in accordance with the interest of the principal and without making mistakes (CC art. 1992).
6. The GERMAN CC § 665 requires the agent to ask for direction when contemplating any deviation from the mandate contract or from directions previously received.
7. In HUNGARY according to the CC art. 477(1), 'The agent shall inform his principal of his activities and the state of affairs upon request or, if necessary, even without a request, particularly if employment of another person has become necessary or if the instructions need to be changed due to the occurrence of new circumstances'.

8. In IRELAND the common law does not comprise detailed rules as to the agent's duties, as are outlined in the black letter rules. An express duty to ask for directions does not exist at common law, but would probably come within the agent's duty to exercise reasonable skill and care, or the wider fiduciary duties owed to the principal. Further, an agent is obliged to obey the principal's instruction's and where instructions are ambiguous (e.g. where it is not clear from the principal's instructions whether the agent is to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal) it has been held that an agent will not be held liable for acting on a reasonable interpretation of the instructions (Ireland v Livingstone [1872] LR 5 HL 395), though an agent should seek clarification, where possible (Woodhouse AC Israel Cocoa Ltd SA v Nigerian Produce Marketing Co Ltd [1972] AC 741 at 772 per Lord Salmon; European Asian Bank AG v Punjab & Sind Bank [1983] 2 All ER 508 at 517 per Goff LJ).

9. In the NETHERLANDS there are no specific rules that apply to this situation but the general articles on due care (CC art. 7:401) and giving directions (CC art. 7:402) may apply and may require a request to be made in the circumstances indicated.

10. The POLISH CC provisions on mandate contain no such duty. If no directions are given the agent is free to choose how to best carry out the agreement.

11. In SCOTLAND there appears to be no specific rule of law requiring the agent to ask for directions in this particular situation. However, the agent's most fundamental duty is to carry out the undertaking, according to the instructions, with the requisite degree of skill and care (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 530 and Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', paras. 84-87). It is likely that an agent would be found to have breached this duty if the agent failed to request instructions in a situation where a direction is required.

12. In SLOVAKIA the agent's duty of care implies an obligation to ask for direction if it is needed for performance.

13. In SPAIN, though there is no special rule, the duty in question follows from the implied duty to act in the best interest of the principal.

14. In SWEDEN it follows from general contract law rules that the agent has a duty to ask for a direction if needed for the performance of the mandate contract. In particular this is the case if the agent feels compelled to deviate from the principal's previous instructions (see KommL § 8).

II. Agent's obligation to ask for direction whether to act in own name or in name of principal

15. In BELGIUM there is no duty for the agent to ask for directions on whether to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal. In the absence of express instructions, a (civil law) agent is presumed to have been instructed to act in the name of the principal (Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 305-306; Wéry, Le mandat, 151). In the absence of express instructions, a (commercial law) commission-agent on the contrary is – according to trade customs – presumed to have been instructed to act in the agent's own name (Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux, 611; RPDB, v° Commission, no. 132; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 511; Van Ryn & Heenen, 21).

16. In BULGARIA the agent needs a power of attorney to act in the name of the principal (see Notes under IV.D.–3:101 (Obligation to act in accordance with mandate). Granting this authority is deemed to be an instruction to the agent to act in the name of the principal (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 22). In case of reasonable doubt, the requirement to perform with the care of "a good householder" obliges the agent to ask whether to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal.

17. In ENGLAND there does not seem to be any specific case law on this example. As mentioned earlier, this issue is crucial. It is therefore thought that, if it is not clear whether the agent is to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal, the agent should ask the principal to clarify. Failing to do that, the agent would probably be found to be in breach of the obligation of due care and skill. If the agent cannot get in touch with the principal, it seems that the agent should act as another reasonable agent in a similar trade would do. Since disclosed agency seems more common than undisclosed agency, it would probably be regarded as reasonable for the agent to act in the name of the principal.

18. In ESTONIA no such specific duty is prescribed by law. As far as the agent is under a duty to act in the best interest of the principal (LOA § 620(2)), such duty could require the agent to ask, if no such direction exists and the interests of the principal are unclear, for directions as to whether to act in the agent's own name or not.

19. In FRANCE there is no specific duty for the agent to ask for directions on whether to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal, but the agent is not free to decide whether to act as agent or as 'commission agent'. When this is unclear, the agent has every interest in requesting the principal to confirm which type of agency has been agreed, because if there is a dispute, the judge will have to decide which of the two types of agency should apply, depending on the terms of the contract and the evidence. If it appears that the agent has made a mistake concerning the type of agency which has been put in place, the agent will be liable for the consequences (CC art. 1992).

20. In GERMANY if the mandate contract does not determine whether the mandate is for direct or indirect representation, it is up to the agent to make the choice (Seiler, in: Münchener Kommentar zum BGB[4], § 662 no. 19). Absent special circumstances, there is no duty to ask the principal.

21. In HUNGARY the agent can only act in the name of the principal if the agent has a power of attorney to do so.

22. In POLAND the representation under the mandate contract is presumed to be direct unless the parties have agreed otherwise.

23. In SCOTLAND whether the agent acts in the principal's or in the agent's own name is a fundamental issue and, as such, it is not likely that the agent has the power to make this decision without recourse to the principal. It is suggested therefore that, in any case of doubt and in the absence of a governing usage or practice in a particular field of activity, an agent in this situation would be bound to request a direction from the principal.

24. In SLOVAKIA in civil relations, without a grant of authority to act in the name of the principal, the agent must act in the agent's own name or ask for directions. In commercial relations, the contract is not concluded without specifying whether the agent is to act in the principal's or agent's name.

25. In SPAIN, though there is no special rule, the obligation in question can be derived from the implied duty to act in the best interest of the principal

26. In SWEDEN if the parties have not regulated whether the agent is to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal and it does not follow from other circumstances, the agent is free to decide the matter. However, if the agent chooses to act in the agent's own name there is the risk of being considered a party to the prospective contract as it is presumed that when you act in your own name you also act on your own behalf and account (Ramberg & Ramberg, 50).

IV.D.–4:103: Consequences of failure to give a direction

(1) If the principal fails to give a direction when required to do so under the mandate contract or under paragraph (1) of IV.D.–4:102 (Request for a direction), the agent may, in so far as relevant, resort to any of the remedies under Book III, Chapter 3 (Remedies for Non-Performance) or base performance upon the expectations, preferences and priorities the principal might reasonably be expected to have, given the information and directions that have been gathered.

(2) Where the agent bases performance upon the expectations, preferences and priorities the principal might reasonably be expected to have, the agent has a right to a proportionate adjustment of the price and of the time allowed or required for the conclusion of the prospective contract.

(3) If the principal fails to give a direction under paragraph (2) of IV.D.–4:102 (Request for a direction), the agent may choose direct representation or indirect representation or may withhold performance under III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation).

(4) The adjusted price that is to be paid under paragraph (2) must be reasonable and is to be determined using the same methods of calculation as were used to establish the original price for the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This provision sets out the consequences if the principal does not give a direction, even though required to do so under the contract or if the agent asks for a direction under IV.D.–4:102 (Request for a direction).

The Article proposes different systems of remedies depending on the situation. The remedy for not giving a direction as to the question whether the agent is to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal (IV.D.–4:102 (Request for a direction) paragraph (2)), is given in paragraph (2) of the present Article: the agent is free to choose how to act. The agent may also withhold performance.

B. Choice of remedies

As regards the remedies for the non-performance by the principal of the obligation to give directions when the agent is in need of such directions in order to continue performance, two possible set of remedies can be chosen, as stated in paragraph (1). On the one hand the agent may invoke the application of the general remedies for non-performance of an obligation. On the other hand, if the agent chooses to continue performance, there is a right to adapt performance to the expectations, preferences and priorities the principal may reasonably be expected to have, given the information and directions that have been gathered, and claim a proportionate adjustment of the price and of the time allowed or required for the conclusion of the prospective contract.

Illustration

A principal instructs an agent to negotiate the purchase of a certain sculpture, without indicating clearly a maximum price for the sculpture. The parties agreed that the agent would have two weeks for performing the task. After one week, the agent has found a third party, the owner of the sculpture, willing to sell it for €10,000. The agent informs the principal of this and asks what answer is to be given to the third party. The principal however remains silent for another week.

Under the present Article the agent may claim damages if, as a result of the delay in the principal answering the request for a direction, the contract can no longer be concluded (Book III, Chapter III, Section 7). The agent may also terminate the mandate relationship for non-performance in so far as the non-performance of the obligation to give the direction amounts to a fundamental non-performance under III.–3:502 (Termination for fundamental non-performance)). The agent may also assume that the principal agrees to the purchase price if this could reasonably be expected in the circumstances of the case, taking into account the express and implied wishes of the principal as these may be known to the agent (paragraph (1). The agent may claim extra time for performance of the mandate (paragraph (2). If the price has to be renegotiated because of the principal's failure to give a direction, the agent has a right to extra remuneration (paragraph (2).

NOTES

I. Remedies for failure to give direction

1. In BELGIUM the law on mandate is silent on this question. General contract law (precontractual duties to inform and the duty to execute the contract in good faith (CC art. 1134(3)) can oblige the principal to give directions to the agent, if the directions are necessary to fulfil the mission.
2. In BULGARIA there are no specific rules regulating remedies for failure of the principal to give directions; general contract rules are applicable. When the agent needs information or directions from the principal in order to perform the contractual obligations, the latter has no actual obligation to give directions, but rather a requirement or mere burden (Тежест, Obliegenheit) to give assistance. Therefore, if the principal does not give the necessary instructions, neither voluntarily nor upon request, there is no breach of contractual obligation, but a case of mora creditoris (Забава на кредитора) (LOA art. 95; Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 110; Апостолов, Облигационно право[2], 331). If this is the case, the agent can terminate the contract and claim the expenses due to mora creditoris (LOA art. 98; Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 111; Кожухаров, Облигационно право[2], I, 352).
3. In ENGLAND there is no specific rule dealing with this particular point.
4. In ESTONIA there is no specific rule on this point but there is a general duty to cooperate with the other party in good faith in order to achieve due performance of the agreement (LOA § 23(2)). If the principal fails to provide instructions when bound to do so and this leads to non-performance of the mandate, the representative will be able to avoid liability as the non performance would be attributable to the principal (LOA § 101(3)).
5. FRENCH law is silent on this, but it is undoubtedly the case that a refusal to reply to questions raised by the agent would exclude the liability of the latter where the mandate failed or was improperly performed. However, the agent could remain liable to any third party contractor (see Cass.civ. 1re, 13 Nov. 1997, Bull.civ. 1997 I, no. 308).
6. Should the principal fail to give the required directions, the GERMAN CC § 665 entitles the agent to perform the mandate in accordance with the preferences the agent may assume the principal to have under the given circumstances. As far as this changed performance of the mandate contract could not have been contemplated by the parties when agreeing on the price, the agent will be entitled to compensation for additional expenses (CC § 670).

7. In the NETHERLANDS there are no specific rules that apply in this situation other than CC art. 7:402.

8. There are no specific POLISH CC provisions (neither a duty to ask for a direction nor a duty to give such directions).

9. In SCOTLAND if the principal provides defective instructions the agent is not liable to the principal for any losses suffered as a direct result of the ambiguity of the instructions (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 84; Ireland v Livingston (1872) LR 5 HL 395). In a situation where the agent does not possess adequate instructions and is unable to obtain clarification, it is suggested that the agent should proceed on the basis of what a reasonable principal would have instructed. In this way the agent will avoid being liable for any losses suffered by the principal. Scottish law contains no specific mechanism allowing an adjustment of the price in the agent's favour in this situation. This might only be possible in situations where, either in terms of the contract or at common law, the agent is entitled to payment of a reasonable fee.

10. For civil relations, the consequences of the creditor's delay are regulated in the SLOVAKIAN CC § 522 (duty to reimburse the agent's expenses occurred during the time of delay; civil liability for damages). For commercial relations, see the general rules on remedies for non performance (Ccom § 344 et seq.)

11. In SPAIN, if there are no instructions from the principal, the agent is to act in accordance with the diligence of the good father of a family (bonus paterfamilias) (CC art. 1719(2)).

12. In SWEDEN if the principal fails to give a direction when obliged to, this constitutes a non-performance. The agent is entitled to damages and termination if the non-performance is fundamental. Furthermore, the agent is not in breach of contract if the agent takes action or is passive due to the principal's failure to give directions. This follows from general contract law.

II. Remedy for failure to indicate whether to act in own name or in name of principal

13. In BULGARIA when it is not stipulated in the mandate contract whether the representation is direct or indirect and the principal does not answer the request for more clarity on this matter, the agent can either perform the mandate in the agent's own name or terminate the relationship. The agent needs a power of attorney to act in the name of the principal.

14. In ENGLAND, in the absence of any case law dealing with this specific issue, a possible solution would be that the agent should act according to customs of the relevant trade or profession.

15. In ESTONIA if the mandate agreement does not provide whether the agent is to act in the agent's own name or not and the interests of the principal are unclear the agent is entitled to ask for instructions from the principal. If no instructions are provided, the agent must act according to the presumed interests of the principal, if the agent exercised due care in identifying such interests (LOA § 620(2)) and has acted accordingly the will not be in breach of any duties and has performed the mandate in accordance with the agreement.

16. Under GERMAN law, it is always up to the agent to choose between acting in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal.

17. In POLAND, since the representation is presumed to be direct, the principal has no duty to indicate whether the agent should act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal.

18. In SCOTLAND where the principal fails to provide instructions on whether the agent is to act in the principal's or the agent's own name, it is suggested that, in the absence of governing usages in the field of activity concerned, the agent would be best advised to act in the principal's name (i.e. in such a way as to affect the principal's legal position directly), this being the more common method of acting. In the case of serious doubt the agent may even be best advised to refuse to act.

19. In SLOVAKIA if the principal does not grant authority to act in the principal's name, it is presumed that the agent has to act in the agent's own name.

20. In SPAIN, apart from the right to withdraw, the agent has to act as agent in alieno nomine, because this is the residual rule.

21. In SWEDEN the principal has a duty to answer requests for information in order for the agent to be able to perform according to the contract. If the principal fails to do so such failure is considered to be a non-performance and the principal could be liable to pay damages to the agent in case the agent suffers any loss (HaL §§ 7 and 34).

IV.D.–4:104: No time to ask or wait for direction

(1) If the agent is required to ask for a direction under IV.D.–4:102 (Request for a direction) but needs to act before being able to contact the principal and to ask for a direction, or needs to act before the direction is given, the agent may base performance upon the expectations, preferences and priorities the principal might reasonably be expected to have, given the information and directions that have been gathered.

(2) In the situation referred to in paragraph (1), the agent has a right to a proportionate adjustment of the price and of the time allowed or required for the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract in so far as such an adjustment is reasonable given the circumstances of the case.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article deals with the situation where immediate action is required by the agent in order to prevent detrimental consequences for the principal. The situation is so urgent that the agent has no time to ask or wait for a direction from the principal. If such is the case, the agent is entitled under this Article to continue performing on the basis of the expectations, preferences and priorities the principal may reasonably be expected to have, given the information and directions that have been gathered. The agent may subsequently claim a proportionate adjustment of the price and of the time allowed or required for the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract (typically, the conclusion of the prospective contract) in so far as such an adjustment is reasonable given the circumstances of the case.

In the situation in which the principal does not indicate whether the representation is to be direct or indirect and the agent does not have time to ask for clarification on this point, then the agent may determine whether to act in the agent's own name or in the name of the principal.

B. Relation to rule on acting beyond mandate

In the situations covered by this Article, the agent may have to act beyond the scope of the mandate. As indicated under IV.D.–3:201 (Acting beyond mandate), the agent is only allowed to act beyond the scope of the mandate when certain conditions, enumerated in that Article, are fulfilled. The conditions would be satisfied in the circumstances envisaged by the present Article.

NOTES

Agent's right to act if no time to ask or wait for direction

1. In BULGARIA as a general rule, the agent is obliged to ask the principal for approval and new directions for every deviation from the mandate. Nevertheless, in some cases the agent is entitled to act without such approval or further directions (LOA art. 282; see Notes under IV.D.–3:201 ((Acting beyond mandate). Furthermore, the agent can sometimes entrust the performance of the mandate to a third person without permission (LOA art. 283(2); see Notes under IV.D.–3:302 (Subcontracting).

2. In ENGLAND there does not seem to be any case law dealing with this particular area. If the agent has no time to ask for direction before acting, provided that he acts reasonably in the circumstances and in the best interest of the principal, there would be little risk of liability for breach of the agency contract.

3. In FRANCE there is no specific rule on this point, but according to French legal academic writing, the agent has a duty to act with diligence in order to comply with the directions given by the principal. From this point of view, the agent may take the initiative if this is necessary in order to answer to the principal's interests (Collart-Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 645 ; Pétel, no. 248).

4. In situations in which postponement of action would result in 'danger' to the principal's interests, the GERMAN CC § 665 entitles the agent to perform the mandate in accordance with the preferences the agent may assume the principal to have under the given circumstances. As far as this changed performance of the mandate contract has and could not have been contemplated by the parties when agreeing on the price, the agent will be entitled to compensation for additional expenses (CC § 670).

5. In IRELAND, the doctrine of agency of necessity may operate to give an agent power to act in 'emergency situations' where communication with the principal is not possible.

6. In the NETHERLANDS according to CC art. 7:401, the agent is obliged to act with due care. In urgent situations, this duty seems to imply that the agent may acts at the agent's own discretion when the principal's directions are lacking. However, this will depend on the circumstances of the specific case.

7. In POLAND there is no duty to ask for a direction. However, the agent may only act contrary to given directions if there is no possibility to contact the principal and it is reasonable to believe the principal would have changed the direction if the principal knew about the state of affairs (e.g. an unforeseen change in the market price).

8. In SCOTLAND where the agent has insufficient time to ask for a direction from the principal, and harm to the principal's interests would follow from inaction or delay, it is suggested that the agent is likely to avoid liability by assuming that the principal's direction would accord with that of a reasonable principal with the known needs and preferences of the actual principal, and acting accordingly. If the agent is a 'general agent', employed to carry out all the principal's business, or all business of a particular kind, the agent is assumed to be authorised to do whatever is necessary to serve the principal's interests (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para 55).

9. In SLOVAKIA this right may be covered by the provisions on the possibility to diverge from the principal's directions (see Notes under IV.D.–4:101 (Directions given by principal)).

10. In SPAIN the agent is required to act with the diligence of the good father of a family if the agent does not have access to the instructions of the principal (CC art. 1719(2) and 255 Ccom art 255)Having no time to call for direction, the agent should act according to the best interest of the principal, assessed in the light of the best knowledge of the agent. As to the expenses, see CC art. 1729.

11. In SWEDEN in cases where the agent is required to ask for a direction but immediate action is required by the agent in order to prevent detrimental consequences for the principal, the agent is required to act as the circumstances require (KommL § 8). This also follows from general contract law and the fact that the agent is contractually obliged to act in the interest of the principal.

Section 2: Changes of the mandate contract

IV.D.–4:201: Changes of the mandate contract

(1) The mandate contract is changed if the principal:

(a) significantly changes the mandate of the agent;

(b) does not revoke a direction without undue delay after having been warned in accordance with paragraph (3) of IV.D.–4:101 (Directions given by principal).

(2) In the case of a change of the mandate contract under paragraph (1) the agent is entitled:

(a) to a proportionate adjustment of the price and of the time allowed or required for the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract; or

(b) to damages in accordance with III.–3:702 (General measure of damages) to put the agent as nearly as possible into the position in which the agent would have been if the mandate contract had not been changed.

(3) In the case of a change of the mandate contract under paragraph (1) the agent may also terminate the mandate relationship by giving notice of termination for an extraordinary and serious reason under IV.D.–6:105 (Termination by agent for extraordinary and serious reason), unless the change is minor or is to the agent's advantage.

(4) The adjusted price that is to be paid under paragraph (2)(a) must be reasonable and is to be determined using the same methods of calculation as were used to establish the original price for the performance of the obligations under the mandate contract.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The obligations under a mandate contract are not performed instantaneously. The relationship remains in force for a period of time, definite or indefinite. For that reason, the principal must be allowed to give subsequent directions as to the performance of the obligations or the contents of the prospective contract. By doing so the principal may change the content of the mandate contract. According to this provision there is a change to the mandate contract when the principal significantly changes the mandate of the agent or when the principal does not revoke a direction without undue delay after having been warned that the direction was unreasonable. Under these conditions, the actions (or, as regards the revocation of the direction, the lack of action) of the principal may be seen as a material change of the contract. Under the present Article, such a change comes about automatically, but it does have important consequences. The present Article sets out what these consequences are.

B. Significant change in mandate

A change to the contract occurs when the principal extends or limits the mandate of the agent in a significant way.

Illustration 1

An agent is authorised to sell a house for no less than €400,000. The principal subsequently orders the agent to sell the house for at least €350,000. As a consequence of this direction, the agent's mandate is extended. Similarly, if the principal for the future tells the agent to sell the house only for at least €450,000, the mandate of the agent is limited. In both cases, the mandate contract is changed under paragraph (1), which in accordance with paragraph (2) may have consequences for the price and the time for performance.

C. No revocation of unreasonable direction

A change of the contract also occurs where the principal refuses to revoke without undue delay a direction which the agent has warned will have the effect that the conclusion of the prospective contract would become significantly more expensive or take significantly more time than agreed upon in the mandate contract, or where the principal refuses to revoke a direction which the agent has warned is inconsistent with the purpose of the mandate contract or may otherwise be detrimental to the interests of the principal.

Illustration 2
If an agent is first authorised to sell a house owned by the principal for a price of €400,000, but the principal later authorises the agent to sell the house only for €450,000, which is above the market price, it will take the agent more time to sell the house and there is a serious risk that it will not be possible to conclude the prospective contract. If the principal, after having been warned of this by the agent, nevertheless holds the agent to the 'unreasonable' direction, this is regarded as a change of the mandate contract.

D. Proportionate adjustment of price and time of performance or damages

When the mandate contract is concluded, both parties have agreed upon a service to be performed in exchange (usually) for a price. The price and the time for performance may have been based upon the cost, time and effort that performance will require from the agent. Therefore, an increase in the content and magnitude of the agent's obligations cannot be without effect on the time the agent has for the performance of the contract and the price which ought to be payable when the mandated task has been accomplished (typically, when the prospective contract is concluded). Consequently, paragraph (2)(a) entitles the agent to extra time for performance and an adjustment of the price. Under paragraph (2)(b) the agent could instead choose damages to put the agent as nearly as possible into the position in which the agent would have been if the mandate contract had not been changed. These provisions may, of course, have no application if the matters are already regulated by the contract – for example, if it provides for a flexible time for performance and payment according to the hours of work spent on the performance.

Especially when the change consists of a limitation of the initial mandate, the agent's interests may be endangered in a different way. The following illustration may clarify this.

A principal mandates an estate agent to sell the principal's house for no less then €250,000. The agent negotiates with a third party, a well-to-do artist, who seems willing to pay the requested sum. The principal, however, subsequently limits the agent's power by requiring the agent to negotiate a sales contract for the price of €200,000 with a fourth party, who is less wealthy than the third party with whom the agent was negotiating, but with whom the principal has a personal relationship.

The limitation of the mandate awarded to the agent may make it more difficult to conclude a contract, as the only possible candidate is now the third party indicated by the principal. This may require a change of the price for the service. Moreover, if the contract is indeed concluded with the fourth party, the sales price will be lower than was originally envisaged. In the case of contracts of this type, it is not unusual that the price for the services of the agent will be proportionate to the sale price. The limitation of the mandate will therefore directly affect the remuneration to be paid by the principal. In a situation such as this, damages may be a more suitable solution. As the change of the contract cannot be seen as the non-performance of an obligation by the principal since the principal is entitled to limit the power of the agent, an express provision entitling the agent to damages is required here.

E. Termination for extraordinary and serious reason

Where the principal severely limits the mandate but does not completely revoke it, this is to be regarded as a change of the mandate contract under the present Article. However, the change may give the agent reason to believe that it will not be possible to accomplish the mandated task – for example, to conclude the prospective contract. If that is the case, the agent has a good reason to fear that the services provided will be to no avail. As the entitlement to a price normally only comes into being when the mandated task has been completed, the agent then has an extraordinary and serious reason to terminate the mandate relationship. Paragraph (3), in combination with IV.D.–6:105 (Termination by agent for extraordinary and serious reason) gives such a right. As a result, the difference between the situation where the mandate is revoked (leading to the automatic termination of the mandate relationship) and that where it is limited, is not so big as it may seem at first glance.

F. No entitlement to termination if change is minor or to agent's advantage

Whereas it seems justified to allow the agent to terminate the mandate relationship for extraordinary and serious reason if the mandate is significantly changed, this is not the case where the change is minor. Nor is there any justification for allowing termination when the change actually improves the agent's chances of accomplishing the mandated task – for example, concluding the prospective contract – or is otherwise to the agent's advantage. This is the case when the mandate of the agent is extended. In such a case, the agent should not be able to escape from the mandate contract for the mere reason that the content of the mandate contract has changed. Paragraph (3) therefore provides that the change of the mandate contract is these cases does not constitute an extraordinary and serious reason for termination.

NOTES

I. Change of mandate by principal

1. BULGARIAN contract law distinguishes between the mandate contract and the power of attorney. The mandate contract presupposes mutual consensus of the parties and regulates their internal relationship. The power of attorney is a unilateral act of the principal to authorise the agent to perform in the principal's name. As a general rule, contracts may be amended, terminated, avoided, or revoked only by mutual consent of the parties or on grounds provided in the law (LOA art. 20bis(2)). Since there is no provision permitting unilateral alteration of the mandate contract, the mandate contract can be changed only by mutual consent of the parties. However, the principle of freedom of contract (LOA art. 9) allows the parties to stipulate that the principal is permitted to unilaterally change the contract and also to define the limits of this alteration (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 119). Furthermore, the principal is entitled to make any alterations in the power of attorney of the agent at any time, as this is a unilateral juridical act.

2. In ENGLAND doctrinal writing indicates that 'the principal's control over the agent is based on his powers not to grant authority, to limit the authority and to withdraw and revoke the authority' (Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[18], no. 6.009). However, whether a significant change of power of the agent can be done unilaterally is doubtful: Reynolds states that actual authority of the agent can only be modified by consent of the principal and the agent (Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[18], no. 10-002).

3. In FRENCH law, there is no clear distinction between change of power and change of direction. The principal can change the directions given to the agent at any time during the mandate relationship, as the mandate contract is concluded for the principal's benefit. But if the requested services are seriously modified, the agent may claim for a higher price.

4. Under GERMAN law, the principal may not unilaterally change the mandate contract – any change, significant or insignificant, has to be accepted by the agent (as it might lead to a modification of the agent's rights and obligations under the contract). Should the agent not agree to the proposed change, the principal can revoke the mandate (CC § 671 (1)).

5. In IRELAND while an agent must follow the principal's lawful instructions, the principal cannot unilaterally alter the terms of the agency contract. Any variation of the terms must be supported by fresh consideration, in the absence of a variation clause in the original contract.

6. In the NETHERLANDS there is no specific rule for this situation. According to CC art. 7:402, the principal is allowed to give directions to the agent and the agent who is unwilling to perform the contract according to these directions may end the mandate contract.

7. The POLISH Civil Code does not allow the principal to change the contract after it has been concluded unless the agent agrees. The principal may terminate the contract but not change it. If the agent was ordered to buy a painting for a set amount and the principal decides to change this amount, the contract should be terminated and a new mandate contract should be concluded unless the agent agrees to carry out the modified contract.

8. In SCOTLAND as the terms of the agency contract will be agreed from the point of formation, the principal will not be entitled unilaterally to make changes to the agency contract. Of course, one of the terms of the contract (whether express or implied by law) will normally be that the principal has the power to give directions as to how the obligations under it are to be carried out. So a distinction has to be drawn between a permissible direction and an impermissible change.

9. In SLOVAKIA there is no special regulation and accordingly the normal rules apply and one party is unable to unilaterally change the contract. .

10. In SPAIN the agent may refuse performance of instructions that imply an imbalance in the contractual position of the parties to the detriment of the agent or instructions that imply a modification of the object of the contract (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII[2], 472-473).

11. In SWEDEN if the principal significantly changes the power of the agent, such change could amount to an important and valid reason entitling the agent to cancel the contract if it cannot reasonably be expected that the contract shall continue (Hesser, 29; KommL § 51; HaL § 26).

II. Unilateral change of mandate contract via direction

12. In BULGARIA the principal is entitled to give directions that result in unilateral change of the mandate contract only when: (a) they are within initially stipulated limits for alteration; or (b) they do not change the mandate significantly and do not make its performance too burdensome for the agent (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 119; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 24).

13. In FRANCE the agent is required to comply with the instructions of the principal, even when the agent has warned the principal and the latter has not changed the instructions (see Notes under IV.D.–4:101 (Directions given by principal). There is no change of mandate contract in that case. The principal can modify the directions at any time during the agency, as the mandate contract is concluded for the principal's benefit.

14. Under the GERMAN CC § 665, the principal may only give directions as long as they stay within the agreed framework of the mandate contract; it is not possible to unilaterally change the contract by way of a direction (Seiler, in: Münchener Kommentar zum BGB[4], § 665 no. 12). A direction may, however, clarify the agent's obligations under the mandate, and the line between a mere clarification and a unilateral change (extension) might often be difficult to draw. In case the direction given exceeds the contractual limits, the agent acting under a gratuitous contract (CC § 662) may either ignore the direction (Seiler, ibid., § 665 no. 13), upon which the principal may revoke the mandate according to CC § 671(1), or the agent might opt to revoke under CC § 671(1).

15. In HUNGARY the principal remains always the master of the affair and can change the directions at any time (Supreme Court Pfv. VIII. 20.107/2006, in BH2006. 321).

16. In the NETHERLANDS the principal may give the agent directions. These directions should be timely and sound. Furthermore, the principal's right to give directions is limited by the scope of the mandate. The mandate contract may also imply that the principal is not allowed to give further directions. See CC art. 7:402(1) and TM, Parl. Gesch. InvW 7, p. 324.

17. In POLAND it is not clear whether the agent is bound by the principal's directions given after the mandate contract has been signed.

18. In SCOTLAND, as above, it is suggested that a distinction has to be drawn between permissible directions and impermissible changes. A direction which would bring about a significant change to the agent's obligations to the agent's detriment would not normally be within the permissible range and would be perceived as an attempted unilateral change of the contract.

19. In SLOVAKIA there is no special regulation; it depends on the content of the mandate contract and the provisions of general contract law. The possibilities to change the contract are very restricted.

20. SPANISH law has no rule as to adjustments of the price of the service in the light of a direction. However, according to the remission to the commercial usages made by CC arts 1711(2) and Ccom art 277, an adjustment of the price may be reasonable if the service becomes more onerous.

21. In SWEDEN the agent is required to follow the principal's directions as long as these are considered to be reasonable.

III. Consequences of unilateral change of mandate contract

22. In BULGARIA since there are no specific provisions, the consequences of a unilateral change of the mandate contract are governed by general contract law and contractual stipulations. If the principal alters the mandate contract within the stipulated limits, the parties are free to negotiate adjustment of the price and/or the time for performance. If the principal does not have the right of unilateral change of the contract and nevertheless gives directions that significantly alter the mandate, this is considered to be a unilateral termination of the old mandate contract and an offer for conclusion of a new contract. The agent may reject the offer (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 119). If the principal has not exceeded the stipulated limits but the mandate contract has become too burdensome for performance, this is considered to be a sufficient reason for termination of the contractual relationship by the agent by means of a unilateral notice of termination (LOA art. 289).

23. In ENGLAND it is thought that if this amounts to a serious breach by the principal, the agent will be entitled to treat the breach as repudiatory, terminate the relationship and claim damages.

24. In FRANCE if the principal changes the instructions, the agent may claim for a proportionate adjustment of the price or may simply decide to renounce the mandate. On the basis of a general obligation of fair dealing, the agent should inform the principal of any possible additional expenses and ensure that the parties agree on such additional expenses. The French courts have accepted that the remuneration set out in the agency contract may be revised if the mandate carried out does not correspond to the remuneration initially envisaged.

25. In GERMANY if the direction given by the principal results in a change of the gratuitous mandate contract and the agent chooses to follow the direction, the agent may claim reimbursement of expenses resulting from the change under CC § 670. Under remunerated mandate contracts (CC § 675(1)), the applicable law on contracts for works or services will require an (at least implied) agreement between the parties for the price to be adjusted.

26. In HUNGARY the unilateral change of the mandate contract can be a ground of unilateral termination for the other party.

27. In IRELAND a unilateral change in the term of the agency contract is not effective unless supported by fresh consideration and may constitute a breach of contract, allowing the innocent party to repudiate the contract and sue for any damages.

28. In the NETHERLANDS the agent need not obey the principal's directions if they were not given timeously or if they were not sound because such directions may cause breach of contract of the agent. See TM for art. 7.7.1.3, Parl. Gesch. InvW 7, 324.

29. In POLAND the principal may not change the scope of the mandate contract by a unilateral act.

30. In SCOTLAND an attempt unilaterally to make a significant change to the agency contract would be ineffective. To be effective the change would have to be agreed by both parties. If the agent did not accept the change and the principle refused to renegotiate but also refused to be bound by the original contract this is likely to amount to a material breach, or anticipatory breach, on the principal's part, entitling the agent to terminate the relationship and claim damages. It could happen that an agent's acceptance of a significant change, without express mention of price, resulted in a new contract with an implied term that payment would be on a quantum meruit basis (cf. Head Wrightson Aluminium Ltd v Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners 1958 S.L.T. (Notes) 12).

31. In SPAIN, the agent is entitled to put the contract to an end, without needing to justify this by reference to changes made by the principal (CC art. 1736)

32. In SWEDEN the agent is entitled to a price which is reasonable considering the circumstances. A unilateral change of power could lead to an adjustment of the price and time for performance of the contract.

CHAPTER 5: CONFLICTS OF INTERESTS

IV.D.–5:101: Self-contracting

(1) The agent may not become the principal's counterparty to the prospective contract.

(2) The agent may nevertheless become the counterparty if:

(a) this is agreed by the parties in the mandate contract;

(b) the agent has disclosed an intention to become the counterparty and

(i) the principal subsequently expresses consent; or

(ii) the principal does not object to the agent becoming the counterparty after having been requested to indicate consent or a refusal of consent;

(c) the principal otherwise knew, or could reasonably be expected to have known, of the agent becoming the counterparty and the principal did not object within a reasonable time; or

(d) the content of the prospective contract is so precisely determined in the mandate contract that there is no risk that the interests of the principal may be disregarded.

(3) If the principal is a consumer, the agent may only become the counterparty if:

(a) the agent has disclosed that information and the principal has given express consent to the agent becoming the counterparty to the particular prospective contract; or

(b) the content of the prospective contract is so precisely determined in the mandate contract that there is no risk that the interests of the principal may be disregarded.

(4) The parties may not, to the detriment of the principal, exclude the application of paragraph (3) or derogate from or vary its effects.

(5) If the agent has become the counterparty, the agent is not entitled to a price for services rendered as an agent.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The present Article starts from the same idea as II.–6:109 (Conflict of interest): the presumption that there is a conflict of interests when the agent concludes a contract with himself or herself in a personal capacity. The agent is therefore not allowed to do so. The main differences between the Articles are not of a substantive nature, but follow from their different focus: whereas II.–6.109 deals with the external relationship between the principal and the third party, the present Article deals with the internal relationship.

Where the agent was not allowed to act as the third party, but has nonetheless done so, the act is not in conformity with the best interests of the principal and the agent is therefore liable for non-performance. However, there are situations where this may be different. Paragraph (2) deals with this matter. For consumers, a more restrictive approach is taken in paragraph (3). This more restrictive rule is mandatory to protect the consumer's interest (paragraph (4)). Paragraph (5) deals with the consequences as regards the payment of the price.

B. Main rule: agent may not act as third party

One of the main obligations of the agent is to act in accordance with the interests of the principal (IV.D.–3:102 (Obligation to act in interests of principal)). In the situation in which the agent is at the same time the third party to the prospective contract (a situation also known as 'self-contracting'), a conflict of interests may arise.

> Illustration
> A principal mandates an agent to sell a precious Ming vase. The agent is himself interested in the purchase of the vase. Whereas the agent, as a buyer, will want to pay as little as possible, in his function as the agent of the principal, he is required to achieve as high a sale price as possible. These interests clearly collide.

An exception to the main rule is however possible when a conflict of interest is deemed or may be assumed not to exist. These cases are regulated in paragraph (2).

C. Self-contracting if agreed in mandate contract

A first exception to the ban on self-contracting is the situation where the contract itself indicates that the agent is entitled to act as the third party. Consent may be express or implied.

D. Self-contracting if agent discloses intention to become counterparty

The risk of a conflict of interests is to a large extent minimised if there is full disclosure of the fact that the agent wishes to act as the third party to the prospective contract, as in that case the principal is aware that the agent has potentially conflicting interests. Such a principal will be alerted to look critically into the question whether the prospective contract is beneficial. Accordingly, when the agent has disclosed the intention of being the third party and the principal does not object, the principal may be assumed to have given consent. In this situation, there is not sufficient reason not to allow the agent to be also the third party to the contract.

E. Self-contracting if intention not disclosed

The fact that the agent did not disclose the intention of acting as the third party should not prevent the agent from nevertheless doing so if either the principal otherwise knew or must have known that the agent would act as the third party. There is no substantial difference between those cases where it was the agent who disclosed the conflict and cases where the principal found out or was informed by another party of the fact that the agent would become the counterparty to the prospective contract if in both of these types of cases the principal did not object to that situation.

F. Self-contracting if content of the prospective contract excludes risk of conflict of interests

Where the content of the prospective contract is very clearly determined in the mandate contract a conflict of interests is excluded. In such cases, the contract offered to the third party is more or less non-negotiable. The agent is then no longer in a position to further his or her own interests to the detriment of the principal as the terms of the prospective contract cannot be altered. If that is the case, there is not much risk that the interests of the principal would be jeopardised.

G. Self-contracting if principal is consumer

A principal-consumer may not be in a position to clearly evaluate whether the agent's own interests have led to a contract which is sub-optimal. In order to protect the principal from hasty decisions or even from giving consent by adhering to standard contract terms, this Article demands that consent must be given expressly, in writing or otherwise.

In order to properly protect the interests of the consumer and also to protect the trust in professional providers of mandate services, a more restrictive provision is needed where it comes to contracts between a business and a consumer. However, it is not in the interest of the consumer to completely exclude the possibility of the agent becoming the principal's counterparty to the prospective contract. The interests of the principal are sufficiently safeguarded with full disclosure of the identity of the agent and express consent by the principal for the particular transaction (paragraph (3)(a)). This implies that the principal cannot by way of agreeing to standard contract terms be forced to accept the agent becoming the counterparty to the prospective contract.

A conflict of interests is also deemed to be excluded in contracts between a business and a consumer when the content of the prospective contract is so precisely determined in the mandate contract that there is no risk that the interests of the principal may be disregarded (paragraph (3)(b)).

NOTES

I. Main rule: self-contracting not allowed

1. In BELGIUM the majority defends a general prohibition of self-contracting: the representative is forbidden to be a party to the prospective contract, unless with the principal's knowledge and permission. This prohibition is based on the risk of a conflict of interests. In case of a breach, the contract is (relatively) null and void (nullité relative, Supreme Court 18 Mar 2004, RW 2004-05, 303, note A. SMETS; Supreme Court 24 Sep 1981, Pas. 1982, I, 125; Supreme Court 7 Dec 1978, Arr. Cass. 1978-79, 407 and Pas. 1979, I, 408; de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 410-412; Ekelmans, 9-10; Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux, 607-610; Foriers, 64-65; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 47-49; Wagemans, 177; Wéry, Le mandat, 154-158).
2. In BULGARIA self-contracting is explicitly banned only in cases of direct representation. LOA art. 38(1) forbids the (direct) representative to negotiate in the name of the principal with either himself or another person he represents, unless the principal has given consent.
3. Under the rules on mandate in GERMANY (CC § 662 et seq.) and Geschäftsbesorgungsvertrag (CC § 675(1)), the contract is decisive, the law being silent on this question. The matter is to some extent decided by the rules on authority (CC § 181), which generally rule out self-contracting (Insich-Geschäft).
4. In the NETHERLANDS according to CC art. 416(1), Selbsteintritt is allowed only if the juridical acts to be performed by the agent under the mandate contract have been precisely established, so that the interests of the principal and the agent do not conflict (Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW^7, no. 3089; Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 31).
5. In SCOTLAND as a general rule, an agent is under a duty not to get into a position in which the agent's own interests would conflict with those of the principal (Huntingdon Copper and Sulphur Co Ltd v Henderson (1877) 4 R 294 at 307, per Lord Mure). Self-contracting is therefore only permitted subject to stringent conditions, commented on below (McPherson's Trustees v Watt (1877) 5 R (HL) 9; Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 97).

6. In SPAIN self-contracting is not explicitly regulated in a general way for mandate contracts. There are however some specific rules that forbid this type of practice. CC art. 1459 does not allow the agent to buy the principal's goods under the agent's administration. See also Ccom art 267. It seems that the legislator did not want to allow this type of situation. However, recent decisions allow self-contracting in cases in which the principal has given consent or when the possibility of a conflict of interests is excluded (STS 24 Sep 1994, 15 Mar 1996 and 12 Feb 1999). (Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II(2)[4], p.15).

7. The main rule in SWEDISH law is that self-contracting is not allowed. A commissionaire is allowed to be a party to the prospective contract only if this right follows from the contract or from trade custom in a particular line of business. A real estate agent is prohibited to be a party to the prospective contract (KommL §§ 40-45; FmL § 13).

II. Conditions under which self-contracting is allowed

8. Where the AUSTRIAN Civil Code applies, the agent must not, without first obtaining the informed consent of the principal, get into a position where the duty to the principal conflicts or may conflict with the agent's own interests or the interests of another principal. An agent is not allowed to be the third party, except if this self-contracting is only advantageous for the principal and involves no risks for the principal (OGH in ÖBA 1992, 274; SZ 69/90; ZfRV 1997, 246; NZ 1995, 305; NZ 1997, 95; SZ 69/90; RdW 1998, 548), e.g. when there is a current price for the goods. In all these cases, the agent must conclude the prospective contract by express words, so that it is transparent and not easy to escape from by unilateral action at the agent's discretion (OGH in RdW 1986, 39; ZfRV 1997, 246). There is special commercial regulation for self-contracting in Ccom §§ 345, 405 and 412(1) (Dullinger, RZ 1986, 204ff; § 25 GmbHG; Wünsch, FS Hämmerle; Strasser, § 1009 Rz 21).

9. For BELGIUM, see Note 1 above.

10. In BULGARIA, in general, self-contracting is only possible with the consent of the principal (LOA art. 38(1)). Ccom art. 358 provides an exception for commission agents: they may conclude the prospective contract on their behalf if it concerns the sale of goods or securities at market or commodity exchange price.

11. In DANISH legislation rules on self-contracting are inadequately treated. The notion appears in the Factors Act sections 40-45 governing the extent and terms under which a factor may take the buyer's place in a sales factoring situation and the seller's place in a purchasing situation (contracting for own account). Sections 40-45 take account of the fact that it is difficult to deal honestly with oneself and lay down that self-contracting is consistent with the Factors Act only when both parties have agreed upon it or when it is consistent with custom. These rules most likely apply to all kinds of representation governed by Danish law.

12. In ENGLAND the agent can be a party to the contract as long as the principal has full knowledge of the extent of the agent's interests in the transaction and agrees to the transaction. The agent's duty of disclosure is full and must be very precise so that the principal knows all the possible consequences before giving consent. The burden of proving that the duty has been complied with is on the agent. The agent will not be able to evade the rule of no conflict of interest by dealing with the principal through a third party (McPherson v Watt ((1877) 3 App Cas 254)

13. In ESTONIA self-contracting is regulated both for the internal relationship between the agent and the principal as well as for the external relationship. For the internal relationship, LOA § 623(1) (applicable for the (general) contract for services) provides that in case of entry into a transaction, the agent may be the third party or the principal of the third party to the transaction only if the possibility of a conflict of interests is precluded. This would be the case where the content of the second contract is so precisely determined in the contract for mandate that a conflict of interests between the principal and the agent is excluded. LOA § 623(2) further provides that the agent must inform the principal of any direct or indirect interest in the prospective transaction.

14. There are no general rules on self-contracting in FINLAND. The agent is usually not entitled to be a party to the prospective contract, unless otherwise agreed. However, when it is clear that no conflict of interests arises, self-contracting is allowed (e.g. when the price of the prospective contract is based merely on an objective valuation). Further, an estate agent is entitled to self-contract if the client is informed in advance (REstateAA § 8).

15. In FRANCE on the basis of a general obligation of fair dealing, which is imposed on the agent (see Pétel, no. 172 s.), and in order to reduce the risk of any misuse of power, the agent may not become a party to the contract negotiated for the principal. The sanction is voidability of the contract; the contract may be avoided by the principal (Civ. 1ère 29 Nov 1988, Bull. civ. I, no. 341). The rule is not, however, one of mandatory public policy. The principal may authorise the agent to become a party to the contract. In addition, the regulations on stockbrokering companies allow them to be parties to the contract in certain cases (Ccom art. L. 131-7). The prohibition on the agent becoming a party to the contract is not established in a general manner by the Civil Code in the chapter relating to agency, but has been deduced by the courts from art. 1596 relating to the particular case of auction sales. It is applied rigorously, even where the price or consideration for the contract is that envisaged by the principal, and even where the agent acts through an intermediary (Civ. 1ère 12 Dec 2000, Bull. civ. I, no. 319 ; Civ. 1ère 29 Nov 1988, Bull. civ. I, no. 341). The general view is that the prohibition on the agent becoming a party to the contract also applies to the commission agent in commercial matters (Huet, no. 31149).

16. Under the GERMAN rules on mandate (CC §662 et seq.) and Geschäftsbesorgungsvertrag (CC § 675(1)), the contract is decisive (the law being silent on this question). The matter is to some extent decided by the rules on authority (CC § 181), which rule out self-contracting (Insich-Geschäft). The law on commercial commission agents explicitly allows self-contracting (Selbsteintritt), provided that the principal has not otherwise instructed the agent (Ccom § 400).

17. According to the GREEK CC art. 235(1) an agent may not execute in the name of the (person) represented a deed with himself or herself personally unless the deed had been authorised (explicitly or tacitly) by the principal or if it constitutes exclusively the performance of an obligation (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Doris, Art. 235 GREEK CC nr. 1). A contract with oneself which has not been executed in the form of a notarial deed is invalid (CC art. 235(2)). If the agent violates these rules and acts as the third party the concluded contract is void (CA Thessaloniki decision no. 2977/1989, EllDni 1991, 1345).

18. If the agent has to act in the name of the principal, according to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 221(3), '[an] agent shall not proceed if the opposite or otherwise interested party is himself or a person whom he also represents. The agent, if a legal person, shall also be allowed to proceed in a case of conflicting interests with the express consent of the person represented'. In case of commission agency, CC art. 510(1) provides that '[t]he commission agent can himself conclude a sales contract with the principal.' In all cases, the general rules of obligations apply, especially CC art. 277(5): '[t]he parties shall be under obligation to inform each other of all important circumstances affecting performance of the contract'. Moreover, '[t]he agent shall inform his principal of his activities and the state of affairs upon request or, if necessary, even without a request, particularly if employment of another person has become necessary or if the instructions need to be changed due to the occurrence of new circumstances' (CC art. 477(1)) .

19. In IRELAND an agent's fiduciary duties include the duty to avoid conflicts of interest. It has been stated: 'It is a rule of universal application, that no one, having [fiduciary] duties to discharge, shall be allowed to enter into engagements in which he has, or can have, a personal interest conflicting, or which possibly may conflict, with the interests of those whom he is bound to protect.' (Lord Cramworth LC in Aberdeen Rly Co v Blaikie Bros [1854] 1 Macq 461 at 471). Where the duty applies, there is a breach if, for instance, an agent instructed to buy property, sells the agent's own property to the principal (e.g. Armstrong v. Jackson [1917] 2 KB 822); or if an agent instructed to sell property, buys it personally (e.g. McPherson v Watt [1877] 3 App Cas 254), unless all the circumstances are disclosed to the principal and the principal consents to the transaction (North & South Trust Co v Berkeley [1971] 1 WLR 470 at 484-485; Gibson v Jeyes [1801] 6 Ves 266). Where an agent buys the principal's property or sells the agent's own property to the principal, the agent must also show that the price was fair and that that there was been no abuse of the position of agent (McPherson v Watt [1877] 3 App Cas 254).

20. In ITALY as a rule, there is no strict prohibition of self-contracting. Self-dealing is governed by CC art. 1395, which is located among the general rules on contracts: 'a contract which the agent makes with himself, whether acting in his own behalf or as the agent of another party, is voidable, unless specifically authorised by the principal or unless the content of the contract is established in such a way to preclude the possibility of a conflict of interests'.

21. In the NETHERLANDS, according to CC art. 416(1), Selbsteintritt is allowed only if the juridical acts to be performed by the agent under the mandate contract have been precisely established, so that the interests of the principal and the agent do not conflict (Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3089; Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 31). If the principal practises a profession, however, the principal's written approval is required under the sanction of voidability (CC art. 416(3); Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3090; Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 33).

22. In POLAND self-contracting is allowed only if the principal has agreed or if there is no danger to the principal's interests.

23. Agents have, in SCOTTISH law, a fiduciary duty towards their principals. This relationship is characterised by trust and loyalty and has several different aspects. The issue has received much attention from academics in the context of the solicitor-principal relationship. If a solicitor makes a contract on behalf of the principal to which the solicitor is a party, then that contract is voidable at the instance of the principal (McPherson's Trs v Watt (1877) 5 R (HL) 9). The onus rests on the solicitor to show why that contract should not be declared void (Rigg's Exx v Urquhart (1902) 10 SLT 503 per Lord Stormonth-Darling at 504). However, the transaction may not be voidable if the solicitor can prove that the transaction was fair and honest when entered into; that there was no undue influence; or that the principal gave fully informed consent to the transaction following disclosure to the principal of all the material facts within the solicitor's knowledge (Paterson, no. 172). In the case of estate agents, this question is governed by both 'soft law' and actual legislation. Several codes of practice exist, most notably the Ombudsman's Code of Practice for Estate Agents and the Estate Agency Affairs Board Code of Conduct. The former contains a general duty to avoid conflicts of interest which '…might not be in the best interests of the principal' (Ombudsman's Code of Practice, rule 9d). An estate agent seeking to buy property owned by a principal or sell property owned by the agent to a principal is under a duty, before negotiations begin, to provide all relevant facts in writing to that principal and as soon as possible to the principal's solicitor (Ombudsman's Code of Practice, rule 9b and 9c; see also the Estate Agency Affairs Board Code of Conduct, art. 4.2). The main piece of legislation relevant to estate agents, the Estate Agents Act 1979, contains a similar obligation (section 21(1)).

24. According to the general rules relating to Representation, no one may act as an agent for another person if his interests conflict with the interests of the person represented (SLOVAK CC § 22(2)). The commission agent must protect the principal's interests known to him, and keep the latter well informed of all the circumstances that may lead to a change in the principal's instructions (Ccom § 579(1)). The issue is explicitly regulated for the Commission Agent Contract on Procurement of Securities' Sale: the agent may perform his obligation by selling his own security to the principal or by buying the principal's security himself, provided that this has been allowed in (written) contract (Act on Securities and Investment Services (Act 566|2001Coll.), § 33(2)).

25. For SPAIN see Note 6 above.

26. In SWEDEN the parties can by contract allow self-contracting. An agent is allowed to be a party to the prospective contract only if this right follows from the contract or from trade custom in a particular line of business. If the agent enters into the prospective contract as a party, the agent is obliged to notify the principal about this fact and the duty to act in the principal's interest remains. See KommL §§ 40-45; Ramberg, 254; Tiberg and Dotevall, Mellanmansrätt[9], 99).

III. No price in case of self-contracting

27. In AUSTRIA the self-contracting agent is not entitled to a price for services rendered or to reimbursement of expenses made. It is in this respect not relevant whether the agent, before becoming a party to the prospective contract, has entered into failed negotiations with a third party (Strasser, § 1009 Rz 21; Straube (-Griss), HGB I[3], § 405, no. 1; Schütz, § 412 Rz 2).

28. In BELGIUM according to de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V[2], there is no longer a question of a contract for representation, in case of self-contracting. There is only the prospective contract, the former object of the contract for representation (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V[2], 412). Recent authors on the contrary consider the permitted self-contracting as a simple modality to execute the contract for representation. Therefore the rights and duties of the contract for representation (e.g. the principal's duty to pay a salary and to reimburse the expenses) remain (Wéry, Le mandat, 158).

29. In BULGARIA, in a case of self-contracting the commission agent is entitled to receive half of the remuneration stipulated in the commission contract (Ccom art. 358(1)).

30. DANISH law in all probability will not entitle the self-contracting agent to claim a price for services or to claim reimbursement of expenses incurred, even if the agent has conducted failed negotiations with a third party.

31. In ENGLAND provided that all the relevant conditions of remuneration are complied with, there is no reason why the self-contracting agent should not be entitled to commission. Such an interpretation seems possible relying on Wilson v Short ((1848) 6 Hare 366 and Robinson v Mollett (1874) LR 7, HL).

32. The ESTONIAN LOA § 623(3) provides that a transaction entered into by the principal with the service provider (the agent) upon the performance of a contract of services does not restrict the right of the service provider (the agent) to receive remuneration and reimbursement of expenses if the provisions of § 623(1) have been adhered to.

33. In FINLAND there is no clear general rule on this point. Unless otherwise agreed, the agent is normally entitled to remuneration. However, this depends on the circumstances. An estate agent is not entitled to a price for the performance in a case of self-contracting (REstateAA § 20).

34. In FRANCE if the principal authorises the agent to be a party to the contract, it would appear that French case law allows the agent to be entitled to payment in respect to what is due under the mandate. French academic legal writing considers in fact that, in that situation, the initial agency remains in place and a second contract is entered into with the agent who has become a party to the contract (Collart Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 646). This position would not apply, however, if parties decided to first terminate the agency in order to enable the conclusion of the other contract between them (Huet, no. 31149). The French courts do not require any prior condition such as the failure of the transaction with a third party, and it is simply the wish of the principal to accept that the agent become a party to the contract which will determine the position.

35. In the case of self-contracting, the GERMAN Ccom § 403 nevertheless entitles the commission agent to a price for the services and reimbursement of expenses.

36. In GREECE if the agent is allowed to be the third party, the answer to the question of entitlement to remuneration or reimbursement of expenses depends on the internal relationship which underlies the mandate. In the case of a gratuitous mandate relationship the agent is not entitled to a price in any event. With regard to the reimbursement of expenses CC art. 722 is applicable: '[a] principal shall be bound to reimburse the agent for everything the latter has spent to achieve an orderly performance of the mandate.'

37. If the agent has to act in the name of the principal, according to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 221(3), the agent 'shall not proceed if the opposite or otherwise interested party is himself or a person whom he also represents. The agent, if a legal person, shall also be allowed to proceed in a case of conflicting interests with the express consent of the person represented'. Because of this prohibition, the agent cannot be entitled to a price or to reimbursement of expenses. In the case of commission agency, CC art. 510(1) provides that '[t]he commission agent can himself conclude a sales contract with the principal'. In this case, paragraph (2) of this same article establishes that '[t]he commission agent's claim for commission shall not be affected if the sales contract with the principal is concluded by the commission agent himself'. According to CC art. 511(2), '[t]he commission shall include the expenses usually involved with consignment, but it shall not include expenses related to carriage'. In all other cases CC art. 478(1) applies, according to which '[t]he principal shall pay an appropriate fee, unless the circumstances, or the relationship between the parties suggest that the agent has assumed the agency without any consideration' and the first phrase of CC art. 479(1) which establishes that '[c]osts that arise in connection with the handling of a matter shall be borne by the principal'.

38. For IRELAND, Bowstead and Reynolds list a number of circumstances where no remuneration is payable, including where the transaction is unauthorised; in cases of misconduct or breach of duty; and in respect of unlawful transactions (Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[18]). There is no mention, in this litany of circumstances, of where the agent is allowed to be the third party. Moreover, given that self-contracting is permissible and not necessarily in breach of any fiduciary duty, provided there is full disclosure etc., it would appear that remuneration and reimbursement of expenses are due in such circumstances (Wilson v Short [1848] 6 Hare 366; Robinson v Mollett [1874] LR 7).

39. In ITALY a self-contracting agent is still entitled to a price for the services provided and reimbursement of expenses incurred.

40. In the NETHERLANDS if self-contracting is allowed, the agent remains entitled to remuneration (CC art. 7:416(4)). If it is not allowed, however, the agent usually is deprived of the right to payment. Self-contracting which is not allowed is a breach of contract, but the principal may determine to maintain the mandate contract. In that case, the principal may (partially) postpone payment (CC art. 6:262) or deduct the agent's remuneration from the principal's claim for compensation for the agent's breach of contract (Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3090; Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 34).

41. There are no POLISH CC provisions that would deprive the agent of the remuneration or limit it in any way in case of self-contracting.

42. In SCOTLAND if the requirements for self-contracting are adhered to, and the contract is not voidable, then there is no reason why the agent should not be entitled to a price for the services and reimbursement of expenses incurred in the normal fashion.

43. In SLOVAKIA there is no explicit regulation, but if the contract is not void, the agent will be entitled to a price.

44. In SPAIN a self-contracting agent is probably still entitled to a price for the services provided and to reimbursement of expenses incurred.

45. In SWEDEN an agent is entitled to a price which has to be as favourable to the principal as the prevailing price at the time of the self-contracting notification (KommL § 42).

IV.D.–5:102: Double mandate

(1) The agent may not act as the agent of both the principal and the principal's counterparty to the prospective contract.

(2) The agent may nevertheless act as the agent of both the principal and the counterparty if:

(a) this is agreed by the parties in the mandate contract;

(b) the agent has disclosed an intention to act as the agent of the counterparty and the principal

(i) subsequently expresses consent; or

(ii) does not object to the agent acting as the agent of the counterparty after having been requested to indicate consent or a refusal of consent;

(c) the principal otherwise knew, or could reasonably be expected to have known, of the agent acting as the agent of the counterparty and the principal did not object within a reasonable time; or

(d) the content of the prospective contract is so precisely determined in the mandate contract that there is no risk that the interests of the principal may be disregarded.

(3) If the principal is a consumer, the agent may only act as the agent of both the principal and of the counterparty if:

(a) the agent has disclosed that information and the principal has given express consent to the agent acting also as the agent of the counterparty to the particular prospective contract; or

(b) the content of the prospective contract is so precisely determined in the mandate contract that there is no risk that the interests of the principal may be disregarded.

(4) The parties may not, to the detriment of the principal, exclude the application of paragraph (3) or derogate from or vary its effects.

(5) If and in so far as the agent has acted in accordance with the previous paragraphs, the agent is entitled to the price.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This rule follows the same rationale as IV.D.–5:101 (Self-contracting): there is presumed to be a conflict of interests when the agent also acts as agent of the third party. The risk of a conflict of interests generally precludes the agent from representing properly both the principal and the third party to the prospective contract. The general rule is therefore that the agent is not allowed to do so.

However, there are exceptions to this general rule. Paragraph (2) deals with this matter. For consumers, a more restrictive approach is taken in paragraph (3). This more restrictive rule is mandatory to protect the consumer's interest (paragraph (4)). Paragraph (5) deals with the consequences as regards the payment of the price.

B. Main rule: double mandate not allowed

As the case is with self-contracting, a conflict of interests may arise between the interests of the principal and those of the agent if the latter represents both the principal and the third party with whom the prospective contract is to be concluded. This situation is of special relevance in mandate relationships, in which the agent's main obligation is to act in the interest of the principal. The option chosen is to forbid this practice as a general rule, unless a conflict of interests is excluded.

C. Exceptions to general rule if conflict excluded

The ratio of the present Article follows that of IV.D.–5:101 (Self-contracting). By way of exception a double-mandate is allowed when a conflict of interests between the principal and the agent is excluded. This approach protects the interests of the principal, since it prevents the agent from advancing the interests of the third party while disregarding those of the principal. This is for example the case when the principal consents to the double representation, or when the prospective contract is so precisely defined in the mandate contract that a conflict of interests is excluded.

D. Double mandate if principal consumer

The Article grants extra protection to the interests of a principal who is a consumer. In such a case the principal's consent in writing is required if the agent wants to represent the third party. In cases where the consumer is not informed of the fact that the agent acts as agent of the third party, or is informed in a standard contract term only, the consumer may be caught unaware or even feel betrayed when the party entrusted with the negotiation of a contract appears to have used, or abused, that position by defending the conflicting interests of the other party to the prospective contract.

E. Payment in case of double mandate

The agent should be entitled to payment in cases of permitted double representation. In this situation, the agent has done everything required under the contract and the services provided have led to the conclusion of the prospective contract. As the agent was allowed to act as the agent of the third party, the interests of the principal were not in jeopardy. Under these conditions, there seems to be no reason why the agent should not receive payment.

NOTES

I. Main rule: double mandate not allowed

1. In BELGIUM serving two principals seems to be allowed (Supreme Court 18 Mar 2004, RW 2004-05, 303, note A. Smets (implicit confirmation); Beltjens, no. 53; Ekelmans, 16; Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 48-49). Some authors require nevertheless that both principals are informed, expressly or tacitly (e.g. through the agent's profession; Wéry, Le mandat, 158-159).
2. In BULGARIA although there is no explicit prohibition on double mandate, in legal writings it is considered inadmissible for the agent to act on behalf of both parties to the prospective contract simultaneously (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 120). This conclusion is deduced from the requirement that the agent acts in accordance with the interests of the principal in the best possible manner under the existing circumstances. There are some special provisions on this matter. First, LOA art. 38(1) forbids direct representatives from negotiating in the name of the principal with another person also represented by them, unless the principal has given consent. Second, BAA art. 43(3) contains special rules for advocates with regard to representation of counterparties. Third, commercial procurators, commercial agents and commercial agents are under a general prohibition of acting in competition with the principal, including representing the principal's competitors (Ccom art. 29 and art. 44).

3. In GERMANY acting as the agent to a third party is considered to be analogous to an 'Insich-Geschäft' (self-contracting); the law on authority (CC § 181) therefore declares it to be generally inadmissible. The law on brokerage is less strict: CC § 654 indicates that a double mandate is only inadmissible if it runs contrary to the brokerage contract, thus making it permissible where the contract does not (expressly or impliedly) provide otherwise (BGHZ 61, 17; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 654 no. 4).

4. In the NETHERLANDS serving two masters is only allowed if there is no conflict of interests between the principal and the third party (CC art. 7:417(1); Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3090-3091; Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 35). See also CA Leeuwarden, 28 Dec 1994, NJ 1996, 117.

5. In SCOTLAND as a general rule, an agent is under a duty not to get into a position in which the agent's interests would conflict with those of the principal (Huntingdon Copper and Sulphur Co Ltd v Henderson (1877) 4 R 294 at 307, per Lord Mure). Acting for two principals may put the agent in breach of this rule. However, double mandate is possible in certain contexts as commented on below.

6. In SPAIN the opinion has been put forward that the self-contracting prohibition does not apply when the agent acts both for the principal seller and for the principal who gave a mandate to buy (Castro, El autocontrato, RGLJ 1927, p. 391). Yet the question remains doubtful, and, given the silence of the law, every situation may depend upon the possibility of an eventual conflict of interests.

7. In SWEDEN it is unclear whether double mandate is allowed.

II. Double mandate allowed if agreed by or disclosed to principal

8. In AUSTRIA the agent may generally not also act as agent of the third party, as the agent may in case of conflicting interests be in breach of duty to one principal by acting with the intention of furthering the interest of another. Where the agent is of a type known to act for many parties (e.g. an estate agent or a lawyer who draws up a contract) it may be held that the situation is assented to by the principals (CC § 879) and that there is no breach of duty (Strasser, § 1009 Rz 22; Koziol/Welser, 194; Krejci, 212; Schütz, § 408 Rz 8 (Doppelvertretung)).

9. For BELGIUM, see Note 1 above.

10. In BULGARIA direct representatives may act on behalf of the counterparty to the prospective contract if the principal has given consent (LOA art. 38(1)). Advocates may act as an agent of both counterparties if the parties consent and do not have contradictory interests (BAA art. 43(3)).

11. According to section 15 of the DANISH Real Estate Agency Act an estate agent is not allowed to represent both the seller and the buyer before the conclusion of the contract between the parties has taken place. Section 15 is a mandatory rule for a special (although important) situation. The prohibition cannot without reservation be extended to cover other types of representation.

12. In ENGLAND similarly to the duty imposed on the agent to disclose when the agent's own personal interests may conflict with those of the principal, the rule of disclosure prevents the agent from getting into a position where the interests of one principal might conflict with the duty to the other principal in the same transaction. This will arise when a solicitor acts for the vendor and the buyer of a property. In such a case where there is a high probability that the interests of the respective principals will conflict, the agent can only act providing that informed consent has been obtained from the two principals (Clark Boyce v Mouat ([1994] 1 AC 428). Informed consent in this case was held to mean consent given in the knowledge that there is a conflict between the parties and that, as a result, the solicitor may be disabled from disclosing to each party the full knowledge which the solicitor possesses in relation to the transaction or may be disabled from giving advice to one party which conflicts with the interest of the other (Brown, 116). The same obligation applies regardless of whether the agent acts gratuitously. For the financial sector, the rules appear to be more stringent, but it seems that it will depend on the size of the corporations involved. For big corporations, there is a risk that one department may act for a principal and another department may work for another principal whose interests will conflict with the first one. In order to avoid this kind of conflict, financial institutions will use what are called 'Chinese walls' to ensure that confidential information from one department of a company will not leak to the other. The House of Lords had to consider the efficacy of such Chinese walls in protecting confidential information in the case of Bolkiah v KPMG [1999] 2 AC 222 If the same agent acts for two potentially conflicting principals in two separate transactions, there does not seem to be a problem: Kelly v Cooper ([1993] AC 205). In this case the contract was held to contain an implied term that the agent would be allowed to act for more than one principal at a time whose interests might conflict and that the agent could keep confidential information received whilst acting for competing principals.

13. The conflict of interest provision in the ESTONIAN LOA § 623(1) applies both in cases of self-contracting and in cases where the agent (also) acts as an agent to the third party: this is only allowed if the possibility of a conflict of interests is precluded.

14. In FINLAND there is no regulation in this respect. In literature, a double mandate is considered disallowed and a prospective contract between two or more clients represented by the same agent is effective only if expressly accepted by the principal. In case there is no acceptance, the prospective contract is found to be voidable (Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I[2], 460-464). Should the principal agree on double mandate, the agent is, in general, allowed to act for two clients. A disclosure by the agent is not sufficient unless the principal clearly accepts the double mandate.

15. In FRANCE the hypothesis of a double mandate is not envisaged by the legislation on agency, but the situation is sometimes regulated by specific legislation (e.g. art. 2 of the Decree of 26 Dec 1971 concerning Notaries, and art. 155(1) Decree of 27 Nov 1991, concerning Avocats). The hypothesis is accepted without difficulty for insurance agents (Req. 26 Nov 1928, S. 1929, 1, 94; CA Paris 8 May 1981, GP. 1981, 2, 801). Academic legal writers cannot agree about this question, and French courts have adopted a prudent position. In general, the double mandate is accepted, provided that it is implemented with complete transparency (see, for example, the case concerning an estate agent: Civ. 1ère 13 May 1998, Bull. Civ. I, no. 169; RTD Civ. 1998, 927). It may be supposed that in the absence of transparency in the case of the double mandate, the contract entered into with a third party could be avoided at the instance of the principal (contract voidable and not void). This would be on the basis of the failure of performance of the agent to satisfy its obligation of fair dealing (see Malaurie, Aynès & Gautier, no. 566). An action for negligence could also be envisaged against the agent.

16. The parties may agree to deviate from GERMAN CC § 181 and allow a double mandate. No form requirements apply. CC § 181 ad fine furthermore declares a double mandate to be admissible where the legal act performed by the agent 'consists exclusively in the fulfilment of an obligation', e.g. an already existing legal obligation to execute said act – in this case, no conflict of interest is possible, as the agent merely does what the principal was already obliged to do before the agent got involved.

17. According to the GREEK CC art. 235(1) an agent may not execute in the name of the person represented a deed in the capacity as agent of a third party except if any such deed had been authorised (explicitly or tacitly) by the person represented or if it constitutes exclusively the performance of an obligation (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Doris, Art. 235 GREEK CC nr. 1).

18. If the agent has to act in the name of the principal, according to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 221(3), '[a] agent shall not proceed if the opposite or otherwise interested party is himself or a person whom he also represents. The agent, if a legal person, shall also be allowed to proceed in a case of conflicting interests with the express consent of the person represented'. If the agent does not act in the name of the third party, he may act also as an agent to the third party but he has the obligation to inform the principal about this fact (CC art. 277(5)). Moreover, CC art. 474(2) provides that '[a]n agent must fulfil the principal's instructions and represent his interests regarding the authority conferred upon him'. Also CC art. 477(1) establishes that '[t]he agent shall inform his principal of his activities and the state of affairs upon request or, if necessary, even without a request, particularly if employment of another person has become necessary or if the instructions need to be changed due to the occurrence of new circumstances'. In case of commission agency, CC art. 510(1) provides that '[t]he commission agent can himself conclude a sales contract with the principal'. As it follows from these principles, it is not relevant in this respect whether the principal and/or the third party is a consumer or not.

19. In IRELAND as part of the fiduciary duty owed to the principal, an agent must not allow personal interests to conflict with those of the principal. English authority provides that this duty may be excluded by an express or implied term of the contract (e.g. Kelly v Cooper [1993] AC 205; Henderson v Merrett [1995] 2 AC 145). Whether an Irish court would allow such exclusion remains to be seen. The majority of cases concern an agent taking up a position of conflict with the principal. Interesting questions have arisen where an agent takes a position where the duty to one principal may conflict with the duty to another principal. In the English case of Kelly v Cooper an estate agent, A, acted for two principals, P and X, who owned two adjacent properties. They both instructed A to sell their properties. A showed both properties to T, who agreed to buy X's property. T subsequently made an offer to P to buy his property. P, unaware that T had already agreed to buy X's property, accepted the offer. When P discovered that T had agreed to buy X's property, he argued that had he known that fact he would have been able to negotiate a higher price for his property because it was clear that T wanted both properties. P argued that A was in breach of his fiduciary duties in failing to disclose that T had agreed to buy X's property and in placing himself in a position where his duties to his two principals would conflict. He claimed damages for loss of the chance to negotiate a higher price. The Privy Council held that where an agent acts in pursuance of a contract, the scope of his fiduciary duties is determined by the contract. Since it was well known that estate agents might act for more than one principal, the agency contract in this case contained an implied term that the agent would be permitted to act for more than one principal, whose interests might compete, and to keep confidential information received whilst acting for other principals. On the facts, the contract could not include a term preventing the agent acting for other principals. This decision has wide implications because situations where an agent acts for more than one principal are increasingly common, as with financial advisors and solicitors, especially as firms become larger. In Clarke

Boyce v Mauot ([1994] 1 AC 428), the Privy Council went a step further when it held that a solicitor was entitled to act for both parties in the same transaction even where their interests might conflict, provided the informed consent of both parties was obtained. The recognition, by English courts, of the ability of parties to contract out of the 'no conflict rule' reflects modern commercial practice. Nevertheless, critics point to the danger of leaving everything to express and implied terms of the contract, thereby denying the importance of fiduciary obligations.

20. In ITALY as a rule, the agent may act on behalf of two or more principals. However, if the principals have opposing interests which may lead to a conflict of interests the consent of the first principal is required (priority rule). As a consequence, if the agent who acts for a principal intends to act also for a third party, the agent must notify the first principal of this circumstance in order to receive the principal's authorisation. If the authorisation is not granted, the agent should refuse the mandate.

21. In the NETHERLANDS serving two masters is only allowed if there is no conflict of interests between the principal and the third party (CC art. 7:417(1); Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3090-3091; Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 35). If the principal does not act in the course of a business, the principal's written approval is required before the agent is allowed to serve two masters (CC art. 7:417(2); Haak and Zwitser, Opdracht aan hulppersonen, 161). If in this case the agent serves two masters without having received the principal's written approval, the agent will be in breach of contract (Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3091; Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 36).

22. In POLAND double mandate is allowed only if the principal has agreed or if there is no danger to the principal's interests.

23. SCOTTISH solicitors are prohibited from acting for two different parties whose interest's conflict (Begg, 363; Solicitors (Scotland) Practice Rules 1986, rule 3). Provided however that no conflict arises, there is no bar to acting for two parties. The rules on conflict of interest are complex and are not explored in full here. The issue is governed by both the Code of Conduct for Scottish Solicitors 2002, rule 3 and the Solicitors (Scotland) Practice Rules 1986. The former provides that, in choosing to act for two parties, solicitors must have regard to any possible risk of breaches of confidentiality and impairment of independence arising in the future (Code of conduct for Scottish solicitors 2002, rule 3). A different kind of agent, a 'broker', also has a limited ability to act for two principals. The term 'broker' has been defined as '…a limited agent who is employed in making bargains or contracts between other persons in matters of trade, commerce, and navigation'. (Encyclopaedia of the Laws of Scotland 1926, para 553). It is accepted that a broker may be the agent of both parties (Encyclopaedia of the Laws of Scotland 1926, para 553). The various estate agency codes which regulate the actions of their members all contain provisions on conflicts of interest (Ombudsman's Code of Practice, rule 9a; Estate Agency Affairs Board Code of Conduct, art 4.1.4 and the National Association of Estate Agents Rules of Conduct, rule 10).

24. In SLOVAKIA the advocate is obliged to refuse to perform legal services for a person if he or she has performed legal services for another person (client) in the same or a related matter and the client's interests conflict with the interests of the person concerned.

25. In SWEDEN the parties can agree on a double mandate. It may also follow from usages. There are cases where a double mandate is allowed. An example is an auctioneer's office which acts as an agent for both the seller and the buyer; both the seller and the buyer paying a commission of a certain percentage of the sales price to the commissionaire (see Håstad, 302).

III. Right to price if double mandate allowed

26. In BULGARIA there are no explicit rules. Legal doctrine considers it unallowable for the agent to receive remuneration from both parties to the prospective contract (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 120).

27. In FINLAND if the prospective contract is valid, the agent is in general entitled to charge a fee and reimbursement of expenses. A real estate agent, however, is entitled to charge only one price if the agent represents both parties to a purchase (Real Estate Agent Act art. 20).

28. In FRANCE in the case of a transparent double mandate, the agent would normally be entitled to double remuneration and to obtain repayment of all expenses in accordance with the terms of each agency contract entered into. If the double mandate is not transparent, there are cases where the agent would certainly be held to be liable and the damages would be set off against any remuneration and repayment which may be due to the agent. This situation has not, however, been clearly defined by French case law and litigation is exceptional.

29. In GERMANY if the double mandate was permissible, the agent is entitled to the price. For brokerage contracts, the CC § 654 explicitly declares that neither price nor reimbursement of expenses may be claimed if the double mandate was contrary to the brokerage contract, thus indicating that in cases of permissible double mandate the broker maintains the right to claim the price.

30. In IRELAND given that double mandate may be permissible and not necessarily in breach of any fiduciary duty, provided there is full disclosure etc., it would appear that remuneration and indemnity are payable in such circumstances.

31. In the NETHERLANDS if double mandate is allowed, the agent is entitled to the remuneration. If double mandate is not allowed according to CC art. 7:417(1)-(2), for instance if the principal has not given written approval, the agent is not entitled to the price (CC art. 7:417(3); Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3091; Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 37; Haak and Zwitser, Opdracht aan hulppersonen, 163).

32. There are no POLISH CC provisions that would deprive the agent of the remuneration or limit it in any way in case of double mandate.

33. In SCOTLAND if acting for both parties is permitted the normal rules on remuneration apply.

34. In SLOVAKIA in the case of commercial representation, the agent cannot claim entitlement to a commission and agreed compensation for costs if the agent acted, as a commercial agent or as a broker, for the party with whom the principal has concluded the business deal (Ccom § 659(3); see § 647(1) for the Brokerage Contract).

35. In SWEDEN the agent is entitled to a price for the services as well as reimbursement of expenses. This is regardless of whether the double mandate is disclosed or not and it may lead to a double remuneration.

CHAPTER 6: TERMINATION BY NOTICE OTHER THAN FOR NON-PERFORMANCE

IV.D.–6:101: Termination by notice in general

(1) Either party may terminate the mandate relationship at any time by giving notice to the other.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1), a revocation of the mandate of the agent is treated as termination.

(3) Termination of the mandate relationship is not effective if the mandate of the agent is irrevocable under IV.D.–1:105 (Irrevocable mandate).

(4) The effects of termination are governed by III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (3).

(5) When the party giving the notice was justified in terminating the relationship no damages are payable for so doing.

(6) When the party giving the notice was not justified in terminating the relationship, the termination is nevertheless effective but the other party is entitled to damages in accordance with the rules in Book III.

(7) For the purposes of this Article the party giving the notice is justified in terminating the relationship if that party:

(a) was entitled to terminate the relationship under the express terms of the contract and observed any requirements laid down in the contract for doing so;
(b) was entitled to terminate the relationship under Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5 (Termination); or
(c) was entitled to terminate the relationship under any other Article of the present Chapter and observed any requirements laid down in such Article for doing so.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article provides, first, that a notice of termination by either party has the effect of terminating the mandate relationship (paragraph (1)). In accordance with the general rules on notices in Book I, the termination is effective when the notice of termination reaches the other party or, if the notice so provides, when a period indicated in the notice has elapsed (I.–1:109 (Notice) paragraph (3)). The effects of termination are governed by the general rules in Book III, Chapter 1 on the effects of termination of a contractual relationship by notice. This means that termination has prospective effect only, subject to the restitution of certain benefits (III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (3)), but does not affect provisions for the settlement of disputes or other provisions intended to survive the termination of the mandate relationship.

The notice leads to the termination of the mandate relationship, whether or not the party giving notice had a right to terminate the relationship under the express terms of the contract or under the rule on termination for fundamental non-performance or under any other rule in the present Chapter, such as the rule on termination of a relationship of indefinite duration by giving notice of reasonable length. If there is such a right to terminate and if the requirements for such termination are observed (i.e. if the termination is justified within the meaning of paragraph (7)) no damages are payable for terminating the relationship (paragraph (5). However, if there is no right to terminate under the express terms of the contract or under the provisions on fundamental non-performance or the equivalent or under any other rule of this Chapter, the aggrieved party will be entitled to damages (paragraph (6)). This applies also if the requirements for exercising such an other right to terminate were not observed – for example, if a reasonable period of notice is required but only an inadequate period of notice is given. As the mandate relationship is ended, the aggrieved party is not entitled to claim specific performance of the obligations under the mandate contract, i.e. cannot force the party wrongfully terminating the mandate relationship to continue performance. The aggrieved party can however ask for specific performance of obligations relating to the settlement of disputes and other obligations which are intended to survive termination of the mandate relationship. This follows from the general rule in III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (3)(b).

According to paragraph (2) a notice of revocation of the mandate of the agent is to be treated as a notice by the principal terminating the mandate relationship.

B. Notice of termination effective, unless mandate irrevocable

Notice of termination in principle always effective. A notice of termination leads in any case to the termination of the mandate relationship, whether or not the party has a right to terminate under any other rule.

Relationship to general rule in Book III. The general rule under III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (1) is that a contractual relationship can be terminated by notice by either party "where this is provided for by the terms regulating it". The present Article is an example of such a term. It is a default rule. The parties may include a different term in the mandate contract – for example, one providing that termination by notice will take place only after a period of a prescribed length. Given the nature of a mandate contract, however, such a term would be unusual as it would not be in the interests of the principal.

The character of mandate relationships, with their strong foundation in trust and confidence, suggests that the parties should not be compelled to continue the relationship once one of them has shown an intention to terminate it. If, for example, the agent were to be obliged to continue performance for a period after giving notice, it might be asked whether the agent would in fact be very active in facilitating, negotiating or concluding the prospective contract during that period. Similarly, there is a strong argument for not placing a principal in a situation where another person can affect the principal's legal position after a notice of immediate termination of the relationship has been given. There is not after that time a strong basis in trust and confidence for a compulsorily continued mandate relationship.

No termination in case of irrevocable mandate. There is, however, one exception to the rule that the notice of termination is always effective, whether or not the conditions for termination have been met. This is the case where the mandate is irrevocable under IV.D.–1:105 (Irrevocable mandate). If termination of an irrevocable mandate were possible, the consequences of irrevocability could be easily circumvented by giving notice of termination. This is exactly what is not intended in the case of irrevocability. The present paragraph (3) therefore excludes the effectiveness of a notice of termination in the case of an irrevocable mandate.

C. Non-compliance with normal requirements for termination only relevant to liability in damages

There are some situations where a party to a mandate relationship has a right under other rules to terminate it by notice without being liable to pay damages for so doing. Paragraph (7) lists the relevant situations for present purposes. One such situation is where the contract itself confers an express right to terminate, perhaps after giving a reasonable period of notice. Another is where there has been fundamental non-performance (or the equivalent) by the other party of obligations under the contract. See Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5 (Termination). Other situations are provided for in the present Chapter. So far as the principal is concerned the relevant provisions are IV.D.–6:102 (Termination by principal when relationship is to last for indefinite period or when mandate is for a particular task), which applies where the mandate relationship is not irrevocable and the mandate contract was concluded for an indefinite period or for a particular task, and IV.D.–6:103 (Termination by principal for extraordinary and serious reason). Under both provisions notice must be given. Under the first a notice period of reasonable length must be observed and under the second there must be an extraordinary and serious reason to terminate the contractual relationship immediately. For the agent, IV.D.–6:104 (Termination by agent when relationship is to last for indefinite period or when it is gratuitous) and IV.D.–6:105 (Termination by agent for extraordinary and serious reason) contain similar provisions. If the requirements of these provisions are observed, there is no liability in damages for the party who wants to terminate (paragraph (5)). If they are not observed, termination is still effective under the present Article according to the terms of the notice of termination but damages will be payable by the party giving notice (paragraph (6)).

D. Revocation of mandate of the agent implies termination of mandate relationship

Revocation of the mandate of the agent leads to the termination of the mandate relationship by the principal. By revoking the mandate, the principal takes away the core of the content of the mandate relationship and as a result the whole of the mandate relationship consequently comes to an end. For that reason, paragraph (2) provides expressly that revocation of the mandate of the agent is regarded as termination by notice under paragraph (1).

The fact that the principal is allowed to revoke the mandate and thereby terminate the mandate relationship does not mean that the revocation is always ‘free of charge’. As revocation of the mandate is treated as a termination, the rules of Chapter 6 apply. This implies that termination is in any case effective, but where the agent has not been guilty of fundamental non-performance or the equivalent and the principal does not have an extraordinary and serious reason to revoke or has not observed a notice period of reasonable length in terminating a contractual relationship of indefinite duration, the principal would be required to pay damages under paragraph (5) of the present Article.

When the principal concludes the prospective contract personally or by means of another agent this implicitly revokes the agent’s mandate to conclude that contract on the principal’s behalf (cf. IV.D.–1:104 (Revocation of the mandate) paragraph (2)). Under paragraph (2) of the present provision, revocation is treated as termination by notice. Since in the situation in which the principal concludes the prospective contract personally or by means of another agent the principal in effect terminates the contractual relationship without being entitled to do so under any of the provisions mentioned, the principal would be obliged to pay damages in accordance with III.–3:702 (General measure of damages).

E. Calculation of damages

Where the principal terminates the mandate relationship without being justified in doing so under paragraph (7) and where damages are consequently payable, the general rules on the calculation of damages come into operation. Under III.–3:702 (General measure of damages) the agent is entitled to be put as nearly as possible into the position in which the agent would have been if the principal's obligations under the mandate contract had been duly performed. In this respect it should be noted that, if the mandate contract has been concluded for an indefinite period or for a particular task, then – unless the parties have validly derogated from IV.D.–6:102 (Termination by principal when relationship is to last for indefinite period or when mandate is for a particular task) – the principal may at any time terminate the mandate relationship by giving notice of reasonable length. In that case, the damage sustained by the agent is not the fact that the agent could not conclude the prospective contract, but the fact that the notice period was not observed and, therefore, that the agent has lost the chance of being able to conclude the prospective contract in the remaining period in which the mandate contract would have been in force. In these cases, the effect of III.–3:702 is to substitute a monetary sum for the reasonable notice period. Damages will be payable in lieu of a reasonable period of notice. Where the contract was concluded for a definite period then the damages would be for the loss of the chance of concluding the prospective contract in the remainder of the period.

F. Restitutionary effects of termination

The restitutionary consequences of termination are dealt with under paragraph (4). The effect of that paragraph is that the general rules in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5, sub-section 4 apply. These rules require a party who has received any benefit from the other's performance of the obligations under the contract to return the benefit. If the benefit is transferable it must be returned by transferring it. If the benefit is not transferable its value must be paid. (III.–3:510 (Restitution of benefits received by performance)). As any benefit received by the performance of the agent, in so far as it has already been rendered, cannot normally be transferred, the principal will have to pay the value of any performance which has been received but for which payment was not yet due at the time of termination. If payment had been due at the time of termination then it would remain due because termination has only prospective effect.

The method of calculating the payment due is laid down in III.–3:512 (Payment of value of benefit). Where a price is payable under the contract, the basic rule is that the payment due is that proportion of the price which the value of the actual performance (received but for which payment was not due at the time of termination) bears to the value of the promised performance (III.–3:512 paragraph (2). Where a price per hour or day of work by the agent was payable under the contract the payment due will be calculated by reference to that price. Where, however, the price was due only if the prospective contract was concluded it will usually be difficult to argue that the agent is entitled to any restitutionary payment. The comparison then would be between what was promised (a result) and what was provided (no result). What this means is that if, in such "no result, no pay" cases, the agent terminates the relationship without justification before the result is achieved then the agent will receive nothing. If the principal terminates the relationship without justification before the result is achieved then the agent will receive nothing by way of a restitutionary payment but will be entitled to damages for the loss of the chance of concluding the prospective contract. If the agent had been on the point of concluding the prospective contract then these damages should approach or even equal the amount of the commission which would have been due.

NOTES

I. Termination by notice

1. In AUSTRIA an agent's authority can be terminated at any time by the express revocation of it by the principal (CC § 1020). The question of termination of the contractual relationship is the same as that of termination of authority. There are no special commercial rules, so the common rules apply for the termination of a commission business or forwarding (see CC §§ 918 et seq., 1020, 1022, 1024 and 1447).

2. In BELGIUM the principal can always revoke for any or no reason the authority to represent. The conclusion of the contract by the principal personally is considered to be a silent revocation (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 462).

3. In BULGARIA if one of the parties ends the mandate, the contract ends when the other party gets to know (including by receiving a notice) or could have become aware of the ending (LOA art. 290; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 30). There is no general rule about the length of a notice period; the parties are free to stipulate it in their contract. Special rules exist for the length of a notice period for some types of mandate contracts (e.g. Ccom art. 47(1)).

4. In ENGLAND it is clear that the principal can terminate the authority and the agent can renounce the authority at any time and that such a revocation/renunciation will be valid, even if in breach of contract, in which case the guilty party is liable for damages. The rules for unilateral termination are as follows: one must distinguish the rules for the internal relationship (principal/agent) and the external relationship (principal/third party). Internally, the principal must give notice to the agent for the authority to end: Re oriental Bank Corpn ex p Guillemin (1884) 28 Ch D 634, Simpson (Robert) Co v Godson (1937) 1 DLR 454. In spite of this, one must mention two old decisions: Smith and Jenning's case (1610) Lane 97 and Anon. (1700) 12 Mod 409, 88 ER 1415 (as cited by Brown, 218) which show that revocation can be implied by an act of the principal which is inconsistent with the continuation of the agent's authority which comes to the agent's notice. Moreover, for some agents (e.g. estate agents) no notice is required: Nelson (EP) & Co v Rolfe (1950) 1 KB 139. In relation to the external relationship, revocation of authority is only valid towards the third party when the third party has actual notice of the revocation and therefore until then, the principal can still be bound under apparent authority. There is no obligation on the principal to provide a notice period to the agent, but equally, it is clear that no contract is meant to last for ever. If the parties to a contract for an indefinite duration have not provided for a notice, the courts may imply a reasonable notice: Martin-Baker Aircraft Co v Murison (1955) 2 QB 556.

5. In FRANCE the general rule is revocation ad nutum, i.e. at any time, without specific reason and without any right to compensation (CC art. 2004). A specific notice need not be sent to the agent, except when the termination occurs as a result of the appointment of a new agent for the same transaction (CC art. 2006).

6. A termination of the mandate relationship according to GERMAN CC § 671(1) takes effect when the notice reaches the agent, CC § 130(1) (Seiler, in: Münchener Kommentar zum BGB[4], § 671 no. 3).

7. In HUNGARY even if the revocability of the contract for representation is restricted, the principal can withdraw the powers of representation from the agent at any time during the execution of the contract and is entitled to conclude the prospective contract (or to execute the prospected other juridical act) personally. In the case of commission agency, CC art. 512(2) provides that '[a]ny limitation or exclusion of the right of rescission shall be null and void'. According to CC art. 223 para (2), 'A power of representation shall be valid until withdrawn, unless otherwise provided; its withdrawal that concerns a bona fide third person shall be operative only if he has been informed thereof.' See Supreme Court Pfv. IX. 22.281/2005, in EBH2006. 1426.

8. In IRELAND as a general rule, either party may terminate the contractual relationship (although such termination may amount to a breach of contract), in accordance with any notice period in the contract, or, if the contract is silent, on reasonable notice.

9. In the NETHERLANDS the principal can at any time end the mandate relationship according to CC art. 7:408(1). There are no specific rules on notice but if the relationship is to last for an indefinite period, either party may terminate it by giving notice of reasonable length. The principal, however, may in general end the mandate relationship without giving notice of reasonable length at any time according to CC arts. 7:408(1) and. 7:422(1), a rule that is mandatory (CC, art. 7:422 (2)), whereas the agent may only do so for extraordinary and serious reason (CC art. 7:402)

10. In POLAND the mandate relationship ends when notice of termination reaches the other party (CC arts. 746 and 61).

11. In SCOTLAND although the principal must communicate the fact of revocation of the agent's authority to the agent (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 536, relying on English authority, Re Oriental Bank Corporation, ex p Guillemin (1884) 28 Ch D 634), the principal need not provide the agent with a period of notice on the expiry of which the revocation takes effect unless either (a) this is agreed in terms of the principal/agent contract, or; (b) in the circumstances, the absence of reasonable notice would be 'gravely prejudicial' to the agent (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 536, relying on English authority, Martin-Baker Aircraft Co v Murison [1955] 2 QB 556).

12. In SLOVAKIA in civil relations, the principal and the agent are always entitled to terminate the relationship. Until the revocation of authority becomes known to the agent, the agent's juridical acts have legal consequences as if the authority continued to be effective. If the agent terminates the relationship, the agent is nevertheless bound to perform an immediately required juridical act if necessary to prevent detriment to the rights of the principal; acts thus performed have the same legal effects as if the representation had continued, unless they conflict with the arrangements made by the principal (CC § 33b). In commercial relations (B2B), the agent may terminate the contractual relationship, and the termination will take effect at the end of the month following the month during which the notice was delivered to the principal, unless a later date ensues from the notice (Ccom § 575(1)). The principal may also terminate the mandate partly or fully at any time; unless the term of notice stipulates otherwise, the notice will take effect as of the day on which the agent has or could have learned about it (Ccom § 574(1)-(2)).

13. In SPAIN the principal may terminate or revoke at any time (CC art. 1733). If revocation damages the interests of the agent or if the revocation is based on unlawful reasons, the agent will have the right to indemnity (Lete del Río, Derecho de obligaciones III[4], 413). Termination is however effective in any case, from the moment the agent is informed (CC art. 1735 and 1738). The agent may also terminate the relationship, subject to certain conditions: (1) the agent has to inform the principal (CC art. 1736(1)); (2) the agent has to indemnify the principal if the latter suffers damage, unless the agent terminates because continuing with the mandate will cause serious detriment to the agent (e.g. illness of the agent, refusal of the principal to pay an advance or an unfriendly relationship between the parties) (CC art. 1736(2)); (3) the agent has to continue performance until the principal can take the measures necessary to adapt to the new situation (CC art. 1737). As is the case for the principal, notice of termination by the agent is effective in any case.

14. In SWEDEN if a notice period is agreed upon in the contract, the contractual relationship ends when such period has elapsed. If no such period has been agreed upon the relationship ends with immediate effect when the notice reaches the other party (unless the notice refers to another specific date). This follows from general contract law principles.

II. Revocation of mandate is considered to be termination

15. In AUSTRIA an agent's authority can be terminated at any time by the express revocation of it by the principal (CC § 1020). The question of termination of the contractual relationship is the same as that of termination of authority. There are no special commercial rules, so the common rules apply for the termination of a commission business or forwarding (see CC §§ 918 et seq., 1020, 1022, 1024 and 1447).

16. In BELGIUM the revocation can be express or implied. The conclusion of the prospective contract by the principal himself is considered to be a silent revocation (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V[2], 462).

17. In BULGARIA the principal has the right to revoke the mandate at any time by unilateral notice to the agent (LOA art. 288; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 29). This revocation terminates the contractual relationship (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 29; Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 239; Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 170) from the moment when the agent gets to know or could have become aware of the revocation (LOA art. 290; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 30).

18. In ENGLAND when the principal revokes the agent's authority, this amounts to termination of the agent/principal relationship.

19. The FRENCH Civil Code gives the principal the possibility of terminating the agent's authority ad nutum, i.e. at any time, without specific reason and without any right to compensation (art. 2004). The termination may even occur as a result of notice to the agent of the appointment of a new agent for the same transaction (CC art. 2006). The principal does, however, have to inform any possible third party contractors of such revocation in order to give them binding notice (CC art. 2005).

20. Whether revocation of the authority granted to the agent also results in termination of the mandate relationship is a question of interpretation of the revocation notice: GERMAN CC § 168 addresses the reverse situation and stipulates that the authority ends when the underlying legal relationship (e.g. a mandate contract) ends, but no general rule about the effect of a revocation of authority for the mandate relationship exists.

21. In HUNGARY even if the revocability of the contract for representation is restricted, the principal can withdraw the powers of representation from the agent at any time during the execution of the contract and is entitled to conclude the prospective contract (or to execute the prospected other juridical act) personally. In general, the revocation of a power of representation is not considered to be termination of the agency relationship.

22. In IRELAND since agency is a consensual relationship it can be terminated if either party withdraws consent. Where the principal withdraws consent, the principal is said to 'revoke' the agent's authority. No formality is required for a revocation. Revocation is effective even if in breach of contract. Thus, for instance, the authority of an agent appointed for a fixed term may be revoked before expiry of the term and the revocation will be effective to terminate the agent's actual authority. However, while the agency relationship may be effectively terminated, other liabilities may arise. For example, the agent may continue to have apparent authority, thereby binding the principal with third parties. Moreover, revocation before the expiry of a fixed term may give rise to liability for breach of contract (e.g. damages for loss of opportunity to earn commission) on the principal's part, unless justified by a prior breach by the other party. Where an agent is appointed for an indeterminate period the agency can be terminated in accordance with any provision in the agreement for termination by notice. In the absence of any express term, it will normally be implied that the agency can be terminated, by either party, on reasonable notice.

23. In the NETHERLANDS the principal is allowed to revoke the agent's mandate. However, there are restrictions if the mandate is irrevocable according to CC art. 7:422(2) (Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3096; Haak and Zwitser, Opdracht aan hulppersonen, 157; CFI Roermond 11 Feb 1999, NJ 1999, 607; HR 29 Sep 1989, NJ 1990, 307).

24. In POLAND there are no specific provisions on this matter. Since the agent may not carry out agency duties after the revocation it should be considered equal in effect to termination.

25. In SCOTLAND, the entire revocation of the agent's mandate would be equivalent to the termination of the agency relationship. (Cf Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', paras. 25 and 183).

26. In SLOVAKIA the provisions on termination of authority (external level) should be applied to the termination of the agency relationship (internal level); the CC § 731 implies a strong link between revocation of authority and termination of the mandate relationship. Revocation of power definitely terminates the contractual relationship. The same applies to commercial relations.

27. In SWEDEN a revocation of power is considered to be a termination of the agent's assignment, provided that the agent knows of the revocation.

III. Consequences of termination for payment of the agent

28. In AUSTRIA, if the principal terminates the relationship, the agent is entitled to a proportional part of the remuneration or price, to reimbursement of any expenses incurred and to damages for losses suffered (Strasser, § 1020 Rz 2-8e and 3 1021 Rz 15-26). The common Civil Code rules apply to the termination of a commission business or forwarding (see CC §§ 918 et seq., 1020, 1022, 1024 and 1447).

29. In BELGIUM the revocation has effect ex nunc and has no retroactive effect. The principal is obliged to reimburse the past expenses and losses of the agent and to pay a salary pro rata (Tilleman, Lastgeving, 304-305; Wéry, Le mandat, 215 and 273).

30. In BULGARIA unilateral withdrawal of the principal does not deprive the agent of remuneration (if such has been stipulated) and reimbursement of expenses (LOA art. 288(1)). The commission agent is entitled to receive remuneration and reimbursement of expenses for prospective contracts concluded on behalf of the principal until the end of the contractual relationship (Ccom art. 360). Unilateral termination by the principal does not eliminate the commercial agent's right to remuneration if the principal continues to enjoy benefits from the clientele established by the agent, except if the termination is due to the agent's fault (Ccom art. 47(3) referring to art. 40).

31. In ENGLAND termination does not affect any rights that the agent had accrued before termination, i.e. commission, indemnity, right to sue for breach etc. If termination by the principal amounted to a breach, the agent will still be entitled to sue for this breach and claim damages. Once the agent has received notice of the termination, any act that the agent does afterwards is not binding on the principal and will not give rise to commission, indemnity etc.

32. In FRANCE if the termination is based on the fact that the mandate can no longer be performed for reasons that are independent of the parties, the French courts consider that the remuneration normally due may then be limited to the part of the contract which has already been performed (Cass.com., 21 Dec 1981, Bull.civ. 1981 IV, no. 450). If the mandate has not been performed for reasons of force majeure, it is thought that the remuneration will not be due. In any event, the agent will be entitled to repayment of expenses already incurred. There are, however, several limits to the absence of compensation of the agent in the case of termination of the mandate, e.g. in case of misuse by the principal of the right to freely terminate the agency (Cass.civ. 1re, 2 May 1984, Bull.civ. 1984 I, no. 143), in case of termination of a fixed-term agency (the termination must be based on a proper ground; see Cass.civ. 1re, 28 Jan 2003, Bull.civ. 2003 I, no. 27) and in case the agency contract provides for compensation in the event of unilateral termination (Cass.civ. 1re, 6 Mar 2001, Bull.civ. 2001 I, no. 56). A special category is formed by the agency 'd'intérêt commun' ('of common interest'), which has been distinguished by the courts since the end of the 19th century. In this case, the mandate is freely terminable, but the agent must be compensated for the losses suffered in making specific efforts to develop the business or the custom in performance of the mandate.

33. According to HUNGARIAN CC art. 478(4), 'Fees shall be payable at the time a contract is extinguished.'

34. In IRELAND termination of the agency does not affect existing liabilities. For instance, an agent is entitled to any commission earned and, to any indemnity due in respect of liabilities incurred, before termination. An agent may also be entitled to commission on contracts performed after termination of the agency where they were entered into prior to termination. Termination without notice will be justified where the other party has been guilty of a serious breach of contract. In other cases, termination without notice, or with less than the full notice required by the agreement, will terminate the agent's authority but may give rise to liability for breach of contract where the agency is contractual. Usually, this will be a claim against the principal by a dismissed agent. An agent is dismissed in breach of contract may claim damages in respect of the loss of the opportunity to earn commission had the contract been performed. As with any claim for breach of contract, the claimant will have to show that the loss is not too remote and will have to mitigate the loss.

35. In the NETHERLANDS although the principal may end the agency at any time without giving notice of reasonable length, that does not alter the fact that the agent is entitled to wages according to CC art. 7:411(2). Obviously, the individual circumstances should be taken into account.

36. In POLAND the agent is entitled to receive partial remuneration and compensation for all incurred expenses. The agent is entitled to claim for the loss only if the contract was terminated without "important reasons" (CC art. 746).

37. In SCOTLAND termination by the principal will be without prejudice to the agent's accrued rights in respect of remuneration and/or commission, relief, and damages for breach of contract (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 114; Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 536). As a general rule, however, the agent is not entitled to commission on orders received after the principal has terminated the agency relationship (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 114; Black, para. 518). The principal is also bound to relieve the agent for any losses suffered where revocation prevents the agent from completing unfinished transactions (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 183).

38. In SLOVAKIA in civil relations, where the mandate has been revoked by the principal, the principal is obliged to compensate the agent for all expenses incurred before revocation, for damages suffered and if any remuneration is due for work that the agent performed, for such work or part thereof. The same probably applies in case of termination by the agent. In commercial relations, the agent is entitled to reimbursement of expenses and to a proportionate part of remuneration for duly rendered services before the day the notice takes effect.

39. In SPAIN, the right to terminate the agency does not make the principal free from the obligation to reimburse incurred expenses or the liability to pay damages for any loss suffered by the early termination (STS 3 March 1998, RJA 1998/1129). The STS 3 march 1998, RJA 1998/1129 held that the principal was not entitled to freely terminate the mandate where a price for the services and a definite time had been agreed.

40. In SWEDEN where the principal terminates the relationship, the agent is entitled to payment for work already performed.

IV. Notice of termination always brings about termination

41. In BULGARIA unilateral notice of termination from one of the parties to the other one always ends the legal relationship. However, the prerequisites for lawful unilateral ending of the relationship are different for the principal and for the agent. The former, as "master of the contract", is entitled to give a notice at any time (LOA art. 288), whereas the latter may only end the relationship for a "serious reason" (LOA art. 289; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 29-30). Unless agreed otherwise, the commission agent is not allowed to unilaterally end the agency, except if the principal has breached the contract (Ccom art. 359(1)). The commercial agent and the principal are permitted to unilaterally end their relationship on equal terms (Ccom art. 47(1), (2)).

42. In ENGLAND when one party gives notice of termination but fails to comply with a period of notice required by the contract, this usually amounts to a repudiatory breach; normal common law rules of contract apply (Atlantic Underwriting Agencies Ltd. v. Compagnia di Assicurazione di Milano SpA [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep 240). So, at common law, a repudiation only has the effect of ending the contractual relationship if it is accepted by the other. It is therefore up to the agent to accept the repudiation or not. If the agent does not, the contractual relationship remains alive. However, in practice, it is in the agent's interest to accept the repudiation and end the relationship if the agent wants to claim damages for breach.

43. In FRANCE the rule entitling the parties to freely terminate the agency is a matter of mandatory public policy. The parties cannot validly agree that the agency will be irrevocable. In practice, there are clauses in contracts entitled 'irrevocabilité', but these would be interpreted as simply giving rise to compensation for the agent (Cass.civ. 1re, 5 Feb. 2002, Bull.civ. 2002 I, no. 40), and would also not prevent the principal from carrying out the transaction personally (Cass.civ. 1re, 16 Jun 1970 D. 1971, 261).

44. According to the GERMAN CC § 671(2), a revocation of the mandate by the agent is also valid if it has been declared in violation of the requirements of this provision (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 671 no. 3). The principal is, however, entitled to damages.

45. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 483(1), (2) and (4), 'The principal shall be entitled to abrogate the contract with immediate effect at any time; the principal, however, shall be obliged to uphold the obligations already assumed by the agent. The agent shall also be entitled to abrogate the contract at any time; however, the period of notice must be sufficient for allowing the principal to handle the matter. In the event of the principal's grave breach of contract, abrogation can have immediate effect. Any limitation or exclusion of the right of cancellation shall be null and void; however, the parties shall be entitled to agree on the limitation of the right of cancellation with regard to continuous agencies.' For commission agency, CC. art. 512 prescribes that 'Prior to the conclusion of a sales contract, the principal shall be entitled to terminate the contract by notice with immediate effect, and the commission agent by fifteen-days' notice. Any limitation or exclusion of the right of rescission shall be null and void.'

46. In IRELAND as a general rule, either party may terminate the agency relationship (although such termination may amount to a breach of contract), in accordance with any notice period in the contract, or, if the contract is silent, on reasonable notice. An ineffective termination would usually amount to a repudiation or anticipatory breach.

47. In the NETHERLANDS the principal may in general end the relationship without giving notice of reasonable length at any time according to CC arts. 7:408(1) and. 7:422 (1), a rule that is mandatory (CC, art. 7:422 (2)), whereas the agent may only do so for extraordinary and serious reason (CC art. 7:402)

48. There is no similar rule in the POLISH Civil Code. Parties may only terminate the contractual relationship if entitled to do so.

49. In SCOTLAND where the principal's notice of termination is served in circumstances which do not comply with the terms of the agency contract, the notice will have no immediate terminating effect (on the assumption that it is not given for fundamental breach by the agent). By requiring a period of notice the parties would have contracted out of the normal rule that the principal could terminate at any time. However, an ineffective notice of termination would usually amount to a repudiation by the principal (in effect a declaration that the principal no longer wished to be bound by the contract) which would give the agent the option of terminating the relationship and claiming damages. It would usually be in the agent's interest to exercise this option as the relationship would be precarious and unsatisfactory once the principal's notice has been given. The same would apply in reverse if the agent purported to terminate the relationship but did not observe a period of notice required by the contract.

50. In SLOVAKIA the notice period for the agent's termination in commercial relations must be observed if the parties have not agreed otherwise; the contract is terminated by the end of the notice period. In other cases, the notice has immediate effect; the only limitation may be the obligation of the commercial agent to take preventive measures if needed.

51. In SWEDEN a notice leads to the ending of the contract (with immediate effect or after a notice period).

V. Notice period not observed: right to damages

52. In BELGIUM if the contract provides for a notice period and this period is not upheld, the agent may have a right to damages on the basis of breach of contract.

53. In BULGARIA when the agent wants to unilaterally end the mandate contract for a "serious reason", the agent is obliged to notify the principal in due time; otherwise, he may be held liable for damages incurred by the principal (LOA art. 289).

54. In ENGLAND as explained, if the principal fails to give the required period of notice, the agent will usually be entitled to treat this as an anticipatory breach, terminate the relationship and claim damages for breach.

55. In FRANCE if a notice period provided for in the contract was not upheld, the agent may have a right to damages on the basis of breach of contract.

56. According to the GERMAN CC § 671(2), the principal is entitled to damages if the agent has revoked the mandate contract in an untimely manner.

57. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 483(3), 'If the agency is cancelled without substantial grounds, the damages that are caused shall be indemnified, unless the agency is gratuitous and the period of notice is sufficient for allowing the principal to handle the matter.' According to the decision of the Supreme Court Nr. 3/2006 on the Uniform Application of Law, the CC 483(3) applies also to the principal and 'If a remunerated agency is cancelled without substantial grounds with immediate effect, the damages of the agent that are caused shall be indemnified by the principal'. See CA Jász-Nagykun-Szolnok Megyei Bíróság 4. Gf. 16-00-000016/12, in BDT2002. 577.

58. In IRELAND failure to observe a notice period or provide reasonable notice is a breach of contract for which damages may be payable.

59. In the NETHERLANDS if the contractual requirements as to a notice period are not observed by the principal, the agent is entitled to remuneration according to art. 7:411; if it is the agent who does not observe the requirements and does not have an extraordinary and serious reason for this, the contractual relationship will not terminate.

60. In POLAND the parties may not terminate the contractual relationship if not entitled to do so.

61. In SCOTLAND, as noted above, where the principal serves notice of termination without cause, but without observing the requirements for an effective notice laid down in the agency contract, the agent will usually be entitled to treat this as a repudiation and will then have the option of terminating the relationship and claiming damages. It should be noted that the failure to observe the notice period would not be itself a non-performance of an obligation. A requirement of a certain period is just that – a requirement and not an obligation – and the sanction for non-compliance is the ineffectiveness of the notice.

62. In SLOVAKIA the notice period for the agent's termination in commercial relations must be observed

63. In SWEDEN if the parties have agreed upon a notice period and such period is not upheld by a party, this constitutes non-performance for which the other party could claim damages.

IV.D.–6:102: Termination by principal when relationship is to last for indefinite period or when mandate is for a particular task

(1) The principal may terminate the mandate relationship at any time by giving notice of reasonable length if the mandate contract has been concluded for an indefinite period or for a particular task.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply if the mandate is irrevocable.

(3) The parties may not, to the detriment of the principal, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects, unless the conditions set out under IV.D.–1:105 (Irrevocable mandate) are met.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Following the approach in III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice), the present Article provides the principal with a means to terminate a mandate relationship concluded for an indefinite period by giving notice of reasonable length. The Article follows the generally accepted principle that nobody can be contractually bound to another eternally. But this Part also extends this right of the principal to terminate by notice to those cases in which the contract has been concluded for a particular task. The justification for such solution is that this type of contract may give rise to a relationship where the parties are bound to each other eternally since it is uncertain when or if the envisaged result will be achieved.

B. Termination by notice of reasonable length when contract for an indefinite period

The principal is allowed to bring a mandate relationship entered into for an indefinite period to an end (even in the absence of an extraordinary and serious reason) provided that the principal notifies the decision to terminate a reasonable time in advance in order to grant the agent some time to adapt to the new situation.

Whether a period is reasonable would have to be determined in the light of the relevant circumstances. These would include the time the contract has lasted, the efforts and investments which the agent has made in performing the contract, the time it may take the agent to obtain another contract, and any relevant usages or practices.

C. Termination contract for a particular task

A mandate relationship entered into for a particular task terminates when the particular task is completed (e.g. when the prospective contract is concluded). It is therefore not a contract concluded for an indefinite period but rather one for a definite period, despite the fact that the exact date of expiry is not known exactly. Under IV.D.–6:101 (Termination by notice in general), a principal who terminates a contract for a definite period before the agreed date of expiry (i.e. the specific date or the date when the envisaged result is achieved) is in principle liable in damages, unless there is some other legitimate reason for early termination.

However, under the present Article a principal is entitled to terminate a mandate relationship entered into for a particular task by giving notice of reasonable length and to do so without liability for damages. Although this type of contract could be classified as for a definite period, its specific characteristics are deemed to justify the right to terminate at any time by giving notice. Indeed, since it is uncertain when the envisaged result will be achieved or even whether it will be finally achieved, the parties may be de facto linked to the contract for an indefinite period, in particular in the situation where the agent fails to conclude the prospective contract without breaching the obligations under the mandate contract – in which case the mandate relationship cannot be terminated for non-performance either. However, the principal is not allowed under this Article to terminate the contract immediately: it is essential to give notice of reasonable length to the agent in order to provide some time for adjustment to the new situation.

Illustration
A principal entrusts an estate agent with the task of selling the principal's house without specifying a time within which this is to be done. After a year and a half the house has still not been sold, even though the principal has twice given the estate agent a direction to reduce the price. At that moment, the number of sales of houses has dropped significantly and it does not appear that the housing-market will soon recover. For these reasons, the principal finally decides not to pursue the attempt to sell the house.

In this situation the principal can terminate the mandate relationship, without incurring liability for damages for so doing, by giving a reasonable period of notice.

D. No termination if irrevocable mandate

For obvious reasons paragraph (2) of the Article provides that the principal's right to terminate under paragraph (1) does not apply in the case of an irrevocable mandate.

E. Mandatory character of the rule

The principal's right to terminate the mandate relationship for an indefinite period of time or a particular task is mandatory in favour of the principal – whether the principal is a consumer or a business. If the parties could not terminate a mandate relationship entered into for an indefinite period of time, the contract would in fact be concluded for eternity, and this is considered to be contrary to public policy or good morals in many legal systems. Moreover, if the parties could exclude the right to terminate the mandate relationship, this would undoubtedly lead to a stretching of the notion of 'extraordinary and serious reason' under the following Article, thus enabling the principal to escape from the contract, but without even having to observe a notice period of reasonable length. For these reasons, the parties are not allowed to derogate from this Article to the detriment of the principal. This idea is expressed in paragraph (3).

NOTES

I. Termination by principal

1. For AUSTRIA, this question is submerged in the principal's general right to terminate. See Note 1 to preceding Article.
2. According to the BELGIAN CC art. 2004, a principal can always revoke the authority to represent ad nutum, i.e. without a motive and without a term or amount of notice (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 460-462; Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux , 639; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 301-305; Wéry, Le mandat, 267-273). It is irrelevant whether the contract for representation is non-remunerated (e.g. Supreme Court 28 Jun 1993, Pas. 1993, I, 628, R. Cass. 1993, note I. DEMUYNCK and RW 1993-94, 1425, note A. VAN OEVELEN). As a unilateral juridical act, the revocation does not have to be accepted by the representative to be effective (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 462-463; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 281 and 290-291). The revocation must be notified to the representative and will only be effective when the representative takes note or ought to have taken note of the revocation. No formal requirements apply to the notification (Tilleman, Lastgeving, 283-285; Wéry, Le mandat, 272). According to CC art. 2005, the revocation can only be invoked towards third-parties after they have taken note of it (Wéry, Le mandat, 272). The revocation has effect ex nunc: the representative loses the authority for the future. Contracts concluded prior to the revocation remain valid (Tilleman, Lastgeving, 298-299; Wéry, Le mandat, 273). The absence of retroactivity also means that the principal is obliged to reimburse the past expenses and losses of the representative and to pay a salary pro rata (Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux, 640; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 304-305; Wéry, Le mandat, 215 and 273).

3. As a general rule, the principal can revoke the mandate relationship with the agent at any time and without any reason (BULGARIAN LOA art. 288(1)). This rule is applicable to both gratuitous and non-gratuitous contracts and to contracts for an indefinite or a fixed period (Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 29; Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 239). The principal can end the contract either explicitly by a unilateral notice to the agent or implicitly by the conclusion of the prospective contract by the principal himself or another agent (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 176). The internal mandate relationship is considered terminated from the moment when the agent gets to know or could become aware of the revocation (LOA art. 290; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 30). The agent does not lose his right to remuneration (if such has been stipulated) and reimbursement of expenses (LOA art. 288(1)).

4. Apart from the special (mandatory) rules of The Commercial Agents and Travellers Act, DANISH law contains no specific rules on termination of a contract between a principal and the representative when the contract for representation has been concluded for an indefinite period of time and does not end by the conclusion of the prospective contract. If the parties have not agreed otherwise, the principal is entitled to bring the contract to an end at any time by giving a termination notice to the representative. Under these circumstances the representative is not entitled to claim compensation even if the period of representing the principal had been expected to last for a longer time. The representative may claim compensation for the expenses incurred during the period of the representation.

5. In ENGLAND under the general principle of revocation, the principal may revoke the agent's authority by giving notice before the authority has been fully exercised (Hampden v Walsh ((1876) 1 QBD 189)). This rule of 'unfettered revocation' (Brown, 216) applies even where the agency is described as irrevocable (Vynior's case (1609) 8 Co Rep 81b). In case of an indefinite duration contract, the principal must give notice of the revocation to the agent since the agent's authority does not end until receipt of actual notice of the revocation (Re Oriental Bank Corpn, ex p Guillemin ((1884) 28 Ch D 634)). Once the agent knows about the revocation, any future acts are ineffective and the agent loses the right to future remuneration and indemnity. However, if the notice by the principal is a breach of contract, the agent will be entitled to damages. If the agent is an employee, it may also be possible to claim for compensation for unfair dismissal or for a redundancy payment. For contracts entered into for a particular task, it is accepted that the contract is often unilateral in nature, i.e. that the agent is under no obligation to perform the task and that the principal is bound to pay only when the agent has actually performed the task. In such cases the agent accepts the risk that the principal may withdraw at any time until the agent has performed the required task and therefore bears the risk of not being paid should that occur: Luxor (Eastbourne) Ltd v Cooper [1941] AC 108 (estate agency case). Even though this seems to be the normal interpretation of estate agency contracts, this is subject to express or implied terms to the contrary as is clear from Alpha Trading Ltd. v Dunnshaw-Patten Ltd. [1981] QB 290 where a collateral contract was implied to restrict the principal's freedom to withdraw at any time. In the case of a fixed term contract an attempted termination before the expiry of the term constitutes a repudiatory breach, entitling the agent to claim damages (e.g. Turner v Goldsmith [1891] 1 QB 544). This is so, unless termination is justified by an earlier breach committed by the other party: Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co v Ansell (1888) 39 Ch D 339, CA.

6. In ESTONIA the principal may, as far as the internal relationship to the representative is governed by the (general) contract for services terminate the contract at any time, no special cause for termination is needed (LOA § 630(1)). In case of termination, the representative is entitled to the price for the services rendered until the termination (LOA § 195) and to the costs incurred so far as these are not covered by the price for the services rendered (LOA § 628(2)). If the contract is concluded for a definite period of time, it may be terminated prior to the expiry of that period only on material grounds (LOA § 631), i.e. if the party wishing to terminate the agreement cannot be expected to continue performance. If the contract is entered into for the life of one party or for a period longer than five years, the principal has the right to terminate the contract once five years have passed from the date of conclusion of the contract by giving at least six months' advance notice (LOA § 630(3)).

7. In FINLAND if the contract requires specific personal trust (e.g. mandates for legal services), the principal is entitled to cancel the mandate contract at any time without any reason for the termination. In these cases, the representative is usually entitled to charge a fee only for the tasks already fulfilled. Otherwise the right of termination should be considered in light of the type of the mandate and other circumstances. The principal is generally entitled to cancel the mandate contract with a reasonable period of notice, unless the contract is concluded for a definite period of time (Commercial Agents and Salesmen Act §§ 22-23). The REstateAA contains provisions concerning termination of the mandate relationship in cases where the contract has become unreasonably disadvantageous for the principal (§ 6). The representative is generally entitled to the agreed fee if the termination is not based on a non-performance of the representative. If a concluded prospective contract or some other action is a prerequisite for the fee, the representative is not usually entitled to remuneration if such contract or other action has not been concluded or taken at time of termination of the mandate contract. The representative is entitled to compensation for expenses incurred.

8. In FRANCE the principal can terminate the contract ad nutum, i.e. at any time, without a specific reason and without any liability to pay compensation (CC art. 2004). The termination may even occur as a result of notice to the agent of the appointment of a new agent for the same transaction (CC art. 2006). The principal does, however, have to inform any possible third party contractors of such revocation in order to give them binding notice (CC art. 2005). Regarding the remuneration of the representative, if the mandate has not been performed for reasons of force majeure, it is thought that no remuneration will be due. If the mandate has been partly fulfilled before its cancellation, the French courts consider that the remuneration normally due may then be limited to the part of the contract which has already been performed

(Com. 21 Dec 1981, Bull. civ. IV, no. 450). In any event, the agent will be entitled to reimbursement of expenses already incurred. The possibility for the representative to claim damages depends on the circumstances of the cancellation and the type of mandate contract. Courts have long distinguished a special type of agency ('d'intérêt commun': 'of common interest'), which is freely terminable, but requires compensation of the costs the agent has made in specific efforts to develop the business or the custom in performance of the mandate. Other grounds for claiming damages are misuse by the principal of the right to freely terminate (Civ. 1ère 2 May 1984, Bull. civ. I, no. 143), termination of an agency contract for a fixed term (Civ. 1ère 28 Jan 2003, Bull. civ. I, no. 27. – Cass. 3e civ., 27 Apr 1988, Bull. civ. III no. 80) and termination of an agency contract containing a clause providing for compensation in the event of unilateral termination (Civ. 1ère 6 Mar 2001, Bull. civ. I, no. 56).

9. In GERMANY a gratuitous mandate relationship may be terminated at any time (CC § 671(1)). Termination of a remunerated relationship (Geschäftsbesorgungsvertrag) is governed by the law on contracts for services or contracts for works. The rules on contracts for services allow termination by the principal as well as the representative (CC § 621). The termination period depends on the time frame according to which the service provider is paid. Contracts for services under which payment is not made after particular time periods can be cancelled at any time. Additionally, either party has the right to terminate irrespective of any termination period where there is an important reason which makes it unacceptable for the party to continue the contract (CC § 626). Furthermore, termination is possible even without an important reason where the contract calls for services 'of a higher kind which are usually assigned on the basis of particular trust' (CC § 627(1)). This will often be the case where a contract for representation is concluded.

10. In GREECE in case of a gratuitous mandate relationship the principal is entitled to revoke the mandate at any time. An agreement to the contrary is void, except if the mandate also concerns the interest of the agent or of a third party (CC art. 724). . If the revocation takes place before completion of the mandate it results in cancellation of the contract. If it takes place after a part of the mandate has been performed, the revocation concerns only the future performance of the mandate (ex nunc). A contractual agreement of restrictions or requirements for the exercise of the right of revocation can be concluded only if the mandate also concerns the interest of the agent or of a third party (Kapodistrias, Art. 724 GREEK CC nr. 3-22). The revocation of the representative results in the cessation of the power to represent the principal. Due to the gratuitous character of the contract of mandate the question regarding the entitlement of the agent to a price does not arise. The principal is only obliged to reimburse the expenses that the agent has incurred prior to the revocation of the mandate. However that question arises in the case of the obligatory remunerated mandate between lawyer and client regulated in art. 170 of the Code of Attorneys (legislative decree nr. 3026/1954). If revocation of the mandate was unjustified, the principal should perform all contractual obligations to the lawyer, such as payment of remuneration. If revocation was justified, the principal should only pay remuneration or expenses incurred prior to the revocation of the mandate (Kapodistrias,Art. 724 GREEK CC nr. 31; Supreme Court decision no. 1/1987, EEN 1987, 783).

11. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 483(1), '[t]he principal shall be entitled to abrogate the contract with immediate effect at any time; the principal, however, shall be obliged to uphold the obligations already assumed by the agent'. CC art. 478(3) establishes that '[i]f the contract is terminated before the agency has been fulfilled, the agent shall be entitled to demand an appropriate fraction of the fee for his activities'. It is not relevant in this respect whether the principal is a consumer. In the case of commission agency, according to CC art. 512, '[p]rior to the conclusion of a sales contract, the principal shall be entitled to terminate the contract by notice with immediate effect, and the commission agent by fifteen-days' notice. Any limitation or exclusion of the right of rescission shall be null and void'. Also in this case CC art. 511(1) applies, according to which '[t]he commission agent shall be entitled to receive a commission only if the sales contract has been performed'.

12. In IRELAND, where an agent is appointed for an indeterminate period the agency can be terminated in accordance with any provision in the agreement for termination by notice. In the absence of any express term, it will normally be implied that the agency can be terminated, by either party, on reasonable notice.

13. According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1723(1) 'the principal can revoke the mandate, but if it was agreed that the mandate should be irrevocable, he is liable for damages, unless revocation is made for a just cause'. The general principle concerning termination by the principal is that of the free revocability of the authority granted to the representative, while the irrevocable mandate is considered an exception to this general rule. If the representative is entitled to a price, CC art. 1725 provides that 'the revocation of a non-gratuitous mandate given for a specified period of time or for a specified transaction renders the principal liable for damages if the revocation was made before the expiration of the time limit or before the completion of the transaction, unless there is just cause for the revocation'. Accordingly, the principal's freedom to revoke an onerous mandate is subject to the following alternative conditions: reasonable notice or just cause. In the absence thereof the principal must pay damages to the representative.

14. In the NETHERLANDS the principal is in general allowed to terminate the relationship at any time without having to give reasonable notice (CC arts. 7:408(2) and 7:422). It is only in the exceptional case that parties have agreed a mandate contract that is to be performed in the interest of the agent or of third party that the relationship cannot be ended freely by the principal.

15. In POLAND the principal is always entitled to revoke the mandate due to "important reasons". The contracting parties may not derogate from this rule (CC art. 746(3)). The principal's right to terminate the contract on other grounds may be excluded.

16. In SCOTLAND the principal is entitled to end an agency of unlimited duration at any time (unless the agency is irrevocable as explained below). (Stair, Institutions I[10], 12, 8; Erskine, III,3,40; Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 536; Walker v Somerville (1837) 16 S 217). This is not so where the contract is a fixed term one, where termination by the principal before the expiry of the agreed term will constitute a breach of contract (Black, para. 551). The principal's right to terminate may also be excluded as a matter of construction of the agency contract (Galbraith and Moorhead v Arethusa Ship Co Ltd (1896) 23 R 1011). Although the authorities are ambiguous on this point, it seems that the principal must communicate the termination to the agent (Erskine, III,3,40). The principal is, nevertheless, bound to relieve the agent of any losses the agent suffers where termination prevents the agent from completing a transaction, and indeed, termination may only be possible once the agent has been so relieved (Erskine, III,3,40). Termination is subject to the agent's other accrued rights such as payment of remuneration or commission, or damages for breach of contract (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 536; Galbraith and Moorehead v Arethusa Ship Co Ltd (1896) 23 R 1011).

17. In SLOVAKIA the principal is always entitled to terminate the contractual relationship without any conditions (CC § 33b). The question of termination of the contract is the same as that of termination of authority (see Notes under IV.D.–6:101

(Termination by notice in general). Where the mandate has been terminated by revocation, the principal is obliged to compensate the agent for all expenses incurred before revocation and for the damage suffered and if any remuneration is due for work that the agent performed, for such work or part thereof. In commercial relations, the client may also terminate the mandate partly or fully at any time. Unless the term of notice stipulates otherwise, the notice takes effect as of the day on which the agent has or could have learned about it. The agent is entitled to compensation of expenses and to a proportionate part of the remuneration for duly rendered services before the day when the notice takes effect (Ccom § 574).

18. In SPAIN the principal may terminate the relationship at any time (CC art. 1732). Some legal authors argue that in the case of a remunerated mandate contract termination implies that the principal has to pay damages to the agent, on the basis of the doctrine of abuse of right or the principle of good faith in CC art. 1258 (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII^2, 512). However, according to Lete del Río, the principal will have to indemnify the agent if the principal terminates in order to damage the interests of the agent or if the termination is based on unlawful reasons (Lete del Río, Derecho de obligaciones III^4, 413). It is doubtful whether cases of implicit revocation in which the principal concludes the contract personally or by means of another agent are to be regarded as lawful reasons or reason within the limits of the good faith principle. For the case law, see Díaz-Regañón, La resolución unilateral del contrato de servicios, 2000, pp. 75 ff).

19. In SWEDEN when the contract has been concluded for an indefinite period of time, the principal may terminate the contractual relationship at any time without cause and usually with immediate effect. The agent can only claim reasonable compensation for work already performed under the contract (Bengtsson, Särskilda avtalstyper I^2 153; Hesser, 30).

II. No termination if mandate is irrevocable

20. For BELGIUM see Notes under IV.D.–1:105 (Irrevocable mandate).

21. In BULGARIA even when the mandate contract is said to be irrevocable the principal can unilaterally end it at any time (see Notes under IV.D.–1:105 (Irrevocable mandate).

22. In ENGLAND, as mentioned earlier, the concept of 'irrevocable agency' is somewhat complicated and very specific. The agent's authority will be irrevocable in two instances: (1) when it is coupled with an interest belonging to the agent, i.e. that 'the authority is given for the purpose of being a security' (Smart v Sandars [1848] 5 CB 895, 918 per Wilde CJ) so that security and authority are closely connected with one another, or (2) when a power of attorney is given to secure an interest, or some obligation, to the donee; the consent of the donee is then required for the authority to be revoked (Power of attorney Act 1971, s 4).

23. For FRANCE see Notes under IV.D.–1:105 (Irrevocable mandate).

24. In IRELAND an agency may be irrevocable where e.g. (i) the agent is given a 'power with an interest', that is, where an agent is given power and a personal interest, as where the principal owes the agent money, and gives authority to sell property and thereby raise funds to pay the debt; or (ii) where a power of attorney is expressed to be 'enduring' or irrevocable under the Powers of Attorney Act, 1996.

25. In the NETHERLANDS if the mandate deals with performing a legal act in the interest of the agent or a third party, the contracting parties can agree that the principal is not allowed to terminate the relationship (CC art. 7:422(2)). In this case, the mandate is irrevocable. See Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 49; Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3096-3097.

26. POLISH law does not recognise irrevocable mandate.

27. In SCOTLAND where the agency is, in effect, an irrevocable mandate, or procuratory in rem suam, the principal is not entitled to terminate without the consent of the agent (Black, para. 551).

28. In SLOVAKIA irrevocable mandate is not allowed.

III. Mandatory nature of rule

29. For BELGIUM, See Notes under IV.D.–1:105 (Irrevocable mandate).

30. For BULGARIA see Notes under IV.D.–1:105 (Irrevocable mandate).

31. ESTONIAN law distinguishes between the internal relationship (arising from the mandate contract) and external relationship (the authority). For the external relationship the agent can be issued an irrevocable authority. The law however provides that as a mandatory rule such authority can be revoked upon important reason. For the internal relationship the parties can agree that the termination of the mandate agreement is excluded (the termination provisions are default rules; LOA § 5).

32. For FRANCE see Notes under IV.D.–1:105 (Irrevocable mandate).

33. The parties cannot validly exclude the principal's right to terminate the mandate relationship under the GERMAN CC § 671(1), unless the conclusion of the (gratuitous) mandate contract also served the interests of the agent and those interests are as important (gleichwertig) as those of the principal (BGH, WM 1971, 956; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 671 no. 2).

34. In the NETHERLANDS the provision that the principal is at all times allowed to terminate the relationship (CC art. 408(1)) is a mandatory rule for most mandates according to CC art. 7:422(2). However, in the cases where irrevocable mandates are recognised by the law, the contracting parties can agree that the principal is not allowed to terminate (CC art. 7:422(2)). See Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 49; See Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3096-3097.

35. POLISH law does not recognise irrevocable mandate.

36. In SLOVAKIA irrevocable mandate is not allowed.

IV.D.–6:103: Termination by principal for extraordinary and serious reason

(1) The principal may terminate the mandate relationship by giving notice for extraordinary and serious reason.

(2) No period of notice is required.

(3) For the purposes of this Article, the death or incapacity of the person who, at the time of conclusion of the mandate contract, the parties had intended to perform the agent's obligations under the mandate contract, constitutes an extraordinary and serious reason.

(4) This Article applies with appropriate adaptations if the successors of the principal terminate the mandate relationship in accordance with IV.D.–7:102 (Death of the principal).

(5) The parties may not, to the detriment of the principal or the principal's successors, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The present Article introduces a right for the principal to immediately terminate a mandate relationship without having to observe a notice period and without having to pay damages. This right can be exercised when there is an extraordinary and serious reason which justifies termination. Termination is by notice by the principal to the agent of the decision to terminate the mandate relationship. Extraordinary and serious reasons to terminate a mandate relationship may arise in very different circumstances. Paragraphs (3) and (4) mention two situations which are classified as extraordinary reasons to terminate. This rule has a mandatory character.

B. No exhaustive list of extraordinary and serious reasons

This provision refers in paragraph (3) and (4) to two situations which are to be regarded as extraordinary reasons which justify termination: the death or incapacity of the person who, at the time of conclusion of the mandate contract, the parties had intended to perform the agent's obligations under the mandate contract (paragraph (3)) and, for the successors of the principal, the death of the principal (paragraph (4)). This list does not purport to provide an exhaustive enumeration of the reasons that justify immediate termination. Whether a reason qualifies as extraordinary and justifies immediate termination is to be determined on a case-by-case basis.

Termination by the principal for an extraordinary and serious reason may occur when the principal no longer believes that the agent is acting in the principal's best interest and has lost trust in the agent. This may, for instance, occur when the agent has breached an implied or explicit obligation of confidentiality. There may also be an extraordinary and serious reason to terminate for the principal if the result to be achieved by the agent has become pointless for the principal.

The following week a fraud case involving Julka is reported on the front page of all national newspapers. Whether or not the accusations are true, Julka's business reputation is seriously damaged and Marco does not have sufficient trust in Julka being able, at this time, to properly negotiate with the current owners of the bank. Even though there is no case of non-performance by the agent, under these circumstances the principal cannot be expected to continue allowing the agent to take care of the transaction.

However, there is no provision stating that whenever the principal justifiably loses trust and confidence in the agent, there is a serious and extraordinary reason for termination of the mandate relationship. Such an explicit rule could tempt principals to argue that there would be a loss of confidence and trust just to escape having to respect a notice period or, after the fact, to prevent having to pay damages for wrongfully terminating the mandate relationship with immediate effect. It is thought better to leave the matter for the court to decide on the basis of the general provision in paragraph (1).

C. No notice period

If there is indeed an extraordinary and serious reason which justifies termination of the contract, termination should take immediate effect. In this specific situation the party giving notice is not required to observe any other condition than notifying the other party about the decision to terminate. In particular, no notice period needs to be observed, as follows from paragraph (2). It follows from the general rules on notice in I.–1:109 (Notice), that there is no form requirement regarding the notification.

D. Relation to termination for non-performance

In many cases where the principal has an extraordinary and serious reason to terminate the contractual relationship, there will also be a fundamental non-performance of obligations by the agent allowing the principal to terminate. Termination of the mandate relationship under the present Article does not as such entitle the principal to damages, whereas this will normally be the case when the principal terminates the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance.

E. Relation to rule on change of circumstances

In some circumstances, III.–1:110 (Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances) may be applicable. If such is the case parties would be expected to enter into negotiations to adapt the terms of the contract or to terminate the contractual relationship. If negotiations fail it is for the judge to decide between adaptation and termination. Under the present Article (and the corresponding provision in IV.D.–6:105 (Termination by agent for extraordinary and serious reason)) the party who does not want to continue performance can terminate with immediate effect. The party who has an extraordinary and serious reason to terminate is discharged of the burden of trying to negotiate with the other party and of going to court in order to bring the relationship to an end.

F. Mandatory character of the rule

The right to terminate the mandate relationship for extraordinary and serious reason is mandatory, as is expressed in paragraph (4). This cannot reasonably be otherwise if the right to terminate for extraordinary and serious reason is to mean anything in practice, as the parties by way of standard contract terms could effectively exclude its application. This would in fact mean the exclusion of the good faith principle, which underlies the present Article.

NOTES

I. Termination by principal for extraordinary and serious reason

1. According to the BELGIAN CC art. 2004, a principal can always revoke the authority to represent ad nutum, i.e. without a motive.
2. The principal is entitled to end the mandate contract at any time and without any reason (BULGARIAN LOA art. 288(1)).
3. In ENGLAND following the principle of free revocation, the principal need not have an extraordinary and serious reason to terminate the relationship by notice. If the principal has such reasons, i.e. the agent taking a bribe or the agent being guilty of a serious breach, this would allow the principal to terminate the relationship summarily and therefore with no need to comply with a notice.
4. In ESTONIA each of the parties to a mandate contract is entitled to terminate the relationship for important reason. No notice period is required (LOA § 631).
5. In FINLAND in general, a contracting party is entitled to terminate the contractual relationship with immediate impact due to an essential breach of contract on the other party's side. Furthermore, Commercial Agents and Salesmen Act art. 25 contains a provision on ending a mandate contract for "important reasons", but all such reasons are, according to the list provided in the article, related to disloyal or other such behaviour of the other party.
6. The FRENCH Civil Code gives the principal the possibility of terminating the agency ad nutum, i.e. at any time, without specific reason and without any right to compensation (CC art. 2004).
7. Under GERMAN law, every contract for a continuing obligation can be revoked when there is an 'important ground' for the revocation – a fundamental principle of German law which was developed by the courts and is now expressly laid down in CC § 314(1). CC § 626 as part of the law on contracts for service, which may apply to remunerated mandate contracts by virtue of CC § 675(1), provides a special, but quite similar rule.
8. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 483(3), 'If the agency is cancelled without substantial grounds, the damages that are caused shall be indemnified, unless the agency is gratuitous and the period of notice is sufficient for allowing the principal to handle the matter. According to the decision of the Supreme Court Nr. 3/2006 on the Uniform Application of Law, the CC 483(3) applies also to the principal and '[i]f a remunerated agency is cancelled without substantial grounds with immediate effect, the damages of the agent that are caused shall be indemnified by the principal'. See CA Jász-Nagykun-Szolnok Megyei Bíróság 4. Gf. 16-00-000016/12, in BDT2002. 577.
9. In IRELAND where the agency is contractual, breach of a condition of the contract, or of an innominate term where the consequences of the breach are serious, by the agent will enable the principal to terminate the relationship and pursue a remedy in damages. Moreover, where an agent is in breach of fiduciary duties, a variety of remedies is available including termination of the agency, damages in contract or in tort, an account of profits, etc.
10. In the NETHERLANDS the principal is in general allowed to terminate the agency at any time without having to give reasonable notice according to CC arts. 7:408(2) and 7:422. The usual effect of the presence of an extraordinary and serious reason is therefore only to prevent the claim for wages the agent is entitled to according to CC art. 7:411.

11. Under POLISH law the principal may always terminate the agency if "important reasons" occur (CC art. 746).

12. In SCOTTISH law, the principal is entitled to terminate an agency of unlimited duration at any time, and is not required to show an extraordinary and serious reason (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 183; Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 536). The principal is, of course, entitled to terminate the agency in a case of a material breach on the part of the agent. Beyond cases of breach of contract, certain events may act to frustrate, or terminate, the agency relationship, including the termination of the principal's business, and the death, incapacity or bankruptcy of the principal or agent. In cases of death, incapacity or bankruptcy, the agent may remain entitled to act, as is explored in more detail below.

13. In SLOVAKIA the principal is not obliged to respect any notice period. He can always terminate the contract immediately without any reason.

14. In SPAIN the principal may terminate the mandate relationship at any time without the need to give reasons(CC art. 1733). However, according to the decisions of the TS of 25 November 1993 and 3 March 1988, if the principal terminates a relationship concluded for a definite period before the period has expired, damages are to be paid to the agent, unless the principal has a good reason (justa causa) to terminate, based on the (lack of) performance of the agent (Sierra Gil de la Cuesta (-Hernández Gil), Código Civil VII^2, 515).

15. In SWEDEN when the contract has been concluded for an indefinite period of time, the principal may terminate the resulting relationship at any time without cause and unless agreed otherwise may usually terminate with immediate effect. The agent can only claim reasonable compensation for work already performed under the contract (Bengtsson, Särskilda avtalstyper I^2, 153; Hesser, 30). If the contract was for a definite period of time and the principal terminates the relationship without a valid reason, this constitutes non-performance. The agent has no right to continue performance but is entitled to claim damages (Hellner, 215).

II. No notice period required

16. According to BELGIAN CC art. 2004, a principal can always revoke the authority to represent ad nutum, i.e. without a notice period, unless the parties have agreed upon a notice period in the contract.

17. In BULGARIA the principal is free to end the mandate relationship without observing any notice period. A requirement for such a period only exists for the principal of a commercial agency contract for an indefinite term (Ccom art. 47(1)).

18. In ENGLAND if the agent is guilty of a serious breach, the principal will be entitled to terminate the agency immediately.

19. No notice period is required in ESTONIA (LOA § 631).

20. In FRANCE a notice period is never required for terminating the mandate relationship (except when the parties have agreed to insert a notice period clause in the contract).

21. In GERMANY both CC § 626(1) and CC § 314(1) expressly allow for a revocation without observance of a period of notice.

22. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 483(1)-(2), 'The principal shall be entitled to abrogate the contract with immediate effect at any time; the principal, however, shall be obliged to uphold the obligations already assumed by the agent. The agent shall also be entitled to abrogate the contract at any time; however, the period of notice must be sufficient for allowing the principal to handle the matter. In the event of the principal's grave breach of contract, abrogation can have immediate effect.' In case of commission agency, according to CC art. 512, '[p]rior to the conclusion of a sales contract, the principal shall be entitled to terminate the contract by notice with immediate effect, and the commission agent by fifteen days' notice.

23. In IRELAND where the agent has committed a serious breach of contract or breaches fiduciary duties, no notice period is required.

24. In the NETHERLANDS a notice period is not required.

25. POLISH law requires no notice period when terminating the mandate relationship, unless the parties have agreed otherwise.

26. In SCOTLAND where the principal terminates the agency, whether this is in response to a breach by the agent or not, no period of notice is required (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 536).

27. In SLOVAKIA the principal can always terminate the relationship immediately without any reason.

28. In SWEDEN if the principal terminates on the basis of a valid reason, no notice period is required.

III. Specific cases of extraordinary and serious reason

29. In BULGARIA if the parties have agreed on a particular person to perform the agent's obligation and this person dies or becomes incapable, the principal can end the mandate relationship.

30. In ENGLAND there would be automatic termination on the occurrence of any event which brought about frustration of the contract (if the contractual obligations become illegal or impossible to perform).

31. In FRANCE this question does not arise.

32. In GERMANY death or incapacity of a 'specific person' without whom the obligations under the mandate relationship cannot be performed would terminate these obligations due to impossibility (CC § 275(1)) and would likely be viewed as an important reason for termination of the contract as a whole.

33. In IRELAND a contractual agency may be automatically terminated by any event which frustrates the contract. Thus, it will be terminated if performance becomes impossible, for instance, because of the death of either party. Where one of the parties is a company the agency is similarly terminated by the winding up of the company. An agent's bankruptcy will terminate the agency if it makes the agent unfit to continue to act.

34. In the NETHERLANDS serious reasons are changes in the circumstances that are in all fairness likely to cause the immediate termination of the contract. An example of a serious reason is the situation that the principal has lost faith in the agent (Memorie van Toelichting, Parlementaire Geschiedenis, Ow 7, p. 325).

35. In POLAND the mandate contract does not end in case of death or loss of legal capacity by the principal. It does end in case of death or loss of legal capacity by the agent (CC art. 748 POLISH).

36. In SCOTLAND there appears to be no specific consideration in the authorities of the situation where the specific person who was to perform the obligations under the agency contract dies or becomes incapable (distinguishing this situation from that where the agent as contracting party dies or becomes incapable).

37. In SLOVAKIA there is no comparable regulation.

38. In SWEDEN a valid reason is said to exist if the agent is liable for fundamental non-performance, if it would be unreasonable to demand that the task continues or if another important reason to cancel the agreement exists (KommL § 51 and HaL § 26). This may include events of force majeure character and also circumstances of a personal nature (e.g. incapacitation of a party).

IV. Termination of irrevocable mandate in case of fundamental non-performance or extraordinary and serious reasons

39. In AUSTRIA even an irrevocable mandate may be terminated in the case of important reasons (loyalty, misrepresentation). The irrevocability is further restricted by case law: revocation is possible when the representative neglects the contractual duties, fails in complying with the duty to represent the interests of the principal or abuses the authority (Strasser, § 1020 ABGB Rz 4). An agreement to the contrary is void.

40. In BELGIUM a clause precluding revocation does not mean that there can be no other grounds to end the contractual relationship. However, much will depend on the interpretation of the relevant clause. A court could interpret a clause excluding revocation as having a broader scope and as also excluding other grounds for ending the relationship (Wéry, Le mandat, 278).

41. In BULGARIAN legal doctrine, the irrevocability of the mandate contract is considered relative (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 171). Thus, the principal can end the irrevocable contract at any time with or without extraordinary and substantial reasons or terminate it because of a fundamental non-performance but with different legal consequences. Firstly, when the principal revokes, without serious reason, the irrevocable mandate, apart from payment of stipulated remuneration and reimbursement of expenses, the principal can be held liable for damages incurred by the agent (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 171). On the other hand, in case of a revocation of an irrevocable contract due to extraordinary and serious reasons, under some special rules the principal (client) is obliged to pay the remuneration not in full amount, but only proportionally to the acts performed by the agent (advocate) – BAA, art. 26(2). Furthermore, in case of termination as a result of a fundamental non-performance, the principal is not liable for payment of compensation to the agent, but in accordance with general contract law rules is entitled to claim damages from the latter – LOA art. 88 (1).

42. In DENMARK a clause excluding the possibility of termination of the contract for fundamental non-performance of the representative may be declared invalid in the situation traditionally called ‘breach of basic assumption’: ‘promise may wholly or party be set aside with reference to circumstances after its making’ (Contract Act section 36).

43. In ENGLAND if it is possible to agree to the irrevocability of the contract for representation and the parties have not provided for the irrevocability to end, such irrevocability will only end once the interest of the agent has been satisfied. Note that the rules defined under the Power of Attorney Act 1971 are narrower than the common law rules since it seems possible to revoke the authority under specific circumstances such as death, insanity and bankruptcy as defined by s 5(5).

44. In ESTONIA the irrevocability of a mandate relationship is restricted in the sense that the relationship may still be terminated on material grounds (LOA § 631). If the contract is entered into for the life of one party or for a period longer than five years, the principal has the right to terminate the relationship once five years have passed from the date of conclusion of the contract by giving at least six months’ advance notice (LOA § 630(3)). The common understanding in practice is that even although the ‘material grounds’ justifying the termination may be defined by the contract, the parties cannot exclude termination in cases of fundamental breach.

45. In FRANCE the parties cannot validly agree that the agency will be irrevocable. In any event, as a matter of general principle, French law does not accept that parties may be subject to perpetual obligations, and CC art. 2003 provides that the agency will terminate by the death, insolvency or incapacity of either party.

46. Under GERMAN law, although CC § 314(1) does not expressly say so, the right to revoke based on an important ground cannot be excluded (Heinrichs, § 314 para. 3).

47. In GREECE if an irrevocable mandate has been granted it is accepted that such an authority can be nevertheless revoked if serious grounds (breach of contractual obligations, insolvency of the representative) exist (Supreme Court decision no. 1157/1991, EllDni 1992, 841; CA Thessaloniki decision no. 1381/1979, EllDni 1981, 353) or revocation is required on the basis of good faith (Supreme Court decision no. 1108/1984, EEN 1985, 497). Furthermore, the irrevocability ends if the ground that justifies such irrevocability does not exist any more (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Doris, Art. 218-221 GCC nr. 15).

48. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 483(4), '[a]ny limitation or exclusion of the right of cancellation shall be null and void; however, the parties shall be entitled to agree on the limitation of the right of cancellation with regard to continuous agencies'. Therefore, even in case of a continuous relationship of representation, the revocability of the contract can only be restricted but not excluded. Concerning the powers of representation, CC art. 223(2) establishes that '[a] mandate shall be valid until withdrawn, unless otherwise provided; its withdrawal that concerns a bona fide third person shall be operative only if he has been informed thereof. The right of withdrawal cannot be validly waived'. In case of commission agency, CC art. 512(2) provides that '[a]ny limitation or exclusion of the right of rescission shall be null and void'.

49. In IRELAND, under section 20 of the Power of Attorney Act 1996, where a power of attorney is expressed to be irrevocable and is given to secure (a) a proprietary interest of the donee of the power, or (b) the performance of an obligation owed to the donee, then, so long as the donee has that interest or the obligation remains undischarged, the power shall not be revoked: (i) by the donor without the consent of the donee, or (ii) by the death, incapacity or bankruptcy of the donor or, if the donor is a body corporate, by its winding up or dissolution.

50. In ITALY irrevocability is not restricted in time. The reason thereof lies in the interests of both the representative and the principal's heirs or successors in obtaining performance of the obligations under the contract, i.e. the interest of the representative to a price, if agreed, and the interest of the heirs or successors to the exact execution of the mandate.

51. In the NETHERLANDS the contracting parties may validly agree on an irrevocable mandate in certain cases according to CC art. 7:422(2) jo. CC art. 3:74(1)-(2). The principal cannot then terminate the relationship if the acts in question are in the interest of the agent or a third party (see CFI Roermond 11 Feb 1999, NJ 1999, 607). However, the judge is allowed to alter such provision because of serious reasons (CC art. 3:74).

52. There is no irrevocable mandate under POLISH law; the principal may always terminate the relationship if "important reasons" occur (e.g. non-performance by the agent or other actions that may lead the principal to lose confidence in the agent).

53. In SCOTLAND whether an irrevocable mandate may be revoked because of fundamental non-performance or for serious or extraordinary reasons is an issue which is virtually unexplored. It appears, however, that the Scottish irrevocable mandate, or procuratory in rem suam, is absolutely irrevocable, even in cases where serious and extraordinary reasons apply (Black, para. 551).

54. In SLOVAKIA irrevocable mandate is not allowed.

IV.D.–6:104: Termination by agent when relationship is to last for indefinite period or when it is gratuitous

(1) The agent may terminate the mandate relationship at any time by giving notice of reasonable length if the mandate contract has been concluded for an indefinite period.

(2) The agent may terminate the mandate relationship by giving notice of reasonable length if the agent is to represent the principal otherwise than in exchange for a price.

(3) The parties may not, to the detriment of the agent, exclude the application of paragraph (1) of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

In the normal case the mandate relationship will terminate when the agent has concluded the mandated task (typically the conclusion of the prospective contract) on behalf of the principal. There may be situations, however, in which the agent no longer wants to continue to carry out the contractual obligations even though the prospective contract or other task has not been concluded. The present Article enables the agent to terminate the mandate relationship, if the contract is for an indefinite period of time or provides for gratuitous representation, by giving notice of reasonable length.

B. Termination by notice when mandate contract concluded for indefinite period

Following the regime in III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (2), the present Article allows the agent, as is the case with the principal, to terminate the agency, if it is for an indefinite period, by giving notice of reasonable length. Agents are not to be compelled to be bound to their principals eternally, but if they want to end a relationship entered into for an indefinite period they do have to give the principal notice of reasonable length. Notification is designed to give the principal enough time to adapt to the new situation, e.g. to find another agent.

C. Termination by notice when agent not entitled to remuneration

Traditionally, the mandate contract was considered to be of a gratuitous nature. This is no longer the case and the normal contract regulated by these rules will not be gratuitous. Nevertheless, some mandate contracts are still gratuitous.

When the mandate contract is not remunerated, some specific provisions apply. IV.D.– 2:103 (Expenses incurred by agent) paragraph (2) explicitly entitles the agent to the reimbursement of reasonable expenses. Moreover, the non-remunerated nature of the mandate contract influences the care that may be expected of the agent, cf. IV.D.–3:103 ((Obligation of skill and care) paragraph (2)(c). However, as a general rule the position of an agent acting gratuitously does not differ much from the position of a remunerated agent. This implies that the obligations resulting from the mandate contract may become too burdensome for the agent. The agent is granted the right to be freed from these obligations by giving notice of the termination of the mandate relationship, provided the period of notice is of reasonable length. This applies even if the gratuitous mandate was for a definite period.

D. Character of the rule

For the reasons explained above in relation to the principal's corresponding right it is generally regarded as contrary to public policy to bind parties to contracts for eternity. Moreover, again for the reasons explained above, it is necessary to make the provision on contracts for indefinite duration mandatory.

Paragraph (2) regarding the right to terminate the relationship arising from a non-remunerated contract contains a default rule from which the parties may derogate.

NOTES

I. Termination by agent of mandate relationship entered into for indefinite period

1. The agent can cancel the mandate contract concluded for an indefinite period of time at any time under the AUSTRIAN CC § 1021, but has to carry on urgent business until the principal can make other arrangements (CC § 1025) and has to indemnify the principal for losses suffered due to the termination of the relationship before the agreed date (except for unforeseen legal and material obstacles).
2. According to the BELGIAN CC art. 2007, the agent has the right to cancel the contract for representation. The cancellation can be given ad nutum, i.e. without a motive, but the agent must notify the cancellation to the principal. If the cancellation prejudices the principal, the agent must indemnify the principal. Exceptionally, the agent will be exempt from indemnification, if the agent cannot fulfil the mission to represent without harming his or her own position in a significant way (Dekkers, 735-736; Delahaye, 53-55; Foriers and Glansdorff, Contrats spéciaux, 642; Paulus und Boes, Lastgeving, 156-159; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 285; Wéry, Le mandat, 291-296).
3. In BULGARIA provided that there is a substantial reason, the agent can end the relationship under a mandate contract concluded for an indefinite period of time with unilateral notice duly sent to the principal (LOA art. 289). If the does not observe these prerequisites, the agent is liable in damages for any loss incurred by the principal. Unless agreed otherwise, the commission agent is entitled to terminate the agency only in case of a breach of contractual obligations by the principal (Ccom art. 359(1)). A contractual relationship entered into for an indefinite term between the commercial agent and the principal may be terminated by either party with a notice period of one month during the first year, of two months during the second year and of three months thereafter (Ccom art. 47(1)).
4. In DENMARK the agent may at any time cancel the contract for representation where the contract is concluded for an indefinite period of time. In the case of cancellation, the agent is not entitled to claim compensation other than for the expenses incurred during the period of the representation.
5. In ENGLAND in the case of an indefinite duration contract, similarly to the principal being entitled to unilaterally terminate the relationship at any time, the agent can also renounce the authority at any time. Such a renunciation will be valid even if it is a breach of contract. There is however no case law on the matter and doctrine stipulates that the agent renouncing authority will not terminate the agency until the principal accepts such a renunciation (Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[18], art. 119, no. 10-004, art. 122).

6. In ESTONIA the agent may terminate a mandate relationship entered into for an indefinite period only under the condition that the principal can receive the service or enter into the transaction in another manner; otherwise, the agent must compensate the principal for any damage caused by the termination (LOA § 630(2)).

7. In FINLAND the agent is, in general, entitled to terminate the mandate relationship on giving a reasonable period of notice. A liability to pay damages may arise in specific circumstances, e.g. if it is evident that the termination is substantially harmful for the principal, or when a reasonable period of notice is not given. A lawyer is not entitled to terminate the relationship with the client, except in specific circumstances (CConduct § 15-16). A professional agent has to pay special attention to the interests of the principal, especially when the latter is a consumer.

8. In FRANCE the agent may terminate the mandate relationship at any time by simply notifying the decision to the principal (CC art. 2007). The agent may, however, have to pay compensation to the principal if such termination causes loss to the principal, unless the agent can demonstrate that the continuation of the agency would have involved substantial losses for the agent. The agency agreement may provide for a notice period or compensation in the form of liquidated damages to be paid to the principal in the event of termination.

9. A gratuitous mandate relationship may be terminated at any time under the GERMAN CC § 671(1). Termination of a remunerated relationship (Geschäftsbesorgungs-vertrag) is governed by the law on contracts for services or contracts for works. The rules on contracts for services allow termination by the principal as well as the agent (CC § 621). Either party has the right to terminate irrespective of any termination period where there is an important reason which makes it unacceptable for the party to continue (CC § 626). Furthermore, termination is possible even without an important reason where the contract calls for services 'of a higher kind which are usually assigned on the basis of particular trust' (§ 627(1)). This will often be the case where a contract for representation is concluded.

10. In GREECE in the case of representation based on a contract of mandate, an agent is entitled to terminate the mandate relationship at any time provided this right has not been renounced. The termination is without effect if there are serious grounds militating against it. If the termination was notified at an inappropriate time (the time is considered to be inappropriate when it is impossible for the principal to take care of the affairs at the time of the termination; see CFI Thessaloniki decision no. 280/1984, EllDni 1985, 758) without serious ground, the agent is liable to compensate the principal for the loss caused (CC art. 725). If the termination was notified at an inappropriate time but with a serious ground, such as the illness of the agent, the latter is not obliged to pay compensation (Kapodistrias, Art. 725 GCC nr. 5-15).

11. The HUNGARIAN CC art. 483(2)-(3) establishes that '[t]he agent shall also be entitled to abrogate the contract at any time; however, the period of notice must be sufficient for allowing the principal to handle the matter. In the event of the principal's grave breach of contract, abrogation can have immediate effect. If the agency is cancelled without substantial grounds, the damages that are caused shall be indemnified, unless the agency is gratuitous and the period of notice is sufficient for allowing the principal to handle the matter'. In this respect it is not relevant whether the agent is a professional party or whether the principal is a consumer. In the case of commission agency, according to CC art. 512, '[p]rior to the conclusion of a sales contract, the principal shall be entitled to terminate the contract by notice with immediate effect, and the commission agent by fifteen days' notice. Any limitation or exclusion of the right of rescission shall be null and void'. In this respect it is not relevant whether the agent is a professional party or whether the principal is a consumer.

12. In IRELAND since agency is a consensual relationship it can be terminated if either party withdraws consent. Where an agent withdraws consent, the agent is said to 'renounce' the agency. No formality is required for a renunciation. Where an agent is appointed for an indefinite period of time the agency can be terminated in accordance with any provision in the agreement for termination by notice. In the absence of any express term, it will normally be implied that the agency can be terminated, by either party, on reasonable notice. What constitutes reasonable notice will depend on the facts of the particular case.

13. In ITALY the agent may cancel a contract for representation for an indefinite period of time in case of just cause (CC art. 1727). In the absence of just cause the agent may cancel the contract by giving a reasonable notice to the principal. If a reasonable period of notice is not given the agent is liable for damages vis-à-vis the principal. According to CC art. 1727(2), '[i]n all cases except those of grave difficulty for the agent, the renunciation must be made in such manner and at such times as will enable the principal to make other arrangements'. In sum, the agent may terminate the relationship either for just cause or at will, but is required to give a reasonable notice and try to mitigate the negative consequences for the principal.

14. In the NETHERLANDS according to CC art. 408(2), the agent who has entered into a mandate relationship in the course of a profession, may terminate the relationship by giving notice of reasonable length, if this contract applies for an indefinite period (and does not end because of completion).

15. It is a general rule of POLISH contract law that any contractual relationship entered into for an indefinite period of time (including agency) may be terminated by any party (CC art. 365). This right may be limited but not excluded, since nobody may be forced to remain in a contractual relation forever.

16. In SCOTLAND whether the agent is entitled unilaterally to terminate the relationship depends on the terms of the mandate contract. There are no formal requirements. See Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para 182. In general contract law a contract of indefinite duration may be terminated by reasonable notice on either side (McBryde paras 9.12-9.21). In the gratuitous contract of mandate the agent may renounce the contract, but may be liable in damages for losses to the principal resulting from the timing of the renunciation (ibid, para 25; Erskine, III,3,40).

17. In SLOVAKIAN civil relations, the agent may terminate the mandate relationship without any reason. The agent is nevertheless bound to perform any immediately necessary juridical acts to prevent detriment to the rights of the principal. Acts thus performed have the same legal effects as if the representation had continued, unless such acts conflict with the arrangements made by the principal (CC § 33b). In commercial relations, the agent may also terminate the relationship, and the termination will take effect at the end of the month following the month the notice was delivered to the principal, unless a later date ensues from the notice (Ccom § 575(1)). The agent's obligation to perform activities on behalf of the principal expires on the day the notice becomes effective. If the principal may incur damage due to discontinuation of certain activities, the agent must inform the principal of the measures to be taken in order to prevent such damage. If the principal cannot take the measures even by means of other persons, and asks the agent to effect them, the agent is bound to do so.

18. In SPAIN gratuitous mandates or mandates indefinite as to time are freely revocable without liability.

19. In SWEDEN when the contract is for an indefinite period of time, the agent may terminate the relationship at any time without cause and unless agreed otherwise usually with immediate effect. The principal has no right to compensation.

II. Termination by agent of mandate relationship entered into for definite period

20. In AUSTRIA the agent can terminate a mandate relationship entered into for a definite period at any time (CC § 1021), but has to carry on urgent business until the principal can make other arrangements (CC § 1025) and has to indemnify the principal for losses suffered due to the termination of the relationship before the agreed date (except for unforeseen legal and material obstacles).

21. According to BELGIAN CC art. 2007, the agent has the right to terminate the agency relationship.

22. In BULGARIA a mandate relationship for a fixed period of time can be ended unilaterally by the agent under the same prerequisites as a relationship entered into for an indefinite period – as long as there is a serious reason for this and a notice has been duly given to the principal – BULGARIAN LOA art. 289 (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 178; Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 239). A commercial agency that has been entered into for a definite period may be terminated before its expiration if the party wishing to terminate it compensates the other party for the damage caused – Ccom art. 47 (2).

23. In DENMARK if the contract for representation is concluded for a definite period of time or if the agency would otherwise have ended by the conclusion of the prospective contract, the agent cannot rightfully terminate during the agreed period. The agent may, however, in a case of non-performance on the part of the principal immediately terminate the relationship when the non-performance occurs.

24. In ENGLAND it seems that when the contract is for a specified period of time, the agent can only renounce the authority if it is because of a breach by the principal: termination by either party of a fixed-term relationship before expiry of the term is a repudiatory breach: Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co v Ansell (1888) 39 Ch D 339, CA. If the contract is for a specific task, as mentioned earlier, since the contract is treated as unilateral in most instances, the agent is under no obligation to perform and is therefore under no obligation to provide the principal with notice.

25. Under ESTONIAN law the agent may terminate the mandate relationship that is entered into for a definite period only on material grounds (ESTONIAN LOA § 631), i.e. if it becomes evident that, bearing in mind all the circumstances and the interests of both parties, the party wishing to terminate cannot be expected to continue performance until expiry of the term for termination or the term of the agreement or until the services are performed.

26. In FINLAND it follows from the general principles of contract law that the agent is not entitled to terminate a mandate relationship that has been entered into by a contract concluded for a definite period of time. This does not apply when the principal has been guilty of a fundamental non-performance.

27. The rules under FRENCH law are the same whether the mandate was concluded for a fixed term or an indefinite term, whether or not the mandate has been substantially performed or not. The CC art. 2007 makes no distinction. The agent therefore has the right to cease performance of the mandate. The agent will, nonetheless, have to compensate the principal for any loss suffered and the agent's remuneration will be reduced pro rata temporis or pro rata the work performed. In some cases, the right to remuneration may not arise if the mandate has failed due to the agent's decision.

28. In GERMANY a mandate relationship under a contract concluded for a definite period of time may be terminated by the agent under the same conditions as one under a contract concluded for an indefinite period of time. However, the conclusion of a contract for a restricted period of time can arguably be construed as the agent's waiver of the right to termination under CC § 671(1). Whether such an interpretation is feasible depends on the circumstances of the particular case. While the majority of authors are reluctant to accept the conclusion of a time-restricted mandate as an implicit waiver (Grundmann, 457, no. 482; Wittmann, § 671 para. 16), others are open to this idea (notably Seiler, in Münchener Kommentar zum BGB, 4th ed., 2004, § 671 para. 6). There is no case law on this question.

29. In GREECE an agent can terminate a mandate relationship under a contract for a definite period on the same conditions as a mandate relationship under a contract for an indefinite period.

30. In HUNGARY the situation is the same.

31. In IRELAND where the contract is for a specified period of time, the agent may renounce the authority and terminate the relationship but this may constitute a breach of contract unless the principal has already committed a breach of contract which allows the agent to terminate.

32. In ITALY if the contract for representation is concluded for a definite period of time the agent may terminate the relationship only for just cause. In the absence of just cause the agent is liable to the principal for damages.

33. In the NETHERLANDS the agent may terminate a mandate relationship entered into for a definite period only in case of serious causes (CC arts. 7:408(2) and 7:402 (2)).

34. In POLAND the agent may terminate the agency relationship at any time. However, if the service was provided against a remuneration, the agent may terminate only in case of "important reasons".

35. In SCOTLAND the agent, like the principal, is entitled to terminate an agency of unlimited duration at any time (Erskine, III,3,40; Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 536). This rule does not apply in cases of fixed term agency contracts where, in the absence of provision in the contract allowing unilateral early termination, termination by one party prior to the agreed expiry will amount to a breach of contract.

36. In SLOVAKIA an agent can terminate a mandate relationship for a definite period under the same conditions as one entered into for an indefinite period of time.

37. In SPAIN, the agent may terminate the relationship at any time. However, the agent is liable to compensate the principal's loss, unless the agent may prove a serious reason for the termination (CC art. 1736).

38. In SWEDEN when the contract is for a definite period of time, the agent may terminate the relationship for a valid cause. The agent cannot be forced to finish the performance. However, the agent will be liable for non-performance if the termination is without cause (Hellner, 215).

III. Termination by agent in case of a gratuitous mandate contract

39. In BELGIUM no distinction is made between a remunerated or a non-remunerated contract for representation.

40. The general rule of the BULGARIAN LOA art. 289 concerning unilateral ending of the mandate relationship by the agent is applicable to both gratuitous and non-gratuitous contracts (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 178).

41. In ENGLAND there does not seem to be any rule dealing specifically with this particular question on gratuitous agencies. However, it seems that a gratuitous agent should be entitled to terminate the relationship at any time.

42. In FRANCE the rules are the same whether the mandate is gratuitous or not; the Civil Code makes no distinction.

43. In GERMANY for a gratuitous mandate contract, termination is possible at any time. CC § 671(2) provides for an additional condition (applicable to both gratuitous and remunerated contracts): the agent may only terminate in a manner that will allow the principal to make suitable arrangements for the subject matter the agent attended to, unless there is an 'important reason' (wichtiger Grund) for the immediate termination. It is not relevant whether the principal is a consumer.

IV.D.–6:105: Termination by agent for extraordinary and serious reason

(1) The agent may terminate the mandate relationship by giving notice for extraordinary and serious reason.

(2) No period of notice is required.

(3) For the purposes of this Article an extraordinary and serious reason includes:

(a) a change of the mandate contract under IV.D.–4:201 (Changes of the mandate contract);

(b) the death or incapacity of the principal; and

(c) the death or incapacity of the person who, at the time of conclusion of the mandate contract, the parties had intended to perform the agent's obligations under the mandate contract.

(4) The parties may not, to the detriment of the agent, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The present Article introduces a right for the agent to immediately terminate a mandate relationship, no matter whether the contract has been concluded for a definite or indefinite period, without having to observe a notice period and without having to pay damages. This applies when the agent can invoke an extraordinary and serious reason which justifies termination.

Extraordinary and serious reasons to terminate a mandate relationship may arise in very different circumstances. Paragraph (3) provides a non-exhaustive list: if the principal changes the contract, if the principal dies or becomes incapable and if the person who, at the time of conclusion of the mandate contract, the parties had intended to perform the agent's obligations under the mandate contract, dies or is becomes incapable.

B. No exhaustive list of extraordinary and serious reasons

In many cases the well-founded loss of trust and confidence in the principal will constitute an extraordinary and serious reason for the agent to terminate a mandate relationship. In these cases, the confidence in the other party was necessary for the proper performance of the obligations under the mandate contract. The present Article introduces accordingly a right for the agent to immediately terminate a mandate relationship without having to observe a notice period and without having to pay damages. However, it does not seem to be wise to include a general provision stating that whenever the agent justifiably loses trust and confidence in the principal, there is a serious and extraordinary reason for termination of the mandate relationship. Such an explicit rule could tempt agents to argue that there would be a loss of confidence and trust just to escape having to respect a notice period or, after the fact, to avoid having to pay damages for wrongfully terminating the mandate relationship with immediate effect. It is thought better to leave the matter for the court to decide on the basis of the general provision of paragraph (1).

Illustration

A principal mandates an agent to negotiate the purchase of a major bank. The following week a fraud case implicating the principal is reported on the front page of all national newspapers. Whether or not the accusations are true, the principal's business reputation is damaged. As the agent is dependent on an unimpeachable business reputation, the agent needs to be able to bring the relationship with this principal to an end as soon as possible. Even though there is no case of non-performance by the principal, under these circumstances the agent cannot be expected to continue performance under the mandate contract.

C. No notice period

If there is indeed an extraordinary and serious reason which justifies termination of the contractual relationship, termination should take immediate effect. In this specific situation the agent should not be required to observe any other condition than notifying the principal about the decision to terminate. In particular, no notice period needs to be observed, as indicated in paragraph (2). There is no form requirement regarding the notification.

D. Relation to rule on change of circumstances

In some circumstances, III.–1:110 (Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances) may be applicable. If such is the case the parties would be expected to enter into negotiations to adapt the contract or to terminate the relationship. If negotiations fail it is for the judge to decide what is to be done. This would, however, all take a long time, during which there is uncertainty as to the position of the parties. Where the agent can terminate the mandate relationship for an extraordinary and serious reason, this long process and the possible need of an application to the court is avoided.

E. Mandatory character of the rule

The right to terminate the mandate relationship for extraordinary and serious reason is mandatory, as is expressed in paragraph (4), for the reasons given in Comment F to IV.D.–6:103 (Termination by principal for extraordinary and serious reason).

NOTES

I. Termination by agent for extraordinary and serious reason

1. According to the BELGIAN CC art. 2007, the agent has the right to cancel the contract for representation ad nutum, i.e. without a motive, by notifying the cancellation to the principal. The Civil Code does not require an extraordinary and serious reason. If the cancellation however prejudices the principal, the agent must indemnify the principal. Exceptionally, the agent will be exempt from indemnification, if the agent cannot fulfil the mission to represent without harming the agent's own position in a significant way.
2. In BULGARIA whereas the principal is entitled to unilaterally end the mandate relationship without any reason, the agent can only terminate the relationship on the ground of "a serious reason" (LOA art. 289; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 29-30).
3. In ENGLAND in the light of the principle of free renunciation of authority mentioned earlier, the agent is free to renounce the authority and need not mention any reason for it. If the principal is guilty of a serious breach, the agent will be entitled to treat the breach as repudiatory and therefore terminate the relationship immediately. Apart from instances of breach of contract, there will be events which will frustrate the contract and therefore will terminate the agency such as death, bankruptcy, insanity etc of the principal.

4. In ESTONIA each of the parties is entitled to terminate the mandate relationship for an important reason. No notice period is required (LOA § 631).

5. The agent may terminate the mandate at any time by simply notifying this decision to the principal (CC art. 2007). The Civil Code does not require an extraordinary and serious reason in any case. The agent may, however, have to pay compensation to the principal if the termination causes loss to the principal, unless the agent can demonstrate that the continuation of the mandate would have involved 'substantial loss' for the agent. The agency agreement may provide for a notice period and/or compensation in the event of termination.

6. Under GERMAN law, every contract for a continuing obligation can be revoked when there is an 'important ground' for the revocation – a fundamental principle of German law which was developed by the courts and is now expressly laid down in CC § 314(1). CC § 626 as part of the law on contracts for service, which may apply to remunerated mandate contracts by virtue of CC § 675(1), provides a special, but quite similar rule.

7. The HUNGARIAN CC art. 483(2)-(3) establishes that '[t]he agent shall also be entitled to abrogate the contract at any time; however, the period of notice must be sufficient for allowing the principal to handle the matter. In the event of the principal's grave breach of contract, abrogation can have immediate effect. If the agency is cancelled without substantial grounds, the damages that are caused shall be indemnified, unless the agency is gratuitous and the period of notice is sufficient for allowing the principal to handle the matter'.

8. In IRELAND where the agency is contractual, breach of a condition of the contract by the principal, or of an innominate term where the consequences of the breach are serious, will enable the agent to terminate the relationship and pursue a remedy in damages.

9. In the NETHERLANDS the agent may terminate the agency without giving notice only in case of a serious cause for termination (CC arts. 7:408(2) and 7:402 (2)).

10. In POLAND the agent may terminate a non-gratuitous mandate relationship only if "important reasons" arise; otherwise the agent can be held liable for in damages.

11. In SCOTLAND, there is no special rule on termination for extraordinary and serious reason falling short of a material breach of contract (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 183; Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 535-6). Where the principal is in material breach of the agency contract, the agent is, of course, entitled to terminate for that reason. Beyond cases of breach of contract, certain events may act to frustrate and thus terminate the agency relationship, including the termination of the principal's business, and the death, incapacity or bankruptcy of the principal or agent. In cases of death, incapacity or bankruptcy, the agent may remain entitled to act, as is explored in more detail below.

12. SLOVAKIAN law does not recognise termination for important reasons.

13. According to the SPANISH CC arts. 1732 and 1736, the agent may terminate the mandate relationship at any time (renuncia), irrespective of whether it has been concluded for a definite or indefinite period. Notification is the only condition imposed. There is no other requirement. The only limit to the freedom to exit is the duty to pay damages for loss suffered by the principal when the termination is not supported by a "just cause" (serious reason). The only sure thing one may say about this expression is that the Code has weakened the exoneration requirements set up by the rebus sic stantibus rule.

14. In SWEDEN when the contract is for an indefinite period of time, the agent may cancel it at any time without cause and unless agreed otherwise usually with immediate effect. When the contract is for a definite period of time, the agent may cancel it for a valid reason. The agent cannot, however, be forced to finish the performance. The agent will be liable for non-performance on terminating without cause and the principal will be entitled to claim damages (Hellner, 215).

II. No notice period required

15. In BELGIUM the agent has the right to cancel the contract for representation ad nutum, i.e. without notice period.

16. In BULGARIA in order to escape liability for a breach of contract, the agent does not only have to have a serious reason to unilaterally end the relationship, but is also obliged to give a notice of reasonable length (LOA art. 289). Otherwise, the is obliged to compensate the principal for any damage caused.

17. In ENGLAND if the principal is guilty of a serious breach or other important reasons mentioned above, the agent can terminate the contract immediately.

18. In FRANCE no notice period is required.

19. Both the GERMAN CC § 626(1) and CC § 314(1) expressly allow for a revocation without observance of a period of notice.

20. In IRELAND where the principal has committed a serious breach of contract, no notice period is required.

21. In the NETHERLANDS if there is a serious cause for termination (CC arts. 7:408(2) and 7:402 (2)), the agent does not have to observe a notice period when terminating.

22. In POLAND the contract ends when the notice of termination reaches the principal.

23. In SCOTLAND where the agent terminates the agency relationship(e.g. in response to a breach by the principal) , no specific period of notice is required.

24. SLOVAKIAN law does not recognise termination for important reasons. A notice period is required in commercial relations, but parties may agree otherwise.

25. In SPANISH Law, CC art. 1736 does not require any notice period.

26. In SWEDEN if the agent terminates the relationship on the basis of a valid reason, no notice period is required (HaL § 26).

III. Specific cases of extraordinary and serious reason

27. In BULGARIA if the principal has given directions resulting in a unilateral change of the mandate contract and its performance has become too burdensome for the agent, this is considered a sufficiently serious reason for termination of the relationship by the agent with a unilateral notice of termination (LOA art. 289; Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 119; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 24).

28. Under GERMAN law, the principal is not entitled to change the content of the mandate contract unilaterally, but only as far as the agent agrees – an agreed change can therefore not constitute grounds for termination. The death of the principal generally ('in doubt') does not lead to the termination of the mandate (CC § 672). Death or incapacity of a 'specific person' without whom the agent's obligations under the mandate relationship cannot be performed would terminate these obligations due to impossibility (CC § 275(1)), but would not give the agent an important reason to terminate the relationship.

29. For the NETHERLANDS CC Art. 7:402 (2) mentions the case where the agent is upon reasonable grounds not willing to carry out the mandate according to the instructions given, as a case of an extraordinary and serious reason for termination by the agent.

30. There are no examples of "important reasons" in the POLISH Civil Code.

31. In SCOTLAND this question does not arise as termination by a party for extraordinary and serious reasons falling short of material breach is not recognised.

32. SLOVAKIAN law does not recognise termination for important reasons.

33. In SPANISH law, the death, the commencement of insolvency proceeding and the insanity or loss of mental capacity automatically put the mandate to an end, without any required manifestation of will.

34. In SWEDEN a valid reason is said to exist if the agent is liable for fundamental non-performance, if it would be unreasonable to demand that the task continues or if another important reason to cancel the agreement exists (KommL § 51 and HaL § 26). This may include events of force majeure character and also circumstances of a personal nature (e.g. incapacitation of a party).

IV. Mandatory rule

35. In BELGIUM the rule that the agent has the right to cancel the contract for representation ad nutum, is not mandatory (Tilleman, Lastgeving, 335; Wéry, Le mandat, 294). An exception is made by some authors for contracts for an indefinite period (Paulus und Boes, Lastgeving, 159).

36. In BULGARIAN legal doctrine, any contractual stipulation that obstructs the agent in exercising the right to unilaterally terminate the mandate relationship is deemed null and void (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 178). However, a stipulation to that effect may render the agent liable for damages if the agent terminates in breach of it .

37. For FRANCE the rule stated above in Note 5 is a mandatory rule.

38. Although the GERMAN CC § 314(1) does not expressly say so, the revocability based on an important ground cannot be excluded (Palandt [-Grüneberg], BGB[66], § 314 no. 3).

39. The parties may not exclude the agent's right to terminate the relationship because of "important reasons" (CC art. 747(3)).

40. In SLOVAKIA the rules on termination are not mandatory, except in the case of a commercial representation contract.

41. In SPAIN there is discussion about whether the parties can contract out of the agent's right to terminate and further about whether there would be any sense in the principal agreeing to this (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Gordillo Cañas), Código Civil II, 1591)

41. In SWEDEN the rules concerning a right to cancel on the basis of a valid reason are of a mandatory character (KommL § 51 and HaL § 26).

CHAPTER 7: OTHER GROUNDS FOR TERMINATION

IV.D.–7:101: Conclusion of prospective contract by principal or other agent

(1) If the mandate contract was concluded solely for the conclusion of a specific prospective contract the mandate relationship terminates when the principal or another agent appointed by the principal has concluded the prospective contract.

(2) In such a case, the conclusion of the prospective contract is treated as a notice under IV.D.–6:101 (Termination by notice in general).

COMMENTS

A. Application of general rules on termination

This Chapter deals only with grounds of termination which are specific to mandate and which have not been covered in the preceding Chapter. It does not deal with grounds for termination which are covered by the general rules in Book III and which require no modification for the mandate relationship. Accordingly termination by expiry of a fixed period is not dealt with here but in III.–1:107 (Time limited rights and obligations), which must be read with III.–1:111 (Tacit prolongation). Termination by full performance of the obligations under the mandate contract is regulated by the general rule in III.–2:114 (Extinctive effect of performance). Termination for fundamental non-performance is dealt with in Section 5 of Chapter 3 of Book III.

The present Chapter deals with three more specific types of termination, indicated by the titles of the relevant Articles – IV.D.–7:101 (Conclusion of prospective contract by principal or other agent); IV.D.–7:102 (Death of the principal) and IV.D.–7:103 (Death of the agent).

B. No provision on termination in case of incapacity of principal or agent

In most Member States the supervening incapacity of the principal or that of the agent is also regarded as bringing the mandate relationship to an end. The laws on the legal effects of mental incapacity, however, differ from one country to another. Some countries have special regimes for mandates with a view to incapacity or enduring powers of attorney.

In most Member States the incapacity of the principal is regarded as a cause for termination: Belgium, Cyprus, France, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Portugal and Sweden. The same is true for Italy, unless the mandate was for the conclusion of a contract pertaining to business activities and the business of the principal remains in operation. In Spain, the incapacity of the principal also leads to the termination of the mandate relationship, unless the contract indicates otherwise or unless the mandate relationship was precisely concluded for the situation that the principal would later be declared incapable. In this case, the mandate relationship remains in force in accordance with the conditions imposed by the principal.

The contractual relationship does not terminate when the principal is declared incapable in Austria, the Netherlands, Poland and Slovakia. It follows that in those legal regimes the mandate relationship continues between the agent and the curator of the principal. In England, the mandate relationship terminates unless the Enduring Power of Attorney Act applies.

If the incapacity of the principal terminates the mandate relationship, the relevant moment is the moment when the incapacity is declared by a court or specific body in France, Lithuania, Slovakia and Spain. In most other systems the relevant moment is the moment the agent becomes aware of the incapacity. Among these systems it is possible to differentiate two sub-groups. In a first group of systems, the relationship is deemed to be terminated when the agent knows or ought to have been aware of the incapacity of the principal. This is the regime in Belgium, Greece, Hungary, Italy, and Portugal. In a second group of systems, the relevant moment is when the agent is informed of the incapacity. This is the case in Cyprus, Poland, and Scotland. In this second group, the burden of proof regarding whether the agent was aware of the incapacity seems to lie on the person charged with protecting the interests of the incapacitated principal.

The agent has the obligation to continue performance in order to prevent detriment to the interests of the principal or the principal's successors in Austria, Belgium, Cyprus, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Lithuania, the Netherlands, Portugal, Scotland, Slovakia and Spain. In England, the agent has to wait for instructions from the successors of the principal. In most countries, the agent seems only to be obliged to continue running the affairs that were already started before the principal was incapacitated. This is the case in Belgium, Cyprus, Greece, Italy, Portugal, Scotland and Spain. In some of these systems, the agent would also be obliged to take urgent measures. This is the case in Italy and the Netherlands. In Slovakia the agent is only obliged to take urgent measures. In some systems, the obligation to perform these measures is subject to a time-limit: the agent has to continue until the curator can take over the responsibility. This is the case in Germany, Greece, Hungary, and Lithuania. In the Netherlands, the time-limit is specific: one year.

The agent is entitled to payment in Austria, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Scotland, and Slovakia. In the Netherlands, the agent is entitled to payment if and in so far as this is reasonable in view of the circumstances.

In almost all European legislations, the supervening legal incapacity of the agent implies the termination of the mandate relationship. As far as is known, this is different only in Austria and Sweden.

As was said above, the rules on the legal effects of mental incapacity differ greatly from one country to another. Given the fact that the law governing mental incapacity is not covered by these model rules, it is thought that the question whether or not the supervening incapacity of either party to the mandate relationship should lead to the end of the mandate relationship – and what the consequences should be if that happens – is best left to national law.

C. No provision for termination in case of bankruptcy

In all Member States bankruptcy law determines whether or not the mandate relationship terminates by the bankruptcy of either the principal or the agent.

The bankruptcy of the principal terminates the mandate relationship in Austria, Cyprus, England, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Lithuania, Slovakia, Scotland, Spain and Sweden. The same holds true for Estonia, unless the carrying out of the mandate does not affect the bankruptcy. In Poland, the bankruptcy of the principal does not terminate the mandate relationship. In Portugal, the same is true, as it is thought that such a provision is not needed: where relevant, both the person charged with the bankruptcy and the agent can simply terminate the mandate relationship by giving notice.

In many Member States the public declaration of bankruptcy implies the termination of the mandate relationship. This is the case in Austria, Cyprus, Greece, Slovakia, Spain and Sweden. In other countries, notably Belgium, Estonia, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, and Lithuania, the mandate relationship only terminates when the agent becomes aware of it.

The declaration of bankruptcy of the agent also leads to the termination of the mandate relationship in the majority of the legal systems. However, in some of these systems there is no termination if the mandate relationship is not related to the bankruptcy. This is explicitly indicated for Austria, Estonia and Ireland. In England, Germany, and Hungary the mandate relationship does not automatically end. This is also the case for the Netherlands, where under bankruptcy law the mandate relationship may, however, be terminated by the person charged with the bankruptcy.

In all Member States bankruptcy law determines whether or not the mandate relationship ends by the bankruptcy of either the principal or the agent. Given the fact that bankruptcy law is not covered by these model rules, it is thought that the question whether or not the bankruptcy of either party to the mandate relationship should lead to the end of the mandate relationship – and what the consequences should be if it is so terminated – is best left to national law.

D. Conclusion of prospective contract by principal or other agent

If the specific mandated task is the conclusion of the prospective contract and it is not the agent but the principal or another agent appointed by the principal who has concluded the prospective contract, the present Article provides that the mandate relationship terminates. In such a situation, the performance of the main obligation under the mandate contract becomes impossible as a result of an act by the principal or another agent appointed by the principal. Such an act is to be regarded, under paragraph (2), as a form of termination of the mandate relationship by notice under Chapter 6. In many cases, this will imply that the principal will be liable for damages for non-observance of the reasonable notice period.

NOTES

1. In BELGIUM the classic example of an implied revocation by the principal is the conclusion of the prospective contract by the principal personally (CA Brussels 26 Jun 1986, Res.Jur.Imm. 1986, no. 6073; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 294; Wéry, Le mandat, 271). The termination may also occur as a result of notice to the agent of the appointment of a new agent for the same transaction (CC art. 2006).
2. In BULGARIA there is no explicit rule in the sense that the conclusion of the prospective contract by the principal or by another agent, appointed by the principal, is treated as revocation of the mandate. Nevertheless in legal doctrine such behaviour of the principal is interpreted as a case of revocation (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 176). This means that the contractual relationship is terminated when the agent gets to know about or could have been aware of either the conclusion of the prospective contract or the authorisation of another agent with the same authority. The contract will keep its legal effect when the principal explicitly states that the previous mandate is not revoked (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 176).

3. In ENGLAND the position depends on whether the agent has been granted an exclusivity by the principal or not.

4. Article 2003 of the FRENCH Civil Code, which describes the various situations where an agency will terminate, does not refer to this case. However, it is accepted generally that, on the basis of ordinary rules of contract, the completion of the mandate by the agent or by the principal will result in the termination of the mandate. The termination may even occur as a result of notice to the agent of the appointment of a new agent for the same transaction (CC art. 2006).

5. In GERMANY while there is no specific provision to this end, general rules of contract law may lead to a mandate relationship ending once the purpose of the mandate has been fulfilled (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 671 no. 4). Case law has confirmed this notion at least for the contractual relationship with an executor of a will (BGHZ 41, 23, 25).

6. In IRELAND it seems likely that, where the mandate is solely for the conclusion of a particular contract, the conclusion of that contract by someone other than the agent would have to result in the termination of the agency (and perhaps also give rise to liability for breach of contract, depending on the terms of the contract).

7. There are no specific rules on this matter in the POLISH Civil Code.

8. In SCOTLAND where the agency was entered into to achieve a specific purpose, and the principal or another agent achieves that purpose, the agency relationship would be brought to an end on the basis that it is now impossible for the agent to achieve the agreed purpose. The agent might remain entitled to payment where the conclusion of the contract which is the purpose of the agency relationship is attributable in part to the agent's efforts, even if the agent is no longer involved at the moment of conclusion (Macgregor, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Agency and Mandate', para. 112; Walker, Fraser & Steele v Fraser's Trustees 1910 SC 222 at 229, per Lord Dundas; Walker, Donald & Co v Birrell, Stenhouse & Co (1883) 11 R 369).

9. In SLOVAKIA the authority as well as the mandate relationship are terminated if the juridical act for which it has been granted is executed (CC § 33(b)(1)(a)).

10. In SPAIN, the appointment of a new agent for the same matter amounts to termination of the former mandate (CC art. 1735). It is accepted also that the conclusion of the intended contract by the principal personally brings about the tacit revocation of the previous mandate (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Gordillo Cañas), Código Civil II, 1589).

11. In SWEDEN the conclusion of the prospective contract by the principal or by another agent appointed by the principal would not automatically be treated as a revocation of the mandate of the agent. The principal would still be required to revoke the mandate by notice.

IV.D.–7:102: Death of the principal

(1) The death of the principal does not end the mandate relationship.

(2) Both the agent and the successors of the principal may terminate the mandate relationship by giving notice of termination for extraordinary and serious reason under IV.D.–6:103 (Termination by principal for extraordinary and serious reason) or IV.D.–6:105 (Termination by agent for extraordinary and serious reason).

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Under the present Article, the mandate relationship does not terminate if the principal dies. The position of the principal is to be taken over by the successors (i.e. heirs or executors). This approach presumes that the interest of the principal may very well be the same as those of the successors and that they can continue the relationship. Yet, as the interests of the principal may be different from those of the successors, they should be entitled to escape from the mandate relationship without having to observe a notice period. Similarly, as it may become more onerous for the agent to have to deal with the whole of the successors – with possibly conflicting views on the pursuit of their interests – the agent should also be able to escape from the mandate relationship. For these reasons, both the agent and the successors of the principal may give notice of termination of the mandate relationship for extraordinary and serious reasons under IV.D.–6:103 (Termination by principal for extraordinary and serious reason) or IV.D.–6:105 (Termination by agent for extraordinary and serious reason).

B. Conclusion of the prospective contract after termination of mandate relationship due to the death of the principal

It should be noted that IV.D.–2:102 (Price) paragraph (5) remains applicable if the prospective contract is concluded after the mandate relationship has terminated and the conclusion of the prospective contract can be mainly attributed to the performance of the mandate by the agent.

NOTES

I. Death or incapacity of principal

1. In AUSTRIA if the principal dies, the mandate is automatically revoked subject to the statutory regulation of CC § 1022 (except in case of a mandatum post mortem). The mandate relationship ends even if the grant of authority was irrevocable. In many cases this is inconvenient, since the power may have been granted, for example by an elderly person, with this very contingency in mind. The case-law therefore permits a person to create, subject to restrictions, a power of mandate which endures after the principal's death (OGH in JBl 1991, 244; SZ 64/13). In cases where the mandate ends with the principal's death, the agent is required to take the necessary measures to prevent impending unnecessary harm to the interest of the principal or the principal's heirs (CC § 1002; Strasser, § 1002 Rz 21). The agent is liable for failure to take required measures. The agent is reimbursed for the expenses incurred in order to take such measures. According to § 35/1 ZPO solicitors also have to continue to act for such reason. In commercial relations, the mandate is in doubtful cases not automatically terminated with the entrepreneur's death (Art. 8 Nr. 10 of the 4th EVHGB; Ccom § 52(3)). The mandate survives the principal's incapacity, because the loss of capacity to act (in such a way as to produce legal consequences) is not tantamount to the principal's death (Strasser, § 1020 Rz 28b and § 1018 Rz 6; OGH in SZ 13/71; 24/244; 26/132; EvBl 1968/60; 1992/76). Previous declarations of intent remain effective, if validly made.

2. According to the BELGIAN CC art. 2003, the authority to represent ends by the death or the incapacity of one of the parties. According to CC art. 2008, the termination of the authority will only be effective at the moment the agent has taken note or ought to have taken note of the termination. Acts concluded without knowledge of the termination are valid. When the principal dies, the agent is bound to continue running affairs (CC art. 1991(2)). More precisely, the agent must finish affairs started before the principal's death if any delay in their accomplishment would be harmful (Wéry, Le mandat, 301). This provision is strictly interpreted and does not allow the agent to start new affairs (CFI Luik 2 Apr 1930, Pas. 1930, III, 86; de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 456). An agent who breaches this duty is liable to the principal.

3. In BULGARIA the mandate relationship is ended ipso jure by death or legal incapacity of the principal as well as dissolution of the principal legal entity (see LOA art. 287 and the NOTES under IV.D.–7:101; Vassilev, L., Obligazionno pravo, 28; Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 163; Goleva, Obligazionno pravo2, 239). Since the rule of LOA art. 287 is not mandatory, the parties can stipulate otherwise, including post mortem mandate (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 164). Upon termination of the mandate due to death, incapacity or dissolution, the heirs, guardian, trustee or the liquidator of the principal are obliged to immediately notify the agent and undertake the necessary steps to protect his or her interests (LOA art. 291).

4. In DENMARK according to section 21 of the Contracts Act the mandate relationship does not end automatically when the principal dies. Special circumstances, e.g. the agent being instructed to buy personal things for the principal, may lead to termination. Even if such special circumstances are present, a contract concluded by the agent is still effective vis-à-vis the estate of the deceased principal if the third party did not know about the death. When the principal is placed under curatorship, a third party with whom the agent concludes a contract does not acquire a better legal position than if the contract had been concluded by the principal personally (cf. section 22 of the Contract Act). Under circumstances where the mandate relationship ends, e.g. the death of the principal, the agent is obliged (and entitled) to take the necessary steps to protect the interests of the heirs until the estate of the deceased principal takes over (section 24 of the Contract Act). An agent who takes such measures can claim a price for the activities and compensation for the expenses incurred. These rules apply even if the contract for representation was irrevocable.

5. In ENGLAND following the case of Wallace v Cook ((1804) 5 Esp 117), the death of the principal automatically terminates the agent's actual authority, unless the authority is irrevocable. The agent cannot therefore sue for remuneration or indemnity for acts performed after the death of the principal even if the agent was not aware of the principal's death (Pool v Pool (1889) 58 LJP 67; Campanari v Woodburn (1854) 15 CB 400). Once the agent becomes aware of the death of the principal, the agent must stop acting and wait for new instructions from the estate of the principal. If the agent nonetheless continues to act, the agent will be liable for any losses the actions cause the principal's estate (Re Overweg, Haas v Durant ([1900] 1 Ch 209)). When the agent does an act on behalf of the principal after the latter's death, the estate is not bound by the act (Blades v Free (1829) 9 B&C 167) but the estate may choose to be bound through ratification of the act. However, the estate is not bound to pay the agent's remuneration unless the estate also ratifies the contract with the agent. In such a case, the estate must however pay a reasonable sum to the agent for services rendered (Campanari v Woodburn ((1801) 6 Ves 266; Lunghi v Sinclair [1966] WAR 172). Insanity of the principal terminates the agent's actual authority and any transaction that the agent performs is void for lack of authority (Drew v Nunn ((1879) 4 QBD 661)).

6. In ESTONIA as a default rule, it is presumed that the contract for services, governing the mandate, will not cease to have effect with the death of the principal (LOA § 632(1)). In exceptional cases where the mandate relationship expires upon the death of the principal, LOA § 632(3) provides that the contract is nevertheless deemed to be in force until such time as the service provider (the agent) becomes aware or ought to become aware of the death of the principal. The placing of the principal under curatorship has no influence on the contract for services that governs the mandate (and to the authority of the agent in an external relationship).

7. In FINLAND the mandate contract including the right to conclude contracts on behalf of the principal continues to have effect after the principal has died, unless circumstances show otherwise (e.g. the prospective contract is pointless after the death of the principal). In other cases the mandate relationship usually ends when the principal dies, unless otherwise agreed between the agent and the estate of the deceased. If the principal is placed under curatorship, the agent is only entitled to take actions which the principal can still undertake personally. The authorisation ends at the time of the placement under the curatorship (LContract § 21-22 and Ccom § 18:8).

8. In FRANCE, in principle, the mandate will terminate with the death or incapacity of the principal (CC art. 2003), even if it includes an irrevocability clause, subject to the existence of any mandate post mortem, which is accepted in French law, provided it does not affect mandatory rules of succession. See also the recent law which deals with 'the mandate with posthumous effect' (Law no. 2006-728 of 23 Jun 2006, Chapter 6). The CC does not give any further indication on the exact moment when the mandate will terminate, but art. 2008 provides that all that the agent may have accomplished in ignorance of the death of the principal will be valid. French case law is not, however, very clear on the question of proof of the agent's ignorance of the event. In the event of the death of the principal, the agent is required to complete the mandate if there is an urgent need to do so (CC art. 1991(2)), e.g. if the agent was to sell perishable goods. In the event of the principal being placed under an incapacity, the CC does not provide for any similar rule.

9. In GERMANY the mandate relationship does not normally end automatically when the principal dies or is incapacitated. In cases of doubt, the contract continues to have effect after the principal dies or loses the legal ability to act (CC § 672). If the contract does cease to have effect, the moment when this happens depends on the interpretation of the contract. The agent is required to continue to carry out the representation if discontinuation of activity would result in danger (CC § 672).

10. In GREECE a mandate relationship is dissolved by the death of the principal or of the agent as well as by the placing under curatorship or the bankruptcy of either, except if there is an agreement to the contrary (CC art. 726). The relationship ends when the agent becomes aware of the incident by any means, including information received from the heirs in case of death of the principal or from the principal or the curator in case of curatorship (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 726-727 GCC nr. 2). In case of curatorship the mandate ends automatically (Kapodistrias, Art. 726 GCC nr.

15). In case of an agreement on continuance after the death of the principal, the prospective contract is concluded in the name of the heirs of the principal who can revoke the power of representation under the same conditions as the principal could have done if alive (Supreme Court decision no. 564/1989, EllDni 1990, 624). If there is no agreement on continuance the principal's heirs are obliged to reimburse the expenses that the agent incurred for the performance of the mandate until the death of the agent (Supreme Court decision no. 57/1995, NoV 1996, 1239). According to CC art. 727, in the cases provided for in CC art. 726, 'if the dissolution of the mandate imperils the interests of the principal the agent his heir or his legal agent shall be under an obligation to continue the conduct of the affairs that were entrusted to him until such time as the principal or his heir or his curator is in a position to take appropriate steps.' From that rule it is implied that if the dissolution of the mandate due to the death or curatorship of the principal imperils the principal's interests the dissolution of the contract is suspended temporarily until the principal or a curator or heir is able to take care of the affairs of the principal. Failure of the agent to continue temporarily the conduct of the affairs can give rise to a claim for damages. An agent who continues temporarily the conduct of the affairs of the principal is entitled to reimbursement of all the expenses incurred for such temporary performance (Kapodistrias, Art. 726 GCC nr. 19). An irrevocable mandate does not end automatically when the principal dies, but continues between the heir of the principal and the agent (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 726-727 GCC nr. 2). The contract of mandate cannot be continued between the curator of the principal and the agent.

11. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 481, '[t]he contract shall be terminated even if the agency has not been fulfilled, if either party dies or, if a legal person, is dissolved, unless the dissolved legal person has a legal successor; the principal becomes partially or fully incompetent or if the agent becomes incompetent'. CC art. 482 establishes that '[i]f the agency is terminated for a reason that is inherent in the person of the principal, termination shall take effect on the date on which the agent credibly acquires knowledge of the cause of termination. In the event of cancellation or the principal's death or loss of legal competency, the agent shall take such measures as are necessary to protect the interests of the principal even after the cancellation of the contract as long as the principal or its legal successor is unable to attend to the business at hand'. The agent is liable for damages resulting from non-performance (see CC arts. 310 and 318(1)). To the remuneration of the agent and to the reimbursement of his expenses, the general rules apply (see CC arts. 478(1)-(2) and 479). The same rules apply for commission agency (CC art. 513(2)).

12. In IRELAND a contractual agency may be automatically terminated by any event, which frustrates the contract. Thus, it will be terminated if performance becomes impossible, for instance, because of the death of either party. Therefore, the death of the principal automatically terminates the agent's actual authority (Wallace v Cook [1804] 5 Esp 117). The agent cannot therefore sue for remuneration or indemnity for acts performed after the death of the principal even if the agent was not aware of the principal's death (Pool v Pool [1889] 58 LJP 67). Once the agent becomes aware of the death of the principal, the agent must stop acting as the agent and wait for new instructions from the estate of the principal. An agent who nonetheless continues to act will be liable for any losses the actions cause the principal's estate (Re Overweg, Haas v Durant [1900] 1 Ch 209). When the agent does an act on behalf of the principal after the principal's death, the estate is not bound by the act (Blades v Free [1829] 9 B&C 167) but the estate may choose to ratify such an act. However, the estate is not bound to pay the agent's remuneration unless the estate also ratifies the contract with the agent. An irrevocable grant of authority does terminate on the death of the principal.

13. According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1722(4) the relationship under a contract for representation ends on the death or loss of capacity of the principal; however, if the representation contract is concluded for the conclusion of contracts pertaining to business activities, if the business continues to run, the relationship does not end automatically, without prejudice to the heirs' right to terminate it. The relationship ends when the agent becomes aware of the death or incapacity. All acts executed by the agent before becoming aware of the event causing the termination are valid and enforceable vis-à-vis the principal or the heirs (CC art. 1729). Special rules apply for representation in court proceedings: the death of the principal represented in court by the attorney only acquires a judicial meaning (i.e. entailing the interruption of the proceedings) when the attorney gives notice of it in the forms prescribed by the law. According to CC art. 1728, the agent has to continue the activity in the principal's or the heirs' account, but only if delaying action would lead to a danger for the represented interests. The agent is then not only required to take specific urgent measures, but to continue the execution of the mandate entirely. In case of failure, the agent is liable for breach of contract. However, it should be stressed that CC art. 1728 is an exception to the general rule stated in CC art. 1722(4). An irrevocable representation contract does not end on the death or loss of capacity of the principal (CC art. 1723(2)). Consequently, the agent continues to act on behalf of the principal's heirs and successors.

14. In the NETHERLANDS, as mandate contracts have a personal nature, the mandate ends after the death of the principal (CC art. 422(1)(a)), a provision that is mandatory (CC, art. 7:422 (2) first sentence). In that case, the mandate ends when the agent has knowledge of the principal's death (Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3096). However, if the mandate is in the interest of the agent or a third party, the parties may stipulate that the death of the principal does not result in the ending of the mandate (CC art. 7:422(2). If the mandate contract ends because of the principal's death or guardianship order, the agent is required to do what may be expected in the contracting party's interests, having regard to the specific circumstances (CC art. 422(3)).

15. In POLAND the mandate relationship does not end on the principal's death (CC art. 747) or loss of legal capacity (declaration of incapacity by the court). In case of expiration of the mandate contract after the death or declaration of incapacity of the principal, the agent should continue to provide services until the principal's successor or incapacitated principal's legal representative decides otherwise (CC art. 747).

16. In SCOTLAND as a general rule, the relationship under a contract of representation is terminated by the death of the principal (Erskine, III,3,40; Pollok v Paterson 10 Dec 1811 FC at 376, per Lord Meadowbank; Kennedy v Kennedy (1843) 6 D 40; Lord Advocate v Chung 1995 SC 32). However, there are many exceptions to this rule. Where the agent continues to act in ignorance of the principal's death, the actings may be ratified by the heirs of the principal (Stair, Institutions I[10], 12, 6; Erskine, III,3,41). The institutional writers Stair and Erskine indicate that the agent should be encouraged to continue acting until receipt of reliable intelligence of the death of the principal (Stair, Institutions I[10], 12, 6; Erskine, III,3,41); therefore it seems that the mandate relationship does not end until such reliable intelligence has been received by the agent. Furthermore, it seems that an agent may be entitled to continue to carry out the obligations under the contract for representation if informed of the principal's death at a time when a transaction has been begun but not yet completed (Stair, Institutions I[10], 12, 6; Erskine, III,3,41). It is thought that the agent would be entitled to carry out all necessary work in order to complete the transaction, and would be entitled to remuneration in the normal manner. Where the issue is mental incapacity of the principal, the matter is now regulated by the Adults with Incapacity (Scotland) Act 2000 (asp 4). The Act makes special provision for "continuing powers of attorney" which can survive such incapacity but which are subject to special safeguards and regulatory mechanisms. Under section 18 of the Act an ordinary mandate for representation (power of attorney) has no effect during any period when the principal is mentally incapable of dealing with the matters to which the power relates.

17. In SLOVAKIA the relationship under a contract of representation terminates by the death of the principal, unless it has been stipulated otherwise in the contract (CC § 33(b)(1)). If the principal dies, the agent is nevertheless bound to perform any immediately necessary juridical acts to prevent detriment to the rights of the principal. Acts thus performed have the same legal effects as if the representation had continued, unless such acts conflict with the arrangements made by the principal's legal successors or curators (CC § 33(b)(6)). The agent is liable for failure to take such measures. If the agent takes the required measures the agent can claim remuneration (if the contract is remunerated) and expenses from the heirs.

18. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1732(2), the death of the principal terminates the mandate relationship. The agent is however obliged to continue performance if otherwise the interests of the successors of the principal would be in danger (CC art. 1718(2)). Performance of the agent without being aware of the death of the principal is valid and effective with regard to third parties who have contracted with the agent in good faith (CC art. 1738). The commercial code establishes a different regime for mandates of a commercial nature. The death of the principal in a mandate regulated in the commercial code does not imply the termination of the relationship, although the successors of the principal have the right to revoke it (Ccom art. 280).

19. In SWEDEN according to HB 18:8 the mandate relationship should end at the death of the principal. However, this rule is considered to be out-of-date and questionable and according to AvtL (Contract Act) § 21 the relationship does not end automatically when the principal dies. Only special circumstances may end it. Such circumstances could be that the contract relates to matters which concern the principal personally and which lose their meaning after the death of the principal (see Adlercreutz, 206).

II. Termination in case of insolvency or bankruptcy of principal

20. In AUSTRIA the mandate relationship ends automatically when the principal becomes bankrupt or is otherwise subject to rules of insolvency law (AUSTRIAN CC § 1024, KO § 26), independent of the agent's awareness of the incident. This is so even if the grant of authority was irrevocable. (Strasser, § 1020 Rz 8a).

21. According to the BELGIAN CC art. 2003, the authority to represent ends in case of apparent insolvency of one of the parties, e.g. bankruptcy, at the moment the incident occurs or takes effect. Nevertheless, the termination will only be effective when the agent has taken note or ought to have taken note of the termination (CC art. 2008). Acts concluded without knowledge of the termination are valid.

22. In BULGARIAN private law, only business persons (natural or legal) can be declared bankrupt by virtue of a court judgment in a special civil proceeding (Ccom art. 607bis). Non-business persons, other than companies, can be declared bankrupt as an exception (Ccom arts. 609-610). In legal doctrine, it is considered that the mandate relationship terminates when the principal is declared bankrupt, because the principal cannot conclude new contracts (Mevorah/Lidji/Farhi, Komentar III, 165).

23. In DENMARK if the principal becomes bankrupt, a third party with whom the agent concludes a contract will not acquire a better legal position than if the contract had been concluded by the principal personally. This follows from section 23 of the Contract Act, which must be interpreted in connection with section 29 of the Danish Bankruptcy Act. Section 29 lays down that upon pronouncement of the adjudication the principal (and thus the agent of the principal as well) will lose the right to assign or abandon the principal's property, to accept payments etc. The fact that the debtor (and the agent) upon pronouncement of the adjudication order is barred from disposing as regards the estate does not mean that this applies towards third parties as well. Only after the expiry of the day and night on which publication of the bankruptcy has been made in the official gazette will the debtor's (the agent's) loss of power be effective towards the whole world (cf. section 30 of the Bankruptcy Act). Until this point in time, the loss of the power to dispose is effective only against a party who knew or ought to have known of the bankruptcy. This means that a third party who has made a contract with the agent of the debtor in the interval between the pronouncement of the order and its publication will prevail in a question with the estate if the third party acted in good faith as regards the announcement of the adjudication order. Thus the contract is treated as if made before the bankruptcy. The rule in section 30 applies not only to dispositions whereby rights are created against the estate but also to payments to the agent. A party who has made a bona fide payment of a debt to the debtor (the agent) before the publication of the order will thus be discharged as against the bankrupt estate. These rules will apply even if the grant of authority was irrevocable.

24. In ENGLAND the bankruptcy of the principal automatically terminates the authority. Bankruptcy is treated similarly to death. Upon the principal becoming bankrupt, the property of the principal is vested in the trustee in bankruptcy (Dawson v Sexton ((1823) 1 LJOS Ch 185)). Because bankruptcy is treated similarly to death, the principal cannot be bound by apparent authority. However, third parties are protected by certain measures (Insolvency Act 1986, s 284(4)–(5)).

25. In ESTONIA the contract for services governing the mandate will cease to have effect upon bankruptcy of the principal, except in the case where there is no connection between the contract and the bankruptcy estate (LOA § 632). LOA § 632(3) provides that the contract is nevertheless deemed to be in force until such time as the service provider (the agent) becomes aware or ought to become aware of the declaration of the principal as bankrupt. The authorisation of the agent (for the purposes of the external relationship) will also expire (General Part of the Civil Code Act § 125(2)). However, third parties in good faith can rely on the authorisation if the grant of the authorisation was communicated to them or if an authorisation document was issued and presented (General Part of the Civil Code Act § 127(1)).

26. In FINLAND the mandate relationship normally ceases to have effect automatically when the principal is declared bankrupt. The ACAgentsS § 24 proscribes, however, that if the assets of the principal are surrendered into bankruptcy, the representation contract shall be deemed to have expired on the date when the bankruptcy application was submitted to a court.

27. In FRANCE in the event of insolvency of the principal (or more generally, 'bankruptcy', according to the case law), the general rules are the same as those concerning the case of death or incapacity of the principal. The mandate will be terminated by such event (CC art. 2003) as soon as the agent has become aware of the event, even if the contract includes an irrevocability clause.

28. In GERMANY in the case of bankruptcy, the mandate relationship terminates (§ 115(1) of the Insolvenzordnung (InsO) for gratuitous mandate relationships and InsO § 116 for Geschäftsbesorgungsverträge). In principle, the termination occurs when the insolvency proceedings are commenced (InsO § 115(1)). InsO § 115(3), however, contains a rule protecting the agent: as long as the agent was without fault unaware of the commencement of the insolvency proceedings, the mandate/Geschäftsbesorgungsvertrag continues. The mandate relationship also ends when the grant of power was irrevocable, as InsO § 119 explicitly declares any agreement deviating from InsO §§ 103-118 to be null and void.

29. According to the GREEK CC art. 726 a mandate shall be dissolved by the placing under the bankruptcy of the principal (or liquidation if it concerns a legal person). If the principal becomes bankrupt or is otherwise subjected to rules of insolvency law the mandate ends automatically from the time of the publication of the decision which declares the insolvency of the principal. In this respect it is irrelevant if the agent is informed by the principal or when the agent otherwise becomes aware of the insolvency (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 726-727 GCC nr. 4). In the case of an irrevocable mandate, the mandate ends in case of the insolvency of the principal as it cannot be continued between the trustee in insolvency and the agent (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 726-727 GCC nr. 4).

30. According to the HUNGARIAN CC art. 481(b), '[t]he contract shall be terminated even if the agency has not been fulfilled, if either party dies or, if a legal person, is dissolved, unless the dissolved legal person has a legal successor', so that the contract for representation does not end automatically when the principal becomes bankrupt or is otherwise subjected to rules of insolvency law. However, according to art. 35(1) of the Bankruptcy Act (Act XLIX of 1991 on Bankruptcy Proceedings, Liquidation Proceedings and Members' Voluntary Dissolution), '[a]t the time of the beginning of the liquidation proceedings, all the debts of the economic entity become expired (due)'. The same rules apply for the commission agency (CC art. 513(2)).

31. In IRELAND the principal's bankruptcy terminates the agency and deprives the agent of authority (although there are a number of rules designed to protect agents and third parties in respect of acts done before they have notice of the bankruptcy; see Bankruptcy Act 1988).

32. In ITALY the same answers for the case of death of the principal apply to the case of opening of insolvency proceedings involving the principal as the insolvent debtor (see CC arts. 1722, 1723 and 1728 and Italian Insolvency Law art. 78; this last provision clearly states that any contract of mandate ends in case of the insolvency of one of the parties).

33. In the NETHERLANDS according to the CC art. 422(1)(a), the mandate relationship ends in case of the principal's insolvency or the applicability of debt rescheduling to the principal. (Castermans/Krans, Tekst & Commentaar BW[7], no. 3096).

34. In POLAND the mandate relationship ends on the day the bankruptcy is declared by the court (art. 102 of the Bankruptcy Law). The agent may claim damages.

35. In SCOTLAND although in general the principal's bankruptcy (sequestration) acts to terminate the agency relationship, this general rule is subject to practical exceptions which aim to facilitate the efficient administration of the principal's assets. The case of Pollok v Paterson (10 Dec 1811 FC (369), a case decided by a bench of five judges, suggests that the agent's authority may continue notwithstanding sequestration (the judges relying on Stair, 1.12.6; Erskine, III,3,41). Sequestration will certainly not have this effect in relation to transactions already commenced (Bell, Commentaries I[7], 525-526). Others have suggested that the principal's sequestration merely 'entitles the agent to decline to act further' (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 537 relying on Goudy, 368).

36. In SLOVAKIA the relationship under the contract for representation ends automatically when the principal becomes bankrupt, but not when the principal is otherwise subjected to the rules of insolvency law. The relationship ends when the bankruptcy is declared (Act 7{2005 Coll § 52). It is not relevant whether the agent is actually aware of the declaration of bankruptcy; it is presumed that everyone is because it is promulgated by the court in public and published in the official commercial bulletin.

37. In SPAIN, the commencement of the insolvency proceeding of any of the parties extinguishes the mandate (CC art. 1732.3).

38. In SWEDEN bankruptcy of the principal automatically terminates the agency (Hesser, 32).

IV.D.–7:103: Death of the agent

(1) The death of the agent ends the mandate relationship.

(2) The expenses and any other payments due at the time of death remain payable.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

According to this provision, the death of the agent brings the mandate relationship to an end. This approach implies that it is by virtue of the personal characteristics of the agent that the principal entrusts the agent with the responsibility to carry out actions on the principal's behalf. Accordingly, the relationship ends if the agent cannot comply with the contractual obligations any longer (paragraph (1).

B. Obligation to pay remains

The successors of the deceased agent will take the agent's place as creditor of the payment obligation. The provisions under IV.D.–2:102 (Price) paragraph (5) and IV.D.–2:103 (Expenses incurred by agent) apply. The effect of the former is that the price will often be payable if the prospective contract is concluded after the mandate relationship has ended due to the death of the agent and the conclusion of the prospective contract can be mainly attributed to the performance of the mandate by the agent.

C. Contract may provide otherwise

There may be cases where the mandate relationship does not depend on the personal qualities of the agent and where the fact that the agent dies does not by itself mean that the obligations under the contract can no longer be performed. If the agent dies, often colleagues or employees can carry out the performance of the obligations. In such a case, automatic ending of the mandate relationship may therefore not be in the interests of any of the parties involved. It is for the parties to explicitly agree on this.

NOTES

I. Mandate relationship ends automatically on death, insolvency or incapacity of agent

1. The mandate relationship ends automatically (ipso jure) when the agent dies (AUSTRIAN CC § 1022) or becomes bankrupt or is otherwise subjected to rules of insolvency law in so far as the contract for mandate concerns the bankrupt's estate (CC § 1024; KO § 26; with the exception of the contract for commission, which is not terminated automatically (HVertrG § 26, KO § 26)). If the administrator of the bankrupt's estate insists on the performance of the contract, the principal has a claim for separation and recovery of assets not belonging to the bankrupt's estate (Straube (-Griss) HGB I³, § 383, no. 13). If one of the creditors of the commission/commercial agent takes possession of the goods on commission, the principal may bring in an action for recovery of the goods (EO § 37; Straube (-Griss) HGB I³, § 383, no. 13). The principal of a commission business is not entitled to exercise the agent's rights towards the third party where the commission agent commits a fundamental non-performance or if prior to the time for performance it is clear that there will be a fundamental non-performance (CC § 1024 Schwimann (-Apathy), ABGB V³, no. 1). The contract for mandate does not end if the agent is placed under curatorship, though the agent cannot act for the principal as long as the incapacity renders the agent unable to perform the agency duties (CC § 1018; Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I³, no. 5). In case of the agent's death, bankruptcy or insolvency the contractual relationship ends when the incident leading to the end occurs or takes effect. If it ends for such reason, the agent's heirs are not required to take the necessary measures to prevent unnecessary harm to the interest of the principal. In cases where another person exercised a profession or a business with the agent or in the agent's service and was authorised by the principal in doing so (e.g. another lawyer of the same law firm), such other person is required to take the necessary measures to prevent unnecessary harm to the interest of the principal.

2. According to the BELGIAN CC art. 2003 the authority to represent ends by the death, the incapacity or the apparent insolvency of one the parties, of which bankruptcy is an example. The mandate relationship probably ends when the incident occurs or takes effect. According to CC art. 2010, the agent's heirs who are aware of the contract for representation are required to notify the agent's death to the principal and to perform in the meantime all urgent and necessary acts, required in the principal's interest by the circumstances (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V^2, 454; Wéry, Le mandat, 297-298).

3. For BULGARIA see Notes under IV.D.–7:103 (Death of the agent).

4. In DENMARK the contract for representation will end automatically when the agent dies, is placed under curatorship, becomes bankrupt or is otherwise subjected to rules of insolvency.

5. In ENGLAND the death of the agent automatically ends the authority. The basis for such a rule is the fact that the agency is a personal contract (Farrow v Wilson [1869] LR 4 CP 744). Should there be joint agents, the death of only one of them is sufficient to end the agency relationship (Adams v. Buckland (1705) 2 Vern 514, 23 ER 929). Because of the personal aspect of the contract, there is no possibility for another agent to come in as a substitute of the original dead agent. Insanity of the agent also automatically terminates the actual authority since the agent is no longer capable to represent the principal. Bankruptcy of the agent may end the actual authority, but it is not automatic and will depend upon the terms of the appointment. It may be considered as a frustrating event or a repudiation of the contract depending on the terms in the contract in question (McCall v Australian Meat Co Ltd [1870] 19 WR 188; Hudson v Granger [1821] 5 B&A). In relation to the agent's cessation of business, the rules are less clear: in Triffit Nurseries v Salads Etcetera Ltd [1999] 1 Lloyd's rep 697. affd [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep 74, the Court of Appeal held that the appointment of a receiver did not automatically end the authority of the agent (see Longmore J ([1999] 1 Lloyd's rep 697 at 700) who stated that 'cessation of business' was an uncertain concept and therefore could not be added to the list of causes of automatic termination.

6. In ESTONIA as a default rule, it is presumed that the mandate relationship will end with the death of the agent (LOA § 633(1)). The same applies in case of bankruptcy, except where there is no connection between the contract and the bankruptcy estate (LOA § 633(2)). The contractual relationship will automatically end. The heirs are obliged to inform the principal of the death of the agent (LOA § 634).

7. In FINLAND the mandate relationship ends automatically when the agent dies and the estate of the deceased does not generally have any specific personal duties towards the principal. The authorisation does not always end automatically when the agent is declared bankrupt. The bankruptcy estate has, in principle, the right to decide whether the activities of the agent are to be continued. However, the principal is usually entitled to terminate the agency due to the bankruptcy. A commercial agency ends automatically on the date when the bankruptcy application was submitted to a court (Commercial Agents and Salesmen Act art. 24). A curatorship limits the agent's authorisation to those measures the agent is still entitled to take personally.8. In FRANCE the death, insolvency or incapacity of the agent would effectively involve automatic termination of the mandate or agency (CC art. 2003; for a merger or takeover of the agent, see Cass.civ. 3eme, 10 Nov 1998, Bull. civ. 1998 III, no. 212). The rules above apply unless the agency contract contains a clause to the contrary (e.g. Cass.com., 22 May 1967, JCP 1968, II, 15389). CC art. 2010 indicates that in the event of the death of the agent, the heirs must inform the principal of the event, which raises the presumption that the mandate will terminate at that time. The heirs of the agent must also do whatever is in the interest of the principal for the time being. There is no similar rule applicable in the event of incapacity or insolvency of the agent, but it is likely that the mandate will terminate when the principal is informed of the event.

9. In GERMANY, in case of doubt, the mandate ends when the agent dies (CC § 673). In case of curatorship (if depriving the agent of power to perform juridical acts), this would be considered a case of impossibility of contract performance, thus terminating the agent's obligations (CC § 275; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 673 no. 1). Bankruptcy and insolvency of the agent have no effect on the contract (InsO §§ 115-116 a contrario; cf. MünchKomm (-Häuser), HGB, § 383 no. 97; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 671 no. 5). The moment of death/commencement of curatorship is decisive. According to CC § 673, the heirs have to continue to perform the obligations under the contract of representation. If this obligation is breached, the heirs are liable for damages according to CC § 280(1) (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 673 no. 2).

10. In GREECE a mandate is dissolved by the death of the agent (except if there is an agreement to the contrary) as well as by the agent's being placed under curatorship or becoming bankrupt (CC art. 726). In the case of curatorship the contract of mandate ends automatically (KAPODISTRIAS IV, Art. 726 GCC nr. 15). Both in case of death and curatorship, the contract ends when the principal becomes aware of the incident by any means (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 726-727 GCC nr. 2). If the agent becomes bankrupt or is otherwise subjected to rules of insolvency law, the mandate relationship ends automatically from the time of the publication of the decision which declares the insolvency of the agent, irrespective of whether the principal is informed of it (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 726-727 GCC nr. 4). If the dissolution of the mandate due to the death or insolvency or curatorship of the agent imperils the interests of the principal the dissolution is suspended temporarily (the agency being continued by the agent's heir or legal representative, if the agent has died) until the principal or the principal's heir or legal representative is able to take care of the principal's affairs (CC art. 727). Failure of the agent or the agent's heir or legal representative to continue temporarily the conduct of the affairs that were entrusted by the principal can establish a claim for damages for any loss caused by such failure. If the agent or the agent's heir or legal representative continues temporarily the conduct of the affairs of the principal there is a right to reimbursement of all expenses incurred (Kapodistrias, Art. 726 GCC nr. 19).

11. In HUNGARY if the agent dies or becomes incompetent, the relationship under the contract for representation is terminated (CC art. 481). It does not end automatically when the agent becomes bankrupt or is otherwise subjected to rules of insolvency law, but according to Bankruptcy Act art. 35(1), '[a]t the time of the beginning of the liquidation proceedings, all the debts of the economic entity become expired (due)'.

12. In IRELAND a contractual agency may be automatically terminated by any event, which frustrates the contract. Thus, it will be terminated if performance becomes impossible, for instance, because of the death of either party. Therefore, the death of the agent automatically ends the contract. This is also supported by the fact that the agency is a personal contract (Farrow v Wilson [1869] LR 4 CP 744). Insanity of the agent also automatically terminates the actual authority since the agent is no longer capable to represent the principal. An agent's bankruptcy will terminate the agency if it makes the agent unfit to continue to act. Even an irrevocable grant of authority terminates on the death of the agent.

13. According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1722(4), the mandate for representation ends automatically when the representative dies, is placed under curatorship, becomes bankrupt or is otherwise subjected to rules of insolvency law. This happens when the principal is informed of the incident leading to the termination or when the principal becomes anyhow aware of it. According to CC art. 1728(2), '[w]hen a mandate is extinguished by the death or supervening incapacity of the representative, if his heirs or the person who represents or assists him have knowledge of the mandate, they shall give prompt notice to the principal and in the meantime shall take the measures which circumstances may require in the interest of the principal'. The heirs or such other persons are required to promptly notify the principal of the representative's death and to take any circumstances which are necessary in the light of the specific circumstances (e.g. urgent activities). They would be liable for failure to take such measures pursuant to CC art. 1728. They do receive payment and/or reimbursement for the expenses they incur in order to take such measures. The mandate ends even if the grant of authority was irrevocable.

14. In the NETHERLANDS the mandate relationship ends because of the agent's death, guardianship order, the agent's insolvency or the applicability of debt rescheduling to the agent (CC art. 422(1)(b)). If the relationship ends because of the agent's death, the heirs may be obliged to do what may be expected in the contracting party's interests, as far as they have knowledge of the succession and the mandate. Such obligation may apply to those who exercised a profession or business with the agent (CC art. 422(4)). See Van der Grinten, Lastgeving, no. 53.

15. In POLAND, unless agreed otherwise, the mandate relationship ends on the death or loss of legal capacity of the agent (POLISH CC art. 748).

16. In SCOTLAND the death of the agent terminates the agency relationship (Stair, Institutions I 10, 12, 6; Erskine, III, 3,40; Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 537). This rule reflects the 'personal' nature of the agency relationship (Stair, Institutions I 10, 12, 6). The incapacity of the agent has the same effect (Wink v Mortimer (1849) 11 D 995; Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 537). Whether the agent's bankruptcy (sequestration) has a similar effect is a more difficult question, and it may be that this is the case only where the agent's solvency is an implied term of the agency contract (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 537-8, relying on English authority: McCall v Australian Meat Co Ltd (1870) 19 WR 188; Hudson v Granger (1821) 5 B&A).

17. In SLOVAKIA the relationship under a contract for representation ends automatically when the agent dies or is placed under curatorship (in the latter case the contract ends because a person may not act as a representative for another person if the person himself or herself has no capacity to undertake the relevant juridical acts; CC § 22(2))

The relationship does not end automatically when the agent becomes bankrupt, but the administrator of the bankruptcy assets may terminate it.

18. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1732(2), the death of the agent ends the mandate relationship. See also Ccom art. 280. CC art. 1739 states that in this case the successors of the agent must inform the principal of the death of the agent and must act according to what is needed to protect the interests of the principal. According to Lete del Río, this is not possible if the mandate was concluded in view of the personal characteristics of the agent and the successors cannot act as substitutes in the activity (Lete del Río, Derecho de obligaciones III[4], 415).

19. In SWEDEN the mandate relationship ends automatically on the death of the agent. The estate of the deceased has no other duty than to provide an account of the work performed by the agent prior to his/her death (HB 18:8 and Bengtsson, Särskilda avtalstyper I[2], 156). It is somewhat uncertain whether the mandate relationship ends automatically or not on the bankruptcy of the agent. In case a commissionaire is declared bankrupt, the mandate ends automatically. In other cases, the bankruptcy of the agent may only result in a right for the client to cancel the contract.

II. Termination of mandate relationship in case of death of specific person designated to perform the mandate contract

20. The mandate relationship ends automatically when the specific person with consideration to whom the authority to represent the principal had been granted dies (CC § 1020). When this person is placed under curatorship, the contractual relationship does not automatically end, though the agent cannot act for the principal as long as the incapacity precludes performance of the duties (CC § 1018; Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I[3], no. 5).

21. In BELGIUM the relationship under a contract for representation ends automatically when the specific person with consideration to whom the authority to represent the principal had been granted dies or is placed under curatorship.

22. In BULGARIA here is no explicit rule regulating the legal effect on the mandate relationship of the death of the specific person designated to perform the contract. The parties are free to stipulate this in the contract.

23. This situation has not been resolved in DANISH legislation or case law. The relationship will probably end automatically when the specific person dies or is placed under curatorship.

24. In ENGLAND if a specific person has been appointed to represent the principal, then, given the personal nature of the relationship (Farrow v Wilson [1869] LR 4 CP 744), it seems that the same rules as in the case of death, incapacitation or bankruptcy of the agent defined above will apply.

25. In ESTONIA the mandate relationship will not end automatically when the specific person dies or is incapacitated, however the principal will most likely be able to terminate it on 'material grounds' according to LOA § 631.

26. In FINLAND if the mandate is of highly personal nature, the relationship usually ends when the specific person dies or is placed under curatorship.

27. In FRANCE no rule has been established by legislation or case law on this point. One can consider that if the event occurs, the agent would have to carry out the mandate personally or find a replacement since the initial mandate would not be affected by this event (academic opinion: see Mallet-Bricout, no. 180). But if the principal has designated the person whom the principal wishes to carry out the mandate, it is likely that the mandate will be treated as having a personal nature and the death or incapacity of the sub-agent or the specific person will bring the agency to an end. It would obviously be preferable to deal with this specifically in the contract.

28. For GERMANY see Notes under IV.D.–6:103 (Termination by principal for extraordinary and serious reason) and IV.D.–6:105 (Termination by agent for extraordinary and serious reason).

29. In the case of substitution GREEK CC art. 726 is analogously applicable (Georgiadis/Stathopoulos/Karasis, Art. 726-727 GCC nr. 6). According to that rule a mandate will be dissolved by the death of the substitute mandatory (except if there is an agreement to the contrary) as well as by the placing under curatorship of such a substitute.

30. On the basis of the rule of the HUNGARIAN CC art. 481, the contractual relationship is not terminated if the specific person with consideration to whom the authority to represent the principal had been granted dies or is placed under curatorship (and not one of the parties to the contract). However, the principal is entitled to terminate the relationship with immediate effect at any time (CC art. 483). The same rules apply for the commission agency (CC art. 513(2)).

31. In IRELAND because of the highly personal nature of an agency contract, the death of the specific person identified to perform the obligations under the contract will terminate the agency.

32. In ITALY the CC does not contain any specific rules with regard to this matter, but a systematical interpretation of the provisions governing mandate, in light of the fact that in case of sub-representation the original agent remains liable for the performance of the contractual obligations vis-à-vis the principal, leads to the conclusion that the relationship under the contract for representation does not end automatically if the third party dies.

33. In the NETHERLANDS according to CC art. 409(1), a contract for professional services in general ends on the death of the specific person designated to perform the obligations under it. That person's heirs may be obliged to do what may be expected in the contracting party's interests, as far as they have knowledge of the succession and the mandate. Such obligation may apply to those who exercised a profession or business with the agent (CC art. 409(2)). There is no such provision that applies specifically to mandate contracts.

34. POLISH law does not provide a straight answer to this question. Since the mandate relationship ends on the death of the agent it may be assumed that it also ends on the death of the person who was chosen to perform the obligations under the contract. Additionally, it is a general rule that if contractual obligations can no longer be performed, the contractual relation ends (CC art. 475).

35. In SCOTLAND there appears to be no specific consideration in the authorities of this situation, namely where the specific person who was to perform the obligations under the agency contract dies (distinguishing this situation from that where the agent as contracting party dies). It is likely that a court would seek to ascertain whether the 'agent' was in fact the contracting party or the person designated to carry out the work. Only where the specific person was truly the 'agent' would the agency relationship terminate on that person's death. In other situations, the agency relationship would continue. It is likely that the same approach would be adopted in a case of incapacity, i.e. only where the party incapacitated could truly be described as the agent would the relationship terminate.

36. In SLOVAKIA this is not specifically regulated, but on the basis of general provisions on impossibility of performance, it can be argued that when the specifically designated person dies or is placed under curatorship, performance of the contractual obligations is not possible and thus the relationship terminates (CC § 575). This provision, however, is not applicable to commercial relations; in these cases it is always possible for both parties to terminate the relationship.

37. SPANISH law does not contain any provision as to the present question. But the analogy of the death of the agent is persuasive when the conditions of the dead person were decisive for giving the authority.

38. In SWEDEN the death of the agent usually ends the mandate relationship. The reason for this is that the mandate contract usually and to a high degree based on personal trust. However, in case the task is assigned to a certain company and the client does not attach great importance to the particular person representing the company, the mandate contract does not end automatically on the death of the person carrying out the tasks. The principal is granted a right to cancel the contract (Bengtsson, Särskilda avtalstyper I^2, 156).

III. Termination of irrevocable mandate on death of the agent

39. In BELGIUM a clause of irrevocability is no bar to termination on such grounds as death, incapacity, bankruptcy or insolvency of one of the parties. The court can nevertheless judge that the parties have a common will to give the clause of irrevocability a broader scope and also exclude the other grounds to end the contract for representation (Wéry, Le mandat, 278).

40. In BULGARIA the death of the agent is always considered to be a ground for termination , irrespective of whether the mandate is irrevocable.

41. In FRANCE the parties may not validly agree for the mandate to be irrevocable (CC art. 2004). As a matter of general principle, French law does not accept that parties are subject to perpetual obligations, and CC art. 2003 provides that the mandate will terminate by the death, insolvency or incapacity of either party.

42. In doubt, the mandate ends when the agent dies (GERMAN CC § 673).

43. The rule of the HUNGARIAN CC art. 481 (termination even if the agency has not been fulfilled, if either party dies) applies, irrespective of whether the revocability of the contract has been restricted.

44. In IRELAND the death of either party does not terminate an irrevocable agency. Such an agency will only terminate once the interest of the agent has been satisfied.

45. In ITALY if the agent dies, the contract ends even if the grant of authority was irrevocable.

46. In the NETHERLANDS, it seems that an irrevocable mandate contract only ends on the death of the agent if the contract was established considering a specific person (CC art. 7:409(1)).

47. Irrevocable mandate is not permitted under POLISH law.

48. In SCOTLAND it is not clear from the very few authorities on the procuratory in rem suam, the type of irrevocable agency recognised in Scots law, whether the relationship terminates on the death of the agent. It is likely that the general rules apply, which would dictate that death does, in fact, terminate the relationship.

49. In SLOVAKIA irrevocable mandate is not allowed.

50. In SPANISH law no solution is given. It depends on the cause or rendering irrevocable the mandate whether the right of the agent is devolved to the agent's estate.

IV. Price and expenses in case of death of agent

51. In BELGIUM the principal is obliged to reimburse the past expenses and losses of the agent and to pay a salary pro rata to the heirs of the agent.

52. In BULGARIA if the agent dies, the mandate relationship ends. The principal is obliged to reimburse the expenses incurred and a proportional part of the stipulated remuneration (LOA art. 288(1)).

53. In DENMARK the agent is probably entitled to reimbursement of the expenses made, but not to a price.

54. In ENGLAND any obligations accrued prior to the death of the agent are due to the agent's estate.

55. The FRENCH CC art. 2010 indicates that in the event of the death of the agent, the heirs of the agent must inform the principal of the event and must also do whatever is in the interest of the principal for the time being. No other indications are given by the law or case law on how this provision would work in practice, particularly as regards any possible indemnity or remuneration to be paid to the heirs. However, the repayment of expenses would be due to the heirs and if the mandate has been fulfilled they are also entitled to the price.

56. In GERMANY as the relationship merely ends ex nunc, a right to payment of price or reimbursement that has already arisen prior to the death can be claimed.

57. In GREECE due to the gratuitous character of mandate the question if the agent is entitled to a price does not arise. That question arises only with regard to the expenses that the substitute has incurred in order to perform the contract of mandate. In such a case the heir in case of death of the substitute or the substitute in case of curatorship is entitled to a reimbursement of expenses. In case of the obligatory remunerated mandate between the lawyer and the principal, the heir of the substitute lawyer is entitled to a price and reimbursement of expenses in case of the lawyer's death (Supreme Court decision no. 1/1987, EEN 1987, 783) or the substitute lawyer personally in case of curatorship.

58. The HUNGARIAN CC art. 478(3) establishes that '[i]f the contract is terminated before the agency has been fulfilled, the agent shall be entitled to demand an appropriate fraction of the fee for his activities'. Moreover, according to CC art. 479(1), '[c]osts that arise in connection with the handling of a matter shall be borne by the principal. The agent shall not be obliged to advance any costs'.

59. In IRELAND following termination, any pre-existing rights, such as right to remuneration and indemnity, continue to exist and are payable to the estate of the agent.

60. In the NETHERLANDS if the mandate is not fulfilled, only a certain part of the agent's wages has to be paid by the principal. In that case, the agent is entitled to reasonable wages according to CC art. 7:411(1). Three circumstances are specifically important to determine a reasonable wage for the agent when the mandate is not fulfilled: the activities that have already been performed under the mandate contract, the principal's profit and the cause that ended the contract (CC art. 7:411(2)).

61. In POLAND the agent's successors may claim for (a part of) the price and all the expenses the agent was entitled to at the moment of the death.

62. In SCOTLAND any sums due to the agent, whether fees or expenses, outstanding at the time of death would be payable to the agent's estate. It is unlikely that the agent's heirs and agents would be entitled to claim the full price where death has prevented full performance on the part of the agent.

63. In SLOVAKIA the agent (the heirs) is entitled to an appropriate price for work that was performed and to reimbursement of expenses made.

64. In SPAIN, as termination for this reason is not retroactive, a right to payment of price or reimbursements that has already arisen prior to the death is not affected.

65. In SWEDEN in case of termination the agent is only entitled to payment for work already performed.

PART E. COMMERCIAL AGENCY, FRANCHISE AND DISTRIBUTORSHIP

CHAPTER 1: GENERAL PROVISIONS

Section 1: Scope

IV.E.–1:101: Contracts covered

(1) This Part of Book IV applies to contracts for the establishment and regulation of a commercial agency, franchise or distributorship and with appropriate adaptations to other contracts under which a party engaged in business independently is to use skills and efforts to bring another party's products on to the market.

(2) In this Part, "products" includes goods and services.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The rules in this Part of Book IV apply primarily to contracts for the establishment and regulation of a commercial agency, franchise or distributorship. These contracts have many characteristics in common, especially their economic function – the establishment and regulation of a marketing relationship. The rules relating to these common characteristics are to be found in Chapter 2. However, there are also some differences. Therefore, this Part also contains separate Chapters on commercial agency (Chapter 3), franchise (Chapter 4) and distribution (Chapter 5).

The Part applies not only to these contracts, but also with appropriate adaptations to all other contracts whereby an independent business person is to use skills and efforts to bring another party's products on to the market – i.e. to contracts which do not fall exactly within one of the three categories mentioned but which nevertheless have the same economic function of regulating a marketing relationship (vertical agreements; compare Article 2(1) EC Regulation 2790/1999 and Guidelines on Vertical Restraint, no.24) This wider application means that parties cannot avoid the application of the rules contained in this Part (especially the mandatory ones) by labelling, classifying or drafting their marketing relationship contract in such a way as to avoid calling it a commercial agency, franchising or distribution contract.

B. Not advertising contracts

However, the reference to other contracts under which an independent business person is to use skills and efforts to bring another party's products on to the market is not meant to refer to advertising contracts which are contracts of a different nature than the ones under discussion here: an advertising company will never itself sell the other party's products (goods or services) to the public or to another link in the distribution chain, either in its own name (as distributors and franchisees do) or in the name of the principal (as an agent may do). In other words, advertisers are not a link in the chain between producers and final users. Rather, they provide a service to one of the links which is meant to assist it to be more effective in bringing its products on to the market.

C. Independent business persons; not employees

The concept of independent business person includes both natural persons and legal persons. Indeed, in practice commercial agents, franchisees and distributors (especially the larger ones) are frequently companies which have legal personality according to the applicable national law.

However, it does not include – and therefore the rules contained in this Part do not apply to – persons who bring another party's products on to the market otherwise than as independent business persons. The typical example of a person who is not independent is an employee. In other words, nothing in this Part is meant to cover labour contracts.

D. Products

This Article refers to "bringing products on to the market". The concept of "products" includes here and throughout this Part both goods and services. (In the same sense Article 1(a) EC Regulation 2790/1999; see also Guidelines on Vertical Restraints (2000/C 291/01, no. 2)).

E. Default rules

The rules in this Part are merely default rules unless otherwise provided (see II.–1:102 (Party autonomy)). The application of that principle is particularly important in relation to the contracts within this Part because most such contracts are in practice governed by carefully drawn up contract terms.

There are a number of exceptions to the general rule of party autonomy. These are clearly stated in the relevant Articles. Their general justification is that the rules in question exist for the protection of the weaker party.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. None of the European legal systems includes a set of specific rules which apply to commercial agency, franchising and distribution contracts. However, under all European systems of law there are specific rules that apply to commercial agency. In addition, under BELGIAN law there is a specific Act that applies to distribution contracts and ITALIAN law includes a specific statute on franchise contracts. In some legal systems the rules concerning commercial agency are applied by way of analogy to franchise and distribution contracts as well. Where this is not the case, general contract law applies or the rules concerning other nominate contracts.

II. Specific rules concerning commercial agency

2. All European legal systems contain specific rules on commercial agency as a result of the transposition of the Council Directive of 18 December 1986 on the coordination of the laws of the Member States relating to self-employed commercial agents (hereafter: the Directive). These rules are laid down in the AUSTRIAN Handelsvertretergesetz

1993 (HVertrG), the BELGIAN Wet van 13 April 1995 betreffende Handelsagentuurovereenkomsten, B. S. 2 juni 1995/Loi du 13 avril 1995 rélative au contrat d´agence commerciale (M. B. 2 juin 1995), the UK Commercial Agents (Council Directive) Regulations 1993 (S. I. 1993/3053), as amended by the Commercial Agents (Council Directive) (Amendment) Regulations 1993 (S. I. 1993 No. 3173) and 1998 (S. I. 1998 No. 2868) (applying equally to ENGLAND and SCOTLAND), the FINNISH Act on Commercial Agents and Salesmen (1. 1. 1976) which was replaced by a new Act on 8 May 1992, in arts. L. 134-1–L. 134-17 of the FRENCH C. com., §§ 84-92 c of the GERMAN HGB, the GREEK Presidential Decree 219/1991, in arts. 1742-1753 of the ITALIAN CC, arts. 7:428-7:445 of the DUTCH CC, art. 758- 764 IX of the POLISH CC, the PORTUGUESE DL no. 178/86, the SPANISH Ley 12/1992, del Contrato de Agencia (LCA) and the SWEDISH Lag om handelsagentur (HaL). See also the notes to Article 2:101.

III. Specific rules concerning franchises

3. Under Italian law there is a specific act that concerns franchises: L n. 129/2004 Norme per la disciplina dell´ affiliazione commerciale. In SPANISH law there is no specific Act regulating franchises, although some specific rules may be found in article 62 of the Statute on Retail Trade (a definition of a franchise, the obligation to register the franchise and the precontractual duties) and in the Royal Decree 2485\1998 that develops the content of this article and provides the rules on the register of franchises.

IV. Application of commercial agency rules by way of analogy to franchises

4. In some legal systems the rules concerning commercial agency are applied by way of analogy to franchises in so far as this is appropriate (AUSTRIA, BELGIUM: Verbraeken & De Schoutheete no. 131; GERMANY; FINLAND: Halila-Hemmo (1996) 272; Bygglin (1978); PORTUGAL). See also the notes to the specific provisions in Chapter 4.

5. Due to the lack of specific regulation of franchises in SPANISH law, some of the agency rules may be applicable by analogy, mutatis mutandis, to this contract, especially those which relate to business collaborations based on mutual confidence such as articles 2, 5, 9, 10 20-27 LCA (Domínguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 581 and 601).

V. Specific rules concerning distributorships

6. Under BELGIAN law there is a specific act that concerns distributorships: (Loi du 27 juillet 1961 relative à la résiliation unilatérale des concessions de vente exclusive à durée indéterminée (M. B., 29 déc. 1961; Alleenverkoopwet)). Under FRENCH law there are specific rules concerning the pre-contractual obligation to inform included in art. L. 330 C. Com. These rules apply to certain types of distribution contracts.

VI. Application of commercial agency rules by way of analogy to distributorship

7. In some legal systems the rules concerning commercial agency are applied by way of analogy to distributorships in so far as appropriate. (AUSTRIA; GERMANY; FINLAND: KKO 1987:42, Aalto (2002) 2-3, 10, Telaranta (1993) 25, 149-163; PORTUGAL).

8. See also the notes to the provisions in Chapter 5.

9. Under SWEDISH law, the rules concerning commercial agency may be applied by way of analogy to sole distributorships. The scope of such application by way of analogy is however uncertain, (Söderlund, 160 ff).

10. Under SPANISH law, some agency provisions may be applicable by way of analogy to distributorship, especially those concerning indemnity for goodwill, although the case law has not established a unanimous position towards this matter (J.L. Díaz Echegaray in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p.563).

VII. Other rules

11. Under GREEK law, in so far as is possible the rules concerning other long-term nominate contracts may apply by way of analogy to commercial agency, franchising and distribution contracts. They are the rules concerning lease contracts (Μίσθωση πράγματος) 574-618 AK, employment contracts (Σύμβαση εργασίας) 648-680 AK, mandate (Εντολή) 713-729 AK, Partnership/Community (Εταιρία) 741-748 AK, loan (Δάνειο) 806-809 AK and deposit contracts (Παρακαταθήκη) 822-833 AK).

12. As to franchising contracts, according to BELGIAN, GREEK, DUTCH law the rules of general contract law apply (BELGIUM: Verbraeken & de Schoutheete, no. 131). According to FINNISH law apart from the rules on agency also the rules concerning employment law may be applied by way of analogy in so far as appropriate, Halila-Hemmo 1996, 272; Bygglin 1978.

13. Under FINNISH, GREEK and DUTCH law the rules of general contract law apply to distribution contracts (THE NETHERLANDS: Barendrecht & van Peursem, no. 21).

14. According to Chitty-Reynolds it is more likely that under the law of ENGLAND franchise and distribution contracts will be classified as contracts for purchase for resale and the rules concerning those contracts apply accordingly (Chitty-Reynolds no. 31-003.) In SCOTTISH law they fall under the general law of contract.

15. Under ITALIAN law the situation is again different. With respect to certain distribution contracts, CC arts. 1559 et seq. concerning somministratione may apply by way of analogy (Baldi 84 et seq.). Some of these rules which have developed with respect to distribution contracts apply by way of analogy to franchising contracts. In addition, rules can also be inferred from the general rules concerning good faith (Baldi 132).

Section 2: Other general provisions

IV.E.–1:201: Priority rules

In the case of any conflict:

(a) the rules in this Part prevail over the rules in Part D (Mandate); and

(b) the rules in Chapters 3 to 5 of this Part prevail over the rules in Chapter 2 of this Part.

COMMENTS

This Article is intended, first, to regulate questions of priority between the rules in this Part and the rules in the Part on Mandate. This is particularly relevant in relation to the rules on commercial agency. A commercial agent may, or may not, have a mandate to conclude, negotiate or facilitate contracts (or other juridical acts) on behalf of the principal. In so far as there is such a mandate the agent will fall both under the rules on commercial agency and the rules on mandate. To a large extent these rules supplement each other but to the extent that there is any conflict the rules on commercial agency, which regulate a more specific situation and which have a stronger protective policy content, prevail. The second sub-paragraph is intended merely to resolve any doubts about the relationship between Chapter 2 and the subsequent Chapters of this Part. The important point is that the general rules for all marketing relationship contracts in Chapter 2 apply to the specific types of contract covered in the subsequent Chapters, subject to any particularisation or adaptation in those Chapters.

CHAPTER 2: RULES APPLYING TO ALL CONTRACTS WITHIN THE SCOPE OF THIS PART

Section 1: Pre-contractual

IV.E.–2:101: Pre-contractual information duty

A party who is engaged in negotiations for a contract within the scope of this Part has a duty to provide the other party, a reasonable time before the contract is concluded and so far as required by good commercial practice, with such information as is sufficient to enable the other party to decide on a reasonably informed basis whether or not to enter into a contract of the type and on the terms under consideration.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article imposes upon each party a pre-contractual duty to provide the other with all the information which the other party needs to make a rational decision as to whether or not to enter into a contract of the type and on the terms under consideration. The information must be given a reasonable time before the contract is concluded. Reflecting the rule on pre-contractual information duties in relation to contracts between businesses for the supply of goods and services (II.–3:101 (Duty to disclose information about goods, other assets and services)) the duty is limited to what is required by good commercial practice. The main consequence of a failure to perform the duty is that the contract will be voidable for mistake.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This duty to provide adequate pre-contractual information is intended to guarantee that each party will have all the relevant and necessary information in order to commit itself with full knowledge of the relevant facts. This is important because commercial agency, franchise and distribution contracts are often concluded for a long period and their conclusion ("entrance fee") and the performance of the obligations under them frequently imply important investments. A party interested in concluding such a contract often has no way of obtaining the relevant information from any source other than the other party.

C. Relation to Book II

Book II, Chapter 3 contains provisions on information duties at the pre-contractual stage. These duties do not specifically focus on the commercial agency, franchise or distribution situations. Indeed most of them are framed in such terms (e.g. businesses supplying goods or services to consumers) that they would not apply to contracts within the scope of this Chapter. This Article is therefore necessary.

Also relevant are the provisions in II.–3:301 (Negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing), II.–7:201 (Mistake) and II.–7:205 (Fraud).

The present Article provides a specific rule for the pre-contractual duty to inform in commercial agency, franchise and distribution and similar marketing contracts. This rule may be considered as a special instance for these contracts of the general pre-contractual duty to negotiate in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. In the context of the provisions on fraud, paragraph (3) of II.–7:205 (Fraud) states:

> In determining whether good faith and fair dealing required a party to disclose particular information, regard should be had to all the circumstances, including: (a) whether the party had special expertise; (b) the cost to the party of acquiring the relevant information; (c) whether the other party could reasonably acquire the information by other means; and (d) the apparent importance of the information to the other party.

The present pre-contractual duty to inform is based on policy considerations which are closely related to these four factors.

D. Within a reasonable time

The time requirement included in the present provision aims to guarantee that the other party has sufficient time at its disposal in order to ponder on the basis of the information whether or not to enter the contract under consideration. In assessing whether the pre-contractual information is given within a reasonable time criteria such as the circumstances of the case or any applicable usage will fall to be taken into consideration.

E. Information required

The information which is to be given is such information as is sufficient to enable the other party to decide on a reasonably informed basis whether or not to enter into a contract of the type and on the terms under consideration. This means among other things that the information must be correct, complete and transparent. Depending on the circumstances of the case, especially the type of contract and the branch of trade, the types of information which must be given may include information regarding one's own company and experience, intellectual property rights which are involved, particular features of the commercial sector, market conditions, the structure and extent of the network, remuneration and fees and the terms of the contract.

The provision that only such information need be given as is required by good commercial practice is intended to place reasonable bounds on the scope of the information to be supplied. Contracts should not be open to attempts to avoid them on the ground that some item of information which one party considered relevant (perhaps, for example, information about the personal circumstances or political views of the other party) was not supplied.

For franchise contracts IV.E.–4:102 (Pre-contractual information) provides a detailed list of information which the franchisor must give to the franchisee before the conclusion of the contract. That list is mandatory (see paragraph (3) of that Article).

F. Remedies

The sanction for non-compliance is that the contract may be avoidable under II.–7:201 (Mistake). Paragraph (1)(b)(iii) of that Article specifically refers to the situation where one party caused the contract to be concluded in mistake by failing to comply with a pre-contractual information duty. All the ordinary rules on mistake apply, including liability those under II.–7:203 (Adaptation of contract in case of mistake) and II.–7:204 (Liability for loss caused by incorrect information).

NOTES

I. Specific statutory rules concerning pre-contractual information

1. FRENCH, ITALIAN and SPANISH law contain specific statutory rules concerning pre-contractual information in the case of franchising contracts. They are laid down in the FRENCH Loi Doubin (Ccom art. L-330-3 C), art. 8 of the ITALIAN L 129/2004 and in art. 62 para 3 of the SPANISH Statute on Retail Trade (Ley de Ordenación del Comercio Minorista) and art. 3 and 4 of the Royal Decree 2485\1998 respectively. The FRENCH Loi Doubin may also apply to certain types of distribution contracts, in so far as they meet the requirements of Ccom art. L-330-3 (Malaurie & Aynès, no. 839). Under art. 8 of the ITALIAN Act, a contract can be avoided if the other party provided incorrect information. The FRENCH and SPANISH rules do not include any specific private law remedies. Nevertheless, in Spain breach of the relevant pre-contractual information duty implies extra-contractual liability under CC art. 1902 for any loss caused: not only damnum emergens but also lucrum cessans (Domínguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, 2007, p. 591). See further the notes to IV.E.–4:102.

II. General statutory rules concerning pre-contractual information

2. In GREECE and in PORTUGAL the general statutory provisions concerning pre-contractual liability apply (GREECE: arts. 197, 198 AK; PORTUGAL: CC art. 227). For GREEK law it means that the parties must disclose any information that may reasonably be expected to influence the decision of the other party. A failure to do so amounts to a serious ground for termination, except when the contract has been performed without any problems. However, as to franchising the rules concerning the doctrine of abuse of rights (art. 281 AK, see Voulgaris and Georgiadis) may also come into play. Pre-contractual liability is limited to the reliance interest. In some cases a lack of disclosure may give rise to a claim for the annulment of the franchise contract and for damages on the basis of articles 140 et seq. Greek civil code for mistake or on the basis of art. 147 AK for fraud. In other cases a lack of disclosure may give rise to the annulment of the contract on the basis of arts. 178 and 179 AK with regard to acts contrary to bonos mores, but the case law has been restrictive, see CA Patras 150/2000 DEE 8-9/2000, 890. For PORTUGUESE law it implies that the parties must inform each other concerning facts relating to the contract and potential events during the performance (Sinde Monteiro (1989) 355 ff., Menezes Cordeiro (1984) 505).

III. Other sources of an obligation concerning pre-contractual information

3. In other legal systems a pre-contractual obligation to inform follows from good faith. (BELGIUM: Verbraeken & de Schoutheete, no. 147; FRANCE: Fabre-Magnan, 214; GERMANY: § 242 BGB, the closer the relationship, the more intense the pre-contractual obligation to inform Martinek/Semler § 14 nos. 61, 62; ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:228, Asser-Hartkamp 4-II, no. 158, Hesselink, 259; SPAIN, SWEDEN)

4. Under FINNISH law a pre-contractual obligation to inform follows from the doctrine of loyalty. Case law has introduced the pre-contractual obligation to inform in the case of commercial agency contracts (KKO 1993:130, Tolonen (2000) 88, Nysten-Haarala (1998), 126). As to distribution contracts the rules developed with respect to commercial agency may apply by way of analogy (Telaranta (1994) 154). The obligation to give all required information can be derived from the general principle of loyalty (good faith and fair dealing) as well by applying the Commercial Agents Act by way of analogy (KKO 1993:130). Case KKO 1996:27 also dealt with pre-contractual information; however, the issue at stake was whether including an arbitration clause in a franchise contract may be unfair towards the franchisee. According to scholarly opinions the court would have adjusted the contract had there been a grave imbalance between the contracting parties in access to information or had the franchisor given misleading information (Saarnilehto 1997).

5. According to AUSTRIAN case law there is a pre-contractual obligation to inform in the case of franchising contracts (OGH 19. 1. 1989, 7 Ob 695/88).

6. In contrast, under ENGLISH law there is no general duty of disclosure (Keates v. Cadogan (Earl of) (1851) 10 CB 591, 138 ER 234, but only an obligation not to make misrepresentations, Williams v. Natural Life Health Foods Ltd. [1998] 1 WLR 830, Boyle v. Prontaprint, unreported, 26 February 2000, CA; ANC Ltd. v. Clark Goldring & Page Ltd. [2001] BCC 479. SCOTTISH law is similar although giving slightly more recognition than English law to ideas of good faith and culpa in contrahendo (MacQueen & Thomson, paras 2.89-2.96).

Section 2: Obligations of the parties

IV.E.–2:201: Co-operation

The parties to a contract within the scope of this Part of Book IV must collaborate actively and loyally and co-ordinate their respective efforts in order to achieve the objectives of the contract.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Co-operation is essential to commercial agency, franchise and distribution contracts and indeed to most other long-term commercial contracts. Each party heavily depends on the other party's co-operation for attaining its objectives. The obligation spelled out here explicitly recognises that the parties to such contracts are under an intense obligation to co-operate actively and loyally in order to achieve the objectives for which the contract was concluded.

Indeed, many (if not most) of the specific obligations spelled out in this Part may be regarded as special instances of this general intense obligation to co-operate actively and loyally (e.g. specific obligations relating to information, assistance, instructions, supervision, confidentiality et cetera). In addition to these specific rules, this Article makes sure that both parties are, more generally, under this intense obligation to co-operate which may be the source of other specific obligations to be established and further elaborated by the courts and arbitrators.

Although the intensity of the required co-operation may vary among them (it is usually strongest in franchise contracts), the obligation to co-operate in commercial agency, franchise and distribution contracts, and similar contracts establishing and regulating a marketing relationship, is more intense than in other contracts. The general obligation to co-operate in order to give full effect to the contract, which each party to any contract owes to the other according to III.–1:104 (Co-operation), is mainly limited in some contracts (e.g. most sales contracts) to an obligation to allow the other party to perform its obligations and thereby earn the fruits of performance stipulated in the contract, which is similar to the doctrine of mora creditoris in many civil law countries.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Although each party may have a short-term interest in exclusively pursuing its own interests, even at the expense of the other party, in the long term both parties benefit from a steady co-operation where each of them not only takes the other party's interests into account but actively helps the other party to realise its goals. Both parties have an interest in actively demonstrating their commitment in the long term in order to pursue the reciprocal advantages deriving from their co-operation. This Article aims to encourage participation in exchange and to promote reciprocity between the parties. In addition, the Article takes into account the fact that during the course of commercial agency, franchise, distribution contracts and similar marketing relationship contracts contingencies may occur which the parties had not foreseen when they concluded the contract, contingencies which do not necessarily justify the application of III.–1:110 (Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances). It follows from the present Article that the parties should collaborate in overcoming such contingencies and in adapting to the new situation in such a way that the objectives of the contract can be achieved.

C. Relation to general obligation to co-operate

For contracts within the scope of this Part the duty to co-operate which is contained in III.–1:104 (Co-operation) is particularly intense. It is not sufficient for a party to a commercial agency, franchise or distribution contract to passively allow the other party to perform its obligations and thereby earn the fruits of performance stipulated in the contract (see III.–1:104 Comment A). Rather, the parties should collaborate actively and loyally in order to achieve the objectives for which the contract was concluded. In order to avoid any doubt, this Article says so explicitly.

D. Co-operate actively and loyally

In a commercial agency, franchise and distribution contracts, and similar marketing relationship contracts, a party must do more than merely refrain from obstructing the other party's performance. In such contracts each party must collaborate actively and make a serious effort to achieve the objectives for which the contract was concluded. These objectives include, first of all, those that are common but may also include individual objectives.

However, a party is not under an obligation to act contrary to its own interests. In other words, the obligation to co-operate actively and loyally is meant to achieve win-win situations. Moreover, the obligation to co-operate loyally does not turn the contractual relationship into a fiduciary relationship in the sense of the law of trusts.

The obligation to co-operate implies an obligation for principals, franchisors and suppliers to treat their commercial agents, franchisees and distributors equally. Thus, the principal, the franchisor and the supplier must not discriminate against – i.e. make any unjustified distinction between – their commercial agents, franchisees and distributors, neither during the pre-contractual stage nor during the performance of the contract. Similarly, a commercial agent, a franchisee (e.g. in shop corner franchising) or a distributor, who has contracts with more than one principal, franchisor or supplier, must not make any unjustified distinction between them.

NOTES

Obligation to co-operate

1. According to the case law, legal doctrine, standard contracts and codes of conduct in the Member States, the obligation to co-operate is the main obligation of both parties.
2. Under GERMAN, GREEK, ITALIAN, DUTCH and SPANISH law there are no specific rules for marketing relationship contracts in this respect. However, an obligation to co-operate follows from the general principle of good faith under these legal systems. In most legal systems the obligation to co-operate has not been defined clearly. However, it has been accepted that in the case of long-term commercial contracts, such an obligation is more intense than in other contractual relationships.

(GERMANY: Handkommentar-BGB, § 242 BGB no. 14; GREECE: art. 288 AK; ITALY: CC arts. 1175, 1375, Cass. civ., sez. lav., 8-2- 1999, n. 1078, Contratti, 1999, 1019; Cass. civ., sez. I, 20-4-1994, n. 3775, Gius., civ., 1994, I, 2159; NETHERLANDS: Asser-Hartkamp 4-II, no. 307 ff; POLAND: CC art. 760 in the case of commercial agency; SPAIN: Ccom art. 57, Móxica Román , La Ley del Contrato de Agencia (2000), p. 23, in particular concerning commercial agency: art. 9, para 1 (agent) and art. 10, para 1 (principal) LCA, for franchise contracts. However, although the LCA imposes on the agent the obligation of following the instructions of the principal, the limit of that obligation is the independence of the agent (art. 9.2.c LCA).

3. Under FINNISH law the obligation to co-operate was introduced to contract law by legal scholars who were experienced in commercial arbitration. The obligation to co-operate is connected with the general discussion concerning the doctrine of loyalty (Muukkonen (1975), Taxell (1972) 1977, Ämmälä (1994), Häyhä (1991); Mähönen (2000)). The FINNISH doctrine of loyalty corresponds with the principle of good faith and fair dealing. Both district and appellate courts refer to the loyalty principle in their case reports. However, there is only one case in which the Supreme Court has accepted the principle of loyalty according to scholarly opinions (KKO 1993:130).

4. In SWEDISH law there is no general statutory obligation to co-operate with respect to agency, distribution and franchising contracts. However, according to §§ 5(1) and 7(1) HaL both the commercial agent and the principal must act dutifully and in good faith. This probably includes an obligation to co-operate.

5. In ENGLISH general law an obligation to co-operate is imposed where this is necessary in order to give business efficacy to the agreement (The Moorcock (1889) 14 PD 64, Court of Appeal). Beyond this, it is difficult to identify the precise extent of the obligation. However, it has been strongly recognised in employment contracts (Secretary of State for Employment v. Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen (No. 2) [1972] 2 QB 455) which bear some analogy with long-term marketing relationship contracts. Various commentators have argued that co-operative behaviour in long-term contracts maximises returns and should be underpinned by default law, see e.g. Baird (1990) 583. However, as to franchising contracts, express terms providing for ongoing co-operation would appear to be common, see e.g. Adams/Prichard Jones Precedent I, which includes obligations on the part of the franchisor to offer to the franchisee both consulting services (Clause 6.12) and general support (Clause 6.19), and on the part of the franchisee, “to work diligently to protect and promote the interests of the Franchisor”, (Clause 7.12), and, “in all matters to act loyally and faithfully toward the Franchisor”, (Clause 7.20). SCOTTISH law and practice is similar.

IV.E.–2:202: Information during the performance

During the period of the contractual relationship each party must provide the other in due time with all the information which the first party has and the second party needs in order to achieve the objectives of the contract.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Each party must disclose all information in its possession to the other party if this is what the other party needs in order to achieve the objectives of the contract. This obligation includes an obligation to provide the other party with all relevant documentation where this is appropriate. This general obligation is specified further in succeeding Chapters with respect to contracts for commercial agency, franchise and distribution.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Both parties have an interest in being informed concerning facts and developments which are relevant to their performance. It may render their performance easier and more successful. On the other hand, an extensive obligation to inform the other party may be very burdensome and, in any event, very costly. Therefore, the present obligation is limited in two significant respects. First, a party only has to pass on to the other party such information as the first party already has. In other words, parties are not under a duty to investigate in order to be able to inform each other. Second, the obligation is limited to the information which the other party needs in order to achieve the objectives of the contract.

The obligation under this Article may be regarded as based on similar policy considerations as the duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing in performing obligations. See III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing) and Comment B to that Article: "In relationships which last over a period of time (Dauerschuldverhältnisse) such as … agency and distributorship agreements … the concept of good faith has particular significance as a guideline for the parties' behaviour." The obligation under this Article could also be regarded as a specific example of the particularly intense obligation to co-operate in marketing relationship contracts.

C. No duty to investigate

This obligation relates to actual knowledge. A party is only under the obligation to disclose the information which it actually has. A party is not under an obligation to make (possibly expensive) investigations in order to obtain the relevant information. In other words, if a party to a commercial agency, franchise or distribution contract, or similar marketing relationship contract comes across information which the other needs in order to achieve the objectives of the contract, it is under an obligation to pass that information on to the other party; it is not free to keep that information for itself.

D. In due time

The information must be given in due time in order to allow the other party to perform its obligations under the contract and, more generally, to achieve the objectives of the contract. When and how often information should be given depends, among other things, on the contract, the type of information and the other circumstances of the case. In the case of new developments, a party must, in principle, update the information which has been provided within a reasonable period of time in order to allow the other party to adapt to the new situation.

E. No form requirement

There is no general form requirement as to the way in which this information is to be provided. The aim of the Article is merely to oblige parties to communicate.

NOTES

Information to be provided

1. For commercial agency mandatory obligations to inform are laid down in arts 3 1 (b) (commercial agent), 4 2 (a), (b) (principal) and 5 of the Directive, which have been transposed into the national legal systems.
2. As to franchising and distribution contracts, in most legal systems such an obligation can be inferred from the general obligation of good faith or loyalty. (AUSTRIA, FINLAND: KKO 1993:130; GERMANY: § 242 BGB Küstner/Thume, no. 1300, 1302, Martinek/Semler, § 14 nos. 63, 64, § 19 nos. 60-67; ITALY: CC arts. 1175, 1375, concerning distribution contracts see: Cass. 24 March 1999, n. 2788; NETHERLANDS: Asser-Hartkamp 4-II no. 307, Barendrecht & Van Peursem, no. 107; PORTUGAL: Sinde Monteiro (1989) 355 ff., Menezes Cordeiro (1984) 505; SPAIN CC art.1258 and Ccom 57; concerning distribution contracts: Dominguez García, Los contratos de distribución comercial: agencia mercantil y concesión comercial, (1997) 1354 ff). Concerning agency contracts, under SPANISH law the obligation of providing reciprocally the necessary information is established by LCA arts. 9.2b and 10.2b. In ENGLAND, the British Franchising Association states that the owner of the franchise is obliged to provide the other party with "assistance in carrying on the business…in relation to the organisation…training of staff, merchandising, management or otherwise…" (Adams, John N., "Franchising: practice and precedents" para 1.102, 3rd ed., (1990), Butterworths). The operating manual, detailing such information, is an essential part of the franchise agreement.
3. In addition, under FINNISH and GERMAN law the rules on commercial agency are applied by way of analogy to distribution contracts as well (FINLAND: Telaranta (1994) 154, GERMANY: Giesler/Nauschütt, § 5 no. 123, 165, § 8 no. 18, Küstner/Thume, no. 1300; Martinek/Semler, § 14 nos. 63, 64, § 19 nos. 60-67).
4. Concerning franchising contracts, see also the notes to IV.E.– 4:205 and 4:302. Concerning distribution contracts see also the notes to IV.E.– 5:202 and 5:302.
5. A duty to inform during the contract does not exist as such in SCOTTISH law but may be an express or implied term of the contract.

IV.E.–2:203: Confidentiality

(1) A party who receives confidential information from the other must keep such information confidential and must not disclose the information to third parties either during or after the period of the contractual relationship.

(2) A party who receives confidential information from the other must not use such information for purposes other than the objectives of the contract.

(3) Any information which a party already possessed or which has been disclosed to the general public, and any information which must necessarily be disclosed to customers as a result of the operation of the business is not regarded as confidential information for this purpose.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Both parties to a commercial agency, distribution, franchise contract or other marketing relationship contract should treat any sensitive information they receive from the other party as confidential. This is especially true where key elements in the exploitation of the business (know-how, financial data et cetera) are disclosed, which often happens especially in franchise contracts. These are business values which are essential to the franchisor's (or supplier's) business concept and which must be kept within the network and saved from competitors.

However, not all information has to be considered as confidential: the information which a party already had or which was already publicly known when this party received it, and any information which is necessarily disclosed to customers when running the business is not to be treated as confidential.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This rule protects the reasonable interest of a party (usually the franchisor, the principal or the supplier) and of the other members of the network in preventing its business method and other secrets from ending up in the hands of competitors.

The policy considerations behind the present rule are similar to those behind II.–3:302 (Breach of confidentiality) which applies only to pre-contractual information received from the other party in the course of negotiations. They are also similar to those behind the general duty of good faith and fair dealing under III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing) and the obligation to co-operate actively and loyally under IV.E.–2:201 (Co-operation).

C. Protection of know-how

In franchise contracts, throughout the duration of the contract, the franchisor must provide the franchisee with the know-how which is necessary to operate the franchise business (IV.E.–4:202 (Know-how)). Moreover, in some other marketing relationship contracts, e.g. in certain specific types of distribution, a similar obligation may follow from the contract. Where one party is under such an obligation to share its know-how with the other, the obligation of confidentiality is of specific importance since it is the only way to guarantee that the know-how, as a value essential and intrinsic to the development of the franchisor's method of business, remains in the hands of the franchisor and does not benefit competitors.

D. Confidential information

What kind of information is confidential largely depends on the circumstances of the case. Such types of information may include product information, technology, market research, purchase price lists, customers' details et cetera. It is not a necessary requirement that the information should be sophisticated or complex. Information known by the public can never be confidential.

Illustration 1
Franchisor A runs a franchise chain of travel agencies and provides its franchisees with know-how concerning the marketing of holidays to students. This knowledge is not generally known. Therefore, it is to be regarded as confidential information.

Illustration 2
Franchisor A runs a franchise network of travel agencies and provides its franchisees with know-how concerning a specific booking system. Within the travel business this booking system is used generally. Since this knowledge is generally known in this business, it is not to be regarded as confidential information.

E. Contractual and post-contractual

Confidential information is usually a business value which allows the successful exploitation of a business formula or commercialisation of the principal's, the franchisor's, or the distributor's products and which differentiates it from its competitors. If the information falls into the competitor's hands, it loses its value. Therefore, a party is required not to disclose the confidential information during, or after the termination, of the contractual relationship.

F. Information already public

All the information which a party already had in its possession, or which was already known to the public when the party received it, and any information which is necessarily disclosed to customers when properly running the business is not to be treated as confidential (Paragraph 3).

NOTES

I. Confidentiality during the period of the contract

1. In most legal systems there is a confidentiality obligation for the parties in commercial agency, franchising and distribution contracts during the period of the contract. However, the sources of this obligation differ from country to country.
2. In SPANISH law such an obligation for the franchisee is laid down in a statutory provision (art. 4 RD 2485/1998) although according to the legal text, the franchisee has to be explicitly required by the franchisor to keep the information confidential. Moreover, the majority of legal authors maintain that due to the principle of good faith a similar obligation of confidentiality is imposed on the franchisor though art. 4 RD does not explicitly require this (see for example: Hernando Giménez, El contrato de franquicia de empresa, 2000, p. 104). This duty is also imposed by art 76 of the Patent Law. The violation of the confidentiality obligation and the disclosure of industrial secrets is a transgression contemplated in art. 13 of the Disloyal Competition Law, although to be considered as disloyal conduct it has to be performed with either animus lucrandi or animus nocendi.

3. According to other legal systems such an obligation is deduced from the doctrine of good faith. With respect to commercial agency contracts, it follows from good faith under BELGIAN, SPANISH and SWEDISH law (BELGIUM: Verbraeken & Schoutheete, no. 87; SPAIN arts. 9, 10 LCA; SWEDEN §§ 5(1) and 7(1) of the HaL, § 7 KommL).

4. As to franchise contracts, under GREEK law such an obligation follows from good faith (art. 288 AK). In addition, arts. 17 and 18 of the GREEK Act 146/1914 on unfair competition apply. They protect the franchisor against disclosure or unfair use (misuse) of the information that a franchisor will customarily disclose to a franchisee. According to SWEDISH law the contract will always contain provisions concerning confidentiality. Such clauses apply, for instance, to the content of the contract and manuals, but not, for instance, to general sales tactics etc. (Sohlberg, 57 ff).

5. With respect to franchise and distribution contracts, it follows from good faith according to DUTCH law (Barendrecht & Van Peursem, no. 173) and SPANISH law.

6. In GERMANY, § 86 I HGB (Interessenwahrnehmungspflicht) prohibits the disclosure of business secrets to third parties (Koller/Roth/Morck, § 86 HGB nos. 5, 10; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 86 HGB no. 57). This rule is applied by way of analogy to franchise and distribution contracts. (Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, Vor § 84 HGB nos. 16, 21, § 90 HGB no. 6).

7. Under ENGLISH law an obligation of confidentiality follows from general contract law. According to a general equitable principle a recipient of information which it knows or ought to know is confidential should not take unfair advantage of it, Seager v. Copydex Ltd. (No. 1) [1967] 1 WLR 923. SCOTTISH law also has a general principle of confidentiality where a reasonable person should in all the circumstances recognise that information received should remain confidential (Lord Advocate v Scotsman Publications 1989 SLT 705); the obligation may be imposed by contract (e.g. Levin v Farmers Supply Association of Scotland 1973 SLT (Notes) 43).

II. Post-contractual obligation

8. Under GERMAN law this obligation results from § 90 HGB. However, this obligation is less strict than the one during the contractual period, since "all circumstances of the professional standards of a prudent businessman" must be considered (see § 90 HGB; Koller/Roth/Morck, § 90 HGB no. 2). Both § 86 I and § 90 HGB are applied by way of analogy to franchisees and distributors (Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, Vor § 84 HGB nos. 16, 21; § 90 HGB no. 6).

9. The obligation of the principal not to disclose secrets of the commercial agent in the contractual and in the post-contractual period rests on the general idea of § 86 a HGB (Treuepflicht) and good faith (§ 242 BGB, Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 86 a HGB nos. 45, 46). The same is true for the franchisor and the supplier (Koller/Roth/Morck, Vor § 84 HGB nos. 10, 11; Martinek/Semler, § 19 nos. 60-63).

10. In SPAIN, in the case of franchise contracts, the confidentiality obligation is generic and it includes all relevant information that affects the interest of the parties and that has been collected in pursuance of the contractual relationship. This obligation remains even when the contract is terminated, due to the principle of good faith (Domínguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p.600).

III. Information already disclosed to the public

11. According to ENGLISH, SCOTTISH and GERMAN law any information that is already available to the public is not confidential (ENGLAND: Att.-Gen. v. Guardian Newspapers (No. 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, 285, House of Lords; SCOTLAND: Stair Memorial Encyclopaedia vol. 18 para 1461; GERMANY: Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 90 HGB nos. 9-10). Also DUTCH authors have defended this (Barendrecht & Van Peursem, no. 172).

Section 3: Termination of contractual relationship

IV.E.–2:301: Contract for a definite period

A party is free not to renew a contract for a definite period. If a party has given notice in due time that it wishes to renew the contract, the contract will be renewed for an indefinite period unless the other party gives that party notice, not later than a reasonable time before the expiry of the contract period, that it is not to be renewed.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article provides a rule for a specific situation which can arise at or towards the end of a contract for a definite period. The starting point, which does not need to be stated, is that the contractual relationship will come to an end on the expiry of the definite period.

Parties are free not to renew a contract for a definite period of time after the expiry of its term. However, if one party gives notice to the other in sufficient time that it wishes to renew the contract, the latter party, if it wishes not to renew the contract, has to respond not later than a reasonable time before the end of the contract period. If it fails to respond by that time, the contract will be renewed for an indefinite period.

A contract concluded for a definite period of time would normally end upon the expiry of the period. However, when the parties actually continue performing the contract after the agreed term has expired, an agreement that was concluded for a fixed term does not come to an end upon the expiry of the fixed term. Instead, the contract becomes a contract for an indefinite duration, subject to the same conditions. This is the effect of the general rule in III.–1:111 (Tacit prolongation).

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

In principle, both parties have an interest in the binding force of their contract. In particular, it is in their interest to be certain that it will last for the period which they have agreed upon. It allows them to determine proper and rational business planning and to evaluate what investments they should make. However, during the course of the performance their interests may change. One party may wish to abandon the contract, e.g. because another contract is more favourable. If the other party agrees there is no problem (consensual ending of the contract) but the other party will usually object. In this rule the interest in legal certainty is upheld by guaranteeing the binding force of a contract for the term which the parties have agreed upon. If a party wishes to retain the right to end the contract at any time it should either provide for that in the contract or conclude a contract for an indefinite period (see IV.E.–2:302 (Contract for an indefinite period)).

The requirement to provide notice of non-renewal – when the other party has given sufficient notice that it wishes to renew the contract – even though a fixed duration for the contract was agreed upon, is based on the notion that, sometimes, the definite period may be very long and that the party giving notice of a wish to renew may build up hope that the contract will be renewed and will act accordingly. Therefore, a requirement of a counter-notice is not unreasonable. It is not an onerous requirement. The party intending not to renew does not have to give notice of non-renewal in any particular form. The only thing it has to do is to respond in such a way as to indicate that it does not wish to renew. Such a limited obligation to respond to a notice by the other party is not very burdensome and may be expected from a party under an intense general obligation to co-operate. The effect of not giving a timely counter-notice is that the contract will be renewed for an indefinite period. This does not, of course, mean that the parties are bound to each other forever. As in any contract for an indefinite period, either party has the right to unilaterally end the contractual relationship by giving notice (IV.E.–2:302 (Contract for an indefinite period)).

C. Definite period

Parties may have various reasons for concluding a contract for a definite period. One such reason is that the contract cannot be ended unilaterally during the period which the parties have agreed upon. Another reason may be the applicability of other rules. For example, "non-compete obligations" benefit from the block-exemption, and are therefore presumed to be valid from an EC competition law perspective, if they do not exceed a period of five years (EC Regulation 2790/1999, Article 5(a)). As a result, many distribution and franchise contracts are concluded for a period of five years.

D. Notice of renewal and response to non-renewal

A proposal for renewal and a notice by the other party of its decision not to renew may be given by any means appropriate in the circumstances and becomes effective when it reaches the addressee (I.–1:109 (Notice) paragraphs (1) and (3).

A notice by a party who wishes to renew the contract must be given in due time; the responding notice by the other party of its decision not to renew must be given within a reasonable time before the expiry of the contract. What constitutes due time and a reasonable time respectively depends on the circumstances of the case. Obviously, the second period depends, in part, on the first.

F. Continued performance: a new contract for an indefinite period subject to the old conditions

The effect of the general rule in III.–1:111 (Tacit prolongation) is that in the case of continued performance the contract becomes a contract for an indefinite period. But on what conditions? In most cases the same basic obligations on the part of the parties will continue, unless the way in which the parties continue to perform the obligations under the contract shows otherwise. Other (ancillary) obligations, the prolongation of which is no longer appropriate, may be dispensed with at the time of the expiry of the term. Ultimately, this is a matter of interpretation to be determined by the court.

Obviously, as a result of continued performance the parties are not bound to each other forever. As in any contract for an indefinite period, either party has the right to unilaterally end the contractual relationship by giving notice (IV.E.–2:302 (Contract for an indefinite period)).

NOTES

I. No right to end a contract for a definite period unilaterally

1. According to a large majority of the legal systems a contract for a definite period of time cannot be ended prior to the expiry of the period, unless parties have agreed otherwise. In some countries there is an exception: i. e. the possibility to end a contract for a definite period immediately in the case of an urgent and important reason. (POLAND: CC art. 764 II)

2. Under the following legal systems it is not possible to end a contract for a definite period unilaterally, unless the parties have agreed otherwise: ENGLISH law (Bowstead & Reynolds §10-042), FINNISH law (Hemmo (1997) II 370*)*, FRENCH law: Fabre-Magnan, 512; GERMAN law § 620 I BGB (Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 HGB no. 9), GREEK law, DUTCH law as to commercial agency CC arts. 7:437, 7:438, concerning distribution see HR 21-10-1988, NJ 1990, 439; HR 10-8-1994, NJ 1994, 688. SCOTTISH law (Gloag & Henderson para 3.41). In the PORTUGUESE law as to commercial agency this rule is included in art. 26 DL 178/86 and CC art. 1051 (cf. Pinto Monteiro (1998) 94), which will be applied by way of analogy to franchise and distribution contracts (Pinto Monteiro (2002) 133; Pestana de Vasconcelos (2000) 75; Ribeiro (2001) 249). In SPANISH law, a contract clause providing for unilateral termination in a contract for a definite period is invalid according to CC art. 1115 and 1256. The party which intends to terminate will be liable for non performance, unless the other party has failed to perform previously or there is an important reason (Domínguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 608). Regarding commercial agency, the LCA art. 26 provides that there is a reason for unilateral termination only in case of a total or partial non-performance by the other party or when the other party is declared insolvent.

3. However, under SWEDISH law contracts concluded for a definite period may be ended unilaterally prematurely. Nevertheless, in such a case the party ending the contract will be liable for damages (KommL § 51 para 2). Concerning distribution, the EÅ 93 establishes a contractual period of two years, which is prolonged by one year unless notice is given six months before the expiry of the contract. In franchise contracts, the contract is normally concluded for a determined period of time, in most cases three or five years, (Sohlberg, 67). The most common solution, however, is that the contract is concluded for a definite period of time, but with an additional possibility to end the contract, provided a notice has been given within a certain notice period, (SOU 1986:17, 213). The most common length for such a notice period is six or twelve months, (SOU 1986:17, 72).

II. Notices of non-renewal and of renewal

4. According to ITALIAN law a party must notify the other party that it does not want to renew the contract provided it concerns a commercial agency contract that falls within the scope of the collective economic agreements (Accordi Economici Collettivi, AEC) of 2002 concerning agency. When the period of contract lasts for more than six months, the principal has to communicate to the agent "at least 60 days before the expiry of the term, his possible readiness to renew or prorogue the mandate". However, non-observance of this provision does not affect the renewal of the contract. It may only be a source of liability for damages (Baldi (2001) 226). The SWEDISH model contract concerning distribution EA 93 includes a similar obligation. The EA 93 concerns a contract for a definite period of two years, which is prolonged by one year at a time unless notice is given six months before the expiry of the contract.

5. Under the other legal systems there are no specific obligations to inform the other party of a possible renewal of a contract for a determinate period. However, depending on the circumstances, such obligations may follow, in some systems, from the general obligation of good faith.

III. Tacit prolongation by continued performance

6. If parties continue to perform a contract for a definite period after the expiry of the contract, in the majority of the legal systems the contract will be converted into a contract for an indefinite period.

7. For commercial agency, this rule is laid down in specific statutory provisions (art. 14 Directive, § 20 of the AUSTRIAN HVertrG, art. 4 of the BELGIAN Handelsagentuurovereenkomstenwet, reg. 14 of the UK Regulations; art. L. 134-11 of the FRENCH Ccom, art. 8 para 2 of the GREEK Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991, art. 1750 para 1 of the ITALIAN CC, art. 7:436 of the DUTCH CC, art. 764 of the POLISH CC, art. 27/2 of the PORTUGUESE DL 178/86, art. 24 para 2 of the SPANISH LCA, § 25(2) of the SWEDISH HaL).

8. This statutory rule is applied by way of analogy to franchise contracts under PORTUGUESE law and probably under SWEDISH law. Under SPANISH law the rule is not clear. Some authors defend the application of the commercial agency rule by way of analogy to franchising as well (García Herrera (1995), Echebarría Sáenz, El contrato de franquicia, 1995, p.513), whereas others argue that the contract will be renewed as a definite contract for the period initially agreed upon (Hernando Giménez, 2000) p. 398). Also under GREEK law it is not clear whether the agency rule may apply by way of analogy to franchise contracts.

9. This statutory rule is applied by way of analogy to distribution contracts (PORTUGAL, SPAIN and, most likely, SWEDEN). In the NETHERLANDS authors differ as to whether the commercial agency rule is applied to distribution contracts by way of analogy (Barendrecht & Van Peursem, 145-146, Van de Paverd, 78). Also under GREEK law it is not clear whether this rule may apply by way of analogy to distribution contracts.

10. In SCOTTISH law the notion of ‘tacit relocation’, under which continuing to perform a lapsed contract renews it for the same period as the previous contract, is applicable to contracts of lease, partnership and certain forms of mandate or employment. There is no authority for extending it beyond these contracts (Gloag & Henderson para 3.41) although there is no reason on principle why it should not be.

IV.E.–2:302: Contract for an indefinite period

(1) Either party to a contract for an indefinite period may terminate the contractual relationship by giving notice to the other.

(2) If the notice provides for termination after a period of reasonable length no damages are payable under IV.E.–2:303 (Damages for termination with inadequate notice). If the notice provides for immediate termination or termination after a period which is not of reasonable length damages are payable under that Article.

(3) Whether a period of notice is of reasonable length depends, among other factors, on:

(a) the time the contractual relationship has lasted;
(b) reasonable investments made;
(c) the time it will take to find a reasonable alternative; and
(d) usages.

(4) A period of notice of one month for each year during which the contractual relationship has lasted, with a maximum of 36 months, is presumed to be reasonable.

(5) The period of notice for the principal, the franchisor or the supplier is to be no shorter than one month for the first year, two months for the second, three months for the third, four months for the fourth, five months for the fifth and six months for the sixth and subsequent years during which the contractual relationship has lasted. Parties may not exclude the application of this provision or derogate from or vary its effects.

(6) Agreements on longer periods than those laid down in paragraphs (4) and (5) are valid provided that the agreed period to be observed by the principal, franchisor or supplier is no shorter than that to be observed by the commercial agent, the franchisee or the distributor.

(7) In relation to contracts within the scope of this Part, the rules in this Article replace those in paragraph (2) of III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice). Paragraph (3) of that Article governs the effects of termination.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

A contract is for an indefinite period either when it does not contain any specific duration or when it explicitly states that it is for an indefinite period. The present rule provides that in either case the contractual relationship can be terminated unilaterally by giving notice. In other words, each party has ‘a right to end’ the relationship. A reasonable period of notice is not a requirement for the effective termination of the relationship. However, if the period of notice is not reasonable compensation is payable under the following Article.

Paragraph (3) gives guidance to the parties and the courts in establishing what would be a reasonable period of notice in the circumstances of a particular case. Although the list indicates the factors which are most likely to be of relevance, it is not meant to be exhaustive: depending on the circumstances of the case other factors may be relevant for establishing what period of notice will be reasonable. This Article is based on the assumption that it is impossible to indicate only one or two factors which will be decisive in all cases. The possible uncertainty with regard to the relative weight of each of the factors is mitigated by the presumption indicated in paragraph (4).

For a principal, a franchisor or a supplier who wants to end the contractual relationship there is a minimum period of notice: one month for the first year, two months for the second, three months for the third, four months for the fourth, five months for the fifth and six months for the sixth and subsequent years. This is a mandatory rule; parties may not derogate from this provision (paragraph (5)).

Of course, the parties are free to agree on longer periods of notice than the ones provided for in paragraphs (4) and (5). However, if they do so the agreed period to be observed by the principal, franchisor or supplier may not be shorter than the one to be observed by the commercial agent, the franchisee or the distributor (paragraph (6)).

Paragraph (7) clarifies the relationship with the general rules on termination by notice in Book III. The provisions of the present Article on reasonable periods replace the provisions in III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) but the general provisions in paragraph (3) of that Article govern the restitutionary and other effects of termination.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

On the one hand, there is the interest of the party who wishes to end the relationship which under the contract is to last for an indefinite period. It may wish to do so for various reasons. For example, it may wish to end its activity in this particular geographical area, or it may have found another agent, franchisee or distributor whom it expects to be more effective. In all these cases, without this provision the party who no longer wishes to continue the contractual relationship would nevertheless be linked to the other until the end of time, unless the other party agrees to a termination.

On the other hand, the other party usually has no interest in the ending of the relationship. On the contrary, especially when the performance of the obligations under this contract is its main activity, the contract may be the very basis of its economic existence. Moreover, this party may have made important investments which will only see a return after a period of many years. Also, it may be very difficult for this party to find an equally satisfactory alternative. Therefore, this party may be economically very dependant on the continuation of the contractual relationship.

In this rule these interests are balanced in the following way. A party who wishes to terminate a contractual relationship for an indefinite period will succeed: the notice of termination will be effective. However, the other party's interest in continuing the contractual relationship for a reasonable period is protected, albeit in a monetary way. A party who terminates the relationship without giving reasonable notice will be liable to compensate the other for the loss sustained by not getting a reasonable notice (see IV.E.–2:303 (Damages for termination with inadequate notice)).

This rule not only balances the interests of the parties; it is also in the general interest. First, by establishing that a party has a right to terminate unilaterally it provides legal certainty which diminishes litigation. Secondly, it is economically efficient: if a party (e.g. a franchisor) can derive a greater benefit from a contract with another party (e.g. a new franchisee) than it costs to perform the new contract and to properly compensate the aggrieved party (the first franchisee), then termination creates a surplus, since at least one party is better off without anyone being worse off.

The period of notice (and the compensation in lieu of this) is meant to safeguard the interests of the party confronted with unilateral termination by its counterpart. Therefore, the factors mentioned in paragraph (3) mainly focus on that party's position. However, this does not mean that in establishing what notice period would be reasonable in the circumstances, only the interests of the aggrieved party should be taken into account. Not only can the facts of the case relating to each of the factors point to a shorter period of notice (e.g. the absence of investments by the aggrieved party, of a post-contractual competition clause, of difficulties in finding an alternative etc.), but also in the case of facts which point towards a longer period, these factors must be weighed against the interest of the party which wishes to end the relationship.

C. Relation to other provisions

The rules in this Article replace the rule contained in III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (2). The scheme is different. Under III.–1:109(2) a reasonable period is a requirement for effective termination. Under the present Article a reasonable period is a requirement only for the avoidance of liability for compensation. The default rules on what is a reasonable period also differ. However, the rules in III.–1:109 paragraph (3) on the effects of termination do apply for the purposes of the present Article. That means that where the parties do not regulate the effects of termination, then:

> (a) it has prospective effect only and does not affect any right to damages, or a stipulated payment, for non-performance of any obligation performance of which was due before termination;
> (b) it does not affect any provision for the settlement of disputes or any other provision which is to operate even after termination; and
> (c) in the case of a contractual obligation or relationship any restitutionary effects are regulated by the rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) with appropriate adaptations.

The general provisions on notice in I.–1:109 (Notice) apply. So notice may be given by any means appropriate in the circumstances (paragraph (2)) and becomes effective when it reaches the addressee (paragraph (3)).

D. No "good reason" required for terminating the relationship

This rule does not subject a party's right to end the relationship to an evaluation of the appropriateness of its reasons. Even where the party who gives notice has no good reason the notice is nevertheless effective.

E. Reasonableness of the period of notice

In assessing what is reasonable, the nature and purpose of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usage and practices of the trade or profession involved should be taken into account.

The list in paragraph (3) of specific factors which may play a role in assessing whether a reasonable period of notice was provided, is not meant to be exhaustive. This means that other factors may also determine what period of notice is reasonable in the circumstances. Conversely, not all these factors play a role in each case. Moreover, not all factors have the same weight in each case. All this remains a matter for the court to consider.

The time the contractual relationship has lasted. In most cases the period during which the contract has lasted will be an important factor. Normally, the longer the contractual relationship has lasted the more a party becomes dependent on it and the more difficult it will be to adapt to a new situation and, as a consequence, the greater its damage in the case of unilateral termination by the other party.

The importance of this factor is reflected in the fact that the minimum notice period for the principal, the franchisor or the supplier in paragraph (5) increases with each year during which the contractual relationship has lasted.

However, although in most cases the assumption is that the longer the relationship has lasted the longer the notice period must be, this factor may, in certain circumstances, also point in the opposite direction. If the contractual relationship has lasted for a long time, in some cases this may have been sufficient for the parties to fully recover their investments. Therefore, this factor may also point to a shorter period of notice.

Reasonable investments made. Frequently, unilateral termination will occur at a moment when a party has not yet seen a return on all the investments which it has made for the purposes of the contract. Unless it is protected by a rather long period of notice which allows it to amortise its investments (or compensated by damages in lieu thereof) it may be confronted with extensive losses. Conversely, if the aggrieved party has not made any important investments this may be a reason to accept a rather short notice period. Therefore, the investments made by the aggrieved party will usually play an important role in assessing the length of a reasonable notice period.

However, not all investments made by the aggrieved party should be taken into account, but only those investments which were reasonable in the circumstances; excessive investments are at a party's own risk. Moreover, in principle only specific investments should be taken into account. General investments, for example investments in a generic showroom which can be sold or let or sublet should in principle not be taken into account.

On the other hand, however, recovery is not limited to investments induced or even requested by the other party. In principle, all reasonable investments may be taken into account.

In principle, in the present system there is no room for complementary damages (i.e. in addition to damages in lieu of the notice period) for the recovery of damages due to useless investments not fully amortised by the notice period, as some European systems are familiar with. Under the present system, such investments are always covered by the notice period (and the damages in lieu thereof). This may in some cases lead to a very long period of notice of more than one year being required if liability for damages is to be avoided.

Within this system, however, there is a possibility that the aggrieved party will be additionally entitled to a goodwill indemnity in accordance with IV.E.–2:305 (Indemnity for goodwill).

The time it will take to find a reasonable alternative. An important function of the period of notice is to allow the aggrieved party to adapt to the new situation, especially to find an alternative, either a new principal, franchisor or supplier, or to commence a different economic activity. The easier it is for this party to find an acceptable alternative, the shorter the period of notice can be. What counts is a reasonable alternative: it does not necessarily have to provide the same benefits or be exactly in the same trading sector or in the same place.

Here post-contractual non-competition clauses may be of relevance. If the contract contains a valid clause which restrains post-contractual competition, it may be more difficult for the aggrieved party to find an alternative. Consequently, in such a case the reasonable period of notice should in principle be longer. However, to the extent that the aggrieved party's difficulty in finding an alternative economic activity has already been compensated by the compensation which is due under the contract or under the law relating to post-contractual non-competition clauses, that difficulty should again be taken into account here. Consequently, the reasonable notice period may be shorter (and the damages in lieu thereof lower).

Usages. Obviously, the reasonableness of the notice period may vary according to the type of contract (commercial agency, franchise, distribution) and the sector of the trade (e.g. within distribution: beer, cars, petrol). Especially the presence of usages in a particular trade may be of relevance in establishing the reasonableness of a notice. Such usages may sometimes be inferred from codes of conduct, although much depends on the persons and organisations involved in drafting these codes (e.g. only franchisors).

However, on the other hand, there is no presumption that periods of notice will be generally longer for one type of contract than for another, as is the case in some European jurisdictions. On the contrary, the minimum notice periods for the principal, the supplier and the franchisor provided for in paragraph (5) are the same for all contracts concerned.

More generally, although usages may play a role in determining what is reasonable, they will not supersede the reasonableness test. In other words: any unreasonable usage (which may be the result of a monopoly or oligopoly leading to structurally unequal bargaining power) should be disregarded, unless the parties have explicitly agreed otherwise.

F. Presumption of reasonableness

Paragraph (4) contains a presumption that a notice period of one month for each year during which the contractual relationship has lasted, with a maximum of 36 months, is reasonable.

This presumption is rebuttable. The aggrieved party may prove that the presumably reasonable period (including the maximum of three years) is unreasonably short in the circumstances. Conversely, the party which has ended the relationship may prove that the presumed period is unreasonably long.

G. Minimum period

For the principal, the franchisor or the supplier who wishes to end the contractual relationship there is a minimum period of notice (see paragraph (5)): the period is to be no less than one month for the first year, two months for the second, three months for the third, four months for the fourth, five months for the fifth and six months for the sixth and subsequent years during which the contract has lasted. Parties may not derogate from this provision.

H. Agreed longer periods

If the parties agree on longer notice periods than those laid down in paragraphs (3) and (4) then the agreed period to be observed by the principal, franchisor or supplier must be no shorter than that to be observed by the commercial agent, the franchisee or the distributor. In other words, the parties are free to agree on longer notice periods than the ones which are considered to be reasonable. However, they may not do so exclusively for the benefit of the principal, franchisor or supplier. To the extent that they nevertheless do so, such an agreement is invalid.

I. Character of the rule

This is a default rule; the parties are free to agree otherwise. However, the minimum period of notice contained in paragraph (5) is mandatory; any agreement on a shorter period by the parties remains without effect. Moreover, paragraph (6) is also mandatory: the parties may not derogate from this provision.

NOTES

I. Right to terminate (general)

1. Under all legal systems either party may end a commercial agency, franchise or distributorship, provided that a notice has been given.
2. For commercial agency a rule to this effect is laid down in statutory provisions based on art. 15(1) of the Directive. (Art. 15(1) of the Directive: "Where an agency contract is concluded for an indefinite period either party may terminate it by notice."). See: AUSTRIA: § 21(2) of the HVertrG; BELGIUM: art. 18 § 1 Handelsagentuurwet; FINLAND: art. 23 of the Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE: Ccom art. L. 134-11; GERMANY: § 89 I HGB; GREECE: art. 8 Law on Commercial agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1750; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7: 437; POLAND: CC art. 764 I; PORTUGAL: art. 178/86; SPAIN: art. 24(1) 25.1 LCA; SWEDEN: § 24(2) HaL.; UK: Commercial Agents Regulations 1993 reg. 15.
3. As to franchise and distribution contracts under GERMAN law, the rule concerning commercial agency applies by way of analogy (Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 HGB no. 6). However, under GREEK and PORTUGUESE law the rules concerning commercial agency apply by way of analogy only to distribution contracts (Pinto Monteiro (2002) 129; Menezes Cordeiro (2001) 513; Ribeiro (2001) 241; Pestana de Vasconcelos (2000) 80; STJ 18/10/1994, BMJ 451 (1995) at 445; STJ 23/09/1997, www.dgsi.pt; STJ 16/05/1996, BMJ 468 (1997) at 428; STJ 4/05/1992, BMJ 427 (1993) at 524).
4. In BELGIAN law a rule to the effect of the present Article is laid down in art. 2 of the Alleenverkoopwet, which applies to distribution contracts.
5. As to franchise and distribution contracts under FRENCH and SPANISH law with respect to a distribution contract either party may end the relationship unilaterally, provided a notice period is observed and there is no abuse of the right (FRANCE: Ccom art. L. 442-6 I, Leloup, no. 2065 et seq.). In Spain the right to terminate unilaterally is generally admitted in every contract for an indefinite period (Domínguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 606).

6. However, as to franchise and distribution contracts under DUTCH law the point of departure is that the contractual relationships cannot be ended. However, based on good faith there may be a right to terminate (CC art. 6:248, Asser-Hartkamp 4-II, no. 310 ff.). Whether a notice period must be observed and, if so, its length depends on the requirements of good faith.

7. Under SCOTTISH law the general principle of contract law is that a contract of indefinite duration may be terminated by reasonable notice (McBryde para. 9.16).

II. Fixed notice period

8. As to commercial agency contracts art. 15(2) of the Directive includes a fixed minimum mandatory notice period. (Art. 15(2) of the Directive: "The period of notice shall be one month for the first year of the contract, two months for the second year commenced, and three months for the third year commenced and subsequent years. The parties may not agree on shorter periods of notice.") However, the Directive leaves it to the Member States to include a minimum mandatory fixed notice period for the fourth, fifth, sixth and subsequent years of the contract as well. (Art. 15(3): "Member States may fix the period of notice at four months for the fourth year of the contract, five months for the fifth year and six months for the sixth and subsequent years. They may decide that the parties may not agree to shorter periods.")

9. The following countries include a fixed mandatory minimum notice period in their legal systems for the first 6 years of the commercial agency: AUSTRIA: § 21 of the HVertrG; BELGIUM: art. 18 Handelsagentuurwet; FINLAND: art. 23 of the Act on Commercial Agents; GREECE: art. 8 Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1750 III; SWEDEN: § 24(2) HaL.

10. In SPAIN the LCA art. 25.2 in the framework of a commercial agency establishes a minimum notice period of one month for every year that the contractual relationship has lasted. Nevertheless, this minimum notice period will never exceed six months. If the relationship has not lasted for a year, the minimum notice period is fixed at one month.

11. GERMAN law differs in the sense that the notice period is one month for the first year, two months for the second year, three months for three to five years and six months for contractual relationships which lasted more than five years (§ 89 I HGB).

12. THE UK, FRENCH, DUTCH, POLISH and PORTUGUESE laws have opted for art. 15(2) of the Directive. The minimum notice period for both parties is three months for contractual relationships which lasted for three years and longer (UK: Reg. 15(2); FRANCE: Ccom art. L. 134-11; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:437 II; POLAND: CC art. 764 I; PORTUGAL: art. 28(1) DL 178/86)

13. These minimum rules concerning commercial agency are applied by way of analogy to franchise and distribution contracts under GERMAN law (Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 HGB no. 6). They apply to distribution contracts by way of analogy under GREEK and PORTUGUESE law (Pinto Monteiro (2002) 129; Menezes Cordeiro (2001) 513; Ribeiro (2001) 241; Pestana de Vasconcelos (2000) 80; STJ 18/10/1994, BMJ 451 (1995) at 445; STJ 23/09/1997, www.dgsi.pt; STJ 16/05/1996, BMJ 468 (1997) at 428; STJ 4/05/1992, BMJ 427 (1993) at 524).

III. Reasonable notice period

14. In a number of countries, franchises or distributorships can be ended unilaterally by giving reasonable notice. (art. 2 of the BELGIAN Alleenverkoopwet; FINNISH law Cf. KKO 1982 II 1; under SPANISH law the decisions rendered with respect to distribution contracts can be applied by way of analogy to franchising (STS 11 February 1984 RJ 1984\646, STS 2 December 1992 RJ 1992\9998, STS 23 July 1993 RJ 1993\6280, STS 24 February 1993, RJ 1993\1298; STS 25 January 1996, RJ 1996\319). There are no specific rules about the notice period in franchises or distributorships; therefore, the general principles of good faith must be applied. A period of notice is reasonable when the other party may avoid any harm as a result of the unilateral decision to terminate (SAP Asturias 13 November 1998, AC 1998\2234).

15. Under FRENCH law with respect to franchise and distribution contracts the notice period to be observed depends on the length of the contract concerned and commercial usages (Ccom art. L. 442-6 I 5). In addition, if the contract involves the distribution of goods under a trademark the notice period should be doubled (Ccom art. L. 442-6 I 5).

16. Under DUTCH law a reasonable notice period must be observed with respect to franchising and distribution contracts, which follows from case law (HR 23-12-1994, NJ 1995, 263; HR 21-4-1995, NJ 1995, 437.)

IV. Minimum notice period for the principal, franchisor or supplier

17. According to Art. 15(4) of the Directive the notice period which the principal must observe is not allowed to be shorter than the one observed by the commercial agent if parties agree upon longer notice periods than the minimum notice periods provided for in the Directive. (Art. 15(4) of the Directive: "If the parties agree on longer periods than those laid down in Paras 2 and 3, the period of notice to be observed by the principal must not be shorter than that to be observed by the commercial agent."). Concerning commercial agency a similar rule is included in the following legal systems: (AUSTRIA: § 21(3) HVertrG; BELGIUM: art. 18 § 1 Handelsagentuurovereenkomstenwet; UK: Reg. 15(3); FRANCE: Ccom art. L. 134-11; GERMANY: § 89 II HGB; GREECE: art. 8 Law on Commercial agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1750; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:437(2); POLAND: CC art. 764 I § 2; PORTUGAL: art. 28(1) DL 178/86); SPAIN art. 25(3) LCA.)

18. As to distribution contracts under FINNISH law the notice period must be of such length that it allows the distributor to amortise investments. If a notice period does not allow the distributor to do so, the notice period is considered to be unreasonable and can be assimilated into a reasonable one according to art. 36 of the Contracts Act. The same applies to franchise contracts.

19. With respect to franchise and distribution contracts no such rule has been found in the other legal systems.

V. Consequences of disregarding the notice period

20. See the notes to the following Article.

IV.E.–2:303: Damages for termination with inadequate notice

(1) Where a party terminates a contractual relationship under IV.E.–2:302 (Contract for indefinite period) but does not give a reasonable period of notice the other party is entitled to damages.

(2) The general measure of damages is such sum as corresponds to the benefit which the other party would have obtained during the extra period for which the relationship would have lasted if a reasonable period of notice had been given.

(3) The yearly benefit is presumed to be equal to the average benefit which the aggrieved party has obtained from the contract during the previous 3 years or, if the contractual relationship has lasted for a shorter period, during that period.

(4) The general rules on damages for non-performance in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 7 apply with any appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Under the preceding Article a party can terminate a contractual relationship which is to last for an indefinite time by giving notice. No period of notice is required for the termination to take effect. However, if a reasonable period of notice is not given the other party is entitled to damages. This Article regulates that question.

The aggrieved party's compensatable damage amounts to the expectation interest (paragraph (2)): it should be placed, as far as possible, in the position in which it would have been if a notice of reasonable length had been provided. If reasonable notice had been given the aggrieved party would have had all the usual benefits from the contract during the remainder of its duration (i.e. the reasonable notice period). Therefore, the aggrieved party is, in principle, entitled to compensation for the loss of that benefit.

Paragraph (3) contains a presumption that the yearly benefit is equal to the average benefit which the aggrieved party has received from the contract during the last three years. The idea is to refer to a period of time which is indicative of the business of the aggrieved party. Exceptional circumstances should not be taken as a general measure.

Finally, although, strictly speaking, these are not damages for non-performance of an obligation (the notice ends the contract, even if the period of notice was too short) but rather for not giving a reasonable period of notice, the application of the normal regime on damages for non-performance of an obligation is appropriate here. Therefore, paragraph (4) declares that these rules apply with any necessary adaptations.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The rule that damages are the only remedy is based on considerations of economic efficiency: as long as a party is ready to pay (damages), it should be capable of ending the contract without observing a period of notice. Compelling it to 'wait' until a reasonable period of time has expired, could result in the loss of other opportunities. Therefore, the system adopted here provides the most efficient solution: a party can effectively end a contract, but will have to pay a ‘price’ (compensation). If the ‘price’ is lower than the benefit it expects from ending the contract, at least one party is better off without anyone else being actually worse off.

The ‘price’ to be paid amounts to full compensation of the interest the aggrieved party had in the observance of the notice period, i.e. all the benefits it would have derived from the contract during the (remainder of) the period of notice. In other words, the expectation interest.

C. Damages the only remedy

Unlike in the ordinary case of non-performance of an obligation, here the aggrieved party (in principle) has only one remedy: damages. There is no obligation to give a reasonable period of notice (and therefore no question of specific performance) but just a requirement to give it if a claim for damages under the present Article is to be avoided. It would be inappropriate to impose an obligation (rather than set out a simple requirement) and to allow specific performance.

The present system provides the parties with the certainty that the notice will effectively end their contractual relationship.

D. Calculation of damages

The general test for the amount of damages is the benefit which the aggrieved party would have obtained during the non-observed period of notice (the expectation interest).

What is meant here is the ‘net’ benefit: if the aggrieved party during that period has to (continue to) incur expenses which cannot be (immediately) avoided (e.g., depending on national labour law, laying off personnel which the aggrieved party cannot reasonably employ in another function or elsewhere), then these will also have to be compensated.

The estimation of benefit is based on the benefit which the aggrieved party has obtained from the contract during the previous 3 years. However, other factors may be taken into account, either in order to raise or to mitigate the amount. One such factor may be the aggrieved party’s right to transfer its contractual position to a third party. If it can ‘sell its business’ to a successor, the benefit from this transfer will be taken into account.

E. Concrete damages

Damages are not calculated in an abstract fashion: what must be compensated is the damage which has been (or will be) effectively suffered by the aggrieved party.

Therefore, although damages should amount to the benefit which the aggrieved party would have obtained during the non-observed period of notice, and although the estimation of the benefit is based, in principle, on the average benefit which the aggrieved party has obtained from the contract during the previous 3 years, liability ultimately depends on the damage which the aggrieved party actually suffers.

Illustration 1
A distributor runs a petrol station. The petrol supplier ends the relationship after four years by giving one month's notice of termination. According to the preceding Article the supplier ought to have given at least four months' notice, which is considered reasonable in this case. To run the petrol station the distributor employs four persons. To make them redundant the distributor must itself observe a notice period of five months. In other words, the distributor must pay their salaries for another five months. The damages which the supplier must pay are 3/12 of the average benefit of the last three years and the sum resulting from the salary costs of the four persons for the forthcoming five months.

F. General rules on damages applicable

The general rules on damages for non-performance apply here as well. They include e.g. rules on foreseeability, loss attributable to the aggrieved party, reduction of loss, and substitute transactions .

NOTES

I. Entitlement to damages for inadequate notice

1. The national legal systems differ as to the consequences of termination without adequate notice.
2. In some systems the aggrieved party is entitled to damages in lieu of a notice period. This can be found in the following legal systems: BELGIAN law (art. 2 Alleenverkoopwet, art. 18 Handelsagentuurwet), FINNISH law (the general right to damages when the notice period has not been observed was awarded in KKO 1982 II 1); GREEK law; POLISH law (CC art. 764 II § 2; SWEDISH law (KommL § 51(2), HaL § 34(1)).
3. In BELGIAN and DUTCH law, in the case of commercial agency the aggrieved party is entitled to damages in lieu of a notice period, unless the contractual relationship was ended because of important and urgent reasons, which are notified to the other party (art. 18 § 3, art. 19 Handelsagentuurwet; CC art. 7:439(1)). Important and urgent reasons are circumstances such that the other party cannot reasonably be required to continue the relationship.
4. In contrast, under FRENCH law there is no entitlement to damages unless the non-observance of the notice period also results in an abus de droit. (Ccom art. L 442-6 I 4). In SPANISH law the non-observance of the minimum notice period is considered as any other non-performance of a contractual obligation Therefore the party is entitled to damages only when loss can be proved (STS 28 September 2007, RJ 2007\5311).
5. However, in other systems there is no entitlement to damages, although the notice period will be replaced by one which is proper. (GERMAN law: Martinek/Semler, § 10 no. 9; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 HGB no. 62. However, the aggrieved party may end the contractual relationship (without a notice period), since the non-observance of the notice period can be considered an important reason for termination (§ 89 a I HGB, BGH, BB 1966, p. 1410; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 a HGB no. 56). In that case the aggrieved party is entitled to damages in accordance with § 89 a II HGB. This provision also applies by way of analogy to franchise and distribution contracts. Also according to FINNISH law both unfairly long or short periods of notice can be adjusted according to art. 36 of the Contracts Act. There is, however, no case law on such adjustments.

6. In ENGLISH law, where the owner of the franchise has terminated the contract in breach of contract, for example by failing to give the required period of notice, the other party is entitled to damages. "…[A] notice provision would have to be strictly complied with in order to justify a contractual termination…"(Mendelsohn, "Franchising Law", 2nd ed. 2004, para 18.4.1). In SCOTTISH law the remedy for failure to give notice of the length required by the contract will generally be damages.

II. Calculation of the damages

7. The calculation of damages differs from country to country and from contract to contract. Under some legal systems there are specific rules concerning the calculation of the damages, whereas according to others general contract law or the general law of obligations determines the amount of damages. Moreover, in several systems the calculation of damages is a question of fact, not of law.

8. Under the following legal systems there is a specific rule concerning the calculation of damages.

9. Under BELGIAN law the terminating party must pay a sum that equals the remuneration that the other party would have obtained, had a proper notice period been observed (art. 18 § 3 Handelsagentuurwet). Also under DUTCH law the terminating party must pay a sum that equals the award a commercial agent would have obtained if the agency had been properly ended. To calculate the amount, the commission earned prior to the termination must be taken into account as well as all other circumstances (CC art. 7:441(1)). The aggrieved party may also claim the actual damages instead, provided that it proves the actual damages.

10. Under ITALIAN law there are authors who argue that the calculation of damages for non-observance of the notice period may be inferred from collective economic agreements (AEC) (Baldi (2001) 240). Pursuant to such collective agreements the amount of damages corresponds to as many twelfths of the commissions earned in the previous year (1 January-31 December) as the number of months of due notice period, or to a sum which is proportional to this amount, in the case the notice period only had to be partially observed. If the relationship has lasted for less than one year, the calculation has to be done on the basis of the monthly average of the commissions earned during that relationship.

11. As to distribution contracts, concrete damages must be paid under BELGIAN law (art. 3 Alleenverkoopwet). Under ITALIAN law, when it is the supplier who ends the relationship, it will have to provide the distributor with the lost net profit that it would have obtained, had the notice period been respected (Baldi (2001) 92). Under DUTCH law the elements taken into account to assess the amount of damages are the length of the relationship and the legitimate expectations of the aggrieved party as a result of statements made by the supplier. Moreover, the timing of the termination and its consequences are to be taken into account as well. Sometimes the reasons for termination and the customs in the distributor's branch are also taken into account (HR 21 June 1991, NJ 1991, 742).

12. Under other legal systems the amount of damages follows from general contract law. Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law the measure of damages is as in paragraph (2) of the present Article (Robinson v. Harman (1848) 1 Ex. 850, 855).

13. Also under FINNISH law general contract law applies to determine the amount of damages. The objective of awarding damages is that the aggrieved party will be in the same position had the contractual obligations been performed properly. Under GREEK law positive and negative damage are compensated (art. 298 AK), whereas non-material damage is compensated only where this is explicitly provided by a legal provision (art. 299 AK). According to the case law the provisions of the civil code on mandate and, in particular art. 722 AK, apply by way of analogy to calculate damages. The damages cover at least the expenses incurred in the proper performance of the contractual obligations, including expenses incurred in the purchase and storage of stock and advertising (CA Piraeus 1251/1991 Epitheorisi Emporikou Dikaiou 1991, 625; CA Athens 1107719/91; First Instance Court of Athens 1007/1993, Epitheorisi Emporikou Dikaiou 1995, 226). The CA Piraeus considered the application of art. 723 AK, which provides that the principal must compensate the mandatory for any damage suffered in the execution of the mandate which was not due to his fault (CA of Piraeus 1251/91, Epitheorisi Emporikou Dikaiou 1991, 625; see also First Instance Court of Athens 305/1997 Epitheorisi Emporikou Dikaiou 1998, 531).

14. In SPAIN as the non-observance of the minimum notice period is a non-performance of a contractual obligation, the amount of indemnification is calculated according to the general contract rules (the loss proved to be caused by the non-performance). For instance, the STS 16 May 2007, RJ 2007\4616, allowed compensation only up to the amount of the commissions not received during the minimum notice period that should have been respected. However, the mere termination of a commercial agency of indefinite period by the principal, even when the notice period is legally observed, gives the agent the right to claim damages for loss caused by that unilateral decision under LCA art. 29.

IV.E.–2:304: Termination for non-performance

(1) Any term of a contract within the scope of this Part whereby a party may terminate the contractual relationship for non-performance which is not fundamental is without effect.

(2) The parties may not exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The normal rule is that the parties can provide for termination on any ground they wish. See III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (1). Normally therefore they are free to provide that even a minor non-performance of any obligation under the contract will entitle the other party to terminate the relationship. If they have no such provision then only a fundamental non-performance will justify termination (III.–3:502 (Termination for fundamental non-performance). The list of definitions in the Annex provides that:

> A non-performance of a contractual obligation is fundamental if (a) it substantially deprives the creditor of what the creditor was entitled to expect under the contract, as applied to the whole or relevant part of the performance, unless at the time of conclusion of the contract the debtor did not foresee and could not reasonably be expected to have foreseen that result; or (b) it is intentional or reckless and gives the creditor reason to believe that the debtor's future performance cannot be relied on.

The general idea of the present Article is that, in the case of non-performance of the obligations under a commercial agency, franchise or distribution contract, or similar marketing relationship contract, the contractual relationship may be terminated for non-performance only when the non-performance is fundamental.

The normal freedom to stipulate for a right to terminate for any non-performance of an obligation however minor is not appropriate to contracts where parties sometimes make considerable investments in long-term relationships, and where they are frequently dependent on the continuity of such a relationship. Such a relationship may not be terminated by one party on account of the other party's mere non-performance of an obligation unless the non-performance is fundamental as defined above.

Therefore, these long-term commercial relationships may be terminated for non-performance if indeed (i) the non-performance is intentional or reckless and gives the aggrieved party reason to believe that it cannot rely on the other party's future performance, or (ii) the non-performance substantially deprives the aggrieved party of what it was entitled to expect under the contract.

> Illustration 1
> An international chain of hamburger restaurants provides its franchisees with a book containing hundreds of pages and thousands of very detailed instructions relating to all aspects of hamburger selling. The franchise contract says that strict compliance with each of these instructions is of the essence of the contract. During a monthly inspection the franchisor discovers that hamburgers in one particular restaurant are on average 2% too hot. The franchisor may not terminate the franchise.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Although the aggrieved party may have a considerable interest in strict compliance with the contract, e.g. because it needs to maintain the good reputation of the product or the trademark (in the case of a principal, a franchisor or a supplier) or because it risks running out of stock (in the case of the commercial agent, the franchisee or the distributor), the other party usually has an equally (or even more) important interest in the continuity of the contractual relationship.

Therefore, the aggrieved party is only allowed to terminate the contractual relationship where the non-performance is intentional or reckless and therefore undermines the relationship or it deprives the aggrieved party of most of the benefit under the contract.

However, if the contract is for an indefinite period either party may always terminate the relationship by giving notice under IV.E.–2:302 (Contract for an indefinite period). Unless it gives reasonable notice the party who wishes to end the contract will have to pay damages to the other party (IV.E.–2:303 (Damages for termination with inadequate notice)).

C. Character of the rule

This rule is mandatory: the parties cannot exclude it by contract. (see paragraph 2).

NOTES

I. In general

1. Under the majority of the legal systems any party may terminate a commercial agency, franchise or distributorship for non-performance in the instances mentioned in the definition of fundamental non-performance. However, these rules are sometimes included in general contract law and sometimes in the rules for specific contracts. For commercial agency contracts, the Directive (art. 16(a)) leaves this issue to the legal systems of the Member States (Art. 16 of the Directive: "Nothing in this Directive shall affect the application of the law of the Member States where the latter provides for the immediate termination of the agency contract: (a) because of the failure of one party to carry out all or part of his obligations; (b) where exceptional circumstances arise.").

II. Specific rules

2. In BELGIAN, POLISH, PORTUGUESE, SPANISH and SWEDISH law a specific rule concerning the termination of a commercial agency is included in the statutory provisions concerning commercial agency contracts. (BELGIUM: art. 20 Handelsagentuurwet; POLAND: CC art. 764 II § 1; PORTUGAL: art. 30 DL 178/86; SPAIN: art. 26 LCA; SWEDEN § 26 HaL.) In SPAIN the LCA art. 26 gives a party a right to terminate in case of non-performance (both partial and total) by the other party or when the other party is declared insolvent.
3. In ENGLAND, an attempt to terminate the contract for a non-performance which was not sufficiently serious to justify termination would itself amount to a wrongful repudiation of the contract, and any clause which purported to exclude or restrict the liability of the terminating party would, if it was one of his written standard terms of business, be invalid under Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s. 3., unless it was fair and reasonable. However, it remains permissible for the parties themselves to define what shall amount to a sufficiently fundamental breach to justify termination. They would have to use very clear language to make a minor breach into a „breach of condition" that would justify such termination (see L Schuler AG v Wickman Machine Tool Sales [1974] AC 235, HL) but if clear enough language is used, there clause would be effective. See Lombard North Central plc v Butterworth [1987] QB 527 (prompt payment „of essence" of contract).

III. Non-specific rules

4. In BELGIAN law only a fundamental non-performance justifies the termination of a commercial agency (un manquement grave de l´autre partie à ses obligations). Apart from this possibility, there are also the possibilities which general contract law provides. Under SPANISH law, the LCA art. 26 does not deviate from general contract law (CC art. 1124) in the case of non-performance (SAP León 21 November 1996, AC 1996\2169, Domínguez Gracía, p. 1317, Memento, p. 471). If a distribution contract can be regarded as being subject to the same rules as a commercial agency contract ("identity of reason", CC art. 4) then LCA art. 26 applies by way of analogy. In all other instances general contract law applies.

5. In PORTUGUESE law either party can terminate a commercial agency (i) in the case of a serious or reiterated non-performance that renders the continuation of the contractual relationship impossible or (ii) in the case of unexpected circumstances that render the regular performance of the contractual obligations impossible. However, an adequate term of notice of termination is still required (art. 30 DL 178/86, Pinto Monteiro (1998) 106; Pinto Monterio (2002) 143). Art. 30 DL 178/86 is applied by way of analogy to franchise and distribution contracts (Pinto Monteiro (2002) 142; Pestana de Vasconcelos (2002) 85).

6. According to § 26 of the SWEDISH HaL, each party may terminate the contractual relationship immediately if the other party has failed to fulfil contractual or statutory obligations and the non-performance is fundamental for the terminating party and the other party realised or should have realised this. Concerning commission agencies, there is no liability for damages for premature termination if the other party has committed a fundamental breach of contractual duties, KommL § 51(2). Concerning distribution, the rules on commission agencies can probably be used by way of analogy.

7. As to distribution contracts, art. 2 of the BELGIAN Alleenverkoopwet determines that in the case of fundamental non-performance the contractual relationship can be terminated.

8. In ENGLAND, the courts require strong reasons to justify termination of franchise contracts and will only permit termination for breach in accordance with contractual terms allowing termination for breach or where the other party has committed a repudiatory breach of contract. (Mendelsohn, Martin, "Franchising Law", para 18.4.1, 2nd ed. (2004), Richmond.)

9. Under some legal systems, termination for important and urgent reasons also includes termination for non-performance. See below.

IV. Termination for important and urgent reasons

10. Under a number of legal systems a commercial agency, franchise or distributorship may be terminated also for important and urgent reasons.

11. In some legal systems termination for important and urgent reasons also includes termination for non-performance.

12. As to commercial agency contracts, such a rule is included in the legal systems of the following countries: AUSTRIA: § 22 HVertrG (vorzeitige Auflösung aus wichtigem Grund); GERMANY: § 89 I (1), § 89 a I (2) HGB (Kündigung aus wichtigem Grund); FINLAND: art. 25 of the Act on Commercial Agents; ITALY: Cass. applies CC art. 2119 by way of analogy to commercial agency contracts: Cass. sez. lav. 2-5-2000, n. 5467, Disc. comm., 2000, 1078, with note by F. di Ciommo, Diritto alle provvigioni e recesso dell´agente per giusta causa, Cass. 5-11-1997, n. 10852, Rep. Foro. It., 1997, voce Agenzia, n. 25, Cass. 15-11-1997, n. 11376, Rep. Foro It., 1997, voce Agenzia, n. 24, Cass. 14-1-1999, n. 368, Rep. Foro It., 1999, voce Agenzia, n. 8, Cass. 1-2-1999, n. 845, Rep. Foro It., 1999, voce Agenzia, n. 12, Cass. 20-4-1999, n. 3898, Rep. Foro It., 1999, voce Agenzia, n.15 (guista causa); NETHERLANDS: CC arts. 7:339, 7:440; SWEDEN § 26 HaL.

13. Under AUSTRIAN law. the possibility of termination for urgent and important reasons has generally been accepted for long-term contracts (OGH 1999/11/16 10Ob247/99t). As to franchise contracts see OGH 1987/05/05 4 Ob 321/87, OGH 1987/10/21 1 Ob 641/87, OGH 1989/05/09 4Ob52/89, OGH 1991/04/10 9 Ob A 8, 9/91. As to distribution contracts see: OGH 1996/05/23 6Ob661/95. With respect to distribution contracts the rules concerning commercial agency contracts may apply by way of analogy (OGH 2000/05/25 8Ob295/99m).

14. Under GERMAN law the rule concerning commercial agency contracts is applied to franchising and distribution contracts by way of analogy (Küstner/Thume, no. 1789; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 a HGB no. 9). An "important reason" is determined by taking into account all the circumstances of the case and the interests of the parties (Koller/Roth/Morck, § 89 a HGB no. 4). All the instances to which Article 1:304 refers, are recognised as wichtiger Grund under GERMAN law. (Koller/Roth/Morck, § 89 a HGB no. 4; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 a HGB nos. 18, 29, 43).

15. Also under the SWEDISH law concerning all long-term contracts there is a right to terminate the relationship immediately for important reasons, mostly applicable in severe cases of breach of contract by the other party.

16. According to the BELGIAN statutory rules on commercial agency, either party may terminate the contractual relationship because of circumstances which render further future co-operation impossible. (des circonstances exceptionelles rendent définitivement impossible toute collaboration professionelle entre le commettant et l´agent art. 19 Handelsagentuurwet).

V. Agreed right to terminate

17. Under GERMAN law the rule concerning termination for important and urgent reasons, which includes termination for fundamental non-performance, is mandatory (§ 89a II HGB). That is to say parties cannot deviate therefrom by contract.

18. However, under other legal systems parties may stipulate in their contracts which circumstances justify termination. This is the case under FINNISH law. However, if such a stipulation is unfair, the court can adjust the contract (Article 36 of the Contracts Act). Also under DUTCH law, parties may stipulate circumstances that justify termination. However, such an agreement is subject to good faith. This is also the situation under BELGIAN law with respect to parties to commercial agency and distribution contracts. However, such stipulations are policed by the courts.

19. Under FRENCH commercial agency law, parties are not allowed to stipulate that certain obligations are of the essence and justify the termination of the contractual relationship (Cass. 28 May 2002).

20. In SPANISH law, due to the lack of specific provisions and the practical difficulties in deciding in a particular case which obligations are of the essence, the distribution contracts normally establish when the non-performance is considered fundamental and the termination is justified (Domínguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 614).

IV.E.–2:305: Indemnity for goodwill

(1) When the contractual relationship comes to an end for any reason (including termination by either party for fundamental non-performance), a party is entitled to an indemnity from the other party for goodwill if and to the extent that:

(a) the first party has significantly increased the other party's volume of business and the other party continues to derive substantial benefits from that business; and

(b) the payment of the indemnity is reasonable.

(2) The grant of an indemnity does not prevent a party from seeking damages under IV.E.–2:303 (Damages for termination with inadequate notice).

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Irrespective of whether the contract was for an indefinite or a definite period and irrespective of the way in which the contract ended (whether or not for fundamental non-performance), the mere fact that the contractual relationship comes to an end may lead to a transfer of goodwill. To the extent that such a transfer has actually taken place and indemnification would be reasonable in the circumstances there is a ground for the payment of an indemnity. This Article provides the other party with a remedy.

Goodwill has its own value which must be differentiated from the expectation interest under the contract. Therefore, it should always be refunded irrespective of the way the contractual relationship is ended. Indemnity for the clientele does not depend on any sort of fault. It will cumulate with damages in the case of the premature termination of the relationship without adequate notice (see IV.E.–2:303 (Damages for termination with inadequate notice)).

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The entitlement to an indemnity for transfer of goodwill is based on considerations similar to those underlying the law on unjustified enrichment: a party should not be unjustifiably enriched as the result of the termination of a long-term commercial relationship.

C. Generated goodwill

A party which claims an indemnity for the transfer of goodwill has to prove that it has significantly increased the other party's volume of business. In other words, it must prove that the goodwill it had was transferred to the other party as a result of the termination of the contractual relationship. It is crucial that the agent, franchisee or distributor has played an active role in increasing the volume of business of the other party. This means that where the volume has increased as a consequence of a new client from a party's exclusive territory, this party is not automatically entitled to an indemnity.

The most typical example of transfer of goodwill is where the principal, franchisor or supplier has access to lists of clients and other similar data either because the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor has handed such lists over after the termination of the relationship or because the principal, franchisor or supplier otherwise has access to such data (e.g. because the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor has regularly passed such information on to the principal, franchisor or supplier during the relationship.

D. Commercial agency, franchise and distributorship distinguished

In the case of commercial agency contracts the termination of the agency will normally lead to a transfer of goodwill. Therefore, frequently there will be a right to compensation. On the other hand, in the case of franchise the goodwill is rarely the goodwill of the franchisee since, typically, clients are attracted by the image of the brand and the network. In the case of distributorships, sometimes the goodwill (clientele) will be attracted by the supplier's products or its brand (especially in the case of exclusive distribution agreements). However, it may also be the distributor who, like an agent, has created the market for the products. In the latter case, the distributor may be entitled to goodwill compensation after the ending of the relationship.

E. Continuous substantial benefits

The party claiming an indemnity must prove that the generated goodwill stays with the other party and that it is substantial. Normally, the benefits which the other party continues to derive decrease gradually over time. This must be taken into account. Moreover, the general turnover of this specific principal, franchisor or supplier may decrease in time, e.g. because the general market for its products deteriorates. Such a development should also be taken into account. However, the principal, franchisor or supplier is presumed to continue to derive substantial benefits from the generated goodwill even if it sells its business or client list to a third party if it can be shown that the purchaser will use the client base.

F. Reasonable indemnity

A party who claims an indemnity for the transfer of goodwill also has to prove that the indemnity it claims is reasonable in the circumstances. I.–1:104 (Reasonableness) provides that "Reasonableness is to be objectively ascertained, having regard to the nature and purpose of what is being done, to the circumstances of the case and to any relevant usages and practices." Obviously, the reasonableness test leaves some room for interpretation.

For commercial agency, Chapter 2 provides a specific rule on how to calculate goodwill compensation. (IV.E.–3:312 (Amount of indemnity)).

G. Relation to damages for irregular termination

The grant of an indemnity for goodwill does not prevent a party from seeking damages. In other words, damages for termination with inadequate notice and an indemnity for goodwill can, in principle, cumulate.

However, when establishing whether an indemnity for goodwill is reasonable in the circumstances the entitlement of the aggrieved party to damages for irregular termination should be taken into account. In other words, the same loss cannot be compensated twice, once as loss of benefit (damages amounting to the expectation interest) and once as 'loss' of goodwill (indemnity for the transfer of goodwill).

H. Relation to compensation for post-contractual non-competition

If a party, as a result of a valid post-contractual non-competition clause, is not allowed to compete with its former principal, franchisor or supplier, and if, as a result clients who would have moved to it had it started a competing activity now move to its former principal or franchisor or supplier, the combined effect of termination and the post-contractual non-competition clause may be a transfer of goodwill in the sense of this Article, which gives rise to a right to be indemnified. However, if the impossibility to compete is already compensated by an entitlement for the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor to compensation (compensation for post-contractual non-competition), as will usually be the case, then the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor is not impoverished, and is therefore not entitled to an indemnity for goodwill.

I. Relation to post-agency commission

Under certain circumstances the agent is entitled to commission for contracts concluded by the principal after the agency has ended. If a claim for a goodwill indemnity under the present Article is considered, the entitlement to such commission must be taken into account in two ways. First, if such entitlement exists no indemnity is due for the transfer of the same clientele. Secondly, the fact that no entitlement is due is an indication that no transfer of goodwill has taken place, and that therefore the agent is not entitled to goodwill compensation. In sum, it is very unlikely that a claim by an agent for goodwill compensation under this Article will succeed.

NOTES

I. Indemnity for goodwill

1. In the case of commercial agency, after the termination of the agency the commercial agent is entitled to either indemnity for goodwill (art. 17(2) Directive) or compensation for damages (art. 17(3) Directive). In transposing the Directive into their legal systems the Member States had to choose one of these options. The present Article includes the option of art. 17(2) of the Directive, which is also transposed in the majority of the legal systems. (Art. 17(2) of the Directive states: "(a) The commercial agent shall be entitled to an indemnity if and to the extent that: – he has brought the principal new customers or has significantly increased the volume of business with existing customers and the principal continues to derive substantial benefits from the business with customers, and – the payment of this indemnity is equitable having regard to all the circumstances and, in particular, the commission lost by the commercial agent on the business transacted with such customers. Member States may provide for such circumstances also to include the application or otherwise of a restraint of trade clause, within the meaning of Article 20; (b) The amount of the indemnity may not exceed a figure equivalent to an indemnity for one year calculated from the commercial agent's average annual remuneration over the preceding five years and if the contract goes back less than five years the indemnity shall be calculated on the average for the period in question; (c) The grant of such an indemnity shall not prevent the commercial agent from seeking damages.")
2. However, the present Article differs from the Directive to the extent that according to art. 18 of the Directive no indemnity is awarded in the case of fundamental non-performance by the commercial agent (art. 18(a) Directive) or when the commercial agent has terminated the relationship without any non-performance on the side of the principal (art. 18(b) Directive). Under the present Article it is also possible to claim indemnity in the case of non-performance by either party. (Art. 18 of the Directive: "The indemnity or compensation referred to in Article 17 shall not be payable: (a) where the principal has terminated the agency contract because of default attributable to the commercial agent which would justify immediate termination of the agency contract under national law; (b) where the commercial agent has terminated the agency contract, unless such termination is justified by circumstances attributable to the principal or on grounds of age, infirmity or illness of the commercial agent in consequence of which he cannot reasonably be required to continue his activities; (c) where, with the agreement of the principal, the commercial agent assigns his rights and duties under the agency contract to another person."

3. Art. 17(2) of the Directive is based on GERMAN law (Commission Report, 1). Under GERMAN case law and literature specific criteria have been developed to establish whether the conditions laid down in Art. 17(2) are fulfilled. Similar criteria are included in IV.E.–3:312 (Amount of indemnity) see also the notes on that Article). Moreover, art. 17(2) b includes a maximum amount of indemnity.

4. Art. 17(2) of the Directive is transposed into the following national provisions: § 24 of the AUSTRIAN HVertG (Ausgleichsanspruch); art. 20 of the BELGIAN Handelsagentuurwet; art. 28 of the FINNISH Act on Commercial Agents; § 89 b I nos. 1 and 3 of the GERMAN HGB. (However, in addition, § 89 I b no. 2 HGB requires that the commercial agent loses its commission due to the ending of the contract with the customers which the commercial agent acquired.); art. 9 of the GREEK Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; art. 1751 of the ITALIAN CC; art. 7:442 of the DUTCH CC; art. 764 III of the POLISH CC; arts. 33, 34 and 35 of the PORTUGUESE DL 178/86; art. 28(1), (2) SPANISH LCA; § 28(1) of the SWEDISH HaL.

5. Under UK law parties have the possibility of stipulating that the commercial agent is entitled to indemnity for goodwill after the end of the agency. However, if the parties fail to do so the commercial agent will be entitled to compensation for damages (Reg. 17).

II. Compensation for damages

6. Art. 17(3) of the Directive includes the possibility of compensation for damages. It states: "The commercial agent shall be entitled to compensation for the damage he suffers as a result of the termination of his relations with the principal. Such damage shall be deemed to occur particularly when the termination takes place in circumstances: – depriving the commercial agent of the commission which proper performance of the agency contract would have procured him whilst providing the principal with substantial benefits linked to the commercial agent's activities, – and/or which have not enabled the commercial agent to amortize the costs and expenses that he had incurred for the performance of the agency contract on the principal's advice." This provision of the Directive is based on FRENCH law (Commission Report, 5) and is included in art. L. 134-12 of the FRENCH Ccom.

7. Under FRENCH law the level of compensation is established according to the global sum of the last two years' commission or the sum of 2 years' commission calculated over the average of the last three years. However, a principal may prove that the commercial agent's loss is less. Moreover, there is no maximum level of compensation. (Commission Report, 5 ff). The amount of compensation based on Ccom art. L 134-12 and actual damages do not cumulate (Cass. 25-6-2002).

8. Under UK law the commercial agent is entitled to compensation for damage if the parties fail to stipulate in their contract that the commercial agent is entitled to indemnity (Reg. 17(2)). Initially the French method of establishing compensation is taken as a starting point. However, in some cases less compensation has been provided than the global sum of the last two years' commission or the average sum of 2 years' commission calculated over the average of the last three years (Ingmar GB Limited v. Eaton Leonard Inc. [2002] ECC 5, [2001] EurLR 756). However, it has been held subsequently that the French method is not to be followed and the and the United Kingdom method is now laid down by the recent House of Lords decision in Lonsdale v Howard & Hallam Ltd [2007] UKHL 32, [2007] 1 WLR 2055, which supersedes all earlier authority. The French practice appears to be based on the assumption that agencies in France change hands at this sort of valuation, whereas there is no such market in the United Kingdom. The courts of the United Kingdom should calculate the compensation payable ''by reference to the value of the agency on the assumption that it had continued'' [2007] UKHL 32 at [21]).

III. Indemnity for goodwill in the case of distribution contracts

9. Under BELGIAN law, art. 3 of the Alleenverkoopwet entitles the distributor to an indemnity payment after the termination of the contractual relationship. However, there is no entitlement to indemnity of goodwill if the relationship is terminated because of the non-performance of the distributor. In order to asses the amount of indemnity the following factors must be taken into account: (1) the value of the customers which the distributor acquired and from which the supplier will benefit after the termination; (2) the costs which the distributor incurred and from which the supplier benefits after the termination; (3) the costs involved in employing employees.

IV. Application of the commercial agency rule concerning indemnity for goodwill by way of analogy to franchise or distribution contracts

10. Under AUSTRIAN and FINNISH law, the national rules resulting from the transposition of art. 17(2) of the Directive are applied by way of analogy to franchise and distribution contracts. (See the decisions of the AUSTRIAN OGH: OGH 2000/10/23 8Ob74/00s, OGH 1999/12/15 6Ob247/99p, OGH 1999/03/30 10Ob61/99i, OGH 1998/11/24 1Ob251/98p, OGH 1997/12/17 9Ob2065/96h; FINNISH law: Halila-Hemmo (1996) 281.)

11. Under GREEK and PORTUGUESE law the commercial agency rule is applied by way of analogy to distribution contracts (see for GREEK law Georgakopoulos (1999) 434; Georgakopoulos (1998) 113, Marinos, annotation in First Instance Court of Athens 1097/1999, Epitheorisi Emporikou Dikaiou (1999) 49; see for PORTUGUESE law: STS 4-5-1993, (1993-II) Colectânea de Jurisprudência 78; STS 22-11-1995, (1995-III) Colectânea de Jurisprudência 115, STS 22-11-1995, (1995-III) Colectânea de Jurisprudência 115).

12. Under GERMAN law it is unclear whether § 89 b HGB applies by way of analogy to franchise and distribution contracts. A majority of the decisions and legal authors favour application by way of analogy to franchise and distribution contracts (pro: BGH, BB 1959, 7; BGH, NJW 1983, 1789; BGH, WM 1993, 1466; Koller/Roth/Morck, Vor § 84 HGB nos. 10, 11; Küstner/Thume, no. 1466–1477; Küstner/Thume, nos. 1816–1823; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 b HGB nos. 18–24; contra: Oberlandesgericht Köln, Entscheidungen zum Wirtschaftsrecht 1986, 1217; Bechtold, NJW 1983, 1393; Kroitzsch, BB 1977, 1631).

13. Also in other member states authors differ as to whether the rule on commercial agency can be applied way of analogy to franchising. See for ITALY: Pardolesi, Frignani (1999) 191; SPAIN: Bogaert/Lohmann, 2000. In GREECE some authors argue that the rules concerning commercial agency can be applied by way of analogy to franchise contracts (Voulgaris, Georgiadis). Also in PORTUGAL authors do not agree as to whether an indemnity is payable in the case of franchise contracts (pro:

Alexandre (1991) 368, Olavo (1988) 170, Ribeiro (1992) 58, Pestana de Vasconcelos (2000) 94; contra: (Cordeiro (1988) 83).

V. No indemnification for goodwill in the case of franchise and distribution contracts

14. Under ITALIAN law no goodwill is payable in the case of distribution contracts and the same applies according to DUTCH law (Smit (1996) 18; Barendrecht & Van Peursem 164; Van de Paverd (1999) chapters 4 and 5) and SPANISH law.

15. According to FRENCH, ENGLISH, SCOTTISH and SWEDISH law no indemnification for goodwill is payable in the case of franchise or distribution contracts. (For FRANCE see: Leloup, no. 2101).

VI. Entitlement to damages because of non-observance of notice period

16. As stated in note 1, Art. 17(2) c of the Directive establishes that the entitlement to indemnity does not prevent the commercial agent from seeking damages. From the Commission Report it follows that it concerns both damages for non-performance and damages in lieu of a notice period (Commission Report, 5). If the facts of a case justify a claim based on some other ground - non-performance of a contractual obligation, non-contractual liability for damage or unjustified enrichment – the present Article does not prevent the aggrieved party from resorting to such a claim. Art. 17(2 c) of the Directive has been transposed into the following legal systems: (ITALY: CC art. 1751; POLAND: CC art. 764 III § 3).

17. AUSTRIAN law does not include such a rule in the HVertrG nor does DUTCH law. However, in Dutch literature it has been accepted that indemnity may cumulate with the damages both in lieu of a notice period and for non-performance (Asser-Kortmann, no. 236).

18. Under BELGIAN law (art. 21 Handelsagentuurwet) if the amount of indemnity does not include the total amount of damages incurred by the commercial agent, the commercial agent may claim the difference between the amount of indemnity and the damages in fact incurred, if the commercial agent is able to prove this.

19. Under SPANISH law, the payment of indemnity for goodwill is regulated only in the Agency Law, art. 28. The agent has to prove that due to the agent's activity, the operations with the pre-existent clientele have substantially increased or that a new clientele was created (STS 19 November 2003, RJ 2003\8335). However, some courts infer a right to compensation for goodwill from a long duration of the terminated agency, as it is obvious that the relations were satisfactory for the parties and the benefits were mutual (SAP Asturias 7 February 2005, JUR 2005\92189) The law specifies that the agent has a right to an indemnification when the principal continues to derive benefits from the business due to the contractual activity of the agent and the existence of clauses on post-contractual non-competition, loss of commission and other circumstances affecting the equity of the contractual parties justify compensation for the transfer of the goodwill. The right is enforceable even when the agency terminates because of the agent's death (art. 28.2 LCA). The case law states that this right has a mandatory character; therefore a contractual waiver of the right to compensation for goodwill is invalid (STS 7 April 2003, RJ 2003\2951, STS 27 January 2003, RJ 2003\1137). Nevertheless, the amount of the indemnification must not exceed the average amount of the annual remuneration received by the agent during the last five years of the contract (art. 28.3 LCA). The parties are free to establish clauses calculating the indemnification, although the court may modify the amount according to the specific circumstances (Raúl Bercovitz Álvarez in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 532; SAP Barcelona 8 June 2005, JUR 2005\176788). Nevertheless, this right may cumulate with a right to claim an indemnification for loss caused as a consequence of a unilateral termination of the agency (art. 29 LCA), unless the principal terminates due to a fundamental non-performance of the agent, the agent assigned the contractual rights and obligation to a third party or when the agent has rescinded the contract (art. 30 LCA) – in those cases the agent has no right to indemnification. Regarding the application of the provisions on commercial agency by way of analogy to other contracts, the case law prima facie recognises a right to compensation for goodwill in distribution contracts (STS 12 June 1999, RJ 1999\4292; STS 14 February 1997, RJ 1997\1418). However, this opinion is not followed unanimously by the courts and there are contrary decisions as well (STS 6 November 2006, RJ 2006\9425). Therefore, the application of those provisions must be preceded by a verification if the circumstances in every case allow such analogy, as the clientele in the distribution contract does not belong exclusively to the principal supplier (Raúl Bercovitz Álvarez in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles; p.535; STS 10 July 2006, RJ 2006\8323). Moreover, in a distribution contract, a clause of waiver of goodwill compensation is valid (STS 18 March 2002, RJ 2002\2849). In the case of a franchise, the case law is divided as well: there are decisions which admit the application of the LCA art. 29 by analogy LCA (SAP Barcelona 10 June 2004, AC 2004\1100) and those which refuse to apply this article to a franchise (AAP Álava 10 April 2006, AC 2006\899).

IV.E.–2:306: Stock, spare parts and materials

If the contract is avoided, or the contractual relationship terminated, by either party, the party whose products are being brought on to the market must repurchase the other party's remaining stock, spare parts and materials at a reasonable price, unless the other party can reasonably resell them.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

These Comments will refer to commercial agents, franchisees and distributors and their counterparts but the same comments apply to parties to other contracts within the scope of this Part.

If a commercial agent, franchisee or distributor is left with excess stock, spare parts and advertising and other materials after the contract has been avoided or the contractual relationship terminated, the principal, franchisor or supplier must repurchase those objects, and it must do so at a reasonable price. However, if the agent, franchisee or distributor can itself reasonably resell them, the principal, franchisor or supplier is under no obligation to repurchase them and to incur useless transaction and transportation costs.

This rule is normally more relevant to distribution and franchise relationships than to commercial agency, since in the latter no property normally passes. However, where the agent has actually bought advertisement materials or spare parts or other objects from the principal this rule will also protect the agent.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

After the premature termination of the contractual relationship, the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor will frequently be left with excess stock, spare parts and materials which will usually no longer be of any value to it. With the termination the agent, franchisee or distributor may even have lost the right to use or resell them (especially in the case of a valid post-contractual non-competition clause). On the other hand, the excess stock, spare parts and materials will normally still be useful to the principal, franchisor or supplier which can either use them itself or sell them to the new or other agents, franchisees or distributors. Therefore, the principal, franchisor or supplier must repurchase them.

As a result of the termination of the contractual relationship the agent, distributor, or franchisee finds itself in a weak bargaining position. Therefore, this Article provides that the principal, franchisor or supplier must pay a reasonable price.

However, an obligation to repurchase stock, spare parts and materials would be inefficient where the agent, franchisee or distributor can itself reasonably resell them. Therefore, in those cases no such obligation exists.

C. Reasonable price

In many cases a reasonable price will be the price for which the principal, supplier or franchisor can resell the objects in question to the new or other agents, franchisees or distributors. For very old stock this may mean that the price is very low. Another circumstance which may be relevant to establish whether it is a reasonable price, is whether minimum obligations to buy were imposed unilaterally by the principal, franchisor or supplier on the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor.

In principle, it should be practically impossible for the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor to speculate with regard to the price to be paid by the principal, supplier or franchisor by buying unusually large amounts, since normally the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor will only hear of the principal's, supplier's or franchisor's intention to terminate the relationship when the notice is given. However, should it be established that the agent, franchisee or distributor has nevertheless bought unusually large amounts on a falling market, successful speculation should be avoided by taking this fact into account when establishing what amounts to a reasonable price in the circumstances.

A distributorship for ready to wear designer clothes has been terminated. The distributor still has some clothes in stock from the collections of the present and the previous year. The price which the supplier must pay the distributor, differs from collection to collection. A reasonable price for the collection of the present year probably corresponds to the price which the distributor paid. However, the price which the supplier must pay for the collection of the previous year is probably considerably lower.

D. No obligation to repurchase

There is no obligation for the principal, supplier or franchisor to repurchase stock, spare parts and materials when the agent, franchisee or distributor can itself reasonably resell them. The burden of proof is on the principal, supplier or franchisor. 'Reasonably' means without great effort, for a reasonable price and within a reasonable time.

E. Relation to the period of notice

To the extent that the principal, franchisor or supplier has given the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor, the opportunity (and, where necessary, the right) to use up its remaining stock, spare parts and materials or to resell them to the public or to the new or other agents, franchisees or distributors, the former is not under an obligation to repurchase them.

NOTES

Obligation to repurchase stock, spare parts and materials

1. Many legal systems include a similar rule. However, they differ with regard to their scope of application and the price to be paid.
2. Under GERMAN law such an obligation follows from the nachvertragliche Treuepflicht for long-term commercial contracts, which is based on good faith (§ 242 BGB, Martinek/Semler § 21 nos. 56-60, BGH, BB 1970, 1458). However, there is no such obligation in case the agent, distributor or franchisee ends the relationship, since this would be a case of venire contra factum proprium (BHG, BB 1970, 1460; Martinek/Semler, § 21 no. 59 et seq.).

3. With respect to franchising under ITALIAN law a lower court decided in a way which is similar to the rule in the Article (Pretore di Roma, 11 June 1984, Sangemini s. p. a. e Soc. Acqua minerale Ferrarelle c. Schweppes Int. Ltd. e Soc. Acqua minerale S. Benedetto, Foro it., 1984, I, 2909 (with note by Pardolesi) and Giur. it. ,1985, I, 2, 711 (with note by Frignani).

4. With regard to distribution, GREEK courts seem to apply the rules concerning mandate, which include a similar rule to the one in the Article, by way of analogy (art. 722 AK, CA Piraeus 1251/1991 Epitheorisi Emporikou Dikaiou 1991, 625; CA Athens 11077/1991; First Instance Court of Athens 1007/1993, Epitheorisi Emporikou Dikaiou 1995, 226). Moreover, if the principal refuses to repurchase the stock, the distributor may continue to sell the stock. The price the supplier must pay is the price the distributor paid to obtain the stock, spare parts and other materials. These rules may be applied by way of analogy to agency and franchising. In SPAIN there is no specific legal provision on the matter. Some scholars consider that in the absence of a contractual obligation on the supplier to repurchase the stock left, the distributor has no right to have it repurchased, as the distributor assumed the risk of the contract (J.L. Díaz Echegaray in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles; p. 567; SAP Jaén 13 September 2000, AC 2000\2223). According to other authors such an obligation follows from good faith (Memento (2002) 487; Sánchez Calero (2000) 178, Dominguez García (1997) 1372). However, the price to be paid is the price for which the goods were sold to the distributor (SAP Madrid 16 September 2004 AC 2004\2113) minus the possible depreciation of the goods. (Dominguez García (1997) 1372, Sánchez Calero (2000). There is no such obligation if the distributor may continue to sell the goods.

5. Further, it must be noted that in some countries franchise contracts usually include a similar obligation (SWEDEN: Sohlberg, 75). However, in GERMANY such a term is not common in practice (Martinek/Semler, § 21 no. 56).

6. Under the minority of the legal systems there is no such rule. (AUSTRIA, ENGLAND, FINLAND, THE NETHERLANDS, SCOTLAND, SWEDEN (Söderlund, 143; Håstad, 295). Also the Directive does not include such a rule.

7. Under FRENCH law the supplier only has to repurchase the stock in the case of an abusive termination of the relationship (Cass. Com. 13. 05. 1975, JCP 1975.IV, 211; Cass. Com. 26. 10. 1982, Bull. civ. IV, 275).

Section 4: Other general provisions

IV.E.–2:401: Right of retention

In order to secure its rights to remuneration, compensation, damages and indemnity the party who is bringing the products on to the market has a right of retention over the movables of the other party which are in its possession as a result of the contract, until the other party has performed its obligations.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

These Comments will refer to commercial agents, franchisees and distributors and their counterparts but the same comments apply to parties to other contracts within the scope of this Part.

As a result of this Article the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor is entitled to refuse to give movables which are owned by the principal, franchisor or supplier back to the principal, franchisor or supplier (or, as the case may be, to the new owner) as long as the principal, franchisor or supplier has not fully paid the remuneration, compensation, damages, and indemnity to which the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor is entitled. This right is of special significance as a means to exercise pressure on the former principal, franchisor or supplier after the contract has expired or has been terminated or ended.

The right of retention is effective not only towards the (former) principal, franchisor or supplier but also towards third parties (e.g. the new owner of the goods).

This rule is normally more relevant to commercial agency relationships, in which normally no property passes, than to franchise and distribution relationships. Nevertheless, where appropriate, this rule may also protect the claims of franchisees and distributors.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This rule intends to protect the interests of the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor when its money claims towards its (former) principal, franchisor or supplier remain unpaid. This Article provides it with some security.

C. Relation to other provisions

The right of retention will be dealt with in Book IX (Proprietary Security Rights in Movable Assets). The right of retention will usually be also a right to withhold performance in the sense of III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation). That is the case whenever the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor is under a contractual obligation to return the goods it retains. However, contrary to the right to withhold performance, the right of retention is also effective towards third parties.

D. Right of retention

All the ordinary rules relating to the right of retention apply. This means, among other things, that such a right is also effective vis-à-vis third parties. See further Book IX (Proprietary Security Rights in Movable Assets).

NOTES

Right of retention

1. In most legal systems there is a right of retention in such cases. However, the rules differ from country to country.
2. Under PORTUGUESE and SWEDISH law there is a similar specific statutory rule with respect to commercial agency (Art. 35 of the PORTUGUESE DL 178/86, 754 CC, Pinto Monteiro (1998) 119; SWEDISH HaL § 15). Under PORTUGUESE law this rule is applied by way of analogy to franchise and distribution.
3. Also in GERMANY there is a specific statutory rule that applies to commercial agency contracts and is applied by way of analogy to franchise and distribution contracts. However, under GERMAN law such a right only exists after the ending of the contract. Moreover, the retention right is restricted to documents provided by the principal. In addition, this right of retention may only concern entitlements to commission and the compensation of expenditures. This rule is applied to franchise and distribution contracts by way of analogy (Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 88 a HGB no. 8). Also § 19 of the AUSTRIAN HVertrG includes a right of retention. However, this right is restricted to samples.
4. In other countries a right of retention is inferred from general private or commercial law. Under ENGLISH law the general rules concerning the possessory lien accordingly apply to commercial agency, franchise and distribution (Bowstead & Reynolds 7-073, Goode 619-621). The same is true of SCOTTISH law (McBryde chapter 20 (part 9). Under GERMAN law, apart from § HGB, also the general rules concerning a right of retention apply (§§ 273, 274 BGB, Zurückbehaltungsrecht or § 369 HGB kaufmännisches Zurückbehaltungsrecht). Depending on the applicable statutory rule, different requirements must be met. Unlike § 369 HGB, §§ 273, 274 BGB require a connection between the right of the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor and the right of the principal, franchisor or supplier. Furthermore, § 369 HGB also gives the retaining party, under particular circumstances, the right to satisfy its claim from the goods which it has kept. Under DUTCH law either party has a right of retention provided there is a sufficient connection between the obligation of the commercial agent, franchisee or distributor on the one hand and the obligations of the principal, franchisor and supplier on the other (CC arts. 6:52, 3:290).
5. The only case where SPANISH law provides a right of retention is in the framework of service contracts: the supplier of a service may retain the movable asset on which work has been done until payment is made (CC art.1600). There is no similar provision in relation to distribution contracts. However, in the case law, an application by analogy to a commercial agency of Ccom art. 276 that establishes for the commission contract a right to retain the goods until the commission is paid, is accepted by the courts (SAP Barcelona 1 March 2005, JUR 2005\117408).

IV.E.–2:402: Signed document available on request

(1) Each party is entitled to receive from the other, on request, a signed statement in textual form on a durable medium setting out the terms of the contract.

(2) The parties may not exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The function of this Article is twofold: (i) providing the requesting party with information and (ii) facilitating evidence. It does not, however, introduce any formal requirement for the validity of the contract.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Especially in the case of a dispute, the parties will usually need a statement in textual form on a durable medium on which to rely for evidence. In most cases the obligation will not be very burdensome: some textual record of what was agreed upon usually exists. However, it should be kept in mind that this record can be requested either at the conclusion of the contract or during the performance of the obligations under it and even within a reasonable time after the contractual relationship has ended. Therefore, a party must keep a record even some time after the end of the relationship.

C. Terms of the contract

The signed document that a party may request must set out the terms of the contract. This means that if a document is requested after changes have been made to the initial contract, the party requesting the document is entitled to the most recent version of the terms of the contract and not only to the initial one.

D. Signed statement in textual form on a durable medium

The meanings of "signed", "in textual form" and "on a durable medium" are given in I.–1:106 ("In writing" and similar expressions) and I.–1:107 ("Signature" and similar expressions). See also the Comments on those Articles.

E. Character of the rule

This rule is mandatory; any deviation from it by the parties to the detriment of the party who would benefit from it remains without effect.

NOTES

I. Written document

1. This rule corresponds to Art. 13(1) of the Directive which was transposed into the legal systems of the Member States with respect to commercial agency. (Art. 13(1) of the Directive: "(1) Each party shall be entitled to receive from the other on request a signed written document setting out the terms of the agency contract including any terms subsequently agreed." § 4 of the AUSTRIAN HvertG; art. 5 of the BELGIAN Handelsagentuurwet; UK: reg. 13; art. 3 of the FINNISH Act on Commercial Agents; art. L.134-2 of the FRENCH Ccom; § 85 of the GERMAN HGB; GREECE art. 8 Para 1b; art. 1742 of the ITALIAN CC; DUTCH CC art. 7:428 para. 3; PORTUGAL: art. 1(2) Decreto-lei 178/86; SPAIN: art. 22 LCA.)

2. Under GERMAN law this rule also applies by way of analogy to franchise and distribution contracts (see Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 85 HGB no. 1).

II. Formal requirements

3. However, according to art. 13 II of the Directive the legal systems of the Member States may provide that a contract in writing is a validity requirement for the contract. (Art. 13(2) of the Directive: "Notwithstanding paragraph 1 a Member State may provide that an agency contract shall not be valid unless evidenced in writing."). According to the case law of the ECJ this is the only formal requirement that national legal systems may provide in the case of commercial agency. (Barbara Bellone v. Yokohama SpA, ECJ 30 April 1998, C-215/97, ECR 1998, I-2191; Centrosteel Srl v Adipol GmbH, ECJ 13 July 2000, C-456/98, ECR 2000, I-6007, Francesca Caprini v. Conservatore Camera di Commercio, Industria, Artigianato e Agricoltura (CCIAA), ECJ 6 March 2003, C-485/01, ECR 2003, I-2371).

4. According to BELGIAN, FINNISH, GERMAN, DUTCH, SCOTTISH, SWEDISH law there are no formal requirements as to the conclusion of these contracts.

5. However, under FRENCH and ITALIAN law there are form requirements in the case of franchising contracts. Under SPANISH law franchising contracts, due to the lack of any specific provisions, are not subject to any form requirements and the general contractual provisions are applied (CC art. 1278 – liberty of form). However, some authors believe that the LCA art. 22 should rule those contracts as well, by way of analogy (Domínguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles,; p. 595).

6. In addition, it must be noted that in some legal systems del credere stipulations in commercial agency contracts must be in writing. Moreover, it must also be noted that art. 20(2) of the Directive requires that a restraint of trade clause included in a commercial agency contract is valid only if it is concluded in writing.

CHAPTER 3: COMMERCIAL AGENCY

Section 1: General

IV.E.–3:101: Scope

This Chapter applies to contracts under which one party, the commercial agent, agrees to act on a continuing basis as a self-employed intermediary to negotiate or to conclude contracts on behalf of another party, the principal, and the principal agrees to remunerate the agent for those activities.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The commercial agent's main task consists of prospecting the market, attracting customers, promoting the sale or purchase of products and negotiating the terms of contracts which will be concluded between the principal and the customer or seller. The agent may also be entrusted with concluding contracts for the principal. The commercial agent always acts independently of and on behalf of the principal. A commercial agency agreement may be concluded for a definite or indefinite period of time.

The principal must remunerate the commercial agent (Section 3). If the parties have stipulated that the agent will not be remunerated, this Chapter applies by way of analogy where appropriate.

A principal who wants to be active in a certain area may conclude a contract with a commercial agent in order to find out whether specific products will be successful in a certain territory or with a certain group of customers. The agent will do all the preparatory work, which enables the principal to conclude contracts more easily, namely without making high investments and running high risks.

The agent may, as a self-employed intermediary, organise its activities as it thinks fit. Although the agent must comply with reasonable instructions given by the principal (IV.E.–3:202 (Instructions), the latter cannot affect the agent's independence.

The relevance of this Article is that it determines whether a certain contractual relationship may be qualified as a commercial agency and, thus, whether the Articles in this Chapter are applicable. This is of special interest in relation to the mandatory rules in several of the Articles.

B. Self-employed intermediary

The concept of a self-employed intermediary is taken from the Directive. Self-employed refers to the fact that the agent in any case acts independently from the principal, that is to say that the commercial agent is not its employee. A commercial agent may be either a legal entity or a natural person. These rules may in principle apply to commission agents. The concept of intermediary is introduced in order to clarify that the activity of the agent must lead to the conclusion of contracts between two other parties, i. e. the principal and the customer or seller.

Illustration 1
A produces and sells perfume. A enters into a contract with B, according to which B will negotiate contracts of sale with respect to the perfume on A's behalf and on A's account. In the contract it is stipulated that A determines B's working hours. In such a situation B is not a self-employed intermediary.

C. Contracts with customers

The purpose of the agency agreement is that the agent negotiates (and possibly concludes) contracts on behalf of (and in the name of) the principal. Although it is most common that commercial agents are appointed for the sale or purchase of goods, in exceptional cases they may be concerned with the promotion of services. This Chapter applies in both situations. In this Chapter the resulting contract, i. e. the one to be concluded by the principal or in the principal's name, will be referred to as the contract with the customer, the customer being the party (the reseller or service provider) who enters into a contract with the principal.

D. Competition law

Competition law may exceptionally affect the validity of some agency agreements. The European Commission has declared Article 81(1) EC to be applicable to agency relationships whereby the agent bears important financial and commercial risks in relation to the activities for which the commercial agent has been appointed by the principal, the "non-genuine agency agreements" (Guidelines on Vertical Restraints (OJ 2000, C291/01)). The Guidelines state that the question of risk must be assessed on a case-by-case basis with regard to the economic reality of the situation rather than the legal form (nos. 12-17). Nevertheless, the Commission considers that Article 81(1) will generally not be applicable to the agent's obligations.

The provisions included in this Chapter apply to commercial agency contracts only to the extent that they are valid in the light of competition law.

NOTES

I. Transposition of the directive into national legal systems

1. The Directive has been transposed into all the legal systems of the Member States. However, the definition of a commercial agent and the scope of application differ from country to country.

II. Self-employed intermediary

2. In the Directive (art. 1(2)) and in all the legal systems of the Member States the commercial agent is an independent business person, who can be either a natural person or a legal entity (AUSTRIA: § 1(1) HVertrG; BELGIUM: art. 1 Handelsagentuurwet; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 2(1); FINLAND; FRANCE: Ccom art. L.134-1; GERMANY: § 84 I (1) HGB; GREECE: art. 1 para 2 Law on Commercial Agency; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:428 I; POLAND: CC art. 758

§ 1; PORTUGAL: art.1 DL 178/86; SPAIN: art. 1 LCA; SWEDEN: § 1 HaL). Under ITALIAN law this is not spelled out by the statutory provisions. However, according to legal authors it is a requirement which has to be met.

III. Contracts with clients may include both service and sales contracts

3. Under AUSTRIAN, BELGIAN, FRENCH, GERMAN, GREEK, ITALIAN, DUTCH, PORTUGUESE and SPANISH law (Raúl Bercovitz Álvarez in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles; p.513), the scope of application includes not only the sale of goods but also service contracts (AUSTRIA: § 1(1) HvertG.; BELGIUM: art. 1 Verbraeken & de Schoutheete Nr. 74, GERMANY § 84 I HGB; FRANCE: Ccom art. L.134-1; THE NETHERLANDS, CC art. 7:428). Under ITALIAN law there is no explicit reference in the statutory rules; however, its applicability to service agents is defended by legal authors. Under AUSTRIAN law there is an exception: contracts relating to immovables do not fall within the definition (§ 1(1) HvertG.).

4. However, in the Directive, UK, FINNISH and SWEDISH law, the scope of the commercial agency rules is restricted to contracts for the sale of goods. (Art. 1(2) of the Directive; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 2(1); FINLAND: art. 2 Act on Commercial Agents; SWEDEN § 1 HaL).

IV. Remuneration

5. The commercial agency rules in the Directive and in the legal systems of BELGIUM, ENGLAND, FINLAND, GREECE, ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS, POLAND, PORTUGAL, SCOTLAND, SPAIN and SWEDEN only apply to commercial agency contracts which provide for remuneration by the principal (art. 2(1) Directive; AUSTRIA: § 1(1) HVertrG; BELGIUM: art. 1 Handelsagentuurwet, ENGLAND, SCOTLAND: Reg. 2(2); FINLAND: art. 2 Act on Commercial Agents and Salesmen; GREECE: art. 1 para 2 Law on Commercial Agency; ITALY: CC art. 1742; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:428 I; POLAND: CC art. 758 § 1; PORTUGAL: art. 1 DL no. 178/86; SPAIN: art. 1 LCA; SWEDEN: § 1 HaL).

Section 2: Obligations of the commercial agent

IV.E.–3:201: Negotiate and conclude contracts

The commercial agent must make reasonable efforts to negotiate contracts on behalf of the principal and to conclude the contracts which the agent was instructed to conclude.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The commercial agent must actively negotiate contracts for the principal. The agent may be engaged in negotiations either in its own name or in the principal's name. The agent may also be charged with the conclusion of contracts on the principal's behalf. The agent who is authorised to do so must undertake proper efforts in the performance of this obligation.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Where parties have a commercial agency relationship, the agent is under an obligation to act as an intermediary for the principal by negotiating contracts. The commercial agent must only conclude contracts on the principal's behalf if the parties have so agreed. In both situations the agent is obliged to use its best endeavours.

This provision is protective of the principal. It is meant to avoid negative effects on the principal's business because of the agent's non-compliance with its obligations. The agent should not affect the relationship between the principal and the customers by acting without due care. The principal may lose its good reputation and the customers may refrain from contracting with it and its turnover may decrease. This rule is of special importance where the agent is charged with concluding contracts, because then the transactions entered into by the agent create legal consequences for the principal.

On the other hand, the agent, too, has an important reason to comply with this obligation: its income will be directly or indirectly related to the number and value of contracts concluded between the principal and the customer. Moreover, this obligation is not unreasonably burdensome for the agent: it does not mean that it must always succeed in negotiating and concluding a certain number of contracts. The agent does not fail to perform this obligation merely because a contract is not concluded.

C. Reasonable efforts

The commercial agent must do its best to negotiate and, if the parties so agree, to conclude contracts. Reasonableness in the context of the Article is to be judged by the criteria mentioned in the definition of that term in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness). What is "reasonable" is to be objectively ascertained, having regard to the nature and purpose of what is being done, to the circumstances of the case and to any relevant usages and practices. The agent cannot sit back, wait and incidentally pass on orders to the principal, but must actively search for potential customers and try to convince them to conclude contracts with the principal. The agent cannot guarantee, however, that its negotiations will always be successful. The agent must use its best endeavours.

This objective standard may require adaptations for two reasons. In the first place, a higher or lower standard of activity may be required according to the principal's expectation of the agent's reputation or experience, which is justified given the circumstances of the case. In the second place, it is possible that the contract contains specific requirements regarding the level of activity expected of the agent. Whether or not the agent uses its best efforts may affect its right to commission.

D. Negotiate contracts

The task of the commercial agent who negotiates contracts on behalf of the principal is to prepare transactions by searching for customers and convincing them to enter into a contractual relationship with the principal. The fact that the agent negotiates contracts on behalf of the principal neither creates obligations for the agent towards the (potential) customers nor vice versa. The agent may however be liable vis-à-vis the principal if it does not negotiate properly. The agent may, for instance, have neglected the reasonable instructions given by the principal (IV.E.–3:202 (Instructions). Moreover, mere negotiations are not binding upon the principal and the potential customer. Only if and to the extent that the principal and the customer have actually concluded a contract, will they be bound.

E. Conclude contracts

The principal may charge the commercial agent with the conclusion of contracts on its behalf either on a permanent or incidental basis. The commercial agent is under an obligation to undertake reasonable efforts to do so. This means, for instance, that the agent who has successfully negotiated a contract, should approach the customer within a reasonable time in order to conclude the contract.

Where the agent has the right and the obligation to conclude contracts, the commercial agent must also deal with complaints by customers regarding the products involved. The parties may agree that the agent must also accept payments on the principal's behalf and, if so, under which conditions.

In relation to the conclusion of contracts reference should be made to Part D (Mandate), although in case of conflict the rules in this Chapter prevail (IV.E.–1:201 (Priority rules)).

NOTES

I. Reasonable efforts to negotiate

1. This element is taken from art. 3(2)a of the Directive, where it is stated that the commercial agent must make proper efforts. A similar rule has been transposed into the following national legal systems: AUSTRIA: § 1 para 1 HVertrG; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 3 (2) a; FINLAND: art. 5 Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE: Ccom art. L.134-4; GERMANY: § 86 I HGB; GREECE: art. 4 Law on commercial agency 219/1999; SWEDEN: HaL § 5 (2) a.
2. Under AUSTRIAN law the commercial agent must exercise 'der Sorgfalt eines ordentlichen Kaufmanns' (§ 5 HVertrG). Also under ITALIAN and SPANISH law, the commercial agent must exercise the due diligence of a good businessman. (SPAIN: art. 9 para 2 sub a LCA, Ccom art. 57, Moxica, 98). Under DUTCH law the principal must observe the diligence of a good principal (zorg van een goed opdrachtnemer, CC art. 7:401).

3. In SPAIN if the agent represents more than one principal, the agent must give an even-handed attention to the interest of all the principals, according to the rule of good faith. In order to avoid conflicts it seems advisable to establish in every particular contract a minimum level of operations to be negotiated on behalf of the principal. A failure will amount to non-performance and consequently as a cause for termination (SAP Lugo 4 June 1994, AC 1994\988).

II. To conclude contracts

4. This element has been taken from art. 3(2)a of the Directive which has been transposed in the following statutory provisions. AUSTRIA: § 1 para 2 HVertrG; BELGIUM: art. 1, art. 6 sub 1 Handelsagentuurwet; FINLAND: art. 5 Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE: Ccom art. L. 134-1; GERMANY: § 86 I HGB; GREECE: art. 4 Law on Commercial Agency; ITALY: CC art. 1752; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:428 I; POLAND: CC art. 758(1); SPAIN: art. 6 LCA (according to the LCA art. 6, the agent may only conclude contracts on behalf of the principal when such faculty has been granted to the agent in conformity with the terms of the contract).

IV.E.–3:202: Instructions

The commercial agent must follow the principal's reasonable instructions, provided they do not substantially affect the agent's independence.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The agent must comply with the instructions given by the principal. The agent has to follow only instructions which are reasonable in view of the content and the nature of the agreement. In order to be reasonable, instructions must be given in a timely fashion.

However, the principal may never substantially affect the agent's independence. The agent may arrange its activities and use its time as it thinks fit.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The commercial agent may, as an intermediary, bind the principal if it concludes contracts in the principal's name. Therefore, it is important for the principal that the commercial agent closely follows the principal's instructions. Without this obligation, the agent could negotiate (and conclude) contracts on the principal's behalf without following instructions. This would be contrary to the principal's purpose of appointing an intermediary to represent its interests.

While this Article protects the interests of the principal, it also takes into account the fact that the agent has an interest in remaining autonomous. Moreover, the agent does not have to follow any instructions by the principal, only those instructions which are reasonable.

C. Reasonable instructions

The commercial agent is only required to follow those instructions which are reasonable. Reasonableness in the context of this Article is to be judged by the criteria mentioned in the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness). The circumstances of the case and the applicable usages must be taken into account as well as what persons acting as a commercial agent and principal in the same situation would consider reasonable.

The principal usually has its own business policies relating to the conditions of sale such as the prices of the products, the production and delivery terms, the terms of payment and the procedure for dealing with customers' claims. Generally, instructions relating to these policies will be considered reasonable.

> Illustration 1
> A principal instructs its commercial agent to see its customers once every week. Such an instruction is unreasonable, since it substantially affects the commercial agent's independence.

NOTES

Reasonable instructions

1. According to art. 3(1)c of the Directive a commercial agent must comply with reasonable instructions given by his principal.

2. In BELGIAN, UK, FINNISH, GREEK, ITALIAN, POLISH, PORTUGUESE, SPANISH and SWEDISH law an obligation for the commercial agent to follow instructions is included in the specific rules on commercial agency. (BELGIUM: art. 6 Handelsagentuurwet; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 3(2) c; FINLAND art. 5 of the Act on Commercial Agents; GREECE: art. 4 of the Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1746; POLAND: CC art. 760 I § 1; PORTUGAL: art 7 a. DL 178/86, Pinto Monteiro (1998) 62, Pinto Monteiro (2002) 93, STJ 25/01/2000, AD, 467, 1519; SPAIN: LCA art. 9 para. 2 sub c , Moxica, 24; SWEDEN: § 5 II a HaL, Söderlund 39).

3. Under AUSTRIAN, GERMAN, FRENCH and DUTCH law such an obligation is not included explicitly in the statutory rules concerning commercial agency. Under AUSTRIAN and GERMAN law this obligation follows from the commercial agent's obligation to behave as a good businessman (AUSTRIA: § 5 HvertG.; GERMANY: § 84 I(2) HGB, § 86 I HGB, § 665 BGB, Koller/Roth/Morck, § 86 HGB no. 9; Martinek/Semler, § 8 no. 58, BGH, NJW 1966, 883). Under FRENCH and DUTCH law such an obligation follows from the general rules concerning mandate (FRANCE: Leloup no. 1322-1330 ; Com. 24. 11. 1998, Bull. civ. IV, n° 277; Défr. 1999, 371 obs. D. Mazeaud; RTDciv. 1999, 98 obs. J. Mestre ; ibid., 646 obs. P.-Y. Gautier; Cont. Conc. consomm. 1999, no. 56 note Malaurie-Vignal; JCP 1999.I.143, no. 6 obs. Jamin; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:402(1)).

4. According to all these legal systems the instructions from the principal may not affect the commercial agent's independence. (BELGIUM: art. 6 Handelsagentuurwet; UNITED KINGDOM:: Reg. 3(2) c; FINLAND art. 5 of the Act on Commercial Agents; GERMANY: § 84 I (2) HGB (BGH, NJW 1966, 883; Koller/Roth/Morck, § 86 HGB no. 9); GREECE: art. 4 of the Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1746; PORTUGAL: art 7 a DL 178/86, Pinto Monteiro (1998) 62, Pinto Monteiro (2002) 93, STJ 25/01/2000, AD, 467, 1519; SPAIN: art. 9 para. 2 LCA, 24; SWEDEN: § 5 II a HaL, Söderlund 39).

IV.E.–3:203: Information by agent during the performance

The obligation to inform requires the commercial agent in particular to provide the principal with information concerning:

(a) contracts negotiated or concluded;
(b) market conditions;
(c) the solvency of and other characteristics relating to clients.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The obligation to inform is imposed by IV.E.–2:202 (Information during the performance): the agent must disclose all the information in its possession which the principal needs for the proper performance of its part of the contractual obligations. The agent must inform the principal of its specific individual situation, concerning issues such as the transactions which were prepared or concluded and with whom. In addition, the agent also must inform the principal concerning more general issues, such as the market in which the agent operates. The list of required information in this Article is not exhaustive.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

While the principal is the party who will be bound by a sales or service contract negotiated by the agent, the principal is not in a position to verify, for instance, the customer's solvency or reputation. It is thus important for the good functioning of the principal's business that the principal is provided with such information. The principal needs to know how many and which contracts have been negotiated regarding its products in order to decide whether it will conclude a certain contract. Information about the market in which the agent operates enables the principal to judge whether the agency will remain worthwhile.

This obligation is not unreasonably burdensome for the agent: the agent only has to communicate the information which is available to it, in so far as this is needed by the principal for the performance of its obligations in relation to the agent and the customers.

C. Information to be provided

The agent must inform the principal of its past, present and future activities, the customers found and the market situation in which it operates. This information is relevant to the need for the principal to perform the obligations under the contracts with the agent and the customer or customers.

Under this obligation the agent must make reasonable efforts to ensure that the information is correct. In this respect information concerning the market must be distinguished from information concerning the agent's own activities. With respect to the former it will be more difficult for the agent to obtain accurate information, since it concerns more variable (unforeseeable) factors. However, concerning the latter, the standard of care may be a higher one in the case of information concerning its own activities.

Contracts negotiated or concluded. Apart from informing the principal of the contracts concluded or negotiated, this obligation includes, amongst other things, the obligation to transmit third parties' complaints or claims which the agent has received or has become aware of and special demands by customers concerning the products involved.

Market Conditions. These conditions include, among other things, modifications in demands by customers, price developments and the state of competition. The obligation is limited to information relating to the agent's territory.

The solvency of and other characteristics relating to customers. This obligation is limited to the customers' relevant characteristics, the main one being solvency. However, the principal does not need to know all the characteristics relating to customers if the agent may conclude the contract on the principal's behalf. In that case the characteristics of the customers represent a value for the agent, which it is not obliged to share with the principal.

D. No formalities

There is no general form requirement as to the way in which this information is to be provided. The aim of the Article is merely to oblige parties to communicate.

NOTES

I. Information to be provided

1. According to the Directive the '… commercial agent … must communicate to his principal all the necessary information available to him' (art. 3(2)b of the Directive).
2. This obligation is laid down in a specific statutory rule in the following countries. BELGIUM: art. 6 sub 2 Handelsagentuurwet; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 3 (2) b; FRANCE: art. 1 Décret n 58-1345 du 23-12-1958; GERMANY: § 86 II HGB; GREECE: art. 4 of the Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1746; POLAND: CC art. 760 I § 1; SPAIN: art. 9 para. 2 sub b LCA. Under DUTCH law it follows from the rules concerning mandate (CC arts. 7:401, 7:403, Asser-Kortmann, no. 201 ff).

II. Contracts negotiated or concluded

3. Under AUSTRIAN, FINNISH and SWEDISH law it is laid down in statutory law that the commercial agent must inform the principal about the contracts negotiated or concluded (AUSTRIA: § 5 HvertG; FINLAND: art. 5 Act on the Commercial Agent; SWEDEN: § 5 para. 2 HaL). According to authors in the NETHERLANDS this obligation follows from the rules concerning mandate (CC arts. 7:401, 7:403 (Asser-Kortmann, no. 201 ff). Also according to GERMAN case law and legal literature the agent must inform the principal with respect to contracts negotiated or concluded (BGH, NJW 1966, 882; BGH, BB 1969, 1196; OLG Köln, BB 1971, 543; Koller/Roth/Morck, § 86 HGB no. 7; Martinek/Semler, § 8 no. 61; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 86 HGB no. 50).

III. Market conditions

4. In SPAIN Although the LCA art. 9 does not oblige the agent explicitly to inform the principal of the market conditions, some authors consider that the agent's duties include giving information about the operations being negotiated and about the market conditions (Raúl Bercovitz Álvarez in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p.523). BELGIAN and FINNISH literature, GERMAN case law and literature, ITALIAN case law and SWEDISH literature mention market conditions as one of the subjects concerning which the agent has to inform the principal (BELGIUM: Dambre, 1401; FINLAND: Telaranta (1993), Aalto (2001); GERMANY: BGH, NJW 1966, 882; BGH, BB 1969, 1196; OLG Köln, BB 1971, 543; Koller/Roth/Morck, § 86 HGB no. 7; Martinek/Semler, § 8 no. 61; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 86 HGB no. 50; ITALY: Cass. 19-8-1996, n. 7644, Danno e resp., 1997, 256; SWEDEN: Söderlund, 38). However, in GERMANY these market conditions are restricted to actual market conditions.

IV. Characteristics of clients

5. The solvency of the client is one of the client's main characteristics. The agent's obligation to inform its principal with regard to the client's solvency is mentioned explicitly in the SPANISH statute concerning commercial agency. Also BELGIAN, FINNISH literature, GERMAN case law and literature, DUTCH case law and literature and SWEDISH authors include the client's solvency as one of the subjects about which the commercial agent must inform its principal (BELGIUM: Dambre, 1401; FINLAND: Telaranta 1993; Aalto 2001; GERMANY: BGH, NJW 1966, 882, BGH, BB 1969, 1196; OLG Köln, BB 1971, 543, Koller/Roth/Morck, § 86 HGB no. 7; Martinek/Semler, § 8 no. 61; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 86 HGB no. 50; NETHERLANDS: Rb. Amsterdam 27-3-1962, NJ 1962, 443, Asser-Kortmann no. 202 ff; HR 2-12- 1960, NJ 1962, 21; SPAIN: art. 9, para. 2, b LCA; SWEDEN: Söderlund, 38).

IV.E.–3:204: Accounting

(1) The commercial agent must maintain proper accounts relating to the contracts negotiated or concluded on behalf of the principal.

(2) If the agent represents more than one principal, the agent must maintain independent accounts for each principal.

(3) If the principal has important reasons to doubt that the agent maintains proper accounts, the agent must allow an independent accountant to have reasonable access to the agent's books upon the principal's request. The principal must pay for the services of the independent accountant.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The commercial agent has to keep proper accounts, in particular relating to the contracts it has negotiated or concluded (paragraph (1)). The agent has to keep documentation concerning the customers involved in the contracts. Where appropriate, the agent must maintain accounts of payments receivable on the principal's behalf and of the products of the principal. Where the agent represents more than one principal, this obligation to keep accounts also obliges the agent to keep separate accounts for each principal it represents (paragraph (2)). This provision entitles the principal to verify whether the agent actually complies with the obligation to keep proper accounts in paragraph (1), when the principal has reasons to doubt that the commercial agent keeps proper accounts. This may be the case, for instance, when the information provided by the agent is not correct, or the information is not provided in due time or in the case of a sudden decrease in the number of contracts negotiated (paragraph (3)).

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

For the performance of its obligations under the contract, the principal needs specific information from the agent. Accordingly, it is reasonable to expect the agent to keep proper accounts. Proper accounts also include keeping separate accounts for different principals.

This provision entitles the principal to verify whether the agent actually keeps proper accounts. However, the principal may inspect the agent's books only if the principal has important reasons to believe that the agent does not keep proper accounts. The agent is not obliged to disclose information in the books which it keeps in its relationship with other principals, if the agent complies with its obligation to keep separate accounts (paragraph (2)).

Although this provision seems to favour mainly the principal, it is not unreasonably burdensome for the agent, who as a professional will usually keep proper accounts. Where the agent complies with this obligation to keep accounts, it will be easier for it to comply with the obligation to inform. The agent also needs proper accounts for its own purposes, for instance because it has to know which commission it is entitled to in relation to which contracts and from which principal. After the contract, the commercial agent may require proper accounts in order to prove that the principal cannot terminate the contract for non-performance.

C. Proper accounts

The agent is always obliged to keep books relating to the contracts it successfully negotiates or concludes with customers on the principal's behalf. If the agent has the principal's products at its disposal, the accounts will include an overview of how the agent disposes of them. If the parties have agreed that the agent must accept customers' payments in the principal's name, an overview of all sums received and to be received are also to be included in the agent's books. If the commercial agent represents more than one principal, it must maintain independent accounts for each principal represented.

NOTES

Obligation to keep separate accounts

1. Under SPANISH law, the agent must keep separate books of the accounts with regard to the different principals it represents (art. 9 (2) e LCA). Also according to GERMAN law the commercial agent must keep accounts. This follows from the general rules relating to mandate (§ 666 BGB). The accounts must contain a proper written overview of the income and the expenditures under § 259 I BGB (Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 86 HGB no. 53). Furthermore, § 259 I BGB also requires that the vouchers have to be submitted. If the parties have not agreed upon another arrangement, the commercial agent has to fulfil the obligation regarding monthly accounts by way of analogy to § 87 c I (1) HGB (Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 86 HGB no. 53). An obligation to maintain independent accounts for each principal represented is not required, but is common practice. Also under PORTUGUESE law there is a statutory obligation: art. 7 DL 176/86, Pinto Monteiro (1998) 63.
2. Under FINNISH law there are no explicit rules in this respect. However, these rules are implied in the obligation to inform. Also according to DUTCH law authors seem to derive this obligation from the obligation to inform (CC art. 7:403, Asser-Kortmann, no. 201). Under ITALIAN law there is no explicit obligation. However, the commercial agent must specify and prove the facts from which its entitlement to remuneration follow, and therefore, in particular the conclusion of the relevant contracts (Cass. n. 5467/00).

3 According to AUSTRIAN, GREEK law there is no explicit obligation for the commercial agent to keep proper and separate accounts.

4. In ENGLAND, the representative must keep proper accounts on behalf of the principal. (Chitty)

Section 3: Obligations of the principal

IV.E.–3:301: Commission during the agency

(1) The commercial agent is entitled to commission on any contract concluded with a client during the period covered by the agency, if:

(a) the contract has been concluded

(i) as a result of the commercial agent's efforts;
(ii) with a third party whom the commercial agent has previously acquired as a client for contracts of the same kind; or
(iii) with a client belonging to a certain geographical area or group of clients with which the commercial agent was entrusted; and

(b) either

(i) the principal has or should have performed the principal's obligations under the contract; or
(ii) the client has performed the client's obligations under the contract or justifiably withholds performance.

(2) The parties may not, to the detriment of the commercial agent, exclude the application of paragraph (1)(b)(ii) or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

One of the characteristics of a commercial agency is that the main part of the agent's remuneration typically consists of commission. During the contract period the commercial agent is entitled to commission on contracts concluded during this period if these contracts were entered into as a result of the agent's activity or if these contracts were concluded with customers which the agent has previously acquired for contracts of the same kind (paragraph (1)(a)(i) and (ii)).

However, the agent can also be entitled to commission on contracts which have not been negotiated or concluded by the agent: when the customer belongs to the agent's area or group of customers (paragraph (1)(a)(iii)).

The agent is entitled to commission as soon as the obligations under the contract have or should have been performed (paragraph (1)(b)). The parties may agree that the entitlement to commission arises before performance by either the principal or the customer, for instance when the contract is concluded. However, they may not agree that the entitlement to commission arises at a moment which is later than the customer's performance (paragraph (2)).

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

In the case of commission-based remuneration the interests of the agent and those of the principal run parallel: both parties aim at a maximum number of successful contracts. If the agent does not find many customers willing to conclude contracts, not only are the gains of the principal directly affected, but also the agent's income is reduced. It is no different when the agent has made important investments. Thus, commission-based remuneration gives the agent an incentive to use its best efforts to negotiate or conclude as many contracts as possible.

This Article gives the agent, in principle, a right to commission on contracts which are the result of its activities. The agent's interest in earning commission is well protected in case the agent is entrusted with a specific area or group of customers. Then it is, in principle, entitled to commission whether or not its activities have contributed to the contract and whether or not it has an exclusive right to such an area or group of customers: the mere fact that the customer belongs to that area or group is sufficient for its entitlement.

Paragraph (1)(b) provides incentives for the agent to negotiate contacts with reliable customers, since the mere conclusion of the contract does not entitle the agent to commission. Only when the contractual obligations are performed by one of the parties is the agent entitled to commission. However, this does not burden the agent unreasonably. Paragraph (1)(b) also provides that commission is earned in certain specific situations, even though the contractual obligations have not yet been performed. This is the case when the principal should have performed or the customer justifiably withholds its performance. Paragraph (2) determines that, whatever the parties have agreed upon in their contract, the agent's entitlement to commission arises with the customer's performance or the customer's justified exercise of its right to withhold its performance.

C. Result of the agent's efforts

In order to be entitled to commission, the agent must actively negotiate with customers on the principal's behalf, by locating potential customers or groups of customers and trying to persuade them to conclude a contract with the agent or the principal. The negotiating agent must communicate offers to the principal. The mere fact that the agent has mentioned a customer is insufficient to give a right to commission. The agent must have contributed to the conclusion of the contract between the customer and the principal in an identifiable, considerable and useful manner. However, it is not required that the agent has made efforts to acquire the customer with the purpose of concluding a particular contract; the agent is also entitled to commission when it has acquired the customer at an earlier stage for contracts of the same type.

> Illustration 1
> A has a mobile telephone network. B, as a commercial agent for A, procures customers who will obtain a mobile telephone subscription to that network. During the period of the agency between A and B, A directly approaches the customers procured by B to subscribe to that mobile phone network. B is also entitled to commission on the contracts with those customers.

D. Customers from a specific geographical area or group

This Article entitles the agent to commission regardless of whether its efforts have led to the conclusion of a contract between the principal and the customer. The fact that the agent is working in a certain territory or with a certain group of customers and that the principal concludes a contract with a customer belonging to this territory or group during the period of the agency, creates for the agent a direct entitlement to commission. In this case the agent does not have to prove that the conclusion of the contract was the result of its actions.

E. Performance of the contract with the customer

The agent's entitlement to commission exists only when its activities have proved to be effective, i. e. when the obligations under the contract have or should have been properly performed. The principal then owes the agent the commission on that particular transaction. This obligation to pay commission does not mean that the agent may immediately claim the agent's commission as the commission is to be paid periodically (see IV.E.–3:304 (When commission is to be paid)). The agent may demand payment only from the expiry of the agreed period (at the latest three months). If the agent claims payment before that period, the principal may justifiably withhold performance until that moment.

F. Amount of commission

This Article leaves it to the parties to agree upon the rate of the commission and the method of calculating it. The parties usually explicitly stipulate in a detailed manner the rate of the agent's remuneration. The parties may agree that the rate of commission will be higher for contracts concluded as a result of the agent's efforts than for contracts concluded with customers belonging to the agent's area or group of customers.

In the absence of any agreement on this matter between the parties the contract is not invalid; a normal or reasonable commission is substituted in accordance with II.–9:104 (Determination of price). Factors which play a role in determining whether the amount of commission is reasonable include: the type and place of transactions, the type of goods or services, their price, the efforts made by the agent et cetera. Also, for instance, the length of the period during which the agent has to wait until it may claim the payment of the commission which it has earned can be taken into account.

G. Character of the rule

The parties may not derogate from paragraph (1)(b)(ii) to the detriment of the commercial agent.

NOTES

I. In general

1. The Article combines arts. 7 and 10 of the Directive. Art. 7 of the Directive determines under which circumstances there is an entitlement to commission, whereas art. 10 establishes when payment of the commission is due. (Art. 7 of the Directive: "(1) A commercial agent shall be entitled to commission on commercial transactions concluded during the period covered by the agency contract: (a) where the transaction has been concluded as a result of his action; or (b) where the transaction is concluded with a third party whom he has previously acquired as a customer for transactions of the same kind. (2) A commercial agent shall also be entitled to commission on transactions concluded during the period covered by the agency contract: – either where he is entrusted with a specific geographical area or group of customers, or where he has an exclusive right to a specific geographical area or group of customers, and where the transaction has been entered into with a customer belonging to that area or group. Member States shall include in their legislation one of the possibilities referred to in the above two indents.")

II. Entitlement to commission during the contract

2. Art. 7 of the Directive has been transposed into the following national legal systems: AUSTRIA § 8 (2) HVertrG.; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 7 (3); FINLAND: art. 10 of the Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE: Ccom art. L 134-6; GERMANY: § 87 I, II HGB; GREECE: art. 6(1) Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1748; Baldi and Venezia, note to Cass. sez. lav., 2-5-2000, n. 5467, cit., 802; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:431; POLAND: CC art. 761 § 1; PORTUGAL: art 16/3 DL 178/86, Pinto Monteiro (1998) 77; SPAIN: art. 12 LCA; SWEDEN: § 9 (1) HaL.

3. The Directive gave the Member States a choice as to whether or not to limit the right to commission to the case where the commercial agent's right to a specific geographical area or group of customers is an exclusive right. The present Article does not include such a limitation. Under the following legal systems the same option has been adopted: AUSTRIA § 8 (2) HVertrG.; FINLAND: art. 10 of the Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE: Ccom art. L 134-6; GERMANY: § 87 I, II HGB; GREECE: art. 6(1) Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1748; Baldi and Venezia, note to Cass. sez. lav., 2-5-2000, n. 5467, cit., 802; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:431; SWEDEN: § 9 (1) HaL.

4. UK, POLISH and SPANISH law have adopted the other option with respect to exclusivity (UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 7 (3); POLAND: CC art. 761 § 2; SPAIN: LCA art. 12; STS 14 May 2001, RJ 2001\6207. The LCA art. 14 should be interpreted in accordance with the LCA art. 17 (cases when the agent loses the right to commission). Therefore, the agent retains the right to be paid if the contractual obligations are not performed due to a reason attributable to the principal. On the other hand, if the cause of non-performance is not attributable to the principal, the agent has no right to commission.

III. The moment when commission is 'due'

5. In art. 10 the Directive contains a further rule with regard to the moment when the agent becomes entitled to commission. However, in that article the directive uses the concept of commission "due". This is potentially confusing, because normally the moment when an obligation is due indicates the moment from which the creditor can claim performance. Therefore, paragraph (1)(b), which contains the requirements of art. 10 (1) and (2) of the Directive, does not refer to the commission being "due" but continues the idea of entitlement.

6. The same requirements are included in the legal systems of the following countries: AUSTRIA: § 9 HvertG.; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 10 (2) and (3); FINLAND: art. 12 Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE: Ccom art. L.134-9; GERMANY § 87a I, III HGB; GREECE: art. 6(1) Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1748; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:343; PORTUGAL: art. 18 DL 178/86; SPAIN: art. 14 LCA; SWEDEN: § 11 (2) HaL.

IV.E.–3:302: Commission after the agency has ended

(1) The commercial agent is entitled to commission on any contract concluded with a client after the agency has ended, if:

(a) either

(i) the contract with the client is mainly the result of the commercial agent's efforts during the period covered by the agency contract, and the contract with the client was concluded within a reasonable period after the agency ended; or

(ii) the requirements of paragraph (1) of IV.E.–3:301 (Commission during the agency) would have been satisfied except that the contract with the client was not concluded during the period of the agency, and the client's offer reached the principal or the commercial agent before the agency ended; and

(b) either

(i) the principal has or should have performed the principal's obligations under the contract; or

(ii) the client has performed the client's obligations under the contract or justifiably withholds the client's performance.

(2) The parties may not, to the detriment of the commercial agent, exclude the application of paragraph (1)(b)(ii) or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Even if the agency has ended, the agent is still entitled to commission in two situations. First, when the contract is concluded within a reasonable time after the agency ended (paragraph (1)(a)(i)). Secondly, when the offer from the customer has reached either the principal or the agent before the end of the agency (paragraph (1)(a)(ii)). This rule merely deals with a transition period: although the parties will not continue the contractual relationship in the future, they still have a relationship in the sense that one party has undertaken activities during the period of the agency for which it would have been remunerated had the relationship not ended.

This Article applies for instance in the case where the agent has negotiated sales contracts for the supply of goods to be ordered and delivered periodically after the termination of the agency or where the principal has concluded contracts the obligations under which will be performed only after the termination of the agency.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

In the two situations mentioned above, it is considered reasonable to entitle the agent to commission on the contracts in question. It is assumed that the principal will benefit from the transaction which will be concluded shortly after the ending of the agency relationship. The rule protects the commercial agent's interest in receiving payment for its efforts made before the ending of the relationship.

However, the agent cannot expect to receive commission on transactions concluded a long time after the ending of the agency. This right to commission is limited to a limited number of specific situations. This rule therefore also takes into account the principal's interests.

C. Reasonable period

The parties are free to agree upon a period rather than leave it to the reasonableness test in paragraph (1)(a)(i). Reasonableness in the context of this Article is to be judged by the criteria mentioned in the definition of that term in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness). For instance, the nature and purpose of the contract, the circumstances of the case, and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved must be taken into account. Factors which play a role in order to determine a reasonable period include, for instance, the volume of the transactions and the time it normally takes the principal to conclude a contract negotiated by the agent. A reasonable term is normally no longer than 6 months.

D. Mainly the result of the agent's efforts

The requirements relating to the agent's entitlement after the agency has ended are stricter than those in IV.E.–3:301 (Commission during the agency). The agent has to prove not only that it played an active role in locating customers, negotiating with them and concluding the contract, but also that the conclusion was mainly due to its efforts. However, if the agent proves that the conclusion is primarily due to its actions, the agent may be entitled to commission in two situations – first, when the contract is concluded within a reasonable period after the ending of the agency; secondly, when the customer's offer reached the agent or the principal before the ending of the agency.

E. Performance of the contract with the customer

Another requirement for the existence of the agent's entitlement to commission is that the agent's activities have proved to be effective, i. e. when the obligations under the contract have, or should have been, properly performed. The principal then owes the agent the commission on that particular transaction. This obligation to pay commission does not mean that the agent may immediately claim commission; the commission is to be paid periodically (see IV.E.–3:304 (When commission is to be paid)). The agent may only demand payment from the expiry of the agreed period (at the latest three months). If the agent claims payment before that period, the principal may justifiably withhold performance until that moment.

F. After the agency has ended

This Article applies to situations where the contractual relationship has come to an end for whatever reason. It applies for example where a relationship entered into for a definite period has expired and where a contractual relationship has been terminated unilaterally, whether or not for non-performance.

G. Relation to an indemnity for goodwill and to damages for non-observance of the period of notice

The entitlement to commission after the end of the agency may not cumulate with an Entitlement to an indemnity for goodwill (IV.E.–2:305 (Indemnity for goodwill)) when the agency is terminated. Both rules are based on the same idea of restitution.

However, t(e entitlement to commission may cumulate with an entitlement to damages under IV.E.–2:303 (Damages for termination with inadequate notice).

Illustration 1
After 15 years, A, the principal, ends the agency of B, the commercial agent, by giving two months' notice. B claims the payment of commission according to the present Article, indemnity for goodwill and damages for termination with inadequate notice. A court will grant either (i) the payment of commission according to the present Article and damages for termination with inadequate notice or (ii) indemnity for goodwill and damages for termination with inadequate notice.

H. Character of the rule

The parties may not derogate from paragraph (1)(b)(ii) to the detriment of the commercial agent.

NOTES

I. In general

1. This Article is a combination of arts. 8 and 10 of the Directive. Art. 8 of the Directive determines under which circumstances there is an entitlement to commission after the end of the agency, whereas art. 10 establishes when the commission is "due". (Art. 8 of the Directive: "A commercial agent shall be entitled to commission on commercial transactions concluded after the agency contract has terminated: (a) if the transaction is mainly attributable to the commercial agent's efforts during the period covered by the agency contract and if the transaction was entered into within a reasonable period after that contract terminated; or (b) if, in accordance with the conditions mentioned in Article 7, the order of the third party reached the principal or the commercial agent before the agency contract terminated.")

II. Entitlement to commission

2. Art. 8 of the Directive has been transposed into the following statutory provisions: AUSTRIA: § 11 (1) HVertrG.; UNITED KINGDOM : Reg. 8; FINLAND: art. 11 Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE Ccom art. 134-7; GERMANY § 87 III HGB; GREECE: art. 6 para. 2 Law on Commercial Agency; ITALY: CC art. 1748; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:431(2); POLAND: CC art. 761 I.

3. Under SPANISH law there is a rule similar to art. 8 of the Directive (art. 13 LCA). However, under the Spanish rule, the contract with the client must have been concluded within three months after the contract ended, rather than within a reasonable period.

III. The moment when commission is 'due'

4. In art. 10 the Directive contains a further rule with regard to the moment when the agent becomes entitled to commission. The same requirements are included in the following legal systems: AUSTRIA: § 9 HvertG.; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 10 (2) and (3); FINLAND: arts. 12, 14 the Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE: Ccom art. L.134-9; GERMANY: § 87a I, III HGB; ITALY: CC art. 1748 para. 3; PORTUGAL: art. 18 DL 178/86; SPAIN: art. 14 LCA; SWEDEN: § 11 (2) HaL.

IV.E.–3:303: Conflicting entitlements of successive agents

The commercial agent is not entitled to the commission referred to in IV.E.–3:301 (Commission during the agency) if a previous commercial agent is entitled to that commission under IV.E–3:302 (Commission after the agency has ended), unless it is reasonable that the commission is shared between the two commercial agents.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This provision concerns cases in which the two preceding Articles may conflict, i. e. where an agent has been replaced by another agent and both claim their commission on transactions which have been concluded. According to the present rule, usually the first agent is entitled to the commission. However, certain circumstances may lead to the conclusion that the two agents must share the commission on a transaction, in particular when both of them have contributed to it.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Conflicts may arise between the first and the second agent relating to the question of who should receive the commission on a particular transaction. This rule protects the first agent's interest. If the first agent shows that the transaction was mainly due to its efforts and either the contract was concluded shortly after the ending of the agency or the customer's offer reached the first agent or the principal before the ending of the agency, then it is assumed that the transaction is due to the first agent's efforts more than to those of its successor.

However, the entitlements of the first agent can arise only during a short period after the ending of the agency and if all the requirements of IV.E.–3:302 (Commission after the agency has ended) have been met. This rule is therefore not unreasonably burdensome for the second agent. Moreover, it leaves open the possibility that both agents should share the commission.

Finally, this rule takes care of the principal's interest in the sense that the principal will never have to pay commission twice on a certain transaction.

C. Reasonableness of shared entitlement

Whether it is reasonable that the two agents share their entitlement to commission on a particular transaction depends to a large extent upon their respective contributions to the conclusion of the contract. In particular if the second agent's contribution to the conclusion of the contract was substantial, then the first agent's right will not necessarily prevail. If both agents are entitled to commission on the same transaction, each party's share must be reasonable.

NOTES

I. Conflicting rights to commission

1. This rule has been taken from art. 9 of the Directive which has been transposed into the national legal systems as follows: AUSTRIA: § 11(2) HVertrG; BELGIUM: art.

12 Handelsagentuurwet; FINLAND: Article 11. 2 of the Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE: Ccom L. 134-8; GERMANY § 87 I (2), § 87 II (2), § 87 III (2) HGB; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 9; ITALY: CC art. 1748 para.; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:431(3), Asser-Kortmann, nos. 208, 213; POLAND: CC art. 761 II; PORTUGAL: art. 17 DL 176/86; SPAIN art. 13(2) LCA.

II. Character of the rule

2. Under ITALIAN, DUTCH law this rule is mandatory (NETHERLANDS CC art.7:445(1), Asser-Kortmann, nos. 208, 213). Under the other systems it is a default rule, just as in the Directive.

IV.E.–3:304: When commission is to be paid

(1) The principal must pay the commercial agent's commission not later than the last day of the month following the quarter in which the agent became entitled to it.

(2) The parties may not, to the detriment of the commercial agent, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The parties may agree upon periodical payments of commission by the principal. The present rule provides a minimum standard: while the parties may agree that the principal must pay at an earlier date, they may not agree that the principal must pay at a later date. If the parties have not agreed on a period for payment, the commission is to be paid every three months. The moment of payment is usually also the moment when the statement of the commission to which the agent is entitled has to be supplied (see IV.E.–3:310 (Information on commission)).

According to this rule, the agent may have to wait in claiming commission for up to three months after it has earned it. The fact that the principal has free use of the money for an extra period can be taken into account when the rate of commission is fixed.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This Article, on the one hand, protects the agent in the sense that the parties may not agree that the principal can pay at a later moment than once every three months, while they remain free to agree on, for instance, monthly payments.

On the other hand, it allows the commission to be paid periodically which is mainly in the interest of the principal. It means that the commission earned on separate contracts is calculated over a certain period (three months) and paid at the end of that period.

C. Relation to other provisions

The general rule is that the time at which an obligation is to be performed depends on the terms regulating the obligation, which failing the obligation must be performed within a reasonable time after it arises (III.–2:102 (Time of performance). The terms regulating the obligation may be derived from the law (III.–1:102 (Definitions) paragraph (5). The present Article is an example of specific legal regulation of the time of performance.

However, the present rule deviates from III.–2:102 (Time of performance) in the sense that it limits the parties' freedom to determine the time of performance in their contract: the parties may not agree that the principal must pay on a later moment than provided for in this Article.

D. Character of the rule

This rule is mandatory: the parties may not agree that the principal must pay later than once every three months.

E. Remedies

The normal remedies for non-performance of a monetary obligation are available. The agent is in particular entitled to claim interest from the moment when the principal has failed to pay the commission which became due, i. e. at the end of the period fixed for payment (at the latest three months).

NOTES

Moment when commission is to be paid

1. The Directive employs the concept of commission 'due' in art. 10. This is confusing because normally the moment when an obligation is due indicates the moment from which the creditor can claim performance. Therefore this Article does not use the concept of commission 'due'.
2. Art. 10(3) and (4) of the Directive include: "(3) The commission shall be paid not later than on the last day of the month following the quarter in which it became due. (4) Agreements to derogate from paragraphs 2 and 3 to the detriment of the commercial agent shall not be permitted." A similar rule to that of art. 10(3) and (4) of the Directive has been transposed into the following legal systems. AUSTRIA: § 9 HVertrG; UNITED KINGDOM Reg. 10(3), (4); FRANCE: Ccom art. L. 134-9; GREECE art. 6 para. 3 Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1748; POLAND: CC art. 761 III § 3; PORTUGAL: art. 18 DL 178/86, Pinto Monteiro 1998, 80; RP 28/03/2001, JTRP7, www.dgsi.pt.; SPAIN: LCA art. 16 (the parties may stipulate in the contract for payment of the commission before the time provided for by art. 16). SWEDEN: HaL § 11(1).
3. However, under GERMAN law the commission must be paid before the last day of the month in which it became due (§§ 87 a IV, 87 c I HGB). But the minimum requirement – the last day of the month following the quarter in which it became due – is the mandatory rule (FINLAND: art. 14.2 Act on Commercial agents; NETHERLANDS: CC arts. 7:433, 7:434). Under FINNISH and DUTCH law the default rule is that the commission is due on a monthly basis (FINLAND art. 14.1 Act on Commercial agents; NETHERLANDS: CC arts. 7:433. 434).

IV.E.–3:305: Entitlement to commission extinguished

(1) A contract term whereby the commercial agent's entitlement to commission on a contract concluded with a client is extinguished is valid only if and to the extent that it provides for extinction on the basis that the client's contractual obligations are not performed for a reason for which the principal is not accountable.

(2) Upon the extinguishing of the commercial agent's entitlement to commission, the commercial agent must refund any commission already received.

(3) The parties may not, to the detriment of the commercial agent, exclude the application of paragraph (1) or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

In principle, each contract concluded by the principal as a result of either the agent's efforts or with a customer from the agent's area entitles the agent to commission once either the principal or the customer has performed the obligations under the contract (see IV.E.–3:301 (Commission during the agency) and IV.E.–3:302 (Commission after the agency has ended). The parties may agree that such an entitlement is extinguished, if the obligations under the contract with the customer are not performed. They may agree that the agent is to repay commission already paid but even if they do not expressly agree this the principal may recover any commission previously paid to the agent (paragraph (2)).

However, the agent cannot lose the right to commission when the principal is accountable for the non-performance (paragraphs (1) and (3)).

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The principal has an interest in not paying commission on transactions which have not been successfully brought to a successful end. The present provision recognises that interest because it entitles the principal to recover the commission already paid for such transactions.

The commercial agent is also protected in the sense that the agent cannot lose the right to commission where the principal is responsible for the non-performance.

C. Non-performance of the obligations under the contract with the customer

Extinguishing the agent's right to commission can only occur if the obligations under the contract with the customer are not performed and the non-performance is not due to the principal. This rule may therefore be applicable when it is clear that the customer cannot or will not perform the customer's obligations under the contract or when the principal can be excused non-performance under III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment). If the principal is however accountable for the non-performance, the agent is entitled to commission. As this is an exception on which the principal has to found in order to defeat an existing entitlement it will be for the principal to establish that it applies. It will therefore be for the principal to establish that there has been non-performance of the client's obligations and that this is for a reason for which the principal is not accountable. Although, in accordance with the normal drafting convention, the provision is drafted in the present tense ("are not performed") it is implied that the time for performance has passed. It would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing for the principal to try to exercise the right to extinguish the commission if there was still time within which the client's obligation could be performed.

D. Character of the rule

Paragraph (1) of this rule is mandatory in the sense that the parties may not deviate therefrom to the detriment of the commercial agent. The second paragraph is a default rule: parties are free to agree otherwise.

NOTES

I. Entitlement to commission extinguished

1. This rule has been taken from art. 11 of the Directive which has been transposed into the national legal systems of the Member States.
2. Art. 11 of the Directive: "The right to commission can be extinguished only if and to the extent that: – it is established that the contract between the third party and the principal will not be executed, and – that fact is due to a reason for which the principal is not to blame. 2. Any commission which the commercial agent has already received shall be refunded if the right to it is extinguished. …" AUSTRIA: § 9 (3) HVERTRG.; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 11; FINLAND: art. 13 Act on Commercial Agents and Salesmen; FRANCE: Ccom art. L. 134-10; GERMANY: § 87 a III (2) HGB; GREECE: art. 7 paras. 4-4a-7 Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1748(6); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:426(2), 7:432(2); the duty to refund commission is covered by the more general rules of onverschuldigde betaling (undue payment), CC arts. 6:203-6:211, Asser-Kortmann, no. 215, Nuytinck, at 7:432, Smit (1996) 48-50); POLAND: CC art. 761 IV; PORTUGAL: art. 19 DL 178/86 Pinto Monteiro (1998) 80; SPAIN: art. 17 LCA; SWEDEN: § 12 HaL.
3. However, under FINNISH law there is an additional requirement: it must also be clear that the contractual obligations are not going to be performed in the future (Art. 13.2 Commercial Agents Act).

II. Character of the rule

4. Art. 11(3) of the Directive provides: "Agreements to derogate from paragraph 1 to the detriment of the commercial agent shall not be permitted." See also: AUSTRIAN law, GERMANY: § 87a V HGB; ITALY: CC art. 1748 para. 6; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:445(1); SWEDEN: HaL § 12.

IV.E.–3:306: Remuneration

Any remuneration which wholly or partially depends upon the number or value of contracts is presumed to be commission within the meaning of this Chapter.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

If the parties have agreed that the agent is entitled to a remuneration which is completely or partially dependent upon the amount or value of the resulting transactions without explicitly referring to it as commission, then the rules on commission will nevertheless apply.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The presumption that any remuneration which depends upon the number or value of contracts amounts to commission is in the commercial agent's interest, because in such cases the protective rules in this Chapter will apply.

C. Basis of remuneration

Although the remuneration is normally calculated on the basis of contracts with customers which have been concluded and the obligations under which have been performed (IV.E.–3:301 (Commission during the agency) and IV.E.–3:302 (Commission after the agency has ended) the parties may agree upon a remuneration which does not depend on the amount or value of the contracts. Moreover, even though the agent will normally mainly or solely be paid by commission, the parties may agree that it will in addition be entitled to a fixed amount of money over a certain period or under certain conditions. Such remuneration may give the commercial agent the security of some income at the beginning of the relationship. At a later stage, the parties may agree on a fixed minimum sum in case the principal does not have any work for the agent, or not as much as usual, as a result of the principal's production capacity or company policies. Such a fixed amount then entitles the agent to a minimum income. It follows from the present Article that the rules on commission in this Chapter do not apply to such a fixed income.

Remuneration

1. In most European countries, this rule, which is laid down in Art. 6(2) of the Directive, has been transposed into the national legal system. (Art. 6(2) of the Directive: "Any part of the remuneration which varies with the number or value of business transactions shall be deemed to be commission within the meaning of this Directive." See: BELGIUM: art. 17 Handelsagentuurwet; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 2; FINLAND: art. 15 Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE Ccom art. L. 134-5; GREECE: art. 5 Law on Commercial Agency; POLAND: CC art. 758 I § 3; PORTUGAL: art 15 DL 178/86, Pinto Monteiro (1998) 73; SPAIN: art. 11 LCA.
2. § 87 b I of the GERMAN HGB includes art. 6 of the Directive. However, it is less detailed than the present Article and art. 6 of the Directive. The German provision merely determines that, in the absence of any agreement regarding remuneration, the commercial agent is entitled to the remuneration which is customarily allowed. The place where the commercial agent carries out business determines the remuneration (Koller/Roth/Morck, § 87 b HGB no. 2). If the commercial agent is unable to prove the customarily allowed remuneration, it is allowed to determine the remuneration in accordance with 'billigem Ermessen' (§§ 315, 316 BGB, Koller/Roth/Morck, § 87 b HGB no. 2; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 87 b HGB no. 13)

3. However, under AUSTRIAN, ITALIAN and DUTCH law, there is no such statutory rule.

IV.E.–3:307: Information by principal during the performance

The obligation to inform requires the principal in particular to provide the commercial agent with information concerning:

(a) characteristics of the goods or services; and

(b) prices and conditions of sale or purchase.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

During the agency contract, the principal must disclose all the information in its possession which the agent needs for the proper performance of its obligations under the contract (IV.E.–2:202 (Information during the performance)). The principal must inform the agent, in particular, concerning the products to be sold or purchased and the conditions under which the principal will conclude contracts with customers. This implies that the principal must also provide the agent with all relevant documentation where this is appropriate. The list of required information is not exhaustive.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

If the agent does not know which products the principal wants to sell or purchase and for which price, it will not find many customers willing to conclude a contract. Therefore, the principal must disclose information relating to the products involved and the conditions under which the principal wants to contract. This duty to provide information is not unreasonably burdensome for the principal: it only has to provide the agent with the information and documentation available to it, in so far as this is required by the agent for the performance of its obligations under the agency contract.

C. Relation to other provisions

This Article may be regarded as a further specification of the obligation to inform under IV.E.–2:202 (Information during the performance) and more generally of the obligation to co-operate under III.–1:104 (Co-operation).

D. Information to be provided

There is no general form requirement as to the way in which this information is to be provided. Depending on the circumstances the principal may, for instance, communicate the information to the agent by means of documents relating to the products, such as leaflets and standard contract forms. Unless otherwise agreed, this documentation must be provided free of charge.

The obligation is not an obligation of result as to the quality of the information: the principal must make reasonable efforts to ensure that the information is correct.

Characteristics of the products. The principal must provide the agent with information concerning all the relevant characteristics of the products involved. If the principal decides that it will purchase or sell other products, it must inform the agent and provide it with all the relevant information regarding the new products. The principal may be obliged to provide relevant documentation, for instance samples and designs.

Prices and sales conditions. Such information may include, for instance, information concerning prices, the terms of payment, the terms of delivery, the principal's commercial policy (for what type of customers the goods are meant) and any modifications to these. This obligation to inform may include the obligation on the part of the principal to provide documentation, such as price lists and printed advertising material.

NOTES

I. Information during performance

1. Under the Directive the obligation to inform has not been elaborated. Art. 4(2) a, b first sentence of the Directive merely states: "A principal must in particular: (a) provide his commercial agent with the necessary documentation relating to the goods concerned; (b) obtain for his commercial agent the information necessary for the performance of the agency contract, …"

2. The legal systems of the following countries contain a rule similar to the one included in the Directive: AUSTRIA § 6 (1) 1 HVertrG; BELGIUM: art. 8 sub 1, 2 Handelsagentuurwet; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 4(2) a; FRANCE: Art. 2 Décret n 58-1345, 23-12-1958; GERMANY: § 86 II HGB; GREECE: art. 4 Law on Commercial Agency; ITALY: CC art. 1749(1); THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:430; POLAND: CC art. 760 § II.

II. Characteristics of the goods or services, prices and conditions of sale or purchase

3. In some legal systems the contractual obligation to inform has been specified. Under GERMAN and SPANISH law the duty to provide the commercial agent with documentation is elaborated in the statutory provision itself. The principal must provide the agent with a collection of samples, catalogues, price lists and other documents necessary for its professional activity (GERMANY: § 86 a I HGB; SPAIN: art. 10(2) a LCA).

4. Under DUTCH and SWEDISH law such an elaboration of the obligation to provide information is not included in the statutory provisions themselves. However, reference is made to the items mentioned in the Article in the Parliamentary history of the general statutory provisions. (NETHERLANDS: MvT, Kamerstukken II 1988/1989, 20842, nos. 3, 4; Asser-Kortmann no. 207; Nuytinck, comment on arts. 7:430 (sub 2) and CC 7:611; SWEDEN: Prop. 1990/91:63, 63 f).

5. Under GERMAN law the information regarding the characteristics of the products, prices, conditions of sale, and the commission due are not mentioned explicitly in the HGB. However, the courts and legal authors do agree that the principal also has to inform the agent about these issues because this information is essential for the work of the agent (BGH, BGHZ 49, 44; BGH, DB 1972, 525; Koller/Roth/Morck, § 86 a HGB no. 3; Martinek/Semler, § 8 no. 72; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 86 a HGB no. 10-14).

IV.E.–3:308: Information on acceptance, rejection and non-performance

(1) The principal must inform the commercial agent, within a reasonable period, of:

(a) the principal's acceptance or rejection of a contract which the commercial agent has negotiated on the principal's behalf; and

(b) any non-performance of obligations under a contract which the commercial agent has negotiated or concluded on the principal's behalf.

(2) The parties may not, to the detriment of the commercial agent, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The principal has to inform the agent, who negotiates contracts on its behalf, concerning any follow-up action relating to offers or orders procured by it. The agent is entitled to know whether a transaction has been accepted, accepted subject to conditions or rejected. This provision does not mean that the principal has to provide reasons for refusing a transaction: the mere statement that a particular transaction has been refused without specifying any detail will be sufficient. It does, however, include an obligation for the principal to inform the agent on a more general level whether, as a rule, the principal will refuse a certain type of customer or contract. Where the contract with the customer has been concluded, the agent must be informed regarding any non-performance of the obligations under the contract. The agent is entitled to this information within a reasonable period.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This obligation is important for the negotiating agent because it enables the agent (i) to calculate its commission, (ii) to verify whether refusals have been given systematically, arbitrarily or in bad faith, and (iii) to inform the customers regarding the principal's reaction. It is also relevant for the agent who actually concludes contracts, because the fact that obligations under a contract have not been performed, may either completely remove the agent's right to commission or temporarily prevent the agent from demanding commission (IV.E.–3:301 (Commission during the agency) and IV.E.–3:302 (Commission after the agency has ended). Where appropriate, the performance also determines the agent's del credere liability (IV.E.–3:313 (Del credere clause). The agent itself cannot easily obtain information concerning the performance of the obligations under the contract with the customer, because after the negotiations (and the conclusion) the agent is no longer involved in the transaction between the principal and the customer.

This rule also takes the interest of the principal into account. The principal serves its own reputation if the agent can speedily answer a potential customer. Moreover, if the principal informs the agent in due time that it does not want to conclude a certain contract, no right to commission comes into existence. The present rule is not unreasonably burdensome for the principal, who has this information available. The principal knows whether it will accept or reject an order. The rule leaves the principal with reasonable time to decide whether it wants to conclude the contract. The principal will know more about the performance of the contractual obligations than the agent, because after the negotiations on (and the conclusion of) the contract by the agent, it will directly contact the customer and vice versa.

C. Character of the rule

This rule is mandatory; the parties may not deviate from it to the detriment of the commercial agent (paragraph (2)).

NOTES

I. Information on acceptance, rejection and non-performance

1. This rule has been taken from art. 4(3) of the Directive which has been transposed into the legal systems of the Member States. Art. 4(3) of the Directive states: "A principal must, in addition, inform the commercial agent within a reasonable period of his acceptance, refusal, and of any non-execution of a commercial transaction which the commercial agent has procured for the principal." AUSTRIA: § 6 (3) HvertG.; BELGIUM: art. 8 Handelsagentuurwet; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 4 (3); FINLAND: art. 8 Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE: Art. 2 Décret n 58-1345, 23-12-1958; GERMANY: § 86 a II (2) HGB. GREECE: Art. 4 Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC article 1749; NETHERLANDS: CC art.430(4); POLAND: CC art. 760 II § 2; PORTUGAL: art. 13 b DL 178/86, Pinto Monteiro (1998), 71; SPAIN: art. 10, para. 3 LCA).

II. Reasonable period

2. Some legal systems contain a different rule as to the period within which the information must be provided. Under AUSTRIAN and GERMAN law the principal must inform the commercial agent immediately (unverzüglich) (AUSTRIA: § 6(3) HvertG; GERMANY: § 121 BGB). Under PORTUGUESE law the principal must fulfil this obligation without delay (art. 13 b DL sem demora). According to SPANISH law the acceptance or rejection must be communicated within 15 days and, in the case of non-performance, as soon as possible considering the nature of the transaction (art. 10(3) LCA). The principal has to justify the rejection to the agent, according to RD art. 7(c) 1438/1985). Pursuant to the ITALIAN collective economic agreements of 9 June 1988 for commerce and 16 November 1988 for industry, the period within which the information is to be communicated is 60 days from the moment when the principal receives the order procured by the agent. After the expiry of this period, if the principal does not inform the commercial agent of the refusal, the transaction is deemed to be accepted.

III. Character of the rule

3. Under the directive this rule is mandatory (art. 5 of the Directive). See for transposition into the legal systems of the Member States: AUSTRIA: § 27(2) HvertG.; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 5; FRANCE: Art. 3-1 Décret n 58-1345, 23-12-1958; GERMANY: § 86 a III HGB; ITALY: CC art. 1749; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:445(1); POLAND:CC art. 760 II § 4; SPAIN.

IV.E.–3:309: Warning of decreased volume of contracts

(1) The principal must warn the commercial agent within a reasonable time when the principal foresees that the volume of contracts that the principal will be able to conclude will be significantly lower than the commercial agent could reasonably have expected.

(2) For the purpose of paragraph (1) the principal is presumed to foresee what the principal could reasonably be expected to foresee.

(3) The parties may not, to the detriment of the commercial agent, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This mandatory rule imposes an obligation on the principal to warn the agent regarding changes in its business which are likely to affect the agent's entitlement to commission. This rule takes into account the fact that, within a commercial agency, circumstances may change. If the principal foresees that its business capacity will diminish to a greater extent than the agent could reasonably expect, this rule obliges it to warn the agent. Because of the difficulty of proving what the principal actually foresaw, paragraph (2) introduces a presumption that the principal foresaw what it could reasonably be expected to have foreseen.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

If the principal does not inform the agent regarding, for instance, a decrease in the principal's production, the principal may refuse more orders than the agent would reasonably expect. This warning may be essential for the agent, because the agent's income depends solely, or to a large extent, on the amount of contracts concluded. The warning enables the agent to search for other means of income in time. This provision also avoids the situation where the agent incurs expenses in locating customers and negotiating contracts which the principal will eventually not conclude.

This obligation to warn is also in the principal's own interests. If the agent is warned a sufficient time in advance, it will not negotiate with customers in vain; the customers will not be disappointed and the principal's reputation will not be affected. This obligation is not unreasonably burdensome for the principal, because the principal does not have to provide the agent with the reasons why the volume of transactions will change, nor does the principal have to warn that this may lead to the ending of the agency. The principal must only warn the agent if it foresees a considerable change in volume.

C. Volume of contracts

The volume of contracts is the total amount of contracts during a certain period of time. The principal has to inform the agent both in situations where a decrease in volume is due to factors within the principal's control and where the decrease is due to a change in the market.

D. Reasonableness

The reasonableness of the time within which the warning is given must be assessed in accordance with the criteria mentioned in the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness). Factors to be taken into account include the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case, and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved. The same goes for the reasonableness of the agent's expectations. A good test to determine the agent's reasonable expectation will in most cases be the average volume of contracts with customers over the previous 5 years, or if the contract has been in existence for less than 5 years, over the whole period.

E. Character of the rule

This rule is mandatory; the parties may not deviate therefrom to the detriment of the commercial agent (paragraph (3)).

NOTES

I. Warning of decreased volume

1. This rule is included in the Directive (art. 4(2) b of the Directive: "A principal must in particular: … (b) obtain for his commercial agent the information necessary for the performance of the agency contract, and in particular notify the commercial agent within a reasonable period once he anticipates that the volume of commercial transactions will be significantly lower than that which the commercial agent could normally have expected." All Member States have transposed it into their national systems: AUSTRIA: § 6(2) HVertrG; FINLAND: art. 8 Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE: Art. 2 Décret no. 58-1345, 23-12-1958; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 4(2) b; GERMANY: § 86 a II (3) HGB; GREECE: art. 4 Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1749(1); NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:403(3); POLAND: CC art. 760 II § 4; PORTUGAL: art. 14 DL 178/86, Pinto Monteiro 1998, 73 ff; SPAIN: art. 10(2) b LCA; SWEDEN § 7 (3) HaL.

II. Reasonable period

2. The following legal systems contain a different rule concerning the period within which the warning must be given. Under PORTUGUESE law the principal must warn the commercial agent immediately (art. 13 c DL 178/86). Under SPANISH law, the principal must fulfil this obligation "as soon as he knows" of the decrease (art. 10(2) b LCA) and under SWEDISH law the principal must fulfil this obligation without unreasonable delay (SWEDEN: § 7 (3) HaL).

III. Character of the rule

3. AUSTRIAN, FINNISH, FRENCH law include a similar default rule (AUSTRIA: art. § 27 (2) HVertrG.; FINLAND, art. 8 Act on Commercial Agents; FRANCE: art. 3-1 Décret no. 58-1345, 23-12-1958).

4. However, under art. 5 of the Directive this rule is mandatory. In the same sense: UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 5(1); GERMANY: § 86 a III HGB; ITALY: CC art. 1749; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:445; POLAND: CC art. 760 II § 4.

IV.E.–3:310: Information on commission

(1) The principal must supply the commercial agent in reasonable time with a statement of the commission to which the commercial agent is entitled. This statement must set out how the amount of the commission has been calculated.

(2) For the purpose of calculating commission, the principal must provide the commercial agent upon request with an extract from the principal's books.

(3) The parties may not, to the detriment of the commercial agent, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The agent has a right to obtain, within a reasonable period, a statement of the commission that the agent has earned. The agent may furthermore request the principal for an extract from the principal's books, in so far as the information which the agent requests concerns the agent's entitlement to commission.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The commercial agent has a right to know the amount of the commission which it has earned. However, the agent is not necessarily aware that a contract which it has negotiated, and possibly concluded in the name of the principal, has actually led to performance of the obligations under it. This information is typically information which the principal has in its books. The principal must therefore provide the agent with regular overviews of the commission which has become due and, in addition, enable the agent to verify this statement by providing the agent with an explanation of the calculation used. The statement, including the calculation method, should place the agent in a position to make its own calculation.

This obligation is not unreasonably burdensome for the principal. The principal has reasonable time to make and to provide the statement of the commission to which the agent became entitled. This obligation does not require much extra effort, because the principal has to make this calculation anyway in order to be able to comply with its own obligation under the agency contract, i. e. to pay commission to the agent.

C. Relation to other provisions

"Reasonableness" is defined in general terms in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness). The statement is a notice in the sense of I.–1:109 (Notice). Therefore, the statement may be given by any means appropriate to the circumstances and becomes effective when it reaches the commercial agent.

D. Reasonable period

The parties may agree upon the moment when the principal has to provide the statement of commission. However, the term must be reasonable. To assess what is reasonable, the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved must be taken into account. However, normally it will be reasonable for the principal to provide the agent with the commission statement at or before the moment when the commission has to be paid.

E. Character of the rule

This rule is mandatory; the parties may not deviate therefrom to the detriment of the commercial agent.

NOTES

I. Commission statement

1. The present rule differs from the Directive and from UK, GREEK, ITALIAN and SPANISH law to the extent that under these legal systems the principal is required to provide a commission statement no later than the last day of the month following the quarter in which the commercial agent has become entitled to the commission rather than within a reasonable period. (Art. 12(1) of the Directive: "(1) The principal shall supply his commercial agent with a statement of the commission due, not later than the last day of the month following the quarter in which the commission has become due. This statement shall set out the main components used in calculating the amount of commission.' AUSTRIA: § 16(1) HVertrG; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 12(1); GREECE art. 7 paras. 5-6 Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY: CC art. 1749(2); POLAND: CC art. 761 V § 1; PORTUGAL art. 13 c DL 178/86, Pinto Monteiro (1998) 71; SPAIN: art. 15(1) LCA).

2. In contrast, under DUTCH law the principal must supply the commercial agent with a commission statement every month, unless they agree that the statement will be provided every two or three months. (CC art. 7:433(1)). Under AUSTRIAN law the commercial agent may request a statement of the commission to which it is entitled. As a consequence, the law allows for no delay in the delivery of the statement (§ 16 HVertrG).

II. Extracts from the principal's books

3. According to Article 12(2) of the Directive a commercial agent may request its principal to provide it with extracts from the books, which are available to the principle and which the agent needs in order to check the amount of the commission due. Under AUSTRIAN, UNITED KINGDOM, FRENCH, GERMAN, GREEK, ITALIAN, SPANISH law there is a similar rule (AUSTRIA: § 16 (1) HVertrG; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 12(2); FRANCE: art. 3 Décret n 58-1345, 23-12-1958; GERMANY: § 87c II HGB; GREECE art. 7 paras. 5-6 Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991; ITALY, CC art. 1749, Cass. 2-10-1998, n. 9802, in Mass. giur. ital., 1998, col. 9802; PORTUGAL: art. 13(2) DL 178/86, Pinto Monteiro (1998), 72; SPAIN: art. 15(2) LCA).

4. Under DUTCH law a commercial agent may require an inspection of the books. However, it cannot demand an extract from the books (CC art. 7:433(2), HR 28-2-1964, NJ 1964, 456 GJS; HR 5-2-1971, NJ 1971, 222 GJS).

III. Character of the rule

5. Under AUSTRIAN, FRENCH, GERMAN, GREEK law there is a similar rule. (AUSTRIA: § 27(1) HVertrG.; FRANCE: art. 3-1 Décret n 58-1345, 23-12-1958; GERMANY: § 87c V HGB; GREECE art. 7 paras 5-6 Law on Commercial Agency 219/1991).

6. However, according to UNITED KINGDOM and DUTCH law this rule is mandatory. (UK: Reg. 12(3); NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:445)

IV.E.–3:311: Accounting

(1) The principal must maintain proper accounts relating to the contracts negotiated or concluded by the commercial agent.

(2) If the principal has more than one commercial agent, the principal must maintain independent accounts for each commercial agent.

(3) The principal must allow an independent accountant to have reasonable access to the principal's books upon the commercial agent's request, if:

(a) the principal does not comply with the principal's obligations under paragraphs (1) or (2) of IV.E.–3:310 (Information on commission); or

(b) the commercial agent has important reasons to doubt that the principal maintains proper accounts.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The principal has obligations under IV.E.–2:202 (Information during the performance) and IV.E.–3:307 (Information by principal during the performance) to provide the agent with all the information the agent needs for the proper performance of the obligations under the contract. In order to properly fulfil these and other obligations the principal has to keep proper accounts, in particular relating to any follow-up action with regard to contracts negotiated by the agent on the principal's behalf, the agent's right to commission and the principal's volume of business. The principal must also keep documentation concerning the products involved in the contracts.

If the statement or the extract supplied by the principal in accordance with the preceding Article is incorrect, the commercial agent may have an important reason to doubt that the principal keeps proper accounts. The agent may then request an inspection of the principal's books by an independent accountant.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

For the performance of the commercial agent's obligations under the contract, the agent needs specific information from the principal. Accordingly, the principal may reasonably be expected to keep proper accounts. As a professional the principal will usually do so. Where the principal complies with this obligation to keep proper and separate accounts, it will be easier for the principal to comply with its other obligations under this Section. The principal thus also needs proper accounts for its own purposes.

This provision entitles the agent to verify, by means of an independent third party, whether the principal actually keeps proper accounts. The agent is also allowed to have such an inspection carried out, in the case where the principal does not comply with its obligation to provide a commission statement or an extract from the books under IV.E.–3:310 (Information on commission).

This provision takes into account the principal's interests in keeping its administration secret, because the agent is not granted direct access to the principal's books. Moreover, the agent has no general right to inspect the principal's administration. The agent can only do so in a limited number of situations, i. e. where the agent has important reasons to suspect that the principal has failed to perform its obligations properly. Finally, the inspection of the books by the accountant takes place at the agent's expense.

C. Proper accounts

The principal is always obliged to keep accounts relating to the products involved, the commission due and the follow-up action relating to those contracts which are the result of the agent's activities.

NOTES

Reasonable access to the principal's books

1. Under FINNISH law if the principal does not give the necessary extracts to the agent, a chartered accountant has a right to inspect the accounts to the extent that is required (Art. 20.2 Act on Commercial Agents). Under AUSTRIAN law there is a similar rule when the principal refuses to give the commercial agent access to the principal's books. In such a case the court may then appoint a registered account to check the books (§ 16(2) ff. HVertrG).
2. Under GERMAN law there is a similar rule to Article 2:311(3)(b) included in § 87c IV HGB. However, it must be necessary to establish the amount of commission due.
3. There is no specific provision under SPANISH law for such an obligation on the principal, although the Ccom art. 25 has a general obligation of proper business accountancy.
4. In ENGLISH law the representative has a right to information regarding commission and to extracts from the principal's accounts (Commercial Agents (Council Directive) Regulations 1993, Reg 12).

IV.E.–3:312: Amount of indemnity

(1) The commercial agent is entitled to an indemnity for goodwill on the basis of IV.E.–2:305 (Indemnity for goodwill) amounting to:

(a) the average commission on contracts with new clients and on the increased volume of business with existing clients calculated for the last 12 months, multiplied by:

(b) the number of years the principal is likely to continue to derive benefits from these contracts in the future.

(2) The resulting indemnity must be amended to take account of:

(a) the probable attrition of clients, based on the average rate of migration in the commercial agent's territory; and

(b) the discount required for early payment, based on average interest rates.

(3) In any case, the indemnity must not exceed one year's remuneration, calculated from the commercial agent's average annual remuneration over the preceding five years or, if the contractual relationship has been in existence for less than five years, from the average during the period in question.

(4) The parties may not, to the detriment of the commercial agent, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This rule aims to provide a method for calculating the amount of indemnity to which the agent may be entitled according to IV.E.–2:205 (Indemnity for goodwill). In order to do so, two steps must be taken. The first step concerns the identification of the new customers and the existing customers whose volume in the principal's business increased considerably.

Then, the agent's average commission that was paid on these customers is calculated for the last twelve months prior to the termination of the agency. Subsequently, the duration of these benefits for the principal must be estimated. Next, the rate if migration must be considered. The rate of migration is calculated on a yearly basis and is reduced for each year with a certain percentage of the commission for the migration rate, and the average interest rate must be taken into account as well (paragraph (2)). The second step concerns the comparison between the amount of indemnity calculated on the basis of paragraphs (1) and (2) and the annual average remuneration over the preceding five years. If the amount of indemnity exceeds the annual remuneration, the latter will be awarded. In other words, paragraph (3) provides for a maximum amount of indemnity.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The policy consideration underlying this rule is that the increased volume of business for the principal represents a benefit for the principal if the agency is terminated for which the agent should be indemnified. The present rule is in the interest of both parties, because it provides legal certainty and avoids extensive transaction and litigation costs for establishing the exact value of the goodwill which has passed between the parties.

In the interest of the commercial agents the calculation method tries to ensure that the agent is indemnified, as much as possible, for the loss of goodwill. On the other hand, the interests of the principal are taken into account by the fact that the principal's benefits usually decrease over time. Moreover, the provision also contains a maximum for the indemnity, which is also in the interest of the principal.

C. New or old customers

Each new customer acquired would usually entitle the agent to commission and must therefore be taken into account when calculating the amount of indemnity. The income which the agent would have earned from services (and other activities) provided to the customers should not be taken into account when calculating the indemnity.

Whether the agent is entitled to an indemnity for goodwill with regard to contracts concluded with previously acquired customers, depends on whether the commercial agent has substantially increased the volume of business with them. The increase in volume must be such that it equals the acquisition of a new customer in economic terms.

D. Likely future duration of benefits

The principal will not eternally benefit from the agent's activities. In order to determine how long the principal will profit from the continuous advantages which were generated by the agent, an estimation must be made. This estimation depends to a large extent on the market situation and the sector concerned. Usually these benefits last for 2 or 3 years, but they may last for as long as 5 years.

E. Attrition and migration rate

Over time, the principal always loses customers. A customer may conclude just one transaction with a principal without the intention to continue doing so on a regular basis. Also, customers switch to another principal, for instance because the other principal deals in another brand or different products, or they move to another area. The rate of migration is variable and must be evaluated from the particular experience of the agent in question. The rate of migration must be calculated as a percentage of the commission on an annual basis.

F. Discount for early payment by reference to average interest rate

This factor is meant to calculate the present value of the transactions taking into account that there is an accelerated receipt of income.

G. Maximum amount of indemnity

The third paragraph provides a final amendment to the amount of indemnity. It is not in itself a method of calculation, but it includes a limit to the amount of indemnity. The limit is the average annual remuneration. To determine the maximum sum to be paid to the commercial agent, the amount of indemnity calculated on the basis of paragraphs (1) and (2) must be compared to the commercial agent's average annual remuneration. To establish the latter, all forms of payment (not only commission) and all customers (not merely new customers or the ones generating more benefits for the principal) are to be included. If the amount of the indemnity which results from the calculation on the basis of the first two paragraphs is less than the average annual remuneration then the amount of indemnity calculated is awarded. If, however, the amount of indemnity exceeds the annual average remuneration, the latter is granted. In practice, it is quite unusual for this maximum to be reached.

H. Damages

Where the principal terminated the agency with inadequate notice the agent may decide to claim damages for the actual losses which it has suffered as a consequence of the termination of the agency: they may include the loss of clientele, investments made and costs incurred in the performance of the obligations under the agency contract, and payments to third parties, for instance employees or sub-agents. In that case the agent must prove both the loss and the fact that it was caused by the termination with inadequate notice (see IV.E.–2:303 (Damages for termination with inadequate notice)).

I. Character of the rule

This rule is a mandatory rule; the parties may not derogate from it to the detriment of the commercial agent.

NOTES

I. Calculating the amount of indemnity

1. The present article is based on the Report on the application of Article 17 of the Council Directive on the co-ordination of the laws of the member states relating to self-employed agents (86/653/EC) (Presented by the Commission) COM (96) 364 final (hereafter: Report of the Commission) which, in turn, was inspired by German case law.

2. Under GERMAN law the amount of indemnity is calculated as follows. First, the average commission on contracts with new customers is established (§ 89 b I (1) no. 2 HGB) and also the significant increase in volume concerning business with existing customers (see § 89 b I (2) HGB) for the last 12 month before the contractual relationship ended (BGH, WM 1991, 826; BGH, NJW 1983, 2879; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 87 b HGB no. 131). The result of this calculation must be multiplied with the number of years the principal is most likely to benefit from these customers in the future (Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 87 b HGB no. 137). To determine which number of years should be considered, all circumstances have to be taken into account. Usually, these benefits last for two or three years, but for long-lasting goods they may last for up to five years (BGH, NJW 1985, 860; OLG Frankfurt, BB 1973, 212; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 87 b HGB no. 82). Subsequently the resulting amount of indemnity must be corrected to take account of several factors. The first is the average rate of migration in the territory of the agent (Abwanderungsquote, BGH, Zeitschrift für Wirtschaftsrecht 1987, 1387; OLG Köln, Versicherungsrecht 1968, 966; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 b HGB no. 133). This rate is not estimated, but is calculated on the basis of the migration rates of the last years before the contract ended (Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 b HGB no. 133). The second is the average interest rate due to the accelerated receipt of income (the so-called Abzinsung, see BGH, NJW-RR 1991, 484; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 b HGB no. 139). The third is the average percentage of customers that will most likely conclude only one contract with the principal and refrain from further contracts in the future (so-called "Mehrfachkundenquote", see BGH, Zeitschrift für Wirtschaftsrecht 1987, 1387; Münchener Kommentar no. 132). The final factor is the reasonableness of the indemnity considering all the circumstances under § 89 b I (1) no. 3 HGB (BGH, NJW 1990, 2991; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 b HGB no. 138; see also Note under article 1:108). This correction normally entails a reduction in the agent's amount of indemnity (Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 b HGB no. 138). The criteria for establishing reasonableness are e.g. the duration of the contractual relationship and social or personal circumstances (Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 89 b HGB no. 103).

3. From the Report by the European Commission it follows that the Member States apply the rules which are the result of the transposition of art. 17(2) of the Directive in different forms. The AUSTRIAN courts use the GERMAN method of calculating the amount of indemnity. However, the AUSTRIAN courts regularly reach the maximum amount of indemnity, whereas the GERMAN courts never do so (Commission Report, 8).

4. In BELGIUM and SPAIN this is held to be a question which must be established by the courts (Verbraeken & de Schoutheete, no. 113; STS 16 November 2000, RJ 2000\9339 and 14 May 2001, RJ 2001\6207). The amount of the indemnity must be based on the specific remuneration established in the contract, excluding accessory provisions like deposit or delivery of the goods to the clients (SAP Albacete, 17 February 2005, JUR 2005\76703). Although there is no obstacle to admitting a contractual regulation of the way of calculating the indemnity for goodwill, the courts may moderate the amount in order to preserve the equity of the contract (SAP Barcelona 8 June 2005, JUR 2005\176788).

5. In the NETHERLANDS and SWEDEN it is assessed whether the requirements of art. 17 (2) of the Directive are met and subsequently a reasonable amount of indemnity is established (Asser-Kortmann, no. 239; § 28 (3) HaL, Söderlund, 128). In PORTUGAL the courts tend to assess directly whether an amount is reasonable and, if so, to award it (Commission Report, 6).

6. In ITALY, a court continued to apply the rules which prevailed before the provisions based on the Directive came into force. Another ITALIAN court applied the rules laid down in a collective agreement. The amount of indemnity is measured on the basis of the level of commission, the duration of the agency contract and the percentages set out in the collective agreement (Commission Report, 8).

7. In the UNITED KINGDOM the House of Lords has now held that under the Commercial Agents Regulations 1993 the agent is entitled to receive compensation for loss resulting from the termination, which may be calculated by valuing the income which the agency would have generated (Lonsdale v Howard & Hallam Ltd [2007] UKHL 32.

II. Maximum amount of indemnity

8. The Directive contains a rule concerning the maximum amount indemnity in art. 17 (2) sub b of the Directive, which states: "The amount of indemnity may not exceed a figure equivalent to an indemnity for one year calculated from the commercial agent's average annual remuneration over the preceding five years and if the contract goes back less than five years the indemnity shall be calculated on the average for the period in question." These rules have been transposed into the following statutory provisions: AUSTRIA: § 24(4) HVERTRG; UNITED KINGDOM: Reg. 17(4); GERMANY: § 89 b II HGB; ITALY: CC art. 1751; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:442(2); POLAND: CC art. 764 III § 2; SPAIN: art. 28 (3) LCA, Moxica 32; SWEDEN: § 28(3) HaL.

III. Character of the rule

9. Under art. 19 of the Directive", the parties may not derogate from Articles 17 and 18 to the detriment of the commercial agent before the agency contract expires." This rule is laid down in AUSTRIAN (§ 27 HvertG), BELGIAN (art. 23 handelsagentuurwet), GERMAN, ITALIAN (CC art. 1751), DUTCH law (CC art. 7:442, 7:445(2)), POLISH (CC art. 764 V), PORTUGUESE, SPANISH (STS 7 April 2003, RJ 2003/2951) and SWEDISH law.

IV.E.–3:313: Del credere clause

(1) An agreement whereby the commercial agent guarantees that a client will pay the price of the products forming the subject-matter of the contract which the commercial agent has negotiated or concluded (del credere clause) is valid only if and to the extent that the agreement:

(a) is in textual form on a durable medium;
(b) covers particular contracts which were negotiated or concluded by the commercial agent or such contracts with particular clients who are specified in the agreement; and
(c) is reasonable with regard to the interests of the parties.

(2) The commercial agent is entitled to be paid a commission of a reasonable amount on contracts to which the del credere guarantee applies (del credere commission).

COMMENTS

A. General idea

A del credere clause is a clause in which the commercial agent guarantees that the customer will pay to the principal the price agreed upon in the contract between the customer and the principal. Such a clause may increase the agent's liability if the customer does not perform. If the parties wish to include a del credere clause in the agency contract, they can only do so in textual form on a durable medium. The del credere clause may not extend to a general group of (or to all) customers (paragraph (1)(b)). The del credere clause may not unreasonably burden the commercial agent (paragraph (1)(c)). Moreover, the agent is entitled to specific compensation for the fact that the agent guarantees the customer's payments. This compensation is due from the moment of the conclusion of the contract between the principal and the client.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

A del credere clause gives the principal the possibility to control risk in the case of a customer's insolvency. This is important, especially if the agent has the authority to conclude contracts in the name of the principal. However, obviously such a clause may also imply great financial risks for the commercial agent.

In practice, the principal is frequently in a position to force the agent to accept a far-reaching liability for customers' performance. Since it is usually the principal who accepts or refuses a transaction, the agent may accept such liability for fear of losing the right to commission. Therefore, the agent needs protection. The present provision also protects the agent in the sense that the principal must pay separate commission on the contract for which the agent guarantees the payment by the customer.

NOTES

I. Del credere clause

1. BELGIAN, DUTCH, FINNISH, GERMAN, POLISH, PORTUGUESE, SPANISH law include a specific provision concerning a del credere clause (BELGIUM: art. 25 Handelsagentuurwet; FINLAND: art. 17 of the Act on Commercial Agents; GERMANY: § 86 b HGB; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:429; POLAND: CC art. 761 (1,2); PORTUGAL: art. 10 DL 178/86; SPAIN: art. 19 LCA). SCOTTISH law recognises del credere agency at common law (Gloag & Henderson para 19.17). The requirements concerning those del credere clauses included in those provisions will be discussed in the following notes.

2. GERMAN law contains a slightly broader definition of a del credere clause. § 86 b I (1) HGB states that the commercial agent can also guarantee the performance of an obligation resulting from a transaction. This can e.g. also contain a guarantee for the delivery of goods (Koller/Roth/Morck, § 86 b HGB no. 5).

3. In contrast, the Directive does not contain any provision in this respect, nor do AUSTRIAN, ENGLISH and FRENCH law.

II. In writing

4. According to BELGIAN, DUTCH, FINNISH, GERMAN, POLISH, PORTUGUESE and SPANISH law the del credere clause is invalid if it is not in writing. BELGIUM: art. 25 Handelsagentuurwet; GERMANY: § 86 b II (2) HGB; FINLAND: art. 17 Act on Commercial Agents; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:429(2); POLAND: CC art. 761 VII § 1; PORTUGAL: art. 10(1) DL 178/86, Pinto Monteiro (1998) 66. SPAIN: art. 19 LCA;) However, under SCOTTISH and SWEDISH law there is no such requirement (Gloag & Henderson para 19.17; Söderlund, 166).

III. Particular contracts or particular clients

5. Under FINNISH, GERMAN, POLISH and PORTUGUESE law a del credere clause may only be agreed upon in relation to either specific contracts or contracts with specific clients. (GERMANY: § 86 b II (1) HGB; FINLAND: art. 17 of the Act on Commercial Agents; POLAND: CC art. 761 VII § 1,2; PORTUGAL art. 10 DL 178/86; Pinto Monteiro (1998), 66).

6. In contrast, under BELGIAN, DUTCH, SCOTTISH, SPANISH and SWEDISH law there does not seem to be such a requirement.

IV. A reasonable clause taking into account the interests of the parties

7. In THE NETHERLANDS this is covered by CC art. 7: 429 para 4.

8. In the specific provision in GERMAN law the reasonability with regard to the interest of the parties is not mentioned explicitly. However, it is to be considered under general contract law.

9. FINNISH, SCOTTISH, SPANISH, SWEDISH law do not contain such a requirement.

V. Del credere commission

10. Under GERMAN, FINNISH, PORTUGUESE, SPANISH, SWEDISH law, the commercial agent is entitled to a specific commission in the case of a del credere clause. (This special commission accumulates with the normal one in PORTUGAL) (GERMANY: § 86 b I (1) HGB; Koller/Roth/Morck, § 86 b HGB no. 6; FINLAND, Art. 17 Act on Commercial Agents; PORTUGAL: art. 13 f. DL 178/86, Pinto Monteiro (1998) 72; Spain: art. 19 LCA; SWEDEN: Söderlund, 166.)

11. However, under GERMAN law there are two exceptions to this entitlement: (i), when the principal or the customer have their branch or residence abroad (§ 86 b III (1) HGB) or (ii) if the commercial agent's authorisation for concluding transactions is unlimited (see § 86 b III (2) HGB).

CHAPTER 4: FRANCHISE

IV.E.–4:101: Scope

This Chapter applies to contracts under which one party (the franchisor) grants the other party (the franchisee), in exchange for remuneration, the right to conduct a business (franchise business) within the franchisor's network for the purposes of supplying certain products on the franchisee's behalf and in the franchisee's name, and under which the franchisee has the right and the obligation to use the franchisor's tradename or trademark or other intellectual property rights, know-how and business method.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The essential elements which characterize a franchise relationship are: a) granting the right to operate the franchisor's method of business, which mainly includes licensing the use of intellectual property rights and know-how (the business package); b) selling certain types of products (distribution contract); c) the franchisee's independence: in the franchisee's name and on the franchisee's behalf; d) (direct or indirect) financial remuneration for the franchisor.

Franchise contracts should be distinguished from ordinary distribution contracts. They differ because of the following: first, although many franchise contracts have as their object the distribution of products, this is not always the case; secondly, in a franchise contract there is always the right to operate the franchisor's business method (which notably includes transferring the use of intellectual property rights and know-how); more generally, franchise networks are characterised by a much stronger uniformity than ordinary distribution networks. In fact, in the eyes of consumers there is frequently no difference between a daughter company (or subsidiary) and a franchisee.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The relevance of this Article is that it determines whether a certain contractual relationship is to be classified as a franchise. If so, the Articles in this Chapter apply. This is of particular importance in relation to the mandatory rules contained in several Articles.

Providing assistance is not considered an element of a franchising contract under the present Article. This approach differs from the one taken by European competition rules. According to European competition law, certain types of franchise agreements are exempted from falling under Article 81(1) of the EC Treaty, which prohibits agreements which are incompatible with the common market. In order to restrict the application of these exemption benefits, antitrust rules include assistance as an integral component of the business method being franchised. However, the aim of the present provision is that this Chapter applies to a broader range of franchise agreements. Hence, even when assistance is not provided, this Chapter applies.

C. Mixed contracts

Franchising agreements may draw specific elements from several types of contract: for instance, from a licence agreement relating to trademarks; a purchase or lease agreement concerning specific machinery and equipment; a distributorship agreement concerning the actual products to be marketed by the franchisee; a sales agreement to purchase the goods from the franchisor; a lease agreement concerning the premises where the business will be conducted, or an agreement on joint advertising along with the franchisor and other franchisees for the marketing of the products. The rules on mixed contracts will apply (II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts)). The rules applicable to each relevant type of contract will apply to the corresponding part of the franchise contract. Generally speaking the franchise contract as such (i.e. the part governed by this Chapter) will regulate the framework relationship within which the other contracts will operate.

D. Types of franchise contracts

On the basis of the subject-matter of franchising three main types of franchising are usually distinguished: industrial, distribution and service franchising. In the case of an industrial franchise, the franchisee produces goods according to the instructions of the franchisor and sells them under the intellectual property rights of the franchisor, whereas in the case of a distribution franchise, the franchisee simply sells certain goods in a shop which bears the franchisor's business name or symbol. Finally, a service franchise concerns situations where the franchisee offers a service under the business name, symbol or intellectual property rights of the franchisor.

E. Franchise network

A franchise network consists of a franchisor and the group of all franchisees that operate the same business method and the existing liaison among them.

F. Competition law

Competition law may affect franchise contracts. It depends on the stipulations of the franchise agreement at stake and its economic context whether this is the case. In its Pronuptia decision (Pronuptia de Paris GmbH v. Pronuptia de Paris Irmgard Schillgallis*, ECJ 28 January 1986, C-161/84, ECR 1986, 353) the ECJ held that the terms of a franchise contract concerning the confidentiality of assistance and know-how, the protection of the intellectual property rights, maintaining the identity and the reputation of the network, do not fall within the ambit of Article 81(1) EC. However, the terms of the contract that concern the partition of the market territorially do fall within the ambit of Article 81(1) EC. Having said that, a franchise agreement may be exempted if it falls within the block exemption laid down in the Commission Regulation EC No 2790/1999 of 22 December 1999 on the application of Article 81(3) of the Treaty to categories of vertical agreements and concerted practices.

The provisions included in this Chapter only apply to franchise contracts to the extent that they are valid in the light of competition law.

NOTES

I. Definition of a franchise

1. ITALIAN and SPANISH law include a statutory definition of franchise (ITALY: art. 1. L nr. 129/2004; SPAIN: art. 62 of *Ley de Ordenación del Comercio Minorista, (*Act 7/1996 of 15 January 1996, on Retail Trade).

2. However, European competition law includes several descriptions of franchises. See Pronuptia de Paris GmbH v. Pronuptia de Paris Irmgard Schillgallis, ECJ 28 January 1986, C-161/84, ECR 1986, 353; Regulation 4087/88 on the application of Article 85 (3) of the Treaty to categories of franchise agreements (OJ L 359/46) and the Guidelines of Vertical restraints of 2000).

3. Under DUTCH, ITALIAN and SPANISH law the competition law definition as included in Regulation 4087/88 is also used in private law issues. (ITALY: Pardolesi (1990) 66, Pretore di Milano, 21 July 1992, Grimaldi s. p. a. c. Magatelli ed Effeci s. a. s., Contratti, 1993, 173, (note De Nova, Franchising e apparenza); NETHERLANDS: HR 25 January 2002, NJ 2003, 31 note J. B. M. Vranken).

4. Under other legal systems definitions of a franchise can be found in case law, literature and model contracts. (FRANCE: Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 951).

5. The elements of all these definitions differ. Hereafter it will be considered to what extent the elements included in the present Article are also included in the various legal systems and model contracts.

II. Use of franchisor's tradename, trademark, know-how and business method

6. These elements correspond with those given by European law and a large majority of the legal systems and the model contracts. See:– Art. 3 a, b of Regulation 4087/88, Guidelines on Vertical Restraints 2000 nos. 32, 43, 199 and the Pronuptia de Paris GmbH v. Pronuptia de Paris Irmgard Schillgallis, ECJ 28 January 1986, C-161/84, ECR 1986, 353; AUSTRIA: OGH 26. 4. 1994, 4 Ob 535/94; ENGLAND: Adams/Prichard Jones §1.02; FRANCE: CA Colmar, 9. 06. 1982, D. 1982, 553 note Burst. Com. 8. 07. 1997, D. Aff. 1997, 960; RJDA 1994, n° 795, CA Paris, 7. 06. 1990, D. 1990, IR. 176.; 31. 03. 1993, RJDA 1993, n° 613. Com. 19. 02. 1991, D. 1992 somm. 391, obs. *D. M. Vranken, Wessels, 1991, 12, Barendrecht & van Peursem, 11; PORTUGAL: Pinto Monteiro (2002) 120; Coutinho de Abreu (1996) 63; Pestana de Vasconcelos (2000) 21; Ribeiro (2001) 143, STJ 14 April 1999, Agravo nº176/99 ; SPAIN: art. 62 para 1 of the Statute on retail sales, STS of 27 September 1996, RJ 1996\6646 and STS 4 March 1997, RJ 1997\1642; SWEDEN: definition by the Swedish franchise federation, Sohlberg, 32, 41; art. 1 of the ECE, the preamble of the ICC Model Contract and art. 2 of the Unidroit Disclosure Law.

III. To conduct a business in its own name and on its own behalf

7. These elements recur in the case law, legal literature or model contracts of all the legal systems. See: AUSTRIA: OGH 26. 4. 1994, 4 Ob 535/94; BELGIUM: Verbraeken & de Schoutheete No.139; ENGLAND: Adams/Prichard Jones at §1.02; FRANCE: Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 952, 958, Huet, no. 11624; GERMANY: Küstner/Thume, 1590-1594; Rohe, 412; ITALY: art. 1 L. 129/2004, Frignani (1999) 6;

NETHERLANDS: HR 25-1-2002, NJ 2003, 31 note J. B. Art. 1 of the ECE.

IV. In exchange for remuneration

8. This element is included in nearly all definitions in the case law, in European competition law and in those formulated by legal scholars or in model contracts. See:– European competition law: Art. 3 b of Regulation 4087/88; AUSTRIA: OGH 26. 4. 1994, 4 Ob 535/94; ENGLAND: Adams/Prichard Jones at §1.02; GERMANY: Küstner/Thume, 1590-1594; Rohe, 412; ITALY: art. 1 L. affiliazione commerciale, Frignani (1999) 6; NETHERLANDS: HR 25-1-2002, NJ 2003, 31 note J. Art. 1 of the ECE, the preamble of the ICC Model Contract and art. 2 of the Unidroit Disclosure Law.

V. To conduct a business within the franchisor's network

9. This element is laid down in the majority of the legal systems and in European competition law. See:– Guidelines on vertical restraints, no. 42, 43, 199; AUSTRIA: OGH 26. 4. 1994, 4 Ob 535/94; FRANCE: Huet no. 11621; ENGLAND: Adams/Prichard Jones at §1.02; GERMANY: Küstner/Thume, 1590-1594; Rohe, 412; ITALY: art. 1 L. 129/2004, Frignani (1999) 6; THE NETHERLANDS: HR 25-1-2002, NJ 2003, 31 note J. VI. Written requirement

10. Under ITALIAN law a franchise contract must be in writing: otherwise it is void (art. 3 (1) L. 129/2004).

IV.E.–4:102: Pre-contractual information

(1) The duty under IV.E.–2:101 (Pre-contractual information duty) requires the franchisor in particular to provide the franchisee with adequate and timely information concerning:

(a) the franchisor's company and experience;
(b) the relevant intellectual property rights;
(c) the characteristics of the relevant know-how;
(d) the commercial sector and the market conditions;
(e) the particular franchise method and its operation;
(f) the structure and extent of the franchise network;
(g) the fees, royalties or any other periodical payments; and
(h) the terms of the contract.

(2) Even if the franchisor's non-compliance with paragraph (1) does not give rise to a mistake for which the contract could be avoided under II.–7:201 (Mistake), the franchisee may recover damages in accordance with paragraphs (2) and (3) of II.–7:214 (Damages for loss), unless the franchisor had reason to believe that the information was adequate or had been given in reasonable time.

(3) The parties may not exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

In addition to the general duty for the parties in franchising to provide the other party with pre-contractual information (IV.E.–2:101 (Pre-contractual information duty)), this Article imposes a further duty on the franchisor, since it specifies the types of information which have to be provided. Paragraph (1) contains a list of items which must be disclosed. The franchisee needs to have such information in order to be able to enter the contract with full knowledge of all the relevant facts.

In addition to the remedies granted by the rule on the general duty to provide pre-contractual information, this specific provision establishes the specific remedy of liability in damages (paragraph (2)) in case the franchisor does not provide adequate and timely information on the items specified in the provision even if the lack of information does not give rise to a fundamental mistake.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This duty protects the franchisee's interests. The franchisee has to make important investments without having any other possibility to obtain this qualified information. This specific duty to provide pre-contractual information is aimed at guaranteeing that the franchisee will have all the relevant and necessary information in order to commit itself with full knowledge of the relevant facts.

The main reasons for imposing a duty on the franchisor to provide the franchisee with this information may be summarized as follows. The essential information in a franchise agreement is at the disposal of the franchisor, which owns or has legal rights concerning the intellectual property rights and the know-how regarding the franchise business formula. The franchisee has no other means to collect such information since it is part of the 'business secrets' of the franchisor and is therefore confidential. Some franchisors try to attract investors by proposing that they enter a non-existent network and by promising them the possibility to operate a formula which is either non-existent or not successful. Whilst the franchisor actively asks the prospective franchisee to disclose the necessary information by means of questionnaires, the prospective franchisee is usually not in a position to direct similar questionnaires to the franchisor. As a result, the franchisee completely depends on what the franchisor wants to disclose. The unilateral imposition of standard clauses which can only be accepted on a 'take it or leave it' basis by the franchisee justifies the latter receiving prior information regarding such terms.

This disclosure rule imposes a burdensome duty on the franchisor. The franchisor may be confronted with situations where it is not certain whether all the necessary information has been provided. It may not be possible either for the franchisor to be aware of all the facts which must be disclosed or to check whether those facts are correct.

C. Adequate information

The franchisor must provide the potential franchisee with the relevant information regarding the franchise business in order to enable the franchisee to conclude the contract with full knowledge of the relevant facts. The listing of the items in paragraph (1) is a minimum requirement: i.e. the franchisor may disclose more information but not less. In particular, relevant information normally includes:

The franchisor's company and experience. The information should include the particulars which identify the franchisor, such as the name or corporate denomination, the registered address and, where applicable, details of inclusion in the register of franchisors, as well as, in the case of a company, the share capital shown in the latest balance sheet, and details on registration in the mercantile register.

In addition, the information should also include essential information regarding the experience of the franchisor in the sector and, more specifically, regarding the franchisor's experience with the particular business formula. In principle, this information should include the date on which the franchise was launched, the main stages in the development of the business formula and the franchise network.

The relevant intellectual property rights. In principle, this information should include a certificate evidencing the granting and current validity of the title of ownership or licence for the use of the trademark and distinctive signs of the franchising company; and of possible legal proceedings against such a company, if any, with express mention in any event of the duration of the licence. The information must also indicate what will be the franchisee's rights over the intellectual property.

Here, and throughout these rules, 'intellectual property rights' includes industrial property rights, copyright and similar rights.

Characteristics of the know-how. The know-how is one of the elements contained in the business package transferred by the franchisor. It includes information concerning the franchisor's business method which is indispensable to the franchisee for the use, sale or resale of the contract products.

Commercial sector and market conditions. In principle, this information should include a general description of the franchise's sector of activity and an account of its most noteworthy features. In particular, it should include essential information regarding the state of competition, the state of demand and price development.

Franchise method. In principle, this information should include a general explanation of the system of business to which the franchise refers, the characteristics of the "know-how" and the assistance to be provided by the franchisor, as well as an estimate of the investments and expenses which are necessary for conducting a typical business. If the franchisor is to provide the potential individual franchisee with sales forecasts or trading results, these should be based on experience or studies and should be sufficiently justified.

Structure and extent of the franchise network. In principle, this information should include the form of the organisation of the franchise network and the number of establishments, distinguishing those exploited directly by the franchisor from those operated by other franchisees, the place where they are located and the number of franchisees which have recently ceased to belong to the network, stating whether such a cessation occurred due to the expiry of the contractual term or due to other causes for termination.

Fees, royalties and other periodical payments. In practice, parties generally agree that financial remuneration comprises two elements: the initial fee and ongoing periodical payments. Before entering into the agreement the franchisees must be aware of the conditions of payment, especially of those periodical fees which will be determined by the franchisor at a later stage. Information should be given regarding the criteria for determining the periodical payments to be made during the whole duration of the contractual relationship.

The terms of the contract. In principle, this information should include the rights and obligations of the respective parties, the duration of the contract, the fee system, the conditions for termination and, if applicable, for the renewal thereof, economic considerations, exclusivity agreements, and restrictions on the free disposal of the business by the franchisee.

D. Character of the rule

This rule is mandatory; the parties are not free to agree otherwise.

E. Remedies

This Article provides the franchisee with the specific remedy of damages (paragraph (2)), when the franchisor does not provide adequate and timely information on the items included in the specific list even if the information does not give rise to a mistake which would provide a ground for avoidance of the contract, unless the franchisor had reasons to believe that the information was adequate or given within a reasonable time.

NOTES

I. Pre-contractual information

1. There is such a duty under nearly all legal systems in the EU.

2. Under FRENCH, ITALIAN and SPANISH law such a duty is laid down in a statutory rule. Under FRENCH law this is the Loi Doubin (Ccom art. L. 330-3 and the Décret n 91-337 du 4 avril 1991, which elaborates Ccom art. L 330-3). Under ITALIAN law it is laid down in arts. 4, 6 L. 129/2004. Under SPANISH law it is laid down in art. 62, para. 3 of the Retail Trade Act and art. 3 of Real Decreto 2485/1998.

3. Under the other legal systems there is no specific statutory duty. Nevertheless, case law and literature in several countries have accepted such a pre-contractual duty under the general doctrine of good faith. (AUSTRIA: OGH 19. 1. 1989, 7 Ob 695/88; BELGIUM Verbraeken & de Schoutheete No.147 (b); GERMANY: § 242 BGB (good faith) Küstner/Thume, no. 1637-1649; Martinek/Semler, § 19 nos. 1-4, Bundesarbeitsgericht, DB 1980, 2040; OLG München, BB 1988, 865; OLG München, NJW 1994, 667, see also number 3.2 of the Ethikkodex of the German Franchise Association; FINNISH law: KKO 1993:130; THE NETHERLANDS: Asser-Hartkamp II, nos. 71, 159, HR 15-11-1957 Baris/Riezenkamp, NJ 1958, 67). However, in a decision on 2002, the HR held that there is no general obligation on the basis of good faith for the franchisor to provide the franchisee with information concerning the expected profit.

4. Under GREEK and PORTUGUESE law the general statutory rule concerning pre-contractual liability applies (arts. 197 and 198 of the GREEK Civil Code and art. 227 of the PORTUGUESE Civil Code). In addition, according to PORTUGUESE law in extreme situations, the provisions of art. 253 (Misrepresentation) or art. 282 (Usury) may be applied (Ribeiro (1992); Pestana de Vasconcelos (2000); Ribeiro (2000), 75). Finally, the doctrine of abuse of a right could be applied under GREEK and PORTUGUESE law (GREECE: CC art. 281, Voulgaris and Georgiadis and art. 334 of the PORTUGUESE civil code).

5. In addition, under FINNISH law the Commercial Agent Act is applied by way of analogy. Also the EurCodeEthics (art. 3(3)) and the Unidroit Model Disclosure Law (art. 3 et seq.) include an explicit pre-contractual obligation to provide information to the franchisee.

6. In contrast, under ENGLISH contract law there is no general duty of disclosure, Keates v. Cadogan (Earl of) (1851) 10 CB 591, 138 ER 234, but only an obligation not to make misrepresentations, Williams v. Natural Life Health Foods Ltd. [1998] 1 WLR 830, Boyle v. Prontaprint, unreported, 26 February 2000, CA; ANC Ltd. v. Clark Goldring & Page Ltd. [2001] BCC 479. SCOTTISH law is to the same effect: MacQueen & Thomson, chap. 2.89 et seq.

II. Contents of the information

7. FRENCH, ITALIAN and SPANISH law include a list concerning the items of information to be provided, which broadly correspond with those in the present Article. In FRANCE a Decree has been adopted (n° 91-337, 4 April 1991, in relation to Ccom art. L. 330-3; for ITALY see art. 3, 4 L. 129/2004; under SPANISH law a list of items is included in art. 3 of Real Decreto 2485/1998; Echebarría p.213; Art. 6 of the Unidroit Model Disclosure Law contains a more detailed list.

8. Under the other legal systems there are no specific statutory lists. However, the items mentioned in the Article recur in the case law, legal literature and model contracts in the following countries. GERMANY: OLG München, BB 2001, 1759; OLG München, BB 1988, 865; Flohr, 18; Martinek/Semler, § 19 no. 1-4, the OLG München, BB 1988, 865, OLG München NJW 1994, 667; GREECE: Georgiadis; PORTUGAL: Ribeiro (2000), 54.

9. In the NETHERLANDS the Hoge Raad has held that there is no general obligation for the franchisor to inform the franchisee concerning future turn-over and profit expectations (HR 25-1-2002, NJ 2003, 31, note J. B. M. Vranken). Further, concerning this issue there is no consensus among legal authors. Some authors require a more extensive obligation than the general one (Van der Heiden (1999) 47-48; Grosheide (1994) 382).

10. Under AUSTRIAN law there is only a general duty to disclose all the information necessary to run the franchise business in a satisfactory manner.

III. Remedies

11. If the franchisor fails to provide the franchisee with pre-contractual information, the franchisee usually has recourse to a remedy. However, these remedies differ from legal system to legal system.

12. Under ITALIAN law, if the information provided is incorrect, the franchisee may avoid the contract (art. 8 L.129/2004).

13. Art. L. 330-3 of the FRENCH Ccom. does not provide a specific remedy. From the case law of the Cour de Cassation it follows that if the franchisor has failed to provide the pre-contractual information, the franchise contract will be invalid, provided it has been proved that there is a defective consent on the side of the franchisee (Cass. Com. 2-12-1997, D. 1998, somm., 334, obs. D. Ferrier, Cass. Com. 10-2-1998, D. 1998 somm. 334). Also under DUTCH law, it will result in invalidity of the contract on the basis of defective consent (CC arts. 3:44, 6:228). In addition, CC art. 6:230 provides the franchisor the possibility to propose an adaptation of the contract.

14. Under SPANISH law, the franchisee has private law remedies as well. Although the Spanish system lacks specific rules concerning precontractual liability, according to some authors the rules on extra-contractual liability in CC art. 1902 should be applied (M.A. Domínguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 591). Therefore any damage caused to the franchisee by the franchisor's non-compliance with the duty gives rise to a liability to compensate. However, there is no consensus among authors concerning the type of remedy. Some argue that the rules on defective consent apply (CC art. 1265 ff, Hernando, p. 128 ff). Then, the contract may be avoided and the franchisee is entitled to claim restitution and damages. Nevertheless, the mistake has to affect an important element of the contract: according to the SAP Madrid 6 November 2007, RJ 2008\81, a benefits forecast, although it has to be based on the franchisor's experience or studies, is not a substantial element of the franchise contract. Therefore a mistake concerning this matter does not avoid the contract, as the object of the franchise is not obtaining the benefits, but exploitation of the franchisor's business.

15. Also, under GREEK and PORTUGUESE law the failure of the franchisor to provide pre-contractual information results in the invalidity of the contract. In addition, the franchisee may claim damages under the doctrine of culpa in contrahendo (GREECE: arts. 140, 147, 178, 179 AK, with respect to arts. 178, 179 AK, the case law has been restrictive CA Patras 150/2000 Dikaio Epixeiriseon kai Etairion 8-9/2000 890; PORTUGAL: CC art. 227, cf. Ribeiro (2000) 75).

16. Under GERMAN law non-performance of the obligation to provide pre-contractual information may result in an obligation to pay damages (culpa in contrahendo), recovering the negative Interesse (including: payments made to the franchisor, investments minus the re-sale-value, interests).

IV. Form requirements

17. Under FRENCH, ITALIAN, SPANISH and the Unidroit Model Disclosure Law the information must be provided in writing. (FRANCE: Ccom art. L.330-3; ITALY: art. 3(1) L. 129/2004; art. 62 para. 3 of the SPANISH Statute on Retail Trade, art. 4 of the Unidroit Model Disclosure Law).

18. Moreover, the information must be provided within a certain period before the conclusion of the franchise contract. However, this precise period differs from country to country. Under ITALIAN law it is 30 days before the conclusion of the franchise contract (art. 4 (1) L. 129/2004), whereas under FRENCH and SPANISH law it is 20 days before signing the contract or the precontract (FRANCE: Ccom art. L-330-3; art. 62(3) of the SPANISH Retail Trade Law) and according to art. 3 of the Unidroit Model Disclosure law it is 14 days before the precontract or the payment.

19. Under the other legal systems there are no form requirements. However in practice it is common for the information to be disclosed in writing. (GERMAN law: Martinek/Semler, § 19 no. 15-17; number 3.3. of the German Ethikkodex).

IV.E.–4:103: Co-operation

The parties to a contract within the scope of this Chapter may not exclude the application of IV.E.–2:201 (Co-operation) or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

Although in general the obligation of co-operation is non-mandatory there is an exception in the case of franchise contracts. The justification for this exception is the particularly close and collaborative nature of the relationship. Co-operation is of the essence of the relationship.

NOTES

1. See notes to IV.E.–2:201 (Co-operation).

Section 2: Obligations of the franchisor

IV.E.–4:201: Intellectual property rights

(1) The franchisor must grant the franchisee a right to use the intellectual property rights to the extent necessary to operate the franchise business.

(2) The franchisor must make reasonable efforts to ensure the undisturbed and continuous use of the intellectual property rights.

(3) The parties may not exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Under paragraph (1) of this provision, the franchisor is obliged to grant the franchisee the licence to use the intellectual property rights related to the franchise business. It necessarily implies that the franchisor owns or has legal rights to license these rights and that there are no third parties with better rights over the intellectual property who may disturb the use of the proprietary rights by the franchisee.

Under paragraph (2), the franchisor is bound to undertake reasonable efforts to prevent and to rectify situations where third parties claim that they have a better right over the intellectual property and consequently attempt to disturb the use of the rights by the franchisee.

Whilst paragraph (1) imposes on the franchisor the obligation to attain a certain result, which is to license the use of the property rights to the extent necessary to operate the franchise business, paragraph (2) merely obliges the franchisor to observe due diligence in providing an adequate response when there is an action, claim or proceeding brought or threatened by a third party concerning such intellectual property rights.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The licensing of intellectual and industrial property rights is the cornerstone in the proper functioning of the franchise business method. Consumer recognition of and confidence in the product identified by the trademark is the lifeline of a successful franchise system. In fact, this is the main reason for franchisees to be attracted by the franchisor's system of doing business.

Since it is the selling of products during the entire duration of the franchise which forms the object of the exploitation of the intellectual and industrial property rights it is essential for the franchisee to be provided with the necessary licences in order to be able to benefit from the attraction of the trademark and it is equally crucial that the franchisor ensures the undisturbed and continued use of these rights.

The franchisor is interested in the expansion of its business and image. Therefore the franchisor has to ensure that the members of the network utilise the trademarks and other signs which identify the business and also has to prevent and resolve situations where third parties intend to disturb the use of such rights. The franchisor must be in the lead in any action, claim or proceeding brought or threatened by a third party with regard to the intellectual property rights involved in the franchise business.

C. Granting intellectual property rights

The exact meaning of the expression "grant …a right to use the intellectual property rights" depends on the intellectual property rules in each legal system. Neither ownership of such rights nor registration is always a prerequisite for being able to assign them or to grant a right to use. Thus, the franchisor may be the owner or merely have the legal rights to grant or transfer the intellectual property rights involved in the franchise relationship.

D. To the extent necessary to operate the franchise business

These words refer to the package of industrial and intellectual property rights relating to trademarks, trade names, shop signs, logos, insignia, utility models, designs, copyrights and related rights, software, drawings, plans or patents held by the franchisor for the operation of the franchise business.

E. Undisturbed and continuous use of intellectual property rights

The franchisor is required to make reasonable efforts to guarantee the undisturbed and continuous use of the relevant intellectual property rights (paragraph 2). In assessing what is reasonable, the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved should be taken into account. (See the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness).)

The franchisor's intellectual property rights are protected against abuse by the franchisee. Apart from the rules in intellectual property law and the licence agreement, the franchisee is under an obligation to strictly limit the use of the rights to the operation of the franchised business and in the manner provided for by the franchisor (see IV.E.–4:303 (Business method and instructions)). Moreover, the franchisee is to be identified as a mere licensee of such rights.

The obligation to guarantee the undisturbed and continuous use of these rights may have different consequences depending on the national situation: e.g. the obligation to fulfil validity requirements according to national legislation (for example, renewing registration).

F. Character of the rule

This is a mandatory rule; the parties are not free to agree otherwise.

NOTES

I. Granting of intellectual property rights

1. None of the European legal systems include a specific statutory provision of this type. However, in a large majority of the legal systems either the granting of the right to use intellectual property rights or the transfer of intellectual property rights is recognised as an obligation of the franchisor in the case law, legal literature or model contracts.

2. The obligation to grant the franchisee a right to use intellectual property rights exists under the following legal systems: FRENCH law (Ferrier, no. 687; Huet, no. 11621), GERMAN law (Giesler/Nauschütt, § 5 no. 122; Martinek/Semler, § 19 no. 10, art. 2.2. of the Ethikkodex of the German Franchise Association), GREEK law (CA Thessaloniki 1043/1998 Dikaio Epixeiriseon kai Etairion 1998 491; First Instance Court of Athens 23373/1998 Dikaio Epixeiriseon kai Etairion 1999 864), NETHERLANDS: Pres. Rb. Arnhem 29-04-1988, BIE 1989, 157-159 (Quick-sportschoenen), Hof ‚s-Hertogenbosch 23-05-1989, IER 1989, 93-94 (Mc Donalds/McMussel,) Van der Heiden (1999) 32, 38-40). See also art. 1 III B EC Regulation 4097/88; art. 3.1 of the ICC Model Contract; arts. 1, 2.2 of the EurCodeEthics.

3. Under FINNISH law, even though there is no explicit obligation, it is considered to be included in the duty to co-operate. Under ENGLISH law such an obligation is probably considered to be an implied term (Adams/Prichard Jones Precedent I, (Clauses 4.1.4, 11.2)). SCOTTISH law is probably the same.

4. Under other legal systems the granting of intellectual property rights is a necessary element to classify a contract as a franchise agreement. Without it, there is no franchise contract, since the contract would not have a causa. This is the case in AUSTRIAN law; ITALIAN law: Tribunale di Milano, 30 April 1982, Soc. Standa c. Soc. Arcobaleno Market, Foro it., 1982, I, 2042; PORTUGUESE LAW: Meneses Cordeiro (1998) 76; Ribeiro (2000) 158; Pinto Monteiro (2002) 121; Pestana de Vasconcelos (2000) 25, STJ 14 April 1999, Agravo nº 176/99-2; SPANISH law: STS of 15 May 1985, RJ 1985/2393. Under Spanish law the franchisor is obliged not only to grant the intellectual property rights to the franchisee, but also to hand over all the necessary information concerning the licences and rights and technical assistance (know how included) as well, so that the franchisee may exploit the business successfully (Dominguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 602); art. 2.1 sub a and 2.1. sub c Real Decreto 2485/1998.

II. Undisturbed and continuous use

5. Such an obligation has been defended by Belgian and French authors. (Belgium: Verbraeken & de Schoutheete, no. 152; France: Ferrier, no. 687.) Also in Spain, authors have defended such an obligation, based on the principle of good faith from CC art. 1258 and Ccom 57 (Dominguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 602). They suggest the application of CC art. 1474 (concerning sales contracts) or CC art. 1554 concerning lease contracts by way of analogy to franchise contracts. Both the seller and the lessor must provide respectively the undisturbed use of the object sold or rented.

IV.E.–4:202: Know-how

(1) Throughout the duration of the contractual relationship the franchisor must provide the franchisee with the know-how which is necessary to operate the franchise business.

(2) The parties may not exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

One of the franchisor's main obligations is to provide the franchisee with the relevant know-how, by means of operational manuals, or, in the case of general knowledge and experience, through ongoing assistance.

Know-how is to be provided as part of the initial package to enable the franchisee to start the operation of the business, but also during the entire duration of the franchise in so far as necessary to operate the business activities correctly.

According to the present Article the franchisor must provide the franchisee with the necessary know-how during the entire period of the contractual relationship. This implies that if during that period the know-how is changed or updated, the franchisor must provide the franchisee with the updated know-how.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Know-how plays a central role in the franchise system. The franchisor's know-how is, together with the appeal of the trademark, the most interesting value which the franchisor has to offer to a franchisee. As a result, even relatively inexperienced entrepreneurs can start a sophisticated business concept. In addition, the franchisor and the other franchisees have an interest in the franchisee being provided with relevant know-how from the outset in order to maintain the standard and reputation of the whole franchise chain. This guarantees that the same method of exploitation will be used, which ensures the maintenance of the common image and reputation of the network and therefore eventually benefits both parties in franchising. If, within the franchise period, the operational system has to be modified, the franchisee must be made aware of such changes. In that way the franchisee will be able to adapt the operational method and consequently continue the correct operation of the business.

C. Necessary know-how

Know-how is defined by art. 1(f) of EC Regulation No. 2790/1999 as a package of non-patented practical information, resulting from experience and tested by the supplier, which is secret, substantial and identified In this context "secret" means that the know-how, as a body or in the precise configuration and assembly of its components, is not generally known or easily accessible; "substantial" means that the know-how includes information which is indispensable to the buyer for the use, sale or resale of the contract products; "identified" means that the know-how must be described in a sufficiently comprehensive manner so as to make it possible to verify that it fulfils the criteria of secrecy and substantiality.

Necessary know-how includes technical information, financial data, advice on site selection and the layout of the premises, the provision of start-up materials and any other specifications specifically relating to the system and the intellectual property rights and the utilisation of them contained in the operating manuals or the agreement.

D. Regularly reviewed know-how

Any modification of the operational method has to be communicated promptly to the franchisee. This is mainly done by updating the operational manuals and assisting the franchisee in adapting to the changes.

E. Protection of know-how

Protection of the franchisor's know-how from misuse by franchisees and competitors is taken care of by the provision which imposes on the franchisee the obligation to follow the business method and instructions (IV.E.–4:303 (Business method and instructions)) and by the confidentiality obligation in the general chapter (IV.E.–2:203 (Confidentiality)).

F. Relation to obligation to inform

The communication of know-how is a very particular manifestation of the franchisor's obligation to inform under IV.E.–4:205 (Information by franchisor during the performance). It is considered to be one of the main obligations for the franchisor since it concerns the indications as to how the business method is to be operated which are vital to allow the franchisee to exploit the franchise business. Such information is confidential because it forms part of the business secrets of the franchisor.

These specific characteristics justify that the obligation to communicate know-how, although, strictly speaking, contained in a more general obligation to inform, is formulated here as a specific obligation in a separate provision.

G. Character of the rule

This is a mandatory rule; the parties are not free to agree otherwise.

NOTES

I. Know-how

1. The content of know-how in the present Article corresponds with the definition given by art. 1 of the EC Regulation 2790/1999 on Vertical Agreements. In ITALY a similar definition is included in art. 1 para 3 L 129/2004. A corresponding definition is also used in BELGIAN, DUTCH, PORTUGUESE and SPANISH case law or by the authors of these legal systems. (BELGIUM: Verbraeken & de Schoutheete no. 150; THE NETHERLANDS: HR 25-1-2002, NJ 2003, 31 note J. B. M. Vranken; SPAIN: SAP Madrid, 6 November 2007, AC 2008\81, Hernando Giménez 245, Uría 739, contra Echebarría Sáenz (1995) p. 306). A corresponding definition is used by authors in ENGLAND. See Adams, John N. "Franchising: practice and precedents, para 3.118, 3rd ed, (1990), Butterworths. Spanish law lacks a precise definition of know how. However, the case law assimilates it to the franchisor's experience and industrial secrets (unknown to the general public) concerning the sector of the market where the franchise is exploited, including the methods of organisation of the business. Know how is regarded as information with a patrimonial value, necessary for the successful exploitation of the franchise (SAP Madrid 6 November 2007, AC 2008\81).

2. Art. 1 of the EC Regulation 2790/1999 on Vertical Agreements defines know-how as follows: '… a package of non-patented practical information, resulting from experience and testing by the supplier, which is secret, substantial and identified: in this context, "secret" means that the know-how, as a body or in the precise configuration and assembly of its components, is not generally known or easily accessible; "substantial" means that the know-how includes information which is indispensable to the buyer for the use, sale or resale of the contract goods or services; "identified" means that the know-how must be described in a sufficiently comprehensive manner so as to make it possible to verify that it fulfils the criteria of secrecy and substantiality;

3. Under the EurCodeEthics and in the comments of the ICC MODEL CONTRACT different definitions are employed. However, within these definitions the common features of know-how are: confidentiality, substantiality and identification.

II. Granting know-how

4. Under none of the legal systems is there an explicit statutory obligation to provide the franchisee with the necessary know-how. However, in a majority of the legal systems such an obligation has been accepted in the case law, legal literature or model contracts.

5. Under some legal systems such an obligation has been accepted as such, for instance under DUTCH law: HR 25-1-2002, NJ 2003, 31 note J. B. M. Vranken; PORTUGUESE law: Ribeiro (2000) 167, Pestana de Vasconcelos (2000) 27, Menezes Cordeiro (1998) 76. In ENGLAND: Adams, John N., "Franchising: practice and precedents", Model Franchise Agreement 1.

6. Under other legal systems it is inferred from the duty to co-operate. FINLAND; GERMAN law: Flohr, 108; Giesler/Nauschütt, § 5 no. 116; Martinek/Semler, § 19 no. 10; GREEK law: Court of Appeal of Thessaloniki 1043/1998 Dikaio Epixeiriseon kai Etairion 1998 491; First Instance Court of Athens 23373/1998 Dikaio Epixeiriseon kai Etairion 1999 864

7. However, under the FRENCH and SPANISH legal systems granting know-how is to be considered a validity requirement. Without this, the franchise contract is void, since there is no causa (FRANCE: CA Paris, 7. 06. 1990, D. 1990, IR. 176.; 31. 03. 1993, RJDA 1993, n° 613. Com. 19. 02. 1991, D. 1992 somm. 391, obs. D. Ferrier; Huet, no. 11621; SPAIN: SAP Barcelona 10 May 2000, JUR 2000\211264, SAP Barcelona 23 December 2003, AC 2004\433). However, another situation is distinguished as well. When there is know-how, but the franchisor refuses to provide it to the franchisee, the contract can be terminated by the court because of non-performance and damages can be granted. This solution seems to be supported by the SAP Madrid 6 November 2007, AC 2008\81 which considers granting the know how as one of the fundamental obligations of the franchisor. (Com. 24. 05. 1994, Cont. Conc. Consomm. 1994, n° 191 with note L. Leveneur).

IV.E.–4:203: Assistance

(1) The franchisor must provide the franchisee with assistance in the form of training courses, guidance and advice, in so far as necessary for the operation of the franchise business, without additional charge for the franchisee.

(2) The franchisor must provide further assistance, in so far as reasonably requested by the franchisee, at a reasonable cost.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Providing the franchisee with the right to use the intellectual property rights and with the know-how concerning the franchisor's method is generally not sufficient to allow the franchisee to successfully manage the business. In addition to such information, the franchisee may need assistance from the franchisor on using the information concerned in practice.

Paragraph (1) imposes on franchisors an obligation to assist the franchisees in order to provide them with the necessary support in commencing the operation of the business (initial assistance) and to solve problems which may arise throughout the duration of the relationship regarding the operation of the business concept (ongoing assistance). The franchisor is obliged not only to provide assistance actively but also to respond to the franchisee's demands for assistance when the requested assistance is necessary to enable the franchisee to operate the business correctly.

The content of the obligation to assist is specified in the wording of the Article: assistance is provided in the form of training courses, guidance and advice.

Paragraph (1) makes it clear that the necessary assistance is to be provided without any additional cost for the franchisee. It means that the payment to be made in exchange for assistance is deemed to be included in the payments made by the franchisee for the right to operate the franchisor's business method.

Paragraph (2) concerns the franchisor's obligation to respond to requests from the franchisee for further assistance. The franchisor is obliged to provide such assistance when the request is reasonable. The franchisor can charge the franchisee for the provision of further assistance in so far as the additional cost is reasonable.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This provision is mainly aimed at safeguarding the franchisee's expectations concerning the system which the franchisee has entered. Franchisees need certainty as to the proper way in which to conduct the franchised business, and it is only the franchisor which can provide this.

On the other hand, the obligation to assist and to be responsive to requests for further assistance in so far as they are reasonable is a burden imposed on the franchisor since it requires the franchisor continuously to keep up with the activities of the franchisees and to collaborate actively with the members of the network during the entire period of the franchises in order to guarantee that they operate the business correctly.

However, by providing active assistance to the franchisees, the franchisor guarantees a uniform exploitation throughout the network which is in the interest of all the franchisees, and ultimately of the franchisor as well.

C. Necessary assistance

Assistance is to be considered as a broad concept. It comprises the organisation of training courses, the provision of advice based on general knowledge and experience, e.g. advice on real estate and financial planning and visits to premises, in so far as is required in order to allow the franchisee to adequately operate the franchise business.

Assistance on site may include additional training (usually in an area of weakness or with respect to a newly introduced service, product, method or technique), the identification of the franchisee's successes and weaknesses, the establishment of strategies to attain the goals which have been set, conversations with employees and customers, and technical assistance.

D. Responsive to reasonable requests for further assistance

Standard assistance from the franchisor may not suffice to provide all franchisees with sufficient certainty concerning the method by which to conduct the business. Franchisees may need additional input from their franchisor. Through the present provision franchisees are granted the right to demand further assistance from the franchisor at a reasonable cost, in so far as the requests are reasonable. To assess whether requests are reasonable, the nature and the purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved should be taken into account. (See definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness)) Normally, requests which are meant to achieve guidance which serves to meet the specific needs of the franchisee in order to guarantee the adequate operation of the business, will be considered reasonable.

E. Without additional cost

Necessary assistance, along with the intellectual property rights and know-how, are part of the business package which the franchisor must transfer to the franchisee in exchange for direct or indirect financial remuneration. Therefore, such remuneration covers the provision of assistance which is necessary for the operation of the business. Only demands for specific assistance which is not necessary in general terms, but which may be necessary for the particular franchisee in order to meet the franchisee's needs as regards the adequate operation of the business and the maintenance of the quality standards, could lead to extra costs for the franchisee, in so far as the additional cost is reasonable.

NOTES

I. Obligation to provide assistance

1. In all legal systems the franchisor's obligation to provide assistance is considered to be one of the franchisor's main obligations by case law, legal authors or model contracts. (BELGIUM: Verbraeken & de Schoutheete No.151; FRANCE: Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 955, Ferrier, no. 692, Huet, no. 11621; NETHERLANDS: Van der Heiden (1999), 58 PORTUGAL: Ribeiro (2000) 179 ff, Pestana de Vasconcelos (2000) 32; Menezes Cordeiro (1998) 76; SPAIN SAP Valencia 21 May 1993 (AC 1993\1024), art. 2.1 sub c Real Decreto 2485/1998, Hernando Giménez 272 et seq.; under GREEK law the situation appears to be the same as under the present Article.) The franchisor is obliged to provide technical and commercial assistance during the whole duration of the contract, on the request of the franchisee, in order to preserve the patrimonial value of the business (Domínguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 602). As this obligation is substantial, the non-performance is considered fundamental and is a reason for termination of the contractual relationship (SAP Madrid 6 November 2007, AC 2008\81).

2. Under FINNISH, GERMAN and ITALIAN law this obligation follows from the doctrine of good faith or the duty to co-operate. (ITALIAN law: e.g. Lodo Arbitrale, Torino 11 July 1995, Società X c. Società Y, unpublished in Frignani, 157). In addition, under GERMAN law the rule concerning commercial agency is applied by way of analogy to franchising as well. (GERMANY Giesler/Nauschütt, § 5 no. 91; Küstner/Thume, no. 1694, Martinek/Semler, § 19 no. 10; Number 2.2. of the Ethikkodex of the German Franchise Association).

3. Also ENGLISH authors seem to support an obligation to provide assistance (Adams/Prichard Jones 348). In SCOTTISH law the obligation would arise from an implied term if not expressed: MacQueen & Thomson ch 3.34 et seq.

4. See also art. 15 of the ICC Model Contract and arts. 1, 2.2 of the EurCodeEthics.

II. Free of extra charge

5. The ICC Model Contract states, in Article 15.5: “The Franchisor shall use its reasonable endeavours to also provide the Franchisee with additional specific training, at the latter’s request, to meet its specific needs at the Franchisee’s sole expense and on the dates and at the locations stipulated by the Franchisor”. Also according to the definition of the EurCodeEthics assistance is free of charge: in exchange for the fee the franchisee is entitled, among other things, to ongoing assistance. Also according to BELGIAN law the price is included in the royalties (Verbraeken & de Schoutheete no.158).

IV.E.–4:204: Supply

(1) When the franchisee is obliged to obtain the products from the franchisor, or from a supplier designated by the franchisor, the franchisor must ensure that the products ordered by the franchisee are supplied within a reasonable time, in so far as practicable and provided that the order is reasonable.

(2) Paragraph (1) also applies to cases where the franchisee, although not legally obliged to obtain the products from the franchisor or from a supplier designated by the franchisor, is in fact required to do so.

(3) The parties may not exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The present Article is meant to establish (under paragraph (1)) that in the case that the franchisee is forced to obtain its goods or services only from the franchisor or from a supplier appointed by the franchisor, the franchisor must guarantee that the orders for the supply of the franchisee are met within a reasonable time, whether the supplier is the franchisor or a third party designated by the franchisor, in so far as the demands for supply are reasonable.

This provision also concerns cases where parties do not explicitly agree on an exclusive purchasing obligation for the franchisee but where the franchisee has recourse, in fact, to no other source of supply than the one provided by the franchisor or by the suppliers designated by the franchisor – e.g. when only the products supplied by the franchisor and suppliers designated by the franchisor meet the quality standards required. According to paragraph (2), the franchisor is also obliged to guarantee the delivery of the products to the franchisee within a reasonable time when there is de facto exclusivity.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

It is a very common practice in franchising that parties agree on an exclusive purchasing clause in favour of the franchisor. This obligation means that the franchisee's needs for supply can only be met either by the franchisor or by designated suppliers.

Exclusive purchasing obligations are justified when they aim to assure that the products distributed within the franchise network fulfil the objective quality standards of the franchisor's network. However, such a constraint is likely to have very negative consequences for the franchisee when the franchisor or the designated suppliers refuse to meet the franchisee's orders for supply, restrict the amount to be delivered or delay delivery without any business-related justification. This provision is meant to reduce these negative effects by assuring that the decision whether or not to supply the franchisee is not at the sole discretion of the franchisor or the designated suppliers.

This rule may be deemed a very burdensome obligation since the franchisor is obliged to guarantee that the franchisee is provided within a reasonable time with the supplies ordered, even when the counterpart of the franchisee in the sales contract is not the franchisor but another supplier designated by the franchisor. The rationale of this rule is that when the franchisee grants exclusivity to the franchisor, the former should obtain some advantage in return.

The obligation is, however, limited to guaranteeing the delivery of reasonable orders. The reasonableness test is meant to protect the supplier against orders for supply which demand the delivery of products which are not actually needed to enable the franchisee to operate the business. These are orders which exceed what the franchisee would normally order according to the contract and to the franchisee's actual needs for supply. Furthermore, the franchisor is only obliged to guarantee delivery in so far as it is practicable to do so (for the franchisor or for the designated suppliers) taking into account the suppliers' supply capacity.

A prompt delivery of the products is eventually beneficial for both parties. An adequate supply permits the franchisee to continue with the operation of the distribution business whilst at the same time it prevents temptations, on the side of the franchisee, to purchase competing products in order to fulfil its need for supply. Such a reaction of the franchisee would be certainly risky for the franchisor and the other franchisees because it may alter the uniform quality of the products within the franchise network.

C. Designated suppliers

As a counterpart of the franchisor's prerogative to restrict the franchisees' freedom of business by compelling them to purchase the products from selected suppliers, the franchisor is obliged to guarantee that the designated suppliers provide the franchisee within a reasonable time with the products which the franchisee orders, provided that these orders are reasonable.

D. Practicability

The franchisee is entitled to demand the fulfilment of the supply orders in so far as it is practicable for the franchisor or the designated suppliers to fulfil such demands in view of their actual supply resources. Supply would also be impracticable if the supplier encounters an insuperable obstacle to perform or the fulfilment of such an obligation would cause inconvenience or expenses on the supplier's side which are substantially disproportionate to the demands of the franchisee.

E. Reasonable order

To assess whether an order is reasonable, the nature and the purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved must be taken into account. (See the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness)) In this respect it is particularly relevant whether the franchisee seeks delivery of products of the quality, quantity and modality which is required by the franchise contract and which enable the franchisee to operate the distribution activities adequately, and whether the orders fall within the scope of the franchising contract, i. e. the franchisee is to be provided with the products which are the subject of the franchise. Special market conditions could justify demands for supply which exceed the franchisee's normal requests.

F. De facto exclusivity

Paragraph (2) concerns the situation where the parties have not agreed explicitly upon exclusive purchasing obligations, but where there is an exclusivity de facto. Such is the case when the franchisee has in fact no possibility to be supplied by any other supplier because e.g. the other suppliers do not meet the quality standards imposed by the franchisor or it is not possible to find the products which are the subject of the franchise in the market. Other examples are situations where better prices of the products offered by the franchisor have led the franchisee to purchase exclusively from the franchisor; or where the franchisee has been buying exclusively from the franchisor from the start of their relationship and in fact an exclusive sales relationship is the result.

G. Character of the rule

This is a mandatory rule; the parties are not free to agree otherwise.

NOTES

In general

1. A stipulation that the franchisee may only purchase certain goods from the franchisor or designated sellers is rather common in franchise contracts. (See also Art. 18.1 ICC Model Contract).
2. Only, under BELGIAN law does there seem to be a rule which is similar to the present Article (Verbraeken & de Schoutheete, no. 153). For the other legal systems no rules were found in the legislation, case law or literature.
3. Under SPANISH law there is no similar rule, although the case law admits exclusive product supply as a contractual obligation. When the franchisor fails to supply the goods or the goods are defective, the contract may be terminated (SAP Valencia 21 May 1993, AC 1993\1024).

IV.E.–4:205: Information by franchisor during the performance

The obligation to inform requires the franchisor in particular to provide the franchisee with information concerning:

(a) market conditions;
(b) commercial results of the franchise network;
(c) characteristics of the products;
(d) prices and terms for the supply of products;
(e) any recommended prices and terms for the re-supply of products to customers;
(f) relevant communication between the franchisor and customers in the territory; and
(g) advertising campaigns.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The obligation to inform imposed by IV.E.–2:202 (Information during the performance) is further elaborated by this Article.

The Article includes an obligation for the franchisor to provide information (without being requested by the franchisee) and specifies the types of information that should normally be disclosed. The obligation to inform comprises more than communicating know-how or providing assistance. It refers to all the relevant data concerning the exploitation of the franchised business, such as general information concerning the market, research projects, improvements made to the business method or commercial results. The list of required information is not exhaustive.

In certain circumstances it may be reasonable for the franchisor to charge the franchisee for the specific information to be provided.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Both parties have an interest in being kept informed concerning facts and developments which are relevant to their performance. It can make their performance easier and more successful. The reciprocal exchange of information throughout the franchise network also benefits the whole network: it will lead to a continuous improvement of the business method.

This provision is aimed at guaranteeing that the franchisee who is obliged to conduct the franchise business according to the concept of the franchisor, is provided with all the relevant information regarding the franchisor's business method which will allow the proper performance of the franchisee's obligations. This obligation also serves to meet the interests of the franchisor, since by providing such information the franchisor guarantees that all franchisees operate the business in a uniform manner and meet the quality specifications.

C. Necessary information

The franchisee must be provided in due time with all the information which the franchisee needs for the proper operation of the franchise business (IV.E.–2:202 (Information during the performance)).

In particular, the information to be provided normally includes the disclosure of the following features:

Market conditions. This mainly regards up-dated information concerning the state of competition and the state of demand.

Commercial results of the franchise network. The welfare and success of the franchisor's method requires that all the members of the network operate the system in a uniform manner. It means that the achievement of the expected profit by a franchisee does not only depend on its isolated efforts to operate the franchise outlet but also depends on the business efforts of the other franchisees. Therefore, the individual business activity of each franchisee has an impact on the business results of the other members. The information on whether the other members are achieving positive or negative commercial results is an indicator of whether the system is working adequately.

This obligation imposes indirectly an obligation on each franchisee to inform the franchisor concerning the individual commercial results, but this is in any case the common practice in franchising since the ongoing payments are generally calculated on the basis of the achieved benefits of each franchisee.

Characteristics of the products. Franchisees are intermediaries in the distribution channel since they undertake the obligation to pass on the products of the franchisor to customers. The relevant information regarding such products is in the hands of franchisors. In fact, it is for the franchisor to establish the quality standards which are to be met by the products offered to consumers. An adequate performance of the contractual obligations of franchisees requires adequate and accurate knowledge concerning the products and services offered to third parties during the time the franchisee carries out its task as a distributor. Therefore the franchisor should provide the franchisee with updated information on the characteristics of the goods and services which are to be distributed.

Prices and conditions for the sale of products. Franchise contracts generally contain a provision by which the seller (franchisor) agrees with the buyer (franchisee) on the terms under which the sale of the products is to be carried out. Among them is the sales price. Due to the generally long-term character of franchise agreements, these conditions may change during the course of the relationship. If such is the case it is for the franchisor, as the supplier of the products and consequently the one with access to such an information, to inform the franchisee.

Any recommended prices and terms for the resale of products. In addition to the sales contract concluded between franchisor and franchisee, there is another sales contract. This is the sales contract concluded between the franchisee and the customer for the resale of products. Usually franchisors recommend which prices are to be charged to the customer. The franchisees will typically respect such recommendations in order to ensure a competitive position in the market and a certain harmonisation with the price policy and the advertising campaigns throughout the network which eventually benefits all franchisees.

Relevant communication with customers in the territory. Any contact between the franchisor and customers belonging to the territory where the franchisee's outlet is located which can be relevant as to the operation of the business by the individual franchisee (e.g. preferences of customers, expected changes in demand) is to be communicated to the franchisee.

Advertising campaigns. The success of franchisees in conducting the business depends on the maintenance of the reputation of the network which is made known to customers through advertising. The franchisor is under an obligation to ensure an adequate advertising strategy and to coordinate the promotion activities of the members of the network (IV.E.–4:207 (Reputation of network and advertising)). Such an obligation necessarily implies giving information to the franchisees regarding the advertising initiatives taken by the franchisor, notably regarding those which do not involve the participation of franchisees on a local level.

D. No formalities

There is no formal requirement as to the way in which this obligation must be performed, e.g.: in writing. Nevertheless, in practice such information will generally be provided in writing.

NOTES

The franchisor's obligation to inform its franchisee

1. Under none of the legal systems is there an explicit statutory obligation for the franchisor to provide information to the franchisee during performance. However, under a majority of the legal systems, such an obligation is considered by legal authors to be included in the obligation to co-operate or to follow from the doctrine of good faith. The items mentioned in the Article recur in the case law and legal literature of a majority of the legal systems. (DUTCH law, Van der Heiden (1999) 59 ff; ENGLISH law; FINNISH law; GERMAN law: Giesler/Nauschütt, § 5 no. 123, 165, § 8 no. 18; Martinek/Semler, § 19 no. 60-67; GREEK law: First Instance Court of Athens 1733/2000 Dikaio Epixeiriseon kai Etairion 7/2000 746 with annotation by Kostakis; ITALIAN law: e.g. Lodo Arbitrale, Torino 11 July 1995, Società X c. Società Y, published in: Frignani (1999) 157; PORTUGAL: Pestana de Vasconcelos (2000) 32).
2. In addition, under GERMAN law the law on commercial agency (§ 86 a II HGB) is also applied by way of analogy to franchising (Giesler/Nauschütt, § 5 no. 123, 165, § 8 no. 18; Martinek/Semler, § 19 no. 60-67).
3. However, under FRENCH law this obligation follows from the obligation to assist, which is based on good faith. (See also: art. 11, 15.7 of the ICC Model Contract.)
4. Under SPANISH law there is no explicit provision as to the obligation of providing information during the performance, but it may be inferred from the franchisor's duty to grant continuous technical and commercial assistance to the franchisee which is the fundamental content of the franchisor's performance (SAP Madrid 6 November 2007, AC 2008\81).(SAP Madrid 6 November 2007, AC 2008\81).(SAP Madrid 6 November 2007, AC 2008/81), as provided by the art. 2.1 sub c of Real Decreto 2485/1998. According to Domínguez García (in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 602), it includes especially any commercial information related to studies developed by the franchisor in order to actualise the products, marketing or publicity techniques, commercial campaigns etc. This obligation stems as well from the principle of good faith (CC 1258 and Ccom 57) and the character of the franchise as a contract of collaboration between businesses.

IV.E.–4:206: Warning of decreased supply capacity

(1) When the franchisee is obliged to obtain the products from the franchisor, or from a supplier designated by the franchisor, the franchisor must warn the franchisee within a reasonable time when the franchisor foresees that the franchisor's supply capacity or the supply capacity of the designated suppliers will be significantly less than the franchisee had reason to expect.

(2) For the purpose of paragraph (1) the franchisor is presumed to foresee what the franchisor could reasonably be expected to foresee.

(3) Paragraph (1) also applies to cases where the franchisee, although not legally obliged to obtain the products from the franchisor or from a supplier designated by the franchisor, is in fact required to do so.

(4) The parties may not, to the detriment of the franchisee, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This provision concerns situations where the franchisee is obliged to purchase the contract products only from the franchisor or from other suppliers designated by the franchisor. This rule establishes that in such cases the franchisor must warn the franchisee when the franchisor foresees an important decrease in the franchisor's supply capacity or in the supply capacity of the authorised suppliers. This obligation does not concern decreases in the supply capacity of the franchisor or authorised suppliers which can reasonably be expected by the franchisee. However, it is concerned with situations where the supply capacity of the suppliers turns out to be significantly less than what the franchisee had reasons to expect.

Paragraph (2) provides that the franchisor is presumed to foresee changes which the franchisor could reasonably be expected to foresee.

Paragraph (3) extends the obligation for the franchisor in franchise relationships where, even though the parties have not agreed on a contractual obligation to exclusive purchasing, the franchisee is, in fact, obliged to buy on an exclusive basis from the franchisor or from authorised suppliers.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

An exclusive purchasing obligation implies that the franchisee is not allowed to find sources of supply other than the one provided by the franchisor or the designated supplier. Eventually, this means that the franchisee entirely depends on the supply capacity of the franchisor and the authorized suppliers. Therefore, even when the franchisor or the authorised suppliers cannot supply the products involved in the franchise business, the franchisee cannot approach other suppliers.

This provision aims to protect the franchisee in such situations. It aims to avoid situations where it is not possible for the franchisee to continue operating the business because the suppliers cannot deliver the required supplies due to a decrease in the supply capacity. Due to the franchisor's warning, the franchisee will be able to adapt the new availability of supplies to the demand of customers. The franchisor must warn the franchisee within a reasonable time, so that the latter may react promptly.

This obligation may be deemed burdensome for the franchisor. However, this strict obligation is justified, since the franchisor is the one who imposes on the franchisee the obligation to purchase exclusively from the selected suppliers. In addition, this obligation is not unreasonably burdensome since the franchisor does not have to provide the franchisee with the reasons why the supply capacity will change and since there are two limits to the obligation of the franchisor: (1) the decrease in the supply capacity must be foreseen (or, taking the presumption into account, at least reasonably foreseeable) and (2) the decrease cannot reasonably be expected by the franchisee.

This obligation to warn is also in the franchisor's interests. If the warning is given a sufficient time in advance, the franchisee will be able to adapt to the new supply availability and find solutions which avoid the disappointment of customers when they are not provided with the products they expect. Consequently the franchisor's reputation will not be negatively influenced.

C. Supply capacity

The supply capacity of the franchisor or of the designated suppliers concerns the availability of products of the type which the franchisee has ordered or usually orders.

D. Designated suppliers

The franchisor is obliged, according to this provision, to warn the franchisee when the franchisor foresees that the supply capacity of the selected suppliers will be significantly less than what the franchisee had reason to expect.

E. Reasonable time

In principle, the warning must be given a sufficient time in advance in order to allow the franchisee to react and adapt to the new supply availability. To assess what is reasonable, the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved should be taken into account. (See the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness))

F. Significant decrease

The franchisor must warn the franchisee when the supply capacity will be significantly less than expected. It follows that no obligation arises in the case of a minor or temporary obstacle to supply.

G. Expectations of the franchisee

The franchisee will normally expect to be provided with the amount of products purchased from the franchisor or the designated suppliers and which corresponds with the franchisee's needs for supply with a view to an adequate operation of its business.

H. De facto exclusivity

Paragraph (3) equates situations where the parties have explicitly agreed on exclusive purchasing obligations with situations where there is no explicit agreement, but nonetheless there is a situation of actual exclusivity. This is the case when the franchisee has in fact no possibility to buy from other suppliers because no one meets the quality standards imposed by the franchisor or because it is impossible to find the products which are the subject of the franchise in the market.

I. Character of the rule

This is a mandatory rule; the parties are not free to agree otherwise.

NOTES

In general

1. This rule has been taken from the Directive on commercial agency (art. 4(2)b). It can be considered a specific instance of the obligation to provide information and to cooperate. Under the legal systems studied no specific information concerning such an obligation in relation to franchising was found although sometimes, as is considered to be the case in SPANISH law, it may be derived from the generic principle of good faith.

IV.E.–4:207: Reputation of network and advertising

(1) The franchisor must make reasonable efforts to promote and maintain the reputation of the franchise network.

(2) In particular, the franchisor must design and co-ordinate the appropriate advertising campaigns aiming at the promotion of the franchise network.

(3) The activities of promotion and maintenance of the reputation of the franchise network are to be carried out without additional charge to the franchisee.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Under this provision the franchisor must make reasonable efforts to promote and maintain the network. These efforts include maintaining the good reputation of the intellectual property rights related to the franchise business. In the same manner it requires the observation of due diligence in assuring that the know-how is up-dated and is in conformity with the relevant circumstances. The maintenance of such a common reputation also depends on the extent to which uniformity is preserved. Such uniformity is achieved when all the members within the network follow the common guidelines for conducting the business. All these aspects, pursuant to this provision, fall under the franchisor's control. In addition, the franchisor must actively promote the business.

Paragraph (2) stresses the importance of advertising as a crucial activity in maintaining the good reputation of the network. Since the success of a franchise business largely depends on the appeal of the formula and the trademark, the franchisor must make reasonable efforts to promote the franchise chain through advertising campaigns. The advertising efforts, the costs of which are to be borne by the franchisor (paragraph (3)), point to the activities of design and coordination of the campaigns followed by the members of the network.

This Article does not include advertising campaigns which are initiated by the franchisee as an independent entrepreneur and which are intended to promote the franchisee outlet on a local level.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The reputation and image of the franchisor's method of business with respect to consumers attract businesses which are interested in adopting the same formula in order to have a high possibility of making a profit. The economic profitability of the franchise business for both franchisor and franchisee depends on the maintenance of the good reputation and image of the network towards consumers. Therefore, both parties' activities will be aimed at maintaining the good reputation of the network.

Since the franchisor is in the position to exercise control over the intellectual property rights and know-how related to the business concept and especially over the activities of the members of the network, it is for the franchisor to devote reasonable efforts to promote and maintain the good reputation of the network, especially by guaranteeing a uniform operation of the business formula by the franchisees in the network.

The maintenance of the good reputation of the network necessarily requires an adequate promotional activity to be carried out by the franchisor in co-ordination with all its franchisees to guarantee a common image in the eyes of the public.

This obligation, which may seem very burdensome for franchisors, may not in practice have such a negative impact. What generally occurs is that franchisors are reluctant to grant a great deal of discretion to franchisees in promoting the franchise business. The reason for this is that a uniform and reputable image of the system is normally made known to customers through advertising. Therefore, contracts generally contain clauses whereby the franchisor undertakes the obligation to control promotional activities.

C. Reasonable efforts

The franchisor is required to make reasonable efforts to guarantee the maintenance of the good reputation of the franchise network. To assess what is reasonable the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved, among other things, should be taken into account. (See the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness))

D. Appropriate advertising campaigns

Appropriate advertising campaigns mainly refer to advertising campaigns on an international, national or regional level which are aimed at promoting the franchisor's business on a general level. The initiative is to be taken by the franchisor, who is furthermore obliged to guarantee that all members of the network uniformly follow the campaigns.

Some of the advertising campaigns may require the participation of franchisees on a local level. The franchisee must participate on a local level in the advertising campaigns launched by the franchisor in so far as these campaigns are reasonable.

E. Without additional cost

Under the Article, the costs of promoting and maintaining the reputation of the network are to be paid by the franchisor. In other words, the price that the franchisee has to pay as a contribution to the advertising campaigns launched by the franchisor is deemed to be included in the periodical payments made by the franchisee. This is designed to prevent uncontrolled and unilateral inflation of royalties in the guise of advertising costs. It therefore aims to protect the franchisee in that the franchisee does not have to pay for the advertising unless the contract explicitly says so and the franchisee was properly informed of this during the pre-contractual stage.

The exception to this rule is for those situations where the franchisee must participate on a local level in the advertising campaigns launched by the franchisor. If that is the case, the costs of local advertising are to be covered by the franchisee provided that the price is reasonable.

NOTES

I. Reasonable efforts to promote and maintain the network's reputation

1. This obligation has been accepted by a large majority of the legal systems. However, its legal basis and character differs from country to country.
2. Under some legal systems such an obligation has been accepted by legal authors. (DUTCH law: Van der Heiden (1999) 87, Kneppers-Heynert; FRENCH law: Dutilleul & Delebecque no. 955, Ferrier no. 691; PORTUGUESE law: Ribeiro (2000), 161 ff.; SPANISH law: Hernando Giménez p.278, Dominguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 602). The situation appears to be the same under GREEK law. See also art. 15.7 of the ICC Model Contract)
3. Under GERMAN law such an obligation may be inferred from the doctrine of good faith (§ 242 BGB, Giesler/Nauschütt § 5 no. 143 et seq., BGHZ 136, 295)
4. Under FINNISH law there is no such specific rule; the situation appears to be the same under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law. ENGLISH law, which does not more than recognise that "…the franchisor must be able to take measures necessary for maintaining the identity and reputation of the network bearing his business name or symbol", and thus measures to that end do not infringe Art 81 of the EC Treaty: (Halsbury's vol. 47, 2001 Reissue, para. 429.

II. Advertising

5. Under none of the legal systems is there such a specific statutory obligation.
6. However, under PORTUGUESE law such an obligation is inferred from the obligation to maintain the reputation of the network (Ribeiro (2001) 196). Also under DUTCH law a lower court has recognised such an obligation (Praktijkgids, 1998, 105-106).
7. Under BELGIAN law such an obligation is included in the obligation of assistance (Verbraeken & de Schoutheete no. 151 (c). In SPAIN the obligation of the franchisor to design and develop campaigns in order to promote the franchised brand, without any additional cost for the franchisee, is recognised by the case law (SAP Girona 11 October 2006, JUR 2007\140527).
8. Most model contracts include an explicit contractual term in this respect. (Arts. 15.6 and 15.7 of the ICC Model Contract; ENGLAND: Adams/Prichard Jones Precedent I, Clause 6.4; see for GERMAN law: Martinek/Semler, § 19 no. 10; ITALY: Frignani, 291;

III. Costs

9. According to BELGIAN law sometimes these costs are regarded as being included in the fee, whereas in other circumstances the franchisee may be charged for this (Verbraeken & de Schoutheete no. 158).
10. According to Article 16.1 ICC Model Contract the franchisor must pay a certain percentage of its gross quarterly sales to contribute to the franchisor's promotional activities in relation to the business. It seems that the franchisor must bear the costs of the initial advertising campaign (art. 15.6).

Section 3: Obligations of the franchisee

IV.E.–4:301: Fees, royalties and other periodical payments

(1) The franchisee must pay to the franchisor fees, royalties or other periodical payments agreed upon in the contract.

(2) If fees, royalties or any other periodical payments are to be determined unilaterally by the franchisor, II.–9:105 (Unilateral determination by a party) applies.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

In practice, the parties to a franchise contract generally agree on an initial payment, which is viewed as an admission fee for entry to the franchise network. It is normally a fixed amount which essentially covers the franchisor's initial training and recruitment costs. In addition, parties further agree on periodical payments or royalties, which are to be paid during the whole duration of the contractual relationship, in exchange for the continuous exploitation of the business, ongoing assistance provided by the franchisor and so on. This provision spells out the franchisee's obligation to pay these fees, royalties and periodical payments.

However, where the contract states that such fees are to be determined (at a later stage) by the franchisor unilaterally and the franchisor's determination of the price is unreasonable, a reasonable price is substituted by law in accordance with II.–9:105 (Unilateral determination by a party).

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

In many franchise relationships periodical fees cannot be established at the moment of concluding the contract for its whole duration. Sometimes it is not even possible to establish an objective mechanism beforehand. In those cases it may be reasonable to accept the validity of a contract which leaves the determination of a term, even one as important as the periodical fee, to one party, very often the franchisor. However, the law must closely monitor the use which the franchisor makes of such a discretionary power, especially in the case of franchise contracts where the franchisee is frequently heavily dependent (as a result of extensive investments) on the continuity of the contractual relationship.

This Article provides the franchisee with strong protection in the case of an abuse by the franchisor of its discretionary power: the legal effect is not the invalidity of the unreasonable term (and maybe as a result the invalidity of the whole contract) but the substitution of a reasonable term by law. If the franchisor does not want to continue the contractual relationship on these reasonable terms, it is left with no other choice but to end the contract. However, in that case it will have to respect the rules contained in Chapter 1. In particular, it will have to give reasonable notice.

Such strong protection is necessary in order to avoid the situation where a franchisor can effectively end the franchise without having to give reasonable notice simply by unreasonably raising the fee, thus forcing the franchisee to end the relationship.

C. Relation to other provisions

This Article applies – specifically concerning fees, royalties or any other periodical payments in franchise contracts – the rule in II.–9:105 (Unilateral determination by a party) concerning the price and any other contractual term in any contract. This Article aims to ensure that any fees, royalties or any other periodical payments which are to be established unilaterally by the franchisor are covered by the policy laid down in that general provision. An additional justification for the presence of this specific Article is that the unreasonable unilateral determination of fees is one of the most recurrent problems in franchise relationships. Therefore, a clear and specific rule is appropriate.

D. Calculation of royalties and periodical payments

Royalties and periodical payments are frequently calculated on the basis of the franchisee's quarterly gross sales. Since these payments are to be made on a periodical basis and during the entire course of the relationship, they are normally increased by the franchisor to adapt the price to inflation and other circumstances (for example, an increase in production costs, an increase in the value of the shares of the franchise company, improvements to the system) and the franchisee. The contract may provide for a mechanism or criteria which determine variations in the amount which is periodically due.

NOTES

I. Payment of fees, royalties or other periodical payments

1. In most legal systems it is accepted by case law, legal authors or model contracts that the franchisee must pay an entrance fee and subsequently royalties or other periodical payments. (BELGIUM: Verbraeken & de Schoutheete no. 158; FRANCE: Ferrier no. 695, Huet, no. 11621; FINLAND; GREECE: Georgiadis, 203, Alepakos, 936, Voulgaris, 902, ITALY: Frignagni, 291; NETHERLANDS: Van der Heiden (1999) 60 ff; PORTUGAL: Ribeiro (2001) 184, Pestana de Vasconcelos (2000) 34; SWEDEN (SOU 1987:17, 57). In SPAIN the parties are free to establish any payment system, although the most common one consists of payment of the entrance fee (pago de entrada) to the franchisor and periodic payments as agreed, e.g. a payment on the profits obtained(Dominguez García in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 596). See also art. 1 ECE; arts 20, 21 of the ICC Model Contract.

II. Unilateral determination of fees, royalties and other periodical payments

2. If the fees, royalties and other periodical payments are determined unilaterally by the franchisor, in a large number of the legal systems such a price is replaced by a reasonable one if the price determined is unreasonable. (ENGLAND: Adams/Prichard Jones §542; GERMANY: § 315 III (2) BGB. The paragraphs regarding unfair contract terms under § 305 BGB are not applicable even if the term regarding the determination is expressed within general terms of business (Giesler/Nauschütt, § 9 no. 22, 23; see also § 307 III BGB.)
3. Under FINNISH law any unfair term in a contract may be substituted by reasonable ones under the general clause. (Article 36 of the Contracts Act).
4. Under a minority of the legal systems the contract is void if it includes an unreasonable price unilaterally determined by the franchisor due to the legal prohibition of leaving the establishment of the price to only one of the parties. For SPAIN see CC art.1449 applied by the way of analogy.

IV.E.–4:302: Information by franchisee during the performance

The obligation under IV.E.–2:202 ((Information during the performance) requires the franchisee in particular to provide the franchisor with information concerning:

(a) claims brought or threatened by third parties in relation to the franchisor's intellectual property rights; and

(b) infringements by third parties of the franchisor's intellectual property rights.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

As a counterpart to the franchisor's obligation to make reasonable efforts to ensure the undisturbed use of intellectual property rights regarding the operation of the franchise business, under this provision the franchisee is required to inform the franchisor if the franchisee becomes aware of any claim brought or infringement made by a third party regarding the franchisor's intellectual property rights – it will mainly concern claims and infringements by third parties located in the local market where the franchisee operates. This list of information obligations is not exhaustive.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Both parties have an interest in being kept informed concerning facts and developments which are relevant to their performance. It can make their performance easier and more successful. Reciprocal exchange of information throughout the franchise network also benefits the whole network: it will lead to a continuous improvement of the business method.

However, the present provision moderates the burden of the obligation to inform for franchisees since in most cases only this information is relevant to the proper functioning of the franchising network.

NOTES

The franchisee's obligation to inform the franchisor

1. According to legal authors there is such an obligation in BELGIAN law (Verbraeken & de Schoutheete, no. 160). Under FRENCH law, the franchisee has the obligation to contribute to the protection of intellectual property rights; the obligation to inform the franchisor of infringements, claims brought or threatened by third parties can be considered a part of this (Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 955, Ferrier, no. 701). With respect to the other legal systems no specific information has been found.
2. Under the SPANISH law there is no specific provision about this obligation. However, such a contractual term is valid. The only provision on this matter in Spanish law concerns leases (CC art. 1559) which obliges the lessee to inform the lessor about any right or claim brought by a third party against the rented goods.

IV.E.–4:303: Business method and instructions

(1) The franchisee must make reasonable efforts to operate the franchise business according to the business method of the franchisor.

(2) The franchisee must follow the franchisor's reasonable instructions in relation to the business method and the maintenance of the reputation of the network.

(3) The franchisee must take reasonable care not to harm the franchise network.

(4) The parties may not exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The franchisee is under an obligation to conduct its business in accordance with the franchisor's method. This method is communicated to the franchisee through a business package that comprises intellectual property rights, know-how and assistance. The present provision is aimed at guaranteeing a uniform operation of the franchise business and the protection of the franchisor's business values. In other words, the franchisee has not only a right to obtain intellectual property rights, know-how and assistance from the franchisor but also an obligation to use the intellectual property rights, know-how and assistance according to the franchisor's business method.

Moreover, the franchisee must follow the instructions given by the franchisor regarding the method by which to conduct the franchise system, in so far as such instructions are reasonable in order to guarantee the correct functioning of the system.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This rule aims to guarantee that the intellectual property rights, the know-how and the knowledge provided through assistance are followed by all franchisees within the network. Such protection of the network is essential, both for franchisors and franchisees, who depend on the economic strength of the trademark and who share a common interest in protecting the image and reputation of the franchise network.

In addition to the general obligation to follow the franchisor's business method, the franchisee is also required under paragraph (2) to follow indications which may frequently be given by the franchisor during the relationship. The maintenance of the quality standards and uniformity of the franchise network may not be attainable unless the franchisee follows such instructions.

Such an obligation is to be measured against the interest of the franchisee in managing its business as an independent entrepreneur. As such, it is obliged to follow the method and instructions of the franchisor provided that they do not hinder its independence.

C. Instructions

Apart from being reasonable the instructions must also be necessary to guarantee the maintenance of the quality standards required by the franchisor's method; they must not change the method articulated through intellectual property rights, know-how and assistance and they must not hinder the legal status of the franchisee as an independent entrepreneur – the franchisee may arrange its activities and use its time as it thinks fit.

D. Reasonable care not to harm the franchise network

Although it is in the franchisee's own interests to ensure the reputation of the franchise network, this provision stresses the importance for the welfare of the franchise network to avoid any misbehaviour on the part of franchisees which may result in damaging the image of the franchise system. Consequently, the franchisee is expressly required to take reasonable care not to harm the network.

E. Character of the rule

This is a mandatory rule; the parties are not free to agree otherwise.

NOTES

I. Reasonable efforts to operate according to the franchisor's business method

1. Such an obligation has been accepted in most legal systems by case law or legal authors. (AUSTRIA: Holzhammer, 103; Krejci, Grundriss, 404; BELGIUM: Verbraeken & de Schoutheete, no. 159 (b); FINLAND; FRANCE: Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 955, Ferrier, no. 696, Huet, no. 11623; GERMANY: Giesler/Nauschütt, § 5 no. 160; NETHERLANDS: Kneppers-Heynert 15-16, 99-100, Barendrecht & Van Peursem 114, Articles 4 and 10 NFV Model Franchise Agreement. Article 10.1 of the ICC Model Contract; Art. 2.3 of the EurCodeEthics.); ENGLAND: Adams, John N. "Franchising: practice and precedents" , Model Franchise Agreement 1, Article 7.7.
2. SPANISH law lacks a specific provision on this matter. Nevertheless, an obligation to operate the franchise may be inferred by way of analogy from the CC art. 1555.2 on leases and from the general duty of diligence and good faith in commercial relations (Ccom art. 57).

II. Obligation to follow instructions

3. Such an obligation is accepted in various legal systems' case law or by legal authors. BELGIUM: Verbraeken & de Schoutheete no. 159 (b); FRANCE: Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 955, Huet, no. 11623.3 ; art. 10.7 ICC Model Contract; ENGLAND: Adams, John N., "Franchising: practice and precedents", Model Franchise Agreement 1, Article 7.21.
4. Under GERMAN law a majority of the legal authors and the courts apply § 86 HGB by way of analogy to franchising. Under this provision the commercial agent must follow the principal's reasonable instructions (BGH, NJW 1984, 2102; Koller/Roth/Morck, Vor § 84 HGB no. 10, 11; Münchener Kommentar zum Handelsgesetzbuch, § 86 HGB no. 3).
5. Under SPANISH law art. 9.2. sub (c) of the Agency Law which obliges the agent to follow the principal's instructions as long as they do not affect the agent's independence, may be applied by way of analogy. Nevertheless, the franchisor must not interfere in the franchisee's area of exclusive competence: this kind of behaviour will be considered as a violation of market freedom and commercial good faith (ex art. 5 of the Disloyal Competence Law).

III. Reasonable care not to harm the franchise network

6. Under a number of legal systems such an obligation is recognised by case law and legal authors. (FRANCE: Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 955, Huet, no. 11621.1; ITALY: The use of the commercial symbols of the franchisor by franchisees that operate under the common standards may result in discrediting the image connected to them, and may thus damage not only the franchisor, but the whole network. Case law on the liability of a franchisee for damaging the 'commercial image' of the franchisor is rather rare. See e.g.: Tribunale di Milano, 23 November 1994, A. B. Sportsman Club s. r. l. c. Vico s. r. l., in Giur. it., 1996, I, 2, 382 (note Cipriani, Sul danno all 'immagine del "franchisor"); PORTUGUESE law: Ribeiro (2000) 161 ff.; arts. 10.7, 10.11 of the ICC Model Contract; art. 2.3 of the EurCodeEthics; ENGLAND: Adams, John N., "Franchising: practice and precedents", Model Franchise Agreement 1, Articles 7.38 and 7.55).

7. There is no similar provision under SPANISH law. However, it may stem from the principle of good faith and the requirement of acting with good commercial diligence (Ccom art. 57).

IV.E.–4:304: Inspection

(1) The franchisee must grant the franchisor reasonable access to the franchisee's premises to enable the franchisor to check that the franchisee is complying with the franchisor's business method and instructions.

(2) The franchise must grant the franchisor reasonable access to the accounting books of the franchisee.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This provision imposes on the franchisee the obligation to allow the franchisor to enter the franchisee's premises to check whether the franchisee is complying with the quality standards of the franchisor's business method and with the instructions given by the franchisor regarding the operation of the franchised business.

Under paragraph (2), the franchisee is also required to allow reasonable access to its accounting books.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Inspection is an effective method for the franchisor to check whether the franchisee manages the franchise business in accordance with the guidelines which are provided by the franchisor and which must be respected by all franchisees in order to maintain the common image and reputation of the network. Thus, it is indirectly beneficial for the other franchisees.

The franchisor is granted the right to have reasonable access to the accounting books of the franchisee in so far as this is required in order to ascertain the actual results of the franchisee in the operation of the business which will allow the franchisor to determine the amount of the ongoing payments to be made by the franchisee.

This right of the franchisor is to be measured against the right of the franchisee to organise its business as an autonomous entrepreneur. Therefore, inspection as a control activity is to be allowed by the franchisee, provided, however, that it is carried out within the limits imposed by the independent status of franchisees.

C. Inspection

Inspection is a control activity exercised by the franchisor concerning the way in which the franchisee carries out the operation of the business. An inspection is carried out by visiting the franchisee's premises in order to check in situ whether the franchisee is conducting the business in conformity with the franchisor's method and quality standards and by having access to the franchisee's accounting books.

D. Reasonable access

Reasonableness in the context of the Article is to be judged by the usual criteria (see definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness)). Obviously, an inspection should not take place in the middle of the night or five times a week. Reasonable access must take place during normal working hours and with a normal frequency and, more generally, only in so far and in such a way as is necessary to guarantee that the business is conducted in accordance with the franchisor's business method. Moreover, the inspection of the accounting books is to be done in so far as it is necessary to assess the business results of the franchisee for a determination of the ongoing payments.

NOTES

I. Right to inspect the franchisee's premises

1. Under most legal systems such a right is recognised either by case law or by legal authors or is included in model contracts. (BELGIUM: Verbraeken & de Schoutheete, no. 165; FINLAND; FRANCE: Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 955; ITALY: Frignani, 117; NETHERLANDS: Kneppers-Heynert, 15 et seq., cf. art. 20(1) NFV Model franchise agreement; PORTUGAL: Ribeiro (2001) 191; SPAIN: STS 4 March 1997 RJ 1997/1642, Echebarría Sáenz (1995) 378, Hernando Giménez, 280 et seq.; art. 10 para 13 ICC Model Contract; art. 2.3 ECE)
2. Under SPANISH law, the right to inspect the franchisee's premises by the franchisor stems from the obligation of technical and commercial assistance through which the franchisor exercises the right to supervise the franchisee's activity, in order to protect the unified image of the brand. However, the franchisor's right of legitimate control must not go so far as to be an interference that violates the franchisee's independence (by analogy: art. 9.2. sub (c) Agency Law).
3. Under GERMAN law this obligation is inferred from good faith in some circumstances (Giesler/Nauschütt, § 5 no. 165; Martinek/Semler, § 19 no. 12).

II. Access to the books

4. Under FRENCH law authors recognize such an obligation and consider it to be part of the franchisor's right of inspection. (Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 955).
5. Under GREEK law the franchisee must provide the franchisor with full access to financial data and client files (First Instance Court of Athens 1733/2000 Dikaio Epixeiriseon kai Etairion 7/2000 746 with annotation by Kostakis). Under BELGIAN law the franchisee must provide the franchisor with the required financial data. However, it is unclear whether the franchisor has access to the franchisee's books. (Verbraeken & de Schoutheete no. 165).
6. Under SPANISH law, from the obligation to pay the price in accordance with agreed criteria, commentators tend to infer an obligation to inform and more specifically an obligation to account (Ccom art. 243). As the franchisee must inform the franchisor of the volume of sales or benefits to establish the periodical payments it follows that the franchisor should have a right to verify such information (Hernando, p.282). Nevertheless, as the Ccom art. 32.1 provides for accountancy secrecy, the violation of this principle should be consented to by an adequate contractual clause. Moreover, the franchisor is obliged to give prior notice to the franchisee about the books' inspection and to treat any information obtained as confidential; revealing the content of the books may result in liability for the damage caused, ex CC art. 1902.
7. A right for the franchisor to have access to the franchisee's books is included in art. 2.3 of the EurCodeEthics. With respect to the other legal systems, no specific information has been found.

CHAPTER 5: DISTRIBUTORSHIP

Section 1: General

IV.E.–5:101: Scope and definitions

(1) This Chapter applies to contracts (distribution contracts) under which one party, the supplier, agrees to supply the other party, the distributor, with products on a continuing basis and the distributor agrees to purchase them, or to take and pay for them, and to supply them to others in the distributor's name and on the distributor's behalf.

(2) An exclusive distribution contract is a distribution contract under which the supplier agrees to supply products to only one distributor within a certain territory or to a certain group of customers.

(3) A selective distribution contract is a distribution contract under which the supplier agrees to supply products, either directly or indirectly, only to distributors selected on the basis of specified criteria.

(4) An exclusive purchasing contract is a distribution contract under which the distributor agrees to purchase, or to take and pay for, products only from the supplier or from a party designated by the supplier.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Distribution contracts are contracts concluded between a supplier (who may also be the manufacturer of the products) and a distributor (who may either be a wholesaler or a retailer). The supplier agrees to supply the distributor with products. The distributor commits itself to purchasing, distributing and promoting such products in its own name and on its own behalf.

There are different types of distribution contracts. The type of collaboration between the parties differentiates these contracts from each other. The contract itself addresses what type of exclusivity, if any, is granted. However, exclusivity is not an essential feature of a distribution contract.

Some of the rules in this Chapter apply only to specific types of distribution contracts: exclusive distribution, selective distribution, and exclusive purchase contracts respectively. Different obligations apply depending on the type of exclusivity the parties agree upon. However, these rules may also apply to other distribution contracts (e.g. basic framework agreements) by way of analogy. Furthermore, when the contract provides for bilateral exclusivity, both regarding purchase and supply, all obligations listed in this chapter will apply.

The typical distribution contract involves the purchase of goods from the supplier for sale by the distributor to customers but there may be cases which involve the leasing of goods or the supplying of services. In these Comments references to "sale" and "purchase" are meant to cover such other means of supply.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The underlying notions in this Chapter are (i) that if parties agree on any exclusivity, they normally have a closer relationship, which requires a higher degree of collaboration and loyalty to each other and (ii) that a party who grants exclusivity to the other party does so in order to obtain some advantage in return.

Consequently, a supplier who refrains from dealing with other distributors by granting exclusive or selective distributorship is for instance entitled to give instructions and to check that they are followed (IV.E.–5:304 (Instructions)). As to the distributor, if the distributor agrees to buy a certain type of product exclusively from one supplier, the distributor receives advertising materials in exchange (IV.E.–5:204 (Advertising materials)).

In a limited number of cases the parties' freedom of contract is restricted. This is especially the case where exclusivity is granted unilaterally. These exceptional (mandatory) rules are meant to compensate to some extent for imbalance in bargaining power (see IV.E.–5:203 (Warning by supplier of decreased supply capacity) paragraph 2, concerning exclusive purchasing contracts).

In contracts where no exclusivity has been agreed upon, the parties do not have strong commitments towards each other. As a result, only basic obligations apply. A non-exclusive or a non-selective agreement could be regarded as nothing more than a loose contract to co-operate and to have some points agreed upon when and if the parties decide to buy or sell the products in question.

Distribution contracts which include exclusivity clauses are rather similar to franchise contracts. For this reason, the obligations of the parties in these two different contracts are dealt with in a consistent manner. This prevents any opportunistic classification of the agreements by the parties aimed at circumventing a less favourable regime.

C. Products

The term "products" in these rules refers to both goods and services (IV.E.–1:101 (Contracts covered). The same terminology has been adopted by (European) competition law and is consistent with commercial practice. It is largely for this reason that the Article includes the words "take and to pay for" in addition to "purchase". Some examples of the distribution of services include the distribution of music on the Internet and the distribution of information concerning the financial markets.

D. Continuing basis

A distribution relationship consists of a commercial co-operation between the parties, which may last for a varying, but usually substantial, period of time. This relationship may last even if for some time no sales or service contracts are concluded. A single sales contract or even a mere accidental succession of sales contracts between the same parties would not amount to a distribution contract.

E. In the distributor's name

This Chapter only applies where the party who distributes products to third parties does so in its own name. In other words, the distributor sells the products which it has bought from the supplier. This is the main difference with commercial agency where the commercial agent does not become owner of the products.

F. On the distributor's behalf

In promoting the sale of the products, the distributor pursues its own interest. This implies that commission agents do not fall within the scope of this Chapter.

G. Framework agreement

A distribution contract is a framework agreement (contrat cadre), which provides the context for subsequent contracts (contrats d´application). A framework contract usually only defines the basic elements of the subsequent contracts, without establishing the specific modalities.

Whereas the contrat d´application is usually of short duration and binds the parties to precise obligations, the framework agreement is meant to establish a relationship of ongoing collaboration between the parties. The "application" contracts will usually result from the orders by the distributor to the supplier.

H. Exclusive distribution contracts

In exclusive distribution contracts, the supplier undertakes to supply the products only to one distributor, to the exclusion of other potential distributors, in a specified territory (territorial exclusivity) or to a certain group of customers (exclusive customer allocation). This provides the distributor with some protection against intra-brand competition (i. e. from products of the same brand brought on to the market by other distributors). The extent of this protection depends on the agreement.

The definition in paragraph (2) includes both sole distributorships and exclusive distributorships. In the case of a sole distributorship the supplier is entitled to sell directly to customers, whereas in the case of exclusive distributorship, the supplier also agrees to refrain from direct sales.

Examples of exclusive distribution agreements first appeared in the motor industry. Subsequently, these contracts have become common in virtually all branches of the wholesale and retail sector (agricultural machinery, electrical appliances, furniture, beauty products and computer equipment).

Examples of exclusive customer allocation include differentiation between the business and consumer market, between the day and night-time market, et cetera.

In return for territorial exclusivity or exclusive customer allocation, the distributor usually agrees to buy only the supplier's products (exclusive purchasing contract (see below, Comment J) or not to represent competing products (contractual non-competition clause).

I. Selective distribution contracts

Selective distribution contracts result in closed sales organisations. The supplier limits the distribution of the products to those distributors with the qualifications which correspond most closely to the supplier's sales policy.

The selection may be based on either qualitative or quantitative criteria. Examples of qualitative criteria are: the employment of technically qualified staff, the possibility to display the products separately from others, the maintenance of a sufficiently representative selection or a sufficiently wide stock of products, et cetera. Quantitative criteria are: the number of distributors in relation to the population of the territory to be served and a minimum turnover in the products et cetera.

A supplier will opt for this form of distribution in order to maintain the prestige of its brand or image (jewellery, cosmetics, et cetera), to ensure the efficient and speedy distribution of perishable products (fish), to provide a high level of pre-sales or after-sales services which is required because of the technological nature of the products to be distributed (personal computers, electronics, cars, high-tech equipment, et cetera).

J. Exclusive purchasing contracts

If the distributor undertakes to purchase the products (belonging to a certain market category) from the supplier only, the contract will be classified as an exclusive purchasing contract. The exclusivity may be either total or limited to a certain percentage of the distributor's requirements. It may also result from an obligation to purchase a quantity of products that in fact corresponds to the distributor's needs (de facto exclusivity). Normally, exclusive distribution agreements also include an exclusive purchase clause. In exchange for the distributor's control of the sale of the supplier's products in a given territory, the distributor then agrees not to buy the contract products from any other than the given supplier. These types of contracts are recurrent, for example, in the petrol and the beer distribution industries.

K. Mixed contracts

Some contractual relationships have the characteristics of a distribution agreement as well as another contract. This is the case, for example, where a distributor also sells some products in the supplier's name, thus acting as a commercial agent. Or, the distributor may purchase with a view not only to reselling the goods but also to transforming or incorporating them into a product for resale. In such cases the rules on distribution regulate those aspects of the contractual relationship which fall under the scope and definitions rule as set out in this Article (see II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts).

L. De facto distribution contracts and de facto exclusivity

The relationship which provides the framework for consecutive application contracts is the most characteristic element of distribution contracts. If such a relationship de facto exists without the parties ever having formally agreed to establish it, either in writing or orally, the rules contained in this Chapter may nevertheless apply, together with the general provisions contained in Chapter 1. This follows from the general rules on the formation of contracts. See II.–4:211(Contracts not concluded through offer and acceptance). Comment A to this Article stresses that a contract may be concluded by conduct alone. In such cases it is not easy to discern when the parties reach an agreement which amounts to a binding contract.

The same holds true for distribution contracts presenting de facto exclusivities. Rather than formally imposing exclusivity, the supplier may induce the distributor to obtain all or the major part of the distributor's supplies from the supplier. The latter may do so by granting discounts which are conditional upon total or quasi-total loyalty to the supplier's products (loyalty discounts). There may eventually be a tacit agreement on exclusivity or a practice of exclusivity established between the parties. In such a case, the rules in this Chapter on exclusive purchase agreements may apply in spite of the written contract that contains no exclusive purchasing clause. See II.–9:101 (Terms of a contract).

M. Competition law

Distribution contracts may be invalid pursuant to the application of EC and national competition law. In this respect, especially relevant is Commission Regulation (EC) No. 2790/1999 of 22 December 1999 on the application of Article 81 (3) of the Treaty to categories of vertical agreements and concerted practices, and the various exceptions for specific branches of trade (e.g. Commission Regulation (EC) No. 1400/2002 of 31 July 2002 on the application of Article 81 (3) of the Treaty to categories of vertical agreements and concerted practices in the motor vehicle sector). The provisions provided in this Chapter only apply to exclusive distribution, selective distribution and exclusive purchasing contracts to the extent that they are valid in the light of competition law.

NOTES

I. Scope

1. BELGIAN law is the only European legal system which contains specific statutory provisions concerning distribution contracts. (BELGIUM: Wet 27 juli 1961 betreffende de eenzijdige beëindiging van de voor onbepaalde tijd verleende concessies van alleenverkoop, B. S., 5 oktober 1961, zoals gewijzigd door Wet 13 april 1971, B. S. 21 april 1971). As to which rules are applied to distribution contracts in the other countries, see the notes to Article 1:101.

II. Definition of distribution

2. Apart from BELGIAN law, there are no statutory definitions of distribution contracts under the legal systems studied. Under the other legal systems distribution contracts are defined by legal authors and case law.

3. According to all these legal systems distribution includes the supply of products on a continuing basis and the sale by the seller of the products to third parties in its own name and on its own behalf. (AUSTRIA: EvBl 1990/96, EvBl 1998/104, EvBl 1991/76; Krejci, 402; see Heller, Löber, 110; Hämmerle/Wünsch, 311; BELGIUM: art. 1 § 2 Alleenverkoopwet; FRANCE: Ferrier no. 1 et seq., Huet, no. 11596; FINLAND; GREECE: distribution contract σύμβαση διανομής/ simvasi dianomis, Georgakopoulos 1999 435; ITALY: the term "distribution contracts" refers to different types of contracts that are employed for the distribution of goods and services. Most commonly used in commercial practice are the following: rivendita autorizzata, concessione di vendita and franchising Pardolesi (1988) 4, Cagnasso (1983) 17 ff; THE NETHERLANDS: distributie contract, Barendrecht & Van Peursem, 3; Geel, 108; Van den Paverd, 13; PORTUGAL: contrato de concessão commercial Pinto Monteiro, 108 ff.; Menezes Cordeiro, 509 ff.; Pinto Monteiro, 45;

Brito, 179 ff.; Coelho Vieira, 15; STJ 4/05/1993, BMJ 427, 1993, 530; STJ 22/11/1995, BMJ 451, 1995, 454; STJ 5/06/1997, BMJ 468, 1997, 434; STJ 23/01/1997, www.dgsi.pt, JSTJ00032260; SWEDEN: (återförsäljningsavtal) (Håstad, 295); SPAIN: contratos de distribución o concesión STS of 17 May 1999, RJ 1999\4046, J.L. Echegaray in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 544. Notwithstanding some unclear case law (STS 8 November 1995, RJ 1995/8637) that includes the distribution contract as a subspecies of an agency contract, it is necessary to clarify that a distributorship may never be confused with an agency, as they differ substantially in the character of the legal position of the parties: whereas the agent acts on behalf of the principal (art. 1 LCA), the distributor always acts on the distributor's own behalf. As the distribution contract lacks specific regulations under Spanish law, there are no mandatory rules. Therefore the contract terms established by the parties are crucially important. Nevertheless, the provisions on the liberty of competence, derived from Spanish and international law, are binding for the parties to a distribution contract. The distribution contract covers only products generated or distributed by the distributor as, unlike a franchise, the concession does not include immaterial goods (De la Cuesta, Contratos Mercantiles, 2001, p. 367).

4. In BELGIAN statute law and AUSTRIAN, GERMAN and PORTUGUESE case law and literature distribution contracts are defined to include only the distribution of goods rather than the distribution of goods or services (AUSTRIA: Holzhammer, 104; BELGIUM: art. 1 § 2 Alleenverkoopwet; GERMANY: Küstner/Thume, no. 1139-1150). Moreover, under GERMAN law there is an additional requirement in order to define a distribution contract: i. e. the distributor's integration into the supplier's sales system (BGH, NJW 1971, 30; OLG Zweibrücken, BB 1983, 1301; Küstner/Thume, no. 1142; Rohe, 450; § 14 no. 1; Ulmer, 206).

5. Under ENGLISH law, distribution contracts will be classified as contracts for purchase for resale and the rules concerning those contracts apply accordingly (Chitty-Reynolds no. 31-003). In SCOTTISH law the sale elements of distribution contracts would come under the Sale of Goods Act 1979. The framework element of the contract would be governed by the general rules of contract law, which means that the terms drawn up by the parties, and the rules on interpretation, are of crucial importance.

III. Exclusive distribution, selective distribution, exclusive purchasing

6. The definitions of exclusive agreements adopted in this Article correspond to the ones in Commission Regulation (EC) No. 2790/1999 of 22 December 1999 on the application of Article 81 (3) of the Treaty to categories of vertical agreements and concerted practices.

7. The same distinction is made by GERMAN and DUTCH legal writers and courts (GERMANY: Martinek/Semler, § 14 no. 1; Rohe, 449 Küstner/Thume, no. 1261-1278; Ulmer, 138; NETHERLANDS: Barendrecht & Van Peursem, 10 et. seq.).

8. FRENCH and SPANISH authors distinguish between exclusive and selective distribution contracts (Alicia García Herrera, La duración en el contrato de distribución exclusiva, 2006, p. 156; Enrique Guardiola Sacarrera, Contratos de colaboración en el comercio internacional, 1998, p. 122; art. 1. sub d) of the European Commission Regulation 2790/1999;). Under FRENCH law, exclusive distribution contracts also seem to include exclusive purchasing contracts (FRANCE: Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 925, 930, 935, Huet, no. 11607 ff; 11615).

9. Also BELGIAN law seems to distinguish only between exclusive and exclusive purchasing agreements. However, BELGIAN law does not seem to distinguish selective distribution agreements. Art. 1 § 1 sub 3 Alleenverkoopwet refers to another category: distribution contracts whereby the supplier imposes important obligations on the distributor and which are of such importance that in the case of ending of the contract, the distributor incurs severe damages.

10. Under GREEK law the same distinction is made as under Article 4:101 i. e. between common distribution contracts (koines simvaseis dianomis), selective distribution contracts (simvaseis epilektikis dianomis) and exclusive distribution contracts (simvaseis apokleistikis dianomis) (Georgakopoulos (1999) 435-6) However, also another distinction is made between simple distribution (apli simvasi dianomis) and distribution with added legal rights (simvasi dianomis me prostheto xaraktira dikaioxrisias).

11. Some ITALIAN legal scholars discern three different types of distribution contracts: (i) sales of a certain amount of products to be determined, plus a clause of unilateral or bilateral exclusivity, (ii) concession of (re)sale of the products within a certain area, (iii) a commitment by the concedente to sell its products only to one concessionario and (or) by the concessionario to buy them from only one concedente. (Oreste Cagnasso-Gastone Cottino, 133).

Section 2: Obligations of the supplier

IV.E.–5:201: Obligation to supply

The supplier must supply the products ordered by the distributor in so far as it is practicable and provided that the order is reasonable.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The supplier must consistently meet the supply orders of the distributor. However, parties are free to agree that the supplier is not obliged to meet all the orders placed by the distributor. This follows from the non-mandatory character of this rule. Moreover, the supplier is only bound to supply products in so far as the supplier is in a position to do so, taking into account the supplier's actual possibilities (i. e. productive capacity, stock capacity, et cetera). There is no obligation to supply in the case of impracticability. Lastly, the supplier is not bound by orders placed by the distributor if they are not reasonable.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

In most cases supply of the products ordered by the distributor will be in the interest of both parties. The supplier sells the products to the distributor and the latter is able to bring them to the market and to make a profit by reselling them. However, this may not always be the case. The supplier, for various reasons, may be either unable or unwilling to supply the distributor.

This Article obliges the supplier to meet the orders placed by the distributor, unless there are pressing reasons not to do so. The aim is to prevent a supplier from arbitrarily refusing to supply its distributors, and thus to provide the distributor with legal certainty.

However, this Article does not impose a mandatory obligation to supply upon the supplier. The rationale is to preserve the supplier's freedom of contract, so that the supplier is not forced to enter into undesired sales contracts.

The distributor's interest and the general interest are protected by the rules on unfair contract terms (see Book II, Chapter 9, Section 4) and by competition law.

C. Obligation to supply and actual supply contracts

The obligation to supply stems from the framework agreement. This provision does not regulate the terms of the contracts for the actual supply of the goods. Provisions on sales or services provide the specific modalities of the "application" contracts (e.g. the time of delivery, conformity of the products, remedies, et cetera).

Non-performance of obligations under the application contracts may have consequences for the distribution relationship. The latter issue is dealt with by, for example, the rules on termination for non-performance in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5 as modified by IV.E.–2:304 (Termination for non-performance). The effect is that the distributor may terminate the contractual relationship if the non-performance of obligations under i.e. the contracts which give precise operation to the general obligation under the framework contract, or a series of such contracts, amounts to a fundamental non-performance.

D. In so far as practicable

The distributor is entitled to demand the fulfilment of its orders as long as this is not excessive for the supplier, taking into account the supplier's actual resources. An order will not be regarded as practicable if the supplier encounters insuperable obstacles or fulfilment would cause inconvenience or expenses on the supplier's part to the extent that it would be substantially out of proportion to the distributor's interest for the supplier to fulfil the obligation to supply.

E. Reasonable order

In accordance with the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness) reasonableness depends upon the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved. Special market conditions can justify orders exceeding the distributor's normal requests (e.g. a larger order for national team football shirts before the World Cup Finals). An order will be unreasonable if it goes beyond the limits of what would be a normal exercise of such a right by a careful and diligent distributor. This occurs, for instance, when the distributor places extra orders at the very last minute, although the distributor had foreseen (or could have foreseen) long before its actual order the forthcoming need for a much larger amount of products and the distributor knew (or should have known) of the limited supply capacity of its supplier. More generally, the distributor should place the order a reasonable time before the distributor foresees a forthcoming extra need.

NOTES

Obligation to supply

1. According to GREEK law the supplier has an obligation to provide the distributor with the goods to be distributed (Georgakopoulos (1999) 435). Moreover, according to SPANISH legal authors, the supplier must supply the products (Fernandez (1999) 354; Sanchez Calero (2000) 177). This also seems to be the case under FRENCH law with respect to bilateral exclusive distribution contracts, contrats de concession (Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 942).
2. The SPANISH case law shows that the non-performance of this obligation without a justified reason is a cause for termination of the distributorship by the distributor, due to the frustration of its purpose. Moreover the supplier may not terminate the contractual relationship unilaterally invoking lack of achievement of the established minimum levels of sale, if previously the supplier has failed to supply (SAP Valencia 13 April 2007, JUR 2007/235136 and SAP Almería 17 November 2000, JUR 2001/50696).
3. Under DUTCH law, authors agree that where the supplier has economic power the supplier is not allowed to refuse to supply the goods or services to the distributor (Barendrecht & Van Peursem, 63 et. seq., Geel, 108; Van de Paverd, 21-22)
4. Under GERMAN law pursuant to the doctrine of good faith (§ 242 BGB) the BGH held that the supplier may not refuse the distributor's orders arbitrarily (BGH, BB 1958, 541; OLG Bremen, BB 1966, 756; Küstner/Thume, no. 1289; Martinek/Semler, § 14 no. 15). Moreover, if the parties agree that the distributor must purchase a minimum quantity of goods and if they agree upon a competition ban, the supplier must supply (BGH, BB 1972, 193; Küstner/Thume, no. 1290; Martinek/Semler, § 14 no. 15).

5. However, under ITALIAN law there is no general obligation on the side of the supplier to fulfil the orders of the distributor Pardolesi (1979) 257. Whether there is such an obligation depends upon the contract concluded by the parties. And, cases in which parties define rigidly the obligation to supply at the moment of the conclusion of the contract, i. e. the supplier will be bound to supply a specific amount of goods at specific intervals of time, are rare Delli Priscoli, 797, Boero, 308, Cagnasso, 37, Pardolesi, 230. Nonetheless, a refusal to supply by the supplier would certainly be evaluated with regard to the general principle of good faith in performance of the contract (CC art. 1375).

6. Under AUSTRIAN, ENGLISH, SCOTTISH and FINNISH law in the absence of special legislation the obligation to supply is not defined.

IV.E.–5:202: Information by supplier during the performance

The obligation under IV.E.–2:202 (Information during the performance) requires the supplier to provide the distributor with information concerning:

(a) the characteristics of the products;
(b) the prices and terms for the supply of the products;
(c) any recommended prices and terms for the re-supply of the products to customers;
(d) any relevant communication between the supplier and customers; and
(e) any advertising campaigns relevant to the operation of the business.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article states what information the supplier must make available to the distributor during the contract. It follows from IV.E.–2:202 (Information during the performance) that the parties must supply each other with the information which they have at their disposal and which their counterpart needs for the proper performance of their obligations under the contract. The present provision further specifies certain types of information which are included in the supplier's obligation to inform.

The supplier has to provide some basic information which will enable the distributor to distribute the products effectively. The information concerns the characteristics of the products, the prices and terms for the sale of the products and any recommended prices and terms for the resale of the products. In addition, the supplier must inform the distributor about relevant communication with customers and advertising campaigns that it has started.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The aim of this provision is to ensure that the distributor obtains information which is relevant in order to promote the sales of the products efficiently (e.g. knowing their characteristics and so being in a position to inform customers of them) and competitively (e.g. knowing the recommended prices which other distributors may charge). It is also in the interest of the supplier to inform the distributor about general quality requirements for the distribution of the products it supplies, or about new advertising campaigns. The obligation is not unreasonably burdensome for the supplier, since it only has to communicate information which is available to him and in so far as this is needed by the distributor.

Such further information is required because of the high degree of collaboration between the parties in exclusive distribution, selective distribution and exclusive purchase contracts. Moreover, distribution contracts including any exclusivity are rather similar to franchise contracts. Therefore, they should be treated in a similar way, in order to avoid attempts at opportunistic classification by the parties.

C. Information to be provided

The supplier must actively provide the distributor with the information which it possesses and which the distributor needs to achieve the objectives of the contract. Information includes documentation relating to the products (brochures, leaflets, et cetera) or to advertising campaigns. This obligation continues throughout the whole contractual relationship. It also implies that the supplier has to promptly update the distributor as soon as new relevant information (e.g. concerning modifications and improvements to the products offered and sold) becomes available. Depending on the circumstances, the obligation to inform includes information of specific types. This Article mentions, in a non-exhaustive list, information regarding the following matters.

The characteristics of the products. In principle, a supplier has to inform the distributor about the products and their use. This enables the distributor to pass such information on to its customers, and to take the general quality requirements et cetera into account. The provision of this product information may include the supply of documentation, guidelines, management and operation manuals and recipes.

The prices and terms for the supply of the products to the distributor. A supplier must communicate its prices to the distributor. Prices referred to in the present paragraph are those relating to the contract between the distributor and the supplier.

The supplier must also inform the distributor about the supplier's terms for the sale of goods and services, including e.g. guarantees and delivery times.

Any recommended prices and terms for the re-supply of the products to customers. A supplier must communicate any recommended prices and terms to the distributor. These prices relate to the contract between the distributor and the final customers. This information is relevant because the distributor is then aware of what others may charge, and, depending on this, it will decide its own price policy in order to be competitive in the market.

The supplier must also inform the distributor about any recommendation as to the terms for the re-supply of the products to customers; e.g. regarding after-sales services, limitation clauses or credit.

Any relevant communication between the supplier and customers. The supplier must inform the distributor about any wishes, preferences or complaints communicated to it by customers within the territory or the specific group exclusively allotted to the distributor and, more generally, about any communication between it and those customers relevant to the distributorship.

Any advertising campaigns relevant to the operation of the business. The supplier must inform the distributor of any advertising campaigns, so that the distributor is able to participate in them and to benefit from them. The performance of this obligation may require the supply of relevant documentation together with samples of promotional material.

D. No formalities

There is no formal requirement for the way in which this obligation must be performed. Nevertheless, in practice such information will normally be given in writing. It may be problematic for the supplier to prove that it properly supplied the distributor with all the required information, when such information is presented otherwise than in a written document.

E. Competition law

The obligation to inform under paragraph (1)(c) only applies to recommended prices which do not amount to price maintenance clauses that are invalid according to competition law.

As an independent merchant, the distributor is free to set the prices charged for the products. However, practice demonstrates the recurrent use of resale price maintenance clauses. These are clauses whereby the distributor of a product undertakes vis-à-vis the supplier to maintain a certain price level when distributing the products. In its group exemption concerning vertical restrictions (Regulation 2790/99), the EU Commission has taken a relatively lenient approach concerning maximum vertical price restrictions.

Maximum prices and recommended prices that do not amount to a fixed or minimum resale price as a result of pressure or incentives created by any of the parties are now exempted. In contrast, other forms of resale price maintenance, e.g. minimum resale prices and minimum margins, are still a serious infringement that could lead to invalidity and to the imposition of fines. If the agreement does not fall under Article 81(1) (e.g. because it is not capable of affecting trade between Member States), the resale price maintenance clause will be legal under EU law, but will still have to be reviewed under the applicable national law.

NOTES

Information during the performance

1. None of the legal systems contains an explicit statutory rule similar to the present Article.
2. However, under FINNISH, GERMAN, ITALIAN and PORTUGUESE law a similar obligation follows from a general duty of good faith or loyalty (GERMANY: § 242 BGB (Küstner/Thume, nos. 1300, 1302, Martinek/Semler, § 14 no. 63, 64; ITALY: CC arts. 1175 and 1375, Cass. 24-3-1999, n. 2788. Moreover, under GERMAN and PORTUGUESE law the rules concerning commercial agency are applied by way of analogy. (GERMANY: Küstner/Thume, no. 1300; Martinek/Semler, § 14 nos. 63, 64; PORTUGAL: art. 13 a DL 178/86 on Agency).
3. In the NETHERLANDS as well as in SPAIN legal authors agree upon a supplier's obligation to provide the distributor with information concerning the products to be distributed (Barendrecht & Van Peursem, 92) (Calvo (1997) 1351). In SPAIN this is said to follow from the characteristics of a distributorship as a confidential and reciprocally loyal relationship in which the achievement of the best possible results is in the interest of both parties (STS 11 July 2007, RJ 2007/5132). In addition, this is said to be justified in view of the dependent situation of the distributor towards the supplier, who possesses the essential information regarding the marketed product. (See also art. 17.1 of the Model distribution contract Guardiola Sacarrera (1998) 150). In ENGLAND this aspect has been recognised by legal authors. See Adams, John N. "Franchising: precedent and practice", Model Franchise Agreement 1, Article 6.19.
4. Under GREEK case law it has been established that in the case of exclusive distribution the supplier must provide all the information and expertise needed for the distributor to trade the merchandise effectively and to conduct the business (see Efeteio Athinon 9658/1995, DEE 2/1996 at 154).

5. Under FRENCH law, in the case of a contrat de concession an obligation to provide information with respect to advertising campaigns follows from the obligation to assist the distributor (Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 942; Ferrier, no. 495 et seq.). Under FRENCH law it has been debated extensively whether the supplier may set a fixed price. The prevailing opinion seems to be that the supplier cannot impose a price upon the distributor, but can only recommend such a price. (Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 943, Cass. com. 22 juillet 1986 D. 1988 D. 1995 som. 85).

IV.E.–5:203: Warning by supplier of decreased supply capacity

(1) The supplier must warn the distributor within a reasonable time when the supplier foresees that the supplier's supply capacity will be significantly less than the distributor had reason to expect.

(2) For the purpose of paragraph (1) the supplier is presumed to foresee what the supplier could reasonably be expected to foresee.

(3) In exclusive purchasing contracts, the parties may not exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The supplier has to warn the distributor within a reasonable time when the supplier foresees major decreases in its supply capacity. The supplier is presumed to foresee such a major decrease when it could reasonably be expected to foresee it (paragraph (2)). In the case of an exclusive purchase agreement, the rule is mandatory (paragraph (3)).

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This Article protects the interests of the distributor. The distributor may have become dependant on the product output of a supplier. This especially occurs when the latter offers a unique product (e.g. a patented innovation) or when the product constitutes a necessary item in the distributor's range. The availability of specific models (e.g. brand new ones) and delivery times are elements which are capable of affecting seriously the competitiveness of the distributor.

The present provision requires real collaboration between the parties. The supplier, who is aware of a significant decrease in its supply capacity, must warn the distributor. On the basis of the supplier's warning, the distributor will be able to avoid damage and liability (e.g. in relation to those orders which the distributor has already accepted from customers).

This obligation is not unreasonably burdensome for the supplier. First, the supplier is only required to warn the distributor in the case of a major change in relation to what the distributor had reason to expect. Secondly, the distributor is neither entitled to know the reasons for the decrease nor is the distributor entitled to a warning in relation to a supply capacity it had no reason to expect. Finally, the obligation only arises in the case of actual foresight although, because of the difficulty of proving this, the supplier is presumed by paragraph (2) to foresee what it could reasonably be expected to foresee.

Only in the case of exclusive purchase agreements is this rule mandatory. In those agreements, the distributor is left with no alternative but to order those products from the supplier. The distributor depends entirely upon the supply capacity of the supplier (e.g. the supplier's products are the only or main products with which the distributor deals). Therefore, an important decrease in the supplier's supply capacity would have very serious consequences.

C. Reasonable time

The supplier must warn the distributor concerning the forthcoming decrease in supply capacity within a reasonable time. When assessing what is reasonable, the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved must be taken into account. (See the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness)). In principle, the supplier must issue the warning as soon as the supplier is aware of the alarming fact. Moreover, the supplier must leave the distributor a certain amount of time to prepare a reaction and to adapt to the customers' demand. The supplier's warning allows the distributor to avoid the acceptance of orders which the distributor will probably not be able to fulfil.

D. Significant decrease

The supplier is under an obligation to warn the distributor only when the supplier foresees that its supply capacity will be significantly lower. No obligation arises in the case of a merely temporary or minor obstacle to supplying. The present obligation applies both when the decrease of the supply capacity is the result of factors within the supplier's control and where the decrease is the consequence of market conditions or other external factors (e.g. a shortage of raw materials or industrial action).

E. Expectations of the distributor

What amounts to the capacity which the distributor had reason to expect depends on the circumstances of the particular case. In the absence of other more decisive factors, the average supplies over the previous years may serve as a yardstick.

F. Character of the rule

In exclusive purchasing contracts, this is a mandatory rule; the parties may not derogate from this obligation. In exclusive and selective distribution agreements, this rule is a default rule; the parties are free to agree otherwise.

NOTES

In general

1. This rule is based on art. 4(2) b of the Directive on commercial agency. None of the European legal systems have explicitly regulated this issue with respect to distribution contracts.
2. According to SPANISH authors such an obligation may follow from the character of the distribution contract, which is a contract characterized by confidentiality and reciprocal loyalty (Calvo (1997) 1351). In addition, in the SPANISH Model distribution contract a similar stipulation is included in art. 17(2) of the contract (Guardiola Sacarrera (1998) 150).
3. Under ITALIAN law a similar obligation can only stem from general principles of good faith (CC 1375) and fair dealing (CC 1175). With respect to the other legal systems no information was provided.

IV.E.–5:204: Advertising materials

The supplier must provide the distributor at a reasonable price with all the advertising materials the supplier has which are needed for the proper distribution and promotion of the products.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article requires the supplier to provide the distributor with advertising materials. The supplier has to supply only the materials which it has at its disposal and which the distributor requests. However, the distributor is entitled to ask only for advertising materials which are necessary for the proper distribution and promotion of the products.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Providing the distributor with the advertising materials which the supplier possesses will usually be in the interest of both parties. On the one hand, this will contribute to a uniform image of the supplier's products in the eyes of the public and to a more effective campaign. On the other hand, the distributor will be identified in the eyes of the customers as a dealer in certain branded products. However, there may be cases in which the supplier prefers to refrain from supplying advertising materials to certain distributors. This Article aims at preventing any discriminatory behaviour, granting distributors equal treatment.

This provision clearly promotes the interests of the distributor. The distributor is free to choose whether or not to join a promotional campaign launched by the supplier. However, this Article is not too burdensome for the supplier. The supplier is not required to start a promotional campaign merely to please the distributor. In addition, the supplier is not required to search for advertising materials which the supplier no longer possesses, e.g. linked to old promotional campaigns. Moreover, the Article only refers to what is needed in order to promote the sales of the products.

C. Advertising materials

Advertising materials are additional and accessory materials related to the distribution activity, e.g. fittings for the distributor's premises such as posters, chairs, sunshades, signs and special offers.

D. Reasonable price

The distributor who decides to participate in a campaign must have access to the advertising materials at a reasonable price. To asses what is reasonable, the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved must be taken into account. (See the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness)). It would, for instance, be unreasonable to charge the distributor a price which is completely out of proportion to the cost borne by the supplier for the advertising campaign. The same holds true for a price which is far higher than what other distributors have paid or the price in previous similar campaigns.

NOTES

Advertising materials

1. Under FINNISH law and GERMAN law there is such an obligation. In FINLAND it follows from the general duty to co-operate. In GERMANY it follows from good faith (§ 242 BGB) and from the analogous application of § 86a HGB to distribution contracts (Genzow, no. 84; Küstner/Thume, no. 1307). According to FRENCH authors such an obligation follows from the supplier's obligation to assist the distributor (Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 942).
2. Under ITALIAN law, there is no explicit obligation on the side of the supplier. However, from the general principle of good faith in performance of the contract (CC art. 1375) and fair dealing (CC art. 1175) such an obligation may be inferred. With respect to the other legal systems, no information was provided.
3. English law does not appear to recognises such an obligation on the franchisor. . Most franchise organisations provide for advertising and that most franchise owners collect contributions for this from those who have bought into the franchise: Mendelsohn, "Franchising Law" para 7.4
4. SPANISH law lacks any provisions on this matter. The existence of an obligation to provide the distributor with sufficient advertising materials, and the question of who bears the cost, depend on the terms of the contract. The case law shows that the cost of the campaigns may be shared by two parties (STS 22 June 2007, RJ 2007/5427). However, if the advertising materials are possessed by the supplier and they are necessary in order to develop proper distribution and promotion of the products, the character of the relationship (and in particular the fact that it requires reciprocal confidentiality and loyalty) and the principle of good faith oblige the supplier to provide the distributor with these materials, in exchange for a price established in the contract. Although distributorships and franchises are different, it must be taken into account that a similar obligation of designing campaigns in order to promote the brand has been recognised by the case law in the framework of franchise (SAP Girona 11 October 2006, JUR 2007\140527).

IV.E.–5:205: The reputation of the products

The supplier must make reasonable efforts not to damage the reputation of the products.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The supplier is under an obligation not to damage the good reputation of the products which it supplies. This means that the supplier must avoid behaviour which may cause such damage. In certain cases, it must also take the necessary precautions to prevent such damage.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The positive image of the products in the minds of the final customers is one of the elements inducing distributors to promote the sales of such products. This provision requires the supplier not to harm the good reputation that attracted the distributor. Upholding the good reputation of the products should normally be in the interest of both parties. Taking necessary precautions in this respect may be costly.

However, as said, the provisions in this Chapter only apply to exclusive distribution, selective distribution and exclusive purchase agreements. In an exclusive purchasing agreement, the distributor agrees only to buy from one supplier. As a result, the distributor is effectively dependant on the good reputation of the products, somewhat similar to a franchisee. As regards exclusive distribution and selective distribution contracts, the rationale is that the exclusive or selective distributor expects to be in a privileged position with respect to the commercialisation of the products. From this, certain specific default obligations on the part of the supplier will arise. Furthermore, distribution contracts including exclusivities mainly relate to branded products. It is essential for their reputation not to harm the image of the brand.

C. Reasonable efforts

To assess what is reasonable, the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved should be taken into account (see definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness)).

D. Liability of the supplier

The supplier is only liable for a loss of reputation caused by its acts or omissions; e.g. by the supply of poor-quality products. This means that the supplier is not liable in the case of a breakdown of a brand which is exclusively the result of external factors such as the extraordinary success of a competing good or service.

E. Character of the rule

This is a default rule; the parties are free to agree otherwise.

F. Remedies

In the case of non-performance of the supplier's obligation to make reasonable efforts not to seriously damage the reputation of the products the aggrieved party may, in principle, resort to any of the remedies set out in Book III, Chapter 3 (Remedies for non-performance).

NOTES

Reputation of the products

1. No European legal system contains a specific rule as the present Article.
2. According to ITALIAN law, in the case of supply contracts (somministrazione) when the supplied party (somministrato) undertakes, in exchange for exclusivity, to promote the sales of the products supplied (CC article 1568 para. 2), the supplier must supply products of an adequate quality so as to completely satisfy the clientele obtained by the supplied party. It is disputed whether such an obligation can be inferred from the decision of the Cass. Sez. II civ. 22-2-1999, n. 1469 as to concessione di vendita, see the note by C. Maria, Gius. Civ., 2000, fasc. 6 (giugno), pt. 1, 1813-1815 and see also note by R. Christian, Resp. Civ. e Prev. 2000, fasc. 2, 363-371). In SPANISH literature it has been argued that such an obligation could be inferred from the general rule of Ccom art. 57 which states that the distributor has to act with proper commercial diligence De la Cuesta, p. 365). Under GREEK law such an obligation has also been accepted.

Section 3: Obligations of the distributor

IV.E.–5:301: Obligation to distribute

In exclusive distribution contracts and selective distribution contracts the distributor must, so far as practicable, make reasonable efforts to promote the products.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article requires the distributor to enhance the sales of the contract products. The distributor is under an obligation to make reasonable efforts to promote, develop and extend their market.

The obligation is restricted to cases of exclusive and selective distribution contracts.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Both parties have an interest in achieving the highest possible sales volume. The more the distributor sells, the more profit it makes and the more the supplier profits as well. This provision adds that promoting sales is not only a right of the distributor but also an obligation. In exclusive and selective distribution contracts, suppliers take the risk of having only limited channels of distribution. The exclusive and selective distributors are the channels available for suppliers in order to reach the final market. Suppliers agree to refrain from selling to other distributors (in the same area or within the same group of customers) or to unauthorised distributors, respectively.

However, this obligation is not too burdensome for distributors. First, it only requires the distributor to take reasonable steps. Secondly, it applies only so far as practicable. Thirdly, this obligation is in principle restricted to cases of exclusive and selective distribution agreements. By means of a selective distribution system, the distributor makes higher profits than it would have attained otherwise. Exclusive distribution offers the distributor a monopoly position which is, in some aspects, similar to that of the producer. In both cases, distributors are paid back by a certain degree of protection from intra-brand competition.

C. Reasonable efforts so far as practicable

This provision does not impose an obligation of result. The distributor is only under an obligation to make reasonable efforts to resell the supplier's products. In assessing what is reasonable, the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved should be taken into account. (See the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness)). The distributor is not obliged to do anything excessive, taking into account the distributor's actual resources.

NOTES

Obligation to promote the sales of the products

1. Although there are no specific statutory provisions under the legal systems in this respect, according to the legal authors and case law of GERMANY, THE NETHERLANDS and SPAIN, there is a similar obligation for the supplier. However, in those countries the supplier's obligation to promote the sales of the goods or services (by advertising campaigns etc) is not restricted to exclusive and selective distribution contracts. (GERMANY: Küstner/Thume, no. 1314; Martinek/Semler, § 14 no. 13; NETHERLANDS: Barendrecht & Van Peursem, 113 ff, Van de Paverd, 21 ff.; SPAIN*: Calvo Caravaca* (1997) 1345; De la Cuesta (2001) 365).

IV.E.–5:302: Information by distributor during the performance

In exclusive distribution contracts and selective distribution contracts, the obligation under IV.E.–2:202 (Information during the performance) requires the distributor to provide the supplier with information concerning:

(a) claims brought or threatened by third parties in relation to the supplier's intellectual property rights; and

(b) infringements by third parties of the supplier's intellectual property rights.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article indicates what specific information the exclusive or selective distributor is required to provide to the supplier during the contractual relationship. Whenever the distributor is aware of any infringement of, or possible challenge to, the supplier's intellectual property rights (IPR), it has to inform the supplier.

This obligation applies only to exclusive and selective distribution contracts.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The supplier has a clear interest in being informed of any threat to or any infringement of its intellectual property rights. Often the distributor is in a position to provide the supplier with such information. This obligation is not too burdensome for distributors. First, from IV.E.–2:202 (Information during the performance) it follows that the distributor only has to provide information which the distributor possesses. Secondly, exclusive and selective distribution agreements often include the licensing by the supplier of intellectual property rights to the distributor. Therefore, it will be also in the interest of the distributor to inform the supplier of any IPR infringement.

In principle, the present obligation only applies in cases of exclusive and selective distribution contracts. The rationale is that if a supplier agrees not to sell to distributors other than the exclusive or authorised ones that is because of the supplier's trust in them. It may therefore be expected from a loyal distributor that it should provide the supplier with information which the distributor has that may prevent or limit any harm to the supplier (e.g. information concerning an infringement of any IPR rights).

The information required from the distributor is the same type of information as is required from a franchisee. Since there are similarities between these contracts, it is important to deal with them in a similar way in order to avoid problems of classification.

C. Information to be provided

Exclusive and selective distributors must provide information they possess. This obligation lasts throughout the whole contractual relationship. The Article specifically mentions, in a non-exhaustive list, information regarding the following matters.

(a) Claims brought or threatened by third parties in relation to the supplier's intellectual property rights

This information relates to claims and threats regarding trademarks, trade names or symbols, or other industrial property rights).

(b) Infringements by Third parties of the Supplier's Intellectual Property Rights

Exclusive and selective distributors should inform their suppliers if they are aware that third parties do not respect and infringe the supplier's intellectual property rights.

D. No formalities

There is no formal requirement for the way in which this obligation must be performed, e.g. in writing.

NOTES

Obligation to provide information during performance

1. Under none of the legal systems does there seem to be a specific obligation of this type. However, under DUTCH law such an obligation has been defended by authors (Barendrecht & Van Peursem, no. 114).
2. In SPANISH literature it has been argued that a distribution contract includes specific obligations which can be derived from the reciprocal obligations of loyalty, good faith and the protection of the party's interests. (Dominguez García (1997) 1354 ff). These specific obligations include the obligation for the distributor to inform the supplier periodically concerning the market situation, the perspectives of development, the state and prognosis on future sales, and the requirements of the clients in order to allow the supplier to adapt the quantity and quality of the products to the demands of the clientele. See also art. 10 (1) of the model distribution contract proposed by Guardiola Sacarrera (1998) 147.
3. As to claims brought by the third parties or infringements of the supplier's intellectual rights, the distributor's obligation to inform may be established by a contractual term (as there is no specific legal provision on this matter) or be inferred by analogy from a similar obligation established in the Spanish lease system by CC art. 1559 which obliges the lessee to inform the lessor about any right in, or claim against, the leased goods.

IV.E.–5:303: Warning by distributor of decreased requirements

(1) In exclusive distribution contracts and selective distribution contracts, the distributor must warn the supplier within a reasonable time when the distributor foresees that the distributor's requirements will be significantly less than the supplier had reason to expect.

(2) For the purpose of paragraph (1) the distributor is presumed to foresee what the distributor could reasonably be expected to foresee.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article requires the distributor to warn the supplier whenever it foresees a major decrease in its orders in comparison to what the supplier could reasonably expect. The distributor must notify the supplier within a reasonable time.

The obligation is restricted to cases of exclusive and selective distribution agreements.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This Article protects the interest of the supplier. On the basis of the distributor's warning, the supplier is able to adjust its production, and sometimes even its production capacity, to the new situation. This is especially important in those cases where the supplier sells to large distributors such as large retail chains, e.g. a supermarket chain which has become the only distributor of a leading brand on the national food retail market.

However, this obligation is not unreasonably burdensome for the distributor. First, there is no obligation to warn in the case of minor changes. Secondly, the supplier is not entitled to know the reasons why this change occurs. Thirdly, the obligation only arises in the case of actual foresight, although the difficulty of proving this is alleviated by the presumption in paragraph (2).

In principle, this provision only applies to exclusive and selective distribution agreements. The reason is that under such agreements the supplier is largely dependent, for its entire sales, on the distributors' requirements. If they suddenly do not order any products, the supplier will encounter serious economic difficulties, since it is not in a position to bypass its distributors and sell to other distributors (within a certain area or group of customers) or to unauthorised distributors.

C. Reasonable time

The distributor has to warn the supplier within a reasonable time. To assess what is reasonable, the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved must be taken into account (see the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness)). In principle, the distributor must issue the warning as soon as the distributor is aware of the alarming fact. Moreover, the distributor must leave the supplier a certain amount of time to react and to adapt to the new customer demand (e.g. by limiting its production).

D. Significantly less

The distributor need warn the supplier only when it foresees an important decrease in its orders. No obligation arises in the case of only a minor decrease in orders. This obligation exists irrespective of whether the distributor requires less products as a consequence of factors within the distributor's control or whether this is due to market-related reasons.

E. Expectations of the supplier

What the supplier has reason to expect depends on the circumstances of the case. In most cases, the average quantities ordered over the previous years will be a proper starting point for determining the supplier's reasonable expectations.

NOTES

1. This rule is similar to the one provided by the Commercial Agency Directive (art. 4 (2)b). None of the European legal systems have explicitly regulated this issue for distribution contracts.
2. Under SPANISH law such an obligation may be inferred from the principle of good faith (Ccom art. 57) , as the system lacks an explicit regulation. No doubt the same argument could be made in many other systems.

IV.E.–5:304: Instructions

In exclusive distribution contracts and selective distribution contracts, the distributor must follow reasonable instructions from the supplier which are designed to secure the proper distribution of the products or to maintain the reputation or the distinctiveness of the products.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article requires the exclusive or selective distributor to follow reasonable instructions given by the supplier. The distributor must follow only those instructions which aim to secure the proper distribution of the products or to maintain their good reputation.

The obligation is restricted to cases of exclusive and selective distribution agreements.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This provision strikes a balance between two conflicting interests: (i) the distributor's interest in pursuing its own goals by means of an independent commercial policy and (ii) the supplier's interest in a professional and uniform presentation and distribution of its products in the market.

This Article protects the interest of the supplier, in that it grants the supplier the possibility to instruct its distributors. The maintenance of the good reputation and distinctiveness of the products may not be attainable unless the distributor follows such instructions. In exclusive and selective distribution contracts, the distributors are the only channels through which the supplier can reach the final market (unless the supplier is entitled to undertake direct sales). In the case of selective distribution, giving instructions to the authorised distributors is not only a right of the supplier but also an obligation, in order to maintain the same high quality standards within the selective distribution system.

However, the present Article also takes into account the distributor's interest in remaining autonomous. The point here is that the distributor has an interest in the success of its entire range of products. Co-ordinating its behaviour with the commercial policy of the supplier necessarily implies restricting its freedom of manoeuvre (e.g. the distributor gives up some elasticity in the composition of its range of products). Moreover, the present provision does not require the distributor to follow any instruction by the supplier. The distributor has to comply only with those instructions which are relevant in relation to the operation of the distributorship and which are reasonable. Secondly, the present obligation does not apply to any distributor, but only to exclusive and selective distributors, in exchange for their privileged position in the commercialisation of the contract products.

C. Reasonable instructions

The distributor is only required to follow instructions which are reasonable. To assess what is reasonable, the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved must be taken into account (see the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness)). Elements to be taken into account to ascertain whether certain instructions are reasonable include: the interests of the parties, the nature of the instruction given as well as their purpose. To be reasonable, instructions should not alter the equilibrium of the contract.

D. To secure proper distribution

The supplier is entitled to instruct distributors with a view to ensuring the proper distribution of the products. Instructions of this kind for instance relate to the setting up and maintenance of specific commercial premises, the packaging of the products and the maintenance of a suitable number of samples of the products for marketing purposes.

E. To maintain reputation and distinctiveness

Especially in the case of the distribution of branded products it is essential that the reputation and the distinctiveness of the products are maintained. Instructions for that purpose relate, for instance, to the arrangement of – or adhesion to – advertising campaigns, the maintenance of certain facilities for the clientele (i. e. assistance services or advice to the clientele) and the presentation and display of the products.

NOTES

In general

1. None of the legal systems includes specific statutory rules in this respect. However, PORTUGUESE, SPANISH and DUTCH legal authors agree upon a similar obligation to follow instructions in order to maintain the prestige of the brand. (SPAIN: Calvo (1997) 1353, Domínguez García in Calvo Caravaca/Fernández de la Gándara, 1353, Fernandez (1999) 353, J.L.Echegaray in Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p. 552). This obligation is considered to be one of the distributor's main obligations according to PORTUGUESE authors (Pinto Monteiro (2002) 108; Brito (1990) 179). DUTCH writers argue that it follows from the nature of a distribution contract (Barendrecht & Van Peursem, 93, 114, 116; Geel, 104).
2. Under GREEK law the distributor must follow any instruction given by the supplier concerning the goods and the selling method. The closer and more qualified the bond between the parties, the more obligations follow from such a relationship. For instance, in an exclusive distribution agreement the distributor must abide by the instructions of the producer-supplier as to the marketing technique for the merchandise, the service of the products, and the stock of products to be maintained (Efeteio Athinon 9658/1995, DEE 2/1996 at 154].
3. Under FINNISH, GERMAN and ITALIAN law it depends on the circumstances of the case whether such an obligation can be derived from good faith (GERMANY: § 242 BGB; ITALY: CC article 1375). Under AUSTRIAN law the situation seems similar to FINNISH and GERMAN law. (OGH 2001/12/07 7Ob265/01y 4 Ob 79/95, OGH 1995/12/05 4Ob79/95).

IV.E.–5:305: Inspection

In exclusive distribution contracts and selective distribution contracts, the distributor must provide the supplier with reasonable access to the distributor's premises to enable the supplier to check that the distributor is complying with the standards agreed upon in the contract and with reasonable instructions given.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article requires the distributor to allow the supplier to examine whether the distributor is performing its activity in accordance with the contract and with the instructions which have been given. The supplier's access is limited to the distributor's premises.

The obligation is restricted to cases of exclusive and selective distribution agreements.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The present obligation supplements the main obligation of an exclusive or selective distributor, which is simply to make reasonable efforts in order to promote the sales of the products. Inspection is an important instrument to ascertain whether the distributor has complied with the standards agreed upon in the contract and whether the distributor has followed the relevant instructions. This is fundamental in the case of selective distribution systems. In such cases, the distributor's obligation to provide reasonable access to the premises indirectly benefits other distributors as well. In fact, the poor commercialisation of the products may have negative consequences for other distributors of the same products.

However, the supplier's right to inspect may be very intrusive from the perspective of the distributor. For this reason, this obligation in principle is restricted to exclusive and selective distribution contracts, since in those contracts the supplier grants distributors a privileged position in the commercialisation of its products. Moreover, the present obligation is not too burdensome for the distributor. The distributor is only under an obligation to provide reasonable access to the distributor's premises. The right to inspect does not imply a right for the supplier to have access to accounts. There is no reason which would justify such an intrusion. Unlike in commercial agency, no commission is calculated on the basis of the contracts concluded nor are there, as in franchise agreements, any fees to be paid on the basis of volume.

C. Reasonable access

The supplier is entitled to carry out a reasonable inspection. To assess what is reasonable, the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved must be taken into account (see the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness)). In general, the supplier is permitted to check whether the standards agreed upon and the instructions have been met. Moreover, the supplier's inspection should not obstruct or alter the distributor's commercial activities.

D. Distributor's premises

The supplier's inspection will mainly consist of periodical visits to the distributor's commercial premises, which is the location in which the distributor promotes the sales to its customers (e.g. quality control). This Article does not entitle the supplier to have access to the accounts of the distributor; i. e. the supplier is not entitled to request the distributor to render reports on sales, stock and prospective business.

NOTES

Inspection

1. Under none of the legal systems is there a statutory rule in this respect. However under PORTUGUESE law this obligation is recognised unanimously by the authors. (Pinto Monteiro 2002, 109; Brito 1990, 179; RP 5/07/1999, www.dgsi.pt, JTRP26.).
2. Under AUSTRIAN law the Commercial Agency Act is applied by way of analogy to distribution contracts and the distributor must allow an inspection at its premises (OGH 1999/08/25 3Ob10/98m, OGH 1999/03/30 10Ob61/99i, contractually agreed: OGH 2000/10/23 8Ob74/00s).
3. Under GERMAN and ITALIAN law concerning any type of distribution contract such an obligation may follow from the principle of good faith depending on the circumstances of the situation (GERMANY: § 242 BGB, Genzow, no. 79; Küstner/Thume, no. 1327; ITALY: CC arts. 1375, Galgano, 631). Some SPANISH authors agree upon such a right of inspection and control as a counterpart of enjoyment of the prestige of the brand and in order to prevent any damage to the distributor's reputation (Domínguez García (1997) 1353, De la Cuesta (2001) 366).

IV.E.–5:306: The reputation of the products

In exclusive distribution contracts and selective distribution contracts, the distributor must make reasonable efforts not to damage the reputation of the products.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article obliges the distributor to avoid any behaviour which could seriously harm the good reputation of the supplier's products. The obligation requires the distributor to take the necessary precautions to avoid such damage.

The obligation is restricted to cases of exclusive and selective distribution agreements.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Maintaining the good reputation of the contract products is normally in the interest of both parties. However, the distributor may lose some interest in dealing with the contract products, if for instance it favours another product that it distributes as well, or if it envisages bringing the contractual relationship to an end. The present provision aims to prevent the distributor from damaging the good reputation of the products. It obliges the distributor to take the necessary precautions to avoid such damage.

In principle the present obligation is restricted to cases of exclusive and selective distribution agreements. First, these types of contracts mainly deal with branded products for which image is of the essence and this image may be very easily damaged; e.g. the reputation of the products could be harmed by inadequate packaging, presentation and display of the products by the distributor. Secondly, the idea of commercialising the products via a few refined sales sites is aimed at reinforcing the image of exclusivity attached to the products. Thirdly, since the supplier grants the distributor the privilege of being the only one or one of the few distributors dealing with certain products, it is fair to expect from the distributor a certain loyal behaviour towards the supplier and the products it trades.

C. Reasonable efforts

In assessing what is reasonable, the nature and purposes of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trade or profession involved must be taken into account (see the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness)). For instance, an advertising campaign promoted by the supplier which stresses the quality of the after-sales service could be undermined by the fact that the distributors fail to set up the necessary assistance service.

D. Liability of the distributor

The distributor is only liable for a loss of reputation caused by the distributor's acts or omissions. If the loss of reputation is caused by a third party, or by specific market conditions, the distributor is not liable. This would simply be part of the ordinary commercial risk borne by both parties.

NOTES

The reputation of the products

1. Under none of the legal systems is there a specific statutory rule which includes such an obligation. However, FRENCH and SPANISH legal authors argue that the distributor must maintain the image of the products (FRANCE: Dutilleul & Delebecque, no. 943; SPAIN: Dominguez García (1997), 1353, Memento Lefebvre (2003-2004) 522). In GERMAN law it is accepted that the supplier must maintain the good reputation of the trademark (Genzow, no. 85; Küstner/Thume, no. 1308). This obligation is founded on good faith (§ 242 BGB). The supplier must take all reasonable measures to ensure and maintain the highest quality of the traded product (Qualitätssicherungspflicht). However, the obligation to maintain the good reputation of the trademark is not limited to exclusive purchasing contracts, but is also applicable to all other types of distribution contracts.

PART F. LOAN CONTRACTS

IV.F.–1:101: Scope

(1) This Part of Book IV applies to loan contracts other than those under which:

(a) a business lends to a consumer;

(b) the lender's rights are secured either by a mortgage or by another comparable security commonly used in a Member State on immovable property or secured by a right relating to immovable property; or

(c) the purpose of the loan is to acquire or retain property rights in land or in an existing or projected building.

(2) A loan contract is a contract by which one party, the lender, is obliged to provide the other party, the borrower, with credit of any amount for a definite or indefinite period (the loan period), in the form of a monetary loan or of an overdraft facility and by which the borrower is obliged to repay the money obtained under the credit, whether or not the borrower is obliged to pay interest or any other kind of remuneration the parties have agreed upon.

(3) A monetary loan is a fixed sum of money which is lent to the borrower and which the borrower agrees to repay either by fixed instalments or by paying the whole sum at the end of the loan period.

(4) An overdraft facility is an option for the borrower to withdraw funds on a fluctuating, limited basis from the borrower's current account in excess of the current balance in the account. Unless otherwise determined, an overdraft facility has a revolving character in that the borrower can use the facility over and over again.

(5) A contract is not a loan contract merely because it provides for the time of payment of an obligation to pay money to be deferred, unless it requires the borrower to pay interest or any other charge in addition to the price.

(6) The parties may however agree that money due under an existing obligation to pay money will in future be due under a loan contract.

IV.F.–1:102: Main obligation of the lender

(1) The lender is obliged to provide the borrower with credit for the amount, in the manner and for the period determinable from the contract.

(2) If a period of time within which the obligation is to be performed cannot be determined from the terms regulating the obligation, the lender is obliged to make the credit available a reasonable time after the borrower's demand.

IV.F.–1:103: Main obligation of the borrower

(1) Where the credit takes the form of a monetary loan, the borrower is obliged to take up the loan in the manner and for the period determinable from the contract.

(2) If the time the borrower is to take up the loan is not determinable from the contract, the borrower is obliged to take up the loan a reasonable time after the lender's demand.

IV.F.–1:104: Interest

(1) The borrower is obliged to pay interest or any other kind of remuneration according to the terms of the contract.

(2) If the contract does not specify the interest payable, interest is payable unless both parties are consumers.

(3) Interest accrues day by day from the date the borrower takes up the monetary loan or makes use of the overdraft facility but is payable at the end of the loan period or annually, whichever occurs earlier.

(4) Interest payable according to the preceding paragraph is added to the outstanding capital every 12 months.

IV.F.–1:105: Purpose of the credit

If the contract restricts use of the credit to a specific purpose, the borrower is obliged, within a reasonable time after the lender's demand, to provide information necessary to enable the lender to verify its use.

IV.F.–1:106: Early repayment

(1) The borrower is entitled, by paying into the account, to reduce or extinguish at will the amount borrowed under an overdraft facility.

(2) The borrower is entitled to repay a monetary loan, in whole or in part, at any time if under the loan contract the borrower does not have to pay interest or any other kind of remuneration which depends on the duration of the credit.

(3) In the case of any other type of monetary loan, the borrower is entitled to repay the whole or part of the loan at any time. Paragraphs (4) and (5) apply.

(4) Where the loan contract has a duration of more than 1 year, or is of an indefinite duration, and provides for a fixed interest rate the borrower is entitled to repay early in whole or in part under paragraph (3) only on giving the lender at least three months notice.

(5) On early repayment under paragraph (3):

- (a) the borrower is not liable to pay interest on the amount repaid for any time after the receipt of the repayment by the lender; and
- (b) the lender is entitled to compensation for any loss caused by the early repayment.

(6) The compensation due under paragraph (5)(b) includes lost interest and administrative costs but must take into account any interest the creditor can receive by lending out the amount repaid on the market.

PART G. PERSONAL SECURITY

CHAPTER 1: COMMON RULES

IV.G.–1:101: Definitions

For the purposes of this Part:

(a) a "dependent personal security" is an obligation by a security provider which is assumed in favour of a creditor in order to secure a right to performance of a present or future obligation of the debtor owed to the creditor and performance of which is due only if, and to the extent that, performance of the latter obligation is due;

(b) an "independent personal security" is an obligation by a security provider which is assumed in favour of a creditor for the purposes of security and which is expressly or impliedly declared not to depend upon another person's obligation owed to the creditor;

(c) the "security provider" is the person who assumes the obligations towards the creditor for the purposes of security;

(d) the "debtor" is the person who owes the secured obligation, if any, to the creditor, and, in provisions relating to purported obligations, includes an apparent debtor;

(e) a "co-debtorship for security purposes" is an obligation owed by two or more debtors in which one of the debtors, the security provider, assumes the obligation primarily for purposes of security towards the creditor;

(f) a "global security" is a dependent personal security which is assumed in order to secure a right to performance of all the debtor's obligations towards the creditor or a right to payment of the debit balance of a current account or a security of a similar extent;

(g) "proprietary security" covers security rights in all kinds of assets, whether movable or immovable, corporeal or incorporeal; and

(h) the "secured obligation" is the obligation the right to the performance of which is secured.

COMMENTS

A. Personal security

"Personal security" as a general term is not familiar to all European countries. It is to be understood as a broad counterpart to the term "proprietary security". Personal security comprises all those security rights in which a person (whether a natural person or a legal entity) is liable with all that person's assets in order to secure an obligation of another person, the principal debtor. By contrast, proprietary security (often but not necessarily provided by the debtor of the secured claim) exposes the security provider only with respect to the specific encumbered assets to a right for preferential satisfaction of the secured creditor. The contrast to personal security is obvious. This indicates why personal security is very attractive for creditors and plays a very important role in practice. However, as always, that attractiveness for creditors has to be paid for. It is paid for by an equivalent degree of risk for the provider of personal security. The proper protection of providers of personal security is therefore an important feature of any acceptable set of rules on this subject.

There are two main types of personal security – the dependent and the independent personal security. The dependent personal security is the older; its roots go back to Roman law (fideiussio). Centuries of practical experience have resulted in national rules that are relatively well settled, although they vary to some degree between the member states. By contrast, the independent personal security is a phenomenon of modern times which in some countries has not been recognised until very late in the twentieth century and which has only exceptionally been sanctioned by legislators. Most other modern functional types of personal security, such as binding comfort letters and stand-by letters of credit are covered by one or other of those two central institutions. The only exception is co-debtorship for security purposes.

The terms "dependent" and "independent" personal security are not derived from any national legal system. They are used because they express the salient features of the two types. Personal security may either be dependent upon major aspects of the secured claim or it may be independent of any possibly underlying claim.

In general, the present rules do not deal with the formation or validity of contracts or other juridical acts for the provision of personal security. This is left to the general rules in Book II along with any applicable European or national rules. However, one major exception is to be found in Chapter 4 of these rules on personal securities provided by consumers. The assumption of liability as a security provider is an area where the consumer requires special protection.

Dependent personal security is dealt with in Chapter 2. The rules in that Chapter are supplemented by specific provisions on consumer protection in Chapter 4 which are also applicable where consumers assume other types of personal security. The rules on independent security can be found in Chapter 3, which in fact will essentially be relevant for personal security granted by business and professional security providers. The rules in Chapters 2 to 4 are subject to a few general rules set out in Chapter 1.

B. Dependent personal security

Introductory. The term "dependent personal security" does not seem to be used by any national legal system in Europe. Instead, various names are given to designate the basic institution – e.g. suretyship or guarantee or caution or cautionary obligation. Unfortunately none of these various names can be said to be firmly rooted or universally accepted. For these reasons it was decided to coin the new functional and descriptive term – "dependent personal security".

Nature of security provided. A dependent personal security may take three forms. In the vast majority of cases, the security provider promises to make a payment of money. In some specific cases, the payment of damages is promised. The most important example is the issue of a binding comfort letter.

> Illustration 1
> A, the majority shareholder of company Z, sends a letter to the major creditors of Z which is in financial straits saying: "I herewith undertake to settle all present and future indebtedness of company Z in order to save it from bankruptcy." If, contrary to his promise, Z does not abide by his letter, the creditors of Z who have received the above undertaking may sue Z for damages based upon the breach of his undertaking.

A security provider may also promise to make a performance other than the payment of money, such as the delivery of marketable securities or even of other goods.

Nature of secured obligation. The secured obligation may be of any type. In the vast majority of cases, it will be a monetary obligation – repayment of a loan, payment of a purchase price or of rent, payment of damages, etc. These obligations – like all secured obligations – may already have come into existence upon assumption of the security obligation or they may arise in future, such as a claim for damages for non-performance of obligations under a contract just concluded. The secured obligation may be a conditional one. For example, the provider of a personal or a proprietary security may wish to be ensured that, if pursued on the security, recourse against another person is possible. There is no objection to securing such a conditional obligation of a security provider. Indeed this type of security is frequently used in commercial practice. The secured obligation may be a public law obligation. The case law of the European Court of Justice and of national courts furnishes ample support for admitting this variety. (See e.g. Bundesverband Güterkraftverkehr und Logistik eV (BGL) v. Bundesrepublik Deutschland, ECJ 23 September 2003, C-78/01, ECR 2003, I-9543 at nos. 6–11; Berliner Kindl Brauerei AG v. Andreas Siepert, ECJ 23 March 2000, C-208/98, ECR 2000, I-1741 at p. 1752 s. nos. 36–37; Préservatrice foncière TIARD SA v. Staat der Nederlanden, ECJ 15 May 2003, C-266/01, ECR 2003, I-4867 at p. 4893 no. 36, p. 4895 no. 40 and p. 4896 nos. 41 and 43; Frahuil SA v. Assitalia SpA, ECJ 5 February 2004, C-265/02, ECR 2004, I-1543 at p. 1554 no. 21.)

Nature of relationship. As a rule, the security provider, especially if not a professional, will not ask or receive any counter-performance for assuming the obligation. By contrast, professional security providers, such as banks or insurance companies, charge a commission for issuing a dependent personal security. Typically, therefore, such security is granted in the framework of a bilateral contract and creates an obligation at least on the part of the security provider. The debtor of the secured obligation as the factual beneficiary of the security is usually indirectly involved in two ways. In the relationship with the creditor, e.g. under a credit agreement, which gives rise to the obligation to be secured, the debtor is usually obliged to engage the provider of a personal security which must fulfil certain minimum conditions set by the creditor. On the other hand, the debtor must ask a security provider to assume a security towards the creditor meeting the latter's conditions. Thus, in fact a triangular relationship comes into being. However, the contents and objectives of each of the three sides of this triangle differ. Two sides can easily be classified as well-known types of bilateral contract: The credit relationship between creditor and debtor (usually including the security agreement), and the mandate or service contract between debtor and security provider. What remains, is the third side, that between creditor and security provider: this is the contractual dependent personal security.

Dependency. Sub-paragraph (a) enumerates the most important elements to which the dependency between security and secured obligation relates. Mere correspondence of the terms regulating the two obligations, though, does not suffice to constitute dependency. Rather, the terms of the contract or other juridical act creating the security must establish a connection with the secured obligation.

The all-important element of the definition is "depends upon": the basic type of personal security is characterized by the fact that in almost all respects it depends upon the debtor's obligation to the creditor which is secured by the provider of the personal security towards the creditor. The only major exception is to be found in the debtor's insolvency: any reduction or discharge of the debtor's obligations does not affect the security provider's obligation (cf IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) paragraph (2) sentence 2) since this would run counter to the fundamental purpose and function of security. The principle of dependency is not limited to personal security but dominates also proprietary security, both in movables and in immovables. However, today this principle is no longer the only maxim of personal and proprietary security; rather it is more and more supplemented by security rights that are independent from any specific secured obligation.

In Chapter 2 on dependent personal security, the principle of dependency informs essential provisions, especially IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) and IV.G.–2:103 (Debtor's defences available to the security provider).

In at least three cases, the European Court of Justice has also recognized the principle of dependency as the characteristic element of suretyships. The surety's obligation does not fall due until maturity of the secured obligation and the surety's obligation may not surpass that of the debtor. These statements were made in order to ascertain whether certain Directives on consumer protection or the Brussels Convention of 1968 on jurisdiction in civil and commercial matters were or were not applicable to suretyships. (See Préservatrice Foncière TIARD SA (above) at p. 4891 s. no. 29; cf. also p. 4893 no. 34. Earlier in more general form in Bayerische Hypotheken- und Wechselbank AG v. Dietzinger (case no. C-45/96) of 17 March 1998, ECR 1998 I 1199 at p. 1221 nos. 18 and 20 and in Berliner Kindl Brauerei AG (above) at p. 1744 no. 26.)

Reverse dependency. While the dependency of the personal security upon the secured obligation is generally recognized, there may also be reverse dependency. The contract or other juridical act giving rise to a dependent personal security may for some reason be invalid (e.g. due to a legal prohibition or disregard of the protective provisions for consumer dependent securities established in Chapter 4 of these Rules) or avoided (e.g. for mistake). Such invalidity or avoidance may give rise to the issue whether this may have repercussions on the secured obligation. This issue was alluded to in a decision of the European Court of Justice (Dietzinger case, above, p. 1221 no. 21). This issue is not dealt with in this Part and will depend on the terms (express or implied) of the contract or other juridical act giving rise to the secured obligation.

Performance of secured obligation must be due. Performance of the secured obligation will not be due if it does not exist. So a dependent personal security depends first of all on the existence of the secured obligation. There cannot be an effective dependent personal security unless the secured obligation exists. The existence of the secured obligation will depend on the validity of the contract or other juridical act from which it arises. This may be affected by various factors.

Some such factors may be the personal qualities of the parties to the juridical act. One of the parties, if it purports to be a legal entity, may not have come into existence. Or a natural person, due to age or sickness, may be legally incapable of juridical acts. Any incapacity of this kind may under the applicable national law have the consequence of invalidating the underlying juridical act and therefore preventing the secured obligation from coming into existence. This rule also protects the security provider: the chances of recovery in a claim for recourse against a debtor who is incapable would be small. There is one exception to this general rule. According to IV.G.–2:103 (Debtor's defences available to the security provider) paragraph (3) the security provider may not invoke the debtor's lack of capacity or the non-existence of the debtor legal entity if the relevant facts were known to the security provider at the time when the security became effective. For details, reference is made to the Comments to this provision.

Other factors which may affect the validity of the contract or other juridical act from which the secured obligation arises are the various grounds of invalidity (such as mistake, fraud, coercion or threats, or infringement of fundamental principles or mandatory rules) mentioned in Book II, Chapter 7 (Grounds of Invalidity).

In practice more important than existence are the extent of the debtor's obligation which is to be covered by the security and whether or not performance of it is due. "Extent" refers primarily to the amount of money that is usually involved: capital, interest and cost of recovery. However, in the case of a global security the amount of the secured claim may be open-ended and fluctuating, especially if a current account is secured.

Whether performance of the secured obligation is due also depends on its maturity and any other conditions which determine whether it can, at any particular moment, be enforced by the creditor. This will depend on the terms of the contract or other juridical act (or rule of law) from which the secured obligation arises.

The "dependency" of the personal security upon the secured obligation implies that the latter is not identical with the security obligation. There are two separate obligations, owed by two different persons, the security provider, on the one hand, and the debtor of the secured obligation, on the other hand. Neither is it necessary that these two obligations are identical in extent or content. The security obligation can be lower than the secured obligation and due only if certain extra conditions are fulfilled. By contrast, its amount cannot be higher and it cannot be due on less stringent conditions than the secured obligation.

Transfer of right to performance of secured obligation. One consequence of the principle of dependency is that upon transfer of the right to performance of the secured obligation the attendant security also passes to the transferee. For assignments by contract or other juridical act this is provided for by III.–5:115 (Rights transferred to assignee) paragraph (1) since dependent securities are "accessory rights securing the performance." One may assume that the same rule obtains upon legal transfers, unless the contrary is provided.

C. Independent personal security

Introductory. The independent personal security is a close relative to, but in one decisive respect completely different from, a dependent personal security. The one distinguishing feature is the independence of the security provider's obligation to the creditor in contrast to the dependency of the dependent security on the secured obligation. In all other respects the independent and the dependent personal security share the same features and the Comments made above apply.

The detailed rules on independent personal security are to be found in Chapter 3 of these Rules.

Special feature. The decisive special feature of the independent personal security is its independence from any other agreement, especially an underlying contract between the creditor and the debtor. This independence is laid down and specified in sub-paragraph (b). In particular, the existence and extent of the underlying obligation (such as a seller's obligation to deliver or a customer's obligation to pay the price under a contract of sale or for services) are irrelevant for the security provider's obligation.

On the other hand, the validity of the security provider's undertaking itself is an indispensable condition for the security provider's obligation to honour the security. Thus the security provider must have full capacity and the undertaking must have been created without violation of any legal rules or any defects of consent which might give rise to a right of avoidance under Book II, Chapter 7 (Grounds of Invalidity).

The independent character of an independent personal security must be "expressly or impliedly declared". This rule dovetails with IV.G.–2:101 (Presumption for dependent personal security) which establishes a presumption for any personal security being a dependent security, "unless the creditor shows that it was agreed otherwise." For letters of credit and stand-by letters of credit, UCP 500 (1993) art. 3 and 4 explicitly and broadly emphasise the independence of the "credit" from underlying contracts or the objects of those contracts, such as goods, services and other performances. More succinctly in the same sense is the UN Convention on Independent Guarantees of 1995 art. 3. Apart from these specific types of an independent personal security, the latter requires an express or implied declaration. An express declaration can usually be found if the title or body of a personal security document contains the words "independent guarantee". An implied declaration of independence can be presumed if an instrument does not make any reference to a secured obligation, as is usual in any dependent personal security; such silence may be treated as an implied declaration of independence.

The provisions of IV.G.–3:101 (Scope) paragraph (1) specify and confirm the independent character of a security. A merely general reference to an underlying transaction does not impair the independence of an independent undertaking. Usually, an independent security refers to an underlying contract (e.g., of sale or services) or another security (e.g., a default security to the security provided by the bank opening a letter of credit; or a "counter security" to the security issued by the security provider on the instruction of the issuer of the counter security) in order to specify the event upon the occurrence (or non-occurrence) of which performance of the security may be demanded by the creditor. Any such general reference to an underlying obligation does not affect the independent character of a security, since the decisive point is that the security provider's obligation to perform is independent of the obligation of the principal as debtor under the underlying contract with the creditor.

Advantages and risks of independent undertakings. At least for professional security providers, such as banks and insurance companies, the independence of their security undertakings has clear economic advantages: they can easily calculate their risk and this risk is a reliable basis for calculating their charges for assuming this risk. While it seems to be more advantageous to assume a dependent personal security since this allows the security provider to invoke the debtor's exceptions and defences, the administration of these counter-rights is difficult, time consuming and uncertain as to its success.

On the other hand, it is precisely the independence of such undertakings which creates a risk for the persons who have caused the issuance of such undertakings in favour of the creditor. Demanding performance of an abstract security or of another independent security does not require the creditor to prove any default on the part of the debtor. This has invited abusive presentations of independent security instruments. In order to counter such practices, defensive provisions had to be instituted along the lines of IV.G.–3:104 (Independent personal security on first demand) paragraph (2) and IV.G.–3:105 (Manifestly abusive or fraudulent demand).

D. Security provider

This definition requires hardly any comment. The term "security provider" is neutral. It covers any person who is obliged to the creditor under a personal security, whether the latter is dependent or independent. A special situation may arise if the security provider wishes to secure a potential claim for reimbursement against the debtor. In such a case, the debtor may instruct a fourth party to provide a personal security in favour of the primary security provider. In the case of such a counter security provided by a fourth person to the primary security provider, the roles of the parties change: the primary security provider becomes the creditor of the counter security, who may claim performance of the counter security from the secondary security provider.

E. Debtor

In a dependent personal security, two different persons owe obligations to the creditor: One is the debtor of the secured obligation, the other the debtor of the security obligation. The latter is in these Rules called the "security provider" in order to avoid misunderstanding. By contrast, the obligor of the secured obligation can retain the designation of – principal – debtor.

On the other hand, in an independent personal security, only a security provider and a creditor are legally relevant. Since in these cases a secured obligation is not necessary, neither is a debtor, as defined in sub-paragraph (d) of the Article. The two words "if any" refer to this possible absence of a debtor.

F. Co-debtorship for security purposes

Policy. Co-debtorship for security purposes is, as the name suggests, not a traditional security device but rather a functional one. In order to achieve full protection of those persons who deserve it and to counter creditors' attempts to evade protective provisions for "genuine" security providers, functional devices with security purposes must be covered by these Rules. In some countries, parties sometimes evade mandatory provisions of the national law on personal security (such as a simple or qualified writing) by agreeing on a co-debtorship for security purposes. If, apart from the principal debtor, another person assumes a corresponding obligation towards the creditor, a trilateral relationship comes into being. However, the position of the additional debtor may differ from that of the principal debtor: while the latter requires a credit for a business or professional activity, the additional debtor may, or may not, have any proper interest in the loan granted by the creditor.

Illustration 2a
A young medical doctor D wishes to acquire for his medical office a very expensive instrument and obtains a credit from his bank. D's wife W is also a medical doctor who also practices in D's medical office. Therefore the bank requires W's co-signature of the credit and security agreement. After D's death in an accident, the bank requests payment of the credit from W who invokes the protective rules for consumer security providers.

Illustration 2b
The facts are as in Illustration 2a, except that W is an artist from a wealthy family.

Must W be treated as a genuine co-debtor or does she deserve to be treated as a mere security provider?

Criteria for distinction. Illustrations 2a and 2b suggest that an important, if not the most important criterion is the economic interest which the two obligors have in the granting of the credit. While D's interest is obvious, that of W obviously varies in the two hypothetical cases. It is nil in Illustration 2b, but is as great as that of D in Illustration 2a. In the latter case, W should be treated as a genuine co-obligor, whereas in the former case W clearly qualifies as a mere security provider. The fact that W even in the second case may indirectly benefit from the credit granted to D since the latter's better financial position indirectly will benefit also W, does not meet the requirements of sub-paragraph (e) of the Article. Decisive is the primary purpose of the assumption of debt (cf. "primarily" for purposes of security). As a co-debtor for security purposes acting primarily for purposes not related to her business or profession, W is in Illustration 2b entitled under IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for security purposes) to the protection of a consumer according to Chapter 4 of the Rules. In the final analysis, the creditor's contract with the two obligors must be interpreted in light of all the circumstances.

Time of assumption of debt irrelevant. The definition in sub-paragraph (e) does not distinguish whether the second obligation had been assumed at the same time as the other (or, possibly, the main) obligation or subsequently. The time element is here as irrelevant as it is for the provision of true personal (or proprietary) security.

Applicable rules. IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for security purposes) lays down which rules apply to a co-debtorship for security purposes. Most important is the reference to Chapter 4 of this Part containing rules for the protection of a co-debtor for security purposes who is a consumer.

G. Global security

A type of dependent personal security. Most personal securities are limited in one way or another: they secure either a specific credit with a specific amount; or several credits for which a total limit is specified; or a credit for a specific purpose for which a maximum limit can be calculated, etc. Or the security itself is limited to a specific amount. For independent personal securities, the limitation of the security itself is the only feasible method and is standard practice.

However, dependent personal securities do not always fit this scheme because the credits which they secure may be open-ended. The parties, at the time of contracting the secured credit, may not yet know which kinds of credits are to be secured. The standard example is a personal security for a current account or for all future indebtedness of a debtor, where the number, nature and kinds of claims to be secured is initially not yet known. By contrast, personal security for a specific claim for which at the time of contracting the security the upper limit is not yet known is not a global security since it is much less risky than the kinds of credit for which a global security is granted.

Global security and lack of maximum amount of security distinguished. The existence of a global security does not depend upon the fact that the parties have or have not fixed a maximum amount for the security. A security is not global because no maximum limit has been agreed for the security. A security is global if the kind, source or time of credits to be secured is left open by the parties.

Applicable rules. Special rules on global security are to be found in several provisions spread over Chapter 2. According to IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) paragraphs (3) and (4) global security is exempted from certain limits which are placed upon open-ended ordinary dependent security rights. IV.G.–2:104 (Coverage of security) paragraph (3) limits the coverage of global security to obligations which were created by contracts between the creditor and the debtor of the global security. The most important protective consequence is incorporated in IV.G.–2:107 (Requirement of notification by creditor) paragraphs (2) and (3) which impose upon the creditor of a global security duties of information in favour of the security provider. Finally, where a consumer assumes a global security additional protective rules apply. If the secured amount had not been fixed by the parties, it must have an agreed maximum amount or such a limitation will have to be determined according to IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) paragraph (3). See IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (a).

H. Consumer

Terminology. The term "consumer" is used here in an unusual context. Normally a consumer is understood as a contracting party who is the buyer of assets or the receiver of services from a professional seller or a professional provider of services or both. By contrast, in these Rules it is the weak party rather than the professional who may be providing financial services by providing personal security, in whatever form. However, the definition of "consumer" in Annex 1 is appropriate enough for present purposes even if nothing is consumed. A "consumer" means "any natural person who is acting primarily for purposes which are not related to his or her trade, business or profession."

Consumers are only natural persons because they are the ones who typically need protection. Legal entities and also groups without legal personality are therefore excluded, even if they do not pursue economic purposes because as groups they are typically more powerful than individuals.

On the other hand, individuals who exercise a trade, business or profession are typically better versed and more experienced than "private" individuals. They can also more easily obtain business or legal advice from trade, business or professional organisations with which most are either associated or to which they can easily have access.

Special protective rules on personal security assumed by consumers are to be found in Chapter 4 of these Rules. Moreover, the rules of Chapter 2 apply to all types of personal security assumed by a consumer.

I. Proprietary security

For the application of this Part, proprietary security is defined very broadly. With respect to security in movables, modern phenomena, such as retention of ownership and the security transfer of ownership are covered, but also functional equivalents, such as financial leasing and hire-purchase. For the purposes of the present Part, proprietary security in immovables is also included.

Proprietary security as such is not covered by this Part. It is comprehensively covered in Book IX. Nevertheless, for the application of some rules of this Part it is necessary to take proprietary security into consideration. This applies in particular to the rules for the situation where there are several security providers.

Proprietary security rights provided, not by the debtor of the secured obligation but by a third person, have some similarity with the granting of a personal security and can even be combined with the latter.

> Illustration 3
> At the request of D, his brother T provides both a suretyship to creditor C and a mortgage encumbering his private home. D and T are not successful in their common business and are both declared bankrupt. While C has only a slim chance of recovering the loan from D or from T on the latter's suretyship, the mortgage on T's private home provides a good security.

The relationship between C and T with respect to the mortgage resembles that of a suretyship. But that resemblance is more apparent than real. As mortgagor of his private home, T is liable towards C only up to the limit of the mortgage, but not with all his assets, as he is as surety. On the other hand, the mortgage gives C a preference in enforcing the claim as against all of D's unsecured or less secured creditors.

The preceding discussion illustrates some fundamental differences between personal and proprietary security. Nevertheless, there are also similarities between proprietary security granted by a third party and personal security. However these similarities become relevant not in the primary relationship between secured creditor and third-party security provider, but in the secondary relationship between the third-party security provider and the debtor, especially if the third-party proprietary security provider has had to make payment to the creditor. Then the third party security provider will normally be entitled to claim reimbursement from another security provider or the debtor. These issues will primarily be dealt with by a special Section of the Book on proprietary security; the present Part, however, already contains rules on the internal recourse between the security providers and on the secondary recourse against the debtor.

J. Secured obligation or secured right

It is often convenient to refer to the "secured obligation" and that term is used frequently in this Part. However, strictly speaking it is the creditor's right and not the debtor's obligation which is secured. The security affects the right and not the obligation. A secured right is likely to be more valuable than an unsecured right. The debtor's obligation remains the same whether the creditor's right is secured or unsecured. "Secured obligation" is therefore just a short expression for the obligation covered by the security or, even more correctly, "the obligation the right to performance of which is secured" and that is made clear by sub-paragraph (h).

NOTES

I. Personal security

1. The term "personal security" is not defined in the legislation of most member states. However, in FRANCE, the rules of the Grimaldi Commission, as adopted by Decree-Law no. 2006-346 of 23 March 2006 on Security, expressly use the notion of personal securities (sûretés personnelles) (CC new art. 2287-1) (In the following notes the proposals of the Grimaldi Commission are mentioned only in so far as they deviate from the present state of FRENCH law or as they clarify it). In BELGIUM, subtitle 6 of the ConsCredA of 1991 (last modified in 2003) is entitled "Personal Securities" and its provisions apply to "securities and if applicable to any other form of personal security" (art. 34; similar formulas in arts. 35 and 36 as well as in arts. 33, 38(2), (3) and 97). The ITALIAN Civil Code distinguishes in several places between personal and proprietary securities (CC arts. 156(4), 1179, 1828(1), 1844(1)). The AUSTRIAN ConsProtA § 25c and 25d use for personal security the more traditional term "intercession".

2. However, the term "personal security" is often used and defined in legal theory (AUSTRIA: Harrer, Sicherungsrechte 5-6; however, most writers use the traditional term "intercession", e.g. Koziol and Welser II (-Welser) 145 ss. and Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1345 no. 3; GERMANY: Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten no. 11, nos. 831 ss., nos. 1543 ss., Lwowski no. 14, nos. 78 ss., no. 341 ss.; ITALY: Fragali, Garanzia 455 s.; NETHERLANDS: Snijders and Rank-Berenschot, Goederenrecht nos. 482-483; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 763; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 69).

3. In all member states there are different typical and atypical personal security rights (FRANCE: Simler no. 6; ITALY: Giusti 1 ss., 295 ss., 315 ss.; Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 1 ss., 23 ss., 37 ss.; PORTUGAL: Vaz Serra, Fiança e figuras 19 ss.; Menezes Cordeiro, Direito 604 ss., 616 ss.; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 69 ss., 307 ss., 337 ss., 373 ss., 435 ss.). They are all covered and held together by the concept of "personal security", which is defined by legal writers as any contractual obligation assumed by a third person (security provider) towards the creditor for the purpose of securing the exact performance of another person's (the debtor's) obligation towards the creditor or another event. The "personal security" creates a new obligation of the security provider towards the creditor, which often, although not necessarily, has the same content as the underlying secured obligation of the debtor, if any.

4. In ENGLISH and IRISH law the term 'security' has traditionally been used only in relation to rights over assets (ENGLAND: Penn and Shea no. 17-002; IRELAND: Johnston 9.01), i.e. "real" or "proprietary security". However, at least by some more modern authors it is accepted that the concept of security covers both proprietary security and personal security (ENGLAND: Goode, Legal Problems no. 1-06; Bradgate and White 321; IRELAND: White 511 and 533), the latter term having a meaning comparable to that used in this Part, i.e. covering suretyship guarantees, indemnities, stand-by letters of credit and comfort letters (ENGLAND: Goode, Legal Problems no. 8-02; Bradgate and White 321, 341, 350; IRELAND: White 533 ss., 546 s.; cf. nos. 5 ss. and 11 ss. below).

II. Dependent personal security

(a) Origins

5. In all member states the dependent personal security is the classic and usual form of a third party's undertaking to personally secure another person's debt, by assuming a new personal obligation towards the creditor. Whereas its origins are mostly based on the fideiussio of Roman law (in a broad historical and comparative perspective cf. Zimmermann 114; BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 356; FRANCE: Malaurie and Aynès/Aynès and Crocq, Les sûretés no. 103; GERMANY: one branch of intercession of the 19th century ius commune, Staudinger/Horn no. 1 preceding §§ 765 ss.; GREECE: ErmAK/Zepos prec. art. 847-870 no. 7; ITALY: Campogrande 12; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 770; SCOTLAND: Stair/Eden nos. 805 s.; SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 2; NETHERLANDS: Feenstra nos. 377-394), in ENGLAND the law of suretyship guarantees or dependent personal securities has developed from common law: The earliest predecessor of the surety was the borh, whom every man was required to have and who was responsible for the principal's criminal acts (O´Donovan and Phillips no. 1-04). However, due to the influence of ROMAN and CANON law on the development of medieval mercantile law and on the system of Equity jurisdiction administered by the ENGLISH chancellors, there are many areas in the law of dependent personal securities which bear significant similarities between ROMAN and COMMON law based systems (Zimmermann 144).

(b) European Court of Justice

6. The nature of contracts for dependent personal security has been discussed in cases in the European Court of Justice. Divergent views have been expressed. In Berliner Kindl Brauerei AG v. Andreas Siepert, ECJ 23 March 2000, C-208/98, ECR 2000, I-1741 at p. 1752 s. nos. 36–37.In Berliner Kindl Brauerei, Attorney-General Léger, invoking a French legal dictionary, expressed the view that a suretyship is a unilateral contract. On the other hand, in the later case of Préservatrice foncière TIARD SA v. Staat der Nederlanden, ECJ 15 May 2003, C-266/01, ECR 2003, I-4867 at p. 4893 no. 36, p. 4895 no. 40 and p. 4896 nos. 41 and 43 the Court of Justice, invoking "the general principles which stem from the legal systems of the contracting States" regarded a suretyship contract as a "triangular process". Since, however, in fact the Court dealt only with the surety's obligation towards the creditor this may be regarded as a mere obiter dictum. By contrast, the last relevant case Frahuil SA v. Assitalia SpA, ECJ 5 February 2004, C-265/02, ECR 2004, I-1543 at p. 1554 no. 21 implicitly seems to be based on the idea of a trilateral contract. Here the Italian surety company, after having paid the customs duties sought recourse from the French debtor, the importer of the goods. The Court stated that the French debtor was not a party to the suretyship contract. The Court then inquired whether the transport company which had mandated the surety, had done so "for the account of the importer" (no. 25). If the national courts cannot find that the debtor has become a party to the suretyship contract, the national courts in Italy have no jurisdiction under the exceptional head of Art. 5 no. 1 (for contractual claims) of the Brussels Convention.

(c) Terminology

7. In ENGLAND and IRELAND guarantee is used interchangeably with suretyship, both terms often being used in a rather inaccurate way; in SCOTTISH law the term caution or cautionry is more common than guarantee. In AUSTRIA and GERMANY the term used to denote a dependent personal security is Bürgschaft, in DENMARK kaution, in FINLAND takaus, in SWEDEN borgen, in the NETHERLANDS and the Dutch speaking part of BELGIUM borgtocht, and in FRANCE as well as in the French speaking part of BELGIUM cautionnement. In ITALY, PORTUGAL and SPAIN the term 'guarantee' (garanzia/garantia/garantía) is very broad and refers to warranties and guaranties as well as to all kinds of securities (personal and proprietary). The ROMAN origin of the dependent personal security in ITALY, PORTUGAL and SPAIN is also patent in the terminology of the three countries: The terms used for it are fideiussione in ITALY, fiança in PORTUGAL and fianza in SPAIN. The last mentioned terms are considered to be a specification of the more general concept of 'guarantee'. In all these countries another specification of the term 'guarantee' is used to denominate independent personal securities (ITALY: garanzie autonome; PORTUGAL: garantias autónomas; SPAIN: garantías autónomas: cf. no. 12 below). In GREECE the dependent personal security is denominated as eggiisi (εγγύηση, guarantee), whereas the term used for independent personal security is eggiodosia (εγγυωδοσία), which usually appears in form of a eggiitiki epistoli (εγγυητική επιστολή, guarantee letter).

(d) Obligations of a provider of dependent personal security

8. The obligations of a provider of dependent personal security are strictly determined by the particular connection of the security obligation with the secured obligation (cf. no. 10 below). Due to the accessory character of the dependent personal security, in most cases the obligation of the provider of a dependent personal security is considered as having the same content as the secured obligation (cf. no. 20 below).

9. The provider of dependent personal security may be obliged (a) to pay a sum of money (cf. no. 20 below), (b) to render another performance (cf. nos. 20, 26 s. below) or (c) to pay damages (cf. nos. 21 ss. below).

(e) Main feature: accessory obligation

10. The essential distinguishing features of a contract of dependent personal security are that the security provider's obligation is established in addition to the secured obligation of the debtor, and that the security provider's liability is accessory to the liability of the latter (AUSTRIA: cf. CC §§ 1351, 1363; Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1346 no. 1; BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG: CC arts. 2011-2013 (since 2006: FRENCH CC arts. 2288-2290); BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 18; R.P.D.B. no. 1 and no. 6; FRANCE: Cass.civ. 20 December 1983, Bull.civ. 1983 I no. 306 p. 274; LUXEMBOURG: CA Luxembourg 28 October 2003 BankFin 2004, 172; DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 13; ENGLAND: Harburg India Rubber Comb Co v. Martin [1902] 1 KB 778; Goode, Legal Problems no. 8-02; FINLAND: LDepGuar § 3; RP 189/1998 rd 29 s., 33; GERMANY: BGH 9 July 1998, NJW 1998, 2972, 2973; GREECE: CC art. 850; Georgiades § 3 no. 14; ITALY: CC arts. 1936, 1939; Giusti 33; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:851; Blomkwist nos. 8-12; however, du Perron and Haentjens Inleiding no. 5 emphasise that suretyship as a species of co-debtorship does not create an obligation separate from that of the debtor, although the law limits this identity, cf. idem Art. 851 no. 1, Inleiding no. 7, art. 851 no. 1; PORTUGAL: CC art. 627(2); Almeida Costa 774; SCOTLAND: Stair/Eden no. 835; SPAIN: CC arts. 1822, 1824; Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 14; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 89; for the accessority principle as a fundamental principle of security rights – both proprietary and personal – in EUROPEAN law see van Erp 309). In principle this implies that the personal security is dependent on the validity, terms and extent of the principal obligation (principle of co-extensiveness). There are, however, several exceptions within the national systems (cf. national notes on IV.G.–2:103 (Debtor's defences available to the security provider).

III. Independent personal security

(a) Origins

11. The independent personal security appeared gradually in the business practice of every EUROPEAN country during the last century, but legal acceptance of independent personal securities as personal security rights took place with a different intensity and speed in each of these countries. In FRANCE the independent personal security is defined and very briefly dealt with in CC new art. 2321 (enacted by DL no. 2006-346 of 23 March 2006). The GERMAN legislator decided expressly not to enact rules on independent personal securities in the Civil Code because of the diversity of their possible types (cf. Hadding, Häuser and Welter 682 s.). However, the validity of this instrument of security is not doubted (cf. nos. 14 ss. below).

(b) Terminology

12. The term independent guarantee, or an equivalent in the national language, is used in ITALY, PORTUGAL and SPAIN, as well as in FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG. In these countries qualifying words like independent, abstract or autonomous stress the non-ancillary character of this contract, as distinct from the dependent guarantee (dependent personal security). The GREEK term used – guarantee letter – does not contain any such indication. In ENGLAND the term indemnity is used. In its broader meaning it describes every obligation imposed on a person by operation of law or by contract to make good a loss suffered by another person – i.e. inter alia insurance, guarantee (cf. Halsbury/Salter para. 1255, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008)). In a narrower meaning the expression contract of indemnity describes a promise to indemnify another person by way of security. AUSTRIA and GERMANY as well as DENMARK, SWEDEN and the NETHERLANDS use special terms for the dependent personal security (Bürgschaft, kaution, borgen and borgtocht, respectively) on the one hand and the independent personal security on the other hand (AUSTRIA and GERMANY: Garantie, DENMARK and SWEDEN: garanti, NETHERLANDS: garantie).

(c) Obligations of a provider of independent security

13. The obligations of a provider of independent personal security vary according to the parties´ determinations in the security agreement as well as to specific rules of the national laws. However, one common element may be underlined: Although here, as well as under a dependent personal security, the security provider can in principle be obliged not only to pay a sum of money, but also to render another performance (cf. no. 20 below) or to pay damages (cf. nos. 21 ss. below), in an independent personal security the liability of the security provider is typically regarded as a liability to make good any losses suffered by the creditor and not to perform an obligation having the same content as the debtor's obligation.

(d) Main feature: independency from a secured obligation overview

14. The essential feature of the independent personal security is that the liability under the latter is (wholly) autonomous of any liability, which may arise as between the debtor and the creditor (AUSTRIA: Harrer, Sicherungsrechte 47; BELGIUM: Simont/Bruyneel 523; ENGLAND: Goode, Commercial Law 799, Andrews and Millett no. 1-013; DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 14; FRANCE: CC new art. 2321 of 2006 (above no. 11) "in consideration of an obligation of a third person"; Simler nos. 880 ss.; GERMANY: Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten nos. 30 ss.; ITALY: Cass. 1 October 1987, plenary decision, no. 7341, Foro it. 1988 I 3021, where, however, the autonomy of the security from the underlying obligation is defined as 'relative', and not fully; cf. further Cass. 6 October 1989 no. 4006, BBTC 1990 II 553; Cass. 7 June 1991 no. 6496, Fallim 1991, 5007; Bonelli 37 ss.; NETHERLANDS: Dutch Business Law nos. 6-45; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa and Pinto Monteiro 18; SCOTLAND: Stair/Eden no. 844; SPAIN: TS 27 October 1992, RAJ 1992 no. 8584 and 30 March 2000, RAJ 2000 no. 2314; Carrasco, Las nuevas garantías 726 ss.; Vicent Chuliá 397; Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 100). In ENGLAND, therefore, it is irrelevant whether the debtor's liability is void (Wauthier v. Wilson (1911) 27 TLR 582 (CFI), (1912) 28 TLR 239 (CA); Yeoman Credit Ltd. v. Latter [1961] 1 WLR 828. Equally, the extent and the terms of the debtor's obligation are of no significance, and thus the principle of co-extensiveness is not applicable (Goulston Discount Co. Ltd. v. Clark [1967] 2 QB 493 at 498). Equally in SPAIN and ITALY, where the independent personal security has been excluded from the scope of SPANISH CC arts. 1824, 1826 and ITALIAN CC art. 1945, which express the ancillary character of the dependent personal security (SPAIN: TS 27 October 1992, RAJ 1992 no. 8584 and 30 March 2000, RAJ 2000 no. 2314; Carrasco, Las nuevas garantías 740 ss.; ITALIAN Cass. 31 July 2002 no. 11368, Giust.civ. 2003 3, 2838; Cass. 21 April 1999 no. 3964, Riv. Notar. 1999, 1271).

(e) Theoretical difficulty in some continental countries

15. At first, this abstract nature of the independent personal security caused difficulties of acceptance in FRANCE, BELGIUM, LUXEMBOURG, ITALY and SPAIN. The validity of an independent personal security was very controversial in these "causalist" countries, where a contract without a "legal cause" is ex lege void (ITALY: CC art. 1325 no. 2; FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1131; SPANISH CC art. 1261).

16. In FRANCE and BELGIUM the causa is nowadays found in the relationship between the security provider and the debtor; independent personal securities can validly be concluded (BELGIUM: Wymeersch, Garanties 95; FRANCE: Contamines-Raynaud 413 ss.; Rives-Lange 301 ss.). In FRANCE the causa has also been found in the underlying relationship between the creditor and the debtor (Stoufflet no. 50). According to a recent decision of the FRENCH Supreme Court the causa exists even if the person who instructs the granting of a security (instructing party) is not the debtor und has merely an economic interest in the conclusion of the underlying contract, without being a party to it (Cass.com. 19 April 2005, Bull.civ. 2005 IV no. 91 p. 94, Petites Affiches 18 May 2005 no. 98 p. 9). In AUSTRIA, if the problem is discussed at all, the causa is found in the combined relationships of the security provider with the principal and of the latter with the creditor (Koziol, Garantievertrag 32-35). In PORTUGAL the causa is seen in the security function of the contract of independent personal security (STJ 9 January 1997, 402/97 www.dgsi.pt; Ferrer Correia 249-250; Galvão Telles 288). In ITALY and SPAIN (Vicent Chuliá 397) this problem was solved by clearly distinguishing the independence from the lack of causa: especially in ITALY, in general terms, the causa of the independent personal security is found in the coverage of the risk of non-performance of the underlying obligation (Cass. 6 October 1989 no. 4006, no. 14 above; Cass. 26 June 1990 no. 6499, Giur.it. 1991 I 1 446; Cass. 3 February 1999 no. 920, BBTC 2001 II 666; Calderale, Fideiussione 203 ss. for an overview of the prevailing doctrines on the causa of independent personal securities; Portale, Fideiussione 1062 ss.; Pontiroli, Garanzia 350). In GREECE, where there has always been a clear distinction between contracts with and without a causa, it is very disputed in literature whether the independent personal security is a contract with a causa (Gouskou 93; Psychomanis 368 ss.; distinguishing Markou 16 ss.; Liakopoulos, NoB 35, 289) or without it (Dimitriades 40 ss.). According to the prevailing opinion (Georgiades § 6 no. 86) the independent personal security is a contract with causa, the causa being the creditor's possibility of immediate satisfaction, i.e. without court intervention. This purpose is contained in the contract by virtue of the obligatory reference to a certain secured basic legal relationship (Georgakopoulos, EED 21, 256; Psychomanis 370; Gouskou 104).

(f) Recognition without problems

17. Contrary to some of the "causalist" countries, in GERMANY the validity of the abstract nature of the independent personal securities never was controversial. Personal securities are contractual transactions, which implicate the causa in themselves (Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten no. 31, no. 57).

(g) Breakthrough in case law

18. In FRANCE independent personal securities were recognised as a contract sui generis by the Supreme Court in 1982 (Cass.com. 20 December 1982, Bull.civ. 1982 IV no. 417 p. 348, D. 1983, 365) and by the legislator since 2006 (CC new art. 2321). ITALIAN courts as well as legal writers began already in the late 1970s to recognise independent personal securities as valid security rights (Portale, Fideiussione 1043; a first explicit judicial recognition of the validity of independent personal security in ITALY is to be found in Cass. plenary session 1 October 1987 no. 7341, Foro it. 1988 I 3021; cf. further Cass. 6 October 1989 no. 4006, BBTC 1990 II 553). In SPAIN, although this atypical personal security was known and used in practice, courts did not wholly accept their independent nature until 2000 (TS 17 February 2000, RAJ 2000/1162, TS 30 March 2000, RAJ 2000/2314). In GREECE the institution of independent personal security has been known to practice mostly through the so-called guarantee letter, issued by banks. The wording used to describe these instruments caused great confusion, especially among the courts, which at first considered them as dependent personal securities. Although GREEK courts today recognise the autonomous character of this instrument, they still apply the provisions of GREEK CC arts. 847–870 on the dependent personal security, due to the word "security" and the lack of special provisions (A.P. 862/1996, DEE 2, 1087; A.P. 1433/1998, DEE 5, 507). This opinion has been strongly criticised in the literature (among others Georgiades § 6 no. 92 with further references) which prefers the term "security-giving contracts" (Georgiades § 5 no. 2 fn. 1), considers independent personal securities to be a special contract (cf. GREEK CC art. 361 regarding the freedom of contract) and denies the application of the provisions on dependent personal securities to these contracts. The situation is similar in the NETHERLANDS, where independent personal securities ("bankgaranties") were developed in financial practice, but only later were discussed by writers. These authors discussed mainly whether these securities were characterised by an abstract nature or not (Pabbruwe, Bijzondere bankgarantie 182-183; contra Smit, Hoe abstract 489-491). Nowadays, "bankgarantie" is used as a general term, which can cover different kinds of securities, but mostly independent personal securities (Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie no. 3). In PORTUGAL the independent personal security was also introduced by financial practice but its main features have subsequently been accepted by the courts (CA Porto 13 November 1990, CJ XV, V-187; CA Lisboa 11 December 1990, CJ XV, V-135) and in the literature (listed in Menezes Cordeiro, Direito 606).

IV. Content of the security provider's obligation

19. The main feature of a contract of personal security is the creation of a new personal obligation of the security provider towards the creditor for purposes of security.

20. The precise content of this obligation of the security provider varies between the legal systems of the member states and depending on the type of personal security in question.

(a) Content of the security provider's obligation to perform equal to principal obligation

21. Especially in the situation of a dependent personal security securing a money debt or a liquidated sum of money, the content of the liability of the security provider is usually understood as an obligation to perform with the same content as the secured obligation (cf. AUSTRIA: Rummel/Gamerith §1350 no. 1; ENGLAND: O´Donovan and Phillips no. 10-201; FRANCE: Simler no. 198; GERMANY: MünchKomm/Habersack § 765 no. 77; ITALY: Giusti 25 ss.; PORTUGAL: Vaz Serra, Fiança e figuras 60; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 147). Where, however, the secured obligation is for any other performance, such as the obligation of a construction firm to build a house under a building contract, even the security provider under a dependent personal security is according to ENGLISH law not bound to perform in the same way as the original debtor, but only liable for damages for non-performance (cf. no. 22 below). By contrast, in ITALIAN and PORTUGUESE law obligations assumed by the dependent personal security provider to render performances, such as supplying or manufacturing goods are regarded as having the same content as the secured obligation if the personal quality of the debtor (security provider or original debtor) is not of prevalent importance for the creditor (ITALY: Bozzi, La fideiussione 218 s.; Giusti 27; PORTUGAL: Vaz Serra, Fiança e figuras 60).

(b) Liability of the security provider for damages

22. The liability of a security provider may be for damages in various situations: first, the secured debt might be a liability to pay damages. In such a situation the liability of the security provider is typically considered as a liability for damages, too (ENGLAND: O´Donovan and Phillips no. 10-203; GERMANY: MünchKomm/Habersack § 765 nos. 65 and 79; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 148). In this case the security provider's obligation is equal to the secured obligation as described above (no. 20).

23. Another situation where a security provider typically may be liable for damages is where the security covers obligations not for the payment of money but for any other performance (cf. AUSTRIA: CC § 1350; Rummel/Gamerith § 1350 no. 1; ENGLAND: O´Donovan and Phillips no. 10-203; FRANCE: Simler no. 911 e.g. in the case of a performance guarantee – "garantie de bonne fin"). The security provider is typically not able to perform these obligations or the creditor may not be interested in specific performance by the security provider, thus damages are the appropriate remedy. In GERMAN, ITALIAN, PORTUGUESE and SPANISH law this is the case where personal security is provided to secure obligations where the personal performance of the debtor is essential for the creditor (GERMANY: MünchKomm/Habersack § 765 no. 79; ITALY: Giusti 31 s.; PORTUGAL: Vaz Serra, Fiança e figuras 60; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 148).

24. Also a binding comfort letter is typically understood as creating a liability of the security provider in damages only (cf. ENGLAND: O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 1-77 s.; FRANCE: "garantie indemnitaire" cf. Simler nos. 900 and 1012; GERMANY: "harte Patronatserklärung" in Staudinger/Horn no. 414 preceding § 765; ITALY: De Nictolis 390, 391; PORTUGAL: Soares da Veiga 385; SPAIN: Carrasco, Las nuevas garantías 634 s.).

25. In the case of an independent personal security, the liability of the security provider is typically regarded as a liability to make good any losses suffered by the creditor (cf. ENGLAND: Sutton v. Grey [1894] 1 QB 285; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 1-88; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn no. 194 preceding § 765). The rationale for this is obvious: in the case of an independent personal security, there is no (or at least there need not be a) secured obligation, hence the liability of the security provider cannot be regarded as an obligation to perform under the same terms as the principal debtor's obligation.

26. That the security provider's obligation in these situations is regarded as a liability for damages (and not an obligation to perform, which might appear similar in the case of an obligation to pay an amount of money) is not merely a matter of terminology; rather, in ENGLAND this classification is regarded as decisive since it triggers the creditor's duty to mitigate losses (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips no. 10-209).

(c) Obligation of the security provider to procure performance by the debtor

27. In addition to the security provider's liability to perform in case of non-performance of the principal debtor, the security provider is under ENGLISH law also obliged to procure that the principal debtor performs the secured obligation (cf. Moschi v. Lep Air Services Ltd. [1973] AC 331; however, this idea has been criticised as outdated by O´Donovan and Phillips no. 10-202 citing Commonwealth authorities). Since the security provider typically is not in a position to compel the principal debtor to perform, this liability will usually amount to a liability for damages as described above sub nos. 21 ss. (cf. Andrews and Millett no. 1-004)

(d) Content of the security provider's obligation subject to agreement by the parties

28. Finally, the contract of personal security being in all member states a contract subject to the general rules of contract law, the specific content of the security provider's obligations is subject to the agreement of the parties. Especially in the case of an independent personal security, where there is often no reference to an underlying secured obligation, it is the nature and terms of the individual contract of independent security that are decisive for the extent of the security provider's obligation (cf. ENGLAND: Halsbury para. 1264, Vol 49, 5th ed., (2008)); FRANCE: Simler nos. 122 ss. and 930 ss.; GERMANY: Lwowski no. 177; ITALY: Mastropaolo 255 ss.; PORTUGAL: Soares da Veiga 358; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 338).

V. Security provider

(a) Definition and terminology

29. In all EUROPEAN countries the personal security provider is a person who, under the contract of security, assumes a new obligation towards the creditor for the purpose of securing an underlying obligation (secured obligation) or for any other security purpose (cf. FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2011 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2288); AUSTRIA: Harrer, Sicherungsrechte 5-6; DENMARK: Gomard, Obligationsretten 140 s.; Pedersen, Kaution 11 ss.; FINLAND: LDepGuar § 2 no. 1; RP 189/1998 rd 29; GERMANY: Lwowski no. 34; ITALY: Fragali, Garanzia 455; PORTUGAL: Antunes Varela II 475 s.; SPAIN: Díez-Picazo II 397; SWEDEN: Ccom chap. 10 § 8; Walin, Borgen 24). The terms identifying these persons are mostly derived from specific types of personal security (such as guarantor in ENGLAND and IRELAND, or cautioner in SCOTLAND). In traditional ENGLISH legal terminology, the term used in relation to the persons liable under different types of personal security in general is either guarantor or surety (cf. the title of Rowlatt´s Law on Principal and Surety).

(b) Capacity

30. The requirements for the validity of a security provider's consent are determined by the general rules on capacity (AUSTRIA: CC § 1349, Rummel/Gamerith, § 1349 nos. 1-2; FRANCE: Simler no. 149; GERMANY: Lwowski nos. 37 ss.; ITALY: Giusti 94; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 773). When the debtor is obliged to furnish a provider of personal security, ITALIAN and PORTUGUESE law require, besides the general requirements of capacity, the ability to pay of the provider (ITALIAN CC art. 1943; PORTUGUESE CC art. 633(1)).

(c) Commercial corporations

31. In all member states commercial corporations can also validly provide personal security. In ITALY, if the provider of personal security is a commercial corporation, the lack of express mention of the activity of providing personal security in the articles and memorandum of the corporation does not influence its capacity to validly provide personal security in favour of third parties. In particular according to CC art. 2384 (as amended by the reform of ITALIAN company law, DLgs 17 January 2003 no. 6), limitations of the articles and memorandum of the corporation – even if they have been disclosed – cannot be raised against third parties, unless there is evidence of a specific fraud of the third party against the corporation; mere knowledge that the providing of personal security is outside the corporation's object is not sufficient (cf. First Directive on company law of 1968 art. 9). Also in SPAIN the limits of the company's object cannot be invoked against third parties in good faith (Law on share companies, RDL 1564/1989, art. 129(2) and Law on Limited Liability Companies of 23 March 1995 no. 2, art. 63(2)) and SPANISH case law tends to regard in any case the providing of personal security as an activity within the company's object (TS 14 May 1984, RAJ 1984/2111, TS 12 May 1989, RAJ 1989/4003; Carrasco a.o. 115 s.). For FRENCH share companies a distinction is to be made between the obligations of the members of management and those of persons outside of the management. The obligations of the members of management cannot be secured ("cautionner ou avaliser") by the company (Ccom arts. L 225-43 and L 225-91). On the contrary, the company can secure the obligations of persons outside of the management by way of "cautions, avals, garanties", provided this has been approved by the board of directors (or of the supervisory board in the case of a dual management system; Ccom art. L 225-35(4) and art. L 225-68(1)). Otherwise the security is ineffective (Cass.com. 29 January 1980, Revue des sociétés 1981, 83). However these requirements do not apply to financial institutions (Ccom art. L 225-35(4) and art. L 225-68(1), Ccom art. L 225-43(2) and art. L 225-91(3)). According to the DANISH Law on share companies (Law no. 324 of 7 May 2000 § 61(1)) a share company cannot be committed for a dependent obligation which falls outside the purpose of the company, if it can prove that the other party knew or should have known this. Such a rule does not prevent a parent company to provide a security for a subsidiary company. In accordance with § 115 of the same Law, a company may not provide a personal security for shareholders, members of the board or managing directors of the company, or for persons, who are very close to it. The personal security is however binding, if the other party was in good faith. The above stated also applies to a limited liability company in accordance with Law of Limited Liability Companies (Law no. 325 of 7 May 2000) §§ 25 and 49 (Beck Thomsen 66).

32. As in DENMARK, almost everywhere it is possible and frequent in practice for a commercial corporation to provide personal security – also in the form of binding comfort letters – to another company of the same group (ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett no. 14-014; GERMANY: Reinicke and Tiedtke, Kreditsicherung no. 425; ITALY: CFI Torino 11 April 2000, Giur.it. 2001 1445; Cass. 5 December 1998 no. 12325, Giur.it. 1999 2317; PORTUGAL: Soares da Veiga 379; SPAIN: Carrasco , Las nuevas garantías 629).

(d) Public institutions

33. In GERMANY and ITALY also public institutions may provide personal security according to special statutory provisions expressly enabling them to engage in this activity. The particular nature of the security provider does not affect the applicability of the private law rules to the security (GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn § 765 nos. 72 s., Lwowski no. 56; ITALY: Bozzi, La fideiussione 227 s.). In FRANCE the State and territorial authorities may secure the obligations of whatever type of debtors including private debtors (Simler no. 67). A special Law (Law no. 82-213 of 2 March 1982 on rights and liberties of territorial authorities – "relative aux droits et aux libertés des collectivités locales") expressly permits the granting of personal securities by territorial authorities in favour of private debtors as long as certain conditions are respected. According to FRENCH court practice in principle these contracts are governed by the rules of private law even if the contract concluded between the creditor and the debtor is of public interest (Tribunal des Conflits 16 May 1983, GazPal 1985 I 218).

(e) Spouses as security providers for third persons´ debt

34. In the NETHERLANDS, the capacity of spouses to act as security provider securing the obligations of third persons is limited: A spouse, acting for private purposes, can assume a personal security only with the consent of the other spouse; if this consent is lacking, the other spouse can avoid the security (CC arts. 1:88 lit. (c) and 1:89(1)). Although not a EU member state, it may be remarked that SWITZERLAND knows the same rule (OR art. 494(1)) which recently (Federal Law of 17 June 2005) has been extended also to married security providers who are registered in the commercial register. According to the law of Navarra (Law 1 March 1973 no. 1, art. 61(2)) the personal security provided by one spouse without the consent of the other can only affect the individual property of the contracting spouse, but not the common property of the family.

VI. Debtor

35. In all European legal systems it is accepted that in the case of a dependent personal security the debtor owes the secured obligation on the basis of a legal relationship that differs from that arising under the contract of dependent personal security (ENGLAND: O´Donovan and Phillips no. 1-20; FRANCE: Simler no. 12; GERMANY: Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten nos. 835-836; ITALY: Bozzi, La fideiussione 215; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 770; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 71). On the other hand, the liability of a security provider under an independent personal security is independent from an underlying obligation, hence the existence of a debtor and the debtor's obligation is not necessary in the case of an independent security (cf. ENGLAND: Halsbury*/Salter* para.1255, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008)).

36. The debtor, if there is one, can be a private person or a public institution. In some countries, if the debtor of the secured obligation is a merchant or an entrepreneur, special rules may be applicable. Thus in SPAIN and PORTUGAL a dependent personal security is a mercantile security regulated by the commercial code, and not by the civil code, whenever the secured obligation is an obligation of commercial law, i.e. if the debtor of the secured obligation is a merchant (SPAIN: TS 20 October 1989, RAJ 1989 no. 6941; TS 7 March 1992, RAJ 1992 no. 2007), the only practical remaining difference is that in commercial guarantees the debtor and guarantor are liable as a solidary joint debtors; PORTUGAL: Vaz Serra, Fiança e figuras 29; cf. Ccom art. 101). However, this distinction has little practical relevance and seems to be disregarded by case law (SPAIN: TS 20 October 1989, RAJ 1989 no. 6941; TS 7 March 1992, RAJ 1992 no. 2007). By contrast, in FRANCE the personal security preserves its civil character even if the debtor is a merchant (Simler no. 96 ss.).

37. In commercial practice, a debtor is often involved in two separate contracts of personal security at the same time: one (primary) security that was assumed in relation to the debtor's obligation towards the original creditor, and another security in which a second security provider secures any claims for reimbursement that the (primary) security provider may acquire against the debtor under the primary security. Contracts of security of the second type are typically called counter security (cf. ENGLAND: Goode, Commercial Law 1020; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 13-61; ITALY: De Nictolis 25; Cass. 17 May 2001 no. 6757, Giust.civ. 2002 I 729; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 367 ss.). Counter securities can be used to secure claims for reimbursement arising both under contracts of dependent personal security (cf. ENGLAND: Goode, Commercial Law 1020; FRANCE: "sous-cautionnement" Simler nos. 118 ss.; cf. Grimaldi Commission's proposal for a CC new art. 2297; ITALY: for the so-called "fideiussione del regresso" or "fideiussione al fideiussore" Giusti 220; Cass. 13 May 2002 no. 6808, Foro it. 2002 I 2694; SPAIN: Vazquez Garcia 478 ss.) and contracts of independent personal security (usually in international commercial practice: FRANCE: Simler nos. 914 ss.; ITALY: Cass. 17 May 2001 no. 6757, Giust.civ. 2002 I 729; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 367).

VII. Co-debtorship for security purposes

38. The first issue that arises is the criterion which has to be used for distinguishing between an "ordinary" co-debtorship on the one hand, and a co-debtorship for security purposes on the other hand. Most legal systems seem to differentiate according to the degree of interest which the co-debtor whose position is at issue has in the economic benefit which the "true" debtor seeks to achieve by incurring the obligation towards the creditor. The lesser this interest is, the more likely this co-debtor will be treated as a mere security provider. The prototype of such a mere security provider (i.e., a co-debtor for security purposes) is a wealthy housewife who has no direct stake in, and only indirectly benefits from, the credit incurred by her husband acting for his business purposes.

39. In the present field, comparison of the legal systems of the member states is difficult due to the fact that some countries have a broad concept of co-debtorship which comprises both initial and subsequent co-debtorship. This is the case in AUSTRIA, GERMANY and recently also the NETHERLANDS.

40. By contrast, especially the ROMANIC countries distinguish between initial and subsequent co-debtorship. True co-debtorship is limited to the co-debtorship which has been assumed contemporaneously by two debtors towards the creditor. Subsequent co-debtorship is regarded by some legislators as a technique of settling a pre-existing debt which the co-debtor owes to the primary debtor and which is settled by a promise to pay the primary debtor's obligation to the creditor (délégation imparfaite). Under the present Rules this is a possible situation, but it is by no means a necessary condition. The above Article applies if two debtors have incurred obligations towards a creditor on essentially identical terms (délégation-sûreté). By contrast, the time at which they incurred their respective obligations is irrelevant.

VIII. Global security

(a) Definition

41. In the legal systems of all member states, personal securities are not only used as security for specific obligations but can be more widely drafted so as to cover for example all obligations arising out of specific creditor-debtor relationships. In BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG such securities are known as "cautionnement pur et simple" or "indéfini" or "cautionnement général (omnibus)", in AUSTRIA and GERMANY as "Globalbürgschaft" (AUSTRIA: Harrer, Sicherungsrechte 26; GERMANY: Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten no. 843). In ITALY they are called "fideiussioni omnibus" (cf. CC art. 1938); in PORTUGAL "fiança geral" (cf. CC art. 628(2)) and in SPAIN "fianza omnibus" or "general" (cf. CC art. 1825). In ENGLISH legal terminology such securities are called "all accounts" or "all moneys" securities (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 5-79 ss.; Andrews and Millett nos. 6-004 s.). According to DANISH terminology these types of securities are called "alskyldserklæringer" or "alskyldskautioner" (Pedersen, Kaution 45 ss.; Beck Thomsen 70 s.) and according to FINNISH and SWEDISH terminology "generell borgen" (FINLAND: LDepGuar § 2 no. 5; RP 189/1998 rd 30 s.; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 88 s.).

42. A global security is generally understood as a security covering obligations that are not specifically determined at the conclusion of the contract of security. Thus, global securities are often used to secure future obligations of the debtor or a liability under a current account. As a rule, the security does not expire merely because the debit balance of the account is nil at some point of time (cf. ITALY: CC art. 1844(1)). In FRANCE earlier attempts (cf. Sargos, GazPal 1988, I, p. 209 no. 4) to reduce the scope of the global security to the "cautionnement omnibus" are taken up again in the Grimaldi Commission´s proposal for a CC new art. 2302(1) sentence 3.

(b) Applicable rules

43. In most countries recently legislators or courts have tried to increase the level of protection of the provider of a global security. It seems that only in ENGLAND has the validity of continuing dependent securities, such as securities containing "all monies" terms never been doubted. A great variety of contract terms is regularly used in dependent securities (cf. the discussion in O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 5-79 ss.; Andrews and Millett nos. 6-004 s.), which will normally be effective. The only limitation seems to be that debts originally owed by the debtor to a third party but then assigned to the creditor do not normally increase the obligation of the provider of dependent security (Kova Establishment v. Sasco Investments Ltd. [1998] 2 BCLC 83). AUSTRIAN courts and writers are also still rather liberal. The Supreme Court repeatedly accepted a dependent security for "all" future obligations of the debtor (OGH 1 December 1976, ÖRZ 1977, 169 no. 76; also OGH 18 February 1987, ÖBA 1987, 576; critical because of lack of definiteness Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1353 no. 12). It is regarded as sufficient that the amount of the secured obligation is "determinable" (Rummel/Gamerith and Faber § 1353 no. 3 and § 1346 no. 2a). Similarly in PORTUGAL, where a dependent security for future obligations is void if its object is undeterminable, i.e., if the provider of a dependent security secures all obligations without reference to their origin or nature (STJ 29 April 1999, 131/99 www.dgsi.pt; STJ 2 October 2001, 3353/01 www.dgsi.pt; STJ 29 November 2001, 3592/01 www.dgsi.pt; Mendes 136).

44. The level of protection is considerably higher in FINLAND and ITALY where limitations in the contract of dependent security are required: According to FINNISH LDepGuar § 5(1) a "general" dependent security must contain a maximum amount and be limited in time. In the absence of such terms the dependent security provider is only liable for obligations that were assumed together with the security or for previous debts that were known to the provider of the dependent security according to § 5(2) (cf. RP 189/1998 rd 36 s.). Similarly, according to ITALIAN CC art. 1938 in fine global securities must contain a maximum amount, agreements without this limit being totally invalid (Giusti 168). This rule has been introduced by Law no. 154 of 17 February 1992 in order to stop the earlier practice of banks' personal securities for an indeterminate amount (cf. references in De Nictolis 207 ss., 332 ss.).

45. In FRANCE protection depends upon the person of the provider of dependent security. A security without a maximum amount (cautionnement indéfini) can not be assumed by consumers (ConsC arts. L. 313-7 and L. 341-2), not even if professional debts are secured (for dependent securities with solidary liability: Madelin Act art. 47 II(1); in general: ConsC art. L. 341-2). Also according to BELGIAN ConsCredA art. 34(1) a consumer credit can only be secured by a dependent security with specified amount (Van Quickenborne no. 196). Apart from these restrictions, global securities are valid in FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, provided the secured obligations can be determined (FRANCE: Simler no. 202; BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 191; LUXEMBOURG: CA Luxembourg 9 July 1996, no. 18403 unpublished). The granting of global securities is, in particular, not considered as being contrary to the requirement of the express engagement of the security provider as prescribed in FRENCH CC art. 2015 – since 2006: CC art. 2292 – (Cass.com. 16 October 1978, JCP G 1978 IV, no. 348). However, from 1983 to 2002 FRENCH court practice tended to restrain the extent of the global security (excluding, contrary to CC art. 2016 (since 2006: CC art. 2293) accessories) if formal requirements were not respected (Cass.civ. 22 June 1983, Bull.civ. 1983 I no. 182 p. 160; Cass.civ. 29 October 2002, D. 2002, 3071). In the NETHERLANDS as well, global securities (usually assumed by banks) are also valid provided the secured obligations can be determined (Pitlo-Croes no. 851); however in favour of a non-professional security provider the secured obligation has to be limited by a maximum amount (CC art. 7:858(1)).

46. The legal situation is still different in GERMANY where case law has changed dramatically (on this development Staudinger/Horn § 765 nos. 44-57): Global securities had been considered as in general valid, provided the secured obligations were sufficiently determined (e.g. to all existing and future obligations resulting from a specific business relation between debtor and creditor: BGH 10 October 1957, BGHZ 25, 318; BGH 5 April 1990, NJW 1990, 1909; BGH 16 January 1992, NJW 1992, 897). However, since 1995 global securities that are established by standard terms of trade are regarded as in general surprising (GERMAN CC § 305c) and generally as an unreasonable disadvantage or injury for the security provider (CC § 307). Invalidity affects only the corresponding term (cf. the leading case of BGH 18 May 1995, BGHZ 130, 19; Palandt/Sprau § 765 no. 20; Erman/Herrmann § 765 no. 3; cf. also Horn, ZIP 1997, 525; Trapp, ZIP 1997, 1279). As an exception, the aforementioned principles are not applied if the provider of a dependent security has considerable influence upon the principal debtor, especially as manager of the latter (BGH 18 May 1995, BGHZ 130, 19, 30; BGH 10 November 1998, ZIP 1998, 2145; BGH 16 December 1999, NJW 2000, 1179, 1182). It is still unclear in how far the assumption of global securities is valid outside the scope of GERMAN CC §§ 305 ff, especially in individually negotiated contracts (cf. Palandt/Sprau § 765 no. 7 and Erman/Herrmann § 765 no. 3).

47. In GREECE, the issue arises mostly for dependent securities securing the outstanding balance of a current account. The GREEK Supreme Court (1265/1994, DEE 1, 410) differentiated between subsequent new credits and subsequent supplementary credits, which simply increase the amount (limit) of the initial credit. The provider of dependent security is liable, even without having provided security for the (increased) credit limit provided by this supplementary credit (quantity criterion). The liability is restricted, however, to the amount of the initially secured credit (quality criterion). The Supreme Court justified this position in its decision 48/2001 (DEE 2001, 1011 ss., 1012) by asserting that the claims are no longer independent upon integration into the account and the provider of dependent security remains liable for the outstanding balance, regardless of the movements in the account (entering of new claims). This decision is consistent with the prevailing opinion in GREECE on this matter (cf. also A.P.: 412/99, DEE 5, 1031; 984/99, EllDik 1999, 1720 ss.). In SPAIN global personal securities are common in practice. The protective devices developed in case law are the principle of restrictive construction of this kind of guarantee as well as the rule imposing a fixed maximun amount of liability. Moreover – although this is also usually granted in the general term of the contracts – case law also has the basic principle that a debtor cannot be deprived of the right to put an end to the indefinite contract (see Carrasco 157 ff).

IX. Consumer

48. Throughout the member states, protection for non-professional market participants by special legal provisions is also in the area of personal security typically connected with the classification of these persons as consumers. In these notes, two questions will be dealt with: first, how is the concept of the consumer defined in the member states (nos. 49 ss. and 53 ss. below); and second, whether it is the security provider or another person who has to be qualified as a consumer in order for the national consumer protection legislation to apply to personal securities given by this security provider (nos. 63 ss. below).

49. Other questions such as the scope of consumer protection legislation in the area of personal securities in the member states or the applicability of general rules and principles of law protecting weaker parties to personal securities are dealt with in the national notes on IV.G.–4:101 (Scope of the application).

(a) The term "consumer" in the legislation of the Member States - the regulatory Framework

50. The definition of the term "consumer" differs between the member states quite considerably. Although most consumer legislation is based on EU-Directives, the principle of minimum harmonisation leaves the member states much room to define the term as they think fit. Even worse: in many states there is no coherent definition of who is a consumer, but the consumer can have different shapes under different laws.

(b) Definitions of consumer security providers

51. Only the DUTCH Civil Code and the FINNISH LDepGuar contain special rules concerning personal securities by consumer security providers. The DUTCH Code has laid down special rules for "dependent personal securities other than in a profession or business" in arts. 7:857–7:863. The scope of application of these rules is determined as follows: “The provisions of this section apply to dependent personal securities entered into by a natural person who did not act in the course of his or her profession or business, nor acted for the benefit of normal exploitation of the business of a share company or a company with limited liability of which he or she is an officer and in which, alone or with co-officers, he or she holds the majority of the shares” (CC art. 7:857). Another general definition is offered by the FINNISH LDepGuar § 2 no. 6: “A private security provider is a natural person, who assumes the personal security”. This rule, however, is subject to limitations and does not apply if the security provider is a director, board member, member of the administrative committee or another comparable organ, or if the security provider is a responsible shareholder in the debtor company or foundation or in a parent company thereof; further the rule does not apply if the security provider was a founder of the company, or directly or indirectly holds at least a third of the shares in another share company, or has a share of ownership or influence in another company by virtue of the voting right resulting from the shareholding (see RP 189/1998 rd 31 s.).

(c) Comprehensive statutory definitions of a consumer

52. In AUSTRIA, GERMANY, GREECE, ITALY, SPAIN and SWEDEN there are at least comprehensive general definitions of the term “consumer” with effect for all rules concerning consumer protection. But none of these applies specifically to personal securities. AUSTRIAN ConsProtA § 1(1) no. 2 states that a consumer is every person who is not an entrepreneur. On the other hand, the preceding provision of § 1(1) no. 1 defines an “entrepreneur” as “everybody who concludes the transaction for the exercise of its enterprise”. GERMAN CC § 13 defines the consumer as every natural person who concludes a legal transaction for a purpose that cannot be attributed to his or her commercial or independent professional activity. It is the same in the SPANISH ConsProtA art. 3.

53. In ITALY a new Consumer Code has been introduced by DLgs no. 206 of 6 September 2005, consolidating in a single legislative text all the former different laws on consumer rights which have now been repealed (especially CC arts. 1469*bis*-1469*sexies* and the Law on the Rights of Consumers and Users of 30 July 1998 no. 281). The term consumer is now defined by ConsC art. 3(1) lit. a) as any “natural person acting for purposes which are outside his or her business or professional activity, if any”. The new ConsC contains some fundamental, mandatory rights protecting the weak party in a contract. These rights include, among others, the right to adequate information, to transparency, correctness and equal treatment in the contractual relationships regarding services. All contracts entered into by a consumer are governed by its rules, which should be regarded as applicable also to a personal security granted by a consumer (Alpa 21). Further, in ITALY new banking legislation has been introduced (cf. DLgs 1 September 1993 no. 385) fundamentally increasing the protection of bank-customers. This regulation shall also be applicable to most personal securities granted by a consumer in favour of a bank (Chinè, I contratti di garanzia 324 ss.). In SWEDEN the general definition of a consumer is laid down in Act on Terms of Contracts in Consumer Relations § 2(1) (Ramberg 259 ss.).

(d) Criteria for defining the consumer in general

54. Apart from these differences in the legislative technique, the scope of the term “consumer” differs widely. There are, in general, two aspects which are relevant for the classification of a person as a consumer: First, the term has an objective scope, i.e. it deals with the issue whether only natural persons or, additionally, certain legal entities are covered by the notion of consumer. Secondly, the term has a functional scope, i.e. a person is regarded as consumer only if acting for certain purposes.

(e) Objective personal scope - only natural persons

55. In DANISH, DUTCH, FINNISH, GERMAN, ITALIAN and SWEDISH law, the term "consumer" is restricted to natural persons (DANISH Law on Certain Consumer Contracts § 1 read with § 3(1) and Contract Law § 38a(2); DUTCH CC art. 7:857; FINNISH LDepGuar § 2 no. 6, specifically for dependent personal security; GERMAN CC § 13; ITALIAN ConsC art. 3(1) lit. a); the ITALIAN Constitutional Court has held that neither the limitation of the notion of consumer to natural persons nor the exclusion of small enterprises or artisans from that notion according to the text of CC art. 1469*bis*, now ConsC art. 3(1) lit. a), are in violation of the principle of equality as laid down in Cost. art. 3: Corte Cost. 30 June 1999 no. 282, Foro it. 1999 I 3118; 22 November 2002 no. 469, Giur.cost. 2002, 6; the same was held in relation to the exclusion of the beneficiary of an accident insurance from the notion of consumer by Corte Cost. 16 July 2004 no. 235, Foro it. 2005 I 992; SWEDISH Act on Terms of Contracts in Consumer Relations § 2(1)).

(f) Including legal entities

56. GREEK and SPANISH law extend consumer protection to legal entities (GREEK ConsProtA art. 1(5) lit. a); SPANISH ConsProtA art. 3. Also in AUSTRIAN law it would seem that a legal entity can be a consumer (e contrario ConsProtA § 1(2) sentence 2).

57. By contrast, in many member states there is no generally used definition of the term consumer in the consumer legislation. Thus, the term is sometimes restricted to natural persons, sometimes it also covers legal entities.

58. Although in all FRENCH legislation the consumer is described as a natural person, courts and authors commonly understand it as including certain legal persons without professional purpose, e.g. non-profit associations, communities of apartment owners or political parties (FRANCE: CA Paris 5 July 1991, JCP E 1991 Pan. no. 988).

59. According to the ENGLISH Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, a consumer is a natural person only (reg. 3(1)). The ConsCredA is designed for the protection of "individuals". In s. 189 an individual is defined as including "a partnership or other unincorporated body of persons not consisting entirely of bodies corporate" (in the form amended by s. 1 of the Consumer Credit Act 2006 s. 189 defines "individual" as including "(a) a partnership consisting of two or three persons not all of whom are bodies corporate; and (b) an unincorporated body of persons which does not consist entirely of bodies corporate and is not a partnership").

60. In the BELGIAN ConsCredA a consumer is a natural person (art. 1(1)). In the Commercial Practices Act, a consumer is defined as a "natural or legal person" (art. 1(7)). The LUXEMBOURGIAN ConsCredA art. 2 lit. a) defines the consumer as a natural person only; the LUXEMBOURGIAN ConsProtA with rules on unfair contract terms, on the other hand, does not define the term at all. The PORTUGUESE ConsCredA art. 2(1) lit. b) defines the consumer as a "singular person", while the ConsProtA (DL 24/96 of 31 July 1996) uses the expression "that one", which is said to include legal entities (Duarte 661).

(g) Functional scope

Acting outside trade or business

61. In accordance with EUROPEAN Directives, in most legal systems consumer protection is dependent on the purpose of a person's dealing. The BELGIAN ConsCredA art. 1(1) defines a consumer as "every natural person who […] is acting for purposes which can be supposed to be outside his business, profession or trade" (similar LUXEMBOURGIAN ConsCredA 1993 art. 2 lit. a)). In the BELGIAN Commercial Practices Act, a consumer is defined as "every natural or legal person who exclusively for non-professional purposes acquires or uses marketed products or services" (art. 1(7)). Equally, the LUXEMBOURGIAN ConsProtA art. 1 opposes "the professional supplier of durable or non-durable consumer goods or services" to the "consumer acting for private purposes." In FRENCH law the consumer is understood as a non-professional, a person without professional purpose (ConsC art. L. 132-1). Since 1995 (Cass.civ. 24 January 1995, D. 1995, 327) consumer protection is according to the Supreme Court generally excluded if a "direct relationship with the exercise of professional activities" exists. This criterion had already been introduced by the Law of 23 June 1989 on doorstep transactions (cf. ConsC art. L. 121-22). The FRENCH Supreme Court continues to apply the criterion of the "direct relationship" (Cass.civ. 5 March 2002, JCP G 2002, II no. 10123), although it is very controversial among the lower courts. There is no direct relationship according to certain courts if the contract is concluded outside of the ordinary professional sphere of the person who deserves protection or, according to other courts, if the contract is set up outside of the interest of the enterprise (cf. further Paisant, JCP G 2003, I no. 121, p. 549 ss.). Under the ENGLISH Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 the consumer has to be "acting for purposes which are outside his trade, business or profession" (reg. 3(1)). Under the ITALIAN ConsC art. 3(1) lit. a) the consumer has to act "outside his or her business or professional activity, if any". This definition is interpreted strictly by the Supreme Court (Cass. 25 July 2001 no. 10127, Giust.civ. 2002 I 685; Cass. 14 April 2000 no. 4843, Corr.giur. 2001, 524), whereas sometimes courts of first instance and legal writers regard also as consumers persons who act in matters belonging to their professional or business activity, as long as these matters are outside the ordinary scope of their professional or business activity (CFI Roma 20 October 1999, Giust.civ. 2000 I 2117; Monteleone 28).

62. Similarly, according to the PORTUGUESE ConsCredA the consumer has to act for purposes outside his or her commercial or professional activity. Under the ConsProtA the goods supplied, the services provided or the rights transferred by a person with a professional economic activity to the consumer must be allocated to a non-professional use. According to the SWEDISH Law on Terms of Contracts in Consumer Relationships § 2(1) and the DANISH Law on Certain Consumer Contracts § 3 and ContrA § 38a(2) a consumer is defined as "a natural person, who is mainly acting for a purpose which is outside business activities" (SWEDEN: Ramberg 258 s.) or "who mainly is acting outside his or her profession" (DENMARK: Gomard 29 ss.; Andersen, Madsen and Nørgaard 96). Less specific is the AUSTRIAN definition of "non-entrepreneurial activity" (ConsProtA § 1(1) no. 2).

63. GREEK and SPANISH law deviate from Council Directive 85/577 art. 2: in their view protection does not depend on the participation of the consumer in the market "for purposes outside his trade or profession", but on the final receiving of the goods or the services, i.e. as long as the consumer is at the end of the economic chain and has no intention to prolong the economic circulation of the goods or services (GREECE: Skorini-Paparrigopoulou 80, 82. Under the ENGLISH ConsCredA, protection of the consumer was not dependent upon that person acting outside his or her trade or business (note that it is the person of the debtor that is relevant for the applicability of the consumer protection provisions under this act in relation to securities provided for agreements regulated under this act, cf. no. 65 below): according to the present sec. 8 para. 2, it was decisive only that the amount of the credit does not exceed GBP 25,000. This rule ceased to have effect according to sec. 2 para 1 lit. b) of the Consumer Credit Act 2006, which came into force in April 2008: all credit agreements with individuals now fall under the ConsCredA regardless of the amount of the credit, subject to certain exemptions. One exemption are credits with an amount exceeding GBP 25,000 entered into by the debtor wholly or predominantly for the purposes of a business carried on, or intended to be carried on, by the debtor (s. 16B of the ConsCredA, as introduced by s. 4 of the Consumer Credit Act 2006).

(h) Acting outside independent professional activity

64. The GERMAN CC § 13 fixes a broader functional scope of the term consumer by excluding not all legal acts in the context of a professional activity but only those pertaining to independent professional activity. Therefore an employee who buys working equipment is regarded as a consumer according to GERMAN consumer law (Palandt/Heinrichs § 13 no. 3; Ulmer/Brandner/Hensen/Ulmer § 24a no. 23). Problems of differentiation arise if an entrepreneur acts since the dependent personal security can be assumed for private or for professional activity. In the absence of any indication in the contract of personal security the differentiation is made according to the entrepreneur's intended purpose as it appears to the other party (Ulmer/Brandner/Hensen/Ulmer § 24a no. 24). Even small merchants, farmers, artisans and persons exercising a liberal profession are regarded as entrepreneurs and consequently not as consumers if they act in connection with their profession. This is even true if an employed person concludes a contract for the purpose of establishing a professional activity (BGH 24 February 2005, BGHZ 162, 253, NJW 2005, 1275; this is, however, controversial and there is a contrary provision in CC § 507 for the assumption of a credit for purposes of setting up a profession or business). Acting outside any business or professional purpose is the main feature in the new definition of consumer laid down in art. 3 of the SPANISH ConsProtA.

(i) Whether security provider or debtor has to be a consumer

Consumer security provider

65. The DUTCH Civil Code focuses on the person of the security provider (CC art. 7:857). In GREECE it is asserted that the security provider enjoys consumer protection even if the secured credit is not granted to a consumer, since the dependent character of the personal security does not preclude the need for protection of the security provider, when he is inexperienced and an amateur (Georgiades § 3 no. 100). GERMAN case law on consumer protection in personal security transactions also focuses exclusively on the person of the security provider (Staudinger/Weick § 13 no. 49; Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten nos. 866-890; Lwowski nos. 412-420). On the basis of the above mentioned decision of the European Court of Justice (cf. Comment B, e, no. 18 fn. 4, Dietzinger v. Bayerische Hypotheken- und Wechselbank AG, ECJ 17 March 1998) the GERMAN Federal Supreme Court previously required for the rules on doorstep transactions that both debtor and security provider must be consumers and that the contract creating the secured obligation and the contract of dependent personal security must fall under the rules on doorstep transactions (BGH 14 May 1998, BGHZ 139, 21 at 24 ss.; Palandt/Heinrichs § 312 no. 8, but critical; Erman/Saenger § 312 no. 29 with further references and Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht nos. 463 ss.). Recently, however, the division which now is exclusively competent for security has held that the personal qualification of the debtor is irrelevant (BGH 10 January 2006, BGHZ 165, 363, 367 s.). The GERMAN provisions on standard terms, though, protect everyone – not only consumers – from unfair or surprising standard terms. However, according to CC § 310(3) that transposes the EU-Directive on abusive contract terms, consumers enjoy special protection vis-à-vis entrepreneurs.

66. Formerly, in FRANCE the person of the debtor was the decisive criterion for consumer protection of the provider of a dependent security (ConsC arts. L. 311-3 ff, 312-3 ff). It was not until the Law Dutreuil no. 2003-721 of 1 August 2003 that protective consumer legislation turned on the person of the provider of dependent security, even if the debtor was a professional (ConsC arts. L. 341-1 to L. 341-6). According to the proposals of the Grimaldi Commission special protection should be granted equally to all natural persons who assume a dependent security irrespective of the person of the debtor. The only exception would obtain for the application of the principle of proportionality between the amount of the security and the assets and income of the security provider who must not act for a professional purpose (à titre non-professionnel). According to the proposed CC art. 2305 the engagement of the provider of dependent security must not be manifestly disproportionate to the provider's financial capacity and income, unless at the time of the requested performance the provider is able to perform the obligation. However, as a result of the transfer of the protective rules from the Consumer Code to the Civil Code, the natural person who assumes a dependent security for a professional purpose should not be considered as a consumer but as a person requiring special protection.

(j) Consumer debtor of the secured obligation

67. A few member states regard as decisive not the person of the security provider but that of the debtor of the secured obligation. In ENGLAND personal securities are only subject to specific consumer credit legislation if the secured debt is a regulated agreement according to ENGLISH ConsCredA 1974 ss. 8 and 15. The decisive criterion is whether the debtor is an individual protected under the provisions of that Act. To consumers securing obligations which are not regulated agreements (in the meaning of these Acts), the more general consumer legislation applies (ENGLAND: UnfContTA 1977, Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999). In ENGLISH law it is nowhere discussed whether for the purposes of the ConsCredA, in addition, the security provider also has to fall within the definition of consumer. However, it seems that, since the wording of ConsCredA s. 189 simply defines the security provider as "the person by whom any security is provided", the security provider does not necessarily have to be a consumer for the Act to apply. The situation appears to be similar for the purposes of the application of the IRISH ConsCredA s. 30(1) lit. b. A similar situation can also be found in BELGIAN law, where ConsCredA arts. 34–37 only apply to personal securities granted in order to secure debts arising from a consumer-credit-agreement – without distinguishing between consumer and other security providers. If the debtor is not a consumer, the credit agreement falls beyond the scope of the ConsCredA. Other consumer protective legislation, such as the Commercial Practices Act may apply.

(k) Alternative between solutions a. and b

68. In ITALY the scope of the legislative provisions on consumer protection together with the criteria developed by case law in the last years seem to lead to the following practical results: Consumer protection legislation will be applicable to personal securities (a) when the security provider acts as consumer; or (b) when the security provider acts as professional, but the principal debtor is a consumer. This last alternative has been developed by the courts (Cass. 11 January 2001 no. 314, Foro it. 2001 I 1589; Cass. 13 May 2005 no. 10107, Foro it. Mass. 2005, 1203): the accessority of the security to the relationship between debtor and creditor makes it possible to apply the rules of consumer protection of the latter relationship to the former (Palmieri 1598; Falcone 91; Ruggeri 685 s.). Therefore, consumer protection legislation will be not applicable when the security provider acts as a professional in order to secure an obligation of another professional, as in the situation of security provided by the manager of the company in favour of the latter (Falcone 92). In the model contract of personal security provided by the Association of Italian Banks (version 11 November 2003), however, it is suggested to restrict the scope of consumer protection to situations where both the security provider and the debtor of the secured obligations act as consumers. This model contract has no binding character though (Falcone 91).

X. Proprietary security

(l) Definition

69. The distinction between proprietary and personal security rights is recognized in all European countries. However, a definition of proprietary security is not given in the civil codes, but rather is traditionally left to scholarly writings.

70. In BELGIUM, FRANCE, ITALY, LUXEMBOURG and PORTUGAL the notion of proprietary security right (sûreté réelle or sûreté, garanzia reale) is sometimes used by the legislators (cf. FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1188 "… le bénéfice du terme lorsque par son fait il a diminué les sûretés qu´il avait données par le contrat à son créancier"; ITALIAN CC arts. 156(4), 506(2), 1179, 1828(1), 1844(1), 2795(2) and (3); PORTUGUESE CC arts. 624, 639, 674(3)).

(m) Proprietary rights granted by third persons

71. In most member states proprietary securities granted by a third party who is not the debtor of the secured obligation are classified as proprietary security rights, although overlappings with the position of the provider of dependent personal security sometimes come to the surface: Rules on dependent personal security are sometimes applicable – by virtue of express legal provision or by analogy – not only to the relationship between the third-party provider of proprietary security and the debtor, but also to the relationship between the third-party provider of proprietary security and the creditor (FINLAND: LDepGuar § 41; RP 189/1998 rd 78 ss.; ITALY: CC arts. 2868-2871 on the effects of land mortgages of a third-party security provider are applicable by analogy to third-party security providers of pledges, Gorla and Zanelli 457 ss., 460; PORTUGAL: Antunes Varela II 520 fn. 2; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 478 ss.; for a qualification of the third-party provider of proprietary security as a subject assuming personal liability for the secured debt as an "obligado sui generis", whose liability is limited to the specific encumbered asset cf. TS 23 March 2000, RAJ 2000, 2025).

72. In FRANCE, although the term "cautionnement réel" seems to refer to a personal security, a third-party proprietary security is considered as a proprietary right as far as the external relationship between the creditor and the security provider is concerned (cf. recently Cass.com. 7 March 2006, Bull.civ. 2006 IV no. 59 p. 59 confirming Cass.ch.mixte 2 December 2005, Bull.civ. 2005 ch.mixte no. 7 p. 17, JCP G 2005 II no. 10183; Grimaldi Commission´s proposed art. 2295 "Le cautionnement réel est une sûreté réelle constituée pour garantir la dette d´autrui"; Simler no. 20). However, it is possible that the provider of a proprietary security in addition also assumes a personal security (Cass.com. 21 March 2006, Bull.civ. 2006 IV no. 72 p. 71).

IV.G.–1:102: Scope

(1) This Part applies to any type of voluntarily assumed personal security and, in particular, to:

(a) dependent personal securities, including those assumed by binding comfort letters;

(b) independent personal securities, including those assumed by stand-by letters of credit; and

(c) co-debtorship for security purposes.

(2) This Part does not apply to insurance contracts. In the case of a guarantee insurance, this Part applies only if and in so far as the insurer has issued a document containing a personal security in favour of the creditor.

(3) This Part does not affect the rules on the aval and the security endorsement of negotiable instruments, but does apply to security for obligations resulting from such an aval or security endorsement.

COMMENTS

A. Types of personal security covered

Personal security. Paragraph (1) opens with a general formula indicating that this Part covers "any type of voluntarily assumed personal security". Personal security must be contrasted with proprietary security: in the latter case, the security provider's liability towards the creditor is limited to the encumbered asset. By contrast, in any type of personal security the security provider is liable towards the creditor with all assets – up to the agreed maximum amount, if any.

Types of personal security. This general formula is supplemented by an enumeration of three major types of personal security in paragraphs (a) to (c). However, this enumeration is open-ended, as the words "in particular" indicate. This is necessary in order to make sure that special instruments that may be evolved in future will be covered if they meet the general criterion laid down in the opening general term.

Dependent personal security. Paragraph (1)(a) starts out by mentioning dependent personal securities – the "suretyship guarantees" of English law. See the Comments to the preceding Article. A modern type of dependent personal security expressly mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) is that created by a binding comfort letter.

"Binding" comfort letters. Comfort letters are a recent phenomenon primarily of commercial practice fulfilling a security function outside the traditional scheme of instruments of personal security. Security providers as well as creditors have differing reasons (such as accounting, taxes, fees etc.) to avoid using one of the traditional means of creating a personal security which would achieve the same purpose. One may distinguish a commercial and a non-commercial type. Comfort letters of the commercial type are used in many countries in the framework of corporate financing. As a result of individual negotiation, they are couched in very different terms. So-called comfort letters of a non-commercial type and of a different design are also issued in some countries by individuals in connection with the (temporary) admission of aliens. In these letters the issuer, a citizen and inhabitant, promises, on a form supplied by the public authority, to reimburse public authorities for any financial assistance from public resources that may have to be rendered to the alien during his or her stay in the country.

A preliminary general issue is whether comfort letters are binding. This is partly a question of interpretation to be solved by the rules laid down in Book II, Chapter 8.

Most binding comfort letters, especially those of a commercial type, differ from the usual forms of personal security. The provider undertakes to make payments to the creditor's debtor (usually a company which is a subsidiary of the security provider or a company controlled by the security provider) in order to enable it to perform its obligations to the creditor. Practice converts any breach of this promise, especially in the debtor company's insolvency, to a claim for damages by the creditor against the sender of the binding comfort letter.

By contrast, in the non-commercial type of comfort letter the sender promises reimbursement of the public expenses to the creditor, on the same pattern as in a traditional personal security.

The sender of a binding comfort letter will not usually be willing to make payment for the creditor's claims against the debtor, unless the latter is insolvent. Also, the sender will not be willing to pay more or under less favourable conditions than those of the debtor's obligations. These two criteria imply that the rules of Chapters 1 and those of Chapter 2 on dependent personal security apply to binding comfort letters.

Independent personal security. Paragraph (1)(b) deals with independent personal security, the modern branch of the field. One particular form of independent personal security is that assumed by a stand-by letter of credit.

Stand-by letters of credit. In a "pure" letter of credit a bank promises payment of a sum of money to a creditor if the latter so demands; possibly, the creditor has to present certain documents on which the demand is based. Such letters of credit serve as a primary means of payment for goods sold by the creditor or for another performance, such as work or services.

By contrast, stand-by letters of credit serve a security function. They are issued in order to create a security which may be utilised by the creditor if the conditions fixed for its utilisation are fulfilled. Even a "pure" letter of credit may in reality have been issued for a security purpose; that would bring it under the present Part.

Stand-by letters of credit are subject to Chapters 1 and 3 of this Part.

Co-debtorship for security purposes. Recent protective legislation and court practice in some countries, especially that dealing with consumer security providers, extends to debtors who assume a solidary obligation along with the "principal debtor", provided this assumption of debt is undertaken for security only. Such a collateral debtor deserves indeed the same protection as a security provider. The term "co-debtorship" covers both an initial co-debtorship and a subsequent assumption of a solidary debt after the "principal" debtor had already incurred an obligation. Co-debtorship for purposes of security is governed by IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for security purposes).

Nature of the secured obligation. One aspect of the secured obligation is already covered by IV.G.–1:101 (Definitions) paragraph (a): the secured obligation may be present or future. The latter rule implies that it may also be conditional; if subject to a suspensive condition, it will arise as soon as the condition materialises. If the secured obligation is subject to a resolutive condition, it is a present obligation.

B. Personal security and insurance

In paragraph (2), the first sentence expressly excludes insurance contracts from the scope of application of the present Rules. In a very broad functional sense third party liability insurance may be regarded as a kind of personal security. However, the general structure of insurance contracts of which those contracts form but a part and the special European rules that are envisaged to govern them exclude even this branch of insurance from the scope of application of this Part.

The same general considerations apply to credit insurance, i.e. an insurance taken out by the creditor against loss due to the debtor's insolvency. Although functionally very close to a personal security, credit insurance is everywhere regarded as a pure insurance contract and therefore subject to the relevant rules of this branch of the law.

Functionally even closer to personal security is guarantee insurance since it is taken out by the debtor, usually on the demand of the creditor and in the creditor's favour. Practice and legislation seem to vary considerably from country to country, and this is reflected in differing doctrinal qualifications. These, however, also are highly controversial within some countries, such as Germany and Spain. In France, the Benelux countries, Austria and apparently also in England, guarantee insurance seems to be regarded as a pure insurance contract, insuring the creditor against the debtor's insolvency. In other countries, especially in Germany, Italy and Spain, perhaps also in the Scandinavian countries, the insurer issues on the basis of the insurance contract a (dependent or independent) personal security to the creditor; thus an insurance contract and a personal security are combined. Paragraph (2) sentence 2 restricts the application of this Part to this personal security, to the exclusion of the underlying insurance contract.

C. Personal security and negotiable instruments

Paragraph (3) makes clear that the rules applicable to the aval of negotiable instruments, especially those governed by the Geneva Uniform Laws on Bills of Exchange (arts. 30–32) and of Cheques (arts. 25–27) of 1930 and 1931, respectively, have precedence over the rules of this Part. The same applies to corresponding national laws which are not governed by the aforementioned Geneva Conventions. This is especially true for the form of the aval and the avalist's liability. The same precedence is enjoyed by the English and Irish rules on the security endorsement (sec. 56 Bills of Exchange Act) which differ to some degree from those of the Geneva Uniform Laws.

However, apart from these special rules and the general provisions on negotiable instruments into which those special rules are embedded, paragraph (3) implies that the aval and the security endorsement are two types of personal security; therefore, subsidiarily the rules of this Part apply, as the last half-sentence spells out.

D. Aspects of public law

In practice, personal security, especially in the form of dependent and independent personal securities, plays an important role in economic law. In this respect, various aspects of public law may become relevant.

First, public law rules may establish an obligation, or offer the possibility, to provide personal security, and they may also require specific features for such security. Such public duties and requirements do not, however, affect the legal nature of the personal security that has to be provided. Therefore, the rules of this Part are applicable.

Secondly, personal security may be demanded or provided in order to secure public obligations, such as taxes or customs duties. An example of great practical importance is the international transport of goods under cover of carnets TIR, as regulated by the so-called TIR Convention of 14 November 1975. In essence it provides that border-crossing road transports of goods are exempted from controls and the payment of customs duties if they are made under cover of a carnet TIR. Such carnets are only issued if an approved "guaranteeing association" has provided a carnet TIR. The guaranteeing association is liable, "jointly and severally with the persons" who owe payment of the customs duties (art. 8 para. (1)); this liability is subsidiary to that of the debtors (art. 8 para. (7)).

Again, the rules of this Part are fully applicable. The fact that the secured obligation is governed by public law does not exclude the application of this Part. This is even true for a dependent personal security where the security provider may invoke the debtor's defences, possibly even defences rooted in public law.

Thirdly, the strongest aspect of public law may become visible if the state or another public authority provides a personal security, especially a dependent security. Depending upon the legal and factual circumstances, such a security may be regarded as one of private law and therefore be subject to these Rules. But even if it is regarded as one of public law, these Rules may be relevant. If and in so far as there are no specific rules on personal security of public law, the rules of this Part may be applicable directly or at least by analogy.

E. Freedom of contract

The rules in this Part are mainly default rules. This follows from II.–1:102 (Party autonomy). Only in Chapter 4 (Special Rules for Personal Security of Consumers) are there any mandatory rules.

NOTES

1. The scope of personal securities has to be understood as broadly as possible. Not only typical forms of security (established by legislation or firm case law) but atypical personal securities are also regulated by the rules of this Part.

I. Typical personal securities

(a) Dependent personal security

2. The main typical personal security is the contract of dependent personal security (cf. the national notes on the preceding Article, nos. 5-10).

3. The rules on dependent personal security have been considered as a kind of general law for personal securities. In most member states the rules on dependent personal security are applicable to any kind of personal security if possible according to their nature and unless otherwise agreed (BELGIUM: Dirix and De Corte no. 383; FRANCE: Cass.com. 19 November 1985, JCP E 1986 I no. 1551; GREECE: see national notes on preceding Article no. 18; ITALY: Giusti 8 s.; NETHERLANDS: du Perron and Haentjens, Inleiding no. 6 and HR 25 September 1998, NJ 1998 no. 892 sub no. 3.4; PORTUGAL: STJ 23 November 1971, RT no. 1867, 23; Almeida Costa 763; Galvão Telles 278; SPAIN: Díez-Picazo 416; Lacruz Berdejo 499).

4. By contrast, the rules on dependent personal security (Bürgschaft) of the GERMAN CC §§ 765 ff are in general not applied, even by analogy, to other instruments of personal security, especially not to independent personal securities (Palandt/Sprau no. 2 preceding § 765; Erman/Herrmann no. 21 preceding § 765; but see also Staudinger/Horn no. 197 preceding §§ 765 ss. with some qualifications). Similarly, in PORTUGAL they are generally not applied to independent personal securities (STJ 27 January 1993, BolMinJus no. 423, 483; STJ 11 November 1999, 694/99 www.dgsi.pt; Cortez 590) nor to the aval (STJ 4 October 2000, 2228/00 www.dgsi.pt; different: STJ 7 May 1993, 83594 www.dgsi.pt).

(b) Independent personal security

See the national notes on the preceding Article nos. 11-18 and the national notes on IV.G.–3:101 (Scope).

II. Atypical personal securities

(c) Binding comfort letters origins

6. The comfort letter as a personal security right is known in the legal practice of most member states. The comfort letter appeared only recently in the practice of FRANCE, PORTUGAL and SPAIN (FRANCE: Cass.com. 21 December 1987, D. 1989, 112; PORTUGAL: CA Lisboa 15 February 2001, 94458/00 www.dgsi.pt; SPAIN: TS 16 December 1985, RJ 1985/6442, 30 June 2005, RAJ 2005/ 5089; Carrasco, CCJC 71 (2006) § 1897 In FRENCH literature, the comfort letter was known under various and equivalent denominations like "lettre d´intention", "lettre de confort" or "lettre de patronage" (Simler nos. 1008 ss.). Since Decree-Law no. 2006-346 of 23 March 2006 the comfort letter is recognised as a security by the legislator and the name of lettre d´intention prevails (CC new art. 2322). In DANISH law the term comfort letter (støtteerklæring) was first introduced in 1986 by Harboe Wissum (UfR 1986 B 340 ss.; Iversen 15) and there are only very few DANISH decisions (e.g. CA Vestre Landsret 21 March 1989, UfR 1989 A 618). In GREECE, although unknown to practice (there is no case law), they have been dealt with in literature, where they are translated with the term "letters declaring interest" (Velentzas 381) or "patronic statements" (Filios II/1 §126, 81-82; Georgiades § 6 no. 19 refers to both). In GERMANY comfort letters are a well known type of personal security nowadays (Fleischer, WM 1999, 666). Several GERMAN courts dealt with comfort letters (CA Düsseldorf 26 January 1989, NJW-RR 1989, 1116; CA Karlsruhe 7 August 1992, WM 1992, 2088; BGH 30 January 1992, BGHZ 117, 127 (applying AUSTRIAN law); CA München 24 January 2003, DB 2003, 711; CA Berlin 18 January 2002, WM 2002, 1190).

(c) Binding character

7. Whether a comfort letter is legally binding must be ascertained, in view of the great variety of such declarations (GERMANY: examples at Lwowski nos. 445-465), by interpretation of the specific instrument (GERMANY: BGH 30 January 1992, BGHZ 117, 127 at 129; CA Berlin 18 January 2002, WM 2002, 1190 at 1191). Whether any legally binding liability (or merely a moral obligation) has been created and what kind of liability has been assumed by the issuer of the comfort letter depends upon the careful interpretation of the wording of the agreement (ITALY: De Nictolis 386, 396; Cass. 27 September 1995 no. 10235, BBTC 1997 II 396; PORTUGAL: Soares da Veiga 380; SPAIN: Carrasco , Las nuevas garantías 636). The same is true in DENMARK and SWEDEN (DENMARK: Iversen 151 s.; SWEDEN: HD 25 June 1992, NJA 1992, 375; HD 7 April 1994, NJA 1994, 204; HD 27 October 1995, NJA 1995, 586; Hellner, Avtalsrätt 79 s.; Ramberg 152 s.). In SPAIN the TS 30 June 2005, RAJ 2005/5089, held as binding a comfort letter with an interpretation strongly supported in the presumption that the issuer has asked the beneficiary to provide credit to the subsidiary, and assuming that any person who ask another to provide credit to a third party assumes liability for such third party's non-performance. On the contrary, in the TS 13 February 2007, RAJ 2007/684, the Supreme Court disqualified the letter as a binding transaction due to the weight given to the statement that the issuer was entitled to release its equity in the subsidiary without getting the consent of the beneficiary.

8. In ITALY, binding comfort letters are declarations that are considered as being legally binding upon the author of the letter (Costanza, Lettere di patronage 485 ss.; Bozzi, Le garanzie 347 s.; Cass. 27 September 1995 no. 10235, Arch.civ. 1996 I 3007). In GREECE binding comfort letters may either have the character of an independent personal security, thus creating for the sender an autonomous contractual obligation (Velentzas 383-384), or they may give rise to liability for culpa in contrahendo vis-à-vis the receiver of the letter (Georgiades § 6 no. 21). According to both opinions, the claim for compensation in favour of the receiver is not necessarily equal to the amount of the enterprise's debt vis-à-vis the creditor as receiver of the letter. It has been accepted in SWEDEN that depending on its wording, in appropriate circumstances a comfort letter can be regarded as binding, thereby constituting a form of dependent personal security (cf. HD 27 October 1995, NJA 1995, 586; Gorton, Suretyship 583 fn. 18). In ENGLAND it is asserted that, even were a letter of comfort to create a binding obligation (compare Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Malaysia Mining Corp. [1989] 1 WLR 379, where the letter was held merely to be a statement of intention which had no binding force), the degree of protection might be less than under a security: the creditor will have to establish a sufficient causal connection between the parent company's failure to do what it promised in the comfort letter and the creditor's loss, which might for instance be doubtful if the subsidiary would have become insolvent anyway (Andrews and Millett no. 14-015). In FRANCE the comfort letter is according to the Supreme Court regarded now as binding, irrespective of the nature of the liability assumed by the patron (cf. Cass.com. 9 July 2002, Bull.civ. 2002 IV no. 117 p. 126, Revue des sociétés January-March 2003, 124 ss.: a parent company may be bound towards the creditor by merely an obligation of care), contrary to earlier decisions imposing a liability for result (Cass.com. 26 January 1999, D. 1999, 577, note Aynès).

(e) Qualification

9. It is not possible to provide a common legal qualification of comfort letters, since the extent and kind of liability supplied by this instrument depend on the concrete agreement of the parties (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 847; FRANCE: The Grimaldi Commission´s proposal of a CC new art. 2324 mentioned expressly that the terms vary; but this proposal was not adopted by the CC new art. 2322 (as inserted by DL no. 2006-346 of 23 March 2006); Simler nos. 1009 s.; GERMANY: Reinicke and Tiedtke, Kreditsicherung 153; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 21; ITALY: Cass. 27 September 1995 no. 10235, Arch. civ. 1996 I 3007; Mazzoni, Lettere di patronage 564; De Nictolis 386; NETHERLANDS: Wessels 7; PORTUGAL: STJ 19 December 2001, 2509/01 www.dgsi.pt; Soares da Veiga 380; SPAIN: Carrasco, Las nuevas garantías 632). The recent FRENCH provision characterises the contents of a comfort letter in a very general way as "support of the debtor in the performance of the obligation towards the creditor" (CC new art. 2322 of 2006). In appropriate circumstances comfort letters may give the creditor similar rights as a contract of dependent or independent personal security (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 848; ENGLAND: Chemco Leasing SpA v. Rediffusion [1987] 1 FTLR 201 where, however, the court refused to impose liability on the parent company for the creditor's lack of compliance with an implied term, cf. Andrews and Millett no. 14-015; GERMANY: BGH 30 January 1992, cit. at p. 132; Lwowski no. 441; ITALY: CFI Milano 17 December 1994, BBTC 1996 II 346; De Nictolis 393; NETHERLANDS: Blomkwist 15; Wessels 7; PORTUGAL: CA Lisboa 15 February 2001, 94458/00 www.dgsi.pt, treated a comfort letter as an independent personal security; Menezes Cordeiro, Direito 624; SPAIN: Carrasco, Las nuevas garantías 670). The AUSTRIAN Supreme Court qualified a binding comfort letter in one case as an independent guarantee (OGH 23 March 1988, SZ 61 no. 73 at p.365). However, in another case in which an Austrian citizen obliged himself to reimburse the Federal government and other public bodies for expenses made to support a foreigner who, on the basis of this declaration, had been admitted to enter, and stay in, the country, the Supreme Court qualified such a declaration as a suretyship and not an independent guarantee (OGH 23 February 2000, SZ 73 no. 36 at p. 209 s.). In ITALY the similarity between binding comfort letters and the dependent personal security has been stressed, but the prevailing view among the authors is in favour of distinguishing it from the typical dependent personal security (Di Giovanni 121 ss.; Mazzoni, Le lettere di patronage 480) and the same trend is followed by the courts (Cass. 27 September 1995, no. 10235, cit.). The main difficulty to consider a binding comfort letter fully as a dependent personal security is the absence of an express intention of the parent company to grant security, which is required by ITALIAN CC art. 1937 for the valid creation of dependent personal securities, as well as the nature of the obligation assumed by the promisor, which has not the same content as the principal obligation secured (CA Roma 4 December 1979, BBTC 1981 II 88; Bozzi, Le garanzie 350). However, if according to the rules of interpretation, the intention to grant a dependent personal security can be deduced from the wording of the letter, it will have to be considered a dependent personal security (CFI Milano 17 October 1994, BBTC 1995 II 346; for a recent assimilation of a binding comfort letter to a dependent personal security, by way of analogical application to it of CC art. 1938 concerning the necessary maximum amount of the security see CFI Roma 18 December 2002, Giur.mer. 2003, 1661). In FRANCE a binding comfort letter can be considered as a personal security sui generis (garantie) mentioned in Ccom art. L 225-35, which seems to differ from a dependent or an independent personal security (Cass.com. 9 July 2002, Revue des sociétés January-March 2003, 124 ss.). In the Grimaldi Commission´s proposal, as adopted by Decree-

Law no. 2006-346 of 23 March 2006, the comfort letter (lettre d´intention) constitutes a third category of personal security (cf. new chapter III of title I on personal securities and CC new art. 2322 merely giving a definition). If the company which the issuer of a binding comfort letter had promised vis-à-vis the creditor to support becomes bankrupt, the promisor is liable to the creditor for damages for non-performance of this binding promise (AUSTRIA: OGH 23 March 1988, cit. at p.365; Leitner 522; GERMANY: BGH 30 January 1992, cit. at 132; CA Berlin 18 January 2002, cit. at p. 1191; Staudinger/Horn nos. 441 s. preceding §§ 765 ss.) The issuer of the letter and the supported company are liable as solidary debtors to the creditor, like a surety and the principal debtor (AUSTRIA: Harrer 77; Leitner 525; GERMANY: BGH 30 January 1992, cit. at p. 132, 134; Staudinger/Horn no. 415 preceding §§ 765 ss.; Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten no. 1623).

10. According to a DANISH author (Gomard 56 fn. 11) a comfort letter cannot in general be considered to be a personal security and in the opinion of one writer (Iversen 25 fn. 31) comfort letters can under no circumstances be similar to personal securities.

(f) Stand-by letters of credit generalities

11. Since stand-by letters of credit are mainly used in international commercial transactions they tend to escape a 'pure' national regulation in most countries. This subject matter is usually governed by the lex mercatoria (UCP 500 (1993) and ISP98 of the International Chamber of Commerce in Paris) and international conventions (UN Convention on Independent Guarantees of 1995); the influence of this 'trans-national' law is often to be found in national laws.

(g) Qualification

12. Stand-by letters of credit are similar to independent personal securities (GERMANY: Schütze nos. 93 ss.; Zahn, Eberding and Ehrlich nos. 8/10 ss.; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 26; ITALY: Costa 270; Terrile 591; Pontiroli, Garanzie autonome 233 and 249; Di Meo 330; NETHERLANDS: cf. de Rooy 1115; Ebbink 543; PORTUGAL: Soares da Veiga 360). Therefore GERMAN courts apply the principles that have been developed for independent personal securities on first demand also to stand-by letters of credit (CA Frankfurt 18 March 1997, WM 1997, 1893). FRENCH opinion considers that the banker's engagement is autonomous from the underlying contract (Ripert and Roblot no. 2386-1) and that a stand-by letter of credit is a genuine personal security (Simler no. 870 p. 901).

13. Stand-by letters of credit are mainly used in the UNITED STATES and in international trade so that national court practice in Europe is rare (for GERMANY cf., apart from the aforementioned decision, BGH 26 April 1994, WM 1994, 1063). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND stand-by letters of credit resemble performance bonds and demand securities, which clearly are securities. They have only been considered in very few ENGLISH decisions (cf. Offshore International SA v. Banco Central SA [1977] 1 WLR 399 (CFI); Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corp. v. Kloeckner & Co. AG [1990] 2 QB 514). The same principles as in regular letters of credit apply because "in law a standby credit is no different from any other type of credit" (Jack, Malek and Quest no. 12.15, 3rd ed. (2000)). In ENGLAND it is highlighted that the differences to demand personal securities "lie in business practice, not in law" (Goode, Commercial Law 1018).

III. Credit insurance and guarantee insurance

(a) Credit insurance

15. A credit insurance, i.e. an insurance taken out by the creditor against the loss due to the debtor's insolvency, may in fact create a kind of personal security, but is in some countries regarded as a pure insurance contract (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 852–860; DENMARK: H 6 May 1991, UfR 1991 A 523; FRANCE: Simler nos. 24 s.; Cerini, L´assicurazione del credito interno in Francia 539 ss., 558 ss.; GERMANY: Meyer 35, with examples of general conditions of insurance concerning credits on goods in the annex; GREECE: cf. Insurance Law 2496/1997 art. 22(1); ErmAK/Zepos no. 35 preceding art. 847-870; Rokas nos. 155-156; ITALY: Cerini, L´assicurazione del credito interno in Francia 563; Fanelli 27 s.; LUXEMBOURG: Ravarani, Rapport Luxembourgeois 422; NETHERLANDS: De Vries 468; PORTUGAL: Credit and Guarantee Insurance Decree Law 183/88 art. 8, last modified in 1999; STJ 9 March 1995, BolMinJus no. 445 (1995) 552; however, credit insurance is considered as having the function of a dependent or independent personal security: Menezes Cordeiro, Direito 614; SPAIN: Law 50/1980 of 8 October 1980 on Insurance Contracts arts. 69-72; Tirado Suárez 444 ss.; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 137 ss.).

(b) Guarantee insurance

16. The guarantee insurance is agreed between the debtor and the insurer, which secures vis-à-vis the creditor the payment of the debt in favour of the debtor. This contract is regarded in some countries as an insurance (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 861-862; FRANCE: controversial, Simler no. 25; Larroumet/François nos. 16 ss.; SWEDEN: HD 9 September 1999, NJA 1999, 544; Hellner, Försäkringsrätt 447; GREECE: cf. Insurance Law 2496/1997 art. 11 read with art. 22(2); the guarantee insurance is classified in the Second Part of this Law as a special branch of insurance against damages; Rokas no. 154). In GERMANY the basic relationship between the debtor and the insurance company is considered as a special type of an insurance contract that is mostly governed by standard terms concerning guarantee insurance (cf. CA Koblenz 16 February 1996, VersR 1997, 1486; Meyer 118 ss.); on the basis of this contract, a security is issued to the creditor (cf. CA Koblenz, as before; Beuter no. 409 at p. 412). In ITALY the guarantee insurance is recognized by several provisions of special statutes (e.g. RD no. 827 of 23 May 1924, art. 54 as modified in 1948; RDL no. 210 of 7 August 1931, art. 5; RDL no. 1113 of 7 August 1931, art. 1 ss.; DPR 26 October 1972 no. 633, art. 38*bis*; DPR no. 43 of 23 January 1973, art. 87 and Law no. 348 of 10 June 1982, art. 1), which, however, do not provide a general regulation. A well-established case law regards the guarantee insurance as a dependent personal security, unless differently agreed by the parties (Cass. 1 June 2004 no. 10486, BBTC 2005 II 481 ss.; Cass. 15 March 2004 no. 5239, Assicurazioni 2004, 231 ss.; Cass. 17 May 2001 no. 6757, Giust.civ. 2002, 729; Cass. 18 May 2001 no. 6823, Giur.it. 2001 I 3174; Cass. 26 June 1990 no. 6499, Giur.it. 1991 I 446; Cass. 17 May 1988 no. 3443, BBTC 1989, 429; recently also CA Milano 14 May 2004, BBTC 2004 II 619 ss. note Barillà, Il Garantievertrag 633 ss.), whereas scholarly writings show less uniformity on the point and consider this contract sometimes as an insurance (Stolfi 67 ss.; Barbieri 502), sometimes as an 'atypical' contract to which the rules governing dependent personal security are substantially applicable, unless differently agreed by the parties (Volpe Putzolu 245; La Torre 103 ss.; Lipari 133 ss.; Vaccà 167; Costanza, L´assicurazione fideiussoria 2418 ss.; Bozzi, Le garanzie 65). It has been noticed that commercial practice usually tends to regulate the internal relationship between insurer and debtor according to the rules on insurance contracts and the outside relationship between insurer and beneficiary of the contract (the creditor) according to the rules on dependent personal security (Bozzi, Le garanzie 67 ss.). In PORTUGAL guarantee insurance is regulated by Decree-Law 183/88 (last modified in 1999) arts. 6-14. It is an insurance (STJ 12 March 1996, CJ [ST] IV [1996-1] 143), but it is equivalent to a dependent (CA Oporto 7 May 1998, www.dgsi.pt Processo 9750894) or independent (STJ 9 May 2002, 1014/02 www.dgsi.pt; STJ 28 May 2002, 636/02 www.dgsi.pt) personal security (STJ 19 March 2002, 2832/01 www.dgsi.pt). In SPAIN, however, after much controversy about its legal nature (Camacho de los Ríos 81; Carrasco Comentario 653), a mixed approach prevailed, according to which the guarantee insurance (cf. Law 50/1980 on Insurance Contracts art. 68) is an insurance contract, from which a security obligation arises (Carrasco, Comentario 653) and therefore the rules on personal securities are concurrently applicable with insurance rules (Embid Irujo 1863). A similar approach is followed in SWEDEN: the mandatory rules of the Law on Insurance Contracts prevail but the non-mandatory rules may be replaced by the rules on personal securities (Walin, Borgen 137-141). Also in ENGLISH law, it is accepted that insurance contracts, where the insured event is the default by a debtor, are equivalent to a personal security contract para. 1022 Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008)).

IV. The aval

(a) Origins

17. The Uniform Laws of Geneva 1930/1931 on bills of exchange and on cheques regulate these special forms of personal security. Almost all Member States are parties to the Uniform Laws of Geneva, except IRELAND and the UNITED KINGDOM. SPAIN, on the other hand, has signed but not ratified the Uniform Laws. However, Law 19/1985 on bills of exchange, promissory notes and cheques has fully adopted its contents, expressly mentioning the Geneva Conventions in its motives.

(b) Qualification

18. In some countries, the rules of the civil codes on dependent personal securities cannot apply to the aval; since the avalist is no provider of dependent security, the relevant rights and obligations are regulated by the provisions on bills of exchange and cheques (BELGIUM: Cass. 3 April 1981, Arr.Cass. 1980-81, 874; Van Quickenborne no. 883; GERMANY: BGH 6 April 1961, BGHZ 35, 19, 21; Scholz/Lwowski no. 440; Staudinger/Horn no. 423 preceding §§ 765 ss.; GREECE: A.P. 1306/1984, EED 37, 87; CA Athens 8840/1984, EED 37, 300; Georgiades § 4 no. 67; NETHERLANDS: Blomkwist 15; PORTUGAL: STJ 13 October 1998, 779/98 unpublished; STJ 4 October 2000, 2228/00 www.dgsi.pt; while according to the majority view in the literature the aval is characterised by an imperfect autonomy, its pure autonomy is argued by: Sendim and Mendes 13). In ITALY and SPAIN, however, despite the autonomous character, which distinguishes the aval from the dependent personal security, it has been recognised that the aval has a limited accessory character due to its security function. Therefore, the rules on dependent personal securities may apply by analogy (ITALY: for CC art. 1948, 1953, 1955: Cass. 11 September 1953 no. 3026, Foro pad. 1953 I 1273; Cass. 8 June 1976 no. 2090, Giust.civ. 1976 I 1225; Cass. 11 September 1997 no. 8990, Giust.Civ.Mass. 1997, 1688; Cass. 7 May 1998 no. 4618, BBTC 2000 II 118; excluded are CC art. 1956 and 1957: Cass. 8 June 1976 no. 2090, cit.; Cass. 23 March 1994 no. 2782, Foro it. 1994 I 3070; Angeloni 32; Bianchi d´Espinosa 577; Tedeschi 533; SPAIN: García Cortés 518). In GREECE it is accepted, that an invalid aval may be converted into a dependent personal security, if the parties would have wished to contract a security, had they known the invalidity of the aval (cf. CC art. 182; Georgiades § 4 no. 71 fn. 37). By contrast, in PORTUGAL an aval may not be automatically converted into a dependent personal security for, according to CC art. 628(1), the contract of dependent personal security must be based on an explicit declaration; but the aval giver, according to the interpretation of the parties' intention and declaration, can assume an obligation also as a provider of security (STJ 17 May 1977, BolMinJus no. 267, 149; CA Lisboa 20 April 1993, CJ XVIII, II-138; STJ 9 October 1997, 123/97 www.dgsi.pt). In FRANCE the aval is considered as a dependent personal security with primary liability (Simler no. 107; Cass.com. 28 October 1952, JCP G 1953, II no. 7588).

19. The ENGLISH, SCOTTISH and IRISH Bills of Exchange Acts do not specifically provide for a security comparable to the aval. In practice, either a formal security to honour the bill is provided separately or the bill will be endorsed by a "stranger", i.e. a person not belonging to the sequence of endorsers (Jahn 85); according to the Bills of Exchange Act 1882 s. 56, such an endorser is liable as (any other) endorser to a holder in due course. Although such an endorsement is in substance a security the Statute of Frauds cannot be set up as a defence to the claim (ENGLAND: G. & H. Montage GmbH v. Irvani [1990] 1 WLR 667; Banco Atlantico SA v. British Bank of the Middle East [1990] 2 Lloyd´s Rep 504).

V. Freedom of contract

20. Contracts of personal security are regarded as part of the law of contract in all member states (cf. ENGLAND: Moschi v. Lep Air Services Ltd. [1973] AC 331; DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 15; FRANCE: Simler nos. 122 ss. for dependent personal security and nos. 930 ss. for independent personal security; GERMANY: Horn, Bürgschaften nos. 4 and 7; ITALY: Sacco, Autonomia contrattuale 796 ss.; Roppo 23 ss.; Piazza 5; NETHERLANDS: du Perron and Haentjens, Inleiding no. 3 with references; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 770 ss.; SPAIN: Vicent Chuliá 375 s.; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 36 ss.). Consequently, the rights and obligations of the parties under these contracts are determined primarily by the agreement of the parties (cf. ENGLAND: Moschi v. Lep Air Services Ltd [1973] AC 331, 339 (HL); ITALY: Giusti 6 ss., 10 ss.).

21. Mandatory rules specifically concerning the contract of personal security – which, however, do have a limited scope of application only – are found in the member states typically in matters concerning consumer protection. For these matters, see the national notes on the Articles in Chapter 4. A noteworthy exception relates to specific formal requirements which in some member states exist for personal securities provided both by consumers and non-consumers (cf. national notes on IV.G.–4:104 (Form)).

22 As another consequence of the fact that contracts of personal security are regarded as part of the law of contract in all member states, mandatory rules of general contract law are applicable to these contracts. Therefore, general mandatory contract law rules on matters such as illegality apply also to personal security contracts (cf. ENGLAND: O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 4-66 ss.; ITALY: Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 86 s.; NETHERLANDS: cf. no. 1 above; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 772; SPAIN: Roca Trias 147, 154 ss.).

23. The most important general mandatory rules of general contract law applicable to contracts of personal security are the protective rules of general contract law: throughout the member states, protection in matters such as acting against good morals, mistake, undue influence, duress etc. is usually based on the general mandatory protective rules of contract law and of the law of obligations (cf. AUSTRIA: Schwimann/Mader and Faber CC § 1346 nos. 14-31; ENGLAND: O´Donovan and Phillips chapter 4; DENMARK: ContrA § 36; Pedersen, Kaution 29;

FINLAND: ContrA § 36; FRANCE: Simler nos. 132 ss.; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn nos. 71-77 preceding §§ 765 ff; IRELAND: White 539; ITALY: Sacco and De Nova (Sacco) I 22 ss., II 59 ss.; Roppo 399 ss., 779 ss., 811 ss., 825 ss.; Bussani 97 ss.; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 88 ss.; SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark nos. 891 ss.; SPAIN: Roca Trias 154 ss., 156 ss.; Carrasco a.o. 106 s.; SWEDEN: ContrA § 36; Walin, Borgen 37; see also national notes on IV.G.–4:101 (Form) nos. 16 ss. and on IV.G.–4:103 (Creditor's pre-contractual duties) nos. 27 ss.).

IV.G.–1:103: Creditor's acceptance

(1) If the parties intend to create the security by contract, the creditor is regarded as accepting an offer of security as soon as the offer reaches the creditor, unless the offer requires express acceptance, or the creditor without undue delay rejects it or reserves time for consideration.

(2) A personal security can also be assumed by a unilateral undertaking intended to be legally binding without acceptance. The rules of this Part apply with any appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

A. Creation of security by contract

This Article proceeds from the assumption that a personal security is usually created by contract although exceptionally a unilateral undertaking by the security provider may suffice (paragraph (2)). Deviating from the general rule that a contract is concluded by offer and acceptance, paragraph (1) presumes acceptance "as soon as the offer reaches the creditor". The term "reaches" is defined in I.–1:109 (Notice).

B. Creditor's presumed acceptance

An express rule appears to be desirable since the general rules on contracting do not provide sufficient certainty: According to II.–4:204 (Acceptance) paragraph (2), silence or inactivity does not in itself amount to acceptance; nor does affirmative conduct by the creditor, unless it is known to the security provider (cf. II.–4:205 (Time of conclusion of the contract). Therefore an express rule is desirable and necessary in order to preclude the security provider from later denying being bound by the security since the offer had not been accepted. The main rule of this Article implies that the contract of security is concluded as soon as the security provider's offer reaches the creditor.

This departure from the general rules on contracting is justified since the contract on personal security usually creates an obligation only for the security provider in favour of the creditor. Therefore many legal systems do not insist upon an express acceptance by the creditor. This widely accepted rule is, however, expressed by the present Article only as a rebuttable presumption. The presumption is rebutted if one of the events specified in the second part of the Article occurs.

C. Exceptions

According to the second part of paragraph (1), the presumption of acceptance established by the first part is rebutted if the offer requires express acceptance or if the creditor without undue delay rejects it or reserves time for consideration. The presumption of acceptance by the creditor can be rebutted only by unambiguous declarations of the creditor.

If an express agreement is required, it will be a question of interpretation whether a statement by the creditor amounts to an acceptance. The same is true for a rejection of the offer. The general rules in Book II apply.

If the creditor without undue delay after receipt of the offer of security reserves time for consideration, the creditor must be enabled to examine carefully a complicated security instrument; depending upon the circumstances, the creditor must be allowed the time to consult an advisor.

D. Express acceptance

The ordinary rules on acceptance apply if the offer of security requires an acceptance or if the creditor has effectively reserved time for consideration. Apart from the preceding two cases, the ordinary rules also apply if the creditor, without being "invited" by the security provider to do so, expressly declares acceptance within a time limit fixed by the offeror or else within a reasonable time limit. See also II.–4:207(Late acceptance) and II.–4:208 (Modified acceptance).

E. Security by virtue of debtor's contract with security provider

The preceding rules also apply if the debtor contracts with the security provider and the security is expressed as a term of that contract in favour of the creditor (cf. Book II, Chapter 9, Section 3 (Effects of stipulation in favour of third party)).

F. Creation of security by unilateral undertaking

The fact that a security provider's offer of personal security often is not regarded as calling for an express acceptance invites drawing the consequence that not even any acceptance of the offer is necessary; rather, a mere unilateral undertakign suffices. This corresponds to the general rule established in II.–1:103 (Binding effect), according to which "A valid unilateral undertaking is binding on the person giving it if it is intended to be legally binding without acceptance." A practical example is a binding comfort letter sent by the sole or majority shareholder of a company to all creditors of the latter which is presumed to create a dependent security (IV.G.–2:101 (Presumption for dependent personal security) paragraph (2)).

G. Commencement of security provider's obligation

The Article implicitly fixes the time at which the security becomes binding if the creditor does not declare acceptance. The fixing of this point in time is relevant for securities that may fix their duration by indicating a period only (e.g. two years) without indicating a precise date of expiration. Also for the application of IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) paragraphs (3) and (6), IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligations) paragraphs (3) and (4) and IV.G.–2:103 (Debtor's defences available to the security provider) paragraph (3) a precise date must be determined.

NOTES

I. Personal security as contract

(a) Declaration of creditor's acceptance necessary

1. In the BENELUX-countries and in PORTUGAL, the general rules on the formation of contracts apply, in particular the "offer and acceptance" method of the general law of contracts as set out in the respective civil codes. All these countries demand that both the security provider and the creditor expressly agree on the contract of dependent personal security (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 104-105; NETHERLANDS: Blomkwist no. 13 at p. 24; PORTUGAL: STJ 6 June 1990, no.78761 unpublished; Mesquita 29; Costa Gomes 343). Reference can be made to the notes to Book II, Chapter.4 on the formation of contract (section 2: offer and acceptance). In FINLAND, according to Ekström 39 s. the creditor must expressly accept the offer of the security provider. Also in GREECE, an essential condition for contracting the security is that the creditor has expressly or tacitly accepted it, hence the mere receipt of the offer by the creditor and subsequent silence or inactivity of the creditor do not make the contract binding (Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 847 no. 15; A.P. 682/1995, EEN 1996, 586; A.P. 1197/1992, ETrAksXrD 1993, 385). Not only must the creditor accept, but the declaration of acceptance must also reach the offeror/security provider (cf. GREEK CC art. 192). An exception is made for independent personal securities (cf. C below).

2. In ENGLISH law, as a rule, acceptance must be communicated to the security provider; but a detrimental act of the creditor relying on the security provider's promise to the knowledge of the latter can be sufficient (Jays Ltd. v. Sala (1898) 14 TLR 461); similarly, in appropriate circumstances communication can even be inferred from silence and inactivity on the part of the creditor (Pope v. Andrews (1840) 9 C & P 564, 173 ER 957). Acceptance must be expressly communicated if stipulated for in the offer (Gaunt v. Hill (1815) 1 Stark 10, 171 ER 386; Newport v. Spivey (1862) 7 LT 328); further, if a time limit is stipulated in the offer, acceptance has to be communicated within that period of time, otherwise within a reasonable time (Payne v. Ives (1823) 3 Dow & RyKB 664). If the offer is a bilateral one, i.e. it is given in consideration of an express promise by the creditor to enter into a transaction with the debtor, thus establishing a binding and enforceable bilateral agreement between creditor and security provider, it is irrevocable even before the creditor has acted upon it (Greenham Ready Mixed Concrete v. CAS (Industrial Developments) Ltd. (1965) 109 SJ 209).

(b) Declaration of creditor's acceptance necessary in specific cases

3. In ITALY, the general rules on the formation of contracts based on the "offer and acceptance" method apply to the formation of dependent personal security, when the security creates obligations binding not only the security provider, but also the creditor (CC art. 1326 ff; Sacco, La conclusione dell´accordo 24). In AUSTRIA, the Supreme Court held in one case that an offer of a personal security that had been given by the private security provider on a form supplied by the creditor, in which the creditor had stipulated that express acceptance was necessary, but which had not been given, was void although the creditor had granted the credit to be secured (OGH 7 February 1989, ÖBA 1989, 1021 with approving note Bydlinski; cf. idem, Kreditbürgschaft 36 s.).

(c) Acceptance by creditor's act or behaviour

4. Pursuant to the principle of DANISH ContrA § 7 a security is binding if the creditor has been informed about it. Consent can also arise from the creditor's silence and inactivity (Andersen, Termn, Edlund a.o./Pedersen 435 s.; Pedersen, Kaution 18; Bryde Andersen 425; Højrup 16 s.). According to the BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2015 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2292) as well as ITALIAN CC art. 1937, PORTUGUESE CC art. 628 and SPANISH CC art. 1827(1), the existence of a dependent personal security cannot be presumed, it must expressly be established. But in fact this rule concerns only the offer made by the security provider, who is (usually) the only person assuming an obligation (Simler no. 125). In ITALY, the offer made by the security provider can also be expressed by conclusive acts, provided it is possible to infer from them a clear intention (Giusti 90). Nevertheless it must be noticed that special rules on the form of the security provider's declaration are given by the ITALIAN Banking Law (DLgs 1 September 1993 no. 385): according to art. 117(1), the security provider's offer must be in writing (with a copy retained or given back). This rule applies, whether or not the security provider is a consumer (Lobuono 52 s.). In FRANCE the acceptance of the creditor can be given impliedly by any unequivocal act, particularly by bringing judicial proceedings against the provider of security (Cass.com. 13 November 1972, GazPal 1973 1, 144). The consent of the creditor may also be implied, e.g. by setting up a counter security or by any advance payment in case of a security for an advance payment (Simler no. 933).

5. In AUSTRIA, in the context of the formation of a contract the absence of an express acceptance by the creditor is justified in two ways. First, the security provider's binding offer may be regarded as setting a prolonged period for acceptance. This interpretation suggests itself, in particular, where a definite time period for calling upon the security provider had been agreed upon. In this case, the creditor's demand is to be regarded as the acceptance. Second, according to AUSTRIAN CC § 864(1), an offer may be accepted by the offeree acting in accordance with the offer. There may be such a conforming act if the creditor concludes the underlying contract with the debtor in accordance with what had been agreed upon from the beginning by the three parties (Avancini/Iro/Koziol 283 no. 3/68; cf. also D below). A DUTCH court has held that the creditor's demand based upon an offered personal security signifies acceptance (CA Amsterdam 17 October 1988, NJ 1990 no.339).

6. In SCOTTISH law there is no definite rule, whether an express acceptance is required or whether the security provider's liability is fixed once the creditor performs towards the debtor (Wallace v. Gibson [1895] AC 354). The security provider's obligation may also arise from an undertaking to secure a person's debts which is not addressed to any particular creditor: then anyone who has given credit on the faith of the security is entitled to enforce it, unless the contrary is evident from the terms of the undertaking (Fortune v. Young 1918 SC 1).

7. According to GREEK law, the creditor's acceptance of the offer of a dependent personal security must be made explicitly or tacitly (Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 847 no. 15; A.P. 682/1995, EEN 1996, 586; A.P. 1197/1992, ETrAksXrD 1993, 385; cf. GREEK CC art. 189). Silence, however, constitutes neither acceptance nor rejection, unless this is provided by law or in a Code of Conduct or if the parties have so agreed or it is dictated by good faith and business usages, especially among merchants (Georgiades, General Principles § 32 no. 22; Perakis § 48 no. 22). It has been ruled however, that the mere fact of receipt of the offer neither constitutes a tacit acceptance, nor can such an acceptance be derived from the circumstances concerning the status of the parties or the nature of the contract that binds them (CA Thessaloniki 1197/1992, EpTrapDik 1993, 385). On the other hand, independent personal securities are almost always considered to have been accepted tacitly by the creditor, i.e. by the bank sending the document containing the independent personal security (Georgiades § 6 no. 46). Also in SPAIN, the creditor's acceptance may be informal and even tacit (Carrasco a.o. 105; TS 20 January 1999, RAJ 1999 no. 3); this is especially important for the creditor in case the security provider had waived rights (Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 56).

(d) Security provider's promise as acceptance

8. Under ENGLISH common law, if the security provider offers the security at the request of the creditor, it is not necessary that the creditor should notify acceptance to the security provider (on the authority of the Canadian decision in Fraser v. Douglas (1906) 5 WLR 52; cf. Andrews and Millett no. 2-002). A similar view is also taken in AUSTRIA: The creditor's demand to the debtor to procure a security is transmitted by the debtor to the security provider who accepts the creditor's offer by issuing the security (Avancini/Iro/Koziol 284 no. 3/69).

(e) Additional requirements

9. ENGLISH law additionally requires contracts which are not under seal to be supported by consideration; that the creditor promises to grant a credit to the debtor or to forbear from suing the debtor for a debt already in existence can constitute sufficient consideration in contracts of security (Chitty/Whittaker nos. 44-019–44-023). The same principles apply in IRISH law (White 537 ss.), where however it has been held that the fact that the creditor does not sue the debtor is not necessarily a consideration for the security but might as well be a consequence of the obvious fruitlessness of any attempt to enforce the claim against the debtor (Commodity Broking Co. Ltd. v. Meehan [1985] IR 12).

II. Beginning of security provider's obligation

10. In ENGLISH law the commencement of the security provider's obligation under the contract of security depends on the nature of the offer: if it is a unilateral offer (which is not made under seal), the provider of security can revoke it until it has been accepted by the creditor (as to what constitutes acceptance see I above); Daulia Ltd. v. Four Millbank Nominees Ltd. [1978] Ch 231).

11. Pursuant to DANISH ContrA § 7 a security provider's obligation arises as soon as the creditor has been informed about the offer of security (Karnov/Lynge Andersen 5397 fn. 32 s.). According to the law of the BENELUX-countries, the contract of dependent personal security and therefore the security provider's obligation becomes effective with the acceptance by the creditor of the offer to grant the security. According to the emission theory the security contract is concluded in FRANCE, as soon as the creditor dispatches the consent (Simler no. 129).

12. Under GERMAN and PORTUGUESE law a contract becomes binding at the moment when the declaration of acceptance of the offeree becomes effective, i.e. – if the parties do not act inter praesentes – when it reaches the offeror, or in PORTUGAL also when it becomes known to him (cf. GERMAN CC § 130; Palandt/Heinrichs § 148 no. 1; PORTUGUESE CC art. 224; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela 214). In GERMANY in the vast majority of dependent personal securities the creditor does not declare acceptance. Nevertheless, the contract of security is validly concluded since according to GERMAN CC § 151 first sentence a contract is concluded by the acceptance of the offer, which, however, need not be communicated to the offeror, if such notification is not to be expected according to common usage. GERMAN courts have held that such a usage exists for offers that are only beneficial for the offeree as is the case of personal securities (cf. especially BGH 12 October 1999, NJW 2000, 276 with further references for dependent as well as for independent personal securities and assumptions of debt; for a binding comfort letter cf. CA Berlin 18 January 2002, WM 2002, 1190, 1191). It has been considered as sufficient that the creditor retains the (written) declaration of the security provider (cf. for dependent personal security BGH 6 May 1997, NJW 1997, 2233; BGH 30 March 1995, WM 1995, 901). The PORTUGUESE CC art. 234 is similar to GERMAN CC § 151. According to that provision, the contract is concluded as soon as the offeree shows an intention to accept the offer, if according to the terms of the offer, the nature or circumstances of the contract or common usage it is not necessary to require a declaration of acceptance by the creditor. CC art. 234 is considered also to apply to dependent personal securities inserted into a complex financial operation (Costa Gomes 365). The acceptance can therefore be inferred from the fact that the bank grants a credit (CA Coimbra 5 July 1989, CJ XIV, IV-50) or retains the declaration of the security provider (STJ 6 June 1990, no.78761 unpublished; STJ 15 December 1998, 747/98 www.dgsi.pt). This rule also applies to independent personal securities (Pinheiro 431).

III. Personal security as unilateral contract or promise

13. In ITALY, the dependent personal security being a contract which usually creates obligations for the security provider only, an offer made by the person obligated is considered a binding contract if the offer has not been rejected by the offeree (CC art. 1333) (Giusti 71; Ravazzoni 255; Chianale 276; Cass. 26 May 1997 no. 4646, Giur.it. 1998, 1135). This particular method of formation of the dependent personal security, however, does not affect its contractual nature (Sacco and De Nova I 267-268; Sacco, La conclusione dell´accordo 23 ss., 28; Sacco, Il contratto 36 ss.; Cass. 27 September 1995 no. 10235, Giur.it. 1996 I 1 738; Cass. 3 April 2001 no. 4888, Giur.it. 2001, 2254; Cass. 25 September 2001 no. 11987, Stud.Iuris 2002, 393). The perfection of the security takes place at the moment the declaration reaches the creditor if the latter does not reject it within a reasonable time according to the nature of the business or the usage.

IV.G.–1:104: Co-debtorship for security purposes

A co-debtorship for security purposes is subject to the rules of Chapters 1 and 4 and, subsidiarily, to the rules in Book III, Chapter 4, Section 1 (Plurality of debtors).

COMMENTS

A. General

Delimitation. Co-debtorship for security purposes must be delimited from different, though closely similar agreements in which a third person intending to act merely for security purposes is drawn into a relationship between creditor and debtor. Three basic situations may be distinguished: First, the creditor and the third party agree that the latter should be or become a co-debtor for security purposes. Second, the original debtor and the third party agree in favour of the creditor that the third party should become an additional debtor for security purposes; this is a stipulation in favour of the creditor which entitles the creditor to demand performance from the new debtor as well (cf. Book II, Chapter 9, Section 3 (Stipulation in favour of a third party). By contrast, if the debtor agrees with a third party that the latter should assume the debtor's obligation so that the latter is discharged, this agreement does not bind the creditor unless the creditor agrees. If the creditor does agree, this is a substitution of a new debtor (cf. Book III, Section 2 (Substitution of a new debtor)) and not a co-debtorship. Only in the first two cases is a co-debtorship for security purposes created.

Legal policy. If, in addition to a principal debtor, another person assumes a corresponding obligation towards the creditor in order to secure the principal debtor's obligation, a trilateral situation arises which corresponds to that of a (dependent or independent) personal security. The additional security debtor assumes a function which is similar to that of a security provider. This co-debtorship for security purposes is defined in IV.G.–1:101 (Definitions) paragraph (e). While it is certainly not a species of a traditional personal security, it is increasingly realised that functionally it has features of a personal security. For this reason, IV.G.–1:102 (Scope) paragraph (1)(c) includes co-debtorship for the purpose of security in the ambit of this Part.

The present Part regards co-debtorship for security purposes as a distinct legal institution. For this reason, it is mentioned expressly and separately in enumerating the major types of personal security in IV.G.–1:102 (Scope) paragraph (1)(c). It partakes of the features both of co-debtorship and of a personal security. Consequently, this institution generally is governed by the rules on co-debtorship; this respects the intention of the parties who have chosen this particular type of transaction for the purposes which they intend to pursue. However, if and in so far as the parties use a co-debtorship for the purpose of providing security for the creditor, this justifies the application of certain basic rules on personal security, especially Chapter 1.

If the "securing" co-debtor is a consumer, the special protective rules of Chapter 4 apply. In addition, IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1) refers to Chapter 2 on dependent personal security and in the framework of this reference the rules on dependent personal security become applicable and are mandatory in favour of the security provider (IV.G.–4:102 paragraph (2)). The reason for selecting this regime is that the rules on dependent personal security are – generally speaking – the most protective ones for security providers. For details, cf. no. 15 below.

Two types of co-debtorship? Co-debtorship for security purposes may exist from the creation of the main obligation.

> Illustration 1
> A husband and wife sign contemporaneously a credit agreement as debtors for financing the husband's business; the wife, a housewife, merely signs at the special request of the creditor and in order to assist her husband.

It may also be created later if a co-debtor for security purposes subsequently accedes to an already existing obligation of an "ordinary" full debtor. Also the reverse situation would be covered, although it rarely occurs in practice.

The consequences of this distinction are more linguistic than real. If co-debtorship does not exist from the creation of the obligation to be secured, there is no plurality of debtors and therefore no co-debtorship; it comes into being only at the time when an (additional) debtorship for security purposes is created. The same is true if the sequence of creation is reversed.

B. Criteria for security purpose

There is no generally recognised criterion for qualifying a co-debtorship as being assumed for the purposes of security. The test must be whether one of the co-debtors clearly has the greater direct interest in the credit extended and therefore is finally to be saddled with it. According to IV.G.–1:101 (Definitions) paragraph (e) there is no co-debtorship for security purposes unless one of the debtors assumes the obligation "primarily" for purposes of security to the creditor. In the final analysis, this depends upon the interpretation of the credit agreement in light of all the circumstances.

A major indication for a co-debtorship with security purposes rather than a full co-debtorship is whether the co-debtor has a personal interest in the performance of the obligations under the contract in which the main obligation is rooted. The fact that the co-debtor's obligation is coterminous with that of the other debtor and that the co-debtor has co-signed the same document as the other debtor cannot be decisive since this would eventually place the result into the hands of the creditor. If doubts remain, it is preferable to assume that the third person has merely assumed a co-debtorship for security purposes. The fact that a housewife as such indirectly may benefit from the success of her husband's business cannot be relevant and does not suffice to saddle her with full liability.

Co-debtorship for security purposes has to be delimited not only from co-debtorship as such, but also from other types of personal security, especially from dependent security. According to IV.G.–2:101 (Presumption for dependent personal security) paragraph (1), any "undertaking to pay, … to the creditor by way of security" is presumed to create a dependent personal security. Therefore the creditor has to show that it was agreed otherwise (IV.G.–2:101 paragraph (1) last half-sentence). Consequently, there will only be a co-debtorship for security purposes if the creditor can show that the parties unambiguously agreed upon this specific type of personal security.

C. Co-debtorship and personal security combined

An additional reason for covering co-debtorship is that in some countries the parties sometimes call the person assuming an obligation for security purposes a "co-debtor and security provider". Since these two obligations involve different consequences, the meaning of the instrument, as intended by the parties, will have to be clarified. One possible construction may be that the security provider was meant to provide a dependent security with solidary liability (cf. IV.G.–2:105 (Solidary liability of security provider)). Another possible construction is that the combined formula is intended to express the security character of the assumption of debt.

D. Applicable rules

For the reasons set out above it is not possible to subject co-debtorship for security purposes to all provisions of this Part because this would disregard the basic differences between co-debtorships for security purposes and dependent as well as independent personal securities and the intentions of the parties who have chosen this particular method of providing security. For this reason, it appears necessary to subject such co-debtorships only to the general rules laid down in Chapter 1 and to the special provisions on consumer personal security laid down in Chapter 4 (which also applies rules from Chapter 2 by reference). For the rest, co-debtorships are governed by the rules on plurality of debtors laid down in Book III, Chapter 4, Section 1.

Applicable rules in Chapter 1. According to the above Article a co-debtorship for security purposes is subject primarily to Chapter 1 of this Part. However, only a few rules of Chapter 1 appear to be directly relevant for a co-debtorship for security purpose.

In applying IV.G.–1:105 to 1:107 (which deal with the position where there are several security providers) a co-debtor for security purposes can easily be put on the same level as one of several security providers. This is true for the relationship inter se (IV.G.–1:105), recourse among several security providers (IV.G.–1:106) as well as recourse against the debtor whose obligation is secured (IV.G.–1:107).

IV.G.–1:108 (Subsidiary application of rules on solidary debtors) does not become relevant for a co-debtor for security purposes since IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for security purposes) itself already declares Book III, Chapter 4, Section 1 to be applicable.

Rules in Chapter 4. A co-debtorship for security purposes is subject also to Chapter 4 of this Part. Chapter 4 contains the special and mandatory rules for consumers who have provided personal security. The application of these rules to co-debtorships for security purposes assumed by a consumer is explained in the framework of Chapter 4.

Rules in Chapter 2. Chapter 4 applies, for the regime for consumer providers of a co-debtorship for security purposes, primarily the rules of Chapter 2 on dependent personal security (cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1)). These rules are declared to be mandatory in favour of the consumer provider of security (IV.G.–4:102 paragraph (2)). In general, these rules are the most protective ones for the security providers. Generally speaking, they are also more protective than the rules on co-debtorship which do not provide for any consumer protection. However, in a few instances, the regime for co-debtors laid down in Book III., Chapter 4, Section 1 is more protective than Chapter 2 of the present Part.

Where a comparison of the two regimes leads to this conclusion, exceptionally the rules of Chapter 2 are disregarded in favour of the general regime for solidary debtors in Book III. The detailed comparisons are to be found in the Comments to the relevant rules of Chapter 2.

NOTES

I. General

1. In most member states it is generally recognized that solidary co-debtorship, i.e. a plurality of debtors who are liable for one and the same obligation towards the creditor, reinforces the position of the latter and may therefore have the function of security for the creditor (e.g. for PORTUGAL: Teles de Menezes Leitão 165; SPAIN: Díez-Picazo II 207). All member states seem to agree that, if two persons contemporaneously agree to assume an identical obligation, even though details may differ, they are co-debtors. By contrast, concepts and even effects differ where a person accedes to an obligation which had earlier been assumed by another person. Some countries regard both branches as one institution which is essentially subject to identical rules (e.g. GERMANY), whereas other countries regard them as two separate, although closely related, institutions which are subject to more or less different but closely related rules (especially the ROMANIC countries).

II. Initial co-debtorship

2. In most CONTINENTAL EUROPEAN countries the basic institution of solidary co-debtorship is recognized and regulated by legislative rules as a modality of the obligation which is owed from its inception by several debtors; they are solidarily liable towards the creditor for the performance of one single obligation (AUSTRIA: Mitschuldner zur ungeteilten Hand, CC § 896; DANISH Promissory Note Act § 2(1) regulates a plurality of debtors without, however, using the term solidary liability. According to Karnov/Møgelvang-Hansen 5558 fn. 8 the debtors are solidarily liable towards the creditor (een for alle og alle for een). The term "solidary liability" is used in Law on Bankruptcy § 47 (solidarisk hæftelse); DUTCH CC art. 6:7(1) (hoofdelijke verbintenis); GERMANY: Gesamtschuld, CC § 421; BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG: codébiteurs solidaires, CC art. 1216; ITALIAN CC arts. 1292–1313, obbligazioni solidali; PORTUGUESE CC arts. 512 ff, Ccom art. 100, obrigações solidárias; SPANISH CC arts. 1137 ff, Ccom art. 567, obligación solidaria; SWEDISH Promissory Note Act § 2(1) regulates like the DANISH Promissory Note Act § 2 par 1 a plurality of debtors. According to Walin, Lagen om skuldebrev 26, this provision assumes a solidary liability (the provision says, that the debtors are liable "one for all and all for one" (en för alla och alla för en). Like in DENMARK the term "solidary liability" does not occur in the SWEDISH Promissory Note Act § 2 par 1 (the terminology solidariskt ansvar for several debtors is however used in the SWEDISH Law on Bankruptcy chap. 5 §§ 4 ff). Solidary liability exists even if the co-debtors are not liable on the same terms (ITALIAN CC art. 1293; SPANISH CC art. 1140; PECL Article 10:102 (3)). Towards the creditor each co-debtor is liable for the whole obligation, so that the creditor has the free choice to demand performance from any one of the co-debtors (AUSTRIAN CC § 891; DENMARK: Karnov/Møgelvang-Hansen 5558 fn. 8 referring to the Promissory Note Act § 2 concerning plurality of debtors; DUTCH CC art. 6:6(1); FRENCH CC arts. 1200 and 1203; GERMAN CC § 421; ITALIAN CC art. 1292; PORTUGUESE CC arts. 512(1), 518, 519; SPANISH CC art. 1144; SWEDEN: Walin, Lagen om skuldebrev 27; cf. also PECL Article 10:101 (1)); in the internal relationship among co-debtors the obligation is divided into shares, for which statutory law usually establishes a rebuttable presumption that the shares of all co-debtors are equal (AUSTRIAN CC § 896; GERMAN CC § 426(1) sentence 1; ITALIAN CC art. 1298(2); PORTUGUESE CC arts. 516, 524.

3. Some countries differentiate between civil and commercial transactions: While in BELGIUM, FRANCE, LUXEMBOURG, PORTUGAL and SPAIN solidary liability must expressly be agreed by the parties for civil obligations (BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 1202; PORTUGAL: CC art. 513; SPAIN: CC arts. 1137-1138), for commercial obligations this is in many countries the rule and separate liability must expressly be agreed (e.g. FRANCE: Cass.civ. 18 July 1929, D.H. 1929, 556; PORTUGAL: Ccom art. 100; SPAIN: TS 14 February 1997, RAJ 1997/1419). By contrast, in GERMANY and ITALY there is a general presumption in favour of solidary liability (GERMANY: CC § 427; ITALY: CC art. 1294).

4. Solidary co-debtorship for security purposes is more attractive in countries which establish subsidiary liability for dependent personal securities (e.g., AUSTRIAN CC § 1355 f; FRENCH CC art. 2021 ff; GERMAN CC §§ 771 ff; PORTUGUESE CC art. 638; SPANISCH CC art. 1822) than in countries which provide for solidary liability such as ITALY (CC art. 1944(1)).

III. Subsequent cumulative assumption of another person's debt

5. The subsequent cumulative assumption of an already existing debt by an additional debtor is recognized in the various member states in several different forms and is called by different names. However, most of the various forms result in a solidary co-debtorship between the new and the original debtor. This subsequent assumption of another's debt can be considered as a variation of the general category of solidary co-debtorship to which also some specific rules may apply (BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG: délégation imparfaite, CC art. 1275; AUSTRIA, GERMANY and NETHERLANDS: Schuldbeitritt, which is mentioned in AUSTRIAN CC § 1347; in the GERMAN and the DUTCH Civil Codes it is not regulated, but is generally recognised, GERMANY: Palandt/Grüneberg no. 2 preceding CC § 414; NETHERLANDS: Asser/Hartkamp IV 1 no.102; GREEK CC art. 477; ITALIAN CC arts. 1268-1276, for delegazione, espromissione and accollo; PORTUGUESE CC art. 595, for assunção de dívida; SPAIN: Díez-Picazo and Gullón 591 ss., for asunción cumulativa de deuda, expromisión cumulativa and delegación imperfecta).

6. If this variety of designations and rules is classified according to solutions, three groups can be distinguished: (a) countries in which the cumulative assumption of another person's debt is basically identical with a co-debtorship, except that it comes into being after the first debt had been created: subsequent cumulative co-debtorship; (b) countries which utilise differently named institutions, but which all lead to the practical effect of a subsequent cumulative co-debtorship; and (c) countries in which the cumulative assumption of another person's debt is not only regulated by institutions which differ from co-debtorship, but which also have more or less different practical effects.

(a) Subsequent cumulative assumption of another person's debt: regulated as co-debtorship

7. In AUSTRIA, GERMANY and the NETHERLANDS, the Schuldbeitritt consists of an assumption of co-debtorship subsequent to the creation of the primary debt. The new co-debtor assumes solidary liability towards the creditor. The rules governing this variety of co-debtorship are the general rules of the 'initial' co-debtorship, except that the new co-debtor assumes the original obligation as to its conditions and extent as existing at the time of the assumption of debt (and not as it was at the time of its creation) (AUSTRIA: Koziol and Welser(-Welser) 124, 139; Rummel/Mader (Faber) § 1347 no. 1; GERMANY: Reinicke and Tiedtke, Kreditsicherung 1 ss.; Staudinger/Horn nos. 363 and 369 ss. preceding §§ 765 ss.).

(b) Subsequent cumulative assumption of another person's debt: different institutions but identical results

8. In BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG a subsequent cumulative assumption of another person's debt may be created by délégation imparfaite (CC art. 1275; BELGIUM: Van Oevelen no. 876; LUXEMBOURG: Ravarani, Rapport Luxembourgeois 421): The original debtor "delegates", i.e. instructs a third person to pay a debt corresponding to the debtor's own obligation towards the creditor. The delegation is 'imperfect' since the original debtor remains liable together with the new debtor; both debtors are solidarily liable towards the creditor (FRANCE: Simler no. 35). It seems that, in spite of a differing name for the institution, the practical result is the same that is reached through the AUSTRIAN/GERMAN version of the subsequent cumulative assumption of debt. In FRANCE the security character of a subsequent assumption of debt ("délégation-sûreté": Cabrillac and Mouly no. 473-3) is indirectly confirmed by Law no. 75-1334 of 31 December 1975 on subcontracting. The customer has to provide to the subcontractor a personal security (garantie) in form of either a dependent personal security or a subsequent (partial) assumption of debt for the subcontractor's claim against the main contractor.

9. The same can be said for PORTUGAL and SPAIN. In PORTUGAL, the subsequent cumulative assumption of another person's debt implies solidary liability of the new debtor together with the original one, unless the creditor releases the old debtor (CC art. 595(2); STJ 17 October 1975, RLJ no. 109, 281; CA Lisboa 2 November 2000, 69272/00 www.dgsi.pt; Vaz Serra, Assunção de dívida 190; Teles de Menezes Leitão 170). In SPAIN, the Civil Code regulates only the replacement of the original debtor by another debtor (CC art. 1205, novación). However, the cumulative assumption of another person's debt, as well as the cumulative expromission, are admitted by virtue of the freedom of contract as atypical contracts (CC art. 1255; the first important decision was TS 22 February 1946 cited by Díez-Picazo II 842; see then TS 7 November 1986, RAJ 1986/6217 ; 15 December 1989, RAJ 1989/8832 ; 22 March 1991, RAJ 1992/2428 ; Vicent Chuliá 389). The liability of the original and the new debtor is solidary (TS 15 December 1989 above and 7 December 1971, RAJ 1971 no. 5154).

(c) Subsequent cumulative assumption of another person's debt: different institutions and different results

10. In ITALY the general effect of assumption of another's debt may be achieved by the use of three different legal institutions, namely cumulative delegation, cumulative expromission and subsequent assumption of another person's debt (accollo cumulativo). All these institutions have the same general effect, i.e. to provide an additional debtor to the creditor; in this sense they are similar – as to the operative results and economic function – to a dependent personal security (Casella 260; Nicolò 971) and difficult to distinguish from it (Rescigno, Studi 168; Rescigno, Delegazione 952 ss.; Mancini, La delegazione 483 ss.). However, their legal structures differ. Under a cumulative delegation a third party agrees with the debtor to perform the latter's obligation to the creditor. The cumulative expromission is an agreement between the third party and the creditor for the assumption of the debtor's obligation by the former, whereas the accollo cumulativo is an agreement between the debtor and the third party, through which the latter assumes the debtor's obligation. In all three cases the creditor does not release the debtor, who will remain liable; however, this continued liability is only subsidiary (CC art. 1268(2) for the delegation; for the expromission and the subsequent assumption of another one's debt this provision is generally applied by analogy: Rescigno, Studi 67; Mancini, La delegazione 500, 512; Ceci 292; Rodotà 787; Cass. 24 May 2004 no. 9982, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, 1178). Thus, the original debtor's liability, in these cases, while solidary with the liability of the new debtor (CC art. 1272(1) and 1273(3)), is merely subsidiary: the creditor can demand performance from the original debtor only after having demanded it from the new debtor (CC art. 1268(2) by analogy). However, the creditor has not to bring execution against the new debtor before demanding performance from the original one (see authors and case law mentioned above).

IV. Criteria for security purpose

(a) Initial co-debtorship express agreement of the parties

11. The parties may expressly agree that one of them is to act as co-debtor for security purposes. In ENGLAND, a co-debtor may assume the role of a security provider by virtue of a security agreement with the other debtor: both co-debtors agree internally that one of them is to act as a security provider only, while the whole burden ultimately is to fall on the other debtor (cf. Goode, Commercial Law 800; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 1-29 s.). This agreement is effective as between the co-debtors from the outset (cf. Halsburypara. 1015, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008)); the creditor, however, is bound to treat the debtor who has assumed the position of a security provider as a security provider only on becoming aware of this agreement (cf. Rouse v. Bradford Banking Co. Ltd. [1894] AC 586); Goldfarb v. Bartlett [1920] 1 KB 639). That the co-debtors may in this way unilaterally affect the creditor's position vis-à-vis the debtor who becomes a security provider has met strong criticism in the literature (cf. Goode, Commercial Law 800).

12. The AUSTRIAN Supreme Court also recognised an agreement between two solidarily liable co-debtors according to which one of them in future should merely act for security purposes. Since the creditor had not been informed, the new co-debtor for security purposes remained fully liable towards the creditor when the other co-debtor was unable to perform. Upon performance by the co-debtor for security purposes, the creditor's proprietary security rights passed to the performing co-debtor as in the case of performance by a dependent security provider (OGH 28 May 1969, ÖJZ 1969, 551).

(b) Interpretation of contractual terms

13. In deciding whether an instrument creates a dependent suretyship or a solidary co-debtorship, FRENCH courts enjoy a considerable degree of freedom according to NCPC art. 12. In a case where a housewife assumed a loan with which her husband as mere co-debtor financed his business, a first-instance court requalified the loan as a dependent personal security which was void due to lack of the required form (CFI Lons-le-Saulnier 18 November 1997, CCC April 1998 no. 64 with approving note). In another case a claim, although brought on the basis of a dependent security, was allowed as a claim on the basis of co-debtorship (Cass.civ. 22 June 1982, Bull.civ. 1982 I no. 233 p. 199). Where the contract uses the ambiguous term "with solidarity", the appellate court's qualification as co-debtorship was accepted (Cass. 17 November 1999, JCP G 2000 IV no. 1002). In other circumstances, the courts have denied such requalification if the contractual terms were unambiguous (Cass. 10 December 1991, Bull.civ. 1991 I no. 347 p. 227). Two FRENCH cases dealt with terms on AMEX credit cards issued to employees of a company, on the latter's application for use in the services of the company and reimbursed by the latter; according to a term of the contract the employee was to become co-debtor vis-à-vis the issuer of the credit card company. After insolvency proceedings over the assets of the two companies had been opened, the courts upheld the credit card company's claims against the employees, although the form for a dependent personal security had not been observed (Cass. Civ. 22 May 1991, Bull.civ. 1991 I no.162 p. 107) and the creditor had not notified its claim against the company to the latter's insolvency administrator (CA Paris 5 June 1992, JCP E 1993, Pan. no.176).

(c) Objective criteria

14. Without agreement of the parties, in many EUROPEAN legal systems the main criterion for qualifying a co-debtorship as being assumed for security purpose is the absence of a personal interest of the co-debtor as security provider in the performance of the debtor's "secured" obligation to the creditor (BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 1216; FRANCE: Cass.civ. 21 July 1987, Bull.civ. 1987 I no. 249 p. 182; Cass.civ. 22 May 1991, Bull.civ. 1991 I no. 162 p. 107; Simler no. 28: "co-débiteur non intéressé à la dette"). The same is true in ITALY; CC art. 1298(1) uses the criterion that the contract is concluded in the "exclusive interest" of one of the contracting parties.

15. GERMAN and AUSTRIAN practice have reached similar results. The GERMAN Federal Supreme Court holds that a co-debtor who has personal interests in the granting of the credit and who may influence the decision about the paying out and the use of the loaned money is a co-debtor without security purposes, whereas a co-debtor who does not enjoy equal rights is a debtor for security purposes only; a merely indirect interest is irrelevant (BGH 14 November 2000, BGHZ 146, 37, 41 s.; BGH 4 December 2001, NJW 2002, 744). In AUSTRIA, in cases of doubt, courts and writers similarly use the co-debtor's economic interest in achieving the purposes of the principal debtor as a criterion: if such economic interest is lacking, the co-debtorship is for security purposes only (OGH 19 July 1988, SZ 61 no. 174, ÖBA 1989, 432 note Bydlinski; OGH 4 February 1993, ÖBA 1993, 819 note Bydlinski; already OGH 30 June 1960, ÖRiZ 1961, 45; Bydlinski 27–28). In special cases, even a merely personal reason, such as assistance to a close, but poor relative in order to enable proper defence in a criminal proceeding, has been recognized as supporting a full-fledged co-debtorship (OGH 19 July 1988, above). By contrast, a merely moral interest in supporting a debt of a dissolved company does not qualify as a cumulative assumption of debt, but is a suretyship (which in this case, due to lack of the required written form, was invalid: OGH 7 April 1976, SZ 49 no. 53). Also under the DUTCH CC it has been concluded that, where one of the two co-debtors is the only beneficiary under a contract, the other co-debtor may recoup any performance rendered to the creditor (Asser*Hartkamp* IV 1 no.117).

(d) Subsequent cumulative assumption of another person's debt

16. In those EUROPEAN countries where specific legal institutions for the subsequent cumulative assumption of debt are known it is generally acknowledged that these institutions may function like, and can then be considered as, a personal security.

17. In GREECE the subsequent cumulative assumption of debt which is the contractual promise of a third party to pay to the creditor the debt of another (cf. CC art. 477), must be distinguished from the promise of a third party to the debtor to discharge the latter (cf. CC art. 478). Several criteria have been proposed for this distinction, including the security purpose: when it is the purpose of the contract to provide security to the creditor and to reinforce the obligations of the original debtor, the contract is to be qualified as personal security, whereas when the intervening third party has an immediate personal interest in the performance of the debt and this is perceived by the creditor, then the contract is regarded as a subsequent cumulative assumption of debt (Georgiades § 7 no. 61 ss.; ErmAK/Michaelides-Nouaros art. 477 no. 11; CA Athens 10465/1978, NoB 27, 979). Cases of doubt are resolved, by GREEK literature, as personal security (ErmAK/Michaelides-Nouaros, art. 477 no. 11; Zepos A 644); by the courts, however, as a subsequent cumulative assumption of debt (CA Athens 4592/1972, ArchN 25, 138). None of these criteria, however, is deemed satisfactory by a minority opinion (cf. Kallimopoulos 1523 ss.).

18. In FRANCE, the cumulative assumption of the debt by a new debtor does not primarily serve a security purpose. Rather, it is mostly used as a simplified means of payment: the new debtor by performing to the creditor performs both an obligation assumed towards the initial debtor and the debt of the initial debtor towards the creditor (cf. Malaurie and Aynès/Aynès and Crocq no. 323; Cabrillac and Mouly no. 473-2). But the subsequent cumulative assumption of debt functions as a security if the parties so agree and if the new debtor has no interest in the performance of the obligation towards the creditor (Larroumet/François no. 487; Malaurie and Aynès/Aynès and Crocq no. 323; Cabrillac and Mouly no. 473-3: "délégation-sûreté"; contra Billiau no. 7 s.: for in this case the subsequent cumulative assumption of debt disappears). Thus FRENCH court practice admits the validity of the cumulative assumption of debt irrespective of any obligation of the new debtor to the initial debtor (Cass.com. 21 June 1994, Bull.civ. 1994 IV no. 225 p. 176; RTD civ. 1995, 113 note Mestre).

19. In ITALY the similarity of the institutions of cumulative assumption of another person's debt with a personal security is increased by the fact that the original debtor's liability is merely subsidiary (see no. 10 above and Cicala 288 s.). However, the special feature is that the law itself determines the person of the security provider and that against expectation the original debtor's obligation is reduced to being subsidiary rather than that of the subsequent new debtor. Nevertheless, ITALIAN authors and courts try to distinguish between subsequent assumption of another person's debt, on the one hand, and dependent personal security, on the other hand. They point out the differences in legal structure and in causa existing between the two institutions (Cass. 5 March 1973 no. 609, Giust.civ. 1973 I 937; Cass. 24 March 1979 no. 1715, Giur.it.Mass. 1979, 456; Cass. 20 February 1982 no. 1081, Foro it.Mass. 1982, 239). One relevant criterion is whether the contract of subsequent cumulative assumption of debt is gratuitous or not. If it is non-gratuitous, it should be qualified as an assumption of a debt together with the existing debtor and not as a dependent personal security (Di Sabato 497). If, on the contrary, the subsequent assumption of debt is gratuitous, the creation of a security is the only purpose of the operation and the new co-debtor has no relevant personal interest in the performance of the obligation; it will be qualified as a dependent personal security (Rescigno, Delegazione 953).

20. In PORTUGAL, although the subsequent assumption of debt conceptually differs from the contract of dependent personal security, it is recognised that in practice this distinction may become uncertain (Almeida Costa 764) because the co-debtor(s) may pretend to assume in substance a personal security (Vaz Serra, Note on acordão de 17. 10. 1975, at 294). According to case law, the distinction is a matter of interpretation of the contract, basically depending on the existence of a personal interest of the new debtor in the obligation: in this case, the agreement will be qualified as an assumption of debt; otherwise, and if only a personal interest to help the original debtor is to be detected in the agreement, the latter will be regarded as a personal security (STJ 6 May 2004 no. 2294/03; 12 December 1995 no. 8131/93: www.dgsi.pt).

V. Co-debtorship for security purposes: prerequisites and effects

(a) Prerequisites

21. An important attraction of any co-debtorship and therefore also of one for security purposes is a negative one: the validity of such a co-debtorship does not depend upon any formal requirement (cf. the provisions mentioned above no. 2) – as is usually established for a dependent personal security (cf. the court practice cited in national notes to IV.G.–4:104 (Form) no. 20). However, in AUSTRIA which has most strongly adapted the general rules on co-debtorship to purposes of security, this freedom from form requirements has generally been criticised since the risk for co-debtors for security purposes is at least as high as, if not even higher than, that for a provider of a dependent personal security (AUSTRIA: Bydlinski 27, 29, 30 with references); for the same reason, also some GERMAN authors plead for the written form (MünchKomm/Möschel, no. 13 preceding § 414; Harke, ZBB 2004, 147 ss.), but the majority is against it (Palandt/Heinrichs no. 3 preceding § 414 with references).

(b) Effects initial co-debtorship

22. In BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG, the liability of a solidarily liable co-debtor deviates from the merely subsidiary liability of a dependent security provider. Thus even the co-debtor who has no personal interest in the performance of the contract remains liable towards the creditor as a co-debtor (Cass.civ. 21 July 1987, Bull.civ. 1987 I no. 249 p. 182; Cass.civ. 22 May 1991, Bull.civ. 1991 I no. 162 p. 107; Simler no. 27). Nor can personal defences of the other co-debtor be raised by the solidary co-debtor (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1208; cf. Simler no. 27), also contrary to the rules on dependent personal securities. Further, the solidary co-debtor is not discharged if the creditor by acts or omissions thwarts the co-debtor's right of subrogation to rights against another co-debtor (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2037-since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2314 – CA Versailles 20 February 1991, JCP G 1992 I no. 3583 (9), note Simler). Only in the internal relationship between the co-debtors is the solidarily liable co-debtor, who has no personal interest in the performance of the contract, expressly considered as a provider of dependent personal security (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1216; cf. Simler no. 27) and consequently has full recourse against the other co-debtor for all amounts paid to the creditor.

23. In AUSTRIA and GERMANY, the starting point virtually is the same as in the FRANCOPHONIC countries (preceding no. 22). However, in the two GERMANOPHONIC countries, courts and writers have in varying degrees adapted the general rules on co-debtorship in order to serve more properly the special function of the co-debtorship for security purposes (AUSTRIA: short survey in Bydlinski 26-30; GERMANY: broad survey in Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten nos. 1579-1607). According to court practice, the co-debtor for security purposes is solidarily liable with the other (full) co-debtor (contra in GERMANY: Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten no. 1598 for consumer co-debtors against prevailing opinion (cf. MünchKomm/Habersack no. 15 preceding § 765)). This differs from the ordinary rule on the merely subsidiary liability of the provider of a dependent security (cf. national notes on IV.G.–2:106 (). Personal defences of the co-debtor which have not been raised by it, cannot be invoked by the co-debtor for security purposes (AUSTRIA: Bydlinski 28; GERMANY: Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten no. 1603), again contrary to the rules on dependent personal security (cf. national notes on IV.G.–2:103). According to another departure from these latter rules, the co-debtor for security purposes cannot object to the creditor that the latter had prevented or diminished rights on which the co-debtor could have relied upon performance (GERMANY: Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten no. 1604), whereas in AUSTRIA the Supreme Court has admitted this exception (OGH 29 April 1992, ÖBA 1993, 64; OGH 14 April 1996, ÖBA 1996, 893). For the internal relationship between the (main) debtor and the debtor acting for security purposes, the general rules on recourse between co-debtors are applicable (GERMANY: Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten nos. 1605 s.: the co-debtor for security purposes can fully recover from the (main) debtor, while the latter is not entitled to any recovery).

24. According to the absolutely dominant view in GREECE, the "additional" obligation of the new debtor is solidary (joint and several) with that of the initial debtor and has no accessory character: the obligation of the new co-debtor does not depend upon the obligation of the initial debtor, but evolves separately (Georgiades § 7 no. 57; Theodoropoulos 58; CA Athens 5557/1993, NoB 41, 1097). Hence, the new debtor, in contrast to the provider of personal security (cf. CC art. 851), is not liable for the principal debt at any given point in time. Also as far as reimbursement is concerned, in the case of a subsequent assumption of debt each co-debtor who has satisfied the creditor is entitled ex lege to claim reimbursement from the others (cf. GREEK CC art. 487), even if there is no underlying relationship between the co-debtors (Zepos A 313-314). The co-debtor will be deprived of the right to reimbursement only if this can be deduced from a special underlying relationship (Tampakis 426; Kallimopoulos 1520). On the contrary, in a contract of security, the provider of personal security is entitled to reimbursement only if such right can be deduced from the underlying relationship (Georgiades § 7 no. 59). Hence, the plaintiff co-debtor does not have to prove the existence of the underlying relationship in order to exercise the right to reimbursement or recourse, whereas the defendant co-debtor bears the burden of proving the existence of a special underlying relationship denying any right of recourse and has to rebut the presumption of CC art. 487 (Tampakis 427; contra, Zepos A 315 fn. 3); on the contrary, the plaintiff provider of security must prove the existence of an underlying relationship in order to claim reimbursement or recourse (cf. CC art. 858; Tampakis 427).

(c) Subsequent cumulative assumption of another person's debt

25. In BELGIUM and FRANCE the prohibition on invoking any defence derived from the relationship between the original debtor and the creditor is one of the reasons for denying the délégation the character of a dependent personal security (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 876–877; FRANCE: Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations no. 1295). In FRANCE many authors plead for an exception if in the absence of an agreed definite amount of the debt the new debtor is obliged to pay the debt of the initial debtor (Malaurie and Aynès/Aynès and Crocq, Les sûretés no. 324 relying on Cass.civ. 17 March 1992, JCP G 1992, II no. 21922; Marty, Raynaud and Jestaz II no. 435; Planiol and Ripert/Esmein no. 269).

26. In GREECE the principle of accessority is to some extent applied and is in cases of subsequent assumption of special importance since the co-debtor assumes the debt in the state and with all the principal debtor's objections as at the time of assumption; the co-debtor may not, however, set off a claim of the principal debtor against the creditor

(cf. GREEK CC art. 472 read with 473(1) and (2), by an extension of the rules on the assumption of debt in order to discharge the original debtor). Also in GERMANY the subsequent assumption of an obligation is only valid if the primary obligation exists; however, its further fate is not necessarily bound up with that of the primary obligation. It is controversial whether the subsequently assumed obligation depends upon and is subsidiary to the primarily assumed obligation (against Staudinger/Horn no. 363 preceding §§ 765 ss.; forcefully pro: Schürnbrand 118-126; against dependency, but for subsidiarity, generally Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten nos. 1598, 1602 s.).

(d) Classification dependent personal security

27. According to DANISH authors referring to the Promissory Note Act § 2 concerning plurality of debtors, "a person who assumes an obligation towards a creditor in order to secure the debtor's obligation is not an additional debtor, but a provider of personal security" (Karnov/Møgelvang-Hansen 5558 fn. 8; likewise Ussing, Kaution 12 s.) Also in the NETHERLANDS, co-debtorship for security purposes and dependent personal security are closely associated with each other, although proceeding from the other side. According to the new CC art. 7:850(3), dependent personal security is subject to the rules on plurality of debtors, except in so far as the code does not establish special rules on dependent personal security!

(e) Independent personal security

28. For several FRENCH authors, the subsequent cumulative assumption of debt constitutes an independent personal security, if the new debtor is obliged to pay a definite sum (Malaurie and Aynès/Aynès and Crocq, Les sûretés no. 324 ; Larroumet/François no. 326). Furthermore, the prohibition to raise any exceptions from the underlying relationships confirms the independent character of this assumption of debt (Cabrillac and Mouly no.473-4; Malaurie and Aynès/Aynès and Crocq, Les sûretés no. 324; further references in Simler no. 897). However, protective judicial measures can be invoked by a co-debtor in the case of a subsequent cumulative assumption of debt in order to refuse performance, which is contrary to the first demand character of an independent personal security (Simler no. 898). Simler has carefully pointed out not only some similarities but also several dissimilarities of a subsequent co-debtorship as compared with an independent personal security (Simler nos. 897 s.).

(f) Special instrument of security

29. Under GERMAN law the subsequent cumulative assumption of debt for purposes of security is a special instrument of security that is neither a dependent nor an independent personal security. Contrary to the characteristics of a dependent personal security, the co-debtor assumes vis-à-vis the creditor a personal (primary and independent) obligation as of the time of the assumption (cf. Reinicke and Tiedtke, Kreditsicherung 1, 5, 14; it may therefore be called a "semi-accessory security"). The issuer of an independent personal security assumes the responsibility that the original debtor will perform (pay a certain amount of money), whether or not this amount is due. Some voices plead for recognising co-debtorship for security purposes as a special institution, combining characteristics of both (Schürnbrand 194-198; Madaus 327–329, with proposals for specific legislative rules).

30. In FRANCE, such a great authority as Simler no. 897 s. seems to tend in the same direction.

VI. Additional rules on plurality of debtors

31. Cf. national notes to IV.G.–1:105 (Several security providers: solidary liability towards creditor) as well as to Chapters 2 and 4.

IV.G.–1:105: Several security providers: solidary liability towards creditor

(1) To the extent that several providers of personal security have secured the right to performance of the same obligation or the same part of an obligation or have assumed their undertakings for the same security purpose, each security provider assumes within the limits of that security provider's undertaking to the creditor solidary liability together with the other security providers. This rule also applies if these security providers in assuming their securities have acted independently.

(2) Paragraph (1) applies with appropriate adaptations if proprietary security has been provided by the debtor or a third person in addition to the personal security.

COMMENTS

A. Context and scope

This Article and the next two Articles form, as the partly identical titles indicate, a complex but coherent set of rules dealing with the special problems which arise if there are several security providers. In this situation, the first issue is the kind of liability that exists between the several security providers towards the creditor. This is dealt with in the present Article. The second issue arises after one of the security providers has made payments to the creditor: can the payer have recourse against the other security providers and for how much? This is dealt with in IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse). The third issue is whether and for how much the security providers who have satisfied recourse claims by other security providers can have recourse against the debtor. This is dealt with in IV.G.–1:107 (Several security providers: recourse against debtor). All these provisions apply also to a co-debtorship for security purpose, cf. IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for security purposes).

B. Several providers of personal security

Basic rule. If several persons assume a personal security in favour of a creditor, their liability may be divided or solidary. If the secured obligation amounts to 40.000 and security providers A and B have divided liability, creditor C has a right to 20.000 from each (III.–4:102 (Solidary, divided and joint obligations) paragraph (2); III.–4:104 (Liability under divided obligations)). By contrast, if they are solidarily liable, C may demand the full amount of 40.000 from either A or B (III.–4:102 (Solidary, divided and joint obligations) paragraph (1)), whoever appears to be more solvent, and can leave the payer to seek recourse from the other (III.–4:106 (Apportionment between solidary debtors); III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors).

The present Article opts for solidary liability. This is the default rule for the liability of two or more debtors to perform the same obligation (III.–4:103 (When different types of obligation arise) and in the present situation will correspond to the expectations of the parties. Each provider of personal security must assume the risk of being held fully responsible; and this is also in the interest of the creditor. The principle of solidary liability of several personal security providers seems to be generally recognised. Of course, the parties may agree to deviate from this general rule.

There is less unanimity with respect to the question whether solidary liability exists, even if the several contracts of personal security have been assumed independently from each other, especially at various times. However, distinctions as to time or occasions neither make sense nor are they practicable. In reality, all personal security providers are in the same boat and should share the same risk (paragraph (1) sentence 2).

"Same obligation" or "same security purpose". This alternative is based upon the basic distinction in this Part between dependent and independent personal securities. Obviously, the first part of the pair of words refers to dependent securities and the second part to independent securities.

"Within the limits of that security provider's undertaking". This formula has both a quantitative and a qualitative meaning.

As far as quantity is concerned, a personal security provider may have secured parts only of the same obligation; in this case, paragraph (1) only applies, if and in so far as the various part securities cover the same portion of the secured obligation. In the latter case, the two part security providers are liable as solidary debtors (paragraph (1) sentence 1) unless otherwise provided.

Illustration 1a
For a credit of 3 million, A assumes a security for 1,5 million and B for 0.5 million. Up to 0.5 million, A and B are liable solidarily.

Illustration 1b
As in Illustration 1 a, but the debtor has paid 2 million on his debt. The creditor may then demand all of the remaining 1 million from A; or he may demand up to 0,5 million from B and the remaining amount from A; or he may divide his claim in any other proportion as between A and B, but only within the maxima which A and B, respectively, have agreed as their upper limit of liability.

Illustration 2
For a credit of 3 million, A assumes a security with a maximum amount of 3 million and B a security for any amount surpassing the first 2 million. A and B are solidary debtors for any amount that exceeds 2 million.

As far as the quality of the undertaking is concerned, the security provider may have assumed vis-à-vis the creditor not a solidary liability with the debtor but a merely subsidiary liability (cf. IV.G.–2:105 (Solidary liability of security provider) and IV.G.–2:106 (Subsidiary liability of security provider); in particular, according to IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (b) a security assumed by a consumer creates only a subsidiary liability. The merely subsidiary liability of one or more security providers does not affect the liability of any additional security providers.

C. Personal and proprietary security providers

Paragraph (2) deals with the relatively novel issue of a plurality of personal and proprietary security providers.

Illustration 3
C's credit to D is secured by a proprietary security right encumbering the shares of D in company Z and also by a personal security provided by D's friend F.

Most writers start from the principle that the two groups of security providers should be treated equally. The creditor (and not the law) should be free to choose, according to the circumstances, which of the several security providers to turn to first.

The minority view would establish primary liability of proprietary and only subsidiary liability of personal security providers. It is based upon the idea that personal security, since it charges all the assets of a person, is more risky and therefore deserves more protection by attaching only a subsidiary liability to it. However, this view is not convincing. In fact, the limits between the impact of the two types of security are fluid, depending upon the circumstances. On the one hand, proprietary security may cover virtually all the security provider's assets while; on the other hand, a personal security for a low amount may in fact burden only a small portion of the security provider's property.

NOTES

I. Types of liability in case of plurality of providers of personals security

(a) Overview

1. For the existence and shape of solidary liability in the different member states in general reference is made to the national notes on III.–4:102 (Solidary, divided and joint obligations).
2. The liability of several persons providing personal security for the same debt or part thereof may in all national systems take the different forms described in III.–4:102 (Solidary, divided and joint obligations): it may be divided (pro rata, several, separate) or solidary (in solidum, joint and several). Which of these types is applied under the national systems may depend upon several circumstances, which will be discussed in detail below.
3. The exact shape of the solidary liability of providers of security in the case of a plurality of providers of personal security under the national systems is highly diversified: whereas there may be full solidary liability covering both the external relationship as against the creditor and the internal relationship upon recourse between the providers of security, there may also be a mere external solidarity of the providers of security but divided liability in their internal relationship (for details of the latter, see the national notes on the following Article). The present Article deals only with the external relationship between the creditor on the one side and the providers of security on the other side.

(b) Intention of the parties – solidary liability within the limits of each security provider's undertaking

4. In general, the intention of the parties as found upon proper construction of the contract is the most important factor (ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett no. 4-011; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn § 769 no. 7 with further references: agreement of the parties is possible). In the absence of a contractual stipulation, there are presumptions as to the type of liability applicable (see nos. 6 ss. below).
5. It follows from the general emphasis on the agreement of the parties to the security transaction that the liability of each security provider is restricted to that security provider's undertaking and thus the solidarity of several providers of security is limited to that part of the obligation for which at least two of the security providers have assumed liability (AUSTRIA: CC § 1359 first sentence; Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1359 no. 1; DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 102; ENGLAND: Ellesmere Brewery v. Cooper [1896] 1 QB 75 (CFI); FINLAND: LDepGuar § 31 para 1 read with § 5; RP 189/1998 rd 70; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn § 769 no. 13).

(c) Differentiation between co-securities and independently assumed securities

6. Some countries differentiate between the circumstances of contracting: simultaneously assumed personal securities (co-securities) are treated differently from personal securities that are assumed at different times. In most countries which make that differentiation the liability of co-providers of security is solidary (ENGLAND/IRELAND: White v. Tyndall (1888) 13 App.Cas. 263 (HL(Irl))) for all cases of plurality of sureties. In ENGLAND, if the promise is made simultaneously by two or more providers of security, clear words of severance are necessary to render the security providers' liability divided (cf. White v. Tyndall (1888) 13 App.Cas. 263 (HL(Irl)); The Argo Hellas [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep 296, 300 (CFI)). The situation is similar in IRELAND (Donnelly 420). By contrast, the liability of the providers of security will be separate if they have acted independently or successively without making reference to the other security provider's promise (Andrews and Millett no. 4-011).

7. In ITALY solidary liability is the general rule for co-securities; it arises also when the several security providers, in assuming their obligations, did not act simultaneously, but in the view of a common interest. However, it is possible for the parties to agree on the so-called beneficium divisionis (CC art. 1946), i.e. the right of the security provider who is solidarily liable to limit liability to the proportionate share of the secured obligation only when being called for the payment of the whole obligation by the creditor (CC art. 1947). If securities are assumed by a plurality of security providers without the intention to realise a common interest, the liability of the several security providers is separate; nevertheless, as in the former case, the security provider who first pays the creditor is subrogated to the creditor's rights against the other security providers (Cass. 6 May 2004 no. 685, Riv.Notar. 2005, 333; Giusti 210; Fragali, Confideiussione 196 s.).

8. In PORTUGAL the rules on solidary debtors (CC art. 518, 527) apply with the necessary exceptions to independently assumed personal securities relating to the same debt, unless the beneficium divisionis has been agreed (CC art. 649 para 1). In the case of jointly assumed personal securities, on the other hand, each one of the providers of security can exercise the beneficium divisionis. However, each of the providers of security is proportionally liable for the share of the co-provider of security who is insolvent or against whom no demands or executions can be made in PORTUGAL (CC art. 649 paras 2 and 3 read with 640 lit. b).

9. In SPAIN, on the other hand, co-providers of security have a divided liability, unless expressly agreed otherwise. CC art. 1837 para 1 establishes the so-called mancomunidad in the following terms: "When there are several providers of security of only one debtor and for one debt only, the obligation of responding therefor shall be divided among all. The creditor can only demand from each surety his corresponding share, unless solidarity has been expressly stipulated" (Lacruz Berdejo 537; Guilarte Zapatero, Notas sobre la cofianza 891 s.; Díez-Picazo 446). Again, these rules are not applicable to independently assumed personal securities.

(d) General presumption in favour of solidary liability regardless of circumstances of contracting

10. In several countries there is a general presumption for solidary liability (AUSTRIA: for dependent personal securities cf. CC § 1359; for independent personal securities cf. Avancini/Iro/Koziol nos. 3/124–3/125; DENMARK: Promissory Note Act §§ 2, 61; Andersen, Termn, Edlund a.o./Pedersen 437 s.; DUTCH CC art. 7:850 para 3 read with art. 6:6 para 2; Asser/Hartkamp no. 95 at p. 78; FINLAND: LDepGuar § 3 para 3; HD 3 Jan. 1996, KKO 1996:1; GERMANY: cf. CC § 769 for dependent personal securities; GREEK CC art. 854; SWEDEN: Law of Commerce Chap. 10 § 11 read with Promissory Note Act § 2; Ekström 73).

11. This presumption applies regardless of whether the providers of security have acted jointly and whether they had knowledge of the other securities (GERMANY: BGH 24 Sept. 1992, NJW 1992, 2287; Erman/Ehmann § 421 no. 46; Erman/Herrmann § 769 no. 1) and leads to the application of the general rules on solidary liability (GERMAN CC §§ 421–425; GREEK CC arts. 482–488). According to GREEK opinion, however, there should be no solidarity where there is more than one personal security with a maximum amount which is lower than the total amount of the secured claim (Georgiades § 3 nos. 119-120 and § 4 nos. 3-4).

12. A similar presumption applies in the ROMANIC countries. In FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG (CC art. 2025 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2302)) each of several providers of security can be called upon to pay the whole debt ("obligation au tout"). A solidary liability in the strict sense, however, can be presumed only if the providers of security are merchants (FRANCE: Cass.com. 21 April 1980, Bull.civ. 1980 IV no. 158 p. 123; by contrast, Law no. 94-126 of 11 Feb. 1994 art. 47 para 2 (loi Madelin) prohibits solidary liability in the case of indefinite security assumed by a natural person guaranteeing a professional debt of an individual enterprise; BELGIUM: Declerck-Goldfracht no. 15). However, the creditor is free to demand partial performance from each security provider separately (BELGIAN, FRENCH CC art. 2027 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2304); Van Quickenborne no. 390).

(e) Beneficium divisionis

13. In most of the ROMANIC countries the providers of security can invoke the beneficium divisionis (cf. no. 7 above; BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2026 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2303)); according to PORTUGUESE CC art. 649, if the security had been assumed in common) resulting in divided liability of the providers of security (Van Quickenborne no. 392). In ITALY the beneficium divisionis has to be explicitly agreed upon by the parties (CC art. 1947 para 1), similarly in PORTUGAL, if the personal securities have been independently assumed (CC art. 649 para 1). In the other ROMANIC countries this right is always available unless solidary liability is expressly agreed upon. The situation is similar in SCOTLAND (cf. Wilson nos. 28.1, 10.1; Bell § 267). The right has to be invoked explicitly (Van Quickenborne no. 396) and only the security provider who invokes it benefits from the division (Van Quickenborne no. 402). If a co-provider of security is insolvent at the time of invoking the right, the liability of the other providers of security increases proportionally (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2026 para 2 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2303 para 2); ITALIAN CC art. 1947 para 2; Giusti 216; PORTUGUESE CC art. 649 para 2 (see no. 8 above); SPANISH CC art. 1844 sentence 1).

14. The new DUTCH Civil Code does not provide a beneficium divisionis any more, as it appeared that in practice contracting parties mostly had excluded it. Parties are free, though, to expressly agree on the beneficium (Blomkwist no. 41 at p. 67–68).

II. Application to co-debtors for security purposes

15. The principles set out above for the case of plurality of providers of security are equally applicable to cases of co-debtorship for security purposes and situations where there is a co-debtor for security purposes besides a security provider. In ENGLISH law, this result follows from the fact that a co-debtor who agrees with the other (principal) debtor to act as surety only is treated as a normal security provider (cf. national notes to IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for security purposes) no. 11). Under GERMAN law co-debtors, like providers of personal security, may agree with the creditor upon the type and details of their liability (cf. Reinicke and Tiedtke, Kreditsicherung 15). In the absence of any agreement several co-debtors are solidarily liable (Erman/Ehmann § 421 no. 47). See generally as to the type of the security provider's liability under a co-debtorship for security purposes in the different member states notes to IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for security purposes) nos. 22 ss.

III. Personal and proprietary security

(a) Solidary liability

16. In ENGLAND often, even though not always, a person granting proprietary security for another person's debt in the same document also assumes a personal security (Lingard 154). Regardless of whether a security provider grants a proprietary security or assumes a personal security, it is regarded as a surety (Halsbury/Salter para 105; Andrews and Millett no. 1-001). Therefore providers of personal and proprietary security may be solidarily liable. The same is true for FINLAND (LDepGuar § 41 refers for third party proprietary providers of security, inter alia, to § 3 para 3, cf. no. 10 ss. above). Similarly, in FRANCE and BELGIUM a third party granting proprietary security is known as "caution réelle/zakelijke borg" (FRANCE: Cass.com. 7 March 2006, Bull.civ. 2006 IV no. 59 p. 59; Cass.ch.mixte 2 Dec. 2005, Bull.civ. 2005 ch.mixte no. 7 p. 17, JCP G 2005 II no. 10183; the Grimaldi Commission's proposed CC art. 2295 ("Le cautionnement réel est une sûreté réelle constituée pour garantir la dette d´autrui") has not, however, been adopted by the legislation of 2006; Simler no. 20; BELGIUM: T´Kint no. 718). Such security is regarded as proprietary security in relation to the creditor (FRANCE: Cass.com. 7 March 2006, above, confirming Cass.ch.mixte 2 Dec. 2005, also above; it is possible, however, that the provider of a proprietary security in addition also assumes a personal security: Cass.com. 21 March 2006, Bull.civ. 2006 IV no. 72 p. 71). The exercise of the beneficium divisionis is excluded (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 70; FRANCE: Simler nos. 22 and 510). Therefore providers of personal and of proprietary security are solidarily liable.

(b) Quasi solidarity

17. In GERMAN and SPANISH law the liability of providers of personal and proprietary security is technically not regarded as solidary because of the different content of the obligations or claims. However, the same results are achieved since the courts regard all providers of security as quasi solidarily liable (GERMANY: BGH 29 June 1989, BGHZ 108, 179, 183 and 187, confirming BGH 14 July 1988, BGHZ 105, 154, 158; BGH 24 Sept. 1992, NJW 1992, 3228; implicitly approving e.g. Palandt/Heinrichs § 426 no. 2; different view Erman/Ehmann § 421 nos. 40 s.; SPAIN: Díez-Picazo 445).

IV. Ranking of the creditor's claims against different providers of security

(a) Creditor's free choice

18. In most countries the creditor generally has the choice from which of the several providers of personal and proprietary security it will demand performance or payment (AUSTRIA: OGH 20 June 1984, SZ 57 no. 114 565-566; Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1360 no. 1; BELGIUM: Dirix and De Corte no. 27; DENMARK: Rørdam and Carstensen 40 s.; Højrup 52; Ussing, Kaution 87; ENGLAND: Re Bank of Credit and Commerce International S.A. [1998] AC 214, 222 (HL); Jackson v. Digby (1854) 2 WR 540 (HL); FRANCE: the creditor is not obliged to first call upon the "caution réelle", Cass.com. 10 Nov. 1981, D. 1982, 417; Simler no. 510; GERMANY: BGH 29 April 1997, WM 1997, 1247, 1249; Reinicke and Tiedtke, Kreditsicherung 395; ITALY: the principle of free choice of the creditor is clearly expressed only in relation to several providers of personal security: Ravazzoni 263; Giusti 212; NETHERLANDS: while the principle of free choice is often made subject to the demands of good faith, this has not yet been utilised to negate a creditor's choice, H.R. 24 April 1992, NJ 1992 no. 463 with note Snijders, H., NTBR 1993, 163, 166; CA Hertogenbosch 3 Oct. 1994, NJ 1995 no. 357; SCOTLAND: Ewart v. Latta (1865) 37 Sc Jur 418; 1865 SC 36 (HL (Sc))).

(b) Restrictions

19. Legal ranking may, however, result from the rules on the subsidiary liability of providers of dependent personal security. Yet these rules are subject to several exceptions so that in practice even the provider of a dependent security with subsidiary liability will very often not be entitled to demand from the creditor the prior enforcement of other securities (for details see national notes to IV.G.–2:106 (Subsidiary liability of security provider) nos. 13 ss.).

20. In SWEDEN, if the third party's liability under the security is subsidiary, the creditor must in dubio first enforce against the debtor's proprietary security (Walin, Borgen 150). The legal situation is more uncertain if a third person has granted a proprietary security and another security provider a subsidiary personal security. Walin seems to prefer that a proprietary security pledged by a third party is fully liable towards providers of personal security, although he also expresses the contrary opinion (317-320). There is no relevant Supreme Court decision (as to the principles, cf. HD 10 Nov. 1981, NJA 1981, 1104). There are, however, cases where a proprietary security provider is treated less favourably than a provider of personal security. E.g. in HD 18 Feb. 1987, NJA 1987, 80 primary liability was assumed although a personal security provider in dubio is liable only subsidiarily. Many other SCANDINAVIAN authors think that providers of personal and proprietary security in principle should be treated equally (cf. Walin, Borgen 317 fn. 15).

21. In FINLAND a free choice exists in case of a solidary personal security and proprietary security granted by the debtor if the parties have agreed on a so-called "supplementary security" (LDepGuar § 2 no. 4). There is such a security if the main purpose of the secured credit is the acquisition or repair of a house or vacation place and this serves as security for the credit (§ 3 para 2). Besides, the parties are free to agree against which of the several providers of security the creditor should turn first.

22. In GREECE, ITALY and SPAIN there is no straightforward rule regarding the relationship between personal and proprietary security (see for ITALY also no. 18 above). In GREECE, the creditor in general has the right to choose the security which seems more suitable for obtaining satisfaction; this right is not without limits and subject to the so-called duty of vigilance, especially if the creditor is a bank (cf. Doublis, Metavivasi pistosis 122-123). By contrast, in PORTUGAL the relationship between personal and proprietary security is regulated by CC art. 639, though the parties may agree otherwise. The provider of dependent personal security with beneficium discussionis (i.e. with subsidiary liability; see national notes on IV.G.–2:106 (Subsidiary liability of security provider) no. 9) may demand from the creditor first to seek satisfaction from a provider of proprietary security securing the same debt and created prior to or contemporaneously with the dependent personal security. However, if the proprietary security also secures other claims of the same creditor, this rule only applies if the value of the proprietary security is sufficient to satisfy all claims. Literally, CC art. 639 only refers to proprietary securities on a contractual basis, but it may be applied to proprietary securities created by operation of law as well (Almeida Costa 776).

23. In ENGLAND, the free choice of the creditor from whom to demand performance can in appropriate situations be affected by the equitable doctrine of marshalling. This equitable right serves to ensure that one creditor does not deprive another creditor of that other's due portion of the debtor's estate. When e.g. the creditor demands performance from the provider of personal security, the latter may compel the creditor, if the latter has a claim upon two funds in respect of the secured debt, only one of which the provider of personal security can use, to resort to the other first (cf. Halsbury/Salter para 226; see generally Ali, passim).

IV.G.–1:106: Several security providers: internal recourse

(1) In the cases covered by the preceding Article recourse between several providers of personal security or between providers of personal security and of proprietary security is governed by III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors), subject to the following paragraphs.

(2) Subject to paragraph (8), the proportionate share of each security provider for the purposes of that Article is determined according to the rules in paragraphs (3) to (7).

(3) Unless the security providers have otherwise agreed, as between themselves each security provider is liable in the same proportion that the maximum risk assumed by that security provider bore to the total of the maximum risks assumed by all the security providers. The relevant time is that of the creation of the last security.

(4) For personal security, the maximum risk is determined by the agreed maximum amount of the security. In the absence of an agreed maximum amount, the value of the secured right or, if a current account has been secured, the credit limit is decisive. If a secured current account does not have a credit limit, its final balance is decisive.

(5) For proprietary security, the maximum risk is determined by the agreed maximum amount of the security. In the absence of an agreed maximum amount, the value of the assets serving as security is decisive.

(6) If the maximum amount in the case of paragraph (4) first sentence or the maximum amount or the value, respectively, in the case of paragraph (5) is higher than the value of the secured right at the time of creation of the last security, the latter determines the maximum risk.

(7) In the case of an unlimited personal security securing an unlimited credit the maximum risk of other limited personal or proprietary security rights which exceed the final balance of the secured credit is limited to the latter.

(8) The rules in paragraphs (3) to (7) do not apply to proprietary security provided by the debtor and to security providers who, at the time when the creditor was satisfied, were not liable towards the latter.

COMMENTS

A. Recourse between several security providers

General. The preceding Article establishes solidary liability of several personal security providers vis-à-vis the creditor. The general rules on recourse between several solidary debtors are well adapted to being applied between several security providers since all security providers are in the same boat. A creditor's decision to demand performance from one security provider rather than another or all is motivated by the creditor's interests.

Shares proportionate to maximum risk. Neither III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) nor other provisions of Book III, Chapter 4 determine the size of the individual shares of solidary debtors. III.–4:106 (Apportionment between solidary debtors) paragraph (1) merely says that solidary debtors are liable in equal shares, unless otherwise provided. This is not suitable for recourse among security providers since they often run risks of very different extent. If for example A had assumed a personal security for 1.000 and B one for 300 for a credit being initially 1.300, but reduced by payments of the debtor to 500, it seems to be unfair to divide the remaining 500 between A and B equally, so that both would be internally liable for 250. Under the present Article therefore each security provider is internally liable in proportion to the maximum risk that security provider had assumed.

For a credit of 3.000 A had assumed a dependent personal security with a maximum amount of 1.000 and B one with a maximum amount of 2.000. The sum of all maximum risks being 3.000 (1.000 of A + 2.000 of B), A's portion is ⅓ and B's ⅔. If the debtor has paid 1.500, A would be internally liable for 500 (⅓ of 1.500) and B for 1.000 (⅔ of 1.500).

Agreements on another sharing. However, personal security providers may agree upon another sharing (paragraph (3). For instance, if shareholders of a company with very different holdings had assumed personal securities for a credit granted to their company, it must be possible for them to agree otherwise. But it may be a question of fact whether they wanted to share liability according to the size of their holdings in the company.

Time relevant for calculation of maximum risk. As several securities are not always created at the same time and as their value can differ, it is necessary to define the moment that is decisive for the evaluation of the maximum risk. According to paragraph (3) sentence 2 the moment of creation of the last security is relevant. This is justified since only at this moment can the maximum total and therefore the proportions be established. The time at which a security is assumed must be determined according to general rules, taking into account IV.G.–1:103 (Creditor's acceptance).

In January, A had assumed a dependent personal security with a maximum amount of 3.000 for a credit to D of 3.000. In May the creditor and A agree to reduce the maximum amount to 2.000 and in June B assumed a dependent personal security with a maximum amount of 1.000. As the moment of creation of the last security is decisive and in June A is liable up to 2.000 and B up to 1.000, the portions are the same as in Illustration 1.

B. Definition of the maximum risk for personal security

Although most personal securities probably are limited by a maximum amount, it is according to these Rules possible to agree upon a dependent personal security without stipulating a maximum amount (cf. IV.G.–2:104 (Coverage of security)). In these cases the maximum risk is determined by the amount of the secured claim or, in case of a current account, by the credit limit at the time of the creation of the last security (paragraph (4) sentence 2 and paragraph (3) sentence 2) since the amount of the secured credit determines the maximum each personal security provider may be obliged to pay.

Illustration 3
For a current account with a credit limit of 3.000 A had assumed a personal security with a maximum amount of 2.000, whereas B had assumed the debt without limitation for security purpose. Later on the credit limit is extended to 5.000. A and B being solidary debtors only for 3.000, A is to that extent internally liable for $^{2}/_{5}$ and B for $^{3}/_{5}$, the latter being alone additionally liable for the remaining 2.000.

If a credit limit does not exist, the final balance of the secured credit is decisive according to paragraph (4) sentence 3. This rule is justified by the mere fact that there is no other possible moment to determine the maximum risk.

Illustration 4
A and B had assumed dependent personal securities for all existing and future obligations of D towards C, A agreeing a maximum amount of 1.000 whereas B's security had not been limited. If D in the end owes 9.000, A's portion is $^{1}/_{10}$ and B's $^{9}/_{10}$.

C. Definition of the maximum risk for proprietary security

For those types of proprietary security which can only be created if a maximum amount is agreed (e.g. real estate mortgages), the maximum risk can be determined as for personal securities paragraph (5) sentence 1). But in most cases of proprietary security in movables, no agreement of a maximum amount will be necessary. The maximum risk is determined in these cases by the value of the assets serving as security (paragraph (5) sentence 2), the moment of creation of the last security being again decisive. If the value of the assets diminishes later on, the proportion is not affected.

Illustration 5
For a credit of 3000 A had assumed a dependent personal security with a maximum amount of 2000 and B gave a car as security to the creditor, the value of the car being 2000 at the time of contracting. Two years later, the debtor has repaid only 1000 and the creditor has obtained the remaining 2000 from A. The latter is entitled to demand 1000 from B as the portion of each security provider is $^{1}/_{2}$. If the value of the car is only 500, A will only get this sum since B is not personally obliged.

D. Limitation of the maximum risk

Often the security provider assumes a personal security or creates another security whose maximum amount or value is at the time of contracting higher than the secured credit. In these situations it seems to be appropriate not to limit the maximum risk by the maximum amount or the value but by the amount of the credit since this is the amount the security is liable for. This is done by paragraph (6).

Illustration 6
For a credit of 3000 A had assumed a dependent personal security with a maximum amount of 4000 and B one with a maximum amount of 1000. If A had to pay 3000 to the creditor, he may demand payment from B up to 750 (the sum of all securities being 3000 + 1000 = 4000 and B's portion being therefore $^{1}/_{4}$).

However, if the amount of the secured claim is reduced after creation of the last security below the agreed maximum amount of a security, this is irrelevant, since otherwise any payment by the debtor would be mostly to the advantage of the security with the higher risk.

Illustration 7
For a credit of 3000 A had assumed a dependent personal security with a maximum amount of 1.000 and B one with a maximum amount of 2000. The debtor has paid 1500 to the creditor. A's portion remains ⅓ (= 500) and B's ⅔ (=1.000), rather than $^{10}/_{25}$ (= 600) and $^{15}/_{25}$ (= 900).

E. Special limitation

Paragraph (4) last sentence deals with an unlimited credit that is secured by an unlimited personal security; the maximum risk here is determined by the final balance of the credit. This rule can without any problems be applied if only unlimited personal securities are assumed since all security providers are equally liable in this situation.

> Illustration 8
> A and B had assumed dependent personal securities for all existing and future obligations of D towards C, both securities not being limited by maximum amounts. Independently from what D owes finally, both personal security providers are liable for half since the final balance determines both maximum risks which are therefore identical.

The solution according to paragraph (4) is still adequate if an unlimited credit is secured by unlimited personal securities and limited securities, provided that the final balance of the credit is higher than the limitations of the limited securities (cf. Illustration 4). But matters differ if the final balance is lower:

> Illustration 9
> A and B had assumed dependent personal securities for all existing and future obligations of D towards C; A agreeing a maximum amount of 1000 whereas B's security had not been limited. If the final balance of the credit is 500, A would according to the rule in paragraph (4) be internally liable for two thirds and B (only) for one third.

This solution seems to be unfair because A who only wanted to assume a limited risk is burdened with a higher portion than B who accepted every risk up to the loss of all B's assets. Moreover, as is shown by Illustration 8, the situation of A would be better if A had assumed an unlimited personal security. To prevent this obviously unfair result, paragraph (7) limits the maximum risk of the limited security to the final balance of the credit so that finally all security providers are inter se equally liable.

F. Exceptions

Paragraph (8) contains two exceptions to the preceding rules. The first exception refers to proprietary security rights granted by the debtor. Since it is the debtor who eventually has to reimburse all other security providers, it would make no sense if the debtor as a provider of proprietary security was allowed to participate in the internal recourse of the security providers as provided for in this Article. If the creditor enforces a security created by the debtor, the debtor may not take recourse against the security providers. On the other hand, if a third party security provider satisfies the creditor, the former is as a matter of course entitled to enforce a security right granted by the debtor, to which the third party security provider is subrogated according to IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraph (1) sentence 2 read with paragraph (3).

The second exception contained in paragraph. (8) relates to security providers who would not have been under any liability towards the creditor. In certain situations for example, a provider of dependent security can refuse payment to the creditor under IV.G.–2:103 (Debtor's defences available to the security provider), while a provider of independent security is not entitled to do so. This position would be undermined if the provider of independent security could after payment to the creditor hold the provider of dependent security internally liable. The same principle applies to a security provider whose liability towards the creditor is only subsidiary: as long as the security provider may invoke the subsidiary character the liability according to IV.G.–2:106 (Subsidiary liability of security provider), this security provider is also protected against other security providers' claims for internal recourse.

NOTES

I. General

1. General legal provisions on recourse between several providers of security seem to exist only in DENMARK (Promissory Note Act § 61 read with § 2(2) read with Insurance Agreement Act § 42; cf. Pedersen, Kaution 97) and the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 7:869 read with art. 6:152). However, the FINNISH LDepGuar of 1999 regulates not only the relationship between providers of dependent personal security (§ 31) and their relationship vis-à-vis providers of proprietary security (§ 30(3)) but also the right of recourse of third party pledgees (§ 41 read with § 30). As far as general legal provisions on recourse between several debtors exist, these are in GERMANY not directly applicable to providers of security due to the peculiarly narrow concept of solidary liability under GERMAN law which requires an equal basis of the obligations, which does not exist for different types of security providers' obligations (see national notes to IV.G.–1:105 no. 17; BGH 29 June 1989, BGHZ 108, 179, 183 and 187). In some countries legal provisions on recourse between all providers of personal security exist (SWEDISH Promissory Note Act § 2(2) read with Ccom chap. 10 § 11). Nevertheless, in most continental legal systems there are at least legal provisions on recourse between several providers of dependent personal security (AUSTRIAN CC § 1359; BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2033 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2310); DUTCH CC art. 7:869; GERMAN CC § 774(2); GREEK CC art. 860; ITALIAN CC art. 1954; PORTUGUESE CC art. 650; SPANISH CC art. 1844).
2. For all legal systems two observations can be made. First, freedom of contract prevails also in this part of the law so that the parties are free to deviate from legal provisions on recourse (see e.g. AUSTRIA: Schwimann/Mader and Faber CC § 1358 nos. 25-26; BELGIUM: Du Laing nos. 13, 23; Van Quickenborne no. 534; ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett nos. 12-001 s.; FINNISH LDepGuar § 30(3), 31(1) and (2); FRANCE: CA Lyon 13 October 1981, JCP N 1983, II no. 112; CA Riom 2 October 1996 (two decisions), JCP G 1997, I no. 4033 (9); Simler no. 636; GERMANY: BGH 29 June 1989, BGHZ 108, 179, 183, 186; GREECE: A.P. 793/1995, NoB 45, 775; ITALY: Andreani 704; NETHERLANDS: du Perron and Haentjens art. 869 no. 2).
3. Secondly, while the debtor does not have any right of recourse against third party providers of security, securities (especially proprietary securities) granted by the debtor are fully available to the providers of security after they have performed to the creditor (ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett no. 11-024; FINLAND: LDepGuar § 30(1); GERMANY: BGH 5 April 2001, NJW 2001, 2327, 2329; ITALY: Ravazzoni 269; SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark no. 930; SPAIN CC arts. 1210.3 and 1839). However, in FINLAND an exception applies if the debtor's proprietary security by virtue of legislation is liable only subsidiarily (LDepGuar § 30(2)).

II. Internal recourse

(a) Recourse between providers of dependent security

4. It is common opinion in most legal systems that several providers of dependent security are in the absence of any special agreement and in so far as they secure the same debt in general internally liable like solidary debtors. This means that a provider of security who paid the creditor, as a rule, has a right of recourse against the other provider(s) of security, irrespective of the circumstances, especially the time of assumption of the dependent personal security. This right arises in ENGLAND independently of any contract and is equitable in nature (Andrews and Millett no. 12-001). In most other legal systems this results from the general rules on co-debtorship (AUSTRIAN CC §§ 1359 sentence 2, 896; DENMARK: Promissory Note Act § 61 read with § 2 (2); Andersen, Møgelvang-Hansen and Ørgaard 35 ss., 251 s.; Pedersen, Kaution 97 s.; DUTCH CC art. 7:869 read with art. 6:152; GERMAN CC §§ 774(2), 426; GREEK CC art. 860, 487; ITALIAN CC art. 1954; SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark no. 940; SPAIN: CC art. 1844 is applied by the Supreme Court in cases of plurality of securities agreed to be liable solidarily (TS 4 May 1993, RAJ 1993/3403, TS 24 May 1994, RAJ 1994/3741); Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 258; Díez-Picazo 451; SWEDEN: Promissory Note Act § 2(2) read with Ccom chap. 10 § 11; Walin, Borgen 30; Walin, Lagen om skuldebrev 26 ss.). In PORTUGAL, several providers of personal security are internally liable like solidary debtors, but the provider of security with beneficium divisionis who pays voluntarily is only entitled to internal recourse after satisfaction has been sought from the debtor (CC art. 650(3)). Without a reference to the rules on internal recourse between co-debtors, the same result is achieved more directly in BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG under CC art. 2033 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2310) according to which the provider of personal security who paid the creditor in one of the cases enumerated in CC art. 2032 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2309) has recourse against each of the other providers of security.

5. Only in FINLAND does the right to demand recourse depend upon the circumstances, especially the chronological order in which the several dependent personal securities have been established (LDepGuar § 31(2)): a subsequent provider of security may demand full payment from an earlier provider of security; but an earlier provider of security may not demand anything from a subsequent provider of security.

(b) Recourse upon part payment

6. Opinion is divided on the question under which circumstances a right of internal recourse arises upon part payment of the secured obligation.

7. In AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, ENGLAND, FINLAND, FRANCE, ITALY, the NETHERLANDS and PORTUGAL a provider of personal security seems to be entitled to recourse upon partial payment to the creditor, provided this payment surpasses the security provider's share (AUSTRIA: OGH 23 April 1998, ÖBA 1999, 154 critical note Bacher; OGH 23 February 1999, ÖBA 1999, 827 note Riedler; Bydlinski 105-106; BELGIUM: Du Laing no. 3; Van Quickenborne no. 530; ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett no. 12-004; FINNISH LDepGuar §§ 30(1) sentence 2, 31(1) – however, subject to the exception in § 31(2) (above sub a); FRANCE: Cass.civ. 3 October 1995, JCP N 1996, II no. 1631; Simler no. 640; ITALY: Fragali, Della fideiussione 446; NETHERLANDS: CFI Haarlem 24 February 1942, N.J. 1942 no. 849 at p. 1270; Korthals Altes 340-341; Asser/Hartkamp no. 116; PORTUGAL: CC art. 650(2); STJ 15 February 2001, 3764/00 www.dgsi.pt). Even more in FRANCE the provider of personal dependent security is entitled to exercise internally the right to recourse before any payment if the creditor has brought an action against the security provider. The reason is that the claim of this provider of personal security against other providers of security is considered to exist since the date of the assumption of the dependent security so that the claim for contribution against a co-provider of security is not affected if the co-provider has become insolvent after assumption of the security (cf. Cass.com. 16 June 2004, Bull.civ. 2004 IV no. 123 p. 126). But a provider of dependent security can demand performance from other providers of security only after having paid (Cass.civ. 15 June 2004, D. 2004, 1972).

8. GERMAN courts are somewhat more favourable to the paying provider of security. As long as it is uncertain to what extent the creditor will demand performance from the providers of security, each provider of personal security is after every partial payment to the creditor generally entitled to demand proportionate recourse from the other security provider(s). It is irrelevant whether the security provider paid more than the correct internal share as that would have to be calculated on the hypothesis that the creditor demands performance of the full security or less than such share (cf. BGH 21 February 1957, BGHZ 23, 361, 364; BGH 19 December 1985, NJW 1986, 1097, 1097; BGH 15 May 1986, NJW 1986, 3131, 3132). But in the latter case recourse is suspended until the internal share of each security provider is certain if the paying security provider becomes insolvent after payment (BGH 17 March 1982, BGHZ 83, 206, 210). Finally, if the principal debtor is insolvent the paying security provider is entitled to recourse only if having paid more than the correct internal share (CA Köln 26 August 1994, GmbHR 1995, 51).

9. In GREECE, according to the predominant opinion in literature, in case of part payment the claim of the provider of personal security (security provider or co-debtor for security purpose) for partial recourse competes with the creditor's claim for payment still due: hence, according to CCP art. 977 paragraph 3, 1007 paragraph 1 the creditor and the provider of personal security are to be satisfied pro rata (Georgiades § 3 no. 164; Kaukas 858 § 3, 465-466; ErmAK/Zepos art. 858 no. 11; Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 858 no. 13). However, according to a minority opinion, the claim of the creditor has priority: the predominant opinion would only be justified, if the claims of the creditor and of the provider of personal security vis-à-vis the debtor had the same rank; but this is not so, since the co-debtor remains liable until the whole performance has been furnished (cf. CC art. 482 sentence 2; Tampakis 425; on the grounds of good faith Zepos A 316), whereas the security provider may still be called upon by the creditor for the payment of the remaining part (Tampakis 426; on the grounds of good faith Theodoropoulos 217).

10. For a "second-degree" recourse if one (or more) security provider(s) are unable to contribute, cf. notes on III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) paragraph (3). In SPAIN it is held that the co-guarantor who partially pays has recourse against the co-guarantors when the payment exceeds the amount to be borne by the payer in the internal relationship between them (Carrasco, Tratado, p. 293).

(c) Extension to all securities

11. In most countries the principle of full recourse is applied to all third party providers of security. All persons granting security of any kind have a right of recourse against each other. However, the legal basis for this solution differs: in DENMARK, Promissory Note Act § 61 read with § 2(2) concerning several providers of personal security as solidary debtors (cf. Bryde Andersen 35 ss. and 251 s.; Pedersen, Kaution 97 s.) is extended to the relationship between all providers of security according to the principle of the Insurance Agreement Act § 42 (cf. Pedersen, Kaution 97).

12. In ENGLAND a person granting proprietary security for another person's debt is regarded as a surety just as a provider of personal security and is thus entitled to the same remedies for the indemnity (Rowlatt 6). The principles of equity mentioned above (no. 4) are therefore applicable. The same is true in BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG since CC art. 2033 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2310) applies mutatis mutandis to providers of proprietary security (BELGIUM: Du Laing no. 7; Van Quickenborne no. 527; FRANCE: Cass.civ. 25 October 1977, Bull.civ. 1977 I no. 388 p. 306; CA Paris 13 January 1995, D. 1995, 573). And DUTCH CC art. 7:869 read with art. 6:152 and 6:151 paragraph 2 cover providers both of personal and also of proprietary security ("other sureties and persons who as non-debtors were liable for the obligation", cf. also Blomkwist no. 39).

13. In view of the lack of specific legal provisions in GERMANY and GREECE, legal practice had to find solutions on the basis of general principles of law. There was special need for adequate solutions in these countries since the strict application of existing legal provisions would result in an internal liability for "everything" by the first performing security provider and in no liability of any other security provider, which has been considered as arbitrary and unjust (GERMANY: BGH 29 June 1989, BGHZ 108, 179, 183, 186; GREECE: Karasis 179-180; ITALY: Petti 192). Therefore GERMAN courts apply with the approval of most legal writers the general rules on recourse among solidary debtors on the legal basis of bona fides (CC § 242) in all cases of plurality of providers of security, provided that the securities can be regarded as having equal rank (BGH 29 June 1989, BGHZ 108, 179, 183, 186; BGH 24 September 1992, NJW 1992, 3228; Schlechtriem 1026-1047; Bülow, Ausgleich 62-63; Graf Lambsdorff and Skora no. 313; Schmitz [a Justice of the Federal Supreme Court]; contrary view: Reinicke and Tiedtke, Kreditsicherung nos. 1111-1122; Staudinger/Horn § 774 no. 68 who are still of the opinion that providers of dependent personal security are to be privileged). The same solution is sustained by AUSTRIAN courts and writers (OGH 20 June 1984, SZ 57 no. 114 at p. 565-566; OGH 9 December 1987, SZ 60 no. 266 at p. 701; Rummel/Gammerith § 1359 no. 7) as well as by the prevailing opinion in GREEK legal literature (cf. with different dogmatic reasons Georgiades § 3 nos. 175 ss., 178; Karakatsanis 127-129; Karasis 187; Spyridakis § 80; Theodoropoulos 260 ss.; with a different – procedural – approach Kaukas arts. 847-848, § 9 sub c, § 10; but contra Filios II/1 § 128, 90-93; Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 858 no. 12: providers of personal security must be treated more favourably than mortgagees).

14. Although in SPAIN the strict application of the legal provisions seems to result in the same difficulties and unfairness as in GERMANY and this has been demonstrated by scholars, SPANISH courts until now have not found a satisfactory solution. In literature, however, both solutions have been proposed: the proportional liability of providers of security as well as the privilege of providers of personal security (cf. Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 219). As a default solution when no special features exist it is proposed that the internal division should be in proportion to the respective amount of the risk borne by each security provider (Carrasco, Tratado, p. 267).

15. Under SCOTTISH law the question of recourse between providers of securities of a different kind is rarely discussed. Thow´s Trustee v. Young 1910 SC 588, 596 (CA) can probably be understood as indicating that it is in principle possible for a personal security provider to claim relief from proprietary providers of security (in this case, however, relief was denied because the proprietary security was held not to be granted as security for the same debt).

16. In SWEDEN, Walin, Borgen 317 ss., seems to prefer that a third party who has furnished proprietary security normally is fully liable with the encumbered assets towards providers of personal securities, although he finally also expresses the contrary opinion.

(d) Internal recourse restricted to some providers of security

17. In some countries the provisions on recourse between providers of dependent personal security are applied only to some minor extent to other securities.

18. Under PORTUGUESE law, the general rule being the non-solidarity of several obligations (CC art. 513), there is no internal recourse, unless the parties agreed otherwise. By contrast, in commercial obligations there is a general rule of solidarity according to Ccom art. 100.

19. Under FINNISH law the provider of dependent personal security has a right to recourse against a provider of proprietary security only in so far as this has been agreed between the security providers (LDepGuar § 30(3); RP 189/1998 rd 69). According to LDepGuar § 41 third persons' proprietary securities are governed by § 30. This means that after payment the provider of proprietary security has, as a rule, a claim for recourse against proprietary security granted by the principal debtor (§ 30(1), but see (2), cf. no. 3 above) but has not, unless otherwise agreed, a right of recourse against another third party provider of proprietary security (§ 30(3)). Since § 41 does not declare § 31 to be applicable, there is also no recourse against providers of dependent personal security.

III. The measure of internal recourse

20. Where internal recourse between providers of security is recognised, the question arises how the amount of this recourse should be calculated.

(a) Party agreement

21. As mentioned before (above no. 2), the principle of freedom of contract also applies in this part of the law. Due to this principle providers of security are free to agree upon the internal sharing of their liability (DENMARK*: Pedersen*, Kaution 96 s.; ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett no. 12-002; FINNISH LDepGuar § 31; RP 189/1998 rd 69 s.; FRANCE: CA Lyon 13 October 1981, JCP N 1983, II no. 112; CA Riom 2 October 1996 (two decisions), JCP G 1997, I no. 1033 (9); GERMAN CC § 426(1), Schlechtriem 1039 and Bülow, Ausgleich 59, 64; GREEK CC art. 487(1) and Georgiades § 3 no. 178; Karakatsanis 137; Karasis 187; Spyridakis § 80 no. 2; ITALY: Fragali, Della fideiussione 437; PORTUGAL CC art. 516; SCOTLAND: Gloag and Irvine 822; SPANISH CC art. 1138; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 119 s.). But an agreement between the creditor and one or all providers of security that excludes the internal recourse between the providers of security is not valid (GERMAN BGH 14 July 1983, BGHZ 88, 185, 189 for dependent personal securities assumed by standard form contracts).

(b) Internal liability "per capita"

22. According to ITALIAN and SPANISH law, several providers of security are, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, internally liable per capita (ITALIAN CC art. 1954 read with art. 1299 and Giusti 243; SPAIN: CC art. 1844 read with art. 1145(2) and (3), 1138; TS 2 December 1988, RAJ 1988/9287). Similarly in SCOTLAND there is a presumption for per capita liability if the parties have not agreed on a different share to be borne by the providers of security (Stair/Clark no. 940).

(c) Proportional internal liability – cf. para (2)

23. AUSTRIAN CC § 896, FINNISH LDepGuar § 31(1), GERMAN CC § 426, GREEK CC art. 487, ITALIAN CC art. 1298, PORTUGUESE CC art. 516, SPANISH CC art. 1138 and SWEDISH Ccom chap. 10 § 11 provide that co-debtors are liable in equal shares unless there is a "special relationship" between them (AUSTRIAN CC § 896) or it is "otherwise provided" (GERMAN CC § 426) (the situation is similar in DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 101 s.). The latter is mostly the case since AUSTRIAN and GERMAN courts nowadays consider that the maximum risk assumed by the providers of security is in general the basis for internal recourse (AUSTRIA: OGH 9 December 1987, SZ 60 no. 266 p. 702-703 (at the time of the payor's payment); formerly different OGH 20 June 1984, SZ 57 no. 114 at p. 566; GERMANY: BGH 11 December 1997, BGHZ 137, 292 approving CA Hamm 29 October 1996, WM 1997, 710 for dependent personal securities). According to GERMAN case law the maximum risk of an unlimited dependent personal security is defined by the final balance of the secured credit (BGH 11 December 1997, BGHZ 137, 292, 296 s.). Most writers agree with this (AUSTRIA: Rummel/Gamerith § 896 no. 12, but differently in II § 1359 no. 7 a; indirectly also Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1359 nos. 3-4); but some are opposed (GERMANY: Schlechtriem 1026-1047 – except if one of several security providers has a special interest in the secured credit 1026-1030, 1047; Staudinger/Horn § 774 nos. 55 ss., but rejected by BGH 11 December 1997, BGHZ 137, 292).

24. DUTCH CC art. 7:869 refers to art. 6:152 as the applicable rule on the measure of the internal recourse. The part which has remained unpaid by the debtor is apportioned among the subrogated party and other providers of security or liable "non-debtors" (i.e. providers of proprietary security) who are liable in proportion to the amounts for which each party was liable towards the creditor at the time of the payment (CC art. 6:152(1)), the maximum being the extent of their respective obligation towards the creditor (2); cf. also (3) (Blomkwist no. 39).

25. The solution is similar under BELGIAN, ENGLISH, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN law. If providers of personal security are not liable for equal amounts, they share the burden of the secured debt according to the proportion of their maximum liability (BELGIUM: Du Laing nos. 18-20; Van Quickenborne nos. 533-539; ENGLAND: Ellesmere Brewery v. Cooper [1896] 1 QB 75; FRANCE: Cass.civ. 2 February 1982, JCP 1982 II no. 19825; Simler nos. 646 ss.; LUXEMBOURG: CFI Luxembourg 8 October 1982, Pas luxemb XXVI (1984-1986) 59); the latter is according to FRENCH writers in cases of unlimited dependent personal securities determined by the final balance of the secured obligation (cf. Simler no. 649). In SPAIN, there is a similar solution when not every security provider is liable to the same amount (see Carrasco, Tratado, p. 296).

(d) Legal systems with uncertain solution

26. GREEK courts have not yet dealt with this issue and the literature is divided. Whereas some writers are of the opinion that providers of security should be internally liable in equal shares (Karasis 187; Spyridakis § 80 no. 2), others argue that only if the value of proprietary security exceeds the value of the secured obligation should the providers of security shall be internally liable in equal shares, but if the value of proprietary security is less than the value of the secured claim, the liability should be proportional (Karakatsanis 134-136; Theodoropoulos 263).

(e) Type of liability

27. It is commonly thought that a provider of security who has a right of recourse against several fellow providers of security cannot seek satisfaction from only one of them, with the consequence that the second would have to proceed afterwards against the third and so on. Rather, the first is obliged to divide recourse between the remaining providers of security pro virili parte (DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 101 s.; FRANCE: if fellow providers of security are liable for equal amounts CA Poitiers 11 June 1981, D. 1982, 79; for GERMANY in general Palandt/Grünberg § 426 no. 6: no solidary liability in the internal relationship of co-debtors).

IV.G.–1:107: Several security providers: recourse against debtor

(1) Any security provider who has satisfied a right of recourse of another security provider is subrogated to this extent to the other security provider's rights against the debtor as acquired under IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraphs (1) and (3), including proprietary security rights granted by the debtor. IV.G.–2:110 (Reduction of creditor's rights) applies with appropriate adaptations.

(2) Where a security provider has recourse against the debtor by virtue of the rights acquired under IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraphs (1) and (3) or under the preceding paragraph, including proprietary security rights granted by the debtor, every security provider is entitled to a proportionate share, as defined in IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) paragraph (2) and III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors), of the benefits recovered from the debtor. IV.G.–2:110 (Reduction of creditor's rights) applies with appropriate adaptations.

(3) Unless expressly stated to the contrary, the preceding rules do not apply to proprietary security provided by the debtor.

COMMENTS

A. Rights of security provider after exposure to internal recourse

General. If a security provider had been exposed to internal recourse according to IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) paragraphs (1) and (2) the next issue is what rights that security provider has against the debtor. This issue is addressed by paragraph (1) of the present Article. It has to be emphasised that this secondary recourse against the debtor does not feature prominently in the legal systems of the member states. The reasons are obvious. More often than not the security provider's chances of recovery from the debtor are low because of the latter's insolvency – precisely because it is especially in such situations that the creditor will demand payment from the security provider instead of the debtor. The situation is different in the area of, amongst others, personal securities on first demand. Also here, the effect of these Rules is that several providers of security are solidarily liable (cf. IV.G.–1:105 (Several security providers: solidary liability towards the debtor) paragraph (1)). However, the creditor typically demands payment from a security provider under such a security not only if the debtor defaults but because this is an easier way of achieving payment. Since in this situation the security provider is held liable by the creditor even though the debtor is solvent, the security provider's rights of recourse against the debtor become more important. Thus, not only the rights of internal recourse between several security providers but also the rights of secondary recourse against the debtor in the situation of a plurality of security providers need to be dealt with.

Rights against the debtor. Paragraph (1) deals with the question of which rights a security provider has against the debtor if the security provider has been exposed to recourse by another security provider according to paragraphs (1) and (2) of the preceding Article.

Secondary recourse against the debtor. Whenever a security provider performs to the creditor, the former acquires both rights against the debtor according to IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraph (1) sentence 1 and 2 read with paragraph (3) as well as rights against other security providers according to IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraph (1) sentence 2 read with paragraph (3) and IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) paragraph (1). While in principle the security provider can claim reimbursement in full from the debtor, chances of success will typically be higher for proceeding against the other security providers. These are liable to the security provider, who has satisfied the creditor, however, only within the limits of their respective proportionate shares as defined in IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) paragraph (2). Therefore, any security provider who has been held internally liable by the security provider who has paid to the creditor may not in turn take recourse against the other security providers on the basis of IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) paragraphs (1) and (2), since a right to internal recourse is available only where a solidary debtor has paid more than the correct proportionate share. The security provider may in this situation only try to be reimbursed by the debtor, either directly (cf. the following paragraphs) or indirectly (on the basis of IV.G.–1:107 (Several security providers: recourse against debtor) paragraph (2).

Subrogation according to paragraph (1) sentence 1. A security provider (the "second" security provider) who has been held liable by the security provider (the "first" security provider) who had satisfied the creditor steps into the shoes of the first security provider according to the first sentence of paragraph (1); The second security provider is subrogated to the rights against the debtor to which the first security provider had been subrogated on paying the creditor (cf. IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraph (1) sentence 2). The second security provider is also subrogated to those rights against the debtor which the first security provider had acquired under IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraph (1) sentence 1.

This subrogation does not follow from any other provision, at least not to the extent provided for here: no rights are conferred to the security provider in question by II.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors), since this provision applies only if a solidary debtor has performed more than the proper share.

Extent of the subrogation. The extent to which a security provider who is held liable by the security provider who has satisfied the creditor is subrogated to the latter's rights against the debtor depends upon the extent to which the latter security provider has taken recourse against the former security provider. Since this right to recourse is limited to the other security provider's proportionate share as defined in IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) paragraph (2), this security provider will normally acquire no more than the proportionate share of the rights against the debtor. The security provider who has satisfied the creditor is then entitled to the remaining part. A security provider held liable for less than the proportionate share as defined in IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) paragraph (2) is subrogated only proportionally to the rights acquired by the other security provider according to IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraphs (1) and (3).

It is important to stress that paragraph (1) sentence 1 of the present Article may not only give a security provider a personal claim for reimbursement against the debtor but may also confer an entitlement to proprietary security rights (not, however, to proprietary security rights provided by third persons) in so far as such rights have passed to the security provider who has satisfied the creditor (IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraphs (1) and (3)). It is self-evident, however, that paragraph (1) sentence 1 of the present Article cannot confer any entitlement to rights against the debtor or proprietary security rights which the security provider who sought recourse has not acquired by reason of performance under the security, but e.g. as a counter-security granted by the debtor. The subrogation is limited to rights acquired by the security provider, who seeks recourse from the other security providers, under IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraphs (1) and (3).

Subrogation to proprietary security rights. It is expressly spelt out in IV.G.–1:107 Several security providers: recourse against the debtor) paragraph (1) that there is no subrogation to proprietary security rights provided by third persons. Third party proprietary security aside, however, the reference in IV.G.–1:107 (Several security providers: recourse against debtor) paragraph (1) to proprietary security rights granted by the debtor is to be understood in a wide sense. It is meant to cover not only proprietary security rights that a creditor obtains from the debtor (whether by transfer or by creation of a new proprietary security interest), but also proprietary security rights retained by the creditor on the basis of an agreement with the debtor, such as a retention of ownership. While it is envisaged that the future European Rules on Proprietary Security will cover both types of proprietary security rights (although they might to some extent be subjected to different rules), these provisions are not finally drafted yet. Therefore, it is thought to be preferable at this stage to have a rather broad reference to proprietary security rights irrespective of the method of creation instead of an explicit reference to both distinct types of proprietary security.

Reduction of rights. A security provider who – after having paid the creditor – seeks recourse from the other security providers, may find that the rights to recourse are reduced or extinguished because of the security provider's conduct. This may occur if such conduct makes it impossible for the other security providers to be subrogated to the first security provider's rights against the debtor, including any proprietary security rights granted by the debtor, or to be fully reimbursed by the debtor (cf. IV.G.–2:110 (Reduction of creditor's rights)). After the creditor is satisfied only the security provider who has paid the latter is entitled to the latter's rights against the debtor. The other security providers, however, will be subrogated to these rights once held internally liable by the security provider who satisfied the creditor, and then these rights against the debtor will be available as a means to secure reimbursement from the debtor for these other security providers. Thus the latter have to be protected against any loss or depreciation in value of these rights due to the fault of the security provider who has satisfied the creditor.

This aim is sought to be achieved by paragraph (1) sentence 2. This provision will apply, e.g., where a security provider releases the debtor or fails to realise proprietary securities in due time, which are subsequently lost or depreciated. A security provider who does not timeously commence proceedings against the debtor who then becomes insolvent might also in appropriate circumstances lose rights of recourse against the other security providers. The basic principle can be seen as an aspect of the duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. A security provider which culpably fails to consider the interests of the other security provider's may find that rights of recourse against them are appropriately reduced or even extinguished.

B. Other security providers' entitlement to benefits recovered from the debtor

General idea. The basic principle underlying the provisions about a plurality of security providers is that all security providers securing the same obligation should share the risk which they assumed in proportion to their individual proportionate shares.

One consequence flowing from this principle is that a security provider who has satisfied the creditor under the security is entitled to take recourse against the other security providers up to the extent of their individual proportionate shares according to IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse). On the other hand, where a security provider obtains relief by taking recourse against the debtor after having duly paid the creditor or any other security provider, this security provider has to share any benefits obtained with the other security providers. Without such participation, individual security providers could effectively reduce their total liability by taking recourse against the debtor to the disadvantage of other security providers who might not be able to get any reimbursement from the debtor, e.g. due to an intervening insolvency of the latter.

Security provider's entitlement to share of benefits recovered. Paragraph (2) achieves this objective by obliging any security provider who has taken recourse against the debtor to share any benefits so obtained with the other security providers in proportion to their individual proportionate shares as defined in IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse). Again, no security provider is bound to let the other security providers participate in any benefits acquired e.g. under proprietary security rights granted by the debtor as a counter-security to this security provider only. The liability under paragraph (2) sentence 1 arises only where a security provider has recourse against the debtor under the rights conferred by IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraphs (1) and (3) or under IV.G.–1:107 (Several security providers: recourse against debtor) paragraph (1) or equivalent claims arising from the underlying relationship between security provider and debtor (e.g. a mandate). This liability arises in the case of a recourse by virtue of rights which in appropriate circumstances would have been available to the other security providers as well, if they had paid the creditor or had been held internally liable by another security provider, respectively. It should be emphasised that the reference to proprietary security rights granted by the debtor is to be understood in the same broad sense as in paragraph (1).

Reduction of rights under paragraph (2) sentence 2. Sentence 2 of paragraph (2) refers to IV.G.–2:110 (Reduction of creditor's rights). The intention is to prevent a security provider from sharing in benefits recovered if that security provider has culpably failed to exercise or pursue available rights against the debtor under IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraphs (1) and (3) or under IV.G.–1:107 (Several security providers: recourse against debtor) paragraph (1).

The rule in paragraph (2) sentence 2 will typically arise in two different sets of circumstances. In the first situation, a security provider might fail to take advantage of proprietary security rights, which subsequently are depreciated. Such conduct would be detrimental to the other security providers as well since in such situations their right to share in any benefits obtained from the debtor could be diminished or become worthless. It would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to allow the negligent security provider to deprive the other security providers of their right to share in these benefits and yet still claim a right to share in their benefits. The reference to IV.G.–2:110 (Reduction of creditor's rights) is broad enough, however, to cover also situations, in which a security provider wilfully refrains from exercising any rights against the debtor. A security provider may have personal reasons not to demand reimbursement from the debtor although entitled to do so; however, that security provider should not then be able to share in benefits recovered by other security providers.

C. Exception

Proprietary security rights provided by debtor excepted. Paragraph (3) contains an exception referring to proprietary security rights provided by the debtor. In any case, it is the debtor who is liable in the end for the secured obligation, and obviously there is no point in subrogating the debtor to rights against the debtor.

Counter-exceptions. Some provisions in this Article, however, are expressly declared to apply also to proprietary security rights granted by the debtor (paragraph (1) sentence 1 and paragraph (2) sentence 1). These provisions are dealing with the exercise of or the subrogation to rights against the debtor, which for the purposes of this Article follows identical rules for personal as well as proprietary security rights.

NOTES

I. General

1. In most countries, it is a well-known principle that after performance towards the creditor, the security provider acquires rights against the debtor. Equally accepted and similarly prominently dealt with in the legal systems of most member states is the principle of an internal recourse between several security providers, which typically follows the idea of sharing the burden between all providers of security for the same obligation or the same security purpose. The problems dealt with in this article, i.e. the distribution of rights against the debtor and of benefits received from the debtor among several security providers, however typically feature much less prominently in the legal systems of the member states and relevant court decisions are scarce.

II. Entitlement of other security providers to rights against the debtor

2. The idea of an outright transfer of the rights against the debtor to any security provider who has satisfied another security provider's claim for reimbursement by way of an automatic subrogation as provided for in paragraph (2) of the present Article seems to be unknown in most member states.

3. In ENGLAND, however, falling short of a transfer of the legal title in any rights against the debtor, at least an equitable entitlement of co-security providers arises in those rights that the security provider who has satisfied the creditor is subrogated to, i.e. the security provider holds these rights in trust for the co-security providers (cf. Re Arcedeckne; Atkins v. Arcedeckne (1883) 24 ChD 709 (CFI); O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-335). In SPAIN, the TS 23 March 2000, RAJ 2000/2025 refused the paying provider of proprietary security subrogation in the creditor's right against other co-obligees, but allowed it against the principal debtor. The solution has been criticised, because there is no reason to refuse the payer (first or secondary payer) any recourse grounded in subrogation in the creditor' rights, as far as the amount paid exceeds the risk to be borne by the payer in the internal relationship. As to the payee's right against the principal debtor, every paying co-surety (even a secondary payer) has a right to subrogation in the payee's right, regardless of whether payer and payee are co-guarantors to each other (Carrasco, Tratado, pp. 263, 296).

III. Entitlement of other security providers to benefits received from the debtor or third parties

4. More generally accepted is the principle that benefits received by any of the co-security providers have to be shared with the others.

5. Especially benefits recovered from the debtor are regarded as having to be accounted for in relation to the other security providers. In ENGLAND, this follows, first, from the principle that the rights acquired by the security provider who has satisfied the creditor are held in trust for the other security providers (cf. nos. 2-3 above). Second, the equitable doctrine of contribution, i.e. the principle of internal recourse between several security providers, is thought to demand that all benefits received by a security provider have to be shared pro tanto with the co-security providers (the so-called "hotchpot principle", cf. O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-248). Under these principles, benefits received under counter-securities provided by the principal debtor are available to the other security providers even if it had been agreed between the security provider originally entitled to that counter-security and the principal debtor that this counter-security should not be for the benefit of the other security providers (cf. Steel v. Dixon (1881) 17 Ch. D 825; Andrews and Millett no. 12-017).

6. Benefits received from third parties other than the debtor, however, need not be shared with the other security providers (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-249). Especially benefits secured on an individual security provider's own initiative and at that security provider's own expense (such as an insurance policy) do not fall under the "hotchpot principle" (cf. Re Albert Life Assurance Co. (1870) LR 11 Eq 164, 172 (CFI); O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-249).

IV. Consequences of conduct disadvantageous to other security providers

7. Whereas – in accordance with the approach chosen throughout this Part – in the present Article conduct by a security provider that is disadvantageous to the other security providers is regarded as giving rise to a liability for damages, ENGLISH law seems to prefer the loss of the right to internal recourse as a consequence of any such conduct. An analogy is drawn to the situation of the creditor holding several security rights, and thus it has been suggested that a security provider loses the right to internal recourse on giving up any security rights against the debtor (cf. Rowlatt 160; Andrews and Millett no. 12-017). The idea of rights held in trust for the other security providers, however, makes it seem conceivable that in appropriate circumstances the liability for conduct that is disadvantageous to the other security providers could also be regarded as liability for breach of trust.

IV.G.–1:108: Subsidiary application of rules on solidary debtors

If and in so far as the provisions of this Part do not apply, the rules on plurality of debtors in III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) to III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations) are subsidiarily applicable.

COMMENTS

A. General

Contracts of personal security and plurality of debtors. Contracts of personal security frequently involve situations where several persons owe similar or even identical obligations to the same creditor. Such situations, which might be described as a plurality of debtors in a non-technical sense, can exist in relation to several debtors owing the same secured obligation, or several security providers securing the same obligation or even under certain circumstances in relation to a debtor owing the secured obligation and a security provider owing an obligation under the contract of personal security that is at least partly identical with the secured obligation.

Solidary obligations according to Book III, Chapter 4 and effect of the present Article in general. The concept of solidary obligations according to Book III, Chapter 4 is rather wide. Therefore, a number of situations described in the preceding paragraph would fall under the rules on solidary debtors in Section 1 of that Chapter. On the one hand, this result has to be welcomed from the point of view of the law of personal security, since a number of the general provisions on solidary debtors fit the needs of this area of law perfectly well, so that a reference to these general provisions replaces the need to spell them out in detail here. On the other hand, the situations of solidary debtors (co-debtorship) in the context of personal security often are governed by considerations that are different from those relevant for situations of solidary debtors in general. Therefore the reference to these general rules can only be made with caution: the general rules are applicable only subsidiarily, i.e. as long as the rules in this Part do not contain specific provisions concerning the relevant issue.

Plurality of debtors of the secured obligation. The reference can be made unconditionally, however, in so far as a plurality of debtors owing the same secured obligation is concerned. The rules on personal security do not contain any specific provisions governing this issue, i.e. the effects of events concerning the obligation of one debtor on the obligation of the other debtor or debtors are governed by Book III, Chapter 4, Section 1 only.

Plurality of security providers and co-debtorship between debtor(s) and security provider(s). More important is the reference to the provisions on solidary obligations contained in Book III, Chapter 4, Section 1 in the following types of situations, which will be considered in greater detail in these Comments. Firstly, in the case of several security providers who are all securing the same obligation towards the creditor it has to be emphasised that the provisions on solidary debtors may apply under this heading to providers of dependent and independent security alike, provided that in respect of each security provider concerned the conditions for liability towards the creditor are fulfilled. Secondly, there might be a co-debtorship between debtor(s) on the one hand and security provider(s) on the other hand. A co-debtorship of this type, however, cannot exist if there is an independent personal security only; even in cases of a dependent personal security, such a co-debtorship between the debtor and the security provider can exist only if the liability of the security provider is solidary or, should the latter's liability be subsidiary, if the special conditions according to IV.G.–2:106 (Subsidiary liability of security provider) paragraphs (2) and (3) are fulfilled.

Co-debtorship for security purposes. A special situation concerns the co-debtorship for security purposes according to IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for purposes). This provision contains its own reference to Book III, Chapter 4, Section 1.

B. Plurality of security providers

General. The rules in IV.G.–1:105 to IV.G.–1:107 deal specifically with a plurality of security providers. Concerning the topics covered by these specific Articles, Book III, Chapter 4, Section 1 is applicable only if it is specifically referred to. However, in a number of other situations outside IV.G.–1:105 to IV.G.–1:107 these general rules can be applied. It has to be emphasised in this context that the rules of III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) to III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations) are applicable only if the requirements of III.–4:102 (Solidary, divided and joint obligations) paragraph (1) are fulfilled, i.e. if all debtors concerned are bound to perform the obligation in full and if the creditor may require performance from any one of them until full performance has been received. In relation to several security providers, such a co-debtorship arises only under the conditions set out in IV.G.–1:105 (Several security providers: solidary liability towards creditor): the conditions for liability towards the creditor must be fulfilled for every security provider concerned.

III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors). As between several security providers who are solidarily liable, III–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) is applicable by virtue of the express reference contained in IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) paragraph (1) with the qualifications set out in paragraphs (2) and (3).

III.–4:108 (Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations) paragraph (1). It follows already from IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraph (3) (for providers of independent security, IV.G.–3:108 (Security provider's rights after performance) applies), that a security provider who has performed under the contract of personal security is subrogated to the creditor's rights against the other security providers. Consequently, these other security providers are no longer liable towards the creditor to the extent to which the former security provider has fulfilled the obligations under the security. Within its scope of application, III–4:108 (Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations) paragraph (1) serves as a clarification of that implied consequence.

III.–4:108 (Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations) paragraph (2). This provision is applicable, i.e. the merger of debts between one security provider and the creditor discharges the other security providers only for the share of the security provider concerned (this share to be determined according to IV.G.– 1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse).

III.–4:109 (Release or settlement in solidary obligations). If the creditor releases, or reaches a settlement with, one of several providers of dependent security, the consequences are covered by IV.G.–2:110 (Reduction of creditor's rights) the liability of the other security providers is not affected, but the creditor is liable in damages towards them; this counter-claim can, obviously, be set off against the other security providers' liability under the contract of dependent personal security. By contrast, there is no specific rule for the effect on the liability of providers of independent personal security; thus III–4:109 (Release or settlement in solidary obligations) paragraph (1) is applicable. This difference in treatment is due to the fact that independent security should be treated in a more formalistic way than dependent security where a more flexible approach is preferable.

III.–4:110 (Effect of judgment in solidary obligations) to III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations). These provisions are generally applicable in the situation of several security providers who are solidarily liable towards the creditor.

C. Co-debtorship between debtor(s) and security provider(s)

General. The following Comments concern the situation where a co-debtorship exists between the debtor(s) on the one hand and the security provider(s) on the other hand, i.e. where debtor(s) and security provider(s) are solidary debtors as defined in III–4:102 (Solidary, divided and joint obligations) paragraph (1). Apart from the situation dealt with by IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for security purposes), such a situation can arise especially where there is a dependent personal security with solidary liability of the security provider, so that the creditor is free to claim performance from the debtor or the security provider as solidary debtors (IV.G.–2:105 (Solidary liability of security provider). In a dependent personal security with subsidiary liability of the security provider, a co-debtorship exists between the security provider and the debtor only if the special conditions under IV.G.–2:106 (Subsidiary liability of security provider) paragraphs (2) and (3) are fulfilled, i.e. if the security provider can no longer invoke the subsidiarity as a defence against the creditor. There can be no co-debtorship between security provider and debtor, if any, in the case of an independent security: the obligation of a provider of an independent personal security is conceptually distinct from any underlying obligation. There are two obligations, not co-debtorship of one obligation.

III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors). The rights against the debtor of a security provider who performs the obligation under the contract of personal security are governed by IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance), so that there is no need to have recourse to III–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors). If, however, the debtor fulfils the secured obligation, it can be derived from III–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) that the debtor has no claim against the security provider: internally the debtor is of course liable for the whole obligation owed to the creditor so that the internal share of the security provider is nil.

III.–4:108 (Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations) paragraph (1). This provision is not applicable. If, on the one hand, the security provider performs the security obligation towards the creditor, the debtor is not discharged, but IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) operates so as to subrogate the security provider to the creditor's rights against the debtor. If, on the other hand, the debtor performs towards the creditor, the security provider may rely on this performance as against the creditor according to IV.G.–2:103 (Debtor's defences available to the security provider) paragraph (1). Thus, in this situation the principle of dependency on the secured obligation achieves the same result as III–4:108 (Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations) paragraph (1). The same principles apply if there is a set-off as between the creditor and either security provider or the debtor.

III.–4:108 (Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations) paragraph (2). This provision is applicable; it has to be kept in mind, however, that internally the debtor is liable for the whole of the secured obligation. One has to distinguish between two situations. If the merger of debts takes place between the debtor and the creditor, the security providers are discharged completely. If, however, the merger of debts concerns one security provider (as solidary debtor) and the creditor, the debtor remains liable towards the creditor for the whole debt.

III.–4:109 (Release or settlement in solidary obligations). This provision is only in part applicable. It is not applicable in so far as the consequences of a release by the creditor of the debtor on the liability of the security provider are concerned: in such a situation it follows already from the principle of dependency that such a release provides a defence for the security provider vis-à-vis the creditor. If, by contrast, the security provider is released by the creditor, III–4:109 (Release or settlement in solidary obligations) applies: since the debtor is internally liable for the whole of the secured obligation, the effect of the application of this provision is that the debtor is not discharged towards the creditor.

III.–4:110 (Effect of judgment in solidary obligations). This provision is applicable only if this would not run counter to the principle of dependency. Thus, contrary to the rule in III–4:110 (Effect of judgment in solidary obligations) a decision by a court as between the debtor and the creditor may affect the security provider's obligation in so far as according to IV.G.–2:103 (Debtor's defences available to the security provider) paragraph (1) the security provider, too, may raise the defence of res judicata if it is available to the debtor. If a court decides in proceedings between the debtor and the creditor in favour of the debtor – even if only partly – the creditor is barred on the basis of the defence of res judicata from bringing another action for the same claim not only against the debtor, but also against the security provider. In other constellations, however, III–4:110 (Effect of judgment in solidary obligations), is applicable, e.g. in so far as a court decides against the debtor or in proceedings between the creditor and the security provider.

III.–4:111 (Prescription in solidary obligations). This provision is not applicable in so far as the consequences of a prescription of the creditor's right to performance against the debtor are concerned: in such a situation it follows again from the principle of dependency that the security provider can rely on a prescription of the secured obligation vis-à-vis the creditor. III–4:111 (Prescription in solidary obligations) is applicable, however, as far as the effect of prescription of the creditor's claim against the security provider on the obligation of the debtor towards the creditor is concerned: according to III–4:111 (Prescription in solidary obligations) sub-paragraph (a) prescription of the creditor's claim against the security provider does not operate as a defence for the debtor vis-à-vis the creditor.

III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations) paragraph (1). This provision is not applicable. In so far as the possibility of the security provider to invoke a defence of the debtor is concerned, this situation is specifically dealt with in IV.G.–2:103 (Debtor's defences available to the security provider) paragraph (1). Since the security provider's obligation is merely an additional claim for the creditor, the debtor may not rely on any defence of the security provider.

III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations) paragraph (2). This provision is not applicable. As between the security provider and the debtor, contribution can only be demanded by the security provider from the debtor after the former has performed the security obligation towards the creditor. Should the security provider have failed to raise vis-à-vis the creditor any personal defence of the debtor towards the creditor that was available to the security provider, the security provider may nevertheless claim full reimbursement according to IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance). The interests of the debtor are protected by the security provider's liability for damages according to IV.G.–2:112 (Security provider's obligations before performance) paragraph (2).

NOTES

1. It is a common legal technique in many member states to provide for the subsidiary applicability of the rules on plurality of debtors in specific matters of personal security. DUTCH law even provides that "Suretyship is governed by the rules on co-debtorship, except in so far as the present subchapter [on suretyship] does not deviate from them" (CC art. 7:850(3); in addition, there are express references to the rules on co-debtorship in arts. 7:866, 7:868 and 7:869).
2. Specific references to the law of co-debtorship can especially be found with respect to the internal relationship between several security providers (cf. AUSTRIA: CC § 1359 second sentence; DENMARK: Andersen, Møgelvang-Hansen and Ørgaard 35 ss.; FINLAND: RP 189/1998 rd 7; Ekström 73; GERMANY: CC § 774(2); BGH 24 September 1992, NJW 1992, 3228; Lunchroom/Bydlinski § 426 no. 46; ITALY: CC art. 1954; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 26 ss.).
3. In several member states, also the relationship between debtor and security provider vis-à-vis the creditor is regarded as a case of plurality of debtors (BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG: for the security provider with solidary liability: CC art. 2021 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2298); FRANCE: Simler nos. 534 ss.; ITALY: CC art. 1944(1); Bozzi, La fideiussione 252; Casella 250; Giusti 45; SPAIN: CC art. 1822(2); Carrasco a.o. 86). In other member states, however, it is thought that the rules on plurality of debtors are not applicable in such situations (cf. GERMANY: MünchKomm/Bydlinski § 421 nos. 33 ss.; Staudinger/Noack § 421 no. 38; for the contrary view Erman/Ehmann § 421 nos. 48 ss.).

CHAPTER 2: DEPENDENT PERSONAL SECURITY

IV.G.–2:101: Presumption for dependent personal security

(1) Any undertaking to pay, to render any other performance or to pay damages to the creditor by way of security is presumed to give rise to a dependent personal security, unless the creditor shows that it was agreed otherwise.

(2) A binding comfort letter is presumed to give rise to a dependent personal security.

COMMENTS

A. Definition and central role

Historically and still today, dependent personal security constitutes the core institution of personal security. This becomes even more obvious if one recurs to the different national names for the most important type of dependent personal security in all the member states (to mention only suretyship, cautionnement, Bürgschaft etc.). All other modern types of personal security, be they dependent (such as the binding comfort letter) or independent (such as indemnities, independent guarantees or stand-by letters of credit) have been developed by modifying the one or the other element of the dependent personal security.

B. General presumption

Paragraph (1) establishes a presumption that when a personal security is assumed it is a dependent personal security. This presumption is based upon the extremely risky nature and implications of any personal security: the security provider becomes liable with all present and future assets for the liabilities which another person, the debtor, has incurred or may incur in future. By virtue of the dependency upon the secured obligation, these risks can to some degree be limited. Therefore any personal security in favour of the creditor of another person is presumed to be dependent and therefore to be subject to Chapter 2.

The presumption in favour of a dependent security applies vis-à-vis all other types of personal security including both the independent personal security and the co-debtorship for security purposes. If the parties intend to agree upon an independent personal security or a co-debtorship for security purposes, this must expressly be said or unambiguously result from the agreement of the parties. Otherwise, it will be assumed that the parties intended to agree upon a dependent security, which is in general the most favourable for the security provider.

It goes without saying that the presumption in favour of a dependent security should also apply, and for particularly good reasons because of its protective function, to a personal security assumed by a consumer.

C. Binding comfort letter

Paragraph (2) establishes merely a presumption as to the classification of a personal security assumed by binding comfort letter. The presumption can, of course, be rebutted. The presumption is based upon the typical interests pursued by a "patron" in issuing a binding comfort letter of a commercial type. If the promise to the creditor to support financially the debtor (company) is not kept, the breach of that promise is sanctioned by an obligation to compensate the creditor for the loss suffered. On the other hand, the "patron" generally will not be willing to be liable for those obligations of the debtor which are subject to objections or defences.

The preceding two reasons speak for classifying the obligation assumed by the binding comfort letter, in the context of the present Rules, as a dependent personal security – unless the contrary is proved.

In the case of a non-commercial binding comfort letter where the author promises to reimburse the creditor for any expenses incurred in assisting the debtor in so far as the debtor is liable to repay them and does not do so, this is the typical situation of a dependent personal security.

D. Consumers as security providers – general remarks

The rules on consumer protection for providers of personal security must be based, in order to fulfil their purpose of being protective for the security provider, on the regime of personal security which is most protective for security providers. Generally speaking, this is the regime of dependent personal security in Chapter 2. However, sometimes doubts may arise where exceptionally the application of rules on other security devices is, or may seem to be, more protective for the security provider. Such instances have to be analysed in detail.

The rules on dependent personal security are to be applied not only to a consumer's dependent personal security, but also to all other types of personal security assumed by a consumer: Specifically, they also apply to a consumer's independent personal security (cf. IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c)) and to a consumer's co-debtorship for security purposes (cf. IV.G.–4:102(Applicable rules) paragraph (1)).

In applying the rules on dependent personal security to any type of personal security provided by a consumer, it is to be noted that in this context the rules on dependent personal security are mandatory and may not be deviated from to the disadvantage of the consumer security provider (IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2)). This purpose is achieved in two ways which, however, converge in the end. If a consumer assumes a dependent personal security, the rules of Chapter 2 are not only directly applicable, but are made mandatory in favour of the consumer by (IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2)). If a consumer assumes an independent personal security or acts as a co-debtor for security purposes the same result is achieved in two steps: firstly, by declaring applicable to these cases the rules of Chapter 2 (cf. IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c)) and IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1)) respectively). On this basis IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2) becomes applicable and it provides for the mandatory character of the rules on dependent personal security. Thus, even where the presumption of paragraph (1) is rebutted, every personal security by a consumer security provider will be subject to Chapter 2.

NOTES

I. Ordinary dependent security

(a) No presumption

1. In most member states no presumption for a dependent personal security exists.

(b) Presumption for a dependent security

2. However, in FRANCE if it is doubtful whether a dependent personal security or another kind of personal security has been assumed, the qualification with the weaker effect, i.e. a dependent personal security will be chosen (cf. the general rules on interpretation CC art. 1156 ff; Simler no. 895). If the security provider is a consumer, this interpretation guideline is even more strictly respected (Simler no. 921; CA Paris 26 January 1993, D. 1993, I.R. 93). Also under GERMAN law, if after applying the principles of interpretation (CC §§ 133, 157) a doubt remains, a dependent personal security is assumed since this is the regular legal type of personal security and since the security provider is in this way best protected, especially by the formal requirement of a writing according to CC § 766 (cf. Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 24). Similar arguments are used in AUSTRIA, although the dependent personal security does not enjoy better protection by a form requirement since that is applied also to independent personal securities. It is controversial whether banks as providers of security may invoke a presumption in favour of a dependent personal security; but prevailing opinion allows this (cf. Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/32, but different at no. 3/25). Also in ITALY the general rules on interpretation of contracts (CC arts. 1362-1371) are applied and these also lead to a presumption in favour of a dependent security since this is the solution which is less onerous for the debtor (Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 56). In SPAIN there is properly not a presumption as such, but a chain of rules and general presumptions in the law of obligations; there is a presumption in favour of the lesser obligatory effect when the debtor gets no consideration for assuming the obligation (CC art. 1289) and it is also presumed (CC art. 1827) that mere litterae commendatoriae (i.e., statements as to the credit worthiness of the principal debtor) do not amount to a binding commitment (Carrasco, a.o 117 ff).

(c) Presumption for an independent security

3. In the area of bank guarantees, especially those employed in international trade, there is a special situation. The "security provider", i.e. the bank issuing an independent guarantee, is most interested in being involved as little as possible in the underlying transaction. Therefore, it prefers to perform upon first demand. The only requirement for its obligation to perform is that the conditions expressly set out in the mandate to issue the guarantee are fulfilled by the creditor. The debtor of the underlying transaction, very often the buyer/importer, must and can see to it that these conditions are laid down so as to suit the commercial requirements of the situation (cf. for GERMANY: Graf von Westphalen 5-7; ENGLAND: Goode, Commercial Law 1017 ss.; ITALY: Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 56; NETHERLANDS: Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie 1-10). In FRANCE if the principal debt covers non-pecuniary obligations (e.g. in the case of building contracts), there is a strong presumption for an independent security (Simler no. 924 a)).

II. Binding comfort letters

4. Most EUROPEAN member states do not share the rule of paragraph (2) of the present Article.

IV.G.–2:102: Dependence of security provider's obligation

(1) Whether and to what extent performance of the obligation of the provider of a dependent personal security is due, depends upon whether and to what extent performance of the debtor's obligation to the creditor is due.

(2) The security provider's obligation does not exceed the debtor's obligation. This rule does not apply if the debtor's obligations are reduced or discharged:

(a) in an insolvency proceeding;
(b) in any other way caused by the debtor's inability to perform because of insolvency; or
(c) by virtue of law due to events affecting the person of the debtor.

(3) Except in the case of a global security, if an amount has not been fixed for the security and cannot be determined from the agreement of the parties, the security provider's obligation is limited to the value of the secured right at the time the security became effective.

(4) Except in the case of a global security, any agreement between the creditor and the debtor to make performance of the secured obligation due earlier, or to make the obligation more onerous by changing the conditions on which performance is due, or to increase its amount, does not affect the security provider's obligation if the agreement was concluded after the security provider's obligation became effective.

COMMENTS

A. The principle of dependency

This Article is one of the two principal provisions expressing the guiding idea of a dependent personal security, namely the principle of dependency (or accessority, as it is sometimes called). Another important rule which is based upon the principle of dependency is IV.G.–2:103 (Debtor's defences available to the security provider).

B. Main rule

The main rule of the first paragraph expresses this basic feature. The security obligation must not exceed the secured obligation. Whether the secured obligation is due, and the extent of it, will, of course, depend on the terms regulating it. It may, for example, not be currently due because it is conditional and the condition has not yet been purified; or it may be due for performance only after a certain time which has not yet arrived; or it may have prescribed. If any feature of the security obligation exceeds the corresponding element of the secured obligation, the security obligation does not become void. Rather, the respective element of the security obligation is reduced correspondingly.

One application of the principle of dependency occurs upon the transfer of the right to performance of the secured obligation. Due to the practical importance of this phenomenon, this consequence of dependency is usually spelt out explicitly. For voluntary transfers of rights to performance (i.e. assignments) III.–5:115 (Rights transferred to assignee) paragraph (1) provides that "all accessory rights, including accessory rights securing the performance" of the assigned right are transferred to the assignee. This is supplemented for security rights which are not accessory by an obligation of the assignor to transfer such rights to the assignee (III.–5:112 (Undertakings by assignor) paragraph (6)). In addition, legal transfers are often provided for non-contractual transfers of claims, especially in the form of subrogation to a creditor's rights if a person other than the (principal) debtor performs an obligation of the latter. Examples in the present rules can be found in IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraphs (1) and (3) and provisions which refer to this rule.

C. Exceptions

Debtor's insolvency and equivalent events. However, the principle of dependency does not apply in the case of necessity for which the security has been designed, namely where the debtor's obligations are reduced or it is even discharged in an insolvency proceeding. Generally speaking, an insolvency proceeding over the debtor's assets does not affect the debtor's liabilities. Even less does this occur when the opening of such proceedings has been refused, for whatever reason, especially due to insufficient assets of the debtor. Therefore, the relevant personal securities are not affected either.

However, modern insolvency laws tend to provide more and more for opportunities to discharge insolvent debtors, at least certain classes of debtors. Alternatively, the reorganisation of a commercial company and similar arrangements with creditors are provided for in which these may agree to reduce their claims. Nevertheless, the dependent personal securities securing obligations that are reduced or discharged should remain fully effective since they have been agreed upon precisely for the purpose of protecting the secured creditor against the risk of such insolvency.

The same is true if special laws enacted in times of war or general economic crisis liberate fully or partly national debtors or debtors who have fallen in distress. Such laws may for instance provide that debtors must make payments on secured obligations that have fallen due, to a prescribed national institution and that such payments discharge the debtor. Or the secured obligations may simply be declared discharged. Apart from specific legislation, such special rules may also be developed by court practice. Security providers living, or having assets outside these jurisdictions remain liable since they (or their foreign assets) are not subject to such measures which are directed at the persons of a circle of more or less closely defined debtors (cf. paragraph (2)(c)). However, even if such laws or practice discharge the debtor, personal security granted to the debtor is not affected since it would run counter to the very purpose of security which is meant to secure the creditor against risks of this kind.

D. Amount of security

Paragraph (3) gives rules on determining the amount of a security if this has not been expressly fixed by the parties, except if the security provider had assumed a global security. The amount may either be determined from the agreement of the parties, e.g. if a security is provided for the purchase price of a specific new car according to the dealer's price list. If the amount cannot be ascertained in this way, then the amount of the security is equal to the amount of the secured obligation at the time at which the security became effective. The security becomes effective upon its creation if at that time the obligation to be secured had already come into existence. By contrast, if the obligation to be secured comes into existence only after creation of the security, the latter becomes effective only at this latter point in time. This will generally correspond to the intention of both parties.

The question which ancillary obligations of the debtor are covered by the amount of the security, is answered separately by IV.G.–2:104 (Coverage of security).

The last term of paragraph (3) indirectly confirms the earlier rule that future claims can be secured, although within the limits indicated by this rule (cf. IV.G.–1:101 (Definitions) sub-paragraph (a)). A suggestion that a maximum amount might be fixed for the protection of security providers has not been followed for commercial security providers since it would unduly restrict business practices. However, if a consumer provides a global security or a specific personal security without a fixed maximum amount, such a security is reduced to a fixed amount which is determined by the amount of the secured obligations at the date on which the security became effective (IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (a)).

Subsequent increases of secured obligation. In the interest of protecting security providers, the extent of their security obligations is, as a rule, fixed at the time at which the security becomes effective; again, this is the presumed intention of both parties. Subsequent increases of the secured obligation, therefore, do not bind the security provider. This applies not only to an outright increase of the amount of the secured obligation; or an aggravation of the payment terms; or to a predating of maturity; but also to the aggravation of other terms of the personal security.

An extension of maturity, by contrast, usually will not increase the security provider's burden provided the security provider keeps within the time limit of the security, if any. If exceptionally there is an increase of burden (e.g., if the debtor has become insolvent), the creditor is liable according to IV.G.–2:110 (Reduction of creditor's rights).

E. Further incidents of dependency

Less frequently arising issues of dependency are not expressly regulated in these rules on personal security. However, solutions can be derived via IV.G.–1:108 (Subsidiary application of rules on solidary debtors) from the general rules on solidary debtors laid down in Book III, Chapter 4, Section 1. Comment C to IV.G.–1:108 applies to the relationship between debtor and solidarily liable security provider.

F. Consumers as security providers

Dependent personal security. Only the application of paragraphs (3) and (4) calls for special explanatory remarks.

Paragraph (3) is supplemented in favour of consumer providers of a dependent security (as well as in relation to other consumer security providers) by IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (a). Specifically this means that the exception spelt out in the first half-sentence of paragraph (3) concerning global securities without a maximum amount is not applicable.

Generally, agreements between creditor and debtor increasing in any respect the burdens of the secured obligation do not affect the security provider. The exception in favour of a global security in paragraph (4) is qualified for consumers by IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (a): unless a maximum amount had been agreed for the security, the amount covered by the security has to be determined according to paragraph (3) of the present Article. Amendments can only bind the consumer security provider if they do not exceed the maximum limit of the security.

The rules on a consumer's dependent personal security are mandatory in favour of the security provider (cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2)).

Other types of personal security. For consumers who have provided security in any form other than dependent security, paragraph (1) and paragraph (2) first sentence of the present Article are also binding. For a consumer who has granted an independent personal security this follows from IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c) and for a consumer's co-debtorship for security purposes this follows from IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1). These two provisions declare applicable the rules of Chapter 2 on dependent personal security, and in the present context these rules are mandatory in favour of the consumer security provider.

For a consumer's co-debtorship for security purposes, additional protective rules are to be found in III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors), III.–4:108 (Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations); III.–4:109 (Release or settlement in solidary obligations) and III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations). These provisions remain applicable in favour of a consumer co-debtor for security purposes.

For independent personal security, the exception to the principle of dependency established by paragraph (2) second sentence merely spells out the general rule: the fate of a possibly underlying claim of the creditor against the debtor in an insolvency proceeding over the latter's assets is irrelevant for the security provider's liability towards the creditor.

The effect of a reduction or discharge of one of several co-debtors as a consequence of an insolvency proceeding over the assets of that co-debtor is nowhere explicitly spelt out. However, it would seem that such partial or full discharge is a personal defence in the sense of III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations) paragraph (1) sentence 1 and therefore does not benefit any co-debtor. This result would also be in conformity with the security purpose pursued by a co-debtorship for security purposes. The result conforms to paragraph (2) sentence 2 of the present Article and therefore is in harmony with the results reached for providers of dependent as well as independent security.

Paragraphs (3) and (4) are provisions for the protection of the security provider; as such they are applicable for the protection of consumer providers of an independent security or of a co-debtorship for security purposes as well (cf. IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (a) and IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1) respectively). However, as in the case of a consumer provider of dependent security, paragraphs (3) and (4) apply to the consumer security providers of an independent security or a co-debtorship for security purposes only subject to the specific consumer protection effects of IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (a), which is applicable to all types of personal security by consumers.

In the present context, the rules of the Article are mandatory in favour of the consumer, cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2). And in the context of a consumer security provider's co-debtorship for security purposes the term "debtor" in the present Article means the debtor whose obligation is secured.

NOTES

1. In all member states the dependent personal security is due only when and to the extent that the secured obligation is due. This common feature, which has decisive consequences for the regime of dependent personal security, is the principle of dependency. In the national laws, especially of the CONTINENTAL countries, it is better known under the name of accessority. It is everywhere recognized as a general principle of EUROPEAN private law, basically aiming at the protection of the security provider (van Erp 309 ss.).

I. Nature of secured obligation

(a) Any kind of obligation

2. By a contract of dependent personal security, the provider of security assumes vis-à-vis the creditor responsibility for the payment of a third person's obligation (GERMAN CC § 765(1); GREEK CC art. 847; PORTUGUESE CC art. 627). In general it is possible to grant a dependent personal security for every kind of financial obligation, irrespective of its source or object (GERMANY: Palandt/Sprau § 765 no. 17; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 35, PORTUGAL: Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela 644). Hence, the dependent personal security can also secure an obligation to hand over a specific object or an obligation to do or not to do something (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 178-184; FRANCE: Simler no. 209 s.; GERMANY: Palandt/Sprau § 765 no. 17; GREECE: A.P. 691/1955, A.P. 692/1955, NoB 4, 455 ss.; ITALY: Fragali, Della fideiussione 98; Giusti 27; NETHERLANDS: Blomkwist no. 3; PORTUGAL: Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela 644; SCOTLAND: Gloag and Irvine 645; SPAIN: Vicent Chuliá 379) or secure against a "default or miscarriage of another person" (ENGLAND: Mercers Co. v. New Hampshire Insurance Co. [1992] 1 WLR 792; PORTUGAL: Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela 644; SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 89). Which obligation the personal security right secures, depends on the construction of the contract between the parties (DENMARK: Højrup 30 ss.; Pedersen, Kaution 15 s.; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 36 ss.).

3. If the dependent personal security secures a monetary obligation, the security provider's obligation will consist in a monetary obligation of the same content (GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 35) and, in some countries, the security provider also has to procure that the debtor performs the secured obligation (ENGLAND: Moschi v. Lep Air Services Ltd. [1973] AC 331, 348 (HL); SCOTLAND: Erskine III, 3, 61; Stair/Eden no. 918).

4. If the dependent personal security is provided in respect of a non-monetary obligation, e.g. a non-monetary performance or a forbearance of the debtor, then the security provider is obliged to pay damages to the creditor to the same extent as the debtor for the non-performance of the debtor's obligation, but does not have to perform the debtor's obligation (AUSTRIA: expressly CC § 1350; Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1350 no. 1; DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 49; ENGLAND: O´Donovan and Phillips no. 10-203; FRANCE: Simler no. 209; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn no. 14 preceding §§ 765 ff.; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 35; ITALY: Giusti 31; SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark no. 918), in particular when the non-monetary obligation of the debtor is not fungible (NETHERLANDS: cf. CC art. 7:854; du Perron and Haentjens art. 854 no. 1; SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 89). In GERMANY the same result is achieved by means of interpretation of the contract of security (Palandt/Sprau § 765 no. 25).

(b) Another security provider's obligation as secured obligation

5. Almost in every member state the secured obligation may be the security engagement of a primary security provider (AUSTRIA: CC § 1348; BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2014(2) (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2291(2)); ITALIAN CC art. 1948; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn nos. 57-59 preceding § 765; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:870; PORTUGUESE CC art. 630; SPANISH CC art. 1823(2)). But this security (certification de caution) is not very often used in FRANCE, because creditors prefer the more practicable securities with solidary liability (Simler no. 116).

(c) Future or conditional secured obligation

6. Future and conditional obligations may be secured in all member states (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 186; DUTCH CC art. 7:851(2) for future obligations and art. 6:26 for conditional obligations; ENGLAND: prospective securities, cf. Andrews and Millett no. 4-016; FRANCE: (for future obligations) see new CC art. 2301 as proposed by the Grimaldi Commission and Simler nos. 210 ss.; GERMAN CC § 765(2); GREEK CC art. 848; ITALIAN CC art. 1938; PORTUGAL: CC art. 628(2); Almeida Costa 785; SCOTLAND: Stair/Eden no. 835; SPAIN: CC art. 1825; Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 99 ss.). The parties are free in GERMANY to agree to secure all future obligations that will be created in a specific period of time (Reinicke and Tiedtke no. 150). In these cases the security provider is liable for all obligations which fall due in the agreed period of time and, contrary to the case of a security with time limit for the resort to the security (cf. IV.G.–2:108), the creditor is entitled to demand performance from the security provider even after expiration of the agreed time limit. Regarding global securities, see national notes to IV.G.–1:101 nos. 40-46.

(d) Restrictions

7. However, there are general limits regarding a security provided for future claims: In BELGIUM, FRANCE, GERMANY, GREECE, PORTUGAL, SPAIN and the NETHERLANDS there must be enough elements in the contract of security to determine the secured obligation at a later moment (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 186, 188 and 191; FRANCE: CA Paris 17 February 1998, RD banc 1998, 177; Simler no. 210; GERMANY: BGH 30 March 1995, NJW 1995, 1886; Palandt*/Sprau* § 765 no. 7; Erman*/Herrmann* § 765 no. 3; GREECE: CFI Athens 975/1997, EED 48, 704; Georgiades § 3 nos. 36, 51-55; ITALY: Cass. 18 July 1997 no. 6635, Giur.it.Mass. 1997, 651; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:851(2); PORTUGAL: STJ 11 May 2000, 250/00 www.dgsi.pt; According to a liberal court doctrine, in SPAIN it suffices that the parties and the underlying transaction are sufficiently enough, and that a maximum amount is fixed (TS 23 february 2000, RAJ 2000/1242). The future or conditional claim must be somehow defined in order to prevent an excessive burden upon the security provider (DUTCH CC art. 7:851(2): "sufficiently determinable"; Blomkwist no. 11; FRANCE: Simler no. 210; without the intention to impose excessive burden, in application of this principle GERMAN modern case law and most writers nowadays, cf. only BGH 18 May 1995, BGHZ 130, 19; Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten nos. 840-841; Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 21 in fine; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 36; PORTUGAL: STJ 30 September 1999, 436/99 www.dgsi.pt; SPAIN: Reyes López 217). This determination does not have to be precise, but one should be able to identify the legal relationship which may give rise to the future claim. In FRANCE, the interest rates do not have to be mentioned in the contract of security for future obligations, contrary to the case of security for present obligations (Cass.com. 9 March 2004, D. 2004, 2706, note Aynès).

8. It suffices that the obligation has come into existence, or that the condition has been fulfilled, at the time when a demand is made against the provider of the security (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 185-187; GERMANY: Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 9; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 36; ITALY: CC art. 1938; Foschini 465; Giusti 156; NETHERLANDS: Blomkwist no. 11; du Perron and Haentjens art. 851 no. 5; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 786; SPAIN: CC art. 1825; Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 80 s.).

9. In the NETHERLANDS the validity of securities for a conditional obligation is usually derived from CC art. 6:26, according to which the provisions on unconditional obligations apply to conditional obligations to the extent that the conditional character of the obligation in question permits (Blomkwist 24). In SPAIN the performance of the security can only be requested when the secured debt is fixed (CC art. 1825; TS 29 April 1992, RAJ 1992 no. 4470).

10. By contrast, in DENMARK, pursuant to the agreement between the DANISH Consumer Council and the Financial Council a security by a consumer for future and conditional obligations is not allowed.

(e) Maximum amount for future obligations

11. In ITALY dependent personal securities for future obligations must indicate a maximum secured amount (CC art. 1938 as amended 1992); otherwise they are in toto void (for an analogical application of that rule to a binding comfort letter see CFI Roma 18 December 2002, Giur.mer. 2003, 1661). Agreements exceeding an indicated maximum amount are pro tanto invalid (De Nictolis 207 ss.). In the NETHERLANDS, if at the time at which a non-professional party assumes a security the amount of the obligation of the debtor is not yet determined, the security is only valid to the extent of an agreed maximum amount, expressed in money (DUTCH CC art. 7:858(1)). This provision is mandatory for consumer providers of security (cf. CC art. 7:862 lit. a). In PORTUGAL, the indication of a maximum amount seems to be indispensable (STJ 19 October 1999, BolMinJus no. 490, 262). Furthermore, a dependent personal security that secures a future obligation may be terminated by the security provider before the obligation to be secured has actually come into existence, if the debtor's financial situation deteriorates or if, unless another time has been agreed, five years have passed since it was provided (PORTUGUESE CC art. 654). In SPAIN a maximum amount is required for the global security to be valid (TS 23 February 2000, RAJ 2000/1242).

II. Extent of the security obligation

(a) General rule

12. As a consequence of the principle of dependency, the security provider's liability is no greater than that of the debtor, in terms of amount, time for payment and the conditions under which the debtor is liable. Security obligations exceeding the secured obligations are automatically reduced to the limits of the latter (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2013 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2290); DUTCH CC arts. 7:851 and 7:860; FINNISH LDepGuar § 5(2); GERMANY: cf. CC § 767(1) sentence 1; Palandt/Sprau § 767 no. 1; GREEK CC art. 851; ITALIAN CC art. 1941; PORTUGAL: CC art. 627(2) and 631; SPANISH CC art. 1826). The same is true for ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law, where the security provider's liability is said to be co-extensive with the debtor's (ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett no. 6-002; IRELAND: White 541; SCOTLAND: Stair/Eden no. 918).

13. GERMAN CC § 767(1) sentence 1 provides that the extent of the secured obligation at any time determines the obligation of the security provider. Consequently, the security provider is bound by modifications, including extensions, of the secured obligation that are not based on agreement between creditor and debtor (cf. GERMAN CC § 767(1) sentence 2 and Palandt/Sprau § 767 no. 2).

(b) Specific rules

14. In the NETHERLANDS it is stipulated by a provision which is mandatory for consumer sureties (cf. CC art. 7:862 lit. a) that a security provider is not bound by more onerous terms than those by which the debtor is bound, except however to the extent that they concern the manner in which proof of the existence and extent of the obligation of the principal debtor can be made against the security provider (CC art. 7:860; Blomkwist no. 26).

(c) Consequences of accessority upon assignment of secured claim

15. As a direct consequence of the accessory character of the dependent security, in most of the European legal systems a dependent security right passes to the assignee automatically with the assignment of the right to performance of the secured obligation. This rule is widespread in European codes and doctrines which state that every accessory right passes to the assignee automatically with the assignment of the principal right, without the need for a separate act of transfer (AUSTRIA: implicitly CC § 1393; OGH 17 March 1987, SZ 60 no. 46 at p. 244; DENMARK: Ussing, Kaution 98; BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG for civil debts: CC art. 1692; FRANCE for professional debts: MonC art. L 313-27(3); GERMANY: CC §§ 398, 401; ITALY: CC art. 1263(1); NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:142 and 3:82; PORTUGAL: CC art. 482; SPAIN: CC art. 1528; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 88 s.). Under ENGLISH law, however, the assignee of the secured claim is entitled to the rights under the dependent security only if the benefit of the security has been expressly or impliedly assigned along with the secured claim (O´Donovan and Phillips no. 10-176).

16. In FRANCE, contrary to the rules on assignment of rights to performance, court practice had held that the dependent personal security can not be transmitted automatically as an accessory contract to the new creditor upon an assignment. Rather, the dependent personal security was extinguished upon sale of a rented building by the secured lessor (Cass.com. 26 October 1999, D. 2000, 224, note Aynès) or even after a merger-absorption of the secured creditor (Cass.civ. 28 September 2004, JCP E 2005, no. 14 p. 619). It was considered that firstly the assignment of these contracts is generally not recognised in FRENCH law and that secondly the dependent personal security is concluded in consideration of the person ("intuitus personae") and can not be extended outside its limits (CC arts. 2013 and 2015 (since 2006: CC arts. 2290 and 2292)). This opinion has recently been reversed by a plenary decision of the Court of Cassation (for sale of rented buildings: Cass.ass.plén. 6 December 2004, D. 2005, 227, note Aynès; also for merger-acquisition: Cass.com. 8 November 2005, in JCP E 2006 II, no. 1000, note Legeais). According to the path-breaking decision of December 2004, the change of creditor is not essential for the contract of security in so far as the terms of the engagement of the security provider are the same. The dependent security is considered as a necessary accessory of the contract of rent which is itself by law (cf. CC art. 1743) accessory to a contract of sale of a building.

III. Exception upon discharge of debtor in insolvency proceedings and comparable events

(a) Insolvency proceedings

17. In no European country is the security provider released by virtue of the debtor's insolvency (AUSTRIA: Bankruptcy Act § 151 and Composition Act § 48; BELGIUM: Bankruptcy Act of 8 August 1997, last modified in 2005, arts. 21 § 1 and 35 § 4; however, there is a partial or full discharge of a consumer security provider if the engagement is disproportionate in relation to his or her income and assets: Judicial Composition Act of 1997 art. 80(3); Cass. 16 November 2001, JLMB 2001, 1731; Lebon, Borgtocht nos. 1-7; in the context of the Collective Debt Rescheduling Act of 5 July 1998: Dirix and De Corte no. 421; DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 106 ss.; ENGLISH Insolvency Act s. 281(7); FINLAND: LDepGuar § 21, RP 189/1998 rd 58 ss.; FRANCE: Ccom art. L 631-14 II for enterprise insolvency and CC art. 2308(2) as proposed by the Grimaldi Commission for insolvency of individuals; since Law no. 2005-845 of 26 July 2005 on Safeguard of Enterprises this is true even if the creditor omits to declare the claim at the opening of the insolvency procedure (Ccom art. L 622-26); GERMAN Insolvency Statute § 254(2) sentence 1; GREECE: Filios II/I § 127, fn. 29 at p. 89; ITALY: Cass. 17 July 2003 no. 11200, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, 1709 s.; Cass. 27 June 1998 no. 6355, Fallim 1999, 525; LUXEMBOURG: Ravarani, Rapport Luxembourgeois 437-438; NETHERLANDS: Bankruptcy Act art. 241, 300 and 340(3); SCOTLAND: Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act s. 60; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 157 ss.). In SWEDISH law it is required that the creditor has to take all necessary steps to make the debtor pay, but he need not wait for the bankruptcy of the debtor before performance can be claimed from the security provider (Gorton, Suretyship 592 fn. 31). In SPAIN, although with some uncertainty, Supreme Court doctrine held in the past that in bankruptcy proceedings the security provider was not discharged, even in cases in which the insolvency plan approved a partial or total release of the debtor (Carrasco, Tratado, pp. 204 ff). This rule has been upheld in the present art. 135 of the Insolvency Law of 2003.

18. What effect has the avoidance of a performance made by the debtor in the suspect period upon personal security securing the avoided performance? In GERMANY the monetary claim underlying the returned performance is revived and both accessory and non-accessory security rights of any type for the claim are also revived (Frankfurter Kommentar/Dauernheim § 144 no. 3; CA Frankfurt/Main 25 November 2003, ZIP 2004, 271). In GREECE it has been held that a security is valid when provided in favour of a bankrupt debtor, even though any unilateral act reducing the latter's property, including an abstract acknowledgement of debt, is null in regard to the creditors when done during the suspect period, since it remains valid between the creditor and the debtor and subsequently the former can turn against the security provider and demand payment of the debt (cf. CA Athens 5511/1975, NoB 24, 85; Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 850 no. 12).

19. In GERMANY it is held that even the disappearance of a debtor company, if due to insufficient assets, does not discharge the provider of a dependent security; rather, the security is maintained as an independent obligation and can then be assigned as such (BGH 25 November 1981, BGHZ 82, 323, 327 s.; Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 126).

(b) Transfer moratorium

20 The AUSTRIAN Supreme Court has held that an Austrian security provider of a claim against a Hungarian debtor cannot invoke vis-à-vis the Austrian creditor a transfer moratorium issued by the Hungarian government (OGH 5 September 1934, SZ 16 no. 162, p. 451 s.).

(c) Voluntary arrangements between the debtor and creditors

21. According to DUTCH, GERMAN and GREEK statute law as well as PORTUGUESE and SPANISH case law an arrangement between the debtor and creditors to avoid bankruptcy proceedings or a moratorium as well as a rescheduling agreement of a non-professional debtor do not release the security provider (DUTCH Bankruptcy Act art. 160 and 272 no. 5; GERMAN Statute on Insolvency § 254(2) sentence 1; GREECE: cf. Commercial Law art. 643; Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 853 no. 29; PORTUGAL: Insolvency Code arts. 63, 81(2) and 245). However, if the creditor has accepted the arrangement, the security provider is released (STJ 19 April 2001, 329/01 www.dgsi.pt; STJ 18 November 1999, 859/99 www.dgsi.pt (no discharge by moratorium); According to some past SPANISH case law (Carrasco, Tratado, p. 206) a creditor would lose the right vis-à-vis the surety where the creditor has taken positive steps to get the release agreement approved; nowadays this rule has been probably upheld in the art. 135 Insolvency Law of 2003 . Also from ITALIAN statutory law it can be inferred that a voluntary agreement in bankruptcy between the debtor and creditors does not release the security provider (L.fall art. 140(3); art. 184; cf. Cass. 6 August 2002 no. 11771, Giust.civ.Mass. 2002, 1479). In GERMANY it is expressly provided that, while the security provider is not released vis-à-vis the creditor (cf. above), the debtor is released as against the security provider (Insolvency Statute § 254(2) sentence 2), so that recourse against the debtor is excluded. Corresponding rules probably also exist in other countries since otherwise the debtor's (partial) release would not be effective. In GREECE, however, the security provider who pays to the creditor part of the debt, participates in the insolvency procedure as creditor entitled to partial reimbursement (cf. Commercial Law art. 641 sentence 2; Georgiades § 3 no. 213).

22. In ENGLAND voluntary arrangements under Part VIII of the Insolvency Act 1986 regularly release the security provider because they are based on the parties' consent and thus the common law rules on variation of the principal contract (see below at IV) apply (Johnson v. Davies [1999] Ch 117); only if the creditor expressly reserves rights against the security provider will the latter not be released (Andrews and Millett no. 9-014). In FRANCE the same solution is in case of partial release of the debtor commonly admitted by court practice (Cass.com. 5 May 2004, Bull.civ. 2004 IV no. 84 p. 87; contra for release of debts: Cass.com. 13 November 1996, JCP E 1997, II no. 903, note Legeais; Simler no. 478), even if the security provider was excluded from the arrangement about debt releases and delays: the principle of good faith in contracting has to be respected. But the Law on Safeguard of Enterprises no. 2005-845 of 26 July 2005 now expressly recognizes the release of the security provider subsequently to the debtor's release in the procédure de conciliation (Ccom art. L 611-10(3)).

(d) No release of the security provider despite debtor's discharge

23. According to FRENCH consumer law the security provider is not discharged even after the partial release of the consumer debtor during the insolvency procedure (Simler no. 719). The security provider has only the right to be informed about the opening of this procedure (ConsC art. L. 331-3; CC art. 2024 sentence 2 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2301 sentence 2)).

24. The GERMAN Statute on Insolvency allows consumer debtors under certain conditions to obtain release from almost all existing obligations six years after termination of an insolvency procedure (cf. §§ 286-303, especially § 287(2) and § 300(1)). But according to § 301(2) sentence 1, security providers may not invoke this release vis-à-vis the creditor, although they have no recourse against the debtor (ibidem sentence 2).

25. The BELGIAN legislator is presently preparing an amendment to the Bankruptcy Act under which in specific situations the privilege of a discharged bankrupt trader would be extended to the trader's security provider.

IV. Agreement aggravating the secured obligation

(a) Generally

26. According to AUSTRIAN, BELGIAN, DANISH, FINNISH, FRENCH, GERMAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN law as well as GREEK, ITALIAN and SPANISH case law, agreements between the creditor and the debtor to increase the extent, to aggravate the conditions and terms or to predate the maturity of the secured obligations agreed upon after the security provider had assumed the security do not bind the latter (AUSTRIA: Rummel/Gamerith § 1353 no. 4; Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1351 no. 14; DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 79 s.; FINLAND: LDepGuar § 8(1); RP 189/1998 rd 40 s.; FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC arts. 2013 and 2015 (since 2006: FRENCH CC arts. 2290 and 2292); BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 241 ss.; FRANCE: Simler nos. 462 ss.; GERMAN CC § 767(1) sentence 3; GREECE: CA Thessaloniki 2539/1989, Arm 43, 986; Georgiades § 3 no. 111; ITALY: CC art. 1941(1) and 3; Giusti 141 ss., 150 s.; Cass. 20 February 1999 no. 1427, Giur.it. 1999 I 1576; SPAIN: art. 1835 CC and SAP Ciudad Real 26 January 1995, AC 1995/148).

27. By contrast, under ENGLISH law any material variation of the terms of the contract for the secured obligation will even discharge the security provider (Holme v. Brunskill (1877-78) 3 QBD 495; Chitty/Whittaker no 44-089). A security provider who assents to the variation will remain liable, however, unless after the variation the contract for the secured obligation is no longer within the general purview of the original dependent security; in this case there must be a new contract of security (cf. Trade Indemnity Co. Ltd. v. Workington Harbour & Dock Board (No. 1) [1937] AC 1; Triodosbank NV v. Dobbs [2005] EWCA Civ 630, [2005] 2 Lloyd's Rep 588). The same rule as to the discharge of the security provider by reason of a variation of the terms of the contract for the secured obligation applies in IRELAND (MacEnroe v. Allied Irish Banks Ltd. [1980] ILRM 171; White 545 s.), unless the variation is limited to a severable part of the contract.

(b) Details

28. GERMAN CC § 767(1) sentence 3 provides that the obligation of the security provider is not increased by any legal transaction entered into by the debtor after the assumption of the dependent personal security. Consequently, the security provider is not bound by any legal transaction that worsens the security provider's position, unless there is only a minor change that does not affect the substance of the secured obligation and that therefore, according to bona fides, appears to be reasonable for the security provider (BGH 1 March 1962, WM 1962, 701; Palandt/Sprau § 767 no. 3; Erman/Herrmann § 767 no. 9). In the NETHERLANDS, a special rule is laid down in

CC art. 7:861(4). A non-professional security provider is not bound by future obligations arising from a legal act, which the creditor has performed without being obliged to do so, after he had become aware of circumstances which have considerably diminished the possibility of recovering from the debtor. This rule does not apply if the security provider explicitly consented to the legal act or unless this act could not be postponed (Blomkwist no. 29).

(c) In particular: extension of time

Discharge

29. In ENGLAND, IRELAND and SCOTLAND the security provider is also discharged if the creditor gives additional time to the debtor (ENGLAND: Swire v. Redman (1875-76) 1 QBD 536; Andrews and Millett no. 9-029; IRELAND: White 545; SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark no. 965), because this would affect the security provider's right to pay off the creditor and then to sue the debtor in the name of the creditor. The security provider remains liable under ENGLISH law, however, if the creditor, on postponing the debt's payment date or releasing the principal debtor, notifies the principal debtor that rights against the security provider are reserved (cf. Greene King v. Stanley [2001] EWCA Civ 1966, [2002] BPIR 491; O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 6-66 ss.) Also according to SPANISH CC art. 1851 "an extension (of time) granted to the debtor by the creditor without the security provider's consent extinguishes the security". An express consent is not necessary if the security provider already knew about the possibility of tacit extension at the time of assumption of the security (TS 8 May 1984, RAJ 1984/2399). Consequently, the SPANISH Supreme Court has declared art. 1851 as not applicable in the case of security for future or conditional debts (TS 31 October 1984, RAJ 1984/5153).

(d) No discharge

30. By contrast, according to AUSTRIAN courts and writers an extension of time to the debtor does not release the security provider (OGH 4 May 2005, JBl. 2005, 722, 724 s.; OGH 6 May 1954, ÖJZ 1954, 455 no. 312; Rummel/Gamerith § 1353 no. 4). Also according to FRENCH and BELGIAN CC art. 2039 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2316) and PORTUGUESE case law the extension of time granted to the debtor by the creditor does not discharge the security provider (PORTUGAL: STJ 24 January 1989, 77015 www.dgsi.pt). The security provider may also profit from the postponement of the due date, but can equally well waive the right to profit from this postponement (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 326-329; FRANCE: Simler nos. 464 ss.). Pursuant to a minority FRENCH opinion CC art. 2039 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2316) is applied also to the security provider with solidary liability (Simler no. 465), although the strict application of the rules on solidarity would exclude this solution (cf. FRENCH and BELGIAN CC art. 2021 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2298)). As CC art. 2039 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2316) is not compulsory, the parties can agree otherwise and discharge the security provider if the latter does not consent to the extension of time granted to the debtor by the creditor (Simler no. 469).

IV.G.–2:103: Debtor's defences available to the security provider

(1) As against the creditor, the security provider may invoke any defence of the debtor with respect to the secured obligation, even if the defence is no longer available to the debtor due to acts or omissions of the debtor occurring after the security became effective.

(2) The security provider is entitled to refuse to perform the security obligation if:

(a) the debtor is entitled to withdraw from the contract with the creditor under Book II, Chapter 5 (Right of Withdrawal).

(b) the debtor has a right to withhold performance under III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation); or

(c) the debtor is entitled to terminate the debtor's contractual relationship with the creditor under Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5 (Termination).

(3) The security provider may not invoke the lack of capacity of the debtor, whether a natural person or a legal entity, or the non-existence of the debtor, if a legal entity, if the relevant facts were known to the security provider at the time when the security became effective.

(4) As long as the debtor is entitled to avoid the contract from which the secured obligation arises on a ground other than those mentioned in the preceding paragraph and has not exercised that right, the security provider is entitled to refuse performance.

(5) The preceding paragraph applies with appropriate adaptations if the secured obligation is subject to set-off.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article supplements the preceding Article by clarifying another aspect of the dependency of the security upon the secured obligation, i.e. the debtor's defences which are available to the security provider.

B. The principle

The main rule is laid down in the first sentence of paragraph (1): "any defence" available to the debtor may be invoked by the security provider. This general rule is in keeping with the principle of dependency laid down in paragraph (1) of the preceding Article.

However, an important qualification to the principle of dependency is established by the last half-sentence of paragraph (1): Any defence that originally had existed but which was lost later due to acts or omissions of the debtor can nevertheless be relied upon by the security provider if the loss occurred after the security became effective. Examples are a loss of a defence due to a waiver by the debtor; or an omission to raise the defence before it becomes time-barred. The rationale of this exception is to protect the security provider's expectancy to be able to continue to rely on any defence of the debtor which existed at the time the security became effective.

Existence of secured obligation. The secured obligation may not exist. In such a case there is technically no debtor. Nonetheless there may be an appearance of an obligation (for example, a forged document purporting to be signed by the debtor, or a contract which is invalid for some other reason) and the creditor may try to invoke the security. Of course, the security provider can invoke the nullity of the document or the invalidity of the contract just as the apparent debtor could do.

Correspondingly, the secured obligation may have arisen but may thereafter have been duly paid by the debtor or a third person. In this case also, the security provider may counter any possible claim by the creditor by relying on the extinction of the secured obligation just as the debtor could do.

An invalidity of the contract or other juridical act giving rise to the secured obligation may have a variety of causes of a personal nature or related to the subject matter. The debtor may be subject to an incapacity which is unknown to the security provider (so that paragraph (3) does not apply). The underlying contract may have been avoided by the debtor for some such reason as fraud, mistake or threats (cf. Book III, Chapter 7, Section 2) or it may run counter to a legal prohibition and therefore be void or avoided by a court (cf. Book III, Chapter 7, Section 3).

Extent of the secured obligation. Since the obligation of the security provider does not extend beyond the secured obligation, on maturity of the security the security provider will first have to ascertain the exact extent or amount of the secured obligation at the point in time at which it has fallen due. If the dependent security has been given for a current account, it will be necessary to look at the balance of the account at the date of maturity of the security. A common situation where the extent of the secured obligation is likely to be relevant for the purposes of the present Article is where the debtor has paid part of the debt. If the creditor than tries to recover the whole amount from the security provider, the latter can invoke the part payment just as the debtor could do.

Performance of the secured obligation not due. The secured obligation may exist but performance may not be due. It may, for example, be subject to a suspensive condition which has not yet been fulfilled or a suspensive time limit which has not yet arrived. Or the debtor may have a right to refuse performance. An important example is where the period of prescription of the secured obligation has run. According to III.–7:501 (General effect) paragraph (1), after expiry of the period of prescription "the debtor is entitled to refuse performance". The security provider may invoke this defence of the debtor, whether or not the debtor had already invoked it. If, however, the security provider had already performed the prescribed obligation, anything conferred by the performance cannot be reclaimed merely because the period of prescription had expired (III.–7:501 (General effect) paragraph (2)).

C. Right to refuse performance

The second paragraph deals with three situations which are not technically defences of the debtor but in which the debtor could nevertheless lawfully refuse performance or bring about such a situation by giving notice. The first (sub-paragraph (2)(a)) is where the debtor has a right to withdraw from the contract with the creditor under the rules on this subject in Book II, Chapter 5. This right will often be of short duration and once the debtor loses it the security provider will also lose the right to refuse performance on that basis. The second situation (sub-paragraph (2)(b)) is where the debtor under the general rules of Book III has a right to withhold performance to the creditor, e.g. because the latter is refusing to perform a reciprocal obligation in time. The security provider may in effect invoke the debtor's right in order to withhold performance of the security obligation to the creditor. Again this right to refuse performance may be temporary. If later the creditor performs, then the security provider is no longer allowed to refuse performance to the creditor. The third situation is where the debtor has a right to terminate the debtor's contractual relationship with the creditor under the rules in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5. The typical case would be a right to termination for fundamental non-performance by the creditor of the creditor's obligations under the contract.

D. Debtor's lack of capacity

Many countries establish one exception to the principle, which relates to defects or lack of full capacity of the debtor and, in the case of a debtor legal entity, also the lack of legal personality. However, these incapacities or the non-existence of a legal entity must have been known to the security provider at the time when the security became effective. The underlying assumption is that in these cases the security serves the purpose of supplying an important element to overcome the economic consequences resulting from the debtor's "personal defect". But the provider of the security must have willingly incurred this risk. Paragraph (3) lays down this rule.

The consequences which any such lack of full capacity or of legal personality has for the security provider's recourse against the debtor are laid down in IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) paragraph (4).

E. Debtor's unexercised rights of avoidance

The common feature of paragraphs (4) and (5) is that the debtor is entitled to exercise rights of avoidance or set-off but has not done so. Since in general the security provider is not entitled to exercise those rights because of their personal character, but, on the other hand, should not suffer from the debtor's passivity, some substitute must be designed. The position is not dissimilar to that under paragraph (2).

According to paragraph (4), the security provider is entitled to refuse performance where the debtor has not exercised an available right of avoidance. Examples are a right to avoid the contract which is the basis for a monetary claim by the creditor on the ground of a threat committed by the creditor or a mistake of the debtor. The granting of a right of refusing performance is a compromise: on the one hand, the security provider should not be entitled to exercise the debtor's right of avoidance since this is based upon a personal decision of the debtor but, on the other hand, should not be disadvantaged by the debtor's non-exercise of a right which by virtue of the principle of dependency is to the security provider's benefit.

F. Unexercised rights of set-off

The reasons just given apply equally if the debtor has a right of set-off against the creditor's claim but has not exercised it.

The same reasons apply also when the creditor also has a right of set-off against the debtor, as usually happens when the debtor has such a right. They also apply if exceptionally only the creditor is entitled to set off, but not the debtor.

G. Effectuation

In order to facilitate the effective realisation of the rights enumerated in the present Article, the security provider has not only a right towards the secured debtor but has even an obligation of inquiry according to IV.G.–2:112 (Security provider's obligations before performance) paragraph (1). Further, the security provider is obliged to raise defences which were communicated by the debtor or which were otherwise known to the security provider (IV.G.–2:112 (Security provider's obligations before performance) paragraph (2)).

H. Consumer as security provider

Dependent personal security. If a consumer has assumed a dependent personal security, the rules of the present Article become mandatory in favour of the security provider by virtue of IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2).

Other types of personal security. Paragraphs (1) and (2). From the point of view of a co-debtorship for security purposes, paragraph (1) (subject to the slight qualification in paragraph (2)) allows a security provider to invoke a defence inherent in the debt even in cases where a co-debtor as such had lost this defence due to acts done after the security became effective. This rule goes beyond III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations) paragraph (1) sentence 1. Consequently, if applied to a consumer co-debtor for security purposes by virtue of IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1), this rule places the consumer in a better position than a non-consumer security provider.

If a consumer provides an independent personal security, the same result is achieved by virtue of IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c): the consumer is enabled to invoke defences rooted in an underlying transaction which under the general rules of Chapter 3 the provider of an independent personal security is unable to invoke.

Paragraph (3). Generally, any form of incapacity or even legal inexistence of the debtor, whether a natural person or legal entity, does not affect the obligations of the provider of an independent personal security towards the creditor. The fact that a consumer provider of independent security is by virtue of IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c) bound by paragraph (3) of the present Article does not therefore weaken the provider's position.

The position of a consumer co-debtor for security purposes is similar. III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations) paragraph (1) sentence 1 allows a co-debtor to invoke any defence which another solidary debtor can invoke, other than a defence personal to that other debtor. The incapacity of the debtor whose obligation is secured is a defence personal to that debtor. (See Comment to III.–4:112). So again the fact that the consumer security provider is subject to paragraph (3) of the present Article does not weaken the provider's position.

Paragraphs (4) and (5). For the consumer security provider of an independent personal security, paragraphs (4) and (5) offer remedies which are not available under Chapter 3. Consequently, there can be no objection to the application of these provisions in favour of a consumer provider of an independent personal security according to IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c).

The same conclusion applies to a consumer's co-debtorship for security purposes. Paragraph (4) allows a consumer co-debtor for security purposes to invoke a personal defence of the principal debtor to avoid the contract giving rise to the secured obligation. According to III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations) paragraph (1) sentence 1, such a remedy is not available to a co-debtor (cf. Comment on that Article). Paragraph (4) (as applied by virtue of IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1)) therefore improves the position of the consumer co-debtor for security purposes. And paragraph (5) goes beyond III.–6:107 (Effect of set-off) since it allows the co-debtor to rely on the principal debtor's defence of set-off, although that defence had not yet been exercised and, as a personal defence could not be exercised by the co-debtor. By making these defences available to a consumer co-debtor for security purposes, the position of the consumer co-debtor is improved. This improvement is due to the reference to Chapter 2 which is contained in IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1).

Mandatory character of consumer protection rules. In all instances in which the provisions of the present Article are applicable, these obtain a mandatory character in favour of the consumer by virtue of IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2).

NOTES

I. General principle: extension of debtor's defences to the provider of dependent personal security

1. A primary consequence of the accessority principle is that the liability of the provider of dependent personal security must not be higher than the debtor's. Hence, the defences that are personally available to the provider of dependent security are supplemented by the debtor's defences (AUSTRIA: Rummel/Gamerith § 1351 no. 6; BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 673 ss.; ENGLAND: O´Donovan and Phillips no. 11-46; FRANCE: Simler no. 656 ss.; cf. GERMAN CC § 767(1) sentence 1 and § 768; cf. Palandt/Sprau § 768 no. 6; Staudinger/Horn § 768 no. 16; GREECE: Theodoropoulos 273; ITALY: CC art. 1945; LUXEMBOURG: Ravarani, Jurisprudence récente 915; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:852; PORTUGAL: CC art. 637(1); Almeida Costa 774; SCOTLAND: Stair/Eden no. 841; SPAIN: CC art. 1853; Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 340). The provider of dependent security may raise as against the creditor pleas of the debtor, even if the latter has desisted from raising these defences (GERMAN CC § 768(2); PORTUGAL: CC art. 637(2); Almeida Costa 774; BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 674; FRANCE: contra Simler no. 231) after creation of the security (cf. GREEK CC art. 853; SPAIN, Carrasco, Tratado, p. 176). However, frequently specific exceptions (e.g., for the case of the debtor's incapacity, nos. 5-6 below) or modifications (for rights of avoidance, cf. nos. 16-19 below) are provided for.
2. In several countries, the debtor's defences that may be raised are specified by providing that the security provider is entitled to raise the defences that are "inherent" to the secured debt, excluding those that are personal to the debtor (cf. BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2036 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2313); DUTCH CC art. 7:852(1), cf. also Blomkwist nos. 17, 32; du Perron and Haentjens art. 852 no. 5; GREEK CC art. 853; SPANISH CC art. 1853). "Personal" are those defences of the debtor which are closely connected to the debtor as a person and, thus, cannot be transferred actively or passively (see nos. 14-21 below). Furthermore, it has been held in GREECE that the provider of dependent security is entitled to raise the debtor's defences even if the security provider has no right of recourse vis-à-vis the debtor or has waived the beneficium discussionis (cf. CA Athens 6902/1995, EllDik 37, 1398 s.; Theodoropoulos 273).The PORTUGUESE CC art. 637(1), on the other hand, uses as criterion the compatibility of the invocable defences with the guaranteeing obligation.

II. General defences

(a) Invalidity of the secured claim

3. According to AUSTRIAN CC § 1351, BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2012(1) (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2289(1)), GREEK CC art. 850, ITALIAN CC art. 1939, PORTUGUESE CC art. 632(1) and SPANISH CC art. 1824, a dependent security presupposes a valid principal debt. The same is true for ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law (cf. Heald v. O´Connor [1971] 1 WLR 497; Andrews and Millett no. 6-019; Swan v. Bank of Scotland (1836) 10 Bligh N.S. 627, 6 ER 231) and for DUTCH law (Pitlo-Croes no. 851) and can be derived indirectly from GERMAN CC § 767. In GREECE the secured debt need not be valid at the time of the assumption of the dependent security, but must be so at the time at which the security provider is called to perform the obligation (cf. Kaukas 437 fn. 1; ErmAK/Zepos art. 850 no.3).

4. As everyone may invoke the "absolute" nullity of a contract, the provider of dependent security can invoke the nullity of the secured debt and therefore of the security (FRANCE: Simler no. 227; GREECE: cf. Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 853 no. 3; ITALY: Fragali, Della fideiussione 317; NETHERLANDS: nullity by law (van rechtswege): Du Perron and Haentjens art. 852 no. 2; PORTUGAL: CC art. 632(1)). In some countries, the provider of dependent security may invoke the nullity of the debt, even if aware of this nullity at the time of the assumption of the dependent security (PORTUGAL: Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela 649, no exception), except regarding the debtor's lack of legal capacity (cf. nos. 5-6 below) and the nullity of the agreement due to excessive interest (GREECE: Kaukas 437; CFI Thessaloniki 399/59, Arm 13, 237). By contrast, in other countries, if the provider of dependent security already knew about the nullity of the secured obligation at the time of the security agreement, the security will be valid (SCOTLAND: Stair/Eden no. 838; SPAIN: Carrasco, Tratado, p. 151). In the latter case, the dependent security may have been assumed in GERMANY for the claim for unjustified enrichment which may arise due to the invalidity of the secured obligation, if one party or both had already made performances (Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht nos. 4 ss.).

(b) Exception

Debtor's incapacity

5. Exceptionally, in many European countries a dependent security is valid even if the debt is defective by reason of any incapacity or limited capacity of the debtor to act legally (especially if a minor, cf. AUSTRIAN CC § 1352; FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC arts. 2012(2) and 2036(2) (since 2006: FRENCH CC arts. 2289(2) and 2313(2)) also BELGIUM: T´ Kint no. 753, Van Quickenborne no. 746; ENGLISH Minors Contracts Act 1987 s. 2; GREEK CC art. 850(2); ITALIAN CC art. 1939 in fine; PORTUGUESE CC art. 632(2) for incapacity and defective consent of the debtor causing a relative nullity, cf. Galvão Telles 279; SCOTLAND: cf. Stevenson v. Adair (1872) 10 M 919; SPANISH CC art. 1824(2)). In most countries, the provider of dependent security must have been aware at the assumption of the dependent security of the debtor's incapacity or limited capacity to contract (FRANCE: Simler no. 219; PORTUGUESE CC art. 632(2) in fine; SPAIN: Reyes López 170). In GREECE the creditor must prove the relevant knowledge of the security provider (cf. Kaukas 439; ErmAK/Zepos art. 850 no. 10; Apostolides art. 850

no. 5); negligent ignorance is not sufficient in this case (same references). Only in AUSTRIA is it provided expressly that a provider of dependent security is bound even if unaware of the lack of capacity (CC § 1352); however, this feature of the rule is generally criticised (Rummel/Gamerith § 1352 no. 4; Koziol and Welser II (-Welser) 139).

6. If a debtor company has acted ultra vires, the provider of dependent security (often a director) is personally liable in (ENGLAND: Yorkshire Railway Waggon Co. v. Maclure (1881-82) 19 Ch. D 478; it has been said, however, that the liability of the personal security provider should depend upon whether the security was intended to cover the risk of non-payment for the reason of legal incapacity of the debtor, cf. also Garrard v. James [1925] Ch 616; Chitty/Whittaker no. 44-036; after abolition of the doctrine of ultra vires by the Companies Act 1989 ss. 108, 109, 111 this problem is now of little relevance). In FRANCE some court decisions (Cass.civ. 27 April 1976, JCP G 1978, I, no. 2902 (79)) tried to assimilate incapacity to the lack of power (e.g. if dependent securities are granted by the manager of a legal person). But since 1980, this assimilation in regard to CC art. 2012(2) is no longer admitted (Cass.com. 25 November 1980, JCP G 1981, IV, no. 56). For SPANISH law, see CA Barcelona 1 February 2002, AC 2002/401 (promoting an application by ananlogy of CC art. 1824.2 to ultra vires transactions carried out by company representatives).

7. FRENCH and GERMAN courts have dealt with cases in which the debtor, a legal entity, was dissolved after assumption of the personal security. In a case where the assets of the dissolved company passed without liquidation to the sole shareholder, the FRENCH Supreme Court held that the dependent personal security remained valid for obligations that arose before the dissolution (Cass.com. 19 November 2002, Bull.civ. 2002 IV no.175 p.200). More daring is a decision of the GERMAN Federal Supreme Court on a similar set of facts; however, the company had been liquidated and erased from the commercial register. A creditor's claim under a dependent personal security failed; but it did not fail due to the "death" of the debtor company but because the security provider was allowed to invoke the expiration of the period of prescription for the secured claim (BGH 28 January 2003, BGHZ 153, 337, 339 ss., JZ 2003, 1068 with critical note Tiedtke; cf. also IV.G.–2:102 national notes no. 19).

(c) Unenforceability of the secured claim

8. The provider of dependent security may invoke the defence that the secured claim arose from gaming or betting and is therefore unenforceable (FRANCE: cf. CC art. 1965; Simler no. 215; GERMANY: Palandt/Sprau § 765 no. 28 with further references; GREECE: CC art. 844, cf. Kaukas 444; PORTUGAL: CC art. 1245). There is some authority in ENGLISH law that a provider of dependent security is in certain cases released from liability if the principal contract is unenforceable, e.g. for lack of compliance with statutory requirements (Eldridge and Morris v. Taylor [1931] 2 KB 416; Temperance Loan Fund Ltd v. Rose [1932] 2 KB 522: both cases concerning a failure to comply with the Moneylenders Act 1927). This, however, must not be understood as rendering unenforceable every dependent security which is provided for a principal obligation that is unenforceable (cf. Andrews and Millett no. 6-027). Rather, the decision has to be made on a case by case basis (O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 5-125 s.).

(d) Prescription of the secured claim

9. The provider of dependent personal security may invoke the defence of prescription of the principal debt (AUSTRIA: Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1351 no. 10; FRANCE: Simler nos. 689 ss.; GERMANY: Erman/Herrmann § 768 no. 4 with further references; see also no. 7 above and the exception in BGH 21 January 1993, BGHZ 121, 173; GREECE: A.P. 601/1985, EllDik 27, 77; ITALY: cf. CC art. 1945; Fragali, Della fideiussione 318; Cass. 15 March 2000 no. 2975, BBTC 2001 II 544; SCOTLAND: Halyburtons v. Graham (1735) Mor 2073 (CA); SPAIN: Díez-Picazo 455). This rule applies also if the prescription period has been completed after the creditor has initiated judicial proceedings against the provider of dependent security, because proceedings against the security provider do not interrupt prescription vis-à-vis the debtor (GERMANY: BGH 12 March 1980, BGHZ 96, 222, 225 ss.; CA Bamberg 14 January 1998, MDR 1998, 796; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 133). The NETHERLANDS go one step further by declaring the dependent security to be extinguished if the prescription period for the secured claim has expired (CC art. 7:853). In GREECE, the provider of dependent security may exercise the general remedy of third party opposition (CCP art. 583 ff) against a decision rendered in a trial between the creditor and the debtor, where the debtor did not raise the plea of prescription, and raise this plea (Kaukas 445). If however the provider of dependent security assumed the dependent security after prescription of the debt, even if unaware of the prescription (cf. CC art. 272(2) sentence 2), then the security provider is not entitled to rely on that prescription (GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 134). If the claim against the provider of dependent security was declared valid by a final judgment and subsequently the prescription period of the secured debt expires, then the provider of dependent security may raise this defence with the remedy of opposition against the enforcement (cf. GREEK CCP art. 933; Georgiades § 3 no. 135).

10. In conformity with this principle, the creditor's demand for payment or the debtor's acknowledgement interrupts prescription also against the provider of dependent security (FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 2250; BELGIUM: CA Brussels 8 May 1990, BankFin 1990, 463; GERMANY: Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 262; GREECE: Kaukas 445). In PORTUGAL, however, this interruption does not affect the dependent security unless the creditor informs the provider of the dependent security about the interruption of the prescription of the secured debt. The prescription of the dependent security is considered interrupted by law at the time of this communication (CC art. 636(1)). Suspension of prescription of the secured debt as well as its waiver do not affect the prescription of the dependent security (CC art. 636(2) and (3)). In SPAIN, the running of the prescription is interrupted only if the creditor's claim is a formal suit before a court (CC art. 1975).

11. By contrast, in ENGLAND it has been held that the prescription of the principal obligation does not release the provider of dependent security from liability (cf. Carter v. White [1884] 25 Ch. D 666).

(e) "Res judicata"

12. The provider of dependent security may invoke the defence of res judicata based upon a final judgment for the debtor in a proceeding brought by the creditor, if the decision dismissed the action of the creditor against the debtor as unfounded (GERMANY: cf. Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht nos. 535 with further references), unless it regards personal circumstances of the debtor, since these do not affect the liability of the security provider (BELGIUM: T´ Kint nos. 748, 373; FRANCE: cf. Simler nos. 499 for subsidiary liability and no. 541 for solidary liability; GREECE: cf. CCP art. 328, A.P. 1264/1995, EllDik 38, 798; NETHERLANDS: du Perron and Haentjens art. 852 no. 2; PORTUGAL: CC art. 635(1); SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 341). In GERMANY the provider of dependent security may rely upon a favourable final judgment between creditor and debtor, but not bound by a final judgment the other way (Erman/Herrmann § 767 no. 6 with further references). The same solution is held by ITALIAN legal writers (Fragali, Della fideiussione 318 s.; however, Ravazzoni 261 thinks that the security provider is bound also by an unfavourable final judgment between the debtor and the creditor).

(f) Extinction of the secured claim

13. The provider of dependent security can raise the defence of extinction of the debt due to whatever reason, especially payment (cf. AUSTRIAN CC § 1363; FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1281(2) and art. 2038 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2315); cf. also for BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 680-698 and 707-726; FRANCE: Simler nos. 661 ss.; LUXEMBOURG: Ravarani, Jurisprudence récente 913-915; ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law: Andrews and Millett no. 9-001, Stair/Clark no. 958; GERMAN CC § 767(1) sentence 1; GREEK CC art. 851; Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 853 no. 7; ITALIAN CC art. 1945; Fragali, Della fideiussione 317; NETHERLANDS: du Perron and Haentjens art. 852 no. 1; PORTUGAL: CC art. 651; Almeida Costa 784); SPAIN CC art. 1847 and Carrasco, Tratado, pp. 228 ff. Under FRENCH, BELGIAN, LUXEMBOURGIAN and PORTUGUESE law, payment may be made by a third party (FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1236(2); PORTUGUESE CC art. 767), who will then be subrogated against the provider of the dependent security as well as against the debtor (FRENCH CC art. 1252; PORTUGUESE CC art. 593), except if the third party made this payment in that party's own interest (cf. FRENCH CC art. 1236(2); BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 685; FRANCE: Simler no. 670). In PORTUGAL the subrogation depends either on the creditor's explicit declaration or on the debtor's explicit consent (CC art. 589, 590). However, a legal subrogation occurs if there is a direct interest of the third party (CC art. 592). In GREECE a third party who has mortgaged property provided as additional security, and who pays the secured debt, is subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee-creditor and the dependent security remains valid, although the principal debt has become extinct by virtue of payment (GREEK CC art. 1298, cf. Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 853 no. 7). By contrast, under GERMAN law the payment of a third person extinguishes the obligation of the provider of a dependent security (Erman/Kuckuk § 267 no. 9).

14. In case of partial performance by the debtor, in some countries the dependent security remains valid for the remaining debt (AUSTRIA: CC § 1363 sentence 1 and Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1363 no.1; GERMAN CC § 767(1) sentence 1 and Staudinger/Horn § 767 no. 10; BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 688; FRANCE: Simler no. 673; GREECE: Kaukas 446). In BELGIUM, FRANCE and GREECE, a partial performance of the secured obligation is in the first place allocated to the non-secured part of the debt (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 689; FRANCE: Simler no. 674; GREECE: Kaukas 446).

III. Specific defences

(a) Right to withhold performance

15. In some European countries, the provider of dependent security can also invoke the debtor's right to withhold performance (defence of non adimpleti contractus) in order to force the creditor to perform to the debtor (BELGIUM: T´ Kint no. 749, Van Quickenborne no. 732; FRANCE: by analogy to CC art. 1653, Simler no. 730; GERMANY: Palandt/Sprau § 768 no. 6; GREECE: CC arts. 325 and 374, Kaukas 444 fn. 1a, 447; ErmAK/Zepos art. 853 no. 7; ITALY: cf. CC art. 1945; PORTUGAL: CC art. 637(1); SPAIN Carrasco, Tratado, p. 178). DUTCH law comes to the same result, but by another route: if the debtor rightfully withholds performance, the surety provider has the same right (CC art. 7:852(3); du Perron and Haentjens art. 852 nos. 11-15).

16. The provider of dependent security may also invoke the defence that the debt cannot yet be claimed due to a condition or term set for performance (cf. DUTCH CC art. 7:852 (1); du Perron and Haentjens art. 852 no. 2(c), Pitlo-Croes no. 852, p. 353-354; BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 322 a fortiori), unless this defence is considered as related to the person of the debtor (GREECE: Kaukas 444; ErmAK/Zepos art. 853 no. 11; ITALY: CC art. 1945, cf. also Giusti 209 s.).

(b) Debtor's rights of avoidance

17. The situation seems more complicated if the secured debt is affected by a "relative" nullity which can only be invoked by the contracting parties or one of them. The debtor is then entitled to avoid the contract by invoking this relative nullity. The matter is of great importance, since in some countries the solution will also apply for all other rights of the debtor concerning the effectiveness of the debt, i.e. not only for avoidance, but also for other rights such as termination, which do not relate to a relative nullity. One must distinguish as to whether the debtor avoids the contract or whether the provider of dependent security can exercise the respective right:

(c) Avoidance by court decision

18. If the contract is avoided by virtue of a court decision, then the dependent security as an accessory to the secured debt is also void ab initio and the security provider can raise the plea of res judicata against the creditor (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 729; FRANCE: Simler no. 229; GREECE: Kaukas 438; ErmAK/Zepos 850 no. 6; ITALY: Fragali, Della fideiussione 318; NETHERLANDS: (cf.) du Perron and Haentjens art. 852 no. 2e; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 774; SPAIN: cf. Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 427 s.). A corresponding rule applies if the contract is avoided by declaration (ENGLAND: Andrews and Millet no. 6-024; GERMANY: Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 280).

(d) Can the provider of dependent security avoid the contract?

19. In some countries the provider of dependent security may avoid a contract affected by a relative nullity in which the secured obligation is rooted (BELGIUM: T´ Kint nos. 748, 372; Van Quickenborne nos. 729-730; FRANCE: Simler no. 230; Cass.civ. 11 May 2005, Bull.civ. 2005 III no. 101 p. 94; ITALY: Fragali, Della fideiussione 317; PORTUGAL: CC art. 632(2); Almeida Costa 774; SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 340). By contrast, in many other countries the security provider is precluded from avoiding the contract (AUSTRIA: OGH 25 February 2004, ÖJZ 2004, 677; ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett no. 6-024; GERMANY: Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 280; GREECE: cf. CC art. 154; contra ErmAK/Zepos art. 850 no. 6, 853 no. 5; NETHERLANDS: Pitlo-Croes no. 852, p. 355). Especially in GREECE and the NETHERLANDS, this negative solution applies to all rights of the debtor concerning the effectiveness of the debt (GREECE: Filios II/1 § 127 at p. 89; NETHERLANDS: du Perron and Haentjens art. 852 no. 5). If the debtor ratifies the transaction as valid, the provider of dependent security is not deprived of the right to invoke the nullity of the secured obligation (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 738-741 and cited references; FRANCE: contra Simler no. 231).

20. In still other countries, a provider of dependent security who is not entitled to avoid the contract is at least entitled to withhold performance as long as the debtor may avoid the contract (expressly GERMAN CC § 770(1); followed in AUSTRIA invoking the GERMAN provision, cf. Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1351 no. 11 sub 1); Rummel/Gamerith § 1351 no. 6). When, however, in AUSTRIA and GERMANY the debtor has failed to invoke the defence and is precluded by a final decision from invoking it in future, then the provider of dependent security must perform (cf. AUSTRIA: OGH 27 April 1987, SZ 60 no. 69, p. 362 s.; GERMANY: cf. Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht nos. 282 ss.). In the NETHERLANDS the provider of dependent security may grant the debtor a reasonable time to exercise the right of avoidance and is entitled to withhold performance of the security obligation during that period (CC art. 7:852(2); du Perron and Haentjens art. 852 nos. 2 and 7; Pitlo-Croes no. 852). Though SPANISH law has no legal provision on this matter, a similar approach has been advocated (*Carrasco,*Tratado, p. 178).

(e) Set-off

21. Three solutions can be distinguished if both the debtor and the creditor are entitled to a set-off, but neither of them has exercised such a right. In some European countries the provider of dependent security may set off the debtor's counter-claim against the creditor, even if the security provider's liability is solidary, since set-off is not considered to be a personal defence of the debtor which the security provider cannot raise vis-à-vis the creditor, and even ifthe security provider has no right of action and subrogation against the debtor (cf. BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1294(1); BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 699-703; FRANCE: Cass.civ. 1 June 1983, D. 1984, 152, note Aubert; also Simler no. 686 ss.; ENGLAND: Bechervaise v. Lewis (1871-72) LR 7 CP 372 ; Murphy v. Glass (1867-69) LR 2 PC 408; FINLAND: cf. LDepGuar § 27(2); RP 189/1998 rd 66 ss.; Håstad 3 s; GREECE: CC art. 447; cf. Fragistas 1371; Georgiades § 3 no. 129; SCOTLAND: Stair/Eden no. 843). Since in FRANCE the Grimaldi Commission proposes to suppress the distinction between personal defences and defences inherent in the debt (proposed new CC art. 2308(1)), the right of the security provider to set-off the debtor's claims is indirectly confirmed.

22. In other countries, the provider of dependent security has the right to withhold performance, either indefinitely or as long as the possibility of set-off exists (expressly GERMAN CC § 770(2); ITALY: Giusti 208; PORTUGAL: CC art. 642(1); SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 283). In AUSTRIA opinions are divided, the majority denying the provider of dependent security a right of set-off (OGH 20 December 1991, ÖBA 1992, 660; Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1351 no. 11 sub 3) and most writers granting a right of retention (cf. Schwimann/Mader and Faber and Rummel/Gamerith § 1351 no. 6 sub c); contra OGH 20 December 1991, above); also in the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 8:150(3) read with 6:139(1), (2); du Perron and Haentjens art. 852 nos. 5, 9).

23. In SWEDEN and DENMARK, however, the provider of dependent security remains fully liable in spite of the set-off situation because the security provider should not be able to "reject the claim because the debtor has other assets, such as a counter-claim" (SWEDEN: HD 7 July 1994, NJA 1994, 474; DENMARK: Ussing, Kaution 222 ss.).

IV. Conditions for invoking these defences

(a) Solidary liability

24. The right of the provider of dependent security to invoke the defences of the debtor exists, even if the security provider has waived the beneficium discussionis (see national notes on IV.G.–2:106 nos. 8 ss.) and liability is solidary (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 411, 214; GREECE: A.P. 148/1997, NoB 46, 1061). Although according to FRENCH CC art. 2021 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2298) the rules on solidary debtors apply for the solidarily liable provider of dependent security, such a person is considered first to be a security provider and not a solidary co-debtor. So the defences of set-off and of relative nullity, which according to the broad interpretation given to FRENCH CC art. 1208 are not available to co-debtors, can also be raised by the provider of dependent security who is solidarily liable (FRANCE: Simler no. 220).

(b) Waiver of defences and other rights by the debtor

25. If the debtor waives defences, in the narrow, technical sense of the word (cf. no. 26 below), the rule in BELGIUM, GERMANY, ITALY and PORTUGAL is that the provider of dependent security can still invoke all defences which are inherent to the secured debt (BELGIUM: T´ K*int* no. 751; Van Quickenborne no. 674; GERMANY: CC § 768(2); ITALY: Fragali, Della fideiussione 315, Giusti 206: the provider of dependent personal security acts iure proprio when invoking defences; PORTUGAL: CC art. 637(2); Almeida Costa 779; SPAIN, Carrasco, Tratado, p. 176), regardless of the time when the waiver took place. According to GREEK CC art. 853, however, if the debtor waives defences inherent to the debt prior to the assumption of the dependent security, then the security provider cannot invoke these defences, because they were not available to the debtor at the time of contracting, even if the security provider had no knowledge of this waiver on assuming the dependent security (cf. Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 853 no. 18). If, however, the waiver took place after the assumption of the dependent security, the security provider may invoke the defences originally available to the debtor, despite the waiver (cf. CC art. 853, Georgiades § 3 no. 139).

26. By contrast if the debtor waives a right of avoiding the underlying contract or of set-off with respect to the secured obligation, opinions between the member states differ. If the debtor has waived the right to declare a set-off against the creditor demanding performance, then in some countries the provider of dependent security can nevertheless declare a set-off instead of the debtor (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 700; FRANCE: cf. Simler no. 686; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no.130, contra Fragistas 1372). By contrast, in other countries, these rights are no longer available to the security provider (ENGLAND: Bechervaise v. Lewis (1871-72) LR 7 CP 372; Andrews and Millett no. 11-006; GERMANY: cf. CC § 770(1) (which is to be applied by analogy in the case of a right of set-off, cf. MünchKomm/Habersack § 770 no. 6; but the security provider may still rely on this defence as long as the creditor is entitled to set-off vis-à-vis the debtor, CC § 770(2)); SCOTLAND: Stair/Eden no. 843).

(c) Waiver by provider of dependent security

27. The provider of dependent security may waive the right to invoke defences available to the debtor, since the principle of accessority is generally dispositive (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 676, contra: T´ Kint no. 750; GREECE: cf. CC art. 853, CA Athens 635/1986, EllDik 27, 1476; SPAIN, Carrasco, Tratado, pp. 179 ff). In GREECE and in ITALY this waiver is a standard term in the General Business Conditions of banks (GREECE: cf. Kozyris EEN 1972, 416 ss.; ITALY: Giusti 132 ss.). This right to waive defences is restricted, however, by the core of the accessority principle: any waiver of defences available to the debtor in the contract of dependent security may not alter the core of the accessory character of the dependent security, so that defences available to the debtor regarding the existence and validity of the debt cannot be waived by the provider of dependent security, without at the same time transforming the dependent security into another contract (e.g. an independent security, promise or acknowledgement or assumption of debt: BELGIUM: T´ Kint

no. 750; Van Quickenborne nos. 675-677; FRANCE: S*imler* no. 924; GERMANY: The Federal Supreme Court has recently held that a term in general business conditions refusing the security provider a right to invoke set-off is at least invalid if the debtor's counter-claim is admitted or has been confirmed by final judgment; however it may even be admitted if the debtor is by court decision precluded from invoking a set-off (BGH 16 January 2003, BGHZ 153, 293, 299 s., 301 s.); cf. Erman*/Herrmann* § 768 no. 6; Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht nos. 293 ss. and 556 for standard contracts; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 140; ITALY: Cass. 17 July 2002 no. 10400, Giust.civ.Mass. 2002, 1257; Petti 383 ss. and Chinè, I contratti di garanzia 309 ss. on the presumption of nullity of the term waiving defences when the security provider is a consumer on the basis of ConsC art. 33(2), former CC art. 1469*bis* (2); SPAIN: Reyes López 191).

28. Under DUTCH law, however, there may be no derogations to the detriment of the non-professional provider of dependent security from CC art. 7:852 on the possibility of the provider of dependent personal security to invoke the debtor's defences that relate to the existence, content and time of performance of the obligation of the debtor (CC art. 7:862 lit. a)).

V. Consequences of not raising these defences

29. Cf. national notes to IV.G.–2:112 (Security provider's obligations before performance) paragraphs (2) and (3).

VI. Defences unavailable to the provider of dependent security

(a) Debtor's personal defences (cf. nos. 2 and 5-6 above)

30. In ITALY and in GREECE the provider of dependent security may not invoke the defence arising from the personal agreement to release the debtor, concluded between the latter and the creditor (ITALY: Fragali, Della fideiussione 317; GREECE: CC art. 853; Kaukas 448; ErmAK/Zepos art. 853 no.16). Neither can in GREECE the security provider invoke the right of a donor (debtor) to refuse the performance of the donation if such performance would endanger either the donor's own maintenance or any maintenance owed by the donor to another by virtue of law (cf. CC art. 501; Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 853 no. 26) or the rescission of a donation made ultra vires (cf. CC art. 1836; Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 853 no. 26).

(b) Defences incompatible with the securing purpose of a dependent security

31. In addition to the cases mentioned in the national notes to IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) nos. 17-23, the following defences are not admitted: a limitation of liability which results from the acceptance of a succession on behalf of the debtor with the benefit of inventory (GREECE: cf. CC art. 1902; Georgiades § 3 no. 141; NETHERLANDS: du Perron and Haentjens art. 852 no. 5). According to PORTUGUESE CC art. 637(2) sentence 2, the provider of dependent security may not invoke those defences of the principal, which are "incompatible with the guaranteeing obligation". In SPAIN, defences contrary to the security's intended purpose are not available; this is the case where the security provider tries to raise defences in order to get free of the special risk it agreed to bear for the creditor's benefit (Carrasco, Tratado, p. 177)

(c) Defences from the relationship between provider of dependent security and debtor

32. Since the creditor is a third party who stands outside the relationship between the provider of dependent security and the debtor, defences arising from this latter relationship cannot be invoked against the creditor (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 749; GREECE: CFI Pireus 1499/1968, EED 19, 629; ITALY: Fragali, Della fideiussione 317).

IV.G.–2:104: Coverage of security

(1) The security covers, within its maximum amount, if any, not only the principal secured obligation, but also the debtor's ancillary obligations towards the creditor, especially:

(a) contractual interest and interest due by law on delay in payment;

(b) damages, a penalty or an agreed payment for non-performance by the debtor; and

(c) the reasonable costs of extra-judicial recovery of those items.

(2) The costs of legal proceedings and enforcement proceedings against the debtor are covered, provided the security provider had been informed about the creditor's intention to undertake such proceedings in sufficient time to enable the security provider to avert those costs.

(3) A global security covers only obligations which originated in contracts between the debtor and the creditor.

COMMENTS

A. Survey

Paragraphs (1) and (2) set out those elements of a secured obligation which are, within the financial limits of the dependent security, covered by the latter. By contrast, paragraph (3) excludes for a global security coverage of certain "extraneous" items. Of course, the parties may deviate from any of these restrictions.

B. Principal, ancillaries and sums due upon default

According to paragraph (1) the dependent security primarily covers, apart from the principal, also contractual interest as an ancillary obligation. In addition, the normal items that will arise if a debtor defaults will also be covered since a dependent security is designed to cover such consequential damage, unless otherwise agreed. The typical items are:

- default interest;

- damages or an agreed sum of money or a penalty (where allowed) which fall due on the debtor's non-performance ; and – reasonable extra-judicial costs of recovery of the preceding items.

The references to contractual and default interest are not qualified. Indeed, these items will be determined by fixed rates. These rates may be agreed upon by the parties or, if no agreement had been reached, by law. For default interest, III.–3:708 (Delay in payment of money) paragraph (1) provides a specific rule: the rate of default interest is determined by the average commercial bank short-term lending rate to prime borrowers prevailing for the contractual currency of payment at the place where payment is due. Additional damages may be recovered (paragraph (2) of same Article).

The same is true for any compensation which the debtor may owe to the creditor upon any non-performance of a contractual obligation. Such compensation may take the form of damages or payment of an agreed sum of money or, where allowed, a penalty.

By contrast, extra-judicial costs for recovery of the aforementioned items may only be demanded if they are “reasonable”. Where fixed scales for such costs exist, these must be observed. In the absence of such scales, average costs for average efforts must be considered to be reasonable. In both cases, the fixed scales and the reasonableness of average costs must be determined according to the rules and customs prevailing at the place where the services are to be rendered.

C. Costs and expenses of legal proceedings and executions

According to paragraph (2), the costs of legal proceedings and of judicial executions are covered. However, in this case it is necessary for the creditor to inform the security provider in due time, so that the latter is enabled to avert these costs by performing the security obligation.

D. Maximum limit

It goes without saying that all these specified ancillary items are secured only within the maximum limit of a security. If this limit is surpassed and the security provider makes full payment to the debtor, the following issue arises: to which parts of the secured obligation should this performance be attributed since the various elements of the secured debt may be subject to differing rules, especially with respect to prescription. III.–2:110 (Imputation of performance) paragraph (5) provides that a payment is to be appropriated, first to expenses, secondly, to interest, and thirdly, to the principal; however, the creditor may make a different imputation. Of course, the parties can agree otherwise, e.g. by extending the security to cover fully (or partly) all or some of the listed ancillary items.

E. Exclusions and extensions

Items not mentioned in paragraphs (1) and (2) and in the preceding comments are not covered by law. One example is a claim for repayment of a loan on the basis of unjustified enrichment by the creditor if, for whatever reason, the secured obligation is void or avoided. Of course, the parties may agree otherwise. An agreement providing not only for the repayment of a loan according to the terms of the valid loan contract, but also that claims for repayment of any advances made if the loan contract is void would be secured would not constitute a deviation detrimental to the security provider within the meaning of IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2), since this would rather constitute a definition of the subject matter of the contract of security. Generally, any type of principal obligation can be made the object of dependent security; this would include also restitutionary and other non-contractual obligations. Of course, it has to be ascertained in these situations whether the contractual security might also be affected by the factors resulting in the ineffectiveness of the loan contract.

F. Exclusion of non-personal and non-contractual secured obligations from global security

In order to limit the risks of global securities, paragraph (3) provides that only contractual obligations directly incurred by the debtor towards the creditor are covered. This provision excludes, in particular, the coverage of claims against the debtor which have been assigned to the creditor after the global security had been assumed. In addition, non-contractual claims are excluded from global security. Again, the parties are free to agree otherwise.

G. Consumer as security provider

Dependent personal security. If a consumer has assumed a dependent personal security, the present Article becomes mandatory in favour of the security provider by virtue of IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2).

Other types of personal security. The provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) of the present Article are fully applicable to a consumer's independent personal security (cf. IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c)) and to a consumer's co-debtorship for security purposes (cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1)). A slight qualification is necessary for the words "if any" in paragraph (1) relating to the indication of a maximum amount of the security. According to IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (a), the amount of a consumer security provider's security must always be limited, and the limitation, if the parties have not provided for it, is to be effected according to IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) paragraph (3). Therefore, in the present context the words "if any" are irrelevant.

By virtue of the references in IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c), paragraph (3) of the present Article is also applicable where a consumer assumes an independent personal security or a co-debtorship for security purposes. As in the case of a consumer provider of a dependent security, an agreement which according to its terms purports to cover all the debtor's obligations towards the creditor or the debit balance of a current account (a global security), is restricted to cover obligations which originated in contracts between the debtor and the creditor. An additional restriction in favour of consumer security providers follows from IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (a), according to which global securities of consumers must have a maximum limit, which either has been agreed by the parties or has to be determined according to IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) paragraph (3).

The present Article is mandatory in favour of the consumer security provider, cf. cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2). And in the context of a consumer security provider's co-debtorship for security purposes the term "debtor" in the present Article means the debtor whose obligation is secured.

NOTES

1. In all legal systems a dependent security covers, of course, the secured obligation. But there are some differences regarding the coverage of other claims of the creditor against the debtor.

I. Ancillary obligations – General rules

2. BELGIAN, FRENCH, LUXEMBOURGIAN and SPANISH law differentiate between definite and indefinite dependent securities. A dependent security is "indefinite" if only the principal obligation is mentioned in the contract of security, no other limitation (maximum amount) of the security being agreed. By contrast, a dependent security is definite if security provider and creditor have specifically agreed upon the extent of the security (see e.g. FRANCE: Cabrillac/Mouly 129; BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 257 ss.). An indefinite dependent security secures the principal obligation and all its ancillary obligations (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2016 para. 1 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2293 para. 1) and SPANISH CC art. 1827 para. 2).

3. FRENCH case law originally required for non-commercial dependent securities that the liability for ancillaries must be expressly mentioned in the dependent security provider's hand-written declaration in accordance with FRENCH CC art. 1326 (Cass.civ. 22 June 1983, Banque 1984, 860). The Commercial Chamber of the FRENCH Supreme Court (Cass.com. 16 March 1999, JCP G 1999, I no. 156 (1)), however, held that such a hand-written declaration is not necessary. Despite earlier decisions to the contrary (cf. Cass.civ. 13 October 1999, JCP G 2000, II no. 1037), the Civil Chamber of the Supreme Court has now accepted the view of the Commercial Chamber (Cass.civ. 29 October 2002, JCP G 2002, II no. 10187, note Legeais), CC art. 1326 is no longer applied to the liability for ancillaries. The proposals of the Grimaldi Commission would confirm this case law (cf. the proposed CC art. 2300 (1)).

4. In FRENCH consumer legislation, on the other hand, stricter formal requirements were developed (cf. ConsC arts. L. 313-7 and L. 341-2, see national notes to IV.G.–4:104 (Form)).

5. There are two general rules on ancillary obligations in GREECE: According to CC art. 852, in cases of doubt a provider of dependent security is not liable for contractually agreed ancillary obligations which were due and payable at the time the dependent security was provided; and is liable for those contractually agreed ancillary obligations that become due and payable after the assumption only if aware of the existence of these obligations (cf. Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 852 no. 1).

6. AUSTRIAN writers similarly distinguish between a limited and a full dependent security, only the latter covering also ancillaries. Dependent securities by banks, in favour of banks and generally among merchants are usually full dependent securities (Rummel/Gamerith § 1353 no. 5; Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1353 no. 5).

II. Specific items

(a) Contractual interest in general - Legal systems with a specific rule

7. The most extensive rule concerning the coverage of contractual interest seems to be FINNISH LDepGuar § 4 para. 1: a provider of dependent security is ex lege liable for contractual interest provided the provider of security and the creditor had not agreed otherwise (see also RP 189/1998 rd 35). The same is true for ITALY and PORTUGAL regarding all ancillaries (ITALIAN CC art. 1942; PORTUGUESE CC art. 634; Almeida Costa 770). In BELGIUM, FRANCE, LUXEMBOURG and SPAIN, an indefinite dependent security (above no. 2) covers contractual interest of the secured obligation since contractual interest is regarded as an ancillary obligation (cf. BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 263; FRANCE: art. 2016 para. 1 (since 2006: CC art. 2293 para. 1); Piedelièvre, Sûretés 26; LUXEMBOURG: Ravarani, Jurisprudence récente 901-902; SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 132). However, nowadays FRENCH CC art. 2016 para. 1 (since 2006: CC art. 2293 para. 1) is applied to definite dependent securities as well (Cass.com. 16 March 1999, JCP G 1999, I no. 156 (1)). This solution seems to be confirmed by the Grimaldi Commission´s proposal of a new CC art. 2302, which determines the coverage of the security provider's liability, irrespective of the indefinite or definite character of the dependent securities.

(b) Legal systems without a specific rule

8. In other legal systems there are no relevant statutory provisions. Consequently, the provider of dependent security is only liable for contractual interest if this is at least implicitly stipulated in the contract of security (DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 48 s.; ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett no. 6-010; GERMANY: Reinicke and Tiedtke no. 21; Palandt/Sprau § 765 no. 24; GREECE: Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 852 no. 1; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 151 ss.). As far as there are formal requirements in these legal systems, they do not prevent such an extension of liability. Since for purposes of interpretation especially the surrounding circumstances of the transaction are to be taken into account, contractual interest will often be secured despite the silence of the written agreement (DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 48 s.; ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett no. 6-010; Fahey v. MSD Speirs Ltd. [1975] 1 NZLR 240 (PC)). In GERMANY and SCOTLAND, it is considered as sufficient that the provider of dependent security knows that the secured obligation bears interest (Erman/Herrmann § 765 no. 7 with further references; however critical Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 40; cf. similarly for SCOTTISH law Stair/Eden no. 917). In AUSTRIA a full dependent security (above no. 6) covers contractual interest (Rummel/Gamerith § 1353 no. 5). AUSTRIAN law establishes a restrictive rule for contractual interest that is overdue: the provider of dependent security is not liable for those portions of such interest which had already been due for some time when the creditor demanded payment from the security provider (CC § 1353 sentence 2; cf. the prevailing interpretation of this provision by Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1353 no. 2 and Rummel/Gamerith § 1353 no. 5).

(c) Implications of agreed maximum amount

9. In ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law an agreed maximum amount will usually be expressed to relate to the principal sum only and the provider of dependent security is then liable for interest on that sum, unless the maximum is expressed to include interest (ENGLAND: Dow Banking Corp. v. Mahnakh Spinning & Weaving Corp. [1983] 2 Lloyd´s Rep 561; SCOTLAND: Stair/Eden no. 917). On the other hand, the provider of dependent security is not liable for interest on parts of the secured debt exceeding the agreed maximum of the dependent security (ENGLAND: Meek v. Wallis (1872) 27 LT 650; SCOTLAND: Commercial Bank of Scotland Ltd. v. Pattison´s Trustees (1891) 18 R 476). Also in AUSTRIA and ITALY, an agreed maximum amount without further specification is understood as an absolute limit, excluding liability for any amount of interest surpassing the maximum (AUSTRIA: OGH 8 January 1956, SZ 29 no. 5 p. 11; Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1353 no. 10; ITALY: CFI Roma 5 June 2003, BBTC 2005 II 71; SPAIN, Carrasco, Tratado, p. 162). In GREECE again the declaration of the provider of dependent security must be interpreted restrictively since the maximum amount aims to provide a general limit on the security provider's liability (Georgiades § 3 no. 116 and § 4 no. 30).

10. In GERMANY it is disputed whether an agreed maximum amount covers the principal obligation only or contractually agreed interest as well (BGH 17 March 1994, WM 1994, 1064, 1068: no exclusion of interests; contra: Reinicke/Tiedtke no. 24). However, general business terms and conditions according to which an agreed maximum amount does not limit the security provider's obligation for contractual interests have been held invalid (BGH 18 July 2002, BGHZ 151, 375, 380 ss.). In BELGIUM, it is thought that, if the parties limit the dependent security to a maximum amount that is lower than the secured debt, the security provider will normally be liable for the ancillaries in the same proportion as he is liable for the secured debt. But parties can agree otherwise (Van Quickenborne no. 284).

(d) Extra-judicial costs of recovery

11. According to GERMAN CC § 767 para. 2 and PORTUGUESE CC art. 634 the provider of dependent security is liable for the expenses of notice which must be paid by the principal debtor to the creditor; the same is true for BELGIUM, FRANCE, ITALY, LUXEMBOURG (CC art. 2016 para. 1 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2293 para. 1); cf. BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 264; FRANCE: Simler no. 299; ITALY: Giusti 155; LUXEMBOURG: Ravarani, Jurisprudence récente 901-902) and GREECE (ErmAK/Zepos art. 851 no. 6). By contrast, in SWEDEN the dependent security provider is in dubio not liable for the expenses of notice (Walin, Borgen 153 s.).

(e) Other ancillary obligations

12. What has been said above about contractual interest is in GERMANY also true for commissions and costs (GERMANY: Palandt/Sprau § 765 no. 24; Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 40). FINNISH LDepGuar § 4 para. 1 extends the liability of the provider of dependent security to other extra costs if there is no other stipulation in the contract. The same is true in BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG, since the dependent security covers according to CC art. 2016 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2293) the principal debt and all its ancillaries (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 269; LUXEMBOURG, Ravarani, Jurisprudence récente 901; FRANCE: Simler no. 304).

(f) Obligations due to debtor's fault or default - Default interests; claims for damages due to the debtor's fault

13. In most European countries the provider of dependent security is, unless otherwise agreed in the contract of security, especially liable for default interest and for claims for damages due to non-performance of the secured obligation (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 266; ENGLAND: Moschi v. Lep Air Services Ltd. [1973] AC 331 (this decision is also relied upon in SCOTLAND, cf. Stair/Eden no. 918); Astilleros Espanoles SA v. Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association [1995] 2 Lloyd´s Rep 352; Andrews and Millett no. 6-030; FRANCE: ConsC arts. L. 313-7 and L. 341-2 for consumer securities; Cass.civ. 10 May 1988, Bull.civ. 1988 I no. 134 p. 93; Simler no. 300 ss.; GERMANY: BGH 17 May 1994, NJW 1994, 1790; Palandt/Sprau § 767 no. 2; Staudinger/Horn § 767 no. 25; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 115; A.P. 1486/1997, listed in www.dsanet.gr; ITALY: cf. Giusti 154; LUXEMBOURG: Ravarani, Jurisprudence récente 902; NETHERLANDS: Blomkwist no. 19, p. 37; PORTUGUESE CC art. 634; SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 132). Especially in AUSTRIA, a provider of dependent security under a full dependent security (above no. 6) is liable for default interest (Rummel/Gamerith § 1353 no. 5; Schwimman/Mader and Faber § 1353 no. 5), but not under a limited dependent security (cf. OGH 24 September 1987, SZ 60 no. 185 at p. 276).

14. This principle applies also to all claims for damages in connection with the secured obligation that are based on an action of the debtor after conclusion of the contract of dependent security (GERMANY: BGH 14 July 1988, NJW 1989, 27; Staudinger/Horn § 767 no. 28; GREECE: A.P. 1486/1997, listed in www.dsanet.gr; Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 851 no. 9; ITALY: Giusti 155; LUXEMBOURG: Ravarani, Jurisprudence récente 902; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 770), even after resolution or annulment of the contract (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 268; FRANCE: Cass.com. 2 November 1994, JCP G 1995 I no. 3851 (13), note Delebecque and Mouly; Simler no. 303; NETHERLANDS: Blomkwist no. 19, p. 37). In GREECE the provider of dependent security is additionally liable for alterations of the principal obligation caused by fortuitous events or by force majeure, provided the debtor bears the respective risk (Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 851 no. 9).

15. The legal situation is different in the SCANDINAVIAN countries and in the NETHERLANDS. In DENMARK the provider of dependent security is liable for claims for damages caused by the non-performance of the secured obligation (Pedersen, Kaution 49; CA Vestre Landsret 11 January 1971, UfR 1971 A 337) but according to DANISH court practice not for default interest, unless this has been stated in the security agreement (H 18 January 1982, UfR 1982 A 162; CA Vestre Landsret 4 October 1973, UfR 1974 A 198; Pedersen, Kaution 49). The same is true for SWEDEN (Walin, Borgen 151 ss.). If the contractual relationship comprising the secured debt is terminated owing to delay, a consumer provider of dependent security is pursuant to the FINNISH LDepGuar § 25 entitled to pay according to the conditions that had prevailed had the debtor not been in delay (RP 189/1998 rd 63).

16. In the NETHERLANDS, the provider of dependent security owes legal interest only over the period when in default, unless the obligation of the debtor arises from non-contractual liabilty for damage caused to another or from non-performance (CC art. 7:856). There may be no derogations from this rule to the detriment of the non-professional provider of dependent security (CC art. 7:862 lit. a)). Interest and costs owed according to art. 8:856 can be claimed irrespective of the expressed maximum (art. CC 7:858).

(g) Penalty for non-performance of contractual obligation

17. In BELGIUM, GERMANY, GREECE, ITALY, LUXEMBOURG and the NETHERLANDS a penalty for non-performance of a contractual obligation is only covered if this has been stipulated in the contract of dependent security (BELGIUM: CA Brussels 20 January 1982, RW 1982-83, 2397; CFI Brussels 27 September 1971, B.R.H. 1972, 2; Van Quickenborne no. 266; GERMANY: BGH 7 June 1982, NJW 1982, 2305; BGH 15 March 1990, WM 1990, 841; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 115; ITALY: Cass. 30 May 1963, no. 1468, Giur.it.Mass. 1963, 502; Giusti 154; LUXEMBOURG: CA Luxembourg 9 November 1993, Pas luxemb XXIX (1993-95) Jur. 293; Ravarani, Jurisprudence récente 902; NETHERLANDS: Blomkwist no. 19); in deciding whether this is the case, the principles of interpretation are to be applied (GERMANY: cf. Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 40 and Erman/Herrmann § 765 no. 7).

18. In AUSTRIA, under a full dependent security (above no. 6), there is liability also for penalties (Rummel/Gamerith § 1353 no. 5; differentiated Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1353 no. 5). In FRANCE since the leading case of October 2002 (Cass.civ. 29 October 2002, JCP G 2002, II no. 10187, note Legeais) the Civil and Commercial (cf. Cass.com. 6 February 2001, Bull.civ. 2001 IV no. 29 p. 27) Chambers of the Supreme Court consider the penalty term as automatically covered by the ancillaries designated by CC art. 2016 para. 1 – since 2006: CC art. 2293 para. 1 – (Larroumet/François no. 161). It seems that in PORTUGUESE law a penalty for non-performance is to be borne by the provider of dependent security as an ancillary obligation (PORTUGAL: CC art. 634; Almeida Costa 770). In SPAIN, penalties for non-compliance have been deemed to be included in the scope of the suretyship, unless otherwise provided (TS 30 June 1969, RAJ 1969/3680; TS 3 October 1985, RAJ 1985/4570; TS 2 October 1990, RAJ 1990/7464, and also in legal writing; Guilarte, p. 133; Carrasco, p. 140).

(h) Costs of legal and enforcement proceedings

19. According to GERMAN CC § 767 para. 2, ITALIAN CC art. 1942, PORTUGUESE CC art. 634 and GREEK literature the provider of dependent security is, apart from the expenses of notice (see no. 11 above), liable for the expenses of legal action which are owed by the debtor to the creditor. This liability exists regardless of whether the dependent security is solidary or subsidiary and especially does not depend upon any default of the debtor. The provider of dependent security is obliged to pay not only costs that have arisen in a formal proceeding but all costs for recovery owed by the debtor (GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn § 767 nos. 33 s.; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 115), unless liability is excluded in the contract of dependent security. For a full dependent security (above no. 6), AUSTRIAN law comes to the same results (Rummel/Gamerith § 1353 no. 5; Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1353 no. 5).

20. By contrast, in ENGLISH, FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN, DUTCH and SCOTTISH law a provider of dependent security is only liable for the costs of a fruitless action against the debtor if the creditor has given notice to the security provider of an intention to sue the debtor (ENGLAND: Baker v. Garratt (1825) 3 Bing 56, 130 ER 434; Colvin v. Buckle (1841) 8 M & W 680, 151 ER 1212; FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2016 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2293 para. 1); FRANCE: CA Pau 9 February 1905, S. 1905, 2, 76; BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 264; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:856 para. 2; SCOTLAND: Fraser v. Andrew (1831) 9 S 345 (CA); Collier v. Beath (1836) 15 S 195). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND it is further taken into consideration whether upon the true construction of the terms of the security agreement, expenses may fall within the object of the dependent security (ENGLAND: O´Donovan and Phillips no. 5-59; SCOTLAND: Grant v. Fenton (1853) 15 D 424 (CA)) and whether the expenses incurred were reasonable (SCOTLAND: Struthers v. Dykes (1847) 9 D 1437 (CA); Stair/Eden no. 916). Similarly, according to SPANISH CC art. 1827 para. 2 in cases of indefinite dependent securities those costs of suit are covered which arose after the creditor had demanded payment from the provider of dependent security.

21. According to DANISH law the provider of dependent security is not liable for the procedural costs, unless this has been stated in the dependent security (Pedersen, Kaution 49).

(i) Claims for repayment in case of nullity of underlying contract

22. Express extensions of a dependent personal security to claims for repayment of the capital, if the underlying contract providing for the payment is void, are, generally speaking, recognized (GERMANY: if not expressly agreed, an interpretation of the contract terms is necessary: Staudinger/Horn § 765 nos. 82-85 with references; ITALY: in banking practice, such terms are widely used and valid, if individually negotiated: CA Torino 27 October 1998, BBTC 2001 II 87; CFI Milano 25 May 2000, ibid. 88. Whether such extensions can validly be fixed by general conditions, is not free from doubt. In ITALY, a corresponding term in the model contract drafted by the Italian Bank Association was declared to be void – however, on the basis of a violation of antitrust law (decision of the Bank of Italy no. 55 of 5 May 2005, Bolletino no. 17 of 16 May 2005 p. 97 ss). The GERMAN Federal Supreme Court held a corresponding term to be compatible with the statutory regime on general terms (BGH 21 November 1991, NJW 1992, 1234, 1235; approving Staudinger/Horn § 765 nos. 87 s.; more differentiating Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht nos. 4-12). In SPAIN the case law is not conclusive as to the extension to secondary duties for repayment, but the extension has been proposed as a default rule (Carrasco, Tratado, p. 152).

23. FRENCH courts have repeatedly held that, even if the credit contract as such is void, the debtor's contractual duty of returning the payment received "survives" the contract; therefore, in that respect also the dependent personal security survives (Cass.com. 2 November 1994, JCP G 1995 I 3851 no. 13 with note Delebecque and Mouly; Cass.com. 4 February 1986, JCP G 1986 IV 100).

III. Global security

(a) Liability of a provider of dependent security under a global security

24. See national notes to IV.G.–1:101 (Definitions) nos. 42-46.

(b) Proof of the secured claim

25. It has been held in GERMANY and in GREECE that the acknowledgement of the outstanding balance on behalf of the debtor also binds the provider of dependent security: the creditor may rely upon the non-causal acknowledgement of the balance and does not have to assert and prove each account entry, which, along with others, is contained in the outstanding balance (GERMANY: BGH 18 DECEMBER 2001, ZIP 2002, 297 ss., 298; GREECE: A.P. 1264/1994, EllDik 37, 316; Chrysanthis 299). Regardless of such an acknowledgement, the creditor may assert and prove the account claim by asserting and proving all account entries which led to the outstanding balance (GERMANY: BGH 18 DECEMBER 2001, ZIP 2002, 297 ss., 298; GREECE: A.P. 46/1984, NoB 33, 232; Kondylis 39 fn. 103).

IV.G.–2:105: Solidary liability of security provider

Unless otherwise agreed, the liability of the debtor and the security provider is solidary and, accordingly, the creditor has the choice of claiming solidary performance from the debtor or, within the limits of the security, from the security provider.

COMMENTS

A. The general rule: solidary liability

The present Article expresses the basic form of the security provider's liability under these Rules, which is solidary. The creditor may choose to claim full performance from the debtor or the security provider. The creditor may also divide the claim and claim one part from the one and the other part from the other person. Technically, in some cases this may not be solidary liability, since the legal bases of the two obligations may differ; but the effect is comparable in some respects.

Solidary liability is established for this situation by most modern legislation and has always prevailed in commercial relations. Where older laws provide for the security provider's subsidiary liability, in practice this is usually replaced contractually by solidary liability.

B. Security on first demand

If a personal security is due on first demand it is a security with solidary liability. Typically, it will be an independent personal security, cf. IV.G.–3:103 (Independent personal security on first demand), unless the parties have expressly designated it as a dependent personal security. However, any first demand security which has been assumed by a consumer, is considered as creating a dependent security, provided the requirements of the latter are met, cf. IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c).

C. Consumer as security provider

While for ordinary dependent security solidary liability of the security provider is the rule and subsidiary liability the exception, by virtue of IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (b) this relationship is reversed for a consumer's dependent security: the latter's liability as a rule is subsidiary; however, the parties may expressly agree otherwise. This reversal is intended to grant better protection to the consumer who assumes a dependent personal security.

This rule applies to both a consumer's assumption of an independent personal security (cf. IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c)) as well as to a consumer's co-debtorship for security purposes (cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1)). In the context of a consumer security provider's co-debtorship for security purposes the term "debtor" means the debtor whose obligation is secured.

NOTES

I. Solidary liability as the general rule

1. According to ITALIAN law, the security provider is solidarily liable with the debtor (CC art. 1944 para. 1; Calderale, Fideiussione 33 ss.), whereas there had been subsidiary liability under the old CC of 1865 art. 1907. The meaning of solidarity is vividly discussed (see Giusti 45 ss.). According to the majority of legal authors as well as the Supreme Court, solidarity of the security means that several persons are liable for the same obligation, so that every one of them can be compelled to render the full performance and the performance by one discharges all others (Cass. 15 December 1970 no. 2683, Giust.civ. 1971 I 569; Giusti 50). The securing obligation is due and payable together with the secured debt and the creditor can demand payment from the debtor and/or the security provider. The special features of the solidary security distinguish it from the obligation in solido; therefore, not all rules of the latter can be applied to solidary security (Busnelli 39 ss.; di Majo, Obbligazioni solidali 306 ss.; Casella 266 ss.; Giusti 50). Solidary liability of security provider and debtor is also the rule in both ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law. Although the liability under a security in ENGLISH law is contingent on the debtor's default, the creditor is regularly not obliged to take any steps against the debtor before turning to the security provider (China and South Seas Bank v. Tan [1990] 1 AC 536; Moschi v. Lep Air Services Ltd. [1973] AC 331): Contrary to the Roman-based systems, the beneficium discussionis was never adopted in ENGLISH law (Andrews and Millett no. 11-002). In general, the security provider's liability arises once the debtor defaults in the performance of the secured obligation (Andrews and Millett no. 7-002; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 10-07). A right to compel the creditor first to take steps against the debtor does not even exist in equity (see Ewart v. Latta (1863) 1 M 905); this decision in a SCOTTISH case is of highest authority in ENGLAND, too). The situation is similar in IRELAND (White 541).

2. SCOTTISH common law, which is based on Roman law, knew the beneficium discussionis. This was abolished by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (Scotland) 1856 s. 8 in respect of securities for money debts. The beneficium discussionis is still recognized where the secured obligation is one ad factum praestandum, i.e. if the principal is obliged to perform a certain act. It suffices, however, that the creditor fruitlessly attempts to obtain satisfaction from the debtor; execution against the debtor's estate is not required (Stair/Clark nos. 923-926).

3. In the NETHERLANDS, one writer holds a very broad view of solidarity by thinking that solidarity and subsidiarity do not exclude each other; in his view a "subsidiary solidarity" is possible and he regards the dependent personal security as a statutory example for this (Van Boom 25-29). However, this is a minority view.

II. Solidary liability for commercial providers of security

4. AUSTRIAN, GERMAN as well as FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN and PORTUGUESE law distinguish between commercial and non-commercial providers of dependent personal security. A dependent personal security assumed by a merchant in the course of business is solidary (AUSTRIAN and GERMAN Ccom § 349 read with § 343). It is presumed that any legal act of a merchant is made in the course of business (GERMAN Ccom § 344). In AUSTRIA dependent personal securities of merchants incurred after the end of 2006 will create a merely subsidiary liability (Law amending commercial law of 27 October 2005 art. I no. 132 abrogates present Ccom § 349 as of 1 January 2007). In FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG the dependent security has a commercial character if the secured debt is of a commercial nature; this follows from the principle of accessority. In addition, a personal interest of the security provider in the secured debt of a commercial nature is required (FRANCE: Simler no. 98; LUXEMBOURG: CA Luxembourg 26 June 1985, Pas luxemb XXVI (1984-86) Jur. 352), contrary to BELGIUM (cf. T´Kint no. 738). In FRANCE and BELGIUM the presumption of solidary liability which is in general available for commercial debts applies also to a commercial security (FRANCE: since Cass.com. 28 April 1966, Bull.civ. 1966 III no. 209 p. 187; Simler no. 364; BELGIUM: since Cass.com. 25 April 1985, Pas belge 1985 I 1044). In PORTUGAL the security provider does not have to be a merchant, the commercial character of the obligation being sufficient (Ccom art. 101). In SPAIN, although there is no relevant legal provision, the Supreme Court has in various decisions assumed solidary liability for commercial providers of security (TS 4 December 1950, RAJ 1951/227 ; TS 14 February 1997, RAJ 1997/1419 26 May 2004, RAJ 2004/4261). But since there are also Supreme Court decisions to the contrary (TS 5 March 1990, RAJ 1990/1665), the solidary nature of commercial securities cannot be regarded as settled.

III. Subsidiary liability by agreement

5. In the aforementioned countries the parties are free to agree that the provider of dependent security be charged only with subsidiary liability. This is expressly stated by ITALIAN CC art. 1944 para. 2 (cf. also Ravazzoni 262). The same is also true in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND (ENGLAND: Holl v. Hadley (1828) 5 Bing 54, 130 ER 980; SCOTLAND: Mercantile Law Amendment Act (Scotland) 1856 s. 8 at the end: “Provided always that nothing herein contained shall prevent any cautioner from stipulating in the instrument of caution that the creditor shall be bound before proceeding against him to discuss and do diligence against the principal debtor.”).

IV. Subsidiary liability as the rule

6. By contrast, in many other countries the security provider’s liability is, as a rule, subsidiary to the liability of the principal debtor and solidary liability must be agreed upon or, as an exception, prescribed by law (see national notes to following Article).

IV.G.–2:106: Subsidiary liability of security provider

(1) If so agreed, the security provider may invoke as against the creditor the subsidiary character of the security provider's liability. A binding comfort letter is presumed to establish only subsidiary liability.

(2) Subject to paragraph (3), before demanding performance from the security provider, the creditor must have undertaken appropriate attempts to obtain satisfaction from the debtor and other security providers, if any, securing the same obligation under a personal or proprietary security establishing solidary liability.

(3) The creditor is not required to attempt to obtain satisfaction from the debtor and any other security provider according to the preceding paragraph if and in so far as it is obviously impossible or exceedingly difficult to obtain satisfaction from the person concerned. This exception applies, in particular, if and in so far as an insolvency or equivalent proceeding has been opened against the person concerned or opening of such a proceeding has failed due to insufficient assets, unless a proprietary security provided by that person and for the same obligation is available.

COMMENTS

A. Subsidiary liability as exception

Since according to the preceding Article solidary liability of a provider of dependent security is the rule, subsidiary liability requires an agreement of the parties. In case of doubt the security provider has to prove that the liability is merely subsidiary. Exceptionally, according to IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (b) a personal security given by a consumer is always subsidiary.

Binding comfort letter. A binding comfort letter is "presumed" to create only subsidiary liability. This presumption is derived from the fact that the author of such a letter does not assume a direct liability to make payment to the creditor but, typically merely promises to see to it that the debtor has sufficient funds to satisfy the debtor's obligations towards the beneficiary of the letter. Failure to keep this promise results merely in liability in damages to the creditor. Of course, the presumption of a merely subsidiary liability of the patron can be disproved by the creditor.

B. Effects of subsidiary liability

The effect of subsidiary liability as intended by these Rules is defined by paragraph (2). In the case of subsidiary liability, the security provider is protected against too early an imposition of liability towards the creditor. Before being allowed to turn against the security provider, the creditor is required to have undertaken appropriate attempts to obtain satisfaction from several other possible sources. The subsidiary nature of a security provider's liability not only protects the security provider against a primary demand for performance under the security by the creditor but also gives provisional protection against attempts by other security providers, who have assumed solidary liability, to hold the security provider with subsidiary liability internally liable on recourse (cf. IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) paragraph (3) second alternative).

The appropriate attempts to obtain satisfaction which have to be undertaken by the creditor (or another security provider who might seek internal recourse) before claiming from a security provider with only subsidiary liability consist of the following requirements.

Firstly, the creditor must have tried to obtain satisfaction from the debtor. Only after having attempted an execution against the debtor may the creditor turn against the security provider for any obligation of the debtor which is still outstanding. Especially if the debtor has provided a proprietary security right, the creditor must attempt to satisfy the debt from this source.

Second, the creditor must have tried to enforce any personal or proprietary security rights granted by third parties for the same obligation which are not subsidiary. If another security provider has assumed solidary liability this shows a willingness to answer any demand for payment even though the creditor could well turn e.g. against the debtor. It is appropriate that a security provider who has assumed only a subsidiary liability should have to pay only if satisfaction cannot be obtained from a security provider of the "first rank".

C. Exceptions

In certain situations, a security provider who is only subsidiarily liable, is nevertheless not entitled to refuse performance to the creditor under the security even though the creditor has not undertaken all or some of the appropriate attempts to obtain satisfaction required under paragraph (2).

One self-evident case presents itself where all personal and proprietary securities are only subsidiarily liable. Provided that the creditor has undertaken appropriate attempts to obtain satisfaction from the debtor, the creditor can choose to claim performance from any of the security providers since their liability towards the creditor is solidary.

Other cases, in which it would be pointless to demand that the creditor first undertakes attempts to obtain satisfaction from the debtor or other security providers as required under paragraph (2) before claiming from the security provider with only subsidiary liability are dealt with in paragraph (3). This provision applies where it is obviously impossible or exceedingly difficult to obtain satisfaction from the debtor or other security providers who are solidarily or subsidiarily liable. In such a situation, a waste of time and money by the creditor must be avoided.

The most important example of a situation where it is obviously impossible or exceedingly difficult to obtain satisfaction from other persons is given in the second sentence of paragraph (3): insolvency or equivalent proceedings have been opened against the debtor or any other security provider or the opening of such a proceeding has failed due to insufficient assets. The mere chance to obtain some quota from the insolvent person's estate does not suffice since such quotas are, generally speaking, low or very low. The creditor may not be limited to such chances since full satisfaction in the near future is virtually excluded. And security is meant to prevent just such a result.

However, even if insolvency proceedings have been opened, the creditor still has chances of obtaining satisfaction from the insolvent person, if that person had provided proprietary security rights for the creditor; therefore the second sentence of paragraph (3) provides for a counter-exception, where the creditor is not relieved from the requirements of paragraph (2).

Other situations falling under paragraph (3) first sentence not expressly mentioned could be cases where the asset which is subject to a proprietary security right is located outside the country of the debtor's (or any other security provider's) residence in a country outside the European Union and enforcement or execution would be difficult or time-consuming. Economic equivalents would be cases where the value of the encumbered asset has depreciated or where it is clearly inadequate to satisfy the creditor's claim or if the encumbered asset is obviously worthless.

D. Default security

Especially in commercial practice, performance by one security provider is frequently supported by a default security. This is furnished by a second security provider (often one residing in the creditor's country) which is assumed towards the creditor and can be utilised by the latter if the first security provider is unable or unwilling to perform. In this setting, the default security is subsidiary since it may only be invoked if the creditor's attempt to obtain satisfaction from the first security provider has failed.

E. Consumer as security provider

Contrary to the approach to ordinary dependent security a consumer who assumes a dependent personal security is as a rule liable only subsidiarily; cf. IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (b) and also Comment C to the preceding Article. This rule applies to a consumer who purports to provide an independent security (cf. IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c)) as well as to a consumer who has assumed a co-debtorship for security purposes (cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1)).

Contrary to the general rule for consumer security providers, the basic principle of subsidiary liability may be deviated from by express agreement of the parties (cf. IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (b)). And in the context of a consumer security provider's co-debtorship for security purposes the term "debtor" means the debtor whose obligation is secured.

NOTES

I. Subsidiary liability of security provider as general rule

1. In most member states a dependent personal security establishes without agreement merely a subsidiary liability for the security provider (AUSTRIAN CC § 1355, 1351 para. 1 sentence 2; BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2011 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2288); FRANCE: Simler no. 501 ss.; DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 32 ss.; Ussing, Kaution 78; DUTCH CC art. 7:855 para. 1; FINNISH LDepGuar § 3 para. 1; RP 189/1998 rd 33; GERMAN CC § 771; GREEK CC art. 855; PORTUGUESE CC art. 638; SPANISH CC art. 1822 para. 1; SWEDISH Ccom chap. 10 § 9). In most member states the liability of a security provider who assumes liability for another security provider (collateral or default-security) is also subsidiary (DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 40 s.; FINLAND: Nehrman 355; Ekström

27; FRANCE: Simler no. 504; GERMANY: Erman/Herrmann no. 15 preceding § 765; GREECE: Georgiades § 4 nos. 10 s.; ITALY: CC art. 1948; Bozzi, La fideiussione 258; SPAIN: CC art. 1836; Díez-Picazo 460). This is true equally for BELGIAN, LUXEMBOURGIAN and DUTCH law where the security to secure another security is dealt with as any other security. PORTUGUESE CC art. 643 establishes a two level subsidiary liability of the security provider "subfiador" securing another security provider. By contrast, in commercial matters, solidarity is the rule and subsidiarity the exception (cf. national notes to preceding Article no. 4).

II. Solidary liability by agreement

2. In most member countries, the principle of subsidiary liability is in reality very frequently derogated from by the parties.

3. Some countries expressly provide for the possibility of party agreement (AUSTRIAN CC § 1357; FINNISH LDepGuar § 3 para. 1; BELGIUM and FRANCE: CC art. 2021 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2298); GERMAN CC § 773 para. 1 no. 1; GREEK CC art. 857 lit. a) read with art. 855; Georgiades § 3 no. 144; PORTUGUESE CC art. 640 lit. a); SPANISH CC art. 1822 para. 2, 1831 no. 1).

4. In these and other countries, very frequently the parties make use of the possibility to agree on solidary liability (AUSTRIA: Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1357 no. 1; SPAIN: Lacruz Berdejo 534; Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 30 ss.; TS 5 December 1991, RAJ 1991 no. 8917 (the most frequent form of dependent personal security in both countries). This is also true for DANISH law, at least for commercial relationships (Pedersen, Kaution 34). On the meaning of solidary liability, cf. national notes to preceding Article.

5. In GERMANY general terms for dependent personal securities very often provide for solidary liability of the security provider. However, the security provider is protected in so far as the exclusion of subsidiary liability must be in writing and signed by the security provider (CC § 766; BGH 25 September 1968, NJW 1968, 2332), except if the latter is a merchant (cf. Ccom § 350).

6. Although the presumption in SWEDISH legislation (Ccom chap. 10 § 9) is for a subsidiary liability, even when the security provider is a commercial party, the creditor practically always provides for primary liability, also in relation to private persons assuming securities (contra Walin, Borgen 29). In BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG, the subsidiary liability, although an important feature of dependent personal securities is of little practical importance nowadays as parties mostly agree to establish solidary liability for the security provider (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 404; FRANCE: Simler no. 512). This solidary liability cannot be presumed (CC art. 1202 para. 1). In FRANCE the presumption of solidary liability for commercial debts is applied also to commercial securities since 1966 (Cass.com. 28 April 1966, Bull.civ. 1966 III no. 209 p. 187).

III. Subsidiary liability – details

(a) Requirements

7. Subsidiary liability has different meanings in the various countries. One may distinguish between a slight and a strict form of subsidiarity.

(b) Slight subsidiarity

8. In AUSTRIA, the NETHERLANDS and in SCOTLAND for a specific form of security a slight form of subsidiarity applies. The creditor has first to demand performance from the debtor (AUSTRIAN CC § 1355; DUTCH CC art. 7:855 para. 1; SCOTLAND, cf. national notes to preceding Article no. 1 ss.), but need not do more than that. In AUSTRIA it is expressly provided that the parties may deviate from this rule also in favour of the provider of dependent security: they may agree upon a "strict" form of subsidiarity (CC § 1356). The same is true in the NETHERLANDS, except if the security provider is a consumer (cf. CC art. 7:862 lit a)). According to DUTCH CC art. 7:855 para. 1, the security provider need not perform until the debtor has failed to perform. Therefore the creditor must first demand performance from the debtor; only if the latter does not perform can the creditor address the security provider (Pitlo/Croes 358; Hartlief 216). Since the creditor has not "the choice of claiming solidary performance from the debtor and/or… security provider", the security provider's liability is subsidiary only (cf. Nieuwenhuis/Castermans art. 855 no. 2; Dutch Business Law § 6.05 [2]; du Perron and Haentjens, Introduction no. 11 and art. 855 no. 1). The situation is similar in BELGIUM for consumer credits secured by consumer or other security providers. According to BELGIAN ConsCredA the preconditions for the consumer debtor's default are increased: the creditor may only sue the security provider for a consumer credit if the debtor has defaulted at least on two payments or twenty percent of the total sum due or on the last due payment and if the debtor has not performed within one month after the creditor's demand sent by registered letter (ConsCredA art. 36).

(c) Strict subsidiarity

9. In most legal systems of member states in case of a subsidiary dependent personal security the creditor must attempt to obtain satisfaction by execution from the debtor (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2021 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2298); DENMARK: Iversen 24; Pedersen, Kaution 33; Ussing, Kaution 85; FINLAND: LDepGuar § 21 lit a); RP 189/1998 rd; GERMAN CC §§ 771 f; GREEK CC art. 855; PORTUGUESE CC art. 638; SPANISH CC arts. 1830, 1832, 1833 and 1834; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 157). In all these countries, the security provider's subsidiary liability is not observed ex officio, but is an exception that must be raised by the security provider against the creditor (beneficium excussionis or discussionis; for the use of both terms in ROMAN law sources cf. Zimmermann 130 fn. 104; BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC arts. 2022-2024 (since 2006: FRENCH CC arts. 2299-2301); GERMAN CC § 771 (exception of prior legal action against the principal debtor, Einrede der Vorausklage); GREEK CC art. 855; PORTUGUESE CC art. 638; SPANISH CC art. 1832). The raising of the exception forces the creditor first to bring action and execution against the debtor (FRANCE: Simler no. 501 ss.; GERMANY: Palandt/Sprau § 771 no. 1; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 144; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 776).

10. If in ITALY the beneficium excussionis has been agreed, the security provider must point out the assets of the debtor to be executed (ITALIAN CC art. 1944 para. 2 in fine). In particular, under ITALIAN law the beneficium excussionis operates only if three conditions are given: a) it must be invoked by the security provider; b) the debtor's assets to be executed must have been pointed out by the security provider and c) unless agreed to the contrary, the security provider has to pay in advance the costs of this execution (Distaso 112 ss.; Ravazzoni 262 s.). In BELGIUM, FRANCE, LUXEMBOURG and SPAIN, the security provider who has raised the exceptio discussionis must indicate to the creditor those assets of the debtor into which an execution can be brought (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC arts. 2023-2024 (since 2006: FRENCH CC arts. 2300 and 2301); SPANISH CC art. 1832). The beneficium discussionis may also in PORTUGAL be raised with regard to property rights of a third party, which secure the same debt, if they were constituted before or simultaneously with the personal security (CC art. 639). In PORTUGAL the creditor is entitled in any case to demand performance only from the security provider or from the security provider together with the debtor. If performance is demanded from the security provider alone, in case both of solidary and subsidiary liability he has the right to call the debtor upon demand in order to defend or to be condemned together (CC art. 641 para. 1). If the security provider omits to do this, a waiver of the beneficium discussionis will be presumed, unless the security provider declares the contrary in the proceedings (CC art. 641 para. 2; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela 658). Also according to SPANISH CC art. 1834, the creditor can sue the security provider together with the debtor, but the beneficium discussionis remains effective even if a judgement is rendered against both of them.

11. When the creditor omits or is negligent in bringing execution against the debtor's indicated assets, the creditor is liable to the extent of the value of these assets if they are lost in a subsequent insolvency of the debtor. To this extent the security provider is no longer liable (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2024 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2301); Simler no. 521; and SPANISH CC art. 1833).

12. In contrast to these legal systems, in GERMANY and GREECE the security provider does not have to indicate assets of the debtor to the creditor. The creditor has to attempt execution against the secured debtor (GERMAN CC § 771; GREEK CC art. 855). However, according to GERMAN CC § 772 and GREEK CC art. 856 in most cases of securing money claims compulsory execution must only be attempted against the secured debtor's movables and only against those situated at the debtor's domicile or residence (in GERMANY including a place of business). Additionally, the creditor has in general to seek satisfaction from a pledge or lien on the debtor's movables (para. 2 of the previously cited provisions).

(d) Exception based on impossibility or extreme difficulty of execution

13. In DENMARK the creditor is not obliged to attempt to obtain satisfaction by execution from the debtor's assets if it is proved that this is impossible or if the security provider admits the impossibility (Ussing, Kaution 85; see Kæstel 1). In FRANCE, especially if the debtor is overindebted (and even if the security provider is a consumer), the creditor is not obliged to attempt satisfaction by execution from the debtor (Simler no. 511). Rather the security provider is liable if the debtor's assets are not sufficient (cf. Cass.com. 17 March 1969, Bull.civ. 1969 IV no. 96 p. 97). According to GREEK CC art. 857, the security provider's liability ceases to be subsidiary, if it is obvious that execution on the debtor's property would not yield results. The situation of obvious inability to pay of the debtor produces a factual impossibility of exercise of the beneficium excussionis also in ITALY (Distaso 116). Similarly, GERMAN CC § 773 para. 1 no. 4 prescribes that "the exception of prior execution against the principal debtor is barred if it must be assumed that compulsory execution on the property of the principal debtor will not lead to the satisfaction of the creditor." However, according to paragraph 2 there is again only subsidiary liability if the creditor can obtain satisfaction from a pledge or lien over a movable asset of the debtor.

14. In PORTUGAL the security provider cannot invoke the beneficium discussionis if the debtor or the owner of the goods securing the debt cannot be sued or be made the subject of execution within the continental territory or the adjacent islands, due to a fact that arose after the creation of the security (CC art. 640 lit. b)). The same is valid for SPAIN when the debtor cannot be sued within the Kingdom (CC art. 1831 no. 4). In BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN law, the assets of the debtor to be executed may not be located outside the district of the court of appeal of the place where payment is to be made and may not be subject to a controversy or be pledged for the debt and therefore no longer in possession of the debtor (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2023 para. 2 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2300 para. 2); BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 377-380; RPDB, Cautionnement nos. 237-243; FRANCE: Simler no. 518; in FRANCE the requirement of proximity is considered to be anachronistic). These requirements indicate the legislator's intention that only goods which can easily and within a short period of time be executed, can be indicated by the security provider (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 378 at p. 196; Lebon, Borgtocht no. 10; FRANCE: Simler no. 518). A general exception for executions that are obviously difficult or even without a chance does not exist.

15. By contrast, in SWEDEN and FINLAND there is no exception from the creditor's duty to attempt to obtain satisfaction by execution (SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 157 ss.; FINNISH LDepGuar § 2 no. 2 and § 21; RP 189/1998 rd 30, 58 ss.).

(e) Exception in case of debtor's move

16. In GERMANY and GREECE the exception of prior proceeding is excluded if the difficulty of bringing an action against the debtor is materially increased due to a change of domicile, place of business, or place of residence occurring after assumption of the security (GERMAN CC § 773 para. 1 no. 2; GREEK CC art. 857 no. 2). The reason for this exception is that the creditor in cases of monetary claims is only required to bring executions against the debtor's assets at the debtor's domicile, residence or place of business as at the time of creating the security. In AUSTRIA, subsidiarity cannot be invoked by the security provider if the debtor's residence at this time is unknown, provided that the creditor did not behave negligently (CC § 1356).

(f) Exception in case of debtor's insolvency

Debtor's insolvency

17. According to SPANISH CC art. 1831 no. 3 an execution into all of the debtor's assets is not required in case of bankruptcy or insolvency of the debtor. The wording of this provision does not make clear whether an insolvency proceeding must have been opened or whether an obvious factual insolvency would be enough to exclude the beneficium excussionis. In case of an obvious factual insolvency, the security provider will not find the property of the debtor that can be sold within Spanish territory and which is sufficient to cover the amount of the debt, which according to art. 1832 sentence 2 must be pointed out. Moreover, according to general case law the creditor should not be compelled to bring suit for claims when it is obvious in advance that this will be useless (cf. TS 30 July 1999, RAJ 1999/5724; Carrasco, Tratado, p. 220). As mentioned (above no. 13) the ITALIAN solution is very similar.
