"payment" is not mentioned here. Es findet sich nur in CC art. 1896 (speaking of a person "who accepts an undue payment"). Some authors conclude from this apparent contradiction that CC art. 1895 acknowledges a broader condictio than the classical condictio indebiti, including e.g. performances which are not credendi causa (Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez loc. cit. 115-116). Compilación del Derecho Civil Foral de Navarra Gesetz 508 schließlich lautet: "Derjenige, der einen von einer anderen Person empfangenen Gewinn ohne Grund erwirbt oder behält, ist zur Rückerstattung verpflichtet".

27. Das ITALIENISCHE Recht ordnet im Rahmen der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld (pagamento dell'indebito) eine ripetizione an. Der fehlende Rechtsgrund kommt in dem Wort indebito zum Ausdruck. Für den Zahlenden und den Zahlungsempfänger gibt es im Gesetz keine feste Terminologie. In der Literatur ist durchweg von solvens und accipiens die Rede (z.B. Alpa and Mariconda [-Sirena], Codice civile commentato IV, sub arts. 2033 ff). Für die Bereicherungsklage spricht CC art. 2041 das Fehlen des Rechtsgrundes mit den Worten senza una giusta causa an. Der Nachteil des Klägers wird in derselben Bestimmung als "Schaden" bezeichnet. Der notwendige Nexus zwischen der Vermögensmehrung und der Vermögensminderung kommt in dem Erfordernis einer "correlativa" diminuzione patrimoniale auf der Seite des Verarmten zum Ausdruck.

28. Das AUSTRIAN ABGB kennt noch kein selbständiges Bereicherungsrecht; es verfügt weder über einen einheitlichen Bereicherungstatbestand noch über eine einheitliche Terminologie. Der Anspruchsinhaber wird vom Gesetz teils 'Eigentümer' (CC § 1041), teils 'Geber' (CC § 1435) und manchmal auch nur 'jemand' (CC §§ 1431 ff) genannt. In Anlehnung an CC § 934 (laesio enormis) nennen Rechtsprechung und Lehre den Anspruchsinhaber heute durchweg den 'Verkürzten', den Anspruchsgegner den Bereicherten (z.B. Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 273; Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III[2], no 15/1; OGH 22 August 1951, SZ 24/204). Die Notwendigkeit einer Verbindung zwischen dem Vorteil des Bereicherten und dem Nachteil des Verkürzten wird vom Gesetz nicht gesondert hervorgehoben, steckt für den Bereich der Leistungskondiktionen aber in dem Wort 'Zurückfordern' und für den Bereich der Verwendungskondiktion (CC § 1041) in dem Erfordernis, dass die Sache des Verkürzten 'zum Nutzen eines anderen' verwandt worden sein muss (Koziol and Welser loc.cit.; Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Koziol], ABGB[2], § 1041 no. 1).

29. PORTUGUESE CC arts. 473-482 tragen die Überschrift enriquecimento sem causa; im Schrifttum ist auch die Rede von enriquecimento injusto (ungerechte Bereicherung) oder von locupletamento à custa alheia (Bereicherung auf fremde Kosten) (z.B. Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 471). CC art. 473 erhebt zur Voraussetzung, dass die Bereicherung injustamente erlangt wurde. Der Einfluss deutschen Rechtsdenkens ist nicht gering; er zeigt sich auch der Formulierung, dass die Bereicherung à custa de outrem (auf Kosten eines anderen) erfolgt sein muss (STJ 24 June 2004, Processo 03B3105). Gelegentlich finden sich in der Rechtsprechung sogar deutsche Begriffe mit portugiesischer Übersetzung (z.B. in STJ 24 June 2004 loc.cit. teoria da afectação ou destinação ["Zuweisungslehre"], atribuições patrimoniais ["Vermögenszuwendungen"], deslocações patrimoniais ["Vermögensverschiebungen"], conteúdo da destinação ["Zuweisungsgehalt"] und enriquecimento por intromissão ou usurpação ["Eingriffskondiktion"]). Der Anspruchsberechtigte wird vom Gesetz meistens empobrecido ("Verarmter") genannt (z.B. CC arts. 474, 479(1) und 480), der Anspruchsgegner enriquecido (Bereicherter) (z.B. CC arts. 480(a) und 481(1)). Für die condictio indebiti hat hat sich teilweise eine eigene Terminologie erhalten; CC arts. 476-478 verweisen gelegentlich auf die repetição do indevido (die Rückforderung des Ungeschuldeten) und das direito de repetição (den Rückforderungsanspruch).

30. Zur Terminologie des GERMAN law siehe die Angaben in PEL Unj.Enr. Introduction B21, C52, 89 and 108.

31. Das GREEK CC enthält einen eigenen Abschnitt mit der Überschrift "ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung" (arts. 904-913). Das griechische Bereicherungsrecht folgt weitgehend deutschen Vorbildern (Schlechtriem, Restitution und Bereicherungsausgleich in Europa I, ch. 1, no. 51). CC art. 904 spricht von demjenigen, der "reicher wurde" (οποιος εγινε πλουσιοτερος); im Schrifttum ist meistens von dem "Bereicherten" die Rede (z.B. Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 4), während der Anspruchsberechtigte entweder "Gläubiger" oder "Geschädigter" genannt wird (Stathopoulos loc.cit. no. 17). Die Bereicherung muss "aus dem Vermögen eines anderen oder zu dessen Schaden" erfolgt sein. Mit dieser Formulierung übernahm der griechische Gesetzgeber die Terminologie des Ersten Entwurfes zum deutschen BGB (Xelidonis, Arm 2000, 309, 316 mit fn. 23). CC art. 905 spricht vom "Empfänger" der Leistung, CC art. 907 vom "Geber", CC art. 908 vom "Empfänger".

32. HUNGARIAN CC § 361(1) kleidet die allgemeine Bereicherungsklage in die Worte: "Wer zu Lasten eines anderen ohne rechtlichen Grund einen Vermögensvorteil erlangt, muss diesen Vorteil zurückerstatten". Die Formulierung deckt sich also weithin mit der in VII.–1:101 (Basic rule). Der erforderliche Nexus zwischen Vermögensvorteil und –nachteil wird allerdings in den Worten "zu Lasten" ausgedrückt, die ihrerseits vorwiegend dahin verstanden werden, dass sie eine kausale Verbindung fordern. BULGARIAN LOA arts. 55 ff sind mit den Worten "ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung" (неоснователно обогатяване) überschrieben. Das Gesetz hat damit die seinem Vorgänger noch bekannte Kategorie der Quasiverträge aufgegeben (näher Goleminov, Neosnovatelno obogatyavane, 26). SLOVENIAN LOA art. 190 spricht von dem "ungerechtfertigt Gewonnenen" (neupravičena pridobitev) bzw. der "Bereicherung".

33. Das POLNISCHE Recht hat den Begriff der "ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung" (niesłuszne wzbogacenie) erstmalig im Obligationengesetzbuch aus dem Jahre 1933 verwandt (näher Radwański [-Ohanowicz], System prawa cywilnego III(1), 474). Das Zivilgesetzbuch aus dem Jahre 1964 führte (in Buch III, fünfter Titel) den Ausdruck "grundlose Bereicherung" (bezpodstawne wzbogacenie) ein, weil man die Abwesenheit einer causa als das zentrale Merkmal des Bereicherungsrechts hervorheben wollte. Die Bereicherung nennt das Gesetz in CC art. 405 "Vermögensvorteil" (korzyść majątkowa); ein begriffliches Äquivalent zu dem in diesen PEL Unj.Enr. Verwendung findenden "disadvantage" fehlt. In der Lehre ist oft von "Verarmung" (zubożenie) bzw. "dem Verarmten" die Rede (z.B. Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania – część ogólna.[2], 218). Den erforderlichen Nexus zwischen dem Vor- und dem Nachteil umschreibt man zumeist mit den Worten związek między wzbogaceniem a zubożeniem ("Zusammenhang zwischen der Bereicherung und der Verarmung") (Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 219; Ohanowicz loc. cit. 485; Pietrzykowski [-Pietrzykowski], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 405 no. 4). CC arts. 410-413 behandeln die nienależne świadczenie, die "nicht zustehende Leistung".

34. DUTCH CC art. 6:203 spricht im Rahmen der ungeschuldeten Zahlung (onverschuldigde betaling) einerseits von der Person, "die gegeben hat" (degene die heeft gegeven), und andererseits von dem "Empfänger" (ontvanger) der Zahlung. Im Rahmen der Bereicherungsklage aus CC art. 6:212 ist im Gesetz dagegen von dem "Bereicherten" (verrijkte) und dem "anderen" (ander) die Rede. Auch die Formulierung für die Rechtsgrundlosigkeit ist nicht einheitlich, nämlich zonder rechtsgrond im ersten und ongerechtvaardigd im zweiten Fall. Voraussetzung der Bereicherungsklage ist ein Schaden (schade) des Klägers. Das Recht der ungeschuldeten Zahlung umschreibt den erforderlichen Nachteil des Klägers nicht mit einem selbständigen Oberbegriff. Es arbeitet vielmehr, je nach Kontext, mit einem Wort für den weggegebenen Gegenstand, also "Gut" (goed: CC art. 6:203(1)), eine "Summe Geld" (geldsom: CC art. 6:203(2)) und "Leistung anderer Art" (prestatie van andere aard: CC art. 6:203(3)); vgl. zu alledem Asser (-Hartkamp), Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 317 p. 337; Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 803.

35. In den NORDIC coutries existiert eine allgemein anerkannte bereicherungsrechtliche Terminologie nicht. Die kontinentaleuropäische Begrifflichkeit wird oft scharf kritisiert, darunter auch der Begriff der Bereicherung, see note II14 above.

V. Burden of proof

36. In FRANCE obliegt es dem Kläger, die Anwendungsvoraussetzungen der action en répétition de l´indu zu beweisen; dazu gehört auch der Nachweis des ungeschuldeten Charakters der Zahlung (Cass.civ. 16 November 2004, Bull.civ. 2004, I, no. 276 p. 232). In einem Reisekostenstreit zwischen einer Krankenkasse und einem Krankenpfleger muss also die Krankenkasse im Rückforderungsprozess beweisen, dass dem Pfleger die an ihn ausgezahlten Reisekosten nicht zustanden; dagegen muss der Pfleger, wenn er aktiv Zahlung noch ausstehender Reisekosten begehrt, beweisen, dass ihm die Reisekosten zustehen (Cass.soc. 9 December 1993, Bull.civ. 1993, V, no. 311 p. 211). Der Beweis kann jeweils mit allen rechtlich zulässigen Beweismitteln geführt werden (Cass.civ. 29 January 1991, Bull.civ. 1991, I, no. 36 p. 22). In BELGIEN ist die Ausgangslage dieselbe (Cass. 12 April 1973, Pas. belge 1973, I, 780). In der Lehre findet sich allerdings die Auffassung, dass hinsichtlich des Beweises der Zahlung CC art. 1341 mit der Folge zu beachten sei, dass Zahlungen, deren Wert € 375,- übersteigen, schriftlich bewiesen werden müssten. Der Irrtum des solvens kann dagegen auch durch Zeugen bewiesen werden (Brunet/Servais/Resteau, RPDB XI, v° Quasi-contrat, no. 273 p. 44). Hinsichtlich des Beweises des ungeschuldeten Charakters der Zahlung kann CC art. 1341 ebenfalls eine Rolle spielen, etwa dann, wenn der Kläger zu seinen Gunsten eine Novation behauptet. Trägt er dagegen lediglich vor, als Nichtschuldner gezahlt zu haben, so stehen ihm hierfür alle rechtlichen Beweismittel offen (Brunet/Servais/Resteau loc. cit.). Hinsichtlich der enrichissement sans cause wird in FRANCE zwischen den "materiellen" oder "positiven" und den "rechtlichen" oder "negativen" Anwendungsvoraussetzungen unterschieden. Materielle Anwendungsvoraussetzungen sind die Bereicherung eines Vermögens (enrichissement), die Minderung eines anderen Vermögens (appauvrissement) und die Kausalität zwischen diesen beiden Vorgängen (der lien de causalité). Rechtliche Anwendungsvoraussetzungen sind die Abwesenheit eines Rechtsgrunds (absence de cause) und der subsidiäre Charakter der actio de in rem verso. Die materiellen Voraussetzungen hat der Kläger zu beweisen (Romani, Enrichissement sans cause, no. 29). Über die Beweislast hinsichtlich der rechtlichen Voraussetzungen herrscht in der Lehre dagegen Uneinigkeit. Die Mehrzahl der Autoren stimmt der Rechtsprechung des Kassationshofes (Cass.civ. 19 January 1988, Bull.civ. 1988, I, no. 16 p. 11) darin zu, dass der Kläger die Abwesenheit des Rechtsgrunds zu beweisen habe (Sériaux, Droit des obligations[2], no. 90 p. 325). Eine Mindermeinung vertritt jedoch die genau umgekehrte Ansicht (Bénabent, Les obligations[10], no. 485 p. 333). Die BELGISCHE Lehre folgt der herrschenden Ansicht in Frankreich. Der Beweis kann mit allen rechtlichen Beweismitteln geführt werden (Roodhooft [-Roodhooft], Bestendig Handboek Verbintenissenrecht V, no. 2291).

37. SPANISH CC arts. 1900 and 1901 regeln Fragen der Beweislast im Rahmen der condictio indebiti. The solvens has to prove both payment (CC art. 1900(1)) and error (CC art. 1900(2); see TS 31 May 2006, BDA RJ 2006/3322). CC art. 1901, however, facilitates the proof of the error. Ein Irrtum wird widerleglich vermutet, wenn die gelieferte Sache nicht geschuldet oder schon geleistet war. Die Notwendigkeit, einen Irrtum zu beweisen, entfällt sogar ganz, wenn der Beklagte bestreitet, die Sache empfangen zu haben (CC art. 1900). Auf die allgemeine Bereicherungsklage findet die gewöhnliche Beweislastregel in CCP art. 217 Anwendung (TS 15 June 2004, RAJ 2004 (3) no. 3847 p. 7922). Thus, the plaintiff must prove the increase in the defendant´s assets (TS 8 July 1999, RAJ 1999 (3) no. 4764 p. 7355) and the decrease in his or her assets. However, the burden of proving the existence of causa is said to be on the defendant (Albaladejo, Derecho Civil II(2)[10], 917).

38. ITALIAN CC art. 2697, wonach jeder, der "ein Recht bei Gericht geltend machen will, ... die Tatsachen beweisen [muss], die dessen Grundlage bilden", und wonach die tatsächlichen Voraussetzungen eines Verteidigungsmittels vom Beklagten bewiesen werden müssen, gilt auch im Recht der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld (CC arts. 2033 ff) und im Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung (CC arts. 2041-2042). Der Kläger hat folglich Leistung an den accipiens und ihre Rechtsgrundlosigkeit zu beweisen (Cass. 12 July 2005, no. 14597, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, 6; Cass.sez.lav. 13 November 2003, no. 17146, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, 11; Cass. 15 July 2003, no. 11073, Nuova giur. civ. comm. 2004, I, 447, note Moscati; Cass.sez.lav. 23 August 2000, no. 11029, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 1823; Cass.sez.trib. 21 July 2000, no. 9604, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 1592). Die Behauptungen, es sei um die Erfüllung einer Naturalobligation gegangen (CC art. 2034) oder die Leistung sei unter Verstoß gegen die guten Sitten erbracht worden (CC art. 2035), sind dagegen vom Beklagten zu beweisen. Beim indebito soggettivo (CC art. 2036) obliegt dem Kläger zusätzlich der Beweis eines entschuldbaren Irrtums (Moscati, Pagamento dell'indebito, sub art. 2036, 423-424; Cass. 30 August 1962, no. 2728, Foro it. Mass. 1962, no. 2728; anders Schlesinger, Riv.Dir.Com. 1957, I, 58, 70). Dagegen muss der Beklagte beweisen, dass er sich der Schuldurkunde oder der für die Forderung erhaltenen Sicherheit entledigt hat; der gute Glauben wird vermutet (Alpa and Mariconda [-Sirena], Codice civile commentato IV, sub art. 2036, VII, §§ 16-17, p. 2326). Aus CC art. 2037 folgt, dass die Unmöglichkeit der Rückgabe einer bestimmten Sache vom accipiens zu beweisen ist, und zwar auch dann, wenn der solvens Wertersatz in der Annahme verlangt hat, die Rückgabe der Sache werde unmöglich sein (Cass. 14 June 1996, no. 5512, Giur.it. 1997, I, 1, 642). Im Rahmen des Anwendungsbereichs von CC art. 2039 trägt der solvens die Beweislast hinsichtlich des von dem geschäftsunfähigen accipiens erlangten Vorteils; der accipiens dagegen muss seine mangelnde Geschäftsfähigkeit und den Umstand beweisen, dass der solvens von ihr Kenntnis hatte oder hätte haben müssen (Moscati loc. cit. sub art. 2039, 563). Im Rahmen der Bereicherungsklage aus CC art. 2041 obliegt dem Kläger der Beweis, dass er einen Vermögensnachteil erlitten hat, durch welchen der Beklagte bereichert worden ist (Cass. 28 October 2005, no. 21096, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, 7-8; Cass.sez.lav. 10 March 1994, no. 2356, Resp.civ. e prev. 1994, 645). Gegebenenfalls hat der Kläger auch die Grundlage seines Rechtstitels zu beweisen, z.B. dass er Eigentümer des Gutes war, dessen Verlust den Schaden ausmacht, oder dass er der Urheber des plagiierten Werkes ist (Sirena loc. cit. sub art. 2041, XII, § 65, p. 2351-2352). Bei einer Bereicherung der öffentlichen Verwaltung hat der Kläger zu beweisen, dass die Verwaltung die Nützlichkeit des Werkes oder der Leistung anerkannt hat (Cass. 9 March 2006, no. 5069, Giust.civ.Mass. 2006, 3).

39. Auch in AUSTRIA hat der Kläger alle Anspruchsvoraussetzungen zu beweisen (OGH 23 January 1957, 7Ob13/57), d.h. die Bereicherung des Beklagten, ihre Rechtsgrundlosigkeit (OGH 14 October 2003, ÖBA 2004, 552; CFI Vienna 28 November 1994, ZVR 1995/145 p. 338) und, im Rahmen der condictio indebiti, i.d.R. auch den Irrtum des Leistenden (OGH 27 November 1968, SZ 41/63). Im Falle der Zahlung einer objektiven Nichtschuld wird der Irrtum allerdings prima facie vermutet (OGH 7 July 1987, WBl 1987, 312; OGH 14 October 2003, JBl 2005, 100).

40. Unter PORTGUESE CC art. 342(1) hat der Kläger alle Voraussetzungen seiner Bereicherungsklage zu beweisen. Im Recht der Leistungsbereicherung muss der Kläger also die Bereicherung des anderen Teils, seine eigene Verarmung, den Kausalzusammenhang zwischen diesen beiden Ereignissen und die Abwesenheit eines Rechtfertigungsgrundes für die Bereicherung beweisen (STJ 2 July 1976, BolMinJus 259 [1976] 206). Der Kläger muss also z.B. beweisen, dass es sich nicht um eine Freigiebigkeit handelte (STJ 29 May 2007, Processo 07A1302). Im Zweifel wird vermutet, dass die Bereicherung mit Rechtsgrund und deshalb der Nachteil des Klägers nicht sine causa geschah (STJ 29 May 2007 loc. cit.; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], note 1b under art. 473, p. 456). Bei Klagen aus Eingriffsbereicherung ist der Beweis eines Schadens nicht erforderlich (STJ 29 April 1992, RLJ 125 [1992-1993] 86, note Mesquita loc. cit. 158; STJ 23 March 1999, CJ [ST] VII [1999-1] 172 = BolMinJus 485 [1999] 396; STJ 18 February 2002, Processo 02B4011). Ein Patentinhaber kann wegen Verletzung seines Patents aus Eingriffsbereicherung auch dann vorgehen, wenn er nicht beabsichtigte, seine Erfindung zu verwerten (STJ 22 April 1999, CJ [ST] VII [1999-2]) 58).

41. Nach den Grundsätzen der Beweislastverteilung des GERMAN law hat jede Seite die ihr günstigen Voraussetzungen zu beweisen. Dem Bereicherungsgläubiger obliegt es deshalb, alle anspruchsbegründenden Voraussetzungen zu beweisen, und dem Bereicherungsschuldner obliegt der Beweis der tatsächlichen Voraussetzungen seiner Einwendungen (BGH 6 December 1994, NJW 1995, 727, 728; BGH 14 December 1994, BGHZ 128, 167, 171; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 812, no. 103). Gewisse Besonderheiten gelten allerdings hinsichtlich des fehlenden Rechtsgrundes (CC § 812(1)(i) first alternative). Zwar muss auch dieses "negative" Merkmal grundsätzlich vom Bereicherungsgläubiger bewiesen werden. Der Bereicherungsschuldner muss allerdings im Rahmen des Zumutbaren die Umstände darlegen, aus denen er ableitet, das Erlangte behalten zu dürfen (BGH 18 May 1999, NJW 1999, 2887, 2888; Sprau loc. cit.). Sodann obliegt es dem Bereicherungsgläubiger, den vom Schuldner behaupteten konkreten Rechtsgrund auszuräumen (BGH 21 October 1982, NJW 1983, 626; BGH 3 February 1995, NJW-RR 1995, 916, 917; Reuter and Martinek, Ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung, 757). Der Bereicherungsgläubiger muss aber nicht alle theoretisch in Betracht kommenden Rechtsgründe ausschließen (BGH 20 May 1996, NJW-RR 1996, 1211; BGH 27 September 2002, NJW 2003, 1039). Behauptet der Bereicherungsgläubiger, dass er zur Erfüllung einer bestimmten Verbindlichkeit geleistet habe, diese aber nicht existiere, so muss er ihr Nichtbestehen beweisen (RG 11 July 1901, RGZ 49, 50; BGH 6 December 1990, NJW-RR 1991, 574, 575). Entsprechendes gilt jeweils für die condictio ob causam finitam, bei welcher sich die Beweislast des Bereicherungsgläubigers auf den Wegfall des Rechtsgrundes bezieht. Bei der condictio ob rem muss bewiesen werden, dass ein Erfolg vorausgesetzt war, welcher nicht eingetreten ist (Erman [-Westermann], BGB II[11], § 812, no. 90; Sprau loc. cit.). Wer ein indebitum geleistet hat, muss dagegen nicht beweisen, sich geirrt zu haben (CC § 814). Bei der Nichtleistungskondiktion hat der Bereicherungsgläubiger zu beweisen, dass der Bereicherungsschuldner die betreffende Vermögensposition (durch die Handlung eines Dritten oder auf andere Weise) ohne Rechtsgrund erlangt hat (Westermann loc. cit.). Der Bereicherungsschuldner dagegen muss beweisen, die Bereicherung durch die Leistung eines Dritten erhalten zu haben, so dass eine Haftung gegenüber dem Bereicherungsgläubiger aus Nichtleistungskondiktion ausscheidet (Sprau loc. cit. no. 106).

42. Auch under GREEK law obliegt es dem Bereicherungsgläubiger, alle anspruchsbegründenden Voraussetzungen zu beweisen, auch wenn es sich dabei um negative Tatbestandsmerkmale handelt. Der Bereicherungsgläubiger hat folglich zu beweisen: (i) die Bereicherung des Beklagten, (ii) dass diese Bereicherung zu Lasten des Klägers erfolgt ist, und (iii) dass sie nicht auf einem Rechtsgrund beruht (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, nos. 118 und 120; A.P. 1440/2000, EllDik 42 [2001] 731). Die Beweislast für den Wegfall einer Bereicherung obliegt dagegen dem Beklagten (A.P. 401/1960, NoB 8 [1960] 1071; A.P. 785/1964, NoB 13 [1965] 706). Auch im Rahmen von CC art. 905 ist der Beklagte dafür beweispflichtig, dass der Kläger freiwillig und in Kenntnis der Nichtschuld geleistet hat (Stathopoulos loc.cit. art. 905, no. 2).

43. Unter HUNGARIAN Bereicherungsrecht muss der Kläger (anders als im Deliktsrecht, wo die Vorwerfbarkeit vermutet wird) alle Anspruchsvoraussetzungen beweisen (Petrik [-Bíró], Polgári jog II^2, 650). Dazu gehört auch die Abwesenheit des Rechtsgrundes. Eine Ausnahme wird für den Fall der Zweckverfehlungskondiktion vorgeschlagen; hier müsse der Bereicherte beweisen, dass der Zweck tatsächlich erreicht worden sei. Dem Bereicherten soll auch der Beweis obliegen, dass auf eine noch nicht fällige Forderung geleistet worden sei (Bíró loc. cit. 655). Im POLNISCHEN Recht gilt die allgemeine Regel, dass die Beweislast für eine Tatsache denjenigen trifft, der aus ihr Rechtsfolgen ableitet (CC art. 6). Im Bereicherungsrecht trifft die Beweislast folglich den Bereicherungsgläubiger. Ausnahmen von dieser Regel werden weder in der Literatur noch in der Rechtsprechung thematisiert. Unter BULGARIAN Law muss der Kläger beweisen, dass der Bereicherungsgegenstand aus seinem Vermögen stammt, an den Beklagten gelangt ist und dass die Bereicherung ohne Rechtsgrund erfolgte. Der Kläger muss dagegen nicht beweisen, irrtümlich geleistet zu haben (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 587); anders ist das nur, wenn er aus CC art. 56 (Irrtümliche Zahlung einer fremden Schuld) klagt. Auch im SLOVENIAN law muss der solvens alle Tatbestandsvoraussetzungen des LOA art. 190(1) beweisen. In den Fällen der Eingriffsbereicherung (der Versionsklage) muss der Entreicherte zusätzlich den Kausalzusammenhang zwischen der Bereicherung und dem Ereignis beweisen, aus dem sie nach seiner Behauptung herrührt (Šinkovec and Tratar, Obligacijski zakonik s komentarjem in sodno prakso, art. 190, p. 190).

44. Unter DUTCH CCP art. 150 trägt jede Partei die Beweislast für die tatsächlichen Voraussetzungen der von ihr geltend gemachten Rechtsfolge, sofern sich nicht ausnahmsweise aus besonderen Regeln oder aus Redlichkeit und Billigkeit (redelijkheid en billijkheid) etwas anderes ergibt. Daraus folgt, dass der Kläger alle Voraussetzungen des von ihm geltend gemachten Bereicherungsanspruchs beweisen muss, darunter auch die Bereicherung des Beklagten (HR 26 January 2001, NedJur 2002 no. 118 p. 905).

45. Auch in the NORDIC countries gilt das allgemeine Prinzip, wonach eine Person, die etwas unter dem Gesichtspunkt der condictio indebiti (bzw. der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung) zurückfordert, die tatsächlichen Voraussetzungen für diesen Anspruch beweisen muss (SWEDISH HD 17 September 1999, NJA 1999, 575). Den genauen Rechtsgrund für den geltend gemachten Anspruch muss die klagende Partei jedoch nicht vortragen (HD 8 February, NJA 1993, 13; see also Ravnkilde, Betalningskorrektioner, 81, 90; Roos, JFT 1992, 75, 79).

Illustration 2 from CA Dresden 19 March 2007, WM 2007, 1023; illustration 3 from BGH 31 October 1963, BGHZ 40, 272; illustration 4 from BGH 25 June 1962, BGHZ 37, 258; illustration 5 from Irvine v. Talksport Ltd [2003] EWCA Civ 423, [2003] 2 All ER 881; illustration 6 from BGH 26 October 2006, WRP 2007, 83; illustration 7 from BH 1997/87 (similarly BH 2005/401); and illustration 9 from TS 23 March 2006, RAJ 2006 (2) no. 1824 p. 4347.

CHAPTER 2: WHEN ENRICHMENT UNJUSTIFIED

VII.–2:101: Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified

(1) An enrichment is unjustified unless:

(a) the enriched person is entitled as against the disadvantaged person to the enrichment by virtue of a contract or other juridical act, a court order or a rule of law; or

(b) the disadvantaged person consented freely and without error to the disadvantage.

(2) If the contract or other juridical act, court order or rule of law referred to in paragraph (1)(a) is void or avoided or otherwise rendered ineffective retrospectively, the enriched person is not entitled to the enrichment on that basis.

(3) However, the enriched person is to be regarded as entitled to an enrichment by virtue of a rule of law only if the policy of that rule is that the enriched person is to retain the value of the enrichment.

(4) An enrichment is also unjustified if:

(a) the disadvantaged person conferred it:

(i) for a purpose which is not achieved; or

(ii) with an expectation which is not realised;

(b) the enriched person knew of, or could reasonably be expected to know of, the purpose or expectation; and

(c) the enriched person accepted or could reasonably be assumed to have accepted that the enrichment must be reversed in such circumstances.

COMMENTS

A. Enrichments unjustified for want of legal basis or consent: para. (1)

Overview. This Article provides that an enrichment is unjustified unless one of two conditions is satisfied. An enrichment is justified if it is a benefit to which the enriched person was entitled (vis-à-vis the disadvantaged person) under a juridical act (such as a contract), a court order or a rule of law. Alternatively an enrichment is justified if the disadvantaged person has consented to the disadvantage, provided that consent is free and not based on error. VII.–2:103 (Consenting or performing freely) sets out the circumstances in which a disadvantaged person's consent is to be regarded as not having been given freely – namely, where it is affected by incapacity, fraud, threats or unfair exploitation.

Absence of legal basis, not unjust factors. This Article takes as a starting point the notion that an enrichment is unjustified unless one of two broad exceptions applies. By virtue of this provision any enrichment which is not supported either by some legal basis, such as a contractual right against the disadvantaged person, or by the disadvantaged person's consent, is regarded as unjustified. In other words, an enrichment is unjustified unless it is justified by a contract (or other juridical act) with the disadvantaged person or a court order or rule of law or the disadvantaged person's consent. There is therefore no catalogue of particular matters which trigger an absence of justification ('unjust factors'); such an approach takes the converse starting point that an enrichment is justified and looks to identify a reason for treating it otherwise.

Two alternative justifications. In order to constitute an "unjustified" enrichment both the exceptions in paragraphs (1)(a) and (1)(b) must be negated. Thus, despite the broad wording of paragraph (1)(a), an enrichment for which there is no legal basis will only be unjustified if the disadvantaged person did not confer the enrichment voluntarily or, if it was conferred voluntarily, this was induced by some mistake (e.g. as to the existence of a binding obligation to do so), fraud, threats, or the like vitiating factor. This ensures that a person who is sui juris, and who has conferred the enrichment in full awareness of the situation and free of imposition has no claim under this Book.

Effect of paragraph (2). Paragraph (1)(a) indicates the legal bases which justify an enrichment: (i) contract or other juridical act; (ii) court order; or (iii) rule of law. Para. (2) qualifies this notion of a legal basis. It makes it clear that there is a legal basis only if the juridical act, court order, or rule of law is valid. A juridical act, court order or rule of law which is void from the outset, or voidable and avoided, or in some other manner rendered ineffective retrospectively, does not establish a legal basis. Indeed it is precisely for cases such as these, where the contract is void and one or both of the parties perform their apparent obligations arising out of that contract, that the law of unjustified enrichment is intended to be applicable.

Effect of paragraph (3). An entitlement to an enrichment by virtue of a rule of law only constitutes a justification for the enrichment if that entitlement is more than merely formal – i.e. it is the policy of the law that the enriched person should have the benefit of and not merely the title to the enrichment.

Relationship to paragraph (4). Paragraph (4) expands the notion of what is meant by "unjustified" beyond those enrichments brought within the definition by paragraph (1). Paragraph (4) provides that if its requirements are met, an enrichment is also unjustified if it is conferred for a purpose which is not achieved or with an expectation which is not realised. Such enrichments are of course unjustified under paragraph (1) in any case if there was no legal basis for the enrichment. Paragraph (4) extends the notion of "unjustified" by including enrichments conferred for a failed purpose or a disappointed expectation even where there was a legal basis for the enrichment. If the restrictive conditions of paragraph (4) are satisfied, such enrichments are unjustified notwithstanding that they were provided by the disadvantaged person in performance of a contractual obligation owed to the enriched person.

Relationship to VII.–2:102 (Performance of obligation to third person). VII.–2:102 (Performance of obligation to third person) provides that enrichments conferred in or arising from the performance of an obligation owed to a third person are as a rule justified. This has the consequence that generally any claim under the law of unjustified enrichment will be against the other party to the (void) obligation. A claim against the actual recipient will as a rule fail. The disadvantaged person must instead direct the enrichment claim against the contractual partner.

Prestations by both parties. Where both parties to a contract which is of no effect have performed their apparent obligations under it, both prestations will be unjustified and accordingly both of the parties will ordinarily have individual claims to a reversal of the unjustified enrichment which their respective performance under the contract brought about. In such a case, of course, possibilities for set-off may arise, depending on the nature of the claims. Where a service is provided or assets are used in exchange for a payment, reversal of the enrichment in receiving the service can necessarily only involve a money payment because the enrichment is of its nature not transferable (see VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment)), so that the possibility of set-off exists. This assumes that the liability in respect of the non-transferable enrichment is something other than the price paid, which in view of paragraph (3) of that later Article (establishing a minimum liability of the agreed price if the contract genuinely fixed the price for the enrichment) will not always be the case. If the contract is a genuine agreement (though void for technical reasons) and fully performed, and the enrichment on both sides is either money or non-transferable, the parties may ultimately be unaffected by enrichment law.

B. Justification under a contract or other juridical act

(a) General

Entitlement under a juridical act. Subject to the possible application of paragraph (4), an enrichment is justified under paragraph (1)(a) if the enriched person is entitled to it as against the disadvantaged person by virtue of a juridical act.

Juridical act. Juridical acts of relevance here are those which grant or oblige a party to provide some benefit or confer on the other party (or a third party) a right to that benefit. Besides contracts, this includes acts of assignment and the creation of trusts and testamentary dispositions. However, by far and away the most important type of juridical act in this context is a contract and the following comments clarify the operation of this rule primarily against that background.

(b) In particular: entitlement under a contract

General. If the parties have concluded a valid contract for the provision of goods or services, the contents of that contract will govern the recipient's liability in respect of the supply. The enrichment is justified by virtue of the contract and no question of liability under this Book arises. It is therefore not possible for a party to a valid contract to escape a bad bargain by contending that the other party is liable (e.g. to return the goods or to pay the higher market price for them) under enrichment law. Conversely, where the parties have not determined their affairs in advance by contract, there remains scope for the contention that an enrichment is unjustified.

> Illustration 1 (see further illustration 45)
> D, who has cohabited with E, claims recompense for expenses which D incurred in renovating E's property during the period of their cohabitation. The parties did not live together in a registered civil partnership and had not concluded any contract specifically regulating the financial aspects of their cohabitation; nor can their de facto domestic partnership be regarded as a form of contract of partnership, which presupposes an intention to undertake a profit-making venture in the nature of a business. While E consented to the renovation, an intention to enter into a legally binding arrangement on the part of D and E, who settled their affairs informally during their period of intimacy, is not discernible. Since E was not entitled to this benefit by virtue of any contract, D, who consented freely to the disadvantage and without error, may have a claim under this Book if D can establish that E's enrichment is unjustified under paragraph (4).

Valid concluded contract without a specific determination of the price. The principle that an enrichment provided by one party to another under a valid contract is justified applies even where the parties have not specifically determined the price of the goods or services to be supplied. Provided that the parties have reached a sufficient agreement so as to have concluded a valid contract, the recipient's liability will be governed by contract law which fills the gap left by the parties. Where the parties fail to agree a specific price, the rules of contract law imply an obligation to pay a reasonable price: II.–9:104 (Determination of price). Enrichment law will apply only where there is no valid contract. This may be the case because the parties still intend to agree a specific price between themselves. Indeed, more generally, the absence of an agreement on price may be a sign that the parties are still negotiating. Thus the borderline between contract and enrichment law is between a concluded contract on the one hand and, on the other hand, an absence of agreement or an incomplete agreement falling short of a valid contract. If the contract is valid, it is immaterial whether its contents have been expressly agreed or must be filled out by resort to legal rules or implied terms.

Illustration 2
E commissions D, a joiner, to undertake work on repairing an attic. It is agreed that the work should be completed within an extremely tight time frame. Although it is understood that the professional work will be remunerated, nothing is explicitly agreed about the price. D completes the work. D has a claim in contract law, and not under this Book, for a reasonable price for the work done. Since the parties intended to be legally bound and that E would pay D for the work, D and E concluded a valid contract. Where the parties fail to agree a specific price, the rules of contract law imply an obligation to pay a reasonable price: II.–9:104 (Determination of price). The reasonable price for the work takes account of the terms under which the service was provided – i.e. the "added value" which D provided by completing the job within a narrow time frame.

Partial invalidity. Where an enrichment is obtained as a result of a contractual right and that right is effective only in part, the enrichment will be justified under this Article only in so far as the right is valid and it will be unjustified in accordance with this Article to the extent of the invalidity. Hence goods or services supplied under a partially void or avoided contract will be a justified enrichment so far as supported by the valid part of the contract and otherwise unjustified.

Illustration 3
The lease between L and T contains a provision apparently conferring on the landlord L the right to increase the rent due from the tenant T. L makes use of this apparent right on several occasions and T pays the increased rent. Under the law governing the lease the rent adjustment clause is void. Since the validity of the contract is otherwise unaffected, the enrichment of L is justified as regards the sums which were due as rent under the original terms of the lease, but is not justified as regards the additional sums paid over and above that on the basis of the supposed rent increase.

Illustration 4
D obtains a loan from E of € 20,000. € 35,000, representing principal, interest and a penalty for early re-payment, is repaid. D subsequently succeeds in obtaining a court order determining that interest and the penalty for early re-payment together constituted an extortion and reduces the sum due under the contract to € 28,000. To this extent D's repayment to E is justified. E's enrichment is not justified to the extent of the residual € 7,000 which was paid in respect of a contractual right which retrospectively was without effect.

Entitlements not specifically enforceable. Provided there is a valid juridical act, it is immaterial whether the obligation to provide the enrichment which arises under the juridical act (or the corresponding right to have the enrichment conferred) is specifically enforceable in the particular circumstances of the case.

Unenforceable entitlements. The same applies even where the entitlement, though legally recognised and valid, is not capable of producing legal sanctions in the event of a default – in other words, there is not even a right to compensation for non-performance. An entitlement which is entirely unenforceable – that is to say, a right to the enrichment which the creditor cannot enforce because the debtor is entitled to refuse performance – is nonetheless an entitlement within the sense of this article if in the eyes of the law the right arising from the juridical act is legal in nature and more than a merely moral claim. A material distinction is thus between cases where the debtor's obligation under the juridical act has determined or expired before performance (in which case there is no entitlement at the time of performance) and cases where the creditor is merely precluded from suing for performance (in which case there is a subsisting entitlement at the time of performance).

Performance not yet due. An enrichment conferred by a premature performance of an obligation under a contract – that is to say, a tender of performance of the debtor's contractual obligation before performance is actually due – may nonetheless be an enrichment to which the enriched person is entitled by virtue of the contract. This will be the case where the creditor actively accepts early performance or is not entitled to refuse it. That the creditor could not compel performance until performance became due is immaterial since paragraph (1) justifies enrichments obtained as a result of the performance of obligations which are not enforceable. Any enrichment which accrues to the creditor from the fact that performance is undertaken before it was due is in principle justified under this Book. Of course the juridical act itself may make provision for the legal consequences of early performance.

Illustration 5
Company D employs E as its agent to acquire nuts and bolts of various types for use in D's manufacturing business. Under the terms of their agreement D is to place E in funds necessary to make the required acquisitions by the 16th of each calendar month. Following a change in its banking arrangements, D transfers the necessary funds on the 1st, rather than the 15th of each month, as it had previously invariably done. Transfer of the funds was not due until the 15th. However, as acceptance of funds before they are due will not prejudice E's interests, E must accept D's performance before it is due (III.–2:103 (Early performance)). Premature payment was therefore a performance of D's obligation to place E in funds by the 15th. The benefit which flows to E from early payment (such as any interest accruing on the deposit in the period between receipt and onward transmission) is an enrichment resulting from D's (premature, but accepted) discharge of an obligation under the juridical act. The enrichment is justified as against D by virtue of the contract between them. There is no liability under this Book. Any obligation of E to account to D for interest will depend on an express or implied term of the agreement between them imposing on E an obligation to account for the benefit of funds paid in advance and will be contractual. A right to recover under contractual rules is unaffected by this Book: see VII.–7:101 (Other private law rights to recover).

Obligation to suffer another's enjoyment. No distinction is drawn between enrichments resulting from an active performance and those resulting from the discharge of obligations to remain passive. In both cases the creditor has an entitlement to the benefit of the enrichment: whether the enrichment is to be conferred by the debtor or taken by the creditor (the debtor being obliged to suffer the creditor's interference) is immaterial.

Illustration 6
D leases a flat to E. The terms of the lease include permission to sub-let. E makes use of this right to sub-let. D has no claim against E under this Book because E is merely exercising rights conferred by D under a valid contract. Indeed, quite aside from this justification, the effect under property law rules of the contract of lease granting the right to occupy or sub-let D's flat may be such that when E sub-lets he can be seen to be making use of his own assets and is not enriched at D's expense at all.

Illustration 7
D pawns jewels with E, a pawnbroker. E is entitled under the terms of the pledge to retain the jewels until the money borrowed by D is repaid with interest and to sell them in the event that D fails to discharge her debt of repayment by an agreed redemption date out of the proceeds of sale. Retention and disposal of the jewels (and retention of the relevant amount of the proceeds of sale) in accordance with the terms of the pledge are enrichments to which E is entitled under the contract of pledge.

Performance as condition of another's liability. Entitlement by virtue of a contract extends to the case where a person is admittedly not obliged to render a performance, but does so in order to render another liable to confer some benefit. This situation arises, for example, where a contract binds one party only when the other does some act or omits to do some act but does not oblige the other party to do or not to do the act (a so-called unilateral contract). The significant aspect of the transaction for present purposes is that the promisee is not bound to fulfil the condition of the promise, although doing so will thereby render the promise unconditionally binding: the performance rendered by the promisee remains one which the promisee was never bound to undertake. At the same time, the behaviour of the promisee, which the other party's promise has induced, may well enrich the promisor – for example, it may amount to the rendering of a service. Such enrichments are nonetheless to be regarded as coming within the notion of enrichments to which the promisor is entitled by virtue of a contract, even though the person performing was not bound to do so.

Illustration 8
E hangs up in a local supermarket a poster on which E offers a specified reward to anyone finding and returning a dog of hers which has strayed. D sees the poster. He subsequently finds the dog and returns it to E. E has obtained a justified enrichment. However, D has a contractual claim against E based on the offer of the reward accepted by actings. (If the case is analysed as a unilateral binding promise rather than a contract the result is the same because of the reference in the Article to "other juridical act").

Illustration 9
E, a home owner, negotiates with D, an estate agent, with a view to D's assistance in finding a buyer for E's home. It is agreed between the parties that D is not bound to make any effort to find a buyer, but if D should do so E is to pay a commission based on a specified percentage of the purchase price. D subsequently advertises the property and is contacted by an interested purchaser to whom E's property is sold as a result. E's enrichment in the form of the service rendered by D is justified. D's claim against E is contractual, based on the terms of the agreement between them.

Rationale. For the purposes of enrichment law at least, the case is functionally one of or comparable to performance of a contractual obligation and ought to be assimilated to any (other) performances under a contract. The policy of confining the parties to a valid contract to the rewards (and risks) envisaged by the terms of the contractual agreement applies to such a promise as much as to a typical bilateral contract. If the promisee has been prompted to act by the promise of reward held out to it by the other party and rendered binding by the promisee undertaking the required condition, it is unnecessary - and would be improper – to superimpose an entitlement to recompense under the law of unjustified enrichment. The promisee's redress must be the enforcement of the promise. A promisee who has misjudged the arduousness of the task to be rendered or the meagreness of the reward offered ought not to be entitled to more (for example, the actual value of the service provided). The same holds where the promisee commences to fulfil, but fails fully to fulfil, the condition set out in the promise: the promisee ought to bear the risk of failure in view of the promisee's free decision to gamble the promise of reward against the burden of discharging the condition of the promise. In such cases the principles which apply to incomplete performance of an entire contractual obligation ought correspondingly to apply to the incomplete venture to render a unilateral promise binding.

Illustration 10
E, a manufacturer of drinks and confectionery, advertises a competition for advertising slogans for its latest product, Slosh. A prize of € 1,000 is offered to the winning entrant composing the most innovative slogan. It is a term of the offer that competitors agree to E using their slogans in publicity for the product. D, the winning competitor, produces a slogan which is used by E worldwide in its marketing for Slosh with recognised success. D cannot claim more than the contractually agreed € 1,000 even though D has rendered a service to E worth considerably more than € 1,000. Notwithstanding that D was not obliged to produce a slogan, E's enrichment is one to which E was entitled by virtue of the contract concluded between them.

(c) Scope of the entitlement

Justification as to part of enrichment only. Where the enrichment conferred is above and beyond that which was dictated by the terms of the juridical act, the entitlement under the juridical act extends only to part of the enrichment. Accordingly the enrichment is justified only as to part, the excess being unjustified and a liability to reverse the enrichment may arise unless the matter is regulated by contract.

Illustration 11
D is contractually obliged to E to pay € 500 and arranges for a bank payment to discharge this debt. As a result of a mistake for which D alone is responsible, D instructs her bank to transfer € 5,000 to E's bank account. As D was obliged to pay to E € 500, the enrichment is justified to this extent. The balance of € 4,500 is unjustified under this Article.

Incomplete performance. Conversely, a person does not cease to be entitled to an enrichment merely because the enriched person is entitled to much more. A case in point is the incomplete performance by one party of an obligation. Where the enrichment results from a tender of performance which, so far as it goes, conforms to the contract, it will be covered by the entitlement and a justified enrichment, even though a completion of the performance is outstanding. It does not matter whether the obligation is discharged pro tanto or is an entire and indivisible obligation, discharged only when the performance is complete. The latter case is where one party fails to completely discharge the obligations, but has nonetheless enriched the other party to the contract by the partial performance, the non-performance of the outstanding remainder is not excused and the right to a counter-performance is contingent on a complete discharge of the obligations under the contract. If there is no termination of the contract by the enriched party in view of the other party's non-performance, the enrichment conferred does not give rise to an obligation to give recompense. This will rarely be unjust because (i) the usual remedy for the disadvantaged party will be simply to complete the work and claim the agreed reward for the complete performance of the contractual obligation and (iii) in cases where further performance is no longer possible and the risk of frustration was not the disadvantaged person's, obligations under the contract are automatically extinguished under III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment) paragraph (4) (applicable where the impediment is "permanent"), and in that case the disadvantaged person is entitled to a reversal of the benefit conferred under the rules in III.–5:111 (Right or authorityto assign) to III.–5:115 (Rights transferred to assignee).

Illustration 12
D, a building firm, contracts with E, a property developer, to construct a luxury block of flats for a fixed price payable on completion. After excavation work on the land and constructing the foundations, D realises that it has seriously underestimated its costs and that the contract is no longer economic for it. As E refuses to renegotiate the contract, D stops building. Although this work has not discharged the obligation to construct the building, it was nonetheless something to which E was entitled under the contract. Accordingly E has obtained a justified enrichment.

Illustration 13
E, the owner of a mansion, commissions D, an internationally renowned artist, to paint a mural on one of the internal walls of the building. It is a term of the contract that the wall will be painted by no one other than D (see III.–2:107 (Performance by a third person) paragraph (1)) and that the agreed remuneration will be paid only when the painting is complete according to the agreed design. After starting work but before completion, D dies as a result of self-induced intoxication. As the impediment to completion is the result of D's own misadventure and not due to matters outside D's control, the failure to finish painting is not excused (see III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment) paragraph (1)). D's successors have no claim under the law of unjustified enrichment for a payment of the value of the incomplete painting since D conferred the enrichment on E under a valid contract and the enrichment is accordingly justified.

Role of good faith in extreme cases. There may be extreme cases in which the benefit conferred is very substantial and the outstanding performance disproportionately small. If in such circumstances it is unjust for one party to take the benefit and rely on the fact that counter-performance is not due (because there has not been complete performance), there could be a breach of the party's duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing (III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing)) if the enriched party insists on the absence of a contractual obligation to provide recompense for the partial performance received. There may be said to be a failure to do what good faith and fair dealing requires in the circumstances of the case in the enriched party's refusal to renegotiate the terms of the contract. In this way contract law caters adequately for any extreme case.

Deviations from contractual terms. Since justification of the enrichment depends upon an entitlement under the contract, an enrichment is as a rule unjustified if it falls outside the scope of the entitlement. Hence, for example, where a contractual performance tendered is outside the four corners of the contract (e.g. because the party tendering has made a fundamental mistake as to what was required) so that what the enriched person has received is not what was due, this Article regards the enrichment as unjustified. However, where in such a case the rules governing the juridical act regulate or oust a claim to restitution – and this is particularly the case where one party's performance of contractual obligations is not tangential and is merely sub-standard, where the exclusion of a right to restitution may be implicit in the fact that a party is confined to other remedies (e.g. repair) – those rules take priority. See VII.–7:101 (Other private law rights to recover) paragraph (3).

(d) Validity of the juridical act

General. A legal basis for an enrichment – an entitlement to the enrichment based on a juridical act – depends on the validity of the juridical act. Only if the juridical act is valid is it capable by itself of supporting an entitlement to an enrichment and providing a ground of legal justification for the enrichment. A requirement that the juridical act be valid is not expressly spelled out in the wording of paragraph (1)(a). The principle is indicated by pointing out the opposite: that there is no entitlement and no justification for the enrichment where the contract is void or avoided or is otherwise rendered ineffective with retrospective effect: see paragraph (2).

Valid contracts. The existence of the valid contract provides a justification for the enrichments which arise out of it. Hence, where an enrichment is conferred by one party on another as a result of the due performance of an unimpeachable valid contract, there can be no claim under the law of unjustified enrichment (for a return of the benefit conferred or payment of its value).

Rationale. Since this rule excludes an "absence of justification" and so denies an essential element of the enrichment claim, the rule has the effect (from a functional point of view) of excluding the application of the law of unjustified enrichment to the consequences of a proper performance of a valid contract. This is compelled by the policy consideration that parties to a legally binding agreement should be confined to the contractually agreed rewards for their performances. The point is of significance where a party has sold for too little and the agreed reward is less than the real market value of a performance: parties in such a case should not be entitled to escape a (legally binding) bargain to pursue a more lucrative claim under the law of unjustified enrichment.

Illustration 14

D concludes a contract with E for the sale of 1,000 tonnes of thermal coal at an agreed price of $75 per tonne. At the time stipulated for delivery to E, the prevailing market price of thermal coal has risen to $98 per tonne. As a result, E will make an economic gain under this transaction of $23,000 and D will make a corresponding economic loss. D delivers the coal. D has a contractual claim for payment of the agreed price. However, although E has made a gain at D's expense, D has no claim under the law of unjustified enrichment (either for return of the coal or payment of its current market value). E's acquisition of the coal is an enrichment to which E is entitled from D under the contract of sale.

In particular: matters not affecting the validity of the contract. In particular, if the enriched person is entitled to the enrichment under a contract which is valid (or voidable, but not avoided), the existence of matters such as a mistake, fraud, threat, or the like, are irrelevant. Such matters are relevant within the terms of the law governing the juridical act (i.e. contract law) in determining whether or not the contract or other juridical act is valid and accordingly whether the enrichment is justified. A mistake or fraud inducing a contract, for example, will not establish a right under this Book to a reversal of an enrichment conferred in performance of that contract if the mistake or fraud is not sufficient to establish a right to avoid the contract or if the right to avoid is not exercised. If, despite some factor undermining the consent of one or more of the parties to it, the contract remains valid, the enrichment will be justified, subject to paragraph (4), and there will be no liability under this Book.

Illustration 15
D, a property developing company, concludes a contract with E, an owner of vacant land, to purchase a large greenfield site for the development of luxury housing. From reports in the local press E, but not D, is aware that in future years there may be a risk of increased noise pollution at this site as permission has been granted for expanded use of a nearby airfield. Quite how dramatic that risk would be is, however, difficult to assess. The purchase price is within the range of possible prices a vendor might reasonably hope for from a purchaser with knowledge of this imprecise risk. Since E was not aware and could not reasonably be expected to have been aware that D lacked this public knowledge, the contract is not voidable (II.–7:201 (Mistake) paragraph (2)). D cannot demand a repayment of all or any of the purchase price paid to E on the ground that it would not have entered into the contract or not have entered into it at that price if it had been told of the airfield's permission. The enrichment is justified.

Illustration 16
Shortly before his niece's wedding, D promises to make a donation of € 20,000 to his niece, E, as a wedding present. After fulfilling his promise, D discovers that the man his niece has married is a wealthy property tycoon. Had he known of the bridegroom's affluence at the time, D would not have made a gift of the money. It is supposed, for present purposes, that the binding nature of D's promise of a donation was not vitiated by D's mistaken assumption as to the financial position of E's future husband: the risk of such a mistake was assumed by D since he failed to inquire as to the financial position of the future bride and groom before making his promise: cf. II.–7:201 (Mistake) paragraph (2). As D is not entitled to avoid the promise to make a gift, the payment is justified as E had an entitlement to it by virtue of a juridical act. This is unaffected by the fact that E obtained the money from D because D parted with it while labouring under a mistake. The mistake did not affect the validity of the promise.

In particular: donations. Where an enrichment is conferred by one party on another as an unimpeachable donation, the enrichment is justified and there is no possibility of a claim under the law of unjustified enrichment (whether for a return of the benefit conferred or payment of its value). Just as enrichment law cannot be used by one party to defeat a valid onerous contract which that party regards as a bad bargain, so the law of unjustified enrichment cannot be invoked to unwind a valid but regretted donation.

Illustration 17
D makes a gift to E of a large shareholding in a family company. D is subsequently disappointed by E's lack of business enterprise and regrets the gift, but cannot avoid the donation on grounds of mistake or on grounds of changed circumstances. D has no right under this Book to demand a reversal of E's enrichment. E has obtained the enrichment under a gift from D and accordingly it is justified by virtue of E's entitlement as against D under that juridical act.

Illustration 18
In order to avoid anticipated inheritance taxation, D, an elderly person, decides to make a gift of certain investments to his son, X, and his son's wife, E, jointly instead of leaving the property to them in his will. After D has made the gift, the relationship between X and E deteriorates and later ends in divorce. As part of the divorce settlement between the parties, X retains a one-third, E a two-third share in the investments. D regrets the gift, in view of the changed circumstances, so far as it relates to E's benefit. Nonetheless, the risk of such an outcome was assumed by D and thus D cannot revoke the donation. D has no claim under this Book against E if the continuance of the marriage between the donees was not a condition of the gift.

Voidable contracts not avoided. A contract which might be avoided, but which has not been, continues to have full effect, entitles each party to the performance due from the other party and provides a legal justification for the enrichments so conferred – notwithstanding that the contract might have been avoided. (This follows by implication e contrario from paragraph (2), which indicates that a person is not entitled if the juridical act is avoided.) Thus an enrichment obtained as a result of the other party's performance of obligations under a contract which is voidable but which is not in fact avoided is justified. This might be the case, for example, where a right to avoid the contract is lost by affirming it under II.–7:211 (Confirmation). Such contracts fall to be treated like any other contract which remains valid and fully operative. The contract remains valid for all purposes and the fact that a party may have other contractual remedies to obtain redress for being induced to conclude the contract, such as a right to damages under II.–7:214 (Damages for loss), is irrelevant here. The crucial fact is that the contract is not impeached and continues to subsist.

Rights to withhold performance. A juridical act supports an entitlement to an enrichment even though the performing party had (but did not exercise) a right to withhold performance. As in the case of a right to avoid a contract, the fact that a person bound by an obligation had a right to withhold performance will not render unjustified an enrichment which the person confers pursuant to a juridical act; the existence of the right (which one party fails to exercise) does not deprive the other party of the entitlement under the contract.

Illustration 19
D, an owner of shares, agrees to sell them to E. It is a term of the contract that transfer and payment are to be simultaneous. E fails to pay the purchase price on the agreed day, but assures D that he will pay soon. Notwithstanding that D has a right to withhold performance under III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation), D transfers the shares to E. D has no right to reclaim the shares under this Book. D's enrichment of E is justified: E's entitlement under the (valid) contract of sale to a transfer of the shares did not cease to exist merely because D had a right to withhold performance. Any right to a return of the shares will arise under contract law from an exercise by D of a right to terminate the contractual relationship for E's non-performance in a continued failure to pay.

Unenforceable (but valid) contractual obligations. Hence another case where liability in respect of an enrichment will be excluded under this Book because the enrichment is justified by reason of the recipient's entitlement under a valid juridical act is where legal rules provide that in given circumstances a contract is valid but unenforceable. The effect is to allow parties to perform their agreement and to prevent recovery of enrichments conferred. That this may result in a windfall benefit is a matter of legislative policy: the absence of a restitutionary claim is intended to provide an incentive to shun conclusion of a contract which will be rendered unenforceable by mandatory rules.

Illustration 20
As a result of X's negligence, E's car is damaged. While the car is being repaired, E hires a car from D. It is agreed that payment of hire charges will not be due until E takes legal action against X to recover compensation. Under the applicable national consumer credit legislation, the agreement to postpone payment of the hire charges constitutes a provision of consumer credit and the hire contract is unenforceable for want of compliance with prescribed formalities. As the contract for use of the car is valid, though unenforceable, D was obliged to make the car available for E's use (though D was entitled to refuse performance). Consequently E's use of the car is an enrichment to which E was entitled under a valid (though unenforceable) contract. E's enrichment is accordingly justified. E is therefore not liable under the law of unjustified enrichment to pay to D a reasonable fee for the use of the car. That D is not able to enforce the contractual right to the agreed counter-performance does not render the enrichment unjustified. This is a matter of policy, rooted in the unenforceability of the agreement. For the like reason the enrichment is not unjustified by virtue of paragraph (4): E, who is to have the benefit of the protection of consumer credit legislation, is to not be regarded as having accepted the enrichment must be reversed in these circumstances for the purposes of sub-paragraph (c) of that paragraph.

Satisfaction of claims subject to prescription. Another case where the existence (but non-exercise) of a right to withhold performance does not affect the underlying validity of the juridical act (and correspondingly the enriched person's entitlement to the enrichment conferred) is that of prescription. Under the rules governing extinctive prescription the creditor's right to claim performance is lost by failing to assert it within time (see DCFR Book III Chapter 7). The effect of prescription is not to extinguish the obligation, but merely to entitle the debtor to refuse performance (III.–7:501 (General effect)). The fact that the creditor's right to claim performance of an obligation is time-barred does not deny its enduring existence since prescription only affects its enforceability. An enrichment which is obtained by a creditor as a result of the debtor's voluntary performance of a time-barred claim is therefore a justified enrichment. This rule gives effect to the principle in III.–7:501 (General effect) paragraph (2) that a debtor cannot reclaim a performance simply because it is rendered after the period of prescription has expired.

Illustration 21
D, an events organiser, owes E, a hotel, outstanding sums in respect of accommodation provided to D's clients. After the period of prescription has expired, D responds to a further "final" demand of E's for payment. D cannot reclaim the payment from E. The money has been transferred in performance of a valid contractual obligation, albeit that at the time of performance E's right ceased to be enforceable because prescription entitled D to refuse performance.

Obligations ceasing to have effect for the future only. Where, after an enrichment has been conferred, the juridical act conferring the entitlement to the enrichment ceases to have effect, but (unlike avoidance of a contract) the juridical act does not cease to have effect retrospectively, the enrichment remains justified by virtue of the entitlement under the juridical act. The juridical act has only ceased to have effect for the future. Thus, while a debtor of an outstanding obligation is no longer obliged to perform, a debtor who has performed before the obligation ceased to have effect is still regarded as having performed a valid obligation. Precisely because the right to the enrichment remains intact as regards the past, the enrichment conferred in performance of the juridical act before it ceased to have effect for the future is regarded as a justified enrichment under these rules. (This follows by e contrario reasoning from paragraph (2), which provides that there is no entitlement if the juridical act is retrospectively without effect.) This state of affairs invariably arises in the context of a relationship whose ramifications are to be unwound, if at all, in the special context of that legal relationship. Whatever rights to reversal of enrichment there ought to be will be provided for by the rules governing that relationship. Those rules would not have sliced the effectiveness of the juridical act on a temporal plane (past – effective; future – ineffective) without special cause and without regard to the ramifications. Either there will be a special regime for reversal of benefits or a deliberate policy to leave past benefits where they are. In either case it will be those rules which will determine whether there are rights to recover benefits and, if so, what those rights entail. This Book does not disturb those rights: see further VII.–7:101 (Other private law rights to recover) paragraph (3). Cases in point are termination of a contractual relationship and withdrawal from or revocation of contracts or other juridical acts.

Void juridical acts. Turning to instances where the juridical act is without effect so that no entitlement to the enrichment can subsist under paragraph (1), a first obvious case is where the juridical is void ab initio. This is provided for expressly in the wording of paragraph (2). Subject to the other rules of this Book (and in particular the protection of third parties to the transaction under the following Article), the enrichment is unjustified and the other party to the transaction will be liable to reverse that enrichment. This principle applies regardless of the ground of invalidity; it is sufficient that an agreement is for some reason void as a contract.

Grounds of invalidity of contracts. Reasons why a contract may be void are not to be found in the law of unjustified enrichment. These are a matter of contract law, both in the general principles of contract law and in the specific rules governing particular types of contract. One reason might be non-compliance with an essential formality requirement. While there is in general no requirement of form for a contract according to these rules (II.–1:106 (Form)), rules relating to specific contracts may, by way of exception, introduce such rules (see, for example, IV.G.–4:104 (Form)). Equally a contract may be void as a result of rules governing illegality or the capacity of a party. The latter is relevant not merely to natural persons who are minors or who lack sufficient mental capacity to act, but also to legal persons in so far as the law provides that a transaction beyond its powers is without effect for want of capacity to undertake it.

Voidable juridical acts which are avoided. In accordance with paragraph (2), there is no entitlement under a juridical act to an enrichment if that juridical act is avoided with retrospective effect. For the purposes of enrichment law, an initial validity which retrospectively is inoperable is disregarded. The paragraph makes explicit the proposition that an enrichment is not justified merely because an entitlement to it subsisted at the time it was conferred if, retrospectively, the entitlement is annulled.

Illustration 22
D, a collector of a particular model of cars, negotiates with E for the purchase of a used motor car. He asks E, the owner, which original parts have been replaced and E assures him that only tyres, certain cables and peripheral parts have been changed. In fact, as E knows and has deliberately concealed, several cylinders, some panelling and both wheel axles have been substituted. Taking into account what E has told him, D agrees to buy the car for € 32,000, though he would not have bought the car had he known the truth. D later discovers the truth and gives E notice of avoidance of the contract based on E's fraud, returning the car. E's enrichment (receipt of money) is unjustified under this Article. The fact that at the time of enrichment (from the standpoint of that moment in time) D was obliged to pay does not render the payment a justified enrichment because the right to payment was annulled with retrospective effect.

Grounds of avoidance of contracts. Grounds of avoidance of contracts are not to be found in the law of unjustified enrichment. These too are a matter of contract law. Basic and generally applicable grounds of avoidance of contracts and other juridical acts are to be found in DCFR Book II Chapter 7 (Grounds of invalidity). There are also specific grounds for the avoidance of specific contracts. For example, a guarantor has a right to avoid a personal security granted after the creditor has breached a pre-contractual duty to inform the guarantor: IV.G.–4:103 (Creditor's pre-contractual duties) paragraph (3).

Exercise of right to avoid and failure to avoid a contract. An enrichment can only be unjustified under this paragraph if the entitlement to the enrichment is in fact avoided. As already indicated, the fact that the disadvantaged person is or was entitled to set the obligation aside will not suffice to render the enrichment unjustified: the bare existence (past or present) of a right of avoidance is not enough. The right must have been exercised. An exercise of the right of avoidance will require the disadvantaged person to give notice of avoidance to the other party to the contract (who need not necessarily be the enriched person) (II.–7:209 (Notice of avoidance)) unless the parties have agreed a more liberal mechanism for avoidance (II.–1:102 (Party autonomy)). The right of avoidance may be lost due to lapse of time (II.–7:210 (Time)) or confirmation of the contract (II.–7:212 (Effects of avoidance) paragraph (2)) or (which may amount to an implied confirmation) pursuit of the alternative remedy of damages for non-performance by the other party (non-accumulation of these remedies being implicit in II.–7:216 (Overlapping remedies)).

Juridical acts otherwise rendered ineffective retrospectively. Avoidance of a contract is not the only manner in which a contract may become ineffective with retrospective effect. The notion of a juridical act "without effect" in this sense extends to any case where legal rules dictate that a juridical act assessed from the standpoint of the time of its creation as valid is rendered of no effect back-dated to the time of creation. A case in point might be where parties to a contract agree that the effect of a given condition being fulfilled is to render their agreement null and void from the outset. A contractually agreed retrospective effect of a resolutive condition might fall within paragraph (2) – with the consequence that an enrichment obtained by one party is unjustified in relation to the party which provided it. Of course in such cases it is possible that what is agreed is not that the contract is of no effect, but rather that there is a (contractual) right to a return of benefits conferred. In that case there is a mere modification of the obligations under a contract (from counter-performance to restitution) in the same manner as termination of a contractual relationship: the contract remains valid, but the terms of the obligations are transformed. If that is so, the enrichments resulting from prior performances remain justified because the contract is not "without effect". The matter is one of contract law and enrichment law does not come into play.

Illegal contracts which are without effect. Particular care is required in relation to enrichments conferred pursuant to contracts which are vitiated by illegality. II.–7:301 (Contracts infringing fundamental principles) and II.–7:302 (Contracts infringing mandatory rules) set out a range of possible effects on the validity of a contract, depending on the particular illegality in question. Where the contract is declared to have been of no effect – that is to say, the contract is regarded as having been void ab initio – the reasoning set out above regarding void contracts applies. This is the situation with respect to contracts contrary to principles recognised as fundamental to the laws of the Member States of the EU: see II.–7:301 (Contracts infringing fundamental principles). If, at the other extreme, the contract is declared to have full effect, there is no difficulty: this is simply a valid contract and the enrichments resulting from a due performance of the contract will be justified on the basis of an entitlement to the enrichment under a valid juridical act. Where the contract is merely declared to be modified, there is no retrospective ineffectiveness and the contract is not "without effect". The enrichments arising from performance of the contract will again be justified accordingly. Any right to reversal of such enrichments – for example because a right to a counter-performance is converted by considerations of public policy into a right to restitution – will be governed entirely by contract law. The same holds where the contract has partial effect in the sense that it gives rise to an obligation but no corresponding right to performance: this is merely a particular case of an unenforceable obligation where the debtor has a right to refuse performance. A further possibility is that the contract vitiated by illegality is in effect voidable, since it may be impeached by only one party (the party for whose protection the rule on illegality exists). In that case the situation is the same as for contracts voidable on any other basis.

Suspensive conditions not fulfilled. A juridical act may be created on the basis that it is subject to a suspensive condition – in other words, it is conditional upon the occurrence of an uncertain future event so that the rights and obligations take effect only if the event occurs: see III.–1:106 (Conditional rights and obligations) paragraph (1). Usually some period of time – either a fixed or ascertainable period or, if no particular definite or indefinite period is envisaged, a reasonable period of time whose parameters are determined by the nature of the condition or policy considerations – is prescribed by the parties or legal rules as the period during which the condition must be satisfied in order for the rights and obligations to take effect. At some stage it will emerge that a condition which has hitherto not been fulfilled is no longer capable of fulfilment. Where for any reason the condition cannot be fulfilled (that is to say, a party may treat the condition as not having been fulfilled (see III.–1:106(4)) or has become impossible of fulfilment, the conditional right can no longer become binding. Any enrichment which has been obtained by performance of the corresponding conditional obligation while it was in suspense and before it irretrievably failed to become binding is to be regarded, in accordance with paragraph (2), as an enrichment obtained as a result of a juridical act which is without effect. The benefit received by the other party to the contract is without justification.

Illustration 23
D sends to E1 and E2 a wedding present in view of their prospective marriage. On the eve of the wedding the relationship between E1 and E2 irretrievably breaks down when E2 discovers E1 has been concurrently involved with another woman. The wedding is cancelled. D's gift was expressly or impliedly subject to the suspensive condition that E1 and E2 were to marry. Accordingly D's gift is without effect. The enrichment of E1 and E2 by D is unjustified. D can demand a return of the present.

(e) Entitlement as against the disadvantaged person

Entitlement as against third party insufficient. In order for an enrichment to be justified it is essential that the entitlement to the enrichment is an entitlement against the disadvantaged person. An enrichment is not justified merely because the enriched person has contracted for it if the contract is not with the disadvantaged person. Where, for example, funds are mistakenly credited to a wrong bank account, the account holder's enrichment is not justified in relation to the transferor or depositor of the money merely because the account holder is entitled to the sum as against the account holder's banker.

Protection of persons dealing with non-entitled third parties in good faith. However, an enriched person who has paid a third party in good faith for the benefit received is deserving of protection. Moreover, there is a public interest in the commercial circulation of property, which is impeded where an acquirer in good faith cannot rely on the apparent 'title' of a seller of goods of services. This consideration is taken care of in two ways under this Book. Firstly, there may be an entitlement to the enrichment by virtue of a rule of law (as to which, see below). Secondly, VII.–6:102 (Juridical acts in good faith with third parties) makes provision for cases where the enriched person is an innocent party deserving of complete exculpation from unjustified enrichment liability by virtue of dealings for value and in good faith with a third party. Finally, in any case to which that defence is not available (e.g. because the enriched person has not paid a third party in order to receive the benefit), good faith may nonetheless operate to limit liability, either on the basis of the defence of a change of position under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment) or even where the third party has not made any countervailing outlay if the enrichment can only be reversed by a monetary payment (on the basis of VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment)).

Illustration 24
X, a caretaker of a building employed by D, lets out a vacant flat rent-free to a friend E. E was unaware that X did not have the authority of his employer to let out the flat. D claims rent from E for the period of her occupation of the flat. E's enrichment is not the result of any entitlement against D, since in so far as he purported to let out the flat on D's behalf or with its permission X, who had only custody of the flat, acted with neither express, implied nor apparent authority. E's enrichment is justified as against X, but this does not justify the enrichment in relation to D. However, what, if anything, E is liable to pay D in reversal of the unjustified enrichment will depend on the application of VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment).

Illustration 25
E, a butcher, purchases pork from X, which (unknown to E) has been stolen from D's supermarket. The pork is rendered into sausages and sold to E's customers. Under the governing property law, since the pork was stolen, E acquired no property in the meat under the contract of purchase with X, but acquired ownership (and was correspondingly enriched by an increase in assets) as a result of processing the meat and rendering it into sausages. However, since E was not entitled to this enrichment as against D it is unjustified in relation to D. The fact that E transacted with X in respect of the meat does not justify E's enrichment, but may enable E to establish the defence under VII.–6:102 (Juridical acts in good faith with third parties).

Discharge of one solidary debtor by another. A particular case where the satisfaction of one person's entitlement may enrich another who is not entitled to the enrichment is where one solidary debtor discharges more than its share of the debt. That situation can arise because, as against the creditor, each solidary debtor is bound to render the performance in full (see III.–4:102 (Solidary, divided and joint obligations) paragraph (1)). If the creditor obtains performance from one of a plurality of solidary debtors, the entire debt is discharged. The creditor's enrichment is justified in accordance with this Article because of the entitlement to payment in full from any of the debtors. However, the same is not true of the enrichment of the co-debtors, whose share of the debt has been discharged by the performing debtor: the discharge of their liability to the mutual creditor is not justified by any entitlement in the sense of paragraph (1)(a) because no debtor has a right against the co-debtors for payment of that debtor's share; in the internal relationship between the co-debtors, each is liable for the appropriate share. An entitlement to contribution is provided for within the law governing the internal relationship of solidary debtors set out in Book III Chapter 4 – specifically under III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors). That rule is unaffected by this Book in accordance with VII.–7:101 (Other private law rights to recover).

C. Justification under a court order or rule of law

(a) General

Entitlement under a court order or rule of law. Subject to the qualification in paragraph (3) and the possible application of paragraph (4), an enrichment is also justified (under paragraph (1)(a)) if, as against the disadvantaged person, the enriched person is entitled to it by virtue of a court order or rule of law.

Court order. A court order will ordinarily give effect to an entitlement or exercise a judicial discretion, provided for by law, which has the effect of conferring an entitlement. An entitlement under a court order provides a justification for an enrichment because the policy considerations which might ordinarily require recompense for the advantage conferred on the benefited party do not arise or have already been addressed by the legal rules which prompted or authorised the making of the order. It remains important, however, to identify the precise scope and effects of the court order since any patrimonial transfer beyond its terms and unsupported by it is in principle unjustified.

Illustration 26
An unmarried cohabiting couple separate. A court order made under the applicable family law grants the woman the terraced house belonging to the man. The court order transferring the home does not preclude a claim under this Book in respect of the woman's use of the house after separation and before title is transferred.

Illustration 27
An insurance company is obliged under the terms of an order made by an appellate court to pay a policy holder € 100,000 and it complies with the court order. The final court of appeal subsequently sets aside the decision of the lower appellate court and reduces the amount payable to € 50,000. The insurer may demand restitution of the overpayment of € 50,000.

Rule of law in general. The source of the legal rule is immaterial. The term "rule of law" is intended to be understood in a neutral and undogmatic sense embracing primary and secondary legislation and rules recognised or applied in judicial decisions.

Extra-contractual obligations. Entitlement by virtue of a rule of law includes an entitlement to reparation, reversal of an enrichment, a handing over of profits and other remedies under the law on non-contractual liability arising out of damage caused to another, unjustified enrichment, benevolent intervention in another's affairs and other legal relationships arising by operation of law.

In particular: benevolent intervention. This paragraph also has the effect of excluding from the law of unjustified enrichment those enrichments which are conferred on the enriched person as the result of a benevolent intervention in the enriched person's affairs. Such an intervention may be regarded as an enrichment of the principal: the principal benefits from the service rendered or the work done by the intervener. There is a corresponding disadvantage of the intervener who provides the service or does the work. Nonetheless, independent of paragraph (1)(b), a benevolent intervener has no claim under this Book for the value of services or work benefiting the principal because the principal is entitled to that benefit on the basis of a rule of law. The benevolent intervener's sole claim to recompense for rendering the service is under the rules of benevolent intervention, which restricts a right to remuneration to those cases where "the intervention is reasonable and undertaken in the course of the intervener's profession or trade" (V.–3:102 (Right to remuneration)). That claim is unaffected by these Articles: see VII.–7:101 (Other private law rights to recover).

Requirements of benevolent intervention. The exclusion of an intervener's claim on this basis presupposes that, as regards the activity which has resulted in the enrichment, the particular requirements for a (justified) benevolent intervention are satisfied (as to which see V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another)). Those requirements will not be satisfied if intervention is officious, that is to say without good reason (for example, because it was knowingly conducted in contravention of the principal's wishes), or was conducted primarily for reasons other than to benefit the principal (for example, because the intervener sought chiefly to appropriate benefit for himself or herself). On the other hand it should not be overlooked that the absence of a reasonable ground for intervening is not fatal to the existence of a benevolent intervention if the principal subsequently approves the act without delay detrimental to the intervener. The potential for ratification makes it possible for an intervention to be characterised in law, with retrospective effect, as a benevolent intervention.

Effect of the rule. The effect of the provision in this Book is to confine the benevolent intervener (the disadvantaged person) to the rights conferred by the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs. The exclusion of the law of unjustified enrichment prevents the latter from undermining the values enshrined in the former.

Illustration 28
Seeing flames through a window, D rushed to put out with a fire extinguisher a fire which threatened to take hold in the house of a neighbour, E. D has rendered a service to E. E is accordingly enriched by receipt of the service. However, D has no claim under this Book against E. D conferred the enrichment in the course of a benevolent intervention in E's affairs. Any right of D against E is governed by the law of benevolent intervention.

Rationale. Were the law of unjustified enrichment to apply, an intervener might assert a claim to payment of the value of that service or work. Under the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs, however, the intervener does not necessarily have a claim for the value of work done. In general, so far as the service rendered is concerned, the intervener is to be regarded (in keeping with the benevolent intention) as essentially conferring a gratuity on the principal, having only a claim for reimbursement of expenditure (or indemnification for obligations incurred): see V.–3:101 (Right to indemnification or reimbursement). Only where the intervention is conducted in the course of the intervener's profession or trade does the intervener have a claim to remuneration equal to the value of the performance undertaken: see V.–3:101. Conversely, an enrichment claim might well be restricted in the circumstances of the case (where typically the principal has not consented to or authorised the intervention) to a mere claim to the principal's patrimonial saving: see VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment). The difference between a claim to the value of the service rendered and the principal's actual patrimonial saving will be significant where the intervention was conducted properly, but failed to achieve the desired object.

Significance of ratification. This differential treatment of work done in the course of benevolent intervention highlights the significance of ratification. In converting an intervention into a benevolent intervention, approval of the act done by the intervener destroys any enrichment claim which the intervener might have and generates instead a claim under the law of benevolent intervention, so far as the latter affords one. The exact circumstances of the case will determine which of principal and intervener ultimately benefits from this transition from one set of principles to the other.

Entitlement under property law rules. An entitlement by virtue of a rule of law will typically take the form of a right under property law which is effective against third parties generally - and thus against the disadvantaged person, even if the enrichment has not resulted from any involvement of the disadvantaged person.

(b) Entitlement to the benefit of the enrichment under a rule of law: paragraph (3)

General. The mere fact that a rule of law has entitled an enriched person to an enrichment and that that entitlement is effective against the disadvantaged person does not in itself justify the enrichment. The entitlement must be such that the enriched person is immune from liability under this Book because the rule of law entitles that person to the benefit of the enrichment – the right to retain it without liability to compensate for the gain. For these purposes it must be appreciated that entitlements under a rule of law have differentiated significance, depending on the nature and context of the rule.

Enrichment with liability under other rules. In one set of cases, a right to reversal of the enrichment or to some compensatory transfer is provided for under other rules of private law. A right under this Book would at best merely duplicate and at worst contradict that other regime and is accordingly excluded by regarding the enrichment as justified. Since in such cases the statutory or other rules authorising the enrichment have simultaneously fixed the quantum of liability, it would contradict those rules to set a different tariff under this Book.

They confer an entitlement to the benefit of the enrichment because they stipulate the terms of that entitlement.

Illustration 29
Statute provides that where a gratuitous performance of a dramatic work is undertaken (other than in and for the benefit of a school) a reasonable fee is to be paid. Whether this is a fee to be assessed according to market principles or whether considerations of social purpose, fairness or equity may play a role in determining the proper level of the fee is a matter of statutory interpretation. Whatever the proper construction of this statutory rule, the enrichment of the performers is justified under this Article because the statute provides a mechanism which is implicitly a complete regime for compensation of the copyright holder. An alternative liability under this Book, which might exceed the statutory liability, contradicts the purpose of the statutory rule because that rule is intended to set the level of compensation due for the enrichment obtained.

Enrichment without liability. In other cases, for reasons of policy, no compensation is awarded at all under the regime entitling the recipient to the enrichment. It is the intention of the statutory rule that the enriched person should enjoy a windfall – an enrichment without obligation to account for it. The effect of this Article in such a case is to exclude a right to reversal of the enrichment under this Book (subject to paragraph (4)) and so to confer a positive right to retain the enrichment without any obligation to account for it. Again the enriched person is to be regarded as being entitled under the rule of law to the benefit of the enrichment.

Exclusion of enrichment claim need not be explicit. It is immaterial whether the statute or other rule of law or the court order indicates explicitly that the entitlement to the enrichment carries the benefit of that enrichment. An entitlement to the benefit will arise whenever liability under enrichment law would contradict the purposes of the legal rule or court order. It is enough if this contradiction is implied or can be deduced by inference, based on an assessment of the function of the statute or other legal rule, or the court order.

Entitlement to enrichment, but subject to liability under this Book. On the other side of the line stands the case where there is a right to have the enrichment by operation of legal rules, but the statutory regime is silent on the question of accounting for the benefit and liability under this Book would not contradict the entitlement to the enrichment. These are cases where there is nothing in the legal rule and its context which dictates that the enriched person should not be liable as a matter of the law of obligations to reverse the enrichment conferred by operation of law; the rule itself does not negate the notion that the benefited party should pay for the benefit gained. In other words, the entitlement under the rule of law is based on considerations of legal certainty or simplification or to protect the position of third parties and there is nothing in such considerations which also implies that the entitled party should have an economic benefit as well.

Illustration 30
The social security department pays child benefit to M, the mother of the child J who is recorded in a social register as being entitled to receive the sum on behalf of J. In fact, following a divorce, the father F has custody and consequently also the right to receive the child benefit. M is obliged to pay the benefit received to F because the registration in the social register is of a purely formal character and does not confer any substantive justification for retention of child benefit payments in relation to the person who is entitled to custody.

Transfer of title rules. Property law rules which stipulate that title is to transfer to another in given circumstances – such as the rules on acquisition in good faith from non-owners and the rules on mixing and accession – provide a case in point. They confer an entitlement on the enriched person: as a matter of property law – in relation to the disadvantaged person as well as others – the enriched person is the holder of the property right in the asset concerned. This in itself, however, does not dictate that the enriched person who has acquired a property right under a rule of law should necessarily be immune from an enrichment claim. The entitlement must be such that it precludes personal liability under enrichment law to account for the benefit obtained. Whether a given rule of property law merely passes formal title without intending to address the economic balance between the parties concerned or whether it also intends to confer real benefit in addition depends on the particular rule and the reason for the law recognising a transfer of title in the circumstances. Where title to another's property has been obtained without sacrifice on the part of the acquirer, the starting point may be the assumption that only a nominal and not a substantive entitlement is conferred, so that the enriched person should account for the windfall unless there are other policy considerations encapsulated in the rule on transfer of title which point against liability under this Book. Conversely, property law rules which are intended to protect a purchaser or one who has already sacrificed something of value to obtain the enrichment may be taken as a rule as entitling the enriched person to the benefit of the enrichment. That remains so if the property law rules themselves provide for some mechanism whereby a divested owner can reclaim property from a good faith acquirer on satisfying some condition (e.g. compensating the acquirer) because such a regime clearly assumes there is otherwise no (contingent) liability to give up the acquired benefit.

Illustration 31
X hires from D musical equipment. X subsequently sells the equipment to E. That X was not entitled to dispose of the equipment does not affect the validity of X's contract with E: see II.–7:102 (Initial impossibility or lack of right or authority to dispose). Under the applicable rules of property law, E acquires property in the equipment by virtue of E's purchase in good faith and for value. E's enrichment is justified in relation to X because E was entitled to it as against X by virtue of the contract with X. While E's contract with X does not as such entitle E to the enrichment as against D, E's enrichment is also justified as against D by virtue of the property law rules governing acquisition in good faith (which have been brought into play by D's purchase from X). Those rules entitle E not only to title to the property formerly vested in D, but also to the benefit.

Unsolicited goods sent to or services rendered to a consumer. A second instance where a right to the benefit of the enrichment and a corresponding exclusion of enrichment liability arises from the rule that where unsolicited goods are sent to a consumer by a business (and likewise where unsolicited services are rendered) the consumer is not as a rule liable in respect of the supply: see II.–3:401 (No obligation arising from failure to respond), which takes up the principle in EC Directive 97/7. II.–3:401(1)(b) explicitly provides (for the case where the goods or services are not supplied in error or similar circumstances) that "no non-contractual obligation arises from the consumer's acquisition, retention, rejection or use of the goods or receipt of benefit from the services". That excludes liability under this Book.

Illustration 32

A consumer receives unsolicited goods which have been deliberately sent through the post by a business enterprise in the course of its professional activities with the intent of inducing the consumer to pay for them. No liability arises under this Book.

Discharge of bankrupt. A further case where enrichment liability will be expressly or impliedly excluded by statutory rules is where a bankrupt is discharged of outstanding debts as a result of the process of bankruptcy.

Illustration 33

As a result of rules of bankruptcy, a bankrupt is discharged of all debts. The bankrupt is enriched thereby because of the decrease in liabilities. The creditors are disadvantaged by a corresponding decrease in assets since their claims against the bankrupt are extinguished. This enrichment is justified by virtue of the rules on bankruptcy. The bankrupt is entitled to the benefit of the enrichment under a rule of law (the statutory rules on bankruptcy). It would contradict the purpose of those rules if the bankrupt were to come under a fresh liability to pay the former creditors the debts which have been discharged by operation of the statutory rules.

Acquisitive prescription. Another case where liability under this Book is impliedly excluded by statutory rules is where a person acquires a right by prescription. Property law rules enabling a person in adverse possession to obtain an indefeasible title to property over time aim to promote legal certainty and to encourage right-holders to assert their entitlements promptly. Such rules would be undermined if the law of unjustified enrichment were to enable the former owner to assert a claim under the law of obligations for a return of the property which legal rules have vested in the new owner. This would effectively extend the period over which a dispute as to ownership could be conducted, contrary to the goal of setting a prescribed time period for such disputes.

Statutory rights to encroach on property rights. There are many cases where legislation provides, in the broader public interest, for encroachments on the property of another. These may well amount to authorisations to make use of another's property and thus to obtain an enrichment. Often it will be explicit or implicit that the authorised encroachment is not one for which the persons authorised are liable to give an account of the benefit obtained.

Illustration 34

An enactment provides that persons who need to enter adjacent land in order to carry out works to their own land, but who do not have consent to enter that adjacent land, may apply to court for a court order authorising access. Statute provides that the terms and conditions of the access order granted by the court may include a provision requiring the applicant to pay a fair and reasonable sum as consideration for the privilege of entering the land, unless the works are to be carried out to residential land. E obtains an access order enabling her to effect repairs to her home by entering D's land. Although E may use D's land in entering on it and making repairs from there, E's enrichment is justified: E is entitled to do so under a court order; and since the statute precludes in such circumstances an obligation to pay a fee for the privilege as a term of the order, an equivalent liability under enrichment law is likewise excluded. E is entitled to the benefit of the enrichment.

Further examples. It would be extremely arduous to compile a complete list of those instances within the scope of this Article where the entitlement to the enrichment is such that any liability to make restitution or pay compensation to the disadvantaged person is explicitly or implicitly excluded. The following further illustration can serve only to outline the practical width of this rule.

Illustration 35
Statutory provisions permit teachers to make anthologies for specified educational purposes of limited amounts of certain types of published material which is subject to copyright. Although teachers who exercise this privilege (and their employers) make use of another's asset (namely, the copyright enjoyed by the copyright holder), their enrichment is justified under this Article. The purpose of the statutory provision is to promote the use of literature in education and to relieve educational institutions of the burden of acquiring (potentially costly) permission to make copies. The purpose of the statutory provision would be defeated if teachers (or their employers) were to be obliged under this Book to pay a reasonable fee for making copies. The legislation intended their enrichment to be as of right and gratuitous and thus also to confer the benefit of the enrichment.

D. Consent to the disadvantage: paragraph (1)(b)

(a) Consent to the disadvantage

Meaning of consent. Consent for the purposes of this Article means a bare consent. However, a consent to a disadvantage only justifies an enrichment if that consent is not vitiated by matters such as fraud, threats or unfair exploitation – in other words if it is a consent which is freely given. A further requirement is that the consent be "without error". Consent includes the case where a person sustains a disadvantage as a result of acts or omissions of another which the disadvantaged person has authorised.

Deliberate enrichment of another. Accordingly a disadvantage will be sustained with consent if the disadvantaged person has acted knowingly to confer the enrichment or has authorised a third party to effect this.

Incidental benefit to others from acts within own sphere. Since it is consent to the disadvantage rather than agreement to the enrichment which establishes the justified nature of the enrichment under paragraph (1)(b), cases of incidental benefit to others resulting from the pursuit of one's own interests will as a rule be justified enrichments. Where people act to advance their own affairs, within their own property sphere, they consent to their side of the disadvantage-enrichment equation. The fact that others may be enriched as a result and that that outcome was neither intended nor envisaged is immaterial.

Illustration 36
D, a landowning company, establishes an irrigation system for the benefit of its land. That system also happens to improve the irrigation of adjacent land belonging to E. E's enrichment (in so far as D has done work which benefited both D and E) is not unjustified under this Article because D undertook the work voluntarily and thus consented to doing the work. D's ignorance of the fact he was coincidentally benefiting E does not amount to an error.

Similarly, a squatter who improves property to make it more comfortable, knowing it belongs to another (and who therefore makes no mistake as to title), will do so at his or her own risk. There is consent to the disadvantage which results to the benefit of the landowner.

(b) Error

General. Paragraph (1)(b) provides that an enrichment is not justified by consent to the disadvantage if that consent is affected by error. While the error may be either of fact or law (see below), it must be causative of the disadvantage and not merely coincidental. It is also important to distinguish between mistakes as to an existing state of affairs (which are errors in the sense of these rules) and mere mispredictions as to possible future outcomes or events.

Error of fact or law. The disadvantaged person's error may be either of fact or of law. This is in keeping with the spirit of the rules on mistake in contract law where mistakes of either fact or law may be operative to generate a right to avoid the contract (II.–7:201 (Mistake) paragraph (1)). There seems to be no compelling reason why any distinction between errors of fact and errors of law should be made in the context of enrichments conferred otherwise than in satisfaction of rights under valid juridical acts.

Inexcusable errors. There is no requirement that the error be excusable (i.e. neither self-induced nor grossly negligent). Where the error is not obvious to the enriched person, the disadvantaged person will in any event carry the risk that the enriched person has or acquires a defence to the claim (in particular: by virtue of a subsequent disenrichment in good faith). Gross negligence in making an error may be relevant to the plausibility of the claimant's case that the claimant was actually in error when the enrichment was conferred, but this is a matter for the tribunal finding the facts. Admittedly, the excusable or inexcusable nature of a mistake is material in limiting the right to avoid a contract (see II.–7:201 (Mistake) paragraph (2)(a)), but this further restriction may be of limited import. Moreover, that restriction is merely part of the general logic that contracts are not lightly to be unravelled and that one party should not be able to escape a bargain primarily on the basis of that party's own carelessness. By contrast, an "inexcusable" error is largely only relevant to the law of unjustified enrichment when there is no contractual or other entitlement which can justify the enrichment; if there is a binding juridical act, whose efficacy is unaffected by the mistake, the mistake will have no bearing and (unless paragraph (4) applies) the enrichment will be justified. Paragraph (1)(b) is thus largely concerned with the cases where there is no binding contract between the parties which governs the enrichment. Indeed, it will usually be the case that by virtue of the disadvantaged person's (careless unilateral) mistake, the enriched person has simply received a windfall. In that context the legitimate expectations of the other party are less extensive in comparison (they can relate only to the legitimacy of the enrichment, not a whole legal relationship) and are adequately safeguarded by circumscribing the extent of liability (especially where the enrichment can only be reversed by monetary payment) and by broad defences (especially that of change of position in good faith reliance on the apparently justified nature of the enrichment).

Unilateral errors. There is equally no requirement either that the error be bilateral or that the enriched person should have been aware of the error. The knowledge, actual or constructive, of the enriched person that the enrichment is being conferred in error is not relevant to the absence of justification for the enrichment. Of course the principle is expressed in II.–7:201 (Mistake) paragraph (1)(b)(ii) (in the case where the other party neither caused nor shared the same mistake) that a contract is not to be thrown over if the other party had no cause to know of the mistake. This protects an innocent party from being 'surprised' by an obscure (that is to say, private or secret) mistake made by their counterpart. However, that is again in the context of determining whether a contract is binding. Such a restriction is not intrinsically compelling where, as here, an enrichment is often conferred outside the context of a (void or valid) contract. The policy concern outside the contractual context is a narrower one, namely that the consequences of a unilateral mistake should not be shifted to an innocent party to the latter's detriment. Again, therefore, an absence of knowledge of the error on the part of an innocent recipient is a reason for protecting the enriched person, for example, if the enrichment cannot be reversed except by payment (because the enrichment is by its nature not transferable) or because the enriched person has sustained a disadvantage in reliance in good faith on the supposition that it was permissible to retain the enrichment without liability to account for it. The concern to protect the innocent recipient is not a sufficient reason for allowing enriched persons a windfall if they are able, without pain, to reverse the enrichment. Such considerations are therefore properly addressed by the rules governing the extent of liability and the existence of defences, rather than by categorising the enrichment as justified at the outset, and in this draft are taken up in later Articles of this Book: see VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment) and VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment). It must be remembered that if the error is truly causative, the only reason the enriched person has obtained the enrichment is because of the claimant's error; the enriched person was never 'truly' meant to have it. As a matter of principle this is the proper test of justification.

Requirement of a causative error. The enrichment must have been conferred on the basis of an error. Whatever the nature of the error, it must be causative in a 'but for' sense if the consent is not to justify the enrichment. The fact that the claimant was mistaken as to some present fact or legal position at the time of the enrichment will not be relevant if the enrichment would still have been conferred even if the disadvantaged person had not been mistaken. Mere ignorance of a true state of facts or law is consequently not an error relevant to paragraph (1)(b). There is an additional requirement that knowledge of the true situation would have modified behaviour so as to forestall the disadvantage being sustained.

Awareness of disadvantage, but error as to terms. The requirement that the error be causative does not mean that paragraph (1)(b) is inapplicable simply because the claimant was fully aware of sustaining a disadvantage. In the usual cases involving error the disadvantaged person will indeed appreciate that some sacrifice is being made. The disadvantage will be triggered by an error as to who is being enriched or as to the extent of the enrichment being conferred on an intended beneficiary.

> Illustration 37
> By mistake D pays money into E's bank account. D intended to pay creditor X, but by mistake entered E's details on the deposit slip. E's enrichment is obtained as a result of an error by D within the terms of paragraph (1). D (it is assumed) would not have given the instruction for that transfer had D appreciated that it was E and not X (whom D intended to pay) who stood to benefit from the transfer. The fact that D would still have parted with the same sum had the instruction been completed properly (because D would have paid X) is immaterial.

Illustrative types of relevant error. In broad terms there may be error as to who is being enriched (misdirected performance), or the extent of the enrichment (excessive performance), or the reason for the enrichment. Typical errors may therefore include the following scenarios. Firstly, there may be a flawed assumption by the disadvantaged person of an obligation to confer the enrichment on the enriched person, although there is in fact no question of an obligation to do so. For example, a person who pays a debt twice is mistaken when paying for the second time in supposing that there is an obligation to pay. It will be irrelevant whether the disadvantaged person supposes that there is an obligation to the enriched person to confer the enrichment. The belief might well be that there is an obligation to a third party to enrich the enriched person. Secondly, a claimant may have wished to benefit a third party whom the claimant supposed was bound to perform an obligation to enrich the recipient. The claimant may thus have wrongly assumed that in enriching the recipient the claimant was discharging an obligation of the third party. Thirdly, the disadvantaged person may be mistaken as to the identity of the person being enriched (e.g. where wrong account details are entered in transferring money between bank accounts) or as to the extent of the enrichment being conferred (e.g. where the wrong sum is entered in a bank transfer).

Compromises and submission to doubtful claims. A case of potential difficulty is where one party makes a transfer in order to end or avoid a dispute. There is no difficulty where the compromise amounts to a juridical act (contract). In that case there will be an entitlement on the part of the recipient based on the terms of the compromise. We are concerned here with residual cases in which payment and acceptance of the payment do not amount to a juridical act. Explicitly or implicitly, the would-be creditor making the demand asserts that the disadvantaged party is under an obligation to confer an enrichment (e.g. to make the payment invoiced). The supposed debtor, it is assumed, has, at the very least, some doubt about the apparent creditor's claim (that is to say, the existence or extent of any obligation) and, in some cases, may hotly contest this. The "debtor" nonetheless complies with the demand and makes an unconditional payment. It is subsequently established that the creditor was not in fact entitled. (Where the creditor was entitled in part, but not to the extent demanded, the same question is raised pro tanto.) In such circumstances the transferor will not generally be able to show that the transfer was made in error. Usually the disadvantaged party will have paid simply to avoid the aggravations that would arise from creating a confrontation or from prolonging a dispute. The transfer is made from reasons of greater convenience, on a cost-benefit analysis, to dispose of the demand, to avoid the irritation of on-going controversy and perhaps avert the threatened prospect of litigation. In such a case the payer has not made the payment with and because of a belief that there is an obligation to do so as such. There has been no causative error involved precisely because in making the payment or agreeing to a compromise the payer was not acting under the false impression that there was any obligation to pay. The payment is made not because of the supposition of an obligation, but rather because of the intransigence of the demand. For the payer it may ultimately have been immaterial whether there was in fact an obligation; what was decisive was the annoyance of the allegation and it was to eliminate the nuisance (not the obligation as such – whose very existence may have been contested) that the enrichment was conferred. It will therefore be immaterial in those circumstances whether the payer privately considered all along that there was no obligation, or considered the matter was unclear and had no decided view of the issue, or had in the end inclined towards the view which the other party had alleged. The payer's belief as to the existence of the obligation has simply ceased to be the determining factor in conferring the enrichment. The determining factor is rather the presence of the demand. The same principles will apply if the transferor had a suspicion that there was no obligation to pay, but (whether from laziness or for other reasons) has declined to make further inquiry into the matter. In that case there is an affirmative belief that there is no obligation, but this is again coupled with a doubt and the fundamental motivation for the transfer (to eliminate the demand) is again decisive. The case is of course otherwise if the payment is made with a reservation, since in that case there is no settlement of the demand and an indication that the supposition of an obligation is the entire basis for the enrichment.

Mispredictions. An error within the scope of paragraph (a), whether of fact or law, must be as to a present matter. This provision does not embrace mere mispredictions of future outcomes. An error as to a present matter includes, for example, errors as to another party's intentions (this being an error as to their present state of mind). By contrast, an erroneous anticipation of how another will behave is not an error within this paragraph. It is a mere misprediction of a future event. An enrichment conferred with some express or secret hope that it will induce or lead to a given outcome is not conferred under a mistake of present fact. Rather it is a mistaken anticipation of a future state of affairs, a misjudged expectation. As such it constitutes a mere misprediction and not an error within the meaning of paragraph (1). The exclusion of mispredictions is implied by the special conditions attached to paragraph (4). If a misprediction sufficed to nullify consent to a disadvantage, then an enrichment could be unjustified according to paragraph (1)(a) – notwithstanding a supporting legal basis - so by-passing in such instances (i.e. where there is no valid juridical act in the background) the stringent requirement that the enriched person must have known of the failed purpose or disappointed expectation.

(c) Absence of consent

Categories of enrichment without consent. A prime instance of absence of legal justification for an enrichment (falling within paragraph (1)) is where the enrichment is obtained from the disadvantaged person without the latter's consent to the loss of property or use of rights. Broadly three types of situation may be envisaged where this may occur. These are (i) where an act of nature has effected the enrichment, (ii) where a third party, such as a stranger or other intermeddler acting without authority, has effected some transfer of value (i.e. has extracted benefit from the disadvantaged person and passed that benefit on to the enriched person), and (iii) where the enriched person has extracted benefit from the patrimony of the disadvantaged person without the latter's permission. In the latter case the acts of the stranger or the enriched person may or may not be in bad faith and interference with the claimant's rights need not necessarily be tortious.

Illustration 38
E uses a photograph of D, an internationally renowned footballer, in its advertising promotion to launch a new beverage. The company did not contact D to obtain his permission for the use of his image and name in the endorsement of the product. D's disadvantage in suffering the use of his rights of personality is without his consent. The enrichment of the E company is unjustified under this Article.

Illustration 39
Sheep belonging to farmer E break through a hedge at the boundary of D's land and graze on D's pastures. D's disadvantage in (unwittingly) providing grazing for E's sheep is without D's consent. D's enrichment of E is unjustified under this Article.

E. Purpose not achieved; expectation not realised: paragraph (4)

(a) General

Overview. Paragraph (4) provides that an enrichment which the disadvantaged person has conferred in order to achieve some purpose or for the fulfilment of some expectation is unjustified in specified circumstances if the intended purpose is not achieved or the expectation is not fulfilled.

Relationship to paragraph (1). This Article only sets out circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified. It operates to enlarge the ambit of "unjustified", buttressing the rule in paragraph (1). Accordingly an enrichment which is unjustified under paragraph (1) is unaffected by this provision. (Indeed an enrichment may be unjustified under both provisions.) Where, however, an enrichment is justified according to paragraph (1), it may nonetheless be unjustified according to paragraph (4) so as to support an enrichment claim (notwithstanding that there was an entitlement to the enrichment under a juridical act or rule of law). This will be in limited cases only, however, since a mere disappointment of an expectation or frustration of a purpose which a (valid) juridical act was intended to fulfil will not form the basis for a claim under this Book if the rules governing the juridical act itself constitute a complete regime governing rights to recover benefits conferred (e.g. by termination of a contractual relationship). See further VII.–7:101 (Other private law rights to recover).

Illustration 40
D makes a payment to E. The purpose of the payment, as disclosed by the documentation for the transaction, is to benefit X by discharging a debt which X owes to E. E notifies D, however, that the payment is not accepted in discharge of X's debt. X has not authorised the payment and fails to ratify it. It is assumed that in the circumstances D's payment does not discharge the debt which X owes to E. E's enrichment obtained from D is unjustified under paragraph (4). This is so even though D made no mistake (D knew he was not obliged to make the payment) and merely mispredicted that E would accepted the payment as a discharge of X's debt, so that D consented freely to the disadvantage.

(b) Conferment for a purpose not achieved or with an expectation not realised: sub-paragraph (a)

General. The typical instance of a purpose or expectation which forms the basis for one person enriching another is the expectation of some reward for doing so, whether in exchange or as a consequence. However, the provision is not confined to cases in which the enrichment was conferred with a view to a counter-enrichment which ultimately does not materialise.

Illustration 41
A father F helps his daughter's fiancé, E, by making substantial contributions towards construction of the latter's house which is to be the future matrimonial home. The young couple's relationship breaks down; they separate shortly before the marriage is due to be concluded. The purpose of the contributions made by the father, namely to contribute to his daughter's future matrimonial home, is frustrated. F can demand recompense from E for the value of the work which F provided in the construction of E's house.

Causative purpose or expectation. The purpose or expectation must constitute the basis for the enrichment. In other words, it must be causative. An enrichment which the disadvantaged person would have conferred in any case, independent of the particular purpose not achieved or the expectation not fulfilled, does not come within the terms of the paragraph. In such circumstances it would be impolitic to regard the enrichment as unjustified because the disadvantaged person is in no need of protection unless the enrichment is predicated by the purpose or expectation (i.e. where it can be said that 'but for' the purpose or expectation the enrichment would not have been conferred).

Failure of negotiations. This paragraph is of particular relevance where, prior to the conclusion of contractual negotiations, an enrichment is conferred with a view to the benefits to which the disadvantaged person would be entitled under the anticipated contract. In such a case the disadvantaged person – not being contractually obliged to do so – may well have enriched the other party in order to induce the conclusion of a contract and thus obtain an enforceable right to some benefit in return.

(c) The enriched person's awareness of the purpose or expectation: sub-paragraph (b)

General. It is not a condition of the application of paragraph (4) that the purpose or expectation be a shared one (although that is, of course, one possible scenario). It is, however, a requirement that the enriched person was or ought to have been aware of the disadvantaged person's purpose or expectation at the time of conferring the enrichment. This limitation ensures that the ambit of the Article is confined to sensible proportions since the purpose or expectation must necessarily be either communicated to the enriched person or else, from an objective standpoint, easily identifiable in the circumstances. This limitation provides the safeguard that those who venture to advance their interests without either making this apparent or concluding a contractual agreement will do so at their own risk. This goes some way to creating an incentive to clarify legal relations before undertaking some measure which will enrich another.

> Illustration 42
> After their divorce and the sale of the matrimonial home the man moves into the flat occupied by his ex-spouse. An attempted reconciliation is unsuccessful. Subsequently the man demands recompense from his ex-wife for the sums which he spent at his own initiative discharging his ex-wife's debt with a mail-order business. Even if those payments were made in the precise expectation that there would be a long-term continuation of the relationship, an unjustified enrichment claim could only be conceivable if as a very minimum the ex-wife knew of the discharge of her debt. Only then could it be arguable (and a matter for proof) that she was at least capable of sharing her ex-husband's expectation in making the payment.

(d) The enriched person's acceptance that the enrichment must be reversed: sub-paragraph (c)

General. A final restriction contained within the Article is the requirement that the enriched person accepts or may be regarded as accepting that there must be a reversal of the enrichment if the purpose is not achieved or the expectation not fulfilled. That requirement is not satisfied if the disadvantaged person manifestly meant to take the risk of failure. The conferment of an enrichment by the disadvantaged person as part of what is patently a purely speculative enterprise is inconsistent with the notion that the enriched person has accepted an obligation to reverse the enrichment. Manifest speculation by the disadvantaged person implies rather that the enrichment may be accepted by the recipient on the basis it is "without strings attached".

> Illustration 43
> D makes a living by cleaning cars in a car park, without obtaining the car owners' permission in advance, and soliciting afterwards for remuneration when the owners return to their cars. E sees D cleaning her car and rightly supposes that D hopes to be paid, but does not intervene to stop D. Afterwards E drives off without paying D. The service which has been rendered is not an unjustified enrichment. Although D cleans the car only because he hopes to be paid for his service, D intends to take the risk that he will not be paid. E cannot be regarded as having accepted that D must be paid for his service.

Illustration 44
D is a professional locator of heirs. By following up published notices and various means of research he locates persons entitled to shares of deceased person's estates which have not been claimed. Having found that E is entitled to a share in the estate of X, D contacts him, arranges a meeting at which he outlines E's entitlement, and offers to disclose full details in exchange for a specified percentage of E's interest. E considers D's terms exorbitant and rejects the offer. From the information D has already disclosed, E is able to make his own inquiries so as to enforce successfully his claim to a share of X's estate. D claims from E the value of the service he provided in disclosing information enabling E to assert his rights in respect of X's estate. The claim is made on the basis that D conferred this enrichment only in order to obtain from E a contractual promise to reward him for full disclosure and that the enrichment is therefore unjustified under this article. D's claim must fail. The enrichment is not unjustified. The requirements of paragraph (4) are not satisfied because D assumed the risk that, despite the information, E would not agree to his offer. E cannot be regarded as having accepted that he would have to pay for the information obtained during the negotiations. If the negotiations were terminated contrary to good faith, D might be entitled under II.–3:301 (Negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing) paragraph (3). The redress in that case, however, is not restitutionary, but rather compensatory as reparation for loss.

Illustration 45
The facts are as in illustration 1. Whether the enrichment is unjustified under paragraph (4) will depend on whether the parties can be regarded as having assumed that E must give recompense for the enrichment if the relationship broke down. This in turn will depend on the scale of D's investment in the property, since it may be assumed that a minor contribution would be merely part and parcel of D's enjoyment of the shared home. The greater D's expense, the less realistic is the notion that D assumed the risk that he would short-changed in the event the relationship failed.

NOTES

I. Zuwendungen an den Vertragspartner in Erfüllung wirksamer Rechtsgeschäfte

(a) Der Grundsatz

1. Leistungen in Erfüllung einer wirksamen vertraglichen oder anderweitigen Verbindlichkeit können grundsätzlich nirgendwo zurückverlangt werden, auch nicht der Profit, den die andere Seite aus einem ihr günstigen Vertragsschluss zieht, vgl. für FRANCE Cass.com. 18 January 1994, Bull.civ. IV, no. 27 and Cass.com. 29 March 1994, Bull.civ. IV, no. 128. Eine Bereicherung, die aus einem Rechtsgeschäft herrührt, ist gerechtfertigt (Cass.civ. 28 May 1986, Bull.civ. III, no. 83). Im Rahmen des Rechts der répétition de l'indu scheitert der Rückgabeanspruch an der Existenz einer "Schuld". Keinen Rückgabeanspruch hat zwar auch, wer freiwillig eine bloße Naturalobligation erfüllt (CC art. 1235(2)). Das wird jedoch so aufgefasst, dass sich die Naturalobligation solchenfalls in eine echte zivilrechtliche Verpflichtung umwandelt (Cass.civ. 14 January 1952, D. 1952.177, note Leonan; Cass.civ. 14 February 1978, Bull.civ. I, no. 59). Darin bestätigt sich mithin erneut der Grundsatz, dass Leistungen in Erfüllung einer wirksamen (vertraglichen oder anderweitigen) Verbindlichkeit nicht zurückverlangt werden können. Das entspricht auch der Rechtslage in BELGIUM. Niemand ist ungerechtfertigt bereichert, wenn seine Bereicherung (und die Verarmung des Klägers) ihren Grund in einem wirksamen Vertrage haben (Cass. 20 September 1984, Pas. belge, 1985, I, 97).

2. Das SPANISH Recht der Leistungskondiktion nimmt implizit seinen Ausgangspunkt bei dem Grundsatz, dass ein Vermögenszuwachs nur dann als effektiv und endgültig anzusehen ist, wenn ihm ein rechtmäßiger und sicherer Zweck zugrundeliegt (Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 115-116). Damit wird zugleich gesagt, that an increase of assets which arises from the performance of a valid and enforceable obligation need not be reversed (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 122); alles andere wäre eine Verletzung des Prinzip der Bindung an Verträge (CC arts. 1091 and 1113). Der Verkäufer eines Grundstücks, der mit seinem Käufer vereinbart, dass dieser einen höheren Preis zu zahlen habe, falls die zuständige Behörde es erlauben sollte, mehr Quadratmeter zu bebauen als zwischen den Parteien bislang angenommen, hat gegen den Käufer einen vertraglichen Anspruch auf den entsprechend höheren Preis, sobald die Behörde positiv entscheidet; mit einem Ausgleich für eine ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung hat der Anspruch auf den höheren Preis nichts zu tun (TS 1 March 2007, BDA RJ 2007/1618).

3. Unter ITALIAN CC art. 1372(1) hat ein Vertrag zwischen den Parteien Gesetzeskraft. Eine Leistung auf einen wirksamen Vertrag ist geschuldet, ein Anspruch auf Rückerstattung des Geleisteten folglich grundsätzlich ausgeschlossen. In AUSTRIA wird es zwar für unmöglich angesehen, in einer einzigen Definition zu formulieren, wann eine Vermögensverschiebung rechtsgrundlos ist (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 273), doch ist klar, dass ein Vertrag ein Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen darstellt. Eine Korrektur von Verträgen mit Hilfe des Bereicherungsrechts ist unzulässig (OGH 9 July 1992, JBl 1993, 107; OGH 20 January 2000, JBl 2000, 590). Der Vertrag rechtfertigt die Vermögensverschiebung aber natürlich nur, wenn er mit dem Leistenden besteht (OGH 19 December 2003, JBl 2004, 382); andererseits muss sich dieser aber auch an seinen Vertragspartner halten, kann also z.B. keine Versionsklage gegen eine Frau erheben, deren (inzwischen insolventer) Mann im eigenen Namen den Auftrag erteilt hatte, ihr Haus zu reparieren (OGH 10 March 1981, JBl 1982, 429). Einen Anspruch aus Leistungskondiktion hat i.d.R. nur, wer infolge mangelhafter Willensbildung schutzwürdig ist (CC §§ 877, 1431, 1434, 1435). Auch kann unter CC § 1174 nicht zurückverlangt werden, was wissentlich zur Bewirkung einer unmöglichen (CC § 878) oder unerlaubten Handlung (CC § 879) hingegeben wurde.

4. Unter PORTUGUESE CC art. 473 ist ein Vertrag zwischen dem Bereicherten und dem Benachteiligten die wichtigste causa justificativa für die entsprechende Vermögensverschiebung (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[10], 500). Das stimmt in der Sache mit CC art. 474 überein, wonach der Bereicherungsanspruch ausgeschlossen ist, wenn ihn das Gesetz dem Benachteiligten versagt oder wenn es der Bereicherung andere Wirkungen beimisst (Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 473). Zuwendungen an den Vertragspartner in Erfüllung des Vertrages sind gesetzeskonform und deshalb nicht rückforderbar. Eine dem Mieter vertraglich erlaubte Untervermietung löst zugunsten des Vermieters keinen Bereicherungsanspruch auf den Erlös aus (STJ 22 May 2001, CJ [ST] IX [2001-2] 95); zu ihr kommt es nur im Falle einer unerlaubten Untervermietung (STJ 30 October 2003, Processo 03B2593). Auch under GERMAN Law setzt jeder Anspruch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung die Abwesenheit eines die Vermögensverschiebung rechtfertigenden Grundes voraus (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 812, no. 68). Im Bereich der Leistungskondiktion kommt es darauf an, ob der (erlaubte) Leistungszweck erreicht oder verfehlt wurde. Der typische Fall ist die Erfüllung einer vertraglichen Pflicht. Sie begründet einen Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen und schließt damit zugleich ein Rückforderungsrecht aus (Erman [-Westermann], BGB II[11], § 812, no. 44; Sprau loc.cit. no. 69). Under GREEK law stellt der Wille des Benachteiligten den entscheidenden Rechtsgrund dar. Er äußert sich typischerweise in einem Vertrag, durch den sich eine Partei der anderen zur Erbringung der versprochenen Leistung verpflichtet. Der Vertrag muss eine causa haben, also den Grund angeben, welcher die Übernahme der schuldrechtlichen Verpflichtung rechtfertigt (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 37).

5. In HUNGARY folgt derselbe Grundsatz bereits aus CC § 198(1) (wonach aus einem Vetrag die Verpflichtung zur Erbringung und die Berchtigung zur Forderung einer Leistung folgen). POLISH CC unterwirft nur denjenigen der Verpflichtung, eine Bereicherung herauszugeben, der sie ohne rechtlichen Grund erhalten hat. Das ist der Fall, wenn die Bereicherung weder auf ein Rechtsgeschäft, noch auf ein Gesetz, noch auf eine Gerichtsentscheidung oder einen Verwaltungsakt gestützt werden kann (Supreme Court 17 November 1998, III CKN 18/98, unpublished; Bieniek [-Kołakowski] I[5], art. 405, no. 6; Pietrzykowski [-Pietrzykowski] Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 405, no. 10). Ein wirksamer Vertrag beinhaltet folglich die Rechtsgrundlage zum Behaltendürfen des zu seiner Erfüllung Erhaltenen. So verhält es sich selbstverständlich auch in BULGARIA. Ein Bereicherungsanspruch kommt dagegen in Betracht, wenn die Schuld im Leistungszeitpunkt bereits erloschen oder wenn mehr gezahlt wurde als unter den Umständen geschuldet war, z.B. weil die anspruchsreduzierende Wirkung eines Mitverschuldens übersehen wurde (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 584).

6. Im Sinne von DUTCH CC art. 6:203 erfolgt eine Leistung ohne Rechtsgrund, wenn es für sie an einer Rechtfertigung fehlt (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 805; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 322 p. 341; Vriesendorp, Verbintenissen uit de wet en schadevergoeding, no. 294). Gültige Rechtsgeschäfte bilden einen solchen die Leistung rechtfertigenden Grund; sie schließen die Anwendbarkeit des Rechts der onverschuldigde betaling aus. Anders ist das nur im Falle einer Zuvielleistung hinsichtlich des überschießenden Teils (Hartkamp loc.cit. no. 324 p. 343). Auch anfechtbare, aber nicht angefochtene Rechtsgeschäfte bilden einen zureichenden Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen. ESTONIA LOA § 1028(1) provides that if a person receives anything from another in performance of an obligation, the transferor may reclaim it from the recipient only if the obligation does not exist or ceases to exist. Leistungen auf einen wirksamen Vertrag sind bereicherungsrechtlich nicht rückforderbar, es sei den, es handelt sich um Zuvielleistungen oder Doppelzahlungen (Tampuu. Lepinguväliste võlasuhete õigus, 61). Substituted performance of obligation with the consent of the obligee is considered as fulfilment of the obligation (LOA § 89) and thus also cannot be reclaimed.

7. Der Grundstz der Nichtrückforderbarkeit gilt natürlich auch in the NORDIC countries. Im Falle einer wesentlichen Änderung der Umstände nach Abschluss des Vertrages kann es allerdings zu Korrekturen aus allgemeinen Billigkeits- oder Gerechtigkeitsgründen kommen. Contracts Act § 36 (der in allen drei Staaten gilt) sieht die Möglichkeit vor, einen Vertrag ganz (das ist die Ausnahme) oder teilweise für nichtig zu erklären, wenn er, gemessen entweder an den Umständen im Zeitpunkt des Vertragsschlusses oder an später eingetretenen Umständen unconscionable conditions enthält. Die Regelung soll schwächere Vertragsparteien schützen, insbesondere Verbraucher. Eine vergleichbare Regel findet sich in the so-called doctrine of tacit assumptions. Sie betrifft nach Vertragsschluss fehlgeschlagene Erwartungen einer Partei und sieht die Möglichkeit einer Nichtigerklärung des Vertrages vor, falls eine Billigkeitsüberprüfung zu dem Ergebnis führt, dass diese Partei das Risiko, dass ihre Erwartung fehlschlägt, nicht tragen sollte. Im Gegensatz zu Contracts Act § 36 führt the rule on tacit assumptions ex nunc zu einer vollständigen Unwirksamkeit des Vertrages (Adlercreutz, Avtalsträtt I[11], 291; Gomard, Obligationsret I[4], 159).

8. Zu den vertragsrechtlichen Rückawicklungsregimen (insbesondere Rücktritt, Widerruf, Rückforderung nach Minderung) siehe die notes under VII.–7:101 (Other private law rights to recover).

(b) Schenkungen

9. Auch schenkweise erbrachte Leistungen können grundsätzlich nicht zurückverlangt werden. Anders ist das nur dann, wenn ein spezifisch schenkungsrechtlicher Ausnahmetatbestand vorliegt. Unter FRENCH law ist die donation ein Vertrag unter Lebenden (CC art. 894). Eine Schenkung ist grundsätzlich nur mit Zustimmung des Beschenkten widerruflich (Malaurie and Aynès, Les successions, les libéralités[2], no. 430 p. 217). Ein einseitiger Widerruf kommt gemäß CC art. 953 nur in Betracht wegen Nichterfüllung von mit der Schenkung verbundenen Auflagen, wegen groben Undanks und der Geburt von Kindern nach Vollzug der Schenkung (CC arts. 960-966). Bis auf einige Abweichungen im Detail entspricht das auch der Rechtslage in BELGIUM; allerdings sind dort die CC arts. 960-966 aufgehoben worden. Im Falle des wirksamen Widerrufs muss der Beschenkte dem Schenker das Empfangene in natura herausgeben bzw., wenn das nicht möglich ist, Wertersatz leisten (de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge VIII(1)[2], no. 674 p. 778).

10. In SPAIN gilt die Grundregel, dass auch Schenkungen grundsätzlich nicht zurückverlangt werden können, unabhängig von der anhaltenden Diskussion über die Frage, ob eine Schenkung ein Vetrag ist (näher Albaladejo, Derecho Civil II[12], 573; López/Montés/Roca [-Roca i Trias], Derecho de Obligaciones y Contratos, 413); wirksame Schenkungen sind bindend und verbleiben dem Beschenkten (TS 21 May 1984, RAJ 1985 (2) no. 2499 p. 1885; Roca i Trias loc.cit. 418; see also CATALAN CC art. 531-8). Widerruflich sind Schenkungen nur unter den Voraussetzungen der CC arts. 644-653, d.h. im Falle der ingratitude of the done (CC arts. 648-651), der nachträglichen Geburt eines Kindes des im Zeitpunkt der Schenkung kinderlosen Schenkers (CC arts. 644-645) und der Nichterfüllung von mit der Schenkung verbundenen Auflagen (CC art. 647; see TS 19 October 1973, RAJ 1973 (2) no. 3800 p. 3022 und Compilación del Derecho Civil de NAVARRA Ley 162). Catalan CC arts. 531-7 to 531-22 stimmen mit dem gemeinspanischen Recht überein, kennen zusätzlich aber noch das Rückforderungsrecht wegen einer Verarmung des Schenkers (Catalan CC art. 531-15).

11. In ITALY sind Schenkungen Verträge (CC art. 769) und als solche grundsätzlich bindend (CC art. 1372). Einseitige Widerrufsgründe (CC art. 800) sind der grobe Undank und das Hinzukommens von Kindern. Schenkungen, die zur Belohnung eines bestimmten Verhaltens oder in Hinblick auf eine bestimmte Ehe vorgenommen worden sind, können weder wegen Undanks noch wegen Hinzukommens von Kindern widerrufen werden (CC art. 805). Erst das Urteil, mit welchem dem Antrag auf revocazione stattgegeben wird, beseitigt (mit obligatorischer, nicht mit dinglicher Wirkung: Torrente, La donazione, 585) den Erwerbstitel. Bereicherungsrecht kommt gleichwohl nicht zur Anwendung, weil das Schenkungsrecht die Rechtsfolgen der revocazione in CC arts. 807 und 808 abschließend regelt.

12. Auch in AUSTRIA stellt eine Schenkung einen Rechtsgrund dar, der eine bereicherungsrechtliche Rückforderung grundsätzlich ausschließt. Allerdings können Schenkungen wesentlich leichter angefochten (CC § 901: Motivirrtum) bzw. widerrufen werden (CC §§ 947 [Verarmung], 948 [Undank], 1247 [Ausbleiben der Eheschließung] und 709 [Nichterfüllung einer Auflage]) als andere Verträge. Dann entfällt die causa und es entsteht ein Kondiktionsanspruch. Außerhalb des Anwendungsbereichs von CC § 1247 (Brautgeschenke) liegt zudem die Beweislast dafür, dass es sich um eine auf einem Verpflichtungswillen beruhende Schenkung gehandelt hat, beim Zuwendungsempfänger (OGH 15 January 1958, SZ 31/8; OGH 25 June 1986, SZ 59/222). Es besteht eine allgemeine Vermutung, dass eine Leistung nicht unentgeltlich erfolgt (OGH 14 November 1990, JBl 1991, 309, note Apathy). Problematisch ist die Abgrenzung zwischen Schenkungen und solchen Leistungen, die in Erwartung eines späteren Erfolgs oder des Fortbestands einer bestimmten Situation getätigt werden, weil Letztere den Regeln der Zweckverfehlungskondiktion (CC § 1435 analog) unterliegen. Praktische Bedeutung erlangt diese Frage insbesonders bei Fragen des Ausgleichs nach Auseinanderbrechen einer nichtehelichen Lebensgemeinschaft (die nicht dem Familien-, sondern allein dem Schuldrecht unterliegen: Deixler-Hübner, ÖJZ 1999, 201, 206). Eine Schenkung wird hier nur angenommen, wenn die Zuwendung nach dem Willen des Leistenden ohne Erwartung einer Gegenleistung und aus reiner Freigiebigkeit erfolgt. Das könne bei Aufwendungen zur Bestreitung des täglichen Lebens vermutet werden, nicht jedoch bei langfristigen Anschaffungen (wie z.B. dem Erwerb eines Pkw: OGH 16 April 1996, SZ 69/89) oder beim Bau eines Hauses (OGH 20 April 1980, SZ 53/71).

13. PORTUGUESE CC art. 940 qualifiziert die Schenkung als einen Vertrag; eine wirksame Schenkung ist deshalb ein Rechtfertigungsgrund im Sinne des Bereicherungsrechts (CC art. 473; siehe CA Lisbon 8 February 2000, BolMinJus 494 [2000] 391). Gegenstand einer Schenkung kann auch die Übernahme einer Verpflichtung sein. Die revogação das doações ist Gegenstand von CC arts. 969-979. Sie verdrängen das Bereicherungsrecht, weil sie eine selbständige Regelung der Rückgewährpflicht (restituição) enthalten (CC art. 978). Es geht u.a. um den Widerruf wegen groben Undanks (CC arts. 970 und 974), Wenn ein Schenkungsvertrag nichtig ist (z.B. wegen Nichteinhaltung der Form für Verträge über Immobilien, vgl. STJ 5 July 2007, Processo 07A1839), erfolgt die Rückabwicklung über das Nichtigkeitsrecht (CC art. 289(1)). Dasselbe gilt für Schenkungen, die kraft Gesetzes nichtig sind, z.B. Schenkungen fremder Güter (CC art. 954) sowie Schenkung unter Ehegatten, die zwingend (CC art. 1720(1)) im Güterstand der Gütertrennung leben (CC art. 1762).

14. In GERMANY ist gleichfalls unbestritten, dass auch Schenkungen einen Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen des Erhaltenen darstellen (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 812, no. 69). Unter CC § 530(1) kann eine Schenkung allerdings wegen groben Undanks widerrufen werden, was den Rechtsgrund entfallen lässt und zugunsten des Schenkers einen Anspruch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung erzeugt (CC § 531(2)). Unter CC § 528(1) kann ein Schenker, der nach der Vollziehung der Schenkung so verarmt, dass er außerstande ist, sich oder seine unterhaltsberechtigten Angehörigen zu unterhalten, vom Beschenkten die Herausgabe des Geschenkes nach den Vorschriften über die Herausgabe einer ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung fordern. Der Beschenkte kann die Herausgabe durch Zahlung des für den Unterhalt erforderlichen Betrags abwenden. GREEK CC arts. 496 ff stimmen damit in den wesentlichen Punkten überein, allerdings kann hiernach auch Arbeitskraft geschenkt werden, wenn derjenige, der sie annimmt, durch sie Aufwendungen erspart (CFI Thessaloniki 2044/1967, EllDik 9 [1967] 620). Eine Schenkung stellt einen Rechtsgrund i.S.v. CC art. 904 dar (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 31). Sie kann nach denselben Regeln wie in Germany widerrufen werden; im Falle des Widerrufs ist die erbrachte Leistung nach Bereicherungsrecht zurückzugewähren (CC art. 509). Ausgeschlossen ist der Widerruf, wenn die Schenkung aus besonderer moralischer Pflicht erfolgt ist (CC art. 512).

15. Auch HUNGARIAN CC § 582 erlaubt den Widerruf einer Schenkung wegen Verarmung des Schenkers bzw. wegen groben Undanks des Beschenkten, außerdem den Widerruf wegen des Nichteintritts eines mit der Schenkung verfolgten Zwecks. Der Rückforderungsanspruch ist grundsätzlich auf dasjenige beschränkt, was sich noch im Vermögen des Beschenkten befindet (CC § 582(4)). Nicht zulässig ist die Rückforderung eines Geschenks "in gewöhnlicher Größe" (CC § 582(5)). Unter POLISH Recht ist die Schenkung ein Vertrag (CC art. 888 § 1), dessen Erfüllung einen Rechtsgrund i.S.v. CC art. 405 darstellt; ein bereicherungsrechtlicher Rückforderungsanspruch besteht folglich nicht. Allerdings ist der Beschenkte im Fall der Verarmung des Schenkers verpflichtet, ihm "innerhalb der Grenzen einer vorhandenen Bereicherung" Unterhalt zu gewähren (CC art. 897). Im Fall eines groben Undanks des Beschenkten kann der Schenker seine Schenkung widerrufen (CC art. 898 § 1), was zu einem Rückgabeanspruch "gemäß den Vorschriften über die ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung" führt (CC art. 898 § 2). BULGARIAN LOA art. 227(1) kennt gleichfalls das Widerrufsrecht wegen groben Undanks, außerdem ein Widerrufsrecht für den Fall, dass der Beschenkte dem Schenker den von ihm benötigten Unterhalt nicht leistet. Auf übliche Geschenke und auf Geschenke, die als Belohnung gewährt wurden, finden diese Widerrufsrechte keine Anwendung (LOA art. 227(2)). Der Beschenkte haftet nach den Regeln des Bereicherungsrechts (LOA art. 227(5) i.V.m. art. 59; siehe näher die Anordnung no. 1 des Plenums des Obersten Gerichtshofs of 28 May 1979). Das SLOVENIAN LOA folgt ganz ähnlichen Regeln. Im Falle eines begründeten Schenkungswiderrufs (LOA arts. 539-541: Verarmung, grober Undank, Hinzukommen von Kindern) ist das Geschenkte im Umfang der noch vorhandenen Bereicherung zurück zu gewähren (LOA art. 542(1)), see Juhart and Plavšak (-Podgoršek), Obligacijski zakonik III, art. 542, p. 498.

16. Auch unter DUTCH CC arts. 7:175-188 ist die Schenkung ein Vertrag. Er bildet als solcher einen rechtlichen Grund zum Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen i. S. v. CC art. 6:203 (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 805). Das entspricht der Rechtslage in ESTONIA. Unter Estonian LOA § 268(1) kann allerdings das in Erfüllung eines unentgeltlichen Vertrages Geleistete nach den Vorschriften des Bereicherungsrechts zurückverlangt werden, wenn einer der in LOA § 267(1)-(3) genannten Ausnahmetatbestände erfüllt ist. Widerrufsgründe sind grober Undank des Beschenkten, Verarmung des Schenkers und der Verstoß gegen eine mit der Schenkung verbundene Auflage. Der Widerrufsgrund des groben Undanks scheint in der Praxis der wichtigste zu sein (Varul/Kull/Kõve/Käerdi, Võlaõigusseadus II, §§ 208-618, Kommenteeritud väljaanne, 139). Der Rückforderungsanspruch setzt den Beweis einer vollzogenen Schenkung voraus (Supreme Court 21 May 2005, judgement no. 3-2-1-129-05 in civil matters).

17. In the NORDIC countries the general rules on invalid contracts are applied. In SWEDEN wird hinsichtlich der Vernichtung eines unentgeltlichen Vertrages danach unterschieden, ob die entsprechende Erklärung vor oder nach der Erfüllung abgegeben wird. Act on certain Gratuitous Promises (lag [1936:83] angående vissa utfästelser om gåva) § 5 erlaubt den Widerruf einer Schenkung wegen Verarmung des Schenkers und wegen groben Undanks des Beschenkten nur, wenn die Schenkung noch nicht bewirkt worden ist. In allen Nordic countries findet jedoch Contracts Act § 36 (on unconscionable conditions) und the doctrine on tacit assumptions auch auf Schenkungen und andere unentgeltliche Verträge Anwendung (Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 264; Jensen and Rasmussen, Familie Retten, 18).

(c) Vorzeitige Leistungen und Teilleistungen

18. Das Grundprinzip der Nichtrückforderbarkeit von Leistungen, die in Erfüllung eines Vertrages erbracht wurden, gilt zumeist auch für vorzeitige Leistungen und für Teilleistungen, die noch nicht ausreichen, um einen Anspruch auf die Gegenleistung auszulösen. In FRANCE wird deshalb zwischen der inexistence einer Schuld und der fehlenden Fälligkeit (inexigibilité) einer existierenden Schuld unterschieden. Leistungen auf noch nicht fällige Schulden können nicht zurückgefordert werden (CC art. 1186). Das entspricht sowohl der Rechtslage in BELGIUM als auch in SPAIN (CC art. 1126(1)). Auch eine vorzeitige Leistung ist eine Leistung, die auf einem Rechtsgrund basiert; sie ist folglich nicht i.S.d. condictio indebiti "ungeschuldet". Die Vorleistung unterscheidet sich gerade in diesem Punkt von einer Leistung auf einen aufschiebend bedingten Vertrag (Albaladejo [-Montés Penadés], Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales XV(2), arts. 1126 and 1127, p. 101; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 506). Ein solvens, der vorfristig leistet, ohne dass er den hinausgeschobenen Leistungszeitpunkt kennt, kann den Gläubiger unter CC art. 1126(2) allerdings für die fragliche Zeitspanne auf "interest or fruits" in Anspruch nehmen. Das wird mit dem Gedanken der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung begründet (Montés Penadés loc.cit. p. 107-108). Zum Schutz der Erwerber von Eigenheimen sieht Ley 57/1968 of 27 July 1968 sobre percepción de cantidades anticipadas en la construcción y venta de viviendas einen Anspruch auf Rückzahlung des im Voraus bezahlten Kaufpreises nebst 6% Zinsen vor, falls die Baugesellschaft mit der Fertigstellung bzw. Übergabe des Gebäudes in Verzug gerät. Die Erben eines Verstorbenen, der Unterhaltsvorauszahlungen erhalten hatte, sind nicht verpflichtet, diese zurück zu zahlen (CC art. 148(2)). Unter CC arts. 1157 and 1169(1) kann der Gläubiger Teilleistungen zurückweisen; nimmt er sie an, so läuft das aber auf eine stillschweigende vertragliche Vereinbarung hinaus, die einen Rückzahlungsanspruch ausschließt.

19. ITALIAN CC art. 1185(2) sagt ebenfalls ausdrücklich, dass der Schuldner nicht zurückfordern kann, was er vorzeitig geleistet hat; das gilt selbst dann, wenn er die Erfüllungsfrist nicht kannte. Er kann dann jedoch in den Grenzen des erlittenen Verlusts dasjenige zurückfordern, um das der Gläubiger durch die vorzeitige Zahlung bereichert wurde. Der Umfang des Anspruchs unterliegt folglich den Grundsätzen der allgemeinen Bereicherungsklage (Cass. 16 Febraury 1985, no. 1330, Giust.civ.Mass. 1985, fasc. 2). Die Grundregel (keine Rückforderung) ergibt sich aus der Überlegung, dass die Leistung in Erfüllung eines bestehenden Schuldverhältnisses erfolgte (Di Majo, Dell´adempimento in generale, sub art. 1185, p. 199); dasselbe gilt für die Nichtrückforderbarkeit von Teilleistungen (Moscati, Pagamento dell'indebito, 122 fn. 6(I)(c)). Auch unter CC art. 1181 kann der Gläubiger eine Teilleistung allerdings grundsätzlich ablehnen. Er soll sogar berechtigt sein, eine zunächst gegebene Zustimmung zu widerrufen, falls der Schuldner die ausstehenden Leistungsteile nicht rechtzeitig oder korrekt erbringt (so Giorgianni, L'inadempimento, 41).

20. Wer auf eine bestehende, aber noch nicht fällige Verpflichtung leistet, kann das Geleistete auch unter AUSTRIAN CC § 1434 second sentence nicht zurückverlangen; die Leistung erfolgt nicht ohne Rechtsgrund und der spätere Eintritt der Leistungspflicht steht bereits fest (OGH 13 June 1990, ecolex 1990, 567). Ein Kreditnehmer, der eine zu hohe Kreditrate gezahlt hat, kann den Überschuss nicht zurückfordern; er wird ihm nur auf die nächste Rate angerechnet. Eine Rückforderung kommt erst dann in Betracht, wenn das Gezahlte den insgesamt geschuldeten Betrag übersteigt (OGH 26 January 2005, SZ 2005/10). Der Rückforderungsausschluss betrifft auch die aus der vorzeitigen Leistung gezogenen Nutzungen, insbesondere den Zwischenzins (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB II(3)[3], § 1434 no. 4; kritisch Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Koziol], ABGB[2], § 1434 no. 2). Für Verbraucherkredite gilt Consumer Protection Act (KSchG) § 12a, wonach der Konsument bei vorzeitiger Rückzahlung einen Anspruch auf Ermäßigung der Kreditkosten (Zins und laufzeitabhängige Kosten) hat. Keine vorzeitige, sondern eine ungewisse – und daher kondizierbare – Leistung ist nach h.M. die Vorleistung im Falle eines nur Zug-um-Zug zu erfüllenden Vertrages (OGH 5 March 1987, RdW 1987, 194; OGH 15 September 2000, 7Ob 108/00h).

21. PORTUGUESE CC art. 476(3) schließt die Rückforderung vorzeitiger Leistungen aus. Ein Schuldner, der sich in einem entschuldbaren Irrtum bezüglich des Fälligkeitstermins befand, kann jedoch die Bereicherung herausverlangen, die der Gläubiger durch die vorzeitige Erfüllung erlangt hat. Man folgt also der Lösung des italienischen Rechts (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 480). Wer irrtümlich in Erfüllung einer aufschiebend bedingten Verpflichtung zahlt, hat dagegen bis zum Bedingungseintritt ein Rückforderungsrecht (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], note 8 under art. 476, p. 464). Darlehensnehmer dürfen das Kapital grundsätzlich vorfristig zurückzahlen, freilich nur incl. der Zinsen bis zum Ablauf der vereinbarten Laufzeit (CC art. 1147; näher CA Lisbon 4 July 1991, BolMinJus 409 [1991] 863). Teilleistungen dürfen nur erbracht werden, wenn sie vereinbart wurden oder Gesetz bzw. den Gebräuchen entsprechen (CC art. 763(1)); aus dem Prinzip der indivisibilidade da prestação (STJ 7 January 1993, CJ [ST] I [1993-1] 13) folgt, dass der Gläubiger eine Teilleistung ablehnen darf (Menezes Cordeiro, Obrigações II, 441). Besonderheiten gelten, falls die Teilleistung eine Folge einer teilweisen Unmöglichkeit der Erfüllung ist (CC arts. 793 und 802). Bei unverschuldeter Unmöglichkeit reduziert sich die Haftung auf die mögliche Teilleistung und es wird die Gegenleistung des Gläubigers proportional reduziert (CC art. 793(1)).

22. GERMAN CC § 813(2) betrifft Verbindlichkeiten, welche bereits entstanden, jedoch ganz oder teilweise noch nicht fällig bzw. noch nicht durchsetzbar sind (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 813, no. 5). Wird eine solche Verbindlichkeit vorzeitig erfüllt, so ist die Rückforderung ausgeschlossen, weil es sich nicht um die Erfüllung einer Nichtschuld gehandelt hat. Auch die Erstattung von Zwischenzinsen kann nicht verlangt werden. CC § 813(2) betrifft aber nicht Leistungen auf aufschiebend bedingte Verbindlichkeiten; sie entstehen erst im Zeitpunkt des Bedingungseintritts (Sprau loc.cit.). Teilleistungen gehören zum Regelungsgegenstand des Rechts der Leistungsstörungen (CC §§ 280 ff; vgl. Auch CC § 434(3)), welches das Bereicherungsrecht verdrängt (Sprau loc.cit. Einführung vor § 812, no. 12). GREEK CC art. 905 second sentence gleicht German CC § 813(2). Die Vorschrift wird allerdings für problematisch gehalten, weil sie die Rückforderung auch dann ausschließt, wenn der Erfüllungszeitpunkt noch sehr weit in der Zukunft liegt und selbst einen Zinsanspruch abschneidet (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 905, no. 10).

23. Unter POLISH CC art. 457 gilt eine durch Rechtsgeschäft bestimmte Frist für die Vornahme einer Leistung im Zweifel als zugunsten des Schuldners vereinbart. Der Schuldner darf also vor Ablauf der vereinbarten Frist leisten, der Gläubiger aber die Leistung noch nicht verlangen (Pietrzykowski [-Popiołek], Kodeks cywilny II[4], art. 457, no. 1). Leistet der Schuldner vor Fristablauf, so ist eine bereicherungsrechtliche Rückforderung ausgeschlossen (CC art. 411 no. 4). Teilleistungen darf ein Gläubiger gemäß CC art. 450 nur ablehnen, wenn die Annahme einer solchen Leistung sein berechtigtes Interesse verletzen würde. In HUNGARY setzt eine vorzeitige Erfüllung eine Einigung zwischen den Parteien voraus (CC § 282(2); see Bíró, A kötelmi jog és a szerződéstan közös szabályai[6], 403; Petrik [-Bíró], Polgári jog II, 653). Ausnahmen gelten allerdings für Geldleistungen (CC § 292(2)) und für (andere) teilbare Leistungen (CC § 285); sie können weder zurückverlangt werden noch besteht ein Anspruch auf die Zwischenzinsen. Gegenteilige Vereinbarungen sind nichtig. "Rechtsgrundlos" i.S.v. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 190(1) sind Vorleistungen, wenn und soweit sie sich auch auf einen Zeitraum beziehen, für den der Behaltensgrund später wegfällt, also etwa dann, wenn ein Mieter die Miete für ein Jahr im Voraus zahlt, das Mietverhältnis aber schon nach fünf Monaten durch Kündigung endet (Juhart and Plavšak [-Polajnar Pavčnik], Obligacijski zakonik II, art. 190, 46). Auch für BULGARIA wird gesagt, dass vorzeitige Leistungen keinen Rückforderungsanspruch auslösen, weil sie nicht ungeschuldet erbracht werden (Goleminov, Neosnovatelno obogatavyane, 43; Kojucharov, Obligazionno pravo I, 165). Zwischenzinsen freilich können geltend gemacht bzw. abgezogen werden (LOA art. 70(3)).

24. Under DUTCH law sind solche Leistungen nicht ungeschuldet, die eine Partei trotz eines bestehenden (aber nicht ausgeübten) Leistungsverweigerungsrechts erbringt. Es leistet also nicht ungeschuldet, wer leistet, obwohl die andere Seite vorleistungspflichtig war, und es leistet auch nicht ungeschuldet, wer erfüllt, ohne sich auf ein ihm zustehendes Leistungsverweigerungsrecht zu berufen (vgl. CC art. 6:248(2)). CC art. 6:39(2) stellt außerdem klar, dass vorzeitige Leistungen nicht aus Bereicherungsrecht zurückverlangt werden können. Die Bestimmung einer Leistungszeit dient nämlich dem Interesse des Schuldners, nicht dem des Gläubigers (art. 6:39(1); see Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 325 p. 343; CFI Amsterdam 3 November 1923, NJ 1923, 1253). Das Grundprinzip der Nichtrückforderbarkeit von Leistungen, die in Erfüllung eines Vertrages erbracht wurden, gilt auch für Teilleistungen, die noch keinen Anspruch auf die Gegenleistung auslösen. Leistungen auf noch nicht fällige Schulden können nicht zurückgefordert werden.

25. Das ESTONIAN LOA enthält zwar keine ausdrückliche Regelung zu dieser Frage, doch ergibt sich auch hier die Nichtrückforderbarkeit vorzeitiger Leistungen aus allgemeinen bereicherungsrechtlichen Grundsätzen. Außerdem lässt sich dieses Ergebnis auch aus LOA §§ 76(4) and 84(1) ableiten, die es dem Gläubiger verwehren, vorzeitige Leistungen abzulehnen.

26. In the NORDIC countries an early performance does not constitute a mistaken performance which could justify a condictio indebiti. Bei der Erfüllungshandlung handelt es sich um eine bewusste, nicht um eine irrtümliche Leistung, und es handelt sich um eine Leistung auf eine bestehende Schuld. Zur Begründung der Nichtrückforderbarkeit wird außerdem argumentiert, dass einer Erfüllung die wichtige Funktion zukomme, die Rechtsbeziehung zwischen den Parteien endgültig zum Erlöschen zu bringen (Hult, Condictio indebiti, 64; HD 10 February 1933, NJA 1933, 25; Ravnkilde, Betalningskorrektioner, 84).

(d) Zuvielleistungen; Leistungen an den falschen Empfänger

27. Wird mehr geleistet als geschuldet, oder wird an eine Person geleistet, die nicht Gläubigerin der Forderung ist, so ist dagegen ein Rückforderungsanspruch überall unproblematisch gegeben. Unter FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBURGIAN CC art. 1377 steht jeder Person, die eine Schuld befriedigt hat, weil sie sich irrtümlich als Schuldnerin betrachtete, ein Rückforderungsrecht gegen den Gläubiger zu; dieses Recht erlischt allerdings, wenn der Gläubiger seinen Titel anschließend vernichtet hat. Freiwillige Zahlungen erfolgen nicht irrtümlich. Eine Gesellschaft, die einer anderen Gesellschaft finanziell hilft und weiß, dass sie dazu nicht verpflichtet ist, kann keine Rückzahlung fordern (Cass.com. 8 June 1979, Bull.civ. 1979, IV, no. 187); desgleichen nicht ein Arbeitgeber, der einem Arbeitnehmer freiwillig mehr zahlt als der Arbeitsvertrag vorsieht (Cass.soc. 24 June 1971, Bull.civ. 1971, V, no. 481). Die Rückforderbarkeit von Zuvielleistungen bzw. von Leistungen an einen falschen Empfänger wird in Frankreich noch dadurch erleichtert, dass der solvens einen Irrtum in aller Regel nicht mehr beweisen muss (Cass.ass.plén. 2 April 1993, Bull.civ. 1993, I, no. 9 p. 326; D. 1993, 373, note Jéol; Cass.civ. 20 January 1998, Bull.civ. 1998, I, no. 18; Cass.soc. 14 October 1993, Bull.civ. 1993, V, no. 236. Nach belgischer Auffassung (Cass. 26 June 1998, Pas. belge 1998, I, 824) setzt die répétition de l'indu einerseits eine Zahlung und andererseits die Rechtsgrundlosigkeit dieser Zahlung voraus; daraus folgt, dass auch unter belgischem Recht Zuvielleistungen und Zahlungen an einen falschen Empfänger zurückverlangt werden können. Dasselbe Ergebnis folgt aus CC art. 1376, wonach derjenige, der irrtümlich oder wissentlich etwas unberechtigt erhält, es demjenigen zurückgeben muss, von dem er es ohne Rechtsgrund erhalten hat. Besonderheiten gelten allerdings im französischen Bankrecht. Zahlt eine Bank mit négligence fautive irrtümlich doppelt an einen Kunden, dann scheint ihr Rückforderungsanspruch gegen ihn ausgeschlossen zu sein (Cass.com. 12 January 1988, Bull.civ. 1988, IV, no. 22).

28. In SPAIN behaupten zwar einige Autoren, dass es sich bei Zuvielleistungen durch einen Schuldner an seinen Gläubiger nicht um eine ungeschuldete Zahlung handele, so dass die CC arts. 1895 ff (condictio indebiti) keine Anwendung fänden (López/Montés/Roca [-Capilla Roncero], Derecho de Obligaciones y Contratos, 291), doch sind the prevailing legal doctrine and the courts genau gegenteiliger Auffassung: the difference between what was paid and what was due can be claimed back CC arts. 1895 ff (TS 21 November 1957, RAJ 1957 (1) no. 3632 p. 2420; TS 21 May 1980, RAJ 1980 (1) no. 1957 p. 1491; TS 2 October 2000, RAJ 2000 (4) no. 8131 p. 12552; Gullón Ballesteros, FS Batlle Vázquez, 367, 371; Albaladejo, Derecho Civil II[12], 909). Die Zahlung an eine Person, die nicht der Gläubiger ist, stellt einen klaren Fall der condictio indebiti dar. Es bestehen allerdings Ausnahmen von der Grundregel der Rückforderbarkeit (Gullón Ballesteros loc.cit. 368), nämlich bei Leistungen an einen Scheingläubiger (acreedor aparente, CC art. 1164), insbesondere im Fall der Zession (CC art. 1527), und in der Situation des CC art. 1163(2), in der die Leistung an einen Nichtgläubiger dem Gläubiger ausnhamsweise zum Vorteil gereicht.

29. In ITALY werden auf Zuvielleistungen und Leistungen an einen falschen Empfänger die Regeln über die Zahlung einer Nichtschuld angewandt (Cass. 29 October 1973, no. 2821, Giur. it. 1975, I, 1, 174; Cass. 12 March 1984, no. 1690, Giur.it. 1985, I, 1, 638; Cass. 21 July 2000, no. 9604, Rep.Giur.it. 2000, voce Indebito, no. 4). Ausnahmen betreffen auch hier den Schutz eines Schuldners, der an einen Scheingläubiger zahlt; sofern die Zahlung den Schuldner befreit, ist der Scheingläubiger dem wahren Gläubiger zur Herausgabe des Empfangenen verpflichtet (CC art. 1189(2)). Ob der Schuldner trotz der Befreiungswirkung selber gegen den Scheingläubiger vorgehen kann, ist streitig (verneinend Di Majo, Dell´adempimento in generale, 285; bejahend Cannata, L'adempimento delle obbligazioni[2], 117).

30. Zuviel- und Fehlleistungen fallen in den Anwendungsbereich von AUSTRIAN CC § 1431 (condictio indebiti): es fehlt an einer Verbindlichkeit, und der Leistende kann die Zahlung zurückfordern, wenn er sich über den Bestand der Verbindlichkeit irrte (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 277). Da es jeweils nur auf den überzahlten bzw. fehlgeleiteten Teilbetrag ankommt (so schon von Zeiller, Commentar zum ABGB IV, § 1431 no. 4), stellen sowohl die Doppelzahlung (OGH 15 December 1981, SZ 54/187) als auch die Zuvielleistung hinsichtlich des überschießenden Teils (OGH 13 January 1981, SZ 54/2: Überweisung von DM 2944 statt ÖS 2944) und die Zahlung einer bestehenden Schuld an den falschen Gläubiger (OGH 31 January 1985, SZ 58/19) eine ungeschuldete Leistung i.S.v. CC § 1431 dar. Der Leistende muss sich zwar geirrt haben, doch genügt auch ein schuldhafter Irrtum (OGH 9 October 1980, SZ 53/130). Dem Irrtum steht es gleich, wenn die Leistung 'unter Vorbehalt' erfolgt, weil der Leistende Zweifel an der Höhe der Schuld oder der Person des Gläubigers hatte (Koziol and Welser loc.cit.). Es darf sich die Leistung aber aus der Sicht des Empfängers (OGH 12 July 1995, 7Ob 18/95) nicht wie ein Schuldanerkenntnis darstellen (OGH 18 May 1971, SZ 44/75). Einen Sonderfall der Zuvielleistung regelt CC § 1436: war der Schuldner verpflichtet, nach seiner Wahl eine von zwei Sachen zu leisten und leistet er irrtümlich beide, so kann er wählen, welche er zurückfordert, es sei denn, mit der ersten Leistung ist bereits Erfüllung eingetreten (weil mit ihr die Ausübung des Wahlrechts einher ging). In PORTUGAL werden Zuvielleistungen oder Doppelzahlungen über das Recht der condictio indebiti rückabgewickelt (CC art. 476(1)); see Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 472; STJ 14 January 1972, BolMinJus 213 (1972) 214 und STJ 8 July 1997, CJ (ST) V (1997-2) 144. Unter CC art. 1214(3) darf ein Werkunternehmer ohne Zustimmung des Bauherren den vereinbarten Leistungsumfang nicht ändern und den Preis enstprechend erhöhen. Die Ansprüche des Werkunternehmers sind in einem solchen Fall auf eine dem Bauherrn verbleibende Bereicherung beschränkt. Leistungen an eine Person, die nicht der Gläubiger der Forderung ist, sind unter CC art. 1214 ausdrücklich bereicherungsrechtlich rückabzuwickeln. Der Schuldner kann eine Leistung an einen Nichtgläubiger aber nur dann zurückverlangen, wenn die Leistung keine schuldbefreiende Wirkung hat (CC art. 476(2) i.V.m. CC arts. 769 und 770).

31. In GERMANY wird angenommen, dass dann, wenn eine Verbindlichkeit nur in geringerer Höhe bestand als der Schuldner meinte, der überschießende Teil der Bereicherungsgegenstand ist und als solcher herausgegeben werden muss (Reuter and Martinek, Ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung, 131). Grundsätzlich besteht ein Rückforderungsanspruch auch dann, wenn eine Schuld zwar bestand, die Leistung aber an eine Person erbracht wurde, die nicht Gläubigerin der Forderung ist. Von diesem Grundprinzip gibt es aber eine Reihe von Ausnahmen, z.B. zum Schutze eines Schuldners, der nach einer ihm unbekannten Zession an den Zedenten leistet (CC § 816(2)). Zuvielleistungen und Leistungen an einen Nichtgläubiger stehen der Leistung auf eine Nichtschuld gleich, welche nach CC § 812(1)(i) first alternative rückabzuwickeln ist (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[66], § 812, no. 71). Auch unter GREEK law besteht im Falle der Zuvielleistung ein Anspruch auf Rückgabe des Überschusses; es handele sich inswoeit um eine Nichtschuld (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 905, no. 3). Entsprechendes gilt bei Leistungen an den falschen Gläubiger, sofern sie nicht ausnahmsweise ein Erlöschen der Schuld bewirken (Stathopoulos loc.cit. no. 78).

32. Zuvielleistungen, Doppelzahlungen und Leistungen an einen falschen Empfänger werden auch in HUNGARY and BULGARIA (LOA art. 55(1) first alternative; see Goleminov, Neosnovatelno obogatyavane, 45) bereicherungsrechtlich ausgeglichen. LOA art. 56 regelt den Bereicherungsausgleich in Fällen der irrtümlichen Erfüllung einer fremden Verbindlichkeit; die Vorschrift setzt voraus, dass der solvens glaubt, dass er entweder eine eigene Verpflichtung gegenüber dem accipiens oder die Verpflichtung eines Dritten zu erfüllen habe (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 589). In die erste Gruppe gehören Zahlungen an den falschen Gläubiger, in die zweite Sachverhalte, in welchen der solvens sich über das Bestehen eines Haftungsgrundes irrt, z.B. weil er irrtümlich annahm, den von einem Dritten verursachten Schaden ersetzen zu müssen.

33. Da es in solchen Fällen an einem Rechtsgrund für die Zuwendung fehlt, wird in den NIEDERLANDEN auf Zuviel-, Doppel- und Fehlleistungen das Recht der ungeschuldeten Zahlung (CC art. 6:203) angewandt. Es genügt, dass der überschießende Betrag rechtsgrundlos geleistet wurde; dass im Übrigen zwischen den Parteien ein Vertrag bestand, hindert die Anwendung des Rechts der ungeschuldeten Zahlung auf das zuviel Geleistete nicht (Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 324 p. 343). So liegen die Dinge auch in ESTONIA. The amount exceeding the agreed debt is seen as performance of a non-existing obligation (LOA § 1028(1)). Wages Act (Palgaseadus of 1 March 1994, RT I 1994, 11,154; 2007, 54, 362) art. 37 sieht vor, dass ein Arbeitgeber, der infolge eines Kalkulationsirrtums mehr Lohn zahlt als er schuldet, den überzahlten Betrag nur während der nachfolgenden drei Monate vom Lohn einbehalten darf, und dies auch nur, wenn die Überzahlung unstreitig ist. Andere Überzahlungen können nur zurückverlangt werden, wenn sie auf einer Täuschung durch den Arbeitnehmer beruhen.

34. In the NORDIC countries cases where a person performs more than was owed to the creditor or to a person who in fact was not the creditor, constitute the core situations for a claim based on condictio indebiti (see note III24 under VII.–1:101).

II. Rückforderbarkeit von Zuwendungen an den Vertragspartner in vermeintlicher Erfüllung eines angefochtenen Vertrages

35. Für Zuwendungen an den Vertragspartner in Erfüllung eines angefochtenen Vertrages lautet der Ausgangspunkt in FRANCE, dass der Anfechtende in die Lage zurückversetzt werden muss, in der er sich befunden hätte, wenn der Vertrag nie geschlossen worden wäre. Aus dieser Pflicht zum Ersatz des "negativen Interesses" ergibt sich auch das Recht zur Rückforderung des Geleisteten (Fabre-Magnan, Les obligations, no. 155 p. 405). In BELGIEN verweist man dagegen auf das Recht der enrichissement sans cause bzw. des paiement de l'indu. Ist der Vertrag vor Anfechtung bereits (ganz oder teilweise) erfüllt worden, so kann das Geleistete (je nach dem Gegenstand der Leistung) entweder über das Recht der enrichissement sans cause oder über das Recht des paiement de l'indu zurückverlangt werden (von Kuegelgen, Réflexions sur le régime des nullités et des inopposabilités, 612-613; Cass. 8 December 1966, Pas. belge 1967, I, 434). Nach der Lehre von der remise des choses en leur pristin état soll es sich, technisch gesprochen, hierbei aber nicht wirklich um die Anwendung von Bereicherungsrecht, sondern um die Übertragung von dessen Grundwerten in das allgemeine Vertragsrecht handeln. CA Liège 26 May 2003, no. JL035Q1_1, no. de rôle 2000RG919, meint, es handele sich um den Ersatz des "negativen Schadens" (dommage négatif). Dem Betroffenen stünde ein Ersatz für alle von ihm im Hinblick auf den Vertragsschluss sans cause unternommenen Anstrengungen zu (näher Wery, RCJB 2003/1, no. 22 p. 110). Der Wert dessen, was zurückgefordert werden kann, bemisst sich nach den Prinzipien der enrichissement sans cause (Cass. 24 March 1972, Pas. belge 1972, I, 693).

36. Die Rechtslage in SPAIN ist einigermaßen kompliziert. Im Ausgangspunkt wird gewöhnlich zwischen der nulidad de pleno derecho (Nichtigkeit von Rechts wegen) und der anulabilidad (Anfechtbarkeit) unterschieden. Diese Unterscheidung ist zwar im Gesetz nicht angelegt, entspricht aber herrschender Meinung und Rechtsprechung, wobei zugleich klar ist, dass dies nicht die einzigen Nichtigkeitsgründe des spanischen Rechts sind (Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán, Las nulidades de los contratos, 29, 34, 36-42). Die Anfechtunsklage (CC arts. 1300-1314) does not require the claimant to prove that he was aggrieved (TS 13 May 1992, RAJ 1992 (2) no. 3983 p. 5261). Ein anfechtbarer Vertrag ist nach herrschender Auffassung gültig, aber nur von beschränkter Wirksamkeit (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 592-595; TS 27 February 1997, RAJ 1997 (1) no. 1332 p. 20750; anders [der Vertrag sei als von Anfang an unwirksam anzusehen] Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 54-60 and Menéndez and Díez-Picazo [-Miquel González], Comentarios a la Ley sobre condiciones generales de la contratación, 474-475). Auf den Umfang des Rückforderungsanspruches hat dies allerdings keine Auswirkungen, weil die Folgen eines (durch Klage) angefochtenen Vertrages dieselben sind wie die eines von Anfang an nichtigen Vertrages (Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 203-204; anders allerdings López Beltrán, La nulidad, 46-47). Auch ein angefochtener Vertrag hat nach CC arts. 1303 ff mindestens noch die Wirkung, dass er den Parteien ein gegenseitiges Recht auf Rückforderung des jeweils Geleisteten gewährt. CC art. 1303 wird trotz seines Wortlauts sowohl auf die anulabilidad (für die er konzipiert ist: Díez-Picazo, La liquidación de las nulidades contractuales, § 1) als auch auf die nulidad angewandt (TS 26 July 2000, RAJ 2000 (5) no. 9177 p. 14227; TS 30 November 2000, RAJ 2000 (5), no. 9319 p. 14441). Der Rückforderungsanspruch hat seinen Rechtsgrund folglich in beiden Fällen weder im Recht der condictio indebiti noch im Bereicherungsrecht; dass der Supreme Court gleichwohl auf den Gedanken der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung Bezug nimmt, um die Anwendbarkeit von CC art. 1303 auf die nulidad argumentativ zu stützen (TS 22 September 1989, RAJ 1989 (5) no. 6351 p. 7343; TS 30 December 1996, RAJ 1997 (2) no. 2182 p. 3325; TS 30 November 2000 loc. cit.), ändert daran nichts. Es bewirkt allerdings, dass die Beziehung zwischen den Rückforderungsansprüchen aus CC art. 1303 und dem Bereicherungsrecht in jüngerer Zeit zunehmend unklar geworden ist. Eine neue Lehre spricht sich vor diesem Hintergrund dafür aus, ein allgemeines bereicherungsrechtliches System der condictiones zu entwickeln, zu denen auch die condictio de prestación ("Leistungskondiktion") zähle, welche ihrerseits aber als ein Stück Vertragsrecht zu klassifizieren sei (Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 100-104; Miquel González, Enriquecimiento injustificado, 2807; TS 8 January 2007, BDA RJ 2007/812; TS 23 February 2007, BDA RJ 2007/1475 [obiter] and CA Ciudad Real 30 March 2004, BDA JUR 2004/128779). Praktische Folgen kann diese Neuorientierung vor allem in Fällen erlangen, in denen der Empfänger den geleisteten Gegenstand weiterveräußert hat. Denn die condictio de prestación contained within CC arts. 1303 is considered dogmatically a case of condictio indebiti (Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 234-235; Díez-Picazo, La liquidación de las nulidades contractuales, § 2; TS 31 October 1984, RAJ 1984 (3) no. 5158 p. 4053), was wiederum die Anwendbarkeit von CC art. 1897 (Pflicht zur Erlösherausgabe bzw. zur Abtretung des Anspruchs gegen den Erwerber) eröffnet (Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 270-271; Díez-Picazo loc.cit. § 2). Außerdem muss das Recht der condictio indebiti ohnehin die Lücken schließen, die sich dadurch ergeben, dass CC art. 1303 zu dem Problem der Rückabwicklung von Leistungen schweigt, die in einem facere or non facere bestehen (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 125; López/Montés/Roca [-Capilla Roncero], Derecho de Obligaciones y Contratos, 293) (freilich wäre in einem solchen Fall auch eine analoge Anwendung von CC art. 1307 denkbar: Díez-Picazo, La liquidación de las nulidades contractuales, § 3; Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 256-257). CC art. 1303 folgt im Übrigen drei Grundsätzen: (i) Der Rückforderungsanspruch steht nur den Vertragsparteien, nicht einem Dritten zu (TS 27 March 1963, RAJ 1963 (1) no. 2121 p. 1313); anders ist das nur im Falle der CC arts. 1301 in fine and 1322 (Zustimmungserfordernis des Ehepartners; Anspruch auch des übergangenen Ehepartners: TS 15 October 1984, RAJ 1984 (3) no. 4866 p. 3783). (ii) Der Rückforderungsanspruch aus CC art. 1303 is a personal claim which can only be exercised against the other party to the contract; it has no proprietary effect (Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 243). Eine Ausnahme von diesem Grundsatz findet sich in CP art. 111 nur für bestimmte Straftaten. (iii) CC arts. 1303 and 1308 finden auf alle Arten von Verträgen, nicht nur auf Kaufverträge über bewegliche Sachen Anwendung (TS 22 November 1983, RAJ 1983 (3) no. 6492 p. 4994; Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 254). Rückgabepflichtig sind unter CC art. 1303 auch die Früchte der Sache. CC art. 451 beschränkt diese Pflicht allerdings auf bösgläubige Besitzer. Diese Regel wird nach wohl herrschender Meinung auch im Rahmen von CC art. 1303 angewandt (TS 10 February 1970, RAJ 1970 (1) no. 792 p. 570; TS 26 July 2000 loc. cit.; Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 258-259).

37. Under ITALIAN law hat die (gerichtliche) Annullierung (annullamento) eines Vertrages rückwirkende Kraft. Das führt zur Anwendbarkeit der Regeln über die Zahlung einer Nichtschuld. Die rückwirkende Kraft der Annullierung gilt ab Eintragung der Klage auch gegenüber Dritten, es sei denn, die Annullierung hat ihren Grund in fehlender Geschäftsfähigkeit (CC art. 1445). Annullamento und nullità werden einander im Recht der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld gleichgestellt (Cass. 31 January 1966, no. 359, Giust.civ. 1966, I, 869). Eine Leistung in Kenntnis des Unwirksamkeitsgrundes wird als Heilung des Vertrages angesehen (CC art. 1444(2)). Unter AUSTRIAN CC § 877 sind die Parteien eines (wegen Irrtums, List oder Drohung) angefochtenen Vertrages einander verpflichtet, das Empfangene zurückzugeben. Es handelt sich um eine condictio sine causa, die entweder als eine eigene Fallgruppe innerhalb der Leistungskondiktion (Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III^{2}, no. 15/13) oder als ein Sonderfall der condictio causa finita (CC § 1435) verstanden werden kann. Jedenfalls setzt CC § 877 keinen Irrtum des Leistenden voraus. Auch derjenige, der sein Anfechtungsrecht kannte, kann das Geleistete kondizieren (OGH 29 November 1990, ecolex 1991, 238).

38. In PORTUGAL hat das jeweilige Unwirksamkeitsregime grundsätzlichen Vorrang vor dem Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung. Die Rückforderung von Leistungen in vermeintlicher Erfüllung eines angefochteten bzw. nichtigen Vertrages unterliegt deshalb CC arts. 285-294. Das Bereicherungsrecht wird in solchen Fällen als überflüssig betrachtet; der Rückerstattungsanspruch sei eine unmittelbare Folge der Unwirksamkeit (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I^{4}, note 1 under art. 289, p. 265). Anfechtung und Nichtigerklärung eines Rechtsgeschäfts wirken ex tunc (CC art. 289(1)); folglich ist alles Geleistete (in Natur bzw., wenn das nicht möglich ist, dem Werte nach) zurückzuerstatten. Ein anfechtbares Rechtsgeschäft kann durch Bestätigung geheilt werden (CC art. 288). Die Anfechtung muss innerhalb bestimmter Fristen klageweise geltend gemacht werden (CC art. 287).

39. GERMANY unterwirft die Rückabwicklung eines (mit Wirkung ex tunc: CC § 142) angefochtenen Vertrages dagegen dem Bereicherungsrecht; Uneinigkeit besteht wegen CC § 814 (Rückforderungsausschluss bei Kenntnis der Nichtschuld) nur im Hinblick auf die Frage, ob der Rückforderungsanspruch seinen Rechtsgrund in der condictio indebiti oder in der condictio ob causam finitam hat (dann ware CC § 814 nicht anwendbar), vgl. Palandt (-Sprau), BGB^{66}, § 812, no. 77 und BGH 4 April 1990, BGHZ 111, 125, 130). Auch in GREECE erfolgt die Rückabwicklung nach erfolgter Anfechtung über das Bereicherungsrecht (Schlechtriem, Restitution und Bereicherungsausgleich in Europa I, ch. 3 nos. 330 and 542). HUNGARY begreift die Anfechtung als eine Form der Ungültigkeit. Der Vertrag wird infolge der Anfechtung mit Wirkung ex tunc zum Zeitpunkt seines Abschlusses unwirksam (CC § 235(1)). Die Rückabwicklung unterliegt der vertragsrechtlichen Vorschrift des CC § 237.

BULGARIAN LOA art. 55(1) unterscheidet zwischen der Rückforderung eines rechtsgrundlos erworbenen Vermögensvorteils und der Rückforderung eines Vorteils, der aufgrund eines nachträglich entfallenen Rechtsgrundes erworben wurde. Die Rückforderung gehört in die erste Fallgruppe, wenn nach der Anfechtung geleistet wurde; erfolgt die Anfechtung dagegen nach der Leistung, geht es um einen Fall aus der zweiten Gruppe (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 583). SLOVENIAN LOA art. 96 enthält zwar eine selbständige Vorschrift über die Rückabwicklung angefochtener Verträge, doch handelt es sich hierbei nach herrschender Meinung um eine Verweisungsnorm. Sie will, ähnlich wie LOA art. 87, nicht ein eigenständiges Restitutionsregime etablieren, sondern die Anwendbarkeit des Bereicherungsrechts eröffnen (Juhart and Plavšak [-Polajnar Pavčnik], Obligacijski zakonik I, art. 97, p. 532). In ROUMANIA wendet man auf die Rückabwicklung angefochtener Verträge je nach den Umständen entweder das Recht der Bereicherung ohne rechten Grund (actio de in rem verso) oder das Recht der condictio indebiti an. Auf die Letztere wird aber nur bei von beiden Seiten bereits erfüllten synallagmatischen Verträgen abgestellt, weil in einer solchen Situation die Voraussetzungen der allgemeinen Bereicherungsklage nicht mehr als erfüllt angesehen werden (Dogaru and Drăghici, Drept civil, 196).

40. In the NETHERLANDS stellt eine Leistung auf einen infolge Anfechtung oder aus anderem Grunde von Anfang an nichtigen Vertrag eine Leistung ohne Rechtsgrund mit der Folge dar, dass die Rückabwicklung CC arts. 6:203-211 (ungeschuldete Leistung) unterliegt (näher Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 806; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 318 p. 338; HR 20 April 1917, NedJur 1917 p. 600; HR 25 February 1926, NedJur 1926 p. 361). Komplikationen enstehen aber deshalb, weil nicht alle Anfechtungen ex tunc wirken und weil der Richter in einigen Fällen die Rechtswirkungen einer Anfechtung nach Ermessen modifizieren kann. Problematisch ist auch, dass einige Anfechtungsgründe mit anderen Gründen für die Beendigung eines Vertrages konkurrieren und deshalb im Einzelfall die für die letzteren vorgesehenen Rückabwicklungsmechanismen Vorrang beanspruchen können. Anfechtbare, aber nicht angefochtene Rechtsgeschäfte bleiben gültig. Zur Anfechtung berechtigen jedenfalls bestimmte Willensmängel (CC arts. 3:44 [rechtswidrige Drohung, Betrug, missbräuchliche Ausnutzung bestimmter Umstände: siehe z.B. HR 29 May 1964, NedJur 1965 no. 104 p. 385] und 6:228 [Irrtum]). Man kann sich zeitgleich sowohl auf Irrtum als auch auf einen der anderen Anfechtungsgründe berufen; außerdem kann der Irrende statt anzufechten auch Aufhebung des Vertrages wegen Nichterfüllung verlangen, z.B. dann, wenn der Verkäufer dem Käufer bestimmte Eigenschaften der Kaufsache vorgespiegelt hat. Im Kaufrecht kommt es auch wegen CC arts. 7:17 und 7:23 besonders häufig dazu, dass der Käufer zwischen seinen anfechtungs- und seinen gewährleistungsrechtlichen Rechtsbehelfen wählen kann. Das besondere Anfechtungsregime der actio Pauliana (Gläubigerbenachteiligung) ist in CC art. 3:45 geregelt; zahlreiche Sondervorschriften über die Anfechtbarkeit der Rechtsgeschäfte einer juristischen Person finden sich im zweiten Buch des Zivilgesetzbuches. Ein besonderes Anfechtungsregime gilt unter CC arts. 6:229 und 6:230 für Verträge, die zu dem Zweck geschlossen werden, ein zwischen den Parteien vermeintlich bestehendes Rechtsverhältnis zu erweitern. Auf Verlangen einer Partei kann der Richter hier statt der Vernichtung des Vertrages auch seine Anpassung an die Umstände des Einzelfalls anordnen. Ein weiteres spezielles Anfechtungsregime ist in CC arts. 6:233 und 6:234 zum Schutz vor vorschneller Bindung an Allgemeine Geschäftsbedingungen kodifiziert.

41. ESTONIAN GPCCA §§ 86-89 nennen die allgemeinen Unwirksamkeitsgründe für Rechtsgeschäfte (insbesondere Verstoß gegen ein Gesetz oder die guten Sitten).

Gemäß GPCCA § 90(1) kann ein Rechtsgeschäft (mit Wirkung ex tunc) annulliert werden, wenn es unter dem Einfluss eines relevanten Irrtums abgeschlossen wurde oder infolge fraud, threat or violence zustandekam; außerdem in allen Fällen eines groben Ungleichgewichts von Leistung und Gegenleistung (Wucher). Was auf der Basis eines solchen Vertrages erlangt wurde, muss nach den Vorschriften des Rechts der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung zurückgegeben werden (GPCCA § 84(1)). This corresponds to LOA § 1028(1) under which performance of an obligation that ceased to exist amounts to an unjustified enrichment. The declaration of annulment must be made within certain time limits. Unter LOA § 1034(1) darf sich der Empfänger einer Leistung aus einem gegenseitigen Vertrag nur dann auf den Wegfall seiner Bereicherung berufen und gleichwohl dasjenige, was er geleistet hat, zurückfordern, wenn der Vertrag wegen mangelnder Geschäftsfähigkeit oder infolge von Drohung oder Gewalt nichtig ist.

42. Zur Rechtslage in den NORDIC countries see PEL Unj.Enr. Introduction C78. Die Rückabwicklung angefochtener Verträge folgt vertragsrechtlichen Regeln.

III. Rückforderbarkeit von Zuwendungen an den Vertragspartner in vermeintlicher Erfüllung eines aus anderem Grunde nichtigen Vertrages

(a) Der Grundsatz

43. Die Rückforderbarkeit von Zuwendungen an den Vertragspartner in vermeintlicher Erfüllung eines aus anderem Grunde nichtigen Vertrages folgt gewöhnlich denselben Regeln wie die Rückforderbarkeit von Zuwendungen unter einem mit Wirkung ex tunc angefochtenen Vertrag. Nur einige wenige Besonderheiten sind zu beachten. Unter FRENCH CC art. 1131 ist eine Verpflichtung unwirksam, wenn sie grundlos (sans cause), mit einer Scheinbegründung (fausse cause) oder wegen eines rechtswidrigen Grundes (cause illicite) eingegangen wurde. Ohne Grund ist z.B. ein Vertrag über die Versicherung einer bereits verbrannten Sache (Cass.civ. 27 February 1990, Bull.civ. 1990, I, no. 52), oder ein Leibrentenvertrag, wenn der Käufer weiß, dass der Verkäufer in sehr kurzer Frist sterben wird. In der BELGIAN Rechtsprechung ist die cause als die Daseinsberechtigung der eigenen Verpflichtung definiert worden (CA Liège 28 June 2002, no. JL026S2_1, no. de rôle 1998/RG/14). Der jeweilige Einsatz der Parteien muss einen Grund haben, sonst ist der Vertrag nichtig. Folglich führten die allgemeinen Regeln über die ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung und die Prinzipien des CC art. 1131 zu identischen Ergebnissen (CA Liège 26 May 2003, no. JL035Q1_1, no. de rôle 2000RG919). Besteht bei einem aleatorischen Vertrag (wie dem Leibrentenvertrag) in Wahrheit gar kein Unsicherheitsfaktor (in diesem Fall: der Todeszeitpunkt), so ist der Vertrag mangels cause nichtig, und zwar selbst dann, wenn die speziellen Voraussetzungen der CC arts. 1974 und 1975 nicht erfüllt sind (Cass. 20 June 2005, no. JC056K4_1, no. de rôle C040549F). SPANISH CC art. 1303 ist applicable to both void and avoided contracts (see II39 above). Die Gerichte können die Rückabwicklung eines nichtigen Vertrages sogar ohne einen entsprechenden Parteiantrag anordnen (TS 24 February 1992, RAJ 1992 (1) no. 1513 p. 1883; TS 11 February 2003, RAJ 2003 (1) no. 1004 p. 1906). CC art. 1303 setzt im Übrigen nichts anderes als den Nachweis voraus, dass die betreffende Leistung auf einen nichtigen Vertrag hin erbracht worden ist (Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán, Las nulidades de los contratos, 228). Abgesehen von den Sonderregeln für Verträge, die wegen fehlender Geschäftsfähigkeit oder wegen eines Gesetzesverstoßes nichtig sind (CC arts. 1304 and 1305-1306), existiert ein rückabwicklungsrechtliches Sonderregime außerdem auch für Verträge, die wegen eines Verstoßes gegen strafrechtliche Vorschriften unwirksam sind (CP arts. 109-111; see e.g. TS 27 October 2001, RAJ 2001 (5) no. 9348 p. 14784); in Fällen dieser Art kann ein Rückforderungsrecht sogar gegen Dritte gerichtet sein, der Anspruch also eine quasi-dingliche Wirkung entfalten (näher Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 326).

44. In ITALY sind die aufgrund eines nichtigen Vertrages erbrachten Leistungen nach den Regeln des Rechts der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld zurückzugeben; prozessual bedarf es dafür (anders als in Spanien) eines entsprechenden Parteiantrages (Cass. 1 August 2001, no. 10498, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 1519). Dass das Recht auf Erhebung der Nichtigkeitsklage nicht verjährt, bedeutet nicht, dass auch der Rückforderungsanspruch unverjährbar wäre (CC art. 1422; see Cass. 1 August 2001, no. 10498 loc. cit.). Die Anwendbarkeit der Regeln über die Zahlung einer Nichtschuld ist zeitweilig mit dem Argument bekämpft worden, die condictio indebiti betreffe nur Fälle, in welchen die Parteien nie in einer rechtlichen Beziehung zueinander gestanden hätten (so z.B. Barcellona, Riv.trim.dir.proc.civ. 1965, 11, 28; Gazzoni, Riv.Dir.Civ. 1973, I, 287 und Argiroffi, Riv.Dir.Civ. 1976, II, 610); die Existenz eines nichtigen Vertrages genüge bereits, um bei Untergang oder Verschlechterung einer individuellen Sache die Anwendbarkeit von CC art. 2037 auszuschließen (Stolfi, Teoria del negozio giuridico, 71). Die Rechtsprechung ist dem jedoch nicht gefolgt (Cass. 12 March 1973, no. 685, Foro it. 1974, I, 2783). Ein weiteres Koordinierungsproblem zwischen dem Nichtigkeitsrecht und dem System der CC arts. 2033-2040 (Zahlung einer Nichtschuld) betrifft die Rechtsstellung eines Dritten, der das vom solvens Geleistete vom accipiens erworben hat. Denn die Nichtigkeit kann grundsätzlich jedermann gegenüber geltend gemacht werden, das Recht der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld operiert aber grundsätzlich nur zwischen solvens und accipiens. Die heute herrschende Lehre hält aber gleichwohl an der Anwendbarkeit des Rechts der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld fest. Das Gesetz gestatte nicht, zwischen verschiedenen condictiones zu unterscheiden; außerdem folge der Rückforderungsanspruch nun einmal nicht aus Vertrag, sondern aus Gesetz (Moscati, Pagamento dell'indebito, arts. 2028-2042, p. 136, 141).

45. AUSTRIAN CC § 877 wird (i.V.m. CC §§ 1431 und 1435) über seinen Wortlaut hinaus auch auf die Rückforderung von Leistungen auf einen wegen Dissenses, Scheingeschäfts (OGH 12 February 1970, SZ 43/38), Geschäftsunfähigkeit (OGH 18 June 1985, SZ 58/105; OGH 24 June 1982, SZ 60/119) oder aus anderem Grunde nichtigen Vertrages angewandt. Wegen des Irrtumserfordernisses muss allerdings zwischen verschiedenen Nichtigkeitsgründen unterschieden werden. Eine Rückforderung im Fall des Dissenses setzt einen Irrtum über die Wirksamkeit der Verpflichtung voraus (CC § 1431; Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Bollenberger], ABGB^{2}, § 877 no. 2). Ist der Vertrag wegen ursprünglicher Unmöglichkeit nichtig, so wird demjenigen, der irrtümlich auf diesen Vertrag geleistet hat, eine condictio indebiti, andernfalls eine Kondiktion wegen Zweckverfehlung (CC § 1435) gewährt. Bei gesetz- oder sittenwidrigen Verträgen kommt es dagegen nicht auf den Irrtum, sondern auf den Zweck der Verbotsnorm an (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II^{13}, 280): wer bewuchert wurde, kann die Zinsen selbst dann zurück fordern, wenn er sie in Kenntnis der Gesetzwidrigekit des Vertrages gezahlt hat (Rummel, ÖJZ 1978, 258). Andererseits kann ein Darlehen nicht zurückgefordert werden, das zur Finanzierung eines verbotenen Spiels gegeben wurde (CC § 1174(2); näher OGH 2 June 1986, SZ 59/177; OGH 26 July 1990, SZ 63/139; OGH 6 September 1995, 7Ob 579/95). Für PORTUGAL ist in Ergänzung zu II41 above nur noch darauf hinzuweisen, dass die Nichtigkeit eines Vertrages jederzeit von jedermann geltend und vom Gericht von Amts wegen ausgesprochen werden kann (CC art. 286). Die Nichtigkeitswirkungen treten ipso jure und unabhängig vom Willen der Parteien ein; freilich ist es in der Praxis das (lediglich deklaratorische, nicht constitutive)

Nichtigkeitsurteil, welches den Rechtschein eines wirksamen Vertrags endgültig zerstört (Schlechtriem, Restitution und Bereicherungsausgleich in Europa I, ch. 3, no. 165 mit fn. 488). Die wichtigsten Nichtigkeitsgründe finden sich in CC arts. 220 (Formmangel), 240(2) (Simulation), 244(2) (geheimer Vorbehalt), 245 (nicht ernst gemeinte Erklärung), 246 (fehlendes Erklärungsbewusstsein; Zwang), 280 (Unmöglichkeit, Unbestimmtheit, Verstoß gegen die guten Sitten oder den ordre public) und 294 (Verstoß gegen zwingendes Gesetzesrecht). Im Falle der Nichtigkeit richten sich die Rückforderungsansprüche nach CC art. 289, nicht nach Bereicherungsrecht.

46. Unter GERMAN law bedeutet Nichtigkeit, dass das betreffende Rechtsgeschäft zu keinem Zeitpunkt die bezweckten Rechtswirkungen hervorbringen konnte. Nichtigkeit wirkt ex tunc gegenüber jedermann, bedarf keiner Geltendmachung und ist im Prozess von Amts wegen zu berücksichtigen (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[66], Überblick vor § 104, no. 27). Die Rückabwicklung nichtiger Verträge erfolgt nach den Regeln des Bereicherungsrechts (CC § 812(1) first sentence, first alternative. Die Rückabwicklung nichtiger Dienst- und Geschäftsbesorgungsverträge wird von der Rechtsprechung allerdings oft über das Recht der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag vollzogen; eine Anwendung des Bereicherungsrechts scheidet dann aus, weil die berechtigte Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag einen Rechtsgrund i.S. CC § 812 darstellt (BGH 30 September 1993, NJW 1993, 3196; BGH 10 April 1969, NJW 1969, 1205, 1207). Bei in Vollzug gesetzten Gesellschafts- und Arbeitsverträgen können die meisten Nichtigkeitsgründe nur mit Wirkung ex nunc geltend gemacht werden (Heinrichs loc.cit. no. 36). In GREECE ist teils von "ungültigen", teils von "unwirksamen", teils von "nichtigen" und teils von "mangelhaften" Verträgen die Rede. Als Oberbegriff dient heute wohl die "Ungültigkeit" (Avgoustianakis, NoB 39 [1991] 1340, 1365). Er umfasst sogen. "Nichtgeschäfte" (z.B. im Falle des Dissenses), nichtige und angefochtene Geschäfte (Papantoniou, Genikes Arches tou Astikou dikaiou, 417; Georgiades, Genikes Arches Astiku dikaiu, 285). Nichtige (ungültige) Rechtsgeschäfte gelten als nicht vorgenommen (CC art. 180). Die Rückabwicklung bereits erbrachter Leistungen unterliegt dem Bereicherungsrecht (Schlechtriem, Restitution und Bereicherungsausgleich in Europa I, ch. 3, no. 38).

47. Die Nichtigkeit ist eine der beiden in HUNGARIAN CC § 234(1) genannten Ungültigkeitsarten. Auf die Nichtigkeit kann sich jedermann berufen; sie muss nicht in einem besonderen Verfahren oder innerhalb einer bestimmten Frist geltend gemacht werden. Die rückabwicklungsrechtlichen Folgen sind Gegenstand der vertragsrechtlichen Vorschriften in CC § 237. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 190(3) qualifiziert demgegenüber die in diesen Fällen einschlägige condictio sine causa als ein Stück Bereicherungsrecht. So verhält es sich auch unter BULGARIAN LOA art. 55(1) first alternative. Alle Leistungen auf ein nichtiges Rechtsgeschäft sind i.S.d. Bestimmung "ohne Grund" empfangen.

48. ESTONIAN courts have dealt with a number of cases where the lendor of a loan denied to pay the agreed interest settled, alleging that the high percentage of the interest was contrary to good morals. The Supreme Court found that the unproportionally high interest rate alone was not a sufficient ground for invalidity; rather, a party must prove that the interest rate is a result of gross disparity, and must annul the transaction on that reason (Supreme Court 29 January 2007, judgment no. 3-2-1-137-06 in civil matters, with further references). Nichtigkeit bedeutet Unwirksamkeit ex tunc; Basis des Rückforderungsanspruchs ist das Bereicherungsrecht (LOA § 1028(2)). Die Rückforderung ist ausgeschlossen, wenn ihre Gewährung dem Zweck des Nichtigkeitsgrundes widersprechen würde (LOA § 1028 (3)).

49. Zur Rechtslage in den NORDIC countries see PEL Enj.Enr. Introduction C78. Die Rückabwicklung nichtiger Verträge folgt vertragsrechtlichen Regeln.

(b) Besonderheiten zugunsten Geschäftsunfähiger

50. Ist der Vertrag nichtig, weil eine oder beide Parteien nicht voll geschäftsfähig waren, so kann die Rückforderung unter bestimmten Voraussetzungen eingeschränkt oder ausgeschlossen sein. Unter FRENCH CC art. 1241 i.V.m art. 1312 ist eine geschäftsunfähige Person nur dann zur Rückgabe des Erlangten verpflichtet, wenn sie im Zeitpunkt der Klageerhebung durch die "Bezahlung" noch tatsächlich bereichert ist. Unter CC art. 1310 muss ein Minderjähriger allerdings alles, was er erhalten hat, restituieren, wenn der Erwerb auf einem Delikt oder Quasidelikt beruht. Diese Regel soll im Wege der Analogie auf sämtliche nicht voll geschäftsfähige Personen anwendbar sein (Ghestin, Régime des créances et des dettes, no. 841). Das entspricht der Rechtslage in BELGIUM. Belgian CC arts. 1241 und 1310 stimmen mit den entsprechenden Vorschriften des französischen CC überein; Belgian CC art. 1312 findet schon seinem Wortlaut nach auch auf interdits (CC art. 489) Anwendung; die Vorschrift umfasst alle nicht voll geschäftsfähigen Personen (de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge II(1)^{3}, no. 823).

51. SPAIN quailifies incapacity as a case of anulabilidad. Under CC art. 1304 ist der Rückforderungsanspruch auf die Sache oder den Preis beschränkt, durch welche der Geschäftsunfähige bereichert ist. Das entspricht der Regelung des CC art. 1163, wonach Zahlungen an einen Geschäftsunfähigen oder an einen Minderjährigen nur wirksam sind, wenn sie zu seinem Vorteil erfolgen (näher zum Verhältnis dieser beiden Regeln Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán, Las nulidades de los contratos, 282). CC art. 1304 kommt nur zur Anwendung, wenn sich die Unwirksamkeit des Vertrages aus der fehlenden Geschäftsunfähigkeit des Leistungsempfängers ergibt. Die Rechtsprechung wendet die Regel andererseits auch in den Fällen of so-called natural incapacity an, obwohl dies ein Fall ist which is usually considered an example of nulidad (TS 9 February 1949, RAJ 1949 no. 99 p. 67; TS 15 February 1952, RAJ 1952 no. 288 p. 203; Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 283-284). Die Frage, was der nicht geschäftsfähige Empfänger zu resituieren hat, entscheidet sich nach dem modelo diferencial. Es kommt auf eine tatsächlich noch vorhandene Wertsteigerung im Vermögen des Empfängers an; eine Ersparnis genügt (Carrasco Perera, ADC 1988, 5, 92-97). Der bloße Erhalt der Sache oder des Preises reichen für eine Bereicherung nicht aus (TS 15 February 1952 loc. cit.). Die Beweislast dafür, dass der Minderjährige oder die geschäftsunfähige Partei noch bereichert ist, trägt nach der Rechtsprechung der Kläger (TS 9 February 1949 loc. cit.; kritisch Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I^{6}, 601).

52. Unter ITALIAN CC art. 1443 ist eine geschäftsunfähige Person nur insoweit zur Herausgabe verpflichtet, als die empfangene Leistung zu ihrem Vorteil verwendet worden ist. Eine entsprechende Regelung findet sich im Recht der ungeschuldeten Leistung (CC art. 2039); der Schutz umfasst auch bösgläubige Geschäftsunfähige. Das Gesetz vermutet widerleglich, dass geschäftsunfähige Personen nicht in der Lage sind, aus einer empfangenen Leistung denselben Nutzen zu ziehen wie ein Geschäftsfähiger. Folglich hat der solvens die Beweislast dafür, dass im konkreten Fall eine Ausnahmesituation vorliegt. CC art. 1443 ist auf Fälle zugeschnitten, in welchen die Geschäftsunfähigkeit bereits im Zeitpunkt des Vertragsschlusses vorlag, CC art. 2039 auf Fälle der Geschäftsunfähigkeit im Zeitpunkt der acceptio. AUSTRIAN CC § 1433 hebt den Kondiktionsausschluss für formungültige Verpflichtungen, Naturalobligationen und wissentliche Zahlungen einer Nichtschuld (CC § 1432) für Geschäftsunfähige wieder auf. Aus CC § 151(3) (wonach bei altersüblichen Geschäften Minderjähriger die Erfüllung den Mangel der Geschäftsfähigkeit heilt), wird aber geschlossen, dass Minderjährigen in diesen Fällen kein Rückforderungsrecht zusteht; CC § 1433 soll dagegen wieder gelten, wenn der Minderjährige in den Fällen des CC § 151(2) mit ihm zur freien Verfügung überlassenen oder aus eigenem Erwerbseinkommen stammendem Geld bezahlt hat (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB II(3)[3], § 1433 no. 1; Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Koziol], ABGB[2], § 1433 no. 2; contra Schwimann [-Mader], ABGB VII[3], § 1433 no. 2). Ist die bereicherte Person geschäftsunfähig, so haftet sie nur, wenn die Leistung bei ihr noch vorhanden ist oder zu ihrem Vorteil verwendet wurde (OGH 24 June 1987, SZ 60/119; OGH 15 May 1991, JBl 1992, 39); der Geschäftsunfähige kann sich stets auf den nachträglichen Wegfall der Bereicherung berufen (OGH 12 February 2002, SZ 2002/21).

53. Under PORTUGUESE law sind in der Regel Minderjährige (CC art. 123) und Entmündigte (CC art. 138) geschäftsunfähig; Minderjährige und Entmündigte unterliegen grundsätzlich denselben Regeln (CC art. 139). Die Geschäftsunfähigkeit berechtigt zur Anfechtung der Willenserklärung, ist aber kein Nichtigkeitsgrund. Für das Rückforderungsrecht unter CC arts. 289 und 290) ist das zwar ohne Belang. Es kann aber im Rahmen von CC art. 287 eine Rolle spielen, wonach nur die Partei, in deren Interesse das Gesetz die Anfechtbarkeit vorsieht, sie auch gerichtlich geltend machen kann. Unter CC art. 289(1) kann ein Minderjähriger nur dann Rückzahlung des Kaufpreises verlangen, wenn der Kaufvertrag wirksam angefochten wurde; es muss also Anfechtungsklage (CC art. 125) erhoben werden. Der Minderjährige kann sich, da die Rückabwicklung nicht bereicherungsrechtlichen Regeln folgt, aber nicht auf eine zwischenzeitliche Entreicherung berufen. Die entsprechende Regelung im alten portugiesischen Zivilgesetzbuch und im Entwurf ist nicht in das Gesetz übernommen worden, möglicherweise aus Versehen (Schlechtriem, Restitution und Bereicherungsausgleich in Europa I, ch. 3, no. 300 mit fn. 899). Zu den Rechtsgeschäften, die ein Minderjähriger wirksam tätigen kann, gehören u.a. Rechtsgeschäfte des täglichen Lebens, die seiner natürlichen Einsichtsfähigkeit entsprechen und nur geringwertige Ausgaben oder Verfügungen mit sich bringen (CC art. 127(1)).

54. Under GERMAN CC § 105(1) sind Willenserklärungen eines Geschäftsunfähigen nichtig; die Rückabwicklung bereits erbrachter Leistungen erfolgt deshalb über das Bereicherungsrecht. Geschäfte eines volljährigen Geschäftsunfähigen sind nach CC § 105a allerdings wirksam, wenn es sich dabei um ein Geschäft des täglichen Lebens handelt, das mit geringwertigen Mitteln bewirkt werden kann und bewirkt worden ist; insoweit ist eine Rückforderung folglich ausgeschlossen. Besonderheiten gelten ferner im Arbeits- und Gesellschaftsrecht. Hat ein Geschäftsunfähiger einen Arbeitsvertrag geschlossen und bereits Arbeit geleistet, so soll er unter CC § 242 (Treu und Glauben) trotz der Nichtigkeit des Vertrages seinen Anspruch auf das vereinbarte Entgelt behalten. Ähnliche Einschränkungen der Nichtigkeitsfolgen sollen zugunsten geschäftsunfähiger Personen gelten, die einen gemäß CC § 105(1) unwirksamen Gesellschaftsvertrag geschlossen und der Gesellschaft Arbeit oder Kapital zur Verfügung gestellt haben. Der bereicherungsrechtliche Schutz von nicht voll geschäftsfähigen Personen wird über die Nichtanwendung der sogen. “Saldotheorie” verwirklicht. Sie kann im Ergebnis dazu führen, dass sich eine Partei eines gegenseitigen Vertrages nicht auf eine Entreicherung hinsichtlich des Empfangenen berufen und gleichzeitig das Geleistete zurückfordern kann. Einer nicht voll geschäftsfähigen gutgläubigen Partei bleibt ihr bereicherungsrechtlicher Herausgabeanspruch in vollem Umfang erhalten (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 818, no. 49). Bei der Frage der Gut- bzw. Bösgläubigkeit wird überwiegend zwischen Leistungs- und Eingriffskondiktion differenziert. Im Rahmen der Leistungskondiktion kommt es auf die Kenntnis des gesetzlichen Vertreters (typischerweise die Eltern eines Minderjährigen), im Rahmen der Eingriffskondiktion auf den Minderjährigen selbst an. In diesem Fall werden die Regeln über die persönliche Haftung von Minderjährigen aus Delikt entsprechend angewendet (Sprau loc.cit. § 819, no. 4; BGH 7 January 1971, BGHZ 55, 128). Handelt es sich nicht um eine beschränkt geschäftsfähige (z.B. Kinder zwischen 7 und 17 Jahren), sondern um eine vollständig geschäftsunfähige Person, entscheidet stets der Kenntnisstand des gesetzlichen Vertreters (MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 819, no. 7). Unter GREEK CC art. 130 sind die Rechtsgeschäfte einer geschäftsunfähigen Person (CC art. 128: Kinder vor Vollendung des 10. Lebensjahres und Personen, die unter vollständiger gerichtlicher Betreuung stehen) absolut nichtig. Dasselbe gilt für die Geschäfte einer im maßgeblichen Zeitpunkt geistig gestörten Person (CC art. 131). Absolut nichtig sind auch Rechtsgeschäfte von Minderjährigen, die das 10. Lebensjahr bereits vollendet haben, sofern sie durch sie nicht lediglich rechtliche Vorteile erlangen (A.P. 419/1971, NoB 19 [1971] 1118; CFI Athens 14296/ 1974, NoB 24 [1976] 332). Der bereicherungsrechtliche Rückforderungsanspruch gegen solche Personen kann im Einzelfall an ihrem besonderen Schutzbedürfnis scheitern (Stathopoulos, Axiosis adikaiologitou ploutismou, 263). Außerdem kann sich ein Minderjähriger nach beiderseitigem Leistungsaustausch auf einen Wegfall seiner Bereicherung berufen und trotzdem das Geleistete zurückfordern, wenn sein Vertragspartner von der Geschäftsunfähigkeit Kenntnis hatte (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopulos], art. 904, no. 100).

55. HUNGARIAN CC §§ 13/B (beschränkt geschäftsfähige und geschäftsunfähige Minderjährige) und 16/A (entmündigte Personen) regeln die sog. relative Nichtigkeit, d.h. eine Nichtigkeit, auf welche sich nur die Partei berufen kann, welche die Rechtsordnung schützen will. Allerdings haftet derjenige, der die andere Seite hinsichtlich seiner Geschäftsfähigkeit täuscht, auf Schadenersatz und kann deshalb sogar zur Erfüllung des Vertrages verpflichtet werden. Der Schutz der nicht voll geschäftsfähigen Person verwirklicht sich durch das ihr eingeräumte Wahlrecht. Sie kann darauf verzichten, die Nichtigkeit geltend zu machen; dann ist der Vertrag faktisch wirksam. Oder sie macht die Nichtigkeit geltend; dann wird der Vertrag nach den gewöhnlichen Nichtigkeitsregeln rückabgewickelt. BULGARIAN LOA art. 58 beschränkt die bereicherungsrechtliche Haftung von Personen, welche nicht voll geschäftsfähig sind, auf dasjenige, was sich noch in ihrem Vermögen befindet. Hat der nicht voll geschäftsfähige Empfänger den empfangenen Gegenstand weiterveräußert, ohne schon Zahlung für ihn empfangen zu haben, kann sich der solvens mit der allgemeinen Bereicherungsklage nur gegen den Dritten wenden (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 593). Für den Schutz des LOA art. 58 ist erforderlich, aber auch genügend, dass der accipiens im Zeitpunkt der gerichtlichen Geltendmachung des Kondiktionsanspruchs nicht voll geschäftsfähig war (so jedenfalls Goleminov, Neosnovatelno obogatyavane, 80; anders aber noch Vassilev loc.cit. 592). Das SLOVENAIN LOA kennt einen besonderen bereicherungsrechtlichen Schutz für nicht voll geschäftsfähige Personen nicht. Allerdings beschränkt LOA art. 98 ihre anfechtungsrechtliche Haftung auf den Fall, dass sie der anderen Seite vorgetäuscht haben, geschäftsfähig zu sein.

56. Unter DUTCH CC art. 6:209 treffen einen Geschäftsunfähigen, der eine ungeschuldete Leistung empfangen hat, die Verpflichtungen zur Rückgabe der empfangenen Sache (bzw. ihres Wertes) und der Früchte nur insoweit wie ihm das Empfangene tatsächlich zum Vorteil gereicht hat oder in den Gewahrsam seines gesetzlichen Vertreters gelangt ist. Dem entspricht CC art. 6:31 (Erfüllung von Verbindlichkeiten im Allgemeinen); für geschuldete wie für ungeschuldete Leistungen gilt folglich dieselbe Regel. Um eine ungeschuldete (rechtsgrundlose) Leistung handelt es sich, wenn der gesetzliche Vertreter das von der geschäftsunfähigen Person vorgenommene Rechtsgeschäft gemäß CC art. 3:32(2) angefochten und dadurch ab initio vernichtet hat. Der Schutz des Geschäftsunfähigen hängt nicht von seiner Gutgläubigkeit ab. Denkbar ist allerdings, dass der Geschäftsunfähige bzw. seine Eltern oder sein Vormund aus Delikt haften. Dem Geschäftsunfähigen hat eine Leistung tatsächlich zum Vorteil gereicht, wenn sie seinem Lebensunterhalt diente oder ihm anderweitig körperlich oder geistig nützlich war (näher CFI Zwolle 31 May 2006, LJN AY5733). Bei der Rückabwicklung von Leistungen auf einen gegenseitigen Vertrag ist CC art. 6:278 zu beachten, wonach zwischenzeitliche Veränderungen des Wertverhältnisses von Leistung und Gegenleistung durch eine Nachzahlung kompensiert werden müssen. CC art. 6:209 hat in der Praxis bislang nur eine geringe Rolle gespielt. Auch under ESTONIAN LOA § 1034(1) kann eine geschäftsunfähige Person dem gegen sie gerichteten Rückforderungsanspruch den Wegfall der empfangenen Bereicherung entgegengehalten.

57. Die NORDIC countries regeln die Folgen eines Vertrages, der wegen fehlender Geschäftsfähigkeit (Minderjährigkeit; nicht geschäftsfähige Erwachsene under guardianship) unwirksam ist, in besonderen Gesetzen (SWEDEN: Parental Code [föräldrabalk] chap. 9 § 7; FINLAND: Act on Guardianship [lag om förmyndarskap of 1 April 1999/442]; DENMARK: Act on Guardianship [lovbekendtgørelse of 20 August 2007, no. 1015, værgemålslov]). Die jeweilige Leistung ist in natura oder, wenn das nicht möglich ist, dem Werte nach zu restituieren. Der geschäftsfähige Partner kann sich nicht auf seinen guten Glauben berufen. Die geschäftsunfähige Person muss nur dann Wertersatz leisten, wenn die ihr erbrachte Leistung ihrem Unterhalt diente oder ihr aus anderem Grunde nützlich war. Ist das der Fall, hat sie das Empfangene aber unwirtschaftlich verwendet, so kann ihre Pflicht zum Wertersatz gemindert werden. Für den Wertersatz soll es nicht auf eine Bereicherung der geschäftsunfähigen Partei, sondern allein auf den Zweck und den Nutzen der empfangenen Leistung ankommen (Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[11], 231; Lejman, SvJT 1949, 641, 653). Die genannten Regeln verfolgen freilich den generellen Zweck, geschäftsunfähige Personen auf die von ihnen ersparten Aufwendungen haften zu lassen (Vinding Kruse, Restitutioner, 324).

(c) Besonderheiten für den Fall der Nichtigkeit wegen eines Formmangels

58. In einigen Ländern existieren Sonderregeln, welche die Rückforderbarkeit von Leistungen auf Verträge, die wegen eines Formmangels nichtig oder unwirksam sind, einschränken. FRANCE and BELGIUM zählen zwar nicht zu dieser Gruppe. Zu bedenken ist aber, dass ein Vertrag in beiden Rechtsordnungen wegen eines Formmangels rechts- bzw. gesetzwidrig sein kann. Belgische Gerichte wenden z.B. im Falle von Werkverträgen, die nichtig sind, weil der Unternehmer nicht über die erforderlichen schriftlichen Genehmigungen verfügt, die aus den nemo auditur propriam turpitudinem allegans- und in pari causa turpitudinis cessat repetitio-Grundsätzen abgeleitete Rückforderungssperre an (CA Brussels 9 Juni 2006, no. °JB0669B_1, no. de rôle 2005 AR 632; CA Liège 4 February 2003, no. JL03241_1, no. de rôle 2001RG349). In SPAIN führt ein Verstoß gegen ein gesetzliches Formerfordernis nach traditioneller, wenngleich nicht unbestrittener Auffassung zur nulidad of the contract (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 578; Albaladejo [-Carrasco Perera], Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales I(1), art. 6 p. 834-837). Ebenfalls umstritten ist, ob ein Verstoß gegen die Regeln, welche zum Schutz von Verbrauchern Schriftform verlangen, die nulidad oder lediglich die anulabilidad of the contract bewirkt (näher Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán, Las nulidades de los contratos, 50; López/Montés/Roca [-Valpuesta Fernánedez], Derecho de Obligaciones y Contratos, 247).

59. Auch ITALY kennt keine rückabwicklungsrechtlichen Sonderregeln für formnichtige (CC art. 1325 no. 4) Verträge. Wer auf einen lediglich mündlich geschlossenen Grundstückskaufvertrag zahlt, kann den Kaufpreis zurück verlangen (Cass. 5 August 1947, no. 1445, Foro it. 1948, I, 464). Verbraucherkreditverträge unterliegen nach Decreto legislativo 1 September 1993, no. 385 (Suppl.ord. no. 92 alla Gazz. Uff. of 30 September 1993, no. 230 - Testo unico delle leggi in materia bancaria e creditizia) arts. 124 i.V.m. 117(1) der Schriftform; dem Verbraucher ist eine Kopie der Vertragsurkunde auszuhändigen. Die Nichtigkeit des Vertrages kann nur vom Verbraucher geltend gemacht werden (loc.cit. art. 127(2); sog. nullità relativa). Sonstige spezielle Vorschriften hinsichtlich der Rückforderbarkeit von Leistungen auf formunwirksame Verträge existieren nicht (Vettori, Materiali e commenti sul nuovo diritto dei contratti, 643-644). Wie überall, so sind auch in AUSTRIA Verträge grundsätzlich formfrei wirksam (CC § 883). Das ist nur dann anders, wenn die Parteien eine Form vereinbaren oder sie vom Gesetz vorgeschrieben wird. Letzteres ist nur selten der Fall; insbesondere unterliegen weder der Grundstücks- und der Unternehmenskauf noch Miet- und Kreditverträge einer besonderen gesetzlichen Form. Auch CC § 1432 misst Formvorschriften nur geringe Bedeutung zu, weil die Vorschrift ausdrücklich anordnet, dass Zahlungen auf eine Schuld, die nur wegen eines Formmangels ungültig ist, nicht zurückgefordert werden können. Die Vorschrift beruht auf der Überlegung, dass Formvorschriften nur vor Übereilung schützen wollen und dass es dieses Schutzes im Falle der Erfüllung nicht mehr bedarf (Schwimann [-Mader], ABGB VII^3, § 1432 no. 7). Bei der Verletzung von Formvorschriften, deren Zweck darüber hinausgeht (Information des Schuldners, Schutz Dritter) kommt es deshalb zu einer teleologischen Reduktion von CC § 1432 (Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III^2, no 15/7; Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB II(3)^3, § 1432 no. 5; contra Mader loc.cit.). Die Kondiktion bleibt möglich, wenn nach dem Zweck der Formvorschrift die Vermögensverschiebung selbst verhindert werden soll. So soll es z.B. bei der Verletzung der Form für Eheverträge (OGH 16 September 1959, SZ 32/108) liegen, nicht aber bei der Verletzung der Form von Bürgschafts- und Schenkungsverträgen (OGH 26 February 1996, SZ 69/40). Im letzteren Fall wird der Formmangel ohnehin durch Erfüllung geheilt. Bei Verträgen, für welche die Parteien eine Form vereinbart hatten, kann in der Annahme der Erfüllung außerdem eine konkludente Aufhebung der Formvereinbarung zu sehen sein (OGH 19 March 1974, JBl 1975, 161). Bei bei gegenseitigen Verträgen greift die Kondiktionssperre des CC § 1432 erst ein, wenn beide Seiten geleiset haben, es sei denn, die Form soll nur einen der Vertragspartner schützen (Mader loc.cit. no. 10).

60. Under PORTUGUESE CC art. 219 bedürfen Rechtsgeschäfte grundsätzlich keiner Form. Anders ist das nur, wenn das Gesetz (CC art. 220) oder die Parteien (CC art. 223; vgl. STJ 15 June 1999 BolMinJus 388 [1989] 473) etwas anderes vorschreiben. Verträge, die ohne Einhaltung der nötigen Form geschlossen werden, sind, sofern das Gesetz keine andere Rechtsfolge vorsieht, nichtig (CC art. 220). Im Mittelpunkt der rückabwicklungsrechtlichen Erörterungen stehen formnichtige Darlehensverträge. Nach CC art. 1143 bedürfen Darlehensverträge über € 20.000,- der notariellen Form, und Darlehensverträge über € 2.000,- der Unterschrift des Darlehensnehmers. Die Anwendung des Bereicherungsrechts wird auch hier abgelehnt (STJ 18 January 2007, Processo 06B4633; siehe bereits STJ 31 March 1993, BolMinJus 425 [1993] 534); die Rückabwicklung richtet sich nach Nichtigkeitsrecht (CC art. 289(1)). Unter den Voraussetzungen von CC art. 293 kann ein nichtiger Vertrag allerdings auch in einen wirksamen Vertrag umgedeutet werden. Eine solche conversão ist z.B. bei formnichtigen Grundstückskaufverträgen zugunsten eines wirksamen Verkaufsversprechens (CC art. 410) denkbar (STJ 15 October 1996, BolMinJus 460 [1996] 727; STJ 18 June 1996, BolMinJus 458 [1996] 281; Hörster, Parte geral, 600).

61. Auch in GERMANY bedürfen Rechtsgeschäfte grundsätzlich keiner Form; Ausnahmen müssen gesetzlich (z.B. CC §§ 311b(1), 518(1), 766) oder vertraglich bestimmt sein. Bei Nichteinhaltung der entsprechenden Formvorschrift ordnet CC § 125 die Nichtigkeit des Rechtsgeschäfts an. Allerdings führt die Erfüllung des Vertrages in einer Reihe von Fällen zur Heilung des Formmangel (z.B. §§ 311b(1)(ii), 518(2), 766 third sentence). Bei vollzogenen Gesellschafts- und Arbeitsverträgen wirkt die Geltendmachung eines Formmangels nur ex nunc (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[66], § 125, no. 10). Die bereicherungsrechtliche Rückabwicklung einer Leistung auf eine formungültig eingegangene Verpflichtung erfolgt über CC § 812(1)(i) first alternative (Erman [-Westermann], BGB II[11], § 812, no. 46). Wird eine Leistung auf einen formnichtigen Vertrag in der Erwartung erbracht, dass der formgültige Abschluss demnächst nachgeholt wird, so handelt es sich bereicherungsrechtlich um eine condictio ob rem (CC § 812(1)(ii) second alternative). Das hat die Nichtanwendbarkeit von CC § 814 (Rückforderungsausschluss bei Kenntnis der Nichtschuld) zur Folge (Staudinger [-W. Lorenz], BGB [1999], § 812, no. 110). Oft handelt es sich um Grundstücksgeschäfte, bei denen der Käufer auf den formnichtigen Vertrag Leistungen erbracht hat, um den Verkäufer in Erwartung der Heilung des Formmangels zur Erfüllung zu veranlassen (RG 12 March 1920, RGZ 98, 237, 240; BGH 26 September 1975, NJW 1976, 237, 238; BGH 26 October 1979, NJW 1980, 451). Ein Vertrag, der unter Verletzung einer gesetzlichen (wichtig besonders CC art. 369: Grundstücksgeschäfte) oder vertraglichen Form (CC art. 159(2)) geschlossen wurde, ist auch unter GREEK CC art. 159 nichtig; erbrachte Leistungen sind bereicherungsrechtlich (CC art. 904) rückabzuwickeln. Wird in einer notariellen Urkunde über den Verkauf eines Grundstücks ein geringerer als der vereinbarte Preis angegeben, so soll daraus nicht die Nichtigkeit des ganzen Vertrages folgen, sondern nur die Nichtigkeit des nicht beurkundeten Vertragsteils. Der Verkäufer kann also nicht auf Zahlung des tatsächlich vereinbarten Preises klagen; der Käufer sei durch Zahlung nur des beurkundeten Preises auch nicht ungerechtfertigt bereichert. Hat der Käufer dagegen den vereinbarten Preis bereits bezahlt, beschränkt sich sein Rückforderungsanspruch auf den Betrag, um den der gezahlte Preis den objektiven Wert des Grundstücks übersteigt (A.P.1566/2001, NoB 50 [2002] 1662; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 44).

62. Auch unter HUNGARIAN CC § 217(1) ist ein Vertrag, der den gesetzlichen oder vertraglichen Formanforderungen nicht entspricht, nichtig, sofern nicht das Gesetz eine andere Rechtsfolge vorsieht. Die vertragliche Vereinbarung einer bestimmten Form muss ausdrücklich erfolgen; der Mangel einer nur vertraglich vereinbarten Form wird durch die Annahme der Erfüllung oder einer Teilerfüllung geheilt (CC § 217(2)). Unter Arbeitsgesetzbuch (Gesetz no. XXII/1992) § 76(2) muss der Arbeitsvertrag schriftlich niedergelegt werden. Für die Einhaltung dieser Form ist der Arbeitgeber verantwortlich. Deshalb kann sich auf die Ungültigkeit des Arbeitsvertrages wegen Nichteinhaltung dieser Form nur der Arbeitnehmer berufen, und dies auch nur innerhalb von 30 Tagen ab dem Arbeitsbeginn. Gesetz no. CXII/1996 über die Kreditinstitute und Finanzunternehmen § 213 betrifft den Verbraucherdarlehensvertrag. Er ist nichtig, wenn er die in dieser Vorschrift genannten Angaben nicht enthält; die Nichtigkeit kann allerdings nur vom Verbraucher geltend gemacht werden. Das BULGARISCHE Recht betrachtet den Mangel einer gesetzlich vorgeschrieben Form als Nichtigkeitsgrund (LOA art. 26(1)), mit der Folge, dass Leistungen auf einen solchen Vertrag als grundlos empfangen im

Sinne der condictio indebiti (LOA art. 55(1) first alternative) zurückzugewähren sind. Auch in SLOVENIA führt der Mangel einer gesetzlich vorgeschriebenen Form zur Nichtigkeit des Vertrags, es sei denn, dass dies dem Zweck der Formvorschrift widerspricht (LOA art. 55(1); siehe dazu Juhart and Plavšak [-Polajnar Pavčnik], Obligacijski zakonik I, art. 55, p. 370). Wirksam wird ein wegen Fehlens der Schriftform formnichtiger Vertrag dagegen in der Regel durch Erfüllung, es sei denn, die Wirksamkeit ist mit dem Zweck der Formvorschrift unvereinbar (LOA art. 58). Der Verstoß gegen eine vertraglich vereinbarte Form führt zur Nichtigkeit (LOA art. 55(2)); erbrachte Leistungen sind nach den Regeln des Bereicherungsrechts rückabzuwickeln.

63. Rechtsgeschäfte, die nicht der gesetzlich vorgeschriebenen Form genügen, sind auch unter DUTCH CC art. 3:39 nichtig, es sei denn das Gesetz ordnet eine andere Rechtsfolge an. Was für die Hauptverträge gilt, gilt auch für Vorverträge (CC art. 6:226). Formvorschriften, die der Gültigkeit eines Vertrages entgegenstehen, finden sich z.B. in CC art. 7A:1576i (Mietkauf); Gesetz über kollektive Arbeitsverträge (Wet op de collectieve arbeidsovereenkomst) art. 3; CC art. 37:2 (Kauf eines Wohnhauses); CC art. 7:766 (Bau eines Wohnhauses); CC arts. 7:613, 653, 619 und 667 (individuelle Arbeitsverträge). Einige Formmängel bewirken nur den Ausschluss bestimmter Beweismittel vor Gericht, andere anstelle der Nichtigkeit die Anfechtbarkeit des Geschäfts (siehe CC arts. 3:40, 4:108 und 109. Bei (nach der Grundregel) formnichtigen Verträgen stehen dem Richter einzelne besondere Gestaltungsbefugnisse zu (näher Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht II[12], no. 59 p. 57-58, no. 217-219 p. 214-217).

64. ESTONIAN GPCCA § 83(1) geht von denselben Grundsätzen aus: Der Verstoß gegen eine gesetzliche Formvorschrift führt zur Nichtigkeit des Vertrages, es sei denn, das Gesetz sieht eine andere Rechtsfolge vor oder der Zweck der Formvorschrift steht der Nichtigkeitsfolge entgegen. Formvorschirften unterliegen grundsätzlich der Privatautonomie, sofern das Gesetz nicht auch insoweit etwas anderes vorsieht (LOA § 11(1)). Zwingenden Rechts sind typischerweise Formvorschriften zugunsten von Verbrauchern; Grundstücksgeschäfte bedürfen der notariellen Form. Besondere bereicherungsrechtliche Vorschriften über die Rückabwicklung formnichtiger Verträge existieren nicht.

65. Zur Rückabwicklung formnichtiger Verträge sind in the NORDIC countries kaum Besonderheiten zu beachten. Allerdings gilt für Verbraucherkreditverträge zumindest in SWEDEN die allgemeine Regel, dass ein Verstoß gegen die gesetzlich vorgesehene Form nur insoweit zur Unwirksamkeit führt, als die entsprechende Vertragsklausel dem Verbraucher zum Nachteil gereicht (Consumer Credit Act [konsumentkreditlag 1992:830] § 9).

(d) Besonderheiten für gesetz- und sittenwidrige Verträge

66. See notes under VII.–6:103 (Illegality).

(e) Besonderheiten für einzelne Vertragstypen

67. In einigen Rechtsordnungen finden sich Sonderregeln, welche die bereicherungsrechtliche Rückabwicklung bei einzelnen Verträgen, insbesondere bei Arbeitsverträgen, Gesellschaftsverträgen und anderen Dauerschuldverhältnissen, trotz Nichtigkeit bzw. Unwirksamkeit einschränken oder ausschließen. Unter FRANZÖSISCHEM Recht kann ein Arbeitsvertrag z.B. nichtig sein, weil er mit einem Ausländer geschlossen wurde, der sich in Frankreich ohne Aufenthalts- und Arbeitserlaubnis aufhält. In solchen Fällen soll dem Arbeitnehmer trotz der Nichtigkeit bei Kündigung des Arbeitsverhältnisses (wegen der fehlenden Genehmigungen) ein Recht auf die ausstehende Vergütung, auf kündigungsbezogene Entschädigung, auf Abrechnung und ein Arbeitszeugnis zustehen (Cass.soc. 26 January 1983, Bull.civ. 1983, V, no. 33). Der Arbeitgeber könne sich nicht rückwirkend auf die Nichtigkeit berufen (ebenso im Falle eines Arbeitnehmers, der nicht über das erforderliche Diplom verfügte, bereits Cass.soc. 14 Juni 1967, Bull.civ. 1967, V, 474). Zu den Besonderheiten im Falle der Zuvielleistung von Lohn siehe bereits oben note I27.

68. SPANISH Workers' Statute (Estatuto de los Trabajadores; Real Decreto Legislativo 1/1995 of 24 March 1995) art. 9(2) provides that "if the labor contract is void, the employee is entitled to claim the remuneration for the work done as if the contract were valid". Schrifttum und Rechtsprechung begründen diese lex specialis zu CC arts. 1303 ff (TS [Labor Chamber] 5 October 1994, RAJ 1994 (4) no. 7748 p. 10126) mit dem Gedanken der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung (Concheiro del Río, El enriquecimiento injusto en el Derecho laboral, 85, 259; TS [Administrative Chamber] 28 May 1991, RAJ 1994 (4) no. 4215 p. 5791; TSJ La Rioja 16 March 2004, BDA AS 2004/1295; TSJ Comunitat Valenciana 29 November 2001, BDA JUR 2002/267328). Workers' Statute art. 9(2) wurde z.B. in Fällen angewandt, in welchen der Arbeitnehmer keine Aufenthaltserlaubnis hatte (TS [Administrative Chamber] 28 May 1991 loc.cit.) (heute stellt dies allerdings keinen Nichtigkeitsgrund [nulidad] mehr da; es sollte der Arbeitnehmerschutz bei Arbeitsunfällen verbessert werden: TS 9 June 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 3936 p. 7268). Außerhalb von Arbeitsverträgen muss im Rahmen der Rückabwicklung von unwirksamen oder mangelhaften Dauerschuldverhältnissen zwischen Kündigung, Nichtigkeit und Anfechtbarkeit unterschieden werden. Die Kündigung wirkt nur ex nunc und lässt deshalb den Rechtsgrund für bereits erbrachte Leistungen unberührt (TS 1 May 1950, RAJ 1950 no. 728 p. 431; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 724). Bei nichtigen Dienstleistungsverträgen scheint die herrschende Meinung dagegen an CC art. 1307 festzuhalten, wonach der Wert der erbrachten Dienstleistung nach objektivem Maßstab zu vergüten ist (Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán, Las nulidades de los contratos, 256-257; Díez-Picazo, La liquidación de las nulidades contractuales, § 3; López Beltrán, La nulidad, 65; CA Ciudad Real 30 March 2004, BDA JUR 2004/128779). Siehe im Übrigen auch noch note IV76 below.

69. Unter ITALIAN CC art. 2126 haben die Nichtigkeit und die Annullierung eines Arbeitsvertrages keine Wirkung für die Zeit, während der das Arbeitsverhältnis tatsächlich ausgeführt worden ist, es sei denn, die Nichtigkeit beruht auf der Unerlaubtheit des Gegenstandes oder des Rechtsgrundes der Tätigkeit. Ein Verstoß gegen Vorschriften, welche den Arbeitnehmer schützen sollen, berührt seinen Lohnanspruch nicht. CC art. 2126 betrifft aber nur abhängig Beschäftigte, nicht Dienstleistungen selbständiger Unternehmer (Cass. 25 March 1995, no. 3496, Rep.Giur.it. 1995, voce Arricchimento senza causa no. 17; Cass. 27 November 1995, no. 12259, Rep.Giur.it. 1995, voce Lavoro (Rapporto) no. 631; Cass.sez.un. 3 April 1989, no. 1613, Foro it. 1989, I, 1420); in solchen Fällen beschränkt sich der Anspruch auf einen bereicherungsrechtlichen Wertausgleich (Cass. 19 August 1992, no. 9675, Foro it. 1993, I, 428). CC art. 2126 findet gleichfalls keine Anwendung, wenn ein Arbeitnehmer nach dem Ablauf eines befristeten Vertrages weiter arbeitet (Cass. 29 April 1968, no. 1330, Rep.Giur.it. 1968, voce Lavoro (Rapporto di) no. 283). Die Gegenausnahme "unerlaubter Gegenstand" betrifft nur Fälle, in welchen der Vertrag gegen die öffentliche Ordnung, gegen "ethische Grundprinzipien" der Rechtsordnung verstößt (Cass. 23 April 1981, no. 2434, Giust.civ.Mass. 1981, fasc. 4; Cass. 22 April 1983, no. 2779, Giust.civ.Mass. 1983, fasc. 4); der Vertrag muss auf ein unerlaubtes, typischerweise strafbares Tun gerichtet sein (Cass. 27 November 1987, no. 8830, Giust.civ.Mass. 1987, fasc. 11). Auch dann stehen dem Arbeitnehmer aber noch die Regeln des Rechts der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung bzw. der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld offen (nach denen aber im Falle eines Verstoßes gegen die guten Sitten ein Anspruch ausgeschlossen sein kann: Cass. 27 November 1987 loc.cit.). Ein "unerlaubter Rechtsgrund" ist z.B. gegeben, wenn jemand in einer Apotheke zum Verkauf von Arzneimitteln eingestellt wird, die nur ein Apotheker abgeben darf (Cass. 23 July 1983, no. 5093, Giur.it. 1984, I, 1, 266). Wird eine Wohnung aufgrund eines nichtigen Mietvertrages genutzt, so findet ein Wertausgleich nach den Grundsätzen des Bereicherungsrechts statt (Breccia, Il pagamento dell'indebito, 774; Moscati, Pagamento dell'indebito, arts. 2033-2040, 155-180; anders [condictio indebiti] CFI Bologna 1 December 1964, Giur.it. 1965, I, 2, 826). Cass. 3 May 1991, no. 4849, Giur.it. 1991, I, 1, 1314 entschied, dass eine Partei, welche die Immobilie tatsächlich genutzt hat, nicht Rückzahlung des Mietzinses verlangen könne, weil sie sich dadurch ungerechtfertigt bereichern würde. Da die Nutzung der Immobilie nicht rückgängig gemacht werden könne, müsse dem Vermieter auch der Mietzins verbleiben. Ist ein formnichtiger Beförderungsvertrag durchgeführt worden, kommen dieselben bereicherungsrechtlichen Prinzipien zur Anwendung: jede Seite behält das Empfangene; ein Rückausgleich findet nicht statt (CFI Milan 3 July 1997, Riv.giur.circ.trasp. 1998, 519).

70. Für den Bereicherungsausgleich bei Dauerschuldverhältnissen, insbesondere Arbeitsverhältnissen, hat auch die AUSTRIAN Rechtsprechung besondere Regeln entwickelt. Der Tendenz nach soll ein bereits in Vollzug gesetztes Dauerschuldverhältnis entgegen den allgemeinen Regeln nicht als ex tunc unwirksam sondern als ex nunc beendet anzusehen sein, es sei denn, der Vertragsschluss wurde durch List oder Zwang herbeigeführt (Rummel [Rummel]. ABGB I[3], § 859 no. 27). Für Arbeits- und Dienstleistungsverträge ist außerdem zu beachten, dass die Bereicherung in analoger Anwendung von CC § 1152 nicht nach dem Vorteil des Bereicherten bemessen, sondern in Höhe eines angemessenen Entgelts ausgeglichen wird. Der Anspruch des Arbeitgebers auf Rückzahlung zu viel gezahlten Lohnes wird der kurzen vertraglichen (nicht der langen bereicherungsrechtlichen) Verjährungsfrist unterworfen (OGH 17 May 2000, RdW 2001, 106; vgl. auch OGH 27 January 1988, SZ 61/16 [Zweckverfehlungskondiktion]). Ein Mieter von Wohnraum kann selbst bestimmte Leistungen zurückfordern, von denen er wusste, dass sie nicht geschuldet waren. Dazu gehören überhöhte Mietzinszahlungen und die sogen. "Ablöse" an den Vormieter, see MRG § 27(3).

71. Under PORTUGUESE Labour Code art. 115(1) a labour contract which is declared void or annulled produces the same effects as if it were valid during the time in which it was performed by the parties. Die Nichtigkeit eines Arbeitsvertrages wirkt ex nunc; er wird behandelt, als wäre er während der Zeit seiner Erfüllung wirksam gewesen (Martinez, Código do Trabalho anotado[4], note 3 under art. 115, p. 255; STJ 22 March 2007, Processo 07S364). Das ist nur dann anders, wenn the contract has an object that is contrary to the law, disturbs the peace or is offensive to decency. In einem solchen Fall verliert die Partei, die sich des Verstoßes bewusst war, alle Vorteile aus dem Arbeitsvertrag; sie gehen auf das Instituto de Gestão Financeira da Segurança Social über (Labour Code art. 117(1). Die Rechtsfolgen ungültiger Arbeitsverträge haben die Theorie viel beschäftigt, scheinen aber die Praxis kaum vor Probleme zu stellen, weil man sich dort mit zahlreichen anderen Instrumenten (Probezeit, Informationspflichten etc.) zu helfen gewusst hat (Gomes, Direito do trabalho I, 515). Labour Code art. 115(1) betrifft allerdings nur Individualarbeitsverträge; die Rückabwicklung von Leistungen aufgrund eines nichtigen kollektiven Arbeitsvertrages verbleibt dem allgemeinen Nichtigkeitsregime (STJ 23 January 2008, Processo 07S2186).

72. Under GERMAN law können bei in Vollzug gesetzten Gesellschafts- und Arbeitsverträgen die meisten Nichtigkeitsgründe nur mit Wirkung ex nunc geltend gemacht werden (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[66], Überblick vor § 104, no. 36; § 125, no. 10). Auch andere Dauerschuldverhältnisse (z.B. Miete und Pacht, Darlehen, Verwahrung und Versicherung) sind dadurch gekennzeichnet, dass aus ihnen während ihrer Laufzeit ständig neue Leistungs-, Neben- und Schutzpflichten entstehen. Im Gegensatz zu Arbeits- und Gesellschaftsverträgen, bei denen die genannten Rückabwicklungsbeschränkungen weithin anerkannt sind, wird aber bei den anderen Dauerschuldverhältnissen, insbesondere bei Miete und Pacht, die Frage noch kontrovers diskutiert, ob auch bei ihnen die Geltendmachung von Nichtigkeits- und Anfechtungsgründen Beschränkungen unterworfen ist (verneinend Heinrichs loc.cit.; bejahend jedenfalls für die Anfechtung Erman [-Palm], BGB I[11], § 142, no. 10). Bei Geschäften, die wegen Wuchers nichtig sind (CC § 138(2)), wird unterschieden. Bei Darlehensverträgen kommt eine (gerichtliche) Herabsetzung des wucherischen Zinses auf ein vertretbares Maß nicht in Betracht, bei einem wucherischen Mietzins für Wohnraum wird sie dagegen zumeist für möglich gehalten (Heinrichs loc.cit. § 138 nos. 75-76; Palm loc.cit. § 138 no. 55). Versicherungsvertragsgesetz §§ 16 ff gewähren dem Versicherer im Falle eines nicht zu vertretenden Irrtums über gefahrrelevante Umstände ein Rücktrittsrecht; das Anfechtungsrecht unter CC § 119 wird hierdurch ausgeschlossen (BGH 22 February 1995, NJW-RR 1995, 725). Auch in GREECE wird vorgeschlagen, die Rückforderung von Lohn, der auf einen nichtigen Arbeitsvertrag gezahlt wurde, dadurch auszuschließen, dass der Nichtigkeit nur ex nunc-Wirkung beigemessen wird (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Poullos], art. 649, nos. 57-58). Ist der Lohn noch nicht gezahlt, so scheint die Rechtsprechung dem Arbeitnehmer aber nur einen bereicherungsrechtlichen Anspruch zu gewähren (A.P. 677/1971, NoB 20 [1972] 283; A.P. 456/1973, NoB 21 [1973] 1329; A.P. 579/1977, NoB 26 [1978] 203). Im Schrifttum wird andererseits auch für bereits in Vollzug gesetzte nichtige Gesellschaftsverträge behauptet, dass eine Rückabwicklung ex tunc ausgeschlossen sei (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Minoudis], art. 741, no. 16).

73. Die HUNGARIAN Rechtslehre fasst alle Dauerschuldverhältnisse (Gesellschaft, Miete, Wohnungsmiete, Pacht, Leihe) mit den Dienstleistungsverträgen in dem Begriff der “ursprünglich irreversiblen Verträge” zusammen (Weiss, A szerződés érvénytelensége a polgári jogban, 417). Die Rückgabe des Geleisteten ist in solchen Fällen entweder physisch unmöglich oder wirtschaftlich sinnlos. CC § 237(2) sieht deshalb einen lediglich ex nunc wirkenden Ausgleichsmechanismus vor. Das Gericht erklärt den ungültigen Vertrag für die Zeit bis zu der Entscheidung für wirksam. (Es kann auch einen Wuchervertrag für gültig erklären, indem es den unangemessenen Vorteil der begünstigten Partei beseitigt und die Rückerstattung der ohne Gegenleistung bleibenden Leistung verfügt.) Die Wirksamkeitserklärung ändert aber nichts daran, dass tatsächlich erbrachte irreversible Leistungen nach bereicherungsrechtlichen Grundsätzen dem Werte nach ausgeglichen werden müssen (BH 1998/39: Forschungsvertrag), (BH 1990/30 und BH 2002/29: Werkvertrag), (BH 2001/168: Pachtvertrag). Zu den Besonderheiten des Arbeitsrechts s. bereits note III62 above. Unter BULGARIAN Labour Code art. 74(1) kann das Gericht einen gegen das Gesetz oder einen Tarifvertrag verstoßenden Arbeitsvertrag für unwirksam erklären. Das hat allerdings für einen bei Vertragsschluss gutgläubigen Arbeitnehmer keine rückwirkende Bedeutung; die Unwirksamkeitserklärung wirkt in seinem Fall ex nunc (Labour Code art. 75(1)). War der Arbeitnehmer bösgläubig, so steht ihm hinsichtlich der von ihm bereits erbrachten Arbeitsleistungen dagegen nur ein Bereicherungsanspruch zu (Supreme Court 8 February 1990, decision no. 23 in civil matters no. 839/89).

74. ESTONIAN Employment Contracts Act (Eesti Vabariigi töölepingu seadus of 1 July 1992, ECA) §§ 129-131 bringen besondere Vorschriften über Arbeitsverträge, die von Minderjährigen oder Personen geschlossen werden, welche infolge einer geistigen Behinderung nicht oder nicht voll geschäftsfähig sind. Such contracts may be declared invalid by the labour dispute resolution body. Handelt es sich um einen nicht voll geschäftsfähigen Arbeitgeber, so muss der Arbeitnehmer ihm alles zurückgeben, was er unter dem Arbeitsvertrag erhalten hat, kann aber den Lohn jedenfalls in Höhe des von der Regierung für die entsprechende Tätigkeit festgesetzten Mindestlohnes behalten. Wird der Arbeitsvertrag für unwirksam erklärt, weil der Arbeitnehmer nicht voll geschäftsfähig ist, so berührt das seine Ansprüche aus dem Vertrag nicht.

75. In the NORDIC countries, as a general rule, the unwinding of long-term contracts (including labour contracts) only affects the future relationship of the parties; voidness or invalidity of such contracts are effective merely ex nunc so that there is no room for restitution of past performances (Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(2)[4], 56; Karlgren, Obehörig vinst och värdeersättning, 91; Jørgensen, Kontraktsret II, 128). Voidness/invalidity and termination of long-term contract have similar effects (Jørgensen, Kontraktsret I, 120; see also Hellner/Hager/Persson loc.cit. 185). SWEDISH Consumer Services Act (konsumenttjänstlag [1985:716]) § 29(1) and FINNISH Consumer Protection Act (konsumentskyddslag 20 January 1978/38) chap. 8 § 9(5) modifizieren diesen Grundsatz allerdings dahin, dass für in der Vergangenheit erbrachte Leistungen auf eine bewegliche Sache oder ein Grundstück ein angemessener Ausgleich in Geld zu zahlen ist. Hiernach muss z.B. ein Bauherr, der von dem Vertrag mit dem Werkunternehmer zurückgetreten ist, die von diesem bereits erbrachten Leistungen angemessen vergüten (näher Hellner/Hager/Persson loc.cit. 138; Bryde Andersen and Lookofsky, Obligationsret I[2], 238; ähnlich DANISH HD 9 January 1942, UfR 1942, 252).

IV. Auflösende und aufschiebende Bedingungen

(a) Rückforderbarkeit bei Eintritt einer auflösenden Bedingung

76. Leistungen auf einen Vertrag, der infolge des Eintritts einer auflösenden Bedingung seine Wirksamkeit verloren hat, können nach allen Rechtsordnungen zurück verlangt werden. Unter FRENCH CC art. 1183 führt das Eintreten einer auflösenden Bedingung ex tunc zur Beseitigung der vertraglichen Verbindlichkeit, so dass der Fall so anzusehen ist, als habe es nie einen Vertrag gegeben. Folglich ist das bereits Empfangene zurückzugeben. Das entspricht der Rechtslage in BELGIUM. Under SPANISH CC art. 1113(2) an obligation subject to a resolutive condition is immediately enforceable. Tritt die auflösende Bedingung ein, so hat das den Verlust schon erworbener Rechte zur Folge (CC art. 1114). CC art. 1123(1) stellt klar, dass diese Wirkung ex tunc eintritt: das Empfangene ist zurückzugeben. Ist eine empfangene Sache verloren gegangen oder zerstört worden, so wird CC art. 1122 (suspensive condition) anwendbar: fällt dem Schuldner Fahrlässigkeit zur Last, so muss er Schadenersatz zahlen; andernfalls erlischt seine Verpflichtung. Im Schrifttum stößt diese Lösung des Gesetzes allerdings auf Kritik; sie sei zu simpel (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 368). Vor allem im Rahmen von Dauerschuldverhältnissen restitution should not have retroactive effect (Díez-Picazo loc.cit. 367; López/Montés/Roca [-Verdera Server], Derecho de Obligaciones y Contratos, 106).

77. Wer ein Recht unter einer auflösenden Bedingung erwirbt, darf es under ITALIAN law während der Schwebezeit ausüben, doch kann der andere Vertragsteil bestimmte Rechtshandlungen zur Sicherung seiner Rückfallposition vornehmen (CC art. 1356(2)). Tritt die Bedingung ein, so wirkt dies in Ermangelung einer abweichenden Vereinbarung oder besonderer Umstände auf den Zeitpunkt des Vertragsschlusses zurück (CC art. 1360). Dritten gegenüber wirkt der Bedingungseintritt stets ex tunc und dinglich (näher und auch zu den Einschränkungen dieser Grundregel durch Vorschriften über den gutgläubigen Erwerb Roppo, Il contratto, 626-630). Ist ein auf dauernde oder regelmäßig wiederkehrende Durchführung gerichteter Vertrag auflösend bedingt, so kommt dem Bedingungseintritt allerdings mangels gegenteiliger Vereinbarung keine Wirkung hinsichtlich der bereits erbrachten Leistungen zu (CC art. 1360(2)). Der Bedingungseintritt lässt auch die Gültigkeit der Verwaltungshandlungen unberührt, welche die berechtigte Partei innerhalb der Schwebezeit vornahm (CC art. 1361). Ersatz für gezogene Früchte ist erst ab Bedingungseintritt geschuldet. Im Übrigen bewirkt der Eintritt einer auflösenden Bedingung den Wegfall der causa solvendi und löst deshalb Rückerstattungsansprüche aus (Moscati, Pagamento dell'indebito, 124 mit fn. 6; Cass. 16 March 1943, no. 621, Giur.it. 1943, I, 1, 245; Cass. 7 February 1962, no. 234, Foro it. 1962, I, 676).

78. In AUSTRIA gehören Rückforderungsansprüche bei Eintritt einer auflösenden Bedingung in den Anwendungsbereich der condictio causa finita (CC § 1435; see Schwimann [-Mader], ABGB VI^{3}, § 1434 no. 1). OGH 15 January 1987, SZ 60/6 betraf einen Fall, in welchem die auflösende Bedingung (das Ausbleiben einer Genehmigung für ein Grundstücksgeschäft) erst nach 11 Jahren eintrat. Das Gericht meinte, dass sich der aus den erbrachten Leistungen gezogene Nutzen gegenseitig aufhebe, sodass der Käufer weder Zinsen noch einen Inflationsausgleich verlangen könne. Das Gericht hat diese Rechtsprechung trotz kontroverser Diskussion im Schrifttum später noch mehrfach bestätigt (OGH 22 April 1997, SZ 70/69; OGH 29 September 1998, SZ 71/162). Under POTUGUESE CC art. 270 können die Parteien die Wirkungen ihres Rechtsgeschäfts einem zukünftigen ungewissen Ereignis unterstellen; bei dieser Bedingung kann es sich (was durch Auslegung zu ermitteln ist: Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I^{4}, note 2 under art. 270, p. 250) um eine condição suspensiva oder um eine condição resolutiva handeln. Auflösende Bedingungen wirken in Ermangelung einer anderen Parteiabrede ex tunc (CC art. 276). Anders ist das nur bei Verträgen, die dauernde oder regelmäßig wiederkehrende Leistungen zum Gegenstand haben (CC art. 277(1) i.V.m. art. 434(2). Das Rückforderungsregime ist dem des Rücktrittsrechts gleichgestellt (CC art. 433) und unterliegt dem allgemeinen Ungültigkeitregime (siehe CC art. 434(2)). Die Anwendung der Regeln zur ungerechtfertigen Bereicherung ist deshalb ausgeschlossen (STJ 15 March 2005, Processo 05B314).

79. GERMANY klassifiziert die Rückforderung von Leistungen, die aufgrund eines auflösend bedingten Vertrages (CC § 158(2)) vor Bedingungseintritt erbracht worden sind, als einen Fall der condictio ob causam finitam (CC § 812(1)(ii) first alternative; see Staudinger [-W. Lorenz], BGB [1999], § 812, no. 94). Denn im Zeitpunkt der Leistung bestand ein Rechtsgrund für ihre Erbringung; er ist erst nachträglich durch den Bedingungseintritt endgültig weggefallen. Eine Bedingung i.S.d. CC § 158 setzt voraus, dass die Parteien den Eintritt oder den Fortbestand der Rechtswirkungen ihres Rechtsgeschäfts von einem künftigen, objektiv ungewissen Ereignis abhängig machen (Erman [-Armbrüster], BGB I^{11}, Vor § 158, no. 1). Im Falle der auflösenden Bedingung tritt die Rechtsänderung nach ganz herrschender Auffassung ex nunc ein (Armbrüster loc.cit. § 158, no. 5; Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB^{66}, § 159, no. 1; BGH 26 September 1996, BGHZ 133, 331, 334). Die Anwendbarkeit der Regeln über die condictio ob causam finitam ist freilich nicht völlig unbestritten. Es wird auch argumentiert, dass Parteien, die eine auflösende Bedingung vereinbaren, die Möglichkeit eines späteren Wegfalls des Geschäfts voraussähen. Deshalb könne eine Rückgewährpflicht als stillschweigend vereinbart angesehen werden; des Bereicherungsrechts bedürfe es folglich nicht mehr (Medicus, Schuldrecht II[13], no. 647). Die Rechtslage in GREECE entspricht der Sichtweise der herrschenden Auffassung in Germany, see Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 92.

80. In HUNGARY wird gesagt, Bedingungen beträfen die zeitliche Wirksamkeit des Vertrages (Bíró, A kötelmi jog és a szerződéstan közös szabályai[6], 309, Weiss, A szerződés érvénytelensége a polgári jogban, 168). Der Eintritt einer auflösenden Bedingung führe zum Erlöschen seiner Wirksamkeit. Erbrachte Leistungen werden nachträglich rechtsgrundlos (CC § 228(2)). Für die Rückabwicklung erbrachter Leistungen finden sich keine ausdrücklichen gesetzlichen Bestimmungen. Seit einiger Zeit scheint die Meinung vorzuherrschen, dass die Rückabwicklung nach den Regeln des Bereicherungsrechts zu erfolgen habe (Kemenes, A szerződés érvénytelensége, 55, 70). Die Reformvorschläge zum neuen Zivilgesetzbuch haben sich dieser Auffassung angeschlossen (http://irm.gov.hu/download/otodiktervezet.pdf/otodiktervezet.pdf). Under BULGARIAN LOA art. 55(1) erfüllt der Eintritt einer auflösenden Bedingung ausdrücklich einen der drei Tatbestände der condictio indebiti. Auch in SLOVENIA führt der Eintritt einer auflösenden Bedingung ipso facto und mit Wirkung ex tunc zum Erlöschen des Vertrages (LOA art. 59(3); see Šinkovec and Tratar, Obligacijski zakonik s komentrajem in sodno prakso, art. 59, p. 62). Bereits erbrachte Leistungen sind nach LOA art. 190(3) rückabzuwickeln.

81. Under DUTCH law können Leistungen auf einen Vertrag, der infolge des Eintritts einer auflösenden Bedingung erloschen ist, nicht über das Recht der ungeschuldeten Zahlung (onverschuldigde betaling) zurückgefordert werden, weil CC art. 6:24 insoweit ein spezielleres Rückgewährschuldverhältnis geschaffen hat. Allerdings gehen dessen Regeln kaum ins Detail; zur Lückenfüllung muss deshalb im Wege der Analogie doch wieder auf das Recht der ungeschuldeten Zahlung zurückgegriffen werden (Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk (-Valk), T & C Burgerlijk Wetboek[6], art. 6:24, no. 1 p. 2141). Under ESTONIAN GPCCA § 102 führt der Eintritt einer auflösenden Bedingung zum Erlöschen der Wirkungen des Rechtsgeschäfts. Eine auflösende Bedingung gilt als ausgeblieben, wenn die begünstigte Partei ihren Eintritt treuwidrig verhindert hat (GPCCA § 104). Eine während der Schwebezeit getroffene Verfügung wird bei Bedingungseintritt in der Regel unwirksam (see also GPCCA § 106). Die Rückabwicklung richtet sich nach den bereicherungsrechtlichen Vorschriften des LOA. Rechte gutgläubiger Dritter bleiben allerdings unberührt (GPCCA § 106(3)).

82. Auch in the NORDIC countries ist anerkannt, dass ein Vertrag beim Eintritt einer auflösenden Bedingung rückabgewickelt werden muss (Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[11], 105). SWEDISH Land Code (jordabalk) chap. 4 §§ 3-4 erlauben auch für Grundstücksgeschäfte aufschiebende und auflösende Bedingungen, verlangen aber Schriftform und begrenzen die Wirksamkeit solcher Bedingungen auf zwei Jahre, es sei denn, sie beziehen sich auf die Erfüllung der Zahlungsverpflichtung.

(b) Rückforderbarkeit bei Nichteintritt einer aufschiebenden Bedingung

83. Rückforderbar sind grundsätzlich überall auch Leistungen auf einen Vertrag, der mangels Eintritts einer aufschiebenden Bedingung nicht wirksam geworden ist. Under FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBURGIAN CC art. 1181 fehlt es in einem solchen Fall an einem Schuldverhältnis; gleichwohl erbrachte Leistungen sind folglich nach den allgemeinen Regeln zurückzugewähren (Cass.ass.plén. 2 April 1993, Bull.civ. 1993, I, no. 9 p.326). Eine aufschiebende Bedingung gilt allerdings auch dann als erfüllt, wenn die Partei, die der Bedingungseintritt zu einer Leistung verpflichtet hätte, den Eintritt der Bedingung verhindert (CC art. 1178).

84. Under SPANISH CC art. 1113 ist ein Vertrag vor Eintritt der vereinbarten aufschiebenden Bedingung nicht durchsetzbar; ein Schuldner, der vor Bedingungseintritt leistet, kann das Geleistete vom Gläubiger zurück verlangen (CC art. 1121(2)). Dieser Rückforderungsanspruch wird als eine besondere, von der condictio indebiti durch das Fehlen des Irrtumselementes unterschiedene Kondiktion qualifiziert (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 358); gesondert zu prüfen sei allerdings, ob ein Leistungsaustausch zwischen Parteien eines aufschiebend bedingten Vertrages darauf hinausliefe, dass sie sich stillschweigend auf eine Aufgabe der Bedingung geeinigt hätten (Díez-Picazo loc.cit.; Gullón Ballesteros, FS Batlle Vázquez, 367, 370). Under CC art. 1120(1) kommt dem Eintritt einer aufschiebenden Bedingung rückwirkende Bedeutung zu, sofern es sich um die Verpflichtung zur Übergabe einer Sache oder Geld handelt. Bei Dienstleistungen oder Unterlassungspflichten entscheidet das Gericht whether there is retroactive effect or not (CC art. 1120(2)). Zahlt eine Bank ein hypothekarisch gesichertes Darlehn aus, obwohl der Vertrag die Darlehnsgewährung von der Mitteilung des land registers abhängig gemacht hatte, dass das Grundtsück nicht weiter belastet ist, so kann die Bank, welche die Auszahlung rückgängig macht, nachdem sie den Fehler bemerkt hat, nicht auf erneute Auszahlung verklagt werden (TS 27 September 1999, RAJ 1999 (4) no. 7081 p. 11085).

85. Unter ITALIAN CC art. 1360 wirkt der Eintritt einer aufschiebenden Bedingung auf den Zeitpunkt des Vertragsabschlusses zurück, es sei denn, die Parteien haben etwas anderes vereinbart. Ob das Geleistete während der Schwebezeit zurückverlangt werden kann, scheint streitig zu sein. CA Naples 13 January 1970, Dir. e giur. 1970, 240 hat die Auffasung vertreten, dass eine Rückforderung nur in Betracht komme, wenn sicher sei, dass die Bedingung nicht eintreten werde. In der Lehre wird dagegen gesagt, die Rückforderung sei nur dann ausgeschlossen, wenn der solvens gewusst habe, dass die Erfüllung noch nicht geschuldet war (Moscati, Pagamento dell'indebito, 123 mit fn. 6). AUSTRIAN CC § 1434 stellt die Leistung einer bedingten Schuld der Leistung einer Nichtschuld gleich (näher Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 277); sie kann folglich kondiziert werden, sobald die Bedingung endgültig ausgefallen ist (OGH 12 November 1979, JBl 1981, 148; Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III[2], no. 15/6). Praktisch bedeutsam sind insbesondere Leistungen auf einen Vertrag, dessen Wirksamkeit von einer öffentlichen Genehmigung abhängt. Da CC § 1434 als ein Sonderfall des CC § 1431 verstanden wird, ist das Irrtumserfordernis zu beachten: die Rückforderung ist ausgeschlossen, wenn die Leistung entweder in Kenntnis der ausstehenden Genehmigung (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB II(3)[3], § 1434 no. 2) erfolgt oder wenn der Leistende verpflichtet ist, die Genehmigung einzuholen, dies aber unterlassen hat (OGH 13 March 1957, SZ 30/15).

86. Auch under PORTUGUESE CC art. 270 können die Parteien vermittels einer aufschiebenden Bedingung die Wirkungen eines Rechtsgeschäfts einem zukünftigen ungewissen Ereignis unterordnen. Der Rückforderungsanspruch aus CC art. 276 ist auf die Wiederherstellung des früheren Zustands gerichtet. Man habe es bei Leistungen während der Schwebezeit mit einem pagamento indevido zu tun (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 472). Folglich können sie, wenn die Bedingung ausbleibt, nach den Regeln des Bereicherungsrechts zurückverlangt werden (STJ 18 June 1996, BolMinJus 458 [1996] 347). Das entspricht der Rechtslage in GERMANY and GREECE. Bei Nichteintritt einer aufschiebenden Bedingung wird der bis dahin bestehende Schwebezustand beseitigt und das Rechtsgeschäft endgültig wirkungslos. Man spricht vom Ausfall der Bedingung. Ausgefallen ist die Bedingung nicht nur, wenn sie objektiv nicht mehr eintreten kann, sondern auch dann, wenn der Zeitraum, innerhalb dessen ihr Eintritt zu erwarten war, verstrichen ist (Erman [-Armbrüster], BGB I[11], § 158, no. 10; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Kritikos], art. 201, no. 4). Wie bei Leistungen vor Eintritt der Bedingung erfolgt auch bei endgültigem Ausfall der Bedingung eine Rückabwicklung nach CC § 812(1)(i) first alternative.

87. Ist der Vertrag wegen einer aufschiebenden Bedingung (noch) unwirksam, werden aber trotzdem bereits Leistungen erbracht und bleibt die Bedingung aus, so erfolgten die Leistungen auch unter HUNGARIAN CC § 228(1) rechtsgrundlos. Ihre Rückabwicklung obliegt nach heutiger Auffassung den Vorschriften über die ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung und den unrechtmäßigen Besitz, see note IV76 above. Dem entspricht die Rechtslage under BULGARIAN LOA art. 55(1). Keinen Kondiktionsanspruch hat dagegen die Partei, welche den Bedingungseintritt treuwidrig verhindert hat. In solchen Fällen wird der Bedingungseintritt fingiert (LOA art. 25(1); näher Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 586). Leistungen auf einen aufschiebend bedingten Vertrag sind, auch wenn sie vor Bedingungseintritt erfolgen, unter SLOVENIAN LOA art. 59(2) wohl als mit Rechtsgrund erbracht anzusehen; der bereicherungsrechtliche Rückforderungsanspruch entsteht erst bei endgültigem Ausbleiben der Bedingung.

88. Under DUTCH CC art. 6:25 unterliegt die Rückforderung von Leistungen, die vor Bedingungseintritt und bei seinem Ausbleiben auf einen aufschiebend bedingten Vertrag erbracht werden, den Regeln des Rechts der ungeschuldeten Zahlung (Verbintenissenrecht I [-Busch], Art. 6:25, no. 3-5 p. 2). In ESTONIA übernimmt das Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung im LOA diese Aufgabe. Eine aufschiebende Bedingung gilt auch dann als eingetreten, wenn ihr Eintritt von der begünstigten Partei wider Treu und Glauben verhindert wird (GPCCA § 104). Verfügungen während der Schwebezeit sind vorbehaltlich der Rechte gutgläubiger Dritter bei Bedingungseintritt nichtig (GPCCA § 106).

89. For the the NORDIC countries see note IV82 above. Eine Partei, die zu ihrem Vorteil treuwidrig den Eintritt einer aufschiebenden Bedingung verhindert, haftet der anderen Seite auf Schadenersatz (Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[11], 105).

V. Entsprechende Anwendbarkeit auf nichtvertragliche Obligationen

90. Auch Leistungen auf nur scheinbar existierende nichtvertragliche Obligationen können grundsätzlich in allen Rechtsordnungen zurück gefordert werden. FRENCH Gerichte haben z.B. bestätigt, dass zwischen dem Lebensgefährten einer nichtehelichen Lebensgemeinschaft und den Eltern der Partnerin weder eine Unterhaltspflichtschuld noch eine entsprechende Naturalobligation besteht; folglich können die entsprechenden Beistandsleistungen nach CC art. 1305 zurück verlangt werden (Cass.civ. 18 July 1995, Petites affices 21 July 1997, note Hauksson-Tresch). Desgleichen kann ein Versicherer, dessen Haftpflichtschuld von der Berufungsinstanz als wesentlich geringer eingestuft wird, den nach Abschluss der ersten Instanz an den Geschädigten ausgezahlten Betrag in Höhe der Zuvielzahlung über die Regeln der répétition de l'indu zurück fordern (Cass.civ. 20 January 1998, Bull.civ. 1998, I, no. 18; D. 1999, 500, note Martin). Mit den Mitteln der action en répétition de l'indu werden auch zu viel gezahlten Sozialleistungen (Cass.civ. 22 November 2005, no. de pourvoi 04-30583) und Steuern (Cass.civ. 24 February 2005, no. de pourvoi 03-20040) zurück gefordert. Ebenso verhält es sich in BELGIUM (Cass. 27 March 2006, no. JC063R"_3, no. de rôle S050022F; Cass. 3 January 2005, no. JC05133_1, no. de rôle S040118F ; Cass. 29 September 2003, no. de rôle S020047F ; Cass. 26 June 1998, no. JC986Q2_4, no. de rôle F970071F).

91. Die Regelung in SPANISH CC arts. 1895-1901 betrifft alle irrtümlichen ungeschuldeten Leistungen, auch solche auf inexistente außervertragliche

Schuldverhältnisse. Standardfälle betreffen undue payments of the Social Security Administration to employees (e.g. TS 9 March 1999, RAJ 1999 (2) no. 2753 p. 4265; TSJ Extremadura 15 March 2002, BDA JUR 2002/151478; see Concheiro del Río, El enriquecimiento injusto en el Derecho laboral, 53-65, 264). Die condictio indebiti ist auch auf Rückforderungsansprüche von Verbrauchern angewandt worden, die auf Musik CD´s and DVD´s Gebühren gezahlt hatten, die nur gewerbliche Nutzer zahlen müssen (CA Málaga 19 September 2006, BDA AC 2006/1569). Auch für ITALIAN CC art. 2033 ist unumstritten, dass sich der Begriff der ungeschuldeten Zahlung sowohl auf vertragliche als auch auf außervertragliche Schuldverhältnisse bezieht (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[6], Vor Artt. 2033, II). Geläufige Beispiele aus der Rechtsprechung betreffen ungeschuldete Steuerzahlungen an die Finanzverwaltung (z.B. Cass.sez.trib. 22 May 2006, no. 11987, Giust.civ.Mass. 2006, 5; Cass.sez.trib. 12 July 2006, no. 15840, Giust.civ.Mass. 2006, 7-8; Cass.sez.un. 13 September 2005, no. 18120, Dir. e giust. 2005, 39).

92. Die Regelungen über die Leistungskondiktion sind auch in AUSTRIA sowohl auf vertragliche als auch auf außervertragliche Obligationen anwendbar, etwa auf die Erfüllung einer vermeintlichen Unterhaltsschuld oder einer Schuld aus Delikt. CC § 877 (List oder Drohung) wird auf außervertragliche Obligationen entsprechend angewandt (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 278). PORTUGUESE CC art. 476(1) (repetição do indevido) bezieht sich gleichfalls auch auf Leistungen, die in Erfüllungsabsicht auf eine tatsächlich nicht bestehende außervertragliche Obligation erbracht wurden (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 472). Der Begriff der Obligation in CC art. 476(1) deckt sich mit dem in CC art. 397; obrigação ist die juristische Verbindung, durch die eine Person einer anderen gegenüber zur Erbringung einer Leistung verpflichtet ist (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[10], 506; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], note 1 under art. 476, p. 463). Dem enstpricht die Rechtslage in GERMANY and in GREECE (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 905, no. 3). German CC § 812(1)(i)first alternative erfasst alle Fälle von Leistungen auf eine in Wirklichkeit nicht bestehende Verbindlichkeit. Sie kann ihren Sitz im Schuld-, Sachen-, Familien- oder Erbrecht haben, und es ist auch gleicgültig, ob der Leistende meinte, sie stamme aus Vertrag oder aus Gesetz (Staudinger [-W. Lorenz], BGB [1999], § 812, no. 81).

93. In HUNGARY ist zwischen der Rückabwicklung nicht existierender und der Rückabwicklung ungültiger Verträge zu unterscheiden. Entsprechendes gilt für nicht existierende nichtvertragliche Obligationen. Ihre Erfüllung fällt - als ungeschuldete Leistung - unter das Bereicherungsrecht, sofern vor ihm kein anderes Rückabwicklungsregime Vorrang beansprucht. Besonderen Bestandsschutz genießen Unterhaltszahlungen. Gemäß CC § 362 kann eine zum Lebensunterhalt gewährte und hierfür genutzte Zuwendung nicht zurückgefordert werden, es sei denn, sie wurde durch eine strafbare Handlung erlangt oder das Gesetz ordnet eine andere Rechtsfolge an. Under BULGARIAN LOA art. 55(1) unterliegt es gleichfalls keinem Zweifel, dass auch Leistungen auf eine inexistente Forderung aus einem gesetzlichen Schuldverhältnis kondiziert werden können. Ein Beispiel liefert die Zuvielleistung von Schadenersatz, weil das Mitverschulden des Opfers (LOA art. 51(2)) nicht berücksichtigt wurde (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 584).

94. Auch the NETHERLANDS wickeln Leistungen auf inexistente außervertragliche Obligationen vermittels des Rechts der ungeschuldeten Zahlung (CC arts. 6:203 ff) ab (Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 326 p. 343; Vriesendorp, Verbintenissen uit de wet en Schadevergoeding[2], no. 294 p. 277). Dazu gehören auch Leistungen aufgrund eines später vernichteten verwaltungsbehördlichen Beschlusses oder eines aufgehobenen Urteils oder einer aufgehobenen einstweilige Verfügung (kort geding). Dasselbe gilt für Leistungen zur Abwehr einer Beschlagnahme (CFI 's-Hertogenbosch 24 April 1925, NedJur 1925 p. 1351) oder einer Strafverfolgung (HR 19 February 1931, NedJur 1931, p. 1501). Vgl. aus der Rechtsprechung ferner HR 19 February 1999, NedJur 1999, no. 367 p. 1984; HR 19 May 2000, NedJur 2000, no. 603 p. 4192 und HR 30 January 2004, NedJur 2005, no. 246 p. 2289.

95. Pursuant to ESTONIAN LOA § 3 kann eine Obligation auf einem Vertrag, aber auch aus jedem anderen Rechtsgrund erwachsen. Der Begriff schließt also auch außervertragliche Obligationen ein. LOA chapter 52 (on unjustified enrichment law) use the term "obligation" in exactly this sense. Folglich kann z.B. unter LOA § 1028 eine Schadenersatzzahlung zurück verlangt werden, wenn der Zahlende irrtümlich annahm, zum Ersatz verpflichtet zu sein, während die Ersatzpflicht in Wahrheit jemand anderen traf. Ein besonderer Bestandsschutz besteht allerdings unter Family Law Act (Perekonnaseadus of 1 January 1995, RT I 1994, 75, 1326; 2006, 14, 111) § 72(2) für ungeschuldet erbrachte Unterhaltsleistungen. Sie können nur zurück verlangt werden, wenn die entsprechende gerichtliche Entscheidung auf einer Täuschung durch den angeblich Unterhaltsberechtigten beruht.

96. Auch in the NORDIC countries sind die Regeln der condictio indebiti nicht auf die Rückabwicklung von Leistungen auf vertragliche Schuldverhältnisse beschränkt. Unter dem allgemeinen Recht der condictio indebiti kommt es freilich dann nicht zu einer Rückabwicklung, wenn the person performing the payment lead the recipient to believe that there was an obligation to discharge, wenn die Zahlung in billigender Inkaufnahme der Abwesenheit einer Schuld erfolgte oder wenn der Empfänger Grund zu der Annahme hatte, dass der Zahlende die Existenz einer Schuld geprüft hatte. Zahlungen aufgrund eines Rechtsirrtums konnten ursprünglich nicht zurückverlangt werden (Ussing, Enkelte Kontrakter, 439), doch scheint sich insoweit ein Auffassungswandel zu vollziehen, zumindest in SWEDEN (Hult, Condictio indebiti, 86), wenn auch wohl noch nicht in DENMARK (von Eyben/Mortensen/Sørensen, Obligationsret II, 141). Ob ein Rechtsprechungswandel die Annahme eines Rechtsirrtumes tragen kann, ist zweifelhaft; jedenfalls kommt ihm keine rückwirkende Bedeutung zu, so dass auf ihn auch keine condictio indebiti gestützt werden kann (Danish Eastern CA 13 April 1992, UfR 1992, 763 [Änderung einer Rechtsauffassung im Kontext des Pfandrechts]; similarly Swedish HD 28 February 1942, NJA 1942, 39 [Aufhebung einer gerichtlichen Vaterschaftsfeststellung; kein Rückforderungsrecht des Scheinvaters für die zurückliegende Zeit]). Wer auf eine zweifelhafte Rechtslage hin zahlt, ohne ihre gerichtliche Klärung abzuwarten, zahlt auf eigenes Risiko, wenn er nicht unter dem Vorbehalt der Rückforderung zahlt (Swedish HD 17 February 1961, NJA 1961, 18 [Bank zahlt in der Annahme auf eine nicht bestehende Deliktsschuld, sich nicht erfolgreich verteidigen zu können; keine Rückforderung]).

VI. Court order and rule of law

97. Allgemein anerkannt ist, dass das Recht zum Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen seinen Grund auch in einer Gerichtsentscheidung oder unmittelbar in einer gesetzlichen Regelung haben kann. Allerdings muss im letzteren Fall oft noch geprüft werden, ob für den erworbenen und nicht rückgabepflichtigen Titel ein Ausgleich in Geld geschuldet ist. Unter FRENCH CC art. 2262 z.B. führt ein den Anforderungen von CC art. 2229 genügender dreißigjähriger ununterbrochener Besitz zum Eigentumserwerb (siehe Cass.civ. 15 June 1976, Bull.civ. 1976, III, no. 262). Ein Anspruch aus répétition de l'indu ist dann ausgeschlossen (Cass.com. 1 March 1994, Bull.civ. 1994, IV, no. 89). Kürzere Fristen gelten beim Eigentumserwerb infolge gutgläubiger Ersitzung (CC art. 2265: zehn bzw. zwanzig Jahre). Es entsteht nach Fristablauf ein

"gerechter Titel", wenn ein Nichteigentümer Eigentum auf einen gutgläubigen Empfänger übertragen wollte (Cass.civ. 30 October 1972: Bull.civ. 1972, III, no. 575). Ein Ausgleich in Geld ist nicht vorgesehen. Unter Code de la consommation (Consumer Protection Code) art. L122-3 ist die entgeltliche Lieferung unbestellter Ware oder die Erbringung unbestellter Dienstleistungen an Verbraucher untersagt. Für den Verbraucher entstehen aus solchen Leistungen keine Verpflichtungen; er kann gleichwohl erbrachte Zahlungen mit Zinsen zurück verlangen. Ob der Verbraucher seinerseits einen bereicherungsrechtlichen Ausgleich zu zahlen hat, wurde bislang nicht entschieden, dürfte aber nach dem klaren Gesetzeswortlaut zu verneinen sein.

98. BELGIAN CC arts. 2262 und 2262*bis* unterscheiden sich in einigen Punkten von ihrem französischen Vorbild. CC art. 2262 unterwirft den Eigentumsherausgabeanspruch einer dreißigjährigen Verjährung, auch wenn der Besitzer keinen Titel erworben hat oder bösgläubig ist. CC art. 2262*bis* betrifft die Verjährung von Forderungsrechten. Dagegen stimmen Belgian und French CC art. 2229 wörtlich überein. Die Kombination der drei genannten Bestimmungen führt letztlich freilich zu identischen Ergebnissen. Eine Verpflichtung, für das nicht herausgabepflichtige Eigentum einen Ausgleich in Geld zu zahlen, besteht nicht. Für LUXEMBURG hat CFI Luxemburg 28 April 1988, Pas. luxemb. 27 (1987-1989) 284 entschieden, dass derjenige, der aufgrund einer später vom Berufungsgericht aufgehobenen einstweiligen Verfügung Unterhalt bezahlt hat, den entsprechenden Betrag als rechtsgrundlos geleistet zurück fordern kann.

99. Auch in SPAIN ist anerkannt, dass das Recht zum Behaltendürfen eines Vermögensvorteils seinen Grund unmittelbar im Gesetz haben kann (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 122; Miquel González, Enriquecimiento injustificado, 2806). Ein Beispiel liefert Ley 7/1996, of 15 January 1996, de ordenación del comercio minorista (retail trade regulation) art. 42, which provides that a consumer who has received an unsolicited good is not obliged to return it. An exception to this rule is the case where the provider has sent the good by mistake. Rechtsgründe zum Behaltendürfen des Erlangten liefern ferner die Regeln über prescriptive acquisition (usucapión) and good faith acquisition a non domino in Fällen, in denen der Veräußerer infolge der Unwirksamkeit seines vorangegangenen Erwerbsgeschäfts keinen Titel hatte (Real Estate Act [Ley Hipotecaria] art. 34; CC art. 464). CC art. 1295(2) bringt insoweit eine Sonderregelung für den Rücktritt. Für den bereicherungsfesten Erwerb des Dritten genügt hier allein schon der gute Glaube. In den Fällen der usucapión und des gutgläubigen Erwerbs ist der Dritterwerber nicht zu einer Ausgleichszahlung verpflichtet. Das ist anders z.B. in den Fällen des CC art. 360 (Bauen mit fremdem Material auf eigenem Grund; Eigentumserwerb, Wertersatz und bei Bösgläubigkeit obendrein Schadenersatz; see Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 281) und der CC arts. 361-364 (Grundstücksüberbau in gutem Glauben; Wahlrecht des Grundstückseigentümers zwischen der Zahlung von Wertersatz bei Behalt der Konstruktion und Inanspruchnahme des Überbauenden auf Abriss). Ähnliche Regeln finden sich in CC art. 383 (on specification). Auch im Recht des geistigen Eigentums finden sich eine Reihe von Regeln, welche einen Wertausgleich für die Nutzung fremder Rechte ausdrücklich ausschließen, z.B. bei der Reproduktion eines berühmten Gemäldes in einem Schulbuch (CA Barcelona 31 October 2002, BDA JUR 2004/54771; see. Directive 2001/29/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 May 2001, on the harmonization of certain aspects of copyright and related rights in the information society art. 5(3)(a)). Dass auch Gerichtsentscheidungen einen Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen darstellen können, zeigt sich vielfach besonders im Zusammenhang mit Unterhaltsvereinbarungen zwischen geschiedenen Ehegatten; sie werden erst durch gerichtliche Genehmigung wirksam (CC art. 90). Fehlt es an einer solchen Vereinbarung, muss das Gericht den Unterhalt festsetzen und auch eine Regelung über die Nutzung der Wohnung treffen (CC arts. 96 and 97).

100. In ITALY lautet der Ausgangspunkt, dass eine Bereicherung, die aufgrund Gesetzes erworben wurde, im Zweifel mit giusta causa erlangt ist. Desgleichen sind Bereicherungen aus rechtskräftigen gerichtlichen Entscheidungen mit Rechtsgrund erworben (Alpa and Mariconda [-Sirena], Codice civile commentato IV, sub art. 2041, V, § 25). Auch im Falle von Ersitzung und gutgläubigem Erwerb besteht in der Regel keine Ausgleichspflicht. Wer dagegen auf seinem Grund mit fremden Materialien Baulichkeiten, Anpflanzungen oder Werke geschaffen hat, muss ihren Wert ausgleichen, wenn entweder der Eigentümer der Materialien nicht auf Trennung besteht oder sich eine Trennung nicht schadlos durchführen lässt (CC art. 935(1)). Auch für den Fall, dass ein Dritter die Werke mit fremden Materialien geschaffen hat, deckt sich die italienische Rechtslage mit der spanischen (CC arts. 936 and 937). Hat jemand gutgläubig und ohne innerhalb von drei Monaten auf den Widerspruch des Nachbarn zu stoßen über die Grundstücksgrenze gebaut, kann das Gericht dem Überbauenden das Eigentum am Gebäude und den Besitz am Grundstück zusprechen; der Überbauende muss dann dem Grundeigentümer den doppelten Wert der in Anspruch genommenen Fläche vergüten (CC art. 938). Einen den gesetzlichen Eigentumsverlust ausgleichenden Anspruch auf den objektiven Wert kennen die Vorschriften über Verbindung, Vermischung und Verarbeitung (CC art. 939 and 940). Die Vorschriften über den Verbraucherschutz im Falle unbestellt zugesandter Waren bzw. unbestellt erbrachter Dienstleistungen finden sich in Decreto Legislativo 6 September 2005, no. 206 (Suppl.ord. no. 162 alla Gazz. Uff., 8 October 2005, no. 235) art. 57; s. näher CFI Genua 11 November 2002, Contratti I 2003, 437 und de Marzo, I contratti a distanza, 46.

101. Auch in AUSTRIA kann sich die Rechtfertigung einer Vermögensverschiebung aus einem rechtskräftigen Urteil (OGH 6 April 2006, 2 Ob 256/05v) oder unmittelbar aus dem Gesetz ergeben. Geläufige Beispiele sind der gutgläubige Erwerb (OGH 28 July 1998, SZ 71/128), die Ersitzung und die Verjährung (OGH 5 June 1970, SZ 43/98). In Fällen, in denen ein gesetzlicher Eigentumserwerb unabhängig von Gut- oder Bösgläubigkeit eintritt (CC §§ 371, 416 und 417 [Vermischung etc.]), rechtfertigt das Gesetz aber nur den Eigentumswechsel als solchen, nicht auch die mit ihm verbundene Wertverschiebung (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 287). Ein Urteil stellt auch dann einen Rechtsgrund dar, wenn es fehlerhaft ist (OGH 14 December 1955, 7 Ob 543/55). Auch under PORTUGUESE CC art. 473(1) stellt ein gerichtliches Urteil einen Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen des Erlangten dar (STJ 22 November 2007, Processo 07A3835). Eine Bereicherungshaftung ist aber natürlich auch ausgeschlossen, "wenn das Gesetz dem Verarmten (...) den Erstattungsanspruch versagt", CC art. 474. Beispiele liefern der Rückforderungsausschluss bei Zahlung vorläufigen Unterhalts (CC art. 2007(2)) und das Recht zum Behaltendürfen des Erlangten, wenn die entsprechende Schuld verjährt ist (CC art. 304(2)). Gesetzliche Behaltensgründe stellen ferner die Vorschriften über den Eigentumserwerb dar, darunter diejenigen zur Ersitzung (CC art. 1294). Die Vorschriften über den gutgläubigen Erwerb kennen für einzelne Fallgruppen eigene Ausgleichsmechanismen (CC arts. 1287 ff), darunter CC art. 1301 (Eigentumsherausgabeanspruch gegen einen gutgläubigen Dritten, der die Sache von einem Händler gekauft hat; Anspruch des Dritten gegen den Eigentümer auf Wertersatz). Verbraucher können unverlangt zugesandte Waren bzw. unbestellt erbrachte Dienstleistungen nach den gemeinschaftsrechtlichen Regeln ausgleichlos behalten: Lei de Defesa do Consumidor (Lei 24/96 of 31 July 1996) art. 9(4); Decreto-Lei no. 143/2001 of 26 April 2001 art. 29(2), näher Dias Oliveira, Proteção dos consumidores, 140.

102. In GERMANY wird bereicherungsrechtlich je nachdem unterschieden, ob es sich bei der jeweiligen Rechtsänderung nur um einen formellen Vorgang handelt oder ob sie vom Gesetz auch als materiell gerechtfertigt gewollt war (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 812, no. 96; Staudinger [-S. Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 812, no. 28). Ein bereicherungsrechtlicher Ausgleich ist folglich bei Verbindung, Vermischung und Verarbeitung (CC § 951) sowie im Fundrecht (CC § 977) vorgesehen. Bereicherungsfest sind dagegen der entgeltliche (CC § 816(1)(ii)) gutgläubige Erwerb vom Nichtberechtigten, der Erwerb infolge Zeitablaufs und Ersitzung (W. Lorenz loc.cit., Vorbemerkung zu §§ 812 ff., nos. 28, 36, 38). Gerichtsurteile dagegen haben zwar (es sei denn, es handelt sich um Gestaltungsurteile) nur deklaratorische Wirkung und schaffen deshalb als solche noch keinen Rechtsgrund (Erman [-Westermann and Buck-Heeb], BGB II[12], § 812, no. 79). Allerdings rechtfertigt die Rechtskraft der Entscheidung das Behalten des Zugesprochenen (Sprau loc.cit. no. 98). Eine Bereicherungsklage kann also nicht darauf gestützt werden, der Rechtsstreit sei unrichtig entschieden worden (W. Lorenz loc.cit. § 812, no. 91). Das ist nur dann anders, wenn nach der letzten mündlichen Verhandlung, in der noch zum Sachverhalt hätte vorgetragen werden können, neue Tatsachen eingetreten sind, auf welche sich die materielle Rechtskraftwirkung der Entscheidung nicht erstreckt (BGH 17 February 1982, BGHZ 83, 278, 280; BGH 11 March 1983, NJW 1984, 126, 127; BGH 2 March 2000, NJW 2000, 2022, 2023). Der Rechtslage in Germany ähnelt die in GREECE. Gesetzvorschriften stellen dann, aber auch nur dann einen Rechtsgrund dar, wenn die jeweilige Rechtsänderung als gerechtfertigt gewollt war (Überblick bei Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, nos. 59-60). Ein Beispiel ist die Ersitzung unter CC art. 1041. Keinen Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen der Bereicherung stellt dagegen CC art 1036 (gutgläubiger Erwerb vom Nichtberechtigten) dar. Bereicherungsfest ist nach griechischer Auffassung nur der entgeltliche gutgläubige Erwerb; für ihn entfaltet aber nicht CC art. 1036, sondern die Gegenleistung die bereicherungsrechtlich rechtfertigende Wirkung (Stathopoulos loc.cit. no. 63).

103. Auch HUNGARY kennt eine Reihe von eigenständigen Ausgleichsmechanismen für bestimmte Fälle des Eigentumsverlustes. Dazu gehören die Regeln über die Rechtsfolgen der Verarbeitung, der Verbindung und der Vermischung (CC §§ 133-135). Umfangreiche und detaillierte Vorschriften regeln den Bau auf fremdem Grund, den Bau mit fremdem Material (CC §§ 136-138) und den Überbau (CC §§ 109 und 110). Die Ersitzung verpflichtet wie üblich nicht zu einem Wertausgleich.. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 195 schließt einen Anspruch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung ausdrücklich aus, wenn es um eine Zuwendung an eine gutgläubige Person geht und die Zuwendung wegen einer Körperverletzung, eines Gesundheitsschaden oder wegen der Tötung eines Menschen erfolgt ist. Ein gutgläubiger accipiens ist durch die Kondiktionssperre dem solvens gegenüber geschützt. Allerdings kann der solvens bereicherungsrechtlich gegen den Schädiger vorgehen (näher Cigoj, Teorija obligacij, 258). Under BULGARIAN LOA art. 59(1) haftet auf Wertausgleich nach bereicherungsrechtlichen Grundsätzen, wer eine fremde Sache durch Vermischung, Verbindung oder Verarbeitung zu Eigentum erworben hat (näher Goleva, Obligazionno pravo[4], 293). Den gutgläubigen Erwerber einer beweglichen Sache trifft eine solche Bereicherungshaftung dagegen nicht; der ehemalige Eigentümer muss sich nach Delikts- und Bereicherungsrecht an den Verfügenden halten (Vassilev, Bulgarsko Veshtno pravo[2], 206). Leistungen auf aufgehobene Urteile und kassierte Schiedssprüche können wiederum mit der Bereicherungsklage zurückgefordert werden (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 585).

104. Zum DUTCH law siehe bereits note V94. ESTONIAN LOA § 1027 sagt nicht ausdrücklich, was unter der Abwesenheit eines Rechtsgrundes für die jeweilige Vermögensverschiebung zu verstehen sei. Gleichwohl unterliegt es keinem Zweifel, dass das Gesetz selber einen solchen Rechtsgrund schafft, wo es den Rückforderungsanspruch ausschließt (wie z.B. in LOA § 99(1) bei Verbrauchern unbestellt zugesandter Ware oder ungeschuldet erbrachter Dienstleistung; ein Bereicherungsrechtsanspruch setzt hier eine Irrtum des Lieferanten voraus). Einen bereicherungsrechtlichen Bestandsschutz genießen unter Ccom (Äriseadustik of 1 September 1995) arts. 158 and 280 auch die Gesellschafter bestimmter Kapitalgesellschaften für zuviel ausgezahlte Gewinne, es sei denn, die überzahlten Beträge sind zur Befriedigung der Gesellschaftsgläubiger erforderlich. Ausgeschlossen ist auch die Rückforderung einer auf der Grundlage eines unwirksamen Vertrages übertragenen beweglichen Sache, wenn sie der Empfänger fünf Jahre lang ununterbrochen in gutgläubigem Eigenbesitz gehabt hat (Law of Property Act [Asjaõigusseadus of 1 December 1993] § 110); bei Immobilien beträgt die entsprechende Ersitzungsfrist 30 Jahre. Andere Beispiele für den gesetzlichen Ausschluss von Ansprüchen aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung liefern das Fundrecht (Law of Property Act § 100) und das Recht des gutgläubigen Erwerbs vom Nichtberechtigten (Law of Property Act § 95(1)). Schließlich ist auch anerkannt, dass ein Gerichtsurteil einen Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen darstellen kann (Supreme Court 9 June 2006, civil matter no. 3-2-1-25-06; Supreme Court 19 October 2004, civil matter no 3-2-1-107-04).

105. Court orders and statutory provisions may in the NORDIC countries exclude a right to vindication or other restitution of property. SWEDISH HD 28 February 1942, NJA 1942, 39 might be seen as an example. Die Klage eines Mannes, dessen Vaterschaft in einer früheren Entscheidung festgestellt worden war, auf Rückzahlung des an die Mutter und das Kind gezahlten Unterhalts wurde abgewiesen, obwohl inzwischen gerichtlich festgestellt worden war, dass er doch nicht der Kindsvater sei. Einen gesetzlichen Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen des Erlangten stellt z.B. die Ersitzung von Grundeigentum dar, die sich in Sweden (bei Gutgläubigkeit) schon nach Ablauf von zehn, sonst nach Ablauf von zwanzig Jahren vollzieht (Land Code [jordabalken] chap. 16 §§ 1 und 2). (In DENMARK tritt Eigentumserwerb durch Ersitzung sowohl bei Mobilien als auch bei Immobilien erst nach Ablauf von zwanzig Jahren und nur bei Gutgläubigkeit ein, [Danske lov 5-5-1]; FINLAND kennt den Eigentumserwerb durch Ersitzung nicht mehr). Die Möglichkeit des gutgläubigen rechtsgeschäftlichen Erwerbs vom Nichtberechtigten ist dagegen nicht nur in Sweden (Land Code [jordabalken] chap. 18; Act concerning Good Faith Acquisitions of Movable Things [lag (1986:796) om godtrosförvärv av lösöre]), sondern auch in Finland (Land Code [jordabalken] chap. 13 § 4; Ccom [handelsbalken] chap. 11 § 4) gesetzlich anerkannt, und zwar sowohl für Immobilien als auch für Mobilien. In Denmark existieren entsprechende gesetzliche Vorschriften nur für Immobilien (Act on Land Registry [Lovbekendtgørelse 2006-03-09 no. 158 om tingslysning] §§ 1, 5 and 7); die Möglichkeit des gutgläubigen Erwerbs von Mobilien ist nur das Ergebnis einer richterrechtlichen Rechtsentwicklung (Einzelheiten bei Mortensen, Tingsretten, 176). Danish Act regarding certain consumer contracts [Lov om vise forbrugeraftaler, 2004-06-09 no. 451] § 8 clearly states that the consumer may keep unsolicited goods delivered to him or her unless delivery is made by mistake. In Sweden und Finland existiert diese Regel dagegen bislang nicht; klar ist nur, dass such conduct does not result in a binding contract (Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[11], 70).

VII. Freiwillige Zuwendungen und Leistungen auf eine Naturalobligation

106. Zur Rückforderbarkeit freiwilliger Zuwendungen und von Leistungen auf eine sogen. Naturalobligation siehe die notes under VII.–2:103.

VIII. Rückforderbarkeit wegen Zweckverfehlung

107. Obwohl der Code Napoléon keineswegs alle condictiones des römisches Rechts geregelt hat, geht die Lehre traditionell davon aus, dass sie Bestandteil des FRENCH law geworden sind (Demogue, Traité des Obligations en général III, no. 129). Man ist deshalb der Auffassung, dass Zahlungen auf eine künftige cause, die sich nicht verwirklicht hat, grundsätzlich im Wege einer action en répétition zurück verlangt werden können, und zwar unabhängig von einem Irrtum des Zahlenden und auch unabhängig davon, ob die Zuwendung in dem Willen erfolgte, eine Naturalobligation zu erfüllen oder sonst aus einem Gefühl von Billigkeit, Feinfühligkeit oder Ehre geschah (Aubry and Rau [-Ponsard and Dejean de la Bâtie], Droit civil français VI[7], nos. 309-310 pp. 465-466). Ein gesetzliches Beispiel findet sich in CC art. 1088 (Schenkung wegen bevorstehender Heirat; Eheschließung bleibt aus). In der BELGISCHEN Rechtslehre (de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge III(2)[3], no. 4 p. 9) ist unter Berufung auf Demogue sogar behauptet worden, CC arts. 1235 und 1376 würden alle condictiones des römischen Rechts einbeziehen, die nicht die Nichtigkeit von Verträgen beträfen. Daher sei auch die condictio causa data causa non secuta Teil des belgischen Rechts (de Page loc.cit. no. 8 p. 15).

108. Die moderne SPANISH Lehre zum Bereicherungsrecht anerkennt neben der Leistungs- und der Eingriffskondiktion auch the so-called condictio por inversión o desembolso. Sie betrifft Fälle, in denen eine Person einer anderen etwas zuwendet, ohne dazu vertraglich oder sonst rechtsgeschäftlich verpflichtet zu sein (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 128; Miquel González, Enriquecimiento injustificado, 2807). Mit dem Konzept der condictio por inversión o desembolso wird eine kohärente wissenschaftliche Klassifikation mehrerer Spezialregelungen des Zivilgesetzbuches angestrebt. Im Näheren unterscheidet man, in Anlehnung an den deutschen Sprachgebrauch, zwischen der condictio de regreso (Rückgriffskondiktion) and the condictio por impensas (Verwendungskondiktion). Erstere betrifft die ungeschuldete Erfüllung fremder Verbindlichkeiten; that area is adequately governed by CC arts. 1158 and 1210. The condictio por impensas is regulated by CC arts. 453 and 454 (assessment of possession) and CC arts. 360 ff (accession). Einige Fälle, die in den Anwendungsbereich dieser Vorschriften fallen, werden jedoch mehr und mehr unter dem Aspekt des Rechts der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung analysiert (zustimmend Quesada Sánchez, La Ley, 2005 (4) 1719, 1730; kritisch zu diesem Trend dagegen Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 50; 270). In TS 27 March 1958, RAJ 1958 (1) no. 1456 p. 940 hatte der Kläger, who was about to marry the daughter of the defendant, invested some money to improve an apartment. Nach der Auflösung der Verlobung verklagte er den Vater seiner ehemaligen Verlobten und Eigentümer der Wohnung. Der Supreme Court gab dieser Klage auf Ersatz des Wertes der Verbesserungen aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung statt. Ganz ähnlich entschied CA Badajoz 1 October 2003, BDA JUR 2004/48273, wo die Erben eines jungen Mannes, der gestorben war, bevor er seine Verlobte heiraten konnte, den entsprechenden Anspruch geltend gemacht haben. Der Klage wurde gleichfalls unter dem Gesichtspunkt der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung stattgegeben. Auf das Prinzip der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung stützte schließlich auch TS 30 July 1996, RAJ 1996 (3) no. 6411 p. 8566 seine Entscheidung zugunsten einer Witwe, deren Mann, Gemeinderatsmitglied in einem kleinen Ort, der Gemeinde aus seinen privaten Mitteln die Finanzierung zweier Tennisplätze ermöglicht hatte, die im Eigentum der finanziell angeschlagenen Gemeinde verblieben.

109. Die ITALIAN Rechtsprechung operiert verhältnismäßig häufig mit der im Schrifttum durchaus umstrittenen (näher Belfiore, La presupposizione, passim) Kategorie der presupposizione. Der Ausdruck bezeichnet eine (tatsächliche oder rechtliche, gegenwärtige, vergangene oder zukünftige) Lage objektiver Natur, die von den Parteien bei Vetragsschluss vorausgesetzt wurde und wirksam blieb, auch wenn sie im Vertrag selber keine Erwähnung fand (Cass. 5 January 1995, no. 191, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, 34). Für die Lehre von der presupposizione ist eine gesetzliche Grundlage nur schwer zu finden; gelegentlich scheint sie auf CC art. 1467 gestützt zu werden (z.B. von Cass. 24 March 2006, no. 6631, Giust.civ.Mass. 2006, 3). Bleibt eine erhebliche "Voraussetzung" aus (oder liegt sie von Anfang an nicht vor), so führt das nach einigen Entscheidungen zur Vertragsaufhebung (Cass. 24 March 2006, no. 6631, Giust.civ.Mass. 2006, fasc. 3; Cass. 17 May 2005, no. 10340, Obbligazioni e contratti 2005, 3, 265; Cass. 29 September 2004, no. 19563, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, 9), nach anderen zur Unwirksamkeit (Cass. 24 March 1998, no. 3083, Giur.it. 1999, I, 1, 511), zur Anfechtbarkeit (CFI Pavia 24 February 1973, zitiert bei Belfiore loc. cit. 132; CFI Palermo 28 March 1981, Giur.mer. 1981, 885; CFI Palermo 15 January 1981, Giur.it. 1982, I, 2, 539), zur caducazione (Cass. 11 March 2006, no. 5390, Giust.civ. 2006, II, 2331) oder (wegen Fehlen des Rechtsgrundes) zur Nichtigkeit des Vertrages (CA Torino 2 December 1987, Riv.Notar. 1990, 201; Cass. 6 December 1988, no. 6617, Giust.civ.Mass. 1988, fasc. 12; Cass. 11 August 1990, no. 8200, Giust.civ.Mass. 1990, fasc. 8 [Nichtigkeit, wenn die vorausgesetzte Lage schon beim Abschluss des Vertrages nicht besteht; Aufhebbarkeit, wenn die vorausgesetzte Lage später wegfällt; ebenso Cass. 8 August 1995, no. 8689, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, 1498 und Cass. 5 January 1995, no. 191, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, 34]). Gelegentlich wird eine presupposizione auch noch einer stillschweigend vereinbarten Bedingung gleichgestellt (CFI Isernia 18 November 2005, Giur.mer. 2006, 3, 563). Die Rückerstattungsansprüche richten sich naturgemäß nach dem jeweils angewandten Unwirksamkeitsregime.

110. In AUSTRIA wird gesagt, eine Vermögensverschiebung könne ihre Rechtfertigung auch in einer rechtlich nicht bindenden reinen Zweckvereinbarung finden (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 275). Wird dieser Zweck verfehlt, kommt eine condictio causa data causa non secuta in Betracht. Sie wird auf eine Analogie zu CC § 1435 gestützt. Beispiele liefern die Leistung von Geld (OGH 19 March 1980, 3 Ob 531/79) oder Arbeit (OGH 26 February 1963, SZ 36/30) in Erwartung der versprochenen Einsetzung zum Erben, Leistungen im Vertrauen auf die nachfolgende Eheschließung (OGH 2 February 1967, SZ 40/15; OGH 23 June 1969, SZ 42/94; OGH 18 January 1989, SZ 62/5) oder den Fortbestand der Ehe (OGH 14 May 1975, SZ 48/59: Hausbau). Die bloße Zweckvereinbarung muss aber deutlich von einem Schenkungsvertrag (zu Geschenken zwischen Verlobten siehe zudem CC § 1247) unterschieden werden. Ausgeschlossen ist die Kondiktion wegen Zweckverfehlung, wenn dem Leistenden bei Leistung bekannt war, dass der Zweck nicht erreicht werden kann (CC § 1174(1) analog), z.B. dann, wenn die Lebensgefährtin ihrem Partner gegenüber die Eheschließung wiederholt ausgeschlossen hat (Deixler-Hübner, ÖJZ 1999, 201, 206). Für Dienstleistungen, die den vereinbarten Zweck verfehlen, ist ein Bereicherungsausgleich auch dann geschuldet, wenn der Empfänger aus ihnen keinen bleibenden wirtschaftlichen Nutzen erlangt (OGH 2 September 1998, 9 ObA 207/98a; OGH 15 January 1981, JBl 1981, 543; OGH 1 July 1986, 14 Ob 101/86 [unentgeltliche Haushaltsführung durch die geschiedene Frau]). PORTUGUESE CC art. 473(2)in fine enthält eine ausdrückliche Regelung der condictio ob rem bzw. der condictio causa data causa non secuta. Die bereicherungsrechtliche Haftung hat hiernach auch das zum Gegenstand, was wegen Nichteintritts eines Erfolgs erlangt wurde. CC art. 475 (dessen Auslegung weithin mit der von German CC § 815(2) übereinstimmt: Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 529) schließt die Pflicht zur Rückerstattung aus, wenn der Leistende im Leistungszeitpunkt wusste, dass der Erfolg nicht eintreten konnte oder wenn er seinen Eintritt treuwidrig verhindert hat (siehe STJ 11 December 2003, Processo 03B34831; STJ 12 September 2006, Processo 06A1999). Die Rückforderung wird z.B. gestattet, wenn eine Leistung vor Vertragsabschluss in der Erwartung erbracht worden ist, es komme zum Vertragsschluss, dieser aber scheitert; desgleichen dann, wenn in Erwartung eines nicht einklagbaren Vorteils eine Vorleistung erbracht worden ist, etwa für das Versprechen, als Erbe oder Vermächtnisnehmer eingesetzt zu werden, oder in der Erwartung, dass ein Verbrechen nicht bei der Polizei zur Anzeige gebracht werde (Schlechtriem, Restitution und Bereicherungsausgleich in Europa I, ch. 2, no. 203 p. 200; Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 512).

111. Auch GERMAN CC § 812(1)(ii) second alternative erwähnt ausdrücklich den Fall, dass der mit einer Leistung nach dem Inhalte des Rechtsgeschäftes bezweckte Erfolg nicht eintritt (condictio causa data causa non secuta oder condictio ob rem). Die in der preceding note genannten Beispiele stammen überwiegend aus der deutschen Rechtsprechung: Rückforderung einer Leistung zur Abwendung einer dann doch erstatteten Strafanzeige (BGH 23 February 1990, NJW-RR 1990, 827); Verfehlung des Schenkungszwecks bei einer Zweckschenkung (BGH 23 September 1983, NJW 1984, 233); Schenkung an Schwiegersohn zum Hauserwerb in Erwartung intakt bleibender Ehe (CA Düsseldorf 30 March 1995, NJW-RR 1996, 517; see also CA Oldenburg 5 November 2007, FamRZ 2008, 1440). Es kommt darauf an, dass über den mit jeder Leistung notwendig verfolgten Zweck hinaus ein besonderer zukünftig eintretender Erfolg rechtlicher oder tatsächlicher Natur nach dem Inhalt des Rechtsgeschäfts von den Beteiligten vorausgesetzt, aber nicht eingetreten ist (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 812, no. 86). Über die Zweckbestimmung muss tatsächlich Einigkeit bestanden haben; nicht erforderlich ist, dass sie den Charakter einer vertraglichen Bindung trägt (BGH 17 June 1992, NJW 1992, 2690; BGH 10 November 2003, NJW 2004, 512, 513). Auch GREECE anerkennt die Figur der Zweckverfehlungskondiktion (Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 40; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 92), für Verlobungsgeschenke ist sie in CC art. 1348(1) gesetzlich besonders geregelt. Hat der Leistende treuwidrig die Verfehlung des Zwecks herbeigeführt, wird Zweckerreichung in Analogie zu CC art. 207 fingiert (CA Thessaloniki 1426/1984, Arm 39 [1985] 469). Ausgeschlossen ist die Kondiktion auch, wenn der Leistende im Leistungszeitpunkt bereits wusste, dass der angestrebte Zweck nicht erreicht werden konnte (CC art. 905 analog; see Deliyannis and Kornilakis loc.cit. 81).

112. Das HUNGARIAN CC kennt eine Zweckverfehlungskondiktion nicht. CC § 361(1) ermöglicht die Rückforderung von Anzahlungen auf einen später nicht zustande gekommenen Vertrag. Leistungen in Erwartung späterer Heilung eines formnichtigen Vertrages lassen sich nach den Vorschriften des Ungültigkeitsrechts beurteilen, bei deren Lückenhaftigkeit unter Rückgriff auch auf das Bereicherungsrecht. Die Voraussetzungen, unter denen ein Geschenk wegen des späteren Wegfalls des bezweckten Erfolgs zurückverlangt werden kann, sind im Schenkungsrecht geregelt (CC § 582(3); näher Schlechtriem, Restitution und Bereicherungsausgleich in Europa I, ch. 1, no. 77 p. 48); eine Anwendung von Bereicherungsrecht kommt daneben nicht mehr in Betracht. In BULGARIA gehört die condictio causa data causa non secuta dagegen in den Anwendungsbereich von LOA art. 55(1); es handelt sich um eine anerkannte bereicherungsrechtliche Figur (Goleminov, Neosnovatelno obogatyavane, 64; Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 586). Dasselbe trifft für SLOVENIA zu. Wer z.B. einer Braut ein Hochzeitsgeschenk macht, soll es zurückverlangen können, wenn die Eheschließung ausbleibt (Juhart and Plavšak [-Polajnar Pavčnik], Obligacijski zakonik II, art. 190, p. 46).

113. Unter DUTCH CC art. 6:203 sind Leistungen, für die es in Ermagelung einer Verbindlichkeit an einem Rechtsgrund fehlt, zurückzugewähren. An einer Verbindlichkeit fehlt es auch dann, wenn in der fehlgeschlagenen Erwartung eines späteren Vertragsschlusses im Voraus geleistet wird. Ein Bauunternehmer, der in Erwartung des Aufrages schon mit der Arbeit beginnt, hat unter (den im Einzelnen natürlich noch näher zu prüfenden Voraussetzungen des) CC art. 6:210 grundsätzlich einen Anspruch auf Wertersatz; freilich dürfte es regelmäßig an der dafür erforderlichen redelijkheid und billijkheid fehlen. Nicht zurückforderbar sollen Schenkungen in Erwartung einer dann ausbleibenden Eheschließung der Kinder sein (Scheltema, Verbintenissenrecht II, art. 6:203, no. 6 p. 28; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 321 p. 340; Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 804; anders aber wohl CA Amsterdam 24 October 1956, NedJur 1957 no. 368 p. 685). Das ESTONIAN law scheint die Zweckverfehlungskondiktion nicht zu kennen, vgl. Tampuu, Lepinguväliste võlasuhete õigus, 66.

114. Das naheste Äquivalent zur Zweckverfehlungskondiktion ist in SWEDEN and in DENMARK die sogen. doctrine of tacit assumptions (Swedish: förutsättningsläran, Danish: forudsætningslæren); in FINLAND scheint sie allerdings bislang keine Rolle zu spielen (Kivimäki and Ylöstalo, Lärobok i Finlands civilrätt, 339; Wilhelmsson, SvJT 1989, 451-459). The doctrine of (tacit) assumptions ('Geschäftsgrundlage') is concerned with assumptions made by parties to juridical acts, which either fail due to subsequent circumstances or were wrong from the beginning. The effect of its application is invalidity or voidness of the relevant juridical act, and, consequently, the reversal of performances made. Es kann sich entweder um eine individuell-subjektive oder um eine unter den Umständen typische (objective) Voraussetzung handeln. Die Voraussetzungslehre existiert in in vielen Schattierungen (näher Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[11], 274). Sie setzt im wesentlichen voraus, dass es (i) ohne diese Voraussetzung nicht zu dem Rechtsgeschäft gekommen wäre; (ii) dass dieser Umstand der anderen Partei bekannt war oder bekannt gewesen sein muss; und (iii) dass es angemessen erscheint, der anderen Partei das Risiko des Ausbleibens des Umstandes aufzubürden. Das Hauptanwendungsfeld der Voraussetzungslehre ist das Vertragsrecht; sie ist darauf jedoch nicht beschränkt. Manchmal wird sie auch als eine Form der ergänzenden Vertragsauslegung verstanden oder im Kontext von Contracts Act § 36 (unconscionable conditions) erörtert (HD 24 June 1996, NJA 1996, 410; Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(2)[4], 60; Jørgensen, Kontraktsret I, 170). Die Voraussetzungslehre soll nicht auf die eigentliche Erfüllungshandlung anwendbar sein, weil es sich bei ihr nicht um ein Rechtsgeschäft handele; ihr Verhältnis zur condictio indebiti ist streitig geblieben (näher Vinding Kruse, Restitutioner, 271; Jørgensen, UfR 1963, 157-176; Lehrberg, Förutsättningsläran, 283, 384; see also Swedish HD 23 May 1925, NJA 1925, 184 and HD 4 March 1926, NJA 1926, 129 [Veräußerung eines Rechts zum Bäumefällen; anschließendes staatliches Verbot, die Bäume zu schlagen]). HD 30 December 1999, NJA 1999, 793 wies das Argument einer Bank zurück, sie habe in der Annahme geleistet, dass sich das Zielkonto im Plus befinden würde; eine solche Zahlung erfolge auf eigenes Risiko. In CA Skåne and Blekinge 28 February 1967, SvJT 1967, 63 hatte eine Frau Schulden ihres Mannes übernommen und im Austausch hierfür Sachwerte erhalten. Da die Schulden in Wahrheit schon bezahlt worden waren, erhielt der Mann einen finanziellen Ausgleich.

Das Stichwort ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung fiel aber nicht (ähnlich CA Västra Sverige 9 July 1971, SvJT 1972, 1). In HD 27 October 1989, NJA 1989, 614 war der Frau im Scheidungsverfahren die Hälfte der Lebensversicherung des Mannes übertragen worden. Die Versicherungspolice ließ eine solche Übertragung aber gar nicht zu. Das Gericht wies die Klage der Frau, ihr in entsprechender Höhe einen Ausgleich zu zahlen, mit der Begründung ab, die Voraussetzungslehre berechtige nur zur Rückforderung von bereits Geleistetem, begründe aber keine neue Obligation oder einen Anspruch auf Schadenersatz. In DENMARK dürfte es dagegen im Ermessen des Gerichts stehen, auch einen solchen Anspruch zu gewähren (Lynge Andersen/Madsen/Nørgaard, Aftaler og mellemmænd[2], 263).

Illustration 1 is inspired by a combination of Civ. 1ère, 5 March 2008, pourvoi no. 07-13902, Civ. 1ère, 25 June 2008, pourvoi no. 06-19556, Civ. 1ère, 24 September 2008, pourvoi no. 06-11294 and Civ. 1ère, 24 September 2008, pourvoi no. 07-11928; illustration 2 is derived from CA Fejér, Gf. 40 037/2991/11; illustration 3 is taken from BGH 20 July 2005, NJW-RR 2005, 1464; illustration 4 is taken from STJ 22 May 2001, CJ (ST) IX (2001-2) 95; illustration 25 is similar to BGH 11 January 1971, BGHZ 55, 176; illustration 26 is taken from Swedish HD 11 April 2006, NJA 2006, 206; illustration 27 is taken from Cass.civ. 20 January 1998, Bull.civ. 1998, I, no. 18; D. 1999, 500, note Martin, and Cass.civ. 26 April 2007, JCP éd. E no. 25 of 21 June 2007, no. 1800 p. 33; illustration 28 is taken from Bulgarian Supreme Court no. 1329 of 26 June 1984, judgment in civil matters no. 638/84 (second chamber); illustration 35 is similar to CA Barcelona 31 October 2002, BDA JUR 2004/54771; illustration 41 is inspired by CA Frankfurt/Main 13 December 2004, FamRZ 2005, 1833, and similarly TS 27 March 1958, RAJ 1958 no. 1456 p. 940; illustration 42 is taken from CFI Haarlem 9 July 2003, NJF 2003, no 54; LJN no. AI1183; illustration 44 is similar to Cass.civ. 31 January 1995, Bull.civ. 1995, I, no. 59, OGH 3 October 1996, RdW 1997, 275 and BGH 23 September 1999, NJW 2000, 72.

VII.–2:102: Performance of obligation to third person

Where the enriched person obtains the enrichment as a result of the disadvantaged person performing an obligation or a supposed obligation owed by the disadvantaged person to a third person, the enrichment is justified if:

(a) the disadvantaged person performed freely; or

(b) the enrichment was merely the incidental result of performance of the obligation.

COMMENTS

A. General

Overview. This Article creates an exception to the preceding Article and so narrows the range of enrichments which may be regarded as unjustified and giving rise to an enrichment claim under the basic rule. The exceptions are two in number. Firstly, an enrichment which is conferred by the disadvantaged person under an obligation to a third party is justified, but this exception applies only if there is free consent (to the performance) on the part of the disadvantaged person; paragraph (a). Secondly, an enrichment is also justified, even if there was no obligation to confer the benefit on the recipient, if such benefit is an incident of discharging an obligation to a third party: paragraph (b).

Relation to VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified). This Article operates as an exception to VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) in that it provides a justification for enrichments which are otherwise unjustified. Accordingly, this Article has no relevance to enrichments which are already regarded as justified under VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified). This excludes all enrichments which are justified under paragraph (1) of that Article (and not unjustified under paragraph (4) of that Article) because the enriched person was entitled to the benefit of the enrichment by virtue of a contract or other juridical act or, as the case may be, a rule of law or court order.

B. Performance under obligation to a third party: para. (a)

General. Paragraph (a) provides that a person who freely performs to the enriched person in compliance with an obligation owed to a third person confers a justified enrichment. The existence of an obligation to provide the enrichment precludes the disadvantaged person from claiming its reversal. That applies regardless of whether the obligation is valid or void (or avoided). This ensures that performances rendered under a contract normally give rise to liabilities only between the parties to that contract, even though a third party may have obtained a benefit as a result. It reflects the policy that reversal of unjustified enrichments resulting from a given ineffective juridical act is as a rule a matter only for those who concluded that juridical act. A party who has performed a contractual obligation must generally seek redress from the other party to the bargain – in contract law if the contract is valid and under enrichment law if it is not.

Illustration 1

X, a customer of bank D, instructs the bank to transfer funds to the credit of E, a football club of which X is the chairperson and to whom X is indebted. The bank makes a payment to the credit of E in accordance with X's instruction. D was mistaken at the time of transfer as to X's creditworthiness and would not have made the transfer if it had known the true situation as regards the state of X's financial arrangements.

Nonetheless D has no enrichment claim against E. D's right to repayment of the money transferred is exclusively against X, to whom D was contractually obliged to effect the transfer. That D's contractual claim against X may be worthless if X is insolvent does not affect the matter.

Illustration 2
D is engaged by X, the vendor of computer equipment, to correct a defective installation of pre-installed software on a network of computers sold by X to E and operating in E's premises. After D has completed the work, but before any payment by X to D, X becomes subject to insolvency proceedings. D has no enrichment claim against E because any enrichment of E is the result of D's performance of a contractual obligation to X to perform to E. D is confined to a contractual claim against X, even if D's claim against X is virtually worthless. D took on this risk of insolvency when contracting with X.

Illustration 3
D contracts with X, a tenant of a building owned by E, to install a new heating system and carries out the work. E may have been enriched in so far as under the applicable property law the heating system may have become part of E's property. Even if the contract between D and X is void or avoided (so that D has no contractual claim against X for remuneration of the service provided), D still has no claim under enrichment law against E, assuming there is nothing like fraud, threats or unfair exploitation affecting the matter. Since E's enrichment results from D discharging an obligation to X, the enrichment is justified in relation to E, as a third party to the obligation, even though the obligation was of no effect. The enrichment is only unjustified in relation to X. D has an enrichment claim against X.

Illustration 4
T is a tenant of land let by L. The rent is relatively low, but T is obliged under the terms of the lease to renovate and convert a building on the land. T procures for this purpose from bank B a loan which T intends to finance by sub-letting the land to third parties. The loan is secured by a charge over the land granted by L. After the conversion of the building is finished, L resolves to sell the land. T is agreeable to the sale provided the loan is repaid out of the proceeds of sale. B releases the charge when L procures an alternative security, namely a guarantee from bank X. In breach of the agreement with T, L fails to pay off the loan. After unsuccessfully seeking re-payment from T, who has defaulted on the loan, B successfully sues X on the basis of the guarantee. Y (the assignee of X) has no claim under this Book against T, even though T is undoubtedly enriched by X's discharge of his debt to B (decrease in liabilities). However, X benefited T in the performance of an obligation which X owed to L, L having procured the guarantee of T's debt as a replacement security. Having paid B, X (and thus Y as successor to X's right) had a contractual claim against L on the terms of the agreement under which X undertook to L to enter into the guarantee of T's debt to B.

Performance of an obligation owed to a third party. While the obligation owed to the third party need not be valid, it is critical that what the disadvantaged person has done to benefit the enriched person lies within the four corners of the obligation. The immunity of a third party to a juridical act from an enrichment claim by the disadvantaged person depends on the enrichment being conferred in compliance with that obligation. An enrichment of another which is not covered by even a void or avoided obligation to a third party is not within the purview of this Article. An enrichment is therefore not justified under this Article merely because the disadvantaged person wrongly supposed there was an obligation to a third party to perform. A case in point here is where the performing party meant to discharge the obligation and tendered the performance with that in mind, but in fact did something which had nothing to do with the contract. A direct claim against the other party to the contract would often be a nonsense: what has been done was not at the contractual partner's bidding. Where the enrichment conferred is not envisaged by the terms of the juridical act – for example, because it departs from them in some fundamental manner (such as conferring benefit on the wrong person) – the disadvantaged person may seek reversal of the enrichment directly from the recipient.

Illustration 5
X instructs his bank, D, to make a payment to Y. As a result of carelessness for which D is solely responsible, D makes a corresponding payment to E instead of Y (though meaning to pay Y). D may reclaim under this Book the money paid to E by mistake. E has not been enriched by D's compliance with an obligation to a third party (X) because D was not required to pay E under the terms of the mandate.

Illustration 6
A debtor D granted a debiting facility to company C, a contractual creditor. Via its bank B1, C causes D's account at the bank B2 to be debited with certain sums. Because C's performance is sub-standard, D objects to the debit and, since the debit functions only on the basis of ratification, B2 is obliged to credit D's account, as B2 is obliged to do under the terms governing the debit facility. However, under the terms of the inter-bank framework agreement regulating the debit facility, B2 can no longer reclaim the sums from B1: although D objected to the debit within the time period allowed under its contract with B2, the debit was reversed after the expiry of the period provided for by the framework agreement. B2 has a direct claim under this Book against C. B2's transfer which benefited C was not made in performance of a contractual obligation to D since there was no authorisation for the transfer (D not ratifying the debit). The enrichment of C is not justified as against B2.

Rationale. This Article rests on the policy consideration that as a rule a party who incurs a (real or apparent) obligation to another must look for redress from the party to whom the obligation was owed (be it a right to counter-performance under a valid contract or a right to reversal of the enrichment of the apparent creditor). The rationale is that the parties to the contract have sought themselves out and, as regards any restitutionary claims arising out of the failure of their purported contractual agreement, ought to look only to their counterpart for recompense since in the usual case it was from that other party (and not any other person who may be directly or incidentally benefited) that the disadvantaged party expected its counter-performance. As a rule it would be impolitic to permit a party who has performed an obligation under a contract which is without effect to claim redress under the law of unjustified enrichment from someone other than the other party to the contract. To do so would provide the performing party with a windfall – a right not bargained for – and an opportunity to circumvent the risk of insolvency of the contractual counterparty which was willingly accepted when the bargain was concluded. Accordingly, where a party performs an obligation under a contract which is void or avoided, the claim in enrichment law must normally be made against the other party to the contract.

Exception. An exception to this fundamental principle is made only where the underlying juridical act (by virtue of which the third party to the transaction has benefited) is void (or avoided) and the disadvantaged person's obligation is vitiated by incapacity, fraud, threats, or unfair exploitation. In this case the assumption underpinning the primary rule that the performing party has sought out the contractual partner and accepted the risk of disappointment is challenged because the consent to those risks has been extracted rather than entered into freely.

Illustration 7
D solemnly undertakes to X to pay € 500 to E and subsequently performs the undertaking. The undertaking is void as a binding promise if D lacks contractual capacity. In that case D has an enrichment claim against E in respect of the payment. In view of D's lack of capacity, the enrichment is unjustified, notwithstanding that E is a third party to the juridical act.

Illustration 8
X, who has stolen E's car, brings it to D's garage. Supposing X to be the owner, D agrees to effect various necessary repairs at usual rates. After completing the repairs, but before the car is collected, the true situation emerges. X has absconded. D demands payment for the services from E. Although D was contractually bound to X to render the service, the contract is voidable for fraud and D avoids the contract. D may have an enrichment claim against E. Admittedly any enrichment of E results from D's performance of a contractual obligation to X, but as that obligation is (retrospectively) without effect and as the enrichment is obtained as a result of X's fraudulent misrepresentation, the exception applies and E's enrichment is not justified in relation to D.

No exception for error. A distinction of importance is that in contrast to the factors which prevent a disadvantaged person from freely consenting to a disadvantage or freely performing an obligation (incapacity, fraud, threats and unfair exploitation), error is only relevant in the context of consent to the disadvantage (i.e. for paragraph (1)(b) of VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified)). If the performance of an obligation is based on an error (including an error which vitiates an underlying juridical act), the enrichment may nonetheless be justified. This restriction on the relevance of error is to be viewed as the reverse side of the significance of incapacity, fraud, threats and unfair exploitation. Those factors – unlike mistake – are regarded as so fundamental as to justify encroaching on the principle that reversal of enrichments in the context of a (void or avoided) contract should take place only between the parties to that contract and that enrichment liability is not to be imposed on third parties to that contract. In the case of fraud and other serious vitiating factors, a person who has benefited directly from the disadvantaged person's performance of an obligation to another is deprived of immunity from an enrichment claim in order that in suitable cases (i.e. where that third party has benefited gratuitously and is otherwise not deserving of protection) the disadvantaged party may proceed directly against the recipient of the benefit. This will be of particular importance in cases of fraud, where the deceiving contractual partner may have absconded and a claim to reversal of the enrichment solely in the contractual line is more or less worthless, while the end recipient is ascertainable and still in possession of a bounty.

Illustration 9
S has agreed to act as surety for M's debt with the bank B1. Under the contract of suretyship S authorises B1 to debit the debt, should it fall due, directly from S's account with bank B2. B1 acts on this debit authority. B2 pays B1, although the account of S is not sufficiently in credit to cover the sum debited; S is insolvent. B2 has no enrichment claim against B1. B2 has performed freely and rendered a contractual performance to S. While B2 may not have checked whether S's account was sufficiently in credit and would not have paid B1 had it known the state of S's account, this is merely a matter of error and does not affect the fact that B2 performed freely.

Third parties with a right to performance. A difficult question arises where there is a contract for the benefit of a third party by virtue of which the third party is entitled (under Book II, Chapter 9, Section 3 (Effect of stipulation in favour of third party) to compel performance of an obligation under the contract for the benefit of the third party. Is the third party in such circumstances to be regarded as a party to the obligation? An affirmative answer has the effect that the enrichment is potentially unjustified in relation to the third party, from whom the performing party may then be able to demand a reversal of the enrichment. A negative answer will as a rule immunise the third party from a direct enrichment claim of the performing party, who must look for recourse from the other party. Since the third party can demand performance it seems natural to regard that party as a party to the obligation and fitting that the third party should take the burden associated with the benefit – i.e. a liability to give back (directly to the performing party) the enrichment which the third party had a right to demand (directly from the performing party). If that is the outcome, the other party to the obligation and the third party must be regarded as solidarily liable for the reversal of the enrichment. However, the better view must be that a mere right to demand performance cannot in itself render a person a party to the obligation (which category extends to assignees). Such rights are subject to the defences which the performing party may have vis-à-vis the other party to the obligation (see II.–9:302 (Rights, remedies and defences) paragraph (b)), so that the mere holder of a right to a performance is not a party to the obligation in a complete sense. Pointing in favour of the latter view, by contrast, is the apparent illogic that the purpose of conferring on a third party a right to performance is to enhance the position of the third party and to regard the third party as a party to the obligation would have the seemingly curious result that the third party is burdened with a liability under unjustified enrichment law which would not otherwise have existed. In other words, the third party is 'better off' if a mere beneficiary without any colour of right to a performance. Moreover, the other party to the obligation may have a defence to an enrichment claim of the performing party and that defence could be circumvented if the performing party is able to sue the third party directly for a reversal of the enrichment.

Assignees and other creditors. The same principle applies in cases where performance is rendered to an assignee or where the performing party is instructed to perform directly to a creditor of the other party to the contract. The situation is otherwise only where the assignee is not a mere assignee but a person who has taken over obligations as well as rights of a party to the transaction. A party who is substituted may be a party to the obligation where an assignee alone would not be.

Illustration 10
D concludes with X a contract for the purchase of a quantity of paper which is to be imported by X from a manufacturer, Y. According to Y's specifications, which X has passed on to D, the paper is suitable for use in printing. After the contract is concluded, X's right to payment of the purchase price by D is assigned to E and D is given notice of the assignment. D pays the purchase price to E. It is later discovered that contrary to the mutual assumption of D and X the paper is of an inferior grade and cannot be used for printing. D avoids the contract on grounds of mutual mistake. D has no claim against E under the law of unjustified enrichment for repayment of the price. E's enrichment is justified because it resulted from D's performance under D's contract with X. It is immaterial in this case that the contract was without effect. D's unjustified enrichment claim is against X.

Illustration 11
E contracts to purchase a quantity of sugar from X, who covers that contract with an option for X to buy sugar from D. X exercises the option and orders D to deliver directly to E. D makes the delivery to E. Even if D's contract with X is without effect D has no unjustified enrichment claim against E. E's enrichment is justified under this Article because it is obtained as a result of D's performance of a contractual obligation with X, and E is a third party to that contract. D has only a claim against X.

Further applications. The principle may apply even where the disadvantaged person, by conferring a benefit on the recipient, has unwittingly performed an obligation owed to a third party. Such a situation may arise due to statutory rules (such as rules for the protection of a debtor acting in good faith) which in special circumstances enable a performance that would otherwise normally not constitute a performance nonetheless to discharge the obligation.

Illustration 12
D, a debtor, pays the creditor, E. Unknown to D, E had earlier assigned the right against D to the assignee X. E (having assigned the right) was not entitled to the enrichment from D. D was mistaken in assuming the existence of an obligation to pay E, when it was in fact X who was entitled to payment. However, D cannot demand a repayment from E. Although D has not paid the creditor (X), D is nonetheless discharged from the obligation: see III.–5:119 (Performance to person who is not the creditor) paragraph (1). D has discharged the obligation to the new creditor (the assignee X) in performing to the former creditor (assignor E). E's enrichment is justified under this Article in relation to D. E's liability is to X.

C. Incidental benefit to enriched person from performance to a third party: para. (b)

General. Paragraph (b) provides that a person who incidentally enriches another while freely performing an obligation owed to a third person confers a justified enrichment on the person incidentally enriched. As in the case of paragraph (a), this applies regardless of whether the obligation is valid or void (or avoided). These two provisions may be regarded as a composite, protecting the third party from an enrichment claim in most cases where a legal relationship (especially a contractual one) between the disadvantaged person and a third party was the essential reason for the enriched person being enriched. The notional boundary between the two provisions lies in the fact that whereas paragraph (a) is essentially concerned with the case where the object of the performance is to benefit the enriched person (as a third party to the juridical act), paragraph (b) comes into play where the enrichment of the third party to the juridical act was not the object of the performance, merely an (incidental) outcome.

Illustration 13
As a result of E's negligence, X's car is damaged. While the car is being repaired, X hires a car from D. It is agreed that payment of hire charges will not be due until X takes action against E to recover compensation. However, under the applicable national consumer credit legislation, the agreement to postpone payment of the hire charges constitutes a provision of consumer credit and the hire contract is unenforceable for want of compliance with prescribed formalities. Consequently X is able to make use of the car without any contractual or enrichment liability to D to provide recompense. As a result of X being able to use the car hired from D without having to pay for that use, X's consequential loss arising from the damage to the car under repair is mitigated. It is assumed that this correspondingly reduces the sum of compensation due from E to X in respect of the negligent causation of the damage. E is therefore enriched by a decrease in liabilities. D has ultimately conferred a benefit on E. However, E's enrichment is justified in relation to D: E obtained the enrichment as a result of D's discharge of a valid (though unenforceable) obligation to X.

Illustration 14
X, the owner of a disused workshop, commissions D to clear it out and prepare it for a change of use. As a result of an error (for which X is responsible) contained in the fax sent to D, X provides D with the wrong unit number and D clears out and prepares disused premises owned by E. E was not entitled to this enrichment – either against D or against X. However, D's contract with X is valid as a contract to refurbish the premises referred to in the fax (see inter alia II.–7:201 (Mistake)) and D was therefore obliged to X to provide this benefit. D's enrichment of E is justified; it results from D's discharge of an obligation owed to X. Consequently D has a contractual claim against X, but no enrichment law claim against E. Any enrichment liability of E will be to X: X did not consent to the disadvantage (incurring a contractual debt to D) without error, because X was mistaken as to the details of the performance due under the agreement.

NOTES

I. Nichtrückforderbarkeit von Zuwendungen an einen accipiens in Erfüllung eines wirksamen Schuldverhältnisses zwischen solvens und seinem Gläubiger

1. Zuwendungen, die ein Schuldner (der solvens) in Erfüllung einer wirksamen Obligation nicht an seinen Gläubiger, sondern an einen Dritten (den accipiens) erbringt, kann der solvens im Grundsatz nach keiner Rechtsordung vom accipiens zurückverlangen. Bei funktionaler Betrachtung gibt es von diesem Grundsatz zwar Ausnahmen, doch sind sie typischerweise gerade nicht bereicherungsrechtlich konzipiert. So haben Subunternehmer under FRENCH Gesetz of 31 December 1975 (Loi no. 75-1334 relative à la sous-traitance, JO of 3 January 1976, 148) art. 12 im Falle der Insolvenz des Haupt- oder Generalunternehmers einen Erfüllungsanspruch gegen den Werkbesteller (den Bauherren) in Höhe des ausstehenden Werklohnes. (Diese action directe wird sogar mit der Folge als loi de police i.S.v. CC art. 3 qualifiziert, dass sie sich auch gegenüber einem von den Parteien vereinbarten ausländischen Recht durchsetzt: Cass.ch.mixte 30 November 2007, D. 2008, 5, note Delpech.) Der Anspruch des Subunternehmers gegen den Bauherren kann aber nur auf die genannte gesetzliche Sonderbestimmung, nicht auf das Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung gestützt werden (Cass.civ. 9 December 1992, pourvoi n° 91-11210, Bull.civ. 1992, III, no. 319 p. 197; Cass.civ. 13 July 1993, pourvoi no. 91-17634; Cass.civ. 25 March 1998, pourvoi no. 96-18641). Dieses folgt vielmehr dem Grundprinzip der Nichtrückforderbarkeit bei Leistungen in Erfüllung eines wirksamen Schuldverhältnisses. Es wird auf den in CC art. 1165 verankerten Grundsatz der Relativität des Vertrages gestützt. (Under CC art. 1236 kann außerdem jede interessierte Person die Verpflichtung einer anderen wie ein Mitschuldner oder Bürge erfüllen. Selbst eine Person, die kein eigenes Interesse an dem Schicksal der fremden Verpflichtung hat, kann sie unter bestimmten weiteren Voraussetzungen erfüllen [Cass.civ. 31 January 1989, Bull.civ. 1989, I, no. 51 p. 33]. Die Zahlung erfolgt auch dann nicht ohne Rechtsgrund, führt folglich gleichfalls nicht zu einem Rückforderungsrecht gegen den accipiens, vgl. Cass.civ. 8 December 1976, Bull.civ. 1976, I, no. 396 und Cass.com. 21 January 2003, pourvoi no. 99-13474). Unter BELGIAN CC art. 1798 (i.d.F. von 1990) haben Subunternehmer, die mit der Errichtung eines Gebäudes oder sonstigen Werkes beauftragt sind, einen direkten Anspruch gegen den Bauherren in Höhe seiner gegenüber dem Generalunternehmer noch verbliebenen Schuld. Der Direktanspruch setzt voraus, dass der Generalunternehmer noch über die Forderung gegen den Bauherren verfügen kann; der Direktanspruch des Subunternehmers erlischt deshalb im Fall der Insolvenz des Generalunternehmers (Cass. 27 May 2004, no. JC045R3_1, no. de rôle C020435N).

2. Auch in SPAIN können Schulden durch Zahlung an eine andere Person als den Gläubiger des solvens erfüllt werden. Abgesehen vom Fall des Vertrages zugunsten Dritter (teilweise geregelt in CC art. 1257(2)), bei dem die Leistung an den Dritten zugleich die Schuld gegenüber dem Vertragspartner des Leistenden tilgt, ist ein Schuldner unter CC art. 1162 auch befreit, wenn er an einen accipiens leistet, den der Gläubiger zur Entgegennahme der Leistung ermächtigt hat. CC art. 1163(2) ermöglicht eine Leistung an einen Dritten sogar ohne Zustimmung des Gläubigers, wenn diese Leistung dem Gläubiger zum Vorteil gereicht. In all diesen Fällen bringt die Zahlung an den accipiens das Schuldverhältnis zwischen dem solvens und seinem Gläubiger zum Erlöschen; ein Rückforderungsrecht besteht folglich nicht. Auch CC art. 1163(2) schließt eine condictio indebiti aus (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 496). Thus, increase of assets that arises from performance to a third person under a valid and effective contract cannot be reversed (see Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 290 and 330 sowie, wenn auch etwas vorsichtiger formulierend, Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 63). Dasselbe Ergebnis lässt sich mittelbar auch aus den vertragsrechtlichen Regelungen der CC arts. 1573 and 487 ableiten. Hier ist vorgesehen that the lessor is not obliged to reverse the profits arising from the improvements made by the lessee during the lease contract. Diese Regel soll sich nach herrschender Auffassung ohne Schwierigkeiten auch auf die Vertragspartner des lessee ausdehnen lassen (Martínez de Aguirre Aldaz, CCJC 38 [1995], 613, 628; Álvarez-Caperochipi, El enriquecimiento sin causa[3], 167; anderer Auffassung Jiménez Horwitz, FS Díez-Picazo II, 2073, 2084). Subunternehmern gewährt allerdings auch Spanish CC art. 1597 eine acción directa gegen den Bauherren. Der Anspruch ist der Höhe nach auf den Betrag begrenzt, welchen der Besteller des Werkes dem Generalunternehmer schuldet. Die Vorschrift betrachtet, so wird gesagt, "den Schuldner meines Schuldners auch noch als meinen Schuldner" (TS 11 October 1994, RAJ 1994 (4) no. 7479 p. 9739; TS 10 March 2005, RAJ 2005 (2) no. 2225 p. 4727). Ihr Zweck besteht folglich gerade nicht darin, eine ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung des Bestellers rückgängig zu machen (Carrasco Perera/Cordero Lobato/González Carrasco, Derecho de la construcción y la vivienda[5], 351; TS 4 November 2004, RAJ 2004 (4) no. 6484 p. 13143), sondern darin, einer eng begrenzten schutzbedürftigen Personengruppe aus Billigkeit einen besonderen rechtlichen Vorteil zu verschaffen (Carrasco Perera/Cordero Lobato/González Carrasco loc.cit.; Bercovitz Rodríguez-Cano [-Rodríguez Morata], Comentarios al Código Civil[2], 1885). Ein Widerspruch zu VII.–2:102 besteht deshalb aus der Sicht des allgemeinen Bereicherungsrechts nicht. Allerdings hat TS 12 July 2000, RAJ 2000 (4) no. 6686 p. 10232 the so-called doctrine of enriquecimiento indirecto ('indirect enrichment') entwickelt. A hatte einen Frachter an B verkauft, der noch vor vollständiger Zahlung des Kaufpreises C damit beauftragt hatte, den Frachter umzubauen. After C had completed the work, A terminated the contract with B for failure to pay the price. Da B auch nicht an C zahlte, nahm C den A aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung in Anspruch. Der Supreme Court gab diesem Anspruch im Gegensatz zu den Vorinstanzen für den Fall statt, dass B insolvent war. Es habe sich um einen ersatzpflichtigen enriquecimiento indirecto gehandelt. Die Entscheidung ist im Schrifttum teilweise auf Zustimmung (Jiménez Horwitz loc.cit., id., FS Albaladejo I, 2527-2532) gestoßen, überwiegend aber schweigend übergangen worden (allgemeine Kritik an der Lehre von der indirekten Bereicherung allerdings schon bei Álvarez-Caperochipi loc. cit. 164-167). Auch CA La Rioja 20 November 2003, BDA JUR 2004/31327 hat sich TS 12 July 2000 loc. cit. angeschlossen. Dieses Urteil ist allerdings mit zahlreichen anderen Entscheidungen des Supreme Court schlechterdings unvereinbar (z.B. TS 14 February 1998, RAJ 1998 (1) no. 984 p. 1560; TS 20 September 1989, RAJ 1989 (5) no. 6323 p. 7318; TS 14 December 1994, RAJ 1994 (5) no. 10111 p. 12935 and TS 4 November 2004, RAJ 2004 (4) no. 6484 p. 13143, followed by CA Barcelona 30 December 2002, BDA JUR 2003/165784) und deshalb in seiner Bedeutung schwer einzuschätzen. Das Verhältnis der genannten Rechtsprechungslinien zueinander ist nicht klar; es lässt sich derzeit nur sagen, that the doctrine of the so-called enriquecimiento indirecto has not been unequivocally adopted by the Tribunal Supremo. Nach der Mehrzahl seiner Entscheidungen gilt anscheinend auch heute noch der Grundsatz, dass enrichments that arise from performance of an enforceable obligation owed to the creditor of the solvens under a valid and effective contact cannot be reversed by means of an unjustified enrichment claim.

3. ITALIAN CC art. 1188(1) bestimmt, dass die Zahlung an den Gläubiger oder an seinen Vertreter oder an die vom Gläubiger bezeichnete oder gesetzlich oder gerichtlich zum Empfang ermächtigte Person zu erfolgen hat. Die an eine nicht zum Empfang berechtigte Person erfolgte Zahlung befreit den Schuldner nur, wenn sie der Gläubiger genehmigt oder wenn er daraus Nutzen gezogen hat (CC art. 1188(2)). Der adiectus solutionis causa ist nicht selbst klagebefugt (Cass. 19 October 1955, no. 3307, Giust.civ. 1956, I, 1327); es handelt sich lediglich um die Person, von der der Schuldner mitgeteilt hat, dass sie berechtigt ist, die Leistung mit schuldbefreiender Wirkung entgegen zu nehmen (Cass. 18 June 1987, no. 5353, Giust.civ.Mass. 1987, fasc. 6; Cass. 20 January 1983, no. 568, Giust.civ.Mass. 1983, 190). Solche Leistungen können natürlich nicht zurückgefordert werden. Die Anweisung begründet die Pflicht, an den Dritten zu zahlen; die adiectio nur eine entsprechende Befugnis. Beim Vertrag zugunsten eines Dritten (CC art. 1411) erwirbt der Dritte vorbehaltlich einer gegenteiligen Abmachung ein Recht gegen den Versprechenden. Sowohl im Verhältnis zwischen Versprechenden und Versprechensempfänger als auch im Verhältnis zwischen dem Versprechensempfänger und dem Dritten bedarf es einer causa; liegt sie vor, schließt sie eine Rückforderung gleichfalls aus. Under AUSTRIAN law sind Leistungen, die der Vordermann in einer Vertragskette dadurch erbringt, dass er direkt an den Gläubiger seines Gläubigers liefert oder zahlt, grundsätzlich durch die jeweiligen Verträge gedeckt. Eine actio de in rem verso (zu ihr und der älteren Rechtsprechung Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 288) wird von der neueren Rechtsprechung abgelehnt (OGH 15 July 1999, 6 Ob 2/99h; kritisch aber Koziol and Welser loc.cit.). Eine Werkstatt, in welche der zahlungsunfähige Mieter das reparaturbedürftige Auto des Eigentümers bringt, hat also keinen Anspruch gegen den Letzteren (kritisch Wilburg, JBl 1992, 545, 550; auch Perner/Spitzer/Kodek, Bürgerliches Recht[2], 356 betrachten die Frage der actio de in rem verso wieder als "offen"). Der Direktanspruch des solvens gegen den Dritten ist freilich dann nicht ausgeschlossen, wenn die Lieferung oder Zahlung ohne gültige Anweisung des Gläubigers des solvens ausgeführt wurde (OGH 15 December 1987, SZ 60/272).

4. Under PORTUGUESE law können Zuwendungen an einen Dritten in Erfüllung eines wirksamen Vertrages zwischen dem solvens und seinem Gläubiger schon deshalb nicht zurückverlangt werden, weil ein wirksamer Vertrag per se ein Rechtfertigungsgrund für die Vermögensverschiebung ist (STJ 30 May 2006, Processo 06A825). Eine schuldbefreiende Leistung an einen Dritten unterliegt der condictio indebiti nicht (CC art. 476(2) i.V.m. art. 770). Wer unter welchen Voraussetzungen an eine schuldnerfremde Person zahlen darf, regeln CC arts. 767-769, ferner CC arts. 464ff (Recht der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag). Handelt der solvens aus Freigiebigkeit, so kommt zwischen ihm und der durch die Befreiung von ihrer Schuld gegenüber dem accipiens begünstigten Person im Zweifel ein Schenkungsvertrag zustande (CC arts. 940 und 945); selbst wenn das wegen CC art. 768(2) (Zurückweisung der Freigiebigkeit) einmal nicht der Fall sein sollte, bleibt eine repetição do indevido des solvens gegenüber dem accipiens ausgeschlossen (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado II[3], note 2 under art. 767, p. 12). Im Rahmen des Vertrages zugunsten Dritter (CC arts. 443-451) übernimmt der promitente gegenüber dem promissário die Verpflichtung, eine Leistung zu Gunsten eines Dritten zu erbringen. Neben dem Versprechensempfänger erwirbt auch der Dritte einen eigenen Leistungsanspruch (CC art. 444). Für einen bereicherungsrechtlichen Rückforderungsanspruch ist auch dann kein Raum (Einzelheiten bei Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 569, 586; vgl. auch STJ 24 October 2006, Processo 06A2496). Ein Vertrag für eine erst zu benennende Person (CC arts. 452-456; contrato para pessoa a nomear) kommt zustande, wenn sich einer der Vertragsschließenden das Recht vorbehält, einen Dritten als Berechtigten oder Verpflichteten zu benennen. Anders als beim Vertrag zugunsten Dritter rückt hier die benannte Person rückwirkend in die Rechtsstellung der den Vertrag schließenden Person ein; diese scheidet aus dem Vertrag aus. Der Vertrag kann auch bedingt werden (näher STJ 23 January 1986, BolMinJus 353 [1986] 429). Besondere bereicherungsrechtliche Fragestellungen wirft er aber nicht auf.

5. Unter GREEK CC art. 417 kann die Leistung an den Gläubiger oder an eine von ihm, vom Gericht oder vom Gesetz ermächtigte Person erfolgen; see A.P. 470/1999, EllDik 41 (2000) 53. Durch eine Leistung an eine andere Person als den Gläubiger wird die Schuld auch dann erfüllt, wenn der Gläubiger die Leistung genehmigt oder sie ihm zum Vorteil gereicht (CC art. 417(2); see A.P. 1170/1997, EllDik 40 [1999] 602). Eine Leistung, durch die eine Schuld erfüllt wird, kann nicht kondiziert werden (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 78).

6. Auch in HUNGARY kann ein solvens eine Zahlung nicht vom accipiens zurückverlangen, wenn sie in Erfüllung einer Pflicht gegenüber dem Gläubiger des solvens erfolgte. Der Dritte wird quasi als "Leistungsort" angesehen. Schwierigkeiten bereitet nur der Fall, dass der solvens seine Zahlung irrtümlich an einen "falschen" accipiens erbringt. Die Rückforderungsansprüche richten sich dann nach den Umständen des Einzelfalls; u.a. ist zu prüfen, ob der accipiens in einem solchen Fall überhaupt bereichert ist, was wiederum davon abhängen kann, ob er dem Gläubiger des solvens eine Gegenleistung erbracht hat oder schuldet (BH 2005/115). Der Vertrag zugunsten Dritter (CC § 233) unterliegt den allgemein üblichen Regeln. In BULGARIA ist zweifelhaft, ob die Direktkondiktion des einen Vertrags mit einem anderen erfüllenden solvens gegen den accipiens grundsätzlich ausgeschlossen ist. Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 600 will einen solchen Direktanspruch jedenfalls dann gewähren, wenn ein Händler (B) dem Pächter eines landwirtschaftlichen Betriebes (C) Saatgut liefert, das C nicht bezahlt. Dann soll der Verpächter (A) auf Kosten des B ungerechtfertigt bereichert sein.

7. DUTCH CC art. 6:30 bestimmt, dass eine Verbindlichkeit grundsätzlich auch durch eine andere Person als den Schuldner erfüllt werden kann. Die Vorschrift findet aber keine Anwendung, wenn der solvens in Erfüllung einer Pflicht gegenüber seinem Gläubiger an den Dritten zahlt. Beim Streckengeschäft (A ist Schuldner des B, B Schuldner des C, A zahlt auf Anweisung des B direkt an C) wird bereicherungsrechtlich überwiegend der delegans (B), nicht der delegataris (C) als Leistungsempfänger i.S.v. CC art. 6:203 angesehen. Die Zahlung des solvens an den accipiens (oder delegataris) hat ihren Rechtsgrund dann in dem Vertrag zwischen solvens und delegans; sie erfolgt m.a.W. nicht ungeschuldet (näher Schoordijk, Onverschuldigde betaling, 23-30). Andere meinen jedoch, dass im Falle des Streckengeschäfts beide Verpflichtungen in ihrer Gesamtheit den Rechtsgrund bilden. Folglich könne der solvens von dem Empfänger das Zugewandte bereits dann kondizieren, wenn auch nur eine dieser Verpflichtungen unwirksam sei. Allerdings sei ein gutgläubiger delegataris zu schützen; ihm gäbe bereits sein Vertrag mit dem delegans einen Grund zum Behaltendüfen (Hartkamp, WPNR 2004, no. 6596, p. 851, 853; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 330; Scheltema, RM-Themis 2000, 126–132; Schoordijk loc.cit.). Bei der sogen. titulierten Delegation (Schuldübernahme [CC art. 6:155], Verträge zugunsten Dritter [CC art. 6:253(1)], Bürgschaft [CC art. 7:850], Zession) lägen die Dinge ähnlich. Auch hier ist der delegans Schuldner des delegataris (oder accipiens). Der solvens nimmt die Schuld des delegans auf sich, weil er letzterem selber schuldet; die Leistung des solvens an den delegataris hängt aber zugleich von der Wirksamkeit des Verhältnisses zwischen delegans und delegataris ab. Auf einen Mangel in diesem Verhältnis kann sich deshalb auch der solvens berufen.

8. Under ESTONIAN law performances made to a third party under a valid contract may not be reclaimed. Die Grundregel lautet vielmehr, dass die Rückabwicklung nur innerhalb der jeweiligen Rechtsbeziehung stattfindet (Hussar and Kivisild, Juridica IV/2005, 272). When a bank (A), upon its customers's (B) instruction (a payment order under LOA § 703), transfers money to B's creditor (C) without realising that B's account contained insufficient funds, C's enrichment is justified (zur Beziehung zwischen der Bank und ihren Kunden in einem solchen Fall siehe noch LOA § 715(2)). Hat die Bank (A) die Weisung ihres Kunden (B) ausgeführt, ist dessen Vertrag mit seinem Gläubiger (C) aber unwirksam, dann scheint ein Anspruch der Bank gegen (C) gleichfalls ausgeschlossen zu sein (Tampuu, Lepinguväliste võlasuhete õigus, 76). Ein Vertrag zu zugunsten Dritter (LOA § 80) berechtigt den Dritten zum Behaltendürfen der Leistung. Hat er allerdings auf das ihm unter dem Vertrag eingeräumte Recht verzichtet (LOA § 80(8)), dann ist für eine schon erbrachte Leistung ein Bereicherungsausgleich geschuldet. Der Leistende kann sich sowohl an den Dritten (LOA § 1028) als auch an seinen unmittelbaren Vertragspartner (LOA § 1030(1)) halten (Varul/Kull/Kõve/Käerdi, Võlaõigusseadus I, 246).

9. Die Lösung der NORDIC Rechtsordnungen stimmt mit der unter diesem Article überein. A contracting party may not seek compensation from a third party when the contract fails, even if the third party indirectly enjoys an advantage from the performance of the contract (Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(2)[4], 127; Karlgren, Obehörig vinst och värdeersättning, 45; Bryde Andersen and Lookofsky, Obligationsret I[2], 427; Hellner, FS Goode, 167-190). Verträge zugunsten Dritter können, müssen dem Dritten aber nicht ein eigenes Forderungsrecht einräumen (Jørgensen, Kontraktsret I, 86; Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[11], 139; Zackariasson, Direktkrav, 183). Eine Direktkondiktion des solvens gegen den Dritten (den accipiens) schließt die herrschende Meinung in beiden Fällen grundsätzlich aus (Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 378; Vinding Kruse, Restitutioner, 140; Ussing, UfR 1937 B, 108-115; Hakulinen, Obligationsrätt, 198). Ein Direktanspruch wird auch dort abgelehnt, wo ein Subunternehmer in Erfüllung seines Vertrages mit dem Generalunternehmer direct an dessen Vertragspartner liefert (Hellner/Hager/Persson loc cit. 143; HD 30 October 2007, NJA 2007, 758; Vinding Kruse loc.cit. 160, 181; Ulfbeck, Kontrakters relativitet, 175, 329).

II. Rückforderbarkeit von Zuwendungen an einen Dritten in Erfüllung eines unwirksamen Vertrages?

10. In der alternativen Fallgestaltung leistet der Schuldner (der solvens) auf einen unwirksamen Vertrag mit seinem (Schein-)Gläubiger an den accipiens. Auch hier ist die verbreitetste Regel die, dass sich der solvens rückabwicklungsrechtlich grundsätzlich an seinen eigenen Vertragspartner (den Scheingläubiger) halten muss. Selbst der Direktanspruch des Subunternehmers gegen den Bauherren (note 1 above) besteht nach FRENCH Cass.civ. 17 February 1999, pourvoi no. 96-21875 nicht, wenn der Vertrag des Subunternehmers mit dem Generalunternehmer nichtig ist; der Bauherr könne in einem solchen Fall höchstens noch aus Deliktsrecht haften, doch setze das eine faute voraus. Sie habe in dem fraglichen Fall aber allein den Generalunternehmer getroffen. Im Übrigen unterliegen Rückgabeansprüche infolge einer Annullierung des Vertrages nach Cass.civ. 24 September 2002, Bull.civ. 2002, I, no. 218; D. 2003, 369, note Aubert nicht dem Recht der répétition de l'indu, sondern dem Nichtigkeitsrecht. Wurde ein nichtiger Vertrag ausgeführt, so ist zwischen den Vertragsparteien der status quo ante wiederherzustellen; ist das nicht in natura möglich, so ist die Leistung nach ihrem Wert zu vergüten (Cass.civ. 29 February 1972, Bull.civ. 1972, IV, no. 77 p. 73; Cass.civ. 16 March 1999, Bull.civ. 1999, I, no. 95; Defrénois 1999, 1325, obs. Delebecque). So verhält es sich auch in BELGIUM (de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge II(1)[3], no. 817).

11. In SPAIN restitutionary claims arising from nulidad or anulabilidad (CC art. 1303) or from rescission or termination (CC arts. 1295 and 1124) are personal claims that can be only addressed to the contractual party, but not to a third person, see, for nullity and avoidance, Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán, Las nulidades de los contratos, 242-245, 268, and for rescission and termination CC art. 1295(2) [wonach es nicht zu einer Vertragsaufhebung kommt, wenn sich die Sachen, die Gegenstand des Vertrages sind, rechtmäßig im Besitz eines gutgläubigen Dritten befinden], sowie Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 614). Eine Ausnahme von dieser Grundregel findet sich aber in CP art. 111, which provides for a restitutionary claim with proprietary effect when the invalid contract amounts to a crime or misdemeanor. In den "normalen" Fällen dagegen, in welchen der solvens (A) in vermeintlicher Erfüllung seines unwirksamen (aber nicht strafbaren) Vertrages mit (B) an den accipiens (C) liefert und Letzterer an den gelieferten Gegenständen (kraft Gesetzes oder Vertrages) Eigentum erwirbt, führt die Analogie zu den Regeln des Eigentumsrechts zu einem Ausschluss auch der Eingriffskondiktion (näher Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 288) gegen den accipiens. Die Eingriffskondiktion established in CC arts. 360, 375, 379(2) and 383(1) in the context of accession soll A (basically, a subcontractor) nur gegen B, nicht gegen C zustehen (Basozabal Arrue loc.cit. 290, pointing out that the contract between C and B is causa for C to retain the enrichment). Sollte C ausnahmsweise kein Eigentum erworben haben, haftet er nach dieser Logik dem solvens A dagegen auch bereicherungsrechtlich, kann aber B in Regress nehmen. Ersteres wird u.a. damit begründet, dass C kondiktionsrechtlich nicht starker geschützt werden dürfe als eigentumsrechtlich, und das nur diese Lösung mit den Regeln des Rechts des Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnisses korrespondiere (Basozabal Arrue loc.cit. 290-291). In Fällen, in welchen es sich nicht um den Wertersatz für Güter, sondern um Geldersatz für Dienstleistungen handelt, tragen diese Analogien allerdings nicht. Hier dürfte selbst die acción directa des Subunternehmers gegen einen Bauherren aus CC art. 1597 ausgeschlossen sein, weil sie (wie in France) einen wirksamen Vertrag zwischen dem solvens (A) und seinem Vertragspartner (B) voraussetzt (Bercovitz Rodríguez-Cano [-Rodríguez Morata], Comentarios al Código Civil[2], 1886). Ein Ausgleich für solche Dienstleistungen kommt also nur unter CC art. 1307 in Betracht, und hierbei handelt es sich um einen persönlichen Anspruch gegen den Vertragspartner (B), nicht gegen den tatsächlichen Empfänger der Dienstleistung (C).

12. In ITALY ist Ausgangspunkt CC art. 1372(2), wonach Verträge nur in den gesetzlich vorgesehenen Ausnahmefällen für oder gegen Dritte wirken, so dass auch die Rückabwicklung eines Vertrages grundsätzlich auf die Vertragsparteien beschränkt bleibt. Im Näheren ist aber zwischen verschiedenen Fallgestaltungen zu unterscheiden. Für das Recht der Dienst- und Arbeitsleistungen ist CC art. 1676 zu beachten, der denjenigen, die in Abhängigkeit von einem Werkunternehmer "ihre Tätigkeit oder Dienstleistung" zur Verfügung stellen, einen Direktanspruch auch gegen den Besteller des Werkes in Höhe des Betrages haben, den der Werkunternehmer ihnen schuldet (näher Cass. 10 July 1984, no. 4051, Giur.it. 1985, I, 1, 616). Unternehmer und Werkbesteller haften insoweit als Gesamtschuldner (Cass. 27 September 2000, no. 12784, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 2008; Cass. 6 March 1985, no. 1857, Giust.civ.Mass. 1985, fasc. 3); der Werkbesteller wiederum hat einen bereicherungsrechtlichen Regressanspruch gegen den Werkunternehmer (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[6], sub art. 1676, I, § 7). CC art. 1676 findet freilich weder auf Subunternehmer, noch auf diejenigen Anwendung, die Ware auf eine Baustelle liefern (CFI Lodi 18 April 2005, Corriere del merito 2005, 876). Es erscheint unter Berücksichtigung von CC art. 2126 (Arbeitnehmerschutz bei nichtigem Arbeitsvertrag) zwar vertretbar, einem Gehilfen, dessen Vertrag mit dem Werkunternehmer nichtig ist, auch einen bereicherungsrechtlichen Direktanspruch gegen den Werkbesteller zu gewähren, doch liegt zu dieser Frage bislang wohl noch keine Entscheidung vor. In Fällen, in welchen ein Subunternehmer auf einen unwirksamen Vertrag mit dem Generalunterunternehmer eine Dienstleistung (ein facere) zugunsten des Bauherren erbringt, ist fraglich, wer Adressat des bereicherungsrechtlichen Wertausgleichsanspruches ist. Gegen einen Direktanspruch gegen den tatsächlichen Empfänger der Dienstleistung sprechen sowohl der nach CC art. 2041 erforderliche Kausalnexus zwischen Bereicherung und Nachteil als auch die Subsidiarität der Bereicherungsklage (CC art. 2042). Bereicherung und Nachteil müssen ihre Ursache in demselben fatto generativo haben, was in den Fällen des sog. arricchimento indiretto (also z.B. bei einer von einer anderen Person als dem Eigentümer der Sache in Auftrag gegebenen Reparatur: Cian and Trabucchi loc.cit. sub arts. 2041-2041, IV, § 3) typischerweise nicht der Fall ist. Folglich kommt ein Direktanspruch gegen den tatsächlichen Empfänger der Dienstleistung grundsätzlich nicht in Betracht (Cass. 10 February 1993, no. 1686, Giur.it. 1994, I, 1, 626; Cass. 17 February 1984, no. 1189, Giust.civ.Mass. 1984, fasc. 2); der Dienstleistungserbringer muss sich an seinen vermeintlichen Vertragspartner halten. Im Schrifttum wird diese Regel allerdings intensiv und kontrovers diskutiert (Nachweise bei Cian and Trabucchi loc.cit. sub arts.

2041-2041, IV, § 3). Auch wenn ein Subunternehmer aufgrund eines nichtigen Kaufvertrages mit einem anderen Unternehmer Ware direkt an dessen Kunden (z.B. einen Bauherren) liefert, vollzieht sich die Rückabwicklung grundsätzlich innerhalb der Vertragsbeziehungen. Ein Anspruch auf Wertausgleich gegen den Kunden nach den sachenrechtlichen Ausgleichsmechanismen für einen gesetzlichen Eigentumsverlust (CC arts. 936 und 937) ist außerordentlich zweifelhaft, weil CC art. 936 erkennbar nur eine Zweipersonenbeziehung im Blick hat. Die Vorschrift ist zwar ohne weiteres anwendbar, wenn der Vertrag zwischen Lieferant und neuem Eigentümer nichtig ist oder angefochten wurde (Bianca, Diritto civile VI, 366; Cass. 26 November 1988, no. 6380, Dir. e Giur. Agr. 1989, 87), doch besagt das nichts für die Situation, in welcher der Vertrag zwischen dem Lieferant und einem Dritten (der gleichzeitig Vertragspartner des neuen Eigentümers ist) unwirksam ist. CC art. 937 schließlich umfasst zwar auch Fälle, in welchen der Grundstückseigentümer einen (wirksamen) Vertrag mit jemandem geschlossen hat, der fremde Materialien verwendet und einbaut (Cass. 22 January 1998, no. 803, Giust.civ.Mass. 1998, 131); ist der Grundeigentümer gutgläubig, haftet er in einem solchen Fall dem ursprünglichen Eigentümer der Materialien nur in Höhe des Betrages, den der Grundeigentümer noch seinem eigenen Vertragspartner schuldet (CC art. 937(3)). Aus dieser Vorschrift lässt sich jedoch ebenfalls nichts für die Situation ableiten, in welcher der Eigentümer seine eigenen Materialien aufgrund eines Vertrages mit einem anderen auf dem Grundstück des Grundeigentümers einbaut.

13. Die Grundregel des AUSTRIAN Rechts lautet, dass bereicherungsrechtliche Rückabwicklungen den rechtlichen Leistungs-, nicht den tatsächlichen Lieferbeziehungen folgen, selbst im Falle des Doppelmangels. Denn es gilt, das Risiko der Schuldnerinsolvenz nicht zu verlagern (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 282; OGH 24 November 1976, SZ 49/145; OGH 14 December 1983, SZ 56/186; OGH 31 January 1985, SZ 58/19). Nur wenn der solvens auch auf ein Schuldverhältnis mit dem Empfänger leistet, kann er auch direkt bei ihm kondizieren (z.B. ein Bürge, der auf eine nichtige Hauptschuld an den Gläubiger zahlt: Koziol and Welser loc.cit. 284). Sonst ist er gegen den Dritten auf den Vindikations- und einen evtl. Verwendungsanspruch beschränkt; ein Anspruch aus Leistungskondiktion scheitert ganz einfach an der Abwesenheit einer Leistung i.S.v. CC § 1431 (kritisch allerdings Spielbüchler, JBl 2001, 38). Umgekehrt kann ein Schuldner, der im Falle einer unwirksamen Zession gutgläubig an den Zessionar leistet, das Geleistete nach herrschender (freilich gleichfalls nicht unbestrittener) Auffassung nur vom Zessionar wieder zurück verlangen (Karollus, JBl 1994, 573; contra Markowetz, ÖJZ 2001, 581; differenzierend Holzner, JBl 1995, 401). Under PORTUGUESE CC art. 478 (subjektive Nichtschuld) kann ein solvens, der eine fremde Verpflichtung in der irrigen Überzeugung erfüllt, dem Schuldner dieser Verpflichtung gegenüber hierzu verpflichtet zu sein, das Geleistete nicht vom accipiens zurückverlangen; er hat nur das Recht, von dem auf diese Weise befreiten Schuldner dasjenige zu fordern, womit dieser ungerechtfertigt bereichert ist. Ein Direktanspruch gegen den accipiens besteht nur, wenn dieser den Fehler kannte, als er die Zuwendung erhielt. Im Übrigen aber ist die ihm zugeflossene Mehrung seines Vermögens als gerechtfertigt anzusehen, weil ihr eine causa solvendi zugrundeliegt (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 534). Für den Fall der Unwirksamkeit des Vertrages zwischen dem solvens und seinem Auftraggeber folgt das Prinzip der Rückabwicklung innerhalb der jeweiligen Vertragsbeziehung im Übrigen bereits aus CC art. 289: die Pflichten zur Rückgewähr von Leistung und Gegenleistung sind nach portugiesischer Auffassung eine unmittelbare Folge der Unwirksamkeit des Rechtsgeschäfts und betreffen folglich nur die daran beteiligten Personen (Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 445).

14. Die GREEK Rechtsprechung akzeptiert, dass der Schuldner, der auf einen unwirksamen Vertrag an einen Dritten leistet, einen Bereicherungsanspruch gegen den vermeintlichen Gläubiger hat, wenn der Dritte als Vertreter des Gläubigers handelte (A.P. 691/1973, NoB 22 [1974] 178; CA Athens 2229/1977, Arm 31 [1977] 642). Es wird aber auch die Auffassung vertreten, dass der Rückforderungsanspruch des Schuldners gegen den vermeintlichen Gläubiger voraussetzt, dass das an den Dritten Geleistete den vermeintlichen Gläubiger tatsächlich erreicht; andernfalls müsse sich der Schuldner an den Dritten halten (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 78).

15. In HUNGARY folgt die Rückabwicklung ungültiger Verträge dem vertragsrechtlichen Regime des Ungültigkeitsrechts (CC §§ 237 ff); ein Ausgleich findet also stets nur zwischen den Vertragsparteien statt. Ein solvens kann gegen den accipiens allerdings im Wege der Vindikation vorgehen, wenn dieser kein Eigentum an der gelieferten Ware erworben hat, weil der Vertrag zwischen dem solvens und dem Dritten ungültig ist und es an einem anderen Erwerbstatbestand für den accipiens fehlt (Vékás, Magyar Jog 2003, 385, 386f; Gellért [-Petrik], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 428; Pomeisl, Gazdaság és Jog 11/2004, 3). Ein Bereicherungsanspruch des solvens gegen den accipiens scheitert in der Regel schon daran, dass der accipiens nach ungarischer Auffassung gar nicht bereichert ist: er wird die ihm gelieferte Ware entweder schon an seinen eigenen Vertragspartner (den Dritten) bezahlt haben oder diesem zumindest Zahlung schulden. In beiden Fällen ergibt sich eine ausgeglichene Bilanz. Zudem wird der Vertrag zwischen dem accipiens und dem Dritten als Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen der Zuwendung des solvens verstanden, vgl. CC § 361(1). Selbst wenn dieser Vertrag (ebenfalls) ungültig sein sollte, scheidet eine Direktkondiktion des solvens gegen den accipiens aber aus. Denn Letzterer muss solchenfalls das Empfangene dem Dritten zurückgewähren, was bei der bilanziellen Betrachtungsweise des ungarischen Rechts wiederum zu dem Ergebnis führt, dass der accipiens auch in seiner Beziehung zum solvens nicht als bereichert anzusehen ist. In BULGARIA wird bei Verträgen zugunsten Dritter die Leistung an den Dritten selbst dann dem solvens (z.B. einer Lebensversicherung) gegenüber für kondiktionsfest angesehen, wenn dessen Vertrag mit dem Versprechensempfänger angefochten oder sonst unwirksam ist. Ein Vetrag zugunsten Dritter entfaltet zugunsten des Dritten Wirkung bereits mit Abschluss des Vertrages zwischen Versprechendem und Versprechensempfänger (Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast[4], 157). Der solvens muss sich deshalb rückabwicklungsrechtlich gemäß LOA art. 55(1) an den Versprechensempfänger halten (see LOA art. 22(3)).

16. Im DUTCH law lautet der Ausgangspunkt, dass ein solvens (A), der auf einen unwirksamen Vertrag hin an einen Dritten (C) zahlt oder liefert, nicht den Dritten, sondern nur seinen eigenen Vertragspartner (B) in Anspruch nehmen kann, und zwar aus CC art. 6:203. Mängel im Verhältnis (A) zu (B) berühren die Rechtsstellung des (C) nicht. Das ist jedenfalls dann gesichert, wenn der Vertrag zwischen dem accipiens (C) und dem delegans (B) wirksam und der accipiens (oder delegataris) gutgläubig ist. Der accipiens soll dagegen dann nicht geschützt sein, wenn er kein Recht gegen den delegans hat, weil der Vertrag zwischen ihnen unwirksam ist; in diesem Fall soll der solvens die Zahlung bzw. Lieferung über CC art. 6:203 vom accipiens zurückverlangen können (Schoordijk, Onverschuldigde betaling, 47). Der solvens wird an diesem Rückforderungsrecht allerdings kein Interesse haben, weil er dem delegans gegenüber entweder über CC art. 6:34(1) (hatte der solvens einen vernünftigen Grund, an den accipiens zu zahlen, dann erlischt nach CC art. 6:34 die Schuld des solvens gegenüber dem delegans) oder ganz einfach deshalb geschützt ist, weil der solvens durch die Lieferung bzw. Zahlung an den accipiens seine (des A) Schuld gegenüber

(B) erfüllt hat. Folglich hat im Ergebnis nur der delegans ein Interesse und ein Recht, den delegataris aus Bereicherungsrecht in Anspruch zu nehmen: der delegans ist verarmt, weil er von dem solvens, jedenfalls, sofern dieser gutgläubig an den accipiens geleistet hat, nichts mehr verlangen kann (CC art. 6:34(1)), und der delegataris ist durch die Zuwendung des solvens als bereichert anzusehen. Sind allerdings bei einem Streckengeschäft (B kauft bei A und verkauft die Ware weiter an C; B bittet A, die Ware direkt bei C abzuliefern) beide Verträge nichtig, dann soll der solvens (A) nach herrschender Meinung die Ware vom accipiens (C) nicht 'nur' vindizieren, sondern auch kondizieren können (näher zu alledem Schoordijk loc.cit.; Scheltema, Onverschuldigde betaling, no. 3.6.1.3, p. 104, van Dunné, Verbintenissenrecht II[5], 663; Scheltema, Verbintenissenrecht II, art. 6:203, no. 11.2, p. 54 und no. 11.3 pp. 55-64; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 192; id., Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 330; id., WPNR 2004, no. 6596, p. 851, 853 und 854; Scheltema, RM-Themis 2000, 124–128). Ist in einem Vertrag einem gutgläubigen Dritten ein Recht eingeräumt worden und war dieser damit einverstanden, dann hat der solvens gegen den Dritten auch dann kein Rückforderungsrecht, wenn der Vertrag mit dem delegans unwirksam ist (CC art. 3:36). In solchen und anderen Fällen der sogen. titulierten Delegation kann der solvens (Versprechender, Bürge, Schuldübernehmer etc.) dem accipiens gegenüber allerdings geltend machen, unter dem "Druck der Umstände", d.h. unfreiwillig geleistet zu haben (CC art. 6:30 und HR 22 April 1983, NedJur 1984, no. 726 p. 2561). Der solvens kann folglich in einem solchen Fall das Geleistete vom accipiens als ungeschuldet zurückverlangen (Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk [-Valk], T & C Burgerlijk Wetboek[6], art. 6:30, no. 1, p. 2144; Brunner and de Jong, Verbintenissenrecht algemeen, no. 77, p. 60; Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 158; van Dunné, Verbintenissenrecht I[5], 641-642; siehe ferner Cahen, Overeenkomst en derden, 46-53). Besteht bei einer Schuldübernahme der Anspruch des Gläubigers gegen den Schuldner nicht und hat der Übernehmer gleichwohl geleistet, so steht ihm gegen den Gläubiger natürlich ein Rückforderungsrecht aus CC art. 6:203 zu. Denselben Anspruch soll aber auch der alte Schuldner haben, weil er seine Schuld gegenüber dem Gläubiger durch den Schuldübernehmer habe tilgen wollen. War dagegen die Schuldübernahme nichtig, kann der Übernehmer nach Leistung an den gutgläubigen accipiens nur gegen den wahren Schuldner vorgehen bzw. mit der Zahlung aufrechnen. Bei einem Doppelmangel soll sich der Schuldübernehmer sowohl an den accipiens als auch an den wahren Schuldner halten können (Schoordijk loc.cit. 89-90; teilweise anders Scheltema, Onverschuldigde betaling, 118-119). Ähnlich ist die Lage im Bürgschaftsrecht. Ist der Vertrag zwischen Hauptschuldner und Gläubiger nichtig, dann steht dem Bürgen gegen den Gläubiger ein Rückforderungsrecht aus CC art. 6:203 zu; er kann aber auf vertraglicher Grundlage auch direkt gegen den Hauptschuldner vorgehen, der sich seinerseits an den accipiens halten kann, weil er i.S.v. CC art. 6:204 über den Bürgen an ihn ungeschuldet geleistet hat. Ist der Vertrag zwischen Bürge und Hauptschuldner unwirksam, dann steht dem Bürgen ein Rückforderungsrecht aber nur gegen den Hauptschuldner zu. Im Falle des Doppelmangels soll der Bürge wiederum einen Anspruch gegen beide anderen Parteien haben (Schoordijk loc.cit. 92; Scheltema loc.cit. 119-123).

17. ESTONIAN LOA § 1029 provides that if a transferor performs an obligation with respect to a third party at the order of an obligee or person whom the transferor erroneously believes to be an obligee, the transferor may only demand that that which is transferred be returned by the obligee or person whom the transferor erroneously believed to be an obligee. This provision applies, for example in cases of deficient bank transfers. It has been suggested, however, that when a payment order is lacking, is performed in an amount exceeding that what was ordered, or is forged, a direct claim of the bank against the recipient is justified (Hussar and Kivisild, Juridica IV/2005, 272). In a case where a board member instructed the company shortly before it's bancruptcy to transfer a sum of money to a third person as payment of the company's debt to the board member, the Supreme Court has found that if the third person when accepting the performance knew or should know of the fact that the performance may be recovered in bancruptcy proceedings (e.g. the court may revoke transactions which were concluded by the debtor before the declaration of bankruptcy and which damage the interests of the creditors), the liquidator may demand recovery on the basis of the principle of good faith (LOA § 6) (Supreme Court 19 December 2007, civil matters no. 3-2-1-115-072). A performance made under an invalid contract for the benefit of a third party may be recovered both from the third party and the other contracting party (LOA § 1030(1)). However, if the other party or a person believed to be a party of that contract is not aware and does not have to be aware that the contract or the obligation does not exist, the return of that which is delivered may only be demanded from the recipient (LOA § 1030(2)). Also, in exceptional cases, when the performance is directed only to the third person and the contracting party has no right to claim performance, the transferor should be granted a claim only against the third person (Tampuu, Lepinguväliste võlasuhete õigus, 77). A representative of the recipient is not liable of returning that which was transferred, as he is not the true recipient (Supreme Court 8 May 2006, civil matters no. 3-2-1-32-06).

18. Die Rückabwicklung von auf einen in Erfüllung eines nichtigen Vertrages an einen Dritten erbrachte Leistungen ist in the NORDIC countries bislang kaum diskutiert worden. Es scheint aber selbst in den Fällen, in denen der Dritte ein eigenes Forderungsrecht hat, bei der allgemeinen Regel zu verbleiben, dass sich jeder an seinen Vertragspartner halten muss. Der Dritte ist in diesem Sinn kein Vertragspartner; Versprechender und Versprechensempfänger können den Vertrag bis zum Fälligwerden der Leistung grundsätzlich noch aufheben oder ändern (Arnholm, Sammansatte aftaler, 137; Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[11], 140). Ist aber erst einmal auf den Vertrag geleistet, kann der solvens das Geleistete nicht vom accipiens mit dem Argument zurückverlangen, der Vertrag sei unwirksam gewesen. Das kann vielleicht auch mit einer Analogie zum Recht der Einkaufskommission begründet werden, weil auch hier der Verkäufer keinen direkten Zahlungsanspruch gegen den Kommittenten hat; der Kommissionär hat zwar für dessen Rechnung, aber eben im eigenen Namen gehandelt (Hellner, FS Goode, 167, 183; Zackariasson, Direktkrav, 63).

Illustration 1 is taken from A.P. 1239/2005, DEE 11 (2005) 1210; similarly BH 2005/115; illustration 4 is taken from CA Koblenz 21 February 2005, NJW-RR 2005, 1491; illustration 6 is taken from BGH 11 April 2006, NJW 2006, 1965; illustration 9 is taken from Polish Supreme Court 11 September 1997, III CKN 162/97, OSNC 1998 (2) 31.

VII.–2:103: Consenting or performing freely

(1) If the disadvantaged person's consent is affected by incapacity, fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation, the disadvantaged person does not consent freely.

(2) If the obligation which is performed is ineffective because of incapacity, fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation, the disadvantaged person does not perform freely.

COMMENTS

Absence of free consent: incapacity, fraud, threats and unfair exploitation

General. This Article provides that a person does not consent to a disadvantage or perform an obligation freely if the consent or obligation is affected by incapacity, fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation. Where the consent or performance is so affected, the justifying grounds in the previous Articles which depend on free consent or a freely given performance do not apply.

Overlapping grounds for absence of free consent. In given circumstances there may be several reasons why the disadvantaged person cannot be said to have consented freely to their disadvantage. Nothing turns on this. If any one of incapacity, fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation is made out, the enrichment will not be justified on the basis of free consent.

Meaning of fraud, coercion, threat and unfair exploitation. The notions of fraud, coercion, threats and unfair exploitation invoked in II.–7:205 (Fraud) to II.–7:207 (Unfair exploitation) (the latter referring to taking grossly unfair advantage or excessive benefit) will be material here. However, they are not directly applicable since those provisions are formally concerned only with rights to avoid contracts. Moreover, those terms themselves are not explicitly defined in DCFR Book II; a particular meaning of the concepts may be derived implicitly from those provisions and that meaning must then be transposed to situations where there is no contract at all. So, for example, fraud will occur where the disadvantaged person is led to confer the enrichment by another's representation (or non-disclosure of information which good faith and fair dealing required be disclosed) which was made with knowledge or belief that it was false and was intended to induce the disadvantaged person to make a mistake (cf. II.–7:205(1), (2)). A threat must be of imminent and serious harm. A consent or performance will be affected by unfair exploitation if the enrichment is obtained as a result of a person exploiting the disadvantaged person's situation of distress or vulnerability.

Source of the fraud, threat or unfair exploitation. A second consideration is that the provisions of Book II Chapter 7 Section 2 are focused on demarcating the circumstances in which the vitiating factors of fraud, coercion, threats, and unfair exploitation impact on the validity of the contract. As in the case of mistake, those restrictions are not to be regarded as carried over to this Book, where the concern is not with determining the binding character of a promise, but rather the restitutionary effect of a prestation conferred. Here, for example, it suffices generally that someone has induced the enrichment by fraud, irrespective of whether that was the enriched person or a third person. This is in contrast to the restrictions of II.–7:208 (Third persons), where, if the contractual partner has already acted on the contract, a right to avoid the contract based on the fraud or threats of a third person is made out only if the contractual partner is responsible for the third person's acts or assented to that person's involvement in the contract formation or knew or ought to have known of the relevant facts. Thus VII.–2:103 applies where the disadvantaged person's consent to the disadvantage or performance of the obligation is affected by fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation vis-à-vis the disadvantaged person regardless of the source of the abuse constituting the vitiating factor. The person perpetrating the fraud, coercion, threat or unfair exploitation need not be the enriched person. Nor need the defect in the disadvantaged person's consent to the transaction have been induced by a third party acting on behalf of the enriched person. The source of the fraud, threat or unfair exploitation may be a person unconnected with the enriched recipient of the benefit.

Rationale. The choice here of rules which are less restrictive than in Book II Chapter 7 is deliberate. VII.–2:103, in contrast to the provisions of Book II, applies to cases where there is no contract or other juridical act involved at all. In that case there is no a priori reason why the provisions in Book II should demarcate the outer boundaries of a right to reclaim an enrichment. Given that the existence of an obligation to confer an enrichment constitutes a justification for that enrichment (except for cases within paragraph (4) of VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified)) there is every reason to read the concepts in VII.–2:103 in wide terms.

> Illustration 1
> E, pretending to be X, asks D, a debtor of X, to pay an outstanding debt which is repayable on demand. D pays to E in compliance with that demand to discharge the debt. It is assumed that although D is a victim of E's fraudulent impersonation, D is not protected and the debt to X is not discharged. Consequently X retains the right right to payment of the debt against D. E is enriched by D's payment. That enrichment is unjustified under the terms of this Article since it was obtained as a result of a fraud practised on D, is not obtained as a result of D's free consent to the disadvantage and accordingly is not justified under paragraph (1) of this Article. D has an enrichment claim against E.

Scope of the two paragraphs. In their scope the two paragraphs of VII.–2:103 are complementary. Paragraph (1) is to be understood as a qualification of VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b). It determines the circumstances (other than the disadvantaged person's mistake) in which a consent to a disadvantage does not suffice to provide a legal justification for an enrichment. This will be in issue only in those cases in which there is no binding contract or other valid juridical act concluded between the parties, since whenever there is a valid juridical act the enrichment will be justified under VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(a). Paragraph (2) of VII.–2:103 has the function of qualifying VII.–2:102 ((Performance of obligation to third person) lit. (a). It determines the circumstances in which an enrichment which has been conferred as a result of the disadvantaged person's performance of an obligation to a third party (and which is not a merely incidental result of that performance) is nonetheless not justified. The existence of a valid or apparent legal relationship with a third party which prompted the performance thus does not deprive the disadvantaged person of a direct claim under this Book against the recipient of the performance if the obligation to perform was vitiated by fraud, threats or one of the other factors listed here. It is thus applicable only where the enrichment has been conferred by the disadvantaged person in compliance with the terms of some (valid or ineffective) contractual or other obligation owed to a third party.

NOTES

I. Freiwillige Vermögenshingabe

1. Freiwillige Vermögenshingaben können grundsätzlich auch dann nicht zurückverlangt werden, wenn ihnen (mangels animus donandi) nicht einmal ein Schenkungsvertrag zugrundeliegt. Deshalb kann z.B. under FRENCH law eine Gesellschaft, die zu dem Zweck zahlt, einer anderen Gesellschaft zu helfen und dabei weiß, dass sie zu dieser Zahlung nicht verpflichtet ist, das Gezahlte nicht wieder vom Empfänger (über die Regeln der répétition de l'indu) zurückverlangen (Cass.com. 8 June 1979, Bull.civ. 1979, V, no. 187 p. 153). Dasselbe gilt, falls ein Arbeitgeber seinem Arbeitnehmer (Cass.soc. 24. Juni 1971, Bull.civ. 1971, V, no. 481 p. 404) oder eine Aktiengesellschaft ihrem Vorstandsvorsitzenden (Cass.com. 24 February 1987, D. 1987, 244, note Bénabent) freiwillig mehr zahlt als geschuldet. Die Freiwilligkeit der Zuwendung ist für den Rückerstattungsanspruch, wie gesagt wird, ein obstacle total (Bénabent, Les obligations[10], no. 474).). Erfolgt die Zuwendung allerdings unfreiwillig, steht ihrer Rückforderung nichts entgegen (Cass.com. 15 December 1987, Bull.civ. 1987, IV, no. 280 p. 209). Dasselbe gilt bei einer irrtümlichen Überzahlung, z.B. einer fehlerhaft zu hoch berechneten Kündigungsentschädigung (Cass.soc. 7 December 1993, Bull.civ. 1993, IV, no. 306 p. 208). Die BELGISCHE Rechtsprechung zur répétition de l'indu verlangt vom Kläger den Beweis, den gezahlten Betrag irrtümlich und nicht bewusst (en connaissance de cause) gezahlt zu haben (CA Liège 19 March 2003, no. °JL033J1_1, no. de rôle 1999/RG/16).

2. Auch in SPAIN lässt sich das Grundprinzip nachweisen, wonach freiwillige Vermögenshingaben kondiktionsfest sind, unfreiwillige aber nicht. Consent, as a general rule, must not be affected by error, fraud or threats (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema I[11], 486). Under CC art. 1798 können demgemäß freiwillig bezahlte Wett- und Spielschulden nur dann zurückverlangt werden, wenn fraud oder incapacity vorlagen (näher Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 68-69; Bercovitz Rodríguez-Cano [-Trujillo Díez and Marín López], Comentarios al Código Civil[2], 2088). Der Ausdruck 'fraud' (dolo) wird dabei weiter interpretiert als im Vertragsrecht (Trujillo Díez and Marín López loc.cit. 2090). Vor allem aber kommt das hinter CC art. 1798 liegende allgemeine Prinzip auch in Fällen zur Anwendung, die nichts mit Spiel oder Wette zu tun haben, see, for instance, CA Pontevedra 13 October 2005, BDA JUR 2006/25151 (der Kläger hatte zu hohe Pensionszahlungen von seiner Sozialversicherung erhalten und sie zurückzahlen müssen; die Klage aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung gegen seine inzwischen geschiedene Frau, die von dem Konto, auf das die Überzahlungen geflossen waren, Geld abgebucht hatte, scheiterte, weil der Kläger in diese Kontobewegungen eingewilligt hatte und weil his consent 'was not affected by error or fraud' (FJ 2)). However, it should be note that this consent – the one that justifies an increase of assets – cannot be within Spanish law conceived abstractly. It is therefore generally admitted that vices of consent, i.e. absence of free consent, do not play any role in the performance of an obligation. If a debtor pays his obligation to the creditor under fraud or threats, this payment or performance is valid and effective; der Schuldner kann zwar wegen des gegen ihn begangenen Delikts auf Schadenersatz klagen, ihm steht aber kein restitutionary claim im Hinblick auf das Gezahlte zu (Díez-Picazo loc.cit. 474; Bercovitz Rodríguez-Cano [-Bercovitz] loc.cit. 1399). An exception to this is probably CC art. 1160, according to which the performance of an obligation of deliver a thing is invalid if affected by incapacity (see in more detail Díez-Picazo loc.cit. 479 and Bercovitz loc.cit. 1398).

3. In ITALY sind Fragen der Freiwilligkeit der Vermögenshingabe eng mit der Frage nach der Rechtfertigung einer Vermögensverschiebung verbunden. Zwar kann eine kondiktionsfeste Zahlung auch ohne animus solvendi erfolgen (Breccia, L'arricchimento senza causa I[2], 930, fn. 1; di Majo, Riv.Dir.Civ. 1994, I, 781), doch setzt eine wirksame Vermögensverschiebung eine causa voraus (Moscati, Pagamento dell'indebito, sub arts. 2033-2040, 186). Nach Auffassung des überwiegenden Schrifttums soll es deshalb zur Rechtfertigung der Bereicherung nicht genügen, dass die Entreicherung freiwillig (mit volontarietà) erfolgte (Alpa and Mariconda [-Sirena], Codice civile commentato IV, sub art. 2041, V, § 29). Der Kassationshof freilich ist in diesem Punkt anderer Ansicht (Cass. 14 May 2003, no. 7373, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, fasc. 5; Cass. 21 November 1996, no. 10251, Giust.civ.Mass. 1996, fasc. 1558; Cass. 6 March 1986, no. 1456, Giust.civ.Mass. 1986, fasc. 3); seine Rechtsprechung liegt auf der Linie von VII.–2:103. (Die Frage wird vor allem relevant bei Leistungen, die affectionis vel benevolentiae causa erbracht werden. Für sie wird im Schrifttum behauptet, dass sie nur bezüglich ersparter Aufwendungen, nicht aber bezüglich der Mehrung des Vermögens des Begünstigten rechtfertigend wirkten.) Für Arbeit, die im Rahmen eines Familienunternehmens geleistet wird, wurde in CC art. 230 eine umfassende Regelung geschaffen (zu ihr Sirena loc.cit.); einem Sonderregime unterliegen auch Leistungen einer nicht geschäftsfähigen Person (CC art. 428(1))

4. AUSTRIAN CC § 1174(1) schließt die Kondiktion ausdrücklich für den Fall aus, dass jemand wissentlich eine Nichtschuld leistet. Dabei ist allerdings vorausgesetzt, dass die Leistung weder auf Zwang noch auf List beruht (OGH 4 March 1970, SZ 43/60; OGH 28 September 1988, SZ 61/207); bei Zwang und Drohung entfällt die Irrtumsvoraussetzung der condictio indebiti (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB II(3)[3], § 1431 no. 6). Für einen "Zwang" genügt es, dass die (überhöhte) Leistung auf äußeren Druck erfolgt, z.B. im Hinblick auf eine angedrohte Zwangsvollstreckung (OGH 4 March 1970, SZ 43/60; OGH 21 March 1979, EvBl 1979, 171) oder Kündigung der Wohnung (OGH 28 September 1988 loc.cit.). Kondiziert werden kann auch die erzwungene Erfüllung einer Naturalobligation (Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger [-Koziol], ABGB[2], § 1432 no. 1). PORTUGUESE STJ 11 May 2000, CJ (ST) VIII (2000-2) 54 hat das Rückforderungsbegehren eines Restaurantbetreibers gegen die Telefongesellschaft in einem Fall abgelehnt, in welchem der Kläger Telefonschulden seines Vorgängers beglichen hatte, nachdem die Gesellschaft die Unterbrechung der Telefonverbindung angekündigt hatte. Die Zahlung sei nicht nur in Kenntnis der Fremdheit, sondern auch freiwillig (CC art. 403(2)) erfolgt, weil die Gesellschaft vertraglich zu dieser Ankündigung berechtigt gewesen sei und es sich deshalb bei Letzterer nicht um eine Drohung im Rechtssinne gehandelt habe. Ein Rückzahlungsanspruch bestehe weder aus CC art. 476 (weil die fremde Schuld tatsächlich bestanden habe), noch aus CC art. 477 (weil der Kläger gewusst habe, dass es nicht um eine eigene Schuld ging), noch aus CC art. 478 (weil der Kläger wusste, dass er auch dem Voreigentümer nicht zur Begleichung von dessen Schuld verpflichtet war). Der Kläger trete aber gemäß CC art. 592 in die Rechte der Telefongesellschaft gegen den früheren Restaurantbetreiber ein. CC art. 304(2) schließt die repetição do indevido ausdrücklich aus, wenn jemand freiwillig eine verjährte Forderung erfüllt; dasselbe gilt unter CC art. 403(1) für die freiwillige Erfüllung einer Naturalobligation, see infra II15. CC art. 2089 schließlich berechtigt einen Erbschaftsverwalter, die Aktiva der Erbschaft einzutreiben, wenn entweder mit einer Verzögerung eine Gefahr für den Nachlass verbunden ist oder wenn die Zahlung spontan (=freiwillig) erfolgt: die Frewiwilligkeit ist mithin auch hier ein Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen.

5. GREEK CC art. 905 und GERMAN CC § 814 schließen Bereicherungsansprüche auf Grund von Leistungen aus, wenn der Leistende gewusst hat, dass er zur Leistung nicht verpflichtet war (see infra III27). Die Regelung betrifft nur die freiwillige Erfüllung einer Nichtschuld; die Beweislast für die Freiwilligkeit trägt der accipiens (Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 86; Kavkas and Kavkas, Enochikon Dikaion III, 653; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 814, nos. 1, 11; Erman [-Westermann and Buck-Heeb], BGB II[12], § 814, nos. 9, 13). Nicht ausgeschlossen ist die Rückforderbarkeit einer Leistung, welche zur Vermeidung eines drohenden Nachteils unter Druck oder Zwang erfolgt (Sprau loc.cit. no. 5; Staudinger [-S. Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 814, no. 8; MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 814, no. 12; BGH 12 July 1995, NJW 1995, 3052, 3054).

6. Das HUNGARIAN Bereicherungsrecht kennt keine ausdrückliche Kondiktionssperre für freiwillige Vermögenshingaben; die Frage ist nicht geregelt und muss deshalb nach allgemeinen Grundsätzen beantwortet werden. Im Kontext des Werkvertragsrechts hat die Rechtsprechung für überobligationsmäßige Leistungen eine Lösung im Recht der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag gesucht (XXXII. számú Polgári Elvi Döntés [PED] a vállalkozói díjjal kapcsolatos egyes kérdésekről). Im Übrigen können bewusst ungeschuldet erbrachte Leistungen wohl oft als Schenkung oder als Leistungen unter Verzicht auf eine Gegenleistung gewürdigt werden. So liegt es wohl auch, wenn jemand einem Rechtsverlust nachträglich zustimmt. Ein Rechtsverzicht bedarf einer einseitigen Willenserklärung, deren materielle Wirksamkeitsvoraussetzungen allerdings besonders streng geprüft werden (CC § 207(4); see Bíró and Lenkovics, Általános tanok, 192 and BH 2004/236); er unterliegt wie jede andere Willenserklärung auch dem Anfechtungsrecht (CC § 199; siehe für unentgeltliche Verträge zudem CC § 210). Insgesamt, so scheint es, sucht man die Begründung für die Nichtrückforderbarkeit freiwilliger Vermögenszuwendungen in erster Linie im Vertragsrecht. BH 1997/483 z.B. betraf einen Fall, in welchem der Kläger in eine Immobilie investiert und dafür einen Bereicherungsausgleich verlangt hatte. Der Anspruch wurde abgelehnt, weil die Investition einer Verabredung zwischen den Parteien widersprochen hatte und das Bereicherungsrecht dem Vertragsrecht subsidiär sei.

7. Anders als das ungarische Zivilgesetzbuch schließt SLOVENIAN LOA art. 191 die Rückforderbarkeit erbrachter Leistungen ausdrücklich aus, falls die leistende Partei wusste, dass sie die Leistung nicht schuldete. Der Rückforderungsausschluss kommt nicht zum Zuge, wenn es sich um eine Zahlung unter Vorbehalt oder unter Zwang handelt. Er soll auch dann nicht eingreifen, wenn jemand zwar weiß, dass die Schuld nicht mehr besteht, er die vorangegangene Erfüllung aber nicht beweisen kann und aus Sorge vor Nachteilen doppelt zahlt (Standardbeispiel: Mieter verliert nach Barzahlung die Quittung und zahlt aus Angst vor der Kündigung ein zweites Mal: Cigoj, Teorija obligacij, 257). BULGARIAN LOA art. 55(2) enthält demgegenüber nur eine Kondiktionssperre für bewusst in Erfüllung einer moralischen Verpflichtung hingegebene Leistungen; die Beweislast trifft den accipiens (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 582). Allerdings sollen Verwandte, die einem anderen anstelle des vorrangig Verpflichteten Unterhalt geleistet haben (Beispiel: Großeltern versorgen statt der Eltern ein Enkelkind), ihren Bereicherungsanspruch gegen den primär Verpflichteten behalten (Anordnung no. 1 des Plenums des Obersten Gerichtshofs of 28 May 1979).

8. Dafür dass eine freiwillige Vermögenshingabe grundsätzlich auch dann nicht zurückverlangt werden kann, wenn ihr keine Schenkung zugrundeliegt, findet sich im DUTCH Zivilgesetzbuch zwar keine allgemeine Regelung, doch dürfte sich das Prinzip aus CC art. 6:210(2) ableiten lassen. Hiernach schuldet der accipiens nur dann

Wertersatz für Leistungen, die ihrer Art nach nicht zurückgewährt werden können, wenn ihm der Umstand, dass die Leistung erbracht wurde, zuzurechnen ist, oder wenn er sich bereit erklärt hatte, für sie eine Gegenleistung zu erbringen. Tilgt der solvens freiwillig eine fremde Schuld, ist ein Rückforderungsrecht gegen den accipiens aus CC arts. 6:203 bzw. 6:212 schon deshalb ausgeschlossen, weil der accipiens aus seinem Vertrag mit dem Schuldner einen Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen haben soll. Ein Ausgleichanspruch gegen den befreiten Schuldner scheitert restitutionsrechtlich wiederum daran, dass Empfänger der Leistung nicht er, sondern der accipiens ist. Wer aus eigenem Antrieb freiwillig eine fremde Schuld begleicht, hat deshalb in der Regel kein Rückgriffsrecht gegen den Schuldner (Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht I[12], nos. 192 and 194; Scheltema, Verbintenissenrecht II, art. 6:203, no. 11.3 p. 55; art. 6:210, no. 3 p. 11 and art. 6:212, no. 6.3 p. 34). In CFI Haarlem 9 July 2003, NJF 2003, no. 54 z.B. hatte ein Mann, der nach der Scheidung für kurze Zeit wieder mit seiner geschiedenen Frau zusammengezogen war, ihre Schulden bei einem Versandhandel beglichen. Sein Ausgleichsanspruch gegen die Frau aus ungeschuldeter Leistung scheiterte, weil sie nicht Empfängerin der Zahlung war, und der Anspruch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung scheiterte, weil der Mann freiwillig und aus eigener Initiative gezahlt hatte, nämlich deshalb, "weil er Schulden nicht mochte". Auch Versuche, nach einer gescheiterten Liebesbeziehung Geschenke oder andere Ausgaben für Urlaub, Haushalt etc. aus dem Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung zurückzufordern, sind durchweg gescheitert, sei es, dass als Rechtfertigungsgrund die "Freigiebigkeit innerhalb einer Beziehung" (CFI Zutphen 16 August 2007, LJN BB7229; vgl. auch CA Amsterdam 2 May 2002, NedJur 2005, no. 110 p. 1022), die Erfüllung einer "moralischen Verpflichtung" (CA Leeuwarden 27 March 2002, NedJur 2002, no. 575 p. 4270; s. auch CFI Haarlem loc.cit.) oder der frühere Bestand einer Ehe zwischen den Beteiligten (CFI Maastricht 25 February 2002, LJN AE2701) angesehen wurde. Zu beachten ist schließlich, dass CC art. 6:2 (Prinzip von Treu und Glauben; redelijkheid and billijkheid) auch auf die Ansprüche aus CC art. 6:203 (ungeschuldete Zahlung) Anwendung findet. Es erlaubt dem Empfänger, sich darauf zu berufen, dass der solvens beim accipiens den Rechtsschein hervorgerufen hat, das Zugewandte behalten zu dürfen.

9. Auch das ESTONIAN LOA kennt keine dem VII.–2:103 ausdrücklich entprechende Vorschrift. Wie in den Niederlanden, so sollte allerdings auch hier das Prinzip von Treu und Glauben der Rückforderung einer freiwillig und bewusst ohne Rechtsgrund erbrachten Zuwendung entgegenstehen (Tampuu, Lepinguväliste võlasuhete õigus, 75). Solche Zuwendungen können aber natürlich die Voraussetzungen einer Schenkung oder einer Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag erfüllen. Bei einer rechtswidrigen Geschäftsführung kommt ein Ausgleichsanspruch nach den Vorschriften des Bereicherungsrechts nur dann in Betracht, wenn der gestor ohne Verschulden vom Vorliegen eines Rechtfertigungsgrundes für die Geschäftsführung ausging (LOA § 1024(4)).

10. In the NORDIC countries a free performance made in the knowledge that there is no underlying obligation can normally not be reversed (Hult, Condictio indebiti, 73; Ussing, Enkelte Kontrakter, 428). Dasselbe gilt grundsätzlich für Leistungen, die in Kenntnis der Nichtigkeit des zugrundeliegenden Vertrages erbracht werden; denn hier kann die Freiwilligkeit der Vermögenszuwendung vermutet werden (Arnholm, Almindelig avtaleret, 344). Zwar ist streitig, ob schon die Leistung als solche als Rechtsgeschäft qualifiziert werden darf (näher Illum, UfR 1939B, 168, 234; Arnholm, Privatrett I, 200), doch scheint heute anerkannt, dass die Regeln des Vertragsgesetzes über unwirksame Verträge zumindest entsprechend angewandt werden dürfen, wenn eine Leistung infolge von incapacity, fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation erbracht wurde und ihr kein Vertragsschluss vorausging (Hagstrøm and Aarbakke, Obligasjonsrett[2], 673; Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[11], 27). In a two-party constellation this simply results in an obligation to return what has been received. However, where the performance was unlawfully induced by another person than the accipiens, the latter may be protected if in good faith. That is the case in situations of coercion (Contract Act § 29), fraud (§ 30) and unfair exploitation (§ 31); but not with regards to duress (§ 28) if the accipiens is immediately informed of the duress after it has come to an end. SWEDISH HD 17 September 1999, NJA 1999, 575 betraf den Rückforderungsanspruch einer Bank, die infolge einer arglistigen Täuschung durch einen ihrer Kunden eine Überweisung an einen gutgläubigen Dritten getätigt hatte; die Klage wurde u.a. unter Hinweis auf Contract Act § 30 abgewiesen. Zu dem Zeitpunkt, in welchem Gutgläubigkeit gegeben sein muss, siehe im Übrigen Contract Act § 39

II. Leistung auf Naturalobligationen

11. Ausgeschlossen ist die Rückforderung einer freiwilligen Vermögenszuwendung insbesondere dann, wenn es sich dabei um die Erfüllung einer sogen. "natürlichen Verbindlichkeit" handelt; es ist oft geradezu der Zweck dieser Kategorie, die Rückforderung einer Leistung auf eine aktiv nicht durchsetzbare Forderung auszuschließen. FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBURGIAN CC art. 1235(2) stellen demgemäß klar, dass die freiwillige Erfüllung einer Naturalobligation keine ungeschuldete Zahlung darstellt (see Carbonnier, Droit civil IV[21], no. 303 p. 504).

12. In SPAIN finden die obligaciones naturales dagegen nur in Compilación del Derecho Civil Foral de Navarra Ley 510 Erwähnung, nicht im Zivilgesetzbuch. Im Schrifttum wird zwar diskutiert, ob einige Sonderbestimmungen des Zivilgesetzbuches im Sinne einer stillschweigenden Anerkennung der Lehre von den Naturalobligationen gelesen werden sollten, insbesondere CC art. 1798 (Nichtrückforderbarkeit bezahlter Spiel- und Wettschulden), CC art. 1756 (keine Rückforderung der Zahlung von im Vertrag nicht vereinbarten Zinsen; see TS 14 April 1999, RAJ 1999 (2), no. 2584 p. 4016 [die Regel beruhe auf der Existenz einer Naturalobligation]) und das Prinzip, dass die Rückforderung von Leistungen auf verjährte Forderungen ausgeschlossen ist. Die dogmatische Qualifizierung dieser Fälle als 'natural obligation' ist aber zweifelhaft geblieben (Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II(1)[4], 21; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 68-72). TS 17 October 1932, RAJ 1932-1933 (1), no. 1235 p. 522 (wo ein Mann von einem 16jährigen Mädchen, mit dem er eine Affäre gehabt hatte, an sie erbrachte regelmäßige Geldzahlungen zurückforderte) benutzte stattdessen die Kategorie der 'moralischen Schuld', um den Rückforderungsausschluss zu begründen. Die sogen. 'natural obligations' können seit diesem Urteil auch mit CC art. 1901 in Verbindung gebracht und mit den 'moralischen Schulden' ineinsgesetzt werden (Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández loc.cit. 21-24; Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos Estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 174; Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 531). Denn die Vorschrift vermutet für das Recht der condictio indebiti einen Irrtum des Zahlenden, wenn entweder eine Schuld niemals bestanden hatte oder bereits beglichen war; der accipiens kann jedoch beweisen, dass der Leistung eine Schenkung oder ein anderer Rechtsgrund zugrundegelegen hat. Ein solcher 'anderer' Grund ist auch die Erfüllung einer moralischen (oder 'natürlichen') Schuld. Neuere Entscheidungen sehen das ebenso (CA Pontevedra 13 October 2005, note I2 above; CA Granada 12 February 2001, BDA JUR 2001/124701 [kein Anspruch einer Frau, die ihren Neffen vor seinem Tode gepflegt hatte, gegen dessen Erben auf Vergütung ihrer Dienstleistungen; dagegen Anspruch wegen der verauslagten Beerdigungskosten aus negotiorum gestio, CC art. 1894, bejaht]; CA Jaén 12 April 2000, BDA AC 2000/3507 [kein Rückforderungsanspruch of an elderly couple, das zu seinem Neffen gezogen war und Geld und eine Waschmaschine mitgebracht hatte, nach dem Verlassen des Hauses; die persönliche Basis der Beziehung war zwar zerstört, doch könne nicht zurückverlangt werden, was das Ehepaar auf der Grundlage einer obligación natural, einer 'moral relationship' hingegeben habe]; CA Madrid 18 December 2002, BDA JUR 2003/82662 [fünfjährige Fortzahlung nachehelichen Unterhalts trotz erfolgreicher Abänderungsklage; keine condictio indebiti, weil der Kläger nicht etwa irrtümlich, sondern allein zu dem Zweck weitergezahlt habe, seiner geschiedenen Frau zu helfen; CC art. 1901 zitiert und die Leistung als Erfüllung einer obligación natural qualifiziert]). Manchmal wird das Konzept der moralischen bzw. natürlichen Obligation allerdings auch in einem überraschenden und dafür nicht besonders geeigneten Kontext verwandt, z.B. in TS 10 October 1963, RAJ 1963 (2) no. 4080 p. 2608 (Mieter behält die Sache nach Ablauf der Mietzeit in Gebrauch; keine Rückforderung des in dieser Zeit gezahlten Mietzinses, weil damit eine moral obligation erfüllt worden sei) und in CA Sevilla 2 March 2005, BDA JUR 2005/139206 (Wohnungskäufer nutzt Gemeinschaftseinrichtungen, u.a. das Schwimmbad der Wohnanlage, und zahlt dafür anteilig; nach langer Zeit stellt sich heraus, dass das Appartment gar nicht Teil dieser Wohnanlage war; keine Rückforderung der Zahlung, weil mit ihr eine obligación natural erfüllt worden sei).

13. ITALIAN CC art. 2034 schließt die Rückforderung einer Zuwendung aus, wenn sie aus freien Stücken zur Erfüllung einer sittlichen oder sozialen Pflicht geleistet wurde; anders ist das nur, wenn der Leistende geschäftsunfähig war. Den genannten Pflichten stehen diejenigen gleich, mit denen nach dem Gesetz kein Klageanspruch, sondern nur eine Rückforderungssperre korrespondiert. Sittliche und soziale Pflichten gründen in gesellschaftlicher Ethik (Bianca, Diritto civile IV, 778); nicht erfasst sind nach h.M. Pflichten der individuellen Ethik sowie Pflichten aus Gefälligkeitsregeln und guten Manieren (Alpa and Mariconda [-Sirena], Codice civile commentato IV, sub art. 2034, I, § 3). Beispiele für nichtklagbare Forderungen, die im Erfüllungsfalle aber einen Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen geben, finden sich u.a. in CC art. 1933 (Spielschuld) und in CC art. 2940 (Zahlung auf eine verjährte Schuld). CC art. 2034 steht der Rückforderung aber nicht entgegen, wenn die Leistung (z.B. durch Gewalt oder arglistische Täuschung) erzwungen wurde oder auf einem Irrtum des solvens beruhte (Bianca loc.cit. 786). In AUSTRIA wird gesagt, eine Naturalobligation unterscheide sich von echten Verpflichtungen nur dadurch, dass sie nicht durchsetzbar sei; im Übrigen stelle sie aber einen gültigen Rechtsgrund dar (Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III^2, no. 15/6). Was auf eine Naturalobligation geleistet wurde, kann folglich nicht zurückgefordert werden. Das betrifft insbesondere Leistungen auf formunwirksam eingegangene und auf verjährte Verpflichtungen (CC § 1432). Nur Geschäftsunfähige können auch Leistungen auf eine Naturalobligation kondizieren (CC § 1433).

14. PORTUGUESE CC art. 476(1) stellt die Anwendung der Regeln über die condictio indebiti unter den Vorbehalt der "Vorschriften über die Naturalobligationen" und verweist damit auf CC arts. 402 und 403. Gemäß CC art. 402 wird eine Obligation dann für natürlich gehalten, wenn sie sich auf eine Pflicht bloß moralischer oder sozialer Natur stützt, die zwar nicht gerichtlich einklagbar ist, aber dennoch einer Gerechtigkeitspflicht entspricht. Leistungen auf solche Pflichten können nicht zurückverlangt werden, es sei denn, der Leistende war geschäftsunfähig (CC art. 403(1)) oder die Leistung war nicht "frei von aller Nötigung" (CC art. 403(2)), d.h. nich frei von Zwang (coacção física, CC art. 246) und Drohung (coacção moral, CC art. 255). Ein bloßer Irrtum genügt zur Rückforderbarkeit nicht (Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 537). Die freiwillige Erfüllung einer Gerechtigkeitspflicht ist eine causa justificativa im Sinne des Bereicherungsrechts (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 477); dass der solvens Kenntnis von der Nichtdurchsetzbarkeit der Obligation hatte, ändert daran nichts (Galvão Telles, Obrigações[7], 53). Dass Unterhaltsleistungen in Erfüllung einer Naturalobligation erbracht werden können, folgt aus CC art. 495(3), wonach im Fall von Tod oder Körperverletzung auch derjenige zum Schadenersatz berechtigt ist, dem der Verletzte in Erfüllung einer Naturalobligation Unterhalt gewährt hatte. Wer sich um die medizinische Versorgung seines im Koma liegenden Bruders und um dessen anschließende Beerdigung kümmert, soll gegen die Erben aber dann einen Anspruch auf Bereicherungsausgleich haben, wenn er von Anfang an mit einer Erstattung rechnete (CA Oporto 4 March 2002, CJ XXVII [2002-2] 176). Sind Spiel und Wette gesetzmäßig, dann sind auch sie Quellen einer Naturalobligation (CC art. 1245; see Pereira Coelho, Obrigações, 79, fn. 3).

15. In GERMANY werden Verbindlichkeiten, die zwar freiwillig erfüllt, jedoch nicht gegen den Willen des Schuldners durchgesetzt werden können, teils "unvollkommene Verbindlichkeiten", teils "Naturalobligationen" (BGH 25 May 1983, BGHZ 87, 309, 314), "Moralobligationen" oder "Schulden ohne Haftung" genannt (näher Schulze, Die Naturalobligation, 162 ff). Solche Verbindlichkeiten sind wirksame Erwerbsgründe mit der Folge, dass das freiwillig Geleistete nicht nach CC §§ 812 ff zurückgefordert werden kann. Dem steht nicht entgegen, dass die Erfüllung einer Naturalobligation auch nicht im Wege von Aufrechnung, Abtretung oder Schuldanerkenntnis durchgesetzt werden kann. Beispiele liefern Forderungen aus Spiel und Wette (CC §§ 762 und 763) sowie aus der Vereinbarung eines Ehemäklerlohnes (CC § 656). CC § 814 schließt zudem die Rückforderung dessen aus, was aus sittlicher Pflicht oder aus Rücksicht geleistet worden ist. In eine Sondergruppe gehören verjährte Forderungen, weil bei ihnen weder die Aufrechnung noch die Abtretung ausgeschlossen ist und sie deshalb nicht zu den "unvollkommenen Verbindlichkeiten" zählen; außerdem können sie, sofern nicht der Schuldner die Leistung verweigert (CC § 214(1)), auch klageweise geltend gemacht werden. Erfüllt der Schuldner eine verjährte Forderung, so kann er das Geleistete freilich auch dann nicht zurückfordern, wenn er vom Eintritt der Verjährung nichts gewusst hatte (CC § 214(2), eine Ausnahme von CC § 813(1)). GREEK CC arts. 272(2), 845(2) und 906 schließen die Rückforderung in denselben Fällen aus, in denen sie auch im deutschen Recht ausgeschlossen ist. CC art. 906 betrifft den Fall, dass die Leistung aus sittlicher Pflicht oder aus Rücksichtnahme auf den Anstand erfolgte.

16. Auch in HUNGARY sieht man die naturalis obligatio nicht als Nichtschuld an. Dass ihre Erfüllung nicht mit staatlicher Hilfe durchgesetzt werden kann, ändere nichts daran, dass sie einen Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen liefere (Bíró, Kötelmi jog – közös szabályok, szerződéstan[8], 72; BH 1998/422; BH 1993/29). Gemäß CC § 204(1) sind Naturalobligationen in diesem Sinn (i) die sich aus einem Spiel oder einer Wette ergebenden Forderungen, sofern nicht das Spiel oder die Wette auf Grund einer staatlichen Genehmigung abgewickelt wurden; (ii) Forderungen aus einem Darlehen, das zu Spiel- oder Wettzwecken versprochen oder gewährt wurde, und (iii) Forderungen, deren Geltendmachung durch ein staatliches Organ durch eine Rechtsvorschrift ausgeschlossen ist. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 192 bestimmt, dass eine Leistung nicht zurückverlangt werden kann, deren Erfüllung einer Naturalobligation oder einer sittlichen Pflicht entsprach (see Supreme Court 7 May 1993, VS II Ips. 586/92). Hierzu rechnen insbesondere Spiel- und Wettschulden (LOA art. 272(2); see Juhart and Plavšak [-Polajnar Pavčnik], Obligacijski zakonik II, art. 192, p. 52) sowie wohl auch verjährte Forderungen; jedenfalls können Leistungen auf sie gleichfalls nicht zurückverlangt werden (LOA art. 335). Dem entspricht die Rechtslage in BULGARIA. Man unterscheidet aber zwischen der Erfüllung einer Naturalobligation und der Erfüllung einer moralischen Schuld. Letztere weise überhaupt keinen rechtlichen Charakter auf, weshalb ein solvens, der nur in Erfüllung einer moralischen Verpflichtung geleistet habe, das Geleistete soll rückfordern können, wenn er von ihr keine Kenntnis gehabt habe (Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast[4], 45-47)

17. In the NETHERLANDS gelten die Regeln über die freiwillige Vermögenshingabe grundsätzlich auch für die freiwillige Erfüllung natürlicher Verbindlichkeiten (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 829-833; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], nos. 322 and 362). Die Zahlung aufgrund einer Naturalobligation erfolgt nie ungeschuldet (CC arts. 6:3-5) und begründet deshalb auch keinen Bereicherungsanspruch. Auf Naturalobligationen finden alle Regeln des 6. Buches des Zivilgesetzbuches Anwendung, die sich nicht mit der Durchsetzbarkeit der Verbindlichkeit und den Rechtsfolgen ihrer Nichterfüllung befassen Die Erfüllung einer Naturalobligation ist keine Schenkung. (Hartkamp loc.cit. no. 331 p. 348).

18. ESTONIAN LOA § 1032(2)(i) schließt die Rückforderung von Leistungen auf eine unvollkommene Verbindlichkeit aus. An imperfect obligation is an obligation which the debtor may perform but the performance of which cannot be required by the creditor (LOA § 4(1)). The LOA defines the following as imperfect obligations: (i) an obligation arising from gambling, except for an obligation arising from a lottery or betting organised on the basis of a permit; (ii) a moral obligation the performance of which complies with public mores; (iii) an obligation assumed to secure performance of an imperfect obligation; (iv) an obligation which is an imperfect obligation pursuant to law.

19. Obligatio naturalis or moral obligation, i.e. an obligation one is not legally obliged to perform, are dealt with in the NORDIC literature, where it is accepted that they need not be reversed (Vinding Kruse, Restitutioner, 263; Gomard, Obligationsret I[4], 7; Hult, Condictio indebiti, 88; Hakulinen, Obligationsrätt, 31). Various instances are subsumed under the notion of obligatio naturalis, amongst them the performance of a prescribed obligation, the performance of an obligation which is not binding due to lack of form, or a gambling debt (Gomard, Obligationsret III, 172, 186). With regards to claims resulting from gambling, it is however generally held in legal writing that such obligations are void, as pactum turpe, and that they cannot be claimed in a court of law. For the same reason a court will also not deal with a claim to reverse payments already made (Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[11], 282; Jørgensen, Kontraktsret I, 55; Hakulinen loc cit. 34). Nevertheless, SWEDISH HD 13 December 1989, NJA 1989, 768 granted the reversal of bets made by poker players during a poker game which was interrupted by a police raid. The Court argued that the opposite position would result in an unwarranted enrichment for the organizer of the poker game, who had not accepted the bets in his own name but for the purpose of paying them to the winners of the game. It was said that this was not a gambling debt per se. If the performance of an obligation naturalis is induced by fraud etc. the general rules on invalid contracts remain applicable, however.

III. Verschulden der disadvantaged person als Rechtfertigungsgrund zum Behaltendürfen for the enriched person

20. In einigen Rechtsordnungen darf der Empfänger jedenfalls bestimmten solvens entgegenhalten, dass sie die rechtsgrundlose Zahllung verschuldet hätten und deshalb die alleinige Verantwortung für sie trügen. Der Gedanke taucht oft im Recht der sogen. subjektiven Nichtschuld auf, kann sich aber auch auf andere Weise Bahn brechen, etwa in der Gewährung von aufrechenbaren Schadenersatzansprüchen, die

den accipiens davor schützen, eine bereits weggefallene Bereicherung ausgleichen zu müssen. In FRENCH Cass.civ. 17 October 1996, Bull.civ. 1996, V, no. 328 p. 232 z.B. hatte die Caisse primaire d´assurance maladie gegen eine versicherte Frau auf Erstattung ihr ungeschuldet erbrachter Leistungen geklagt; die Beklagte hatte darauf mit einer auf dommages-intérêts gerichteten Widerklage reagiert. Die Widerklage war erfolgreich; die Krankenkasse musste den durch ihre faute verursachten Schaden ohne Rücksicht darauf ersetzen, dass diese faute nicht schwer (grossière) und der Schaden abnormal war. Cass.soc. 14 June 1979, Bull.civ. 1979, V, no. 546 p. 401 betraf einen ähnlichen Sachverhalt; es war ein knappes Jahr lang eine zu hohe Rente aus- und weitergezahlt worden, obwohl der Empfänger die zahlende Kasse alsbald auf den Fehler aufmerksam gemacht hatte. Der Empfänger sah seinen Schaden darin, dass er die zum Konsum bestimmten Zahlungen tatsächlich verbraucht hatte. Der Kassationshof kassierte allerdings die auf der Aufrechnung mit dem angeblichen Schadenersatzanspruch beruhende Klagabweisung des Berufungsgerichts; der Erstattungsanspruch aus der action en répétition de l´indu dürfe jedenfalls nicht vollständig verweigert werden, und zwar unabhängig von der Schwere der Fahrlässigkeit des solvens. In Cass.civ. 18 May 1994, Bull.civ. 1994, I, no. 179 p. 132 hatte ein Ehemann im laufenden Scheidungsverfahren die seiner Frau ausgestellte Vollmacht gegenüber der Bank widerrufen und die Bank beauftragt, seine Frau davon in Kenntnis zu setzen. Die Bank unterließ jedoch diese Mitteilung und die Frau hob weiteres Geld von dem Konto ab. Der Mann erhielt es von der Bank zurückerstattet; sie klagte gegen die Frau, die wiederum im Wege der Widerklage den gleichen Betrag gegen die Bank als Schadenersatz geltend machte. Klage und Widerklage wurden stattgegeben; die Frau habe davon ausgehen können, die abgebuchten Beträge für ihren Lebensunterhalt ausgeben zu dürfen.

21. Nach Auffassung von BELGIAN Cass. 22 May 2006, no. de rôle S050008F, unterläuft einer Familienausgleichskasse ein schweres Verschulden, wenn sie Eltern glauben lässt, dass ihnen für mehrere Jahre ein Recht auf erhöhte Familienausgleichsleistungen zusteht. Der daraus resultierende Schaden decke sich der Höhe nach mit dem überzahlten Betrag; beide Forderungen wären infolge der Aufrechnung erloschen. CA Brussels 3 March 2006, no. de rôle 2002 AR 2274, betraf eine Zuvielleistung durch den belgischen Staat; der Auszahlung war eine unzureichende Kontrolle vorausgegangen. Der Rückzahlungsanspruch wurde gleichwohl gewährt, weil sich die Verwaltung gesetzwidrig verhalten habe und gezwungen gewesen sei, den gesetzwidrigen Zustand zu beenden. Andere allgemeine verwaltungsrechtliche Grundsätze (Prinzipien der guten Verwaltung, der Rechtssicherheit und des Schutzes berechtigten Vertrauens) berechtigten nicht zum Behaltendürfen der Subvention. Cour du travail de Liège, section de Namur, 17 January 2006, no. de rôle 7541-04 betraf zu hohe Sozialleistungen an Schwerbehinderte. Die Rückforderung war unter einem arrêté du Gouvernement wallon ausgeschlossen, weil die Überzahlung auf einem Verschulden der zuständigen Agentur beruht hatte. Nach Cour du travail de Bruxelles 23 June 2005, no. de rôle 40587 kann eine Familienkasse, die irrtümlich zu hohe Familiensozialleistungen auszahlt, ihre Entscheidung zwar korrigieren, doch darf diese Korrektur nur dann rückwirkend erfolgen, wenn der Bezieher beim Empfang des Geldes bösgläubig war.

22. Under SPANISH CC art. 1895 gehört der Irrtum des solvens zu den unverzichtbaren Voraussetzungen eines Anspruchs aus condictio indebiti (TS 10 June 1995, RAJ 1995 (3) no. 4914 p. 6589; TS 26 December 1995, RAJ 1995 (5), no. 9207 p. 12262). Wer die Berechnungsmethoden seines Vertragspartners zur Ermittlung der auf geliefertes Öl abzuführenden Steuern genau kennt und nicht dagegen protestiert, kann deshalb Überzahlungen nicht mit dem Argument zurückfordern, ihm seien falsche Beträge in Rechnung gestellt worden (TS 31 May 2006, RAJ 2006 (3) no. 3322 p. 7600; see also TS 13 March 2007, RAJ 2007 (1) no. 692 p. 1803). Das hätte er wissen müssen; die Zahlung erfolgte fahrlässig. Keinen Rückforderungsanspruch hat auch ein Mann, der für eine Weile den Unterhalt für ein behindertes gemeinsames Kind noch nach dessen Tod auf das Konto seiner geschiedenen Frau einzahlt (CA Madrid 12 March 2002, BDA JUR 2002/150868). Im Schirifttum finden sich allerdings gewichtige Stimmen, die meinen, dass das spanische Recht hinsichtlich der Rückforderung von ohne Irrtum rechtsgrundlos erbrachten Leistungen eine echte Lücke aufweise (Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 107); auch in solchen Fällen sei deshalb eine Kondiktion möglich, und zwar entweder als allgemeiner Bereicherungsanspruch (z.B. auf der Grundlage einer angeblich existierenden condictio sine causa generalis under CC art. 1901: Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II(2)[4], 427; López/Montés/Roca, [-Capilla Roncero], Derecho de Obligaciones y Contratos, 291) oder in einer ausdehnenden Anwendung der Regeln der condictio indebiti (Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez loc.cit. 115-116; Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Ballarín Hernández], Código Civil II[2], 1957). TS 22 June 2007, BDA RJ 2007/5427 [FJ 3] hat sich zu dieser zuletzt genannten Ansicht in einem obiter dictum zustimmend geäußert und erwogen, die Lehre von der Ausdehung des Anwendungsbereichs der condictio indebiti mit dem Konzept einer condictio sine causa generalis zu verknüpfen; TS 14 June 2007, BDA RJ 2007/5120 hingegen scheint dem skeptisch gegenüber zu stehen.

23. Under ITALIAN CC art. 2036 kann nur jemand, der eine fremde Schuld "in der entschuldbar irrigen Meinung" gezahlt hat, selber der Schuldner zu sein, das Geleistete vom Gläubiger zurückverlangen (subjetive Nichtschuld). Der Irrtum ist nicht entschuldbar, wenn der solvens bei Anwendung der erforderlichen Sorgfalt hätte erkennen können, dass er nicht der Schuldner war (Moscati, Pagamento dell'indebito, arts. 2028-2042, p. 421-422). Dann überwiegt das Interesse des accipiens am Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen das Rückforderungsinteresse des solvens. CC art. 2036 ist eine Sanktion für dessen Fahrlässigkeit (Moscati loc.cit.; Breccia, L'arricchimento senza causa I[2], 941), soll gerade deshalb aber auch nicht anwendbar sein, wenn der accipiens bösgläubig war, d.h. wusste, dass der solvens in entschuldbarem Irrtum zahlte (Moscati loc.cit. 423). Entschuldigt ist der Irrtum des solvens auch, wenn er vom Gläubiger oder vom wahren Schuldner arglistig verursacht wurde (Moscati loc.cit.). Bei der Rückforderung von Zahlungen auf eine objektive Nichtschuld (CC art. 2033) gehört der Irrtum des Klägers dagegen nicht zu den Anspruchsvoraussetzungen (Albanese, Il pagamento dell'indebito, 199; Cass. 10 March 1995, no. 2814, Giur.it. 1996, I, 1, 228; Cass. 11 March 1987, no. 2525, Giust.civ. 1987, I, 1967; Cass.sez.lav. 6 November 1984, no. 5620, Giust.civ.Mass. 1984, fasc. 11); allerdings meinen manche, die Rückforderung könne u.U. gegen das aus Treu und Glauben abzuleitende Verbot des venire contra factum proprium verstoßen (Übersicht bei Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[7]), sub art. 2033, § 5). Trifft den Staat oder eine seiner Einrichtungen bei der Auszahlung des später zurückgeforderten Betrages ein Verschulden, so neigen die Verwaltungsgerichte dazu, diesen Rückforderungsanspruch unter Hinweis auf das Prinzip der Korrektheit der Verwaltung abzuweisen (TAR Lombardia 4 March 1981, no. 271, Tributi 1981, 503; Cons. Stato 26 July 1978, no. 762; Cons. Stato 1978, I, 1076; Cons. Stato 30 March 1976, no. 1; Cons. Stato 1976, I, 273). In AUSTRIA stellt das Verschulden des Leistenden grundsätzlich weder eine Anspruchsvoraussetzung noch einen Grund dar, den Kondiktionsanspruch auszuschließen. Insbesondere kommt es für die condictio inedebiti nicht darauf an, ob der Leistende seinen Irrtum verschuldet hat (OGH 9 October 1980, SZ 53/130). Ein Thema ist aber die Schutzwürdigkeit der Parteien.

Deshalb ist die Kondiktion ausgeschlossen, wenn der Leistende weiß, dass er die Leistung nicht schuldet (CC § 1432) oder dass er zur Erreichung eines unerlaubten Zweckes leistet (CC § 1174(1) first sentence), z.B. indem er ein Darlehen für ein verbotenes Spiel gewährt (CC § 1174(2)). Hinsichtlich der Höhe des geschuldeten Ersatzes wird zwischen redlichen und unredlichen Empfängern unterschieden (CC § 1437 i.V.m § 330). Gutgläubig verbrauchte Leistungen müssen nicht erstattet werden (OGH 23 April 1929, SZ 11/86; OGH 22 April 1997, SZ 70/69; OGH 30 January 2001, JBl 2001, 381: gutgläubig empfangenes überhöhtes Arbeitsentgelt bzw. überhöhte Unterhaltsleistungen). In Ausnahmefällen werden außerdem Nachteile, die der Benachteiligte verschuldet hat, in einer Billigkeitskorrektur des Ergebnisses von seinem Ausgleichsanspruch abgezogen (OGH 25 October 1988, SZ 61/218).

24. Für die Rückforderung einer objektiven Nichtschuld setzt auch PORTUGUESE CC art. 476(1) einen Irrtum nicht voraus (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 508). Wer aber nicht animo solvendi, d.h. in Kenntnis der Nichtschuld leistet, fällt von vornherein nicht unter diese Vorschrift, so dass es nicht zu einem venire contra factum proprium kommen kann (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 467; STJ 11 May 2000, CJ [ST] VIII [2000-2] 54). Im Bereich der subjektiven Nichtschuld verlangen CC arts. 476(3) und 477 für den Rückforderungsanspruch gegen den Gläubiger einen entschuldbaren Irrtum (erro desculpável) und CC art. 478 für den Rückforderungsanspruch gegen den Schuldner eine irrige Überzeugung (convicção errónea). CC art. 476(3) betrifft vorzeitige Leistungen. CC art. 477 schützt den gutgläubigen accipiens; er haftet nicht auf Rückzahlung, wenn er von dem Fehler des Leistenden nichts wusste und sich seiner Schuldurkunde oder seiner Sicherheit begeben hat (näher Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 521, 550).

25. In GERMANY ist es Sache des Bereicherungsschuldners zu beweisen, dass der Zahlende bewusst und ohne Irrtum auf eine Nichtschuld geleistet hat; das folgt aus CC § 814 (see Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 814, no. 10). Erforderlich ist der Nachweis positiver Kenntnis der Rechtslage zum Zeitpunkt der Leistung. Ein bloßes Kennenmüssen reicht nicht aus, selbst dann nicht, wenn die Unkenntnis auf grober Fahrlässigkeit beruht (BGH 7 May 1997, NJW 1997, 2381, 2382). Die Kenntnis von Einwendungen gegenüber der Verbindlichkeit steht der Kenntnis der Nichtschuld gleich. Nicht ausgeschlossen ist die Rückforderung einer Leistung, die ausdrücklich unter Vorbehalt erbracht und angenommen wurde (BGH 17 February 1982, BGHZ 83, 278, 282). So verhält es sich auch in GREECE (A.P. 410/1962, NoB 10 [1962] 1319).

26. Das HUNGARIAN Bereicherungsrecht zählt das Verschulden bzw. den Irrtum der benachteiligten Person nicht zu den Rechtsgründen, welche ein Behaltendürfen des Empfangenen rechtfertigen (BH 1992/25: Pflicht zur Rückzahlung eines Geldbetrages bejaht, obwohl das die Ausschreibung organisierende Unternehmen, das die Auszahlung veranlasst hatte, den Beklagten fälschlicherweise dahin informiert hatte, dass er die Ausschreibung gewonnen habe). In einigen Fallkonstellationen wird gleichwohl angenommen, dass der solvens auf eigenes Risiko geleistet und deshalb kein Rückforderungsrecht habe. BH 2002/29 hat das z.B. für unbestellt erbrachte Arbeit zur Errichtung eines Holzhauses entschieden. Der Kläger, der sich zur Tilgung seiner Schulden dem Beklagten gegenüber zur Errichtung eines fertigen Holzhauses verpflichtet hatte, habe auf eigenes Risiko gehandelt, als er sich auf die Lieferung der Materialien beschränkt und die Aufbauarbeiten einem Bekannten überlassen hatte. Dessen Arbeitszeit müsse der Beklagte nicht vergüten; seine Bereicherungshaftung sei auf den Betrag beschränkt, um den die Wertsteigerung des Grundstücks die Schuld des Klägers überstiegen habe. Für den Sonderfall, dass der Benachteiligte die Bereicherung der anderen Seite durch ein verbotenes oder gegen die guten Sitten verstoßendes Verhalten selbst herbeigeführt hat, sieht CC § 361(3) vor, dass diese Bereicherung vom Gericht auf Antrag des Staatsanwaltes dem Staat zugesprochen werden kann; diese Vorschrift wird aber nach der Reform des Zivilgesetzbuches voraussichtlich entfallen (Vékás [-Vékás], Szakértői Javaslat az új Polgári Törvénykönyv tervezetéhez, 1145). Unter BULGARIAN LOA art. 56 gehört die Entschuldbarkeit des Irrtums nicht zu den Voraussetzungen eines Rückforderungsanspruchs wegen irrtümlicher Erfüllung einer fremden Schuld (näher Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 590).

27. Auch in the NETHERLANDS wird gesagt, Verschulden oder Irrtum des Verarmten seien für den Bereicherten kein Grund, das Empfangene zu behalten. Allerdings kann sich im Einzelfall und nach Abwägung aller Umstände eine Rückabwicklungssperre aus CC art. 6:2 (redelijkheid and billijkheid) ergeben. Dem entspricht die Rechtslage in ESTONIA; ein Fehler of the disadvantaged person does not preclude an unjustified enrichment claim. Eine Ausnahme von diesem Grundsatz findet sich allerdings in Wages Act § 37. It allows the employer to reclaim wages or compensation only within three months from the date of payment and only if payment occurred due to a calculation error. Amounts otherwise paid to an employee or transferred to an employee's bank account erroneously are not subject to reclamation, except in the case where payment was based on false information or forged documents knowingly presented by the employee.

28. In the NORDIC countries setzt ein Anspruch aus condictio indebiti einen Irrtum des Leistenden über das Vorhandensein einer Schuld voraus. Die Frage, ob der Rückforderungsanspruch besteht, wird aber erst nach Abwägung aller Umstände entschieden. In diesem Zusammenhang wiederum wird vor allem in SWEDEN intensiv diskutiert, unter welchen Umständen Fahrlässigkeit des Leistenden den accipiens berechtigt, die Leistung zu behalten (Hult, Condictio indebiti, 83; Karlgren, SvJT 1940, 330, 331, 339; Gorton, JFT 2005, 452-470). Es handelt sich um einen zwar wichtigen, aber nur um einen Abwägungsfaktor unter mehreren. Vor allem fließt auch eine evtl. Fahrlässigkeit des accipiens in die Gesamtabwägung ein. Der Sorgfaltsmaßstab variiert; bei Banken und öffentlichen Einrichtungen ist er besonders hoch (see e.g. HD 3 January 1991, NJA 1991, 3 I and II; HD 30 March 1994, NJA 1994, 177). Im Ergebnis entscheidet sich die condictio indebiti-Haftung anhand der Antwort auf die Frage, wer das Irrtumsrisiko tragen soll. In DENMARK kommt es im Wesentlichen auf die Gut- bzw. Bösgläubigkeit des Empfängers an, für welche indirekt auch die Frage einer Fahrlässigkeit des Leistenden relevant werden kann (Ravnkilde, Betalingskorrektioner, 93; von Eyben/Mortensen/Sørensen, Obligationsret II, 138). In FINLAND wird auf ähnliche Fragen abgestellt, wie in Sweden, wenn auch der Aspekt der Fahrlässigkeit des solvens weniger stark herausgestrichen wird (Roos, JFT 1992, 75). Für alle nordischen Rechtsordnungen gilt, dass die Beweislast dafür, dass der solvens freiwillig und in Kenntnis des Nichtbestehens einer Schuld geleistet hat, beim recipient liegt (Arnholm, Streiftog i obligasjonsretten, 185). Es kann insoweit schon der Nachweis genügen, dass der solvens im Bewusstsein der Unsicherheit der Rechtslage und ohne Anbringung eines Rückforderungsvorbehaltes zahlt (Rodhe, Obligationsrätt, 83; Vinding Kruse, Resitutioner, 264; Karlgren loc cit. 340; von Eyben/Mortensen/Sørensen loc.cit. 141; Roos loc cit. 79). Nicht rückforderbar ist eine Leistung, wenn der Leistende bei ihrer Erbringung übersehen hat, dass er mit einem eigenen Anspruch hätte aufrechnen können (Lindskog, Kvittning[2], 579; Swedish HD 16 March 1988, NJA 1988, 94). See, however, also Danish SH 10 December 1971, UfR 1972, 283 (Bank zahlt in Kenntnis ihrer Aufrechnugsmöglichkeit noch bereits gewährten Kredit an eine in diesem Zeitpunkt bereits insolvente Gesellschaft aus, um ihr die anstehenden Lohnzahlungen zu ermöglichen; bevorzugte Befriedigung aus der Insolvenzmasse gewährt).

IV. Leistungen an Dritte aufgrund rechtlich unwirksamer Willensbildung

29. Eine spezifische Regel des Inhalts, wonach ein solvens (A), der infolge von Täuschung, Drohung oder Zwang einen Vertrag mit einem anderen (B) schließt, unter dem er an den accipiens (C) leisten muss, das Geleistete direkt von dem accipiens zurückverlangen kann, fehlt in den meisten Rechtsordnungen. Rechtsprechung zu dieser Frage scheint es gleichfalls kaum zu geben; die Rechtslage ist oft unklar. Ähnliches gilt für die Situation, in welcher der Vertrag zwischen (A) und (B) unwirksam ist, weil (A) geschäftsunfähig war. Unter FRENCH CC art. 1111 berechtigt gegen den Leistenden ausgeübte Gewalt auch dann zur Anfechtung und mit ihr zur Rückforderung des Geleisteten, wenn die Gewalt von einer anderen Person als dem Vertragspartner ausging. Dol berechtigt dagegen zwar nur dann zur Anfechtung, wenn die Täuschung von dem Vertragspartner herrührt (Cass.com. 1 April 1952, D. 1952, 380 and 685, note Cooper-Royer; Cass.com. 22 July 1986, Bull.civ. 1986, IV, no. 163), doch ist nicht klar, welche Bedeutung dieser Regel für einen Direktanspruch gegen den Dritten (den accipiens) auf Rückzahlung des Empfangenen beigemessen werden darf. In BELGIEN ist nur gesichert, dass den irrtümlichen Zahlungen solche Zahlungen gleichstehen, welche zur Vermeidung von Verfolgung oder unter Druck erfolgen (Graulich, Théorie générale des obligations, p. 51, no. 240). Spezielle Regeln with regard to restitution in three-party relations existieren jedoch ebensowenig wie in SPAIN, wo erneut Rechtsprechung zu dem hier diskutierten Problem zu fehlen scheint (CA Cantabria 12 January 2006, BDA JUR 2006/90530 bestätigt zwar die Rückabwicklung innerhalb der Leistungsbeziehung (A)-(B), doch ergibt sich aus der Entscheidung nicht, aus welchem Grunde der Vertrag zwischen (A) und (B) gerichtlich angefochten und für nichtig erklärt worden war).

30. In ITALY scheint man an der Rückabwicklung innerhalb der Leistungsbeziehung unter Ausschluss eines Direktanspruches gegen den dritten Zahlungsempfänger (C) selbst dann festzuhalten, wenn der solvens geschäftsunfähig ist (Breccia, Il pagamento dell'indebito, 961-962; Trimarchi, L'arricchimento senza causa, 84). In AUSTRIA wird unterschieden: Leistet der solvens aufgrund eines Vertrags zu Gunsten Dritter unmittelbar an den Dritten und wird der Vertrag erfolgreich angefochten, so kann der solvens unmittelbar beim Dritten kondizieren (CC § 1431). Leistet der solvens dagegen in Erfüllung eines angefochtenen Vertrages mit seinem unmittelbaren Vertragspartner, so kann er auch nur ihn aus Leistungskondiktion in Anspruch nehmen; die Direktlieferung oder –zahlung an den Dritten ändert daran nichts. Der Dritte kann alerdings nur unter engen Voraussetzungen (CC § 367 analog, see Schwimann [-Mader], ABGB VI[3], vor § 1431 no. 31) gutgläubig Eigentum erwerben und bleibt deshalb oft einem Vindikationsanspruch des solvens ausgesetzt, der sich bei Unmöglichkeit der Herausgabe in einem Verwendungsanspruch fortsetzt (CC § 1041; see Rummel [Rummel], ABGB II(3)[3], vor § 1431 nos. 14 and 35; Mader loc.cit.). In PORTUGAL ist der Bereicherungsausgleich in Dreiecksbeziehungen Gegenstand intensiver wissenschaftlicher Diskussion (näher z.B. Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 533). Ausgangspunkt ist auch in den Fällen rechtlich mangelhafter Willensbildung grundsätzlich die Rückabwicklung innerhalb der Leistungsbeziehung (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 506). Das Gesetz sieht einen Direktanspruch gegen den Dritten ausdrücklich nur für den Sonderfall des unentgeltlichen Erwerbs vor (CC art. 289(2)). Im Schrifttum wird darüber hinaus aber ein Direktanspruch gegen den Empfänger (C) auch dann befürwortet, wenn der Leistende geschäftsunfähig war oder infolge von Täuschung, Zwang oder Drohung gezahlt hat (Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 463-464; siehe auch Almeida Costa, Obrigações[10], 505).

31. Vereinbaren zwei Personen die Erbringung einer Leistung an einen Dritten, so wird es sich häufig um einen Vertrag zugunsten Dritter i.S.v. GERMAN CC § 328 handeln. Die Zuwendung des Versprechenden an den forderungsberechtigten Dritten stellt i.d.R. sowohl eine Leistung des Versprechenden an den Versprechensempfänger (Deckungsverhältnis) als auch eine Leistung des Versprechensempfängers an den Dritten (Valutaverhältnis) dar. Die bereicherungsrechtliche Rückabwicklung richtet sich nach diesen Leistungsbeziehungen; bei einem mangelhaften Deckungsverhältnis kann sich der Versprechende folglich trotz CC § 334 (Einwendungen gegenüber dem Versprechensempfänger wirken auch gegenüber dem Dritten) kondiktionsrechtlich nur an den Versprechensempfänger halten. Eine Direktkondiktion gegen den Dritten kommt nur bei Unentgeltlichkeit der Leistung im Valutaverhältnis in Frage (Anwendung des Rechtsgedankens aus CC § 822), außerdem dann, wenn das Forderungsrecht gegen den Versprechenden nach der Parteivereinbarung ausschließlich dem Dritten zustehen soll (näher Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 812, no. 57; MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 812, nos. 129 ff).

32. In HUNGARY erfolgt die anfechtungsrechtliche Rückabwicklung eines Vertrages auch im Falle von Täuschung oder Drohung (CC § 210(4)) zwischen den Vertragsparteien (CC § 237). Es ist aber, wenn der Vertrag zwischen (A) und (B) erfolgreich angefochten wurde, ein bereicherungsrechtlicher Anspruch gegen den accipiens (C) wegen ungeschuldeter Leistung denkbar, weil (A) im Verhältnis zum accipiens ohne Rechtsgrund gezahlt hat. (A) kann zwar nicht doppelten Ausgleich verlangen, aber gegen (B) und (C) aus je unterschiedlichem Rechtsgrund vorgehen. Ist (A) von (B) durch Täuschung, Drohung oder Zwang zu einem Vertrag mit (C) veranlasst worden, kann A seinen Vertrag mit (C) nur dann anfechten, wenn (C) bösgläubig war (CC § 210(4)). Die Rückabwicklung erfolgt in diesem Fall im Verhältnis (A) zu (C) (CC § 237).

33. In the NETHERLANDS hängt die Entscheidung von der Frage ab, ob der Rechtsgrund für die Zuwendung von (A) an (C) nur in dem Vertrag zwischen (A) und (B), nur in dem Vertrag zwischen (B) und (C) oder in beiden zusammengenommen zu sehen ist; nur im letzteren Fall ist eine Direktkondiktion (A) gegen (C) möglich. Nach herrschender Lehre schließt ein wirksamer Vertrag zwischen (B) und (C) ein Rückforderungsrecht des (A) gegen (C) jedenfalls dann aus, wenn Letzterer gutgläubig ist (van Dunné, Verbintenissenrecht II[5], 663; Scheltema, Verbintenissenrecht II, art. 6:203, no. 11.2 p. 54 and no. 11.3 p. 55; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 192 and Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 330; Schoordijk, Onverschuldigde betaling, 23-30, 47). ESTONIAN LOA § 1030 gibt einem solvens, der auf einen nichtigen Vertrag zugunsten eines Dritten geleistet hat, einen Rückforderungsanspruch sowohl gegen seinen Vertragspartner als auch gegen den Dritten; zwischen verschiedenen Nichtigkeitsgründen wird dabei nicht differenziert. Die beiden Ansprüche können sich nach ihrem Ziel (Rückgabe in natura; Wertersatz) und ihrem Umfang unterscheiden. A fraudulent party to a contract may not rely on the defence of disenrichment, must pay interest for the money received and pay damages for loss of profits (LOA § 1035(3)). Liegen die Voraussetzungen eines Vertrages zugunsten Dritter nicht vor, so bleibt der solvens grundsätzlich auf einen Rückforderungsanspruch gegen seinen Vertragspartner beschränt (LOA § 1029). Die Rechtsprechung gewährt aber einen Direktanspruch gegen den Empfänger, der von der Abwesenheit des Rechtsgrundes im Verhältnis (A) zu (B) wusste; dieser Anspruch folge aus dem Prinzip von Treu und Glauben (Supreme Court 21 May 2002 and 19 December 2007, civil matter no 3-2-1-115-07).

34. In the NORDIC countries gehören die Fälle des VII.–2:103 zu den Regelungsgegenständen des Vertragsrechts. Die Rückabwicklung erfolgt grundsätzlich zwischen den Vertragsparteien, allerdings können coercion, fraud or unfair exploitation (Contracts Act §§ 29-31) auch dem Drittempfänger gegenüber geltend gemacht werden (Arnholm, Sammansatte aftaler, 142). HD 16 October 1975, NJA 1975, 517 entschied, dass ein solvens, der von seinem Vertragspartner durch Täuschung zur Direktlieferung an einen Dritten veranlasst wird, das Geleistete von dem Dritten auch dann zurückverlangen kann, wenn dieser gutgläubig war; see Hellner, FS Goode, 167, 183).

CHAPTER 3: ENRICHMENT AND DISADVANTAGE

VII.–3:101: Enrichment

(1) A person is enriched by:

(a) an increase in assets or a decrease in liabilities;

(b) receiving a service or having work done; or

(c) use of another's assets.

(2) In determining whether and to what extent a person obtains an enrichment, no regard is to be had to any disadvantage which that person sustains in exchange for or after the enrichment.

COMMENTS

See Comments to following Article.

NOTES

See Notes to following Article.

VII.–3:102: Disadvantage

(1) A person is disadvantaged by:

(a) a decrease in assets or an increase in liabilities;

(b) rendering a service or doing work; or

(c) another's use of that person's assets.

(2) In determining whether and to what extent a person sustains a disadvantage, no regard is to be had to any enrichment which that person obtains in exchange for or after the disadvantage.

COMMENTS

ARTICLES 3:101 AND 3:102

A. General

Twin provisions. VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) and its mirror-image twin VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage) address the second and third elements essential to establishing an unjustified enrichment claim: namely, the existence of the other party's enrichment and a disadvantage on the part of the claimant. While the claimant's disadvantage and the enriched person's enrichment need not be of the same type, the types of benefit or detriment which may constitute an enrichment or disadvantage are fundamentally the same, as is reflected in the corresponding wording of the two rules. Moreover, in simple cases, where the enrichment is furnished directly by or obtained directly from the disadvantaged party, the claimant's disadvantage and the enriched person's enrichment are simply different sides of the same coin. For that reason these two Articles may be considered together, taking VII.–3:101 as the focus of these comments.

Overview. Paragraph (1) of each Article sets out a definition based on an exhaustive enumeration: VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) lists the types of benefit which are recognised as constituting enrichments relevant to the application of the basic rule, and VII.–3:102 does the same for the notion of disadvantage. Moreover, each Article also sets out (in paragraph (2)) the principle that enrichments and correspondingly disadvantages are, as it were, the individual positive (or, as the case may be, negative) items on a balance sheet; enrichment or disadvantage is not the "bottom line" figure representing the balance itself (i.e. the aggregate of all positive and negative entries).

Relation to Chapter 4 (Attribution). In applying these Articles, account must be taken of the rules in Chapter 4 (Attribution). While this Chapter defines what constitutes an enrichment and a disadvantage, those rules impact upon the question as to who is enriched and who has suffered a disadvantage since in given circumstances they may have the effect, for example, of shifting an enrichment or a disadvantage from one person to another (see VII.–4:102 (Indirect representation)).

Relation to other Chapters. These Articles are concerned solely with the issue of whether or not a given person is enriched or disadvantaged. If a person is not enriched within the meaning of VII.–3:101, then that person cannot be obliged under this Book: there is no liability because there is simply no enrichment to reverse. Equally, if the claimant has sustained no disadvantage within the meaning of VII.–3:102, any enrichment of another has not been at the claimant's expense and there is no entitlement under this Book. The existence of both an enrichment of another and a disadvantage of the claimant, however, does not dictate that the enriched person is liable under this Book. That is so even if Chapter 2 establishes that the enrichment is unjustified. It must be established in addition, in accordance with Chapter 4, that the enriched person's enrichment is attributable to the claimant's disadvantage. Furthermore, the rules in Chapters 5 and 6 must be applied in order to ascertain what quantum of liability, if any, arises.

B. Increase in assets or decrease in liabilities: paragraph (1)(a) of VII.–3:101

Change in assets or liabilities, not change in value. Paragraph (1)(a) of VII.–3:101 provides that a person is enriched by "an increase in assets or a decrease in liabilities". In essence, any beneficial adjustment to either the positive or negative sides of the patrimonial balance sheet – the arrival of a new positive entry or the removal of a negative entry – constitutes an enrichment. However, the definition only embraces a change in substance. It does not extend to a mere change in the value of assets (which are themselves unchanged). There must be an increase or decrease in the quantum of subject-matter not a mere re-appraisal in how the market appreciates an otherwise unaffected quantum. Some new asset must enter or some old liability must leave the patrimony. On the other hand, benefits which do not involve a change in assets or liabilities may nonetheless amount to an enrichment under the other paragraphs of this Article – in particular where a service is rendered or work is done.

> Illustration 1
> D, the owner of a field which abuts a garden attached to E's house, has been lawfully using the field to store scrap material. The pile of junk is a substantial eye-sore and E has found it difficult to find a buyer for the house and garden at an acceptable price. Following a change in business plans, D clears the field for more sightly commercial use and E is subsequently able to sell the house. Evidence from valuers indicates that the improved outlook from E's garden added some € 4.000 to the purchase price. E is not enriched under this paragraph. E has not obtained any asset. The benefit was merely an increase (before sale) in the value of existing property rights. (Nor has D rendered a service or done work for E: see C below.)

Meaning of asset. "Assets" are defined in the Annex to the DCFR as anything of economic value, including property, rights having a monetary value, and goodwill.

Criteria. An unstated criterion for present purposes is that an asset must in some manner be recognised as "belonging" to one party, for it is this which generates the sense that one person's gain of that asset is at the expense of another. This implies that an asset must be an item, whether tangible or intangible, to which an element of protected exclusivity attaches. Secondly, it must be something which is capable of commercial exploitation. That is to say, it must be something for whose grant or use a person would be prepared to pay; it must be a right or an equivalent which is of potential economic benefit. 'Asset' is thus an umbrella term for all such forms of economically valuable positions which are legally protected.

Examples. The term certainly includes money and property rights including intellectual property rights and any other form of right, such as a contractual right e.g. a receivable ('book money'), a right to compensation for damage, a right to benefit under a trust, and even a right under the law of unjustified enrichment itself. It will not matter whether the property concerned is tangible or intangible, moveable or immoveable, and the distinction between proprietary, quasi-proprietary and pure personal rights is equally irrelevant here. It is likewise immaterial whether the right is characterised as essentially procedural or ancillary to some other right: the goodwill of a business or a right to correction of a register of title, for example, may constitute an asset. Moreover, confidential and valuable information may also constitute an asset in so far as its "owner" is entitled to restrict its use or circulation. An example in this category would be an outline for an invention or device which is not yet patented and therefore only an inchoate intellectual property right. A compelling factor is thus whether the "owner" of the "asset" is entitled to prevent infringements or adverse interference.

Illustration 2
D makes a payment by bank transfer. Because D makes a mistake, payment is made to E's account, which is in credit. E is enriched under this paragraph by receipt of the funds. E's personal right as account holder and creditor of the bank is enlarged to the extent of the increase in the balance (which is the sum E can demand be paid out by the bank).

Illustration 3
E acquires at an auction a car belonging to the estate of a famous person and with a personalised number plate bearing his initials ('TAC 1'). The auctioneers neglect to hold back the personalised number plate, which was not part of the sale, but which as a result of the failure to reserve a right of retention under the statutory scheme governing personalised number plates passes to E with the change in title to the car. E is enriched by acquiring the right to use and retain the personalised number plate, an asset which has a market value of some £ 15,000.

Illustration 4
D pays € 4,000 to X as a "sweetener" in order to induce X to conclude a contract for the sale of a farm to E, the partner of D's daughter. X subsequently sells his farm to E at the prevailing market price. Afterwards the relationship between E and D's daughter breaks down and D seeks to recover from E the sum which D paid to X. D's claim must fail because E was not enriched by D. The payment of the sweetener did not increase E's rights (vis-à-vis X, as prospective seller); it merely secured a chance to negotiate and purchase which E already enjoyed. D did not increase E's assets. The acquisition of the farm itself is referable to E's contract with X.

Mode of increase in assets. Provided that a given acquisition constitutes an increase in assets, it will be immaterial for the purposes of this Article how that acquisition has come about. An acquisition of property, for example, will be an increase in assets amounting to an enrichment whether this is an acquisition of title by transfer (sale, assignment, etc) or by any other means (e.g. accession). However, this does not prevent the mode of increase in assets being relevant in other contexts, such as whether or not the enrichment is justified, whether it is attributable to a disadvantage, and what is the measure of any liability of the enriched person. In that context the lawfulness of an acquisition will be especially material.

Illustration 5
D constructs a building on E's land. E is enriched under this paragraph. E has obtained an increase in assets: the building has become part of E's immoveable property by accretion to the land. It is immaterial, for the purposes of this Article, whether D requested the building and whether C knew the land belonged to E; such matters are relevant under other Articles of this Book.

Decrease in liabilities. Paragraph (1)(a) also provides for enrichment in the form of a reduction in liabilities. The typical instance will be where a debt which a person owes is fully or partially discharged. This increases the net balance of that person's patrimonial wealth and therefore merits treatment as an enrichment quite as much as a positive gain. It can hardly be material whether the recipient's bank account is in credit and merely enhanced (increase in assets) or overdrawn and the debt fully or partly cleared (decrease in liabilities). The notion of liabilities extends beyond contractual debts and thus includes, for example, non-contractual obligations or other obligations under private law. Nor is there any requirement that the creditor has in fact demanded performance of the obligation: the bare existence of a liability and its reduction suffices. On the other hand, there will be no decrease in liabilities if the supposed liability is entirely spurious: there must be a legal obligation to perform (e.g. to compensate or provide recompense). The same applies correspondingly where a legal liability has been waived by the creditor beforehand.

Illustration 6
A small amount of oil from X's oil tank flows into the soil of neighbouring premises belonging to N. The local authority undertakes the remedial action which in its view is necessary to deal with the pollution. Quite aside from VII.–7:103 (Public law claims) (according to which this Book need not necessarily apply to enrichments conferred in the exercise of public law functions), the local authority has no claim against X under this Book. If X were liable to N to make reparation for the damage caused, then the local authority's measures – in providing reparation in specie – would admittedly have reduced that liability. However, if under the applicable law a non-contractual liability in the circumstances presupposes that X caused the damage intentionally or negligently (i.e. there is no strict liability) and no negligence on X's part can be established, the liability of X which has been decreased by the claimant is non-existent. In such circumstances X has not been enriched.

C. Receipt of a service or having work done: paragraph (1)(b) of VII.–3:101

General; rationale. Paragraph (1)(b) of VII.–3:101 caters for an alternative form of benefit within the definition of enrichment in the form of the receipt of a service or having work done. The rationale for treating the receipt of a service as an enrichment is that whenever the market recognises a certain type of performance as valuable, the provider of that performance has necessarily rendered something valuable to the recipient and a transfer of value has taken place. Of course, where the service is unsolicited, the recipient may not feel 'better off' as a result. Such considerations (which may reduce or exclude liability on the part of the unwitting recipient) are taken up in later rules – in particular VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment).

Change in patrimonial balance immaterial. A service or work may (but need not) also result in a change to the balance of the enriched party's patrimony. A service which takes the form of 'pure consumption' or enjoyment is nonetheless an enrichment. A construction service (which adds a new structure to property), a treatment service (which merely improves the condition of existing property) and a transportation service (which merely relocates the person or property) are all services in the sense of this paragraph.

Composite notion of service or work. The concept of 'service' is an appreciably difficult one with rather vague boundaries. Its uncertain definition raises the prospect that taken by itself it might be too narrow in scope in bringing in certain benefits within the notion of enrichment. This is the reason for the extension of the paragraph to include "having work done", which is intended to embrace benefits similar in nature to services. The notion of 'service or work' may best be regarded as a composite intended to capture a particular range of intangible benefits.

Notion of service. The service concept normally assumes meaning in the context of contractual (or at any rate commercial) activity. A contract for the supply of services, for example, is in large part defined by contradistinction to an employment contract on the one hand and other specific contracts, such as a contract for the sale of goods, on the other. The notion of contract for the supply of a service put forward in the provisions specific to contracts for services (IV.C.–1:101 (Scope) paragraph (1)) operates without a definition of the core element of "services". They refer only to particular forms of services: paragraph (2) refers to construction, processing, storage, design, information or advice, and treatment, while IV.C.–1:102 (Exclusions) refers to transport, insurance, provision of a security and the supply of a financial product or a financial service. It may be taken that a service is an act or omission of a type normally undertaken for remuneration (cf. EC Treaty art. 50(1)).

Services by agreement, but without a binding contract. In a contractual context one may assume that a service is undertaken in order to render benefit to a recipient. The difficulty in the present context, of course, is that there may not be a contractual relationship between the parties to the enrichment claim. This is not problematic where both parties have proceeded (mistakenly) on the footing that their relationship is one of contract, for it will be their view of the economic activity undertaken which would clearly characterise it as a service; the actual existence of a contract cannot be essential to the provision of a service if both parties regard the performance as a service. There is at least in that case an agreement for services and the identity of the service can be ascertained.

> Illustration 7
> D, a lawyer, undertakes to act for E in pursuing a claim against a third party on a conditional fee basis, D to be paid a fixed share of E's compensation if and only if E's litigation is successful. After E's claim succeeds and settlement is made by the third party, E disputes D's entitlement to the agreed share of the compensation. Although neither party appreciated this, the agreement between D and E was prohibited by the relevant national law applicable in this particular case. There was no valid contract for services: II.–7:302 (Contracts infringing mandatory rules). (It is assumed that national law provides the agreement is void as a contract.) Under the law of unjustified enrichment, D has rendered a service to E in conducting the litigation and E is accordingly enriched in the sense of this paragraph. Whether the illegality of the transaction also affects liability under this Book is determined by VII.–6:103 (Illegality).

Unsolicited services. Enrichment by receipt of a service extends beyond 'remunerative work agreed upon by the parties' to cases where the service provider alone intends to provide a service on the basis of an assumption that this fulfils a request for a service or where there has been a genuine request, but it has not come from the party to whom the service is provided. Thus whether the mistake of the parties is bilateral or unilateral does not affect the qualification of work done as a service.

Illustration 8

Guest X at a hotel, operated by D, gives an instruction for some clothes to be cleaned and pressed during the day, while he is out of his room. The staff in the hotel make a mistake and take away similar clothes from the room of guest E, which are then returned cleaned and pressed. E is enriched under this paragraph. Of course, the fact that E is so enriched is not by itself determinative of whether E is liable to pay the value of that service (or any lesser sum) in order to reverse the enrichment.

Services provided unwittingly. A converse case is where the enriched person alone wishes to have the benefit of a service. In other words, the disadvantaged person provides a benefit to another unwittingly. If the service provider customarily provides the service to others on a fee-paying basis, it will usually be clear that the provider would have acted differently (for example, by acting so as to exclude benefit to the recipient) if aware of the true circumstances. Where the recipient has sought out the benefit in such circumstances, it will be just to regard that benefit as a service and an enrichment within this paragraph.

Illustration 9

E, a stowaway passenger on an aeroplane being flown by the D airline, flies from Hamburg to Munich. E is enriched within this paragraph. The benefit conferred (namely a flight from Hamburg to Munich) is a benefit of a type normally only provided to passengers in exchange for remuneration. It is immaterial whether E has made any saving of expenditure. For example, even if E would not have flown at all, had it not been possible to fly for free (because E merely took an opportunist advantage of lax security for the sheer thrill of the ride) E is still enriched under this paragraph. Although E in such a case has saved nothing, E is enriched by receipt of a service.

Incidental benefits in pursuit of own interest. Where there is neither an appreciation that benefit is being conferred on the part of the provider nor an active involvement on the part of the recipient in bringing about the benefit, its provision will not amount to the receipt of a service or work within the meaning of this paragraph. An exploitation of a state of affairs 'after the fact' is not a receipt of a service.

Illustration 10

A stream runs through land belonging to farmer D and, further downstream, land belonging to farmer E. In order to make better use of the water supply, D erects a filter which has the effect of cleansing the stream of debris. This improves the water supply for E as well as for D. D has nonetheless not enriched E within the meaning of paragraph (1)(b).

Illustration 11

D and E own neighbouring properties in a remote rural area. D enters into a contract with the X cable company for the installation of cable communications. This involves the company in building a cable 'backbone' spur from the highway across country to D's property. Subsequently E engages X to lay cable to E's own property. Since the X company (which owns the cable) is able to connect E to the freshly laid spur, E's costs of connection are considerably lower than D's. In obtaining a connection, E has taken advantage of the work which D had commissioned X to undertake. D has nonetheless not enriched E within the meaning of paragraph (1)(b).

D. Use of another's assets: paragraph (1)(c) of VII.–3:101

General. Paragraph (1)(c) of VII.–3:101 caters for a third type of benefit within the definition of enrichment in the form of the use of another's asset. The term "asset" in this paragraph bears the same meaning as in paragraph (a) (as to which, see B above). In determining who, if anyone, is enriched under this heading (and correspondingly who, if anyone, is disadvantaged under the corresponding paragraph (1)(c) in VII.–3:102), it will be important to identify whose asset is being used.

> Illustration 12
> Company D constructs a waste water channel running from its property. Under statutory rules the channel becomes State property. Subsequently E makes use of the channel under the terms of a statutory regime. Although E profits as a matter of fact from the fruits of D's expenditure, D has no claim under this Book against E. E has not made use of D's assets. Rather E has made use of State property. Nor will D have a claim against the State if the State's enrichment is justified because the State is entitled by law to the benefit of its enrichment (the increase in assets as a result of acquiring the channel) – i.e. if the regime governing the expropriation provides its own mechanism for compensating D.

Assets capable of use. The paragraph necessarily applies only to those assets which are capable of use. In principle this encompasses all transferable absolute rights, such as property rights including rights to intellectual property. However, the right need not be capable of transfer and it will suffice that the right is one which another person might be licensed to use. This will therefore embrace relative rights and non-transferable absolute rights, such as contractual rights and rights of personality. Use of another's asset will likewise cover one person's exploitation of another's confidential information or an invention or design which might be, but has not yet been, converted into a fully-fledged intellectual property right. Conversely, there will be no use of an asset within the meaning of this paragraph if public policy considerations preclude even a notional commercialisation of use.

> Illustration 13
> E occupies a caravan, which D rents from X. E is enriched in using D's asset, namely the right of D vis-à-vis X to occupy the caravan. It is immaterial whether or not D's contract with X prohibits or permits D to transfer this right or whether the right of D amounts to a proprietary right of possession.

> Illustration 14
> An inventor, D, enters into negotiations with a manufacturer, E, with a view to the possible exploitation of D's patent for a carpet grip. In the course of negotiations D outlines a new alternative design for an improved carpet grip. After the negotiations fail, E commences production of carpet grips based on the design outlined (but not patented) by D. D has a claim under this Book. E has made use of an asset of D and that enrichment was unjustified. D's alternative design, while not an intellectual property right in the sense of the patent, was nonetheless protected in law in so far as D was entitled to prevent use of the information disclosed in confidence to E. That right to control exploitation of the information was an asset of D's.

Irrelevance of authority of right-holder to license use. While a right must be susceptible of commercial exploitation in order to constitute an asset, there is no requirement that the holder of the right which the enriched person has exploited must personally be in a position to authorise another to use it. The de facto use of a right which de jure the enriched person could not be authorised to use is nonetheless a use of an asset within the meaning of this paragraph. The right-holder need not have the power to assign or sub-license the exercise of the right, but it is essential that the right must be of a sort which, were it not restricted by the terms of its grant to the right-holder or by the limited capacity of the right-holder, could be made the subject-matter of contractual licence in exchange for some valuable benefit. In this way the requirement of potential commercialisation relates to the intrinsic nature of the right and not, as such, to whether the right-holder has a power of or capacity to assign it or permit another's use. Where the holder cannot transfer or license another to use an asset, the requirement of commercial exploitability is fulfilled, for example, if the right was valuable in grant (i.e. a grantor could have demanded value for it and a grantee would have been willing to pay for the grant). Of course it may well be that a personal right will not have been granted for value, but it is the notional possibility of a purchase price which matters, rather than whether or not the right-holder actually did have to pay for the grant of the right. A right may be valuable, even though it is granted gratuitously.

> Illustration 15
> X is the owner of a small cottage, inherited from his father (F), which X has hitherto only used as a holiday home. As X would like to provide D, an elderly gentleman who during his long working life had given loyal service to F as his gardener, with a retirement home, it is formally and irrevocably agreed that D can occupy the cottage for the rest of his life. After a long spell in hospital, D returns to find E is in occupation of the cottage. E is enriching herself within the terms of paragraph (1)(c) in using D's right to occupy the cottage for life. That D acquired this right gratuitously from X is immaterial because a notional owner of the cottage could have demanded and a notional occupier for life would have been prepared to pay a reasonable price for the grant of the right.

Irrelevance of right-holder's intention to use or commercialise use. Since the question of enrichment by making use of another's assets turns only on the intrinsic potential for commercialisation, the presence or absence of any concrete desire of the right-holder to commercialise the possible use of the right is not material in determining that a person who has used the right is enriched. The home dweller who is prevented from using the property by squatters rarely intends to licence the unwelcome occupants, but that does not affect the point that the squatters have enriched themselves by rent-free occupation of another's property. Equally it is immaterial whether the right-holder would personally have used the asset.

> Illustration 16
> In the preceding example, E is enriched by occupying the cottage while D was in hospital, regardless of (a) whether D needed the cottage for his own use and (b) whether D had any intention of giving up possession in exchange for payment.

> Likewise, where a person has published pictures of a naked individual without that individual's consent, the publisher has exercised a valuable right which the individual featured in the pictures was able to license, even though a licence to that end might well be the very last thing the individual would have desired. In each case it is immaterial that the victim would never have dreamed of permitting the act done: the 'transfer of value' has taken place (against the victim's will) and an enrichment claim may simply make the best of an unwanted state of affairs.

Irrelevance of utility to enriched person. The use of an asset is an enrichment independent of whether this has produced any specific monetary gain or saving for the enriched person. Such matters may be relevant in the context of VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment), in determining the extent of the enriched person's liability if the enriched person is in good faith. Conversely, if the enrichment is in bad faith, the market value of a right to use (and not the actual benefit extracted from it) will provide a benchmark for the quantum of liability. In the case of publication of sexually explicit pictures of certain individuals, for example, the victims are entitled to claim a licence fee from the publisher even if publication to interested voyeurs is gratuitous.

Meaning of use. A use of an asset imports as a minimum an exercise of another's right or exploitation of the asset of that other. That in turn presupposes an intention to do the act which amounts to the utilisation of the asset. The requirement that another's asset be used also contains a further inherent qualification. It involves the limitation that the enriched party has in effect displaced another's (potential) enjoyment. Only then is a right or other asset belonging to another actually exercised rather than simply imitated. A further requirement contained within the notion of use of another's asset for the purposes of unjustified enrichment law is that the exercise of the right or exploitation of the asset must be of such a form that use is made of the asset: the act of interference with another's asset must be directed towards extracting utility from the subject-matter.

An intentional act. The requirement of an intention to do the act amounting to use of the asset does not mean, however, that there must be a deliberate will to displace the entitled party's enjoyment and avail oneself of something one positively knows belongs to another. The requirements of intention in the sense of Book VI (Non-contractual liability arising out of damage caused to another) - where (leaving aside the case of foresight of an almost certain outcome) an intention to cause the damage is required (see VI.–3:101 (Intention) paragraph (a)) - do not govern here. Such notions of fault are not material to this Book. Persons who occupy land under the misapprehension it is their own or that it is ownerless exercise the rights of the landowner or other person entitled to possession and so make use of another's asset simply because (i) they occupy with an intention to occupy that land and (ii) that land (as it happens) is not available for their use.

Displacement of another's use. Displacement of another's use may be either complete or partial, both spatially and temporally. Thus the exercise of another's right for a time is as much a use of that asset as its exhaustive or extinctive exercise. Where the right exercised is one of physical use, as in occupation of premises or possession of a thing, the use will generally be self-evident since such control of the thing generally displaces the corresponding use of another. Use of an asset will be no less present when the physical use is limited and displacement correspondingly partial, as in the case where a person in effect creates a right of way over another's land. Use by the owner is displaced to this extent, even though the owner's possession of the land is only marginally disturbed overall. Correspondingly, however, this is not a use of the whole asset which is at the owner's disposal, but rather a use of a component right – the right to give permission to cross the land. There is likewise a use of another's property where possession is shared.

Illustration 17
Every Saturday a market trader, E, parks a van on the forecourt of the premises owned by business D (which does not operate at weekends). E has made use of D's asset and is enriched within the meaning of this paragraph. It is immaterial that E's use does not interfere with D's actual use of the forecourt. To the extent of E's use, D's possible use of the space occupied by the van is displaced.

Illustration 18
E becomes acquainted with D, who represents herself to be a woman in financial and social need following a series of misfortunes. E agrees to let D occupy a room in his home rent-free and to have the shared use of other domestic facilities. E subsequently discovers that D is an habitual fraudster who preys on naïve young men like himself. D has enriched herself not merely in respect of the exclusive occupation of the room in which she lodges, but also in respect of her shared use of the other amenities in the dwelling.

Intangible property rights. This principle applies in a similar manner even when the property right exercised is intangible. A marginal encroachment may amount to a use of an asset.

Illustration 19
Without permission to do so, E reproduces a text whose copyright is vested in D. E is enriched within the meaning of paragraph (1)(c): E has made use of D's copyright. Although E's act did not preclude D from making or permitting copies at the same time, E has nevertheless made use of D's copyright because E's act necessarily prevented D's effective decision, at the point in time of reproduction, whether that copy should be made or not.

Apparent infringements. The situation is otherwise where the infringement is apparent only and the rights of the supposedly disadvantaged person are intact and unaffected. In that case there is no enrichment (and correspondingly no disadvantage).

Illustration 20
X, a debtor of D, is induced by E's fraud to pay to E sums due to D, E pretending to be collecting the debt on D's behalf. Although X has paid in good faith, X's debt to D is not discharged by the payment. E is of course enriched by X's payment (increase in assets). However, E is not enriched under paragraph (1)(c) in the sense that E has used an asset of D (namely D's right to payment of the debt by X). E has not used that asset because the debt of X to D has not been discharged by the payment to E. D is not prejudiced by the payment. Equally, and for the same reason, E's enrichment is attributable to X, not D: contrast VII.–4.103 (Debtor's performance to a non-creditor; onward transfer in good faith), which applies where a right against the debtor is lost. The case is otherwise if D ratifies X's misdirected performance: see further VII.–4:104 (Ratification of debtor's performance of a non-creditor).

Illustration 21
E takes D's car and transfers it to X in circumstances in which X does not acquire title to the car in accordance with statutory provisions on acquisition in good faith. E has not been enriched by making use of D's right to dispose of title to the car because there has been no transfer of title: X has not acquired ownership. E has merely made use, for a limited period, of D's right to possess the car. The case is otherwise if D ratifies E's purported disposition of the car: see further VII.–4:106 (Ratification of intervener's acts).

Mode of use. Any manner of using an asset which satisfies the foregoing criteria comes within the scope of paragraph (1)(c). In particular, where the asset concerned is property, that property may be used not merely by possession of the thing, but also by other modes of exercising any of the constituent rights, such as a disposition or disposal of the thing. A person who transfers title to another's property to a purchaser in good faith who thereby acquires ownership is enriched by making use of a valuable right of the original owner – the right to transfer title. This is true in a case of gift (so far as the applicable property law allows a non-entitled party to make an effective donation of another's property) no less than in the case of sale because in making an effective gift of another's property the giver purports to appropriate the property quite as much as if the appropriation was for personal use.

Illustration 22
E, a wayfarer, plucks and consumes an apple growing on a tree in D's orchard. E is enriched by appropriation and consumption of the apple.

Illustration 23
E takes D's car and transfers it to X in circumstances in which X acquires title to the car in accordance with statutory provisions on acquisition in good faith. E has been enriched by making use of D's right to dispose of the car.

Illustration 24
E, an electricity generator, purchases coal from D, which is burned in order to generate energy. It subsequently emerges that the contract is void due to non-compliance with regulatory requirements. Even if E did not acquire any property right in the coal, E will have been enriched by destroying it for its business purposes since in that case E has made use of D's rights in the coal.

Interferences not amounting to a use. Not every interference with another's property will amount to a use of that property within the meaning of this paragraph. The requirement of an intentional act of user excludes, among other things, the causation of loss or damage to property or person by a merely inadvertent act. Moreover, a use presupposes that the right is purposefully exercised in order to extract some economically recognisable advantage. A mere wanton act of destroying property, for example, does not by itself constitute an exercise of another's right in this qualified sense of use. Consequently interferences with the rights of others which are not the result of a deliberate act or which are not calculated to appropriate the economic benefits which may be derived from exercising the right do not come within the notion of use of an asset for the purposes of the law of unjustified enrichment. Such matters are the preserve of the law on non-contractual liability for damage.

Illustration 25
E maliciously scratches a parked car belonging to D. E is not enriched within the meaning of this paragraph. D has no claim against E under this Book. Assuming the requirements of VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) are satisfied, D has a claim for reparation. The position is no different if the scratch was accidental and the result of E's negligence or if E was motivated by a thirst for revenge, anarchistic desires, or a perverse thrill from causing destruction. However, the case is otherwise for the law of unjustified enrichment, for example, if E is a professional artist who is working on D's car to produce an elaborate etching. In such a case E has appropriated the bodywork of the car as the basis for the artwork.

Illustration 26
E agrees with D to store some of D's furniture while D's flat is being renovated. D indicates that she will collect it in three weeks time. Forgetful of the arrangement, E goes away on holiday for two weeks just at the time D is due to collect and the furniture can only be collected after E has returned. D demands a fee from E calculated on the basis of hire of equivalent furniture for the period of E's holiday. D cannot base such a claim on this Book. E has not been enriched within the meaning of this Article. E has never used the furniture and never purported to exercise a right to determine its use. E has merely stored the furniture for a period longer than the parties' agreement contemplated. Any liability of E arises under the law of non-contractual liability for damage and (if the parties intended to enter a legally binding relationship: cf. II.–4:101 (Requirements for the conclusion of a contract)) the law of contract.

E. Non-merger of enriched person's concurrent or subsequent disadvantage with the enrichment: paragraph (2) of VII.–3:101

General. The definition of enrichment in paragraph (1) of VII.–3:101 identifies certain forms of benefit (increase in assets, decrease in liabilities, receipt of a service, use of an asset) as constituting enrichments. In this way enrichment is defined in terms of the accretion of particular items which in themselves are valuable. Enrichment is not defined in terms of things which have actually made the enriched person better off. Rather it is defined in terms of receipt or assumption of benefits which are of intrinsic value (in other words, benefits which by themselves tend to make a notional recipient better off). Paragraph (2) of VII.–3:101 buttresses that definition by making it clear that a person is enriched simply because such a benefit has been obtained. No regard is to be had to any concurrent or subsequent disadvantage. The function of the paragraph is thus essentially one of reinforcement, to prevent the rigour of the first paragraph being diluted by other notions of "enrichment" which would not be suited to the rules contained in this Book.

Enrichment as improvement to net wealth. The function of this approach is best illustrated by contrasting an alternative model of enrichment. Enrichment might be defined in terms of the improvement of an individual's net aggregate patrimonial position, reflecting an increase in the surplus or reduction in the deficit of assets minus liabilities. The effect of defining enrichment in terms of the extent to which the individual is 'better off' is that whenever an individual obtains at the same time both a positive adjustment to assets and an equal and opposite adjustment to liabilities, there will be no enrichment because there is no net improvement to the bottom line of the balance sheet. That approach would not be workable for this draft because it would necessitate special rules to bring within the scope of the law of unjustified enrichment the reversal of benefits conferred pursuant to void or avoided contracts where there is no 'net' enrichment. This may occur if the bargain struck by the parties comes close to the market ideal of an efficient and mutually advantageous transaction and both parties have performed before it is discovered that the contract is void or it is avoided. In order that each party may start from the position of having a claim to restitution of the performance given and a corresponding liability to restore what has been received, it is necessary to adopt an approach to enrichment where one looks separately at each adjustment to the 'balance sheet' rather than to their composite effect.

Enrichment on an itemised approach. This is one reason why the draft adopts an 'itemised' approach to enrichment and disadvantage. Paragraph (2) of VII.–3:101 (in conjunction with the corresponding paragraph (2) of VII.–3:102) gives effect to an itemised approach by treating enrichments and disadvantages as distinct matters and excluding a definition of enrichment in terms of an overall improvement in the patrimonial balance. An enrichment is any positive item (within paragraph (1) of VII.–3:101) which is added to the balance sheet and a disadvantage is any negative item (within paragraph (1) of VII.–3:102), regardless of any countervailing movements of value. That enables a situation of exchange to be addressed as a conjunction of two sets of enrichments and disadvantages moving in opposite directions rather than as a single composite transaction.

Illustration 27
S, a provider of services, and P, the purchaser, perform their undertakings under a contract which, it transpires, is void. S is enriched by receipt of the purchase price (increase in assets) and simultaneously disadvantaged by performing the service. P is correspondingly both enriched (receipt of the service) and disadvantaged (decrease in assets: loss of money). Each party potentially has a claim under the law of unjustified enrichment. The value of the service and the amount of the purchase price are immaterial in determining whether a party is enriched or disadvantaged and whether a party has a claim: each is both a claimant in respect of that which was transferred to the other party and a debtor to a claim in respect of that which was received.

Comparison. Of course, where each party to a failed transaction is at the same time both a claimant and a debtor under this Book, there may be scope for set-off. This may result in a resolution of the two claims by one party paying the other the difference in value between the two performances. In such circumstances the approach to the enrichment concept adopted in these model rules and the net enrichment approach will produce essentially the same outcome. Nonetheless, the two models do differ in so far as the net enrichment model is only capable of serving economic goals in reversing the enrichment. The natural redress following a net enrichment approach is monetary payment fixed by reference to the net increase in wealth. This does not logically lend itself in cases of mutual transfers to reversals by return in specie of the benefit conferred. It does not facilitate reversal of an enrichment where a party who has transferred a thing to another is eager to recover that thing for sentimental, rather than economic, reasons. In such a case a pure net enrichment approach tends to imply at most a claim or liability measured by the difference in economic value between performance and counter-performance because that is the measure of the enrichment. It effectively compels a set-off. An itemised approach allows for a claim to the thing transferred and this has the potential to protect the broader interest of the claimant in the transfer of the thing as such based on, for example, sentimental attachment or wider business interests.

Contemporaneous and subsequent disadvantage. The principle of paragraph (2) is directed foremost at the case where there is an exchange (i.e. where enrichment and disadvantage coincide or are contemporaneous), as in illustration 26. However, the principle is not so confined - as the wording indicates ("in exchange for or after the enrichment"). Any subsequent disadvantage (a disenrichment) is to be disregarded for the purposes of identifying the existence of the enrichment, although it may be crucial for the purposes of the defence under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment). That is because the concern at this stage is with identifying the enrichment and not with fixing the quantum of liability.

Illustration 28
D puts banknotes, amounting to € 400, into an envelope which she hands to E as payment for E's invoice for work done by E on D's instruction. The payment due according to the invoice was € 250. Subsequently D discovers that, no doubt because of a failure to separate properly several new banknotes, she has considerably overpaid E. E, however, on opening the envelope and discovering the magnitude of the sum enclosed, assumed that D had enclosed a gratuity and promptly spent € 200 on a new coat for his wife. E is enriched under this article by the acquisition of € 400. This is unaffected by his subsequent disbursement of € 200 for the benefit of his wife. (E's enrichment is justified to the extent of € 250 and unjustified in respect of the € 150 which was not due: see VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified). However, whether E is liable to make any payment to D is to be determined in the light of VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment), in which context it must be considered whether the subsequent expenditure on the coat (as a disenrichment) satisfies the requirements of that defence.

Illustration 29
By mistake, D pays € 200 into E's bank account. Because D had previously spoken about possibly making a gift to E, E assumes that the money is a present. He withdraws the money from his bank account in cash, intent on treating himself to a new jacket. In the shopping centre he meets a friend who is collecting money for a charity, X. With an acute sense of guilt about his rampant consumerism, E hands over to the charity a € 50 note. E is enriched by € 200. His subsequent payment of € 50 to X is irrelevant to determining the enrichment. However, E's liability to D under the law of unjustified enrichment will be reduced to € 150 if E can establish the defence of disenrichment in good faith on the basis that he has sustained a disadvantage (an outlay of € 50) in the reasonable belief that his enrichment was justified and that this outlay is one which he would not otherwise have made.

NOTES

ARTICLES 3:101 AND 3:102

I. Ermittlung der Bereicherung und des Nachteils: Bilanzierung oder Einzelbetrachtung?

1. Die Frage, ob es für das Vorhandensein einer Bereicherung und/oder eines Nachteils darauf ankommt, dass die Vermögensbilanz insgesamt verbessert bzw. verschlechtert wurde (die Betroffenen also mehr erhalten als weggegeben bzw. umgekehrt mehr verloren als erhalten haben), oder ob stattdessen auf den Erwerb bzw. den Verlust des jeweils einzelnen Gutes bzw. der jeweils einzelnen Leistung abzustellen ist, wird von den europäischen Rechtsordnungen unterschiedlich beurteilt. Für das FRENCH law der enrichissement sans cause hat Cass.civ. 23 January 2001, Bull.civ. 2001, I, no. 9 p. 6; D. 2001 I.R., 746; D. 2001 Somm.Comm. 2940, obs. Vareille die Frage im erstgenannten Sinn beantwortet. Der actio de in rem verso könne nur stattgegeben werden dans la mesure où les prestations fournies, ayant excédé les exigences de la piété filiale, ont réalisé à la fois un appauvrissement pour l´enfant et un enrichissement corrélatif des parents. Daran habe es gefehlt, weil der Sohn für seine den Eltern erbrachten Dienstleistungen eine Gegenleistung erhalten hatte. Das entspricht der lange schon herrschenden Rechtslehre, wonach auf die gesamte Vermögenslage des accipiens abzustellen ist um zu ermitteln, ob er bereichert ist: in Betracht zu ziehen sei nur die Nettobereicherung (so schon Demogue, Traité des Obligations en général III, no. 151 p. 241). So sieht man die Dinge auch in BELGIUM. Als Bereicherung komme nur das in Betracht, was nach Abzug des korrespondierenden Verlustes das Vermögen des Bereicherten mehrt (de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge III(2)[3], no. 37 p. 47). Die Theorie der Nettobereicherung ist freilich nicht mehr völlig unumstritten (gegen sie insbesondere Filios, L'enrichissement sans cause en droit privé français, 145, 149.

2. Für SPAIN ist zwischen den verschiedenen condictiones zu unterscheiden. Die allgemeine Regel lautet, dass für die Frage, ob eine Person bereichert ist, consequent or subsequent disadvantages which this person sustains in exchange for or after the enrichment nicht zu berücksichtigen sind (Carrasco Perera, ADC 1988, 5, 92 and 96, der zur Begründung u.a. auf CC art. 451 verweist, wonach der gutgläubige Besitzer nicht seine Nettobereicherung, sondern den Wert der gezogenen Nutzung restituieren muss). (i) Im Rahmen der sogen. condictio de prestación ('Leistungskondiktion') wird zwischen der condictio indebiti (restitution of performances rendered solvendi causa) and restitutionary claims arising from void or avoided contracts unterschieden. (a) Für die Letzteren gilt unter CC arts. 1303-1308 das Prinzip der restitutio in integrum, das wiederum der Grund für die Nichtanwendung der Regeln über die condictio indebiti in diesen Fällen ist (Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 203-204). Parties are obliged to reverse what they received under the void or avoided contract regardless of both their good or bad faith and any advantage or disadvantage sustained in exchange. CC arts. 1303 and 1307 do not allow for a reduction or a suppression of the principle of reciprocal restitution arising from void or avoided contracts; an introduction to Spanish law of a kind of Saldotheorie is, in this context, impossible (Basozabal Arrue loc.cit. 217; anders allerdings Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 129). Das bestätigt auch ein Vergleich mit CC art. 1304 which only by way of an exception provides for a 'net enrichment approach': eine geschäftsunfähige Person ist hiernach ausdrücklich "nur insoweit zur Erstattung verpflichtet, als sie um die empfangene Sache oder den Preis bereichert ist". (Das wiederum entspricht CC art. 1163, wonach Zahlungen an eine geschäftsunfähige Person nur insoweit wirksam sind, als sie ihr zum Vorteil gereichen.) Zur Bestimmung dieser Bereicherung stellt die herrschende Lehre auf das modelo diferencial ab, das seinerseits auf das in quantum factus sit locupletior-Prinzip gestützt wird: keine Bereicherung ohne eine tatsächliche Vermögensmehrung oder Ersparnis (Carrasco Perera loc.cit. 105, 92-97; Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán, Las nulidades de los contratos, 286). Der bloße Empfang einer Sache oder des Preises ist deshalb noch keine Bereicherung (TS 15 February 1952, RAJ 1952 no. 288 p. 203; Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 287). Die Beweislast für das Vorhandensein einer Bereicherung des Geschäftsunfähigen liegt bei der anderen Vertragspartei (TS 9 February 1949, RAJ 1949 no. 99 p. 67; anders allerdings Díez-Picazo loc.cit. 601). (b) Im Rahmen der condictio indebiti ist die Rechtslage, wenn der accipiens indebiti gutgläubig ist, wegen der Sonderregelung in CC art. 1897 nicht ganz klar. Hiernach muss der good-faith accipiens zwar eine empfangene spezifische Sache (ohne Früchte: Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 519; Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Ballarín Hernández], Código Civil II[2], 1961; abweichend Basozabal Arrue loc.cit. 212-213) in natura herausgeben. Ist das nicht möglich, so muss er einen für sie erhaltenen Ersatz aber nur insoweit auskehren, als er durch ihn noch bereichert ist. Man hat es hier mit einer weiteren Ausnahmeregel zu tun, welche auf die Nettobereicherung abstellt (Díez-Picazo loc.cit. 520; anders aber wohl Carrasco Perera loc.cit. 99 and 102. Auf eine verbliebene Netto- oder Bilanzbereicherung scheint im Kontext der condictio indebiti auch CC art. 1899 abzustellen: A paid by error an amount to B, with whom he does not have any legal relationship. B, however, thought that what A paid to him was the debt that C had with him; consequently, B, who is in good faith, does not proceed against C and the claim is barred by prescription. CC art. 1899 excludes the condictio indebiti of A against B, but entitles A to claim against C. The legal prevailing doctrine points out that this claim (A against C) covers no more than C's 'net enrichment' (Gullón Ballesteros, FS Batlle Vázquez, 367, 383; Ballarín Hernández loc. cit. 1965). (ii) Im Anwendungsbereich der condictio por intromisión en derecho ajeno (restitution upon interference with another's assets; Eingriffskondiktion) bestimmt sich die Bereicherung grundsätzlich nach dem Marktwert des Gebrauchs der fremden Sache bzw. des fremden Rechtsguts (see CC arts. 360, 451 and 455 sowie Carrasco Perera loc.cit. 100 and Basozabal Arrue loc.cit. 264; Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 122; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 130 meinen allerdings, die Bereicherung sei auch in einem solchen Fall nach der Saldotheorie zu bestimmen). Verfügt jemand über eine fremde Sache und ist der Verkaufserlös höher als der Marktwert, so steht zwar auch der überschießende Betrag dem Eigentümer der Sache zu, doch soll er umgekehrt dem Verfügenden aus einer condictio based on expenditures under CC arts. 453, 454, 360 et seq. haftbar sein, wenn der erhöhte Verkaufserlös allein auf das persönliche Geschick des Verfügenden zurückzuführen ist (Carrasco Perera loc.cit. 98; Basozabal Arrue loc.cit. 298). Im Ergebnis verbleibt es dann also bei einer Abrechnung nach dem objektiven Marktwert. Liegt der erzielte Preis unter dem wahren Marktwert, so kann die benachteiligte Person Ausgleich des Differenzbetrages nach den Regeln des Deliktsrechts verlangen (Basozabal Arrue loc.cit. 298). (iii) Im Anwendungsbereich der übrigen Kondiktionen (CC art. 1158(3): condictio de regreso, reimbursement upon payment of another's debt; and condictio por impensas (CC arts. 453. 454, 360 ff: restitution for expenditure on another's assets) it is generally admitted that the 'net enrichment approach' determines whether and to what extent a person is enriched (Carrasco Perera loc.cit. 100, who explains that the 'net enrichment approach' also governs all cases of enriquecimiento impuestos [aufgedrängte Bereicherungen]). CC art. 458 provides for a general rule by which the possessor is not obliged to pay the value of improvements that do not longer exist (see e.g. TS 6 December 1985, RAJ 1985 (3) no. 6520 p. 5538). Im Falle der Bezahlung fremder Schuld ist nach CC art. 1158(3) nur dann auf eine reale Nettobereicherung abzustellen, wenn der Schuldner der Zahlung durch den Dritten widersprochen hatte (TS 12 November 1987, RAJ 1987 (5) no. 8397 p. 7847; CA Pontevedra 2 January 2007, BDA JUR 2007/66713; CA Cantabria 7 November 2006, BDA JUR 2006/284920; Bercovitz Rodríguez-Cano [-Bercovitz], Comentarios al Código Civil[2], 1395).

3. Im System der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld versteht die ITALIAN Lehre unter pagamento die Leistung von Geld, die Leistung einer nur der Gattung nach bestimmten Sache und die Leistung einer spezifischen Sache (Moscati, Pagamento dell' indebito, 156; Cass. 2 April 1982 no. 2029, Giust.civ.Mass. 1982, fasc. 4). Leistungen, die in einem bloßen facere oder in der Erbringung einer Rechtshandlung bestehen, unterliegen dagegen nach überwiegender Auffassung dem Bereicherungsrecht. Im Sinne des Letzteren (CC art. 2041) kann eine "Bereicherung" vielfältige Formen haben. Sie kann in einem Vermögenszuwachs, einer Ersparnis von Aufwendungen (D'Onofrio, Dell'arricchimento senza causa[2], 584-586; Barbiera, L'ingiustificato arricchimento, 284; Breccia, L'arricchimento senza causa I[2], 999-1001), der Befreiung von einer Schuld (Breccia loc.cit. 1000) oder der Vermeidung eines Vermögensverlustes (Gallo, Arricchimento senza causa e quasi contratti, 30-31) bestehen, nicht jedoch in einem lediglich 'moralischen Vorteil' (D'Onofrio loc.cit. 586). Ursache einer Bereicherung können eine Leistung, das Verhalten eines Dritten oder ein Naturereignis sein (Cian and Trabucchi [-Zaccaria], Commentario breve, sub art. 2042, II 3). Bei der Feststellung einer Bereicherung scheint sich ein Wandel zu vollziehen. An die Stelle des ursprünglich auf eine "Sache" bezogenen konkreten Bereicherungsbegriffs (sogen. concezione reale) tritt zunehmend die sog. concezione patrimoniale, unter der eine Gesamtbetrachtung der Vermögensverhältnisse nötig ist, um das Vorhandensein einer Bereicherung festzustellen (Breccia loc.cit. 1001).

4. PORTUGUESE CC arts. 473(2) und 479 beziehen sich lediglich auf "das Erlangte", definieren den Begriff der Bereicherung aber nicht. Sie besteht nach herrschender Auffassung in der Erlangung irgendeines Vermögensvorteils (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 481), d.h. entweder in einer Mehrung der Aktiva, einer Minderung der Passiva, der Nutzung bzw. dem Verbrauch eines fremden Rechts oder einer fremden Sache oder der Ersparnis von Aufwendungen (poupança de despesas). Einige Autoren meinen, die Bereicherung bestünde in der Differenz zwischen dem Vermögen vor und nach der Wertsteigerung bzw. in dem ausgebliebenen Wertverlust (Galvão Telles, Obrigações[7], 195). Andere meinen, der Vermögensvorteil könne sowohl objektiv und auf die einzelne Zuwendung bezogen, d.h. als enriquecimento real, als auch wert- oder bilanzmäßig als enriquecimento patrimonial bestimmt werden (näher Pereira Coelho, O Enriquecimento e o dano, 36; Antunes Varela loc.cit.; Almeida Costa, Obrigações[10], 491). Die Diskussion spielt vor allem bei der Berechnung der Rückerstattungspflicht unter CC art. 479 eine Rolle. Nach CC art. 479(1) muss der Bereicherte alles herausgeben, was er auf Kosten des Verarmten erlangt hat, und zwar entweder in specie oder, wenn das nicht möglich ist, dem Wert nach. Unter CC art. 479(2) soll die Verpflichtung zur Rückerstattung jedoch 'das Maß der Bereicherung' zu den dort jeweils näher bestimmten Zeitpunkten nicht überschreiten. CC art. 479(2) beschränke die Haftung des Gutgläubigen auf den enriquecimento patrimonial, während im Rahmen von CC art. 479(1) bereits ein enriquecimento real genüge (Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 109; Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 829).

5. Nach herrschender GERMAN Rechtsauffassung ist der Bereicherungsanspruch auf "das Erlangte", nicht auf die (bilanzielle) "Bereicherung" des Empfängers gerichtet (Larenz and Canaris, Schuldrecht II(2)[13], § 71 I 1; Koppensteiner and Kramer, Ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung[2], § 12 I a; MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 812, no. 339; Staudinger [-S. Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 812, no. 65). Denn CC § 812(1) first sentence verpflichtet den Bereicherungsschuldner zur Herausgabe dessen, was er rechtsgrundlos "erlangt" hat; auch CC § 816(1) first sentence ordnet die Herausgabe des "Erlangten" an. Auch AUSTRIAN CC §§ 1041, 1431 ff stellen nicht auf eine Gesamtbetrachtung, sondern auf den einzelnen konkreten Vermögenserwerb ab. Alles, was sich als Vorteil im Vermögen des Schuldners niederschlägt, ist eine Bereicherung; auf Nutzen und Gebrauch kommt es nicht an (OGH 4 November 1981, SZ 54/164; OGH 23 November 2005, SZ 2005/168). Under GREEK law stellt jede Verbesserung der Vermögenslage eine Bereicherung dar, gleich, ob es sich um eine Mehrung der Aktiva oder eine Minderung der Passiva handelt (CA Athens 1101/1996, Arm 50 [1996] 1329; CA Athens 8350/1993, NoB 42 [1994] 86; A.P. 1095/1973, NoB 22 [1974] 777; A.P. 560/1974, NoB 23 [1975] 147). Eine Bereicherung kann auch in der Befreiung bzw. dem Nichtentstehen von Pflichten und Lasten (Mantzoufas, Enochikon Dikaion, 497; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 24; Kavkas and Kavkas, Enochikon Dikaion II(2)[7], 634) und in der Ersparnis von Aufwendungen (z.B. im Falle der Benutzung fremder Rechtsgüter) liegen (Stathopoulos, Axiosis adikaiologitou ploutismou, 175; Deliyannis and Kornilakis loc.cit. 25; A.P. 604/1973 NoB 22 [1974] 27). Zur Bestimmung des Umfanges der Bereicherung wird das gesamte Vermögen des Beklagten vor und nach dem bereichernden Vorgang verglichen; die Differenz stellt die Bereicherung dar (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no.5; CA Athen 8350/1993 loc.cit.).

6. HUNGARIAN CC § 361(1) operiert mit dem Begriff des Vermögensvorteils, nicht mit dem Begriff der Bereicherung oder dem Begriff des Empfangenen. Deshalb herrscht in der Rechtsprechung eindeutig eine bilanzielle Gesamtbetrachtung vor: ein mit dem Erworbenen korrespondierender Nachteil schließt das Vorhandensein eines Vermögensvorteils aus (BH 1999/172 [wer für einen empfangenen Wechsel Ware weggebenen hat, ist nicht bereichert]; BH 1994/552 [wenn eine Bank ohne Zustimmung des Klägers mit dessen Geld eine tatsächlich bestehende Schuld des Klägers begleicht, erleidet der Kläger in seiner Bilanz keinen Vermögensverlust]; BH 1976/220 [der klagende Frachtführer hatte dem Beklagten irrtümlich zu viel Zement ausgeliefert, dem Verfrachter aber den Gegenwert (noch) nicht erstattet; folglich war der Kläger im Verhältnis zum Empfänger bereicherungsrechtlich nicht benachteiligt]). Im BULGARIAN Bereicherungsrecht ist zu berücksichtigen, dass der Anspruch aus LOA art. 59(1) der Höhe nach auf die Verarmung der kondizierenden Partei beschränkt ist. Im Rahmen von LOA art. 55(1) spielt der Nachteil des Kondiktionsgläubigers für die Kalkulierung der Höhe seines Anspruchs dagegen keine Rolle (Goleminov, Neosnovatelno obogatyavane, 181).

7. Für ROMANIA ist wiederum zwischen der Leistung des Nichtgeschuldeten (acţiunea în repetiţiune - condictio indebiti) und der allgemeinen Bereicherungsklage (der actio de in rem verso) zu unterscheiden. Im Recht der acţiunea în repetiţiune geht es um die Rückgabe des einzelnen Leistungsgegenstandes, real oder dem Wert nach. Das subsidiäre Bereicherungsrecht dagegen stellt auf die Abschöpfung eines Wertzuwachses und damit auf die Gesamtbilanz des Empfängers ab (Adam, Drept civil, 214-218).

8. Im DUTCH Law finden sich Anhänger sowohl der sogenannten ‘objektiven‘ als auch der ‘subjektiven‘ Methode zur Berechnung einer Bereicherung bzw. einer Verarmung. Die Befürworter der objektiven Methode bestimmen die Bereicherung durch einen Vergleich der aktiven Vermögensbestandteile des Empfängers mit dem Zustand, in welchem sie sich ohne den bereicherungsrechtlich relevanten Vorgang befunden hätten (Scheltema, Verbintenissenrecht II, art. 212, no. 3 pp. 14-24; Vriesendorp, Verbintenissen uit de wet en Schadevergoeding[2], no. 312 p. 295; Salomons, WPNR 2001 no. 6467 pp. 993-995). Die objektive Methode entspricht der Lösung dieser model rules; sie verneint den Eintritt einer Bereicherung nicht allein deshalb, weil im Gegenzug eine Schuld entsteht (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 355 p. 372). Die subjektive Berechnungsmethode (für sie u.a. Engelhard and van Maanen, WPNR 2001 no. 6446 p. 490) operiert dagegen mit einer auf das gesamte Vermögen abstellenden Bilanzbetrachtung. Es scheint jedoch, dass es den Vertretern dieser Auffassung vorwiegend um die Methode zur Feststellung einer Verarmung geht (niemand sei verarmt, der im Gegenzug für das weggebene Vermögen eine Forderung erwerbe); zugleich streben sie eine Konkretisierung des Billigkeitskriteriums in CC art. 6:212 an (Engelhard and van Maanen, NTBR 1998, 309-314). Es dürfte sich hierbei jedoch um eine Mindermeinung handeln; in der Rechtsprechung scheint sie noch nirgendwo aufgegriffen und befolgt worden zu sein.

9. In SWEDEN and DENMARK (weniger stark die Kritik in FINLAND seit Hakulinen, Obligationsrätt, 359; see further Roos, JFT 1992, 75, 80) steht man dem Konzept der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung nicht zuletzt wegen der Schwierigkeiten kritisch gegenüber, die man dort mit dem Begriff der Bereicherung hat. (Vinding Kruse, Restitutioner, 158, 189 even thought that the logic of unjustified enrichment was circular, weil der Begriff zugleich Voraussetzung und Grund der Haftung sei; gegen ihn zwar Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 148, 194, doch meinte auch er, dass a general principle, that no one shall make an unjustified enrichment at another’s expense, be meaningless by itself). Immerhin ist klar, dass es bei der Rückabwicklung unwirksamer Verträge nicht (nur) um Schadenersatz, sondern auch um Wertersatz geht und dass dieser je nach den Umständen des Einzelfalls (z.B. Swedish Parental Code chap 9 § 7: Haftung Minderjähriger nur auf den tatsächlich gezogenen Vorteil, wenn eine Sache nicht in specie zurückgegeben werden kann) beschränkt werden muss. Im Übrigen hat insbesondere die Swedish Rechtsprechung einiges zur Klärung des Bereicherungsbegriffs geleistet. Die meisten Fälle betrafen Überweisungen, die eine Bank irrtümlich, ohne Anweisung oder ohne zureichende Kontodeckung durchgeführt hatte (e.g. HD 30 March 1994, NJA 1994, 177; HD 17 September 1999, NJA 1999, 575; HD 30 December 1999, NJA 1999, 793). In allen Fällen hatte der Empfänger einen Anspruch gegen die Person, on whose behalf the bank had carried out the transfer. Der Supreme Court nahm jeweils an, der Empfänger sei nicht bereichert worden. Dagegen hat sich im Schrifttum zwar Kritik geregt (Hellner, JT 1999-2000, 409), doch spricht diese Rechtsprechung verhältnismäßig eindeutig für einen bilanzierenden Bereicherungsbegriff. Das bestätigt sich in HD 30 December 1999 loc.cit., wo eine Bereicherung mit dem Argument bejaht wurde, dass der Schuldner insolvent war und der Gläubiger längst nicht mehr mit einer Bezahlung seiner Forderung gerechnet habe.

10. ESTONIAN LOA § 1027 defines enrichment as “that which is received” from another person without legal basis. Das Gesetz sagt zwar nicht ausdrücklich, that the enrichment must have occurred “at the expense” of the other person, doch zählen Rechtsprechung und Schrifttum auch dieses Element zu den Voraussetzungen eines Bereicherungsanspruches (Tampuu, Lepinguväliste võlasuhete õigus, 59). Ungerechtfertigt ist es, etwas zu empfangen, was einer anderen Person zusteht (Supreme Court 16 May 2007, civil matter no. 3-2-1-46-07). Das “Erlangte” kann aus jeder Art von geldwertem Vermögensvorteil bestehen (Tampuu, Juridica 2002, 454). The Administrative Chamber of the Supreme Court (decision of 17 June 2004, administrative matter no. 3-3-1-17-04) hat in einem Fall, in welchem the Health Insurance Fund einer Frau ein Medikament ersetzt hatte, das nicht auf der Liste der ersatzfähigen Medikamente gestanden hatte, dem Rückforderungsanspruch des Fund entgegengehalten, dass das Medikament die Arbeitsfähigkeit der Frau erhalten und deshalb dem Fund andere Aufwendungen erspart hatte. The Civil Chamber of the Supreme Court (decision of 15 June 2005, civil matter no. 3-2-1-67-05) hat darauf hingewiesen, dass von dem Bereicherungsanspruch der Klägerin wegen unberechtigter Nutzung ihres Landes der Wert der Arbeitsleistungen als ersparte Aufwendungen abzuziehen sei, den die Beklagte dort erbracht hatte. Wer in der berechtigten Annahme, Eigentümer einer Sache zu sein, Aufwendungen auf sie macht, muss die Sache nur gegen Ersatz des Wertes dieser Aufwendungen herausgeben (LOA § 1033(2)). Ist ein Vertrag nichtig, dann können gleichartige Rückforderungsansprüche gegeneinander aufgerechnet werden, so dass im Ergebnis nur die Partei, die mehr erhalten hat, als die andere, den Saldo schuldet (Supreme Court 20 December 2005, civil matter no. 3-2-1-136-05).

II. Instances of Enrichment

11. Nach FRANZÖSISCHER Rechtsauffassung besteht eine Bereicherung in dem Erwerb eines Gutes oder einer Dienstleistung und in der Verwirklichung einer Ersparnis infolge der Vermeidung einer andernfalls erforderlichen Ausgabe (Bénabent, Les obligations[10], no. 488; Malinvaud, Droit des obligations[7], no. 499 p. 331). Jeder in Geld messbare Vorteil stellt eine Bereicherung dar (Planiol and Ripert [-Esmein], Traité pratique de droit civil VII[2], p. 51 no. 753). Auch in BELGIUM besteht eine Bereicherung in einem Vermögensvorteil jedweder Art. Es kann sich um den Erwerb von Gütern und Rechten oder um die Befreiung von Verbindlichkeiten handeln, desgleichen um die Erhöhung des Wertes einer Sache, um die vorübergehende Nutzung einer Sache, um Dienstleistungen (incl. Unterricht), um die Vermeidung oder Reduzierung eines Schadens oder einer Haftung (de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge III(2)[3], no. 37). Dienstleistungen unterliegen in beiden Ländern dem Rückabwicklungsregime der enrichissement sans cause, nicht dem der répétition de l'indu.

12. In SPAIN versteht man unter einer Bereicherung jeden vermögenswerten Vorteil, den eine Person erlangt (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 118). Ähnlich wie im Deliktsrecht wird auch im Bereicherungsrecht unterschieden zwischen (i) lucrum (or damnum) cessans (a non-decrease of assets) and (ii) lucrum emergens (an increase of assets) (Díez-Picazo loc.cit. 119; see on (i) TS 6 October 2006, RAJ 2006 (5) no. 6650 p. 14529; TS 9 February 2006, RAJ 2006 (1) no. 546 p. 1303 and TS 25 May 2007 RAJ 2007 (3) no. 3437 p. 7598 [A hatte C's Hypothekenschuld gegenüber der Bank B abgelöst, um C's Eigentum zu erwerben, was jedoch scheiterte, weil auf dem Grundstück noch eine vorrangige weitere Hypothek lag; A klagte erfolgreich gegen B auf Rückzahlung; B sei, on the basis of damnum cessans, bereichert gewesen, weil sie mit ihrer Forderung gegen den insolventen C ausgefallen wäre] and on (ii) e.g. TS 18 November 2005, RAJ 2005 (6) no. 7733 p. 16863 [wo der Erwerb eines apartments als lucrum emergens, d.h. als enrichment qualifiziert wurde]). Eine Bereicherung ist sowohl die Mehrung eines Vermögens (Erwerb einer Sache oder eines Rechtes, auch eines Anwartschaftsrechtes [Álvarez-Caperochipi, El enriquecimiento sin causa[3], 83], Erwerb des Besitzes einer Sache [Núñez Lagos, El enriquecimiento sin causa en el Derecho español, 114], Werterhöhung einer Sache) als auch die Abwendung einer Vermögensminderung (Schuldtilgung; see TS 28 January 1956, RAJ 1956 (1), no. 669, p. 418). Auch die Nutzung fremder Sachen, Rechte oder Leistungen stellt eine Bereicherung dar. Vorausgesetzt wird jedoch stets, dass der Vorteil zureichend sicher in Geld bemessen werden kann (Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crit.Der.Inm. 1969, 5851). Eine Bereicherung soll ferner in dem Erwerb jedweder vorteilhaften Rechtsstellung bestehen können, darunter die vertragliche Anerkennung des Bestehens oder Nichtbestehens einer Schuld oder die Verbesserung des Ranges eines Grundpfandrechtes (Núñez Lagos loc.cit.). Unter dem Ausdruck damnum cessans oder negative Bereicherung werden die Ersparnis von Aufwendungen, der Verbrauch einer fremden Sache oder die Entgegenahme der einem anderen zustehenden Leistung zusammengefasst (Núñez Lagos loc.cit. 117). Auch Dienstleistungen konstituieren eine Bereicherung, z.B. Dienstleistungen, die die langjährige Lebensgefährtin eines Mannes in seinem Haushalt erbringt (TS 17 June 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 4605 p. 8825) oder vertragslose Dienstleistungen eines Fachmannes (Núñez Lagos loc.cit. 121).

13. In ITALY ist nach wie vor umstritten, welche Bedeutung dem Recht der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld (CC arts. 2033 ff) im Rahmen von Dienstleistungen (Leistungen, die auf ein facere gerichtet sind) zufällt. Ein Teil der Lehre hält in solchen Fällen nur das Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung (CC art. 2041) für anwendbar (D'Onofrio, Dell'arrichimento senza causa[1], 264; Breccia, L'arricchimento senza causa I[2], 929). Andere meinen, es müsse auch in solchen Fällen zu einer Rückabwicklung kommen, doch stützt man sich dann auf ein allgemeines Prinzip; denn die Unanwendbarkeit von CC arts. 2033 ff wird auch von dieser Lehre (Moscati, Pagamento dell' indebito, 168) und vor allem von der Rechtsprechung (Cass. 2 April 1982, no. 2029, Giust.civ.Mass. 1982, fasc. 4; Cass. 24 November 1981, no. 6245, Giust.civ.Mass. 1981, fasc. 11; Cass. 4 February 2000, no. 1252, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 242) vertreten. Die Höhe des Ausgleichanspruches könne, je nach den Umständen, nach dem objektiven Wert der Dienstleistung oder nach dem für sie vereibarten Entgelt bemessen werden. Der gutgläubige accipiens schuldet nach dieser Auffassung nur den jeweils niedrigeren Betrag (Moscati loc.cit. 175). Zur Nutzung fremder Vermögensgegenstände findet sich Einiges im Besitzrecht. Unter CC art. 1148 verbleiben dem gutgläubigen Besitzer bis zum Tag der Klageerhebung die Früchte; die nach diesem Zeitpunkt gezogenen Früchte muss er ebenso herausgeben wie diejenigen, die er bei Anwendung der Sorgfalt eines guten Familienvaters hätte ziehen können. Für den bösgläubigen Besitzer gilt dies entsprechend von Anfang an. CC arts. 1148-1152 gelten aber nicht für den detentor (Cass. 28 June 2000, no. 8796, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 1427; Cass. 27 February 1996 no. 1533, Giust.civ.Mass. 1996, 264). Eine Analogie kommt wohl hinsichtlich des bösgläubigen Detentors in Betracht (Sacco, L'arricchimento ottenuto mediante fatto ingiusto, 43, 64), während der gutgläubige Detentor nach den Regeln des Bereicherungsrechts haften soll (Sacco loc.cit. 185; Breccia loc.cit. 1001). Die Verletzung von Patent- und Urheberrechten unterliegt eigenen Regeln, die neben der Haftung auf eine angemessene Lizenzgebühr auch eine Gewinnabschöpfung vorsehen (näher zum Verhältnis von Schadenersatz und Bereicherungsausgleich in solchen Fällen u.a. Cass. 1 February 1980, no. 773, Giur.it. 1980, I, 1, 1011 und Cass. 1 October 1975, no. 3097, Foro it. 1976, I, 386 [Ablehnung der Bereicherungsklage unter dem Gesichtspunkt der Subsidiarität]). Die unerlaubte kommerzielle Nutzung eines fremden Bildes folgt ausschließlich den Regeln des Deliktsrechts (Cass. 1 December 2004, no. 22513, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc 12), das es seinerseits aber ermöglicht, Auflagensteigerungen in die Berechnung des Schadenersatzes einfließen zu lassen (CFI Monza 26 March 1990, Foro it. 1991, I, 2862). Um die Vermeidung einer ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung soll es auch in CC art. 1775 gehen, der den Verwahrer einer sache verpflichtet, aus ihr gezogene Früchte herauszugeben (Cass. 29 November 1994, no. 10209, Giust.civ.Mass. 1994, fasc. 11). Unter CC art. 1526(1) hat ein Verkäufer unter Eigentumsvorbehalt nach Rücktritt von dem Vertrag Anspruch auf eine billige Vergütung für den Gebrauch der Sache. CC art. 1591 verpflichtet den Mieter, der die Sache nicht rechtzeitig zurück gibt, zu einer Ausgleichszahlung in Höhe des vereinbarten Mietzinses; hierbei soll es sich um einen vertraglichen Anspruch handeln (Cass. 2 March 2000, no. 2328, Giur.it. 2000, 1788; Cass. 10 Febraury 1999, no. 1133, Giur.it. 2000, 56). Aus alledem wird das allgemeine Prinzip abgeleitet, dass der Rechtsinhaber vom Verletzer die von ihm unerlaubt gezogenen Früchte und den objektiven Wert der Nutzung herausverlangen kann (Sacco loc.cit. 59 and 64). Auch Ersparnisse sind in diesen Fällen ausgleichspflichtig (Breccia loc.cit. 1000; Trimarchi, L'arricchimento senza causa, 145-147; CA Venice 29 October 1948, Rep.Giur.it. 1949, 1760).

14. Unter AUSTRIAN CC § 1431 kann eine Bereicherung in jedem von der Verkehrsauffassung als vermögenswert angesehenen Objekt oder persönlichen Vorteil bestehen (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB II(3)[3], vor § 1431 no. 7); das gilt selbst für die Information eines Maklers über eine Gelegenheit zum Kauf einer bestimmten Sache (OGH 15 Febrauary 1956, JBl 1956, 473) und für die Unterlassung von Wettbewerb (OGH 13 April 1988, WBl 1988, 436). Entsprechendes gilt für CC § 1041, siehe z.B. OGH 24 February 1998, WBl 1998, 273 (Ausnutzung des Bekanntheitsgrades einer Person) und OGH 20 March 2003, SZ 2003/24 (Stimmenimitation zu Werbezwecken im Rundfunkt). Selbstverständlich kann eine Bereicherung auch in der Ersparnis von Aufwendungen bestehen (OGH 19 November 1974, SZ 47/130; OGH 14 June 1995, SZ 68/115). Auch PORTUGAL operiert mit einem weiten Bereicherungsbegriff. STJ 24 June 2004, Processo 03B3105 z.B. sagt, dass eine Bereicherung 'prinzipiell' in der Erlangung eines vermögenswerten Vorteils jedweder Art besteht, also in der Mehrung der Aktiva, der Minderung der Passiva, der Nutzung oder dem Verbrauch einer fremden Sache oder der Ausübung eines fremden Rechts. Die Formulierung, dass der Vorteil ‘prinzipiell‘ einen Vermögenscharakter aufweisen müsse, soll wohl die Antwort auf die Frage offenhalten, ob auch ein bloß moralischer oder spiritueller Vorteil genügen könne (verneinend Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 829; bejahend Almeida Costa, Obrigações[10], 494). Für die Bereicherung durch Leistung stellt die Hingabe einer Sache zweifellos den Grundfall dar, doch sind Bereicherungen durch Dienstleistungen nicht aus dem Anwendungsbereich der Leistungskondiktion ausgeschlossen (Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 618; Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 82 [1959] 5, 256). Anerkannt ist ferner, dass auch Eingriffe in fremde Rechte zum Bereicherungsausgleich verpflichten (Pereira Coelho, O enriquecimento e o dano, passim; Oliveira Ascensão, Direito de autor e direitos conexos, 628; Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 684). Die Rechtsprechung hat das für Fälle der Verletzung von Marken und Patentrechten bereits bestätigt (STJ 24 February 2005, Processo 04B4601; STJ 22 April 1999, CJ [ST] VII [1999-2] 58-60), noch nicht aber für Verletzungen des allgemeinen Persönlichkeitsrechts. Keine Bereicherungshaftung löst die Bereicherung durch ein Naturereignis aus (Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 827). Das wird aus CC art. 1327 geschlossen, wonach dem Eigentümer alles gehört, was seiner Sache durch ein Naturereignis hinzugefügt wurde.

15. “Erlangt“ i.S.v. GERMAN CC § 812(1) ist alles, was gegenständlich fassbar ist; der Wert spielt keine Rolle (Medicus, Schuldrecht II[14], no. 673; MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 812, no. 342; Staudinger [-S. Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 812, no. 65). Das “erlangte Etwas“ kann aber ebensogut nichtgegenständlicher Natur sein. Es kann sich also z.B. handeln um den Erwerb von Forderungen, dinglichen Rechten und Besitz, um die Inanspruchnahme von Dienst- und Werkleistungen sowie um den Verbrauch, Gebrauch oder Nutzung fremder Sachen oder Rechte. Dasselbe gilt für die Befreiung von Verbindlichkeiten und von dinglichen Lasten (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 818, nos. 16 ff.). CC § 812(2) stellt ausdrücklich klar, dass das Erlangte auch in der vertraglichen Anerkennung des Bestehens oder Nichtbestehens eines Schuldverhältnisses bestehen kann. Ein vermögenswertes “etwas” i.S.v. CC § 812 erwirbt deshalb auch der Gläubiger eines abstrakten Schuldversprechens (BGH 22 July 2008, ZIP 2008, 1669). Die Rechtslage unter GREEK CC art. 904 entspricht in allen wesentlichen Punkten derjenigen in Germany (z.B. Stathopoulos, Axiosis adikaiologitou ploutismou, 176; Georgiades and Stathopolos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 10).

16. Auch im HUNGARIAN CC fehlt eine Legaldefinition der Begriffe Bereicherung bzw. Nachteil. Die Bereicherung bzw. der Nachteil müssen nach CC § 361(1) allerdings zwingend Vermögenscharakter haben. Dazu gehören z.B. der Besitzerwerb, der Erwerb von Vermögensrechten und Anwartschaften, die Erweiterung eines bereits bestehenden Rechts, die Ersparnis von Kosten und Aufwendungen, die Befreiung von Verbindlichkeiten und Lasten, die Inanspruchnahme der Arbeitskraft eines anderen und die Nutzung einer fremden Sache (Petrik [-Bíró], Polgári jog II[2], 650; Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1391). Dienst- und Werkleistungen stellen deshalb einen besonders häufigen Fall der Anwendung bereicherungsrechtlicher Vorschriften dar, weil die entsprechenden Verträge gemäß CC § 205(2) schon dann nichtig sind, wenn die Parteien keinen Preis ausgemacht hatten (z.B. BH 1998/39 [Forschungsvertrag], BH 1990/30, BH 1992/188 und BH 2002/29 [Werkvertrag]); die Vorschrift betrifft aber gleichermaßen auch andere Verträge, z.B. BH 2001/168 (Pacht), BH 1979/214 (Kauf), BH 1996/163 (Planung) und BH 1979/161 (Kommissionsvertrag). Die Aufwendung von Arbeit als solche begründet dann keine Bereicherung, wenn sie nicht zu einer Wertsteigerung führte oder für den Empfänger in dem Sinn nutzlos war, dass er keine Kostenersparnis davon hatte (BH 1997/400 und BH 1983/291). Vgl. ferner BH 2002/29 (Ersatz für die Materialkosten für den Bau eines Holzhauses; kein Ersatz für die Arbeitsleistung) und BH 1997/483 (Investition in eine Immobilie trotz gegenteiliger vertraglicher Absprache; Vorrang des Vertrages, außerdem keine Werterhöhung des Grundstücks). Eine Bereicherung kann andererseits auch in der unberechtigten Nutzung einer fremden Werbefläche liegen (CFI Csongrád, 1. Gf. 40 177/2002/3). Der Nachteil bzw. die Entreicherung werden nach denselben Kriterien ermittelt wie die Bereicherung. Einen bereicherungsrechtlich relevanten Nachteil erleidet z.B. ein Arbeitnehmer, dessen Arbeitgeber von seinem Gehalt das von der Behörde für einen bestimmten Zeitraum ausgezahlte Arbeitslosengeld abzieht (BH 1997/590). Denn die Entreicherung kann sowohl in einer tatsächlichen Vermögensminderung als auch im Ausbleiben einer Vermögensvermehrung bestehen (Bíró loc.cit. 651).

17. Für BULGARIA ist gesagt worden, eine Bereicherung könne sich auf dreifache Weise einstellen: durch einen Vermögenszuwachs, durch eine Minderung der Passiva und durch eine Ersparnis von Kosten (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 597). Noch keinen Vermögenszuwachs stelle aber der bloße Besitzerwerb dar; hinzukommen müsse eine Nutzung der Sache oder die Ziehung von Früchten aus ihr (Goleminov, Neosnovatelno obogatyavane, 99). Der Begriff des ‘grundlos Empfangenen‘ (LOA art. 55(1)) umfasst Geld, bewegliche und unbewegliche Sachen, die dem accipiens mit dem Ziel der Eigentumsübertragung gegeben wurden, Wertpapiere und Forderungen (Vassilev loc.cit. 581). Ersatz für entgangene Nutzungen kann nur im Rahmen der allgemeinen Bereicherungsklage (LOA art. 59) verlangt werden. Der wichtigste Fall der Minderung der Passiva ist die Tilgung von Schulden des Bereicherten gegenüber einem Dritten, z.B. die Tilgung einer Unterhaltsschuld (Auslegungsentscheidung no. 12 des Obersten Gerichtshofs of 22 March 1971, Plenum).

18. Das (subsidiäre) Bereicherungsrecht der ROMANIAN Rechts stellt einerseits auf einen Vermögenszuwachs und andererseits auf eine Vermögensminderung ab. Es wird auch auf die Rückabwicklung von facere-Obligationen angewandt (Dogaru and Drăghici, Drept civil, 365). Eine Bereicherung setzt einen in Geld messbaren Vermögensvorteil voraus. Bereichert ist z.B. eine Miteigentümergemeinschaft, wenn ein Mieter Verwendungen auf eine im gemeinschaftlichen Eigentum der Beklagten stehende Sache macht (Adam, Drept civil, 215). Einen Bereicherungsanspruch kann auch die Erbringung vertraglich nicht geschuldeter Mehrleistungen begründen, sofern sie zur Durchführung der eingegangenen Verpflichtung erforderlich sind (Supreme Court 2 December 2004, commercial chamber, decision no. 5197). Die actio de in rem verso kann ferner auf eine unberechtigte Grundstücksnutzung gestützt werden (Supreme Court 23 March 2006, commercial chamber, decision no. 1179), nicht aber auf die bloße Vorenthaltung einer rückgabepflichtigen Sache (Supreme Court 24 January 2007, commercial chamber, decision no. 331: Anspruch nur aus Deliktsrecht). Eingriffe in fremde Persönlichkeitsrechte werden grundsätzlich nicht bereicherungs-, sondern deliktsrechtlich ausgeglichen (Adam loc.cit. 260).

19. Ein bereicherungsrechtlicher Anspruch setzt natürlich auch in the NETHERLANDS eine Bereicherung voraus (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 829). Nach herrschender Meinung ist dieser Begriff nicht in erster Linie juristisch, sondern ökonomisch zu verstehen, und dies vor allem deshalb, weil der Bereicherungsanspruch auf Schadenersatz zielt und weil Schadenersatz gemäß CC art. 6:103 in Geld zu erbringen ist. Der Wert der Bereicherung und der Wert der Verarmung begrenzen diesen Anspruch, der außerdem dem Gebot der redelijkheid genügen muss. Nicht bereichert ist ein Mann, wenn der zukünftige Schwiegervater Geld an den Verkäufer eines Bauernhofes nur deshalb überweist, um den Verkäufer dazu zu überreden, den Hof (zum regulären Marktpreis) an den jungen Mann zu verkaufen, der sich anschließend aber doch nicht zu der Ehe entschließen kann (CA Amsterdam 24 October 1956, NedJur 1957 no. 368 p. 685; see illustration 4 above). Die Erscheinungsformen einer Bereicherung (verrijking) sind zahlreich und entziehen sich einer allgemeinen Definition; jede Vermögensmehrung ist eine Bereicherung (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 831). Zahlreiche Beispiele werden genannt: die Vermeidung eines drohenden Schadens (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI loc.cit.; HR 10 December 1999, LJN no. AA3841), der Empfang von Geld, Gütern oder Dienstleistungen, die Einräumung eines Kredits (CFI Zutphen 29 April 2004, LJN no. AO8611), der gesetzliche Eigentumserwerb an einem Gebäude (HR 29 January 1993, NedJur 1994, no. 172 p. 728), während einer Ehe unbezahlt erlangte Arbeit (HR 4 December 1987, NedJur 1988, no. 610 p. 2162), Verbesserungen einer Mietwohnung (HR 25 June 2004, RvdW 2004, no. 89 p. 791; HR 30 September 2005, RvdW 2005, no. 106 p. 961) oder eines Betriebsgebäudes (HR 25 June 2004, RvdW 2004, no. 89 p. 791), eine Bodensanierung (HR 25 March 2005, RvdW 2005, no. 49 p. 487), die Ersparnis von Aufwendungen (HR 14 October 1994, NedJur 1995, no. 720 p. 3629; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 354a p. 371), das Freiwerden von einer Schuld (Vriesendorp, Verbintenissen uit de wet en Schadevergoeding, no. 312, p. 295), die Nutzung einer fremden Sache (Scheltema, Verbintenissenrecht II, art. 6:212, no. 3) der Erwerb von goodwill und eines zusätzlichen Kundenstamms (HR 15 March 1996, NedJur 1997, no. 3 p. 22-37; but see also HR 2 February 2001, NedJur 2001, no. 319 p. 2389). Zusätzlich zu dem Vorhandensein einer Bereicherung ist stets zu prüfen, ob ein Ersatz für sie angemessen (redelijk) ist. Daran fehlt es z.B. im Falle des Bauens auf fremden Grund, wenn der Eigentümer von diesem Bau keinen Nutzen hat, ihn vielmehr abreißt und ein neues Gebäude errichtet (HR 30 September 2005, RvdW 2005, no. 106 p. 961).

20. Aus ESTONIAN LOA § 1032(2) (wonach Wertersatz geschuldet ist, wenn das Erlangte nicht in Natur herausgegeben werden kann) wird geschlossen, dass eine Bereicherung in einem geldwerten Vermögensvorteil besteht. Typische Beispiele liefern der Erwerb von Geld, Eigentum oder Besitz, der Erwerb eines Rechts oder eines Gesellschaftsanteils. Schon eine bloße Eintragung im Grundbuch genügt aber für das Vorhandensein einer Bereicherung (Supreme Court 1 December 2005, decision no. 3-2-1-129-05). Weitere Beispiele sind die Befreiung von einer Schuld und die Ersparnis von Aufwendungen. Für Verwendungen auf fremde Sachen findet sich in LOA § 1042 eine Sonderreglung, wonach bei der Feststellung einer Bereicherung u.a. zu berücksichtigen ist, ob die Verwendungen aus der Sicht des Eigentümers nützlich waren (näher Supreme Court 21 March 2005, decision no. 3-2-1-16-05). Auch der Erhalt eines Schuldanerkenntnisses begründet eine Bereicherung (Supreme Court 23 January 2006, decision no. 3-2-1-146-05), desgleichen Dienstleistungen, der Eingriff in fremde Rechte (see LOA § 1037(1)) und die Vorenthaltung des Besitzes (LOA §§ 1037-1040).

21. For ENGLAND and IRELAND Tettenborn, Restitution[3], 6 proposes that a defendant ought to be regarded as being enriched where (i) he receives money; (ii) he obtains property with a monetary value; (iii) he is saved expense or loss that would otherwise be incurred; (iv) he has property improved so that it is worth more; (v) services are rendered to him. However (i) can be modified in the case of trusts – if monies are obtained through a valid trust and the recipient accepts that he has no power to deal with it except in accordance with the terms of that trust, he will not be regarded as being enriched (Portman Building Society v. Hamlyn Taylor Neck [1998] 4 All ER 202; see also Tettenborn loc.cit. 6-13. The receipt of property is also unproblematic – where someone acquires ownership of property or land then there is a gain which is equivalent to the value of the asset. Positive and negative enrichment can increase net assets, with a large number of claims in restitution arising out of claims for expenses saved, such as contribution or the compulsion to pay the defendants liabilities. These will include claims which were based on releasing someone from an obligation, such as paying off a joint mortgage by the one party (Ker v. Ker (1869) 4 IrEqR 15). Improving the defendant's property can also enrich him. This can arise in two ways – necessitous intervention or through beneficial service. In the former, the defendant ought to be precluded from denying that he is richer – he may of course have other arguments as to why he should not make restitution, such as his not wanting the improvement, but this should not allow his saying that he has not been enriched at all (Tettenborn loc.cit. 199-212). An example may be seen where A loses his dog, only for B to find it. B feeds and cares for the dog until A reclaims it. Can B claim reimbursement for feeding the animal? However beneficial, Irish cases have tended to hold necessitous payment or beneficial services do not give rise to relief (O'Callaghan v. Ballincollig Holdings Ltd, unreported, 31/3/93 (Blayney J)). There are notable exceptions to the general rule of non recovery, namely the agency of necessity (Flannery v. Dean [1995] 2 ILRM 393); bailment (The Winson [1982] AC 939); trustees for reasonable costs; liquidator and receivers; supplying necessaries to incompetents (Re Pike (1889) 23 LR Ir 9 – police have claim for restitution to costs incurred in looking after the house of a woman prior to her relatives coming forward); Sale of Goods (Ireland) Act 1893, s. 2 (an incompetent is liable to pay a reasonable price for necessary goods sold to him); performance of a public duty. Peculiar to Ireland is the notion of salvage – a salvager may have claim to restitution in law. Thus where a person with an interest in property incurs necessary expense for its preservation to the advantage of others also interested, he may obtain restitution of the enrichment of the other parties. This can also be applied to volunteers (Rathdonnell (Lord) v. Colvin [1952] IR 297). As regards services, it may be argued that where services are rendered which in effect improve the property then they may count as an enrichment. The rendering of services to the defendant can count as enrichment but are the most difficult to quantify. Problems could arise where there has been no actual accretion to the wealth of a defendant. Birks favoured pure services being regarded as enrichment independent of any financial "end product" (Birks, An Introduction to the Law of Restitution[1], 109. This would apply where services were in fact rendered to the defendant, especially where requested or freely accepted. Thus in Planché v. Colburn (1831) 8 Bing 14 a book was commissioned and cancelled. The defendants were disbarred from claiming a non-benefit, they were in fact enriched and liable to make restitution. Irish courts will also regard services as capable of bringing an enrichment, as in the case of Premier Dairies v. Jameson, High Court, 1/3/1983, McWilliam J, who stated that there is no difference in principle where benefits were given to the defendant at the cost to the plaintiff (unreported case, see O'Dell, Annual Review of Irish Law [1997] 609-610).

III. Disadvantage

22. Die FRENCH Rechtslehre bezeichnet den für einen Anspruch aus enrichissement sans cause erforderlichen Nachteil des Klägers als Verarmung (appauvrissement). Eine Verarmung besteht in einem tatsächlichen Vermögensverlust oder in dem Entgang eines Gewinns (Bénabent, Les obligations[10], no. 487 p. 333; Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], p. 1022 no. 1067). Auch eine unbezahlt erbrachte Dienstleistung begründet eine Verarmung (Malinvaud, Droit des obligations[7], no. 499 p. 331; Malaurie/Aynès/Stoffel-Munck, Les obligations[2], p. 569 no. 1064; Terré/Simler/Lequette loc.cit.), z.B. die Leistung eines Genealogen, der einen Erben sucht (CFI Vannes 11 December 1967, GazPal 1968, 1, 162) oder eine vertragslose

Lehrtätigkeit (Mazeaud and Chabas, Leçons de droit civil II(1)[6], p. 804 no. 699). Der Begriff der Verarmung entspricht spiegelbildlich dem der Bereicherung (Malaurie/Aynès/Stoffel-Munck loc.cit.). Die Rechtslage in BELGIUM stimmt mit der in France überein (de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge III(2)[3], no. 38). Jeglicher Wertverlust stellt eine Verarmung dar, ganz gleich, ob er auf der Hingabe von Zeit, Arbeit oder Kapital oder auf der Eingehung einer Verbindlichkeit beruht (Dekkers, Précis de droit civil belge II, p. 180 no. 314).

23. Auch in SPAIN the plaintiff must sustain an empobrecimiento (an impoverishment) which is linked to the enrichment of the defendant (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 120; TS 15 June 2004, RAJ 2004 (3) no. 3847 p. 7922). Ein empobrecimiento ist jeder ökonomische Nachteil. Es kann sich z.B. handeln um die Lieferung einer Sache, um die Erbringung einer Dienstleistung oder um einen entgangenen Gewinn, etwa eine entgangene Nutzungsgebühr (Díez-Picazo loc.cit. 121; Núñez Lagos, El enriquecimiento sin causa en el Derecho español, 125). Die Rechtsprechung unterscheidet zumeist zwischen einer Verarmung infolge eines daño positivo und einer Verarmung by frustration of a profit (TS 15 December 2005, BDA RJ 2005/1223; TS 15 June 2004, RAJ 2004 (3) no. 3847 p. 7922). An einer Verarmung soll es aber fehlen, wenn jemand im eigenen Interesse, im eigenen Namen und zum eigenen Vorteil die Bereicherung eines anderen verursacht (TS 22 March 1978, RAJ 1978 (1) no. 1055 p. 920 [Verwendungen eines Besitzers auf das Haus eines anderen, in dem er unrechtmäßig wohnte]). Eine Bereicherungsklage soll auch dann scheitern, wenn der Nachteil seine Ursache in einer unmoralischen oder rechtsiwdrigen Handlung des Klägers hat (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 578 mit dem Beispiel einer Großmutter, die einer gerichtlichen Entscheidung zuwider die Kinder nicht herausgibt; sie könne nicht später von den Eltern Ersatz der Unterhalts- und Ausbildungskosten verlangen).

24. ITALIAN CC art. 2041 spricht von der Entreicherung als Schaden. Es handelt sich um den Verlust oder die Wertminderung von Vermögensgegenständen (Breccia, L'arricchimento senza causa I[2], 1004) und um entgangenen Gewinn (Trabucchi, Arricchimento (azione di),, 52, 71; Breccia loc.cit. 1005). Auch der objektive Wert einer erbrachten Leistung oder einer persönlichen Anstrengung zugunsten eines Anderen wird als Entreicherung angesehen (Breccia loc.cit.), desgleichen die unerlaubte Nutzung einer Sache durch einen Fremden (Breccia loc.cit. 1006; Trimarchi, L'arricchimento senza causa, 48-49; anders noch Trabucchi loc.cit.) und das Verletztwerden in einem eigenen Recht (so jedenfalls Gallo, Arricchimento senza causa e quasi contratti, 35). Die Entreicherung muss der Bereicherung entsprechen: zwischen beiden muss ein Kausalzusammenhang bestehen, und ersatzpflichtig ist nur der jeweils niedrigere Betrag (D'Onofrio, Dell'arricchimento senza causa[2], 589).

25. PORTUGUESE CC art. 473 setzt voraus, dass die jeweilige Bereicherung "auf Kosten" eines anderen (à custa de outrem) erlangt worden ist. Einer "Verarmung" oder eines "Schadens" bedarf es nach dem Wortlaut dieser Bestimmung zwar gerade nicht (näher Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 402), doch muss mit der Bereicherung des Beklagten irgendein sacrifício económico des Klägers in Kausalzusammenhang stehen (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[10], 495; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 488). Dass es für den Anspruch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung nicht auf einen Schaden ankommt, spielt vor allem in der Rechtsprechung zum Bereicherungsausgleich bei Verletzung fremder Rechte eine wichtige Rolle (STJ 24 Februray 2005, Processo 04B4601; STJ 23 March 1999, CJ [ST] VII [1999-1] 172). Der Begriff der 'Verarmung' schleicht sich allerdings auch heute noch gelegentlich in Formulierungen sowohl der Lehre (z.B. Galvão Telles, Obrigações[7], 198) als auch der Rechtsprechung ein (z.B. STJ 20 March 2001, CJ [ST] IX [2001-1] 176). In AUSTRIA legt man Wert auf die Feststellung, dass Bereicherungsansprüche keinen Schaden voraussetzten (OGH 16 June 1972, SZ 44/92; OGH 17 March 1982, SZ 55/37). Bei der Leistungskondiktion habe der Gläubiger zwar stets etwas weggegeben, doch seien im Rahmen von CC § 1041 Fälle denkbar, in welchen dem Vorteil des Bereicherten kein Verlust des Gläubigers gegenüberstehe, z.B. dort, wo unerlaubte Werbung mit dem Bild eines Tenors getrieben und dadurch sein Bekanntheitsgrad erhöht wird (OGH 23 October 1990, WBl 1991, 137).

26. GERMAN CC § 812(1) verpflichtet denjenigen zur Herausgabe, der etwas "auf Kosten" des Bereicherungsgläubigers erlangt hat. Für die Leistungskondiktion hat dieses Merkmal keine eigenständige Bedeutung; eine Leistung erfolgt immer "auf Kosten" des Leistenden (Fikentscher and Heinemann, Schuldrecht[10], no. 1421; Medicus, Schuldrecht II[14], no. 632; Koppensteiner and Kramer, Ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung[2], § 4 IV 1; BGH 29 May 1967, BGHZ 48, 70, 73; BGH 27 May 1971, BGHZ 56, 228, 239). In den Fällen der sogen. Eingriffskondiktion liegt eine Bereicherung "auf Kosten" eines anderen vor, wenn der Schuldner in den Zuweisungsgehalt eines Rechts des Gläubigers eingegriffen hat (sogen. "Zuweisungstheorie", see Medicus loc.cit. no. 713; Larenz and Canaris, Schuldrecht II(2)[13], § 69 I 1 b; BGH 24 November 1981, BGHZ 82, 299, 306; BGH 9 March 1989, BGHZ 107, 117, 120). Es genügt, das der Bereicherungsgegenstand unter Ausnutzung einer geschützten Vermögensposition des Berechtigten erlangt wurde (MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 812, no. 249; Medicus loc.cit.; Koppensteiner and Kramer loc.cit. § 9 I 5). Der Bereicherungsschuldner ist folglich dann auf Kosten des Bereicherungsgläubigers bereichert, wenn er eine Nutzungs- oder Verwertungsmöglichkeit in Anspruch nimmt, für deren Einräumung der Berechtigte hätte Zahlung verlangen können (Lieb loc.cit. no. 250). Es kommt aber nicht darauf an, dass der Bereicherungsgläubiger die Sache auch tatsächlich selbst nutzen wollte; die abstrakte Nutzungs- und Verwertungsmöglichkeit genügt (Lieb loc.cit.; Erman [-Westermann and Buck-Heeb], BGB II[12], § 812, no. 68). GREEK CC art. 904 verlangt, dass die Bereicherung aus dem Vermögen einer Person oder zu deren Schaden erfolgt ist. Diese Formulierung des Gesetzes gilt heute als wenig gelungen (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, nos. 17, 19; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 2). Entscheidend ist das Vorhandensein eines Schadens (Stathopoulos, Axiosis adikaiologitou ploutismou, 194). Der Begriff wird im Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung aber sehr viel weiter verstanden als im Deliktsrecht. Insbesondere bedarf es keines realen Verlustes; die bloße Rechtsverletzung genügt (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], art. 904, no. 20; Deliyannis and Kornilakis loc.cit. 28). Man spricht von einem bloß "abstrakten" oder "hypothetischen" Schaden (CA Athens 2073/1987, NoB 35 [1987] 1067).

27. In HUNGARY kommt es wesentlich auf eine tatsächliche Vermögensminderung oder auf das Ausbleiben einer Vermögensmehrung an (Petrik [-Bíró], Polgári jog II[2], 651). Auch die für einen anderen geleistete Arbeit begründet jedoch einen Nachteil, und zwar unabhängig davon, ob der Kläger andere Verdienstmöglichkeiten gehabt hätte (Szladits [-Személyi], Magyar magánjog IV, 756). Eine Bereicherung ist folglich auch dann auf Kosten des eines anderen erfolgt, wenn dieser keinen tatsächlichen Vermögensnachteil erlitten hat. Das ist z.B. bei der rechtsgrundlosen Nutzung eines fremden Grundstücks der Fall, dessen Eigentümer es weder vermieten noch selber nutzen wollte (Vékás, JbOstR XIX [1978] 243, 246). Allerdings ist in solchen Fällen der Anwendungsvorrang der CC §§ 193-195 (über den rechtsgrundlosen Besitz) vor dem Bereicherungsrecht zu beachten (Vékás, FS György, 331, 352). BULGARIA verlangt eine Verarmung des Anspruchstellers. Der Begriff wird aber sehr weit verstanden und umfasst neben der Minderung der Aktiva, dem Zuwachs der Passiva, der Wertminderung einer Sache und dem entgangenen Gewinn auch die Erbringung von Dienstleistungen (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 598). So liegen die Dinge auch in ROMANIA. Lehrbuchbeispiele nennen den unbezahlt gebliebenen Unterricht und andere Arbeits- und Dienstleistungen ebenso wie Zahlungen, Schuldbefreiungen, Wertminderungen einer Sache und die entgangene Nutzung einer Sache (Adam, Drept civil, 216; Dogaru and Drăghici, Drept civil, 373.

28. Im DUTCH law muss die verarmte Person wiederum einen "Schaden" erlitten haben, denn das Bereicherungsrecht gewährt einen Anspruch auf Schadensersatz. Erneut geht es um eine Minderung der Aktiva, um eine Zunahme der Passiva und um die Erbringung von Dienstleistungen. Der Schaden kann in der Aufwendung von Zeit oder Vermögen und in entgangenem Gewinn bestehen. Es soll allerdings ein Mann keinen Schaden erlitten haben, der auf dem Grundstück seiner inzwischen von ihm getrennt lebenden Frau Arbeitsleistungen erbracht hat, wenn nicht feststeht, dass er ohne diese Arbeiten andere Einkünfte erzielt hätte (CA Leeuwarden 27 March 2002, NedJur 2002, no. 575 p. 4270). Verarmt soll dagegen eine Person sein, die ein ihr zustehendes zinsloses Darlehen nicht abruft (HR 26 February 1986, NedJur 1986, no. 776 p. 2945). Siehe zum Begriff des Schadens im Kontext des Bereicherungsrechts ferner Asser (-van der Grinten and Kortmann), De Vertegenwoordiging I[8], no. 139 p. 164; Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 829; Asser (-Hartkamp), Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no 354 p. 370; HR 22 November 2002, NTBR 2003, 223 und HR 11 April 1986, NedJur 1986 no. 622 p. 2313.

29. In ESTONIA ergibt sich der Begriff des Nachteils ganz einfach aus der Umkehrung dessen, was eine Bereicherung konstituiert; das Ausbleiben eines Vermögensvorteils, die Belastung mit einer Schuld oder die Aufwendung von Kosten. Es ist allerdings möglich, tatsächlich aufgewandten Kosten diejenigen gegenüber zu stellen, die ohne den entreichernden Vorgang angefallen wären, und, falls Letztere höher gewesen wären, einen Nachteil zu verneinen (Supreme Court 17 June 2004, decision no. 3-3-1-17-04 in administrative matters).

30. In the NORDIC countries existieren allgemeine Defintionen von Bereicherung und korrespondierendem Nachteil nicht, die Analyse erfolgt jeweils fallgruppenweise (see notes under VII.–4:101 (Instances of attribution)). Im Falle des unerlaubten Gebrauchs fremder Sachen a reasonable compensation for the value of using the asset is assessed. Das Schrifttum spricht aber nicht von ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung, sondern von Wertersatz. Wertersatz sei eine Ausgleichsform "zwischen" Schadenersatz- und Bereicherungshaftung (Karlgren, Obehörig vinst och värdeersättning, 55). Die SWEDISH Rechtsprechung freilich hat die Ausgleichspflicht für die Nutzung fremder Sachen durchaus based on the "principles of unjustified enrichment" (HD 8 February 1993, NJA 1993, 13; HD 2 July 2007, NJA 2007, 519). In diesen Entscheidungen klingt auch die dichotomy of enrichment and disadvantage an, welche VII.–3:101 und 3:102 zugrundeliegt. Darauf, ob der Rechtsinhaber sein Gut tatsächlich nutzen wollte, kommt es in allen Nordic countries nicht an (Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 229; Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 420; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 278; Ussing, Erstatningsret, 174; Roos, JFT 1992, 75, 84). Strittig ist aber geblieben, ob Merkmale wie "Nachteil" oder "auf Kosten" überhaupt eine sinnvolle Funktion ausüben würden; schließlich müsse jede Bereicherung von jemandem stammen (so Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 170; anders Vinding Kruse, Restitutioner, 158).

31. In IRELAND any enrichment must be at the plaintiff's expense (see In re PMPA Insurance Co Ltd [1986] ILRM 524, per Lynch J, where a bank misdirected funds intended for one company to another, which the disadvantaged party could claim under restitution). This has been described as the notion of interceptive subtraction (O'Dell, Annual Review of Irish Law (1997), 611). Where defendants are enriched by the services of a particular plaintiff, who acted under a mistake, that enrichment will be unjust and the defendants obliged to make restitution (Rogers v. Louth County Council [1981] ILRM 144; O'Connor v. Listowel Urban District Council (1957) Ir.Jurist R. 43). A defendant who deliberately breaks a contract because he calculates that a profit will still be made once the damages for breach of contract are subtracted will be guilty of an unjust enrichment (Hickey & Company Ltd v. Roches Stores (Dublin) Ltd (No.1) unreported, 14/7/76 (Finlay P)), see Clark, Contract Law in Ireland[4], 464.

Illustration 2 is taken from Cass.civ. 16 May 2006, JCP 2006, IV, 2277; illustration 3 is from McDonald v. Coys of Kensington [2004] EWCA Civ 42, reported sub nom. Cressman v. Coys of Kensington (Sales) Ltd [2004] 1 WLR 2775; illustration 4 is from CA Amsterdam 24 October 1956, NedJur 1957 no. 368 p. 685; illustration 6 is from HR 25 März 2005, JOL 2005, 180; RvdW 2005, no. 49*;* illustration 9 is inspired by BGH 7 January 1971, BGHZ 55, 128; illustration 12 is from BH 1991/278; similarly BH 1992/584; illustration 14 draws on Seager v Copydex [1967] 1 WLR 923 (CA); illustration 15 is inspired by HR 30 September 2005, RvdW 2005, no. 106 p. 961.

CHAPTER 4: ATTRIBUTION

VII.–4:101: Instances of attribution

An enrichment is attributable to another's disadvantage in particular where:

(a) an asset of that other is transferred to the enriched person by that other;
(b) a service is rendered to or work is done for the enriched person by that other;
(c) the enriched person uses that other's asset, especially where the enriched person infringes the disadvantaged person's rights or legally protected interests;
(d) an asset of the enriched person is improved by that other; or
(e) the enriched person is discharged from a liability by that other.

COMMENTS

A. General

Overview. This Article, together with the following articles of this Chapter, addresses a further element of the claim for reversal of an unjustified enrichment, namely the requirement that the enriched person's enrichment is attributable to the claimant's disadvantage. It determines that in certain (relatively straight-forward) circumstances the required connection between enrichment and disadvantage is established. Broadly speaking, it addresses those cases in which the disadvantaged party has directly conferred the enrichment on the enriched party or where the enriched party has extracted the enrichment directly from the disadvantaged party.

Particular instances of attribution. The particular cases catered for in the Article are identified as instances of attribution of enrichment and disadvantage. They are applications of the general requirement of attribution within specific contexts. In this regard they flesh out in concrete cases what is meant by attribution, thus giving more structure and content to the application of the basic rule. Not least for reasons of efficiency they necessarily concentrate on situations which may be formulated at a relatively high level of abstraction.

Non-exhaustive list. The Article purports to do no more than provide a positive list of some scenarios in which a given enrichment is attributable to a given disadvantage. The notion of "attribution" is not defined, nor is the list provided by the Articles in this Chapter an exhaustive enumeration. The latter emerges from the wording of this Article, which indicates an attribution "in particular" where the enumerated instances apply. It should be evident, however, that in so far as a scenario is addressed by the Articles in this Chapter and attribution is affirmed by them, these rules decide the point. The list is imperative, so far as it goes, and not merely suggestive.

Other scenarios. Accordingly an enrichment may be connected to a disadvantage in a manner which is not set out in this or the following Articles. A case in point is where an asset is transferred from the disadvantaged person to the enriched person not by the act of the disadvantaged person or the enriched person or by the act of a third party, but by an act of nature. There will always be a sufficient element of attribution where enrichment and disadvantage are in mirror image, the claimant's right or enjoyment having become the enriched person's (with no change of form taking place), regardless of how this has been brought about. These Articles therefore allow for a residual set of scenarios which may be worked out on a case by case basis through juristic interpretation. Reasoning by analogy may be a fruitful source for development. However, interpretation must necessarily be constrained by a regard for the sense of the rules in so far as they do address an appreciable range of scenarios. A construction which would make a key ingredient of a particular rule redundant as a requirement for linking one person's enrichment with another person's disadvantage will tend to undermine rather than enhance the coherence of the rules. For this reason where one or more elements of the specific instance are missing the implication must ordinarily be, e contrario, that the enrichment is not to be regarded as attributable to the claimant's disadvantage.

Variety of possible attributions. In applying this Article and the following rules of this Chapter it may be helpful to bear in mind that out of one set of facts – especially if these are involved or if they concern three or more parties – a person may be enriched or disadvantaged in more than one way and that enrichment may be attributable to the disadvantage of one person, though not to the disadvantage of another. The question of attribution, like the question of justification, cannot be examined globally and must be considered from the standpoint of a given pairing. In triangular or chain arrangements of transactions, where A's position in relation to B may depend on A or B's position to C, so that the relation between several or indeed all pairings may have to be considered serially, the complexity of the case is inescapable. This legal complexity is simply a facet of the parties' economic interconnection.

Relation to other Chapters. This Article is concerned solely with the issue of whether or not an enrichment is attributable to a disadvantage. While attribution is an essential element of a claim, its presence does not conclusively determine that the enriched person is liable to reverse the enrichment, even if the enrichment is unjustified, and has nothing to say on the question of quantum of liability.

B. Direct transfer: paragraph (a)

An asset of the disadvantaged person. Paragraph (a) presupposes that the asset which has become vested in the enriched person was the asset of the disadvantaged person. It therefore does not apply where the enriched person's gain is the effect of a transfer by a third party of an asset of the third party unless, looking at the substance of the transaction, the third party is acting only as a cipher who in material terms is merely forwarding on an asset of the disadvantaged person.

> Illustration 1
> Parents E1 and E2 receive payments of child benefit paid by a public body in respect of their grown up son D, but the money is not applied for D's maintenance. D has no claim under this Book that the money received be transferred to him. The enrichment of E1 and E2 is attributable to transfers by the public body, not D.

Meaning of asset. "Asset" has the same meaning as in Chapter 3. For an elaboration, see Comment B on VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) and VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage). Since, however, paragraph (a) presupposes that the asset is transferred, this paragraph is necessarily confined to property and other rights capable of transfer.

Transfer by the disadvantaged person. An asset is transferred for the purposes of paragraph (a) if what has been done by the disadvantaged person has had the effect of vesting the property or other right in the enriched person. In effecting the transfer the disadvantaged person may have used a representative. Their involvement will not frustrate the application of paragraph (a); mere ciphers are to be disregarded.

C. Rendering a service or doing work: paragraph (b)

General; meaning of service and work. Paragraph (b) presents little difficulty of application, once it is appreciated that a service may be rendered even where only one or other of the parties is aware that benefit is being conferred. The composite notion of 'service and work' which applies in Chapter 3 also applies here. For an elaboration, see Comment C on VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) and VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage).

D. Use of another's assets: paragraph (c)

Meaning of asset. "Asset" has the same meaning as in Chapter 3. Since, however, paragraph (c) presupposes that the asset is used, this paragraph is necessarily confined to rights, such as property rights, which are capable of being used. This therefore includes rights of personality which are susceptible to economic exploitation.

Meaning of use. The notion of "use" of an asset is likewise the same as in Chapter 3 and is elucidated in Comment C on VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) and VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage).

Infringements of rights and legally protected interests. The wording of paragraph (c) indicates, in a non-exhaustive manner (signalled by the word "especially"), a typical scenario in which a use of another's assets may occur – namely, where there is an infringement of rights or legally protected interests. This may take the form, for example, of appropriation of property or (partial) usurpation of property rights. The inclusion of 'legally protected interests' addresses the case, for example, where the enriched person has made use of a trade secret or other confidential information, but has not infringed any (intellectual property) right as such. In such cases the circulation of the information may be legally protected – sufficient to make it an asset in the hands of the disadvantaged person – but its exploitation is not necessarily an infringement of a right.

Illustration 2
X has misappropriated a vehicle belonging to A, who is subsequently indemnified by the insurer, I. By operation of law, I acquires title to the vehicle as a result. X sells the vehicle to Y who in turn disposes of it to Z, who purchases in good faith. Under the applicable property law Z acquires ownership of the vehicle. I has a claim under this Book against Y. In effecting a transfer of title to Z, extinguishing I's rights in the vehicle, Y has made use of a right of I: Y is enriched under VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) paragraph (1)(c) and I is correspondingly disadvantaged (VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage) paragraph (1)(a) and (c)), and the enrichment is attributable to the disadvantage under paragraph (c) of this Article.

Illustration 3
Under a contract with bank B, E deposits certain jewels in a safe deposit box. E and D agree that D may make use of E's facility at the bank and accordingly certain jewels belonging to D are also deposited in the safe deposit box. Subsequently the bank is robbed and E's safe deposit box is emptied by the thieves. B, who has no knowledge of the private agreement between D and E, pays compensation to E based on the value of the entire contents of the deposit box, thus compensating E for D's loss as well. E's enrichment is attributable to a disadvantage of D: E has (passively) made use of D's assets in that E has claimed compensation for the loss of property which belonged to D and has thus, for the purposes of this rule, made use of D's title to the jewels.

E. Improvement of another's assets: paragraph (d)

Meaning of asset. "Asset" has the same meaning as in Chapter 3. Since, however, paragraph (d) presupposes that the asset is improved, this paragraph is necessarily confined to rights, such as property rights, which are capable of being enlarged or supplemented.

Asset of the enriched person. In determining whether or how this paragraph applies, it will be important to determine to whom the asset belongs at the time it is improved. It is the owner of the asset who will be enriched, not subsequent acquirers of the asset (albeit that the owner's unjustified enrichment liability may devolve under other rules on successors in title to the asset).

Illustration 4
An elderly lady, A, living on the terms of a right of habitation in a house belonging to her sister, B, invests considerable sums in the improvement of the property. B subsequently sells the house at undervalue to her son, S. A has no claim under this Book against S based on the investment in the property. A improved an asset of B, not an asset of S.

F. Discharge of another's liability: paragraph (e)

Meaning of liability. "Liability" has the same meaning as in Chapter 3. For an elaboration, see Comment B on VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) and VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage). Discharge of the liability need not be due at the time the enrichment is conferred. A debt which is repayable only on demand is nonetheless a liability extinguished even if no demand for payment has yet been made by the creditor.

Illustration 5
D pays a cash deposit into E's bank account at the X bank. E's account was overdrawn and the deposit has reduced the overdraft. D's disadvantage in the decrease in assets (loss of money) is attributable to E's enrichment in the decrease in liabilities (reduction of overdraft) because D has discharged a liability of E (E's liability to the X bank in respect of the overdraft).

NOTES

I. Transfer of assets

1. The European legal systems in the main identify the necessary nexus between the enrichment and a corresponding disadvantage by means of groups of cases. The obligation to restitute an unjustified patrimonial acquisition arises under FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBURGIAN CC art. 1235(1) primarily from the law on paiement de l'indu, where, however, the notion of "payment" is to be understood in the sense of a transfer of an asset. The voluntary fulfilment of a (legally unenforceable) moral obligation, however, excludes the right to restitution (CC art.

1235(2)). The reversal of performances rendered under a contract which has been avoided or is otherwise void is effected by the relevant regime governing the invalidity (Bénabent, Les obligations[10], no. 488). SPAIN operates with a very elaborate system of condictiones, which include the so-called condictio de prestación (explored in detail in Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 103; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 124; Miquel González, Enriquecimiento injustificado, 2807; López/Montés/Roca [-Capilla Roncero], Derecho de Obligaciones y Contratos, 293). In the context of unjustified enrichment law the concept of prestación signifies a desplazamiento patrimonial, i.e. an application of patrimony for the purpose of performing a (supposed) obligation (Díez-Picazo loc. cit. 124). The Supreme Court has expressly approved this notion of prestation (TS 8 January 2007, RAJ 2007 (1) no. 812 p. 2146 [FJ 7]). The condictio de prestación comprises (i) the condictio indebiti (reversal of performances rendered by mistake, but solvendi causa: CC arts. 1895-1901; see TS 14 June 2007, BDA RJ 2007/5120 [FJ 2] and TS 22 February 2007, RAJ 2007 (2) no. 2233 p. 5283 [FJ 4], both of which underline the proposition that condictio indebiti belongs to the condictio de prestación); (ii) claims for restitution arising from void or avoided contracts (CC arts. 1303-1308; as to its systematic classification as part of the condictio de prestación see TS 23 February 2007, RAJ 2007 (1) no. 1475 p. 3172 [FJ 2]); (iii) restitutionary claims arising from termination of contract (CC arts. 1123 and 1122 [rules on restitution triggered by a resolutive condition; extended to restitution on termination for breach of contract]); and (iv) restitutionary claims arising from rescission of the contract (CC art. 1295).

2. ITALY regulates the law on condictio indebiti in CC arts. 2033 ff. It distinguishes between payment of a debt which objectively is not due (CC art. 2033) and the payment of a debt which is subjectively not due (CC art. 2036). CC art. 2037 governs the duty to pay value in lieu in the event that the thing required to be returned has been destroyed or has deteriorated; CC art. 2038 deals with the cases of disposition oft he thing acquired without a legal basis. The concept of 'payment' (pagamento) in CC art. 2033 has the meaning of 'prestation'. This wide meaning of the term is underpinned by the formulation of CC arts. 1188-1190 and also by CC arts. 2034 and 2035. The latter refer explicitly to prestazione.

3. The law of unjustified enrichment in PORTUGUESE CC arts. 473 ff focuses on the reversal of performances rendered: see CC art. 473(2). These include the condictio indebiti, the condictio ob causam finitam and the condictio causa data causa non secuta (or condictio ob rem). CC arts. 476-478 provided for detailed regulation; the condictio indebiti is regarded as the core of the law of unjustified enrichment. CC arts. 475, 476, 477, 478 and 480 expressly require a prestação; the notion of a pagamento is no longer to be found. It is only CC arts. 473(1), 474, 479 and 482 (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 441, fn. 1317) which are not confined to the law on reversal of performances rendered.

4. Under GERMAN law wird die Übertragung eines vermögenswerten Gutes mit der sogen. Leistungskondiktion rückabgewickelt. Sie umfasst die condictio indebiti (CC § 812(1) first sentence, first alternative), die condictio ob causam finitam (CC § 812(1) second sentence, first alternative), die condictio ob rem (CC § 812(1) second sentence, second alternative), die condictio ob turpem vel iniustam causam (CC § 817 first sentence) sowie Leistungen auf einredebehaftete Forderungen (CC § 813(1)). Eine Leistung ist jede bewusste und zweckgerichtete Mehrung fremden Vermögens (BGH 23 October 2003, NJW 2004, 1169; BGH 24 February 1972, BGHZ 58, 184, 188; BGH 31 October 1963, BGHZ 40, 272, 277). Der Leistungsbegriff legt die Parteien des Kondiktionsverhältnisses fest. Denn nach ihm bestimmt sich, wer als Leistender und wer als Leistungsempfänger anzusehen ist. Es kommt nicht darauf an, wer wem in tatsächlicher Hinsicht etwas zugewendet hat.

5. The HUNGARIAN law of unjustified enrichment does not differentiate between restitution of performances rendered and restitution in other cases. Many of the questions which in the context of these rules are resolved as issues of attribution of an enrichment to a disadvantage do not fall within the scope of application of the law of unjustified enrichment in Hungary because they are subject to special regimes which displace the subsidiary unjustified enrichment law. Soweit es einschlägig ist, a causal connection is required between the relevant patrimonial benefit and the disadvantage. The statute is formulated in terms of a requirement that the enrichment be "at the expense of" the disadvantaged person. That element is lacking if the benefit and disadvantage ocurr independently of one another. A merely indirect causal connection may nonetheless suffice (Petrik [-Bíró], Polgári jog II[2], 651), but this is not a well-defined criterion for demarcation. In BH 1991/278 the claimant procured the construction of a sewage canal at his own expense and for his own purposes, which by virtue of statutory provisions became state property. Der Beklagte hatte später aufgrund behördlicher Genehmigung einen Anschluss an diesen Kanal gelegt. Der bereicherungsrechtliche Ausgleichsanspruch des Klägers wurde mit der Begründung abgelehnt, der Beklagte habe sich nicht auf seine Kosten bereichert (ähnlich auch BH 1992/584, nur ging es hier um eine elektrische Leitung). Für das Recht der Rückabwicklung eines transfer of an asset stehen im Übrigen folgende Anspruchsgrundlagen zur Verfügung: (i) die Vindikation, falls die Sache noch vorhanden und der Vertrag nichtig ist, (ii) in allen übrigen Fällen das Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung, sofern nicht ein Sonderregime mit Anwendungsvorrang eingreift (wie z.B. die Regeln über die Rückabwicklung ungültiger (CC § 237) und aufgehobener bzw. aufgelöster Verträge (CC §§ 319-321). Irrtümliche Zahlungen unterliegen dem Bereicherungsrecht.

6. Im DUTCH law kann die Rückgängigmachung eines transfer of assets gleichfalls auf verschiedene Anspruchsgrundlagen gestützt werden: das Recht der ungeschuldeten Leistung (CC arts. 6:203-211), die Vindikation (CC art. 5:2) und das Bereicherungsrecht (CC art. 6:212), letzteres insbesondere dann, wenn der Benachteiligte sein Eigentum aufgrund gesetzlicher Vorschriften verloren hat. CC art. 6:203(1) bestimmt ausdrücklich, dass derjenige, der einem anderen ohne Rechtsgrund 'ein Gut' gegeben hat, berechtigt ist, dies von dem Empfänger als ungeschuldet geleistet zurückzuverlangen; die Formulierung geht auf ältere Rechtsprechung des Supreme Court zurück (HR 13 April 1962, NedJur 1964 no. 366 p. 832; HR 23 November 1984, NedJur 1985 no. 816 p. 2665; see Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 315 p. 336). Die Rückgabepflicht umfasst sowohl die Rückübertragung von Eigentum als auch die physische Rückgabe einer Sache, ferner bestimmte Nebenpflichten (wie die Korrektur einer Registereintragung oder die Benachrichtigung des Schuldners bei nichtiger Zession). Entgangene Nutzung kann mit der Bereicherungsklage (CC art. 6:212) geltend gemacht werden, sofern mit ihr eine entsprechende Bereicherung des Beklagten korrespondiert. Wann immer die Rückgängigmachung einer ungeschuldet erbrachten Leistung unmöglich ist, bestimmt sich der Ausgleichanspruch nach der Höhe der Bereicherung des Beklagten (Hartkamp loc. cit. no. 317 p. 337, no. 334 p. 351, no. 344 p. 358; Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 803). Im Falle der Vertragsanfechtung ensteht die Restitutionsverpflichtung wegen CC art. 3:53(1) bereits ab dem Zeitpunkt der Leistung. Hat der Schuldner den Grund der Anfechtung nicht zu vertreten, schuldet er keinen Ausgleich über den Betrag hinaus, der ihm als Bereicherung verbleibt (CC arts. 6:204 und 205 i.V.m. arts. 6:74 und 6:78); andernfalls haftet er auf Schadenersatz (CC art. 6:205; näher Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 811-813; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 351 pp. 371-372 and III[12], no. 334, pp. 351-352).

7. In the NORDIC countries it has been discussed that certain situations require the establishment of a connection between enrichment and disadvantage (Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 163; Vinding Kruse, Restitutioner, 159). Claims arising from the unwinding of void or avoided contracts, from termination and re vindicatio werden freilich gerade nicht als bereicherungsrechtliche Ansprüche verstanden, was wiederum bedeutet, dass sich auch keine Fallgruppe "transfer of assets" herausgebildet hat. Die genannten Ansprüche sind in erster Linie auf Herausgabe in natura und sekundär auf Schadenersatz gerichtet (Karlgren, Obehörig vinst och värdeersättning, 29; Grönfors and Dotevall, Avtalslagen[3], 177; Hov, Kontraktsret I, 186; see Swedish HD 9 February 2004, NJA 2004, 52). However, enrichment considerations may indirectly arise, in the form of compensation to the claimant for the use and the fruits of the object in question as well as in the context of compensation to other persons for money invested in the object. Außerdem weisen die von der condictio indebiti erfassten Fälle eine Nähe zu VII.–4:101(a) auf. Condictio indebiti does not, however, involve a particular requirement of attribution of an enrichment to a specific disadvantage; what is required is that the payment was intended to discharge a debt. Another instance bearing an affinity to the transfer of assets are cases concerning the onward bank transfers for one person to another person, although where the bank actually covers the transfer it may instead be categorized as payment of another's debt (see VII.–4:101(e)). Die zuletzt genannten Fälle sind mehrfach Gegenstand schwedischer Entscheidungen gewesen (e.g. HD 30 March 1994, NJA 1994, 177; HD 17 September 1999, NJA 1999, 575; HD 30 December 1999, NJA 1999, 793). Sie haben sich auf das Schuldverhältnis zwischen dem Anweisenden und dem Anweisungsempfänger konzentriert und entschieden, dass es an einer ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung fehlte, weil die Überweisung durch die Banken die Schuld des Anweisungsempfängers gegenüber dem Angewiesenen zum Erlöschen gebracht habe.

II. Besonderheiten bei der Erbringung von Dienstleistungen

8. Die Rückabwicklung rechtsgrundlos erbrachter Dienstleistungen unterliegt nicht selten einem anderen Regime als die Rückforderung rechtsgrundlos hingegebener Sachen. In FRANCE and BELGIUM wird insoweit hauptsächlich das Recht der enrichissement sans cause angewandt, see notes under VII.–2:101 and 3:102. Dienst- und Arbeitsleistung begründen ebenso wie die Benutzung des Gutes eines anderen und die Begleichung seiner Schulden eine Bereicherung in der Form der Ersparnis von Aufwendnungen bzw. Kosten (siehe z.B. zur Arbeitsleistung einer Ehefrau Cass.civ. 26 October 1982, Bull.civ. 1982, I, no. 302 und zur Arbeitsleistung einer Lebensgefährtin Cass.civ. 19 May 1969, Bull.civ. 1969, I, no. 187). Die Höhe des Ausgleichs liegt im Ermessen des Tatrichters (Cass.civ. 19 May 1969 loc.cit.)

9. SPANISH CC arts. 1303-1308 (Rückabwicklung im Falle nichtiger oder angefochtener Verträge) äußern sich nicht zur Rückabwicklung von Verträgen, die auf ein facere (Dienst- und Arbeitsleistungen) bzw. auf ein non facere (Unterlassen, sogen. negative obligations) gerichtet sind. Daraus darf nach herrschender Aufassung aber nicht darauf geschlossen werden, dass Dienstleistungen ersatzlos dem Empfänger verbleiben. Vielmehr sei CC art. 1307 (restitution im Falle des Verlustes der unter dem nichtigen Vertrag hingebenen Sache) mit der Folge analog anzuwenden, dass die Dienstleistung ihrem Wert nach vergütet werden müsse (Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán, Las nulidades de los contratos, 256-257; Díez-Picazo, La liquidación de las nulidades contractuales, § 3; id., Fundamentos I[6], 580; López Beltrán, La nulidad, 65). So sehen es auch TS 17 May 1973, RAJ 1973 (1) no. 2338 p. 1867 and CA

Ciudad Real 30 March 2004, BDA JUR 2004/128779. TS 8 January 2007, RAJ 2007 (1) no. 812 p. 2146 wendet dagegen die condictio de prestación in einem Fall an, in welchem sich eine Familie auf der Basis eines nichtigen Vertrages um einen Nachbarn gekümmert hatte. Er hatte ihr im Gegenzug versprochen, die Familie in seinem Testament zu bedenken, und ihr sogar Vollmacht über das Grundstück gegeben, welche die Familie aber zu ihren eigenen Gunsten missbrauchte. Schwierigkeiten bereitet die Bestimmung des Wertes einer Dienstleistung. Hierzu wird teils auf den von den Parteien ausgehandelten Betrag und teils auf den objektiven Wert der erbrachten Tätigkeit abgestellt (näher Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 218-219; Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 256; López Beltrán loc.cit. 65). As far as labour contracts are concerned, Workers' Statute (Estatuto de los Trabajadores, Real Decreto Legislativo 1/1995 of 24 March 1995) art. 9.2 provides that "if the labour contract is void, the employee is entitled to claim the remuneration for the work done as if the contract were valid". This rule, which has to be supplement with CC arts. 1303 ff (TS [Labour Chamber] 5 October 1994, RAJ 1994 (4) no. 7748 p. 10126), finds its rationale in the doctrine of unjustified enrichment (Concheiro del Río, El enriquecimiento injusto en el Derecho laboral, 85, 259; TS [Administrative Chamber] 28 May 1991, RAJ 1994 (4) no. 4215 p. 5791; TSJ La Rioja 16 March 2004, BDA AS 2004/1295; TSJ Comunitat Valenciana 29 November 2001, BDA JUR 2002/267328).

10. In ITALY ist nach wie vor umstritten, ob sich die Regeln über die Zahlung einer objektiven Nichtschuld nur auf Leistungen beziehen, die in einem 'Geben' bestehen, oder auch auf facere- Leistungen. Soweit Letzteres verneint wird, wendet man das allgemeine Bereicherungsrecht an (CC art. 2041). Das ist der Standpunkt z.B. von Cass.sez.lav. 19 August 1992, no. 9675, Foro it. 1993, I, 428 und von Cass. 8 November 2005, no. 21647, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, 11). Die Gegenposition (das Recht der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld umfasse auch Dienstleistungen) wird dagegen z.B. vertreten von Cass. 2 April 1982, no. 2029, Giust.civ.Mass. 1982, fasc. 4 und von Cass. 23 May 1987, no. 4681, Giust.civ.Mass. 1987, fasc. 5).

11. Die Subsidiaritätsregel in PORTUGUESE CC art. 474 blockiert die Anwendbarkeit des Bereicherungsrechts in allen Fällen, in welchen es das Gesetz dem Benachteiligten ermöglicht, auf andere Weise Ersatz zu erlangen. Wichtig ist das vor allem für die Rückabwicklung nichtiger bzw. unwirksamer Rechtsgeschäfte (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 444; Almeida Costa, Obrigações[11], 503). Sie unterliegt CC arts. 285-294. Unter CC art. 289(1) treten Nichtigkeit bzw. Unwirksamkeit mit der Folge ex tunc ein, dass alles Geleistete zurückzuerstatten ist, und zwar entweder in Natur oder, wenn das nicht möglich ist, dem Wert nach. Unter die zweite Alternative fällt auch die Rückabwicklung unwirksamer Dienstleistungsverträge. Innerhalb des Bereicherungsrechts käme man mit CC art. 479(1) allerdings zu demselben Ergebnis (Wertersatz, see Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 511-512). Dienstleistungsverträge in diesem Sinn sind auch der Auftrag, die Verwahrung und der Werkvertrag (CC art. 1155), nicht jedoch der Arbeitsvertrag (CC art. 1152). Bei ihm kommt eine Abwicklung nur ex nunc in Betracht. Under Labour Code art. 115(1) a labour contract which is declared void or annulled produces the same effects as if it were valid during the time in which it was performed by the parties, see Martinez, Código do Trabalho anotado[4], note 3 under art. 115, p. 255; STJ 22 March 2007, Processo 07S364).

12. Die bereicherungsrechtliche Rückabwicklung rechtsgrundlos erbrachter Dienstleistungen unterliegt in GERMANY den allgemeinen Vorschriften zur Leistungskondiktion. Die ältere Lehre, wonach die Bereicherung bei Dienstleistungen nur in der Ersparnis von Aufwendungen liegen könne, ist inzwischen der Auffassung gewichen, dass die Bereicherung unmittelbar in der Dienstleistung liege und die Frage, ob Aufwendungen erspart worden sind, erst im Kontext der Prüfung eines Wegfalls der Bereicherung (CC § 818(3)) aufzuwerfen ist. Für diese Ansicht spricht nicht nur die Systematik des Gesetzes, sondern auch die Regelung der CC §§ 819(1), 818(4), wonach der Bösgläubige unabhängig von der Ersparnis von Aufwendungen haftet (näher Staudinger [-S. Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 812, no. 72; MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 812, no. 357; Erman [-Westermann and Buck-Heeb], BGB II[12], § 812, no. 9).

13. In HUNGARY unterliegt die Rückabwicklung ungültiger Verträge einem vertragsrechtlichen Sonderregime. Für Vertragsbeziehungen, in welchen sich (wie bei Dienstleistungsverträgen) der frühere Zustand nicht wiederherstellen lässt, ist in CC § 237(2) first sentence vorgesehen, dass das Gericht den Vertrag für die zurückliegende Zeit für wirksam erklärt und über die Erstattung gegenleistungslos erbrachter Leistungen entscheidet (näher Gellért [-Harmathy], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 881-895; Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog II[2], 406/6-414; Kemenes, Polgári Jogi Kodifikáció 2/2002, 7). Soweit sich die Regelungen des Vertragsrechts (z.B. im Hinblick auf den Ersatz von Verwendungen) als lückenhaft erweisen, können ergänzend die Vorschriften des Bereicherungsrechts und diejenigen zum rechtsgrundlosen Besitz herangezogen werden (Vékás, Magyar Jog 2003, 385, 387; Kemenes, Gazdaság és Jog 10/2001, 18, 19; Kemenes, Polgári Jogi Kodifikáció 2002, 7, 19; Pomeisl, Gazdaság és Jog 11/2004, 3, 5-7). Von den ungültigen sind die nicht existierenden Verträge zu unterscheiden; bei Letzteren erfolgt die Rückabwicklung erbrachter Leistungen über das Bereicherungsrecht (Petrik loc. cit. 409; Kisfaludi, Az adásvételi szerződés[2], 127). Die Rechtsprechung hat sich mit einer Vielzahl solcher Fälle insbesondere im Kontext von Arbeitsleistungen auseinandergesetzt und die Anwendbarkeit des allgemeinen Bereicherungsrechts bestätigt (BH 1979/161, BH 1981/512, BH 1983/208, BH 1987/452, BH 1990/30, BH 1992/188, BH 1996/163, BH 1998/39, BH 2001/168, BH 2002/29). Den Anspruchsumfang bestimmt das Gericht nach Ermessen unter Berücksichtigung der aktuellen Marktlage, bei Werkverträgen oft nach Einschaltung eines Sachverständigen (näher BH 1987/452). In die Berechnung fließt ein, ob das Werk fehlerhaft oder fehlerfrei war; ein Unternehmergewinn wird dagegen nur sehr geringfügig eingerechnet. Überhaupt nicht ausgeglichen wird die reine Arbeitsleistung, sofern sie weder zu einer Werterhöhung noch zu einem anderen Nutzen für den Beklagten geführt hat (BH 1997/400, BH 1983/291).

14. BULGARIAN LOA art. 55(1) differenziert nicht zwischen den verschiedenen Arten rechtsgrundloser Leistungen, sondern zwischen den verschiedenen Unwirksamkeitsgründen. POLISH CC art. 405 sagt, dass überall dort, wo die Herausgabe des Erlangten in Natur unmöglich ist, sein Wert ersetzt werden muss. Das betrifft auch Dienstleistungen. Ihr Wert ist objektiv, d. h. nach ihrem Marktpreis zu bestimmen (Ohanowicz, Niesłuszne wzbogacenie, 365; Serda, Nienależne świadczenie, 214; Łętowska, Bezpodstawne, 136). Bei mangelhaften Dienstleistungen wird wohl darauf abgestellt, ob sie trotz ihrer Mangelhaftigkeit zu einer Ersparnis von Aufwendungen bzw. zu einer objektiven Mehrung des Vermögens des Empfängers geführt haben (Serda loc.cit. 215; anders aber Łętowska loc.cit. 137).

15. DUTCH CC art. 6:203(3) sagt, dass auch derjenige, der ohne Rechtsgrund eine Leistung anderer Art (als durch die Hingabe von Geld oder eines Gutes) erbracht hat, gegen den Empfänger einen Anspruch auf Rückgewähr hat. Mit ‘Leistungen anderer Art’ sind in erster Linie Dienstleistungen gemeint. CC art. 210(1) erstreckt die Anwendbarkeit der CC arts. 6:204-209 (Vorschriften über Gut- und Bösgläubigkeit sowie zur Geschäftsunfähigkeit im Falle der Hingabe von Geld und Gütern) erneut auf "andere Leistungen“. Auf Dienstleistungen anwendbar ist auch das Bereicherungsrecht (CC art. 6:212). Der Anspruch aus CC art. 6:203 kann für den Leistenden aber günstiger sein, z.B. im Falle des Transports eines "blinden Passagiers", wo der Bereicherungsanspruch am Fehlen eines Schadens des Beförderers scheitern kann (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 804; zu weiteren Einzelheiten siehe Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], nos. 320-321 pp. 339-341).

16. In ESTONIA services rendered without a contract may in certain circumstances be regarded as negotiorum gestio. Where that is the case, unjust enrichment provisions do not apply; such services are not rendered without a legal basis. In all other cases rendering a service is considered as a performance (sooritus); consequently LOA §§ 1028-1036 (unjustified enrichment law) apply. LOA § 1032(2) ordnet an, dass wann immer die Rückgabe einer Leistung in Natur unmöglich ist, der Empfänger ihren gewöhnlichen Wert in dem Zeitpunkt zu erstatten hat, in welchem der Rückforderungsanspruch anetstanden ist. Under GPCCA § 65, the usual value of an object is deemed to be the value of the object unless otherwise prescribed by law or a transaction. The usual value of an object is its average local selling price (market price).

17. In the NORDIC countries, a person who without contract renders a service to or carries out work for another does not enjoy protection under damages liability, unless the rendering of the service is the result of duress or coercion etc. directed at the performing person. Deshalb werden andere Ausgleichsmechanismen gesucht. Sofern es auch nicht möglich ist, einen stillschweigenden Vertragsschluss zu bejahen, wird ein Anspruch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung erwogen (Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 310 with references). Der Anwendungsbereich des Bereicherungsrechts in Situationen, die sich auch nicht als negotiorium gestio begreifen lassen, wird jedoch für äußerst schmal angesehen (Hellner loc cit. 361). Die Wirkungen der Nichtigkeit bzw. der Anfechtung treten bei in Vollzug gesetzten Dienstleistungsverträgen im Übrigen in aller Regel nur ex nunc ein, was wiederum bedeutet, dass in solchen Fällen no restitutionary compensation is recognized (Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(2)[4], 56; Karlgren, Obehörig vinst och värdeersättning, 91; Jørgensen, Kontraktsret II, 128).

III. Nutzung fremder Sachen und Rechte

18. Die unerlaubte Nutzung fremder Sachen und Rechte (unter Einschluss der Verfügung über sie) führt zwar in allen Rechtsordnungen zu Ausgleichsverpflichtungen, doch können diese ihren Grund in durchaus unterschiedlichen Haftungsregimen haben. Für FRANCE ist entschieden worden, dass Personen, die unerlaubt eine fremde Wohnung oder ein fremdes Haus 'besetzen', dem Eigentümer nach den Regeln der enrichissement sans cause in Höhe des objektiven Mietwerts auf eine indemnité d'occupation haften (Cass.com. 19 May 1985, Bull.civ. 1985, IV, no. 141 p. 122). Die unerlaubte Nutzung einer fremden Sache oder eines fremden Rechts stellt eine Bereicherung in der Form der Ersparnis von Kosten dar (Bénabent, Les obligations[10], no. 488; de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge III(2)[3], no. 37). Allerdings ist stets das principe de subsidiarité zu beachten, wonach eine action de in rem verso nur erhoben werden kann, wenn dem Kläger keine andere Anspruchsgrundlage zur Verfügung steht (Cass.com. 10 October 2000, Bull.civ. 2000, IV, no. 150 p. 136). Solche speziellen Anspruchsgrundlagen finden sich insbesondere im Recht des gewerblichen und geistigen Eigentums mit seinen Instrumenten zur Abschöpfung rechtswidrig gezogener Gewinne (näher – und auch zum Verhältnis zum allgemeinen Deliktsrecht – Tafforeau, Droit de la propriété intelectuelle, no. 353 sowie für BELGIUM Puttemans, Droits intellectuels et concurrence déloyale, 294). Fälle der unerlaubten Werbung mit dem Bild oder dem Namen eines anderen können sich als Verstoß gegen das Recht auf Schutz des Privatlebens unter French CC art. 9 darstellen. Die Feststellung einer Verletzung dieses Rechts genügt schon per se zur Begründung eines Entschädigungsanspruchs (Cass.civ. 5 November 1996, Bull.civ. 1996, I, no. 378). So liegt es auch unter LUXEMBURGIAN Gesetz of 11 August 1982 (loi concernant la protection de la vie privée) art. 1, mit dem French CC art. 9 in das luxemburgische Recht übernommen wurde.

19. Under the so-called condictio por intromisión en derecho ajeno, SPANISH law conceives several unjustified enrichment claims arising out of interference with another's asset. This condictio is well established; it is of a non-subsidiary nature and clearly distinguishable from a claim based on tort law, see TS 12 April 1955, RAJ 1955 (1) no. 1126 p. 602 (which acknowledged a condictio for exploitation of another´s mine); TS 28 January 1956, RAJ 1956 (1) no. 669 p. 418 (appropriation of another's bank account; application of the doctrine of unjustified enrichment) and TS 10 March 1958, RAJ 1958 (1) no. 1068 p. 686 (condictio arising out of disposition of another´s asset). Modern legal doctrine (in particular Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 116-117 and Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 262-267, 292-300) distinguishes between a condictio based on incorporation, disposition or consumption of another's assets (CC arts. 360, 375, 379(2), 383(1)) and a condictio based on unlawful use of another's assets (CC arts. 451 and 455). The latter has played an important role ever since TS 10 March 1958 loc.cit. (which decided that the condictio arises from the mere fact of an unlawful increase of assets; the defendant's good faith is not a defence). It is based on the general principle of unjustified enrichment and obliges the person who disposed of another's thing to reverse the enrichment to its former owner. The defendant has to reverse the price which he received; the latter is seen as an indicator of the objective value of the sold asset (TS 5 May 1964, RAJ 1964 (1) no. 2208 p. 1380). Die an sich klare Unterscheidung zwischen Bereicherungs- und Deliktsrecht ist freilich in späteren Entscheidungen nicht immer präzise durchgehalten worden, weil Schadenersatz und Bereicherungsausgleich (Herausgabe des erzielten Preises) entweder zu einem einzigen Anspruch vermengt (TS 3 July 1981, RAJ 1981 (2) no. 3043 p. 2501) oder weil der deliktische Schadenersatz auch auf die Herausgabe des Erlangten erstreckt wurde (e.g. in TS 8 May 1998, RAJ 1998 (2) no. 3709 p. 5352). Im allgemeinen ist die bereicherungsrechtliche Natur der condictio based on use of another's asset aber auch in der Rechtsprechung anerkannt, see e.g. TS 24 January 1975, RAJ 1975 (1) no. 95 p. 99 (Ausbeutung einer Mine nach Ablauf der Pachtzeit) und CA Barcelona 26 November 2004, BDA JUR 2005/15139 (Nutzung von Computern nach Vertragsrücktritt des anderen Teils wegen Nichtzahlung der Leasingraten; condictio por intromisión). Zahlreiche Sondergesetze bringen Regeln zur Haftung bei der Verletzung gewerblicher Schutzrechte und Urheberrechte. Sie werden durchweg im Sinne der Lehre von der dreifachen Schadensberechnung, der método triple de cómputo del daño interpretiert (näher Basozabal Arrue, ADC 1997, 1287; Fernández-Nóvoa, El enriquecimiento injustificado en el Derecho industrial, 9; Portellano Díez, La defensa del derecho de patente, 55). Nach ihr kann der Rechtsinhaber alternativ auf Ersatz entgangenen Gewinns, auf Herausgabe des Verletzergewinns oder auf Zahlung der entgangenen Lizenzgebühr klagen. Allerdings findet sich in Unfair Competition Act (LCD) art. 18(6) ein klar von der deliktischen Schadenersatzhaftung (LCD art. 18(5)) abgegrenzter Tatbestand der bereicherungsrechtlichen condictio por intromisión. Es wird deshalb vertreten, dass es auch in den beiden zuletzt genannten Alternativen der sogen. dreifachen Schadensberechnung in Wahrheit um Bereicherungsansprüche gehe, die sich unmittelbar auf LCD art. 18(6) stützen ließen und folglich kein Verschulden voraussetzen würden (Fernández-Nóvoa loc.cit. 14 and 17-31; Portellano Díez loc.cit. 76-80; anders aber wohl CFI Alicante 14 July 2006, La Ley 2006 [4] 424 [der Anspruch auf die entgangene Lizenzgebühr sei ein deliktischer Anspruch, obwohl er der Logik des Bereicherungsrechts folge] und CA Barcelona 31 May 2007, BDA JUR 2007/294389). Der Anspruch aus LCD art. 18(6) setzt die Verletzung eines absoluten Rechts (nach CA Barcelona 24 February 2005, BDA JUR 2007/38863 trotz der insoweit vorhandenen Spezialgesetzgebung auch eines Urheberrechts) oder einer vergleichbaren Rechtsposition voraus; ein Beispiel für die Letztere liefert eine exclusive staatliche Lizenz zum Betrieb eines regulären Busservices auf einer bestimmten Strecke (TS 29 December 2006, RAJ 2007 (2) no. 1714 p. 3897). Im Schrifttum wird inzwischen zunehmend anerkannt, dass mit der condictio por intromisión auch Eingriffe in andere unkörperliche Persönlichkeitsrechte erfasst werden können, sofern ihnen ein contenido de atribución (ein Zuweisungsgehalt im Sinne der deutschen Rechtslehre) innewohnt (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 126). Das wiederum wird für das Recht am eigenen Bild bejaht, für das Recht auf Schutz der Privatsphäre diskutiert und für den Ehrenschutz verneint (Pantaleón, La Ley 1996 [2] 1689, 1694; Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 170-178). Gesetz 1/1982 über den Schutz der Ehre, der Privatsphäre und das Recht am eigenen Bild art. 9(3) sieht außerdem vor, dass bei der Berechnung des deliktischen Schadenersatzanspruches wegen der Verletzung eines der von diesem Gesetz geschützten Rechte ein evtl. Verletzergewinn berücksichtigt werden soll; es handelt sich hierbei um eine Sonderform der Berechnung des immateriellen Schadenersatzes (Basozabal Arrue loc.cit. 173). In der Rechtsprechung wird der Schadenersatz wegen der Verletzung des Rechts am eigenen Bilde allerdings zumeist auf der Basis der entgangenen Lizenzgebühr berechnet (z.B. CA Bizkaia 28 November 2000, BDA JUR 2001/254481 and CA Madrid 30 March 2006, AC 2006 [2] no. 811 p. 201).

20. Die unbefugte Nutzung einer fremden Sache stellt, sofern die Handlung vorsätzlich oder fahrlässig erfolgt, natürlich auch in ITALY ein Delikt dar. Das Bereicherungsrecht wird relevant, wenn es entweder an einem Verschulden oder an einem Vermögensschaden fehlt (Breccia, Il pagamento dell'indebito, 1005; Trimarchi, L'arricchimento senza causa, 48; Cass. 23 December 1993, no. 12737, Giust.civ.Mass. 1993, fasc. 12 [rechtswidrige Nutzung einer fremden Immobilie]). Die bereicherungsrechtliche Haftung ist aber natürlich im Gegensatz zur Deliktshaftung auf die Höhe der erlangten Bereicherung begrenzt (CC art. 2041). Sie ist den Regeln des Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnisses (CC arts. 1148 ff) subsidiär (CC art. 2042). Die Rechtsfolgen der Verletzung von gewerblichen Schutzrechten sind vor allem in Gesetzbuch über das Gewerbliche Eigentum (CPI i.d.F. von 2006) art. 125(1) geregelt, der es erlaubt, auch den Verletzergewinn in die Schadensberechnung einzubeziehen. Der Schadenersatz für den entgangenen Gewinn umfasst der Höhe nach mindestens den Betrag der entgangenen Lizenzgebühr (loc. cit. art. 125(2)).

21. Ähnlich wie Spain kennt auch PORTUGAL das Konzept der Eingriffsbereicherung. Sie betrifft die Rückabwicklung von Vermögensvorteilen, die durch einen Eingriff in fremde Rechtsgüter erlangt wurden, insbesondere durch Nutzung, Fruchtziehung, Verbrauch oder Verfügung über sie (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 663). Die Eingriffskondiktion unterliegt wie alles Bereicherungsrecht der Subsidiaritätsregel in CC art. 474 und kommt deshalb vor allem dann zur Anwendung, wenn es an einer der Voraussetzungen der deliktischen Haftung für die Verletzung fremder Rechte fehlt (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 502). So sieht es auch der Supreme Court, der sich freilich gegen eine abweichende Rechtsprechung der Instanzgerichte hat durchsetzen müssen (z.B. STJ 24 February 2005, Processo 04B4601 [Gewährung eines Bereicherungsanspruchs wegen Markenrechtsverletzung]). Ein Bereicherungsanspruch wird bei unbefugter Nutzung fremder Sachen vor allem dann bejaht, wenn zwar eine Bereicherung auf Kosten des Eigentümers vorliegt, dieser aber keinen Schaden erleidet (Pereira Coelho, O Enriquecimento e o dano, 14). So kann es z.B. bei der widerrechtlichen Besetzung einer fremden Wohnung liegen; der Anspruch auf Ausgleich des enriquecimento por intervenção folgt aus der Grundnorm des CC art. 473 (STJ 29 April 1992, RLJ 125 [1992-1993] 86; STJ 23 March 1999, BolMinJus 485 [1999] 396; STJ 6 December 2006, CJ [ST] XIV [2006-3] 154). Wird eine Klage nur auf Deliktsrecht gestützt, liegen dessen Voraussetzungen aber nicht vor, kann das Gericht von Amts wegen Bereicherungsrecht anwenden und der Klage auf dieser Grundlage stattgeben (STJ 6 December 2006 loc.cit). Eine Haftung für den Eingriff in fremde Rechte kommt aber auch nach CC art. 472 (unechte Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag, gestão imprópria de negócios) in Betracht. Der Rechtsinhaber kann die Handlung genehmigen und auf diese Weise den Anspruch auf Herausgabe des Erlangten aus CC art. 465 aktivieren (Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 232). Ohne eine Genehmigung verbleibt es bei der Anwendung des Bereicherungs- (CC art. 472(1)) bzw. (im Falle der Feststellung eines Verschuldens) des Deliktsrechts (CC art. 472(2)). Bei der Verfügung über fremde Sachen kommt es nur selten zu einer Bereicherunsghaftung. Denn der nicht legitimierte Verkauf einer fremden Sache ist grundsätzlich nichtig (CC art. 892) und bewirkt deshalb keinen Eigentumsübergang (CA Coimbra 8 March 1994, BolMinJus 435 [1994] 918). Das ist nur in gesetzlich geregelten Ausnahmefällen anders, z.B. im Immobiliarsachenrecht (Grundstücksregistergesetz art. 17(2)). Wirksam ist der Verkauf fremder Sachen ferner, wenn es sich dabei um ein Handelsgeschäft i.S. von Ccom art. 467 handelt.

22. In GERMANY erfolgt der bereicherungsrechtliche Ausgleich wegen der Nutzung einer fremden Sache oder der Verletzung eines fremden Rechts, insbesondere eines Persönlichkeitsrechts, über die allgemeine Eingriffskondiktion (CC § 812(1) first sentence, second alternative, see e.g. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 812, no. 11). Wie bei Dienstleistungen besteht auch hier nach heute wohl herrschender Meinung das erlangte "Etwas" nicht in der Ersparnis von Aufwendungen, sondern in dem nichtgegenständlichen Vorteil selbst (Staudinger [-S. Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 812, no. 72; MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 812, no. 357; Erman [-Westermann and Buck-Heeb], BGB II[12], § 812, no. 9). Die Nutzung fremden Eigentums durch einen unrechtmäßigen Besitzer unterliegt dem Sonderregime des Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnisses (CC §§ 987 ff), das Anwendungsvorrang beansprucht (CC § 993). Im allgemeinen Bereicherungsrecht richtet sich der Ausgleichsanspruch für gezogenen Nutzungen nach dem Verkehrswert des Gebrauchs (CC § 818(2)), d.h. nach der Vergütung, die bei ordnungsgemäßer Inanspruchnahme des fremden Rechts zu zahlen gewesen wäre; der Verletzergewinn muss dagegen nur im Falle der Bösgläubigkeit herausgegeben werden (Sprau loc.cit. § 818, nos. 18, 23; S. Lorenz loc.cit. § 818, nos. 26, 28; Lieb loc.cit. § 818, nos. 18, 44, 50; BGH 24 November 1981, BGHZ 82, 299, 307; BGH 18 December 1986, BGHZ 99, 244, 248). Die Grundlage für die Gewinnabschöpfung ist dann im Recht der rechtswidrigen Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag (CC §§ 687(2) first sentence, 681 second sentence, 667) zu finden. Verfügungen eines Nichtberechtigten, welche dem Berechtigten gegenüber wirksam sind, werden bereicherungsrechtlich über CC § 816(1) abgewickelt. Hier wird von der Rechtsprechung die gesamte Gegenleistung (einschließlich eines etwaigen Gewinns) als dasjenige angesehen, was i.S.v. CC § 816(1) "durch die Verfügung erlangt" worden ist (BGH 8 January 1959, BGHZ 29, 157, 159; näher und teilweise kritisch Medicus, Schuldrecht II[14], no. 705; Sprau loc.cit. § 816 no. 23).

23. Das HUNGARIAN Law kennt eine dem deutschen und dem spanischen Konzept der Eingriffskondiktion vergleichbare Lehre nicht. Probleme aus dieser Fallgruppe werden zumeist in sachen-, personen- und urheberrechtlichen Vorschriften gelöst, die ihrerseits auf das Bereicherungsrecht weiterverweisen. Dieses kann aber auch ohne eine solche "Zwischennorm" zur Anwendung kommen, etwa dort, wo eine Frau, die selber nicht an der Tat beteiligt war, von einer Unterschlagung ihres Mannes profitiert (BH 2000/546). Der rechtsgrundlose Besitz und die Folgen der Nutzung fremder Sachen sind Gegenstand der sachenrechtlichen CC §§ 193-195; das Bereicherungsrecht kommt in diesem Bereich nur zum Zwecke der Lückenfüllung zur Anwendung (Vékás, FS György, 331, 352). Geregelt werden die Beziehungen zwischen rechtmäßigem und unrechtmäßigem Besitzer (Vékás, JbOstR XIX [1978], 243, 245; Vékás, Magyar Jog 2003, 385, 398; Schlechtriem, Restitution und Bereicherungsausgleich in Europa I, 48). Ausgleichsansprüche infolge der unberechtigten Nutzung einer fremden Immobilie sind von der Rechtsprechung aber keinesfalls nur auf das Recht des unrechtmäßigen Besitzes (so BH 2005/359: Anspruch auf eine Nutzungsgebühr gegen bösgläubige Besitzerin aus CC § 195(3)), sondern auch unmittelbar auf das Bereicherungsrecht gestützt worden (z.B. BH 2001/168). Ausgleichsansprüche bei gesetzlichem Eigentumsverlust (z.B. Verarbeitung und Verbindung, CC §§ 133-135) sind gleichfalls Gegenstand sachenrechtlicher Vorschriften, die bei Bösgläubigkeit des Handelnden auf das Bereicherungsrecht weiterverweisen und ihm so den Einwand der Entreicherung abschneiden. Unmittelbar dem Bereicherungsrecht unterstehen andere Formen der Ausnutzung fremden Eigentums, see e.g. BH 2005/143 (Verbreitung unautorisierter Fotografien eines einzigartigen Hauses für Werbezwecke; kein Schadenersatz, aber Bereicherungsausgleich nach CC § 361(1) und CFI Csongrád, 1. Gf. 40 177/2002/3 (rechtsgrundlose Nutzung einer fremden Werbefläche; Bereicherungsausgleich in Höhe des üblichen Mietzinses unabhängig vom Nachweis eines Schadens). Zum Schutz der Immaterialgüterrechte existiert auch in Ungarn eine umfangreiche Spezialgesetzgebung, die sich ausdrücklich auch Fragen des Bereicherungsausgleichs zuwendet. Bei der Verletzung von privatrechtlichen Persönlichkeitsrechten kommt es typischerweise zu einem Ausgleich immaterieller Schäden; das Gericht kann dem Verletzer nach CC § 84(2) sogar eine an eine gemeinnützige Organsiation zu leistende Geldstrafe auferlegen. Über bereicherungsrechtliche Ansprüche scheint in diesem Zusammenhang bislang zwar noch nicht entschieden worden zu sein, doch dürften sie in dem neuen Zivilgesetzbuch (dort § 84) ausdrücklich anerkannt werden (http://www.parlament.hu/irom38/05949/05949.pdf). Das geltende Recht kennt auch keine ausdrückliche Regelung des Bereicherungsausgleichs im Falle der unberechtigten Verfügung über fremdes Gut. Dem ursprünglichen Eigentümer steht in solchen Fällen nur ein schuldrechtlicher Anspruch gegen den Verfügenden zu (Lenkovics, Dologi jog, 132-134), und zwar in erster Linie ein Schadenersatzanspruch aus Delikt (BH 1997/119, BH 1988/70) und nur ergänzend auch ein Anspruch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung (Menyhárd, Polgári Jogi Kodifikáció 2004, 24, 30).

24. Das BULGARIAN Law kennt die Eingriffskondiktion, schränkt ihren Anwendungsbereich aber durch das Prinzip der Subsidiarität der allgemeinen Bereicherungsklage (LOA art. 59(2)) erheblich ein. Immerhin kommt sie zur Anwendung, wenn der Tatbestand eines Delikts nicht erfüllt ist, z.B. dort, wo ein Miteigentümer die Sache allein nutzt (Supreme Court 8 December 1994, decision no. 1808, civil matter no. 2027/93).

25. In POLAND kommen im Falle der rechtsgrundlosen Nutzung fremder Vermögensgegenstände in erster Linie die Vorschriften zum Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnis (CC arts. 224-230) zur Anwendung; sie verdrängen das Bereicherungsrecht

(Supreme Court 11 May 1972, III CZP 22/72, OSN 1972, no. 12, pos. 213). Unter CC arts. 224 § 2 und 225 hat der Eigentümer gegen den bösgläubigen Besitzer Anspruch auf Zahlung einer Nutzungsvergütung in Höhe des marktüblichen Miet- bzw. Pachtzinses (Supreme Court 23 May 1975, II CR 208/75, LEX no. 7707; Supreme Court 10 July 1984, III CZP 20/84, OSNC 1984, no. 12, pos. 209). Der Schutz von (körperlichen wie unkörperlichen) Persönlichkeitsrechten ist Gegenstand der CC arts. 23 und 24; die Rechtswidrigkeit einer Verletzung dieser Rechte wird vermutet (CC § 24 § 1 first sentence). Der Betroffene kann wegen seiner immateriellen Schäden Ausgleich in Geld (allerdings nur im Falle des Verschuldens der anderen Seite: CA Warsaw 13 January 1999, I ACa 1089/98, Wokanda 2000, no. 3, pos. 42; Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania – część ogólna[7], p. 173 no. 395) oder Zahlung an eine gemeinnützige Organsiation (CC art. 24 § 1 third sentence) verlangen. Man darf vermuten, dass in die Höhe dieses Ausgleichsbetrages auch ein Verletzergewinn eingerechnet wird. Bei einer rechtswidrigen Verfügung über seine Sache kann der Eigentümer von dem verfügenden Besitzer nach CC arts. 224 und 225 Ersatz für ihren 'Verlust' verlangen; der Begriff des 'Verlustes' umfasst auch den Rechtsverlust (Dybowski, Ochrona własności w polskim prawie cywilnym, 193; Pietrzykowski [-Skowrońska-Bocian], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 224, no. 13; Radwański and Dybowski [-Gniewek], System prawa prywatnego III, p. 516, no. 197; a. A. Rudnicki, Komentarz do kodeksu cywilnego II[6], art. 224 no. 3). Die Haftung unter diesen Vorschriften setzt allerdings Bösgläubigkeit voraus und ist der Höhe nach auf den Wert der Sache beschränkt (Gniewek loc.cit. 515, no. 192; Dybowski loc.cit. 191). Schadenersatz wegen entgangenen Gewinns gewährt nur das Deliktsrecht, einen Anspruch auf Gewinnherausgabe nur das Bereicherungsrecht (Dybowski loc.cit. 188, 196: Haftung auf Herausgabe des erzielten Gewinns aus CC art. 406 CC).

26. Zu DUTCH CC art. 6:203 siehe schon oben note II15. Unter diese Vorschrift fällt auch die unerlaubte Nutzung einer fremden Sache (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 321, p. 340; Nieskens-Isphording, NTBR 1998, 239; Zwalve, RM-Themis 1998, 206); der Begriff der 'Leistung' scheint in solchen Fällen sehr weit ausgedehnt zu werden. Geschuldet ist der Marktwert der Nutzung (CC art. 6:210(2); see Scheltema, Onverschuldigde betaling, 203; Hartkamp loc.cit. no. 333, p. 350. CC art. 6:211 ordnet an, dass ein Geldausgleich für Leistungen, die nicht in Natur restituiert werden können, dann ausgeschlossen ist, wenn nicht nur die Leistung selber, sondern auch die Zahlung von Geld für sie eine unerlaubte Handlung darstellen würde. Unter CC art. 6:212 ist ein Käufer, der wegen eines Mangels der Kaufsache vom Vertrag zurücktritt, zu einem Bereicherungsausgleich für den Gebrauch der Sache verpflichtet (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 136; siehe aber auch HR 20 September 2002, NedJur 2004, no. 458 p. 3819 [keine Haftung auf Bereicherungsausgleich, wenn der aus Nichterfüllung in Anspruch genommene Schuldner mangels Mahnung auch nicht auf Schadenersatz wegen Verzuges haftet]).

27. Under ESTONIAN law unauthorised use of another's assets must be compensated since the use is regarded as a gain derived from that asset. Bei der Übertragung von Eigentum, however, the principle of abstraction must be taken into account. Die Unwirksamkeit des schuldrechtlichen Vertrages zieht nicht die Unwirksamkeit des Verfügungsgeschäftes nach sich (GPCCA § 6(4)). Der Empfänger hat in einem solchen Fall also eine eigene Sache genutzt, nicht die Sache eines anderen. Dieser hat aber einen bereicherungsrechtlichen Anspruch auf Rückübertragung des Eigentums, der sich auch auf die gezogenen gains erstreckt (LOA §§ 1028 and 1032(1)). Nur wenn das Verfügungsgeschäft selber nichtig ist, verbleibt das Eigentum beim Veräußerer; er kann die Sache dann mit Hilfe der rei vindicatio (LPA § 80) zurückverlangen und aus LPA § 85(1) i.V.m. LOA §§ 1037-1040 Herausgabe der gains verlangen. Das betrifft alle unrechtmäßigen Besitzer, gleichgültig, ob sie bös- oder gutgläubig sind. 'Gains' umfasst die Früchte und alle sonstigen Vorteile aus dem Gebrauch der Sache (GPCCA § 62(1)). Es wird vermutet, dass jemand, der eine fremde Sache nutzt, Aufwendungen erspart hat (Supreme Court 20 December 2005, judgement in civil matter no. 3-2-1-136-05). Unbefugte Verfügungen über seine Sache kann der Berechtigte genehmigen und anschließend den Verfügenden auf Ersatz des Marktwertes der Sache in Anspruch nehmen (LOA § 1037(2)). Vielfache Verweisungen auf das Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung finden sich in den Sondergesetzen zum Urheberrecht und zum gewerblichen Rechtsschutz; der Rechtsinhaber kann jeweils nach Maßgabe der LOA §§ 1037 and 1039 Herausgabe des vom Verletzer Erlangten verlangen. Auch bei der Verletzung von Persönlichkeitsrechten kommen Ansprüche aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung in Betracht. Nach vorherrschender Ansicht wohnt auch Persönlichkeitsrechten ein ökonomischer Wert inne, so dass insoweit LOA § 1037 anwendbar sei (Tampuu. Lepinguväliste võlasuhete õigus, 82).

28. In the NORDIC countries there is an established claim for a reasonable compensation, separate from tort law, with regards to the use of another's asset. In SWEDEN such a claim is based on the principle of unjustified enrichment. Although no particular requirement of attribution has been identified, the claim is described as being against someone who is foreclosing the property right holder from using the asset himself (HD 2 July 2007, NJA 2007, 519; see also HD 11 April 2006, NJA 2006, 206). In DENMARK the claim is considered to have some affinity with unjustified enrichment, warranting a reasonable compensation for use (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 268). In FINLAND such a claim is explicitly identified as an unjustified enrichment claim (Roos, JFT 1992, 75, 84). The good faith of the infringing person excludes liability for the fruits that person has extracted, but nevertheless results in liability for a reasonable compensation for the use itself (Supreme Court 24 August 1983, KKO 1983 II 104; Supreme Court 29 September 1985, KKO 1985 II 140 [reasonable rent as compensation for use of a building]). Also bad faith situations are sometimes dealt with under unjustified enrichment. With regards to Sweden and Denmark, it is clear that the bad faith (intention/negligence) of the infringing person grants a damages claim for the loss suffered by the right holder (Agell, Skadeståndsansvaret vid obehöriga förfoganden över annans egendom, 202; Vinding Kruse loc cit. 264; Gomard, Forholdet mellem erstatningsregler i og uden for kontraktsforhold, 437). Ein Bereicherungsausgleich wegen der Nutzung der Sache wird hierdurch aber jedenfalls in Sweden nicht ausgeschlossen (Agell loc cit. 208; for Denmark see Vinding Kruse, Restitutioner, 293, 378). Ob dieser Anspruch auf Herausgabe der gesamten Bereicherung des Verletzers gerichtet oder der Höhe nach durch den objektiven Wert der Nutzung zu beschränken sei, wird nach wie vor streitig diskutiert. Sicher ist nur, dass der Anspruch nicht voraussetzt, dass der Rechtsinhaber den Gegenstand tatsächlich selber nutzen wollte (Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 226; Ussing, Erstatningsret, 174; Karlgren loc cit. 43; Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt[7], 420; Roos, JFT 1992, 75 at 84). Danish Insolvency Act [Konkursloven no. 1259 of 23 October 2007] § 75 regulates the recovery from a person who has received performance from the insolvent debtor in violation of the Act, and determines the compensation to correspond to the enrichment of that person, but not beyond the loss of the insolvency estate.

IV. Improvement of another's asset

29. Auch der Anspruch auf Ausgleich von Verwendungen auf eine fremde Sache kann seinen "Sitz" in durchaus verschiedenen Rechtsgebieten haben. Unter FRENCH law umfasst der Anspruch auf revendication nicht nur die Sache selbst, sondern auch deren Zubehör, Zuwächse (accroissements) und Früchte (Zenati and Revet, Les biens[2], no. 172). Nach CC art. 1381 hat der Eigentümer dem Besitzer umgekehrt alle notwendigen Ausgaben zu ersetzen, die er zur Erhaltung der Sache getätigt hat, und zwar unabhängig von Gut- oder Bösgläubigkeit des Besitzers. Nur notwendige Ausgaben sind ersatzpflichtig. Sind Verwendungen auf Immobilien nur nützlich (werterhöhend), aber nicht unentbehrlich gewesen, kann der Eigentümer wählen, ob er den Wert der geleisteten Arbeit oder die Werterhöhung seines Grundstücks ausgleicht. Fehlt es an einer Werterhöhung, entfällt die Ersatzpflicht; der Eigentümer kann sogar Entfernung der Verwendungen und Schadenersatz verlangen (Mazeaud and Chabas, Leçons de droit civil II(2)[8], no. 1605). Die Haftung des Eigentümers auf Ersatz der notwendigen Verwendungen (d.h. der Unterhaltungskosten der Sache) wird als eine der Haftung aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung ähnliche Billigkeitslösung gedeutet (Zenati and Revet loc.cit. no. 173). Der Rechtslage in France entspricht die in BELGIUM (Hansenne, Les biens I(1), no. 267) und in LUXEMBURG.

30. The modern approach to SPANISH Unjustified Enrichment Law kennt in Anlehnung an die deutsche Lehre auch eine condictio por impensas (restitutionary claim based on expenditures) und versucht, sie mit CC arts. 453-454 and 361 zu koordinieren (Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos Estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 131-132; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 128; Miquel González, Enriquecimiento injustificado, 2808; Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 50). Die Gerichte scheinen dagegen den Verwendungsersatz sogar unmittelbar auf das Konzept der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung zu stützen (kritisch dazu u.a. Carrasco Perera, ADC 1987, 1055, 1065; befürwortend aber Quesada Sánchez, La Ley 2005 [4] 1719, 1730). Das folgt u.a. aus TS 27 March 1958, RAJ 1958 (1) no. 1456 p. 940 (Bereicherungsanspruch eines Mannes gegen den Vater seiner Braut bejaht, nachdem die Verlobung auseinandergegangen und deshalb die Investitionen in das dem Vater gehörende Haus für den Mann verloren waren; Ausgleich in Höhe der Wertsteigerung des Hauses) und aus TS 30 July 1996, RAJ 1996 (3) no. 6411 p. 8566 (a citizen of a small village, who also was one of the members of City Council, decided – taking into account that at that moment the City Council had financial problems – to finance the construction of two tennis courts on land belonging to the village; his widow's unjustified enrichment claim was admitted).

31. Auch under ITALIAN law kann die Verbesserung einer fremden Sache eine rechtsgrundlose Bereicherung darstellen. Ihr Ausgleich erfolgt aber in erster Linie über die Regeln zum Besitz und zum Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnis. Dem bösgläubigen Besitzer steht ein Verwendungsersatzanspruch nur zu, wenn die vorgenommenen Verbesserungen im Zeitpunkt der Rückgabe der Sache noch vorhanden sind (CC art. 1150(2)). Der Eigentümer hat entweder den Wert der Verwendungen oder die Höhe der Wertsteigerung seiner Sache auszugleichen, je nachdem, welcher Betrag der geringere ist. Ein gutgläubiger Besitzer hat dagegen Anspruch auf Ersatz in Höhe des Wertzuwachses der Sache. Die Vorschriften des Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnisses über Verwendungsersatz finden allerdings nur auf einen Besitzer im technischen Sinn, nicht auch auf einen detentore Anwendung (Cass. 21 December 1993, no. 12627, Rep.Giur.it. 1993, voce Possesso (in materia civile), no. 66, col. 2993); in Ermangelung anderer spezieller Regeln (wie z.B. in CC arts. 935-937, im Nießbrauchs-, Pacht-, Miet- und Wohnungseigentumsrecht) verbleibt es insoweit beim allgemeinen Bereicherungsrecht.

32. Unter dem Einfluss der deutschen Rechtslehre hat sich auch in PORTUGAL die sogen. Aufwendungskondiktion (enriquecimento por despesas efectuadas por outrem) etablieren können, zu deren Unterkategorien die Verwendungskondiktion (enriquecimento por incremento de valor em coisas alheias) und die Rückgriffskondiktion (enriquecimento por pagamento de dívidas alheias) gehören (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 791-814). Verwendungsersatzansprüche finden sich hauptsächlich im Sachenrecht, dessen Vorschriften in einigen Fällen auf das Bereicherungsrecht weiterverweisen (CC arts. 1273(2), 1334(2), 1341 und 1538(2)). Unter CC art. 1273(1) haben sowohl der gut- als auch der bösgläubige Besitzer Anspruch auf Ersatz notwendiger Verwendungen und auf Wegnahme nützlicher Verbesserungen, sofern die Wegnahme ohne Beschädigung der Sache möglich ist. Ist die Wegnahme nicht ohne Beschädigung der Sache möglich, so ist der Eigentümer dem Besitzer nach den Regeln der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung zum Wertersatz verpflichtet (CC art. 1273(2)). Verliert eine bösgläubige Person Eigentum nach den Tatbeständen des gesetzlichen Eigentumserwerbs über Verbindung, Vermischung u.ä., so haftet der Eigentümer, der die Sache behalten will, gleichfalls nur nach Bereicherungsrecht (CC arts. 1334(2) und 1341). Deshalb haftet z.B. der Staat einer politischen Partei, die ein staatliches Gebäude widerrechtlich okkupiert und mit einem Pavillon ausgebaut hatte, den der Staat weiter nutzte, statt ihn abzureißen (CA Oporto 16 April 1991, CJ XVI [1991-2] 263; Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 801, fn. 2166). Erlischt ein Erbbaurecht und geht infolgedessen das Eigentum an dem Gebäude auf den Grundstückseigentümer über, so ist dieser zum Ausgleich nach bereicherungsrechtlichen Vorschriften verpflichtet (CC art. 1538(2)). CC art. 215(1) gewährt demjenigen, der Früchte herausgeben muss, einen Anspruch auf Ausgleich der investierten Produktions- und Erntekosten bis zur Höhe des Wertes der Früchte; auch das wird als ein Fall der Aufwendungskondiktion verstanden (Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 799).

33. Im Sinne der GERMAN Terminologie sind Verwendungen Aufwendungen auf fremdes Gut. Die bereicherungsrechtliche Rückabwicklung erfolgt über die sogen. Verwendungskondiktion, die einen Sonderfall der sogen. Nichtleistungskondiktion (CC § 812(1) first sentence, second alternative) darstellt. Die Verwendung darf aber nicht den Gegenstand einer Leistung darstellen. Nicht um eine Leistung geht es insbesondere, wenn der Verwendende nicht weiß, dass es sich um eine fremde Sache handelt, oder wenn er die Verwendung selbst nutzen will (wie z.B. der Dieb). Die Verwendungskondiktion ist anderen, spezielleren Ausgleichsmechanismen (insbesondere des Sachenrechts: CC §§ 994 ff) subsidiär (näher Medicus, Schuldrecht II[14], no. 716; Erman [-Westermann and Buck-Heeb], BGB II[12], vor § 812, no. 13; § 812, no. 73).

34. HUNGARY regelt das Recht der Verwendungen auf fremde Sachen zunächst in einer Reihe von Spezialvorschriften des Vertragsrechts, insbesondere im Recht der Miete beweglicher Sachen (CC § 427), der Leihe (CC § 584(4): Verweis auf das Recht der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag mit teilweiser Weiterverweisung auf das Bereicherungsrecht) und der Wohnraummiete (CC § 434(2) i.V.m. Gesetz no. LXXVIII/1993 über einzelne Vorschriften bezüglich der Vermietung und Veräußerung von Wohnungen und anderen Räumlichkeiten [1993. évi LXXVIII. törvény a lakások és helyiségek bérletére, valamint az elidegenítésükre vonatkozó egyes szabályokról]). Die Parteien können Abweichendes vereinbaren und dadurch auch bereicherungsrechtliche Ausgleichsansprüche ausschließen (BH 2000/70; BH 1994/593). Weitere Regelungen zum Verwendungsersatz finden sich in sachenrechtlichen Vorschriften, die gleichfalls nicht selten auf das Bereicherungsrecht weiterverweisen. Zu ihnen gehören im Nießbrauchsrecht CC §§ 159(1) und 162(2) und im Recht des rechtsgrundlosen Besitzes CC § 194, wonach dem bösgläubigen Besitzer notwendige und dem gutgläubigen Besitzer auch nützliche Verwendungen zu erstatten sind. Daneben besteht ein Wegnahmerecht, an dessen Stelle ein Bereicherungsanspruch tritt, wenn die Wegnahme nicht ohne Beschädigung der Sache möglich ist (näher Menyhárd, Dologi jog, 508). Ausführlich geregelt sind die Rechtsfolgen des Bauens auf fremden Grund (CC §§ 137 ff) und des Bauens über die Grenze (CC §§ 109ff); nur bei Bösgläubigkeit des Überbauenden unterliegen seine Ausgleichsansprüche unter den Voraussetzungen von CC § 110(1)(a) dem Bereicherungsrecht. Bereicherungsrecht bzw. das Recht der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag kommen, je nach den Umständen, zur Anwendung, wenn der Verwender irrig meint, im Rahmen eines wirksamen Vertrages zu handeln, außerdem in allen übrigen Fällen, die keiner der bisher genannten Fallgruppen angehören (z.B. BH 1997/400: nach Versteigerung seines Ackerlandes investiert der frühere Eigentümer noch Arbeit darauf; Bereicherungsanspruch nur deshalb abgelehnt, weil der neue Eigentümer durch die Arbeit nicht bereichert worden sei).

35. Gutgläubige Besitzer, die Verwendungen auf eine fremde Sache machen, haben unter BULGARIAN LPA art. 72(1) gegen deren Eigentümer einen Anspruch auf Ausgleich der dadurch bewirkten Werterhöhung; für sie kommt es auf den Zeitpunkt der gerichtlichen Entscheidung an. Der bösgläubige Besitzer kann, je nachdem, welcher Betrag der geringere ist, nur entweder die Werterhöhung oder die aufgewandten Kosten verlangen (LPA art. 74(2)). Problematisch ist, dass die genannten Vorschriften unter einem Besitzer nur den Eigenbesitzer, nicht auch den Fremdbesitzer oder Detentor verstehen, obwohl auch der Letztere ähnlich geschützt sein sollte (näher Tzonchev, Podobreniyata, 30; Goleminov, Neosnovatelno obogatyavane, 100). Supreme Court 2 December 1968, Auslegungsentscheidung no. 85 der Generalversammlung der Zivilkammern (zitiert nach Tzonchev loc.cit. 42) hat dem bloßen Detentor jedoch Ansprüche aus LPA art. 72(1) versagt und ihm stattdessen einen bereicherungsrechtlichen Anspruch aus LOA art. 59 gewährt. Auch dieser komme aber nur in Betracht, wenn der Kläger wenigstens Fremdbesitzer (Detentor) gewesen sei; sonst verbleibe es bei den Regeln der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 194 verpflichtet den Bereicherten auf Ausgleich notwendiger (expensae necessariae) und nützlicher Verwendungen (expensae utiles). Handelte der Verwender bösgläubig, steht ihm ein Ausgleich für nützliche Verwendungen nur bis zur Höhe der dem Eigentümer verbleibenden Wertsteigerung der Sache zu.

36. Wird auf fremdem Grund gebaut oder werden sonst Verwendungen auf eine fremde Sache gemacht, so besteht under DUTCH law die Bereicherung in der Wertsteigerung der Sache, nicht in dem Wert der Aufwendungen; sind Letztere geringer, bleibt der Bereicherungsanspruch aber auf sie begrenzt. Ein über Bereicherung und/oder Verarmung hinausgehender Schadenersatzanspruch besteht nur im Falle einer unerlaubten Handlung des Bereicherten (HR 29 January 1993, NedJur 1994 no. 172 p. 728; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 364 p. 383). Unter CC art. 6:212(2) bleibt eine Bereicherung außer Betracht, deren Wert durch Umstände vermindert wurde, die außerhalb der Risikosphäre des Bereicherten liegen. Das ist wichtig, weil der Wert der Bereicherung grundsätzlich zum Zeitpunkt ihrer Entstehung berechnet wird. Wird die Sache jedoch beschädigt oder vernichtet, ohne dass dem Bereicherten dies zuzurechnen ist, so bleibt die Bereicherung bis zur Höhe dieses Betrages unberücksichtigt. Spezielle Normen zur Abschöpfung ungerechtfertigter Bereicherungen infolge von Verwendungen finden sich im Pacht- und im Nießbrauchsrecht (CC arts. 3:220 und 5:96). Auch die mietrechtliche Regelung in CC art. 7:216(3) wird auf den Gedanken der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung gestützt (HR 25 June 2004, NedJur 2005 no. 338 p. 3078); sie ist im Bereich der Wohnraummiete zwingenden Rechts (CC art. 7:242(2)). Wesentlich durch familienrechtliche Überlegungen überlagert ist die Rechtsprechung zum Verwendungsersatz zwischen Ehegatten. Wer die gemeinsame Wohnung verbessert hat, sie dann aber verlässt, kann je nach den Umständen einen Bereicherungsanspruch gegen den anderen Ehepartner haben (HR 11 April 1986, NedJur 1986, no. 622 p. 2312). Ist das Haus, in welchem die Eheleute wohnen, auf den Namen der Frau eingetragen, dann soll sie jedoch nicht durch die Wertsteigerung ungerechtfertigt bereichert sein, die aus den von ihrem Mann vorgenommenen Verbesserungen resultiert (HR 22 May 1987, NedJur 1988, no. 231 p. 913; HR 12 June 1987, NedJur 1988; no. 150 p. 635; -Scheltema, Verbintenissenrecht II, art. 6:212, no. 6.3, p. 42).

37. Auch das ESTONIAN law gewährt einen Verwendungsersatzanspruch in Höhe der Bereicherung des Eigentümers der Sache. Bei der Feststellung der Bereicherung wird u.a. gefragt, ob die Verwendungen für den Eigentümer, gemessen an seinen Absichten, nützlich waren. Maßgeblich ist der Zeitpunkt der Rückgabe der Sache bzw. der Zeitpunkt, zu welchem der Eigentümer sonst in der Lage war, die Wertsteigerung der Sache für sich zu nutzen (LOA § 1042(1)). Der Verwendungsersatzanspruch ist jedoch ausgeschlossen, wenn der Eigentümer Wegnahme der Verwendungen verlangt und diese ohne Beschädigung der Sache möglich ist, wenn der Verwender den Bereicherten nicht rechtzeitig über seine Absicht, Aufwendungen auf dessen Sache zu machen, unterrichtet hat, wenn der Bereicherte den Verwendungen widersprochen hat oder ihre Vornahme vertraglich oder gesetzlich untersagt war. LOA § 1042 setzt voraus, dass die Sache nicht dem Verwender gehörte. Ist der Verwender (in Anwendung des Abstraktionsprinzips) trotz nichtigen Kaufvertrages Eigentümer geworden und hat er Grund zu der Annahme gehabt, dieses Eigentum dauerhaft behalten zu dürfen, so muss er die Sache nur gegen Zahlung eines Ausgleiches für die auf sie gemachten Verwendungen zurückgeben (LOA § 1033(2)). Das umfasst auch solche Kosten, welche der Kläger nicht investiert hätte.

38. In the NORDIC countries werden Verwendungsersatzansprüche vorwiegend im Zusammenhang mit der Rückabwicklung nichtiger, angefochtener or terminated contracts und als Gegenrechte des herausgabepflichtigen Besitzers im der Vindikation geprüft (Karlgren, Obehörig vinst och värdeersättning, 29). In SWEDEN, the right to receive compensation for costs relating to property which has been in ones possession, can be found in several contexts. Firstly, general maintenance of the property is to be compensated. Secondly, a distinction is made between necessary (costs which the owner could not have avoided), useful (costs which nevertheless have increased the value of the property) and excessive costs (see Land Code chap. 5 § 3; correspondingly FINNISH Land Code chap. 3 § 4). Excessive costs are never to be compensated, nützliche Kosten sind ersatzpflichtig solange der Besitzer gutgläubig ist, aber nicht über den Betrag der Wertsteigerung der Sache hinaus (Karlgren loc cit. 101; see also Swedish HD 11 December 1987, NJA 1987, 845 II and some specific insolvency rules to the same effect, such as DANISH Insolvency Act § 75; Swedish Insolvency Act chap. 4 § 15(3) and FINNISH Recovery to Bankruptcy Estate Act § 18). Der Käufer einer rückgabepflichtigen und der Verkäufer einer nicht rechtzeitig entgegengenommenen Sache sollen einen Ausgleich für nützliche Verwendungen unter dem Recht der negotiorum gestio verlangen können (Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 80). Necessary maintenance cost should be compensated regardless of good faith (Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 374). Work done may be qualified as (necessary or useful) costs (Lennander, Återvinning i konkurs[3], 358). The support for a claim concerning improvements of another's asset is more limited in DENMARK, although its been asserted that a right to compensation for such investments exists in case of good faith improvements and that the compensation is limited to the enrichment of the rights holder, i.e. the increase of value due to the improvements and possible savings made (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 272).

V. Tilgung fremder Schuld

39. Unter FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBURGIAN CC art. 1236 darf jede interessierte Person (wie z.B. ein Bürge oder ein Mitschuldner) die Schuld eines Dritten erfüllen. Eine Person, die kein eigenes Interesse an der Schuldtilgung hat, darf nur im Namen des Schuldners und für ihn handeln; handelt sie im eigenen Namen, darf sie den Gläubiger nicht ersetzen. Wer wissentlich die Schuld eines Dritten erfüllt hat und deshalb gegen ihn vorgehen will, muss nach French Cass.civ. 17 June 2003, pourvoi no. 01-00608 und Cass.civ. 12 June 2001, pourvoi no. 99-15646 beweisen, dass la cause dont procédait ce paiement impliquait pour le débiteur l'obligation de lui rembourser les sommes ainsi versée. Die Freiwilligkeit der Schuldtilgung sperrt andernfalls jeglichen Bereicherungsausgleich. Denkbar ist aber natürlich ein Ausgleichsanspruch auf der Grundlage eines stillschweigend geschlossenen Auftragsvertrages oder, ihm im Ergebnis gleichkommend, einer Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag (Luxemburgian Supreme Court 26 October 1965, Pas. luxemb. 20, 39).

40. SPANISH theory of condictiones conceives a condictio de regreso (reimbursement claim based on payment of another's debt; Rückgriffskondiktion). Die Vorschriften über die Tilgung fremder Schulden (CC arts. 1158, 1159, 1209 and 1210) unterscheiden je nachdem, ob der Zahlende an der Schuldtilgung ein Interesse hat oder nicht. Nur im ersten Fall tritt der Zahlende im Wege der Subrogation an die Stelle des Gläubigers (CC art. 1210(3)). Hat der Zahlende kein Interesse an der Schuldtilgung, so kann er, wenn er für Rechnung des Schuldners leistet, von ihm gemäß CC art. 1158 das Geleistete verlangen, sofern er nicht gegen den ausdrücklichen Willen des Schuldners geleistet hat. Nach herrschender Auffassung in der Lehre gewährt CC art. 1158 zwei verschiedenen Bereicherungsansprüche (see, instead of many, Bercovitz Rodríguez-Cano [-Bercovitz Rodríguez-Cano], Comentarios al Código Civil[2], 1394-1395; abweichend aber Del Olmo García, Pago de tercero y subrogación, 80-83): the acción de reembolso (reimbursement claim) when the debtor ignored the payor's payment (CC art. 1158(2)), und an unjustified enrichment claim when the payor paid against the debtor's will (CC art. 1158(3)). Um einen Bereicherungsanspruch handelt es sich in dem zuletzt genannten Fall, weil er sich ausschließlich auf die Nettobereicherung des Schuldners bezieht (see notes under VII.–3:102).

41. Unter ITALIAN CC art. 1180(1) kann jeder die Schuld eines anderen auch gegen den Willen des Gläubigers tilgen, es sei denn, der Gläubiger hat ein Interesse an persönlicher Erfüllung durch den Schuldner. Der Gläubiger kann allerdings die ihm vom Dritten angebotene Leistung ablehnen, wenn der Schuldner dem Gläubiger gegenüber widerspricht (CC art. 1180(2)). Besteht zwischen dem Schuldner und dem zahlenden Dritten kein vorrangig zu beachtendes Schuldverhältnis und handelt der Dritte auch nicht in Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag, kann er den Schuldner unter den Regeln über die ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung in Anspruch nehmen.

42. Auch PORTUGUESE CC art. 767(1) erlaubt die Tilgung einer fremden Schuld. Jeder Dritte kann die Leistung erbringen; eines besonderen Rechtfertigungsgrundes bedarf es nicht (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 804, fn. 2169). Das Gesetz sieht deshalb zahlreiche Ausgleichsmechanismen vor, die ihrerseits kaum Raum für eine (subsidiäre) Rückgriffskondiktion (enriquecimento por pagamento de dívidas) lassen (Menezes Cordeiro, Obrigações II, 198-199; Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 805). Vorrang vor ihr haben jedenfalls vertragliche Ausgleichsansprüche (z.B. aus CC art. 1167(c) (Auftragsvertrag)), Ansprüche aus einer berechtigten Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag (CC art. 468(1)), Ansprüche aus dem Recht der irrtümlichen Leistung in den Fällen einer subjektiven Nichtschuld (CC arts. 477 und 478) und Ansprüche, welche der Leistende im Wege der Surrogation erwirbt (z.B. CC arts. 592, 589 und 590). Im

Allgemeinen gilt, dass ein Rückgriffsanspruch des Leistenden gegen den Schuldner nur dann besteht, wenn er unter eine dieser Fallgruppen fällt (so implizit auch STJ 11 May 2000, CJ [ST] VIII [2000-2] 54). Ein Ausweichen auf das Bereicherungsrecht soll höchstens in hipótese rara, in seltenen Ausnahmefällen in Betracht kommen (Menezes Cordeiro loc.cit. 199; Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 804).

43. Wenn ein Dritter an einen Gläubiger mit der Folge leistet, dass dessen Schuldner frei wird, steht dem Dritten gegen den befreiten Schuldner unter den Voraussetzungen von GERMAN CC § 812(1) first sentence, second alternative eine sogen. Rückgriffskondiktion zu. Sie allerdings ist anderen Ausgleichsmechanismen subsidiär, insbesondere den zahlreichen Vorschriften, welche die Frage mit der Technik der Legalzession lösen (e.g. CC §§ 268(3), 426(2) und 774(1), der Regelung zum Gesamtschuldnerausgleich in CC § 426(1) und der Regelung über den Aufwendungsersatz im Recht der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag (CC §§ 683, 670), see Medicus, Schuldrecht II[14], no. 719 and Staudinger (-S. Lorenz), BGB [2007], § 812, nos. 2, 42).

44. Unter HUNGARIAN law kann als ungeschuldet zurückverlangt werden, was jemand rechtsgrundlos auf eine vermeintlich eigene Schuld geleistet hat. Situationen, in welchen ein Dritter bewusst eine fremde Schuld tilgen will, fallen dagegen unter CC § 286. Hiernach muss der Gläubiger die von einem Dritten angebotene Erfüllung akzeptieren, wenn der Schuldner zustimmt und die Leistung weder personengebunden ist noch Kenntnisse oder Fähigkeiten erfordert, über die der Dritte nicht verfügt. Die Zustimmung des Schuldners ist nicht erforderlich, falls der Dritte ein gesetzliches Interesse an der Erfüllung hat. Andernfalls stellen Leistungen des Dritten an den Gläubiger keine Erfüllung dar; der Dritte hat gegen den Gläubiger einen Rückforderungsanspruch nach bereicherungsrechtlichen Vorschriften (Gellért [-Harmathy], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1032-1034). Hat die Leistung des Dritten dagegen die Schuld zum Erlöschen gebracht, so kommt es darauf an, ob der Dritte im Interesse des Schuldners oder im eigenen Interesse gehandelt hat. Im letzteren Fall dürfte der Dritte von Rechts wegen die Forderung des Gläubigers gegen den Schuldner erwerben (Harmathy loc.cit.). Dafür gibt es zwar keine ausdrückliche gesetzliche Grundlage, doch gründet man dieses Ergebnis auf eine entsprechende Interpretation von CC § 286(2) (Petrik [-Kisfaludi], Polgári jog II[2], 479; Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1183; Bíró, Kötelmi jog – közös szabályok, szerződéstan[8], 164). Hat der Dritte im Interesse des Schuldners gehandelt, so kann es sich dabei um eine berechtigte Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag gehandelt haben (Benedek loc.cit. 1186; Szladits [-Személyi], Magyar magánjog IV, 755). War die Schuldtilgung unter den Umständen des Einzelfalls "angebracht", so wird der Tilgende so angesehen, als habe er als Beauftragter des Schuldners gehandelt (CC § 486(2); see BH 1993/111 and BH 1982/480); andernfalls steht dem Tilgenden nur ein Anspruch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung zu (CC § 486(3); see Bíró, A megbízási szerződés, 108-114).

45. Under BULGARIAN LOA art. 73(1) kann jeder Dritte die Verbindlichkeit eines Schuldners tilgen, es sei denn, es handelt sich um eine Schuld intuitu personae. LOA art. 73(1) betrifft Leistungen aller Art, nicht nur Geldleistungen (Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast[4], 233). Weder Gläubiger noch Schuldner können der Leistung durch den Dritten widersprechen (Kalaydjiev loc.cit. 234). Nur wenn er ein berechtigtes Interesse an der Leistungserbringung nachweist, erwirbt der Dritte allerdings im Wege der Subrogation den Anspruch des Gläubigers gegen den Schuldner (LOA art. 74). In allen übrigen Fällen kommt es darauf an, ob der Dritte als Auftragnehmer, als Geschäftsführer ohne Auftrag, als Schenker oder als solvens anzusehen ist (Apostolov, Obligazionno pravo. Obshto uchenie za obligazionnoto otnoshenie, 178).

46. Under DUTCH CC art. 6:30 kann eine Verbindlichkeit auch von einer anderen Person als dem Schuldner erfüllt werden. Dazu ist erforderlich, dass der Dritte mit dem Ziel zahlt, den Schuldner zu befreien. Denn wenn der Dritte in der irrtümlichen Annahme leistet, selber der Schuldner zu sein, hat diese Leistung keine schuldbefreiende Wirkung und kann als ungeschuldet vom Gläubiger zurückverlangt werden (CC art. 6:203). In den Fällen des CC art. 6:30 ist der Empfänger dagegen berechtigt, die Leistung zu behalten. Der solvens muss sich an den Schuldner halten, und zwar entweder auf der Basis eines zwischen ihnen bestehenden Vertrages, auf der Basis der Regeln über die Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag (CC art. 6:198) oder auf der Basis der Regeln über die ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung (CC art. 6:212, see Asser [–Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 330 p. 345; Vriesendorp, Verbintenissen uit de wet en Schadevergoeding[2], no. 292 p. 275; Scheltema, Verbintenissenrecht II, art. 6:212, no. 6.2 p. 22).

47. Auch under ESTONIAN LOA § 78(1) a third party may perform the obligation of the obligor in part or in full. In the absence of a legal basis such a performance is usually regarded as negotiorum gestio (LOA ch. 51). Die Vorschriften des Bereicherungsrechts (LOA § 1041) kommen zur Anwendung, wenn es sich um eine unberechtigte und vom Schuldner (dem principal im Sinne des Rechts der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag) auch nicht nachträglich genehmigte Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag handelt. Voraussetzung ist aber, dass der gestor weder wusste noch wissen musste, dass er ohne rechtfertigenden Grund handelte und deshalb gutgläubig war. Andernfalls steht ihm auch ein Bereicherungsanspruch nicht zu (Supreme Court 1 November 2006, civil matter no. 3-2-1-91-06).

48. In SWEDEN führen ungeschuldete und unerbetene Zahlungen fremder Schulden grundsätzlich nicht zu einem Ausgleichsanspruch gegen den Schuldner (HD 23 November 1910, NJA 1910, 622; similarly HD 28 April 1920, NJA 1920, 234 and HD 29 December 1945, NJA 1945, 728). Zwar ist darauf hingewiesen worden, dass die Motivationen für solch freiwillige Zahlungen ganz unterschiedlich sein können und die generelle Ablehnung eines Ausgleichsanspruches deshalb zu unangemessenen Ergebnissen führen könne (HD 21 May 1973, NJA 1973, 286 [dissenting opinion JustR Hessler]; see also Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 109), doch scheint die Existenz eines Ausgleichsanspruches weiterhin davon abzuhängen, ob es auf vertraglicher oder gesetzlicher Grundlage zu einem Übergang des Anspruchs des Gläubigers gegen den Schuldner auf den Zahlenden kommt (HD 21 May 1973 loc.cit.; Håstad loc cit. 116; Hellner, Obehörig vinst, 378, 387). In DENMARK the assessment of performance of another's debt is more uncertain, although its been argued that a restitutionary claim for the enrichment should be granted (Ussing, Erstatningsret, 224; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 272). In FINLAND, the right to receive restitution for performing another's debt is a recognized claim, and not as restricted as in Sweden; the claim is not necessarily defined as a right of recourse but instead as a restitutionary claim of an enrichment (Roos, JFT 1992, 75, 94).

Illustration 1 is taken from CA Naumburg 20 Decmeber 2005, NJW-RR 2006, 1154; illustration 2 is from CA Leeuwarden 10 August 2005, NJF 2005, 393; LJN no. AU0823; illustration 3 is based on CA Barcelona 16 February 2006, BDA JUR 2006/111578; illustration 4 is taken from HR 30 September 2005, RvdW 2005, no. 106 p. 961.

VII.–4:102: Indirect representation

Where a representative does a juridical act on behalf of a principal but in such a way that the representative is, but the principal is not, a party to the juridical act, any enrichment or disadvantage of the principal which results from the juridical act, or from a performance of obligations under it, is to be regarded as an enrichment or disadvantage of the representative.

COMMENTS

Overview. This Article addresses globally issues of enrichment, disadvantage and attribution in situations involving representatives who deal with third parties on behalf of their principal, but in their own name or otherwise in such a way as not to indicate an intention to bind the principal. The purpose of the Article is to ensure that in such cases an essential policy is not disturbed – namely, that the reversal of enrichments conferred by parties to a transaction which is without effect is a matter only for the parties to that transaction. It does so by essentially collapsing the legal position of principal and representative in relation to third parties into one, ascribing enrichments obtained and disadvantages sustained by the principal to the representative because the representative is the third party's contractual partner.

Indirect representation. This Article applies only where a contract is concluded (or another juridical act done) on behalf of an undisclosed or unidentified principal in such a way that the representative is, but the principal is not, a party to it. The representative will have acted in the representative's own name or otherwise in such a way as not to indicate an intention to affect the legal position of a principal (see II.–6:106 (Representative acting in own name)) or will have failed to reveal the identity of an unidentified principal (see II.–6:108 (Unidentified principal)). This Article has no application where the contract is concluded by a representative in such manner as to bind the principal directly (as to which see II.–6:105 (When representative's act affects principal's legal position)).

The problem of the principal who is not a party to the transaction. The difficulty which the Article seeks to address arises where it is the representative and not the principal who is a party to the transaction with the third person. Difficulty may arise, for example, if the representative, by virtue of authority granted by the principal, has power to dispose of or otherwise make use of an asset of the principal. The effect of a performance of the contract with a third party (such as a contract to sell or let out the principal's goods) will be to inflict a disadvantage on the principal and to enrich the third person (purchaser, hirer, etc). The policy of confining reversal of enrichments obtained under a void contract to the parties to that contract demands that the third person return the goods or account for the value obtained to the representative, the third person's contractual partner. However, in the absence of this Article the disadvantage sustained is not that of the representative, but rather that of the principal. It should be the representative and not the principal to whom the third party's restitution is due. Conversely, performance by the third party may well have directly enriched the principal, but this should not facilitate a claim by the third party directly against the principal (with whom the third party never entered into legal relations).

Illustration 1

P authorises I to sell a specified sculpture. In conformity with his agreement with P, I negotiates a sale with T. I does not disclose that he is only acting as an agent. The contract is concluded between I and T, see II.–6:106 (Representative acting in own name), consistent with P's instructions. As a result of performance of the obligations under the sale contract, the purchase money is paid into P's account (as provided for by the terms of the contract) and the sculpture is delivered to T. It later emerges that the contract is void for failure to comply with rules governing the movement of cultural artefacts. In accordance with this Article, it is I, not P, who has a claim against T under this Book for a return of the sculpture and it is I, not P, who is liable under this Book to T to return the purchase price. P's disadvantage in loss of the sculpture is treated as a result of this Article as a disadvantage of I, not P, and P's enrichment in acquiring the purchase price is treated as a result of this Article as an enrichment of I, not P.

Illustration 2
A consumer T concludes with I a contract for the hire-purchase of a car. Unknown to T, I is acting on P's instructions and the car belongs to P. The hire-purchase contract is void due to failure to comply with required statutory formalities, this being the mandatory effect prescribed by law. Although P suffers a disadvantage in that use is made of his car, I and not P is entitled to a return of the car because P's disadvantage is to be regarded as a disadvantage of I, the party purporting to perform the contract. Any claim of P will be against I by virtue of their agency relationship.

Internal relationship of representative and principal. The purpose of the provision is only to ensure that restitutionary claims arising out of a failed transaction between one party to a contract and another party who is an indirect representative are confined to those parties. The rules of this Article thus necessarily only apply in relation to claims by or against the third party. It leaves the internal rights and obligations of the principal and the representative unaffected, except in so far as their content depends on rights and obligations vis-à-vis third parties. There is an impact on the internal relationship between principal and representative only because the existence of rights or liabilities of the representative vis-à-vis the other contract party necessarily must have a bearing on the internal relationship. Thus, for example, the fact that a representative will have an enrichment claim against the third party for a return of the principal's property will generate a liability for the representative to account to the principal. Conversely, the liability of the representative vis-à-vis the third party to reverse enrichments of the principal will create in favour of the representative a right of indemnification by the principal. Hence, the representative will be both debtor and creditor of enrichment claims vis-à-vis the third party and will have both corresponding rights against and obligations to the principal under the internal relationship between principal and agent.

Insolvency or fundamental non-performance of the representative. Exceptions to the principle that unjustified enrichments are to be restored by and to the contractual partner (the representative) and not a hidden participant in the transaction (the principal) can only be justifiable in special circumstances where a direct legal relationship materialises between principal and third party. Under the PECL such exceptional cases were provided for in PECL arts. 3:302 and 3:303, whereby a principal or third party was justified in taking over the intermediary's claims in the event of the intermediary's insolvency or fundamental non-performance. These exceptional cases, which raised difficult questions of policy and for which practitioners acquainted with the recurring problems of representation in a commercial context doubted that the PECL rules provided an appropriate solution, have not been carried forward into these model rules. Accordingly there are no exceptions to the rule set out in this Article.

NOTES

1. Unter FRENCH and BELGIAN law sind die vertraglichen Beziehungen zwischen dem Mittelsmann und seinem Auftraggeber (dazu Cass.civ. 1 December 1971, D. 1972 248) streng von den Beziehungen zwischen dem Mittelsmann (dem Strohmann) und dem Dritten zu trennen (Cass.soc. 17 July 1958, Bull.civ. 1958, IV, no. 940). Der Strohmann ist der unmittelbare Vertragspartner des Dritten; dieser hat sich infolgedessen nur mit dem Strohmann auseinanderzusetzen (Belgian Cass. 17 May 2002, no. de rôle C010330F). Das gilt auch im Falle der Unwirksamkeit des Vertrages zwischen dem Mittelsmann und dem Dritten. Nimmt dagegen jemand mit Vertretungsmacht eine Leistung für einen anderen an, so muss der Leistende seinen Rückforderungsanspruch aus répétition de l'indu unmittelbar gegen den Prinzipal richten (Cass.com. 18 March 2008, pourvoi no. 06-20930; Cass.soc. 5 February 1981, Bull.civ. 1981, V, no 112; Cass. 8 December 1994, JT 1995, 296).

2. In SPAIN ist das concept of 'indirect representation' allgemein anerkannt. Regeln hierzu finden sich sowohl im Recht des Auftragsvertrages (CC art. 1717) als auch im Recht der Kommission (Ccom art. 246); beide betreffen eine Mittelsperson, die einen Vertrag on behalf of an undisclosed or unidentified principal schließt (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema I[11], 580). Dem Dritten gegenüber ist nur die Zwischenperson berechtigt und verpflichtet; ihr Verhältnis zu dem principal richtet sich dagegen nach den diese Beziehung betreffenden Regeln. Verkauft also jemand Ware an einen Einkaufskommissionär, so haftet ihm auf den Kaufpreis nur der Kommissionär, nicht auch der Kommittent (TS 12 July 2006, RAJ 2006 (4) no. 4512 p. 10038; TS 4 July 2000, RAJ 2000 (4) no. 6678 p. 10221). "Ausgenommen" von der Grundregel, dass dem Dritten gegenüber nur die Zwischenperson verpflichtet ist, ist nach CC art. 1717(2) in fine allerdings "der Fall, in dem es sich um Sachen handelt, die dem Auftraggeber gehören". Was das genau bedeutet, ist nicht vollständig klar. Teilweise wird gesagt, dass die Vorschrift dem Dritten nur dann einen Direktanspruch gegen den principal geben will, wenn der Dritte von der Vertretung Kenntnis erlangt hat (Díez-Picazo and Gullón loc.cit. 581). TS 4 July 2000 loc.cit. stimmt damit zumindest insoweit überein, dass dort ein Vertragsanspruch gegen die Zwischenperson (die mangelhaftes Olivenöl des principal verkauft hatte) gewährt wurde, ohne zugleich eine Klage gegen den principal zur Voraussetzung zu erheben. CA Barcelona 24 April 2003, BDA JUR 2003/254230 dealt with a restitutionary claim between a principal and a third party arising out of termination of a contract: P agreed with I that I would try to sell P's motorbike in I's motorbikes' shop; I would get a benefit of the sale price. I managed to sell the motorbike to T. Afterwards, T, however, terminated the sales contract as the seller did not provide him with the necessary license to run the motorbike. Therefore, T returned the motorbike to I, who returned it, in turn, to P. To get the money paid for the motorbike, T brought a claim against P. This direct claim was admitted on the basis of CC art. 1717(2) in fine. Im Übrigen verbleibt es aber für die Rückabwicklung nichtiger oder angefochtener Verträge bei der Grundregel des CC art. 1303, wonach nur die Vertragsparteien (intermediary and third party), nicht aber außenstehende Personen (wie der principal) das Geleistete zurückfordern können (TS 27 March 1963, RAJ 1963 (1) no. 2121 p. 1313; Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán, Las nulidades de los contratos, 237). Es gibt allerdings Bestrebungen im Schrifttum, diese strikte Regel jedenfalls durch eine entsprechende Anwendung von CC art. 1717(2) in fine abzuschwächen (Díez-Picazo/Roca Trias/Morales, Los Principios del Derecho Europeo de Contratos, 214-217; Fernández Gregoraci, ADC 2002, 1717, 1742-1749).

3. In ITALY kommt es jeweils darauf an zu bestimmen, wem eine Zahlung (Leistung) juristisch zuzurechnen ist, nicht darauf, wer sie tatsächlich erbracht bzw. erhalten hat oder aus wessen Vermögen sie stammt. Bei der echten Stellvertretung findet die Rückabwicklung also im Verhältnis principal/Dritter, bei der indirekten Stellvertretung im Verhältnis intermediary/Dritter statt (Breccia, Il pagamento dell'indebito, 944-945; Cass. 27 May 1995, no. 5926, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, 1094; Cass. 19 July 2004, no. 13357, Giust.civ.Mass.2004, fasc. 7-8; Cass 23 July 2004, no. 13829, Giust.civ.Mass.2004, fasc. 7-8). Auch in AUSTRIA stellen Lehre und Rechtsprechung auf die rechtliche Leistungsbeziehung ab; sie legt die Parteien des Bereicherungsausgleichs fest (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB II(3)[3], vor § 1431 no. 11). Die Frage, auf welche Rechtsbeziehung geleistet werden sollte, wird aus der Sicht des Zuwendungsempfängers beurteilt (OGH 31 January 1985, SZ 58/19; str.). Bei der echten Stellvertretung ist der Vertretene der Kondiktionsgegner (OGH 24 October 1990, SZ 63/189). Hat ein falsus procurator in fremdem Namen gehandelt, war er aber zur Entgegennahme der Leistung nicht berechtigt, so haftet nur er unter CC § 1041 (Unger, ÖBA 2002, 606). Dasselbe gilt, wenn ein Vertreter eine Leistung für sich und im eigenen Namen annimmt (OGH 24 September 1995, SZ 68/174).

4. PORTUGUESE CC arts. 1180-1184 regeln die indirekte Stellvertretung (Vertragsschluss im eigenen Namen aber für Rechnung eines anderen) im Rahmen des Rechts des Auftragsvertrages. Dieses Regime des mandato sem representação findet auch auf den Kommissionsvertrag Anwendung (Ccom art. 267; see Neto, Código Comercial Anotado[12], note 1 to art. 267, p. 151); es spielt ferner im Recht der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag eine Rolle (CC art. 471). Ein im eigenen Namen handelnder mandatário sem representação erwirbt alle Rechte und trägt alle Pflichten aus dem von ihm geschlossenen Vertrag (CC art. 1180). Er muss aber das Erworbene auf den mandante übertragen (CC art. 1181), der seinerseits den mandatário entschädigt bzw. von den eingegangenen Verpflichtungen freistellt (CC art. 1182). Nur der mandatário ist legitimiert, die Rechte aus dem Vertrag mit dem Dritten geltend zu machen; nur ihm, nicht dem mandante stehen auch die aus der Ungültigkeit eines solchen Vertrages folgenden Restitutionsansprüche zu (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado II[3], note 3 to art. 1180, p. 746).

5. Hat jemand (etwa Kommissionär) im eigenen Namen, aber auf fremde Rechnung kontrahiert, so ist, falls dieser Vertrag unwirksam ist, auch unter GERMAN law ein Bereicherungsausgleich zwischen dem Prinzipal (dem Kommittenten) und dem Vertragspartner des Kommissionärs ausgeschlossen. Die Rückabwicklung erfolgt vielmehr im Leistungsverhältnis, d.h. zwischen Kommissionär und Drittem. Letzterer kann seine Leistung an den Kommissionär nicht beim Kommittenten kondizieren (Staudinger [-S. Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 812, no. 33; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 812, no. 47). Ein Anspruch gegen den Letzteren ließe sich nur begründen, wenn man in Analogie zu CC § 822 eine Versionsklage zuließe, was aber von der ganz herrschenden Meinung abgelehnt wird (Erman [-Westermann and Buck-Heeb], BGB II[12], § 812, no. 18, § 822, no. 1; Reuter and Martinek, Ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung, § 13 II; Koppensteiner and Kramer, Ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung[2], § 5 III).

6. Das derzeit noch gültige HUNGARIAN Zivilgesetzbuch regelt zwar die Kommission, nicht aber die mittelbare Stellvertretung im allgemeinen (was sich in Zukunft ändern soll: http://www.parlament.hu/irom38/05949/05949.pdf). Schon heute aber gilt, dass aus Verträgen mit dem Dritten nur der zwar für fremde Rechnung, aber im eigenen Namen handelnde sogen. mittelbare Stellvertreter berechtigt und verpflichtet wird (see – im Zusammenhang des Kommissionsrechts – CC §§ 507, 509(1) und 513). Auch im Falle der Ungültigkeit eines Kaufvertrages zwischen Kommissionär und Drittem wird der Vertrag nur zwischen diesen beiden Personen rückabgewickelt; ein Direktanspruch gegen den Kommittenten scheidet aus (BH 2003/248). Dieses Ergebnis wird auch durch den Umstand erhärtet, dass die Rückabwicklung unwirksamer Verträge nach ungarischer Rechtsauffassung ein Stück Vertragsrecht ist (ausführlich und mit Hinweisen zu teilweise abweichenden Stimmen Petrik [-Köles], Polgári jog III, 794/5). Die Regel, dass die Rückabwicklung eines Kommissionsgeschäftes zwischen den Vertragsparteien, d.h. zwischen Kommissionär und Drittem zu erfolgen hat, gilt auch in BULGARIA. Der Vertretene kann die vom mittelbaren Vertreter erworbenen Rechte nur geltend machen, wenn sie ihm von Letzterem übertragen worden sind; andernfalls kommt dem Kommittenten gegen den Dritten auch kein Anspruch aus condictio indebiti zu.

7. Bei der echten oder direkten Stellvertretung treffen die Folgen des Rechtsgeschäfts auch unter DUTCH law unmittelbar den Vertretenen (CC art. 3:66(1)). Er allein ist deshalb auch Inhaber einer Forderung aus ungeschuldeter Leistung (onverschuldigde betaling). Der Vertreter selber kann einen Anspruch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung (ongerechtvaardigde verrijking) haben, allerdings nur in dem seltenen Fall, dass das Geleistete aus seinem eigenen Vermögen stammt und er auch nicht über einen Ausgleichsanspruch gegenüber dem Prinzipal verfügt. Handelt jemand im vermeintlichen Auftrag eines Prinzipals zur Erfüllung einer vermeintlichen Schuld des Prinzipals gegenüber dem Dritten, so soll sich der Zahlende auf einen Irrtum über das Bestehen einer Vollmacht berufen können, der ihn berechtigt, als im Rechtssinne unbefugter Vertreter direkt bei dem Dritten zu kondizieren (Schoordijk, Onverschuldigde betaling, 132). Nimmt ein befugter Vertreter im Namen seines Prinzipals eine onverschuldigde betaling an, so trifft der Rückforderungsanspruch allein den Prinzipal (CC art. 3:66 i.V.m. art. 6:203). Eine Haftung des Vertreters aus ongerechtvaardigde verrijking ist zwar theoretisch denkbar, wird aber in aller Regel am Fehlen einer Bereicherung scheitern; der Dritte hat nur die Möglichkeit, die sich noch beim Vertreter befindlichen Sachen im Wege des Arrestes (derdenbeslag) zu sichern (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 810). Bei der indirekten oder mittelbaren Stellvertretung, bei der die Zwischenperson im eigenen Namen handelt, ist früher ein Direktanspruch des Prinzipals gegen den Dritten aus onverschuldigde betaling befürwortet worden. Es zeigte sich jedoch (insbesondere im Kontext von HR 11 November 1955, NedJur 1957, no. 605 p. 1185 und HR 10 January 1969, NedJur 1969, no. 190 p. 469), dass hierdurch betrügerisches Handeln erleichtert wurde. Seit der Reform des Zivilgesetzbuches im Jahre 1992 gilt deshalb auch in den Niederlanden die Regel, dass Leistungen durch einen indirekten Stellvertreter nur ihm zugerechnet und folglich auch nur von ihm als ungeschuldet i.S.v. CC art. 6:203 zurückgefordert werden können. Der Prinzipal kann höchstens dann (aus ongerechtvaardigde verrijking) direkt gegen den Dritten vorgehen, wenn der Prinzipal einen Schaden erlitten und im Verhältnis zur Zwischenperson einen Anspruch auf dasjenige hat, was ihr aus CC art. 6:203 gegenüber dem Dritten zusteht. Eine solche Konstruktion ist freilich in der Lehre keineswegs unumstritten, weil sie eine Vielzahl neuer Abgrenzungsprobleme heraufbeschwört, insbesondere zu der Regelung in CC art. 6:30 (Leistung durch Dritte) (näher Schoordijk loc.cit. 136; Scheltema, Verbintenissenrecht II, art. 203, note 10). Diskutiert wird auch, dass der Prinzipal aus ongerechtvaardigde verrijking gegen den Empfänger vorgehen kann, wenn die Zwischenperson insolvent geworden ist. Im Falle eines Kommissionsvertrages zwischen Mittelsperson und Prinzipal ist der Kommissionär dem Kommittenten gegenüber verpflichtet, die Forderung aus onverschuldigde betaling im Interesse des Kommittenten einzuklagen; tut er das nicht, kann der Kommittent die Forderung des Kommissionärs aus CC art. 6:203 durch schriftliche Mitteilung an Kommissionär und Dritten auf sich überleiten (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 809; Schoordijk loc.cit.; Scheltema loc.cit.). Nimmt ein mittelbarer Stellvertreter eine Leistung in eigenem Namen für den Prinzipal an, so ist die Klage aus ungeschuldeter Leistung wiederum allein gegen den mittelbaren Stellvertreter zu richten HR 10 Januar 1969 loc. cit.). Hat der mittelbare Stellvertreter das Empfangene aber bereits an den Prinzipal ausgekehrt, so haftet dieser dem Dritten aus ongerechtvaardigde verrijking.

8. Under ESTONIAN law besteht ein Anspruch auf Rückabwicklung eines unwirksamen Vertrages nur zwischen den Parteien dieses Vertrages. LOA § 1028(1) macht das deutlich, indem die Vorschrift den Bereicherungsausgleich auf die an der Leistungsbeziehung beteiligten Personen beschränkt. Es kommt also darauf an, ob die Mittelsperson mit Vertretungsmacht in fremdem oder nur für fremde Rechnung aber im eigenen Namen handelt. Im letzteren Fall stehen auch evtl. Bereicherungsansprüche allein der Mittelsperson zu.

VII.–4:103: Debtor's performance to a non-creditor; onward transfer in good faith

(1) An enrichment is also attributable to another's disadvantage where a debtor confers the enrichment on the enriched person and as a result the disadvantaged person loses a right against the debtor to the same or a like enrichment.

(2) Paragraph (1) applies in particular where a person who is obliged to the disadvantaged person to reverse an unjustified enrichment transfers it to a third person in circumstances in which the debtor has a defence under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment).

COMMENTS

A. General

Overview. This Article adds further content to the requirement of the basic rule that the enrichment be attributable to the claimant's disadvantage by providing for a further instance in which that requirement can be said to be satisfied. It is concerned with the case where the enriched person obtains from a third person something which the disadvantaged person should have obtained. In other words, the performance of the third person is misdirected or intercepted or the third person has innocently forwarded to the enriched person that which was due to be restored to the disadvantaged person. The rule stated presupposes a debtor performing to someone other than the creditor which (in given circumstances) has the result that the debtor is discharged. By this means the payee obtains the fruits of the claim (against the debtor) which the creditor has lost.

A particular instance of attribution. The wording of paragraph (1) ("also") makes it clear that this Article merely adds another case in which attribution is made out. (For general comments on the notion of attribution and the non-exhaustive nature of the provisions in Chapter 4, see Comment A on VII.–4:101 (Instances of attribution)). In this context it is important to note than an e contrario interpretation is compelling, as the following comments outline: in comparable cases in which the requirements of this Article are not satisfied, the assumption must be that the enrichment is not attributable to the disadvantage.

B. The disadvantaged person's loss of a right against the third person

General. This Article applies only if the claimant has lost a right against the third person in respect of the benefit gained by the enriched person. The decisive factor is whether the disadvantaged person's claim against the debtor is extinguished. On the other hand, it is immaterial for these purposes whether or not the enriched person can be regarded as having used the disadvantaged person's claim.

Partial loss of a right. The required loss of a right need not be entire. A diminution or reduction in the extent of a right is a partial loss of a right and may be connected to an enrichment in accordance with this Article. Where the third party has rendered a partial performance to the enriched person and is partially liberated from the obligation to the claimant, the enrichment of that person will be attributable to the pro tanto disadvantage of the claimant so as to bring this Article into play.

Rules protective of a third party. Loss of a claim against a third person may arise, for example, because of the operation of protective rules intended to ensure that a debtor acting in good faith is liberated from the debt, even though the performance has been to the wrong party.

Illustration 1
E makes an immediate assignment to D of a debt due to E from X. Notwithstanding that no notice of the assignment has yet been given to X, the assignment is effective to transfer to D the right which E has against X: III.–5:114 (When assignment takes place) paragraph (1) and III.–5:113 (New creditor). X pays E the sum due on the debt before notice of the assignment can be given to X. X is discharged, notwithstanding that X has paid the assignor rather than the assignee, because X had no knowledge of the assignment: III.–5:119 (Performance to person who is not the creditor) paragraph (1). Accordingly D loses the claim against X and is disadvantaged by a decrease in assets. E is enriched by an increase in assets (the money received from X). E's enrichment is attributable to D's disadvantage under this Article.

Illustration 2
W makes an immediate assignment to D of a debt due to W from X. No notice of the assignment is given to X, but the assignment is nonetheless effective to transfer the claim. Notwithstanding this assignment, W subsequently makes another immediate assignment to E. E gives X notice of this (second) assignment. X, who has no knowledge of the earlier assignment, performs to E. E has priority over D by virtue of prior notification to the debtor (III.–5:121 (Competition between successive assignees) paragraph (1)). Accordingly X is discharged by paying E: III.–5:121 (Competition between successive assignees) paragraph (2). D's right to performance is extinguished. Consequently E's enrichment (receipt of X's performance) is attributable to D's disadvantage (loss of a right against X). However, the fact the enrichment is attributable to the disadvantage does not answer the question whether the enrichment is unjustified or whether E has a defence under Chapter 6.

Illustration 3
D is a holder of certain bearer securities, on presentation of which X is liable to pay a fixed sum. The securities are taken by E who uses them to obtain payment from X. As X has paid in good faith to the holder of the bearer securities, X's debt to D is extinguished. E has been enriched by making use of D's asset (the securities). E's enrichment is attributable to D's disadvantage under this paragraph: E has obtained a sum from X (which was due to D) in circumstances where D has lost the right against X.

Illustration 4
W has died leaving his estate to trustees X1 and X2 on trust for his deceased nephew's children in equal shares. Two of the children, E1 and E2, are personally known to the trustees. However, the trustees X1 and X2 recognise it is possible there are also children of whose existence they do not know. The trustees make appropriate advertisements in order to solicit claims. As no responses are forthcoming, they distribute the estate on the footing that E1 and E2 alone are entitled. In fact, the nephew had also fathered child D, who sometime later gains knowledge of her great uncle's disposition. Although the trustees X1 and X2 were obliged to distribute a one-third share to D, the effect of the measures taken by the trustees X1 and X2 in accordance with the rules of the applicable trust law is to provide them with a complete defence to any claim by D. The distribution by the trustees X1 and X2 of D's share to E1 and E2 has had the effect of destroying D's right against X1 and X2. As to one-third each E1 and E2 have obtained an enrichment which is attributable under this paragraph to D's disadvantage in her loss of rights against the trustees X1 and X2 (the third parties).

Illustration 5
D is entitled to the estate of a deceased person, which includes a claim against X, a debtor of the deceased. Nonetheless E succeeds in obtaining a certificate of inheritance for that estate and on the strength of the certificate collects payment of the debt from X. Because of the special effect of a certificate of inheritance, X is regarded as a matter of law as having discharged his debt to the deceased's successor, even though E was not entitled to the debt. E's enrichment (in obtaining the proceeds of D's claim against X) is attributable to D's disadvantage (in losing the claim).

Third party performing binding instructions. The provision may also apply where directions are given as to the destination of certain assets. The essential elements are that the claimant, in exercise of a right to designate the destination of an asset, gives a direction to a the third person (who is obliged to implement that instruction) in favour of the recipient, the third person duly implements the instruction and the recipient is accordingly benefited. Typical cases are where a bank is directed by a customer to make a bank transfer or where a seller of goods who is obliged to deliver to the purchaser's order is required to deliver them to another. In each case the claimant has given a binding instruction to the third person to enrich the recipient which the third person, in discharge of its obligation to the claimant, has implemented. As a result the claimant loses a right to the enrichment which is correspondingly gained by the recipient.

Illustration 6
D, a purchaser of goods, agrees with X, the vendor, that X will deliver the goods to D or such other person as D nominates. D sends a fax to X instructing X to deliver to E. In fact D intended the goods to be delivered to Y and inserted E's name on the fax by mistake. X discharges its obligation under the contract of sale by delivering to E in accordance with the faxed instruction from D. E is enriched by the delivery and this is attributable to D's loss of rights of performance against X which X has extinguished by performance to E. The case would be otherwise if the mistake in delivering to E rather than Y was that of X since in that case X would not discharge its obligation to D (to deliver to Y). In that case D would not lose the right to performance vis-à-vis Y; there would be no decrease in assets for D and thus D would sustain no disadvantage.

Disappointed expectation insufficient. There can be no attribution of enrichment to disadvantage if the claimant had no right against the third person to an enrichment: a disappointed expectation of benefit does not in any case amount to a disadvantage because the frustration of an expectation is not a loss of an asset.

Illustration 7
Intending to make a gift to his friend D, X delivers an envelope by hand to the home of E, D's neighbour, by mistake. D has no claim against E. Although D has not obtained the money which X intended for him, E's enrichment is attributable to the disadvantage of X, not D. X has sustained a decrease in assets in that it was his money which has been lost. D has not lost any right against X to the money: assuming that X had not bound himself to make the gift, D had no right to be given the money, and in any case in these circumstances a defective performance by X of a binding promise of donation would not extinguish D's right to performance of the promise.

Illustration 8
X engages Y to draft her will according to specified instructions. As a result of a mistake by Y, X's will omits a legacy to her friend D. X executes the will in the erroneous assumption that the will gives full effect to her wishes and subsequently dies. The money which X intended to leave to D passes under the will to X's cousin, E. Since D never had any right to any legacy and had only a hope that X would remember him in her will, D has suffered no disadvantage. E's enrichment in acquiring the legacy is therefore not attributable to any disadvantage of D. Any rights which D has will lie outside the law of unjustified enrichment. D may be entitled under the law of succession to have X's will corrected to give effect to X's true intentions. If that is not the case, then it may be that D has a claim in the law of obligations against Y on the basis that D's frustrated expectation constitutes an actionable damage caused by Y. It will be up to the law of contract to determine whether any claim against Y exists on the basis that D is entitled to damages for loss caused by Y's non-performance of the contractual obligation to X to prepare a will according to X's intent, D being seen as a third party in whose favour Y and X impliedly agreed that Y should be obliged to render performance. (See II.–9:301 (Basic rules) and II.–9:302 (Rights, remedies and defences)). It will be up to the law of non-contractual liability for damage caused to another to determine whether D has suffered a legally relevant damage which can be regarded as caused by Y's failure to exercise reasonable care in the preparation of the will. (See especially VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (1)(c): "violation of an interest worthy of legal protection").

Subsistence of right precludes application without ratification. Equally, the Article cannot apply if the claimant has such a right and has not lost it. Without loss of a right there is no disadvantage and thus there can be no question of attribution in relation to the enrichment. In such cases, however, the claimant can bring the Article into operation by ratification: see further VII.–4:104 (Ratification of debtor's performance to a non-creditor).

Illustration 9
X, a debtor of D, is induced by the fraud of E to pay to E sums due to D, E pretending to be collecting the debt on D's behalf. E's enrichment is not attributable to any disadvantage of D. Although X has paid in good faith, X is not discharged from liability to D and is still obliged to perform to D. Since D still has the right against X, D has sustained no disadvantage. E's enrichment is attributable to the disadvantage of X, who paid E as a result of the fraud. The case is otherwise only if D ratifies X's payment to E: see further VII.–4:104 (Ratification of debtor's performance to a non-creditor).

Illustration 10
D has a life insurance policy with the X company. Under the terms of the insurance contract D is entitled to make a unilateral and revocable nomination of a beneficiary to whom X may pay the proceeds of the policy on D's death. D makes such a nomination in favour of E. Subsequently D revokes the nomination without making a new one, so that X remains contractually obliged to pay the proceeds on D's death to D's successors. On D's death, X fails to notice the revocation and pays the proceeds of the policy to E. D's successors have no claim under the law of unjustified enrichment against E. The payment by X to E has not discharged X's obligation under the insurance contract to pay D's successors. D's successors have not lost any right and so have not suffered any disadvantage to which E's enrichment is attributable. The case is otherwise only if D's successors ratify X's payment to E: see further VII.–4:104 (Ratification of debtor's performance to a non-creditor).

Illustration 11
X, a bank, makes a transfer to E's account at the Y bank and debits the sum transferred from D's account. However, D had given no instructions for such a bank transfer, the bank having made a mistake on the basis of an instruction from a different customer. (The situation would be the same if D had given instructions for a transfer which were duly countermanded and X made the transfer in oversight or if X had duplicated a single authorised transfer by mistake.) D has no claim against E. D has not lost any rights; D is entitled under the contract with X to a correction of D's bank account. X was not obliged to D to make the payment and it is therefore X who has suffered a disadvantage to which E's enrichment is attributable.

Reduction in value of right insufficient. The mere fact that a claim against the third party has depreciated in value as a result of the third party benefiting the enriched person is not sufficient to bring this Article into play. A depreciation of the claim is not a disadvantage to which the enrichment is attributable. The claimant in such a case has not suffered the requisite decrease in assets because he or she is still able to enforce the right against the third party. This corresponds with the basic principle in VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) and VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage) that a mere change in value of an asset does not amount to an enrichment or disadvantage, as the case may be (see Comment B on those Articles).

Illustration 12
X, who owes D € 1 million and other creditors € 2 million, pays € 1 million to E, meaning to put the money beyond the reach of all creditors. Immediately following this payment X is declared bankrupt. As a consequence of the transfer and subsequent insolvency, D's right against X has become virtually worthless. E's enrichment, however, is not attributable to a disadvantage of D. Before the transfer D had a right to payment from X. That right continued to exist after the transfer to E; the effect of the transfer was merely to make performance improbable and thus to devalue D's claim. D has no claim against E in the law of unjustified enrichment. D's redress lies in the law on bankruptcy in setting aside X's payment to E, so as to bring that sum back into the patrimony available for X's creditors and thus to enhance the value of D's right to a proportionate share of the insolvent estate of X.

Effect of insolvency of debtor. The proper response of the legal system in a case such as the last is to ensure that any improper disposition by the third party is reversed in favour of the creditors generally. This is a matter for bankruptcy law, not the law of unjustified enrichment. To hold otherwise would mean that the law of unjustified enrichment might be used by creditors to circumvent the bankruptcy law restrictions on when pre-bankruptcy dispositions may be reversed.

Incurring a debt as an alternative to loss of a right. The Article may apply for the analogous case where, instead of losing a right against a debtor, a person sustains a disadvantage in coming under an obligation to a third party as a result of that third party conferring an enrichment on the enriched person.

C. In particular: onward transfer in good faith: paragraph (2)

Onward transfer as specific application. Paragraph (2) relates to a specific case which falls within the terms of the rule in paragraph (1), but which is made explicit because its deduction from that rule is not transparent. It relates to the case where a person has obtained an unjustified enrichment and then disposed of it in circumstances where the defence of change of position provided for by VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment) will be available. In essence, this is the case where the enriched person is in good faith (in obtaining and disposing of the enrichment) and the disposition is gratuitous. Precisely because the end recipient of the enrichment has received a gratuitous benefit which, in a sense, it was not the enriched person's to give away (since the enriched person was liable under this Book to return it), the end recipient in turn comes under a liability to make restitution. The effect of the disposition by the originally enriched person has been to destroy the disadvantaged person's claim against that first recipient and at the same time to enrich the end recipient: the end recipient's enrichment is attributable to the disadvantaged person's loss of the claim against the originally enriched person.

NOTES

I. Grundfall: Bereicherungsausgleich bei schuldbefreiender Leistung an einen vermeintlichen Gläubiger

1. Unter FRENCH CC art. 1690(1) ist eine Zession Dritten gegenüber nur im Falle der Abtretungsanzeige an den Schuldner wirksam; der Schuldner kann den Zessionar außerdem durch eine in öffentlicher Urkunde erfolgende Annahme "in den Besitz" der Forderung setzen (CC art. 1690(2)). Ohne Anzeige und Annahme wirkt die Zession nur zwischen Zedent und Zessionar (Cass.civ. 12 June 1985, Bull.civ. 1985, III, no. 95, RTD civ 1986. 350, obs. Mestre). Unter BELGIAN CC art. 1690 (i.d.F. des Gesetzes of 6 July 1994) ist die Abtretungsanzeige nur erforderlich, um der Zession dem Schuldner gegenüber Wirksamkeit zu verleihen; im Verhältnis zu anderen Dritten ist die Zession dagegen grundsätzlich auch ohne Abtretungsanzeige wirksam. Allerdings wirkt eine Zession solchen Gläubigern des Zedenten gegenüber nicht, an welche der Schuldner schon vor der Abtretungsanzeige wirksam geleistet hat. Die Zession stellt sich in beiden Rechtsordnungen als ein Vertrag dar, und zwar, je nach den Umständen, entweder als ein Kaufvertrag, eine Schenkung oder eine dation en paiement (eine Schuldtilgung mit einem anderen als dem ursprünglich geschuldeten Gegenstand) (Bénabent, Les obligations[10], no. 727; de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge IV(1)[3], no. 372). Unter CC art. 1135 verpflichten Verträge zu allem, was die Billigkeit, die Gepflogenheit und das Gesetz der eingegangenen Verbindlichkeit ihrer Natur nach beimessen. Daraus wiederum kann abgeleitet werden, dass ein Zedent, der von dem Schuldner bezahlt worden ist, vertraglich verpflichtet sein kann, das Empfangene unmittelbar an den Zessionar weiterzuleiten. In Fällen, in welchen es zwischen wahren Gläubiger und einem Scheingläubiger an einem Vertrag fehlt, kommt dagegen in erster Linie ein Schadenersatzanspruch des wahren Gläubigers gegen den Scheingläubiger in Betracht. Nach French CC art. 730-5 haftet auf Schadenersatz, wer wissentlich und bösgläubig einen unrichtigen Erbschein geltend macht. Die Haftung des Nichtberechtigten gegenüber dem Berechtigten folgt CC art. 1382. Cass.civ. 13 July 1974, pourvoi no. 73-10393, Bull.civ. 1974, III, no. 280 p. 212 bestätigt das insoweit, als hiernach die Verletzung der Pflicht, die Rechtsverhältnisse an einem Grundstück im Register korrekt zu veröffentlichen, dem

Rechtsinhaber die Möglichkeit gibt, den Unberechtigten bzw. den Scheingläubiger auf Schadenersatz aus CC art. 1382 in Anspruch zu nehmen.

2. Auch in SPAIN stellt sich die Zession als ein schuldrechtlicher Vertrag und der Forderungsübergang als eine Folge dieses Vertrages dar. Die einschlägigen Regeln findet man deshalb vorwiegend im Recht des Kaufvertrages (CC arts. 1528-1536). Eine echte Abtretung i.S. eines vom Schuldgrund abgelösten Verfügungsgeschäftes kennt das spanische Recht nicht (Pantaleón Prieto, ADC 1988, 1033, 1034-1038; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 805-806). Während die Übereignung beweglicher Sachen auf dem titulus and modus System aufbaut, setzt an assignment of claims lediglich eine Vereinbarung zwischen den Parteien voraus (Pantaleón Prieto loc.cit. 1060). Auch eine Benachrichtigung des Schuldners ist zum Forderungsübergang nicht erforderlich (TS 26 March 2007, RAJ 2007 (2) no. 2347 p. 5580 at FJ 2); CC art. 1527 sagt lediglich, dass der Schuldner befreit ist, wenn er den Gläubiger befriedigt, bevor er von der Abtretung Kenntnis erlangt (see für den Fall der Aufrechnung auch CC art. 1198). Zwar ist gelegentlich behauptet worden, dass fehlende Benachrichtigung des Schuldners die (relative) Unwirksamkeit der Abtretung ihm gegenüber zur Folge habe (see, for instance, CA Barcelona, 22 April 1999, BDA AC 1999/889), doch lässt sich diese Auffassung aus dem Gesetz nicht begründen (Pantaleón Prieto loc.cit. 1064-1065). CC art. 1527 geht über CC art. 1164 (see below) insoweit noch hinaus, als im Rahmen von CC art. 1527 den assignee die Beweislast für die Kenntnis des Schuldners trifft (TS 30 July 1994, RAJ 1994 (3) no. 6308 p. 8053). Der Schuldner, der gutgläubig an einen Scheingläubiger geleistet hat, kann auf den ihm von CC art. 1527 gewährten Schutz aber auch verzichten und von dem assignor (dem jetzigen Scheingläubiger) Rückzahlung des Geleisteten nach den Regeln der condictio indebiti (CC arts. 1895 ff) verlangen bzw. mit dem entsprechenden Anspruch aufrechnen (TS 26 March 2007 loc.cit.; TS 20 February 1995, RAJ 1995 (1) no. 887 p. 1237). In welcher Form der assignee gegen den assignor an unjustified enrichment claim geltend machen kann, ist nicht völlig klar. Es kann sich entweder um die allgemeine Klage aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung oder um eine condictio arising out of interference with another's assets handeln (hierfür insbesondere Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 127; Miquel González, Enriquecimiento injustificado, 127), die ihrerseits auf CC art. 360 zurückgeführt wird. Es wird aber auch vorgeschlagen, dass der assignee in entsprechender Anwendung von CC art. 1186 im Wege der Subrogation die condictio indebiti des Schuldners gegen den Scheingläubiger erwirbt (Pantaleón Prieto loc.cit. 1068); dasselbe soll im Falle einer doble cesión (as in illustration 2 above) gelten (Pantaleón Prieto loc.cit. 1084). Unter dem schon erwähnten CC art. 1164 ist ein Schuldner befreit, wenn er gutgläubig an den Besitzer einer Forderung leistet. "Besitzer einer Forderung" im Sinne dieser Vorschrift ist jeder, der den Rechtsschein erweckt, ihr Inhaber zu sein (Bercovitz Rodríguez-Cano [-Bercovitz Rodríguez-Cano], Comentarios al Código Civil[2], 1406). CC art. 1164 sagt aber nichts zu den Ansprüchen des wahren Gläubigers gegen den Scheingläubiger. Die Gerichte scheinen sie auf die allgemeine Klage wegen ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung zu stützen (e.g. CA Santa Cruz de Tenerife 23 May 2007, BDA JUR 2007/287536 and CA Valladolid 7 July 1998, BDA AC 1998/6217 [obiter]). Dass der wahre Gläubiger einen unjustified enrichment claim gegen den Scheingläubiger habe, entspricht auch der herrschenden Auffassung im Schrifttum (Bercovitz Rodríguez-Cano loc.cit.; Albaladejo [-Bercovitz and Valladares], Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales XVI(1)[2], 103). Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II, 139 meinen zwar, es handele sich um eine condictio indebiti (Subrogation in die Rechte des Schuldners), doch ist für eine Subrogation in einem solchen Fall weder eine gesetzliche Grundlage ersichtlich (Bercovitz and Valladares loc.cit. 103) noch dürfte dem Schuldner in diesen Fällen (anders als in den Fällen des CC art. 1527) überhaupt ein Rückforderungsrecht zustehen. TS 11 March 1964, RAJ 1964 (1) no. 1367 p. 1367 hat zwar den Anspruch des wahren Gläubigers gegen den Scheingläubiger einmal sowohl auf condictio indebiti als auch auf negotiorum gestio gestützt, doch ist die dogmatische Bedeutung dieses Urteils nur schwer zu gewichten. Nach den neueren Entwicklungen im spanischen Bereicherungsrecht lässt sich im Übrigen auch zu CC art. 1164 die Ansicht vertreten, der wahre Gläubiger habe gegen den Scheingläubiger eine condictio based on interference with another's assets.

3. ITALIAN CC art. 1264 knüpft die Wirksamkeit einer Abtretung dem Schuldner gegenüber an seine Zustimmung oder daran, dass ihm eine Abtretungsanzeige zugestellt worden ist. Von einem Schuldner, der noch vor dem Zugang der Abtretungsanzeige an den Zedenten zahlt, wird aber nur widerleglich vermutet, dass er gutgläubig zahlte; er ist folglich dann nicht befreit, wenn der Zessionar beweist, dass der Schuldner im Leistungszeitpunkt bereits Kenntnis von der Abtretung hatte (Cass. 21 December 2005, no. 28300, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 12). Anderen Personen gegenüber wirkt die Abtretung nur, wenn sie ein sicheres Datum hat (CC art. 1265). Die Abtretung kann dem Schuldner sowohl durch den Zedenten als auch durch den Zessionar angezeigt werden; den Schuldner trifft in der zweiten Alternative allerdings die Obliegenheit, sich der Korrektheit der Anzeige zu vergewissern. Ob das Recht, Erfüllung zu verlangen, unbeschadet der Schuldnerschutzvorschriften grundsätzlich bereits mit der Abtretung (und nicht erst mit der Abtretungsanzeige) auf den Zessionar übergeht, ist umstritten (dafür Cass. 2 February 2001, no. 1510, Giust.civ. 2001, I, 1856; Cass. 21 January 2005, no. 1312, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 1; dagegen Cass. 26 April 2004, no. 7919, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 4; Cass. 21 December 2005, no. 28300, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 12; Cass. 16 June 2006, no. 13954, Giust.civ.Mass. 2006, fasc. 6); im Schrifttum wird die Auffassung bevorzugt, dass sich die Übertragungswirkung zwischen den Parteien bereits unmittelbar mit dem Vertragsschluss einstellt (näher Bianca, Diritto civile IV, 583-585). Der Zessionar hat gegen den Zedenten, an welchen der Schuldner gutgläubig und deshalb befreiend geleistet hat, einen Ausgleichsanspruch, der teils unmittelbar auf die Regeln über die Rückforderung des Nichtgeschuldeten, teils auf eine Analogie zu ihnen gestützt wird (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], sub art. 2033, IV, § 2). Je nach den Umständen wird außerdem eine Vertrags- bzw. eine Deliktshaftung des accipiens erwogen (Perlingieri, Della cessione dei crediti, 220; (Cendon [-Bianca], Commentario al codice civile IV(1), sub art. 1264, § 5).

4. Zahlt ein Schuldner an den Zedenten, bevor er von der Zession Kenntnis hatte (CC art. 583), so ist der Schuldner auch unter PORTUGUESE law befreit und der Zedent ungerechtfertigt bereichert (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], note 1 under art. 473, p. 455). Den Anspruch auf Ausgleich dieser ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung hat der Zessionar (id., note 4 to art. 476, p. 463; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 478; STJ 24 June 2004, Processo 03B3105). Die theoretische Ableitung dieses unbestrittenen Ergebnisses bereitet freilich einige Schwierigkeiten (näher Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 591). Für den Sonderfall, dass neben dem Bürgen auch der Schuldner (ohne Kenntnis von der Leistung des Bürgen) den Gläubiger bezahlt, sieht CC art. 645 einen Bereicherungsanspruch des Bürgen gegen den Gläubiger vor. Es handelt sich dabei aber nicht um einen Anspruch aus ungeschuldeter Leistung, weil der Bürge im Zeitpunkt seiner Zahlung zu ihr (noch) verpflichtet war (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela loc. cit. note 2 under art. 645, p. 663). Im Falle der Leistung an den Zedenten werden sowohl eine Leistungs- als auch eine Eingriffsbereicherung diskutiert (Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 599, fn. 1652). Ein allgemeines Prinzip der schuldbefreienden Wirkung von an Scheingläubiger geleisteten Zahlungen kennt das portugiesische Recht im Übrigen nicht (Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 156, fn. 308).

5. Under GERMAN CC § 816(2) ist, wenn an einen Nichtberechtigten eine Leistung bewirkt wird, die dem Berechtigten gegenüber wirksam ist, der Nichtberechtigte dem Berechtigten zur Herausgabe des Geleisteten verpflichtet. Es handelt sich um einen besonders geregelten Fall der sogen. Eingriffskondiktion (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 816, no. 20). Der Eingriff liegt in der Annahme der Leistung durch einen Nichtberechtigten (Erman [-Westermann and Buck-Heeb], BGB II[12], § 816, no. 14). Voraussetzung ist, dass der Schuldner trotz Zahlung an den falschen Gläubiger von der Leistungspflicht befreit wird. Das ist normalerweise natürlich nicht der Fall (CC § 362(1)). Die wichtigste Ausnahme von dieser Grundregel findet sich in CC § 407(1), wonach ein Zessionar eine Leistung, die der Schuldner in Unkenntnis der Abtretung an den bisherigen Gläubiger bewirkt, gegen sich gelten lassen muss. Weitere Bespiele finden sich in CC §§ 566 c, 567 b, 581, 1056 und 2135. Es geht im Wesentlichen um Fälle, in denen der Schuldner (z.B. ein Mieter oder Pächter) keine Kenntnis von dem Gläubigerwechsel infolge einer Veräußerung des gemieteten oder gepachteten Gegenstandes hatte. Ein anderes Beispiel findet sich in CC § 851 (Sachbeschädigung; Deliktsschuldner zahlt an den Besitzer, den er ohne grobe Fahrlässigkeit für den Eigentümer der Sache hält).

6. Das HUNGARIAN Zivilgesetzbuch verfügt über eine German CC § 816(2) entsprechende Vorschrift nicht, weil das Problem zumindest teilweise zessionsrechtlich geregelt ist. Unter CC § 328(3) ist die Abtretung dem Schuldner anzuzeigen. Bis zu diesem Zeitpunkt ist der Schuldner berechtigt, an den Altgläubiger zu leisten; danach muss er an den Zessionar leisten, wenn die Anzeige vom Zedenten stammt (CC § 328(4)). Hat der Zessionar die Zession angezeigt, darf der Schuldner einen entsprechenden Nachweis verlangen (BH 2002/364); andernfalls handelt er auf eigene Gefahr (BH 2005/16) und trägt das Risiko, von dem angeblichen Zessionar das Geleistete aus ungeschuldeter Leistung zurück zu erhalten. Unter den Voraussetzungen von CC § 287 kann der Schuldner durch gerichtliche Hinterlegung des geschuldeten Geldbetrages erfüllen, bleibt aber verpflichtet, bei der Überwindung der Unsicherheiten hinsichtlich der Person des Gläubigers mitzuwirken (BH 2002/364; Petrik [-Bíró], Polgári jog II[2], 545). Auf Urkunden und Dokumente mit sog. 'öffentlicher Glaubwürdigkeit' kann sich der Schuldner bis zum Beweis des Gegenteils verlassen. Hat der Schuldner befreiend an den Zedenten geleistet, haftet dieser dem Zessionar aus CC § 330(1). Es handelt sich um eine bürgenähnliche Haftung, für die genügt, dass der Schuldner nicht mehr in Anspruch genommen werden kann (Vorschläge zur Reform dieser Regelung bei Vékás [-Gárdos], Szakértői Javaslat az új Polgári Törvénykönyv tervezetéhez, 847, 854). Hat der Schuldner befreiend an einen tatsächlich nicht legitimierten Zessionar geleistet (z.B. weil seine Scheinlegitimation auf einer für den Schuldner nicht erkennbaren Urkundenfälschung beruhte), so kommt eine Haftung des vermeintlichen Zessionars gegenüber dem wahren Gläubiger sowohl aus Delikt als auch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung in Betracht.

7. Zahlt ein Schuldner noch nach Zugang der Abtretungserklärung an den Zedenten, so kann er das Geleistete von ihm aus BULGARIAN LOA art. 55(1) (ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung) zurückfordern (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 583). Hat der Schuldner dagegen gutgläubig (ohne Kenntnis von der Zession, Kenntnis kann im Einzelfall schon vor Zugang der Abtretungsanzeige vorliegen: Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast[4], 496) an den Zedenten geleistet, so ist der Schuldner befreit (LOA art. 99(4)). Infolgedessen erwirbt der Zessionar einen Anspruch aus condictio indebiti gegen den Zedenten.

Entsprechend liegt es, wenn ein Schuldner seine Leistung an eine Person erbringt, von der er unter den Umständen annehmen durfte, dass sie die Leistung fordern durfte (LOA art. 75(1) first sentence), z. B. an den Inhaber eines Ladescheins (Gesetz über den Eisenbahntransport art. 92). Auch hier hat der wirklich Gläubiger einen Kondiktionsanspruch gegen den Leistungsempfänger (LOA art. 75(1) second sentence; see Kalaydjiev loc.cit. 238). Auch unter POLISH CC art. 405 hat der Zessionar einen Bereicherungsanspruch gegen den Zedenten, an den der Schuldner (unter CC art. 512) gutgläubig und deshalb schuldbefreiend geleistet hat. Strittig ist nur, ob der Schuldner auf den Schutz durch CC art. 512 verzichten und das Geleistete vom Zedenten zurückverlangen kann (dafür Ohanowicz, Niesłuszne wzbogacenie, 202; dagegen Serda, Nienależne świadczenie, 62).

8. Auch unter DUTCH CC art. 6:36 kann der wahre Berechtigte gegen denjenigen Rückgriff nehmen, der die Leistung unberechtigt empfangen hat. Damit korrespondiert CC art. 6:34, wonach der Schuldner, der an einen Nichtberechtigten geleistet hat, dem Berechtigten entgegenhalten kann, dass er aus vernünftigem Grund angenommen hatte, an den Berechtigten zu leisten, so dass er von seiner Schuld befreit sei. CC art. 6:34 ist natürlich eine Ausnahme von der Grundregel, wonach schuldbefreiend nur an den wahren Gläubiger geleistet werden kann. Die Hauptbedeutung von CC art. 6:34 liegt im Zessionsrecht, für das zwischen der stille cessie und der Zession unter Benachrichtigung des Schuldners zu unterscheiden ist. Die stille Zession ist erst durch CC art. 3:94(3) im Jahre 2004 wieder in das niederländische Recht eingeführt worden. Bei ihr ist der Schuldner solange geschützt, wie er nicht vor seiner Leistung eine Abtretungsanzeige (durch Zedent oder Zessionar) erhält (Kamerstukken II, 2002/2003, 28 878, no. 3, p. 4); bis zu diesem Zeitpunkt ist der Schuldner gemäß CC art. 3:94 als gutgläubig (Verhagen and Rongen, WPNR 2003, no. 6546, 679, 689; Biemans, WPNR 2004, no. 6584, 532, 536-537) und der Zedent als allein zur Einziehung der Forderung befugt anzusehen. Die Einziehungsbefugnis geht erst mit Zugang der Abtretungsanzeige beim Schuldner auf den Zessionar über. In den Fällen, in welchen die Abtretungsanzeige (CC art. 3:94(1)) Wirksamkeitsvoraussetzung der Zession ist, kommt es bis zu diesem Zeitpunkt nicht zu einem Gläubigerwechsel, so dass der Schuldner nicht einmal des Schutzes durch CC art. 6:34 bedarf. Der Zessionar hat aber gleichwohl bereits einen Rückgriffsanspruch gegen den Zedenten aus CC art. 6:36; außerdem kann der Schuldner vom accipiens verlangen, das Empfangene an den Zessionar auszukehren. Leistet der Schuldner trotz Abtretungsanzeige an den Altgläubiger, so wirkt diese Leistung grundsätzlich nicht schuldbefreiend. Der Schutz durch CC art. 6:34 kann nur ins Spiel kommen, wenn, bei Mehrfachzessionen, der Schuldner auf eine falsche Mitteilung durch einen der Neugläubiger an einen früheren Forderungsinhaber zahlt (näher Biemans loc. cit.). CC art. 6:34 spielt außerhalb der Zessionsfälle vor allem dort eine Rolle, wo ein Schuldner an einen durch eine öffentliche Urkunde (z.B. durch einen Erbschein) legitimierten Scheingläubiger zahlt. Auch dann muss der wahre Rechtsinhaber auf dem Wege über CC art. 6:36 den nur scheinbar Berechtigten in Regress nehmen. Die erbrechtliche Vorschrift des CC art. 4:187 bestätigt diese allgemeinen Grundsätze.

9. Under ESTONIAN law notice is not a prerequisite for the validity of assignment (LOA § 170). Ein Schuldner, der gutgläubig an den Zedenten einer Forderung zahlt, wird durch diese Zahlung befreit; er wird so behandelt, als habe er an den richtigen Gläubiger geleistet (LOA § 169(1)). Der Zedent aber darf diese Leistung nicht behalten; er muss sie als ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung an den Zessionar herausgeben. Der Zessionar hat auch die Möglichkeit, eine ursprünglich nicht schuldbefreiende Leistung des Schuldners an den Zedenten zu genehmigen, ihr somit Erfüllungswirkung beizumessen und sie anschließend vom Zedenten herauszuverlangen (LOA § 1037(4)).

II. Durchgriff bei Entreicherung durch Schenkung

10. Die Frage, ob dem Benachteiligten eine Direktkondiktion gegen diejenige Person zustehen sollte, an welche der Bereicherte den empfangenen Gegenstand weiterverschenkt hat, wird nicht überall ausdrücklich erörtert. In SPANISH TS 7 February 1997, RAJ 1997 (1) no. 685 p. 1061 hatte eine Nießbraucherin (B) das Grundstück eines anderen (A) an eine dritte Person (C) verkauft, die an ihm gutgläubig Eigentum erwarb. B verschenkte den erzielten Kaufpreis an ihre Tochter (D). A verklagte B erfolgreich aus Delikt (aus heutiger Sicht läge es allerdings näher, diesen Anspruch aus einer condictio based on disposal of another's asset [see CC art. 360] zu gewähren) und D erfolgreich aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung. Der Klage gegen D wurde mit der vergleichsweise undifferenzierten Begründung stattgegegeben, dass alle Voraussetzungen eines Anspruchs aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung gegeben wären: eine Bereicherung, eine Verarmung und die Abwesenheit eines Rechtsgrundes für die Vermögensmehrung. Letzteres war aber natürlich das eigentliche Problem, denn im Verhältnis B-D hatte eine Schenkung vorgelegen. Auch war weder Raum für eine acción pauliana (CC arts. 1111(2), 1290 ff) noch für eine acción subrogatoria unter CC art. 1111(1). Bei dieser Ausgangslage ist es nach wie vor ungewiss, ob das spanische Recht der Regel in VII.–4:103(2) zustimmt oder nicht.

11. ITALIAN CC art. 2038 entspricht VII.–4:103(2): Wenn die Sache von einem gutgläubigen Empfänger untentgeltlich an einen Dritten übertragen wurde, haftet der Dritte in den Grenzen seiner Bereicherung unmittelbar dem solvens (CC art. 2038(1)). Es wird allerdings die Auffassung vertreten, dass dieser Anspruch dann nicht besteht, wenn der accipiens anbietet, den Wert der Sache zu bezahlen (Trimarchi, L'arricchimento senza causa, 97; Breccia, Il pagamento dell'indebito, 960-961). Wurde ihm die Sache von einem bösgläubigen Empfänger geschenkt, haftet der Dritte (in den Grenzen seiner Bereicherung) dem solvens nur, wenn dieser den bösgläubigen accipiens erfolglos verklagt hat (CC art. 2038(2)). Der Dritte kann im Wege der Direktkondiktion auch dann nicht in Anspruch genommen werden, wenn die Sache zwar noch in natura bei ihm vorhanden ist (CC art. 2041(2)), der solvens aber ihren Wert vom accipiens erlangen kann (Trimarchi loc. cit., Breccia loc.cit.). Die Stellung des Dritten ist m.a.W. besser, wenn er von einem bösgläubigen accipiens erwirbt. Denn dann haftet der Dritte dem solvens nur subsidiär.

12. Unter PORTUGUESE CC art. 481(1) tritt der Dritte, wenn er die Sache von dem Bereicherten unentgeltlich empfangen hat, an seine Stelle, allerdings nur in den Grenzen seiner Bereicherung. Dieser zuletzt genannte Schutz entfällt im Falle der Bösgläubigkeit (CC art. 481(2)). Sind sowohl der accipiens als auch der Dritte bösgläubig, haften sie dem solvens unter CC art. 493 als Gesamtschuldner (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], note 1 under art. 481, p. 469). Auch GERMAN CC § 822 entspricht VII.–4:103(2). Wendet der accipiens das Empfangene unentgeltlich einem Dritten zu und ist der accipiens wegen dieser Entreicherung von der Haftung aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung befreit (was Gutgläubigkeit des accipiens voraussetzt: CC §§ 818 und 819), so haftet der Dritte "wie wenn er die Zuwendung von dem Gläubiger ohne rechtlichen Grund erhalten hätte". CC § 822 begründet eine Ausnahme vom Grundsatz der Einheitlichkeit des Bereicherungsvorganges, wonach unmittelbar durch ein und denselben Vorgang das Vermögen des Bereicherungsgläubigers gemindert und das des Bereicherungsschuldners gemehrt worden sein muss (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 822, no. 1; § 812, no. 35; MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 822, no. 1; § 812, no. 17).

13. GREEK CC art. 913, POLISH CC art. 407, ESTONIAN LOA § 1036 and LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.239 gleichen der deutschen Regelung in allen wesentlichen Zügen.

14. Den Einwand des Wegfalls der Bereicherung kennt auch HUNGARIAN CC § 361(2). Er setzt voraus, dass die Bereicherung in keiner Form (Kaufpreis, Schadenersatz bei Verlust etc.) mehr im Vermögen des Bereicherten vorhanden ist und auch nicht nutzbringend für ihn ausgegeben wurde (BH 1993/500: für Lebensunterhalt verbrauchtes Geld; BH 1987/312: für dauerhafte Verbrauchsgüter und teure Reisen verbrauchtes Geld; Wegfall der Bereicherung jeweils verneint). Ist die Bereicherung dagegen (durch Schenkung oder ersatzlosen Verlust) tatsächlich weggefallen und war der Bereicherte sowohl bei ihrem Erwerb als auch im Zeitpunkt der Schenkung an den Dritten gutgläubig (CC § 361(2)), so entfällt seine Haftung. Die Frage der Bereicherungshaftung des Dritten ist im Gesetz nicht ausdrücklich geregelt; sie muss nach den allgemeinen Vorschriften beantwortet werden. In Betracht kommt oft ein Vindikationsanspruch, weil der gutgläubige Erwerb von Sachen ein entgeltliches Erwerbsgeschäft voraussetzt (an dem es hier gerade fehlt). In Betracht kommt ferner eine Herausgabeklage nach den Vorschriften des Besitzrechts, die dem berechtigten Besitzer nicht nur einen Anspruch gegen jedweden unrechtmäßigen Besitzer, sondern selbst gegen den nicht zum Besitz berechtigten Eigentümer gewähren (CC § 188(2)). Schließlich kann sich der solvens – insbesondere dann, wenn es sich um die Leistung von Geld handelte – auch unter den allgemeinen Vorschriften des Bereicherungsrechts direkt an den Dritten halten. Denn sie setzen (anders als z.B. in Germany) nicht voraus, dass die erlangte Bereicherung unmittelbar auf dem Nachteil des Anspruchstellers beruht bzw. von ihm verursacht wurde (Petrik [-Bíró], Polgári jog II[2], 651).

15. Ausgangspunkt für das DUTCH law ist der Umstand, dass ein accipiens, der das Empfangene verschenkt, den Rückforderungsanspruch des solvens nicht mehr erfüllen kann. Die Rechtsfolgen dieser Nichterfüllung hängen davon ab, ob der accipiens gut- oder bösgläubig war. Denn unter CC art. 6:74(1) verpflichtet jede Pflichtverletzung bei der Erfüllung einer Verbindlichkeit den Schuldner zu Schadenersatz, es sei denn, die Pflichtverletzung kann dem Schuldner nicht zugerechnet werden. Für die Haftung des Dritten ist CC art. 3:86(1) zu beachten, wonach der gutgläubige Erwerb beweglicher Sachen die Entgeltlichkeit des Erwerbsgeschäfts voraussetzt. Wer nur unentgeltlich erwirbt, bleibt also dem Vindikationsanspruch des solvens (CC art. 5:2) ausgesetzt, wenn dessen (unwirksames) Geschäft mit dem accipiens die Eigentumsverhältnisse an der Sache unberührt gelassen hat (see CC art. 3:84). Denkbar ist auch ein Bereicherungsanspruch gegen den Dritten aus CC art. 6:212; die dogmatische Konstruktion dieses Anspruches ist bislang freilich nicht abschließend geklärt (näher Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht I[12], nos. 211-214 p. 157-167; Wammes, WPNR 1991, no. 6004 p. 297; Scheltema, Onverschuldigde betaling, 88-90).

Ilustration 1 is inspired by CFI Bilbao 26 July 2004, BDA JUR 2004/263555 and illustration 8 on White v. Jones [1995] 2 WLR 187.

VII.–4:104: Ratification of debtor's performance to a non-creditor

(1) Where a debtor purports to discharge a debt by paying a third person, the creditor may ratify that act.

(2) Ratification extinguishes the creditor's right against the debtor to the extent of the payment with the effect that the third person's enrichment is attributable to the creditor's loss of the right against the debtor.

(3) As between the creditor and the third person, ratification does not amount to consent to the loss of the creditor's right against the debtor.

(4) This Article applies correspondingly to performances of non-monetary obligations.

(5) Other rules may exclude the application of this Article if an insolvency or equivalent proceeding has been opened against the debtor before the creditor ratifies.

COMMENTS

A. General

Overview. This Article addresses globally issues of enrichment, disadvantage and attribution in situations involving an attempt by a debtor to discharge an obligation owed to a creditor by performing to a third person. It is a sister provision to VII.–4:103 (Debtor's performance to a non-creditor; onward transfer in good faith). That Article is concerned with cases where there is an effective discharge of the debt by performance to a non-entitled party: it recognises that there may be a claim against the recipient who has got what was due to the claimant. This Article is concerned with performances to a non-entitled party which are ineffective to discharge the debt. It confers on the creditor a power to ratify the attempted discharge of the debt. Ratification renders the performance to the third person effective and paves the way for a possible enrichment claim by the (former) creditor against the recipient.

> Illustration 1
> X, a debtor of D, is induced by the fraud of E to pay to E sums due to D, E pretending to be collecting the debt on D's behalf. Although X has paid in good faith, X's debt to D is not discharged by the payment. However, since X's payment to E was intended by X as a discharge of the debt to D, D may ratify X's performance to E under this article. If D ratifies, X is discharged of liability to D. D has an enrichment claim against E. E's enrichment is attributable to D's disadvantage because, as a result of the ratification of X's misdirected performance to E, D has lost a claim against X and E has gained the fruits of that claim.

Rationale. This provision enables a creditor who ought to have received a given benefit a direct action to obtain that benefit from the person to whom the debtor misdirected the performance. It avoids the necessity for a more circuitous reversal of enrichment (recipient pays to debtor, debtor forwards to creditor) or a further agreement between creditor and debtor (debtor assigns to creditor, in lieu of performance, the debtor's enrichment claim against the recipient).

B. Scope

Payment of debts and other performances. For the sake of simplicity, the provision is worded in terms of ratification of a debtor's payment to another. However, as paragraph (4) makes explicit, the provision applies equally in respect of non-monetary obligations which the debtor purports to discharge by performing to a person who is not in fact the creditor.

Possible exclusion in cases of insolvency. Paragraph (5) provides that this Article may be excluded by other rules if an insolvency or equivalent proceeding has been opened against the debtor before the creditor ratifies. Where a debtor has performed to the wrong person and has become insolvent, a subsequent ratification has the effect of privileging the claimant creditor and immunising that creditor from the effect of the insolvency. Before ratification the debtor has an enrichment claim against the recipient and that is an asset in the insolvent debtor's estate, while the unsatisfied creditor has merely a claim against the insolvent debtor's estate for the unpaid debt. The claimant is therefore merely entitled to a dividend from an insolvent estate. After ratification the disappointed creditor has a direct enrichment claim against the recipient of the mistaken payment which, assuming the recipient is solvent, is a valuable asset, while the other creditors of the insolvent debtor have no claim to a share of the money due from the wrongly paid recipient. This shifting of the relative positions of creditors post-insolvency raises policy issues which may justify excluding the operation of this Article. As in the case of the sister provision (VII.–4:103 (Debtor's performance to a non-creditor; onward transfer in good faith)), the operation of unjustified enrichment law ought not to disturb the policy decisions of insolvency law; its rules have priority over ratification under this Article.

C. Ratification

Entitlement to ratify. Ratification by a creditor of a debtor's misdirected performance is possible only where the debtor has attempted to pay the debt to the creditor. Where a debtor has not discharged the debt as a result of a misdirected performance, the ordinary response is a right in the debtor for restitution under this Book from the recipient. To permit the creditor a direct action against the recipient is an exceptional remedy. It is justified where it was the creditor's claim which the debtor meant to satisfy when the debtor paid to the third party recipient. On the other hand, a creditor should not be able to usurp the debtor's right of recovery from the recipient simply because it would be advantageous for the creditor (in particular: because the debtor has since become insolvent). There must be an intention on the part of the debtor to pay a debt owed to the claimant before the claimant can ratify the payment.

> Illustration 2
> X, who owes D1 € 100, intends to make a gift of € 50 to D2. X intends to pay D2 by way of bank transfer. By mistake, X pays € 50 into E's bank account instead of D2's. D1 cannot ratify X's payment to E. X did not pay to E in attempted performance of the debt due to D1, but rather as a misdirection of an intended gift to D2. D2 cannot ratify the payment either if (it is assumed) X was not obliged to make the gift to D2. E is liable to reverse the enrichment to X.

> Illustration 3
> X is liable to pay D a specified sum under the terms of an insurance. However, X makes the payment in fact to E (the deceased person's successors, who are not in fact entitled to the payment under the terms of the policy because they did not know the deceased personally). D can ratify the payment to E and demand the sum paid to him.

Effect of ratification. Ratification has the following effects. It renders the attempted performance of the obligation effective. That extinguishes the debtor's liability to the creditor and the creditor's claim against the debtor. Accordingly it enables the normal rule contained in VII.–4:103 (Debtor's performance to a non-creditor; onward transfer in good faith) (which is applicable to effective discharges of debt by misdirected performance) to be applied. The recipient's enrichment (in having received the fruits of the claim) is attributable to the former creditor's loss of the claim against the debtor. This is provided for by paragraph (2). The further rule (contained in paragraph (3)) that ratification does not operate in relation to the recipient as a consent to the loss of the claim ensures that the enrichment is not regarded as justified by virtue of the ratification.

NOTES

1. Unter FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBURGIAN CC art. 1239(1) hat der Schuldner an den Gläubiger, seinen Bevollmächtigten (quelqu'un ayant pouvoir de lui) oder denjenigen zu leisten, der gesetzlich oder gerichtlich zur Entgegenhame der Leistung befugt ist. Zahlungen an einen Nichtberechtigten sind wirksam, wenn der Gläubiger sie ratifiziert (vgl. Cass.civ. 18 March 1974, Bull.civ. 1974, III, no. 132 p. 100) oder von ihnen profitiert hat (CC art. 1239(2)); die Möglichkeit der Ratifizierung ist nicht auf Geldzahlungen beschränkt. Da in der Regel das Eigentum an Sachen bereits mit dem Abschluss des Kaufvertrages auf den Käufer übergeht, steht dem wahren Gläubiger gegen den nichtberechtigten Empfänger einer beweglichen Sache unabhängig von einer Genehmigung ein Vindikationsanspruch zu. Bei Zahlungen an ein Nichtberechtigten wird geprüft, ob zwischen ihm und dem Berechtigten ein Rechtsverhältnis besteht, das den Herausgabeanspruch begründet (z.B. Cass.com. 12 July 1993, Bull.civ. 1993, IV, no. 303 p. 216: Wechselübergabe an den Geschäftsführer der Gläubigerin, der das Geld für eigene Zwecke verwendet).
2. Auch in SPAIN ist zwischen schuldbefreienden und nicht schuldbefreienden Leistungen an einen Nichtberechtigten zu unterscheiden. Leistungen an einen Nichtberechtigten wirken z.B. schuldbefreiend unter CC art. 1164 (gutgläubige Leistung an einen Scheingläubiger), aber auch unter CC art. 1163(2), und zwar insoweit als sie dem Gläubiger "nützlich" wurden. Diese Regelung entspricht French CC art. 1239(2) und Italian CC art. 1188(2) (während sich das Äquivalent zu French CC art. 1239(1) in Spanish CC art. 1162 findet). Dem Gläubiger wird eine Zahlung des Schuldners an einen Nichtberechtigten insbesondere dann "nützlich", wenn der Nichtberechtigte sie an den Berechtigten weiterleitet (CA Valencia 10 April 2007, BDA AC 2007/1190). Zwar erwähnt Spanish CC art. 1163(2) gerade nicht die Genehmigung der Leistung an den Nichtberechtigten, doch scheint diese Möglichkeit im Schrifttum geradezu für selbstverständlich gehalten zu werden (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 496; Bercovitz Rodríguez-Cano [-Bercovitz Rodríguez-Cano], Comentarios al Código Civil[2], 1405; Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Cristóbal Montes], Código Civil II[2], 188). Man stützt dieses Ergebnis nicht auf die Behauptung, dass man im Falle der Genehmigung von der "Nützlichkeit" der Leistung für den Gläubiger ausgehen dürfe, sondern darauf, dass CC art. 1162(2) (Erfüllungswirkung im Falle der Leistung an eine autorisierte Person) die Möglichkeit der Ratifizierung impliziere (so wohl auch TS 28 December 1994, RAJ 1994 (5) no. 10388 p. 13299). Die Frage des Bereicherungsausgleichs zwischen Gläubiger und Nichtberechtigtem wird dagegen so gut wie nicht problematisiert, vielleicht deshalb nicht, weil angenommen wird, dass sie sich in der Regel nach einem Rechtsverhältnis richten wird, das zwischen Gläubiger und Nichtberechtigtem schon vor der Genehmigung bestand. Fehlt es daran, dürften dieselben Regeln zur Anwendung kommen, die auch den Bereicherungsausgleich zwischen dem wahren und dem Scheingläubiger beherrschen (see notes under the previous Article), also entweder ein allgemeiner Bereicherungsanspruch oder a condictio based on interference with another's assets, namely disposition of another's claim. Ältere Rechtsprechung, in der es um Schuldnerzahlungen an die 'Marxists Committees' ging, welche die Kontrolle über von ihnen enteignete Gesellschaften übernommen hatten, ist heute nur noch von begrenzter Bedeutung. Die Gesellschaften hatten, nachdem die Komitees aufgelöst und sie wieder die Kontrolle über ihr Unternehmen übernommen hatten, die Zahlungen an diese Komitees genehmigt und dadurch ihren Anspruch gegen die Schuldner verloren (e.g. TS 20 May 1944, RAJ 1944, no. 940 p. 537 and TS 27 April 1945, RAJ 1945 no. 685 p. 417). Bestand die Leistung des Schuldners in der Hingabe einer Sache, wird der wahre Gläubiger sie in den allermeisten Fällen vom Nichtberechtigten vindizieren können.

3. Auch in ITALY wird die Frage der bereicherungsrechtlichen Restitution kaum diskutiert. Sicher ist, dass der Gläubiger eine Leistung an einen Nichtberechtigten genehmigen und dadurch den Schuldner von seiner Schuld befreien kann. Der Schuldner ist auch dann befreit, wenn der Gläubiger aus der dem Nichtberechtigten erbrachten Leistung Nutzen gezogen hat (CC art. 1188(2)). Die Genehmigung kann ausdrücklich oder stillschweigend erfolgen; sie wirkt auf den Zeitpunkt der Zahlung zurück (näher Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], sub art. 1188, VII). Auch in PORTUGAL gilt prinzipiell, dass die Leistung an den Gläubiger bzw. an seinen Vertreter erbracht werden muss (CC art. 769). Leistungen an Dritte befreien den Schuldner grundsätzlich nicht (CC art. 770); er kann sie aber bei dem Dritten kondizieren (CC art. 476(2); näher Menezes Leitão, Obrigações II[4], 152). Genehmigt der Gläubiger dagegen die Leistung, so ist der Schuldner befreit (CC art. 770(b)). Die Ratifizierung bedarf keiner Form (CC art. 219; see Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral II[7], 32). Sie begründet nach wohl herrschender Auffassung keinen Bereicherungsanspruch des Ratifizierenden gegen den Nichtberechtigten. Die schuldbefreiende Wirkung der Ratifizierung wird vielmehr einer nachträglichen Mehrung des Gläubigervermögens mit der Folge gleichstellt, dass es an einer Rechtsgrundlage für eine condictio indebiti fehle (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 479).

4. Zu GERMAN CC § 816(2) siehe bereits die notes under the previous Article. Es wird überwiegend angenommen, dass der Berechtigte die für CC § 816(2) erforderliche Wirksamkeit der Leistung an den Nichtberechtigten durch Genehmigung auch selber herbeiführen kann (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 816, no. 21; Erman [-Westermann and Buck-Heeb], BGB II[12], § 816, no. 17; Larenz and Canaris, Schuldrecht II(2)[13], § 69 II 3 d; MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 816, no. 60; BGH 10 November 1982, BGHZ 85, 267, 272; BGH 6 April 1972, NJW 1972, 1197, 1199). Der Berechtigte kann also wählen, ob er weiterhin den durch die Zahlung nicht befreiten Schuldner oder (z.B. weil dieser zwischenzeitlich insolvent geworden ist) an seiner Stelle den nichtberechtigten Empfänger in Anspruch nehmen will. Erhebt der Gläubiger Herausgabeklage gegen den nichtberechtigten Empfänger, so liegt darin eine konkludente Genehmigung der Fehlleistung des Schuldners (BGH 15 May 1986, NJW 1986, 2430). Das Wahlrecht führt im Ergebnis allerdings zu einer Bevorzugung des Gläubigers in der Insolvenz des Schuldners und stößt deshalb zunehmend auf Kritik (Staudinger [-S. Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 816, no. 32; Koppensteiner and Kramer, Ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung[2], § 9 III 4 b; Reuter and Martinek, Ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung, § 8 III 3). Außerdem nimmt die Genehmigung natürlich auch dem Schuldner die Möglichkeit, Leistungen an den falschen Empfänger selber zu kondizieren.

5. Das HUNGARIAN Zivilgesetzbuch enthält nur wenige Vorschriften über die Genehmigung von Rechtsgeschäften, die ein anderer im Rechtskreis des Genehmigenden vornimmt (z.B. im Recht der Stellvertretung: CC § 221); eine allgemeine Regelung existiert nicht. Zwar kann man durch einseitige Willenserklärung auf ein entstandenes Recht verzichten; man kann dadurch aber jemand anderen nur verpflichten, wenn Rechtsvorschriften dies ermöglichen (CC § 199) oder die Betroffenen eine entsprechende Vereinbarung treffen. Daraus wird man folgern müssen, dass die Genehmigung einer Leistung an einen Scheingläubiger diesem gegenüber nur das Angebot auf Abschluss eines den Ausgleich mit umfassenden Vertrages beinhaltet, aber keinen Anspruch auf einen Bereicherungsausgleich begründet. Auch in BULGARIA wirkt die Leistung an einen Nichtberechtigten natürlich grundsätzlich nicht schuldbefreiend. Ausgenommen von dieser Grundregel sind nach LOA art. 75(1) und (2) gutgläubige Leistungen an einen Scheingläubiger, die Genehmigung und der Fall, dass der Berechtigte von der Leistung an den Nichtberechtigten profitiert, etwa deshalb, weil Letzterer sein eigener Gläubiger ist (näher Kalaydjiev, Obligazionno pravo, Obshta chast[4], 236). Die bereicherungsrechtlichen Folgen einer Genehmigung sind dieselben wie im Falle einer schuldbefreienden Leistung an einen Scheingläubiger.

6. Unter DUTCH CC art. 6:32 ist der Schuldner befreit, wenn der Gläubiger die Leistung an einen Nichtberechtigten genehmigt oder durch sie einen Vorteil erlangt hat. Die Genehmigung wirkt auf den Leistungszeitpunkt zurück. Sie kann ganz oder teilweise, ausdrücklich oder stillschweigend erteilt werden. Die Genehmigung schließt einen Rückforderungsanspruch des Schuldners gegen den Nichtberechtigten aus CC art. 6:203 aus (Scheltema, Onverschuldigde betaling, 89; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 209; Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 161) und begründet einen Rückgriffsanspruch des Berechtigten gegen den Nichtberechtigten aus CC art. 6:36, see note I8 under the previous Article.

7. ESTONIAN LOA § 1037(4) stimmt mit VII.–4:104 überein. Der Berechtigte kann eine Leistung an den Nichtberechtigten genehmigen. Dadurch wird der Schuldner befreit und der Berechtigte erwirbt gegen den Nichtberechtigten einen bereicherungsrechtlichen Ausgleichsanspruch.

Illustration 3 draws on CA Santa Cruz de Tenerife 23 May 2007, BDA JUR 2007/287536.

VII.–4:105: Attribution resulting from an act of an intervener

(1) An enrichment is also attributable to another's disadvantage where a third person uses an asset of the disadvantaged person without authority so that the disadvantaged person is deprived of the asset and it accrues to the enriched person.

(2) Paragraph (1) applies in particular where, as a result of an intervener's interference with or disposition of goods, the disadvantaged person ceases to be owner of the goods and the enriched person becomes owner, whether by juridical act or rule of law.

COMMENTS

Overview. This Article adds a further set of cases in which the requirement of the basic rule that the enrichment be attributable to the claimant's disadvantage is satisfied. In essence it concerns the case where, as the result of an act of interference by a third person, the enriched person obtains from a third person something which belonged to the disadvantaged person.

A general principle and a specific application. Paragraph (1) sets out a general principle, asserting that in such circumstances the enrichment is attributable to the disadvantage if the third person's interference has been effective to transfer to the enriched person what was the disadvantaged person's. Paragraph (2) seeks to render the abstract rule of paragraph (1) more concrete by spelling out what amounts to the usual application of the principle in paragraph (1). This is where property rights of the disadvantaged person are extinguished and those rights are vested in the enriched person, all as a result of the third person's interference.

Typical cases. Typical cases are where, exceptionally, the enriched person has acquired the disadvantaged person's property from a non-entitled party or where a third party has mixed or joined A's property with B's in circumstances where one will become the complete owner of the whole.

Illustration 1
X steals bricks from the premises of D, a supplier of building materials. X uses the bricks in building a house extension on land belonging to a friend E. E is enriched by acquiring ownership of the bricks through accession to the land and the enrichment is attributable to D's disadvantage (loss of ownership of the bricks) brought about by X's making use of D's right as owner to dispose of the bricks.

Illustration 2
X pours oil belonging to the D company into a reserve belonging to E, where it is mixed with E's stock of oil. If under the applicable rules of property law E is owner of the increased stock, E's enrichment is attributable to D's disadvantage in the loss of the oil added to E's reserve.

Illustration 3
X, who is in possession of goods belonging to D, purports to dispose of them to E. In the circumstances and under the applicable rules of property law, E, who is in good faith, acquires title to the goods. E's enrichment is attributable under this Article to D's disadvantage in losing ownership. Whether E's enrichment is justified or E has a defence to liability is addressed by other Articles under this Book.

A particular instance of attribution. The wording of paragraph (1) ("also") makes it clear that this Article merely adds another case in which attribution is made out. (For general comments on the notion of attribution and the non-exhaustive nature of the provisions in Chapter 4, see Comment A on VII.–4:101 (Instances of attribution)). In this context it is important to note than an e contrario interpretation is compelling, as the following comments outline: in comparable cases in which the requirements of this Article are not satisfied, the assumption must be that the enrichment is not attributable to the disadvantage.

Meaning of use. The notion of use of an asset, which as paragraph (2) implies includes effecting a disposition, is the same as in VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) and VII.–3:202 (Disadvantage). See Comment C to those Articles.

Unauthorised collection of another's debt. Where a person collects payment from a creditor's debtor, without authority to do so, this may have the effect of "disposing" of the creditor's claim against the debtor. This may be either because the payment is made in circumstances in which the debtor is entitled to protection (and thus discharge from the debt), notwithstanding that he has not paid the true creditor, or because the creditor ratifies the act of the person improperly collecting payment. Such cases may be regarded as instances of "use of another's assets". Since this proposition is not self-evident to all legal traditions, however, the legal problems which this situation raises are dealt with separately in the last two preceding articles (VII.–4:103 (Debtor's performance to a non-creditor; onward transfer in good faith) and VII.–4:104 (Ratification of debtor's performance to a non-creditor)).

Deprivation and accrual. This Article only applies if the disadvantaged person has been deprived of rights. If a non-entitled party purports to exercise rights of the disadvantaged person, but fails to achieve the desired effect, no use is made of the disadvantaged person's right, no asset is lost by the disadvantaged person and no asset is gained by the enriched person. As a rule this will be because on the one hand the party purporting to exercise the disadvantaged person's rights lacks authority to do so and on the other hand the party contracting with the non-entitled party is not able to take the benefit of any statutory rules which override the lack of authority (such as the rules on acquisition in good faith, e.g. because the recipient is in bad faith or the property has been stolen). Indeed in such circumstances, the prospective claimant and the prospective debtor to the enrichment claim are not in fact enriched or disadvantaged. An enrichment, disadvantage and attribution can then only occur if there is a ratification under the following article (VII.–4:106 (Ratification of intervener's acts)).

Illustration 4
X purports by a contract to assign to E copyright which is in fact the copyright of D. The transaction is effective as a contract between the parties to it, but has no effect on D's copyright. X has purported to make use of D's right as copyright owner to dispose of that intellectual property. D has no enrichment claim against E (or X). Because D has not lost the copyright and E has not gained it there is neither disadvantage for D nor an attributable enrichment for E (nor has X made use of D's rights).

NOTES

1. Unter FRENCH and BELGIAN CC art. 2279 wird vermutet, dass der Besitzer einer beweglichen Sache deren Eigentümer ist. Wer eine bewegliche Sache verloren hat oder wem sie gestohlen wurde, kann sie innerhalb von drei Jahren beim Besitzer vindizieren. Hat der Besitzer eine solche Sache jedoch auf einer Messe, einem Markt (nicht einem Flohmarkt: CA Lyon 8 November 2001, JCP 2003, IV, 1203), anlässlich eines öffentlichen Verkaufs oder aus den Händen eines Kaufmanns, der mit Sachen dieser Art handelt, gekauft, so kann sie der ursprüngliche Eigentümer nur zurück verlangen, wenn er dem Besitzer den Kaufpreis erstattet (CC art. 2280(1)). Den erstatteten Kaufpreis kann er wiederum nur auf der Basis von CC art. 1382 (Deliktsrecht) von dem Veräußerer zurückfordern, also nur bei Nachweis einer faute (Cass.civ. 11 February 1931, D.P. 1931, 1, 129, note Savatier). Auch in Belgium sieht man das so (CFI Bruxelles 13 April 1932, J.C.B. 1932, 453; Hansenne, Les biens I(1), no. 248 p. 257). Ein Anspruch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung wird nicht gewährt. Deliktsrechtlicher Natur ist auch der Anspruch des Erstkäufers eines Grundstücks gegen den Zweitkäufer, der seinen Erwerb in Kenntnis des vorangegangenen Verkaufs als erster in das Grundstücksregister eintragen lässt und auf diese Weise Eigentum erwirbt (Cass.civ. 4 March 2004, Bull.civ. 2004, II, no. 82 p. 72).

2. Auch das SPANISH law kennt zahlreiche Fälle, in welchen es zu einem Eigentumsverlust ohne Zustimmung des Eigentümers kommt. Dazu gehören die gesetzlichen Erwerbstatbestände, unter ihnen die specification (CC art. 383). Wer gutgläubig eine fremde Sache so bearbeitet, dass eine neue Sache entsteht, erwirbt das Eigentum an ihr, muss aber zur Vermeidung einer ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos III[4], 280) dem Eigentümer des Ausgangsmaterials dessen Wert ersetzen. Es handelt sich um eine condictio por intromisión en derecho ajeno (Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 277). Übersteigt der Wert des Ausgangsmaterials den Wert der neuen Sache, kann der Eigentümer auch Bezahlung der investierten Arbeit anbieten und Herausgabe der Sache verlangen. If the intervener acts in bad faith, kann der Eigentümer entweder Herausgabe der Sache oder Schadenersatz verlangen; zur Zahlung eines Ausgleichs für die investierte Arbeit ist er nicht verpflichtet. Weitere Sonderregeln betreffen die Verbindung beweglicher Sachen zu einer neuen Sache (CC arts. 375-380; see TS 13 December 1949, RAJ 1949 no. 1472 p. 875); auch hier steht demjenigen, der sein Recht verliert, ein Bereicherungsausgleich zu (CC art. 375; see Basozabal Arrue loc.cit.), es sei denn, er handelte bösgläubig (CC art. 379(2)). Der Ausgleich im Fall der Vermischung (confusion) (CC arts. 381 and 382) folgt ähnlichen Prinzipien. CC art. 360 verpflichtet denjenigen, der mit fremden Materialien auf eigenem Land baut, im Falle der Gutgläubigkeit zu Wertersatz und bei Bösgläubigkeit darüber hinaus zu Schadenersatz. Für rechtsgeschäftliche Eigentumsübertragungen gilt zwar der Grundsatz nemo plus iura ad alium transferre potest quam ipse habet (the so-called nemo dat principle) (see Díez-Picazo loc. cit. 805 and TS 11 October 2006, RAJ 2006 (5) no. 6693 p. 14649), der wiederum die Abwesenheit eines einheitlichen Regelwerkes über adquisiciones a non domino bewirkt hat. Gleichwohl wird in der Lehre versucht, die gesetzlich geregelten Ausnahmefälle auf einige übergreifende Prinzipien zurück zu führen (see in particular Díez-Picazo loc.cit. 806-807; Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema III[6], 75). Ein gutgläubiger Erwerb from a non dominus setzt hiernach ein entgeltliches Erwerbsgeschäft voraus (das wird aus Ley Hipotecaria art. 34 geschlossen). Er kommt bei Immobilien unter Ley Hipotecaria art. 34 in Betracht, sofern das Landregister den Veräußerer als Inhaber des Rechts ausweist, der Erwerb entgeltlich erfolgt, der Erwerber die wirkliche Rechtslage nicht kennt und seinen Erwerb in das Register eintragen lässt. Für Mobilien formuliert CC art. 464, dass der gutgläubig erworbene Besitz einem Titel gleichstehe. Die Einzelheiten sind sehr umstritten, aber es ist akzeptiert, dass es sich auch hierbei um eine Form der non domino acquisition handele (Díez-Picazo and Gullón loc.cit. 76 and 215). Die genannten Fälle des gutgläubigen Erwerbs rechtfertigten wiederum die Entwicklung einer auf CC art. 360 gestützten condictio arising out of disposal of another's asset (Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 126-127; Basozabal Arrue loc. cit 292-300; see also Spanish notes under VII.–4:101 above). Sie ist auf die Herausgabe des durch den Veräußerer erzielten Preises gerichtet (TS 10 March 1958, RAJ 1958 (1) no. 1068 p. 686). Mit ihr konkurriert allerdings im Falle eines Verschuldens ein Anspruch aus Delikt, der möglicherweise (dies scheint nicht abschließend geklärt) den parallelen Bereicherungsanspruch verdrängt (see Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos del Derecho Civil Patrimonial III[4], 469).

3. Unter ITALIAN CC art. 535(2) ist der gutgläubige Besitzer, der in gutem Glauben eine Erbschaftssache veräußert hat, zur Herausgabe des erzielten Preises oder der sonstigen Gegenleistung an den Erben verpflichtet. Unter CC art. 1776 gilt Entsprechendes für den gutgläubigen Erben eines Verwahrers, der eine verwahrte Sache gutgläubig veräußert. CC art. 184(3) verpflichtet einen im gesetzlichen Güterstand der Gütergemeinschaft lebenden Ehegatten, der ohne die Zustimmung des anderen über gemeinschaftliches Gut verfügt hat, den ursprünglichen Zustand wieder herzustellen oder, wenn das nicht möglich ist, den entsprechenden Wert in die Gemeinschaft zu zahlen. CC art. 2920 verpflichtet einen Gläubiger, der bösgläubig die Zwangsvollstreckung in Schuldnervermögen betreibt, zu Schadenersatz und Kostenerstattung. CC art. 2038 schließlich verpflichtet denjenigen, der eine unberechtigterweise erhaltene Sache in gutem Glauben veräußert, die erzielte Gegenleistung herauszugeben; war er bösgläubig, so ist er zu Herausgabe in Natur oder Wertersatz verpflichtet. Im Schrifttum wird aus diesen Einzelfallregelungen das allgemeine Prinzip abgeleitet, dass jemand, der in einer fremden Rechtssphäre Handlungen vornimmt, die dem Berechtigten gegenüber wirksam sind, dem Letzteren auf Herausgabe der durch die Rechtsverletzung gezogenen Bereicherung verpflichtet sei (Sacco, L'arricchimento ottenuto mediante fatto ingiusto, 112; ähnlich Nicolussi, Lesione del potere di disposizione ed arricchimento, 209-211). Das wird vor allem in den Fällen bedeutsam, in denen sich das Gesetz nicht ausdrücklich zu den Ausgleichsansprüchen desjenigen äußert, der durch die Verfügung eines anderen ein Recht verloren hat, insbesondere in CC art. 1153 (gutgläubiger Erwerb des Eigentums an beweglichen Sachen bei Besitzerlangung und Vorhandensein eines geeigneten Titels). Auch hier ist heute m.a.W. ein bereicherungsrechtlicher Ausgleichsanspruch des ursprünglichen Rechtsinhabers anerkannt (Breccia, L'arricchimento senza causa I[2], 992; Sacco loc.cit. 175-176). Der Anspruch soll allerdings der Höhe nach auf den Wert der Sache beschränkt sein (Barbiera, L'ingiustificato arricchimento, 140; see also Trimarchi, L'arricchimento senza causa, 51-78). Bei Vorsatz oder Fahrlässigkeit trifft den Verfügenden natürlich eine deliktische Haftung. Der Erwerbende haftet aus Delikt (ggflls. zusammen mit dem Verfügenden als Gesamtschuldner), wenn er die Sache unüberlegt erworben oder sich oberflächlich verhalten hat (Cass. 16 June 1981, no. 3899, Rep.Giur.it. 1981, voce Responsabilità civile, no. 96, col. 3192).

4. In PORTUGAL wird je nachdem unterschieden, ob der Eigentumserwerb in der Person des interveners oder bei einem Dritten eintritt. In der ersten Konstellation geht es typischerweise um gesetzliche Erwerbstatbestände; sie lassen Ausgleichsverpflichtungen in Höhe mindestens des Wertzuwachses unberührt (CC arts. 1268, 1333 und 1538, näher Pereira Coelho, O enriquecimento e o dano, 36; Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 668-671, see further notes under VII.–4:101). Die zweite Konstellation tritt vergleichsweise selten auf, weil Verfügungen über fremde Sachen in der Regel unwirksam sind (näher von Bar [-Seabra and Xavier], Sachenrecht in Europa III, 366, 369). CC arts. 892 (Kaufvertrag) und 856(1) (Schenkung) sagen zwar, dass der Veräußerer dem gutgläubigen Erwerber die

Nichtigkeit nicht entgegenhalten kann, doch hat das lediglich schuldrechtliche Bedeutung; insbesondere bleibt hiervon der Vindikationsanspruch des wirklichen Eigentümers (CC art. 1331) unberührt. Der Käufer wird auf seinen Rückzahlungsanspruch gegen den Verkäufer (CC art. 894; see Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 451; STJ 29 June 2006, Processo 06B2141) und auf die Möglichkeit verwiesen, die Sache nach Ablauf der dafür vorgesehen Fristen zu ersitzen (CC arts. 1294-1300). Eine erbrechtliche Ausnahmevorschrift ist CC art. 2076(2). Hiernach können bestimmte Güter von einem Scheinerben gutgläubig durch Kauf erworben werden; der gutgläubige Scheinerbe haftet seinerseits dem wahren Erben nach den Regeln der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung.

5. Gegenstand von GERMAN CC § 816(1) sind Verfügungen (vor allem Veräußerungen und Belastungen) eines Nichtberechtigten, die dem Rechtsinhaber gegenüber wirksam sind. Es geht im Wesentlichen um Fälle des gutgläubigen Erwerbs (CC §§ 932 ff., 1207, 892, 1138, 2366; Ccom § 366). Erfolgt die Verfügung entgeltlich, haftet der Verfügende dem Berechtigten gegenüber auf das durch die Verfügung Erlangte (CC § 816(1) first sentence); erfolgt die Verfügung unentgeltlich kann der Bereichtigte bereicherungsrechtlich direkt gegen den Dritterwerber vorgehen (§ 816(1) second sentence). Der Verfügende ist in diesem Fall nicht mehr bereichert (näher Medicus, Schuldrecht II[14], no. 702). Über die Frage, was genau unter dem ”durch die Verfügung Erlangten“ zu verstehen ist, herrscht keine Einigkeit. Manche meinen, der Anspruch müsse auf den objektiven Wert des Erlangten beschränkt werden, weil eine Gewinnabschöpfung nur unter den Voraussetzungen von CC § 687(2) (rechtswidrige Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag) möglich sei. Der Verfügende habe in Wahrheit nicht die Gegenleistung, sondern Befreiung von seiner eigenen Schuld erlangt (Medicus loc.cit. no. 705). Die Rechtsprechung und die herrschende Meinung sehen das jedoch anders und beziehen den Anspruch auf die gesamte vom Verfügenden erhaltene Gegenleistung unter Einschluss des erzielten Gewinns. Das wird mit dem Wortlaut des Gesetzes und damit begründet, dass durch die Verfügung auch das Recht des Berechtigten verletzt worden sei, den Gegenstand gewinnbringend zu vermarkten (RG 28 June 1916, RGZ 88, 351, 359; BGH 8 January 1959, BGHZ 29, 157, 159; BGH 1 October 1975, WM 1975, 1179, 1180; RGRK [-Heimann and Trosien], BGB[12], § 816, no. 12; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 816, no. 23; differenzierend Larenz and Canaris, Schuldrechts II(2)[13], § 72 I 2). Die Rechtslage in GREECE entspricht weithin derjenigen in Germany. Auch hier ist umstritten, ob der Herausgabeanspruch des wahren Berechtigten gegen den Verfügenden auf den objektiven Wert der Sache beschränkt ist oder auch den darüber hinaus gehenden Preis umfasst. A.P. 479/1962, NoB 11 (1963) 109 entschied, dass ein Mieter, der die Mietsache unerlaubt untervermietet, dem Vermieter aus CC art. 904 i.V.m. arts. 909, 911 zur Herausgabe des auf diese Weise erzielten Mietzines verpflichtet ist.

6. Der gutgläubige Erwerber haftet auch nach HUNGARIAN Rechtsauffassung schon deshalb dem Eigentümer gegenüber nicht aus Bereicherungsrecht, weil ein solcher Erwerb mit Rechtsgrund geschieht. Im Grundsatz ist ein gutgläubiger Erwerb vom Nichtberechtigten zwar ohnehin ausgeschlossen; er muss vom Gesetz ausdrücklich ermöglicht werden (CC § 117(1)). Für bewegliche Sachen finden sich solche Ausnahmen jedoch in CC §§ 118 und 119 (näher Menyhárd, Dologi jog, 299), und im Immobiliarsachenrecht ist der entgeltliche gutgläubige Eigentumserwerb möglich, wenn er sich auf eine entsprechende Eintragung im Grundbuch stützt (näher Zlinszky, Polgári Jogi Kodifikáció 1/2005, 18, 19; Kazay, Gazdaság és Jog 9/2005, 12, 13, 17). Bewegliche Sachen können gutgläubig von einem Händler erworben werden, wenn das Geschäft entgeltlich ist (CC § 118(1)). Ein gutgläubiger Erwerb gestohlener Sachen ist nicht ausgeschlossen (BH 1996/48). Der ursprüngliche Eigentümer kann vom Dieb und vom Händler Schadenersatz verlangen (Lenkovics, Dologi jog, 133), sofern auch Letzterer deliktisch handelte (BH 1997/119). Außerhalb des Handelsverkehrs kann Eigentum gutgläubig und entgeltlich von einer Person erworben werden, welcher der Eigentümer die Sache anvertraut hat (CC § 118(2)); es darf sich in diesem Fall aber nicht um eine gestohlene Sache handeln (Lenkovics loc.cit.; Menyhárd loc. cit. 305; BH 1978/197). Das Gesetz gewährt dem ursprünglichen Eigentümer allerdings ein auf ein Jahr befristetes Rückkaufsrecht. Gegen den Veräußerer kommt wiederum nur ein Anspruch aus Delikt in Betracht. Eigentum an Geld und bestimmten Inhaberpapieren (BH 1999/75) geht durch Übergabe und aufgrund eines gültigen Titels über (CC § 119); der ursprüngliche Eigentümer hat folglich nur einen schuldrechtlichen Ausgleichsanspruch gegen den unberechtigt Verfügenden (Lenkovics loc.cit.; Petrik, Tulajdonjogunk ma, 142); dabei kann es sich auch um einen Schadenersatzanspruch handeln (BH 2005/115: Zahlung mit gestohlenem Geld; Haftung nur des Diebs, nicht des Empfängers, auch nicht aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung). Aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung haftet, wer unberechtigt über fremde Aktien verfügt (BH 2003/66). Zahlreiche Sondervorschriften regeln die Ausgleichsansprüche infolge des gesetzlichen Erwerbs fremden Eigentums, darunter CC § 133 über die Verarbeitung.

7. Verfügt jemand über eine fremde Sache und ist diese Verfügung dem Eigentümer gegenüber wirksam, so ergibt sich dessen Ausgleichsanspruch in BULGARIA aus der allgemeinen Bereicherungsklage (LOA art. 59(1)), see Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 600 and Goleva, Obligazionno pravo[4], 292. Die Bereicherung des Verfügenden erfolgt hier zweifelsfrei “auf Kosten” des früheren Eigentümers.

8. Under ESTONIAN LOA § 1037(1) a person who violates the right of ownership, another right (such as a right of usufruct, personal right of use or intellectual property rights) or the possession of an entitled person by disposal, use, consumption, accession, confusion or specification thereof without the consent of the entitled person or in any other manner is obliged to compensate the usual value of anything received by the violation to the entitled person. Wer also z.B. kraft Gesetzes by way of accession (LPA § 107) Eigentum an gestohlenem Baumaterial erwirbt, muss dem ursprünglichen Eigentümer den Wert erstezen. Similarily, a person who has stolen a leased computer must compensate to the lessee the value of advantage of use which the lessee was deprived of (Tampuu, Lepinguväliste võlasuhete õigus, 82).

Illustration 4 draws on TS 19 April 2007, RAJ 2007 (2) no. 2071 p. 4932.

VII.–4:106: Ratification of intervener's acts

(1) A person entitled to an asset may ratify the act of an intervener who purports to dispose of or otherwise uses that asset in a juridical act with a third person.

(2) The ratified act has the same effect as a juridical act by an authorised representative. As between the person ratifying and the intervener, ratification does not amount to consent to the intervener's use of the asset.

COMMENTS

A. General

Overview. This Article addresses globally issues of enrichment, disadvantage and attribution in situations involving an attempt by a person to dispose or otherwise use an asset belonging to another in a transaction with a third person. It is a sister provision to VII.–4:105 (Attribution resulting from an act of an intervener). That Article is concerned with cases where there is an effective disposition or other use of the claimant's asset: it recognises that there may be a claim against the recipient who has got what was the claimant's. This Article is concerned with ineffective dispositions or other use. It confers on the owner of the asset a power to ratify the attempted disposition or use. Ratification renders the transaction with the third person effective and paves the way for a possible enrichment claim by the asset's (former) owner against the intervener.

> Illustration
> E takes D's car and transfers it to X in circumstances in which X does not acquire title to the car in accordance with statutory provisions on acquisition in good faith. E has purported to dispose of an asset belonging to D in a juridical act with a third person (X) and therefore D may ratify under this Article. If D ratifies E's purported disposition to X, the purported transfer will be effective: X will acquire and D will lose title to the car. D will be disadvantaged by a decrease in assets. X will be enriched by an increase in assets. E will be enriched by having made use of D's asset. By virtue of this Article E's enrichment will be attributable to D's disadvantage.

Rationale. The purpose of the Article is to facilitate a claim against an intervener either where it would be impolitic for the claimant to proceed against the end recipient, or where recovery from the intervener is a more worthwhile remedy. The latter may be the case where the ultimate recipient's liability would in any case be diminished (for example, due to gratuitous disposal of the asset received in good faith, giving rise to a defence under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment)) or where the intervener can be made to account for a substitute enrichment (for example, the proceeds of disposing of the claimant's asset on what, from the claimant's standpoint, were favourable terms). The provision is justified by the fact that the intervener attempted to achieve the outcome which the disadvantaged person permits by means of the ratification. Thus ratification only brings about the state of affairs which the intervener in any case intended to effect. It is not in contradiction of the intervener's intention as manifested in the juridical act with the third party.

Meaning of use. The notion of use of an asset, which as the wording of paragraph (1) indicates includes effecting a disposition, is the same as in VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) and VII.–3:202 (Disadvantage). See Comment C to those Articles.

B. Ratification

Authorisation of the disposition or use. In accordance with paragraph (2), ratification has the following effects. It renders the purported disposition or other use effective. That confers on the third person who dealt with the intervener the rights which the intervener has purported to confer: an attempted sale becomes an effective sale, for instance, as much as if the intervener had been acting as an authorised representative. Accordingly the ratifying party loses the assets disposed of or is burdened with the rights granted to the third party.

Justification of the third party's enrichment. In relation to the third party recipient, the ratifying party has no enrichment claim. The intervener is treated as an authorised representative so that, in accordance with VII.–4:102 (Indirect representation), the disadvantage sustained is not regarded as that of the ratifying party, but of the representative. The enrichment of the third party is justified in relation to the representative by the juridical act between them: see VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(a).

No justification of the intervener's use of the asset. In relation to the intervener, however, the ratification does not operate as a consent to the disadvantage sustained. The converse would entirely frustrate the purpose of this rule, which is to facilitate a claim against the intervener. The intervener is enriched by using the disadvantaged person's asset (e.g. by effecting the disposition of the asset to the third party). The intervener's use of the claimant's asset is attributable to the claimant's disadvantage under paragraph (c) of VII.–4:101 (Instances of attribution).

Law on liability for non-contractual damage. As between intervener and disadvantaged person, ratification is not a consent to the disadvantage not just for the purposes of this Book, but also for the purposes of the rules on non-contractual liability for damage. Where concurrent obligations arise because the intervener is liable under both this Book and Book VI, the rule in VII.–7:102 (Concurrent obligations) paragraph (1) applies.

NOTES

1. Zu der Rechtslage in den Mitgliedstaaten siehe bereits die notes under VII.–4:104 (Ratification of debtor's performance to a non-creditor). Für SPAIN ist ergänzend darauf hinzuweisen, dass Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 127 die Möglichkeit einer Genehmigung für grundsätzlich gegeben halten; sie laufe darauf hinaus, dem verus dominus an option between vindication and condictio zu geben. Carrasco Perera, ADC 1988, 5, 100-101 dagegen hält es für verfehlt, dem Eigentümer einen Anspruch gegen den intervener auf den erzielten Erlös zu geben. Allerdings lässt sich dem entgegenhalten, dass unter CC art. 1897 in fine auch der Schuldner einer Leistungskondiktion, der die Sache weiterverkauft hat, den erzielten Erlös bzw. den Anspruch auf den Erlös herausgeben muss. Die Vorschrift zeigt zugleich, dass der solvens indebiti in Fällen, in denen der accipiens indebiti acted in bad faith, nicht zwingend auf seinen Vindikationsanspruch gegen den Dritten verwiesen wird, vielmehr hierauf verzichten und stattdessen a condictio against the accipiens for the price obtained geltend machen kann (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 520-521). In der Substanz läuft das auf eine Ratifizierung hinaus.

2. Unter GERMAN law hat der Berechtigte die Möglichkeit, die Verfügung eines Nichtberechtigten zu genehmigen. Sie wird dadurch auch dann wirksam, wenn es sich um eine gestohlene Sache handelte (CC § 935) oder der Erwerber bösgläubig war (Medicus, Schuldrecht II[14], no. 701; Larenz and Canaris, Schuldrecht II(2)[13], § 69 II 1 c; MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 816, no. 25; BGH 6 May 1971, BGHZ 56, 131). Durch die Genehmigung erlangt der Berechtigte dann einen Bereicherungsanspruch gegen den nichtberechtigt Verfügenden aus CC § 816(1) first sentence. Klagt der Eigentümer gegen den Verfügenden auf Erlösherausgabe, so soll darin bereits eine konkludente Genehmigung zu sehen sein (BGH 25 January 1955, LM § 816 BGB no. 6; RG 12 March 1923, RGZ 106, 44, 45; RG 28 October 1926, RGZ 115, 31, 34). Die Genehmigung bewirkt zwar den Verlust des Vindikationsanspruches gegen den Erwerber, schließt aber Deliktsansprüche gegen den Verfügenden nicht aus (BGH 6 November 1990, NJW 1991, 695; see also BGH 29 April 1968, NJW 1968, 1326).

3. Im Gegensatz zum German (und auch zum ESTONIAN law, see notes under VII.–4:104) haben andere Rechtsordnungen die Möglichkeit und die Rechtsfolgen einer Genehmigung im Wesentlichen nur im Recht der Vertretung ohne Vertretungsmacht geregelt. Dazu gehören ITALY, PORTUGAL, the NETHERLANDS, BULGARIA und HUNGARY (CC § 221). Die Genehmigung hat zur Folge, dass der Scheinvertreter als echter Vertreter anzusehen ist (BH 2005/21; BH 2004/181; BH 1994/501; BH 1994/148; BH 1993/181). Die Situation ist aber mit der in VII.–4:106 ins Auge gefassten nicht vergleichbar, weil die vertretungsrechtliche Genehmigung zu einem Vertrag zwischen dem Eigentümer und dem Käufer führt.

VII.–4:107: Where type or value not identical

An enrichment may be attributable to another's disadvantage even though the enrichment and disadvantage are not of the same type or value.

COMMENTS

Overview. This provision has a very limited function. Its purpose is simply to exclude a limitation which might otherwise be wrongly supposed to be a part of the scheme of the rules. It supplements the rules in paragraph (2) of each of VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) and VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage). Those rules make it clear that the concepts of enrichment and disadvantage are defined in terms of individual items of patrimonial displacement, rather than the net overall effect on patrimonial wealth – in other words, entries in the accounts and not the overall balance. VII.–4:107 adds the clarification that the enrichment need not be the mirror image of the claimant's disadvantage.

Non-equivalence of enrichment and disenrichment immaterial. While enrichment and disenrichment are exact opposites from a conceptual point of view, this does not mean that in any particular case they must in fact be of an equal and opposite nature. In many instances that will indeed be the case. D's provision of a service to E enriches E because E receives a service and disadvantages D because D provides it. Likewise, E's making use of D's right amounts to an enrichment of E and at the same time a disadvantage of D because D suffers E's use of the right. Nonetheless, this kind of exact correspondence is in no way a requirement of the basic rule. It may equally arise, for example, that the enrichment takes one form of patrimonial enrichment (e.g. liberation from an obligation which the claimant has discharged – a decrease in liabilities), while the claimant's disenrichment takes another (e.g. disbursement of money – a decrease in assets). Payment of cash into an overdrawn account would be a classic example of this. Where third parties are involved there is even more potential for enrichment and disadvantage to take different forms: the disadvantage which the claimant has sustained in benefiting a third party may be attributable to the enrichment which the enriched person has received from the third party, but the benefits received and conferred by the third party may be very different.

Illustration 1:
Y is a friendly society, engaged in procuring the construction of social housing, and X is its chairman. Acting on behalf of the society, X commissions a building company B to construct a luxury villa for himself and his family. B's invoices are satisfied out of an account of Y. Initially the invoices are covered by payments into the account which X makes. X later ceases to make payments into the account, but B's invoices continue to be met from Y's account until X's scheme is exposed. X has been enriched by the receipt of a service and assets from B (construction of the villa and building materials used in the construction). Y has sustained a disadvantage in making payments (to B).

Illustration 2:
D, ein Hausrazt, verliert infolge einer Gesetzesänderung die einzige Apothekenlizenz, die für den betreffenden Ort vergeben wird. E erlangt eine neue Lizenz und in ihrer Folge auch den gesamten Klientenbestand. Bereicherung und Nachteil sind verschieden; die Bereicherung des E erfolgt allerdings nicht ohne Rechtsgrund.

NOTES

1. Zur Rechtslage in den Mitgliedstaaten siehe bereits die notes under VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) and VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage), ferner die notes under VII.–4:101 (Instances of Attribution).

Illustration 1 is taken from TS 15 June 2004, RAJ 2004 (3) no. 3847 p. 7922; illustration 2 draws on HR 15 March 1996, NedJur 1997, no. 3 p. 22.

CHAPTER 5: REVERSAL OF ENRICHMENT

VII.–5:101: Transferable enrichment

(1) Where the enrichment consists of a transferable asset, the enriched person reverses the enrichment by transferring the asset to the disadvantaged person.

(2) Instead of transferring the asset, the enriched person may choose to reverse the enrichment by paying its monetary value to the disadvantaged person if a transfer would cause the enriched person unreasonable effort or expense.

(3) If the enriched person is no longer able to transfer the asset, the enriched person reverses the enrichment by paying its monetary value to the disadvantaged person.

(4) However, to the extent that the enriched person has obtained a substitute in exchange, the substitute is the enrichment to be reversed if:

(a) the enriched person is in good faith at the time of disposal or loss and the enriched person so chooses; or

(b) the enriched person is not in good faith at the time of disposal or loss, the disadvantaged person so chooses and the choice is not inequitable.

(5) The enriched person is in good faith if that person neither knew nor could reasonably be expected to know that the enrichment was or was likely to become unjustified.

COMMENTS

A. General

Overview. This Article sets out the measure of liability and particularises the required mode of reversal of the unjustified enrichment, provided for by the basic rule, where that enrichment consists of a transferable asset. The starting proposition is that the enriched person is required to transfer the asset to the disadvantaged person (paragraph (1)). A transfer in specie is thus the primary response of the law of unjustified enrichment if the enrichment takes the form of a transferable asset. However, in certain circumstances the enriched person may elect instead to pay the monetary value of the enrichment (paragraph (2)). The Article also deals with the case where the enrichment has been disposed of or lost and accordingly can no longer be returned in specie. In that case (so far as liability continues, notwithstanding the loss or disposal: see the defence in VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment)) the starting point is that the enriched person must pay the monetary value of the enrichment (paragraph (3)). However, where the enriched person has traded the asset, there is a possibility that the liability to reverse the enrichment will switch to the substitute representing the proceeds of that trade (paragraph (4)). The switch results from an election of a party; quite which party may make that election depends on the circumstances. Those circumstances include whether the enriched person is in good faith – a matter defined for these (and other) purposes in paragraph (5).

B. Transfer: paragraph (1)

Transferable asset. This Article only applies where the enrichment which was obtained takes the form of a "transferable asset". The term "asset" in this paragraph bears the same meaning as in VII.–3:201 (Enrichment) paragraph (1)(a),(c) and VII.–3:202 (Disadvantage) paragraph (1)(a),(c) (as to which, see Comment B on those Articles). An asset will not be transferable in the sense of paragraph (1) if the asset is not by its nature transferable, if it is impossible or unlawful to transfer it, or for any other reason transfer must be regarded as out of the question. The issue of transferability must be considered from a pragmatic standpoint. A merely legal or theoretical possibility of transfer will not suffice if the asset would be sterile in that condition or if, in order to prevent it being sterile, the enriched person would be compelled to transfer more than the asset (and thus to sustain a disadvantage going beyond a reversal of the enrichment).

Illustration 1
E has made unauthorised use of D's bricks in constructing a building on E's land and is liable to D under this Book in respect of the acquisition of the bricks. It would be barely feasible for E to return the bricks as such without damaging either the building or the bricks themselves (either of which would be a waste of resources). The bricks are not a transferable asset. Nor is the building a transferable asset. While it might be possible under the applicable rules of immovable property law to transfer ownership of the building as such (leaving rights in the soil beneath in E), this would be a useless asset without rights of access to the building over E's land, but to grant such rights of access would subtract from E's patrimony more than corresponds with E's enrichment. (This is quite aside from the fact that the building as such represents more than the bricks, since it is also in part the product of E's labour in constructing it.) Since the enrichment is non-transferable, the mode of reversal of the enrichment and the measure of liability is determined by VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment).

Place of performance. This Article does not regulate issues of place of performance. Such matters will determine in effect who bears the burden of the cost of transfer, such as paying for collection or delivery by a carrier. The question of where the obligation to transfer is to be fulfilled – whether the enriched person is obliged to hand over at the disadvantaged person's place of residence or business or need only make the asset available for collection at his own place – will be determined by the general rules governing place of performance of non-contractual obligations: see III.–2:101 (Place of performance).

C. Election to pay monetary value instead: paragraph (2)

Election to pay value. Paragraph (2) provides that instead of making a transfer the enriched person may elect to pay the monetary value of the enrichment, notwithstanding that it relates to a transferable asset, if a transfer of the asset would cause the enriched person unreasonable effort or expense. There may be circumstances in which, given the cost of transfer involved, no constructive or proper purpose would be served by legal rules insisting on a specific transfer. This is in keeping, for example, with the policy underlying the right to specific performance of a contractual obligation, though the details differ (see III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations)). It is predicated on the basis that the legal system should not compel a transfer in specie where complete justice would be done by an award of equivalent value enabling the claimant to obtain a fully adequate substitute. In such circumstances there is no need to interfere more profoundly with the liberties of the debtor than to compel a payment of value.

Uniqueness of the asset. One factor relevant to determining whether the costs of transfer will be unreasonable is whether the asset transferred is unique. Here regard must be had not merely to the physical and economic or marketable characteristics of the thing concerned. If the enrichment has particular sentimental value (e.g. because it was the favourite material thing of a deceased member of the family), then it may be irreplaceable. Obviously tangibles whose value is almost entirely sentimental (such as love letters) or which are intrinsically unique (such as holograph manuscripts or original artwork) are not enrichments which can reasonably be obtained from another source; payment of its economic value will not enable the disadvantaged person to obtain a fully comparable replacement.

Illustration 2
As a result of undue influence exercised by E over D, D is induced to make a gift to E of a valuable collection of nineteenth century portraits of family ancestors. D subsequently avoids the gift on grounds of undue influence. Assuming that transfer would be both possible and lawful, D is entitled to demand restitution of the portraits. The goods are unique and are of special significance to D. D cannot obtain the like assets from another source. It cannot be maintained that E would suffer unreasonable effort or expense in restoring the paintings.

Election by the enriched person. Where the power of election arises, the decision whether or not to transfer is one for the enriched person to make. The claimant cannot insist on a monetary payment if the asset is transferable. The primary remedy for reversal of the enrichment where the asset is transferable is one of transfer and if the enriched person is willing and able (even though not compellable) to transfer, then the disadvantaged person must accept that, unless the parties come to some agreement. The disadvantaged person cannot in effect convert an obligation to restore an asset into a forced purchase by the enriched person by demanding cash value in lieu of a transfer – to the detriment of an enriched person who is willing to surrender the asset.

Illustration 3
D, the parents of a young girl, acquire from E a horse in part exchange for a pony, which is now too small for D's daughter. It emerges that the contract is void. The parents may only demand – in return for the horse acquired – the benefits which they conferred on E, namely the pony and the sum of money provided in addition. Although they have no interest in the pony as such, they cannot demand that E pay its value instead.

Monetary value. The meaning of monetary value of an enrichment is explained in VII.–5:103 (Monetary value of an enrichment; saving).

D. Liability to pay monetary value transfer no longer possible: paragraph (3)

General. There can be no question of reversing an unjustified enrichment by transferring the asset if the enriched party no longer has the asset to transfer. This may be due to loss of the asset or its destruction or because it has been given or sold away. In this case, the enriched party is obliged to reverse the enrichment by paying the monetary value of the enrichment instead.

Modifications of liability to pay the monetary value of the enrichment obtained. The principle that the enriched party who can no longer return a transferable enrichment must pay the monetary value of what was obtained is subject to two modifications. Firstly, it may be that the enriched person has disposed of the enrichment in good faith and gratuitously (or at least for less than its full monetary value). In such circumstances liability may be reduced by virtue of the defence of disenrichment: see VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment). Secondly, where the enriched party obtains some benefit in exchange for disposing of the enrichment, such as a price or a right to a price under a sale of the transferable asset, an election might be made that the proceeds from the disposal of the enrichment (e.g. the price or claim against the buyer for payment of the price) should be handed over instead. Whether it is the disadvantaged person or the enriched person who may make the election that the enrichment be reversed by transferring the substitute will depend on whether the enriched person disposed of the enrichment in good faith. If such an election is made, the form and potentially also the measure of liability is altered. See Comment C above.

Illustration 4
X, a tax adviser, sells the practice with its goodwill to Y, another tax adviser. The contract of sale is void. However, clients of the practice who have since had their affairs dealt with by Y wish to continue consulting Y, whom they much prefer to X. Y is no longer in a position to restore the goodwill of the business to X. Y is therefore liable to X to make a payment corresponding to the value of the goodwill which cannot be restored.

Partial disposition, loss or destruction of the enrichment. The principle of paragraph (3) applies to the extent that the enriched person is not able to transfer the asset. If only part of the asset is disposed of or lost or destroyed and some part remains which can be transferred, there will be an obligation to transfer the retained part alongside an obligation to pay the monetary value of the part which can no longer be transferred.

Illustration 5
V sells P a plot of land. After registration of the transfer, P partitions the land and re-sells one parcel. It later emerges that the contract of sale between V and P was void. P must transfer to P the retained land and pay the monetary value of the parcel of land which P sold on.

E. Election that substitute be transferred; good faith: paragraphs (4)-(5)

General. Paragraph (4) provides that in defined circumstances, where the enriched person has traded the original unjustified enrichment for some benefit in exchange, the enriched person comes under a liability to transfer the substitute. This is a departure from the principle set out in paragraph (3) that where the enriched person is no longer able to transfer the unjustified enrichment the monetary value is to be paid. When paragraph (4) applies the enriched person is instead liable once again to make a transfer in specie – in this instance, however, a transfer of the substitute.

Election. The rule that an enriched person reverses an enrichment by transferring the substitute is not automatic. It applies only where an election is made. A party who is entitled to make that election may choose not to exercise this option and instead may rely on the underlying rule (under the preceding paragraph) that liability in a case where the original enrichment has been disposed of is a liability to pay its monetary value. Moreover, it depends on the circumstances which of the parties has the right to make the election. Where the enriched person was in good faith when disposing of the enrichment, it is the enriched person who is entitled to elect in favour of the substitute. Otherwise (i.e. where the enriched person was in bad faith by the time of the disposition) it falls to the disadvantaged person to choose. In the latter case, however, the choice is subject to the rider that it must not be inequitable.

Rationale where the enriched person is in good faith. Considerations of fairness justify the right of an enriched person who has been in good faith throughout to elect to hand over the substitute instead of paying the value of the original enrichment. The rule protects the position of the innocent enriched person. It presupposes that the enriched person has defensibly changed position on the basis that the enrichment was apparently justified. If the enriched person were to be subject to the normal rule in paragraph (3) which applies when the original enrichment can no longer be transferred, the enriched person would be compelled in effect to purchase the substitute by paying the value of the original enrichment. This would not be equitable: the enriched person should have the option of surrendering the substitute. This policy – that an innocent recipient of an enrichment is not to be forced into paying to keep it – is also reflected in the special rules governing an enrichment which from the outset is a non-transferable enrichment: see VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment). This is distinct from the defence in VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment) which is available only to the extent that the value received by the innocent enriched person in exchange is less than the value of the original enrichment.

Rationale where the enriched person is not in good faith. Where the enriched person is not in good faith by the time the enrichment is lost or disposed of, the right of the disadvantaged person to demand the substitute rather than the value of the original enrichment is justified by the countervailing considerations. The rule prevents an enriched person who is (or ought to be) aware of the primary obligation to reverse the enrichment in specie from profiting from a default on that obligation. An enriched person cannot knowingly trade a transferable enrichment for an above market price, pay its monetary value (the market price) and pocket the difference. Precisely because of the culpable nature of the behaviour, the enriched person has no cause to complain if forced to surrender that benefit into which the original enrichment has been converted. Where the enriched person is not innocent, there is nothing to countervail the need to give full protection to the disadvantaged person who may have been deprived of the opportunity to obtain that benefit because kept out of having the asset which ought to have been restored. The enriched person who has culpably traded away what was due to be returned to the disadvantaged person may be regarded as a sort of wrongful (unauthorised) manager of another's affairs. Conferring on the disadvantaged person a right of election enables the 'victim' to adopt the proceeds of that 'self-interested' (rather than benevolent) intervention.

Good faith at the time of loss or disposal. In order for the enriched person to be able to exercise the election in favour of surrender of the substitute, the enriched person must be in good faith at the time of disposal of the enrichment: see paragraph (4)(a). Conversely, where the enriched person is not in good faith at the time of its disposal, the disadvantaged person has the right of election: see paragraph (4)(b). The critical time for determining whether the enriched person is in good faith is thus the moment at which the enrichment is disposed of or lost. The requirement of good faith therefore presupposes that there were good grounds to assume that the enrichment was justified and that this assumption continued until it was acted upon by disposing of the enrichment, or endured until the enrichment was lost. Hence, if (whether on or after acquiring the enrichment) the enriched person learns of the facts demonstrating or indicating that the enrichment is unjustified, the enriched person will cease to be in good faith and if the enrichment is nonetheless disposed of or lost (a) cannot insist on handing over the proceeds in lieu of the monetary value of the original enrichment and (b) runs the risk that the disadvantaged person will elect to demand the proceeds rather than the monetary value of the original enrichment.

Meaning of good faith. The notion of good faith is defined correspondingly in paragraph (5).

The enriched person is not in good faith if aware that the enrichment is unjustified or aware of the facts which are likely to result in it becoming unjustified retrospectively. The latter covers the case, for example, where the enrichment results from another's performance of an obligation under a contract and the enriched person knows of the grounds (be it a mistake, fraud, duress, or the like) which entitle that other party to avoid that contract. Actual knowledge of the facts rendering the enrichment unjustified (or making it likely that it will become unjustified) is not required. It suffices that the enriched person ought to be aware of those facts - that is to say, had the enriched person behaved properly, as a reasonable person would, the enriched person would have appreciated that the enrichment was or was likely to become unjustified because such facts as were evident pointed to a reasonable need for further inquiry. An enriched person will not be in bad faith merely by failing to look behind the apparent facts and double check the integrity of the transaction if everything points towards the enrichment being justified. There is no requirement that the recipient of an enrichment treat it sceptically if in all appearance it seems correct. Nor is the enriched person expected to undertake laborious research where there is some room for doubt if a simple appropriate inquiry seems to confirm the correctness of the enrichment. However, an enriched person is not entitled to feign blindness to obvious facts which cast suspicion on the justification for the enrichment; nor may the enriched person place blind faith in an enrichment whose justification can only be supported by a flight of fantasy.

Restriction of the enriched person's right of election. The principle set out in VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (3) serves by analogy as a further implied condition for the existence of the enriched person's right of election. That provision is concerned with non-transferable enrichments and contemplates that an enriched person who has obtained the enrichment in good faith, but on the basis that a price was to be paid or the understanding that the enrichment had a certain value, is at least liable to pay that price or value if (i) that agreement as to the price or value is a genuine one, not vitiated by issues of consent and (ii) the price or value does not exceed the monetary value of the enrichment. The underlying reason for that rule is to ensure that a person who contemplated a certain liability for the enrichment at the time of its voluntary appropriation may legitimately be held to that contemplation so long as this does not exceed the enrichment actually obtained. The same reasoning ought to apply where the enriched person obtains the enrichment in good faith under an agreement genuinely fixing a price or value for that enrichment and subsequently disposes of it to procure a substitute. At the time of disposition, the enriched person assumed that the agreed price or value of the enrichment was to be paid. Consequently, if the enriched person has made an economically unprofitable swap, obtaining something less valuable in exchange for that which the enriched person obtained under the (void) agreement with the disadvantaged person, the enriched person should not be permitted to shift that loss on to the other party, for that would simply confer a windfall on the enriched person. If the enriched person accepted the enrichment knowing that a price was to be paid and that price was fixed genuinely in the agreement, that represents a minimum level to which liability to reverse the enrichment may sink. Before making the swap, the enriched person considered that there was an obligation to pay a (genuinely agreed) price for it, so that any subsequent dealings with the asset should be regarded (to the extent of that agreed price) as at the enriched person's own risk.

Apportionment of substitute. A person enriched without justification will be liable in respect of a substitute only to the extent that it is truly the product of the original enrichment – and not in so far as it is derived from other economic inputs (such as the contributions of third parties or the enriched person's own wealth or efforts). Where the enriched person trades an unjustified enrichment together with other goods or services, the benefit obtained in exchange is only partly to be regarded as standing in the shoes of the original enrichment. The substitute is therefore to be apportioned as between the two parts which do and do not represent the original unjustified enrichment. The apportionment is to be made on the basis of the proportionate value of those different economic inputs for which the substitute was obtained in exchange.

Rationale for apportionment. Fairness requires that a substitute enrichment which is the product of more than just the original enrichment be apportioned as between the different economic factors for which it was exchanged. An unjustifiably enriched person is liable to reverse the enrichment, but should not be under an obligation to make a sacrifice of wealth going beyond this. To the extent that the substitute represents economic input other than the original enrichment the disadvantaged person has no claim on it. To force the enriched party to surrender the entire substitute in such circumstances would amount to a penalty for the enriched person and an undeserved windfall for the disadvantaged person.

NOTES

I. Der Anspruch auf Rückgabe des Empfangenen

1. Under FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBURGIAN CC art. 1379 sind Sachen in Natur zurückzugeben. Wenn das infolge von Verlust oder Beschädigung nicht möglich ist, muss der bösgläubige Empfänger ihren Wert ersetzen, während der gutgläubige Empfänger nur dann auf Wertersatz haftet, wenn er den Verlust oder die Beschädigung verschuldet hat. Hat ein gutgläubiger accipiens die Sache verkauft, haftet er dem solvens lediglich auf den Kaufpreis (CC art. 1380).

2. Auch in SPAIN wird gesagt, dass die condictio de prestación in erster Linie auf Rückgewähr in specie ausgerichtet ist (CC art. 1303 and CP art. 111; see Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 129). Das gilt auch für die Rückforderung von Leistungen auf void or avoided contracts (TS 6 October 1994, RAJ 1994 (4) no. 7459 p. 9703; TS 11 February 2003, RAJ 2003 (1) no. 1004 p. 1906). Der Benachteiligte kann auch hier nicht auf Wertersatz klagen, wenn der Bereicherte Übergabe der Sache in Natur anbietet (CA Bizkaia 1 February 2001, AC 2001 [1] no. 253, p. 391). So verhält es sich ebenfalls im Anwendungsbereich der condictio indebiti (CC arts. 1895 ff.; see Gullón Ballesteros, FS Batlle Vázquez, 367, 374; Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Ballarín Hernández], Código Civil II[2], 1957). Ist eine Rückübertragung der Sache in natura nicht möglich, wird die für nichtige bzw. angefochtene Verträge konzipierte Vorschrift des CC art. 1307 (Wertausgleich plus Früchte) angewandt. Sie betrifft nach ihrem Wortlaut zwar nur den Verlust der Sache, wird aber auf alle Fälle der rechtlichen oder tatsächlichen Unmöglichkeit der Rückübertragung der Sache angewandt (TS 6 October 1994 loc. cit.; TS 6 June 1997, RAJ 1998 (1) no. 376 p. 592; TS 11 February 2003 loc. cit.; Díez-Picazo, La liquidación de las nulidades contractuales, 117; Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán, Las nulidades de los contratos, 256). Entscheidend ist der Marktwert der Sache (TS 6 June 1997 loc.cit.; TS 11 February 2003 loc.cit.; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 129).

3. ITALIAN CC art. 2041(2) legt fest, dass in allen Fällen, in welchen die Bereicherung eine bestimmte Sache zum Gegenstand hat, der Empfänger verpflichtet ist, sie in Natur zurückzugeben, sofern sie im Zeitpunkt der Klage noch vorhanden ist. Für das Recht der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld findet sich dieselbe Regel in CC art. 2037(1)). Ein bösgläubiger accipiens haftet unter CC art. 2037(2) auch für den unverschuldeten Untergang oder die Verschlechterung der Sache. Er hat ihren Wert zu ersetzen; im Falle der Verschlechterung kann der solvens aber auch Herausgabe der Sache und einen Ausgleich für die Wertminderung verlangen. Der gutgläubige accipiens haftet dagegen stets nur in den Grenzen einer ihm verbliebenen Bereicherung (CC art. 2037(3)). Hat ein bösgläubiger accipiens die Sache veräußert, muss er sie entweder in Natur zurückgeben oder ihren Wert ersetzen (CC art. 2038(2)). Entscheidend ist der Wert zu dem Zeitpunkt, in dem er die Sache erhalten hat. Das Wahlrecht soll dem Schuldner zustehen, weil nur er abschätzen könne, ob er die Sache tatsächlich zurückerlangen könne (Nicolussi, Lesione del potere di disposizione e arricchimento, 114-115).

4. Unter GERMAN CC § 812(1) richtet sich der Herausgabeanspruch auf das erlangte "Etwas". Es kommt ganz konkret darauf an, was der Kondiktionsschuldner durch den bereichernden Vorgang erlangt hat. Das Bereicherungsrecht schützt nicht nur ein allgemeines Vermögensinteresse des Gläubigers, sondern sein Interesse daran, gerade denjenigen Gegenstand zurückzuerhalten, der sich numehr beim Kondiktionsschuldner befindet (näher MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 812, no. 339; Staudinger [-S. Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 812, no. 65). Ist allerdings die Herausgabe wegen der Beschaffenheit des Erlangten nicht möglich oder ist der Empfänger aus einem anderen Grunde zur Herausgabe außerstande, so hat er nach CC § 818(2) den Wert zu ersetzen. Das ist etwa der Fall bei empfangenen Dienstleistungen, Gebrauchsvorteilen, Verbrauch oder Veräußerung der Sache (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 818, no. 17). Dem entspricht die Rechtslage unter PORTUGUESE CC art. 479(1); Wertersatz ist nur geschuldet, wenn restituição em espécie nicht möglich ist, see Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 884). (Beispiele liefern Dienstleistungen, Verwendungen auf fremde Sachen, die Nutzung, der Verbrauch und die Veräußerung einer Sache sowie die Befreiung von einer Schuld: Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 511). Im Schrifttum wird allerdings eine analoge Anwendung von CC art. 566 befürwortet, wonach der Deliktsschuldner den Geschädigten in Geld entschädigen darf, wenn ihn eine Wiederherstellung in Natur (reconstituição natural) übermäßig belasten würde (Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 119, 122). Zu einem Wertersatz in Geld kommt es auch dann, wenn – bei Gattungsschulden – Sachen von gleicher Art und Güte zurückgegeben werden könnten (Menezes Leitão loc. cit. 885).

5. Unter HUNGARIAN CC § 361(1) muss der erlangte Vorteil zurückerstattet werden. Das hat in specie zu geschehen, sofern das nicht unmöglich ist; im letzteren Fall ist (vorbehaltlich eines Wegfalls der Bereicherung) Wertersatz zu leisten (CC § 363(2)). Ist die Sache beim Schuldner noch in Natur vorhanden, sind allerdings eigentums- und besitzrechtliche Herausgabeansprüche (CC §§ 115(3), 193(1)) für den Gläubiger in der Regel vorteilhafter. BULGARIAN LOA art. 57(1) legt fest, dass die Restitution grundsätzlich in natura erfolgt. Die Vorschrift betrifft die bereicherungsrechtliche Rückgewähr von Sachen außerhalb vertragsrechtlicher Rückforderungsansprüche. Sie steht in freier Anspruchskonkurrenz zur Vindikation (Property Act art. 108, see Goleminov, Neosnovatelno obogatyavane, 75) und ist für den Kläger insoweit vorteilhafter, als er unter dem Kondiktionsanspruch davon entlastet ist, sein Eigentumsrecht an der Sache zu beweisen. Ist die Sache untergegangen, weiterveräußert oder verbraucht worden, so wandelt sich der bereicherungsrechtliche Herausgabeanspruch in einen Wertersatzanspruch (LOA art. 57(2)). Der bösgläubige Bereicherungsschuldner hat den Marktwert oder, im Fall der Weiterveräußerung, den erzielten Kaufpreis zu zahlen; der gutgläubige Bereicherungsschuldner haftet nur in den Grenzen seiner Bereicherung und darf die Früchte behalten. Hat der Dritte das Eigentum nicht (gutgläubig) erworben, kann der Eigentümer zwischen einem Vindikationsanspruch gegen ihn und einer Kondiktion gegen den Veräußerer wählen (näher Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 593). Auch SLOVENIAN LOA art. 190(1) geht von dem Prinzip der Herausgabe in Natur aus. Nur wenn und soweit sie nicht möglich ist, kann der Bereicherungsgläubiger Ausgleich in Geld verlangen (Juhart and Plavšak [-Polajnar Pavčnik], Obligacijski zakonik II, art. 190, 46). Der bösgläubige accipiens haftet auch auf Herausgabe bzw. Wertersatz für gezogene Früchte (LOA art. 193).

6. Dem entspricht in allen wesentlichen Zügen die Rechtslage in POLAND: Herausgabe in Natur (CC art. 405) und Wertersatz, falls sie unmöglich ist (Pietrzykowski [-Pietrzykowski], Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 405, no 16; Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania część ogólna[2], p. 222, no. 665). Bei Veräußerung, Verlust oder Beschädigung erstreckt sich die Herausgabepflicht auf alles, was für die Sache erlangt worden ist (CC art. 406). Es kann sich dabei um Geld, aber auch um eine andere Sache handeln (Supreme Court 6 July 1967, III CR 117/67, OSN 1968, no. 4, pos. 67). Die bereicherte Person kann im Gegenzug Herausgabe ihrer Aufwendungen verlangen; CC art. 408 bringt dazu eine aufwendige Regelung, die im Kern zwischen notwendigen und bloß nützlichen Aufwendungen und zwischen gut- und bösgläubigen Bereicherungsschuldnern unterscheidet. Das Gericht kann, wenn der Bereicherungsgläubiger zu Aufwendungsersatz verpflichtet ist, anordnen, dass an die Stelle seines Herausgabeanspruchs in Natur ein um die Höhe des geschuldeten Aufwendungsersatzes verminderter Wertersatzanspruch tritt (CC art. 408 § 3). Für die Bestimmung der Höhe des Anspruchs stellt CC art. 409 auf den Wert der Sache im Zeitpunkt der Entscheidung ab. Grund und Grenzen dieses "Prinzips der Aktualität der Bereicherung" sind allerdings sehr umstritten.

7. DUTCH CC arts. 6:204-209 betreffen die Rückabwicklung einer ungeschuldeten Leistung durch ongedaanmaking ("Rückabwicklung in Natur"); CC art. 6:210(2) die Rückabwicklung dem Werte nach, falls das ongedaanmaking unmöglich ist. Wurden Güter (Definition in CC art. 3:1) aufgrund eines unwirksamen Vertrages geliefert, verbleibt das Eigentum i.d.R. beim solvens (CC art. 3:84(1)); die Klage richtet sich deshalb lediglich auf Rücklieferung (CC arts. 3:89-97). Bei beweglichen Sachen erfolgt die Rücklieferung durch Übergabe, sofern nicht besondere Registereintragungen erforderlich sind (CC art. 3:89). Den Schuldner treffen auch die allgemeinen Nebenpflichten desjenigen, der zu einer Lieferung verpflichtet ist. Gattungssachen (genots) sind nach den Regeln über den Wertersatz (CC art. 6:210(2)) auszugleichen (für Geld siehe die Sondervorschrift in CC art. 6:203(2)); es sind Sachen von gleicher Art, Menge und Güte zurückzugeben. In allen Fällen, in welchen Rückgabe in Natur nicht möglich ist, kommt es auf die Ursache dieser Unmöglichkeit und darauf an, ob der accipiens beim Empfang gut- oder bösgläubig war. Unter CC art. 6:204(1), einer lex specialis zu CC art. 6:74, wird dem Emfpänger die Unmöglichkeit der Rückgabe nicht zugerechnet, wenn er mit ihr (noch) nicht rechnen musste. CC art. 6:204(1) betrifft Verlust und Wertminderung von Sachen. Liegt dagegen ein Zurechnugsgrund vor, verbleibt es bei der allgemeinen Schadenshaftung unter CC arts. 6:74. Sie schließt eine Haftung auf erlangte Vorteile (z.B. Veräußerungsgewinne) ein (CC art. 6:78). Im Falle der Wertminderung ist neben der Rückgabe der Sache ein Ausgleich für den Wertverlust in Geld zu entrichten (CC art. 6:278). Ein bösgläubiger Empfänger gerät mit dem Erhalt der Sache ex lege in Verzug (CC art. 6:205), so dass er zusätzlich Ersatz des Verzögerungsschadens schuldet (CC art. 6:85). Die Klage aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung (CC art. 6:212) ist zwar eine Schadenersatzklage, doch kann auch Schadensersatz in natura erbracht werden (CC art. 6:103), was wiederum bedeutet, dass der Unterschied zwischen der Klage aus ungeschuldeter Leistung und derjenigen aus ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung gering ist.

8. Under ESTONIAN law muss die bereicherte Person dasjenige zurückgeben 'was sie erhalten hat. Diese Pflicht zur Rückgabe in specie schließt die Rückübertragung von Besitz ein, desgleichen die Rückgängigmachung (Löschung) einer unrichtigen Grundbucheintragung (Supreme Court 1 December 2005, civil matter no. 3-2-1-129-05). Die Herausgabepflicht schließt die Pflicht zur Herausgabe gezogener Früchte ein. Bei Zerstörung, Verbrauch oder Beschädigung ist der erlangte Ersatz zu ersetzen, andernfalls Wertersatz nach dem Wert im Zeitpunkt der Entstehung des Bereicherungsanspruchs. Ein Wahlrecht wie in VII.–5:101(2) kennt das Estonian LOA nicht. Es kann sich aber aus dem allgemeinen Prinzip von Treu und Glauben ergeben, und es ist außerdem (für die öffentliche Hand) ausdrücklich vorgesehen in State Liability Act (Riigivastutuse seadus, RT I 2001, 47, 260; 2006, 48, 360) § 22

II. Erwerb eines Ersatzes für die Bereicherung

9. Unter FRENCH and BELGIAN CC art. 1380 muss derjenige, der eine Sache, die er zwar gutgläubig, aber rechtsgrundlos erhalten hat, weiterverkauft, dem solvens den Kaufpreis herausgeben. Hat ein Dritter eine Sache des Eigentümers verkauft und ist die Veräußerung dem Eigentümer gegenüber wirksam, kann er vom Dritten Herausgabe des Kaufpreises verlangen (Cass.civ. 16 March 1999, pourvoi no. 96-20877; Cass. 17 November 1983, Pas. belge, 1984, I, 295-297). In Fällen dieser Art verwandelt sich ein ursprünglich auf Sachherausgabe gerichteter Anspruch in einen Geldanspruch; das Geld tritt an die Stelle der Sache (de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge III(2)3, 62). Immer dann, wenn die Herausgabe in Natur nicht möglich ist, erfolgt sie par équivalent (CA Liège 26 May 2003, no. de rôle 2000RG919, decision no. F-20030526-4).

10. Für SPAIN and ITALY siehe bereits die notes under I2-3. Bei Verfügungen über fremde Sachen hat der Verfügende unter Spanish law den erzielten Kaufpreis herauszugeben, see note 2 under VII.–5:102 below. Ein allgemeines Prinzip, wonach der Bereicherte auch das Surrogat seiner Bereicherung herauszugeben habe, existiert aber nicht. Vor allem verbleibt dem Bereicherten dasjenige, was er mit empfangenen Geld erworben hat. Denn es gehört ihm (Carrasco Perera, ADC 1988, 5, 70-72; TS 19 October 1973, RAJ 1973 (2), no 3800, p. 3022 [Widerruf der Schenkung von Geld mit Wirkung ex tunc; Anspruch nur auf das Geld mit Zinsen, nicht aber auf das damit erworbene Grundstück]). In der umgekehrten Situation – der accipiens veräußert in gutem Glauben die ihm gelieferte Sache – muss der accipiens dagegen unter CC art. 1897 entweder den erzielten Kaufpreis oder den Anspruch auf ihn an den solvens übertragen. Ob es sich hierbei um einen Anspruch auf ein Surrogat oder lediglich um eine Methode zur Berechnung des Wertes der Bereicherung handelt, ist freilich offen (näher Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 296). Der Anspruch auf das sogen. stellvertretende commodum unter CC art. 1186 anderseits ist zwar auf die Herausgabe eines Surrogats gerichtet; CC art. 1186 findet jedoch im Bereicherungsrecht keine Anwendung (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 658).

11. Unter GERMAN CC § 818(1) erstreckt sich der Bereicherungsanspruch auch auf bestimmte Surrogate für das ursprünglich Erlangte (BGH 27 February 2007, NJW 2007, 3127, 3130). Zu ihnen gehört dasjenige, was der Empfänger auf Grund eines erlangten Rechtes erworben hat, d.h. Surrogate, welche der Empfänger in bestimmungsgemäßer Ausübung des Rechts erlangt (das auf Grund einer rechtsgrundlos erhaltenen Forderung eingezogene Geld, der Gewinn aus einem rechtsgrundlos erlangten Los, der Erlös aus der Verwertung eines rechtsgrundlos erhaltenen Pfandrechts [Staudinger [-S. Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 818, no. 17; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 818, no. 14] oder einer Grundschuld [BGH 29 September 1989, NJW 1990, 392]). CC § 818(1) umfasst jedoch nicht das sogen. commodum ex negotiatione, also das rechtsgeschäftliche Surrogat (BGH 11 April 1957, BGHZ 24, 106, 110; BGH 11 October 1979, BGHZ 75, 203, 206; BGH 8 October 1990, BGHZ 112, 288, 294): hat jemand rechtsgrundlos Geld erhalten und mit ihm ein Los gekauft, verbleibt ihm der darauf entfallende Gewinn (S. Lorenz loc.cit.; Sprau loc.cit.). Desgleichen tritt eine mit rechtsgrundlos empfangenem Geld (nichtiger Darlehensvertrag) erworbene Eigentumswohnung nicht an die Stelle des Geldes (BGH 18 November 1982, NJW 1983, 868, 870). Zu den herausgabepflichtigen Surrogaten gehört ferner das, was vom Empfänger als Ersatz für die Zerstörung, Beschädigung oder Entziehung des erlangten Gegenstandes erworben wurde. Das betrifft im wesentlichen Leistungen durch Versicherungen. Das PORTUGUESE Schrifttum teilt diese Ansichten. Obwohl in CC art. 479(1) eine German CC § 818(1) gleichende Vorschrift fehlt, schließt man aus der Formulierung, dass alles herauszugeben sei, was auf Kosten des Verarmten erlangt wurde (tudo quanto se tenha obtido à custa do empobrecido), auf dieselben Ergebnisse (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 511; Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 883). Geschuldet ist also auch in Portugal das commodum ex re (Früchte, Vorteile aus der Sache, Surrogate, Versicherungsleistungen etc), nicht aber das commodum ex negotiatione (Menezes Leitão loc.cit.).

12. In SLOVENIA wird gesagt, dass ein accipiens, der für den ihn bereichernden Gegenstand einen Ersatz erlangt, den Letzteren herausgeben muss. Als Hauptbeispiel dient der aus der Weiterveräußerung einer Sache erzielte Kaufpreis. Der gutgläubige accipiens, der die Sache verschenkt, ist dagegen dem solvens bereicherungsrechtlich nicht mehr verantwortlich (Cigoj, Teorija obligacij, 260). In HUNGARY sind Surrogate entweder als erlangte Vorteile i.S.v. CC § 361(1) oder als Vorteile zu qualifizieren, die dem Schuldner den Einwand des Wegfalls der Bereicherung (§ 361(2)) abschneiden (Petrik [-Bíró], Polgári jog II[2], 654/1, 654/4). Denn eine Bereicherung ist nicht weggefallen, wenn sie sich lediglich in anderer Form im Vermögen des Bereicherten erhalten hat, und sei es auch in der Form ersparter Aufwendungen (BH 1987/312 und BH 1993/500: Verwendung überzahlten Geldes für Verbrauchsgüter und teure Reisen bzw. für Lebensunterhalt; keine Entreicherung).

13. Das DUTCH law kennt nur wenige Surragotions- oder Substitutionsregeln (z.B. in CC arts. 3:167 3:213(1), 3:229(1) und 3:283). Sie finden sich im Familienrecht und im Recht der Verwertung von Sicherheiten, nicht aber im Bereicherungsrecht (zu CC art. 6:90 s. sogleich). Zur Begründung wird auf andernfalls drohende Konflikte mit den allgemeinen Regeln über den Eigentumserwerb verwiesen (Perrick, WPNR 2008, no. 6753, 345-353); auch handele es sich bei der Rückgabe von nur der Gattung nach bestimmten Sachen nicht um eine Substitution, sondern um eine Form des Wertersatzes (Scheltema, Onverschuldigde betaling, 153-154; Russchen, WPNR 1994, no. 6154, 713). Im Ergebnis freilich besteht auch under DUTCH law die Verpflichtung des gutgläubigen accipiens, der die Sache weiterverkauft, den erzielten Kaufpreis herauszugeben. Sie folgt zwar nicht aus CC arts. 6:74 und 6:204 (Haftung für zurechenbare Verletzung der Rückgabepflicht), aber sie ergibt sich aus CC art. 6:78, der eine schadensrechtliche Haftung auf den erlangten Vorteil nach bereicherungsrechtlichen Vorschriften auch für den Fall vorsieht, dass die Verletzung der Rückgabepflicht dem accipiens nicht zugerechnet werden kann (bei verderblichen Sachen besteht sogar eine Verwertungspflicht mit der Folge, dass der Erlös an die Stelle der Sache tritt: CC art. 6:90, see Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 318; Perrick loc.cit.; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 333, p. 350 and Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 383 p. 304).

14. Under ESTONIAN LOA § 1032(1) erstreckt sich der Bereicherungsanspruch auch auf den Ersatz, den der Schuldner für die Zerstörung, den Verbrauch, die Beschädigung oder die Verwertung der Sache erlangt hat. Dazu gehören Versicherungsleistungen, Schadenersatzansprüche und Verkaufserlöse. Wurde die Sache dagegen gegen eine andere getauscht, so besteht kein Anspruch auf Herausgabe der eingetauschten Sache; es bleibt dann bei einem Geldanspruch in Höhe des Wertes der weggebenen Sache (Tampuu, Lepinguväliste võlasuhete õigus, 95 and 107).

III. Definition des guten Glaubens

15. FRENCH and BELGIAN CC arts. 1378-1380 unterscheiden ausdrücklich zwischen Personen, die das Nichtgeschuldete de mauvaise foi bzw. de bonne foi erlangt haben. Der bösgläubige Empfänger haftet u.a. auch auf Zinsen und andere Früchte. Das Gesetz, so wird gesagt, gebe damit dem Richter ein billigkeitsrechtliches Korrekturinstrument an die Hand (Albiges, De l'équité en droit privé, no. 341). Der Tatrichter entscheidet in souveränem Ermessen. Gutgläubig ist, wer nicht weiß, dass die ihm erbrachte Leistung ohne Rechtsgrund erfolgte (Bénabent, Les obligations[9], no. 479 p. 317; Labour Court Mons 3 January 2001, no de rôle 11507). Auch in SPAIN hängt, wenn der accipiens die Sache nicht mehr in Natur herausgeben kann, der Umfang seiner Haftung von Gut- und Bösgläubigkeit ab (CC arts. 1896 and 1897). Ein accipiens ist jedenfalls gutgläubig, wenn er nicht wusste, dass die ihm erbrachte Leistung nicht geschuldet war (Gullón Ballesteros, FS Batlle Vázquez, 367, 374; Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Ballarín Hernández], Código Civil II[2], 1960). Anders als im Rahmen des Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnisses (CC art. 433) wird für das Recht der Leistungskondiktion allerdings angenommen, dass auch ein accipiens, der das fehlende Besitzrecht fahrlässig verkennt, als bösgläubig anzusehen ist (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 532; Gullón Ballesteros loc.cit. 374). Wer gutgläubig empfangen hat, dann aber den fehlenden Rechtsgrund erfährt, steht ab diesem Zeitpunkt unter dem strengen Regime der Bösgläubigenhaftung (TS 22 January 2001, RAJ 2001 (1) no. 1324 p. 2147).

16. ITALIAN CC art. 1147(1) definiert: "Gutgläubiger Besitzer ist, wer besitzt, ohne zu wissen, dass er das Recht eines anderen verletzt". Diese Definition des guten Glaubens findet auch für das Recht der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld Verwendung. Einzelheiten sind allerdings nach wie vor umstritten. Im Falle der Zahlung einer objektiven Nichtschuld besteht der gute Glaube in der Unkenntnis der Tatsache, dass die Zahlung nicht geschuldet war; im Falle der Zahlung einer subjektiven Nichtschuld dagegen in der Unkenntnis des Irrtums des solvens (näher Breccia, Riv.Dir.Civ. 1974, I, 130). Nach CC art. 1147(2) ist nicht gutgläubig, wessen Unwissenheit auf grober Fahrlässigkeit beruht. Der accipiens indebiti kann sich aber nicht auf das mala fides superveniens non nocet Prinzip des CC art. 1147(3) berufen: Wie in Spanien, so gilt auch in Italy ab Eintritt der Bösgläubigkeit das verschärfte Ersatzregime (Cass. 5 July 1997, no. 6074, Giust.civ.Mass. 1997, 1145). Der bösgläubige Empfänger haftet auf Wert und Zinsen, der gutgläubige nur auf seine Bereicherung, und auf Zinsen erst ab dem Tag der Klagezustellung (CC art. 2037(2); Cass. 20 March 1982, no. 1813, Rep.Giur.it. 1982, voce Indebito no. 8). Der bösgläubige Empfänger haftet auch dafür, dass er die Sache ohne Verschulden nicht oder nicht unbeschädigt zurückgeben kann; er ist nur befreit, wenn der Leistungsgegenstand auch beim Gläubiger untergegangen wäre (CC art. 1221(1)).

17. In GERMANY gelten dieselben Grundsätze. Gut- bzw. Bösgläubigkeit des Bereicherungsschuldners wirken sich auf den Umfang seiner Haftung aus. Nach herrschender Meinung gilt das auch im Falle der Veräußerung einer rechtsgrundlos erworbenen Sache: der gutgläubige accipiens haftet nur auf den Wert der empfangenen Sache, nicht aber auf den mit ihr erzielten Gewinn (see note II11 above), der bösgläubige Bereicherungsschuldner muss dagegen unter CC §§ 819(1), 818(4), 285 den gesamten Veräußerungserlös herausgeben (BGH 11 October 1979, BGHZ 75, 203; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 818, no. 52; Staudinger [-S. Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 818, no. 50; näher Reuter and Martinek, Ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung, § 18 I, p. 631). Bösgläubigkeit i.S.v. CC § 819(1) bedeutet positive Kenntnis der Tatsachen, aus denen sich das Fehlen des Rechtsgrundes ergibt, und Wissen um die Rückgabepflicht (BGH 12 July 1996, BGHZ 133, 246, 249; BGH 17 June 1992, BGHZ 118, 383, 392). Fahrlässige Unkenntnis bzw. Kennenmüssen reichen nicht aus, auch nicht im Falle der groben Fahrlässigkeit (wie unter CC § 932(2) im Rahmen des gutgläubigen Erwerbs vom Nichtberechtigten). Auch bloße Zweifel am Fortbestand des Rechtsgrundes begründen keine Bösgläubigkeit. Allerdings genügt Kenntnis der Anfechtbarkeit eines Rechtsgeschäfts (CC §142(2)); ficht die andere Seite tatsächlich an, gilt deshalb die verschärfte Haftung rückwirkend (CC § 142(1)) bereits ab dem Zeitpunkt der Kenntnis von der Anfechtbarkeit und deren Rechtsfolgen (Sprau loc.cit. § 819, no. 2; S. Lorenz loc.cit. § 819, no. 5).

18. Boa fé im Sinne von PORTUGUESE CC arts. 119(3), 243(2), 1260(1) und 1340(4) bedeutet grundsätzlich Unkentnis der in den genannten Vorschriften bezeichneten Tatsachen (Menezes Cordeiro, Da boa fé no Direito Civil I, 23). Unter CC art. 1260(1) ist demgemäß der Besitz gutgläubig, wenn der Besitzer beim Besitzerwerb nicht wusste, dass er das Recht eines anderen verletzte; der gute Glaube endet mit Klagezustellung (CCP art. 481(a)) oder Erlangung der Kenntnis über die Abwesenheit des Rechtgrundes (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 902; Menezes Cordeiro loc.cit. 490; CA Oporto 22 July 1986, CJ XI [1986-4] 221). Bereicherungsrechtlich führt der böse Glaube zu einer Verschärfung der Rückerstattungspflicht (CC art. 480). Der bösgläubige Bereicherungsschuldner haftet nicht nur für den schuldhaften Untergang oder die schuldhafte Verschlechterung der Sache, sondern auch für schuldhaft nicht gezogene Früchte und für die gesetzlichen Zinsen. CC art. 480 setzt anders als die meisten übrigen Rechtsordnungen also zwar Verschulden voraus, doch handelt es sich nach herrschender Meinung um eine Haftung aus widerleglich vermutetem Verschulden (CC art. 799 analog, see Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 902).

19. Auch unter SLOVENIAN law ist gutgläubig, wer den Mangel des Rechtsgrundes nicht kennt. Der gute Glaube wird vermutet; Bösgläubigkeit des accipiens muss vom solvens bewiesen werden (Juhart and Plavšak [-Polajnar Pavčnik], Obligacijski zakonik II, art. 193, 53). Unter BULGARIA LOA ist der gutgläubige Bereicherungsschuldner bei Veräußerung, Verbrauch oder Untergang der Sache nur zur Herausgabe desjenigen verpflichtet, was sich anstelle der Sache noch in seinem Vermögen befindet; wer sich gutgläubig des Dokumentes begeben hat, das seine Forderung verkörperte, oder wer gutgläubig eine Sicherheit aufgegeben hat, haftet dem Bereicherungsgläubiger gar nicht; der Letztere tritt allerdings in die Rechte des Schuldners ein (LOA art. 56, see Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 590). Nach HUNGARIAN Auffassung ist gutgläubig, wer die wirkliche Rechtslage weder kennt noch bei Aufwendung der erforderlichen Sorgfalt kennen muss (Bíró and Lenkovics, Általános tanok, 201; Lábady, A magyar magánjog (polgári jog) általános része, 308). Der Bösgläubige kann sich nicht auf den Wegfall der Bereicherung berufen(CC § 361 (2)); außerdem haftet er auf die aus dem Bereicherungsgegenstand gezogenen Nutzungen (CC §§ 363(1), 195).

20. DUTCH CC art. 3:11 stellt klar, dass guter Glaube abwesend ist, wenn ein vernünftiger Empfänger hätte wissen müssen, dass ihm die Leistung nicht zusteht. Guter bzw. böser Glaube beziehen sich sowohl auf tatsächliche als auch auf rechtliche Aspekte. Wer zwar nicht alle Tatsachen kennt, aber wissen muss, dass die Leistung rechtsgrundlos erfolgt, ist nicht gutgläubig: findet sich auf dem eigenen Konto Geld, von dem man nicht weiß, wer es überwiesen oder eingezahlt hat, ist man ebensowenig gutgläubig wie wenn auf eine Forderung doppelt gezahlt wird. Abgestellt wird auf den Maßstab eines vernünftigen accipiens (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht II[12], no. 302, p. 306; Scheltema, Onverschuldigde betaling, 163).

21. ESTONIAN GPCCA § 139 stellt die allgemeine Regel auf, dass guter Glaube vermutet wird. Gutgläubigkeit entfällt nicht nur bei positiver Kenntnis, sondern grundsätzlich auch schon bei fahrlässiger Unkenntnis der relevanten Tatsachen. Im Sinne des Bereicherungsrechts ist bösgläubig, wer entweder die Abwesenheit eines Rechtsgrundes kennt oder sich (im Falle der Eingriffskondiktion) des Umstandes bewusst war, dass es an einem rechtfertigenden Grund für die Verletzung der Rechtsposition eines anderen fehlte. Dem bösgläubigen Bereicherungsschuldner ist die Berufung auf einen Wegfall seiner Bereicherung abgeschnitten; außerdem haftet er auf einen den Wert der empfangenen Sache überschreitenden Veräußerungserlös, auf Zinsen für empfangenes Geld und auf Ersatz desjenigen, was bei ordentlicher Verwaltung mit dem Bereicherungsgegenstand hätte verdient werden können.

Illustration 3 draws on CA Bizkaia 1 February 2001, AC 2001 (1) no. 253 p. 391; illustration 4 is derived from BGH 5 July 2006, BGHZ 168, 220; illustration 5 is taken from TS 11 February 2003, RAJ 2003 (1) no. 1004 p. 1906.

VII.–5:102: Non-transferable enrichment

(1) Where the enrichment does not consist of a transferable asset, the enriched person reverses the enrichment by paying its monetary value to the disadvantaged person.

(2) The enriched person is not liable to pay more than any saving if the enriched person:

(a) did not consent to the enrichment; or

(b) was in good faith.

(3) However, where the enrichment was obtained under an agreement which fixed a price or value for the enrichment, the enriched person is at least liable to pay that sum if the agreement was void or voidable for reasons which were not material to the fixing of the price.

(4) Paragraph (3) does not apply so as to increase liability beyond the monetary value of the enrichment.

COMMENTS

A. General

Overview. This Article sets out the measure of liability and particularises the required mode of reversal of the unjustified enrichment, provided for by the basic rule, where the enrichment which is obtained does not consist of a transferable asset. The enrichment is to be reversed by monetary payment. Depending on the circumstances, the scale of that payment may be any of (i) the full value of the enrichment (paragraph (1)), (ii) the amount which the enriched person has saved by having the benefit of the enrichment (paragraph (2)), or (iii) an amount agreed to be paid for the enrichment (paragraph (3)).

Enrichments which are not transferable assets. This Article will apply only where the enrichment which has been obtained without justification does not take the form of an asset which is transferable. It thus addresses all the cases which fall outside the scope of the preceding Article. (As to the transferability of assets, see Comment B on VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment)). It applies where the enrichment takes the form of an increase in assets, but that asset is not transferable. It will also apply where the unjustified enrichment is by its nature not transferable. This is the case where the enrichment has taken any form other than an increase in assets – in other words, a decrease in liabilities, receipt of a service or work, or a use of an asset of the disadvantaged person.

B. Basic liability: paragraph (1)

Monetary value as maximum liability. The basic liability of a person who is enriched other than by receipt of a transferable asset is to pay the monetary value of the enrichment. This basic liability also represents the maximum liability under this Article. The first alternative measure of liability provided for in paragraph (2) is of relevance only in so far as it reduces liability ("The enriched person is not liable to pay more than ...."). Likewise, the third possible measure of liability set out in paragraph (3) operates, when applicable, only in so far as it does not increase liability beyond the basic measure of liability: this is explicitly stated in paragraph (4). Under this Article, therefore, the enriched person is never liable to pay more than the monetary value of the enrichment.

Monetary value. The meaning of monetary value of an enrichment is explained in VII.–5:103 (Monetary value of an enrichment; saving).

C. Reduced liability: paragraph (2)

Reduced liability. Paragraph (2) provides for a lesser quantum of liability for the enriched person based on what the enriched person has in fact saved as a result of the enrichment. If the saving made by the enriched person exceeds the monetary value of the enrichment, this paragraph will not operate to increase liability beyond the basis measure. It can serve only to reduce liability.

Measure of liability: saving. When this paragraph applies, the liability is to pay no more than the enriched person has saved as a result of obtaining the enrichment. The meaning of a saving is explained in VII.–5:103 (Monetary value of an enrichment; saving).

Circumstances in which liability is reduced. The provision applies if the enriched person did not consent to the enrichment. In other words, the enrichment occurred without the enriched person's request or participation. It will also apply if the enriched person consented to the enrichment, but was in good faith. The notion of good faith which is defined in paragraph (5) of VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment) applies correspondingly here. See Comment E to that Article for details. Accordingly the enriched person is protected by paragraph (2) if having no reason to know that the enrichment was or would be unjustified.

Rationale. The purpose of this paragraph is to protect the innocent recipient of a non-transferable enrichment. Whereas the innocent recipient of a transferable asset can reverse the enrichment by the (usually) comparatively painless task of returning the enrichment (that is to say, making it available to the disadvantaged person), the innocent recipient of a non-transferable enrichment can necessarily only reverse the enrichment by a monetary payment and is therefore compelled in effect to purchase what they have enjoyed. A liability to pay the monetary value of the enrichment has the potential to produce injustice if the enrichment was thrust on the enriched person or if the enrichment was accepted in circumstances where it could not be appreciated that there would be a liability to pay for its (full) value. Limiting the liability is required in order to do justice to the negative aspect of the principle of party autonomy: individuals are not to be forced into exchanges without their consent. In such a case the liability of the enriched person ought generally to be limited to the extent to which the enriched person is, in point of fact, better off. Liability to this extent will leave the enriched person no worse off as a result of the reversal of enrichment; it simply strips away the actual gain, if any.

> Illustration
> Making a mistake as to the address of a new client, D cleans E's windows. E had not requested this service and the cleaning takes place in E's absence. E has not consented to the enrichment and accordingly E's liability in respect of the unjustified enrichment is governed by paragraph (2) of this article. E is liable only for what E has saved. E will have a saving and will be liable accordingly if, for example, (i) E was in the habit of commissioning window cleaning on an ad hoc basis, cleaning was due, and E was able to postpone the next cleaning, or (ii) E cancelled a scheduled window cleaning with another firm without penalty. If, on the other hand, E's windows had just been cleaned, or are cleaned shortly afterwards by a regular contractor without regard to C's additional service, E will have saved nothing and liability will be nil.

D. Intermediate liability: paragraphs (3) and (4)

Measure of liability under paragraph (3). Although as a rule an enriched person who has obtained a non-transferable enrichment in good faith should not be made to pay more than what has been saved, there is one situation in which a reduction of liability to this extent would go too far. Paragraph (3) addresses that situation and provides for a measure of intermediate liability – liability which is less than payment of the full monetary value of the benefit, but more than any actual saving resulting from it. The measure of liability under paragraph (3) is determined by a price or value fixed by the agreement pursuant to which the enrichment was provided.

Intermediate liability. The provision operates as a brake on the reduction of liability from monetary value to actual savings, fixing liability at a point in between. It applies only when it results in the circumstances in an intermediate measure of liability. If the price or value agreed was more than the market value of the enrichment (representing its monetary value), the enriched person will not be liable to pay the agreed price, only the lesser sum which is the monetary value as monetary value always constitutes the maximum liability. This rule is provided for expressly in paragraph (4). It follows that paragraph (3) will not be applicable if the enriched person made a bad bargain and agreed to pay more than the objective worth of the enrichment. If the enriched person has actually saved more than the agreed payment, this paragraph will again be immaterial because the enriched person will remain liable to pay what has been saved. Actual savings are in all cases a minimum liability (unless that measure too would exceed the monetary value of the enrichment). Paragraph (3) is only material if what the enriched person genuinely agreed to pay is more than what has been saved, but less than the market value of the benefit obtained.

Rationale. If the enriched person solicited the enrichment on the basis that a price ought to be paid, that may be relevant as showing the enriched person's preparedness to pay for the benefit actually received. It might be, for example, that the enriched person bargained for the enrichment under an agreement which, it later transpires, was void as a contract. Clearly the price agreed under the contract cannot automatically serve as the measure of the enriched person's liability since otherwise reversal of the enrichment would amount to indirect enforcement of the contract – in direct contradiction of the rules invalidating the contract and giving rise to the unjustified status of the enrichment in the first place. On the other hand, if the enriched person accepted an enrichment in the assumption that it would have to be paid for, there is no hardship in compelling the enriched person to pay the agreed price for the enrichment, provided that the agreed price does not exceed the actual value of the enrichment and the fixing of the price is unaffected by the reasons impairing the validity of the contract. In other words, the basic liability (payment of the monetary value of the enrichment) can be reinstated to the extent that it does not exceed the enriched person's expectations of liability at the time the enrichment was accepted.

A price or value genuinely fixed. A key limitation on imposing intermediate liability (in place of reduced liability measured by actual savings) is that the enriched person should not be held to an estimation of the value of an enrichment which suffers from a defect of consent. If the contract was induced by fraud, for example, or if the enriched person suffers from reduced legal capacity, the enriched person cannot properly be made to pay according to the assessment of the worth of the benefit to be received since that assessment, like the contract, will be tainted by the fraud or lack of capacity. This concern is addressed in this paragraph by the requirement that the price or value of the enrichment be genuinely fixed: the reasons for which the agreement is void or voidable as a contract must not be such as to relate to or cast doubt upon the fixing of the price. The requirement will not be satisfied if the contract was void or voidable (and avoided by the enriched person) for reasons which are relevant to the ability to judge properly the value of the enrichment received. The case is otherwise if the contract is void only for some technical reason which has no bearing on the content of the agreement because the parties' judgements are not affected.

NOTES

1. In FRANCE and BELGIUM werden Fragen zum Haftungsumfang grundsätzlich als Tatsachenfragen verstanden; sie unterliegen deshalb der souveränen Entscheidungsbefugnis des Tatrichters (z.B. Cass.civ. 3 December 2002, pourvoi no. 01-11032 und CA Anvers 8 April 1987, Pas. belge 1987, II, 145). Dienstleistungen fallen nach herrschender Auffassung nicht unter den Begriff des paiement i.S.d. Rechts des paiement de l´indu. Ihre Rückabwicklung unterliegt vielmehr dem Recht der enrichissement sans cause. Eine ausgefeilte Lehre des Schutzes vor einem enrichissement imposé scheint es nicht zu geben. Der Grundgedanke ist aber auch dem französischen Recht geläufig und wird in dem Prinzip ausgedrückt, dass niemand aus seiner eigenen faute einen Vorteil ziehen darf; die faute des Verarmten wird zum Rechtfertigungsgrund für den Bereicherten, die Bereicherung zu behalten (Cass.civ. 23 January 1978, JCP 1980, I, 1, 19365, note Thuillier; Wernecke, Abwehr und Ausgleich aufgedrängter Bereicherungen, 279-288). Der Verbraucherschutz vor unbestellten Waren und Dienstleistungen ergibt sich aus Code de la consommation art. L122-3.

2. In SPAIN gilt wie unter VII.–5:102 die Grundregel, dass der Bereicherungsausgleich dem Werte nach erfolgt, wenn Rückgewähr in specie nicht möglich ist (Carrasco Perera, ADC 1988, 5, 97). CC arts. 645, 650, 457, 1185, 1147, 1303 and 1295 sind Ausdruck dieses Prinzips. Kann der accipiens eine empfangene Leistung entweder nicht mehr zurückerstatten oder handelt es sich um eine Dienstleistung, so ist Wertersatz geschuldet, auch im Falle der Rückabwicklung nach den Regeln des Nichtigkeitsrechts (CC art. 1307), see generally Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 129). Größere Schwierigkeiten bereitet die Festlegung des Haftungsumfanges im Recht der condictio por intromisión en derecho ajeno. Zumeist wird heute vorgeschlagen, Vorschriften des Besitzrechts (insbesondere CC arts. 451 ff and 353 ff) entsprechend anzuwenden (Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 121; Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 221). Aus ihnen, insbesondere aus CC art. 455 und dem dort Verwendung findenden Begriff der frutos percibidos ('fruits obtained') wird geschlossen, dass der Wert der Nutzung der Sache das richtige Maß für die Haftung aus Eingriffsbereicherung sei (Basozabal Arrue loc.cit. 263). Das bestätigten auch CC arts. 1547 and 1553(2) (unwirksamer Mietvertrag; Rückgabe der Sache und Nutzungsausgleich in Höhe des vereinbarten Mietzinses), TS 10 November 1966, RAJ 1966 (2) no. 4881 p. 3106 (unwirksamer Kaufvertrag; Nutzung der Maschine als Fruchtziehung im zivilrechtlichen Sinn) und mehrere instanzgerichtliche Entscheidungen (z.B. CA Barcelona 26 November 2004, BDA JUR 2005/15139). Bei Verfügungen über fremde Sachen soll zwar der erzielte Erlös herausgabepflichtig sein (TS 10 March 1958, RAJ 1958 (1) no. 1068 p. 686; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 126; Basozabal Arrue loc.cit. 296-297), doch lasse sich auch dies als Bestätigung dafür deuten, dass sich der Nutzungswert in allen Fällen, in denen der Bereicherte mit einem Preis einverstanden war, nach diesem Preis berechnen lasse (Basozabal Arrue loc.cit. 296). Zum Schutz vor enriquecimientos impuestos (aufgedrängten Bereicherungen) wird vorgeschlagen, nötigenfalls mit einem bilanziellen oder 'net enrichment approach' zu operieren (Carrasco Perera loc. cit. 100; id., CCJC 1986, 3215, 3223; see also TS 25 November 1985, RAJ 1985 (3) no. 5898 p. 4987 [der Umfang einer Bereicherung dürfe nicht nur nach dem bestimmt werden, was der Bereicherte empfangen habe, sondern auch danach, ob der Kläger eine echte Verarmung erlitten habe]). Für den Versuch einer Systematisierung der gesetzlichen Lösungen im Rahmen der condictio por impensas siehe Basozabal Arrue loc. cit. 321-322. Aus der Summe dieser Regeln folge, dass jemand, der bösgläubig Aufwendungen auf fremde Sachen mache, grundsätzlich keinen Bereicherungsausgleich verlangen könne; ebenso im Ergebnis TS 3 March 2003, RAJ 2003 (2) no. 2536 p. 4695 [Haftung für eine bösgläubig aufgedrängte Bereicherung ausdrücklich abgelehnt]; TS 29 October 2007, BDA RJ 2007/8641 and CA Guadalajara 21 February 2007, BDA JUR 2007/132619. In Übereinstimmung mit VII.–5:102(3) scheinen die Gerichte schließlich den Wert einer empfangenen Bereicherung unter Berücksichtigung des von den Parteien vereinbarten Preises zu bestimmen (see, for instance, for tenancy and lease contracts CA Ciudad Real 30 March 2004, BDA JUR 2004/128779; CA Barcelona 18 January 2007, BDA JUR 2007/177992 and CA Barcelona 26 November 2004 loc. cit.). Ein vereinbarter Preis wird als ein brauchbares Indiz für den Wert einer Bereicherung angesehen, die nicht in Natur zurückgegeben werden kann (see also TS 6 June 1951, RAJ 1951 no. 1877 p. 1281).

3. In ITALY ist umstritten, ob sich die Rückabwicklung von facere-Leistungen nach dem Recht der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld oder nach Bereicherungsrecht richtet; die jüngere Rechtsprechung geht den letzteren Weg (Cass. 13 November 1991, no. 12093, Giust.civ.Mass. 1991, fasc. 11; Cass. 10 June 1992, no. 7112, Giust.civ.Mass. 1992, fasc. 6; Cass. 19 August 1992, no. 9675, Foro it. 1993, I, 428; CFI Milan 3 July 1997, Riv.giur.circ.trasp. 1998, 519). Bei der Feststellung der Höhe der Rückerstattungspflicht wird regelmäßig auf den sich aus der Vereinbarung ergebenden Preis, sonst auf den Marktwert der Leistung Bezug genommen. Für Arbeitsverträge sieht CC art. 2126 ausdrücklich vor, dass die Vertragsnichtigkeit nur ausnahmsweise ex tunc wirkt; es bleibt also auch hier bei dem vereinbarten Lohn. Für die Rückabwicklung eines nichtigen Pachtvertrages (in diesem Fall nach den Regeln der condictio indebiti) soll es zwar nach CFI Bologna 1 December 1964, Giur.it. 1965, I, 2, 826 auf den vereinbarten Pachtzins, nicht auf den Nettogewinn des Pächters ankommen. Doch hat Cass. 3 May 1991, no. 4849, Giur.it. 1991, I, 1, 1314 entschieden, dass die Rückzahlung des Mietzines für eine Immobilie den Mieter ungerechtfertigt bereichern würde, weshalb der Nichtigkeit in solchen Fällen nur ex nunc-Wirkung beizumessen sei. CFI Milan 3 July 1997 loc. cit. prüft die Rückabwicklung eines nichtigen Beförderungsvertrages nach Bereicherungsrecht und kommt zu dem Ergebnis, dass die erbrachten Leistungen mangels Verarmung unberührt bleiben sollten. Gesetzliche Regeln zum Problem der aufgedrängten Bereicherung finden sich u.a. in CC arts. 936 und 937, die umfangreiche Regelung zu Anpflanzungen bzw. zum Bauen auf fremdem Grund treffen; eine vertiefte Diskussion der allgemeinen Problematik scheint sich nicht entwickelt zu haben.

4. Under PORTUGUESE CC art. 479(1) muss alles zurückgegeben werden, was auf Kosten des Verarmten erlangt wurde. Das schließt die Haftung für den Wert von Dienstleistungen und Nutzungen ein; zwischen der Leistungs- und der Eingriffsbereicherung wird insoweit nicht unterschieden (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 811). Anerkannt ist auch, dass namentlich bei der Kondiktion von Aufwendungen der Bereicherte vor einer Haftung vor einer aufgedrängten Bereicherung geschützt werden muss (Menezes Leitão loc.cit). Das Gesetz befasst sich mit dem enriquecimento forçado vor allem im Recht der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag und im Recht des Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnisses, gelegentlich aber auch im Vertragsrecht (Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 316, 322; Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 810). Ein Beispiel findet sich in CC art. 1214, wonach die Leistung eines Werkunternehmers als mangelhaft anzusehen ist, wenn sie gegen oder ohne eine Weisung des Werkbestellers (z.B. des Bauherren) erfolgt; dieser kann das veränderte Werk zwar akzeptieren, wird dadurch aber nicht verpflichtet, einen höheren Preis zu zahlen oder seine Bereicherung auszugleichen (CC art. 1214(2) mit Sonderregelung in (3)). Beim Bauen und Pflanzen auf fremden Grund (CC arts. 1333-1343) bleibt der Eigentümer dagegen, wenn er nicht Entfernung des Bauwerkes verlangt, zu einem Bereicherungsausgleich auch dem Bösgläubigen gegenüber verpflichtet (Kritik daran bei Gomes loc.cit. 337). Ebenso liegt es, wenn Verwendungen auf eine Sache nicht ohne deren Zerstörung oder Beschädigung entfernt werden können (CC art. 1273), was Züge einer imposição de enriquecimento trägt (Menezes Leitão loc. cit. 811). Einer Haftung aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung ist ferner der Geschäftsherr ausgesetzt, wenn eine ihm erbrachte auftragslose Geschäftsführung seinem Interesse oder Willen widerspricht (CC art. 468(2)). STJ 22 January 2008, Processo 07A4154 lehnt jedoch ein indemnização für nützliche Verbesserungen in einem gemieteten Büro mit der Begründung ab, dass die Maßnahmen die zukünftige Vermietung der Immobilie eher erschwert als erleichtert hätten (see further STJ 3 April 1984, BolMinJus 336 [1984] 420; CA Lisbon 30 January 1992, CJ XVII [1992-1] 150). Urteile, die sich direkt auf das Konzept des enriquecimento forçado beziehen, scheint es freilich nicht zu geben.

5. GERMAN CC § 818(2) ordnet den Wertersatz für den Fall an, dass Herausgabe in Natur wegen der Beschaffenheit des Erlangten nicht möglich oder der Empfänger aus einem anderen Grunde zur Herausgabe außerstande ist. Zu ersetzen ist der objektive Verkehrswert (näher MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 818, no. 44), d.h. der Wert, den die Leistung nach ihrer tatsächlichen Beschaffenheit für jedermann hat (BGH 24 November 1981, BGHZ 82, 299, 307). Das wiederum ist der Betrag, den ein Dritter am Markt für sie zahlen würde (BGH 5 July 2006, NJW 2006, 2847, 2852). Der der Vermögensverschiebung zu Grunde liegende (unwirksame) Vertrag kann ein Anhaltspunkt für die Bemessung sein. Bei Dienstleistungen bemisst sich der Wertersatz nach der üblichen, hilfsweise nach der angemessenen, und jedenfalls höchstens nach der vereinbarten Vergütung (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 818, nos. 18, 21). Das Problem der sogen. aufgedrängten Bereicherung tritt insbesondere (aber nicht nur) bei Verwendungen auf, die ohne Billigung des Bereicherungsschuldners oder sogar gegen dessen ausdrücklichen Willen erfolgen. Denn die Verpflichtung zum Wertersatz könnte hier im wirtschaftlichen Ergebnis zu einer Art “Vertragsschluss” gegen den Willen des Bereicherten führen oder ihn dazu nötigen, durch Veräußerung des Gegenstandes Liquidität zu schaffen (Lieb loc.cit. § 812, no. 307). Zur Lösung dieses Problems ist eine große Zahl von Vorschlägen erarbeitet worden (Überblick bei Lieb loc.cit. nos. 311 ff). Zumeist wird empfohlen, das Problem durch eine Subjektivierung des Wertbegriffs in CC § 818(2) zu lösen und darauf abzustellen, ob der Schuldner die objective Wertsteigerung tatsächlich nutzt und sie auf diese Weise für seine Zwecke realisiert. Bei der Errichtung eines Gebäudes auf fremdem Grund soll der Eigentümer der Bereicherungshaftung entgehen können, wenn er die Wegnahme der verbauten Materialien gestattet (BGH 21 December 1956, BGHZ 23, 61, 65; BGH 8 December 1971, WM 1972, 389, 391; BGH 12 April 1961, LM § 951 BGB no. 14). Es wurde der Verwendungsersatzanspruch aber auch mit dem Argument verneint, der Eigentümer könne ihm seinen auf Entfernung des errichteten Werkes gerichteten Schadenersatz- (CC §§ 823, 249) oder Beseitigungsanspruch (CC § 1004) einredeweise entgegenhalten (BGH 17 September 1954, LM § 1004 BGB no. 14; BGH 17 February 1965, NJW 1965, 816; BGH 27 April 1966, WM 1966, 765, 766).

6. HUNGARIAN CC § 363(2) bestätigt die Verpflichtung zum Wertersatz, wenn eine Bereicherung nicht in Natur herausgegeben werden kann. Eine allgemeine Regelung zum Schutz vor aufgedrängten Bereicherungen besteht nicht; die Problematik scheint bislang auch nicht systematisch aufgearbeitet zu sein. Es finden sich allerdings zahlreiche Einzelentscheidungen, in denen der Gedanke aufscheint, insbesondere im Kontext von vertragswidrigen Zuvielleistungen (z.B. BH 1997/483; BH 1994/338 und BH 1975/465 zu Investitionen von Mietern). Im Fall einer geduldeten, aber unbestellten Mehrarbeit durch einen Werkunternehmer hat BH 1982/58 einen Bereicherungsanspruch bejaht (ähnlich auch BH 2002/29); protestiert der Werkbesteller dagegen gegen die Mehrabeit, so entsteht ein Bereicherungsanspruch nicht (BH 1983/291). Zur Ermittlung des Wertes einer Dienstleistung darf grundsätzlich auf den von den Parteien vereinbarten Preis zurückgegriffen werden, es sei denn, der in den Vertragsentwurf eingesetzte Preis ist streitig geblieben und geradezu der Grund dafür gewesen, dass es nicht zu einem Vertragsschluss gekommen ist (BH 1982/300). SLOVENIAN LOA art. 191 enthält insofern eine Bestimmung zum Schutz vor einer aufgedrängten Bereicherung, als hiernach eine Leistung in Kenntnis einer Nichtschuld nur dann zurück verlangt werden kann, wenn sie unter dem Vorbehalt der Rückforderung erfolgt. Wer allerdings nur deshalb doppelt zahlt, weil er den Nachweis der früheren Zahlung verlegt hat, bleibt zur Kondiktion berechtigt (Juhart and Plavšak [-Polajnar Pavčnik], Obligacijski zakonik II, art. 191, 50).

7. Die Verpflichtung zur Rückgabe von Leistungen ”anderer Art“ (Handlungen, Unterlassungen, Gebrauchsgewährung) ist unter DUTCH CC art. 6:210(2) auf Wertersatz gerichtet. Ein solche Verpflichtung zum Wertersatz muss angemessen sein, und sie entsteht nur in drei Fällen: (i) wenn der Empfänger durch die Leistung bereichert wurde, (ii) wenn ihm die Leistungserbringung zuzurechnen ist, oder (iii) wenn er sich bereit erklärt hat, eine Gegenleistung zu erbringen. Sinn der Regelung ist es zu verhindern, dass dem Empfänger eine Ausgleichsverpflichtung aufgezwungen wird (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 816). CC art. 6:210(2) strebt für den Fall, dass der Leistungsempfänger eine Gegenleistung versprochen hat, eine Abstimmung mit dem Rücktrittsrecht an (wo stets ein Anspruch auf Wertersatz für erbrachte Dienstleistungen besteht: CC art. 6:272). Allerdings darf es nicht zu einer Restitution kommen, wenn sie darauf hinausliefe, dass der Restitutionsschuldner mit ihr zu der Begehung einer unerlaubten Handlung genötigt würde (CC art. 6:211). Ein Käufer, der wegen einer Schlechterfüllung des Verkäufers vom Vertrag zurücktritt, kann bereicherungsrechtlich verpflichtet sein, für den zwischenzeitlichen Gebrauch der Sache einen Ausgleich nach CC art. 6:212 zu zahlen (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 136; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 320 p. 338; Scheltema, Onverschuldigde betaling, 203-207).

8. Kann der Gegenstand einer Bereicherung seiner Natur nach nicht zurückgegeben werden (Dienstleistung, Nutzung, verarbeitetes Baumaterial etc), so ist er auch under ESTONIAN law dem Wert nach zu ersetzen; es kommt auf den Wert im Zeitpunkt der Entstehung des Bereicherungsanspruchs an. Wertausgleich ist in Geld geschuldet, sofern sich die Parteien nicht auf eine andere Erfüllungsmodalität einigen (LOA § 89). Rechtsgrundlose Verwendungen auf eine fremde Sache begründen dann keinen Ausgleichsanspruch, wenn sie unter Umständen vorgenommen werden, in denen zuvor das Einverständnis des Eigentümers eingeholt werden konnte oder in denen er der Maßnahme widersprochen hat (LOA § 1042 (2) and (3)). Ein für eine Dienstleistung vereinbarter Preis ist, wenn es für sie keinen Rechtsgrund gibt, grundsätzlich nicht bindend, kann aber als Indikator für ihren objektiven Wert herangezogen werden.

VII.–5:103: Monetary value of an enrichment; saving

(1) The monetary value of an enrichment is the sum of money which a provider and a recipient with a real intention of reaching an agreement would lawfully have agreed as its price. Expenditure of a service provider which the agreement would require the recipient to reimburse is to be regarded as part of the price.

(2) A saving is the decrease in assets or increase in liabilities which the enriched person would have sustained if the enrichment had not been obtained.

COMMENTS

General. This Article defines for the purposes of this Book the concepts of the monetary value of an enrichment and a saving. These concepts feature in fixing the measure of the enriched person's liability when the enrichment is not or is no longer transferable and can therefore only be reversed by a monetary payment. In every case it will be critical to identify the enrichment whose value is to be assessed.

> Illustration 1
> At E's request, D builds an extension to E's house. The extension adds some value to E's property, but the costs of the extension exceed the increase in value. If the service rendered by D was an unjustified enrichment of E, E is liable to pay the value of the service received, notwithstanding that this is less than the value of the addition to his property. E was enriched by the receipt of a service; the addition to his land is merely the consequence of D rendering that service and its lesser value cannot therefore serve to limit E's liability in these circumstances.

Time at which value to be assessed. The point in time which is critical for determining the value of the unjustified enrichment is the moment in which the requirements of VII.–1:101 (Basic rule) are satisfied. It is at this moment that the liability to reverse the enrichment arises and thus necessary to determine the quantum of liability (in so far as this must be fixed in monetary terms). As a rule this will be the moment at which the (unjustified) enrichment was received, even if the lack of justification is not apparent until some later time. Where a non-transferable enrichment, such as a service, is conferred in performance of a contract which is subsequently avoided, the time for assessing the value of the enrichment is therefore the time of performance and not the later time at which the contractual obligation is set aside: the avoidance has retrospective effect and the enrichment is thus to be regarded as without legal justification when it was conferred (see VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified), paragraph (2)).

Monetary value. The definition of monetary value in paragraph (1) takes as its bench mark the objective value of the enrichment determined as the price which would be agreed in a hypothetical sale as the outcome of negotiations between parties genuinely interested in a sale. Where there is a market for the asset or service concerned, there will be mechanisms for determining what that market value is – whether by resort to price listings or similar data or expert valuations. The monetary value may be more or less than a price actually agreed between the disadvantaged person and the enriched person since that price may reflect the outcome of an inequality in bargaining power, superior skills in negotiations, the unusual needs of one of the parties and other peculiarities.

Illustration 2
D undertakes repair work in E's building under the terms of an agreement, but the contract is void as D lacked the required professional qualification to undertake the work. The price agreed was based on the assumption that D was qualified to undertake the work. While D is liable to repay the price received from E, D is entitled to set off a payment equal to the value of the benefit which E has received. The value of the services in fact rendered will take account of the fact that D lacked the requisite qualification and that the work was not done to the required standard; full account is to be taken of defects in the work done.

In particular: composite price of services. The second sentence of paragraph (1) provides a clarification in determining the price of services where the service provider is to incur expenditure in performing the service the costs of which are to be covered by the client, such as building materials to be integrated into the building. In such cases the monetary value of the service equals the total which the client would have to pay, regardless of the fact that typically such sums would be divided into the heads of (i) remuneration for the service provider and (ii) payments on account of materials or reimbursement of fees incurred or similar entries. For the purposes of unjustified enrichment law it is the total cost of obtaining the service which matters, rather than the particular way in which that sum might be allocated to the individual aspects of the service provider's economic output. Where, for example, a bank is instructed to make a payment transfer, the value of that banking service will equal the fee charged together with the sum transferred, since the sum transferred will be recouped from the instructing client's funds.

Saving. A saving, as defined in paragraph (2), represents the amount by which the patrimony of the enriched person has avoided a diminution because the enrichment has been obtained. It occurs whenever (a) the enriched person has received a service or used another's assets, (b) were it not for that enrichment, the enriched person would have procured a benefit of that nature and (c) to do so the enriched person would have had to have paid money or have incurred a debt. There will be no saving if, for the enriched person, the benefit is a pure windfall. Rather a saving presupposes that the benefit has (at least in part) substituted for something which the enriched person would have obtained in any event.

NOTES

1. Während Fragen zur Höhe des bereicherungsrechtlichen Ausgleichsanspruchs in FRANCE überwiegend als Tatsachenfragen gedeutet und deshalb dem tatrichterlichen Ermessen überantwortet bleiben (z.B. Cass.civ. 3 December 2002, pourvoi no. 01-11032), gilt in SPAIN, dass sich der Bereicherungsausgleich in allen Fällen, in welchen der Gegenstand der Bereicherung nicht zurückgegeben werden kann, nach dessen objektivem Marktwert richtet (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 129). Die Gerichte sind deshalb häufig auf Sachverständigengutachten angewiesen (e.g. TS 5 May 1964, RAJ 1964 (1) no. 2208 p. 1380 [Wert von Kohle, über welche der Beklagte rechtswidrig verfügt hatte; es käme nicht auf den geringeren – weil seinerzeit noch staatlich festgelegten – Preis der Kohle im Zeitpunkt der ersten Verkaufstranche an]; CA Jaén 23 November 2007, BDA JUR 2008/93208 [Wert der Ersetzung von Obstbäumen durch Olivenbäume]; CA Málaga 25 July 2002, BDA JUR 2002/279327 [Wert der unerlaubten Nutzung von business premises für einen Zeitraum of 15 years]). Besondere Rechtsregeln zur Bestimmung des Wertes einer Bereicherung scheint es zwar nicht zu geben, doch wird auch in Spanien oft darauf abgestellt, auf welchen Preis sich zwei rational handelnde Parteien geeinigt hätten (see note III19 under VII.–4:101); die Rechtslage in Spain deckt sich damit weithin mit VII.–5:103. Es kommt zu einer reconstrucción hipotética, mit welcher der Preis ermittelt wird, auf welchen sich der Rechtsinhaber und der Rechtsverletzer wahrscheinlich geeinigt hätten (Portellano Díez, La defensa del derecho de patente, 169-172; Fernández-Nóvoa, El enriquecimiento injustificado en el Derecho industrial, 52; CA Barcelona 24 February 2005, BDA AC 2005/1094; CA Barcelona 16 February 2004, BDA AC 2004/892; CA Alicante 18 July 2007, BDA JUR 2007/336503; CA Alicante 9 January 2007, BDA AC 2007/1398 [es komme nicht auf die übliche Lizenzgebühr, sondern auf das Entgelt an, dass der Rechtsinhaber üblicherweise für die Verwertung seiner Rechte verlangt habe]). Ersparte Aufwendungen (ahorro de gastos) werden oft auch als enriquecimiento indirecto aufgefasst. Sie bestehen in der Vermeidung einer Verringerung des Vermögens des Bereicherten und sind als solche ausgleichspflichtig, wenn der Bereicherte diese Kosten sonst selber gehabt hätte (Díez-Picazo loc. cit. 120; TS 13 February 2002, RAJ 2002 (2), no. 3195 p. 5580; CA Madrid 5 February 2008, BDA JUR 2008/113690; CA Málaga 16 November 2004, BDA JUR 2005/147829; CA Alicante 13 October 2004, BDA JUR 2005/23856; CA Málaga 4 November 2002, BDA JUR 2003/71196). Diese Rechtsprechung hat den Anwendungsbereich des spanischen Bereicherungsrechts significant verbreitert, weil es auf diese Weise auf Eingriffsbereicherungen anwendbar wurde (Álvarez-Caperochipi, El enriquecimiento sin causa[3], 177-178).

2. Auch in ITALY wird gesagt, der arricchimento (die Bereicherung) könne sowohl in einer Vermögensmehrung als auch in der Ersparnis von Aufwendungen (D'Onofrio, Dell'arricchimento senza causa[2], 584-586; Barbiera, L'ingiustificato arricchimento, 284; Breccia, L'arricchimento senza causa I[2], 999-1001), mithin in der Vermeidung eines Vermögensverlustes bestehen (Gallo, Arricchimento senza causa e quasi contratti, 30-31). Unter einem danno wird dementsprechend sowohl ein aktueller Verlust als auch entgangener Gewinn verstanden (Breccia loc.cit. 1005-1006). Kann eine spezifische Sache nicht mehr zurückgegeben werden, folgt der Wertersatz den Regeln der CC arts. 2037 und 2038. Wertersatz bedeutet Ersatz des objektiven Marktwerts; im Falle der Veräußerung ist allerdings die erzielte Gegenleistung herauszugeben (CC art. 2038(1)). Zum Ausgleich von rechtsgrundlos erbrachten Dienstleistungen wird in der Rechtsprechung oft auf den von den Parteien vereinbarten Preis Bezug genommen (z.B. Cass. 3 May 1991, no. 4849, Giur.it. 1991, I, 1, 1314). Besteht (für Angehörige der freien Berufe) eine Gebührentabelle, wird sie in der Regel den "objektiven Marktwert" widerspiegeln (Cass.sez.un. 10 February 1996, no. 1025, Foro it. 1996, I, 1245).

3. Zu PORTUGAL siehe bereits die notes under VII.–3:101 and 3:102. Auch hier ist anerkannt, dass eine Bereicherung in der Ersparnis von Aufwendungen, in einer poupança de despesas bestehen kann (STJ 21 September 2006, Processo 06B2035; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 511). Ein Beispiel liefert der Fall eines Unternehmers, der die erforderlichen Nacharbeiten an dem von ihm fehlerhaft hergestellten Werk unterlässt. Eine Klage aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung soll in einem solchen Fall auch nicht an ihrer Subsidiarität gegenüber dem Vertragsrecht scheitern (STJ 18 May 2006, Processo 06A1157).

4. Zur Ermittlung des Wertes einer nicht in Natur rückgabefähigen Bereicherung under GERMAN law see note 5 under the previous Article. Streitig ist, ob in den Fällen des unbefugten Ge- oder Verbrauchs fremder Sachen und Rechte sowie bei rechtsgrundlos erbrachten Dienstleistungen die Ersparnis von Aufwendungen den Kondiktionsgegenstand bildet oder ob das "erlangte Etwas" i.S.v. CC § 812(1) unmittelbar in dem nichtgegenständlichen Vorteil selbst zu sehen ist. Letzterenfalls erlangt das Konzept der ersparten Aufwendungen letztlich nur im Rahmen der Verteidigungsgründe (Wegfall der Bereicherung: CC § 818(3)) Relevanz (näher Staudinger [-S. Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 812, no. 72). Wenn das ursprünglich Erlangte nicht oder nicht mehr herausgegeben werden kann, besteht nach CC § 818(3) eine Bereicherung u.a. dann fort, wenn der Empfänger durch Verwendung des Erlangten notwendige Aufwendungen erspart hat, die er andernfalls aus seinen sonstigen Mitteln hätte finanzieren müssen (BGH 17 January 2003, NJW 2003, 3271). Die Bereicherung ist dagegen weggefallen, wenn das Empfangene für Luxus, zur Verbesserung des Lebensstandards oder sonst außergewöhnliche Dinge ausgegeben wurde (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 818, no. 34).

5. Das HUNGARIAN Bereicherungsrecht (zu dem nicht die Rückabwicklung unwirksamer Verträge gehört) spricht in CC § 363(2) nur die allgemeine Regel aus, das der Anspruch auf Wertersatz gerichtet ist, falls Rückgabe in Natur nicht möglich ist. Die Rechtsprechung stellt auf den objektiven Marktwert ab, der oft mit der Hilfe von Sachverständigen ermittelt wird (z.B. BH 1987/452). Zur Höhe des Bereicherungsausgleichs bei der unberechtigten Nutzung eines fremden Grundstücks siehe BH 2001/168, und zur Nutzung von Werbeflächen an Haltestellen für öffentliche Verkehrsmittel Csongrád Megyei Bíróság 1. Gf. 40 177/2002/3. BH 2005/143 spricht ersparte Nutzungsgebühren im Falle des unerlaubten Fotografierens eines einzigartigen Hauses für Werbezwecke zu, BH 1998/39 den von einem Sachverständigen geschätzten Marktwert einer Sache, die das Ergebnis der Forschungsarbeit des Klägers war, nicht jedoch Ersatz für Kosten und Arbeit. Haben Dienstleistungen des Benachteiligten dem Beklagten keine Aufwendungen erspart, wird bereits die Entstehung einer Bereicherung verneint (BH 1997/400, BH 1983/291). Ersparte Aufwendungen fließen also in die Ermittlung einer Bereicherung ein, nicht erst in die Feststellung eines Wegfalls der Bereicherung. Für SLOVENIA erwähnt Cigoj, Teorija obligacij, 260 die Ersatzpflicht für ersparte Aufwendungen und bildet als Beispiel diejenigen Kosten, die der accipiens zu tragen gehabt hätte, wenn er die Sache, welche den ursprünglichen Gegenstand seiner Bereicherung bildete, hätte mieten oder, falls es sich um eine verbrauchbare Sache handelte, hätte kaufen müssen.

6. In den drei Fällen, in welchen unter DUTCH CC art. 6:210 (Zahlung einer Nichtschuld) Wertersatz geschuldet ist (see note 7 under the previous Article), kommt es auf den Zeitpunkt des Leistungsempfangs an; geschuldet ist aber nicht mehr, als unter den Umständen 'angemessen' ist. Der Wert der Leistung ist grundsätzlich nach den Regeln des Bereicherungsrechts zu bemessen. Bei Leistungen auf einen nichtigen Vertrag kommt es deshalb gewöhnlich auf den vereinbarten Preis an. Sonst ist auf den Wert abzustellen, welche der Leistung im Wirtschaftsleben normalerweise zuerkannt wird, d.h. auf ihren "objektiven" Marktwert. Der (möglicherweise geringere) "subjektive" Nutzen für den Empfänger kann ggflls. im Rahmen der Angemessenheitsklausel Berücksichtigung finden, die sich nicht nur auf den Grund-, sondern auch auf die Höhe des Wertersatzanspruches bezieht. Für das Bereicherungsrecht bestimmt CC art. 6:212(2), dass eine Bereicherung insoweit außer Betracht bleibt, als ihr Wert durch Umstände gemindert wurde, die nicht in die Risikosphäre des Bereicherten fallen. Der für die Höhe eines Anspruchs aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung maßgebliche Zeitpunkt ist also zwar grundsätzlich derjenige, in welchem die Bereicherung entsteht, doch sind spätere Wertminderungen unter den Voraussetzungen von CC art. 6:212(2) zu berücksichtigen (näher zu alledem Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[12], nos. 343-344, pp. 357-358, nos. 359-363, pp. 383-385; Scheltema, Onverschuldigde betaling, 203-207; Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk [-Hijma], T & C Burgerlijk Wetboek[6], art. 6:212, nos. 4-6, pp. 2456-2457).

7. Under ESTONIAN LOA § 1032(2) the monetary value of a non-transferable enrichment is the usual value thereof at the time when the right to reclaim accrued (the time when the performance was received, not the time of avoidance or the time when the claim is made). In case of enrichment by violation of another person's right, the value of enrichment is the usual value of anything received by the violation at the time of the violation (LOA § 1037). Pursuant to GPCCA § 65, the usual value of an object is deemed to be the value of the object unless otherwise prescribed by law or contract. The usual value of an object is its average local selling price (market price). A person who incurs costs with regard to an object of another person without a legal basis therefor may demand compensation of the costs to the extent to which the person on whose object the costs are incurred has been enriched thereby, taking into consideration, inter alia, the fact of whether such costs are useful to the person and the intentions which that person had in regard to the object. Determination of the extent of enrichment shall be based on the time when the person on whose object costs were incurred has the object returned or is able to make use of its increased value in any other manner (LOA § 1042(1)). Supreme Court 5 December 2007, civil matter no. 3-2-1-107-07 hat in einem Fall des Bauens auf fremden Grund entschieden, dass der Gläubiger die Bereicherung des Schuldners nicht nur nach der Wertsteigerung von dessen Grundstück, sondern auch nach dem Wert der für die (ohnehin geplante) Baumaßnahme erforderlichen Baumaterialien berechnen könne.

Illustration 1 is taken from Estonian Supreme Court 5 December 2007, civil matter no. 3-2-1-107-07; illustration 2 from Belgian Cass. 11 September 2008, no. C.06.0666.F.

VII.–5:104: Fruits and use of an enrichment

(1) Reversal of the enrichment extends to the fruits and use of the enrichment or, if less, any saving resulting from the fruits or use.

(2) However, if the enriched person obtains the fruits or use in bad faith, reversal of the enrichment extends to the fruits and use even if the saving is less than the value of the fruits or use.

COMMENTS

General. This provision provides for collateral obligations which extend the main obligation to reverse the original enrichment to enrichments arising out of the retention (fruits) or use of that enrichment. It thus enlarges the basic liability under VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment) (in relation to fruits, which can be transferred) and VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) (in relation to use of the enrichment, which is non-transferable). In contrast to the provisions governing substitutes, the liability to reverse the enrichment from obtaining fruits or use of an enrichment is (i) additional rather than alternative to liability to reverse the original enrichment and (ii) automatic, rather than dependent on any election by the claimant.

Measure of liability. The measure of liability for fruits and use is the same. In each case the enriched person is liable to hand over the fruits or pay the monetary value of the use if the enriched person was in bad faith when that benefit was obtained. If, however, the enriched person was in good faith at that time, liability is limited to any saving which the enriched person has obtained. The notion of saving is set out in VII.–5:103 (Monetary value of an enrichment; saving) paragraph (2).

Bad faith. The notion of good faith which is defined in VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment) paragraph (5) applies correspondingly here. A person who is not in good faith at the time that the fruits or use are obtained is in bad faith at that time. The differential treatment based on the presence or absence of good faith is justified by the consideration that an enriched person who knows or ought to know that an unjustified enrichment must be returned must appreciate that there is no entitlement to any consequential benefits and therefore may justly be held accountable for those further benefits. By contrast the enriched person who obtains such consequential benefits in good faith, not appreciating and having no cause to appreciate that the enrichment is to be reversed, is acting excusably. This favouring of the enriched person in good faith mirrors the like differences drawn in the defence of change of position (VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment)), where there is a diminution of the enrichment to be reversed.

Fruits. The fruits of an asset may be either natural (such as the young born to livestock) or legal (income such as dividends, interest or rent). The liability to reverse them is governed by VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment) so that if the fruits cease to be transferable, a liability to pay their monetary value or to hand over a substitute may arise in the same manner as it would for the enrichment from which they stem.

Use. Where assets are returned after a period of possession or other use, a collateral obligation to make payment may arise out of the use made of the asset itself. Such payments will effectively correlate to and compensate for wear and tear. Use of the enrichment must be distinguished from an enrichment which itself consists of a use. This Article is relevant where, for example, an asset is sold which, under the applicable property law rules, does not re-vest in the transferor if the underlying contract of sale is avoided. The core liability is to re-transfer the asset. In addition the transferee will be liable under this Article in respect of use of the asset between transfer and re-transfer. Where by contrast one party is enriched by leasing another's property, the only liability is under VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) since the use of the property is the enrichment itself, and this Article has no application.

NOTES

1. Under FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBURGIAN CC art. 1378 muss der bösgläubige Empfänger einer ungeschuldeten Zahlung ab dem Empfang sowohl das Kapital als auch die Früchte bzw. Zinsen erstatten. Der gutgläubige accipiens muss dagegen nach FRENCH Rechtsauffassung Zinsen (erst) ab dem Zeitpunkt der Geltendmachung des Anspruchs zahlen. Das wird aus CC art. 1153 i.V.m. art. 1378 geschlossen (Cass.com. 16 December 1980 [zweites Urteil von diesem Tag], D. 1981, 380, note Berr; Cass.civ. 12 February 1985, Bull.civ. 1985, III, no. 30). Wird der gutgläubige Empfänger erst später bösgläubig, beginnt die Pflicht zur Zinszahlung mit diesem Zeitpunkt (Cass.civ. 22 March 2005, Bull.civ. 2005, I, no. 152). Sie trifft auch die öffentliche Hand; die répétition de l'indu gilt nicht nur im Privatrecht (Cass.com. 16 Dezember 1980 [erstes Urteil], D. 1981, 380, note Berr). Erhebt der Staat unter Verstoß gegen das Gemeinschaftsrecht Steuern oder Abgaben, so ist er bösgläubig (Cass.civ. 11 December 1985, Bull. civ. 1985, I, no. 347). In BELGIUM wird CC art. 1378 dahin verstanden, dass der gutgläubige Empfänger überhaupt nicht auf Zinsen haftet (Cass. 18 October 1979, Bull.Ass. 1980, 133; Cass. 10 November 2004, JT 1995, 262), während die LUXEMBURGISCHE Rechtsprechung der französischen folgt (Cour 23 May 2001, Pas. luxemb. 32 [2002] 139).
2. Unter SPANISH CC art. 1303 hat derjenige, der aufgrund eines nichtigen Vertrages eine Sache empfangen hat, die Sache mit Früchten (bzw. Zinsen) herauszugeben. CC art. 1295(1) bringt eine gleichlautende Vorschrift zur rescisión. In beiden Vorschriften wird nicht zwischen gut- und bösgläubigen Rückerstattungsschuldnern unterschieden. Das kontrastiert in auffälliger Weise mit den Vorschriften zum Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnis (CC arts. 451(1), 455) und zur Leistungskondiktion. (CC art. 1896(1) verpflichtet nur den bösgläubigen Empfänger zur Herausgabe von Früchten und zum Ersatz für pflichtwidrig nicht gezogenen Früchte, was zumeist dahin verstanden wird, dass der gutgläubige Bereicherungsschuldner gezogene Früchte behalten darf; bösgläubig i.S.d. Leistungskondiktion ist allerdings, anders als im Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnis (CC art. 433) bereits ein accipiens, der das fehlende Besitzrecht fahrlässig verkennt, see note III15 under VII.–5:101.) Es besteht heute weithin Einigkeit darüber, dass der Widerspruch zwischen den verschiedenen Rückabwicklungsregimen beseitigt werden sollte, allerdings ist umstritten, wie das geschehen soll (schöner Überblick bei Berg, Die Rückabwicklung gescheiterter Verträge im spanischen und deutschen Recht, 175). Eine oft vertretene Ansicht geht dahin, die Vorschriften des Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnisses im Rahmen von CC arts. 1303, 1295(1) analog anzuwenden (TS 14 June 1976, RAJ 1976 (1) no. 2752 p. 2042; TS 28 November 1998, RAJ 1998 (5) no. 9698 p. 14178). Es findet sich aber auch die genau umgekehrte Auffassung, dass das strenge Regime der Rückabwicklung nichtiger Verträge de lege lata unabhängig von Gut- oder Bösgläubigkeit zu einer Rückgewähr gezogener Früchte verpflichte; möglicherweise ist das sogar als die heute herrschende Meinung zu qualifizieren (Carrasco Perera, ADC 1987, 1055, 1118-1120; Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 214-221; TS 6 July 2005, BDA RJ 2005/9532; TS 23 June 2008, BDA RJ 2008/4266; TS 27 June 2008, BDA RJ 2008/3312). Den genannten Widerspruch muss dann der Gesetzgeber auflösen.

3. Unter ITALIAN CC art. 2033 schuldet der bösgläubige Empfänger einer Nichtschuld ab dem Tag des Empfangs Zinsen und Früchte, der gutgläubige Empfänger dagegen erst ab dem Tag der Zustellung der Klage. CC art. 1148(2), wonach der verklagte Besitzer auch auf die Früchte haftet, die er nach Zustellung der Klage bei sorgfältigem Wirtschaften noch hätte ziehen können, bleibt neben CC art. 2033 anwendbar (Cass. 7 April 1982, no. 2138, Giur.it. 1983, I, 1, 976, note Moscati; Cass. 1 August 1992, no. 9167, Giur.it. 1993, I, 1, 1268). Umgekehrt haftet der solvens dem accipiens nach besitzrechtlichen Regeln für Aufwendungen und Verbesserungen (CC art. 2040 i.V.m. CC arts. 1149, 1150, 1151 und 1152). Die Pflicht zur Rückgewähr von Geld begründet eine Geldwertschuld. Der bösgläubige Empfänger hat gleichwohl den Wertverlust durch Inflation als Schaden auszugleichen (Cass. 13 June 1991, no. 6702, Rep.Giur.it. 1991, voce Indebito no. 4; Cass. 15 May 1991, no. 5421, Rep.Giur.it. 1991, voce Previdenza sociale no. 270).

4. Auch PORTUGAL unterscheidet zwischen natürlichen Früchten und Rechtsfrüchten (Erträgen), see CC art. 212(2). Früchte einer Sache sind alles, was sie regelmäßig und ohne Substanzverlust produziert (CC art. 212(1)). Dem gutgläubigen Besitzer gehören alle Früchte bis zu dem Zeitpunkt, in welchem er bösgläubig wird (CC art. 1270(1)). Auch bereicherungsrechtlich haftet er nicht auf sie, weil CC art. 1270 einen Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen der Früchte darstellt (Pereira Coelho, O enriquecimento e o dano, 82-83). CC art. 1270 ist eine Ausnahme von dem allgemeinen Prinzip des Bereicherungsrechts (CC art. 473) und darf wegen dieser Eigenschaft als norma excepcional (CC art. 11) nicht analog auf die Eingriffsbereicherung angewandt werden (Pereira Coelho loc.cit.). Bei ihr steht der Ausgleich für Fruchtziehung und Nutzung des Gegenstands vielmehr im Mittelpunkt des Anspruchs (STJ 24 February 2005, Processo 04B4601). Der bösgläubige Besitzer muss nicht nur alle Früchte herausgeben bzw. dem Werte nach ersetzen, sondern auch diejenigen, die er schuldhaft nicht gezogen hat (CC art. 1271). Diese sachenrechtliche Regelung findet ihr bereicherungsrechtliches Pendant in CC art. 480. Auch hiernach haftet der bösgläubige Bereicherungsschuldner auf alle gezoggenen und auf die schuldhaft nicht gezogenen Früchte, außerdem muss er Geld nach dem gesetzlichen Zinssatz (STJ 2 May 1985, BolMinJus 347 [1985] 370; STJ 22 April 1999, CJ [ST] VII [1999-2] 58) verzinsen.

5. GERMAN CC § 818(1) erstreckt die Herausgabepflicht des Bereicherungsschuldners auf gezogene Nutzungen, d.h. auf die Sach- oder Rechtsfrüchte und auf die sonstigen Vorteile, die der Gebrauch des Gegenstandes mit sich bringt (CC §§ 100, 99). Die Herausgabepflicht ist auf tatsächlich gezogene Nutzungen beschränkt, bezieht sich also nicht auf schuldhaft nicht gezogene Nutzungen (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 818, no. 8; BGH 4 June 1975, BGHZ 64, 322, 323; BGH 8 October 1987, BGHZ 102, 41, 47). Schuldhaft nicht gezogene Nutzungen müssen nur der bösgläubige und der verklagte Empfänger vergüten (CC §§ 818(4), 819(1), 292, 987(2)). Der gutgläubige unverklagte Bereicherungsschuldner haftet also z.B. nicht, wenn er rechtsgrundlos erlangtes Geld auf einem unverzinslichen Girokonto belässt. Tatsächlich erwirtschaftete Zinsen sind aber als Nutzungen herauszugeben (BGH 6 March 1998, BGHZ 138, 160, 163; BGH 15 February 2000, NJW 2000, 1637). Zu ersetzen sind auch ersparte Aufwendungen in der Form ersparter Kreditzinsen, wenn es das rechtsgrundlos erhaltene Geld dem Schuldner ermöglichte, ein Darlehen oder eine andere Schuld zu tilgen; zwischen erzielten und ersparten Zinsen wird m.a.W. nicht differenziert (BGH 6 March 1998 loc.cit.; Sprau loc.cit. no. 10; Staudinger [-S.

Lorenz], BGB [2007], § 818, no. 11). Eine Pflicht zur Herausgabe von Nutzungen trifft auch denjenigen, der auf Grund eines nichtigen Kauf- oder Mietvertrags den Bereicherungsgegenstand gebraucht. Der Gebrauchsvorteil kann natürlich nicht in natura herausgegeben werden; für ihn ist folglich Wertersatz (CC § 818(2)) zu leisten.

6. Das HUNGARIAN Bereicherungsrecht verweist in CC § 363(1) hinsichtlich des Nutzungsersatzes auf die sachenrechtlichen Regeln zum rechtsgrundlosen Besitz (CC § 195). Diese wiederum unterscheiden je nach Bös- bzw. Gutgläubigkeit des unrechtmäßigen Besitzers (näher Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1398-1400; Petrik [-Bíró], Polgári jog II[2], 654/4-655). Unter CC § 195(1) haftet der rechtsgrundlose Besitzer nur auf die noch vorhandenen Nutzungen; hat er die Sache gutgläubig und entgeltlich erworben, so entfällt selbst diese Haftung (see Vékás, JbOstR XIX [1978], 243, 247) bis zu dem Zeitpunkt, in dem er gerichtlich oder vor der zuständigen Behörde in Anspruch genommen wird (CC § 195(2)). Ab dem Zeitpunkt der Inanspruchnahme gelten CC §§ 196-197 (Herausgabe vorhandener, Ersatz verbrauchter und schuldhaft nicht gezogener Nutzungen: CC § 196(3)). Das entspricht der Regelung für den bösgläubig rechtsgrundlosen Besitzer (CC § 195(3)). Dem Anspruch auf Nutzungsausgleich steht auch bei Bösgläubigkeit der Anspruch auf Ersatz notwendiger Verwendungen (CC § 363(1)) gegenüber. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 193 bestätigt die Pflicht des Bereicherungsschuldners zur Herausgabe von Früchten und Zinsen ab dem Zeitpunkt der Bösgläubigkeit bzw. der Klageerhebung. Die sachenrechtlichen Regeln (unter Law of Property Act art. 59(2) erwirbt der gutgläubige Besitzer an den abgetrennten Früchten Eigentum) schließen die Bereicherungshaftung für den Zeitraum ab Klageerhebung nicht aus (Juhart and Plavšak [-Polajnar Pavčnik], Obligacijski zakonik II, art. 193, 53).

7. Auch das DUTCH Recht der ungeschuldeten Leistung verweist in CC art. 6:206 auf Vorschriften des Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnisses (CC arts. 3:120, 121, 123 and 124) zur Haftung für gezogene Früchte, für Kosten und Schäden. Das erklärt sich daraus, dass der solvens oft zwischen der Vindikation (CC art. 5:2) und dem Anspruch aus ungeschuldeter Leistung wählen kann und beide deshalb in den Rechtsfolgen angenähert wurden. Dem gutgläubigen accipiens stehen gemäß CC art. 3:120(1) die bereits getrennten Sach- und die fälligen Rechtsfrüchte zu (zum Begriff der Früchte siehe CC art. 3:9). Er kann vom solvens gemäß CC art. 6:207 u.a. Transportkosten, gezahlten Einfuhrzoll und andere Nachteile ersetzt verlangen, die ihm ohne den Empfang der ungeschuldeten Leistung nicht entstanden wären. Der bösgläubige Empfänger haftet dagegen auf die genannten Früchte, außerdem nach den Vorschriften des Deliktsrechts auf Schadenersatz, und die in CC art. 6:207 genannten Ansprüche sind ihm genommen (CC art. 3:121). Die auf das Gut gemachten Aufwendungen kann er nur nach den Vorschriften des Bereicherungsrechts (CC art. 6:212) ersetzt verlangen (CC art. 6:121(2)). See Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk [-Hijma], T & C Burgerlijk Wetboek[6], arts. 6:206-208, pp. 2448-2451; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[12], nos. 338-340, pp. 355-356; Vriesendorp, Verbintenissen uit de wet en Schadevergoeding[2], no. 298, p. 282).

8. Under ESTONIAN LOA § 1032(1) ist der accipiens zur Herausgabe des Erlangten und aller daraus gezogenen Vorteile verpflichtet. Das schließt die Haftung auf Früchte und Gebrauchsvorteile ein (GPCCA § 62(1)). Von demjenigen, der eine fremde Sache nutzt, wird vermutet, dass ihm diese Nutzung einen Vorteil gebracht hat. Das betrifft insbesondere Gebäude (Supreme Court 20 December 2005, civil matter no. 3-2-1-136-05); bei ihnen wird der Gebrauchsvorteil im Zweifel nach der marktüblichen Miete berechnet. Das Gericht darf den Wert von Nutzungen unter den Voraussetzungen von CCP § 233(2) schätzen. Der Anspruch des solvens ist aber nach dem Prinzip von Treu und Glauben auf den Betrag beschränkt, den der solvens nach den Regeln ordentlicher Verwaltung selber hätte erwirtschaften können (Supreme Court 15 June 2005, civil matter no. 3-2-1-67-05). Nicht mehr zu den erstattungspflichtigen Früchten gehören diejenigen, die aus einer Sache erwirtschaftet werden, welche mit rechtsgrundlos erworbenem Geld gekauft wurde (Supreme Court loc.cit.). Ein bösgläubiger Empfänger haftet auch auf Zinsen, außerdem muss er den solvens für schuldhaft nicht gezogene Nutzungen entschädigen (LOA § 1035(3)). In case of enrichment by violation of other person's rights the amount of enrichment is the usual value of anything received by the violation at the time of the violation (LOA § 1037(1) and (3)). The violator must also compensate for advantage of use (Supreme Court 30 November 2005, civil matter no. 3-2-1-123-05) and for proits which the owner would have received had the owner been in possession of the thing (LPA § 85(2)). LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.240(1) provides that a person who has received property without due legal grounds shall be bound to return it and reimburse in total the income that he has received or should have received from this property from the time he became aware or should have become aware that the property he received was not due. An interest at the rate of five percent per annum shall be payable for the sum of money unjustifiedly received.

CHAPTER 6: DEFENCES

VII.–6:101: Disenrichment

(1) The enriched person is not liable to reverse the enrichment to the extent that the enriched person has sustained a disadvantage by disposing of the enrichment or otherwise (disenrichment), unless the enriched person would have been disenriched even if the enrichment had not been obtained.

(2) However, a disenrichment is to be disregarded to the extent that:

(a) the enriched person has obtained a substitute;

(b) the enriched person was not in good faith at the time of disenrichment, unless:

(i) the disadvantaged person would also have been disenriched even if the enrichment had been reversed; or

(ii) the enriched person was in good faith at the time of enrichment, the disenrichment was sustained before performance of the obligation to reverse the enrichment was due and the disenrichment resulted from the realisation of a risk for which the enriched person is not to be regarded as responsible;

or

(c) paragraph (3) of VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) applies.

(3) Where the enriched person has a defence under this Article as against the disadvantaged person as a result of a disposal to a third person, any right of the disadvantaged person against that third person is unaffected.

COMMENTS

A. General

Overview. This Article provides for a change of position defence based on disenrichment. It defines the notion of disenrichment, sets out the conditions under which a disenrichment sustains the defence, and establishes the extent of the reduction in liability.

Burden of proof. It falls to the enriched person to establish all the elements of the defence. In particular the enriched person must show that the circumstances set out in paragraph (2) – in which a disenrichment is to be disregarded – do not apply. The enriched person (E) must therefore show, according to the required standard of proof, (a) that E has sustained a disadvantage, (b) that this would not have been sustained if E had not obtained the enrichment, (c) that E has not received an enrichment in exchange for the disenrichment, and (d) either (i) that E neither knew nor ought to have known that the enrichment was unjustified or (ii) one of the two exceptions cases where good faith is not required applies. Moreover, in order that E's claim is not restricted by the terms of paragraph (2)(c) of this Article, E must also establish, should the point arise, (e) (i) that E did not obtain the enrichment under an agreement, or, (ii) if there was an agreement that agreement did not genuinely fix a price or value for the enrichment.

B. Notion of disenrichment

(a) Forms and manner of disenrichment

General. The first condition for the application of the defence, contained in paragraph (1) of the Article, requires the enriched person to establish the disenrichment. The enriched party must have sustained a material detrimental change in economic position. Without some element of 'debit' from the patrimonial account there is no case for protecting the enriched person from the claim to reverse the enrichment. It is only if a disadvantage has been suffered that reversal of the enrichment would leave an enriched person worse off than before enrichment.

Forms of disenrichment. The wording of paragraph (1) makes it clear that disenrichment may take the form either of disposal of the enrichment obtained or sustaining some other disadvantage. As a matter of principle disenrichment may take any form of disadvantage (within the meaning of the term in VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage)). For this purpose the rules determining what constitutes a disadvantage giving rise to the claim against the enriched person, will be equally material here. The decisive matter is that, trusting to the apparent justification of the enrichment and accordingly the right to retain it, the enriched party has parted with wealth or sustained an additional burden (which would not otherwise have been done) so that the enriched person must retain the enrichment if not to be worse off as a result.

Disposal of the enrichment. The form of disenrichment which typifies the defence (and which is given particular recognition by its explicit mention in the wording of the Article) is the disenrichment which arises where the enriched person has disposed of the enrichment itself. This may be described simply as disposal of the asset gained. This form of disenrichment necessarily supposes that the enrichment is by its nature transferable or otherwise capable of disposal. Disposal of the enrichment then constitutes a decrease in assets and thus a disadvantage within the meaning of paragraph (1)(a) of VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage). An enrichment is disposed of in this sense whenever title to that asset is vested by the enriched person in another.

> Illustration 1
> Despite the effective revocation of a bank mandate which S had granted to her brother B and had entitled B to operate S's account at the bank X, B nonetheless withdraws money from the bank and hands this over to S. On discovering its mistake and not knowing that B has given the money to S, X apologies to S for the lapse and credits S's account with the sum which it allowed to be withdrawn. Because the money withdrawn was handed over to her, S has suffered no loss and thus has no contractual claim against X for damages. X has an unjustified enrichment claim for repayment of the sum credited to S's account: the compensation was given in error and without obligation and thus without legal justification. B was disenriched when he handed the money over to S and has a defence under this Article if he was in good faith, i.e. if he was unaware of the revocation of the bank mandate. If B was in bad faith and has no defence, X has concurrent claims under this Book against both B and S.

Other disadvantages. Since what matters is the overall 'bookkeeping' balance of assets and liabilities – that something of value has been set off against the value of an enrichment - the defence is open to the enriched person whenever, instead of disposing of the enrichment itself, that person's 'minus' corresponding to the 'plus' of the enrichment consists of some other act of disenrichment. Disposal of the enrichment itself thus represents only a specific instance of a general requirement. Any other (equally causally related) disadvantage within the meaning of VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage) will potentially suffice to bring the defence into play.

Illustration 2
E receives from trustees of a trust fund the sum of € 25,000, paid to him ostensibly as a beneficiary under the trust established by a distant relative. Determined to make the most of his unexpected windfall, E spends € 250 on jewellery as a present for a friend. He also makes a gift of his car (worth € 5,000) to his daughter, planning to purchase a replacement using his newly acquired wealth. As he anticipates that the remainder of the sum received from the trustees will produce an equivalent income, E allows his son to occupy rent-free for two months a flat belonging to E which has just become vacant and which E would otherwise have let for € 500 per month. Unknown to E, the trustees had no authority to make the payment and on realising their mistake claim re-payment from E. As the trustees were not obliged to pay E and did so by mistake, E's enrichment is unjustified; it is also attributable to the trustees' disadvantage. E is liable to reverse the enrichment, but may have a defence under this Article in view of his partial disposal of the enrichment (outlay on the jewellery), his other patrimonial loss (gift of the car) and his permitting another to make use of his rights (allowing the son to occupy the flat in lieu of renting it). Assuming the other requirements of the defence are made out, E is obliged to pay back only the balance of € 18,750.

In particular: other loss of the assets; loss of other assets. The range of possible disadvantages includes a decrease in assets such as consuming or exhausting the enrichment or permitting it to disintegrate (so far as the nature of the enrichment allows this), or disposing of other patrimonial benefits (for example, other property or rights or money). Disposal of other assets is clearly the only form of disenrichment possible when the enrichment is not by its nature transferable. It may be equally material in any case where the enrichment has not in fact been disposed of, even if it is transferable.

Illustration 3
A debtor X discharges the debt with creditor E using money which X has stolen from D. D's claim is against X. D has no unjustified enrichment claim against E. E was enriched by receipt of the money, but was also disenriched in losing the claim against X (which was extinguished by the payment) and the disenrichment was in good faith.

Illustration 4
D, who was ordered by a court to pay a sum, paid the sum due by mistake to E. Coincidentally a court had awarded E an equivalent sum due from X and hence E assumed that the money received from D was the payment of X's debt. As a result E released his rights under a court order securing his claim over X's patrimony. D's claim against E under this Book is subject to the defence under this Article.

In particular: incurring obligations. Alternatively, instead of a decrease in rights, reducing the positive side of the economic balance, the disenrichment might take the form of incurring obligations (typically money debts), so as to add to liabilities. The enriched person might assume that the enrichment can be used to finance a fresh debt or at any rate that the enrichment will liberate other liquid assets which can be used to finance the debt. Thus there may be a patrimonial loss (and hence disadvantage) in the form of an increase in debts where the enriched person obtains more credit and thus incurs new or enhanced obligations. The defence may then operate in relation to the obligation to pay interest which is incurred. (The defence is excluded in relation to the obligation to repay the principal sum since this disadvantage is offset by receipt of the principal itself. This is an effect of paragraph (2)(a)).

In particular: allowing use of one's rights. The disenrichment might equally take the form of permitting another to use one's rights: the enriched person is then disenriched by making available to another (a third party) the possession or occupation of property which would otherwise have been used by, or would have generated an income for, the enriched person.

Manner of disenrichment: voluntarily and involuntarily sustained disadvantage. As with the form of disenrichment, the manner of sustaining a disadvantage is not in principle restricted to particular modes of reducing the patrimonial balance. A "disposal" of the enrichment might be a transfer of the property or assignment of the right, if the enrichment takes a transferable form, but an enrichment will also be disposed of in any case where it is voluntarily extinguished, for example by release of personal rights to the debtor. Moreover, while the concept of "disposal" by the enriched person necessarily implies a voluntary act, the umbrella concept of disenrichment (disadvantage sustained) embraces voluntary and involuntary disenrichments alike. That is because what matters is simply the overall balance of the enriched person's wealth. Aside from the required connection between disenrichment and retention of the enrichment, the precise mechanism whereby changes to that balance occur is not of the essence. A deprivation of an enrichment caused by acts of nature or third parties therefore falls squarely within the terms of the Article. The exact cause of the loss or destruction is immaterial.

> Illustration 5
> On behalf of D, an incapacitated person whose patrimony is being administered by X, a purported gift of shares in a foreign company is made by X to E. The transfer of shares is duly registered. The shares are subsequently expropriated by the relevant state. D subsequently regains full legal capacity and claims from E payment of the value of the shares, transfer no longer being possible, on the basis that X had no authority to make the donation (a fact unknown to E). E has a complete defence under this Article because, in losing the shares, E sustained a disenrichment equal to the enrichment.

(b) Fault in causing the disenrichment

Fault in general. An involved question is what role fault in bringing about the disenrichment should play within the framework of these rules. Fault involved in the process of disenrichment may be (i) fault of the disadvantaged claimant; (ii) fault of third parties; or (iii) fault of the enriched person. Different considerations apply in these three cases.

Fault of the disadvantaged claimant. In the first case, where the fault is that of the disadvantaged claimant, if the enriched party suffers a disenrichment because the claimant was largely responsible for bringing the disenrichment about, the claimant hardly has any grounds for objecting to the defence of disenrichment. In that case, therefore, the basic rules apply unaffected by considerations of fault.

Fault of a third party: claim of enriched person against third party. The same applies where the fault is that of a third party and the risks must be allocated between the disadvantaged person and the enriched person: whenever the enriched person is "innocently" disenriched, the risk of frustration of the claim must lie with the disadvantaged claimant. The difference here, however, is that that fault may generate a claim (most especially within the law on non-contractual liability for damage, but potentially also under, for example, the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs or other rules of private law) against the third party in respect of the loss. If the asset constituting the enrichment has been damaged or destroyed after it was obtained and the third party who has brought about or is responsible for the damage or destruction is liable to the enriched person as the person entitled to the asset, that right of the enriched person against the third party for reparation in respect of the damage done is something obtained "in exchange for sustaining the disenrichment". Accordingly, although the enriched persons sustains a disenrichment, there is a simultaneous counter-enrichment which constitutes a substitute. In these circumstances the defence is excluded to the extent of the claim of the enriched person against the third party: see paragraph (2)(a).

Relationship to VII.–5:101, paragraphs (3) and (4). This exclusion of the defence of disenrichment under paragraph (2)(a) (where the enriched person is disenriched by loss or destruction of the asset constituting the enrichment, but gains a claim against the third party at fault in causing the loss or destruction) operates to preserve the enriched person's liability to reverse the enrichment. It does not determine how that liability is to be reversed. This is resolved by paragraphs (3) and (4) of VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment). A lost or destroyed asset cannot by its nature be transferred and accordingly, by default, liability takes the form of a payment of the value of the asset: paragraph (3). Where the enriched person was (still) in good faith when the asset was lost, they may elect instead to transfer the substitute: paragraph (4)(a). In this manner the "innocent" enriched person may pass on to the disadvantaged person the risks associated with the substitute (i.e. that the claim against the third party will prove worthless). If this is regarded as the normal case, the exclusion of the defence of disenrichment under paragraph (2)(a) of the present Article is of limited impact, since the right to choose to surrender the substitute in lieu of paying the value of what was lost or destroyed restores balance to the distribution of risks. Conversely, however, if the enriched person is not in good faith, that risk cannot be forced onto the disadvantaged person; an enriched person who is no longer in good faith bears the risk of loss or destruction of the asset which should already have been transferred. The right of election in that instance rests with the disadvantaged person (see VII.–5:101(4)(b)), who may prefer the solvency of the enriched person to the uncertainties of the claim against the third party.

Fault of a third party: direct claim of disadvantaged person. Of course, if entitlement to the relevant asset vis-à-vis third parties has not passed from the disadvantaged person to the enriched person, it may well be that it is the disadvantaged person who acquires a (direct) claim against the person at fault, but at the same time there will be no relevant disenrichment simply because there was no substantial enrichment in the first place.

Illustration 6

E, a farmer, receives a sheep dog as a gift from D, a dog breeder. The twelve year old son of a neighbour, X, shoots the dog dead while practising with his father's air rifle. It is assumed that X is liable for the damage caused to E and, under the rules in Book VI, must pay compensation at least equal to the value of obtaining a replacement dog. D claims from E the value of the dog, because D had made a gift of the wrong dog by mistake and has avoided the gift. (It is assumed that D is entitled to avoid the gift for mistake.) Assuming that ownership of the dog passed under the gift, but reverted on avoidance, then (assessed retrospectively) at the time of the shooting, D was owner of the dog, E being merely liable (under VII.–1:101 (Basic rule) of this Book as well as any applicable property law rules) to return possession of the dog to E (which was all that E enjoyed). X is directly liable to E under the law on non-contractual liability for damage to E's property. The case would be otherwise if under the applicable property law ownership of the asset did not revert on avoidance (or at any rate not in relation to third parties). In that case, where E remains owner, E was liable under the law of unjustified enrichment to transfer to D property in the dog. X has shot E's dog and is liable to E for damage to E's property. Although the death of the dog means that E has sustained a disenrichment (loss of the dog), E has acquired a substitute enrichment in the form of the right of action against X and to that extent is denied the benefit of this defence: see paragraph (2)(a)).

Fault of the enriched person. Although it is a more controversial case, the source of origin of the fault causing the disenrichment should as a matter of principle be regarded as irrelevant even where the destruction or other loss is caused by the fault of the enriched person. The purpose of this defence is to protect the enriched person who has acquired an enrichment and deals with it on the reasonable assumption that it is available to be disposed of, free of obligation to account for it to another or to compensate another in respect of it. In order that the defence can operate the person who disposes of the enrichment and later relies on this defence must have acted in that state of mind which implied a freedom to look upon the enrichment completely as that person's own. If the person, instead of making a gift of the property to another, decides to destroy it, that is that person's prerogative. The party enriched by receipt of Chippendale furniture who resolves to chop it into firewood and ignite it on a bonfire may well not appreciate the value of the enrichment, but the defence is not excluded by deliberate maltreatment. The reasonableness of the enriched person's behaviour in making use of what seems to be available to dispose of freely is not a requirement of the defence that he has disposed of the enrichment in all innocence of an obligation to transfer it to the claimant (though of course in given circumstances out-of-character or perverse behaviour by an otherwise reasonable actor may well suggest a calculating and far from innocent state of mind). Equally loss caused by careless acts or omissions which result in a maltreatment or damage to the asset obtained are also covered. This flows out of the same basic principle, underlying this defence, that those taking enrichments in good faith are entitled to deal freely with what they suppose to be theirs to keep, without risk of subsequent penalty. That freedom extends to the liberty to be careless with assets which are apparently 'one's own' (i.e. in respect of which there seems to be no personal obligation to return them or account for their value).

Illustration 7
D has transferred a ship to E. Although the agreement for the transfer is vitiated, (it is assumed) title to the ship does not revert to D when D avoids the underlying agreement. Due to E's failure to keep the ship in a seaworthy condition, it has already sunk by the time D demands its return. E sustains a disenrichment when the ship is lost and, if E had no reason to know that the transfer could be avoided, has a defence under this Article to D's claim for payment of its value, notwithstanding that E's want of care is responsible for the loss of the ship. Note, however, that if the transfer was part of a bargain, paragraph (2)(c) of this Article (invoking paragraph (3) of VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment)) will restrict the scope of the defence.

Disenrichment by improvement of the enrichment obtained. The Article does not make any special provision for the case where the enriched person improves the asset which the enriched person is liable to return. Special provision appears to be unnecessary as the issues which such improvements raise can be adequately addressed under the rules of this Book without more. The expenditure (decrease in assets) or labour (service or work done) which the enriched person has expended in effecting the improvement is a disadvantage and is capable of constituting a disenrichment triggering the defence under this Article. Of necessity the disadvantage can only be incurred by reason of the enrichment having been obtained since the disadvantage is focused on improving the enrichment. Accordingly the proviso in paragraph (1) cannot apply. Critical will be whether the disenrichment will be disregarded or discounted in accordance with the rules in paragraph (2). Whether the improvement therefore gives rise to a defence so as to limit the enriched person's liability pro tanto, based on the value of the expenditure or labour invested in improving the enrichment, will normally turn on whether the improvement was effected in good faith, i.e. whether the enriched person appreciated or ought to have appreciated that there was a liability to return the asset. If the enriched person is in bad faith, there will be no defence. Moreover the scope in that case for a counterclaim under this Book will be restricted. While the enriched person will have enriched the disadvantaged person by effecting the improvement, the enrichment will be justified if the enriched person knew that there was an obligation to reverse the enrichment by returning the asset. Effecting improvements to the asset with that state of mind will amount to a free and unmistaken consent to the disadvantage (expenditure or labour) for the purposes of VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b).

C. Disenrichments excluded from the defence

General. Paragraphs (1) and (2) provide for four categories of case where a disenrichment in good faith does not support the defence or where the impact of the disenrichment is restricted for the purposes of the defence. Paragraph (1) contains the requirement that there must be a nexus between the disenrichment and the enrichment. Paragraph (2)(a) discounts an enrichment in so far as there is a counter-enrichment serving as a substitute for the enrichment disposed of. Paragraph (2)(b) contains the general requirement that the disenrichment must have been in good faith, but in two exceptional cases even a disenrichment in bad faith gives rise to the defence under this Article. Finally, paragraph (2)(c) restricts the defence where the enriched person had obtained the enrichment under an agreement which genuinely attributed a price or value to the enrichment, so that the enriched person contemplated from the outset a liability to pay for it.

(a) Absence of nexus between disenrichment and enrichment

Disenrichment independent of enrichment. The mere fact that the enriched person has suffered some disadvantage is not sufficient to trigger the defence of change of position. The rationale for the defence (which fixes its scope) is the need to protect the enriched person who relies detrimentally on an apparent justification for the enrichment. The disadvantage must be of specific relevance to the obligation to reverse the enrichment and that in turn requires that the disadvantage would not have been sustained but for the existence of the enrichment. In other words, disenrichment must be causally connected to acquisition or retention of the enrichment. Effect is given to this requirement in the proviso to paragraph (1).

Basis of comparison. The disenrichment is not relevant if it is one which would have taken place even if the enrichment had not been obtained. The comparison is between the post-disenrichment status quo and a hypothetical projection of the status quo ante into the future on the assumption the enriched person was never enriched. If the disadvantage which the enriched person has subsequently suffered was one which, independent of the enrichment, the enriched person would (willingly or involuntarily) have sustained anyway, it is not causally related to the enrichment and not material. Surrendering the enrichment, despite the disadvantage, will not make the enriched person worse off than if never enriched at the outset.

Illustration 8
As a result of a mistaken bank transfer from D, the balance of E's current account is increased by € 200 to € 1,200. On the following day, E withdraws € 150 in order to purchase a birthday present for his granddaughter. D subsequently demands the re-payment of € 200. E has no defence under this Article if the additional inflow of € 200 did not influence his expenditure. This might be because (i) he was oblivious of the transfer, e.g. he never examined the state of his bank account before making the withdrawal, or (ii) he always spends about €150 on a birthday present for his granddaughter, regardless of the state of his finances, or (iii) he would have decided to spend the same sum on his granddaughter's present even if the balance of the account had been €1,000 at the time of withdrawal.

This fundamental test applies regardless of whether the disadvantage takes the form of disposition of the enrichment or any other form. For the purposes of exposition it is helpful to consider first disadvantages sustained involuntarily (theft, destruction) and then turn to those occurring voluntarily (disposition, expenditure).

Involuntary loss of the enrichment. The requirement of causal connection will usually be satisfied where the disadvantage takes the form of loss of the enrichment as such. Where the asset concerned is stolen or destroyed, the enriched person sustains a loss which could necessarily only be suffered by virtue of the fact that that asset had been obtained: the existence of the enrichment is self-evidently a prerequisite for its disappearance. The manner of involuntary loss (be it as a result of an act of nature or the wrongdoing of third parties) is not in itself important.

Unconnected hardship: involuntary loss of other patrimony. As a rule, the position is otherwise if it is some other asset of the enriched person (and not the asset which constitutes the enrichment as such) which is stolen or destroyed. A reduction in other wealth, subsequent to or contemporaneously with the enrichment, may be merely coincidental and not causally related to obtaining or retaining the enrichment. It is therefore generally immaterial that the enriched person happens to have lost something of equal value to the enrichment and the enriched person may well be unable to establish the defence under this Article. Such misfortune, unconnected as it is to the enrichment, is no more relevant to an obligation to surrender an unjustified enrichment than it is to an increasingly cash-strapped debtor's contractual obligation to pay or a financially hard-pressed wrongdoer's obligation to compensate for damage wrongfully caused.

Illustration 9
As a result of abusive and public hectoring by her husband, D is induced to pawn her jewels at E's pawnbrokers. As E was aware that D's husband was unfairly exploiting D, the contract of pledge between D and E is voidable: see II.–7:207 (Unfair exploitation) and II.–7:208 (Third persons) paragraph (2). D subsequently demands the return of her jewels. E asserts that he has a defence of change of position because, following a 'smash and grab' theft at his premises, valuables have been stolen and, while he retains D's jewels, he has lost others of equivalent value. E has no defence under this article. The theft suffered by E was unconnected to his possession of D's jewels.

Voluntary disenrichments not predicated by the enrichment. Not every case in which the enriched person deliberately parts with the enrichment will satisfy the causative test. The nature of such a disposal and its motivation must be considered. If it can be established that, if not enriched, the enriched person would in any case have made some transfer of wealth having the same value, by resorting to other assets, the disenrichment must be disregarded. In such a case, the mere coincidental fact that the enriched person has chosen to deploy the particular assets constituting the enrichment rather than some other assets in order to make this "inevitable" expenditure ought not to affect the restitutionary obligation. The expenditure must be exceptional – one which would not have been made in the ordinary course of things.

Obligatory expenditure: pre-existing obligations. One category of case, therefore, where the disbursement does not establish the defence is if the enriched person was already obliged (contractually or otherwise) to pay and would therefore have had to pay, even if the enrichment was not available for that purpose. That is so even if, in the absence of the enrichment, the enriched person would not in fact have been in a position to perform the contractual obligation. The disadvantage must be regarded from a normative point of view as having been predicated by the debt rather than the presence of the enrichment obtained. In any case the decrease in liabilities which results from extinguishing the debt is itself an enrichment which offsets the disadvantage in spending the original enrichment: it is a case of a substitute which precludes the defence from operating (see paragraph (2)(a)).

Illustration 10
D is compelled by E's duress to hand over a cash sum of € 500 which E deposits into her current account. E's account immediately prior to the transfer was overdrawn and the transfer reduces E's overdraft. E cannot assert a defence under this Article on the basis that she is disenriched in that she has disposed of the cash by reducing her overdraft. She was contractually obliged to her bank to repay the overdrawn sum and had to discharge that obligation even if not enriched by D. In any case E retains the benefit of the original enrichment in the form of a decrease in liabilities.

Obligations incurred after the enrichment. The position is different for the discharge of debts sustained subsequent to the enrichment (as contrasted with pre-existing debts). The crucial issue is whether there was a relevant disadvantage suffered in incurring the debt in the first place. That in turn raises the issue of whether, in the absence of the enrichment, the enriched person would have incurred the obligation. The basic rule applies: if the enriched person would not have entered into the undertaking if not enriched, the debt incurred is a relevant disadvantage for the purposes of this Article. However, where a debt is incurred in return for some benefit, that benefit may trigger the operation of paragraph (2)(a), so that its effect in reducing liability under this Book will be at least partially muted.

Illustration 11
D, a finance company, overpays its customer E € 100 per month over a six month period before it realises its mistake. On seeing his apparent additional income, which E attributes to a pay rise, E takes out a second instalment mortgage with a bank in order to finance an extension to his home. Repayments of the mortgage commit E to paying € 120 per month. As E would not have taken out the mortgage if he had not supposed his salary had been raised by a comparable amount, E has sustained a disadvantage in incurring the debt which satisfies the requirement of causal relevance set out in this Article. That disadvantage is of course substantially offset by the principal of the loan (a substitute within paragraph (2)(a)), so that only the liability in respect of interest under the loan contract is capable of reducing liability under this Book.

Exceptional relevance of pre-existing obligations. The situation is also different where the obligation is one whose content is enlarged by the acquisition of the enrichment, such as an obligation to dispose of all available funds (or all funds from a given source) which extends to the enrichment in question. A typical example would be a promise to transfer after-acquired property of a given category, the obligation only biting in effect as and when the promisor actually obtains property of that category. In this case the enriched person disposing of the enrichment in compliance with such an obligation (caught in the assumption that it is available to dispose of and that there is no prior restitutionary obligation) has apparently no choice but to make the disbursement. The causative prerequisite is satisfied.

Necessary or usual expenditure and exceptional or extraordinary disbursements. As a rule of thumb, a disposition which amounts to necessary expenditure – expenditure which the enriched person would have had to make in any case – must be disregarded. The enriched person, even if using the enrichment for that purpose, still has the benefit of it and indeed is still enriched because the use of the unjustified enrichment for some necessary reason will have simply saved the equivalent value in other resources. Hence payment of normal outgoings will not found the defence under this Article. Disbursements by individuals to pay for ordinary costs of living, such as money spent on rent, weekly grocery shopping, utility bills (fuel or heating, water, and the like) must be disregarded. Similar observations can be made in relation to businesses for their normal overheads. Moreover, this proposition extends to other usual outgoings, even where these are not essential to basic living or operation of the business, if they are not actually motivated by the fact that there is additional affluence due to the enrichment. This refers to recreational expenditure or outlay on entertainment (theatre, concerts, cinema, etc), meals in restaurants or weekend breaks, outings and holidays, and the like, which merely conform to the normal pattern of life of indulging in such activities "from time to time" as opposed to "only when extra money is available".

Independent liberality: gifts uninfluenced by the enrichment. The same applies correspondingly to donations. Gifts made in the ordinary course of events will tend not to give rise to the defence because these are disbursements which the enriched person would in fact make in any case. Gratuitous dispositions will only come within the scope of this Article to the extent that they are referable back to the enrichment. That will be the case where the donor has decided to make the gift or has increased the amount of the gift only because of the assumption that the unjustified enrichment would not have to be reversed and formed part of the donor's disposable wealth.

Other exceptional disbursements. In any case where the enriched person has spent money in a way which is out of the normal pattern, it must be determined in each case whether the enriched person, in the light of this newly found wealth, has inflated the person's customary style of gracious living. There must be a reliant adaptation to the apparent entitlement to the enrichment in order for the defence to apply. When the new wealth is the reason for acquiring durable luxury goods, it must be recognised that the goods acquired may exclude or limit the effect of the defence by virtue of paragraph (2)(a). It is extraordinary "consumed" expenditure which is of most relevance to the defence.

Disenrichments prior to enrichment (anticipatory reliance). The examples hitherto given have assumed a change of position after receipt of the enrichment in reliance on an apparently justified entitlement to the enrichment. An issue arises where a person makes disbursements in anticipation of an enrichment to come. If the subsequently enriched person knew or ought to have known that the transaction was for any reason void or vitiated, that person will know or should know that any enrichment conferred pursuant to it will be unjustified. In that case the anticipatory disposition in reliance on an 'entitlement' to the enrichment will be at that person's own risk: paragraph (2)(b). The question is whether a defence can be made out if the reliance was in good faith, untainted by actual or constructive knowledge of the legal transaction's deficiency.

No general exclusion of anticipatory reliance. In setting out a requirement of causal connection to the enrichment neither the wording nor the principles of this defence makes it an absolute requirement that enrichment precede disadvantage. In certain circumstances the conditions of the defence may be fulfilled by a disenrichment in anticipation of an enrichment which the person at that time supposed would be obtained and reasonably supposed would be a justified enrichment. A distinction needs to be drawn between different scenarios of anticipatory reliance. There is a difference between reliance on a current entitlement to (a past or future) benefit and a further reliance on an act being done in the future (e.g. a voluntary payment being made) which would in any case be necessary to establish an entitlement (a prediction of a future event). Where the latter is at stake there is more than a change of position in the sense of anticipatory reliance on an entitlement; there is a gamble. There is no need for the law of unjustified enrichment to discount the enriched person's preparedness to take risks. An enriched person who is a risk taker does not merit the protection of the defence; liability is merely the realisation of the risk run.

Disenrichment in expectation of a voluntary enrichment. A first class of case of anticipatory reliance is where, for example, in advance of an anticipated gift funds are spent on some exceptional luxury item (such as an additional holiday). As with disbursements in anticipation of an inheritance, this is an expenditure of future capital based on a mere expectancy. If the prospective donor is not obliged to confer the enrichment, the prospective donee's outlay of assets is a disadvantage sustained in the knowledge that there is no legal entitlement to the expected enrichment and no guarantee that it will be received. If the prospective donor is not obliged to make the gift, the anticipated accretion to wealth is necessarily precarious, depending on a transformation of the goodwill of the prospective donor towards the chosen donee from benevolent intention to execution. The would-be donee must accept the risk involved in spending money in 'reliance' on the future gift. The subsequently enriched person has therefore not trusted in the soundness of the enrichment later received (that is to say, the underlying validity of the transaction which supports and justifies it) but has only gambled on a hope. No reliance could have been placed on an actual entitlement because no such entitlement had (apparently) been conferred. The position is comparable to that of a punter betting on the favourite and spending the expected winnings before the race is run.

> Illustration 12
> On several occasions during his lifetime, D indicated to E, his nephew, that on his (D's) death he would be leaving E his house and landed estate. Assuming that D, who is in the final stages of a terminal illness, would not change his mind and knowing the considerable value of the property that would then come into his hands, E enters into a contract with a firm of builders, B & Co, for the construction of a swimming pool on the estate. Shortly afterwards, D dies. A will is found, leaving D's land to E, and in accordance with its terms E is registered owner of the land. In fact, it is subsequently identified that the will is void for failure to comply with all of the applicable formality requirements and under the rules of intestate succession it is D's wife, W, who inherits the property. W claims a transfer of the land from E. E asserts that he has changed his position in that he has incurred a contractual liability to B & Co, is not in a position to perform, and consequently must pay damages equal to their positive (profit) interest in performance of the obligations under the contract (see III.–3:701 (Right to damages) to III.–3:702 (General measure of damages)). E has no defence under this Article. Even though E would not have contracted with B & Co if he had not supposed he would become entitled to D's land, E's disadvantage was incurred before he was enriched and without any obligation on the part of D to confer it. Accordingly E did not rely on any entitlement to the enrichment and his disadvantage is not causally connected to the enrichment in the sense of paragraph (1).

Disenrichment in expectation of performance under an apparent obligation. The situation will be different, however, where the disadvantaged person has given an assurance of enrichment which might reasonably be understood as constituting a unilateral contractual undertaking to enrich (though in fact that undertaking is for some reason void or voidable). In contrast to the preceding scenario, therefore, there is here a supposition of entitlement to the enrichment (a legal right to obtain a justified enrichment). Moreover, at the time of disenrichment the promisee may legitimately consider that there is an existing enrichment – the holding of a legally binding enforceable promise of enrichment.

Disbursements in context of bargain but in own interest. A final and difficult situation is where the enriched person has incurred costs because of the bargain with the claimant, but they are not directed towards fulfilling the supposed contractual obligation to the claimant. Instead they are directed towards the protection of the enriched person's own commercial interests. (If, by contrast, the disadvantage consists of a performance of obligations under the agreement, that will give rise to a counter-claim in enrichment law and does not need to be factored into the defence of change of position.) Mistakenly supposing the agreement with the claimant to be perfectly valid, the enriched person, for example, takes out insurance or makes other hedging arrangements to protect against non-performance of the 'obligation', or makes arrangements with a third party in respect of receipt of the enrichment which is apparently due from the claimant under the terms of their bargain. A distinction must be drawn between disbursements made in order to guard against the risk that the other party or the enriched person will fail to perform under the contract on the one hand and on the other hand disbursements made purely in view of the benefit to be received (such as property insurance or advance payments of storage charges, so far as irrecoverable). The former are made in view of the contract and not the enrichment as such. Only the latter come within the scope of the defence.

(b) Substitutes

Counter-enrichment. If the enriched person has disposed of the enrichment in order to acquire some other asset, or has obtained some other benefit in return for the disenrichment, the defence is likewise excluded; see paragraph (2)(a). The enriched person who has obtained something in exchange for the disenrichment is not worse off as a result of the disenrichment and therefore does not need the benefit of the defence. In some circumstances the disadvantaged person may claim the proceeds of disposal: see paragraph (4)(b) of VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment).

(c) Disenrichments which are not in good faith

Disenrichment in bad faith. As a rule a disenrichment is material only if sustained by the enriched person in good faith (para. (2)(b)). The disenrichment will not have been in good faith if the enriched person either knew or should have known that the enrichment was unjustified: see paragraph (5) of VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment).

Actual or constructive awareness of absence of justification. Save for the exceptional case addressed in the proviso, the element of good faith is thus essential to the defence of disenrichment. It is the enriched person's excusable ignorance of the obligation to restore the enrichment to the claimant which renders it unjust to overlook the fact that the enriched person would be worse off (compared with the position before "innocent" receipt or acquisition of the enrichment) if made to restore the enrichment or to pay its full value although no longer having it or its equivalent value. The material question therefore is whether, at the time that the disenrichment takes place, the enriched person should have appreciated that there would be a liability to surrender the enrichment. Expressed positively, the enriched person is eligible to make out a defence of change of position if the enriched person reasonably supposed that the enrichment received was owned and available to be to dispose of – that it was obtained with legal justification.

Constructive knowledge. The requirement that this supposition must be reasonable dictates that constructive knowledge of an obligation to surrender the enrichment precludes the defence of disenrichment in good faith as much as an actual knowledge of such an obligation.

> Illustration 13
> E, having fraudulently deceived D into letting him appropriate her diamond ring, makes a gift of the ring to his betrothed X. E knew or ought to have known at the time of acquisition by deceit (and thus also at the time of disenrichment) that the enrichment was unjustified. The requirement of good faith as a precondition of the defence of change of position prevents E from immunising himself from an enrichment claim by D by making a voluntary donation of his choice in this way. E should appreciate that his duty is to return the ring to his victim; his perhaps irreversible breach of obligation in presenting it to a third party can hardly constitute an exculpation. As D would not have made a gift of the ring to X, the exception recognised by paragraph (2)(b) does not apply and the defence is inapplicable. E is liable to pay the value of the ring.

False supposition of justification. The good faith aspect of the defence of disenrichment thus requires in substance that the enriched person (wrongly but reasonably) supposes there is some legal justification for the enrichment. The full spectrum of possible suppositions is implied by the terms of Chapter 2 which sets out when an enrichment is or is not with legal justification. Typically the enriched person must suppose either (i) that there was a right to the enrichment as against the disadvantaged person (e.g. under a valid contract) or alternatively (ii) that the disadvantaged person consented to the disadvantage freely and without error.

> Illustration 14
> A, an elderly and quite naive man, believes the story which is told to him by B, the employee of a bank C, that for reasons of checking internal scrutiny in the bank, it is necessary that a sum of € 2,000 will be credited to A's account which A is to withdraw immediately and hand back to B. In this manner B makes use of the inexperienced A for the purposes of B's criminal scheme. A is unjustifiably enriched in relation to C because B was not authorised to make the transfer. However, it is conceivable that A may be able to establish that in the circumstances A acted throughout in good faith and that consequently the onward transfer of the money to B constituted a disenrichment within the scope of this defence.

Exception: where the disadvantaged person would have been disenriched too. While good faith at the time of disenrichment is generally required, there are cases where the absence of an innocent state of mind should not deprive the enriched person of the defence of change of position. Exceptionally the defence is still available, even in a case where the enriched person was aware of an obligation to reverse the enrichment, if the disadvantaged person would also have been disenriched, even if the enrichment had been reversed. This is set out in the first proviso to paragraph (2)(b). The concluding words of that paragraph envisage the case where the disenrichment was unavoidable in the sense that even if the enriched person had behaved as would normally be required – namely, reversed the enrichment and transferred the asset back to the claimant – the same disadvantage would have been sustained by the claimant. In that case the disadvantage is causally independent of the failure to reverse the enrichment. The enriched person should not be deprived of the right to resist the claim for reversal of the enrichment if the disadvantage sustained was (in this technical sense) inescapable. However, this sense of 'inevitability' of the disadvantage is not to be confused with that which is relevant in paragraph (1). For the purposes of paragraph (1), the enriched person must show that the disadvantage was dependent on the existence of the enrichment: it was only sustained by the enriched person because of the enrichment. For the purposes of paragraph (2)(b), by contrast, the enriched person must show that the disadvantage was independent of the location of the enrichment: the disadvantage would have been sustained, whoever had the enrichment.

Exception where the enriched person does not bear the risk of loss. A second exception where good faith at the time of disenrichment is not required, set out in the second proviso to paragraph (2)(b), concerns the case where the disenrichment takes the form of loss of the enrichment due to the realisation of a risk for which the enriched person is not to be regarded as responsible. This exception protects an enriched person who has obtained the enrichment in good faith, but becomes aware that the enrichment is unjustified (and thus ceases to be in good faith) before the loss occurs. An enriched person who learns of the unjustified nature of the enrichment has a reasonable time in which to perform the obligation to reverse the enrichment: see III.–2:102 (Time of performance) paragraph (1). During that period, the enriched person is not to be regarded as an insurer of the asset to be returned. If the asset is lost without fault on the part of the enriched person, the enriched person may invoke the defence of disenrichment and is not liable to pay its value.

Illustration 15

E orders a computer hard drive from supplier D. After completing the transaction, D by mistake sends a second hard drive to E. On opening the package, E realises that D has made a mistake, but does not send it back immediately as she is due to leave for a short trip. On returning home, E discovers that her house has been broken into and the hard drive has been stolen. E has a defence under this article. E received the enrichment in good faith. E was not obliged to return the hard drive immediately; performance of the obligation to reverse the enrichment was not yet due. The risk of loss from theft was not a risk for which E was responsible, assuming that E had taken ordinary precautions in protecting her premises during her absence.

(d) Agreement genuinely fixing the price or value of the enrichment

Defence restricted in case of genuine agreement. The general rule that a disenrichment in good faith triggers the defence is subject to a further limitation. If the enriched party accepts the enrichment under an agreement and that agreement genuinely fixes a price or value for the enrichment, that amount represents a liability to which the defence will not apply: see paragraph (2)(c), pointing to paragraph (3) of VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment).

Rationale. The reason for this ceiling on the defence is that at the time the enrichment was obtained the enriched person envisaged in any case that such a sum would be due to the other party. The enriched person took on the enrichment knowing that it would have to be paid for at the agreed price. To that extent the enriched person does not merit the benefit of a defence of disenrichment. The enriched person is aware at the time of acquisition that to this extent the risk of any disposal of the enrichment must be accepted; the assumption is that there is a liability to pay the agreed amount at the time of the disposal. An outcome of this nature is achieved in some European legal systems by means of the so-called Saldotheorie.

D. Extent of the defence

General pro tanto reduction. Under paragraph (1), the liability of the enriched person is reduced to the extent of the disenrichment. The protection which the defence provides is the minimum reduction in liability which is necessary to prevent the enriched person from being worse off as a result of the change of position. The enriched person has a defence only to the extent of the disadvantage sustained.

Rationale. This principle follows from the rationale whereby the enriched person merits protection only to prevent the enriched person being worse off in comparison with the status quo before enrichment. If, after sustaining the disadvantage, the enriched person remains "better off" then there is still scope to that extent for the enriched person to disgorge the enrichment. Hence, if the enriched person has disposed of only a fraction of the enrichment, there remains a residual liability.

Illustration 16

E, living at 43, Midget Gardens, receives a Black Forest gateau and a bottle of champagne brought to her door by the D delivery company. As there is no accompanying card, she assumes her husband is up to his familiar romantic tricks and settles down, together with her seven teenage daughters, to devour the cake. In fact D's dyslexic driver made a mistake and the gifts were in fact destined for F who resides at 34, Magnet Drive. At the end of his shift, the driver realises his mistake and shamefacedly returns to E. The cake has been consumed in good faith and E is not liable to account for it. However, since the champagne bottle remains unopened, this must be handed over.

E. Rights against onward recipient: paragraph (3)

General. This provision may be regarded as unnecessary, but it serves as a reminder that where a person gratuitously and in good faith disposes of an enrichment taking the form of a transferable asset and so has the benefit of this defence, that in itself may provide the basis for a claim by the disadvantaged person against the (new) recipient. This is on the basis that the (originally) enriched person was obliged under this Book to reverse the enrichment, but the making of the onward transfer extinguishes the liability because of this defence, so that the enrichment of the new recipient is attributable to the disadvantaged person's loss of an enrichment claim against the originally enriched person: see paragraph (2) of VII.–4:103 (Debtor's performance to a non-creditor; onward transfer in good faith) and Comment C to that Article.

NOTES

1. Ob das FRENCH law den Verteidigungsgrund des Wegfalls der Bereicherung akzeptiert, ist zweifelhaft. Das liegt daran, dass es nach herrschender Auffassung bereits für die Frage, ob eine Bereicherung vorliegt, auf eine bilanzielle oder "Netto"-Betrachtung ankommt (see notes under VII.–3:102). Es fehlt also im Sinne der actio de in rem verso bereits an einer Bereicherung, wenn das Erlangte durch einen Verlust aufgezehrt wurde (Aubry and Rau [Esmein and Ponsard], Droit civil français VI[7], § 442*ter*, p. 476). Es wird freilich für selbstverständlich gehalten, dass erlangte Gattungssachen stets in gleicher Art, Güte und Menge zurückzuerstatten sind (JClCiv [Pin], arts. 1370-1381, Enrichissement sans cause, fasc. 40 no. 17) und dass der Bereicherte dem Verarmten gegenüber frei wird, wenn eine spezifische Sache zufällig untergeht (Pin loc.cit. no. 35). Auf die Haftung des bösgläubigen Bereicherten wird dagegen CC art. 1378 (répétition de l'indu) analog angewandt; er bleibt auf den ursprünglichen Betrag seiner Bereicherung haftbar (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 1074-1 p. 1030; Pin loc.cit.). Der Ausgangspunkt in BELGIUM ist derselbe (de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge III(2)[3], no. 37 p. 47), allerdings scheint man der analogen Anwendung der CC arts. 1378 und 1379 auf das Recht der enrichissement sans cause kritisch gegenüber zu stehen (de Page loc.cit. no. 50 p. 63). Für das Recht der Zahlung des Nichtgeschuldeten sieht CC art. 1302 das Erlöschen des Anspruches vor, falls eine bestimmte Sache ohne Verschulden des gutgläubigen Schuldners bei ihm untergeht oder falls sie auch bei rechtzeitiger Rückgabe an den Gläubiger untergegangen wäre.
2. Wie das französische so verfügt auch das SPANISH Zivilgesetzbuch nicht über eine allgemeine Regelung zum Wegfall der Bereicherung (see, from a comparative point of view, Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 221; Carrasco Perera, ADC 1988, 5, 109). Die Regeln, die über das Vorhandensein einer Bereicherung entscheiden (see notes to VII.–3:102), legen auch hier zugleich den Haftungsumfang fest. There are, however, exceptions in which Spanish law recognises a kind of change of position defence based on disenrichment. Das wichtigste Beispiel findet sich mit CC art. 1899 im Recht der condictio indebiti. Danach ist ein gutgläubiger accipiens, der das anspruchsbegründende Dokument vernichtete, den Anspruch gegen seinen wahren Schuldner verjähren ließ oder Sicherheiten für seinen Anspruch aufgab, von der Rückgewährpflicht befreit. Zahlt also z.B. D irrtümlich an E eine Summe Geldes und nimmt E gutgläubig an, damit werde eine Schuld des X beglichen, so dass E seine Forderung gegen X nicht weiter verfolgt und sie verjährt oder infolge der Freigabe einer Sicherheit nicht mehr realisiert werden kann, dann verliert D seinen condictio indebiti Anspruch gegen E (see TS 28 December 1999, RAJ 1999 (5) no. 9147 p. 14388). Von solchen Spezialnormen abgesehen, ist der Wegfall der Bereicherung vom spanischen Recht aber nicht als Verteidigungsgrund ausgestaltet; die Entwicklung vergleichbarer Ergebnisse muss vielmehr auf diejenigen Vorschriften gestützt werden, welche die Bereicherung ausnahmsweise auf der Grundlage eines bilanziellen oder 'net enrichment approach' festgestellt sehen wollen (see notes under VII.–3:102). Zu ihnen zählt CC art. 1304 im Recht der Rückabwicklung nichtiger Verträge, der die Haftung geschäftsunfähiger Personen auf die noch vorhandene Bereicherung begrenzt. Auch im Rahmen der condictio de regreso (reimbursement based on payment of another's debt) (CC art. 1158(3)) und der condictio por impensas (Verwendungskondiktion) (CC arts. 453, 454, 360 ff) wird allgemein auf einen bilanziellen Bereicherungsbegriff abgestellt (Carrasco Perera loc.cit. 100). CC art. 458 stellt die allgemeine Regel auf, dass derjenige, der den Besitz erhält, nicht verpflichtet ist, für Verbesserungen zu zahlen, die beim Erwerb der Sache nicht mehr vorhanden sind. Für das Recht der condictio indebiti bestimmt CC art. 1897, dass ein gutgläubiger accipiens, der eine spezifische Sache erhalten hat, die zwischenzeitlich beschädigt oder zerstört wurde oder verloren ging, nur in Höhe seiner Bereicherung verpflichtet ist. Auch hier dürfte der Gedanke des Wegfalls der Bereicherung seinen Ausdruck in einer bilanziellen Bestimmung des Bereicherungsbegriffs finden (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 520; Carrasco Perera loc.cit. 99 and 102).

3. Auch in ITALY konzentriert sich das Gesetz auf Fälle, in welchen eine rechtsgrundlos erhaltene Sache beim accipiens untergeht, sich verschlechtert oder von ihm weiterverkauft wird. Seine Haftung folgt je nachdem, ob er gut- oder bösgläubig empfangen hat, unterschiedlichen Regeln. Ein expliziter Verteidigungsgrund des Wegfalls der Bereicherung existiert zwar nicht. Allerdings wird selbst der bösgläubige accipiens befreit, wenn er beweist, dass der Leistungsgegenstand auch beim solvens untergegangen wäre (CC art. 1221(1)), und der gutgläubige accipiens ist erst gar nicht dafür verantwortlich, dass er die Unmöglichkeit der Rückgabe verursachte: er haftet stets nur begrenzt auf seine Bereicherung (CC art. 2037(3)). Sie wiederum ist nicht höher als der Wert der empfangenen Sache (Cass. 12 March 1973, Rep.Giur.it. 1973, voce Indebito nos. 2-4, no. 7). Die Geldabwertung muss berücksichtigt werden (Cass. 19 January 1977, no. 258, Rep.Giur.it. 1977, voce Indebito (pagamento dell') no. 5). Die Haftung des ursprünglich gutgläubigen accipiens bleibt erhalten, wenn er, nachdem er bösgläubig geworden ist, die Sache an einen Dritten veräußert; der solvens kann, falls der Dritte noch nicht gezahlt hat, auch direkt gegen ihn vorgehen (CC art. 2038; vgl. auch Cass. 17 April 1993, no. 4553, Foro it. 1994, I, 1752), es sei denn, der accipiens erklärt sich bereit, den Wert der Sache zu zahlen (Breccia, Il pagamento dell'indebito, 799). Im Schrifttum wird zwar empfohlen, bei der Rückabwicklung eines gegenseitigen Vertrages, unter dem beide Leistungen bereits ausgetauscht worden sind, de lege ferenda der Saldotheorie zu folgen, sieht dafür de lege lata im Gesetz jedoch keine ausreichende Grundlage (Breccia, Riv.Dir.Civ. 1974, I, 190-191; Trimarchi, L'arricchimento senza causa, 139-140). Das AUSTRIAN Zivilrecht kennt gleichfalls keine generelle Regelung, mit deren Hilfe sich der Bereicherte gegen die Kondiktion mit dem Argument verteidigen könnte, dass die Bereicherung nachträglich weggefallen sei. Sobald sie einmal im Vermögen des Bereicherten manifest geworden ist, befreit der nachträgliche Wegfall der Bereicherung nicht mehr (ständige Rechtsprechung seit OGH 6 April 1976, JBl 1977, 36; bestätigt u.a. durch OGH 4 November 1981, SZ 54/156 und OGH 18 June 1985, SZ 58/105). Der Bereicherungsanspruch gründet sich allein darauf, dass der Bereicherte eine Sache ohne rechtlichen Grund 'empfangen' hat (OGH 20 February 1975, 6 Ob 242/74). "Wie ganz allgemein der Anspruch auf den Ersatz des Wertes bestehen bleibt, wenn der zunächst eingetretene Nutzen später wegfällt, ist auch jener Bereicherte ersatzpflichtig, der die Sache veräußert oder verschenkt hat" (OGH 12 February 2002, SZ 2002/21). Es ist auch "unerheblich", ob der Bereicherte von dem Bereicherungsgegenstand "einen nützlichen oder verlustbringenden Gebrauch gemacht hat", und ob von diesem Gebrauch "noch ein Nutzen vorhanden ist oder nicht" (OGH 4 November 1981, SZ 54/164). Auch der nachträgliche Wegfall des Nutzens lässt die bereits eingetretene Bereicherung m.a.W. nicht entfallen (OGH 4 November 1981, SZ 54/156; OGH 23 November 2005, SZ 2005/168).

4. PORTUGAL akzeptiert den Wegfall der Bereicherung (diminuição ou desaparecimento do enriquecimento) als Verteidigungsgrund zugunsten des gutgläubigen Bereicherten. Seine Haftung geht nicht über das Maß seiner aktuellen Bereicherung hinaus (CC arts. 479(2), 480). Dieser Grundsatz hat seine Wurzeln in German CC § 818(3) (Schlechtriem, Restitution und Bereicherungsausgleich in Europa I, no. 292 p. 252) und verwirklicht sich in dem Prinzip der Haftung auf die effektive Nettobereicherung (enriquecimento patrimonial). Entscheidend ist die Differenz zwischen der aktuellen Situation des Begünstigten und der hypothetischen, in der er sich ohne den Bereicherungsvorgang befunden hätte (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 513; STJ 15 November 1995, BolMinJus 451 [1995] 387; vgl. auch CC art. 566(2) und dazu STJ 25 September 2008, Processo 08P2860). Die Rückabwicklung unwirksamer Verträge unterliegt aber dem Ungültigkeitsregime, nicht dem subsidiären Bereicherungsrecht, und das Recht der Rückabwicklung ungültiger Verträge kennt den Einwand des Wegfalls der Bereicherung nicht (CC art. 289(1); see Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 448). Es ist streng auf die Rückgabe des Erlangten ausgerichtet (Menezes Leitão loc. cit. 447; Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 110). Das ist der wichtigste Unterschied zwischen den beiden Regelungskomplexen (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], note 1 under art. 289, p. 265; kritisch Gomes loc.cit. 609). Der bösgläubige Bereicherungsschuldner haftet dagegen im Ergebnis nicht anders als die Parteien eines unwirksamen Vertrages (CC art. 479(1)). Für die Rückabwicklung eines synallagmatischen Vertrages wird die Saldotheorie für überflüssig angesehen, weil der Einwand des Wegfalls der Bereicherung von vornherein abgeschnitten ist; bei Untergang der Sache bleibt Wertersatz geschuldet (CC art. 289(1); see Menezes Leitão loc. cit. 451, fn. 1335). Nur im Falle der Nichtigkeit eines Kaufvertrages infolge des Umstandes, dass der Verkäufer fremde Güter verkauft hat, kann der gutgläubige Käufer Rückerstattung des Kaufpreises verlangen, ohne bei Verlust der Kaufsache selber zu einer Leistung an den Verkäufer verpflichtet zu sein (CC art. 894), nur hier ist die Haftung einer Vertragspartei auf ihre noch vorhandene Bereicherung begrenzt (Menezes Leitão loc.cit. 451, fn. 1336). Dem Ungültigkeitsregime unterliegt selbst die Rückabwicklung von Verträgen mit Minderjährigen; auch ihnen steht deshalb der Einwand des Wegfalls der Bereicherung nicht zur Verfügung (Schlechtriem loc.cit. no. 300, p. 560). Die Rechtsprechung zur Höhe der geschuldeten Bereicherung ist freilich schwierig zu analysieren, weil die Berechnung in der Regel auf das Vollstreckungsverfahren (CCP art. 661(2)) verschoben wird (z.B. STJ 6 December 2006, CJ [ST] XIV [2006-3] 154; STJ 24 February 2005, Processo 04B4601).

5. GERMAN CC § 818(3) anerkennt den Verteidigungsgrund des Wegfalls der Bereicherung. Die Vorschrift schließt (sofern nicht der Bereicherungsschuldner eigene Aufwendungen erspart hat und deshalb in Wahrheit gar nicht entreichert ist) sowohl die Pflicht zur Herausgabe des Erlangten als auch die Wertersatzpflicht aus. Geschützt ist natürlich nur der gutgläubige Bereicherungsschuldner (CC §§ 818(4), § 819). Ist ein nichtiger gegenseitiger Vertrag (insbesondere ein Kaufvertrag) bereits von beiden Seiten erfüllt worden, die Kaufsache aber später beim Käufer ersatzlos weggefallen, so wird es als unangemessen empfunden, dem Käufer zwar den Anspruch auf den Kaufpreis zu geben, dem Verkäufer aber jeden Ausgleich zu verwehren (CC § 818(3)). Dem tragen Rechtsprechung und Lehre mit der sogen. Saldotheorie Rechnung, wonach auch der Bereicherungsschuldner (im Beispiel: der Verkäufer) eine Entreicherung reklamieren kann, nämlich den Wert des an den Käufer gelieferten Wagens, mit der Folge, dass der Verkäufer nur den “Saldo”, d.h. seine Nettobereicherung schuldet. Dies gilt nur dann nicht, wenn es sich um einen nicht schutzwürdigen Schuldner handelt (arglistige Täuschung), der Gläubiger geschäftsunfähig und deshalb schutzwürdiger ist als der Schuldner, oder wenn der Untergang der Sache auf einem vom Gläubiger zu vertretenden Sachmangel beruht. In diesen Fällen wird nicht "saldiert", sondern es wird jede Kondiktion je für sich geprüft (sogen. Zweikondiktionentheorie, see Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 818, no. 46).

6. HUNGARIAN CC § 361(2) stellt die Grundregel auf, dass eine Person die Bereicherung nicht zurückerstatten muss, wenn sie sie vor der Rückforderung verloren hat. Ein solcher Wegfall der Bereicherung ist allerdings solange zu verneinen, wie sie noch in irgendeiner Form im Vermögen des Bereicherten vorhanden ist. Es fehlt deshalb an einem Bereicherungswegfall, wenn der Bereicherte das Erlangte verkauft oder seinetwegen Schadenersatz erhalten hat. Eine im eigenen Interesse verbrauchte Bereicherung ist nicht weggefallen (BH 1993/500 [für Lebensunterhalt verbrauchtes Geld]; BH 1987/312 [für dauerhafte Verbrauchsgüter und zum Teil für teure Reisen ausgegebenes Geld]). Ein Wegfall der Bereicherung ist deshalb regelmäßig nur zu bejahen, wenn der Bereicherte das Empfangene verschenkt hat oder wenn es gestohlen wurde oder sonst ersatzlos untergegangen ist (Petrik [-Bíró], Polgári jog II[2], 654/1; Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1393-1395). Auf den Verteidigungsgrund des Wegfalls der Bereicherung kann sich im Übrigen nur berufen, wer im Zeitpunkt des Wegfalls gutgläubig war und entweder nicht mit einer Rückgabepflicht rechnen musste oder keine Verantwortung für den Untergang der Sache trägt (z.B. BH 2003/66 [gutgläubiger Erwerber von Aktien veräußert sie zu einem Zeitpunkt, in dem er bereits mit der Rückgabe rechnen musste]; vgl. auch BH 1992/541). Zuwendungen, die zum Lebensunterhalt gewährt und genutzt wurden, sind unter CC § 361(2) besonders privilegiert. Zu bedenken ist, dass die Rückabwicklung ungültiger Verträge nicht dem Bereicherungs-, sondern dem Vertragsrecht unterliegt und dass dieses den Verteidigungsgrund des Wegfalls der Bereicherung nicht kennt.

7. Dem BULGARIAN Bereicherungsrecht ist der Verteidigungsgrund der Entreicherung unbekannt; auch hier fließt sein sachlicher Gehalt bereits in die Frage ein, ob der Beklagte tatsächlich bzw. "aktuell" bereichert ist (see Goleminov, Neosnovatelno obogatyavane, 185 mit eingehender rechtsvergleichender Analyse). Ansätze der Lehre vom Wegfall der Bereicherung finden sich in LOA art. 58 (betr. die Rückgewähr einer Bereicherung von einer geschäftsunfähigen Person) und in LOA art. 57(2) (Weiterveräußerung durch gutgläubigen accipiens). Hat z. B. eine nicht voll geschäftsfähige Person den Kaufgegenstand an einen Dritten weiterveräußert, soll der Bereicherungsgläubiger auf eine Kondiktion gegen den Dritten beschränkt sein (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 593). Unter SLOVENIAN law kann sich der accipiens zu seiner Verteidigung darauf berufen, über die Sache gutgläubig verfügt zu haben; er haftet in diesem Fall nur bis zu der Grenze dessen, was er von dem Dritten erhalten hat; hat accipiens die Sache in gutem Glauben verschenkt, ist er von der Haftung frei (Cigoj, Teorija obligacij, 260).

8. Ein gutgläubiger accipiens, der die empfangene Sache weiterveräußert, kann seine dem solvens gegenüber bestehende Herausgabepflicht zwar nicht mehr erfüllen, haftet dem solvens gegenüber aber gleichwohl nicht aus Pflichtverletzung, weil der accipiens unter DUTCH CC art. 6:74(1) dartun kann, dass ihm die Pflichtverletzung nicht zugerechnet werden kann. Denn solange er nicht mit der Verpflichtung rechnen musste, das Gut zurückzugeben, musste er für es auch nicht wie ein sorgfältiger Schuldner Sorge tragen (CC art. 6:204(1)). Allerdings wird er im Normalfall mit dem empfangenen Kaufpreis bereichert sein, den er als Schadenersatz unter den Vorschriften des Bereicherungsrechts herausgeben muss (CC art. 6:78(1)), d.h. beschränkt auf den objektiven Marktwert der empfangenen Sache. Eine Gewinnabschöpfung findet im Bereicherungsrecht nicht statt (CC art. 6:104, see Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 447, p. 397; Scheltema, Onverschuldigde betaling, 170). Auch für das Bereicherungsrecht bestimmt im Übrigen CC art. 6:212(2), dass eine Wertminderung des Erlangten, welche dem Bereicherten nicht zugerechnet werden kann, außer Betracht bleibt. CC art. 6:212(3) fügt hinzu, dass eine Wertminderung dem Bereicherungsschuldner auch dann nicht zugerechnet werden kann, wenn sie zu einer Zeit geschieht, zu welcher der Bereicherte nicht vernünftigerweise mit einer Schadenersatzpflicht rechnen musste. Anspruchsmindernd zu berücksichtigen sind außerdem solche Ausgaben des gutgläubigen (Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 366 p. 385; van Maanen, Ongerechtvaardigde verrijking, 47; Vriesendorp, Verbintenissen uit de wet en schadevergoeding[2], no. 321 p. 302-304) Schuldners, die er ohne die Bereicherung nicht gehabt hätte. CC art. 6:212(3) ist ein Pendant zu CC art. 6:204 (see above) und zugleich eine Konkretisierung von CC art. 6:75 (Begriff der Zurechnung).

9. ESTONIAN LOA §§ 1033, 1035 and 1038 enthalten eine eingehende Regelung der Folgen des Wegfalls der Bereicherung. Der Schuldner ist frei, wenn der Bereicherungsgegenstand zerstört oder verbraucht wurde oder aus irgendeinem anderen Grunde nicht mehr im Vermögen des Schuldners vorhanden ist und ihn fortdauernd bereichert; es darf sich also auch nicht um eine fortwirkende Bereicherung in der Form ersparter Aufwendungen handeln (Supreme Court 17 June 2004, administrative matter no. 3-3-1-17-04). Je nach den Umständen des Einzelfalles kann der Schuldner selbst dann Aufwendungen erspart haben, wenn er die Sache verschenkt hat und wenn feststeht, dass er ohne sie etwas anderes verschenkt haben würde (Tampuu, Lepinguväliste võlasuhete õigus, 98-99). Im Falle der Nichtigkeit eines gegenseitigen Vertrages kann sich der Bereicherte nach beiderseitigem Leistungsaustausch nur dann auf den Wegfall seiner eigenen Bereicherung berufen, wenn er in der Geschäftsfähigkeit eingeschränkt war oder von der anderen Seite durch Täuschung oder Zwang zum Abschluss des Vertrages verleitete worden ist. Auf einen Wegfall der Bereicherung kann sich ferner nicht berufen, wer im Zeitpunkt ihres Wegfalls bereits von der Rückgabepflicht wusste oder mit ihr rechnen musste. Im Falle der Eingriffsbereicherung kann der Verteidigungsgrund des Bereicherungswegfalls ebenfalls nur demjenigen zugute kommen, der weder wusste noch wissen musste, dass er unerlaubt über ein fremdes Recht verfügte.

Illustration 1 draws on CA The Hague 20 December 2005, publ. 26 September 2006, LJN no. AY8847; illustration 3 is inspired by judicial observations in BH 2005/115; illustration 4 is based on TS 28 December 1999, RAJ 1999 (5) no. 9147 p. 14388, and illustration 14 on STJ 10 November 1981, BolMinJus 311 (1981) 353.

VII.–6:102: Juridical acts in good faith with third parties

The enriched person is also not liable to reverse the enrichment if:

(a) in exchange for that enrichment the enriched person confers another enrichment on a third person; and

(b) the enriched person is still in good faith at that time.

COMMENTS

General. A provision of this nature is necessary to protect enriched persons in a number of exceptional situations where they will otherwise find themselves under an enrichment liability although they were not a party to the transaction out of whose circumstances the unjustified enrichment essentially arises. It gives effect to the same basic policy considerations protecting good faith acquirers of property (whose enrichments are justified by a rule of law under VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified)). Provision to this effect is needed because the rules on good faith acquisition have a limited scope of application. Protection is needed outside that scope where the innocent enriched person who has given value in exchange for the benefit does not acquire a property right.

Illustration 1

As a result of X's improper pressure, D is coerced into selling a boat to X. D subsequently avoids the sale to X and under the applicable rules of property law avoidance of the contract of sale re-vests property in the boat in D. D demands a fee for use of the boat from E, who has chartered it from X. E is enriched in making use of D's boat. He has, however, paid X, with whom he dealt in good faith to obtain the use of the boat. If E has not acquired a property right by his good faith dealings with X (e.g. because the right of a charterer is not characterised as a property right), E will have infringed D's rights by making use of D's asset. That enrichment is not justified by a rule of law (since the property law rules on good faith acquisition do not apply). However, E has the defence under this Article by virtue of his payment to X in good faith in return for use of the boat.

Direct recipients. One field of application of this Article is where the disadvantaged person was obliged to perform to the enriched person under an obligation to a third party, which obligation is void or avoided and affected by fraud, threats or unfair advantage (e.g. of that third party) or the disadvantaged person's own lack of capacity. This forms an exceptional case where the disadvantaged person has a direct claim against the enriched person, notwithstanding that the enriched person is a third party to the underlying juridical act, because the disadvantaged person has not performed freely. See VII.–2:102 (Performance of obligation to third person) in conjunction with VII.–2:103 (Consenting or performing freely) paragraph (2).

Illustration 2

By fraudulent misrepresentations X, a rogue, induces D to transfer money to E, whom X purports to represent. When E receives the money, E provides X with goods because X has deceived E into believing that he represents D. E has obtained an enrichment (money) which is unjustified in relation to D. However, E has a defence under this Article since E conferred a counter-enrichment on X (goods) in exchange for the enrichment obtained.

Indirect recipients. A second category of case concerns situations in which the enrichment is brought about on the basis of a mediated involvement of the parties to the enrichment claim – i.e. where the enriched person has not received or taken the enrichment directly from the disadvantaged person.

Illustration 3
X takes D's bricks without D's permission and uses them to construct a building on E's land. As a result of X's intervention, E's enrichment (the bricks becoming part of E's property on being fixed to the land) is attributable to D's disadvantage in losing property in the bricks: see VII.–4:105 (Attribution resulting from an act of an intervener) and in particular paragraph (2). However, E will have a defence under this Article if E had contracted X to construct the building and pays or has paid him, assuming that E neither knew nor ought to have known that X had no right to use the bricks.

Illustration 4
By mistake D makes a payment to X. X in turn makes a gift of the money to E. Although D has an unjustified enrichment claim against X, the onward transfer of the money to E – if made by X in good faith – may entitle X to the benefit of the defence under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment). If (by virtue of that defence to D's claim) X's onward transfer of the money to E has the effect of extinguishing X's liability to D, E's acquisition of the money is an enrichment which is attributable to D's loss of the enrichment claim against X: VII.–4:103 (Debtor's performance to a non-creditor; onward transfer in good faith) paragraph (2).

Exchange. The defence only applies in so far as an enrichment is conferred in exchange for the one obtained. This means in particular that the enrichment which is actually obtained must be the enrichment contemplated by the transaction with the third party. The mere fact that the enriched person has benefited a third party in the expectation of receiving something which is indeed received from the disadvantaged person will not protect the enriched person if the covering transaction is more limited in scope.

Illustration 5
Under the terms of a lease of a hotel complex D is obliged to pay her landlord, X, a year's rent equal to 20% of the income from the complex, subject to a minimum liability of € 28,000. X assigns its claim to rent to its bank, E, and gives D notice of the assignment. D makes a payment to E to discharge her obligation to pay rent, but by mistake pays some € 54,000 rather than the mere € 28,000 which is in fact due. D is entitled to repayment from E of the excess. Even if X represented to E that the rent due was € 54,000 and thereby induced E to accept the assignment in lieu of a debt due from X to E, E's enrichment as regards the excess payment remains unjustified in relation to D. The defence under this Article does not apply to the excess, notwithstanding that E has enriched X (by releasing X from its debt). Properly analysed, E's enrichment of X was not in exchange for a payment from D as such (the enrichment conferred by D), but rather in exchange for X's claim against D. That the value of this claim was misrepresented so that E expected from D a sum greater than that to which E was in fact entitled does not prejudice D.

Good faith. The notion of good faith applicable for the purposes of this Article is the same as in VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment) paragraph (5).

Illustration 6
X, an employee of a public finance body D, has authority to make transactions relating to an account containing public funds in order, among other things, to reimburse travel expenses incurred by those acting in the public service. He misuses this authority to pay money from the account to a prostitute E in satisfaction of debts which he owes her. The prostitute E could not sensibly assume that her services might legitimately be paid for from a public account on the instructions of her debtor. She should have appreciated that the bank payment was wrongful. Consequently, E is liable to repay the money to D.

Extent of the defence. In contrast to the defence under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment), this defence, if established by the enriched person, is a complete defence. Liability is excluded entirely and not merely reduced by the amount of the enriched person's disadvantage (the enrichment which the enriched person conferred on the third party). This promotes legal certainty and the commercial circulation of property more effectively than merely limiting enrichment liability on a pro tanto basis. Having effectively purchased the benefit in good faith, the recipient is assured that there will be no unjustified enrichment liability to any third parties.

NOTES

1. Da die ROMANISCHEN Rechtsordnungen nicht über eine in sich geschlossene Regelung des Rechts der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung verfügen, hat der Gesetzgeber dort auch kein einheitliches System der Verteidigungsgründe gegenüber Ansprüchen aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung aufgestellt. Auch die in diesem Article geregelten Situationen werden demgemäß nicht in der Perspektive eines Verteidigungsgrundes analysiert, sondern im Kontext anderer Regelungszusammenhänge, oft solchen des Sachenrechts. Wenn etwa X und E vereinbaren, dass X auf dem Grundstück des E ein Haus bauen soll, X hierfür aber gestohlene Baumaterialien des D verwendet, so ist under SPANISH law für die Antwort auf die Frage, ob E dem D gegenüber haftet, zunächst CC art. 365 zu konsultieren. Danach muss der Grundstückseigentümer dem Dritten (D) Wertersatz für dessen Materialien zahlen, wenn und insoweit derjenige, der sie verwendet hat, zahlungsunfähig ist. E würde dem D unter CC art. 365 insoweit haften, als D mit seiner condictio gegen X ausfällt. Es ist freilich zweifelhaft, ob CC art. 365 wirklich den Fall umfassen will, in welchem zwischen dem Grundeigentümer und dem Verwender der Materialien ein Vertrag besteht (see Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos III[4], 264 and Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 290); dieser Vertrag, so die genannten Autoren, gäbe dem Grundeigentümer vielmehr einen Rechtsgrund zum Behaltendürfen der Materialien. Anders wäre das nur, wenn der Vertrag zwischen E und X nichtig wäre; dann würde E dem D unmittelbar haften und müsste X in Regress nehmen.
2. Auch unter ITALIAN law kann der Entreicherte nur in wenigen Ausnahmesituationen (mit der actio surrogatoria) direkt gegen den tatsächlichen Empfänger der Leistung vorgehen (Trimarchi, L'arricchimento senza causa, 103). Sonst aber folgt der Bereicherungsausgleich den Leistungsbeziehungen. CC art. 937(3) sieht allerdings für Fälle, in welchen ein Bauwerk mit Materialien eines Dritten geschaffen wird, eine gesamtschuldnerische Haftung des Verwenders und des bösgläubigen Grundeigentümers in Höhe des Wertes der Materialien vor. Der entreicherte (ursprüngliche) Eigentümer der Materialien kann solchen Wertersatz auch vom gutgläubigen Grundeigentümer verlangen, doch ist der Anspruch auf den Preis begrenzt, den dieser für die gelieferten Materialien noch schuldet. Hat er den Preis bereits bezahlt, haftet er dem ursprünglichen Eigentümer gar nicht mehr. Das Letztere entspricht im Kern der Lösung in VII.–6:102.

3. PORTUGAL kennt wie Italy die acção sub-rogatória (CC arts. 606(2) und 609), die es dem Entreicherten in den dort genannten Fällen erlaubt, direkt gegen den tatsächlichen Empfänger der Leistung vorzugehen (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I^{10}, 495, fn. 2). Die sachenrechtlichen Vorschriften zum sogen. Zuwachs an Immobilien (CC arts. 1339-1343) arbeiten mit einer komplizierten Verweistechnik, darunter ausdrückliche Verweise auf das Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung. CC art. 1342 regelt den Fall des Bauens mit fremden Materialien auf fremdem Grund nach italienischem Vorbild (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado III^2, 168, note 1 under art. 1342). Die Vorschrift bringt eine Ausnahme von der sonst nahezu durchweg beachteten Voraussetzung der Unmittelbarkeit der Vermögensverschiebung (Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 438, fn. 719). Der Bereicherungsanspruch besteht aber dann nicht, wenn der Einbau aufgrund Vertrages erfolgte (STJ 30 May 2006, Processo 06A825). Denn eine Durchgriffskondiktio wird nur im Fall des CC art. 481 (unentgeltliche Veräußerung) akzeptiert (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa^2, 858, 861).

4. BULGARIA kennt den Verteidigungsgrund des Wegfalls der Bereicherung nicht. In der Konstellation der illustration 1 under this Article muss D den Vertrag mit X wegen Betrugs anfechten, woraufhin er den Leistungsgegenstand von X aus LOA art. 55(1) zurückfordern kann. E dagegen kann sich nicht auf eine Entreicherung durch die Leistung an X berufen; sie gewährt ihm keinen Verteidigungsgrund (Goleminov, Neosnovatelno obogatyavane, 185). E muss vielmehr gleichfalls das Rechtsgeschäft anfechten, unter dem er an X geleistet hat und gegen ihn vorgehen. Im Falle des Bauens mit gestohlenem fremden Material muss sein ursprünglicher Eigentümer, dessen Eigentum durch Einbau unterging (LPA art. 92), entweder im Wege des Deliktsrechts gegen den Verfügenden oder im Wege des Bereicherungsrechts gegen den Grundeigentümer vorgehen. Diesem scheint es nichts zu nutzen, dass er den Verfügenden bereits bezahlt hat (Stavrou, Vuprosi na bulgarskoto veshtno pravo, 678-679).

5. Die Lösung unter DUTCH law ist nicht völlig eindeutig. HR 29 January 1993, NedJur 1994, no. 172 p. 728 spricht eher für eine andere Lösung als VII.–6:102. Es ging um einen Sohn, der einen Unternehmer damit beauftragt hatte, auf dem Grundstück des Vaters einen Stall zu bauen. Der Unternehmer klagte erfolgreich gegen den Vater, der die Pläne gekannt hatte. Dass der Vater bereits Geld für den Stallbau an seinen Sohn gezahlt hatte, wurde nicht als Verteidigungsgrund akzeptiert; der Vater habe damit rechnen müssen, an den Werkunternehmer zahlen zu müssen. Auf diesen Umstand dürfte es nach niederländischer Auffassung entscheidend ankommen.

6. Under ESTONIAN LOA § 1038 darf der durch einen Eingriff bösgläubig Bereicherte Erwerbskosten nicht von seiner Bereicherung abziehen. Der gutgläubige Bereicherte kann sich hinsichtlich der Erwerbskosten dagegen auf einen Bereicherungswegfall berufen.

Illustration 5 on A.P. 946/2002, XrID 2 (2002) 689; and illustration 6 on BGH 21 October 2004, NJW 2005, 60.

VII.–6:103: Illegality

Where a contract or other juridical act under which an enrichment is obtained is void or avoided because of an infringement of a fundamental principle (within the meaning of II.–7:301 (Contracts infringing fundamental principles)) or mandatory rule of law, the enriched person is not liable to reverse the enrichment to the extent that the reversal would contravene the policy underlying the principle or rule.

COMMENTS

General. This Article draws on the provisions in Book II, Chapter 7, Section 3 (Infringement of fundamental principles or mandatory rules). Those provisions envisage that illegality may have varying impact on the efficacy of a contract, depending on the precise nature and purpose of the illegality and the other circumstances. This Article provides a correspondingly open tool for judicial recognition that a disadvantaged person should not be entitled to recover under this Book in view of an applicable mandatory rule or a fundamental principle.

Illegality and justification. Where the enrichment is obtained by virtue of a contract, a prior question before any issue of a defence under this Article can arise is whether the enrichment is justified – which question will turn on the validity of the contract and accordingly the effect which the illegality has had on the status of the contract. II.–7:303 (Effects of nullity or avoidance) expressly provides that restitution where a contract is rendered ineffective on grounds of illegality is governed by the law of unjustified enrichment.

Illustration 1
E employs D to undertake cleaning services, but D (as E knows) does not have a work permit. Although D has undertaken the work agreed to be done, E refuses to pay D. Whether or to what extent the contract of employment is valid depends on the application of the provisions in Book II, Chapter 7, Section 3 (Infringement of fundamental principles or mandatory rules). Only if the contract is void is E's enrichment in the receipt of a service unjustified and accordingly only then does the question arise whether E has a defence against D's claim under this Book on the basis of this Article.

Illustration 2
D is in the business of supplying radar speed trap detectors which D markets for sale to drivers who are anxious not to exceed the permitted speed on stretches of road which are subject to speed traps. Whether or not the use of such equipment on the highway for the purposes of identifying the existence of speed traps constitutes a criminal offence, its use may be contrary to public policy since it tends to encourage drivers to rely on the fact they will be warned of such devices with the result that they may effectively drive at excess speeds until warned without risk of detection. A contract for the supply of such equipment, where both parties are aware that it will be used for this purpose, is therefore arguably contrary to public policy. On the basis that under the rules of the provisions in Book II, Chapter 7, Section 3 (Infringement of fundamental principles or mandatory rules) the contract is void, this Article will determine whether there will be restitution of the equipment and the price paid – i.e. whether D (the supplier) and E (the recipient of the equipment under a void contract to buy from D) will be able to enforce a reversal of the other's enrichment. The legal consequence will be the same for both claims.

Criterion. This Article envisages that whether or not there is a (complete or partial) defence to an enrichment claim based on illegality will depend on whether in the particular circumstances reversal of the enrichment would support or contradict the policy of the law in recognising the illegality.

Relevant factors. In determining whether the enriched person should have a defence on the basis of illegality the following considerations (which are also relevant in determining whether any underlying contract is valid or enforceable: see II.–7:302 (Contracts infringing mandatory rules)) will be particularly material: (a) the culpability of each party; (b) the purpose of the principle or rule which has been infringed; (c) the category of persons for whose protection the principle or rule which has been infringed exists; (d) any sanction that may be imposed under the rule infringed; (e) the seriousness of the infringement; and (f) the closeness of the relationship between the infringement and the act.

Illustrative application. In applying these factors to the first illustration, the hardship to the employee arising from the supply of work without any recompense must be weighed up against the aim of the rules striking down such contracts, which is essentially to protect the proper market for the supply of labour. The balance of these factors tends towards permitting the employee to claim in respect of their work, albeit only to the extent of the value of their actual work – a value which takes account of the unlawfulness (i.e. the precariousness) of the employment and is thus less than the price for such service on the ordinary labour market. In the second illustration, the aim of the rule striking at the validity of the contract is to deter the supply and use of such equipment. Refusing a claim for the value of the equipment ensures that the supplier has no incentive to conduct a business of supplying the equipment; allowing recovery of the equipment (and return of the price paid), by contrast, allows the status quo ante to be restored to the supplier, by contrast, is consistent with the policy of discouraging the supply and use of the equipment to the public.

Illustration 3
D lends E a sum of money which D knows E intends to use to acquire heroin in Marocco. After E has purchased the drugs, D demands repayment of the sum lent. The contract of loan is void under II.–7:302 (Contracts infringing mandatory rules) because of the purpose of the loan contract known to both parties. E has a defence to D's claim under this Book for a return of the capital – not in order to protect E (whose case is without merit and as a result obtains a windfall), but rather to deter future lenders from financing traffic in drugs.

NOTES

1. Nemo auditur propriam turpitudinem allegans und in pari causa turpitudinis cessat repetitio betreffen im FRENCH and BELGIAN law Verträge, die wegen immoralité nichtig sind (Bénabent, Les obligations[10], no. 233). Niemand soll sich zur Begründung eines Rückforderungsanspruches darauf berufen können, selber sittenwidrig gehandelt zu haben (nemo auditur). Die illicéité des Vertrages findet bei der Feststellung seiner Sittenwidrigkeit Berücksichtigung, ist aber nicht schon für sich allein ausschlaggebend. Bei der Feststellung der Sittenwidrigkeit kommt dem Tatrichter ein breites Ermessen zu (Malinvaud, Droit des obligations[9], no. 407). Die Rückforderung kann z.B. ausgeschlossen sein, wenn ein Werkunternehmer, dem die erforderliche

Genehmigung zum Betrieb seines Gewerbes fehlt, auf einen wegen der fehlenden Genehmigung unwirksamen Vertrag leistet (CA Brussels 9 June 2006, no. JB0669B_1, no. de rôle 2005 AR 632; CA Liège 4 February 2003, no. JL03241_1; no. de rôle 2001RG349).

2. SPANISH CC arts. 1305 and 1306 bringen im Rahmen des Rechts der Rückabwicklung nichtiger Verträge ausführliche Vorschriften für den Rückforderungsausschluss von mit causa torpe oder turpis causa erbrachten Leistungen. Das sind Leistungen auf einen sittenwidrigen Grund, der rechtlich nicht genügt to support the contract. Anders als in France und Belgium stehen nemo auditur propriam turpitudinem allegans and, above all, in pari causa turpitudinis cessat repetitio also ausdrücklich im Gesetz, wenn auch nicht (wie in Compilation of 'Foral Civil Law' of Navarra Act art. 510(2)) im Bereicherungsrecht oder zumindest im Recht der condictio indebiti, sondern im Vertragsrecht (Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán, Las nulidades de los contratos, 290). CC art. 1305 schließt Rückforderungsansprüche aus Verträgen aus, die eine Straftat zum Inhalt haben; CC art. 1306 betrifft Leistungen aufgrund einer nicht mit Strafe bedrohten causa torpe. CC art. 1305 unterscheidet weiter zwischen Fällen, in welchen sich das Verhalten beider Parteien als Straftat erweist, und solchen, in denen nur eine Seite eine Straftat begeht. Im ersten Fall kommt es zu einem vollständigen Rückforderungsausschluss für beide Seiten; außerdem zu einer Konfiskation des Vertragsgegenstandes nach den Regeln des Código Penal. Es ist zwar umstritten, ob auch für den Rückforderungsausschluss (und nicht nur für die Konfiskation) eine vorherige strafrechtliche Verurteilung nötig ist (bejahend Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 583, verneinend Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 302-303), doch umgehen die Zivilgerichte dieses Problem meistens dadurch, dass sie statt CC art. 1305 den CC art. 1306 anwenden (e.g. CA Girona 13 November 2005, BDA JUR 2006/51579). Erweist sich nur das Verhalten einer Partei als strafbar, so bleibt unter CC art. 1305 die unschuldige Partei zur Rückforderung ihrer Leistung berechtigt. Fehlt es auf beiden Seiten an einer Straftat, ist der Vertrag aber gleichwohl sittenwidrig, so kommt es unter CC art. 1306 für den Rückforderungsausschluss vor allem auf den Grad des Verschuldens der jeweiligen Partei an (näher Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc.cit. 305). Unbeschadet des Wortlauts der Vorschrift courts tend to extend CC art. 1306 to any contract whose causa or whose object are illegal (e.g. TS 2 April 2002, RAJ 2002 (2), no. 2485 p. 4295 [wegen CC art. 1306 kein Wertersatz für die aus einer Apotheke gezogenen Nutzungen; die Apotheke war nur zum Schein übertragen worden, um Lizenzerfordernisse zu umgehen]; TS 31 May 2005, RAJ 2005 (3) no. 4251 p. 8862 [rechtswidrige Übertragung einer Marktlizenz; wegen CC art. 1306 kein Anspruch auf Rückforderung des Kaufpreises]). Trotz ihres Standortes im Vertragsrecht sollen die CC arts. 1305 und 1306 nach Delgado Echeverría and Parra Lucán loc. cit. 306 auch im Recht der condictio indebiti und im Rahmen der allgemeinen Bereicherungsklage Anwendung finden; sie sollen sogar einem entsprechenden Vindikationsanspruch entgegenstehen (ebenso Carrasco Perera, ADC 1987, 1055, 1067). Zu beachten ist andererseits, dass den CC arts. 1305 und 1306 besondere Vorschriften vorgehen können, insbesondere Estatuto de los Trabajadores [Workers' Statute] art. 9.2, wonach Arbeitnehmer ihren Lohnanspruch für die Vergangenheit nicht deshalb verlieren, weil der Arbeitsvertrag nichtig ist. Unter dieser Vorschrift sollen z.B. Arbeitnehmer geschützt sein, deren Arbeitsvertrag wegen fehlender Aufenthaltsgenehmigung nichtig ist (TS [Administrative Chamber] 28 May 1991, RAJ 1991 (4) no. 4215 p. 5791) (inzwischen begründet ein solcher Mangel allerdings keine nulidad des Arbeitsvertrages mehr: TS 9 June 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 3936 p. 7268).

3. ITALIAN CC art. 2035 bestimmt, dass derjenige, der eine Leistung zu einem Zweck vorgenommen hat, welcher auch für ihn selbst als Verstoß gegen die guten Sitten zu werten ist, das Gezahlte nicht zurückfordern kann. Beispiele hierfür sind Glücksspiel und Wette, die Inanspruchnahme der Dienste einer Prostituierten (CA Trento 16 May 1955, Rep.Giur.it. 1956, voce Indebito no. 8) oder einer Ehevermittlung (Cass. 25 March 1966, no. 803, Foro it. 1966, I, 1963), das Akzeptieren des vertraglichen Verbots, eine bestimmte Person zu heiraten (Cass. 30 May 1953, no. 1633, Foro it. 1954, I, 194) und betrügerische Vereinbarungen zu Lasten Dritter. Auch eine Bereicherungsklage ist ausgeschlossen (Moscati, Pagamento dell' indebito, 366). Den Zweck des CC art. 2035 hat der Kassationshof einmal darin gesehen, dass die "Untersuchung skandalöser Tatsachen" vermieden werden solle (Cass. 11 April 1949, no. 868, Giur.it. 1950, I, 1, 242). Die rein faktische Bevorzugung des accipiens hat das Gericht damit erklärt, dass in den Fällen des CC art. 2035 das Verhalten des solvens noch anstößiger sei als das des Empfängers (Cass. 29 April 1961, no. 985, Foro it. 1962, I, 765). Vom Text des CC art. 2035 werden jedenfalls nur sittenwidrige Handlungen erfasst; bloße Rechtswidrigkeit oder der Verstoß gegen zwingendes Recht genügen für sich allein nicht. Erforderlich ist ferner, dass beide Parteien den Zweck verfolgten, welcher den Vertrag als sittenwidrig erscheinen lässt. Verstößt nur der Beweggrund einer Partei gegen die guten Sitten, so bleibt der Vertrag ohnehin wirksam (Ausnahme: CC art. 788: unerlaubter Beweggrund bei Schenkung). Fällt ein sittenwidriges Motiv (Darlehen zum Betrieb eines nicht genehmigten Spielcasinos) mit einem anständigen Motiv zusammen (Darlehen aus Freundschaft), dann hängt es von den weiteren Umständen ab, ob der Kondiktionsausschluss eingreift oder nicht (siehe einerseits [Rückforderung erlaubt] Cass. 20 June 1960, no. 1627, Foro it. 1961, I, 89 und andererseits Cass. 17 June 1950, no. 1555, Rep.Giur.it. 1950, Voce Giochi e Scommesse, no. 4 [Kondiktion ausgeschlossen]). Sittenwidrig i.S.v. CC art. 2035 sind desgleichen entgeltliche Verträge über das Austragen eines fremden Kindes (Leih- bzw. "Mietmutterschaft"; maternità surrogata) (CFI Monza 27 October 1989, Giur. civ. comm. 1990, I, 335); Verträge, die aus Solidarität und einem spirito di liberalità geschlossen werden, sind dagegen wirksam (CFI Rome, ord. 14-17 February 2000, Riv.it.med.leg. 2000, 593).

4. Im PORTUGUESE CC findet sich die nemo auditur propriam turpitudinem allegans-Regel nicht; die Rückabwicklung gesetzes- oder sittenwidriger Verträge folgt dem allgemeinen Unwirksamkeitsregime (Schlechtriem, Restitution und Bereicherungsausgleich in Europa I, no. 503, p. 657). Rechtsgeschäfte, deren Gegenstand rechtlich unmöglich oder gesetzeswidrig ist, sind unter CC art. 280 nichtig, desgleichen Rechtsgeschäfte, die gegen den ordem pública oder die guten Sitten verstoßen CC art. 280 konkretisiert CC art. 294, wonach die gegen zwingende Gesetzesvorschriften abgeschlossenen Rechtsgeschäfte nichtig sind, es sei denn, das Gesetz ordnet eine andere Rechtsfolge an (wie z.B. in CC art. 1306). Es ist jeweils zu prüfen, ob die Nichtigkeitsfolge erforderlich ist, um den Gesetzesweck zu verwirklichen (Hörster, Parte geral, 520; Schlechtriem loc.cit. no. 502, p. 656).

5. GERMAN CC § 817 second sentence schließt den bereicherungsrechtlichen Rückforderungsanspruch für den Fall aus, dass sowohl dem Leistenden als auch dem Empfänger der Leistung ein Verstoß gegen ein gesetzliches Verbot oder gegen die guten Sitten zur Last fällt. Der Anwendungsbereich der Vorschrift erstreckt sich nach nahezu einhelliger Auffassung über den Wortlaut hinaus auch auf den Fall, dass nur dem Leistenden ein solcher Verstoß zur Last fällt, und bezieht sich außerdem nicht nur auf die von CC § 817 first sentence gewährte condictio ob turpem vel iniustam causam, sondern auf jedwede Leistungskondiktion (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[67], § 817, no. 12; Medicus, Schuldrecht II[14], no. 659). Sehr streitig ist dagegen, ob CC § 817

second sentence auf nichtbereicherungsrechtliche Ansprüche analog angwandt werden darf. Die Rechtsprechung hat das– meist unter Hinweis auf den Ausnahmecharakter der Vorschrift – bislang stets abgelehnt (BGH 31 January 1963, BGHZ 39, 87, 91; BGH 9 October 1991, NJW 1992, 310, 311; BGH 8 January 1975, BGHZ 63, 365, 368); im Schirfttum ist das teils auf Zustimmung, teils auf Ablehnung gestoßen (näher z.B. MünchKomm [-Lieb], BGB[4], § 817, no. 26 und Erman [-Westermann and Buck-Heeb], BGB II[12], § 817, no. 11). Es werden aber umgekehrt auch teleologische Reduktionen von CC § 817 second sentence praktiziert, z.B. bei Darlehensverträgen, die wegen wucherischer Zinssätze nichtig sind. Es wird angenommen, dass CC § 817 second sentence in einem solchen Fall nicht dazu führt, dass der Darlehensgeber sein Kapital überhaupt nicht mehr zurückerhält, sondern nur dazu, dass der Darlehensgeber das Kapital für die vereinbarte Zeit zinslos zur Verfügung stellen muss: Leistungsgegenstand sei nicht die Übereignung von Geld, sondern seine Überlassung auf Zeit (Medicus loc.cit. no. 661; Sprau loc.cit. nos. 15 and 21). Außerdem wird eine Beschränkung des Anwendungsbereichs von CC § 817 second sentence nach dem Schutzzweck der verletzten Norm befürwortet. Das spielt insbesondere im Kontext von Fällen der Schwarzarbeit eine Rolle, um dem Arbeiter doch zu einer angemssenen Vergütung verhelfen zu können (näher Westermann and Buck-Heeb loc.cit. no. 15).

6. Verträge, die gegen das Gesetz oder die guten Sitten verstoßen, sind unter HUNGARIAN CC § 200(2) grundsätzlich ungültig. Ihre Rückabwicklung unterliegt folglich den Vorschriften des Ungültigkeitsrechts. Der Gegenstand der rückgabepflichtigen Sache kann allerdings vom Gericht auf Antrag der Staatsanwaltschaft dem Staat zugesprochen werden (CC § 237(4)). Die Vorschrift wird heute jedoch kaum noch angewandt und soll mit der Reform des Zivilgesetzbuches abgeschafft werden (http://irm.gov.hu/download/eotodikkonyv.pdf/eotodikkonyv.pdf). BULGARIA hat die entsprechenden Vorschriften des LOA (art. 34(2)-(5)) bereits im Jahre 1993 aufgehoben. Eine VII.–6:103 ähnelnde Vorschrift findet sich nur in Ccom art. 717d(3), wonach jemand, der sich gesetzeswidrig an der Verwertung einer Insolvenzmasse beteiligt, die vorausbezahlten Geldbeträge nicht zurückfordern kann. SLOVENIAN CC art. 87(2) bestätigt dagegen erneut das nemo auditur suam turpitudinem allegans-Prinzip. If a contract is null and void because in terms of its content or purpose it contravenes fundamental moral principles the court may entirely or partly reject a claim by the dishonest party for the reimbursement of that provided to the other party; in ruling the court shall consider the extent to which one or both of the parties acted in good faith and the significance of the interests under threat.

7. DUTCH CC art. 6:211 wird manchmal huurmoordenaarsclausule ("killing provision") genannt. Die Vorschrift schließt auch die Rückabwicklung von Leistungen auf Verträge mit einem strafbaren oder sittenwidrigen Inhalt aus. Solche Leistungen können nicht in Natur zurückgegeben und sollen auch nicht in Geld bewertet werden. Die Gegenleistung dagegen kann grundsätzlich zurückgefordert werden, es sei denn, die Rückforderung verstößt gegen Treu und Glauben. Solch ein Rückforderungsrecht hat z.B. das Opfer einer Erpressung. Die Vorschriften über den schuldrechtlichen Rückforderungsausschluss gelten grundsätzlich auch für den Vindikationsanspruch aus CC art. 5:2 (CC art. 6:211(2)): die Nichtigkeit des Erwerbstitels hat in diesem Fall ausnahmsweise nicht auch die Nichtigkeit der Übertragung zur Folge (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 821; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[12], no. 345, p. 359; van Kooten, NTBR 1995, 101; HR 28 June 1991, NedJur 1992, no. 787 p. 3395-3405; HR 2 February 1990, NedJur 1991, no. 265 p. 1117; HR 7 September 1990, NedJur 1991, no. 266 p. 1122).

8. Under ESTONIAN GPCCA § 84(1), a void transaction has no legal consequences from inception. That which is received on the basis of a void transaction shall be returned pursuant to the provisions concerning unjust enrichment unless otherwise provided by law. A transaction which is contrary to good morals or public order is void (GPCCA § 86), and a transaction contrary to a prohibition arising from law is void if the purpose of the prohibition is to render the transaction void upon violation of the prohibition, especially if it is provided by law that a certain legal consequence must not arise (GPCCA § 87). Pursuant to LOA § 1028 (2)(iii) a transferor does not have the right to reclaim that which is received by the recipient from the recipient if the reclamation of that which is received as a result of a void transaction would be contradictory to the provision which prescribes the nullity of the transaction or to the objective of such provision. Thus for example, a contract for the sale of narcotica, prohibited weapons or medical product to be used as doping in sports, or the transfer of a bribe is void; the reversal, however, would be contrary to the provisions of the Penal Code.

Illustration 1 draws on BGH 31 May 1990, BGHZ 111, 308; illustration 2 on BGH 23 February 2005, NJW 2005, 1490; and illustration 3 on CA Girona 13 November 2005, BDA JUR 2006/51579.

CHAPTER 7: RELATION TO OTHER LEGAL RULES

VII.–7:101: Other private law rights to recover

(1) The legal consequences of an enrichment which is obtained by virtue of a contract or other juridical act are governed by other rules if those rules grant or exclude a right to reversal of an enrichment, whether on withdrawal, termination, price reduction or otherwise.

(2) This Book does not address the proprietary effect of a right to reversal of an enrichment.

(3) This Book does not affect any other right to recover arising under contractual or other rules of private law.

COMMENTS

A. Exclusivity of contractual rules: paragraph (1)

General. This Book does not apply in so far as contractual rules purport to address comprehensively an issue of restitution – either by granting a right to restitution or by excluding such a right. In that case the matter is governed by the contract law solution. Where, however, the rules of contract law are silent on the issue of reversal of an enrichment, this Book continues to apply.

Exclusion of a right to reversal of enrichment. Where contract law envisages that there should be no reversal of an enrichment and that the matter should be addressed by contract law rules by means of different remedies, it would contradict that regime if unjustified enrichment law were to compel a reversal of the enrichment.

Deviation from terms of the obligation. This Article will be relevant where the enrichment is not ordinarily justified because the performance which has given rise to it did not conform to the contract and accordingly the enriched person had no entitlement to the enrichment under the juridical act for the purposes of paragraph (1) of VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified). If a tender of performance does not conform to the contract, the legal consequences are a matter in the first instance for contract law. A right to reversal of the enrichment under this Book may be excluded because the recipient of the goods or services wishes to exercise other remedies, such as a right to repair or replacement, or the provider of the service may have a right to insist on an opportunity to repair without being under an obligation to replace the goods provided. Equally, an obligation on the part of the recipient to reverse the enrichment obtained may be displaced by contract law because this would otherwise contradict the logic of the right to performance. The very fact that a right to reversal of benefit arises where the contractual relationship is terminated indicates that a benefit conferred by a performance which falls short of what is due (a tender of performance which is a non-performance) should not per se give rise to restitutionary claims. The matter depends on the rules on termination of the contractual relationship or interaction with other contractual remedies.

Illustration 1
D, a garage, agrees with E to respray E's car metallic blue. As a result of a mix-up, D sprays the car metallic grey. E is not under an obligation to pay D in respect of the service provided. Rather D is under an enduring obligation (unless and until the contractual relationship is terminated) to re-spray the car the correct colour.

Obligations ceasing to have effect for the future only. Where a contractual relationship is terminated, or a party withdraws from a contract, or in some other way the contractual relationship is ended without retrospective effect, extinguishing only the parties' outstanding obligations and rights to performance, this Book regards enrichments conferred before the termination or equivalent as being justified precisely because there is no retrospective impact on the contractual obligations; the entitlement to the enrichment which has already been satisfied is unaffected. See Comment B on VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified). It will be for the special rules governing the termination of contractual relationships, or other prospective terminations of obligations, to determine what right, if any, a party has to recover in respect of the benefits conferred on the other party.

Contractual relationships terminated for non-excused non-performance. The primary specific instance is the exercise of a right to terminate a contractual relationship. Such a right may be expressly agreed by the parties: see III.–1:108 (Variation or termination by agreement). A right to terminate a contractual relationship arising from a valid contract may also arise by operation of law as a result of the other party's non-performance of obligations. Termination will not avoid the contract retrospectively; it merely discharges the parties from their future obligations: see III.–3:509 (Effect on obligations under the contract) paragraph (1). Thus the contract remains effective and an enrichment which was obtained under the contract before termination is not obtained under a contract which is rendered ineffective retrospectively. Because its primary effects are confined to future operation of the contract, termination merely prevents the contract from providing a justification for any subsequent enrichment (i.e. an enrichment obtained as a result of a performance after termination). III.–3:510 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) and following Articles entitle each party to claim restitution of benefits conferred under the contract before termination. An effect of VII.–7:101 is to express the principle that those rules are not affected by this Book. The availability of a claim under contract law for reversal of benefits confirms that there is no need for a parallel regime under this Book.

Illustration 2
D and E conclude a contract by which E, the owner of premises, agrees to enter into a lease of them with D. It is part of the agreement of the parties that D will make improvements to the premises. D commences work on the improvements, but because they are being completed too slowly E terminates the relationship. D's claim for any benefit conferred on E by virtue of improvements to E's property is governed by the rules setting out the restitutionary consequences of termination of a contractual relationship and correspondingly this Book does not apply.

Contractual relationships terminated for excused non-performance (frustrated contracts). Where a contractual relationship is terminated for excused non-performance (i.e. in essence frustrated), the obligations of the parties which were originally agreed are re-fashioned by contract law into contractual obligations to restore or make payment for benefits obtained. This is achieved by allowing a party to resort to the remedy of termination (III.–3:101 (Remedies available) where the other party is impeded from performing and the non-performance excused on that basis (see III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment)). Termination for excused non-performance (as in the case of termination for non-excused non-performance) enables the parties to recover under III.–3:510 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) and following articles benefits conferred under the contract. Here again enrichments obtained as a result of a performance before the frustration remain justified (and an enrichment claim correspondingly excluded) because they have been conferred under a contract which, despite termination of the resulting relationship for non-performance, remains valid: on termination the obligations of the parties are discharged only in respect of future performance. The contract is not rendered ineffective with retrospective effect. In this regard whether termination is for an excused or a non-excused non-performance is immaterial for the purposes of the rules in this Book since the effects of termination are the same.

Exercise of a right of withdrawal. A second case where a contractual obligation may cease to have effect for the future only is where a contractual relationship comes to an end as the result of the exercise of a right of withdrawal. The effect of exercising a right of withdrawal is not to annul the contract retrospectively, but only to end the contractual relationship from the time the right is exercised: II.–5:105 (Effects of withdrawal) provides that withdrawal terminates the contractual relationship and (in slightly modified form) the general restitutionary rules for termination of contracts apply. Accordingly, an enrichment obtained as a result of one party performing an obligation under a contract which is subsequently cancelled is an enrichment to which a person is entitled by virtue of a valid contract and is justified under VII.–2:101(1)(a) (Circumstances in which an enrichment is justified). Rights to restitution of benefits conferred before withdrawal remain a matter of contract law.

Obligations subject to resolutive conditions. Another case where an obligation may cease to have effect for the future only is where it is made conditional upon the occurrence of an uncertain event so that the obligation comes to an end if the event occurs: see III.–1:106 (Conditional rights and obligations) paragraph (1). The effect of fulfilment of such a resolutive condition is that the obligation comes to an end (unless the parties otherwise agree): III.–1:106(3). For the purposes of the law of unjustified enrichment, the situation is the same as for contractual relationships coming to an end by the operation of a right of termination or withdrawal: the determination of the obligation does not render the entitlement void with retrospective effect. Accordingly an enrichment conferred in performance of a contractual obligation subject to a resolutive condition which is subsequently fulfilled is justified, notwithstanding that the contractual obligation later comes to an end. III.–1:106 (5) provides that the restitutionary effects are likewise regulated by the contract law rules set out in III.–3:510 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) to III.–3:514 (Liabilities arising after time when return due). The case is otherwise only for performances rendered after the condition has been fulfilled and the contractual obligation has ended or if the agreed effect of the contract is to make the contract retrospectively null.

Deviations from contract to which contract law rules do not apply. Paragraph (1) only applies in so far as the rules governing the juridical act regulate or oust a claim to restitution. Hence where the contractual performance tendered is outside the four corners of the contract (e.g. because the party tendering has made a fundamental mistake as to what was demanded) and contract law is silent on the matter of restitution (neither granting a restitutionary claim against the other party to the contract, nor excluding such a claim), the enrichment is not justified, even though a valid contract is part of the background to the case.

Illustration 3
X, a customer of a bank, instructs D, the bank, to make a payment to Y. As a result of its own carelessness, D makes a payment in the correct amount to E (instead of Y) in the mistaken assumption that this was the instruction given by X. E's enrichment is obtained as a result of D's attempted discharge of an obligation (owed by D to X), but the performance was not in conformity with the terms of the obligation and does not discharge it. The rules of contract law do not confer on D a right of restitution in respect of this payment; nor do they exclude it. Under contract law the payment is simply a non-performance which has conferred no benefit on X. Accordingly, this Book applies so that D has a right to reversal of the enrichment against E.

Frustrated purpose or disappointed expectation. The principle that this Book grants no right to reversal of the enrichment where the contract is valid and a right to reversal of the enrichment under contract law depends on termination of the contractual relationship (since it would contradict the insistence of contract law on termination if a right were granted) applies even where the disadvantaged person has conferred the benefit without obtaining anything in return – in other words, where there is a complete failure of counter-performance. If the contract is valid, but an expectation of the disadvantaged person is disappointed or a purpose of the enrichment frustrated (and the enrichment unjustified under paragraph (3) of VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified), notwithstanding that the recipient has an entitlement under the contract), the fact that the claimant never receives in return what was anticipated under the contract will not found a claim under this Book. Given that the enrichment has been conferred in performance of an obligation under a subsisting contract, any redress in that case is contractual by exercising a right to terminate the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance.

Illustration 4
D, a purchaser of goods, pays a deposit to E, the vendor, in accordance with the terms of the contract of sale. Before delivery falls due, D notifies E that she will not accept delivery. If D is in anticipatory breach of her obligation to take delivery, E has a right to retain the deposit. Although D paid the deposit to E only as part of a performance in exchange for E's goods, D has no claim under the law of unjustified enrichment to a return of the deposit even though she has not obtained the counter-enrichment she expected at the time of payment of the deposit.

B. Proprietary effect of a right to recover: paragraph (2)

Proprietary claims. This Book provides for a personal claim to reversal of an enrichment. It does not determine in what circumstances a proprietary claim (be it vindication of property or a claim in the nature of proprietary tracing) should exist. Such matters are not addressed by this Book. Nor does this Book determine what rights to recover (including rights under this Book) ought to be regarded as having proprietary effect (so that an enrichment creditor has priority over unsecured personal creditors of the enriched person).

C. Rights to recover under other private law rules: paragraph (3)

General. Specific rights to recover in respect of benefits conferred may be encountered in all fields of private law. This includes rights which arise under contract law where this Book would regard the enrichment as justified and would therefore not grant an enrichment claim. Property law confers a right to vindicate property which may operate concurrently with a right to reversal of the enrichment where the enrichment is possession of another's property.

Regard must be had also to rights elsewhere in the law of obligations, such as the right of reparation under rules on non-contractual liability for damage (and see especially VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation) paragraph (4), providing for recovery of an advantage obtained by the person causing the damage), the right of a principal against a benevolent intervener to delivery up of all that the intervener has obtained in the course of the benevolent intervention (V.–2:103 (Obligations after intervention) paragraph (1)) and rights of recourse between solidary debtors.

Illustration 5
D sells an appliance for weighing animal feed to E, an agricultural business. It transpires that the contract is void and under the applicable property law title to the appliance is regarded as not having passed. D sues E for surrender of the appliance on the basis of D's (retained) ownership. D also demands compensation from E for the deprivation of use from the time of transfer of possession to E to its return. D may legitimately sue on the basis of non-contractual liability for damage caused to another, invoking VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession) paragraph (2)(a), if the other requirements of liability under VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) are satisfied (in particular: negligence on the part of E in relation to the infringement of D's proprietary rights). Alternatively, D may assert an unjustified enrichment claim: see VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) paragraph (1)(c), VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage) paragraph (1)(c) and VII.–4:101 (Instances of attribution) paragraph (c). Neither this Book (VII.–7:101) nor Book VI (see VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) paragraph) (d)) prevent the concurrence of the claims under the rules on non-contractual liability for damage or under the rules on unjustified enrichment.

Illustration 6
A partner in a firm honours a bill of exchange which is a partnership debt. The partner has a right of recourse against the other partners on the basis that she has discharged more than her share of the solidary debt owed by the partners to the creditor: see III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors). A claim under this Book does not arise because in making the payment (and thus conferring benefit on the other partners, who were thereby also discharged) the partner discharged his own liability: see VII.–2:102 (Performance of obligation to third person).

NOTES

I. Subsidiarität der Haftung aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung?

1. Das Recht der enrichissement sans cause unterliegt in FRANCE und BELGIUM dem principe de subsidiarité: die action de in rem verso kann nur unter der Voraussetzung geltend gemacht werden, dass dem Kläger keine andere Anspruchsgrundlage zur Verfügung steht (z.B. Cass.com. 10 October 2000, Bull.civ. 2000, IV, no. 150, p. 136). Keinen subsidiären Charakter hat dagegen die action en répétition de l´indu (Cass.civ. 19 October 1983, Bull.civ. 1983, I, no. 242 p. 216). Der konkrete Inhalt des bereicherungsrechtlichen Subsidiaritätsprinzips ist freilich schwierig zu fixieren. Sie bedeutet allgemein, dass die action de in rem verso nur ausnahmsweise geltend gemacht werden kann; es handelt sich bei ihr lediglich um einen mécanisme correcteur (Fabre-Magnan, Les obligations, 968). Häufig wird (aber auch das ist umstritten, see Viney, JCP éd. G 1998, II, 10102) behauptet, dass die action de in rem verso nur zur Überwindung eines obstacle de fait, nicht aber zur Überwindung eines obstacle de droit (wie z.B. der Verjährung eines konkurrierenden Anspruchs) eingesetzt werden dürfe (Malaurie/Aynès/Stoffel-Munck, Les obligations[2], no. 1071 p. 574). Ob mit ihr Beweisschwierigkeiten im Kontext eines anderen Anspruchs ausgewichen werden kann, ist gleichfall umstritten; die neuere Rechtsprechung des Kassationshofes bejaht das (Cass.civ. 5 March 2008, pourvoi no 07-13902). Schon Cass.civ. 4 April 2006, D. 2006, 1187 hat es abgelehnt, die Bereicherungsklage eines Mannes gegen seine ehemalige Lebenspartnerin daran scheitern zu lassen, dass er die von ihm in erster Linie behauptete promesse de cession nicht beweisen konnte; die hierauf gestützte Klagabweisung durch das Berufungsgericht habe die principes régissant l´enrichissement sans cause verletzt. Auch die BELGIAN Rechtsprechung folgt dem Subsidiaritätsprinzip und verhindert mit ihm die Umgehung kürzerer anderweitiger Verjährungsvorschriften (Cass. 25 März 1994, Pas. belge 1994, I, 305). Allerdings soll die Möglichkeit der Klage gegen einen Dritten die action de in rem verso nicht sperren (CA Liège 16 February 1939, Pas. belge 1939, I, 1637).

2. Eine ausdrückliche Vorschrift zur Frage der Subsidiarität der allgemeinen Bereicherungsklage findet sich auch in SPAIN nicht. Soweit Ausprägungen besonders geregelt sind, unterliegen die entsprechenden Ansprüche nicht dem Subsidiaritätsprinzip (e.g. Unfair Competition Act [Ley 3/1991, of 10 January, de competencia desleal] art. 18(6) and Compilation of 'Foral Civil Law' of Navarra Act 508 [Rubio Torrano [-Egusquiza Balmaseda], Comentarios al Fuero Nuevo, 1733]). Der Tribunal Supremo hat auch die Subsidiarität der allgemeinen Bereicherungsklage mehrfach ausdrücklich verneint (e.g. TS 12 April 1955, RAJ 1955 (1) no. 1126 p. 602 [condictio based upon interference with another's assets: unlawful exploitation of another's mine]; TS 10 March 1958, RAJ 1958 (1) no. 1068 p. 686 [unlawful disposition of another's barbed wire]; TS 24 January 1975, RAJ 1975 (1) no. 95 p. 99 [exploitation of another's mine beyond the lease contract]; TS 14 December 1994, RAJ 1994 (5) no. 10111 p. 12935 [la acción de enriquecimiento injusto no tiene naturaleza subsidiaria]). Unter dem Einfluss der französischen Rechtsprechung (Álvarez-Caperochipi, El enriquecimiento sin causa[3], 116; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 122) hat der Tribunal Supremo jedoch nicht nur in seiner älteren Rechtsprechung mehrfach die Geltung des Subsidiaritätsprinzips auch für Spain behauptet (e.g. TS 12 January 1943, RAJ 1943 no. 17 p. 19 and TS 22 December 1962, RAJ 1962 (2) no. 4966 p. 3386); er ist hierauf auch in neueren Entscheidungen wieder zurückgekommen (TS 19 February 1999, RAJ 1999 (1) no. 1055 p. 1655; TS 22 February 2007, RAJ 2007 (2) no. 2233 p. 5283). Im Schrifttum wird gesagt, dass man das Subsidiaritätsprinzip nur dann akzeptieren müsse, wenn man das Bereicherungsrecht allein auf Billigkeit und soziale Gerechtigkeit zurückführen wolle; andernfalls käme man ohne es aus (Álvarez-Caperochipi loc.cit. 116; Díez-Picazo loc.cit. 123). Die letztere Ansicht dürfte heute die vorherrschende sein (Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crit.Der.Inm. 1969, 599-601; Álvarez-Caperochipi loc. cit. 118-120; Díez-Picazo loc.cit. 122; Miquel González, Enriquecimiento injustificado, 2806; Pasquau Liaño, CCJC 1999, 893; Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento injustificado por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 336). Die Rechtslage bleibt unklar, wohl auch deshalb, weil courts have been resorting to subsidiarity with different meanings. Manchmal wird gesagt, die allgemeine Bereicherungsklage müsse subsidiär sein, weil sie sich aus allgemeinen Rechtsprinzipien und nicht aus dem Gesetz ergäbe (TS 30 April 2007, RAJ 2007 (2) no. 2396 p. 5676). Manchmal wird das Subsidiaritätsprinzip bemüht, um zu verhindern, dass über das Bereicherungsrecht kürzere vertragsrechtliche Verjährungsfristen umgangen werden (TS 19 February 1999 loc. cit.); manchmal geht es darum, den Anwendungsvorrang spezialgesetzlicher Vorschiften zu sichern (wie in CA Valencia 30 May 2007, BDA JUR 2007/260076; anders aber CA Ourense 23 November 2001, BDA JUR 2002/22015); und manchmal wird der Begriff der Subsisdiarität in dem Sinn verwandt, dass eine Bereicherungsklage gegen einen Drittbereicherten nur in Betracht kommt, wenn der Hauptschuldner insolvent ist (in diesem Sinn TS 12 July 2000, RAJ 2000 (4) no. 6686 p. 10232 und TS 22 October 2002, RAJ 2002 (5) no. 8774 p. 16027).

3. Für ITALY ergibt sich die Subsidiarität der Bereicherungsklage unmittelbar aus CC art. 2042. Die Vorschrift bestimmt, dass ein Anspruch wegen Bereicherung nicht erhoben werden kann, wenn der Geschädigte einen anderen Anspruch geltend machen kann, um für den erlittenen Nachteil entschädigt zu werden. Die Bereicherungsklage kann auch dann nicht erfolgreich erhoben werden, wenn der andere Anspruch verjährt oder verwirkt (Cass. 5 April 2001, no. 5072, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 715), in concreto unbegründet ist oder nur gegen einen Dritten besteht (Cass. 9 May 2002, no. 6647, Giust.civ.Mass. 2002, 795: Anspruch gegen falsus procurator schließt Bereicherungsanspruch gegen den Prinzipal aus). Ob das Subsidiaritätsprinzip für Bereicherungsansprüche auch dann besteht, wenn zwar ein anderer haftet, aber insolvent ist, wird unterschiedlich beurteilt (näher Alpa and Mariconda [-Sirena], Codice civile commentato IV, sub art. 2041 I, 1). Der Zweck des CC art. 2042 besteht u.a. darin zu verhindern, dass der Betroffene für denselben Nachteil mehrfach entschädigt wird. Die Vorschrift verhindert aber nicht die Ergänzung einer Entschädigung, sofern durch eine solche Ergänzung ein anderer Nachteil ausgeglichen werden soll. Mit der Bereicherungsklage kann deshalb der vom Bereicherten durch eine Rechtsverletzung gezogene Gewinn herausverlangt werden, obwohl derselbe Anspruch vom Deliktsrecht nicht gewährt wird (see Albanese, Resp.civ. e prev. 2004, 538).

4. Subsidiär ist die allgemeine Bereicherungsklage auch in BULGARIA (LOA art. 59(2)). Sie steht nicht zur Verfügung, falls der Verarmte einen Anspruch aus Vertrag, Delikt, Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag, Leistungskondiktion oder unter sachenrechtlichen Vorschriften geltend machen kann. Ansprüche des Verarmten gegen Dritte schließen Ansprüche aus LOA art. 59(1) dagegen nicht aus (Vassilev, Obligazionno pravo, Otdelni vidove obligazionni otnosheniya, 600). In zahlreichen anderen Ländern ist die Bereicherungsklage dagegen nur in dem Sinne “subsidiär”, dass sie nicht zum Zuge kommt, wenn zwischen den Parteien ein wirksamer Vertrag oder ein Schuldverhältnis aus berechtigter Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag besteht (so z.B. in GERMANY and in ESTONIA). Es handelt sich hier aber nicht um eine konkurrenzrechtliche Subsidiarität, sondern darum, dass es bereits an der Voraussetzung fehlt, dass es sich um eine “ungerechtfertigte” Bereicherung handeln muss.

5. Für die übrigen Rechtsordnungen siehe die eingehenden Landesberichte in PEL Unj.Enr. Introduction B8-40.

II. Bereicherungshaftung und Vertragshaftung

6. Nichtigkeit ist in FRANCE und BELGIUM die Rechtsfolge der Nichtbeachtung einer der für den betreffenden Vertrag gesetzlich vorgesehenen Entstehungsvoraussetzungen. Der Code civil operiert insoweit sowohl mit dem Begriff der nullité als auch mit dem der rescission; sie werden als Synonyme verwandt. Im heutigen Schrifttum hat sich nullité als allgemeine Bezeichnung für die verschiedenen Fälle der Nichtigkeit durchgesetzt; action en rescision beschreibt i.d.R. die Form der nullité, die auf ein eklatantes Missverhältniss zwischen Leistung und Gegenleistung (lésion) reagiert (Rép.Dr.Civ. [-Picod], VII^2, v° Nullité [1998], no. 16) (z.B. CC arts. 1674 ff: rescision de la vente pour cause de lésion). Die Besonderheit der action en réscision besteht oft darin, dass die begünstigte Partei den Vertrag durch das Angebot retten kann, die Benachteiligung auszugleichen (z.B. CC arts. 1681-1682; see Wéry, Vue d'ensemble sur les causes d´extinction des contrats, 5, 23). Neben der Nichtigkeit kennen das französische und das belgische Recht eine ganze Reihe von zusätzlichen Instrumenten zur Bewältigung von Fragen, die aus Unzulänglichkeiten im Zusammenhang mit dem Vertragsschluss oder der Vertragserfüllung resultieren. Dazu gehört in FRANCE die inopposabilité (fehlende Drittwirksamkeit); sie hat ihre Ursache wie die Nichtigkeit in der Verletzung einer gesetzlichen Vorschrift zum Zeitpunkt des Vertragsschlusses. Zu einer inopposabilité kommt es, wenn die verletzte Norm ausschließlich dem Schutz von Drittinteressen dient. Der Vertrag ist dem jeweiligen Dritten gegenüber unwirksam, bleibt aber zwischen den Parteien gültig (Picod loc.cit. no. 10). Die résolution, die résiliation, die révocation, die caducité und die réfaction sind Sanktionen für Ereignisse, die sich nach wirksamem Vertragsschluss einstellen; die Rechtsprechung scheint sich dieser ausdifferenzierenden Terminologie allerdings nicht immer konsequent zu bedienen (Mazeaud and Chabas, Leçons de droit civil II(1)[9], no. 723 p. 846). Nullité und résolution (Vertragsaufhebung) wirken beide ex tunc (see CC art. 1183(1), wo für den Eintritt einer condition résolutoire gesagt wird, sie remet les choses au même état que si l´obligation n´avait pas existé) und zeitigen deshalb nahezu identische Rechtsfolgen (Cass.com. 26 June 1990, Bull.civ. 1990, IV, no. 190 p. 129: la résolution d´un contrat synallagmatique emporte la remise des parties dans l´état où elles se trouvaient antérieurement). Die résolution des Vertrages kann insbesondere dann gerichtlich (CC art. 1184) ausgesprochen werden, wenn ein unsicheres Ereignis eintritt, das von den Vertragsparteien zur auflösenden Bedingung gemacht wurde, oder wenn eine der Vertragsparteien ihre vertraglichen Pflichten nicht erfüllt (Picod loc.cit. nos. 14-15). Für Verträge mit wiederkehrenden Leistungen (contrats successifs) eignet sich die ex tunc-Wirkung der résolution nicht; deshalb wird bei ihnen i.d.R. nur die résiliation gerichtlich ausgesprochen. Sie wirkt ex nunc (eingehend Bénabent, Les obligations[9], no. 399 p. 265; anders allerdings Cass.civ. 7 June 1995, Bull.civ. 1995, I, no. 244 p. 171) und kommt nur in Betracht, wenn es sich nicht um eine nachträgliche Leistungsstörung handelt (Cass.civ. 30 April 2003, Bull.civ. 2003, III, no. 87 p. 80). Von résiliation ist auch die Rede, wenn die Parteien einen bereits in Vollzug gesetzten Vertrag in gegenseitigem Einvernehmen beenden. Sind unter dem Vertrag noch keine Leistungen erbracht worden, spricht man von révocation. Auch sie wirkt ex nunc (Mazeaud and Chabas loc.cit. no. 723 p. 847) und bleibt ohne Einfluss auf die Rechte Dritter (Bénabent loc.cit. no. 310 p. 226). Einseitig beendet werden Verträge durch Kündigung (z.B. CC art. 1780(2)). Alle unbefristeten Verträge können unilateral beendet werden, vorausgesetzt, die Beendung erfolgt nicht missbräuchlich und respektiert die jeweilige Kündigungsfrist (Sériaux, Droit des obligations[2], no. 48 p. 192). Der résiliation ist die caducité (Unwirksamkeit eines Vertrages) nah verwandt; beide werden manchmal sogar gleichgesetzt (Bénabent loc.cit. no. 341 p. 247). Die caducité führt mit Wirkung ex nunc zur Aufhebung eines rechtsgültig entstandenen Vertrages (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[8], no. 82 p. 96). Caducité ist die Folge des nachträglichen Wegfalls eines wesentlichen Elementes, das im Abschlusszeitpunkt zur Gültigkeit des beitrug (Yester-Ouisse, JCP éd. G. 2001, I, 290, no. 3). Die richterliche Minderung der vertraglichen Gegenleistung im Falle einer Schlechterfüllung ist die réfaction des Vertrages (z.B. CC arts. 1644 [Kauf] und 1722 [Miete]). Sie wird in einigen wenigen Fällen auch ohne gesetzliche Grundlage ausgesprochen (z.B. Cass.com. 15 December 1992, Bull.civ. 1992, IV, no. 421 p. 296).

7. Auch in BELGIUM wirkt die résolution/ontbinding ex tunc; der Begriff entspricht dem des französischen Rechts (Stijns, De gerechtelijke en de buitengerechtelijke ontbinding van overeenkomsten, no. 15 p. 46). Résiliation findet in zwei Bedeutungen Verwendung. Der Ausdruck beschreibt die einvernehmliche Vertragsaufhebung durch die Parteien (CC art. 1134(2)) und, in einigen gesetzlich vorgesehenen Fällen (z.B. CC arts. 1794 [Werkvertrag] und 2004 [Auftrag]), auch die einseitige Vertragsaufhebung (Wéry, Vue d'ensemble sur les causes d´extinction des contrats, 5, 24). Die einvernehmliche Vertragsaufhebung (résiliation amiable/wederkerige opzegging) wirkt nur für die Zukunft (*Stijn*s loc.cit. no. 18 p. 51). Die Parteien können aber auch vertraglich ein einseitiges Kündigungsrecht vereinbaren (Stijns loc.cit. no. 18 p. 52). Daneben akzeptiert die belgische Rechtsprechung ein einseitiges Kündigungsrecht bei allen unbefristeten und bei allen sehr langfristigen Verträgen (Cass. 9 March 1973, Pas.belge 1973, I, 640). Es wird auch vorgeschlagen, résiliation für alle Fälle der résolution zu verwenden, in denen sie ausnahmsweise nicht ex tunc wirkt (Moreau-Margrève, JT 1968, 241; dagegen aber Stijns loc.cit. no. 20 p. 54 und Wéry loc.cit. no. 25 p. 34), was bei Sukzessivlieferungsverträgen der Fall sein kann (Cass. 8 October 1987, RCJB 1990, 379, note Fontaine). Bei einseitigen Verträgen findet oft anstelle von résolution und résiliation der Ausdruck révocation/herroeping Verwendung (van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht I[6], 196). Die caducité/verval von Verträgen und anderen Rechtsgeschäften wurde mit Cass. 28 November 1980, RCJB 1987, 70, note Foriers, in das belgische Recht eingeführt (ohne allerdings den Begriff zu benutzen). Sie wurde zeitweilig unter denselben Voraussetzungen ausgesprochen wie in France, see Cass. 16 November 1989, RW 1989-90, 1259 und Cass. 12 December 1991, Pas. belge 1992, I, 284, concl. Janssens de Bisthoven). Cass. 21 January 2000, JT 2000, 573 hat die Feststellung der caducité aber auf Fälle beschränkt, in denen der Vertrag infolge des Wegfalls seines Gegenstandes nicht mehr in natura erfüllt werden kann. Caducité/verval führt lediglich ex nunc zum Wegfall des Vertrages (van Ommeslaghe, RCJB 1988, 33, 44; nuancierend Foriers loc.cit.). Schließlich kann es, wie in France, auch auf der Grundlage der risicoleer/théorie des risques zu einer vertraglichen Rückabwicklung kommen. Cass. 27 June 1946, Pas. belge 1946, I, 270) entschied, dass dann, wenn die Verpflichtung der einen Partei infolge von force majeure erlischt, auch die andere Partei befreit ist und deshalb, wenn sie vorgeleistet hat, das Geleistete zurückfordern kann.

8. In SPAIN wird unter der neuen Lehre nicht mehr scharf zwischen vertraglichen und außervertraglichen Restitutionsansprüchen unterschieden. Die Fallgruppenbildung orientiert sich vielmehr an einzelnen condictiones. Die condictio de prestación (see notes under VII.–4:101) z.B. wird dogmatisch als ein Stück Bereicherungsrecht verstanden, ist gesetzlich aber vorwiegend im Vertragsrecht geregelt (nur die condictio indebiti findet sich im Recht der Quasiverträge), see Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 125). Das gilt insbesondere für die Rückabwicklung nichtiger Verträge (CC arts. 1303-1308). TS 23 February 2007, RAJ 2007 (1) no. 1475 p. 3172 spricht deshalb of "the condictio de prestación of art. 1303 CC". In ähnlicher Weise werden auch restitutionary claims arising from termination of synallagmatic contracts (CC art. 1124), whose regulation is usually inferred from CC arts. 1123 and 1122 (obligations subject to resolutive conditions) als Fälle der condictio de prestación eingeordnet (Díez-Picazo loc.cit. 124). Unter Compilation of 'Foral Civil Law' of Navarra Act 508 stellen sie sogar ein Stück Bereicherungsrecht dar (TSJ Navarra 11 March 1997, BDA RJ 1997/1851; TSJ Navarra 8 October 1998, BDA RJ 1998/8598). Als ein Fall der condictio de inversión wird dagegen der Ausgleichsanspruch des Händlers bzw. des Handelsvertreters bei der Beendigung eines Distributionsvertrages qualifiziert (TS 15 January 2008, BDA RJ 2008/1393; TS 22 June 2007, BDA RJ 2007/5427; TS 16 May 2007, BDA RJ 2007/4616). Im Übrigen gilt: die resolución por incumplimiento (CC art. 1124) führt im spanischen Recht zur Unwirksamkeit ex tunc, es sei denn, es handelt sich um Dauerschuldverhältnisse oder Sukzessivlieferungsverträge (TS 10 July 1998, RAJ 1998 (4) no. 6600 p. 9830; TS 24 May 1999, RAJ 1999 (2) no. 3927 p. 6087; Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[6], 271; differenzierend Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II(1)[4], no. 128B). Die Rückabwicklung erfolgt nach herrschender Auffassung nach CC 1123(1) (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[5], 723; Díez-Picazo and Gullón loc.cit. 249; Fernández González-Regueral, Resolución por incumplimiento, 173; TS 28 June 1977, RAJ 1977 (2) no. 3053 p. 2263; TS 7 July 1982, RAJ 1982 (2) no. 4219 p. 2744; TS 6 February 1984, RAJ 1984 (1) no. 576, p. 426). In der Rechtsprechung wird aber häufig auch (wie bei der Nichtigkeit) die Formel von der restitutio in integrum bemüht: die resolución verpflichte zur Wiederherstellung des Zustandes, der bestanden hätte, wenn der Vertrag nicht geschlossen worden wäre (TS 15 June 1995, RAJ 1995 (3) no. 4858 p. 6506; TS 23 October 1995, RAJ 1995 (4) no. 7104 p. 9518; TS 23 January 1999, RAJ 1999 (1) no. 419 p. 646), was dann die Anwendbarkeit der Regeln über Nichtigkeit und rescisión (CC arts. 1303 und 1295) zur Folge hat (TS 11 February 1992, RAJ 1992 (1) no. 1207 p. 1531; TS 17 April 1997, RAJ 1997 (2) no. 2914 p. 4414). Ob der Grund für die Rückabwicklung in einem Abschlussmangel oder in einer Leistungsstörung liegt, macht bei dieser Sichtweise praktisch keinen Unterschied mehr. Unstreitig jedenfalls ist, dass die Parteien durch die resolución von ihren Leistungspflichten befreit werden und dass sie einander die bereits erbrachten Leistungen (in natura) zurückzugewähren haben (TS 6 February 1984, RAJ 1984 (1) no. 576 p. 426; Fernández González-Regueral loc.cit. 175).

9. Die ITALIAN Rechtsprechung wendet auf Rückerstattungsansprüche infolge der risoluzione des Vertrags im Kern die allgemeinen Regeln über die Zahlung einer Nichtschuld an (e.g. Cass. 1 August 2001, no. 10498, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 1519; Cass. 4 February 2000, no. 1252, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 242; Cass. 13 April 1995, no. 4268, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, 834; see Breccia, Il pagamento dell'indebito, 934 and Moscati, Pagamento dell'indebito, 119). Die These, dass möglichst viele Erscheinungsformen der Rückabwicklung von Leistungen ohne valide rechtliche Basis unter das Dach eines einzigen Regimes gebracht werden sollten, wird auch mit CC arts. 1463, 1360(2), 1373(2) und 1458(1) begründet (Moscati loc.cit. 145). Schwierig ist aber bis heute die Koordinierung des Aufhebungsrechts mit dem Recht der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld in Situationen geblieben, in welchen der accipiens nicht in der Lage ist, die Sache in idem corpus zurückzugeben (Nicolussi, Lesione del potere di disposizione e arricchimento, 137). Teilweise wird deshalb befürwortet, das Recht der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld jedenfalls nicht auf Rückerstattungsansprüche infolge der risoluzione per inadempimento und der risoluzione per eccessiva onerosità sopravvenuta anzuwenden (näher Nicolussi loc.cit. 148). Besondere Arten der risoluzione sind revoca und recesso. Revoca (Widerruf) ist ein einseitiges Rechtsgeschäft zur Aufhebung eines anderen einseitigen Rechtsgeschäftes (wie z.B. der Vollmacht oder des Angebots auf Abschluss eines Vertrages) oder zur Aufhebung eines Vertrages, der im überwiegenden Interesse nur einer der Parteien geschlossen wurde (wie z.B. der Auftragsvertrag). Recesso dagegen bezeichnet den einseitigen Rücktritt von einem beliebigen Vertrag (CC art. 1373). Die revoca führt zur Unwirksamkeit des Rechtsgeschäfts ex tunc, der recesso wirkt dagegen meistens ex nunc (Bianca, Diritto civile III[2], 734). Der recesso ist einer der gesetzlich zugelassenen Gründe für eine Vertragsaufhebung (CC art. 1372). Man unterscheidet zwischen dem recesso convenzionale (vertraglich vorbehaltenes Rücktrittsrecht) und dem recess legale. Die Wirkung des recesso convenzionale unterliegt der Parteidisposition (CC art. 1373(4)); er kann allerdings nicht wirksam für Verträge mit dinglichen Wirkungen vereinbart werden (Cass. 16 November 1973, no. 3071, Rep.Giur.it. 1973, voce Obbligaz. e contr. 95, 110, 111, 222; str.). Gesetzliche Rücktrittsrechte bestehen typischerweise bei Dauerschuldverhältnissen (CC arts. 1569, 1596(2), 1616, 1750(2), 1771(1), 1810, 1833(1), 1834, 1845(3), 1855, 1899(1), 2118), wo sie durchweg ex nunc wirken, im Falle einer Nichterfüllung durch die andere Partei und im Falle wesentlicher Umstandsänderungen (Überblick bei Roppo, Il contratto, 552). In einigen wenigen Fällen kann diese Form des Rücktritts auch ex tunc wirken, d.h. zur Wiederherstellung des status quo ante verpflichten.

10. In AUSTRIA folgt die Rückabwicklung von Leistungen, die auf einen Vertrag erbracht wurden, welcher durch Rücktritt oder Widerruf beseitigt wird, den Regeln des Bereicherungsrechts. Beruht die Vermögensverschiebung auf einem zunächst wirksamen Rechtsgrund, fällt dieser jedoch nachträglich weg, so steht dem Leistenden die condictio causa finita zu (CC § 1435). Beispiele liefern die Aufhebung wegen nachträglicher Unmöglichkeit (CC §§ 920 und 1447), der Wegfall der Geschäftsgrundlage, der Schenkungswiderruf (CC § 948), der Rücktritt (CC § 921; ConsProtA § 4), die Wandlung wegen Mangelhaftigkeit der Leistung (CC § 932; see OGH 25 October 1994, JBl 1995, 322) sowie Vorleistungen auf ein Dauerschuldverhältnis im Kündigungsfall (OGH 28 April 1905, GlUNF 3038). Auch die Rechtsfolgen der Wandlung richten sich also grundsätzlich nach den bereicherungsrechtlichen Regeln der CC §§ 1431 ff, sofern dem nicht anwendungsvorrangige vertragliche Sonderregeln entgegenstehen (näher Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB II(3)^{3}, Pref. to § 1431 no. 25). Bei Dauerschuldverhältnissen steht anstelle des Rücktrittsrechts aber wiederum in aller Regel nur das ex nunc wirkende Kündigungsrecht zur Verfügung (OGH 27 November 1962, SZ 35/120; OGH 26 September 1991, JBl 1992, 186). Eine Rückabwicklung nach Bereicherungsrecht kommt hier folglich nur dann in Betracht, wenn der Rücktritt ausnahmsweise ex tunc wirkt, etwa dann, wenn sich ein Irrtum auch auf die Bemessung der Gegenleistung ausgewirkt hat (see OGH 16 November 1971, MietSlg. 23.071; OGH 27 January 1982, MietSlg. 35.089; OGH 15 November 1989, JBl 1990, 321).

11. PORTUGAL unterscheidet je nachdem, ob die Nichterfüllung bzw. der Verzug dem Schuldner zurechenbar ist (CC arts. 798 ff) oder nicht (CC arts. 790 ff). Die Unmöglichkeit der Leistung einer Partei befreit auch die andere von ihrer Pflicht zur Gegenleistung und gibt ihr, falls sie vorgeleistet hat, das Recht auf Rückforderung des Geleisteten nach den Vorschriften des Bereicherungsrechts (CC art. 795(1)). Die Regelung gleicht der für eine stillschweigend vereinbarte auflösende Bedingung (condição resolutiva tácita). Sind Nichterfüllung oder Verzug dem Schuldner zuzurechnen, so kann der Gläubiger vom Vertrag zurücktreten und zusätzlich die Rückerstattung seiner evtl. bereits erbrachten Leistung verlangen; CC art. 479(2) (Wegfall der Bereicherung) ist dann nicht anwendbar (CC art. 801(2); see Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado II^{3}, note 2 under art. 795, p. 50). Der Rücktritt (CC arts. 432-439: resolução do contrato) führt zur einseitigen Beendigung des Vertrages; er kann nur auf einen Grund gestützt werden, der sich nach dem Vertragsschluss einstellt (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral II^{7}, 275). Der Rücktrittsgrund kann sich aus dem Gesetz oder einer vertraglichen Vereinbarung ergeben (CC art. 432(1)). Raum für das Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung bleibt nicht (STJ 20 January 2000, Processo 99B777). Das Rückabwicklungsverhältnis richtet sich vielmehr nach dem Regime der unwirksamen Verträge (CC arts. 289 und 290; see Brandão Proença, Resolução do contrato, 205). Wer das Empfangene nicht mehr zurückgeben kann, verliert das Rücktrittsrecht (CC art. 432(2)). Der Rücktritt wirkt nur dann nicht ex tunc, wenn diese Rechtsfolge dem Willen der Parteien oder dem Zweck der gesetzlichen Regelung widersprechen würde (CC art. 434(1)). Nur ex nunc wirken im Gegensatz zum Rücktritt der Widerruf (revogação, CC arts. 406(1), 265(2), 1170), die Kündigung eines Dauerschuldverhältnisses (denúncia bzw. resolução de um contrato de execução continuada ou periódica, CC art. 434(2)) und die Kaduzität (caducidade, CC arts. 1051, 1141 und 1174). Ein Mietvertrag wird z.B. durch die Zerstörung oder Enteignung der vermieteten Sache und durch den Tod des Mieters kaduziert (CC art. 1051). See Almeida Costa, Obrigações[11], 321.

12. Das GREEK law definiert den Rücktritt als die Rückgängigmachung eines schuldrechtlichen Vertrages durch einseitige Erklärung einer Partei aufgrund einer entsprechenden gesetzlichen oder vertraglichen Befugnis (Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A(1)[2], 1197; Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 511). Man unterscheidet zwischen gesetzlichen und vertraglichen Rücktrittsrechten. Gesetzliche Rücktrittsrechte finden sich in zahlreichen Vorschriften, z.B. in CC arts. 382-384, 386, 401 und in Verbraucherschutzgesetz arts. 3 und 4. Das Rücktrittsrecht betrifft nur die Verpflichtungsgeschäfte des Schuldrechts, nicht dinglich wirkende Verträge; für sie muss nötigenfalls eine auflösende Bedingung vereinbart werden. Der Rücktritt bewirkt das Erlöschen der Leistungspflichten; bereits erbrachte Leistungen sind nach den Regeln des Bereicherungsrechts (condictio ob causam finitam) zurückzugeben; jedoch beanspruchen CC arts. 391-393 Anwendungsvorrang. Der Rücktritt beseitigt das Schuldverhältnis nach herrschender Meinung mit ex tunc-Wirkung (CA Athens 5183/2001, EllDik 2002, 245; anders aber Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], art. 389, no. 8), jedenfalls kommt ihm insoweit Rückwirkung zu, dass die Empfänger der erbrachten und nach Ausübung des Rücktritts zurückzugewährenden Leistungen auch in der Zeit vor der Ausübung des Rücktritts nicht als Berechtigte angesehen werden dürfen (Stathopoulos loc.cit. 1210). Die Verweisung der rücktrittsrechtlichen Vorschriften auf das Bereicherungsrecht bezieht sich insbesondere auf CC arts. 908 ff, die den Haftungsumfang regeln. Ist Rückgewähr in natura nicht möglich, wird Wertersatz geschuldet. CC art. 912 (strengere Haftung ab dem Zeitpunkt, zu dem mit der Rückgabepflicht gerechnet werden musste), ist auch im Rücktrittsrecht anwendbar (Papanikolaou loc.cit. no. 16). Der Rücktritt ist u.a. ausgeschlossen, wenn die Rückgabe der Sache infolge unverschuldeter Zerstörung oder erheblicher Verschlechterung unmöglich geworden ist (CC art. 391). Vorrang vor den allgemeinen Rücktrittsvorschriften haben die eingehenden Spezialregeln der CC arts. 540 ff für das Kaufrecht. Nicht notwendig identisch mit der allgemeinen Terminologie ist der Rücktrittsbegriff im Anwendungsbereich des speziell geregelten Verbrauchervertragsrechts.

13. Auch HUNGARY unterscheidet zwischen vertraglichen und gesetzlichen Rücktrittsrechten. Der Rücktritt hebt den Vertrag rückwirkend zum Zeitpunkt des Vertragsschlusses auf; bereits erbrachte Leistungen sind zurückzuerstatten (CC §§ 319(3), 320(1)). Voraussetzung ist eine entsprechende Rücktrittserklärung an die andere Vertragspartei. Es ist der Zustand wieder herzustellen, der ohne den Vertrag bestanden hätte; die Rücktrittsfolgen decken sich deshalb mit denen, die das Gesetz für das Recht der ungültigen Verträge vorsieht (BH 2004/320). Für das vertraglich vorbehaltene Rücktrittsrecht gelten einige besondere Vorschriften. Es darf insbesondere dann nicht ausgeübt werden, wenn der Rücktrittsberechtigte die empfangene Leistung nicht oder nur in einem Zustand zurückgeben kann, der ihren Wert beträchtlich verringert (CC § 320(3)). Ausgeschlossen ist der Rücktritt bei Dauerschuldverhältnissen; zu deren Beendigung steht nur das Kündigungsrecht zur Verfügung. Das Verbrauchervertragsrecht operiert dagegen wiederum mit dem Rücktrittsrecht; die Rechtsfigur des Widerrufs ist auf den Widerruf eines Angebotes zum Abschluss eines Vertrages beschränkt (CC § 214(2)). Auch im BULGARISCHEN Recht wirkt der Rücktritt ex tunc; nur bei Dauerschuldverhältnisses ist das wiederum anders (LOA art. 88(1). Rücktritt und Kündigung werden aber terminologisch nicht scharf unterschieden.

14. Den Verfassern des ESTONIA LOA lag viel daran, das Recht der Vertragsbeendigung klar zu strukturieren und alles zu vermeiden, was zu terminologischer Konfusion führen könnte (Kõve, Juridica IV/2003, 230). Das Gesetz kennt deshalb für die einseitige Vertragsbeendigung ex nunc nur die Kündigung (ülesütlemine, LOA §§ 195 ff) (als den Mechanismus zur Beendigung von Dauerschuldverhältnissen) und den Widerruf (taganemine, LOA §§ 188 ff); letzterer beendigt Verträge, die auf einen einmaligen Leistungsaustausch gerichtet sind. Kündigung und Widerruf befreien die Parteien mit Wirkung für die Zukunft von ihren Leistungspflichten. Sie unterscheiden sich im Umfang dessen, was zurück zu gewähren ist. Im Falle der Kündigung müssen nur Vorausleistungen zurückerstattet werden. Im Falle des Widerrufs kann dagegen jede Partei alles von ihr Geleistete zurückverlangen, ferner Früchte und erzieltes Einkommen, sofern sie selber das Empfangene zurückgewährt. Interest shall be paid on money refunded as of the moment of receipt of the money. In Fällen, in welchen eine Partei den empfangenen Gegenstand verarbeitet und in denen sich erst zu diesem Zeitpunkt herausstellt, dass ihr ein Widerrufsrecht zusteht, bleibt sie zur Herausgabe einer ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung verpflichtet (LOA § 190(2).

15. Zu weiteren Fragen des Verhältnisses zwischen Bereicherungs- und Vertragsrecht siehe die notes under VII.–2:101.

III. Bereicherungshaftung und Vindikation

16. In FRANCE und BELGIUM ist für die Bestimmung des Verhältnisses zwischen Bereicherungsrecht und Vindikation in einem ersten Schritt die Bestimmung des gegenständlichen Anwendungsbereichs des zivilen Eigentumsrechts wichtig. Aus der Systematik des Gesetzes (weniger aus dem Text des CC art. 544) folgt, dass es das Eigentumsrecht auf körperliche Gegenstände beschränken wollte (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge V[2], no. 1134 p. 997; Rép.Dr.Civ. [-Sériaux], VIII[2], v° Propriété [2001], no. 26 ; see also Cass.req. 25 July 1887, S. 1888, 1.17, note Lyon-Caen; D. 1888, 1.5, note Sarrut [das droit d´auteur sei kein Eigentumsrecht i.S.d. Code civil]). Die herrschende Meinung hält an diesem Konzept bis heute fest (see Sériaux loc.cit.; Mazeaud and Chabas, Leçons de droit civil II(2)[8], no. 1351 p. 117). Die Beschränkung des Eigentumsbegriffs auf körperliche Gegenstände ist allerdings seit Jahrzehnten heftig umstritten. Seit dem Code de la propriété intellectuelle (1992) hat sich in Frankreich der Begriff propriété intellectuelle als Oberbegriff für die Immaterialgüterrechte durchgesetzt, und Entsprechendes gilt heute auch für Belgium (de Page and Dekkers loc.cit.). Diese Entwicklung hat noch einmal zu der Frage Anlass gegeben, ob Immaterialgüterrechte in den zivilrechtlichen Eigentumsbegriff des CC art. 544 integriert werden könnten; sie ist überwiegend erneut verneint worden (Terré and Simler, Les biens[5], no. 35 p. 35; Edelman, D. 1992, Chron. 91; de Page and Dekkers loc.cit.; Malaurie and Aynès, Les biens[5], no. 412 p. 117; Mazeaud and Chabas loc.cit.). Eine analoge Debatte wird – mit demselben Ergebnis - über die Frage geführt, ob ein Eigentumsrecht an schuldrechtlichen Ansprüchen (ein propriété des créances) existiere (bejahend z.B. Zenati, Rev.trim.dr.civ. 1996, 422-425, verneinend aber u.a. Sériaux loc.cit. no. 21; Mazeaud and Chabas loc.cit.; Larroumet, D. 1998 Jur. 92, 93). Wenn folglich auch weiterhin davon auszugehen ist, dass das Eigentumsrecht i.S.v. CC art. 544 auf körperliche Gegenstände beschränkt bleibt, können Vindikations- und Kondiktionsansprüche nur dort in Konkurrenz zueinander treten, wo es um die Rückforderung einer rechtsgrundlos weggegebenen bzw. empfangenen Sache geht. Wird eine Sache aufgrund eines unwirksamen Kaufvertrages geliefert, verbleibt das Eigentum beim Verkäufer. Wegen ihrer Subsidiarität muss dann die action de in rem verso der Vindikation weichen. Dasselbe gilt aber nicht für die action en répétition de l´indu, die gerade keinen subsidiären Charakter hat (Cass.civ. 19 October 1983, Bull.civ. 1983, I, no. 242 p. 216). Die action en revendication dient der Feststellung des Eigentums an der Sache und wirkt, anders als die action personnelle en restitution auch Dritten gegenüber (Zenati and Revet, Les biens[2], p. 202, no. 166; Hansenne, Les biens I(1), p. 591, no. 636). Erstere setzt den (oft schwierigen) Beweis des Eigentums voraus; letztere nicht.

17. In SPAIN ist heute anerkannt, dass Vindikation (CC art. 348(2)) and condictio frei konkurrieren; ihr Verhältnis unterliegt nicht dem Subsidiaritätsprinzip (TS 12 April 1955, RAJ 1955 (1) no. 1126 p. 602; Basozabal Arrue, Enriquecimiento por intromisión en derecho ajeno, 336). Der Kondiktionsanspruch kann aber ein Folgeanspruch des Vindikationsanspruches sein, insbesondere dort, wo es durch Verarbeitung oder Verbindung zu einem gesetzlichen Eigentumsverlust kommt, see e.g. CA Málaga 4 December 2007, BDA JUR 2008/83624 (D verlangt nach der Trennung von seiner ehemaligen Freundin E erfolgreich Möbel aus Eigentum und Wertersatz für verlegtes Parkett im Wege eines unjustified enrichment claim). Da Spain dem kausalen Übereignungssystem folgt, können Ansprüche auf die Rückgewähr geleisteter Sachen grundsätzlich auch auf die Vindikation gestützt werden. Sie setzt freilich nicht nur den Nachweis des Eigentums des Klägers und des Besitzes bzw. der Detention des Beklagten, sondern auch die Möglichkeit voraus, die Sache zu identifizieren (was z.B. bei Gattungssachen i.d.R. ausgeschlossen ist), see Álvarez-Caperochipi, El enriquecimiento sin causa[3], 30. Der Bereicherungsanspruch hat demgegenüber den Vorteil, dass er nicht davon abhängt, dass die Sache in natura zurückgegeben werden kann (Álvarez-Caperochipi loc.cit. 67-70). Umgekehrt ist die Vindikation ausgeschlossen, wenn das Gesetz an anderer Stelle (z.B. im Nichtigkeitsrecht: CC arts. 1305 und 1306) die Restitution trotz Ungültigkeit des Titels aus übergreifenden Gründen (Sittenwidrigkeit; Gesetzesverstoß) ausschließt (Carrasco Perera, ADC 1987,1055, 1066).

18. In AUSTRIA unterbleibt aufgrund des kausalen Übereignungssystems im Falle der rechtsgrundlosen Leistung idR. auch der Eigentumserwerb des Bereicherten. Dem solvens steht deshalb auch die Eigentumsklage aus CC § 366 offen. Sie konkurriert frei mit Ansprüchen aus Bereicherungsrecht; der Bereicherte ist sowohl nach CC § 366 als auch nach CC §§ 1041-1042 bzw. §§ 1431-1432 zur Herausgabe der Sache verpflichtet (OGH 29 February 1984, SZ 57/44; OGH 15 January 1992, SZ 65/5; Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III[2], no. 15/3). In der Praxis wird die Klage aber nur selten auf das Eigentumsrecht gestützt, weil der Nachweis des Eigentums erhebliche Anforderungen stellt. Buchgeld kann, da es sich dabei um eine Forderung handelt, ohnehin nicht im Wege der Vindikation zurückgefordert werden, und bei Barzahlungen geht das Eigentum häufig durch Vermischung unter (Schwimann [-Honsell and Mader], ABGB VII[2], Pref. to §§ 1431 ff. no. 15). Für die Kondiktion ist das Eigentum des Leistenden an der zurückgeforderten Sache dagegen unerheblich (OGH 4 November 1991, SZ 54/156; Apathy and Riedler loc.cit. no. 15/4; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 269). Außerdem kann mit der rei vindicatio nur die Herausgabe der Sache selbst, nicht aber Nutzungs- oder gar Wertersatz verlangt werden. Die rei vindicatio ist deshalb für den Kläger i.d.R. nur dann gegenüber einem Bereicherungsanspruch vorteilhaft, wenn der Bereicherte nach Leistungsempfang zahlungsunfähig geworden ist.

19. In PORTUGAL wird das Verhältnis der Bereicherungs- zur Eigentumsherausgabeklage wegen der Subsidiarität der Bereicherungsklage (CC art. 474) als problematisch empfunden, see Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 88, 428).

Die Rechtsprechung scheint neuerdings einer freien Konkurrenz der beiden Anspruchsgrundlagen zuzuneigen (STJ 18 December 2002, Processo 02B4011), die Lehre ist weiterhin uneins (gegen die Subsidiarität der Bereicherungsklage gegenüber der Vindikation z.B. Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 464-465; für sie Leite de Campos, A subsidiariedade da obrigação de restituir o enriquecimento, 360). Die acção de reivindicação (CC art. 1311(1)) ermöglicht es dem Eigentümer, gerichtlich von jedem Besitzer oder Detentor der Sache die Anerkennung seines Eigentumsrechts und damit die Herausgabe dessen zu verlangen, was ihm gehört. Die Eigentumsherausgabeklage unterliegt nicht der Verjährung (CC art. 1313); sie findet auf andere dingliche Rechte mit Anpassung an deren Besonderheiten entsprechende Anwendung. Da auch Portugal dem kausalen Übereignungssystem folgt (CC art. 408(1)), übeträgt ein unwirksamer Vertrag kein Eigentum: der Verkäufer bleibt Eigentümer und kann die Sache vindizieren. Da das portugiesische Recht auch den gutgläubigen Erwerb vom Nichtberechtigten nicht kennt (auch nicht die posse vale título-Regel), scheint sich die Geltendmachung von Vindikationsansprüchen in der Praxis geradezu aufzudrängen. Der Eigentümer ist jedoch mit dem oft sehr komplizierten Nachweis seines Eigentums belastet (CC art. 342). Deshalb ist es für ihn oft günstiger, sich auf die besitzrechtlichen Vorschriften der CC arts. 1276-1286) zu stützen (Carvalho Fernandes, Direitos reais, 93, 250).

20. In HUNGARY kann sich der Anspruchsteller frei zwischen der Geltendmachung der Bereicherungs- und der Eigentumsherausgabeklage entscheiden. Die Bereicherungsklage ist nur gegenüber anderen schuldrechtlichen Ansprüchen subsidiär (Petrik and Bíró, Polgári jog II[2], 653). Die Eigentumsherausgbaeklage verjährt nicht (CC § 115(1); sie ist nur durch die Ersitzung (CC § 121(1)) beschränkt. Wie andere schuldrechtliche Ansprüche verjährt der Bereicherungsanspruch dagegen nach Ablauf von fünf Jahren. In POLAND ist die Frage des Verhältnisses zwischen der Vindikation und dem Bereicherungsrecht sehr umstritten. Die Rechtsprechung vertritt seit Supreme Court 15 September 1945, C I 116/45, PiP 1946, no. 2, p. 120 überwiegend die Auffasung, dass der Bereicherungsanspruch gegenüber der Vindikation subsidiär sei. Ein Bereicherungsanspruch komme nur in Betracht, wenn es keine andere Anspruchsgrundlage für den angestrebten Vermögensausgleich gäbe oder wenn der entsprechende Anspruch nur mit erheblichen Schwierigkeiten realisiert werden könne (Supreme Court 27 April 1995, III CZP 46/95, OSNC 1995, no. 78, pos. 114).

21. In ESTONIA entscheidet das Abstraktionsprinzip über das Verhältnis von Vindikation (LPA § 80) und Leistungskondiktion (LOA §§ 1028-1036). Dem solvens steht nur dann neben der Kondiktion auch ein Eigentumsherausgabeanspruch zu, wenn nicht nur der schuldrechtliche Vertrag, sondern auch die dingliche Verfügung unwirksam war (Supreme Court 20 December 2005, civil matter no. 3-2-1-136-05). Im Normalfall freilich bleibt das Verfügungsgeschäft von der Unwirksamkeit des Verpflichtungsgrundes unberührt (GPCCA § 6(4)); in diesem Fall bleibt der solvens auf einen Anspruch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung beschränkt.

IV. Sonstige privatrechtliche Ansprüche

22. Unter den sonstigen privatrechtlichen Ansprüchen, die mit denen aus Bereicherungsansprüchen konkurrieren können und unter VII.–7:101(3) von den Letzteren unberührt bleiben, spielen diejenigen aus benevolent intervention in another's affairs, Delikt und aus den Ausgleichsmechanismen des Sachenrechts eine besondere Rolle. Im Verhältnis zur berechtigten Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag ist das Bereicherungsrecht grundsätzlich schon deshalb subsidiär, weil eine solche Geschäftsführung einen Rechtsgrund i.S.d. Bereicherungsrechts darzustellen pflegt. Je

weiter das Recht der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag reicht, desto schmaler wird also der Anwendungsbereich des korrespondierenden Bereicherungsrechts. So sind zwar in FRANCE und BELGIUM geschäftsführungsrechtliche Ansprüche bei Verwendungen auf vermeintlich eigene Sachen ausgeschlossen (Mazeaud and Chabas, Leçons de droit civil II(1)[9], no. 675 p. 808; de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge II(1)[3], no. 1074 p. 1137), doch wird bei eigennützigen Verwendungen auf fremde Sachen in France inzwischen die Anerkennung einer sog. gestion d'affaires intéressée diskutiert, und entschieden ist, dass Verwendungen auf im Miteigentum stehende und deshalb nur teilweise fremde Sachen einen Anspruch aus CC art. 1375 rechtfertigen können (CA Paris 21 May 1986, RTD civ 1986, 786, note Giverdon; see also CA Paris 14 October 1997, Juris Data 1997-023144). In Belgium wird aber nach wie vor nur die gestion d´affaires désintéressée akzeptiert; der Geschäftsführer darf nicht primär im eigenen Interesse gehandelt haben (Stijns/Van Gerven/Wéry, JT 1996, 689, 697). Das soll aber schon dann nicht der Fall sein, wenn ein Abschleppunternehmer das Unfallfahrzeug einer ins Krankenhaus eingelieferten Fahrerin zu seiner Garage transportiert; er habe dann sowohl Anspruch auf die Transportkosten als auch auf Abstellgebühren (CA Brugge 10 June 1985, TBR 1986, 70). Zu einer besonders engen Interaktion von Deliktsrecht und Bereicherungsrecht bzw. dem Recht der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld kommt es in France in den Fällen, in welchen dem Leistenden ein Verschulden unterläuft. Cass.civ. 17 October 1996, Bull.civ. 1996, V, no. 328 p. 232 betraf ungeschuldet von einer Krankenkasse erbrachte Leistungen. Die Empfängerin brauchte sie nicht zurück zu erstatten, weil angenommen wurde, dass die Kasse mit der Zahlung eine deliktische faute (CC art. 1382) begangen habe, so dass die Frau mit einem Schadenersatzanspruch in Höhe der empfangenen Leistung habe aufrechnen können. Cass.soc. 14 June 1979, Bull.civ. 1979, V, no. 546 p. 401 hatte in einem nahezu identischen Fall noch ähnlich argumentiert, im Ergebnis aber entschieden, dass dem Inhaber der action en répétition de l´indu der Erstattungsanspruch nicht vollständig verweigert werden dürfe.

23. In SPAIN wird gesagt, dass es sich sowohl bei der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag als auch bei der ungeschuldeten Leistung um quasivertragliche Schuldverhältnisse aus rechtsgrundlos erbrachten Leistungen handele (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 426). Die Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag beträfe in der Regel die Leistung eines Dienstes, die ungeschuldete Leistung die Übergabe einer Sache. Dem Recht der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag gebühre als der spezielleren Regelung der Vorrang (Pasquau Liaño loc.cit. 419). Große praktische und auch theoretische Bedeutung kommt dagegen dem Recht des Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnisses zu. CC arts. 360, 375, 379(2), 383(1) und vor allem CC arts. 451-455 have not only been used to compose a condictio based on incorporation, disposition, consumption or use of another's asset (condictio por intromisión), but also to compose a condictio based on payment of another's debt and other expenditures (condictio por inversion o desembolso), see Díez-Picazo and de la Cámara Alvarez, Dos estudios sobre el enriquecimiento sin causa, 121-127, 132; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[6], 126-127, 128; Miquel González, Enriquecimiento injustificado, 2807-2808; CA Barcelona 26 November 2004, BDA JUR 2005/15139). CC arts. 451 ff (die Vorschriften zum Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnis) stellen die allgemeine Regelung der Besitzrestitution dar. Sie ergänzen das teilweise lückenhafte Recht der Leistung des Nichtgeschuldeten, u.a. in Fragen der Rückgabe von Früchten durch den accipiens indebiti (Carrasco Perera, ADC 1987, 1055, 1106, 1115). CC arts. 453, 454 und 456 differenzieren zwischen notwendigen, nützlichen und luxuriösen Verwendungen. Notwendige Verwendungen (gastos necesarios) sind solche, die zur Erhaltung (conservación) der Sache erforderlich sind (CC art. 455). Der Begriff gastos drückt aus, dass es in erster Linie um einen Ausgleich für Aufwendungen des Verwenders geht, nicht um einen Ausgleich für den Wertzuwachs des Empfängervermögens. Anspruch auf Ersatz notwendiger Verwendungen hat selbst der bösgläubige Besitzer; ein Zurückbehaltungsrecht wegen solcher Verwendungen steht aber nur dem gutgläubigen Besitzer zu (CC art. 453(1)). Nützliche Verwendungen sind nichtnotwendige Verwendungen, durch die der Wert der Sache erhöht wird, z.B. durch die Ablösung einer Hypothek. Anspruch auf Ersatz nützlicher Verwendungen hat nur der gutgläubige Besitzer (CC art. 453(2)). Sie müssen sich im Zeitpunkt der Rückgabe der Sache noch werterhöhend auswirken (CC art. 458). Luxusverwendungen schließlich sind Verwendungen, die eine Sache verändern oder verschönern, aber ihren Wert nicht erhöhen (TS 22 April 1983, RAJ 1983 (2) no. 3651 p. 2856). Sie müssen weder dem gutgläubigen (CC art. 454) noch dem bösgläubigen Besitzer (CC art. 455 second sentence) erstattet werden, können von ihnen aber weggenommen werden, wenn das ohne Beschädigung der Sache möglich ist.

24. Der Aufwendungsersatzanspruch des auftragslosen Geschäftsführers gegen den Prinzipal ist unter ITALIAN CC art. 2031 unabhängig von Be- und Entreicherung der Beteiligten auf Ersatz aller Kosten des Geschäftsführers gerichtet; eine Klage aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung ist insoweit weder nötig noch möglich, zumal sie am Subsidiaritätsprinzip (CC art. 2042) scheitern würde, see Trimarchi, L'arricchimento senza causa, 41-42. Einen Aufwendungsersatzanspruch hat auch der Besitzer, der zur Rückgabe von unberechtigt gezogenen Früchten verpflichtet ist. Der Anspruch ist auf Ersatz der Aufwendungen gerichtet, die zu Produktion und Einbringung der Früchte erforderlich waren (CC art. 1149 i.V.m. art. 821(2)). Der Besitzer einer Sache kann für den Zeitraum, für den er die Früchte herausgeben muss, auch Erstattung der Kosten für ordentliche Ausbesserungen der Sache verlangen (CC art. 1150(4)). Aufwendungen für außerordentliche Ausbesserungen kann auch der bösgläubige Besitzer erstattet verlangen (CC art. 1150(1)), desgleichen einen Ausgleich für die Verbesserungen der Sache, die im Rückgabezeitpunkt noch vorhanden sind (CC art. 1150(2)). Der Anspruch des gutgläubigen Besitzers bemisst sich nach dem Wertzuwachs der Sache, der Anspruch des bösgläubigen Besitzers entweder nach dem Wertzuwachs oder nach seinen Kosten, je nachdem, welcher dieser Beträge der geringere ist (CC art. 1150(3)).

25. Das PORTUGIESISCHE Recht der unerlaubten Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag operiert an zahlreichen Stellen mit Verweisungen auf das Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung, z.B. in CC arts. 468(2) und 472(1)). Während die echte, berechtigte Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag in ihrem Anwendungsbereich das Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung verdrängt, besteht freie Anspruchskonkurrenz zwischen der unechten (angemaßten) Geschäftsführung und der Eingriffskondiktion (Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa[2], 920). Auch stehen Ansprüche aus Delikt und aus Eingriffstkondiktion in freier Anspruchskonkurrenz. Die Verjährung des Anspruches aus Delikt bewirkt weder die Verjährung des dinglichen noch die des bereicherungsrechtlichen Herausgabenanspruches (CC art. 498(4); see STJ 11 May 2005, Processo 05S4753).

26. Das HUNGARIAN Recht der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag verweist mehrfach auf die Vorschriften des Bereicherungsrechts. Eine unangebrachte Einmischung in die Angelegenheiten eines anderen berechtigt den Geschäftsführer nur, Erstattung seiner Kosten nach den Regeln der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung zu verlangen (CC § 486(3)). Leistet z.B. ein Werkunternehmer mehr als das vertraglich Vereinbarte und ist diese Mehrleistung unangebracht, dann haftet der Kunde für sie nur nach Bereicherungsrecht (Vékás, JbOstR XIX [1978], 243, 251). Wer sich wissentlich die Angelegenheiten eines anderen als eigene anmaßt und von dem anderen nach den Regeln des Rechts der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag in Anspruch genommen wird, hat insoweit eine ähnliche Rechtsstellung; er kann unter den genannten Voraussetzungen nach den Regeln der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung mit seinen Kosten aufrechnen (CC § 487).

27. POLISH CC art. 414 entspricht insoweit VII.–7:101(3), als danach die Vorschriften des Bereicherungsrechts diejenigen über die Verpflichtung zum Schadenersatz unberührt lassen. Schwieriger gestalten sich die Konkurrenzfragen zwischen dem Bereicherungsrecht und dem Recht des Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnisses bei Aufwendungen auf eine fremde Sache. CC art. 408 bringt eine aufwendige Regelung der Ansprüche des Bereicherungsschuldners zum Ausgleich seiner auf den erlangten Vorteil getätigten Aufwendungen. Der Anspruch ist grundsätzlich auf Ersatz der notwendigen Aufwendungen gerichtet; für nützliche Aufwendungen kann nur insoweit Ersatz verlangt werden, wie sie den Wert des Bereicherungsgegenstandes im Zeitpunkt seiner Herausgabe noch erhöhen. Ist der Bereicherungsgläubiger zum Aufwendungsersatz verpflichtet, kann das Gericht anstelle der Herausgabe in Natur Wertersatz in Geld unter Abzug des Wertes der Aufwendungen anordnen (CC art. 408 § 3). CC art. 226 betrifft demgegenüber den Aufwendungsersatz im Eigentümer-Besitzer-Verhältnis. Der gutgläubige Eigenbesitzer kann Ersatz notwendiger Aufwendungen insoweit verlangen, als sie nicht durch die Vorteile, die er aus der Sache erhalten hat, gedeckt werden. Den Ersatz anderer Aufwendungen kann er nur insoweit verlangen, als sie den Wert der Sacher im Zeitpunkt ihrer Herausgabe an den Eigentümer übersteigen. Der bösgläubige Besitzer hat nur Anspruch auf Ersatz notwendiger Aufwendungen; der Dieb oder sonstige bösgläubige Eigenbesitzer kann notwendige Aufwendungen sogar nur insoweit verlangen, als der Eigentümer durch sie bereichert sein würde. Die Lage des Besitzers ist unter CC art. 226 ist folglich schlechter als die des Bereicherungsschuldners unter CC art. 408. Daraus wird geschlossen, dass es sich bei CC art. 226 um eine die bereicherungsrechtliche Regelung verdrängende lex specialis handele (Supreme Court 11 May 1972, III CZP 22/72, OSNCP 1972, no. 12, pos. 213; Supreme Court 25 May 1986, IV CR 29/86, OSNCP 1987, no. 2-3, pos. 44; Bieniek [-Kołakowski] I[5], art. 405, no. 2; Pietrzykowski [-Skowrońska-Bocian] Kodeks cywilny I[4], art. 226 no. 14).

28. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 196 bringt innerhalb des Bereicherungsrechts die Regel, dass derjenige, der eine eigene oder eine fremde Sache zu Gunsten eines Dritten verwendet, einen Anspruch gegen den Dritten auf Herausgabe der Sache bzw. auf Ersatz ihres Wertes hat. Dieser Anspruch ist einem Anspruch aus berechtigter Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag schon nach dem Wortlaut der Vorschrift subsidiär (see Juhart and Plavšak [-Polajnar Pavčnik], Obligacijski zakonik II, art. 196, 56). Ansprüche aus anderen Versionsklagen und Ansprüchen aus Geschäftsführung stehen dagegen in freier Anspruchskonkurrenz, z. B. dann, wenn jemand die gesetzlich begründete Pflicht eines anderen tilgt (Polajnar Pavčnik loc.cit. art. 197, 57). Freie Anspruchskonkurrenz besteht auch im Verhältnis zum Deliktsrecht. Als eine das Bereicherungsrecht verdrängende lex specialis wird dagegen die Verwendungsersatzklage aus LPA art. 48 qualifiziert (Juhart/Tratnik/Vernčur, Stvarno pravo, 295).

29. Im DUTCH law sollen Ansprüche aus Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag (CC art. 6:198) und Ansprüche aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung (CC art. 6:212) frei konkurrieren, z.B. dann, wenn die Tilgung einer fremden Schuld die Voraussetzungen beider Vorschriften erfüllt. Das Recht der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag wolle Ansprüche aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung nicht ausschließen (so jedenfalls Scheltema, Verbintenissenrecht II, art. 212, no. 9, p. 68-69; art. 198, no. 4, p. 12; anders aber wohl van Maanen, Ongerechtvaardigde verrijking, 43, der meint, dass das Bestehen einer Forderung aus Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag eine Verarmung bzw. einen Schaden i.S.d. Bereicherungsrechts entfallen lasse). Klagen auf Herausgabe einer Sache können schuldrechtlich auch auf das Deliktsrecht gegründet werden (CC art. 6:103: Schadenersatz in natura), und umgekehrt kann selbst der Anspruch auf die Rückgewähr einer ungeschuldeten Leistung letztlich in einen Schadenersatzanspruch münden, nämlich dann, wenn die Rückgabeverpflichtung aus CC art. 6:203 nicht erfüllt werden kann, so dass man es mit einer Pflichtverletzung zu tun hat (CC art. 6:74). Forderungen aus Delikt, aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung und aus ungeschuldeter Leistung stehen zueinander in freier Anspruchskonkurrenz, aber natürlich kann dieselbe Leistung nicht mehrfach verlangt werden (Scheltema loc.cit. art. 203, no. 15, p. 81 und art. 212 no. 9; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 337, p. 341; HR 13 May 1977, NedJur 1978, no. 154, p. 529; CA The Hague 23 February 1989, NedJur 1990, no. 595, p. 2449). Wo eine Klage aus Delikt möglich ist und den insoweit höheren Beweisanforderungen entsprochen werden kann, wird regelmäßig diese bevorzugt, weil sie für den Kläger in aller Regel günstiger ist (Scheltema loc.cit.). Das hängt auch damit zusammen, dass der Schadenersatzanspruch aus CC art. 6:212 im Gegensatz zu dem deliktischen Schadenersatzanspruch aus CC art. 6:162 der Höhe nach durch Verarmung und Bereicherung begrenzt ist. Der Anspruch auf Gewinnherausgabe aus CC art. 6:104 ist dementsprechend auf das Deliktsrecht beschränkt.

30. In ESTONIA verdrängt das Recht der negotiorum gestio (LOA ch. 51) das Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung. Das Recht der ungerechtfertigten Bereicherung findet aber in einigen Sonderfällen ergänzende Anwendung, z.B. dann, wenn der Geschäftsführer ohne Verschulden irrig annahm, zur Geschäftsführung berechtigt zu sein (LOA § 1024(4)). In that case the principal is obliged to transfer that which is received as a result of the intevention pursuant to the provisions concerning unjustified enrichment. Der Vorrang des Rechts der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag ist praktisch bedeutsam, weil Leistungen unter nichtigen Dienstleistungsverträgen nach geschäftsführungsrechtlichen, nicht nach bereicherungsrechtlichen Regeln rückabgewickelt werden sollen (Tampuu, Lepinguväliste võlasuhete õigus, 67). Zwischen dem Delikts- und dem Bereicherungsrecht herrscht dagegen grundsätzlich freie Anspruchskonkurrenz (LOA § 1044(1)). If a plaintiff has both a claim for compensation of damages and an unjustified enrichment claim against the person who violated his rights, he may choose between the two claims (Supreme Court 25 September 2006, civil matter no. 3-2-1-70-06). Das Bereicherungsrecht kann für den Kläger aber insbesondere deshalb günstiger sein, weil es weder den Nachweis eines Verschuldens der anderen Seite noch eines Schadens des Klägers voraussetzt (see Supreme Court 13 December 2006, civil matter no. 3-2-1-124-06).

Illustration 2 is derived from BH 2006/193; illustration 5 is derived from Bulgarian Supreme Court no. 1023 of 17 July 1968, judgment in civil matters no. 4017/58, third chamber; illustration 6 is inspired by STJ 27 January 1988, BolMinJus 473 (1998) 474.

VII.–7:102: Concurrent obligations

(1) Where the disadvantaged person has both:

(a) a right under this Book to the reversal of an unjustified enrichment; and

(b) (i) a right to reparation for the disadvantage (whether against the enriched person or a third party); or

(ii) a right to recover under other rules of private law as a result of the unjustified enrichment, the satisfaction of one of the rights reduces the other right by the same amount.

(2) The same applies where a person uses an asset of the disadvantaged person so that it accrues to another and under this Book:

(a) the user is liable to the disadvantaged person in respect of the use of the asset; and

(b) the recipient is liable to the disadvantaged person in respect of the increase in assets.

COMMENTS

General. The function of this provision is to prevent double recovery in a range of cases. These are firstly where the disadvantaged person has an enrichment claim and also another private law claim (against the same or a different person) which ought to be regarded as alternative (paragraph (1)). Such private law claims may take the form of a right to compensation or other reparation for damage caused arising out of the same disadvantage giving rise to the enrichment claim or a right of recovery which, like the enrichment claim, serves to reverse an enrichment. The second instance is where the disadvantaged person has enrichment claims against several enriched persons, but in respect of the same disadvantage (paragraph (2)).

Claims with different bases. In so far as an enrichment claim and a claim for reparation relate to the same disadvantage, any discharge of one claim also goes towards the discharge of the other. For example, where E has made use of D's asset, D may claim compensation for the deprivation of the property and will also have an enrichment claim based on a notional fee for the hire of the asset. D cannot demand payment of both sums since if D had the use (the basic point of reference for the loss in the reparation claim) D could not at the same time have hired the asset out to another (the basic point of reference for determining the quantum of liability for the enrichment claim: see VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (1) and VII.–5:103 (Monetary value of an enrichment; saving)). To have the benefit of both claims would involve a contradiction.

Illustration
D, a bus company, has an exclusive franchise to operate a bus line from O to P. E, a competitor, has a franchise to operate a long-distance bus line from O to Q. Contrary to the terms of its franchise and in infringement of D's exclusive franchise, E's coaches make regular stops at P to transport passengers between O and P. D has a claim against E for loss of profit under the rules of the applicable competition law. D also has a claim under this Book for a fee equal to the value of E's enrichment – the use of D's franchise – or, depending on whether E is in bad faith, the profits which E has obtained as a result of the infringement. D is not entitled to recover both sums, since the claims arise in respect of the same disadvantage, but D is free to claim the greater of the two amounts due.

Claims against different persons. Paragraph (2) applies where a person has been enriched by making use of an asset of the disadvantaged person in such a manner that the asset has vested in another, who is correspondingly enriched by the increase in assets. In the usual case only one of the two claims will be meaningful for the disadvantaged person. If the recipient is a good faith acquirer who has given value for the enrichment, the enrichment will be justified by the property law rules on good faith acquisition or, in other cases, the recipient will have the benefit of the defence in VII.–6:102 (Juridical acts in good faith with third parties). In such a case only the claim against the user will yield benefit to the claimant. This paragraph therefore only applies in limited situations. Recovery on the basis of one claim reduces the other because the disadvantaged person cannot be permitted to recover both in respect of the claim against the transferor (enriched in making use of a right to dispose of an asset, for example) and the recipient (enriched in obtaining the asset). Otherwise the disadvantaged person would have the value of the asset twice over. The internal relationship between transferor and recipient will depend among other things on the terms of the contract or other juridical act between them.

NOTES

1. Soweit Ansprüche aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung überhaupt frei mit Ansprüchen aus anderem Rechtsgrund konkurrieren (see Notes under VII.–7:101 (Other private law rights to recover)), ist in allen Rechtsordnungen selbstverständlich, dass der Umstand, dass das Anspruchsziel auf mehrere Anspruchsgrundlagen gegründet werden kann, nicht zu double oder gar mehrfach recovery führen darf. Siehe bereits die notes under VII.–7:101.
2. In SPAIN ist nicht nur der bereicherungsrechtliche Anspruch gegen a bad faith intervener auf Gewinnherausgabe gerichtet (see Notes under VII.–5:104 (Fruits and use of an enrichment)), sondern in einigen Fällen auch der Deliktsanspruch. To avoid double recovery as well as undercompensation in such cases, e.g. within patent law, werden zwei Grundregeln vorgeschlagen. Es dürfe (i) nur das als "echte" Bereicherung des Patentverletzers angesehen werden, was nach Abzug seiner deliktischen Schadenersatzverpflichtung übrig bleibe. Wenn der Verletzergewinn geringer sei, als der geschuldete Schadenersatz, sei auch bereicherungsrechtlich stets mindestens der tatsächliche Verlust des Rechtsinhabers auszugleichen (Portellano Díez, La defensa del derecho de patente, 190). Die Gerichte sind sich des Problems der double recovery aber möglicherweise nicht immer zureichend bewusst gewesen. TS 29 December 2006, RAJ 2007 (2) no. 1714 p. 3897 (see the illustration under the Article) decided that both the tort law claim and the unjustified enrichment claim are different and compatible. Consequently, E was obliged (i) to compensate D for his actual damage and for lost profits; and (ii) to reverse to D the profits obtained by the unlawful practice. (However it might have been the case that within the enforcement-period of this decision the amounts concerning the lost profits (based on Unfair Competition Act art. 18(5) (tort) and Unfair Competition Act art. 18(6) (unjustified enrichment) had been correspondingly reduced to avoid overcompensation of the claimant.) TS 5 February 2008, BDA RJ 2008/4029 gewährte dagegen dem verletzten Inhaber eines Markenrechts nur einen nach der entgangenen Lizenzgebühr berechneten Schadenersatzanspruch aus Delikt; der Bereicherungsanspruch aus Unfair Competition Act art. 18(6) wurde mit der ausdrücklichen Begründung verneint, dass eine doppelte Kompensation vermieden werden müsse. Likewise, Díez-Picazo, ADC 2007, 1601, 1610 suggests that in the context of cases of interference with another's rights the aggrieved party is only entitled to either a tort law claim or a condictio against the intervener.

3. Under PORTUGUESE CCP art. 469 kann der Kläger den geltend gemachten Anspruch auf mehrere Anspruchsgrundlagen stützen; das Gericht ist verpflichtet, den subsidiär geltend gemachten Anspruch (das pedido subsidiário) zu berücksichtigen, wenn dem primären Klagebegehren nicht stattgegeben werden kann, z.B. weil ihm die Einrede der Verjährung entgegensteht (STJ 10 November 1981, BolMinJus 311 [1981] 353; STJ 17 October 2006, Processo 06A2741; STJ 16 September 2008, Processo 08B1644). Entsprechendes gilt, wenn der primär geltend gemachte Anspruch aus Vertrag oder Delikt unbegründet ist, aber der subsidiär erhobene Anspruch aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung durchgreift (STJ 18 May 2006, Processo 06A1157).

4. Also, under ESTONIAN law a plaintiff may have both a claim for compensation of damages and an unjustified enrichment claim against the violator of his or her rights. In such cases the amount of the enrichment claim must be taken into account in determining the amount of the claim on compensation of damage, and vice versa, in order to avoid any enrichment of the plaintiff.

The illustration is taken from TS 29 December 2006, RAJ 2007 (2) no. 1714 p. 3897.

VII.–7:103: Public law claims

This Book does not determine whether it applies to enrichments which a person or body obtains or confers in the exercise of public law functions.

COMMENTS

General. Among the Member States some legal systems have different sets of rules governing unjustified enrichment law for private law and public law cases and this Article respects that tradition. It leaves it to those public law rules to determine whether and in what fashion the rules of this Book should also extend to unjustified enrichment claims in the public law field or whether a completely different, specifically public law regime should govern. It is not the function of these private law model rules to determine to what extent, if any, they are also apt for the public law sphere. This is in keeping with and broadens the general principle that these model rules are not intended to be used or used without modification or supplementation, in relation to rights and obligations of a public law nature: see I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2).

Contexts. Where specifically public law principles of unjustified enrichment law apply, these usually take the form of special modifications of the basic private law rules for public law cases. In addition, however, there may be special regimes for particular categories of public law cases, such as, for example, for repayment of fees or tax to public authorities where less was due to the state or no sum was due at all, or for recovery of social security payments which were excessive or to which the recipient was not entitled. Such rules can take proper account of the complications specific to the public law field – for example, due to the fact that the legislation underpinning the authority to demand the sum is struck down under constitutional or administrative law or that the revenue raised has been factored into budgetary planning.

Scope. The priority of possible public law regimes of unjustified enrichment law envisaged by the Article relates to (a) claims between public law bodies, (b) claims by individuals against public law bodies (e.g. in respect of overpaid tax), and (c) claims by public law bodies against individuals (e.g. in respect of overpaid welfare benefits).

NOTES

1. Mit der action en répétition de l'indu können staatliche Stellen sowohl nach der FRENCH als auch nach der BELGIAN Rechtsprechung überzahlte Sozialleistungen (Altersversorgung, Arbeitslosengeld etc) zurückgefordern (Cass.civ. 22 November 2005, pourvoi 04-30583; Cass. 27 March 2006, no. de rôle S050022F; Cass. 3 January 2005, no. de rôle S040118F; Cass. 29 September 2003, no. de rôle S020047F). Umgekehrt können Bürger mit dieser Klage auch gegen den Staat vorgehen, z.B. wegen zu viel gezahlter Steuern (Cass.civ. 24 February 2005, pourvoi 03-20040; Cass. 26 June 1998, no. de rôle F970071F).
2. In SPAIN dagegen the legal regime of restitutionary claims arising out of public law relationships is usually to be found in a public law rule, with no apparent connection to the Spanish CC or other private law rules. Thus public law rules set out a wide array of restitutionary claims based on unjustified enrichment. General Budgetary Act (Ley 47/2003, General Presupuestaria) of 26 November 2003, BOE no. 284 of 27 November 2003 art. 77, for instance, lays down the duty of the beneficiary of public benefits to reverse to the public Administration what he or she received from the latter by mistake, General Act on Taxation (Ley 58/2003, General Tributaria) of 17 December 2003, BOE no. 302 of 18 December 2003 art. 221 the duty of the tax authority to reimburse overpaid taxes. However, public law courts have, under the general doctrine of unjustified enrichment, extended the duty to reverse an unjustified enrichment to many other areas, such as extra work done under an implicit or explicit order of the public body, but beyond the contractual agreement (e.g. TS 25 February, RAJ 1991 (2) no. 1536 p. 2085; TS 28 April 2008, BDA RJ 2008/2486). Today, public law courts frequently refer to the (civil) doctrine of unjustified enrichment as developed by the civil chambers of the Tribunal Supremo and apply the 'principle that interdicts unjustified enrichments' (e.g. TS 2 April 1986, RAJ 1986 (3) no. 4214 p. 4045 andTS 28 April 2008 loc. cit.).

3. In ITALY haben sich schwierige Fragen der Zuständigkeitsabgrenzung zwischen den Zivil- und Verwaltungsrechten gestellt (dazu Cass.sez.un. 25 July 2006, no. 16896, Giust.civ.Mass. 2006, 7-8). In der Sache aber kann (und muss) der Staat, sofern nicht ein Sondergesetz Vorrang beansprucht, Zuvielleistungen (wie z.B. überzahlte Bezüge von Angestellten des öffentlichen Dienstes) nach den Regeln der Zahlung einer Nichtschuld (CC arts. 2033 ff) zurückfordern. Der gute Glauben des accipiens steht der Forderung nicht entgegen, allerdings dürfen die Lebensbedürfnisse des Schuldners nicht beeinträchtigt werden (Administrative Court Lazio Roma, 17 November 2006, no. 12593, TAR 2006, 11; Consiglio Stato 22 June 2006, no. 3962, Foro amm. CDS 2006, 6, 1792). Klagt ein Privatrechtssubjekt aus ungeschuldeter Leistung gegen den Staat, weil der mit der zuständigen Verwaltung abgeschlossenen Vertrag unwirksam war (was wegen besonderer verwaltungsrechtlicher Gegebenheiten in Italien nicht selten vorkommt), so prüft die Rechtsprechung üblicherweise, ob die zuständige öffentliche Körperschaft (z.B. eine Gemeinde) die ihr erbrachte Leistung als nützlich anerkannt hat (z.B. Cass. 28 October 2005, no. 21079, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, 10; Cass. 21 September 2005, no. 18586, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, 7/8). Es soll zwar schon eine implizite Anerkennung durch konkrete Nutzung der Leistung genügen. Allerdings kann eine solche Anerkennung nur nach dem Zeitpunkt der Leistungserbringung und nur von dem zuständigen Organ der Körperschaft erklärt werden (Cass. 16 September 2005, no. 18329, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, 6).

4. In AUSTRIA ist anerkannt, dass CC §§ 1431 ff analog angewandt werden können, wenn eine Leistung ihren scheinbaren Rechtsgrund nicht in einem Vetrag oder einer privatrechtlichen Regelung, sondern in einer Vorschrift des öffentlichen Rechts hat (VwGH [verstärkter Senat] 30 June 1965, JBl 1966, 436). Zuständig sind dann aber die Verwaltungsgerichte (Schwimann [Mader], ABGB VI^3, no. 20; see OGH 14 June 1989, SZ 62/105) (Ausnahme: Enteignungssachen). Bei Rückforderungsansprüchen eines Hoheitsträgers gegen ein Privatrechtssubjekt gehen der analogen Anwendung des Bereicherungsrechts allerdings spezielle Grundsätze des öffentlichen Rechts vor, insbesondere sind die zum Schutze der Privatperson erlassenen verfahrensrechtliche Vorkehrungen zu beachten (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB II(2)^3, vor § 1431 no. 28). Im Verhältnis zwischen dem Träger der Sozialversicherung und den Versicherten scheitert die Anwendung des privatrechtlichen Bereicherungsrechts zumeist an dem Anwendungsvorrang der spezielleren Regeln des Social Security Act (ASVG); für eine Analogie zu CC §§ 1431 ff ist hier nur noch zum Zwecke der Lückenfüllung Raum.

5. PORTUGAL verfügt über eine Reihe von öffentlichrechtlichen Spezialnormen quasibereicherungsrechtlichen Inhalts. Unter General Social Security Act (Bases Gerais do Sistema de Segurança Social, Lei no. 4/2007 of 16 January 2007) art. 60(2) sind ungerechtfertigt gezahlte Sozialleistungen zurückzuerstatten, und Lei Geral Tributária (DL no. 398/98 of 17 December 1998) art. 43 begründet den Anspruch auf Rückerstattung ungeschuldet gezahlter Steuern. Ansprüche dieser Art unterliegen dem jeweiligen Spezialregime unter komplementärer Anwendung der Regeln des Zivilgesetzbuches (loc.cit. art. 2(d)). Ansprüche aus ungerechtfertigter Bereicherung können Gegenstand der allgemeinen Verwaltungsklage sein (Código de Processo nos Tribunais Administrativos, Lei 15/2002 of 11 September 2002, art. 37(2) lit. I; see STA 14 July 2008, Processo 0386/07 [Ansprüche eines Arichitekten wegen Leistungen, die über das vertraglich Geschuldete hinausgingen]).

6. Im BULGARIAN Recht unterliegen Rückforderungsansprüche wegen nichtgeschuldet oder zu viel gezahlter Steuern und die Rückforderung unberechtigt ausgezahlter Sozialversicherungsleistungen dem Restitutionsregime der sogen. Steuer-Sozialversicherungsverfahrensordnung (art. 118(1)). Ihren Regeln unterliegen auch staatliche Rückforderungsansprüche aus unberechtigt empfangenen Subventionen (see loc.cit. art. 162(2)(vi)). Auch SLOVENIA verfügt über spezielle öffentlichrechtliche Rückforderungsregime. Ein Beispiel ist Steuerverfahrensgesetz art. 96, der die Rückforderung von zu viel gezahlten Steuern regelt.

7. Pursuant to ESTONIAN Administrative Procedure Act (Haldusmenetluse seadus) § 69(1), things, money and other benefits transferred to a person on the basis of an administrative act which is repealed retroactively shall be returned or compensated for according to the private law provisions concerning unjustified enrichment. In addition, State Liability Act § 22(1) states that a person may request a public authority to return a thing or money transferred without legal basis in a public law relationship unless otherwise provided by law; if the return of a thing received without legal basis is not possible or involves excessive costs, the entitled person may request compensation for the value of the thing in money. The provisions of private law apply to unjustified enrichment in a public law relationship, unless otherwise regulated by the State Liability Act and if it is not in conflict with the nature of the public law relationship. A public authority may request from a person the return of a thing or money transferred without legal basis in a public law relationship on the bases and pursuant to the procedure provided by private law (State Liability Act § 22(3)). Supreme Court 17 June 2004, administrative matter no 3-3-1-17-04, however, decided that submission of claim by a public authority against a recipient, who for the intended purposes has consumed the enrichment, may be contrary to good morals. Under Taxation Act § 33 a person who has paid a greater amount of tax than prescribed by law has the right, within three years as of the date on which excess payment occurred, to apply to the tax authority for the overpaid amount to be refunded or set off.

8. ENGLAND (pointer): Deutsche Morgan Grenfell v. Her Majesty's Commissioners of Inland Revenue [2006] UKHL 49, note Manner, ZEuP 2007, 872-887: Rechtsirrtum dem Tatsachenirrtum nun auch auch im Verhältnis Bürger und Staat gleichgestellt.

BOOK VIII

ACQUISITION AND LOSS OF OWNERSHIP OF GOODS

CHAPTER 1: GENERAL PROVISIONS

Section 1: Scope of application and relation to other provisions

VIII.–1:101: Scope of application

(1) This Book applies to the acquisition, loss and protection of ownership of goods and to specific related issues.

(2) This Book does not apply to the acquisition or loss of ownership of goods by:

(a) universal succession, in particular under the law of succession and under company law;
(b) expropriation and forfeiture;
(c) separation from movable or immovable property;
(d) division of co-ownership, unless provided by VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk) or VIII.–5:202 (Commingling);
(e) survivorship or accrual, unless covered by Chapter 5 of this Book;
(f) real subrogation, unless covered by Chapter 5 of this Book;
(g) occupation;
(h) finding; or
(i) abandonment.

(3) This Book applies to the acquisition and loss of ownership of goods by extrajudicial enforcement in the sense of Book IX or the equivalent. It may be applied, with appropriate adaptations, to the acquisition and loss of ownership of goods by judicial or equivalent enforcement.

(4) This Book does not apply to:

(a) company shares or documents embodying the right to an asset or to the performance of an obligation, except documents containing the undertaking to deliver goods for the purposes of VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (4); or
(b) electricity.

(5) This Book applies, with appropriate adaptations, to banknotes and coins that are current legal tender.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of this Article. This Article defines the scope of application of Book VIII on "acquisition and loss of ownership of goods". The scope is delimited on different levels: with regard to the assets covered, it is restricted to goods and does not extend to immovable property or other assets such as intellectual property rights or rights to performance of an obligation. With regard to the type of property right covered, the scope is – basically – limited to the right of ownership (proprietary security rights being regulated in Book IX and trusts being covered by Book X). All this already follows from the basic circumscription contained in paragraph (1) of this Article, which states that this Book applies to the acquisition, loss and protection of ownership of goods and to specific related issues. Further limitations apply with regard to certain modes of acquisition or loss of ownership (spelled out in paragraphs (2) and (3)) as well as regarding certain types of movable assets (paragraphs (4) and (5)). On the other side, the scope of Book VIII extends to "specific related issues", which had to be used as a short-cut expression in order not to overload the text of the Article. This basically refers to certain issues regarding possession, such as definitions and protection of possession, to consequential questions arising on restitution of goods to their owner, and to some (limited) issues on co-ownership.

Issues of central importance, no complete Book on property law regarding movables. Book VIII certainly covers property law issues of central practical as well as dogmatic importance. For instance, it determines under which circumstances ownership passes under a contract for the sale of goods, and provides good faith acquisition principles. Many issues addressed in this Book, such as the principle of speciality (identification), are general matters of property law. However, Book VIII does not provide a full set of rules on "property rights in movable assets"; it is confined to important segments. Details emerge from the subsequent Comment B.

B. Scope of Book VIII in general (paragraph (1))

Reasons and criteria for delimitation. There are several reasons for choosing the scope as it stands. Covering the whole area of property law, based on a comparative analysis of almost all European legal systems, would simply have been impossible in terms of time and research capacities. Second, these model rules in general are not intended to be used (except where otherwise provided) in relation to the ownership of, or rights in security over, immovable property (I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(f)). Then, not only for organisational matters of dividing workload, but also for well-founded policy reasons of treating functionally comparable issues together, all matters of security rights relating to movable assets are left to Book IX on proprietary security rights. With regard to the potentially remaining issues, above all a criterion of transaction-affinity was important. The central part of Book VIII, therefore, is Chapter 2 on the "derivative" transfer of ownership of goods, such as that based on a contract for the sale of goods, this certainly being the most important issue from the viewpoint of the internal market. The issues dealt with in the other Chapters of this Book are grouped around and supplement the central transfer issue, e.g. by addressing situations where a valid transfer, for one reason or the other, fails. Another criterion is that Book VIII should cover those issues which supplement other parts of these model rules on a property law level because they are needed to develop final solutions to important practical situations. This will be discussed more closely in Comment B below.

(a) Assets covered: goods, not immovable property, intellectual property or rights to performance

Goods. Book VIII applies to "goods", which is a bit narrower than "movables" in the sense of Book IX. The term "goods" is defined in VIII.–1:201 (Goods); see the Comments on that Article. There is, however, one important reservation to be observed: pursuant to VIII.–1:102 (Registration of goods), the question whether ownership and the transfer of ownership in certain categories of goods may be, or may have to be, registered in a public register must be left for national law to decide. Also, the effects of such registration, as determined by national law, have priority over the respective rules of this Book.

Immovable property. As mentioned above, Book VIII does not apply to immovable property. This converges with I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(f). Practically, covering immovable property as well would have been unrealistic. It would have required, among other things, a complete analysis of European land registration systems, including rather technical and procedural details. The results could have been considerably different as compared to the analysis carried out in relation to goods. For example, the importance of publicity could be weighed in a completely different way where reliable means of providing publicity (in particular, by registration) are available.

A specific issue regarding the demarcation between movable and immovable property is, however, addressed in VIII.–1:301 (Transferability) paragraph (2).

Intellectual and industrial property rights. Also, Book VIII does not apply to intellectual and industrial property rights. Technically, this follows from the restriction to "goods" in the sense of VIII.–1:201 (Goods). The reasons for this choice partly converge with what has been said in relation to immovable property: covering this area would simply have been unrealistic. Also, it would have made no sense to focus on transfer and protection aspects only.

Rights to performance of an obligation. Some European legal systems perceive the transfer of a right to performance of an obligation as a matter of property law. Another approach is to deal with this issue within the law of obligations. These model rules, as PECL did before, contain a separate Chapter on assignment in Book III on obligations and corresponding rights (see Book III Chapter 5 on transfers of rights and obligations).

Further exclusions and clarifications as to assets covered. Paragraph (4) of this Article contains further exclusions, or partly rather clarifications, with regard to company shares, certain documents and electricity. Paragraph (5) deals with money. See the related Comments E and F below.

(b) Rights covered: ownership

General; ownership. As indicated above, Book VIII does not deal with all kinds of proprietary rights. It focuses on the right of "ownership" within the meaning of the definition provided in VIII.–1:202 (Ownership). For a description, see the Comments on that Article. This choice was to provide model rules for the practically most important property law areas concerning the trade in goods: proprietary security rights as regulated in Book IX, and issues of transfer (including protection in the contractual partner's insolvency), which are governed by Book VIII.

Proprietary security rights and retention of ownership devices. All matters of security in movable assets are subject to Book IX. See IX.–1:101 (General rule) on the scope of Book IX and the general policy expressed in VIII.–1:103 (Priority of other provisions) paragraph (1). This applies to classic proprietary security devices, such as the pledge; it also applies to retention of ownership and functionally comparable devices. Retention of ownership, as far as aspects of security are concerned, is, therefore, outside the scope of this Book. Only with regard to the position of an acquirer subject to a retention of ownership device, this Book provides some additional rules in VIII.–1:204 (Limited proprietary rights) subparagraph (c) and in VIII.–2:307 (Contingent right of transferee under retention of ownership). Indirectly, however, certain provisions in particular of Chapter 5 of this Book are highly relevant for proprietary security rights, since Book IX partly refers to these provisions; cf. the overview provided in VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment E.

Other limited proprietary rights. Further, Book VIII does not contain detailed rules on other limited proprietary rights, such as proprietary rights to use (e.g. usufruct rights) or to acquire (e.g., a right of pre-emption with effect in rem). Limited proprietary rights are, however, recognised for certain purposes relevant to matters covered in this Book; see VIII.–1:204 (Limited proprietary rights) and the Comments on that provision.

(c) Issues covered: transfer and protection, plus supplements

General: acquisition, loss and protection, and specific related issues. According to paragraph (1) of this Article, Book VIII applies to the acquisition, loss and protection of ownership of goods and to specific related issues. Evidently, this is a short-cut formula of a descriptive nature and needs some further clarification. The following Comments list these issues and briefly explain why they are included in Book VIII.

Central issue: transfer (Chapter 2). As already mentioned above, the "derivative" transfer of ownership, regulated in Chapter 2, forms the core of Book VIII. It, above all, supplements and, in a sense, continues the provisions on contracts for the sale of goods, as provided in Book IV.A of these model rules, on a property law level. It need hardly be said that this is a kind of transaction happening several millions of times each day in Europe, thus being of central practical importance. But it is not only sales. Rules for the transfer of ownership are also necessary with regard to contracts for donation. Ownership of goods must also be "transferred" where goods have already been delivered, but delivered in such a defective state that the contractual relationship is terminated, with the result that the goods must be returned to the original debtor under III.–3:511 (Restitution of benefits received by performance). There are, of course, further examples.

Good faith acquisition (Chapter 3). A transfer under Chapter 2 may fail where the transferor lacks the right or authority to dispose of the property: nemo dat quod non habet. This requires an answer to the question whether, and if so, under which preconditions, a transferee may nevertheless deserve protection in terms of making a valid acquisition. This issue is dealt with by Chapter 3 on good faith acquisition. It is ancillary to Chapter 2 in a legal sense, since it applies only where a valid transfer would otherwise fail due to the transferor's lack of right or authority. In terms of transaction costs, however, the solution to this question is of considerable importance, having a major impact on whether and to what extent buyers are advised to undertake investigations about the provenance of goods they intend to purchase.

Acquisition by continuous possession (Chapter 4). There are cases where both a valid transfer under Chapter 2 and immediate acquisition based on good faith acquisition under Chapter 3 fail. E.g., the contract between the acquirer and the seller who lacks the right or authority to dispose is invalid; or the goods are obtained under a contract of donation. This raises the next question, namely whether a valid acquisition should nevertheless be possible after a certain time of possessing the goods. Solutions are provided by Chapter 4 on acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. This Chapter, in the first place, provides fall-back provisions in relation to Chapters 2 and 3. It does, however, go beyond, pursuing a general aim of providing legal certainty.

Acquisition by production, combination or commingling (Chapter 5). Chapter 5 deals with consequences – on the level of property law as well as with regard to compensation claims – of production, combination and commingling. This issue is included, first, because it can arise in several instances related to a transfer context (see VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment A). In particular, the rules on production have considerable practical importance where material transferred subject to retention of ownership is used for production before payment of the price. In this respect, Book IX on security rights in movables, which basically covers all issues of retention of ownership devices, refers back to Chapter 5 of this Book. Also regarding other types of security rights, the rules of Book IX largely build upon the provisions of Chapter 5. Besides the parallels as to content, dealing with these issues in Book VIII is hence also supported by an argument of symmetry in coverage.

Protection of ownership (Chapter 6). VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) contains central rules on the protection of ownership. Above all, the owner is entitled to recover possession of the property from any person who has no right to possess it in relation to the owner. In particular, this right is valid and effective where that other person is insolvent. Given that a right of revindication is not self-evident from a comparative perspective, including these provisions makes sense for practical reasons; but also to make clear what exactly is transferred or otherwise acquired under the other Chapters of this Book. In addition, the right of revindication serves an important function in providing a clear and complete picture of the consequences of subsequent avoidance of a contract, based on which property has already been transferred to the acquirer. It, therefore, also supplements the rules of Book II Chapter 7 on grounds of invalidity, and Book VII on unjustified enrichment.

Protection of possession (Chapter 6), possession in general. Given that rules on the protection of ownership are covered by Book VIII, much speaks in favour of adding rules on protection of possession as well. In practice, these rules serve an important supplementary function in relation to the ownership-rules in many countries. Arguably, this area would otherwise be incomplete from a practical perspective. This of course requires detailed rules on the concept and relevant forms of possession. Such rules are included in Chapter 1 of this Book. Also, these general possession rules operate as a central tool in other Chapters of this Book; especially in Chapter 2 (regarding the definition of delivery) and in Chapter 4 on acquisition by continuous possession.

Consequential questions on restitution of goods (Chapter 7). Chapter 7, finally, supplements the protection-rules as well as other parts of these model rules (again, e.g. the rules on the effects of avoidance). They can be important in order to solve a number of practical cases and – against the comparative background in this area – make important proposals in terms of internal coherence and simplification. See also VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) Comment A2.

(d) Areas not covered

Further modes of acquisition and loss of ownership. Paragraph (2) of this Article contains exceptions and clarifications as to further modes of acquisition and loss of ownership. See Comment C below.

Co-ownership and co-possession. This Book only contains fragmentary provisions on co-ownership; see the Comments on VIII.–1:203 (Co-ownership). The existing rules are covered by the broad formula of "specific related issues". Also, Book VIII does not, or at least not explicitly, deal with co-possession. However, protection of co-ownership and co-possession will be possible under the rules of Chapter 6.

C. Exclusion of specific modes of acquisition and loss (paragraph (2))

General. Paragraph (2) of this Article lists specific modes of acquisition or loss of ownership which are not covered by this Book. The reasons for excluding these areas differ. Partly, they are outside the scope of these model rules in general. Others have been kept out because they are of rather inferior importance in view of the primary task of providing rules which can be used in a transfer context. Time pressure certainly was another reason for keeping the scope narrow.

Universal succession (paragraph (2)(a)). This Book does not cover acquisition of ownership by "universal succession". This term means succession to an entire estate or to the entire assets and liabilities of another person, whether natural or juridical. There are two main practical examples: first, the exception covers universal succession at death as provided under national laws of succession. Excluding this area corresponds to the policy of the provisions governing the scope of application of these model rules in general, which state that these rules "are not intended to be used, or used without modification or supplementation … in relation to … wills and succession" (I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(b)). Second, the exception applies to mergers and split-ups under company law, where a company's ownership in its movable assets is transferred to a new or other company (cf. the policy expressed in I:–1:101 paragraph (2)(g)). These two examples are explicitly mentioned in the text of the provision. Paragraph (4)(a) adds another exception regarding the company law area, namely for the transfer of company shares.

Expropriation and forfeiture (paragraph (2)(b)). I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(b) provides that the these model rules "are not intended to be used, or used without modification or supplementation, in relation to rights and obligations of a public law nature". Paragraph (2)(b) of this Article supplements this provision with respect to the acquisition and loss of ownership of goods under specific rules which are either of a public law character, or at least closely associated with public law principles and policies, namely on expropriation and forfeiture. These rules have not been considered any more closely when developing Book VIII, and it would be inappropriate to give any directions in this respect, although, theoretically, the transfer rules provided by Chapter 2 of this Book could be made applicable to these cases as well: the entitlement to the transfer of ownership in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(d) could arise from a court order or decision of another competent authority and regard has to be paid to paragraph (4) of that basic transfer provision which ensures that ownership passes at the time determined by a court order (or rule of law; or, here: order of another competent authority) itself. E.g., with regard to expropriation, a requirement of having paid compensation to the expropriated owner may be made a prerequisite applicable under the rules governing such acquisitions of ownership. However, whether the whole system Book VIII Chapter 2 would appear appropriate for such purposes, or after making specific adaptations, cannot be evaluated here.

Also, the rules of Chapter 3 on good faith acquisition are not intended to be applied in the areas of expropriation and forfeiture. For instance, the true owner may have had no chance to participate as a party in expropriation proceedings, which may cause a different weighing of the interests of the true owner and the good faith acquirer as compared to other good faith acquisition constellations. With respect to Chapter 4, however, nothing prevents a possessor of goods who obtained possession by, say, expropriation of another (which legally failed for some reason), to acquire ownership by continuous possession after a certain period of time as provided by that Chapter. Chapter 4 stands on its own. All the requirements are laid down there; it is irrelevant whether possession was obtained under circumstances covered by paragraph (2)(b) of the present Article or not. Acquisition does not take place "by" expropriation or forfeiture, but independently thereof after at least ten years.

Separation from other asset (paragraph (2)(c)). This book does not regulate acquisition of ownership by separation from movable or immovable property. Traditionally, there usually is a rule that the owner of the main property will acquire ownership of the separated item upon separation, e.g. the owner of a field will be the owner of the crop once harvested. The same may apply to a person entitled to a usufruct right, but there may be a different rule for a person "only" entitled to a right of usus (acquisition upon perception). These issues have been regarded as of subordinate importance, given that the starting point and focus of this project is the derivative transfer of ownership under, e.g., a contract for the sale of goods. Cf. also VIII.1:301 (Transferability) paragraph (2) and the Comments on that provision.

Division of co-ownership (paragraph (2)(d)). This Book does not provide a full set of rules on co-ownership so that most of this area is left to national law (cf. VIII.–1:203 (Co-ownership) Comment A). This applies, among other things, to the rules on dividing co-ownership between the co-owners, by which co-ownership is terminated and transformed into sole ownership of the goods held by one of the former co-owners or by a third person. Paragraph (2)(d) of this Article spells out that the rules provided by this Book do, in principle, not apply to such acquisition of (sole) ownership. Under national law, the division of co-ownership often involves court proceedings and selling the property in an auction, unless the co-owners agree on another form of division. Book VIII does not deal with such issues and there does not seem to be any need to do so. Where co-ownership is created under VIII.–5:203 (Combination), these national provisions are to be applied for division.

In two rules, however, Book VIII provides for a mode of simplified division of co-ownership, without involving court proceedings or a special agreement of the parties. These rules provide a right to divide co-ownership by physically separating a respective quantity from a bulk of fungible goods. For this reason, paragraph (2)(d) of this Article contains a reservation for VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk) and VIII.–5:202 (Commingling).

Survivorship and accrual (paragraph (2)(e)). Survivorship is a doctrine applicable in common law countries where property is held on joint tenancy. A surviving party having a joint interest with others in an estate may take over the whole (or a bigger proportion), in particular where one of the partners dies. The property automatically accrues to the surviving co-owner(s). "Accrual" may also address situations where a partner of a company withdraws, retires, etc. The provisions of this Book are not intended to apply to such acquisitions. The term "accrual", however, may also cover "accession" of a subordinate part to the principal part upon combination of these two, which is a situation expressly regulated by Chapter 5 of this Book. The present subparagraph, therefore, makes a reservation for Chapter 5.

Real subrogation (paragraph (2)(f)). Real subrogation is a very important concept in some legal systems; for instance, in France and Belgium. It may be applied, in particular, with respect to retained ownership, where the buyer resells the goods, in order to extend the security right to proceeds. It may also be used with regard to restitution, providing for a right to proceeds where another's goods have been sold; or with regard to the assignment of claims. Book VIII does not deal with such a concept on a general basis. Some rules in Chapter 5 – in particular: the rules on extending a security right to the proceeds of a sale, VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights) paragraph (2) – however, might be interpreted as a form of real subrogation. Therefore, Chapter 5 is excluded from the exemption spelled out in paragraph (2)(f).

Occupation (paragraph (2)(g)). Ownerless property may traditionally be acquired by any person by occupation, i.e. by taking it into possession with the intention to keep it as one's property. This is left to national law. The issue is not important for the primary purposes of this Book. The same applies to comparable forms of acquisition by a unilateral act, however named (perception etc.).

Finding (paragraph (2)(h)). Further, acquisition of ownership as a consequence of finding property which has been lost by another is not covered by this Book. The basic approach usually is that the finder is under specific duties of either returning the goods to the person who lost them or of handing them over to a public authority which keeps lost goods for a certain period in order to give their owner a chance to recover possession of them. If the owner does not claim the property after a certain time, many national legal systems provide for a right of the finder to acquire ownership of the goods. This, as well as a right to a finder's reward, is intended to work as an incentive for a finder to comply with the specific duties imposed by law. Upon a closer look, the rules in the European legal systems differ in many details. Given this and the remoteness of the issue from the central tasks Book VIII is intended to fulfil, it was agreed that finding would be kept out of this Book.

Abandonment (paragraph (2)(i)). Corresponding to the comprehensive right to dispose of the property, an owner may traditionally also abandon it, i.e. may give up possession of the goods with the intention of terminating the proprietary right. The right of ownership thereby ceases and the goods become ownerless. It has not been thought necessary to regulate this issue in the framework of this Book.

D. Acquisition and loss of ownership by way of enforcement (paragraph (3))

General. I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(h) provides that these model rules "are not intended to be used, or used without modification or supplementation … except where otherwise provided, in relation to … matters relating primarily to procedure or enforcement". Explicit regulations on enforcement issues are, in particular, provided in Chapter 7 of Book IX which deals with the enforcement of proprietary security rights. Under that Chapter, enforcement may be judicial or extrajudicial. In particular, realisation may be effected by selling the encumbered assets, which implies a transfer of ownership of these goods to the acquirer, or ownership of the collateral may be appropriated by the secured creditor. As to extrajudicial enforcement, cf. IX.–7:207 (General rule on realisation) in conjunction with IX.–7:211 (Sale by public or private auction or by private sale) and IX.–7:216 (Appropriation of encumbered asset by secured creditor)).

Extrajudicial enforcement (sentence 1). In principle, the provisions of Book VIII are fully applicable to the acquisition and loss of ownership of goods by way of extrajudicial enforcement in the sense of Book IX Chapter 7. However, reference is to be made to the general rule of VIII.–1:103 (Priority of other provisions) paragraph (1), under which the provisions of Book IX have priority over the provisions in Book VIII. For instance, where the secured creditor fails to comply with certain duties required by Book IX Chapter 7 – e.g., the notification requirements under IX.–7:208 (Notice of extra-judicial disposition) to IX.–7:210 (Time and contents of notice), or the duty to realise a commercially reasonable price under IX.–7:212 (Commercially reasonable price) – the general principle is that the position of a third party buyer of the collateral is not affected by any violation of these provisions (cf. the Comments on these provisions). These rules taking priority, the general transfer principle expressed in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(c), namely that the transferor (here: secured creditor) must have "authority to transfer the ownership" may, consequently, not be applied in such a way that a failure to comply with these provisions would affect the secured creditor's authority to dispose, by which the transfer would become invalid, and the third party buyer's acquisition would fall (unless good faith acquisition principles would counteract).

The rules on acquisition and loss of ownership under Book VIII are also intended to apply where extrajudicial enforcement is carried out under rules of national law which are functionally equivalent to those of Book IX.

Judicial enforcement (sentence 2). With regard to judicial enforcements, on the other hand, it is clear that this Book, in principle, does not intend to interfere with national enforcement law. On the other hand, some of the principles of Book VIII could also be applied there, if compatible with a particular national legal system, and provided appropriate adaptations are made where necessary. Basically, this is already expressed in I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(h), but the idea is repeated for reasons of clarity by paragraph (3) sentence 2 of this Article. Adaptations may, for example, be necessary where national rules on judicial enforcement provide that the "fall of the hammer" (the acceptance of the highest bid in an auction) does not only bring about the conclusion of a contract for sale, but also effects the transfer of ownership. Here, the delivery concept generally adopted in Chapter 2 of this Book may prove to be unsuitable, as it requires a voluntary act of the transferor, which may cause practical difficulties in forced sales. Also, applying the good faith acquisition rules in Chapter 3 of this Book to judicial enforcement proceedings may be appropriate with certain adaptations, e.g., again relating to the time of acquisition (such as making the fall of the hammer decisive instead of delivery).

"Equivalents" to judicial enforcement refers to other enforcement systems run "by the state" in a wide sense, for instance operated by police authorities without involving a court.

E. Exclusion of specific types of assets (paragraph (4))

General. Paragraph (4) serves a clarifying function in relation to the types of assets covered by Book VIII. Most issues are already settled by the definition of "goods" provided by VIII.–

1:201 (Goods) which limits the scope of this Book to corporeal movable assets. This already excludes immovable property, intellectual and industrial property rights and rights to the performance of an obligation (cf. Comment B above). The list of exceptions provided by paragraph (4) of this Article is reduced to such assets which – in the everyday meaning of the word – will not be considered to be "goods", but may cause doubts against the broad definition of goods being corporeal movables. A comparable question arises in relation to banknotes and coins, which are also corporeal and movable. This issue is expressly regulated by paragraph (5) of this Article.

Company shares (paragraph (4)(a)). I –1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(g) provides that these model rules are "not intended to be used, or used without modification or supplementation. … except where otherwise provided, in relation to … the creation, capacity, internal organisation, regulation or dissolution of companies and other bodies corporate or unincorporated". Paragraph (4)(a) supplements this general rule by excluding the transfer, other acquisition of, and the protection of rights in, shares in an existing company. Company law has been kept out entirely from the research carried out in this project. A clarification as to this Book's scope is however useful since shares in a company may be incorporated in certain documents, like securities, which, as such, are "corporeal" and "movable".

Documents embodying rights (paragraph (4)(a)). A comparable, and partly overlapping, issue is addressed by the second type of asset mentioned in paragraph (4)(a) of this Article, namely "documents embodying the right to an asset or to the performance of an obligation". Again, there is a general rule in I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(g), which provides that these model rules are "not intended to be used, or used without modification or supplementation. … except where otherwise provided, in relation to … bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes and other negotiable instruments". Paragraph (4)(a) of this Article conclusively clarifies the matter for Book VIII. Partly, these fields are governed by specific rules serving specific purposes, in particular needs of celerity and safety in commercial transactions. Partly, these purposes are served by specific transfer means and effects, like endorsement and "abstract" effects, which are not compatible with some approaches opted for in this Book. Also, some of these areas are subject to international harmonisation instruments, like the 1930 Geneva Convention Providing a Uniform Law For Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes. There is no use in touching this field. It was also left completely outside the project.

Paragraph (4)(a) of this Article makes a proviso for documents containing the undertaking to deliver goods for the purposes of VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (4). Book VIII "applies" to these documents in the sense that transferring these documents constitutes an equivalent to delivery in the sense of that Article, the result of which is that ownership of the goods "represented" by the document passes to the transferee, provided all the other general transfer requirements are met. This is not intended to imply that the transfer of such a document itself is necessarily governed by the rules of Chapter 2 of this Book. That may follow separate rules which may, e.g., require endorsement in the case of certain forms of a bill of lading. See also VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) Comment E.

Electricity (paragraph (4)(b)). Paragraph (4)(b) of this Article clarifies that this Book does not apply to electricity. This refers to electricity "contained" in a power grid. The background is a technical one. Electricity does not "move", in a physical sense, from a specific supplier to a specific customer. Rather, a specific voltage must constantly be kept in the network by suppliers feeding the network and suppliers taking electricity therefrom. Also, electricity will not be regarded as "corporeal", notwithstanding being measurable. Accordingly, transfer rules envisaging physical delivery from one to another do not fit. On the other hand, book VIII does apply where electricity is contained in a corporeal movable body, like a battery.

F. Money (paragraph (5))

Money in general; cases clearly covered or clearly not covered. The classification of "money" in terms of being an object of transfer under private law may be manifold. This is apparent when posing the question whether, or to what extent, it may be covered by Book VIII. Bank account money is definitely not included, this being a claim against the bank and not a corporeal asset. To this extent, the scope of Book VIII clearly deviates from Book IX. On the other hand, banknotes and coins of former currency, i.e. money which is not used as current legal tender anywhere (like "Deutsche Mark" coins which have been replaced by the Euro), are intended to be covered by Book VIII from the outset; i.e. without any reservation of "appropriate adaptations". Such items are treated as "goods". They may be subject to trade, as single items as well as forming parts of collections. Also, there may be cases where banknotes or coins actually being current legal tender are functionally traded as "goods". For example, a collection of all Euro- and Eurocent-coins from all States of the Euro-zone is offered for sale in exchange for a price. For such "goods", Book VIII also applies without restrictions. With regard to the wording of paragraph (5), which provides that Book VIII applies with appropriate adaptations, one may say that in such a case, simply no modification is necessary.

Applicability to banknotes and coins that are current legal tender only with appropriate adaptations: underlying reasons. With regard to current banknotes and coins, as long as they serve the function of legal tender, Book VIII will only apply with "appropriate adaptations". This will be the case where money is paid as a price in exchange for goods or services, but also where money is stolen and, e.g., commingled with other money. There should be no difference whether the banknotes or coins are current legal tender in the respective country where they are received (or possessed) or whether they are current legal tender somewhere else. There are two main reasons for mentioning "appropriate adaptations". The first one is simple prudence. Comparative research as well as the drafting deliberations when preparing this Book always focused on goods, and it would not be reasonable to copy the result to money without thorough consideration. Second, a better approach would arguably even be to take into account both bank account money and current banknotes and coins right from the beginning and to strive for coherent solutions. However, the fact that this has not been possible does not necessarily preclude the application of the results achieved under the present Book as long as it is made clear that these results may be overridden in any case where another solution is found to be more appropriate. This approach underlies paragraph (5) of this Article.

Applicability in detail: basic overview. In a rough analysis of the main principles of Book VIII, it appears that the rules, at least basically, fit the transfer of current banknotes and coins. As stated above, "appropriate adaptations" may be necessary and can, for instance, also be based on consistency arguments relating to bank account money. As to substance, in particular the delivery concept in chapter 2 seems quite all right with banknotes and coins, and applying good faith acquisition rules (Chapter 3) to money is quite usual. In some countries, however, the requirements for good faith acquisition of money are less strict than for other assets (in order to serve full negotiability), e.g. with regard to the standard of good faith; or by establishing no "for value" requirement; or by providing that stolen money can be acquired in good faith without any exceptions. As mentioned above, the policies for Chapter 3 of Book VIII have been developed with a view to “goods” and policies may prove to be not fully identical. This may require adaptations to be made. Chapter 4 on acquisition by continuous possession of money does not seem to create problems, although it would have very little practical importance in relation to money. Regarding Chapter 5, the “commingling” rule provided in VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) appears to provide a fair solution also where money owned by different persons is commingled: these persons acquire co-ownership in proportion to the value of their contributions and each co-owner is allowed to separate an amount corresponding to that co-owner’s share. Chapter 6 on remedies does not seem to create additional problems; the only – but practically important – problem for the owner will be to identify the owned banknotes or coins. Also Chapter 7 will hardly create any problems, since it refers to Books VI and VII; some questions will not arise at all, e.g. improvements to money.

VIII.–1:102: Registration of goods

(1) Whether ownership and the transfer of ownership in certain categories of goods may be or have to be registered in a public register is determined by national law.

(2) The effects of such registration, as determined by national law, have priority over the respective rules of this Book.

COMMENTS

A. General

General approach. Book VIII does not aim to establish a system of registration for goods. Whereas in Book IX a system of registration for proprietary security rights in movables is introduced, the acquisition and transfer of the right of ownership of the movable itself cannot be registered in accordance with any rules of the DCFR. This lack of a possibility to register the ownership of goods under these model rules does not, however, exclude the possibility and effect of registration of ownership on the basis of national registration rules or international conventions. This means that national or international registration rules, which may exist for certain categories of goods in certain countries, can principally be combined with the application of Chapter VIII on the acquisition and loss of ownership of goods.

B. The rule in detail

Paragraph (1): national law determines the categories of goods to which ownership-registration applies. The term 'national law' includes rules of autonomous national origin as well as rules stemming from European or international sources which are considered to be or to have become part of national law (for instance in the case of international conventions by ratification). Such registration systems may apply to vehicles like ships, aircraft or cars or to other specific types of movables. It is important that the registration has some significance or effect with respect to right of ownership of the goods. If it does not contain information pertaining to the ownership of the goods, it will not overlap with the rules of Book VIII and, therefore, is not addressed by this paragraph. The rules of Book VIII do not restrict or prescribe the categories of goods which have to be registered for the purpose of acquisition or transfer of ownership or for the purpose of achieving other effects of private law. It is a highly political decision to introduce or abolish a registration system for the ownership of certain types of movables, because such decisions have an important impact on the trade with such goods. The introduction of a registration system is costly and burdensome, for the parties as well as for the state or other institutions involved, and it will be justified only for very few categories of goods – which are valuable, long-lasting, and important for the economy, and trade without registration would be too insecure for the market participants. Only where these and maybe other requirements are fulfilled, will the beneficial effects of such registration systems outweigh their costs and other disadvantages. The difficult answer to the questions in which countries and with respect to which goods these requirements will or will not be met can only be given by political institutions on national or European levels, but not by the drafters of these rules.

Paragraph (1): 'may be or have to be registered'. The national or international rules of registration may create a duty of a person to register certain goods and their owner(s) or may just give a person a possibility to register on a facultative basis. Equally the consequences and effects of such a duty or possibility to register and the following registration may differ considerably in the national or international systems.

Paragraph (2): different types of systems in terms of their effect. The registration of ownership of certain goods may have different effects. These effects are prescribed by the national or international rules. They characterise the respective system and cannot be separated from it. It is impossible to isolate the duty of registration (paragraph (1]) and provide uniform effects for all national registrations by Book VIII. Therefore, Book VIII must also step back with respect to the legal effects of such national registration systems and must let them prevail over its own rules of acquisition, transfer and loss of ownership.

Where the registration has only administrative or similar effects, but no effects with respect to the proof of, creation of, transfer or loss of ownership and no other private law effects with respect to the parties dealing with the movable, no conflict or overlap with the rules of Book VIII may occur. For such non-private law effects it is, therefore, not necessary to exclude the model rules of Book VIII and to give the national or international rules priority.

Where, on the other hand, the registration rules have private law effects, two differentiations have to be made. The registration of ownership may have either 'constitutive' or 'declaratory' effect. The registration may be part of a system where ownership is acquired by delivery (or delivery equivalent) or the registration may form part of a system where ownership is transferred by contract (or other juridical act etc.) alone without the requirement of delivery. In delivery systems the registration may be considered an equivalent of delivery. Thus, the transfer and acquisition of ownership may require the registration of ownership of this particular movable. In such a case registration has constitutive effect. The delivery system may also give the acquirer the choice to either register or receive delivery of the movable, either alternative being sufficient for the transfer of ownership to the transferee. In the case of consensus or consent systems delivery as well as registration will not have constitutive effect for the acquisition of ownership, because under such systems ownership is acquired by consent (e.g. contract) alone. The effects of registration under such systems will, therefore, be declaratory with respect to the acquisition or transfer of ownership, but may have additional proprietary effects in certain constellations, as for instance in cases of multiple transfers (A sells the goods first to B, then to C, the goods are registered for C only). Finally it is also possible that delivery systems provide registration duties or possibilities for certain categories of goods, but accord only declaratory effects to such registrations. In such cases the goods are acquired by delivery or delivery equivalent, a subsequent registration only provides information about the already existing ownership of the transferee. The declaratory effects of registration may be important in private law with respect to third persons who rely on the information given by the register.

Paragraph (2): partial exclusion of Book VIII rules. The rules of Book VIII principally apply to all categories of goods (subject to the exceptions mentioned in VIII.–1:101 (Scope of application)), even to goods for which national or international rules have established or will establish a registration system. With respect to these categories of goods (for which registration is provided) the rules of Book VIII do not interfere with a person's duty or option to register as created by national or international law. Additionally the rules of Book VIII concerning the acquisition, transfer and loss of ownership of registered goods will be modified by the respective national or international rules if and as far as these rules provide differently from the Book VIII rules. If, for instance, national rules provide that ownership of a certain category of movables can only be acquired by registration of the new owner, rules of Book VIII which provide that ownership can be transferred by agreement as to the time ownership is to pass or by delivery or an equivalent to delivery cannot be applied. In such a case, for the sake of consistency, the national (international) legal system will also be given priority with respect to the question of whether a valid contract or other juridical act must exist as a requirement for the transfer. Book VIII (Chapter 2) requires such a contract, other juridical act or rule of law, some national systems do not (e.g. Germany, Greece).

If, on the other hand, national rules provide that certain goods have to be registered with declaratory effect only and that ownership of these goods is transferred by conclusion of a contract (or other juridical act etc.), then also these rules will have priority over the conflicting rules of Book VIII Chapter 2 (requiring delivery, a delivery equivalent or an agreement as to the time ownership passes in addition). But the Member State adopting the rules of Book VIII will, of course, be free to provide in such cases of declaratory registration that the requirements of delivery or an equivalent under Chapter 2 of Book VIII will have to be met for such categories of goods as well. The following sentence can be used as a general rule for drawing the line between national rules and the rules of Book VIII. Whenever the declaratory or other private law effects of registration may be combined with the rules of Book VIII without causing any contradictions or any interferences with the substance of the national registration system, the rules of Book VIII will also apply to categories of goods that have to be registered.

National and international systems of registration. National registration systems may, in particular, exist for ships and vessels, aircraft, railway rolling stock or motor vehicles. More detailed information is provided in the Notes to this Article. On an international level, the 2001 Cape Town Convention on International Interests in Mobile Equipment establishes an international registration system for “international interests” (security rights, retention of ownership or rights under a leasing agreement) in airframes, aircraft engines and helicopters, railway rolling stock and space assets. In case of conflict, national provisions transposing this Convention prevail over the rules provided by Book VIII; see also VIII.–1:103 (Priority of other provisions) Comment D.

VIII.–1:103: Priority of other provisions

(1) In relation to a transfer, or retention, of ownership for purposes of security, the provisions of Book IX apply and have priority over the provisions in this Book.

(2) In relation to a transfer of ownership for purposes of a trust, or to or from a trust, the provisions of Book X apply and have priority over the provisions in this Book.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of this Article; relation to other parts of these model rules. This Article clarifies the relation of Book VIII to some other parts of these model rules with which an overlap can easily occur, namely to the provisions of Book IX on proprietary security rights and of Book X on trusts. In order not to undermine particular policies of these Books, the present Article spells out, as a general rule, that the provisions of the named Books have priority over the provisions of Book VIII. Other parts of these model rules, on the other hand, are intended to "co-exist" with the provisions of this Book without one superseding the other. The latter applies, e.g., to the general provisions of Books I to III, to the rules on contracts for the sale of goods as provided in Book IV.A, to the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs (Book V), as well as to Book VI on non-contractual liability and Book VII on unjustified enrichment. With regard to some Chapters of this Book, however, specific rules also provide that other parts of these model rules take priority; see VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) paragraph (5) and VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application), both spelling out this effect in relation to Book V on benevolent intervention.

Concept of "priority over the provisions in this Book". The approach adopted regarding the relation to Books IX and X is that the provisions of these Books "apply and have priority over the provisions in this Book" (i.e. Book VIII). This does not mean that, where an overlap with these Books occurs, Book VIII would be inapplicable as a whole. Rather, the provisions of Book VIII are intended to apply, but only to the extent they are compatible with the rules of Books IX and X.

Mandatory character. This Article is mandatory and cannot be deviated from by agreement of the parties. This is necessary, taking into account the purpose of this Article, i.e. safeguarding that the policies of Books IX and X cannot be undermined.

B. Priority of Book IX on proprietary security rights (paragraph (1))

Priority of Book IX; scope of principle. Paragraph (1) of this Article provides that in relation to a transfer, or retention, of ownership for purposes of security, the provisions of Book IX apply and have priority over the provisions in this Book. This effect is spelled out, in particular, for transfers of ownership for security purposes in the sense of IX.–1:102 (Security right) paragraph (3)(a) and for the retention of ownership as a device for securing payment (cf. IX.–1:103 (Retention of ownership devices: scope)). The principle, however, is intended to be a general one. It applies to all Chapters of Book VIII, i.e. not only to transfers under Chapter 2, but also to the rules on good faith acquisition (Chapter 3), acquisition by continuous possession in the sense of Chapter 4 (which could, theoretically, become relevant with regard to acquisition free of encumbrances in the form of a proprietary security right) and production, combination and commingling (Chapter 5). With regard to Chapter 5, the relation is further specified in VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) paragraphs (3) and (4); see Comment E on that Article.

Examples of remaining scope of Book VIII. As mentioned above, the approach of Book IX taking priority means that the provisions of Book VIII will apply to the extent that Book IX does not contain specific provisions and the rules of Book VIII are compatible with the concepts of Book IX. For example, VIII.–2:307 (Contingent right of transferee under retention of ownership) contains provisions on the legal position of a transferee acquiring goods subject to a retention of ownership device. Or, where parties who transfer ownership for security purposes agree that, upon the payment of the secured debt, ownership will fall back to the transferor, VIII.–2:203 (Transfer subject to condition) may be applied to the extent that it is consistent with Book IX. Also, IX.–2:112 (General matters of property law) partly refers back to the provisions of Book VIII. The same approach is applied in some of the substantive rules of Book IX; e.g. IX.–2:307 (Use of encumbered goods for production or combination), IX.–2:308 (Use of goods subject to a retention of ownership device for production or combination) and IX.–2:309 (Commingling of assets subject to proprietary security), which are closely synchronised with the provisions of Chapter 5 of Book VIII.

C. Priority of Book X on trusts (paragraph (2))

General principle. The same general principle applies in relation to Book X on trusts. The provisions of Book X prevail where ownership of goods is transferred to or from a trust, or where a transfer otherwise serves the purposes of a trust. Again, the provisions of Book VIII may be applied to the extent that they are compatible with the trust law principles.

D. Priority of EU instruments and international instruments

General principle. Also, EU instruments and relevant international instruments to which Member States are parties, are, in principle, intended to have priority over the provisions of this Book. This is a general principle of these model rules and it suffices to spell this out in the Comments only. However, there are only a few examples at the moment. VIII.–4:102 (Cultural objects) paragraph (2) repeats the policy in relation to international conventions in the area covered by that Article. The 2001 Cape Town Convention on International Interests in Mobile Equipment (cf. VIII.–1:102 (Registration of goods) Comment B) may be relevant with regard to certain issues of retention of ownership, as well as with regard to the rules on vesting the encumbered object in the chargee in or towards satisfaction of the secured rights (cf. Article 9 of the Convention). Bills of exchange and promissory notes, for which the 1930 Geneva Convention Providing a Uniform Law For Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes provides uniform rules, is outside the scope of this Book (cf. VIII.–1:101 (Scope of application) Comment E).

VIII.–1:104: Application of rules of Books I to III

Where, under the provisions of this Book, proprietary effects are determined by an agreement, Books I to III apply, where appropriate.

COMMENTS

A. General

General idea and function of this Article. In some – prominent – places, this Book allows the parties to determine effects on the level of property law by "agreement". These provisions are special applications of the general principle of party autonomy. As to substance, such agreements may well fall within the definition of "contract" in the sense of II.–1:101 (Meaning of "contract" and "juridical act"). However, using the term "agreement" is considered to read more smoothly in some of these provisions, and it allows – as will follow from Comment B below – the making of reservations in order to avoid unintended effects which could perhaps occur when using the term "contract" instead. The function of this Article, then, is to make the general "contract law" provisions contained in Books I to III applicable to these "agreements" as well.

Comparative background. There are some parallel phenomena to be found in European legal systems. E.g., where a legal system employs the concept of a "real agreement" (cf. VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) Comments A and D) – which does, however, not apply under Book VIII – this "real agreement is considered to be a contract, to which general rules of contract law apply. For example, these agreements are subject to the general rules on avoidance for mistake.

B. The rule in detail

Agreement determining proprietary effects. There are basically two types of "agreements" covered by the present Article. First, the Article applies to "agreements as to the time ownership is to pass" in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e) and VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass). This type is also addressed in VIII.–2:302 (Indirect representation) paragraph (3)(c), and where parties agree on a condition in the sense of VIII.–2:203 (Transfer subject to condition). Second, VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) provides that the consequences of production, combination or commingling can be regulated by party agreement. See also VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights) paragraph (3).

Meaning of reference to Books I to III. The purpose of this Article is to make the general rules of Books I to III applicable to such "agreements". This applies, for instance, to the rules on: formation of a contract (Book II Chapter 4), representation (Book II Chapter 6), validity (Book II Chapter 7), interpretation (Book Chapter 8), contents and effects (Book II Chapter 9), and on conditions and time limits (III.–1:106 (Conditional rights and obligations) and III.–1:107 Time-limited rights and obligations)). With regard to Book I, I.–1:110 (Computation of time) may be used for interpreting the parties' agreement as to a time ownership is to pass. With regard to Book III, one may, e.g., also think of an arrangement between an owner of material and a producer under which the latter undertakes to produce certain products from the owner's material for a certain price, including an agreement that the owner of the material will become the owner of the products, the producer however being granted far-reaching security rights in these objects. But then, the producer does not start the production process. The owner of the material will be able to terminate the contractual relationship under Book III Chapter 5. The present Article will make sure that such termination also affects the agreement as to the proprietary consequences of production.

Reservation: "where appropriate". There may, however, be certain rules in Books I to III, the application of which would be inappropriate, either in general or under the specific circumstances of an individual case. In order to avoid unreasonable results, the Article contains a proviso for such cases.

Section 2: Definitions

VIII.–1:201: Goods

"Goods" means corporeal movables. It includes ships, vessels, hovercraft or aircraft, space objects, animals, liquids and gases.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the Article; general idea of definition. This Article provides a definition of the term "goods", which is of central importance throughout the whole Book VIII. In so doing, the Article also supplements the general scope of application rule of VIII.–1:101 (Scope of application). The definition is the one used throughout these model rules. (See the Annex of definitions.)

Purpose of containing a definition. Given that the definitions in the Annex are incorporated into these model rules by the general provision in I.–1:108 (Definitions in Annex), one may well question whether it is necessary to repeat the definition here. This is, however, considered useful for purposes of clarity, since this term is one of the most central ones in the whole Book VIII. The same applies to the definition of "ownership" in the subsequent Article.

B. The rule in detail

Corporeal movable assets, including animals, liquids and gases. The central criteria for assets to be covered by this Book are that they are "corporeal" (tangible) and "movable" (as opposed to immovable). Immovable property has been kept out of the entire project (cf. VIII.–1:101 (Scope of application) Comment B). The state of aggregation of corporeal movable items is, however, immaterial: "goods" covers solids, liquids and gases. The term also applies to animals, which is not intended to imply any ethical values, but simply is to be seen against the background of the content this Book: the transfer of ownership and other property law matters.

Ships, vessels, hovercraft or aircraft, space objects. These specific assets are, for purposes of clarification, listed in the definition of goods as provided in the Annex. Since there would be no sense in applying a different definition, they are listed here as well. However, with regard to the rules governing the transfer of ownership, some of these examples may fall within the reservation provided by VIII.–1:102 (Registration of goods), e.g. ships may be transferred by entry in a ship register under national law.

Reference to clarifications contained in VIII.–1:101. Also, reference is to be made to VIII.–1:101 (Scope of application) which, in paragraphs (3) and (4), contains clarifications as to the kinds of assets covered by this Book which, partly, can also be said to constitute exceptions from the present Article: documents (paragraph (4)(a) of the named Article) and money (paragraph (5)) would, in principle, be corporeal movable assets. See VIII.–1:101 (Scope of application) Comments E and F.

VIII.–1:202: Ownership

"Ownership" is the most comprehensive right a person, the "owner", can have over property, including the exclusive right, so far as consistent with applicable laws or rights granted by the owner, to use, enjoy, modify, destroy, dispose of and recover the property.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the Article. This Article defines the right of "ownership", this virtually being the most central term in the whole Book. The rule, therefore, defines what is transferred or otherwise acquired, and to what the means of protection provided by VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) relate. The definition is in fact used throughout the DCFR(see the Annex) but this is the obvious place to express it in the model rules(cf. also VIII.–1:201 (Goods) Comment A). This is its natural home. Indirectly, using this term as a central reference point throughout this Book also implies a major policy choice as to method, content and presentation of the rules contained in this Book; see the discussion of a "functional approach" in Comment A below. Against this background, adopting a definition in Book VIII is also important to make the effects of the subsequent Chapters understandable.

Comparative background. A definition of the style and content of this Article is quite common in "continental" European legal systems following a Roman law tradition. The perception in these legal systems is that ownership is a right in rem, i.e. a right of a person directly related to an asset (as opposed to a right of a person directed against another person, who is under an obligation to perform any kind of act or omission), an absolute right, being effective against everyone (erga omnes). The concept is, as such, not equally rooted in the common law tradition, where title is viewed as a relative, rather than absolute, matter. As to the particular contents of the right, the common law concept is, however, not so remote from a civil law understanding, also associating "property" or "title" with the greatest possible interest in a thing, consisting of a "bundle" of various "incidents" or "aspects" which, as such, largely correspond with the ones listed in the present Article. None of the incidents is individually necessary, though, and individual incidents of property can be transferred from the bundle to other parties without the transferee becoming the "owner". There is also a common understanding in that such incidents re-vest in the owner once any lesser interests granted in respect of the thing terminate (sometimes described as the "flexibility" of ownership). With regard to Nordic legal systems, it can be observed that a concept of ownership comparable to the definition provided in the present Article is quite commonly used as a description outside situations of transfer or other acquisition. It is, however, not usual to deduce specific legal consequences from qualifying a person as "the owner". In particular, when it comes to a transfer of the right, e.g. under a contract for the sale of goods, Scandinavian legal systems treat all "aspects" of "ownership" separately and independently from one another, so that different points in time may be decisive for different aspects to "pass". This is called a "functional approach"; see also VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) Comment A and the structure of the general discussion provided there in Comment C. The provisions of this Book, in general, do not follow such an approach although a functional analysis of the issues is employed and a few exceptions are recognised to the basically unitary approach adopted; cf. VIII.–2:101 Comment G.

B. The rule in detail

Comprehensive and exclusive right over property. "Ownership" is defined as the most comprehensive right a person, the "owner", can have over property, including the exclusive right, so far as consistent with applicable laws or rights granted by the owner, to use, enjoy, modify, destroy, dispose of and recover the property. The definition builds upon the idea of a legal relation between a person and a thing, the right provided by this legal relation being maximally comprehensive and of exclusive character. The exclusive character corresponds to specific means of protection provided by property law, but also under general rules of the law of obligations. The text provides examples of the "aspects" or "incidents" comprised by the right of ownership; cf. the following Comments. See also the more detailed discussion of these aspects in the context of a transfer: VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) Comment C.

In particular: right to use, enjoy, modify and destroy. The owner is entitled to deal with the property in any kind of factual way. The owner may use it (drive a car) or simply have it without using it. The owner may decide whether to use it personally or make its use available to another (e.g., by letting the goods on lease). The owner is also allowed to affect the substance of the property, covering mere adaptations and modifications as well as destruction – e.g. painting a car, modifying an item of clothing, drinking wine.

In particular: right to dispose. The owner is also entitled to dispose of the property. This covers the owner's power to validly transfer title of the goods to another and to validly create limited proprietary rights in the property. This incident, the owner's "right to transfer the ownership", is addressed as a general transfer requirement in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(d). Also, the owner can, based on the comprehensive right to dispose, grant such a possibility to another person, in which case this Book speaks of "authority" to dispose; cf. VIII.–2:101 Comment H.

In particular: right to recover, including separation in insolvency. Based on the exclusive character of ownership, the owner is entitled to specific means of protection. The most central device in this respect, which is also addressed explicitly by the text of this Article, is the right to recover possession of the property from any other person holding it without being entitled to do so. This is provided for by VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1). It is essential that this right is also valid as against the current holder's creditors in the latter's insolvency (right of separation) as well as against creditors of such other person who seek to enforce their claims in the property outside insolvency proceedings. If, therefore, in a transfer situation, the transferee has already acquired ownership of the goods while they are still in the hands of the transferor and the transferor becomes insolvent, the transferee has a right to separate the goods and is thereby protected as against the transferor's general creditors. Details are discussed in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) Comment C.

In particular: other means of protection. In addition, the owner is entitled to property law protection where another person interferes with the owner's rights in any other way than by dispossession, or where such interference is imminent; see VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraphs (2) and (3). Interferences with the owner's property may also trigger protection under the rules of Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage and under the provisions of Book VII on unjustified enrichment. See VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) Comment C for a closer description.

So far as consistent with applicable laws. However, this does not mean that the owner's rights are unlimited. Rather, other rules of law may provide restrictions, which is expressly stated in the present Article. Such rules of law may exist on a constitutional level, like the European Convention on Human Rights; or be of a public law character (e.g., certain restrictions on use and alienation applicable to weapons or toxic substances, or rules concerning specific cultural objects); or be part of private law, such as the restrictions applicable to self-help under VIII.–6.202 (Self-help of possessor).

So far as consistent with rights granted by the owner. Also, the owner may by virtue of the right to dispose "give away" the right to exercise certain aspects of the property right. The owner may, e.g., create a usufruct right in the object in favour of another person. If so, the owner is legally bound to respect that right and cannot, as long as this right persists, dispose of the property free of that right.

VIII.–1:203: Co-ownership

Where "co-ownership" is created under this Book, this means that two or more co-owners own undivided shares in the whole goods and each co-owner can dispose of that co-owner's share by acting alone, unless otherwise provided by the parties.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the Article. This Article defines the concept of "co-ownership" for the purposes of this Book; these purposes, however, being rather limited ones. Since general rules on co-ownership are not provided (cf. Comment A below), the only function is to provide a definition applicable to those – rare – provisions under which co-ownership is created in this Book. These provisions are VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk), VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination). Taking into account the restricted role matters of co-ownership play in Book VIII, there is no need for further regulation in a definition rule; in particular, there is no need to make choices of which types of co-ownership to acknowledge.

Comparative background. The concepts of co-ownership – in a wide sense – available in the European legal systems differ to a considerable degree. In particular, there are differences as to whether co-owners hold shares or are entitled to the whole; and with regard to the co-owners' possibilities to dispose of their interests. Details are reflected in the Notes on this Article.

No general rules of co-ownership. Book VIII does not provide a full set of rules on co-ownership. That would encompass, in particular, definitions of those kinds of co-ownership which are acknowledged; rules on the creation, administration and division of co-ownership (involving court proceedings in many countries); and rules on the transfer and other acquisition of co-ownership rights. Given the indicated differences in the national legal systems in Europe and the time pressure the whole project was subject to, such rules were not developed. Also, some aspects of this area were not considered to be of primary importance having regard to the fact that the central issue to be covered by this Book should be matters of transfer and supplementing rules of acquisition.

Accordingly, Book VIII only contains segments of the law of co-ownership: apart from the definition provided by this Article, there are some rules on the creation of co-ownership in particular instances closely linked to transfers or other modes of acquisition covered by this Book (see Comment B below); and two specific rules on the division of co-ownership created under some of these provisions, cf. VIII.–1:101 (Scope of application) paragraph (2)(d) in conjunction with VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk) and VIII.–5:202 (Commingling).

B. The rule in detail

Scope: creation of co-ownership under Book VIII. This Article defines what is to be understood by "co-ownership" where other rules of this Book provide for the creation of co-ownership rights. This is the case in two particular areas only: first, where fungible goods contained in an identified bulk are purported to be transferred before the goods themselves are identified. For such situations, VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) provides that the "transferee" acquires co-ownership of the goods in the bulk. The second field of application is Chapter 5 on production, combination and commingling. There, co-ownership may be created under VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination).

Concept of co-ownership in the sense of this Article. Unless the parties agree otherwise, the creation of co-ownership under this Book means that two or more co-owners own undivided shares in the whole goods and each co-owner can dispose of that co-owner's share by acting alone. In particular, it is material that all co-owners have a right in the whole goods, not – as long as co-ownership exists – in a part of them only. Second, for practical reasons, the type of co-ownership right adopted under this Article is such that each co-owner can freely dispose of that co-owner's right alone, without being dependent on any consent or co-operation of other co-owners.

Party autonomy, different forms acknowledged by national law accepted. It is not intended by this Book to impose restrictions in terms of accepting only a limited number of co-ownership types. This is not necessary for the purposes of this Book. Consequently, it impliedly accepts other forms of co-ownership as may be provided by national law. Also, parties are allowed to choose such other types by agreement when the creation of co-ownership, as such, follows from the provisions of this Book ("unless otherwise provided by the parties"). This leeway of party autonomy is intended to be confined by the rules of the applicable national law.

VIII.–1:204: Limited proprietary rights

Limited proprietary rights in the sense of this Book are:

(a) security rights if characterised or treated as proprietary rights by Book IX or by national law;

(b) rights to use if characterised or treated as proprietary rights by other provisions of these model rules or by national law;

(c) rights to acquire in the sense of VIII.–2:307 (Contingent right of transferee under retention of ownership) or if characterised or treated as proprietary rights by other provisions of these model rules or by national law;

(d) trust-related rights if characterised or treated as proprietary rights by Book X or by national law.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the Article. This Article defines the term "limited proprietary rights", which is used as a reference term in some provisions of this Book. As the term is also used in Book IX, the definition used here is also reproduced in the Annex for wider use for the purpose of the model rules. Some of the provisions in this Book use the term "proprietary rights" which comprises both the right of ownership (including co-ownership rights) and limited proprietary rights in the sense of this Article. These references to "limited proprietary rights" or "proprietary rights" in general are made in the following provisions: VIII.–2:102 (Transferor's right or authority) paragraph (2), which protects acquirers of proprietary rights in the case of ratification of colliding dispositions made by a person originally lacking authority to dispose; VIII.–3:102 (Good faith acquisition of ownership free of limited proprietary rights), which regulates the good faith acquisition free of such limited proprietary rights; VIII.–4:301 (Acquisition of ownership) paragraph (2), which deals with the parallel issue in the field of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession; and VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) which allows the parties to create proprietary rights as a consequence of production, combination and commingling.

Concept of limited proprietary right in general. The concept of "limited proprietary rights" is a traditional feature in "continental" European legal systems. Under this tradition, going back to ancient Roman law, it refers to rights in rem, i.e. rights of a person directly related to an asset (as opposed to a right of a person directed against another person, who is under an obligation to perform any kind of act or omission). The essential aspect for the purposes of this Book is that a limited proprietary right has effect against everyone (erga omnes) i.e. against the owner as well as against other persons. It is, therefore, an exclusive right, traditionally linked to special means of protection. Being effective as against the owner of the asset, it limits the owner's right to dispose of the property (cf. VIII.–1:202 (Ownership)); unrestricted ownership can, however, traditionally be acquired in good faith. As to the content, this exclusive position is limited to the scope of the respective right: it may, e.g., be a right to use; or to preferential satisfaction.

The concept of a "limited proprietary right" is not to be mixed up with the concept of a "limited-right-possessor" in the sense of VIII.–1:207 (Possession by limited-right-possessor).

No full set of rules on limited proprietary rights; references to national law. This Book does not provide a full set of rules on limited proprietary rights, containing, in particular, a detailed typology including rules on the particular contents of such rights, rules on their creation, transfer and protection. It must, therefore, build on, and refer to, national law in this respect. Some of these areas are covered by separate Books within these model rules, namely proprietary security rights (Book IX) and trusts (Book X), to which reference is also made in subparagraphs (a) and (d). In addition, these subparagraphs spell out a reference to national law as well, which (in the fictitious case that these model rules were applicable law) makes sense for cases of an international character involving, e.g., goods from a non-European country, so that it is for the rules of private international law to decide which (national) law is to be applied with regard to a specific right in these goods. Also, the reference to national law could make it possible – although not intended – that the rules of Book VIII could stand alone, without other parts of these model rules.

The reference to national law also implies that this Book does not take a particular stand on the question whether, and if so, in which way, a principle of a numerus clausus (closed list) of proprietary rights should be adopted. Deciding on this matter does not appear necessary for the purposes of this Book.

B. Particular limited proprietary rights

Proprietary security rights (subparagraph (a)). In particular, this Article accepts as limited proprietary rights "security rights if characterised or treated as proprietary rights by Book IX or by national law". There is no sense in defining and listing which types of rights are covered in detail, and under which preconditions they qualify. This is primarily for Book IX to decide (as to the additional reference to national law, see the preceding paragraph). It is therefore stated that these other provisions of law must "characterise or treat" a security right as proprietary so as to be covered by the present Article. One may say that, e.g., Book IX does not itself define what a "proprietary" right is, but rather assumes this being a given term. Book IX does, however, spell out the decisive effects. For reasons like this, the double formula "characterised or treated as proprietary rights" is used. The same applies to the subsequent subparagraphs.

Proprietary rights to use (subparagraph (b)). Second, this Article covers rights to use if characterised or treated as proprietary rights by other provisions of these model rules or by national law. This refers, e.g., to traditional types emerging from Roman law, like the "usus" (right to use) or "usus fructus" (right to use and reap fruits) in an asset, which are accepted as proprietary rights in many European legal systems. At least in relation to immovable property, some legal systems also acknowledge proprietary rights by which a person has a right to a certain active performance against the owner of an asset. In case national law accepts such rights also in relation to goods, they are intended to be covered by subparagraph (b) as well. The reference to "other provisions of these model rules" leaves leeway to these model rules to create and define such rights. With regard to the right of a lessee under a contract for the lease of goods as governed by Book IV.B, however, the Study Group deliberately left it open whether such right should be characterised as "proprietary" in the sense of this Article. With regard to one practically important aspect, a comparable effect is expressly provided: where ownership passes from the lessor to a new owner, the new owner of the goods is substituted as a party to the lease if the lessee has possession of the goods at the time ownership passes (IV.B.–7:101 (Change of ownership and substitution of lessor)).

Rights to acquire (subparagraph (c)). This subparagraph probably is the only one with a somewhat programmatic character. It covers "rights to acquire" (sc. ownership or a functionally equivalent position) and primarily addresses the position of a buyer, or other acquirer of goods, subject to a retention of ownership device in the sense of Book IX (cf. IX.–1:103 (Retention of ownership devices: scope)). The position of such acquirers as against the creditors of the transferor is expressly clarified in VIII.–2:307 (Contingent right of transferee under retention of ownership). The present subparagraph supplements that Article by stating that such rights to acquire have a proprietary character, which implies, e.g. that the holder of such a right can use the asset under the agreed terms and can protect the right against third persons. If the formal "owner" of the asset disposes of the goods without being authorised by the right-holder to dispose free of that right, the right to acquire is intended to keep on encumbering the property and bind the acquirer, unless the latter acquires free of encumbrances in the sense of VIII.–3:102 (Good faith acquisition of ownership free of limited proprietary rights). Other examples may be provided by national law; e.g., where such rules accept that a right of pre-emption has a proprietary character under specific circumstances.

Trust-related rights (subparagraph (d)). The last subparagraph covers trust-related rights if characterised or treated as proprietary rights by Book X or by national law. The regulation scheme corresponds to the one employed in subparagraph (a).

VIII.–1:205: Possession

(1) Possession, in relation to goods, means having direct physical control or indirect physical control over the goods.

(2) Direct physical control is physical control which is exercised by the possessor personally or through a possession-agent exercising such control on behalf of the possessor (direct possession).

(3) Indirect physical control is physical control which is exercised by means of another person, a limited-right-possessor (indirect possession).

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Possession and proprietary right. Articles VIII.–1:205 to VIII.–1:208 define the notion of possession and its several qualifications. Because of the frequent circulation and the various types of use of movables on the market, the person holding a movable (having direct physical control over it) is quite often not the owner of the movable. The European legal systems protect not only the position of holders of rights in rem (proprietary rights) in the movable (i.e. the owner, the pledgee, the holder of a usufruct right etc.), but also the position of persons having actual physical control over a movable as a mere factum not necessarily based on a right in rem. These persons are usually defined as "possessors". The position of a possessor can – but does not necessarily have to – coincide with the position of the holder of a right in rem in the movable. The protection of the legal position of a possessor as such differs from the protection of the position of the holder of a proprietary right in the movable. Mere possession is usually not considered to constitute a right in rem in the movable. Nevertheless, the position of a possessor is recognised as a legal position from which certain rights of the possessor and other legal consequences may follow.

Possession in other parts of Book VIII. A notion of "possession" or something similar (mere physical control over a movable or physical control combined with a certain intention) is needed in many parts of Book VIII: the transfer of ownership based on the transferor's right or authority (Chapter 2), good faith acquisition of ownership (Chapter 3), acquisition of ownership by continuous possession (Chapter 4), protection of ownership and protection of possession (Chapter 6) and the relationship between owner and possessor (Chapter 7).

Different categories of 'possession'. The particular purposes of these Chapters require different categories of possession or physical control: sometimes only actual physical control is important and the particular intention of the person exercising this control does not matter (e.g. partly in Chapter 2, self-help in Chapter 6), whereas other chapters protect only a more restricted group of persons exercising physical control. Most of the remedies in Chapter 6 (VIII.–6:203, 6:204, 6:301, 6:302, 6:401) are designed to protect only persons exercising physical control themselves or through a third person in their and this person's own interest (owner-possessors and limited-right-possessors) and not persons holding a movable without any particular own interest (possession-agents). The requirements for the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession (Chapter 4) are even more restrictive: The person acquiring by continuous possession must be exercising physical control with the intention to do so like an owner (owner-possessor): mere limited-right-possessors and possession-agents are not able to acquire the movable by continuous possession.

The analysis of the different categories of persons exercising physical control over a movable which have to be addressed in the different chapters mentioned above leads to the conclusion that three different categories have to be distinguished:

Owner-possessors (OPs): are persons exercising physical control over a movable (themselves or through a third person) with the intention of doing so like an owner – as e.g. owners, thieves, acquirers in good faith and acquirers by prescription (= continuous possession).

Limited-right-possessors (LRPs): are persons exercising physical control over a movable (themselves or through a third person) with the intention of doing so in their own interest and also for the owner-possessor as indirect possessor (e.g. the owner), based on a specific legal relationship between them and the owner-possessor which gives them the right to hold the movable (e.g. a contract of lease, a limited right in rem as usufruct). In other situations, the 'own interest' of the LRP is not so obvious: as for instance where the LRP is a storage company that stores goods for the owner. Here the interest of the owner-possessor is dominating, the LRP's interest in holding the goods is reduced to the interest in getting the agreed price paid for the storage. In some cases both types of limited-right-possessors need to be protected against dispossession and interference with their physical control in the same way as owner-possessors (recovery of goods, protection order, reparation for damage caused by another).

Possession-agents (PAs): are persons exercising physical control over goods with the sole intention of doing so for the owner-possessor (e.g. the owner) or the limited-right-possessor (e.g. the lessee), but without a particular own interest and without a particular legal relationship with respect to this movable – as e.g. employees or finders in good faith on their way to deliver the movable to the owner or competent institution, which will search for the owner. These persons are acting exclusively on behalf of the respective OP or LRP. They can, for instance, take delivery for the possessor (the transferee), or can exercise physical control for or rather of the possessor, in other circumstances. But, in the absence of any own interest in holding the movable, possession agents will not be qualified as 'possessors' themselves. They are only the 'long arm' of the two other categories of possessors, OP and LRP. Thus no particular possession protection under Chapter 6 is granted to them. PAs will be only allowed to exercise immediate self-help (VIII.–6:202) as a 'third person' against a person who takes away the goods or otherwise interferes with them.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Protection of possession as temporary legal regime. The particular rules on possession and its legal protection can be best characterised as a temporary order, a preliminary form of regulation and protection of the exercise of power over goods, as opposed to the regulation of ownership, which constitutes, by contrast, a permanent order based on the universal power of the owner over an object (usus, fructus, abusus). The aim of the latter is the definite resolution of all disputes over the right of ownership.

Falling-apart of ownership and actual physical control. The regulation of possession as a separate legal category follows from the fact that the position of a person exercising actual physical control over a movable does not necessarily coincide with the position of the owner. This causes a split between the position of ownership and the position of possession. This is perfectly consistent, if one takes into account the fact that the actual physical control over the object is not a prerequisite to the right of ownership, though a consequence of the powers accorded to the owner by law.

Illustration 1
Farmer A leases to neighbour B a mowing machine for a period of six months and delivers it to B.

Illustration 2
A receives a loan from B and as security creates a pledge in B's favour in a precious diamond ring A which A has inherited. A delivers the ring to B.

Illustration 3
A sells and delivers a car to B. The contract of sale is invalid, which is unknown to A and B. B continuous to possess the movable.

Illustration 4
B is A's driver and, for the performance of the duties of the employment, A has provided B with a car, as well as all necessary tools and products for its usual maintenance.

Illustration 5
A loses her wristwatch while taking a walk in the City Park; B finds the lost wristwatch.

Special function and character of remedies which protect possession. In the illustrations above, B is in actual physical control of the movable, but is not the owner of the movable. B can hold the movable for various reasons, for a shorter or a longer period of time, depending on the particular constellation. In most legal systems in Europe, B's factual position, the exercise of actual control over the movable, which may or may not be based on a particular right to hold the movable, is accorded special protection against third persons who dispossess B or otherwise interfere with B's possession. This protection is generally granted to possessor B irrespective of B's legal entitlement or proprietary right to hold the movable. This protection is, in some legal systems, also extended to avert unlawful interferences with B's possession by the owner (owner-possessor) personally, if B has a right to hold the movable (e.g. under a lease contract). The special protection remedies based on possession (see Chapter 6) are usually quick remedies, because they do not require an examination of the underlying proprietary rights. Their aim is to protect peaceful possession and to provide a quick – albeit legally controlled – reaction to stop unlawful interferences with a peaceful position of physical control over goods. The rules on protection of possession facilitate the continuous financial exploitation of movables by giving the possessors quick remedies at hand which they can use to defend their position, instead of having to have recourse to time-consuming litigation based on proof of ownership. The remedies which protect possession are something in-between self-help and the remedies based on rights in rem (e.g. ownership): They are much quicker than the latter, but – unlike the former – they are based on a formal procedure administered by the state (most often through the court system) and cannot be exercised by the individual alone.

C. Comparative overview

Notion of possession. The notion of possession is common to all European legal systems. Although differences may appear from system to system, the concept of possession in all of them attaches to the factum of exercising actual physical control over a movable; the existence of a particular right to do so is in this respect irrelevant. Possession in most legal systems consists of two elements: the corpus-element, relating to the actual physical control exercised over the movable, and the animus-element, which refers to the intention with which the possessor exercises physical control: the possessor may have the intention to behave with respect to the movable like an owner (e.g. the thief or the buyer under an invalid sales contract) or the intention to make use of the movable in accordance with a limited right with respect to the movable (e.g. a proprietary security right or a usufruct, or a contractual right arising out of a contract of lease or storage). The different types of intention constitute different types of possession.

Different types of possession and 'detention'. The limited-right-possessor and the possession-agent of these model rules are commonly known in most legal systems as 'detainer' or 'detentor' (détenteur, Inhaber), as e.g. in France, Belgium, Italy, Austria, Greece. In Germany, a distinction is made between the indirect and the direct possessor (mittelbarer und unmittelbarer Besitzer). The German 'direct possessor', when possessing for an indirect possessor (e.g. owner), corresponds to the 'detainer' of the above mentioned systems. German law distinguishes two types of direct possessors (Besitzmittler und Besitzdiener), which roughly correspond to the LRP and PA of this Book. The Common Law systems include LRPs, PAs and OPs in a general notion of possession. In most legal systems, the notion of the possession-agent can also be found in a context similar to the one regulated by the present rules, namely with a minimum of rights with respect to the object.

D. General notion of direct and indirect possession – the corpus element

Direct or indirect physical control (paragraph (1)). Preceding the provisions on the respective categories or types of possession, a general definition of possession is provided, so as to stress the main aspect of the notion, which is found in all forms of possession, namely the exercise of physical control over a movable, either in a direct or in an indirect manner (by means of persons qualifying as LRPs). This is the corpus element of possession, the physical element of the notion, which can be traced in a tangible manner and is always present, irrespective of the intention of the possessor.

The definition clarifies the possibility of exercising physical control over a movable by means of others. Thus, possession can be functionally organised on several levels, i.e. an owner-possessor still exercises control over the movable and is in (indirect) possession, when a limited-right-possessor (e.g. a lessee) in turn exercises control over the movable by means of the LRP's own (sub-)limited-right-possessor or possession-agent, e.g. in case of a sub-lease.

A distinction must be made between 'having physical control' (see VIII.–1:205 paragraph (1)) and 'exercising physical control' (see VIII.–1:205 paragraphs (2) and (3)): Possession always means to 'have' physical control (paragraph (1)) and to 'exercise' it in some way: directly or indirectly through another person. There are only two types of persons who qualify as 'possessors' in the sense of 'having control': owner-possessors (OPs, VIII.–1:206) and limited-right-possessors (LRPs, VIII.–1:207), whereas 'possession-agents' (PAs, VIII.–1:208) never have control themselves. They are not 'possessors' in the legal sense. They only 'exercise' possession on behalf of a possessor (OP or LRP).

Direct possession (paragraph (2)). Paragraph (2) defines 'direct possession' as physical control exercised either by the 'direct' possessor in person (e.g. owner A holds the goods personally, they are on A's premises) or by a different person, a possession-agent (PA), on the direct possessor's behalf (e.g. B who is possessor A's driver takes A's car to X for repair). It is true that in the second case – from a physical point of view ('corpus') – the actual physical control is with B (PA) and not with A (owner). However, B exercises this control without any independent purpose or interest, B is only the 'long arm' of owner A. In the absence of any independent 'animus' on the side of B, there is no need to attribute any legal relevance to the fact that possession-agent B is holding the goods instead of owner A personally. The legal concept of possession which triggers some legal consequences of its own does not have to be extended to B where B is only acting on behalf of A. The legal institution of possession as well as its legal consequences have to be attributed to A alone. Thus, where a possession-agent is holding the movable, the movable is not in 'possession' of the PA in the legal sense, but is still in direct possession of the person on behalf of whom the PA is holding the movable.

Indirect possession and 'co-possession' (paragraph (3)). One can distinguish the following situations in which direct and indirect possession with respect to the same movable co-exist:

> OP in indirect possession, while LRP is in direct possession: in physical control personally or PA in physical control which is attributed as direct control to the LRP.
>
> OP in indirect possession, while LRP is also in indirect possession, and the LRP's sub-LRP is in direct possession.

The respective chains of LRPs and PAs after the OP could also be longer: as for instance OP, first LRP, sub-LRP, PA of sub-LRP in direct possession.

It is important to note that in all cases of indirect possession two or more persons are in 'possession' (in 'co-possession') of the goods. 'Co-possession' here does not designate the same as the German term 'Mitbesitz' which means possession by two possessors of the same rank.

E. Mandatory character of the rules

The rules on possession as set out above are clearly of a mandatory nature. If they were ius dispositivum and the parties could depart from them by stipulations in their contract, this would create a great deal of uncertainty within all fields of law in which the notion of possession is needed: protection of ownership and possession, transfer of ownership, good faith acquisition, acquisition by continuous possession. In order to avoid these uncertainties, the rules must be of a mandatory character.

VIII.–1:206: Possession by owner-possessor

An "owner-possessor" is a person who exercises direct or indirect physical control over the goods with the intention of doing so as, or as if, an owner.

COMMENTS

The required intention of the owner-possessor (OP) is the intention to exercise physical control as, or as if, an owner. The definition abides by what is commonly perceived as "possession" throughout most of the European legal systems. Two prerequisites must be met: the exercise of physical control over the object, commonly known as the corpus-element, and the intention of the person to exercise this control as or like an owner, which is the animus-element. The formulation "as, or as if, an owner" was preferred to the alternative formulation "as an owner" to stress the fact that the person exercising the control need not necessarily be the owner: also the thief or a buyer without a valid contract is an OP. The aim of possession regulation in all the examined legal systems has always been to regulate the actual physical power over the object, irrespective of the relevant legal relationships. Consequently, the decisive element is whether the OP considers himself or herself to be the owner, either in bad or in good faith. The element of good faith will be crucial with respect to a series of further matters, like the OP's possibility to acquire ownership by means of good faith acquisition (Chapter 3) or by acquisition by continuous possession (Chapter 4).

OPs often do not exercise physical control themselves but through another person who exercises this physical control for them. This is clarified in the text of the Article. The rules of Book VIII distinguish between two categories of persons acting 'for' the owner-possessor:

> The possession-agent (PA), mentioned in VIII.–1:205 paragraph (2) and defined in VIII.–1:208, 'possesses' only on behalf of the OP (as direct possessor) without any interest of his or her own in holding the movable. Therefore, the PA's physical control is completely attributed to the owner-possessor who is held to be in 'direct' physical control (direct possession) – in the legal sense.
>
> The limited-right-possessor (LRP), mentioned in VIII.–1:205 paragraph (3) and defined in VIII.–1:207, on the other hand, possesses the movable 'for' the owner-possessor only in so far as the LRP respects the owner's superior proprietary right in the movable in general, but has an interest of his or her own in the possession of the movable, which is very strong in the case of a lessee, and less strong in the case of a storage company or the like. Direct possession by an LRP and indirect possession by the owner-possessor at the same time is, therefore, the typical case of indirect possession by an OP (see also above Comments).

VIII.–1:207: Possession by limited-right-possessor

(1) A "limited-right-possessor" is a person who exercises physical control over the goods either:

(a) with the intention of doing so in that person's own interest, and under a specific legal relationship with the owner-possessor which gives the limited-right-possessor the right to possess the goods; or

(b) with the intention of doing so to the order of the owner-possessor, and under a specific contractual relationship with the owner-possessor which gives the limited-right-possessor a right to retain the goods until any charges or costs have been paid by the owner-possessor.

(2) A limited-right-possessor may have direct physical control or indirect physical control over the goods.

COMMENTS

A. The limited-right-possessor

The limited-right-possessor (LRP) is a person holding the movable on the basis of a legal bond with the owner-possessor, which also shapes the LRP's intention to hold the movable (the animus-element of the possession). The legal relationship gives the LRP a 'right to possess' the movable or a 'right to retain' the movable. The LRP's intention is limited to the right the LRP exercises with respect to movable, and not comparatively unrestricted like the OP's intention to exercise all the powers of an owner. The LRP intends to use the movable in accordance with this (limited) right in his or her own interest or to the order of the OP and, at the same time, to hold the movable "for the owner-possessor". Holding "for the owner possessor" means that the LRP acknowledges the OP's right in the movable and does not want to hold the movable with the animus of an OP in the sense of VIII.–1:206.

B. Requirements of limited-right-possession

Thus, the notion of limited-right-possession requires three things: the corpus element consisting of direct or indirect possession according to VIII.–1:205; the existence of a specific legal or contractual relationship that gives the LRP a valid right to possess or retain the movable in relation to the owner-possessor; and an intention of the LRP to hold the movable in the LRP's own interest or to the order of the OP (animus-element).

C. Two types of limited-right-possessors

The 'classical' limited-right-possessor is described in (a) This covers the holder of a proprietary (pledge, proprietary right to draw fruits or to use otherwise, lease in some systems) or obligatory (lease in other systems) right to possess and use the movable in a limited way in the LRP's own interest. This right may arise out of a contractual relationship with the owner or out of a legal relationship with the owner created by operation of law. The LRP at the same time respects the superior right of ownership of the indirect OP. This right of ownership is, however, not superior when it comes to the question of who should be in direct possession of or eventually use the goods. The question of the right to possess and eventually use the goods is answered by the specific legal relationship between OP and LRP. This specific contractual (or other) right to possess (and use) the goods has priority over the OP's right of ownership.

A second type of LRP is described in (b). In cases of storage by warehouses and the like the LRP has a right to possess the goods, the right arising from a contract with the OP. But this contract does not give the LRP the right to use the goods in the LRP's own interest. Therefore, it cannot be said that the LRP of type (b) possesses the goods in his or her own interest. The LRP possesses them mainly 'to the order of the owner-possessor' and keeps and stores them as the owner instructs, in the owner's rather than in the LPR's interest. The only interest the LRP of type (b) has in the possession of the goods is a monetary interest – an interest in being paid for the storage and the costs (or damages) incurred. This interest is expressed in a 'right to retain the goods' until all charges and costs have been paid by the OP. It is clear of course that the LRP of type (b) also respects the superior right of ownership of the indirect OP.

D. Specific legal or contractual relationship

Paragraph (1)(a) and (b) of the Article refer to the existence of a 'specific legal relationship' or 'specific contractual relationship' which gives the LRP the required right to possess (a) or to retain (b) the goods. Such a specific legal (contractual) relationship may be a contract of lease, a usufruct relationship (= right to draw fruits) arising from a contract with the OP or by operation of law, a (possessory) security right as a right in rem (by contract or operation of law), a storage agreement, etc. This legal (contractual) relationship must give the LRP the right to possess the movable (either directly or indirectly, the right may be prorietary or obligatory) or in cases of (b) a right to retain the movable for payment of charges and costs. In certain legal systems (e.g. France, Greece), when the legal relationship is a limited right in rem, there is a further distinction drawn between the (owner-)possessor and the quasi-possessor, whereby the (owner-)possessor possesses with the animus of an owner, whereas the quasi-possessor possesses with the animus of a beneficiary of the respective right in rem. Such a further differentiation would, however, be rather superfluous in the context of the present rules. The position of a "quasi-possessor" is considered to be subordinate to that of the possessor, which also holds true for the limited-right-possessor in the sense of the rules of Book VIII; moreover, both obligatory rights and limited rights in rem to possess a movable lead, though in a different way, to the same result, which is a partial encroachment on the absolute right of ownership. Within the context of Book VIII, there is no need to distinguish between LRPs on the basis of a proprietary right and LRPs on the basis of an obligatory right to possess the movable. Therefore, this differentiation is not pursued further here.

In paragraph (a) cases, the legal bond between the owner-possessor and the limited-right-possessor need not necessarily be restricted to an agreement (contract). The specific legal relationship entitling the LRP to hold the movable may be either an agreement, such as the ones described above, or a relationship created otherwise by law. In the latter case, the LRP may have the right to possess the movable by virtue of an ex lege right of retention or a lien. In paragraph (b) cases, which are mainly storage cases, the relationship is usually a contractual one and the right to hold the goods to the order of the OP is an obligatory right. However, the right to retain the goods once it arises (when the OP does not pay in due time) may be a proprietary security right in the sense of Book IX which gives the LRP also the right to possess and to use the goods in a restricted way in the sense of paragraph (a). In such a case – after the right to retain has come into existence and is exercised by the LRP – the LRP has to be qualified as an LRP of type (a).

E. No different legal consequences for LRPs types (a) and (b)

The differentiation between LRPs of type (a) and type (b) does not trigger any different legal consequences in Book VIII. It is made only to be able to define more precisely which persons fall into the category of an LRP and which do not. Within book VIII all LRPs are treated in the same way (see particularly Chapter 6 below).

F. Validity of specific legal (contractual) relationship

In order to constitute limited-right-possession the right of the LRP to possess or eventually retain the movable must really exist. If the underlying legal relationship is invalid and the possessor, therefore, has no right to possess or retain the movable, two constellations are possible:

> The possessor is aware of the fact that there is no valid (limited or absolute) right to possess the movable, but nevertheless intends to hold the movable as if he or she were the owner or LRP of the movable.
>
> The possessor believes that there is a valid limited right to possess the movable and therefore has the intention to hold the movable in accordance with this (putative) right.
>
> Possessors who intend to hold the movable as if they were the owner have, of course, to be qualified as owner-possessors (VIII.–1:206). Possessors who intend to hold the movable like an LRP without having such a limited right to possess or retain should be treated as owner-possessors, by analogy, irrespective of the bad or good faith with respect to the existence of such a right. Just as an OP who is not the owner arrogates – in bad or in good faith – the right to behave like an owner, so the possessor without a limited right to possess arrogates – in bad or good faith – the right to behave like an LRP. Both possessors do not have the right that shapes their intentions. They should be, therefore, treated as the same category of possessors (OPs).

G. Protection of LRPs

In accordance with the majority view among legal systems, LRPs, having a right to hold or retain the movable and an interest of their own to do so, should benefit from better means of protection of their physical control over the movable than a mere "possession-agent" (VIII.–1:208) who also has physical control of the movable but without a right and an interest of his or her own to do so. I. e. LRPs should be partly afforded the same legal protection as owners and owner-possessors (see Chapter 6 below). Therefore, a distinction between LRPs and PAs has to be made in the definitions section.

H. 'Direct' and 'indirect' limited-right-possession

Paragraph (2) of the Article refers to the possibility of 'direct' and 'indirect' possession of the respective type. An LRP can exercise possession 'directly' by holding the goods personally or through a possession-agent (PA). If the LRP hands the goods over to a second LRP (sub-LRP) with whom LRP 1 has a specific legal relationship in the sense of VIII.–1:207, LRP 1 will be 'indirect' possessor of the goods, while LRP 2 (the sub-LRP) will be 'direct' possessor. Thus, the goods have two indirect possessors, LRP 1 and OP, and one direct possessor, LRP 2.

Another case of 'indirect' possession can be seen in the following facts. LRP 1 and LRP 2 conclude a separate contract each with the OP. Both contracts qualify as specific legal relationships in the sense of VIII.–1:207. For instance, LRP 2 has a contract with the OP granting a security right to LRP 2. LRP 1 may hold a security right in the same movable. There may or may not be an additional legal relationship between LRP 1 and LRP 2 which provides that LRP 2 holds the movable also for LRP 1. If there is, then LRP 2 has the intention to possess the movable partly for the 'indirect' possessor LRP 1. Thus, the goods have two indirect possessors, LRP 1 and OP, and one direct possessor, LRP 2. If LRP 2, who has a legal relationship only with the OP, does not know of LRP 1, then LRP 2 is the LRP of the OP, not of LRP 1. In this case, the intention ('animus') of LRP 2 does not include LRP 1 and so LRP 2 cannot hold the goods for LRP 1. LRP 1 is not in possession of the goods.

Illustration 6
B leases the movable from the OP A and then subleases it to C. In this case B as well as C have to be seen as LRPs in the sense of VIII.–1:207. B is an 'indirect' LRP, because he exercises his physical control through another LRP, namely C. For C to qualify as an LRP it is sufficient to have a specific legal relationship to LRP B which gives him the right to hold the movable in his own interest. A direct relationship to OP A is not required. C has the intention to hold the movable for B, and may, if he has the respective knowledge, have the intention to hold the movable for A as well. For A to be in indirect possession, a chain of sub-LRPs suffices. The later sub-LRPs in the chain only have to have the intention to possess for their respective contract partner (the former LRP), not for OP A.

Illustration 7
B stores the movable of possessor A. The movable is in the actual physical control of B's employee C, and not in B's own actual physical control. In this case B has to be seen as an LRP and C as a PA. B is a "direct" LRP, because she exercises her physical control through another person, namely C, who is not an LRP, but a PA.

Illustration 8
A is the owner of a motorcycle and he rents it simultaneously to B and C. Only one of them can acquire possession in the form of physical control over the motorcycle. If A delivers the motorcycle to B, B is the LRP of the movable. C is no LRP because he only has the right to possess the movable, but has no possession (corpus).

Illustration 9
A is the owner of a motorcycle, he rents it to B and at the same time he grants a security right in the motorcycle to C, informing both B of the security right in the motorcycle, and C that B – as the lessee of A – holds the motorcycle. B as a lessee is the LRP of the movable, A is the OP of the movable. Depending on the relationship to B (and A), C is either no possessor, because he does not have possession (corpus), or C is 'indirect' possessor (LRP), because B also holds the movable for C. In this case B has the intention (animus) to hold the movable also for LRP C. Thus, C is the LRP of the movable with respect to the OP, B is also LRP with respect to the OP, but at the same time he is also the direct LRP of indirect LRP C, because B exercises his possession not only for the OP A, but also for the LRP C.

Illustration 10
A grants a security right in her golden necklace to B and hands it over to B. Later on, A grants a security right in the same necklace to C and informs him that B holds the necklace. The solution is the same as in illustration 9. A is the OP of the movable, B is the direct LRP. C can be qualified as indirect LRP only in case B also holds the movable for C (animus).

VIII.–1:208: Possession through a possession-agent

(1) A "possession-agent" is a person:

(a) who exercises direct physical control over the goods on behalf of an owner-possessor or limited-right-possessor without the intention and specific legal relationship required under Article VIII.–1:207 (Possession by limited-right-possessor) paragraph (1); and

(b) to whom the owner-possessor or limited-right-possessor may give binding instructions as to the use of the goods in the interest of the owner-possessor or limited-right-possessor.

(2) A possession-agent may, in particular, be:

(a) an employee of the owner-possessor or limited-right-possessor or a person exercising a similar function; or

(b) a person who is given physical control over the goods by the owner-possessor or limited-right-possessor for practical reasons.

(3) A person is also a possession-agent where that person is accidentally in a position to exercise, and does exercise, direct physical control over the goods for an owner-possessor or limited-right-possessor.

COMMENTS

A. The 'animus' or intention of a possession-agent (PA).

The possession-agent is a person who exercises physical control over a movable, this control being completely attributed to the OP or LRP for whom the PA holds the movable. The PA who holds the movable creates direct possession in the OP or LRP for whom the PA acts. The reason for this complete attribution of the PA's physical control to the OP or LRP is the lack of any interest of the PA to possess the movable. Decisive for the qualification of a person exercising physical control over a movable ('corpus') as PA is again the intention of this person, in combination with the non-existence of a specific legal relationship in the sense of VIII.–1:207.

The PA must have the intention to exercise the physical control 'on behalf' of an OP or LRP and must not have an intention referring to any personal interest in holding the movable, as described in VIII.–1:207 or in VIII.–1:206.

B. Absence of specific legal relationship in the sense of VIII.–1:207.

In addition the PA may or may not be acting in accordance with a legal relationship with the OP (LRP), for instance a contract of employment. But this legal relationship should certainly not be a legal relationship in the sense of VIII.–1:207 paragraph (1): i.e. not a 'specific legal relationship' referring to the question of possession of the particular movable and creating the possessor's right to possess (and use) or right to retain the movable in the possessor's own interest.

C. Optional element of 'binding instructions'.

It is very often the case that the PA receives binding instructions on how to keep and use the goods in the interest of the OP or LRP. But this is not a requirement for qualification as PA. The mentioning of these instructions in paragraph (1)(b) has the same purpose as the exemplary list in paragraph (2) – to describe typical cases of PAs in order to clarify which different types of persons may qualify as PAs (while always meeting the requirements of paragraph (1)(a)).

D. Exemplary list in paragraph (2).

Paragraph (2) of the Article contains an exemplary, non-exhaustive, list of typical categories of PAs.

Paragraph (a) refers to employees and those exercising a similar role. The PA is often integrated in the sphere of influence of the OP or the LRP (e.g. household, business, etc.) as an employee or in a similar function. This means that the PA does some work for the OP or LRP and, for purposes of accomplishing the tasks, needs to be in physical control of certain movables belonging to the OP or LRP. There may be a legal relationship between the OP or LRP and the PA, like a contract of employment. In performance of the duties under this contract, the PA exercises physical control over certain goods of the OP or LRP. Such a legal relationship must not be confused with the 'specific legal relationship' described in VIII.–1:207 paragraph (1). This latter relationship is 'specific' because it has as its object the question of possession, use or retention of a particular movable. The legal relationships that may exist under paragraph (2)(a) of the present Article are much more general: they do not have as their sole content the possession of a particular movable.

If somebody employs a driver and gives the driver a car so as to perform her duties according to her employment contract, the car cannot be considered the object of a right on behalf of the driver. The case is different if a particular contract has been concluded between the OP (or LRP) and the person in physical control concerning the use of the object –. if e.g. a lease agreement exists between the employer and the driver (whereby the rental fee could consist in a reduced salary for the driver) which allows the driver to use the car also for her private purposes. Then the driver, when using the car for her private purposes, must not be considered as a PA, but as an LRP.

Paragraph (b) refers to persons who are for whatever reasons in the vicinity of the OP's or LRP's goods and are given physical control for practical reasons, without any closer relationship of integration to the household or business of the OP or LRP. For instance, the owner of a sick cat asks her neighbour or friend X, who happens to drop by her house in the morning, to take the cat to the vet. When he does so, X is the PA of the cat.

E. Persons in physical control of the goods by coincidence (paragraph (3)).

Paragraph (3), in fact, adds another case to the exemplary list commenced in paragraph (2). A person may come into contact with a movable and start to exercise physical control over it merely by chance. This describes the case of a finder in good faith who does not have the intention to keep the movable as if the owner (OP) but simply wants to keep the movable temporarily in the interest of its owner, whom the finder does not know yet. By holding the movable for the owner, the finder (PA) conveys 'direct' possession of the movable to the owner. Before the movable is found by such a good faith finder, the owner does not possess the movable (lack of direct or indirect physical control).

F. No ‘indirect’ possession-agents.

The PA can only be in direct physical control, no indirect version of a ‘possession-agency’ exists. In the normal case, the PA will have direct physical control of the movable (which is actually considered as the OP’s or LRP’s direct possession, the PA is not personally in possession). As soon as the PA’s ‘possession-agency’ is terminated, whether by the unlawful intrusion of a third person or by or with the consent of the OP or the LRP, the PA’s relationship to the movable is terminated as well. In another type of case, the PA, who is e.g. the employee of the OP (or the LRP), may leave the movable for safekeeping or storage for some time, thus surrendering physical control to the keeper or the person storing the movable. The safekeeping or storage company will exercise direct physical control over the movable in the sense of VIII.–1:207 (LRP), while the PA is no longer PA with respect to the movable. The company acts as the LRP of the OP or LRP and not of the (former) PA. The same applies when the PA hands the goods over to another PA – the PA of the OP or the PA of another person to whom the OP has sold the goods: The possession-agency of the first PA is terminated: now the possession of the OP or the new owner (buyer) is constituted by the physical control of the second PA.

Section 3: Further general rules

VIII.–1:301: Transferability

(1) All goods are transferable except where provided otherwise by law. A limitation or prohibition of the transfer of goods by a contract or other juridical act does not affect the transferability of the goods.

(2) Whether or to what extent uncollected fruits of, and accessories or appurtenances to, goods or immovable assets are transferable separately is regulated by national law. Chapter 5 remains unaffected.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the Article. This Article is the only provision of Section 3, which provides further general rules applicable to the whole of Book VIII. It addresses the issue of transferability, i.e. the question of whether parties can, provided they fulfil all requirements set forth by the relevant rules of law, bring about a transfer of ownership, or another mode of validly acquiring ownership of the goods (such as good faith acquisition under Chapter 3). "Transferability" of the goods is listed as one of the general transfer requirements in paragraph (1)(b) of the basic transfer rule in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general). In part, namely in addressing the question of whether goods "linked" to immovable property are transferable separately, i.e. without also transferring the property of the immovable asset, paragraph (2) of the present Article also touches the issue of how to delimit movable from immovable assets.

B. Transferability in general (paragraph (1))

General rule: all goods are transferable. The general policy of this Article is to ensure that goods may be kept in circulation. Barring goods from the market is considered to run against the general economic interests of society. Exceptions may only apply where substantive reasons of public policy so require. Such exceptions must, therefore, be provided by law.

Exceptions provided by law. As indicated, substantive reasons of public policy may require providing exceptions from the general rule of transferability of goods. If so, exceptions may be provided by law. Such reasons may, e.g., be rooted in piety and ethics, such as a traditional rule exempting res sacrae from commerce. Or, the reason may lie in particular dangers emerging from the goods, which may be the case, e.g., regarding drugs, specific weapons or nuclear material. Whether and to what extent the transfer of such goods should be prohibited is a matter of national law, primarily national public law. Transferability may be excluded in general, or there may be certain restrictions.

Exceptions provided by parties ineffective. Pursuant to the general policy of maximum transferability sentence 2 of paragraph (1) provides that contractual limitations or prohibitions of alienation do not affect the transferability of the goods. The same applies to prohibitions or restrictions of alienations provided by a unilateral juridical act where the transfer is based on such act. This means that such clauses have no effect with regard to the validity of the acquisition made by the acquirer, nor any effect against third parties. Where a clause of nonalienation has been agreed upon but ownership is nevertheless transferred, the transfer as such is valid. The effect such agreement may have inter partes is, however, not addressed by the present Article, but is a matter for contract law to decide. The transferee may, therefore, be obliged to pay damages to the party entitled under the non-alienation agreement.

Although the approach, as a general policy, is quite clear, sentence 2 is not intended to deal with effects on enforcement, cf. I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(h)). This issue has been stressed with regard to donations: in some legal systems, the donee's creditors are not entitled to take enforcement measures against property subject to such a restraint. It is for the national enforcement law to decide whether enforcement can be effectively made in such a situation.

C. Transferability of goods linked to other assets (paragraph (2))

General approach: reference to national law. Paragraph (2) provides that, generally, the question of whether or to what extent uncollected fruits of, and accessories or appurtenances to, goods or immovable assets are transferable separately is regulated by national law. All cases covered by this rule have in common that, in one way or the other, a "link" between the asset in question and another asset exists, so that the question arises whether the one can be transferred independently from the other. Uncollected fruits are items not yet separated from their "mother-item". The terms "accessories" and "appurtenances" may overlap and there is no need to define them strictly for the purposes of this Book. They intend to address, first, a strong physical combination between these two items (perhaps best described by "accession"), as well as "combinations" which are merely created by the owner's will or dedication ("appurtenances"). The latter may, in particular, appear in relation to immovable property, e.g. a tractor being dedicated by the farmer to belong to the farm. An example for a link in a physical sense could be water pipes built into a house. Uncollected fruits are, e.g., a crop standing on the field, growing timber in a forest etc. (both becoming movable assets at least in the future). National legal systems partly draw different borderlines regarding these issues. Where the question is on the "link" between an asset and an immovable asset, there is a general policy within these model rules not to touch such issues (cf. I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(f)). This approach is followed by leaving the question to national law. In general, i.e. also with respect to movable assets, leaving these issues to national law matches with the general rules on this Book's scope of application, which excludes some forms of acquisition which probably would be of importance in the present context, namely acquisition of ownership by separation and by occupation (cf. VIII.–1:101 (Scope of application) paragraphs (2)(c) and (g)).

Reservation for Chapter 5. Facts constituting "accession" may also fall within the scope of the rules of Chapter 5 on production, combination and commingling. The rules of that Chapter are intended to be conclusive in the sense that they spell out all effects of such events which may be relevant for the question of transferability. The result will either be sole ownership or co-ownership of the resulting item or unit, both types of rights being transferable; cf. VIII.–1:202 (Ownership) and VIII.–1:203 (Co-ownership). In this respect, no restriction or reference to national law is needed.

CHAPTER 2: TRANSFER OF OWNERSHIP BASED ON THE TRANSFEROR'S RIGHT OR AUTHORITY

Section 1: Requirements for transfer under this Chapter

VIII.–2:101: Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general

(1) The transfer of ownership of goods under this Chapter requires that:

(a) the goods exist;

(b) the goods are transferable;

(c) the transferor has the right or authority to transfer the ownership;

(d) the transferee is entitled as against the transferor to the transfer of ownership by virtue of a contract or other juridical act, a court order or a rule of law; and

(e) there is an agreement as to the time ownership is to pass and the conditions of this agreement are met, or, in the absence of such agreement, delivery or an equivalent to delivery.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1)(e) the delivery or equivalent to delivery must be based on, or referable to, the entitlement under the contract or other juridical act, court order or rule of law.

(3) Where the contract or other juridical act, court order or rule of law defines the goods in generic terms, ownership can pass only when the goods are identified to it. Where goods form part of an identified bulk, VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) applies.

(4) Paragraph (1)(e) does not apply where ownership passes under a court order or rule of law at the time determined in it.

COMMENTS

A. General

(a) Preliminary introduction

Brief introduction to subject matter, function and scope of this Article. This Article comprises the basic rule for the transfer of "ownership" as regulated by Chapter 2 of this Book, which in turn constitutes the central subject matter of Book VIII as such. "Transfer" in the sense used here is a form of "derivative" acquisition: An existing right of ownership, relating to goods, passes from one person to another person. The transferor is either the owner of the goods, or a person having the authority to dispose of the goods (cf. the title of Chapter 2: transfer of ownership based on the transferor's right or authority). Such transfer may be based on a contract for sale, which will be the most important field of application in practice, and will often operate as the paradigmatic case when discussing these model rules; or it may be based on other types of contract, like barter, or donation. But the scope of the provision goes further, encompassing transfers based on a court order or a rule of law, such as an obligation to return goods under unjustified enrichment principles or an obligation to transfer goods resulting from benevolent intervention in another's affairs. Hence, the present Article and Chapter 2 as a whole serve an important function of completing major other parts of these model rules, bringing about the ultimate effect towards which many obligations created by contract as well as by operation of law are directed, namely the transfer of property of the goods concerned. Within Chapter 2 as such, this Article serves as a basic rule setting forth all major requirements for a transfer of ownership. The other Articles of this Chapter specify these basic principles further with regard to the requirements (Section 1) or effects (Section 2) of a transfer, or address particular issues arising in special transfer situations (Section 3).

Impact of registration under national law. Book VIII does not create a system of registration for the purposes of a transfer of ownership. It does, however, accept that national legislation partly has established, or may yet establish, such provisions. The general approach taken by Book VIII is that where national law establishes a registration system which concerns the right of ownership and the transfer of ownership (in contrast to registration merely for administrative purposes) and the register is publicly accessible, irrespective of whether registration is obligatory or optional, the effects of such registration "have priority over the respective rules of this Book"; see VIII.–1:102 (Registration of goods) paragraph (2). This does not mean that Chapter 2 of this Book is automatically excluded as a whole. The national rules have priority over the rules of Chapter 2 only where the effects of these national rules and those of the present Chapter are incompatible. In particular, it may be provided that the transfer of goods subject to the relevant registration system in general, or once the respective item has been registered there, can only be effected by an act of registration, by which paragraph (1)(e) of the present Article as well as Articles VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass) to VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) would be rendered ineffective. The issue is further discussed in the Comments on VIII.–1:102 (Registration of goods).

Terminology. The parties referred to in the present Article and throughout the whole Chapter 2 are the "transferor" on the one side and the "transferee" on the other. These two terms are neutral, deliberately avoiding any implications of particular types of contracts (like "seller" and "buyer"), focussing on the central effect under property law, namely the transfer (and acquisition) of title. The transferee is the one who acquires the ownership of the goods by virtue of the rules set out in this Chapter. The transferor, on the other hand, may be the owner of the property who undertakes to transfer the property to the transferee and effects this transfer by virtue of the owner's right to dispose (cf. VIII.–1:203 (Ownership)). But this is not necessarily so: also a person who does not "own" the property in the sense of the named Article, but has authority to dispose of it (which may, e.g., have been granted by the owner or by a rule of law) is understood as being the "transferor" in the sense of this Article (for more details, see Comment H below). Another term deserving preliminary explanation at this stage is the "entitlement to the transfer of ownership" in the sense of paragraph (1)(d) of this Article. One may briefly describe this "entitlement" of the transferee as the mirror image of the transferor's obligation to transfer ownership, the term "obligation" having been avoided in the black letter text for reasons discussed below (Comment H). It is important not to mix up this concept of the transferee's "entitlement" with the transferor's "right or authority to transfer the ownership" in the sense of paragraph (1)(c) of this Article. The latter refers to the basic principle nemo dat quod non habet, i.e. to a requirement relating to the transferor alone; the former addresses the legal bond between the two parties. The concept of an "agreement as to the time ownership is to pass" in the sense of paragraph (1)(e) of this Article most probably is self-explaining. Practically, such agreement may relate to a point in time after delivery (in particular: the time of payment of the purchase price where the parties have stipulated for a retention of ownership in the traditional sense) as well as to a time before delivery, e.g. the moment of the conclusion of the underlying contract itself (cf. the traditional concept of a constitutum possessorium available in most countries following a delivery principle).

"Delivery" means an act directed towards a transfer of property where the goods themselves are moved; "equivalents to delivery", on the other hand, are acts to the same effect where the goods themselves are not moved. As to details, see the Comments on VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) and VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery).

(b) Comparative background: main differences

General. The starting points for the rules on transfer of "ownership" in the European legal systems have significant differences, and these discrepancies occur on several levels. These are briefly introduced in the subsequent Comments, the focus being confined to basically describing the different concepts as such. Closer comparative information in the sense of discussing which concept has been adopted in which particular legal system(s) is provided in the Notes to this Article.

Unitary transfer approach versus functional approach. One crucial distinction, although hardly reflected on in large parts of Europe, relates to the question what exactly passes under the relevant property law rules. In most European countries, one will find rules defining the right of ownership (comparable to the definition in VIII.–1:202 (Ownership)) and, second, rules defining a particular moment in time when this right of ownership passes from the transferor (owner) to the transferee. At this very moment in time, all "aspects" related to the right of ownership under the said definition, like the owner's right to recover possession of the property from another person, even if that other person is insolvent (i.e. protection as against that other person's general creditors), the right to legally dispose of the goods in the sense of alienating them or creating limited proprietary rights in them, the right to use, alter or consume the goods and related rights to claim damages or the reversal of an unjustified enrichment from a third party interfering with these rights, pass to the transferee. Such an approach may be called a "unitary" approach, meaning that one moment in time is decisive in many relations. This kind of approach certainly is the predominant starting point in "continental" European legal systems. As to the practical effects, the same description essentially may be given in relation to English law, although common law basically does without a tradition of defining a "right of ownership", and certain central concepts, such as a right of revindication, do not exist. However, the scope of this unitary approach is not necessarily the same in all these European legal systems: e.g., in some countries, risk, as a rule, passes with property whereas in others it does not. Also, some effects which would, in principle, follow from a clear cut unitary rule are often counteracted by specific provisions, such as by providing the transferor of unpaid goods with a right to retain, or a statutory lien, where "ownership" already passes with the conclusion of a contract for sale.

The Nordic countries, on the other hand, deliberately do not adhere to such a "unitary" way of thinking. Their laws follow a "functional" approach, which is based on the assumption that the various aspects of what one could describe as "ownership" can pass independently from one another at different points in time. For one aspect, the conclusion of the underlying contract may be decisive, for another one, delivery or payment of the price may be. Who has the "right of ownership" is actually considered to be of no importance. Rather, emphasis is placed on distinguishing different types of conflicts, such as the question of whether and as of which time a buyer of goods is protected against the seller's general creditors in case the latter becomes insolvent; or whether or under which conditions a seller is protected against the buyer's general creditors in case payment of the purchase price has not been made; or whether and under which preconditions the original "owner" of goods has a right to recover the goods from a person having bought these goods from a third person who was not authorised to dispose of them. A person may have a "better right" in one conflict against another person, but lose a conflict in another relation. The rules on the transfer of these various "aspects" and different conflict situations are partly laid down in specific statutory provisions, but have mostly been developed by court practice and legal writing by taking into account existing (often fragmentary) legislation and, first and foremost, by weighing the different interests involved in the specific conflict situation.

Transfer by delivery versus "consensual" transfer. The next difference, which is usually the one primarily discussed, is that in some countries, the transfer of the right, in principle, requires a transfer of possession (delivery), whereas in other legal systems, the conclusion of the underlying contract – paradigmatically: a contract for sale – itself suffices. The latter concept is often referred to as the "consensual" system, which term will also be used for the purpose of discussion within these Comments, although it does not fit well where the entitlement to transfer is not created by contract (i.e., by consensus of the parties) but by other means, such as by operation of law as in the case of unjustified enrichment. However, it seems that the concept of an immediate transfer at the moment an entitlement other than arising by contract (or other juridical act) comes into existence is hardly ever applied in the European legal systems (except in some contexts of the law of successions). In principle, the question of whether the transfer is effected by delivery or by mere consensus arises on both the unitary and the functional approaches. In the former case, the question is whether "ownership" passes in the one or other way; in the latter, the question may relate to each single "aspect" and may be answered differently in relation to different conflict situations. This brief summary should not create the impression that the conclusion of a contract and delivery are the only possible acts to which a transfer may be tied. There are also other events which may be decisive, for instance the "identification" of generic goods, however defined in detail, which can be seen as a general transfer requirement and, in particular, defers the moment of transfer in relation to generic goods where the transfer generally is "consensual". Theoretically, the moment of payment could also be made decisive, but, as such, scarcely is under the existing European legal systems; it may, however, become relevant if the parties so agree, which is, in fact, frequently done by contracting for a retention of ownership.

Despite the different starting points, certain tendencies of convergence may be observed. It has already been pointed out that where a consensual approach applies, national legislators often regard it as necessary to protect the interests of an unpaid seller by establishing a right to retain or a statutory lien, which gives the transferor a favourable position as long as delivery has not been effected (and partly, rights to retake possession are granted even after delivery has been made). In practice, also the requirement of identification frequently aligns the transfer of generic goods with the moment of delivery. Further, consensual systems such as French law traditionally accept certain third party effects only upon delivery, in particular where it comes to multiple transfers to different transferees. It is also noteworthy that the possession vaut titre principle has great importance in consensual systems, but this is not the same in delivery systems. In countries following the principle of transfer by delivery, on the other hand, it is usually accepted that the parties to the transaction may agree on a transfer before delivery, even on a transfer at the moment the underlying contract itself is concluded, by stipulating for a so-called constitutum possessorium (i.e. an agreement under which the transferor undertakes to exercise possession for the transferee).

Party autonomy. It already follows from the foregoing that most European legal systems leave great room for party autonomy, both in deviating from the moment of delivery and in postponing the transfer under a consensual system. There is however one country where – up to now – delivery is a strict requirement at least in one specific relation. Under Swedish law – unless a consumer sale is at hand or a (complicated and seldom used) procedure of notifying the transfer in public and registering it with a special public authority is observed – a buyer of goods is not protected as against the seller's general creditors until the seller's ability to lay hands on the goods has been cut off, which practically means that delivery (or notification of a third party if the goods are in that person's possession) must have been made. A constitutum possessorium is not effective in relation to the buyer's protection against the seller's creditors. However, this principle has been abolished where a consumer buys goods from a professional seller where, now, a consensual rule applies provided the goods are sufficiently specified. Also, with regard to the remaining scope of the strict delivery requirement, the Swedish Supreme Court has recently suggested changing the law towards a consensual approach by an act of legislation.

Causal versus abstract transfer. Another classical difference relates to the question whether a transfer must necessarily be based on a valid obligation – or, phrased in the terminology of this Article: on a valid entitlement to the transfer of ownership. Traditionally, two concepts are available. Under most European legal systems, a transfer in fact does require such a valid entitlement (obligation), e.g., arising from a contract for sale. As a consequence, if the underlying contract is void, the right of ownership can not be transferred, and if the contract is avoided after the transfer has already taken place, the right of ownership falls back to the former owner with retroactive effect; property is thus treated as never having passed to the transferee. This approach is traditionally called a "causal" transfer. Under German law, on the other hand, and in some countries following the German model, a valid underlying obligation is not required. Consequently, where that obligation (entitlement) is void or avoided, ownership nevertheless passes to the transferee and, where it already has been transferred, it does not re-vest automatically. Under this model, the transfer is based on a second juridical act, the so-called "real agreement" (see the following paragraph), the validity of which is independent of the existence or validity of an underlying contract: the transfer is "abstract". This does not, however, mean that under German law, a transferee may finally keep property obtained under a void contract. The transferee will be obliged to return the property under unjustified enrichment principles. But until it has been returned, the transferee will be the legal owner of the asset with all the consequences which follow under the unitary approach. In particular, the transferee (who is obliged to re-transfer the ownership) can validly dispose of the goods and transfer them to a third party (who then acquires ownership derivatively, i.e. from the legal owner, without any need to resort to good faith acquisition principles); and the transferee's general creditors may levy execution in the goods or have them sold as part of their debtor's patrimony in case the transferee goes bankrupt.

The concept of a separate "real agreement". As indicated, several European legal systems have adopted the concept of a "real agreement" in the sense that a transfer requires a contractual agreement separate from the "underlying contract" (e.g., a contract for sale) or other legal basis of the transfer (e.g., an obligation arising from unjustified enrichment law). This concept occurs in all countries where the transfer is "abstract" in the abovementioned sense; there, it is an indispensable vehicle for implementing the abstraction principle. But the real agreement concept has also been adopted in a number of countries which follow the causal transfer approach. There, consequently, if the transfer is based on a sale or other contract, two agreements with two different contents are required for bringing about a valid transfer: the "underlying contract" (contract for sale) and the real agreement, the latter's validity however being dependent on the former's. As to the content, the difference between these two types of agreement may be summarised as follows. The "underlying contract" (e.g. contract for sale) produces the transferor's obligation to transfer the ownership and the corresponding right of the transferee to get the property transferred. Within the "real agreement", on the other hand, the parties do not create an obligation but agree to affect the proprietary right as such: The transferor declares to transfer the ownership and the transferee declares to accept it. Practically, such a real agreement is most often concluded implicitly. Due to this "invisible" nature, it is subject to dispute in some countries whether, if delivery is made at a time after conclusion of the underlying contract, the real agreement should be assumed to be concluded upon the making of the underlying contract, or upon delivery. In any case, being a (special type of) contract, the real agreement is subject to the general rules of contract law, meaning that the real agreement may, e.g., be avoided under general contract law rules, or can be concluded subject to a condition (the most frequent condition being full payment of the purchase price: retention of ownership).

B. Brief introduction to the approach taken in Chapter 2

Disputed subject matter. Some fundamental issues relating to the basic rule of this Chapter were disputed throughout the period of developing these rules. There was no unanimity within the Study Group on the concepts and policies pursued. In particular, representatives of the Nordic countries have been constantly critical of an orientation towards a unitary approach. And a considerable number of members of the Study Group's Co-ordinating Committee, including even the majority of the working group's advisory board, have favoured a consensual rather than a delivery-based transfer system. The overall majority is, however, in agreement with the working group's approach. It has however been agreed that arguments from all sides will be reflected in these Comments on Chapter 2.

Main approach taken in Chapter 2. The basic approach suggested in Chapter 2 is to adopt a non-mandatory delivery system, or, put differently, a "delivery-default-rule". The primary rule thus is that party autonomy prevails, i.e. the transferor and the transferee can regulate the transfer according to their needs and preferences. Subject to a general requirement of identification provided for by paragraph (3) of this Article, they can, for example, agree that the transfer will take place upon conclusion of the underlying contract although delivery is to be made later, or agree on a transfer upon delivery or any other condition, such as payment of a price. This primary rule is reflected in paragraph (1)(e) of this Article which refers to an "agreement as to the time ownership is to pass" and states that ownership will pass when the conditions are met. Where there is no such agreement, default rules apply, and these default rules are based on a delivery approach. The default rules address different practical situations that may occur, such as delivery in a narrow sense where physical control over the goods themselves is transferred from one party to the transaction to the other (VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) paragraph (1)), or situations where an independent carrier is involved (VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) paragraph (2)). Further, "equivalents to delivery" are established, meaning that certain default rules address situations where the goods themselves need not be moved, but the same effect as delivery of the goods is achieved by some other means. These rules, all contained in VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery), address situations where the goods are already in the hands of the transferee, or in the hands of a third party (e.g. a warehouse or a lessee), or where not the goods themselves but certain means of obtaining the goods are handed over to the transferee (such as keys to a warehouse or container where the goods are stored), or where documents "representing" the goods are delivered. The common idea behind these default rules is that they define circumstances under which there is a high probability that the parties intend property to pass unless there is an agreement to the contrary.

This non-mandatory default approach basically is a unitary approach in the sense of the description given in Comment A above, i.e. what passes to the transferee is the right of ownership in the sense of VIII.–1:202 (Ownership) comprising all aspects linked to this right, which certainly is the majority approach in Europe. However, there has been agreement when developing this Chapter that this unitary approach should be open to exceptions where better arguments are considered to speak for a deviating solution. There are some particular rules which may be seen as examples of a willingness to depart from unitary thinking where there is good reason to do so, for instance VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership) paragraph (4) which aims to provide an efficient solution protecting an unpaid transferor's interests where ownership has already been transferred before delivery (see there). Further, VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership) paragraphs (2) and (3) contain a number of clarifications which show that that the unitary approach pursued by the present Chapter is not as far-reaching as a unitary approach can theoretically be (and, partly, historically was in some countries).

Chapter 2 provides a "causal" transfer system, which is reflected in paragraphs (1)(d) and (2) of the present Article and is addressed in more detail by VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation). The concept of a separate "real agreement" has not been adopted. Finally, it should be remembered that national registration rules may override parts of the above stated principles; see Comment A above.

Structure of this Article and Chapter 2 in general. Paragraph (1) of the present Article lists the general requirements for a transfer of ownership under Chapter 2. The first three requirements of the goods being existent and transferable (subparagraphs (a) and (b)) as well as the transferor's right or authority to dispose (subparagraph (c)) are rather self-evident and do not contain any particular policy choice. Subparagraph (d), together with paragraph (2), addresses the "causal" approach mentioned above, and also clarifies the broad scope of the present Chapter in listing contracts and other (in particular: unilateral) juridical acts, court orders and rules of law as possible grounds for a transfer under these rules. Subparagraph (e) of paragraph (1) implements the named "delivery-default-approach". It is supplemented by paragraph (3) which spells out the general requirement of identification. Paragraph (4) only has a clarifying function and states that, of course, a court order or rule of law may itself provide when ownership of goods is to pass, in which case the "delivery-default-approach" does not apply.

Some of the requirements listed in this general rule are regulated in more detail in the subsequent rules of Chapter 2. Chapter 2 of this Book is divided into three sections, the first dealing with the requirements for a transfer of ownership, the second dealing with the effects of the transfer, and the third dealing with a number of special situations which may occur in the context of a transfer.

In particular, the requirement of the transferor's right or authority to dispose (paragraph (1)(c) of this Article) is supplemented by some specific details provided for in VIII.–2:102 (Transferor's right or authority) and the non-mandatory delivery approach laid down in paragraph (1)(e) of this Article is further specified in VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass), VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) and VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery). In the second section on effects of the transfer, VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership) first states that the transfer basically follows a unitary approach (paragraph (1): one point in time is decisive for internal as well as for external relations) but continues by clarifying that the unitary approach does not cover and decide everything it theoretically could cover. Partly, these clarifications may be considered superfluous, but taking into account the different traditions governing this area in the European legal systems, addressing such issues directly in the black letter text has been regarded as preferable. The next Article, VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation) takes up an issue already addressed in paragraphs (1)(d) and (2) of the present Article, namely the "causal" transfer approach, being supplemented with rules relating to the effects of termination, withdrawal and revocation of a donation. Again, since several of these issues are regulated differently in the European legal systems, it seems preferable to address these issues explicitly, although some of the results may also be derived from an interpretation of other Articles of this Chapter. The same holds true for VIII.–2:203 (Transfer subject to condition). Section 3, finally, comprises special constellations. Again, it has been a policy to provide explicit rules where the European legal systems diverge or the consequences could otherwise remain unclear. This applies to VIII.–2:301 (Multiple transfers), VIII.–2:302 (Indirect representation) and VIII.–2:303 (Passing of ownership in case of direct delivery in a chain of transactions). The next Article, VIII.–2:304 (Passing of ownership of unsolicited goods), supplements II.–3:401 (Unsolicited goods or services) on a property law level. The following two Articles, VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) and VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk) deal with the specific situation that fungible goods are contained in an identified bulk and the parties intend to transfer a certain quantity of them before identification of the goods in the strict sense has taken place. The rules provide for the creation of a right of co-ownership in the whole goods contained in the bulk and deal with certain consequential issues. Finally, VIII.–2:307 (Contingent right of transferee under retention of ownership) clarifies two practically important aspects relating to the rights of a transferee under a retention of ownership which turned out to be unclear or disputed in some European legal systems.

Structure of the Comments on this Article. Taking into account the very different starting points in the European legal systems and the fact that two policy decisions proved to be disputed, the Comments on this Article will first try to provide a general discussion of the main principles and structure elements, including some of the major issues outlined above, before considering the technical details of the paragraphs of the Article (Comment H).

C. General discussion of the delivery approach versus a consensual approach, including further options

(a) General

Introduction; overview. The question of whether delivery or the mere conclusion of the underlying contract, or a further alternative, should be regarded as decisive for a transfer of "ownership" (or a certain "aspect" of it) becomes relevant where delivery is intended to take place some time after the conclusion of the contract. The issue can be discussed with various focuses, many of them being reflected or at least touched upon in the following. After addressing some general points, the following discussion will point at the somewhat limited potential scope of a consensual approach and the conclusions which may be drawn from that (section (b)). Then, the implications of the consensual-versus-delivery (etc.) choice will be discussed separately with regard to single "aspects" of ownership. First, special emphasis will be laid on the aspect of the transferee's protection against the transferor's general creditors (section (c)), which proved to be the main issue in the discussions within the Study Group. Then, the converse issue of the unpaid transferor's protection as against the transferee's general creditors will be discussed (section (d)), followed by an analysis of the "passing" of the "owner's" right to dispose (section (e)) and the right to recover possession from a third person, the right to use the property and related rights against third persons, including rights to claim damages or the reversal of an unjustified enrichment from a third person (section (f)). These discussions largely involve precisely focusing on specific types of conflicts and "aspects" of "ownership", comparable to an analysis under a "functional approach". Whether or to what extent it finally appears advisable to formulate the preferred rules in a structure and language coherent with a functional approach, will be summarised and discussed below, in Comment G on this Article. Since the discussion in this part of these Comments will often concentrate on the two main options of "delivery" and "conclusion of the contract" only and thereby neglects the hypothetical "payment" options to a certain extent, the arguments concerning this alternative will be summarised and evaluated in a separate section (g) below. There will also be a summary of hypothetical consumer protection issues, see section (h).

Further options: payment. Although consensual and delivery-based solutions certainly dominate the status quo in the European legal systems as well as the related discussions, these two options are not the only ones potentially available. In particular, the criterion could be whether payment of a counter-performance – where relevant under the concrete transaction, such as a contract for sale – has been made or not. This idea may suggest itself in terms of an equal treatment of both parties to the transaction, and it may also suggest itself against the background that often the preference for a consensual rule is in fact supported by the argument that protection will be provided for pre-paying buyers. In detail, several nuances of a "payment" rule can be thought of. Ownership (or a certain kind of protection) could pass only upon full payment, or already upon partial payment, or – theoretically – even proportionally according to payments effected. Also, one could limit a payment rule so that payment would be decisive only before delivery of the goods is made, but then ownership would pass upon delivery unless otherwise agreed by the parties (so that the transferor would have to contract for a kind of retention of ownership device in case payment is to be made after delivery). Or, payment could be made a general default rule, so that a retention of ownership (after delivery) would already follow from the black letter text and would only be excluded if so provided by party agreement. These options will, to some extent, be taken into account throughout the following discussion which will, however, primarily relate to the classical dichotomy of mere consent and delivery. As mentioned above, a summary and concluding discussion of the payment options will be provided later.

Quantitative arguments from comparative survey; recent trends. Potentially, simply counting the European countries following the one or the other approach could amount to at least some indication of a preferable option. But this does not prove fruitful for present purposes; first, because there is no clear majority in one or the other direction (except that "payment rules" do not play a considerable role in present European legal systems). And second, even if one tried to identify only recent trends over the past years, the outcome would be ambivalent. In Sweden, for instance, a certain trend moving away from the (mandatory) delivery requirement – or rather: cut-off of the transferor's factual power over the goods – for the transferee's protection in the transferor's insolvency, towards a consensual approach (which however appears the only alternative discussed) can be observed in recent legislation (regarding consumer sales), doctrinal writing and court practice. In France, on the other hand, delivery is said to gather more and more importance in commercial practice as well as in legislation, primarily safeguarding the unpaid seller's interests. It may also be noteworthy that in the Study Group's discussions on this subject , representatives of the diverse countries did not necessarily favour the approach in force in their own legal system.

"Natural" solution, "ordinary people's expectations". It has also proven more or less pointless to ask which solution appears to be the most "natural" or "what ordinary people expect" (or: what ordinary business people expect), not because it is considered adequate to ignore ordinary people's expectations, but simply because expectations of ordinary people seem to vary in a pan-European perspective. Such expectations are probably influenced by various parameters, including, among other things, the situations people envisage when being asked about such issues (depending on the kind of goods, how the respective field of commerce is usually organised and whether they rather identify with the transferor's or the transferee's role, or with the role of a third person) and their – sometimes limited, but still to a certain degree existing – experience regarding economic and legal customs in their home countries. There is, so far, no reliable empirical survey available which could be used as a basis for taking such kinds of arguments more fully into consideration. However, what definitely seems worthwhile is to use the actual or hypothetical expectations of "ordinary people" as a kind of test question in relation to an approach which appears preferable based on other arguments, in order to verify whether this approach proves workable and generally acceptable.

(b) Limited applicability of consensual approach

Remark as to importance of the following arguments. The following comments list a number of instances where the consensual rule remains inapplicable, partly for reasons of logical coherence with general principles of property law, such as the requirement of identification, and partly because the consequences, although applying the principle would be possible from a theoretical viewpoint, would be considered too far-reaching. As a consequence, the consensual approach has a more limited potential scope of application as compared with a delivery approach. To a certain – but not decisive – degree this in itself may be used as an argument in favour of a delivery system (cf. the following paragraphregarding the significant practical importance of transfers of generic goods). In particular, however, the question arises in what respect transactions falling within the potential scope of a consensual rule differ from other transactions so as to justify treating them differently in relation to certain advantages a consensual rule is argued to have. The latter kind of argument will be taken up repeatedly in subsequent sections of these Comments .

Generic goods. According to the general requirement of identification expressed in paragraph (3) of the present Article, where the underlying contract (or other juridical act, court order or rule of law) defines the goods in generic terms, ownership can pass only when the goods are identified. It is commonly accepted in the European legal systems that a proprietary right cannot attach an asset as long as it is unclear to which asset it shall relate. Consequently, a rule stating that ownership (or whatever proprietary "aspect" of ownership) passes upon conclusion of the underlying contract (or creation of another legal basis) cannot be applied to situations where the goods subject to the transfer are only defined generically but it is still unclear which particular items will finally be transferred. The same applies to a rule providing that the transfer occurs upon (full or partial) payment, where this payment is made before identification.

This raises the question which other criterion should then be regarded decisive. One may say that this other criterion should be identification itself, as this is the earliest moment in time possible and, thereby, comes closest to the original starting point of a transfer upon conclusion of the underlying contract. This would, evidently, put much weight on defining what exactly constitutes identification. This is not easy (see Comment H) and this criterion might bring about a certain amount of insecurity. Another option could be spelling out that the standard default rule for generic goods is delivery, which would be a simpler rule to apply.

Second, taking into account the importance of contracts for generic goods in many economic spheres(including the supply of raw materials, the area of wholesale transactions and much distance selling), one may put forward the question whether it is wise to establish a general rule (transfer by mere consent) which is inapplicable to these large parts of the economy. Although comprehensive empirical information is lacking, it is probably not incorrect to assume that the majority of transactions in the European Union, in terms of absolute figures and in terms of total turnover, concern contracts for generic goods.

A delivery approach, on the other hand, allows transfers of generic goods and transfers of specific goods to be treated alike, which may appear preferable unless certain reasons demand the opposite. At the time of delivery, identification generally has already occurred or takes place at that very moment. The rule is comparatively easy to apply. Insecurity and lack of predictability related to the precise requirements of identification are not totally avoided, since, under the approach proposed under the present Chapter, the parties are free to stipulate that the transfer will take place at an earlier time than delivery; but practically, such insecurities are considerably reduced.

Future goods (goods to be manufactured). A second field where a transfer upon the conclusion of the underlying contract does not work concerns goods which do not yet exist at that time but still have to be produced. The present Article explicitly spells out that a transfer requires that the goods exist (paragraph (1)(a); besides, the identification requirement could be applied where the product is defined in generic terms). Again, the same applies to a rule providing that the transfer shall take place at the moment of payment, if payment is made before the goods exist. This, too, is an area of considerable practical importance.

If the general rule was agreed to be a transfer upon conclusion of the contract, one would have to clarify which time should be decisive in cases where that rule cannot apply. The answer is not self-evident. It could be the moment when the product is put into a deliverable state, which could have the advantage of being a clear-cut rule and rather simple to apply. But – depending on the underlying policy pursued by the hypothetical choice in favour of a consensual approach – one may well ask whether such a rather late moment in time would be consistent with these underlying policies and whether ownership (or a certain aspect of it) should not pass already when the goods are at least partly finished; e.g. where a boat is to be produced and the hull already exists when the transferor goes bankrupt. Again, however, one may ask whether or not an even earlier stage of the production process may suffice as well, going back, e.g., to the moment when the first two planks have been combined (or even further back, to the moment of mere identification of material dedicated to the actual production). It obviously seems hard to identify a reasonable criterion of demarcation for designing a default rule along the lines of a basically consensual approach. The issue, again, is rather simple to deal with under a delivery-based approach. Delivery will occur when the product is finished; and if earlier, it is still a very simple criterion to identify. And where the parties contractually agree that ownership is to pass at an earlier stage, it is up to them to define this moment or relevant conditions in the terms of the contract. Such contractual stipulation may range from the mere appropriation of material even before the construction process itself has started (in which case the parties rather agree to transfer the material and create an additional obligation to perform the work, than on a transfer of the product) to the completion of the last stroke of the brush, or actual delivery, or whatever.

Transfer of goods owned by a third person. The following examples certainly are of lower practical importance, but are listed for the purpose of completeness. It is, for example, possible under these model rules to establish a valid contract on the sale of goods which are not, or not yet, owned by the transferor. Also in this case, the consensual approach cannot be applied, even where the goods concerned are specific: at the time the contract is concluded, the transferor has no right (or authority) to legally dispose of the goods (paragraph (1)(c)). Again, the same applies under a payment rule if the price is paid before the transferor acquires the right or authority. However, no major problems seem to result from this observation. Delivery, on the other hand, does of course not cure a lack of the right or authority to dispose, but – where the transferor has not meanwhile acquired such right or authority – the transferee may acquire by virtue of VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership).

Alternative obligations. Another instance to be addressed in this context are alternative obligations (cf. III.–2:105 (Alternative obligations or methods of performance)). Where the transferor is bound to transfer one of two or more goods, it is perhaps not logically excluded to provide the transferee with proprietary protection in relation to all hypothetical objects of performance so that no other creditor of the transferor may seize these goods. But this may go a bit far in terms of constituting a general default rule, e.g. considering that third party creditors would be prevented from attaching all these goods in enforcement proceedings outside bankruptcy. Traditionally, the consensual model is not strictly applied, but the transfer is postponed up to the moment when the party entitled to choose the performance exercises the right of choice. Further difficulties do not seem to arise, unless perhaps where the choice is on the transferor and one of two goods perish so that ownership in the remaining object can pass automatically. Here there may be cases where it is doubtful whether or not such effect takes place because it is unclear whether the goods have been "sufficiently damaged".

Contract under suspensive condition. Certain difficulties may also arise where the contract underlying the transfer has been concluded subject to a suspensive condition, which turns on an uncertain event which may or may not occur in future. Due to this element of uncertainty, an immediate transfer upon conclusion of the contract as such does not work. Consensual systems tend to solve this by assuming that the occurrence of the event has a retroactive effect in the sense that ownership is deemed to have passed at the moment of conclusion of the contract.

(c) Transferee's protection against the transferor's creditors

General: method, subject matter. The following sections (c) to (f) try to analyse the advantages and disadvantages of the consensual approach, and the delivery approach respectively, by addressing the single "aspects" of the right of ownership, which become important in different typical conflict situations, separately and – as far as possible – independently from one another. To a certain degree, therefore, the discussion follows a functional approach (although some of the subsequent issues or "aspects" are traditionally only little discussed, if at all, in Nordic legal systems). The first of these "aspects" to be discussed is as from when the transferee (e.g., a buyer) is protected against the transferor's (e.g., seller's) general creditors. As this way of phrasing the issue is, perhaps, not the most common one in all European countries, it should perhaps be clarified a little. There is no doubt that under a valid contract for sale (or under another legal relationship obliging one party to a transfer of ownership), the transferee is entitled to demand that the other party to this transaction, the transferor, transfers the goods. Still, this entitlement may be frustrated by the transferor's other creditors in basically two situations. The first is that one of these other creditors enforces a right against the transferor by attaching the goods sold to the transferee. The result will be that this other creditor may have the goods sold and satisfy the right, whereas the transferee does not get these goods, but may proceed against the transferor under the rules on non-performance of the latter's obligation (in particular, by claiming damages, so that at least some kind of equivalent for the goods is obtained). The second situation is the more critical one where the transferor is insolvent. Then, all creditors who are not particularly protected – mainly by either having a proprietary security right or a right to separate specific assets from the insolvent debtor's estate – will sustain a loss, receiving only a dividend. From an economic viewpoint, it is basically this second situation that matters in the present context. The question is whether the transferee (already) has a right to separate the goods from the transferor's estate or whether the transferor's general (i.e., unprotected) creditors can lay their hands on these goods and proportionally distribute the goods' value amongst them. This issue certainly was the most intensively debated one throughout the process of developing the rules of Chapter 2. Traditionally there are also other sets of rules dealing with conflicts between these groups of parties, namely the actio Pauliana and similar concepts, under which the transferor's creditors can "avoid" a transaction or otherwise treat it as ineffective (cf. VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership) paragraph (3)(a)). Such devices are not discussed in the context of the present Article.

Although the scope of Chapter 2 is wider, the discussion will often focus on the practically most important area, i.e. transfers based on bilateral contracts under which both parties are bound to exchange performances, the paradigmatic example being a contract for the sale of goods. As to the possible alternative solutions, the primary focus of the discussion will, again, be a default rule stating that the relevant "aspect" of ownership passes with the conclusion of this contract (consensual model) on the one side, and a default rule under which the relevant "aspect" passes upon delivery on the other side. Other hypothetical alternatives, in particular concepts under which payment is decisive will be touched on occasionally. The discussion of the consensual model will have to be restricted to specified goods (which already exist and in relation to which the transferor has a right or authority to dispose).

It must be stated right at the beginning that there are well-grounded arguments for both solutions and that it is not intended to create the impression that, although in an overall assessment a preference for a default rule following the delivery approach is argued (and it is therefore necessary to point out the advantages of this approach as compared to the other), the consensual model would be considered unreasonable or to create serious impediments to economy and should therefore be rejected from the outset. The preference is a relative one, and certainly depends on the weight given to the various arguments. If one weighs certain arguments differently, another outcome could also be argued.

As to the structure of the discussion, we try to deal with arguments put forward in favour of the consensual model first and then switch to arguments favouring the delivery model. A strict distinction is however hard to draw, since counter-arguments related to the one model will often appear as arguments supporting the other. The following arguments stem partly from published discussions relating to existing national legal systems in Europe and partly from the discussions within the Study Group.

Consensual model coincides with "natural expectations" of the parties, etc. It is sometimes stated that ordinary people – or ordinary business people – consider it "natural" that a buyer (or other transferee) acquires a right to separate the (specific) goods upon concluding the contract for sale, this right being valid also in relation to the transferor's creditors. On its own, as has already been pointed out, such a statement is not very helpful. It must be completed by some additional substantive arguments.

Consensual model: transferor and creditors sufficiently protected by right to withhold performance. One of the most frequently used arguments is that the transferor's creditors should be content with receiving the transferee's counter-performance. It is argued that the transferee should be protected against the transferor's creditors from the conclusion of the contract, but should be able to exercise the right to separation only when the transferor has been fully paid. As long as payment is not made, the transferor may withhold performance (delivery) under the general rule of III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation), which should also have effect in favour of the transferor's general creditors. The effect of such a model is that – typically – the full value of the goods concerned will be left to the general creditors in any case: either the transferee pays the price in exchange for the goods, or the transferor is not paid but retains the goods, which can eventually be sold. This has the appearance of being a fair solution as between these two parties. There is, however, a certain problem in explaining why one type of creditor (the transferee of specified goods) should necessarily be entitled to 100 % of what is due while other creditors in the transferor's insolvency only receive a (normally small) dividend. This issue will be more thoroughly discussed below.

Consensual model: protection of pre-paying transferee. Along with the argument discussed above, the most frequent argument in favour of a consensual model seems to be that this model grants protection to a transferee who, for whatever reason, pays all or part of the purchase price before taking delivery. It is partly argued that a particular need for such protection exists with regard to consumers, who, if a buyer was only protected as from taking the goods into possession, would often lose the goods and their pre-payment due to ignorance of the legal rules. It is also stated that there may exist legitimate and well-motivated reasons for a buyer not to take the goods into possession immediately upon conclusion of the contract: there may be lack of space for storing the goods at the moment, or the object may still need to be completed or repaired by the seller. Also, it is pointed out that down-payments fulfil an important task to secure the transferor's claim for damages if the transferee later withdraws from taking delivery, or otherwise does not pay, and it is argued that, therefore, it would be desirable that a down-payment can be made by a transferee straight away in reliance on a right to acquire full protection against the transferor's creditors by paying the outstanding amount. These are strong arguments. Against them it may be said that such immediate protection, or protection upon full or partial payment, is also possible under a system where the transferee is basically protected as from delivery, but the parties can also agree on an earlier transfer. Apart from this, one may question in what respect such pre-payments of buyers of specified goods are more worthy of protection than all other kinds of advance performances, which usually involve taking a risk unless special protection is arranged, and other types of creditors who have no chance to obtain such security. This issue will also be taken up again in more detail below.

In the context of favouring the consensual model for the sake of protecting pre-paying buyers, it is also sometimes stated that protecting a pre-paying buyer only upon taking delivery would cause an undue over-protection of the seller's creditors in allowing them to take both the money and the goods. Put this way, however, the argument is misleading: the delivery model corresponds to the principle of equal treatment of all creditors in the transferor's insolvency, which the consensual model does not.

It should also be added that where the protection of pre-paying transferees is seen as the main argument for adopting a consensual approach, this argument is inapplicable where the transferee in fact does not perform in advance. If protection of the transferee's payment (in particular: before delivery) is considered to be a main policy, however, this would speak more in favour of a "payment rule" than in favour of protecting the transferee automatically upon conclusion of the contract.

Consensual model: transferor has no specific interest in the goods whereas the transferee has. One may try to develop an argument in favour of the consensual model by addressing the kind of interests the parties may have in the goods transferred. Whereas – except in some cases of donation – it would obviously go to far to say that the transferor simply intends to get rid of the goods and therefore has no interests in them at all (for which reason, then, immediate protection may be given to the transferee), it is perhaps generally correct to say that a person willing to transfer a particular item of property does not have a specific interest in this very object (any longer) but rather an interest in its value, as reflected in the price agreed upon. The transferee, on the other hand, especially where the contract concerns specific goods, may have a specific interest in exactly this object (chosen e.g. to satisfy a personal or business need). Based on this observation, the argument could be made that the transferee's specific interest should be given preference against any interests on the transferor's side. (One may add that the argument, as far as the transferor is concerned, will typically apply only to situations where the transferor voluntarily decided to transfer the goods, i.e. where the basis of the transfer is a contract.)

One would, however, have to give an explanation why a "specific" interest in certain goods should be valued higher than "mere" value interests. Such an explanation probably does not exist, since the one can be transformed into the other, and vice versa, by agreeing on a price. But – based on this – the argument could be formulated in terms that no one else would pay a better price than the person with such specific interest, which may also result in a benefit for the transferor's creditors. This argument will be discussed further below. Another argument which can, perhaps, be built on the transferee's "specific interest" is that giving preference to the transferee could result in a common benefit on a macro-economic level. In both respects, however, broadly generalising the existence of significant "specific interests" and putting much weight on their possible effects would certainly not be realistic.

Consensual model: transferee pays best price – efficiency and benefit for transferor's creditors. One aspect that may be brought forward in support of a consensual model and partly can be linked with the idea of specific interests the transferee may have in the goods is that it is usually more efficient to sell and transfer the goods to the one who has already concluded a binding contract (the transferee) than to sell off the goods in liquidation proceedings. Apart from double efforts, the prices to be achieved in such enforcement sales will often be less attractive (for the transferor's general creditors), which may be based on general distrust, the goods growing older in the meantime, limitation or exclusion of the buyer's rights in case the goods do not conform with the contract, or other reasons. The original transferee, on the other hand, especially if particularly interested in acquiring these very goods, may pay an attractive price immediately. This may result in an additional benefit for the transferor's general creditors, if one compares this way of proceeding with the option of liquidating the goods in insolvency proceedings. However, this may not be brought as an argument against a delivery-based approach where the applicable insolvency law provides that the insolvency administrator may choose whether to stick to the contract (so that the transfer takes place as originally agreed upon, and the agreed price is paid), or to terminate it

(so that the goods may be sold in liquidation and the original transferee's claim for damages will be discharged only proportionally), by which the original buyer is treated as any other unprotected creditor. This latter approach may also enable the insolvency administrator to collect even more money for the benefit of all general creditors.

Consensual model: macro-economic benefit from protecting transferee. The fact that the buyer (or other transferee) of a specific asset may have a particular interest in this asset may give rise to an argument that leaving these goods to the transferee will typically be more efficient on a macro-economic level in the sense that the transferee has the best opportunities to exploit the goods successfully, which means an optimal allocation of resources and may cause a maximum increase of welfare in the overall economy. There may be a point in such reasoning in some situations. But it should probably not be generalised too much nor its strength be overestimated. There may also be cases where, after leaving the sold goods to the insolvency creditors, a third person buys these goods at a low price in an execution sale and manages to use the goods even more profitably.

Consensual model: both parties usually want an immediate transfer. Also, it is sometimes argued that it is usually in the interest of both parties to the transaction to give the transferee immediate protection against the transferor's general creditors, which, of course, is itself used as an argument for the consensual approach and, second, also forms the basis for further arguments (see below). The argument must be specified a bit in order to be more than a general assertion. It can certainly be assumed that one party, the transferee, will be interested in being protected against the transferor's creditors as soon as possible. The second assumption underlying the argument discussed here is that the transferor, though not actively favouring such an immediate protection of the transferee, will at least have no interests against such a solution. For the transferor, it is assumed, it will be sufficient to have some security for the payment of the price, which is another question under a "functional approach" and could, therefore, also be subject to another rule than the consensual principle. In particular, it may be sufficient for the transferor to have a right to retain the goods in possession until the price is paid. It has already been pointed out that this solution involves an unequal treatment of creditors in insolvency insofar as one creditor (the transferee of specified goods) will always receive 100 % whereas all other unprotected creditors only receive a dividend. The argument discussed in the present Comment, therefore, must make the assumption that the transferor (typically) does not care about the other creditors' interests and is willing to act to their disadvantage. It must also presuppose that the transferor has no further interests in letting the general creditors prevail over the transferee. This issue will be taken up again below, where it will be argued that there indeed exist reasons for the transferor to identify with the general creditors' interests and, therefore, not to yield to the transferee's preference for an immediate protection. One may add that in those European countries where delivery is the main rule but the parties can agree on an immediate transfer by establishing a constitutum possessorium, such agreements are rather seldom made in practice.

Consensual model: requirement for contracting out of a delivery rule would be a trap for ordinary people and would create additional transaction costs. Where the alternative to a consensual principle (regarding the transferee's protection against the transferor's general creditors) is a delivery rule with a possibility for the parties to establish an immediate transfer (or any other time of transfer) by party agreement, this approach of a delivery-default-rule is partly criticised for only creating a "trap for ordinary people" (consumers as well as ordinary business) or a privilege for those who can afford legal advice, respectively. It may be said that contracting out of a delivery model increases transaction costs. The argument that parties (transferees) are "trapped" by a legal rule they are not aware of may become valid under two preconditions: First, it presupposes that both parties – and this primarily means not only the transferee, but also the transferor – would actually want to contract out of a delivery regime if fully informed about their legal possibilities. This has already been doubted with regard to the transferor. The second premise is that transferees typically do not know about the range of possibilities of legally designing a transfer (in particular: the possibility to contract for an immediate transfer), or – which probably is the way proponents of this argument would prefer to put it – that transferees typically do not know that they need to establish a certain agreement with the transferor in order to achieve the desired result, i.e. being protected as against the transferor's general creditors upon conclusion of the contract. The latter assumption will certainly have some substance, depending on various parameters such as a person's experience in legal matters, the quality of generally accessible legal information (e.g. examples of standard terms provided by national chambers of commerce, information provided by organisations protecting consumer interests, etc.) or the rules provided in the respective national legal system today. It is then a question of how the law should react to such a lack of information, given that such lack of information exists. The view adopted here is that the law should nevertheless adopt a solution balancing the interests of all parties involved, i.e. including the transferor and the transferor's general creditors, which is considered to be achieved best by a delivery-based approach. In other words, taking into account all the other arguments analysed with regard to the issue of the transferee's protection against the transferor's general creditors, information deficits which may typically exist with transferees are not valued so highly as to supersede the arguments put forward for a delivery solution. It does, by the way, also seem clear that even if a consensual model was adopted, there would remain considerable information deficits in practice. For example, many transferees will not know that they will remain unprotected when pre-paying for generic goods.

Consensual model: increasing transaction costs resulting from alternative security for pre-payment. The delivery model adopted in Chapter 2 puts a buyer of specified goods in the same position as other general creditors in that the buyer must, if so advised, counter the risks of performing in advance by seeking some security for the pre-payment. This is partly used as an argument against this approach (and in favour of the alternative consensual model) by stating that the delivery approach causes an increase of transaction costs in the form of costs for such security devices, e.g. bank guarantees. One may put it like this. It should, however, be observed that under the delivery model adopted here, the parties can also agree on a transfer upon conclusion of the contract, or upon payment, in which case such transaction costs do not arise. Also, seeking alternative devices for securing pre-payment will largely be inevitable under a consensual system as well, where the transaction concerns unspecified goods. In the end, one may also say that if a seller wants to benefit from advance payment, this is nothing but a form of taking credit and, as with other forms of credit, it is both a legitimate interest of the creditor to ask for security and a normal consequence that the debtor either pays for obtaining security from a third party or uses the debtor's own property for security purposes (which, here, could be simply agreeing on a transfer upon payment).

Consensual model: protection of good bargain. A transfer (in the sense of the transferee being protected as against the transferor's creditors) upon consensus is sometimes favoured also for the reason of providing in rem protection of a buyer's interests when the buyer has made a good bargain: the buyer can separate the goods from the seller's estate in exchange for paying a comparably low price. If so, the (other) general creditors may sustain a loss in two respects. First, the bankrupt's estate does not increase by any pre-payment the buyer of such goods may have advanced so that one creditor (the buyer of these specified goods) receives full counter-performance by paying once, whereas all other general creditors only receive a dividend. Second, the price paid by that buyer is low; perhaps the goods could have been sold for a better price in an execution sale. One has to ask whether this is a policy goal worth being pursued. This could be argued in view of enabling the buyer to gain maximum benefit from exploiting the goods, and of possible macro-economic benefits this may have (which, as noted above, are not regarded as very persuasive). On the other side, there is at least some indication from insolvency law in so far as "very good bargains", under certain additional requirements, can be set aside by the transferor's creditors under the rules of the so-called actio Pauliana which, in one way or the other, are adopted in most or even all European legal systems. These are, of course, rules for certain qualified cases and apply irrespectively of whether a consensual or a delivery transfer model is opted for, but one could try to derive some guidance in so far as in an insolvency situation, where people normally lose, at least the default rule should not be that one creditor wins. It is not intended to put much weight on this kind of argument, which certainly is open to criticism on several levels (such as that contractually departing from delivery is nevertheless allowed, and this would only be possible for the "very clever ones", i.e. those who both manage to negotiate a good bargain and to reach agreement about a transfer before delivery). But it shows that a policy of protecting good bargains in insolvency would not be self-evident.

Consensual model: party autonomy rule will anyway erode delivery principle. Another argument put forward against the approach followed by Chapter 2 is that allowing the parties to deviate from the delivery principle by party agreement, which, according to general rules, also includes agreements concluded impliedly by conduct (cf. VIII.–1:104 (Application of rules of Books I to III), II.–4:102 (How intention is determined)), brings about the risk of eroding the delivery principle. It is argued that – if these model rules were applied in court proceedings – courts, especially courts from countries which traditionally had a consensual transfer model, may tend to accept implied agreements on a transfer before delivery, e.g. in order to protect consumers. Such a risk can, of course, not be denied completely. But it accords with generally accepted principles of interpretation (cf. I.–1:102 (Interpretation and development)) that the objectives and goals underlying a legal provision are to be taken into account in its application. Given the motivations and typical party interests discussed in these Comments, this should prevent courts from inventing deemed consents about immediate transfers where no clear evidence in that direction is at hand. See the general rules on interpretation of contracts as provided by Chapter 8 of Book II; cf. also below, Comment H.

Consensual model: clarity and simple application. Finally, the consensual model is sometimes supported by stating that it is easier to ascertain when a binding contract of sale has been concluded (in which case the transfer would occur at this moment in time) than assessing an agreement as to a transfer prior to delivery (which would be necessary to contract out of a delivery rule). But obviously, this kind of argumentation is not directed against a delivery rule as such. To the contrary, delivery in the sense of a physical change related to the goods usually is rather easy to assess, and the same will usually apply to the equivalents to delivery provided for by VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery). One must also take into account that applying a consensual model can be all but simple when it comes to generic and future goods. As to the critical point regarding the delivery system, i.e. the parties' option to deviate by agreement, it will be up to the parties to make this contractual deviation as clear as necessary.

Non-mandatory delivery model: general remark on impact of insolvency law principles. The question of the transferee's protection against the transferor's general creditors is most relevant when the transferor becomes insolvent. It therefore suggests itself that basic principles of insolvency law, which are common in more or less all European legal systems, are taken into account when evaluating which solution to adopt as a default rule. The most important principle in this respect is that creditors of the insolvent person should, in general, be treated equally. This general principle will repeatedly play an important role in the discussion in the subsequent Comments. Second, a particularly relevant feature of insolvency law, which also has to be seen in the context of the principle of equal treatment of creditors, is that where reciprocal obligations arise from a contract established before the opening of insolvency proceedings and these obligations are both not, or not fully, performed when insolvency proceedings commence, it is a quite common rule in the European legal systems that the insolvency administrator (in a broad sense) has some right to choose whether to uphold such a legal relationship or to terminate it. Details vary from country to country, but as to the basic idea, the European legal systems coincide (see the Notes to VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership)). The effects of this right to choose are further discussed in the following paragraph. Taking into account this background, the default rule adopted in Chapter 2 of this Book aims to adequately balance the interests of all persons involved, i.e. not only the transferor's and the transferee's interests, but also the interests of the transferor's insolvency creditors.

The insolvency administrator's right to choose whether to uphold or terminate the obligations under an unfulfilled bilateral contract in particular. As mentioned above, the administrator in insolvency (or other person serving functionally similar tasks) may decide whether to fulfil or terminate the obligations under a bilateral contract not fully performed by both parties. If the insolvency administrator chooses to uphold the contractual relationship, both parties to the transaction have to perform their outstanding obligations in full, which means that – focusing on the situation relevant here, i.e. that the transferor is insolvent – the transferee will get what was contracted for and thereby is "protected" in the sense used in the present discussion. If the insolvency administrator, on the other hand, terminates the contractual relationship, the European legal systems roughly coincide in that the other party to the (bilaterally unperformed) contract, with regard to pre-payments this party may have issued, will be satisfied only with the dividend all general creditors receive from the bankrupt's estate. In countries following a delivery approach, this means that a pre-paying transferee remains "unprotected" as against the transferor's creditors (unless ownership has already been transferred): the transferee must be content with a dividend. In European legal systems following a consensual model (like France, Belgium or Italy), on the other hand, the traditional view is that ownership of specific goods already passes upon conclusion of the contract and, therefore, the right to choose does not apply (because the alienator's obligation to transfer the ownership is already fulfilled and so no bilaterally unfulfilled contract is at hand). The transferee will have to pay the outstanding price and may demand delivery of the goods. As will be reflected in more detail in the Notes on VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership), this view is, however, disputed in modern Belgian doctrine (where it is partly argued that the transferee will be protected only upon delivery) and is uncertain under English law, where the traditional understanding is that the administrator (or equivalent officer) may opt for refusing to perform the outstanding contractual obligation to deliver the goods, in which case the transferee remains unprotected even though English sales law provides for a passing of property upon conclusion of the contract, if not otherwise agreed by the parties. Whether the buyer may be granted an order of specific performance (delivery of the goods) based on property rights appears to be not fully settled in relation to movables under English law. These (partial) uncertainties with regard to the consensual approach's interaction with the insolvency administrator's right to choose are not used here as a positive argument. It is just pointed out that if – contrary to the proposals made in Chapter 2 – a consensual system was opted for, these associated areas of insolvency law would have to be checked and, if necessary, adapted in order to achieve the intended results.

Delivery model: transferee of specific goods is a general creditor like others. At the beginning, it should be clarified that – unless ownership has already passed under a contractual agreement for an immediate transfer or a rule of law to this effect – a transferee of specific goods who has concluded a contract for sale but has not yet taken delivery and against whom, therefore, the transferor is simply obliged to transfer the ownership, is nothing but a general creditor of the transferor. In the following Comments, this will be underlined with regard to the principle of equal treatment of creditors. This is important not only on a substantive, but also on a more terminological level. If a transferee (especially in case of pre-payment) is not granted particular protection in insolvency because a delivery model is opted for, this does not mean that the general creditors are "preferred" over the transferee; the transferee is just treated as one of them.

Delivery model: equal treatment of creditors (why should a transferee of specific goods be treated preferentially to others?). It has already been pointed out above that a consensual principle can only be applied to a transfer of specific goods which already exist. This means that one type of creditor, namely a transferee of specified existing goods, will always receive the performance due under the contract in exchange for paying the agreed price, whereas all other unsecured creditors run the risk of receiving no counter-performance and of losing any advance performance they may have made. This raises the question of why a buyer of specific goods deserves more protection than, e.g., a buyer of generic goods. Also, why should a buyer (of a specific item) who paid in advance be treated preferentially to a person who gave credit under other circumstances, without stipulating for any security device. Also, service providers, who often perform in advance, obtain no comparable protection unless they contractually demand some security (such as a bank guarantee). Under a consensual model, the buyer of specific goods would even be preferred over creditors who have never contracted with the debtor and, therefore, have never chosen this person voluntarily as their contractual partner. This applies, in particular, to those having a claim under the law on non-contractual liability for damage and to alimentay creditors (such as children). They are all restricted to a dividend, whereas the transferee of specific goods gets 100 %, although it may well be argued that it would be more adequate to let the risk of a debtor's insolvency be borne by someone who voluntarily entered into a legal relationship with this person. A satisfactory answer to the question why all this should be so is, however, not provided. In the absence of a sufficient explanation for preferring buyers of specific goods, much speaks in favour of applying the general principle (an aspect of justice) of treating similar cases alike, which supports the delivery principle. The latter can be applied to specific, generic and future goods and allows an equal treatment of all creditors who perform in advance. Also, it increases the dividends paid to those creditors who did not undertake any performance to the debtor, but whose rights correspond to the debtor's delictual or alimentary obligations. Ultimately, the delivery rule is much more in conformity with the general principle of equal treatment of all creditors in insolvency.

Delivery model: performing in advance means taking risk; principle of contemporaneous performance as well-balanced starting point. As will be discussed in more detail below, the difference between a consensual and a delivery principle will be economically most important where the transferee of specified goods has already paid, fully or in part, before delivery. Under a delivery model, in case of full pre-payment as well as where the transferee paid only part of the price and the insolvency administrator decides to terminate the contractual relationship, the pre-paying transferee, being an ordinary insolvency creditor, will usually only regain a small percentage of the pre-payment. This means that, under a delivery model, performing in advance means taking a risk. Following up on what has been discussed in the previous Comment, this may be turned into an argument in favour of a delivery approach: All other types of creditors, if they perform in advance, also face this risk of losing the value of their own performance, unless they contract for a security right. This principle applies to a person who grants credit over a certain amount of money, it applies to service providers, and to buyers of generic goods, etc. It would, therefore, be coherent in terms of applying the same values to comparable cases to apply the same principle to buyers of specific goods. Also, the seller of goods who performs (delivers the goods) before being paid the price is in the same situation and takes the risk of losing the value of the performance in the event of the buyer's insolvency. The seller may decide either to deliberately accept this risk or to contract for a security (e.g., a retention of ownership). Adopting a non-mandatory delivery rule for the transferee's protection as against the transferor's creditors would, therefore, also result in an equal treatment of both parties to the transaction (transferor, transferee) in relation to the other party's creditors.

This corresponds to a generally well-accepted contract law principle, namely that, unless otherwise agreed, reciprocal obligations are to be performed contemporaneously and, if the other party does not perform, each party has a right to withhold performance. This principle is explicitly stated in VIII.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation). Opting for a non-mandatory delivery rule for the transferee's protection as against the transferor's creditors (and, vice versa, for the transferor's protection as against the transferee's creditors, see below) would mean to continue, or uphold, this principle also on a property law level: The general default rule will be that the obligations of both parties (delivery and transfer of ownership; payment of price) are performed at the same time. If one party does not perform, the other may withhold performance. The parties can however deviate from this principle by agreement. If one party agrees to perform in advance, it will be in the sphere of this party's own responsibility to decide whether to bear the resulting risks, or to ask for a security. In the case of a pre-paying buyer, such security can be an agreement on a transfer before delivery, or another form of security.

Different scenarios under the non-mandatory delivery approach in detail: only transferor has (fully) performed. In order to give a clear picture of the approach taken under this Chapter and of how the policy choices discussed so far, and the relevant insolvency law principles, apply to the different practical scenarios, the following Comments will provide an overview of the typical constellations which may appear in practice. The first one is rather unproblematic and is just mentioned for the sake of completeness: Where the transferor (seller) has already delivered the goods to the transferee (buyer) and, subsequently, the transferor goes bankrupt, the buyer remains under the obligation to pay the price agreed under the contract. This result is the same irrespective of whether a consensual or a delivery principle is chosen. In the end, two performances of – typically – equal value are exchanged.

In detail: none of the parties has yet performed. In the next constellation, namely where none of the parties has performed anything so far, certain differences between the consensual and the delivery model do occur. They are, however, not too striking from an economic point of view. In this situation, the insolvency administrator will have the right to choose whether to perform or terminate the contractual obligations. Unless performing the obligation to deliver would be particularly burdensome, or the contract has been a bad bargain for the transferor, or exceptionally another buyer who offers a considerably better price is in sight, or the sold goods are specifically needed for carrying on the business activities, the administrator will tend to opt for performing the contract obligations. The administrator will thus earn a reasonable price in exchange for the goods; the transaction is neutral from the transferor's creditors' perspective. The creditors take the money instead of the goods. This result is identical to the one achieved under a consensual model. The bankrupt's estate typically saves costs which otherwise would have arisen when efforts for selling off the goods in execution sales would have to be undertaken, and the price achieved by the original sale will typically be higher than the hypothetical result of a forced sale. In this situation, there usually is no way to achieve a better result for the (other) general creditors. It is therefore no problem (it cannot be avoided) that one of them (the buyer) parts with 100 % of an investment. Contrary to other situations discussed in this context, the buyer has, however, not advanced payment and has therefore taken no risk. Also, the same solution applies with regard to contracts for specific as well as for generic goods. Where, exceptionally, the insolvency administrator opts for terminating the contractual relationship, neither of the parties is bound to perform. This will be a disadvantage for the buyer where the buyer has made a good bargain or sustains additional loss, but the loss will usually be relatively small in relation to the total value of the mutual performances.

In detail: transferor still in possession of goods, transferee has fully paid. If, on the other hand, the goods are not yet delivered but the buyer paid the full price before the transferor becomes insolvent, insolvency law does not confer any right to choose on the insolvency administrator. Being bound to act in the interests of the insolvency creditors and treating them equally, the insolvency administrator will not deliver the goods to the buyer, but liquidate them on account of the creditors. The buyer's pre-payment will be lost to a great extent: irrespective of how the respective insolvency law rules are construed in detail, the contractual relationship will probably be terminated for the seller's failure to deliver, and the buyer's claim for repayment of the purchase price, or damages, will only be a claim against the bankrupt's estate, to be fulfilled by a certain (regularly low) percentage. As mentioned above, this is the general risk taken by each party who performs first without contracting for a security.

One may describe this situation as one where "the creditors take the money and the goods", which is sometimes used as an argument for criticising the delivery approach, being suggestive of over-protection of the transferor's creditors while the prepaying transferee gets "nothing". Some proponents – seemingly in order to stress the alleged over-protective effect of a delivery principle – add that the creditors lay their hands on the money and the goods "which the transferor himself is unable to". Such an impression would, however, be misleading in two respects: First, the pre-paying transferee is not left with nothing, but receives a proportionate part of the claim, the total value of the estate however being increased by the pre-payment contribution, inuring to the benefit of all creditors (including the buyer). Second, of course none of the creditors receives more than is due, just as the transferor could not keep the goods plus the paid price, but only one performance in exchange to the other. Rather, all creditors, including the pre-paying buyer, are treated equally. The following (heavily simplified) illustration shows the difference between a consensual and a delivery approach.

Illustration 1
When insolvency proceedings are commenced, the debtor S holds in possession two specific goods, each of a value of € 1.000, and certain other movable assets with a total value of another € 2.000. The two specific goods have already been sold, but not yet delivered, to buyers B1 and B2, who already have paid the full purchase price of € 1.000 to S. This means that S's estate, including all movable assets and the money received from B1 and B2 has a value of € 6.000. – On the other side, S is bound to perform obligations of a total value of € 12.000 to his creditors: Both B1 and B2 are entitled to receive € 1.000 (originally: the sold specific goods, or repayment of the purchase price they already paid), and in addition there are two other creditors, namely one unsecured credit giver C3 entitled to payment of € 5.000, and a tort victim C4 entitled to damages of another € 5.000.

Under a consensual system, the two buyers B1 and B2 are entitled to receive delivery of the purchased goods, each worth € 1.000, so that each of them gets out the same value as invested by prepaying (100 %). Consequently, the value of the two specific goods which have already been sold before commencement of the insolvency proceedings (i.e. € 2.000) has to be deducted from S's estate, which then amounts to € 4.000. This value is shared equally between the remaining creditors C3 and C4, so that each of them receives € 2.000 (40 %).

Under a delivery system, on the other hand, the undelivered specified goods sold to B1 and B2 form part of the bankrupt's estate, which under these circumstances amounts to € 6.000. This amount is distributed proportionally among all creditors. In the given example, each creditor receives 50 % of that creditor's claim, i.e. B1 and B2 get € 500 each and C3 and C4 receive € 2.500 each. The fact that both the goods bought, and the money paid, by B1 and B2 go into the bankrupt's estate does not result in any preference of the other general creditors C3 and C4 as against B1 and B2. Rather, all four creditors are treated equally.

In detail: transferor still in possession of goods, transferee has partly paid. The last typical situation is that specific goods are already sold but not delivered, and the price for them has already been partly paid. In this situation, none of the parties has fulfilled the obligations in full, so that it is for the transferor's insolvency administrator to decide how to serve the principle of equal treatment of creditors best. The administrator may choose to uphold the contract, i.e. to keep the part of the price already received and earn the rest while giving the goods to the buyer. Or, the administrator may choose to terminate the contractual relationship, in which case no additional money comes in, but what has already been received, as well as the sold goods themselves, can be used for proportionally satisfying all creditors. For the latter option, the insolvency administrator must take into account the hypothetical price which may be achieved when selling off the goods to a third party in an execution sale or otherwise, which may, depending on the circumstances, be lower than the total price which would be received from the original buyer. The administrator must also take into account all costs which probably must be incurred in order to find a new buyer (e.g., costs for organising an execution sale, or costs of a sales agent, perhaps additional storage costs, costs for further maintenance or management, etc.). In short, the total income to be achieved when upholding the contract (pre-payment plus outstanding price) must be held up against the hypothetical total income when terminating (the pre-payment already received from the original buyer plus the price to be achieved in an alternative sale minus additional costs to be incurred). However, where these two results are the same, and even where the hypothetical total income in case of termination is higher, the insolvency administrator has to consider that in the case of termination there is one additional creditor (the original buyer with a claim for re-payment or damages) to be satisfied from the overall assets. Depending on how much the original buyer already paid (and, therefore, is to be repaid after proportional reduction), opting for upholding the contract may still be better for the other creditors than termination.

Sticking to the contract will typically be a reasonable choice where only a small part of the price has been paid and no "better buyer" is in sight (e.g. where the original buyer already offered an above-average price). Terminating the contractual relationship, on the other hand, may suggest itself e.g. where a considerable part of the price has already been paid, or, where only a small part has been paid but the original contract was a bad bargain for the seller and a better buyer could be found without incurring many costs.

Illustration 2
Before the commencement of insolvency proceedings, S has sold specific goods to B which have not yet been delivered. The price S and B agreed upon is € 1.000, of which B has already made a down-payment of € 50. If the goods were, alternatively, sold to another person (in an execution sale or otherwise, as most appropriate under the individual circumstances), the insolvency administrator must realistically expect that the price to be achieved will only be € 960. In addition, organising such a sale to a third party and keeping the goods until they can finally be delivered to a new buyer will cause further costs of approximately € 30, so that, all in all, alternatively selling the goods to a third person will only achieve € 930. Further, S's estate comprises other assets worth € 19.000, and S has obligations against other creditors amounting to € 100.000.

If, given these facts, the insolvency administrator opts for upholding the original contract with B, the total receipts in exchange for the goods will be € 1.000 (€ 50 advance payment, € 950 to be paid in order to get the goods delivered). This amount is then to be distributed among the remaining creditors (B has already been satisfied by 100 %). In this example, total assets of € 20.000 (€ 1.000 price received from B plus € 19.000 other assets) are to be distributed amongst creditors claiming € 100.000. Consequently, the other creditors receive 20 % of their claims. This is the percentage which the insolvency administrator must oppose to the percentage of satisfaction to be achieved when terminating the contractual relationship.

Opting for the termination, on the other hand, would lead to the following result: The total receipts after having sold the goods to another buyer will only be € 980 (€ 50 advance payment made by B, a price of € 960 to be achieved when selling the goods to another buyer, minus additional costs of € 30). This amount is then to be distributed among all other creditors and B. In our example, total assets of € 19.980 (the € 980 resulting from the goods in question plus € 19.000 other assets) are to be distributed amongst creditors (including B) claiming € 100.050. In the end, all creditors, including B, receive 19,97 % of their claims.

Since in this case, the result of termination will be less favourable for the other creditors, the insolvency administrator will opt for upholding and fulfilling the contract with B.

Illustration 3
The facts are identical with those given in illustration 2, except that B already pre-paid € 500.

Opting for a continuation of the contract with B will lead to the same result as achieved in illustration 2: The total receipts in exchange of the goods will also be € 1.000 (€ 500 advance payment, € 500 still to be paid). B will be satisfied by 100 %, the other creditors receive 20 % of their claims.

Here, terminating the relationship with B will lead to a more favourable result for the other creditors. The total receipts after having sold the goods to another buyer will be € 1.430 (€ 500 advance payment made by B, plus the same price of € 960 and deduction of additional costs of € 30). Again, this amount is to be distributed among all other creditors and B. Total assets of € 20.430 (€ 1.430 resulting from the goods plus € 19.000 other assets) are to be distributed amongst creditors claiming € 100.500 (including B's claim for € 500). In the end, all creditors, including B, receive about 20,33 % of their claims.

Since this is more than could be achieved by upholding the contract with B, the insolvency administrator will opt for termination.

Delivery model serves optimal satisfaction of creditors by giving insolvency administrator's right to choose a broader scope. The illustrations and Comments provided above both show that a delivery model does not necessarily frustrate a buyer's expectations when concluding the contract and how important the function of the insolvency administrator is in the present context. The question of how the general creditors' interests are served best can not be answered schematically by providing either continuation or termination of the contract as a general guideline, but may need a careful weighing involving a number of factors. This may be turned into an additional argument in favour of a delivery model, or, in fact, a variation of the general equal treatment argument, namely that it is desirable to have a default rule which, first, leaves such important choices to a decision-maker who serves a common interest (the optimal satisfaction and equal treatment of the creditors), and second, broadens the practical scope of the administrator's right to choose. In both respects, the delivery model appears preferable as against the consensual approach. Since opting for termination will seldom be the preferable choice where the transferee has not paid anything in advance, the area where the right of termination will practically be exercised is, as stated above, where the counterparty has taken a risk by performing in advance. But still, there is no automatic "punishment" of pre-performing transferees. They may still benefit from the insolvency administrator's discretion and be allowed to receive 100 % of their counter-performance, but only where this, at the same time, serves the creditors.

No significant difference as to kind of performance. There are some minor arguments to be added which, in a broad sense, fit the context of equal-treatment-arguments, however rather focusing on the question whether the kind of performance rendered by the insolvent debtor may give rise to an appropriate differentiation. For example, when criticising the delivery model for allowing the creditors to "take the goods and the money" it is sometimes argued that such effect should not be allowed because in other situations, such as where a service provider receives a pre-payment before going bankrupt, the debtor's creditors are also unable to take the money as well as an additional value. This is, however, not considered convincing. Pre-payment for generic goods is an obvious example that this phenomenon exists and must be accepted also in other areas. As to service providers, the point is simply that such a person has "assets" other than goods which can either be directed to the original contract party or be directed to a third party under a new contract in exchange for new money flowing into the bankrupt's estate. The "asset" a service provider has is the workforce and ability to render a service, which, economically, has a value similar to goods. As long as the business goes on, this workforce can, metaphorically, be converted into money. In relation to the administrator's right to choose, etc., there is no significant difference to a sale of goods. A second argument occasionally put forward so as to justify a consensual model is that a sale of specific goods is not comparable to other situations because other creditors have no right to a transfer of specified assets. As an observation, this is correct. As an argument, it is circular.

Non-mandatory delivery model: equal treatment argument not only defensible when delivery is mandatory requirement; functions of a default rule. It has sometimes been argued that a delivery model based on equal treatment arguments as presented above could be acceptable, but only if the delivery requirement was mandatory. Otherwise, the policy of equal treatment could not be upheld since the parties could undermine it by agreeing on an immediate transfer. This kind of reasoning is, of course, correct in so far as the scope of the insolvency administrator's right to choose between upholding and abandoning the contract would be further extended, and the general creditors' percentage of satisfaction in bankruptcy would, as a tendency, increase if the parties had no possibility at all to bring about any transfer before delivery. But this would go too far. Party autonomy is a fundamental principle of these model rules in general (for contract law, cf. I.–1:102 (Party autonomy)). Exceptions must be justified by strong reasons, which do not exist in the present context (it would, e.g., go without saying that the alternative consensual principle would also not be mandatory with regard to the transferee's protection against the transferor's creditors). In particular, the equal treatment policy cannot be said to be betrayed. No one will question that creditors, in general, have, and should have, a possibility to secure their claims. A bank may require a mortgage, a personal security or a proprietary security right in movable assets before disbursing a loan. A seller of goods may stipulate for a retention of ownership device before delivering the sold goods to the buyer. A pre-performing service provider may demand a bank guarantee, etc. Similarly, a buyer who agrees to pay the whole or a part of the price in advance may require an agreement to an immediate transfer, or a transfer upon payment, or another form of security. The point is that it will be in the buyer's sphere of responsibility, just as in the case of other creditors in other situations, to decide whether to bear the typical risk of performing in advance, or to make performance dependent on a security. This, also, is an aspect of equal treatment in a wide sense.

As to equal treatment in the usual, more narrow, sense, namely of providing optimal and equal protection to those creditors who did not contract for any security granting a right of separation or preferential satisfaction in insolvency, the delivery model obviously serves these creditors' interests much better than other hypothetical default rules, in particular to granting the transferee full protection from the conclusion of the contract. The purpose of optimal and equal satisfaction will be achieved each time the default rule applies; and this means very often. This will not only be the case where parties are unaware of any possibility of regulating the issue by agreement, or forget to do so in the particular case, but also where one party (usually, the transferee) intends to contract for a transfer before delivery but the other party refuses, and situations where perhaps even both parties retrospectively claim that an agreement on a transfer before delivery has been established, but no reliable evidence can be produced. The experience from national legal systems which have adopted such a non-mandatory delivery model is that agreements on a transfer before delivery occur rather exceptionally. Also, it has already been mentioned that courts should not be allowed to accept implied agreements on an immediate transfer where sufficient evidence in this direction is not at hand.

In this context, it is also important to underline the intended purpose of a default rule in property law. In general, default rules aim at bringing about an adequate balance of the interests of the parties involved. This should, of course, be the same in a property law context. The only special aspect is that there are not only the interests of the two parties to the transaction, but also the interests of third parties involved. In the present context, it is the transferor's creditors' interests that are to be taken into account when striking the balance. This may sound banal, but it is important to stress this since otherwise it would be easy to argue that the best default rule would be one where both parties to the transaction receive 100 % of the counter-performance they envisage under the contract (which would, for specific goods, speak for a consensual model). These deliberations will also play a role in the next Comment.

Non-mandatory delivery model: transferor's interests may be parallel to those of creditors. As already discussed above, the non-mandatory delivery approach has been criticised by arguing that usually both parties to the transaction will be content with an immediate transfer (in the sense that the transferee has full protection against the transferor's creditors) so that one must expect that informed parties will regularly agree on such an immediate transfer (the transferor's interest of receiving full payment being secured by a right to withhold performance in case payment is not made or tendered). This presupposes that a typical transferor does not care about the general creditors' interests and has no personal interest in protecting the creditors' interests against the transferee. Such an assumption must, however, be questioned. It is evident that under a rule which does not automatically separate sold specific goods from the estate but keeps them in where fully paid, or leaves discretion to the insolvency administrator where the goods are partly paid before delivery, the general creditors, typically, receive a higher dividend. This can also be in the interest of the transferor. The point is that when speaking about the transferor's insolvency, one should not only think of liquidation; where business activities discontinue, it may perhaps be without relevance for the insolvent party whether the creditors get a more or less attractive percentage. But modern tendencies in insolvency law seek to provide possibilities to continue business activities, and with respect to these legal facilities it certainly matters by which percentage general creditors can be satisfied. E.g., national insolvency regulations may provide for a compulsory settlement if the debtor can discharge at least 20 % of the debts within two years. Against such a background, one may put forward the argument that a fully informed transferor in fact has an interest in increasing the estate available for general creditors as much as possible and, therefore, that the transferor's interests are parallel to those of the general creditors.

Delivery model: one rule appropriate for various situations. To a certain extent, the aspect to be discussed here is only a repetition of arguments already discussed previously. They nevertheless should not be omitted in the present context. A (non-mandatory) delivery model has the advantage of providing one rule which can be applied to practically all situations involving a transfer of corporeal movable property. This has already been discussed at some length in relation to generic goods, future goods, and other situations where a consensual approach cannot be, or usually is not, used. It also fits where a transfer is based on another kind of obligation, e.g. an obligation arising from a unilateral juridical act or from a rule of law, such as under unjustified enrichment rules, or an obligation to re-transfer goods after termination of a contractual relationship. Further, an immediate transfer before delivery would certainly not be argued to be of need from a policy point of view where the basis is a validly concluded contract for donation. Here, there will probably be agreement that the value of the property should be shared by all creditors instead of being exclusively attributed to someone who has promised no counter-performance whatsoever. Delivery, on the other hand, fits better (and may be supplemented by national insolvency law rules in the tradition of the classical actio Pauliana, allowing the creditors to treat the transfer as ineffective within a certain period of time). All in all, this broad applicability may be considered as an advantage in terms of simplicity and clarity, both for parties to orientate themselves before carrying out a transfer and for applying the law after the relevant acts have already taken place, and in terms of providing equal solutions for comparable situations.

The role of "publicity" in the sense of providing reliable information to third parties as a basis for taking decisions. Traditionally, providing publicity has perhaps been the main argument for a delivery rule in those national legal systems where the delivery rule is applicable. The idea is not restricted to these legal systems; it also appears in the possession vaut titre principle of the French tradition. The basic idea is that exercising physical control over certain goods, which is visible to the outside world, "informs" other people as to which assets belong to the person in possession. In particular, potential contractual partners of this person may, on this basis, evaluate whether the person is sufficiently creditworthy. Under this idea, the potential creditors may trust in being satisfied from these goods, if the potential debtor does not perform the contractual obligations properly. Another aspect, which is however not equally relevant in the present context of the transferee's protection against the transferor's general creditors, is that the transferee may trust in the transferor having a right (or authority) to validly dispose of the goods possessed, so that the transferee may validly acquire rights in these goods.

Today, there is a broad understanding that, with regard to (unregistered) movable property, the value of a publicity principle in the named sense is heavily eroded. This is, in particular, caused by modern commercial practices frequently applied in the field of acquisition financing, like buying goods under reservation of ownership, or employing financial leasing, etc. This observation is frequently made for today's national legal systems. It could, however to a limited extent, also be made under a system as provided by Book IX of these model rules, where the effectiveness of acquisition finance devices basically requires registration, taking into account that registration is not required where goods are supplied to a consumer, and, for the rest of the cases, registration can be made within 35 days after delivery (cf. IX.–3:107 (Registration of acquisition finance devices)). Also, the external appearance based on physical control may be incorrect because the goods in question are leased under an outright leasing contract in the sense of Book IV.B, or borrowed gratuitously. Finally, the possibility of deviating from the delivery rule for a transfer of ownership, as also accepted under the present Chapter, and, in some countries, the possibility of creating non-possessory proprietary security devices (like a transfer of ownership for security purposes in Germany), may further undermine the reliability of any "information" arising from physical control over goods. Of course, there may be significant differences as to whether physical control and ownership of particular goods statistically tend to coincide or not, depending, e.g., on the type and age of the goods (new cars being frequently acquired under a retention of ownership device, whereas an old TV set may perhaps typically be owned by its possessor), market usages and other circumstances. But obviously, generalisations of a kind that could serve as a basis for legal rules can hardly be made. In the course of developing these model rules, it was therefore agreed that the publicity idea in the classic sense should not play an important role for justifying a decision as to the transfer concept.

Especially with regard to the aspect of protecting the creditors of the person exercising physical control, the publicity idea is subject to further criticism. Even if one could rely on the person exercising physical control over goods being their owner, the argument of protecting creditors on the basis of "publicity" could not be applied to "old" creditors, i.e. to persons who have made their decision about granting credit before their debtor acquired control over the thing. The idea may, if at all, only work in relation to "new" creditors who make their dispositions at a time their debtor actually has control over the asset; with regard to "old" creditors it could only work where they make new decisions for which their debtor's possession may operate as a basis, e.g. where a decision has to be made whether to enforce the claim or to prolong the credit. Second, even where the publicity idea is applied to a "new" creditor who makes a decision now, when the debtor has the goods in possession and given the debtor, at that time, is really the owner of these goods, this may still change in the course of time until this creditor actually seeks to enforce the claim. When the credit has to be repaid later, the goods can be lost, destroyed, seized by another creditor or sold off, and the purchase price received in turn may be used up, again seized by another etc. In other words, exercising physical control over goods cannot provide any protection against future loss of assets.

For the sake of clarity, it should be added that there is nothing to be said against letting publicity play a much more important role where sufficient means for providing reliable information exist. This may be the case where an appropriate system of registration exists for certain kinds of goods (such as for ships). VIII.–1:102 (Registration of goods), therefore, contains a reservation for national rules providing such a registration system. Also, publicity may well play an important role regarding the transfer of immovable property, where an appropriate land register is established. If so, much may speak in favour of making registration a mandatory transfer requirement.

Physical control as a reasonable starting point for burden of proof. In contrast to the "prospective" functions of publicity (in the sense of providing a basis for future-oriented decisions) discussed above, the aspect of exercising physical control over the goods may well serve other functions that are relevant in a transfer system. In particular, the question of where the goods are physically placed can be a reasonable starting point for the burden of proof when – retrospectively – assessing whether a transfer has already taken place or not. Although the same kind of facts – physical control over the goods – are relevant, there are significant differences to the classic publicity idea: the aim is not to protect the expectations of parties who have their own interests in the goods (directly or indirectly, such as where the interest concerns the general creditworthiness of the person exercising physical control). Rather, the function is to provide a simple and workable starting point for assessments made by a person who has no such interests (e.g., a judge or an enforcement authority), or for a person who may serve particular collective interests, but appears on the scene only after the relevant acts have occurred (like an insolvency administrator who has to sort out to which customers to deliver goods, which obligations are not to be discharged and in relation to which contracts the right to choose should be exercised).

In this respect, a non-mandatory delivery rule provides a plausible starting point in placing the burden of proof as to the question of whether the parties already intended the transfer to occur (i.e., in relation to the requirements set out in paragraph (1)(e) of the present Article): Where the goods are already in the hands of the transferee, which is easy to assess, it is quite likely that the parties intended that the transfer be completed (here: that the transferee's creditors should be protected as against the transferor's creditors). It would be on the transferor (or the transferor's creditors) to prove the contrary. Where there has been no transfer of possession of the goods themselves, but the facts required by one of the equivalents to delivery provided for by VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) can be established, it is still plausible that the parties intended "ownership" to pass (here: the transferee to be protected) upon the relevant act. If the transferor, or the transferor's creditors, assert the contrary, it is up to them to provide sufficient evidence. Where, finally, the goods are still in the hands of the transferor, the burden of proof as to an agreement that property has already passed to the transferee is placed on the latter.

Together with other arguments discussed above, this scheme of distributing the burden of proof as to the parties' intention to transfer the goods fits the non-mandatory delivery approach opted for under the present Chapter. In this respect, a special reduced form of publicity-akin ideas may be used as an argument supporting the approach taken in this Chapter.

Delivery: manifest caesura also from the parties' perspective. It may be added that, also from the perspective of the parties to the transaction (transferor and transferee), delivery is a manifest event so that it will be quite plausible that legal consequences are tied to it. The same can be said for the equivalents to delivery provided for by VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery). It is not argued that these events are necessarily more manifest than the conclusion of a contract, or effecting payment, so that one can turn it into an argument strongly favouring the delivery approach (although it may, depending on how the relevant rules are shaped in detail, cf. Comment H below, possibly be argued that delivery may be more manifest than individualisation of generic goods). But in any event, it is at least of a certain value that delivery is no secret, or implausible, event from the perspective of the parties. Also, this aspect is perhaps not most important in relation to the particular question of the transferee's protection against the transferor's creditors. But it has certain relevance in signalising to the transferee that now, when delivery has occurred or is tendered, pay can be made without the risk of losing the value of the performance to the transferor's creditors.

Arguments put forward in favour delivery (cutting off the transferor's control over the goods) as a mandatory requirement. There are a couple of additional arguments in favour of a delivery rule which have been put forward especially in Swedish doctrine and court practice, where the requirement of delivery – or rather a requirement that the seller's physical control over the goods must have been cut off effectively – has traditionally been a mandatory prerequisite for granting the transferee protection against the transferor's creditors. These arguments are not used here, because the delivery model proposed in the present Chapter is intended to be non-mandatory and the arguments do not fit in such a context. They should nevertheless be briefly mentioned.

(i) One argument is that a mandatory delivery requirement makes it unnecessary to distinguish between outright transfers and transfers of ownership for security purposes where, based on general principles of the law on proprietary security rights in movables, it is necessary that the security giver has lost the power to factually dispose of the goods (or that registration has been made under the relevant rules). Under the model adopted in the present Chapter, any practical difficulties in distinguishing between outright transfers and security transfers, given that the goods concerned are still in possession of the "transferor" and the "transferee" (or both) argue that there has been an agreement on transferring outright ownership to the transferee before delivery (VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass)) will be solved quite naturally on the basis of burden of proof rules. The person who claims a right to separation from the transferor's estate must prove that the relevant requirements are fulfilled. In particular, the transferee will have to prove that (a) the parties really concluded the contract, that (b) thereby (or at another time prior to delivery) a property right was intended to be transferred and (c) that this property right was outright ownership, without a security purpose.

(ii) Another argument is that the mandatory Swedish delivery (cutting off) rule effectively prevents acts defrauding the transferor's creditors. Such acts could either be simulated transfers, i.e. a "formal" agreement really concluded between the parties at that time which, however, internally was agreed never to be carried out in reality (e.g., a farmer who fears that enforcement proceedings will be carried out in the near future, agrees with a cousin to pretend that they herewith transfer the horses to the cousin but leave them in possession of the "transferor" and invoke this agreement when a creditor shows up). Or, the fraudulent attempt could be made by subsequently "construed" transfers which, in fact, did not take place but are now pretended to have taken place, with the same intention that the creditors will be prevented from enforcing their claims against the transferor. Such acts are intended to be "neutralised" from the outset, as they anyway could not be effective without cutting off the purported "transferor's" physical control over the goods. Such purposes cannot be fulfilled by the non-mandatory delivery model adopted in the present Chapters. There are, however, other legal means to tackle such fraudulent acts. The general contract law rule of II.–9:201 (Effect of simulation) provides that the parties' true intention prevails, i.e. no transfer takes place. This rule directly applies to the contractual "entitlement" of the transferee in the sense of paragraph (1)(d) of the present Article and, with regard to the "agreement as the time ownership is to pass" (paragraph (1)(e)) it is applicable by virtue of VIII.–1:104 (Application of rules of Books I to III). The transfer, thus, will be ineffective in relation to the transferor's creditors. A transferee from the transferee could, however, possibly be protected under paragraph (2) of the said II.–9:201 (Effect of simulation). In addition, also for situations where the parties' fraudulent intentions cannot be indubitably verified, there are insolvency law rules entitling the creditors to treat a transfer as ineffective, and similar provisions applicable outside insolvency proceedings (actio Pauliana and similar concepts). Since these general rules govern the issue in relation to all other kinds of performances, the same may well be applied to transfers of corporeal movable assets. Where the parties cannot produce sufficient evidence that they have in fact agreed on a transfer before delivery, a valid transfer will have to be denied anyway. Also, one may question whether the risk of parties betraying their creditors in a way discussed here is that imminent today. For consumer contracts, this has been answered in the negative by the Swedish legislator and a consensual approach has been adopted recently. All in all, this risk is not considered strong enough to cause a change towards a mandatory delivery system.

(iii) A third purpose the non-mandatory delivery model will not fulfil is to help counteract the potential temptation of an economically troubled person to dispose repeatedly of the same asset (there may be a typical preference to take such risks among people in such situations). This possible function primarily prevents valid double dispositions, but may indirectly also prevent the creation of new claims (of second transferees or security takers) against the debtor.

(d) Unpaid transferor's protection against transferee and transferee's creditors

General; comparative background. Another aspect of "ownership" occurring in a transfer situation is that the transferor, at some stage, will lose the possibility of resorting to the goods for the purpose of protecting the interest in receiving the counter-performance due under the relevant legal relationship (e.g., payment of the price under a contract of sale, or re-payment of the price where both performances must be returned after termination of the contract). This is, so to say, the opposite question to the one discussed above. Again, the question affects not only the transferee, who is bound to effect performance anyway, but also the transferee's general creditors, who will be affected if the transferee becomes insolvent. This issue is, however, a clearly less controversial one when looked upon from a comparative perspective taking into account the solutions offered in the European legal systems. Where the legal system provides for a "unitary" delivery approach, it already follows from this starting point that the transferor does not lose protection as against the transferee's creditors before delivery is made. Under consensual systems, on the other hand, one can observe a clear tendency to counteract the effects which would, in principle, follow from the consensual approach: the unpaid seller is usually granted protection at least while having physical control of the goods, by exercising a right of retention, or a statutory lien, or an equivalent device. Some consensual systems go even further and provide rights to take back unpaid goods even for a certain period after delivery. Besides, under some legal systems (also delivery systems), the seller's protection is also extended by a right of stoppage in transit.

Options and discussion. One can identify four basic approaches to this issue. (i) The first option would be to let the transferor's protection cease when the contract between the two parties is concluded (or another legal relationship is established on which the transfer is based). As indicated above, such a solution is, however, not even applied in the European consensual systems of today. The transferor would have to deliver the goods even if it is clear that no counter-performance would be received. This solution is not considered adequate and will not be further considered. (ii) The second option is to protect the transferor until full payment has been received or, at the latest, until delivery is made. This is the solution nowadays adopted in countries basically following a consensual rule (some of them, however, granting even further protection). (iii) For the third option, the starting point would be protecting the transferor until delivery. However, if full payment has been received before, there is nothing left to be protected. Functionally, this solution therefore equals the second option discussed above. (iv) Finally, the solution could be protecting the transferor even after delivery, provided payment has not yet been made. There are many ways in which such an approach could be implemented in detail. The transferor could, e.g., be entitled to take back the goods within a certain time limit (e.g., eight days after delivery has been made). Instead of a right of separation (e.g. of demanding that the goods be physically returned), the transferor could also be given a right of receiving preferential payment. The strongest protection would be a right to preferential payment or even to separate the goods until payment is actually made. The latter would mean that a retention of ownership would be provided for, ex lege, as a default rule, so that it would always apply unless the parties have agreed otherwise. Such broad protection is, however, considered to go too far. As discussed above in relation to the transferee's protection against the transferor's creditors, performing in advance generally means taking a risk. Like other creditors, a transferor of goods can make advance performance depend on a security, which is in this case even relatively easy to bring about, namely by agreeing on a retention of ownership. In this respect, it appears preferable to treat a seller of goods in the same way as other creditors. Further, a rule providing for a retention of ownership by operation of law would not fit the principles adopted in Book IX which provide that a retention of ownership device, like other forms of proprietary security rights, must be agreed upon.

The rule adopted. As seen above, options number (i) and (iv) are not suitable while options number (ii) and (iii) are functionally equivalent. As in the end, after having analysed the different aspects of a transfer of ownership in detail, the basic rule contained in paragraph (1) of the present Article can be phrased in terms of a unitary delivery rule, it seems appropriate that the transferor's protection as against the transferee's creditors should also be phrased in this way, i.e. as described in option (iii). As to substance, this rule has the advantage of being easy to apply, both for the parties themselves and for a person subsequently charged with assessing the case. Taking into account the result achieved for the opposite issue of the transferee's protection as against the transferor's creditors, this solution provides equal protection to both parties to the transaction in relation to the other party's creditors. It further fits the principle of equal treatment of creditors in that each party who performs first without seeking a security takes a risk.

Where, due to the non-mandatory character of the delivery approach adopted in this Chapter, the parties have agreed on a transfer before delivery, the transferor may still be protected by a right to withhold performance provided by contract law (III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation)). With regard to such situations, reference is made to a special rule contained in VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership) paragraph (4) which deals with the consequences of the contractual relationship being terminated for the transferee's failure to pay the price.

(e) Right to dispose

General; comparative background. The right to legally dispose of a piece of property is another central aspect of the right of "ownership" (cf. VIII.–1:202 (Ownership)). "Disposing of" the asset in the sense addressed here means effectively transferring or creating proprietary rights in the asset, such as, in particular: transfer the right of ownership; to create a proprietary security right in the asset; or to create a proprietary right to use in relation to the asset. In a transfer situation, the question arises at which point in time this "right to dispose" passes from the transferor to the transferee. The issue becomes important when the transferor, after an obligation to transfer the goods to a particular other person, the transferee, has been created, purports to create or transfer proprietary rights in the same object in favour of another person. It is then the question whether the transferor may still validly bring about such a transaction. Second, the issue may become relevant where the transferee intends, in turn, to dispose of the asset in favour of another person and it is not fully clear whether the transfer (between transferor and transferee) has already been completed. In particular, the question of who can validly dispose of the asset can be practically relevant for situations of multiple dispositions (e.g., double sale) and good faith acquisition. The comparative background can briefly be described as follows: In unitary systems, the right to dispose follows the right of "ownership", i.e. in delivery systems, it will generally pass upon delivery, whereas under a consensual system, where the transfer concerns specified goods, it will already pass upon the conclusion of the contract (or with identification). Interestingly, the issue seems to be very little discussed in the Nordic countries, which follow a functional approach (so that, theoretically, a completely different point in time than the one chosen for, e.g., the transferee's protection against the transferor's creditors, could be decisive).

Advantages of delivery approach. When trying to evaluate this issue on its own, it appears that two instances can be identified where a delivery principle seems preferable to a consensual principle or a principle under which the right to dispose could pass upon payment when made before delivery. The first situation is that the goods are still under the transferee's physical control and the transferee does not pay the price as agreed in the contract. The transferor may ultimately terminate the contractual relationship. Thereafter, the transferor will usually have to sell the goods to another buyer, which makes it necessary to be in a position to confer good title on this other buyer. If a consensual principle applied, the right to dispose would already have passed to the transferee. Under a delivery approach, on the other hand, the right to dispose is still with the transferor so that the goods can be resold right away. The same effect could, however, also be achieved under a consensual model if termination had retroactive proprietary effect. This would be possible, but somewhat inconsistent with the general approach taken for Chapter 2, where termination does usually not have retroactive proprietary effect (cf. VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation) paragraph (3)). Also, there could be consequential problems where, in the meantime, the transferee conferred rights on third parties in good faith. Besides the delivery rule, the first situation would also be solved adequately by a rule making the right to dispose pass upon payment or at latest delivery.

Second, a delivery rule also provides an easy handling of situations where the seller of generic goods, before delivery, detects that the object already selected for the buyer is defective. The seller can unilaterally replace the object of performance without having lost the right to dispose of the item chosen first. In addition, one may repeat that the consensual rule would not work for generic goods before identification occurred, goods to be manufactured and further cases discussed above. All in all, the delivery principle appears to be preferable also in this respect.

(f) Recovery of possession from third person, rights to use and related rights against third persons

General. This section comprises a discussion of further aspects of the right of "ownership". Although it is intended to discuss them individually, it is hard to separate them strictly. Under "unitary" systems, these aspects will be linked to the right of ownership and the respective right will pass when ownership passes. In countries adhering to a "functional" approach, one can again observe that these issues are rarely discussed. Once more, it is repeated that a consensual rule could not be applied where, e.g., the transfer concerns generic or future goods.

Right to obtain or recover possession from third party. One important right of an owner is to exercise proprietary remedies to recover possession of the goods if they have got into the hands of a person who is not entitled to possess them; cf. the general right to "revindicate" the goods under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1). The issue may become relevant in different situations, such as where the goods have been unlawfully removed from the transferor's place of business before delivery, or where the transferor lost them and another person finds them, or where a third party who has, e.g., leased or borrowed the goods, does not hand them back. When evaluating whether such an entitlement should be conferred to the transferee immediately upon conclusion of the contract, or only when delivery is effected, arguments in favour of a consensual approach could be that the transferor anyway intends to part with the goods, so that it could be considered "natural" if the transferee could reclaim the goods from the third party. It has also been argued that the transferee may have an interest in exercising such a right if the transferor does not, because, e.g., unwilling or unable to do so (due to illness or absence, etc.). On the other hand, it may be argued that practically, the transferee's interests in claiming the return of the goods may be limited. The transferee would bear all the risks of judicial proceedings, i.e. would lose time; would bear the risk of losing the lawsuit; would probably be forced to incur further costs and would face the risk of not being able to recover such costs from the third party. Practically, it may be easier for a transferee to terminate the contractual relationship when delivery cannot be effected in due time and claim damages for any loss resulting from procuring substitute goods.

In addition, the transferor may have better access to evidence when the goods were taken, or got lost, from the transferor's sphere of control. Depending on the situation, it may also be easier for the transferor to find out where the goods are actually placed. There is a further argument in favour of a delivery model (or rather, against a consensual approach): if only the transferee had a right to demand the return of the goods, the transferor would lose the right to withhold performance of the obligation to deliver in case the transferee does not pay.

In the end, it seems that there are stronger arguments in favour of a delivery model. Note that with regard to double transfer situations, a special rule is proposed in VIII.–2:301 (Multiple transfers) paragraph (2) sentence 2.

Right to demand a protection order against third persons otherwise interfering with the property. Where property is interfered with otherwise than by dispossession, VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraphs (2) and (3) provides the possibility of issuing a protection order, by which the court can prohibit future interference, order the cessation of existing interference, or order the removal of traces of past interference. To a considerable extent, the evaluation regarding this aspect of ownership is similar to the one on vindication above. Since there is, however, no interference with the transferor's right to withhold performance, the result is more open. Again, one may argue that if the transferor does not (does not want to, or is unable to) make use of any protection right, it may be in transferee's interest to exercise such a right. It would, however, not be reasonable if only the transferee could exercise such a right. Before delivery, the transferee perhaps does not even know that an interference is imminent or has already taken place, whereas the transferor usually will, may typically be able to take (at least more) effective steps to prevent interference, and will typically be closer to evidence. Also, the transferor is obliged to deliver the goods in conformity with the contract or other legal relationship, so that there exist certain incentives to undertake reasonable steps so as to prevent damage. Otherwise, the transferee can withdraw from the contract, perhaps even terminate the contractual relationship for anticipated non-performance, and claim for damages. In the end, following the patterns of a delivery model would also be all right with respect to this issue of protection against third parties; adding a subsidiary right to demand such protection for the transferee could also be contemplated.

Right to use the goods. A further aspect of the right of ownership is the owner's right to (exclusively) use the object in a factual sense (driving a car, taking pictures with a camera, permitting another person to use the object). Evaluating the hypothetical rules governing the "transfer" of this aspect is difficult, since there are a lot of different forms of use imaginable and it may be advisable to distinguish between certain kinds of goods, such as, apart from specific and generic, new and used goods. As long as identification of generic goods has not taken place, granting a right to use to the transferee is of course out of the question. And, even if a transferee of specific goods had already acquired the exclusive right to use, it could, in most cases, not be exercised before delivery of the goods. In this respect, it may be said that it will in most cases be more efficient to let the right to use remain with the transferor until the goods are delivered. Also, if the transferee already had the exclusive right to use before delivery, the question would come up how to protect this right efficiently against third party interferers. It has already been noted that granting an exclusive right to proceed against third party interferers to the transferee does not appear very advisable. The point is that, depending on the circumstances (such as: new or used goods, kind of use, risk of wear and tear or damage occurring by ordinary use), the transferee may rather have a legitimate interest that the transferor abstains from using the goods than an interest in using the goods personally before delivery. This is very plausible where, e.g., a new car is sold, the value of which may considerably decrease when being used. However, since this is basically an issue between the transferor and the transferee, and since the existence as well as the coverage of such a term of non-usage may vary considerably from case to case, it appears preferable to leave this internal question to contract law, which provides the necessary flexibility, and let the external relation (e.g., the right to seek a protection order, or to claim the reversal of an unjustified enrichment) be covered by the delivery rule. This coincides with the needs which come up in some special situations. With regard to goods still to be manufactured when the contract is concluded, it may be necessary to use them for test purposes before delivery. Also, if a contractual relationship is terminated for non-payment before the goods are delivered, the transferor should have the right to use for e.g. demonstration purposes. This issue basically is parallel to the one discussed in relation to the right to dispose. Where national enforcement law provides for a possibility to enforce claims by way of sequestration of the debtor's assets – which is, however, not so frequent in relation to goods –there would even be a coherency argument: the solution for the right to use would have to correspond to the solution for the transferee's protection against the transferor's creditors.

Right to modify the goods and "right to destroy". Under general rules, an owner is further entitled to affect the substance of the goods; e.g., by modifying them in any way, or, most radically, by destroying them, as in the case of consumption. The issue is quite close to the aspect of the "right to use", as these two areas are sometimes hardly separable from one another. When discussed in relation to a transfer situation, the "right to destroy" of course becomes a rather academic issue. In relation to the transferee, the transferor is evidently not allowed to destroy the goods which are covered by the obligation to transfer, neither before nor after delivery. But that can be left to contract law. The transferor who destroyed the goods before delivery would be liable for non-performance of the obligation to deliver. Also with regard to ordinary modification scenarios, one may very well live with handling the issue basically under contract law. Depending on the circumstances, there may be a contractual prohibition of modification, at least of a modification to the detriment of the goods, and damages may be claimed for non-performance of any such obligation. In this respect, it does not matter much whether a delivery or a consensual approach is chosen. However, a certain argument in favour of a delivery approach could be that at least the seller should be allowed to repair the sold goods (whether new or used) if a defect is detected before delivery, and this should not formalistically amount to an infringement with the transferee's property right.

Right to fruits. A similar evaluation can be provided in relation to the owner's right to reap fruits from the goods. It sometimes can hardly be kept apart from the "right to use" in a reasonable way (e.g. where the use of goods is let to another person and a price is earned under a contract for lease). The evaluation goes in a similar direction. With regard to the internal relation between the transferor and the transferee, the issue should be left to contract law rules. With regard to the external relations, such as seeking a protection order or being entitled to issue a claim for the reversal of an unjustified enrichment, the delivery approach may usefully apply.

Right to claim damages from a third party. Under the traditional concept of ownership, an owner has, following from the exclusive right to the property, not only proprietary remedies but also certain rights under the law of obligations. In particular, the owner traditionally has a right to claim damages from any third party who unlawfully impairs the piece of property or otherwise causes a loss in relation to it. The loss may relate to the substance of the asset (a car is destroyed in an accident; fuel is consumed) or follow from the owner being prevented from using the goods. An arguable advantage of a consensual concept could be that the person who finally receives the goods has the right to claim damages "from the beginning" as legal proceedings may take a longer period of time. This would however presuppose that the transferee is still interested in receiving the goods despite the damage, which may possibly be the case where the goods are unique or otherwise very important to the transferee, and the damage is not so serious as to frustrate the transferee's interests in the transaction. Practically, however, a transferee will often have no interest in initiating legal proceedings against a third person with regard to goods not yet even received. It will be simpler to resort to the rights arising from the contractual relationship, i.e. to demand performance from the transferor, or to terminate the contractual relationship in case the goods are not tendered in a quality conforming to the contract. A delivery principle may have the advantage that, typically, the person in possession of the goods will have better possibilities to prevent the goods from being damaged and if damage occurs, this person may have better information and evidence to start judicial proceedings against a third party who has caused the damage. Additionally, the person who holds the goods can more easily comply with a duty to mitigate damage which may arise from principles of non-contractual liability for damage (in fact, a duty to minimise the damage can only work if it is addressed to someone who can undertake such steps). Finally, although the passing of risk is a different and independent issue, a delivery model may also fit together more easily with the rules on the passing of risk under a contract for sale, which are also based on a delivery principle (cf. Chapter 5 of Book IV.A). It also proves that the rules on non-contractual liability for damage are apt to provide adequate solutions for situations where, irrespective of the right of ownership still resting with the transferor, the economic loss is sustained by the transferee because the latter already bears the risk of loss. See VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership) paragraph (3(b) and Comment D on that Article. With regard to loss sustained by being prevented from using the goods, similar arguments as to the possibility to prevent or mitigate damage and access to evidence can be brought forward. The issue can also hardly be separated from the distribution of the right to use and the right to fruits as such, discussed above.

Right to claim reversal of unjustified enrichment. Resorting to the remedies provided for under unjustified enrichment principles is another right traditionally linked to the right of ownership. This approach is also followed by the unjustified enrichment rules provided by Book VII of these model rules. According to VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) Comment B, it will be the "owner" of an asset who can claim the reversal of an unjustified enrichment. Unjustified enrichment law is geared to an element of protected exclusivity, an entitlement to prevent infringements or adverse interference. Taking into account the analysis in the previous Comments, this will speak in favour of applying a (general) delivery approach also in this relation. When trying to develop independent arguments (without recurring to solutions argued for other "aspects" of the right of ownership), one may perhaps say, again, that a person exercising physical control over the property may more easily prevent any unauthorised use or consumption by a third party, and it may therefore be more efficient to link the access to legal protection to these abilities. These are, however, not considered to be very compelling arguments. In some situations, namely where the third party's enrichment correlates with physical damage to the goods, it may in fact be preferable for a transferee to stick to the rights under the contract (as discussed for the right to claim damages). With regard to unjustified enrichment remedies, there exist specific risks that the disadvantaged person will not be compensated for the full amount of the disadvantage if the enriched party (third party) acted in good faith; in particular, there is a limitation to any "saving" of the enriched party under VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (2) and a defence of disenrichment under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment). It may be easier, and less risky, to proceed against the other contracting party. All in all, it appears that choosing a delivery approach is also an adequate solution in this context.

(g) Conclusive remark on payment rule

General. As pointed out above, delivery or the conclusion of a contract (and identification regarding generic goods) are not the only possibilities when designing a transfer rule. One could also think of making payment of the price the decisive turning point. This would not be unreasonable in so far as, for example, many arguments put forward in favour of a consensual model are, in fact, based on the goal of protecting pre-paying buyers. Also, with regard to the transferor's protection against the transferee's creditors, payment of the price is the crucial aspect. Since payment could be made before or after delivery, in full or in part, there are, however, several hypothetical options to consider.

Transfer upon payment, even after delivery. The most radical option would be to let a transfer take place, as a general (default) rule, when payment has been effected in full – even if that happened after delivery. This option has already been rejected with regard to the aspect where it would be most important, namely the transferor's protection against the transferee's creditors. It does not seem suitable either with regard to other aspects, e.g. when it comes to claiming the return of the goods unlawfully removed, by a third party, from the transferee's place of business before the price has been paid.

Transfer upon payment, or at latest upon delivery. The more reasonable option would be to let ownership (or specific aspects of it) pass when payment is made before delivery, or where payment is not made before that time, upon delivery. Still, there are a number of options as to how such a rule could be shaped in detail. The transfer could occur only when full payment is effected, or upon payment of a certain percentage, or upon any payment. Or, theoretically, the right could "pass" step by step, proportionally to payments made, by creating co-ownership in the goods which is, step by step, transformed into sole ownership of the transferee. The latter option may appear "fair" in a certain sense, but is impractical in a number of instances, starting from administration issues with regard to, e.g., the use of the goods (the majority shifting gradually), protection against third parties, and even the question how to wind up the transaction when it turns out that the full price will never be paid. Defining a certain percentage of payment upon which the full right would pass would be better, but would always have a certain arbitrariness. A concept which, in fact, received considerable support in the course of developing the basic rule for Chapter 2 was that in a contract for the sale of goods, under which the buyer has agreed to pay the price or part of the price in advance of delivery, the parties are taken to intend that ownership of the goods is to be transferred when payment (including partial payment) is made, unless it is shown that the parties have established another arrangement. This would mean that ownership would pass when at least a part of the price is paid. However this approach was rejected by the majority of the Study Group's Co-ordinating Committee, which approved the delivery-based concept adopted in Chapter 2. The most important arguments are similar to those already discussed in relation to the consensual principle as a possible solution for the transferee's protection against the transferor's creditors. Performing in advance, in general, means to take a risk; the principle of treating the creditors equally has been given preference. With regard to some other "aspects" of ownership, namely the transferor's protection against the transferee's creditors and, partly, the right to dispose, a payment rule of this type appeared to be adequate, but not more adequate than a delivery-based model. However, where it comes to protection against third parties (right of revindication, right to claim damages, etc.), criteria like physical control and the transferee's option to terminate the contractual relationship, if the transferor's obligations are not performed as required, are usually of importance. Such criteria are independent from payment. In summary, it is considered preferable to start from a delivery principle. In addition, the argument could be brought forward that a payment rule, which would be a new concept in the European arena, could lack acceptance. This has, however, not played any considerable role in the evaluation process.

(h) No specific consumer protection arguments

General. Taking into account the model rule character of this project, it has been contemplated whether there are any specific issues of consumer protection to be taken into account. If so, this may either be an additional argument when deciding on the general transfer rules, or specific transfer rules for transactions involving a consumer could be adopted. However, the second option (specific transfer rules for consumers) never received much support throughout the discussions on the present Chapter. There appears to be agreement, or at least a strong majority view, that there are no sufficient reasons to treat transfers involving consumers differently from other transfers. Consumer protection arguments have, on the other hand, been brought forward when discussing the general transfer model. They were usually directed towards supporting the consensual model. These views did not, however, attract a majority.

Consumer can be either party. One aspect to consider is that consumers can find themselves in either position of the scheme. They may act as a transferee (which appears to be the position consumers are most frequently associated with); but the consumer can also act as a transferor (e.g., when selling a used car to a car dealer, or to another consumer). There will often be consumers among the general creditors of a transferor; e.g., consumers who ordered generic goods from a distance seller who became insolvent (which is significant because in that situation, consumers may often find themselves "on the seller's side"). In the same way, consumers may be among the general creditors of a transferee. When the discussion is about implementing consumer protection policies when choosing the general transfer model, this makes it hard to say that going down a particular route is in the interest of consumer protection.

Consensual rule and consumer protection. If it were to be decided, contrary to the proposals made here, that protecting consumers by property law means should be a main policy, the question would come up to what extent such a policy could be served efficiently by opting for a consensual principle, or a payment rule, respectively. One may think, in particular, of situations like distance selling or purchasing a new car, where (partial) pre-payment may be asked from the consumer. One must take into account that such transactions will often be contracts for generic goods (in the case of motor vehicles, they sometimes do not even exist yet) and, as repeatedly stated above, a consensual approach cannot provide protection to the transferee before the goods have been identified. In the case of distance selling, for example it will be doubtful whether opting for a consensual principle would put a consumer-buyer in a much more favourable position as compared to a delivery-based transfer model. All in all, it is of course obvious that a consensual (or payment) rule would, on the whole, be preferable to buyers (including consumers, where acting in this role). But the weight the consumer protection aspect adds in this respect is not regarded as sufficient to outweigh the advantages of the system opted for.

D. General discussion of requirement of a separate real agreement

(a) General

General; the concept of a "real agreement". Especially from the perspective of continental European legal systems, another basic issue as to the concept of a transfer system is whether or not to adopt the concept of a so-called "real agreement". The basic idea of this concept is that the existence of a mere obligation – or, phrased in the terminology of this Article, of the transferee's "entitlement as against the transferor to the transfer of ownership by virtue of a contract or other juridical act, a court order or a rule of law" (cf. paragraph (1)(d) of this Article) – does not suffice to make the transfer effective. There is at that stage only an obligation to effect the transfer on the transferor's side, and a respective right on the transferee's side to demand that such a transfer be effected. The real agreement concept means that, irrespective of (or in addition to) this named first requirement, the parties have to conclude a separate contract, the content of which is an agreement to actually dispose of the proprietary right, i.e. an agreement to transfer the right of ownership and to obtain ownership, respectively. This (second) contract is the "real agreement".

As reflected in more detail in the Notes to this Article, there are a couple of continental legal systems – usually systems which have adopted a delivery approach – where the real agreement concept is recognised, either in the text of the statutory transfer rules itself, or, more often, by court practice and legal writing. Where already the contract produces proprietary effects, as under the French tradition, the concept is not needed. It is also unfamiliar in common law systems and in the Nordic countries and is partly considered to be superfluous. For the purposes of these model rules, the choice depended on an analysis of whether such a constructive device could achieve sufficient practical advantages to justify its adoption.

In the following, it will be argued that the adoption of a real agreement concept is not required. The basic transfer rule provided by the present Article is, therefore, silent on this issue.

Further details as to the real agreement concept. It is noteworthy that in those legal systems which have adopted the real agreement concept, it rarely happens that the real agreement concerning a transfer of movable property is concluded explicitly. Regularly, it is assumed that the parties have concluded the real agreement impliedly by conduct. From a critical point of view, it may be argued (and, in fact, partly is argued also in these countries) that assuming the existence of a separate real agreement is, therefore, more or less fictitious; or, at least artificial and remote from everyday life. Another issue, which is of course related to this "invisible" nature of the real agreement, is that it is not self-evident at which point in time such an agreement should be deemed to be concluded. The traditional view in most countries (if the matter is discussed at all) seems to be that the real agreement is concluded upon delivery. At least in one country (Austria), a modern approach, on the other hand, assumes that where the basis of the transaction is a contract, the real agreement regularly is concluded already when the underlying contract is established. If it was decided to adopt a real agreement approach, these issues would have to be clarified.

Concept not needed. The concept of a real agreement is not indispensable from a logical perspective. The underlying entitlement to transfer does not necessarily need an additional contract to become effective in property law; rather, the effect of a passing of ownership can simply result from a rule of law, provided specific requirements are fulfilled. This approach is followed for the purposes of the present Chapter. Where the transfer is based on a contract, the same result could, regularly, also be achieved by interpreting the parties' statements and conduct when concluding this contract. A person who, e.g., agrees to sell goods under a contract of sale is, apart from undertaking to transfer the ownership (i.e., from consenting to the creation of an obligation), usually also declaring consent to the result of the whole transaction being performed (i.e., in particular, that ownership will pass to the buyer). Likewise, the transferee will at least implicitly declare consent to becoming the owner.

(b) Practical advantages a real agreement concept may have

Prevention of a passing of ownership without consent. One hypothetical purpose the real agreement concept may serve is to ensure that a transfer will not take place without the consent of the parties. This accords, in fact, with a main policy of these model rules in general, corresponding to constitutional principles and to the general principle of party autonomy. Even where a contract has been concluded which may operate as a basis for a transfer (e.g. a contract for sale), it should not be possible for the transferee to unilaterally remove the goods from the seller's premises and thereby bring about a passing of title. If a real agreement was required as a separate transfer requirement and the real agreement was deemed to be concluded only at the moment of delivery, such a concept could prevent a passing of ownership in such a situation. Under the transfer model adopted here, however, a real agreement concept is not needed in order to reach this result. Under paragraph (1)(e) of the present Article, the transfer either requires an "agreement as to the time ownership is to pass", so that both parties have to give their assent to the transfer becoming effective and conditions set out in this agreement must be met, or "delivery or an equivalent to delivery" must be carried out. Delivery, as well as the named equivalents to delivery, cannot be brought about without a voluntary act performed by the transferor. Technically, this effect is achieved by VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) requiring that "the transferor gives up and the transferee obtains possession of the goods". The same principle applies in the cases governed by VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (3), i.e. where means enabling the transferee to obtain possession (e.g. keys to a container) are handed over, and paragraph (4), i.e. where a document representing the goods is transferred. Also VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (2) requires a voluntary act performed by the transferor, namely giving notice to a third party who exercises physical control over the goods. In the case of VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (1), finally, where the goods are already in the possession of the transferee, the named effect is achieved by the requirement that the transfer must be "based on, or referable to", the entitlement to transfer the ownership (cf. paragraph (2) of the present Article). Consequently, a real agreement concept is not required in this respect.

Technical construction of a retention of ownership. In those legal systems which have adopted the real agreement concept, a retention of ownership is, usually, construed by concluding the real agreement subject to the condition of full payment of the purchase price. Accordingly, this technical function is traditionally named as one of the advantages the real agreement concept brings about. However, a comparative law perspective shows that legal systems which have not adopted a real agreement concept manage to accept retention of ownership devices. Under these model rules, Book IX on proprietary security rights provides its own requirements for an effective creation of a retention of ownership. Introducing a real agreement concept to Book VIII is not required in this respect.

Possibility of unilaterally imposing a retention of ownership. If a real agreement concept was adopted and the real agreement was deemed to be concluded at the time of delivery, the transferor could use this concept for unilaterally bringing about a "retention of ownership", without having previously agreed so with the transferee when concluding their underlying contract (under which the transferor is obliged to perform in advance). Technically, this would work as follows. Upon delivery, the transferee would (at least implicitly) declare that the passing of ownership was accepted, as originally envisaged under the contract. If, now, the transferor (explicitly) declared that ownership was transferred only under the suspensive condition of full payment of the price, there would be a dissensus in the real agreement and, therefore, no ownership would pass (since a valid real agreement would be required to let ownership pass). The effect would be functionally comparable to a situation where a retention of ownership device was agreed upon from the beginning (which however was not the case). Depending on which policy is pursued, this could be seen as an advantage and, in turn, be brought forward as an argument in favour of the real agreement concept as such. However, such a policy is not favoured here. Modalities of payment, as well as security devices etc., should basically be fixed when the contract as such is concluded, this being the time for both parties to calculate their risks and benefits from the transaction. And in particular, an approach opening up possibilities for unilaterally imposing equivalents to proprietary security rights would run against basic policies underlying Book IX on proprietary security rights, which require that security rights as well as retention of ownership devices be based on a "contract for proprietary security" (cf. IX.–1:101 (General rule) paragraph (1); the possibility to create security rights by unilateral juridical acts in paragraph (2)(b) of the named Article refers to juridical acts undertaken by the security provider, not by the secured creditor). Accordingly, a real agreement concept is not needed for this purpose either.

Further, it should be added that the transferor, theoretically, could also avert a valid transfer, even if delivery is made, for completely other reasons than securing the right to payment, and even if no legitimate reason existed at all, by explicitly withholding agreement to a transfer when delivery is made. This does, however, not cause significant practical problems in those legal systems which have adopted the real agreement concept, and the transferee could both withhold payment and enforce the right to get the property transferred by judicial proceedings. But it may be noted that the real agreement concept, if this kind of agreement is considered to be concluded at the time of delivery, at least potentially carries the risk of granting inappropriate over-protection to the transferor and the transferor's creditors. If, on the other hand, the real agreement were regarded as concluded at the same time as the underlying contract is concluded, the real agreement would, from that time on, have binding effect so that subsequent declarations, even if expressed explicitly, could not undermine its validity and effectiveness.

Security for payment where performances are to be exchanged contemporaneously. There is also no real practical need for a real agreement concept where, under the contract or other legal relationship, the mutual performances are scheduled to be made contemporaneously, but the transferee refuses or fails to tender performance. In such a situation, the transferor may withhold delivery under the general rule of III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation). Allowing the transferor to deliver the goods while retaining ownership by refusing to conclude the real agreement is not preferable. See the reasoning above.

Special situation: goods are already in possession of transferor when entitlement to transfer ownership arises (in particular: re-transfer after termination). The general right to withhold performance referred to above could be without effect where the goods are already in possession of the transferee at the time the entitlement to transfer ownership comes into existence. This is the case under VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (1), the classic traditio brevi manu. The issue is unproblematic where the transfer is based on a contract, because there the transferor nevertheless has a chance to safeguard the interest in receiving the purchase price by including suitable provisions in the contract, e.g. by agreeing on a retention of ownership. It is, however, not self-evident whether the transferor's interests are sufficiently protected where the entitlement to transfer does not arise from the (bilateral) conclusion of a contract, but from a rule of law. The main practical example seems to be an entitlement to re-transfer ownership after a contractual relationship, under which ownership of the goods already passed to the transferee, has been terminated. For the sake of avoiding terminological confusion regarding a situation of transfer and re-transfer, the following discussion will use the terms "seller" and "buyer", a contract for the sale of goods obviously being the main practical example. The following discussion will distinguish two main cases, depending on the ground for termination and the party exercising the right to terminate. In both cases, a real agreement concept could protect the buyer's (re-transferor's) interest in not being deprived of ownership – or, functionally, of not being deprived of the possibility of withholding performance until the outstanding part of the counter-performance is tendered – by not concluding the real agreement until the counter-performance is tendered or secured.

(i) The first category comprises cases where the contractual relationship, after the goods have been delivered and ownership has passed to the buyer, is terminated on the ground of non-payment. Here, termination is effected by the transferor.

> Illustration 4
> Car dealer S has sold a car to buyer B on credit without agreeing on a retention of ownership device. The car has been delivered and ownership has passed to B. After some time, B, who in the meantime failed to pay the agreed instalments, brings the car back to S for a service check. While the car is in S's garage, S terminates the contractual relationship for non-payment. Termination gives rise to an obligation to re-transfer ownership from B to S under III.–3:511 (Restitution of benefits received by performance). As the car is already in the possession of S, VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (1) will, generally, effect an immediate re-transfer to S.

If B has not paid anything to S so far, there will be no problem. There is nothing that S would have to return to B, and B does not have and does not need any right to withhold performance. There is, however, a certain disadvantage for B where the purchase price has already been partially paid. Ownership of the car is re-transferred immediately and as the car already is in S's possession, B cannot withhold its re-delivery in order to exercise some pressure to obtain re-payment of the (partially paid) purchase price. If there was thought to be any practical need to protect B in such situations, one could discuss whether the concept of a real agreement was an adequate way of providing such protection. Yet, from a balancing of interests point of view and taking into account the rules on termination in more detail, B does not seem to deserve much additional protection. First, B has caused the risky situation by not keeping up the instalments and by returning the car to S. Second, termination for delay in payment regularly requires that the creditor (S) has given a notice fixing an additional period of time of reasonable length (III.–3:503 (Termination after notice fixing additional time for performance), unless the late payment amounts to a fundamental non-performance (III.–3:502 (Termination for fundamental non-performance)). Accordingly, the potential re-transferor B is warned in advance. Knowing that there is a prospect of termination, B still has a chance to react (by either paying or taking back the car to secure the future claim for repayment of the price paid so far). In such cases, therefore, the practical need of a real agreement concept will be rather limited. It should be added that, under a real agreement concept, the buyer could – temporarily – avoid the re-transfer by explicitly refusing to conclude the real agreement even where the whole purchase price is re-paid immediately.

One could, however, not reproach the buyer for stopping payment if the buyer, for justified reasons, assumes that the car has been delivered in a defective state, and returns it to the seller in order to get the facts clarified. Practically, the seller will normally not intend to terminate the contractual relationship in such a situation, but this may change if the dispute about there being a defect remains unsettled. Again, the buyer will have to be warned by receiving an advance notice of termination and can remove the car from the seller's place of business. If the buyer, in such a situation, nevertheless leaves the car with the seller in order to have additional examinations carried out, or in order to have it repaired, one may well discuss whether such conduct of the parties may be interpreted in the sense of giving rise to an implied term to return the car to the buyer in case keeping the car with the seller affects other interests of the buyer than those which should originally be served by handing over the car to the seller. In case of termination, the buyer would have an interest in getting the car back in order to secure the right to receive re-payment of the partially paid price (while the original interest underlying the handing over of the car to the seller was to receive the performance due under the contract). Then, the seller's obligation to return the car to the buyer would, so to say, override the seller's right to get the goods re-transferred after termination. Technically, the case can be solved by the seller's retention of possession in the sense of VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (1) not being "referable to" the seller's entitlement to the re-transfer of ownership as long as the partially paid purchase price is not repaid to the buyer (cf. paragraph (2) of the present Article). Again, a real agreement concept does not appear to be necessary for reaching an adequate result.

(ii) The second category of situations comprises cases where the buyer terminates the contractual relationship because the goods have been delivered in a (fundamentally) defective state; cf. III.–3:502 (Termination for fundamental non-performance).

> Illustration 5
> S has sold and delivered a car to B. Ownership has passed, B has already paid the purchase price. After some time, a defect occurs which amounts to a fundamental lack of conformity under the contract for sale. B returns the car to S's garage and first demands repair. As S is not successful in repairing the defect within a reasonable time, B terminates the contractual relationship. As the car is already in the possession of S, the rule in VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (1) could, if applied literally, effect an immediate re-transfer of ownership to S. B would then have no possibility to withhold the car until the purchase price is re-paid to him.

It is clear that the buyer, in the end, has caused the potential risks arising from such a situation by exercising the right of termination while the car was in the possession of the seller. However, since the basic origin of the problem is that the seller failed to perform contractual obligations properly, it nevertheless seems preferable to protect the buyer from losing a security. A real agreement concept could help in so far as ownership would not pass from the buyer to the seller unless the former gave assent. This solution would work but it would still require certain interpretative efforts, in particular as to construing a real agreement at a later time when re-payment of the purchase price has been made.

Another solution to the problem could be to interpret a notice of termination, if issued by the buyer under circumstances like those described in illustration 5, in such a way that it intends to give rise to restitutionary obligations to be performed (only) contemporaneously. Such contemporaneous performance is a basic concept underlying III.–3:511 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) paragraph (1) which states that where, after termination, both parties have obligations to return, the obligations are reciprocal. Technically, again, the seller's retention of possession in the sense of VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (1) is not "referable to" the seller's entitlement to the re-transfer of ownership as long as the purchase price is not repaid to the buyer (cf. paragraph (2) of the present Article). A need for a real agreement concept does not arise.

Protection of a transferor lacking capacity at the time of delivery. The real agreement being understood as a contract, it requires legal capacity of the parties. Therefore, it could protect a transferor subject to an incapacity (e.g., a minor or mentally handicapped person) in certain situations. The first example is that the transferor lacks capacity at the time of delivery but a valid contract has been concluded prior to delivery, either because the transferor did not lack capacity at that time, or because the contract has been concluded or ratified by a legal representative of the person subject to an incapacity, as the applicable law may provide. Here, the real agreement could only produce a protective effect if it is deemed to be concluded at the time of delivery (or to be maintained up to that time). The other situation is that the entitlement to the transfer of ownership arises from a rule of law and the transferor lacks capacity when effecting delivery. In such situations a transferor subject to an incapacity may run the risk of delivering the object without, factually, being able to make use of the right to withhold performance in the sense of III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation) when the other party fails to tender counter-performance. The person subject to an incapacity possibly does not know about the right to withhold performance or may not have the intellectual abilities to assess the circumstances. The effect of a real agreement requirement would be that in such a situation, a legal representative (as may be required under national law) of the person subject to an incapacity would have to give assent to the transfer (to the real agreement) and could, on this occasion, evaluate the risks with respect of the transferee's solvency.

Here, the real agreement concept would have some practical benefit, limited to rather exceptional cases, though. However, this advantage has not been considered sufficient in order to adopt the real agreement concept as a general transfer requirement. One reason certainly is the limited scope of this advantage; another one is, as pointed out above, that the real agreement would even create an over-protection of the transferor, as the possibility to refuse the conclusion of the real agreement would not be restricted to cases where the other party does not pay. Finally, the risk of effecting performance without being able, due to a lack of capacity, to evaluate the risks of not receiving one's counter-performance is not a specific problem of property law arising only where ownership of goods is to be transferred. It is a general matter of the law on obligations and corresponding rights and it may, perhaps, be solved under general rules.

Extending the transferor's creditors' rights to treat the transfer as ineffective in the transferor's insolvency. National insolvency law rules, and partly also rules applicable outside insolvency situations, provide the creditors' rights to treat a transfer as ineffective under certain circumstances, e.g. where the transfer has been a gratuitous one and occurred within a certain period of time before the commencement of insolvency proceedings, or where the transaction was intended to be to the detriment of the creditors (so-called actio Pauliana and comparable concepts). These rules usually impose certain time limits, and given that the underlying contract related to such a transaction could be concluded a long time before delivery is made, and a real agreement could be deemed to be concluded at the time of delivery, a real agreement concept could have the effect that, under these rules, a juridical act (the real agreement) could be set aside where the other juridical act (the contract for sale, or donation) could not, because it was concluded outside the relevant time limits. This could be considered a further advantage of a real agreement concept. However, it has not been considered adequate to adopt a real agreement concept for this reason. Primarily, it is an issue of insolvency law under which preconditions, and within which time limits, transactions should be subject to a right to be set aside. At least some national insolvency laws also accept that factual acts (like delivery) can be covered by these rules. Accordingly, no argument in favour of a real agreement concept is developed from these instances.

Technical vehicle for implementing an "abstraction principle". Finally, a strong argument for adopting a real agreement concept could be put forward if it was decided to adopt a principle that the transfer may take place independently from there being no valid entitlement to transfer the ownership, but based on the mere agreement "that ownership shall pass". Such an "abstract" transfer principle is, however, not favoured here. Accordingly, this potential argument does not arise.

(c) Conclusion

Real agreement concept not needed. It emerges from the discussion in the previous Comments that there is hardly any practical need for a real agreement concept under the framework of these model rules. It has also become obvious that the concept partly would have over-protective effects. It is, therefore, not adopted.

E. General discussion of a "causal" versus an "abstract" transfer system

(a) General

General; "causal" and "abstract" transfer concept. This part of the Comments refers to another basic distinction usually made when "classifying" different transfer systems: the causal – abstract dichotomy. Under a "causal" approach, a valid transfer requires to be based on a valid obligation to transfer or, as it is phrased in paragraph (1)(d) of the present Article, that "the transferee is entitled as against the transferor to the transfer of ownership by virtue of a contract or other juridical act, a court order or a rule of law". Under an "abstract" transfer system, such an "entitlement to the transfer" in the sense of paragraph (1)(d) is not required. In addition to the other prerequisites (like the transferor's right or authority to dispose, and delivery etc., cf. paragraphs (1)(a) to(c) and (e) of the present Article), the transfer just requires a valid real agreement in the sense discussed above. As a result, ownership also passes when the underlying contract is void or avoided, as long as the real agreement is valid. In such a case, the legal systems employing the abstract transfer principle, however, provide for an obligatory claim to re-transfer ownership. Since the practical differences between the two approaches, above all, come up where the goods have already been delivered and the underlying contract is avoided subsequently, e.g. on account of mistake, fraud, coercion or threats, one may functionally phrase one part of the issue also in terms of protecting the transferor against the transferee's creditors after delivery. In a wider sense, the issue is then not only confined to cases of avoidance, but could be extended to the question of whether other means of setting aside a contractual relationship, like termination or withdrawal, should have retroactive proprietary effect (equivalent to the effect of a "causal" transfer rule) or not. These issues are discussed in the context of VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation). In the present context, the main focus will be on avoidance. Another conflict where the causal/abstract dichotomy plays a role is the conflict between the transferor and a (potential or actual) acquirer from the transferee. This is discussed furrther below.

The principle of abstraction is employed in German law and, following this model, in Greece and Estonia. The other European countries can be said to employ a causal transfer model, although the question is not identified as a particular issue in all legal systems. Details are reflected in the Notes.

Hypothetical alternative concepts. Theoretically, opting either for a causal or for an abstract model are not the only possible solutions. One could, for example, try to analyse in which particular instances either a retroactive proprietary effect (in the sense that ownership is treated as never having passed from the transferor to the transferee), or the mere creation of an "entitlement to transfer ownership" (which would only take effect upon delivery or another instance provided by paragraph (1)(e) of this Article), or perhaps an immediate, but not retroactive, "automatic" re-transfer by operation of law appears to be most adequate. The outcome could be different solutions according to criteria like: which rule is used to set aside the contract and which policies underlie this rule (public policy or protection of one of the parties); the weight of the respective ground of setting aside the contract (e.g., fraud or threats probably being more severe instances than simple mistake); or whether it was the transferor or the transferee who exercised the relevant act entitling the other party to set aside the contractual relationship and whether it appears justified that this party, or the other party, and the parties' creditors, may benefit from, e.g., a retroactive proprietary effect. Such an approach could suggest itself if one tries to arrive at solutions by weighing the relevant interests involved, as promoted by a "functional approach". Accordingly, such options were, to a certain extent, discussed during the process of developing the present Chapter. The result, however, was a clear preference for adopting simple and clear-cut rules such as providing retroactive proprietary effect for all cases of avoidance in the sense of Book III Chapter 7, and triggering a mere obligation to retransfer in cases of termination, withdrawal and revocation of a donation. The main argument for this simple solution obviously was to provide clarity and legal certainty.

The rule adopted: causal transfer. For the reasons reflected below in section (b) of these Comments, a causal approach was adopted. This rule is implemented in paragraph (1)(d) of the present Article. Also paragraph (2) of this Article relates to the same principle. The principle is further clarified in VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation).

(b) Evaluation

Protection of commerce; conflict A – C. The policy behind the abstraction principle is commonly described as providing protection of commerce. Future purchasers from the transferee (for the purpose of the following discussion: the third person C) are not forced to investigate the validity of the underlying contract between transferor (A) and transferee (B), which is regularly considered to cause difficulties. As the issue concerns situations where, either from the beginning or retrospectively (after avoidance), the contract between A and B is invalid, the situations discussed here are potentially – namely: if an abstract transfer system is not adopted or where a re-transfer has already taken place when B purports to transfer to C – (also) covered by Chapter 3 on good faith acquisition. These rules exactly serve the purpose of striking a balance between protection of commerce in general (protection of C) and the interests of the original owner A who may ultimately lose his right of ownership if protection is granted to C. Accordingly, the question comes up why, i.e. for which particular policy reasons, it should be necessary to decide one and the same type of conflict differently from the general rules provided for such conflicts, namely those on good faith acquisition. Also, as a matter of principle, it seems preferable to solve that conflict in the relation in which it occurs, i.e. in the relation A – C (which means to deal with it under good faith acquisition principles) and not in the relation A – B (which would be the case under an abstraction principle). Chapter 3 will then be the place for fine-tuning the requirements as to C's good faith adequately; see also the following Comment. Further, good faith acquisition rules may decide whether to adopt further general requirements under which a sub-purchaser (C) appears to be worthy of more protection, such as a requirement that the purported transfer in the relation B – C must be for value.

Only C in good faith deserves protection. In particular, a third party acquirer (C) from the transferee only deserves protection when acting in good faith. Under Chapter 3 on good faith acquisition, this is an indispensable requirement. Under the abstraction principle, however, C would acquire ownership (without being obliged to re-transfer it) even if C actually knew that the contract between A and B was invalid. This seems to be an inadequate over-protection of C (or "commerce" in general).

Conflict between transferor (A) and transferee's (B's) creditors. As pointed out above, the legal systems adhering to an abstraction principle do not at all provide that where the underlying "entitlement to the transfer" (the contract between A and B) is invalid, ownership of the goods remains, once and for all, with the transferee. On the contrary, the transferee B will be under an obligation under the law on unjustified enrichment to re-transfer the property to the original transferor A. To this extent, the difference between the causal and the abstract approach basically comes up when B becomes insolvent before re-transferring the goods to A. In other words, the conflict can be described as one between the transferor (A) and the transferee's (B's) general creditors. Since avoidance cases are rooted in special defects affecting the validity of the contract, the adequate policy is considered to be that the transferee's creditors should, so to say, step into their debtor's shoes. This policy fits a causal approach. A right to choose whether to fulfil outstanding mutual obligations under a bilateral legal relationship or to "terminate" this relationship apparently only exists in relation to contracts, not for situations of a re-transfer.

Publicity. Since, under an abstraction principle, avoidance of a contract only creates an obligation to re-transfer, but the transferee, for the time being (usually until delivery) remains the owner, this approach obviously fits better to the idea of publicity than a causal approach, under which ownership retroactively reverts to the transferor. This may speak in favour of the abstract transfer approach. However, as noted above, publicity is considered not to play an important role under this Chapter in general. Accordingly, this argument does not carry much weight in the present context either.

Difficulties for abstraction policy due to voidability of real agreement. The real agreement – which is traditionally used as a central technical vehicle to implement an abstraction principle – is understood to be a contract and, consequently, is subject to general contract law rules. If this concept was adopted in the present Chapter, this would follow from the general rule in VIII.–1:104 (Application of Books I to III). Consequently, the real agreement would, among others, be subject to the provisions on invalidity as provided by Chapter 7 of Book II. In particular, the general rule on avoidance on account of mistake (II.–7:201 (Mistake)) would apply to the real agreement. This would lead to a problem well known in those legal systems where the abstraction principle is adopted: although the validity of the real agreement is intended to be independent from the validity of the underlying entitlement to transfer ownership, the real agreement may happen to be voidable for exactly the same reason which causes the voidability of the underlying contract. If the real agreement is avoided as well, the transfer necessarily falls. Obviously, such a double avoidance undermines the policies which may be pursued by an abstraction principle. And obviously, the question of how the relevant rules on avoidance of a contract are shaped in detail plays a considerable role in this respect. Arguably, II.–7:201 (Mistake) would bear the "risk" (depending on the perspective one takes) of opening up a rather broad scope for double avoidances. The rule deliberately does not distinguish between different categories of misapprehension; it is equally applicable to mistakes of facts and of law (cf. Comment H on that Article). If, e.g., a buyer of a used car is entitled to avoid the contract for sale because she was in the mistaken belief, caused by the other party, that the car had never before been involved in an accident and had never had major repairs, which was explicitly revealed to be of significant importance to the buyer before the contract was concluded, the buyer most probably could, for the same reasons, also avoid the real agreement: she would not have concluded this agreement had she known about the true properties of the car. Depending on the circumstances, it could also be argued that the real agreement is voidable because one party erroneously believes that the underlying contract is perfectly valid, although it is subject to a right of avoidance. This may be the case where, e.g., the other party caused this mistake (as to the validity of the underlying contract), but also where both parties made the same mistake; see II.–7:201 (Mistake) paragraph (1)(b). Given this legal environment, an abstraction principle would most likely not work efficiently. This is another, and perhaps conclusive, argument for not adopting it in these model rules.

F. Conclusive remark on the role of party autonomy

Considerable importance. Freedom or party autonomy is a fundamental principle underlying these model rules. It plays a considerable role regarding transfers of ownership under this Chapter. Whereas the framework set out by the basic rule in this Article is mandatory, it leaves much room for the parties to design their transfer within that framework. This applies, first and foremost, to the time of the transfer, which can, basically, be freely stipulated by the parties. See paragraph (1)(e) of this Article, which allows the parties to agree on any time or condition, subject to general limitations such as the prerequisite of identification for generic goods. However, there is considerable scope for party agreements also within this general identification requirement, since even where the transferor holds a stock of equivalent goods, the description of the object of performance may be made more and more precisely, which often, but not always, may make an earlier transfer possible. Also where future goods are to be transferred before delivery, the parties may agree at which stage of completion the transfer will occur.

Party agreements indirectly affecting third parties. Especially with regard to the non-mandatory character of the delivery rule adopted in paragraph (1)(e) of this Article and the consequence that the parties may, on this basis, bring about an outright transfer at any time before delivery without this being "visible" to other persons, it has been argued by some that this should not have effect on third parties. It should, however, be noted that this is nothing extraordinary. In particular, the alternative model of a consensual transfer would not essentially differ in this respect. For some situations, if one considers that third parties should be able to rely on an apparent situation, good faith acquisition rules may provide protection to a certain extent.

G. Conclusive remark on a functional versus a unitary-based approach

Unitary starting point, but not as far-reaching as hypothetically possible, and open to exceptions. The working group in charge of preparing Book VIII tried to make use of the functional approach as a working method. This certainly turned out to be helpful in many instances. It may also facilitate future discourse in property law matters. However, it became apparent throughout the course of developing the rules of this Book that many European lawyers would in fact face difficulties if confronted with a statutory text phrased in a functional approach style.

As to substance, the analysis carried out as to whether a consensual or a (non-mandatory) delivery approach appears preferable in different situations showed that the latter approach would be either preferable, or at least equally workable, in almost all instances examined. With regard to the choice between a "causal" or "abstract" – or a more differentiated – transfer approach, there was a clear majority in favour of broad, simple and clear-cut rules. Given all this, it is preferred to phrase the rules of Chapter 2 more in the style of a unitary transfer approach, by setting out requirements for a transfer of "ownership" in the sense of the definition provided by VIII.–1:202 (Ownership), taking place at one particular moment as defined by the rules of this Chapter. At the same time, the unitary starting point will not determine all questions which might arise. For this reason, VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership) contains a number of clarifications which, in conjunction with the definition of ownership, make clear what is linked, and what is not linked, to a transfer of ownership. In addition, the policy has been to be prepared to adopt exceptions to the basically unitary approach whenever this seemed appropriate. The latter is the case, e.g. with regard to the special rule contained in VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership) paragraph (4), with regard to VIII.–2:301 (Multiple transfers) paragraph (2), with regard to VIII.–2:304 (Passing of ownership of unsolicited goods) paragraph (3) and, arguably, with regard to VIII.–2:307 (Contingent right of transferee under retention of ownership). The way of dealing with a re-transfer of ownership upon termination, while the goods are already in possession of the former transferor, may also be mentioned in this context, although no formal exception in the rules was thought necessary as the matter can be dealt with by interpretation

General reasons for this drafting style. Shaping these rules in a unitary-oriented drafting style would, of course, not have been possible if the preferences as to substance had been very different. However, as has been pointed out above, the analysis carried out in the previous Comments allows this to be done. It is then a matter of taste and other factors how to structure and present the Articles. Representatives, in particular, of the Nordic countries would have preferred to describe each problem separately in plain, simple and direct language which, it was argued, would be easier for ordinary people and ordinary lawyers to grasp. One would, then, have one rule stating that under a contract for the sale of goods, the buyer, provided the contract is for specific goods, has a right to separate these goods in the seller's insolvency under certain requirements (e.g., those listed in paragraph (1) of this Article). One would have an additional rule for generic goods (probably defining under which circumstances identification is brought about), possibly another one for goods to be manufactured – all that for the question of the buyer's protection against the seller's creditors in the latter's insolvency. The same question would presumably have to be regulated separately for other contracts than sales (e.g., donations in the sense of Book IV.H), transfers based on a unilateral juridical act, on a rule of law (possibly different solutions for different rules of law) or on a court order. Then, other conflict situations would have to be regulated separately, e.g. the requirements for a seller to retain the goods if payment is not made as agreed under the contract; the same issue for transfers based on other legal grounds, etc. Then there would have to be something on the right to dispose, rights to use, and protection against third parties and so on.

Since these model rules aim at presenting solutions for a very large range of patrimonial relations, many of which have property law implications, the number of such "simple and direct" rules would have to be considerable. Nordic legal systems adhering to a functional approach manage to do without such a huge number of single rules. They manage to do so because they, in their statutory provisions, simply leave a lot of issues unregulated. In their legal tradition, this works without causing major problems and without causing considerable uncertainty. Court practice and legal writers step in. Still, a number of issues seem to remain largely undiscussed (e.g., the passing of a "right to dispose", issues like the right to use etc.). Yet, these model rules in general follow a codification-like approach. Compatibility with other parts, such as unjustified enrichment law, non-contractual liability for damage, sales and proprietary security rights, is considered to be of major importance. There is, however, no example of a codification-oriented, functional approach-based set of rules on the issues related to a "transfer of ownership" of movable property in Europe. One could try to develop that in a project like this, but presumably, many people would consider this to be quite risky. Certainly, reading a rule phrased in terms of a "transfer of ownership" may cause difficulties in understanding for a Scandinavian lawyer. On the other hand, if there were just a couple of rules for "main cases", continental European lawyers would be insecure about remaining gaps; and if there were a lot of separate detailed rules (as adumbrated above), it could in turn be difficult for people to identify which rule exactly fits the case in question. Legal cultures differ. The attempt made here is to analyse the issues individually as far as feasible, but to phrase the result in a unitary approach, as far as possible. This is intended to serve consistency, workability and predictability.

As pointed out already, opting for a unitary-based model partly also appears preferable from the viewpoint of other parts of these model rules (e.g. the rules on unjustified enrichment).

H. The basic rule in detail

General. This Article, primarily in its paragraph (1), contains the basic requirements for a derivative transfer of ownership. It implements the policy decisions and conceptual approaches discussed in the foregoing Comments. Many of the following Articles are linked to one of the rules set out in this Article and regulate the respective principles in more detail.

The requirements provided by paragraphs (1) to (3) of this Article must be fulfilled cumulatively in order to effect a transfer of ownership. This effect (the transfer of ownership) is already spelled out in paragraph (1); it is however repeated and further clarified in VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership). Where the requirement of paragraph (1)(c) is not met, good faith acquisition under Chapter 3 may take place provided the additional prerequisites set out there are fulfilled.

Parties: transferor and transferee, owner. This Article, as well as the subsequent Articles of this Chapter, speaks of the "transferor" as the one party to the transaction and the "transferee" as the other. Evidently, the transferee is the one who is to acquire the right of ownership by virtue of the transfer. The transferor, on the other hand, may – and most often will – be the owner of the property who personally undertakes (or is otherwise bound) to transfer it; but not necessarily so. The transferor in the sense of this Chapter can also be a person who is not the owner, but who is authorised to legally dispose of the property in that person's own name. Such authority may be granted either by the owner or by a rule of law. In such cases, the acts carried out by the transferor will affect the right of the owner: ownership directly passes from the owner to the transferee (acquirer). The legal relationship based on which the transferee is entitled to demand the transfer of ownership in the sense of paragraph (1)(d) of this Article will, however, exist between transferee and transferor.

Where a representative in the sense of Book II Chapter 6 acts on behalf of the transferor, or on behalf of the transferee, the parties in the sense of this Chapter are nevertheless the transferor and the transferee, respectively (cf. II.–6:105 (When representative's act affects principal's legal position)). For the purposes of Chapter 3 on good faith acquisition, also the person who, without having a right or authority to dispose of the property, purports to transfer the ownership is named a "transferor"; see VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership) paragraph (1) and the Comments on that rule.

(a) Goods must exist (paragraph (1)(a))

General. Paragraph (1)(a) of this Article provides that a transfer of ownership can only take effect when the goods concerned exist. This requirement is not fulfilled both where the goods do not exist yet and where they do not exist any longer. The rule does not preclude that certain acts required for the transfer, e.g. the conclusion of a contract under which the transfer is undertaken, may be carried out in advance. Parallel requirements are provided for assignments of a right to the performance of an obligation (cf. III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) paragraph (1)(a)) and for the creation of proprietary security rights (cf. IX.–2:102 (Requirements for creation of security rights in general) subparagraph (a)).

Certain flexibility provided by party agreement. As to goods to be manufactured in future, certain flexibility exists in so far as it is up to the parties to define what they consider as the "goods" to be transferred. If they, e.g., agree that a ship is to be transferred when semi-finished (practically to be defined more closely), then the half-finished ship fulfils the requirement of "existing goods" in the sense of this Article. The parties do not have to wait until the ship is finished completely. Further, they can agree that any material added to the ship in the shipbuilding process from that time onwards will be transferred to the buyer of the ship upon being combined with the already existing hull.

(b) Goods must be transferable (paragraph (1)(b))

General. The content of paragraph (1)(b) is self-evident. A transfer cannot take place where the goods are not transferable in a legal sense. This is, however, only exceptionally the case. The issue is regulated by VIII.–1:301 (Transferability). The assignment chapter contains a parallel rule in III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) paragraph (1)(b). The same applies to proprietary security rights, cf. IX.–2:102 (Requirements for creation of security rights in general) subparagraph (b) and IX.–2:104 (Specific issues of transferability, existence and specification).

(c) Transferor must have the right or authority to transfer (paragraph (1)(c))

General. Paragraph (1)(c) embodies a basic principle of property law. A person cannot transfer more rights than that person has, as expressed in well-known Latin maxims like nemo dat quod non habet, or nemo plus iuris transferre potest quam ipse habet. This principle is extended in so far as also a person who is not the owner may validly transfer ownership of a piece of property if so authorised by the owner or a rule of law. VIII.–2:102 (Transferor's right or authority) specifies the general requirement stated in this subparagraph further with regard to some details. As mentioned above, where the person purporting to undertake the transfer has neither a right nor an authority to transfer the ownership, good faith acquisition under Chapter 3 may take place.

Again, a parallel rule applies to assignments (III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) paragraph (1)(c)). See also IX.–2:105 (Requirements for granting of security right) subparagraph (b).

Transferor's right to dispose. The term "right to transfer the ownership" is intended to address the owner of the property. The owner's right to legally dispose of the property is a basic element already in the definition of the right of ownership; see VIII.–1:202 (Ownership). The owner may also grant authority to dispose to another person (see next Comment) which, however, is not considered to preclude the owner from exercising the right to dispose personally (as long as the goods have not been transferred by that other person). However, the owner's right to dispose may be limited to the extent that the asset is encumbered with a limited proprietary right of a third party. The owner can then still dispose of the right of ownership, but the other person's limited proprietary right remains unaffected.

Transferor's authority to dispose. A transfer of ownership may also be validly brought about by a person who is not the owner of the goods, provided that this person has "authority to dispose". Such authority to dispose can be granted by the owner (as a derivative of the owner's own right to dispose). A main practical example is a sale by commission. The commission agent does not own the goods, but is granted authority to legally dispose of the goods by their owner, the principal. The commission agent concludes, in the agent's own name, a contract for sale with a third party, and transfers ownership of the goods (also in the agent's own name) to the buyer. The transaction is effective since it is based on the commission agent's authority to dispose. See also VIII.–2:302 (Indirect representation) and the Comments on that Article. Authority to dispose can also be granted within certain limits. E.g., authority to dispose can be granted with the restriction that a certain minimum price must be achieved, or that certain other acts are performed. For example, where a producer of goods sells products to a trader subject to retention of ownership, the producer may grant the trader authority to dispose of the goods (free of any rights of the producer) subject to the condition that the trader's rights against the customers are assigned to the producer for security purposes.

The transferor's authority to dispose may also be granted by a rule of law. E.g., a secured creditor may have authority to dispose of the encumbered asset under the rules on extra-judicial enforcement of proprietary security rights; cf. IX.–7:207 (General rule on realisation) in conjunction with IX.–7:211 (Sale by public or private auction or by private sale) and IX.–7:213 (Buyer's rights in the assets after realisation by sale).

(d) Transferee's entitlement as against the transferor to the transfer of ownership (paragraph (1)(d))

General: entitlement. The transfer must be based on a legal relationship between the transferor (in the sense discussed above) and the transferee, by virtue of which the latter is "entitled" to the transfer of ownership as against the former. The formula used in this subparagraph corresponds to VII.–2:201 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified). In principle, the transferee's "entitlement" corresponds to an obligation (in the sense of Book III) of the transferor to transfer the ownership, but the concept is neutral in terms of any particular state of performance. The entitlement exists and persists as from the time of its creation, regardless of whether performance has already been made or not. In terms of facilitating a common understanding from the perspectives of different legal traditions, the term "entitlement" has been considered advantageous in so far as it lacks the "prospective" connotation of "obligation", which is, e.g., in some traditions questioned with regard to a spontaneous gift from hand to hand which is made without there being any prior obligation to make it. Similarly, different views on whether an "obligation" is present could be brought forward regarding a case where a person puts glass bottles into a recycling bin. The concept of "entitlement" is intended to cover all this. An obligation to transfer may have arisen in advance, or the parties may agree to carry out the same kind of transaction immediately, be it a transfer in exchange for a counter-performance, or a gratuitous transfer. A mere "real agreement", without the parties' consent as to the economic purpose of the transaction, would not fit this concept.

Entitlement must be "valid". At the same time, the requirement of there being an "entitlement to transfer" imtegrates the "causal" transfer approach into the basic transfer rule. Where there is no valid entitlement to the transfer of ownership, a transfer cannot take place even though all other requirements set out in paragraph (1) of this Article are fulfilled; and where the entitlement is extinguished retrospectively after the transfer has already been carried out, the transfer falls. This issue is regulated in more detail in VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation). The "causal" approach is further underlined by paragraph (2) of this Article where it is stated that the delivery or equivalent to delivery must be "based on, or referable to" the transferee's entitlement.

By virtue of a contract or other juridical act. Subparagraph (d) also lists the four possible bases of an entitlement to the transfer of ownership. Entitlement by virtue of a contract certainly is the most important category in practice. In particular, an entitlement to the transfer of ownership of goods in the sense of this Article may arise from a contract for sale (IV.A.–2:101 (Overview of obligations of the seller) subparagraph (a)) or donation (IV.H.–3:101 (Obligations in general) paragraph (1)(b)). "Other juridical acts" are basically unilateral juridical acts undertaken by the transferor in the sense of II.–4:301 (Requirements for unilateral juridical act), where the party doing the act intends to be legally bound to transfer ownership. In such a case, the potential transferee is not forced to accept the passing of property. The passing of property can, e.g., be prevented by factual means such as by refusing to take delivery, or by rejecting the right by notice to the transferor (II.–4:303 (Right or benefit may be rejected). Other juridical acts may be those provided for by the (national) law of successions, which do not lead to universal succession but cause an obligation to transfer goods to a certain person, e.g. a legacy.

By virtue of a court order. The transferee's entitlement to the transfer and the transferor's obligation to transfer, respectively, may also be established by a court order. For instance, one spouse may be ordered to transfer certain goods, such as household equipment, to the other spouse by a divorce judgment.

By virtue of a rule of law. Finally, the transferee's entitlement as against the transferor may result from a rule of law, provided the requirements set out in the respective provision are fulfilled. Two important examples are the disadvantaged person's right to get an unjustified enrichment reversed under Book VII and the right of restitution of benefits received by performance which arises as a consequence of the termination of a contractual relationship (III.–3:511 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) paragraphs (1) and (3)). See also III.–3:205 (Return of replaced item) and the benevolent intervener's duty to hand over anything obtained as a result of the intervention under V.–2:103 (Obligations after intervention). Theoretically, the entitlement may also result from an obligation to effect reparation under the rules on non-contractual liability for damage.

(e) Agreement as to time ownership is to pass, delivery or equivalent to delivery (paragraph (1)(e))

General. Subparagraph (e) implements the non-mandatory delivery model discussed above. The main rule, therefore, is that the transferor and the transferee may decide themselves when ownership will be transferred by concluding an "agreement as to the time ownership is to pass". In this case, ownership passes when the conditions set out in this agreement are fulfilled, provided that the other general requirements of this Article – such as the preceding subparagraphs of paragraph (1) and the identification requirement in paragraph (3) – are met as well. The parties can agree on a point in time before or after delivery of the goods. In particular, they can agree that ownership will pass immediately upon the conclusion of the underlying contract, or at the point in time when payment is made. This principle is repeated in VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to time ownership is to pass) and will be discussed further in the Comments on that Article. The "agreement as to time" in the sense of the present subparagraph also covers cases where the parties have made the transfer dependent on a condition. In this respect, the present Article is supplemented by VIII.–2:203 (Transfer subject to condition). Where the parties, on the other hand, have not concluded such an agreement as to the time ownership is to pass, default rules apply. The default rule in paragraph (1)(e) provides that ownership passes upon delivery or where the prerequisites constituting an equivalent to delivery are fulfilled. These terms are defined more closely in the subsequent provisions, namely VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) and VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery), and will be discussed in the related Comments. The reasons for choosing this model have alredy been fully discussed.

Functionally – to a certain extent – comparable requirements are provided in the rules on assignment (III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) read with II.–1:102 (Party autonomy)) and on proprietary security rights, where IX.–2:105 (Requirements for granting of security right) subparagraph (d) requires that the secured creditor and the security provider agree on the granting of the security right in order for the security right to be created and, in addition, the secured creditor must generally acquire possession or be registered in order for the security right to become effective (IX.–3:102 (Methods of achieving effectiveness)).

Hierarchy when applying the default rule system. As mentioned above, the party autonomy rule has priority over the default rules requiring delivery or an equivalent to delivery when the parties carry out their transfer. Retrospectively, when assessing whether a transfer has already taken place, the possession aspect immanent in the delivery concept gains importance in so far as the delivery rule will be the starting point for the distribution of the burden of proof. Accordingly, if the goods are already in the hands of the transferee, ownership will be taken to have passed unless it is shown that the parties have agreed on a later transfer, e.g. upon payment in case of a retention of ownership. On the other hand, if the goods are still with the transferor, it will be on the transferee (or the transferee's creditors) to assert, and provide sufficient evidence for this assertion, that the parties have agreed on a transfer before delivery and that the conditions of this agreement have been met. If the transferee manages to prove only that a contract giving a right to the transfer (in the sense of paragraph (1)(d)) has been concluded, this will not suffice. It is certainly not intended that courts undermine the delivery principle adopted in this Chapter by presuming the existence of implied agreements on an immediate transfer in the sense of a consensual transfer approach. Where there is no sufficient evidence that an agreement to this effect has been made, the default rules must be applied. Depending on the circumstances, however, it may be easier to make it plausible that ownership was intended to pass before delivery where also payment was made before delivery.

The equivalents to delivery provided for in VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) are designed to cover specific situations where the goods themselves are not moved from the transferor to the transferee, but it is nevertheless typical that the parties intend to bring about a transfer of ownership. In the case covered by paragraph (1) of the named Article, a physical handing over of the goods themselves has already taken place before. In the other situations, a physical handing over of the goods themselves will typically follow. Regarding the issue of the burden of proof, this means that where the goods are not yet in the hands of the transferee and no agreement as to a prior transfer of ownership is on hand or can be proved, a transfer will nevertheless be accepted where the requirements of one of these equivalents are fulfilled and sufficient evidence can be provided in this respect. Otherwise, one will have to await delivery of the goods themselves in order to accept a transfer.

Reference to other paragraphs of this Article. Paragraph (2) of this Article provides that the delivery or equivalent to delivery must be based on, or referable to, the transferee's entitlement. Paragraph (4) clarifies that, of course, a party agreement, delivery or an equivalent to delivery is not necessary where a court order or a rule of law itself determines the time of the transfer based on it. Both rules are discussed in the relevant Comments below.

(f) Delivery or equivalent to delivery must be based on, or referable to, the transferee's entitlement (paragraph (2))

General. Paragraph (2) of this Article requires that there must be a certain inner link between the "factual" criteria of delivery or an equivalent to delivery and the legal bond between the transferor and the transferee, by virtue of which the latter is entitled to the transfer. The delivery or equivalent to delivery must be "based on, or referable to" the underlying entitlement. The function of this rule is, mainly, merely a clarifying one, but in some – rather exceptional – cases it may also serve a normative "corrective" function.

Accentuation of the causal approach. As already indicated above, paragraph (2) underlines the "causal" transfer approach adopted under this Chapter . This idea is more explicitly repeated in VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation), but it is considered preferable to make this issue clear already in the basic rule.

Protection from transfer to take place where equivalent to delivery is not referable to entitlement. Exceptionally, there may occur situations where a party to the transaction is in a situation where an entitlement to the transfer has arisen and, also, the requirements of an equivalent to delivery are fulfilled, but an effective transfer should nevertheless be denied because the one is not sufficiently related to the other. The main example will be where the entitlement arises from a rule of law and the goods are already in the hands of the transferee, so that VIII.–2:205 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (1) would apply, but the transferor would thereby be prevented from using the protective remedy of withholding delivery of the goods. Cases where this may become relevant include a termination of a contractual relationship when the sold goods are temporarily with the seller. One may solve such cases by denying the "referable to" requirement. This should, however, only be applied exceptionally.

Terminology: based on, or referable to. The "based on" formula corresponds with the purpose of accentuating the causal approach as described above. However, where the transferee is already in possession at the time when the underlying entitlement arises (cf. VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (1)), the "based on" terminology was not considered ideal. One may, however, say that the retention of possession is "referable to" the entitlement arising in such a situation (cf. also VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) Comment B with Illustration 2. At the same time, the "referable to" formula helps to solve the (minor) problems addressed in the previous Comment.

(g) Identification of generic goods (paragraph (3))

General. All European legal systems acknowledge a principle of speciality in property law: a proprietary right can exist only when it is clear in which object it exists. As a consequence, the transfer of goods which are defined by generic terms in the underlying entitlement ("generic goods") requires that the goods are identified (individualised, appropriated to the contract). The national rules differ in detail. In many countries, the issue of identification is rather little discussed with regard to the transfer of property (it is often more intensively discussed with regard to the parallel issue in the context of the passing of risk). Theoretically, the scale may cover identification only in the transferor's head (when deciding to take a specific asset to fulfil the obligation to the transferee), identification by notice to the other party, identification by both parties' consent, or identification only when this is obvious to third parties. Also, it could be required that the act of identification must be irrevocable. In the present Article, the identification requirement is deliberately not regulated in too much detail in order to keep a certain flexibility if need be. It is only stated that where the goods are defined in generic terms, they must be identified to the transferee's entitlement.

Proposed understanding: no standardised requirements, rather a matter of proof. The proposed understanding of the requirement is that there is no need to adopt, by way of interpretation, certain standardised requirements such as that the other party must give assent, or must be given notice, or that the act of identification must be irrevocable. It may play a certain role that under the delivery-based approach adopted in this Chapter, the identification requirement does not have the function of deciding when ownership of generic goods usually does pass. Rather, since the parties must contract out of the delivery-default-rule in order to achieve a transfer before delivery, it may be sufficient that it becomes clear which goods are affected by the transfer. This is enough so that ownership may pass. The burden of proof as to the fact that certain goods have been selected rests with the person who asserts that the transfer took place.

In this perspective, it will hardly suffice that a selection took place internally "in the transferor's head", as it is hard to imagine how sufficient plausible evidence could be provided for this. In view of the function of the rule discussed above, it should, on the other hand, not be impossible to bring about identification by a unilateral act (the decisive aspect being that identification becomes sufficiently clear retrospectively). The contrary could be accepted if the possibility of unilaterally identifying the goods caused a particular risk to the other party, or that party's creditors, or to the identifying party's creditors. But this does not seem to be the case. The transferee would be negatively affected if the risk of loss under the contract of sale passed to the transferee unreasonably early. But this is another issue and regulated independently in Chapter 5 of Book IV.A. For the transferor's creditors, the fact that the goods leave the transferor's patrimony at an early stage may of course be a negative implication. But the most crucial fact in this respect is that the transferor agreed on a transfer before delivery. Identifying the goods to the transferee's entitlement can never have the effect that the transfer occurs at an earlier time than stipulated in the agreement as to the time ownership is to pass. When, and by which means, identification is made after this agreed point in time does not put additional risks or disadvantages on the transferor's creditors. In order to defend the transferor's unilateral possibility to make identification, one may also invoke a certain parallel to the rules on alternative obligations which provide that the choice belongs to the debtor (alone) unless the terms regulating the obligation provide otherwise (cf. III.–2:105 (Alternative obligations or methods of performance)). Finally, it is considered that the act of identification need not necessarily be irreversible. One would otherwise exclude a number of practically important situations, for instance, where identification is made by separating, marking or even packaging the goods, as long as the transferor has these goods in possession: the transferor could remove the marking or packaging, or could return separated items to the stock from which they were taken. The point is that where a potentially reversible act of identification is not reversed subsequently, the transferee should arguably not be put in a worse position than where an irreversible act had been made. If, on the other hand, the transferor actually reverses an original act of identification and nobody gets to know of this, a judge will anyway not accept that identification had occurred. Finally, where the transferor reverses an act of identification but the transferee succeeds in proving that identification had already been made before, the transferor will arguably not deserve specific protection, so that it appears reasonable to accept a valid transfer to the transferee.

When delivery in the sense of VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) is made, there will regularly be no question that identification in the sense of paragraph (3) has occurred.

Sentence 2: reference to rules on transfer of goods forming part of a bulk. VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) contains an extension of the identification rule provided by the present Article. Where generic goods to be transferred are contained in a specified bulk, they are not themselves identified (so that ownership in specific items might pass), but at least the bulk is identified. The named rule, therefore, opens up the possibility of acquiring co-ownership in the mass or mixture contained in that bulk. For details, see the Comments on that provision.

(h) Clarification concerning court orders or rules of law determining the time of the transfer themselves (paragraph (4))

Purpose of the rule. Paragraph (4) clarifies that the requirement of there being delivery or an equivalent to delivery (unless the parties have determined the time of the transfer by agreement) does not apply where the transfer takes place under a court order or a rule of law and the court order or rule of law itself determines when ownership passes. This is probably self-evident but is, nevertheless, spelled out explicitly for clarification purposes.

VIII.–2:102: Transferor's right or authority

(1) Where the transferor lacks a right or authority to transfer ownership at the time ownership is to pass, the transfer takes place when the right is obtained or the person having the right or authority to transfer has ratified the transfer at a later time.

(2) Upon ratification the transfer produces the same effects as if it had initially been carried out with authority. However, proprietary rights acquired by other persons before ratification remain unaffected.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the rule. This Article supplements paragraph (1)(c) of the basic rule contained in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) which requires that the transferor has the right or authority to transfer the ownership. The standard cases addressed by the general rule are that the transferor's right or authority to dispose exists when the transferee's entitlement to the transfer of ownership is created, or at least at the time ownership would pass subject to the fulfilment of the other general requirements, i.e., basically, at the time agreed upon by the parties, or upon delivery. The present Article deals with situations where the transferor still lacks the right or authority to dispose at that time.

Brief overview of cases regulated. Where the transferor lacks a right or authority to transfer the ownership at the time ownership is to pass, there is still a possibility that the transfer takes place at a later time. The present Article defines two alternative requirements. The first alternative is that the transferor, later, acquires the right to dispose personally (i.e., acquires ownership of the goods in question). This alternative is discussed in Comment B below. The second alternative is that the true owner, or another person actually authorised by the owner, ratifies the transfer at a later time (see Comment C below).

B. Subsequent acquisition of right to dispose

Rationale; comparative background. Where a person disposes of property without having the right to do so, but acquires this right at a later point in time, this person should be bound by the earlier dispositions although they were ineffective originally. Therefore, the transfer should become valid when the missing requirement (the right to dispose) is fulfilled subsequently. A rule of this kind exists in many European legal systems.

How the rule works. The transfer takes place when the transferor, who did not have the right of ownership originally, subsequently acquires ownership and thereby obtains the right to dispose. Ownership then passes to the transferee at, and with effect as of, this very moment (ex nunc effect).

Illustration 1
A sells goods to B; ownership is to pass upon delivery. Before delivery is made to B, B sells the goods on to C. They agree that ownership will pass upon the conclusion of this contract. This will, however, not be possible since at that time, A is still the owner. However, at the moment B receives the goods and thereby acquires ownership of them, ownership immediately passes to C.

C. Ratification

General. The second rule provided for by this Article is that, where a person lacking authority has purported to transfer the ownership, this transfer becomes valid when the transfer is ratified either by the owner of the goods (i.e. the person having the right to transfer) or by a person actually authorised to dispose of the property. The underlying idea is that nothing should speak against the validity of a transfer initially carried out without the transferor having sufficient authority provided that all parties involved – i.e., the transferor and the transferee, who have already consented to the transfer, and the owner of the goods, who will be affected by it – agree. In this sense, one may say that the fundament of the rule is serving the idea of party autonomy. Whereas this principle is rather simple in relation to these three parties involved, the issue becomes more complicated where there are other persons who, between the purported transfer carried out without authority and its subsequent ratification, have acquired rights in the same goods from the person whose right has been alienated. This issue appears to be little discussed in many European legal systems. Where it is discussed or even regulated by statute, the solutions differ as to details. They have in common, however, that such other persons are protected in one way or the other.

The rules on representation contain a parallel provision in II.–6:111 (Ratification) paragraph (2), which provides that upon ratification, the act originally carried out without authority "is considered as having been done with authority, without prejudice to the rights of other persons".

Ratification. As mentioned above and expressly stated in the text of this Article, ratification may be made by the owner himself or by a person legally authorised to transfer the goods. Parallel to II.–6:111 (Ratification), ratification can be made by express declaration addressed to the transferor (who acted without authority) or to the third party transferee. Also, ratification may be implied from acts of the owner (or authorised person) which unambiguously demonstrate an intention to adopt the transfer; cf. II.–6:111 (Ratification) Comment A.

Effect of ratification in general (paragraph (2) sentence 1). The general effect of ratification, as stated by paragraph (2) sentence 1, is that the transfer becomes valid retrospectively, i.e. as if it had initially been carried out with authority (ex tunc effect). As a consequence, for instance, if the transferee has meanwhile transferred rights to another person, these rights become valid. The rule corresponds to the parallel provision in II.–6:111 (Ratification) paragraph (2).

Rights acquired by third persons before ratification remain unaffected (paragraph (2) sentence 2). The most problematic issue addressed by this Article is how to deal with proprietary rights which meanwhile – i.e. between the purported transfer undertaken by the person lacking authority and the ratification of this transfer – were acquired by third parties in relation to the owner of the goods. Such acquisitions doubtlessly were valid originally, since they were made from the owner. However, upon the preceding transfer to another person being ratified retroactively (sentence 1), the owner would, retrospectively, have to be treated as a non-owner, which could make the acquisition of this third party ineffective, or make it dependent on the fulfilment of good faith acquisition rules (requiring, inter alia, the taking of possession and that the acquisition is for value; cf. VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership)).

Illustration 2
A authorises C to dispose of certain goods, owned by A, under specific limits. C, exceeding these limits, concludes a contract for the sale of these goods with B1 on July 1. On August 1, A himself concludes a contract for the sale of the same goods with B2. At that time, the goods are still in possession of A. Both contracts have been concluded with the agreement that ownership passes immediately. Now, A ratifies the contract concluded with B1 (who, say, agreed to pay a better price).

Illustration 3
A authorises C to dispose of certain goods, owned by A, under specific limits. C, exceeding these limits, concludes a contract for the sale of these goods with B1 on July 1. They agree that ownership passes upon conclusion of the contract, but leave the goods in possession of A. On August 1, the bank B2, a creditor of A, seizes these goods when enforcing a claim against A. Thereafter, A ratifies the contract concluded with B1.

The approach opted for in sentence 2 is that proprietary rights acquired by other persons before ratification remain unaffected. In Illustrations 2 and 3 above, B2 would, therefore, prevail. With regard to "double transfer" situations (such as in illustration 2), this solution is considered justified in so far as B1's "right" can only be "created" by A by breaching the pre-existing contract with B2 (by ratifying the contract between C and B1). Ratifying the contract with B1 bears an element of wrongfulness as against B2. It seems to make more sense to require the good faith of B1 (if B1, in the case of Illustration 2, first takes delivery of the goods) than the good faith of B2 (which would be necessary for B2 to acquire if the rule in sentence 2 were not adopted). In general, the good faith acquisition rules of VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership) – which could alternatively be employed to solve the issue – are not considered to protect B2 sufficiently.

With regard to situations like the one in Illustration 3, the proposed approach appears justified because it prevents the owner from depriving creditors of seizable assets. Also in these situations, subsequently ratifying the contract with B1 would bear an element of wrongfulness as against B2.

This solution appears to be coherent with the representation rule in II.–6:111 (Ratification) paragraph (2), which also has a proviso for the rights of other persons.

VIII.–2:103: Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass

The point in time when ownership passes may be determined by party agreement, except where registration is necessary to acquire ownership under national law.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the rule. This Article, on the one hand, repeats what has already been stated in the basic rule in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e), namely that the parties to the transaction are free to determine the time of the transfer of ownership by agreement. The rules on delivery and equivalents to delivery provided for in the subsequent Articles are only default rules. On the other hand, the present Article serves the function of clarifying the relation of the party autonomy rule to other transfer rules. Under the concepts adopted in this Chapter, however, there is only a need for such a clarification in relation to those rules of national law which require registration in order to acquire ownership. See VIII.–1:102 (Registration of goods). Theoretically, there could be further reservations for situations where, e.g., documents representing the goods have been issued or the goods are in the possession of a third party. But it is not intended that a transfer by agreement as to the time ownership is to pass is precluded in such situations; cf. VIII.–1:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraphs (2) and (4) with Comments C and E.

Comparative background. Virtually all European legal systems allow the parties to determine the time of transfer by agreement. This is evidently so with regard to agreements on a point in time after delivery; but also where the parties agree that the transfer shall take place before delivery, such an agreement is effective (subject to exceptions in double transfer situations, and subject to a general exception with regard to the transferee's protection against the transferor's creditors in Sweden, unless a consumer sale is involved). In those countries which follow a consensual approach, it goes without saying that the parties may also agree on any later point in time for the transfer becoming effective. And where the legal system requires delivery, it is widely accepted that the parties may establish a so called constitutum possessorium, i.e. an agreement under which the transferor undertakes to possess the goods for the transferee, which is considered to be sufficient to bring about a transfer of ownership. One can, therefore, say that the rule stated in this Article is an (almost) generally accepted one in Europe.

Concept of agreement as to time ownership is to pass. The agreement in the sense of this Article is on the time when ownership is to pass. Although this, practically, can hardly be strictly separated from agreeing that ownership will pass (at the relevant time), which would equal a "real agreement", it is clear that the latter concept is not required under these model rules (see the Comments on VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general)). The concept of an agreement as to the time ownership is to pass is deliberately designed to have a wide coverage, encompassing agreements on any time before or after delivery of the goods. A prominent example is the classic constitutum possessorium already mentioned above. Where the parties, e.g., agree that the transferor, from now on, leases the goods from, or stores the goods for, the transferee, this also implies an agreement that from now on, the transferee is the owner and the transferor will hold the goods as a limited-rights-possessor for the transferee (cf. VIII.–1:207 (Possession by limited-right-possessor)); or in other words: that ownership of the goods passes immediately.

Illustration 1
S intends to sell his sailing boat sooner or later. However, he would like to undertake one ultimate cruise of three weeks. B is interested in the boat. She does not mind if she gets it handed over only three weeks later, provided that S obeys certain guidelines as to the use of the boat and pays at least a small price for using it. They conclude a contract for sale and agree that S leases the boat for three weeks' time. This implies the intention of the parties that ownership passes to B and S henceforth possesses the boat for B.

However, it is by no means required that the agreement involves any arrangement about possession; it is not even required that any of the parties has possession at all. In this respect, the concept of an agreement as to the time ownership is to pass exceeds the classic construction of a constitutum possessorium. There is no obvious reason why it should not be possible to effect a transfer where, at the moment, neither of the parties is in possession of the goods.

Illustration 2
Goods owned by S have been stolen. There is hardly any hope of recovering them. B, a specialised detective, makes an offer to S to buy these goods for a certain price (considerably lower than the market value). Subsequently, he will try to trace the stolen goods at his own risk and expense and, if successful, will sell the goods off. There is no reason why it should not be possible for S and B to carry out the transfer now, although neither of them currently is in possession of the goods.

Illustration 3
S lost his valuable Rolex wrist watch when swimming in a lake. He does not exactly know where this happened and anyway, he would not be able to dive that deep to recover the watch. B, a hobby diver, offers to buy the watch for a relatively low price because he would like to keep it for himself. Also, he would like to proceed against a third person in case another person finds the watch before him. Again, S and B should be able to transfer ownership of the watch right now. The present Article makes this possible.

For the purpose of clarification, it should be added that an agreement on a constitutum possessorium is exclusively covered by the present Article and does not (also) fall within VIII.–2:104 (Delivery). The latter rule requires that the "transferor gives up" possession, which would not be the case under a constitutum possessorium where the transferor continues to possess in the capacity of a limited-rights-possessor (e.g., as a lessee). Also where the parties agree that the transferor will henceforth exercise physical control as a possession-agent for the transferee (cf. VIII.–1:208 (Possession through a possession-agent)), e.g. where an employee sells her car to the employer and it is agreed that she will keep on using it, such transaction is covered (only) by the present Article. This may be of certain – technical – importance in order not to undermine the clear order of rule and exception between the delivery rule and the party autonomy rule.

Form of agreement. There are no specific requirements as to the form and manner of concluding an agreement in the sense of this Article. In particular, it is not required that the agreement must be recorded in a written document or must be concluded expressly. It may also be implied from the parties' conduct (cf. II.–4:102 (How intention is determined)).

Technically, this follows from VIII.–1:104 (Application of rules of Books I to III). As to substance, it is maintained that strict formalism would hinder the parties' flexibility to regulate the transfer of ownership according to their individual needs and often would produce inappropriate results. The fact that there are no formal requirements does not, however, make it permissible to undermine the delivery-default-approach..

When agreement can be made. An agreement as to the time ownership is to pass can be concluded at any time from the creation of the underlying entitlement to transfer ownership (VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(d)) until any form of delivery or an equivalent to delivery (VIII.–2:104 (Delivery), VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery)) occurs, because then, ownership would pass upon delivery (or equivalent) in the absence of an agreement. In principle, the parties can also conclude the agreement as to the time ownership passes before the underlying entitlement comes into existence. Where the transfer is based on a contract, the agreement as to time will regularly be made at the same time as the underlying contract is concluded, but it can also be concluded separately at a later time. It is further possible that the parties first agree that ownership will pass with delivery but later (before delivery) agree that ownership will pass at another point in time. The later agreement replaces the first one.

The agreement can also be made in advance when the goods do not yet exist or are not yet owned by the transferor ("anticipated" agreement).

Burden of proof; no undermining of delivery rule. As repeatedly pointed out above, it is neither intended, nor would it be permissible under general rules of interpretation, that the delivery-default-approach be undermined by an inflationary accepting of implied agreements as to an immediate transfer. In order to accept a deviation from the delivery rule, clear evidence must be provided for the fact that an agreement as to that time of transfer has been concluded validly and on time. The burden of proof as to the existence of such an agreement lies with the one who asserts it; e.g., where a transfer prior to delivery is claimed: on the transferee. Compare VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) Comments C and H.

General limits. As also discussed above, the effect of an agreement as to the time ownership is to pass is also limited by general rules, such as that the goods must exist at the time ownership is intended to pass or that generic goods must be identified (VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraphs (1)(a) and (2); cf. also Comment C on that Article). The general requirements set out in the basic rule must always be fulfilled. Further, the agreement cannot have "retroactive" effect in the sense that the parties could agree that ownership "has passed" before this agreement is concluded. Further, where a transfer serves the purpose of security, or of a trust, the rules of Books IX and X have priority over the rules of Book VIII, which may impose further limitations on the effects of party agreements in the sense of the present Article (cf. VIII.–1:103 (Priority of other provisions)).

Reservation for registration. National law may provide registration systems for the transfer of ownership of certain goods (e.g. ships). These systems vary considerably, for which reason it was necessary to take the approach that national law prevails in this respect (see VIII.–1:102 (Registration of goods)). The present Article ties in with this principle and clarifies that the parties cannot determine the time of the transfer by agreement where registration is necessary to acquire ownership under national law.

B. Examples of agreements as to time ownership is to pass

Any time or condition. In principle, the parties can determine that the transfer of ownership will take place at any time as from the making of this agreement (the transfer of course depending on the fulfilment of the other general requirements set forth by (VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general), see above). The fixed date may be a calendar date or be determined relatively (e.g., "in a week's time"), or be determined by a certain event (e.g., "upon delivery of the goods", "upon payment of the purchase price"). The agreement on "time" includes agreements on conditions. See also VIII.–2:203 (Transfer subject to condition) and the Comments on that Article.

In particular: transfer upon payment, retention of ownership. In particular, the parties may agree that ownership will pass upon full or partial payment of the purchase price due under a contract for sale. This may be regarded as suitable in order to synchronise each party's risks resulting from the possibility of the other party becoming insolvent in other cases than where payment is scheduled to be made upon delivery. The parties may also agree that payment will bring about the transfer of ownership (only) if it is made before delivery. Where the parties agree that payment will be made only after delivery and the agreement in the sense of this Article provides that ownership will pass when payment is received, this will constitute a retention of ownership, which is of course possible under the present Article. However, the effects of such an agreement, as far as all matters of security are concerned, are governed by Book IX (cf. VIII.–1:103 (Priority of other provisions) paragraph (1)), which take priority over the rules of Book VIII. In particular, the effectiveness of such an agreement vis-á-vis certain third parties depends, at least in general, on registration (cf. IX.–3:107 (Registration of acquisition finance devices)). With regard to the buyer's rights under such an agreement, see VIII.– VIII.–2:307 (Contingent right of transferee under retention of ownership). The rules of Book IX may also be of relevance with regard to an anticipated agreement to re-transfer ownership upon payment of the secured debt where ownership is transferred for security purposes.

In particular: transfer upon conclusion of contract or any other time before delivery. The parties may always agree that the transfer will take place at the moment the underlying contract is concluded This is, however, not generally considered to correspond to the typical interests of a seller (and the seller's creditors).

Agreement when goods are in possession of a third party. When goods are in the possession of a third party (e.g., a warehouse keeper) and the transferor assigns the contractual right (e.g., resulting from the contract for storage) to recover the goods from this third party to the transferee, this will typically also imply an agreement that ownership will pass upon the assignment becoming effective. See VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) Comment C.

VIII.–2:104: Delivery

(1) For the purposes of this Book, delivery of the goods takes place when the transferor gives up and the transferee obtains possession of the goods in the sense of VIII.–1:205 (Possession).

(2) If the contract or other juridical act, court order or rule of law involves carriage of the goods by a carrier or a series of carriers, delivery of the goods takes place when the transferor's obligation to deliver is fulfilled and the carrier or the transferee obtains possession of the goods.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the rule. This Article concretises the notion of "delivery" used in the basic rule of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e).

Comparative background. A rule along the lines of the basic delivery rule provided for by paragraph (1) of this Article is quite common in those legal systems which follow a delivery-based transfer concept. Some details may vary; e.g., the modern understanding of the (mandatory) Swedish rule concerning the transferee's protection as against the transferor's creditors is to stress the aspect of cutting off the transferor's factual power to control the goods (instead of requiring that the transferee must also have taken possession). Indirectly, delivery in the sense of the basic rule of paragraph (1) is also important in those consensual transfer systems which employ a possession vaut titre rule. The specific rule on delivery involving an independent carrier as contained in paragraph (2) of this Article, however, is not such a common one in Europe. Some legal systems provide that the transfer occurs upon shipment of the goods (comparable to the approach taken here), whereas others let ownership pass when the goods are handed over to the transferee.

Reservation for the "purposes of this Book". The definitions of "delivery" provided by this Article are without prejudice to other parts of these model rules. For example, a different definition is provided in the rules on contracts for the sale of goods (see IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery)). See also the qualified definition of "delivery" in the Annex.

B. The general delivery rule (paragraph (1))

General. Under the concept adopted in this Chapter, the acts constituting delivery in the sense of this Article, i.e. the transferor giving up and the transferee obtaining possession, are characterised as factual acts. They do not imply, or need to be accompanied by, an agreement of the parties that (herewith or at a later point in time) "ownership shall pass" in the sense of a "real agreement" concept. Nevertheless, the acts performed by the parties to the transaction must be voluntary acts. This is a fundamental principle, although cases where this may become relevant usually are of a rather theoretical nature. E.g., where a valid contract for sale has been concluded and the transferee unilaterally removes the goods from the transferor's premises without the latter's consent, or forces the transferor to hand over the goods by violence or the threat of violence, this will not bring about a valid transfer.

For reason of clarification, it may be added that agreements on a constitutum possessorium are exclusively covered by VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass). See Comment A on that Article.

Recourse to the concept of possession, including indirect possession. The central vehicle employed by the basic delivery rule in paragraph (1) of this Article is the concept of possession as regulated in VIII.–1:205 (Possession) and the subsequent Articles. This is a common drafting technique in many European legal systems. Possession being possible both when physical control over the goods is exercised directly and when it is exercised indirectly, the concept allows a wide range of practically important situations to be covered by using a short formula. Consequently, the parties may carry out the acts of giving up and obtaining possession of the goods either personally, or by making use of any kind of intermediary in the sense of VIII.–1:207 (Possession by limited-right-possessor) or VIII.–1:208 (Possession through a possession-agent), and the exact qualification of such a person is immaterial in the present context (both limited-rights-possessors and possession-agents being covered). Indirect possession may be involved on the transferor's side as well as on the transferee's. Evidently, such cases are of enormous practical importance.

Illustration 1
E, an employee working in the seller's (S's) shop, hands over the goods to the buyer (B). Delivery is made through a possession-agent of S.

Illustration 2
Company B buys a new car. B sends the employee E to fetch the car from seller S. Delivery is taken by a possession-agent of B.

Illustration 3
B, a leasing company, concludes a contract for financial leasing with its customer C. B buys the relevant goods (e.g., a car) from seller S, whereby the parties agree that the goods will be handed over directly to C. On the transferee's (B's) side, delivery in the sense of this Article is taken by means of the limited-rights-possessor C, who possesses the goods for B.

Requirements of delivery: transferor giving up and transferee obtaining possession. Delivery in the sense of paragraph (1) is defined by the double requirement that the transferor gives up and the transferee obtains possession. In standard cases, the meaning of this concept will be unproblematic.

Illustration 4
B buys books in S's bookstore. Delivery is made by S handing over the books to B, who thereby assumes possession of the goods. Both acts relevant under this Article evidently take place at the same time.

The rule also covers situations where one of the parties is not present.

Illustration 5
S sells his used bike to B. They agree that S will not lock his garage and B will fetch the bike while S has gone to work. Delivery occurs when B takes the bike from the garage.

Illustration 5 shows that it makes sense to require more than that the transferor makes the goods available to the transferee (as is sufficient for performance delivery in the sense of the sales law rules, cf. IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery) paragraph (1). Before the transferee takes control of the goods, the transferor could re-assume exclusive control at any time (by locking the garage again). This would contradict the purposes of the delivery-requirement in the situations discussed in the Comments to VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general), such as, e.g., the transferee's protection as against the transferor's general creditors and, vice versa, the transferor's protection as against the transferee's creditors; the right to dispose as well as the entitlement of resorting to protective remedies.

In general, the aspect of the transferee obtaining possession is to be understood in a rather broad sense. It is not necessarily decisive that the transferee physically lays hands on the goods. Rather, it is decisive that the goods are brought into the transferee's sphere of control which, often, must be assessed by the "common opinion".

> Illustration 6
> Milkman S places a bottle of milk in front of B's door. Ticket seller S places the concert tickets ordered by B in B's letter box while B is not at home. The paper boy places the newspapers at B's letter box or at her doorstep. Delivery takes place in all of these cases because the goods are brought into B's sphere of influence.
>
> Illustration 7
> B constructs a house and orders bricks from supplier S. S places the ordered bricks at B's building site on a late Friday afternoon when no one is there. Again, the requirements for delivery in the sense of this Article are fulfilled.

Providing one definition of "delivery" for all "aspects" of a transfer of ownership runs the risk of a potential criticism from a functional perspective. Even if it is basically decided to apply a delivery-model, it could be argued that the most suitable understanding of "delivery" is not necessarily the same in all the relevant situation. Such a criticism is correct in principle. It is, however, considered that the present rule is workable with regard to all the relevant situations. As has been shown with regard to the requirement of the transferee obtaining possession, the requirements can be applied somewhat flexibly. One must also take into account that some of the ownership-aspects can hardly be kept strictly apart. Occasionally, moreover, adaptations have been included in the black letter rules ; see VIII.–2:304 (Passing of ownership of unsolicited goods) paragraph (3) and Comment B to that Article.

Delivery in case of joint possession. Where the transferor and the transferee are in joint possession of the goods, delivery in the sense of this Article does not occur until the transferee has become the sole possessor. If the parties want to make the right of ownership pass at an earlier point in time they have to make an agreement pursuant to VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass).

C. Delivery involving carriage by a third party carrier (paragraph (2))

Different situations involving transport; coverage of the rule. Often, a transaction requires that the goods be transported from the transferor to the transferee. The transport may be undertaken by one of the parties (e.g. by means of a truck or transport van owned by the company), which will be covered by paragraph (1) of this Article and does not create any further difficulties. Or, transportation can be made by means of a third party, i.e. a carrier.

These situations are covered by paragraph (2). In the latter category, again three sub-constellations may be distinguished: The terms of the contract (other juridical act, court order or rule of law) may provide (i) that the transferor fulfils the obligation to deliver by putting the goods at the transferee's disposal at the transferor's place of business (e.g., under an Incoterms ex-works clause); (ii) that the transferor is obliged to dispatch the goods to the transferee, and fulfils the obligation by doing so (e.g., under an F-term or C-term); or (iii) that the transferor is obliged to have the goods carried to the transferee (delivery at destination; e.g., under D-terms). Combinations of these three sub-categories may occur; in particular the transferor may be obliged to carry out the transport to a certain place of shipment, e.g. a harbour, which is defined as the place of performance under the terms of the contract (e.g., under FAS or FOB).

Technically, the three categories outlined above are covered by the formula "if the contract or other juridical act, court order or rule of law involves carriage of the goods by a carrier or a series of carriers". This formula is co-ordinated with the sales law provision of IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery) paragraph (2).

Policy of the rule. The underlying idea of this paragraph is that the possession-based concept of the general delivery rule in paragraph (1) should not necessarily be decisive for the transfer of ownership. As will emerge from the subsequent Comment, the possession concept would, in carriage cases, often make the transfer dependent on which one of the parties concluded the contract of carriage with the carrier. This is considered to be too formal a criterion. Rather, delivery should take place when the transferor's obligation to deliver under the relevant legal relationship is fulfilled. This may bring about practical simplifications, such as a co-ordination with the passing of risk (although it is not proposed to strictly tie the passing of ownership to the passing of risk, which would not be reasonable, e.g., in the case of the transferee's delay in acceptance). This may further make things easier where the goods are damaged by a third party while being in transit. Letting the transfer run parallel to the performance of the transferor's obligation to deliver will presumably also appear feasible from the perspective of the parties. If not, they may agree on a different solution.

Why the delivery-concept of paragraph (1) should not govern these cases. Attempts to achieve the appropriate result under a possession-concept, as generally followed in paragraph (1), would face the difficulty that the carrier will be regarded as a limited-rights-possessor either for the transferor or for the transferee, depending on who concluded the contract of carriage with the carrier (cf. VIII.–1:207 (Possession by limited-right-possessor)). If so, in all cases where the contract of carriage was concluded with the transferor, delivery in the sense of paragraph (1), i.e. the transferor giving up and the transferee obtaining possession, would not occur before the carrier has handed over the goods to the transferee.

The problem is probably most obvious in the situation (situation (ii) in the above list) where the transferor is obliged to dispatch the goods to the transferee, and fulfils the obligation by using a carrier. Under the possession concept, the carrier could be a limited-rights-possessor for the transferor (if the latter concluded the carriage contract; e.g., under a CFR-term), the result being that the transferor would be regarded as the "possessor" in the sense of the basic delivery rule in paragraph (1) of this Article. Or, the carrier could be a limited-rights-possessor for the transferee (if the latter concluded the carriage contract; e.g., under a FOB-term), with the result that the transferee would be regarded as the "possessor" in the sense of the basic delivery rule in paragraph (1). Only in the second case would the intended result be achieved under paragraph (1).

However, the problem is not restricted to this situation (ii). There may also be situations where the transferor is able to achieve cheaper prices for transportation and the parties to the contract for sale agree, for this reason, that the transferor will negotiate and conclude the contract of carriage with the carrier, even in a situation where the parties have agreed that the obligation to deliver will be fulfilled by handing over the goods at the transferor's place of business (as in the ex-works case), but the transferor will charge the transferee with the transportation costs. It seems clear that the question of who formally concludes the contract with the carrier – and who is, therefore, to be regarded a possessor – should not be the decisive aspect. Vice versa, it is theoretically possible that the contract between the transferor and the transferee obliges the former to deliver at destination (situation (iii)) but the parties agree, for the simple reason that the transferee can achieve a better price, that the latter concludes the contract with the carrier.

Accordingly, the special rule for situations involving transport by a third party carrier covers all situations (i) to (iii).

First requirement of delivery in the sense of paragraph (2): transferor's obligation to deliver is fulfilled. Technically, paragraph (2) provides two requirements in order to achieve the effect outlined above. The first one is that the transferor's obligation to deliver is fulfilled, which refers to the terms regulating the relevant entitlement to the transfer of ownership (arising from a contract or other juridical act, a court order or a rule of law). In particular, where the transfer is based on a contract, the place of performance may follow from the terms of the contract, or from relevant default rules such as IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery) paragraph (2). This requirement implements the main policy as outlined above.

Second requirement of delivery in the sense of paragraph (2): carrier or transferee obtains possession. The second requirement is a functional equivalent to the "transferee obtains possession"-requirement in paragraph (1). In contrast to the general delivery rule of paragraph (1), however, the "transferor gives up" element is not mentioned. The reason is that where the transferor concluded the contract of carriage, the transferor would, formally, still be regarded as an indirect possessor and, hence, would not "give up" possession (as required by paragraph (1)). Therefore, the rule only provides that delivery takes place when the carrier obtains possession (i.e. in the form of a limited-right-possessor in the sense of VIII.–1:207 (Possession by limited-right-possessor)) or, which is relevant for situation (iii), the transferee obtains possession (in the sense of VIII.–1:205 (Possession)). Where the transferor's obligation to deliver requires delivery at destination but the transferee formally concludes the contract of carriage, a prior transfer of ownership is prevented by the first requirement that the transferor must have fulfilled the obligation to deliver.

Relation to rule on delivery of documents (VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (4). This issue is discussed more fully below, VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) Comment E. In short, both rules are applicable without one superseding the other as a matter of principle. Unless the parties have agreed otherwise, ownership passes when the requirements of either of the rules are fulfilled.

VIII.–2:105: Equivalents to delivery

(1) Where the goods are already in the possession of the transferee, the retention of the goods on the coming into effect of the entitlement under the contract or other juridical act, court order or rule of law has the same effect as delivery.

(2) Where a third person possesses the goods for the transferor, the same effect as delivery is achieved when the third party receives the transferor's notice of the ownership being transferred to the transferee, or at a later time if so stated in the notice. The same applies where notice is given to a possession-agent in the sense of VIII.–1:208 (Possession through possession-agent).

(3) The same effect as delivery of the goods is achieved when the transferor gives up and the transferee obtains possession of means enabling the transferee to obtain possession of the goods.

(4) Where a person exercising physical control over goods issues a document containing an undertaking to deliver the goods to the current holder of the document, the transfer of that document is equivalent to delivery of the goods. The document may be an electronic one.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the rule. This Article concretises the short-cut term of "equivalents to delivery" used in the basic rule of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e). The Article contains four separate rules, each of them addressing one specific practical situation. Where the requirements of one of these special rules are fulfilled, this has the same effect as if "delivery" in the sense of VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) was carried out, i.e. that ownership of the goods passes unless otherwise agreed by the parties (hence the notion: "equivalent to delivery"). The rules of this Article, therefore, have the character of special default rules. If a situation covered by one of the paragraphs (2) to (4) of this Article is present, but the further requirements for bringing about an effect equivalent to delivery are not fulfilled (e.g., the goods are placed with a third party, but this third party does not receive a notice as required by paragraph (2) of this Article), the general default rule will apply and ownership will pass upon delivery of the goods themselves (unless a contrary agreement is made in the meantime).

Common characteristics of "equivalents to delivery". The four rules of this paragraph have in common that they cover a certain special situation where the goods themselves are not "moved" and no act in relation to the goods themselves occurs. However, the parties undertake other acts which typically imply the intention of carrying out the transfer of ownership and such intention will also appear to be plausible from an outside or ex post perspective.

Burden of proof. As with VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass), the burden of proof as to the fulfilment of the requirements of any of the rules provided in this Article lies with the one who invokes it. This will regularly be the transferee (or the transferee's creditors, or a sub-purchaser). With regard to the situations covered by paragraphs (2) to (4), the application of the relevant rule will be favourable to the transferee because it may bring about an earlier transfer than if the general delivery rule would have to be applied. If one of the requirements set out in these paragraphs cannot be proved, the general default rule of VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) will apply, unless the transferee succeeds in proving that the parties have in fact concluded an agreement in the sense of VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass) with the content that ownership passes at the time asserted.

B. Goods already in possession of transferee (paragraph (1))

General. The rule in paragraph (1) contains a necessaary simplification of the delivery concept. Where the goods are already in the possession of the transferee, it would be too formalistic and remote from the parties' expectations (and also from third parties' expectations) to require a second act of delivery. Rather, ownership, in principle, passes when all other general transfer requirements are met; in particular, when the underlying entitlement to transfer the ownership comes into existence.

> Illustration 1
> Farmer B has borrowed a harvester from farmer S since his own one was not working. After handing the machine over to B, S receives an attractive offer to purchase a new harvester. As S does not need the old machine any longer, they agree that B buys the old harvester, which is currently in his possession. In the absence of any contrary agreement, ownership will pass upon the conclusion of this contract.

Comparative background. As to its basic ideas, the solution adopted in the paragraph goes back to ancient Roman law (so called traditio brevi manu) and is commonly accepted in the national legal systems following a delivery approach. Since the goods are in the hands of the transferee already upon conclusion of the underlying contract, the identical practical result is achieved under a consensual approach. The present paragraph is, therefore, rooted in a broad congruence within the European legal systems.

How the rule works in detail. Paragraph (1) provides that the effect of a passing of ownership is triggered by the "retention of the goods on the coming into effect of the entitlement under the contract or other juridical act, court order or rule of law". The main aspect in this formula is the coming into effect of the underlying entitlement, e.g. upon the conclusion of a contract for sale as between the parties. Ownership passes at this time. The further element of the "retention of the goods" rather has the function of fitting this "equivalent to delivery" into the framework formed by the other general transfer requirements. The retention of the goods is "based on, or referable to" the underlying entitlement to the transfer in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (2). This is intended to make the rule easier to read and apply, e.g. where the underlying entitlement arises from a rule of law.

> Illustration 2
> A sporting goods store (S) sells a new bicycle to buyer B. Ownership passes upon delivery. B finds that the bicycle does not work as well as it should as soon as he takes it out for his first ride and returns it to S. The problem is that incompatible parts have been fitted to the frame by an inexperienced employee of the seller, although they are all good valuable parts in perfect condition which could be used in assembling other bikes. The seller recognises the problem immediately and fits correct parts. The bike is returned to B with all the moving parts replaced. Obviously, the buyer should not be allowed to keep, and possibly sell, valuable parts in addition to getting a new bike. For this purpose, III.–3:205 (Return of replaced item) provides that a debtor (here: S) who has remedied a non-conforming performance by replacement has a right (and an obligation) to take back the replaced item at the debtor's own expense. This rule also applies to "partial replacements" as on hand in the present example. Upon the initial handing over of the bike for repair, it might not be known whether replacement of any parts would be needed, as opposed to some adjustment. But when the seller discovers the problem when the bike is in his possession and takes off and retains the old parts and puts on the new, there is an equivalent to delivery in the sense of this paragraph because the rule of law entitling the seller to the replaced parts comes into effect in the particular situation, and the retention of the old parts is referable to this rule of law.

A transfer under paragraph (1) of this Article is, of course, subject to all the general transfer requirements; e.g., that generic goods must be identified. Where the (future) transferee holds several identical goods for the transferor (e.g., under a contract for storage in the sense of Book IV.C Chapter 5) and then concludes a contract for buying one of them, the transfer will not take place before identification.

Immanent risk: loss of security for payment. As outlined above, the approach adopted in paragraph (1) is a commonly accepted one, and it is commonly maintained that the effect produced by the rule meets the intentions of the parties. The rule does, however, imply a certain risk for the transferor: since the goods are already in the hands of the transferee, the transferor has, in principle, no possibility to withhold performance of the obligation to deliver if the transferee fails to tender the due counter-performance (cf. III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation)). This is not considered to be inappropriate where the underlying entitlement arises from a contract. Here, the transferor voluntarily enters into a transaction in a situation where it is obvious that the goods are in the transferee's possession. The transferor will typically be alerted to any danger and can be expected to obtain protection, if this is thought necessary, by agreeing on a retention of ownership device or other security. Where, however, the entitlement arises from a rule of law, perhaps even without the transferor being "warned" in advance, an effect of immediate transfer irrespective of the transferor's potential interests of securing a counter-performance could be unsatisfactory. However, it appears possible to solve such situations by different means, in particular by resorting to the requirement that an equivalent to delivery must be "based on, or referable to" the underlying entitlement. This is discussed in the Comments to VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) to which we refer. Where the transfer is based on a court order, it may be that the court itself will take sufficient care of the transferor's legitimate interests. If not, an approach comparable to the one discussed for transfers under a rule of law could be contemplated.

C. Goods in possession of third person (paragraph (2))

(a) General

Situations covered. Paragraph (2) covers situations where the goods are under the physical control of a third party who possesses the goods for the transferor; e.g., a lessee, a storer, or a holder of a possessory proprietary security right, all of them being limited-right-possessors in the sense of VIII.–1:207 (Possession by limited-right-possessor). The transfer is intended to be brought about without immediately delivering the goods from this third person to the transferee. Accordingly, "delivery" in the sense of the basic rule of VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) paragraph (1) will not take place. Rather, it is intended that the goods will remain with the third person for the time being. Paragraph (2) provides that the transfer can be made by the transferor giving notice to the third party in possession. The same principles apply where physical control is exercised in the capacity of a possession-agent in the sense of VIII.–1:208 (Possession through a possession-agent), e.g. by an employee (who is not treated as a possessor under the definition provided by the latter rule).

Illustration 3
S has leased her goods to X for a period of one year. After eleven months, S sells the goods to B. B may acquire ownership if S gives notice to X that ownership is transferred to B.

Illustration 4
Car dealer S sells a car to B subject to reservation of ownership. The purchase price is financed by the bank X which regularly co-operates with S in such matters. In turn, S's retained ownership is to be transferred to X as security for payment. Since administration takes some time, the car is already delivered to B when X pays the price to S. S may transfer the retained ownership to X by giving notice to B.

Comparative background. The situation covered by paragraph (2) of this Article is not subject to explicit regulation in all European legal systems. In those (delivery-based) legal systems where the issue is regulated, the main concepts are that ownership is transferred either (i) by giving some kind of notice or order to the third party holder (sometimes with additional requirements), which seems to be the solution in the majority of tradition-systems; or (ii) by assigning the transferor's (contractual) right to recover the goods to the transferee (by an assignment in the sense of Book III Chapter 5). Under the latter concept, it is not required that the third party holder is informed about the transfer of ownership (although such information is regularly given in practice).

Both notice approach and assignment approach possible under these model rules. As to substance, these model rules accept both approaches outlined in the previous Comment. The notice approach is explicitly adopted in paragraph (2) of this Article. Covering the assignment approach, on the other hand, does not require adopting a specific rule: it is already covered by VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass) which, as a general rule, also applies where the goods are in the hands of a third person. Strictly speaking, the concepts are of course not fully identical. But comparably to parties agreeing that the transferor henceforth exercises possession for the transferee (constitutum possessorium), the agreement on assigning (at once or at a later time) a contractual right to recover the goods from a third party exercising possession for the transferor will typically imply an agreement that ownership of the goods will, as from that time, rest with the assignee. Alternatively, the parties (transferor and transferee) could even confine themselves to concluding an agreement that ownership will pass at any time when the goods are in possession of a third person, without issuing any notice or making any act of assignment (VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass)). Talking in terms of harmonisation, covering both the notice approach and the assignment approach also has the advantage that parties from all European countries could continue their practices as they are used to do. Taking into account that publicity is not considered to have central importance under the approach adopted in this Chapter, the fact that alternative methods can be applied and that the third party exercising physical control does not necessarily know who is the legal owner of the goods does not appear to cause major problems. Practically, the parties to the transfer will regularly inform the third party possessor anyway.

(b) The rule in detail

Notice. The term "notice" in this paragraph is to be understood in the sense of the general rule of I.–1:109 (Notice). The notice can be given by any means appropriate to the circumstances. In general, it becomes effective when it reaches the addressee and it can be revoked up to this time. Giving notice is, like making delivery of the goods themselves, intended to be a voluntary act. As to its content, the notice in the sense of this Article has the character of information. It states that ownership passes from the transferor to the transferee. The notice in the sense of this paragraph is not an "order" to which the third party is bound, and the rule does not require that the addressee must make any declaration of consent or "acceptance". When the third person exercising control over the goods receives the notice (before its receipt, the notice could still be revoked), the transferor has made a clear voluntary statement giving up control of the goods, comparable with conduct constituting delivery.

Person giving the notice. Paragraph (2) requires that it is the transferor who issues the notice to the third party. This corresponds to the general idea that the transfer must be based on a voluntary act. If the transferee could also give this notice, the transferor would be deprived of the possibility of withholding performance if the other party fails to pay (cf. III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation)). Also, the situation could remain somewhat doubtful, which of course would be unsatisfactory in terms of publicity, if publicity was considered a basic principle. But the aspect of clarity appears to carry weight even though publicity is not held to be very important, simply because of the practical difficulties a default rule like this could create for the third party exercising control if the transferor subsequently claims the contrary. The default rule should mark a rather clear case. Where notice is given by the transferee, it is still possible for the parties (in particular, the transferee) to prove that a valid entitlement to transfer and an agreement as to ownership passing while the goods are in the hands of the third party exist (VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass)). But this requires the providing of evidence as to the existence of such an agreement, or that other acts have been undertaken from which such an agreement can be implied, e.g., an assignment of the contractual right to recover possession of the goods.

Person receiving notice. Notice must be given to the person exercising possession (e.g., a warehouse keeper, or secured creditor). Sentence 2 is added in order to cover possession-agents in the sense of VIII.–1:208 (Possession through a possession-agent), e.g., employees, who, for reasons irrelevant in the present context, are not defined as "possessors".

Time of transfer. Under the default rule of this paragraph, the transfer takes place at the time when the third party in possession receives the notice, or at any later time stated in the notice. The transferor's act of issuing the notice is not regarded sufficient, inter alia because the notice could be revoked until received by the addressee.

Relation to rule on delivery of documents (paragraph (4) of this Article). In particular where goods are stored in a warehouse, it may happen that the warehouse keeper issues a document containing an undertaking to deliver the goods to the current holder of the document. If so, the question arises how paragraphs (2) and (4) of this Article relate to each other. This issue is discussed more fully below. In short, both rules are applicable without one superseding the other as a matter of principle. Unless the parties have agreed otherwise, ownership passes when the requirements of either of the rules are fulfilled.

Effect on position of third party in possession. This paragraph is not intended to affect negatively the legal position of the third party exercising physical control. These model rules contain provisions which have the effect that the legal position of a third party in possession does not deteriorate through a transfer based on this paragraph (or a transfer by agreement, e.g., where the parties agree on an assignment of the transferor's contractual right to the return of the goods). For instance, where the third party holder is a lessee, IV.B.–7:101 (Change in ownership and substitution of lessor) provides that the new owner of the goods is substituted as a party to the lease if – which is fulfilled in the situations relevant in the present context – the lessee has possession of the goods at the time ownership passes. Where an assignment of the transferor's contractual rights against the third party possessor is involved (which may also be the case in situations covered by paragraph (2) of this Article, if the assignor gives notice to the third party), III.–5:116 (Effect on defences and rights of set-off) paragraph (1) provides that the debtor (i.e. the third party possessor) may invoke against the assignee all substantive and procedural defences which the debtor could have invoked against the assignor. In addition, where the third person is a storer in the sense of Book IV.C Chapter 5, IV.C.–5:106 (Payment of the price) provides that the storer may withhold the thing until the client pays the price, for which purpose III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation) applies accordingly. Finally, if the third party exercising possession does so based on a limited proprietary right, this right is – so to say by definition – valid as against the acquirer.

D. Delivery of means enabling the transferee to obtain possession of the goods (paragraph (3))

Basic idea; means. "Means enabling the transferee to obtain possession of the goods", in the sense of this provision, are for instance: keys to a room, container or stockroom where the goods are stored; keys to a safe; or other tools providing access to the goods. By acquiring possession of such means, the transferee is given the possibility of assuming physical control of the goods themselves at any time. The transferee is put in a similar position as if physical control of the goods themselves had been given. Accordingly, the provision of such means is given an effect equivalent to delivery in the sense of VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) paragraph (1) provided that the transferor, on the other hand, gives up access. The difference basically is that the transferee's actual taking over of the goods themselves may happen later. But the exclusive possibility of doing so draws a sufficiently clear picture.

Therefore, it is maintained that, unlike in a minority of European legal systems, this rule should not be restricted to cases where corporeal delivery is impossible or impracticable.

Comparative background. Most European legal systems do not contain an explicit rule comparable to this Article. Some cases may be covered by the general delivery rule. For the sake of clarity, this Article nevertheless adopts the approach in a separate paragraph.

Transferor giving up, and transferee obtaining, possession of the means. Corresponding to the basic delivery rule in VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) paragraph (1) the default rule provided for in the present paragraph requires that the transferor gives up possession of the means of access to the goods, and the transferee obtains possession of such means. The latter aspect does not seem to raise additional issues to those already discussed in the Comments to VIII.–2:104 (Delivery). The aspect of the transferor giving up possession requires further discussion. E.g., in case there are two keys to the place where the goods are stored and the parties agree that only one of them should be handed over to the transferee, the requirements of this provision are intended not to be met. Neither from the perspective of the parties to the contract nor from the perspective of an independent person, like a judge assessing the case, is it sufficiently clear that the transferor has lost access to the asset. The parties could, in such a case, transfer ownership pursuant to VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass) and make sure that they can provide evidence for such an agreement. Where, on the other hand, the transferor secretly keeps one of the existing keys whereas the transferee thinks that all existing keys have been handed over, an exception seems to be justified and ownership should pass. There is no reason to protect the transferor (or the transferor's creditors) in such a situation.

Codes (pure information). Where the transferor, instead of handing over keys or other physical tools, communicates a code (e.g., a combination of numbers or letters) providing access to the goods, there is no full parallel to corporeal tools, which are first held only by the transferor and then only by the acquirer. Information, at least the knowledge of a code, often cannot be deleted; the transferor cannot "forget on demand". However, not subsuming codes under "means" in the sense of this paragraph would probably neglect the practical needs of current commerce. And if codes were excluded here, the next question would immediately be whether telling a code has to be seen as an "agreement as to the time ownership is to pass" in the sense of VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass), which is rather likely unless another purpose for providing the code is shown (such as access only for test purposes or inspection). Hence, it is proposed not to exclude codes and comparable means from this paragraph, the term "means" apparently being broad enough and open to future technical developments. The reference to "giving up possession", which partly does not seem to fit so well with information, may, however, favour the interpretation that telling a code is sufficient only when it is clear from the circumstances that the transferor will not make use of it any more. This may be the case, e.g., where it is envisaged that the transferee will change the code immediately.

E. Transfer of document containing the undertaking to deliver the goods (paragraph (4))

General. In commercial practice, it often happens that a transfer of goods is linked to the transfer of certain documents, e.g. a bill of lading or a warehouse keeper's warrant. The dogmatic perception, as well as the accepted number of such documents varies to a certain degree. In some legal systems, it is stressed that the main function of such documents is to provide (and transfer) constructive possession of the goods represented by them. In others, it is maintained that where certain, strictly limited types of such documents are issued, the right to the goods can be transferred only by transferring the document, so that the transfer of such documents replaces delivery. Some legal systems tend to accept a more open list of documents available for these purposes, and may allow the list to be extended by local practices. Some countries now accept electronic documents, others do not. In relation to some of these documents, the term "document of title" has become common, perhaps, however, with slightly different implications in different legal systems. In preparing the present provision, therefore, choices had to be made, in particular, as to whether the list of accepted types of such documents should be an open one or a cosed one and as to how this provision should relate to other transfer rules adopted under this Chapter.

Open list, electronic documents included. The approach adopted in paragraph (4) of this Article is based on an open list of documents, which is considered to fit better to the needs of commercial practice and is open to future developments. Sentence 2 of this paragraph clarifies that it makes no difference whether the document is of physical or electronic nature. This is in line with recent developments (cf., for instance, Article 17 UNCITRAL Model Law on Electronic Commerce). The open list approach also fits better to the broad party autonomy rule provided by the present Chapter, under which the parties can, anyway, agree on any time for the transfer to take place (unless that rule were agreed to be restricted in relation to transfers by documents).

Requirements as to the document. Paragraph (4) provides two requirements as to the documents covered. First, a document within the meaning of this rule must be issued by the person exercising physical control over the goods. This may, e.g., be a warehouse-keeper or a carrier. Second, as to the content of the document, the rule just names the basic element one can find with all such documents, namely that they contain the undertaking to deliver the goods to the current holder of the document.

Transfer of goods upon transfer of documents. Different to other default rules, paragraph (4) does not link the transfer of the goods to giving up, and obtaining, possession of the goods themselves or means providing access to them, but to the "transfer" of a related document. However, "transfer" in the sense of this Article also implies that there must be a voluntary act of giving up control over the document, and that the transferee obtains control over the document (so that, e.g., stealing the document does not transfer any right). Regarding some kinds of documents, there may, however, exist additional prerequisites for transferring them; in particular, endorsement may be required. Such additional requirements are not defined in the present paragraph; this obviously would not make sense. However, it is essential that without all requirements for a valid transfer of the document being fulfilled, there can be no transfer effect as to the goods themselves. This is intended to be taken care of by the "transfer of that document" formula. The formula has to be applied flexibly, taking into account the modalities of the relevant system, when electronic documents are used.

Relation to other transfer rules: no exclusivity of transfer by document. When examining the European legal systems, the question arises whether certain other forms of transfer should be restricted or even excluded once a "document of title" has been issued. Under German law, for instance, a transfer by assignment of the right to recover the asset from a third party is restricted in so far as such a transfer is said to require (also) the transfer of the document, in order not to undermine the rules on a transfer by documents of title. With regard to the rules adopted in this Chapter, the question of how paragraph (4) of this Article relates to other transfer rules arises basically with regard to: VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass), including implied agreements where the contractual right to get the goods delivered is assigned; VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) paragraph (2) for cases involving an independent carrier; and paragraph (2) of the present Article, under which goods in possession of a third party can be transferred by notice. The solution inherent in the rules of this Chapter is that paragraph (4) does not exclude any of these other transfer rules. Ownership will, therefore, pass once the requirements for either of these rules are fulfilled, always subject to any contrary agreement made by the parties. This is based on the broad application of the party autonomy principle as well as on the broad coverage of documents within paragraph (4). Also, practical experiences show that exclusively embodying any possibility to transfer goods in a specific document may have its downsides. E.g., where goods are transported by ship and the ship reaches its destination before the bill of lading arrives, there may be a practical need to deliver the goods to the transferee in order to avoid unreasonable costs which could arise if the ship had to await the arrival of the bill of lading. The cargo is handed over to the transferee against a letter of indemnity in order to secure the carrier against liabilities which could arise from effecting delivery before the bill of lading is presented. For such situations, it should, for example, also be possible to transfer ownership by giving notice under paragraph (2) of this Article or by letting the parties agree on another suitable time.

This approach also appears acceptable with regard to other practical results. Where there is only one seller and one buyer (i.e., a two-party constellation) and a document containing the undertaking to deliver to the person presenting this document has been issued, there do not seem to be any substantive obstacles against allowing the parties to agree on a passing of ownership prior to, or later than, handing over the document.

In three-party constellations, where the transferor purports to transfer the same goods two times to different buyers (e.g. by transferring under an agreement as to time to the first buyer and by handing over a document to the second buyer; or by handing over one document to the one and another to the other buyer), problems can be solved by the regular rules on double disposition (cf. VIII.–2:301 (Multiple transfers)): The first transfer is valid, the second one is undertaken by a non-owner, so that the second buyer does not acquire ownership from the seller, but could possibly acquire based on the rules on good faith acquisition. This is a general issue, not a specific problem of a transfer by documents. In practice, it may turn out that there is only little risk of a conflict between two different buyers, one of them receiving the document and the other acquiring the goods themselves, not knowing that there is any document, where the goods are held by specific types of third parties. Depending on the circumstances, a potential transferee may expect from the third party's type of business that this person will usually issue documents. If so, and goods are offered without related documents being presented, the buyer may have reason to be suspicious and may wish to check with the third party before proceeding further. The third party, on the other hand, once it has issued such a document, will ensure in its own interest that only the buyer who can present the document can take delivery.

F. Acts not covered

Handing over single items only symbolising a bigger entity no equivalent to delivery. This Article – and, in particular, paragraph (3) of this Article – does not cover the physical handing over of single items which only symbolise a bigger entity, without enabling access to and physical control over the entire assets. Examples would be handing over one book of a library (pars pro toto) or handing over car documents only, without the keys and the car itself. There is no sufficient act of giving up possession in relation to the rest of the entire object or objects. However, such an act may be accompanied by an agreement that ownership is to pass at the time of this symbolic act. Where such intention can be proved, the transfer will already follow from VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass) so that a separate default rule is not necessary.

Marking the goods for the transferee no equivalent to delivery. In a minority of European legal systems, the same effect as delivery is achieved where the goods are marked for the transferee, e.g. by putting a plate on the goods, at least where it is impossible or unreasonable to hand them over physically. Such a rule is not adopted in the present Article. Such cases are left to VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass). However, the fact that the goods have been marked may make it easier to prove that such an agreement has been established.

Section 2: Effects

VIII.–2:201: Effects of the transfer of ownership

(1) At the time determined by Section 1, ownership passes within the limits of the transferor's right or authority to dispose, with effect between the parties and with effect against third persons.

(2) The transfer of ownership does not affect rights and obligations between the parties based on the terms of a contract or other juridical act, court order or rule of law, such as:

(a) a right resulting from the passing of risk;
(b) a right to withhold performance;
(c) a right to fruits or benefits, or an obligation to cover costs and charges; or
(d) a right to use or an obligation not to use or otherwise deal with the goods.

(3) The transfer of ownership does not affect rights of or against third parties under other rules of law, such as:

(a) any right of the transferor's creditors to treat the transfer as ineffective arising from the law of insolvency or similar provisions; or
(b) a right to claim reparation under Book VI from a third party damaging the goods.

(4) Where ownership has been transferred but the transferor still has a right to withhold delivery of the goods (paragraph (2)(b)), terminating the contractual relationship while exercising the right to withhold performance has retroactive proprietary effect in the sense of the following Article.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of Section 2 in general. After the general requirements of a transfer of ownership have been set out in the previous Section 1 of this Chapter, the present Article deals with the effects such a transfer has in general. The two subsequent Articles deal with specific further issues related to the effects of a transfer, namely with the impact of possible defects occurring either upon the conclusion of the contract and with the effects of different types of rights to "set aside" a contract or contractual relationship (VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation)), and with the effects different kinds of conditions may have on a transfer (VIII.–2:203 (Transfer subject to condition)). Partly, these provisions supplement the general transfer requirements as set out in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) and placing some of these rules in Section 1 would have been equally reasonable.

Function and structure of the Article. Paragraph (1) of this Article spells out the general effects linked to the fulfilment of the transfer requirements set out in Section 1. As will be discussed more fully below, it basically implements a unitary transfer approach, meaning that one specific point in time is decisive for the passing of various "aspects" linked to the right of "ownership". The following paragraphs (2) and (3) are intended to serve a clarifying function, in order to avoid misunderstandings as to the range of this unitary approach. These rules correspond with the law of many European legal systems and, depending on one's background and perspective, may perhaps be regarded as superfluous. However, since the starting points and traditions as to the transfer of movable property are so different in Europe, including provisions of such a clarifying character is considered appropriate. Besides these clarifying provisions, this Chapter is also open to exceptions from the unitary starting point. Paragraph (4) of this Article, which provides a specific effect where the transferor terminates the contractual relationship while the goods are retained after ownership has already passed, is one of these instances.

B. Effects of transfer in general (paragraph (1))

(a) General

Reference to time; unitary transfer approach. Paragraph (1) of this Article, in conjunction with the definition of "ownership" contained in VIII.–1:202 (Ownership) and the basic rule of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general), is one of the basic provisions in implementing the "unitary" transfer approach – or perhaps rather: the unitary-nucleus approach – adopted in this Chapter (cf. section (b), below). For a general description of the "unitary" approach as opposed to a "functional" transfer approach, see the Comments on VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general). In principle, the rules of Section 1 define one specific moment in time for the transfer of ownership; namely the point in time when all requirements set out in Section 1 are fulfilled. This moment depends on the individual facts of each case, e.g., on whether the parties have agreed on a specific time when ownership is to pass and on whether the goods exist and are identified at that time; or, on whether the goods have already been delivered or on the fulfilment of the requirements for any equivalent to delivery. At this point in time, "ownership" in the sense of VIII.–1:202 (Ownership) passes to the transferee.

Reference to transferor's right or authority to dispose. A transfer of ownership under this Chapter requires the transferor's right or authority to transfer the ownership; see VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(c). The transferor's right or authority to dispose may, however, be limited in other respects. For example, where the goods are encumbered with an effective proprietary security right of a third party, ownership of the goods may well be transferred, but the encumbrance prevails. Equally, where the goods are encumbered with a third person's proprietary right to use and the transferor is not permitted, by the holder of this right, to transfer the goods free of this encumbrance, the transferor's right or authority to dispose will be "limited", in the sense of this paragraph, with respect to this right to use. In other words, the rule is a special application of the nemo dat principle.

(b) Range of the unitary-based approach

Effect as between the parties and effect against third parties. When ownership passes, it passes entirely. There is, as such, no distinction between an "effect as between the parties" (however defined) and an "effect against third parties" (whoever covered). As to its content, the rule implicitly refers to the definition provided for in VIII.–1:202 (Ownership). The former owner loses, and the transferee acquires, the exclusive right to use, enjoy, modify, destroy, dispose of and recover the property. This exclusive attribution is, on the one hand, protected by property law remedies; cf. VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership). This includes protection as against third parties who, like a thief, unlawfully possess or use the asset, but also implies, in particular, protection as against the general creditors of the other party to the transaction. The element of exclusive attribution is, on the other hand, also a key link to other areas of private law, if autonomously chosen so by the rules governing these areas. In particular, unjustified enrichment law under Book VII ties itself to this kind of protected exclusivity and the right-holder's entitlement to prevent infringements or adverse interference

(cf. VII.–3:101 (Enrichment) Comment B). Similarly, the rules on non-contractual liability for damage provide that loss caused to a person as a result of an infringement of that person's property right is legally relevant damage. The latter rule is, in full coherence with the implications of "ownership" in the sense of this Book, further specified in that "loss" includes being deprived of the use of the property, and in that an "infringement" of a property right includes destruction of or physical damage to the subject-mater of the right (property damage), disposition of the right, interference with its use and other disturbance of the exercise of the right (VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession)). For a discussion of the underlying policy considerations for choosing the present non-mandatory delivery approach in relation to these aspects, see the Comments on VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general).

Law of obligations may provide its own effects. As will be discussed more fully in the Comments on paragraphs (2) and (3) of this Article, the concept of "ownership" and the rules on the passing of ownership do not "absorb" issues regulated by other parts of law, in particular by the law of obligations as provided by other Books of these model rules. For instance, the rules on the passing of the risk under a contract for sale, being a question of the effect of external events on the rights and obligations existing between the two parties, are covered by Chapter 5 of Book IV.A and are not affected by the rules on the passing of ownership.

Some exceptions from unitary approach adopted under this Chapter. Also, this Chapter adopts a few exceptions to the basic unitary approach where this, with regard to concrete interests involved in the specific situations, is found more appropriate than sticking to the general approach. One example is paragraph (4) of this Article; others can be found with regard to double dispositions (VIII.–3:101 (Multiple transfers)) and a buyer's right to become owner by paying although a seller who has retained ownership becomes insolvent (VIII.–2:307 (Contingent right of transferee under retention of ownership).

No accountability linked to ownership. Since this issue was subject to discussions during the drafting process of this Book and could provoke misunderstandings if not clarified explicitly, it should be stressed that ownership as such, or the transfer of ownership, does not by itself create any liability for damage caused to another by the object of the transfer. Under these model rules, the fact that a person is the owner of a piece of property does not constitute accountability. This is so under Book VI of these model rules, and Book VIII does not intend to change anything in this respect.

Tax law issues not intended to be decided. Also, it should be clarified that this Book does not intend to decide issues of tax law. Tax law may decide autonomously which facts are essential for the respective taxation purposes. It may follow the classification of who is to be regarded as an owner under the private law rules, but it may decide to follow other approaches, e.g. taking a more economic perspective.

C. Clarifications as to relation to rights and obligations between the parties (paragraph (2))

General. The purpose of this rule, as well as of the following paragraph (3), is to clarify that, although Chapter 2 basically follows a "unitary" transfer concept, the unitary concept does not govern all issues one can think of. With regard to the internal relation between the transferor and the transferee, contract law rules or an interpretation of the individual terms of a contract can lead to partially different results. The same applies where the legal relationship has a basis other than a contract (i.e., a unilateral juridical act, court order or rule of law) and relevant provisions exist. The list in paragraph (2) provides an indication of rules which may become relevant in this respect. The list is not conclusive ("such as"). For instance, a right of stoppage in transit, where this has a contractual character under the applicable law, or a right to "suspend" performance after delivery (such as under Article 71 (2) CISG)), will, as between the transferor and the transferee, not be affected by the rules on a transfer of ownership.

Risk (subparagraph (a)). The passing of the risk, e.g. under a contract for sale, is not characterised as a property law issue under these model rules. It merely affects the rights and obligations in the internal relation as between transferor and transferee; in particular whether a buyer must pay the price although the goods will not be received due to a fortuitous event. As to contracts for sale, these issues are regulated in Chapter 5 of Book IV.A. and are not affected by the rules on the transfer of ownership.

Right to withhold performance (subparagraph (b)). The general rule of III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation) entitles a party to a contractual or other legal relationship to withhold performance provided certain prerequisites are fulfilled. Subparagraph (b) clarifies that this right is not affected by the rules on the transfer of ownership.

Internal distribution of fruits and benefits, internal distribution of costs and charges (subparagraph (c)). The parties may, irrespective of when ownership passes under the rules of this Chapter, agree that, e.g., certain fruits or benefits derived from the object of transfer will go to the transferor, or the transferee, respectively. For example, where a pregnant cow is sold, the parties may agree that the calf will belong to the buyer, no matter whether it is born before or after the ownership of cow passes. This agreement has binding effect on the parties, but where, e.g., the seller becomes insolvent before the cow has been transferred, the question of whether the seller's creditors can lay their hands on the cow as well as on the calf will be decided by the property law rules of this Chapter. Further, the parties may internally regulate who shall bear the costs of maintaining the goods until ownership is transferred. This question is not necessarily reserved to property law.

Internal right to use, or obligation not to use (subparagraph (d)). Also, the terms of the contract (or other legal basis) may provide a right to use, or an obligation to abstain from using, the goods as between the parties. For instance, where a new car is sold but will be delivered only later, the contract may provide that the seller, notwithstanding that ownership is to pass upon delivery, is not allowed to use the car, because this would cause a decrease in value and would create the risk of the car being damaged before delivery.

D. Clarifications as to rights of or against third parties (paragraph (3))

General. In a similar way, paragraph (3) clarifies that other parts of the law regulating rights of or against third parties are not deactivated by the transfer rules, but may, in turn, prevail and lead to a different solution than what would be arrived at when linking the issue to the transfer rules. The two subparagraphs of this paragraph provide important examples.

Transferor's creditors' right to treat transfer as ineffective (actio Pauliana and similar concepts). National insolvency laws usually provide creditors with a right to treat certain transactions made by the debtor as ineffective, provided that they have been to the detriment of the creditors, that they have been carried out within a certain time before the opening of insolvency proceedings and that certain additional requirements are fulfilled. Such additional requirements may be, e.g., that the other party to the transaction intended to put the creditors at a disadvantage; that the other party knew of the debtor's insolvency; or that the transfer was gratuitous. In some countries, a creditor may exercise such a right even outside bankruptcy proceedings. These rules serve important purposes with which this Book does not intend to interfere. This is clarified by subparagraph (a) of this Article.

Right to claim reparation under Book VI from a third party damaging the goods where person suffering economic loss is not the owner (subparagraph (b)). This subparagraph refers to situations where the party who is not (yet) the owner suffers an economic loss due to a third person damaging the sold goods. In particular, this issue occurs where the transferor is still the owner of the goods but the transferee already bears the risk of loss. This may be the case because of an agreement established between the parties, or where a buyer fails to take over the goods in good time (cf. IV.A.–5:102 (Time when risk passes) Comment C). The purpose of subparagraph (b) is to clarify that the fact that ownership of the goods has not yet passed to the transferee does not prevent the latter from claiming damages from the third party who causes the damage. That the transferee may do so already follows from the regime of Book VI. The transferee will, in such a case, suffer a "loss resulting from a violation of an interest worthy of legal protection" in the sense of VI.–2.101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (1)(c). The transferor, on the other hand, whereas still being "the owner", will not be considered to have suffered a "loss caused as a result of an infringement of that person's property right" in the sense of VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession) paragraph (1). Accordingly, the transferee, who must pay the price to the seller but does not receive the goods (or only receives goods in a damaged condition), will have a right to reparation against the third party who caused the loss by damaging the goods. This, also, is supported by the "considerations of public policy" provision in VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (3), as it would not be fair and reasonable to let the third party escape from liability. Again, the property law level is not decisive for the outcome of the case.

E. Effect of termination exercised when withholding delivery after transfer of ownership (paragraph (4))

General; situations covered. The rule in paragraph (4) can be said to constitute an exception from the general unitary approach. Technically, it does so by providing a specific effect where the transferor terminates the contractual relationship in a specific situation, namely where the delivery of the goods may be withheld by the transferor but ownership has already passed to the transferee based on an agreement. The rule could also be described as a special provision dealing with the transferor's protection against the transferee and the transferee's creditors, under which the question who owns the goods is not decisive. The rule envisages situations like the following.

> Illustration
> Seller and buyer agree that the goods will be stored at the seller's premises for three weeks after the conclusion of the contract. As the buyer wants to be safe from the risk of the seller's insolvency, they agree on an immediate transfer of ownership. Payment (covering the price for the goods as such and additional storage costs) is to be made when the goods are physically delivered three weeks later. But the buyer does not pay.

Transferor still has a right to withhold delivery of the goods. Whether the transferor, despite the fact that ownership has already passed to the transferee, still has a right to withhold delivery of the goods is a matter of contract law, not a matter for this Book. See the general rules provided by III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation). Under a contract for the sale of goods in the sense of Book IV.A, the seller, among others, has to perform two main obligations –transfer the ownership of the goods and deliver the goods. Whereas the obligation to transfer the ownership is already fulfilled in the cases covered by this paragraph, the obligation to deliver the goods is not fulfilled. It appears, therefore, that the transferor is entitled to withhold delivery until the reciprocal obligation of paying the purchase price is fulfilled or payment is tendered. The text of the paragraph makes reference to paragraph (2)(b) of this Article, where it is stated that the existence of such a right to withhold performance is not affected by the rules on the transfer of ownership.

Termination of the contractual relationship. The technical vehicle of providing protection to the transferor in such situations is providing a special effect to the termination of the contractual relationship. Usually, it will be the transferor who terminates the contractual relationship for the other party's failure to pay. However, the rule is not restricted to this situation. It should also apply where the parties, in a situation as described above, mutually agree to terminate the contractual relationship. It should also apply where the transferee is insolvent and the insolvency administrator decides to "terminate" the contractual relationship which is, at the time of the commencement of the insolvency proceedings, not fully performed by both of the parties.

Retroactive proprietary effect of termination. Paragraph (4) provides that in the situations covered by this rule, termination – exceptionally – has retroactive proprietary effect. The concept of such retroactive proprietary effect is defined in VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation) paragraph (2). Ownership is treated as never having passed to the transferee. This is an exception in so far as in all other situations, termination has no such retroactive proprietary effect, but only triggers an obligation to re-transfer the ownership to the (former) transferor (cf. VIII.–2:202 (3)).

This approach is chosen for practical reasons. Where the contract with the original transferee fails, the transferor will have to sell off the goods to another buyer (and seek to recover any loss from the original transferor). The transferor would find it difficult to attract other buyers if he could not dispose of the goods and confer good title immediately. Becoming the owner immediately upon termination, the transferor will regain the right to dispose. As far as this effect is concerned, the same result could also be achieved if ownership re-vested in the transferor immediately, but without retroactive effect. The concept of retroactivity is, however, needed to give the transferor priority over sub-purchasers of the transferee, if the transferee has sold and transferred the goods to a third person before receiving delivery and paying the price. Where the transferee has not paid for the goods and the transferor still possesses them, it appears preferable to let the transferor (who has only transferred ownership in order to give the transferee security in case the transferor should become insolvent) prevail over such third party sub-purchasers. Finally, the retroactive proprietary effect of termination also provides protection to the transferor in case the transferee becomes insolvent.

Since the effect of termination in general and the concept of "retroactive proprietary effect" are, in general, only regulated in the following Article VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation), this paragraph could have been placed in that Article. However, it is placed here because the context is the transferor's right to withhold performance.

F. Note on transferor's right of stoppage in transit

Right of stoppage in transit not explicitly provided for. These model rules – neither in Books III, IV.A nor VIII – do not contain any provision on a right of a seller (transferor for value) to stop the transport of goods which have already been handed over to the carrier – so that ownership of the goods may already have passed to the transferee – but which have not yet been handed over to the transferee, for the reason that payment has not been made properly or the risk exists that proper payment will fail. Many European legal systems provide for such a right of stoppage in transit. As to its technical construction, as well as with regard to its effects (only as between the parties, or also against third parties), however, the respective rules differ. Partly, these provisions are part of sales law; in other countries, they are part of insolvency law. In the latter legal systems, the buyer being insolvent is an indispensable requirement for the rule to apply; in others, something like a strong indication of a risk of non-performance suffices. Also, there are countries which have abolished this kind of right, mainly because recent experience showed that there was not much practical need for it any longer, since most often, the seller secures the right to payment by means of a retention of ownership device or a documentary letter of credit.

At a rather late stage of the drafting history of this Chapter, there was some discussion whether a right of stoppage in transit should be adopted in Book VIII, in the present Article. There was, however, no clear view on whether such a right is practically needed today or not. In the end, no provision was adopted in the present context. However, this does not mean that this Book would not acknowledge such a right. Where sales law provisions are applied which contain a right of stoppage in transit, it will be accepted by paragraph (2) of this Article. Where it is provided by insolvency law rules, it may fall within paragraph (3).

VIII.–2:202: Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation

(1) Where the underlying contract or other juridical act is invalid from the beginning, a transfer of ownership does not take place.

(2) Where, after ownership has been transferred, the underlying contract or other juridical act is avoided under Book II, Chapter 7, ownership is treated as never having passed to the transferee (retroactive proprietary effect).

(3) Where ownership must be re-transferred as a consequence of withdrawal in the sense of Book II, Chapter 5, or termination in the sense of Book III, Chapter 3, or revocation of a donation in the sense of Book IV.H, there is no retroactive proprietary effect nor is ownership re-transferred immediately. VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership) paragraph (4) remains unaffected.

(4) This Article does not affect any right to recover the goods based on other provisions of these model rules.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the rule. In its paragraphs (1) and (2), this Article repeats and further clarifies the "causal" transfer approach already implemented by VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraphs (1)(d) and (2). The present Article makes this approach most explicit by directly spelling out its effects; in particular, by defining the concept of a retroactive proprietary effect in paragraph (2). The latter concept is also referred to by the other Articles of this Section. Paragraph (3), then, spells out that other remedies bringing a contractual relationship to an end, namely withdrawal, termination and revocation of donation, do not trigger such retroactive proprietary effect. It appears advisable to state this explicitly since in a couple of legal systems, the termination of a contractual relationship and the revocation of a contract for donation traditionally have retroactive proprietary effect. This Article, thereby, comprises a compilation of the effects of all these remedies in property law.

B. Initial invalidity and subsequent avoidance (paragraphs (1) and (2))

General. Paragraphs (1) and (2) both concern cases where the underlying entitlement is affected by a "defect" from the beginning, either causing it to be invalid all the time or to be valid for the time being, but becoming invalid retrospectively upon avoidance. The rules correspond to a widespread approach in many European countries that, where such defects affecting the "root" of a contract are present, the transfer cannot have effect under property law.

Initial invalidity (paragraph (1)). Paragraph (1) covers all cases where the underlying entitlement to transfer ownership (VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(d)) is invalid from the beginning. This may be the case, for instance, where the underlying contract was concluded by an agent without authority, or where the contract is invalid under the relevant rules of national law because one of the parties was subject to incapacity when concluding the contract. Further, the rule will apply where the underlying contract is void under II.–7:301 (Contracts infringing fundamental principles). As to the effect of nullity under the latter provision, II.–7:303 (Effects of nullity or avoidance) paragraph (2) refers to Book VIII. It is clarified that no transfer of ownership can take place where the underlying entitlement is subject to such nullity, irrespective of whether this is found out before, or after delivery or any other act required for a transfer is carried out.

Obviously, this rule is most important where the underlying entitlement is based on a contract. It also, however, covers entitlements by virtue of any other juridical act, court order or rule of law, although the latter issues may be of rather academic nature. Whether a defect affects a court order or a rule of law in a way causing the entitlement to be "invalid" or "voidable" in the sense of this Article must be decided by the applicable (national) law.

Subsequent avoidance (paragraph (2)). Paragraph (2) covers situations where ownership has already passed to the transferee but, subsequently, the underlying contract or other juridical act is avoided. "Avoidance" is to be understood in the sense of Book II Chapter 7, including avoidance under II.–7:201 (Mistake), II.–7:205 (Fraud), II.–7:206 (Coercion or threats), II.–7:207 (Unfair exploitation) and II.–7:302 (Contracts infringing mandatory rules). In all these cases, ownership is treated as never having passed. The same applies, although this is not explicitly stated in this Article, where the underlying contract or other juridical act is avoided before delivery is made, which theoretically may happen, e.g., where the contract is avoided but an employee, who does not know this, delivers the goods. There seems to be no need for stating this explicitly in the black letter text.

Paragraph (2) only applies to contracts and other juridical acts. A concept of "avoidance" strictly comparable to the one in Book II Chapter 7 does not to exist in relation to court orders or rules of law. Whether other legal means of eliminating, in particular, a court order, should have a comparable effect in property law, must be decided by national law.

Concept of retroactive proprietary effect. Upon avoidance, ownership is treated as never having passed to the transferee. This concept of a "retroactive proprietary effect" applies in many European legal systems. If the transferee has become insolvent in the meantime, the transferor can nevertheless separate the goods from the transferee's estate. Also, since the right to dispose is treated as never having passed to the transferee, a third person who has "acquired" rights in the goods from the transferee (e.g., a sub-buyer, or a person who has been granted a proprietary security right) cannot acquire these rights derivatively. However, good faith acquisition is possible provided that the relevant requirements are fulfilled.

C. Withdrawal, termination and revocation (paragraph (3))

General. Where a right of withdrawal, termination or revocation of a donation is exercised after ownership has already passed to the transferee, paragraph (3) provides for that this neither has retroactive proprietary effect in the sense of paragraph (2) nor the effect of an immediate (automatic) re-transfer of ownership. Rather, the transferee is under a mere obligation to re-transfer the ownership to the (former) transferor. It seems advisable to state this explicitly in the text of the Article, as the termination of a contractual relationship as well as the revocation of a donation traditionally has retroactive proprietary effect in some European legal systems. In the present Chapter, however, the general policy rather was to avoid retroactive proprietary effects, unless specific reasons speak for the contrary solution. In addition, when analysing the interests of the parties involved, one can develop further arguments for the solution adopted in this paragraph. See the following Comments.

Termination. Under Book III Chapter 3, a contractual relationship can be terminated mainly as a sanction of the other party's delay in performance (III.–3:503 (Termination after notice fixing additional time for performance)) or where the other party's non-performance is fundamental (III.–3:502 (Termination for fundamental non-performance)). As mentioned above, such termination does not have any immediate, or even retroactive, effect as to property, but triggers an obligation to re-transfer the ownership of the goods to the (former) transferor. This seems to be justified because the (former) transferor – in the following discussion: a seller under a contract for the sale of goods – does not appear to be in need of specific legal protection. There are basically two situations where the contractual relationship may be terminated. Either, the seller terminates the contractual relationship for the buyer's failure to pay. In a situation covered by paragraph (3) of this Article, the seller has delivered the goods to the buyer without being paid and without securing the right to payment by agreeing on a reservation of ownership. In doing so, the seller has taken a risk, and it seems reasonable to treat the seller in the same way as any other creditor of the buyer, meaning that any claim for the return of the goods will only be discharged by a dividend in the buyer's insolvency. This solution is considered preferable in terms of the principle of equal treatment of creditors . If the buyer has already sold the goods to a sub-purchaser, the latter may take preference over the seller in the sense that, irrespective of whether the buyer is insolvent or not, taking delivery from the buyer will confer good title to the sub-purchaser whereas the original seller must seek to recover the value of the goods. Where the buyer already is insolvent, the sub-purchaser will be able to take delivery only if payment has not been made in full and the insolvency administrator chooses to uphold this contract because this appears advantageous to the general creditors (including the former seller).

If, on the other hand, the buyer terminated the contractual relationship, this will either be because the seller is in delay in delivering the goods or has delivered non-conforming goods. In the first situation (delay) ownership usually has not passed; and if it has, there is no need to give the seller more protection than an obligatory right to the re-transfer of ownership. Where the termination is caused by the seller's failure to deliver conforming goods and this failure amounts to a fundamental non-performance there again seems to be no reason for providing the seller with more than an obligatory right to have the goods re-transferred.

Withdrawal. A right to withdraw usually has the purpose of protecting the transferee (buyer). Again, and for similar reasons, there seems to be no need for providing the seller with specific protection; the seller can reasonably be expected to bear the risk of the buyer becoming insolvent. Partly, the right of withdrawal is a sanction for the seller employing problematic distribution techniques by which extra customers may have been acquired. This can be said, e.g., where withdrawal is exercised under II.–5:201 (Contracts negotiated away from business premises). There also does not seem to be a need to provide a seller with better protection than other creditors where the seller failed to comply with information duties under Book II Chapter 3 Section 1. The right to withdraw from a timeshare contract under II.–5:202 (Timeshare contracts) is outside the scope of Book VIII. In addition, the solution of giving the transferor "only" an obligatory right to have the goods re-transferred can be supported by an argument of dogmatic consistency: II.–5:105 (Effects of withdrawal) provides that withdrawal "terminates" the contractual relationship and that the restitutionary effects of such termination are the same as in the case of termination under Book III Chapter 3. It may, therefore, be argued that the proprietary effects should also be parallel.

Revocation of donation. Also, the revocation of a donation should have no retroactive or immediate proprietary effect but should trigger a mere obligation to re-transfer the ownership of the goods (as spelled out by IV.I.–4:103 (Consequences of revocation) paragraph (2)), even though the donee did not pay any price for receiving the goods. This is the very character of a donation. The donor is free to decide whether to donate or not. Where the donation is revoked because of the donee's ingratitude (IV.I.–4:201 (Ingratitude of the donee)), the origin of such revocation is a specific risk inherent in donations, a problem of "choosing the right person", which arguably may be placed on the donor. In the cases of revocation on the ground of impoverishment (IV.I.–4:202 (Impoverishment of the donor)) or a subsequent change of essential circumstances (IV.I.–4:203 (General clause)), an additional aspect is that typically a long time has passed and parts of the donated assets may have been transferred to third parties. Providing the revocation with retroactive proprietary effect would, in principle, invalidate these third party acquisitions, and it may be doubtful whether good faith acquisition principles could help a third party acquirer where the latter knows, or could know, that the goods were once donated. Confining the donor to an obligatory right to the re-transfer of the goods, or their value, therefore, seems preferable in terms of legal certainty and protecting the free flow of commerce.

D. Other rights to recover not affected (paragraph (4))

Purpose of this paragraph. Where ownership re-vests in the transferor with retroactive proprietary effect, the transferor may demand the return of the goods under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1). Paragraph (4) of this Article makes it clear that any right to recover the goods based on other provisions of these model rules remains unaffected. In particular, the transferor may also demand the return of the goods under the rules of Book VII on unjustified enrichment.

VIII.–2:203: Transfer subject to condition

(1) Where the parties agreed on a transfer subject to a resolutive condition, ownership is re-transferred immediately upon the fulfilment of that condition, subject to the limits of the re-transferor's right or authority to dispose at that time. A retroactive proprietary effect of the re-transfer cannot be achieved by party agreement.

(2) Where the contract or other juridical act entitling to the transfer of ownership is subject to a suspensive condition, ownership passes when the condition is fulfilled.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the rule. The rules of the present Article can be said to be mere applications of the general rule that ownership may be transferred at any time agreed by the parties (VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e) and VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass)). The rule on resolutive conditions in paragraph (1) does, however, imply a basic policy choice, the solutions offered in the European legal systems differing considerably in this respect. The Article applies to conditions agreed upon by the parties or introduced into another juridical act.

Concepts of suspensive and resolutive condition. The concepts of suspensive and resolutive conditions employed by this Article are defined in III.–1:106 (Conditional rights and obligations). A condition depends on the occurrence of an uncertain future event. In the case of a suspensive condition, the conditional right (or obligation) takes effect upon fulfilment of the condition; in the case of a resolutive condition, it comes to an end upon fulfilment of the condition.

B. Transfer subject to resolutive condition (paragraph (1))

General. Paragraph (1) applies to transfers made subject to a resolutive condition. This means that (i) the underlying contract or other juridical act must contain a resolutive condition; and, in addition, (ii) the parties have agreed that ownership of the goods will re-vest in the original transferor upon fulfilment of the condition. Element (i) alone will not suffice, as will be evident from examples of resolutive conditions where no re-transfer is intended at all (e.g. a newspaper has been ordered under a contract subject to a resolutive condition – nothing is to be reversed after that time). The text of paragraph (1) also clarifies that the parties must have agreed upon this consequence, which means that it will not be possible to include such a condition unilaterally where the underlying contract does not provide so. Where, exceptionally, the transfer takes place based on a unilateral juridical act, the transferee may either accept the property subject to the condition imposed by the transferor – in which case the transferee "agrees", for the purposes of this paragraph, to the future re-transfer in case the condition is met – or may reject it.

Comparative background. With regard to transfers subject to a resolutive condition, the European legal systems offer a variety of solutions. Also, the issue is a quite disputed one in some countries. In some legal systems, especially in the French tradition, the occurrence of the condition has retroactive proprietary effect. In other countries an immediate re-transfer "ex nunc" takes place and dispositions of the property which have been made in the meantime are automatically invalidated, subject however to the rules on good faith acquisition. Another solution is that where delivery is made in the performance of a conditional obligation, the right so acquired is subject to the same condition, and the conditional right returns to the transferor by operation of law at the moment when the condition is fulfilled. Finally, it is sometimes argued that the fulfilment of the condition should have no effect in property law.

Basic policy considerations. The following policy considerations served as starting points when developing the rules of this paragraph. The approach should (a) limit retroactive proprietary effects where no specific need for them exists (retroactive proprietary effects should rather be the exception); (b) strive for consistency within these model rules in general (in particular, with III.–1:106 (Conditional rights and obligations) and the rules of Book IX on proprietary security rights) and (c) strive for consistency with the system of the present Book. All of this applies unless other important arguments are found which could favour another solution.

General rule: no retroactive proprietary effect, but immediate "automatic" re-transfer within the limits of the re-transferor's right or authority to dispose. Based on the policy aspects outlined above, paragraph (1) provides that the fulfilment of a resolutive condition does not have retroactive proprietary effect, but causes an immediate "automatic" re-transfer of ownership to the (former) transferor. The re-transfer takes place "subject to the limits of the re-transferor's right or authority to dispose at that time". The latter formulation corresponds to the general rule of VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership) paragraph (1) and provides that the re-transferor can only return what the re-transferor still has at the time when the condition is fulfilled. If, therefore, the original transferee – who should now re-transfer the ownership – has meanwhile transferred ownership of the goods to a third person, the third person's acquisition remains valid and ownership cannot be returned. The original transferor may claim the reversal of any enrichment resulting from that sub-sale, or damages. Or, where the original transferee has effectively granted a proprietary security right in the goods to a third person, ownership of the goods will automatically re-vest in the original transferor, but the goods will remain encumbered with the third party's security right.

Arguments in favour of this general rule. The solution adopted in paragraph (1) is obviously consistent with policy (a) as outlined above (no retroactive proprietary effect). Also, it is consistent with policy (c), namely to provide a solution which is compatible with the concepts underlying Book VIII: As to substance, agreeing on a re-transfer of ownership upon the fulfilment of a resolutive condition is nothing but an "agreement as to the time ownership is to pass" in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e) and VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass). In the present case, the agreement concerns the conditional re-transfer of ownership to the original transferor, and it is made in advance ("anticipated"), at the time when the contract for the original transfer is concluded.

As to policy (b), i.e. achieving consistency with other parts of these model rules such as those on resolutive conditions, there is consistency in so far as III.–1:106 (Conditional rights and obligations) paragraph (3) provides that, upon fulfilment of the condition, the relevant right or obligation comes to an end, which means a prospective (ex nunc) effect (see also Comment G on III.–1:106). As to restitutionary consequences, III.–1:106 (5) refers to Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4, i.e. III.–3:511 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) and the subsequent Articles on restitution in case of termination. Taking into account these rules, the general consequence where obligations have already been performed before the resolutive condition is fulfilled will be that an obligation to return any benefit received is triggered. With regard to the re-transfer of ownership, such obligation will operate as an "entitlement to transfer" in the sense of the general transfer rule in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(d). This fits smoothly to the general framework created both by these model rules in general and Book VIII in particular.

The concept is also coherent with the aproach taken in Book IX on proprietary security rights. E.g., regarding transfers of ownership for security purposes, the concept of an automatic re-transfer upon the condition of full payment of the credit seems to coincide with a common practice in the credit markets and does not seem to create problems with the rules of Book IX. Where, on the other hand, the parties agree that ownership will re-vest in the seller if the buyer does not pay at the agreed date, VIII.–1:103 (Priority of other provisions) paragraph (1) ensures that such an agreement will be subject to the rules of Book IX and these rules have priority over the provisions of Book VIII (a re-transfer in the sense of the present Article of course also being a "transfer" in the sense of the named VIII.–1:103).

If, in a specific constellation, the parties wish the fulfilment of the condition to trigger only an obligation to re-transfer, this should be perfectly possible under the general principle of party autonomy. They can agree on this effect under the general rule of VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass), or they can agree on a right to repurchase or an equivalent device providing a comparable effect.

Mandatory exclusion of retroactive proprietary effect (sentence 2). A second question is whether the rule outlined above should be mandatory or whether the parties may deviate by agreement. Whereas nothing seems to speak against allowing the parties to agree on a re-transfer taking effect later than the fulfilment of the resolutive condition, sentence 2 of this paragraph provides that the rule is mandatory in the sense that no retroactive effect can be established by party agreement. Allowing the parties to agree on retroactive proprietary effects would require substantive policy reasons backed by a clear preference of the former transferor's interests as against the interests of other parties involved. Compelling reasons of this kind, however, do not seem to exist. Rather, the interests of third parties, be they parties who acquired rights from the "conditional" transferee or creditors in the latter's insolvency or other enforcing creditors, argue against party autonomy in this respect.

Also, policy (c) above supports this approach, as retroactive proprietary effects cannot be agreed upon elsewhere under Book VIII. One could of course argue that party autonomy is one of the most central principles of the general transfer rule in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) and that, for that reason, parties should be free to establish retroactive proprietary effects if they wish to do so. But it should be noted that the "agreement as to the time ownership is to pass" is just one of a number of requirements for a transfer, another being the existence of an "entitlement as against the transferor" (in other words: an obligation to transfer), and no transfer can take effect before such obligation arises. The obligation to re-transfer arises (only) upon fulfilment of the condition; cf. III.–1:106 (Conditional rights and obligations) paragraph (5) in conjunction with III.–3:511 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) paragraph (1). It is of course clear that the general rules on conditions in III.–1:106 are default rules and open to party agreement, but this does not seem to impose any binding guidelines for the level of property law.

Finally, it should be considered that if parties, in order to serve specific purposes, wish to create special patrimonies under these model rules, they are free to make use of the trust rules as provided by Book X. When this is taken into account, there appears to be little practical need for additional legal features under Book VIII; there even could be a risk of undermining trust law policies.

In particular: effect on third parties. A further important issue which is relevant to a decision on the mandatory or default character of the rule is the question of the effect a transfer subject to a resolutive condition may have on third parties – such as parties acquiring rights from the transferee (sub-buyer, security taker etc.), creditors in the transferee's bankruptcy or other creditors enforcing their claims against the transferee outside bankruptcy. The comparative survey shows that in all legal systems at least some protection is given to good faith acquirers. Under the approach chosen in this paragraph, third parties who have acquired rights from the transferee before the condition is met, as well as creditors in the latter's bankruptcy, etc., are protected. As mentioned above, the transferee can only re-transfer ownership "subject to the limits of the transferee's right or authority to dispose at the time of the re-transfer", which refers to a general principle followed throughout Chapter 2, namely that a person cannot transfer more rights than the person has (cf. the general transfer rule in VIII.–2:201 (Effects of the transfer of ownership) paragraph (1)). This means, for instance, that where a proprietary security right has been created and has become effective in the goods before the condition is fulfilled, the goods will stay encumbered by this security right when they are re-transferred to the former transferor. If the transferee has violated any agreement not to create such a right in the goods, as established between the transferor and the transferee, the transferee may be held liable for non-performance of an obligation. But the free flow of commerce would not be restricted. This appears to be an adequate solution.

In particular: mandatory character also applicable to donations. It has been contemplated whether an exception from the mandatory character of sentence 2 should be adopted for donations. However, such a solution was not considered convincing, one argument being that such a possibility could be used for defrauding the transferee's creditors. Another argument is, as mentioned above, that these model rules provide for other features by which parties can create a special property for specific purposes, namely Book X on trusts. Accordingly, practical needs that may exist in this respect can be served by other means.

C. Transfer subject to suspensive condition (paragraph (2))

Special application of agreement as to the time ownership is to pass. A transfer of ownership subject to a suspensive condition does not create comparable difficulties. As to substance, this is nothing but a special form of a party agreement in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e) and VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass), the particularity being that it is yet uncertain whether the agreed point in time will come or not. A most common example in this respect is the agreement on a retention of ownership, the parties agreeing that ownership will pass when (and only if) the price is paid in full. All aspects related to the security function of this device are regulated by Book IX (cf. VIII.–1:103 (Priority of other provisions) paragraph (1)). The transfer aspect as such is, however, covered by paragraph (2) of the present Article. Regarding the buyer's right to achieve this transfer by paying the price as required under the terms of the contract, see also VIII.–2:307 (Contingent right of transferee under retention of ownership).

D. Note on transfer subject to time limit

Transfers subject to suspensive or resolutive time limits may be treated like transfers subject to condition. Formally, this Article only covers transfers subject to a (suspensive or resolutive) condition in the sense of III.–1:106 (Conditional rights and obligations). It does not speak of transfers subject to a time limit in the sense of III.–1:107 (Time-limited rights and obligations). The difference between a condition and a time limit in the sense of the named provisions basically only is that a time limit relates to an event which is certain to occur (e.g., a calendar date, a person's death, etc.). However, the principles established in this Article can also be applied to transfers subject to time limits. This is obvious for transfers subject to a suspensive time limit, which is identical to an agreement as to time ownership is to pass. With regard to transfers subject to a resolutive condition, the Study Group's Co-ordinating Committee was hesitant to adopt a rule parallel to the one contained in paragraph (1) of this Article, because some members expressed concerns about impliedly introducing new types of proprietary rights. However, under the approach adopted in paragraph (1), no such risks occur. What the parties essentially agree upon is nothing but an agreement as to the time ownership is to pass back to the original transferor (cf. VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass)). The re-transfer can only take place in relation to what is still in the hands of the re-transferee, subject to the limits of this party's right or authority to dispose at that time. Accordingly, it is suggested that this Article may be applied to transfers subject to any kind of time limit by way of analogy.

Section 3: Special constellations

VIII.–2:301: Multiple transfers

(1) Where there are several purported transfers of the same goods by the transferor, ownership is acquired by the transferee who first fulfils all the requirements of Section 1 and, in the case of a later transferee, who neither knew nor could reasonably be expected to know of the earlier entitlement of the other transferee.

(2) A later transferee who first fulfils all the requirements of Section 1 but is not in good faith in the sense of paragraph (1) must restore the goods to the transferor. The transferor's entitlement to recovery of the goods from that transferee may also be exercised by the first transferee.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the rule. This Article addresses a standard situation discussed in all European legal systems, namely that the transferor purports to transfer the same goods to different persons one after another.

> Illustration 1
> S, the owner of specified goods, concludes a contract for the sale of these goods with B1. For the time being, the goods are left at S's place of business. Later, S concludes a contract for the sale of the same goods with B2.
> The facts can be varied or further specified in several respects: in particular, the goods may have been delivered either to B1 or B2. Especially in the latter case, it may also be of relevance whether B2 was in good faith or in bad faith (however these terms may be defined in detail) as to the non-existence of B1's earlier entitlement.

However a set of rules governing situations of this kind may be structured in detail, it may be characterised as addressing the interface between derivative transfers and original acquisitions based on good faith acquisition principles. Also the present Article, which covers the "transfer aspects" of the problem, must be seen in conjunction with the relevant rules on good faith acquisition, i.e. VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership).

The present Article primarily addresses the conflict between the "transferees", namely who will ultimately receive and be entitled to keep the goods. However, it also affects the purported transferees' relation to the transferor. For the sake of clarity, the subsequent discussion will employ the terms used in illustration 1. The parties will, therefore, be called "S" (the transferor), "B1" (the transferee whose entitlement to the transfer of ownership in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(d) is created first) and "B2" (the transferee whose entitlement comes into existence only later).

Comparative background. Although the starting points in the European legal systems differ considerably by either following a delivery-based or consensual approach, the solutions arrived at for the present problem accord to a certain extent. Under a delivery system – unless

S and B1, or possibly S and B2, agree on an immediate transfer – the general rule is that the transferee who first takes delivery of the goods will acquire the ownership. However, this result may be reversed if B2 took delivery in bad faith. Depending on the respective national rules on non-contractual liability for damage, B1 may, in such a situation, have a right to reparation from B2. Such reparation may be reparation in kind, in which case B2 is under an obligation to transfer the ownership of the goods to B1. The requirements for such a right to arise are, however, rather restrictive in some legal systems (e.g., restricted to cases where B2 induced S to breach S's contractual obligation as against B1; or where B2 at least had actual knowledge of B1's prior entitlement to the transfer). In short, under such a system delivery, and the acquisition of ownership resulting from it, will only be of interim relevance in some situations: where B2 acts in bad faith (perhaps to be specified further), a final solution will be provided by the law of obligations.

In the countries following a consensual approach, on the other hand, the second transferee traditionally acquires ownership if that transferee takes delivery in good faith. The technical means for arriving at this solution may vary. It may be based, in particular, on a concept that the mere conclusion of the contract S–B1 suffices only to effect a "transfer of ownership inter partes", but actual delivery is required in order to make this transfer "opposable to third parties in good faith"; or in a possession vaut titre rule (or both); or simply on good faith acquisition rules. Under such a concept, the issue of a second transferee in bad faith may be solved by property law itself.

In relation to multiple transfers, consensual systems tend to move towards a delivery approach. Conversely, the approach adopted in this Article slightly shifts away from the delivery starting point by including a good faith requirement. This may be seen as a kind of compromise solution; it is, however, adopted for certain substantive reasons, as will be discussed below.

Primary options under a delivery-based transfer system: general. Given that the basic transfer approach adopted in Chapter 2 requires delivery of the goods (or an equivalent) unless the parties have agreed otherwise, adopting a rule along the lines of the consensual tradition outlined above would certainly be inconsistent. However, comparable results can be achieved by way of modification of the basic delivery approach, namely by inserting an additional requirement that a later transferee (B2, or B3, B4, as the case may be) can only acquire if in good faith as to the non-existence of B1's prior entitlement. In the following, this option (called option 2) will briefly be compared with the "traditional" delivery-based approach providing that, where B2 takes delivery first, ownership passes to B2 irrespective of whether B2 acts in good or bad faith, but B1 may proceed against B2 under principles of non-contractual liability for damage in case B2 acted in (some kind of) bad faith (option 1).

Under both models, B1 has contractual claims against S in case S delivers the goods to B2. In some situations, B1 may well be content with a claim for damages. On a general level, it may also be said that the issue is about the protection of a transferee (B1) who has taken a certain risk by leaving the goods with the transferor.

Cases solved equally under both options. In some situations, options 1 and 2 lead to identical results. This is the case, first, where S and B1 agreed on an immediate transfer of ownership. Here, ownership passes to B1 and B2 can acquire ownership only if the requirements of good faith acquisition are fulfilled, which basically means that B2 must take delivery in good faith and for value (cf. VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership)). The second situation where both approaches converge is where no prior transfer has been agreed upon by either of the parties and B1 takes delivery first. Then, B1 will acquire ownership, being the transferee who first fulfils all requirements provided by Section 1 of this Chapter. Also, the same result applies where B2 takes delivery in good faith: B2 will acquire ownership, fulfilling all requirements provided by Section 1.

The following Comments will focus on the situations where different results are achieved.

Option 1: general delivery approach, however reversed by non-contractual liability in case later transferee acts in "bad faith". If multiple transfer situations were governed by the (non-mandatory) delivery approach employed by this Chapter in general, without any exceptions or modifications, and B2 acquired by agreement on an immediate passing of ownership, the goods being left with S, B1 can (only) acquire ownership under good faith acquisition principles. B1, therefore, would acquire only if B1 neither knew nor could reasonably be expected to know that the transferor had already transferred ownership.

A second situation to be discussed here is that B2 is the first to take delivery, however knowing, or having reason to know of, B1's prior entitlement. B2 being the one who first fulfils all transfer requirements of Section 1, would become the owner of the goods. However, B1 could have a chance to proceed against B2 under the principles of non-contractual liability for damage. Provided the requirements for non-contractual liability under Book VI are fulfilled, it would be possible for B1 to claim the transfer of ownership of the sold goods from B2: VI.–6:101 (Aim and form of reparation) provides that reparation is to reinstate the person suffering legally relevant damage (B1) in the position that person would have been in had the legally relevant damage not occurred; in principle, reparation may be in kind (i.e. by transferring ownership to B1). The "problem" (in B1's perspective), however, is to find a rule stating that the failure to acquire ownership of the goods (because of acquisition by B2) constitutes "legally relevant damage" in the sense of Book VI. VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession) will not be applicable exactly for the reason that B1 did not acquire the goods. There is only one rule which may apply, namely VI.–2:211 (Loss upon inducement of non-performance of obligation) which is, however, very narrow (as compared to the general good faith criterion employed by option 2, and as compared to the solutions some delivery-based legal systems have accepted under their rules on non-contractual liability). The latter Article would require that B2 induces S to breach S's obligation towards B1. Accordingly, the rule would, for instance, not be applicable where S already intends to breach S's obligation against B1 (e.g. S actively offers the goods to B2, without the latter's initiative) and B2, knowing these facts, just "takes advantage" of this (existing) breach of S's obligation. Also, B2 would have to intend S to fail to perform S's obligation against B1. In short, given the contnet of the relevant provisions of Book VI, adopting option 1 would mean that B1 could demand the transfer of the goods from B2 only under very limited conditions, which practically are hard to prove.

Option 2: delivery approach, acquisition of later transferee being excluded in case of "bad faith". If, on the other hand, multiple transfer situations were governed by a (non-mandatory) delivery approach, modified in so far as B2 must be in good faith in order to acquire ownership of the goods, the situations discussed in the previous Comment would be solved as follows. Where S is still in possession and "transfers" the goods to B2, who is in bad faith, by agreeing on an immediate transfer, this transfer would not take place and B1 – when taking delivery from S at a later point in time – will acquire ownership without depending on the fulfilment of good faith acquisition requirements (e.g. a transfer for value).

Where B2 first takes delivery, but is in bad faith as to the existence of B1's prior entitlement, B2 will simply not acquire ownership and B1 may still demand a transfer of ownership from S. This solution has certain advantages as compared to option 1 discussed above. First, it is possible to let B1 win the conflict with B2 in many more situations than the rules on non-contractual liability for damage would allow, since a simple definition of good faith could be employed instead of the inducement requirement. Also, this option provides better protection of B1 in case B2 goes bankrupt. Finally, solving the conflicts within property law itself may, as such, be considered advantageous as compared to making a "detour" to the rules on non-contractual liability for damage. Whether such a rule provides a workable solution will, however, depend on certain details, which will be discussed in the following Comment.

B. How the rule works in detail

Scope: several purported transfers of the same goods. As already mentioned above, this Article applies where two or more persons (transferees) are entitled, as against the same person (transferor), to the transfer of ownership of the same goods. It is immaterial whether these entitlements are based on a contract, other juridical act, court order or a rule of law (cf. VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(d)), the case of main practical relevance however being multiple dispositions by contract. The "same goods" are specified goods, so that it is impossible for the transferor to comply with all existing entitlements.

The scope left to the basic delivery rule; unproblematic cases. In principle, the present Article follows the general (non-mandatory) delivery approach applied in the whole Chapter 2. This means that, as the rule states expressly, ownership passes to the transferee who first fulfils all the requirements of Section 1. There is only an exception where the later transferee is in bad faith at the time when these general transfer requirements would be fulfilled in relation to that later transferee.

The general delivery rule will, therefore, be applicable, first, where S and B1 have agreed on an immediate transfer of ownership and, second, where neither B1 nor B2 have agreed on a transfer prior to delivery and B1 takes delivery first. These cases have already been discussed in Comment A above.

Transferor still owner, later transferee in good faith. The second part of paragraph (1) modifies the basic delivery approach in so far as a later transferee (i.e. any transferee whose entitlement to the transfer of ownership comes into existence later than the first entitlement) must be in good faith at the time the general transfer requirements are fulfilled in relation to that later transferee. The definition of good faith employed by this Article ("who neither knew nor could reasonably be expected to know") corresponds to the general formula of good faith used by VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership); see there for more detailed discussion. One important aspect is that a buyer, unless there are specific indications, is under no duty to investigate whether the goods have previously been sold to another person. The result of this concept is that the scope of "bad faith" is still much broader than what could be achieved by applying VI.–2:211 (Loss upon inducement of non-performance of obligation). Consequently, the first transferee (B1) will have a right to the goods more frequently than under the alternative concept (option 1, see above). This is not an unusual result from a comparative perspective: as briefly outlined above, it is quite common that consensual legal systems employ their general good faith acquisition principles.

Under paragraph (1) of this Article, a later transferee in good faith can acquire both by (first) taking delivery of the goods and by agreeing on the transfer taking place before delivery, e.g. upon conclusion of the underlying contract. This is different under good faith acquisition principles (cf. VIII.–3:101 (1)(b)); but the present Article is not a good faith acquisition rule in the sense of providing original acquisition from a non-owner, but a specific transfer rule, building upon the general transfer requirements.

Good faith must relate to the non-existence of the prior entitlement(s) of the other transferee(s).

Transferor still owner, later transferee in bad faith (paragraphs (1) and (2)). Where the later transferee, who first fulfils all the general transfer requirements of Section 1, is in bad faith at that time, that later transferee is precluded from acquiring ownership under paragraph (1) of this Article. This does not cause specific problems where the parties have agreed on a transfer before delivery and the transferor is still in possession of the goods.

> Illustration 2
> S, the owner of specified goods, concludes a contract for the sale of these goods with B1. For the time being, the goods are left at S's place of business. Later, S concludes a contract for the sale of the same goods with B2, who knows that the goods have already been sold to B1 but offers a better price. B2, also, does not want to take delivery at the moment, but agrees with S that ownership of the goods will pass upon the conclusion of their contract.

In this case, the transferor, who still owns the goods, can transfer the goods to the first transferee under the terms agreed in their contract (or provided by the other legal ground underlying the transfer). If this is done, ownership will, derivatively, pass to the first transferee and the later transferee may resort to a claim for damages for non-performance of the obligation to transfer against the transferor (which, however, may be reduced or even barred by reason of the later transferee's contributory fault).

Where, on the other hand, the goods have already been delivered to the later transferee, the transferor still remains the owner of the goods pursuant to paragraph (1) of this Article.

> Illustration 3
> The facts are identical to those in Illustration 2. However, B2 does not agree on an immediate transfer, but takes delivery of the goods before B1 approaches S and demands the delivery of the goods.

In contrast to situations like the one in Illustration 2, the transferor (S) in the first place is unable to effect delivery to the first transferee. S may transfer ownership by giving notice to B2 under VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (2), but in general, it may be impractical for B1 to approach B2 – who typically wants to keep the goods – in order to get the goods handed over. This might mean entering into a dispute with B2 and incurring additional costs, e.g. for transportation. Depending on the circumstances, it may be more practical to stick to the original relationship with S and demand delivery under the terms of the contract. Therefore, S has the right to recover possession from B2 (paragraph (2) sentence 1), so that S can effect delivery to B1. In a certain sense, sentence 1 of paragraph (2) repeats what already follows from the general rule in VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1), namely that an owner can demand that the property be returned from any person who has no right to possess it. But it deliberately states that the later transferee "must restore" the goods to the transferor in order to avoid any doubts whether B2, based on the valid entitlement to the transfer of ownership existing between B2 and S, has a "right to possess the goods" in the sense of VIII.–6:101 (1) as long as the underlying legal relationship between S and B2 exists. In particular, where the purported transfer between S and B2 is based on a contract, it is immaterial whether the contractual relationship has been terminated (which could be done by S, if B2 does not pay; or by B2, since S fails to confer ownership on B2) or not. It would be unsatisfactory, and against the policy underlying this Article, if B2 could rely on the contract with S and thereby prevent the transfer of the goods to B1 where, e.g., B2 has fully paid and S, therefore, could not terminate the contractual relationship in order to recover possession of the goods.

In addition, paragraph (2) sentence 2 provides that the transferor's entitlement to recover the goods from the later transferee (B2) may also be exercised by the first transferee (B1). The wording of this special provision is coordinated with VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1) and implies that B1's right is a proprietary remedy, so to say, a special authorisation to exercise the owner's general claim of revindication. This specific right is introduced, on the one hand, in order to provide B2 with effective means of protection in case the transferor (who has already acted dishonestly by disposing of the goods a second time in favour of B2) refuses to co-operate. Otherwise, it would not be of much help to B1 that S still has the ownership of the goods and could, theoretically, demand the goods back from B2 in order to deliver them to B1, or transfer ownership to B1 by giving notice to B2. It also helps B1 where B2 or S or both are insolvent. Third, the direct right against the later transferee is intended to help B1 in case B2 has already paid the whole or part of the price to S and, now that this transaction has to be reversed, invokes a right to withhold performance of the obligation to return the goods to S under the general rule of III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation). Such a right may be effective as against S, which is for the law of obligations to decide. Sentence 2 of paragraph (2) is intended to ensure that no such right to withhold performance may be set up against B1. This may put B2 in a less favourable position in relation to S. However, in relation to B1, it is clear that B2 – who acted in bad faith – is not worthy of legal protection.

In case there are several purported transferees and all of them intend to proceed against the later transferee in possession, the wording already makes it clear that only the first transferee (B1) can exercise the right granted by paragraph (2) sentence 2.

In particular: insolvency of later transferee in possession. As already indicated, the solution adopted in this Article – being a "property law solution" without falling back on obligatory rights to be exercised against B2 – is considered to be advantageous where B2 becomes insolvent before returning the goods either to S or to B1. It appears more justified to protect the first transferor, whose acquisition was intended to be frustrated by a dishonest act, than to protect B2 and B2's general creditors, who should rather step into B2's shoes instead of profiting from B2's bad faith. As noted above , the right of separation can be exercised by S or B1.

In particular: insolvency of transferor. Finally, the approach adopted in this Article is also intended to provide B1 with protection in case (also) the transferor S becomes insolvent. As long as the goods are still in the possession of B2, B1 can exercise the direct claim against B2 provided for by paragraph (2) sentence 2. For reasons discussed below, B1's right against B2 is intended to have priority over S's claim, in case S also demands the return of the goods from B2 under paragraph (2) sentence 1. Pursuant to the policy underlying this Article, however, B1 is entitled to separate the goods also where, after the purported transfer to B2 has taken place, they still are in possession of the transferor S (because S and B2 agreed on an immediate transfer) or have returned to S under paragraph (2) sentence 1. The reason for preferring B1 as against S's general creditors lies in the function of this Article: from S's perspective (and the perspective of S's creditors), it is irrelevant whether the goods are validly transferred to B2 or B1; in either case, the goods part from S's patrimony. The purpose of this Article is not to confer an enrichment upon the transferor's estate. The technique that S retains the ownership although B2 would, formally, have already fulfilled all general transfer requirements just serves the purpose of abridging the alternative "detour" of letting B2 acquire the ownership – in which case S's creditors would also have no chance to lay their hands on the goods – and letting B1 proceed against B2 based on mere obligatory rights. For these reasons, B1's right should also be valid as against S's creditors.

This, however, only applies where the goods would already have been transferred to B2 had this transfer not been prevented by paragraph (1) of this Article. There is no general rule that ownership is treated as having passed "upon conclusion of the contract" (or whatever other specific time) in case a double disposition in favour of another transferee in bad faith occurs, which obviously would be inconsistent. The general effect of the transfer of ownership to B1 will only occur when the general requirements are fulfilled in relation to B1. The effect of this Article before B1 obtains possession (or S transfers the goods to B1 by way of giving notice to B2, or by agreeing with B1 that ownership will, now, pass at a specific point in time) is only to provide B1 with a particular proprietary right to delivery (separation) of the goods from B2 or S. Of course, this right can only be exercised if B1 pays the agreed price to S.

VIII.–2:302: Indirect representation

(1) Where an agent acting under a mandate for indirect representation within the meaning of IV.D.–1:102 (Definitions) acquires goods from a third party on behalf of the principal, the principal directly acquires the ownership of the goods (representation for acquisition).

(2) Where an agent acting under a mandate for indirect representation within the meaning of IV.D.–1:102 (Definitions) transfers goods on behalf of the principal to a third party, the third party directly acquires the ownership of the goods (representation for alienation).

(3) The acquisition of ownership of the goods by the principal (paragraph (1)) or by the third party (paragraph (2)) takes place when:

(a) the agent has authority to transfer or receive the goods on behalf of the principal;
(b) there is an entitlement to transfer by virtue of a contract or other juridical act, a court order or a rule of law between the agent and the third party; and
(c) there has been an agreement as to the time ownership is to pass or delivery or an equivalent to delivery in the sense of Article VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e) between the third party and the agent.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the rule. This Article deals with situations where a transfer of ownership of goods involves a mandate for indirect representation. This may occur in two situations. Either, the agent (who will be called the intermediary in these Comments) transfers goods, in the intermediary's own name but on behalf of the principal, to a third party. For the purposes of the following discussion, this will be called "representation for alienation". In this respect, the present Article serves a "didactical" purpose only. As to substance, the rule is already implied in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(c), which provides that ownership may also be transferred by a person who is not the owner of the goods but has been granted authority to transfer the ownership. In the second situation, the intermediary acquires goods from a third party in the intermediary's own name, but on behalf of the principal: "representation for acquisition". With regard to this situation, the present Article provides for a special default rule, namely that the ownership of the goods directly passes from the third person to the principal (without entering the intermediary's patrimony). In the first place, therefore, the function of the Article is to regulate between which persons ownership passes (paragraphs (1) and (2)); also, the Article clarifies the time when ownership passes (paragraph (3)).

Direct and indirect representation. This Article addresses indirect representation, which has to be distinguished from (direct) representation in the sense of Book II Chapter 6. Roughly speaking, direct representation means that where a person (the representative) acts in the name of a principal and within the scope of authority granted by the principal or a rule of law, the act carried out by the representative affects the legal position of the principal in relation to the third party as if it had been done by the principal. The representative's acts are immediately effective and binding vis-à-vis the principal; see, above all, III.–6:105 (When representative's act effects principal's legal position).

Illustration 1
P is a cheese producer. P agrees with I that I will sell, in P's name, 100 kg of mozzarella to T for a certain price. I concludes a sales contract with T in the name of P and delivers the cheese to T. On the basis of this contract between P and T the ownership of the cheese directly passes from P to T (direct representation).

However, in commercial practice, it is also common that the intermediary acts on order and on account of, but not in the name of, the principal. This frequently happens, e.g., where transactions are carried out by a commission agent. In general, one traditionally speaks of "indirect representation". Indirect representation can either be disclosed, when the third party knows that the intermediary is acting on behalf of a principal; or undisclosed, if the third party does not know that the intermediary is acting on behalf of a principal. There may be different reasons for a principal to carry out transactions by way of indirect representation. For instance, the principal may wish to conduct the transaction in a discreet fashion, or to secure more advantageous contractual conditions or prices. It can also be that the reputation or known solvency of the intermediary will increase the chances that the third party will be willing to enter into the transaction. Also, using indirect representation may be in the interest of the intermediary, e.g. where the intermediary is an expert in the relevant market and does not want to disclose the names of customers to the principal.

Illustration 2
P wishes I to sell the mozzarella to T in I's own name instead of in P's name. Being a relatively small-scale producer, P thinks that potential buyers would prefer to enter into a deal with I. I, in his own name, sells and delivers 100 kg of P's mozzarella to T. Before doing so, I informs T that he is acting on account of the producer P (disclosed indirect representation).

Illustration 3
P is an amateur art collector, and an outsider to the art trading circuit. P wishes to acquire a specific valuable painting that belongs to T, the owner of an art gallery. Wishing the transaction to be discreet, and fearing that T would take advantage of the disparity by asking a very high price, or that T would not trust his creditworthiness, P agrees with I, a professional art dealer, that she will acquire the painting in her own name, thus preventing T from trying to obtain a very high price at P's expense, or from not accepting the deal for fear of lack of solvency (undisclosed indirect representation).

Indirect representation for acquisition and for alienation. For the purposes of this Article, two categories of indirect representation are distinguished (cf. paragraphs (1) and (2)). The one category is "indirect representation for acquisition". The intermediary intervenes on behalf of the principal in the acquisition of goods from the third party: P (buyer) – I – T (seller). The other category is "indirect representation for alienation". The intermediary intervenes on behalf of the principal in the transfer of goods to the third party: P (seller) – I – T (buyer).

The discussion in the following Comments will employ the following abbreviations: P is short for "principal", I for "intermediary" and T for the "third party".

Comparative background. A plain picture is hard to provide in brief, so that reference must be made to the Notes on this Article for more details. However, with regard to representation for alienation, European legal systems accept a direct transfer from the principal to the third party where the principal has granted the intermediary authority to dispose of the principal's property. In the converse direction, i.e. regarding representation for acquisition, the solutions are more diverse and, often, unclear or disputed. There are countries which, in principle, do not accept a direct transfer from the third party to the principal, so that the transfer is made, first, to the intermediary who, then, passes on ownership to the principal. However, it is then often accepted that the principal and the intermediary may agree on an anticipated constitutum possessorium, so that ownership passes to the principal at the moment it is acquired by the intermediary. In some countries, it is sometimes argued that in such a case, ownership would not rest with the intermediary for a "logical second", which would amount to a direct passing of ownership at least in these specific situations. Also, in some of these countries there exist specific rules on commission under which, in the end, the goods a commission agent received from a third party in the course of fulfilling the commission contract are treated as if they belonged to the principal in relation to the commission agent and the agent's creditors. Very generally speaking, this shows that even in countries which basically apply a two-step transfer approach, there are at least some tendencies towards a direct transfer approach in representation for acquisition. In other countries, it is explicitly acknowledged that the principal acquires directly from the third party. As to common law systems, where the basic distinction is rather made between disclosed and undisclosed agency than between direct and indirect representation, one can perhaps say that at least comparable results may be achieved by accepting that the principal may have beneficial interests in goods acquired by the intermediary.

Within the structural framework of these model rules, a choice has to be made between the two options already mentioned above: a two-step transfer approach under which the intermediary acquires ownership for some interim stage, and a direct transfer between the third party and the principal. The arguments will be discussed in Comment B below.

Related provisions in other parts of these model rules. Reference should be made to III.–5:401 (Principal's option to take over rights in case of agent's insolvency) and III.–5:402 (Third party's counter-option). On the history, see III.–5:401 Comment B. These two provisions are of importance for achieving a balance of the interests involved in transactions carried out by means of an indirect representative (see Comment B below). As to the delimitation of this Article's scope of application, reference is made to the definitions provided by IV.D.–1:102 (Definitions) on mandate contracts; cf. Comment C below.

B. Discussion of "two-step transfer" versus "direct transfer" approach

General: options; authority to dispose already implies solution for representation for alienation. As mentioned above, the two basic options in this field are to provide either a direct transfer between principal and third party; or a two-step transfer, under which a transfer takes place both in the relations P – I and I – T, so that the intermediary acquires ownership for some time. With regard to representation for alienation, however, a direct transfer solution is already accepted by VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(c), which provides that ownership may also be transferred by a person who is not the owner of the goods but has been granted authority to transfer the ownership. Such a granting of authority to dispose will usually be contained, e.g., in a commission contract, where the commission agent agrees to sell goods for the owner in the agent's own name. Also in other cases of indirect representation, the granting of authority to dispose will usually follow from an interpretation of the underlying contract or other juridical act determining the legal relation between the principal and the intermediary. In the case of representation for alienation, the principal's right of ownership of the goods is, therefore, not affected by handing over the goods to the intermediary. It will only be lost when directly passing to the third party. However, the parties (P and I) are not precluded from agreeing otherwise: they may well choose to transfer ownership to I first, who then transfers the goods further to T.

The following sections (a) to (c) briefly discuss the main issues of relevance when choosing between a two-step transfer and a direct transfer. They also deal with representation for alienation, for the purposes of illustration and of testing the result already achieved under the general rules.

(a) Protection of, or against, the intermediary's general creditors

Representation for acquisition: principal's perspective. Under a two-step transfer approach, if the third party has already delivered the goods to the intermediary and the intermediary becomes insolvent before delivering the goods to the principal, the goods will form part of the intermediary's estate. The principal cannot separate the goods from the estate, which of course is unfavourable in particular where the principal has already advanced money to the intermediary to enable the latter to pay the purchase price to the third party. Also, the principal cannot make use of the direct action provided by III.–5:401 (Principal's option to take over rights in case of agent's insolvency), as the third party can invoke the defence that there has already been performance to the intermediary. That Article only entitles the principal to take over the rights to performances which are still due to the intermediary. Under a direct transfer approach, on the other hand, the principal acquires ownership directly from the third party as soon as the goods are delivered to the intermediary, and the principal can rely on the ownership-protection remedies and separate the goods by virtue of VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1), provided the principal refunds, or already has refunded, the purchase price to I. Thereby, the principal is protected against losing the goods in the intermediary's insolvency, which certainly is considered to be the main advantage of the direct transfer approach. As under a two-step approach, the principal will, however, remain unprotected if the principal has paid the intermediary in advance, the intermediary becomes insolvent before effecting payment to the third party, and the third party did not deliver the goods to the intermediary. In this case, the principal may think of resorting to III.–5:401 in order to take over the intermediary's rights under I's contract with the third party. But the unpaid T may invoke the right to withhold performance (cf. III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation)), which T could have invoked as against I (III.–5:401 paragraph (3)). P, consequently, would have to pay twice in order to get the goods from T. The result, as such, is not inappropriate. It mirrors the general principle that a person who performs in advance takes a risk.

Representation for acquisition: third party's perspective. In this relation, the two approaches do not differ. T will lose the goods when delivering them to I without taking a security. This is the general risk of giving credit. From T's perspective, it is rather immaterial whether the insolvent I or the principal has acquired the goods (the two-step approach may be slightly advantageous for him if P has prepaid and, now that the goods also fall within I's estate, the dividend for all creditors, including T, is a little higher). It may thus be observed that under a direct transfer approach, it is dangerous for the seller (T) to extend credit to an intermediary who buys the goods, but less dangerous for the buyer (P) to extend credit to the intermediary if the intermediary obtains possession of the goods.

Representation for acquisition: intermediary's and intermediary's creditors' perspective. A potential argument against a direct transfer approach is that it, by attributing the value of the goods to the principal rather than to the intermediary, could discriminate against the intermediary and the intermediary's creditors. There would certainly be a problem if the intermediary, due to a direct acquisition by the principal, ran the risk of losing both the goods and the payment the intermediary is entitled to receive from the principal. However, there are other rules which may provide some protection in that respect. In particular, where the intermediary acts under a contract of commercial agency, IV.E.–2:401 (Right of retention) provides a right of retention over the goods of the principal in order to secure the commercial agent's rights to remuneration, compensation, damages and indemnity, until the principal has fulfilled the corresponding obligations. This rule fully fits to the situations relevant here. The goods which can be retained are goods owned by the principal (due to the "direct transfer" approach, once they are delivered to the intermediary). The rule applies when the agency relation is still ongoing, as well as when it has ended. The right to retain provided by this rule is effective against the owner (principal) as well as against third parties (sub-buyers from the principal, even if they already have acquired ownership); see IV.E.–2:401 (Right of retention) Comment A. A right of retention amounts to a proprietary security right (IX.–1:102 (Security right) paragraph (2)(c) and IX.–2:114 (Right of retention of possession)). It can, therefore, be enforced under the general rules of Book IX if the principal does not pay in due time. Given this, one may summarise that the intermediary is not treated unfairly by a direct transfer rule, since – if the right to retention is exercised – the goods are economically only given away against payment of their value (and additional payment for the work carried out). Seen from the perspective of the intermediary's creditors in the latter's insolvency, the principal is, however, still treated preferentially in so far as the principal, once the intermediary obtains the goods, never loses the money paid to the intermediary, even if it has been paid in advance, which normally means taking a risk from which general creditors may profit (cf. the Comments on VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general)). The right of retention referred to above is, however, only provided for commercial agency relations in the sense of IV.E.–3:101 (Scope) and other contractual relationships covered by Part E of Book IV (cf. IV.E.–1:101 (Contracts covered). One may, however, think of analogies. Also, the general rule of III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation) should at least help with regard to the reimbursement of the price paid for the goods and a remuneration for the intermediary's work.

Representation for alienation: principal's perspective. As already mentioned, in a situation of representation for alienation, the principal (owner) will regularly grant authority to dispose to the intermediary, so that P remains the owner and ownership only passes to the third party (T) when transferred to T by I. If the intermediary becomes insolvent before, the principal can separate the goods from I's estate. This would not be the case if the P and I, based on the principle of party autonomy, agree that P transfers ownership of the goods to I for the purpose of transferring it further to T. If T already received the goods, resorting to III.–5:401 (Principal's option to take over rights in case of agent's insolvency) in order to receive payment may be of help for P in such a constellation. But T will be able to invoke a defence to the extent that T has already paid to I; to this extent T has already discharged T's obligations under the contract.

Representation for alienation: third party's perspective. There is also not much to be said in this respect, since a transfer from P to I will not happen that frequently in practice. Under III.–5:402 (Third party's counter-option), the third party (T) can demand delivery from the principal only if the latter opts for taking over the intermediary's contractual rights against T. If so, T arguably could, instead of invoking a defence to the extent T has already paid to I, choose to take the goods by paying a second time to P.

(b) Effects of invalidity or avoidance of one of the contracts

Representation for acquisition. The choice between a "two-step" transfer and a "direct transfer" approach may potentially affect the solution of cases where one of the contracts is invalid (from the beginning) or avoided subsequently. Under both approaches, where the intermediary acts as a representative for acquisition, the invalidity (avoidance) of the contract I – T will, in general, cause the property to re-vest in T (although good faith acquisition principles may possibly create exceptions). Ownership will definitely fall back to T where both contracts are invalid. However, where only the contract P – I is invalid, the two-step transfer approach rather clearly leads to the result that ownership stays with I. A straight-forward formalistic application of the direct transfer approach, on the other hand, would lead to the result that ownership would stay with T, which would be somewhat surprising since T entered into a valid contract with I, delivered the goods to I and would, under the contract, still be obliged to transfer the ownership to I (again). Arguably, there are two other possible solutions to this situation. Either P may ratify the transfer, which should be possible by applying VIII.–2:102 (Transferor's right or authority) and II.–6:111 (Ratification) by way of analogy, e.g. upon taking delivery of the goods. Or, since the direct transfer approach mainly serves the purpose of protecting the recipient but this purpose cannot be achieved where the principal's contract is and remains invalid, the "direct transfer rule" is not applied and I acquires validly from T. This seems to be the appropriate solution, even though the intermediary perhaps never intended to acquire these goods personallt. If this is accepted, both approaches lead to the same result.

Representation for alienation. There are also no striking differences with regard to representation for alienation. Where both contracts are invalid, P definitely remains the owner; where only the contract P – I is invalid, the same will apply unless T acquires in good faith. If only the contract I – T is invalid, the direct transfer approach will cause the ownership to remain with P, which is adequate, whereas under the two-step approach (if chosen by the parties), I has acquired ownership of the goods. This is rather unproblematic here, since I can still sell the goods to another person in the capacity of an indirect representative.

(c) Further aspects; summary of evaluation

Simplicity, practicability, facilitating indirect representation. Proponents of a direct transfer approach usually highlight its simplicity and practicability as further advantages. This does not necessarily refer to the fact that there is simply one transfer less involved, but primarily to the observation that the intended economic effect of the whole transaction is achieved at once. It is also common to stress that the intermediary, in reality, has no interest in acquiring ownership of the goods. What matters for the intermediary (in a representation for acquisition) is to be paid or refunded for the price paid to the third party and to receive payment for the service provided. Ownership is not needed for securing these interests, as long as other legal means sufficiently take care of them. Finally, providing the principal (both in representation for alienation and in representation for acquisition) with a safe position as against the intermediary's creditors may facilitate indirect representation in general and serve the commercial interest of carrying out transactions by way of indirect representation.

Other general arguments. In a certain sense, adopting a direct transfer approach also may be said to promote party autonomy: it is easier to achieve a contractual deviation from the direct transfer rule if the principal and the intermediary agree that the goods are to be transferred by a separate step also in their internal relation, than to achieve a direct transfer effect when starting from a two-step model. Some further general arguments that might be brought forward against a direct transfer concept are considered to carry only little if any weight. In particular, the third party will have no general interest that ownership is acquired by a particular person, the intermediary. What is important is the fulfilment of the counter-performance and that possible later obligations such a right for repair or replacement will be fulfilled. But these are not property law matters. Also, it might be argued that, in case of representation for acquisition, an "authority to acquire" on behalf of the future owner – parallel to the intermediary's "authority to dispose" when transferring goods to the third party – may appear uncommon for many countries. However, other countries have been familiar with this rule for a long time and a two-step transfer rule could be equally surprising from their perspective.

Summary of evaluation. The conclusion is that the practical advantages of the direct transfer approach, in particular of providing the principal with a safe position and the possible effects following therefrom, prevail. On the other hand, the direct transfer model appears to produce no considerable disadvantages. It is, therefore, adopted both in the case of representation for alienation and of representation for acquisition.

C. The rule in detail

Scope. Both paragraphs (1) and (2) require that an agent acts under a "mandate for indirect representation" within the meaning of IV.D.–1:102 (Definitions). Pursuant to subparagraph (e) of that Article, a mandate for indirect representation is a mandate under which the agent is to act in the agent's own name or otherwise in such a way as not to indicate an intention to affect the principal's legal position. A "mandate" is the authorisation and instruction given by the principal as modified by any subsequent direction (IV.D.–1:102(a)). It need not be given by a contract but may be given by a unilateral juridical act.

Direct transfer between principal and third party. Paragraph (1) – for the case of representation for acquisition – and paragraph (2) – for representation for alienation – implement the "direct transfer" approach. In the first case, ownership passes directly from the third party to the principal, without entering the intermediary's patrimony (even though the goods are delivered to the intermediary). In the second case, ownership passes directly from the principal (owner) to the third party. As mentioned above, this is just an express repetition of the general principle that ownership maybe transferred by a person other than the owner who has been validly authorised to transfer the ownership. For the policies underlying the choice of this approach, see Comment B above.

Paragraph (3): requirements for, and time of, the transfer. Paragraph (3) of this Article clarifies how the general transfer requirements set out in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1) are to be applied where the transfer is made by an intermediary; at the same time, it regulates the time when the transfer becomes effective: namely when all requirements are fulfilled. The fact that subparagraphs (a) and (b) of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1) – namely, that the goods must exist and must be transferable – are not repeated in this Article does not mean anything as to substance. They also apply of course, but it is unnecessary to repeat them here because there do not exist any particularities with regard to these requirements when it comes to indirect representation. Ownership passes when all requirements are met.

Agent's authority to transfer or receive the goods (paragraph (3)(a)). A transfer by way of representation for alienation requires that the intermediary has authority to transfer the ownership of the goods. This is already stated in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(c) and just repeated here. The "authority to receive" the goods is intended to constitute the corresponding element for representation for acquisition. In the case of representation for alienation, the intermediary's authority to dispose makes it possible that the intermediary affects the principal's patrimony so as to transfer property out of that patrimony, based on a contract concluded in the intermediary's own name. Equally, in the case of representation for acquisition, the intermediary's authority to receive allows the intermediary to affect the principal's patrimony so as to transfer property into that patrimony, again based on a contract concluded in the intermediary's own name. Such authority will usually be implied in the contract of mandate, or unilateral authorisation given by the principal.

Entitlement between intermediary and third party (paragraph (3)(b)). The entitlement to the transfer of ownership in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(d) must exist in the relation between the intermediary and the third party. It may be based on any of the different legal grounds listed in the text of the Article; however, being entitled by virtue of a contract is the most relevant category here. Subparagraph (b) applies both to representation for alienation and to representation for acquisition. Since there does not occur any transfer between the principal and the intermediary, unless the parties agree otherwise, the entitlement-requirement is not mentioned in this relation. However, the intermediary's authority must validly exist.

Agreement as to time, delivery or equivalent (paragraph (3)(c)). Subparagraph (3)(c), finally, provides that the general transfer requirements of an agreement as to the time ownership is to pass, or, in the absence of such agreement, delivery or an equivalent to delivery, must exist in the relation between the intermediary and the third party. This refers to VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e). It goes without saying and also follows from the reference to the general transfer rule that in case of an agreement as to the time ownership is to pass, the conditions of this agreement must be met in order to let property pass. This rule applies both to representation for acquisition and to representation for alienation.

VIII.–2:303: Passing of ownership in case of direct delivery in a chain of transactions

Where there is a chain of contracts or other juridical acts, court orders or entitlements based on a rule of law for the transfer of ownership of the same goods and delivery or an equivalent to delivery is effected directly between two parties within this chain, ownership passes to the recipient with effect as if it had been transferred from each preceding member of the chain to the next.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the rule. This Article addresses a situation which frequently occurs in practice: A sells good to B, who in turn resells them to C. For practical reasons, however, the goods are delivered directly from A to C. Under a delivery-based transfer system, this raises the question how a transfer of ownership of these goods is brought about. To a large extent, the issue may be considered to be of an academic nature, but it also implies some aspects that may be of practical relevance (cf. Comment B below), for which reason it seems appropriate to address it in a specific Article in model rules like these. With regard to the structural elements used in the transfer concept of this Chapter, the present Article supplements both the delivery rules of VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) and VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery), which basically presuppose that delivery is made from each transferor to the respective transferee, and the rules on the transferee's entitlement (VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraphs (1)(d) and (2)) which, in general, are also based on this assumption.

> Illustration 1
> A concludes a contract for the sale of goods with B, who resells them to C, and C sells them to D. The goods are still in A's possession. In order to keep transaction costs low, the goods are delivered – in the sense of VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) – directly from A to D.

> Illustration 2
> A concludes a contract for the sale of goods with B, who resells them to C, and C sells them to D. The goods are placed in Y's warehouse. A gives notice to Y that ownership of the goods now passes to D. Or, A transfers documents issued by Y, which contain the undertaking to deliver the goods to the current holder of the document, to D. In this case, there is an equivalent to delivery in the sense of VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraphs (2) or (4), respectively.

As to substance, this Article spells out two effects: first, that the acquisition of ownership by the last transferee in the chain is valid; second, that ownership passes with effect as if it had been transferred from each preceding member of the chain to the next.

Comparative background. The situation addressed in this Article is usually not expressly regulated by statute. Solutions usually follow from general transfer principles; in many countries, the issue is only little discussed or not discussed at all. However, one can identify a general principle in so far as it is generally accepted that, where direct delivery is made based on a chain of contracts (or other legal grounds), the last person's acquisition will be valid. Also, it appears that the usual conception is that ownership passes "along the chain" of (contractual or other) entitlements, both in consensual systems (where the transfer already follows from the conclusion of the contract) and under delivery-based systems. Dogmatic concepts differ to a certain extent, as can be seen from the Notes to this Article. However, the idea that ownership could pass directly from the person effecting delivery to the person taking delivery (in Illustrations 1 and 2: from A to D) is at least discussed in some countries.

Options: direct transfer or transfer "along the chain". Taking into account the comparative survey as well as evident practical needs, there is virtually no question that a transfer of ownership by way of direct delivery should be possible. The only issue to discuss is whether the transfer should be regarded as occurring directly (in the examples given above: from A to D) or "along the chain" (i.e., A–B–C–D); in the latter case, B and C may be deemed to become owners for a "logical second".

B. Discussion of the options

General; avoiding artificial constructions and consistency. Arguments may be put forward on different levels. For instance, the concept of a transfer along the chain, since it implies at least one immediate acquisition and sub-transfer by which the person in the middle acquires ownership "for a logical second", may be regarded fictitious; and it may be argued that such artificial constructions should be avoided. On the other hand, it may be argued that transfers in a chain should be treated alike as far as possible, irrespective of whether delivery is made from one member to the next or directly from the first to the last member, the latter only being carried out for reasons of practical simplification. Both views could, depending on subjective preferences, claim to be a "natural" approach; the latter view may also invoke an argument of consistency.

The possibility under this Chapter to contract out of the delivery regime and to bring about the transfer by agreeing on a certain time ownership is to pass does not necessarily speak for the one or other option. If, e.g., A and B agree on an immediate transfer while the goods remain with A, ownership will be regarded to have passed to B, and to further pass on from B, under both approaches.

The following Comments will concentrate on aspects where the practical results of the two approaches may, at least potentially, differ.

Protection of insolvent middle person's creditors. One of the situations where the two approaches potentially differ is where one of the persons "in the middle" becomes insolvent, so that in principle, the fact that this person acquires ownership could be considered advantageous for that person's general creditors (at least under the conceptual thinking of a unitary approach). The following discussion will primarily focus on the most frequent constellation that the legal basis of all transactions in the chain is a contract for the sale of goods.

> Illustration 3
> Facts as in illustration 1. After all contracts in the chain A–B–C–D have been concluded, but before delivery is made from A to D, C becomes insolvent and bankruptcy proceedings are opened.

Wherever one considers ownership to be placed in such a situation, basic insolvency law principles should arguably not be rendered inapplicable. At the time when insolvency proceedings are commenced, both contracts between B and C, and between C and D, are not fulfilled at least on the respective transferor's side. Depending on whether the respective counter-performance, i.e. payment of the price from C to B and from D to C, has already been fully performed at that time or not, C's insolvency administrator may have a right to choose between adopting (fulfilling) each of these two contracts or terminating them. Suppose both payments have not yet been made in full (so that a right to choose would exist) and the insolvency administrator opts for upholding the contracts, because C sold the goods to D for a better price than C is obliged to pay to B and, therefore, executing both contracts would increase the bankrupt's estate, there will be an unaffected chain of contracts from A to D, and all these contracts must be fulfilled irrespective of whether a "direct transfer" or a "transfer along the chain" approach applies in property law. If D took a risk and prepaid a considerable part of the price to C before insolvency proceedings are commenced, the insolvency administrator may opt for termination in order to increase the estate to the benefit of C's general creditors. Placing the goods with C in such a situation may fit easily to a "transfer along the chain" approach (e.g. where insolvency law provides that as from the commencement of insolvency proceedings, dispositions made by the debtor are ineffective as against creditors). It may cause difficulties under a "direct transfer" concept. Making it possible for D to invoke a "direct acquisition of ownership" from A for the purpose of protecting a pre-paying buyer (only because the buyer took delivery from someone else) would appear strange in terms of equal treatment, consistency, and a balancing of interests. Although this is just a small extract of possible scenarios in an insolvency context, it shows that the "along the chain" approach has advantages in this respect. It may be added that for B (a particular creditor of the insolvent C), it seems to be immaterial which concept is applied. It may also be added that where the underlying entitlements to the transfers arise from other legal grounds than from a contract (under which both parties owe a performance to the other), a right to choose does not apply.

Transfer subject to retention of ownership or other encumbrance. The transfer system should make sure that if one of the parties within the chain agrees to transfer the goods only subject to a retention of ownership (or agrees to retain a limited proprietary right in the goods), this transferee's retained ownership or other encumbrance is preserved. Again, this easily goes together with a rule that ownership passes along the chain. A direct transfer rule would need an additional provision. This additional rule would, at least for this particular issue, re-assimilate the direct transfer concept to a transfer "along the chain".

Invalidity of contracts in the chain. Another aspect rather speaking for the "along the chain" solution are cases where one or more contracts within the chain turn out to be invalid or are avoided after delivery. This will give rise to unjustified enrichment claims (unless good faith acquisition principles apply). These claims will "follow the contracts". If ownership passed along the chain as well, both devices will coincide in so far as a certain party within the chain will get the goods based on the unjustified enrichment principles and the proprietary remedies. If, on the other hand, ownership passed "directly", there should – under a causal transfer approach – be no doubt that the invalidity of one of the contracts in the chain will affect the last person's acquisition. Also in this respect, the direct transfer concept would have to be assimilated to a transfer concept along the chain.

All in all, it appears that the concept of a "transfer along the chain" is preferable. It is, therefore, explicitly adopted in the present Article.

C. The rule in detail

Chain of entitlements to transfer same goods. This Article applies where there is a chain of contracts or other juridical acts, court orders or entitlements based on a rule of law for the transfer of ownership of the same goods and delivery or an equivalent to delivery is effected directly between two parties within this chain. A "chain" within the meaning of this Article exists where several (at least three) persons are legally tied towards each other in a way that the first is obliged to transfer ownership to the second, the second to the third, and so on. Compare illustration 1 above. Although the main practical examples doubtlessly are contracts, the rule equally applies to entitlements based on other legal grounds; the wording refers to the general concept of an entitlement to the transfer of ownership established by VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(d). It is immaterial in which chronological order these entitlements are created and the obligations become due. The entitlements must concern the "same goods"; that may be specific goods owned by the first transferee A. However, the goods may also be defined in generic terms in some or in all relations in the chain, provided that the generic terms used by the parties are compatible with each other.

Delivery or equivalent effected directly. Further, delivery of the goods, or an equivalent to delivery in relation to the goods, must be effected directly between two parties in the chain, evidently not being two direct contracting partners. Delivery may, e.g., be made from A to C or from A to D, etc. The terms refer to VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) and VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery), including the latter Article's paragraph (1) which addresses the case that the transferee (e.g., D) already possesses the goods.

Effect: as if transferred from each preceding member of chain to the next. The Article states that where the preceding requirements are fulfilled, ownership passes to the recipient with effect as if it had been transferred from each preceding member of the chain to the next. This implements the "along the chain" approach discussed above. It does not seem necessary to spell out that ownership rests with each person in the middle for a "logical second". It suffices to provide that the effects are "as if" the transfer was made from one to the other, and so on, at the moment when the first person in the chain effects delivery (or equivalent) to the last member.

VIII.–2:304: Passing of ownership of unsolicited goods

(1) If a business delivers unsolicited goods to a consumer, the consumer acquires ownership subject to the business's right or authority to transfer ownership. The consumer may reject the acquisition of ownership; for these purposes, II.–4:303 (Right or benefit may be rejected) applies by way of analogy.

(2) The exceptions provided for in II.–3:401 (No obligation arising from failure to respond) paragraphs (2) and (3) apply accordingly.

(3) For the purposes of this Article delivery occurs when the consumer obtains physical control over the goods.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the rule. This Article supplements II.–3:401 (No obligation arising from failure to respond) on a property law level. The named rule provides that, subject to certain exceptions, if a business delivers unsolicited goods to, or performs unsolicited services for, a consumer, no contract arises from the consumer's failure to respond or from any other action or inaction by the consumer in relation to the goods and services; and that no non-contractual obligation arises from the consumer's acquisition, retention, rejection or use of the goods or receipt of benefit from the services. The effect of such business practice on the ownership of the unsolicited goods is not addressed by II.–3:401, nor is it directly addressed by Article 9 of Directive 97/7/EC on the protection of consumers in respect of distance contracts, which is incorporated by II.–3:401. This gap is filled by the present Article, which completes the private law sanctions for this problematic commercial practice.

Comparative background and main policy questions. Whereas the Directive's impact on the level of the law of obligations has triggered a broad discussion in many EU Member States, its effects on the property law level remained unclear and disputed and were only little discussed in many countries. In a number of legal systems, delivery of unsolicited goods is treated as an unconditional gift; in some others, it has been contemplated whether the business should be granted a certain time to recover the goods before the consumer acquires ownership of them. Details are reflected in the Notes. Against this background, the main policy questions were whether the consumer should acquire "ownership" of the goods at all, and if yes, against whom such acquisition should be valid and when it should take place (immediately or after a certain time, giving the business a chance to take the goods back).

Basic idea. The basic idea underlying this Article is to carry the Directive's policy into effect on a property law level, namely by sanctioning an unfair commercial practice with the effect that it becomes so unattractive for businesses that the practice is abandoned. To this end, the rule provides that the consumer acquires ownership of the goods, and that this acquisition takes place immediately. This being a specific rule with a specific purpose, the scope of this Article equals the scope of II.–3:401 (No obligation arising from failure to respond). Unlike some European legal systems, this Article does not employ a "donation language", in order to avoid possible misunderstandings and consequential problems (e.g., related to the revocation of donations, etc.).

Place of provision. One could, certainly, discuss at length which would be the most appropriate place for this provision. The transfer is not based on a bilateral contract. Rather, acquisition of ownership takes place by operation of law. However, placing the rule in Section 3 of Chapter 2 fits since the mode of acquisition of ownership is derivative, not original.

Relation to unjustified enrichment law. Also, it has to be clarified that acquisition of ownership by the consumer does not amount to an unjustified enrichment. This Article provides a sufficient entitlement in law for the transfer to be justified. See also II.–3:401 (No obligation arising from failure to respond) paragraph (1)(b).

B. The main rule in detail (paragraph (1))

Scope: business delivering unsolicited goods to consumer. The requirements for this Article to apply are identical to those used in II.–3:401 (No obligation arising from failure to respond) paragraph (1). The transferor must be a "business", and the transferee a "consumer" in the sense of the definitions provided by I.–1:105 ("Consumer" and "business"). Goods must be delivered without being ordered by the consumer. "Delivers", in this Article, is not to be understood in the sense of VIII.–2:104 (Delivery), but in the sense in which it is used in II.–3:401. This is made clear by paragraph (3) of the present Article which provides that delivery occurs when the consumer obtains physical control over the goods (because he or she is then in the situation that he or she must decide whether to enter into a contract or not). In the end, this means that the consumer does not acquire ownership before "delivery" in the given sense has taken place. This, also, may be considered to constitute a "functional aspect" in the general unitary-oriented approach adopted in this Chapter justifying a minor exception to the general rules. For further general issues, see the Comments on II.–3:401 (No obligation arising from failure to respond). For the exceptions to the present Article, see Comment C below.

Time of acquisition. As mentioned above, one can think of different approaches as to the time when the consumer's acquisition of ownership takes place. In those countries where the issue of acquisition of ownership of unsolicited goods is explicitly regulated or discussed more closely, ownership passes immediately upon delivery (often following from characterising the delivery of unsolicited goods as an unconditional gift). Another option could be giving the sender a chance to pick up the goods, at least with regard to more valuable goods; or providing a general time limit of, e.g., six months. However, taking into account the policy of preventing businesses from executing unfair commercial practices, the most simple and effective solution is an immediate acquisition by the consumer. Acquisition of ownership takes place upon fulfilment of the general requirements set out in Chapter 2 Section 1, physical delivery in the sense used here of course being the most relevant aspect. Upon delivery, the consumer is "entitled to the transfer of ownership" in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (d) by virtue of the present Article itself. Should the business state, in its communication accompanying the unsolicited goods, that ownership of the goods only passes upon payment of the purchase price, this will remain ineffective.

Right to reject (sentence 2). As a matter of principle, no one should be forced to acquire any right. Accordingly, the consumer has the right to reject the acquisition of the right of ownership. This is catered for by applying II.–4:303 (Right or benefit may be rejected), which regulates the rejection of a right conferred by unilateral juridical act, by way of analogy. According to this rule, the result of such rejection is that the right is treated as never having accrued. Rejection is executed by notice to the maker of the act. This rule also applies for the acquisition of ownership, not only for reasons of consistency, but also because this promotes much more clarity than a merely internal rejection by will. Sending the goods back to the supplier will of course constitute such rejection.

Effects of acquisition of ownership. It is clear that the consumer's acquisition must be good as against the sender (business). Also, in order to give the consumer all possibilities of disposing of the goods, the consumer must be in a position to transfer title to another person, whether for a price or gratuitously. Therefore, the acquisition must be valid also in a question between this new acquirer (who acquired from the consumer) and the sender. This may appear to be a far-reaching consequence. It is only justified by the specific policy pursued by this Article (cf. Comment A above).

The business's general creditors – who may wish to levy execution on the delivered goods – should, in principle, be in the same position as the business itself. They should, therefore, have no rights in the goods. Under specific circumstances, the business's creditors may be provided with some protection under other general rules, namely under national (mainly: insolvency law) rules allowing the creditors to treat their debtor's transactions as ineffective in the sense of an "actio Pauliana" or comparable concepts, provided that the requirements set out in these provisions are fulfilled (e.g. an intention of defrauding creditors; gratuitous transactions, which may well be a matter of discussion with regard to unsolicited goods). It is, however, up to these national rules to decide which solution to adopt.

No effect against original owner if business acted without right or authority to dispose. Where the business itself has not acquired the goods validly, the position of the original owner should not deteriorate This Article's policy is to restrict certain commercial practices, but the original owner did not take part in, and does not benefit from, such practice(if the original ownere took advantage of the unsolicited delivery transaction, this may constitute a ratification in the sense of VIII.–2:102 (Transferor's right or authority)). This is catered for by the reference to the business's right or authority to transfer. The consumer cannot acquire the goods in good faith without paying a price (cf. VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership)).

C. Exceptions (paragraph (2))

General. As mentioned above, this Article aims at completing private law sanctions for business activities covered by II.–3:401 (No obligation arising from failure to respond) on a property law level. But this is it. The present Article does not intend to cover a broader scope than the named provision. Therefore, paragraph (2) of the present Article makes sure that the exceptions set out in II.–3:401 (2) and (3) also apply for the purposes of the transfer of ownership. The idea is to have completely identical scopes for all rules entitling the consumer to keep the goods, dispose of them, etc.

Exception for supply by way of benevolent intervention in another's affairs. II.–3:401 (No obligation arising from failure to respond) paragraph (2) makes an exception for goods supplied to a consumer by way of benevolent intervention in another's affairs. Such situations will be rare. Paragraph (2) of the present Article adopts this exception by way of reference, the idea not being that the consumer will be precluded from acquiring ownership under all circumstances, but that it must be up to the policies governing the applicable rules of Book V to decide whether ownership will pass to the consumer, and whether the business will have any rights resulting from delivering the goods.

Exception for supply in error. II.–3:401 (No obligation arising from failure to respond) paragraph (2) also makes an exception for goods supplied to a consumer in error or in such other circumstances that there is a right to reversal of an unjustified enrichment. Paragraph (2) of the present Article also makes this exception applicable by way of reference. One could discuss whether in such cases, the consumer should acquire ownership of the goods in the first place, but be under an obligation to transfer the goods back to the business under the provisions of Book VII on unjustified enrichment. However, the aim of the present Article is indeed to preclude a transfer of ownership in cases of error, etc., since the consumer's acquisition of ownership is meant as a form of "punishment" for unfair commercial practices which, however, is not appropriate where the business acted in error. One must take into account that the function of the consumer's acquisition of ownership, inter alia, is to enable the consumer to pass on title to a third person by way of donation. In such situations, depending on the circumstances, recovering the full value of the goods under unjustified enrichment principles may be problematic. Under the present concept, tracing the goods would be possible where delivery was made in error, since the third person acquired the goods from a non-owner and will not be protected by good faith acquisition principles, the latter requiring acquisition for value (cf. VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership)).

Delivery of excess quantity under contract for sale of goods. Paragraph (2) also refers to II.–3:401 (No obligation arising from failure to respond) paragraph (3), which provides that the said Article is subject to the rules on delivery of excess quantity under a contract for the sale of goods. The relevant rules on contracts for sale provide that in such a case, the buyer may decide to retain or refuse the excess quantity. If the buyer decides to keep it, he or she must pay for it at the contractual rate, subject to an exception where the consumer believes on reasonable grounds that the seller has delivered the excess quantity intentionally and without error, knowing that it had not been ordered (IV.A.–3:302 (Early delivery and delivery of excess quantity)). For the purposes of the present Article, adopting the reservation spelled out in II.–3:401(3) means that where the consumer decides to keep the goods and is under an obligation to pay the price, ownership of the excess goods of course also passes to the consumer, but based on the general rules of Sections 1 and 2 of this Chapter, and not by operation of law under the specific rule of the present Article.

VIII.–2:305: Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk

(1) For the purposes of this Chapter, "bulk" means a mass or mixture of fungible goods which is identified as contained in a defined space or area.

(2) If the transfer of a specified quantity of an identified bulk fails to take effect because the goods have not yet been identified in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (3), the transferee acquires co-ownership in the bulk.

(3) The undivided share of the transferee in the bulk at any time is such share as the quantity of goods to which the transferee is entitled out of the bulk as against the transferor bears to the quantity of the goods in the bulk at that time.

(4) Where the sum of the quantities to which the transferees are entitled as against the transferor and, if relevant, of the quantity of the transferor exceeds the total quantity contained in the bulk because the bulk has diminished, the diminution of the bulk shall first be attributed to the transferor, before being attributed to the transferees in proportion to their individual shares.

(5) Where the transferor purports to transfer more than the total quantity contained in the bulk, the quantity in excess of the total quantity of the bulk to which a transferee is entitled as against the transferor shall be reflected in the transferee's undivided share in the bulk only if the transferee, acquiring for value, neither knew nor could reasonably be expected to know of this excess. Where, as a result of such purported transfer of a quantity in excess of the bulk to a transferee in good faith and for value, the sum of the quantities to which the transferees are entitled as against the transferor exceeds the total quantity contained in the bulk, the lack of quantity shall be attributed to the transferees in proportion to their individual shares.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of this Article and the following VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk). This and the following Article contain specific provisions on the transfer of fungible (generic) goods forming part of an identified "bulk", e.g., goods stored in a certain container or warehouse, or oil contained in a specific tank, etc. Technically, they provide a certain exception to, or rather modification of, the general requirement of identification as set out in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (3). The latter rule provides that where the contract or other juridical act, court order or rule of law defines the goods in generic terms, ownership can pass only when the goods are identified to it. Regarding fungible goods contained in a bulk, this would mean that ownership of them cannot yet be transferred because the identification requirement is not satisfied. The parties could, therefore, wait until delivery of the single items owed to the specific transferee is made (or until any other event bringing about the identification of the goods). However, a transferee may wish to acquire a position in which there is some protection against the transferor's insolvency, and perhaps, a position in which "the goods" (or a respective quantity of goods) can be validly disposed of before that time. For such cases, the present Article provides for a possibility for the transferee to become co-owner of the whole goods contained in the bulk, which is possible against the background of the identification principle where (not the individual goods themselves, but) at least the quantity of the goods intended to be transferred, and the bulk this quantity is contained in, are identified. Under the present Article, such acquisition of an undivided share will take place if the parties have agreed on a transfer prior to the identification of the goods; typically, where they have agreed on an immediate transfer upon the conclusion of the contract. The undivided share in the bulk provides the transferee with a comparable protection as long as the goods are contained in the bulk. This is, however, only an interim stage. At the end of the day, it is of course intended that a respective quantity of goods is delivered out of the bulk and the transferor's co-ownership share in the bulk is transformed into sole ownership of the delivered goods. The issues related to this stage of delivery out of the bulk are regulated in VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk).

The main policy can be summarised as giving effect to party autonomy as far as possible, i.e. as far as the identification principle canbe applied in a modified form.

Usually, the rules on the transfer of goods forming part of an identified bulk will apply to situations where not only one transferee acquires an undivided share in the whole bulk, but several transferees do. Therefore, the rules must also address the effects of such transfer on other co-owners.

Comparative background. Comparable rules on "bulk sales" only exist in a minority of European legal systems; above all, in United Kingdom law. The context there is slightly different to the rules provided for in these Articles, since the Sale of Goods Act 1979 basically provides for a consensual transfer system, and the buyer's acquisition of an undivided share in the bulk is made dependent on payment. Also, there are some different policy choices regarding the rules on taking delivery out of the bulk. However, it is considered useful to implement the main approach suggested by United Kingdom law, i.e. providing for a possibility of acquiring an undivided share in the whole goods as a means of interim protection, into these model rules.

Basic structure of the "bulk sale" rules. The two Articles intend to address all relevant issues of this concept step by step in the black letter text. Paragraph (1) of the present Article provides for a definition of the term "bulk". The following paragraph (2) contains the main rule, namely that the transfer of a specified quantity of an identified bulk results in the creation of co-ownership of the whole goods contained in the bulk. Paragraph (3), then, provides the basic rule for calculating the undivided shares of the co-owners. The following paragraphs, finally, regulate special situations which may occur, but do not necessarily occur, in the context of the transfer of goods forming part of a bulk. Paragraph (4) deals with the case of subsequent shrinkage of the bulk (e.g., by some goods being stolen, or otherwise vanishing), whereas paragraph (5) addresses the case of "excess dispositions" made by the transferor, i.e. a special situation of multiple transfers.

The following Article, then, deals with issues arising at the stage of taking delivery out of the bulk. Paragraph (1) of that Article expressly states that a transferee is allowed to take delivery of a respective quantity out of the bulk – which is not self-evident, since taking delivery of certain goods that are held in co-ownership of several persons may formally constitute an infringement of the other co-owners' property rights. Paragraph (2) deals with the acquisition of ownership in cases where a transferee takes delivery of a quantity to which that transferee is entitled under the contract, but which exceeds the quantity of goods corresponding to the transferee's undivided share, e.g. because of a diminution of the bulk.

For the purposes described above, paragraph (5) of the present Article and VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk) paragraph (2) provide for specific good faith acquisition rules.

Relation to Chapter 5. As to the relation of these two Articles to the rules of Chapter 5 on production, combination and commingling – in particular: to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) – see VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment C. There is no direct overlap between these two sets of rules.

B. Definition of "bulk" (paragraph (1))

Mass or mixture of fungible goods. Paragraph (1) defines the term "bulk" for the purposes of Chapter 2 (the term is only used in this and the subsequent Article, and in the reference contained in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (3)). There are two decisive criteria; the first being that the goods are "fungible" (or interchangeable). This does not necessarily mean "of exactly the same kind and quality" but will depend on the respective understanding in the relevant market segment. E.g., scrap metal of different form may be regarded as "fungible" when being traded by a scrap dealer. The goods may be solid, liquid or gaseous ("mass or mixture"). Also, the quantity contained in the bulk may vary by new goods being added to the bulk and others being removed therefrom (e.g. for the purpose of effecting delivery to one of the transferees).

Identified as contained in defined space or area. The second decisive criterion is that these goods are placed in a "defined space or area", the emphasis rather lying on "defined" than on "space or area". The space or area may be closed (a tank or container, a specific depot or stockroom, a factory building) or non-roofed (a stockyard, a fish basin, or even a specific grazing land), it may move (a ship, a goods wagon) or not. Theoretically it is not even decisive that the transferor has exclusive access to that space or area, although in practice some element of exclusivity will regularly exist and some kind of separation makes sense. The material aspect is that the location, however defined, allows identifying which goods are placed there at a given moment in time, so that a relation between a quantity sold and the total quantity contained in the bulk can be established.

C. Main rule: creation of co-ownership (paragraph (2))

Specified quantity of identified bulk. This Article applies where the parties agree to transfer a specified quantity of the identified bulk. This contains two elements: First, the rule addresses the transfer of a quantity, which may be defined by number, weight or other measure. The main practical function of the rule becomes evident when it is considered what the parties could do without it. According to general rules on co-ownership – which are not regulated in these model rules, but will exist under national law – the parties could transfer an undivided share in the bulk by agreeing on a certain proportion (in the sense of a fraction or percentage) of the goods contained in the bulk. However, this is not the usual case. Normally, one will buy e.g. 10.000 tons of oil (a certain quantity), not 35 % of the oil contained in a particular tank. Second, the quantity subject to the transfer must be part of an identified bulk. A transfer of "100 bottles Barolo DOCG 2004 stored in my wine cellar in X" will fall within this Article; a transfer of "100 bottles Barolo DOCG 2004" will not (but be subject to the general transfer rules on generic goods; i.e. if a transfer before identification was agreed upon, ownership will pass upon identification).

Agreed time of transfer before identification. Further, paragraph (2) of this Article requires that the transfer "fails to take effect because the goods have not yet been identified", which is the case where the parties have agreed on a transfer before identification takes place. The paradigmatic example is that the parties agree that ownership of the goods will pass immediately upon the conclusion of the contract; but the agreement could be on any other date before identification is made. In the latter case, the effects spelled out by this Article will occur only at that later time.

Under the approach adopted in this Chapter, it is necessary that the parties agree to transfer the ownership of the goods to the transferee at a time covered by the rule. It will not suffice that the parties just conclude a contract for the sale of such goods. This corresponds to the general approach that the default rule under this Chapter is a transfer upon delivery, not upon the conclusion of the underlying contract. Although the usual sphere of application of the bulk-rules will concern contracts for the sale of goods, the Article applies, in principle, also to transfers based on a unilateral juridical act, a court order or a rule of law.

Differing from United Kingdom law, payment of the price (at least partial payment) is not required.

If no transfer prior to identification is agreed upon by the parties, the transfer of ownership will take place upon delivery, without requiring specific extra rules.

Consequence: acquisition of co-ownership. Where these criteria are fulfilled, paragraph (2) provides that the transferee acquires co-ownership in the bulk. Before that, the bulk may have been under the transferor's sole ownership; or there may have already existed co-ownership of the goods in the bulk so that, now, the transferee assumes a certain share (corresponding to the quantity transferred) which formerly belonged to the transferor.

D. Calculation of the undivided shares: general rule (paragraph (3))

Mechanism of calculation: relation of quantity to which transferee is entitled to quantity of goods in bulk. Paragraph (3) provides that the undivided share of a transferee in the bulk at any time is such share as the quantity of goods to which the transferee is entitled out of the bulk as against the transferor bears to the quantity of the goods in the bulk at that time. Applying this mechanism, therefore, requires two facts: first, the quantity out of the bulk to which the transferee is entitled; and second, the total quantity of goods contained in the bulk at the time the share is calculated. The formulation used for the first aspect, the "entitlement" of the transferee as against the transferor, corresponds to the concept of "entitlement" used in paragraph (1)(d) of the general transfer rule (VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general)), i.e. the transferee has a right as against the transferor to demand the transfer of ownership of a specific quantity by virtue of a contract or other juridical act, a court order or a rule of law, and the transferor, correspondingly, is under an obligation to transfer this quantity. This is the general terminology employed in this Chapter; "entitlement", therefore, does not refer to a proprietary right, but to a right to performance. The second factor in the calculation mechanism is the total quantity of goods in the bulk. This may be established by whatever method is appropriate. In practice, such calculation will often not be made all the time, but when the existence of proprietary rights becomes material, in particular when the transferor is insolvent and the bulk is going to be liquidated.

Establishing the relation of these two factors, the transferee's quantity is transformed into a proportion which constitutes the transferee's undivided share in the whole goods.

Illustration 1
X buys 2.000 units out of a bulk containing 9.000 units and agrees on an immediate transfer. The undivided share of X is 2/9 of the bulk.

Situations covered by this general calculation rule ("at any time"): acquisition of share. The general calculation rule provided by paragraph (3) applies to a number of different situations, addressed by the words "at any time" in text of the Article. First of all, this calculation method applies where the undivided share is acquired (as provided by paragraph (2)); cf. Illustration 1 above. The same applies where a transferee, e.g. a buyer in a permanent business relationship with that seller, already owns a share in the bulk and subsequently agrees on the "transfer" of further items. There is however one exception in the context of the acquisition of undivided shares, namely where more quantities are "transferred" than contained in the bulk. These constellations are governed by a special provision in paragraph (5) of this Article.

Subsequent increase of bulk. Second, the general calculation rule applies to any subsequent increase of quantity in the bulk. The quantity may increase for various reasons. The main case, generally, will be that the transferor adds further items to the bulk (e.g., produces new units and adds them to the stockroom, which is defined as "the bulk", or buys further items and adds them to the bulk for the purpose of reselling).

Illustration 2
S produces transistor radios of a certain type and stores them in a stockroom at his business premises. Currently, there are 10.000 radios stored in that stockroom. Customer B buys 1.000 radios from the stockroom, agreeing on an immediate transfer of ownership. B's share will be 1/10. Before the radios are delivered to B, S produces another 2.000 radios and adds them to the stockroom, which now contains 12.000 items. B's share now is 1/12.

Theoretically, in increase may also be brought about by another person adding goods to the bulk. Where this happens without a prior agreement as to the proprietary consequences, the commingling rule of VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) will apply and regulate the calculation of that person's undivided share in the bulk. The quantity out of the bulk to which the transferee is entitled will, however, not be affected by such an event, whereas the calculation of the share is adapted accordingly (as in illustration 2).

An increase may, however, also occur by an "act of nature", without any other person contributing with further units. Then, the question arises to whom the additional quantities shall be attributed. The general rule of paragraph (3) implies the choice that such increase is attributed to the transferor. In other words, a transferee's proportion cannot exceed a percentage representing the goods "transferred" to that transferee.

Illustration 3
Seller S runs a fish-farming enterprise and keeps fish in a defined basin. The price is calculated by weight. When the contract for sale with buyer B is concluded, the basin contains 1.000 fish with an average weight of 1 kilo. B buys 100 kilos and contracts for an immediate transfer; B therefore owns a share of 1/10. Due to extensive feeding, the fish have an average weight of 1,1 kilos one week later. B's share now is 1/11. The increase of 100 kilos belongs to S (it is not divided proportionally between all co-owners).

The result in illustration 3 is justified, because, on the one hand, B only pays for 100 kilos, and, on the other hand, S has to take care of the fish and also, according to paragraph (4), bears the risk of shrinkage in the first place.

Voluntary legitimate diminution of bulk by transferor. The general calculation rule further applies to all situations where the transferor voluntarily reduces the number of goods contained in the bulk. This will be the case, in particular, where the transferor delivers single items to other transferees who already owned undivided shares in the bulk, or where the respective transferee takes partial delivery. This is, so to say, the ordinary course of business, and is expressly allowed by VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk) paragraph (1). Upon such delivery, the shares of the remaining transferees are to be recalculated, which does, however, not affect the quantity to which their shares correspond. Pursuant to the policy underlying the provision, the transferor may also take out a quantity corresponding to the transferor's own undivided share, or consume a respective quantity. The transferees' shares will be recalculated according the general rule of paragraph (3).

Illustration 4
Facts as in illustration 1. The undivided share of customer X is 2/9 of a bulk of 9.000 units. X then takes delivery of 1.000 units, leaving 8.000 units in the bulk of which only 1.000 units are now due to X. X's share is now 1/8 of the bulk.

Cases of "involuntary" shrinkage are regulated by paragraph (4) of this Article.

E. Diminution of the bulk (paragraph (4))

Risk of shrinkage primarily placed on transferor. Paragraph (4) deals with cases where the total quantity in the bulk is "involuntarily" reduced; for instance, where some goods perish or are stolen. For these situations, the general calculation rule of paragraph (3) is partly modified. In principle, the transferees holding undivided shares in the bulk keep a share corresponding to the quantity they are entitled to. All shares formally are to be recalculated according to the reduced total quantity contained in the bulk, but as to substance, the shortfall only affects the share of the transferor, until it reaches zero. In principle, this already follows from paragraph (3), but is repeated in paragraph (4).

Illustration 5
A bulk contains 10.000 units. X, Y and Z by separate contracts buy 2.000, 3.000 and 1.000 units, respectively, and acquire respective shares in the bulk according to paragraphs (2) and (3), so that X holds 2/10, Y 3/10, Z 1/10 and the seller S the rest of 4/10. 4.000 units are then accidentally destroyed, leaving 6.000 units in the bulk. According to paragraphs (3) and (4) of this Article, X will now own 2/6 (which corresponds to the 2.000 units X bought), Y 3/6 and Z 1/6. The transferor S has no longer any share in the bulk.

Shrinkage subsidiarily to be born by transferees. Where, however, the diminution eats up more than corresponding to any share still remaining to the transferor, the general rule established in paragraph (3) would not work: the added quantities to which the single transferees are entitled would exceed the total quantity contained in the bulk. Paragraph (4), therefore, provides that to the extent that the shrinkage cannot be attributed to the transferor, the transferees, as the remaining co-owners, bear the shortfall proportionally.

Illustration 6
A bulk contains 12.000 units. X, Y and Z by separate contracts buy 2.000, 3.000 and 5.000 units, respectively, and acquire respective shares in the bulk according to paragraphs (2) and (3), so that X owns 2/12, Y 3/12, Z 5/12 and the seller S the rest of 2/12. Thereafter, 6.000 units are accidentally destroyed, leaving 6.000 units in the bulk.

The sum of the quantities to which X, Y and Z are entitled would be 10.000, which exceeds the remaining quantity of 6.000 still contained in the bulk. According to paragraph (4), the diminution is, in the first place, attributed to S, who thereby loses his whole share, and then attributed to X, Y and Z in proportion to their undivided shares. The internal proportion between X, Y and Z will remain a ratio of 2 : 3 : 5, being however related to a reduced total quantity. Their shares, therefore, are 2/10, 3/10 and 5/10, respectively (10 in the denominator being the sum of 2 + 3 + 5).

Underlying policy. In the absence of any agreement to the contrary – which is always possible according to general principles – the risk of partial destruction of the goods primarily rests with the transferor. The underlying policy consideration is that the goods, at the time they perish or are stolen or destroyed, are still in the sphere of control of the transferor,who typically has the best chances to take adequate precautions. Also, this distribution of risk corresponds to the general principles that would apply if the present Article did not exist. In the case of generic goods, B would still be the owner of the goods, and also under the rules on the passing of risk under a contract for the sale of goods, the risk would be on the transferor.

Special constellations. The result achieved by applying paragraph (4) would be questionable if the damage to the goods was caused by one of the transferees. In practice, this is most likely to happen in the course of taking delivery. Then, an adequate result can be arrived at by applying VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk). If the respective transferee finally takes delivery of the damaged goods, or abstains from taking delivery of a quantity corresponding to the goods that transferee destroyed, there is no problem, because quantities “reserved” for other transferees are not affected (if further quantities are also damaged, the co-owners may claim damages under the general rules of Book VI). If, however, the transferee who destroyed some of the goods takes delivery of other, non-damaged, goods, this is no problem as long as the transferor still owns a respective share in the bulk to which this quantity corresponds. If the respective transferee takes delivery of quantities “reserved” for the other transferees, it appears justified to treat the destruction as if this transferee had taken delivery of this quantity (by applying paragraph (1) of VIII.–2:306 by way of analogy) and to solve the question of whether the transferee validly acquired the excess quantity by resorting to VIII.–2:306 (2), meaning that this transferee could acquire only when being in good faith as to the non-existence of possible negative effects for the other transferees.

F. “Transfer” of quantity exceeding quantity in the bulk (paragraph (5))

Acquisition in respect of excess only in good faith (sentence 1). Paragraph (5) deals with a specific kind of “multiple transfer”. The transferor purports to transfer more than what – after deduction of the quantities already represented in undivided shares of other transferees – is still contained in the bulk. Parallel to the approach adopted in the general rule of VIII.–2:301 (Multiple transfers), the later transferee, to the extent that the transfer would exceed the total quantity available to transferees, can only acquire when being in good faith. The standard of good faith (“neither knew nor could reasonably be expected to know”) corresponds to the general good faith acquisition rule in VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership). In this paragraph, good faith must relate to the non-existence of the excess disposition. The formula "shall be reflected in the transferee's undivided share" takes care of the possibility that a transferee may partly acquire under general rules (to the extent there is no excess) and partly depends on the good faith requirement.

> Illustration 7
> A bulk contains 10.000 items, of which 9.000 have already been "transferred" to other transferees who now own respective undivided shares in the bulk. Now, B buys another 2.000 items from that bulk and agrees on an immediate transfer, not knowing that half of that would constitute an excess. Rather, the seller confirms, plausibly, that there is no problem with other buyers. With respect to the 1.000 actually contained in the bulk, B acquires a share under the general rule of paragraph (3). With regard to the other 1.000 exceeding the total quantity, B's acquisition depends on whether B is in good faith or not. There being no general duty to investigate, B will be regarded as being in good faith So B will acquire a share also with respect to this quantity.
>
> The calculation of this share (and the re-calculation of the shares of all other co-owners) is regulated by sentence 2 of paragraph (5). See below.

Parallel to the general good faith acquisition principles established in VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership) paragraph (1)(c), this paragraph requires that the good faith acquisition with respect to the excess must be for value. It is, of course, also required that the goods exist, that the goods are transferable and that there is a valid entitlement to the transfer of ownership on which the agreement as to the passing of ownership is based or to which it is referable; cf. VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraphs (1)(a), (b) and (d) and paragraph (2). However, it does not appear to be necessary to state this in the black letter rule; it should already follow from the fact that this Article is part of Chapter 2.

Calculation of shares (sentence 2). Sentence 2 of paragraph (5) regulates the calculation of the undivided shares of all co-owners, including the "new" co-owner who just acquired under the good faith acquisition rule established by sentence 1. The method of calculation conforms to the one employed by paragraph (4) after the transferor's share has been "eaten up". The shares of all co-owners are reduced proportionally.

> Illustration 8
> Facts as in illustration 7; the previous transferees are X and Y, who bought 4.000 and 5.000 items, respectively. Now, B buys another 2.000 in good faith. The total bulk contains 10.000.
>
> X, Y and B will own shares of 4/11, 5/11 and 2/11, respectively. This corresponds to 3.636,36 pieces for X, 4.545,45 pieces for Y and 1.818,18 pieces for B.

Underlying policy; subsequent increase of bulk. This approach implies a choice against a strict "first come, first served" principle on the level of the interim stage of acquiring undivided shares. It has been preferred to apply good faith acquisition principles also in this situation, on the one hand because this is consistent with VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership) and VIII.–2:301 (Multiple transfers), on the other hand also because the outcome is less arbitrary as to the transferees' priority in time. On the other hand, there appears to be no reason for permanently excluding a subsequent transferee, who was not in good faith as to the non-existence of an excess, from acquiring an undivided share. Once sufficient quantities are added to the bulk and, therefore, the reason for limiting the acquisition of undivided shares to good faith acquirers ceases to apply, a transferee who originally acted in bad faith may well acquire a protected status. Technically, this may be achieved by applying the restrictive rule of paragraph (5) only as long as the underlying policy so requires. Thereafter, acquisition may take place pursuant to the general rules of paragraphs (2) and (3).

VIII.–2:306: Delivery out of the bulk

(1) Each transferee can take delivery of a quantity corresponding to the transferee's undivided share and acquires ownership of that quantity by taking delivery.

(2) Where the delivered quantity exceeds the quantity corresponding to the transferee's undivided share, the transferee acquires ownership of the excess quantity only if the transferee, acquiring for value, neither knew nor could reasonably be expected to know of possible negative consequences of this excess for the other transferees.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the rule. This Article builds upon the previous VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) and presupposes that a transferee has acquired an undivided share in a bulk of goods. It deals with the second step of a transaction involving goods in a bulk, namely the transformation of the co-ownership shares of the individual transferees into sole ownership of specific goods which are finally delivered to each transferee.

Basic policy choice: no far-reaching "first come, first served" principle, but adjusted good faith acquisition principles. This Article implies a policy choice deviating from the example of United Kingdom law, which incorporates a far-reaching "first come, first served" principle at the stage of taking delivery. The effect, under United Kingdom law, is that it is immaterial whether a transferee who takes delivery of a quantity to which that transferee is entitled under the contract knows or can reasonably be expected to know that there has been a shortfall (so that this transferee's undivided share actually corresponds to a smaller quantity than the contractual quantity) and the transferor may be unable to fulfil the transferor's contractual obligations towards all transferees. This principle, in United Kingdom law, has been adopted for practical reasons, in order to avoid uncertainties and disputes. As a consequence, also claims for compensation between the transferees are excluded. This approach has not been taken over into the present Article, which follows the good faith pattern (cf. also VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) Comment F. However, the practical concerns underlying the United Kingdom rule are taken seriously. The interests at stake are balanced by an appropriate adjustment of the good faith acquisition rule in paragraph (2). See Comment C below.

B. Right to take delivery and acquisition of ownership (paragraph (1))

Transferee's right to take delivery. Paragraph (1) of this Article explicitly states that each transferee has a right to take delivery of a quantity corresponding to that transferee's undivided share (as determined by VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk)). Such a right to take delivery is not self-evident in relation to other co-owners, because all co-owners have property rights in all goods and, in principle, each act of separation could constitute an infringement of these other co-owners' property rights. Paragraph (1), therefore, has the function of avoiding the result that taking delivery would constitute such an infringement. The same technique is applied in VIII.–5:202 (Commingling). Additionally, the rule implies a very moderate aspect of the "first come, first served" idea, namely that the transferee may take and acquire items of better than average quality without triggering any rights of the others.

In a standard situation, the quantity corresponding to the share will match the quantity to which the transferee is entitled as against the transferor under the contract (or other juridical act, court order or rule of law, cf. VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(d)). The quantity corresponding to the transferee's share may, however, be lower than the quantity due under the contract in case there have been a diminution of the bulk or excessive dispositions by the transferor (cf. VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) Comments E and F. Then, the transferee may have a right to delivery of the full quantity under the contract (or other obligatory ground) as against the transferor, but for the purposes of this Article, the right to take delivery without infringing the other co-owners' property rights will, however, only exist to the extent corresponding to the transferee's undivided share in the bulk.

Acquisition of ownership. By taking delivery of a quantity corresponding to the transferee's undivided share, the transferee acquires ownership of the goods delivered. At this time, the prior co-ownership right in a bulk of goods is transformed into sole ownership in specific items. As in VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) paragraph (2), this rule provides for a special and simplified form of division of co-ownership: it does not require any consent of the other co-owners nor is it necessary to commence any judicial proceedings. The interim stage created by VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) ends upon taking delivery. It is not necessary to let the transferee become sole owner already in case identification in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (3) is made prior to delivery because the co-ownership right already provides the transferee with the same quality of protection as if the transferee were sole owner of specific goods already. The parties may, however, agree otherwise.

C. Delivery in excess of quantity corresponding to undivided share (paragraph (2))

Acquisition in respect of excess only in good faith. The transformation of the transferee's co-ownership right into sole ownership cannot take place to the extent that the transferee takes delivery of a bigger quantity than the quantity corresponding to the transferee's undivided share. Such an excess situation may occur where there has been a shrinkage situation or in case of excessive dispositions by the transferor (see the references in Comment B above). Under paragraph (2), acquisition of sole ownership with regard to the exceeding quantity is, however, possible where the transferee takes delivery for value and in good faith. The principle is similar to the one employed in VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) paragraph (5), but differs – with practically important consequences – regarding the reference point of goods faith (see Comment C below). It is, however, not superfluous to include a second good faith acquisition rule also at this later stage of taking delivery because, e.g., the shrinkage or multiple disposition situation may have occurred only after the respective transferee has acquired an undivided share; or, where the multiple disposition has occurred before, the transferee may have been in good faith first (thus acquiring some share, but smaller than the quantity bought) but may be in bad faith at the time of delivery.

Technically, where a transferee takes delivery in excess of the quantity corresponding to the transferee's undivided share when in bad faith, all transferees holding undivided shares (including the one taking delivery) will continue to be co-owners of the whole quantity possessed by that transferee. The transferee may, however, separate a quantity corresponding to the share and thereby become sole owner of that part (paragraph (1)) while the others remain co-owners of the rest.

Good faith with respect to possible negative consequences of excess for other transferees. The good faith acquisition rule in paragraph (2) is specifically adjusted in order to meet concerns of practicability (cf. Comment A above). The reference point of good faith is not the existence of the excess. It must be considered that the transferee acquires from a person who, originally, certainly was the owner of the goods (or had authority to dispose of them); the risk faced by the transferees is that the transferor disposed excessively, or a shortfall has occurred, so that the transferor is unable, at that point in time, to fulfil all contractual obligations. It also has to be taken into account that the bulk rules will usually be applied in situations where a lot of customers enter into comparable transactions with the transferor, and it may be virtually impossible for a transferee to supervise the transferor's business relations, and to supervise the total quantity of goods in a bulk where, as in a commodity trade, goods may be constantly added, and taken away, from the bulk. It may, therefore, happen that a transferee well knows that there has been an event of shrinkage, and may even know that at the very moment, the transferor would be unable to fulfil all obligations of delivery, but it is very likely that in the ordinary course of events, since the bulk is scheduled to be filled up again soon, the transferor will be able to fulfil all obligations towards other transferees when they become due. The policy underlying paragraph (2) is that such buyers should make a valid acquisition, in order not to undermine the functioning of such specific markets. Therefore, good faith, under this paragraph, must relate to (the non-existence of) "possible negative consequences of this excess for the other transferees". Accordingly, the transferee will be in bad faith where the transferee could reasonably be expected to know that the transferor will not succeed in filling up the bulk again in time so that other transferee will not receive their quantity. This may, in particular, be the case where the transferee has reason to assume that the transferor is going to be insolvent, so that suppliers are likely to stop delivering further goods to the transferor.

Parallel to what has been discussed in VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) Comment F, the bad faith handicap should cease to be effective when, at a later point in time, the total quantity of goods in the bulk increases so much that all other transferees, who could suffer from the preferential delivery to the respective transferee, receive what they are entitled to.

How this is supposed to work in practice and why the good faith approach makes sense. The – modified – good faith approach adopted in this Article might be criticised for being too impractical for everyday business activities, since it is unlikely that later delivery takers would like to test issues of good faith or bad faith of previous transferees, for which reason a strict "first come, first served" policy might be argued to be more pragmatic. However, the point seems to be that the difference between the "first come, first served" principle and the good faith approach adopted here will not become relevant in many cases. As long as there is no insolvency of the transferor, the other transferees will simply enforce their contractual rights to delivery. And where no other items can be taken from this very bulk, the buyer will have a claim for damages (non-fault based) and reparation could be made "in kind" by delivering an equivalent item from some other source (if available). That will normally be simpler for the later delivery takers than testing the good or bad faith of previous delivery takers and finding out about any excess taken by the previous transferees, with all the risks of litigation emerging from this. But when the transferor becomes insolvent, clarifying the business activities may make sense and here, the "solidarity principle" implied in the good faith approach may clearly gain importance in terms of striving for an adequate and well-balanced solution. It will be closer to the equal treatment idea than a strict "first come, first served" principle.

Consequences regarding non-contractual liability for damage and unjustified enrichment law. As indicated in Comment A above, the adoption of the "first come, first served" principle in United Kingdom law was also intended to preclude the other transferees from claiming compensation from a transferee who took delivery of a quantity due under the contract, but exceeding that transferee's undivided share. This approach is not followed here. Liability will only be excluded where the respective transferee acted in good faith in the sense of paragraph (2) and hence did not act unlawfully. In other situations, where the transferee taking delivery acted intentionally or negligently with regard to the possible negative consequences for the other transferees, the "excess taking" transferee may be held liable under Book VI, the infringement of the other transferees' undivided shares constituting a legally relevant damage in the sense of VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession). Similarly, the other transferees will be entitled to proceed against the "excess taking" transferee under unjustified enrichment principles of Book VII. Here also, the good faith acquisition rule provided for by this Article is intended to draw the line of demarcation. Where the prerequisites of this rule are fulfilled, the transferee acquires validly and this enrichment is not "unjustified" due to an entitlement by virtue of a rule of law in the sense of VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraphs (1)(a) and (3). Otherwise, the other transferees may resort to unjustified enrichment law, in particular for the purpose of tracing the value of the quantities formerly corresponding to their undivided shares where the "excess taking" transferee in bad faith has meanwhile disposed of the goods in such a way that the "true co-owners" cannot reach them any longer.

VIII.–2:307: Contingent right of transferee under retention of ownership

Where the transferor retains ownership of the goods for the purposes of a "retention of ownership device" in the sense of IX.–1:103 (Retention of ownership devices: scope), the transferee's right to pay the price under the terms of the contract and the transferee's right to acquire ownership upon payment have effect against the transferor's creditors.

COMMENTS

A. General

Function of the rule. This Article addresses two aspects concerning the position of a transferee acquiring goods subject to a retention of ownership device in the sense of IX.–1:103 (Retention of ownership device: scope) which are not fully settled in some European legal systems. Depending on the background, they may, therefore, be regarded as serving a rather clarifying function, or as strengthening the legal position of such acquirer. In short, the aim is to provide such an acquirer a safe position if he continues paying the price complying with the terms of the contract. The reason is that the acquirer agreed not to acquire ownership immediately, but to provide the transferee a kind of security for his claim for payment (the retention of ownership device), but this should not put the transferee's own acquisition on risk provided that he fulfils his contractual obligations properly. In other words, the fact that the transferor formally remains to be the "owner" of the goods should not have the consequence that the transferee loses the goods to the transferor's creditors as long as he continues paying off the price under the contractual terms. With regard to the content as well as regarding the phrasing, this Article may be seen as a "functional approach" exception to the "unitary-oriented" approach adopted in this Chapter in general.

This Article is supplemented by VIII.–1:204 (Limited proprietary rights) subparagraph (c) which states that rights to acquire in the sense of the present Article are characterised as limited proprietary rights.

Scope: retention of ownership devices. This Article applies to all situations where ownership is retained by the owner of supplied assets in order to secure a right to performance of an obligation; cf. the definition provided by IX.–1:103 (Retention of ownership devices: scope) paragraph (1). Paragraph (2) of that Article provides a list of examples, e.g. retention of ownership by a seller under a contract for sale, or ownership of the supplier under a contract of hire-purchase, or ownership of the leased assets under a contract of leasing, provided that according to the terms of the contract, the lessee at the end of the lease period has an option to acquire ownership of, or a right to continue to use, the leased asset without payment or for merely nominal payment (financial leasing). This understanding is also relevant for the scope of the present Article, as long as, in the end, the transferee acquires ownership (or has an option to acquire ownership). The granting of a mere right to use is outside the scope of this Book. One may, however, contemplate applying the present Article by way of analogy in such cases.

Place of the provision. The present Article addressing the "acquisition side" (transferee's perspective) of a retention of ownership device in contrast to its security function (transferor's perspective), it is placed in Book VIII and not in Book IX. Within Book VIII, the issue fits to the "special constellations" addressed in Section 3 of Chapter 2.

B. The rule in detail

Transferee's right to pay the price under the terms of the contract. This Article provides two particular rights a transferee subject to a retention of ownership device has as against the transferor's creditors and the transferor's insolvency administrator representing these creditors. First, the transferee must have a right to stick to the contract by paying off the transferor under the terms established in their contract. Spelling out this effect is considered important in particular with regard to the transferor's insolvency administrator, who, under virtually all European insolvency law systems, has a right to choose whether to terminate or to stick to a contract which has not been fully performed by both of the parties (or similar requirements). Such requirements would formally be fulfilled in the situation of a sale subject to a retention of ownership, or equivalent device covered by IX.–1:103 (Retention of ownership devices: scope): the transferee has not paid the full price, the transferor has not transferred full ownership. The intended effect of the present rule is that the transferee's right to acquire ownership of the goods by continuing payment under the contractual terms has priority over the insolvency administrator's right to terminate the contractual relationship. The position of the transferor's general creditors is not considerably weakened. The value of the goods will part from the transferor's estate only if the full price is paid in return. The transferee shall be able to keep the goods since entering the agreement on a retention of ownership device is motivated by enabling the transferor to receive a security (whereas the transferee would have had nothing against acquiring ownership immediately upon delivery), so that it appears well justified to treat such a transferee more preferably than a person who took a risk by performing in advance. As mentioned above, the present issue is not fully settled in some European legal systems, for which reason this rule is regarded as a practically important clarification, worth being spelled out in European model rules.

Transferee's right to acquire ownership upon payment. The second aspect catered for by this Article is that the transferee's right to acquire ownership after having paid what has been agreed to pay under the contract has effect against the seller's creditors. Accordingly, the transferor's creditors cannot seize the goods despite the transferor formally still retains the right of ownership, neither in the case that the transferor becomes insolvent nor by individual seizure by a single creditor outside insolvency. Or, more accurately, one should say that the transferee's right to acquire takes priority over any rights created by an act of seizure by the transferor's creditors. If the transferee pays what he has to pay, he will acquire unencumbered ownership. If he fails to pay, the goods will fall within the transferor's estate and can be attached by his general creditors, or an individual creditor's right to the realisation of the asset, created by an act of seizure, can be exercised. The principle spelled out in this Article also comprises the transferee's right to possess and use the goods as well as the transferee's right to alienate his contingent right in the goods. This also follows from including the transferee's contingent right into the definition of limited proprietary rights in VIII.–1:204 (Limited proprietary rights) subparagraph (c).

CHAPTER 3: GOOD FAITH ACQUISITION OF OWNERSHIP

VIII.–3:101: Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership

(1) Where the person purporting to transfer the ownership (the transferor) has no right or authority to transfer ownership of the goods, the transferee nevertheless acquires and the former owner loses ownership provided that:

(a) the requirements set out in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraphs (1)(a), (1)(b), (1)(d), (2) and (3) are fulfilled;
(b) the requirement of delivery or an equivalent to delivery as set out in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e) is fulfilled;
(c) the transferee acquires the goods for value; and
(d) the transferee neither knew nor could reasonably be expected to know that the transferor had no right or authority to transfer ownership of the goods at the time ownership would pass under VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general). The facts from which it follows that the transferee could not reasonably be expected to know of the transferor's lack of right or authority have to be proved by the transferee.

(2) Good faith acquisition in the sense of paragraph (1) does not take place with regard to stolen goods, unless the transferee acquired the goods from a transferor acting in the ordinary course of business. Good faith acquisition of stolen cultural objects in the sense of VIII.–4:102 (Cultural objects) is impossible.

(3) Where the transferee is already in possession of the goods, good faith acquisition will take place only if the transferee obtained possession from the transferor.

COMMENTS

A. General remarks

Purpose and effect of the rule. VIII.–3:101 deals with situations where ownership is "transferred" by a person who is not entitled to do so in the sense of VIII.–2:101 and VIII.–2:102 (i.e. by a person without a right or authority to transfer ownership). Although there will be no transfer of ownership in a strict sense in such situations (see the principle "nemo dat quod non habet" or "nemo plus iuris transferre potest quam ipse habet" which underlies Chapter 2), the transferee may acquire ownership under certain requirements, provided he is in good faith. At the same time, the right of the previous ("real") owner is extinguished.

Persons involved and terminology. In the following, the relevant persons will be referred to as A (the [previous] owner), B (the person transferring ownership without a right or authority) and C (the transferee who acquires ownership in good faith). In one respect, this may be a simplification: In addition to B, there may be several people "transferring" the asset, from one to the other, without right or authority (B1 sells to B2, B2 sells to B3), who do not meet the requirements of good faith acquisition before C does so.

As to the parties of the transaction B–C, the draft uses the same terminology as the general provisions on derivative transfers in Chapter 2. The good faith acquirer C is, therefore, called the "transferee" and the seller B is called the "transferor". It is obvious that this wording has to be understood in a rather broad sense here, as in case of good faith acquisition, ownership is not "transferred" by B, since he is not entitled at all. The function of the rule rather is that A's ownership is extinguished and "new" ownership (of C) is created by operation of law. This can be described as an "original" acquisition (as opposed to "derivative" acquisition).

The terminology is nevertheless used, in the first place for reasons of simplicity and rea dability, and in the second place for reasons of structural and terminological coherence, as the rule requires that, except the seller's lack of right or authority, all other transfer requirements set out in Chapter 2 have to be met. These rules, which are referred to in VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1) (a), use the terms "transferor" and "transferee".

Two types of situations covered. The rule therefore may apply to the following situations: (a) On the one hand, there are situations where A lost his asset or it was stolen from him or A entrusted the asset to B based on a contract (deposition, renting, pledge etc), and B (or B2, who "acquired" from B) transfers the goods to C. (b) On the other hand, there are situations where there has been a contract between A and B, which could, in principle, operate as a basis for a transfer of ownership, but did not for some reason, as may be: the contract A – B was invalid from the beginning or has been avoided with retroactive effect (VIII. –2:202 paragraphs [1] and [2]), with the avoidance taking place either before the transfer to C or after such transfer; or the contract A–B has been for a specific asset, but the wrong asset has been delivered to B, who transfers it to C.

This rule does not cover situations where an entitled person transfers the same asset to different transferees; this issue is regulated by VIII.–2:301 (Multiple transfers).

Where the movable is encumbered with limited proprietary rights of a third person and the transferor has no right or authority to dispose of the asset free of that person's right, the question whether the third party's right is extinguished and the transferee acquires ownership free of encumbrances is governed by VIII.–3:102.

Relationship to international conventions and EC law. As a general rule, the provisions of the international instrument will prevail over the provisions of the present book. This rule also applies to the relationship between VIII.–3:102 and Article 29 (3) and (4) of the Cape Town Convention on International Interests in Mobile Equipment, where the position of the buyer (conditional buyer, lessee) of an asset encumbered with an international interest is regulated without according any relevance to the good faith criterion (the decisive requirement being prior registration).

As to the relation to EC instruments, Council Directive 93/7/EEC on the return of cultural objects unlawfully removed from the territory of a Member State has to be taken into account. This directive, however, does not contain rules on property law. According to article 12 of that directive, "ownership of the cultural object after return shall be governed by that law of the requesting Member State". – Therefore, the provisions of this Chapter will be applicable.

B. General policy of good faith acquisition

Balancing the interests of A and C – individual level. The effect of good faith acquisition is that the good faith acquirer C, who thinks that he has fulfilled all requirements for a transfer of ownership, is protected by acquiring ownership and the real owner A is expropriated.

Therefore, the provisions on good faith acquisition need to balance the interests of the concrete parties A and C (individual level). The decision has two consequences: Primarily, it regulates whether and under which prerequisites A can claim the recovery of his asset from C. A second consequence is that the unsuccessful acquirer C who is not entitled to keep the asset may, in principle, enforce claims against B. In the opposite case, where A can no longer claim recovery of the goods because C successfully acquired in good faith, A will try to get reimbursed by B. Thus, C or A bears the risk of B's solvency. To find out who and where B is, may be difficult in certain cases (risk of identity and insolvency of B).

Policy issues on a general level. At the same time, a balancing of interests is also necessary on a more general level. The existence of good faith acquisition rules places a certain risk on all owners of movable assets (all As), and protects the interests of all market participants intending to acquire movable assets (all potential Cs and further acquirers from Cs). Or, as it is often formulated, it serves the protection of commerce as such. On such a general level one can also say that there is a general interest in the negotiability of goods.

Doctrinal explanations of good faith acquisition. The discussion on the doctrinal justification of good faith acquisition in the single national legal systems can be described as an almost endless one. This paper can only reflect some basic ideas: One of the classical ways of justifying good faith acquisition is to stress the legitimising function of possession, assuming that the acquirer can conclude from the seller's possession that the seller has a right of ownership ("publicity approach" in the classical sense). Such an automatic conclusion may, however, be unrealistic nowadays. Thus, sometimes the focus is laid on the acquirer's (C's) taking possession or the transferor's (B's) factual power to transfer possession to C. In other legal systems, which require that the original owner A has entrusted the asset to B, it is often stressed that A should bear the risk of that person's misbehaviour, as it was A who chose that person. Similar tendencies can be observed where the effect of good faith acquisition is based on the idea of estoppel, meaning that an owner A who transferred possession to B and sets additional indicia of B's ownership is prevented from recovery where the acquirer C can conclude from A's acts that B was owner or at least had authority to dispose. It is argued quite often that there is a practical or economic need of protecting commerce, as it would be too burdensome, costly and insecure if each acquirer was forced to undertake detailed investigations as to the asset's origin. Not having a good faith acquisition rule would create considerable legal uncertainty, even in numerous cases where the transferor was, in fact, entitled to transfer ownership. Thus, good faith acquisition would also serve the aim of promoting legal certainty. The arguments put forward in favour of the owner's protection and against good faith acquisition center on the important function of the legal concept of ownership in our legal, economic and social systems. Private Ownership is protected on the level of constitutional law, it is the basis of our economic system, it contributes to the efficiency of our markets. In the light of the importance of the concept of ownership, a loss of ownership or, more precisely, – as in the case of good faith acquisition – an expropriation of owner A in favour of C needs a solid justification.

Political decision in favour of good faith acquisition. It is hard or almost impossible to find one common or dominating doctrinal approach explaining why and to what extent a good faith acquirer should prevail over the original owner, especially in the context of European harmonisation. The literature and legal sources in the Member States differ considerably on that issue. The main starting point of this Chapter is a policy decision assuming a certain need to protect and promote commerce by some form of goods faith acquisition of goods. This can additionally be legitimised by the idea of reduction of transaction costs, as it can be presumed that detailed investigations as to the relation A – B are rather costly for C; but not only for the concrete acquirer C, but also for also for all further acquirer's from C and, as there often is more than one person that is interested in the asset, for all other potential acquirers. In relation to the considerable benefits achieved by a good faith acquisition rule on the markets and for good faith acquirers, it may seem justified to place the risk of B's insolvency and B's identity on A (and the owners in general). But it should be stressed again that the main basis of the present rule is a political decision.

C. Requirements for the transfer relationship B – C

(a) Transfer requirements of VIII.–2:101 and delivery to acquirer (VIII.–3:101(1)(a) and (b))

Requirements of VIII.–2:101. VIII.–3:101(1)(a) provides that the requirements set out in VIII.–2:101 paragraphs (1)(a), (1)(b), (1)(d), (2) and (3) have to be fulfilled by the transfer relationship that exists between B and C. As to paragraphs (1)(a) and (1)(b), it is evident that also for the purposes of an acquisition of ownership under Chapter 3 the goods to be acquired must exist and be transferable. Paragraphs (1)(d) and (2) refer to the "title" which operates as the basis of the intended transfer between B and C: C must have a right against B to receive transfer of the goods stemming from a contract, an other juridical act, a court order or a rule of law. This "title" or "obligatory basis" of the transfer of ownership of the goods must refer exactly to the goods that are transferred (for instance delivered) to C. It must operate as the basis of the transfer (see paragraph (2)). Where the contract of sale between B and C (= obligatory basis of transfer) is inexistent, invalid or avoided for some reason, no good faith acquisition can occur. Special restrictions as to the transfer apply in the case of fungible (= generic) goods according to VIII.–2:101(3): The earliest point in time ownership can pass is the identification of the goods to the contract (or other obligatory basis). Only in the case of bulk sales (see VIII.–2:305) a pre-stage of full ownership can be created before identification.

Avoidance of contract B–C. If the contract between B and C is avoided with retro-active effect (as for instance in cases of mistake or fraud) after all the requirements set out in VIII.–3:101 had been fulfilled, the ownership acquired by C in accordance with this Article is destroyed retro-actively as well. This follows from the general principle underlying VIII.–3:101 and VIII.–3:102: These provisions provide a substitute only for the missing right or authority of the transferee to transfer ownership or to transfer free of encumbrances. All the other requirements of a regular transfer of VIII.–2:101 have to be present.

Requirement of possession by B – requirement of possession by C. VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1) (b) fixes the requirement of delivery or a delivery equivalent to C, meaning that the possession of C must be instituted. What VIII.–3:101(1) does not require is the existence of possession by B. The decision for this differentiation was made in view of new forms of commerce, especially the practice of distance selling. In a distance selling context the possession of B is no longer visible to the good faith buyer. B's possession can therefore no longer exercise its legitimizing function for C. It can no longer cause C's justified belief that possessor B is also the owner or authorized seller of the goods. In distance selling relationships the function of B's actual possession is taken over by B's capacity to send the goods to C and to constitute C's possession. C is now justified in his belief that B as a person who can provide him with the possession of the goods has also the right or authority to dispose in that way over the goods.

Thus, VIII.–3:101(1) practically does not abolish the requirement of B's possession, which is found in many traditional civil law codifications of the Member States, but rather brings it into a more modern form. In the usual case, B's capacity to cause delivery of the goods to C is based on B's possession of the goods anyway. B himself or a person possessing the goods for him will deliver the goods to C. This requirement of prior possession by B is also indirectly embodied in VIII.–3:101(1)(b) by reference to the delivery and delivery equivalents of Chapter 2. VIII.–2:104 and 2:105 always require a relationship between the transfer of possession to the transferee and transferor. For the special case of VIII.–2:105(1) the requirement of obtention of possession from the transferor is added by VIII.–3:101(3) (see Comments below).

Mere agreement does not suffice. VIII.–3:101(1)(b) also provides that not all forms of transfers that are considered valid and effective under the circumstances of VIII.–2:101 et sequ. also qualify for a good faith acquisition by the transferee under VIII.–3:101. VIII.–2:101 paragraph (1) (e) mentions three types of requirements: actual delivery, delivery equivalents and an agreement as to the time ownership is to pass. VIII.–3:101(1)(b) refers only to actual delivery (see VIII.–2:104) and to the delivery equivalents (see VIII.–2:105), but not to the agreement at to the time ownership is to pass. The restricted reference wants to exclude such mere agreements without any change of possession from VIII.–3:101. Thus, good faith acquisition under VIII.–3:101 requires some physical manifestation or change in addition to an obligatory basis for the transfer (see VIII.–3:101(1)(a)): the transfer of possession to C (VIII.–2:104), C's already existing possession (VIII.–2:105(1)), a notice to a third person holding the movables (VIII.–2:105(2)), delivery of means to obtain possession (VIII.–2:105 [3]) or delivery of a document of title (VIII.–2:105(4)). If B and C agree on an immediate transfer but leave the goods in B's possession, no good faith acquistion by C will occur.

Arguments for this solution. The requirement of B's possession or – in the modernized form – of C's possession of the goods wants to set a minimum level for the justification of C's belief that B is the rightful or authorized transferor of the movable and, at the same time, as an objective restriction to C's possibility to acquire protects owner A. Where B is not able to provide C with the possession of the goods, no C – no matter how strongly he might have believed in B's right or authority to transfer – will be protected in his good faith, in his belief. This solution seems justified not only because it is in line with the law of most European countries, but rather because in cases where B stays in possession of the goods after their transfer to C – (i) C must normally be suspicious and – (ii) A has no possibility to prevent the transfer of his goods to C because the goods are never moved away from B. A transferor (B) who is not willing to give the movable out of his hands may want to avoid delivery in order to hide the fact from owner A that he illegally disposed of A's goods. This strategy of hiding illegal behaviour of owner A should not be supported by law.

(b) Transfer for value (VIII.–3:101(1)(c))

For value – paragraph (1) (c): balancing of party interests. The consequence of good faith acquisition for A – namely expropriation – is so severe that only good faith acquirers who would equally suffer a significant disadvantage by not allowing good faith acquisition deserve protection. This is not the case where good faith acquirers have not given any value or are not under an obligation to give value for the goods: this is the case where C received the goods as a gift (donation). In balancing the interests of A and donee C, the interests of A would clearly prevail. This assessment is not considerably changed even in cases where C has made expenses on the asset or further investments as a consequence of his "acquisition": C, being obliged to surrender the movable to A, will have a claim against A for recovery of necessary expenses for keeping and preserving the movable, and he may withhold the movable until this compensation is paid.

Additional reasons for adopting the "for value" restriction. A rule excluding good faith acquisition for gratuitous transfers does not interfere with the general aim to protect commerce: First of all, gratuitous transfers are not very common in business life. Second, parties will have no difficulties to understand and to accept that they may not expect special protection when acquiring gratuitously (even if the "for value" requirement may cause difficulties with mixed donations, it will at least be clear to each party that such a mixed donation is at stake and that special protection maybe should not be expected). Protecting A can also be seen as the majority approach in the European legal systems. A person acquiring gratuitously may acquire ownership after a certain time by continuous possession (see rules of Chapter 4). C, therefore, is not totally unprotected (but the owner's interests prevail at least for some time).

Mixed donations. Donations involving only the payment of a "symbolic" or otherwise proportionally low price are clearly excluded from good faith acquisition. This follows from the policy reasons explained above. "Mixed donations" do not occur frequently in business practice. The main field of application of such mixed donations seems to be the family circle. The legal systems are generally sceptical of transfers among family members and subject their validity and effect to additional requirements. Where such a transaction between two family members is nevertheless effective it seems to be fair to protect A's interests as long as the value owed by C is lower than 50% of the value of the goods. A rule according to which in cases of doubt with respect to the evidence or the interpretation of the contract A's interests will prevail, may apply as well. In business circumstances a mixed donation may be qualified as donation and not as sale in accordance with the DCFR rules on donations and sales, when the main economic purpose or effect of the transaction is that of gratuitous transfer rather than transfer for value.

Alternative solutions. Where good faith acquisition is not limited to transfers for value, as in this rule, a special regime to protect A's interests in donation cases more than in transfer of value cases would have to be set up. As the following deliberations show, the setting up of such a supplementary protection scheme in favour of A would have been quite a complicated endeavour and was, therefore, rejected by the drafters.

a) A could be granted a right to buy back the goods from C for the price C had to pay to B – even if it was zero. Thus, in donation cases, A could claim recovery of "his" asset for nothing (except compensation for expenses). This would, of course, solve the "for value" problem in an elegant way, the requirement would be superfluous. However, the right to buy back causes problems on other levels, and was therefore not adopted by Chapter 3 (see point F below). In addition, such a solution might cause difficulties in C's insolvency, as the relevant (national) insolvency law might prohibit or prevent the creation or imposition of obligations to C's estate without the receipt of any counter-performance. There are no good reasons why C's estate (not having paid anything for the asset) should be entitled to keep the movable while A is (finally) expropriated.

b) Under German law, the former owner has the right to claim back the asset based on unjustified enrichment (§ 816 (1) S 2 BGB). Such a rule should not be adopted either. It has a rather singular status in Europe and is even questioned by a number of German scholars. It would also be doubtful whether such a rule would fit to the general concept of unjustified enrichment within the ECC. Last but not least, the rule would place the risk of C's insolvency on A, which is not considered to be an adequate result.

Duty to pay or actual payment. To meet the "for value" requirement, it is sufficient that the acquirer is obliged to pay a price; it is not necessary that he already paid. This seems to be the majority approach in the European legal systems. In a system where only actual payment counts, cases of partial payment by C create considerable complications that can be avoided by the rule adopted here.

(c) Requirement of good faith (VIII.–3:101(1)(d))

Object of good faith. In a comparative law perspective, there are different solutions as to what C exactly has to believe in: Must C think that B is the owner of the goods, or may he also think that B is not the owner himself, but that B is a person to whom the owner has granted authority to dispose (for instance, that B is a commissioner for the owner)?

VIII.–3:101(1)(d) provides that it shall suffice that B relies, in good faith, on one of these alternatives. VIII.–2:101 and VIII.–2:102 provide that ownership can be (derivatively) transferred by any person having a "right or authority to transfer ownership"; this applies to the owner as well as to other people (for details, see Comments to VIII.–2:102). As good faith acquisition seeks to protect an acquirer who in good faith assumes that he has fulfilled all requirements set out in Chapter 2, it seems clear that good faith in the transferor's authority to dispose must suffice. Technically, this requirement is laid down by repeating the words "right or authority" in VIII.–3:101(1)(d).

Point in time when C has to be in good faith. VIII.–3:101(1)(d) provides that C has to be in good faith "at the time ownership would pass under VIII.–2:201", that is to say when all requirements set out in Chapter 2 are fulfilled. In the regular case, that will be the time of delivery (or an equivalent to delivery etc). This is also the approach taken in the majority of the Member States. It is justified by the general aim to protect an acquirer who in good faith assumes that he has fulfilled all requirements set out in Chapter 2. Such an acquirer will assume to acquire ownership at the time provided in VIII.–2:201.

This approach has two consequences: It is not necessarily required that C believes that B is owner (or has authority to dispose) at the time the contract B – C is concluded. C may be in good faith also in situations where it is clear, at the time of the contract, that first B has to buy the object himself. In other situations, where B is in possession of the goods right from the beginning, C has reasons to doubt B's right or authority and there are no additional circumstances occurring before ownership should pass, C will continue to be in bad faith up to the time decisive under Article 2:201 and therefore will not acquire ownership.

The second consequence is that if C gets information destroying his good faith after the time decisive under VIII.–2:201 (usually: delivery), ownership has already passed to C and such a later falling away of good faith has no consequence at all. This may seem to be a harsh consequence where good faith breaks away only a very short time after the time decisive under VIII.–2:201. Yet, requiring good faith during the whole time C possesses the object after delivery would, in result, mean to abolish good faith acquisition and to establish a special type of acquisition by continuous possession instead. Other rules restricting the time good faith has to be present after the time following from VIII.–2:201 would seem to lack substantive justification. But first and foremost, such uncertainty would run against the goal of protecting commerce.

Standard of good faith. The national legal systems differ in that issue: In some systems good faith is excluded by definition of law or court practice only when C acts grossly negligent; other systems exclude good faith also in case of slight negligence.

The weighing of interests between A, who is expropriated, and C, who profits from good faith acquisition, suggests that the standard of good faith should be a rather strict one. C should only be protected if he has not been negligent in any way; even slight negligence should exclude good faith. The acquirer will, therefore, be in bad faith if there are, objectively, substantial reasons to doubt B's right or authority to dispose. The lack of B's right or authority does not have to be almost self-evident. It is enough that C has reasons to be suspicious. VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1) realizes this idea by employing the usual words "could reasonably be expected to know" in point (d) and by stating in the comments here that these words should be given a wide interpretation in the sense that they achieve a rather strict standard of good faith. Where C has actual knowledge of B's lacking right or authority, it is clear that he cannot be regarded to be in good faith, even if the individual circumstances of the case would, under an objective standard, not suffice for C to be "reasonably expected to know".

Flexibility of general standard of good faith. The rule is still somewhat flexible. There will be a number of cases where C should be suspicious only when special circumstances are obvious to him (such as: very low price; suspicious conduct of B; certain category of goods in special circumstances, like mobile phones sold on certain second hand markets); otherwise, he can be in "passive" good faith, without being expected to undertake further investigations. There will be other situations, where C should not be regarded to be in good faith unless he collected specific information (so that, if such information is not provided by B or other sources, he may be expected to undertake certain investigations himself). Courts in several Member States decided that C – when he buys new products of a certain kind from B – should expect (at least where C is a professional party) that B himself has bought them under a reservation of title clause, because this is the usual practice on this particular market. C would be obliged to ask for evidence that B has paid (or there has not been a retention of title clause in the previous sales contract). It would not be wise to draft individual rules on such duties of investigation, neither as to certain categories of goods, nor as to the intensity of investigations. The interpretation of the general clause should rather be made dependent on the circumstances of the particular case thus providing more flexibility than detailed rules. Thus, the fine tuning and final adaptation of the standard is left to the courts. The judge may, within his assessment, decide that under the given circumstances C should have made certain investigations. As a second step, the judge has to examine whether these investigations were carried out. If it is shown that C did not undertake these measures, he will be in bad faith. If it is shown that he made sufficient investigations, the judge will look at their results and then decide whether C is to be regarded in good faith or not.

Good faith standard and protection of commerce. This – rather strict – standard of good faith is not regarded inadequate to the detriment of C or of commerce in general. Where investigations are required, there can only be an obligation to undertake reasonable measures, taking into account the costs and realistic opportunities to receive information. Court practice will be able to develop certain guidelines (as it did in the existing legal systems as well) and parties can gather information on main guidelines. Where C has voluntarily undertaken further investigations and now has reasons to be suspicious, he can, without facing any negative consequences, decide to abstain from buying. There is no reason to make good faith acquisition possible in such situations.

Good faith standard and overall approach of VIII.–3:101. The strict good faith requirement, furthermore, fits into the general concept of the present rule of good faith acquisition: Where the objectve restrictions of good faith acquisition set up by VIII.–3:101 (e.g. stolen goods can be acquired in ordinary course of business) end and open up a space for good faith acquisition by C, which at first sight seems to be wider than in a number of EU jurisdictions, the strict good faith requirement provides the necessary balance. It would lead to inappropriate results in a number of cases if good faith acquisition was available too easily in a number of situations (e.g. stolen goods). There also is no general restriction of good faith acquisition as to certain types of acquisitions (such as purchase from a professional salesman, on a public auction etc). This is no problem with a strict good faith requirement; otherwise, there could be a certain risk of inappropriate results.

General acceptability of strict good faith standard. Finally, the drafters of Book VIII assume that the rule proposed has good chances to be accepted by general public. It will generally be appreciated that owners (that is almost each individual) will not lose their right too easily, and in particular that a slightly negligent buyer will not prevail. But also commerce should accept that there is no good reason to protect negligent players (which might amount to a distortion of competition to the detriment of careful players). It may be noted that the most recent law reforms, that is the new codification in the Netherlands and the new Commercial Code in Austria, both opt for a strict standard of good faith (excluding slight negligence); the same is true for the 1986 Act on good faith acquisition in Sweden. As far as Austria is concerned, the (Austrian) working group did not hear of any protest from economic lobbies.

Proof of good faith with respect to negligence. A considerable number of jurisdictions provide a presumption of good faith. VIII.–3:101 provides that the burden of proof shall be on C and that there is no presumption of good faith in favour of C. There are arguments for this solution on different levels:

a) Balancing of interests: Starting from a balancing of the interests of A and C, taking into account that good faith acquisition of C means expropriation of A and an exceptional opportunity for C to acquire ownership (a non domino), there is a strong argument to place the burden of proof on C and not to favour him by a presumption of good faith. C wants to assert that he has acquired the goods and thus deprived A of his right of ownership (involuntarily). The general rule should be that C has to deliver evidence of all the prerequisites for his acquisition.

b) General principles of the law of evidence: The proposed rule coincides with basic ideas that can be found throughout the law of evidence: C is much closer to the act of acquisition, which took place between B and C, and it is, therefore, much easier for him to give evidence for the concrete circumstances. For A, on the other hand, it will often be difficult to investigate the relation B – C; sometimes this may almost be impossible for him. That supports a solution placing the burden of proof on C. Additionally, it regularly causes severe problems (or is even impossible) to prove a negative. If the burden of proof was on A, he would have to prove the absence of good faith on the side of C. This also speaks for placing the burden of proof on C.

There is a general principle that he who wants to benefit from a specific provision has to provide facts and evidence that support his case. Historically (and in some countries even nowadays as well), good faith acquisition is nothing but a defence against the "real" owner's claim for recovery of the goods (see VIII.–6:101). From this point of view, it seems quite natural that the transferee has to prove the requirements for his acquisition. In a material sense, this is true also for the present scope of good faith acquisition, since good faith acquisition, as stated above, is an exceptional opportunity "to acquire ownership from a non-owner".

c) Prevention of inappropriate expansion of good faith acquisition: Together with the strict standard of good faith, placing the burden of proof on C and not presuming good faith is a major tool of preventing an inappropriate expansion of good faith acquisition.

Proof of good faith with respect to actual knowledge. As to actual knowledge, the burden of proof can be on A. That rule applies to – rather exceptional – cases where C had, objectively, no reason to know but actually knew of B's lack of right or authority. Otherwise C would have to prove a negative. In this case, A can more easily prove the alleged circumstances from which follows that C must have known of B' lack of right or authority to transfer.

Rule on burden of proof in black letter text. Taking into account the strong tradition of a presumption of good faith in the majority of European systems, it seems advisable to – exceptionally – regulate rules on evidence and presumptions in the black letter text. Otherwise there could be the risk that courts which are familiar with a presumption of good faith today would continue to apply that rule.

D. Relationship A–B: how A loses possession (paragraph (2) stolen goods)

Different ways of A's loss of possession. As has been pointed out above, owner A may have lost possession of the goods in various ways. The question to be discussed here is whether good faith acquisition should be excluded or otherwise restricted (for instance, postponed for a certain period of time) in some of these situations. In a comparative perspective, one can say that the majority of the European legal systems provide a restriction in that respect in some way, mostly excluding good faith acquisition with regard to stolen goods, often with regard to lost goods as well. A couple of legal systems express this by requiring an act of "entrusting" the goods (A to B).

The range of possible constellations can be described as follows: The most radical way of losing possession is by virtue of a possession breaking crime, i.e. robbery or theft committed by B. There are other situations where A only loses his asset, without any interference by B, and B finds it. A further category are constellations where A entrusted the asset to B on a contractual basis, but with the purpose of re-taking possession of the asset at a later time, either granting a contractual right to use (lease, gratuitous lending), or based on a security agreement (pledge) or simply to store the asset (deposition). But B in breach of his contractual obligations transfers the goods to C (which will amount to a criminal offence as well). Furthermore, there are situations where there was a contract between A and B, which could, in principle, operate as a basis for a transfer of ownership, but did not because of a defect in the contract: Such a defect may be that the contract A – B is avoided with retroactive effect (either before transfer to C or after such a transfer) on account of mistake, fraud or threat, the contract is void because of illegality, usury, defect in representation or lack of capacity. Or the contract A – B has been for a specific asset, but the wrong asset has been delivered to B, who transfers it to C.

Exclusion of good faith acquisition of stolen goods. VIII.–3:101 paragraph (2) excludes good faith acquisition only with regard to goods that have been robbed or stolen from the owner A. As a consequence C could acquire such goods by continuous possession only (if not excluded there as well: see VIII.–4:101(3) and VIII.–4:102).

By protecting the owner in case of theft or robbery, the draft adopts the majority approach in Europe. A justification may be found in the fact that A has not contributed to the loss of possession in any way, at least in the typical case. Theft and robbery are severe offences against the owner and his right of ownership. The general expectations of citizens seem to be that law should take maximum efforts to ensure that such actions cause as few harm to the owner as possible. To a similar effect, it is sometimes argued that an acceptance of good faith acquisition in cases of theft and robbery would render criminal activities more attractive than the opposite rule.

Lost and entrusted goods. Lost goods, which are treated by some legal systems in the same way as stolen (robbed etc) goods, are not excluded from the general possibility of goods faith acquisition by paragraph (1). In cases of entrusted goods and lost goods, the owner A contributes to the loss of possession in some way by either choosing and trusting a person not worth being trusted in (in case of entrusted goods), or by acting negligently (in case of lost goods). Here, it may be justified to let protection of commerce prevail, and the good faith acquirer in particular, who has reason to believe that he has fulfilled all requirements for acquiring the asset. In case of entrusted goods, the risk placed on A will be limited to the risk of B's insolvency, as the identity of B (being A's contractual partner) normally will be clear to A.

Void or avoided contract. Where the transfer A – B is based on a void or avoided contract, VIII.–3:101 lets the protection of commerce prevail as well. Again, A knows B and only faces the risk of B's insolvency, a kind of risk that A, who intended to sell the asset to B, may have checked in his own interest before deciding to sell. In mistake cases, which are presumed to be the main cases here, some kind of negligence on A's side may exist as well.

E. Counter-exception of paragraph (2): in the ordinary course of business, cultural objects

Rule of ordinary course of business in general. In a considerable number of Member States good faith acquisition is possible only in certain types of privileged situations of transfer. Frequent examples are the public auction, a (particular type of) market, or – more generally – acquisition from a professional salesman. In these jurisdictions, good faith acquisition is excluded in all other cases.

VIII.–3:101(2) choses a different approach, which in many cases might, however, lead to the same results as a wide definition of a privileged situation (as especially the ordinary course of business as a privileged situation). VIII.–3:101(1) defines the general requirements of good faith acquisition without any limitation to special situations of transfer and trade. Thus, goods that are not stolen goods (lost goods, entrusted goods etc), can be acquired in good faith in whatever place and time. In the case of non-stolen goods, acquisition is, however, additionally limited by the good faith requirement itself. If time, place or other circumstances of the transfer must make the transferee suspicious, he will be unable to acquire because of lack of good faith. In cases of stolen goods, VIII.–3:101(2) provides that acquisition is only possible in a privileged situation: that of a transfer in the ordinary course of business. The transfer of stolen goods outside this ordinary business circumstances is ruled out completely, because it is almost certain that stolen goods sold in a non-ordinary way must make the transferee suspicious, and the protection of the owner in case of stolen goods should generally be stronger.

Rule more flexibly adaptable to individual circumstances than traditional privileged situations. An analysis of the traditional privileged situations rules employed by some Member States shows that they are not reliable indicators for the unworthiness of protection of C outside these situations. Why should a transferee acting in good faith be worthy of protection only if he buys on a public auction, or a public market of some kind? Depending on the circumstances (which constitute C's good faith) C may also be worthy of protection when acquiring the goods outside such situations. VIII.–3:101 provides a strict category of privileged situation only in case of stolen goods where every transfer outside the ordinary course of business is qualified as suspect from the outset. This seems to be very close, if not convergent, to the result achieved by mere application of the good faith requirement alone. In all other cases (non-stolen goods) not the type of situation of transfer is deceisive but the circumstance from which good or bad faith follows in general. Thus, the approach of VIII.–3:101 is more flexibly adaptable to the circumstances of the individual case than the traditional approach relying on a few privileged situations alone.

Public auction. The rationale of this rule is usually stated as the particular trust a buyer can have in an institution authorised by the state (especially: a court). On closer examination, however, there is no reason to assume that courts or other public authorities take special efforts in examining the origin of the goods sold at such auctions. On the contrary, the public institutions are forced to keep costs as low as possible. Consequently, it is not more likely that the transferor is owner when the asset is sold in a public auction as compared to other sales. It would also not be reasonable to assume that the real owner has significantly good chances to detect his asset due to the public procedure before the auction takes place.

In addition, one would have to define what "public auction" really means. The views in the Member States differ on that issue. The scope might cover execution sales as well as – due to views expressed in some Member States – sales by private auction houses (like Sotheby's) or even internet auctions (like ebay).

Public markets. Market overt rules may have been important in former times. Nowadays, there are no good reasons to privilege acquisitions on a public market as compared to acquisitions elsewhere. One cannot say, for instance, that it is more likely to buy from the owner on a second hand market than in a store (rather to the contrary). Regarding other kinds of public markets, for instance where agricultural products are sold directly by their producers, the problem of an acquisition from a non-owner will very seldom arise at all.

Ordinary course of business. The reasons for adopting the counter-exception of transfer in the ordinary course of business in case of stolen goods do not lie in the (false) assumption that there is a certain supervision by public authorities that guarantees or makes it very likely that all goods sold by businessmen are owned by their sellers (or are sold by authorized transferors). Markets where private sellers offer their goods have extremely expanded with the recent development of electronic commerce on the internet. It cannot be said that these markets are suspicious market from the outset. Therefore, no general exclusion of such markets was adopted in VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1). For the category of stolen goods, it seems, however, accurate to state that the majority of such goods are not sold in the ordinary course of business, i.e. not by professional businesses with a licence or permission to exercise their trade or profession. Regarding the need for enhanced protection of owners in case of stolen goods, it seems fair to outrule any acquisition from a "private" seller including "black" sellers acting without a licence or permission. The latter sellers should also not be assumed to be part of the ordinary course of business. Acquisitions on "black" markets are excluded from VIII.–3:101 additionally by the good faith requirement (A buyer on such a market cannot be in good faith). Transferees buying in the ordinary course of business (consumers and business customers alike) can assume that the goods they buy are not stolen goods, in the first place. Only where special circumstances that must cause C's suspicion are present such an acquisition will fail. The exception must be seen as a measure to protect commerce on all "ordinary course of business" markets which justify the transferees reliance in the vast majority of cases. This generous measure to protect commerce is counter-balanced by a strict standard of good faith in VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1) (d) which in turn protects the interests of owners.

No necessity of special protection of consumers. Where stolen goods are bought on the ordinary markets there seems to be no reason to treat consumer contracts more favorably than business to business contracts. In the ordinary course of business contracts are normally made in a reliable environment, no matter whether the customer is a consumer or a business. Particular circumstances might cause suspicion in ordinary course of business situations. What circumstances should make which person or category of persons suspicious can be more flexibly decided on the basis of the good faith requirement than by a crude distinction between consumer and business sales.

Cultural objects. "Cultural objects" as defined by VIII.–4:102 (by reference to Article 1 (1) Council Directive 93/7/EEC) are considered, throughout Book VIII, to be a special category of goods where the bond of ownership is worthy of a stronger protection as compared to "ordinary" goods:

VIII.–4:102: Cultural objects

(1) Under this Chapter, acquisition of ownership of goods qualifying as a "cultural object" in the sense of Article 1 (1) of Council Directive 93/7/EEC, regardless of whether the cultural object has been unlawfully removed before or after 1 January 1993, or not removed from the territory of a Member State at all, requires continuous possession of the goods:

(a) for a period of 30 years, provided that the possessor, throughout the whole period, possesses in good faith; or

(b) for a period of 50 years.

(2) Member States may adopt or maintain in force more stringent provisions to ensure a higher level of protection for the owner of cultural objects in the sense of this paragraph or in the sense of national or international regulations.

COMMENTS

Therefore, the acquisition of ownership of cultural objects – unlawfully removed from the owner – is more strongly limited under the rules of Chapters 3 and 4 than in case of other goods. In situations of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession (Chapter 4), the time periods are considerably longer than for other goods. And, in addition, Member States may have even more stringend rules. In situations of good faith acquisition (Chapter 3) stolen cultural objects may not be acquired on the basis of the rule of VIII.–3:101, at all, also not if "transferred" in the ordinary course of business. In VIII.–3:101 situations, there is no opening clause for more stringend rules of the Member States, because such a clause does not seem to be necessary. Not stolen goods are normally not "unlawfully removed" from the owner and, therefore, do not fall under the definition of VIII.–4:102 paragraph (1). For stolen cultural objects no stronger sanction than the exclusion of good faith acquisition under all circumstances is possible.

A. Relation A – C: no right to buy back

Additional instrument to protect interests of owners is not necessary. Considering the system of interest balancing embodied in VIII.–3:101, a right of A to buy back the movable despite the good faith acquisition by C does not seem necessary. The main instruments of protecting ownership are the strict standard of good faith and the burden of proof on C. In the view of the drafters of Book VIII this is a very effective and clear concept of protecting the owners' interests in a good faith acquisition situation. An additional right of A to buy back his goods from C does not seem necessary.

Disadvantages of buy back right. A's right to buy back the goods would run against the goal of legal certainty and protection of commerce, since a buyer, despite being in good faith, never could be really sure whether he can keep the asset permanently or not. If he makes investments not only on the asset (such expenses could be compensated within the purchase price A had to pay) but for the asset, e.g. if he builds a garage for the car bought from B, C runs the risk that such investments might get frustrated. Furthermore, there would also be practical problems for C when confronted with a demand to buy back: If he needs the asset in his current business, he could suffer further losses until he can replace it by another object (C will, in principle, be entitled to recover such losses from B, but there might be a row of practical problems). Additional problems could be created by the need to find a fair definition of the price that has to be paid by A.

The practical advantages for A are limited: Goods usually decrease in value by lapse of time, and it therefore will regularly not be very attractive for A to pay C the price C formerly paid to B (the value will have decreased in the meantime). The practical experiences in Sweden, where such a right to buy back is provided, point in the same direction: The right to buy back is exercised only in very few cases. In addition, a right to buy back does not relieve A from the necessity to enforce his claims against B (who may be insolvent). It therefore seems adequate not to implement such a right to re-purchase.

B. Transferee already in possession of the goods (paragraph [3])

Clarification referring to VIII.–2:105 paragraph (1) situations. VIII.–3:101 paragraph (3) provides an additional requirement or clarification for a special situation of transfer: Where – for whatever reason – C is already in possession of the goods, when the remaining prerequisites for the transfer are created, i.e. especially when the contract of sale is concluded between B and C, the appropriate delivery equivalent (VIII.–3:101 paragraph [1] [b]) is described by VIII.–2:105 paragraph (1). In these cases no real delivery is possible any more. It can be considered as a delivery substitute that the transferee is holding the goods when the contract of sale comes into force. All other delivery equivalents of VIII.–2:105 and, of course, delivery itself in VIII.–2:104 are defined by reference to the transferor giving up possesion of the goods, of means, of documents or the transferor giving notice to a third person possessing the goods. Only VIII.–2:105 paragraph (1) does not include the requirement that the transferee must have previously obtained his possession from the transferor. This additional requirement is not necessary for purposes of ordinary transfers under Chapter 2, where there is no falling apart of the owner (and person authorized) on the one hand and the transferor on the other hand. And consequently the issue of C's good faith does not arise.

Good faith excluded. For good faith acquisition situations, it is considered practically impossible that a transferee can be in good faith when he did not obtain possession from his transferor. The object of C's good faith is the transferor's ownership or authority, C must believe B to be the owner (or the person authorized by A). If C has not been provided with possession by B, but by someone else, he must become suspicious of B's right or entitlement. Only for cases where B successfully pretends to be the authorized seller for owner A and C is justified in believing this, the restriction of VIII.–3:101 paragraph (3) could be extended a little bit. In these cases C should probably not be excluded from good faith acquisition if he obtained possession from A (provided C is in good faith). However, the opposite interpretation of the restriction in these cases seems to be also attractive. Where transferor B does not have the power to provide C with possession himself, but someone else (including A) did this before for other reasons than this transfer (B-C), the central justification for C's good faith acquisition is lacking: The basis or main justification for C's belief in B's right or authority is B's capacity to deliver the goods to C. If this basis is lacking, C should not be able to acquire the goods. See Comments above.

VIII.–3:102: Good faith acquisition of ownership free of limited proprietary rights

(1) Where the goods are encumbered with a limited proprietary right of a third person and the transferor has no right or authority to dispose of the goods free of the third person's right, the transferee nevertheless acquires ownership free of this right provided that:

(a) the transferee acquires ownership in a manner provided for in Chapter 2 or the preceding Article;

(b) the requirement of delivery or an equivalent to delivery as set out in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e) is fulfilled;

(c) the transferee acquires the goods for value; and

(d) the transferee neither knew nor could reasonably be expected to know that the transferor had no right or authority to transfer ownership of the goods free of the third person's right at the time ownership passes. The facts from which it follows that the transferee could not reasonably be expected to know of the transferor's lack of right or authority have to be proved by the transferee.

(2) Paragraphs (2) and (3) of the preceding Article apply for the purposes of this Article.

(3) Where the goods are transferred by notice as provided for in VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery) paragraph (2), the notified person's limited proprietary rights in the goods are not extinguished.

(4) For the purposes of the application of this Article to proprietary security rights, IX.–6:102 (Loss of proprietary security due to good faith acquisition of ownership) paragraph (2) applies in addition to this Article.

COMMENTS

A. Scope and function of VIII.–3:102, relationship to VIII.–3:101

Purpose of VIII.–3:102. This rule is designed to cover all cases where a movable, which is encumbered with a "limited proprietary right" of a third person, is transferred to a person that, in good faith, assumes that such a right of a third person does not exist. The consequence of the rule is that such a transferee may, under certain prerequisites, acquire the movable free of this right. By this, the third person's right is extinguished. The effect, therefore, is that freedom of encumbrances (of limited proprietary rights) is acquired in good faith. As for the substantive justification of this Article, see the Comments on VIII.–3:101 above. The issues are parallel ones.

"Limited proprietary rights". The term "limited proprietary right" is defined in VIII.–1:204. Examples of limited proprietary rights are security rights in movables according to Book IX, rights to use a movable if characterized as proprietary by the relevant provisions. The notion "limited proprietary right" differs from the notion of "limited right" in the provision on the "limited right possessor" in VIII.–1:207 insofar as VIII.–1:207 covers all rights to retain, possess and use a movable irrespective of their proprietary or obligatory character. Whereas the notion of VIII.–1:204 covers all limited rights in a movable irrespective of possession or use, but only if they are proprietary in character. Only limited proprietary rights are appropriate for a treatment that is similar to the treatment of the right of ownership (VIII.–3:101) in cases of good faith of the acquirer. In the Comments the third person is referred to as "X". The acquirer in good faith is called "C".

Acquisition of ownership not regulated by VIII.–3:102. The right of ownership, as such, is acquired on the basis of other rules, which may either be the rules on "derivative" acquisition (transfer) in Chapter 2 or the rule on good faith acquisition of ownership in VIII.–3:101. VIII.–3:102 does not regulate the issue in which way the transferee acquires ownership in the movable. It only answers the question of whether limited proprietary rights of third persons survive the transfer of ownership to C or whether they do not survive.

Examples for the differentiation between acquisition of ownership and acquisition free of encumbrances. The following examples illustrate that ownership may be acquired in two different ways, while VIII.–3:102 applies to the limited proprietary rights alone.

> Illustration 1
> B is the owner of a movable and grants X a usufruct right or a security right in that movable. B sells the movable to C, not disclosing X's right. As B is the owner of the object, C will acquire ownership under Chapter 2 (ownership is transferred, in the strict sense, from B to C). The question to be assessed under VIII.–3:102 is whether C acquires without the burden of X's right or not. Provided that C is in good faith with regard to the object's freedom of encumbrances, X's right is extinguished.

> Illustration 2
> B stores a movable for A, who has granted a usufruct right or a security right in that movable to X. B sells the movable to C, neither disclosing that he is not the owner of the object nor disclosing X's right. As B is not the owner of the asset, C may acquire ownership under Article 3:101 if he can assume, in good faith, that B has a right or authority to transfer ownership. However, C may be in good faith in respect of B's right or authority to transfer ownership, but there might be reasons to doubt as to the object's freedom of encumbrances. This question is dealt with by VIII.–3:102. Provided that C is in good faith with regard to the object's freedom of encumbrances, X's right is extinguished, otherwise C acquires ownership (in good faith), but limited by X's still existing right.

VIII.–3:102 regulates these two constellations – as they address the same legal question – in one Article. This structure shall help to ensures that different questions (extinction of a former owner's right of ownership and extinction of a third person's limited proprietary right) are kept apart and solved independently.

Two or more proprietary rights in the same movable. Where there is more than one limited proprietary right in one and the same movable, the test under VIII.–3:102 is to be made for each right independently.

Basic structure: Coherence with Article 3:101. As both VIII.–3:101 and VIII.–3:102 result in an extinction of another person's (A or X) proprietary right in favour of the acquisition of this right by a good faith acquirer (C), it seems necessary to regulate these two issues in a coherent manner. Therefore, the main structure and terminology of VIII.–3:102 is copied from VIII.–3:101. Different rules are only developed where the different nature of limited proprietary rights or the different interests of the parties require so.

B. Requirements for good faith acquisition (paragraph (1))

Title for acquisition of ownership of the goods. According to VIII.–3:102 paragraph (1) (a) the transferee must first acquire ownership of the goods. Thus, the requirement of VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1) (a), i.e. the obligatory basis (the title) of the transfer, has to refer to the acquisition of ownership, either in the circumstances of Chapter 2 (ownership derived from owner) or in the circumstances of VIII.–3:101 (good faith acquisition). No particular title for the "acquisition free of limited proprietary rights" is required.

Delivery or delivery equivalent. According to VIII.–3:102 paragraph (1)(b) the forms of transfer are restricted with respect to the general rule of Chapter 2 (VIII.–2:101), just in the same way as they are restricted in VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1)(b). There must be delivery (VIII.–2:104) or a delivery equivalent (VIII.–2:105), a mere agreement as to the time ownership will pass is not sufficient. The capacity of the transferor to deliver the goods to C or to provide for a delivery equivalent has a legitimizing function for the belief (good faith) of C and the good faith acquisition as such. This general idea can be also applied to the issue of good faith acquisition free of encumbrances: The third person X (holding the limited proprietary right) will often have the right to possess the movable and thus prevent the transferor B from delivering the movable to the acquirer C. Whenever the transferor communicates explanations to B why he cannot provide C with the possession of the goods, C should become suspicious and can no longer be in good faith. The inability of B to deliver the goods to C (or to provide a delivery equivalent) must alert C and instigate two questions in C's mind: (i) Is B really the owner of the goods or the authorized person to transfer the goods? (ii) Is B really entitled to transfer the goods without any encumbrances of third persons?

Acquisition for value. VIII.–3:102 paragraph (1)(c) provides that also here the transferee must acquire the goods for value (see VIII.–3:101 paragraph [1] [c]). Why the for value requirement was adopted for the basic rule of VIII.–3:101 in the first place, is explained in the Comments to that rule. If it seems a fair and balanced solution for the conflict of interests between A and C to let C – who received the goods as a gift – bear the risk that the transfer has no effect because of A's ownership, it must seem equally fair and just for donee C to assume the risk of acquiring goods that are burdened with the right of X. The consequence for donee C in VIII.–3:101 is much harsher than the consequence in VIII.–3:102: In VIII.–3:101 he has to surrender the whole movable to owner A. In VIII.–3:102 he only has to accept that the ownership in the movable he acquired is restricted by the proprietary right of X.

Requirement of good faith. In cases of VIII.–3:102 the object of good faith is not the right of ownership or authority to transfer ownership of the transferor (like in VIII.–3:101), but rather the right or authority of the transferor to transfer ownership of the goods free of the limited proprietary rights of a third person X. Whenever the transferee C knew or should have known of the existence of such rights of a third person, he must normally assume that there is no right or authority of the transferor to transfer the goods to him without these third person rights. Thus, C's actual or constructive knowledge of the existence of such rights of X plays a crucial role in determining the good or bad faith of C. The standard of good faith is a rather stringent one: see the Comments to VIII.–3:101. The burden of proof is regulated in the same way as in VIII.–3:101 (see the Comments to that Article): The burden of proof as to the absence of negligence has to be borne by transferee C. The burden of proof as to the existence of actual knowledge has to be borne by the holder of the limited proprietary right X.

C. Exceptions as to stolen goods and cultural objects (paragraph [2])

Reference to VIII.–3:101 paragraph (2): goods stolen from owner. The value judgement embodied in VIII.–3:101 paragraph (2) that stronger protection should be granted to the interests of owners whose goods have been stolen must be re-interpreted to find adequate application to the situations regulated by VIII.–3:102. Where goods have been stolen from the owner A and not been acquired by C in the ordinary course of business, C will not acquire ownership in the first place. Thus, the question whether he acquires free of encumbrances under VIII.–3:102 does not arise at all (see VIII.–3:102 paragraph [1] [a]). The same argument applies to stolen cultural objects who cannot be acquired in good faith. Where goods are stolen from owner A and are acquired in good faith by C in the ordinary course of business, the question arises whether this theft should have any effect on the possibility of extinction of the right of X. Because VIII.–3:102 does not deal with the protection of the rights and interests of A, but rather with the protection of the rights and interests of X. The answer seems easy: Where the stolen goods are acquired in the ordinary course of business, the stolen-exception is switched off anyway. Thus, it can also no longer apply in the circumstances of VIII.–3:102.

Reference to VIII.–3:101 paragraph (2): goods stolen from third person. As stated above VIII.–3:102 balances the interests of C and X and asks the question of whether X's right(s) should be extinguished in favour of C. In case of X, the goods which are in possession of X cannot be "stolen" in the the ordinary sense, because X is not the owners of the goods, but only a holder of a limited proprietary right in the goods. Nevertheless the dispossession of X can also have a criminal background – parallel to the criminal intention of a thief: The removal of the goods from X can enable the dispossessor to use the goods illegally to the effect of drawing financial benefit from them. In this respect it does not make any difference whether the dispossessor is the owner of the goods or another person. Therefore, the word "stolen" has to be re-interpretated for the purposes of VIII.–3:102 as "unlawfully removed from X with the intention to draw financial benefit from the dispossession".

Goods unlawfully removed from X with the described intention and afterwards transferred to C must be subject to a restriction of good faith acquisition. Where such goods are not transferred to C in the ordinary course of business, C cannot acquire them free of encumbrances, because the interests of X deserve a stronger protection than in other cases. The same must apply to cultural objects unlawfully removed from X with the intention to draw financial benefit.

D. Special situations of transfer (paragraphs [2] and [3])

Transferee already in possession. VIII.–3:102 paragraph (2) refers to VIII.–3:101 paragraph (3). In order to maintain the legitimizing function of the capability of the transferor to deliver the goods to the transferee and in order to provide the necessary justification for C's belief (good faith), the transferee must have obtained the goods from the transferor, in cases where the transferee was already in possession when the transfer occurred. This idea can be also expanded to the situations covered by VIII.–3:102. This provision makes the function and purpose of the delivery (delivery equivalent) requirement of VIII.–3:102 paragraph (1) (b) complete.

Transfer by notice in VIII.–3:102 paragraph (3). The transfer by notice is defined as a delivery equivalent in VIII.–2:105 paragraph (2). In these cases the transferor does not possess the goods directly but through a third person. In order to transfer the transferor's indirect possession to the transferee the third person must be notified that she from now on has to possess the goods for the transferee. In these situations, both transferor and transferee are necessarily aware of the fact that such a third person exists and that she possesses the goods. The fact that a third person possesses the goods is a reliable indicator of the existence of limited proprietary rights of that person in the goods. Such rights can be, for instance, the right of retention of a person storing the goods for remuneration, a lien created by operation of law, or a possessory proprietary security right created by contract. Transferor C must be aware of the likeliness of the existence of such rights and can, therefore, not be in good faith with respect to the non-existence of such rights. Thus, he can never acquire the goods free of the limited proprietary rights of the third person in possession of the movable.

CHAPTER 4: ACQUISITION OF OWNERSHIP BY CONTINUOUS POSSESSION

Section 1: Requirements for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession

VIII.–4:101: Basic rule

(1) An owner-possessor acquires ownership by continuous possession of goods:

(a) for a period of ten years, provided that the possessor, throughout the whole period, possesses in good faith; or

(b) for a period of thirty years.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1)(a):

(a) a person possesses in good faith if, and only if, the person possesses in the belief of being the owner and is reasonably justified in that belief; and

(b) good faith of the possessor is presumed.

(3) Acquisition of ownership by continuous possession is excluded for a person who obtained possession by stealing the goods.

COMMENTS

A. General

Acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. The majority of European legal systems, especially the civil law countries, provide rules on the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. Under this concept, the right of ownership can be acquired based on possession for a certain period of time. Most other European countries recognise concepts with at least functionally comparable effects. Chapter 4 adopts this approach, first, because it fulfils an important supplementary function where a transfer under Chapter 2 or a good faith acquisition under Chapter 3 fails. There are, however, many other instances where it may appear desirable to avoid unclear property positions for the sake of legal certainty. Acquisition by continuous possession is, therefore, adopted as a general concept. .

Concept traditionally going beyond the scope of this Book. The concept of acquisition by continuous possession has a much broader scope in many European legal systems. Whereas Book VIII of these model rules only relates to goods and the acquisition of the right of ownership, the concept traditionally extends to immovable property and the acquisition of limited proprietary rights, in particular proprietary rights of use. In many countries, the practical importance of the concept will be much higher in these other areas. The underlying ideas are, however, similar in all of these areas, so that it may be useful to take these model rules into account also when developing rules for those other fields. It should be clarified, though, that the interests involved and the underlying policy considerations may be weighed somewhat differently with regard to immovables and other types of rights. The rules contained in this Chapter have been developed exclusively with a view on the acquisition of ownership of goods.

Terminology. Chapter 4 employs the term “acquisition of ownership by continuous possession” because it spells out the basic idea of this concept in a very direct way. The frequently used term "acquisitive prescription" has been avoided in order to stress the difference to the concept of ("extinctive") prescription in the sense of Book III Chapter 7 and to prevent any possible misunderstandings in this respect. See also III.–7:101 (Rights subject to prescription) Comment A. In essence, however, that term could be used synonymously.

Extinctive prescription of rei vindicatio and similar concepts. In some Member States, the owner's right to recover possession of the goods from any other person exercising physical control without being entitled to do so is subject to ("extinctive") prescription. To a certain extent, the effects of this approach are functionally similar to those provided for by acquisition of ownership by continuous possession: The possessor is protected against claims from the original owner. In common law countries, such a limitation of the (tort law based) claims for protecting property are the general basis for achieving results comparable to those achieved by acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. In other countries, this concept applies in addition to the rules on acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. Practically, this often opens up the acquisition of a position comparable to the ownership by a person possessing in bad faith even where, under the relevant rules of national law, acquisition of ownership by continuous possession would require good faith. These model rules, however, do not adopt such a concept. In terms of legal certainty and clarity there does not appear to be much sense in leaving a "naked" right to the owner, without any possibility to exercise this right, while conferring a kind of "protected nothing" on another person. Rather, the entitlement to recovery based on a property right should only terminate with the absolute right itself; cf. also III.–7:101 (Rights subject to prescription) Comment D. Since these model rules explicitly recognise acquisition by continuous possession also in bad faith, there also does not seem to be any practical need for adopting a "prescription approach" in this respect. The comparative survey also shows that the falling apart of formal ownership and protected possession has been subject to criticism in national legal writing. Furthermore, these model rules do not adopt an approach existent in Dutch law, which grants ownership to the person who is in possession of the goods at the moment when the limitation period of the rei vindicatio elapses. This would mean that the owner might lose ownership even though the current possessor does not fulfil the general requirements of acquisition by continuous possession, e.g. because possession was interrupted for such a long period of time that cure under VIII.–4:103 (Continuous possession) paragraph (1) is no longer possible, or where the current possessor is unable to produce sufficient evidence for applying VIII.–4:206 (Period of a predecessor to be taken into account). Since one of the main policy considerations of the concept of acquisition by continuous possession is to provide legal certainty, it appears more favourable to make the expropriation effect of this concept dependent on the acquirer's fulfilment of all requirements (including, in particular, the abidance by the respective time limit). The idea of sanctioning the owner's inactivity, which may be put forward in favour of the named alternative concept, should not be regarded as sufficient in this respect.

Finding not covered. Finding, i.e. a situation where the owner, or someone holding goods for the owner, involuntarily lost physical control over these goods and another person finds and obtains physical control over them, being aware of the fact that they are another's property, has traditionally been regulated separately in the European legal systems. In most Member States, the finder may acquire ownership of the goods, provided he complies with certain legal duties, and the original owner does not appear and reclaim the goods within a certain period of time. Usually, this period is shorter than the relevant time limit under the rules on acquisition by continuous possession. The potential overlap of the scopes of these two regimes is intended to be solved in favour of the (national) rules on finding, which usually pursue specific policies. Often, the finder is provided with certain incentives – such as a finder's reward, the reimbursement of expenses and, as already mentioned, a possibility to acquire ownership of the lost item – in order to comply with duties such as having to inform the owner or competent public authority and handing over the found goods to either of the two, which, as a whole, is intended to increase the owner's chances to recover his property. Taking into account these special policies and the various differences in the related national rules, acquisition of ownership by finding has been excluded from the scope of Book VIII from the outset; see VIII.–1:101 (Scope of application) paragraph (2)(h). Due to these special policies, also the question of whether a finder, who does not comply with the duties imposed on him by national law, may acquire ownership under VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1)(b) by keeping these goods in his possession for thirty years should depend on whether this would be compatible with these (national) rules and their underlying policies, respectively; cf. also Comment I below.

B. Scope of application

General. Under these model rules, acquisition of ownership by continuous possession is possible in a number of different constellations. This largely converges with the rules of law in the European legal systems, but goes beyond some of them mainly because the possessor's bad faith does not exclude acquisition of ownership altogether. The following Comments provide an indicative overview.

Acquisition from a non-owner. One major field of application are purported transfers where the requirements for good faith acquisition from a non-owner have not been met. This may, in particular, be the case where acquisition under VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership) fails because the possessor obtains possession of the goods by way of a donation, so that the "for value" requirement is not fulfilled; where the goods have been stolen and the counter-exception of VIII.–3:101(2) does not apply; or where the possessor has not been in good faith when taking delivery (or is unable to produce sufficient evidence for being in good faith at that time). Also, acquisition under Chapter 4 may take place in favour of a person who "acquired" the goods from a deceased non-owner under the (national) laws of succession.

Acquisition under invalid contract. Another group of constellations comprises cases where the possessor "acquired" the goods under a contract – in particular: a contract for sale – which was invalid for any reason but the goods nevertheless remained under the control of the possessor for the required period of time. This may be the case, in particular, where one of the parties lacked legal capacity at the time the contract was concluded; where the contract has been concluded by way of (direct) representation in the sense of Book II Chapter 6 and the representative acted without authority; or where the contract was void or subsequently avoided in the sense of Book II Chapter 7.

Control of goods obtained under a legal relationship other than one of acquisition. A further group of cases has in common that the possessor obtained physical control of the goods under a legal relationship which, itself, was not aimed at the possessor acquiring ownership, but the possessor subsequently changed his mind so as to possess the goods as, or as if he was, an owner in the sense of VIII.–1:106 (Possession by owner-possession). This prior legal relationship may, in particular, be a contract for storage, for the lease of goods, or any contract establishing a gratuitous right of use. The fact that physical control of the goods has been obtained for different reason does not exclude acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. It may, however, have an impact on the length of the required period of time, since it will usually be quite unlikely that such a person possesses the goods in good faith.

Further instances. The following examples are more likely to occur in textbooks than in court, but have been added to complete the picture of this Chapter's scope. Acquisition of ownership under Chapter 4 may further occur where the possessor thinks that certain goods belong to no one and occupies them, while they were in fact someone else's property. It is also imaginable that someone finds an object and wrongfully believes that it is his own property, e.g. because he lost an object of the same kind some time ago. Also, it could happen that seller and buyer conclude a contract for the sale of item A, but erroneously delivery of item B is made, A and B looking very much alike, so that the error remains undetected for a while. Also in such a case, acquisition of ownership could (only) occur by continuous possession. A thief is excluded from acquiring by continuous possession by virtue of a special rule in VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (3). A person knowingly obtaining the loot from a thief may, however, acquire the goods under the general rules on acquisition by continuous possession in bad faith. On these two latter issues, see Comment I below.

Registered goods: national law may have priority. Some legal systems contain separate rules on the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession for "registered goods". In particular, a different period of prescription is provided, whereby the period sometimes is longer, and sometimes shorter, than the "ordinary" period. This leads to the question of how "registered goods" should be treated under Chapter 4. As follows from VIII.–1:102 (Registration of goods) and is more closely elaborated in the Comments on that provision, Book VIII does not create a registration system of its own. Rather, where national law establishes a registration system, which concerns the right of ownership and the transfer of ownership (in contrast to registration merely for administrative purposes) and the register is publicly accessible, whereby registration may be obligatory or optional, the effects of such registration "have priority over the respective rules of this Book"; see VIII.–1:102 paragraph (2). This general approach also applies to acquisition by continuous possession under Chapter 4. This does not mean that Chapter 4 of this Book is automatically excluded as a whole. The national rules shall have priority over the rules of Chapter 4 only where the effects of these national rules and those of Chapter 4 are incompatible. In particular, another period for the acquisition by continuous possession and, possibly, additional requirements for acquisition may be applicable. It is unavoidable that this may lead to certain inconsistencies. However, providing a fully developed proposal for the interaction of registration and acquisition of ownership by continuous possession would presuppose developing a comprehensive (uniform) registration system. Since this proved impossible within the framework of developing these model rules (due to constraints on time and research capacities), the general approach of VIII.–1:102 had to be applied to acquisition by continuous possession as well.

C. Structure of Chapter 4

Section 1. The first Section spells out all basic requirements for the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. The central provision is VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule), its paragraph (1) containing the general prerequisites. All following provisions in that Article and the rest of Sections 1 to 3 are, in principle, supplementary rules in relation to the basic provision in paragraph (1). Paragraph (3) of VIII.–4:101 provides a general exception to the right to acquire ownership by continuous possession for a person who obtained possession by theft. VIII.–4:102 (Cultural objects) contains a special rule relating to the acquisition of cultural objects, which is not excluded, but made more difficult by imposing longer time limits.

Finally, VIII.–4:103 (Continuous possession) contains some additional details as to the requirement of "continuous possession".

Section 2. The following Section comprises additional regulations which have in common that they relate to the calculation of the period required for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. Most of them provide for a suspension, postponement of expiry or a renewal of the period, while the last provision allows for the taking into account of the possession period of a predecessor for the purpose of acquiring ownership by continuous possession.

Section 3. VIII.–4:301 (Acquisition of ownership) and VIII.–4:302 (Extinction of rights under rules on unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability for damage) spell out the effects of acquisition by continuous possession. For the purpose of clarity, the effect which is, in principle, already spelled out in VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1) is elaborated on more explicitly in this Section.

D. Interests underlying, and functions and policies of, the rules on acquisition by continuous possession

General. The rules on acquisition of ownership by continuous possession may affect, and have to balance, the interests not only of the original owner and the possessor of the goods, but also of various categories of third persons or even society in general. The following Comments will first briefly summarise the main interests at stake and then discuss the main functions and general policy considerations of the rules.

Perspective and interests of the original owner. Naturally, the main interest of the owner is to keep his property. For him, acquisition of ownership by continuous possession has far-reaching consequences, namely expropriation without any right to compensation. In this respect, losing ownership by virtue of another's acquisition by continuous possession is comparable to losing ownership by reason of another's good faith acquisition under Chapter 3 – but the practical consequences tend to be even worse: In many situations comparable to those covered by Chapter 3, i.e. where the possessor obtained the goods from a non-owner (cf. Comment A above, the elapsing of a long period of time will typically make it more difficult, or sometimes even impossible, for the original owner to proceed against the third-party non-owner. There may be practical problems such as difficulties in finding out this person's current domicile or place of business; a former company may have ceased to exist; or the third party may now be insolvent. Also, the providing of evidence to support any kind of claim against the responsible third party may now be extremely difficult. In addition, problems of a legal character may arise. In particular, claims against the third party, especially claims for damages or for the reversal of unjustified enrichment, may by now have prescribed under Book III Chapter 7. In mere two-party-constellations, where the owner himself conferred physical control of the goods to the possessor under a contract for storage or lease etc. (cf. Comment A above), the rules on prescription under Book III Chapter 7 and VIII.–4:302 (Extinction of rights under rules on unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability for damage) provide that the original owner does not even have a theoretical chance to proceed against anyone. Only where an intended transfer failed due to a defect in the underlying obligation), the owner's loss caused by an acquisition of ownership by continuous possession may be counter-balanced by taking into account the fate of the owner's counter-claim for reversing the purchase price. This last issue will be dealt with more closely below. In all types of constellations, finally, the owner may be de facto prevented from exercising his right simply because he is unable to find out where (in whose hands) the goods are. In contrast to immovable property, this risk is rather high with regard to movables, in particular where goods have been stolen.

Against the background of these rather harsh consequences, it is obvious that if it is agreed that a concept of acquisition by continuous possession is necessary at all, it will be in the owner's interest to statutorily provide for, at least, a rather long period for such acquisition. Also, any kind of exception or restriction will be advantageous to him.

Perspective and interests of the owner-possessor. An owner-possessor in the sense of VIII.–1:206 (Possession by owner-possessor), i.e. a person who possesses goods in the belief of being their owner, or at least with the intention of using the assets as if he were their owner, will typically be interested in remaining unchallenged in possession. In the present context, the owner-possessor will be interested in remaining unchallenged by any "holder of older rights" in the goods, in particular in being protected against claims of the original owner. The legitimacy of such a typical interest, however, varies considerably. With regard to a thief who wants to use the stolen goods himself, one will have to admit that hardly anything will speak for providing such a person with legal protection. Such reservations will gradually decline in the course of cutting across the spectrum from the position of a possessor in qualified bad faith on its one end, to the position of a possessor in good faith on its other end, and according to the individual facts of the case there may be additional arguments for protecting the possessor to the disadvantage of the original owner. E.g., the possessor may be considered worthy of protection where he has paid a purchase price for obtaining the goods (which may be difficult to recover after the lapse of a long period of time) or when he has already incurred expenditure on the goods and runs the risk of losing his investments. Also, the possessor may have developed a close "personal relationship" to the goods.

Another aspect which may be relevant in this context is that the possessor may run into difficulties in providing sufficient evidence that he made a valid acquisition after the passing of several years. Such difficulties may arise when the possessor is challenged by the former owner, but even more importantly, when he intends to dispose of the asset and the prospective buyer wants to verify whether the seller has a valid title. A similar problem may arise where the possessor intends to exercise rights linked to the right of ownership, e.g. the right to recover possession from a third party under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership), the right to bring a claim under Book VI where a third party damaged the goods (cf. VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession)) or the right to bring a claim under Book VII for the reversal of an unjustified enrichment that another person derived from the goods. In all of these situations, a rule providing that the possessor will acquire ownership at least by virtue of having possessed the goods for a certain period of time may be very helpful for the possessor.

Perspective and interests of the parties' general creditors. The general creditors of the original owner and the possessor have corresponding interests. Naturally, each side will be interested in maintaining, or increasing, the respective party's estate for the purpose of satisfying claims out of it.

Interests of persons (potentially) acquiring rights related to the goods from the possessor. A special group of creditors is the one that intends to acquire rights concerning the goods from the possessor. The main example will be a person who contemplates buying the goods from the possessor, but one may also think of a potential secured creditor who intends to establish a proprietary security right, or a potential lessee. Such persons will have an interest in obtaining a safe position, i.e. a position which will remain uncontested by persons having formerly held rights in the goods, which will establish a safe basis for legal relations created with further third parties. If the possessor has doubtlessly acquired ownership of the goods, he can provide these third parties with such a safe position. If, on the other hand, the possessor's entitlement to the goods was not that clear, the third person may be forced to undertake additional investigations, which could render the whole transaction inefficient. Generally speaking, one may say that creating secure proprietary positions will be in the interest of the general public or "commerce" as such in order to avoid uncertainty and, therefore, in order to enable the parties to a transaction to assess their benefits and risks. In particular, uncertainty could make it extremely risky (or expensive) to buy old and precious movables.

Functions and policies of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession; general. The concept of acquisition by continuous possession is traditionally rooted in several policy considerations, of which the following Comments attempt to provide a summary. One aspect is that the owner's "inactivity" may be sanctioned after the lapse of a long period of time. Most other aspects revolve around the idea of legal certainty, which may appear in different facets. Historically, as Roman law did not recognise the possibility of an immediate good faith acquisition from a non-owner, the area now covered by these rules also had to be taken care of by the concept of acquisition by continuous possession. This is not necessary under these model rules. Rather, regard is to be paid to the possible supplementary function the concept of acquisition by continuous possession may have in relation to immediate good faith acquisition in the sense of Chapter 3.

Sanction for owner's inactivity and related policies. One of the policy considerations relevant for the concept of acquisition by continuous possession is the idea that the owner's "inactivity" regarding the recovery of his property may be sanctioned after the lapse of a long period of time. Formulated positively, the owner is intended be motivated to use (recover) his property. In a certain sense, this may also promote the efficient use of assets. Many of these ideas show parallels to the underlying principles of prescription in the sense of Book III Chapter 7. There, also nothing is lost immediately, but the holder of a right is advised not to wait too long with exercising his right. This parallel, however, should only be drawn subject to a certain reservation. Especially with regard to corporeal movable property, the owner may, in many situations, not even know where his goods have been placed. He may undertake reasonable or even unreasonably intensive investigations but fail. In such a case, an argument based on the owner's "inactivity" is a weak one. In a case of the prescription of a right to the performance of an obligation, on the other hand, the identity of the debtor will usually be known (otherwise, III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance) may be invoked), so that an "inactivity" argument will typically be justified. One may add that an argument based on the owner's inactivity will also be more acceptable with regard to immovable property, where it is at least clear where the asset is located. Also, in some other situations regarding movables, e.g. in the case of acquisition under an invalid contract, the argument may be more persuasive. But it is hard to generalise it. Accordingly, its importance, when developing the rules of Chapter 4, has been limited. Indirectly, it is certainly of some relevance with regard to some of the extension rules in Section 2, where the owner is regarded as being unable to exercise his right, such as in the cases addressed by VIII.–4:201 (Extension in case of incapacity) and VIII.–4:202 (Extension in case of impediment beyond owner's control), or where the owner attempted to solve the conflict with the possessor either by seeking the help of a court (VIII.–

4:203 (Extension and renewal in case of judicial and other proceedings)) or by way of initiating direct negotiations, VIII.–4:204 (Postponement of expiry in case of negotiations).

Legal certainty. The most important underlying policy consideration for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession is the promotion of legal certainty. This includes the protection of individual interests, such as those of the owner-possessor himself, who may have already made investments related to the goods, or who intends to dispose of the assets or to proceed against third parties, and faces difficulties in providing evidence for his right to the goods after the lapse of a long period of time (regarding the recovery of goods by a possessor in good faith, also VIII.–6:301 (Entitlement to recover in case of better possession) may be invoked here). The idea of legal certainty, however, extends to a protection of commerce as such, since continuous possession may provide a clear basis for dispositions over property, ensuring a protected position for potential buyers or creditors seeking to create a security right in the asset . This may reduce investigation costs related to the verification of the transferor's entitlement, or costs of insuring oneself against this risk. In short, the concept of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession may help to reduce transaction costs. Generally speaking, if there was no acquisition by continuous possession and uncertainties were to remain regarding the current possessor's entitlement, also the risk of unpredictable court decisions, as well as litigation costs, would most likely be increased. The existence of a clear rule on acquisition of ownership by continuous possession may, on the other hand, prevent people from entering into uncertain legal disputes, so that one may even speak of a kind of peace-keeping function in society, serving "public interests". One may also mention the benefit of the protection of the owner-possessor's general creditors, who may believe that the goods belong to the owner-possessor (which, of course, is open to the general critique regarding the publicity function of possession, cf. VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) Comment C).

Possessor in good faith more worthy of protection, or acquisition in bad faith not to be facilitated, respectively. If only the policy considerations listed in the two Comments above were to underlie the rules on acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, one could not explain the difference between the rules governing continuous possession in good faith and possession in bad faith. Where possession in bad faith results in an acquisition of ownership at all in the European legal systems, it requires the lapse of a much longer period. This means that subjective aspects on the possessor's side are, after all, regarded as being quite important. One can probably identify different sub-aspects of this rather general policy consideration: Taking into account the expropriation effect on the original owner, it can be argued that only (or all the more) a possessor in good faith should benefit from the advantage of obtaining a quasi-unchallengeable position. Another reason for this policy could be the intention to avoid giving incentives to potentially dishonest people to abuse the concept of acquisition by continuous possession by knowingly remaining in possession of another's property. Such an approach presupposes that the concept of acquisition by continuous possession can already be justified sufficiently by other policy considerations, and would rather aim at limiting it to a socially and economically adequate level. The idea would, however, only be applicable to qualified cases of bad faith, in particular actual knowledge and wilful blindness. In the end, it is probably best to assume that a combination of several general deliberations underlies the idea of differentiating between good faith and bad faith possessors.

E. Overview of main requirements

Main requirements. Acquisition of ownership by continuous possession requires uninterrupted possession throughout a certain period of time. The main requirements of acquisition under Chapter 4 are:

> Possession. Possession has to be understood in the sense of VIII.–1:206 (Possession by owner-possessor), i.e. requiring both a corpus-element and an animus rem sibi habendi. See Comment F.
>
> Continuous possession. Possession must be uninterrupted, i.e. the owner-possessor must, in principle, possess throughout the whole period, the lapse of which is required for the acquisition of ownership. This issue is further regulated in VIII.–4:103 (Continuous possession); see also Comment F.
>
> For a certain period. The owner-possessor acquires ownership after the lapse of a certain period of time. The length of the period differs depending on whether the possessor is in good or bad faith (see Comments F, G and H below). Section 2 of this Chapter deals with different instances that may cause different kinds of a "prolongation" of the period (extension or renewal) or allow the taking into account of a predecessor's possession period already elapsed.
>
> Possession may not be obtained by theft. Actively dispossessing the former holder of the goods (whether that is the owner or another person) excludes the possibility to make an acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. This exception aims at limiting the possibility of acquiring by continuous possession in bad faith where such acquisition would be considered highly inappropriate in the light of the qualified misconduct of the owner-possessor. See paragraph (3) of this Article and Comment I below.

Requirements not adopted. Some legal systems provide further requirements for the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, like the need for a "valid title" or the fact that possession must be "public" and "unequivocal". Such requirements have not been adopted in these model rules. The reasons for this are discussed in Comment J below.

F. Possession

Owner-possessor. In Chapter 4, the term "possession" is to be understood in the sense of VIII.–2:106 (Possession by owner-possessor). The main aspect is that the possessor must exercise physical control over a movable with the intention to do so as an owner (as, or as if being the owner; animus rem sibi habendi). It is not decisive that the possessor subjectively believes to be the rightful owner. The buyer who perfectly knows that the contract under which he acquired the goods is void or voidable but intends to keep the goods for himself is covered, as well as a buyer who has no reason to know of such defect. Also, a thief would be covered by the requirement of owner-possession, but is excluded from the scope of acquisition by continuous possession by a special exception in VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (3). A person who exercises physical control over the goods as a limited-right-possessor in the sense of VIII.–2:107 (Possession by limited-right-possessor) does not have such an intention to possess as an owner. There is, consequently, no need to turn such a person's position into one characterised by a right of ownership after the lapse of a certain period of time, neither from this person's perspective nor in the interest of other persons (the latter will, should the limited-right-possessor change his mind and sell the property in his own name, be sufficiently protected by VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership)). The same applies to a possession-agent in the sense of VIII.–1:208 (Possession through a possession-agent). Since the external appearance of these different forms of "possession" may possibly be hard to discern in practice, it seems that the prerequisite of "owner-possession" is not so much rooted in the policy of promoting legal certainty in the sense of the protection of third parties. It is, however, a common criterion in the European legal systems and shows that also the possessor's own interests are regarded as an important basis for justifying the concept of acquisition by continuous possession.

Change of category of possession possible. It is, however, possible and acceptable for the purposes of this Chapter that a limited-right-possessor or possession-agent turns into an owner-possessor by changing his intention from exercising physical control for another to possessing for himself. If so, the period required for acquiring ownership by continuous possession begins to run with this change of intention. It is, however, hard to imagine that such a possessor will be in good faith in the sense of paragraph (2)(a) of this Article, so that the qualifying period for acquisition of ownership will usually be thirty years. This should be long enough for the owner to react and reclaim his goods (even if the possessor should, exceptionally, be in good faith, the period of ten years should suffice). If there has existed a legal relationship between the owner and the possessor already, it would at least pose no difficulty for the owner to find out against whom to proceed. As an example for a change of intention in the sense discussed here, one may think of a warehouse keeper who, during or after the expiry of the contract period, decides to retain the stored goods for himself. Since the policy decision that acquisition in bad faith shall be excluded only in very limited cases has been reached (see paragraph (3) of this Article and Comment I below), it seems consistent not to exclude the possibility of acquisition under Chapter 4 in such situations, which appear to be comparable to retaining purchased goods knowing that the contract is void, rather than to cases of theft (where the counter-party often is unknown). There may, perhaps, be certain reservations against this approach where a former limited-right-possessor or possession-agent deliberately tries to conceal his changed intention and, externally, appears to continue holding the goods on the same basis as he did before. But such conduct will typically fail to result in acquisition under Chapter 4, either because the possessor will fail in proving that he has exercised control with the relevant intention for the required period, or because his conduct may be interpreted as an acknowledgement of the owner's right (compare Comment F and VIII.–4:205 (Ending of period in case of acknowledgement)), especially where he, as lessor, paid a price to the owner, or received a payment from the owner for storing the goods, or where the content of what he communicated to the owner of the goods proves the contrary. Further examples for a change of intention in the present context could be: After the expiration of a contract providing a gratuitous right to use the goods, the borrower erroneously believes that the lender has donated the goods to him. Where a private person agrees to store goods for another, it may occur that both parties forget the agreement and the storing party (or that party's heirs), upon coming across these things, believe they are that party's property or part of the estate.

Owner-possession may be exercised through another person. Pursuant to the general concept of possession – as is also reflected in the text of VIII.–1:206 (Possession by owner-possessor) by referring to "direct or indirect physical control" – and practical needs, the owner-possessor does not have to exercise physical control personally throughout the whole period. He can exercise control indirectly through a limited-right-possessor or possession-agent. The applicability of this principle should not be restricted to the time after the acquisition of possession, but should apply also as from the moment when owner-possession is obtained for the purposes of this Chapter.

Acknowledgement of owner's right. Once an owner-possessor declares to acknowledge the owner's right, he will normally cease to be an owner-possessor in the sense of VIII.–1:206 (Possession by owner-possessor) because he does not possess "as, or as if (being) an owner" any longer. He will, consequently, not fulfil the requirement of continuous owner-possession as provided by this Article. A new period may only start if he, contrary to the acknowledgement, later resumes possession for himself. For purposes of clarification, and in order to avoid problems which may arise in specific situations, the case of acknowledgement is addressed in a special rule in VIII.–4:205 (Ending of period in case of acknowledgement).

Continuous possession. In principle, the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession requires continuous possession throughout the whole qualifying period. This is a common approach in the European legal systems. Under certain conditions, however, involuntary loss of possession can nevertheless be treated as continuous possession. VIII.–4:103 (Continuous possession) paragraph (1) contains a more detailed regulation on this issue. Paragraph (2) of the named Article also contains a presumption in favour of the possessor: The owner-possessor is presumed to have possessed throughout the whole period when he proves that he was in possession at the beginning and at the end of the period. See there.

For a certain period. The length of the period differs, depending on whether the owner-possessor is in good or in bad faith. In the former case, ten years of possession are required, in the latter case, these model rules require possession for a period of thirty years. The reason for this differentiation is simply that a bad faith possessor does not deserve such a strong protection as against the rightful owner, who will lose his right as a consequence of an acquisition under this Chapter. An exception is provided for cultural objects where a general policy is favoured that acquisition by continuous possession should be possible only subject to the meeting of stricter requirements. Therefore, the named periods are extended under VIII.–4:102 (Cultural objects). For details, see Comments G and H below and the Comments on VIII.–4:102. (Section 2 of this Chapter contains additional provisions as to the calculation of the qualifying period for the acquisition of ownership, and in particular rules on the extension and renewal (interruption) of the period. See VIII.–4:201 (Extension in case of incapacity) to VIII.–4:205 (Ending of period in case of acknowledgement). VIII.–4:206 (Period of predecessor to be taken into account), on the other hand, facilitates an acquisition of ownership under this Chapter by allowing the owner-possessor to take the period of his predecessor into account, provided that the general requirements have been fulfilled both by the predecessor and the successor in possession.

G. Acquisition by continuous possession in good faith

General. The approach that continuous possession in good faith may result in an acquisition of ownership, or at least in obtaining a position protected against claims of the original owner of the property can be said to form part of the common core of European private law. As compared to possession in bad faith, it appears relatively easy to accept that the typical interests of the owner-possessor, potential acquirers and other public interests linked to the concept of acquisition by continuous possession (see Comment D above) prevail over the owner's interests after the lapse of a certain period of time, provided that the possessor acted in good faith. Despite this common approach, the European legal systems show differences particularly as to the length of the period and the relevance of further additional requirements

(cf. Comment J below), but also the meaning of the prerequisite of good faith itself is far from being uniform.

(a) Good faith

Meaning of good faith. For the purposes of this Chapter, the owner-possessor is in good faith if he "possesses in the belief of being the owner and is reasonably justified in that belief"; see paragraph (2)(a) of this Article. The reference to "being the owner" means that doubts or knowledge excluding good faith may relate to all circumstances that might lead the possessor to question whether his position is one of having acquired ownership, for example his predecessor's right of ownership or authority to dispose, or the validity of the contract or other legal ground underlying the purported acquisition. The named definition makes clear that good faith is excluded where the possessor has actual knowledge of the fact that he is not the owner, as well as in cases of wilful blindness and negligent ignorance, having regard to the particular facts and circumstances of the case. No differentiation is made between slight and gross negligence. The rule is not intended to spell out any general duty to undertake investigations. Such a duty may, however, result from the individual circumstances of the case. Practically, the required standard of care may be higher at the time of the acquisition of possession than at a later point in time at which the possessor has already been exercising control over the goods for a couple of years without any reason to doubt his entitlement. General guidelines are difficult to provide; the provision is intended to be applied flexibly according to the individual circumstances, taking into account information accessible before and when possession was obtained as well as information having only become available later, and information open to the public as well as special information exclusively accessible to the possessor. The mere possibility that something may have gone wrong with an acquisition – which, in fact, can never be excluded with full certainty – shall of course not exclude good faith in the sense of this Article. Even where the owner reclaims the goods from the possessor, this will not necessarily exclude good faith if the possessor has had very good reasons to believe that his own acquisition is valid and that the (purported) owner's claim lacks a legal basis. The owner will, therefore, be advised to present plausible reasons for the existence of his claim's legal basis already before initiating judicial proceedings, in order to avoid the possibility of losing his right by virtue of the lapse of the shorter period required for an acquisition in good faith.

Good faith throughout the whole period. The European legal systems have adopted different approaches as to when good faith is required. Under some of them, good faith is essential only at the moment of the acquisition of possession (so that any subsequent doubt or even positive knowledge does not prevent acquisition in the short period), whereas others require good faith throughout the whole qualifying period for acquisition of ownership. These model rules follow the latter approach, which is regarded as more adequate especially when balancing the harsh expropriation effect the concept of acquisition by continuous possession has for the owner against the legitimate interests of the possessor. There may be, for instance, situations where someone receives a gift and does not have any reasons to doubt the donor's ownership at that time, but the circumstances change shortly after acquiring possession when the possessor obtains additional information about the object, e.g. someone tells him about a newspaper article reporting that this asset has been stolen. Under such circumstances, the law should not encourage the possessor to keep the goods until the (shorter) period for acquisition in good faith has elapsed. Rather, he should attempt to clarify the situation and, if possible, return the object to its owner. The general interest of legal certainty, which may exceptionally justify an expropriation of the owner, should prevail only under the fulfilment of the same prerequisites as would be required if the possessor had been in bad faith right from the beginning. – Other arguments, which might be put forward in favour of the alternative solution are not considered as being sufficiently important within the framework of these model rules: The potential argument that good faith throughout the whole period may be difficult to prove should be outweighed by the presumption of good faith provided for by paragraph (2)(b) of this Article. Also, the fact that the period for acquisition in good faith – ten years – is a rather long one under this Article and that it may, therefore, be more likely that the possessor has incurred expenditure on the goods, does not cause a need for a facilitated form of the acquisition of ownership where the possessor has not been in good faith throughout the whole period. Such expenditure is to be reimbursed under VIII.–7:104 (Expenditure on, or parts added to, the goods during possession) and it is all the more justified that the possessor carries the risk of such investments where he makes them when no longer being in good faith (cf. the Comments on the named Article).

Burden of proof as to good faith: options available. The European legal systems provide different answers to the question of whom the burden of proof regarding the good or bad faith of the owner-possessor is to be imposed upon. Most legal systems provide a general presumption of good faith (for the purposes of these Comments and paragraph (2) (b) of this Article, no terminological difference is made between a "presumption" and the imposition of the "burden of proof"). The opposite solution would consist in placing the burden of proof as to good faith throughout the whole period on the possessor. But there are also compromise solutions. Some countries provide for a rule stating that good faith shall be presumed in case the possessor has obtained possession based on a valid obligation (arising from a valid contract or other juridical act, a court order or a rule of law). A further alternative consists in the concept that the owner-possessor must only prove that he was in good faith when he obtained possession, and if he succeeds in this, there is a presumption that he was in good faith throughout the rest of the period as well. Any of the presumptions mentioned here are to be understood as being rebuttable presumptions.

Discussion and justification of the proposed solution (presumption of good faith). As with all other rules of Chapter 4, the decision on which approach to adopt as to the burden of proof must attempt to balance conflicting interests, in particular, on the one hand, the owner's interest in not losing his right, and, on the other hand, the general interest of establishing legal certainty by facilitating the clarification of uncertain property positions, which converges with the good faith possessor's individual interests. With regard to the owner's interests, it must be taken into account that having to provide evidence for facts, from which the non-existence of the possessor's good faith may be deduced, may be particularly burdensome, or almost impossible, in some situations. This may especially be the case where the possessor "acquired" from a non-owner because the owner usually has no direct information about the circumstances of this "acquisition" (whereas the possessor took part in this act and, therefore, typically has better access to evidence). Based on this consideration, no presumption of good faith has been included in VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership). The problem will not arise in the same way where the possessor obtained the goods directly from the owner (e.g. under an invalid contract or where possession was retained after the termination of a contract for lease; cf. Comment B as to its scope of application). Taking into account the rather clear majority solution arrived at in the European legal systems, and the fact that the period of ten years required for the acquisition of ownership by continuous good faith possession is rather long, so that the owner, at least theoretically, has had some time to recover the possession of his property, it is suggested that the good faith of the possessor is presumed regarding the moment in time of obtaining possession as well as for the rest of the period. After that time, the difficulties in providing evidence as to the circumstances of obtaining possession will typically have increased considerably also for the possessor. Above all, the general policy aim of legal certainty may be said to have a higher value after this rather long period has elapsed. Also, Chapter 4's function of supplementing the good faith acquisition rules of Chapter 3 may be considered as best served by this proposed solution. Taking into account the model rule character of these provisions, it should, however, be mentioned that if a shorter period for acquisition by continuous possession was chosen, a different solution as to the burden of proof issue might be contemplated as well.

How the presumption of paragraph (2)(b) works. The presumption of good faith spelled out in paragraph (2)(b) is to be understood as a rebuttable presumption (cf. the definition of "presumption" in the Annex). The owner must, therefore, assert facts, and provide sufficient evidence for them, from which it follows that the possessor was not in good faith neither when obtaining possession nor at any later time during the qualifying period. E.g., the owner may prove that there have been sufficient reasons to realise that the contract, on the basis of which the goods were acquired, was invalid, or that the facts presented by the possessor about his acquisition of possession are very likely to be false. Also, the owner may provide evidence showing that new facts became available after possession had been obtained, that the possessor could reasonably have been expected to know of these facts and that these new facts were of such quality that the possessor should have had reason to doubt the legitimacy of his acquisition.

(b) Period of ten years

Length of period. Evidently, the determination of the length of the qualifying period for acquisition of ownership is a suitable instrument for balancing the interests involved in continuous-possession situations. Taking into account the comparative survey, it is also obvious that there is the quite uniform approach in Europe that a possessor in good faith is considered much more worthy of protection than a possessor in bad faith and, therefore, the period for acquisition in good faith may be much shorter – although the general ("public") interest of safeguarding legal certainty as to property positions remains the same irrespective of the possessor's good or bad faith. Still, determining the length of the period involves a certain measure of arbitrariness. Most European legal systems provide for a period ranging from three years – which seems to be the most frequently chosen solution – to ten years for the acquisition in good faith, but some even provide for a period of forty years in certain circumstances. To a certain extent, of course, the duration of the period may depend on the existence or non-existence of additional requirements for the acquisition by continuous possession, such as the existence of a "valid obligation" ("valid title") for acquiring ownership. But still, it is difficult to provide a generalised picture. During the drafting history of this Article, periods between three and ten years have been contemplated (for non-registerable goods, cf. Comment B). Finally, the majority in the Study Group's Co-ordinating Committee decided in favour of a ten-year period. There are two main arguments put forward for this solution: First, especially where goods have been stolen (but the current possessor is in good faith), shorter periods are considered not to be long enough for the owner to recover his goods. This has been the practical experience in Sweden, where the law, for this reason, has been changed from a three-year to a ten-year period. Theft is, however, not the only case in which this rationale may apply. Similar difficulties may (perhaps not that typically) occur in other situations where possession of the goods has been transferred, or otherwise passed, to several persons one after another. Second, the expropriating effect for the owner is seen as a heavy sanction in general, which has by itself been considered to speak against a short(er) period. One may add that, to a certain extent, providing for a rather long period will also fit to the approach of not adopting additional requirements for the acquisition by continuous possession, which could also have a certain corrective function (cf. Comment J below). – Evidently, however, the long minimum period of ten years reduces the practical relevance of the concept of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession to durable goods. Many things will simply not exist any more after ten years.

No inappropriate results in case of void and avoided contracts: general. The approach of providing for a rather long ten-year period for acquisition of ownership might be contested if it had inappropriate side effects. One aspect, which had to be taken into closer consideration when developing this Article is the ten-year-period's impact on the unwinding of void or avoided contracts (after performances have been exchanged). The underlying reason why this is an issue is that avoidance of a contract has two effects: Under the property law provision of VIII–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation) paragraphs (1) and (2), ownership is never transferred or reverts to the transferor with retrospective effect. Accordingly, the seller is entitled to restitution of the goods under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership). The second consequence is that the mutual performances have to be reversed under the rules of unjustified enrichment (Book VII). These obligations will be subject to prescription in the sense of Book III Chapter 7. The interrelation of these rules with the ten-year period for acquisition by continuous possession is reflected in the following Comments.

Avoidance within ten years. Under these model rules, prescription of a right to performance of an obligation occurs after the lapse of a period of three years (III.–7:201 (General period)). This period will also apply to unjustified enrichment claims. Where, like under a contract for sale, both parties to a contract have performed mutual obligations and, subsequently (e.g. after nine years), this contract is avoided, the relatively long ten-year period for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession should not have the effect that the buyer must restore the goods to their owner while, due to the prescription rules of Book III Chapter 7, not being entitled to recover the purchase price he paid. Such effect, however, does not occur: According to III.–7:203 (Commencement) paragraph (1), the period of prescription begins to run from the time when the debtor's performance is due. In the present context, this means that the three-year prescription period, which the obligation to repay the price is subject to, starts to run when avoidance becomes effective. Consequently, the buyer has, from this moment onwards, a period of three years to reclaim his money. This is long enough. The fact that the periods provided for in the prescription rules under Book III Chapter 7 of these model rules are shorter than the periods for acquisition by continuous possession, therefore, does not place any inadequate disadvantage on the buyer. Accordingly, the difference in the length of the periods is, in itself, no argument against the imposition of a ten-year period for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession.

Avoidance after more than ten years. These model rules do not provide for any absolute time limit for the avoidance of a contract. II.–7:210 (Time) only sets forth that notice of avoidance must be given within reasonable time after the avoiding party gained, or could have reasonably been expected to gain, knowledge of the relevant facts. This implies that a party may possibly be entitled to avoid the contract even after the lapse of ten years. Furthermore, it is clear from the Comments that the prescription rules of Book III Chapter 7 do not apply to a party's right to give notice of avoidance; see III.–7:101 (Rights subject to prescription) Comments B and D. Taking into account this legal framework, avoidance of a contract for sale, after the buyer has possessed the goods in good faith for more than ten years, leads to a situation where (1) the contract is treated as never having existed and obligations to reverse performances arise from unjustified enrichment law (meaning that the price and – in principle – the purchased goods are to be restored); and at the same time (2) the buyer has fulfilled the prerequisites of acquisition by continuous possession in good faith under the present Article. As none of the involved sets of rules (avoidance with retroactive effect, unjustified enrichment, acquisition under the present Chapter 4) is inapplicable as a matter of principle, a provisional result may be described as follows: The seller's unjustified enrichment claim for recovering the sold goods will be extinguished by VIII.–4:302 (Extinction of rights under rules on unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability for damage) upon acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, i.e. after ten years of possession. Also, the seller cannot demand restitution of the goods based on a right of ownership under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) – which, in principle, would be the consequence of avoidance with retroactive proprietary effect, see VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation) paragraph (2): This possibility was extinguished upon fulfilment of the requirements for acquisition under Chapter 4. Whereas this means that the seller cannot recover the sold goods, he continues, in principle, to be under an obligation to return the purchase price to the buyer under the unjustified enrichment rules. This would be a questionable result. It is, however, intended that this problem, with regard to avoided contracts, is to be solved by applying the general rule of III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation) paragraph (1) by way of analogy. This rule states that a creditor, who is to perform a reciprocal obligation at the same time as, or after, the debtor performs, has a right to withhold performance of the reciprocal obligation until the debtor has tendered performance or has performed. This rule applies to all kinds of reciprocal obligations (cf. III.–3:401 Comment A), including unjustified enrichment claims. As mentioned above, the seller's unjustified enrichment claim will be extinguished by VIII.–4:302 upon acquisition of ownership by continuous possession (accordingly, reciprocal obligations in the strict sense do not exist). Nevertheless, the seller shall be entitled to withhold performance of his obligation to repay the purchase price. Pursuant to the proposed analogy, the buyer may either keep the goods (which he has already acquired) and accept that the seller keeps the price paid for them, or he may chose to restore the goods to the seller and to have the purchase price repaid to him. The rules on acquisition of ownership by continuous possession do not have the aim of resulting in an unfair preference of one party over the other in case of avoided contracts. This should be taken into account when interpreting the relevant rules. Third parties who have acquired rights from the buyer after the ten-year period for acquisition by continuous possession has elapsed are not affected: They have validly acquired from the owner. In practice, this may prohibit the buyer from opting for a return of the goods.

Contract invalid from the beginning. In case the contract is not avoided after exchange of performances, but was void from the beginning, the claims to reverse performance under unjustified enrichment law arise at the moment performance is rendered. When the buyer obtains a secure legal position under this Article by having possessed the goods in good faith for a period of ten years, the mutual unjustified enrichment claims will already have prescribed under Book III Chapter 7, by virtue of the application of the three-year period of prescription provided for by III.–7:201 (General period), which begins to run as soon as the relevant performance has been received (cf. III.–7:203 (Commencement) paragraph (1)). Accordingly, also the buyer will be barred from reclaiming the purchase price he paid. The problem of there being inappropriate results for one of the two parties to a synallagmatic contract does not occur.

H. Acquisition of ownership by continuous possession in bad faith

Why acquisition of ownership by continuous possession in bad faith at all. The European legal systems are quite divided on the question of whether a possessor in bad faith should be able to acquire ownership, or some other position legally protected as against the owner, by continuous possession. In about half of the countries where acquisition in bad faith (or the application of a comparable concept) is possible in principle, one can observe the existence of exceptions for certain forms of "qualified bad faith", for example where possession has been obtained by a violent or other criminal act. Also, there are sometimes additional general requirements for acquisition, such as possession having to be "public" or "peaceful", which inter alia also operate to the effect that certain constellations of possession in bad faith will not lead to an acquisition of ownership (cf. Comment J below). The issue can probably be discussed endlessly with good arguments on both sides, involving arguments of ethical, economical and legal character. As already discussed more generally in Comment D above, the interests of the original owner (i.e. not to lose his right to the object) are quite neutral in respect of the possessor's state of mind and honesty, except that a person possessing in bad faith might undertake particular efforts to conceal the goods, which may, at least typically, make it more difficult for the rightful owner to find and recover his goods. The dishonest possessor's personal worthiness of protection, on the other hand, considerably declines with the extent of his bad faith increasing. Only from the perspective of third parties, "commerce" or "society" in general, the policy considerations in favour of legal certainty, the general interest of stability regarding proprietary positions and the "peace-keeping" function of possession, i.e. avoiding uncertain litigation after the lapse of a long period of time, may speak in favour of acquisition by continuous possession in bad faith. It has been decided by the Study Group's Co-ordinating Committee to let these interests prevail in principle after the lapse of a long period of time. For extreme situations of qualified bad faith like theft and robbery, however, an exception is considered to be justified (see paragraph (3) of this Article and Comment I below), which in a way also reflects the majority approach in Europe.

Technical implementation of the rule, paragraph (1)(b). As already discussed on a general basis in Comment A, it is clearly preferred not to employ the concept of an ("extinctive") prescription of the owner's right to recovery of the goods, but to regulate the issue in terms of the "real" acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. The rule under which acquisition by possession in bad faith is made possible is paragraph (1)(b) of this Article, which requires (1) owner-possession (2) exercised continuously (3) for a period of thirty years. The term "bad faith" is not mentioned in the text of the Article. It just follows e contrario from paragraph (1)(a) that paragraph (1)(b) will practically be left to be applied to possessors in bad faith (but see VIII.–4:206 (Period of a predecessor to be taken into account) Comment B). The mentioned exception for cases of "qualified bad faith" is provided for in paragraph (3) of this Article.

Thirty-year period. The period for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession is thirty years. This appears to be the maximum standard period established for such situations in the European legal systems (where acquisition by continuous possession is possible at all). The length of the period reflects, above all, the possessor's limited worthiness of protection in relation to possessors in good faith who already have to possess for the rather long period of ten years. Also, the thirty-year period reflects the abovementioned difficulties in justifying, and reservations existing against, acquisition by continuous possession in bad faith in general.

I. Exclusion of acquisition by a thief, paragraph (3)

Policy. Paragraph (3) constitutes an exception to the general possibility of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession in bad faith. This exception mirrors the struggle in striking a balance between the general aim of promoting legal certainty and a generally accepted ethical understanding of not supporting or legally recognising certain types of criminal behaviour, as it goes without saying that a criminal does not deserve any legal protection at all. With regard to the owner, who would lose his right to the object in case acquisition by continuous possession was possible in this case, the exception rule also takes into account that in case of theft, it may be particularly difficult for the owner to find out about the place where the goods are currently kept. In order not to take away too much from the goal of legal certainty, however, the exception is deliberately kept narrow. It does not provide that acquisition under Chapter 4 be excluded for stolen goods in general. Only the thief himself shall be covered. The thief's heirs, persons purchasing the goods from the thief and limited-right-possessors retaining the goods for themselves are not prevented from acquiring by continuous possession. The scope of the rule and situations which, to a certain extent, may appear comparable in terms of the criminal element involved but are not intended to be covered, are explored in more detail in the Comments below.

Theft. Paragraph (3) excludes acquisition of ownership by continuous possession for a person "who obtained possession by stealing the goods". It is not decisive whether the dispossessed person was the owner or some other person, as it is the qualified illegal act which triggers this exception. The term "stealing" corresponds to the term "stolen goods" in VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership) paragraph (2). It is not intended to refer to any criminal law implications under national law. For the purposes of this Article, a person "steals" goods where the physical control formerly exercised by another person is actively interrupted, regardless of whether or not this act of dispossession is accompanied by violence or performed secretly. It is, however, essential that the "thief" knows that the goods which he takes into his possession are another's property and that he is not allowed to do so. The reference to "stealing" the goods is intended not to be restricted to the person who performs the physical acts of such dispossession: also a person who participates in the act of dispossession, instigates the act or materially assists in some other way (like in driving a getaway car) is considered to be covered by paragraph (3). This is not explicitly spelled out in the text of the Article, but corresponds to VI.–4:102 (Collaboration), which is seen to express a general principle. Thereby, especially a person who "orders" the theft and keeps the loot for himself in exchange for the payment of a price to the "principal offender" is excluded from the possibility of becoming owner by continuous possession. In all cases, since the rule in paragraph (3) is phrased as an exception, the burden of proof as to the fact that a theft in the abovementioned sense has occurred, will be on the owner. Practically, this may be a burden difficult to discharge after the lapse of a long period of time. Again, this has a favourable effect for legal certainty, but leaves the door open for justice to prevail. – Despite employing the same terminology, the exception provided for by paragraph (3) of the present Article is much narrower as compared to the exception for stolen goods in VIII.–3:101 paragraph (2). As described above, the exception regulated in the present Article only excludes acquisition by the thief himself and his accomplices, whereas VIII.–3:101(2) excludes any acquisition under that Article, provided that the goods were once stolen. Under the latter rule, the qualification "stolen" is, so to say, eternally attached to the goods, and prevents good faith acquisition even by persons in "perfect good faith". This difference may be explained by the fact that good faith acquisition under Chapter 3 is a much more radical means as compared to acquisition under Chapter 4, since the rightful owner is expropriated immediately. From that perspective, it appears reasonable that exceptions from acquisition under Chapter 3 are wider than those to Chapter 4.

No circumvention by transfer and re-transfer. Circumventing paragraph (3) by transferring stolen goods to a third party and re-transferring them to the thief must be impossible (irrespective of whether or not the third party is aware of the goods' origin). The wording of the Article already points in this direction by addressing the "person who obtained" possession under the relevant circumstances. The need for such "personal qualification", in the light of the underlying policy, should not be circumventable by an interim transfer and re-transfer. Furthermore, this result should follow from the general principle that circumventing activities shall have no effect.

No extension to person knowingly selling stolen goods or persons knowing that the goods have been stolen in general. When taking the criminal energy involved as a parameter, one may argue that a person who receives stolen goods in order to sell them should be put on the same level as the thief himself. However, for such a person acquisition by continuous possession after a period of at least thirty years does not seem to be a practical issue, because the goods will already be sold before that time. Eventually, the abovementioned extension of the notion of "stealing" to instigators (Comment I) may be applicable, as instigation will not necessarily have to relate to a particular asset. From the aspect of individual worthiness of protection, one may also contemplate extending the exception in paragraph (3) to any person who actually knows that the goods have been stolen. Such approach has, however, not been adopted for the following reasons: It has been a basic choice to permit acquisition of ownership by continuous possession in bad faith for the sake of general legal certainty. In order not to undermine this basic choice, exceptions should be narrow and the criminal energy involved should probably be comparable to the case of theft. This will already be doubtful in case of "mere" knowledge of a former theft. Also, if an exception were adopted for actual knowledge of the fact that the goods have been stolen, one can assume that any possessor would routinely assert that he did not know about this fact. The original owner, bearing the burden of proof as to the possessor's actual knowledge, would perhaps be induced to attempt initiating useless litigation. Rather, it will correspond to the general idea of legal certainty to bar uncertain litigation after a long period of time.

Limited-right-possessor refusing to return the goods after end of legal relationship not covered. Another question is how to treat a lessee, borrower, pledgee or custodian who intentionally refuses to return the goods after the relevant contract has ended and decides to keep them as if they were his property. Such behaviour constitutes a criminal act in many legal systems and the criminal energy involved may be considered to come close to the case of "theft" in the abovementioned sense (Comment I). However, there is a certain difference in that this dishonest person is known to its former contracting partner (paradigmatically: the owner himself), which typically makes it easier to recover the goods (if they are still there, or can be traced) or, at least, to receive compensation for the loss. Against this background, it appears justifiable to let legal certainty prevail.

Finder who keeps goods for himself. National provisions on finding usually impose certain duties on a finder of a movable property. Normally, there is a duty to hand over the goods to the person who lost them or to a competent authority, or at least to give notice to the person having suffered the loss or such competent authority that the goods have been found. The finder is often provided with certain incentives (like a finder's reward or the possibility to acquire ownership in case the owner does not claim the goods) in order to increase the owner's chances to re-obtain the lost property. It may correspond to such policies underlying the national laws on finding that a finder who does not comply with such duties but keeps the found goods for himself shall, in no circumstances, benefit from such behaviour. If so, this policy may also speak against a possibility to acquire ownership by continuous possession (after thirty years). As these model rules exclude the complex of acquisition of ownership by finding – see VIII.–1:101 (Scope of application) paragraph (2)(h) such policies have not been incorporated into these model rules. Therefore, it appears advisable to let the question of whether a finder, who intentionally keeps the goods for himself, may ultimately acquire ownership under this Chapter depend on whether this result would be compatible with the national rules on finding and the policies underlying these rules. Where, on the other hand, someone finds an object and mistakenly assumes that it is his own property, keeping the movable should of course not exclude the possibility of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession after ten or thirty years, the length of the period depending on this person's good faith or bad faith. Further, where a finder first intends to return the found goods or to hand them over to the competent authority, but then undertakes no further steps and, still, intends to keep them for the rightful owner, being willing to return the object in case the owner shows up himself, the finder cannot even be regarded as an owner-possessor. Such person will, therefore, never acquire ownership under Chapter 4.

Thief's heirs, donees and similar cases not covered. A consequential question as to the exclusion of thieves is how to treat a possessor who received the goods from the thief gratuitously, either inter vivos (by donation) or under the law of succession (the thief's heir or legatee). Evidently, one can argue that such a person has not made any counter-performance in order to obtain the goods and, therefore, should not be treated better than his predecessor. Against the background of the general aim of promoting legal certainty, however, such extension of the exception in paragraph (3) has not been adopted. Unlike in the case of a thief, these cases partly involve no criminal energy at all, or, where bad faith actually is on hand, it would become difficult to draw a well-justified line between such a case and the remaining cases of acquisition by continuous possession in bad faith.

Functionally comparable criteria in European legal systems. The exception for thieves provided for in paragraph (3) of this Article corresponds to a common approach followed in many European legal systems. The concepts, within the framework of which this result is achieved, are different though. In many countries, a thief is precluded from acquiring already by virtue of a general requirement of good faith (which, however, is presumed most frequently). In some countries, there is an explicit exception for persons who have obtained possession by a criminal act, by unlawfully depriving the former possessor of possession, or similarly. Further, many legal systems provide that possession must be "peaceful", "unequivocal", or must not have been obtained "vi, clam, precario"; cf. Comment J below. All of the mentioned prerequisites exclude, in the first place, acquisition by a thief. Of course, many of these concepts extend considerably beyond the case of theft. Also, it must be noted that establishing criteria like "peaceful", "unequivocal" or "nec vi, nec clam, nec precario" has a significant impact on the burden of proof. The owner-possessor must establish that he did not steal the goods (so that he must, e.g., provide evidence for having purchased or inherited them), whereas under the present Article, the owner must prove that the possessor obtained the goods by stealing them.

J. Requirements not adopted

General. In addition to the general prerequisites adopted in this Article, i.e. (1) owner-possession (2) exercised continuously (3) for a certain period of time while (4) good faith may be a relevant criterion (and certain exceptions for qualified bad faith apply), some legal systems set forth further requirements for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. When developing these model rules, these further requirements also had to be examined and evaluated in order to decide whether adopting them appeared useful and adequate. As the simplicity and workability of the concept may certainly suffer from including further prerequisites, the general aim was to adopt requirements only if they appear to be workable and serve a particular function. For the reasons summarised below, the following preconditions found in some legal systems have not been adopted.

Valid obligation (valid title). In a number of legal systems, acquisition of ownership by continuous possession for a short period of time is only possible if it is based on a valid obligation ("valid title") which, as such, would be suitable for an acquisition of ownership; for example, an entitlement to the transfer arising from a contract for sale, donation or barter, universal succession of an heir, or legacy. In some countries, also a "putative title" is sufficient to enjoy the benefit of being able to acquire in the shorter period. However, in almost all of these European legal systems acquisition of ownership by continuous possession is also possible without such a valid title (only that the period will be longer). Details will be reflected in the Notes. The requirement of a "valid title" goes back to Roman law (iusta causa usucapionis), where acquisition of ownership by continuous possession served an important function in enabling a valid acquisition from a non-owner to occur, because a possibility of immediate acquisition of ownership based on good faith – like the one provided for under Chapter 3 of this Book did not exist. This also shows that if this criterion was adopted (as a prerequisite for acquisition after the lapse of a "short" period, such as the ten-year period provided by paragraph (1)(a)), the basic function of such a rule would be to serve as a fall-back provision for cases where immediate good faith acquisition under Chapter 3 is impossible. The rule's scope would mainly encompass donations received from a non-owner, the acquisition of stolen goods (where not possible under Chapter 3) and would facilitate acquisition where the transferee's good faith is difficult to prove. Hence, such provision would cure (only) the transferor's lack of ownership or authority to dispose, but not any additional defects in the acquisition. Allowing a "putative title" to suffice would allow the inclusion of further situations, e.g., acquisition under an invalid contract for sale, or where erroneously an object, different to the one which has been bought, is delivered, and the transferee is in good faith.

Possible substantive functions of valid title requirement. When analysing which concrete functions the requirement of a "valid title" may serve within the framework of these model rules and whether there is any particular need to include this requirement to solve specific problems, one will see that a "putative title" does not add much to the criterion of good faith. A strict "valid title" requirement, the fulfilment of which must be proven by the possessor, on the contrary, would in fact exclude certain constellations from the scope of acquisition by continuous possession – whereby these deliberations build upon the assumption that, pursuant to the common core of the European legal systems, a "valid title" requirement would only be imposed on acquisition in the short period, not on acquisition after possession for a period of thirty years under paragraph (1)(b) of this Article: The "valid title" prerequisite would, of course, exclude acquisition by a thief – but only if this requirement were to be applied to acquisition in the "long" period of thirty years, which is, as just mentioned, not taken into closer consideration against the background of the comparative survey. Therefore, if excluding the thief is a policy within the framework of these model rules, a separate rule must be incorporated anyway; see VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (3). The same approach would have to be followed if further situations of acquisition in bad faith (irrespective of whether a "valid title" exists or not) were to be intended to be excluded. But such further exceptions, e.g. for cases where a lessee decides to keep the goods for himself, are not intended to be provided (cf. Comment I). Evidently, a "valid title" requirement would be directly relevant where a contract for the transfer of goods has actually been established, but suffers from a defect that causes its invalidity. For example, it would exclude acquisition of ownership by continuous possession (in the short period), irrespective of the buyer's good faith, in case the seller lacked capacity when concluding the contract. However, protection of persons subject to an incapacity is already achieved by special extension rules in VIII.–4:201 (Extension in case of incapacity). If, on the other hand, the contract is invalid for other reasons, such as a defect in representation, there appears to be no need to give the owner more than ten years to detect this defect and to recover the asset (this evaluation might possibly differ if a considerably shorter period was adopted). Within the present framework the "valid title" requirement would, accordingly, partly counteract existing policy decisions; and where this would not be the case, it would not add much substantive importance. It is, therefore, advisable not to adopt this requirement.

Possible impact of valid title requirement on burden of proof rule. A "valid title" requirement may, however, indirectly have a certain practical impact on the presumption of good faith provided by VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (2)(b). Where the potential acquirer must prove that a valid contract was established, this implies that he must provide evidence as to details of this agreement (such as the identity of other party to the contract, the price and the date of the agreement) and perhaps also of additional circumstances (such as the reasons which led the acquirer to assume that the seller, if the seller was a very elderly person, was nonetheless not subject to an incapacity at that time). This may, depending on the individual facts and the possessor's ability to produce evidence after the lapse of a period of at least ten years, constitute a considerable obstacle. Second, even if the possessor is able to overcome this hurdle, the necessity of disclosing more details about the circumstances of the contract's conclusion may render the possessor vulnerable when it comes to the assessment of good faith; e.g. where the validity of a contract can be proved but it emerges that the seller was a person with a questionable reputation and the price was unreasonably low, so that the acquirer should have doubted the seller's right to the goods. Such interaction may, depending on the circumstances and also depending on how much of an inquisitorial system is incorporated in the relevant civil procedure law, take the edge off the presumption of good faith to a certain degree. However, as these are rather indirect effects, and even difficult to generalise, this possible impact is not considered to be sufficient reason for incorporating a "valid title" requirement.

Public possession. A number of legal systems, apparently influenced by the French civil code, require that continuous possession must be "public". In essence, this means that the possessor does (at least) not hide the goods, or (even) possesses in a way that is transparent to "the public". The main function of such rule certainly is that the owner shall have a chance to find the object and reclaim it. However, nowadays, as far as movable assets are concerned, putting much weight on such an idea appears a little unrealistic, especially where the goods have been stolen, but also in other situations. Another difficulty in this respect is how to define "public" when it comes to applying this criterion in practical cases. E.g., what about a painting situated in a private house – should it be decisive whether or not the painting is placed in the living room, where it may be seen by guests, or in the bedroom; whether guests are invited frequently or not; or whether it can easily be seen through a window when walking past the house, etc.? In (probably most) countries, where a "public possession" requirement was adopted, it is recognised that it must be applied in accordance with the nature of the goods concerned, and that it is practically dispensed with in cases of assets, which are normally not possessed "in public" (e.g., financial instruments). A second possible function of the named requirement is closely related to good faith: Someone who hides an object seems suspicious. Substantially, however, this does not add anything important to the general good faith requirement, which is necessary for acquisition in the short period (since good faith is not only necessary when obtaining possession). Again, though, there is a practical difference with regard to the burden of proving good faith: If "public possession" is adopted as a requirement for acquisition by continuous possession, its fulfilment must be proved by the possessor. Where there is no such requirement but everything turns on the possessor's good faith as such, and the rightful owner must prove the absence of good faith, the risk of failing to provide evidence is on the owner. In this respect, a formalised concept of good faith could, in principle, help to limit the "risk" of substantially incorrect results caused by the presumption of good faith. Nevertheless, the requirement is not adopted in these model rules, by reason of its practical difficulties in application and the somewhat anachronistic underlying considerations mentioned above, as well as due to policy considerations aiming at promoting legal certainty in a comprehensive sense (as described in Comment D above), which lead to the general decision of allowing acquisition of ownership by continuous possession also in bad faith. Exceptions to this policy have been agreed on to be very restricted, being concretely limited to cases of theft in the sense of VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (3). By the way, these will be the most prominent examples of a possessor hiding the goods.

Unequivocal possession. The requirement of unequivocal, or unambiguous, possession which can be found in a handful of countries also originates from the French civil code. The traditional understanding is that there must be no doubt about the origin of the possession, or its exclusive nature. A main practical example, relating mainly to the first aspect, is that a close relative, or e.g. a secretary, of a deceased person possesses certain goods of the latter after his death and asserts that he has received them as a gift, physically handed over to him by its giver. Where, however, the basic policy decision has been to promote legal certainty also where a person possessed in bad faith for a period of thirty years, it would certainly go too far to already strictly exclude any acquisition in a case of doubt (vagueness of facts). The question, in other situations, should then rather be solved on the basis of the general prerequisites: If it in fact turns out that the goods have been stolen, the exception of VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (3) shall apply. If not, the goal of general legal certainty prevails. Another example, relating to the aspect of exclusivity of possession, is a situation of co-possession where the owner has no reason to suspect that the counter-party has changed his mind and now intends to possess "as if" being the (sole) owner. One must say that it is rather unlikely that such a constellation will persist for more than (at least) ten years. And if so, one will be able to solve such cases within the scope of the requirement of owner-possession in the sense of VIII.–1:206 (Possession by owner-possessor) which with regard to the intention to exercise physical control "as if (being) an owner", as well as regarding the factual aspect of exercising such control must be proved by the potential acquirer. Again, a separate requirement of "unequivocal" possession does not appear to be needed.

Peaceful possession. This term, which again stems from French legal tradition, is used with somewhat different meanings in the legal systems having adopted it. As far as it relates to "undisputed" possession in the sense that the rightful owner did not initiate successful legal proceedings against the possessor during the period required for acquisition, this policy is also recognised by these model rules, but formulated more directly as a rule concerning the calculation of the period only; see VIII.–4:203 (Extension and renewal in case of judicial and other proceedings). As far as it means that the possessor did not employ violence when taking possession, this aim has also been adopted, namely in VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (3). Lastly, the prerequisite of "peaceful" possession seems to be used in the sense that a possessor is expected to defend himself (in the manner typical for a normal diligent possessor) against the violence of third parties against his possession. If he does not do so, he will not possess "peacefully". In this understanding, there seems to be no need for adopting such requirement in Chapter 4. If violence exercised by a third party leads to a loss of possession (and possession is not recovered in due time in the sense of VIII.–4:103 (Continuous possession) paragraph (1)), already the fulfilment of the prerequisite of continuous owner-possession will be lacking. Where, on the other hand, the attack does not lead to (permanent) dispossession, the mere possibility that the possessor perhaps fears to seek the help of a competent authority (because he knows or assumes that he does not rightfully own the goods, and that this could be detected) should not exclude acquisition by continuous possession when there is a policy that also possession in bad faith, with the one exception of VIII.–4:101 paragraph (3), shall lead to an acquisition of ownership.

Exclusion of possession obtained by violence, secretly or precariously (nec vi, nec clam, nec precario). These criteria, going back to ancient Roman law, partly repeat what is expressed in other words as to some of the criteria dealt with above. Violent acquisition of possession in the sense of overcoming physical resistance will clearly be excluded by VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (3); the same will apply to secretly obtained possession by theft. In other situations, the level of bad faith required by the (narrow) exception of that rule will not be reached, so that the policy of legal certainty will prevail.

VIII.–4:102: Cultural objects

(1) Under this Chapter, acquisition of ownership of goods qualifying as a "cultural object" in the sense of Article 1 (1) of Council Directive 93/7/EEC, regardless of whether the cultural object has been unlawfully removed before or after 1 January 1993, or not removed from the territory of a Member State at all, requires continuous possession of the goods:

(a) for a period of 30 years, provided that the possessor, throughout the whole period, possesses in good faith; or

(b) for a period of 50 years.

(2) Member States may adopt or maintain in force more stringent provisions to ensure a higher level of protection for the owner of cultural objects in the sense of this paragraph or in the sense of national or international regulations.

COMMENTS

A. General

Policy, length of period. Cultural objects are widely considered to have a special status, involving various public interests. Based on this view, the Study Group's Co-ordinating Committee decided that with regard to cultural objects, acquisition of ownership by continuous possession should be allowed only subject to the fulfilment of stricter preconditions, no difference being made as to whether the case is a merely domestic one, one involving an unlawful removal from a state's territory, or whether any other element of fundamental injustice (such as expropriation out of racial motivation) is involved. This special protection for owners of cultural objects is achieved by extending the qualifying periods to 30 years for acquisition in good faith and to 50 years for acquisition in bad faith. The other policy considerations, in principle, remain the same as discussed in the Comments on VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule), but the owner's interest in keeping the goods is additionally restrained by public interests in those goods (e.g. in making these goods accessible to everyone in a museum, or in preserving the object for the purpose of scientific research, etc.).

Legal framework and purpose of this Article. As will be shown in more detail in the following Comments and in the Notes, there exist various further rules in the national legal systems, incorporating Council Directive 93/7/EEC but being also partly based on international conventions that intend to govern only cases of an international character (UNIDROIT Convention on Stolen or Illegally Exported Cultural Objects 1995; UNESCO Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the Illicit Import, Export and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property 1970). But not all EU Member States are party to these conventions, and, partly, these conventions allow the national provisions prevail. For this reason, it would be a difficult task, involving complex political impacts, to create genuinely uniform rules on the acquisition of cultural objects by continuous possession. Since the regimes on time limits imposed by these instruments are quite different and partly leave it up to the member states to impose even longer time limits and, as mentioned above, by far not all EU Member States have ratified the named Conventions, it would also be practically impossible to adopt just the time limit regime of, e.g., the UNIDROIT Convention, that is to apply to cases of acquisition of ownership under the present Article, without potentially ignoring fundamental standards existent in some of the Member States. Also, these time limits are rather phrased in terms of prescription rules, i.e. limiting the owner's or other requesting party's right, which is a concept quite different to the possession-based one used in this Chapter. Against this background, this Article only establishes a system of minimum standard protection and leaves other rules untouched, which provide a higher standard of protection to the owner of a cultural object.

B. Definition of cultural objects in the sense of paragraph (1)

General. Developing an overall suitable definition of the term "cultural object" is particularly difficult. This is already clear from a comparison between the definitions employed by international and EC instruments, which are summarised below. The definition used in this Article should, in any case, coincide with one of the definitions already existing in international or EC regulations. There is seen to be no sense in reinventing the wheel and introducing a further model. Accordingly, there are basically three possibilities, the first providing a more narrow, but clearly-shaped definition, the second providing a rather broad definition, and the third being a combination of these two.

The chosen option: definition of Council Directive 93/7/EEC. This Article adopts the definition provided in Article 1 (1) Council Directive 93/7/EEC. This definition is the narrowest one, but it has the advantage of serving legal predictability much better than the UNESCO Convention discussed below. The definition of the Directive contains two main prerequisites: First, in order to qualify as a "cultural object" it must be classified as being among the "national treasures possessing artistic, historic or archaeological value", as determined by national legislation or administrative procedures. Second, the goods must either form an integral part of a public collection listed in the inventories of a museum or similar institution, or an integral part of the inventories of ecclesiastical institutions; or the object must fall under certain categories listed in an Annex to the Directive. This Annex imposes certain minimum-age requirements on the various categories (e.g. 50 years for pictures, 100 years for books), that partly also have to exceed a particular value (listed in the Annex to this Directive, e.g. 150.000 ECU for pictures). Furthermore, these categories are much narrower than those of the UNESCO and the UNIDROIT Convention.

Irrelevance of removal from territory, irrelevance of date. In addition to the definition provided by Article 1 (1) Council Directive 93/7/EEC, paragraph (1) of this Article clarifies that it is immaterial "whether the object has been unlawfully removed before or after 1 January 1993, or not removed from the territory of a Member State at all". This clarification has been included because of Article 13 of the Directive, which states that the Directive shall apply only to cultural objects unlawfully removed from the territory of a Member State on or after 1 January 1993. For the purposes of Chapter 4 of this Book, however, it is only decisive that the object fulfils certain qualitative requirements, as outlined above. Any removal or non-removal from the territory of a Member State, as well as any aspect of time is irrelevant.

Policy underlying this choice. The policy of proposing this definition is to provide as much legal certainty as possible, which is achieved, in particular, by the classification requirement, but also by the second requirement of either being registered in certain inventories or forming part of a rather clearly and narrowly defined list of categories.

Alternative option: definition of the UNIDROIT Convention 1995. A second hypothetical alternative would be adopting the definition contained in the 1995 UNIDROIT Convention on Stolen and Illegally Exported Cultural Objects. This definition is, to a large extent, similar to the definition used in the 1970 UNESCO Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the Illicit Import, Export and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property.

Contrary to the UNESCO Convention, the UNIDROIT Convention does not include a requirement of designation by a competent authority of the relevant state. This definition, which is cited in the Notes, is a rather wide one. In particular, there is no requirement of "classification" by a competent authority, nor must the goods be registered in certain inventories. The relevant categories listed in the Annex to the UNIDROIT Convention are much broader, and no limits as to value are included. This alternative could have the advantage of a much broader protection of cultural objects. Furthermore, the UNIDROIT Convention is the instrument most closely related to acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. But, evidently, it lacks legal certainty, for which reason the definition of Council Directive 93/7/EEC is to be preferred.

Alternative option: definition of the UNESCO Convention 1970. A midway solution could be to follow the definition of the UNESCO Convention, which is, in principle, the same as used by the UNIDROIT Convention, but, additionally, requires a specific act of designation by the relevant state. For the reasons already mentioned, however, the definition of Council Directive 93/7/EEC is to be preferred.

C. Relation to other rules of law

Minimum standard of protection for owners of cultural objects. As paragraph (2) of this Article spells out explicitly, the permission of acquisition of ownership of cultural objects after an extended period of continuous possession shall be without prejudice to the applicability of other rules of law providing for a higher standard of protection for owners of cultural objects. It is also stated explicitly that the higher level of protection permissible under paragraph (2) includes protection effected by the adoption of a wider definition of the term "cultural object" itself. Such higher level of protection may be provided by genuine, non-harmonised national law (which could, for instance, exclude the possibility of the acquisition of ownership of cultural objects by continuous possession from the outset, or make it dependent on the fulfilment of additional stricter preconditions). For certain situations, a higher level of protection has, as to their practical effects, already been established by those national provisions implementing Council Directive 93/7/EEC. Although it will not be the owner of the object, but the Member State from whose territory the object has been unlawfully removed, who has a right to the return of the object under that Directive, it may theoretically happen that such a request is lawfully made after the period for acquisition under the present Article has already elapsed: Article 7 of the Directive provides a one-year time period, the running of which commences with the requesting Member State's becoming aware of the location of the cultural object and the identity of its "possessor" or "holder". In addition, there is an absolute thirty-year time period, starting to run as from the moment in time of the object's unlawful removal from the requesting Member State's territory. This time limit is, however, not applicable to objects forming part of certain public collections and ecclesiastical goods, in which cases proceedings may be initiated at least up to 75 years since the unlawful removal. However, the possessor is entitled to fair compensation provided that he exercised due care and attention in acquiring the object. Further, a higher level of protection may be, and partly is already, provided by national regulations implementing the named Conventions prepared by UNIDROIT and UNESCO, respectively. It is immaterial whether such rules already exist or are adopted in future.

Protection under the international Conventions in particular. Apart from the named Directive, above all the 1995 UNIDROIT Convention provides for special rules for the restitution or return of stolen or illegally exported cultural objects in situations of an international character (the 1970 UNESCO Convention aims at preventing the illicit import, export and transfer of ownership of cultural property more indirectly and does not directly provide any private law means, or other means directed at the return of such goods). The UNIDROIT Convention establishes separate sets of rules for "stolen" and "illegally exported" cultural objects, both differing from each other, basically with regard to the person or entity entitled to make the claim or request, and with regard to the regime of time limits applicable (partly allowing the Contracting States to retain longer periods possibly provided for in their laws). Details are provided in the Notes on this Article. In both cases, the possessor of the cultural object is entitled to payment of fair and reasonable compensation, provided that he was in good faith in the sense that he neither knew nor ought reasonably to have known that the object was stolen, or, at the time of acquisition, that the object had been illegally exported.

Interaction of this Article and the 1995 UNIDROIT Convention in particular. Since the rules of the UNIDROIT Convention are the most relevant in the context of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession because of their partial private law character, the interaction of these rules provided that there is a case of an international character falling within the scope of applicability of the Convention is on hand with those proposed ones under the present Book VIII shall be described briefly in the following. The main effect can be summarised in the observation that the possessor of a cultural object enjoys continuously increasing protection with the lapse of time: Before the qualifying period for acquisition of ownership under VIII.–4:102 (Cultural objects) elapses, the possessor must return the goods to their owner under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) without being entitled to receive any compensation (except for what he may be entitled to under VIII.–7:104 (Expenditure on, or parts added to, the goods during possession)). If the qualifying period for acquisition of ownership under VIII.–4:102 has already elapsed so that the possessor has already acquired ownership under this Article – but the time limits imposed by the Convention have not, the possessor (i.e. the new owner) must return the goods. He is, however, entitled to compensation under the rules imposed by the Convention, provided that he is in good faith in the abovementioned sense. After also the time limits of the Convention (or the longer time limits imposed by national law, as permitted by the Convention) have expired, the possessor (who has acquired under the present Chapter 4) may keep the object.

VIII.–4:103: Continuous possession

(1) Involuntary loss of possession does not exclude continuous possession for the purpose of VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule), provided that possession is recovered within one year or an action which leads to such recovery is instituted within one year.

(2) Where the owner-possessor is in possession of the goods at the beginning and at the end of the period there is a presumption of continuous possession for the whole period.

COMMENTS

A. Paragraph (1)

General. In principle, acquisition of ownership under Chapter 4 requires continuous possession throughout the whole period; see VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1). Physical control over the goods may be exercised by the owner-possessor himself or for him by means of another person, see VIII.–4:101 Comment F. If the possessor gives up owner-possession voluntarily, e.g. by transferring possession to another person (such as a buyer) or by abandoning the goods, there evidently is no possibility (and no need to) acquire ownership under this Chapter. According to the general prerequisites set out in this Chapter, the same would (if the present Article did not exist) also apply where possession is lost involuntarily.

Involuntary loss of possession. Paragraph (1) of this Article provides for an exception to the abovementioned principle. If the owner-possessor involuntarily loses possession, but recovers it within one year or institutes an action within one year which leads to such recovery, the interruption of possession will not be taken into account for the purposes of acquisition under Chapter 4. This means that the time that will have elapsed until the recovery of possession will, under the named prerequisites, be counted for the period of "continuous possession" required under VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule), or VIII.–4:102 (Cultural objects), as the case may be. In other words, the time in which the potential acquirer lacked possession is treated as if he had exercised possession continuously. A comparable rule can be found in most of the European legal systems. In the great majority of legal systems, as in paragraph (1) of this Article, the period for re-obtaining possession is one year. This period corresponds with the period of VIII.–6:203 (Entitlement to recover as protection of mere possession), which provides for a possessor's right to recover the goods from another person who unlawfully deprived the possessor of possession, irrespective of who has the better right to the goods. The synchronisation of these two rules makes sense, as unlawful dispossession by a third person will be the main practical example for applying the fiction provided by paragraph (1) of this Article. However, the possessor is of course not restricted to this particular remedy. The term "action" is intended to address any judicial or administrative proceedings or act directed at the recovery of possession. These courses of action are equated with recovering possession by the possessor himself, because people should, for evident reasons, not be prevented from making use of the competent public authorities. For that reason, the point in time of the institution of the action is relevant for the one-year period. Then, the proceedings may well last longer than one year as from the loss of possession. It is only decisive that they lead to the recovery of the goods, so that the possessor can subsequently continue to exercise possession.

Justification; impact on owner and third parties. Paragraph (1) appears justified, apart from serving the interests of the owner-possessor himself, since from the perspective of third parties the possessor reacts in the way any rightful title-holder is expected to act. From the aspect of legal certainty, there is therefore no need to require the anew starting of the period; rather, the contrary is the case. With regard to the interests of the owner, the possessor's loss of possession is of rather fortuitous, or neutral, character. If, and this seems to be the only exception, it is the rightful owner who (unlawfully) dispossesses the owner-possessor in the "last minute" (in order to avoid the latter's acquisition of ownership under Chapter 4), the owner may defend himself against the possessor's claim under VIII.–6:203 (Entitlement to recover as protection of mere possession) by resorting to paragraph (4) of that Article in order to prevent the possessor from recovering the goods. Any kind of claim or counterclaim brought by the owner in such proceedings will, in addition, trigger a suspension of the period under VIII.–4:203 (Extension and renewal in case of judicial and other proceedings).

B. Paragraph (2)

Presumption of continuous possession. Especially with regard to movable property, providing evidence that possession has been exercised every day over a period of ten or even thirty years may obviously create considerable difficulties. Paragraph (2) facilitates the proving of possession by the owner-possessor throughout the whole qualifying period for acquisition of ownership. If he can prove that he held the goods in the capacity of an owner-possessor at the beginning and at the end of the period, there is a rebuttable presumption that he possessed continuously throughout the whole period. It is, then, up to the owner to prove that possession was interrupted (for a longer period than permitted by paragraph (1)). A comparable rule is provided for in many, but not all, European legal systems.

Section 2: Additional provisions as to the period required for acquisition of ownership

VIII.–4:201: Extension in case of incapacity

(1) If an owner who is subject to an incapacity is without a representative when the period required for the acquisition of ownership by another by continuous possession would begin to run, the commencement of the period against that person is suspended until either the incapacity has ended or a representative has been appointed.

(2) If the running of the period has already begun before incapacity occurred, the period does not expire before one year has passed after either incapacity has ended or a representative has been appointed.

(3) The running of the period is suspended where the owner is a person subject to an incapacity and the owner-possessor is that person's representative, as long as this relationship lasts. The period does not expire before one year has passed after either the incapacity has ended or a new representative has been appointed.

COMMENTS

A. Terminology in Section 2

General. Most of the rules contained in this Section, namely VIII.–4:201 (Extension in case of incapacity) to VIII.–4:205 (Ending of period in case of acknowledgement) deal with the extension or renewal (interruption) of the qualifying period for acquisition of ownership. Book III Chapter 7 (Sections 3 and 4) contains similar provisions for the prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation. For the sake of consistency, the terminology of the present Section 2 follows the terminology employed in Book III. For more details, see III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance) Comment A.

Extension of period. "Extension" appears in two sub-forms: "suspension" and "postponement of expiry". They have in common that the time elapsed so far, i.e. before the relevant ground of extension arises, is still added to the qualifying period for acquisition of ownership.

Suspension of period. "Suspension" has the effect that the period, during which the ground for suspension exists, is not accounted for in calculating the qualifying period for acquisition of ownership. When the cause of suspension ends, the old period for acquisition of ownership continues to run. Where the period has not even started to run before the ground for suspension occurred, the period only starts to run after the cause of suspension has ended.

Postponement of expiry. Where a "postponement of expiry" is provided for, the qualifying period for acquisition of ownership continues to run while the ground for postponement exists, but only elapses after the expiry of a certain extra period of time.

Renewal of period. "Renewal" of the qualifying period for acquisition of ownership means that the time elapsed so far is not taken into account at all: the period begins to run anew (provided that the possessor continues to hold the goods as an owner-possessor). Civil law systems usually call this effect an "interruption" of the period. Book III Chapter 7 prefers the term "renewal", which is followed for reasons of terminological consistency.

B. Coherence with Book III Chapter 7 on the prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation

General approach. As to terminology and structure, the rules of Section 2 follow the named provisions of Book III Chapter 7 as much as possible for the purpose of coherency. As to content, however, the rules of the present Section are based on an independent analysis of the interests involved. This analysis shows that there are, in fact, differences to be observed in a couple of instances. For this reason, solving the issues addressed in the present Section 2 by way of a general reference to the provisions on prescription in Book III (as can be found in a number of legal systems) was regarded as inappropriate. Rather, each area shall be dealt with in accordance with its own underlying considerations. This is also intended to be seen as an advice given to legislative bodies. The current experience in legal systems, which apply the same set of suspension and renewal rules both to prescription and (where existent) acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, often is that the main focus in the discourse clearly lies on the area of prescription, whereby, usually unintentionally, peculiarities arising only in the context of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession are sometimes concealed.

Criteria not adopted. Some criteria triggering an extension or a renewal of the period under Book III Chapter 7 or in some European legal systems have not been adopted in the following rules of Section 2. These instances are, however, partly discussed in the Comments on the subsequent Articles. For instance, this Chapter does not adopt a rule comparable to III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance), see VIII.–4:202 (Extension in case of impediment beyond owner's control) Comment B. Also, there is no equivalent to III.–7:306 (Postponement of expiry: deceased's estate). As to the situations addressed by III.–7:402 (Renewal by attempted execution), see VIII.–4:203 (Extension and renewal in case of judicial and other proceedings) Comment F. As to acquisition by continuous possession between spouses, other family members or household members in general, see VIII.–4:201 (Extension in case of incapacity) Comments F-H.

C. Terminology relating to incapacity

Incapacity. Incapacity in the sense of this Article covers situations where a person, due to this person's mental condition, is unable to take care of his legal interests sufficiently. The paradigmatic example is a minor, i.e. a person under a certain age (often 18 years). These model rules do not deal with the question at which age minority in that sense ends. This is, therefore, intended to be decided by the respective rules of national law. Other examples of persons subject to an incapacity are persons suffering a mental illness, elderly people with a deteriorated state of mind due to age, or victims of accidents lying in a coma. The same notion of "person subject to an incapacity" is used in III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity). As to the practical relevance of this Article, if one can suppose that minors will in many countries be automatically represented by their parents, or one of them, the main focus of at least paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article may in the first place be elderly people and persons suffering a mental handicap or illness. Paragraph (3) may also be of relevance in relation to minors.

Representative. The European legal systems seem to provide rather different concepts of "legal representative". The term is not defined more closely in the text of this Article. Again, it is the same as in III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity) and the applicable national law will step in. Depending on the applicable law, the "representative" may be the parent(s) of the minor, a legal guardian or other type of representative. Where the text of the Article and the following Comments refer to the fact that a representative is "appointed", this is intended to be understood in a broad sense, including a formal appointment made by a court or other competent public authority, as well as an "automatic appointment" provided for by law, e.g. where national law states that the parents are the legal representatives of their child. With regard to cases other than those concerning minors, regard should be had to the fact that under (at least) some national legal systems, a representative is not necessarily appointed to manage all legal affairs of the person subject to the incapacity, but the appointment may be restricted to the purpose of managing only some kinds or particularly defined legal affairs. In such a case, the application of this Article will very much depend on whether the protection of the person's interests against losing ownership of goods by way of another's acquisition by continuous possession falls within the scope of the representative's appointment. If not, the person subject to the incapacity is to be treated as "without representative" for the purposes of this Article. Further, national law may provide that legal incapacity is deemed to continue for the duration of the appointment of a representative, even if the person's state of mind has meanwhile improved. Any rule of that or similar kind is intended to be respected by this Chapter.

Terminology: extension, suspension and postponement of expiry. As to these notions, see Comment A. The headline uses "extension" as a collective term for "suspension" and "postponement of expiry".

D. Basic policy decision: no, medium or even "strict" relevance of incapacity

Main options. The first basic question is whether acquisition of ownership by continuous possession to the detriment of a person subject to an incapacity should (a) be possible without any further restrictions at all, even where the person subject to the incapacity has no representative; (b) be possible in principle, but only subject to the fulfilment of additional preconditions, which aim at protecting that person's interests; or (c) be excluded from the outset, even if there is a legal representative to take care of the legal affairs of the person lacking legal capacity. All three options actually exist in the European legal systems, the latter (c), however, being regarded rather critically nowadays in the countries which have adopted it (i.e. France and Belgium, where the running of the period is suspended for as long as incapacity lasts).

Preferred solution: appointment of representative decisive criterion. In perhaps most of the European legal systems, acquisition of ownership by continuous possession to the detriment of a person subject to an incapacity is permitted, provided that a legal representative exists. This Article adopts this general approach, which, by the way, is also taken in III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity). The underlying considerations basically are that option (c) considerably runs against the interest of legal certainty (from the possessor's as well as from the general public's perspective) without any urgent need for such protection. Typically, one may presume that representatives take care of their children's (or clients') legal affairs with due diligence. Option (a), on the other hand, is rejected on the ground that a person subject to an incapacity deserves special protection in the present context, since otherwise, e.g., defects arising from the contract's invalidity due to incapacity could easily be "cured" by the lapse of time, even if they are clearly to the disadvantage of that person. Option (a) could even operate as a certain incentive to damnify persons lacking legal capacity, especially elderly people, by concluding disadvantageous contracts with them, which obviously runs against the fundamental principle of solidarity and social responsibility. Also, in certain situations where possession of goods has been lost it may be necessary to undertake investigations, which may ask too much of a person subject to an incapacity. The preferred option (b), however, appears to provide a suitable compromise between the two policies of individual protection of persons lacking legal capacity on the one hand, and legal certainty on the other hand.

Situations for which regulation appears necessary. Pursuant to the policy considerations outlined above, this Article regulates (only) the "remaining cases", i.e. those where no representative has been appointed when the period would begin to run (paragraph (1)); where the lack of capacity occurs only after the qualifying period for acquisition of ownership has begun to run (paragraph (2)); and where the representative himself is the potential acquirer by continuous possession (paragraph 3)).

E. Suspension in case of initial lack of capacity, paragraph (1)

General; decisive moment in time. Paragraph (1) addresses the situation where an owner subject to an incapacity has no representative at the moment when the period for the acquisition by continuous possession would start to run (if no suspension was provided for). The decisive aspect for the application of this rule is, therefore, the owner's incapacity at the moment when the owner-possessor obtained possession; possibly, when the first predecessor in the sense of VIII.–4:206 (Period of a predecessor to be taken into account) obtained possession. This will often converge, or roughly converge, with the moment when the owner himself lost possession (such as where goods are transferred in performance of an invalid contract).

Purpose of the suspension rule (as opposed to postponement of expiry). The rule builds upon the general idea that the point in time when possession is lost by the owner subject to the incapacity, and the immediate period of time thereafter, will usually be particularly critical with regard to the risk of ultimately losing the right to the object. In order not to lose, or to recover the goods, the owner first has to detect that something goes, or already went, wrong. Regaining possession may require undertaking investigations, or requesting help from other people, institutions or authorities, to find out where the goods are located. It may be necessary to secure evidence, or to look for legal advice. A person subject to an incapacity may typically not only be overburdened with the appropriate taking care of his legally relevant interests when such a situation is on hand. In addition, that person's inactivity (or inefficient activity) at that time may make it much more difficult for a legal representative, who is appointed at a later point in time, to get an overview of the facts. There may be even greater difficulties in gathering evidence and the chance to recover the goods may be reduced considerably. The legal system, from a standardised perspective, must even face the possibility that no progress has been made with respect to recovering the property as long as its owner who is subject to an incapacity is left on his own. It is, therefore, suggested that the effect of a rule governing these situations be a suspension of the period for acquisition, meaning that the person's representative, when appointed later, or the person himself after regaining legal capacity, can take advantage of the full limitation period to re-obtain the goods. This, deliberately, is a stricter effect than the postponement of expiry provided for by paragraph (2), where the owner initially had legal capacity and, therefore, was able to react himself in the first place. (The practical need for a suspension rule in the situations covered by paragraph (1) would, however, be clearly more urgent if the period for acquisition was shorter than it actually is under these model rules; e.g. if the period for acquisition in good faith was only three years).

It cannot be denied that this choice gives the owner's interests priority over the general interests of legal certainty, since the total period necessary to acquire by continuous possession may be extended for years. This is, however, considered appropriate in view of the general idea that an expropriation effect, as achieved by acquisition by continuous possession, should be considered as an exception, and be imposed only under the precondition that the affected party had or has a realistic chance to protect its interests. The suspension effect also coincides with the majority approach adopted in those legal systems which provide for protection by way of extending the period for acquisition in the case of the owner's incapacity.

Illustration 1
O, an elderly woman, living on her own with few social contacts and no relatives taking care of her, owns a set of precious old sterling cutlery. Her neighbour N looks after her from time to time and helps her with shopping etc. Occasionally, N's daughter D, who meanwhile lives in another city helps out when visiting her parents. One day, after O's state of mind has deteriorated to such degree that lack of legal capacity is on hand, D discovers O's cutlery, persuades O to sell it for a price considerably lower than its actual value and takes possession of the goods. No one else obtains knowledge of this incident. Two months later, on the occasion of the wedding of her niece P, D gives the cutlery as a gift to P, who is in good faith. Only eight years later, after O had to move to an old people's home, a legal representative is appointed. She dies after another five years, i.e. thirteen years after P had taken possession in good faith. Only after O's death, her relatives detect that the valuable sterling cutlery, which had been owned by the family for generations, is missing. Suppose the contract between O and D was void for O's lack of capacity. Has P acquired ownership by having possessed the cutlery in good faith for more than ten years?

Under VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule), the period for acquisition would begin to run upon P's taking possession of the goods (the period of D being in possession before transferring to P is not taken into account for acquisition after the lapse of a period of ten years; see VIII.–4:206 (Period of a predecessor to be taken into account) paragraph (2)). If the present Article only provided for a postponement of expiry in the situations covered by its paragraph (1), the period for acquisition would already have elapsed in favour of P, since a representative was appointed only after the lapse of eight years. However, since O had been unable to take care of her interests already from the beginning (when selling to D in a state of incapacity) and the legal representative did not even know of the existence of these precious items in the first place, clarifying the relevant facts and regaining the property would have been a difficult task to fulfil, and would not have been possible in the present example. However, since paragraph (1) of this Article establishes a suspension rule for cases like this, the period for acquisition only starts to run after the lapse of the first eight years. Accordingly, the new owners (O's heirs) still have at least a chance to reconstruct the occurrences and recover the property.

Differences to III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity). There are basically two differences between the concept adopted in the present Article and the one in the corresponding rule on the prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation. First, III.–7:305 does not provide for a suspension of the period, only for a postponement of expiry for an additional period of one year after a legal representative has been appointed or after the incapacity has ended. Apart from a certain indication in the comparative survey, the main reason for establishing a different solution in Book VIII lies in the reason that the risks of losing ownership of a tangible movable asset typically seem to be higher and more diversified than the risk of "losing" a right to the performance of an obligation, which is directed only against one debtor. Whereas it is usually clear who the debtor of an obligation is (and if not, III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance) will apply to the advantage of the creditor), it may be extremely difficult for the owner (or his representative, after having been appointed) to investigate who is in possession of the owner's goods. It is therefore considered that the aspect of having lacked capacity in a very critical phase, i.e. between the owner's loss of possession and the possessor obtaining control, may carry more weight in the context of the present Chapter. The second difference to III.–7:305 is that the suspension effect does not work "in both directions" but only in favour of the owner lacking capacity. There appears to be no reason why an owner-possessor lacking capacity should acquire by continuous possession only after the lapse of a longer period of time. The same observation applies to paragraph (2) of this Article.

End of suspension. The suspension effect provided by this paragraph persists until a legal representative is appointed; alternatively, until the incapacity ends (by reaching the age of majority, or, in case of mental illnesses etc., until this illness has been cured).

F. Postponement of expiry in case of subsequent lack of capacity, paragraph (2)

General. Paragraph (2) applies where the owner of the goods had legal capacity "in the first phase", i.e. when the period for acquisition started to run in favour of the possessor, but lacks legal capacity at a later point in time. In such a situation, many European legal systems also protect the owner by an extension of the period for acquisition of ownership. As to the kind of such extension, variations can be observed. Some legal systems provide for a suspension of the period, others a postponement of expiry. As to the parallel question relating to the prescription of the right to the performance of an obligation, III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity) paragraph (1) provides for a postponement of expiry with an extra period of one year after either capacity has ended or a representative has been appointed. The same approach is adopted in the present VIII.–4:201 (Extension in case of incapacity) paragraph (2). This means that when such "subsequent" incapacity occurs, the period for acquisition, in principle, continues to run. The possessor can, however, not acquire ownership by continuous possession as long as the owner's incapacity has not ended and the owner is without a legal representative. Additionally to the requirement of expiration of the relevant period of ten or thirty years, at least one year must have elapsed as from the point in time when either the owner regained legal capacity or a representative was appointed. Depending on when this is the case, the total period necessary for the possessor's acquisition may exceed the standard period of ten or thirty years, or no extra time will be needed for the possessor to acquire.

Illustration 2
Owner O had legal capacity when valuable jewels were stolen from her house, which subsequently were (privately) sold to Lady P who henceforth possessed them in good faith, trusting in (well-faked) documents presented by the seller. Eight years later, O becomes subject to an incapacity due to gradually increasing dementia and a legal representative is appointed after another one and a half years, i.e. after a total time of nine and a half years of P possessing in good faith. Shortly thereafter, Lady P wears the jewels on the occasion of visiting an opera premiere at the Salzburg Summer Festivals. A photo of her appears in the yellow press and friends of O believe to recognise the jewels. Under paragraph (2) of this Article, O's representative will have one year as from his appointment to reclaim the property from Lady P. In other words,

P would acquire ownership of the goods only after ten and a half years of having them in her possession.

Illustration 3
Same facts as in Illustration 2, but O's representative is appointed already after eight and a half years after P taking possession. Here, the postponement of expiry rule does not cause an extension of the total period of ten years, as already one and a half years have passed since the representative's appointment when the ten-year period for the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession expires.

Purpose of the postponement of expiry rule (as opposed to suspension). In the situations covered by paragraph (2), the owner had legal capacity initially, i.e. when he himself lost possession and the owner-possessor obtained possession. He typically had, therefore, some time to attempt to re-obtain the goods, to undertake investigations and to inform the competent authorities, if regarded as necessary. Although the fact that incapacity occurs at some later stage is considered to require some means of legal protection, it is at least more likely than under the situations covered by paragraph (1) of this Article that the owner has at least noticed that something went wrong and reasonable steps have already been taken, which may also provide a much better basis for additional attempts to be undertaken by the representative, after having been appointed, or by the owner himself, after the incapacity has ended. What appears to be needed, for a representative just having been appointed or the owner himself, after having regained capacity, is to have some time before the expiration of the period for acquisition, in order to get an overview of the person's legal affairs, and to take adequate measures for the recovery of the goods. A postponement of expiry rule granting an additional period as from the representative's appointment, or the end of the incapacity, respectively, seems perfectly apt to serve these functions, while at the same time interfering with the general goal of legal certainty as little as necessary. Paragraph (2) suggests a one-year period before expiry, which corresponds to the one-year period under III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity) paragraph (1). This may also be seen as a compromise on length against the background of the comparative survey, e.g. Germany providing a six-month period whereas Austria provides a two-years period. Regarding the situations covered by paragraph (2) of this Article, it should also be mentioned that under specific circumstances, a suspension rule would be even riskier for the owner than the postponement of expiry rule provided by the present Article. This may be the case where the lack of legal capacity occurs only shortly before the period would expire. In that case, a representative might have very little, perhaps too little, time to react in time after having been appointed. Under the present paragraph (2), there always is at least one year to do so. Taking into account the long periods of ten and thirty years established under these model rules, this aspect, however, is only of rather little weight in justifying the proposed solution.

Possibility of restrictive interpretation regarding very short periods of incapacity. There are situations where a person lacks legal capacity only for a very short period of time, e.g. where a person is put under anaesthetic for a couple of hours in order to undertake a medical operation, or where a person lacks capacity only as a result of having consumed too much alcohol or drugs. Where such an event happened within the last year of the period for acquisition, the "automatic" granting of another year as from the time of this event would appear inappropriate in the light of the policy of this rule. In such situations, granting a minimum one-year period for obtaining an overview of that person's legal affairs is not needed. The person having been subject to such short-term incapacity can, so to say, continue the situation that was interrupted a few hours before. Accordingly, paragraph (2) shall not be applicable in such situations. This result is intended to be achieved by a restrictive interpretation of paragraph (2) in accordance with the policy underlying this paragraph. The effect is not reflected in the text of the present Article itself, as developing an adequate formula appeared to be impossible or would, like providing for an extension for a "reasonable time" after incapacity has ended, bear the risk of considerably hampering legal certainty. Depending on the circumstances, applying paragraph (2) in the light of its policy may either lead to granting the full one-year period before expiry or not.

Illustration 4
O must undergo a medical operation which involves being put under anaesthetic for five hours when P, who is in good faith, has possessed goods owned by O for already for nine years and ten months. Although O will be "subject to an incapacity" for five hours, the expiry of the (ten-year) period for acquisition shall not be postponed under paragraph (2) of this Article. Paragraph (2) is not to be applied in this situation in accordance with its underlying policy considerations, which justify the granting of an extra period (only) where there might be a need for obtaining a (new) overview regarding that person's legal affairs.

G. Owner-possessor himself is representative, paragraph (3)

Policy. The representative of a person subject to an incapacity must act in that person's interest. The idea that the representative may acquire the property of the person subject to an incapacity by continuous possession would not fit to this special relationship, but would rather constitute a paradigmatic conflict of interests. Accordingly, acquisition by the representative himself should be impeded (whereas full exclusion would arguably overshoot the mark with regard to general goal of legal certainty). The same policy is, in principle, followed by the parallel provision in III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity) paragraph (2). In contrast to that rule, however, also paragraph (3) of the present Article does not operate "in both directions". Only the owner subject to the incapacity is protected against losing his right. Regarding the opposite situation, namely the person subject to the incapacity acquiring the representative's goods, there are no restrictions comparable to the general rules. Compare also Comment H below.

Sentence 1. According to the named policy, the first sentence of paragraph (3) regulates that the period for acquisition of ownership does not run as long as the relationship of representation subsists. This suggestion goes further than the respective rule in III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity) paragraph (2), which only provides for a postponement of expiry for an additional period of one year. However, the approach suggested here seems justified due to the idea that, as long as the respective relationship lasts, the representative must let the interests of the person subject to the incapacity prevail over his own interests.

Sentence 2. The rule in sentence 2 supplements sentence 1 to cover such cases where the period for acquisition of ownership has already elapsed to a large extent when the representative is appointed and, therefore, will completely elapse very soon after the appointment or regaining of capacity. Here, the person formerly having been subject to the incapacity, or the new representative, respectively, shall be granted some extra time to investigate the relationship with the former representative. III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity) paragraph (2) achieves the same effect (the postponement rule however being the general one there).

H. Other cases of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession within the family

General. The situation addressed by paragraph (3) of this Article and the related Comment G above may occur in a family relation (between minor and parent) or outside such a relation. Taking into account the comparative survey, there is reason to analyse whether an extension of the period for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession should also be provided with regard to other situations which may occur in family relations, or similar situations where the owner and the potential acquirer live in the same household. These situations are discussed in the subsequent Comments H to J. In the end, however, no such additional rule is proposed to be adopted. Though, some situations can seemingly be solved sufficiently adequately by applying this Article or other provisions of these model rules, which will be discussed in the relevant context below.

Acquisition between minor brothers and sisters. According to an approach taken in some European legal systems, children represented by the same person (e.g. their parents) cannot acquire by continuous possession from each other because, due to a potential conflict of interests, they are regarded as non-represented in that respect. Provided that such an analysis is also to be arrived at under these model rules, the named situations could be covered by VIII.–4:201 (Extension in case of incapacity) paragraph (1): Then, the period for acquisition of ownership would begin to run only when, for one of the children, a different representative has been appointed or when one of them has attained the age of majority. Where the children have originally had different representatives (which may apply in patchwork-family constellations), paragraph (2) of this Article could be applied. An additional rule would not be necessary. Arguably, the result described above can be achieved within the framework of these model rules. There is, however, no provision directly spelling out that two principals being represented by the same person are automatically to be regarded as being unrepresented when a conflict of interests occurs. Rather, II.–6:109 (Conflict of interests) paragraphs (1) and (2)(a) provide that where one person acts as a representative both for the (one) principal and the third party, the principal(s) have a right to avoid the contract under the precondition that the other party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the conflict of interests. Evidently, this solution cannot be applied literally to the situation of acquisition of ownership between brothers and sisters: Most often, there will be no contract between the two which could be avoided, but also if one applies the underlying idea on a more general level, namely that the potentially disadvantaged party should take the initiative to protect his interests, the conflict cannot be resolved. Since both children lack capacity, they could not be expected to take any initiative protecting their interests, due to their very lack of capacity, without, again, being represented by their legal representative. Functionally, this equals both persons being subject to an incapacity due to non-representation. It is, therefore, intended that the situations addressed here are solved, in the manner described above, by application of VIII.–4:201. In addition, where children live in the same household, it may be practically difficult to establish the requirement of (sole) owner-possession in a sufficiently clear way (see also Comment H below for a similar problem between spouses). This difficulty may impede acquisition by continuous possession even where the problem of double representation does not exist (or does not exist any longer).

Minor's acquisition against the representative. Another situation is that a child possesses goods belonging to one of the parents as, or as if the goods were, his own property. The child may, for instance, erroneously believe that an item, e.g. a TV-set, stereo equipment or computer placed in the child's room, has been transferred to him by donation, whereas the parent just intended to allow the child to use the goods, not intending to alienate the property.

It is, however, not considered that the parents require particular additional protection in such situations. They can take care of their interests themselves, and taking into account the rather long periods for acquisition of ownership, the practical relevance of the issue appears to be rather limited in general. It may be added that the hypothetical argument of a need to "maintain the peace in the family" is regarded to be rather week in a context like this (cf. Comment I below). All the parent needs to do is to say something like "you know it's mine", and the child will usually either acknowledge the parent's right or be in bad faith from that day on, so that the child can only acquire after the elapse of a period of thirty years. In addition, establishing sole owner-possession in a sufficiently clear manner may be practically difficult also in these constellations.

I. In particular: no suspension between spouses and registered partners

Suspension between spouses. Suspension (sometimes also postponement of expiry) of the period for acquisition of ownership between spouses is an almost uniform approach at least in the civil law jurisdictions. A major purpose is said to be the maintenance of "peace in the family". A side effect is that such a rule avoids problems that can easily occur where owner and possessor live together in the same household, in which cases it will often be difficult to discern whether there is sole possession by one spouse or co-possession by both spouses. If such functions were to be regarded important, which will be discussed below, a specific rule could be adopted (providing that "the running of the period is suspended as between spouses and registered partners for as long as the relevant relationship subsists"). One would, then, also have to clarify whether the suspension (or postponement of expiry) should terminate when the partners separate, even if they do not divorce formally (which may appear adequate from a "peace-keeping" standpoint), or whether the formal family status (marriage/divorce) should operate as the decisive criterion (which may be preferable from the aspect of legal certainty).

Registered partners. Some legal systems recognise "registered partnerships", having the same private-law implications as marriage. There is a formal act of establishment of such a partnership and it may, analogously to the divorce of a married couple, be dissolved by another formal act. The partners may, depending on the relevant national rules, be of different or the same sex. Provided that the applicable national law recognises such a form of partnership, it would be a logical consequence of the underlying policy that such a partnership would also be treated equally to marriage with regard to acquisition of ownership by continuous possession.

Rule not needed. Yet, it appears that an extension rule for spouses (or similar relationships between adults) is not needed. The reasons are given in the following.

Aspect of "peace in the family" not that relevant for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. As mentioned above, suspension (or postponement of expiry) of the period for acquisition of ownership between spouses is a widespread approach in the European legal systems. It should, however, be noted, that mostly the relevant rules of suspension and renewal are applicable both to the ("extinctive") prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation and to acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. When the issue is dealt with in literature or in the legislation process, the focus, most of the time, is on the issue of ("extinctive") prescription. Taking this into account when reconsidering the underlying policy of this suspension rule, it seems that the "peace-keeping" function is more important for the prescription of a right to performance than for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession: It can be of severe detriment to matrimony if one spouse has to institute a lawsuit against the other spouse in order to avoid the prescription of a right to performance of an obligation. It might be regarded as understandable but see the critique in III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity) Comment F that a legislator accepts that this may cause the creditor to take no steps rather than to risk his/her marriage, and therefore decides to impose a suspension of prescription in order to avoid such potential problems for his citizens. Typically, judicial actions are brought when harmony has ceased to exist. Then, according to the rationale of such rule, it should not be too late to assert one's right. In order to avoid acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, on the other hand, it is normally not necessary to institute a lawsuit against the other spouse: Simply making it clear that a specific asset is one's own property will suffice, as such acquisition by continuous possession can, if it does not lead to an acknowledgement (see VIII.–4:205 (Ending of period in case of acknowledgement)), only take place after the lapse of a period of thirty years due to the other party's bad faith. Where the partner exercising physical control continuously accepts that the goods are the other spouse's property, a period for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession does not even start to run. Taking into account, furthermore, that acquisition of ownership cannot take place before a period of ten years has elapsed, there appears to be no significant practical need for a rule providing for suspension between spouses (or other partners).

No parallel provision in Book III Chapter 7. The respective rules on the prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation do not contain any special provisions on suspension in case of obligations existing as between spouses (cf. III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity) Comment F). Accordingly, one may also argue against a suspension rule in the context of matrimony or registered partnerships for reasons of consistency: In a system where the peace-keeping aspect is not even regarded as important enough in relation to prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation, it should not be decisive for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession either, where arguably the general interest of legal certainty plays an even more important role than in the case of a right to performance.

Practical difficulties can be solved by other criteria. As indicated in Comment I, a rule providing for suspension as between spouses will also minimise practical difficulties in determining who is in possession when the owner and the other party live together in the same household: If suspension takes place, no dispute arises. The main question, however, should not be whether disputes on practically difficult issues take place or not. The main concern must be whether such practical difficulties provoke inadequate results, i.e., an inadequate risk for the owner of losing his right of ownership. But this does not seem to be the case if a suspension rule for spouses or registered partners is not be adopted: It is up to the person asserting the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession to prove that he or she qualifies as an owner-possessor in the sense of VIII.–1:206 (Possession by owner-possession). The fact that physical control has been exercised with the intention of doing so as an owner must be sufficiently clear to the outside world, in order to be provable before a court with a sufficient chance of success. Where both parties live together in the same household and the object in question is situated in this household, such evidence may be hard to provide in particular in relation to the beginning of the period, which is at least ten years. With regard to the ten-year period, a second hurdle may be good faith (which, however, is presumed). Accordingly, as several quite practical risks are placed on the possessor, there seems to be no need to adopt a rule like the one in question.

J. Further cases: unmarried couples, other household members

Suspension rule extending to partnerships similar to marriage. If, on the other hand, the purpose of "keeping peace in the family" was regarded as really important in the context of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, one probably should discuss an extension of the spouses-rule to non-married couples (and to couples of the same sex who did not enter into a legally recognised form of a registered partnership). There would be some internal logic in supporting such an approach because the named rationale of the rule is, in principle, not based on a certain (family law) status but on a relation of "piety", or trust and confidence, which will typically exist between non-married partners in the same way; cf. also III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity) Comment F. The main problem would then be how to draw the line of demarcation. Different to the case of marriage or a registered partnership, it is practically difficult to determine when a relationship of this kind starts (and, partly, when it ends). Another issue would be that such a solution is somewhat disputed in some European legal systems. The main argument for not adopting any such rule is, however, that the need to protect the "peace in a family" (or in family-like relation) does not appear convincing as such (see Comment I above).

Extension of period as between persons sharing the same household. If, contrary to the position taken in Comment I, it was regarded as important to avoid difficulties in determining who is in possession, one could even think of introducing a general suspension rule for persons sharing the same household, applicable to goods kept in that household. A rule of that kind exists in a minority of European legal systems, being a historical relic from the times in which it was common that servants were living in the same household. Today, a rule of that kind would, however, also apply to students sharing an apartment (their academic success though being questionable, as at least ten years are required for acquisition by continuous possession), or adult brothers and sisters living together in the same household. A practical need for such rule does not seem to be in sight. From a policy point of view, in particular with regard to the aim of promoting legal certainty, a rule of that kind should not be adopted.

VIII.–4:202: Extension in case of impediment beyond owner's control

(1) The running of the period is suspended as long as the owner is prevented from exercising the right to recover the goods by an impediment which is beyond the owner's control and which the owner could not reasonably have been expected to avoid or overcome. The mere fact that the owner does not know where the goods are does not cause suspension under this Article.

(2) Paragraph (1) applies only if the impediment arises, or subsists, within the last six months of the period.

(3) Where the duration or nature of the impediment is such that it would be unreasonable to expect the owner to take proceedings to assert the right to recover the goods within the part of the period which has still to run after the suspension comes to an end, the period does not expire before six months have passed after the time when the impediment was removed.

COMMENTS

A. General

Policy. As one of the ideas of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession is that the owner had, at least in theory, a chance to recover his property within (at least) ten years (cf. VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) Comment D), it would appear unduly harsh to let acquisition of ownership by continuous possession take effect against an owner who was prevented from being active by an impediment beyond his control. The rationale behind this Article is somewhat similar to the rationale of VIII.–4:201 (Extension in case of incapacity), extending the idea to persons who cannot make use of their rights for reasons other than legal incapacity (see Comment B below).

Corresponding rule in III.–7:303 (Suspension in case of impediment beyond creditor's control). Book III Chapter 7 establishes practically the same rule for the prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation. This provision has been followed in its major concept as well as regarding drafting details. In applying the two rules, however, regard should be had to any possible difference in the involved interests, which might exist between these two scopes of application.

Terminology: extension, suspension, postponement of expiry. Regarding these terms and concepts, see Comment A of the Comments on Section 2 in general. The headline uses "extension" as a collective term for "suspension" and "postponement of expiry".

B. Paragraph (1)

Situations covered. The rule should be interpreted in a rather strict way. An impediment beyond one's control occurs, for instance, when being kidnapped, cut off from the outside world by a natural phenomenon (avalanches, floods) or in the case of the inactivity of the courts. Someone who is sent to prison (in a civilised country), on the other hand, is not considered to be covered by this rule, as there will be possibilities to pursue one's interests also in such a situation. The mere fact that the owner does not find out where his property is does not constitute an impediment in the sense of the present Article either. For the sake of clarity, the latter aspect is explicitly mentioned in the second sentence of paragraph (1). If this case was not excluded, the whole concept of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, and the general goal of promoting legal certainty, would be severely undermined. For the same reason, Chapter 4 of Book VIII does not adopt a general rule corresponding to III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance). The term "exercising the right to recover the goods" refers to VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) and VIII.–6:301 (Entitlement to recover in case of better possession), but may include other judicially or administratively enforceable remedies. VIII.–6:203 (Entitlement to recover as protection of mere possession) is practically irrelevant due to its short time limit of one year.

Suspension concept. As for the situations covered by the present Article, the concept of suspension (with further specifications in paragraphs (2) and (3)) seems preferable to the hypothetical alternative concept of a general postponement of expiry rule plus an additional period of, e.g., six months. The proposed concept regularly adds less time to the qualifying period, which is preferable in the light of the general aim of legal certainty. Also, in the situations covered by this provision, the owner regularly does not need an extra period of time just to get an overview of his or her legal affairs, as is the case in the constellations of incapacity covered by VIII.–4:201 (Extension in case of incapacity). It, therefore, does not seem necessary to add more time to the qualifying period than was taken away by the event beyond the owner's control. This, exactly, is achieved by the suspension concept. Exceptional situations are taken care of by paragraph (3) of this Article.

The question of actively hiding the goods. One could discuss whether the suspension rule of this Article should be applicable where, in addition to the mere fact that the owner is unable to locate the goods, this is caused by the possessor by actively hiding them. In a certain sense, such conduct of the possessor is of course "beyond the owner's control", because the owner cannot prevent the possessor from trying to hide the goods (once he can, he will most probably have the goods in his hands). But that would not fit to the policy outlined above, i.e. to restrict the rule to a narrow group of cases, namely where the owner's freedom of action as such is excluded by an external event. As to substance, the question, therefore, is about extending the rule in this Article to such situations. Basically, there are three alternatives of how to treat a person who did not steal the goods himself, but knows that they have been stolen and, by further keeping them instead of trying to return the goods, in one way or the other prevents the real owner from recovery: First, one could exclude such person from acquisition by continuous possession altogether. This option is not preferred for the reasons provided in VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) Comment I. The second and less far-reaching option would cover these cases by the suspension rule of the present Article. However, the risk of this becoming a standard matter of litigation, provoking uncertainty and, perhaps, avoidable costs would probably occur in a similar way as under the first option. For the sake of legal certainty, the third alternative is preferred, namely not to extend the suspension rule of this Article to a possessor actively hiding the goods, so that acquisition is possible after thirty years under VIII.–4:101paragraph (1)(b)).

C. Paragraphs (2) and (3)

Restriction to impediments within last six months (paragraph (2)). If the impediment preventing the recovery of the goods has ceased to exist well before the end of the period for acquisition of ownership, there seems to be no compelling reason to extend the period: The owner still has time enough to take appropriate steps. Therefore, paragraph (2) limits this Article's scope of application to impediments that arise or subsist within the last six months of the period. This limitation also promotes the idea of legal certainty. The approach has been adopted from III.–7:303 (Suspension in case of impediment beyond creditor's control) paragraph (2).

Postponement of expiry in exceptional situations (paragraph (3)). The rule in the third paragraph has been adopted from III.–7:303 (Suspension in case of impediment beyond creditor's control), which has been amended accordingly. It is intended to cover extreme situations only, where it is necessary for the owner to regain an overview of his legally relevant affairs after the impediment has ceased to exist. To a certain degree, such situations are comparable to situations covered by VIII.–4:201 (Extension in case of incapacity) paragraph (2), where an owner recovering from a state of legal incapacity is granted a postponement of expiry for the duration of one year. The length of the period adopted in the present Article (six months) corresponds to III.–7:303(3). Also, the following illustration has been borrowed therefrom.

> Illustration
> O is abducted and held in an unknown location by his abductors, without any means of communication to the outside world, for over three year. The abduction took place two weeks before the period for acquisition of ownership of goods owned by O would have elapsed in favour of possessor P. In these circumstances, it would practically not be sufficient to give O two weeks to start proceedings after being released. Except for a need for mental and perhaps physical recovery, he will have to practically reorganise his whole life. The period of prescription will not expire until a period of six months after the time of release has elapsed.

No parallel to III.–7:303 (Suspension in case of impediment beyond creditor's control) paragraph (4). Contrary to the rules governing the prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation, this Article does not explicitly state that an impediment in the sense of this Article "includes a psychological impediment". In III.–7:303(4), such a clarification has been inserted with the intention to cover cases such as those where childhood victims of sexual or other abuse are psychologically unable to report or react to the abuse until very much later. Such rule appears necessary to prevent, in particular, the prescription of claims for damages under Book VI. A comparable need does not, however, exist with regard to the risk of losing one's right of ownership by another acquiring by continuous possession.

VIII.–4:203: Extension and renewal in case of judicial and other proceedings

(1) The running of the period is suspended from the time when judicial proceedings are begun against the owner-possessor or a person exercising physical control for the owner-possessor, by or on behalf of the owner, contesting the owner-possessor's ownership or possession. Suspension lasts until a decision has been made which has the effect of res judicata or until the case has otherwise been disposed of. Suspension has effect only in relation to the parties to the judicial proceedings and persons on whose behalf the parties act.

(2) Suspension under paragraph (1) is to be disregarded when the action is dismissed or otherwise unsuccessful. Where the action is dismissed because of incompetence of the court, the period does not expire before six months have passed from this decision.

(3) Where the action is successful, a new period begins to run from the day when the effect of res judicata occurs or the case has otherwise been disposed of in favour of the owner.

(4) These provisions apply, with appropriate adaptations, to arbitration proceedings and to all other proceedings initiated with the aim of obtaining an instrument which is enforceable as if it were a judgment.

COMMENTS

A. General

Common core. The rule is, in its very basics, a very common one and features in many European legal systems. Most legal systems provide for a renewal (interruption) of the period for acquisition in case of judicial proceedings. Sometimes, the interruption effect is "latent" in the form of an exclusion of good faith in the case of an action filed against the owner-possessor. Some countries have adopted a suspension approach. The latter is also the case under the parallel provision of III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings) on the prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation.

Basic policy. The concept of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession can, inter alia, be justified as being a sanction on the owner for being inactive with regard to his property for a certain period of time; see VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) Comment D. Where the owner, so to say, performs what the law expects him to do, i.e. to institute judicial proceedings against the possessor, acquisition of ownership by continuous possession must not operate against him.

Overview of how the Article works. The basic function of this Article can be summarised as follows: When judicial proceedings against the owner-possessor (or a person exercising physical control for the owner-possessor) are initiated, this leads to a suspension of the period for the duration of these legal proceedings, i.e. this time does not count towards the period for acquisition of ownership (paragraph (1)). When these proceedings have ended, one has to basically distinguish between three constellations:

(i) Paragraph (2) governs the situation in which the claimant loses the proceedings. Then, the suspension provided for under paragraph (1) is to be disregarded retrospectively and the qualifying period has to be calculated as if the suspension never occurred. A special rule (postponement of expiry for another six months as from the judicial decision) is provided for the case when the action is dismissed because it was filed with an incompetent court (paragraph (2) second sentence). In this case, the claimant is given another six months to bring the action before the competent court. If he does so, paragraph (1) will apply again.

(ii) If, on the other hand, the action was successful, the court decision will cause an anew commencement of the running of the qualifying period. The owner has another 30 years (because the possessor will be in bad faith after the judgment) to recover the goods (paragraph (3)). This rule also covers the case where the proceedings do not end with the rendering of a judgment but (if provided by national procedural law) by the defendant acknowledging the right of the owner.

(iii) In the remaining situations, where the proceedings are not continued and the case is not decided in favour of either party, but is solved in another way, the period continues to run again upon the reaching of such a solution (paragraph (1) second sentence). One may think of constellations where the proceedings as such are suspended, which can occur under the procedural rules of (at least) some legal systems.

B. Suspension for the duration of judicial proceedings, paragraph (1)

Only judicial acts covered. Paragraph (1) states that suspension takes place (only) in the case of judicial proceedings. As under III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings), extra-judicial acts, such as reclaiming one's property back in writing or orally, are not covered. Such acts may, however, be of a different kind of legal relevance: On the one hand, such acts may destroy the possessor's good faith so that he can only acquire after a period of thirty years. On the other hand, such acts may lead to negotiations about ownership, which trigger a separate postponement of expiry rule (VIII.–4:204 (Postponement of expiry in case of negotiations)). As to arbitration proceedings, see Comment D below. As to mediation proceedings, see VIII.–4:204 Comment B.

First effect of initiating proceedings: suspension. As pointed out above, the institution of judicial proceedings against the owner-possessor causes suspension of the period for acquisition of ownership. This effect is of somewhat preliminary character, as it finally depends on the outcome of the proceedings: if the claimant (i.e. the person who is or purports to be the rightful owner) loses the case, suspension is deemed to never having taken place; if the claimant wins the case, suspension is "transformed" into a renewal of the period at the end of the proceedings. Nevertheless, it is adequate to provide for a suspension effect for the time of the proceedings (as compared to a retrospective renewal), commencing as from the initiation of the proceedings, provided that they have been won. The duration of the proceedings should not play a decisive role for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. For reasons of clarity, it is stated that suspension begins with the commencement of the proceedings. The second sentence of paragraph (1) states that suspension lasts until a decision with res judicata effect has been made or until the case has otherwise been decided. This has been adopted from III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings) paragraph (2). Compare the Comments on that provision.

Contesting the possessor's ownership or possession. The suspension effect should naturally only take place where the subject matter of the proceedings is the possessor's right of ownership or possession, e.g. in case the owner institutes an action based on VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership), VIII.–6:203 (Entitlement to recover as protection of mere possession) or VIII.–6:301 (Entitlement to recover in case of better possession) or brings a declaratory claim. Furthermore, the rule covers enforcement proceedings initiated on the basis of a judgment in the sense of paragraph (3).

Proceedings begun by or on behalf of the owner. According to the basic idea of the suspension rule in paragraph (1), the owner is required to assert his right actively in judicial proceedings in order to achieve the suspension effect. Usually, the owner himself will be the active part and institute the proceedings. However, there may also be situations where the possessor institutes a declaratory action against the owner (which will not happen that frequently, but is possible). If, in such a situation, the owner brings a counter-claim, there will be no doubt that suspension must occur in such way as if the owner had issued his action first. Yet, the same effect should be achieved also where the owner does not take any such steps and "just" asserts his right as a defendant in proceedings initiated against him. Insisting on any specific kind of procedural conduct is regarded to be too formalistic in view of the underlying policy of this Article. The formulation "proceedings begun against the owner-possessor … by or on behalf of the rightful owner" shall be interpreted in the light of these considerations, where necessary.

Proceedings against the owner-possessor, limited-right-possessor or possession-agent. It is suggested that the action may be brought against the owner-possessor or another person exercising physical control for the owner-possessor. With regard to the policy underlying this Article, the main point is that the owner is active, i.e. takes steps to recover the goods or files a declaratory action. It should not have a negative effect to "sue the wrong person". Someone detaining the goods for the owner-possessor in the sense of VIII.–1:207 (Possession by limited-right-possessor) or VIII.–1:208 (Possession through a possession-agent) belongs to the possessor's sphere as well and the effect regarding acquisition of ownership by continuous possession must be the same.

Suspension only in relation to the parties to the proceedings and persons on whose behalf the parties act (third sentence). The possessor's right of ownership may be contested not only in proceedings against the rightful owner, but also in proceedings between the owner-possessor and a third person, who has no relationship with the rightful owner whatsoever. This may be the case, for example, where the owner-possessor attempts to recover possession of the goods from such a third person, e.g. a thief, under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership), or where the owner-possessor's right to the goods is a preliminary question, e.g. for an unjustified enrichment claim or a tort claim against the third person. Sentence 3 makes it clear that such proceedings, in which the rightful owner is in no way involved, have no suspension effect in favour of the owner, the basic idea being that suspension is to be triggered by the taking of action by the owner (the solution may be different if the third party manages to involve the rightful owner in these proceedings).

C. When the claimant loses the proceedings, paragraph (2)

(a) General (sentence 1)

Basic rule when claimant loses the proceedings ("the action is dismissed or otherwise unsuccessful"). This Article deviates from III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings) in so far as the effect of suspension in favour of the owner only occurs when the action is successful (which, of course, can only be assessed retrospectively, when the final judgment has been passed).

Illustration 1:
P bought goods from a private person nine years ago and has since then possessed them in good faith. After these nine years, a certain O brings a claim against P, pretending the goods have been stolen from him and asserting to be their true owner. However, the owner does not manage to persuade the court. He loses the case before the court of first instance, but appeals to the court of next instance. The court of appeal refers the case back to the court of first instance for additional finding of facts etc. A final judgment, dismissing O's claim, is given after four years of proceedings.

If the proceedings had full suspension effect (irrespective of the outcome of the proceedings), acquisition of ownership by continuous possession (in good faith) could only take place after a total time of 14 years. Under this Article, however, acquisition of ownership by continuous possession will formally take place after ten years (which turns out, however, only after the end of the proceedings, that is, after a total time of thirteen years). The proposed rule seems to be the majority approach in those legal systems, which recognise an interruption or suspension in cases of judicial proceedings. The advantage of this solution is, as becomes obvious in Illustration 1, that it corresponds better to the aim of legal certainty. The settling of the unclear property position takes effect as early as possible.

Details; differences to prescription rules. Besides the main effect of the rule in sentence 1, as pointed out above, the rule may also be relevant with regard to former judicial proceedings over the goods, which have occurred between the parties. In that respect, it also illustrates a certain difference between the context of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession and the context of prescription of a right to performance under Book III Chapter 7: Where the action concerning a right to performance of an obligation is dismissed, it is now authoritatively settled that there is no claim that could be subject to prescription (see III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings) Comment A). This cannot necessarily be said of the right of ownership in the context of acquisition by continuous possession. The first action the owner has instituted may have been an action based on an unlawful interference with possession (VIII.–6:203 (Entitlement to recover as protection of mere possession)) or another remedy for which the ownership of the asset does not have to be proved. Where such an action is dismissed, there is nothing to be said about the right of ownership. This means that the owner can still bring a claim based on his right of ownership under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership). The second paragraph of the present Article makes sure that the duration of such prior proceedings (which have been lost by the claimant) is not added to the total qualifying period. The rule works in favour of the possessor in that the remaining time of the period will be as short as possible.

(b) Action filed at an incompetent court (sentence 2)

The problem. A special constellation to be considered is the case where a person, in fact, is the rightful owner and also brings an action to protect his right in due time, but before a court lacking jurisdiction.

Illustration 2:
The qualifying period for acquisition of ownership has been running for nine years and eleven months. Now the owner brings an action against the possessor, but files it with an incompetent court. One and a half months later the court makes a decision dismissing the claim for lack of jurisdiction.

There are basically three possibilities of how to deal with this situation, which are addressed in the following Comments.

Alternative (1): suspension. One possibility is to provide that the period is simply suspended for as long as the (incompetent) court deals with the matter and continues to run when the court formally and finally declares its incompetence. This approach is followed by III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings), for the prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation. Regarding the period for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, this approach is, e.g., followed by case law and legal literature in Germany. Under these model rules, this effect could be achieved by explicitly stating that a lack of jurisdiction is excluded from paragraph (2) sentence 1 of this Article.

Alternative (2): postponement of expiry. A midway solution is provided by, e.g., Swiss and Dutch law: A claim filed with an incompetent court does not suspend the qualifying period for acquisition of ownership but triggers a postponement of expiry of the period for, e.g., 60 days (under Swiss law) or six months (under Dutch law) as from the date the court's decision becomes non-appealable. As will be discussed below, the latter solution has been adopted in this Article. A comparable approach is now also adopted in III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings) paragraph (2) second sentence, which applies to all cases where judicial proceedings end without a decision on the merits (for which lack of jurisdiction is a main example). For the purposes of Chapter 4, however, a particular practical need for extending the rule to other hypothetical situations in addition to lack of jurisdiction was considered not to exist, so that the original wording was kept. As to an arbitration court's decision on its incompetence (in particular because of an invalidity of the arbitration agreement) see below, Comment E. As to mediation proceedings ending without a settlement, see VIII.–4:204 (Postponement of expiry in case of negotiations) Comment B.

Alternative (3): no extension effect at all. The strictest approach, from the owner's perspective, would be to provide that an action brought before an incompetent court has no effect of renewal or extension whatsoever. This view is defended, e.g., in Austria (unless the court refers the action to the competent court). In these model rules, such an effect could be achieved by deleting any special rule in the second sentence of paragraph (2). Then, the owner's action would have to be regarded as "unsuccessful" in the sense of the first sentence of paragraph (2). In the case of illustration 2, the ten-year period would have passed already and acquisition of ownership by continuous possession would have taken place.

The preferred option: postponement of expiry for six months as from the decision declaring lack of jurisdiction. The draft follows the Dutch model (cf. Comment C above), providing for a postponement of expiry for six months as from the dismissal for lack of jurisdiction; or, more precisely: as from the date this decision becomes non-appealable. Accordingly, if the claimant files the action towards the end of the qualifying period and it turns out that he did so before the wrong court, there are always at least six more months to file the action again at the competent court. This seems adequate, as the owner (claimant), in principle, complied with what the law expects from him, in bringing a judicial action against the possessor, asserting his right of ownership (or possession). There has been made a certain mistake only as to identifying the competent court, which should, as such, not be sanctioned with a loss of ownership. The owner still is bound to file the action again at a competent court within a certain period, for which six months seem appropriate. As to the length of the period, cf. also VIII.–4:202 (Extension in case of impediment beyond owner's control) paragraph (2), VIII.–4:204 (Postponement of expiry in case of negotiations) and the named III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings) paragraph (2) second sentence. The rule only has an effect when the judicial proceedings take place towards the end of the qualifying period. If the situation arises before, so that the court's decision is made (and becomes effective) before the last six months of the period, the running of the period for acquisition of ownership is not affected at all. That makes this solution preferable to a rule providing for a suspension of the period also in a case of dismissal for lack of jurisdiction, as the aim of legal certainty is best served if the qualifying period is affected as little as possible.

D. When the claimant (owner) wins the proceedings, paragraph (3)

Effect when the owner succeeds in the proceedings: renewal of period. If the claimant wins the case, the owner-possessor must hand over the movable. If the owner-possessor refuses to do so and decides to continue possessing the goods with the intention of holding them as if being their owner, he will possess in bad faith, which means that acquisition of ownership by continuous possession is only possible after thirty years. Paragraph (3) explicitly states that the period of possession elapsed until now will not count for that purpose, but a new period of thirty years starts to run as from the moment when the decision has res judicata effect. The same applies if the case has otherwise been disposed of in favour of the claimant (owner) under the relevant national rules of civil procedure.

Renewal instead of suspension. In contrast to the renewal concept employed by paragraph (3) of this Article, III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings) provides for a suspension of the period in relation to the parallel question on the prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation. In general, the suspension concept is more in line with the idea of legal certainty, as the total period for acquisition of ownership is shorter. The motivation for nonetheless choosing a different concept in the present Article shall be explained a little further in the following: The rightful owner who has already obtained an enforceable judgment has done almost all the law can expect him to do in order to avoid the consequence of another's acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. There is no reason for imposing sanctions for being inactive. A suspension rule could lead to unreasonable results for the rightful owner, even if a postponement of expiry of the period (e.g. for one or two years as from the judgment) was provided additionally. The period for the acquisition of ownership would continue to run even where a competent court, in judicial proceedings, found that the owner-possessor is not the owner, and the owner-possessor must know that he has to return the goods. The owner-possessor could even try to delay the restitution of the movable until the remaining period for the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession elapses. It is obvious that a possessor who has been ordered to make restitution of the goods does not deserve the same level of protection as he may have deserved before anymore. When it comes to legal certainty in the sense of the protection of third parties, it must of course be admitted that this goal is not served best by triggering a new thirty-year period starting with the final judgement. But most often, this will be a rather theoretical problem: Where the owner already has an enforceable judgment and the possessor does not restore the goods voluntarily, the owner will initiate enforcement proceedings against him within a relatively short period of time. Typically, he will recover possession in this way. Moreover, one may argue that the fact that property has been affected by judicial proceedings and the existence of an enforceable judgment may also serve to provide some information or "warnings" to third persons.

Additional justification with regard to differences to the prescription context. The divergence between the renewal approach in this Article and the suspension concept in the parallel rule in III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings) must also be seen in the light of a major difference existing between these two contexts: Where the proceedings are about a right to the performance of an obligation, a judgment in favour of the claimant establishes a new right with a prescription period of ten years; see III.–7:202 (Period of a right established by legal proceedings). In the context of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, however, there is no parallel mechanism regarding the right of ownership when the owner succeeds against the possessor in court proceedings. There is no "new ownership" created, which might be subject to a new period of acquisition. But the renewal concept employed by the present Article functionally leads to a comparable result, as another thirty years would have to pass until the owner could lose his right by the continuous possession of another person. This may serve as an additional reason why deviating from the suspension concept provided for under Book III Chapter 7 is justified.

E. Other proceedings, paragraph (4)

Arbitration proceedings, paragraph (4). The parallel provision in III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings) paragraph (3) explicitly extends that rule to, inter alia, arbitration proceedings. A parallel approach is taken here for the sake of consistency, though it is clear that such proceedings are not often initiated in practice with regard to acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. Anyway, it is possible that parties go before an arbitration court once a dispute about ownership has occurred. As to the wording, paragraph (4) of the present Article uses the formulation "and all other proceedings initiated with the aim of obtaining an instrument which is enforceable as if it were a judgment", which was employed in Article 14:302 (3) PECL. This formula is narrower than the new one in III.–7:302 paragraph (3) which explicitly opens up, in particular, for applicability to mediation proceedings. See below.

Arbitration court declaring to be incompetent. With regard to arbitration proceedings, there is perhaps only one situation deserving specific attention, namely where one of the parties contests the validity of the arbitration agreement when proceedings have been initiated before an arbitration tribunal. If the arbitration court accepts this argumentation and, therefore, refuses to pass a judgment because of its lack of competence, there is a practical need for ensuring the existence of some additional minimum period for the parties to be able to file an action with an ordinary court. This need is satisfied with the application of the postponement of expiry rule of paragraph (2) sentence 2 (incompetence of the court) with appropriate adaptations, as provided for by paragraph (4).

Mediation proceedings covered by other rules. Unlike III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings) paragraph (3), this Article does not equate mediation proceedings to judicial proceedings. They are intended to be covered by VIII.–4:204 (Postponement of expiry in case of negotiations) and, in case the possessor agrees to respect the owner's right in the course of these proceedings, by VIII.–4:205 (Ending of period in case of acknowledgement). Practically, most of the results are not strikingly different to what would be achieved if mediation proceedings were covered by the present Article. For a closer discussion, see the Comments on VIII.–4:204).

F. Institution of enforcement proceedings

General: covered by general rules of this Article. This Article does not contain any explicit rules regulating the effect of enforcement proceedings initiated after the owner obtained an enforceable judgment. There is not much practical need for such rules, as paragraph (3) provides for a renewal of the period and this will give the owner thirty more years to recover the property. However, enforcement proceedings are intended to be covered by the general rules of paragraphs (1) to (3) of this Article. The wording of paragraph (1) ("judicial proceedings … contesting the owner-possessor's … possession") is considered to be broad enough to be applied to these situations as well (should, under a certain legal system, enforcement proceedings be of an administrative rather than judicial nature, the rule should nonetheless be applied according to its underlying policy of demanding those steps being taken by the owner which, under the relevant legal system, are required to recover his goods). This will, in particular where the owner-possessor tries to hide the goods, operate in favour of the owner.

Details. Applying the general rules of paragraphs (1) to (3) of this Article to enforcement proceedings initiated by the owner after having obtained an enforceable judgment or other legal instrument has the following effects: The period for acquisition is suspended as from the date the owner formally seeks enforcement of his right to recover possession of the goods (paragraph (1)). Should the owner subsequently withdraw the application for enforcement, or the relevant authority dismisses the enforcement claim, paragraph (2) will be applied accordingly so that the suspension effect provided for by paragraph (1) is to be disregarded; suspension is considered to have never taken place. Where the application for enforcement is accepted by the competent authority, the owner's enforcement is to be qualified as being "successful" in the sense of paragraph (3) of this Article. This means that a new thirty-year period for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession begins to run (renewal). The latter effect is intended to free the owner from having to make repeated enforcement applications towards the end of the period so as to avoid an acquisition by the (successfully hiding) possessor after the period has elapsed. The same effects are, sometimes in other words, achieved in quite many European legal systems (in some countries, where the possessor's good faith is a general prerequisite for acquiring ownership by continuous possession, such a rule is not provided for explicitly; but comparable effects are achieved in so far as a possessor who is subjected to enforcement proceedings will be considered to be in bad faith, which excludes acquisition by continuous possession from the outset). For the purpose of interpretation of this Article, it is important to stress that where the owner seeks enforcement and this application is accepted, the enforcement is to be regarded "successful" in the sense of this Article even where the execution finally (actually) fails in recovering the goods. Enforcement measures being just "actually unsuccessful" in this sense are not intended to qualify as "unsuccessful" in the sense of paragraph (2), which would turn the policy of the Article upside down.

VIII.–4:204: Postponement of expiry in case of negotiations

If the owner and the owner-possessor or a person exercising physical control for the owner-possessor negotiate about the right of ownership, or about circumstances from which acquisition of ownership by the owner-possessor may arise, the period does not expire before six months have passed since the last communication made in the negotiations.

COMMENTS

A. Negotiations

Function and policy. In a certain sense, this Article supplements VIII.–4:203 (Extension and renewal in case of judicial and other proceedings), which is limited to judicial and arbitration proceedings. Extra-judicial acts, such as claiming back one's property orally or in writing, may destroy good faith and therefore "extend" the period necessary for acquiring ownership by continuous possession to thirty years, but have no suspension or interruption effect. However, where the owner took such extra-judicial steps and the possessor did not reject the owner's demand as a matter of principle, but enters into negotiations (see below), it would be unfair as against the owner if the possessor could, after such negotiations have failed, rely on the time that has elapsed while carrying out these negotiations for the purpose of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. For this reason, this Article safeguards that the owner has at least another six months to bring an action for recovery of his goods before a court. The postponement of expiry concept employed by this Article makes it possible to interfere with the general interest of legal certainty as little as possible, since the period for acquisition continues to run in principle, but does not end before the abovementioned period of six months has passed as from the last communication made in these negotiations. The postponement of expiry concept is also a quite widespread one in the European legal systems.

Relation to III.–7:304 (Postponement of expiry in case of negotiations); length of period. III.–7:304 provides a parallel postponement of expiry rule for the prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation. That rule, however, postpones the expiry of the period for one year instead of six months. This has been considered as being too long for the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, taking into account that the periods under this Chapter are already rather long. Therefore, a period of six months has been provided in this Article. This is also seen as a kind of compromise between the one-year period provided for in III.–7:304 and the extra periods provided for in some Member States, which are, in part, no longer than two or three months.

Negotiations. Realistically, the practical importance of this rule will be much smaller in respect of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession than in respect of the prescription of rights to performance of an obligation. One may, however, think of situations where, for example, the owner shows up, reclaiming his property, and the possessor declares that he is not convinced of the claimant's ownership, but that he is willing to verify the facts put forward by the owner, and the parties subsequently agree to try to solve the issue. The owner will then try to present additional evidence and so on. A peculiarity of such negotiations, as compared to negotiations about a right to performance, is that the parties will typically not meet "somewhere in the middle". The negotiations will, if they reach a result as to substance, either end with the full acknowledgement or waiver of the right, or the negotiations will be terminated, which triggers the six-month period of the postponement of expiry. If the possessor acknowledges the owner's right, the prerequisites of VIII.–4:205 (Ending of period in case of acknowledgement) will be fulfilled, meaning that the current period for acquisition ends but possibly, if the possessor nevertheless continues possessing the goods in the capacity of an owner-possessor, a new period (of thirty years) may commence. Where the purported owner waives his right in those negotiations, he probably was not the owner, but if he really were, such an act may constitute an abandonment of the goods so that the current possessor might acquire the goods immediately by occupation. These issues are, however, not covered by Book VIII of these model rules. However, these two hypothetical outcomes of an agreement may be combined with further stipulations, such as an obligation of the owner to pay a certain reimbursement for all efforts undertaken by the possessor during the period of possession. Or the parties may agree that the current possessor may keep the goods against payment of a certain amount. But that would, provided that the transferor really had ownership of these goods, constitute an ordinary transfer under Chapter 2 of this Book.

B. Mediation proceedings in particular

Mediation proceedings covered by this Article. As mentioned in VIII.–4:203 (Extension and renewal in case of judicial and other proceedings) Comment E, mediation proceedings are intended to be covered by the present Article on negotiations. This implies a choice not to follow an approach taken in III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings) paragraph (3), which makes mediation proceedings subject to the same rules as judicial proceedings. This choice is primarily based on specific effects, which are considered to be more favourable for an owner who is party to mediation proceedings in a situation where he may be about to lose his right to the goods by reason of another's acquisition by continuous possession. Formally, mediation proceedings may certainly be covered by this Article, since such proceedings, according to the definition provided in III.–7:302 paragraph (4), are "structured proceedings whereby two or more parties to a dispute attempt to reach an agreement on the settlement of their dispute with the assistance of a mediator". In other words, the parties undertake negotiations in a specifically structured process, conducted and assisted by a neutral third person.

Main practical effects of this approach. When comparing the approach of governing mediation proceedings with this Article to the alternative approach of governing them with the rules provided in VIII.–4:203 (Extension and renewal in case of judicial and other proceedings), the following main results are achieved: (i) As long as mediation proceedings (negotiations) are carried out, both concepts safeguard that the period cannot expire to the detriment of the owner. (ii) Where, as a consequence of these proceedings, the owner "succeeds" in the sense that the possessor acknowledges the owner's right to the goods, the practical result of the two approaches will fully converge: VIII.–4:203 paragraph (3) provides for a renewal of the period, which practically means a thirty-year period due to the possessor's bad faith. The same triggering of a new thirty-year period will be achieved if mediation proceedings are subjected to the present Article VIII.–4:204 (Postponement of expiry in case of negotiations), in which case such conduct of the possessor will constitute an "acknowledgement" in the sense of VIII.–4:205 (Ending of period in case of acknowledgement). (iii) The most crucial scenario with regard to mediation proceedings, however, is that these proceedings fail in the sense that no settlement is achieved. The usual step parties will take in such a situation will be to bring their dispute before a court. The present Article VIII.–4:204 guarantees that the owner has at least six months to initiate such judicial proceedings. At the same time, since the period of acquisition continued to run throughout the negotiations, the total period for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession will not be extended too far, which appears preferable from the perspective of promoting legal certainty in general. Under the alternative concept of VIII.–4:203, the official end of mediation proceedings would have to be subsumed under the phrase of “the case has otherwise been disposed of”, the effect being that suspension ends. If the mediation proceedings started a rather long time before the period would have expired but also lasted for a long time, the effect of suspension will be that the total period for acquisition is also extended for a long time, which appears less favourable in terms of legal certainty. On the other hand, if the mediation proceedings started only towards the very end of the period, the owner may be prohibited from instituting judicial proceedings within the (short) remaining time before the period expires. For this reason, governing mediation proceedings by the present Article (VIII.–4:204), which safeguards a minimum period of six months for taking appropriate steps, is preferred.

VIII.–4:205: Ending of period in case of acknowledgement

The period ends when the owner-possessor, or a person exercising physical control for the owner-possessor, acknowledges the owner's right to the goods. A new period begins to run when the former owner-possessor continues to exercise direct or indirect physical control with the intention of doing so as, or as if, an owner.

COMMENTS

A. General

Common core. There is a common understanding in the European legal systems that the running of the period in favour of an owner-possessor stops if the possessor acknowledges the owner's right of ownership. Technically, this is often expressed in terms of a renewal ("interruption") of the period, meaning that the time already elapsed is no longer taken into account, but rather a new period for the acquisition by continuous possession may commence running if this person continues to hold the property as an owner-possessor after the acknowledgement. The rule is often parallel, or identical, to the one regulating the case of acknowledgement in relation to the prescription of rights to performance of an obligation, a rule of the latter kind also being adopted in III.–7:401 (Renewal by acknowledgement).

Explicit rule adopted for purpose of clarification. One may argue the present Article to be superfluous because where an owner-possessor declares to acknowledge the owner's right, he usually ceases to possess as an owner-possessor in the sense of VIII.–1:206 (Possession by owner-possessor) and therefore fails to meet the general requirement of continuous owner-possession set out in VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1). At least as from the moment of the declaration of the acknowledgement, this person will not be regarded as possessing "as, or as if (being), an owner", but rather as holding the goods for the owner. A new period may start running only if that person, contrary to the former acknowledgement, subsequently changes his mind and henceforth possesses the goods in the capacity of an owner-possessor. It is, however, considered preferable to express the effect of an acknowledgement clearly in an Article. This also makes it easier to deal with situations where the "correct" application of the owner-possession concept may remain doubtful. These cases will be rather hypothetical, and could most probably be solved by application of general principles, though providing an explicit rule will be the simplest solution. (One may, for instance, ask how to treat a person who "externally" acknowledges the owner's right while at the same time "internally" intending to possess for himself. Or, one may ask how to treat a possessor who openly communicates to the owner something comparable to the following statement: "Yes, I perfectly know you own these goods. Nevertheless, I continue to possess your goods as if they were my own property in order to acquire ownership of them by continuous possession.")

B. The rule in detail

Acknowledgement. An acknowledgement in the sense of this Article may be any statement or declaration, regardless of whether made explicitly or impliedly by conduct, expressing the possessor's awareness that the owner's right exists. Specific form requirements do not exist. E.g., it must be sufficient that the possessor declares his willingness to return the goods.

Illustration 1

P has possessed O's goods for 29 years and ten months. In order to avoid losing his right by acquisition by continuous possession, O demands the goods back. P pretends to need them urgently for another four months and promises to return them thereafter. This constitutes an acknowledgement in the sense of this Article so that P does not acquire the goods after the expiration of a total period of thirty years. Rather, a new period (of again thirty years, because P is clearly not in good faith) begins to run after the making of the acknowledgement, provided that P continues to keep the goods for himself.

Subject of acknowledgement ("owner's right to the goods"). According to the text of this Article, the acknowledgement relates to "the owner's right to the goods". This is intended to be interpreted in a broad sense. Of course, the prerequisite is fulfilled where the possessor directly acknowledges that the owner "owns" the goods. But that should not be the decisive aspect. It must equally suffice that the possessor acknowledges any kind of superior right to the goods, e.g. under a contract for lease, storage, or gratuitous lending of the goods. In other words, it suffices that the possessor declares to act as a limited-right-possessor in the sense of VIII.–1:207 (Possession by limited-right-possessor), or as a possession-agent in the sense of VIII.–1:208 (Possession through a possession-agent), for the owner.

Illustration 2
Years ago, after O had an accident, and as from that time could no longer use his sailing boat, O and P agreed that P be allowed to use O's boat in return for a very low, symbolic fee payable annually. After some time, P intends to keep the boat for himself, but continues to pay the annual fee. Each payment constitutes an acknowledgement in the sense of this Article.

Acknowledgement by owner-possessor or a person exercising physical control for the owner-possessor. Furthermore, it should not be decisive that the declaration of acknowledgement be made by the owner-possessor himself. As mentioned previously (VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) Comment F), owner-possession in the sense of the abovementioned provision may be exercised by means of another person, i.e. a limited-right-possessor or a possession-agent. As the text of the present Article states expressly, it shall suffice that the act of acknowledgement is made by that intermediary. There are at least two reasons for this: On the one hand, the whole Article very much roots in the idea that where the owner's right to the goods is acknowledged, there appears to be no need or reason for the owner to institute any proceedings against the holder of the goods in order to protect his right. The rule intends to protect the owner's reliance on an apparently clear situation where such appearance has been created by the person exercising control over the goods. The second reason builds upon the concept of owner-possession: Owner-possession is on hand where the intermediary person exercises physical control over the goods for the owner-possessor. Once the person exercising physical control declares to acknowledge the owner's right and this is inconsistent with regarding the (former) owner-possessor as being the true title-holder, the intermediary will rather possess for the owner than for the (former) owner-possessor, whose owner-possession may thereby considered to have been broken.

Effect of acknowledgement and commencement of new period. Sentence 1 of this Article is not phrased in terms of a "renewal" rule but simply states that the period for acquisition "ends" upon the making of an acknowledgement. A new period does not commence automatically but may start to run only if the possessor, after having acknowledged the owner's right, again changes his mind and conduct by possessing "for himself". Therefore, speaking of a "renewal" would be rather misleading in the context of an acknowledgement. In that respect, there is a certain difference to the parallel rule related to the prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation in III.–7:401 (Renewal by acknowledgement): For the prescription of such a right to performance, no subjective element in relation to the debtor's state of mind is required, so that a new period will start to run automatically whenever the prerequisite for renewal is fulfilled. For the starting anew of a period for acquisition by continuous possession, on the contrary, the subjective element of possessing with the intention of doing so as, or as if being, an owner, must always be fulfilled in addition.

VIII.–4:206: Period of a predecessor to be taken into account

(1) Where one person succeeds another in owner-possession and the requirements set out in this Chapter are fulfilled cumulatively by the predecessor and the successor in possession, the period of the predecessor is taken into account in favour of the successor.

(2) A successor in good faith may take into account the period of a predecessor in bad faith only for acquisition under VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1)(b).

COMMENTS

A. General rule, paragraph (1)

Basic idea. The rule, in terms of its basic principle, embodies an approach common in Europe: It is not decisive that owner-possession, which finally leads to acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, is exercised by one and the same person throughout the whole period for acquisition. Rather, the period having elapsed in favour of one owner-possessor may be taken into account in favour of the next owner-possessor, provided that both possessors fulfil the general requirements of Chapter 4 and that owner-possession is transferred voluntarily or in another generally recognised manner. The rule supports the idea of legal certainty in several nuances: The possibility of acquiring ownership after a shorter period of time of exercising possession for oneself is certainly in the interest of the owner-possessor. The same applies to legal certainty from the perspective of third parties, because a relatively safe legal position can be established more easily. Also, as there is no incentive to keep goods in the possession of one particular person for a very long time in order to establish such a safe legal position, the free flow of commerce is also, at least to a limited degree, facilitated in the sense that goods are to be transferred when this is most reasonable from an economic point of view. From the perspective of the owner's interests, on the other hand, the rule is relatively neutral: Apart from the fact that it may, in some situations, be practically more difficult to identify where one's property is located, the owner's position is not affected irrespective of whether or not property has never been transferred by the first owner-possessor, whether it has been transferred once or several times, or whether one of the possessors died. In some cases, the additional difficulties in "tracing" his property may, however, be considerable.

Succession in possession. Unlike some legal systems, this Article makes no difference between the ways in which a subsequent owner-possessor "succeeded" the former. "Succession in possession" in the sense of this Article covers "universal succession" based on the (national) law of succession (often called a "general title"), as well as succession based on a contract directed at the transfer of these goods ("particular title"), such as a contract for sale, barter or donation. Furthermore, one may think of situations where the goods, being in the hands of the first owner-possessor, are made subject to execution proceedings and a new owner-possessor obtains possession by way of a forced sale (provided that this does not already lead to an immediate good faith acquisition by the latter).

Cumulative fulfilment of all requirements. As stated expressly in the text of this Article, its application presupposes that both the predecessor and the successor in possession fulfil all requirements of Chapter 4. This basically means that both must exercise possession in the capacity of an owner-possessor, i.e. that both possess "as, or as if" being the owner of the goods. Possession must be exercised continuously. Also, neither of them must have obtained possession by stealing the goods; cf. VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraphs (1) and (3) and VIII.–4:103 (Continuous possession). The fulfilment of these prerequisites must be proved by the person asserting the application of this Article.

Effect of paragraph (1). The rule provides that the period of possession by the first possessor is to be taken into account in favour of the successor in possession. In other words, the first possessor's period of possession is added to the time period of possession by the second possessor.

Illustration 1
O owns a collection of stamps, which is stolen by P1. Two months later, P1 sells the stamps to P2 who is in good faith and keeps the goods until his death five years later. P2 is succeeded by his heir P3 who takes possession of the entire property of P2, but, as he is not interested in stamps at all, donates the collection to his nephew P4 two years after P2's death. P4 possesses the stamps for another four years. All possessors except P1 possessed in good faith.

P1's two-month period cannot be taken into account in the sense of this Article because P1 does not fulfil the general requirements set out in Chapter 4 (he is excluded from acquiring by continuous possession under VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (3)). All other possessors, P2 to P4, fulfil the general prerequisites of Chapter 4 and succeed one another in owner-possession in the sense of this Article. Therefore, the periods of five years (P2), two years (P3) and four years (P4) are counted together (eleven years). P4 acquired ownership by continuous possession ten years after P2 had purchased the goods from P1.

B. Good faith and bad faith possessor, paragraph (2)

The problem. VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1) provides for different periods for the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession in good faith (ten years) and bad faith (thirty years), respectively. As long as both the predecessor(s) and the successor are either all in good faith (such as in Illustration 1) or all of them possess in bad faith, no problem as to calculating the whole period for acquisition will arise: It will either be ten or thirty years. What remains to be solved is how to apply the principle expressed by paragraph (1) of this Article to situations where one of the possessors is in good faith but another possesses in bad faith.

First basic choice: qualification of predecessor not to be adopted automatically. In quite many European legal systems there is a rule often applying only to "succession by general title" providing that the successor continues possession subject to the same qualities and defects as the predecessor. Under such a rule, if the predecessor was in bad faith, a successor in good faith would automatically be treated as if he were a possessor in bad faith and could, therefore, only acquire after possessing for a long period (if at all). Likewise, where the predecessor possessed in good faith but the successor is in bad faith, the latter could invoke the more favourable rules for acquisition in good faith, and acquire after expiration of the short period. It is suggested not to follow this approach, but to treat each possessor based on the individual merits of his possession. Since it is generally agreed that the state of mind (good faith or bad faith) of the possessor benefiting from the concept of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession shall be one of the decisive factors in the framework of Chapter 4 (cf. VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) Comment D), it appears to be consistent to apply this approach also to the context covered by the present Article. In particular, it would appear unreasonable to let a possessor in bad faith benefit from the coincidence that he had a predecessor who was in good faith, and let him acquire after a total period of ten years. Applying the suggested approach makes it possible to avoid undue preferential treatment of the possessor as well as avoiding inequitable harshness to the owner, who is ultimately expropriated by the concept of acquisition by continuous possession.

Predecessor in good faith, successor in bad faith. The first (and simpler) category of cases comprises situations where the first possessor was in good faith whereas the second one possesses in bad faith. Such situations will perhaps not occur that frequently, but are possible. They may arise where, after the first owner-possessor possessed in good faith, his predecessor has, from the outset, knowledge of information about the goods' origin which causes him to possess in bad faith. Also, the second owner-possessor may have been in good faith initially but may have obtained such additional information only subsequently (but before the lapse of a total period of ten years of good faith possession). In this case, no additional rule needs to be provided. The relevant period for the second possessor will be the long thirty-year period. Nothing speaks against applying paragraph (1) as it stands. The bad faith successor can therefore acquire ownership after a total period of thirty years (taking into account a maximum of ten years minus the one day of good faith of the predecessor). The successor in bad faith will be treated in the same way as if the predecessor lacked good faith as well.

Predecessor in bad faith, successor in good faith. The second category of cases comprises situations where the first possessor was in bad faith, but is succeeded by a possessor in good faith. The first possessor must not, however, be a thief (cf. paragraph (1) of the present Article in conjunction with VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (3)). This second category of cases obviously needs specific regulation, which should mainly tackle two questions. These are addressed in the subsequent Comments.

Impermissibility of taking bad faith predecessor's period into account for the purpose of acquisition under VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1)(a). The first issue is whether the successor in good faith should be allowed to take advantage of any period of possession by a predecessor in bad faith in acquiring under VIII.–4:101 paragraph (1)(a), i.e. after a total period of only ten years. This would mean that if the bad faith predecessor had been in possession for over ten years, this would result in an immediate acquisition by his good faith successor as soon as the latter takes possession. This would be considered problematic because the owner's chances to recover his property would be extinguished all of a sudden. There are several alternatives how one could deal with this issue. One possibility could be to apply the short ten year period (according to the current possessor's good faith) and, in principle, to allow the good faith successor to benefit from his predecessor's period of possession by resorting to paragraph (1) of this Article though subject to an additional rule safeguarding that the owner has at least a minimum period of time to recover his goods after the successor in good faith obtained possession. For example, one could provide that the ten-year period does not expire before one or two years have passed as from the successor in good faith having obtained possession. However, since the expropriation effect on the owner is a harsh consequence and the possessor in bad faith, due to his actual or imputed knowledge, or doubts, has in some way "prevented" the goods from being returned to their owner (by actively hiding them or simply disregarding the fact that the goods belong to someone else), paragraph (2) of this Article provides that the period of a bad faith predecessor may not be accounted for in favour of a good faith possessor for the purpose of acquisition after a total period of ten years (Illustration 2). However, nothing in this Article prevents the second possessor from invoking VIII.–4:101 paragraph (1)(a) by itself, provided that he himself has possessed for a period of ten years in good faith, so that applying the present Article is not necessary (Illustration 3).

Illustration 2
P1 has possessed O's goods for twelve years in bad faith, when he donates them to P2, who is in good faith. Although a period of more than ten years of owner-possession has elapsed and P2 is in good faith, he is prevented from adding P1's twelve years to his period of possession, the latter being determined by VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1)(a). Consequently, P2 has not acquired ownership by continuous possession so far.

Illustration 3
P1 has possessed O's goods for twelve years in bad faith, when he donates them to P2, who is in good faith. P2 possesses the goods for another eleven years (in good faith). Here, P2 fulfils all requirements of VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1)(a) himself. He acquired ownership after ten years as from obtaining possession. The permissibility of taking a predecessor's period into account is irrelevant in this case.

Good faith successor may take bad faith predecessor's period into account for acquisition under VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1)(b). The second issue is whether the successor in good faith should necessarily be restricted to the possibility of acquiring only after ten years of possessing for himself (as discussed in Comment B) or whether he can take into account his bad faith predecessor's period at least for acquiring after a total period of thirty years, i.e. for invoking VIII.–4:101 paragraph (1)(b). This will be favourable for the successor in good faith where the bad faith predecessor has possessed for more then twenty years. He just has to possess for the remaining time period to complete the required thirty-year period of possession, instead of being forced to possess for at least another ten years for himself (cf. Illustration 4). The solution of allowing the good faith successor to resort to acquisition in the long period is adopted in paragraph (2) of this Article. The choice is based on the consideration that the owner would also lose his right to the goods if both the predecessor and the successor had been in bad faith. Accordingly, a successor in good faith should not be worse off. The result is, above all, also favourable in terms of legal certainty because with this solution, once continuous succession(s) in possession for at least a period of thirty years can be established, there is no need to investigate whether previous possessors were in good faith or not. The solution further corresponds with the existing law in some European legal systems, such as French and Belgian law, and is also advocated in the Netherlands. (And functionally, where the predecessor was in bad faith, it also corresponds with the rule frequently existing for "acquisition by general title", namely that the successor is deemed to continue possession in the same capacity as his predecessor.)

Illustration 4
P1 has possessed O's goods for 25 years in bad faith, when he donates them to P2, who henceforth possesses the goods for another six years in good faith. Here, P2 may add P1's period to his own period of possession and acquires ownership under VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1)(b) after a total period of thirty years. P2 does not have to wait until he himself will have possessed the goods for ten years.

Section 3: Effects of acquisition of ownership by continuous possession

VIII.–4:301: Acquisition of ownership

(1) Upon expiry of the period required for the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession the original owner loses and the owner-possessor acquires ownership.

(2) When the owner-possessor knows or can reasonably be expected to know that the goods are encumbered with a limited proprietary right of a third person, this right continues to exist as long as this right is not itself extinguished by expiry of the respective period, or a period of 30 years (VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1)(b)) or 50 years (VIII.–4:102 (Cultural objects) paragraph (1)(b)) has passed.

COMMENTS

A. Acquisition of ownership, paragraph (1)

General. Paragraph (1) of this Article spells out the basic effect of the expiration of the relevant period. Provided that all prerequisites of Sections 1 and 2 of this Chapter are fulfilled, the owner-possessor acquires the right of ownership of the goods. At the same time, the original owner loses his right of ownership. This is the approach traditionally taken in civil law countries. In principle, the effect of acquisition of ownership is already spelled out in VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1), but is repeated in Section 3, which comprises all provisions related to the effects of acquisition by continuous possession. Additional effects are regulated in paragraph (2) of this Article and in VIII.–4:302 (Extinction of rights under rules on unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability for damage).

Effects of acquisition of ownership. The rule that the owner-possessor "acquires ownership" is intended to be understood in a "unitary" sense, meaning that the acquisition of the right has effect as against the former owner as well as against third persons. In particular, the new owner is now protected against the former owner's claims for recovery of possession of the goods, which certainly is the most common effect of acquisition by continuous possession and comparable concepts from a comparative perspective. Also, the new owner now has relatively simple means of asserting his right to the goods against third parties, in situations where his right of ownership may be of importance, such as when re-obtaining possession from a third party interferer (like a thief), when bringing claims for damages under Book VI on non-contractual liability, when bringing claims based on unjustified enrichment under Book VII, or where the owner-possessor intends to sell or pledge the goods to a third party who, of course, wants to obtain a good title: As discussed above in VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) Comment D, acquisition of ownership by continuous possession fulfils an important fall-back function in situations where it is hard to prove that ownership has been acquired in another way (probatio diabolica). Conversely, such potential acquirers now have a (or an additional) ground for relying on their transferor's right to the goods, which may, as a tendency, reduce transaction costs and have a positive impact on the free flow of commerce and legal certainty in general. See further VIII.–4:101 Comment D. Finally, acquisition of ownership by continuous possession may also have effects on third parties to whom the owner-possessor has already granted or transferred limited proprietary rights before the period of acquisition elapsed. This last issue is dealt with more closely in the following Comment.

