The buyer should examine the goods delivered by the seller as quickly after delivery as is reasonably possible in order to discover any potential lack of conformity. A failure to do so may indirectly, by preventing timely notification of a non-conformity, cause the buyer to lose rights in respect of the relevant lack of conformity.

This requirement to examine ensures that problems are found and sorted out as soon as possible, which allows for commercial sales transactions to be processed rapidly. Not only does this Article therefore promote the needs of the commercial sector – in particular legal certainty – but it also reflects ordinary commercial practice.

B. Modalities of the requirement to examine the goods

Paragraph (1) requires the buyer to examine the goods 'within as short a period as is reasonable in the circumstances'. In some cases, the buyer may have to examine the goods immediately upon delivery, while in other cases, it will be sufficient if examination takes place shortly after delivery (for the notion of "reasonable", see Annex 1; ultimately, the courts will have to determine what is reasonable in a given case).

This Article does not specify how the buyer has to examine the goods delivered. For one thing, such specific procedures for the examination may have been agreed between the parties or may follow from usages or trade practice. In the absence of such indications, the proper procedure will depend on the goods delivered. The buyer may have to take samples, for instance in bulk deliveries, or even have to organise tests in other cases.

R, a retail chain selling textiles and clothing, bought a few hundred leather jackets from D, a wholesale dealer. The leather jackets were delivered on March 18 to the central warehouse, where they were sorted and packed for distribution to the stores. After distribution to the stores on March 26, the first complaints were received on April 5. In fact, half of the leather jackets turned out to be defective, which was visible to the naked eye (material of a poor quality, wrong colours, poor workmanship). In this situation, R has not complied with the duty to examine since, at least under a commercial contract, it would have been required to inspect the goods upon delivery, for instance through taking samples.

Paragraphs (2) and (3) take into account two situations where the buyer cannot examine, or have the goods examined, upon delivery: they provide exceptions to the strict time requirements of the main rule of paragraph (1). Even though the risk has passed in both cases (see IV.A.–5:202: (Carriage of the goods) and IV.A.–5:203: (Goods sold in transit)), the buyer is not in a position to examine the goods, since they are not yet to hand. As a result, the buyer may, in the case of the carriage of goods, defer the examination until the goods have arrived at their destination. Secondly, if the goods are redirected or redispatched while still in transit, and without the buyer having had a possibility to examine them, the buyer may defer the examination until the goods have arrived at their new destination. This rule does not apply, however, if the seller neither knew nor could have been expected to know of such a redirection or redispatch.

C. Failure to examine the goods

While paragraph (1) does not set out the direct legal consequences of a failure by the buyer to examine the goods, it is made clear that such a failure may result in the buyer losing, under III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity) as supplemented by IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity), the rights to rely on a lack of conformity which, because it was not discovered, was not notified in time. In fact, it is therefore the latter provisions which actually sanction the failure to examine the goods.

Illustration 2
During the process of delivery of fresh edible snails the buyer is informed that the truck was delayed at the border. Upon final delivery, (a) he takes a quick look at the goods and discovers that some of the snails have started to smell; (b) he takes a couple of samples and discovers that the snails have started to decay. In both cases, he notifies the seller that the snails are of poor quality. This example makes it clear that an examination as such has no real consequences since only notification matters. In case (a) the buyer does not even examine properly; but as long as there really was a lack of conformity the timely notification is sufficient to retain his rights. If the superficial ‘examination’ had produced no results, but a thorough examination would have, then the buyer ought to have discovered (and subsequently notified) the lack of conformity.

D. Consumer contract for sale

This Article does not apply in consumer contracts for sale, as is explicitly stated in paragraph (4). As a result, consumers are not required to examine the goods upon delivery. This is consistent with the fact that they also are not affected by the provisions on notification of non-conformity in III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity) and IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity) (see paragraph (4) of the former Article and Paragraph (1) of the latter).

NOTES

I. Duty to examine upon handing over the goods

1. Under non-consumer sales in some systems the buyer is under an express duty to examine the goods or cause them to be examined (CISG art. 38(1); FINLAND SGA § 31; HUNGARY CC § 283(1); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.337; NORWAY SGA § 31; POLAND CC art. 563; SLOVENIA LOA § 461(1); SWEDEN SGA § 31). Under POLISH law CC art. 563(1) this duty only applies if it is customary in the given relationship.

2. Under many systems, such a duty only exists under commercial sales (AUSTRIA Ccom §§ 377 and 378; CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 427; DENMARK SGA § 51; ESTONIA LOA § 219(1); GERMANY Ccom § 377; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.374; SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 427(1); SPAIN Ccom art. 336). In some systems the seller can demand that the buyer examines the goods under commercial sales (PORTUGAL CC art. 471 § único; SPAIN Ccom art. 336 in fine).

3. Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law Sale of Goods Act s. 34 there is no general duty on a buyer to examine goods, but the buyer has the right to request such an examination upon delivery. Nevertheless, it is still in the buyer's interests to carry out an examination, since following the delivery of goods, the buyer may be deemed to have 'accepted' them upon the occurrence of one of a number of events. One such event is the "lapse of a reasonable time ... without [the buyer] intimating to the seller that he has rejected them" (Sale of Goods Act s. 35(4)).

4. Under other systems, the buyer is under no express duty to examine the goods. Nevertheless, it is generally still in the buyer's own interest to carry out an examination. Otherwise he may lose his rights to remedies if he fails to notify the seller of defects he should have noticed, or fails to respect applicable time-limits (BELGIUM; CZECH REPUBLIC cf. CC §§ 500(1) and 504; FRANCE; GREECE CC arts. 536 and 537; ITALY CC art. 1495; LATVIA; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:23(1); PORTUGAL).

5. Under BELGIAN and FRENCH law the two principal regulations concerning liability, the non-conforming delivery and the guarantee for hidden defects are distinguished by the acceptance of the buyer. By explicitly or tacitly acknowledging that the delivered thing conforms to the contract and contains no visible defects, only the actions due to hidden defects are left. It is therefore in the interest of the buyer who receives the things, but not a legal obligation, to inspect the goods and to notify the seller in case of non-conformity. If he does not do so, the seller can allege that the things are accepted as conforming by the buyer. According to CC art. 1642 the seller is not liable for apparent defects which the buyer could have discovered himself. By accepting the delivered thing (explicitly or tacitly), the buyer recognizes not only that the delivered thing is in conformity with the sold thing but also that it is free of noticeable defects. A noticeable defect is a defect that can be noted by a normal person on the basis of an attentive examination and that may not elude a careful buyer's notice. In this the capacity of the buyer is taken into account and it is assumed that non-professional buyers are capable of lesser scrutiny. But even when a professional buyer deals with a professional seller, he is not expected to subject the thing to all possible tests. If the buyer complains about non-conforming goods, he has to enter a protest as soon as possible and take all reasonable storage measures to prevent the thing from undergoing the slightest alteration. If the buyer uses, changes or disposes of the thing without any complaint, a tacit acceptance will be deduced. If he protests and in spite of this changes or alienates the thing, he will bear the risk and the onus of proof.

6. Generally, under consumer sales, the buyer is under no obligation to examine the goods. However, as under the general sales regulation, to examine the goods is often in the consumer's own interest. For instance, under NORDIC consumer sales there is no express duty to examine the goods. Nevertheless, the SWEDISH preparatory works provide that the consumer should normally make at least a superficial examination quite soon after having received the goods, but that a thorough examination or testing the different functions of the goods cannot be required (Prop 1989/90:89, 114)). In POLAND the seller is not liable if the consumer ought reasonably to have known about the defect (Consumer Sales Act art. 7).

7. Under HUNGARIAN law the buyer does not have to examine the qualities (properties) of the goods certified or guaranteed by the seller (CC § 283(2)).

8. Under NORDIC law a buyer is not under a duty to examine goods concerning legal defects (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 41). This is explained by the fact that there is no such existing trade practice, compared with what is customary concerning factual defects (SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 444).

II. Speed of examination

9. Normally, it is required that the examination takes place speedily after the delivery. Under some systems it is required that the examination takes place immediately (AUSTRIA Ccom § 377; ESTONIA LOA § 219(1); GERMANY Ccom § 377) or as soon as practicable (CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 427(1); FINLAND SGA § 31; NORWAY SGA § 31; SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 427(1); SLOVENIA LOA § 461(1); SWEDEN SGA § 31). The buyer is to carry out the examination within a reasonable time (CISG art. 38(1); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.337). Moreover, under many systems it is explicitly provided that the examination is to take place in accordance with trade customs etc. (DENMARK SGA § 51; FINLAND SGA § 31; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.337; NORWAY SGA § 31; POLAND CC art. 563(2); SLOVENIA CC § 461(1); SWEDEN SGA § 31).

III. Examination where carriage of goods or sale in transit is involved

10. Under some systems, special regulation is provided as to sales contracts where carriage of goods is involved. Generally, in such a case, the buyer is not obliged to examine the goods until they have arrived at their destination (CISG art. 38(2); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 427(2); DENMARK SGA § 51(2); ESTONIA LOA § 219(2); FINLAND SGA § 31(2); ITALY CC art. 1511 (specifically regarding the notice of defects); NORWAY SGA § 31(2); POLAND CC art. 545(2); SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 427(2); SWEDEN SGA § 31(2)).

11. If the goods are redirected in transit or redispatched by the buyer without a reasonable opportunity for examination by him and at the time of the conclusion of the contract and the seller knew or ought to have known of the possibility of such redirection or redispatch, an examination may be deferred until after the goods have arrived at the new destination (CISG art. 38(3); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 427(2); ESTONIA LOA § 219(3); FINLAND SGA § 31(3); NORWAY SGA § 31(3); SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 427(2); SLOVENIA LOA § 461(3); SWEDEN SGA § 31(3)).

IV.A.–4:302: Notification of lack of conformity

(1) In a contract between two businesses the rule in III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity) requiring notification of a lack of conformity within a reasonable time is supplemented by the following rules.

(2) The buyer in any event loses the right to rely on a lack of conformity if the buyer does not give the seller notice of the lack of conformity at the latest within two years from the time at which the goods were actually handed over to the buyer in accordance with the contract.

(3) If the parties have agreed that the goods must remain fit for a particular purpose or for their ordinary purpose during a fixed period of time, the period for giving notice under paragraph (2) does not expire before the end of the agreed period.

(4) Paragraph (2) does not apply in respect of third party claims or rights pursuant to IV.A.–2:305 (Third party rights or claims in general) and IV.A.–2:306 (Third party rights or claims based on industrial property or other intellectual property) .

COMMENTS

A. General

Because rules on notification have an application to sales, leases of goods and services there is a general provision in III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity). As applied to sales this has the effect that the buyer may not rely on the lack of conformity unless buyer notifies it to the seller within a reasonable time, specifying the nature of the lack of conformity. The reasonable time runs from the time when the goods are supplied or from the time, if it is later, when the buyer discovered or could reasonably be expected to have discovered the non-conformity. However, the seller is not entitled to rely on the buyer's failure to notify if the failure relates to facts which the seller knew or could reasonably be expected to have known and which the seller did not disclose to the buyer. These rules do not apply where the buyer is a consumer: in such a case there is no specific requirement of notification and only the general rule on good faith and fair dealing applies.

The thinking behind these general rules is that the buyer has to indicate any discoverable lack of conformity to the seller, who can then follow up the complaint and ultimately solve the problem. The notification requirement thus aims to resolve quickly any dispute due to non-conforming goods. The requirement applies to any lack of conformity and therefore covers both material and so-called legal defects in the goods.

It should also be mentioned that the rules on prescription in Book III will generally have the effect that the buyer will lose the right to found on a non-conformity three years after the time of delivery of the goods or, if later, the time when the buyer knew of or could reasonably be expected to have known of, the non-conformity. See III.–7:101 (Rights subject to prescription), III.–7:201 (General period), III.–7:203 (Commencement) and III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance). Regardless of what the buyer knew or should have known there is prescription after ten years from the due time of delivery (III.–7:307 (Maximum length of period)). These rules on prescription apply to consumer and non-consumer buyers alike.

B. Absolute time period of two years

The present Article supplements these general rules by a special rule for contracts for sale between businesses. It is a rule of a different type from the general notification rules. It does not depend on what the buyer knew or could reasonably be expected to have known. It is not therefore a sort of more specific version of the rule on good faith and fair dealing in the exercise of remedies. It is an automatic cut-off rule, more akin to the rule on the maximum length of prescription. Its effect is that, even if excusably ignorant of the non-conformity, the buyer loses the right to rely on it if it is not notified to the seller within two years from the time at which the goods were handed over. This rule is heavily influenced by the CISG which provides (art. 39(2)) that:

> In any event, the buyer loses the right to rely on a lack of conformity of the goods if he does not give the seller notice thereof at the latest within a period of two years from the date on which the goods were actually handed over to the buyer, unless this time-limit is inconsistent with a contractual period of guarantee.

The starting point of the two-year period under paragraph (2) is when the goods are actually handed over to the buyer, meaning when the buyer actually receives the goods and not, for instance, when the goods are handed over to a carrier. This point in time was chosen for reasons of clarity and since only when the buyer has the goods in actual possession can the buyer discover any lack of conformity present.

The rationale of this absolute time-limit is to safeguard the seller against claims brought long after the delivery of the goods. An absolute time-limit allows for a better calculation of costs concerning possible risks stemming from claims from the buyer. Besides, legal certainty is promoted since the seller will know that all transactions are definitely settled after the lapse of a certain period. Furthermore, the costs of legal proceedings increase as time passes, as it becomes more complicated to investigate the causes of a defect and to establish whether it existed at the time of delivery. On the other hand, the interests of the buyer require sufficiently long time-limits for a lack of conformity to become apparent.

The two-year time-limit under paragraph (2) can be changed by express agreement. As the rule applies only to contracts between businesses the limits on derogation in relation to consumer contracts for sale have no application. Accordingly the period can be shortened or lengthened by agreement between the parties.

C. Effect of contractual guarantee

Paragraph (3) clarifies that if the parties have agreed that the goods must remain fit for a particular purpose or for their ordinary purpose during a fixed period of time, the period for giving notice under paragraph (2) does not expire before the end of the agreed period. This reflects the closing words of the CISG art. 39(2) – "unless this time-limit is inconsistent with a contractual period of guarantee". A buyer – even if not a consumer buyer – should not lose continuing rights before they have expired.

D. Exception for third party rights or claims

Paragraph (4) exempts rights arising out of third party claims or rights under IV.A.–2:305 (Third party rights or claims in general) and IV.A.–2:306 (Third party rights or claims based on industrial property or other intellectual property) from the two-year time-limit of paragraph (2). Therefore, subject to the normal rules on good faith and fair dealing, the only relevant time-limit is the period of prescription established by Book III, Chapter 7.

E. Consumer contract for sale

It is worth emphasising again that this Article does not apply to consumer contracts for sale but only to contracts between businesses. For consumers therefore, subject to the normal rules on good faith and fair dealing, the only relevant time-limit is the period of prescription established by Book III, Chapter 7.

NOTES

I. General duty to notify lack of conformity

1. A buyer's duty to notify the seller of a lack of conformity can be found under many systems (CISG art. 39(1); CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 504 and 599 and Ccom art. 428; BELGIUM CC art. 1642; DENMARK SGA § 52(1); ESTONIA LOA § 220(1); FINLAND SGA § 32(1); HUNGARY CC § 307; ITALY CC art. 1495; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.348; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:23(1); NORWAY SGA § 32(1); POLAND CC art. 563; PORTUGAL CC art. 916; SLOVAKIA CC §§ 504 and 599 and Ccom art. 428; SLOVENIA LOA §§ 461 and 462; SWEDEN SGA § 32(1)). Cf. also the Notes on prescription periods under IX. since the difference is not always clear-cut.
2. The buyer must generally notify the seller within a reasonable time after he has discovered the lack of conformity or ought to have discovered it (CISG art. 39(1); FINLAND SGA § 32(1); HUNGARY CC § 307; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.348; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:23(1); NORWAY SGA § 32(1); SWEDEN SGA § 32(1)). The buyer must notify the defect to the seller without undue delay after he had the possibility to examine the thing (CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA CC §§ 504 and 599 and Ccom art. 428).
3. Under some systems there are short fixed time-limits running from the discovery of the lack of conformity. For non-consumer sales, the buyer is obliged to notify the seller within 8 days after discovering the lack of conformity (ITALY CC arts. 1495(1) and 1497(2); SLOVENIA LOA §§ 461(1) and 462). Under POLISH law the buyer must notify the seller about the defect within one month from its discovery, and if the inspection of the thing is customary in the given circumstances, within one month from the time when he could have discovered it when observing due diligence (CC art. 563(1)). Under PORTUGUESE law the buyer has to notify the seller within two months from the detection of the defect (CC arts. 918 and 919). In SPAIN there is no duty to promptly notify the seller of the lack of conformity, but the buyer loses the remedies for non-performance if notice of the defects has not been served on the seller within four or thirty days, according to the kind of irregular performance (Ccom arts. 336 and 342). Although these time limitations were probably thought of as prescription rules by the old legislator, court doctrine has promptly shifted the sense of the rules, making them work only as notice time (TS 20 November 1991, RAJ 1991 no. 8469, TS 23 December 1996, RAJ 1996 no. 9373).
4. Generally under all systems the duty to notify varies if the defects are hidden or obvious, since obvious defects must generally be notified speedily. For instance, under ESTONIAN law the moment when the defects should have been discovered depends on whether these are hidden or apparent: during the examination the buyer is expected to discover only apparent defects; as the buyer can reasonably expect that the seller's delivery conforms to the contract he is generally not under a duty to specifically search for the defects or engage professionals to do so (NC CC 3-2-1-50-06). Similarly under SLOVENIAN law, if both parties are present at the examination, apparent defects are to be notified immediately (LOA § 461(2)). Under some systems, however, a differentiation is made between hidden and manifest defects when it comes to notification in the sense that the buyer is only under the obligation to notify obvious defects or that different time-limits apply. Under a few systems the buyer is only obliged to notify the seller concerning manifest defects immediately after delivery (BELGIUM CC art. 1642; FRANCE Cass.civ. I, 26 June 2001, CCC 2001, no. 156, note Leveneur, if the buyer accepts delivery without mentioning an apparent lack of conformity he loses his right to claim a remedy). Under SPANISH commercial sales, different time-limits apply for obvious and hidden defects.

5. Under other systems, the buyer is not obliged to notify the seller (at least concerning hidden defects). He may however be obliged to bring a court claim within a specific period, cf. further under VII. Moreover, under the COMMON LAW a failure to notify a lack of conformity within a reasonable time after delivery will preclude the remedy of termination (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 35(4)).

6. Nevertheless, that the buyer may exercise his remedies without being subject to a notification duty is not always unconstrained. Under GREEK law the exercise of any remedy must be in compliance with good faith, otherwise it may be abusive (CC art. 281). However, the courts have been hesitant in declaring the exercising of remedies in the context of sales to be abusive (A.P.17/1995 EllDik 38, 41; Ef Thessalonikis 781/1999 Arm 1999, 800).

II. Notification under commercial sale

7. Under some systems, a duty to notify the seller is only to be found under commercial sales (AUSTRIA Ccom § 377; GERMANY Ccom § 377; SPAIN Ccom arts. 336 and 342). Moreover, under commercial sale, the buyer is often under a stricter obligation to notify quickly. Under some systems, the buyer is obliged to notify immediately or without delay (GERMANY Ccom § 377; POLAND CC art. 563(2); SLOVENIA LOA §§ 461(1) and 462). Under PORTUGUESE commercial sales the buyer must notify within 8 days from the delivery (Ccom art. 471). Under SPANISH commercial sales, the buyer is obliged to notify obvious defects immediately if the goods are examined by the buyer at the time of delivery, and notification within four days if the goods are packed (Ccom art. 336). Hidden defects must be notified within 30 days from the time of delivery (Ccom art. 342).

III. Notification under consumer sale

8. The Consumer Sales Directive art. 5(1) provides the Member States with an option to oblige the consumer, in order to benefit from his rights, to inform the seller of the lack of conformity within a period of two months from the date on which he detected such lack of conformity. Such a duty to notify under consumer sales can be found under a number of systems (DENMARK SGA § 81; ESTONIA LOA § 220(1); FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 16; ITALY Consumer Code art. 132; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:23(1); NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 27(1); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 9; SLOVAKIA CC § 626; SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act art. 37a(1); SPAIN ConsProtA art. 123(4) presumes that the notification has been made within the legal period; SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 23). A similar duty can be found under HUNGARIAN law, with the exception that the consumer will not lose his rights completely, but only be liable for the damage caused by his omission or delay (CC § 307(2)). Under BELGIAN consumer sales the seller and the consumer may agree upon a period of time within which the consumer has to inform the seller of a lack of conformity (BELGIUM CC art. 1649quarter § 2).

9. Under NORDIC consumer sales notice may be given to someone who has an agreement with the seller to repair or restore the goods, instead of to the seller (DENMARK SGA § 84; NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 27(3); SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 33(2)). Similarly, under FINNISH law notification may be lodged not only with the final seller, but also with the intermediary trader and a previous seller in the same chain of contracts (Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 16(1)).

IV. Notification of legal defects

10. Under some systems, the buyer's duty to notify the seller in case of legal defects is especially regulated or deviates from the general notification requirements. Under the CISG there is a special notification procedure in art. 43. Moreover, only positive knowledge of the third party right on the part of the seller excludes the application of the notification bar in art. 43(1). Under POLISH law the buyer from whom a third party vindicates claims for the thing sold is obliged to notify the seller about the fact immediately and to summon him to participate in the case (CC art. 573). In SPAIN if the goods are taken from the buyer by a third party on the basis of a final court judgment, the buyer has to notify the seller at the moment the buyer knows about the claim instituted by the third party (CC arts. 1481, 1482; for the procedural issues, Durán Rivacoba, Evicción y saneamiento, 157 ff) (Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II(1), 44; Badenes Gasset, El contrato de compraventa, 588). Under DUTCH law a legal defect does not constitute a non-conformity, and hence CC art. 7:23 does not apply if the goods are burdened with a legal defect. Instead, the more general regulation in CC art. 6:89 applies, containing a similar duty to notify 'within an adequate period' after the moment he has or should have discovered the defect. Since CC art. 6:89, as well as art. 7:23, is directed more against physical defects, the provision is to be applied cautiously (Asser (-Hijma), Bijzondere Overeenkomsten I[6], no. 543, 559)).

V. Modalities of notification

11. Generally, there are no special requirements as to form concerning the notice of defects. As a consequence, the notice may be given either orally or in written form. However, under POLISH law it is specifically provided that in order to observe the time-limits for the notification of the defects in the thing sold it is sufficient to dispatch a registered letter before the lapse of those time-limits (CC art. 563(3) and Consumer Sales Act art. 9).

12. If the notification is sent by mail, however, there is a presumption under many systems that the notification is valid if the buyer dispatches it in a timely fashion (CISG art. 27; FINLAND SGA § 82; GERMANY Ccom § 377(4); NORWAY SGA § 82; SWEDEN SGA § 82). Under SLOVENIAN law if the notification was sent on time by registered mail, telegram or in any other reliable manner and it arrives with a delay or not at all, the buyer is nevertheless deemed to have notified the seller (LOA § 464(2)). Under CZECH law there is no such presumption, hence a notification has to reach the seller at the latest on the last day of the notification period (CC §§ 504, 599 and 626).

13. Under many systems it is merely prescribed that the buyer must notify the seller of the lack of conformity. This includes that the buyer specifies the nature of the lack of conformity, so that the seller can judge if there is an actual lack of conformity at hand and which remedies might be appropriate. Under CISG art. 39(1) it is expressly regulated that the buyer must specify the nature of the lack of conformity. Other systems go even further than this. When notifying the seller of the defects, the buyer must precisely describe the defect and invite the seller to examine the goods (ESTONIA LOA § 220(3) (commercial sales only); SLOVENIA LOA § 464(1)). In LITHUANIA the buyer is bound to notify the seller of the breach of any condition of the contract specifying the quality, quantity, range, completeness, containers and packaging of the items (CC art. 6.348).

VI. Legal consequences of a failure to notify

14. Under most systems, the buyer loses his remedial rights against the seller altogether concerning the defect in question if he fails to notify in a timely fashion. This principle may be expressed in many ways. It may be established that the buyer loses the right to rely on a lack of conformity of the goods (CISG art. 39(1); ESTONIA LOA § 220(3) no. 1; ITALY CC art. 1495(1)); that the buyer must inform the seller in order to benefit from his rights (Consumer Sales Directive art. 5(1)(2); POLAND CC arts. 563(1) and 573); or that he may not invoke that the goods are not in conformity unless he notifies the seller (NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:23(1); FINLAND, NORWAY, SPAIN Ccom art. 342 and SWEDEN SGA § 32(1)). Another common approach is that if the buyer fails to notify in good time, it is presumed that he approves of the lack of conformity and thus accepts the goods as they are (AUSTRIA Ccom § 377; GERMANY Ccom § 377(2) and (3)). In the NETHERLANDS, according to the prevailing opinion, the buyer additionally loses the right to claim avoidance of the contract for fundamental mistake (cf. Mon. NBW B-65b (Loos), no. 32, 71) or to claim damages under tort law insofar as the facts give rise to such a claim (cf. HR 21 April 2006, NedJur 2006, 272 (Inno Holding Baarn B.V./gemeente Sluis)).

15. Under a few systems, however, the buyer does not lose his rights altogether. Under the CISG art. 44 if the buyer fails to notify within a reasonable time after he has discovered or ought to have discovered the lack of conformity, he still retains his right to reduce the price or claim damages, except for loss of profit, if he has a reasonable excuse for his failure. However, it should be noticed that this exception has been very rarely used in practice (cf. Sivesand, The Buyer's remedies for Non-Conforming Goods, 172 f). A similar exception can be found in ESTONIA, LOA § 220(3)). Under HUNGARIAN law CC § 307 the buyer will only be liable for the damage caused by his omission or delay. Similarly under LITHUANIAN law if the buyer fails to notify the seller about the lack of conformity, the seller has the right to refuse to meet, fully or in part, the buyer's demands as to the remedy provided that he proves that following the breach of the obligation by the buyer his demands can no longer be met or that meeting the demands would result in unreasonable costs for the seller compared to those which the seller would have incurred if the buyer had duly notified the seller of the breach of contract (CC art. 6.348). Under HUNGARIAN law, the applicable prescription and preclusion periods do not apply to a claim for damages. Here the general prescription period of five years applies (CC § 324(1)).

16. Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law, although there is no actual duty to notify, only termination is lost after the lapse of a reasonable time. Hence, the buyer still has the right to ask for damages.

VII. Fixed time-limits for lack of conformity running from delivery

17. Under some systems, a specific time-limit is applicable usually running from the delivery or handing over of the goods within which the buyer must notify the seller. Generally, such a time-limit is not applicable if the seller knew about the defect or otherwise acted contrary to good faith The length of the time period varies between the different systems. The time-limit may amount to six months (CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 504 and 599; SLOVENIA LOA § 462(2)), one year (POLAND CC art. 568(1)) or two years (CISG art. 39(2); DENMARK SGA § 54; NORWAY SGA § 32(2); SLOVAKIA CC §§ 599, 620 and 626; SWEDEN SGA § 32(2)). Also under HUNGARIAN law, CC § 308/A, there is a preclusion period of 1 year or 3 years in the case of goods designated for long-term use. In several other countries, a similar result is reached through a sales-specific prescription period running from delivery, cf. under IX. In other countries, there are no actual time-limits, only general prescription periods (cf. under IX.) and/or a general duty to notify the seller about the lack of conformity (cf. under I.).

18. Under LATVIAN law, there is no general time-limit to be found, only specific time-limits for different remedies. Hence, the right to termination expires after six months, and the right to a price reduction after one year has passed from the day the contract was entered into or the date a specific guarantee was given (CC arts. 1616, 1618 and 1619).

19. Some countries provide for longer time-limits in consumer sales. In consumer sales the time-limit is two years after delivery (CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 620(1) and 626(1); ESTONIA LOA § 218(2) (in respect of the defects discovered during that period the notification can hence take place within 2 years and 2 months from delivery); SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act art. 37b and one year after delivery in the case of second-hand goods (SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act art. 37b. Under SWEDISH consumer sales, the time-limit has recently been extended to three years (Consumer Sales Act § 23(3)). Under NORWEGIAN consumer sales, the time-limit amounts to five years if the goods or part of the goods are intended to last for a considerably longer period of time than two years in the case of normal use (Consumer Sales Act § 27(2)). Under POLISH law the Consumer Sales Act art. 10 lays down a time-limit of two years from delivery and if the goods are replaced this period starts anew. In SPAIN the legal framework is as follows: in non-consumer sales, there is a time limit of six months, which has to be deemed as a prescription time limit, unless the aliud pro alio rules apply, in which case the prescription period extends to fifteen years. In commercial sales (sales for the purpose of resale), the buyer has also to comply with the time-limit of 4 or 30 days to serve notice of the lack of conformity, unless - though dubious - aliud pro alio rules apply. In consumer sales, the consumer is subject to a two months notification duty (running as from the day the buyer became aware of the lack of conformity) and to a three years prescription period, running from the date of delivery. Additionally, in consumer sales and in sales of residential or commercial buildings (but not in others) there is a period of two years (consumer sale) and three/ten years (immoveable sale) within which the lack of conformity must be manifested.

20. Under other systems, a special remedial regime has been introduced under consumer sales, in order to comply with the Consumer Sales Directive. The time-limit here amounts to two years (Consumer Sales Directive art. 5(1); BELGIUM CC art. 1649quarter § 1; FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-12; ITALY Consumer Code art. 132(1)). Under BELGIAN law in the event of repair, replacement or negotiations between seller and consumer with a view to an amicable settlement, the period of two years during which any lack of conformity must become apparent is suspended or interrupted (CC art. 1649quarter § 1). Generally, the consumer is however not barred from resorting to the general regime of liability either before or after the expiry of this two-year period.

21. Under some systems, the time-limits do not apply regarding legal defects (CISG art. 43; NORWAY SGA § 41(1); SLOVENIA LOA §§ 488-495; SWEDEN SGA § 41(1)).

Under POLISH law the time-limit concerning legal defects only expires after the lapsing of one year from the time when the buyer learned of the defect. If the buyer learned of the defect only as a result of a third party suit, the time runs from the day on which the decision delivered in the dispute with the third party has acquired legal force (CC art. 576(1)). Under HUNGARIAN law, the general prescription period of five years applies concerning legal defects, CC § 324(1).

VIII. Default or mandatory rules

22. Generally, under non-consumer sales, the regulation on notification periods and time-limits are default rules. There are however exceptions, for instance under CZECH law all rules on lack of conformity are generally mandatory, including the notification periods, with the exception of commercial sales (CC §§ 499-510 and 596-600). Under GERMAN law, the parties may not agree upon a shorter prescription period than one year through standard contract terms (CC § 309 no. 8 lit. b ff). Under DUTCH law, an extension of a statutory expiration period is not possible (Asser (-Hartkamp), Verbintenissenrecht I[11], no. 692; Asser (-Hijma), Bijzondere Overeenkomsten I[6], no. 553). The reduction of notification periods and time-limits can in many cases be regarded as an unfair contract term according to general contract law. For instance, under ITALIAN law any agreement which imposes prescription periods so strict that they would render the exercise of the rights of the parties excessively difficult are declared null and void (CC art. 2965).

23. Under consumer sales, however, due to the Consumer Sales Directive, the regulations on notification periods and time-limits are generally mandatory. The parties may therefore only agree upon time-limits longer than two years, or notification periods longer than two months. The Directive only provides for a possibility to restrict the time-limit to one year in the case of second-hand goods in art. 7(1) no. 2. This possibility has been used under several systems, where the parties are hence free to agree upon such a restriction of the time-limit (BELGIUM CC art. 1649quarter § 1; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 626(3); GERMANY CC § 475(2); HUNGARY CC § 308(4); ITALY Consumer Code art. 134(2); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 10; SPAIN ConsProtA art. 123(1).

24. Under LITHUANIAN law, in consumer sales any contractual provision which restricts the rights of the consumer can be declared null and void by the court if it is unfair to the consumer (CC art. 6.188).

IX. Related issues: periods of prescription for claims based on lack of conformity

25. In the area of prescription periods, there is much diversity between the different systems concerning the length as well as the starting point of the prescription period (cf. also PECL Chapter 14). Moreover, some systems provide for sales-specific prescription periods, whereas others rely on the prescription periods of general contract law.

26. Under some systems, the period of prescription runs from delivery or the passing of the risk. For movable goods the period may amount to six months (AUSTRIA CC § 933; HUNGARY CC § 308; GREECE CC art. 554), one year (ITALY CC art. 1495(3); POLAND CC art. 568(1)), two years (GERMANY CC § 438(1) no. 3; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.338; PORTUGAL Decree-law no. 67/2003 art. 5(1)), three years (ESTONIA CCGPA § 146(1); NORWAY Prescription Act (Lov om foreldelse av fordringer/Foreldelsesloven, 1979), five years (DENMARK Prescription Act 1908), ten years (FRANCE (commercial sales) Ccom art. L. 110-4, Com. 27

November 2001, Bull.civ. I, no. 187; JCP 2002.II.10021, note Jourdain; SWEDEN Prescription Act, Preskriptionslagen (1981:130) § 2) or even thirty years (FRANCE CC art. 2262, see Cass.civ. III, 16 November 2005, Bull.civ. III, no. 222, D. 2006, 971, note Cabrillac). Leading to a similar result, under ENGLISH law Limitation Act 1980 art. 5 there is a six-year prescription period running from the date of breach. Under HUNGARIAN law the general rules on prescription (CC §§ 324-327) apply, among them also the rules on the suspension of prescription. Pursuant to CC § 326(2), if the buyer is prevented from pursuing his remedies due to an excusable reason (impediment), he may pursue his remedies for 3 months after the impediment has ceased to exist. I.e. if the lack of conformity has not become apparent within the prescription period of 6 months, the buyer will still be entitled to pursue his remedies within 3 months from when the lack of conformity became apparent.

27. Under other systems, the prescription period runs from the moment in time when the buyer notifies the seller of the non-conformity. Also here the length varies between one year (SLOVENIA LOA § 480), two years (NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:23(2)) and three years (CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA CC § 508 in conjunction with § 101). Moreover under CZECH and SLOVAK commercial sales, the prescription period is four years (Ccom art. 397). Under SLOVENIAN law, however, this is not a genuine prescription period, since the buyer loses his rights (so-called preclusion) if he does not start judicial enforcement within 1 year after notification, LOA § 480(1). The time period cannot stand still or be interrupted and start all over again.

28. Under still other systems, the prescription period starts running from when the lack of conformity became manifest, or upon detection. The period may be two years (FRANCE CC art. 1648), three years (FINLAND Prescription Act (Laki Velan Vanhentumisesta 15 August 2003/728), or five years (SCOTLAND Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 art. 6(3)). The PECL establish a general period of prescription of three years (art. 14:201). This period generally starts to run from the time when the debtor has to effect performance (art. 14:203(1)). However, the period of prescription is suspended according to art. 14:301 for as long as the creditor does not know, and could not reasonably have known, of the facts giving rise to the claim. This exception would, for instance, apply in the case of hidden defects. Finally, PECL art. 14:307 provides for a long stop period of 10 years, after the lapse of which the debtor's remedies are cut off. Under SPANISH law the period in which to exercise the remedies for hidden defects in the goods is six months (CC art. 1490). Although the provision indicates that the period starts running from the time of delivery, the case law deviates on this approach and has indicated that the period starts when the buyer knows about the hidden defects (TS 23 July 1994, RAJ 1994 no. 6587 Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II(2), 57; Martínez de Aguirre Aldaz, Derecho de Obligaciones, 498). The TS has repeatedly established that all these specific actions are not incompatible with the general remedies for non-performance under CC art. 1124, whose period of prescription (de la Cuesta Rute, Contratos Mercantiles V(2), 179) amounts to 15 years (general prescription period for personal actions). A different approach is taken with regard to commercial sales, where the need for security in commercial transactions advises against having very long periods in which to claim non-conformity. Under NORWEGIAN law, there is also a complimentary rule establishing that the period of prescription does not elapse earlier than one year after the creditor has gained or should have gained actual knowledge of the claim, an exception which, for instance, will apply to hidden defects (Prescription Act art. 10 no. 1).

29. Under BELGIAN law lack of conformity concerning delivery is subject to the general period of prescription which amounts to 10 years, running from the day of the conclusion of the contract (CC art. 2262bis). For a hidden defect the buyer must claim within a short period of time as from the day of the discovery of the defect (BELGIUM CC art. 1648). Both the duration and the starting point of the period are determined by a judge taking into account all the circumstances of the case. These concern, for example, the nature of the thing sold, the nature of the defect, the customs, the quality of the parties, but also the parties' actions both in and out of court, like the appointment of a judicial expert. Concerning the duration of the period the courts generally accept that serious negotiations with a view to obtaining a friendly settlement suspend the short period. The short period starts running once again the moment it becomes clear that a friendly settlement is impossible. The period is then determined from the breaking off of the proven negotiations.

30. Under some systems the period of prescription in consumer sales is longer than the general period of prescription. Under ITALIAN law the prescription period for an action based on defects in the goods which have not been wilfully hidden by the seller can be commenced within 26 months from the delivery of the goods (Consumer Code art. 132(4)). Under HUNGARIAN law, the period of prescription amounts to two years from delivery (CC § 308). In SPAIN the prescription period is three years from delivery (ConsProtA art. 123(3)). In contrast, FRENCH law establishes a more unfavourable prescription period for consumer sales, namely two years from the delivery (Consumer Code art. L. 211-12). However, a consumer can claim on the ground of general sales law when the action on the implementation of the Consumer Sales Directive has prescribed (Consumer Code art. L. 211-13).

IV.A.–4:303: Notification of partial delivery

The buyer does not have to notify the seller that not all the goods have been delivered, if the buyer has reason to believe that the remaining goods will be delivered.

COMMENTS

A. General

This provision aims to solve a potential problem associated with the wide definition of non-conformity in IV.A.–2:301 (Conformity with the contract). Since a deficiency in quantity is treated as a lack of conformity under that provision there is a danger that a non-consumer buyer would have to pay for goods which were not received if the seller was not notified of the shortfall within a reasonable time. This article aims to protect the buyer from such a result subject to certain preconditions.

B. No notification required

Under the Article, the buyer is not required to notify the seller of the shortfall in the delivery if the buyer has reason to believe that the seller will deliver the remaining goods. If the buyer, however, is not sure about that the rest of the goods will be delivered, notification to the seller is still required if the buyer wishes to retain rights to rely on the non-performance. This solution can be justified as the seller should know that not all the goods have been delivered, especially if the buyer has good reason to believe this. In this case, the seller therefore needs no notification in order to be informed about the problem.

> The buyer has ordered three tons of oranges, which the seller promised to deliver by lorry. One lorry breaks down; the other delivers half the batch of oranges. The buyer is informed about the delay. The buyer has reason to believe that the seller will still deliver the missing part and will not lose any rights by failing to notify at that stage.

In this context, price may serve as an indicator. In the case of an overall price, the buyer will, in every likelihood, not expect further delivery; whereas in the case of a unit price, it may be different. Other indicators could be invoices or similar statements relating to the delivery.

An example of circumstances speaking against further delivery is the case of an invoice from the seller that concerns the whole contracted quantity, but a few units are missing.

> The buyer has bought 100 tons of bananas from the seller. The shipment arrives, but it consists of only 90 tons. The invoice refers to the delivery of 100 tons. The buyer has no reason to believe that the seller will still deliver the missing 10 tons, since the invoice shows that the seller thought that the whole quantity had been delivered.

Furthermore, the circumstances of a given case may reveal that a part of the delivery has disappeared during transport, for instance because a box has been broken open. In these and similar circumstances, the buyer does not have reason to believe that a further delivery is forthcoming.

C. Consumer contract for sale

Although consumer contracts for sale are not expressly excluded from the Article they will in fact not be affected by it as a consumer buyer is, in any event, not required to notify in order to retain remedies. See III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity) paragraph (4) and IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity) paragraph (1). Moreover a consumer buyer who has justifiably assumed that the seller was going to deliver the missing quantity would not be acting contrary to good faith and fair dealing in not notifying the seller of the shortfall.

NOTES

Notification of partial delivery in relation to notification of lack of conformity

1. Under many systems, the buyer is under an obligation to notify the seller concerning any lack of conformity in order to preserve his rights. If a deficiency in quantity is treated as a lack of conformity (as is the case under these Principles cf. IV.A.–2:301 (Conformity with the contract), this would mean that the buyer would have to pay for goods he has not received if he fails to notify the seller thereof in good time. In order to protect the buyer from such a result, some countries provide for an exception to the obligation to provide notice.

2. Under NORDIC law it is provided that if it can be assumed that the seller is of the opinion that he has fulfilled the contract as a whole in spite of the fact that not all the goods have been delivered, the provisions concerning conformity apply (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 43(2)). This provision aims at substantiating the borderline between a partial delay in delivery and non-conformity in the goods. The difference between the provisions concerning delay and non-conformity lies in the buyer's duty to inspect the goods and notify the seller in the latter case, where non-compliance may lead to the buyer losing his rights against the seller. The prerequisites in SGA § 43(2) are to be judged objectively. For example, the bill from the seller may concern the whole contracted quantity, but a few units are missing. Furthermore, the circumstances may reveal that a part of the delivery has disappeared during transport, for instance because a box has been broken open or the packing was damaged. If such or similar circumstances are not at hand, it is assumed that the seller knew that he had only performed part of his obligations. The provision is not to be interpreted so that it is presumed what opinion the seller actually had, especially if the buyer has justifiably assumed that the seller was going to deliver the missing quantity and has therefore waited before giving notice (SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 465 f)).

3. Under ITALIAN law terms of decadence and prescription that limit the guarantee for vices and lack of qualities do not apply in such a case since it relates to the seller's obligation to deliver (Bianca, La vendita e la permuta, 411). In CZECH and SLOVAK commercial sales if it is clear from a shipping document, a document upon the delivery of the goods or a statement by the seller that the seller is to deliver a smaller quantity (part) of the goods, the provisions on lack of conformity do not apply. The seller is rather in delay concerning the proper and due time for the delivery of the goods (Ccom art. 422(2)). However, under CZECH general sales partial delivery which is not in compliance with the documents is considered as a defect and therefore has to be notified (Knappová, Civil Law II[3], 105). Under SLOVENIAN law, two standpoints can be found in the legal literature; either there are no sanctions for the buyer's failure to notify, or he can be liable for damage caused to the seller

(SLOVENIA Cigoj, Komentar, 1476). In SPAIN the rules on lack on conformity do not apply to partial delivery, as flows from CC arts. 1469-1471. According to Ccom art. 330, the buyer who "accepts" partial performance is not entitled to refuse the delivered goods as not complying with the contract.

4. In SCOTTISH law, intimation of non-conformity is a general requirement but the courts take a commercially realistic view of what is required, in the absence of some provision in the contract itself (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, 20-107).

IV.A.–4:304: Seller's knowledge of lack of conformity

The seller is not entitled to rely on the provisions of IV.A.–4:301 (Examination of the goods) or IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity) if the lack of conformity relates to facts of which the seller knew or could reasonably be expected to have known and which the seller did not disclose to the buyer.

COMMENTS

A. General

Both IV.A.–4:301 (Examination of the goods) and IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity) require the non-consumer buyer to ensure that possible problems with regard to the conformity of the goods are found, indicated and sorted out as quickly as possible upon pain of the loss of the buyer's rights. However, the seller is not entitled to rely on these provisions, which restrict liability for lack of conformity, if the seller knew or should have known of the lack of conformity and did not tell the buyer.

B. Knowledge of the lack of conformity

The crucial question under this Article is whether the seller actually had, or should have had, knowledge of certain facts relating to a potential lack of conformity. While the former variant (positive knowledge of the seller) will burden the buyer with a difficult question of proof, the second variant (what the seller could reasonably be expected to have known) introduces a more objective test. In this context, regard must be had to the economic reality of today's retail business. Final sellers increasingly simply serve as a mere 'point of sale' for highly specialised, mass-produced goods. They will not have taken part in the design and manufacture of these goods and will often lack essential information about the product.

Nonetheless buyers are entitled to expect at least a certain minimum of expertise on the part of the seller. The latter can be expected to be reasonably well informed about the goods sold, not least because the seller will usually handle complaints even if they are passed on to the manufacturers. By and large, the question of what the seller can reasonably be expected to have known will have to be decided on a case-by-case basis.

In addition, the seller needs to disclose these facts to the buyer. However, this rule cannot be construed so as to require the seller to provide an objective and impartial assessment of the goods to be sold, possibly even involving alternatives by competitors and the like.

C. Impact on the buyer's remedies

If the seller is not entitled to rely on the examination and notification requirements under this Section, the buyer does not lose the rights to rely on the relevant lack of conformity by virtue of IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity). There is a virtually identical rule in III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity) paragraph (3). Moreover the buyer would not in these circumstances be adversely affected by the rules of III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing), given that it is the seller who has acted contrary to good faith and fair dealing. However, the general rules on prescription will still apply. The result is that the buyer can bring a claim as long as it has not expired.

D. Consumer contracts for sale

Although consumer contracts for sale are not expressly excluded from this Article, in fact it has no application to them as consumers are not affected by the two provisions mentioned in it.

NOTES

Relevance of seller's knowledge of lack of conformity for the examination and notification requirements

1. Under most systems, the examination and notification requirements do not apply if the seller knew about the defect and did not inform the buyer thereof, or if the seller otherwise acted contrary to good faith, etc. The same applies to sales-specific limitation periods.

2. The obligation to examine the goods or to notify the seller do not apply if the lack of conformity relates to facts of which the seller knew or could reasonably be expected to have known and which the seller did not disclose to the buyer (CISG art. 40; ESTONIA LOA § 221(1) 1); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.348; SLOVENIA LOA § 465).

3. In AUSTRIA and GERMANY if the seller has fraudulently concealed a lack of conformity, the seller may not invoke the buyer's duty to notify under commercial sales; moreover, the longer general period of limitation applies in place of the sales-specific two-year period (CC § 438(3) and Ccom § 377(5)). Under POLISH law the rights to warranty for physical and legal defects do not expire if the seller insidiously concealed the defect (CC arts. 568(2) and 576(2)). Under PORTUGUESE law notice is not needed if the seller acted with dolus (Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], 141). The buyer does not lose his rights due to a failure to notify the seller in a timely fashion or to examine the goods if the seller has acted with gross negligence or against good faith (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 33). Under DANISH law the buyer is not obliged to notify if the seller has acted fraudulently or if he has acted with gross negligence and this causes the buyer considerable loss (SGA §§ 53 and 54). Under ITALIAN law no notice of a defect is necessary if the seller has hidden the existence of the defects (CC art. 1495(2)). Under SLOVENIAN law the rights of the buyer are exceptionally not precluded if he could not enforce them on account of the seller's deceit (LOA § 480(1)).

4. In the NETHERLANDS if the seller knew about the defects but did not inform the buyer thereof, the period to notify only commences when the buyer has actually discovered the defect (CC art. 7:23(1)). Under CZECH law if the seller has knowledge of the lack of conformity, he is obliged to notify the buyer. If he does not do so, the buyer has a right to a reduction in the price and in the case of the thing being useless, a right to terminate the contract (CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 596 and 597). Under SLOVAKIAN law if the seller does not inform the buyer of a lack of conformity known to him, this is of importance for a potential decision of the court as to damages in favour of the buyer (Svoboda, Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, 513). In FRENCH law, the seller's knowledge of the defect allows the buyer to be awarded damages compensating him fully (CC art. 1645). Case law has established that a professional seller is irrebuttably presumed to be aware of hidden defects (a line of case law initiated by Cass.civ. I, 19 January 1965, D. 1965, 389).

5. Under SPANISH law this is an unregulated issue (see Fenoy Picón, El sistema de protección del comprador, 264-280). The case seems not to be problematic. As the purpose of the notice is to warn the seller of the existence of a lack of conformity, this function becomes superseded by the factual knowledge of the breach by the seller. However, according to the factual circumstances the buyer's acceptance without refusal might be construed as novation or confirmation. In SCOTTISH law, the focus is upon the seller's liability for fraud rather than upon the buyer's remedies for non-conformity (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 74).

6. Similarly, in some countries it is expressly regulated that the seller may not exclude liability for non-conforming goods if he has acted in bad faith.

CHAPTER 5: PASSING OF RISK

Section 1: General provisions

IV.A.–5:101: Effect of passing of risk

Loss of, or damage to, the goods after the risk has passed to the buyer does not discharge the buyer from the obligation to pay the price, unless the loss or damage is due to an act or omission of the seller.

COMMENTS

A. General

The present Chapter addresses the question of who has to bear the risk of the goods being lost or damaged in a fortuitous event, i.e. due to no fault of either party. This article governs the question of whether the buyer needs to pay the full price for the goods despite their accidental loss or damage (for further aspects of risk, see Comment C).

B. Consequences of the passing of risk under these rules

The present rules address only the aspect of risk obliging the buyer to pay the price if the goods are lost or damaged after the risk has passed. This aspect of risk relating to the buyer is called the risk of counter-performance or, more specifically, the risk of payment. In other words, is the buyer obliged to perform even if the goods are not received at all, or only in a damaged state?

> A buys china from B, a shopkeeper. B hands the china over to A and the parties agree that A will settle the account the next day. That night the china is smashed due to an earthquake. The next day A returns the shattered pieces of china to B and refuses to pay the price. B rightly claims that A should pay because the risk had passed to A under IV.A.–5:102 (Time when risk passes) when the china was handed over.

It does not matter whether the goods have been lost or damaged completely or merely partially. Thus, the buyer has to pay the full price, provided that the risk has passed. It is a different question altogether whether the seller is discharged from the obligation to deliver, or still has to deliver what is left (see III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment) and III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations) paragraph (3)(b) and Comment C below).

C. Different types of risk in sales

On the other hand, it can be asked whether the seller still has to deliver in spite of the impediments to performance, i.e. the fact that the goods have either perished or been damaged. This aspect of risk relating to the seller is called the risk of performance, which is already covered by III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment). If the risk has passed, the buyer must pay but the seller is excused from the obligation to deliver the goods. If the risk has not passed, the seller is either excused or must deliver other goods. The question is whether the case is one of excused non-performance - which depends on whether it is possible to perform the obligation under the contract. This in turn is likely to depend on whether the contract was one for the sale of those specific goods, of goods from a specified bulk (which cannot be transferred if the bulk has been destroyed) or of generic goods.

A, a retailer, sells the remaining TVs of an older model already out of production in bulk to B, a small shop owner, who wants to resell them at low cost. At the time of the conclusion of the contract, it is clear that the TVs are all stored in a specific warehouse. However, the TVs are lost in a fire that burned down the warehouse where A had stored them. A is excused from delivering the TVs, and paying damages to B, since the non-performance is excused under III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment). It would have been different if the contract required the seller to deliver generic goods, i.e. a TV of a model still in production which can readily be obtained from another source.

The facts are the same as in illustration 2. If the seller is to blame for the fire, say one of his employees had dropped a lighted cigarette, he is liable to the buyer in damages.

Lastly, the present rules also address another important aspect of risk, that of lack of conformity. Technically speaking, the question of who is liable for defective goods does not fall under the classical notion of risk in sales law (i.e. the accidental demise of, or damage to, goods before the actual handing over). However, these two concepts can, at times, conflict with each other, see IV.A.–5:102 (Time when risk passes) Comment C.

D. Act and omission of the seller

The rules on the passing of risk come into play only in the case of fortuitous events resulting in the loss of or damage to the goods, i.e. events that neither party could foresee. The present Article reflects this important principle by providing for an exception relating to the seller's conduct. If the seller is responsible for the loss of or damage to the goods, the buyer is not deprived of rights against the seller regarding that loss or damage.

The facts are the same as in illustration 1. After the contract is concluded it is agreed that B is to arrange for transportation of the china to A's place of business. B engages an independent carrier to transport the goods. During the transportation the china is totally destroyed since B has packed it in an insufficient manner. Even though the risk passed under IV.A.–5:202 (Carriage of the goods) paragraph (2) with the handing over to the carrier, A is not obliged to pay the price, since the damage was caused by B's actions.

As a rule, the seller will be liable in contract or under the law on non-contractual liability for damage for the act or omission resulting in the loss of, or damage to, the goods. The seller will be liable for acts and omissions by persons for whom the seller is responsible, e.g. employees (for the relationship with the rules on lack of conformity, see IV.A.–5:102 (Time when risk passes) Comment D below).

NOTES

I. Events that fall within the notion of risk

1. It is common understanding that the risk of loss or damage is limited to an event that is accidental or fortuitous. Under most legal systems the reference to the requirement that the loss or damage must be accidental leads to the result that if the seller is responsible for the loss of or damage to the goods, then the risk provisions do not apply. This principle is explicitly regulated under some systems (CISG art. 66; ESTONIA LOA § 218(3); FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 12).

2. Most systems do not specify which events fall under the notion of risk, or only mention damage to or the destruction of the goods (BELGIUM; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 590; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND; ESTONIA LOA § 214(1); FRANCE; HUNGARY CC § 99; LATVIA CC art. 2023; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.329; PORTUGAL CC art. 796; SPAIN CC arts. 1182, 1452). Other systems also mention the loss of the goods (CISG art. 66; POLAND CC art. 548; SLOVAKIA CC § 517(3)). This often also includes seizure or theft of the goods (POLAND uchwała SN of 23 May 1997 , OSNC 1997, no. 119; SWEDEN Herre, Konsumentköplagen[2], 123)). Generally, under many systems, the scope of the events falling within the notion of risk is therefore only specified in the case law. Thus under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law, for example, it includes destruction, partial or total (Anderson & Crompton v. Walls & Co. (1870) 9 M 122); damage (Head v. Tattersall (1871-72) LR 7 Ex. 7; Knight v. Wilson 1949 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 26); and deterioration (Pommer & Thomsen v. Mowat (1906) 14 SLT 373; Sterns Ltd. v. Vickers Ltd. [1923] 1 KB 78).

3. Other systems provide for a more concrete regulation, for instance NORDIC law. Here the risk is described as the goods deteriorating or being destroyed, lost or diminished (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 12). DANISH law speaks of the destruction or diminishing of the goods (SGA § 17(1)). Similarly under CZECH commercial sales where Ccom art. 368(2) lays down that the risk means the loss, destruction, impairment or devaluation of the thing, regardless of the cause. Also under AUSTRIAN law, CC § 1048 contains three different cases or 'types' of risk that can affect the object sold: (1) withdrawal from commerce by prohibition; (2) accidental complete destruction; and (3) partial destruction resulting in a decrease in value exceeding half of the value of the original. Withdrawal includes seizure of assets (ZBl 1919/244); goods are only deemed to be banned from commerce if there is a permanent impediment to trade. A merely temporary prohibition does not lead to a suspension of the obligations but to default (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB IV[4], §§ 1048-1051, no. 5, ban on export. Destruction has to be accidental as opposed to causation by or other accountability of the buyer. (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB IV[4], §§ 1048-1051, no.4, above all natural catastrophes such as fires, earthquakes, storms, floods, torrential rain, avalanches, mud slides; Klang (-Wahle), ABGB IV(2)[2], 52 (§§ 1048-51), theft and robbery as well). Partial destruction in CC § 1048 introduces the notion of subsequent laesio enormis with respect to the area of risk: the value of the object in question has to have decreased by more than half of the original (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II, 148; cf. express rule on laesio enormis (Verkürzung über die Hälfte) in CC § 934). If such partial destruction results in a decrease in value exceeding half of the value of the original the rules on risk will apply (CC § 1048, e.g. a sudden drop on the stock exchange market, see Rsp 1926/209, 1931/244; Klang (-Wahle), ABGB IV(2)[2], §§ 1048-1051, 56 f, points out that the buyer can still insist on the contract as long as he pays since the rule has been enacted in favour of the buyer). If the value is not decreased by a half CC § 1049 applies: the seller has to bear the risk of deterioration since the contract remains in existence. In other words, he still has to perform and make up the partial destruction. But if restitution in kind is impossible or unfeasible the seller has to reduce the purchase price accordingly in order to maintain the subjective equivalence of the obligations (Rummel (-Aicher), ABGB I[2], §§ 1048-1051, no. 7; Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB IV[4], §§ 1049, no. 1).

II. Relation between passing of risk and rules on delivery and conformity

4. The passing of risk does not exonerate the seller from his obligation to deliver or for liability for non-conforming goods. Under some systems it is specifically provided that risk does not pass if the buyer invokes the right to termination or a replacement of the goods (NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:10(3); SLOVENIA LOA § 436(2)). Under DUTCH law this exception applies only if, at the time of delivery, there is a case of non-conformity under CC art. 7:17 and the requirements of the remedy of replacement or termination are met (Parl. Gesch. Boek 7, 99-100; Asser (-Hijma), Bijzondere Overeenkomsten I[6], no. 512-513)). In SPANISH law it is explicitly stated (CC art. 1488) that the lack of conformity places upon the seller the post-delivery risk, even where the loss of the asset was due to a fortuitous event.

5. Under other systems, the passing of the risk is the decisive moment for assessing if a lack of conformity is at hand (CISG art. 36; CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 425(1); DENMARK SGA § 44; ESTONIA LOA § 218(1); FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 21). In POLAND the seller is not liable under the warranty for physical defects which have arisen after the risk has passed to the buyer unless the defects have arisen due to a cause which was inherent earlier on in the thing sold (CC art. 559).

6. In certain situations there might be a conflict between the risk provisions, on the one hand, and the conformity regulations, on the other. Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law this applies where the risk is transferred before delivery, since conformity is to be tested at the time of the supply (i.e. delivery) of the goods by the seller to the buyer. It has been suggested that in that case the conformity of the goods with the contract should be tested at the time when the property is transferred, as a form of constructive delivery; thereafter the buyer must take the risk of deterioration or worse, unless that is the fault of the seller (Adams/Atiyah/MacQueen, Sale of Goods[11], 147 f). Also under systems where a lack of conformity is to be assessed at the time of the passing of the risk, there might be a clash between the conformity and risk rules if the risk passes before the goods actually come into the buyer's possession, especially when delivered to the first carrier (CISG art. 67(1); ESTONIA LOA § 209(4); FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 7(2)). In such cases it might for instance be difficult to assess whether the goods were damaged during transportation, or if they were already not in conformity at the time when the risk passed, that is when the goods were delivered to the carrier (cf. SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 222).

III. Connection of burdens and benefits with risk

7. It is an undisputed legal principle that the benefits and burdens of the goods are for the owner. Nevertheless, at what moment the benefits and burdens are transferred from the seller to the buyer differs greatly between the different systems.

8. Under the systems where risk passes with the property, the benefits and burdens are transferred with the property (BELGIUM CC art. 544; FRANCE CC art. 1138; PORTUGAL CC art. 1305). A similar result is reached if the benefits and burdens pass at the time of the conclusion of the contract (SPAIN CC art. 1468). Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law, the matter seems to be unclear, since regulation is lacking and case law scarce. ENGLISH legal doctrine indicates that the fruits and burdens should follow with the property rather than the person who bears the risk or the person in possession (Benjamin (-Guest), Sale of Goods[6], § 6-024)).

9. Under many systems the benefits and burdens are explicitly linked to the passing of the risk (GERMANY CC § 446(1); GREECE CC art. 525; LATVIA CC art. 2025). Other systems connect benefits and burdens with the delivery (AUSTRIA CC § 1050; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:14; POLAND CC art. 548(1)). In practice the difference will be minor, since the moment of delivery and the passing of risk normally coincide under those systems.

10. However, under other systems the agreed time for delivery is decisive, not the actual delivery (FINLAND SGA § 79; NORWAY SGA § 79; SLOVENIA LOA § 437; SWEDEN SGA § 79) with reference to the yields accruing from the goods. A similar regulation applies under ESTONIAN law concerning benefits (LOA § 216(1)). However, the burdens are linked to the actual delivery, i.e. to the passing of risk (LOA § 216(2)).

IV.A.–5:102: Time when risk passes

(1) The risk passes when the buyer takes over the goods or the documents representing them.

(2) However, if the contract relates to goods not then identified, the risk does not pass to the buyer until the goods are clearly identified to the contract, whether by markings on the goods, by shipping documents, by notice given to the buyer or otherwise.

(3) The rule in paragraph (1) is subject to the Articles in Section 2 of this Chapter.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article contains the main rule of the passing of risk, i.e. that the risk passes when the buyer takes over the goods or documents representing them. Paragraph (2) sets out an important requirement for the passing of risk: as long as goods have not been clearly identified to the contract of sale, risk cannot pass. Put differently, the loss of or damage to goods not clearly identified always rests with the seller. The buyer can therefore still request the delivery of new goods without having to pay the price of the lost or damaged goods. Lastly, paragraph (3) makes clear that the general rule on the passing of risk is subject to several exceptions in Section 2, IV.A.–5:201: (Goods placed at the buyer's disposal), IV.A.–5:202: (Carriage of the goods) and IV.A.–5:203: (Goods sold in transit).

Since the provisions on the allocation of risk are, by and large, default rules (in accordance with the general principle of party autonomy) the parties are free to agree otherwise. In particular, the parties may agree that the risk passes earlier, e.g. retrospectively or upon the conclusion of the contract, or after taking over the goods. The parties may also provide separately for specific types of risk.

B. The main rule: taking over the goods or documents

As a rule, the risk of the loss of or damage to the goods passes from the seller to the buyer when the buyer takes over the goods or the documents representing them. Thus, there is a link between control over the goods, either physically or indirectly (i.e. by means of the documents representing them), and the allocation of risk. At the same time, this rule in paragraph (1) corresponds to IV.A.–3:104 (Taking delivery) sub-paragraph (b), which obliges the buyer to take delivery by actually taking over the goods or documents representing the goods.

This taking-over rule is justified for various reasons. To start with, any owner of goods assumes the risk that they may perish accidentally. Since it is the party with physical control over the goods who is in the best position to protect them from damage, this party also assumes that risk prior to the performance of a sales contract. Besides, the party in possession of the goods is in the best position to insure them.

The link between the passing of risk and the taking over of the goods, or the documents representing them, is of particular significance when, in the course of a sales transaction, ownership and control over the goods are separated. If, for instance, a sales contract contains a retention of title clause, ownership of the goods remains with the seller until the buyer pays the price, although risk is transferred to the buyer from the time the goods are taken over.

C. Lack of conformity and rules on the passing of risk

While it has been pointed out that the rules on risk are, at least from a technical point of view, distinct from those relating to lack of conformity (see IV.A.–5:101 (Effect of passing of risk) Comment B), it cannot be overlooked that there is a certain interdependency.

According to IV.A.–2:308 (Relevant time for establishing conformity) paragraph (1), the seller is liable for any lack of conformity which exists at the time when the risk passes to the buyer, even though the lack of conformity only becomes apparent after that time. The passing of the risk is here the decisive moment for assessing whether there is a lack of conformity. If there is a lack of conformity at the time when the risk normally passes to the buyer, the seller's liability does not pass to the buyer, thus the rules on non-conformity override the risk provisions. Nevertheless, a complicated situation might arise if the risk passes before the goods actually come into the buyer's possession, especially when they are delivered to the first carrier in accordance with IV.A.–5:202 (Carriage of the goods) paragraph (2). In such cases it may for instance be difficult to assess if the goods were damaged during transportation, or if they were already not in conformity at the time when the risk passed (that is when the goods were delivered to the carrier). In the former case, the seller would not be liable for the damage in accordance with IV.A.–5:202 paragraph (2), whereas in the latter case the seller would be responsible according to the provisions on non-conformity.

A, a shop owner, and B, a retailer, conclude a contract for the sale of 20 boxes of china and contract that the goods will be transported by an independent carrier to A's shop. While unpacking the goods A notices that the china is damaged in five of the boxes. In this case, the damage could have been in existence before the goods were handed over to the carrier, but it could also have occurred during transportation.

D. Identification of the goods

Paragraph (2) reflects a central property law principle, i.e. that of specificity, which is also of importance for the passing of risk. In practice, this requirement of identification is of particular relevance for the passing of risk in sales involving carriage under IV.A.–5:202 (Carriage of the goods). This is one reason why IV.A.–2:204 (Carriage of the goods) paragraph (2) obliges the seller to give the buyer notice of consignment in the case of the carriage of the goods).

Goods may be identified to a contract of sale in several ways. Separation, marking and packaging of the goods are the most obvious; the importance of identification in the context of carriage has already been stressed in IV.A.–2:204 (Carriage of the goods) paragraph (2). Whether goods have been duly identified to the contract before they were lost or damaged will often be a question of proof, especially when it cannot be established when the event causing the loss or damage occurred.

A purchases from B, a wholesale distributor, 20 TVs in order to furnish the rooms of his small country hotel. The parties agree that A is to pick up the goods on March 25. Generally, the risk would pass at that date according to IV.A.–5:201 (Goods placed at buyer's disposal) paragraph (1). However, if B has not separated A's order from the same type of TVs in his warehouse, the risk will not pass until he does so.

Identification of the goods can take place as soon as the contract is made. However, goods may often not be identified to the sales contract until the seller tenders delivery to the buyer. The significance of this late identification, as it were, becomes apparent in two situations. First, risk passes to the buyer as a consequence of the delay in taking over the goods, given that the seller has actually tendered the goods at the right place and time (IV.A.–5:201 (Goods placed at the buyer's disposal)). Secondly, if goods are transported in bulk the risk does not pass before the seller has notified the buyer of the consignment (see IV.A.–5:202 (Carriage of the goods)).

The facts are the same as in illustration 2. A fails to pick up the goods at the agreed time. On March 28 B's warehouse is destroyed by fire overnight. Generally, the risk would have passed on March 25 according to IV.A.–5:201 (Goods placed at the buyer's disposal) paragraph (1). However, if B has not separated A's order from the same type of TVs in the warehouse, the risk has not passed according to this provision and A can require the delivery of new goods.

E. Exceptions

The general rule of this Article is subject to a number of exceptions, which are addressed in Section 2: IV.A.–5:201 (Goods placed at the buyer's disposal) addresses cases of mora creditoris; while IV.A.–5:202 (Carriage of the goods) and IV.A.–5:203 (Goods sold in transit) set out rules relating to the risk in the event of the transportation of the goods.

NOTES

I. Point in time when risk passes from the seller to the buyer

1. The European legal systems differ with regard to the point in time when risk passes from the seller to the buyer. The division reflects the different systems regarding the transfer of property. Thus, property law and the system of passing the risk are closely related.

2. Under many systems, risk passes to the buyer together with the property (BELGIUM CC art. 1138; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 20(1); FRANCE CC art. 1138; ITALY CC art. 1465 (in the case of consensual contracts transferring property); PORTUGAL CC art. 796). Generally under those systems, property is transferred at the time of the conclusion of the contract (BELGIUM and FRANCE CC art. 1583). A similar result is achieved if the conclusion of the contract is decisive for the passing of risk (LATVIA CC art. 2023). In SPAIN passing of the risk and transfer of property are split, according to the rules laid down, respectively, in CC arts. 1452 and 1462; for the risk (of a specific item) to pass to the buyer, perfection of the contract suffices. Nevertheless, in commercial sales, the risk passes to the buyer when the items are put at the buyer's disposition (Ccom art. 333) This is explicitly provided for under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law, which connects risk with property and explicitly disassociates it with delivery (Sale of Goods Act s. 20(1)). Nevertheless, all the previous legal systems provide exceptions to the main rule that risk passes with the property. If the sale concerns generic or unascertained goods that have not been identified in the contract, then the risk will only pass at a later point in time, usually with delivery as the event that identifies the goods, cf. further under II. Moreover, a retention of title clause may have the effect of delaying the passing of risk, cf. under III.

3. Under other systems, the risk passes with the delivery/transfer of possession of the goods to the buyer. Under these legal systems, as a matter of law, property passes not just with the conclusion of the sales contract; but regarding movable goods also delivery will be required. Connecting the passing of risk with the delivery is the case in CISG art. 69(1); AUSTRIA CC §§ 1064 and 1051; DENMARK SGA § 17(1); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 455; ESTONIA LOA § 214(2); FINLAND SGA § 13(1); GERMANY CC § 446; GREECE CC art. 522; HUNGARY CC §§ 117(2) and 279(2); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.320; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:10; NORWAY SGA § 13(1); POLAND CC art. 548; SLOVENIA LOA § 436(1); SPAIN (commercial sales only) Ccom art. 331 and 333; SWEDEN SGA § 13(1). A similar result is achieved under systems where the passing of property is decisive for the passing of risk, but where property as a general rule passes upon delivery (CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA CC §§ 133(1) and 590). There are, however, several exceptions to this main rule. Under those systems connecting risk with the delivery the risk may however pass before the delivery if the buyer delays in taking over the goods. Quite a number of systems also provide for consumer sales that the risk passes when the goods actually come into the buyer's possession.

II. Identification of the goods

4. The risk of loss or damage must relate to specific or specified goods, in other words the buyer must be deemed to undertake the risk relating to identified goods. This principle applies under all legal systems.

5. Under systems where the risk generally passes with the property upon the conclusion of the contract, by way of an exception the risk does not pass until the goods have been determined or individualised (BELGIUM CC arts. 1585-1586; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 16; FRANCE CC art. 1585 (for sales of goods to be measured or weighed CC art. 1586 a contrario); ITALY CC art. 1378; LATVIA CC art. 2023(1) and (2); PORTUGAL CC arts. 408(2) and 539). The same applies to future goods which have not yet been produced (FRANCE; PORTUGAL CC art. 408(2)).

6. Under systems where the risk generally passes upon delivery, the identification of the goods normally poses no problems. Nevertheless, the same problem may arise in the case where the sales contract involves the carriage of the goods by an independent carrier (cf. under IV.A.–5:203 (Goods sold in transit)), or where the buyer delays in taking delivery (cf. under IV.A.–5:202 (Carriage of the goods)). In such cases, the risk only passes if the goods are clearly identified to the contract, usually by markings on the goods, by shipping documents, by notice given to the buyer or otherwise (CISG arts. 67(2) and 69(3); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 458; FINLAND SGA § 14; GREECE CC art. 290; HUNGARY CC § 304; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.320; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:10(1); NORWAY SGA § 14; SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 458; SLOVENIA LOA § 437; SPAIN CC art. 1452(2) and (3); SWEDEN SGA § 14). The same applies under GERMAN law, implied in the general requirement in CC § 447 that the goods sold have to be delivered to the carrier.

III. Special issues

7. There is also a specific regulation for the passing of risk under sales contracts that are dependant upon a condition. Pending a suspensive condition the risk remains with the seller (e.g. in SLOVENIAN law expressly in LOA § 516 and in SPAIN for commercial sales, Ccom art. 334.3); in the case of a resolutory condition the risk passes to the buyer upon delivery. Under some systems, a retention of title has the effect of delaying the passing of risk (BELGIUM CC art. 1182; FRANCE Com. 19 October 1982, Bull.civ. IV, no. 321; PORTUGAL STJ 22 February 1983, BolMinJus 324, 578; STJ 5 March 1996, CJ 1996 I, 119; Galvão Telles, Obrigações[7], 473; Varela (1995), 88)). Under GREEK law, however, if the contract of sale includes a retention of title clause, the buyer bears the risk from the time the goods are handed over to him (CC art. 532).

8. Some systems provide a specific regulation for sales concluded on a sale-or-return basis. Under NORDIC law, the buyer will bear the risk from delivery until the goods are returned to the seller in such cases (DENMARK SGA § 60(2); FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN, SGA § 16). The opposite solution can be found under other systems where the goods are purchased subject to the condition that they are first tested or examined. Here, the risk is to be borne by the seller until the buyer declares that he approves of the goods or until the deadline by which the buyer was obliged to return the goods has expired (LATVIA CC art. 2024(5); SLOVENIA LOA § 516).

9. In GREEK law if a sale takes place in a public auction, the risk passes not from delivery but from the knock-down, i.e. the successful bid (CCP art. 1017(3)). Yet another exception concerns the sale of the estate of a deceased person (inheritance) sold as a whole. In this case the risk passes at the time of the conclusion of the sales contract (GERMANY CC § 2380; GREECE CC art. 1951).

IV.A.–5:103: Passing of risk in a consumer contract for sale

(1) In a consumer contract for sale, the risk does not pass until the buyer takes over the goods.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply if the buyer has failed to perform the obligation to take over the goods and the non-performance is not excused under III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment) in which case IV.A.–5:201 (Goods placed at buyer's disposal) applies.

(3) Except in so far as provided in the preceding paragraph, Section 2 of this Chapter does not apply to a consumer contract for sale.

(4) The parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article contains an important exception for consumer contracts for sale from the main rule in IV.A.–5:102 (Time when risk passes) and the special rules in Section 2, as risk does not pass before the buyer actually takes over the goods. This means, for example, that the risk does not pass upon the mere transfer of documents representing the goods. There is an exception to this rule for consumers if the consumer buyer has failed to perform the obligation to take over the goods and this non-performance is not excused (paragraph (2)). Paragraph (3) contains a general clarification that the provisions in Section 2 do not apply under a consumer contract for sale.

Basically, the aim of the rule is to avoid burdening the consumer unduly with unforeseen risks, which he or she will neither be able to anticipate nor be likely to have taken out insurance against. This provision goes beyond the scope of the Consumer Sales Directive, where the matter of risk is explicitly not dealt with. Due to the importance of this principle to the consumer and the high risk that sellers would contract out of it through standard terms, this provision is mandatory in favour of the consumer (paragraph (4)).

B. Goods placed at the consumer's disposal

Under the general regulation, normally if the buyer delays in taking over the goods, the risk will pass to the buyer from the time when the goods should have been taken over, provided that the buyer was aware that the goods were available for collection (IV.A.–5:201 (Goods placed at buyer's disposal) paragraph (1)). The present Article modifies this rule for consumer contracts for sale by establishing that the risk does not pass until the buyer actually takes over the goods, unless the buyer's failure to take over the goods is not excused under III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment).

Illustration 1

A, a consumer buyer, has bought a car from S, a car dealer. The parties agree on a certain date when A is to pick up the car from the seller's place of business. A does not remember the appointment and fails to pick up the car on the agreed date. During that same night, the car is stolen from the seller's premises. The risk is on the buyer, since the failure was not excused.

The facts are the same as above. On the agreed date A is on his way to pick up the car when he has a traffic accident and ends up in hospital with severe injuries. When the car is stolen, the risk rests with the seller, since A's failure is excused under III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment).

The modification for consumers is even more important in respect of IV.A.–5:201 (Goods placed at buyer's disposal) paragraph (2), which addresses cases where the seller makes the goods available at a place other than his place of business. Even though no failure to take over the goods is required, the present Article introduces such a requirement in paragraph (2).

C. Carriage of goods in a consumer contract for sale and passing of risk

Under the general regulation where carriage of goods is involved, the main rule in IV.A.–5:202 (Carriage of the goods) paragraph (2) is that the risk passes when the goods are handed over to the carrier. In a consumer contract for sale, however, risk only passes when the goods are actually handed over to the buyer. As a consequence, if the consumer does not receive the goods because these have been lost or destroyed, he or she does not have to pay for them. Moreover, the seller is delaying in the delivery and all remedies for delay are therefore available.

A, a consumer, buys a fridge just across the border of his native country. According to the agreement, the seller will take care of the transportation of the fridge to A's residence. The seller charges a cross-border delivery service for the transportation. However, the lorry carrying, amongst other goods, the fridge for A, is involved in a traffic accident, in which all the goods are damaged beyond use. Since A has not yet taken over the goods, the risk does not pass. As the risk was still with the seller, he is in delay when not delivering the fridge to A on time.

Such a result will provide an incentive for the seller to exercise the utmost care in arranging transportation and in choosing a carrier. The seller will also be in a better position to calculate the price by integrating the economic cost of the transportation risks in long-term financial arrangements or to obtain a favourable insurance, which often may be blanket cover. A consumer, on the other hand, would encounter more obstacles in pursuing claims against third parties or in pressing an insurance claim. Lastly, it should be pointed out that in many cases a seller involved in consumer transactions will operate its own fleet of delivery vehicles. If so, according to the general rule the risk does not pass anyway before the goods are taken over by the consumer.

Special risk regulation under consumer sales

1. Under most systems, the regulation for consumer and non-consumer sales is identical. However, under quite a number of systems, it is also provided that the seller bears the risk while the goods are under transportation. This is an exception to the well-established principle that the buyer bears the risk after the goods have been handed over to the first carrier, cf. IV.A.–5:203 (Goods sold in transit). Thus, under some systems, when goods are transported to the buyer the risk only passes in consumer sales when the goods actually come into the buyer's possession (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 20(4); ESTONIA LOA § 214(5); FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 3(2); GERMANY CC § 474(2); HUNGARY CC § 278(2); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:11; NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 14; SLOVAKIA CC § 614(3); SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act §§ 6 and 8). However, under DUTCH law the parties may derogate by individually negotiated terms from this specific provision (CC art. 7:6(1)). According to SWEDISH preparatory works and legal literature, the goods must be delivered to the consumer's home and, for instance, deposited in his letter-box or received by him or some other household member. It is not sufficient that the goods are left outside the entrance of the consumer's apartment. If the buyer has to collect the goods at some other place, for instance at the post office, the goods are delivered when they are actually collected from there (Herre, Konsumentköplagen, 112 f).

2. In SPAIN some authors consider that the risk passes to the buyer in a consumer sale at the moment when the goods are delivered; they argue that the goods must be in conformity at that moment (see Orti Vallejo, Los defectos de la cosa en la compraventa civil y mercantil, 98; Morales Moreno, ADC 2003, 1628). Also in FRENCH legal literature this approach has been advocated (Huet, Responsabilité du vendeur et garantie contre les vices cachés, no. 267).

3. Under NORDIC consumer sales, this principle also applies to the situation where the buyer is to collect the goods. Also here the risk does not pass until the goods actually come into the buyer's possession (FINLAND Consumer Protection Act § 5:3(2); NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 14; SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 6 and 8).

Section 2: Special rules

IV.A.–5:201: Goods placed at buyer's disposal

(1) If the goods are placed at the buyer's disposal and the buyer is aware of this, the risk passes to the buyer from the time when the goods should have been taken over, unless the buyer was entitled to withhold taking of delivery under III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation).

(2) If the goods are placed at the buyer's disposal at a place other than a place of business of the seller, the risk passes when delivery is due and the buyer is aware of the fact that the goods are placed at the buyer's disposal at that place.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article provides an exception to the main rule of IV.A.–5:102 (Time when risk passes) according to which the risk passes when the buyer takes over the goods. Under this Article, in a non-consumer contract for sale the risk passes when the goods are made available to the buyer and the buyer fails to take over the goods. The starting point is that the buyer is obliged to take over the goods under the contract. If the buyer fails to comply with this obligation, the risk passes subject to certain conditions.

Paragraph (1) applies to cases where the buyer has to pick up the goods at the seller's place of business. In this case, the risk passes only if the buyer is aware of the goods being available for collection and still fails to pick them up in breach of an obligation under the contract.

Paragraph (2) works as a catch-all clause for all other cases (i.e. the seller has to deliver the goods to the buyer or the buyer has to pick up the goods from another place such as a warehouse). In this case, the risk passes at the time when the goods are placed at the buyer's disposal, provided that the buyer is aware of the goods being so placed.

B. Goods made available at the seller's place of business

The risk passes to the buyer under paragraph (1) if three conditions are met. First, the goods have been placed at the buyer's disposal at the seller's place of business. Thus, the buyer is supposed to pick up the goods from the seller, which is also the default rule of IV.A.–2:202 (Place and time for delivery). Secondly, the seller has to actually make the goods available to the buyer, that is must tender the goods as agreed in the contract. In particular, this requires the identification of the goods within the meaning of IV.A.–5:102 (Time when risk passes) paragraph (2). And, thirdly, the buyer must have failed to take delivery as required by the contract.

Not only does this rule prevent the buyer from postponing the passing of the risk by not taking delivery from the seller (the so-called mora creditoris), but it also sanctions the buyer for having frustrated the seller's attempt to perform the obligation to deliver. While the seller can, in principle, force the buyer to take over the goods, in practice the normally preferred remedy would be to sue the buyer for the price. The passing of risk in such a situation provides a further incentive for the buyer to take over the goods, since the full price will be payable even if the goods are lost or damaged during the period of the delay.

It is fair to absolve the seller from the risk that the goods may perish accidentally if the seller has attempted to comply with the obligations under the contract. As just pointed out, this consequence also serves as an additional incentive for the buyer to comply with the obligation to take delivery. In fact, the buyer may suffer a triple detriment upon the failure to take over goods that are subsequently accidentally lost or damaged: loss of the goods; payment of the price; and a possible liability in damages for breach of contract (if non-performance of the obligation to take delivery has caused the seller any incidental loss).

C. Goods made available at a place other than the seller's place of business

If the seller has to make the goods available at a place other than the seller's place of business the risk passes to the buyer when delivery is due. However, the passing of risk in this case is subject to two conditions. First, the seller has to make the goods available to the buyer (see Comment B above). Secondly, the buyer must be aware of this place of performance and the fact that the goods are made available there. Mora creditoris is, however, not required for the passing of risk. In other words, it is irrelevant whether the buyer, by failing to take over the goods, fails to perform an obligation under the contract.

> A, a retailer, sells goods to B. They agree that the goods will be made available to B at a certain date directly at the place of production, a factory, which is close to B's place of business. The risk passes on the agreed date, given that A has informed B that the goods have been made available at the factory.

In sum, paragraph (2) constitutes a catch-all clause for the passing of risk when goods are placed at the buyer's disposal at any place other than the seller's place of business. It therefore covers both cases where the seller has to deliver the goods to the buyer, and cases where the buyer has to pick up the goods from another place, such as a warehouse or a factory. However, it does not apply in the situations involving transportation covered by IV.A.–5:202 (Carriage of the goods) and IV.A.–5:203 (Goods sold in transit).

D. Consumer contract for sale

This Article does not apply to consumer contracts for sale except to the extent provided for in IV.A.–5:103 (Passing of risk in a consumer contract for sale) paragraph (2) – that is, where the consumer buyer has failed to perform the obligation to take over the goods and that failure is not excused. See the Comments to that Article.

NOTES

Passing of risk when the buyer is in default in taking over the goods

1. It is a common principle to all the legal systems that the risk shifts to the buyer if he fails to take over the goods in good time when they are placed at his disposal. This principle is however regulated in different ways under the different systems.

2. Under many systems it is regulated on a general level that the risk passes to the creditor when there is a default in the performance (CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 522 and Ccom art. 372; GERMANY CC § 324(2); HUNGARY CC § 302; ITALY CC art. 1207(1); PORTUGAL CC art. 815; SPAIN CC art. 1452(3); Ccom art. 333). Under GREEK law there are no explicit provisions regarding this issue, only the general principle providing that when the creditor defaults in performance, the liability of the debtor is limited only to dolus and gross negligence (CC art. 355). Nevertheless, it is established through case law that the buyer, by refusing to take over the goods, defaults in one of his obligations and therefore bears the risk (A.P. 790/1958 NoB 1959, 422). A similar situation can be found under SPANISH law where there is no express obligation of the buyer to accept delivery of the goods. Nevertheless, through case law in combination with legislation it can be concluded that the obligation of delivery has been fulfilled and that the creditor is in mora ((CC art. 1176 and TS 15 October 1987, RAJ 1987 no. 4469).

3. Other systems provide for sales-specific provisions. This mainly applies to systems where the risk passes upon delivery. All in all, the regulations are fairly similar, or at least lead to similar results. In general it is provided that the risk passes if the buyer does not accept the goods, fails to take delivery, or if the goods are not delivered on time and this is due to the buyer's default, or similar (CISG art. 69(1); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 455; AUSTRIA CC § 1048; ESTONIA LOA § 214(3); FINLAND SGA § 13(2); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.320; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:10(2); NORWAY SGA § 13(2); SLOVAKIA CC § 522 and Ccom art. 372; SLOVENIA LOA § 437; SWEDEN SGA § 13(2)).

4. Under some systems further conditions are expressly laid down. It might be required that the buyer commits a breach of contract through his failure to take over the goods (CISG art. 69(1); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom arts. 370 and 455) or that the delay was due to the buyer's act or omission (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 13(2)). Under CZECH and SLOVAKIAN law the risk may also pass if the buyer fails to cooperate with the seller (CC § 522).

5. When delivery is delayed, ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law place the risk with the party, either the seller or buyer, whose fault has caused the delay. In that case the risk extends to any loss that would not have occurred but for such fault (ENGLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 20(2); SCOTLAND Pommer & Thomsen v. Mowat (1906) 14 SLT 373).

6. Moreover, if the goods are to be kept at the buyer's disposal at some other location than the seller's place of business, the risk will pass when the time for delivery is due and the buyer is aware of the fact that the goods have been placed at his disposal (CISG art. 69(2); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 456; ESTONIA LOA § 214(1) in conjunction with § 209(1); FINLAND SGA § 13(3); HUNGARY CC §§ 278(1) and 302; NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 13(3)).

7. For this principle to apply the seller must often fulfil other conditions in order for the risk to pass; in particular in the case of a sale of unascertained goods he must duly identify them to the contract (cf. Notes II of IV.A.–5:102 (Time when risk passes)). Under some systems it is specifically regulated that the seller must notify the buyer that the goods have been duly identified (CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 458; ESTONIA LOA § 209(1); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.320; SLOVENIA LOA § 437) or ask the buyer to collect the goods in case no date for collection has been agreed upon (AUSTRIA CC § 1048). Under POLISH law, according to CC art. 551(1), the seller may place the goods in safe-keeping at the cost and at the risk of the buyer in case the latter is delayed in taking over the goods.

8. This solution does not apply to NORDIC consumer sales. Here the general rule prevails, namely that the risk passes when the goods actually come into the buyer's possession, even if the consumer has committed a breach of contract through not collecting the goods in good time from the seller, cf. under IV.A.–5:103 (Passing of risk in a consumer contract for sale).

9. Under those systems where the risk passes with the property, i.e. mostly upon the conclusion of the contract, generally there is no corresponding sales-specific rule, since the risk has typically already passed before the buyer delays in taking over the goods. Nevertheless, those systems provide for a corresponding rule where the seller delays in delivering the goods. Under some systems, if the seller is urged to deliver the goods (mis en demeure) the risk passes to the seller (BELGIUM and FRANCE CC art. 1138(2)). Similarly under LATVIAN law where CC art. 2024(4) establishes that the risk is borne by the seller if he has delayed the delivery.

IV.A.–5:202: Carriage of the goods

(1) This Article applies to any contract of sale which involves carriage of goods.

(2) If the seller is not bound to hand over the goods at a particular place, the risk passes to the buyer when the goods are handed over to the first carrier for transmission to the buyer in accordance with the contract.

(3) If the seller is bound to hand over the goods to a carrier at a particular place, the risk does not pass to the buyer until the goods are handed over to the carrier at that place.

(4) The fact that the seller is authorised to retain documents controlling the disposition of the goods does not affect the passing of the risk.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article deals with the passing of risk in the event of the carriage of the goods. Basically, the risk passes to the buyer when the goods are handed over to the carrier, and not, as required by the main rule of IV.A.–5:102 (Time when risk passes), when the buyer takes over the goods.

This provision has to be read in the light of the rules on carriage contained in Chapter 2, Section 2. According to IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery) paragraph (2), the seller delivers by handing over the goods to the carrier, and by transferring to the buyer any document which is necessary to take over the goods from the carrier; in addition, IV.A.–2:204 (Carriage of the goods) sets out several obligations on the part of the seller in relation to the carriage of the goods.

B. Carriage of the goods and passing of the risk

Under a sales contract involving the carriage of goods from the seller to the buyer, the risk generally passes when the seller hands over the goods to the carrier, and not when the buyer eventually receives the goods. If the parties have not agreed on a particular place for handing over the goods (paragraph (2)), the risk passes upon handing over the goods to the first independent carrier. In general, the goods will be deemed to have been handed over for transportation when the goods have been placed at the carrier's area of control.

> A sells ten computers to B. The parties agree that A is to arrange for the transportation of the goods to B's place of business. A engages an independent carrier to transport the goods. The risk passes when the goods are handed over to the carrier.

If, however, the seller has to hand over the goods at a particular place (paragraph (3)), the risk passes when the goods are handed over to the carrier at that place. This is generally only the case if the buyer is supposed to organise the transportation. The buyer may then, for instance, name an airport or a port where the goods are to be handed over to the carrier. As a consequence, if the seller hands over the goods to the carrier at the wrong place the risk will not pass.

The facts are the same as under illustration 1. The parties agree that the seller is to hand over the goods to the carrier, an international logistic company at a certain airport. Due to a mistake, A delivers the goods to the carrier at the domestic airport, instead of at the international airport as agreed. Since A has not complied with the requirements under paragraph (3) of this provision, the risk has not passed.

The rule that the risk passes when goods are handed over to the carrier forms an exception to the main rule, according to which the risk passes when the buyer takes over the goods. It is based upon the idea that the risk in general should pass when the seller has done everything possible to deliver the goods. It is also based on the assumption that the carriage of the goods is for the buyer's benefit. It is also customary in international trade to consider the carrier as an 'extension' of the buyer. The rule is not justified in terms of control, because after delivery to the carrier neither the seller nor the buyer has physical control of the goods. On the contrary, in practice after dispatch the seller will usually be the party who can control the goods, or at least the disposition of the goods. It should be pointed out, however, that if the goods are damaged in transit, the buyer may have a claim against the carrier; and that normally the buyer will have the benefit of insurance cover. The buyer will either arrange this directly (e.g. in an FOB contract) or the seller will be obliged to arrange it on the buyer's behalf (as is the case under a CIF contract).

Paragraph (4) makes it clear that the fact that the seller is authorised to retain documents controlling the disposition of the goods does not affect the passing of the risk. It is of no consequence which party is in possession of the documents; the actual handing over to the carrier is the decisive element. Questions as to the transfer of ownership, such as those arising from retention of ownership clauses, are also unimportant for the passing of the risk.

This provision only applies if the parties have not agreed otherwise. The parties are free to regulate the matter of risk as they wish, for instance by agreeing that the risk is not to pass until the goods are actually taken over by the buyer.

C. The carrier as an independent entity from the seller

The carrier envisaged in the first paragraph is an independent carrier. Whether a freight forwarder should also be included under the notion of a carrier may be uncertain, due to the different roles which a freight forwarder plays. However, in cases where the goods are taken by a freight forwarder with the purpose of having the goods transferred to the buyer, this rule does apply. If the seller undertakes the transportation without using an independent carrier the risk will not pass until goods have been handed over to the buyer.

A buys construction materials from Z, a large manufacturer of red bricks. The parties agree that one of Z's employees will bring the materials to A's building site. In this case the risk will not pass until the material is delivered to the building site.

D. Consumer contract for sale

See the Comments to IV.A.–5:103 (Passing of risk in a consumer contract for sale).

NOTES

I. Sales contracts involving carriage

1. If the contract of sale involves the carriage of the goods, under many systems the risk passes from the seller to the buyer when the goods are handed over to the carrier (for the notion of a carrier cf. below under II.). Accordingly, the place of performance must be a place other than the buyer's place of business or habitual residence, because in that case the seller does not perform (and the risk does not pass) until he delivers the goods at that place. In any case, the place of destination must not coincide with the place of performance, irrespective of where that is.

2. It is not always clear whether a contract involves carriage in the sense required for the risk to pass. Generally, however, the contract does not involve carriage if the seller transports the goods himself. Under NORDIC law it is explicitly provided that the risk does not pass until the goods are actually handed over to the buyer if the goods are transported by the seller, or if the transportation takes place within the same locality or within an area where the seller normally arranges the transportation of similar goods (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 7(1) and (2)). Moreover, it is clarified with respect to the trade terms 'free at', 'delivered to' or 'delivered free' at a particular place, that under those terms the goods are not considered to have been handed over until they have arrived at the place mentioned after the respective delivery term (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 7(3)). Under DANISH law there is similar regulation in SGA § 65). In AUSTRIA it is required that the recipient has either determined or authorized the mode of dispatch. It is generally acknowledged (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[10], 237) that the buyer is said to consent tacitly to dispatch by rail (OGH in HS 5345) or mail, by air or ship (OGH in EvBl 1990/34). Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law the seller must be authorised or required to send the goods to the buyer (Sale of Goods Act s. 32(1)).

II. The notion of carrier

3. Most systems do not provide for any special notion of a carrier. Nevertheless, some systems provide that the risk is transferred upon delivery to the transport provider, freight forwarder or the person indicated to send the goods (GERMANY CC § 447(1); PORTUGAL CC art. 797 and Ccom art. 383). It is also generally required that the carrier is independent from the seller (ENGLAND Benjamin (-Guest), Sale of Goods[6], § 5-098 and Goode, Commercial Law 262-263; SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 191 f). The carrier may therefore not be part of the seller's organisation.

III. Passing of risk in a sale involving carriage

4. The principle that the risk passes with delivery to the carrier emerges in multiple ways in the European legal systems. This principle is first and foremost important under systems where the risk passes upon delivery. Unless otherwise agreed, delivery takes place and the risk passes to the buyer when the goods are handed over to the first carrier for transmission to the buyer (CISG art. 67; AUSTRIA CC § 429; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 594 and Ccom art. 457; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 32(1); ESTONIA LOA § 214(2) in conjunction with § 209(4) no. 2; FINLAND SGA § 7(2); GERMANY CC § 447(1); GREECE CC art. 524; HUNGARY CC § 278(2); NORWAY SGA § 7(2); POLAND CC art. 544; PORTUGAL CC art. 797 and Ccom art. 383; SLOVAKIA CC § 594, as well as §§ 133 and 590; SLOVENIA LOA §§ 436(1) and 452;SPAIN (commercial sales) see TS 3 October 1997, 21 February 1972 and 8 September 1972 and cf. Ccom art. 338 and VICENT CHULIÁ, Compendio crítico de Derecho Mercantil, II, 1990, p. 141; SWEDEN SGA § 7(2)). There might also be a general regulation regarding risk and transportation. For instance under FRENCH commercial sales the goods travel at the risk of their owner during transportation, that is the buyer when the goods sold are identified (Ccom art. L. 132-7).

5. If the seller has chosen the carrier, under some systems there are explicit minimum requirements as to the transportation (cf. the Notes to IV.A.–2:204 (Carriage of the goods)). If these requirements are not met, and the goods are damaged due to the choice of transportation, the risk will remain with the seller (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA §§ 8 and 12). If the goods are lost or damaged during transit, the buyer may decline to treat the delivery to the carrier as a delivery to himself or may hold the seller responsible in damages (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 32(2)).

6. Under a few systems there are exceptions to the general rules regarding the carriage of goods. If the seller is bound to hand the goods over to a carrier at a particular place, the risk does not pass to the buyer until the goods are handed over to the carrier at that place (CISG art. 67(1); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 457; HUNGARY CC § 278(2)). Where goods are sent by the seller to the buyer by a route involving sea transit, under circumstances in which it is usual practice to insure, the seller must give such notice to the buyer as may enable him to insure them during their sea transit; and if the seller fails to do so, the goods are at his risk during such sea transit (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 32(3)).

7. For the risk to pass under this article, it is furthermore required that the goods have been duly individualised. Moreover, under quite a number of systems, it is also provided that the seller bears the risk while the goods are under transportation in consumer sales.

IV.A.–5:203: Goods sold in transit

(1) This Article applies to any contract of sale which involves goods sold in transit.

(2) The risk passes to the buyer at the time the goods are handed over to the first carrier. However, if the circumstances so indicate, the risk passes to the buyer as from the time of the conclusion of the contract.

(3) If at the time of the conclusion of the contract the seller knew or could reasonably be expected to have known that the goods had been lost or damaged and did not disclose this to the buyer, the loss or damage is at the risk of the seller.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article applies to the sale of goods in transit, that is goods that are already travelling from point of departure to their destination.

> Illustration 1
> A buys 100 barrels of cotton from B. B dispatches the goods to A. While the goods are still in transit A sells the goods to C. The latter bears the risk for the damage from the time of the delivery to the carrier.

B. Sale of goods in transit and the passing of risk

As a rule, the risk in the case of a sale of goods in transit passes from the time the goods are handed over to the first carrier. Therefore the buyer of goods in transit assumes the risk for a time before the conclusion of the sales contract. This retrospective effect can be justified as follows. First, it is customary practice in this kind of commercial transaction that the final buyer undertakes the whole transportation risk, usually by taking out insurance. Secondly, this type of sale is based on documents representing or relating to the goods, such as insurance and disposition documents, which the buyer may examine before entering into the contract of sale.

The rule in article 68 of the CISG is as follows.

> The risk in respect of goods sold in transit passes to the buyer from the time of the conclusion of the contract. However, if the circumstances so indicate, the risk is assumed by the buyer from the time the goods were handed over to the carrier who issued the documents embodying the contract of carriage. Nevertheless, if at the time of the conclusion of the contract of sale the seller knew or ought to have known that the goods had been lost or damaged and did not disclose this to the buyer, the loss or damage is at the risk of the seller.

The present Article uses the same ingredients but brings the solution of the CISG into line with commercial practice by making the exception of the first sentence of article 68 CISG the rule. The risk may, however, still pass upon the conclusion of the contract if the circumstances so indicate, for example in the absence of insurance against transportation risks.

C. Exception

The main rule in paragraph (2) does not apply if the seller of the goods in transit knew, or should have known, that the goods have been lost or damaged on their journey and did not inform the subsequent buyer. In such a case the seller is in bad faith and must bear that particular risk.

Illustration 2
The facts are the same as in illustration 1. When the cotton arrives at the port of destination C discovers that during the voyage part of the cotton has been damaged. Normally this loss is borne by C, who may seek to press an insurance claim. If A, when entering into the contract of sale with C, knew or ought to have known that the cotton was damaged and did not disclose that information to C, then that loss is borne by A.

D. Consumer contract for sale

Since such sales transactions are almost exclusively commercial transactions, consumer contracts for sale

Sale of goods in transit

1. The majority of legal systems provide explicit regulation regarding risk when it comes to sale of goods in transit. Under some systems the risk passes at the time of the conclusion of the contract, if not the circumstances indicate that the risk is assumed by the buyer from the time the goods were handed over to the carrier who issued the transport documents (CISG art. 68; FINLAND SGA § 15; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.320; NORWAY SGA § 15; SWEDEN SGA § 15). There is an exception to this rule, namely if, at the time of the conclusion of the contract of sale, the seller knew or ought to have known that the goods had been lost or damaged and did not disclose this to the buyer, then the loss or damage is at the risk of the seller. A similar rule can be found under PORTUGUESE law, which provides that the buyer bears the risk from the time of the conclusion of the contract, but this is considered not to apply if the seller knew that the goods had already perished and did not disclose this fact to a buyer in good faith (CC art. 938). Under SPANISH law there is neither a statutory rule nor court decision on this point, and the general regime has to be applied; the present is a case in which delivery through solo consensu (CC art. 1463) makes full sense: the seller assigns to the buyer the contractual right against the factual possessor (carrier). Commentators on CISG art. 68 have not found any precedent or corresponding rule in Spanish law (see Caffarena, Diez-Picazo La Compraventa Internacional de mercaderías, 1997, art. 68).
2. Under other systems the risk is rather linked to the delivery to the carrier in such cases. The risk passes upon delivery to the first carrier (CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 460; ESTONIA LOA § 214(4); ITALY CC art. 1529; SLOVAKIA Ccom arts. 457 and 460). However, under some of these systems the cases where the seller was aware of the damage and did not disclose this to the buyer are explicitly excluded (CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 460; ESTONIA LOA § 214(4)). Under ITALIAN law it is explicitly provided that this principle only applies concerning the documentary sale of insured goods in transit (CC art. 1529). GERMAN case law indicates that the buyer of goods in transit bears the risk from the time when redirections are given to the carrier (BGH 27 March 1968, BGHZ 50, 32).

3. Under the Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 33, which applies in both ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, where the seller agrees to deliver goods at the seller's own risk at a place other than that where they are when sold, the buyer must nevertheless (unless otherwise agreed) take any risk of deterioration in the goods necessarily incident to the course of transit. This does not extend, however, to risks which arise as a result of the defective state of the goods when the transit starts (Adams/Atiyah/MacQueen, Sale of Goods[11], 357.

CHAPTER 6: CONSUMER GOODS GUARANTEES

IV.A.–6:101: Definition of a consumer goods guarantee

(1) A consumer goods guarantee means any undertaking of a type mentioned in the following paragraph given to a consumer in connection with a consumer contract for the sale of goods:

(a) by a producer or a person in later links of the business chain; or
(b) by the seller in addition to the seller's obligations as seller of the goods.

(2) The undertaking may be that:

(a) apart from misuse, mistreatment or accident the goods will remain fit for their ordinary purpose for a specified period of time, or otherwise;
(b) the goods will meet the specifications set out in the guarantee document or in associated advertising; or
(c) subject to any conditions stated in the guarantee,

(i) the goods will be repaired or replaced;
(ii) the price paid for the goods will be reimbursed in whole or in part; or
(iii) some other remedy will be provided.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article provides the definition of a 'consumer goods guarantee'. The first paragraph indicates who may be the provider and recipient of the guarantee. The second paragraph lists different variants, or basic examples, of consumer goods guarantees by describing what a consumer goods guarantee may actually contain.

The application of the rules contained in Chapter 6 is limited to consumer contracts for sale, as they were specifically designed to answer the needs of consumer contracts for sale. The main reason for this policy choice lies in the specific function that the guarantee plays in relation to consumer contracts for sale, which is distinct from the function assumed in other categories of sales. Under commercial sales a guarantee by the producer is often coupled with a reduction of the buyer's rights against the seller. Consumer contracts for sale, on the other hand, are to a large extent governed by rules of a mandatory character, and the guarantee cannot influence (in a negative way) the rights of the buyer. At the same time, guarantees, used as marketing tools aiming at tying the consumer to a particular brand, may very often mislead the consumer as to his or her actual rights. This may lead to a situation where, instead of improving the position of the consumer, a guarantee actually impairs it.

B. Choice of terminology

In the first place, the term 'consumer goods guarantee' refers to the object of the transaction, which has two consequences. On the one hand, it indicates the boundaries of this Chapter by linking the guarantee both to consumers and goods. In this context, it should be noted that the present rules, while defining 'goods' in Annex 1 and IV.A.–1:201 (Goods), do not provide specific rules for consumer goods. However, the rules in the present Chapter are applicable to goods sold in the course of a consumer contract for sale, as defined in IV.A.–1:204 (Consumer contract for sale).

Next, defining the guarantee by reference to the object of the transaction indicates a very strong connection between the guarantee and the object that it accompanies. This is reconfirmed by IV.A.–6:102 (Binding nature of the guarantee) paragraph (2), which establishes that, as a default rule, the guarantee is attached to, and thus follows, the consumer goods.

C. Undertaking

The present rules do not take a stand with respect to the legal form of the consumer goods guarantee. In this respect, they follow the approach adopted by the Consumer Sales Directive, which also uses the expression of 'undertaking', without defining its meaning. The legal qualification of the consumer goods guarantee may depend on many factors, the most important being the will of the party who offers a consumer goods guarantee. Depending on the situation, a guarantee may take the form of a contract, a contractual clause or a unilateral promise. While the legal qualification of the guarantee is of the utmost importance, defining it may have an undesired, restrictive result.

Accordingly, the choice of the legal form of the consumer goods guarantee is left to the parties. If the parties do not make that choice explicitly, the legal form should be established by means of interpretation.

D. Parties related to the consumer goods guarantee

The first consumer buyer of the goods furnished with the consumer goods guarantee always obtains the status of the guarantee holder, and is thus able to invoke the consumer goods guarantee. As a default rule under IV.A.–6:102 (Binding nature of the guarantee), the consumer goods guarantee is attached to the goods. Therefore every subsequent owner of the goods is also entitled to invoke it.

The consumer goods guarantee may be provided by the seller, by the producer, or by any other person in later links in the business chain (which reflects the wording of IV.A.–2:303 (Statements by third persons). The position of a seller and a producer offering a guarantee is different, as the seller is already bound under the conformity regime. If the seller decides to offer a guarantee it is an undertaking additional to the obligations arising from the conformity requirements, whereas a guarantee by the producer is self-standing. According to IV.A.–6:102 (Binding nature of the guarantee), the question of who is the guarantor does not affect the binding nature of the consumer goods guarantee. The wording of the present Article highlights the distinct nature of the consumer goods guarantee provided by the seller and of that provided by the producer (or any other person in later links in the business chain); but at the same time, it allows for an effective and refined common regulation throughout Chapter 6.

In practice, the most common guarantees will be those provided by the producers and the sellers of the goods. However, there is no reason for limiting the number of prospective guarantors, since including other possible guarantors makes the regulation more effective and responsive to market realities.

E. The content of the consumer goods guarantee

Paragraph (2) indicates various variants, or basic examples, of consumer goods guarantees and their contents. Under paragraph (1) the guarantee need only be of a type mentioned in paragraph (2). There may, of course, be many different versions of guarantees falling within these types and the third type concludes with the general expression: "some other remedy will be provided". To this extent the variants in paragraph (2) leave room for expansion.

Sub-paragraph (a) presents the most neutral of the three variants. In this context, the guarantor promises what the consumer is already entitled to expect under the conformity regime set out in Chapter 2, Section 3. In other words, the ordinary purpose is that referred to in IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging) sub-paragraph (b). The goods should be fit for their ordinary purpose for a specified period of time. The guarantor may specify the period of time; otherwise, the default period laid down in IV.A.–6:104 (Coverage of the guarantee) applies.

Sub-paragraph (b) mirrors the definition of the guarantee established by the Consumer Sales Directive. This is the most common solution in consumer contracts for sale; it assumes that the guarantor establishes certain specifications with regard to the goods, either in the guarantee itself or in the associated advertising. The content of the consumer goods guarantee is determined by the guarantee document and the associated advertisement jointly (see also Comment F below). The guarantor is free to make these specifications, subject to certain transparency conditions under IV.A.–6:103 (Guarantee document). The most common elements that should be covered by the specifications of the guarantor are listed in IV.A.–6:104 (Coverage of the guarantee). The default specifications in this latter provision apply if, and to the extent that, the guarantor fails to specify what is covered by the guarantee offered.

In contrast to the two previous variants, sub-paragraph (c) approaches the consumer goods guarantee from a remedial perspective. The remedies include repair, replacement, reimbursement of the purchase price in whole or in part, as well as other possible remedies (which reflects the solution adopted by the Consumer Sales Directive). The concluding words mean that the list does not lay down any limits for the guarantor in relation to the potential remedies. The guarantor may provide one or all of the listed remedies, a remedy different from those listed under sub-paragraph (c), or indeed a combination of the listed remedies. If the guarantor does not indicate which remedies are available to the guarantee holder or who is entitled to choose a remedy, the guarantee holder may choose between repair, replacement, or reimbursement of the price paid (see IV.A.–6:104 (Coverage of the guarantee) and cf. also Comment D to that Article). If the guarantor offers the guarantee holder certain remedies, the transparency requirements of IV.A.–6:103 (Guarantee document) have to be observed in any case.

F. Associated advertising

As indicated in paragraph (2)(b), the actual scope and content of the consumer goods guarantee may be determined by the conditions set out both in the guarantee document and in the associated advertising. Statements in advertising may contain promises that amount to guarantees (e.g. "Guaranteed for five years") but a mere statement of fact ("This car will do 35km to the litre") does not by itself amount to a guarantee. If the consumer goods guarantee is determined exclusively by advertising, the same rules apply as in the case of a regular guarantee (assessment of the guarantee content in accordance with default rules, the right of the consumer to request a guarantee document, etc.).

Where the guarantee document and the associated advertising are equally important in determining the content of the guarantee, possible discrepancies between them should be solved through the interpretation which is the most favourable to the consumer in the given circumstances (cf. II.–8:103 (Interpretation against supplier of term or dominant party)).

G. Consumer goods guarantee free of charge and against payment

The definition of the Consumer Sales Directive indicates that the guarantee must be provided free of charge. In fact, this means that the price of the guarantee should be included in the purchase price. Since the Directive does not apply to guarantees that are offered against direct payment ('given without extra charge') a significant (and growing) number of guarantees offered to consumers remain outside the scope of its influence. At the same time, the Directive limits this restriction only to the offering of the guarantee. It therefore gives the guarantor the possibility to impose two other types of costs on consumers: the cost of invoking and that of performing the guarantee (cf. IV.A.–6:104 (Coverage of the guarantee) sub-paragraph (d)). In addition, the exclusion of guarantees against payment offers guarantors a very easy route to escape the application of the rules of the Directive, for example by charging a trifling sum for the guarantee.

Market practice shows that guarantors very often offer instruments called 'extended guarantees' or 'insurance policies' with respect to the goods sold that in fact constitute guarantees provided against payment. Another common practice is for the guarantor to offer a free guarantee for a relatively short period of time and to invite the consumer to pay extra in order to have it prolonged.

For these reasons, the present rules do not differentiate between guarantees that are, or appear to be, free of charge, and guarantees against extra payment. However, if the guarantor decides to offer a consumer goods guarantee that imposes any kind of liability for direct payment on the consumer, this must be clearly communicated to the consumer (see IV.A.–6:104 (Coverage of the guarantee) sub-paragraph (d)). If the guarantor remains silent as to the costs related to the guarantee, there is a presumption that the costs for the guarantee are included in the purchase price and that there are no additional payments relating to it.

NOTES

I. Where are (consumer) guarantees regulated?

1. There is great variety between the different systems when it comes to the regulation of consumer guarantees. Under a few systems there were already concrete regulations on (consumer) guarantees before the implementation of the Consumer Sales Directive, whereas for most systems such guarantees were previously a novelty. Moreover, there is also considerable deviation as to where the new regime as required under the Directive has been adopted.
2. For instance, under SLOVENIAN and HUNGARIAN law there was already a system of obligatory guarantees for certain types of goods before the Consumer Sales Directive was implemented. This regime has been retained and exists next to the regime on voluntary guarantees. Under SLOVENIAN law there is a very wide range of products which can only be sold with (obligatory) guarantees concerning proper functioning in principle for 1 year (Consumer Protection Act § 15b and the Regulation of the Minister for trade (Official Journal no. 73/2003)). If the seller fails to provide the buyer with the guarantee or the latter does not have the obligatory content or form, the buyer has the same rights ex lege and the seller is punishable (by fines in accordance with the Consumer Protection Act §§ 77-78). Thus the system of obligatory guarantees runs parallel to the seller's liability for defects (at least in consumer sales). Voluntary guarantees are far less important and only marginally regulated, the most important provision being Consumer Sales Act § 18(4) (if the guarantee is not obligatory and the seller has publicly promised a guarantee the buyer has the same rights as in the case of obligatory guarantees). In HUNGARY guarantees (jótállás) are regulated in CC § 248 in a somewhat ambiguous way, since they can be either legal (mandatory) or commercial (voluntary, contractual). It is generally not specific to consumer contracts, though the provision on the guarantee document (CC § 248(3)) is only applicable in the case of consumer contracts. In addition to voluntary commercial guarantees, there are special pieces of legislation on legal (mandatory) guarantees with regard to certain products and services. This is the case concerning durable consumer goods (Government decree 151/2003. (IX. 22.)); repair and maintenance services to consumers (Government decree 249/2004. (VIII. 27.)); and concerning the construction of houses (Government decree 181/2003. (XI. 5.)).

3. In the NORDIC COUNTRIES there was also already some previous regulation of guarantees. This issue is regulated in connection with the general regime on lack of conformity in FINLAND (Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 15a) and SWEDEN (Consumer Sales Act § 21(1)). Consequently, the guarantor will be liable in accordance with the regulation of liability for lack of conformity if the goods deteriorate within the applicable guarantee period and the consumer has access to all the remedies prescribed by law, cf. further Notes V under IV.A.–6:103 (Guarantee document). However, in SWEDEN the formal requirements on the guarantee document laid down by the Directive are regulated in the Marketing Act § 13. Also in DENMARK and NORWAY additional requirements already existed in the Marketing Act (DENMARK Marketing Act § 12; NORWAY Marketing Act § 9c).

4. Under some other systems, the regulation can be found in the civil code (BELGIUM CC art. 1649bis §2, 6; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 620(5); GERMANY CC § 443; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:6a; PORTUGAL CC art. 921; SLOVAKIA CC §§ 502 and 620-621). Similarly under ESTONIAN law the necessary regulation can be found under the LOA § 230. In GERMANY CC § 443 contains general rules on guarantees, whilst CC § 477 adds specific rules for consumer guarantees.

5. In other systems the regulation can be found in a consumer-specific instrument (AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 9b; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 s. 15; FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-15; GREECE Consumer Protection Act art. 5(3)-(6); ITALY Consumer Code art. 128(2); LATVIA Consumer Protection Act art. 16; POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 13(1); SPAIN ConsProtA art. 125).

II. Definition of the guarantee in consumer sales

6. The Consumer Sales Directive defines a guarantee in art. 1(2)(e) as any undertaking by a seller or producer to the consumer, given without extra charge, to reimburse the price paid or to replace, repair or handle consumer goods in any way if they do not meet the specifications set out in the guarantee statement or in the relevant advertising.

7. As a result of the implementation of the Consumer Sales Directive most of the legal systems have adopted a definition of the consumer guarantee based on the definition presented by the Directive (BELGIUM CC art. 1649bis § 2, 6; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 s. 2; ESTONIA LOA § 230; ITALY Consumer Code art. 128(2)(c)). In SPANISH law the guarantee is only described as an additional undertaking (ConsProtA art. 125; cf. also the Exposición de Motivos).

8. In GERMANY CC § 443 distinguishes two types of guarantees: (1) guarantees concerning the characteristics of goods (Beschaffenheitsgarantie) and (2) guarantees concerning the durability of goods (Haltbarkeitsgarantie). In both cases, the guarantee is binding, and the buyer can claim performance against whoever has provided the guarantee (the seller or third party). In the case of the second category there is a presumption that a defect that appears during the time mentioned in the guarantee allows the buyer to enforce his rights expressed in the guarantee (CC § 443(2)). In PORTUGAL there is a definition of a guarantee (garantia de bom funcionamento) in CC art. 921.

9. In some legislations the definition of the guarantee, although loosely based on the concept presented by the Directive, provides a more elaborated description of this instrument. In LATVIA a guarantee is defined as a confirmation by the manufacturer, seller or service provider that the goods or services, or component parts thereof will maintain the use, safety and operational qualities for a specified period of time, and that the manufacturer, seller or service provider undertakes additional obligations that are not provided for in the Consumer Protection Act or other regulatory enactments (Consumer Protection Act art. 16(1)). In the NETHERLANDS the notion of a guarantee in consumer sales contracts is incorporated in CC art. 7:6a. In such a contract, a statement is considered to be a guarantee if the consumer is entitled to certain rights or claims when the promised qualities are lacking (CC art. 7:6a(1)), irrespective of whether such a promise is recorded in a document which is enclosed with the good that was sold, or that it follows from advertising (CC art. 7:6a(5)(a)). In SLOVENIA the closest to the definition of the guarantee is established in LOA § 481(1): “If the seller of any machine, engine, apparatus or similar goods classed as so-called technical goods hands over a guarantee document to the buyer, by which the producer guarantees the proper functioning of the goods during a specific period, counting from delivery, and the goods do not function properly, the buyer may demand from either the seller or the producer a repair within an appropriate period or a replacement, should the seller/producer fail to do so”.

10. Under some systems, the regulation of consumer guarantees is linked to the conformity regime. If the seller has assumed liability for the fitness or for some other characteristics of the goods for a fixed period, the goods are deemed to be defective if they deteriorate during this period as referred to in the guarantee (FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 15a; SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 21(1)). Furthermore, in the SWEDISH Marketing Act § 13, the guarantee is mentioned as follows: “A trader, who while marketing the goods through a guarantee or other similar undertaking offers to be responsible for a certain period of time for a product or a part thereof or for a quality of the product [...].” A similar regulation can be found under SLOVENIAN law concerning obligatory guarantees (which exist next to voluntary guarantees). The system of obligatory guarantees is parallel to the seller’s liability for defects (Consumer Protection Act § 15b and Regulation of the Minister for Trade (Official Journal no. 73/2003)). Also under CZECH law consumer guarantees are linked to the conformity regime. Under CC § 620(5) it is established that: “A guarantee exceeding the scope of the guarantee pursuant to this Code may be given by the seller’s statement to that effect in the guarantee certificate; in such case, the seller shall specify the terms (conditions) and the scope of the guarantee’s prolongation in the guarantee certificate”.

11. Another legislative technique is used in NORWAY, where the Marketing Act § 9c contains a negative definition of a guarantee. It is prohibited to use the word guarantee or similar expressions when trading in goods, services or other performances in the course of business if the receiver is not given additional rights to those rights which he or she already had, or if such rights are limited. Similarly in DENMARK where the term guarantee may only be used in a consumer context if it provides the consumer with substantially better rights compared to his legal rights (Marketing Act § 12(1)).

12. Under GREEK law legislation on commercial guarantees and after-sales services was already introduced as part of consumer protection measures at the beginning of the 1990s. Detailed provisions on commercial guarantees can be found in the Consumer Protection Act art. 5(3)-(6).

13. In HUNGARY the meaning of a guarantee (jótállás) is regulated in CC § 248 in a somewhat ambiguous way, since it can be either legal (mandatory) or commercial (voluntary, contractual).

14. Additionally, there are legislations which do not present an express definition of the guarantee, like FRANCE or SLOVAKIA, where although the CC does not contain any express definition of a guarantee, it might be understood as the liability of the seller that the object of sale will retain its qualities for a specified period of time. In POLAND the Consumer Sales Act only describes in art. 13(1) the way in which the guarantee is offered: without extra payment, by means of declaration contained in a guarantee document or in an advertisement which relates to consumption goods. It also specifies that a declaration that does not include the duties of the guarantor does not create a guarantee.

III. Parties to the guarantee

15. According to the Consumer Sales Directive art. 1(2)(e) the guarantee is an undertaking by a seller or producer to the consumer. The Directive defines the seller as any natural or legal person who, under a contract, sells consumer goods in the course of his trade, business or profession (art. 1(2)(c)) and the producer as the manufacturer of consumer goods, the importer of consumer goods into the territory of the Community or any person purporting to be a producer by placing his name, trade mark or other distinctive sign on the consumer goods (art. 1(2)(d)).

16. Some legislations clearly identify potential parties of a guarantee. Under GERMAN law CC § 443 the parties are the buyer and the seller or a third party. In the NETHERLANDS this is the consumer and the issuing party. Moreover, CC art. 7:6a explicitly indicates that the guarantee may be issued by the seller or producer, but it is generally accepted that the guarantee may also be issued by a party other than the seller or producer (cf. Mon. NBW b-65b (Loos), no. 19). Similarly in SLOVENIA in cases of (obligatory and voluntary) guarantees both the seller and the producer (and, according to the case law, if the latter is not present, also the importer) are liable as guarantors to the buyer (LOA § 481). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the guarantor is a person who offers a consumer guarantee to a consumer (Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 s. 2) and the consumer is any natural person who is acting for purposes which are outside his trade, business or profession.

17. Other national legislations approach the question of the parties more generally. Under some systems the parties are merely defined as the professional and the consumer (AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 9b; DENMARK Marketing Act § 12). In POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 13(1) refers to the guarantor (without further definition) and the buyer. Similarly in SPAIN where the ConsProtA art. 125(1). Also in FRANCE the Consumer Code does not define who is the debtor of the commercial guarantee and only speaks of the buyer (cf. Consumer Code art. L. 211-15). Under CZECH law the parties of the guarantee are not expressly defined. From the wording of the relevant regulation (CC §§ 616 and 619-620) it can be assumed that the parties to a guarantee are the buyer and the seller. Moreover, also guarantees provided by the producer are considered to be provided by the seller. This means that the seller has to provide the buyer on his request with the certificate of guarantee; if there is voluntary guarantee this has to be stated in written in the certificate of guarantee (CC § 620(5)). In SWEDEN the Consumer Sales Act § 21(1) provides no express definition of the parties apart from the general definition of a consumer and a professional provided in § 1. Nevertheless, concerning the guarantor, the provision applies if the seller, or somebody else on his behalf, provides the guarantee. According to the preparatory works, the latter notion is to be interpreted in a wide sense. It is therefore not necessary that the guarantor and the seller are subject to a direct contractual relationship. Instead the decisive criterion should be that the seller and the guarantor appear to form a unit from the consumer's point of view, for instance if the consumer at the time of the conclusion of the contract receives a written guarantee from the producer or a third party (Prop 1989/90:89, 111). In the legal literature, this has been criticised as being rather far-reaching, for instance in the case where the packaging of the goods contains a guarantee certificate from the producer, instructing the buyer to instigate his claims directly against the producer and not against the seller (Herre, Konsumentköplagen[2], 263). In FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 15(a)(2) provides that if the guarantee was provided by a person other than the seller, either at the previous level of the supply chain or on behalf of the seller the goods shall also be considered defective under normal terms and conditions (these are laid down in chap. 5 § 15(a)(1)). However, according to the norm in question, the seller shall not be liable for a guarantee given by a previous level of the supply chain for a defect for which he would not otherwise be liable under Consumer Protection Act Chapter 5, if the seller shows that he has clearly notified the buyer before the conclusion of the sale.

IV. Legal form of the guarantee

18. The Consumer Sales Directive gives no clarification as to the legal form of the guarantee. It describes the guarantee as an 'undertaking' (art. 1(2)(e)), without providing any further explanation as to the meaning of this expression.

19. This approach is followed by some systems (BELGIUM CC art. 1649bis § 2, 5; ITALY Consumer Code art. 128(2)(c); FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-15(2)). Also in FINLAND; GERMANY; SPAIN; and SWEDEN the legal form of the guarantee is not expressly regulated. Under SWEDISH law the guarantee is generally only defined as an undertaking from the guarantor under which he takes responsibility for the correctness of certain circumstances concerning one or more characteristics of the goods (Herre, Konsumentköplagen[2], 257).

20. Other systems are more precise in this respect. Under some systems the guarantee is classified as a unilateral contract between the parties (ESTONIA LOA § 230; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:6a). Under ENGLISH law, all guarantees are contractual in nature: the seller, supplier or manufacturer makes an offer of the substance of the guarantee, which is accepted by the customer. Acceptance of the offer of the guarantee, however, may tacitly be inferred from the acceptance of the goods themselves, so that this requirement becomes merely formal in nature. In SCOTS law, guarantees may also be contractual in nature, although it is possible to view some guarantees as unilateral promises. A unilateral promise is a separate type of obligation from a contract, and is binding without acceptance. A unilateral promise must be made in formal writing in order to be valid, unless it is made in the course of business, which will be so in the case of consumer guarantees (cf. MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland, 63-69; Hogg, Obligations[2]). Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 s. 15(1) classifies a consumer guarantee as a "contractual obligation", but says nothing about the nature of any acceptance of such a contractual obligation by the consumer. It can be argued either that the terms of s. 15(1) are intended to give effect to such contractual guarantees without the need for any acceptance, or that the offer of a guarantee contract is tacitly accepted by the consumer (as outlined above). In POLAND under the Consumer Sales Act art. 13(1) a guarantee is created by a declaration by the guarantor. There are no further specifications as to its legal nature. However, under the part of the CC which applies to non-consumer sales, depending on the circumstances a guarantee could be classified either as a contract, a contractual stipulation or an unilateral promise. In SLOVAKIA according to CC §§ 502 and 620-621 in non-commercial sales in general and in consumer sales a guarantee is binding upon the seller either as a statutory guarantee or as a contractual or declaratory guarantee. The guarantees established by contract or by an unilateral declaration bind the seller if they give the buyer more rights than the CC or specified statutes (CC § 39). The same applies under CZECH law (cf. Knappová, Civil Law II[3], 106). In SLOVENIA the legal nature of a guarantee is not clear; in cases of an obligatory (statutory) guarantee it arises from the Consumer Protection Act, therefore the guarantor's statement (guarantee promise) or the handing over of the guarantee document to the consumer are in fact not relevant.

V. Guarantee – associated advertising relationship

21. According to the Consumer Sales Directive associated advertising constitutes a part of the guarantee contents (arts. 1(2)(e) and 6(1)). Generally, the binding nature of the advertising is consented to; the solution of the Directive has been simply transposed in many legal systems (AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 9b(1); BELGIUM CC art. 1649septies; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 s. 2; FRANCE Consumer Code L. 211-6; GERMANY CC § 443; ITALY Consumer Code art. 133(1); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 13(1); SLOVAKIA CC § 620(5); SPAIN ConsProtA art. 125(1).

22. Some systems provide more elaborate rules on advertising. In NORWAY advertising constitutes a part of the guarantee (Consumer Sales Act § 18(3)), but additionally the Advertising Act § 9c(2) provides that, upon marketing a guarantee, information is to be provided about significant limits to the guarantee. Moreover, if the advertisement gives information about the guarantee, it must also give information about the longest period for giving notice according to the relevant acts/according to the law. In the NETHERLANDS a statement in the advertising amounts to a guarantee if it entitles the consumer to certain rights or claims when the promised qualities are lacking (CC art. 7:6a(1)). As follows from CC art. 7:6a(5)(a) the fact that the statement is not included in the guarantee document, but is made in advertising, does not matter. If both a document exists in which rights or claims are given to the consumer, and a statement made in advertising amounts to a guarantee, the rights and claims in the document may be invoked if the goods do not have the qualities that were guaranteed in the advertisement (CC art. 7:6a(4)). In FINLAND the Market Court has ruled in a number of decisions that the word 'guarantee' may not be used in marketing if the guarantee promised fails to provide consumers with a benefit that they would not directly receive under the law since the term 'guarantee' gives rise to particular expectations for consumers as to the quality of the goods and the legal protection afforded in association with their purchase. The guarantee may represent the object of an advertisement for a product provided that the guarantee offered entails an effective benefit which is additional with regard to the legal protection (cf. the Consumer Agency and Ombudsman Guidelines on Liability for Defects, Guarantees in the Contract for the Sale of Consumer Goods, 7).

23. In SLOVENIA even after the implementation of the Consumer Sales Directive, the Consumer Protection Act does not include the relevant advertising in the content of the guarantee. However, if a guarantee is being advertised, it is also binding, irrespective of whether the guarantor has actually handed over a guarantee document (Consumer Protection Act § 18(4)). In SWEDEN the relationship between marketing and a guarantee has not been explicitly regulated. Marketing Act § 13a only reads: "A trader, who while marketing the goods through a guarantee or other similar undertaking offers to be responsible for a certain period of time for a product or a part thereof or for a quality of the product, shall ....". The question whether an advertisement constitutes a guarantee was dealt with in ARN 1992/93 ref. 16, where the Board decided that an advertisement stating that a certain outdoor paint had a durability of at least ten years could not be regarded as a guarantee. Also under CZECH law this is not explicitly regulated, but in accordance with CC § 616(2) the goods sold must be of the quality and possess the utility values expected on the basis of advertisements by the seller, the producer or his agent.

VI. Guarantees against payment

24. The Consumer Sales Directive only applies to guarantees provided to the consumer without extra charge (art. 1(2)(e)). Most of the legal systems accept this solution (FINLAND Consumer Agency and Ombudsman Guidelines on Liability for Defects, Guarantees in the Contract for the Sale of Consumer Goods, 7-8; ITALY Consumer Code art. 128(2)(c); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 13(1)). Although not regulated expressly, this solution is also accepted in NORWAY, based on the Advertising Act § 9c, which states that in consumer sales a guarantee must give the buyer better rights than those provided for by law. The sales acts all lay down that a lack of conformity is to be remedied at the expense of the seller. Thus, it must be concluded that when a seller remedies a lack of conformity for which he or she is liable in accordance with a guarantee, the seller must do so at his or her own cost. A similar situation exists in BELGIUM.

25. Sometimes, the law is silent as to the applicability of the rules on guarantees to guarantees against payment and in practice such a legal construction is classified differently, for example: additional insurance or a maintenance contract and does not fall under the guarantee regulation (DENMARK, ENGLAND and SCOTLAND; FRANCE; SPAIN; SWEDEN), or is simply offered (SLOVENIA).

26. Some systems also expressly regulate guarantees provided against payment (CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 620(5); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:6a, Bijl. H.TK 2000-2001, 27809, no. 6, 3). Also under GERMAN law CC § 443 covers guarantees against payment (cf. MünchKomm (-Westermann), BGB, § 443 no. 5). The same applies for CZECH law where it is common that the length of the guarantee period is extended against payment (extended guarantee). In such a case the provisions on statutory guarantee are simply valid for the longer agreed period.

IV.A.–6:102: Binding nature of the guarantee

(1) A consumer goods guarantee, whether contractual or in the form of a unilateral undertaking, is binding in favour of the first buyer, and in the case of a unilateral undertaking is so binding without acceptance notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in the guarantee document or the associated advertising.

(2) If not otherwise provided in the guarantee document, the guarantee is also binding without acceptance in favour of every owner of the goods within the duration of the guarantee.

(3) Any requirement in the guarantee whereby it is conditional on the fulfilment by the guarantee holder of any formal requirement, such as registration or notification of purchase, is not binding on the consumer.

COMMENTS

A. General

Once the guarantor has decided to furnish goods with a consumer goods guarantee and the goods are sold to the consumer, the guarantee becomes binding. This rule applies irrespective of the legal form in which the consumer goods guarantee is offered to the consumer. A consumer goods guarantee has been defined in the preceding Article as an "undertaking". The undertaking may be contractual. It may be given by the seller as part of the contract for sale of the goods (which will then technically be a mixed contract for sale and guarantee) or it may be given in a separate contract. Such a separate contract may be one in which the seller gives an "extended guarantee" in exchange for an additional payment or it may be a similar contract with the producer or another guarantee provider (the seller acting as the guarantor's representative in concluding the contract). In such cases the buyer's acceptance will have been given, either to the contract for sale or to the separate guarantee contract. Very commonly, however, the undertaking will be a unilateral undertaking by the producer. In such a case the undertaking, if intended to be legally binding without acceptance, will be so binding in accordance with the general rules in Book II (see II.–1:103 (Binding effect) paragraph (2)). Paragraph (1) of the present Article strengthens this normal rule. Something which purports to be a unilateral guarantee will be binding without acceptance notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary made in the guarantee document or in the associated advertising. In effect, a person who gives a unilateral undertaking within the definition of a consumer goods guarantee is conclusively presumed to intend it to be legally binding without acceptance. Paragraph (1) of this Article constitutes one of the few mandatory provisions on consumer goods guarantees in this Chapter.

B. Transferability of the consumer goods guarantee

As a default rule, the consumer goods guarantee is transferred to every subsequent owner of the goods for the remaining duration of the guarantee. The legal basis on which the subsequent owner receives the ownership of the goods is not relevant – it could be, for example, a sale, barter, gift or succession.

If the guarantor does not specify otherwise, the new owner of the goods obtains the rights arising from the consumer goods guarantee automatically. However, the guarantor is able to either limit the applicability of the consumer goods guarantee to the first buyer, or restrict its transferability. The restriction may, for instance, come in the form of a requirement to notify that the goods have been transferred, or a stricter requirement to obtain permission from the guarantor in order to transfer the consumer goods guarantee to another person.

This form of control may be irrelevant to many guarantors. Nevertheless, it is a highly sensitive area for guarantors offering guarantees based on the buyer's profile (e.g. whether the buyer of a car is 20 or 50 years of age). Therefore, it is important to grant the guarantor flexibility in this regard. In any case, the limitation must be expressly contained in the guarantee document in order to be valid.

C. Formal requirements

As clearly indicated in paragraph (1), the consumer goods guarantee is binding without acceptance. In addition, paragraph (3) establishes that the binding force of the consumer goods guarantee cannot be conditional on formal requirements being met. Any sort of formal requirements imposed by the guarantor on the buyer, such as registration and notification of the sale, do not influence the binding force of the guarantee, and cannot prevent it from entering into force.

> Illustration 1
> A buys a suitcase. He is informed by the seller that the suitcase is accompanied by a producer's guarantee and the guarantee document is stored inside the suitcase. A does not need to use the suitcase for the next two months. After that he finds out that the producer required the registration of the sale within 7 days after the purchase in order to activate the guarantee.

This provision is not intended to restrict guarantors from using devices like registration or notification, which can be useful for their own data gathering purposes. It only prohibits them from making the consumer goods guarantee conditional on the fulfilment of such requirements.

D. Relationship with Book II

It is already the case under Book II that a unilateral promise or undertaking can be binding without acceptance (see II.–1:103 (Binding effect) paragraph (2). According to II.–4:301 (Requirements for a unilateral act) the promise or undertaking must be communicated to the promisee or to the public. In this respect, the present Article deviates from the rules in Book II, i.e. even if the buyer does not know about the existence of the product guarantee, it still binds the guarantor. This deviation is probably, however, more apparent than real because guarantees are used as selling points and in most cases the consumer will be told about the guarantee or it will be addressed to the public in advertisements or promotional literature.

NOTES

I. Binding nature of the guarantee

1. The Consumer Sales Directive art. 6(1) clearly provides that a guarantee is legally binding on the offeror under the conditions laid down in the guarantee statement and the associated advertising. In many legal systems, in accordance with general contract law, the guarantee has a binding character even if this is not expressly established in the concrete regulation (cf. for instance SWEDEN Prop 2001/02:134, 61 f).

2. However, the binding character of the guarantee is directly regulated in many other systems (AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 9b(1); BELGIUM CC art. 1649bis §2; ESTONIA LOA §§ 155(1) and 230(1); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 s. 15(1); FINLAND cf. SGA § 21(2) and Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 15a; ITALY Consumer Code arts. 128(2)(c) and 133(1); LATVIA Consumer Protection Act art. 16(2); NORWAY Consumer Sales Act art. 18(3); SPAIN ConsProtA art. 125(1). In LATVIA the rules that establish the binding nature of the guarantee also indicate very precisely who bears liability under the guarantee in a particular case: "The guarantee issued by any manufacturer, seller or service provider is to be binding on its issuer in conformity with the conditions of the guarantee document and the information included in advertisements for the relevant goods or services. If the manufacturer is not an undertaking (company) registered in Latvia, the seller or the authorised representative of the manufacturer shall be responsible for ensuring the guarantees given by the manufacturer" (Consumer Protection Act art. 16(3)). In SLOVAKIA CC §§ 502 and 620-621 establish that in non-commercial sales in general and in consumer sales the guarantee is binding upon the seller either as a statutory guarantee or as a contractual or declaratory guarantee. The guarantees established by contracts or unilateral declarations bind the seller if they give the buyer more rights than the statutory regime. Similarly in the CZECH REPUBLIC, cf. CC § 619(1) in connection with §§ 616(2) and 627(3)).

II. Transferability of the guarantee

3. The Consumer Sales Directive does not address the problem of the transferability of a guarantee. Most legislations do not deal directly with this issue either. Under some systems however, the accepted solution is that the guarantee is transferable to the subsequent owner, subject to any condition in the guarantee document stating otherwise (BELGIUM CC art. 1615 and Biquet-Mathieu and Wery, La nouvelle garantie, 168; FRANCE Cass.civ. III, 7 March 1990, Bull.civ. III, no. 72). In the NETHERLANDS the guarantee is considered as a 'qualitative right' under CC art. 6:251, which implies that if the goods themselves are transferred, the guarantee automatically follows. However, the guarantor may prevent the transfer of the guarantee if it so determines at the moment when the guarantee is issued. In SCOTS and ENGLISH law rights, including those deriving from a guarantee, may freely be assigned by a consumer to another party, unless (i) this is prohibited by the terms of the guarantee itself, or (ii) the contract is affected by the rule relating to personal contracts (ENGLAND) or delectus personae (SCOTLAND). These common law rules are of similar effect, the English rule being that contractual rights may not be assigned by a creditor where it is clear that the debtor intended performance in favour of the original contracting party alone, styled as a 'personal contract'; the Scots doctrine being applicable to any contract in which the choice by party A of the other party B was influenced by specific qualities possessed by B, in which case assignation may not be effected without A's consent. Neither common law rule is likely to apply to a consumer sales contract, unless, perhaps, the consumer assigns the guarantee to a non-consumer (ENGLAND, Treitel, The Law of Contract[10], 639-641; SCOTLAND Stair, The Laws of Scotland XX, para. 859).

4. In FINLAND a guarantee is given for a specific product and remains valid even if the product changes ownership. A guarantee may be transferred together with the good to which it refers. However, the purpose of the use of the good may not significantly change. The seller may also require the receipt of a written notice upon a change of ownership relating to the good guaranteed (cf. the Consumer Agency and Ombudsman Guidelines on Liability for Defects, Guarantees in the Contract for the Sale of Consumer Goods, 8). Also under GERMAN law there is no explicit rule on the transferability of the guarantee. However, the normal rules on the transfer of rights in CC §§ 398 ff will apply. This has been recognised by the courts concerning the buyer's rights against the seller (e.g. the right to repair: BGH 24 October 1985, BGHZ 96, 146, 147). However, transferability can be excluded by contract, cf. CC § 399, and this seems to occur in guarantee contracts. The courts have even accepted standard terms excluding transferability and have held that they were not unfair (e.g. BGH 7 October 1981, NJW 1982, 178, 180).

5. In contrast in the CZECH REPUBLIC according to case law the rights stemming from liability for defects do not pass to subsequent owners; if the guarantee provide for transferability, that provision is null and void for breaching the mandatory rules on liability for defects (it is possible to extend the scope and length of a guarantee, but only among parties – extension to third persons is not possible; moreover that situation cannot be considered as a contract in favorem tertii, CC § 50). Transferable is only a claim (cess) (for repair, replacement etc.) arising after the first buyer (original contracting party) notifies the original seller (NS ČR 33 Odo 329/2004). Contrary, part of the legal doctrine considers rights from liability for defects to follow the object and therefore to be transferable (Knappová, Civil Law II[3], 107).

6. In SPAIN there is neither default nor mandatory rule as to the transferability of the guarantee. The solution will entirely depend on the wording of the guarantee document, because this additional undertaking only obliges "in the conditions settled in the document of guarantee" (ConsProtA art. 125(1)).When the guarantor is the manufacturer, one may think that the guarantee embodies a promise to anyone who buys the item during the life span of the guarantee (Díaz Alabart and Alvarez Moreno, Garantía, p. 198).

IV.A.–6:103: Guarantee document

(1) A person who gives a consumer goods guarantee must (unless such a document has already been provided to the buyer) provide the buyer with a guarantee document which:

(a) states that the buyer has legal rights which are not affected by the guarantee;

(b) points out the advantages of the guarantee for the buyer in comparison with the conformity rules;

(c) lists all the essential particulars necessary for making claims under the guarantee, notably:

- the name and address of the guarantor;

- the name and address of the person to whom any notification is to be made and the procedure by which the notification is to be made;

- any territorial limitations to the guarantee; and

(d) is drafted in plain, intelligible language; and

(e) is drafted in the same language as that in which the goods were offered.

(2) The guarantee document must be in textual form on a durable medium and be available and accessible to the buyer.

(3) The validity of the guarantee is not affected by any failure to comply with paragraphs (1) and (2), and accordingly the guarantee holder can still rely on the guarantee and require it to be honoured.

(4) If the obligations under paragraphs (1) and (2) are not observed the guarantee holder may, without prejudice to any right to damages which may be available, require the guarantor to provide a guarantee document which conforms to those requirements.

(5) The parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article deals with the elements that enable the consumer to make use of the consumer goods guarantee in practice. The person who offers the guarantee is under an obligation to provide the consumer with a guarantee document, which meets the transparency requirements of this Article as to the content as well as to the presentation of the guarantee.

First of all, paragraph (1) aims at ensuring that the content of the guarantee is readily understandable (sub-paragraph (d)) and that its relation to the conformity regime is made clear (sub-paragraphs (a) and (b)). Moreover, it defines the information necessary to enable the consumer to make a claim against the guarantor (sub-paragraph (c)). Paragraph (2) regulates the form in which the guarantee is to be presented to the buyer. The remainder of the Article deals with the consequences of infringing the transparency requirements.

Due to the importance of this provision in order for the consumer to be able to invoke his or her rights, the Article is mandatory and may not be deviated from to the detriment of the consumer.

B. Consumer goods guarantee in relation to remedies for lack of conformity

In order to avoid situations where the guarantee misleads the consumer with regard to the remedies for lack of conformity, the Article introduces two requirements with respect to the content of the guarantee document. First, it has to inform the consumer that the buyer has legal rights for lack of conformity which are not affected by the guarantee (this is identical to Article 6(2) of the Consumer Sales Directive). Secondly, the guarantee document should indicate the advantages, if any, of the consumer goods guarantee as compared to the conformity regime. This may, for instance, be a more favourable regulation of the burden of proof of non-conformity (cf. IV.A.–2:308 (Relevant time for establishing time of conformity) paragraph (2) and IV.A.–6:107 (Burden of proof)).

These requirements will also discourage guarantors from providing guarantees with no additional, or even less, protection than provided under the conformity regime. Thus, these two elements should enable a correct assessment of the guarantee and its benefits to be made by the consumer.

C. Information necessary for making claims

In order to render the consumer goods guarantees effective, the guarantee document must contain all the information necessary to enable claims to be made under the guarantee. The list of elements required elaborates on the rules provided by the Consumer Sales Directive.

In particular, the present Article mentions the name and address of the guarantor, the name and address of the person to whom notification is to be made, and the procedure by which the notification is to be made. The guarantor is not obliged to remedy any non-conformity in the goods personally. However, the document has to indicate clearly to whom, where and how the failure of the goods should be notified. If notification is to be made to an entity other than the guarantor, the guarantee document must indicate the correct name and address.

D. Territorial limitations

The guarantor should inform the guarantee holder about the territorial scope of the guarantee, i.e. whether the guarantee can be invoked in a country other that the one in which the product was purchased (see paragraph (1)(b)(c)). This obligation is equally important in the case of local branches, where a given product is produced and sold only in a particular country and the consumer should know about the limitations related to this fact, as well as in the case of multinational chains of distribution. The legal form under which they function (not one multinational organisation, but chains of independent distributors) may render invoking the guarantee in a country other than the country of purchase impossible.

E. Language of the consumer goods guarantee

Paragraph (1)(d) refers to the intelligibility of the language used in the guarantee document. This is an elaborated version of Article 6(3) of the Consumer Sales Directive, which relates to the possibilities to read and understand the guarantee document. To that end, the language of the guarantee must be comprehensible to the average consumer (the plain and intelligible language requirement).

The Article does not reproduce art. 6(4) of the Consumer Sales Directive, whereby the Member States may require that the guarantee be drafted in one or more languages of the official languages of the Community. Moreover, these rules have refrained from introducing a requirement that the consumer may require a guarantee document in the same language as the goods were offered, since such a solution could cause many problems in practice.

A Polish consumer on holiday in Ireland buys a hair-drier. All the assistants in the shop are Polish and therefore the transaction is concluded in Polish. In such a case it is not reasonable that the Irish producer of the hair-drier is obliged to predict such a situation and provide a guarantee in Polish.

F. The consumer goods guarantee document

Paragraph (2) requires the guarantee to be made available on paper or in another durable medium. This solution departs from the Consumer Sales Directive, which only requires that the guarantee is to be made available to the buyer upon request. The reasons for this deviation are very practical: first, the consumer would have to know about the right to request the guarantee in order to exercise it; secondly, in the case of long-lasting goods accompanied by a long-term guarantee it is essential for the consumer to have a guarantee document, and third: attaching the guarantee to the goods is already a common practice.

Apart from the traditional paper guarantee, this includes a guarantee in an electronic form, i.e. sending the guarantee by email or publishing the guarantee on the Internet. In any case, the guarantee document must be available and accessible to the consumer.

G. Infringement of the content requirements

The mere fact that the guarantee document does not contain the required elements, or even that it is not made available to the consumer at all, does not affect the binding nature of the consumer goods guarantee. In such a case, the guarantee holder is entitled to specific performance and to damages.

Obtaining a guarantee document that adequately explains the content of the guarantee is essential to the consumer. Traditionally, the infringement of the guarantee transparency requirements was seen as a domain of public law, the Consumer Sales Directive being the best example of such an approach. Without proposing radical changes, these rules give the consumer a right to request a properly constructed guarantee document. The right to specific performance does not affect the right to damages for loss incurred as a result of the non-performance of the obligations under the Article (seeking legal assistance, translating the guarantee document, etc.).

NOTES

I. The guarantee's form requirement

1. The Consumer Sales Directive provides that only at the request of the consumer will the guarantee be made available in writing or feature in another durable medium available and accessible to him (art. 6(3)). This solution has been copied, sometimes with slight modifications, in a number of legal systems. In the majority of systems no alterations have been made (AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 9b(3); BELGIUM CC art. 1649septies § 3; ESTONIA LOA § 231(1) and (2); ITALY Consumer Code art. 133; GERMANY CC §§ 126b and 477(2); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:6a(3); SPAIN ConsProtA art. 125(2). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND (Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 s. 15(3)) the wording of the Directive is supplemented by a specification that the guarantee shall be made available within a reasonable period of time. Moreover, a guarantee given in SCOTLAND, which is both gratuitous and unilateral in nature, is required to be in writing, unless it is provided in the course of business (Requirements of Writing (Scotland) Act art. 1(2)(a)(ii)). In the CZECH REPUBLIC (CC § 620(3)) and in SLOVAKIA (CC § 620(4)) the seller, at the buyer's request, is obliged to give the latter a written guarantee (a letter of guarantee). Where the nature of goods allows, it is sufficient to issue a confirmation of the sale (a receipt) to the buyer, containing information as in the letter, in place of the letter of guarantee. In FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 15b(2) provides that at the request of the consumer the guarantee shall be given in writing or in electronic form so that it cannot be unilaterally altered and that it remains accessible to the buyer. In consumer sales in NORWAY according to the Advertising Act § 9d the guarantor shall inform the consumer of the guarantee and of the consumer's right to receive the terms of the guarantee. A request made by the consumer to make the guarantee available in writing or in another durable medium available and accessible to him or her shall be met by the seller.

2. Some systems go beyond the requirements of the Consumer Sales Directive and demand that the guarantee document is to be made available together with the goods sold. In LATVIA the guarantee must be in writing and it shall be freely accessible before the purchase of goods or the receipt of service (Consumer Protection Act art. 16(2)). In POLAND the guarantor is obliged to hand over the guarantee document to the buyer together with the goods sold (Consumer Sales Act art. 13(2)). Similarly in FRANCE it is required that the guarantee is made available in writing to the buyer (Consumer Code art. L. 211-15(1)). In SLOVENIA at the time of the conclusion of the contract the guarantor shall hand over to the buyer a guarantee document with installation instructions and a list of authorized repair shops (Consumer Protection Act § 16(1)). In SWEDEN, according to the Marketing Act § 13, the guarantee and information on how to invoke it shall be provided in a document or in another readable and durable medium accessible to the buyer. Therefore it should be up to the professional to hand over the guarantee as a document or in another durable form, regardless of whether the buyer has asked for this (Prop 2001/02:134, 64). In HUNGARY CC § 248(3) states that additional requirements may be laid down under the legislation on mandatory guarantees.

II. Content of the guarantee document

3. According to the Consumer Sales Directive (art. 6(2)) the guarantee must state that the consumer has legal rights under applicable national legislation governing the sale of consumer goods and make clear that those rights are not affected by the guarantee and set out in plain intelligible language the contents of the guarantee and the essential particulars which are necessary for making claims under the guarantee, notably the duration and territorial scope of the guarantee as well as the name and address of the guarantor. For the requirement to use plain intelligible language, cf. under III.

4. The solutions adopted by the Member States are to a large extent based on the Directive. The requirements of the Directive have been implemented without major alteration under most systems (AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 9b(2); BELGIUM CC art. 1649septies § 2; DENMARK Marketing Act § 12(2); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 s. 15(2); ESTONIA LOA § 231(1); FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 15b(1); FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-15; LATVIA Consumer Protection Act art. 16(2); GERMANY CC § 477; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:6a(2); SLOVAKIA CC § 502(3); SWEDEN Marketing Act § 13a).

5. In some systems certain additional features have been introduced. In AUSTRIA it is provided that if it is not clear from the guarantee document which qualities are guaranteed, then the goods must have the normally presumed qualities (Consumer Protection Act § 9b(2)). In ITALY Consumer Code art. 133(2)(b) includes the additional requirement that the guarantor is obliged to specify the object of the guarantee in the guarantee document. In SPAIN Consumer Sales Act art. 11(3) requires that the guarantee must specify (1) the goods guaranteed; (2) the consumer's rights as entitled by the guarantee; and (3) the consumer's methods of claiming. In the CZECH REPUBLIC the letter of guarantee must contain the seller's full name or designation or commercial (business) name, identification number, seat (in the case of a legal entity) or home address (in the case of an individual) (CC § 620(3)). Where, due to the guarantee provided, it is necessary to explain its content, the seller shall explain this in the letter of guarantee, the scope, conditions (terms) and the period of validity of the guarantee and how the rights based on the guarantee can be exercised. The letter may indicate that another entrepreneur (businessman) is contracted to undertake a required repair (CC § 620(4)). In POLAND the guarantee document shall describe the duties of the guarantor and the rights of the buyer when the goods do not meet the specifications set out in the guarantee document (Consumer Sales Act art. 3(1)). In SLOVENIA the guarantee document shall in particular contain information about the identification of the goods, the statement of guarantee for the quality or proper functioning during the guarantee period (starting from the delivery of the goods), the guarantee period (at least one year, less is only allowed in the case of second-hand goods), the date of delivery of the goods to the buyer, and a period of time after the expiry of the guarantee during which the producer is obliged to ensure maintenance, spare parts and attachable units (at least three times the length of the guarantee period) (Consumer Protection Act § 18). In NORWAY rules concerning the content of the guarantee document, listed in the Advertising Act § 9d, are particularly extensive requiring information about the content of the guarantee including possible limitations and particular conditions, the longest period for giving notice in accordance with relevant and specified acts provided that it is longer than the guarantee period, and that, regardless of the guarantee, the buyer can always claim remedies due to a lack of conformity in the seller's performance as such, in accordance with relevant and specified acts, provided that the guarantee is limited, for example it only concerns a particular part of the performance or only covers some of the costs of remedying the lack of conformity.

III. Language requirements

6. The Consumer Sales Directive provides two different requirements concerning the language of the guarantee. First, art. 6(2) states that the guarantee shall be drafted in plain and intelligible language. As to the language version, it is elaborated in art. 6(4) that within its own territory, the Member State in which the consumer goods are marketed may, in accordance with the rules of the Treaty, provide that the guarantee must be drafted in one or more languages which it shall determine from among the official languages of the Community.

7. The plain and intelligible language requirement has been adopted in the majority of systems (AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 9b(2); BELGIUM CC art.

1649septies § 2; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 620(4); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 s. 15(2); GERMANY CC § 477; ITALY Consumer Code art. 133(4); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:6a(2); NORWAY Advertising Act § 9d(1); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 3(1); SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act § 16). In SWEDEN, according to the preparatory works, the requirement in the Marketing Act § 13a to provide the buyer with clear information is considered to correspond to the plain an intelligible language requirement in the Directive (Prop 2001/02:134, 64). Similarly, under FINNISH law Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 15(b)(1) requires that the information to be inserted in the guarantee shall be 'clearly noticeable'.

8. Some systems do not make use of the option to indicate in which language the guarantee should be drafted (AUSTRIA; FINLAND; GERMANY; NETHERLANDS; SLOVAKIA; SWEDEN). In the NETHERLANDS the legislator is of the opinion that a limitation to the official EU languages would be too restrictive, especially when selling takes place over the Internet (cf. Bijlage Handelingen II 2000/01, 27809, no. 3, 10). In legal literature it is argued that this governmental view is probably based on the idea that guarantee documents issued in the Netherlands, if not in Dutch, are probably expressed in a language, which can be understood by many of the residents of the Netherlands. This is thought to be naïve, however, given the huge quantities of imported goods from China, Japan, Thailand and Taiwan (cf. Mon. NBW B-65b (Loos), no. 19). However, the majority of systems clearly indicate that their own national language should be used for drafting the guarantee document (CZECH REPUBLIC Consumer Protection Act arts. 11 and 13; DENMARK Marketing Act § 12(2); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 s. 15(5); NORWAY Advertising Act § 9d(2); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 3(1); SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act § 16; SPAIN ConsProtA art. 125(2). In ITALY the guarantee must be available in Italian and if printed in several languages, the Italian version shall not be printed using fonts which are less evident than those used for other languages (Consumer Code art. 133(4)). In BELGIUM Commercial Practice Act art. 13 and FRANCE the language problem is dealt with on a general level.

IV. Infringement of the form and content requirements

9. As is laid down in art. 6(5) of the Consumer Sales Directive an infringement of the content or form requirements does not affect the validity of the guarantee in question, and the consumer can still rely on the guarantee and require it be honoured. The majority of systems have adopted this solution (AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 9b(4); BELGIUM CC art. 1649septies § 4; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 620(4); ESTONIA LOA § 231(3); FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 15b(3); FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-15(4); GERMANY CC § 477(2); ITALY Consumer Code art. 133(5); LATVIA Consumer Protection Act art. 16(2); SLOVAKIA CC § 502 (3)).

10. In DENMARK infringements can be prohibited by the courts and, moreover, the guarantor is liable for damages in accordance with general legal principles (Marketing Act § 20(1) and (2)). In SWEDEN in the preparatory works it is pointed out that art. 6(5) of the Directive is considered to be self-evident and therefore there is no need to introduce express legislation since Swedish law already fulfils the requirements that the guarantee shall be binding upon the offerer (Prop 2001/02:134, 65). If the seller intentionally or negligently does not comply with these requirements, he will be liable for damages to the consumer according to the Marketing Act § 29. In SLOVENIA if a guarantee document does not have the obligatory contents, the holder of the guarantee nevertheless has these rights and the guarantee is deemed not to have been handed over which will result in a penalty for a minor offence (Consumer Protection Act §§ 18(3) and 77(1)).

11. In the NETHERLANDS, as there is no form requirement, if the 'guarantee' does not provide rights when the guaranteed qualities are not provided, it is not a guarantee in the sense of CC art. 7:6a. However, the statements by which a quality is 'guaranteed' without such rights attached to them will be taken into account when it is determined what the consumer may reasonably expect of the good, i.e. whether or not the good is in conformity with the contract (CC art. 7:17(2), cf. Mon. NBW B-65b (Loos), no. 19). Similarly in POLAND an infringement of the form requirement laid down in Consumer Sales Directive art. 3(1) (the plain and intelligible language requirement) does not affect the validity of the guarantee. However, if the guarantee document does not set out the obligations of the guarantor then it is not a guarantee (Consumer Sales Act art. 13(1)). According to the wording of art. 125(3) of the SPANISH General Consumer Protection Act, the prescribed content is of the essence of the guarantee. However, as the issuing of this guarantee is a non-compulsory duty, the lack of any "necessary" (sic) element cannot bring about the consequence of depriving the defective guarantee of any effect. In any case it is better for the buyer to receive than not to receive an additional guarantee that goes beyond the legal rights granted by law. The situation does not change when the conditions of art. 126 are met. According to this rule, the issue and delivery of the guarantee is mandatory in consumer sales when the item sold is of "durable" condition. Again, it would not have made sense to deprive the document of its force as an additional promise in favour of the buyer. Facing this "lacuna", the better solution for the present problem is promoting an implied solution like that set out in the present article: the legitimate party may seek specific performance, claiming for the correct issuing of the guarantee.

12. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 s. 15(6) permits the rectification of a breach of the requirements as to the nature of guarantees by the "enforcement authority" rather than by the consumer. The enforcement authority is defined as "the Director General of Fair Trading, every local weights and measures authority in Great Britain ..." (s. 2). Such rectification is by way of an injunction (ENGLAND) or specific implement (SCOTLAND). In NORWAY the Marketing Council (Markedsråd) and the Consumer Ombud (Forbrukerombud) shall enforce the provisions of the Advertising Act, cf. § 10. Furthermore, the seller is most likely to be liable in damages for any infringements of these provisions, in accordance with general tort law principles (cf. Krüger, Norsk kjøpsrett[4], 150). Under CZECH law the observance of the provisions of the Consumer Protection Act is under the control of the Czech Trade Inspection which can enforce the duty of a seller to inform (in written form) the consumer duly and in Czech on the extent, conditions and ways of asserting rights from liability for defects by infliction of a fine (Consumer Protection Act art. 23(1)).

V. Extra protection offered by the guarantee

13. The Consumer Sales Directive does not require that the guarantee grants the consumer extra rights compared to the statutory regime. The only restriction that is imposed in art. 6(2) is that the guarantee cannot affect or limit the statutory rights of the consumer. Most of the systems follow this approach.

14. There are a few exceptions, however. In SPAIN according to the preparatory works the guarantee must provide the consumer with extra rights (see Fenoy Picón, El sistema de protección del comprador, 106 ff), and this approach was upheld in the final text (art. 125.3 d)). In NORWAY (Marketing Act § 9c) and ESTONIA

(Consumer Protection Act art. 10) it is prohibited to use the word guarantee or similar expressions in consumer sales when selling goods, services etc. in the course of business if the receiver is not given additional rights to those rights which he or she already had or if such rights are limited. Similarly in DENMARK the term guarantee may only be used in a consumer context if it provides the consumer with substantially better rights compared to his legal rights (Marketing Act § 12(1)).

15. This problem is regulated in a distinct way in SWEDEN where, concerning consumer sales, the seller will always be responsible according to the provisions regarding lack of conformity under the Consumer Sales Act, since these are mandatory rules. Consequently, the consumer has access to all the remedies prescribed by law. It is not therefore possible for the seller to limit the guarantee, for instance to repair and replacement. This also applies if the guarantee is applicable for a period exceeding the time-limits in the Consumer Sales Act (three years). To apply the mandatory consumer protection in the Consumer Sales Act also to guarantees given voluntarily was justified due to systematic reasons. It was considered unsuitable and too complicated if different remedies should apply depending upon whether the professional was responsible under a guarantee or under the rules provided by law (Agell, SvJT 1991, 420). This has however been criticised in legal writing as going too far, since providing a guarantee is voluntary and this measure dissuades traders from providing guarantees at all (see e.g. Herre, Konsumentköplagen[2], 252).

IV.A.–6:104: Coverage of the guarantee

If the guarantee document does not specify otherwise:

(a) the period of the guarantee is 5 years or the estimated life-span of the goods, whichever is shorter;

(b) the guarantor's obligations become effective if, for a reason other than misuse, mistreatment or accident, the goods at any time during the period of the guarantee become unfit for their ordinary purpose or cease to possess such qualities and performance capabilities as the guarantee holder may reasonably expect;

(c) the guarantor is obliged, if the conditions of the guarantee are satisfied, to repair or replace the goods; and

(d) all costs involved in invoking and performing the guarantee are to be borne by the guarantor.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article defines the default coverage of the consumer goods guarantee on the basis of certain aspects of the conformity regime. It deals with four essential elements of the content of the consumer goods guarantee: duration, the conditions of the guarantee, the guarantor's obligations and the costs of invoking and performing the guarantee. Not only does this default content give assurance to the consumer, but it also stimulates activity on behalf of the guarantor who remains free to define the terms of the own guarantee in any other way.

As to the relation in general between the conformity regime and a consumer goods guarantee, the borderline between the two will not always be crystal clear. Generally, if the parties have agreed that the seller will undertake obligations towards the buyer additional to those under the contract for sale (or, where the guarantee is part of the same contract) additional to those under the sale part of the contract, then by definition the seller has given a consumer guarantee. Ultimately, this question will have to be decided by interpreting the terms of the guarantee.

B. Default coverage of the consumer goods guarantee

Duration of the consumer goods guarantee. If the guarantor does not specify the duration of the guarantee, the guarantee should be applicable for five years or the estimated life-span of the goods if that is shorter. The estimated life-span of the goods is to be established by means of interpretation. The elements that should be taken into account when making this assessment are the reasonable and justified expectations of the consumer, based on objective factors like the price of the goods and the reputation of the particular seller or producer.

B, a consumer, buys an expensive sailing jacket. Upon purchasing the garment B received a 'lifetime guarantee' concerning the jacket. Eight years later B notifies the seller that the jacket is no longer waterproof, since the material on the shoulder parts has deteriorated. B requests repair or replacement under the guarantee. The retailer contests the claim stating that the guarantee should reasonably be valid for a period of 4-5 years, depending upon usage. However, since the guarantee granted is of a very far-reaching nature and for such an expensive jacket a longer life-span than stated by the retailer can be expected, the consumer is entitled to have the jacket repaired and made waterproof again.

Although this rule seems to grant the consumer very extensive rights, it should be kept in mind that it is merely a default rule. Besides, the overwhelming number of guarantees provided specify the duration of the guarantee; in fact, the duration often constitutes even the major element of the guarantee.

What triggers the guarantor's obligations? If the guarantee document does not provide otherwise the guarantor's obligations become effective if, for a reason other than misuse, mistreatment or accident, the goods at any time during the period of the guarantee become unfit for their ordinary purpose or cease to possess such qualities and performance capabilities as the guarantee holder may reasonably expect. The implied requirements under IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging) that the goods must be fit for a particular purpose and in conformity with samples or models are excluded as they would excessively burden the guarantor. In fact, they assume direct contact between the guarantor and the buyer.

Guarantor's obligations. If the guarantee document does not provide otherwise, sub-paragraph (c) provides that it includes an undertaking to repair or replace the goods if the conditions of the guarantee are met. In accordance with the normal rule on alternative obligations in III.–2:105 (Alternative obligations or methods of performance) the choice between repair or replacement is initially the guarantor's. If the item under guarantee can be easily and cheaply repaired it would clearly be unreasonable to give the consumer the choice of a replacement item.

Cost of invoking and performing the consumer goods guarantee. All the costs connected with invoking and performing the consumer goods guarantee are to be borne by the guarantor. The guarantor may deviate from this rule by indicating in the guarantee document that some costs are to be borne by the guarantee holder. However, such costs may not be disproportionately high. This particular provision aims to ensure that the consumer will not be surprised by an undisclosed liability for costs.

The guarantee document provides that if the guarantee holder moves, he or she has to bear the increased costs if the remedies performed by the seller become more onerous. This could be, for instance, the increased costs of transportation connected with repair or replacement of the goods.

The guarantee document may, for example, indicate that the guarantee holder has to bear the costs of a yearly inspection of the goods amounting to €10. Such an inspection is to assure proper and undisturbed functioning of the goods, as was guaranteed.

It should be noted that this provision only applies to the costs of invoking the guarantee. However, this rule is consistent with the fact that guarantees against payment fall under the scope of this Chapter (cf. IV.A.–6:101 (Definition of a consumer goods guarantee) Comment G).

NOTES

I. Duration of the default guarantee

1. In the Consumer Sales Directive there is no regulation of the default duration of the guarantee. This is also the situation in most of the legal systems. In SPAIN, the Consumer Law lays down a prescription period of six months, but the duration of the guarantee is left open to the parties.

2. Under a few systems however, regulation can be found in this respect. In SLOVENIA the minimum duration for obligatory guarantee is one year (Regulation OJ 73/2003 art. 3). Similarly in POLISH non-consumer sales, if the parties have not indicate a duration, the default duration is one year from the day on which the thing was released to the buyer (CC art. 577(2)). In many systems, although the default duration of the guarantee is not prescribed by law, there are some factors that either indicate or influence the default duration. In GREECE several guidelines are provided in order to establish the duration of the guarantee. Thus, it is suggested that the duration should be commensurate with the estimated life-span of the product. Especially for high-tech products the estimation of the duration must be based on the period of time during which the product will remain state of the art (Consumer Protection Act art. 5(3)). In the NETHERLANDS if the parties (that is: the guarantor) neglect(s) to determine the period, which may especially occur in the case of a guarantee that stems (only) from advertising, the construction of the guarantee contract will determine its duration. In doing so, the Haviltex formula will be used: the reasonable expectations of the parties, given, among other things, the societal circle to which the parties belong and the knowledge of the law that may be expected of such parties (cf. HR 13 March 1981, NedJur 1981, 635 (Ermes/Haviltex)). This formula is to be applied with regard to guarantees as well (cf. HR 22 December 1995, NedJur 1996, 300 (Hoog Catharijne)). In NORWAY in consumer sales the period may never be shorter than the longest period in the Consumer Sales Act for the same or similar goods (cf. the Marketing Act § 9c(1)). In DENMARK according to the Marketing Act § 12(1), the term guarantee may only be used in a consumer context if it provides the consumer with substantially better rights compared to his legal rights. According to the Consumer Ombudsman, this will for instance mean that generally concerning the sale of new goods the guarantee period must be substantially longer than the two-year notification period provided by law (cf. Kristensen/Lando/Møgelvang-Hansen/Schützsack, Nya regler om forbrugerkøb, 60). In SLOVAKIA in general non-commercial sales a default guarantee period might be established in a specific statute or a regulation (see CC § 502).

II. Default cover of the guarantee: defect and remedies

3. The Consumer Sales Directive provides no specifications concerning either default defects covered by the guarantee or default remedies. The only mention of the cover of the guarantee is contained in the definition of the guarantee (art. 6(1)(e)), which states that if the goods do not meet specifications set out in the guarantee statement or in the relevant advertising, the guarantor will reimburse the price paid, replace the goods or handle consumer goods in any other way. Such an approach is reflected in most of the legal systems.

4. In some systems, although there is no direct regulation, there are certain guidelines. In GREECE, for example, it is provided that the guarantee must be consistent with good faith and should not be devoid of significance by excessive exemption clauses

(Consumer Protection Act art. 5(3)). In the NETHERLANDS if the parties (that is: the guarantor) neglect(s) to determine what defects the guarantee is to cover, the construction of the guarantee contract will determine its content and coverage. The construction of the guarantee will take place using the Haviltex formula (see under I.). Moreover, given the fact that the guarantee must state in a clear and comprehensible manner what is covered by it, a failure to indicate what the guarantee covers may lead the courts to interpret the guarantee as covering the whole good or all of the goods (interpretation contra proferentem), cf. CC art. 7:6a(2). In NORWAY if the defects covered by the guarantee in consumer sales are fewer than under the regime for lack of conformity in the Consumer Sales Act, such a limitation is invalid since the consumer's rights may only be extended and not limited by a guarantee (cf. Marketing Act § 9c(1)). In POLISH non-consumer sales CC art. 577 establishes that in the case of doubt, the guarantor is obliged to rectify the physical defects of the thing. In ESTONIA LOA § 231(4) includes a presumption that unless the guarantee document provides otherwise the guarantee entitles the buyer to claim, free of charge, a repair or replacement of the goods if any defect is discovered during the guarantee period. In SLOVENIA it is expressly established that the content of a guarantee is the proper functioning of the goods during a guarantee period which applies to both obligatory (statutory) and voluntary guarantees (LOA § 481).

5. In SWEDEN, the consumer will have access to all remedies prescribed by law for lack of conformity in the Consumer Sales Act, i.e. repair, replacement, a price reduction, termination and damages. Similarly under CZECH and SLOVAK law, the guarantee established by an agreement or a declaration by the seller may not be narrower than the statutory guarantee, meaning that the buyer will at least have access to the normal remedies for lack of conformity (CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 620(5); SLOVAKIA CC § 502(2)).

6. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 s. 159(1) provides that the consumer guarantee takes effect as a contractual obligation owed by the guarantor, implying that all appropriate contract remedies are available to the beneficiary of the guarantee.

III. Costs of invoking and performing the guarantee

7. The Consumer Sales Directive provides that the guarantee means any undertaking, given free of charge (art. 1(2)(e)). The Directive does not however refer to the costs connected with the performance under the guarantee and does not specify directly that the guarantee should be performed free of charge, as in the case of conformity (art. 3(4)).

8. This issue remains unregulated in some of the systems. Other legislations, however, tackle this problem to a different degree. In ESTONIA there is a presumption that the guarantee gives the buyer the right to claim a repair of replacement free of charge (LOA § 231(4)1)). In ITALY the guarantee shall not entail any additional costs (costi supplementari) for the consumer (Consumer Code art. 128(2)(c)). In SLOVENIA the seller shall bear the costs of a repair, spare parts, the transportation of the goods, and all other costs in connection with invoking a guarantee (Consumer Protection Act § 19). In the NETHERLANDS whether or not the costs of invoking and performing the guarantee are to be paid by the consumer is a matter of the contract's construction using the Haviltex formula (cf. Note I2 to this Article). In POLAND the buyer is obliged to deliver the thing, at the cost of the guarantor, to the place indicated in the guarantee or the place where the thing was released to him when giving him the guarantee, unless it follows from the circumstances that the defect should be rectified at the place where the thing was at the time when the defect was discovered. The guarantor shall discharge his obligations and deliver the thing to the person entitled in the guarantee at his cost (CC art. 580(1) and (2)). Under SWEDISH consumer sales, the provisions concerning lack of conformity and the remedies thereof will also be applicable to the guarantee (Consumer Sales Act § 21(1)). Therefore, the consumer will not have to bear any costs while invoking the guarantee (cf. Consumer Sales Act § 26).

9. In DENMARK and NORWAY this is an unregulated issue. However, the Sales Acts provide that a lack of conformity is to be remedied at the cost of the seller, and since the regulation of the guarantee must give the consumer better rights than provided by law the guarantor will hence be obliged to bear the costs. Similarly under CZECH law the guarantee may not limit the rights under the statutory regime, thus the general regulation will apply (CC §§ 598 and 620(5)). Also in FINLAND, according to Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 18(1) the seller shall remedy the defect without cost to the buyer. As a consequence, a repair under the guarantee may not impose any costs on the buyer. However, the law does not prevent chargeable service and repair agreements in connection with the sale of goods, provided that such agreements differ in content from the guarantee.

IV.A.–6:105: Guarantee limited to specific parts

A consumer goods guarantee relating only to a specific part or specific parts of the goods must clearly indicate this limitation in the guarantee document; otherwise the limitation is not binding on the consumer.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article concerns the situation when, viewed from the consumer's point of view, the coverage of the consumer goods guarantee is not as broad as may be expected. A guarantee for a specific part or parts of the goods is usually given with respect to goods that contain various parts that differ with respect to their complexity, or parts that, due to their nature, are guaranteed in a specific way. Different parts of the goods may, for example, have a different durability or may require different maintenance of a specific nature. It also occurs quite often that some parts of the goods are not included in the guarantee at all.

Illustration 1
It is common that parts like bulbs, batteries, etc. are excluded from the scope of the guarantee.

Illustration 2
A guarantee document may specify that the basic guarantee for the entire goods is for 2 years. However, the plastic elements are guaranteed only for 1 year, whereas the metal elements are guaranteed for a period of 10 years.

B. Effectiveness of the limitation

In order to prevent confusion as to the factual coverage of the guarantee, all variations or exclusions of the guarantee coverage must be indicated clearly in the guarantee document. If there is no clear indication of the limitation, it is ineffective.

Illustration 3
B, a consumer, buys a computer to which a 3-year guarantee is attached. Two years after purchase, it is no longer possible to recharge the rechargeable battery. The consumer requests a new battery, invoking the guarantee. The seller contests this request and pleads that the battery is a "consumable" and therefore does not fall under the guarantee.

Since it is not self-evident that a battery of this type is to be regarded as a consumable item and the seller has not indicated any limitation as to the scope of application of the guarantee, the seller is obliged to replace the battery.

NOTES

Guarantee on specific parts only

1. The Consumer Sales Directive does not mention specifically that the guarantee document must make it clear to the consumer that the guarantee covers only specific parts of the guarantee. However, the Directive requires the guarantee document to state the contents of the guarantee (art. 6(2)). Therefore, if the guarantee is confined to only a part of the goods, or if different guarantees are given for different parts of the goods, this must be indicated in the guarantee document.

2. Most systems follow this path and do not regulate the issue specifically. Generally, however, it is required that such a limitation must be made clear in the guarantee document in line with the plain and intelligible language requirement in order to be valid (cf. e.g. NORWAY Marketing Act § 9d(1)(e) and SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act § 18). In the NETHERLANDS a failure to indicate the cover provided by the guarantee may lead the courts to interpret the guarantee as covering the whole good or all of the goods (interpretation contra proferentem), given that it must be stated in a clear and comprehensible manner what is covered by the guarantee (cf. CC art. 7:6a(2); Mon. NBW B-65b (Loos), no. 19).

3. Under SWEDISH law, however, Consumer Sales Act § 21(1) establishes that the seller may undertake responsibility for the goods or a part of the goods. Such limitations are common where the goods partly consist of articles of consumption, for which the seller does not wish to be liable under the guarantee period (Herre, Konsumentköplagen^{2}, 247). If no restrictions are made, the guarantee will apply to all parts of the goods (Prop 1989/90:89, 108).

IV.A.–6:106: Exclusion or limitation of the guarantor's liability

The guarantee may exclude or limit the guarantor's liability under the guarantee for any failure of or damage to the goods caused by failure to maintain the goods in accordance with instructions, provided that the exclusion or limitation is clearly set out in the guarantee document.

COMMENTS

A. General

If special maintenance is required for the proper functioning of the goods, the instructions concerning maintenance should be provided to the buyer regardless of whether or not there is a guarantee attached to the goods (cf. IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging) sub-paragraph (e)). The guarantor may, however, offer the consumer goods guarantee subject to the condition that the guarantee holder will take special care of the goods, or will use or treat the goods in a specific way.

Illustration 1
The consumer goods guarantee may, for example, require the guarantee holder to undertake a periodical motor vehicle service at authorised garages, to have the goods repaired only at authorised repair points, or to use materials of a specific quality in order to maintain the goods.

B. Maintenance instructions

Presentation of the instructions. If the guarantor offers a consumer goods guarantee subject to the condition that the guarantee holder will use, treat or maintain the goods in a specific way, the relevant instructions must reach the consumer. There are many ways in which the guarantor may present the maintenance instructions to the guarantee holder. The instructions may be attached to the goods, for example printed on the box in which the goods are sold, or come in the form of an instruction guide (provided that the guarantee document refers to these instructions). It is also possible that the maintenance instructions may simply be included in the guarantee document itself.

The instructions have to be adequately explained to the consumer, i.e. in a way that leaves no doubt as to their meaning (cf. also IV.A.–6:103 (Guarantee document) paragraph (1)(d)).

Limiting liability via instructions. If the non-observance of the maintenance requirements is to result in a limitation or exclusion of the guarantor's liability under the guarantee, this has to be clearly indicated in the guarantee document. Merely attaching instructions to the goods or including them in the guarantee document does not have the effect of limiting the guarantor's liability in the case of non-observance by the guarantee holder.

Scope of the instructions. The maintenance instructions may exceed the normal scope of the maintenance instructions for consumer goods. As stated above, they may require the guarantee holder to take special care of the goods. The conditions have to be reasonable and introduced for a justified reason. This requirement must be specially underlined if the guarantor suggests using a specific brand of products for the maintenance of the goods in question. Besides, the instructions cannot limit the scope of the normal use of the goods or impose excessive costs on the guarantee holder. In any case, all the additional maintenance costs, like the costs of yearly check-ups must be indicated in the guarantee document in accordance with IV.A.–6:104 (Coverage of the guarantee) sub-paragraph (d)).

The liability of the guarantor is not excluded or limited in the case of non-observance of the maintenance instructions if the same defect would have appeared even if the guarantee holder had observed the instructions. If it is not clear from the circumstances, it should be up to the guarantor to prove that the observance of the instruction would have made a difference.

B, a consumer, buys a second-hand car with a guarantee attached from A, a car dealer. After one year the car breaks down. When B attempts to invoke the guarantee, A refuses the claim under the guarantee since B has not had the car serviced at an authorised garage as required by the guarantee conditions. Since in this case it is clear that for the defect in question it is irrelevant if the prescribed service had taken place at an authorised garage or at another garage, it is unreasonable to apply this condition.

NOTES

Maintenance instructions

1. The Consumer Sales Directive does not mention maintenance instructions specifically and merely lays down that the guarantee document shall state the contents of the guarantee (art. 6(2)), which implies that if there are maintenance instructions specifically designed for the guarantee, they should be incorporated in the guarantee document. Similarly, most of the systems do not deal directly with maintenance instructions.
2. Under ITALIAN law Consumer Code art. 133(2)(b) provides that the guarantee shall incorporate its object and the necessary elements to make it possible to use it. In SLOVENIA unless maintenance instructions are against good faith and thus void as unfair contract terms (cf. Consumer Protection Act § 22), clauses excluding the guarantor's liability in the case of the use, treatment or maintenance of the goods against the explicit instructions of the seller are admissible and often utilized. The maintenance instructions do not have to be included in the guarantee document, but the seller has to deliver them together with the goods, if proper use of the goods is impossible without the instructions. In FINLAND the guarantee shall be as widely valid as the guarantee terms and conditions specify. The terms of the guarantee may exclude any lack of conformity attributable to the buyer, such as a failure to follow the instructions or incorrect handling of the goods. According to the Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 15a(1), liability for defects shall not arise if the deterioration was due to an accident, inappropriate handling of the goods or another circumstance attributable to the buyer. Likewise in SWEDEN, a guarantee does not apply if the seller shows that it is probable that the deterioration was caused by an accident or a similar event or neglect, abnormal use or a similar act or omission on the part of the buyer (Consumer Sales Act § 21(2)). With "similar act or omission" is meant, for example, that the consumer does not follow instructions from the professional regarding service or care, without this amounting to neglect. For instance, concerning vehicles it is common to prescribe a yearly service for the guarantee to be valid. Such service obligations, however, must not be unreasonably burdensome for the consumer. This could for instance be the case if possibilities to use the goods are so restricted that the guarantee is almost misleading or if the costs for the prescribed service are unreasonable (see Prop 1989/9:89, 110). Such a common clause was evaluated by the Market Court in MD 1992:13, where the seller had provided a guarantee for a car and its equipment to be valid for one year or a maximum of 30,000 km. The seller also granted a prolonged guarantee valid for up to three years or 100,000 km, provided that the consumer had all the servicing carried out according to the service manual at a garage authorised by the seller. The court stated that the prolonged guarantee was more beneficial than the consumer's legal rights. The fact that the guarantee obliged the consumer to follow a certain cause of action did not per se render the condition unreasonable. In ARN 1991/92 ref. 42 the Board came to the opposite conclusion. Here the consumer claimed that certain defects in the car purchased should fall under the seller's "second-hand guarantee". The seller denied this claiming that the consumer had not had the vehicle serviced at an authorised garage, as required in the guarantee conditions. The Board found it unreasonable to invoke such a clause, since it had been proven that for the defect in question it would have made no difference if the service had been carried out at an authorised garage or at another garage.

IV.A.–6:107: Burden of proof

(1) Where the guarantee holder invokes a consumer goods guarantee within the period covered by the guarantee the burden of proof is on the guarantor that:

(a) the goods met the specifications set out in the guarantee document or in associated advertisements; and

(b) any failure of or damage to the goods is due to misuse, mistreatment, accident, failure to maintain, or other cause for which the guarantor is not responsible.

(2) The parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General

One of the major advantages of a consumer goods guarantee is the presumption that any defect becoming apparent within the duration of the guarantee is automatically covered by that guarantee. Due to the importance of this presumption, this Article is mandatory and may not be deviated from to the detriment of the consumer. This solution differs from the general regulation on non-conformity in IV.A.–2:308 (Relevant time for establishing conformity) paragraph (2) where only a lack of conformity becoming apparent within six months from the time when the risk passes to the buyer is presumed to have existed at that time, unless this presumption is incompatible with the nature of the goods or the nature of the lack of conformity.

B. Burden of proof

The guarantor can escape liability under the consumer goods guarantee only by showing that the goods do in fact meet the specifications set out in the guarantee document or in the associated advertising. Alternatively, the guarantor may show that any failure of or damage to the goods is due to misuse, mistreatment, an accident, failure to maintain, or any other cause for which the guarantor is not responsible. In other words, the guarantor has to prove that either the defect at hand was not covered by the guarantee, or that it occurred after the guarantee had expired, or that other circumstances have occurred which exclude the liability (mainly damage caused by the consumer or by a fortuitous event).

B, a consumer, buys a cellular phone from A with a one-year guarantee attached. According to the guarantee conditions the guarantee is not valid if the deterioration is due to external damage. Within the guarantee period the phone ceases to work and B therefore demands a repair free of charge. A refuses to repair the phone, claiming that it has been dropped, referring to scratches on the cover. B's explanation is that the scratches originate from a change of aerial. In this case, the evidence adduced by the seller is not sufficient to rebut the explanation provided by the buyer. B may therefore invoke the guarantee. If A had given better evidence of the probability of external damage as well as its influence on the functions of the goods in question the outcome may have been different.

However, it should be kept in mind that the guarantor does not begin to bear the burden imposed by this Article until the buyer has at least shown that the goods are not working, or something similar.

NOTES

Reversal of the burden of proof

1. The Consumer Sales Directive does not establish a reversal of the burden of proof in the case of consumer guarantees. However, it should be kept in mind that the Directive establishes such a reversal for the first six months concerning claims for lack of conformity in art. 5(3).

2. As for guarantees in particular, this issue is not subject to specific regulation in most of the systems and as a consequence the ordinary rules concerning the burden of proof will apply, namely that the burden lies upon the party bringing a claim. However the present issue will probably be determined in SPAIN by the rules of the legal regime for lack of conformity; if the law presumes that the lack of conformity was latent when the defect manifests itself during the six months after the sale (ConsProtA art. 123(2)), the shifting of the burden of proof should not be overcome by the mere fact that the consumer made additional claims based upon the commercial guarantee, where the relief sought will be identical or similar to the legal remedies.

3. However, in a number of systems such a reversal of the burden of proof is expressly established. In SWEDEN the Consumer Sales Act § 21(1) establishes that if the seller, or somebody else on his behalf, through a guarantee or similar commitment undertakes responsibility for the goods or a part of the goods or for their quality for a certain period of time, a lack of conformity is presumed if the goods, during that period of time, deteriorate in a sense covered by the commitment. This presumption does not apply, however, if the seller shows that it is probable that the deterioration was caused by an accident or a similar event or negligence, abnormal use or a similar act or omission on the part of the buyer (Consumer Sales Act § 21(2)). The same applies under FINNISH law (cf. Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 15a). Also under GERMAN law CC § 443(2) provides for a reversal of the burden of proof. However, the buyer must still prove that he has the right to invoke a guarantee and that the lack of conformity falls under the applicable duration of the guarantee.

4. In some systems the reversal of the burden of proof applies although this is not expressly established by law. Under DANISH law there is a general presumption of the reversal of the burden of proof during the whole guarantee period (cf. Kristensen/Lando/Møgelvang-Hansen/Schützsack, Nye regler om forbrugerkøb, 59). In the NETHERLANDS one of the most important rights given in a guarantee in practice is the reversal of the burden of proof as to the question whether or not there is a lack of conformity (cf. Van Rossum, Rechtskarakter van een garantie, 15). Such an approach is also accepted by the legal doctrine in ESTONIA, where the guarantee usually reverses the burden of proof regarding the cause of the defects – if not stated otherwise in the guarantee the buyer is not required to prove that the non-conformity existed during the delivery of the goods (as is normally required in the case of claims under the sales contract); the buyer is merely required to prove that the non-conformity appeared during the guarantee period and the person who provided the guarantee is then usually required to prove that the non-conformity was due to misuse or mistreatment (Kõve, Näidised ja kommentaarid II, 333).

IV.A.–6:108: Prolongation of the guarantee period

(1) If any defect or failure in the goods is remedied under the guarantee then the guarantee is prolonged for a period equal to the period during which the guarantee holder could not use the goods due to the defect or failure.

(2) The parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article addresses the situation when the consumer is deprived of the possession of the goods as a result of their defectiveness or failure. If, during the period covered by the guarantee, the goods fail and it is necessary to remedy them (primarily through repair), there are two consequences for the consumer. First, the guarantee holder will, in most cases, be deprived of the possession of the goods and, as a result, cannot use or benefit from them. Secondly, the duration of the consumer goods guarantee keeps on running, despite the fact that the goods have failed to function as guaranteed and the guarantee holder cannot use them. This solution will also promote speedy action from the guarantor, since the guarantee will otherwise be prolonged. Especially for defects appearing at the end of the guarantee period, this regulation will provide the consumer with additional security. Due to the high risk of guarantors excluding the application of this principle, this Article is mandatory and may not be deviated from to the detriment of the consumer.

B. Prolongation of the guarantee period

According to the solution presented by this Article, the duration of the consumer goods guarantee is prolonged by the time during which the goods could not be used due to their failure. The period during which the consumer could not use the goods covers the period from the moment of the discovery of the failure of the goods until the moment of receiving back the remedied goods. In essence, the guarantee period is therefore merely interrupted rather than starting afresh. The guarantee period can be prolonged several times, if the goods have to be remedied (repaired or replaced) on more than one occasion.

Illustration
B buys a TV with an attached two-year guarantee. On June 15 the TV stops working. B notifies the seller and the TV is sent in for repair. B receives the TV back on July 15. The duration of the guarantee will be prolonged by one month.

NOTES

Prolongation of the guarantee period

1. The Consumer Sales Directive does not deal with the question of the prolongation of the guarantee period. This is also the case in most of the legal systems.
2. However, under some systems a concrete regulation can be found. In ESTONIA LOA § 231(4) sent. 1) lays down that unless the guarantee provides otherwise, it is presumed that in the case of a replacement, the replaced product shall have a new guarantee with the same duration. It is further presumed that in the case of a repair the guarantee period is prolonged for the period of the repair (LOA § 231(4) sent. 3)). In FRANCE, according to Consumer Code art. L. 211-16, there is a prolongation of the guarantee if the good is immobilised for more than seven days. In HUNGARY this issue is regulated on a general level within the context of the remedies for defective performance which is also made applicable, where appropriate, to guarantees by CC § 248(5). Accordingly, CC § 308(3) lays down that the time-limit for asserting rights against the obligor (seller) is interrupted in the case of a repair and replacement and restarts when the obligee can make use of the goods once again. Also under CZECH law general rules will apply since the guarantee may not be less favourable than the statutory regime. Here, the period from the time when the right arising from liability for defects was exercised until the time when the buyer is obliged to take over the goods after repair has been completed shall not count as part of the guarantee period. The seller shall issue to the buyer a receipt (confirmation) stating when the buyer exercised his right, as well as the information on the repair and its duration. (CC § 627(1)) In the case of an exchange (replacement), the guarantee period shall start to run anew from the time when the buyer takes delivery of the new thing. The same shall apply in the event of an exchange of a component to which the guarantee applied (CC § 627(2)). In SLOVENIA in the case of minor repairs the guarantee period is prolonged for the amount of time the buyer was unable to use the goods. In the case of a replacement or significant repairs the guarantee period is renewed (LOA § 483). In SWEDEN concerning a repair and replacement, the preparatory works establish an analogous application of the general time-limit (three years) to start running from the day when a cure was completed in cases where the same defect again appears (Prop 1989/90, 123; cf. ARN 1996-0976, from 1 July 1996).

PART B. LEASE OF GOODS

CHAPTER 1: SCOPE OF APPLICATION AND GENERAL PROVISIONS

IV.B.–1:101: Lease of goods

(1) This Part of Book IV applies to contracts for the lease of goods.

(2) A contract for the lease of goods is a contract under which one party, the lessor, undertakes to provide the other party, the lessee, with a temporary right of use of goods in exchange for rent. The rent may be in the form of money or other value.

(3) This Part of Book IV does not apply to contracts where the parties have agreed that ownership will be transferred after a period with right of use even if the parties have described the contract as a lease.

(4) The application of this Part of Book IV is not excluded by the fact that the contract has a financing purpose, the lessor has the role as a financing party, or the lessee has an option to become owner of the goods.

(5) This Part of Book IV regulates only the contractual relationship arising from a contract for lease.

COMMENTS

A. General

Scope of application. This Part of Book IV deals with contracts for the lease of goods and the rights and obligations arising from them. The contract is not itself the lease. It is a juridical act which gives rise to the lease (cf. II.–1:101 (Meaning of "contract" and "juridical act)). The lease is the legal relationship between the lessor and the lessee, involving obligations and corresponding rights on both sides, which is created and regulated by the contract. This Part of Book IV applies to what can be regarded as the "core" field of contracts for the lease of assets other than immovables, namely contracts granting a temporary right of use of goods against remuneration. Goods are defined (in Annex 1) as corporeal movables, including ships, vessels, hovercraft or aircraft, space objects, animals, liquids and gases. No doubt other types of contract may be found with some but not all of these elements or similar elements or functions to those referred to in the present Article, but it is not recommended that this Part of Book IV be given the widest possible scope of application. A menu of specific contracts can never be exhaustive or cover every possible contract. Neither is it possible to draw sharp lines between different specific contracts. There will be contracts with elements of two or more types. A negative definition of a contract for lease, excluding the application of other principles is hardly possible or desirable. One exception has been made: this Part of Book IV does not apply to contracts where the parties have agreed that ownership is transferred after a period with right of use, (paragraph (3)).

B. Contractual relationship only

Contractual relationship not proprietary rights. This Part of Book IV deals only with the contractual relationship arising from a contract for the lease of goods. It is not concerned exclusively with the relationship between the original lessor and lessee: Chapter 7 deals with new parties and subleases. However, it is concerned only with contractual rights and obligations. It does not deal with proprietary questions. In national law, protection and priority in relation to third parties may be decisive for distinguishing leases from other legal relationships which involve the use of goods, for example the right of usufruct that is employed in several jurisdictions. In most cases these rights will be more comprehensive than the right based on a contract for lease and for that reason fall outside the scope of application of this Part of Book IV. In other cases national law must determine to what extent this Part is applicable to such rights.

C. Right of use

Benefits and physical control. The essential meaning of "use" of goods is so evident in everyday language that it is difficult to give a definition that is not circular. A right of use implies that the lessee may enjoy the benefits that normally flow from having physical control of the goods: driving a car, sailing a boat, digging with an excavator, wearing a suit, watching programmes on a TV, etc. The lessee can do more than a pledgee or a person looking after the goods, but less than the owner, who may destroy the goods or make changes to them or establish rights related to the goods (the lessee's rights concerning changes to, or the sublease of the goods will be dealt with later). The more exact limits within which the lessee may utilise the goods must be determined by the individual agreement, the purpose of the lease and the default rules in this Part (Chapter 5).

Fruits. This Part of Book IV makes no distinction between the right to use the goods and the right to "fruits". For goods, as opposed to immovable property, this distinction is normally of little relevance. Whether or not the lessee may keep natural fruits like the foal of a leased horse or the tomatoes from a leased tomato plant must be determined from the purpose of the lease and other circumstances. It has not been deemed useful to formulate a default rule. Fruits understood as income from a new lease are possible if the lessee may sublease the goods, an issue that will be dealt with in Chapter 7.

Consumable goods, fungible goods, aggregates. The right to consume goods belonging to another person or to return objects other than those originally made available is usually seen as something different from "use", in everyday language as well as in legal language. This Part does not apply to contracts concerning such rights. On the other hand, there seems to be no reason to exclude leases of aggregates of goods, for example a set of tools for computer repairs. To what extent the lessee may replace parts of the aggregate will depend on the individual agreement and the circumstances.

Intellectual property rights. The purpose of leasing a book or a DVD (etc.) is normally to get access to the contents – reading the verses, listening to the music, watching the film etc. This Part deals with the individual copy of the work, not with questions regarding intellectual property rights. If, however, the law on intellectual property should require an illegal copy to be returned immediately or to be destroyed or at least not used by the lessee, this has consequences also for the lease agreement, as the item cannot be used for the purpose for which it was intended.

D. Temporary right

The right of use is not permanent. The lessee's right under a contract for lease is not permanent. A contract permanently dividing the interests in the goods in a way that gives one party a right of use while the other party is left with a right of payment should not be regarded as a contract for lease. However, this Part contains no maximum lease period and the difference between a right of use under a contract for a very long period on the one hand and a permanent right of use on the other may be rather formal (cf. Chapter 2). For leases of goods this will probably not be a problem of practical significance in any case.

E. Goods

Meaning of "goods". The meaning of the word "goods" is determined by a series of definitions (see Annex 1): "Goods means corporeal movables. It includes ships, vessels, hovercraft or aircraft, space objects, animals, liquids and gases." "Movables means corporeal and incorporeal property other than immovable property." "Immovable property' means land and anything so attached to land as not to be subject to change of place by usual human action." "Corporeal, in relation to property, means having a physical existence in solid, liquid or gaseous form."

Movables. This Part applies to movables and not to immovable property. Objects that form part of immovable property, as well as fixtures and accessories to immovable property, should be regarded as immovable property in this respect, unless such property is leased with a view to separating it from the immovable property. Hence a contract concerning the right to utilise a pipeline or a cable fixed to an immovable does not fall within the scope of this Part.

Corporeal movables. This Part applies to leases of corporeal movables only, i.e. movables with a physical existence. In practice, it will be movables in solid form, but it has not been found necessary to make exceptions for liquids or gases. Electricity, information and data are not covered by the definition of goods, neither are financial instruments, even in the form of negotiable documents.

Ships, aircraft etc. The word "goods" includes "ships, vessels, hovercraft or aircraft" (see Annex) and this Part applies to leases of such objects. In most, if not all, jurisdictions, there are registers for several of these objects, registers that also allow for the registration of rights attaching to such objects. Rights relating to ships, aircraft etc. are to a certain extent governed by rules similar to rules on immovable property, which is also registered. It has not been found necessary to exclude ships, aircraft etc. from the scope of application of this Part, nor to include special rules on leases of such objects. For leases of ships and aircraft of some size, there are standardised contract terms, and in any case the parties to the contract will make individual agreements covering all important aspects of the contractual relationship. This Part of Book IV is non-mandatory where the lessee is not a consumer. However, there are lease contracts, typically concerning smaller boats for leisure purposes, where standardised terms are not relevant and individual agreements often less elaborated. For such leases there is no reason to have special rules.

F. In exchange for money or other value

Gratuitous contracts excepted. This Part applies only where the right of use is provided in exchange for money or other value. Contracts concerning gratuitous use of goods have traditionally been regarded as a contract type different from the contract for lease and the typical interests involved in such a relationship are not the same as for leases. These contracts are dealt with in Book IV.H. (Donation). However, where remuneration is owed and it is not purely symbolic, this Part of Book IV applies. Contracts with a low rent are not excepted from the scope of application of this Part, but the fact that the rent is low may in some circumstances be relevant (for example in deciding the standard of quality of the goods that may reasonably be expected by the lessee).

Money or other value. In most cases the lessee is obliged to pay money, but this Part applies also where the right of use is provided in exchange for other value, such as work, services, ownership or use of property etc. The rules in Chapter 5 concerning payment apply with appropriate adaptations in such cases. Leases with remuneration in value other than money are so rare that it has not been found advisable to burden the text with special rules. Sometimes the right of use must be seen as an element of another contract, e.g. an employment contract, and in such cases this Part does not apply.

G. Contracts for lease and contracts for sale

Sales rules have priority. This Part does not apply to contracts where the parties have agreed that ownership is to be transferred after a period with right of use, cf. the third paragraph of the present Article. If the parties have already agreed on the transfer of ownership, and this transfer is not just an option for one or other of the parties, the contract falls under the definition of a contract for sale in IV.A.–1:202 (Contract for sale). The agreed transfer of ownership may take place at once or after a certain period, normally on the condition of full payment of the price. The most important example is a sale with reservation of title. It sometimes happens that lease terminology is used in agreements of this kind; the lessee becomes owner when the agreed rent is paid in full. The contract is still covered by the definition of a contract for sale. The language of such contracts (hire-purchase, conditional sale, sale with retention of title) may differ without corresponding real differences in the obligations undertaken by the parties, and it would be arbitrary to apply lease rules for the period up to transfer of ownership just for some of the contracts. In general, it is not always clear to what extent the applicability of rules concerning one type of contract excludes the applicability of rules concerning other types of contracts. Sometimes the rules may be applied in combination, each to different elements of the same contract; in other cases, obligations characteristic of one specific contract are just accessory elements in a contract that is governed by the rules of another type of contract. This may depend on the circumstances of the case, see also II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts). However, for lease contracts a clarification should be made in relation to the sale contracts mentioned here. The question remains whether the use of lease terminology should mean that lease rules apply by agreement. This is a question of interpretation of the individual agreement, but in most of these cases the use of lease terminology can simply be seen as a matter of form.

Lessee's option to buy. A mere option for the lessee to buy the goods, either at the end of the lease period or at any other point in time, does not make the contract a contract for sale under the definition in IV.A.–1:202 (Contract for sale), and neither does it exclude the contract from the lease definition. This is the case even if it can be proved that the lessee has an intention to use the option, as long as this is not a contract term. The same holds true where the price is so low that it would be obviously irrational not to use the option; this Part of Book IV still applies.

Sale and lease back. Sometimes one person (A) sells goods to another person (B) with the purpose of leasing the goods from that person. Depending on the circumstances, B's right may be regarded as a security right and A's right as ownership, cf. Book IX (Proprietary Security Rights in Movable Assets). Also as between A and B, the contracts for sale and for lease may be seen as simulations, again depending on the circumstances, and if so, this Part of Book IV will not apply. In other cases, this Part of Book IV should apply for the part of the contract concerning the lease.

H. Contracts where goods are supplied for the particular lease ("financial leasing" etc.)

The contracts. It is quite common that the lessor has a role more of credit provider than ordinary lessor: the prospective lessee finds a supplier who can provide goods conforming to the lessee's specification; the goods are then bought by another party, typically a financial institution, who leases the goods to the lessee; a rent and a minimum lease period are fixed such that the cost of the goods, plus interest, may be recovered by the lessor at the end of the lease period. The lessee may have a right to buy the goods at expiry of the lease period at a nominal price or a right to continue the lease at a substantially lower rent. Such contracts are often referred to as "financial leasing contracts" (cf. the following paragraph). Similar transactions may be defined in national legislation under various names. One should be aware that the English term "leasing", as well as more or less analogous terms in other languages, is frequently used for transactions that have only some of the characteristics here mentioned or important additional traits.

The Unidroit Convention. The Unidroit Convention on International Financial Leasing was adopted in Ottawa 28 May 1988 and entered into force on 1 May 1995, following three ratifications. To date (2007), the Convention has been ratified by ten states (Belarus, France, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Nigeria, Panama, Russia, Ukraine and Uzbekistan). According to art. 1 the Convention applies to international lease contracts (contracts "granting to the lessee the right to use the equipment in return for the payment of rentals") where (a) the lessee controls acquisition of the goods (the lessor buys the goods on specifications by the lessee and on terms approved by the lessee, from a supplier selected by the lessee; and the lessee specifies the goods and selects the supplier "without relying primarily on the skill and judgement of the lessor"); (b) the goods are acquired by the lessor in connection with the lease agreement and this is known to the supplier; (c) the rent is "calculated so as to take into account in particular the amortisation of the whole or a substantial part of the cost".

Essential rules of the Unidroit Convention. The essence of the regulation of the Convention is the following.

(a) The lessor's rights against creditors are protected (art. 7).

(b) The lessor, in the capacity of lessor, is protected against claims from third parties resulting from "death personal injury or property damage" (art. 8(1)(b)).

(c) The supplier's duties under the supply agreement are also "owed to the lessee as if it were a party to that agreement" (art. 10).

(d) The lessor "warrants" against third party rights in the goods (art. 8(2)).

(e) All maintenance and repairs lie on the lessee and the goods must be returned in the original condition, normal wear and tear excepted (art. 9).

(f) In the case of non-conformity or delay, the lessor must accept termination (or rejection of delivery) and, prior to acceptance of the goods, withholding of rent, but is not required to pay damages, except for loss resulting from the lessee's reliance on the lessor's skill and judgement or the lessor's intervention in the choice of supplier or in specifications (art. 12 and art. 8(1)).

(g) There are provisions on damages etc. relating to termination as a result of the lessee's non-performance (art. 13).

(h) There is regulation of the right to transfer ownership of the goods or the right of use (art. 14).

The Unidroit Convention and this Part of Book IV. The contracts described in the Unidroit Convention form one group of lease contracts containing elements of credit and security. The lease form is chosen by the parties. Little seems to be won by defining these contracts as contracts of their own kind, different from lease contracts and thus falling outside the scope of application of this Part. Defining the contracts as sale contracts would certainly be contrary to the wishes and intentions of the parties, and there is not sufficient reason to go against such intentions. This Part of Book IV should apply in general. Nevertheless, some special rules must be included as it would be unsatisfactory to have all of the lease rules apply as default rules to a – more or less – distinct and important group of contracts where some of the general rules do not fit. Such special rules are included in IV.B.–2:103 (Tacit prolongation), IV.B.–3:101 (Availability of the goods), IV.B.–3:104 (Conformity of the goods during the lease period), IV.B.–4:104 (Remedies channelled towards supplier of the goods) and IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract) and reference is made to Comments to these Articles.

I. Lease contracts and service contracts

Right of use combined with services. The right of use of goods may be combined with services from the party providing the right of use. There is a wide spectrum of possible combinations. At one end of the spectrum, work to be done by the lessor in the form of maintenance and repairs is an integral part of a great many lease contracts and such work is normally not considered a "service" at all. This Part of Book IV will apply. At the other end of the spectrum, there are contracts where the "use" of goods has no independent character and is merely accessory, such as the passenger's "use" of a car or a boat under a transportation contract. The categorisation is more doubtful where for example a party has the right of use of advanced industrial equipment and the owner provides a mechanic to take care of the equipment throughout the period of use.

Applicability of this Part of Book IV. A general rule on mixed contracts is found in II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts). Rules applicable to each relevant category may apply to the same contract, unless (among other things) one part of the mixed contract "is in fact so predominant that it would be unreasonable not to regard the contract as falling primarily within one category". Both sets of rules may apply where the services to be performed and the right of use are only loosely connected and there is no practical risk of incompatible regulation, for example where surfing lessons are included in the lease of a surfboard. In other cases, different sets of rules cannot easily be combined as they may regulate more or less the same elements of the contract, and rules may be conflicting. In such cases, one part of the contract may often be regarded as predominant. Where the owner or the owner's representative has control of the use of the goods, the service element will normally be dominant. A contract concerning a bus with driver will for example normally imply that the driver decides how to drive, while the client decides where to drive and when. This should not be regarded as a lease. A parallel distinction between "nautical" control and "commercial" control is well known from charter parties. Where the control aspect does not give sufficient indication, the extent and intensity of the service element and the qualifications required to provide such a service should be weighed in the balance. Furthermore, the value of the different elements of the contract may be relevant.

J. The parties

Lessor need not be the owner. In most cases the lessor is the owner of the goods. There may be situations, however, where the lessor may rightfully enter into a contract for lease without being the owner. Such may be the case for the holder of a usufruct right, a right acknowledged in several jurisdictions. Further, where the lessee can sublease the goods, the lessee in the role of sub-lessor is not the owner of the goods.

Lease-and-lease-back etc. In principle, one person (A) may lease the goods to another person (B) and then lease the goods back from B. Such transactions are now and then seen for immovable property, but are probably of small practical interest as far as goods are concerned.

NOTES

I. Contractual nature

1. In most civil law countries, a lease has traditionally been regarded as a contractual and merely obligatory relationship, see for AUSTRIAN law, Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, §§ 1092–1094, nos. 1 ff (see, however, for some proprietary remedies, Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1096, no. 117); for FRENCH law, Huet, Contracts spéciaux, nos. 21112 ff; for GERMAN law, MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB III[4], Pref. to § 535 nos. 6 ff. In GREEK law, a lease is a bilateral contract (CC art. 574), which creates obligations and does not confer real rights. However there are several provisions (such as CC art. 614) which render the contractual rights active not only inter partes, but also erga omnes. A lease is a contract in SPANISH law, cf. the heading of CC Title VI of Book IV. The nature of the lessee's use has been debated; the majority view seems to be that the lessee only has a right through the conduct of the lessor, and that the lessee's right is not a proprietary right, despite any possibility of entering it into the Land Register (Lete del Rio, Derecho de Obligaciones II, 332). In CZECH law, the lease is regarded as a simple contractual relationship between the lessor and the lessee (cf. Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Novotný), OZ[10], § 1171), but it nevertheless resembles proprietary rights in a number of aspects (e.g. CC § 680(2): every owner of the leased goods is bound by the lessee's rights, and CC § 126(2): the lessee may proceed against third party interferences). A lease only creates an obligatory relationship in HUNGARIAN law also. For many years a "right of lease" could be transferred, but not the ownership itself, and to a certain extent this remains the situation even after the transition in 1989/90 (cf. § 42 of the Act LXXVIII of 1993 on the Lease of Apartments and Other Premises and their Alienation; see also Besenyei, A bérleti szerződés[2], 14-15; see also on the proprietary rights of a registered lessee before 1940, Szladits (-Újlaki), Magyar magánjog IV, 502). For DENMARK, NORWAY and SWEDEN, see notes to IV.B.–7:101 (Change in ownership and substitution of lessor). In the UNITED KINGDOM, it is debatable whether or not a lease of goods creates property rights. It has often been speculated that the lessee acquires a proprietary interest in the leased good via possession (Palmer, Bailment[2], 81–82, 86–87; AL Hamblin Equipment Pty Ltd v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1974) 131 CLR 570, 581–582 per Mason J), in particular because of the possibility that the lessee will be protected against interference by third parties with knowledge, once in possession of the goods (Port Line Ltd v. Ben Line Steamers Ltd [1958] 2 QB 146, 151 per Diplock J). The question has never been directly addressed in UNITED KINGDOM law (Birks, English Private Law I, para. 4.195).

II. Right of use

2. In several jurisdictions, a distinction is made between a right of use and a right of use and fruits of the thing: AUSTRIAN CC § 1091 (distinction between Miete for use and Pacht where the object can be used only through hard work; cf. Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V[3], § 1091 nos. 1 ff); ESTONIAN LOA § 339 ("commercial" leases include the right to fruits); GERMAN CC § 535 (Miete) and art. 581 (Pacht); GREEK CC arts. 619 and 638 (special rules for leases of fruit-bearing things); for HUNGARIAN law, see Introduction, B9; ITALIAN CC art. 1571 (locazione) and art. 1615 (affitto for "productive" things); LATVIAN CC art. 2112; POLISH law distinguishes between najem (right of use) and dzierżawa (right of use and fruits), rules on najem are applicable also to dzierżawa (CC art. 694); for SWISS law, see BSK (-R.Weber), OR I[3], Pref. to Art. 253-274g, no. 4. In SPANISH law, the lessee may have a right of "use" or a right of "use and enjoyment", but these two types of lease contract are not treated differently in law (cf. Albaladejo, Derecho Civil II[12], 622). For some jurisdictions, it is explicitly said that the lessee's right may include the fruits: CZECH CC § 663 (cf. Knappová (-Salač), Civil Law II[4], 240); DUTCH CC art. 7:202; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.488 (unless otherwise provided for by the contract); SLOVAK CC § 663; SLOVENIAN LOA § 587(2) (unless otherwise agreed or customary). At common law in ENGLAND, the progeny of livestock born during the lease period may belong to the lessee unless the contract provides to the contrary. The same is true of livestock leased under a hire-purchase contract. See Tucker v. Farm and General Investment Trust Ltd. [1966] 2 QB 421, and Chitty on Contracts II[29], nos. 33-063 and 38-385). In several jurisdictions, the distinction seems to be of no relevance, at least not for leases of goods; this seems to be the case for example in BELGIAN, FRENCH, DANISH, FINNISH, MALTESE, NORWEGIAN, PORTUGUESE, SCOTTISH and SWEDISH law.

III. Temporary right

3. Legal definitions of a contract for lease regularly include a reference to the temporary character of the contract (see also notes to IV.B.–2:102 (End of lease period)): AUSTRIAN CC § 1090 (a certain period; lease contracts may not last forever, see Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V[3], § 1092, no. 88); CZECH CC § 663; DUTCH CC art. 7.201; for ENGLAND, WALES & NORTHERN IRELAND, see Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-063; for SCOTLAND, see Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law III[3], 398; FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1709 (certain temps); for GERMAN law, see MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB[4], Pref. to § 535, no. 5; GREEK CC art. 574 (cf. also art. 610 on lifetime leases); HUNGARIAN CC § 423; ITALIAN CC art. 1571; LATVIAN CC art. 2112; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.477(1); MALTESE CC art. 1526; POLISH CC art. 659(1); SLOVAK CC § 663; SLOVENIAN LOA § 587(1); SPANISH CC art. 1543 (the lease must be for a determined time, i.e. a determined or determinable period, cf. Bercovitz, Manual de Derecho Civil, 169; the intention is to prevent perpetual bonds on property, cf. TS 26 October 1998, RAJ 1998, 8237 for SWISS law, see BSK (-R.Weber), OR I³, art. 253, no. 1. There are exceptions, though; for example the definition in ESTONIAN LOA § 271 does not refer to the temporary character of the contract.

IV. Goods

4. See Comment E9, above, concerning the distinction between leases of immovable property and leases of movables. For practical purposes, rules on the lease of movable property are important primarily for corporeal movables. For some jurisdictions, it is held that a right or "immaterial goods" may be the object of a lease: AUSTRIAN CC § 1093; DUTCH CC art. 7:201(2); for FRENCH and BELGIAN law, see Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 128; La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², no. 58; GREEK CC art. 638 (on fruit-bearing property, cf. Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros , § 23, no. 6, fn. 3; Georgiadou, art. 638, no. 2); for HUNGARIAN law on contracts for use and profit (haszonbérlet), see Gellert(-Besenyei), A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1726; for ITALIAN law, see Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1571, no. IV7; LATVIAN CC art. 2113 (tangible property and rights).

5. As for the possible lease of consumable goods, formulas differ. For some jurisdictions, lease rules apply explicitly only to durable goods (AUSTRIAN CC § 1090, LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.477(2)). For HUNGARIAN law, it is held that only durable goods may be leased, Besenyei, A bérleti szerződés[2], 23. For other jurisdictions, it is said that lease rules apply only to non-consumable goods in principle, but that exceptions are possible (see for FRENCH law, Rép.Dr.Civ. (Groslière), v° Bail, no. 133; for ITALIAN law, Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1571, no. IV3). Then there are jurisdictions which do not exclude consumable goods, even if consumption of the goods may not feature amongst the lessee's rights: for BELGIAN law, see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², no. 66; for CZECH law, see Holub (-Balík, Piková, Pokorná), Civil Code II[2], 1031; DUTCH CC art. 7:224 (same object must be returned); for GERMAN law, see MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB[4], § 535, no. 68 (e.g. fruits are leased for decoration); for GREEK law, see Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[2], § 25 B II; for SLOVAK law (Lazar, OPH II, 146; Svoboda (-Górász), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, art. 663, 610; rules on leases do not apply where use of the goods will lead to consumption of the goods); SPANISH CC art. 1545 (not lease of goods where goods are consumed through their use); for PORTUGUESE law, see Romano Martinez, Direito das obrigações[2], 175 (same object must be returned). This rule will generally follow from the obligation to return the goods at the end of the lease period.

6. It seems that in most jurisdictions, the general rules on lease of goods also apply to contracts for the lease of ships or aircraft. There are, however, special rules on such leases in several countries. In both CZECH and SLOVAK law, general provisions on leases of goods apply also to ships and aircraft. There are, however, special rules on commercial leases of a means of transportation (see CZECH Ccom arts. 630–637; SLOVAK Ccom arts. 630–637). For ESTONIAN law see LOA §§ 291(1) and 312(1). For GERMAN law see CC § 578a for lease of registered ships. In GREEK law, a ship or an aircraft may be the object of a lease contract. The lease of aircraft is specifically regulated by the Code of Air Law (arts. 80–82) and the provisions of the CC (arts. 574 ff) apply to matters which fall outside the Code. The Code of Private Maritime Law regulates only the contract of affreightment and the contract for lease is regulated by the Civil Code. For details and discussion, see for ship leases Deloukas, Maritime Law[2], 253–254, 259; Georgakopoulos, Maritime Law, 166 ff, and for aircraft leases

Chatzinikolaou-Aggelidou, The aircraft as an object of transactions[3], 230 ff. The general rules in POLISH law on leases of goods apply also to ships and aircraft; for special rules on contracts concerning both ship and crew, see the Sea Code 2001. In PORTUGUESE law, the general rules of the Civil Code apply, cf. Ccom art. 482. There exists special legislation as well, e.g. Decree on Contract of Affreightment. In SPANISH law, the general rules on leases in the CC apply to leases of ships or aircraft, but analogy with the rules on freight contracts in the Commercial Code has been recommended for the lease of ships (Gabaldón, Navegación maritíma, 455).

V. In exchange for money or other value

7. Remuneration is usually regarded as a prerequisite for a lease contract: AUSTRIAN CC § 1090, § 1092 (for a fixed price); CZECH CC § 663; DUTCH CC art. 7:201(1) (determinable remuneration); ESTONIAN LOA § 271; FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1709; GERMAN CC § 535(2); GREEK CC art. 574; HUNGARIAN CC § 423; ITALIAN CC art. 1571; LATVIAN CC art. 2112; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.477(1); MALTESE CC art. 1526(1); POLISH CC art. 659(1), cf. Radwański (-Panowicz-Lipska), System Prawa Prywatnego VIII, 14; PORTUGUESE CC art. 1022, cf. Romano Martinez, Direito das obrigações[2], 167; SLOVAK CC § 663; SLOVENIAN LOA § 587; SPANISH CC art. 1543 (the contract is a lease only if there is a certain and determinable rent; TS 2 May 1994, RAJ, 1994, 3557); SWISS LOA art. 253; for ENGLAND, see Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-063 (with reference to McCarthy v. British Oak Insurance Co Ltd [1938] 3 All ER 1) and for SCOTLAND, Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law III[3], 398.

8. It seems generally accepted that the rent need not be monetary; for AUSTRIA, see Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1092 nos. 66 ff; OGH 24 Mar 1998 SZ 71/55; for BELGIAN law, see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², no. 825; for GERMAN law, see Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 535 no. 49. In GREEK law, the rent is usually paid in money, but may also consist in any other value (e.g. work, services, other fungible objects etc.) (Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros , § 23, no. 8; see also Georgiades and Stathopolous (-Rapsomanikis), art. 574, no. 17). To the same effect for DUTCH law, see Asser (-Abas), Bijzondere overeenkomsten IIA[8], no.17. This is also the rule in ESTONIAN law, even if it is not stated explicitly, in CZECH law (see Knappová (-Salač), Civil Law II[4], 240), and HUNGARIAN law (Gellert(-Besenyei), A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1675 and 1686–1687). For a similar rule in FRENCH law, see Rép.Dr.Civ. (Groslière), v° Bail, no. 467; for ITALIAN law, see Alpa and Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 1571, no. 12; LATVIAN CC art. 2119; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.487(3); MALTESE CC art. 1533(1). In POLISH law, rent may be monetary, non-monetary or both, cf. CC art. 659(2) and Radwański (-Panowicz-Lipska), System Prawa Prywatnego VIII, 14. It is held for SLOVAK law that remuneration may be in money or other value (Svoboda (-Górász), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, art. 663; Lazar, OPH II, 146). In SPANISH law, the rent need not be in the form of money; rent may be paid in kind, by services or even repairs (Albaladejo, Derecho Civil, II[12], 627; Bercovitz, Manual, Contratos, 170; Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 331; Sánchez Calero, Curso de Derecho Civil II[4], 378). For SWISS law, see BSK (-R. Weber), OR I[3], § 257 no. 3. In the UNITED KINGDOM, both at common law and under statute, the rent may be either money or some other valuable advantage, see Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s. 6(3) (ENGLAND, WALES & NORTHERN IRELAND) and s. 11G(3) (SCOTLAND). The valuable advantage may, for example, take the form of work done by the lessee for the lessor, whether with or without the leased goods (Derbyshire Building Co. Pty Ltd. v. Becker (1962) 107 CLR 633) or an 'exchange bailment'.

VI. Leases and sales

9. In the NORDIC countries, a lease is regarded as a sale in relation to rules on credit sales if the intention is that the lessee will become owner of the goods (DANISH Credit Contract Act § 6(2); FINNISH Instalment Sales Act § 1(3); FINNISH Law on Consumer Protection chap. 7 § 3 no. 2; NORWEGIAN Credit Sales Act § 3 no. 1 lit. c, SWEDISH Instalment Sales Act § 1(3) and SWEDISH Consumer Credit Act § 3(2)); see for a discussion e.g. Persson, Förbehållsklausuler, 298–312. For CZECH law, such leases are regarded as sales with reservation of title (CZECH CC § 601) or financial leases if the lessee (the buyer) bears the risk of accidental damage; thus an agreement that ownership will pass should not be decisive (but detailed court practice is missing). There are rules covering contracts called "purchase of a leased thing" in CZECH Ccom arts. 489–496. The rules concentrate on the sales part of the transaction, and the lessee's right to buy may be part of the original contract for lease or agreed upon later. For details see Štenglová/Plíva/Tomsa, Commercial Code[11], 1211–1218. In PORTUGUESE law, a contract for locaçaõ-venda ("lease-sale") implies that the contract for lease is automatically transformed into a contract for sale when the full rent is paid, cf. PORTUGUESE CC art. 936(2) and Galvão Telles, Manual, 398. SLOVAK law has special rules concerning commercial lease contracts which include a right for the lessee to purchase the goods (SLOVAK Ccom arts. 489–496); lease law applies to the lease element of the contract and sales law to the purchase element. Under UNITED KINGDOM law, a 'hire-purchase' agreement implies a lease of the goods to the lessee, accompanied by an option to return or to purchase the goods at some time or other (Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 38-270). Under IRISH law, the same 'hire-purchase' agreement implies a lease of the goods to the lessee, under which the lessee may buy the goods or under which property in the goods will pass to the lessee if the terms of the agreement are complied with (Consumer Credit Act 1995 s. 2). The agreement may be in the form of one or more agreements, which will be considered for the purposes of the Act as a single (hire-purchase) agreement at the time the last agreement is made.

VII. Leases with a financing purpose

10. The UNIDROIT Convention on International Financial Leasing (Ottawa 1988) came into force on 1 May 1995 and has been ratified by nine states (Belarus, France, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Nigeria, Panama, Russia and Uzbekistan). The characteristics of the contracts governed by the Convention are these (art. 1): they are lease contracts where the lessor buys goods on specifications made by the lessee and on terms approved by the lessee; the goods are acquired by the lessor in connection with the lease agreement, and this is known to the supplier; the rent is "calculated so as to take into account in particular the amortisation of the whole or a substantial part of the cost". The essence of the regulation in the Convention is set out in Comment H19 above. A draft model law on leasing was submitted to the General Assembly of UNIDROIT on 30 November 2006. In UNIDROIT's presentation of the model law, it is stressed that the model law is targeted in particular at developing countries and countries in transition, and the preamble points out that the "model for legislators in the general context of contract law as opposed to the specific area of that law reserved to leasing" is the Unidroit Principles of International Commercial Contracts.

11. AUSTRIAN law has no special private law rules on leases with a financing purpose. So-called Finanzieriungsleasing is described as one of several types of lease contracts, characterised inter alia by specification of the goods by the lessee, risk on lessee as in a sale, maintenance on lessee, liability for non-conformity directed against supplier (see in general Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1090, nos. 71 ff and 82; Fischer-Czermak, Mobilienleasing, 48 ff and 163 ff). Some options to buy the goods could make the contract a sale (Fischer-Czermak, loc. cit. 162).

12. Lease contracts with a financing purpose are well known in DENMARK, but there is no legislation on these contracts. There is, however, case law concerning various aspects of financial leases, and the contracts are discussed in legal literature, see for all e.g. Gade, Finansiel leasing and Andersen and Werlauff, Kreditretten, 256–279. In DUTCH law, acquisition of ownership is regarded as an important element of financial leases, and this may lead to application of the rules on hire-purchase (DUTCH CC art. 7A:1576h–x), a sub-category of instalment sales (DUTCH CC art. 7A:1576–1576g).

13. ESTONIAN LOA chap. 17 (§§ 361–367) includes several articles on leasing, described as a contract for lease where the lessor undertakes to acquire an object from a seller determined by the lessee (art. 361). The rules correspond generally with the UNIDROIT Convention. A corresponding regulation is found in LITHUANIAN CC chap. XXX (arts. 6.567–6.574).

14. In FRENCH law, crédit-bail is defined in the Monetary and Financial Code art. L 313-7 as an operation where (inter alia) equipment, supplied for this transaction, is leased to a professional with a right for the lessee to buy the equipment. The code deals mainly with public law aspects of such operations (and barely makes crédit-bail a contrat nommé; Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 23002). Other long-term lease contracts where the goods are acquired by the lessor at the lessee's demand, but where the lessee has no right to buy, have been named location financière (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21801). General rules on leases apply to a wide extent (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 23002). See also Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], nos. 881 ff and Rép.Dr.Com. (-Duranton), v° Crédit-bail nos. 38 ff. For comparable legislation (arrêté royal no. 55, 10 November 1967) and similar discussions under BELGIAN law, see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Louage de chose I², nos. 30 ff; Philippe, Le Leasing[2], nos. 030, 050). For LUXEMBOURG, see decision of the Cour Supérieure de Justice (Appel commercial) of 25 May 1977 (Pas. luxemb. 23 [1975–1977], 533, note by Mousel, JT 1977, 694), lease not sale if the lessee is not bound to buy.

15. In GERMAN law, financial leasing contracts are regarded as atypical lease contracts. Characteristics are, inter alia, that the lessee specifies the goods and owes the full amortisation of their value (MünchKomm (-Habersack), BGB[4], Leasing, no. 1), by paying rent or by other performance (Derleder/Knops/Bamberger (-Mankowski and Knöfel), Bankrecht, § 14 nos. 6 ff). Risks (Sach- and Preisgefahr) are by agreement transferred to the lessee and the latter has no remedies for lack of conformity against the lessor. As a counterpart, the lessor's remedies against the supplier are assigned to the lessee (Abtretungskonstruktion); the legal relationship between lessee and supplier is restricted to these remedies and is not regarded as a contractual relationship (Staudinger (-Stoffels), BGB (2004), Leasing, nos. 9–15; Oetker and Maultzsch, Vertragliche Schuldverhältnisse², 734 ff). The notion of financial leasing contracts in GERMAN law is wider than under the UNIDROIT Convention (Kramer (-Ebenroth), Neue Vertragsformen², 194).

16. The GREEK Law on Financial Leasing Contracts, as subsequently modified, regulates some aspects of leasing contracts between financial institutions and professional lessees. Characteristics are, inter alia, that the goods are selected by the lessee; the lessee bears the expenses of maintenance and repairs, as well as the risk of accidental damage to the goods; the lessor cannot be held liable for non-conformity of the goods, but assigns to the lessee his claims against the supplier; the lessee has the right at the expiration of the leasing contract to either purchase the leased goods or renew the leasing contract for a fixed period of time (see Georgiadis, New Contractual Forms of Modern Economy[4], 33 ff). There is no legislation on (domestic) financial leasing in HUNGARY, except a lengthy definition of financial leasing in Appendix 2 to the Act CXII of 1996 on Credit Institutions and Financial Enterprises (relevant in deciding if an activity is subject to authorisation by the Financial Supervisory Authority or not), see also a rather similar statutory definition of financial leases in the Act C of 2000 on Accounting. On financial leases regarded as contracts of transfer of ownership, see Gellert (-Besenyei), A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1677; Besenyei, A bérleti szerződés[2], 18; on financial leases regarded as contracts with elements of sale and lease, BH 1999.468. Legf. Bír. Gf. I. 30.985/1989; see also BH 1996. 257. Legf. Bír. Pf. V. 20. 531/1995 (must be decided from case to case); elements of credit, risk of loss decisive: BH 1998. 496 Legf. Bír. Gfv. I. 31. 135/1997; see also BH 1994. 97. Gf. I. 33. 682/1992; BH 1998. 242. Legf. Bír. Gfv. X. 33. 402/1996 (financial lease as instalment sale).

17. There is no contract legislation on leases with a financing purpose in NORWAY, but the lessor's right under a contract for lease implying (in real terms) total amortisation of the cost is to a certain extent regarded as a security right in the goods (Mortgages and Pledges Act §§ 3-22; Rt 2001, 232; Skoghøy, Panterett, 115–122).

18. POLISH law distinguishes a contract of lease (CC arts. 659–692) and a contract of leasing (CC arts. 709^{1}–709^{18} – added 26 July 2000). Under a contract of leasing the financing party assumes an obligation to acquire goods from another party and allows the user to use those goods for a rent at least equal to the remuneration paid for the acquisition of the goods. After the leasing period the user may have an option to buy the goods.

19. SLOVAK law has no special legislation on leases with a financing purpose. Contracts with relevant characteristics (goods supplied according to the lessee's choice, risk and maintenance duties borne by the lessee, transfer of ownership after a lease period) are regarded as mixed contracts (or innominate contracts) with elements of lease, sale and credit, cf. Patakyová (-Blaha), Commercial Code, art. 489. Recent CZECH court practice obviously also prefers the innominate contract approach (Supreme Court 30 Cdo 2033/2002).

20. In SPAIN, financial leasing is known as from the Royal Law Decree 15/1977. With the Royal Law Decree 1669/1980 the regulation was extended to immovable assets. The substantive rules are in Additional Disposition 7 of the Law 26/1988, and there are other minor and tax regulations. The leasing contract is registrable in the movable goods registry but registration is not compulsory (Law 29/1998). The theoretical nature of this relationship has been highly disputed, ranging from disguised sale to a mixed sale-lease contract (see Diaz Echegaray in Alberto Bercovitz (dir.) Contratos Mercantiles, I, 2007, pp. 898 ff).

21. In SWEDEN, rules on financial leasing have been proposed by a governmental committee, but the proposal has not led to legislation so far (SOU 1994: 120). For existing legislation and case-law, see e.g. Möller, Civilrätten vid financiell leasing; Håstad, Den nya köprätten[5], 300–307.

22. For SWISS law, it has been said that financial leasing contracts should be regarded as mixed contracts with more elements of a lease than of a sale (Honsell, OR-BT[7], 417). A consensus over definitions has not been reached, but elements such as transfer of risk, maintenance by lessee and amortisation of value have been mentioned (BSK (-Schluep and Amstutz), OR I³, Pref. to arts. 184 ff nos. 81, 84).

23. Under ENGLISH law, equipment or finance leasing contracts are described as a type of bailment, but essentially amount to long-term financing contracts. Such contracts arise where the lessee selects the equipment to be supplied by a manufacturer or dealer and the lessor provides the funds, acquires title to the equipment and allows the lessee to use the goods for all (or most) of their expected useful life. The usual risks and benefits of ownership are substantially transferred to the lessee. During the initial lease period, the rent is calculated to amortise the lessor's investment and financial charges. During the common secondary lease period, the lessee may opt to continue the lease at a nominal rent or the equipment may be sold and a proportion of the sum returned to the lessee as a rebate on the rental payments. The common law rules of contract apply. See Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-081.

VIII. Leases and services

24. The distinction between lease contracts and service contracts is sometimes commented upon for national law. The common approach seems to be that there are either two contracts (one lease contract and one service contract), or the parties' intention, the dominating element etc. is decisive. See for example for AUSTRIAN law Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1090 nos. 10, 34, 104 ff, for service contracts see nos. 41, 47 (the intention of the parties, the economic purpose and the main object of the contract); for BELGIAN law, La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², nos. 15 ff (dominant element; contract for a crane with an operator may be a lease); for FRENCH law, Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21124 (dominant element, also mixed application of lease rules and service rules possible); for GERMAN law, (Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], Pref. to § 535, no. 16 (use of machines in a fitness centre regarded as a lease), MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB[4], Pref. to § 535, no. 20 (contract for a machine that is to be controlled by the owner is not a lease); for HUNGARIAN law, BH 2005. 357. Legf. Bír. Gfv. IX. 30. 018/2005 (contract on integrated hospital information system regarded as mixed contract combining elements of service, lease and financial lease contracts). See also the general rule on mixed contracts in ESTONIAN LOA § 1(1); there is, however, a mixed contract only when there are obligations distinct from the ordinary obligations of a lease (general maintenance is not a service). For CZECH law, see Pelikánová, Commercial Code IV, 513; in commercial relations, Ccom art. 275, according to which all interconnected contracts are regarded as separate. In SPAIN the question has been raised where courts have had to deal with the extent of the obligations borne by the provider of parking facilities to third parties (cf. Espiau-Muñerat, Revista Derecho Privado 1996, pp. 787 ff).

25. In the UNITED KINGDOM, the mixed application of supply of service and supply of goods rules is possible. Thus, a contract for the hire of goods remains such whether or not services are included and a contract for the supply of services remains such whether or not goods are also hired: see Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, ss. 6(3) and 12(3) (ENGLAND, WALES, & NORTHERN IRELAND) and s. 11G(3) (SCOTLAND).

IX. The parties

26. It is commonly held that the lessor need not be the owner of the goods, see for example AUSTRIAN CC § 1093, cf. Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1092, no. 22; for BELGIAN law, see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², no. 121; for CZECH law, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Novotný), OZ[10], 1173 (the lease is binding on the owner); for DUTCH law, see Asser (-Abas), Bijzondere overeenkomsten IIA[8], no. 18; for FRENCH law, see Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21132; for GREEK law see Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 23, no. 7; A.P. 108/2003 EllDik 2003, 976; 272/1981 NoB 29, 1492; for ITALIAN law, see Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1571, no. II2; LATVIAN CC art. 2115; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.477(4); MALTESE CC art. 1530; for POLISH law, see Pietrzykowski, Kodeks cywilny II[4], art. 659, Nb. 9, 199; for PORTUGUESE law, see Romano Martinez, Direito das obrigações[2], 173; for SLOVAK law, see Svoboda (-Górász), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, art. 663; for SPANISH law, Bercovitz, Manual de Derecho Civil, 171; for SWISS law, see BSK (-R.Weber), OR I³, art. 253, no. 9.

IV.B.–1:102: Consumer contract for the lease of goods

For the purpose of this Part of Book IV, a consumer contract for the lease of goods is a contract for the lease of goods in which the lessor is a business and the lessee is a consumer .

COMMENTS

A. Consumer rules and structure of the draft

Consumers and contracts for the lease of goods. Contracts for lease to which consumers are parties require special attention. Consumers typically have less bargaining power and less information concerning the leased goods, the law and the circumstances of the contract than businesses. Rules protecting consumers' interests as contracting parties are common both in national law and Community legislation. Consumers may be parties to lease contracts as lessors, as lessees or both. Constellations in which the consumer is lessor and the business is the lessee ("consumer-to-business") are probably not very frequent as far as goods are concerned and it has been deemed unnecessary to include particular rules for these situations. Lease contracts where both parties are consumers ("consumer-to-consumer") are more common, but consumer protection rules are not needed here either, as the typical element of inequality of the parties is not present. It should, however, be considered whether certain rules may create problems where both parties are non-professionals. Consumer protection rules should apply to contracts where the lessor is a business and the lessee is a consumer. This is comparable to consumer protection rules already in existence in national law, Community legislation and other parts of these model rules.

General principles and consumer contracts. Several consumer protection rules are found in general parts of these model rules that apply to several or even all contracts between businesses and consumers. Examples are rules on non-discrimination and information duties at the pre-contractual stage, the right to withdraw from certain contracts, and rules on unfair terms. Some of these rules apply to contracts between businesses as well. It is not necessary to repeat general protection rules in this Part of Book IV.

Consumer protection in this Part of Book IV. The consumer rules of this Part of Book IV are found in the relevant chapters according to their content. Two alternative structures were considered but rejected. One was to gather all special rules concerning consumers in one chapter. This would have had the advantage of making it easier to get an overview of consumer protection. However, it would also have had negative effects, in so far as obliging the reader to consult both the relevant substantive chapter and the consumer chapter in order to get the full picture. A second alternative was to have a separate set of principles for consumer contracts for lease, setting out all the applicable rules, whether deviating from or identical to the rules concerning business-to-business leases (and consumer-to-consumer leases). This would have allowed the consumer to consult just one set of principles. Rules dealing with consumer contracts for lease in particular are, however, rather few, and a separate set of principles would have implied extensive repetition of general provisions. It must also be borne in mind that it would have been necessary for the consumer to consult general parts of the model rules in any case, it not being feasible to gather under one heading absolutely all rules that might affect a consumer contract for lease.

Mandatory rules. Consumer protection rules may not normally be derogated from by the parties to the detriment of the consumer. Where, however, the consumer has notified the other party of a non-performance, the parties are free to make a settlement concerning the effects of the non-performance within the ordinary frame of freedom of contract applicable also to consumer contracts. In other words, the consumer may not as a rule waive rights beforehand (see II.–1:102 (Party autonomy). Further, the parties are in most cases free to decide whether or not to enter into a contract and to agree on what is to be leased, when, for how long and at what price. Some restrictions, though, follow from rules on information duties, unfair terms etc. The mandatory rules found in this Part of Book IV mainly concern the effects of non-performance. This holds true also for IV.B.–1:103 (Limits on derogation from conformity rights in a consumer contract for lease), a provision limiting the possibility to include terms which waive or restrict the rights resulting from the lessor's obligation to ensure that the goods conform to the contract.

B. Definition of consumer contract for lease

Consumer contract definition for the purpose of this Part of Book IV. Under Annex 1, both "consumer" and "business" are defined. These definitions apply for the purposes of the present definition of a consumer contract for lease. The definition covers only business-to-consumer contracts, not consumer-to-business or consumer-to-consumer contracts; cf. Comment A. The provision in IV.A.–1:204 (Consumer contract for sale) has a corresponding definition for that situation.

Consumer. Under the definition in Annex 1 a consumer is a "natural person", i.e. legal persons (associations, companies, public law entities etc.) are not consumers. Further, the person must act "primarily for purposes which are not related to that person's trade, business or profession". The lessee's intended use of the goods is irrelevant as long as the lease is not for trade, business or professional purposes. If, for example, the lessee intends to sublease the goods, the lease remains a consumer contract for lease as long as the sublease is not primarily related to the lessee's trade, business or profession.

The lessor. The lessor may be a natural or a legal person. The lessor does not have to be a full-time professional, but the activities must be of a kind that would normally be qualified as a "business".

NOTES

I. EU legislation

1. Present EU legislation on consumer contract law is fragmented and not fully consistent. Some of the legislation is of a general character, e.g. the Unfair Contract Terms Directive (93/13), while other parts of legislation concern specific contracts, e.g. the Consumer Sales Directive (99/44). The latter deals with lack of conformity of the goods, but not with delay, and not all effects of lack of conformity are covered. There is no instrument dealing with the contract for lease in particular.
2. The EU legislation on consumers' rights is by its character mandatory, i.e. as a rule the protection given to the consumer's interests cannot be excluded. On the other hand, amicable settlements of conflicts must normally be allowed. Such principles are expressed explicitly in art. 7(1) of the Consumer Sales Directive: "Any contractual terms or agreements concluded with the seller before the lack of conformity is brought to the seller's attention which directly or indirectly waive or restrict the rights resulting from this Directive shall, as provided for by national law, not be binding on the consumer."

3. A more general rule is found in the Unfair Contract Terms Directive. Terms that are not individually negotiated and that are unfair are not binding on the consumer (art. 3(1), cf. art. 6(1)). One term in a list of terms that "may be regarded as unfair" (art. 3(3)) concerns exclusion or limitation of liability: "(b) inappropriately excluding or limiting the legal rights of the consumer vis-à-vis the seller or supplier or another party in the event of total or partial non-performance or inadequate performance by the seller or supplier of any of the contractual obligations, including the option of offsetting a debt owed to the seller or supplier against any claim which the consumer may have against him". As will be seen, this is not an absolute prohibition of limitations to or exclusion of remedies.

II. Definition of consumer contract

4. There is no uniform definition of consumer contracts in Community legislation. In particular, there are nuances regarding contracts for mixed purposes (partly for professional purposes, partly for non-professional purposes (on either side). An initiative has been taken to harmonise the definitions of "consumer" and "professional", cf. Green Paper on the Review of the Consumer Acquis (COM (2006) 744 final). Normally, Community legislation on consumer contracts applies to business to consumer contracts, and not to contracts where both parties are consumers.

III. National law

5. EU legislation on consumer contracts is implemented in national legislation in various ways. As the relevant EU legislation has the character of "minimum" directives, some jurisdictions have more extensive consumer protection. One example is the "total" regulation of consumer sales in FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN, i.e. a general regulation of the contractual relationship, not only the issues dealt with in the Consumer Sales Directive (FINNISH Law on Consumer Protection chap. 5, NORWEGIAN and SWEDISH Consumer Sales Act). In SPAIN there is a general Act that encompasses most rules on consumer contracts (Consumer Protection Act of 16 November 2007). The regulation of consumer sales in these countries may not, as a general rule, be derogated from to the detriment of the consumer. The SWEDISH Consumer Sales Act § 32(3) allows agreements excluding liability for the consumer's loss related to trade or profession; liability under the NORWEGIAN Consumer Sales Act does not include the consumer's loss related to trade and business, see § 52(2)(b). These countries have "total" legislation on some service contracts as well where the same model is found (FINNISH Law on Consumer Protection chap. 8, NORWEGIAN Consumer Craft Services Act and Housing Construction Act, SWEDISH Consumer Services Act). This legislation does not cover lease of goods. In CZECH law, consumer contracts are defined as "sales contracts, services contracts and other contracts whose parties are a consumer on one side and a supplier on the other side" (CC § 52(1)), i.e. a contract for lease may easily qualify as a consumer contract. The definition of "supplier" corresponds to EU legislation; the definition of "consumer" is not restricted to natural persons. CC § 55(1) states that "provisions of consumer contracts cannot be derogated from to the detriment of the consumer and that, especially, the consumer cannot waive his statutory rights or otherwise undermine his legal position"; the scope of the rule is discussed, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Hulmák), OZ[10], 376. See also CC § 56, forbidding limitation of liability against consumers for defects and damage. The general rules on leases under DUTCH law are influenced by the provisions on consumer sales, but a distinction between consumer leases and other leases is not made. Consumers are generally protected against unreasonable non-negotiated contract terms (CC arts. 6:231–247). For financial leases, there are protective rules under the Statute on consumer credit (Huls, Wet op het consumentenkrediet).

6. In some countries parts of the general rules on non-performance of sales are made mandatory in consumer sales, even to a greater extent than required by the Consumer Sales Directive. Examples are the AUSTRIAN ConsProtA § 9 and GERMAN CC § 475 (both with a reservation for agreements limiting liability for damages, in so far as the agreement is not contrary to rules on unfair standard terms). In AUSTRIA this technique is also used for lease contracts, as the provision just referred to comprises remedies regarded as special rules concerning non-conformity, i.e. rent reduction (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1096, no. 5) and termination (loc. cit. § 1117 no. 3).

7. Certain rules of the FRENCH Consumer Code apply to lease contracts, especially those concerning price-information or the obligation to provide information and advice; a legal person cannot have the quality of being a consumer (see Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civils et commerciaux[7], no. 422). Rules on abusive contract clauses also apply (see in detail, JClCiv (-Cayron), arts. 1708–1762, fasc. 660, nos. 44–49). The same model is found in PORTUGUESE and SPANISH law; general rules e.g. on information are applicable also to leases, see PORTUGUESE and SPANISH Consumer Protection Acts. However, in SPAIN the special regulation on Residential Leases (1994) should be considered as quasi-consumer regulation, though this provision also applies to consumer-consumer lease contracts. Some special rules on consumer leases are found in LITHUANIAN CC arts. 6.504 ff. There are rules on extraordinary termination of consumer leases in SWISS LOA art. 266k and ESTONIAN LOA § 322. The GREEK Law on the Protection of the Consumers, art. 2, which regulates general terms of transactions and unfair contract terms, applies to consumer contract for lease contracts; according to art. 1(4) both natural and legal persons can have the quality of a consumer if they are the final recipients of a product or service.

8. In the UNITED KINGDOM, the Consumer Credit Act 1974 (amended by the Consumer Credit Act 2006) imposes specific rules on ‘consumer hire agreements’. Consumer hire agreements are defined in s. 15(1) (as amended) as being any lease of goods to an individual which is not a hire-purchase contract and which is capable of subsisting for more than three months. These agreements are regulated where they are not exempted agreements (ss. 16(6), 16A and 16B); agreements entered into wholly or predominantly for the purposes of business and under which the lessee is required to make lease payments exceeding £25 000 are exempted. In the case of regulated ‘consumer hire agreements’, the Act requires that information be provided to the lessee prior to concluding a regulated agreement (s. 55); controls the form and content of such agreements (ss. 60–61); imposes a duty on the lessor to supply copies of the agreement on request (ss. 62–64); allows the lessee a right to cancel within a certain ‘cooling off’ period (ss. 64, 67–73) and the right to terminate at any time 18 months after the making of the agreement (s. 101); and imposes a duty of notice on the lessor before certain actions may be taken to enforce the terms of the contract (s. 76); amongst other things. The Act imposes similar rules on ‘consumer credit agreements’ (including hire-purchase agreements). The Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 applies to all leases, but provides for more stringent protection for consumer lessees (as defined in the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s. 12 with respect to ENGLAND, WALES and NORTHERN IRELAND and s. 25(1) with respect to SCOTLAND) in so far as remedies and exclusion of liability are concerned. In all cases the burden of proof lies on the lessor/creditor to prove that the lessee/debtor does not deal as a consumer.

9. In IRELAND, the Consumer Credit Act 1995 imposes certain conditions on 'consumer hire agreements' where the lease subsists for more than three months. Such agreements must be in writing, contain certain information, provide for a ten-day 'cooling off' period and be signed by the consumer (s. 84). If these provisions are not complied with, the lessor risks not being able to enforce the contract at all. The consumer is also entitled to terminate the contractual relationship at any time, by giving three months notice (or less if specified otherwise in the contract) (s. 89). The same Act precludes a lessor from excluding or limiting liability with regard to title and quiet possession (absolutely), and with regard to correspondence with description and/or sample, quality and fitness for purpose (unless the exclusion is fair and reasonable) (s. 88). It should be noted that whilst the definition of a consumer is similar ("a natural person acting outside his trade, business or profession", s. 2) judicial interpretation has tended to be more restrictive in IRELAND than in the UNITED KINGDOM (cf. Cunningham v. Woodchester, unreported, HC, 16 November 1984 in IRELAND and R. & B. Customs Brokers Co. Ltd. v. United Dominions Trust Ltd. [1988] 1 WLR 321 in the UNITED KINGDOM). However, this IRISH case was based on the definition of a consumer used by the Sale of Goods and Supply of Services Act 1980 (s. 3) and not the more recent definition found in the Consumer Credit Act 1995 s. 2(1).

10. A range of models is applied for implementing the Unfair Contract Terms Directive in different countries (general clauses covering all contracts, general clauses for all consumer contracts, general clauses only for non-negotiated terms, binding lists of unfair terms, non-binding lists of unfair terms). Examples of application of such rules to consumer leases may be found in case law and are also discussed in legal literature. It has not been found necessary to refer to such examples here. According to the SWISS LOA art. 256(2) agreements deviating from art. 256(1) (transfer of object in suitable condition for the predetermined use and maintain in such condition) to the detriment of the lessee are null and void if they are included in pre-formulated general business conditions. This rule applies also for consumer contracts for lease. As a consequence of this provision the lessee's rights in case of defects (Mängelrechte) cannot be excluded or restricted in standard contract forms.

IV. Financial leases in particular

11. It is not unusual that consumers lease goods for financing purposes. In such cases the models of financial leasing etc. may be influenced by consumer protection rules. In AUSTRIAN law, the Consumer Protection Act § 9 may make it impossible for example to limit the lessor's liability for lack of conformity (Fischer-Czermak, Mobilienleasing, 253 ff, in special 255). For CZECH law, the general rule in CC § 55 against derogation to the detriment of a consumer (see note III5) would create problems if the general lease rules were to apply to financial leases. In ESTONIAN law, there is no difference between consumer and non-consumer contracts concerning remedies for lack of conformity in financial lease contracts. The FRENCH Consumer Code applies to location-vente contracts, i.e. contracts for lease with an option to buy, as credit operations (art. L. 311-2). In a consumer contract, a clause that puts all risks in connection with the goods on the lessee would be abusive (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, nos. 23007 ff, Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], no. 895). According to the GERMAN CC § 500, certain rules on consumer credit contracts are also applicable to financial leasing contracts between a professional and a consumer (e.g. right to withdraw, right to terminate). Concerning remedies for lack of conformity, there is in general no difference between consumer and non-consumer contracts (MünchKomm (-Habersack), BGB[4], Leasing, no. 35). However, the consumer lessee's objections against the supplier may be turned against the lessor (Einwendungsdurchgriff, see Staudinger (-Stoffels), BGB (2004), Leasing, nos. 262 ff). Consumer sales rules are not applicable to consumer financial leasing contracts (MünchKomm (-Habersack), BGB[4], Leasing, nos. 38 ff, see also BGH 21 December 2005, NJW 2006, 1066, see also Stoffels, LMK 170499: the typical construction of assignment of remedies is no circumvention of the rules on consumer sales; where assignment fails, the remedies of lease law apply between the lessee and the lessor). The GREEK Law on the Protection of the Consumers is applicable to financial leasing, as for the purpose of this law "consumer" is broadly defined as the final recipient of a product or service (art. 1(4)); accordingly terms included in leasing contracts are subject to the control of their legality according to art. 2 on unfair contract terms. Under the NORWEGIAN Credit Sale Act § 29 (and a regulation), consumer leases of movables that in fact secure a credit or have this function can always be terminated with one month's notice, given that the lease period will be at least three months. The agreement may give the lessor a right to charge "general" rent for the period which has lapsed in such a case instead of the agreed rent. The SWISS Consumer Credit Act applies to some lease contracts, concerning e.g. right to termination and remedies against the lessor (see BSK (-Schluep and Amstutz), OR I[3], Pref. to art. 184 ff, no. 110; Roth, AJP 2002, 968, 975, 976; Honsell, OR-BT[7], 420 ff). In the UNITED KINGDOM, the Consumer Credit Act 1974 imposes similar rules to those listed above for 'consumer hire agreements' to 'consumer credit agreements' (including hire-purchase agreements). Once again the agreement must be a regulated agreement (s. 8(3)). In addition, certain terms (concerning description, quality, fitness for purpose, sample, etc.) are implied into hire-purchase contracts by the Supply of Goods (Implied Terms) Act 1973 (ss. 9-11). None of these terms may be restricted or excluded as against a person "dealing as a consumer" (Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 s. 6(2)). Breach of one of these conditions entitles a consumer to elect to terminate or affirm the contract and claim for damages (Supply of Goods (Implied Terms) Act 1973 s. 11A in ENGLAND, WALES and NORTHERN IRELAND and s. 12A(2) in SCOTLAND). In IRELAND, similar protection to that mentioned above with respect to consumer hire agreements is afforded to consumer hire-purchase agreements (defined in s. 2) by the Consumer Credit Act 1995. See further, ss. 58–83.

IV.B.–1:103: Limits on derogation from conformity rights in a consumer contract for lease

In the case of a consumer contract for the lease of goods, any contractual term or agreement concluded with the lessor before a lack of conformity is brought to the lessor's attention which directly or indirectly waives or restricts the rights resulting from the lessor's obligation to ensure that the goods conform to the contract is not binding on the consumer.

General

Mandatory rules in consumer contracts for lease. The parties to a consumer contract for lease are in most cases free to decide whether or not to enter into a contract and to agree on what is to be leased, when, for how long and at what price. On the other hand, the consumer's rights resulting from the lessor's non-performance may not, as a rule, be waived beforehand, cf. Comment A, the last paragraph to IV.B.–1:102 (Consumer contract for the lease of goods) and Comment B to IV.B.–3:102 (Conformity with the contract at the start of the lease period). The purpose of the present Article is to specify that derogation to the consumer's detriment cannot be achieved indirectly, for example by describing the goods in a way that it is, in real terms, a derogation from the lessor's obligation to ensure that the goods conform to the contract.

X wishes to lease a suit for a wedding and contacts Y, a professional who leases wedding suits. The contract is concluded after X has seen a sample suit and measures have been taken. The contract includes a term in which the lessee accepts that size and colours may vary, depending on the availability of suits in Y's shop on the relevant date. This term is not binding on X, as its effect is to waive the rights resulting from the lessor's obligation to ensure that the goods conform to the contract.

NOTES

See notes to IV.B.–1:102 (Consumer contract for the lease of goods) on the mandatory character of consumer protection rules. The present Article has parallels in IV.A.–2:309 (Limits on derogation from conformity rights in a consumer contract for sale) and in the Consumer Sales Directive art. 7(1).

IV.B.–1:104: Limits on derogation from rules on remedies in a consumer contract for lease

(1) In the case of a consumer contract for the lease of goods the parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of the rules on remedies in Book III, Chapter 3, as modified in Chapters 3 and 6 of this Part, or derogate from or vary their effects.

(2) Notwithstanding paragraph (1), the parties may agree on a limitation of the lessor's liability for loss related to the lessee's trade, business or profession. Such a term may not, however, be invoked if it would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to do so.

COMMENTS

A. Mandatory rules on remedies

Agreements excluding or restricting remedies. According to III.–3:105 (Term excluding or restricting remedies), the general rule is that remedies for non-performance may be excluded or restricted by a term in the contract, with the qualification, though, that such a term may not "be invoked if it would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to do so". For consumer contracts for lease (as defined in IV.B.–1:102 (Consumer contract for the lease of goods)) the main rule should be the opposite: agreements to the detriment of a consumer should not be allowed. Consumer protection is based mostly on the rules on remedies, while the parties are normally free to agree on performance: what is to be leased, at what price and for how long (but see IV.B.–1:103 (Limits on derogation from conformity rights in a consumer contract for lease)). An alternative could be to rely on general rules on unfair terms. This might, however, mean that the outcome would depend on the circumstances of the particular case. Making the rules on remedies mandatory offers a greater legal certainty in consumer contracts. The parties may, however, agree on derogations from the rules on remedies as long as the agreement is not to the detriment of the consumer. Further, an exception should be made for agreements limiting the lessor's liability for losses related to the lessee's trade, business or profession, cf. paragraph 2. Agreements settling claims based on non-performance are also allowed, as discussed in the following paragraph.

Settlement agreements. What may undermine consumer protection is agreements made beforehand, i.e. before the consumer lessee knows of non-performance. The typical imbalance between the business lessor and the consumer lessee with regard to bargaining power and information could, if derogations were allowed, lead to the exclusion of or restrictions to remedies in situations where the lessee has no real choice or is blind to the consequences of the derogation. This holds true both for the initial contract and later amendments. However, where the lessee is aware of non-performance and invokes one or more remedies, the parties should be free to agree on a settlement. In this situation, the lessor is already bound by the contract, and it is normally much easier for the lessee to appreciate the consequences of a settlement than those resulting from a prior agreement. Admittedly, there may be cases where a consumer for various reasons accepts a settlement which a business party would have rejected, but this must be dealt with under the general rules on validity. It would be going too far to restrict all possibilities of settling an actual claim. It is not always easy to distinguish settlement agreements from agreements excluding or restricting remedies. In most cases an agreement concerning non-performance cannot be made prior to the lessee's notification of the non-performance, unless it is clear that the lessee, without having notified, nonetheless knows that there is non-performance. A settlement agreement can typically not comprise future non-performance (as where the lessee is offered compensation "once and for all").

B. Application to lessee's remedies

Relevant remedies of lessee. It must be discussed with regard to each type of remedy whether or not a rule making the remedy mandatory is called for. As for the lessee's right to enforce specific performance of the relevant obligation, this remedy is already limited by general rules in order to avoid imposing an unreasonable burden on the debtor, cf. III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations). Normally, a business lessor has no need to limit even more the lessee's right to enforcement of specific performance. On the other hand, it may be said that enforcement of specific performance is in many cases a rather cumbersome remedy to pursue, in particular for a consumer, and that a limitation to this remedy would often be of small practical importance. However, in the situations where the remedy is most needed, for example where repair of the goods by someone other than the lessor is hard to obtain, the consumer should be protected against derogations in the contract. The best practicable solution seems to be that the remedy generally cannot be excluded by contract in consumer leases. The lessee's right to withhold performance of the reciprocal obligation will protect the lessee from granting unsecured credit to the lessor and further give the lessor an incentive to perform. In particular the former of these effects is important to a consumer lessee. There is reason to believe that possible derogations from this right would lie precisely in those situations where the remedy was most needed. A consumer may not always appreciate beforehand the effects of a derogation clause. Both the lessee's right to terminate the contractual relationship and the lessee's right to reduce the rent are at the heart of the reciprocity of the contractual obligations: non-performance of the lessor's obligations has direct consequences regarding the lessee's obligations under the contract. Termination of the contractual relationship can sometimes be a drastic measure, entailing grave consequences for the lessor. It is, however, hard to see that there should be a legitimate need on the part of the lessor for derogation from a consumer lessee's right to terminate in the case of fundamental non-performance, or to limit the effects of such a termination. As for rent reduction, derogations are hardly justifiable in consumer leases; they would imply that the lessee was obliged to pay full rent for a counterperformance of reduced value. The remedies just discussed should be mandatory, in the sense that they cannot be derogated from to the detriment of the consumer. The lessee's claim for damages, however, raises some particular problems, cf. next comment.

Limitation of liability for certain losses. The lessee is entitled to damages for loss caused by the lessor's non-performance, III.–3:701 (Right to damages), and the damages must as a rule "put the creditor as nearly as possible into the position in which the creditor would have been if the obligation had been duly performed" (III.–3:702 (General measure of damages)). The loss must, however, be foreseeable: "The debtor in an obligation which arises from a contract or other juridical act is liable only for loss which the debtor foresaw or could reasonably be expected to have foreseen at the time when the obligation was incurred as a likely result of the non-performance, unless the non-performance was intentional, reckless or grossly negligent", III.–3:703 (Foreseeability). Even with this foreseeability test the lessor may want to limit liability for losses related to the lessee's trade, business or profession. Such losses may occur for example where the breakdown of a leased car causes the lessee to return late from a holiday. The loss is foreseeable, but it is still different from the typical losses suffered in consumer relationships and more difficult to calculate from the lessor's point of view. Agreements limiting liability for these kinds of losses should be allowed. The term cannot be invoked, however, if it would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to do so. The term can, for example, normally not be invoked if the non-performance was intentional, reckless or grossly negligent.

Non-business lessor. The definition in IV.B.–1:102 (Consumer contract for the lease of goods) does not include contracts between two non-businesses (consumer-to-consumer) or contracts between a non-business lessor and a business lessee (consumer-to-business). It should be considered whether or not there is a need for special rules on remedies in contracts where the lessor is a consumer (i.e. where the lessor is a natural person acting primarily for purposes which are not related to that person's trade, business or profession). There seems to be no reason to derogate from the general rules on remedies implying a temporary or permanent loss of income for the lessor, i.e. withholding of rent, reduction of rent and termination. These are remedies resulting from the reciprocity of the obligations and restricting the lessee's right to pursue them would mean an unacceptable imbalance in the contractual relationship. Normally, a non-business lessor will not have relied on the income from the lease to an extent that makes such remedies unreasonable. As for the lessee's right to enforce specific performance, including by remedying a lack of conformity, this may in some cases entail considerable costs for the lessor, in particular for a non-business lessor often dependent on professional assistance from third parties. However, specific performance cannot be enforced where performance would be unreasonably burdensome or expensive, and this flexible rule makes it possible to take the lessor's situation into consideration. Thus, no particular rule for non-business lessors seems to be necessary. Liability for damages may in some cases be burdensome for a non-business lessor, in particular where the lessee is a business which has suffered losses related to the trade, business or profession. In IV.A.–4:202 (Limitation of liability for damages of non-business sellers), there is a rule limiting – with some exceptions – the liability of a non-business seller to the contract price. It does not, however, seem appropriate to include such a rule for lease contracts. Where the lease period can be terminated by notice, the total rent amount may be very small compared with the loss normally to be expected as a result of non-performance, and the rule could put the other party in a most unsatisfactory position. The parties are free, within the general frame of good faith and fair dealing, to agree on limitations of liability, cf. III.–3:105 (Term excluding or restricting remedies). Further, the prerequisite of foreseeability, III.–3:703 (Foreseeability) and the lessee's duty to reduce the loss, III.–3:705 (Reduction of loss) will work in favour of the non-business lessor as much as the business lessor. In some cases, a non-business lessor may invoke the excuse of impediment, cf. III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment), even if a business lessor would not be in a position to do so in a corresponding situation (e.g. where the non-business lessor could not reasonably have been expected to have taken the impediment into account or to have overcome its consequences). The conclusion is that there is not sufficient need to include special rules on remedies against non-business lessors.

C. Application to lessor's remedies

The Article covers the lessor's remedies as well as the lessee's, as is made plain by the reference to Chapter 6 of this Part.

Standardised damages, fees etc. Remedies are now and then agreed on in the contract as standardised damages, for example a fixed sum of money per day for delayed return of the goods or fixed "prices" for damaged parts of the goods. Other clauses may have the same effect: a "cancellation fee" may for example be compared to damages for fundamental non-performance. In such cases, the agreed remedy amounts to a derogation to the detriment of the consumer to the extent that the effect of the agreed clause in the particular case is less favourable to the consumer than would have been the effect of the remedies described in this Part of Book IV. It is not considered necessary to add a rule allowing for agreed remedies that are typically equal to or more favourable to the consumer than the rules contained in this Part of Book IV, even if the remedy is less favourable in the particular case.

Other remedies. The rules on the lessor's right to enforce specific performance of the lessee's obligations are flexible. For non-monetary obligations the rules are found in III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations). These rules exclude for example enforcement of specific performance where performance would be impossible or unreasonably burdensome. It has not been found appropriate to allow agreements derogating from such limitations of the lessor's right. As for monetary obligations, there are rules specifically designed for lease contracts in IV.B.–6:101 (Limitation of right to enforce payment of future rent). These rules are flexible, referring to a great extent to reasonableness, and there should be no legitimate need to derogate from the rules to the detriment of a consumer. Agreements extending the lessor's right to terminate the contractual relationship, e.g. contract terms to the effect that any delay in payment or any use which does not accord with the contract is regarded as fundamental non-performance, can have unexpected and unreasonable effects, and there is hardly a strong need to apply such clauses in consumer contracts for lease.

D. Non-mandatory rules on performance

Quality, quantity and price. It follows from the principle of freedom of contract that the parties, consumers as well as business parties, are free to agree on what goods are to be leased, their quantity and quality and the rent to be paid. Rules concerning these issues (cf. Chapters 3 and 5) are default rules intended to supplement the individual agreement. This is also the case for consumer leases: the lessee may well agree to lease goods of substandard quality or to pay more than the market price. Consumer protection is concentrated on remedies, cf. Comment A, in addition to rules on pre-contractual information, the right to withdraw etc.

Descriptive terms restricting remedies. Sometimes the terms of a contract are formulated as general descriptions of the performance while the real effect is to restrict remedies. This may be the case if the lessee agrees to "accept" the goods as they are at the time when the contract is made or declares "knowledge" of the quality of the goods. Such terms may for example serve as a warning that the goods are not new, and that traces of earlier use of the goods must be expected. However, if the goods are in a condition worse than the lessee would reasonably expect under the circumstances, despite the above-mentioned contractual term, there is a lack of conformity and the ordinary rules on remedies apply to a consumer contract for lease (and often to other leases as well). Mandatory rules on remedies can of course not be circumvented just by the use of other words. This issue is dealt with in IV.B.–1:103 (Limits on derogation from conformity rights in a consumer contract for lease) (see Comments to that Article). As a guideline, specific descriptions and warnings may be accepted while broad reservations regarding quality and quantity may be without effect.

NOTES

1. See notes to IV.B.–1:102 (Consumer contract for the lease of goods).
2. In SPAIN consumer rights are as a principle excluded from waiver in the contract (ConsProtA art. 10). In non-consumer contracts, parties cannot surrender their rights to compensation where the non-performance or the lack of conformity were due to the fraud of the other party (CC art. 1107).

3. According to the AUSTRIAN ConsProtA § 6(1), clauses shifting the burden of proof to the consumer (no. 11) and clauses on excessive interest rates in cases on late payment (no. 13) are not binding. An agreement making the lessee liable for casual damage would in effect be contrary to the rule in the ConsProtA § 6, under which the lessee's remedies for lack of conformity cannot be excluded by contract out (see Fischer-Czermak, Mobilienleasing, 315).

4. According to the ESTONIAN LOA § 322 the lessee may, without liability for loss, always terminate the lease by giving thirty day notice if it is (in broad terms) a lease between a consumer lessee and a business lessor. General rules in LOA §§ 35–45 on unfair standard terms also apply to lease contracts.

5. The FRENCH Consumer Act art. L. 132-1 on abusive terms also applies to lease contracts. See for example Cass.civ. 17 March 1998, Bull.civ. 1998.I, no. 116: in the case of a lease of a vehicle a clause shifting the risk of accidental damage or force majeure to the lessee was regarded as an abusive term.

6. In GERMAN law, the lessee is protected by rules concerning non-negotiated terms (CC §§ 305–310) against e.g. terms making the lessee liable for casual damage or terms expanding the lessee's vicarious liability (Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 538, no. 7; Schmidt-Futterer (-Langenberg), Mietrecht[9], § 538, no. 17; BGH 1 April 1992, NJW 1992, 1761), or terms deviating from the rules on termination to the detriment of the lessee (Schmidt-Futterer (-Blank), loc. cit. § 543 no. 209; MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB[4], § 543, no. 75).

7. According to art. 2(7) of the GREEK Law on the Protection of the Consumers, terms allowing the supplier to terminate the contract with no specific or significant cause (no. 5), or to terminate a contract for an indefinite period without setting a reasonable term (no. 6), terms shifting the burden of proof to the consumer (no. 27), and terms imposing an excessive financial burden on the consumer in the case of non-performance (no. 30) are regarded as abusive and thus not binding. Under HUNGARIAN law, a consumer lessee is protected by the general rule against unfair non-negotiated terms in consumer contracts, see CC § 209/A (2).

8. The prohibition of abusive clauses under POLISH law also applies to lease contracts (POLISH CC art. 385^3).

9. The general provisions of SLOVAK CC § 53 on unfair terms apply to lease contracts. In SPANISH law, consumer contractual protection cannot be derogated from by agreement (ConsProtA art. 10). Although the whole body of law related to unfair terms in consumer contracts (ConsProtA arts. 82 ff) normally applies to lease contracts, it is noteworthy that the most outstanding protection regime is in the Urban Lease Act, and that this regime applies even where the lessor is not a professional.

10. In SWISS law, certain rules concerning contracts for lease may not be derogated from to the detriment of the consumer, partly where the terms are non-negotiated (LOA art. 256(2)), but partly also in individual agreements (LOA art. 267(2), art. 257d, cf. BSK (-R. Weber), OR I³, art. 257d, no. 1).

11. Under ENGLISH law, the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 deals specifically with exemption clauses in lease contracts. As against an individual "dealing as a consumer" (s. 12(1)(a) and (b)), a business (s. 1(3)) cannot exclude or restrict liability in respect of the failure of the leased goods to correspond with their description or with a sample, or in respect of their quality or fitness for particular purposes (s. 7(2)). As far as title and quiet possession are concerned, these may only be restricted or excluded in so far as it is reasonable to do so (s. 7(4)). The Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 also apply to contracts for lease in so far as the terms are not individually negotiated. Terms which are "contrary to the requirement of good faith" and cause "a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract, to the detriment of the consumer", are not binding on the consumer (reg. 5(1)). Both the Act and the Regulations apply equally to SCOTLAND. In IRELAND, the Consumer Credit Act 1995 deals with exemption clauses in a comparable way: s. 79 ensures that any term attempting to restrict or exclude the rights or liability implied by law into contracts of hire-purchase (and contracts of hire, s. 88) involving consumers is void (in the case of title and quiet possession) and is void unless "fair and reasonable" (in the case of correspondence with description or sample and in respect of quality and fitness for purpose).

12. For CZECH law, the definition of 'consumer contracts' (CC § 52) applies whether the consumer is a lessor or a lessee. The rules on business leases (CC §§ 721–723) do not apply where the lessor is a consumer. See also DUTCH CC art. 6:233(a) on unreasonable contract terms.

CHAPTER 2: LEASE PERIOD

IV.B.–2:101: Start of lease period

(1) The lease period starts:

(a) at the time determinable from the terms agreed by the parties;

(b) if a time frame within which the lease period is to start can be determined, at any time chosen by the lessor within that time frame unless the circumstances of the case indicate that the lessee is to choose the time;

(c) in any other case, a reasonable time after the conclusion of the contract, at the request of either party.

(2) The lease period starts at the time when the lessee takes control of the goods if this is earlier than the starting time under paragraph (1).

COMMENTS

A. Lease period and contract

Performance during a period of time. It is a characteristic trait of the contract for lease that the obligations under it are performed over a period of time. During this lease period the lessor has an obligation to make the goods available for the lessee's use and the lessee has corresponding obligations to pay the rent and take care of the goods. The lease period does not necessarily start immediately on the conclusion of the contract, and the contractual relationship may also continue after the lease period has ended. The contract for lease is different from contracts where the obligations are performed "momentarily", like sales contracts, but it differs also from many contracts where the obligations are performed over time. The lessor's main performance consists in making the goods available for the lessee's use for a period of time and the remuneration is normally calculated for a certain period or per time unit. It is not a question of paying for work done or a quantity supplied, as in many service contracts.

Model of regulation. The present Chapter defines the lease period by fixing the start of the lease period in the present Article and the end of the lease period in the following Article. Defining the lease period means introducing a notion required for regulation; the obligations of the parties are thus decided only indirectly by the present Chapter. Rather, the lease period is an important element of rules found in other chapters: normally the lessor has an obligation to make the goods available for the lessee's use during the lease period, normally the rent must be paid for the lease period, normally the lessee must take care of the goods during the lease period, etc. An alternative model would be to regulate each issue separately, independently of the notion of a lease period, with provisions on the time at which performance can be claimed, provisions on the time when the duty of care starts, provisions on the time when the goods must be returned, etc. In national legislation the notion of a lease period is common, in most cases the length or the end of the lease period being fixed. Provisions on the start of the lease period are more unusual.

B. Non-mandatory character

The rules are non-mandatory. In the main, the rules of the present Chapter are non-mandatory. However, it would be contrary to fundamental principles to bind the parties to a contract for an indefinite period without the possibility to terminate the relationship. This also applies to agreements concerning the lease period, but it has not been found necessary to spell it out in the present Chapter. Paragraph (1) of IV.B.–2:103 (Tacit prolongation), on rent for a period after tacit prolongation of certain contracts, cannot be derogated from to the detriment of a consumer in a consumer contract for lease. Consumer contracts for lease are further discussed under Comment G.

C. Start of lease period

Significance. The start of the lease period signifies the point in time from which the lessor is obliged to make the goods available for the lessee's use and from which the lessee is obliged to pay the rent. Depending on the agreement and the circumstances, it may be that the lease period starts although the lessee has not accepted the goods and even if the goods are not made available as a result of the lessor's non-performance.

D. Time determinable from the contract

Time determinable from terms agreed by the parties. In many cases the start of the lease period is agreed upon explicitly by the parties – in a written document or in some other form, cf. II.–1:106 (Form). It may be a precise date or hour, but the time can also be fixed in other terms, e.g. linked to a future event. In other cases, the beginning of the period can be determined from the circumstances, e.g. where it is obvious that the lessee will receive the goods immediately.

Start within a time frame. There may be situations in which no fixed start time for the lease period can be determined, even if it is agreed that the lease period is to begin within a specified time frame or by a certain time. The rule in III.–2:102 (Time of performance) paragraph (2) is that performance may be effected by the debtor "at any time within that period" unless the circumstances show that the other party is to choose the time. In other words, the party owing performance has the choice if the circumstances do not show otherwise. In more specific provisions for a certain type of contract, such as lease contracts, it is better to clarify which party has the choice as a default rule. It is not possible to say that one of the parties typically needs the benefit of choice more than the other. In many cases the lessor must acquire the goods and make them ready for the lessee's use. On the other hand, the lessee will often have to make some preparations for receiving the goods. The default rule in paragraph (1)(b) of the present Article is that the lessor determines the start of the lease period within the agreed interval. It should be noted, however, that the lessee has no onerous burden of proof in showing that the choice lies on the other side. In many cases it is a matter of taste whether one considers the start of the lease period to be determinable from the contract or whether it is a question of choice by one of the parties within a specified time frame.

A plans to go to Paris next week and leases a car for that purpose. The parties agree that A will pick the car up at the lessor's business place. The circumstances indicate that the lease period starts when A picks up the car some time during the following week.

E. Time not determinable from the contract

Start within a reasonable time. Where no time or time frame for the start of the lease period is determinable from the terms agreed by the parties, the lease period starts at the request of either party within a reasonable time after the conclusion of the contract. This corresponds to III.–2:102 (Time of performance) paragraph (1), with the difference that the start of the lease period must be requested. Without this prerequisite, there would be a risk of starting the lease period before both parties are aware of it, e.g. in a case where the goods have been made available for collection by the lessee. Even if the request is made a reasonable time after the conclusion of the contract, it may be that the other party still needs reasonable time after the request has been made in order to prepare to make the goods available or to take control of the goods. What is reasonable depends on the kind of goods leased, the intended length of the lease period, whether the goods are available at the conclusion of the contract etc., cf. also "reasonable" in Annex 1. Should the case be that no party requests the start of the lease period and no such start time is given by the terms of the contract, the outcome must depend on the circumstances. If the lessee takes control of the goods, this is decisive (second paragraph of the present Article). It may also be that the contract has fallen away – the lessee no longer needs the goods and the lessor does not insist on performance.

F. The lessee takes control of the goods

The lease period starts when the lessee takes control of the goods. The lease period starts when the lessee takes control of the goods, even if this happens earlier than the time specified as the start of the lease period, e.g. earlier than the time fixed by the agreed terms or, if no such time follows from the terms, the time that would be considered reasonable. In most cases such early acceptance is based on an explicit agreement to start the lease at this point in time. The second paragraph of the present Article states a default rule for situations where there is no such agreement. The rule is non-mandatory and the parties may agree – or it may follow from the circumstances – that the lease period is to start at a later point in time. It is not sufficient for an early start of the lease period that the lessor has done what is necessary to make the goods available (e.g. by making the goods available for the lessee to pick up), if the lessee does not take physical control of the goods. This may be the case even where the goods are brought to the lessee. The term "take control" in the present Article refers only to the passing of the goods from the lessor to the lessee and does not in itself imply any approval of the conformity of the goods. It should also be noted that the lessee has no duty to accept early performance (III.–2:103 (Early performance) paragraph (1)).

> The lessor brings the leased tractor to the lessee's farm and leaves it there one week earlier than the agreed start of the lease period. The lessee is not at the farm and finds the tractor on returning home a couple of days after the agreed start of the lease period. The lessee has not taken control of the goods and the lease period starts at the time previously agreed.

Lessee's obligations affected by early acceptance of the goods. The general principle in III.–2:103 (Early performance) paragraph (2) is that a party's acceptance of early performance by the other party does not affect the time fixed for the performance of the party's own obligation. Paragraph (2) of the present Article represents a deviation from this principle as acceptance of an earlier start of the lease period has consequences for the lessee's obligations as well. The lessee's obligation of care is performed continuously and performance should start from the moment control of the goods is taken. The rent should also accrue from acceptance of the goods. Whether or not the time of payment is affected depends on the agreement. If rent is payable for example every seven days, early acceptance will have an effect on the time of payment. The situation may be different if rent is to be paid on certain dates, for example at the end of each calendar month.

Effects on length of lease period. Early acceptance of the goods will have no direct consequences on the length of an indefinite lease period. In other cases the effects of early acceptance will depend on the circumstances. If it is agreed that the lease period will end at a certain hour or date, early acceptance of the goods will normally not imply any change to this and the lease period will then be longer than originally agreed. If, on the other hand, the lease period is agreed to be so many days (hours, years), early acceptance will normally mean that the lease period ends earlier as well, and that the length of the period is not affected.

G. Consumer contracts for lease

No need for consumer rules. The rules of the present Article are of a general kind and should not give rise to any need for special regulation of consumer leases. This is true also for sub-paragraph (b) of the first paragraph, which leaves it to the lessor to determine the exact start of the lease period within an agreed time frame unless the circumstances indicate otherwise. There is no reason to believe that this rule will lead to abuses. Cases where the lessor has this option for an unreasonably long period must be dealt with under general rules on unfair terms.

NOTES

Start of lease period

1. It is not common in national law to include a provision concerning the start of the lease period. If the time cannot be determined from the terms agreed by the parties, there are default rules on time of performance. See notes to III.–2:102 (Time of performance).

2. The text of the AUSTRIAN CC has no rules on the time and place of making the leased goods available. It is held that the lessor has to hand over the leased goods at the beginning of the lease relationship (Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III^{2}, no. 8/19). No distinction is drawn between the start of the contractual relationship and the start of the lease period. The rule in CC § 904(1) is general: if the parties have not agreed on a certain time, the creditor can demand performance immediately (that is, without unnecessary delay). General rules apply in CZECH law. Unless otherwise agreed, the lessor must perform on the first day after the lessee's request (CC § 563) or without undue delay after the lessee's request (Ccom art. 340(2). If a time frame is set for the start of the lease period, the lessor will normally have the choice according to general rules (CC § 561). In THE NETHERLANDS there is no specific rule on the start of the lease period. So only general rules on the performance of obligations will apply. According to these, if a time has been set for performance, it is presumed only to prevent a claim for performance at an earlier time, not earlier performance by the debtor (CC art. 6:39(1)). Where no time for performance has been set, the obligation may be performed and claimed immediately (CC art. 6:38). In DANISH law, the lessor must make the goods available at the agreed time or, if no time is agreed upon, at the lessee's demand (Gade, Finansiel leasing, 101). For FRENCH law, it is simply said that the lessee is allowed to enter into possession at "the agreed date" (Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII^{14}, no. 680, Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21161, Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civil et commerciaux[7], nos. 493, 429, with further references). If no time is agreed, delivery should take place on the next day established by usage for the beginning of leases of that kind of goods. If such usage does not exist, it appears that delivery should take place immediately. But the judge has the power to fix the date of delivery (Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 174: libre pouvoir d'appréciation). According to the ESTONIAN LOA § 276(2) the goods must be delivered at the agreed time; if no such time is agreed upon the general rules in LOA § 82(3) apply. According to the GERMAN CC § 535(1) sent. 1, the lessor is obliged to allow the use during the Mietzeit. If no day is agreed, the handover must be done immediately at the agreed start of the contractual relationship (Blank and Börstinghaus, Miete-Komm², § 535, no. 194; this also follows from the general rule in CC § 271(1). It is observed that the point in time at which the leased goods must be left to the lessee does not necessarily correspond with the beginning of the lease relationship; the time of making the goods available will follow from the contract or other agreements (Schmidt-Futterer (-Eisenschmid), Mietrecht[9], § 535, no. 3). In GREEK law the general rule under CC art. 323 applies: if the time of performance can be determined neither by the contract nor the circumstances of the case the creditor (here: the lessee) is entitled to demand and the debtor (here: the lessor) must render performance immediately. The start of the lease period is in principle not determined by the delivery of the leased object to the lessee: delay in delivery may not postpone the start of the lease period, but instead generates liability for non-performance on the part of the lessor. Similarly, early delivery may not bring about the early start of the lease; if early delivery takes place without remuneration, the contract concluded between the parties is a loan for use (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[2], § 25 E II). For HUNGARIAN law, the general rule is performance at the time agreed and otherwise on request (CC § 280). A general rule on time for performance is found in the ITALIAN CC art. 1183, and this rule applies also for leases. According to SPANISH law, the goods must be made available at the time and place agreed by the parties. If no such time is agreed upon, it can be determined according to the characteristics and the nature of the goods, and the usage of the place. In POLISH law, it follows from general rules that the lessor must transfer the goods immediately after being called upon to do so by the lessee, if nothing else is agreed, cf. CC art. 455 and Bieniek (- Ciepła) II, 242, Radwański (-Panowicz-Lipska), System Prawa Prywatnego VIII, 25. It has been held for SWEDISH law that the lessor, by analogy with the Sales Act § 9(1), must make the goods available within a reasonable time, if nothing else can be determined from the agreed terms or the circumstances (Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 194).

IV.B.–2:102: End of lease period

(1) A definite lease period ends at the time determinable from the terms agreed by the parties. A definite lease period cannot be terminated unilaterally beforehand by giving notice.

(2) An indefinite lease period ends at the time specified in a notice of termination given by either party.

(3) A notice under paragraph (2) is effective only if the time specified in the notice of termination is in compliance with the terms agreed by the parties or, if no period of notice can be determined from such terms, a reasonable time after the notice has reached the other party.

COMMENTS

A. Definite or indefinite lease period

Two main types. Generally speaking, there are two main types of agreements concerning the lease period: leases for a definite period of time and leases for an indefinite period. A lease for an indefinite period can be terminated by giving notice of termination. Normally, a lease for a definite period cannot be terminated unilaterally beforehand by either one of the parties giving notice.

Combinations. Combinations of definite and indefinite lease periods are common. The parties may agree, for instance, that the lease period will end in any case at a fixed point in time, but that one or other of the parties may terminate the lease prior to this date by giving notice. One also finds agreements such that the lease period may end for example at the expiry of each year (every second year, third year etc.), but only if notice of termination has been given by one or other of the parties by a certain date. This may be regarded as a lease for an indefinite period under which notice of termination may be given only at certain intervals.

B. Non-exhaustive regulation

Rules on ordinary termination. The expiry of a definite lease period and termination by giving notice according to the rules of the present Chapter amount to ordinary termination of the lease period. A party does not need to have a special reason to give notice and has no duty to explain to the other party why notice is given. Termination of the contract, and thus also the lease period, may in other cases be the result of non-performance. This is dealt with in other chapters. Termination can result from other general rules as well, e.g. rules on changed circumstances. Some national systems have general rules allowing each party to terminate long-term contracts "for an important reason". There is no general provision on such extraordinary termination under this Part of Book IV. Neither has it been found necessary to include rules on extraordinary termination in the case of the lessee's death. Such rules are found in some jurisdictions, but under this Part general rules on termination by notice and on specific performance will apply.

No protection against ordinary termination. This Chapter contains no provision allowing the courts to avoid or set aside a notice of termination on the grounds that it is unreasonable. In national legislation it is quite usual to have rules concerning leases of dwellings and even business premises protecting the lessee against termination of the contract by the lessor. This is, however, not the case when it comes to the lease of goods.

Non-mandatory character. The parties may derogate from the rules of this Article, They may, for example, give one party a right to terminate a definite lease period by giving a specified period of notice.

C. Definite lease period

Time determined from the contract. A time for expiry of the lease period may be determinable from the contract. An agreement on a definite lease period may have various forms. The simplest form is to agree that the lease period ends on a future day or at a certain hour of day. It is also possible to agree upon the duration of the lease period, so many hours, days etc. counted from the start of the lease period. Expiry of the period may further be defined as a future event that will normally occur sooner or later. The event might for example be the fulfilment of the lessee's purpose of leasing the goods, e.g. where equipment is leased for a specific building project. A contract for a person's lifetime is a contract for a definite period. If the parties have agreed that the lease period will end upon the occurrence of an event that is not certain to happen, this agreement is effective, in the sense that the lease period expires on the occurrence of the event (resolutive condition). However, in relation to the second sentence of paragraph (1) of the present Article, stating that a definite period cannot be terminated beforehand by giving notice, a period ending on the occurrence of an uncertain event cannot be considered an agreement to a definite lease period (see below).

> Illustration 1
> A and B agree that A has a right to use B's car until B is back from holiday. The lease period ends at a certain point in time, even though there always is a risk that B could have an accident and never return.

> C leases scaffolding for a construction project. The lease period ends when the project is completed or has reached a stage where the scaffolding is no longer needed.

A definite lease period ends without notice. If expiry of the lease period is fixed by or determinable from the contract, the period ends at this time without any prior notice. The lessee has no right to use the goods after the end of the lease period and continued use will normally amount to non-performance of an obligation on the part of the lessee. Continued use may, however, lead to tacit prolongation of the lease period (see Comments to IV.B.–2:103 (Tacit prolongation)).

Definite lease period cannot be terminated unilaterally beforehand. Where expiry of the lease period can be established from the contract, the parties have in most cases intended that there be no right to terminate the lease unilaterally before that time by giving notice. This is the default rule in the second sentence of the first paragraph of the present Article. The parties may, on the other hand, agree that the lease period is to end at a fixed time or by notice given by either party. Agreements to this effect may take various forms, e.g. that notice may be given only for certain reasons or only by one of the parties.

Notice of termination if end of lease period is an uncertain event. The parties may have agreed that the lease period will end upon the occurrence of a future event that is not certain to occur (something that may or may not happen). If the agreed event occurs, the lease period will end (Comment C first paragraph). In these cases, however, both parties should have the right to terminate the lease period by giving notice of termination. If not, the lease period could in principle be permanent, which is not acceptable. This means that the lease period is not seen as definite in this respect.

A, a building contractor, leases a machine to B. The parties agree that B will return the machine if A gets the town hall contract that has been tendered for. If A gets the contract, the lease will end without notice. Both parties have, however, a right to end the lease period unilaterally by giving notice as it is not certain whether A will obtain the contract or not.

No maximum period. There is no provision on the maximum length of the lease period. Such rules are found in some national systems. It is not always clear what the background to such rules on maximum lease periods is. They may be inspired by related restrictions concerning leases of immovables whose purpose is, for example, to secure certain ownership structures, preventing feudal ownership etc. The rules may also originate from a wish to clarify the systematic and practical line between leases and transfer of ownership. It might further be noted that a principle of disallowing permanent contractual relationships, without exit clauses, is of limited significance if very long lease periods are permitted. A lease of goods for 100 years or 1000 years is of course equal to a permanent contract. On the other hand, fixing a maximum length for lease periods would be somewhat arbitrary; it is not easy to find criteria based on legal, economic or practical arguments as to what the maximum length should be. If the length of the lease period makes the contract obviously unreasonable, recourse should be had to more general principles of immorality, hardship etc., cf. II.–7:301 (Contracts infringing fundamental principles). It must also be mentioned that IV.B.–6:101 (Limitation of right to enforce payment of future rent) and the more general provisions in III.–3:301 (Enforcement of monetary obligations) limit the extent to which performance can be enforced. According to this principle, the performance of a more or less permanent contract may be transformed into a monetary settlement.

D. Indefinite lease period

Definition. A lease period that does not end at a time fixed by or determinable from the contract is an indefinite lease period. This definition in itself bears no significance except for the rule in paragraph (2) of the present Article that either party may terminate the lease period by giving notice. As stated in Comment C9, the lease period is seen as indefinite in this respect even if it is agreed that the lease period will cease on occurrence of an uncertain event.

Right to terminate the lease period by giving notice. Either party has the right to terminate an indefinite lease period unilaterally by giving notice, cf. paragraph (2) of the present Article. An agreement preventing one or other party from terminating an indefinite lease period would be contrary to general principles, see Comment C10. Should the parties agree that a notice of termination will only have effect after a significant lapse of time, the same questions arise as for agreements for very long definite lease periods.

Notice General rules on notice are found in I.–1:109 (Notice). There are no requirements of form for a notice of termination: it may be given in writing or otherwise. Form requirements may, however, follow from the contract. A notice becomes effective when it reaches the addressee. Normally, the lease period does not end immediately, but only after an agreed lapse of time or after a reasonable time. The calculation of this interval starts when the notice has reached the addressee, cf. paragraph (3) of the present Article. The notice may specify a lapse of time longer than that required by the contract.

It follows from the contract that either party may terminate the lease period with one week's notice. Notice of termination is mailed on Friday and reaches the lessor on a Monday. The lease period ends the following Monday.

Illustration 5
It is agreed that either party may terminate the lease period at the end of the following calendar month by giving notice. A notice of termination is mailed on 31 January and reaches the addressee at 2 February. The lease period ends on 31 March.

As illustration 5, but it is specified in the notice that it takes effect from 30 April. The lease period ends on 30 April.

Period of notice of agreed or reasonable length. The lapse of time between the giving of notice and the end of the lease period may be specified in the contract or otherwise determinable from the terms agreed by the parties. See illustrations 4, 5 and 6 above. If no such time can be determined from the terms, the period of notice must be reasonable. According to Annex 1, "what is 'reasonable' is to be objectively ascertained, having regard to the nature and purpose of what is being done, to the circumstances of the case and to any relevant usages and practices". More specific factors are listed in IV.E–2:302 (Contract for indefinite period) concerning notice of termination in commercial agency, franchise and distribution contracts. The factors there listed are to some extent relevant for contracts for lease as well: the time the contractual relationship (here, the lease period) has lasted, reasonable investments made by either party, the time it will take to find alternatives, and usages. For lease contracts, in particular, regard should in addition be had to the period according to which the rent is calculated. The period for calculation of rent often reflects the time horizon of the contract. A fishing boat at a hotel is leased by the hour, a car by the day, a truck by the week, etc. If rent is agreed for very long periods (several months, a year), it may be that other circumstances indicate that a shorter period of notice must be allowed. Likewise, it may be that the rent period is too short to indicate the period of notice, for example where day rates are agreed in a ship lease. Another factor relevant to contracts for lease is the character of the goods leased. A reasonable period of time for giving notice to terminate will typically not be the same in a contract for the lease of a bathing suit at a holiday resort as for, say, equipment for building construction. The examples also illustrate that the purpose of the lease must be taken into account.

E. Consumer contracts for lease

Unreasonably long lease period. A maximum length for the lease period is not specified by this Part of Book IV, cf. Comment C, last paragraph. Consumer contracts for lease will normally not be entered into for very long periods, but there may be exceptions, for example where a contract is functionally an alternative to sale and the lease period equals the expected useful lifetime of the goods. The problems with setting a maximum period are the same for consumer contracts for lease as for contracts for lease in general, cf. Comment C, last paragraph.

Extraordinary right to terminate lease period? It is explained in Comment C, last paragraph that IV.B.–6:101 (Limitation of right to enforce payment of future rent) and III.–3:301 (Enforcement of monetary obligations) limit the right to enforced performance: future rent cannot be claimed if the lessee wants to return the goods and it would be reasonable for the lessor under the circumstances to take the goods back. The lessor can still claim damages for the loss caused by the lessee's non-performance, but the lessor must take reasonable steps to reduce the loss, cf. III.–3:705 (Reduction of loss), including leasing or selling the goods to another customer. Thus, the lessee will still have to put the lessor "as nearly as possible into the position in which the creditor would have been if the obligation had been duly performed", III.–3:702 (General measure of damages), but the cost for the lessee will in most cases be substantially reduced compared with the ordinary payment of rent over a long period. These rules in combination work in fact as a right of termination, and in consumer contracts for lease the rules on remedies cannot be derogated from to the detriment of the consumer, cf. IV.B.–1:104 (Limits on derogation from rules on remedies in a consumer contract for lease). In deciding whether or not it is reasonable to take the goods back, it must normally have some weight that the lease is a consumer lease. There may, however, be cases under these rules where a consumer will have to pay substantial amounts under a contract for lease when the lessee wants to terminate, for example for goods that are no longer needed or that the lessee for one reason or other cannot afford to lease any more. An additional rule allowing a consumer to terminate the lease for certain "important reasons" etc. has though not been deemed necessary. It would be contrary to the fundamental principles of freedom of contract and market mechanisms to try to eliminate all risks and all liability involved in most contracts. Terms concerning the lease period and the right to terminate the lease are often decisive with regard to the rent paid. A higher rent can in some cases be the "insurance premium" that must be paid for the right to terminate the contractual relationship early. Rules on extraordinary termination should not distort this type of ordinary risk distribution in a contract, even where the lessee is a consumer.

Automatic prolongation etc. It may be agreed by the parties that a contract for lease for a fixed period will be prolonged for a new fixed period unless the lessee indicates otherwise within a certain deadline. If this deadline is very early, and there is no requirement that the lessee be reminded of the deadline, it may happen that the lessee does not react in time, with the result that the lease period is prolonged for a fixed period. Clauses of this kind are included in the "grey list" of terms that may be unfair under II.–9:410 (Terms which are presumed to be unfair in contracts between a business and a consumer) paragraph (10(h). See also the Unfair Terms Directive (93/13). The protection given by the general principles on unfair terms are deemed sufficient, and no provision covering such clauses is included in this Part of Book IV.

Consumer credit and right to terminate lease. The Consumer Credit Directive (87/102) applies to "hiring agreements" where "these provide that the title will pass ultimately to the hirer" (art. 2(1)(b)). Under the Directive the consumer has a right to "discharge his obligations under a credit agreement before the time fixed by the agreement" and, in this event and according to national law, "shall be entitled to an equitable reduction in the total cost of the credit" (art. 8). It is explained in Comment G14 to IV.B.–1:101 (Lease of goods) that contracts for lease where the parties have agreed that ownership is to pass to the lessee are covered by the definition of contracts for sale and fall outside the scope of application of this Part of Book IV. A rule corresponding to art. 8 of the Consumer Credit Directive is thus not included here.

I. Lease for a definite or indefinite period

1. Some jurisdictions only allow leases for a definite period. If the parties have not agreed on a definite period, the duration of the lease is established by law. In other jurisdictions the lease may be made for a definite period or an indefinite period.

2. According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1571, a lease is by definition for a definite period (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1574, no. I1). The parties may agree upon the duration of the contract for lease (art. 1574). If they have not done so, the contract is regarded as being for certain periods stipulated by the code, for movables it is the period used for calculation of the rent. In these cases, i.e. where the parties have not agreed upon the duration, the contractual relationship will not end without one of the parties having given notice – with a period that is agreed or established by usage – before expiry of the lease period thus stipulated by the law (art. 1596(2)). The SPANISH CC only recognises leases for a definite period. A definite term is said to be the opposite of a perpetual or indefinite term (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 331) and the latter are regarded as being against the obligatory character of a lease (TS 7 June 1979, RAJ 1979, 2344, and many others). The parties have to fix a certain and definite period or have to refer to a future event that is certain to occur (TS 21 May 1958, RAJ 1958, 2094). At the expiry of the period the lease ends without notice (if it is not prolonged by continued use, see notes to IV.B.–2:103 (Tacit prolongation) about CC art. 1566). Where the parties do not agree as to a definite time limit, the contract does not become indefinite as to time, but legal rules as to duration apply, CC art. 1581). A similar system is found in the PORTUGUESE CC art. 1026: if a lease period is not agreed upon, the duration of the contractual relationship is equal to the period for which the rent is paid The contractual relationship ends at the expiry of the period (art. 1051 number 1.a), and a notice of termination is not necessary. See also MALTESE CC art. 1567: a lease of goods is, in the absence of agreement to the contrary, deemed to be made for "the period for which the rent has been calculated" (art. 1532).

3. In jurisdictions that also accept leases for an indefinite period, the general rule is that the parties are allowed to agree on a definite period, and that such a definite lease period ends without notice. This is often laid down in legislation: AUSTRIAN CC § 1113; BELGIAN CC art. 1737 (if in writing); CZECH CC § 676(1); DUTCH CC art. 7:228(1); ESTONIAN LOA § 309(1); FRENCH CC art. 1737 (applicable also to leases of goods, Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], no. 601); GERMAN CC § 542(2); GREEK CC art. 608(1); HUNGARIAN CC § 430(1); LATVIAN CC art. 2165; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.479 and art. 6.496; POLISH CC art. 659(1)); SLOVAK CC § 676(1); SLOVENIAN LOA § 614(1); SWISS LOA art. 255(2). In other jurisdictions it follows from general principles that a contract may be made for a fixed period, and that this is valid also for leases of goods as long as no exception is made.

II. Terminating the lease within the agreed period

4. The general rule seems to be that a party cannot, unless otherwise agreed, and subject to rules on termination for extraordinary reasons, unilaterally terminate the contractual relationship within the period if the contract is made for a definite period. This could be said to follow e contrario from the legislation mentioned in note II2 or could be seen as a default construction of a term stipulating a definite period. See for

AUSTRIAN law Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1113, no. 1, Stabentheiner, Mietrecht, no. 79 (parties are bound for the agreed period; if there is no other agreement, neither party can terminate); CZECH CC § 677(1); for DUTCH law, see Hoge Raad 10 August 1994, NedJur 1994, 688 (Aerts/Kneepkens); ESTONIAN LOA § 309(2), cf. § 313 on extraordinary termination; for FRENCH law Cass.civ. 22 February 1968, JCP 1969.II15735, note R.D. (if the lease is for a definite period, the lessor is denied the possibility of giving notice of termination), CA Paris, 13 October 1973, GazPal 1975.1.somm., 155 (if the lessee gives notice before the expiry of a fixed lease, the lessor has a right to payment of the rent until the agreed time of expiry); for GREEK law, Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[2], § 40 Γ II (lessee must pay until agreed end of lease period even if the goods are returned earlier); for GERMAN law Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Rolfs), Hk-Miete[8], § 542, no. 58; for ITALIAN law Cass. 15 October 1971, no. 2919, Giur.it. 1972, I, 1, 292; for HUNGARIAN law, Besenyei, A bérleti szerződés[2], 42 ff (only extraordinary termination, in cases of non-performance and some cases of new parties); PORTUGUESE CC art. 1055 no. 2, for SWISS law, BSK (-R. Weber) OR I[3], Art. 255, no. 2 (ordinary notice of termination excluded). In SPANISH law, and apart from cases of non-performance, a residential lessee has a right to withdraw before the agreed time when the contract lasts for more than five years (Urban Leases Act 1994 art. 11).

5. It is widely accepted that the parties may agree that one or other of the parties may terminate the contractual relationship within the period even if the contract is made for a definite period. See e.g. for AUSTRIAN law Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1113, no. 2; for FRENCH law, Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 542; for GERMAN law, Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Rolfs), Hk-Miete[8], § 542, no. 56. POLISH CC art. 673(3) allows clauses that specify circumstances under which the lease may be terminated within the fixed period (Bieniek (-Ciepła) II, arts. 673, 258, Radwański and Panowicz-Lipska, Zobowiązania – część szczegółowa[3], 82; likewise CZECH law: cf. CC § 667(1) and the Supreme Court practice – e.g. 20 Cdo 2685/99 and 26 Cdo 2876/2000 SLOVAK CC § 676(1).

6. Even if the parties do not stipulate that termination before the end of the lease period is possible, such a right may sometimes be implied. In the UNITED KINGDOM (including SCOTLAND), 'regulated consumer hire agreements' allow the lessee the right to terminate after 18 months minimum by giving notice (see Consumer Credit Act 1974 s. 101). Note that this right only applies to those lessees whose contracts involve hire payments of less than £1500 per year (s. 101(7)(a), though the monetary limit may be amended under s. 181) and who are not hiring for certain business purposes (s. 101(7)(b)). Certain lessors may also be exempted from this provision by the Director General of Fair Trading (s. 101(8)). A similar right applies to consumer hire-purchase agreements (s. 99), as long as the lessee makes up the difference between the rent already paid and half the total hire-purchase price (s. 100). In IRELAND, more extensive provisions in the Consumer Credit Act 1995 allow the lessee to terminate the lease at any time by giving three months notice (or less if the contract so specifies) (s. 83). The right to terminate is also available within the context of consumer hire-purchase agreements (s. 63), with the same proviso that the lessee make up the difference to half of the total hire-purchase price (or less if specified by the contract) or that the lessee purchase the goods by paying the full purchase price less a reduction for early payment (ss. 52 and 53).

III. Various stipulations of a definite period

7. Where legislation provides for the ending of the lease at the expiry of an agreed period, expressions corresponding to "definite" or "fixed" are common: AUSTRIAN

CC § 1113 (ausdrücklich oder stillschweigend bedungener Verlauf der Zeit); BELGIAN CC art. 1737 (term fixé); CZECH CC § 676(1) (translation: "period for which the lease has been agreed"); DUTCH CC art. 7:228 (bepaalde tijd); ESTONIAN LOA § 309(1) (tähtajaline üürileping, translation: "lease contract entered into for specified term"); FRENCH CC art. 1737 (terme fixé); GERMAN CC § 542(2) (bestimmte Zeit); GREEK CC art. 608(1) (translation: "specified term"); ITALIAN CC art. 1596 (tempo derminato); LATVIAN CC art. 2165 (translation: "specified term"); LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.479 (translation: "fixed-term"); MALTESE CC art. 1566 (term expressly agreed upon); POLISH CC art. 659 (czas oznaczony, specified period of time); SLOVENIAN LOA § 614 (translation: "stipulated period"); SLOVAK CC § 676(1) (translation: "period for which the lease was concluded"); SPANISH CC arts. 1565 and 1543 (tiempo determinado); SWISS LOA art. 255(1) (befristetes Mietverhältnis, vereinbarte Dauer).

8. It is generally accepted that the period may be defined by naming a future point in time or by specifying a fixed duration. In these cases the exact time of expiry is known or can be computed in advance. It is less obvious that naming a future event should suffice as a stipulation of a definite period if the exact time of the occurrence of the event is not known. For AUSTRIAN law it is said that objective determinability of the definite period is sufficient; a lease for a lifetime or until a (even uncertain) future event is made for a definite period; the period can also be deduced from the purpose of the contract, the needs of the lessee or the period can depend on another legal relationship of the parties (Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1113, no. 3). To the same effect for DUTCH law, see Rueb/Vrolijk/Wijkerslooth-Vinke (-de Wijkerslooth-Vinke), Huurrecht, art. 7:721, no. 53. A certain future event is sufficient in CZECH law (Supreme Court 31 Cdo 513/2003); whether or not an uncertain event is enough to define a fixed period is debatable, cf. also CC § 37(1) on time determination. In ESTONIAN law, the parties may agree on a fixed period or a period defined by a certain future event. In FRENCH law also, the period may be defined by reference to a certain future event (Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], no. 667 with reference to Cass.civ. 3er, 18 January 1995, Bull.civ. 1995.III, no. 16: événement certain). In GERMAN law an event that is certain to occur is regarded as bestimmte Zeit; if the event is uncertain, it still counts as a resolutive condition, cf. CC § 163, but the lease period is not definite in this case (Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Rolfs), Hk-Miete[8], § 542, no. 54, cf. no. 55: a contract for lease for the lessee's lifetime is a contract for a definite period). The specified term of GREEK CC art. 608(1) may be defined by a specific date, a fixed period of time, the fulfilment of the lease's purpose, the occurrence of a future event that is certain to take place (Antapasis, art. 608 nos. 5, 6; Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[2], § 25 E I 2; Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 27, no. 4; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 192–193). Under HUNGARIAN law, the parties are free to set the duration of the contract for lease by reference to circumstances described in their contract – instead of specifying a future date or the exact length of the lease (HUNGARIAN CC § 430(1)). For a discussion of uncertain events as resolutive condition, see Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[2], § 25 E I 3; Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Antapasis), art. 608, no. 12. The LATVIAN CC art. 2165 expressly mentions that a contract "limited only to a goal to be reached" ends when the goal has been reached. In POLISH law a contract for lease is concluded for a definite period of time if the lease is to expire at a future event that may be reasonably expected to surely occur; Supreme Court judgment from 30 October 1990. In SLOVAK law, the lease period may be agreed with reference to a specific future date or as a unit in time, but it is also possible to determine the duration of the lease period by a future event. If the occurrence of the event is certain in time the lease is regarded as being made for a definite period. If the lease is made for a lifetime or limited in time by an uncertain future event (the lease is subject to a resolutive condition) it is regarded as a lease for an indefinite period. (Svoboda (-Górász), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, art. 663, 610). The period can also be specified by reference to the purpose of the contract; in this case the period of lease is regarded as definite (Lazar, OPH II, 146). As mentioned in note II2, for SPANISH law, the parties may refer to a future event that is certain to occur (TS 21 May 1958, RAJ 1958, 2094). The agreed period in the sense of SWISS LOA art. 255 is not only any unit in time or a specific date, but also an event (HandKomm OR (-Permann), art. 255, no. 2) that is certain to occur (loc. cit. art. 266 no. 2, BGE 56 II, 190: a contract for a lifetime is concluded for a definite period). If the occurrence of the agreed event is uncertain, then the lease is subject to a resolutive condition, but is still regarded as a lease for a definite period even if the event cannot be expected to occur in the unforeseeable future (BSK (-R. Weber), OR I[3], art. 255, nos. 4 ff). Only if it becomes clear that the event will not occur is the lease transformed into a contract for an indefinite period (loc. cit.).

IV. Maximum period

9. Four systems can be found concerning maximum periods for lease contracts: 1) no maximum period; 2) no explicit maximum period, but permanent leases inadmissible; 3) explicit maximum period and reduction to maximum period if the agreed period is longer; 4) maximum period and transformation into contract for indefinite period or right to extraordinary termination if the agreed period is longer.

10. AUSTRIAN law has no maximum period for lease contracts; the wording gewisse Zeit in CC § 1090 is interpreted in the sense that the lessee must be bound for at least some time; any binding in time of the lessee suffices to fulfil the criteria (Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I[3], § 1090, no. 4). Similarly, there is no maximum period under HUNGARIAN law, but a "perpetual" lease – a lease ad infinitum – i.e. which has no limit in time and is not terminable, is inadmissible, see Gellért (-Besenyei), A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1675, Besenyei, A bérleti szerződés[2], 40.

11. In FRENCH law, a lease cannot be permanent, cf. CC art. 1709; there is, however, no explicit maximum period for leases of movables (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21145). In SPANISH law a permanent lease is regarded as inadmissible (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 331). According to the SWISS LOA arts. 2 and 27 a permanent lease is inadmissible; a lease is regarded as permanent when it has no limit in time and is not terminable. An excessively long binding period is partially void and has to be reduced to an admissible extent (BSK (-R. Weber), OR I[3], art. 255, no. 8). In some codes the lease is described as being temporary or for a certain time, and this could be understood as excluding permanent leases (MALTESE CC art. 1526; SLOVAK CC § 663). CZECH law does not stipulate a maximum lease period, but e.g. an inadequately long lease period may be regarded as an indefinite period and thus terminable upon notice of the default length (cf. Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Jehlička), OZ[10], 1189 and Supreme Court 28 Cdo 2187/2001). In DUTCH law, there is no maximum period for leases or prohibition against permanent leases, but the rule on imprévision (CC art. 6:258) allows the judge to adjust or terminate the contract (Rueb/Vrolijk/Wijkerslooth-Vinke, De huurbepalingen verklaard, 3).

12. According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1573, a contract for the lease of goods cannot be stipulated for a period exceeding thirty years. If a contract is stipulated for a longer period or permanently, it is reduced to the duration of thirty years. The parties cannot agree on a clause providing the possibility for the lessee to renew the contract if the period is going to exceed thirty years (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1573, no. I3, Cass. 56/2900). Corresponding rules are found in PORTUGUESE CC art. 1025 (Menezes Leitão, Obrigações III[4], 302). According to the LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.479, a definite or indefinite lease period may not exceed one hundred years; nothing is said with regard to agreements for longer lease periods.

13. The ESTONIAN LOA § 318 stipulates that either party may cancel a lease after thirty years if the contract is entered into for more than thirty years (with an exception for contracts for the lifetime of a party). According to the GERMAN CC § 544, either party has a right to extraordinary termination after thirty years if the lease is agreed for a longer period (Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 544, no. 5). There is an exception for contracts for the lessor's or the lessee's lifetime. According to the GREEK CC art. 610, a lease can be terminated after the lapse of thirty years by notice in conformity with the provisions on leases for an indefinite period, if the contract was concluded for a period longer than thirty years or for the lifetime of one of the parties. The POLISH CC art. 661 allows leases to be concluded for a defined period longer than ten years, however after ten years have passed the lease is to be regarded as concluded for an indefinite period of time.

V. Right and need to give notice

14. It is held for DANISH law that either party may terminate the lease period with reasonable notice, subject to the terms of the contract, Gade, Finansiel leasing, 265. FRENCH CC art. 1736 allows for either party to terminate the contract by notice with a period according to local usages (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21199). The rule in GERMAN CC § 542(1) is that either party may terminate a contract that is not made for a definite period by giving notice according to statutory provisions. For ENGLISH law, it is held that the question whether a contract with no provision for its determination may be terminated by reasonable notice, depends on construction of the agreement (Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 13-026). SCOTTISH law holds that contracts for lease for an indefinite duration are subject to termination by reasonable notice by either party (Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law III[3], 398). According to the SLOVAK CC § 677(1), a lease for an indefinite period can only be terminated by notice, unless otherwise agreed; no reason is required (Svoboda (-Fíger), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, arts. 677, 622). In SPAIN, court doctrine allows for the parties to set an indefinite duration for the lease. Where this is done, both parties are entitled to terminate the lease at any time, subject to previous notice (TS 9 July 1979, RAJ 1979/ 2935, TS 15 October 1984, RAJ 1984/4862, TS 26 October 1998, RAJ 1998/8237). For SWEDISH law, a right to terminate with reasonable notice has been based on an analogy from the Commissions Act § 46 (Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 194); cf. NJA 1992, 168. See also AUSTRIAN CC § 1116; CZECH CC § 677(1); DUTCH CC art. 7:228(3); ESTONIAN LOA § 311; GREEK CC art. 608(2); HUNGARIAN CC § 431(1); LATVIAN CC art. 2166; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.480; POLISH CC art. 673(2); SLOVENIAN LOA § 616(1); SWISS LOA art. 266a.

VI. Period of notice

15. In some systems the rule is that the period of notice must be that agreed upon by the parties or else a period in line with usage (FRENCH CC art. 1736, ITALIAN CC art. 1596(2)).

16. In other systems default rules on the period of notice for termination are included in legislation: the rule in GERMAN CC § 580a is that notice may be given each day with effect from the end of the following day if the rent is measured per day. If the rent is measured by a longer time, notice may be given at the latest the third day before the day the contract is to end. For registered ships the rule is the same as for other movables if the rent is measured per day. If the rent is measured per week, notice must be given at the latest on the first workday of a week with effect from the following Saturday. Other examples are AUSTRIAN CC § 1116 (24 hours); CZECH CC § 677(2) (one month for leases of goods; the parties may agree that no period is required, Supreme Court 28 Cdo 1313/2001); DUTCH CC art. 7:228(2) (at least one month); ESTONIAN LOA § 312 (for contracts for an unspecified term: three months for registered ships and aeroplanes and three days for other movables); GREEK CC art. 609 (depends on the agreed period of rent calculation); HUNGARIAN CC § 431(1) (fifteen days); LATVIAN CC art. 2166 (notice for a lease contract with monthly or weekly rent payment must be given one month or one week in advance); LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.480 (one month); POLISH CC art. 673(2) (three months in advance at the end of a calendar quarter if rent is payable for periods longer than one month; one month before end of a calendar month if the rent is payable per month; three days in other cases); SLOVAK CC § 677(2) (one month for leases of goods); SLOVENIAN LOA § 616(2) (eight days if no other period follows from contract, special legislation or local practice); SWISS LOA art. 266f (three days) and art. 266k (special rule for consumer goods, 30 days if the lease is to last for at least three months, see HandKomm OR (-Permann), art. 266k, nos. 1 ff).

VII. Right to extraordinary termination

17. In some countries, continuous contractual relationships may be terminated for "an important reason" (etc.) and this then applies also to leases. The rule in AUSTRIAN CC § 1117 on contracts for lease is regarded as an expression of a general rule that continuous contractual relationships can be ended for an important reason (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1117, no. 2); ESTONIAN LOA § 313 allows for termination of a lease "with good reason" (i.e. where the party "cannot be presumed to continue performing the contract taking into account all the circumstances and considering the interests of both parties"); the general rule on termination for wichtiger Grund in GERMAN CC § 314 is concretised for leases in CC § 543(2)(sent. 1). According to the SWISS LOA art. 266g a lease can be terminated for an important reason. In SPANISH law the only provision on this matter is the Urban Leases Act art. 9, which under some strict conditions gives the lessor the right to terminate where the immovable is needed for personal or family purposes.

IV.B.–2:103: Tacit prolongation

(1) Where a contract for the lease of goods for a definite period is tacitly prolonged under III.–1:111 (Tacit prolongation) and where the rent prior to prolongation was calculated so as to take into account amortisation of the cost of the goods by the lessee, the rent payable following prolongation is limited to what is reasonable having regard to the amount already paid.

(2) In the case of a consumer contract for the lease of goods the parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of paragraph (1) or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. Tacit prolongation in general

Under III.–1:111 (Tacit prolongation) any contract which provides for continuous or repeated performance of obligations for a definite period may be tacitly prolonged if the obligations continue to be performed by both parties after that period has expired and the circumstances are not inconsistent with the parties' tacit consent to such prolongation. The contract then becomes a contract for an indefinite period and the contractual relationship can be terminated by either party by giving a reasonable period of notice (III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (2)).

B. Application to contracts for the lease of goods

This provision will find frequent application in relation to contracts for the lease of goods. The lessor may continue to make the goods available to the lessee after the end of the lease period: and the lessee may continue to observe the terms of the contract and keep and handle the goods as if the lease continued. Rent may continue to be paid and accepted. Of course, if the circumstances indicate that the lessee is just late in returning the goods, or perhaps that the lessee has left them to be collected in the wrong place and the lessor has failed to pick them up, then there will be no tacit prolongation. The time element will be important also. If the lessee has retained the goods for a only a very short time then that will count against tacit prolongation, but if the lessee has kept them for such a period that the lessor (if unwilling to continue the lease) could have been expected to react strongly to their continued retention then that will count in favour of tacit prolongation. It also follows from the general rule on tacit prolongation that it is excluded if either party has made it clear to the other before it takes effect that there is no consent to a prolongation of the lease. No formal notice is required. Prolongation as an effect of continued use of the goods is based on the presumption of the other party's consent, and prolongation will not result if the circumstances are inconsistent with such consent.

When A leased B's digger for 20 days at a daily rate, A was informed that B needed the machine for B's own purposes immediately after this period. At the end of the period, A by e-mail apologises that the digger will be returned some days late. Even if B does not answer this message, continued use for some days will not lead to prolongation, as the combination of A's knowledge of B's plans for the machine and A's own explanation concerning the continued use shows that consent cannot be presumed.

The prolongation is seen as an unbroken continuation of the original lease period. This means that there is an intermediate period where continued use will be treated as non-performance of the lessee's obligations if the lease period is not prolonged, but as ordinary use if prolongation takes effect.

The continued use of the goods is based on the same contract as the former use. It is not a new contract. This also implies that the terms of the contract are unchanged, except for the terms concerning the lease period (and an exception which will be explained in the following paragraphs). The rent to be paid depends on the contract. Where the rent is set at a fixed amount per week, month etc., the same amount must be paid after prolongation. In other cases there may be a regulation clause, e.g. giving the parties a right to index regulation each year. Such a clause will also be effective after prolongation.

The effect on third parties will be the same as the effect of an expressly agreed prolongation. Whether, for example, a security provider is released at the end of the original lease period will depend on the terms of that security provider's undertaking, as interpreted in accordance with the normal rules on interpretation.

None of the above is specific to contracts for the lease of goods.

C. Special rule for case where the cost of the goods is already amortised.

Under some contracts for the lease of goods, the rent is calculated so as to take into account the amortisation of the cost of the goods during the agreed lease period. These contracts are often three-party transactions involving a lessor, a lessee and a supplier of goods, where the lessor is a financial institution. However, the rent may also be calculated in this way in some two-party contracts. The contract may stipulate that the lessee has an option to buy the goods at the end of the lease period or a right to prolong the lease period at a substantially reduced rent. Where prolongation – or the terms of such prolongation – is not regulated by the individual contract, the rent for the prolonged lease period should not be unreasonable, given the amount already paid. In most cases this implies a substantial reduction in rent if the whole cost of the goods has already been paid. This rule is expressed in paragraph (1) of the present Article. It is mandatory, in the sense that it cannot be derogated from to the detriment of a consumer in a consumer contract for lease (paragraph (2).

NOTES

I. Overview

1. Several European legal systems have provisions on tacit prolongation or renewal of a lease. The common feature is that continued use of the goods without objection from the lessor leads to a prolonged or new lease period without a need for explicit agreement. The details vary, concerning both the requisites for and the effects of prolongation.
2. Provisions on prolongation or renewal, in most cases for an indefinite period, where the use continues without objection from the lessor can be summarised as follows: AUSTRIAN CC § 1114 (tacit renewal if use continues without objection); BELGIAN

CC art. 1738 (wording changed 1991, now only immovable property); DUTCH CC art. 7:230 (prolongation for an indefinite period in case of continued use with (tacit) permission of the lessor); ESTONIAN LOA § 310 (the lessor must object within two weeks after having learnt of the continued use); FRENCH CC art. 1738 (new lease governed by rules on leases not in writing if use continues after a written lease has expired and no notice to quit is given; applicability to movables debated, see (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, nos. 21202 and 21802, fn. 27 and Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contracts spéciaux VIII[14], no. 601); GERMAN CC § 545 (prolonged if neither party protests within two weeks, the lessor's two weeks running from the time of getting knowledge of the continued use; the wording was amended in 2001, but not the substance, Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 545, no. 1); GREEK CC art. 611 (renewal if the lessee continues to use the leased object with the knowledge of and without objection from the lessor); HUNGARIAN CC § 431(2) (lessor must object within fifteen days; no formal requirement, see Gellért (-Besenyei), A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1694); ITALIAN CC art. 1597 (renewal for indefinite period if use continues without objection); LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.481 (ten days, see also art. 6.481 on termination); MALTESE CC art. 1536 (lease renewed for a period corresponding to period for which the rent is agreed, if use continues without objection); POLISH CC art. 674 (presumption of prolongation for indefinite period if use continues with lessor's consent); PORTUGUESE CC art. 1056 (renewal for new period if use continues without objection for one year; only for lease of immovables); SLOVAK CC § 676(2) (court petition for surrender of the goods must be filed by the lessor within thirty days); SLOVENIAN LOA § 615) (new lease if use continues without opposition); SPANISH CC art. 1566 (continued use for 15 days leads to renewal for another fixed period; applicability to leases of movables is debated, see Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 337; Bercovitz, Manual de Derecho Civil, 181, TS 21 February 1985, RAJ 1985, 737); SWISS LOA art. 266 (if a lease for a definite period continues stillschweigend, it becomes a lease for an indefinite period, Honsell, OR-BT[7], 207).

II. The notion of tacit renewal

3. In some countries the rules on tacit prolongation are seen as objective rules, or consequences of law, working independently of the parties' will. This is the situation in GERMAN law. As the prolongation does not depend on the parties' will, a mistake of either party as to the consequences is irrelevant (CC § 119, see for example Palandt (-Weidenkaff), BGB[66], § 545, no. 10). To the same effect, see CZECH CC § 676(2). Tacit renewal (prolongation for an indefinite period) is also an objective rule under HUNGARIAN law.

4. In several countries the behaviour of the parties is deemed to be a declaration of intention, and the provisions on prolongation are then rebuttable presumptions of such will. This can be illustrated by the AUSTRIAN CC § 1114, according to which there is a tacit renewal (stillschweigende Erneuerung) of the lease contract if the use is continued and the lessor does not object. The conduct of the lessor is interpreted as a declaration of contractual intention with certain content (so-called normierte Willenserklärung, OGH 30 August 2002, JBl 2003, 182; see also Stabentheiner, Mietrecht, nos. 80, 26). According to DUTCH law, the prolongation takes place "unless an other intention is shown". If the lessee stays on with the (tacit) permission of the lessor, it is for the lessor to prove that the intention was different. The lessee cannot invoke this legal presumption if the continued use was not known to the lessor or if the lessor protested the continued use (Rueb/Vrolijk/Wijkerslooth-Vinke (-de Vries), Huurrecht, art. 7:230, no. 4). Under ESTONIAN law also, each party's behaviour can be regarded as a declaration of contractual intention (vaikiminsi tahtevaldus). A further illustration is the tacite reconduction found in the FRENCH CC arts. 1738 and 1739 which is regarded as a presumption of the will of the parties (Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, nos. 659 and 665, on the foundations in detail Amar-Layani, D. 1996, Chron., 143 and 144); the simple absence of opposition by the lessor is not sufficient (Cass.civ. 1 February 1949, RTD civ 1950, 72, note Carbonnier). See also on the ITALIAN CC art. 1597, Rescigno (-Giove) , Codice Civile I[5], arts. 1596–1597, no. 2, 1958. In SPANISH law the tacit renewal provision of CC art. 1566 contains neither a presumptive rule nor a rule related to interpretation of the parties' will: in so far as the parties have not impeded the continuance, a mistake of fact or law as to the meaning of that conduct does not matter.

5. The expression relocatio tacita is foreign to ENGLISH law (although tacit relocation is a familiar concept in SCOTTISH law in relation to leases of immovable property). No special rule for the situation of continued use after expiration of the contract can be found in English law. Moreover, there seems to be no case law directly dealing with this situation for contracts on movables (although there is case law on similar situations for leases of land, see Roberts v. Hayward (1828 3 C. & P. 432) – critical remarks Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 2-074, and Western Electric Ltd v. Welsh Development Agency [1983] Q.B. 796). Under special circumstances inactivity can be seen as an offer, although the hurdle in this respect seems to be a high one (Chitty, loc. cit. para. 2-005) and most of the potential cases would probably be seen as a mere breach of the lessee's duty to return the goods, leading to damages for wrongful detention (Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-080: "measure of damages is the full market rate of hire for the whole period of the detention if the hirer has made beneficial use of the chattel"; for a potential remedy on excessive benefits in restitution, see Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 29-145). But nevertheless, the discussion about "silence" or "tacit" reflects to a certain extent the scope of solutions in the Civil Law jurisdictions. Some of the cases of non-return and ongoing use of the leased object by the lessee may be covered by the tort of conversion according to s. 2(2) of the Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977. The ongoing use could be seen as a definite act of conversion. Whether the bailor must demand the return of the goods before being able to rely on the mentioned provision is not clear (Chitty on Contracts II[29], nos. 33-010 ff, fn. 60). For NORWEGIAN law, it has been said that a possible rule on relocatio tacita should not apply to leases of ships, Falkanger, Leie av skib, 423.

III. Tacit prolongation only where the lease is for a definite period?

6. In several jurisdictions, the rules on tacit prolongation apply only for leases for a definite period. This follows explicitly from AUSTRIAN CC § 1114 (Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1114, no. 4), CZECH CC § 676 (cf. Supreme Court 28 Cdo 2253/2003), ESTONIAN LOA § 310, GREEK CC art. 611, HUNGARIAN CC § 431(2), LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.481, SLOVAK CC § 676, SLOVENIAN LOA § 615, SWISS LOA art. 266 (BSK (-R. Weber), OR I[3], art. 255, no. 5).

7. Some provisions exclude tacit prolongation in cases where a notice of termination is given. This will normally mean that there can be no tacit prolongation of leases for an indefinite period, as such leases are ordinarily terminated by notice. See for example BELGIAN CC art. 1739, FRENCH CC art. 1739, SPANISH CC art. 1566. The interpretation of ITALIAN CC art. 1597 is not quite clear in this respect (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], arts. 1596–1597, no. II3). However, if a party who has given notice of termination later has a change of mind, it may follow from general contract law that the parties' conduct is sufficient for the conclusion of a contract (the discussion in ITALIAN law is illustrative, see Cass. 23 August 1990/no. 8621, Giur.it.

1991, I, 1, 692, Cass. 12 August 1988/no. 4936, Giust.civ.Mass. 1988, fasc. 8/9, Rescigno (-Giove), Codice Civile I[5], arts. 1596–1597, no. 2, 1958).

8. In GERMAN jurisprudence and legal literature there is no doubt that CC § 545 is applicable to leases for an indefinite period (BGH 26 March 1980, NJW 1980, 1577, 1578, for the former CC § 568), even where the contractual relationship is brought to an end by extraordinary notice of termination given by the lessor (Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 545, no. 2, Gitter, Gebrauchsüberlassungsverträge, 53, with critical remarks on this point Medicus, Schuldrecht II[11], no. 215). The POLISH CC art. 674 explicitly says that both forms of leases are covered.

IV. Continued use

9. The quality of the continued use leading to tacit prolongation is sometimes discussed. For GERMAN law it is held that it must involve use, not merely a failure to return the goods (Handkommentar-BGB² (-Eckert), § 545, no. 3). Use by a sub-lessee is sufficient (BGH 9 April 1986, NJW-RR 1986, 1020), and tacit prolongation may be the result even when the lessee did not know that the lease period had expired (Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Mietrecht[8], § 545, no. 7). For FRENCH law it is said that the lessee must remain in possession of the object and that use must be continued as if the lease period had not expired (Amar-Layani, D. 1996, Chron., 143 and 144).

10. In many countries the duration of use is specified, either directly or indirectly, in the latter case by specifying a time for the lessor's objection to the use (see note I2). Even if no period is specified, a short delay only in returning the goods may be irrelevant (see for FRENCH law, Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail , no. 662; for GREEK law, Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Antapasis), art. 611, no. 8).

V. Lessor's knowledge of continued use

11. The lessor's knowledge of the continued use may be a prerequisite for tacit prolongation, either directly or indirectly. It may be an indirect condition of prolongation in so far as the lessor, to avoid prolongation, must object within a certain time after learning of the use (see for example ESTONIAN LOA § 310, GERMAN CC § 545, GREEK CC art. 611; see also for DUTCH law, note II4). In SPANISH law acquiescence is needed (CC art. 1566), but it has been held, though not unanimously, that there is a presumption of acquiescence to prolongation if the lessor does not request return of the goods (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 337). In PORTUGUESE law, the requirement is "no opposition" from the lessor (CC art. 1056). According to the POLISH CC art. 674, the lessor's consent (direct or indirect) is a prerequisite for the presumption of prolongation. In other provisions, where knowledge is not mentioned (see for example CZECH CC § 676, FRENCH CC art. 1738, HUNGARIAN CC § 431, SLOVAK CC § 676), the solution is not obvious. It is sometimes held that knowledge is requisite (see for FRENCH law, Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 663; for HUNGARIAN law, the time limit of fifteen day for objections to a prolongation has been regarded as a prescription period, cf. Gellért (-Besenyei), A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1694, probably implying a requisite of knowledge).

VI. Objection to prolongation

12. All systems seem to allow a party to prevent prolongation by objecting to the continued use or indicating in some other way that prolongation or renewal is not desired. A court petition is required according to the SLOVAK CC § 676(2), but in most cases no formalities are required. The question of when the objection must be expressed is sometimes discussed. For AUSTRIAN law it is held that there must be a close link in time between the objection and the expiry of the lease period (OGH 9 October 1986, JBl 1987, 659 note Böhm, Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1114, no. 4). The objection can, however, be expressed even before the lease period expires (OGH 15 December 1992, JBl 1993, 587, note Watzl: requesting return two months before expiry still fulfils the stated close link in time). The situation in GERMAN law is similar (see Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 545, no. 8). For GREEK law it has been maintained that the objection must be made within a reasonable time after the expiry of the lease period (Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 28, no. 12; cf. Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Antapasis), art. 611, no. 13b). Under HUNGARIAN law, the objection must be made within fifteen days of expiry of the lease period, HUNGARIAN CC § 431 (2).

VII. New lease period for a definite or indefinite period

13. In some countries, tacit prolongation leads to a new definite lease period, although not necessarily of the same length as the expired period. The interpretation of AUSTRIAN CC § 1115 is that the lease is prolonged for a new definite period of the same length as the period for which the rent is calculated (Stabentheiner, Mietrecht, no. 81, OGH 9 April 1992, JBl 1993, 584, Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1115, no. 2, Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III[2], no. 8/66). Essentially the same solution is found in ITALIAN CC arts. 1597 and 1574; MALTESE CC arts. 1536 and 1532 and SPANISH CC. According to the CZECH CC § 676(2), the new period is of the same length as the former period, but leases for more than one year are prolonged only for one year. The rule is the same under SLOVAK law, CC § 676(2), (Svoboda (-Fíger), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, arts. 676, 620).

14. The most common solution seems to be a prolongation or renewal for an indefinite period, whether this is expressed positively in the provisions (see note II2) or not (as in FRENCH law, see Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 671, with further references; the rule is the same in ESTONIAN law).

VIII. Other terms of the contract

15. When the consequences for other terms of the contract are dealt with at all, the common view seems to be that these terms remain unchanged: AUSTRIAN CC § 1115 (Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1115, no. 1: except parts having no direct connection with the lease contract); DUTCH CC art. 7:230 (as a consequence of the prolongation); FRENCH CC art. 1738 (Cass.soc. 29 January 1959, Bull.civ. 1959.IV., no. 135, except for clauses occasionnelles, see Cass.civ. 15 June 1960, Bull.civ. 1960.III, no. 232); GERMAN CC § 545 (BGH 29 April 2002, NJW 2002, 2170, 2171); GREEK CC art. 611 (Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Antapasis), art. 611, no. 17; CA Athens 1548/85 EllDik 26, 710); ITALIAN CC art. 1597; MALTESE CC art. 1536; SLOVAK CC § 676; SLOVENIAN LOA § 615. For POLISH law, see Bieniek (-Ciepła), Komentarz do Kodeksu Cywilnego, 258.

16. It is sometimes said explicitly that a guarantee from a third party is not extended to cover the prolonged lease period: FRENCH CC art. 1740 (guarantee to be distinguished from joint responsibility, Cass.civ. 28 October 1889, D.P. 1899.1, 129); ITALIAN CC art. 1598; MALTESE CC art. 1538; SLOVENIAN LOA § 615; SPANISH CC art. 1567; likewise for GERMAN law, Staudinger (-Emmerich), BGB (2006), § 545, no. 16 and for GREEK law Antapasis, art. 611, no. 18.

CHAPTER 3: OBLIGATIONS OF THE LESSOR

IV.B.–3:101: Availability of the goods

(1) The lessor must make the goods available for the lessee's use at the start of the lease period and at the place determined by III.–2:101 (Place of performance).

(2) Notwithstanding the rule in the previous paragraph, the lessor must make the goods available for the lessee's use at the lessee's place of business or, as the case may be, at the lessee's habitual residence if the lessor, on the specifications of the lessee, acquires the goods from a supplier selected by the lessee.

(3) The lessor must ensure that the goods remain available for the lessee's use throughout the lease period, free from any right or reasonably based claim of a third party which prevents or is otherwise likely to interfere with the lessee's use of the goods in accordance with the contract.

(4) The lessor's obligations when the goods are lost or damaged during the lease period are regulated by IV.B.–3:104 (Conformity of the goods during the lease period).

COMMENTS

A. General

Characteristic obligations. Under a lease contract, the lessor makes goods available temporarily for the lessee's use against remuneration. The lessee's use typically implies physical control of the goods. Further, the goods must normally be returned to the lessor at the end of the lease period. As the contract is made for a period of time, questions arise concerning maintenance of the goods and repairs during this period. To the extent that the goods are not to deteriorate, the obligation to maintain and repair the goods must be borne by one of the parties or distributed between them. All this means that the lessor typically has obligations concerning (1) the availability of the goods at the start of the lease period, (2) the availability of the goods during the lease period, (3) the conformity of the goods at the start of the lease period, (4) the conformity of the goods during the lease period to the extent that this is not a part of the lessee's obligations, and (5) the return of the goods at the end of the lease period. In the present Article, availability of the goods at the start of the lease period and during the lease period are dealt with.

B. Time of performance

Start of the lease period. The lessor must make the goods available at the start of the lease period. The time at which the lease period starts may be determined from IV.B.–2:101 (Start of lease period). In the situations dealt with in paragraph (1) of that Article the lease period starts even if the goods are not available to the lessee at the relevant point in time, or the lessee has not accepted the goods. These are questions of non-performance of the lessor's or the lessee's obligations. Where the lessee has taken control of the goods earlier than the time that would follow from IV.B.–2:101 paragraph (1), the lease period starts on acceptance of the goods (see paragraph (2) of that Article).

C. Place of performance

Reference made to general rules. The first paragraph of the present Article refers to III.–2:101 (Place of performance). This reference is made only for clarity's sake.

Place of performance in lease contracts. The place of performance is often agreed upon expressly by the parties or can be determined from the agreed terms. If this is not the case, it is stated in III.–2:101 (Place of performance) that the place of performance should be the debtor's – that is the lessor's – place of business at the time of conclusion of the contract. If the lessor has more than one place of business, performance is to take place at the one that "has the closest relationship to the obligation". In lease contracts, the relevant place of business will often be the place where it is most convenient for the lessee to pick up the goods, provided that the lessor's business at that place includes leasing activities.

> A lessee orders by telephone a car to be leased for one week in Rome. The lessor has several places of business in Rome, and the car is ordered through a general office serving all these places of business. If the lessee e.g. arrives in Rome by aeroplane, and this is made known to the lessor, one may presume that the relevant place of business is the one at the airport of arrival. If the lessee, for example, is resident in Rome, one may presume that the relevant place of business is the one located nearest the habitual residence of the lessee.

Goods acquired from a supplier selected by the lessee. The rule in paragraph (2) applies to situations in which the lessor acquires the goods on the lessee's specifications from a supplier selected by the lessee. Typically, these are contracts of a kind often referred to as "financial leases". The goods are normally not brought to the lessor's place at all in these situations, and the general rule in III.–2:101 (Place of performance) would not be the best one. The parties may agree that the goods are made available for the lessee at the supplier's place. However, as the default rules of this Part of Book IV deal only with the contractual relationship between lessor and lessee, the fall-back rule for these contracts should be that the goods are made available at the lessee's place of business.

D. Availability of the goods

Availability at the start of the lease period. Normally, the contract requires that the lessee obtain physical control of the leased goods. The lessor must do what is needed to enable the lessee to obtain such control and the lessee must co-operate by accepting the goods. In this respect there is a parallel to contracts for the sale of goods. A simple handing over of the goods is illustrative: the lessor offers the goods and the lessee accepts them at once. Control over the goods may also be transferred by giving the lessee a key or a code; the goods may be made available by the lessor at some agreed place for the lessee to pick up; the goods may be transported by an independent carrier who is instructed to deliver the goods to the lessee, perhaps against documents made available by the lessor; etc. As use of the goods is the purpose of the lease contract, and as the lessor will still be the owner of the goods, at least during the lease period, there is no need to regulate situations where the goods are to remain in the hands of the lessor. It could be, however, that the lessee already has physical control over the goods at the start of the lease period, as is occasionally the case in a sale.

Acceptance by employees etc. The goods may be accepted by someone on behalf of the lessee, typically by the lessee's employees. Depending on the agreement and the circumstances, the goods must also be regarded as made available for the lessee where they are given directly to a sub-lessee. It has not been found necessary to regulate explicitly this special situation.

Availability during the lease period. The lessor's obligations also include keeping the goods available for the lessee's use throughout the lease period. This normally implies that it will amount to non-performance if the lessor makes use of the goods for the lessor's own purposes or lets third parties use the goods if such use hinders the lessee's use in accordance with the contract. Further, it will be non-performance if the lessor sells or otherwise disposes of the goods if such disposition collides with the lessee's use. Where the rights of the lessor's creditors affect the lessee's use, this also amounts to non-performance by the lessor. These observations relate to the contract between lessor and lessee. The extent to which the lessee's rights have priority over creditors' and other third parties' rights in the goods will be commented upon in Chapter 7.

E. "Risk"

Availability and conformity. Normally, the lessor has not only an obligation to keep the goods available for the lessee, in the sense that the lessor's dispositions and personal use of the goods must not interfere with the lessee's use according to the contract (cf. the preceding paragraph), but also an obligation to keep the goods in conformity with the contract by performing maintenance and repairs. The latter obligation is regulated by IV.B.–3:104 (Conformity of the goods during the lease period). This obligation includes repair of goods that are damaged by chance. If the damage is total – the goods are "lost" – it may be that the lessee has no right to enforce performance, cf. III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations), but other remedies for non-performance may still be available. Theft of the goods should be dealt with in the same way as total loss; theft is not a question of a third party's right in the goods. One could ask if the goods are "available" to the lessee if they are totally damaged or lost. To make it clear that damage to or loss of the goods is dealt with as a question of non-conformity and not as a question of availability, a reference is made in the fourth paragraph of the present Article to IV.B.–3:104. The difference is important in particular in contracts where the lessee has the full burden of maintenance and repairs, by contract or by law. In such contracts, damage or loss will not lead to non-performance of the lessor's obligation to keep the goods in conformity with the contract, while interference with the lessee's use caused by third party rights or by the lessor's dispositions or personal use of the goods is still non-performance of the obligation to keep the goods available.

No passing of risk. For sales, there are rules on "passing of risk", including an explanation of "risk" in IV.A.–5:101 (Effect of passing of risk): "Loss of, or damage to, the goods after the risk has passed to the buyer does not discharge the buyer from the obligation to pay the price, unless the loss or damage is due to an act or omission of the seller." Corresponding rules are not needed for lease contracts. Damage to or loss of the goods is dealt with as a question of non-conformity, cf. the preceding paragraph. It would be incongruous to regulate the consequences for rent payment independently of other remedies for non-performance. See also Comment B to IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract) on "risk" and the lessee's obligation to return the goods.

F. Non-availability due to need for repairs by lessor etc.

No exception for repairs etc. The lessor is in many cases obliged to carry out repairs and maintenance work on the goods during the lease period. The lessor also has a right to perform certain actions with regard to the goods, whether or not this is part of the lessor's obligation. The lessee's obligation to tolerate such measures is regulated in IV.B.–5:108 (Repairs and inspections of the lessor). The lessor's work on the goods may affect the lessee's use, and the goods may even be totally unavailable for the lessee while the work takes place. This is non-performance of the lessor's obligation to keep the goods available for the lessee's use. At first sight this can seem inconsequent: actions that the lessor has a right to take, result in non-performance, i.e. non-availability. The explanation is found in the definition of "non-performance". "Non-performance" covers any failure to perform, for whatever cause. However, the remedies available to the lessee will vary according to the cause of the non-performance. If repairs are necessary due to non-performance of the lessee's obligations, e.g. the obligation of care, the lessee cannot seek a remedy in the courts with regard to the consequent suspension of availability, cf. III.–3:101 (Remedies available) paragraph (3) (creditor may not resort to remedies "to the extent that the creditor caused the debtor's non-performance "). If, on the other hand, the non-availability is made necessary for other reasons, the lessee has a right to rent reduction, withholding of rent, damages as the case may be, and even termination should the non-performance be fundamental. Ordinary maintenance by the lessor, typically made necessary by accidents or normal use, will give the lessee a right to rent reduction – a remedy in line with the purpose of balancing the performances of the parties – but not to damages, as these measures cannot be avoided.

A leased washing machine breaks down and must be taken to the lessor's premises to be repaired. The repairs take one week. The washing machine is old and the breakdown was caused by normal deterioration. The lessee may claim a reduction in the rent for one week but not damages, as the repairs could not be avoided.

Illustration 3
The facts are the same as in Illustration 2, except that the work takes three weeks because the lessor carelessly damaged other parts of the machine while repairing it. The lessee may claim a reduction in the rent for three weeks and damages covering expenses for the use of launderettes during the two last weeks.

Illustration 4
The facts are the same as in Illustration 2, except that the breakdown was caused by the lessee's careless use of the machine. No remedies are available to the lessee with regard to the unavailability of the machine.

G. Third parties' rights or claims

Rights or claims that interfere with the lessee's use. The lessee's use must not be affected by third parties' rights. Some third party rights will not affect the lessee's use of the goods at all. A third party's security right will typically not affect the use as long as the lessor is not in a position where the security right becomes effective. This is different in contracts for sale, where the buyer does not have to tolerate any rights of this kind. If the lessor was not the owner of the goods and had no right to enter into a lease contract, the true owner's right will typically affect the lessee's use. Whether a later sale or a second lease of the same goods will affect the lessee's use, depends on the rules on priority of the lessee's rights over third parties' rights. To what extent the lessee must accept transfer of ownership, when the use is not affected, is dealt with in IV.B.–7:101 (Change in ownership and substitution of lessor).

Rights or claims that are likely to interfere with the lessee's use. The existence of a third party right that is likely to interfere with the lessee's use amounts to non-performance by the lessor. The lessee does not have to wait until the goods are in fact taken away. A security right can create a threat to the lessee's use if the lessor becomes insolvent or the creditors have taken steps to utilise the security right. Also a third party claim that is contested by the lessor may interfere with or threaten to interfere with the lessee's use. It will depend on the circumstances whether this kind of claim is sufficiently grounded to create a threat to the lessee's use. It must be "reasonably based". Allegations that are clearly unjustified are irrelevant. The lessee should not, however, be obliged to tolerate being involved in disputes between the lessor and third parties.

H. Contract and default rules

Non-mandatory rules. The parties may derogate from the provisions of the present Chapter unless otherwise provided. In normal situations the parties agree amongst themselves the basic elements of the contract: which object is to be leased, for how long and at what price. Often the parties also specify the required quantity and quality of the goods, where and when the goods are to be delivered, the distribution of obligations concerning maintenance and repairs etc. The rules of the present Chapter are merely supplementary in so far as they do not apply to issues sufficiently regulated by the parties. At the same time the rules of the present Chapter are objective rules applicable to the contract for lease – in the supplementary fashion just described – without any act of inclusion or acceptance and independently of the parties' will.

Consumer leases. Consumer protection rules may not normally be derogated from by the parties to the detriment of the consumer. On the other hand, the parties are in most cases free to decide whether or not to enter into a contract and to agree on what is to be leased, when, for how long and at what price, cf. Comment A to IV.B.–1:102 (Consumer contract for the lease of goods). It is specified in IV.B.–1:103 (Limits on derogation from conformity rights in a consumer contract for lease), however, that the parties may not describe the goods in a way that it is, in real terms, a derogation from the lessor's obligation to ensure that the goods conform to the contract. See Comments to that Article.

I. Overview of the lessor's obligations

1. The structure of legislation on contracts for lease varies among the jurisdictions. Sometimes the obligations of the lessor – or of both parties – are enumerated in general provisions, in many cases in "introductory" provisions. In other jurisdictions there is no such overview. The extent to which the obligations of the lessor are divided into separate obligations or treated more or less as one overarching obligation (making the goods available for the lessee's use) also varies. The difference between the GERMAN and the FRENCH Civil Codes is illustrative. The highest level of abstraction is found in the GERMAN CC: the main obligation is to allow use of the goods; making the goods available and maintaining them are regarded as the means of fulfilling this obligation (CC § 535(1) sent. 1). The lessor is obliged to allow the lessee the use of the leased goods during the lease period (Mietzeit). Therefore the lessor has to hand over the leased goods (Gebrauchsüberlassungspflicht), may not disturb the agreed use and must prevent disturbance from third parties, in so far as this is possible and reasonable (Gebrauchserhaltungspflicht, see Larenz and Canaris, Schuldrecht II(1)[13], § 48, no. II, 219; Brox and Walker, Schuldrecht BT[31], § 11, no. 1). Sentence 2 of CC § 535(1) specifies that the lessor has to turn the leased goods over to the lessee in a state suitable for the agreed use and must maintain the goods in that state during the lease period (Instandhaltungspflicht; for an overview of the principal obligations of the lessor see for example Oetker and Maultzsch, Vertragliche Schuldverhältnisse[2], 278). Sentence 3 of the same provision mentions the obligation of the lessor to bear costs and charges connected with the leased goods, which is regarded as a repetition of the obligation to allow the agreed use (Schmidt-Futterer (-Eisenschmid), Mietrecht[9], § 535, no. 570) or as clarification of the idea that the contract for lease does not lead to a new distribution of these costs (Blank and Börstinghaus, Miete[2], § 535, no. 376). On the other hand, the FRENCH CC art. 1719 enumerates the principal obligations of the lessor (the obligations are specified in arts. 1720–1727): to deliver the leased goods to the lessee (no. 1), to maintain the leased goods in a state fit for the use for which the have been leased (no. 2), to secure a peaceful enjoyment by the lessee for the duration of the lease (no. 3; a special provision for plantations is found in no. 4). This enumeration follows a chronological order (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21160, Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], 427). The enumeration has been described as deceptive in two ways: first, it is not complete (missing the guarantees and the security); second, it suggests that the obligations are parallel and independent of each other. In reality there is only one essential obligation of the lessor: to ensure that the lessee has the peaceful enjoyment of the goods. All other obligations can be regarded as being just different means of contributing to this objective (cf. Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], no. 334-3).

II. Obligation to make the goods available (transfer of physical control)

2. To the extent that the issue is regulated or discussed in national law, it seems to be generally agreed that making the goods available implies giving the lessee physical control over the goods. In AUSTRIAN law (CC § 1096), the lessor has to hand over the leased goods, together with accessories, to the physical possession (physischer Besitz) of the lessee at the beginning of the lease relationship (Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III[2], no. 8/19, Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I[3], § 1096, no. 1, 3). Under DUTCH CC art. 7:203, the goods must be put at the lessee's disposal; physical control is not required (Rueb/Vrolijk/Wijkerslooth-Vinke (-Huydecooper) , Huurrecht, art. 7:203, no. 4). According to the ESTONIAN LOA § 276(1), the lessor is required to deliver the goods, together with accessories, to the lessee, i.e. to transfer the possession of the goods, which means physical control of the goods or the means to enable control, cf. Law of Property Act arts. 33(2) and 36. In FRENCH law, the lessor has to put the goods at the disposal of the lessee (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21161: possession physique). This act of putting at disposal is fundamental and cannot be excluded by contract, because it is imposed by the nature of the contract for lease (Cass.civ. 11 October 1989, Bull.civ. 1989.I, no. 317). The goods must be free of any other occupation (Cass.civ. 16 January 1980, Bull.civ. 1980.III, no. 13), but it may be stipulated that the lessee has to suffer certain inconveniencies without a remedy (Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], no. 334-4). The lessor has to deliver accessories which are necessary for normal use (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21162) and has to bear the costs of delivery (loc. cit. 653). In GERMANY, the lessor is obliged to ensure that the lessee has the use of the leased goods; thus the lessor must leave or hand over the leased goods to the lessee. In general it is not clear if this demands transfer of possession in the sense of CC § 854 (Besitzverschaffung, BGH 22 October 1975, BGHZ 65, 137, 139 ff: no prerequisite in general, making accessible is sufficient). For movables, the "handing over" demands in case of doubt the physical handing over, that is unmittelbarer Besitz, but other agreements are possible (Emmerich and Sonnenschein, (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 535, no. 7). Under GREEK law the lessor is obliged to provide the lessee with the use of the leased object (CC art. 574) and to hand it over to the lessee in a condition fit for the agreed use (CC art. 575); it suffices that the leased goods become available to the lessee (Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), art. 575, no. 1). In HUNGARIAN law, according to the definition of a contract for lease in CC § 423, the lessor is obliged to provide the lessee with the use of the leased object. Pursuant to CC § 424 (2), the lessor must ensure that the leased object is free from any third party right that would prevent or limit the lessee's use of it. In ITALIAN law, as a general rule, the obligation of the lessor to make the goods available (CC art. 1575 no. 1 - consegnare the leased goods to the lessee) presupposes an act on the part of the lessor that comprises all acts, material and judicial, which are necessary for the commencement of use by the lessee. If the details of this obligation are not stipulated by the contract, default rules apply (CC arts. 1182, 1183). Together with the goods, accessories must also be delivered (Cass. 61/229). If the goods are in the detenzione of a third person, the lessor is obliged to get detenzione and transfer it to the lessee (Cass. 55/2181). The provision in CC art. 1575 no. 1 does not apply to financial leasing contracts which stipulate that the supplier is to make the goods available (see Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1575, no. I). See also CZECH CC § 664; HUNGARIAN CC § 423; LATVIAN CC art. 2130; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.483(1); MALTESE CC art. 1539; POLISH CC art. 662(1) (lessor must transfer the goods in a suitable condition; the lessor should also make available all accessories required for normal use of the leased goods, Pietrzykowski, Kodeks cywilny II[4], art. 662, Nb. 1, 207); PORTUGUESE CC art. 1031 lit. a; SLOVAK CC § 664 (obligation to make the goods, together with accessories, available in a condition fit for the agreed use or normal use; Svoboda (-Górász), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, arts. 664, 611). SLOVENIAN LOA § 588; SPANISH CC art. 1554 no. 1; SWISS LOA art. 256(1).

III. Time of performance

3. See Notes to IV.B.–2:101 (Start of lease period).

IV. Place of performance

4. It seems that national legislation normally has no separate provisions on the place where leased goods should be made available. One explanation could be that legislators have mainly been preoccupied with immovables (where the place is no problem). General rules may apply, see CZECH CC § 567(1) (place of business or residence of the debtor); ESTONIAN LOA § 85(1) (agreed place, or place determined by nature of the contract, or the place where the goods are at the conclusion of the contract); GREEK CC art. 320 (agreed place, place determined by circumstances, otherwise the debtor's place); ITALIAN CC art. 1182 (place where the goods are when obligation arises); or POLISH CC art. 454 (debtor's place).

V. Availability during the lease period

5. In AUSTRIAN law, the lessor must make the goods available for the lessee's use in accordance with the contract and ensure that they remain available for such use; this obligation is seen as a unity and CC § 1096 contains parts of it (Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1096, no. 1). According to § 1096(1) sent. 1, the lessor must not interfere with the lessee's agreed use or enjoyment of the leased goods; the lessor must allow the agreed use and abstain from all activities which the lessee need not tolerate; the lessor must perform all acts necessary to ensure that the lessee has the use of the goods (Rummel, loc. cit. no. 7). The lessor must prevent interference with the agreed use originating from third persons (OGH 20 May 1970, JBl 1970, 523; Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III[2], no. 8/21). Third parties must not be given rights that are likely to interfere with the lessee's use. The lessor must take the steps necessary to avoid interference by third persons, even if this involves financial burdens for the lessor (Rummel, loc. cit. no. 9). In DUTCH law, the obligation to make the object available is likewise combined with an obligation to leave it at the disposal of the lessee for the duration of the contract (DUTCH CC art. 7:203).

6. Under DANISH law, the lessor has an obligation to maintain the goods and to ensure that third parties' rights do not interfere with the lessee's use (Gade, Finansiel leasing, 113–125).

7. According to the ESTONIAN LOA § 276(1), the lessor must deliver the goods in a condition suitable for contractual use and ensure that the goods are maintained in such condition throughout the lease period. This means that the goods must have the characteristics agreed upon and be free from defects that restrict or preclude their use during the lease period. The lessor must, upon demand, remove defects or obstacles or take over a dispute with a third party, except for defects and obstacles for which the lessee is responsible and which must be removed at the lessee's cost, LOA § 278.

8. According to the FRENCH CC art. 1719 no. 3, the lessor is obliged to ensure the lessee's peaceful enjoyment of the goods for the duration of the lease. Normally this obligation is split up into two components (some authors include a third component: the guarantee of the lessor against hidden defects, see Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 234). The first component is that the lessor must abstain from acts which interfere with the lessee's use (Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], no. 336). This is regarded as an obligation not to do (Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civils et commerciaux[7], no. 496) or as a prolongation of the obligation to deliver (loc. cit. 497), and constitutes the dynamic element of a lease, an essential obligation of the contract (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21164). The second element concerns protection against interference from third persons (arts. 1725 to 1727). If factual interference, without a claim to have a right to the leased goods, makes the lessee's use impossible, this is covered by the "guarantee" of the lessor (Bénabent, loc. cit.; Groslière, loc. cit. no. 297; Huet, Contrats spéciaux, nos. 21164, 660: to assure enjoyment is an obligation of result). Where the lessee's use has been (partially) disturbed by an action relating to ownership (legal problems), the lessee is entitled to a proportionate reduction in rent, if the lessor has been notified of the interference and of the impediment (art. 1726; but in most cases simple legal problems do not lead to any loss for the lessee, see Groslière, loc. cit. no. 304). The lessee may withdraw from a legal action by third parties claiming rights in the goods, by naming the lessor and making the lessor a party to the action (art. 1727). Another specification of quiet enjoyment is mentioned in art. 1723: the lessor may not change the form or the destination of the leased object (see Groslière, loc. cit. nos. 264 ff). For BELGIAN law, see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I[2], nos. 619 ff.

9. In the GERMAN CC, the principal obligation of the lessor is found in § 535(1) 1. sent.: the lessor is obliged to grant the lessee the use of the leased goods during the lease period. This is not merely an obligation to hand over and to leave the goods to the lessee (MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB[4], § 535, no. 71); ensuring use of the goods goes beyond this. The lessor must ensure the contractually agreed use for the lessee during the whole lease period (Schmidt-Futterer (-Eisenschmid), Mietrecht[9], § 535, no. 1). This obligation implies that the lessor is obliged to tolerate the contractually agreed use by the lessee and to prevent loss or disturbance of the use caused by third persons (Oetker and Maultzsch, Vertragliche Schuldverhältnisse[2], 279 ff, Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 535, no. 13).

10. In GREEK law the lessor is obliged to allow the lessee to use the leased goods for the whole term of the lease (CC art. 574). This obligation entails not only positive action but also omissions on the part of the lessor (e.g. abstaining from acts that would disturb the lessee's use and preventing third parties from disturbing such use) (Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 24, no. 5; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 195). Greek law – which distinguishes between factual defects (CC art. 576(1)), agreed qualities (CC art. 576(2)) and legal defects (CC art. 583) – classifies third party claims under legal defects. More specifically, a legal defect exists when the stipulated use of the leased object is either entirely or partially taken away from the lessee through the right of a third party. Contrary to contracts for sale (CC art. 514), the notion of legal defect in the contract for lease presupposes that the object is taken away from the lessee (CC art. 583); the mere existence of a third party right does not suffice if it does not affect the use of the leased object. The coming danger of the object being taken away does not suffice either (Ca Thessaloniki 570/1966 Arm 21, 116). Only when third party rights impede the stipulated use are they considered to be legal defects of the leased goods (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[2], § 27 Γ I; Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 25 nos. 12–13; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 220–221; Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), art. 583, no. 2).

11. According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1575 no. 3 the lessor is obliged to guarantee the lessee's peaceful enjoyment during the lease period. Factual and legal interferences with use are distinguished (CC art. 1585). The lessee has to inform the lessor promptly of any claim from third parties; the lessor must take over litigation, and the lessee is discharged from the proceedings by indicating the identity of the lessor (art. 1586); see Rescigno (-Giove), Codice Civil I[5], arts. 1585 and 1586, 1947 ff.

12. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1554 no. 3 the lessor is obliged to ensure the lessee's quiet enjoyment of the goods during the whole period of the contract (Albaladejo, Derecho Civil, II[12], 639). This has been characterised as the principal obligation of the lessor (Bercovitz, Manual de Derecho Civil, 175). The lessor may not change the form of the goods (art. 1557) and has to abstain from all conduct which interferes with the lessee's possession. With regard to acts of third persons, Spanish law also distinguishes between factual and legal interferences. According to art. 1559 the lessee is obliged to inform the lessor about any interference. The lessor is not responsible for mere factual interference with use by third persons (art. 1560); but the lessee has a direct action against the disturber (art. 446). It is not regarded as factual interference if a third person has acted by virtue of a corresponding right (art. 1561(2)). See further Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 335.

13. Under SWEDISH law, the common view seems to be that the lessor has an obligation to maintain the goods, even where the goods are damaged without fault on the side of the lessor, but this view is challenged by Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 194–197. The lessor has no such obligation if the goods are lost or become totally damaged. The lessor must not alienate the goods without reserving the lessee's right. See Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 194–197 with further references.

14. In SWISS law, the lessor has an obligation to maintain the goods, LOA art. 256. This obligation implies that the lessor must ensure the usability of the goods during the whole lease period (BSK (-R. Weber), OR I[3], art. 256, no. 2). Further, the lessor must abstain from interfering with the use and must prevent interference by third parties where appropriate (BSK (-R. Weber), OR I[3], art. 256, no. 1). If a third person has sued the lessee, the lessee can demand that the lessor take over the proceedings (art. 259a); the lessor is correspondingly obliged to do so.

15. According to the POLISH CC art. 662, the lessor must sustain the goods in a condition suitable for use throughout the lease period. The lessor is liable for legal interferences by third parties, but not factual interference.

16. According to the SLOVAK CC § 664, the lessor must maintain the leased goods in the state agreed by the parties or in a state allowing the normal use of the goods. This obligation relates to the quality as well as to the quantity of the leased goods (Svoboda (-Górász), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, art. 664, 611). Another aspect of the lessor's obligation is that the lessee is to be protected against disturbances by third persons, and this includes an obligation on the lessor to take necessary legal steps if a third person vindicates rights over the leased thing incompatible with the lessee's rights (CC § 684).

17. Under UNITED KINGDOM law, the obligation to ensure the availability of leased goods throughout the lease period is regulated by the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982. In ENGLAND, WALES and NORTHERN IRELAND, s. 7(2) implies into all contracts for the hire of goods a warranty that the lessee will enjoy "quiet possession" of the goods for the period of hire. An exception is however made for "disturbance" of quiet possession by the lessor, or by a third party with a charge or encumbrance over the goods made known to the lessee prior to conclusion of the contract. Non-performance with regard to this implied warranty gives the lessee the right to damages reflecting the extent of the injury to the lessee's (possessory) interest in the goods and may be set off in diminution or extinction of the rent payments due (Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-073). Further, if the lessor wrongfully retakes possession of the goods, the lessee may seek the exercise of the court's discretion to order specific delivery of the goods (s. 3 of the Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977). It will generally not give the lessee a right to terminate the lease (see Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-074 and Treitel, The Law of Contract[11], 804–805 more generally). It should be noted that the law also imposes an implied condition that the lessor holds the right to transfer possession of the goods for the period of the lease (Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 s. 7(1)). Liability for non-performance of obligations implied by law may be excluded or restricted by a party acting in the course of business (Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 s. 1(3)) only in so far as the exclusion or restriction fulfils the requirement of reasonableness (Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 s. 7(4)). Section 11H(1) and (2) of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 contain the corresponding provisions concerning title and "quiet possession" in SCOTLAND. In this case however the implied term as to quiet possession is not classified as a warranty or a condition, the distinction bearing a different meaning under Scottish law. Attempts to exclude or restrict liability for non-performance of the statutory obligations to ensure quiet possession have effect only in so far as incorporation of such terms is fair and reasonable (Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 s. 21(1)(b)). In IRELAND, the corresponding implied warranty (which covers charges and encumbrances, as well as quiet possession) is to be found in s. 88 of the Consumer Credit Act 1995. Further, a term attempting to exempt the agreement from these implied provisions is void (s. 79(2)).

IV.B.–3:102: Conformity with the contract at the start of the lease period

(1) The lessor must ensure that the goods conform with the contract at the start of the lease period.

(2) The goods do not conform with the contract unless they:

(a) are of the quantity, quality and description required by the terms agreed by the parties;

(b) are contained or packaged in the manner required by the terms agreed by the parties;

(c) are supplied along with any accessories, installation instructions or other instructions required by the terms agreed by the parties; and

(d) comply with the following Article .

A. Conformity at the start of and throughout the lease period

Conformity. The condition of the goods regarding quality and quantity is normally a crucial issue in any lease contract. The lessee's use of the goods and the benefits gained by this use depend heavily on the condition of the goods. The word "conformity", together with its antonym "lack of conformity", is used to denote the relationship between the lessee's justified expectations under the contract and the factual state of the goods. The condition of the goods, in terms of both quality and quantity, can be determined by the parties in their individual agreement. Default rules on conformity of the goods at the start of the lease period are found in the present and the following Article. The rules are parallel to the rules for contracts for sale (Book IV.A.).

Distinguishing conformity at the start of the lease period and during the lease period. The lessor typically has obligations concerning the condition of the goods both at the start of the lease period and during the lease period. This is a significant difference in comparison with sales contracts, where conformity as a rule is established upon delivery (the time when risk passes). One might ask whether it is necessary to distinguish between the lessor's obligation concerning conformity at the start of the lease period and the obligation concerning conformity during the lease period. A distinction should be made for at least two reasons. First, the requirements concerning the condition of the goods are normally not exactly the same during the lease period as they are at the start of the lease period. This is obvious in contracts where the obligation to repair and maintain the goods is shared between the parties. Even where the lessor is obliged to keep the goods in the original condition throughout the lease period, the lessee must normally tolerate some discrepancies due to ordinary wear and tear. Second, the remedies for non-performance can be influenced by differences in factual situations: during the lease period it is quite possible that non-conformity is caused by factors beyond the lessor's control and even by the lessee's own non-performance.

B. Conformity at the start of the lease period

Individual agreement and default rules. The parties normally agree at least on the basic requirements of quantity and quality of the leased goods. In some cases the goods are described in great detail, either directly in one or more contract documents or by referring to certain technical standards etc. In other cases the goods are not described at all beyond the identification of a certain thing or of goods of a certain kind. It may, however, be possible to determine the quantity and quality of the goods to some extent by taking into consideration the lessor's knowledge of the lessee's intended use of the goods and other circumstances.

Sometimes one has to look at default rules – objective law regulating the contract where the parties have not agreed otherwise. The default rules may be more or less specific. In their most general form the default rules refer to reasonableness and other abstract principles. For lease contracts, the present Article refers to the individual agreement, while some default rules are found in the next Article, even if referred to already in the present Article. In addition, the general rules in Book II and Book III apply. It should be noted that it is not necessary – and not always possible – to distinguish strictly between individual requirements and requirements in default rules.

Lessee A agrees to lease a computer that lessor B will build based on the specifications of A's IT expert. When the computer is delivered, A discovers that it has insufficient capacity for the intended use. As the computer has been built in accordance with the specifications, it conforms to the contract and there is no non-performance.

The construction business enterprise A agrees with B, a professional provider of construction equipment, to lease a building fence for a particular building site. Even if the contract has no specifications, it can be determined from the contract that B must deliver a fence that is long enough for this building site, and as B knows that the site is located in the centre of the town, it must conform to public requirements regarding traffic, pedestrians etc.

Elements of agreed condition of the goods. The present Article, which has a parallel for sales contracts in IV.A.–2:301 (Conformity with the contract), describes the elements of the agreed condition of the goods. The expression "quality, quantity and description", cf. paragraph (2)(a), is wide enough to cover all aspects of the agreement concerning the condition of the goods. Paragraph (2)(b) specifies that the goods must be contained and packaged in the manner required by the contract. These requirements may be relevant for contracts for lease as well as for contracts for sale, typically when the lessee picks up the goods and trusts that they are protected by proper packaging (cf. Illustration 3 to the following Article concerning default rules). Accessories and instructions are dealt with under paragraph (2)(c); these elements may be specified in the parties' agreement. Paragraph (2)(d) refers to the default rules in the following Article. This means that, technically, the present Article includes requirements based both on the individual agreement and the default rules.

No provision concerning specifications etc. For sales contracts, IV.A.–3:102 (Determination of form, measurement or other features) deals with situations in which the buyer is to determine the form, measurements and other features of the goods and fails to provide such specifications. Under certain conditions, the specifications may be made by the seller and these specifications will then be binding for the buyer. It has not been found necessary to include a corresponding provision for leases, as the situation is less practical here than it is for sales contracts.

Relevant point in time for establishing conformity. This Article fixes the relevant point in time for establishing conformity with the contract, namely the start of the lease period. Further, it follows from the Article that the condition of the goods prior to the start of the lease period, for example at the time when the agreement was concluded, is not relevant for establishing conformity with the contract – that is, of course, unless the parties have agreed otherwise. It is explained in Comment A that the distinction between requirements at this point in time and the requirements for the subsequent lease period may be of importance. A lack of conformity which was present at the start of the lease period, but which was unknown to both parties ("hidden defect"), is treated as a lack of conformity at the start of the lease period even if the effects become apparent only later. Thus, this may be non-performance of the lessor's obligations even in a contract placing the obligation of maintenance on the lessee.

Agreements on quality etc. compared with exemption clauses. Rules on conformity and rules on remedies for non-conformity are closely related. The present Article obliges the lessor to ensure that the goods meet the requirements of the contract to be in conformity with the contract. Lack of conformity is non-performance of the lessor's obligations. This could also be put another way: the lessee is entitled to remedies for non-performance if the goods do not meet the requirements of the contract. The model chosen in this Part of Book IV, operating with conformity as the link between the requirements of the contract on one hand and remedies on the other, is the same as in other Parts of Book IV and in many national systems. Sometimes, it may be difficult to distinguish between an exemption clause and a description of the goods. If the goods are described only vaguely, or if the lessor is explicitly given a wide range of choice concerning what kind of goods are to be leased and the quality of the goods, this may have the same effect as a contract term limiting the lessor's liability. As a rule, this Part of Book IV is non-mandatory, even where remedies for non-performance are concerned, and the distinction between an exemption clause and a description is not important. In consumer contracts, however, rules on remedies are designed to be mandatory. In these cases, a line must be drawn between description of the goods and derogation clauses. This is a problem common to several types of contract; it is hardly possible to give general guidelines as to how the line should be drawn. Further, giving the lessor a wide range of choice in defining the quality and quantity of the goods may be regarded as an unfair term, cf. Book II, Chapter 9, Section 4 and the Unfair Contract Terms Directive with annex.

Lessor A and lessee B agree that B will, starting next month, lease a car of a certain brand and model with ten seats. However, it is a term of the contract that B is to have no remedies if the car provided does not conform to the contract. If the contract is a consumer contract, this is an invalid exemption clause, cf. IV.B.–1:104 (Limits on derogation from rules on remedies in a consumer contract for lease).

Illustration 4
The situation is the same as in Illustration 1, but this time there is a term allowing the lessor to provide a car of another brand or model or with fewer seats. Depending on the circumstances (the lessee's needs, the planned use of the car etc.) this term may be treated as an exemption clause which is invalid in a consumer contract, cf. IV.B.–1:104 (Limits on derogation from conformity rights in a consumer contract for lease).

NOTES

See Notes to following Article.

IV.B.–3:103: Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging etc.

The goods do not conform with the contract unless they:

(a) are fit for any particular purpose made known to the lessor at the time of the conclusion of the contract, except where the circumstances show that the lessee did not rely, or that it was unreasonable for the lessee to rely, on the lessor's skill and judgement;

(b) are fit for the purposes for which goods of the same description would ordinarily be used;

(c) possess the qualities of goods which the lessor held out to the lessee as a sample or model;

(d) are contained or packaged in the manner usual for such goods or, where there is no such manner, in a manner adequate to preserve and protect the goods;

(e) are supplied along with such accessories, installation instructions or other instructions as the lessee could reasonably expect to receive; and

(f) possess such qualities and performance capabilities as the lessee may reasonably expect.

COMMENTS

Default rules on conformity

General. The present Article has default rules that supplement the individual agreement regarding the condition of the goods at the start of the lease period. Some of the provisions are closely connected to the individual agreement (particular purpose, sample or model), while others are more general (fit for ordinary purposes). Corresponding rules on sales contracts are found in IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packing etc.).

Fit for particular purposes. Where the lessee has leased the goods for particular purposes and the purposes are known to the lessor, the goods should be fit for these purposes unless otherwise agreed. Often, the lessor is a business and the lessee is a person without any special knowledge of the kind of goods in question. The lessor is then expected to either supply goods fit for the purposes or else warn the lessee that the goods are not fit for the purposes. However, this applies only where the lessee may reasonably rely on the lessor's expertise. The lessee cannot rely on the lessor's expertise if the particular purposes are not sufficiently made known to the lessor. The situation may also be such that the lessor's knowledge of the lessee's purposes is not sufficiently detailed. The lessee is typically in a better position to know about the intended use of the goods. Further, it may be that the lessee has more expertise concerning the particular kind of goods than the lessor. If both the lessor and the lessee are amateurs, and the lessee has no reason to expect more, the lessee can consequently not rely on any expertise on the lessor's side.

A leases a small car from B, in order to drive from Amsterdam to Brussels. This qualifies as ordinary use of a small car, and does not constitute a particular purpose. However, when driving back from Brussels to Amsterdam, A is to tow another car. The small car is not capable of towing another car. If A has made the towing purpose known to B, and B has not informed A to the contrary, the car is required by the contract to fulfil this purpose.

Fit for ordinary purposes. A more general rule is found in sub-paragraph (b): the goods must be fit for the purposes for which goods of the same kind would ordinarily be used. This is, together with sub-paragraph (f), a requirement of "ordinary standard". The basic requirement is that the goods can be used for their ordinary purpose. It must also be possible to obtain the normal benefit and results of use without extraordinary costs or difficulties. The goods must further comply with relevant legislation or other public or private requirements concerning for example safety. Technical standards etc. may be relevant. The provision refers to the ordinary purposes of use for goods of the "same description", irrespective of the actual contract. However, the reference to an ordinary standard must be seen in connection with the circumstances of the particular case. The requirements may vary according to the agreed rent, the agreed lease period, time available to prepare delivery, etc.

Sample or model. Where the lessor has held out a sample or a model prior to conclusion of the contract, the leased goods must normally conform to the quality of this sample or model, cf. sub-paragraph (c). The lessor may, however, have informed the lessee of differences to be expected, and the circumstances may also allow for certain discrepancies, e.g. a different colour.

B leases a computer from A. The model demonstrated at the business premises of the lessor has a 19-inch screen, but the leased computer comes with a 15-inch screen. It does not conform to the contract, as the computer screen should be equal to that demonstrated at the premises of the lessor.

Packaging etc. The goods must be packaged or contained in an adequate way, cf. sub-paragraph (d). This may be of importance for the lessee in connection with transport, storage and return of the goods. If goods of the relevant kind are normally contained or packaged in a certain manner the lessor has an obligation to make the goods available contained or packed in this manner – or to a higher standard. This applies even if there are terms in the individual agreement regarding packaging. When there is no standard manner of containing or packing the goods, the standard required to preserve and protect the goods is decisive. These rules are of particular importance for contracts in which the burden of maintenance falls on the lessee.

When the lessee arrives at home with the 48 crystal glasses leased for a wedding party, six of them are broken. The glasses were transported in the lessee's car with normal care taken. No instructions for transport were given. The glasses should have been packed so as to protect them from breakage in normal conditions of transport. The glasses did not conform to the contract.

Accessories and instructions. The accessories, instructions etc. which the lessee may reasonably expect, cf. sub-paragraph (e), depend on the circumstances. Instructions for maintenance may be needed if the goods are leased for a long period, but not if the goods are leased just for a few days or hours. The accessories necessary for normal use and safety must sometimes come with the goods, while the circumstances may indicate that accessories required for the lessee's particular purposes must be provided by the lessee.

A copier is leased for two years and is installed by the lessor. The lessee can expect that the first toner cartridge is in place – but not necessarily included in the agreed rent

– so that the copier is ready for use. Subsequent replacements must be ordered by the lessee. However, the situation may be different if the copier uses generic cartridges, not usually supplied by the lessor; in such cases it may be that the lessee cannot expect the copier to be installed with a cartridge.

X leases a cabin cruiser for three weeks. The lessee can reasonably expect that there is a fire extinguisher on board when the boat is made available for the lessee's use.

What the lessee may reasonably expect. A general provision is included in sub-paragraph (f): the goods must possess such qualities and performance capabilities as the lessee may reasonably expect. This rule overlaps with several of the other rules of the present paragraph, but it expresses a general principle that may supplement the former limbs. Together with the rule in sub-paragraph (b), it expresses the requirement of "ordinary standard". The rule in sub-paragraph (f) is closely connected to the rule in II.–9:108 (Quality): if the quality cannot be determined from the terms agreed by the parties, from a rule of law or from usages or practices, "the quality required is the quality which the recipient could reasonably expect in the circumstances".

NOTES

I. Overview

1. Legislation in European jurisdictions varies regarding the condition of the leased goods at the start of the lease period. The starting point is that the goods must conform to the individual agreement. Some, but far from all, jurisdictions also have explicit provisions as to objective requirements on quality etc. Questions of conformity are usually addressed in connection with the lessor's obligation to make the goods available for the lessee's use, cf. notes to IV.B.–3:101 (Availability of the goods).

II. Provisions explicitly dealing with objective standards

2. Requirements of conformity concerning the quality and quantity of the goods at the start of the lease period are mainly parallel with corresponding rules for sales contracts. In CISG art. 35(1) it is stated that the seller must deliver goods "which are of the quantity, quality and description required by the contract and which are contained or packaged in the manner required by the contract". Article 35(2) then has default rules – objective rules – on conformity. The most general requirement is that the goods must be "fit for the purposes for which goods of the same description would ordinarily be used". The same structure is found in national legislation on sales law based on CISG. For consumer sales there are corresponding rules in Directive 1999/44/EC art. 2.

3. According to the FRENCH CC art. 1720(1), the lessor has to deliver the goods in a good state of repair in all respects, see also BELGIAN CC art. 1720(1)); regard must be had to usages and the nature of the goods (Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 184, with further references.); in practice the standard stipulated in the law (to deliver in a good state of repair) is often excluded by contract (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21163, 656, Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civil et commerciaux[7], nos. 493, 429 ff). In DUTCH law, there is a defect, implying non-performance of the lessor's obligations, if the object does not provide the enjoyment that a lessee may expect of a well-maintained object of the kind concerned (CC art. 7:204 (2)). See also ITALIAN CC art. 1575 no. 1 (in a good state of repair); MALTESE CC art. 1540(1) (in a good state of repair in every respect). It has been pointed out that these standards are higher than those stipulated in sales law (see Rescigno (-Giove), Codice Civile I[5], art. 1575, no. 3) and higher than for the maintenance of the goods (Groslière, loc. cit. no. 193). The provision in the ITALIAN CC art. 1575 no. 1 is (in spite of the objective formula) understood as a concept referring to the agreed use (Catelani, Locazione[3], 196; Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1575, no. II1). For BELGIAN law it is said that the obligation to maintain the goods in a state fit for contractual use implies delivering them in the same state (La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I[2], no. 575). According to the POLISH CC art. 662(1), the lessor should transfer the goods in a condition suitable for the agreed purpose, Pietrzykowski, Kodeks cywilny II[4], art. 662, Nb. 2, 207. If no particular purpose is known to the lessor, the goods should be of "average quality" (general rule from CC art. 357).

4. UNITED KINGDOM law deals explicitly with the condition of leased goods in the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982. As a consequence, common law rules as to the quality and fitness of leased goods have become practically redundant (see Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-068). Sections 8–10 (concerning ENGLAND, WALES and NORTHERN IRELAND) and ss. 11I–11K (concerning SCOTLAND) set out the terms, regarding correspondence with description or with a sample and quality or fitness for a particular purpose, which will be implied by law into a contract for hire. Under these provisions, the goods must correspond to their description (if leased by reference to a description); be of satisfactory quality (in so far as concerns fitness for all the purposes for which such goods are normally supplied, appearance and finish, freedom from minor defects, safety and durability, as set out in s. 18(3) (see Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-070, fn. 371); be reasonably fit for any particular purpose made known to the lessor expressly or by implication; and conform to the sample (if leased by reference to a sample). The above terms are implied by law as conditions in England, Wales and Northern Ireland (theoretically giving the lessee the possibility of terminating the lease on breach). As against a consumer, a lessor contracting in the course of business may not exclude or restrict liability with regard to the above (Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 s. 7(2) in England, Wales and Northern Ireland and s. 21(1)(a)(i) in Scotland). In other cases, exclusion or restriction of liability will have effect only to the extent that it satisfies the requirement of reasonableness in England, Wales and Northern Ireland (Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 s. 7(2)) and only if it is fair and reasonable to incorporate such a term in Scotland (Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 s. 21(1)(a)(i)). Similar terms are implied into hire-purchase contracts by the Supply of Goods (Implied Terms) Act 1973 (ss. 9–11), regardless of the amount financed and the status of the lessee. The Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 further renders ineffective (absolutely or subject to certain conditions) any attempt to exclude these terms or the liability of the lessor for breach of such terms (cf. Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 38-346). In IRELAND, terms regarding correspondence with description or with a sample and quality or fitness for a particular purpose, will also be implied into a contract for lease by law (Consumer Credit Act 1995 s. 88). A term of a lease which attempts to exempt application of s. 88 will be void and unenforceable unless it can be shown that it is fair and reasonable (s. 79(3)). Terms excluding or restricting liability with reference to these implied terms may also be struck out by the court.

5. The provision in the SPANISH CC art. 1554 no. 1 is silent as to the standard required at the time of delivery of the leased goods. In the legal literature it is held that the lessor must deliver the goods in a state fit for the use they are destined for; that is the same state as for maintenance (art. 1554 no. 2). The law presumes that the lessee has received the goods in a good state, if nothing else is expressed, and the burden of proof shifts to the lessee to prove non-conformity (art. 1562). Also TS 25 June 1985, RAJ 1985, 3313). CC art. 1553 makes a reference to the sales rules for the concept of, and remedies for, hidden defects.

III. Standard set by agreed use

6. Some legislation requires that the goods must meet the standard necessary for the agreed use: AUSTRIAN CC § 1096 (in useful state, cf. Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III[2], no. 8/19); ESTONIAN LOA § 276 (suitable condition for the agreed use); GERMAN CC § 535(1) sent. 2 (suitable condition for the agreed use, cf. MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB[4], § 536, no. 4); GREEK CC art. 575 (condition suitable for the agreed use); see also SWISS LOA art. 256(1) and note II3 concerning POLISH CC art. 662(1). For SWEDISH law, it is held that the goods must be fit for the agreed use, Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 194.

7. Under UNITED KINGDOM law, where the lessor leases goods "in the course of a business" and the lessee "expressly, or by implication, makes known … any particular purpose for which the goods are being [leased]", there is "an implied condition that the goods supplied under the contract are reasonably fit for that purpose, whether or not that is a purpose for which such goods are commonly supplied" (except where it would be unreasonable for the lessee to rely on the lessor's skill and judgement). This provision is implied by s. 9(4)–(7) of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 into contracts for lease in ENGLAND, WALES and NORTHERN IRELAND (see further, Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-071). The same provision is extended to SCOTLAND by s. 11J(5)–(8) of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982. An equivalent provision is implied into hire-purchase contracts by s. 10(3) of the Supply of Goods (Implied Terms) Act 1973. IRELAND implies similar provisions into contracts for lease under s. 88 of the Consumer Credit Act 1995 and into consumer hire-purchase contracts under s. 76(3) of the same Act, but only where the lessee is a consumer.

IV. Mixed approach

8. Some jurisdictions have a mixed subjective and objective approach: SLOVENIAN LOA § 592 (agreed or customary use); LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.483(1) (in a state corresponding to the conditions of the contract and designation of the property, lessor can inform of defects at conclusion of the contract); see also PORTUGUESE CC arts. 1027 and 1032 sent. 1; SLOVAK CC § 664 (fit for agreed use, or if no particular use is agreed, normal use (Svoboda (-Górász), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, arts. 664, 611); cf. CC § 496(2) with default rule on average quality); the rule is the same for CZECH law, cf. CC § 664. Under HUNGARIAN law, there are general rules on conformity in CC §§ 277–311/A. The Consumer Sales Directive (1999/44/EC) was also implemented by amendment of these rules, affecting not only the rules on the sale and supply of goods, but also the rules on the lease of goods. The general requirements apply also to lease contracts, both at the time of delivery of the goods and during the whole period of lease; the HUNGARIAN CC § 424 (1) – as a special rule for contracts for lease – extends the applicability of the general requirements in § 277 to the entire duration of the lease.

IV.B.–3:104: Conformity of the goods during the lease period

(1) The lessor must ensure that throughout the lease period, and subject to normal wear and tear, the goods:

(a) remain of the quantity, quality and description required by the contract; and

(b) remain fit for the purposes of the lease, even where this requires modifications to the goods.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply where the rent is calculated so as to take into account the amortisation of the cost of the goods by the lessee.

(3) Nothing in paragraph (1) affects the lessee's obligations under IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract) paragraph (1)(c).

COMMENTS

A. General

Models. Regarding the condition of the goods during the lease period, different models are possible: the lessor may be obliged, throughout the lease period, to keep the goods more or less in the same condition as that required at the start of the period. The opposite solution is to impose these obligations on the lessee. In principle, it could also be that neither party has obligations concerning maintenance and repairs, the situation then being that the lessee must tolerate deterioration or damage during the lease period and the lessor must accept the condition in which the goods are recovered at the end of the lease period. Intermediate solutions are more common: in such cases, the lessee must usually perform some maintenance and repair and the lessor must do the rest. The situations vary a lot. Typically, the obligation of maintenance etc. may be borne by the lessor alone in contracts for very short periods (some hours or days), while – at the opposite end of the scale – all work is left to the lessee where the lease period covers the entire economic lifespan of the goods and the contract for lease in fact has the same function as a contract for sale. The present Chapter is based on a mixed model where the obligations regarding maintenance etc. are distributed between the parties. The rules must be accompanied by a test of reasonableness, taking into account the circumstances of each case. A particular rule is included for contracts where the rent is calculated so as to take into account the amortisation of the cost of the goods, i.e. the intention is that the goods are leased to only one lessee. In these cases, the lessor should have no obligation to repair or maintain the goods, cf. paragraph (2) and Comment C, second paragraph.

Conformity and availability. It is noted in Comment E to IV.B.–3:101 (Availability of the goods) that loss of or damage to the goods – including theft – is regarded as a question of conformity and dealt with in the present Article.

Repairs, maintenance, wear and tear, duty of care. Some activities are normally required to keep up the standard and functioning of leased goods. For most contracts for lease it is therefore necessary to establish, by individual agreement or by default rules, to what extent each of the parties – lessor and lessee – must carry the practical and economic burden of such activities. There exist a wide range of possible options. Use of a leased gold bracelet hardly involves any costs at all, even if the lease lasts for years, while use of a leased machine for heavy outdoor construction work may entail considerable costs each day. In national legislation, as in contracts for lease and in everyday language, different expressions are used – expressions which normally have no precise meaning. Roughly, 'repairs' typically denotes measures taken to re-establish the normal condition after some damage to the goods, breakdown of vital parts etc., while 'maintenance' typically refers to ordinary activities – often at certain intervals – that are necessary to avoid deterioration and damage. By 'wear and tear' is normally meant ordinary and often inevitable traces of use that are typical for most goods that are not new any more, even if they are treated with care and properly maintained. The latter expression is found in the present Article, while the expressions 'repairs' and 'maintenance' are not used or defined in the provision. The activities are described in a way which does not necessitate a clear distinction between 'repairs' and 'maintenance'. It should also be noted that it is not always possible to distinguish an obligation of maintenance from the obligation to handle the goods with care or even from the daily operation of some devices. Necessary oiling of parts of a machine illustrates this as well. It is not necessary to distinguish between maintenance and care for the purposes of the present Article.

B. Lessor's obligation

Obligation to keep the goods in the original condition. The starting point concerning the lessor's obligations is found in the first paragraph of the present Article: the lessor must ensure that the goods remain fit for the purpose and remain of the quality and quantity initially required. This means that the lessor must repair any damage to the goods and do what is necessary to maintain the original standard and functioning of the goods – with the exceptions noted below. The lessee must accept that the lessor's activities in this respect are likely to have some consequences for the normal use of the goods, cf. IV.B.–5:108 (Repairs and inspections of the lessor).

Fit for purposes – the dynamic aspect. At the start of the lease period the goods must normally be fit for the lessee's particular purposes, if known to the lessor, and for the purposes for which goods of the same kind would ordinarily be used. Conformity during the lease period means that the goods remain fit for such purposes, even under changed circumstances. Typically, public security requirements may change during the lease period. Unless the parties have agreed otherwise, the lessor should be obliged to keep the goods fit for the relevant purposes. Sometimes this may imply repairs; in other cases the situation may be such that the goods can no longer be used at all.

> A farmer has leased a tractor for two years. After six months public safety requirements are amended, so that all farm tractors must now have a new type of steel frame protecting the driver. If the lessor will not – or cannot – install such a frame, this is non-performance of the obligation under the present Article.

Wear and tear. The lessee must accept normal wear and tear for the kind of goods in question The meaning of this expression is dealt with in Comment A, last paragraph. Normal wear and tear will typically not affect the functioning of the goods at all or at least not significantly. An example might be scratches to the paintwork of a construction machine. Minor deteriorations occurring during the intervals between regular maintenance work can also be regarded as normal wear and tear.

> A pair of alpine skis is leased for the season. At the end of the season, the steel edges of the skis are not as sharp as they were at the beginning of the lease period, to some extent reducing their performance capabilities. The skis still conform to the contract as long as the use is not significantly affected.

Lessor's obligation negatively defined. Besides tolerating normal wear and tear the lessee may also be obliged to perform some activities necessary to maintain the standard and functioning of the goods, cf. the third paragraph of the present Article and comments below. In addition, the lessee must handle the goods with care and in some exceptional cases intervene to take care of the lessor's interests, cf. IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract) and IV.B.–5:105 (Intervention to avoid danger or damage to the goods). Unless otherwise agreed, the lessee has no other obligations to repair or maintain the goods than those stated in these provisions. The exceptions to the lessor's obligation to keep the goods in the same condition as they were in at the start of the lease period are thus exhaustive and the lessor's obligation as stated in the first paragraph is negatively defined.

C. Lessee's obligation

General. The second and third paragraphs of the present Article are formulated as exceptions to the lessor's obligation stated in the first paragraph. The first exception applies where the rent is calculated so as to take into account the amortisation of the cost of the goods, typically in a lease for financing purposes, cf, the following paragraph. The second and more general exception refers to the obligation of the lessee stated in IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract) paragraph (1) (c) to preserve the normal standard and functioning of the goods. The lessee's obligation – and the corresponding exception to the lessor's obligation – will be commented upon here.

Leases with full amortisation of the cost. In many cases, a contract for lease is more or less functionally equivalent to a contract for sale. This is typically the case where it is intended that the cost of the goods will be amortised through one lease contract, the lease period then regularly covering the entire expected economic lifespan of the goods. Important examples are three-party transactions of the type covered by the Unidroit Convention on International Financial Leasing. The lessor has the role of a financing party and acquires the goods on the lessee's specifications from a supplier chosen by the lessee. The lessor's ownership of the goods serves the purpose of securing the claim for full payment of the rent for the entire lease period. As the full interest in the quality and functioning of the goods is vested in the lessee, it is usual to leave all maintenance to the lessee. On the other hand, the lessor normally cannot allow the lessee to let the goods deteriorate, as the value of the goods during the lease period is important for the lessor's security interest in the goods. The lessee should, therefore, have a positive obligation to keep the goods in the condition they were in at the start of the lease period, subject to normal wear and tear for the kind of goods, cf. IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract) paragraph (2). These observations are relevant not only to the three-party transactions referred to, but also to two-party transactions, often quite similar to conditional sales, with the exception that it is not agreed that ownership will pass. The criterion for relieving the lessor of the obligation of maintenance etc. (second paragraph of the present Article) and for placing a corresponding burden on the lessee (IV.B.–5:104 paragraph (2)) should be the calculation of the rent, not whether it is a three-party or a two-party transaction. The formula chosen is amortisation of "the cost", meaning the total cost of the goods. Expressions like "the substantial part" of the cost (as the formula is in the Unidroit Convention) have been avoided as they are ambiguous (is more than half of the cost sufficient or must it be almost the total cost?). If the parties want to achieve the same regulation for a contract where only a part of the cost is amortised through rent payments (leases with "residual value" etc.) they must include this in their individual agreement. It should also be noted that the regulation in the second paragraph of the present Article and in IV.B.–5:104 paragraph (2) implies that the lessee will bear the "risk" in case of damage to the goods by chance, theft of the goods etc., as the lessor has no obligation to repair or replace the goods, cf. also IV.B.–3:101 (Availability of the goods) paragraph (4), and the lessee has a positive obligation to keep the goods in the condition they were in at the start of the lease period, subject to wear and tear.

Measures ordinarily to be expected. For lease contracts other than those discussed in the preceding paragraph, the lessee's obligation concerning maintenance etc. is defined in IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract) paragraph (1)(c), and a corresponding exception is included in the third paragraph of the present Article. The activities falling under the lessee's obligation include such measures as must ordinarily be expected to become necessary during the lease period. What is to be expected depends on the character of the goods, the intended use of the goods and the length of the lease period. Taking the lease of a car as an example, no measures are to be expected, apart from refilling with fuel, if an ordinary car is leased for a weekend. If the car is leased for several months or for years, on the other hand, ordinary service checks, change of oil etc. must be expected, perhaps even a change of tyres. Repairs, such as installing a new windscreen or replacing parts of the engine, are not to be expected even within the scope of a long lease period. The situation may be different where a machine or vehicle is leased for rough or taxing use over a period of some weeks – in such cases, even a change of parts may be a measure to be expected. Whether or not the measures must ordinarily be expected is decisive in each case. Statistics may show that there are defects now and then in goods of the kind leased and that repairs are necessary in such cases. These are not, however, measures that must ordinarily be expected. The same is true for accidental damage to the goods, cf. the windscreen example.

Preserving normal standard and functioning. The measures to be taken by the lessee are such measures as are necessary to preserve the normal standard and functioning of the goods. Upgrading and renewal of the goods are not covered by the lessee's obligation. Repairs made necessary by damage to the goods are not measures required to preserve the normal standard and functioning of the goods. Thus, these measures are normally excluded from the lessee's obligation as not ordinarily to be expected, cf. the preceding paragraph. It is irrelevant whether the damage is caused by a third party or by the lessee. In the latter case it may be that the lessor can claim damages, but the obligation to repair remains on the lessor's side.

Test of reasonableness. The measures referred to in IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract) paragraph (1)(c) and indirectly in the third paragraph of the present Article are only included in the lessee's obligation – and excluded from the lessor's obligation – to the extent that it is reasonable, taking into account the duration of the lease period, the purpose of the lease and the character of the goods. This test of reasonableness is required as a result of the wide spectrum of contracts covered by the provision. One example of the need for such a test might be a situation in which ordinary maintenance must be performed at certain intervals and the goods are leased just for short periods by subsequent lessees. Here it may be unreasonable to hold the particular lessee, at the time maintenance becomes due, responsible for the costs.

Co-operation with lessor. The lessee's obligations under IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract) paragraph (1)(c) may sometimes imply alterations to the goods that should not be made without consulting the lessor. As a rule, the lessee has a right to do what is necessary under that provision. Should the situation be, however, that a reasonable lessee would understand that the lessor might have preferences concerning the measures to be taken, it follows from the lessee's general obligation of co-operation (III.–1:104 (Co-operation) that the lessor must be consulted if possible.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. In some jurisdictions the rule is that only the lessor has obligations of maintenance and repair of the leased goods. In other jurisdictions the obligations of maintenance and repair are divided between lessor and lessee. In addition it should be noted that the lessee's duty of care in using the goods cannot always be distinguished clearly from maintenance of the goods.

II. Lessor alone has obligations of maintenance and repair

2. According to the AUSTRIAN CC § 1096(1) the lessor is obliged, at the lessor's own expense, to maintain the leased object in a useful state (the code does not differentiate between maintenance and the standard at the start of the lease period; at the outset no duty to maintain is on the lessee). The lessor's obligation to maintain is limited to what is possible and economically feasible. The obligation to maintain is independent of the lessor's fault and can be excluded by contract or transferred to the lessee (Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III^{2}, no. 8/20, Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I^{3}, § 1096, nos. 5 ff). If the goods become unfit for use due to an extraordinary event (fire, war, etc.) the lessor is not obliged to restore them (CC § 1104).

3. Under DANISH law, the lessor has an obligation to maintain the goods throughout the lease period (Gade, Finansiel leasing, 113–116).

4. According to the GERMAN CC § 535(1) 2. sent. the lessor must maintain the leased object during the lease period in a state which enables the contractually agreed use to be made of the goods. If the agreed use makes repairs necessary, the obligation of the lessor also includes carrying out those repairs (see MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB^{4}, § 535, no. 108). If the leased goods are destroyed without any fault of the lessor, the lessor is not obliged to restore them (Palandt (-Weidenkaff), BGB^{66}, § 535, no. 37). The parties can contract out of the obligation to maintain (MünchKomm, loc. cit. no. 114). The responsibility for minor repairs in principle also lies on the lessor but in practice is often placed upon the lessee by standard contract forms (with limitations) or explicit agreement (MünchKomm, loc. cit. nos. 130 ff).

5. According to the GREEK CC art. 575, the lessor is obliged to keep the leased object suitable for the agreed use during the whole term of the lease. This obligation entails: (a) measures of maintenance and (b) repairs in case of damage to the goods (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I^{2}, § 26 Δ II). Correspondingly, CC art. 591(1) provides that the lessor is obliged to reimburse the lessee for any necessary expenses, i.e. expenses required to keep the goods suitable. However, expenses directly connected with the exploitation and use of the leased goods (e.g. refilling a leased car with fuel) must be borne by the lessee. The lessee cannot demand reconstruction of a leased object that is totally destroyed by accident; in such a case the lease is terminated (Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 24, no. 10, fn. 7; Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), arts. 590–592, no. 4). Furthermore, according to CC art. 592 the lessee is not liable for wear and tear brought about by the stipulated use; again this is a provision which indicates that the expenses of covering maintenance and repair as required by the agreed use fall on the lessor. These obligations of the lessor can be excluded by contract.

6. Under NORWEGIAN law, it is held that the lessor has an obligation to maintain the goods, with a possible exception for long-term leases, see Falkanger, Leie av skib, 347–349, Hagstrøm and Aarbakke, Obligasjonsrett[2], 383.

7. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1554 no. 2, the lessor must carry out all repairs during the lease period which are necessary to keep the goods fit for the destined use (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 334), whether they have become necessary by the mere passing of time, ordinary use by the lessee or an accidental event or force majeure (TS 9 March 1964, RAJ 1964, 1365). The lessor is only obliged to remedy damage, not to reconstruct (TS 16 December 1986, RAJ 1986, 7447). According to some authors, repairs caused by ordinary daily usage must be borne by the lessee, and special legislation has provided some support for this thesis (i.e. Urban Leases Act art. 21(4)), cf. Bercovitz, Manual de Derecho Civil, 174. The PORTUGUESE CC art. 1036 refers to "urgent" repairs or other expenses, but seems to imply that repairs and expenses are the responsibility of the lessor. The article provides that if the lessor does not undertake repairs or cover other expenses, and these were urgent, the lessee may carry out such repairs with a right to reimbursement of expenses.

8. The previously common view in SWEDISH law – that the lessor had an obligation to maintain the goods during the lease period – has met with opposition: Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 194–197 (although the authors hold that the lessee may reduce the rent in case of deterioration or damage to the goods). The lessee only has an obligation of care (op. cit.).

9. Under UNITED KINGDOM law, unless special obligations are undertaken within the context of the contract, the lessee is not responsible for fair wear and tear (Blackmore v. Bristol & Exeter Ry (1858) 8 E & B 1035), nor is the lessee under any obligation to do repairs (Sutton v. Temple (1843) 12 M & W 52), except those which are naturally incidental to the due performance of the obligation to take reasonable care. Further, the lessee has no right to deliver the goods to a third party for repair, unless such a right has been expressly agreed in the contract (see Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-079). The express reference to "durability" in s. 18(3) of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 as among the factors to be taken into account in deciding whether or not goods are of a "satisfactory quality" (s. 9(2)) seems to confirm the idea that the terms implied by the Act continue to apply to the leased goods after possession has been transferred to the lessee (see Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-072). There is some suggestion then that "satisfactory quality" (allowing for normal wear and tear) will be the standard of maintenance demanded of the lessor. The lessee under a hire-purchase contract is not responsible for fair wear and tear, unless the contract specifies the contrary. However, most hire-purchase contracts require the lessee to keep the goods in good order, repair and condition. The courts have held such clauses to imply a duty to keep the goods in such a condition as they may reasonably be expected to be in if the hirer looks after them properly (Brady v. St. Margaret's Trust Ltd [1963] 2 QB 494). See further Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 38-285. Under SCOTTISH law, the lessor is liable for all major repairs and maintenance, and for any exceptional outlays incurred by the lessee, provided they were necessary, not due to the fault of the lessee, and notice is given by the lessee as soon as reasonably possible (Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], § 145). By contract or by custom the lessee may be liable for ordinary running costs.

10. See also CZECH CC § 664 (the lessor must maintain the goods in a condition appropriate to the agreed or normal manner of use), § 721 (business leases, also rule on substitute goods) and CZECH Ccom art. 633(1) (lessee must maintain a leased means of transportation); HUNGARIAN CC § 424 (minor costs of maintenance to be borne by the lessee); MALTESE CC art. 1539 litra b (exception in arts. 1540, 1556 only for urban tenements); SLOVAK CC § 664 (cf. Lazar, OPH II, 150).

III. Maintenance obligations also on lessee

11. According to the FRENCH CC art. 1719 no. 2, the lessor is obliged to maintain the goods so that they are fit for the use for which they have been leased. The lessor has to carry out all repairs which become necessary during the lease period and which are borne by the lessee (FRENCH CC art. 1720(2), réparations locatives). Court cases concerning which repairs are to be borne by the lessee are numerous (Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], no. 681). For immovables, FRENCH CC art. 1754 contains a specific list of repairs to be borne by the lessee, and the basic idea of this provision is also applicable to movables (Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], no. 339). Generally speaking the repairs to be borne by the lessee are those corresponding to the current use of the goods (Bénabent, loc. cit. nos. 334–335 and 339). On the other hand, all repairs of importance and connected with the structure of the goods fall to the lessor (Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 196: see also no. 384 and Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21166). For example, the lessee of a car has to bear costs for fuel, oil and a puncture, but a breakdown of the engine must be borne by the lessor; the lessee of an animal must feed and take care of it; but an operation should be covered by the lessor (Bénabent, loc. cit. nos. 339, 247). According to the CC art. 1755, the lessee does not have to carry out repairs, even if they are of the kind usually borne by the lessee, if they have become necessary by "force majeure", dilapidation or old age of the goods. The lessor is not obliged to reconstruct the goods when they are destroyed by accident (CC art. 1722). In other cases, the reason why repairs are necessary is of no relevance; if a third party damages the leased goods by delict, the lessor still has an obligation to maintain (Cass.civ. 25 February 2004, Bull.civ. 2004.III, no. 36). For similar discussion in BELGIAN law, see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I[2], nos. 588 ff. DUTCH law distinguishes between repairs in general and minor repairs. The latter are the responsibility of the lessee According to the CC art. 7:217. As usual, the article is not mandatory.

12. According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1575 no. 2, the lessor is obliged to maintain the leased goods in a state fit for the agreed use, and it is stated in CC art. 1576(1) that the lessor is to do all necessary repairs during the lease period, apart from minor maintenance. According to the CC art. 1576(2), concerning movables, the lessee must bear the costs of conservation and ordinary maintenance of the goods, subject to contrary agreement. The obligation to maintain ends when the goods are totally or partially destroyed (Provera, Locazione. Disposizioni generali, art. 1576, nos. 3, 201, with further references).

13. In SWISS law, the lessor is obliged to maintain the leased goods (LOA art. 256(1) in a state suitable for the agreed use. According to the LOA art. 259, the lessee must, corresponding to local usages, remove any minor lack of conformity during the lease period at the lessee's own expense, if this can be done by cleaning or small repairs necessary for ordinary maintenance. Concerning derogation in non-negotiated terms, see BSK (-R. Weber), OR I[3], art. 259, no. 4).

14. According to the POLISH CC art. 662(1) the lessor must keep the goods fit for the agreed purpose. However, there is no obligation to restore the goods if they are destroyed by a casual event (CC art. 662(3). Minor repairs resulting from ordinary use must be borne by the lessee (CC art. 662(2)).

15. See also ESTONIAN LOA § 280 (“minor” defects must be borne by the lessee, i.e. “defects [that] can be removed by light cleaning or maintenance which is in any case necessary for the ordinary preservation of the thing”; for commercial leases also the lessee must carry out “customary small repairs” and replacing of “equipment and tools of low value if, due to their age or use, they have become unusable” (LOA § 345) and “feeding and caring for leased animals” (LOA § 347)); LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.492 (capital repairs on the lessor) and art. 6.493 (obligation of the lessee to maintain in a proper state and make “current” repairs); SLOVENIAN LOA § 589(3) (“costs for minor repairs caused by the customary use of the thing and the costs of use itself shall be charged to the lessee”).

IV. Leases with a financing purpose

16. It is stated for several countries that agreements are usual, under which the lessee has obligations of maintenance and repair in so-called finance leasing contracts, often justified by the lessor’s interest in keeping up the value of the goods as a security: for AUSTRIAN law, Fischer-Czermak, Mobilienleasing, 66; for BELGIAN law, Philippe, Le Leasing[2], no. 070; for CZECH law, Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Novotný), OZ[10], 1179 ff; for DANISH law, Gade, Finansiel leasing, 117–119; ESTONIAN LOA § 363(2); for FRENCH law on crédit-bail, Ripert and Roblot (-Delebecque and Germain), Droit Commercial II[17], no. 2422; see also Rép.Dr.Com. (-Duranton), v° Crédit-bail, no. 135; for GERMAN law, Staudinger (-Stoffels), BGB (2004), Leasing, nos. 210 ff; MünchKomm (-Habersack), BGB[4], Leasing, no. 76; for GREEK law, Georgiadis, New Contractual Forms of Modern Economy[4], 67–68; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.571(2)(4); for LUXEMBOURG, Cour Supérieure de Justice (Appel commercial) of 25 May 1977 Pas. luxemb. 23 (1975–1977), 533, note by Mousel, Journal des Tribunaux 1977, 694; POLISH CC art. 709[7]; in SWISS law, there is discussion (see Honsell, BT-OR[7], 420, Tercier, Les Contrats spéciaux[3], nos. 6928 ff (result: lessee); different BSK (-Schluep and Amstutz), OR I[3], Pref. to arts. 184 ff, nos. 93, 104 (lessor)). In SPANISH law, current clauses in leasing contracts place all risks of damage to the assets on the lessee and also place on the lessee the duty to repair and keep the assets fit for their purpose and in usable condition. Normally, the clauses absolve the lessor of any duty in these respects, and subrogate the lessee in the rights and claims against the seller (Diaz Echegaray,- Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles I[3], pp. 910-913). In the UNITED KINGDOM, the usual risks and rewards of ownership are substantially transferred to the lessee under a finance leasing contract, including the risks of loss, destruction, depreciation, obsolescence and malfunctioning. The lessee also bears the costs of maintenance, repairs and insurance. Finance leasing contracts with non-consumers inevitably exclude the terms implied by the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 (with the reasonableness requirement generally fulfilled, see R. & B. Customs Brokers Co. Ltd. v. United Dominions Trust Ltd. [1988] 1 WLR 321, at 331–332). See further, Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-081.

IV.B.–3:105: Incorrect installation under a consumer contract for the lease of goods

Where, under a consumer contract for the lease of goods, the goods are incorrectly installed, any lack of conformity resulting from the incorrect installation is regarded as a lack of conformity of the goods if:

(a) the goods were installed by the lessor or under the lessor's responsibility; or

(b) the goods were intended to be installed by the consumer and the incorrect installation was due to shortcomings in the installation instructions.

COMMENTS

A. Installation and lack of conformity

Overview. The purpose of this Article is to make the rules on lack of conformity applicable to situations where the goods are installed incorrectly after the goods have been made available to the lessee and the installation is done by the lessor or by the lessee according to the lessor's instructions. A parallel rule is found in the Consumer Sales Directive and in IV.A.–2:304 (Incorrect installation under a consumer contract for sale). For lease contracts the rule will apply to situations where installation is done at the beginning of the lease period as well as situations where the installation is done later, typically in the course of repairs or improvements to the goods. "Installation" should be read in its broadest sense, as covering both assembly of the parts made available to the lessee, the fitting of the goods to other objects and subsequent adjustments (e.g. connecting a leased washing machine etc.) and the replacing or supplementing of parts.

Installation by the lessor. The installation may be done by the lessor or under the lessor's responsibility, for example where a safety seat is installed in a car or additional memory is installed on a leased computer, in both cases either at the beginning of the lease period or later on. If the installation is incorrect (the safety seat is not properly attached, the new memory does not function), this is deemed to be a lack of conformity under the contract, and the remedies for lack of conformity apply. There is then no need to discuss whether or not the installation should be seen as an "accessory" obligation, the non-performance of which would lead to consequences other than non-performance of the ordinary obligations under the contract. Normally, the negative effects caused by the installation are also to be dealt with under the rules on lack of conformity, as for example where ordinary car seats are torn up during installation of a safety seat or where additional memory installed on a computer causes a conflict with other functions.

Installation by the lessee. If installation is to be by the lessee, the lessor is normally not liable for incorrect installation. An exception is made under sub-paragraph (c) for situations in which incorrect installation is due to shortcomings in the installation instructions. Instructions that should have been provided by the lessor may be totally lacking or the instructions may be incomplete or misleading. In the absence of this Article it might be argued that the lessor is liable only for damages. The Article applies even where someone else, for example a household member, a friend or a professional, performs the installation for the lessee, as long as the incorrect installation is a direct result of shortcomings in the installation instructions.

The installation must be under the contract. The present Article applies only where installation is done under the contract, either as an obligation on the lessor or as an intention that installation is to be by the lessee. If installation becomes necessary because of repairs that are part of the lessee's obligations under the actual contract or because of improvements initiated by the lessee (with or without the lessor's consent, as the case may be), general rules should apply even where the lessee engages the lessor to perform the work or where new parts are bought from the lessor with installation instructions. This should not be seen as non-performance of obligations under the lease contract.

NOTES

General

1. See in general notes to IV.A.–2:304 (Incorrect installation in a consumer contract for sale). See also notes to IV.B.–1:102 (Consumer contract for the lease of goods) concerning the implementation of EU consumer protection rules in the field of leases. National law concerning installation and lease contracts in particular seems to be uncommon.

IV.B.–3:106: Obligations on return of the goods

The lessor must:

(a) take all the steps which may reasonably be expected in order to enable the lessee to perform the obligation to return the goods; and

(b) accept return of the goods as required by the contract.

COMMENTS

A. Separate obligation to take goods in return

Lessor's obligation. The lessor's obligation to accept the goods at the end of the lease period corresponds to the lessee's obligation to return the goods. The obligation implies for example informing the lessee of details concerning the place for return of the goods and accepting the goods. Normally, it is in the lessor's own interest to have the goods returned. Co-operating to make the performance of the lessee's obligation possible is, however, seen as an obligation in its own right, and if the lessor does not accept return of the goods, this amounts to non-performance on the lessor's side. It is not only in the lessor's interest that the goods are returned; it may be essential for the lessee as well to dispose of the goods and of the responsibility for keeping them. For environmental and security reasons goods should not normally been left unattended.

Right not to accept the goods? The situation may be that the lessee wishes to return goods that are not in the condition the lessor might expect, as a result of non-performance of the lessee's obligations of care and maintenance. The question of whether the lessor may refuse to accept the goods and resort instead to remedies for delay must be answered on the basis of general rules on non-performance and remedies. It has not been found necessary to deal with this issue in the present Article.

B. Remedies

Remedies for non-performance. If the lessor fails to perform the obligation to accept the goods, general rules on remedies for non-performance apply. In this situation the practical remedy is damages for loss caused by the lessor's non-performance.

Protection of the goods etc. In addition to general rules on remedies for non-performance, III.–2:111 (Property not accepted) applies. This means that the lessee has obligations to protect and preserve the goods if the lessor does not accept them and further that the lessee may deposit, sell or dispose of the goods, as the case may be, and claim damages for loss incurred by such actions.

NOTES

General

1. A general reference is made to the notes to III.–1:104 (Co-operation) concerning the obligation to co-operate. National laws on contracts for the lease of goods do not explicitly regulate the obligation to accept the return of the goods. It depends on the general approach under the relevant national law whether or not the lessor's cooperation in relation to return of the goods is regarded as a separate obligation. The parallel issue for sales contracts is taking delivery. According to the CISG art. 60, the buyer is obliged to co-operate and to take delivery, and corresponding rules on sales are found in several jurisdictions.

2. In ENGLAND there is a wide statutory power conferred on lessees to sell the goods if a lessor is in breach of the obligation to accept return of the goods (ss. 12 and 13 of the Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977). See further, Chitty on Contracts II[29] nos. 33-092–33-097.

3. In SPAIN a special provision has probably been deemed as unnecessary. General rules apply, and the lessor who fails to comply with the duty to accept the return of the goods incurs mora credendi (CC art. 1176).

4. The only claim by the lessor on return of the goods recognised in SCOTTISH law is one for damages (Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Leasing and hire of movables', para. 49; Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], para. 13.11), implying an obligation to accept the return.

CHAPTER 4: REMEDIES OF THE LESSEE: MODIFICATIONS OF NORMAL RULES

IV.B.–4:101: Lessee's right to have lack of conformity remedied

(1) The lessee may have any lack of conformity of the goods remedied, and recover any expenses reasonably incurred, to the extent that the lessee is entitled to enforce specific performance according to III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations).

(2) Nothing in the preceding paragraph affects the lessor's right to cure the lack of conformity according to Book III, Chapter 3, Section 2.

COMMENTS

A. Application of ordinary rules

The general rules in Book III. General rules in Book III, Chapter 3 on non-performance and remedies apply also to non-performance of obligations under a contract for the lease of goods. Some derogations or additions are needed due to the characteristic traits of lease contracts but rules already found in Book III, Chapter 3 are not repeated. Not all of these remedies are available in every case of non-performance of an obligation by the lessor. For example, termination of the lease will be available under Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5 only if the non-performance is fundamental.

Lessee's remedies only. The present Chapter deals with the lessee's remedies only. Provisions on the lessor's remedies for non-performance of the lessee's obligations are found in Chapter 6.

Enforcing specific performance. It follows from III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations) that the creditor is entitled, subject to certain prerequisites, to enforce specific performance of the debtor's non-monetary obligation, including the remedying free of charge of a performance that is not in conformity with the contract. A lessee has this right where the goods are not made available at all, where only some (or some part) of the goods is made available, where the quality of the goods does not conform to the contract, where third parties' rights interfere with the lessee's use of the goods, where the goods become unavailable for the lessee's use during the lease period, and where the lessor does not accept the goods at the end of the lease period. The lessee may further be entitled to enforce specific performance of other obligations undertaken by the lessor in the individual contract. Specific performance may, depending on the circumstances, entail making available unique goods under the contract, replacing goods, repairing non-conforming goods, eliminating third party rights and accepting goods that are returned by the lessee.

There are several exceptions to the creditor's right to enforce specific performance, cf. III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations) paragraph(2) and (3). Specific performance cannot be enforced where performance would be unlawful or impossible, unreasonably burdensome or expensive, or of such a personal character that it would be unreasonable to enforce it. For lease contracts the exception of unreasonably burdensome performance holds particular interest as the leased goods still belong to the lessor and often will be returned at the end of the lease period for the lessor's own use or for new lease contracts. The lessor may have good reasons to object to more or less irreversible modifications to the goods even where such modifications are not unreasonably expensive.

> X leases an antique bride's crown to wear on her wedding day. The crown has been in the lessor Y's family for centuries. By mistake, Y gives X incorrect information on the size of the crown, and it does not fit. This amounts to a lack of conformity under the contract, but the lessee is not entitled to have the crown altered, whether by the lessor or someone else, as it would be unreasonable to make changes to an heirloom like this, irrespective of any loss of economic value that might result from the change.

Withholding performance. According to III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation), a party who is to perform "at the same time as, or after, the debtor performs has a right to withhold performance of the reciprocal obligation until the debtor has tendered performance or has performed". This rule applies also where the other party has performed, but the performance is not in conformity with the contract. Further, the above-mentioned Article states that the performance which may be withheld is "the whole or part of the performance as may be reasonable in the circumstances". Withholding performance is also allowed where the creditor "reasonably believes that there will be non-performance by the debtor when the debtor's performance becomes due". Thus the rule is made applicable even in certain cases where the withholding party is to perform first.

A distinction should be made between the rule on withholding performance and rules on the time for performance: in many cases it is agreed, or there is a presumption, that the parties are to perform simultaneously. In such cases, waiting for the other party's performance is not, strictly speaking, a remedy for non-performance. The party's performance is simply not due. The right to withhold performance – in the strict sense – has two main purposes, namely to protect the withholding party against granting credit and to give the other party an incentive to perform. The first of these purposes – protection against granting credit – has various aspects, depending on the type of contract and on the circumstances. If a lessee pays the rent before the goods are made available the lessee takes the risk of ending up with an unsecured claim in the lessor's insolvency proceedings. However, withholding performance with the aim of securing claims arising from the other party's non-performance can also be seen as protection against granting credit: a party having for example a right to claim damages for non-conforming performance should not be obliged to perform the full amount, and in so doing take the risk that the other party will not be able to pay the damages. This may also provide a guideline for the test of reasonableness in III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation): the party should normally be allowed to withhold so much as is needed to secure the party's remedies for non-performance.

The provision in III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation) establishes no right to withhold performance after the other party has performed and therefore does not cover the situation where the aggrieved party wants to withhold performance in order to secure remedies for non-performance at a stage where the other party has performed, as for example where the performance was late and the aggrieved party may claim damages for consequential loss. This is a question of set-off, cf. Chapter 6 of Book III.

As will be discussed below, rent reduction is seen as a remedy for non-performance, not as a question of whether rent has been incurred or not. Hence, suspending rent payment because of non-performance is a question of withholding performance (or of set-off, as the case may be).

Rent is in most cases payable at the end of certain intervals or at the end of the entire lease period, cf. IV.B.–5:102 (Time for payment). If the goods are not available for the lessee's use at the time for payment or the goods still do not conform to the contract, the lessee may withhold the whole payment or parts of it. Where the goods have been delayed, but have already been made available at the time established for payment, the lessee may – according to the rules in Book III, Chapter 6 – set off a claim for rent reduction or for damages against the lessor's claim for payment, cf. the two preceding paragraphs.

Termination of the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance. The lessee may terminate the contractual relationship if the lessor's non-performance is fundamental, cf. III.–3:502 (Termination for fundamental non-performance) paragraph (1). A definition of fundamental non-performance is found in paragraph (2) of that Article, where the general criterion is the following (sub-paragraph (a)): the non-performance is fundamental if it "substantially deprives the creditor of what the creditor was entitled to expect under the contract …". According to sub-paragraph (b), intentional or reckless non-performance is fundamental if it gives "the creditor reason to believe that the debtor's future performance cannot be relied on". In contracts for lease the prospects of future performance will typically be crucial in judging whether non-performance is fundamental under sub-paragraph (a), and whether or not non-performance is intentional or reckless under sub-paragraph (b).

According to III.–3:506 (Scope of right to terminate), termination will in many cases affect only a part of the contractual relationship where the obligations under the contract "are to be performed in separate parts or are otherwise divisible", if there is a "ground for termination … of a part to which a counter-performance can be apportioned". As applied to leases, this rule will often overlap with the rules on rent reduction. However, there may be cases where the lessee will prefer partial termination in order to put a decisive end to the lessee's own obligations.

> T runs activity holidays. She has concluded a contract with a firm, L, for the lease of 12 mountain bicycles, at so much per bicycle, for a week for the use of a party of clients. On delivery of the bicycles on the first morning one of them is found to be unfit for use. L has no more suitable bicycles in stock but says that it will obtain one within the next three days. This is no use to T who cannot have one client without a bicycle for that length of time. T would prefer to obtain a bicycle immediately from another firm and be free of any possible obligation to L in relation to the defective bicycle. T can terminate the lease in relation to the one defective bicycle.

Rent reduction According to III.–3:601 (Right to reduce price), non-performance may give a creditor a right to a proportionate reduction in the price. This rule should obviously apply to contracts for lease in situations where the goods are made available for the lessee's use, but at a reduced value because of quality defects, third party rights etc. However, for periods where the goods are not available for the lessee's use at all, it may be questionable whether any rent has been incurred. Under this Part of Book IV, the rent reduction rule is meant to apply also to periods in which the goods are not available. There are two reasons for this. First, this rule makes it unnecessary to make a sharp distinction between lack of conformity and non-availability. It may well be that the goods are made available to the lessee, but in a condition entirely unfit for use. In other situations the value of the goods may be substantially reduced for a period, even if the lessee can still make some use of the goods. The right to rent reduction is flexible enough to permit reduction to zero. Second, application of the rent reduction rule makes the system of remedies more consistent and simple, as there is no need to distinguish between "off-hire" periods and rent reduction. It must be added that other solutions may follow from the individual contract. A rule on rent reduction is included in IV.B.–4:102 (Rent reduction) to avoid misunderstandings on this and other points concerning the application of the general rules on price reduction.

A leased computer breaks down one month after it has been made available to the lessee. The computer is brought to the lessor for repair, which takes one week. Rent is paid in advance every month. The lessee has a right to reduce the rent by one fourth of the monthly rent and can set off this amount against the rent for the following month.

According to III.–3:601 (Right to reduce price) paragraph (1), the price reduction "is to be proportionate to the decrease in the value of what was received by virtue of the performance at the time it was made compared to the value of what would have been received by virtue of a conforming performance". If the rent is agreed for certain periods, the agreed rent will normally indicate the proportionate reduction in value for periods where the goods have not been available. In other cases the reduction in value must be established using other criteria.

Damages and interest. Rules on damages for loss caused by non-performance and on interest for delay in payment of money are found in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 7. These rules also apply to lease contracts. Reference to interest is made in the present Article, even though the lessor's obligations are normally non-monetary.

If the lessee terminates the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance the general measure for calculation of loss is the following: the lessee must be put "as nearly as possible into the position in which the creditor [here: the lessee] would have been if the obligation had been duly performed", III.–3:702 (General measure of damages). For lease contracts for an indefinite period, it should be noted that the lessor is not bound for a longer time than the required period for notice of termination. The lessee must accept that the lessor could have given notice of termination at the time the lessee terminated the contractual relationship.

Cure of non-performance. The lessor must in many cases be given a chance to cure non-performance, typically by remedying lack of conformity. The rules in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 2 apply.

B. Modification of general rules in relation to right to have lack of conformity remedied

Need for rules on lessee's own remedying of lack of conformity. In Book III, Chapter 3, there are no rules explicitly dealing with the creditor's right to have a lack of conformity remedied and recover the costs from the debtor. In most cases this is a matter of damages: the cost of remedying the lack of conformity is part of the loss that the creditor can claim damages for, cf. III.–3:702 (General measure of damages). The situation may even be such that the debtor is not liable for the loss that can be reduced by such remedying, cf. III.–3:705 (Reduction of loss). In contracts for lease there is an additional problem: the goods do not belong to the lessee, and it must be decided to what extent the lessee may be permitted to have work done to the leased goods. For this reason a provision on the lessee's right to have the lack of conformity remedied is introduced in the present Article. According to the first paragraph, the lessee may have the lack of conformity of the goods remedied and may recover reasonable expenses incurred, to the extent that the lessee is entitled to specific performance. This rule limits the lessee's right to remedy the lack of conformity both with regard to the kind of work that may be done and with regard to the costs that may be recovered.

Work that may be done. The lessee may not claim specific performance – and therefore may not remedy a lack of conformity – where such performance would be unreasonably burdensome or expensive, cf. III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations) paragraph (3)(b). "Unreasonably burdensome" may cover situations where the lessor has good reason to object to work necessary to remedy the lack of conformity.

Unreasonable costs. The lessee is not entitled to enforcement of specific performance – or to have a lack of conformity remedied – if it would be unreasonably expensive, cf. III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations) paragraph (3)(b). This rule applies whether the remedying is to be done by the lessor, by the lessee or by a third party. Should the lessee be willing to bear some of the costs, and claim refund only of reasonable costs, the lessee may have the work done, if it would not be unreasonable for other reasons, cf. the preceding paragraph. The first paragraph of the present Article allows for recovery of expenses "reasonably incurred". This rule overlaps with the rule on limitations to the right to specific performance where the work will lead to unreasonable expenses in any case. However, the rule also applies where the lessee has chosen an unnecessarily expensive means of remedying the lack of performance, even if the costs are not disproportionate per se.

Lessee's obligation of care. The lack of conformity may be remedied by the lessee or the lessee's employees or by a third party. The lessee must handle the goods with care, cf. IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract). If the lessee plans to have work done on the goods by someone who lacks the necessary qualifications, the lessor may object, as this will normally be unreasonable from the point of view of the lessor. The lessor can also claim damages for loss caused by the lessee's carelessness in this respect.

Lessor's right to cure unaffected. The lessor normally has a right to cure if the lessee wants to exercise a remedy for non-performance, cf. Book III, Chapter 3, Section 2. In such cases, the lessor must be allowed the opportunity to remedy the lack of conformity before the lessee does so.

I. Non-performance and remedies in general

1. The general rules in Chapter 3 of Book III apply also to lease contracts. The corresponding rules in national law – concerning e.g. non-performance as a unitary concept, excused non-performance and cumulation of remedies – differ and these differences are of course found in national law on contracts for lease as well. A general reference is therefore made to the notes to Chapter 3 of Book III. The following notes refer to contracts for lease in particular.

II. Enforce specific performance

2. For general information on enforcing specific performance, see notes to III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations). In some countries the creditor has, as a rule, a right to enforce specific performance, although with important exceptions; in other countries enforcement of specific performance is a discretionary remedy. In accordance with III.–3:302, exceptions from the right to specific performance may be grouped as (i) cases of impossibility or unlawfulness, (ii) cases where specific performance is unreasonable, (iii) cases where performance is of a personal character or depends on a personal relationship. Note that in ENGLAND and IRELAND, the remedy of specific performance will always be at the discretion of the court and is generally only available where damages are not adequate, quantifiable, or appropriate (see Treitel, The Law of Contract[11], 1019–1040 and Keane, Equity and Law of Trusts, §§ 16.01 ff respectively). In SCOTLAND, the approach to the remedy is closer to the continental approach, but has nevertheless been significantly influenced by English law in this area to the extent that grant of the right is subject to equitable control and many of the rules restricting use of this remedy now apply in Scotland.

3. The effects of impossibility (or unlawfulness) of performance may differ: the contract may be void, enforcement of specific performance may be denied, and there may be effects concerning liability for damages as well. The information here is concentrated on enforcement of specific performance. For AUSTRIA, see in general Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1096, no. 6. According to the AUSTRIAN CC § 1112, the lease is terminated automatically if the goods are destroyed, i.e. the leased object perishes totally (Koziol (-Iro), ABGB, § 1112, no. 1) or is finally lost (OGH 4 November 1980, EvBl 1980/70: destruction of an excavator; for an example of final loss, see OGH 17 June 1919, SZ 1/45). The rule is interpreted restrictively and does not apply if the lessor has an obligation towards the lessee to restore the leased object; such a duty can also result from requirements of good faith; as long as the reconstruction is legally and economically possible, the lessee can claim performance of the lessor's obligation (OGH 22 June 1994, SZ 67/112). CC § 1112 can be regarded as a special rule within lease law for subsequent impossibility and is therefore regarded as an expression of what is economical and reasonable (Riss, Erhaltungspflicht, 187, 191). Under CZECH law, the lease is terminated if the goods are totally destroyed, CC § 680(1). Where the lessor is a business, the rule in CC § 721 on substitute goods may also apply to such cases. Under DUTCH law, remedying of a defect cannot be claimed if it is impossible or requires expenditure which in all reasonableness cannot be required of the lessor, or if the defect was caused by the lessee or concerns a minor repair, CC art. 7:206(1). According to the FRENCH CC art. 1722, the lease is terminated automatically if the leased object is destroyed entirely by a fortuitous event during the lease period (loss of the object is also mentioned in CC art. 1741 as a cause of termination); in cases of partial destruction, the lessee may choose termination or price reduction. The courts have extended the rule to cases where the object is destroyed by the fault of one of the parties; although there will be a difference concerning liability for damages (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21157). For goods, interpretation of the contract may show that the lessor is obliged to replace destroyed goods (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21155). The MALTESE CC art. 1571 also has a rule on termination by operation of law in case of total destruction of the object. Under GERMAN law, if the leased object is totally destroyed the general rules on impossibility apply, which means that the lessee cannot claim specific performance (see Palandt (-Weidenkaff), BGB[66], § 535, no. 37 and MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB[4], § 535, no. 112). The lessor is not obliged to invest insurance compensation in the reconstruction of leased goods (Schmidt-Futterer (-Eisenschmid), Mietrecht[9], § 536, no. 499). The general rule of GREEK CC art. 380 on impossibility of performance leads to termination of the lease by operation of law when the goods are totally destroyed by a fortuitous event. Depending on the circumstances, claiming repair of partially destroyed goods may be contrary to good faith (CC arts. 288, 281), destruction then being treated as total (CA Athens 1022/2002 EllDik 43, 1485; 5178/1992 EllDik 34, 1097; Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[2], § 26 Δ II; Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 24, no. 10, fn. 7; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 217; Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), art. 575, no. 14 and arts. 590–592, no. 4). Under SWISS law, a claim for performance is limited by objective impossibility (LOA arts. 97 and 119; BSK (-R. Weber) OR I[3], § 259b, no. 4). Under HUNGARIAN law, the lease is also terminated by operation of law if the goods are destroyed, CC § 430(2). In ITALY, the obligation to maintain ends when the thing is totally or partially destroyed and the rules on subsequent impossibility apply (CC arts. 1463–1466; Provera, Locazione. Disposizioni generali, art. 1576, nos. 3, 201 ff). Deteriorations, even substantial, must be repaired. In cases of partial destruction the lessee may choose to reduce the rent or to terminate the contractual relationship (art. 1464; Scialoja and Branca, loc. cit. 203). In SPANISH law, the lessor's obligation is extinguished and the lease comes to an end if the goods perish or have been lost without the lessor's fault, cf. CC art. 1568, referring to arts. 1182 and 1183; TS 17 March 1952, RAJ 19532, 499; TS 3 March 1951, RAJ 1951, 604. Note that the lease also comes to an end if the leased goods are lost due to the culpa of the lessor. In such cases, the lessee is entitled to claim damages (Bercovitz, Manual de Derecho Civil, 182). The lessor is only obliged to remedy damage, not to reconstruct. This rule is not clearly fixed anywhere, but stems from consideration of the irrational cost specific performance would have in this case. It is noteworthy that CC art. 1556 does not mention specific performance among the remedies available to the lessee. According to the SLOVAK CC § 680(1) the lease is terminated if the goods are totally destroyed, irrespective of the cause of destruction. If the leased thing perishes totally, the lessor has no obligation to reconstruct the leased object; even where the leased thing is restored, the lease is not renewed (Lazar, OPH II, 156). According to the POLISH CC art. 662(3), if the leased goods have been destroyed as a result of circumstances for which the lessor is not liable, the lessor has no obligation to restore the goods and the lease comes to an end. If the lessor is responsible for impossibility, the lessee may claim damages. Under ENGLISH law, where provision is not made in the contract for lease (force majeure or hardship clauses), a lease which becomes impossible to perform (cf. Taylor v. Caldwell (1863) 3 B&S 826) through no fault of the lessee is discharged. Both parties are discharged of their obligations from the date of impossibility, without incurring any liability for breach. The financial consequences of frustration are taken care of by the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943: a frustrated contract may either be unwound where sums have been paid (s. 1(2)) or restitution awarded to the party who has provided a valuable non-monetary benefit (s. 1(3)). In NORTHERN IRELAND, the same provisions are contained in s. 1(2) and 1(3) of the Frustrated Contracts Act (Northern Ireland) 1947. In SCOTLAND, if a contract is frustrated, the obligations of the parties under the contract cease but there may be an equitable adjustment of the rights of the parties under the principles of unjustified enrichment (Cantiere San Rocco SA v. Clyde Shipbuilding & Engineering Co. Ltd. 1923 SC (HL) 105). In IRELAND, the common law of frustration still applies.

4. Situations where performance by the lessor would be unreasonably burdensome are also sometimes regulated or commented upon particularly for lease contracts. For AUSTRIAN law it is said in general that the lessor's obligation of maintenance is limited where performance would be unreasonable or inefficient from an economic point of view (Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1096, no. 6, Riss, Erhaltungspflicht, 173 ff). The burden of proof in these instances is on the lessor (Riss, loc. cit.). If the goods become entirely or partially unusable by an extraordinary event, the lessor is not obliged to restore them (CC § 1104; Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1104, no. 3). This can be seen as a special rule on changed circumstances within lease law (Riss, Erhaltungspflicht, 197). For DUTCH law, see note II3. In FRENCH law, it is regarded as partial loss, and thus a cause for termination (or price reduction, see previous note) if the object has deteriorated to a degree where the cost of repairs would be disproportionate (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21166, Cass.civ. 12 June 1991, Bull.civ. 1991.III, no. 169, Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civils et commerciaux[7], no. 468). The lessor is not obliged to reconstruct, even if the cost is covered by an insurance company (Bénabent, loc. cit. no. 355). Where the deterioration is merely the result of the lessor's non-performance of the obligation to maintain the object, the lessor must still perform (Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 210, Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], nos. 334-5 and 355). If the agreed use becomes unlawful this is also seen as partial destruction. The lessor's loss of property in the object may also lead to termination (Bénabent, loc. cit. no. 355). GERMAN law now has a provision in CC § 275(2) that corresponds to PECL art. 9:102(2)(b) (see explicitly Palandt (-Heinrichs), BGB[66], § 275, no. 26). For lease contracts (as before the Schuldrechtsmodernisierung), the so called limit of sacrifice applies (Opfergrenze, Palandt (-Heinrichs), loc. cit. no. 28) but has its basis now in CC § 275(2) (BGH 20 July 2005, NJW 2005, 3284, following MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB[4], § 535 no. 110). The cost of repairs must not be manifestly disproportionate bearing in mind the benefit of the repairs for the lessee, the worth of the leased object and the achievable earnings (BGH, loc. cit.). The issue of defects and impossibility remains as before (Emmerich, JuS 2006, 81, 82). If, in case of partial destruction, reconstruction is not reasonable for the lessor for financial reasons, the rule on changed circumstances applies (CC § 313; Schmidt-Futterer (-Eisenschmid), Mietrecht[9], § 535, no. 90). For ITALIAN law, the rules on subsequent impossibility (see previous note) also take into account economic criteria (Provera, Locazione. Disposizioni generali, art. 1576, nos. 3, 201). The same applies for GREEK law (see previous note). In SPAIN, the lessor is only obliged to remedy damage, not to reconstruct (TS 16 December 1986, RAJ 1986, 7447). The general rules in POLISH CC art. 357^1 on extraordinary change of circumstances apply also to lease contracts.

III. Withholding performance of the reciprocal obligation

5. A general reference is made to the notes to III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation) concerning the rules on withholding performance of the reciprocal obligation in cases of non-performance of the other party's obligations. For lease contracts, a distinction must sometimes be made between the situations before and after the goods are made available to the lessee.

6. A general rule on the right to withhold reciprocal performance in cases of non-performance is found in CZECH CC § 560. To the same effect, see DUTCH CC art. 6:262. The general rule in GERMAN CC § 320 applies also to lease contracts, both in cases of delay and of lack of conformity. In the latter case a claim for rent reduction may be combined with withholding of (parts of) the remaining rent to put pressure on the lessor (BGH 7 May 1982, BGHZ 84, 42, 45). For all see MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB[4], Pref. to § 536, nos. 15 ff, Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 536, nos. 34 ff. The right to withhold rent is always connected with a claim for removal of non-conformity and has to be directed against the person responsible for such removals (BGH 19 June 2006, LMK 2006, 189.670, note Blank). The general rule on withholding performance in POLISH CC art. 488 applies also to lease contracts (Radwański (-Panowicz-Lipska), System Prawa Prywatnego VIII, 9). In SCOTLAND, the principle of mutuality allows the lessee to withhold performance of a reciprocal obligation in response to the lessor's breach as long as there is a link between the breach and the performance withheld (Bank of East Asia Ltd. v. Scottish Enterprise 1997 SLT 1213). The consequence is suspension of the contractual obligations until the breach has been cured. There is no precise equivalent amongst the available remedies in ENGLAND and NORTHERN IRELAND. However, the same result may be achieved in practice. Where there is a contractual breach giving rise to a right to terminate and the lessee elects to terminate (see further notes on termination below), the lessee is entitled to claim damages and, where there is a total failure of consideration (e.g. the equipment leased does not function), restitution. It is submitted that where the lessee would be entitled to restitution, on termination, of monies paid prior to the breach, the lessee should also be relieved of liability to pay sums which have become due prior to termination (Treitel, The Law of Contract[11], 850). In this sense, the lessee may refuse to tender performance of the reciprocal obligation. Under PORTUGUESE law, the lessee may suspend the payment of rent, totally or partially, if the goods are not made available or there is a lack of conformity (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado II[3], 375). In SLOVAK law, non-performance of the lessor's obligation may entitle the lessee to withhold the rent (Svoboda (-Švecová), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, arts. 673, 618), even partially, cf. SLOVAK CC § 674. There is no general rule as to the right of withholding in the SPANISH regulation of the lease contract. An incidental application, however, may be found in CC art. 1588, which allows the lessee to stop payments when the lack of use due to repairs lasts for more than forty days. According to the general rules, the lessee may withhold payment so long as the lessor is in breach of the duty to make necessary repairs; however, scholars hold the opinion that minor non-performances do not give rise to the right to withhold (see Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Lucas Fernandez), Código Civil II, 1097).

7. For AUSTRIAN law it has been argued that the lessee cannot withhold the whole rent if the greater part of the leased object is being used (Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1096, no. 10a, cf. no. 2). It is held that the ex lege rent reduction in the sense of CC § 1096 excludes a right to withhold in the sense of CC § 1052 (OGH 29 March 2004, SZ 2004/47, Koziol (-Iro), ABGB, § 1096, no. 9 at the end); see for strong arguments in favour of withholding rent in addition to rent reduction, Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1096, no. 97; cf. also Riss, Erhaltungspflicht, 232. It is debatable whether the lessee can withhold rent with reference to the general rule in SWISS LOA art. 82 (on order of performance) or whether art. 259d (rent reduction in cases of non-conformity during the lease period) is a lex specialis (see for all BSK (-R. Weber), OR I³, art. 259d, no. 8).

8. For GREEK law, authors have argued that the general rule of CC art. 374, which covers cases of non-performance, as well as of improper performance (exceptio non rite adimpleti contractus, for which see Stathopoulos, § 17, no. 62), applies to lease contracts (Dacoronia, The plea of 374 CC as to the lease of a thing, 218 ff; Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[2], § 29 Δ I; Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 25, no. 20). However, case law does not accept its application, as it has held that the lessee, if partially hindered in using the leased goods, is entitled only to rent reduction and not to withholding of the rent (A.P. 1557/1983 EEN 51, 624) and furthermore that the application of CC arts. 373 ff is excluded by the specific provisions on leases (A.P. 83/2002 ChrID 2002, 214).

9. In FRENCH law, the lessee is in principle not allowed to resort to the general rule on withholding performance in cases of non-performance of the lessor's maintenance obligations, i.e. non-performance during the lease period. Exceptions to this principle can be made if it is impossible or almost impossible to use the object or there is a prolonged refusal by the lessor to perform necessary repairs (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21179, Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civils et commerciaux[7], no. 488, Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], nos. 334-5, 241). For the comparable discussion in BELGIAN law see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I[2], nos. 400 and 830, 559: suspension of rent payments only in exceptional cases, such as important impediments to use due to lack of maintenance; in general suspension must conform to rules on good faith. The rule in ITALIAN CC art. 1460 on withholding performance in principle applies also to contracts for lease (see Provera, Locazione. Disposizioni generali, art. 1571, 17). However, the prevailing part of doctrine and jurisprudence allows withholding of rent only where performance by the lessor is missing in its entirety (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1587, no. V5). The situation seems not altogether clear (see for example Cass. 11 February 2005, 2855/2005, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 4).

IV. Termination of the contractual relationship

10. Termination of a lease normally has effect only for the future, see e.g. for AUSTRIAN law, Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1117, no. 1, § 1118, no. 2; for FRENCH law Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], no. 356; for GERMAN law, MünchKomm-BGB[4] (-Schilling), loc. cit. § 542 no. 8; see also CC § 543(1); for GREEK law, CC art. 587 sent. 1; for ITALIAN law Rescigno (-Pellegrini), Codice Civile I[5], § 1458, no. 3; for SPANISH law Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 338.

11. In GERMAN law, a long-term contractual relationship may be terminated without a period of notice if there is an important reason, CC § 314, and non-performance of contractual obligations can, as the case may be, provide sufficient reason for termination. This principle is concretised for leases in CC § 543(2)(1). A similar rule is found in AUSTRIAN law: the lessee may terminate the lease without a period of notice if the lease object or a considerable part of it is not (or no longer) fit for the agreed use (CC § 1117). This is an expression of the general rule that continuous contractual relationships can be ended for an important reason (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1117, no. 2). According to the SWISS LOA art. 259b litra a, the lessee may give notice of termination with immediate effect if a defect reduces the suitability of a movable for its predetermined use. This rule is a lex specialis to LOA art. 266g (termination of a lease for an important reason, see BSK (-R. Weber), OR I³, art. 266g, nos. 3 ff). See also ESTONIAN LOA § 313 and Comment D to IV.B.–2:102 (End of lease period).

12. CZECH CC § 679(1) contains a rule on termination of the lease for non-performance, termination here implying the lease contract ceases to exist with effect from the beginning. A subsidiary rule of CC § 517(1) on termination for delay may also apply. The right to terminate the lease cannot be contracted out (Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Jehlička), OZ[10], 1191). According to the general rule in DUTCH CC art. 6:265, a contract may be terminated for non-performance of sufficient importance. A rule allowing for termination for non-performance of obligations under a lease is found in FRENCH CC art. 1741. According to general contract law, a court must decide whether there is sufficient reason for termination (CC art. 1184), see Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21208 (see also note IV14 below). Parties often agree on a resolution clause, but such clauses are interpreted restrictively (Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], no. 356, Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civils et commerciaux[7], no. 490). GREEK CC art. 585 allows for termination of a lease where the goods are totally unavailable or only partially available for the lessee's use. Concerning the requirement of setting a reasonable time-limit for performance, see CC art. 585 sents. 1 and 2. For an exception to the right of termination in cases where the obstacles to use are insignificant or unimportant, see Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 25, no. 28; A.P. 633/2003 ChrID 2003, 519 cmt. by E. Nezeriti; cf. also Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 249). For HUNGARIAN law, general rules on termination of contracts are found in CC §§ 319–323; for leases, CC § 424 allows for ex nunc termination in cases of lack of conformity or conflicting third party rights. A general rule allowing termination for non-performance (that must not be of merely minimal importance) is also found in ITALIAN CC art. 1453, cf. 1455. A rule on termination of leases due to considerable non-conformity of the leased object is found in CC art. 1578. According to the MALTESE CC art. 1570, a lease may be terminated for reasons of non-performance. According to the POLISH CC art. 664(2), the lessee may terminate the lease if the goods cannot be used for the agreed purpose because of lack of conformity and the lessor fails to repair them. PORTUGUESE CC art. 1050 allows for termination of a lease in cases where the lessee is prevented from using the goods and where the goods have dangerous defects; it is held that this is not an exhaustive list of grounds for termination (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 387). In SLOVAK law, the lessee may terminate the lease for non-performance, see CC § 679(1); for termination where third parties' rights interfere with the lessee's use, see Svoboda (-Fíger), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, arts. 684, 625. Under SPANISH law, termination is also one of the remedies for non-performance of obligations under a lease contract, see CC arts. 1556 and 1568, the latter with a reference to the general rule in art. 1124.

13. Under ENGLISH law, the right to terminate depends both on the nature of the contractual term breached and (where innominate terms are concerned) the consequences of breach. The breach of a condition will always give rise to an option to terminate. The breach of a term which is neither a condition nor a warranty (i.e. an innominate term) will give rise to an option to terminate if the breach is both 'serious and substantial'. In SCOTLAND, the breach must merely be 'material', meaning that it must go to the root of the contract. In both cases, these breaches are called 'repudiatory'. An anticipatory breach of contract which is repudiatory has the same effect as an actual breach throughout the UNITED KINGDOM (Hochster v. de La Tour (1853) E&B 678, QB; Universal Cargo Carriers Corp. v. Citati [1957] 2 QB 401), entitling the innocent party to elect to immediately terminate the contractual relationship. In none of these cases is termination on repudiatory breach automatic. The innocent party may elect to terminate or may instead affirm the contract and claim damages. An election to terminate following breach must generally be notified and has only prospective effect. A termination clause is often inserted into commercial contracts but recently such clauses have been interpreted strictly (Rice (t/a The Garden Guardian v. Great Yarmouth Borough Council, unreported, CA, 26 July 2000). IRISH law is similar.

14. For some jurisdictions (inter alia AUSTRIA, GERMANY, GREECE, HUNGARY, SLOVAKIA, SPAIN), the lessee may terminate the lease without intervention from the court; for other jurisdictions (inter alia FRANCE, ITALY, MALTA) such intervention is required.

V. Rent reduction

15. See notes to IV.B.–4:102 (Rent reduction).

VI. Claiming damages and interest

16. See notes to III.–3:701 (Right to damages) for general rules on contractual liability in different jurisdictions. In several jurisdictions there are, in addition to the general rules, particular rules concerning liability for loss caused by defects (lack of conformity) in leased objects.

17. The basis of a claim by the lessee for damages in cases of lack of conformity in AUSTRIAN law is CC § 933a (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1096, nos. 110 f.), i.e. fault liability (see also note 3 above) and no strict liability for defects present at the time of conclusion of the contract (Riss, Erhaltungspflicht, 239 fn. 780). The lessor is further liable for losses caused by an omission to repair as soon as possible (see OGH 4 March 1993, SZ 66/26, where delay seems to be the relevant criterion). Under CZECH law, the general rule in CC § 420 applies (fault liability; see also the special rule concerning leases of a means of transportation, CZECH Ccom art. 631(2)). Fault liability is the main rule in DANISH law, also for leases, cf. Gade, Finansiel leasing, 147–151; Bryde Andersen and Lookofsky, Obligationsret I[2], 315. A rule on damages for loss caused by a defect that was known to or is imputable to the lessor, is found in DUTCH CC art. 7:208 (on art. 7:209 and the possibility of derogating from the liability rule, see Rueb/Vrolijk/Wijkerslooth-Vinke, De huurbepalingen verklaard, 7. According to the ESTONIAN LOA § 278 no. 3, the lessee has a claim for damages in cases of lack of conformity; cf. the general rules on excused non-performance (§ 103) and compensation for damage (§ 115). The general rule in FRENCH law is that the lessor is liable for non-performance with the exception of force majeure, see notes to III.–3:701 (Right to damages). Liability for defects of a leased object is dealt with in CC art. 1721: the lessor is normally liable for defects which affect the use or cause damage; for defects arising during the lease period, this rule must be seen in connection with the lessor's obligation of maintenance (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, nos. 21170 ff). For the corresponding rule in BELGIAN law, see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Louage de choses I², nos. 660 ff. The main rule in GERMAN contract law is liability based on fault, meaning wilful or negligent non-performance, and this is the starting point if the leased goods are delayed or performance of repairs and maintenance is delayed, see CC §§ 280, 286 and 276 and the particular rules for leases in CC § 536a(1) second and third alternatives. For a lack of conformity already present at the time of conclusion of the contract there is a strict liability. According to the CC § 536a(1) first alternative, even if it was not possible for the lessor to know of the non-conformity (Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8,] § 536a, no. 3: risk of hidden defects is on the lessor). This rule is applied accordingly where goods are to be produced (BGH 29 April 1953, BGHZ 9, 320). The rule also covers losses caused as a consequence of the defect (BGH 21 February 1962, NJW 1962, 908: bodily injury and loss of income). In GREEK law the lessee is entitled to damages in the following cases: (1) the agreed quality of the leased goods is lacking at the time of conclusion of the contract for lease (CC art. 577 sent. 1, strict liability, CA Athens 2647/1997 EllDik 39, 650); (2) lessor had or ought to have had knowledge of factual or legal defects existing at the conclusion of the lease contract (CC arts. 577 sent. 2 and 583 sent. 1, fault-based liability); (3) a later lack of conformity (legal or factual defects, lack of agreed quality) due to the lessor's fault (CC arts. 578(1), 583 sent. 1); or (4) the lessor does not remedy (CC arts. 578(2), 583 sent. 1). The right to compensation covers any damage causally linked to the defect or the lack of the promised quality (i.e. positive damage and loss of profit), as well as further damage caused to the legal goods of the lessee as a consequence of the defect, e.g. bodily injury (Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 25, no. 25; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 227; Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), arts. 577–578, no. 8). A particular rule on liability for loss caused by defects (vizi) in leased goods is found also in ITALIAN CC art. 1578(2): if the lessor, without fault, was unaware of the defect when the goods were delivered, liability is avoided, cf. Alpa and Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 1578, no. 6. It is held that the rule covers not only damage as a consequence of the defect but also loss as a consequence of the deprivation or diminution of the use (Provera, Locazione. Disposizioni generali, arts. 1578, 216 f.). According to the MALTESE CC art. 1546 the lessor is liable for damage caused by hidden defects existing at the time of the contract, but only if the lessor knew of the defects or had "a reasonable suspicion thereof". Liability for delayed maintenance is governed by MALTESE CC art. 1542 (see also art. 1544). For SLOVAK law, see the general rule in SLOVAK CC § 420 on fault liability. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1556, the lessee can claim compensation for loss in case of non-performance by the lessor. It is held that this rule is applicable also to cases of hidden defects in the leased goods (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 333 and 335). Consequential losses seem to be covered by CC art. 1553, according to which the rules on elimination of defects in sales law (CC arts. 1474 ff) are applicable to leases (subject to the necessary adjustments, see Lacruz Berdejo, Derecho de obligaciones II-2, p. 133² also Albaladejo, Derecho Civil, II[12], no. 12, 640). Liability is dependent on the lessor's fault (Lacruz, loc. cit.). For SWEDISH law, a presumption of fault has been recommended (Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 202–203). For lack of conformity during the lease period, fault is presumed under SWISS LOA art. 259e, cf. HandKomm OR (-Permann), art. 259e, no. 5. Under UNITED KINGDOM and IRISH law, all non-excused breaches by the lessor will automatically give rise to a claim in damages, contractual liability being strict. In ENGLAND defects in title and in conformity (with description, sample, satisfactory quality, and fitness for particular purposes) of the goods are treated as breaches of conditions under the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982. The lessee therefore has a right to elect to terminate or to affirm the contract and claim damages. This remedy is only limited by s. 10A of the same Act, which specifies that where the lessee is not a consumer and the breach is so slight that it would be unreasonable to treat it as repudiatory, the breach will be treated as a breach of warranty (giving rise to a claim in damages only). A breach of the implied warranty concerning quiet possession will give rise to a claim in damages only. The position is similar in SCOTLAND although the distinction between conditions and warranties is not used and the availability of the remedy of termination depends on whether the breach was material. In IRELAND too, defects in conformity (with description, sample, merchantable quality, and fitness for particular purposes) of the goods are treated as breaches of conditions under the Consumer Credit Act 1995. A consumer lessee therefore has a right to elect to terminate or affirm the contract and claim damages. A breach of the implied terms as to charges and quiet possession gives rise to a claim in damages only. The UNITED KINGDOM rule is that damages for late or non-payment do not include interest. This rule is modified by the Late Payments of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998, s. 1(1) and (2), but only with regard to two parties acting in the course of business. In ENGLAND s. 35A of the Supreme Court Act 1981 also gives the court a discretionary right to award interest on debts or damages. This provision applies to all contracts, but is subject to a number of limitations. In IRELAND, it appears that the court may order interest on damages for contractual breach to be paid from the date of judgment or from the date on which notice of interest accrual is given (Ireland (Debtor's) Act 1840), but there is no general duty on the lessee to pay interest on unpaid sums during the period of delay.

VII. Lessee's own remedying of non-conformity – general rules

18. Where the lessee does work on goods belonging to the lessor this is sometimes seen as a case of benevolent intervention in another's affairs (negotiorum gestio), even if the work is done predominantly in the lessee's own interest (see PEL/von Bar, Ben. Int., 64 and 67). According to the AUSTRIAN CC § 1097 second sentence a lessee who makes disbursements which the lessor was obliged to make (or useful disbursements) is regarded as an intervener in another's affairs (cf. CC § 1036). The work does not have to be urgent; the lessee can even act against the wishes of the lessor (OGH 26 April 1961, EvBl 1961/295). It is sufficient that the expenditures were useful from an ex-ante perspective (OGH 31 Mar 1989, JBl 1989, 527), a final benefit for the lessor being no prerequisite for the claim (OGH 17 September 1974, EvBl 1975/122). A (mandatory) rule allowing the lessee to remedy a lack of conformity where the lessor is in default, and to recover reasonable costs, is found in DUTCH CC art. 7:206(3). In FRENCH law, where the main rule is that the lessee needs a court order before performing work on the goods, it is also held that the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs may justify the lessee making necessary repairs (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21168; Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 223).

19. Some jurisdictions explicitly allow the lessee to remedy lack of conformity, and claim reimbursement, without reference to the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs. Thus According to the ESTONIAN LOA § 279(3) the lessee may remedy if the lessor is late "or if the defect or obstacle only restricts the possibility of using the thing for the intended purpose to an insignificant extent". According to the GERMAN CC § 536a(2) the lessee can remedy non-conformity and recover the costs as damages if the lessor is late in remedying (no. 1) or if immediate remedying is necessary for preservation or restoration of the goods (no. 2). The alternative in no. 1 requires delay, which normally presupposes a reminder (see CC § 286 sect. 2, in particular nos. 3 and 4, Schmidt-Futterer (-Eisenschmid), Mietrecht[9], § 536a, nos. 116 f.). For other disbursements, CC § 539(1) refers to the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs, including the requirement of an intention to benefit another. According to the GREEK CC art. 578(2), the lessee can remedy non-conformity and claim the costs as damages if the lessor is late in remedying. The lessor is also obliged (CC art. 591) to reimburse the lessee for any necessary expenses, i.e. expenses required to keep the goods suitable, while useful expenses, i.e. expenses which result in an increase in value of the leased goods, are reimbursed according to the provisions on benevolent intervention. If there is no urgent need, the lessee is entitled to remedy the lack of conformity only after having notified the lessor (CC art. 589) and only if the latter is late in remedying (CC art. 578(2)) (Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 24 nos. 10–11). Under HUNGARIAN law, the general rules on remedies for defective performance apply. According to the CC § 306 (3), the creditor, in this case the lessee, is entitled to repair the leased goods or have them repaired at the expense of the lessor, if the lessor does not undertake or does not accomplish the repairs within a reasonable time. It is stated in ITALIAN CC art. 1577(2) that the lessee may perform urgent repairs, with a right to reimbursement, provided that the lessor is notified. The consequences of an omission to notify are debated (Alpa and Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 1577, no. 4: no consequence or application of CC art. 1227). According to the POLISH CC art. 663, if the lessor does not repair defects that make the goods unfit for the agreed purpose the lessee may have the defects repaired and claim reimbursement of expenses. According to the SLOVAK CC § 669, the lessee may perform repairs that were to be made by the lessor. The lessee has a claim for reimbursement if repairs were made with the lessor's consent or where the lessor has not carried out the repairs in good time despite notification. If repairs were made without the lessor's consent or without notifying the lessor, the lessee's claim is limited to the lessor's enrichment (Svoboda (-Švecová), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, arts. 669, 615). There is a similar rule in CZECH law.

20. The main rule in several jurisdictions is that the lessee's own remedying of non-conformity is allowed only after a court order. Thus, in FRENCH law the ordinary rules apply (CC art. 1144, Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 223). The lessor must be late; and the lessee requires the authorisation of a court to carry out remedies; under these conditions the lessee has a claim for reimbursement of expenditure (Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], nos. 334-5, 240 f.). A court order is generally also required by SWISS LOA art. 98, but in contracts for lease the lessee can within certain limits have non-conformity remedied without a court order (LOA art. 259b(b), see Guhl (-Koller), OR[9], § 44, nos. 41 and 42). In SPAIN, the lessee cannot normally resort to self help and perform the lessor's unperformed obligation to repair, even if the lessee gives the lessor due notice and the lessor still fails to do the repairs. According to the court doctrine (see Bercovitz (-Rodriguez Morata), Comentarios a la Ley de Arrendamientos Urbanos, 512), and the Law on Urban Leases (art. 21.3), the lessee is only entitled to claim specific performance or rescission for breach, being only allowed to resort to self help where the repairs are urgent.

VIII. Right to enforcement of specific performance as limit

21. It is sometimes explicitly stated in national law that the right of the lessee to have non-conformity remedied, against reimbursement, presupposes that the lessor (still) has an obligation to remedy the non-conformity in question (for AUSTRIAN law, Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1096, no. 2; for GERMAN law, (indirectly) Blank and Börstinghaus, Miete-Komm², § 536a, no. 36; for FRENCH law, Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21168; for ITALIAN law, Alpa and Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 1577, no. 5). It is not always clear whether this refers to the right to reimbursement or to the right to have the work done as well.

IX. Lessor's right to cure not affected

22. General comments on the debtor's right to cure are found in the comments to Book III, Chapter 3, Section 2. Regarding the lessor's right to cure where the lessee wishes to remedy the non-conformity, it seems that the lessee does not necessarily have to give the lessor a chance to cure under AUSTRIAN law, as the lessee can take such steps without notifying the lessor and without the lessor even having knowledge of the work (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1097, no. 1). Nevertheless, under certain circumstances the lessee may be held liable for the negative effects of an omission to notify (Schwimann, loc. cit. no. 15: higher costs for the lessee than for the lessor; see also on legal defects, no. 8). Similar results seems to follow from CZECH CC § 668. In ESTONIAN law (main rule), DUTCH law, GERMAN law, GREEK law, and FRENCH law, a certain delay is required before the lessee acquires a right to act. In FRENCH law, a court order is required in addition (see above), and this normally implies that the lessor has had a chance to cure. According to the SWISS LOA art. 259b(b), the lessor's knowledge is a precondition, and in legal writings it is said that a time limit given by the lessee is indispensable (Guhl (-Koller), OR[9], § 44, no. 41), thus giving the lessor a chance to cure.

X. No right to remedy non-conformity

23. Since specific performance is a discretionary equitable remedy under ENGLISH law, the lessee has no legal right to independently remedy non-conformity and subsequently recoup expenses. The lessee may however elect to affirm the contract on breach and claim damages to cover the costs of remedying the non-conformity.

IV.B.–4:102: Rent reduction

(1) The lessee may reduce the rent for a period in which the value of the lessor's performance is decreased due to delay or lack of conformity, to the extent that the reduction in value is not caused by the lessee.

(2) The rent may be reduced even for periods in which the lessor retains the right to perform or cure according to III.–3:103 (Notice fixing additional time for performance), III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules) paragraph (2) and III.–3:204 (Consequences of allowing debtor opportunity to cure)).

(3) Notwithstanding the rule in paragraph (1), the lessee may lose the right to reduce the rent for a period according to IV.B.–4:103 (Notification of lack of conformity).

COMMENTS

Rent reduction

Clarification of the general rule. The first paragraph of the present Article clarifies the general rule on price reduction (III.–3:601 (Right to reduce price)) for the purposes of lease contracts. Firstly, the lessee may reduce the rent as a consequence of delay or lack of conformity, i.e. for periods during which the goods are still not available and for periods during which non-conforming goods are accepted by the lessee. Secondly, it is made clear that rent may be reduced for the entire period during which the value of the lessor's performance is diminished. This means that the lessee may reduce the rent even for periods where the lessor has still not had a chance to cure a lack of conformity, for example by way of repairs. Whether or not it was possible for the lessor to cure is relevant to a claim in damages, but not to rent reduction. However, to the extent that the lessee caused the decrease in value, the lessee cannot reduce the rent. This rule, stated in III.–3:101 (Remedies available) paragraph (3), is included in the present provision, as the wording might otherwise be regarded as too wide.

Derogation from general rules. The second paragraph of the present Article, in combination with the wording of the first paragraph, makes it clear that the lessee may reduce the rent even if the lessee has given notice allowing the lessor an additional period for performance. Under the general rule in III.–3:103 (Notice fixing additional time for performance) paragraph (2), the creditor may withhold performance during the additional period "but may not resort to any other remedy". It seems appropriate to modify this rule for lease contracts, where the lessee's performance is normally directly related to a period of time. For this reason, the lessee may also reduce the rent there and then during the period allowed for cure. According to the general rule found in III.–3:204 (Consequences of allowing debtor opportunity to cure), the creditor may withhold performance during this period "but may not resort to any other remedy". The result of these modifications is a difference in process or timing rather than substance. Under the general rules the lessee can always withhold payment of rent during the period allowed for performance or cure and then reduce it later when the period has elapsed.

The engine of a leased boat breaks down. The lessor wants to replace the engine, and this can be done in one week. The lessee did not intend to use the boat much during the relevant week anyhow and cannot resort to termination of the contractual relationship. As the boat cannot be used at all while the engine is being replaced, the lessee can claim a rent reduction equal to one week's rent.

Late notification. The third paragraph of the present Article refers to the notification rule in IV.B.–4:103 (Notification of lack of conformity), according to which the lessee, in case of late notification, may lose the right to rely on non-performance for a period corresponding to the unreasonable delay in notification.

NOTES

I. Non-performance and rent reduction

1. Rent reduction as a consequence of non-performance of the lessor's obligations is known to numerous jurisdictions throughout Europe. The scope and content of rent reduction rules vary. There is a close relationship between a claim for rent reduction and the content of the lessor's obligations. If a certain disturbance of the lessee's use of the goods does not amount to non-performance of the lessor's obligations, there is normally no rent reduction. Comparative notes on the lessor's obligations are found in Chapter 3.

2. In several jurisdictions there are general rules on rent reduction in cases of lack of conformity. According to the AUSTRIAN CC § 1096(1) sent. 2, the lessee is entitled to a proportionate reduction in the rent for periods where the goods are faulty and thus not (fully) fit for the agreed use. The rule applies where the goods are not available for the lessee's use or the use is disturbed, even where the physical condition is not affected (Stabentheiner, Mietrecht, no. 61). The effect of the rule is that the lessor bears the risk where use is affected by a casual event (Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I^{3}, § 1117, no. 2); the fault of the lessor is not a prerequisite. For similar results under DANISH law, see Gade, Finansiel leasing, 136–137. Rules on rent reduction are found in CZECH CC § 673 (the goods cannot be used in the agreed or normal manner), § 674 (the goods can be used only to a limited extent), and § 721 (corresponding rule for business leases). In DUTCH law, the lessee has a right to reduce the rent from the day that the lessor had sufficient information to take measures (or the day when the lessee informed the lessor of the defect) and up until the day the defect is remedied, CC art. 7:207(1). According to the ESTONIAN LOA § 296, the lessee may reduce the rent for any period where the goods have not been in conformity with the contract or not available for the lessee's use. The general principles of price reduction in LOA § 112 apply as to the extent of the reduction (Estonian Supreme Court decision no. 3-2-1-84-05. RT III 2006, 39, 326). In GERMAN law the lessee is entitled to rent reduction where the goods presented a lack of conformity when they were made available to the lessee or where such a defect arises during the lease period, CC § 536(1), regardless of fault on the part of the lessor. The rule also applies where a promised quality is or becomes lacking (CC § 536(2)) or where use is affected by a third party right (CC § 536(3)). An insignificant lack of conformity will be disregarded (CC § 536(1) last sentence). The relevant lack of conformity may relate to circumstances other than the condition of the goods; it may also be a legal, factual or economic condition that interferes with the lessee's use (Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete^{8}, § 536, nos. 3 and 14; BGH 23 September 1992, NJW 1992, 3226, 3227: obstacles to use by public authorities). According to the GREEK CC arts. 576(1) and (2) and 583 sent. 1, the lessee has a right to rent reduction for lack of conformity (legal or factual defects, lack of agreed quality), either at the start of the lease period or later. Fault is not a requirement, and the rule also applies when repairs and maintenance affect the lessee's use (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I^{2}, § 39 B II 2). Under HUNGARIAN law, general rules on price reduction for non-conforming performance, CC § 306(b), also apply to lease contracts. For a discussion of the right to rent reduction under NORWEGIAN law, including for periods during which the lessor repairs the goods, see Falkanger, Leie av skib, 438–439. In POLISH law, the lessee has a right to an appropriate reduction in the rent if lack of conformity makes the goods unfit for the agreed use, CC art. 664(1). There is no fault requirement, Bieniek (-Ciepła), Komentarz do Kodeksu Cywilnego, art. 664, 260. According to the SLOVAK CC § 674, the lessee has the right to an adequate reduction in rent in cases of lack of conformity not caused by the lessee. A claim for rent reduction, regardless of fault, because of reduced usability follows also from SWISS LOA art. 259d. The rule applies even where the lessor has no influence over the situation (BSK (-R. Weber), OR I[3], art. 259d, no. 1).

3. In other jurisdictions legislation on rent reduction is less general. Rules on rent reduction may be found in FRENCH CC art. 1722 (partial destruction of the leased object by fortuitous event), CC art. 1724 (repair work lasting for more than forty days) and CC art. 1726 (disturbance due to legal action concerning ownership). It is, however, held that rent reduction may also be claimed in (other) cases of non-conformity (Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 251, Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21271, 670 with reference to sales). For BELGIAN law see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I[2], nos. 424, 438, 1127. According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1584, if repair work lasts for more than one-sixth of the duration of the lease and, in any case, for more than twenty days, the lessee is entitled to a reduction of the rent in proportion to the duration of the entire period of repairs and to the extent of his impaired enjoyment. A rule on proportionate rent reduction in cases of non-conformity at the time the goods were made available to the lessee is found in CC art. 1578(1), and this rule applies correspondingly to non-conformity during the lease period. Where the usability of the goods is affected by external events, rules on supervening partial impossibility (CC art. 1463) can lead to a corresponding rent reduction (see Alpa and Mariconda, Codice Civile commentato IV, art. 1581, no. 2). The application of the latter rule seems, however, to be disputed (see Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1587, no. V5, but compare for example Cass. 11 February 2005, 2855/2005, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 4). New judgments seem to allow application of CC art. 1584 per analogiam and to allow a general right to rent reduction in cases of non-performance (see Cass. 13 July 2005, no. 14739, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005 fasc. 7/8). According to the MALTESE CC art. 1545, the lessee has a claim for rent reduction (abatement) if there are "faults or defects which prevent or diminish the use of the goods", and the rules also applies where "such faults or defects … have arisen after the stipulation of the contract". Other rules on rent reduction are found in CC art. 1548(2) (repair work lasting for more than forty days), art. 1551 (use disturbed by third party actions concerning rights in the goods) and art. 1571(2) (partial destruction by fortuitous events). SPANISH CC art. 1558(2) allows for rent reduction in cases of urgent repair work lasting longer than forty days. The code seems to contain no general rule for the case of limited usability not imputable to one of the parties. According to the TS, such circumstances do not lead to the extinction of the contract, but to a proportional reduction in the rent (TS 26 December 1942, RAJ 1942, 1547). It is held that the rule in CC art. 1558(2) on rent reduction is to be extended to disturbances to use that are independent of the lessor's will (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], 336).

II. Implementation of rent reduction

4. In AUSTRIAN law rent reduction takes place ex-lege; no declaration or lawsuit is necessary (Stabentheiner, Mietrecht, no. 60). The lessee may claim back rent already paid, under the conditions of CC § 1431 (payment of a non-existing debt, Stabentheiner, loc. cit.). Under DUTCH law, the reduction of rent has to be claimed in court to prevent improper use of the (general) option for partial termination out of court (CC art. 6:265 CC). According to the ESTONIAN LOA § 112(2), a price reduction requires a declaration to the debtor; a refund may be claimed for money already paid (§ 112(3)). Under GERMAN law rent reduction also takes place as a result of law, without a declaration of the lessee, Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 536, no. 30 (but see also CC § 536c(2)(1): limitation of the lessee's right in case of late notification). Rent already paid can be claimed back under CC § 812(1) sentence 1 alt. 1 (MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB[4], § 536, no. 27). The lessee has no claim, though, if excess rent is paid for a longer time with knowledge of the lack of conformity and without any reservations (BGH 18 June 1997, NJW 1997, 2674). In GREEK law there seems to be no unanimity as to the implementation. It has been asserted that rent reduction takes place ex lege (Mantzoufas, Enochikon Dikaion[3], § 44 II 2, 339–340; Toussis, Enochiko Dikaio, § 67, 217); that it is exercised by the lessee's unilateral declaration addressed to the lessor (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[6], § 30b B); and that it may be exercised either extra-judicially or via lawsuit (Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 25, no. 22; Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), art. 576, no. 12). Rent already paid can be claimed back according to the provisions on unjustified enrichment (Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), art. 576, no. 10). According to the POLISH CC art. 664(1), the lessee may only demand reduction of future rent and may not claim back rent already paid. According to the SLOVAK CC § 675, the lessor must notify the lessor of a claim for rent reduction without undue delay and no later than six months after the claim arises. There is a similar rule in CZECH law. The nature of the rent reduction is controversial in SWISS law (BSK (-R. Weber), OR I³, art. 259d, no. 3: Gestaltungsrecht or ex-lege reduction). In several countries explicit statements concerning the start of rent reduction are not easily found.

III. No explicit right to rent reduction

5. Under UNITED KINGDOM and IRISH law, there is no explicit legal right to rent reduction as a remedy. The actio quanti minoris of the civil law is unknown to common law. It would be more natural in these cases to see the remedy of rent reduction as a form of damages for non-performance of the contract. If the goods are defective, the lessee may recover damages equal to the difference between the value of the goods actually delivered and the value which the goods would have had if they had been in accordance with the contract. Further, where performance is incomplete and the price can easily be apportioned, it seems that the lessee may treat the contract as apportionable and pay only for the units delivered (e.g. Dawood Ltd. v. Heath Ltd. [1961] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 512, Q.B.). Finally, the aggrieved party may also set off claims arising out of the same transaction against sums that party would otherwise have to pay (Beale, Remedies, 50–52).

IV.B.–4:103: Notification of lack of conformity

(1) The lessee cannot resort to remedies for lack of conformity unless notification is given to the lessor. Where notification is not timely, the lack of conformity is disregarded for a period corresponding to the unreasonable delay. Notification is always considered timely where it is given within a reasonable time after the lessee has become, or could reasonably be expected to have become, aware of the lack of conformity.

(2) When the lease period has ended the rules in III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity) apply.

(3) The lessor is not entitled to rely on the provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) if the lack of conformity relates to facts of which the lessor knew or could reasonably be expected to have known and which the lessor did not disclose to the lessee.

COMMENTS

A. Notification within a reasonable time

Purpose. The lessee must notify the lessor of a lack of conformity within a reasonable time. Notification may be necessary to give the lessor a chance to cure the lack of conformity, and in any case the lessor has a legitimate interest in knowing whether or not the lessee will make a claim based on non-performance. This is important in particular for reductions in rent. The lessor should have the opportunity to earn the full rent by remedying the lack of conformity. With regard to damages, the situation may be such that the lessor's non-performance is excused for a period if the lessor could not have known of the lack of conformity, but even in this respect there is a need for a rule on notification to avoid doubt. The lessor should also be given a chance to cure or to take other measures before the lessee is allowed to terminate the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance.

Reasonable time. Notification may always be given within a reasonable time after the lessee has become, or could reasonably be expected to have become, aware of the lack of conformity. What is a reasonable time will depend on the circumstances, for example the kind of goods leased, the parties involved, the lease period, the actual phase of the contract, and the nature of the lack of conformity. A notification can be too late even if it is given immediately after the lessee has become aware of the lack of conformity if the lessee could reasonably have been expected to have become aware of it earlier. It has not been deemed necessary to include a provision concerning the lessee's examination of the goods. A duty to examine would only refer to the situation at the start of the lease period, but the notification rule also relates to a lack of conformity arising during the lease period. In any case, where the lack of conformity could have been discovered by normal examination, this should be taken into consideration when establishing what the lessee should reasonably have been aware of. When the lease period has come to an end, the general rule in III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity) applies, cf. paragraph (2) of the present Article. The difference between the two provisions lies in the cut-off effect, cf. Comment B.

Informing of lack of conformity. The lessee must give sufficient information to enable the lessor to identify the lack of conformity. Without such information the notification cannot serve its purpose. Often it is sufficient to explain the incorrect functioning, as the lessee cannot be expected to know why the goods do not function properly.

B. Effect of late notification

Cut-off effect. The effect of late notification is that the lessee cannot resort to remedies – typically rent reduction – for the lack of conformity in question for a period corresponding to the unreasonable delay. The lessee may, however, still resort to remedies with regard to the period which follows and of course with regard to other occurrences of lack of conformity for which notification is given in time. It has been found too harsh to leave the lessee without any remedies for the lack of conformity, including subsequent periods, as the lack of conformity continues to be a non-performance of the lessor's obligations. Also it has been considered preferable not to cut off remedies for the entire period prior to notification; this would lead to a loss of remedies for a period longer than the actual delay. The question of remaining remedies for subsequent periods does not arise when the lease period has not come to an end, and in this situation the general rule in III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity) applies.

No absolute time limit. For some types of contracts there are absolute time limits for notification of a lack of conformity, implying a cut-off effect for remedies irrespective of whether the creditor in the relevant obligation had – or could have – discovered the lack of conformity. Thus, in a contract for sale between two businesses, there is an absolute limit of two years from – in practice – delivery in IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity) paragraph (2). No such absolute limit is found in this Part of Book IV. In a contract for lease lack of conformity is an issue both at the start of the lease period and during the entire lease period. Each instance of lack of conformity must be notified within a reasonable time.

C. Notification of remedy

Specific performance and termination for non-performance. According to III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations) paragraph (4) and III.–3:508 (Loss of right to terminate), a party may lose the right to enforce specific performance or the right to terminate the contractual relationship if enforced performance is not sought or notice of termination not given within a reasonable time after the party has become, or could reasonably be expected to have become, aware of the non-performance. These rules apply in addition to the rule in paragraph (1) of the present Article. Specific performance, along with remedying of a lack of conformity, and termination for non-performance, are remedies which directly affect the lessor's performance. They must therefore be claimed within a reasonable time. A "neutral" notification according to paragraph (1) will not give the lessor sufficient information in this respect. A claim for performance or a notice of termination may be given in the first notification of lack of conformity, but the situation may also be such that there is still time after the first notification to claim performance or to give notice of termination.

Other remedies. There are no separate rules on notification regarding withholding of rent, claims for rent reduction or damages if notification of lack of conformity is given according to paragraphs (1) and (2) of the present Article. The lessee may, however, lose such claims according to general rules on good faith and faire dealing and prescription.

D. Exception to cut-off effect

Knowledge and non-disclosure. Comment A1 describes the purposes of the notification rule: the lessor needs information concerning the facts discovered by the lessee and concerning the lessee's assessment of the performance. If the facts to which the lack of conformity relates to are already known to the lessor, or the lessor can reasonably be expected to know the facts, notification is not necessary regarding these facts. The lessor still needs to know however whether or not the lessee wants to pursue remedies (it might also be that the lessee approves of the goods). This interest is protected by the notification requirement, but only in so far as the lessor has disclosed the relevant facts to the lessee. There is no good reason to protect the lessor through a notification rule if the lessor knew that the performance did not conform to the contract but failed to disclose this information to the lessee. A corresponding provision is found in III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity) paragraph (3).

NOTES

I. Overview

1. For notification as a prerequisite to enforcement of specific performance and to termination for non-performance, see notes to III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations) paragraph (4) and III.–3:508 (Loss of right to terminate). See also notes to III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity). The importance of notification may vary according to the nature of the obligation and the non-performance. Where an obligation is one of means (i.e. an obligation to use best efforts, not an obligation to achieve a specific result) the lessor's knowledge of the actual situation, for example a need for repair of the goods, is typically a precondition for non-performance. Also where liability is based on fault, knowledge of the situation is typically necessary. But notification may be a prerequisite for remedies even where there is an obligation to achieve a specific result and where there is liability without fault.

II. Notification and cut-off effect in lease contracts

2. In AUSTRIAN law, late notification may lead to loss of the lessee's right to rent reduction and of the lessee's right to terminate (OGH 17 December 1985, RdW 1986, 208, see also Koziol (-Iro), ABGB, § 1097, no. 1) but the lessee does not lose a claim for specific performance (OGH 29 Jun 1971 MietSlg 23.209, obiter) or a claim for reimbursement of the costs of having non-conformity remedied (OGH 15 September 1972, EvBl 1972/74, Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1097, no. 15). Payment of full rent with knowledge of counterclaims may be regarded as a waiver of rent reduction (Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1096, no. 11). Further, the right to terminate may be regarded as waived if it is not invoked without undue delay (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1117, no. 13). Under CZECH law, there is a notification requirement for rent reduction, CC § 675 (for more detail see Knappová (-Salač), Civil Law II[4], 245 and Supreme Court 20 Cdo 2295/99), cf. also special rules for business leases, CC § 721(2) and for leases of a means of transportation, Ccom art. 635(2). If notification is given in time, rent reduction may be claimed with retroactive effect. A claim for damages or specific performance is not available without a request from the creditor, CC § 563, cf. Ccom art. 340(2), and the lessee may not withhold the rent without notifying the lessor (Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Škárová), OZ[10], 996). Prior notification seems to be no formal requirement for termination under CC § 679. For DANISH law, it has been argued that late notification of lack of conformity at the start of the lease period may prevent the lessee from claiming rent reduction, withholding rent and claiming damages, but not from claiming specific performance. There is however no cut-off effect of late notification of lack of conformity during the lease period, see Gade, Finansiel leasing, 160–161. In DUTCH law, there is a general obligation for the lessee to report a defect to the lessor (CC art. 7:206(3)). Some claims have their own notification-rules, for instance the claim for cure (remedying the defect) requires an express request by the lessee, and the claim for rent reduction requires adequate notification. The right of the lessee to remedy the defect (CC art. 7:206 (3)) and some kinds of damage compensation require a default, brought about, in principle, by a written warning. For the latter requirement there are many statutory and case-law exceptions (CC art. 7:208). In ESTONIAN law, late notification results in extra time for the lessor's cure, LOA § 282(3). Notification is required According to the FRENCH CC art. 1726 for rent reduction where the lessee's use is affected by third parties' rights, but the lessee may show that late notification was without importance, as where the lessor had the information anyhow or where the lessor could not have remedied the lack of conformity (Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 303). The lessor's obligation to maintain the goods is not dependent on formal notification (mise en demeure, see CC art. 1146, Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 220). It may, however, under the circumstances be necessary to make the lessor aware of the need to maintain the goods (Cass.civ. 15 July 1963, D. 1964, 5, Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 208) or to make clear what the claim of the lessee is (Cass.civ. 21 February 1984, Bull.civ. 1984.I, no. 68). According to the GERMAN CC § 536c(1) the lessee has a duty to notify a lack of conformity arising during the lease period. The same is true of the need to protect the goods and claims of third parties. To the extent that late notification has impeded the lessor's remedying of the non-conformity, the lessee's claim for rent reduction or damages may be reduced, and the lessee cannot terminate without giving the lessor a chance to cure (CC § 536c(2)). Other remedies are unaffected, such as a claim for specific performance, withholding of rent (see Schmidt-Futterer (-Eisenschmid), Mietrecht[9], § 536c, nos. 35 and 37), a claim for reimbursement of costs for remedying non-conformity (CC § 536a(2)) and claims based on non-contractual liability; late notification can in these cases be regarded as contributory negligence (Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 536c, no. 10). After notification the lessee is once again entitled to rent reduction (Emmerich and Sonnenschein, loc. cit. § 536c no. 11). For GREEK law, it has been argued that a failure to notify can lead to loss of the rights to rent reduction and termination for non-performance (Kafkas, Enochiko Dikaio I[7], arts. 585–586 § 4 and art. 589 § 7; Toussis, Enochiko Dikaio, § 69, 229; contra Zepos, Enochikon Dikaion II[2], § 7 IV, 212 and fn. 2). Under HUNGARIAN law, the general rule in CC § 307 applies (notification as soon as possible in the circumstances; late notification may result in liability for damage caused by the delay, not loss of remedies; in consumer contracts notification within two months is always timely). According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1577, the lessee must notify the lessor of the need for repairs not falling under the lessee's obligations. The lessor's obligation to perform repairs and the lessor's liability for non-performance are dependent on knowledge of the need for repairs (see Alpa and Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 1577, no. 1 and Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1577, no. II1). Failing to give notification of third parties' claims may lead to liability for the lessee but not to loss of remedies (Alpa and Mariconda, loc. cit. art. 1586 no. 1, Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1586, no. 3). According to POLISH law, notification is a prerequisite for rent reduction, cf. Notes to IV.B.–4:102 (Rent reduction). Termination also presupposes that the lessor has been given a chance to remedy the lack of conformity, cf. CC art. 664(2) and Radwański (-Panowicz-Lipska), System Prawa Prywatnego VIII, 27. Further if the lessee does not notify the lessor of a lack of conformity, the goods are presumed to be in conformity with the contract, cf. CC art. 675(1). Under SLOVAK CC § 668(1), the lessee must notify the lessor without undue delay of the need for repairs that are to be made by the lessor. If in breach of this duty, the lessee loses the rights to withhold rent, reduce rent or terminate the contract without notice (Svoboda (-Górász), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, 614). Lack of notification of the need for repairs may also lead to a loss of claims for reimbursement of expenditure by lessee on these repairs; in this case the lessee may only demand reimbursement limited to the lessor's enrichment (see CC § 669). In SPANISH law the lessee must inform the lessor as soon as possible of claims and disturbances by third parties and also of the need for repairs (CC art. 1559). Such notification is a prerequisite for remedies for non-performance of the obligation to repair (Bercovitz, Manual de Derecho Civil, 179). SWISS law does not recognise a cut-off effect for late notification in lease contracts (Guhl (-Koller), OR[9], § 44, no. 37; BG 22 October 1981, BGE 107 II 426, 429: different from sales law), but the lessor's knowledge of non-conformity is a prerequisite for certain remedies (inter alia SWISS LOA art. 259b litra a for termination, art. 259b litra b for self-help, art. 259d for rent reduction). The way in which the lessor learns of non-conformity is irrelevant (BSK (-R. Weber), OR I[3], § 257g, no. 7). Standard contract forms my not establish a cut-off effect for late notification (BSK, loc. cit. no. 9). Under UNITED KINGDOM and IRISH law, where the lessee chooses to affirm the contract despite lack of conformity or the lack of conformity is not such as to give rise to the right to terminate, the lessee must inform the lessor of the lack of conformity and allow the lessor a reasonable time to remedy the breach. Notice is not required where the lessor has knowledge or is deemed to have knowledge of the lack of conformity.

IV.B.–4:104: Remedies to be directed towards supplier of the goods

(1) This Article applies where:

(a) the lessor, on the specifications of the lessee, acquires the goods from a supplier selected by the lessee;

(b) the lessee, in providing the specifications for the goods and selecting the supplier, does not rely primarily on the skill and judgement of the lessor;

(c) the lessee approves the terms of the supply contract;

(d) the supplier's obligations under the supply contract are owed, by law or by contract, to the lessee as a party to the supply contract or as if the lessee were a party to that contract; and

(e) the supplier's obligations owed to the lessee cannot be varied without the consent of the lessee.

(2) The lessee has no right to enforce performance by the lessor, to reduce the rent or to damages or interest from the lessor, for late delivery or for lack of conformity, unless non-performance results from an act or omission of the lessor.

(3) The provision in paragraph (2) does not preclude:

(a) any right of the lessee to reject the goods, to terminate the lease under Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5 (Termination) or, prior to acceptance of the goods, to withhold rent to the extent that the lessee could have resorted to these remedies as a party to the supply contract; or

(b) any remedy of the lessee where a third party right or reasonably based claim prevents, or is otherwise likely to interfere with, the lessee's continuous use of the goods in accordance with the contract.

(4) The lessee cannot terminate the lessee's contractual relationship with the supplier under the supply contract without the consent of the lessor.

COMMENTS

A. Overview

"Financial leasing" and remedies. This Article applies mainly to contracts that correspond to the contracts dealt with in the Unidroit Convention on International Financial Leasing (Ottawa 1988). In these transactions the lessor has the role of a financing party, and the parties regularly seek to channel some of the lessee's remedies towards the supplier of the goods, past the lessor. This is the same rule established by the Unidroit Convention. Other special rules concerning the contracts described in the Convention are found in IV.B.–2:103 (Tacit prolongation) paragraph (4), IV.B.–3:101 (Availability of the goods) paragraph (2), IV.B.–3:104 (Conformity of the goods during the lease period) paragraph (2), and IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in conformity with the contract) paragraph (2). The criteria for applying special rules are not the same for every one of these provisions, as different aspects of the contracts justify different rules. It is not a requirement for the application of this Article that the entire cost be amortised by rent payments. Thus the Article also applies to certain leases with so-called residual value.

B. Scope of application

Prerequisites. The Article applies where certain prerequisites are met. These prerequisites depend partly on the factual situation in which the contract is concluded and partly on the terms of the individual contract. The prerequisites are cumulative; it is therefore not sufficient that only some of them are met.

Goods supplied for the particular lease. The Article applies only where the lessor has acquired the goods on the basis of specifications provided by the lessee, from a supplier selected by the lessee. For practical purposes this means that the goods are acquired solely for the lease contract in question. This reflects the role of the lessor in such contracts: the lessor is typically a financing institution without supplies of goods for lease purposes and without any interest in purchasing goods that are not already intended for a particular client. The goods are normally meant for a single lease contract and not for several subsequent contracts with different lessees.

Specification of goods. The goods must have been acquired on the basis of specifications provided by the lessee. This means that the goods are acquired for the purposes and needs of the lessee, and that the lessor cannot unilaterally specify the goods to be acquired and their qualities. This element in particular justifies the fact that liability for lack of conformity is channelled past the lessor. It is not necessary that the specifications be drawn up by the lessee exclusively. Nor is it necessary that the lessee has had the last word in all respects. The lessee may have consulted an independent expert, the supplier, and even the lessor, but the specifications must be drafted for the lessee and to satisfy the lessee's own purposes. The lessor is of course free to abstain from the transaction if the specifications drawn up by the lessee are thought to be inappropriate.

Selection of supplier. The supplier must be selected by the lessee. Once again, this is a result of the characteristic role of the lessor in these contracts. In ordinary contracts for lease the lessor will decide where to source goods for the lease business. It is not necessary that the lessee choose freely, independently of the lessor. The lessor will normally want to approve the supplier, as the supply contract is made between the lessor and the supplier. It is not unusual that the supplier co-operates with a financing institution that will offer contracts for lease to the supplier's customers. Thus it can be said that the supplier has selected the lessor. However, with regard to the lease contract, the supplier is still selected by the lessee. This, too, is part of the justification for channelling liability to the supplier, past the lessor.

Specification of goods and selection of supplier. The rules apply only where the lessee has not primarily relied on the lessor's skill and judgement in specifying the goods and selecting the supplier. This is another element of the justification for relieving the lessor of some of the normal liability under the lease contract. As already mentioned in the two preceding paragraphs, the lessor may want to approve the specification of the goods and the selection of the supplier, and the lessor may also give advice in this matter. It is only when the lessee has primarily relied on the lessor's skill and judgement that the contract for lease will fall outside the scope of the present Article. If that is the case, the lessor has an active role not typical of the transactions dealt with here, and there is a presumption that the general lease rules apply.

Other elements of the transaction. The lessor may have given advice concerning other elements of the transaction, besides the specification of goods and the selection of a supplier, for example concerning the costs of the transaction, lease period and profile of rent payments, tax and accounting effects, etc. This is not incompatible with application of this Article.

Approval of the terms of the supply contract. The lessee must have approved the terms of the supply contract. This is essential, as the supply contract will to a great extent determine the lessee's rights in the case of non-performance. Normally, however, the parties to the supply contract will be only the lessor alone and the supplier and the terms will be agreed by these two parties. It is not a prerequisite that the lessee have any influence on the terms; approval is sufficient. There are no formal requirements concerning the lessee's approval of the terms of the supply contract and proof of approval may be provided by any means, (cf. II.–1:106 (Form). In most cases the parties will prefer to have the lessee's approval in writing.

Supplier's obligations owed to lessee. The rules contained in the present Article apply only where the supplier's obligations under the supply contract are owed to the lessee as a party to the contract or as if the lessee were a party to the supply contract. This is why the lessor may be partly relieved of liability for non-performance. In the Unidroit Convention, the lessee's rights under the supply contract are a result of the application of the Convention (or rather the national law implementing the Convention). Here, another solution is chosen: the lessee's rights under the supply contract are a prerequisite for applying the rules of the present Article. The supplier's obligations may be owed to the lessee as a result of a rule of law (national law) or as a result of the contract itself, where a stipulation in favour of the lessee as a third party is included.

Rules of law. If a rule of law, applicable to the relationship between supplier and lessee, provides that the supplier's obligations under the supply contract are owed to the lessee as if the lessee were a party to the contract, then the prerequisite for application of the present Chapter is met. It has not been deemed necessary to examine national law to establish whether or not such rules exist (apart from rules implementing the Unidroit Convention). It should be mentioned that rules on "direct action" found in some jurisdictions are normally subject to certain limitations, so that the supplier's obligations are not owed to the lessee entirely as if the lessee were a party to the contract.

Contract with lessee. The lessee may be a party to the supply contract, together with the lessor, to the effect that the supplier's obligations are owed to the lessee. Whether or not this is the case must be established by ordinary interpretation of the contract.

Stipulation in favour of the lessee as a third party. The supplier and the lessor may stipulate in the supply contract that the supplier's obligations are owed to the lessee as if the lessee were party to the contract, cf. the general rules on stipulation in favour of a third party in Book II, Chapter 9, Section 3. If it is further agreed that the supplier's obligations cannot be varied without the consent of the lessee (cf. the following paragraph), the rules of the present Article will apply (provided the other prerequisites are also met).

Supplier's obligations cannot be varied without lessee's consent. It is not sufficient that the supplier's obligations under the supply contract are owed to the lessee; it must also be ensured – whether via application of a rule of law or under the contract – that these obligations may not be varied without the lessee's consent. In particular, this qualification is important with regard to a stipulation in favour of the lessee as a third party in the contract between lessor and supplier, as the contracting parties may in many cases remove, revoke or modify the third party's right, cf. II.–9:303 (Rejection or revocation of benefit), unless otherwise agreed.

C. Effects

Channelling liability past the lessor. The effect of the present Article is such that liability for non-performance on the part of the lessor is, to a certain extent, channelled past the lessor. Some of the normal remedies cannot be pursued against the lessor, and in such instances the lessee is left with the sole option of pursuing the supplier. The remedies will mainly depend therefore on the supply contract, rather than the lease contract. The precise scope of the supplier's liability to the lessee is not expressed in the present Article, such liability being a prerequisite for applying the Article at all.

Overview. In the case of late delivery, including non-delivery, and lack of conformity the lessee has no right to performance from the lessor, to reduce the rent, or to damages. Such non-performance is normally caused by the supplier. The lessor must, however, accept rejection of the goods, termination of the contractual relationship under the lease contract, or withholding of rent prior to acceptance of the goods, as the case may be, but only to the extent that the lessee may resort to these remedies as a party to the supply contract. In such cases, the lessor will normally have a corresponding right to terminate the lessor's own contractual relationship with the supplier under the supply contract or to recover from the supplier loss caused by late payment. Where non-performance is the result of an act or omission of the lessor, remedies against the lessor will be available according to the general rules.

Purpose of the rules. The reasoning behind these rules is based on the special role of the lessor in the transaction, normally that of a financing institution. The supplier controls availability and conformity of the goods, and the lessor's main interest is to recover what is generally in real terms a credit granted to the lessee. If the ordinary lease rules were to apply, the lessor would be liable to the lessee and would then have to recover from the supplier any loss caused by the supplier. The effect of the rules contained in the present Article is such that the lessee must pay the rent to the lessor and may then recover any loss sustained from the supplier. The lessee will thus to a certain extent bear the risk of the supplier's insolvency and take the burden of litigation, something that can be justified by the lessee's having selected the supplier.

Specific performance. The lessee cannot enforce specific performance by the lessor, whether in the form of claiming the goods in cases of late delivery or in the form of remedying a lack of conformity by substitution or repair. Normally the lessee can enforce specific performance by the supplier, based on the supply contract.

Reduction of rent. The lessee cannot reduce the rent for late delivery or lack of conformity (prior to acceptance of the goods rent may, however, be withheld). In ordinary leases, the lessee may reduce the rent to zero for periods where the goods have not been made available at all and reduce the rent proportionally where the goods do not conform to the contract. Under the contracts dealt with here, the lessee will have to pay the rent and then claim rent reduction or damages from the supplier.

Damages and interest. The lessee cannot claim damages (or interest, if relevant) from the lessor. Damages obtained from the supplier under the supply contract may, however, compensate the loss.

Termination of the contractual relationship with the lessor. The lessee may terminate the lease if such termination would be allowed under the supply contract. Termination may take place before or after acceptance of the goods. If the lease is terminated, the lessor will not receive future rent, while the lessee cannot claim the goods or must return the goods if they have already been accepted. The lessor may in turn terminate the lessor's contractual relationship with the supplier under the supply contract, and is thus relieved of the obligation to pay for the goods, or granted the right to claim for recovery of sums already paid, in addition to other losses incurred. Should the supplier be unable to pay, the goods may serve as security for the lessor.

Withholding of rent, rejection of goods. Prior to acceptance of the goods, the lessee may withhold rent because of late delivery or the tender of non-conforming goods, to the extent that the supply contract allows for payment to be withheld in such situations. The lessee may also reject non-conforming goods if this is allowed under the supply contract. After acceptance of the goods, however, rent may not be withheld because of lack of conformity of the goods.

Hidden lack of conformity. The effects of these rules can be illustrated by a case of a hidden lack of conformity. In the case of a lack of conformity of which the lessee could not have been expected to be aware on acceptance of the goods, rent may not be withheld. The reason given is that the lessor, typically a financing party, would be left with a claim against the supplier for rent unpaid by the lessee, but no way of securing this claim as long as the lessee is allowed to keep the goods under the lease contract. However, the lessee may terminate the lease, if termination is allowed under the supply contract. The lessor may then take back the goods and terminate the lessor's relationship with the supplier under the supply contract, the goods serving as security for claims against the supplier. The lessee may not reduce the rent because of a hidden lack of conformity or claim damages from the lessor, for the same reasons. Such remedies would also leave the lessor with an unsecured claim against the supplier.

Non-performance resulting from lessor's act or omission. If late delivery or lack of conformity results from an act or omission of the lessor, the general rules on remedies for non-performance apply, and the lessee may resort to any remedy relevant, including rent reduction, withholding of rent, even after acceptance of the goods, and a claim against the lessor for damages.

Third parties' rights. The rules contained in the present Article do not relieve the lessor of liability for non-performance resulting from a right or a reasonably based claim of a third party which is likely to prevent or otherwise interfere with the lessee's use of the goods in accordance with the contract. The general rules apply, irrespective of the non-performance being related to the supplier or the lessor: the lessor may have bought goods that did not belong to the supplier, or it may be that dispositions of the lessor or rights of the lessor's creditors interfere with the lessee's use.

Lessee's termination of the lessee's relationship with supplier under supply contract. The rules of the present Article apply only where the supply contract imposes obligations on the supplier with regard to the lessee (as a party to the supply contract or as if the lessee were a party to that contract). There is thus a legal relationship between the lessee and the supplier. This means that the lessee can also terminate this legal relationship where termination is foreseen by the contract or is permitted under the general rules on non-performance. A limitation is made in the fourth paragraph of the present Article: the lessee may not terminate the relationship with the supplier under the supply contract without the consent of the lessor. The lessor will typically want to have some say in situations where the lessee's obligation to pay rent is terminated and the goods are returned to the supplier. Termination may also lead to disputes concerning the lessor's rights under the supply contract. It is therefore appropriate that termination take place only with the lessor's consent. The lessee may in any case resort to the right to terminate the lease if the lessor's consent is for some reason denied.

I. Scope of application

1. For definitions and a description of contracts often referred to as leasing, financial leasing, financial leases etc., see notes to IV.B.–1:101 (Lease of goods).

II. Excluding remedies against lessor for delay or lack of conformity

2. In AUSTRIAN law, remedies against the lessor can be excluded if and in so far as the lessee is authorised to claim such remedies in the name of the lessor against the supplier or the corresponding rights have been assigned to the lessee (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1090, no. 82). However, the lessee may reject the goods because of lack of conformity (Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1090, no. 32); under certain conditions the lessee may withhold rent (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1090, no. 85); and termination for an important reason cannot be excluded (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1090, no. 96; Fischer-Czermak, Mobilienleasing, 259). The lessee is left with the remedies that the lessor would have under sales law (Fischer-Czermak, Mobilienleasing, 258). For the consequences of the execution of these sales law remedies on the contract for lease see Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1090, no. 86.

3. Where rules in line with the UNIDROIT Convention have been codified, they include both exclusions of the lessor's liabilities – with certain exceptions – and a right for the lessee to pursue claims against the supplier. See ESTONIAN LOA chap. 17 (§§ 361–367); LITHUANIAN CC arts. 6.567–6.574; POLISH CC art. 709.

4. Exclusion of the lessor's liability and assignment of the lessor's claims against the supplier and the limits to such agreements under DANISH law are discussed in Gade, Finansiel leasing, 167–197.

5. In FRENCH crédit-bail contracts, exclusion of the lessor's liability and assignment of the lessor's claims against the supplier are usual and in principle possible. For details and discussion, see Rép.Dr.Com. (-Duranton), v° Crédit-bail nos. 114, 112, 192 ff; Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], nos. 898 ff; Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 23006. For corresponding rules in BELGIAN law, see Philippe, Le Leasing[2], no. 070

6. In GERMAN law, the exclusion of remedies against the lessor and assignment to the lessee of the lessor's remedies against the supplier are in principle possible. The obligation to make the goods available cannot be excluded by contract, and the lessee must have a right to withhold rent, to terminate the contract, and to claim damages (Staudinger (-Stoffels), BGB (2004), Leasing nos. 188 ff, MünchKomm (-Habersack), BGB III[4], Leasing, nos. 65 ff; Oetker and Maultzsch, Vertragliche Schuldverhältnisse², 737). Concerning the lessee's pursuing the lessor's remedies under the contract of sale, see MünchKomm (-Habersack), BGB[4], Leasing, nos. 79 ff; Staudinger (-Stoffels), BGB (2004), Leasing nos. 213 ff.

7. In GREEK law, exclusion of the lessor's liability and assignment of the lessor's claims against the supplier (for damages, rent reduction, termination of the contract) are usual and in principle possible. The lessor's liability as an importer of the goods cannot be excluded by contract, in which case the liability is governed by the provisions on the liability of the producer (art. 6(3) and (12) of L. 2251/1994). For details see Georgiadis, New Contractual Forms of Modern Economy[4], 67–68, 71–73. An agreed waiver of legal rights against the lessor for lack of conformity is normal in SPANISH leasing contracts. As a compensation, the lessor usually assigns the lessee its own rights vis à vis the supplier. This subrogation poses serious problems when the lessee tries to terminate the supply contract for gross lack of conformity. Sometimes case law refuses this attempt (TS 26 June 1989, RAJ 1989/4786). Sometimes it requires that the claim be brought against both supplier and lessor (TS 25 June 1997, RAJ 1997/5210). Sometimes it has upheld the lessee's claim, but pointing out that the final outcome of this subrogation is also the termination of the lease contract, as a subordinate agreement (TS 26 February 1996, RAJ 1996/1264).

8. In SWISS law, limitation of the lessor's liability and assignment of the lessor's claims against the supplier are in principle possible, but not without certain exceptions, see BSK (-Schluep and Amstutz), OR I[3], Pref. to arts. 184 ff nos. 100, 103; Tercier, Les contrats spéciaux[3], no. 6918. It has been observed that the UNIDROIT Convention is more favourable to the lessee (Kramer (-Stauder), Neue Vertragsformen[2], 104).

9. In SCOTTISH law the lessor is liable to the lessee for the quality of the goods supplied under the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 but normally this liability is excluded in finance leases, such exclusions being subject to the fairness and reasonableness test of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 s. 21 (note however the controversial case of G.M. Shepherd Ltd. v. North West Securities Ltd. 1991 S.L.T. 499, holding that a finance lease was an innominate contract into which the implied terms under the common law of hire were not added). There are no cases of these kinds of exclusion being held unreasonable. The lessee can only have a claim against the supplier if it has a jus quaesitum tertio under the contract between supplier and lessor. In the absence of an express provision, this seems unlikely as the intention of the parties is to keep the sale and the lease legally apart (see Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], para 13.15).

III. Liability for third parties' rights

10. For several jurisdictions, exclusion of liability for third parties' rights interfering with the use seems possible: for AUSTRIAN law, Fischer-Czermak, Mobilienleasing, 258 ff; for GERMAN law, MünchKomm (-Habersack), BGB III[4], Leasing, no. 104; for SWISS law, BSK (-Schluep and Amstutz), OR I[3], Pref. to arts. 184 ff, no. 101. For a different solution, see ESTONIAN LOA § 362(1).

IV. Lessee's right to terminate the relationship under the supply contract

11. For several jurisdictions, the lessor's right to terminate the contractual relationship under the supply contract may also be assigned to the lessee who may then terminate without the lessor's consent: for AUSTRIAN law, Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V[3], § 1090, nos. 85 and 86; for FRENCH law on crédit-bail, Rép.Dr.Com. (-Duranton), v° Crédit-bail, no. 122 (but duty to inform the lessor); for GERMAN law, MünchKomm (-Habersack), BGB[4], Leasing, nos. 86, 91, 95; for SWISS law, Tercier, Les contrats spéciaux[3], nos. 6915 ff; Kramer (-Stauder), Neue Vertragsformen[2], 106. For a different solution (consent of the lessor), see ESTONIAN LOA § 365(2); LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.573(1); POLISH CC art. 709^8(4). For SPAIN, see above.

CHAPTER 5: OBLIGATIONS OF THE LESSEE

IV.B.–5:101: Obligation to pay rent

(1) The lessee must pay the rent.

(2) Where the rent cannot be determined from the terms agreed by the parties, from any other applicable rule of law or from usages or practices, it is a monetary sum determined in accordance with II.–9:104 (Determination of price).

(3) The rent accrues from the start of the lease period.

COMMENTS

A. Reference to the contract and default rules

The contract. Normally, the parties have agreed on the rent to be paid. The rent may be agreed as an amount for the entire lease period. More often though the rent is agreed as an amount per interval of time (rent per hour, day, month, etc.). In some cases the amount to be paid is not spelt out in the contract, but can be determined via a reference to price lists etc. In particular for long term leases, there may be rent regulation clauses of various kinds, for example a clause allowing one or each of the parties a right to claim adjustments to rent based on an index.

Default rule. Occasionally, the rent cannot be determined from the contract, even if it is agreed that a rent is to be paid. In such cases the rent must be determined by the rules in II.–9:104 (Determination of price). If the rent cannot be determined from agreed terms, from any other applicable rule of law or from pertinent usages and practices, "the price payable is the price normally charged in comparable circumstances at the time of the conclusion of the contract or, if no such price is available, a reasonable price". Often there will be no sharp distinction between the agreement and the pertinent usages and practices established by the parties, or between common usages and practices and the rent normally charged ("market price"). If the rent cannot be determined from such criteria, the lessee must pay a rent that is reasonable. According to the definition in Annex 1, what is "reasonable" is to "be objectively ascertained, having regard to the nature and purpose of what is being done, to the circumstances of the case and to any relevant usages and practices". Hence there is a certain overlap between reasonableness and the guidance that can be garnered from usages and practices.

B. Rent from the start of the lease period

Accrual and payment. Where rent is agreed for certain intervals, the period during which the rent accrues must be established. This must be done irrespective of the time agreed for payment, which may be at certain intervals or may not.

Accrual from the start of the lease period. Rent in principle accrues even for parts of the lease period during which the goods have not been available for the lessee's use. Unavailability must be dealt with as a question of rent reduction (or partial termination, which will lead to the same result). The consequence of this is that the rent accrues from the start of the lease period, not from the time when the goods are made available, even where performance is late. The lessee can in most cases claim reduction of the rent to zero for the period of delay. If the delay was caused by the lessee, however, there is no claim for rent reduction, cf. III.–3:101 (Remedies available) paragraph (3).

NOTES

I. Obligation to pay rent

1. In general, the obligation to pay for the right of use of the goods is a characteristic trait of the lease contract. An agreement on gratuitous use of goods is normally not regarded as a lease (though it falls under the general category of bailments in ENGLISH law). Correspondingly, the obligation to pay rent is included explicitly in legislation in several countries: Austrian CC §§ 1090, 1092, 1100 ff; Belgian CC art. 1728(2); CZECH CC art. 671(1); DUTCH CC art. 7.212; ENGLAND, WALES, and NORTHERN IRELAND Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s. 6(3) and SCOTLAND Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s. 11G(3); Estonian LOA §§ 271, 292(1); French CC art. 1728(2); German CC § 535(2); Greek CC arts. 574, 595; Hungarian CC §§ 423 and 428(1); Italian CC art. 1587(1); Latvian CC art. 2141; Lithuanian CC art. 6.487; Maltese CC arts. 1526(1), 1533; POLISH CC arts. 659(1), 669(2); Portuguese CC arts. 1022 and 1038(a); SLOVAK CC § 671; Slovenian LOA §§ 587(1), 602; SPANISH CC arts. 1543 and 1555(1); Swiss LOA art. 257.

II. Determined or determinable rent as requirement

2. In several systems it is a more or less general requirement for a valid contract that the price must be determined by the parties or at least be determinable from the contract (see notes to II.–9:104 (Determination of price)). This requirement is often made explicit for lease contracts in particular. It implies that determination of future rent may not be left to the courts. See AUSTRIAN CC § 1090, cf. Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1092, nos. 66 ff; for BELGIAN law, La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², no. 825; DUTCH CC art. 6:226 (obligations have to determinable), cf. Asser (-Abas), Bijzondere overeenkomsten IIA[8], no. 16; for FRENCH law, Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21143; for ITALIAN law, Alpa and Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 1571, no. 14; for POLISH law, Pietrzykowski, Kodeks cywilny II[4], art. 659, Nb. 22, 394; for PORTUGUESE law, Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado II[3], 370; for SPANISH law, TS 2 May 1994, RAJ 1994, 3557 and Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Lucas Fernandez), Código Civil II, 1095; SWISS BGE 119 II 347 (15 September 1993). If the object has already been used payment may be owed under the rules on unjustified enrichment (for AUSTRIAN law, see Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, §§ 1092–1094, no. 14) or as a contractual obligation (for SWISS law, see Guhl (-Koller), OR9, § 44, no. 12, faktisches Vertragsverhältnis, Honsell, OR-BT[7], 203, Huguenin, OR-BT², no. 471, mietvertragsähnliches Verhältnis).

III. Fixing a rent that is "usual", "reasonable" etc.

3. Other systems allow the courts to supplement the contract by fixing a rent or, in some systems, to appoint independent experts to fix the rent. It may be a rent that is "usual" (CZECH CC § 671(1); SLOVAK CC § 671(1)) or "reasonable" (UNITED KINGDOM, by analogy with contracts for services, Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s. 15, Chitty on Contracts II[29], nos. 33-076 and 33-047); for SWEDEN, see Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 197, analogy to sales law), or such criteria in combination (GERMAN CC §§ 612(2) and 632(2) per analogy, determination by the lessor According to the CC §§ 315 and 316 is a last resort, Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], Pref. to § 535, no. 29). See also ESTONIAN LOA § 28(2) (general rule, price generally charged, or else reasonable price); GREEK CC arts. 371–373, 379 (general rules); LATVIAN CC art. 2123 (rent in previous contract or else fixed by discretion); LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.487(2) (determination by independent experts); MALTESE CC art. 1534 (current price, if any, or valuation by independent experts).

III. Accrual of rent

4. The question concerning the time from which rent accrues is closely connected to the rules on reduction of rent, and a general reference is made to the notes to IV.B.–4:102 (Rent reduction).

IV. Rent in the form of money or other value

5. See notes to IV.B.–1:101 (Lease of goods).

IV.B.–5:102: Time for payment

Rent is payable:

(a) at the end of each period for which the rent is agreed;
(b) if the rent is not agreed for certain periods, at the expiry of a definite lease period; or
(c) if no definite lease period is agreed and the rent is not agreed for certain periods, at the end of reasonable intervals.

COMMENTS

A. Time for payment

End of period for which rent is agreed. The parties normally agree on the time for payment. If the time of payment is not fixed by or determinable from the terms agreed by the parties, it is determined by the default rules found in the present Article. Where the rent is agreed for certain periods, for example a certain amount per month, the rent must be paid at the end of each month. The rent may be agreed for the entire definite lease period. In such cases the rent must be paid at the end of the lease period (it might be considered that this is also a period for which the rent is agreed, and that there is overlap between (a) and (b) in the first paragraph of the present Article). The default rule may admittedly lead to rather cumbersome results where the rent is agreed for very short periods (hours, days), but the parties are free to agree on another time for payment even after conclusion of the contract.

End of reasonable intervals. Where no definite lease period is agreed and the rent is not agreed for certain periods, the rent must be paid at the end of reasonable intervals. Guidelines for judging reasonableness are found in the definition of "reasonable" in Annex 1.

B. Place of payment

Lessor's place of business. The place of payment may be fixed by or determinable from the terms agreed by the parties. If not, III.–2:101 (Place of performance) determines the place of payment. As a rule, money is to be paid at the creditor's place of business as at the time of conclusion of the contract. If the creditor has more than one place of business, the place of payment is the place of business with the closest relationship to the obligation. Money must be paid at the creditor's habitual residence if there is no business address. In practice, the lessor instructs the lessee to transfer money to a specified bank account in the country of the place of business or habitual residence, as the case may be.

NOTES

I. Time for payment

1. The common rule throughout the European legal systems is that rent is payable at the time determined by the terms agreed by the parties. This is often stated explicitly in legislation, sometimes also with a reference to usages in particular, see for example AUSTRIAN CC § 1100; DUTCH CC art. 7:212; PORTUGUESE CC art. 1039; SPANISH CC arts. 1555(1) and 1574; SWISS LOA art. 257c. Rules on time for payment in the absence of agreement or usages vary to some extent.

2. In some systems the default rule is that rent is payable at the end of periods for which the rent is agreed or, if no such periods are agreed, at the end of the lease period, for DANISH law, Gade, Finansiel leasing, 198–199; ESTONIAN LOA § 294; GERMAN CC § 579(1) first and second sentence; GREEK CC art. 595; for NORWEGIAN law, see Falkanger, Leie av skib, 429; for SWEDISH law, see Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 197–198. In SCOTTISH law the general presumption is that rent is payable in arrears (Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Leasing and hire of movables', para. 46); in the absence of contractual provision or custom, the rent would in principle be payable at the end of the rental period.

3. The time for payment of rent, in the absence of agreement or usages, may be fixed in relation to certain periods: According to the Austrian CC § 1100, rent must be paid at the end of every half year if the lease period is one year or longer. If the lease period is shorter than one year, the rent must be paid at the end of the lease period. The same rule is found under SLOVENIAN LOA § 602(2). Under CZECH law, the rent must be paid at the end of each month of the lease, CC § 671(2). A special rule applies to leases of a means of transportation, Ccom art. 634(2): the rent must be paid at the end of the lease period, or at the end of each calendar month if the lease period exceeds three months. According to the SLOVAK CC § 671(2), the rent must be paid at the end of each month of the lease. This is the rule also in SWISS LOA art. 257c (if the lease period exceeds one month).

II. Payment in advance

4. In some systems, rent must be paid in advance, unless otherwise agreed, see HUNGARIAN CC § 428(1) (periodically in advance)); LATVIAN CC art. 2142(2) (six months in advance for contracts for a year or more, or else at the end of the lease period); POLISH CC art. 669(2) (in advance for the entire period if the lease period is up to one month; monthly in advance if the period is longer, but no later than on the tenth day of the month).

III. Place of payment

5. A reference is made to the Notes to III.–2:101 (Place of performance). In some systems the general rule is that money must be paid at the creditor's place, thus for rent payments this means the lessor's place. In other systems, the creditor (here the lessor) must accept that money be paid at the debtor's place, sometimes with the distinction that the debtor must transfer the money to the creditor (the creditor must suffer the loss of a delay in transit). It seems that these rules are normally applied also to lease contracts.

6. According to the PORTUGUESE CC art. 1039, rent must be paid at the lessee's domicile if nothing else follows from agreement or usages.

7. If there is no agreement on the rent, According to the SPANISH CC art. 1574, art. 1171 applies (place of the goods at the constitution of the obligation, else debtor's place). The provision has raised doubt and led to contradictory case law. However, most of the authors prefer the solution of the lessee's place (Albaladejo, Derecho Civil II[12], 641; Bercovitz, Manual de Derecho Civil, 170).

IV.B.–5:103: Acceptance of goods

The lessee must:

(a) take all steps reasonably to be expected in order to enable the lessor to perform the obligation to make the goods available at the start of the lease period; and
(b) take control of the goods as required by the contract.

COMMENTS

A. Separate obligation to accept the goods

Obligation to co-operate and to take control of the goods. The lessee has a separate obligation to co-operate in order to enable the lessor to make the goods available (III.–1:104 (Co-operation)) and then to take control of the goods. This obligation is a parallel to the lessor's obligation to accept the goods at the end of the lease period. Reference is made to IV.B.–3:106 (Obligations on return of the goods) and the comments to that Article.

B. Remedies

Protection of the goods etc. The lessor can resort to ordinary remedies for non-performance of the lessee's obligations under the present Article. In addition there are rules in III.–2:111 (Property not accepted) on preservation of the goods etc., cf. Comment B to IV.B.–3:106 (Obligations on return of the goods).

NOTES

Obligation to co-operate and to take control of the goods

1. A general reference is made to the notes to III.–1:104 (Co-operation) concerning the obligation to co-operate; see also notes to IV.B.–3:106 (Obligations on return of the goods).
2. According to the CISG art. 60 the buyer is obliged to co-operate and to take delivery, and corresponding rules on sales are found in several jurisdictions.
3. Corresponding rules in national law on contracts for lease are not common. According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1587(1), the lessee must take control of the goods, but it is debated whether or not this is a contractual obligation, the non-performance of which entails remedies (Alpa and Mariconda, Codice Civile commentato IV, art. 1587 nos. 2 and 3). HUNGARIAN legislation in force does not expressly regulate the lessee's obligation to take delivery of the goods, whereas the draft of the new CC (published in 2006) contains such an obligation in § 5:311(1). However, legal literature affirms that the lessee is obliged to take delivery (accept) the goods. See Besenyei, A bérleti szerződés[2], 30-31. In a case where the lessee returned the leased goods to the lessor one month earlier than the expiry of the lease period, the Supreme Court ordered the lessee to pay the rent for the last month nonetheless. (BH 1996/640. Legf. Bír. Pfv. II. 23. 285/1995.) On the basis of this decision, Besenyei argues that the lessee is under an obligation to take delivery of the goods. The DUTCH CC does not expressly regulate the lessee's obligation to take control of the goods, but this obligation may be inferred from the lessee's general obligation to exercise the care of a good lessee (CC art. 7:213). It has been argued that the lessee has an obligation to accept the goods, at least in long-term leases, under NORWEGIAN law, Falkanger, Leie av skib, 229. Under SCOTTISH law, the lessee must take possession of the goods leased, or will be liable in damages for non-acceptance (Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law III[3], 399). Under a hire-purchase contract in the UNITED KINGDOM, the lessee is under a duty to accept delivery of the goods leased. If the lessee does not do so, the lessor may bring an action in damages for the whole of future unpaid instalments less the value of the goods at the time they are refused and a discount in respect of early return of the goods (see Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 38-283). In SPANISH law there is no rule on this issue, and general rules on mora creditori apply.

4. For some jurisdictions it is explicitly said that the lessee is not obliged to take control of the goods: for Austria see Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V[3], § 1094, no. 1; for Germany see Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 535, no. 52 (Annahmeverzug, but not Schuldnerverzug). For GREEK law, it is unanimously held that the lessee is not obliged to take control of the goods (see Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[6], § 32; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 203; Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), art. 575, no. 3; CC arts. 349 ff on creditor's default apply).

IV.B.–5:104: Handling the goods in accordance with the contract

(1) The lessee must:

(a) observe the requirements and restrictions which follow from the terms agreed by the parties;

(b) handle the goods with the care which can reasonably be expected in the circumstances, taking into account the duration of the lease period, the purpose of the lease and the character of the goods; and

(c) take all measures which could ordinarily be expected to become necessary in order to preserve the normal standard and functioning of the goods, in so far as is reasonable, taking into account the duration of the lease period, the purpose of the lease and the character of the goods.

(2) Where the rent is calculated so as to take into account the amortisation of the cost of the goods by the lessee, the lessee must, during the lease period, keep the goods in the condition they were in at the start of the lease period, subject to any wear and tear which is normal for that kind of goods.

COMMENTS

A. Proper handling of the goods

Obligation to handle the goods in accordance with the contract. It is characteristic of contracts for lease that the lessee's right – as opposed to the owner's right – to benefit from the goods by use or by disposition is "positively" limited, i.e. the lessee may only use and dispose of the goods within the limits that follow from the contract. The lessee further has a general obligation to handle the goods with care. This obligation can be seen as including everything that the lessee is obliged to do, not to do, or to tolerate concerning the goods during the lease period. The present Article refers to the individual agreement in paragraph (1)(a) and then states a general obligation of care in handling the goods in paragraph (1)(b). Obligations with regard to maintenance etc. are dealt with in paragraph (1)(c). A special rule on contracts where the rent is calculated so as to amortise the entire value of the goods is contained in paragraph (2).

B. Restrictions and requirements following from the contract

Express terms, purpose of use etc. The parties may have agreed on specific restrictions on and requirements for handling of the goods, including maintenance, safety measures, areas of use, cleaning etc. Even if there are few express terms, restrictions and requirements may follow more or less directly from the purpose of the contract.

B is going to move from one apartment to another and leases a small van for that purpose. The van must not be used for transporting stones from B's quarry.

Handle the goods with care. The lessee has a general obligation to handle the goods with care. It is impossible to define in detail and exhaustively what this obligation implies. What is required will depend on the circumstances, including the length of the lease period, the purpose of the lease and the character of the goods. The lessee's acts and omissions must be judged against what a reasonable lessee would have done in the circumstances. Regard must also be had to obligations of repair and maintenance: if the consequences of the lessee's lack of care must be carried by the lessee and not by the lessor, this should influence the intensity of the lessee's obligation of care in handling the goods.

Maintenance etc. The obligations to repair and maintain the goods during the lease period are discussed in the Comments to IV.B.–3:104 (Conformity of the goods during the lease period). As mentioned there, the lessee's obligation to maintain the goods should be complementary to the lessor's obligations. The obligations on the lessee stated in paragraphs (1)(c) and (2) of the present Article condition the lessor's obligation of maintenance, see also IV.B.–3:104 paragraph (3). Any obligations placed on the lessee under paragraph (1)(c) are consequently excluded from the lessor's obligations under IV.B.–3:104. Reference is therefore made to the Comments to that Article.

Leases with full amortisation of the cost. The second paragraph of this Article includes special rules on contracts where the rent is calculated so as to take into account the full amortisation of the cost of the goods. The provision is formulated as a specified application of the first paragraph. In these cases the lessee must keep the goods in the condition they were in at the start of the lease period, subject to normal wear and tear. The reason is that these contracts for lease in real terms have the same function as contracts for sale. The rule covers both three-party transactions (often referred to as "financial leasing" etc.) and two-party long-term leases. Details are dealt with in Comment C to IV.B.–3:104 (Conformity of the goods during the lease period).

"Risk" and lessee's obligation to return the goods. Loss of, or damage to, the goods can raise questions concerning the lessee's obligation to return the goods. In such cases it is not a question of non-performance of the lessor's obligations, but of non-performance of the lessee's obligations. The rules on the lessee's obligations to return the goods, including the rules on the condition of the returned goods, should ideally be a mere function of the rules concerning the lessee's obligations of care, maintenance and repair. In other words, if the lessee has performed the obligations concerning care, maintenance and repair, the returned goods should generally conform to the rules on the condition of returned goods. The lessee is not, however, responsible for the consequences of loss or damage not caused by non-performance of the lessee's obligations concerning care, maintenance and repairs (unless the contract states otherwise). In such cases then, the lessor must accept that the goods cannot be returned or that they can only be returned in damaged condition. There is no need here to formulate this as the "owner's risk", as it is sometimes done. On the other hand, where the lessee has a positive obligation to keep the goods in the condition they were in at the start of the lease period, the lessee must bear the consequences of accidental damage to the goods, either by repairing the goods or by paying damages, subject to relevant excuses based on impediment, cf. III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment). Regarding contracts where the rent is calculated so as to amortise the entire cost of the goods, the expected value of the goods at the end of the lease period is usually low, cf. the exception for normal wear and tear in the second paragraph of the present Article. This will for practical purposes limit the lessee's liability when the goods are lost by accident.

Agreements on "risk". It is not unusual to find contract clauses to the effect that the lessee must bear the "risk" while in possession of the goods. This is typically the case in contracts for lease covering the entire economic lifespan of the goods, or contracts where the intention is to make the lessee owner of the goods at the end of the lease period. Similar clauses can, however, also be found in other contracts. The meaning of such clauses must be determined by interpretation in each case. Whether the clause deals with the lessor's obligations, the lessee's obligations or both can hardly be determined on a general basis. It is recommended that the parties agree on something more specific than the distribution of "risk".

NOTES

I. Requirements and restrictions following from the contract

1. In several systems, a reference is made to the purpose of the contract, either negatively, restricting the lessee's right to use the goods, or positively, defining the lessee's obligation regarding the handling of the goods: AUSTRIAN CC § 1098; CZECH CC § 665 (agreed use or use conforming to the nature and destination of the goods; sometimes even duty to use the goods). ESTONIAN LOA § 276(2), cf. § 344 (commercial leases) and § 363 (financial leasing); HUNGARIAN CC § 425(1) (use the goods according to the terms of the contract and according to the destination of the goods; i.e. for the purposes goods of the same kind would ordinarily be used for); LATVIAN CC art. 2151. For some systems it is said explicitly that the purpose of the lease may also be presumed given the circumstances, usages, the nature of the goods etc.: BELGIAN CC art. 1728 (cf. La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I[2], nos. 792 ff); FRENCH CC art. 1728, ITALIAN art. 1587(1) cf. Alpa and Mariconda, Codice Civile commentato IV, art. 1587, nos. 8 ff; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.489(1); MALTESE CC art. 1554(a); POLISH CC art. 666(1); PORTUGUESE CC art. 1038(c); SLOVAK CC § 665 (agreed use or use conforming to the nature and destination of the goods; sometimes even duty to use the goods, Svoboda (-Górász), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, 612); SLOVENIAN LOA § 600(2); SPANISH CC art. 1555-2 (to use the thing with the ordinary diligence, according to the intended use and, when lacking any agreed use, according to the nature of the asset and to general usage).
2. Some systems have rules on remedies for use at odds with the contract; what is at odds with the contract must be decided on the basis of legislation, the contract itself and usages. See CZECH CC § 679(3) (termination); GERMAN CC §§ 538, 541 and 543(2), cf. Staudinger (-Emmerich), BGB (2006), § 541 nos. 2–4; GREEK CC art. 594 (termination and damages), see Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), art. 594.
3. Under UNITED KINGDOM law, the leased goods may only be used for the purpose for which they were leased (Palmer, Bailment, 1270–1275; Burnard v. Haggis (1863) 14 CB (NS) 45 and Walley v. Holt (1876) 35 LT 631; and in SCOTLAND, Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], § 143). Where the lessee uses the goods for a purpose not contemplated by the contract, the lessee is liable both in contract and in tort or delict for any loss caused by such use. However the right to use the goods confers on the lessee the authority to do anything "reasonably incidental to its reasonable use", unless there is express provision to the contrary in the contract. See further, Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-077.

II. Obligation of care

4. An obligation for the lessee to handle the goods with care is expressed in legislation in several countries, see for example CZECH CC § 670; DUTCH CC art. 7:213 (as a good lessee); ESTONIAN LOA § 276(2) (with prudence and according to the intended purpose), cf. § 344 (commercial leases) and § 363 (financial leasing); FRENCH CC art. 1728 (user de la chose louée en bon père de famille; cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21183); GREEK CC art. 594 (translation: "with care and as agreed", see Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 24 nos. 46–47; Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), art. 594, nos. 2–4); HUNGARIAN CC § 4(4) (general principle on a standard of care "to be expected in the given circumstances"); ITALIAN CC art. 1587(2) (osservare la diligenza del buon padre di famiglia, cf. Alpa and Mariconda, Codice Civile commentato IV, art. 1587, nos. 4 ff); LATVIAN CC art. 2150 (translation: "properly and as a good manager"); MALTESE CC art. 1554(a) ("make use of the thing as a bonus paterfamilias"); to the same effect, PORTUGUESE CC art. 1038(d); SLOVENIAN LOA § 600(1) (translation: "use the thing with the diligence of a good businessperson or with the diligence of a good manager"); SPANISH CC art. 1555(2) (use the thing as a diligente padre de familia); SWISS LOA art. 257f (die Sache sorgfältig gebrauchen, cf. BSK (-R.Weber), OR I[3], § 257g, no. 1). Under POLISH law the lessee should use the goods in a manner specified in the contract and, if the contract does not provide any guidelines, in a manner which corresponds to the nature or designation of the goods.

5. A obligation of care is commonly held to exist even without express legislation, see for example for AUSTRIAN law, Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I[3], § 1098, no. 1; for DANISH law, Gade, Finansiel leasing, 213–214; for GERMAN law, Staudinger (-Emmerich), BGB (2006), § 535 nos. 93–96; for ENGLISH and N. IRISH law, Sanderson v. Collins [1904] 1 KB 628, CA; for NORWEGIAN law, see Falkanger, Leie av skib, § 25, in particular 232–235; for SCOTTISH law, Campbell v. Kennedy (1828) 6 S 806 (Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], § 145). According to the POLISH CC art. 667, the lessee's neglecting the goods amounts to non-performance. For SWEDISH law, see Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 198.

III. Liability for damage or deterioration

6. An obligation of care may follow indirectly from the lessee's liability for damage to or deterioration of the goods, sometimes even to the extent that the burden of proof lies on the lessee to show that there is no negligence on the lessee's part, see for example ESTONIAN LOA §§ 334(2), 358 (commercial leases) and 347(2) (animals in particular); FRENCH CC art. 1732, cf. Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 347, Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21190; ITALIAN CC art. 1588; SPANISH CC art. 1563, cf. Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II[2], no. 437, 121; for NORWEGIAN law, see Falkanger, Leie av skib, 226 and 283–288; SLOVAK CC § 670; for SWEDISH law, see Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 204–205.

7. At ENGLISH common law, the lessee is bound to take reasonable care of the goods hired, but is not liable for damage to the goods if not negligent in causing the damage (see Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-076, with reference British Crane Hire Corp. Ltd. v. Ipswich Plant Hire Ltd. [1975] QB 303, at 311–312). Under SCOTTISH law, the lessee is not liable for loss due to natural causes, pure accident, theft or other causes for which the lessee is not responsible, nor for ordinary depreciation or fair wear and tear (Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law III[3], 400). A special clause may vary the lessee's normal liability, but this will be subject to statutory controls found in the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977.

IV. Obligation of maintenance etc.

8. See notes to IV.B.–3:104 (Conformity of the goods during the lease period).

IV.B.–5:105: Intervention to avoid danger or damage to the goods

(1) The lessee must take such measures for the maintenance and repair of the goods as would ordinarily be carried out by the lessor, if the measures are necessary to avoid danger or damage to the goods, and it is impossible or impracticable for the lessor, but not for the lessee, to ensure these measures are taken.

(2) The lessee has a right against the lessor to indemnification or, as the case may be, reimbursement in respect of an obligation or expenditure (whether of money or other assets) in so far as reasonably incurred for the purposes of the measures.

Measures ordinarily to be taken by the lessor

Purpose of the rule. The lessor often has an obligation to repair and maintain the goods during the lease period, see IV.B.–3:104 (Conformity of the goods during the lease period). Normally, the lessor will also have an interest in having the goods properly maintained and protected against damage even where the measures are not covered by a contractual obligation. Sometimes it is not possible or at least not practical for the lessor to take action, for example where the goods are located far from the lessor's business place or where repairs must be done immediately. This might be the case, for example, where repairs to the keel of a sailing boat are urgently required but the lessee has taken the boat to faraway waters, or where there is an urgent need to secure the counterweights of a building crane. According to the present Article, the lessee has an obligation to take measures to avoid danger or damage to the goods. To a certain extent one could rely on the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs (Book V), but the position here is that the lessee should have a contractual obligation to intervene.

Limitation of lessee's obligation. The obligation is limited in several respects: the intervention must be necessary to avoid danger or damage to the goods; it must be impossible or impractical for the lessor to take care of the matter; and it must not be impossible or impractical for the lessee to act.

Indemnification and reimbursement. The right to indemnification or reimbursement is a parallel to the corresponding right under Book V (Benevolent Intervention in Another's Affairs), Chapter 3. The rules in Book V may provide guidance in answering other questions concerning intervention and the consequences. The present Article should also be read along with the lessee's obligation to notify the lessor of any damage or danger to the goods, cf. IV.B.–5:107 (Obligation to inform).

Lessee's right to have a lack of conformity remedied. The lessee's obligation to intervene must not be confused with the lessee's right to have a lack of conformity remedied, see IV.B.–4:101 (Lessee's right to have lack of conformity remedied). The lessee has a right to have a lack of conformity remedied even where there is no danger to the goods. On the other hand, the lessee must respect the lessor's right to cure the lack of conformity.

NOTES

Obligation to intervene

1. A contractual obligation on the lessee to intervene to avoid danger or damage to the goods is known in some systems. A similar rule for the lease of immovable property in the NORWEGIAN Landlord and Tenant Act § 5-5 may also apply to the lease of movables (see for the situation prior to this act, Falkanger, Leie av skib, 231). An obligation to intervene may also follow from the general rule in CZECH CC § 419. In ENGLAND, the lessee must take reasonable care to protect leased goods against any imminent danger (Brabant & Co. v. King [1895] AC 632) and foreseeable hazards, including theft, fire, floods, or vandalism by third parties (Birks, English Private Law II, para. 13.49). See further Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-048. In SCOTLAND the lessee is bound to take reasonable care for the safety of the article hired, the degree of care required being such as a diligent and prudent person would use in caring for that person's own property (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], para. 13.07). It is held for SWISS law that the lessee is obliged to remove damage to the goods in cases of emergency (BSK (-R. Weber), OR I[3], § 257g, no. 1).
2. For most systems, there are no explicit provisions implying an obligation to intervene. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1559, the lessee is only under a duty to warn the lessor of any danger threatening the goods.
3. In several systems, the lessee has a right to remedy a lack of conformity and have reasonable expenses recovered, thus having a right to perform work that is included in the lessor's obligations, see notes to IV.B.–4:101 (Lessee's right to have lack of conformity remedied). Further, the lessee normally has an obligation to take care of the goods, sometimes expressed indirectly as a liability for damage or deterioration, see notes to IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract). The question then arises, whether or not the obligation of care may go so far as to imply that the lessee must undertake work generally falling under the lessor's obligations (with a right to recover costs). There seems to be no single answer to this question throughout the jurisdictions. For GERMAN law it has been argued that an obligation to intervene may be seen as a result of a tacit mandate or as a duty to make use of the lessee's right to "self help" under CC § 536a(2)(2), see MünchKomm (-Schilling) BGB[4] § 535, no. 192 and § 536a, no. 30. On the other hand, it is also said that the obligation of care does not imply an obligation to repair (Staudinger (-Emmerich), BGB (2006), § 535, no. 96, but see also op. cit. § 536a, no. 25 on lessee's possible duty to remedy lack of conformity). For GREEK law the lessee is entitled to and not obliged to perform repairs (Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), arts. 590–592, no. 2); it has, however, been argued that the lessee's obligation of care and of appropriate use of the goods may include an obligation to avert danger (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[2], § 37 A, B III, with reference to GREEK CC arts. 173, 200, 288). For ITALIAN law, it is held that the lessee may have an obligation to perform urgent repairs, cf. Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1587, no. III1, Rescigno (-Giove), Codice civile I[5], art. 1587, no. 2. For DUTCH law, it is not impossible that an obligation to carry out urgent repairs might be construed as a consequence of CC art. 7:213, the general obligation to act as a good tenant.

IV.B.–5:106: Compensation for maintenance and improvements

(1) The lessee has no right to compensation for maintenance of or improvements to the goods.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not exclude or restrict any right the lessee may have to damages or any right the lessee may have under IV.B.–4:101 (Lessee's right to have lack of conformity remedied), IV.B.–5:105 (Intervention to avoid danger or damage to the goods) or Book VIII (Acquisition and Loss of Ownership in Movables).

COMMENTS

Improvements etc. to the goods by lessee

Introduction. Actions taken by the lessee, or on behalf of the lessee, may lead to improvements to the goods, or at least enhance the value of the goods compared with a situation in which no such action is taken. The present Article deals with the question of possible compensation for costs or for value added. As a rule, the lessee has no right to such compensation, but there are several exceptions.

Performance of lessee's obligation of maintenance etc. Depending on the individual agreement and on IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract), the lessee may have an obligation to maintain the goods. In most cases maintenance will preserve the value of the goods and often the work will also lead to improvements, e.g. when worn parts are replaced with new parts. The lessee has no right to compensation for such actions, unless otherwise agreed.

Improvements made with lessor's consent. The lessee may have the goods improved by having work done or by replacing or supplementing parts etc. with the consent of the lessor. The parties may agree on compensation to be paid (or deducted from the rent) at once or at the end of the lease period, perhaps including the calculated depreciation of the improvements. Where a claim for such compensation cannot be based on the contract, including the circumstances of the consent given by the lessor, the present Article states that the lessee is not entitled to compensation. This rule should encourage the parties to consider the question of compensation when the agreement on improvements is made. A default rule giving the lessee a right to compensation would be more complicated, as several factors would have to be considered, such as the lessee's costs and the value and depreciation of the improvements. If the lessee terminates the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance of the lessor's obligations, the fact that the benefit of any such improvements is withdrawn from the lessee may form part of the loss covered by a claim for damages. Should the contractual relationship be terminated by the lessor for fundamental non-performance of the lessee's obligations, the residual value of improvements may be taken into account as gains to be offset against the lessor's loss (compensation lucre cum damno).

Improvements made without lessor's consent. If the improvements are made without the lessor's consent, and they are not part of the lessee's obligations under the contract, there is even less reason to compensate the lessee. This should be the rule whether or not the lessee is allowed to make the relevant alterations to the goods without the prior consent of the lessor.

Lessee has remedied lack of conformity. The lessee may, under certain conditions, remedy a lack of conformity and recover the costs from the lessor, cf. IV.B.–4:101 (Lessee's right to have lack of conformity remedied). The present Article does not detract from the lessee's rights under this rule.

Lessee's intervention. Under Article IV.B.–5:105 (Intervention to avoid danger or damage to the goods). the lessee must in some cases perform maintenance and repairs to avoid danger or damage to the goods even if these measures should ordinarily be taken by the lessor. The present Article does not affect the lessee's right to indemnification or reimbursement under that Article.

Property law rules. There may be situations in which the lessee's obligations under the contract for lease concerning return of the goods are fulfilled even if improvements are "reversed", for example by replacing a new part with the old one. However, this may sometimes be contrary to the rules on accession, cf. Book VIII, Chapter 5 and the policies behind theses rules. Under these rules, the result may be that the lessor may keep the improvements by compensating the lessee. The present Article does not derogate from such rules.

NOTES

I. Interplay of different sets of rules

1. Only contractual claims for compensation for the lessee's improvements to the goods will be dealt with here. It should be borne in mind that these rules must be supplemented in several – perhaps most – systems with rules of property law concerning combination, processing etc. (see Book VIII, Chapter 5). Rules on unjustified enrichment (Book VII) and rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs (Book V) may in some systems also supplement contract law in this respect.
2. The lessee's right to remedy a lack of conformity against recovery of costs may sometimes in real terms imply compensation for improvements. See notes to IV.B.–4:101 (Lessee's right to have lack of conformity remedied) concerning these rules. A similar situation may occur if the lessee performs an obligation to intervene to avoid danger or damage to the goods, see notes to IV.B.–5:105 (Intervention to avoid danger or damage to the goods).

II. Lease law referring to rules on benevolent intervention

3. In some systems, there are references in lease law to rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs or a modified version of these rules. According to the Austrian CC § 1097(2) a lessee is regarded as a benevolent intervener in another's affairs in relation to expenses concerning the goods that are included in the lessor's obligations or are useful. This is seen as so called "applied" benevolent intervention, which inter alia means that no intention to benefit another is required. On the requirement of advantage to the lessor of expenses that were not included in the lessor's obligations, see Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III[2], no. 8/35; for AUSTRIAN CC § 1097 in connection with § 1037 see Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V[3], § 1097, no. 11. GERMAN CC § 539 (1) refers to the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs concerning expenses related to the goods if recovery cannot be claimed under the rules in CC § 536a(2) on the lessee's remedying of lack of conformity. The lessee may further claim compensation for unjustified enrichment, and this may even include compensation for improvements which the lessee was obliged to make, if the lessor benefits from a premature termination of the lease (Staudinger (-Emmerich), BGB (2006), § 539, nos. 11–18). Installations made by the lessee may be removed, CC § 539(2); the right for the lessor to keep the installations against payment, CC § 552(1), does not apply to movables (Staudinger (-Emmerich), BGB (2006), § 539, no. 23). For Greek law, see CC art. 591(2): useful expenses must be reimbursed in conformity with the provisions governing benevolent intervention. The lessee has the right to remove an installation added to the goods. Hungarian CC § 427(3) entails a claim for reimbursement of necessary expenditures and refers to the rules on benevolent intervention for other expenditures; the lessee must remove changes to which the lessor has not consented, § 425(3).

III. Lessor's consent to improvements as a central requirement

4. In other systems, the main rule is that compensation may be claimed only for improvements to which the lessor has consented, sometimes with modifications to this main rule. For DANISH law, it is held that the lessee cannot claim compensation for improvements made without the lessor's consent, Gade, Finansiel leasing, 272. Under Estonian LOA § 286(1), if improvements or alterations were made with the lessor's consent, the lessee may claim reasonable compensation for a considerable increase in the value of the goods; for other expenses (requirement of consent is questionable), the lessee is compensated pursuant to the provisions regarding benevolent intervention. Such compensation is not a remedy for non-performance (Estonian Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 23 February 2006, civil matter no. 3-2-1-3-06; RT III 2006, 8, 74). Consent must not be refused "if the improvements and alterations are necessary in order to use the thing or manage the thing reasonably". See also more detailed rules for commercial leases, LOA § 359. In ITALIAN law, a difference is made between improvements to the goods and additions, CC arts. 1592 and 1593 (for the difference see Alpa and Mariconda, Codice Civile commentato IV, art. 1592–1593, no. 2). As a principle the lessee has no claim for reimbursement of improvements or additions (Alpa and Mariconda, loc. cit. no. 1, Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1592, no. I1). The lessee may, however, claim compensation (for expenses or value, whichever is the lower amount) for improvements if the lessor has consented to the improvements (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1592, no. III1: implied consent or simple tolerance is not sufficient). Even without such consent, the lessee may offset the value of the improvements against the lessor's claim for damages for loss or damage, unless loss or damage is caused by gross negligence, CC art. 1592(2). Additions to the goods may be removed by the lessee, but the lessor may choose to keep them against compensation, CC art. 1593(1). If the addition cannot be removed without harm to the goods and amounts to an improvement, the rules on improvements apply. To the same effect (with variations concerning calculation), see MALTESE CC art. 1564. According to the LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.501(1) the lessee may claim compensation for necessary expenses if improvements are made with the lessor's consent. Improvements made without consent may be removed if this can be done without harm to the goods and the lessor does not want to compensate for them, CC art. 6:501(2). The lessee has no claim for compensation for inseparable improvements made without consent, CC art. 6:501(3). According to the Swiss LOA art. 260a(3) the lessee may claim a corresponding compensation for improvements if the goods have a significant added value due to renovation or modification agreed to by the lessor. If these requirements are not met the lessee's expenses are not compensated (see Guhl (-Koller), OR[9], § 44, no. 234: also no claim under unjustified enrichment). According to the SLOVAK CC § 667(1), the lessee may require reimbursement of costs if the lessor has agreed to provide such reimbursement. If the lessor has consented to the modifications but not to any reimbursement, the lessee may claim reimbursement only of the relevant value. There is a similar rule in CZECH law, cf. also the special rule of Ccom art. 633 concerning leases of a means of transportation: the lessee must maintain the object at the lessor's expense. Under ENGLISH law, the lessee has no authority to deliver the goods to a third party for repair, except where the circumstances show implied authority from the lessor. In such circumstances, the repairer acquires a lien over the goods (Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-079). The same is true of a lessee under a hire-purchase contract (Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 38-387). In SCOTTISH law likewise the obligation of maintenance and repair falls on the lessor rather than the lessee and only if the lessee has authority, or if the repair was necessary, not due to the lessee's fault, and notice is given as soon as possible to the lessor, does the latter have any liability to reimburse the former. The lessee also cannot create a lien over the goods in favour of a third party repairer (see Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Leasing and hire of movables', para. 41; Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], paras. 13.05, 13.11).

IV. Other solutions

5. In DUTCH law, the lessee has a claim under the rules of unjustified enrichment where the improvements were approved by the lessor, CC art. 7:216(3). Such a claim is not recognised in the SCOTTISH law of unjustified enrichment, where the improver of another's property can recover only if able to show a bona fide but erroneous belief at the time of the improvement that the improver was the owner of the property (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland11, para. 25.17). LATVIAN CC art. 2140 refers to general rules in arts. 866 ff concerning reimbursement of necessary and useful expenditures to "a property". In POLISH law, the lessor may either keep the improvements against remuneration or demand that the lessee removes them, CC art. 676. This provision is lex specialis and the lessee may not demand remuneration under the rules of unjustified enrichment Pietrzykowski, Kodeks cywilny II[4], art. 676, Nb. 3, 414. In PORTUGUESE law, a lessee who makes improvements to the goods (if the rules on urgent repairs do not apply) is in the same position as a possessor in bad faith. CC art. 1046 implies that useful improvements may be compensated for (cf. CC arts. 1273 and 1275). The lessee may also remove the improvements if this can be done without harm to the goods. SLOVENIAN LOA § 604(5): "The lessee may take any additions added to the thing if such can be separated without damaging the thing; however the lessor may keep them by compensating the lessee for their value upon return" (translation). Under SPANISH law, the lessee may remove improvements if this can be done without harm to the goods, but there is no right to compensation, CC art. 1573, referring to art. 487 concerning usufruct. For SWEDISH law, it is held that the lessee, "according to common rules", may claim compensation for costs necessary to avoid loss of or damage to the goods, but not for other costs (Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 198).

IV.B.–5:107: Obligation to inform

(1) The lessee must inform the lessor of any damage or danger to the goods, and of any right or claim of a third party, if these circumstances would normally give rise to a need for action on the part of the lessor.

(2) The lessee must inform the lessor under paragraph (1) within a reasonable time after the lessee first becomes aware of the circumstances and their character.

(3) The lessee is presumed to be aware of the circumstances and their character if the lessee could reasonably be expected to be so aware.

COMMENTS

Obligation to inform

General. The present Article concerns the obligation of the lessee to inform the lessor of damage and danger to the goods arising during the lease period, and likewise of third party rights, that become known to the lessee. The purpose of the rule is to make it possible for the lessor to defend the lessor's own interests. Non-performance of the lessee's obligation to inform may give rise to remedies, even if the lack of notification does not lead to actual loss. The lessor has a legitimate interest in relying on the lessee to give notification in these situations.

Illustration 1
The lessee notices that a leased car leaks brake fluid. This constitutes an immediate danger to the car (and to the driver as well as to third parties). The lessee is obliged to inform the lessor. The same will be the case if the lessee notices that the level of brake fluid has decreased considerably, without being able to spot any leak.

Illustration 2
The lessee has rented a boat for a trip up a river. Due to heavy rain the river becomes a torrent and the lessee does not dare to continue and needs help and perhaps the assistance of another boat in order to get back. In such a case the lessor should be informed.

Third party claims and rights. The obligation to inform also encompasses situations in which the lessee learns that a third party has a claim or right to the object. An example might be a case in which someone claims to be the rightful owner of the goods and wants to recover them.

Information within reasonable time. The lessee must provide such information a reasonable time after the lessee first becomes aware of the damage, claim etc., and that the circumstances require the lessor's attention (paragraph (2)). An obligation to do the impossible cannot be imposed. The lessee cannot therefore be obliged to notify something of which the lessee could reasonably be expected to be aware but was not in fact aware. However, the burden on the lessor of proving knowledge is eased by the rule in paragraph (3) that the lessee is presumed to be aware if the lessee could reasonably be expected to be aware.

Non-conformity not relevant. The lessee must inform the lessor according to this Article even if the danger or damage does not affect the lessee's use or in any way amount to non-performance of an obligation under the contract.

NOTES

I. Obligation to inform

1. An obligation on the lessee to inform the lessor of facts that may require action from the lessor is found in various forms in national law. The rules may concern third party claims, physical damage to the goods (or a danger of such damage), or both. The character of this obligation is not always clear. In some systems, the obligation is coupled with liability for damages where information is not given in time. An obligation to inform may also be seen as a part of the general obligation to handle the goods with care, but it may further be regarded as an independent contractual obligation. In the following, no attempt has been made to decide the character of the obligation in national law. Rules on notification as a precondition for remedies are not dealt with here, see III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity) and IV.B.–4:103 (Notification of lack of conformity).

2. An obligation to inform the lessor of both physical damage and danger and of claims by third parties is found in several systems: DUTCH CC arts. 7:222 (defects) and 7:211 (third party claims); ESTONIAN LOA § 282 (damages as sanction); GERMAN CC § 536c (damages as sanction); GREEK CC art. 589 (damages as sanction); ITALIAN CC art. 1577(1) for repairs (damages as sanction, Alpa and Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 1577 nos. 1 and 2) and ITALIAN CC art. 1586(1) for third party claims; MALTESE CC art. 1565 ("any encroachment or damage affecting the thing let"); for NORWEGIAN law, see Falkanger, Leie av skib, 230; POLISH CC art. 665 (third party claims) and art. 666(2) (necessity of repairs; no duty to notify of factual danger to the goods); PORTUGUESE CC art. 1038(h); SPANISH CC art. 1559 (damages as sanction).

3. According to the AUSTRIAN CC § 1097(1) the lessee must notify when repairs by the lessor become necessary. An obligation to notify of claims by third parties may be deduced from the more general obligation of the lessee to take care of the goods. Under SCOTTISH law, the lessor is only liable for repairs if notice is given by the lessee as soon as reasonably possible (Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], § 145). It seems likely that this is also true of UNITED KINGDOM contracts for lease in general.

4. FRENCH CC art. 1726 deals with the obligation to notify if the lessee's use is affected by an action relating to ownership and liability in damages for non-compliance (Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, nos. 301 and 302). It is also held, however, that the lessee must notify of the need for repairs (Groslière, loc. cit. nos. 220 and 221). For BELGIAN law, see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², nos. 808 ff (the lessee's obligation to notify is based on his position as a gardien).

5. In several systems, the rule seems to be concentrated on physical damage or danger to the goods: CZECH CC § 668 (need for repairs), cf. § 722 for business leases. HUNGARIAN CC § 427(2); LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.493(2); SLOVAK § 668(1) (need for repairs); SLOVENIAN LOA § 596; SWISS LOA art. 257g (damages as sanction).

II. Time for information

6. It is common that the lessee must notify "without delay", "immediately", etc.: Austrian CC § 1097(1); CZECH CC § 668(1) and § 722(2), both: without undue delay; DUTCH CC art. 7:222; Estonian LOA § 282(1); German CC § 536c(1); Greek CC art. 589; Lithuanian CC art. 6.493(2); Maltese CC art. 1565; Polish CC art. 665 and art. 666(2), both "immediately"; SLOVAK CC § 668(1) (without undue delay);

Slovenian LOA § 596(1); SPANISH CC art. 1559 (cf. TS 10 June 1987, RAJ 1987, 4272). For Italian law, it is explained that the notification must be given at such a time and in such a way as to avoid unnecessary or further deterioration or damage to the goods (Alpa and Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 1577, no. 1). For Swiss law the time within which notification must be given depends on the circumstances of the case, i.e. the knowledge of the lessee, the kind of damage and the extent of the damage (BSK (-R.Weber), OR I³, § 257g, no. 3).

III. Positive knowledge, negligence

7. It is not always clear to what extent the liability of the lessee requires positive knowledge of the facts or whether negligence is sufficient. For example, gross negligence seems to be the requirement in GERMAN law (the lessee may not overlook what everybody would see, BGH 4 April 1977, NJW 1977, 1236, 1237, Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 536c, no. 3), while positive knowledge is required under SWISS law (BSK (-R.Weber), OR I³, § 257g, no. 3). Negligence is sufficient under GREEK law (Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), art. 589, no. 5).

IV.B.–5:108: Repairs and inspections of the lessor

(1) The lessee, if given reasonable notice where possible, must tolerate the carrying out by the lessor of repair work and other work on the goods which is necessary in order to preserve the goods, remove defects and prevent danger. This obligation does not preclude the lessee from reducing the rent in accordance with IV.B.–4:102 (Rent reduction).

(2) The lessee must tolerate the carrying out of work on the goods which does not fall under paragraph (1), unless there is good reason to object.

(3) The lessee must tolerate inspection of the goods for the purposes indicated in paragraph (1). The lessee must also accept inspection of the goods by a prospective lessee during a reasonable period prior to expiry of the lease.

COMMENTS

A. Necessary repairs etc.

The lessee must tolerate repairs. The rule in paragraph (1) reflects the lessor's maintenance and repair obligations. The lessee must tolerate such work provided that, where possible, reasonable notice of it has been given. The lessee has, however, the right to rent reduction for periods during which the goods are not available for the lessee's use or where use of the goods has been affected by the work, see the discussion in Comment F to IV.B.–3:101 (Availability of the goods). Non-availability of the goods is a non-performance of the lessor's obligations even if the lessor has a right to perform the repairs etc. Correspondingly, the lessee has an obligation to tolerate the work in the sense that the lessee cannot prevent the work being done. The lessee's obligation to tolerate such work is, however, restricted to work and repairs which are necessary to preserve the goods, remove defects, and prevent danger. The lessee does not have to tolerate other work or repairs (unless there is no good reason to object, see Comment B). Otherwise it would be too easy for the lessor to interfere with the exclusive right of use of the lessee.

B. Other work

Obligation not to obstruct other work without good reason. The lessee's right under a contract for lease constitutes an exclusive right of use. The lessor in principle has no right to use the goods or take them away. This also applies to third parties. However, it would be unreasonable to completely bar the lessor from performing other work, e.g. updates to computers. The lessee therefore has an obligation to tolerate this kind of work where there is no good reason to protest. In deciding whether the lessee has good reason to object to such work, one must take into consideration both the consequences the work may have on the lessee and the lessor's interest in having the work done before the expiry of the lease.

C. Inspections

Inspections by lessor and by prospective lessees. Naturally, the lessee must tolerate inspection of the goods for the purposes indicated in paragraph (1). The lessee must also tolerate inspections by prospective lessees during the final period of the lease. In practice, this obligation will probably only arise in leases of durable and expensive goods (boats, cars, etc.).

NOTES

I. Necessary repairs etc.

1. It seems to be generally accepted that the lessee must tolerate performance of work on the goods which the lessor is obliged to perform under the contract. It is sometimes said explicitly that the lessee must tolerate work that is necessary for the preservation of the goods etc., irrespective of the lessor's obligation to perform such work, see for example for AUSTRIAN law, Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1098, nos. 10 ff, see also Koziol (-Iro), ABGB, § 1098, no. 4; CZECH CC § 668(2); DUTCH CC art. 7:220(1), cf. Rueb/Vrolijk/Wijlkerslooth-Vinke, De huurbepalingen verklaard, 43; ESTONIAN LOA § 283(1); PORTUGUESE CC art. 1038(e); SLOVAK CC § 668(2); SWISS LOA art. 257h(1); SPANISH CC art. 1559 and Urban Lease Act art. 21 (necessary repairs), Urban Lease Act art. 22 (improvements). In SCOTTISH law the lessor's obligation to maintain the thing in sufficiently good order for the lessee to be able to continue to use it throughout the lease period entails an obligation and a right to repair, although by custom certain minor or running repairs fall on the lessee, e.g. fitting new tyres on a car in a long-term lease (Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue 'Leasing and hire of movables', para. 41).
2. In many systems, the right to rent reduction is general and also covers interference with the lessee's use due to maintenance and repairs by the lessor. There are, however, systems where the lessee has only a limited right to rent reduction in such cases, see Notes to IV.B.–4:102 (Rent reduction).
3. Rules allowing not only rent reduction but termination of the lease as a result of interference with the lessee's use due to repair work etc. are also found: LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.492; SLOVENIAN LOA § 590.

II. Other work

4. In some jurisdictions, the lessee must to some extent tolerate modernisation of the goods or other work, i.e. work that is not necessary and not included in the lessor's obligations. Under AUSTRIAN law, a test of balance of interests applies both for necessary work and for other work (see references in note I1). Estonian LOA § 284 has detailed rules: a lessee must tolerate improvements and alterations, unless the work and effects are unfairly burdensome. There are rules on prior notification, and the lessor must take the lessee's interests into account. The lessee may claim compensation for expenses and may in some cases terminate the lease; rent reduction and damages are not precluded. For GERMAN law, it is indicated by some authors that the lessee must tolerate modernisations, see (MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB[4], § 535, nos. 97, 99, Schmidt-Futterer (-Eisenschmid), Mietrecht[9], § 535, no. 59 (CC § 554(2) does not apply to movables). For GREEK law, the lessee is obliged to tolerate improvements and alterations to the leased goods only in exceptional cases, when required by good faith and business usages (Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 24, no. 55). According to the Swiss LOA art. 260(1), the lessor may renovate or modify the object if the work may reasonably be imposed upon the lessee and if notice of termination has not been given. ITALIAN CC art. 1582 forbids changes to the goods which diminish the lessee's use; other work seems to be allowed, Alpa and Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 1582, no. 4. Under the SPANISH Urban Lease Act art. 22, the lessee cannot prevent improvements intended by the lessor, which cannot reasonably be delayed until the end of the lease, but the lessee has the right to terminate the lease as well as to claim for price reduction.

5. Some systems do not allow modernisation etc. of the goods by the lessor. According to the French CC art. 1723, the lessor may not change the form of the thing leased during the lease period. CC art. 1724 applies exclusively to urgent repairs and is not applicable to improvements to the goods (for see Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 261, for BELGIUM see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², no. 679). See to the same effect, MALTESE CC art. 1547 and SPANISH CC art. 1557. According to the Slovenian LOA § 591(1) the lessor may not make any changes to the goods that interfere with the lessee's use. Under Lithuanian CC art. 6.492(4), capital repairs that are not urgent may be authorised by the court.

III. Inspections by lessor or by prospective lessees

6. It seems to be generally accepted that the lessee must tolerate inspections concerning work which must be tolerated. See as examples of positive regulation, Estonian LOA § 283(2) and Swiss LOA art. 257h(2).

7. In some systems, the lessor has a more general right to inspect the goods, see for example CZECH CC § 665(1); Hungarian CC § 425(2)(a); Lithuanian CC art. 6.489(5); PORTUGUESE CC art. 1038(b); SLOVAK CC § 665(1)(2).

8. There are also examples of legislation allowing inspections in preparation for a new lease contract (or a sale): Estonian LOA § 283(2), HUNGARIAN CC § 433(1); Lithuanian CC art. 6.489(5); Swiss LOA art. 257h(2).

9. In other systems, the lessor's right to inspect the goods has been developed in case law and doctrine. For Austrian law, see Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III[2], no. 8/31, for example, concerning visits by prospective buyers, see OGH 11 March 1961, EvBl 1961/223. For French law it is held that the right to necessary repairs under CC art. 1724 implies a right to access, see Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21167; for Belgian law, see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², nos. 687 ff (also control of lessee's performance); for DUTCH law, see Rueb/Vrolijk/Wijkerslooth-Vinke, De huurbepalingen verklaard, 43, with reference to DUTCH CC art. 7:220(1). For GERMAN law, see Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 535, no. 56, with reference to GERMAN CC § 242 (inspections in individual cases and for particular reasons). For GREEK law, see Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[2], § 39 A (the lessee must tolerate inspections only in exceptional cases according to good faith). For ITALIAN law, inspections for control and by prospective lessees and buyers may be possible, see for details Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1587, no. V8; Provera, Locazione. Disposizioni generali, art. 1585, 237.

IV.B.–5:109: Obligation to return the goods

At the end of the lease period the lessee must return the goods to the place where they were made available for the lessee.

COMMENTS

A. Obligation to return the goods

The obligation. The lessee has only a temporary right to use the goods, and at the end of the lease period the goods must be returned to the lessor. The parties may derogate from this rule, for example by giving the lessee a right to buy the goods at the end of the lease period or a right to prolong the lease period.

Time for return of the goods. The time for return of the goods is at the end of the lease period. The time at which the lease period ends follows from IV.B.–2:102 (End of lease period).

B. Place for return of goods

Place where the goods were made available. The goods must be returned to the place where they were made available for the lessee's use. As a rule, the goods are made available at the lessor's place of business, cf. IV.B.–3:101 (Availability of the goods) paragraph (1). The rule in the present Article is a deviation from III.–2:101 (Place of performance), which fixes the debtor's place of business as the place for performance of obligations other than paying money. In a contract for lease it will normally be more convenient to return the goods to the lessor's place of business. The lessor may have facilities for storing the goods; the goods will be repaired here before they are leased to another person; the goods will be made available here under a new lease contract; etc. If it has been agreed that the goods will be made available for the lessee's use at a place other than the lessor's place of business, this will also be the place to which the goods should be returned according to this rule. Even where the goods were made available at a place different to that originally agreed, this will be the place for return of the goods. It might be discussed whether the lessee is obliged to accept this: the place originally agreed upon is the place to which the lessee expects to return the goods. Nevertheless, if the lessee has accepted the goods at a different place, it should normally be possible to return the goods to the same place. In this way the rule is also simpler and less ambiguous.

NOTES

I. Obligation to return the goods

1. In legislation on lease contracts, it is common to include the lessee's obligation to return the goods; the provisions are not listed here.
2. In some systems, it is said explicitly that the lessor may demand the goods directly from a sub-lessee: Estonian LOA § 334(5), cf. § 358(1) for commercial leases; GERMAN CC § 546(2); GREEK CC art. 599(2); Polish CC art. 675(2) (sub-lessee or other person to whom the lessee has transferred the goods); SWISS court practice allows a direct claim for return by the lessor against the sub-lessee (BSK (-R.Weber), OR I³, art. 267, no. 1).

3. In particular, the extent to which the lessee may withhold the goods because of counterclaims etc. is sometimes regulated (a question that is not regulated in this Part of Book IV but left to general rules): under AUSTRIAN CC § 1109, the lessee must return the goods irrespective of counterclaims or security rights in the goods; under Estonian LOA § 334(3), the lessee of a movable may withhold until expenses are reimbursed; the latter solution is accepted in DUTCH case law as well, cf. Hoge Raad 4 April 1997, NedJur 1997, 608 (Pilgram/Vastgoed).

II. Place of return

4. The place of return is mostly the lessor's place (unless otherwise agreed): for AUSTRIAN law, see Koziol, (-Iro), ABGB, § 1109-1110, no. 3; ESTONIAN LOA § 334(6) (the place at which the goods were delivered). Under FRENCH law the place of return is in principle governed by CC art. 1247: the place of the goods at the time of performance of the obligation; in practice the contract often stipulates the place of the lessor and it is said that this may be presumed also without agreement (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21195; for BELGIUM see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², no. 1240: place of return is the place where the lessee received the goods). For GERMAN law it is held that movable goods must be returned to the place of the lessor (Emmerich and Sonnenschein, (-Rolfs), Hk-Miete[8], § 546, no. 15). In GREEK law the prevailing view is that, in regard to movables, the place of return is the lessor's place (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[6], § 35 B 2; Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 27, no. 49). According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1590(4), movables must be returned to the place where they were made available to the lessee, normally the lessor's place (Alpa and Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 1590, no. 3). According to the POLISH CC art. 454, the goods are to be returned to the lessee's place. Under the SLOVENIAN LOA art. 604(2) goods must be returned to the place where the goods were made available to the lessee. Under SWISS law, the goods must be returned to the place where they were at the time of the conclusion of the contract, unless otherwise agreed (LOA art. 74(2)(2), BSK (-R.Weber), OR I³, art. 267, no. 1). Under ENGLISH law, the lessee must return the goods to the lessor (or a nominee) at the expiration of the hire period and must bear the costs of returning the goods (British Crane Hire Corp. Ltd. v. Ipswich Plant Hire Ltd. [1975] QB 303, 311–313), but no specific place for return is specified by law. For CZECH law, the general rule of the debtor's (i.e. the lessee's) place applies, with the exception of leases of a means of transportation, Ccom art. 637: the place where the object was accepted by the lessee. In SCOTTISH law general principles (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], para. 3.29) imply that the lessee must restore the goods at the lessor's place of business unless otherwise stated.

III. Condition of the goods

5. Rules concerning the condition of the goods on return are common. Such rules will not be dealt with here. Under this Part of Book IV, the required condition of the goods at the end of the lease period is regarded as a function of the lessee's obligation of maintenance and care etc.

6. In some systems, a description of the goods and their condition at the time they were made available to the lessee (e.g. in an inventory) may play a certain role at the return of the goods, see for example AUSTRIAN CC §§ 1109 and 1110; ESTONIAN LOA § 334(1); FRENCH CC art. 1730; ITALIAN CC art. 1590(1); PORTUGUESE CC art. 1043(2); SPANISH CC art. 1562.

IV. Lessor's right to reject the goods

7. It is held for ITALIAN law that the lessor may refuse to accept the goods if they are not in the required condition, apart from minor variations (Alpa and Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 1590, no. 7).

8. For Austrian law it is held that the lessor cannot refuse the proffered return even if the goods are damaged; the lessor's claim for damages must be pursued under CC § 1111 (OGH 3 November 1987 SZ 60/229). To similar effect under GERMAN law, see BGH 10 January 1983, BGHZ 86, 204, 209; Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Rolfs), Hk-Miete[8], § 546, no. 9; and for GREEK law, see Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 24, no. 51, fn. 71; Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), art. 599, no. 2; A.P. 907/1996 EllDik 38, 117; Ca Athens 3401/2002 EllDik 44, 849. SCOTTISH law only envisages a claim for damages by the lessor (Stair, The Laws of Scotland XIV 'Leasing and hire of moveables', para. 49; Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11] ,para. 13.11).

CHAPTER 6: REMEDIES OF THE LESSOR: MODIFICATIONS OF NORMAL RULES

IV.B.–6:101: Limitation of right to enforce payment of future rent

(1)Where the lessee has taken control of the goods, the lessor may not enforce payment of future rent if the lessee wishes to return the goods and it would be reasonable for the lessor to accept their return.

(2) The fact that a right to enforce specific performance is excluded under paragraph (1) does not preclude a claim for damages.

COMMENTS

A. Application of normal rules on remedies

Where the lessee fails to perform an obligation under the contract the lessor may be entitled, depending on the circumstances, to any or several of the remedies conferred by Book III, Chapter 3, as modified by the present Chapter. The general rules are partly supplemented, and partly derogated from, by the provisions of this Chapter.

Enforced specific performance of non-monetary obligations. Some of the lessee's obligations are non-monetary, for example the obligation to maintain the goods and the obligation to return the goods at the end of the lease period. The main rule, following from III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations), is that the lessor is entitled to enforce specific performance of such obligations. Several exceptions are, however, mentioned in the Article referred to: specific performance cannot be enforced where performance would be unlawful or impossible; where performance would be unreasonably burdensome or expensive; or where performance would be of such a personal character that it would be unreasonable to enforce it.

Enforced specific performance of monetary obligations. The creditor is entitled to enforce performance of monetary obligations according to III.–3:301 (Enforcement of monetary obligations). This general rule has, however, important exceptions in cases where the other party is unwilling to receive performance. See Comment B.

Withholding performance when goods are not made available. It follows from III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation) that a creditor who is to perform simultaneously or after the other party may withhold performance until the other party has tendered performance or has performed. If it is clear that there will be non-performance by the other party, even a creditor who is to perform first may withhold performance. These rules apply to contracts for lease as well as other contracts. The withholding of performance serves two purposes, namely to protect the withholding party from granting credit and to give the other party an incentive to perform. If the lessee is to pay rent before or at the start of the lease period, the lessor may withhold the goods in the sense that they are not made available to the lessee. In some cases the lessee may have other obligations that are to be performed before the goods are made available, for instance to make specifications or to provide necessary certificates for use of the goods.

Withholding performance when goods have been made available. The lessor's obligation to keep the goods available for the lessee's use is a continuous obligation. However, the performance of this obligation cannot be withheld after the goods have been made available to the lessee. The contract for lease implies that the lessee is given physical control of the goods, and to take the goods back would be to reverse a part of the performance, not to withhold it. Whether or not a lessor who has for some reason regained physical control of the goods may keep the goods because of non-performance of the lessee's obligations will depend on the rules in Book VIII (Acquisition and Loss of Ownership in Movables). The lessor is entitled to withhold performance of other obligations, for example the lessor's obligation to repair the goods, as a remedy for the lessee's non-performance.

Termination for fundamental non-performance. The lessor is entitled to terminate the obligations of both parties under the contract if the lessee's non-performance is fundamental, cf. the rules in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5. Fundamental non-performance is defined in III.–3:502 (Termination for fundamental non-performance) paragraph (2) and may relate both to monetary obligations (typically late payment of rent) and non-monetary obligations (typically the obligation to handle the goods with care).

Termination implies that the lessor no longer wants performance by the lessee and that the lessor is no longer obliged to perform the corresponding obligations. As the lessor's obligation to ensure that the goods remain available for the lessee's use is also terminated, the lessor is entitled to have the goods returned. This follows from IV.B.–5:109 (Obligation to return the goods).

Damages. The lessor is entitled to damages for loss caused by the lessee's non-performance, unless the non-performance is excused, cf. III.–3:701 (Right to damages). Non-performance of the obligation to pay rent will in most cases not be excused, but exceptions may occur, e.g. payment delayed due to a bank strike. Regarding non-monetary obligations, such as the obligation to handle the goods with care or the obligation to return the goods at the end of the lease period, excuses may be more relevant in practice.

Damages may be claimed for actual loss as well as for future loss, and for both economic and non-economic loss, cf. III.–3:701 (Right to damages) paragraph (3). As a rule the creditor is entitled to a sum that "will put the creditor as nearly as possible into the position in which the creditor would have been if the obligation had been duly performed", cf. III.–3:702 (General measure of damages). If the lease is terminated the lessor is normally entitled to the rent for the remaining lease period, or put more precisely: the rent for the remaining time of a fixed leased period or for the time until the lessee could have terminated the lease by giving notice in the case of an indefinite lease period. The lessor must reduce the loss by taking reasonable steps, cf. III.–3:705 (Reduction of loss), typically by entering into a new lease contract. Further, the lessor may suffer loss because the goods are damaged or reduced in value for other reasons as a result of non-performance of the lessee's obligations to handle the goods with care or to maintain the goods.

The termination may in some cases mean that the lessor is left with a benefit that must be taken into consideration when recoverable loss is calculated. As already mentioned, the lessor must take reasonable steps to reduce the loss, typically by leasing the goods to another lessee. If the lessor chooses to use the goods for the lessor's own purposes instead of entering into a new lease, the value of this benefit should be seen as a reduction of the loss. Unless otherwise agreed, the lessee is not entitled to compensation for improvements made to the goods, cf. IV.B.–5:106 (Compensation for maintenance and improvements). If, however, the lease is terminated and the improvements make it possible to achieve a higher rent than would otherwise be the case, this will reduce the loss. Accordingly, the improvements should also be taken into account if the lessor chooses to utilise the goods for the lessor's own purposes.

Option to buy the goods. Some contracts give the lessee an option to buy the goods at the end of the lease period or even earlier. If the rent is calculated so as to take into account the amortisation of the cost of the goods, the option to buy can often be exercised at a nominal price. Also where rent payments amortise less than a substantial part of the value, the rent already paid may influence the price at which the option can be exercised. If the option to buy is lost because the lease is terminated as a result of the lessee's non-performance, the lessor may be left with a benefit that the lessor would not have possessed had the option been exercised. However, as long as there is no agreement that ownership will pass, it remains hypothetical to say that the lessee would have exercised the option if the lease had not been terminated. The result is that the lessee will only be compensated for the benefit obtained by the lessor in so far as the lessor disposes of the goods up until the end of the agreed lease period.

> The lessee has leased a machine for three years with an option to purchase at a nominal price on the expiry of the lease period. After two and a half years, the lessee cannot pay the rent any more, and the lessor terminates the lease. It turns out that the goods have a much higher value than the option price at the end of the original lease period. The lessor's loss is reduced by the possibility of leasing or using the goods for the remaining half-year, but not by the difference between the value of the goods and the option price.

Interest. The lessor is entitled to interest on any sum of money that is paid late, and the lessee cannot invoke excuses. The relevant interest rate is "the average commercial bank short-term lending rate to prime borrowers prevailing for the contractual currency of payment at the place where payment is due", cf. III.–3:708 (Interest on late payments). Interest is added to the capital every twelve months, cf. III.–3:709 (When interest to be added to capital). For loss not covered by the interest, the lessor is entitled to damages according to the general rules on damages, cf. III.–3:708 paragraph (2).

Rules on remedies non-mandatory except for consumer contracts for lease. The rules of the present Chapter may be derogated from by agreement, except in the case of consumer contracts for lease, where the rules cannot be derogated from to the detriment of the consumer, cf. IV.B.–1:104 (Limits on derogation from rules on remedies in a consumer contract for lease). The parties may agree on prerequisites for remedies, e.g. on conditions for termination, and on the effects of the remedies. The parties may for example agree that a party who fails to perform an obligation is to pay a specified sum to the other party. Such an agreement is valid, although an excessive sum may in some instances be reduced, cf. III.–3:712 (Stipulated payment for non-performance).

B. Special rule in this Article for recovery of future rent

Under III.–3:301 (Enforcement of monetary obligations) performance of obligations to pay sums due can as a rule be enforced. However, where the other party does not want performance, or further performance, the situation may change and the obligation to pay sums due may, under certain conditions, be replaced by an obligation to pay damages.

Where the lessor has not yet made the goods available for the lessee's use and it is clear that the lessee will be unwilling to take control of the goods, the rules of Book III are adequate without adaptation. The starting point is that the lessor may proceed with performance and recover sums due. Enforced performance of the lessee's obligation to accept the goods is in principle possible, but is rather impractical in most cases. The lessor may also handle the goods according to the rules in III.–2:111 (Property not accepted). In both cases the lessor may enforce payment of rent that is due and continue to do so throughout the lease period. There are, however, important exceptions to these rules.

If the lessee is unwilling to receive performance, the lessor may not proceed to tender performance in cases where a substitute transaction may be made without significant effort or expense (III.–3:301 (Enforcement of monetary obligations) paragraph (2)(a)). A substitute transaction will typically be a new lease contract. The lessor is entitled to have reasonable expenses covered but may fear that the lessee will not be able to pay. The lessor is therefore not obliged to make a substitute transaction if the expenses are significant.

The lessor may not proceed to tender performance and enforce payment of sums due if this would be unreasonable under the circumstances (III.–3:301 (Enforcement of monetary obligations) paragraph (2)(b)). It may be the case that performance will incur unnecessary costs where the lessee can no longer make use of the goods. The lessor should for example not be allowed to enter into a contract for the supply of goods with a view to tendering performance if it is clear that the lessee is unwilling to receive performance.

Where the lessee has taken control of the goods, the situation is different. The lessor may enforce payment of the rent that is due, at intervals throughout the lease period as the case may be. However, even in this situation an exception should be made and, as the matter is not covered by (III.–3:301 (Enforcement of monetary obligations), a special rule is necessary.

If the lessee wishes to return the goods and it is reasonable for the lessor to accept return of the goods, the obligation to pay rent for the future period should be replaced by an obligation to pay damages. What is reasonable will depend on the situation of the parties, the kind of goods leased, the proportion of the agreed lease period remaining, etc. For a business lessor there are in many cases few problems with accepting return of the goods, and the goods can in many cases be leased to new customers. In other situations, the lessor may have entered into the contract for lease so as to dispose of the goods for a certain period, and accepting return of the goods in such cases may cause practical problems and expenses. It may also be unreasonable to accept return of the goods even if the costs can be recovered from the lessee.

Lessee X has leased a horse for a four-week holiday. After one week X falls ill and cannot use the horse or look after it. Lessor Y, whose business is to lease horses, must agree to take the horse back and to claim damages instead of the weekly rent.

Illustration 2
Lessor X, who lives in Piraeus, is stationed for one year in the organisation's branch office in Norway. X owns a cabin cruiser and leases the boat to Y for one year before leaving for Norway. After a couple of months Y is tired of being seasick and wants to return the boat. X no longer has a place for the boat and at this time of year it is difficult to find a new lessee. X may still enforce payment each month under the contract.

C. Damages

The lessor can claim damages if performance of the obligation cannot be enforced because of a rule restricting such enforcement (III.–3:303 (Damages not precluded) and paragraph (2) of the present Article). The damages "will put the creditor as nearly as possible into the position in which the creditor would have been if the obligation had been duly performed", in terms of losses suffered and gains not obtained, cf. III.–3:702 (General measure of damages). In these situations the general rule on reduction of loss applies, cf. III.–3:705 (Reduction of loss). To what extent a substitute transaction will reduce the loss depends on the circumstances. If the lessor can supply goods to any new customer, the lessor may recover loss of gains, even if the goods are leased to a new customer for the same rent. The idea behind allowing the lessee the right to refuse performance is partly that the lessor may save costs by not proceeding with the performance, and partly that payment may be settled at once as damages in lieu of future performance.

NOTES

I. Non-performance and remedies in general

1. The general rules in Book III, Chapter 3 apply also to lease contracts. The corresponding rules in national law – concerning e.g. non-performance as a unitary concept, excused non-performance and cumulation of remedies – differ, and these differences are of course also found in national law on lease contracts. A general reference is therefore made to the notes to Book III, Chapter 3.

II. Enforcement of performance

2. Rules on enforced performance of monetary obligations are found in (III.–3:301 (Enforcement of monetary obligations)), see notes to that Article.

3. The general rules in III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations) on the right to enforce performance of non-monetary obligations also apply to lease contracts, and reference is made to the notes to that Article. There are, however, some rules in national law dealing with enforcement of the lessee's non-monetary obligations in particular. Only such rules will be commented upon here.

4. Under GERMAN CC § 541, the lessor has a procedural remedy (Unterlassungsklage) to stop the lessee from using the goods in a way not conforming with the contract if the use continues even after a warning from the lessor. A warning is, however, not necessary in some cases where it would have no purpose (Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 541, no. 4). In AUSTRIAN law the lessor has procedural remedies under general law in the case of use at odds with the contract (Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1098, no. 1) and the lessor may also make use of remedies as a possessor and as an owner (Koziol (-Iro), ABGB, § 1098, no. 3). The situation is similar in ESTONIAN law and in GREEK law (for the latter, see Georgiadis, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, § 25, no. 53). The right to choose between enforcement of the contract and termination is present in several jurisdictions (e.g. DUTCH CC art. 3:296; FRENCH CC art. 1184, ITALIAN CC art. 1453) and is included in the lease provisions of the MALTESE CC (art. 1570), PORTUGUESE CC (art. 1041) and SPANISH CC (art. 1556). Under ENGLISH and N. IRISH law, the court may order specific performance under a claim in conversion (s. 3, Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977). Thus, the lessee is precluded from wrongfully detaining the goods or using the goods in a way inconsistent with the lessor's right of property in the goods. (Sufficient encroachment on these rights is necessary for an action in conversion: Marcq v. Christie, Manson & Woods Ltd. [2003] EWCA Civ 731, [13]–[24]). Detention of the goods after a request by the lessor for return of the goods may also be construed as conversion. In the case of 'regulated consumer hire agreements' and 'regulated consumer hire-purchase agreements' under the Consumer Credit Act 1974 (s. 92(1)), the lessor is not allowed to enter the lessee's premises to take possession of the goods without an order of the court. If the lessor ignores this rule, the lessee may apply to the court for an order that the whole or part of any sum paid to the lessor in respect of the goods be repaid and that the obligation to pay the whole or part of any sum owed is extinguished (s. 132(1)). Under HUNGARIAN law, the lessor may demand that use contrary to the contract or the purpose of the goods stops (CC § 425(2)(b)). The lessee is obliged to restore the goods if they have been transformed without the lessor's consent (CC § 425(3)). According to Gellért (-Besenyei), A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1683, all transformations of the leased property require the prior consent of the lessor. In one of its judgments, the Supreme Court held that in the case of transformations of the leased property without the consent of the lessor, the latter is only entitled to restitutio in integrum, but not to termination with immediate effect (BH 1993. 49, Legf. Bír. Gf. IV. 32. 817/1991).

III. Withholding of performance

5. It seems to follow from general rules that the lessor, in cases of non-performance of the lessee's obligations, may withhold the goods before they are made available to the lessee, but not afterwards. These rules are sometimes commented upon for lease contracts explicitly (for AUSTRIAN law, see Riss, Erhaltungspflicht, 226; for GERMAN law, see Schmidt-Futterer (-Blank), Mietrecht[9], § 543, no. 149; for SWISS law, see BSK (-R.Weber), OR I³, § 257f, no. 2). Performance of other obligations, e.g. maintenance, may be withheld because of the lessee's non-performance (see e.g. for FRENCH law, Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21179, 680).

IV. Termination for non-performance

6. The general rules in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5 on termination of the contractual relationship also apply to leases, and a reference is made to the notes to that Section. Only rules concerning contracts for lease in particular will be dealt with here.

7. As for grounds for termination, harmful use and late payment may, on certain conditions, be grounds for termination according to the AUSTRIAN CC § 1118. It is debatable whether or not the provision is exhaustive (see Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1118, nos. 15, 17 ff, Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1118, no. 3). Under CZECH law, the lessor may terminate the lease contract (with effect ex tunc) on the basis of a sublease in violation of the contract (CC § 666(2)), harmful alterations to the goods (CC § 667(2)), or harmful use of the goods (CC § 679(3)). The general rule on termination for non-performance (CC § 517(1)) may also apply. ESTONIAN LOA §§ 315 and 316 contain rules on termination in cases of use contrary to the contract and cases of delayed payment, cf. also the general rule in LOA § 116(2) on fundamental non-performance. GERMAN CC § 543 (cf. § 314) allows either party to terminate a lease without notice for an important reason, in particular in specified cases of lack of care, entrustment of the goods to third parties, and late payment. Further, in SWISS law, either party may terminate extraordinarily for an important reason, LOA art. 266g, here with notice as fixed by law. There are special rules on termination because of the lessee's bankruptcy (LOA art. 266h), late payment (LOA art. 257d), and lack of care (LOA art. 257d). According to the BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1729, use contrary to the purpose of the goods or in a way that may result in damage to the goods may, depending on the circumstances, give the lessor a right to terminate. Late payment may lead to termination under general rules (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21178). In ITALIAN law, important non-performance may lead to termination of the contract, cf. for lease contracts in particular, cf. Alpa and Mariconda, Codice civile commentato IV, art. 1587, no. 7. In GREEK law, use contrary to the contract, lack of care and late payment may give reason to termination by giving notice (GREEK CC arts. 594, 597). Rules on extraordinary termination because of delayed payment, non-conforming use, or subleasing without consent are found in HUGANRIAN CC § 428(2), § 425(2) and § 425(4). Under MALTESE CC art. 1555(1), use contrary to the purpose of the goods or in a way that may result in damage to the goods may, according to the circumstances, give the lessor a right to terminate. See also CC art. 1570 on termination in cases of non-performance of either party's obligations. According to the POLISH CC art. 672, the lessor may terminate the lease if rent is delayed for two periods. The lessor may also terminate if the lessee uses the goods in a manner inconsistent with the contract or designation of the goods and despite a warning from the lessor does not cease to use them in such a way (CC art. 667(2)). Thirdly the lessor may terminate if the lessee neglects the goods (CC art. 667 (2) CC). A particular rule on late payment is found in PORTUGUESE CC art. 1048, cf. art. 1041(1): the lessee may prevent termination by paying within eight days (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 386). According to the SLOVAK CC § 679(3), the lessor may terminate the lease at any time if the lessee uses the leased thing or admits use of the leased thing in a way resulting in rise of damage or in danger of a considerable damage. Termination is also available where the lessee does not pay rent for three months (if the rent period is shorter than three months) or fails to make a rent payment until the following rent payment is due (where the rent period is longer than three months. The lessor may also terminate if the lessee subleases the thing contrary to the contract for lease (CC § 666(2)) or if considerable danger threatens the leased goods due to modifications made without the lessor´s consent (CC § 667(2); Lazar, OPH II, 155. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1556 (cf. art. 1555), the lessor may terminate the lease for non-performance of the obligation to pay rent or the obligation to use the goods with care and in conformity with the contract or custom. The normal rules on termination for repudiatory breach apply in the UNITED KINGDOM and IRELAND. However, in the case of breach by the lessee under a 'regulated consumer hire agreement' or a 'regulated consumer hire-purchase agreement' under the Consumer Credit Act 1974, the lessor must serve a 'default notice' on the lessee, allowing 14 days for compliance, before enforcing certain rights (including the right to terminate) (ss. 87-89). Similar provisions are in force in IRELAND under the Consumer Credit Act 1995: the lessor may not terminate the contract following breach by the lessee before giving notice and allowing the lessee 21 days to remedy the situation (s. 54(2)).

8. In some systems, termination must as a rule be decided by a court, see notes to III.–3:502 (Termination for fundamental non-performance), but even in these systems contract clauses allowing automatic termination may be permitted, see for lease contracts in particular, Huet, Contrats spéciaux, nos. 21178 and 21209.

V. Damages

9. The general rules in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 7 on damages and interest also apply to lease contracts, and a reference is made to the notes to that Section.

10. The contract for lease normally implies that the lessee uses and has physical control over goods belonging to another person, and the question often arises of liability for deterioration of or damage to the goods. This is regularly regarded as a question of non-performance of the lessee's obligation to use the goods (only) in conformity with the contract and to handle the goods with care. The burden of proof may lie on the lessee, as it is often difficult for the lessor to prove the causes of deterioration and damages while the goods were under the lessee's control. Rules on vicarious liability for the acts of third persons permitted by the lessee to use the goods are often found; some of these rules are of particular interest to leases of immovable property, but may be relevant to leases of goods as well. According to the AUSTRIAN CC § 1111, the lessee is liable for damages and deterioration caused by the lessee's own fault or the fault of family members etc. (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V[3], § 1111, no. 8). It follows from the general rule in CC § 1298 that the lessee must prove that the loss was not caused by fault. See primarily to the same effect, ESTONIAN LOA § 334(2). According to the CZECH CC § 683 (1), the lessee is liable for damage or inadequate wear of the leased thing resulting from use inconsistent with the contract. The lessee is vicariously liable for persons allowed access to the goods by the lessee, but not for fortuitous events. Special rules are found in CC art. 722 (business leases) and Ccom art. 632 (leases of a means of transportation). In DUTCH law, the lessee is liable in damages for non-performance, and with the exception of damage by fire, all damage is presumed to be imputable to the lessee (CC art. 7:218, cf. art. 7:219 on vicarious liability for persons allowed to use the goods. In GERMAN law, the lessee's liability for non-performance of the obligations concerning use of the goods is based on the general rules in CC §§ 276, 280 and 249 on liability for fault, but the discussion is often linked to the rule in § 538 stating that the lessee is not liable for deterioration of and changes to the goods caused by use consistent with the contract (see e.g. Emmerich and Sonneschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 538). Liability for performance entrusted to another, cf. CC § 278, extends to persons whom the lessee has allowed to come into contact with the goods (Staudinger (-Emmerich), BGB (2006), § 538, no. 6). It is up to the lessee to prove that there was no fault, if the lessor succeeds in proving that the damage or deterioration was not there already at the start of the lease (Staudinger (-Emmerich), BGB (2006), § 538, no. 13). Fault liability for damage caused by lack of care or by use inconsistent with the contract is the rule under GREEK CC art. 594, whether or not termination follows (Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 237; Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), art. 594, no. 10); the burden of proof is on the lessee (CA Athens 1139/2000 EllDik 43, 226; 3799/1998 EllDik 40, 182; Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[6], § 33 II). Concerning vicarious liability for sublessees and other third parties, see CC art. 593. Under SWISS law, the lessee is liable for fault. The lessee may have to prove that there was no fault if the lessor proves that the damage was caused by the lessee (LOA art. 97; see further BSK (-R.Weber), OR I[3], § 267 nos. 4 and 5). According to the FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1732, the lessee is liable for damage to or deterioration of the goods during the lessee's use unless it is proved that the deterioration or damage was caused without the lessee's fault (see the even stricter liability for fire in CC art. 1733, applicable also to movables, Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 423). The lessee is vicariously liable for household members and sub-lessees (see further Huet, Contrats spéciaux, nos. 21190–21193). Under HUNGARIAN law, the lessee is liable for any damage resulting from use inconsistent with the contract or the purpose of the goods, see § 425(1). The lessor may claim compensation (damages) – in addition to termination with immediate effect, CC § 425(2). In ITALIAN law, the lessee is responsible for deterioration and damage to the goods, fire included, during the lease period, unless it is proved that the deterioration or damage was due to a cause not attributable to the lessee, CC art. 1588(1). This implies that it must be proved that the damage or deterioration was caused without the lessee's fault (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1588, no. I1). The liability extends to loss caused by persons permitted by the lessee to use the goods, CC art. 1588(2). In MALTESE law, the lessee is also liable unless it is proved that the damage or deterioration is caused without the lessee's fault (CC art. 1561; see also the rule in art. 1562 on damage caused by fire), and the lessee is vicariously liable for family members etc. (art. 1563). In PORTUGUESE law, the lessee is liable for damage or deterioration that is not caused by ordinary use or by casual events, but the burden of proof is on the lessee (CC art. 1044, cf. art. 1043). According to the SLOVAK CC § 683 (1), the lessee is liable for damage or excessive wear of the leased thing resulting from use inconsistent with the contract. The lessee is vicariously liable for persons allowed access to the goods (e.g. family members, household members, sub-lessees, guests), however, the lessee is not liable for casus (Svoboda (-Fíger), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, 625). The lessee's liability under SPANISH CC art. 1556 (cf. art. 1568) includes loss caused by lack of care or use inconsistent with the contract or custom. For SWEDISH law, the lessee must prove that damage was not caused by the lessee's fault (Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 204–205). Under UNITED KINGDOM law, the onus of proof is on the lessee to show that loss of or damage to the goods while in the lessee's possession was not caused by any failure on the lessee's part to take reasonable care (Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-049, with reference to Brook´s Wharf & Bull Wharf Ltd. v. Goodman Bros [1937] 1 KB 534, 538–539 and in SCOTLAND: Walker, Principles in Scottish Private Law III, 399). The lessee will not be liable for damage or loss caused by the fault of persons, other than the lessee's own employees, to whom the lessee properly entrusts the goods (Smith v. Melvin (1845) 8 D 264). Where damages are available, the lessee will be liable for the diminution in value of the goods or for the actual value of the goods (if they have been lost). Damages for consequential loss are only available where this was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time the lease was made (Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-050, with reference to Anderson v. NE Ry (1861) 4 LT 216).

11. Some rules are found in national law regarding liability for the lessee's continued use after the expiry of the lease period (where there is no prolongation of the period). According to the CZECH CC § 723, on business leases, the lesse must pay the rent, along with an additional statutory delay payment. ESTONIAN LOA § 335 states that the lessee must pay the rent agreed or the rent that is usual; this does not preclude a claim for compensation for further loss. According to the GERMAN CC § 546a(1), the lessor may claim the agreed rent or the rent that is normally paid for such goods. It is a precondition that return of the goods is possible (Staudinger (-Emmerich), BGB (2006), § 546a nos. 22–27). Damages for additional loss is not excluded, CC § 546a(2). For a comparable rule in GREEK law, see Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), art. 601; and in SWISS law, see BSK (-R.Weber), OR I³, § 267, no. 2. In HUNGARIAN law, the lessee is obliged to pay damages for delayed return of the leased goods after the expiry of the lease period (BH 1982. 528. Legf. Bír. Gf. III. 30 176/1981); see Gellért (-Besenyei), A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1688. In a case where the contract of lease was void, the Supreme Court ordered the party who used the leased property on the basis of the void contract to pay a "fee for use". See BH 1987. 364. Legf. Bír. Gf. I. 31 456/1986. According to the ITALIAN CC art. 1591, a lessee must pay the agreed rent in cases of delayed return of the goods, and damages for additional loss, as may be. This amounts to a form of minimal damages, available without the lessor having to prove any loss (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1591, no. III1). A rule to the same effect is found in PORTUGUESE CC art. 1045, but here the liability is fixed as double the agreed rent if the lessee is late both in returning the goods and in paying the rent. SLOVAK CC § 723(1) applies to business leases of goods, and states that the lessee must pay the agreed rent in case of delayed return of the goods, in addition to a "charge".

VI. Special rules for case where lessee wishes to return goods

12. In some systems, a reduction of the lessee's obligation to pay rent for the rest of the lease period is to some degree accepted even if premature return of the goods is caused by events on the lessee's side. In AUSTRIAN law, rent must be paid even if a casual event on the lessee's side prevents the use or limits the usefulness of the goods. The lessor must, however, deduct what is saved or gained because of this, the lessor may also under the circumstances have to make a substitute transaction (AUSTRIAN CC § 1107, see Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V[3], § 1107 nos. 1 and 4, Koziol (-Iro), ABGB, § 1107, no. 1). The rule is rarely applied, perhaps because the lessee is allowed to sublease the goods. Refused consent to assignment of the lessee's right may also under the circumstances lead to a reduction of the lessee's liability (cf. AUSTRIAN CC § 1295(2), see Schwimann, loc. cit. § 1107 no. 3). According to the ESTONIAN LOA § 296(3), the lessee must pay rent for periods during which the goods cannot be used because of circumstances depending on the lessee, but sums saved and benefits gained by the lessor are deducted from the rent. In GERMAN law too, the point of departure is that rent must be paid even if use of the goods is prevented by causes on the lessee's side, CC § 537(1). If the lessee proposes an acceptable new lessee for the rest of the period on unchanged terms and the lessee has an outstanding interest in returning the object, the lessor may have to accept the substitution, at least for leases of immovable property (see in general, Staudinger (-Emmerich), BGB (2006), § 537, no. 1). As the underlying rule is CC § 242, the same principle should be relevant also to leases of goods. In GREEK law, whatever the lessor has gained by alternative use may be deducted from the rent (CC art. 596), and it is held that the same applies where the lessor by fault omits to utilise the goods (Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Rapsomanikis), arts. 595–596, no. 7). For SWEDISH law, it is held that the lessee has a right to "cancellation", in consumer leases perhaps even without having to indemnify the lessor (Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 197–198). According to the SWISS LOA art. 264, the lessee may be discharged by proposing an acceptable substitute lessee. If not, the lessee must pay the rent for the rest of the lease period if the goods are returned prematurely, with a reduction, however, for sums which it is possible for the lessor to save or gain through early return of the goods. See in general, BSK (-R.Weber), OR I[3], art. 264.

13. Under ENGLISH and IRISH law, where there is an anticipatory repudiatory breach by the lessee (i.e. an anticipatory breach which gives the lessor the right to terminate), the lessor may elect to terminate and claim damages or to affirm the contract. In the former case, damages may be claimed immediately (Hochster v. De la Tour (1853) 2 E&B 678). In the latter case, the lessor may choose to tender performance in the hope that the lessee will withdraw his repudiation. If an actual breach occurs, the lessor will have a claim in damages. If the breach is sufficiently serious, the lessor may also elect to terminate at this later date. The rules on specific performance of monetary obligations (in the form of an action for an agreed sum) are less strict than for specific performance. However, the lessor will not be able to secure performance by the lessee against the lessee's wishes where damages would be an adequate remedy. Where, on the other hand, the contract is frustrated through no fault of the lessee, all obligations on both sides are discharged and the lessee is under no further obligation to pay rent. SCOTTISH law is to the same effect.

14. In other systems, there seems to be no reduction of the lessee's obligations in such situations. This follows from general rules in CZECH law. This is true also for DUTCH law, with the possible exception of the application of rules on reasonableness and fairness (CC arts. 6:248 and 6:258) and on creditor's fault (CC art. 6:102(2)). In FRENCH law, it seems that rent must be paid for the rest of the period even if the lessee wishes to return the goods (Cass.civ., 10 January 1990, Bull.civ. 1990.III, no. 7; Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], no. 354; Cass.civ. 3e, 3 April 2001, Loyers et copr. 2001, no. 167, note Vial-Pedroletti). For BELGIAN law it is said that the fact that it is not possible to use the goods because of events on the lessee's side is of no impact whatsoever (La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de choses I², no. 425). In SPAIN this situation has been highly disputed under the old Urban Leases Act 1944. According to art. 56 of this law, the lessee who repudiates the contract ought still to pay the remainder of the rent for the agreed time, even where the goods have been returned to the lessor. Nevertheless, case law decided that this compensation would amount in most cases to a super-compensation and unjust enrichment for the lessor, and accordingly would diminish the incentives to make reasonable efforts to mitigate the resulting loss (see Bercovitz (-Carrasco), Comentarios a la Ley de Arrendamientos Urbanos, p. 246). Under the new law, the TS 20 March 2004 (RAJ 2004/2710, CCJC 68 § 1815, note by Carrasco) upheld the rationale given by the Appellate Court in order to apply the compensation rule laid down in art. 11 (one month of rental payment for each remaining year of the lease period) as a general rule of limitation of liability when the lessee rejects the contract and gives back the asset.

IV.B.–6:102: Reduction of liability in consumer contract for the lease of goods

(1) In the case of a consumer contract for the lease of goods, the lessor's right to damages may be reduced to the extent that the loss is mitigated by insurance covering the goods, or to the extent that loss would have been mitigated by insurance, in circumstances where it is reasonable to expect the lessor to take out such insurance.

(2) The rule in paragraph (1) applies in addition to the rules in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 7.

COMMENTS

A. Insurance and leases

No obligation to take out insurance covering contractual liability. No obligation to insure the goods is included in this Part of Book IV, whether on the side of the lessor or the lessee. Such obligations are often found in contract terms. Normally, a party to a contract will prefer to take out insurance covering the party's liability against the other party, e.g. liability under the contract for damage to or loss of the goods. (Sometimes a party will want insurance covering liability against third parties as well, e.g. liability for damage caused by the goods, liability for pollution etc.) It has not been deemed necessary to include an obligation to provide insurance of this kind. Further, it may be in the interests of one party to the contract that the other party has insurance covering that other party's liability under the contract. The reason for this is typically a fear that the liable party will be unable to pay damages. For business-to-business contracts, as well as for consumer-to-consumer contracts, the evaluation of the other party's ability to perform the obligations under the contract and meet claims arising from non-performance is one element in the complex decision to enter into a contract with that person. For business-to-consumer contracts a mandatory rule on insurance on the side of the business could be discussed. This is, however, a general issue which concerns several contract types, not contracts for lease in particular, and such a rule is not included in this Part of Book IV.

No obligation to insure the goods. It is a characteristic element of the contract for lease that the lessee has control over and care of goods belonging to another person. Non-performance of the lessee's obligations may lead to liability for loss resulting from damage to or destruction of the goods. In many cases this loss – and the corresponding liability – is mitigated by ordinary insurance covering physical damage to the goods. It would hardly be possible to establish as a general rule that normal insurance should always be provided by the owner or always by the user. The cost – and even the availability – of insurance may vary according to the character of the goods, the length of the lease period, the planned use, the professionalism of the parties etc. As a rule then, it should be left to the parties to agree on the question of insuring the goods.

B. Consumer contracts for lease

Lessee's reasonable expectations. It seems impossible even for consumer contracts for lease to say that insurance should be provided by one of the parties in all cases. Consumer protection is, however, required to the extent that a lack of insurance coverage should not come as a surprise to the consumer. In situations where the consumer had reason to believe that the goods were insured by the lessor, and therefore did not take out insurance, the lessee's liability for loss or destruction of the goods should be reduced correspondingly. It may be that this result can be based on general rules on relevant loss and reduction of loss, but it seems appropriate to express it explicitly for consumer contracts for lease, where the question is most likely to arise in practice.

Existing insurance or expected insurance. Reduction of the lessee's liability should be available in two different situations. If the loss is in fact covered, partially or totally, by existing insurance, this may lead to reduced liability whether the existence of insurance coverage was reasonably to be expected or not. If the loss is not covered by insurance, liability may be reduced to the extent that the loss would have been mitigated had the lessor taken out insurance where such an action could reasonably have been expected. It must be determined from the circumstances whether the lessor could reasonably have been expected to provide insurance and, if so, in what form. The answer is obvious if the lessor is obliged by the contract to insure the goods. The lessor may also be expected to take out insurance where this is mandated by law. In other situations, regard must be had to insurance coverage that is commonly provided. The character of the goods and the length of the lease period may also be relevant.

Consumer A leases a rather new car for the weekend from B, a business. The lessee drives too fast and loses control of the vehicle, which is severely damaged when it hits a road fence. Since it is usual to insure new cars against such loss, and the lessee was offered no short-term insurance when entering into the contract, the lessee's liability may be reduced by an amount corresponding to normal insurance coverage even if the car was not insured.

Coverage of insurance. Under the default rules of this Part of Book IV, the lessee is not liable for destruction or loss of the goods by fortuitous events: repair in such cases will normally go beyond the lessee's obligations under IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract), and the lessee is not obliged to return the goods in a condition better than that which follows from the obligation to maintain etc. The parties may, however, have agreed to impose more extensive obligations of maintenance and repair on the lessee. Further, the goods may be damaged as a result of non-performance of the lessee's obligation to handle the goods in accordance with the contract. It must also be determined from the circumstances to what extent it may be expected that insurance provided by the lessor will cover loss caused by the carelessness or negligence of the lessee.

C. Contracts for lease other than consumer contracts

General rules apply. The rule in paragraph (1) of the present provision applies in addition to the general rules in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 7 on damages, see paragraph (2) of the present provision. Situations may vary to a considerable degree, and it is not advisable to try to establish one rule for all cases concerning the effects or availability of insurance. Neither should the rule in paragraph (1) give rise to conclusions a contrario.

NOTES

Insurance and lease contracts

1. In national law, questions concerning insurance and leases are dealt with sporadically. In GERMAN law, the lessee's liability for damage not caused intentionally or by gross negligence may be limited if the cost of insurance of the goods is borne by the lessee, directly or indirectly (see Staudinger (-Emmerich), BGB (2006), § 538, no. 9). In FRENCH law, there is no obligation to insure leased goods. It may lead to reduction of the lessee's liability if the lessor gives the false impression that risks are covered by insurance (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21196). Under ENGLISH law, the lessee owes no obligation to the lessor to insure the leased goods (Lockspeiser Aircraft Ltd. v. Brooklands Aircraft Ltd., unreported, 7 Mar 1990), but such a duty may arise through agreement, trade custom or other special circumstances (Birks, English Private Law II, § 13.51). The lessee may choose to insure the goods however, and if a payment is made, may retain so much as would cover the lessee's own (possessory) interest, holding the balance on trust for the lessor (Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-025). The position is similar under SCOTTISH law. It is commented upon in BELGIAN law that contract clauses stating that the lessor will insure the goods often include the relinquishing of the insurer's recourse against the lessee (La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de choses I², nos. 1041, 1043 ff). ITALIAN CC art. 1589 has rules on the reduction of the lessee's liability for destruction of the goods by fire when the goods are insured by the lessor. According to the GREEK CC art. 600, if insured goods are damaged by fire, the lessee is liable only if fault is proven. See for a discussion of possible reliance on usual insurance coverage under NORWEGIAN law, Falkanger, Leie av skib, 413. In SPAIN there is no particular rule. The lessor has no duty to insure. If the lessor does insure and the insurer compensates the resulting loss, it enjoys a subrogation claim against the lessee, who is presumed to have caused the damage (CC art. 1563).

CHAPTER 7: NEW PARTIES AND SUBLEASE

IV.B.–7:101: Change in ownership and substitution of lessor

(1) Where ownership passes from the lessor to a new owner, the new owner of the goods is substituted as a party to the lease if the lessee has possession of the goods at the time ownership passes. The former owner remains subsidiarily liable for the non-performance of the obligations under the contract for lease as a personal security provider.

(2) A reversal of the passing of ownership puts the parties back in their original positions except as regards performance already rendered at the time of reversal.

(3) The rules in the preceding paragraphs apply accordingly where the lessor has acted as holder of a right other than ownership.

COMMENTS

Contracts for lease and change in ownership. Generally, a party to a contract may assign the right to performance under the contract (III.–5:105 (Assignability: general rule)), but the party will not be discharged of contractual obligations without the other party's assent (III.–5:302 (Transfer of a contractual position)). For lease contracts, a change in ownership of the leased goods raises some special questions. The lessor's position as owner of the goods (or holder of a comparable right) and as a party to the contractual relationship arising from the contract for lease are closely connected. In order to perform the obligations under the contract the lessor must be able to make the goods available for the lessee's use and in most cases must also be able to carry out work on the goods in the form of maintenance and repairs. This normally presupposes that the lessor is the owner of the goods. Rules are needed concerning the consequences of a change of ownership regarding both the contractual relationship between the lessee and the original lessor and the relationship between the lessee and the new owner.

Contractual rights and protection of possession. The rule under this Article is that a new owner is substituted as a party to the contractual relationship arising from the lease contract. Even without this rule the lessee's possession of the goods may be protected to a certain extent under the rules on transfer of ownership, see Book VIII. To the extent that the lessee's possession is protected against a new owner this can be regarded as a "negative" obligation on the side of a new owner, an obligation to tolerate the lessee's use; while a substitution as a party to the contractual relationship implies that the new owner has "positive" obligations under the contract.

B. Models and policy issues

Lessor's right to dispose of the goods. It follows indirectly from the present Article that the lessor is allowed to dispose of the goods, by transferring ownership or otherwise. Such a change in ownership is not regarded by itself as a non-performance of the lessor's obligations, and the lessee cannot object to the transfer of ownership or stop it by claiming specific performance. This is also the situation for a change in ownership resulting from a forced sale or from actions by the lessor's general creditors. If, however, the change in ownership is likely to interfere with the lessee's use of the goods in accordance with the contract, this amounts to non-performance of an obligation under the contract, cf. IV.B.–3:101 (Availability of the goods) paragraph (3). Given that the new owner is normally substituted as a party to the contractual relationship and the former lessor remains liable for the performance of the obligations under the contract, a change of ownership will in most cases not interfere with the lessee's use. The situation may be different if the goods are sold after the conclusion of the contract but prior to the lessee's taking possession of the goods, or where rules on registration of rights result in a change of ownership without a duty on the new owner to respect the lease contract.

Enforceability against new owner. As for the relationship between the lessee and a new owner of the goods, there are two possible main models: there may be no relationship at all, or the lessee's right may have some protection in relation to other interests in the goods, including the interests of a new owner. Both models are found in national law. As long as the rules are transparent and relatively simple, prospective lessees or buyers of goods as well as security right holders and the lessor's general creditors can adjust their behaviour to the consequences of the rules. Arguments pointing to one model as the most fair or most economically efficient are hardly sustainable. The model chosen here, protecting a lessee who has taken possession of the goods, is likely to create fewer situations of non-performance and conflict than a model where the lessee has no protection against third parties at all. A change in ownership will not automatically lead to non-performance of the obligations under the lease contract, and a prospective buyer or lender of money is warned by the fact that the owner of the goods is not in direct possession. The same kind of reasoning justifies the rule that a new owner is substituted as a party to the contractual relationship under the lease contract. If a new owner were only to have the passive duty of respecting the lessee's possession and use of the goods the rule could still lead to non-performance of the obligations under the contract for lease in many cases. Another reason for choosing this model is that some contracts for lease have more or less the same function as a contract for sale. A contract for lease may be chosen primarily to establish a security right in the goods, in particular where the contract confers on the lessee full use of the goods for their entire economic lifespan. In such cases the protection of the lessee should not differ too much from the protection afforded a buyer. If the lessee is to be protected in some contracts for lease of this type, the simplest solution is to apply the same rule to all leases. Otherwise it can be difficult to find exact criteria for differentiating between contracts.

New owner in good faith. A buyer of the goods with knowledge of the lease has normally accepted the substitution as a party to the contractual relationship with the lessee, and the price agreed is normally influenced by this knowledge. As the rule in the present Article applies only when the lessee has possession of the goods, the buyer in most cases knows or ought to know of the lease. The owner's lack of direct control of the goods should alert the buyer to the fact that other interests in the goods may exist, and the buyer can make further investigations. If the buyer does not know of the lease despite the fact that the lessee has possession of the goods, the unexpected existence of the contract for lease will often amount to non-performance of an obligation under the sales contract, cf. IV.A.–2:305 (Third party rights or claims in general). The lessee's right is still protected, but the lessee must accept a reversal of the substitution of the buyer as a party to the contractual relationship, (see below). The individual contract for lease is decisive as to the terms regulating the rights and obligations between the new owner and the lessee. There may be cases where the terms of the contract are less favourable to the lessor than the buyer expected, even if it was known that a lease existed. It has not been found necessary to introduce an exception to the lessee's protection for these situations. Depending on the sales contract, the buyer is entitled to remedies against the seller, including termination of the contractual relationship and a retransfer of the goods to the seller, entailing a reversal of the change in ownership. A lessee lacking possession of the goods is not protected, irrespective of the buyer's knowledge. In this situation, the sale of the goods amounts to non-performance of an obligation under the lease contract, unless the buyer voluntarily takes on the obligations of lessor, perhaps as a result of an agreement between buyer and seller. A possible claim by the lessee against a buyer in bad faith is regulated by the rules in Book VI.

Protection against the lessor's general creditors. The rule in the present Article also applies where ownership is transferred to a new owner as a result of the lessor's general creditors satisfying their claims, through bankruptcy proceedings or individually. Protection against the lessor's general creditors can be justified in a situation where the lessee has possession of the goods. Rules of national bankruptcy law have priority over the present rules, however, and may lead to other results. In particular this is the case when it comes to rules on avoidance in bankruptcy.

C. The lessee has possession of the goods

New owner as lessor. If the lessee has possession of the goods at the time ownership passes the new owner is substituted as a party to the relationship under the lease contract, see the first sentence of the first paragraph of the present Article. This means that the lessee has rights and remedies against the new owner to the same extent as against the former owner, including enforcement of specific performance. The new owner, as a result of the substitution as party to the contractual relationship, has the rights under the contract for lease and can collect the rent. It must be decided according to the rules in Book VIII (Acquisition and Loss of Ownership in Movables) at what time ownership passes. The rules in that Book also define the prerequisites of the lessee's possession. The present Article applies where the new owner's right is derived from the former owner's right ("ownership passes from the lessor to a new owner") and thus not where the new owner has acquired rights in good faith under a transaction with a possessor not being the owner.

> X leases to Y five containers for industrial waste for a period of one year and the containers are brought to Y's premises at the start of the lease period and remain there. After six months, X sells the containers to Z without informing Z of the lease contract. Z is substituted as a party to the contractual relationship under the contract for lease and must tolerate that Y uses the containers for the rest of the lease period. Z must also repair one of the containers, which is damaged after eight months, as this falls under the lessor's obligations under the lease contract. On the other hand, Z can claim payment of rent directly from Y.

Former owner's liability. The former owner remains subsidiarily liable for non-performance of the obligations under the contract for lease as a personal security provider, cf. the second sentence of the first paragraph of the present Article. The former owner may be discharged only with the lessee's assent, cf. III.–5:302 (Transfer of contractual position). Several of the lessor's obligations under a contract for lease cannot be performed by a person not being the owner of the goods or not having at least the owner's consent. Under these circumstances, the best practicable solution is to make the former owner subsidiarily liable as a personal security provider. For the purposes of Book IV.G.(Personal Security), the former owner becomes a provider of a dependent personal security, i.e. the former owner's obligation secures the new owner's obligations owed to the lessee. Before demanding performance from the former owner, the lessee must have made appropriate attempts to obtain performance from the new owner, IV.G.–2:106 (Subsidiary liability of security provider) paragraph (2). In practice, the only performance possible for the former owner is payment of money, either as performance of a claim for money or as damages for non-performance of a non-monetary claim.

The facts are the same as in Illustration 1. Due to Z's weak financial situation, the damaged container is not repaired, and Y has to lease an extra container elsewhere. Y's claim for damages from Z receives no answer. Y can claim damages from X.

Reversal of the passing of ownership. The passing of ownership may be reversed, and then the parties are put back in their original position, see the second paragraph of the present Article. It follows from the rule in paragraph (1) that the former owner has the position of a lessor when ownership passes back. The point of the second paragraph, however, is to clarify that the new owner (who is now no longer an owner) is discharged. The rule will typically apply when the contractual relationship under the sales contract is terminated, perhaps for the very reason that the lease contract was an unexpected burden on the buyer, implying a substantial non-performance of the seller's obligations. The right to terminate could lose much of its effect if the buyer were held liable to the lessee even after termination. The rule also applies where the seller agrees to termination of the contractual relationship, irrespective of the buyer's right to terminate. The term 'reversal' is chosen in order to indicate that there must be a close connection, as to both time and motivation, between the first and the second change in ownership. If the new owner, after some time, re-sells the goods to the former owner there is no reason why the main rule in the first paragraph should not apply. A qualification is made concerning performance already rendered at the time of reversal. It would in many cases be too complicated to put the parties back into their original positions regarding such performance. Obliging the lessee to compensate for or return performance rendered by the new owner during the period of change of ownership up until reversal, leaving the lessee with recourse to the original lessor, would further entail an unacceptable risk on the side of the lessee.

The facts are the same as in Illustration 1, except that after two weeks the new owner Z terminates the contractual relationship under the sales contract for fundamental non-performance, on learning of the lease between X and Y. Z has no liability under the lease contract and Y has no claim against Z even if it later turns out that X is unable to perform the obligation to repair the damaged container.

D. The lessee does not have possession of the goods

Possible claims against the new owner. The rule under paragraph (1) of the present Article applies only when the lessee has possession of the goods at the time ownership passes. If the lessee does not have such possession no claim against the new owner can be based on this provision. However, there may be a stipulation in the sales contract in favour of the lessee as a third party to the effect that the lessee has the same rights and claims against the new owner as the lessee has under the contract for lease with the former owner. A seller of goods will often be interested in including a stipulation like this in the sales contract in order to avoid non-performance of obligations under the lease contract. A possible claim under the rules on non-contractual liability against a new owner in bad faith depends on the provisions in Book VI (Non-contractual Liability arising out of Damage caused to Another). Where ownership of the goods is transferred before the lessee has possession of the goods and the new owner does not agree to be bound by the lease contract, this will normally amount to non-performance of an obligation under the lease contract, and the lessee may pursue the ordinary remedies for non-performance against the lessor, i.e. the former owner.

X leases to Y five containers for industrial waste for a period of one year. Before the containers are made available to Y, X sells the containers to Z. The containers are brought to Z's premises. Z is not substituted as a party to the lease contract. Y can terminate the contractual relationship with X under the lease contract for fundamental non-performance and may also claim damages from X.

E. Registration of rights

Priority of rules on registration. For some categories of goods, typically aircraft and ships, there are registers of rights in the goods. Registration may have effect with regard to good faith acquisition of rights, protection of rights, and priority between conflicting rights. Such rules have priority over the rules of the present Article. This follows directly from the rules concerned, and it has not been found necessary to state this explicitly in the present Article.

F. Lessor is not owner

The rules apply accordingly. This Part of Book IV applies also where the lessor is not the owner of the goods but has some other right to enter into a lease contract, cf. Comment J to IV.B.–1:101 (Lease of goods). The lessor may for example be the holder of a usufruct right. The rules in the present Article apply accordingly if the lessor's right in the goods is transferred to someone else. The rules also apply if a lessor has subleased the goods and then transfers the original lease contract. This follows from the third paragraph of the present Article.

NOTES

I. Protection of lessee's right

1. In most jurisdictions, an important distinction is made between proprietary rights in goods and non-proprietary (obligatory) rights. This distinction relates among other things to the position of the holder of the right in goods when ownership of the goods passes, as a result for example of a sale of the goods or of the owner's general creditors satisfying their rights. See for these issues in general, the Introduction to Book VIII (Acquisition and Loss of Ownership in Movables) and notes to the relevant Articles there. Traditionally, the lessee's right has been regarded as a non-proprietary right, implying in principle that the lessee has only a claim against the lessor for performance, not a right that must be respected by a new owner. The rules are, however, complex, and the lessee is in many cases protected at least to a certain extent against a new owner. This is the case first of all for leases of immovable property, but also to some extent for leases of goods.
2. The situation may be that the new owner of the goods must tolerate the lessee's possession of the goods for the rest of the lease period or until the new owner terminates the lessee's right by notification. This means that the new owner has a "negative" obligation not to interfere with the lessee's use of the goods. Whether or not the new owner – without agreement to this effect – must perform also the contractual obligations of maintenance etc. ("positive" obligations) is in principle a different question. If the new owner – without agreement – is bound by the lease contract, and thus has both negative and positive obligations, this may be characterised as a rule on transfer by operation of law of the entire contractual position. Such a rule may be combined with a right of extraordinary termination of the contractual relationship for the new owner.

3. Special rules apply to goods which must or may be registered, in particular ships and aircraft. The effect of registration regularly relates to the protection of registered rights against colliding interests in the goods. These rules will not be dealt with here.

II. Ex lege transfer of the relationship under the lease contract

4. For AUSTRIAN law, it is held that CC § 1120 implies an ex lege transfer of the relationship under the lease contract if the lessee has possession of the goods when ownership is transferred (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V[3], § 1120, no. 13; Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I[3], § 1120, no. 1). The original lessor remains bound as a co-debtor (Schwimann, loc. cit. § 1120 no. 14). In principle, the new owner may terminate the lease by normal notice (Schwimann, loc. cit. § 1120 no. 41; Rummel (-Würth), loc. cit. § 1120 no. 5), but with reference to CC § 1401(1) it is argued that for movables the original lease period is upheld (Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III[2], no. 8/79). In DANISH and NORWEGIAN law, it is held that the lessee's right is protected against a new owner (and the owner's general creditors) at least in cases where the lessee has taken control of the goods (Gade, Finansiel leasing, 387–388; Falkanger and Falkanger, Tingsrett[6], 622; Lilleholt, Godtruerverv[3], 201). It is not quite clear to what extent the new owner is bound by the "positive" contractual obligations (Falkanger, Leie av skib, 596–604; Krag Jespersen, FS Brækhus; Gade, Finansiel leasing, 389–390). In DUTCH law, the transfer of ownership includes ex lege the transfer of the contractual position under the lease contract to the new owner, with the exception of clauses that do not concern the use of the goods against the agreed rent (agreements of a strictly personal kind). According to the HUNGARIAN CC § 432(2), the buyer (the new owner) of the leased object is not entitled to terminate a lease for a definite period before the expiry of the period, except in the case of a misrepresentation by the lessee regarding the length or any other essential term of the lease. The new owner is bound by the lease contract for a definite period. The principle that a sale does not break a lease is found in the draft of the new Civil Code as well (§ 5:322(2) and (3)), and the draft introduces a new rule under which the former owner remains liable as a solidary surety provider. In ITALIAN law, a new owner has to "respect" the lease, but only as a lease for an indefinite period, if the lessee has control of the goods, CC art. 1600 (cf. Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve[8], art. 1600, no. I1). MALTESE CC art. 1574 states that a new owner cannot "dissolve" the lease unless such a right was reserved in the lease contract. In POLISH law, a new owner becomes a new lessor (CC art. 678). The new owner may always terminate the lease by giving notice unless the contract for lease is in writing and with an authenticated date, and, in addition, the goods have been made available to the lessee. According to the PORTUGUESE CC art. 1057 an acquirer of the lessor's rights succeeds the lessor in rights and obligations under the lease (Romano Martinez, Direito das obrigações III[4], 205; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 400–401). According to the CZECH CC § 680(2) and (3) and SLOVAK CC § 680(2) and (3), the contractual position is transferred to the new owner, but the new owner (as well as the lessee) may terminate the lease with a normal period of notice (but see CZECH Supreme Court 26 Cdo 866/2002 – "an obligation of the former lessor which goes beyond the framework of the lease relationship, as e.g. the obligation to tolerate the change of the substance of the leased goods, does not pass to the new owner"). The rule under SLOVENIAN LOA §§ 610, 612 and 613 seems to be that a new owner is bound by the contract for lease if the lessee has possession or the new owner knows of the lease (the former owner remains solidarily liable to the lessee), but the new owner may terminate the lease by giving notice. In SPANISH law, a new owner may terminate the lease, cf. CC art. 1571, but it does not end automatically as a result of a sale (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Lucas Fernandez), Código Civil II, 1139). In residential leases, the lessee keeps the rights under the lease contract against the new owner, at least for a period of five years (Urban Leases Act arts. 13 and 14), and beyond this time, where the lease is registered in the land register. Although the general law (but not the Urban Leases Act arts. 8 and 14) is silent as to this issue, the transfer of property amounts to an automatic assignment of the contractual rights, and the original lessor does not remain bound as surety. However, it still remains dubious whether this subrogation becomes also compulsory for the lessee, who accordingly is not entitled to terminate the lease (see Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Lucas Fernandez), Código Civil II, 1139-1140). According to the SWISS LOA § 261, the lease is transferred to a new owner nach Abschluss des Mietvertrags, but the new owner may terminate the lease by giving notice. It has been held that Abschluss des Mietvertrags refers to delivery (BSK (-R.Weber), OR I[3], § 261, no. 2).

III. Protection of lessee's possession only

5. In GERMAN law, the lessee's possession is protected under CC § 986(2), but for goods there is no ex lege transfer of contractual obligations (different for lease of immovable property, CC § 566), cf. MünchKomm (-Schilling), BGB[4], § 566 nos. 2 and 3; Gitter, Gebrauchsüberlassungsverträge, para. 3 B VI 3, 48. In GREEK law, the new owner is not subrogated as lessor into the lease contract, which still binds the original parties. The lessee is protected against the new owner as a possessor (CC arts. 1095, 463) and retains the rights provided by CC art. 583 with regard to legal defects as against the lessor (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I[2], § 51 Γ; different for lease of immovable property, see CC arts. 614–615: subrogation of the new owner when the contract bears an authenticated date and it has not been agreed otherwise therein; right to terminate if it is so agreed or if the contract does not bear an authenticated date). In ENGLAND, in cases, at least, where the lessee has taken possession of the leased goods, the lessee may be protected against eviction from the goods by a purchaser or other alienee of the lessor, where that alienee knew of the pre-existing hire and its terms (Birks, English Private Law II, § 13.61 with reference to Port Line Ltd v. Ben Line Steamers Ltd. [1958] 2 QB 146, 151 per Diplock J). However, the existence of a lessee's proprietary right is still highly debatable.

IV. No protection against new owner

6. It is held that the FRENCH CC art. 1743 (purchaser may not evict the lessee who has an authentic lease or one whose date is indisputable) is applicable only to immovable property, and that a lessee of goods is not protected (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, nos. 21206 and 21800; Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 599). The rule has been criticised (see Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21800 for references). For corresponding rules in BELGIAN law, see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le louage de chose I², nos. 1224 ff. In SWEDISH law, the lessee's right is not, in principle, protected as a proprietary right. It may be, however, that the lessee's right is protected against a new owner with knowledge of the lease, and protection of the lessee has been advocated for financial leases (Håstad, Sakrätt[6], 426–427; cf. SOU 1994: 120, 440–442; see further Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 208–210). The same classical rules of eviction exist in the SPANISH CC for leases subject to neither the Urban Leases Act nor the Rural Leases Act (CC art. 1571); knowledge of the existence of the lease does not affect the right to eviction of the new acquirer; but registration of the leases in the land register does. In SCOTTISH law the general principle is that contracts do not run with moveables: the purchaser of an article acquires no title to sue on contracts which the seller may have made in relation to that article, and is not bound by them (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], para. 8.13). While the lessee could not be dispossessed without consent or a court order, the personal right under the lease contract is against the seller only and is not good against the purchaser or the seller's creditors (Reid, The Law of Property in Scotland, para. 5(5)).

IV.B.–7:102: Assignment of lessee's rights to performance

The lessee's rights to performance of the lessor's obligations under the contract for lease cannot be assigned without the lessor's consent.

COMMENTS

Lessee's rights not assignable

Exception from the general principle. According to III.–5:105 (Assignability: general rule), all rights to performance are assignable except where otherwise provided by law. The rule in the present Article is an exception to the general principle, as the lessee's rights to performance of obligations under the contract for lease cannot be assigned without the lessor's consent. There are two different reasons for this exception, both of them related to the lessee's obligation of care, maintenance etc. Firstly, the lessor may rely on the lessee's personal qualifications in many lease contracts. The lessor may have interests in the goods beyond the mere economic value and hence does not want to see the goods left in the hands of persons who do not have the professional or personal ability to handle the goods appropriately. There may also be situations where the lessor remains liable as an owner towards third parties for damage caused by the goods. This makes the interest in having control over who is using the goods even more acute. Secondly, several of the obligations regarding care, maintenance etc. can only be performed by a person having physical control of the goods. An assignment of the lessee's rights under the contract without a corresponding substitution of the assignee as a debtor could therefore imply a problematic division of the contractual position as lessee. A general rule allowing for the substitution of a third party as lessee without the lessor's consent is not acceptable. One alternative could be to differentiate the rule and accept assignment in contracts for lease where the lessor's interests are predominantly of an economic character, but such a rule would be more complicated. It is thought better to leave it to the parties to include a right of assignment in their contract where this right is required by the lessee and is acceptable to the lessor. An agreed right to assignment can be fine-tuned, including for example a requirement that the lessor's consent must not be withheld without good reason.

NOTES

I. Right to assignment without consent

1 In AUSTRIAN law, assignment of the lessee's right is in principle possible without the lessor's consent, as the right of use is not regarded as personal. It is, however, debated what effects an assignment has against the lessor (obligations owed directly to new lessee or not), see Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1094, no. 26; Apathy and Riedler, Bürgerliches Recht III², no. 8/45; Koziol (-Iro), ABGB, § 1098, no. 9; Rummel (-Würth), ABGB I³, § 1098, no. 15. FRENCH CC art. 1717 allows assignment of the lessee's rights; it is recommended that the former lessee is regarded as discharged of the obligations if the lessor accepts payment from the new lessee (Huet, Contrats spéciaux, nos. 21803 and 21207; Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, nos. 488 ff); for the same results for BELGIAN law, see La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², no. 1221. Assignment without consent is accepted also in GREEK CC art. 593 combined with arts. 455 ff (see Dacoronia, Sublease of a thing, 26–28); MALTESE CC art. 1614.

II. Assignment requires lessor's consent

2. For CZECH law, it is held that the right to sublease the goods (CC § 666(1)) is a special rule, and that assignment is allowed only with the lessor's consent (see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil, OZ[10], 937). Under DANISH law, the lessee's rights are not assignable without the lessor's consent, see Gade, Finansiel leasing, 219–220. The same is true for DUTCH law (CC arts. 7:270 and 7:307 a contrario). According to the ESTONIAN LOA § 290, the lessee's transfer of the "rights and obligations" under the contract for lease requires the lessor's consent (rules also on period of solidary liability of former and new lessee). GERMAN CC § 540 states that the use of the leased object cannot be transferred to others without the lessor's consent, and it is held that this rule applies to assignment of the lessee's rights under the contract as well; the lessee has a right to extraordinary termination if consent is withheld without important reason (Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 540, nos. 22 ff). Consent is required in HUNGARIAN law, CC § 426(1); ITALIAN law, CC art. 1594(1); LATVIAN law, CC art. 2115; LITHUANIAN law, CC art. 6.491; NORWEGIAN law, Falkanger, Leie av skib, 215; PORTUGUESE CC art. 1038(f); SWEDISH law, Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 198–200 (with possible right of extraordinary termination by the lessee if consent is withheld); and SWISS law, Guhl (-Koller), OR[9], § 44, no. 83. Under ENGLISH and N. IRISH law, a distinction is drawn between the assignment of contractual rights and the assignment of contractual liabilities. In theory, assignment of the contractual rights under a lease is possible. In practice, however, the right to assign the benefits of the contract will generally be excluded. Where consent of the lessor and the assignee is obtained, both contractual benefits and liabilities may be transferred. This process is known as 'novation'. Novation involves the creation of a new contract where an existing party (the lessee) is replaced by a new party (the assignee). Consent may be expressed or inferred by conduct, but must be clearly established on the evidence. (See summary of novation in The Tychy (No 2) [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep 10, at 24, per David Steel J). The statutory assignment of contractual rights alone is possible under the Law of Property Act 1925 s. 136(1). Assignment of the contractual rights to possess and use leased goods must be made in writing, with express notice (in writing) given to the lessor. Under SCOTTISH law, the lessee may not assign the benefit of a contract for lease unless contractually permitted to do so (Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law III[3], 400, with reference to Lamonby v. Foulds 1928 SC 89, 95).

3. In SPAIN the legal situation is as follows. Ordinary leases are not assignable by the lessee, because nobody may subrogate a third party into its duties; a separate assignment of the right to use or of the right to have the thing repaired has no economic sense. Urban residential leases cannot be assigned to a third party without the lessor's consent (Urban Leases Act art. 8); but commercial leases are assignable (Urban Leases Act art. 32) and the lessor, who is deprived of the right to oppose the assignment, gets as compensation the right to increase the rent by up to 10%.

IV.B.–7:103: Sublease

(1) The lessee may not sublease the goods without the lessor's consent.

(2) If consent to a sublease is withheld without good reason, the lessee may terminate the lease by giving a reasonable period of notice.

(3) In the case of a sublease, the lessee remains liable for the performance of the lessee's obligations under the contract for lease.

COMMENTS

A. Right of use and the lessee's personal qualities

General. The importance of the lessee's personal qualities varies considerably from contract to contract. The lessee is liable as a party to the contract even if other persons use the goods. In some cases, however, the lessor's interest is not merely a matter of economic rights against the lessee (see also Comment A to the preceding Article). The lessor may for example fear damage to unique goods or wish to avoid time-consuming repair work or conflict with the lessee as a result of careless or unqualified use. An owner leasing a precious heirloom to a relative to wear at a wedding is unlikely to accept that the lessee hand the object over to some other person, unknown to the owner. On the other hand, a business enterprise leasing bicycles to tourists will as a rule not put much weight on the lessee's personal qualities. The parties may agree on who may use the goods or the qualifications required to make use of the goods, e.g. that a car must not be driven by a person without a driver's licence. It may also follow from the circumstances that the lessee will not use the goods personally, e.g. where a machine is leased by a large business enterprise. Normally, the situation will be that the goods are used under the lessee's control, whether it is by the lessee personally or the lessee's family members, employees etc. It is not considered necessary to express this in a separate provision.

B. Sublease

Sublease only with consent. If the lessee enters into a contract with a third party making the goods – partly or wholly – available for this party's use against remuneration, it is a sublease. The lessee should not be allowed to sublease the goods without the lessor's consent, unless agreed otherwise at the time of conclusion of the contract or at a later date. The sublease typically implies that the goods will no longer be under the lessee's control, as the sub-lessee is independent in relation to the lessee. The lessor may have objections to such a lack of control over and supervision of the use of the goods, notwithstanding the fact that the lessee remains liable as a party to the original lease contract. Further, the lessor may see the sublease as not conforming with the purpose of the lease contract: the lessee was given a right to use the goods; now the lessee benefits not from the use, but from the income raised by the sublease transaction. In some cases a sublease may even be in competition with the lessor's own lease business.

Withholding of consent and extraordinary right of termination. The lessee can have a legitimate interest in subleasing the goods, for example where the contract for lease is made for a long period and the lessee can no longer use the goods due to changed circumstances. Subleasing may be the only way to benefit from the goods – goods for which the lessee must still pay rent. At the outset the consequences of such a development must be borne by the lessee. However, if the lessor has no good reason to withhold consent to a sublease, the balancing of the parties' interests should lead to an extraordinary right for the lessee to terminate the relationship with the lessor under the lease contract. This is the rule stated in the second paragraph of the present Article. The lessee may terminate the relationship by giving reasonable notice, thus being freed from the obligations under the contract for the remaining period. The lessor has no claim for damages for early termination. On the other hand, the lessee's termination is not a remedy for non-performance. The lessor is under no obligation to consent to a sublease, with or without good reason. Some typical objections to a sublease are mentioned under Comment B, justifying the general requirement of consent. If, in a particular case, such objections are not relevant or are of only limited importance, it may be that there is not sufficiently good reason to withhold consent to a sublease under this rule. The relative weight of the inconveniences to the lessor compared to the benefits to the lessee of a sublease should also be taken into account.

C. Sublease, assignment of rights and transfer of the contractual position

Sublease distinguished from assignment and transfer. A sublease does not bring new parties into the contractual relationship between lessor and lessee. Obligations and rights under the contract for lease still lie between lessor and lessee. The situation is different where the lessee wants to assign the rights under the contract or wishes to transfer the entire contractual position, obligations and rights included, to another person. These questions are dealt with in IV.B.–7:102 (Assignment of lessee's rights to performance).

Lessor remains liable in case of sublease. For pedagogical reasons, it is stated in the third paragraph of the present Article that the lessee, in the case of a sublease, remains liable for performance of the lessee's obligations under the lease contract.

NOTES

I. Right to sublease without lessor's consent

1. In AUSTRIAN law, the main rule is that the lessee may sublease the goods without the lessor's consent, cf. CC § 1098; Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB V³, § 1098, no. 82. To the same effect, see CZECH CC § 666(1), cf. opposite rule for leases of a means of transportation, Ccom art. 632(2); FRENCH (and BELGIAN) CC art. 1717; GREEK CC art. 593 (the lessee is entitled to sublease, unless otherwise stipulated in the individual contract); MALTESE CC art. 1614(1), POLISH CC art. 668(1) (the lessee may sublease all or some of the goods leased or enable a third party to use them on the basis of a gratuitous contract, unless the lease agreement directly forbids a sublease); SLOVAK CC § 666; SLOVENIAN LOA § 605; SPANISH CC art. 1550, provided that subleasing is not prohibited by the contract (the contrary in residential leases, Urban Leases Act art. 8). In SWISS law, consent is required, but consent may nonetheless be withheld for certain reasons, LOA art. 262; BSK (-R.Weber), OR I³, § 262, no. 1. A similar rule is found in ESTONIAN LOA § 288 (see also the rule in § 288(4) on increased rent as a condition for consent) and LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.490. According to the DUTCH CC art. 7:221, the lessee is entitled to sublease the goods unless the lessee "has reasons to suppose that the lessor would have reasonable objections to the other party having use of the goods".

II. Consent required for sublease

2. In several countries, the lessee cannot sublease without the lessor's consent: for DANISH law, Gade, Finansiel leasing, 219–220; ESTONIAN LOA § 288(1); GERMAN CC § 540 (Emmerich and Sonnenschein (-Emmerich), Hk-Miete[8], § 540, no. 1); HUNGARIAN CC § 426(1); ITALIAN CC art. 1594(2); NORWAY, see Falkanger, Leie av skib, 215; SWEDEN, see Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], 199. In ENGLAND, the lessee may not sublease the goods without the actual or "ostensible" consent (The Pioneer Container [1994] 2 AC 324, PC) of the lessor. Authority to sublease may be inferred from the parties' knowledge of ordinary commercial practices (see Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-026). Where the lessee subleases without such consent, the lessor may have an action in tort for conversion both against the third party and the lessee. If the goods are lost or damaged as a result of the sublease, the lessor may have an action in tort for negligence against the third party. In SCOTLAND, the lessee may not sublease the goods unless contractually permitted to do so (Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law III[3], 400, with reference to Lamonby v. Foulds 1928 SC 89, 95).

III. Right to extraordinary termination if consent is withheld

3. Several jurisdictions have rules according to which the lessee is given a right to extraordinary termination of the lease if the lessor's consent to sublease is withheld without sufficiently good reason: ESTONIAN LOA § 288; GERMAN CC § 540; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.490(2).

IV. Lessee remains liable

4. It seems to be generally accepted that the lessee remains liable for the performance of the obligations under the contract, see for example for BELGIAN law, La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², no. 258; for CZECH law, Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Jehlička), OZ10, § 1183; for FRENCH law, Rép.Dr.Civ. (-Groslière), v° Bail, no. 528, Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21136; ITALIAN CC art. 1595(1); for SLOVAK law, Svoboda (-Górász), Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, art. 666; SPANISH CC art. 1550 (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II9, 340). The lessee's liability for the sublessee's use is sometimes mentioned explicitly, see for example ESTONIAN LOA § 288(5); HUNGARIAN CC § 426(2) (see also § 426(3) on granting of use to other persons without lessor's consent); GERMAN CC § 540(2); GREEK CC art. 593; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.490(6); POLISH CC art. 668; SLOVENIAN LOA § 605(2); SWISS LOA art. 262(3). In POLISH CC art. 668(2) it is also stated explicitly that a sublease (or similar relationship) expires at the termination of the lease.

V. Direct action

5. In some countries, it is accepted that the lessor has rights directly against the sub-lessee, for payment of rent or for other performances. These rules will not be dealt with here, but see as an example FRENCH CC art. 1753 (applicable to leases of immovable property) and for case law and discussion, Huet, Contrats spéciaux, no. 21136, 625, Groslière, loc. cit. nos. 531 and 532; cf. different results for BELGIAN law, La Haye and Vankerckhove, Le Louage de Choses I², nos. 278 ff. See also GREEK CC art. 599(2) (right of the lessor to claim return of the leased object from the sub-lessee at the end of the lease period), as well as LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.490(7) on the right of the sublessee to submit claims on behalf of the lessee. See also note I2 to IV.B.–5:109 (Obligation to return the goods) on the lessor's right to claim return of the goods from the lessee. In ENGLAND, where the lessor has given actual or ostensible consent to a sublease, a direct lease relationship will arise between the lessor and the sub-lessee, provided the sub-lessee received the goods knowing another "is interested in the goods" (The Pioneer Container [1994] 2 AC 324, at 336–338, 340–342). Thus, "all the terms agreed between the [lessee] and the [sub-lessee], in so far as these are applicable to the relationship of the [lessor] and the [sub-lessee], apply as between the [lessor] and the [sub-lessee]" (Sandeman Coprimar SA v. Transitos y Transportes Integrales SL [2003] EWCA Civ 113, at [62]; see further Palmer, Bailment[2], 1329). In SPAIN, the sublessee is bound by the terms of the main contract as to the scope and limits of permitted use; furthermore, the main lessor has the right to proceed directly against the sublessee for the payment of the rent, where the sublessor is in default (CC arts. 1551, 1552).

PART C. SERVICES

CHAPTER 1: GENERAL PROVISIONS

IV.C.–1:101: Scope

(1) This Part of Book IV applies:

(a) to contracts under which one party, the service provider, undertakes to supply a service to the other party, the client, in exchange for a price; and

(b) with appropriate adaptations, to contracts under which the service provider undertakes to supply a service to the client otherwise than in exchange for a price.

(2) It applies in particular to contracts for construction, processing, storage, design, information or advice, and treatment.

COMMENTS

A. Scope

A contract for services is defined in Annex 1 as "a contract under which one party, the service provider, undertakes to supply a service to the other party, the client". However, the main application of this part of Book IV is to contracts imposing an obligation on a party to supply a service in exchange for remuneration (paragraph (1)(a). It applies only "with appropriate adaptations" to gratuitous contracts for services (paragraph (1)(a). A later Article (IV.C.–2:101 (Price)) provides that if a business supplies a service it is entitled to a price. However, this is just a default rule: the parties can contract out of it and agree that the service is to be provided gratuitously.

An obligation to supply a service is imposed if a party (the service provider) is bound to perform work undertaken according to the specific needs and instructions of another party (the client). The work will require in any event the supply of labour and may also involve the input of materials and components. The outcome of a service can be, but need not be, a tangible immovable structure, a corporeal movable or an incorporeal thing. Services falling within the scope of application of this Part are, for instance, provided by architects, banks, building and civil engineering contractors, carpenters, consultants, doctors, dry cleaners, estate agents, fashion designers, gardeners, garages, information technology providers, interior decorators, lawyers, plumbers, researchers, storers, trainers and many others.

Paragraph (2) lists the types of service contracts which are covered more specifically in later Chapters of this Part. The general rules on service contracts are applicable to such contracts, but some of these rules are particularised or modified in the specific Chapters.

B. Generality

A significant feature of the present Part, compared to many national laws, is its generality. It does not draw distinctions at the primary level of classification between storage contracts and other service contracts, or between contracts for the provision of intellectual services or material services. It does, however, expressly exclude certain types of contract. See the following Article.

C. Relation to Parts I to III

This Part deals with service contracts and the rights and obligations arising out of them. The rules of Parts I to III apply generally to contracts and the rights and obligations arising out of them. These general rules apply to service contracts and do not have to be repeated in this Part. However, they may be particularised or modified by the rules in the present Part, having regard to the particular context of the supply of a service.

D. Default rules

The application of the principle of party autonomy in II.–1:102 (Party autonomy) is particularly important in relation to service contracts because many such contracts are in practice governed by carefully drawn up contract terms – very often based on standard terms developed for a whole industry or sector. The result is that the application of default rules may be rather infrequent in relation to certain types of service contract.

There are few exceptions in this Part to the general rule of party autonomy. Some later Articles are by their nature not susceptible to exclusion or derogation by the parties. This is the case for scope provisions and definition provisions, which exist for internal purposes. Apart from such Articles, the only provisions which are mandatory are a number of provisions in the Chapter on Treatment which are designed to protect essential interests of the patient.

1. A separate set of contract law rules applicable not only to services involving the supply or modification of an immovable structure or movable thing but also to mere intellectual services – and apart from the obvious general contract law provisions – is only to be found in ENGLAND (Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982). Although storage (bailment) contracts are considered to be a separate category of contracts, they are also subject to the general requirements of ss. 13-17 of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982; cf. s. 12(3). The services part of the 1982 Act does not apply in SCOTLAND, where the common law is based upon the Roman law concept of locatio operis faciendi; this is however to be distinguished from the contract of employment (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.23). The situation is only slightly different in FRANCE and BELGIUM where all services are generally subject to the rules on the contract for work (contrat d´entreprise or louage d´ouvrage CC arts. 1779 and 1787 ff), with the exception however of mandate (CC arts. 1984 ff) and storage (CC arts. 1915 ff) services. The concept of the contract for work is very wide: it covers any contract by which one party agrees to perform work for another party on an independent basis. It includes not only services having as their object immovable structures and movable things but also intellectual services (Cass.civ. III, 28 February 1984, Bull.civ. III, no. 51). This means that the general provisions on the contract for work (CC arts. 1710, 1779 and 1787 ff) also apply to design, information, and treatment services.
2. In many systems storage services (or contracts for deposit) are dealt with separately from other services: see AUSTRIAN CC §§ 957 ff and Ccom §§ 415 ff; GERMAN CC §§ 688 ff and Ccom §§ 467 ff); GREECE CC arts. 822 ff; ITALY CC arts. 1766 ff; THE NETHERLANDS CC arts. 7:600 ff; POLAND CC arts. 835 ff and 853 ff, PORTUGAL CC arts. 1185 ff and Ccom arts. 403 ff) and SPAIN CC arts. 1758 ff. SCOTTISH law again follows Roman law in recognising contracts for deposit (Stair, The laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit').

3. As regards the qualification of services other than storage or deposit, many systems distinguish between contracts for work involving material services and pure contracts of service involving only the provision of intellectual or similar services. The systems of AUSTRIA, GERMANY, GREECE, ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS, POLAND, PORTUGAL AND SPAIN – unlike the systems of France and Belgium – distinguish in different ways material services from intellectual services. In Austria and Germany, for instance, most material and intellectual services (apart from storage services) are subject to the provisions on contracts for work (Werkvertrag) (Austrian CC §§ 1165 ff; German CC §§ 631 ff). It is debated in Austria, however, whether this qualification fits treatment services better than the qualification of pure service contracts (Dienstvertrag). This issue is not debated in Germany where treatment services are indeed qualified as pure service contracts, a qualification which can also cover information services. The situation in Austria appears to be similar to that in Greece where all services (again, with the exception of storage) are subject to the rules on contracts for work (see CC arts. 681 ff), but where some seem to prefer the rules on labour contracts (see CC arts. 648 ff) to apply to treatment contracts. A different point of view is taken in The Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and Italy where mere intellectual services and material services (other than storage services) are qualified differently. In The Netherlands the general provisions on opdracht (CC arts. 7:400 ff) are applicable to intellectual services, with additional provisions to be found in CC 7:7.5 on treatment services. On the other hand, services involving the supply or modification of an immovable structure or movable thing are covered by the provisions of CC arts. 7:750 ff (aanneming van werk). In Portugal the latter services fall within the scope of the contract of empreitada (CC arts. 1207 ff) whereas an intellectual service is considered to fall under the scope of the contract of mandato (CC arts. 1157 ff). Likewise, in Spain, CC art. 1544 distinguishes material contracts for work (contratos de obra) from mere intellectual contracts for services (contratos de servicio). A similar distinction is made in Italy, where material services (contratto d´opera or appalto) are distinguished from intellectual services (contratto d´opera intellectuale), although general provisions on material services (CC arts. 2222 ff and 1655 ff) may also be relevant for intellectual services (CC arts. 2229 ff)) SCOTTISH law sometimes distinguishes the contract of supply of work and materials from contracts purely for work or services (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.24; cf. Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 s. 11A(3)).

4. In FINLAND and SWEDEN, specific legislation exists governing consumer service contracts (Finland, see Chapter 8 of the Consumer Protection Act on certain consumer service contracts; Sweden, see Consumer Services Act). If the contract is not a consumer contract, sales law applies in Finland and Sweden by way of analogy when this is considered appropriate.

IV.C.–1:102: Exclusions

This Part does not apply to contracts in so far as they are for transport, insurance, the provision of a security or the supply of a financial product or a financial service.

COMMENTS

The contracts excluded by this Article are of great importance to practice, but there are powerful reasons for not including them. Contracts for insurance and guarantee are governed by their own sets of provisions in these model rules. Contracts for financial services and transport are of a specialised nature and are subject to, or likely to be subject to, initiatives at EU level. The words "in so far as" leave room for the rules on mixed contracts to operate (see II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts)). This means, for example, that a contract for the performance of a maintenance service on a movable and the transport of the movable would be within the scope of this Part so far as the maintenance service was concerned.

The exclusions in this Article are without prejudice to the general exclusions in Book I. One such exclusion is employment relationships. Employment contracts raise highly political issues relating to the protection of employees. They also have many specific features and particularities which would make it difficult to include them within the general rules on service contracts.

NOTES

1. Although there are no general rules for service contracts in the SPANISH law, all of the types of contract mentioned in this article are specifically regulated: the transport contract in Ccom arts. 349 ff and in the Ground Carriage Act 1987, the insurance contract in the Insurance Contract Act. Security contracts are ruled by the provisions of CC arts. 1822 ff. Supply contracts are regulated only by administrative law (Public Sector Contracts Law art. 9).

IV.C.–1:103: Priority rules

In the case of any conflict:

(a) the rules in Part IV.D. (Mandate) and Part IV.E. (Commercial agency, franchise and distributorship) prevail over the rules in this Part; and

(b) the rules in Chapters 3 to 8 of this Part prevail over the rules in Chapter 2 of this Part.

COMMENTS

This Article is intended to resolve any doubts about the relationship between different sets of provisions. The special rules for mandate contracts (which are contracts for the provision of a particular kind of service) and the rules on commercial agency, franchise and distributorship prevail over the general rules in this Part. (As between mandate and these other contracts, the rules for these other contracts prevail (see IV.E.–1:201 (Priority rules)). The general rules for all service contracts in Chapter 2 apply to the specific types of service contract covered in the subsequent Chapters (as well as to other innominate service contracts), but as the rules for those special types of contract are more specific they prevail over the general rules in Chapter 2.

CHAPTER 2: RULES APPLYING TO SERVICE CONTRACTS IN GENERAL

IV.C.–2:101: Price

Where the service provider is a business, a price is payable unless the circumstances indicate otherwise.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article imposes an obligation on the client to pay a professional service provider a price for the service the latter agrees to perform. Depending on the type of service, there are various methods of determining the price to be paid under a service contract. For some services it is customary to agree on the payment of a fixed price.

> Illustration 1
> A building constructor is commissioned by the local authorities to build an extension wing to the town hall. The parties agree that the work will be carried out for the total sum of € 800,000.

In other cases the service provider may be paid on the basis of an agreed tariff, such as an hourly rate.

> Illustration 2
> The owner of a house asks a painter to paint all ceilings, walls and doors of the house. The parties agree that the painter will be paid €12.50 per hour of work done.

> Illustration 3
> A meat trader agrees with a storer that the latter will store a shipment of Argentinean beef for the price of € 35.00 per ton per week.

Sometimes the agreement will be that no price is payable unless a result is obtained.

> Illustration 4
> A solicitor agrees with the victim of a work accident that she will try to obtain financial compensation from the victim's employer for all loss suffered as a result of the accident. The parties agree that the solicitor will be paid a percentage of the compensation obtained and that she will not be paid for the legal services rendered if no compensation is obtained.

It may happen that the parties do not state a price in the contract. The reason for this may be that – as is the case with some services – it is not possible to determine the price prior to the conclusion of the contract. The fact that the parties failed to determine a price does not mean that there is no service contract. The service provider will simply be entitled to payment of the price in accordance with the general rule in II.–9:104 (Determination of price). This provides that the price payable is the price normally charged in comparable circumstances at the time of the conclusion of the contract or, if no such price is available, a reasonable price. This will result either in a fixed price or in a price to be determined on the basis of a generally charged tariff.

Illustration 5
A doctor agrees to perform a vasectomy on a patient. The parties did not discuss the financial aspects of the operation.

In this example, the doctor may charge the patient for the operation, but will have to observe the generally applicable tariffs.

Illustration 6
An architect agrees to design a new office for a law firm. When the design is completed, the architect finds a builder who is prepared to carry out the work for € 1,500,000.

In this example, the architect may charge the law firm for the design services, even if the parties did not explicitly agree in advance on payment. Assuming that it is general practice that an architect is paid 10 per cent of the price to be paid for the construction of the designed building, the fee for the design service will be € 15,000.

B. Only unless otherwise agreed

This is only a default rule. The parties can contract out of it. A business can agree to perform a service gratuitously. However, the mere fact that no price is stated in the contract will not be sufficient for such contracting out.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. Service providers are generally entitled to payment of a price for services rendered, even if the parties to the service contract did not agree to that in express wording: AUSTRIA CC § 1152, ENGLAND Supply of Goods and Services Act, 1982 s. 15(1), FINLAND ConsProtA chap. 8 § 25, FRANCE CC art. 1710, ITALY CC art. 1655, THE NETHERLANDS CC arts. 7:750(1), 7:764, PORTUGAL CC art. 1154, SPAIN CC art. 1544. For SCOTTISH law see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.44. Occasionally, entitlement to payment of a price is subject to the requirement that the service is generally considered to be done only for remuneration: GERMANY CC §§ 632(1), 689, GREECE CC art. 682(1), or subject to the requirement that the service provider acts in the exercise of a business: The Netherlands CC arts. 7:405(1), 7:601(1)), Portugal CC arts. 1158, 1186. Express wording or some indication of an implied intention of the parties as regards the service provider's entitlement to a price is sometimes needed with respect to storage services rendered in non-commercial relations: AUSTRIA CC § 969, France CC art. 1917, Italy CC art. 1767, Spain CC art. 1760. Sometimes separate rules exist for commercial storage services, stating that the service provider is entitled to payment of a price in principle: Austria (Ccom § 420), Germany (Ccom § 467(2)), Portugal (Ccom art. 404), Spain (Ccom art. 304).

2. If the service provider is entitled to payment of a price and if the parties neither agreed on the amount of that price nor on the manner of its determination, the price is calculated either with the help of the criterion of a reasonable price: AUSTRIA CC § 1152, ENGLAND Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s. 15(1), FINLAND ConsProtA chap. 8 § 25, THE NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:752(1), or with reference to what is customary: Austria Ccom § 420, GERMANY CC § 632; Ccom § 467(2), ITALY CC art. 1657, PORTUGAL Ccom art. 404(1), SPAIN Ccom art. 304, or with reference to both criteria: Greece CC art. 682(1), The Netherlands CC arts. 7:405(2), 7:601(2), SCOTLAND McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.45. Sometimes it is relevant to ask what is customary at the place of the service provider: Austria CC § 969, or at the place where the service is to be performed: Germany BGH, BB 1969, 1413, or what is usually charged by the service provider for similar services: The Netherlands CC art. 7:752(1), Portugal CC art. 883 read with art. 1211. When determining what is a reasonable or customary price, tariffs and fees established by special regulations or by competent authorities or authorised associations are sometimes considered to be an important factor: Austria, Germany, Greece, Italy, Portugal and Scotland (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.46). If the matter cannot be resolved by the application of these criteria, it is sometimes left to the courts to determine the price: France (Cass.civ. III, 12 December 1972, Bull.civ. III, no. 674; Cass.civ. I, 4 October 1989, Bull.civ. I, no. 301), Italy CC art. 1657.

II. Entitlement to price

3. According to the AUSTRIAN CC § 1152, the service provider is entitled to payment of a price in the event that the parties did not expressly or impliedly agree on such payment. As for storage services subject to the Austrian CC § 969 states that a price may be demanded for the service only when so provided expressly or tacitly. In case of commercial storage services the storer is entitled to payment of a price on the basis of Ccom § 420.
4. Under ENGLISH law if the parties did not agree on payment of a price, the client's obligation to pay a price follows from Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s. 15(1).
5. In FRANCE, if the parties did not agree on payment of a price for a service under a contract for work, the contract is nevertheless valid and a price must be paid (CC art. 1710; Cass.civ. I, 24 November 1993, Bull.civ. I, no. 339, RD imm. 1994, 248; Cass.civ. III, 20 February 1996, Bull.civ. III, no. 9). As to deposit, this case law is considered to be applicable as well, notwithstanding the fact that CC art. 1917 states that such services are presumed to be rendered gratuitously in principle.
6. If the parties to a contract for work under GERMAN law did not explicitly or indirectly agree on the price of the service, CC § 632(1) provides that they are deemed to have agreed that a price is to be paid if the work that is to be done is considered be done only for remuneration. As to storage services, CC § 689 is to the same effect. In case of commercial storage services the storer is entitled to payment of a price on the basis of Ccom § 467(2).
7. If the parties to a contract for work under GREEK law did not agree on payment of a price, a price may nevertheless be due on the basis of CC art. 682(1). This Article states that payment is deemed to be tacitly agreed if, under usual circumstances, the service is performed solely for remuneration.
8. A price is due for services qualified as appalto under ITALIAN law, even in the event that parties did not agree on the subject matter (CC art. 1655). Pursuant to CC art. 1767 a storage service is presumed to be gratuitous, except for those cases in which from the professional quality of the storer or other circumstances, a different intention may be assumed.

9. In the Netherlands, if a service can be qualified as aanneming van werk, following CC art. 7:750(1), the client must pay a price. This is even so when the parties did not explicitly agree on a price. The same goes for services qualified as overeenkomst inzake geneeskundige behandeling (CC art. 7:764). No price is due, however, for services qualified either as opdracht (cf. TM, p. 987) or as bewaarneming (cf. TM, Parl. Gesch. InvW 7, p. 394), unless the service provider acts in the exercise of a business (see for opdracht CC art. 7:405(1) and for bewaarneming CC art. 7:601(1)).

10. Definitions of the contract of specific work under POLISH law (CC art. 627), the building contract (CC art. 647) and the storage contract (CC art. 853) indicate that these contracts are concluded against remuneration. Rules on the contract of specific work provide rather detailed regulation concerning the price (CC arts. 628–632). The price can be fixed directly, or the parties may only indicate in the contract the basis for its calculation (CC art. 628(1)). If the contract is qualified as a mandate (CC art. 735) or as a safe-keeping, the service provider is entitled to the remuneration unless it follows from the contract or from the circumstances that the service is to be provided without remuneration (CC art. 836).

11. According to the PORTUGUESE CC art. 1154, if the contract can be qualified as prestação de serviços, the service provider is entitled to payment of a price. CC art. 1155 identifies three types of prestação de serviços, two of which are subject to an additional rule as regards the service provider's entitlement to a price: in the event of services qualified either as mandato (CC art. 1158) or as depósito (CC art. 1186) the contract is presumed gratuitous, unless the service provider carries out the service as a profession in which case the contract is presumed onerous. In the event of commercial storage services, it is presumed that a price must be paid (Ccom art. 404).

12. In SCOTTISH law the entitlement to remuneration is implied at common law (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.44).

13. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1544, a price must be paid for services under a contract for work. As to deposit, the contract has a gratuitous character, unless agreed otherwise (CC art. 1760). On the contrary, Ccom art. 304 states that in the event of a commercial storage service a price is due unless agreed otherwise.

III. Determination of price

14. The price to be paid to the service provider under an AUSTRIAN contract for work must be a reasonable price according to CC § 1152. Guidelines and regulations concerning fees do exist (see Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I^2, §§ 1165, 1166, no. 108). The latter are not binding but serve as an indication as to the concept of reasonableness referred to in CC § 1152. As for storage services falling within the scope of the Austrian CC, the price must be calculated 'nach dem Stande des Aufbewahrers' (CC § 969) whereas a customary price is to be paid for commercial storage services (Ccom § 420).

15. The price to be paid by the client under a contract for the supply of a service in ENGLISH law must be reasonable both under common law (Greenmast Shipping Co. SA v. Jean Lion et Cie (The Saronikis) [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep 277) and according to the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s. 15(1). In case of storage services provided outside the scope of a contract, the service provider is entitled to expenses reasonably incurred in the keeping of the things, China Pacific SA v. Food Corp. of India (The Winson) [1982] AC 939. In The Saronikis case the typical market price was emphasised as an important element to be taken into account when calculating the reasonable price for the service.

16. As to FRENCH service contracts falling within the scope of contracts for work, if the parties have not determined the criterion on the basis of which the price is to be determined, it is left to the courts to determine the price, although the service provider must prove that the amount of the invoice is justified by the work performed (Cass.civ. III, 12 December 1972, Bull.civ. III, no. 674; Cass.civ. I, 4 October 1989, Bull.civ. I, no. 301). As to deposit, this case law is considered to be applicable as well.

17. If the service provider under a GERMAN contract for work is entitled to payment of a price, despite the fact that parties did not agree on a price, the price has to be determined primarily by taking into account official scales of charges and fees. If there are no official tariffs available, the usual price has to be paid. This is the price which would be payable at the time of conclusion of the contract for similar services at the place where the service is to be accomplished, according to the general views of the parties involved (BGH, BB 1969, 1413). In the case of storage services falling under the scope of the German CC, the price is to be determined by observing the official rate or – if there is none – the customary rate (cf. MünchKomm [-Hueffer], BGB, § 689 no. 5). Only if a customary price cannot be determined, the general provisions of CC §§ 315 and 316 apply and the storer may determine the price. For commercial storage services the remuneration in accordance with local custom is to be paid on the basis of Ccom § 467(2) together with Ccom § 354. The commercial storer may also ask for reimbursement of expenses (Ccom § 474).

18. As to the calculation of the price due under a GREEK contract for work on the basis of CC art. 682(1), it must include payment for the work done and the expenses incurred. Payment for the work done corresponds to the customary payment for similar work. This might be determined with reference either to a set of standards of payment or to a reasonable price. In addition the principles of CC arts. 371-373 and CC art. 379 apply. They state that if the determination of a performance has been entrusted to one of the contracting parties or to a third party, it is in case of doubt considered that the determination must be made by reference to equitable criteria.

19. Under ITALIAN law, if the parties to a contract qualified as appalto did not agree on payment of a price, the price to be paid is to be calculated on the basis of existing tariffs or customs. Tariffs to refer to are prices determined by special regulations or by competent authorities or authorised associations. Where such tariffs or customs are missing, the manner of determination of the price is left to the courts (CC art. 1657).

20. If the service provider is entitled to payment of a price and if the price has not been determined under DUTCH law, the following rule applies in case the service can be qualified either as opdracht or overeenkomst inzake geneeskundige behandeling (CC art. 7:405(2)) or as bewaarneming CC art. 7:601(2): the price must be calculated by the service provider according to custom; if such a customary calculated price does not exist, a reasonable price is due. As to services qualified as aanneming van werk, CC art. 7:752(1) is drafted in a slightly different way but amounts to the same effect. The main rule of the Article is that a 'reasonable' price is due if the parties did not determine the price in advance. In calculating such price, the prices the service provider usually charges at the time of conclusion of the contract, as well as the expectations raised by the service provider with regard to the price, are to be taken into account. Costs incurred by the provider for the execution of services are to be compensated if these costs are not included in the price (CC arts. 7:406(1) and 7:601(3)).

21. If the parties did not agree on the price under POLISH law, the manner of determination of the price depends on the type of the service contract, and refers either to the normal remuneration or to the work done. In the case of the contract of specific work, if the parties did not fix the price or indicate the basis for its calculation, it is deemed, in case of doubt, that they meant the ordinary remuneration for a work of that kind. If the remuneration cannot be determined in that way either, the remuneration due is to correspond to the justified input of labour and other outlays by the person accepting the order (CC art. 628(1)). In the case of the mandate contract, if there is no mandatory tariff and if the amount of remuneration has not been agreed on, the remuneration due is to correspond to the work done (CC art. 735(2)). If a contract is qualified as a safe-keeping contract, and the amount of the remuneration for the safe-keeping is not specified in the contract or in the tariff, the keeper is entitled to the remuneration usually accepted in the given relationships unless it follows from the contract or from the circumstances that the undertaking was to keep the thing safe without remuneration (CC art. 836).

22. If the service is qualified as empreitada in PORTUGUESE law (a specific type of prestação de serviços, see CC art. 1155) and if the price has not been fixed at the time of conclusion of the contract, the provision on price determination under the law of sales applies (CC art. 883 by force of CC art. 1211): if the price is not fixed by an administrative authority, the price is to be the market price usually asked by the service provider. If it is not possible to determine the price according to this criterion, the courts will decide according to equity (CA Lisboa, 25 June 1984, CJ 1984 III, 166. Cf. Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 365). As regards another type of prestação de serviços, namely depósito: if no price has been agreed, professional tariffs apply. If there are no such tariffs, the courts will adjudicate the price based on equity. If no price was agreed for commercial storage services, Ccom art. 404(1) provides that the price is to be set on the basis of local mercantile uses (cf. Pires de Lima/Antunes Vaarela, Código Civil anotado, p. 757).

23. In the absence of contractual provision, the price in SCOTTISH law is to be either quantum meruit, the customary rate or what is reasonable (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.45).

24. Under SPANISH law, the price that is due for services under contracts for work does not necessarily have to be calculated at the moment of conclusion of the contract but can be determined by the parties (or by a third party) at a later stage on the basis of the material and the labour used (see TS 31 May 1983, RJ 2952; Carrasco Perera/Cordero Lobato/González Carrasco, Derecho de la Construcción y la Vivienda[4], p. 295). According to Ccom art. 304 the price for commercial storage services is determined in accordance with the usages of the place where the storage contract was concluded.

IV.C.–2:102: Pre-contractual duties to warn

(1) The service provider is under a pre-contractual duty to warn the client if the service provider becomes aware of a risk that the service requested:

(a) may not achieve the result stated or envisaged by the client,

(b) may damage other interests of the client, or

(c) may become more expensive or take more time than reasonably expected by the client.

(2) The duty to warn in paragraph (1) does not apply if the client:

(a) already knows of the risks referred to in paragraph (1); or

(b) could reasonably be expected to know of them.

(3) If a risk referred to in paragraph (1) materialises and the service provider was in breach of the duty to warn of it, a subsequent change of the service by the service provider under IV.C.–2:109 (Unilateral variation of the service contract) which is based on the materialisation of the risk is of no effect unless the service provider proves that the client, if duly warned, would have entered into a contract anyway. This is without prejudice to any other remedies, including remedies for mistake, which the client may have.

(4) The client is under a pre-contractual duty to warn the service provider if the client becomes aware of unusual facts which are likely to cause the service to become more expensive or time-consuming than expected by the service provider or to cause any danger to the service provider or others when performing the service.

(5) If the facts referred to under paragraph (4) occur and the service provider was not duly warned, the service provider is entitled to:

(a) damages for the loss the service provider sustained as a consequence of the failure to warn; and

(b) an adjustment of the time allowed for performance of the service.

(6) For the purpose of paragraph (1), the service provider is presumed to be aware of the risks mentioned if they should be obvious from all the facts and circumstances known to the service provider, considering the information which the service provider must collect about the result stated or envisaged by the client and the circumstances in which the service is to be carried out.

(7) For the purpose of paragraph (2)(b) the client cannot reasonably be expected to know of a risk merely because the client was competent, or was advised by others who were competent, in the relevant field, unless such other person acted as the agent of the client, in which case II.–1:105 (Imputed knowledge etc.) applies.

(8) For the purpose of paragraph (4), the client is presumed to be aware of the facts mentioned if they should be obvious from all the facts and circumstances known to the client without investigation.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The primary purpose of this Article is to impose a duty to warn on the parties prior to the conclusion of the service contract. This duty relates to typical risks that may occur after the conclusion of the contract once the services process has started. Occurrence of these risks would go to the very heart of the contract. The service provider is to warn the client about the risks that are identified in paragraph (1), and the client is to warn the service provider about the risks mentioned in paragraph (4).

Illustration 1
A supplier of computer networks is requested by the management of a hospital to install a tailor-made network on the basis of a design made on behalf of the hospital. If the supplier were to follow the design exactly, the computer network would not serve the intended purposes.

This is an example of a risk against which the service provider may have to warn, subject to the test of paragraph (6), which is explained below.

Illustration 2
A civil engineering constructor offers to excavate a piece of land and to remove the excavated soil to a nearby depot by truck. The constructor offers to perform the service for a fixed price within a fixed period of time. The offer is based on the constructor's assumption that the subsoil of the land is sufficiently condensed to support the constructor's large and heavy excavators without additional measures. This assumption is made known to the client. Geo-technical data on neighbouring land seem to confirm the constructor's point of view, but the client has specific knowledge of the fact that the subsoil of his land contains large pockets of soft and unstable clay. Extra measures are required to support the excavators, which will slow down the service and will make the service more costly.

This is an example of a risk which may give rise to a duty on the client to warn, subject to the test of paragraph (7), which is explained below.

These mutual duties to warn have in common that the parties only have to warn each other if the risks are obvious to the party subject to the duty, or if they are actually discovered by that party. This principle is reflected in paragraph (1) in conjunction with paragraph (6) as regards the service provider's duty to warn and in paragraph (4) in conjunction with paragraph (7) as regards the client's duty to warn.

An additional requirement that needs to be fulfilled under paragraph (4) in order to impose on the client a duty to warn, relates to the unusual character of the risk. This additional requirement is to prevent the client from being under a duty to warn if the risk mentioned in paragraph (4) is considered to be obvious to the service provider as well. This can be illustrated by using a modification of Illustration 2 above:

A civil engineering constructor offers to excavate a piece of land and to remove the excavated soil to a nearby depot by truck. The constructor offers to perform the service for a fixed price within a fixed period of time. The offer is based on the constructor's assumption that the trucks will be able to approach and leave the land via a shortcut through a residential area. The client knows that the local authorities will not allow heavy trucks to drive through that area, which will slow down the service and will make the service more costly.

The mirror image of this approach can be found in paragraph (2) which negates the service provider's duty to warn in the event that a risk is either known to, or obvious to, the client.

A hairdresser is asked by a customer to dye her hair. The hairdresser proposes to perform the service by using 'Inecto' hair dye. The hairdresser does not inform the customer that some customers in the past suffered from an allergic reaction to the use of 'Inecto' hair dye. The customer in question did experience such an allergic reaction some years ago, when another hairdresser treated her with 'Inecto'. However, the customer does not mention that earlier experience to the hairdresser.

The additional purpose of this Article – closely linked to its primary purpose – is to stimulate the parties to exchange important information prior to the conclusion of the contract. This information particularly relates to the wishes and needs of the client for which the service is required as well as to important circumstances in which the service is to be performed.

A specialised lift contractor is asked to supply and install four lifts in an office building under construction at a fixed price. In order to be able to make the offer, the contractor needs to study the plans of the building, showing the specifications as regards the lifts. The contractor will also need to know at what time during the building process the lifts are to be installed and what other contractors will be present on the building site at that time in order to take into account possible interferences with the job.

This information needs to become available to the extent that it enables the service provider to offer a tailor-made service to the client and to explain the most important characteristics of the service offered. This is the point where the connection with the service provider's pre-contractual duty to warn becomes relevant, for the extent of that duty depends on risks that are obvious or are discovered by the service provider given the information the service provider should have collected in order to make an informed offer to the client as regards the service that can be supplied. A modification of Illustration 1 may explain this.

A supplier of computer networks is requested by the management of a hospital to make an offer for installing a tailor-made network on the basis of a design made on behalf of the hospital. The supplier studies the design for the purpose of preparing the offer. If this investigation brings to light that the hospital will not be able to use the computer network for the intended purposes, due to a failure in the design, the supplier must warn against that risk.

The risks to be discovered also relate to risks inherent in the service that are independent of the client's needs and the circumstances surrounding the future performance of the service.

Illustration 7
A doctor is asked to perform a vasectomy on a patient. The doctor will have to warn the patient that he will not be infertile immediately after the operation. The doctor will have to do so, whether or not the patient has told the doctor that the operation is to be performed for the purpose of becoming infertile and irrespective of the question whether the patient has a steady relationship with a female partner.

Once the client has been offered the service and has been warned against the risks mentioned in paragraph (1), the client will be able to make an informed decision on the conclusion of the service contract. Moreover, having received the offer the client will be able to perform the pre-contractual duty to warn under paragraph (4). This is in fact what the client should do in the example given in Illustration 2 above. In that example, the client must share the client's special knowledge with the civil engineering contractor prior to the conclusion of the contract.

A service is usually offered to a particular client and tailor-made to satisfy the needs of that client.

> Illustration 8
> A company specialised in the development of industrial software is asked to design a computer program that will enable the client, a medical laboratory, to compare medical test results.

However, it is also possible that standard services are offered to the public in general.

> Illustration 9
> A garage offers to remove and change standard exhaust pipes at the fixed price of € 50.

The situation in Illustration 9 will probably not lead to an extensive exchange of information between the service provider and a potential client, something which will most likely happen in the situation in Illustration 8. Nevertheless, if a rather standard service is offered to a group of clients, the duties under the present Article remain imposed on the service provider. These duties will still have to be fulfilled, bearing in mind the average purposes, conditions, circumstances, characteristics, and risks that are relevant to the average client being a member of this group.

Non-performance of a pre-contractual duty to warn under paragraph (1) or (4) will sometimes lead to the aggrieved party avoiding the contract for mistake or claiming damages for loss caused by the mistake, or both. Other remedies may also be available. The rules of paragraphs (3) and (5) supplement the normal rules on remedies. They deal with the frequently occurring situation that non-disclosure of information prior to the conclusion of the service contract causes the service to become more expensive and to take more time once the information is revealed after the conclusion of the contract.

Paragraph (3) protects the client from being confronted with a claim for compensation for extra costs and extension of time if the service provider failed to fulfil the duty to warn under paragraph (1). It prevents the service provider from unilaterally varying the terms of the contract under IV.C.–2:109 (Unilateral variation of the service contract) on the basis of the materialisation of a risk of which the client should have been warned in advance. This does not apply however if the service provider proves that the client would have entered into the contract even if warned about the risk prior to the conclusion of the contract. If the service provider succeeds in proving that, the provisions of IV.C.–2:109 will apply.

Paragraph (5) allows the service provider to claim damages and extension of time if the client failed to warn under paragraph (4).

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Imposing pre-contractual duties to warn on parties to a service contract raises several issues that need to be considered.

The first issue is whether pre-contractual duties to warn are to be imposed on the parties to a service contract at all. One may argue that a duty should not be imposed on a party unless that duty was freely assumed, either impliedly or expressly, at the time of conclusion of the contract. Another argument against such duties would be that they would put too much of a burden on the parties' negotiations prior to the conclusion of the service contract. On the other hand it can be assumed that both the client and the service provider will in any event be involved in a process of information exchange whenever they negotiate the conclusion of a service contract. The client will explain what is needed and the service provider will give details about the most important characteristics of the service which can be provided. Only such an exchange of information will enable the service provider to make an offer to the client, which will allow the latter to make an informed decision on the conclusion of the service contract. In the light of the information received from the other party, each party may find out that the other party is making an erroneous assumption as to the benefits that can be derived from the contract. The imposition of a duty to warn in such situations will hardly impose extra costs. It may even be beneficial to the party issuing the warning in view of the fact that a warning may prevent future disputes, which might arise once the aggrieved party finds out that the contract was concluded under a wrong assumption. The standard economic reasoning for a pre-contractual an obligation to inform is that the costs of collecting information, its supply to the other party, as well as its digestion by that other party are less than the costs of wrong decisions (the chance of a wrong decision times the damage caused by that decision, which is the difference between what a party expected to get and what it actually obtained).

A second issue is what should trigger an obligation to warn, having regard for the information that is exchanged during the negotiations. One may be inclined to draw a parallel with the approach taken to the service provider's contractual obligation to warn. There, the analysis of arguments leads to the solution that the obligation is to be triggered by inconsistencies in the information or directions supplied by the client if it is expected that following the information or directions may lead to a risk that would go to the very heart of the contract from the client's perspective. That approach may be taken here too, both as regards the service provider's and the client's pre-contractual an obligation to warn. On the other hand, one may question whether the parallel can indeed be drawn, for the contractual obligation is to be considered not only in the framework of a contract already negotiated and concluded, but also in the perspective of a service that is either in process or already completed. It is then obvious that triggering the contractual obligation to warn is related to fundamental risks that may compromise the desired outcome of the service process. It could be argued that this is not what a pre-contractual an obligation to warn should be about and that, instead, triggering such duties should be related to the desired outcome of the process of negotiating the contract.

Assuming that pre-contractual duties to warn are to be imposed on the parties to a service contract and that it is possible to establish in which situation they are to be imposed, a third issue has to be resolved. This issue involves the question how alert the parties should be during the pre-contractual information exchange in order to be able to signal assumptions on the part of the other party that may give rise to a pre-contractual duty to warn. Here, the same questions and arguments that are raised for the contractual obligation to warn may be put forward. Do the parties need to focus on wrong assumptions of the other party? Do they have to search for such assumptions? If that were to be accepted, the process of information exchange would become very costly. These costs might even be incurred in vain, if the negotiations do not result in a contract. And even if they do result in a contract, they will have made the service more costly in any event. On the other hand, an extended pre-contractual duty to investigate one another's assumptions would prevent parties from entering into a contract that later on turns out to be less profitable than expected prior to the conclusion of the contract.

A fourth issue involves the question whether a pre-contractual duty to warn is to be imposed on a party if the other party is more competent than the average party or if it already knows of the problem to which the warning should refer. This question is particularly relevant in the context of services, where clients are frequently assisted by someone else who has – or is deemed to have – the capacity of a professional and competent adviser. The issue is also raised with respect to the contractual obligation to warn of the service provider. One argument would be that imposing a pre-contractual duty to warn in such circumstances would not only be unnecessary but also become very costly. On the other hand, it implies that one has to make a choice between an unnecessary warning and the occurrence of disappointment that is not discovered in time.

The previous issues give rise to a fifth and final issue. Parties will only be able to analyse information and give appropriate warnings on the basis of it if such information has actually been exchanged during contract negotiations. The question to be answered is, therefore, whether a pre-contractual duty to exchange information (going beyond the general pre-contractual information duties imposed in Book II, Chapter 3) is to be imposed on the parties, and what the content of that information should be. This question is closely related to the first issue raised above, questioning the need to adopt mutual pre-contractual obligations to warn. There it has been argued that pre-contractual exchange of some information is a conditio sine qua non if parties contemplate the conclusion of a service contract. This will particularly be the case if the service required is not standard. The information will relate to both the client's needs and to the solutions the service provider can offer to fulfil these needs. It is doubted whether parties will be able to contract with one another without such information. By the same token, it is doubted whether they would need more information in order to consider one another's assumptions, which may eventually result in a warning causing additional information exchange.

C. Preferred option

The present Article imposes pre-contractual duties to warn on both parties to a service contract. It is better to have such an Article and to limit carefully the extent of the duties it imposes than to have no provision at all. Furthermore, the duties are firmly embedded in the development of pre-contractual duties to inform, a development that has taken place and is still taking place in the jurisdictions investigated and in European private law. This development is already reflected in Book II, Chapter 3 and in the provisions on mistake in Book II, Chapter 7. It has, however, been considered necessary to deal with these duties in an Article in the present Part, in addition to those more general provisions. In service contracts pre-contractual information exchange is of crucial importance. Clear rules are needed, which are adapted to the particular context of the interrelationship between the information exchange prior to the contract and the performance of the service subsequent, to conclusion of that contract.

As to the question what kind of problems should trigger the parties' pre-contractual duty to warn, the Article follows the contractual counterpart of the obligation of the service provider under IV.C.–2:108 (Contractual obligation of the service provider to warn). This is based on the assumption that fundamental risks which – if they occur on conclusion of the contract – would compromise the desired outcome of the service process, are risks a party would want to know of prior to the conclusion of the contract. If that party were not to know of such risks at that time and if the risks occurred later on, the party would most likely argue that it would not have entered the contract or would have done so only on fundamentally different terms. An example of such a risk is given in Illustration 1 above.

As to the questions how alert the parties should be during the pre-contractual information exchange and whether they should be on the lookout for wrong assumptions, the Article does not expect the parties to make investigations. The duty is only to warn of what the party is aware of. There is a logical difficulty in imposing a duty to warn of something of which one is not aware. However, the service provider is presumed, under paragraph (6), to be aware of risks if they should be obvious from all the facts and circumstances known to the service provider, considering the information supplied by the client and the circumstances in which the service is to be carried out. The approach implies that the service provider will have to examine carefully the client's information, including the more general information about the client's needs, because it will be the basis of any tailor-made offer. In doing this, the service provider will have to think of risks that are inherent in the service and that are independent of either what the client's needs are or the circumstances in which the service is to be provided. Wrong assumptions of the client, which will not escape the service provider's attention on studying the information as thoroughly as is necessary to prepare the offer, have to be mentioned to the client. Any active inspection aimed at discovering wrong assumptions is therefore not required.

> An engineer is requested by a factory to make an offer for adapting a production machine following specific functional, technical, and production requirements provided by the factory. The engineer studies the requirements for the purpose of preparing his offer. Only if this investigation at the same time brings to light that, due to an inconsistency in the functional and technical requirements, the adapted production machine will not be able to meet the production requirements, must the engineer warn the factory against that risk.

As to the client's pre-contractual duty under paragraph (4), a similar approach is adopted. The client is presumed under paragraph (8) to be aware of the relevant facts if they should be obvious from all the facts and circumstances known to the client without investigation. Again, this implies that the client will have to analyse the service provider's information contained in the latter's offer carefully, given that contractual obligations will be incurred once the offer is accepted. Wrong assumptions of the service provider, which will not escape the client's attention on studying the offer as thoroughly as is necessary to make an informed decision as to the acceptance of the offer, have to be mentioned to the service provider. Again, any active inspection aimed at discovering wrong assumptions of the service provider is not required.

> A management training agency is requested by a company to make a fixed-price offer for a three-day training of the company's financial staff. The company wants an 'all-in' service, meaning that the fixed price offered not only covers training fees and additional training costs, but also catering and accommodation costs. Having received the offer of the agency, it becomes clear to the company that the agency has made a computation mistake to its own detriment.

In this example, the client has become aware that if the service provider is not told about the computation mistake, the supply of the service will become more costly for the latter. The client therefore must warn the agency.

The same approach is adopted for the purpose of establishing whether a party's competence or knowledge is such as to negate the other party's duty to warn. First, as regards the client's duty to warn, paragraph (4) states that the duty only concerns an 'unusual' risk. The word 'unusual' is used in order to negate the client's pre-contractual duty to warn in the event of foreseeable facts and circumstances, which the service provider should take into account – as stated in paragraph (1) in conjunction with paragraph (6) – on studying the client's information as thoroughly as is necessary to prepare the tailor-made offer.

A meat trader agrees with a storer that the latter will store a shipment of beef. The trader does not inform the storer that meat will perish if it is not stored in frozen condition. There is no breach of the duty to warn as this is a usual and obvious risk.

Paragraph (7) gives an additional clarification to the question whether and, if so, to what extent the client's own competence or the competence of any other person assisting the client at the pre-contractual stage can be taken into account in determining whether the client can reasonably be expected to know of a risk. The principle adopted is that the client's competence by itself is insufficient to support the prima facie conclusion that the client can reasonably be expected to know of a risk at the pre-contractual stage. The same goes when someone else advises the client: The competence of that other person does not automatically lead to the conclusion that the client can reasonably be expected to know of the risk at the pre-contractual stage. This is particularly to protect the interests of Small and Medium-sized Enterprises (SME's) and consumers that are advised – often for free – by their relatives or friends. The situation becomes different, however, if a client specifically hires a professional adviser for the specific purpose of acting as an agent during the pre-contractual stage of the service contract. Any knowledge or competence of such an agent will be imputed to the client under paragraph (7) in conjunction with II.–1:105 (Imputed knowledge etc) and may amount to knowledge or reason to know of the client, which will then negate the service provider's pre-contractual duty to warn under paragraph (2).

Finally, it is implied in paragraph (6) of the present Article that the service provider should collect information prior to the conclusion of the contract about what the client wants. As explained above (see Comments A and B), this involves information the exchange of which is already inherent in service contract practice.

The duties imposed by this article are related to the pre-contractual duty to inform under Book II, Chapter 3 and the similar duty that is implied in the provisions on mistake in Book II, Chapter 7.

D. Relation to other chapters of this part

The pre-contractual exchange of information between a service provider and client, as required under the present Article, will not always be relevant to the same extent to all types of services. Differences can be noted which are caused by the characteristics related to each type of service. An important aspect that has to be taken into account is that the client cannot always objectively expect to obtain certainty in advance as regards both the quality and the cost of the result that will be achieved through the service to be performed. The question whether or not it is possible to provide such certainty in advance depends on the ability to both identify and control all the factors capable of influencing the result of the service and its cost. In general terms these factors are: (1) the particular needs of the client, (2) the service provider's solution that fits these needs, and (3) the surrounding circumstances in which that solution is to be applied in order to meet the client's needs. Pre-contractual exchange of information regarding these aspects only becomes relevant if one or more of these aspects are neither identified nor controlled sufficiently prior to the conclusion of the contract and – in the unfortunate event they present themselves after the conclusion of the contract – if they cause a substantial increase in the costs or a decrease in quality of the outcome of the service. The most prominent example of this is probably to be found in the field of construction contracts, given the particularities of a construction process, which will be discussed below after the following illustration:

> Illustration 13
> A regional authority requests a civil engineering contractor to make an offer for the construction of a flyover on the basis of a design prepared by the authority's planning department. The flyover is to be constructed in the vicinity of a motorway junction.

First, and this is also shown in the illustration, in construction one can see a strong interrelationship between the abstract factors referred to earlier. The solution to be applied by the contractor very much depends on the client's specific needs, given the particular surrounding circumstances in which the new building or other immovable structure has to be realised. This further explains why there is no such thing as a standardised construction service. Secondly, in theory it is possible to identify and control the result of the construction process in advance, provided the client's needs and the surrounding circumstances in which the building is to be built are thoroughly mapped and checked in advance, usually by means of a design that is supplied by or on behalf of the client to the contractor. Thirdly, given the ability of the parties to control the output of this technical process, they are also able to calculate and check in advance the total costs that will be incurred. This explains why it is very common in construction contracts to agree on a fixed price for the construction service. Fourthly, parties clearly have an interest in identifying and controlling both the quality and the costs of the result of the construction process as much as possible in advance: if they refrained from doing so as regards one or more of the aspects referred to above, they run the risk of facing considerable problems after the contract has been agreed on. For instance, they might find out that the real costs of the building exceed the agreed price. Also, the quality of the outcome or the timely performance of the construction project are likely to be endangered as a result of the contractor's solution being insufficiently attuned to the client's needs given the surrounding circumstances in which the building is to be realised.

Taken together, the above particularities are the reasons why it is common in construction to map out in detail – in advance – the client's needs and the technical solution to meet these needs, attuned to the surrounding circumstances in which that solution is to be applied by the contractor. The particularities further explain why there is a clear distinction between the pre-contractual stage on the one hand and the contract stage on the other. Finally, the particularities show why pre-contractual exchange of information as required under the present Article is regarded to be most relevant. In order to be able to offer both a tailor-made solution and a fixed price for the construction of the building required by the client, the contractor needs to know in advance what the specific needs of the client and the particular surrounding circumstances are in which the construction service is to be performed.

A parallel can be drawn between the construction of a new building or other immovable structure and the situation in which a service is centred on an existing movable or incorporeal thing, which is the case in the event of a processing service or a storage service. However, as will be explained below, that parallel exists only to a certain extent. The parallel will be drawn for processing contracts, but the analysis is also applicable to storage contracts. Where appropriate, a parallel with other particular service contracts will be drawn.

As regards the processing of an existing movable or incorporeal thing, there is an interrelationship between the needs of the client, the processor's solution that fits these needs, and the surrounding circumstances in which that solution is to be applied by the processor in order to meet the client's needs. The following illustration shows this:

A craft upholsterer agrees with a client to upholster the seats of six antique armchairs belonging to the client by using a special type of fabric selected by the client.

There is, however, a crucial difference with construction, in the sense that – apart from the particularities of the thing that is to be processed – there are hardly any influential surrounding circumstances in which the processing service is to be carried out. The costs and the results of the service entirely depend on the particularities of the thing, given the client's needs. Particularly if both that thing and the client's needs are rather standard, the absence of surrounding circumstances likely to influence the outcome of the service process will make it likely that the client's needs can be satisfied by supplying a standardised processing service, as is shown in the following examples:

Illustration 15
A car owner requests a garage to replace the exhaust pipe of his car.

Illustration 16
A dry cleaner agrees to dry clean a raincoat for a client.

In such cases, the duties under the present Article will likewise be limited to an exchange of standard information. Given that the processor, in many of these situations, is probably also able to offer a fixed price immediately after the client's needs are known and that the processor is sometimes even able to do so without performing a superficial inspection of the thing to be processed, the pre-contractual exchange of information will be very similar to the one preceding the conclusion of a sales contract. This type of processing contract – and the scenario that is described for the conclusion of such contracts – also resembles contracts involving the supply of factual information under Chapter 7, an example of which is given in the following illustration:

A pension fund agrees with the online data services department of the stock exchange that it will have continuous access to electronic information as regards the actual value of shares traded at the stock exchange.

The situation will become different, however, if the processing service is no longer standard, given the particularities of the client's needs and the thing that is to be processed. Pre-contractual exchange of information will then become more relevant and will probably be necessary if the processor is to be able to offer a fixed price. This will, for instance, be the case in the following example:

Illustration 18
An engineer is requested by a factory to make an offer for changing a production machine following specific functional, technical, and production requirements provided by the factory.

The situation may be very similar in the case of design contracts, as is illustrated in Illustration 8.

There is also another gradual difference between the construction of a new building or other immovable structure and the processing of an existing movable or incorporeal thing (this is, for instance, also where the parallel between processing contracts and storage contracts ends), for it will not always be possible to identify and control in advance the aspects that will influence the result of a processing service – either standard or tailor-made – due to which pre-contractual exchange of information regarding these aspects will become less useful. This will particularly be the case if pre-contractual exchange of information is not essential for calculating a fixed price that is to be paid for the processing service. In this situation, however, there will still be a clear distinction between the pre-contractual and the contractual stage of the processing service.

Illustration 19
The owner of a seventeenth century painting, which has been exposed to smoke and other damaging conditions for centuries, agrees with a specialist restorer to try to bring back the original colours of the painting without damaging it.

The position may be similar for contracts involving the supply of evaluative information under Chapter 7.

A company involved in a difficult legal dispute requests a law professor to investigate the documents related to the dispute and to assess the company's chances of winning the dispute in court.

The distinction will become blurred if the factors that influence both the results and the costs of the processing service can no longer be identified and controlled in advance and the pre-contractual exchange of information will – again – become less useful for that purpose. Given that the processor in such a situation will probably not offer the performance of the service at a fixed price, the parties will hardly notice the passing of the pre-contractual stage of such a service.

Illustration 21
During an archaeological excavation, the shattered remains of a large collection of Roman pottery are discovered. The State contracts a specialised company to try to restore the collection.

This type of processing contract – and the scenario that is sketched out for the conclusion of such contracts – resembles contracts involving the treatment of persons under Chapter 8.

Illustration 22
A patient has suffered from an ongoing headache for several weeks and eventually decides to contact a doctor.

E. Remedies

If the service provider's pre-contractual failure to warn causes the service not to achieve the result stated or envisaged by the client (subparagraph (1)(a)), the latter will probably seek resort to a remedy under Book III, Chapter 3 on the basis of the service provider's non-performance of the main obligation under IV.C.–2:106 (Obligation to achieve result). As explained in Comment A to that Article, however, the obligation of that Article is not imposed on the service provider in every service contract. Another option may be to try to claim damages on the basis that the service provider failed to perform a contractual obligation to warn. That second route would also be an option for the client in the event that the risk mentioned in subparagraph (1)(b) occurs. A third option for the client – in the event that either the risk under subparagraph (1)(a) or under subparagraph (1)(b) is the result of the failure to warn – would be to try to avoid the contract on the basis of mistake. This option will sometimes be hypothetical, given that it may be impractical or unprofitable to stop a service process and invoke the rules on the effects of avoidance.

On the other hand, whether or not the client exercises the right to avoid the contract, damages may still be recovered under II.–7:214 (Damages for loss) for loss caused by the mistake. If the risk mentioned in subparagraph (1)(c) occurs, the client does not need to resort to a remedy but can simply block the service provider's claim on the basis of paragraph (3), unless the service provider can prove that the client would have entered into the contract even if warned about the risk prior to the conclusion of the contract.

If the client fails to perform the duty to warn under paragraph (4), the service provider may either not achieve the result the client has in mind or damage other interests of the client in performing the service. In this case, the client might try to resort to a remedy on the basis that the service provider did not perform the obligations under the contract. Here, however, the client's failure to warn will prevent the client from resorting to a remedy for the service provider's non-performance to the extent that that failure caused the non-performance (see III.–3:101 (Remedies available) paragraph (3)). It is noted, however, that, after the conclusion of the contract, the service provider may come under a contractual obligation to warn under IV.C.–2:108 (Contractual obligation of service provider to warn) which concerns the same risk the client failed to warn about prior to the conclusion of the contract. In that case, the non-performance of that contractual obligation will give rise to remedies as explained in the Comments to that Article, in the event that they jointly caused the result envisaged by the client not to have been achieved.

If the client does not warn the service provider under paragraph (4), the latter may try to avoid the contract for mistake. This will, however, probably be as hypothetical as the client's option to avoid the contract in the case of the service provider's failure to warn under paragraph (1), for the risk that occurs due to the client's failure to warn is that the service has become more expensive and time consuming.

The service provider will probably want to carry on with the service and earn the fruits of the contract as long as there is compensation for the loss sustained. The service provider is unlikely to be able to seek damages for mistake under II.–7:214 (Damages for loss) if payment of a fee based on an hourly rate was agreed on at the time of conclusion of the contract, for in that case no loss will be suffered. However, if payment of either a fixed price or a fee based on a 'no result, no pay' basis was agreed on, II.–7:214 will become relevant. However, given that the situation described is in fact similar to what may occur if the client fails to perform a contractual obligation to co-operate, the service provider may also seek resort under paragraph (5) of the present Article. This means that the service provider can claim both compensation for the loss occurred and extension of time to perform the service.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. Pre-contractual duties to inform have firmly developed in many European jurisdictions and are still developing. This development has influenced European law, given that several EU Directives impose pre-contractual duties to inform on suppliers of goods and services, particular in the context of consumer contracts. See for instance Directive 85/577/EEC of 20 December 1985 to protect the consumer in respect of contracts negotiated away from business premises, OJ 1985 L 372/31; Directive 87/102/EEC of 22 December 1986 for the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States concerning consumer credit, OJ 1987 L 42/48; Directive 90/314/EEC of 13 June 1990 on package travel, package holidays and package tours, OJ 1990 L 158/59; Directive 94/47/EC of 26 October 1994 on the protection of purchasers in respect of certain aspects of contracts relating to the purchase of the right to use immovable properties on a timeshare basis, OJ 1994 L 280/83; Directive 97/7/EC of 20 May 1997 on the protection of consumers in respect of distance contracts, OJ 1997 L 144/19; Directive 2000/31/EC of 8 June 2000 on certain legal aspects of information society services, in particular electronic commerce, in the Internal Market, OJ 2000 L 178/1. These developments are reflected in Book II, Chapter 3, Section 1 of which deals with pre-contractual information duties. In addition to general contract law provisions on mistake of fact or law, pre-contractual duties of service providers to inform have further been developed by the courts in some of the countries investigated, particularly in FRANCE, GERMANY, THE NETHERLANDS and SPAIN. The exact basis of such duties is not always firmly established. This does not appear to be regarded as a major problem in legal doctrine, given that various legal concepts seem appropriate for providing such a basis, notably the concept of good faith and culpa in contrahendo. Some of the countries investigated have specific statutory provisions providing a basis for explicit pre-contractual duties to inform in the framework of services: FINLAND (chap. 8 and chap. 9 § 13(1) and § 13(3) (16/1994) of the Consumer Protection Act), France (ConsC arts. L. 111-1 and L. 114-1) and The Netherlands (CC arts. 7:754, 7:753(2) and 7:748). The pre-contractual duty of the service provider involves the supply of information on both the characteristics and risks of the service offered, if and to the extent that it is foreseeable for the provider that such information may influence the client's decision to enter into the contract.

II. Pre-contractual duties to inform

2. Under ENGLISH law, a party induced to enter into a service contract by a pre-contractual 'statement' of another party can claim damages under various headings: in the tort of deceit, if the statement was made fraudulently; in the tort of negligence, if the claimant can establish the conditions for the existence of a duty of care under Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] AC 465, or under the provisions of the Misrepresentation Act 1967 (cf. Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 1-072). The latter Act also entitles the aggrieved party to rescind the service contract. English law is reluctant, however, to accept pre-contractual liability outside the scope of 'statements'. The general rule is that mere non-disclosure of information does not constitute misrepresentation, for there is, in general, no duty on a party to a contract to disclose material facts that would be likely to affect the other party's decision to conclude the contract (cf. Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 6-013). Exceptions to this rule are limited and involve (1) contracts uberrima fidei, or situations (2) where there is a fiduciary relationship between the parties, (3) where failure to disclose distorts a positive representation, or (4) where a person is considered guilty of misrepresentation by conduct (cf. Chitty on Contracts I[29], nos. 6-013 ff, 6-079 ff, and 6-135 ff). Further development of pre-contractual duties to inform are said to be hampered by the fact that English law has not committed itself to overriding general principles of good faith and culpa in contrahendo (cf. Chitty on Contracts I[29], nos. 1-019 and 1-076).

3. As regards services provided to consumers, under FINNISH law, chap. 8 § 2 (16/1994) of the Consumer Protection Act provides that contract terms derogating from the provisions of that chapter to the detriment of the consumer are void unless otherwise provided. Chap. 9 § 2 (16/1994) of the ConsProtA, applicable to construction services provided to consumers, is to the same effect. Given these basic rules, it then follows from chap. 8 § 13(1) that a service is considered to be defective if it does not conform to the information that the service provider has given on the service or on other circumstances relating to the quality or use of the service before the conclusion of the service, and which can be deemed to have had an effect on the decision-making of the client. The rule of chap. 8 § 13(1) is extended in § 13(3) to non-disclosure of information on circumstances the service provider should have been aware of and which the client could justifiably have been expected to be notified of. Chap. 9 § 14(1) and § 14(3) on construction services are to the same effect.

4. Pre-contractual duties to inform in FRENCH law are widely applied (Fabre-Magnan, De l´obligation d´information dans les contrats, nos. 285 ff) and can first of all be derived from CC art. 1110 (erreur) and from CC art. 1116 (dol), both allowing a misinformed party to nullify the service contract on fulfilment of certain requirements. Additional pre-contractual duties to inform, however, have long been accepted by the courts outside the scope of these general provisions (cf. Ghestin, La formation du contrat[3], no. 623; Larroumet, Les obligations. Le contrat, no. 376), with not much contemplation on the exact basis of such duties (cf. Larroumet, Les obligations. Le contrat, no. 376; Girot, User Protection in IT Contracts, p. 262). Further pre-contractual duties to inform may follow, for some suppliers of services, from specific statutory provisions (Ghestin, La formation du contrat, nos. 608, 612 and 619) and for all suppliers from ConsC arts. L. 111-1 and L. 114-1. Pre-contractual duties to inform, as developed by the courts, have been categorised and developed into a system by legal doctrine (see for instance Ghestin, La formation du contrat, no. 594; Fabre- Magnan, De l´obligation d´information dans les contrats, no. 281-284), but the distinctions drawn do not always seem to be observed by the courts. It is undisputed, however, that both the courts and legal doctrine acknowledge a duty of the service provider to supply information at the pre-contractual stage. Such information relates to the characteristics and the risks of the service offered, provided that it is foreseeable for the service provider that this may influence the client's decision to enter into the contract (cf. Ghestin, La formation du contrat, no. 643). Case law is abundant on the obligation to warn the client. For example a travel agency is bound to inform the traveller about the requirement of visas, vaccinations and insurance policies (Cass.civ. III, 3 November 1983, JCP 1984.II.20147). An architect must inform the client that the land he plans to buy is unsuitable for construction (Cass.civ. III, 25 March 1981, Bull.civ. III, no. 73).

5. In GERMAN law the basic rule under general contract law is to be found in CC § 119 allowing a party to avoid a service contract on the basis of mistake of fact or law. In practice, however, the courts will more frequently be asked to consider claims for damages in the context of culpa in contrahendo. Such claims will be allowed, provided that it can be established that the required standard of care was not observed, having regard to the rule of CC § 276 (cf. Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB, § 276, nos. 65-103). Pre-contractual duties to inform in the framework of services contracts may also follow from specific statutory provisions (Barendrecht and Van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, no. 21). Although the courts occasionally attempt to approach the subject matter of pre-contractual duties to inform in a manner consistent for all types of services (see for instance BGH VersR 1996, 471), it is hard to discover an all-embracing system in this respect. Nevertheless, several authors agree, on the basis of an analysis of case law and legal doctrine, that the duty requires a service provider to supply information on both characteristics and risks of the service offered, if and to the extent that it is foreseeable for the provider that this may influence the decision of the client to enter into the contract. On the other hand, this does not seem to require the service provider to investigate in detail all the needs and circumstances of every possible client (cf. Abegglen, Aufklärungspflichten in Diensleistungsbeziehungen, p. 172; Borgmann and Haug, Anwaltshaftung, pp. 89, 90 and 95; Ganter, WM 1996, p. 703; Haug, Die Amtshaftung des Notars, no. 470).

6. The main rule under general DUTCH contract law is that mistake of fact or law will only enable the party concerned to nullify the service contract (CC art. 6:228 and CC art. 3:44(1) in conjunction with (3)). Although an additional claim for damages will sometimes be possible as well (cf. HR 2 February 1993, NedJur 1995, 94), Dutch case law and legal doctrine have explored several other legal concepts which could support pre-contractual duties to inform of a party to a service contract, thus enabling the other party to seek remedies other than avoidance of the contract. Although dogmatic difficulties are acknowledged in this respect, pre-contractual duties to inform are widely accepted in the framework of services (see for an overview: Barendrecht and Van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, nos. 90-109; Girot, User Protection in IT Contracts, pp. 233 ff). For some services, the duty also follows from specific statutory provisions. As regards services qualified as aanneming van werk, the duty of the service provider can be based on CC art. 7:754 and on CC art. 7:753(2), whereas CC art. 7:748 provides a basis for services qualified as overeenkomst inzake geneeskundige behandeling. See also CC art. 7:501 (reisovereenkomst). Analysis of case law and legal doctrine shows that the service provider's pre-contractual duty involves the supply of information on both characteristics and risks of the service offered, if and to the extent that it is foreseeable for the provider that such information may influence the client's decision to enter into the contract (cf. Barendrecht and Van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, nos. 114-269). It is doubted whether this would require the service provider to investigate in detail all needs and circumstances of every possible client (cf. Barendrecht and Van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, nos. 122-126).

7. The POLISH CC does not contain rules pertaining to a pre-contractual obligation to warn; the obligation is established after the conclusion of the contract. It is questionable whether a court would uphold the existence of a pre-contractual obligation to warn, drawn from the obligation of loyal contracting. Avoidance for error may, however, sometimes be possible (CC art. 84(1)).

8. Although giving slightly more recognition than English law to ideas of good faith and culpa in contrahendo, SCOTTISH law is similarly reluctant to accept pre-contractual liability outside the scope of 'statements' (MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland, paras. 2.89-2.96).

9. Pre-contractual duties to inform of the service provider are not dealt with as such in the SPANISH CC. According to the general principle of good faith (CC art. 1258), however, a party negotiating a contract has to fulfil certain pre-contractual duties towards its counterpart, including the duty to inform (cf. Echebarría Sáenz, El contrato de franquicia, p. 243). It appears to be debated whether the failure of a party to disclose information at the pre-contractual stage is to be considered in the context of either pre-contractual duties, or as a matter of the validity of the contract or as a question of extra-contractual liability (cf. Echebarría Sáenz, El contrato de franquicia, p. 211). Pre-contractual non-disclosure of information may cause misrepresentation on the other party which affects the validity of the contract. The remedy for the aggrieved party may be the avoidance of the contract with the right to restitution and damages (CC art. 1300). The provider of the service should warn the client if there is a risk that the service may not achieve the envisaged result or damage another interests of the client. In such a case, the provider of the service has the obligation to notify the client of the existing risk, in order to avoid the frustration of the contract's purpose by modifying the content of the service (TS 30 December 2002, RJ 2003/333).

IV.C.–2:103: Obligation to co-operate

(1) The obligation of co-operation requires in particular:

(a) the client to answer reasonable requests by the service provider for information in so far as this may reasonably be considered necessary to enable the service provider to perform the obligations under the contract;

(b) the client to give directions regarding the performance of the service in so far as this may reasonably be considered necessary to enable the service provider to perform the obligations under the contract;

(c) the client, in so far as the client is to obtain permits or licences, to obtain these at such time as may reasonably be considered necessary to enable the service provider to perform the obligations under the contract;

(d) the service provider to give the client a reasonable opportunity to determine whether the service provider is performing the obligations under the contract; and

(e) the parties to co-ordinate their respective efforts in so far as this may reasonably be considered necessary to perform their respective obligations under the contract.

(2) If the client fails to perform the obligations under paragraph (1)(a) or (b), the service provider may either withhold performance or base performance on the expectations, preferences and priorities the client could reasonably be expected to have, given the information and directions which have been gathered, provided that the client is warned in accordance with IV.C.–2:108 (Contractual obligation of the service provider to warn).

(3) If the client fails to perform the obligations under paragraph (1) causing the service to become more expensive or to take more time than agreed on in the contract, the service provider is entitled to:

(a) damages for the loss the service provider sustained as a consequence of the non-performance; and

(b) an adjustment of the time allowed for supplying the service.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The parties to a contract are under a general obligation to co-operate to the extent that this can reasonably be expected for the performance of the obligations under the contract III.–1:104 (Co-operation). Paragraph (1) of the present Article particularises this obligation for the purposes of service contracts.

The client must, under paragraph 1(a) and (b), supply appropriate information and directions. These may involve information and directions promised to the service provider at the time of conclusion of the contract. Depending on the type of service, such information and directions may be expected to specify the client's expectations as regards the result to be achieved through the service. An example of this is given in the following illustration.

A trader of vegetables agreed with a storer that 10 tons of vegetables are to be stored at a fixed price per ton per week. After the conclusion of the contract, the client must supply additional specifications to the storer as regards the type of vegetables and the manner of handling and preserving them.

The information and directions may also provide further details as to the circumstances in which the service is to be carried out.

Illustration 2
A management consultant agreed to investigate the logistics department of a large food production factory and to advise on a possible reorganisation of the department. Once the contract is concluded, the consultant needs to receive additional information from the factory as regards the age, education, job descriptions, and career development of the employees working in the department. She also needs to be informed about internal and external work processes.

Further information or directions may subsequently be required if the service provider encounters difficulties which prevent the achievement of the result envisaged by the client and which cannot be solved by the service provider without such information and directions.

Another particularisation of the client's general obligation to co-operate in the context of service contracts can be found in subparagraph (1)(c). It involves the obtaining of permits or licenses needed to allow the service to be performed lawfully. The obligation is imposed on the client if explicit wording to that effect is used in the contract. An obligation to that effect can also be implied if the service provider cannot obtain the permit or license required.

The obligations of the client under subparagraphs 1(a), (b), and (c) are subject to a necessity test. They arise only so far as necessary to enable the service provider to perform obligations under the contract. An example of a case where this test is deemed to be fulfilled, is provided in the following illustration:

A company specialised in removing graffiti from concrete walls is hired by a bank to clean the walls of the bank's head office. The contract states that the bank will take care of all licences and permits required. After two days of cleaning, the cleaning company is instructed by local authorities to stop working because no permit has been granted. The cleaning company awaits instructions from the bank on how to proceed with the service.

Subparagraph 1(d) requires the service provider to give the client a reasonable opportunity to monitor the service process as it proceeds. This will give the client the opportunity to perform promptly the obligation to notify under IV.C.–2:110 (Client's obligation to notify anticipated non-conformity) if the client becomes aware that the service provider will fail to achieve the result envisaged by the client. It will also enable the client to give directions under IV.C.–2:107 (Directions of the client).

An aged couple contracted with an architect to design the reconstruction of their mansion, which will enable them in the future to live and sleep downstairs. The architect is to present his ideas and plans to the couple on a regular basis during the design process.

Subparagraph (1)(e) imposes an obligation on both parties. It may well be that the client has to perform specific obligations to co-operate throughout the service process, which then amounts to an iterative process of intertwined performances of both parties. Obviously, such a process will only lead to the result envisaged by the client if both parties co-ordinate the performances of their respective obligations. Again, however, this obligation to co-ordinate is subject to the application of the necessity test referred to above.

> Illustration 5
> The owner of a house wants to sell his house and contracted with an estate agent to find a buyer for that purpose. In order to be able to perform the service, the parties will have to make practical arrangements together in order to enable the estate agent to assess the value of the property and to allow potential buyers to visit the house for inspection at a time convenient to all parties involved.

Failure to perform any of the obligations under paragraph (1) will allow the aggrieved party to resort to the normal remedies for non-performance of a contractual obligation. In addition to the service provider's normal remedies, paragraphs (2) and (3) of the present Article contain further rules which may assist the service provider in the event of the client's non-performance of an obligation to co-operate.

If the client does not supply the information or directions required under subparagraph (1)(a) or (b), the effect will often be to prevent the service provider from knowing the client's expectations, preferences and priorities and hence from being able to achieve the result envisaged by the client. However, depending on the type of service contracted for, it may still be possible to proceed on the basis of the expectations, preferences and priorities the client could reasonably be expected to have. If this is the case, the service provider may try to earn the fruits of the contract by proceeding on that basis provided that the client is notified of this intention.

> A road constructor is carrying out the reconstruction of a road on the basis of a design provided by the regional planning authorities. The design requires that the subsoil of the road's foundation consist of a layer of sand of at least one metre. The information supplied to the constructor by the authorities warrants the presence of such a layer. After the road works have started, the presence of a vast amount of soft clay is discovered. The authorities fail to give the necessary directions to the constructor as to how to proceed. The constructor notifies the authorities that he will excavate the clay and replace it with sand.

This rule of paragraph (2) does not prejudice the service provider's right to resort to any of the normal remedies for non-performance of an obligation.

If the client resumes co-operation after a period of passivity – whether or not in response to a warning given by the service provider – or if the service provider pursues the performance of the contractual obligations under paragraph (2), it is likely that the service will have become more costly for the latter and that more time will be needed to achieve the result required. This will not cause problems if payment of a fee based on an hourly rate was agreed on at the time of conclusion of the contract. However, if payment of either a fixed price or a fee based on a 'no result, no pay' basis was agreed on, the service provider would incur a loss due to the client's failure to co-operate.

Illustration 7
A factory agrees with a specialised engineer that the latter will adjust a machine owned by the factory at a fixed price. The job will take about two weeks. The parties also agree the date when the service will have to start. When the engineer wants to start work on the agreed date, factory employees tell him that he will not have access to the machine yet, 'but that access will be granted soon'. The engineer has to keep himself available for the service, but loses time and money.

In this example, the service provider may claim compensation for the loss suffered as a result of the client's non-performance of the obligation to co-operate under paragraph (3) of the present Article. Such a claim may include an extension of time to perform the service.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

A particularisation of the obligation to co-operate as regards service contracts raises several issues that have to be taken into account.

First of all, one might question the need to have specific obligations to co-operate in the present Part. Although the obligation to co-operate appears to be particularly relevant to service contracts, it might be argued that the general rule in III.–1:104 (Co-operation) is enough. On the other hand, one might argue that that rule is too general and that commercial practice needs more specific guidance in the context of a service contract.

A second issue to be dealt with concerns the extent to which the client in particular is to co-operate under a service contract. One might question whether the general criterion under III.–1:104 (Co-operation) ('to the extent that this can reasonably be expected for the performance of the debtor's obligation') is precise enough in the context of service contracts. The obligation to co-operate under many service contracts is distinctly more intense than it is in most other contracts, because each party depends heavily on the other party's co-operation to achieve its objectives. This is an argument in favour of stating an intense obligation to co-operate actively and loyally in order to achieve the objectives in view of which the contract was concluded. On the other hand, one might question whether a client should enable the service provider to earn the fruits of the contract even if the latter is perfectly able to do so without the client's support.

A third issue involves the need to state a rule that can now be found in subparagraph (1)(d) of the Article, imposing an obligation on the service provider to enable the client to follow and check the service process. One might argue that such an obligation is not required, given that – as in any contract – it is the service provider's sole responsibility to achieve the result required. On the other hand, notwithstanding that the client will have remedies if the result is not achieved, it would be in the client's interest to be able to check the service on a regular basis whilst it is still being carried out. First of all, it would enable the client to establish the extent to which further co-operation is to be supplied. Moreover, the client would be enabled to anticipate a possible breach of the service provider's obligations and, if appropriate, to give directions. By the same token, such a prevention of failure to achieve the result required, or limitation of its consequences, would also be in the interest of the service provider.

A fourth and final issue relates to the remedial effect of the non-performance of the client's obligation to co-operate in the context of a service contract. One might question whether the rules stated in paragraphs (2) and (3) are needed, given that the service provider may resort to any of the normal remedies under Book III, Chapter 3. On the other hand, it might be doubted whether it is practical to invoke any of these remedies in the event of non-performance of an obligation to co-operate under a service contract. Resort to a remedy would indeed serve the interests of a seller under a sales contract if a buyer were to refuse to take delivery of the things sold. However, if a service provider is hindered in performing the service agreed on, this will probably happen in the middle of performance which costs time and money and which cannot readily be abandoned. Moreover, the service provider will probably not want to walk away in practice, and would probably prefer a rule that would allow the service to be continued and compensation to be claimed for costs and delay incurred as a result of the client's failure. In this way the service provider could earn the fruits of the contract without having to go to court. On the other hand, the client has an interest in not being tied to the service provider any longer if the client does not want to be.

C. Preferred option

It is thought to be practical to deal explicitly with the most important and typical aspects of the obligation to co-operate under a service contract both in paragraph (1) of the present Article and in related Articles of Chapters 3 to 8 of this Part. This enables commercial practice to determine how the general obligation to co-operate under III.–1:104 (Co-operation) is to be applied in the context of a service contract. Moreover, the client's specific obligations to co-operate under a service contract are at the very heart of this Part, together with the service provider's main obligations. The importance of their interrelationship is reflected in many of the Articles of the present Chapter.

As regards the ambit of the client's obligation, there is common ground for adopting the principle of necessity in subparagraphs (1)(a), (b), and (c). That principle is recognised throughout the legal systems investigated. It should be noted also that under subparagraph (1)(a) the client need answer only 'reasonable' requests.

> Illustration 8
> A fashion designer is carrying out a design contract for an international fashion company. The designer is dependent on regular instructions from an employee of the company as to how to proceed. The fashion designer rings the employee in the middle of the night to receive further instructions. The instructions are necessary but not urgently necessary. These phone calls are unanswered. The client is not in breach of the obligation to co-operate merely by failing to answer such calls. The requests are not reasonable requests.

The service provider's obligation to enable the client to follow and check the performance of the service whilst it is carried out is stated in subparagraph (1)(d) for various reasons, some of which have been mentioned above. What is essential to many service contracts is that the service is performed on the basis of the client's specific needs and wishes and that the client has an interest in determining whether these particular wishes are being fulfilled. The client will not always be able to check this once the service has achieved a particular result. And even if this were possible, it would be a waste of money and time for both parties if the result achieved deviates from the result contracted for. If the latter can be prevented by allowing the client to check the service process regularly – which is already common for some service contracts – both parties will benefit. In the same way, the performance of this obligation will enable the client to exercise relevant rights and perform relevant obligations under later rules of this Part.

The rules stated in paragraphs (2) and (3) are needed in addition to the normal remedies to which the service provider can resort. The service provider's interests are better protected by those rules. There will be no need to take the unprofitable position of having to walk away from the contract and seek resort to court. The rules will allow the service provider to continue the service and to earn the fruits of the contract. The interests of the client are sufficiently protected because the client can always invoke the right to terminate the contractual relationship under IV.C–2:111 (Client's right to terminate). That Article is in fact a direct expression of the client's right to cease co-operation.

D. Remedies

If a party fails to perform the obligation to co-operate, the normal remedies for non-performance of an obligation are available. Nothing more needs to be said regarding a non-performance by the service provider. However, some observations can be made as regards the client's failure to co-operate under the present Article.

If the client does not supply any co-operation at all this will usually prevent the service provider from performing the main obligations under the contract and for that reason the service provider may raise the defence of III.–3:101 (Remedies available) paragraph (3) (namely that the client caused the non-performance) against any claims put forward by the client. This is, for instance, what the dentist may do in the following example:

> Although a patient has agreed with a dentist to undergo treatment on a particular afternoon, he physically refuses to be treated once he is lying in the dentist's chair.

In addition, in such examples – when the client's failure to co-operate is not excused – all the normal remedies for non-performance of an obligation are in principle open to the service provider. However, in the context of a service contract there may be occasions where a claim for a specific performance of the client's obligation to co-operate will be excluded. For example, a dentist could not get an order compelling a patient to submit to treatment.

If the client fails to perform the obligation to co-operate in the first instance, but resumes co-operation later on, much of what has been said above on remedies will still be applicable. In practice, however, the service provider will probably not want to resort to a remedy under Book III, Chapter 3 but will instead try to claim extra payment and extension of time under paragraph (3) of the present Article.

It is also possible that the client performs the obligation to co-operate in a defective manner. The client may, for instance, supply incorrect or inconsistent information, which leads the service provider in the wrong direction and may have several consequences: (1) the result envisaged by the client at the time of conclusion of the contract may not be achieved; (2) other interests of the client may be damaged, or (3) the service may become more expensive or may take more time than agreed on in the contract.

> A supplier of computer networks is requested by the management of a hospital to install a tailor-made network on the basis of a design made on behalf of the hospital.

The design, however, is defective. If the supplier were to follow the design exactly, the computer network would not serve the intended purposes.

If it is assumed that the service provider was not in breach of an obligation to warn (on which, see above), this example is to be resolved as follows. In situations (1) and (2), the client is not in a position to resort to any of the remedies under Book III, Chapter 3 because the client caused the non-performance. In situation (3), the client's defective co-operation gives the service provider the right to resort to any of the remedies set out in Book III, Chapter 3, provided the non-performance of the client's obligation is not excused. But again, it would probably be more practical for the service provider to claim extra payment and extension of time under paragraph (3) of the present Article.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. Frequently occurring examples of the client's obligation to co-operate under a service contract are to be found in AUSTRIA and GERMANY, BELGIUM and FRANCE, ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, THE NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL and SPAIN. They relate to: the supply of information and directions, necessary for the service provider to perform the service; co-operating with the service provider for the purpose of obtaining licenses and permits; and co-ordinating the work of the service provider with activities of co-contractors.

2. The obligation of the service provider to give the client a reasonable opportunity to determine whether the service provider is performing the obligations under the contract is particularly recognized in AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, ENGLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY, ITALY THE NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL and SCOTLAND.

II. The client's specific obligations to co-operate under a service contract

3. In AUSTRIAN law (CC § 1168) the client's obligation to co-operate under a contract for work encompasses an obligation to supply information to the service provider to the extent that this is necessary for the performance of the service in accordance with the client's expectations (see for construction services: ÖNORM A 2060 2.6). Co-ordination of the work of various co-contractors is considered to be part of this obligation as well (see for construction services: ÖNORM B 2110 5.14).

4. Contracts for work in BELGIAN law impose an obligation on the client to supply the service provider with the information that is necessary for the latter to perform the service (cf. Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 989 and 998; Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 133-136 and pp. 147-156 with references to standard forms of contracts). This obligation includes the obligation to give directions to the service provider to the extent that this is necessary for the performance of the service (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, p. 168), as well as an obligation to co-ordinate the activities of the various service providers with whom the client has entered into a contract (cf. Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 1002 ff; Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 184-185). In the context of construction services, these latter obligations also follow from statutory law, see art. 4 Loi sur la protection du titre et de la profession d´architecte. Construction services usually also impose an obligation on the client to obtain permits and licenses (cf. Goossens, Aanneming van werk, no. 986; Jansen, Defects liability, p. 174).

5. The client under an ENGLISH contract for the supply of a service has an obligation to inform the service provider to the extent that this is necessary to enable the latter to perform the service: Roberts v. Bury Improvement Commissioners (1869-70) LR 5 C.P. 310; J. & J. Fee Ltd. v. The Express Lift Co. Ltd. (1994) 10 Const LJ 151 (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 133-136 and pp. 147-156 with references to standard forms of contracts). An obligation to give further directions only exists to the extent that such directions are necessary. The obligation is limited by the principle that stresses the service provider's independent position: the service provider must carry out the service, within the framework of the client's expectations, as the provider thinks fit: Clayton v. Woodman & Son Ltd. [1962] 2 QB 533 (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, p. 169). The client's obligation to co-ordinate the work of the service provider with the activities of other parties is recognised for construction services, but is absorbed by the obligation of the client to give undisturbed access to the site (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 185-186; see also PELSC art. 2:102). The obligation to obtain permits and licenses required for the service is also recognised in the particular context of construction services: Porter v. Tottenham Urban DC [1915] 1 KB 776 (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, p. 174).

6. The FINNISH ConsProtA chap. 9 § 31 on construction services imposes an obligation on the client to co-operate in different ways. Specified obligations are also found in the General Conditions for Building Contracts YSE 1998, chap. 1, ss. 5-8.

7. FRENCH contracts for work (louage d´ouvrage) impose an obligation on the client to supply the service provider with the information that is necessary for the latter to perform the service: CA Paris 22 June 1983, SA Olivetti/I.G.I.R.S. and CA Paris 30 June 1983, Passeport/Soc. Kienzle Informatique, D. 1985, IR 43, note Huet; CA Colmar 15 May 1992, RD imm. 15(2) 1993, p. 228; Cass.civ. III, 7 May 1996, SCI Saint-Lary Soulan vacances/Cie Mutuelle du Mans et autres, RD imm. 18(4) 1996, p. 579, note P. Malinvaud and B. Boubli (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 133-136 and pp. 147-156, with references to standard forms of contracts). This obligation includes an obligation to give directions to the service provider (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, p. 168) and to co-ordinate the performance of the service provider with activities of co-contractors: Cass.civ. III, 6 November 1984, Soc. C.F.E.M., RD imm. 7(2) 1984, p. 156 (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, p. 184). An obligation to obtain permits and licenses is also incumbent on the client, particularly in the context of construction services: Cass.civ. III, 5 November 1980, Chazelet, JCP 1981.IV.32 (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, p. 174).

8. The general obligation to co-operate of any client, which can be derived from GERMAN CC § 293, has been particularised for contracts for work (Werkvertrag) in CC §§ 640 and 642. In the context of such services, the client must provide the service provider with the information the latter needs in order to perform the service in accordance with the client's expectations: BGH 29 November 1971, NJW 1972, p. 447 (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 133-136 and pp. 147-156, with references to standard forms of contracts). This obligation includes a further obligation to give directions, and to co-ordinate the activities of other contracting parties of the client with the activities of the service provider (Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 168 and 185). The client in a contract qualified as Werkvertrag will generally have to obtain the permits and licenses required for the service (CA Munich 14 February 1978, BauR 1980, p. 275; cf. Jansen, Defects liability, p. 174).

9. If the service can be qualified as aanneming van werk under DUTCH law, the client has an obligation to inform the service provider about the client's expectations as regards the service, and the requirements that must be observed by the service provider. The obligation is incumbent on the client to the extent that the supply of information is necessary to enable the service provider to perform the obligations under the contract (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 133-136 and pp. 147-156, with references to standard forms of contracts). An obligation to co-ordinate the activities of other contracting parties of the client in connection with the service provider's performance of the service, is usually derived from this obligation to inform (Jansen, Defects liability, p. 185). Generally speaking, the client has no additional obligation to assist the service provider with directions, unless such obligation has explicitly been agreed between the parties or can be derived from good faith, having regard to the circumstances of the case (HR 4 December 1970, Bouchette and Van Limburg, NedJur 1971, 204, note G.J. Scholten). This decision is not opposed to recognising an obligation of the client to give directions necessary for the service provider's performance of the obligations under the contract (Jansen, Defects liability, p. 168). The client to a contract qualified as aanneming van werk will generally have to obtain the permits and licenses required for the service (Asser (-Kortmann), Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 559), but if the contract leaves a considerable amount of freedom to the service provider (freedom as to how to carry out the functional specifications of the client), the obligation may become incumbent on the service provider (Jansen, Defects liability, p. 174).

10. The obligation to co-operate in any type of contract follows from the general rule of the POLISH CC art. 354 according to which the creditor is obliged to co-operate in the discharge of the obligation in accordance with its contents and in a manner complying with its socioeconomic purpose and the principles of community life, and if there are customs established in that respect, also in a manner complying with those customs. The client should take into account the justified interest of the other party and refrain from doing anything which could complicate, stop or frustrate the performance of the obligations under the contract (Bieniek [-Wiśniewski] I[6], p. 21). This negative obligation is always imposed on the client. A positive obligation exists only if it follows from the nature of the obligation or the contract itself. In other cases the service provider cannot demand co-operation from the client, even if it would be justified by the service provider's interest or social reasons (Radwański [-Brzozowski], System Prawa Prywatnego VII[2] , p. 340). The rules on the contract of specific work contain direct references to the client's obligation to co-operate. If co-operation on the part of the client is required for the doing of the work and such co-operation is lacking, the service provider may set the client an appropriate time limit with the sanction that after the lapse of that time limit the service provider will be entitled to renounce the contract (CC art. 640).

11. The client's specific obligations to co-operate under a PORTUGUESE service contract follow from the general principles of good faith: CC arts. 762 and 813. These obligations include the supply of plans and instructions which comprise the information the service provider needs to perform the service. They further entail co-operation necessary to obtain permits and licenses (cf. Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 344).

12. As with English law, an obligation to co-operate including dealing with requests for information and giving directions is mainly recognised in SCOTTISH law in the context of construction contracts and the industry's major standard forms, for which see Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building contracts' paras. 10-12, 41-45 (with updates). It has been said that "as a general rule … where both parties have agreed that something shall be done which cannot effectually be done unless both parties concur in doing it, the construction of the contract is that each agrees to do all that is necessary to be done on his part, even though there may be no express words to that effect" (Mackay v. Dick and Stephenson (1881) 8 R (HL) 37 at 40, per Lord Blackburn).

13. As is the case with any type of contract, the specific obligations to co-operate of the client under SPANISH service contracts follow from general principles of good faith (CC art. 1258). With respect to construction services, the typical co-operation obligations of the client are stated in art. 9(2) of the Construction Act 1999 (LOE) and consist of the supply of all documents and information necessary to allow the execution of the construction service and to get all necessary licenses and administrative permits.

III. The service provider's obligation to co-operate

14. The service provider has an obligation under an AUSTRIAN contract for work to allow the client to check the performance of the service whilst it proceeds: Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I^2, art. 1170, no. 5. See also ÖNORM A 2060 2.11 in the context of construction services. As to treatment services (Behandlungsvertrag), KAKuG § 5a no. 1 constitutes the right of the patient to view records corresponding to the obligation set forth in KAKuG § 10.

15. Under a BELGIAN contract for work the service provider must allow the client to check the performance of the service. This has particularly been established in the context of construction services (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 192-199).

16. The service provider under ENGLISH law must allow the client to determine, in the course of the service process, whether or not the provider performs the service in conformity with the contract: this has particularly been established in the context of construction services (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 192-199, with references to standard forms of contracts).

17. In FRANCE a service provider must allow a client under a contract for work to check the service process. Particularly in the context of construction services, this is generally accepted (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 192-199, with references to standard forms of contracts).

18. Under a GERMAN contract for work the service provider must allow the client to check the performance of the service whilst it proceeds (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 192-199, with references to standard forms of contracts).

19. It follows from the ITALIAN rule under CC art. 1662 that the provider of a service qualified as appalto must allow the client to examine the service process (Cass. 18 January 1980, no. 434, Rep.Foro it., V° Appalto, c. 1:115, no. 13; Cass. 10 May 1965, no. 891, Riv.giur.edil., 1965, I, p. 945, with comment by E. Favara, Limiti del controllo del committente sull´opera dell´appaltatore. Art. 21 of the Medical Deontological Code imposes an obligation on the provider of treatment services to put all medical reports at the disposal of the client.

20. An obligation to allow the client to check the service process is imposed on service providers both in contracts qualified under DUTCH law as aanneming van werk (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 193-199, with references to standard forms of contracts), as well as in contracts qualified as opdracht (CC art. 7:403(1)). In case of treatment services qualified as overeenkomst inzake geneeskundige behandeling, CC art. 7:456 gives the client the right to view medical records and to obtain a copy of the documents included in the records, unless the privacy of a third party is at stake.

21. The service provider's obligation to co-operate follows from the general rule of the POLISH CC art. 354 mentioned above. In the contract of specific work, the service provider is obliged to respect the client's right to control the performance of the contractual obligations (Radwański [-Brzozowski], System Prawa Prywatnego VII^2 , p. 337*).* In the case of mandate the service provider is obliged to inform the client about the activities undertaken in order to perform the service, in case the client would like to give some additional instructions as to the performance (Radwański [-Ogiegło], System Prawa Prywatnego VII^2, p. 447*).*

22. Under PORTUGUESE law, the service provider's obligation to allow the client to determine in the course of the process, whether the service is in accordance with the contract follows from CC art. 1209(1): CA Porto, 15 June 1973, BolMinJus 229, 235.

23. In SCOTTISH law the main example of a service provider's obligation to co-operate is again found in the context of construction contracts (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 46.

IV.C.–2:104: Subcontractors, tools and materials

(1) The service provider may subcontract the performance of the service in whole or in part without the client's consent, unless personal performance is required by the contract.

(2) Any subcontractor so engaged by the service provider must be of adequate competence.

(3) The service provider must ensure that any tools and materials used for the performance of the service are in conformity with the contract and the applicable statutory rules, and fit to achieve the particular purpose for which they are to be used.

(4) In so far as subcontractors are nominated by the client or tools and materials are provided by the client, the responsibility of the service provider is governed by IV.C.–2:107 (Directions of the client) and IV.C.–2:108 (Contractual obligation of the service provider to warn).

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The supply of a service can be described as a process by which the service provider performs work undertaken according to the particular wishes and needs of the client, in order to achieve a particular result. The work undertaken requires in any event the supply of labour and could also involve the input of tools, materials, and components. This Article imposes obligations on the service provider with respect to the service process itself, particularly as regards the selection of tools, materials, and components to be supplied under the service contract. It further states rules in the event that subcontractors are involved in carrying out the service. Paragraph (2) is to be read in connection with IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care). The obligation under this paragraph is to be performed with the care and skill required under that Article. Paragraph (3), however imposes strict obligations on the service provider, which cannot be performed by merely acting with care and skill.

Paragraph (1) allows as a principle the service provider to subcontract obligations under the service contract, either in part or in whole. This may be done without the client's consent, unless personal performance is actually required by the contract. Whether or not personal performance is required depends on the circumstances of the case and is left to the court to determine. In the following illustration an example is given of a case where personal performance would be required.

> A fashion company enters into a contract with a famous fashion photographer. The company instructs the photographer to make photographs of the latest fashion line of the company for the purpose of illustrating their catalogue. The photographer decides to shoot the indoor pictures himself but to subcontract the outdoor shooting to another professional photographer.

The obligation imposed on the service provider by paragraph (2) implies that any subcontractors selected should be capable of performing the service or part thereof subcontracted. The fact that the service provider subcontracted part of the service does not relieve the service provider from obligations under the contract, subject to the rule of paragraph (4), as follows from III.–2:106 (Performance entrusted to another).

Paragraph (3) imposes obligations on the service provider regarding the quality of the tools, materials, and other components to be used in the course of the service. There is a strict obligation to select tools, materials, and other components of such quality as is needed to ensure that the result the client wishes to obtain through the service will actually be achieved.

The service is to be performed on the basis of the wishes and needs specified by the client. The client may want the service or part of it to be performed by specific subcontractors, in which case the client will nominate them to the service provider.

The Ministry of the Interior awards a contract for the investigation of corruption practices in the civil service to a specialised consulting agency. The Ministry insists that part of the investigation – the analysis of the credibility of existing internal reports dealing with the subject matter – is to be carried out by a specialised research institute.

The client may further wish that the service be carried out with the help of tools, materials, and other components to be supplied by the client.

A house owner agrees with a painter that the latter will paint all the doors of the house with special paint bought by the owner of the house.

If the service is carried out by nominated subcontractors or with the help of tools, materials, and components supplied by the client, it may happen that the result the client envisages will not be achieved. In that case, the service provider's liability is to be established under paragraph (4) in conjunction with the rules in IV.C.–2:107 (Directions of the client) paragraph 2, given that both the nomination of a subcontractor as well as the actual supply of tools, materials, or other components by the client are thought to be equal to the issuing of a direction by the client. The Article on directions by the client also provides rules for the situation where the client directs the service provider to use inadequate tools, materials, or other components – i.e. selected, though not actually supplied by the client himself – whether or not to be obtained by the service provider from a nominated subcontractor.

The contract may oblige the service provider to transfer the ownership of what is produced. To the extent that ownership is to be transferred for a price or in exchange for something else the contract would be one of sale or barter and the obligations of the parties would be regulated by Book IV.A. The provisions of that Book would regulate such matters as conformity of the things with the contract and freedom from third party rights or claims.

A client enters into a contract with a computer shop. The purpose of the contract is to change the mainframe of the client's personal computer and to install on that computer the latest version of a well-known anti-virus software program.

In such cases, interpretation of the contract will lead to the conclusion that the parties have impliedly agreed on transfer of ownership of the structure or thing produced as a result of the service. The same goes for the supply of materials, components, and all other things – corporeal or incorporeal – inherent to the service. There is a mixed contract – partly for the supply of a service and partly for the sale of goods or other assets. In accordance with II.–

1:107 (Mixed contracts) the rules of this Part apply to the service component. The rules on sale apply to the obligations of the parties under the sale component. The rules governing the actual transfer of ownership of movable things can be found in the Book on the transfer of moveable goods and in national rules on the transfer of immovable property.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The main issue is whether explicit rules are needed stating obligations which are self-evidently imposed on a service provider and which might also be derived from the main obligation under the contract. In addition, it is difficult to see what remedies the client may resort to if the service provider fails to perform these obligations. Such a failure will probably coincide with a failure of the service provider to achieve the result envisaged by the client, in which case the latter would rather invoke a remedy on the basis of the non-performance of the service provider's main obligation stated in IV.C.–2:106 (Obligation to achieve result). On the other hand, that obligation (to achieve the result) will not always be imposed on every service provider in every case. This would imply that the obligations under the present Article may still be useful in order to enable the client to resort to a remedy.

It could further be argued that it is useful to regulate the quality of the input into the service process because it gives the service provider incentives to prevent the result envisaged by the client from not being achieved. It would stimulate the service provider to select competent subcontractors and to use adequate tools, materials, and components.

Rules dealing with the quality of the service provider's input into the service process would also make it easier for the client to take precautionary actions. It is typical for a service contract that the client is able to check and follow the service process whilst it proceeds. The present Chapter contains various provisions to support this ability. Such an interaction may lead to the client's discovery that the service provider failed to select competent subcontractors, or failed to select adequate tools, materials, or components. This may even disclose the risk that the result envisaged by the client will not be achieved. Rules imposing an obligation on the service provider as regards the quality of the input into the service process would then enable the client to anticipate the breach of the latter's main obligation by taking precautionary actions. The client might notify the service provider or give a direction. The client might also demand an adequate assurance of due performance under III.–3:505 (Termination for inadequate assurance of performance). This would be advantageous for both parties as disputes about quality will be solved as early as possible in the process and not at the final stage, when it probably will be much more costly to accomplish changes.

C. Preferred option

The ability of a service provider to achieve the result envisaged by the client often depends on the ability to select competent subcontractors and to use tools, materials, and components of good quality and fit for their purpose. If, subsequently, the desired result is not achieved because the service provider failed to select such subcontractors, tools, materials, or components, the client will not always be able to resort to a remedy on the basis of the allegation that the service provider failed to perform the obligation under IV.C.–2:106 (Obligation to achieve result). The reason is that this obligation is not imposed on every service provider in every case. If it is not, the client will have to invoke non-performance of another obligation in order to be able to resort to a remedy. This may be one of the obligations imposed on the service provider by in the present Article.

Illustration 5
The owner of a seventeenth century painting, which has been exposed to smoke and other damaging conditions for centuries, concludes a contract with a specialist restorer under which the restorer is obliged to try to bring back the original colours of the painting without damaging it. The restorer uses a steel brush that is too stiff to do the job and subsequently damages the painting.

In this example, the client will not be able to claim on the basis of failure to achieve a result because the obligation is only to attempt restoration. However, the client will be able to claim on the basis of paragraph (3) of the present Article.

Furthermore, by making the obligations explicit – as is done in the present Article – the service provider is stimulated to achieve the result envisaged by the client. This will particularly be the case if the latter can anticipate the failure to achieve such a result – which is inherent in the ability to check and follow the service process as it proceeds – by invoking the failure to select either, competent subcontractors or adequate tools, materials, and components.

Particular problems may arise when the client has instructed the service provider to use particular tools, materials, and components – whether or not to be obtained from a nominated subcontractor – that turn out to be inadequate.

Illustration 6
A storer has agreed with a client to store liquid nitrogen. The storer is instructed to use a particular machine for keeping the nitrogen at the right temperature. This machine, however, turns out to be defective and as a result the nitrogen can no longer be used for certain industrial purposes.

This issue is dealt with in the Articles on directions by the client and the service provider's contractual obligation to warn.

D. Remedies

If the service provider is obliged to achieve a particular result and fails to do so because of non-performance of one or more of the obligations imposed by this article, it is in the client's interest to invoke non-performance of the service provider's main obligation. The burden of proof on the client will then be limited. In this scenario, it is not likely that the client will invoke non-performance of an obligation under the present Article as this would mean a heavier burden of proof. An example of a case where the client will most likely claim on the basis of non-performance of the main obligation is given in the following Illustration.

Illustration 7
A garage manager agreed with a car owner to replace the exhaust pipe of the latter's car. The materials used by the mechanic to connect and attach the exhaust pipe to the car are not strong enough. As a result, the pipe comes down after a few days.

Moreover, a claim that would in effect seek double compensation for the same damages would in any event be barred.

An obligation to achieve a result will, however, not be imposed on every service provider in every situation. If it is not imposed, the client may be led to invoke non-performance of an obligation of the service provider under the present Article.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. The service provider in a contract for work is unconditionally allowed to subcontract parts of the contractual performance in AUSTRIA, GERMANY, and PORTUGAL. The right to subcontract can, on the other hand, also be dependent on the intentions of the parties to the contract and to other circumstances of the case, particularly the degree to which the service is inherently personal: Austria (CC § 1153), Germany (CC § 613), BELGIUM, ENGLAND, ITALY (CC art. 1180), THE NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 6:30(1), 7:404 and 7:751), SCOTLAND, SPAIN (art. 17(6) of the Construction Act). This principle also exists in FRANCE on the basis of CC art. 1237, but is less relevant for services contract law as a result of art. 3 of the Loi du 31 Décembre 1975 on subcontracting, which imposes an obligation on service providers in general to ask the client's permission before entering into a subcontract. The latter approach is also followed in Italy for services qualified as appalto (CC art. 1656) and in many standard forms of contracts used in construction services practice. References with respect to the specific obligation of the service provider under a storage contract not to subcontract the performance of the storage service without the client's consent are to be found in the notes to the Chapter on such contracts. In all these countries it is established law that the service provider remains responsible towards the client for the part of the service entrusted to the subcontractor.
2. The following countries recognise that the supplier of a service must in principle use tools and materials of good quality and fit for their intended purpose: BELGIUM, ENGLAND, FINLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY, ITALY and THE NETHERLANDS, SCOTLAND. The responsibility of the service provider for tools or materials may however be limited in AUSTRIA, Belgium, England, Germany and in The Netherlands and Scotland if inadequate quality requirements were specified by the client.

II. Performance of the service through subcontractors

3. If the service is to be qualified as an AUSTRIAN Dienstvertrag, the service provider cannot subcontract the service unless the intentions of the parties to the contract and the circumstances of the case demonstrate otherwise (CC § 1153). Under a Werkvertrag, on the other hand, the service provider is not excluded from entrusting parts of the performance of the service to subcontractors. The rule of CC § 1165 merely states that the service provider must carry out the work personally or to have it carried out under his personal responsibility. The general rule of CC § 1313a is relevant in this respect as well in the sense that it establishes the contractual responsibility of the service provider for the performance of his staff as if this were his own performance. In the particular context of construction services, the client has a right to reject a subcontractor for good reasons under ÖNORM A 2060 2. 10. 1.3.
4. If the parties concluded a BELGIAN contract of louage d´ouvrage, the service provider may subcontract the service to the extent that the intentions of the parties are not opposed to this. The concrete intentions of the parties are dependent on the circumstances of the case, in particular the degree of intuitu personae, the nature of the part of the service entrusted to the subcontractor and the abilities of the latter (cf. Goossens, Aanneming van werk, 1215 ff). The service provider remains responsible for the part of the service carried out by the subcontractor (CC art. 1797).

5. In ENGLAND, whether or not a service contract can be carried out through the employment of a subcontractor depends on the proper inference to be drawn from the contract itself, the subject matter of it, and other material surrounding circumstances: Davies v. Collins [1945] 1 All ER 247. Dependent on the circumstances of the case, the obligation may be too personal to allow performance by a subcontractor. If subcontracting is permitted, the service provider nevertheless remains responsible towards the client for the performance of the subcontractor: Stewart v. Reavell´s Garage [1952] 2 QB 545 (cf. Chitty on Contracts I[29], nos. 20-079 ff). In the context of construction services, standard forms of contract may have limited the service provider's freedom to subcontract (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 215-216).

6. The question in FRANCE, whether or not the service provider may subcontract performance of the service, is answered with the general rule of CC art. 1237: the debtor may not subcontract without the creditor's consent if the latter has an interest in personal performance by the debtor. Hence the concrete intentions of the parties, particularly the degree of intuitu personae, are considered relevant. See however art. 3 of the Loi du 31 Décembre 1975 on subcontracting, which imposes an obligation on service providers in general to ask the client's permission before entering into a subcontract. The service provider remains responsible towards the client for the part of the performance that is entrusted to the subcontractor on the basis of CC art. 1797 and art. 1 of the Loi du 31 Décembre 1975 on subcontracting, as well as Cass.civ. III, 13 March 1991, Bull.civ. III, no. 91.

7. If the service is to be qualified as a GERMAN Dienstvertrag, the service provider must perform the service personally (CC § 613). A similar rule does not exist for services qualified as Werkvertrag. In the context of construction services, however, standard forms of contracts impose an obligation on the service provider to ask the client's permission for subcontracting (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 215-216). The general rule is that the service provider remains responsible for the part of the service entrusted to subcontractors (CC § 278; BGHZ, 13, 111).

8. The rule that follows from general law of obligations in ITALIAN law (CC art. 1180) is that the debtor may not subcontract without the creditor's consent if the latter has an interest in personal performance by the debtor. In case the contract can be qualified as appalto, the service provider is only allowed to subcontract the service if this is permitted by the client (CC art. 1656). It can be implied from the rule stated in CC art. 1670 that the service provider remains responsible towards the client for the part of the service carried out by the subcontractor.

9. The general principle on the right of a contracting party to entrust part of his performance to a subcontractor under DUTCH law can be derived from CC art. 6:30(1): subcontracting is possible in principle, unless this would conflict with the express or implied intentions of the parties to the main contract, having regard to their mutual interests. The creditor, for instance, may have an interest in personal performance by the debtor (Parl. Gesch. 6, TM, p. 158). The second general principle, stated in CC art. 6:76, is that the debtor remains responsible for the part of the performance entrusted to the subcontractor. CC art. 7:751 upholds these general principles for services qualified as aanneming van werk, whereas CC art. 7:404 does the same with respect to services qualified as opdracht. As regards services that can be qualified as bewaarneming, see for the second principle also CC art. 7:603(3). This latter provision, however, contains a more lenient provision (than CC art. 6:76) for those cases where the storage was supplied gratuitously and the storer was more or less forced to hand over the thing for sub storage for reasons that cannot be attributed to the storer. See for standard forms of contracts narrowing down the first principle in the context of construction services: Jansen, Defects liability, p. 215.

10. The general rule of the POLISH CC (art. 356(1)) is that the creditor may demand a personal performance only if that follows from the contents of the act in law, from statutory law, or from the nature of the performance. Rules relating to services contracts contain a few references to the personal performance of the obligations under the contract. In the case of the contract of specific work, where performance depends on the personal qualifications of the service provider the contract is dissolved as a result of that person's death or inability to work (CC art. 645(1)). The position of subcontractors in building contracts is regulated in CC art. 647^1. In such a contract the parties will define the scope of work to be performed personally by the contractor and through subcontractors (CC art. 647^1(1)). The contractor may conclude a contract with subcontractors only with the consent of the client. The client is assumed to consent in the absence of an objection in writing within 14 days from being presented with the subcontract (CC art. 647^1(2)). Furthermore, if the subcontractor wishes to conclude a contract with further subcontractors, the consent of the client and the contractor are required (CC art. 647^1(3)). The person who concludes a contract with the subcontractor as well as the client and the contractor have solidary liability for payment of the remuneration for the building works done by the subcontractor (CC art. 647(5)). In the case of a safe-keeping contract the keeper cannot deposit the thing for safe-keeping with another person unless forced by circumstances to do so. In such a case the keeper is obliged to immediately notify the depositor where and with whom the things have been deposited, and is then liable only for a lack of due diligence in choosing the substitute (CC art. 840(1)). The substitute is liable also to the depositor. If the keeper is liable for the acts of the substitute, their liability is solidary (CC art. 840(2)).

11. In PORTUGAL, if the service can be qualified as empreitada, the service provider is allowed to use subcontractors but remains responsible nevertheless for the conformity of the part of the service entrusted to the subcontractor: STJ 15 January 1992, BolMinJus, 413.

12. In line with the general principles of SCOTTISH contract law, a service provider may delegate the work to others unless the contract involves delectus personae (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, paras. 9.40, 12.44).

13. With respect to construction services under SPANISH law, Construction Act arts. 11(2)(e) and 17(6) state that the service provider can only subcontract parts of the service within the limits imposed by agreement, and remains responsible for the conformity of these parts.

14. In the context of construction services, the SWEDISH AB 04, art. 5:12, does not restrict the possibility of the service provider to entrust parts of the service to subcontractors. The provision states, however, that the service provider remains responsible for these parts. As regards processing services, a similar solution is achieved on the basis of § 4 of the Consumer Services Act, stating that the service provider must perform the service in a professional manner (see also Olsen, Konsumentskyddets former, p. 95).

III. Quality of tools and materials used in the course of the service

15. The provisions of the AUSTRIAN CC on Werkvertrag do not contain specific provisions on the obligation of the service provider with respect to the quality of tools and materials to be used for the service. A provision referring to the quality of materials is Ccom § 360, which is to be applied in case of doubt and which imposes an obligation on the service provider to supply materials of average kind and quality. The provision is only applicable in commercial contracts in principle, but the prevailing opinion applies this provision analogously to non-commercial contracts as well (cf. Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 217). The responsibility of the service provider for the quality of tools and materials used in the course of the service process can be limited in the event that inadequate specifications were imposed by the client (CC § 1168a).

16. The service provider under a BELGIAN contract qualified as louage d´ouvrage has an obligation to use tools (cf. Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 969 ff) and materials of good quality and fit for their intended purpose, although the latter obligation does not seem to be as strict as in FRENCH law: Cass. 6 October 1961, S.P.T.L. Algemene Bouwonderneming Léon van Eeghem/Haesaert, RW 1961-62, col 783 at 798-799, and RCJB, 1963, note A. Lagasse, p. 5 (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 248, 251 and p. 347). If the client has specified inadequately the quality of tools and materials to be used, this may limit the responsibility of the service provider (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 422-427).

17. The service provider under an ENGLISH contract for the supply of a service warrants that the materials used will be of good quality and reasonably fit for the purpose for which they are used unless the circumstances of the contract are such as to exclude any such warranty. Such circumstances could involve the specification by the client of inadequate quality requirements to be observed by the service provider: G. H. Myers & Co. v. Brent Cross Service Co. [1934] 1 KB 46 at 55; Samuels v. Davis [1943] KB 526; Ingham v. Emes [1955] 2 QB 366 at 374; Young & Marten Ltd. v. McManus Childs Ltd. [1969] 1 AC 454; Gloucestershire County Council v. Richardson [1969] 1 AC 480. See also Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 s. 4(2)(A) and s. 4(5) (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 247-250 and pp. 422-427).

18. According to FINNISH law, chap. 8 § 12(3) (16/1994) of the Consumer Protection Act (38/1978) the service provider must supply material conform to ordinary good quality, unless agreed otherwise.

19. Under FRENCH law, the service provider in a contract for work is under an obligation to select materials of good quality and suitable for the purpose for they will be used: Cass.civ. III, 19 November 1986, RD imm. 1987, 457 (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 248 and 250). It is doubted, however, whether inadequate quality requirements imposed on the service provider by the client will exculpate the service provider: Cass.civ. III, 7 March 1990, Bull. III, no 69; RD imm. 1990, 375 (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 427-434).

20. Tools and materials used in the performance of a GERMAN contract for work must be of good quality and fit for their intended purpose (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 248-251). But the responsibility of the service provider as regards the quality of the service may be limited if inadequate quality requirements were specified by the client (CC § 645(1) and BGH 14 March 1996, BauR 1996, p. 702; cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 422-427).

21. If the supply of a service can be qualified as appalto, under ITALIAN law, the service provider generally warrants the quality of the materials used: D. Rubino, Dell´appalto, pp. 51 ff.

22. The obligation of the service provider to use tools and materials of good quality and fit for their particular purpose follows from general DUTCH contract law (CC art. 6:77; HR 5 January 1968, NedJur 1969, 174; HR 13 December 1968, NedJur 1969, 174). As regards services qualified as aanneming van werk the obligation is particularised in CC art. 7:760(1). If the client imposes inadequate requirements on the service provider as to the quality of tools and materials to be used, this may affect the client's ability to obtain a remedy (CC art. 6:77; CC art. 7:760(2) and (3)) (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 422-427).

23. The provisions of the POLISH CC do not contain specific rules relating to the quality of tools and materials to be used in the course of the service. The obligation to use tools and materials of an adequate quality may be derived from a general rule that governs performance of obligations (CC art. 355), which demands diligence generally required in the relationships of the given kind. The due diligence of the debtor within the scope of the economic activity is assessed with the consideration of the professional nature of that activity (higher standard of care) (CC art. 355(2)).

24. According to the PORTUGUESE CC art. 1210(2), if the service can be qualified as empreitada and if the contract does not specify the quality of the materials to be supplied under the contract, the service provider must supply materials of at least average quality.

25. The service provider's responsibility for the fitness of tools and materials in SCOTLAND depends upon the contract terms and the provider's general duty of care and skill (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.37-9.39). Further, under the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 s. 11D goods supplied under a contract for work and materials must be of satisfactory quality.

26. In the event that construction services are supplied, under SPANISH law, art. 17(6) of the Construction Act imposes responsibility on the service provider for damage caused to the building work as a result of inadequate materials used in the course of the service.

27. As regards construction services, SWEDISH AB 04, art. 1:9, states as the main rule that the service provider must provide all material necessary for the performance of the service. AB 04, art. 2:1, imposes an obligation on the service provider to perform the work in a professional manner and it is thought that this obligation includes an obligation not to use defective material. A similar obligation for the supplier of a processing service can be found in Consumer Services Act § 4, stating that the service provider shall perform the service in a professional manner (cf. Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 94).

IV.C.–2:105: Obligation of skill and care

(1) The service provider must perform the service:

(a) with the care and skill which a reasonable service provider would exercise under the circumstances; and

(b) in conformity with any statutory or other binding legal rules which are applicable to the service.

(2) If the service provider professes a higher standard of care and skill the provider must exercise that care and skill.

(3) If the service provider is, or purports to be, a member of a group of professional service providers for which standards have been set by a relevant authority or by that group itself, the service provider must exercise the care and skill expressed in those standards.

(4) In determining the care and skill the client is entitled to expect, regard is to be had, among other things, to:

(a) the nature, the magnitude, the frequency and the foreseeability of the risks involved in the performance of the service for the client;

(b) if damage has occurred, the costs of any precautions which would have prevented that damage or similar damage from occurring;

(c) whether the service provider is a business; ;

(d) whether a price is payable and, if one is payable, its amount; and

(e) the time reasonably available for the performance of the service.

(5) The obligations under this Article require in particular the service provider to take reasonable precautions in order to prevent the occurrence of damage as a consequence of the performance of the service.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Supplying a service is in fact equivalent to a process during which a service provider takes all kinds of decisions for the purpose of achieving a specific result, stated or envisaged by a client. These decisions involve the carrying out of labour which is – with the exception of pure intellectual services – usually carried out by the application of materials and components by means of tools. The service provider's strict obligations as regards the selection of these tools, materials, and components, are all dealt with in the preceding Article. That Article further states rules as regards the selection of subcontractors. The present Article imposes obligations on the service provider with respect to the carrying out of the service process itself. These obligations relate to the decisions the service provider must take as regards the application of the tools, materials, and components, in the course of the labour process.

The central obligations imposed on the service provider by paragraph (1) presuppose that, whenever carrying out a service, the service provider will first of all have to observe the requirements to be found in the contract itself. In addition, there may be statutory requirements or other binding provisions which have to be followed.

A company specialised in removing asbestos isolation material, agrees with the owner of an old factory to clean that factory from asbestos. The company will have to observe all legal provisions related to health and safety at work whilst carrying out the said contract.

Paragraph (1)(a) imposes an obligation on the service provider to carry out the service with the care and skill generally to be observed in the circumstances of the case. In doing so, the intention of the service provider must be to achieve the result stated or envisaged by the client. Whether an obligation to achieve that result is to be imposed on the service provider, depends on the interpretation of the contract, taking into account IV.C.–2:106 (Obligation to achieve result). The present Article merely imposes an obligation on the service provider to make every reasonable effort for the achievement of the particular result.

A doctor agrees to treat a patient suffering from severe pneumonia. The intention of the doctor is to cure the patient and he will have to do his best to achieve that result. But he cannot guarantee that the treatment will indeed cure the patient.

An important aspect of the obligation under the present Article will often be careful collection of information about circumstances in which the service is to be performed, adequate planning of the performance in the light of those circumstances and the taking of care to ensure that they are taken into account while the service is being performed.

An oil production plant hired a specialised contractor to repair pipes that were damaged due to regular pressure. Before starting the actual repair work, the contractor will not only have to establish the way in which other parts of the installation influence the functioning of the pipes, but will also have to find out how the functioning of the pipes affects the functioning of other parts of the installation.

Illustration 4
A management consultant agreed to investigate the logistics department of a large food production factory and to advise on a possible reorganisation of the department. Once the contract is concluded, the consultant can be expected to gather information as regards the ages, education, job descriptions and career developments of the employees working at the department; and about the internal and external work processes that take place at the logistics department.

Illustration 5
A farmer contracts the harvesting of a maize crop out to a company that specialises in providing labourers and machinery for that purpose. The company will have to establish whether the soil can support tractors despite the recent heavy rainfall.

Illustration 6
A geo-technical surveyor is requested to investigate the subsoil conditions of a particular piece of land and to advise on the necessity of extra foundation works, for the purpose of a building that is to be erected on that piece of land. The surveyor fails to take into account the geo-technical influence of a nearby tidal river and gives the client the wrong advice.

The standard of care to be demonstrated by the service provider depends on the circumstances of the case. The Article, however, further specifies the required standard of care for some important and frequently occurring situations. Paragraph (2) deals with the situation in which the service provider professes to be capable of performing the service with a higher standard of care and skill than the standard generally required. If that is the case, the higher standard is the one to be observed, as is shown in the following illustration:

Illustration 7
A law firm specialises in giving legal advice on proposed mergers and takeovers. It is the firm's only field of business. The firm has a high reputation among other law firms and must live up to that reputation.

If the service provider is a member of a group of professional service providers which has set its own disciplinary standards to be observed, paragraph (3) requires that these standards will also have to be observed by the service provider. Such standards will usually have been set by a relevant authority – usually a national authority – which can either be a public authority or a private entity.

Illustration 8
A contract is concluded between a client and a shop which specialises in body piercing. The shop will have to observe the disciplinary standards set out by the National Association of Body Decoration.

Finally, the criteria provided for in paragraph (4) are to be taken into account in determining the standard of care and skill to be demonstrated by the service provider. They are not to be regarded as the only criteria that have to be looked at, but they are thought to be the most relevant ones.

The obligations which this Article imposes on the service provider all relate to the particular result to be achieved through the service process. That result can be thought of as the accomplishment of the client's explicit and implicit wishes and needs. It is implied in these wishes and needs that the service process will – apart from the achievement of the said result – not lead to personal injury or damage to property.

A storer agrees with a fireworks trader to store fireworks. The safety policy of the storer is not very strict: employees smoking cigarettes are able to walk past the open containers in which the fireworks are kept. As a result an explosion occurs and several residents living nearby are killed and several adjacent buildings and cars are seriously damaged.

Because of the importance of this point, paragraph (5) expressly requires reasonable precautions to be taken by the service provider to prevent the occurrence of damage as a consequence of the performance of the service. "Damage" means any type of detrimental effect (Annex): it therefore includes loss and injury. In the case of construction and processing contracts a particular application of this rule is that the service provider must take reasonable precautions to prevent damage to the thing being made or processed.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

It is undisputed that an obligation should be imposed on the service provider to carry out the service with the care and skill generally to be observed in the circumstances of the case and that it must at least be the intention of the service provider to achieve a result stated or envisaged by the client. The crucial issue is whether the service provider has a further obligation to actually achieve that result through the service. That issue is considered in Comment B to the following Article.

A related issue is whether the service provider must still carry out the service with the required care and skill if there is an obligation to achieve a particular result. One might argue that failure to carry out the service with due care and skill will then probably coincide with a failure to achieve that result, in which case the client will invoke a remedy on the basis of the non-performance of that primary obligation. There would then be no need for a separate obligation to carry out the service with care and skill, given that it would be superfluous to allow the client to resort to a remedy for the non-performance of that obligation if the client could also claim for non-performance of the primary obligation.

It could be argued that it is useful to impose the obligation of care and skill on the service provider in any event, because that gives the service provider incentives to prevent the result from not being achieved. Imposing the obligation, even in the case where the service provider has an obligation to achieve a particular result, would also make it easier for the client to take precautionary actions. The client is in the position to do so, given that he can check and follow the service process as it proceeds, and discover problems at an early stage. Imposing the obligation of care and skill, even if the service provider is under an obligation to achieve a particular result, would then enable the client to anticipate the breach of that obligation. The client could give a direction or a notification and could demand an adequate assurance of due performance. Both parties will profit from these precautionary actions if they enable problems to be identified and disputes to be resolved at an early stage.

C. Preferred option

The present Article imposes an obligation on the service provider to carry out the service with the care and skill generally to be exercised by a reasonable service provider in the circumstances of the case. This is the fundamental obligation imposed on a service provider in all legal cultures, unless there is reason to impose the stricter obligation to actually achieve the result stated or envisaged by the client. The present Article is needed for cases where the latter obligation is not imposed on the service provider.

Even a service provider who is subject to the stricter obligation to achieve the required result will still be under an obligation to carry out the service with the required care and skill for the reasons explained above.

D. Remedies

It is possible that the service provider is not only under an obligation to carry out the service with due care and skill, but also under an obligation to achieve the result stated or envisaged by the client. If that is the case, and if the result is not achieved, it is in the client's interest to invoke the non-performance of the latter obligation. The burden of proof imposed on the client will then be limited.

The obligation to achieve a particular result will, however, not be imposed on every service provider in every situation. If it is not imposed, this might cause the client to invoke the non-performance of an obligation of the service provider under paragraphs (1) to (4) of the present

Article. The client may resort to any of the remedies of Book III, Chapter 3 if the service provider fails to perform the obligation stated in paragraph (5) of the present Article. The most likely remedy will be damages.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. It is established law in the countries investigated that any service provider owes the client an obligation to perform the service with reasonable care and skill. This obligation usually follows from general contract law provisions dealing with good faith: AUSTRIA (CC §§ 1297, 1299), BELGIUM (CC art. 1135), FRANCE (CC arts. 1135 and 1137), GERMANY (CC § 242), GREECE (CC art. 330), ITALY (CC art. 1176(2)), POLAND (CC art. 355(1)), PORTUGAL (CC art. 762(20)), SPAIN (CC art. 1104), although specific provisions in services contract law can be found as well, sometimes applying only to specific types of contract: Austria (CC § 964), England (Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 s. 13), FINLAND (ConsProtA chap. 8 § 12(2)), France (CC art. 1927), Germany (CC § 690 and Ccom § 475), Greece (ConsProtA art. 8, see also CC arts. 686 and 823), Italy (CC art. 2236), THE NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 7:401, 6:27, 7:453 and 7:602), Portugal (CC art. 1208), SWEDEN (Consumer Services Act § 4). In SCOTLAND the obligation is implied generally at common law (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.37). Generally speaking, the standard of care to be observed by the service provider depends on the skills of a reasonably competent representative of the relevant trade or profession and is further determined by the generally accepted (technical) standards and customs of that profession.

II. The obligation of care of the service provider

2. There are no specific provisions to be found in the AUSTRIAN CC on the standard of care to be observed by service providers in general. Each service provider, however, has to observe a standard of care on the basis of the general provisions of CC § 1297 and CC § 1299. The exact standard of care to be observed depends on the circumstances of the case and will be determined following the usual degree of care and attention necessary for the performance of the service in question (cf. OGH, SZ 34/153=JBl 1962, 322; OGH, JBl 1982, 245=EvBl 1981/159). A specific provision exists for storage services: CC § 964 imposes an obligation on the service provider to act with reasonable care.

3. In case of a contract for work under BELGIAN law, the service provider has an obligation to take safety precautions in order to prevent material damage and safety risks which may occur as a direct consequence of the performance of the service. This obligation is said to follow from CC art. 1135 (cf. Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 917, 955 and 961).

4. In ENGLISH law, there is an implied term that the service provider will carry out the service with reasonable care and skill, cf. Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 s. 13; Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 13-031. Although storage services are considered to be a separate category of contracts, they too are subject to the general requirements of Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 s. 13 (cf. s. 12(3)). The degree of care and skill required of the service provider is that which is to be expected of a member of the profession of ordinary skill and competence, cf. Bolam v. Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 WLR 582. Cf. for contract of bailment: Morris v.

C.W. Martin & Sons Ltd. [1966] 1 QB 716. The service provider is must also comply with applicable regulations governing safety standards and practices, cf. Wilson v. Best Travel Ltd. [1993] 1 All ER 353.

5. According to FINNISH law (ConsProtA chap. 8 § 12(2)) the service provider must perform the contractual obligations with professional care and skill, taking into account the interests of the client, and in accordance with the requirements set out by law, decree or official decision.

6. In a contract for work under FRENCH law, it has to be determined whether the service provider merely has an obligation to act with reasonable care and skill (obligation de moyens) or whether there is an obligation to accomplish a particular result (obligation de résultat). Generally speaking, the former obligation is usually imposed in the case of mere intellectual services, whereas the latter obligation relates to services involving the supply of an immovable structure or movable thing (cf. Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier/Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], no. 742). Despite the fact that some service providers are under a higher obligation to accomplish a particular result, it nevertheless follows from CC art. 1135 that any service provider must observe the standards and customs relevant to the profession, even if the contract is silent about them. Moreover, it follows from CC art. 1137 that any party performing a contract must observe the normally expected standard of care. In the case of a service provider, comparison is made with a reasonably careful and skilled service provider. For deposit see also CC art. 1927 and Cass.civ. I, 28 May 1984, Bull.civ. I, no. 173.

7. There are no specific provisions to be found in the GERMAN CC on the standard of care to be observed by service providers in general while performing the service. Each service provider, however, must perform the service in accordance with the standard of care which can be expected and which is to be determined primarily according to the generally accepted standards and customs of the profession. This general obligation of any service provider follows from the general provision of CC § 242. Specific provisions are applicable, however, in the context of storage services. A service provider who supplies a gratuitous storage service must take such care as the owner of the thing would take (cf. CC § 690). In a commercial storage service, the service provider has an obligation to act with reasonable care (cf. Ccom § 475).

8. IN GREECE the general obligation of care owed by any service provider when carrying out the service follows from CC art. 330 and from ConsProtA art. 8. The standard of care owed by the particular service provider depends on the skills of a reasonably competent representative of that profession, which are further determined by the generally accepted standards and customs of that profession. If the service can be qualified as a contract for work the service provider has an obligation of care on the basis of CC art. 686. In storage services, CC art. 823 requires the service provider to exercise the same care as an owner, unless the service is for remuneration in which case the general rule of CC art. 330 applies.

9. According to the general provision of ITALIAN CC art. 1176(2), a service provider must perform the obligations under the contract with the diligence and knowledge, required by the profession (confirmed for services qualified as appalto in Mangini, Il contratto di appalto[2], p. 134; Marinelli, Giust.civ., 1982, ii, p. 116). It follows from CC art. 2236 that a more lenient obligation is imposed on the supplier of a service qualified as contratto d´opera intellectuale when the performance of the service is of particular difficulty.

10. In the NETHERLANDS, if the service can be qualified as opdracht, the service provider must act as a reasonably skilled and a reasonably acting service provider would act: cf. CC art. 7:401 and HR 9 June 2000, NedJur 2000, 460. This obligation is also imposed on the service provider whose service can be qualified as overeenkomst inzake geneeskundige behandeling; cf. CC art. 7:453 and HR 9 November 1990, NedJur 1991, 26 (Speeckaert/Gradener). As regards services qualified as bewaarneming, the same obligation is imposed on the service provider; cf. CC art. 7:602 and CC art. 6:27. The obligation is not stated in the DUTCH CC for services qualified as aanneming van werk, but follows nevertheless from HR 26 April 1991, NedJur 1991, 455 (Benjaddi/Neve).

11. It follows from the general provision of the POLISH CC art. 355(1) that any service provider must act with the diligence generally required in a service contract. CC art. 355(2) adds to this that the professional capacity of the service provider is to be taken into account, leading to a higher standard of care (M. Sośniak, Należyta staranność).

12. In PORTUGAL any service provider has an obligation to perform the service in accordance with the state of the art and the technical standards generally accepted in the profession. This obligation follows from the general provision of CC art. 762(2); cf. CC art. 1208 for services qualified as empreitada. It includes the specific obligation to take safety precautions while performing the service; cf. Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 350.

13. The obligation of care to be observed by any service provider follows from the general provision of the SPANISH CC art. 1104. The provider of the service must act with the care and skill that a reasonable service provider would demonstrate under the given circumstances in accordance with the state of the art in the profession.

14. In the case of the supply of a service to a consumer, § 4 of the SWEDISH Consumer Services Act states that the provider must perform the service in a professional manner, safeguard the consumer's interests with due care and consult the consumer to the extent that this is necessary and feasible. The same standard applies to non-consumer contracts, but the parties are free to agree on the quality and standards they like, cf. Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 95.

IV.C.–2:106: Obligation to achieve result

(1) The supplier of a service must achieve the specific result stated or envisaged by the client at the time of the conclusion of the contract, provided that in the case of a result envisaged but not stated:

(a) the result envisaged was one which the client could reasonably be expected to have envisaged; and

(b) the client had no reason to believe that there was a substantial risk that the result would not be achieved by the service.

(2) In so far as ownership of anything is transferred to the client under the service contract, it must be transferred free from any right or reasonably based claim of a third party. Articles IV.A.–2:305 (Third party rights or claims in general) and IV.A.–2:306 (Third party rights or claims based on industrial property or other intellectual property) apply with any appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

A client who concludes a service contract generally wants to obtain a particular result. The ability of a service provider to achieve that result, however, depends on a number of factors which will not always be under the control of the service provider. This can be illustrated by the following examples:

Illustration 1
A patient suffering from a severe form of cancer enters into a contract with a specialised doctor in order to be cured through medical treatment.

A law firm is engaged by a victim of alleged medical malpractice for the purpose of obtaining financial damages from the doctor through legal action.

Whether a service provider has promised to achieve a particular result – for example to cure the patient from cancer, or to obtain damages in a lawsuit on his client's behalf – is a matter of interpretation of the contract. The same goes for the question what that particular result to be achieved consists of. The purpose of the present Article is to assist the process of interpretation in those cases where the contract does not regulate the matter expressly.

The rule under the Article is that the service provider is under an obligation to achieve the particular result in the following two situations: (1) before conclusion of the contract, the client expressly requires the service provider to achieve the result, and the service provider does not dispute that the service will be able to achieve that particular result, and (2) at the time the contract was concluded, the parties did not expressly discuss the matter, but a reasonable service provider would expect the client to expect the result to be achieved.

If the client states the particular result, it will already be clear to the service provider what it is that the client expects. If the result is not stated, the particular result envisaged by the client must be determined. In that case the result to be achieved is the result that is in the mind of the objective, average reasonable client. Clearly, an average competent service provider must know what is in the mind of such a client.

A motorcycle is brought to a garage for the purpose of changing the tyres. If the type of tyres to be supplied is not specified, the average reasonable client may expect new tyres of the same type as the old ones. The client may not expect the motorcycle to be fit for off road journeys, if it is objectively clear from the type of motorcycle and from the type of tyres to be changed that such journeys were not possible prior to changing the tyres.

If it is clear what the particular result is that is to be achieved, application of the Article still depends on the client's having no reason to believe that there was a substantial risk that the result would not be achieved by the service. Obviously, the parties to the contract may have differing views. An average and reasonable client may very well believe that the service will lead to the envisaged result without any risk, whereas the average competent service provider in the same situation may not always have that belief, as is illustrated in the following example:

A supplier of computer networks is asked by a hospital to install a tailor-made network, following a design prepared on behalf of the hospital. The hospital sincerely believes that the design is perfect, but it is not. If the supplier were to follow the design exactly, the hospital would not be able to use the computer network for the purposes it has in mind. The supplier does not trust the design handed over by the client.

If the parties have differing views on whether the result can be achieved without any risk, the Article nevertheless applies and the obligation to achieve the particular result is imposed on the service provider. If the average competent service provider would expect the achievement of the result to be endangered by the occurrence of some substantial risk, he must warn the client about that risk (see IV.C.–2:102 (Pre-contractual duties to warn) and IV.C.–2:108 (Contractual obligation of the service provider to warn)). Once so warned, a reasonable client could no longer have the belief that there is no substantial risk that the result will not be achieved by the service.

A reasonable client may expect a constructor, a designer, a storer, as well as a supplier of factual information to achieve the particular result through the performance of the service requested. That is the reason why the obligation to achieve such a result is imposed upon these service providers in principle by the later Chapters in this Part. The obligation is not imposed as a principle on a processor, a supplier of evaluative information or a provider of medical treatment. Dependent on the circumstances of the case, however, interpretation of the contract on the basis of the rules of the present Article could lead to the conclusion that these service providers too are under an obligation to achieve the particular result envisaged by the client. This is clearly the case in the example given in the following illustration:

A garage is asked by a car owner to remove and change the standard exhaust pipe of a standard car.

Finally, whenever a contract is interpreted in the sense that the service provider must achieve a particular result, other Articles imposing obligations – either under the present Chapter, or under the relevant specific Chapter of this Part – nonetheless remain applicable.

Paragraph (2) deals with a particular application of the general rule in paragraph (1). Where the ownership of something is transferred to the client under, or as a result of, the service contract, the client can reasonably expect that such ownership will be free from any right or reasonably based claim of a third party. Sometimes this result will be achieved through the direct application of the rules on sale. This will be the case if, for example, the contract is one for construction and sale (see II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts) and IV.A.–1:102 (Goods to be manufactured or produced)) or if it is categorised as a mixed contract for sale and the performance of a service (for example, selling and fitting a car tyre). Paragraph (2) of the present Article extends the sale solution to cases where the ownership is transferred without there being, technically, a sale. For example, a fitted part may become the property of the client by accession under the rules on the transfer of property.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The question addressed by this Article is probably the most important issue in the context of service contracts. Two different approaches are generally recognised.

The first approach is to establish the service provider's liability on the basis of failure to perform the service with the required care and skill. In this approach, the idea is that the obligation imposed upon the service provider is an obligation of means, implying that the provider must strive for the achievement of the result envisaged by the client. In the event that such result is not achieved, the client must prove that the service provider failed to perform the service with due care and skill. Conversely, the service provider is allowed to prevent liability by proving that the service was performed with due care and skill.

The second approach is to establish the liability of the service provider on the basis of the mere fact that the service did not achieve the result stated or envisaged by the client at the time of conclusion of the contract. In this approach, the idea is that the obligation imposed upon the service provider is an obligation of result, implying that it is not enough merely to attempt to achieve the required result. If the result is not achieved, the client has to establish that fact. The service provider may escape liability by proving that the non-performance of the obligation was caused by the client or excused by an impediment but cannot prevent liability by proving that the service was performed with due care and skill.

It is difficult to make a choice between the two approaches for all types of service contracts. The client's interests are obviously protected best by the second approach. But the difficulty is that, although it may be appropriate to impose an obligation of result on most service providers, it would be harsh to impose such an obligation on some of them, given their inability to fully control the outcome of the service process, even if they make every effort to achieve the result envisaged by the client. Imposing an obligation of result on such service providers would not only be a danger to their interests, but would also make their services much more expensive for the client, given that the service provider would have to buy insurance for the coverage of uncontrollable risks. Where insurance cover cannot be obtained or can be obtained only at very high costs, this might cause service providers to withdraw from the market, leading to the disappearance of such services altogether.

C. Preferred option

The solution which is chosen in this Article reflects the idea that the probability that the result envisaged by the client can be achieved should be decisive for the obligation to be imposed upon the service provider. This means that neither the first nor the second approach sketched out under Comment B has been adopted for all services contracts. It is preferred to have a more flexible solution, which makes it possible to take into account the particularities of each type of service. Hence, if it is probable that the service can achieve the required result, an obligation to do so is imposed on the service provider (in the absence of a contractual provision to the contrary). If there is no such probability, the obligation is not imposed. Liability will then have to be established on the basis of the rules under the other Articles of this Chapter, in particular under the preceding Article .

In order to establish in each particular case whether it is probable in advance that the result envisaged by the client can indeed be achieved, it is necessary to determine whether the service provider ought to be able to identify and control the following three important factors – as well as the interrelationship that exists between them – in order to achieve that result: (1) the (particular) needs of the client, (2) the services provider's (tailor-made) solution that fits these needs, and (3) the circumstances in which the service is to be performed. In some services dealt with later in this Part, the service provider is deemed to have this ability. An obligation to achieve the particular result is imposed upon these service providers as a principle.

If the service provider is under an obligation to achieve the result stated or envisaged by the client and fails to achieve that result, the client may resort to any of the remedies set out in Book III, Chapter 3, provided that the non-performance is not excused under III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment) and that the client complies with any requirements as to notification - e.g. under III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity).

It is possible that the service provider is prevented from achieving the result by the client's failure to warn under IV.C.–2:102 (Pre-contractual duties to warn) paragraph (4) or failure to co-operate under IV.C.–2:103 (Obligation to co-operate) (1)(a), (b), (c) or (e), or as a result of following a direction of the client under IV.C.–2:107 (Directions of the client) paragraph (1). This would give the service provider a defence under III.–3:101 (Remedies available) paragraph (3) on the ground that the client had caused the non-performance. However, if the service provider was under a duty to warn the client that the result might not be achieved due to the client's incorrect or inconsistent information or directions, and failed to perform that duty, the issue becomes different. In that case the client's information or directions are no longer to be regarded as the only cause of the fact that the service provider has not achieved the result. The service provider will then not be able to bar the client's claim on the basis of III.–3:101 paragraph (3) or prove that the non-performance was due to an impediment beyond the service provider's control. The client may then in principle resort to any of the normal remedies.

Failure by the client to warn of an anticipated failure to achieve the required result under IV.C.–2:110 (Client's obligation to notify anticipated non-conformity) will not bar the client's claim for non-performance of the obligation under the present Article, because the failure to notify did not cause the service provider's non-performance. The client may then too resort to any of the normal remedies: failure by the client to notify of an anticipated non-performance gives the service provider certain rights but does not cut off the client's remedies.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. If the contract does not regulate the question whether or not the service provider has to achieve a particular result through the service, the legal qualification of the service type itself is not sufficient to answer that question in: BELGIUM, ENGLAND, FINLAND, FRANCE and THE NETHERLANDS and SCOTLAND. In these countries, an obligation to achieve a particular result may be implied from the circumstances of the case, for instance if the client relies on the skill and judgement of the service provider (England and Scotland); if the client refrains from giving detailed instructions thus leaving it to the provider to decode how to carry out the service (Belgium, The Netherlands, England, Scotland); if the service has as its object an immovable structure or movable thing and does not involve particular difficulty or particular hazard (France); or if the achievement of a particular result is something that the client may reasonably expect (Finland). In other countries, however, these circumstances are considered irrelevant to the question whether the service provider has an obligation to achieve a particular result and the answer primarily depends on the legal qualification of the service: AUSTRIA (CC § 1167*)*, FRANCE (to the extent that the service involves construction of immovable structures; cf. CC art. 1792), GERMANY (CC § 633), GREECE (CC arts. 688 and 689), PORTUGAL (CC art. 1208).

II. Obligation to achieve result

2. In AUSTRIA it is a general rule that whenever a party expressly or impliedly agrees to achieve a particular result, failure to achieve that result constitutes non-performance of the obligation (CC §§ 922 ff). This general rule in particularised in CC § 1167 for contracts for work. Cf. also CC § 961. The service provider cannot escape liability by arguing that the service has been performed with reasonable care and skill (cf. Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], p. 247). If the service provider is not sure whether or not the service will be able to achieve the result, the client must be so informed at the time of conclusion of the contract: the provider must make it clear that responsibility is limited to performance of the lesser duty of reasonable care and skill (cf. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], arts. 1165-1166, no. 56).

3. In a contract for work under BELGIAN law the service provider only has a duty to achieve a particular result if the client is considered to rely on the skill and judgment of the service provider. The client is not considered to rely on the service provider if the former imposes detailed instructions as to how to carry out the service (cf. Cass. 26 February 1976, Entr. Et dr. 1985, p. 263, note M.A. Flamme and Ph. Flamme. See also Goossens, Aanneming van werk, no. 40 and Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 265-266).

4. In ENGLISH law there is no rule in ss. 13 ff of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 imposing an obligation on the service provider to achieve a particular result through the service. But the Act does not prejudice any rule of law which imposes a stricter obligation on the supplier (s. 16(3)). There is ample case law showing that where the client relies on the skill and judgement of the service provider, there is likely to be an implied term that the latter is to achieve a particular result through the service: Duncan v. Blundell (1820) 3 Stark 6, 171 ER 749; Hall v. Burke (1886) 3

TLR 165; Jones v. Just (1886) LR 3 QB 197; Lawrence v. Cassel [1930] 2 KB 83; Samuels v. Davis [1943] 1 KB 526; Hancock v. B.W. Brazier (Anerly) Ltd. [1966] 1 WLR 1317; Greaves & Co. Ltd. v. Baynham Meikle & Partners [1975] 1 WLR 1095 (cf. Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 13-031). Generally speaking, a client is considered to rely on the skill and judgement of the service provider if it is left to the service provider to decide how to achieve the required result. There will be less reliance if the client imposes detailed instructions as to how to perform the service (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 261-264).

5. According to FINNISH ConsProtA chap. 8 § 12(2) sentence 2 the service must conform to what the consumer generally has reason to expect in the case of such a service. If the service does not conform to the consumer's reasonable expectations, it is deemed to be defective (cf. ConsProtA chap. 8 § 12(4)).

6. If the contract is for work, under FRENCH law it has to be determined whether the service provider merely has an obligation to act with reasonable care and skill (obligation de moyens) or must achieve a particular result (obligation de résultat). Generally speaking, the former obligation is usually imposed in case of mere intellectual services, whereas the latter relates to services involving the supply of an immovable structure or movable thing, provided that the service promised does not involve particular difficulty or hazard (cf. Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], no. 742; Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 32259 ff and the abundant case law quoted). An obligation to achieve a particular result is imposed on the service provider, however, irrespective of the involvement of any particular difficulty or hazard in the case of construction services (cf. CC art. 1792).

7. According to the GERMAN CC § 633 the service provider under a contract for work has to achieve a result that is fit for the specific purpose made known to the provider at conclusion of the contract, as well as fit for the normal purpose of such a service. To that extent, the service must have the qualities which are common for services of the same kind and which the client, from the nature of the service, may expect (cf. CC § 633(2); BGH 26 November 1959, 31 BGHZ, 224; BGH, NJW 1998, 3707). The duty to achieve a specific result is not imposed upon the service provider if the contract is qualified as Dienstvertrag (cf. BGH 4 June 1970, BGHZ 54, 106).

8. If the contract can be qualified as a contract for work under GREEK law the service provider is under a duty to achieve a particular result through the service (cf. CC arts. 688 and 689).

9. In case of a service qualified as aanneming van werk the position of DUTCH law is rather similar to ENGLISH and BELGIAN law. This means that the service provider has an obligation to achieve a particular result unless the client has given precise instructions (Asser (-Kortmann), Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 514; Van den Berg, Samenwerkingsvormen in de bouw, nos. 69-70; Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 267-270). As regards services qualified as bewaarneming the service provider has an obligation to achieve a particular result (Rutgers, Bewaarneming, no. 5; Paquay, RM Themis 1994, p. 494; cf. art. 7:605(4)).

10. Under POLISH law, the service provider is obliged to achieve the specific result always, if the contract is classified as an obligation of result (for example a contract for specific work). In such a case achieving the specific result is one of the conditions of fulfilling the contract.

11. The service provider under PORTUGUESE law has an obligation to achieve a particular result through the service only if the service can be qualified as empreitada (cf. CC art. 1208). The service provider cannot escape liability by arguing that the service has been performed with reasonable care and skill (cf. CC art. 798 and 799; CA Lisboa, 27 November 1981, CJ 1981, V, 164).

12. In SCOTLAND the general obligation of the service provider is to use care and skill rather than provide a result. The parties may however provide for this in their contract (although courts have been reluctant to interpret these as imposing absolute obligations), or it may be implied if the client makes known both a particular purpose and reliance on the provider's special skill in this regard, or if the provider designs or selects a system or materials for installation (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, paras. 9.37-9.39; Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 37 (with update)).

13. In SPANISH law, when the service contract establishes an obligation which can be fulfilled only by achieving a specific result (CC art. 1544: contrato de obra), this result generally is described explicitly in the terms of the contract. In the absence of a specific description the result to be achieved is the one envisaged by the parties, either inferred from the context of the obligation or stemming from the general good faith obligation (CC art. 1258) and usages (TS 30 January 1997, RJ 1997/845). It is a matter of construction whether the special purpose intended by the creditor is a risk borne by the debtor; were this the case, the contract ought to be deemed as a contract of work; in the contract of services, the creditor bears the risk of failure to achieve the purpose where this failure is not due to the debtor's negligence. In the area of plastic surgery, providing information about the results that may be expected is an obligation of the supplier, therefore the result envisaged by the client depends on the information received and the client should be aware of the possibilities of achieving the desired result (SAP Cáceres, 24 September 2001, BDA JUR 2001\317424). The duty to transfer property is always a duty to achieve a result; the transferor is therefore liable for eviction, even if not aware of the lack of title.

IV.C.–2:107: Directions of the client

(1) The service provider must follow all timely directions of the client regarding the performance of the service, provided that the directions:

(a) are part of the contract itself or are specified in any document to which the contract refers; or

(b) result from the realisation of choices left to the client by the contract; or

(2) If non-performance of one or more of the obligations of the service provider under IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care) or IV.C.–2:106 (Obligation to achieve result) is the consequence of following a direction which the service provider is obliged to follow under paragraph (1), the service provider is not liable under those Articles, provided that the client was duly warned under IV.C.–2:108 (Contractual obligation of the service provider to warn).

(3) If the service provider perceives a direction falling under paragraph (1) to be a variation of the contract under IV.C.–2:109 (Unilateral variation of the service contract) the service provider must warn the client accordingly. Unless the client then revokes the direction without undue delay, the service provider must follow the direction and the direction has effect as a variation of the contract.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The client will generally translate wishes and needs into directions to be observed by the service provider when carrying out the service. These directions could involve the nomination of subcontractors, the selection of specified tools, materials, and components and the manner in which the service is to be performed, including the application of the tools, materials, and components through labour. They might contain functional requirements, specifying the outcome that will eventually have to result from the service process.

> Illustration 1
> A building constructor agrees to build a new office for an investment bank. The constructor receives instructions from the client to cover the walls of the meeting room of the bank's board of directors with 18 mm wooden panels (meranti), to be obtained from supplier X and to be fixed by means of contact glue of type Y by subcontractor Z.

Such directions will usually be laid down in the contract itself, or in the documents and drawings the contract refers to. Paragraph (1)(a) imposes an obligation on the service provider to follow these directions. It is also possible that the contract allows the client to issue such a binding direction at a later stage under paragraph (1)(b), by making a choice left to the client by the contract, or under paragraph (1)(c), following a choice that may be made by either party at a later stage (c).

Paragraph (1) further requires directions to be given reasonably and in good time. Whether a direction is so given depends on the circumstances of the case. The steps that have already been taken by the service provider for the purpose of performing the obligations under the contract will have to be taken into account.

If the service is carried out following the client's directions, it may happen that the result the client intends will eventually not be achieved. In that case the service provider's liability is to be established under paragraph (2) of the present Article, which follows the same principle underlying various other provisions of this Chapter dealing with similar forms of defective co-operation of the client. That principle accepts the liability of the client for defective co-operation in principle, subject to the exception of the service provider's failure to warn. An example of a case where a service provider failed to warn in this respect, is to be found in the following illustration:

> A supplier of computer networks is asked by a hospital to install a tailor-made network, following a design prepared on behalf of the hospital. The network as designed is fit for the purpose the hospital has in mind, namely to allow a maximum of 150 staff members to use the network at the same time. Whilst the installation service is carried out, the hospital instructs the supplier to make 250 workplaces throughout the hospital available for entering the network, without instructing the supplier to enlarge the access capacity of the network. When the network is completed, it shuts down 15 times a day due to an overload of simultaneous access attempts.

Some directions are refinements of choices already made in agreement between the parties.

> Illustration 3
> A garage agrees to paint the car of a customer yellow for a fixed price. Once the contract is concluded and the service is to be performed, the customer chooses from a range of colours the exact type of yellow.

A client who wishes to leave the framework of such choices is allowed to do so. But in that case, the rules on variation of the contract will apply, according to paragraph (3). This can be explained on the basis of a modification of Illustration 3.

> Illustration 4
> A garage agrees to paint the car of a customer yellow for a fixed price. When the car is being painted, the customer instructs the garage to paint a black horizontal banner on both sides of the car.

Given that there is often an imprecise borderline between a direction that is issued within the boundaries of the existing contractual framework on the one hand, and a direction, which is outside that framework on the other, the service provider has to warn the client if of the view that this borderline is crossed.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

One issue is whether a client ought to be allowed to give directions while the service process is already on its way. It could be argued that it is essential for the client to be able to do so. In some situations it will be impossible or impracticable to foresee every detail of both the service process and the result that is to be achieved through that process at the conclusion of the contract. Often it is much easier to take decisions about such details when the process is already on its way and the contours of the result are visibly present. Also, if it becomes clear that achievement of the result becomes a problem due to unexpected developments, which cannot be controlled by the service provider, the client will most likely want to be able to decide how the latter is to proceed with the service. Hence the client can contribute – by way of giving directions – to the achievement of a successful result.

But the downside of this is that directions may run contrary to the expectations of the service provider, who will have organised the work in accordance with the directions laid down in the contract itself and a reasonable interpretation of what is needed to accomplish the agreed outcome through the service. Directions may conflict with measures taken by the service provider, or even with the way parts of the result of the service have already been achieved.

Another issue involves the responsibility for any unfortunate consequences resulting from carrying out a direction. If the service provider observes a direction, which is incorrect or inconsistent with previous directions having regard to the result envisaged by the client, it is likely that the provider will not achieve that result. This means that directions might conflict with the obligations of the service provider under other Articles of this Chapter, and especially with the obligation to achieve the result which is imposed on some service providers. One might argue, as a general principle, that the client should presumably be responsible for the consequences of his directions to the service provider. In following these directions, the latter does nothing but perform the agreed obligations. But on the other hand, the service provider is in a much better position to assess the consequences of the directions given by the client. It is the provider who carries out the service, and who will usually have much more technical and other professional knowledge than the client. Channelling some of the responsibility to the service provider would therefore seem to be reasonable as well.

C. Preferred option

The present Article allows the client to give directions to the service provider in the course of the service process. The arguments set out in Comment B support this choice.

If a direction would lead to a change of the service, the service provider will have to notify the client of that, in order to trigger the operation of the rules under IV.C.–2:109 (Unilateral variation of the service contract) which might allow additional payment.

If the result of following an incorrect or inconsistent direction is that the service provider does not achieve the result envisaged by the client or otherwise fails to perform an obligation under the contract, the client may seek a remedy for the non-performance of the service provider's obligation. The service provider is then allowed to establish that the non-performance was caused by the incorrectness or inconsistency of the client's direction. The service provider will not be allowed to invoke the client's responsibility if the incorrectness or inconsistency of the direction was obvious to the provider or was actually discovered by the provider.

Mere selection by the client – through a direction – of generally adequate tools, materials, and components – whether or not to be obtained from a nominated subcontractor – which turn out to be unfit for their purpose in the particular case concerned due to an incidental production failure is not to be regarded as a direction which caused non-performance of the service provider's obligations. This can be explained by giving an illustration that is a further modification of Illustrations 3 and 4.

A garage agrees to paint the car of a customer yellow for a fixed price. The customer specifies the type and colour of the car paint to be supplied by the garage. This type of paint is generally suitable for painting cars. However, due to an incidental production failure, the garage buys a can of paint, which does not do the job properly.

The main reason why the client's specification cannot be considered to have caused the non-performance follows from the general idea that decisions of the client in these typical situations do not restrict the freedom of the service provider to select adequate tools, materials, or components. Moreover, the service provider will have remedies against the supplier. An exception to this principle could arise in the event that the input – unfit due to an incidental production failure – is to be obtained from a nominated subcontractor who then limits liability towards the service provider to a further extent than the limitation the latter can resort to under the contract with the client. The exception will particularly be needed if the service contract does not allow the service provider to object to the nomination.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. The service provider under a contract for work often has an obligation to follow directions given by the client in the course of the service process, whether or not the parties have agreed on the subject matter in express wording: AUSTRIA (CC § 1168a), BELGIUM, FRANCE, GERMANY (CC § 242), GREECE (CC art. 685), ITALY (CC art. 1661), THE NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 7:402(1), 7:754, 7:760(3)), POLAND (CC art. 641(2), PORTUGAL (CC art. 1208), SPAIN (in the context of construction services: Construction Act art. 11. Express wording in the contract on the obligation of the service provider is needed in ENGLAND, given the prevailing principle that the service provider has the responsibility of deciding how to perform the service (Clayton v. Woodman & Son Ltd. [1962] 2 QB 533). This latter principle is considered to be important elsewhere as well, but there seems less reluctance to allow the client to give directions in the course of the service process necessary for the appropriate performance of the contractual obligations, even if the contract is silent about this. SCOTTISH law has not given this matter much consideration except in the context of construction contracts (see Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 42), but would probably otherwise follow English law.
2. If the client supplies inadequate materials or directions to the service provider, as a result of which the latter does not perform the service in accordance with the express or implied terms of the contract, the service provider under a contract for work may in principle escape liability in AUSTRIA (CC § 1168a), BELGIUM, ENGLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY (CC § 645), GREECE (CC art. 691), ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS (CC art. 7:760(2) and (3)), POLAND (CC art. 641(2)) and PORTUGAL. This result may be altered if the service provider is in breach of an obligation to warn.

II. The obligation of the service provider to follow the client's directions

3. The obligation of the service provider to perform the service in accordance with instructions issued by the client follows indirectly from the AUSTRIAN CC § 1168a in the case of a contract for work.

4. If a service is supplied under a contract for work under BELGIAN law there is an obligation on the supplier to follow directions of the client (cf. Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 797 ff). This obligation only relates to instructions which are issued in time and within the framework of the contract, taking into account the characteristics of the service to be supplied, and having regard to the reasonable expectations of the service provider and the interests of both parties to the contract (Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 801-802).

5. In ENGLISH law the prevailing principle is that the service provider is free to decide how to perform the obligations under the contract. But the parties can word the contract so as oblige the service provider to follow the client's directions (Clayton v. Woodman & Sons Ltd. [1962] 1 WLR 585 (CA); cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 159-167, with regard to service contracts having as their object the construction or processing of immovable structures and movable things and with ample examples of express wording in standard forms of construction contracts).

6. Under FRENCH law, although the service provider is considered to have an independent responsibility as to how to carry out the service, the client is nevertheless allowed to give directions in the case of a contract for work (cf. Mazeaud, Principaux contrats[5], no. 1332; Jansen, Defects liability, p. 158).

7. The obligation of the service provider to follow the client's directions is undisputed in GERMAN law with respect to contracts for work (cf. BGH 25 January 1996, NJW 1996, 1346; Jansen, Defects liability, p. 159). The obligation is considered to be implied in the contract on the basis of the general provision of CC § 242 whenever this is necessary to ensure the appropriate performance of the service. The latter remains, however, the responsibility of the service provider. The service provider does not have to follow directions of the client if they are given after the conclusion of a contract for storage but may decide, within the framework of the express and implied contractual obligations, how to store the thing (cf., MünchKomm [-Hueffer], BGB, § 692 no. 2).

8. It follows from the GREEK CC art. 685 that the service provider owes an obligation towards the client to carry out the service in accordance with the client's directions in the case of a contract for work.

9. In ITALY, if the service is qualified as appalto, the obligation of the service provider to perform the service in accordance with the client's directions follows from ITALIAN CC art. 1661.

10. The obligation of the service provider to observe directions of the client under a contract for work follows indirectly from the DUTCH CC arts. 7:754 and 7:760(3)) and is generally accepted (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, p. 159). The obligation also exists in case the service is to be qualified as opdracht (cf. CC art. 7:402(1).). In the latter case the client must give directions in time and within the boundaries of the framework of the contract. The characteristics of the particular opdracht of the service provider may limit the obligation as well (Parl. Gesch. TM, InvW 7, p. 324), particularly if a direction would be in conflict with his professional ethics, professional codes of conduct and the independent position he may have to take towards the client (Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 61).

11. In this case the most relevant contract under POLISH law is the contract of specific work. According to the letter of the law, the way in which the contract is performed is in principle left to the service provider. However, the client has a right to control the method of performance – its correctness and accordance with the contract (CC art. 636(1)). As a rule the service provider is not bound by the client's instructions (Radwański [-Brzozowski], System Prawa Prywatnego VII[2], pp. 336-337). In practice however, the scope of the client's possibilities to interfere is normally wider.

Sometimes the possibility to give instructions is seen as an entitlement of the client (Radwański [-Brzozowski], System Prawa Prywatnego VII^2, p. 340).

12. In PORTUGAL the obligation of the service provider to follow the client's directions in case of services qualified as empreitada is considered to stem from CC art. 1208 (cf. CA Coimbra, 1 June 1993, BolMinJus 428, 689).

13. In SCOTLAND construction contracts normally give the client power to issue instructions through an architect or engineer, and so long as these are within the scope of the contract the service provider must comply. The authority to issue such instructions may be implied (see Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 42).

14. In SPAIN with respect to construction services, the obligation of the service provider to follow directions given by or on behalf of the client follows from Construction Act art. 11.

III. Effect of inadequate directions

15. According to AUSTRIAN CC § 1168a, the service provider is not liable in principle for the consequences of inadequate materials or instructions supplied by the client (cf. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I^2, § 1168a, no. 30).

16. If the supply of the service under a contract for work under BELGIAN law is delayed as a result of the client's instructions, the service provider is not liable in principle (cf. Goossens, Aanneming van werk, no. 801). The same applies if the client supplies inadequate materials (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, p. 423) or inadequate directions (Cass. 8 November 1974, Entr. et dr. 1976, p. 237, note P. Libert; cf. Jansen, Defects liability, p. 466).

17. If the client supplies inadequate materials or directions to the service provider, under ENGLISH law the latter will not generally be liable for non-performance (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 423 and 466, particularly with respect to services having as their object the construction or processing of immovable structures and movable things. See for instance Lynch v. Thorne [1956] 1 WLR 303. Nomination of subcontractors by the client may in particular circumstances enable the service provider to escape liability for non-performance: Gloucestershire County Council v. Richardson [1969] 1 AC 480 (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 453-458).

18. The supply by the client of inadequate materials to the provider of a service under a contract for work in FRENCH law has been considered as a ground for exculpation of the service provider (cf. Cass.civ. III, 17 July 1972, JCP 1973.II.17392), although it seems to follow from a later decision that the service provider must warrant the quality of the materials supplied by the client: cf. Cass.civ. III, 7 March 1990, Bull.civ. III, no. 69 and RD imm. 12(3) 1990, p. 375. Contrary to that decision is a later decision from the first chamber: Cass.civ. I, 20 June 1995, RD imm. 17(4) 1995, p. 751 (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 432-434). Inadequate directions by the client may also enable the service provider to escape liability, on the basis that the client's inadequate direction amounts to actual interference by a competent client. (Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 473 ff).

19. In GERMANY, the service provider will not be liable in principle for non-performance of a service under a contract for work if that non-performance is the consequence of the client's supply of inadequate materials or directions (cf. CC § 645; BGH 29 November 1971, NJW 1972, 447; Jansen, Defects liability, p. 423 and pp. 464-466). The mere nomination by the client of subcontractors is in itself not sufficient to enable the service provider to escape liability for non-performance (cf. BGH 14 March 1996, BauR 1996, p. 702; Jansen, Defects liability, p. 451).

20. The service provider under GREEK law is not, in principle, liable under a contract for work if non-performance is the result of carrying out the service in accordance with the client's inadequate directions or using inadequate materials supplied by the client (cf. CC art. 691).

21. If the service is qualified as appalto under ITALIAN law and if the service provider is bound to follow inadequate instructions of the client, the service provider will not in principle be liable for the consequences (cf. Cass. 28 May 1958, no. 1781, Foro it. Mass. 1958, c. 361).

22. In a contract for work under DUTCH law a non-performance as a consequence of inadequate materials supplied by the client will not lead to liability of the service provider in principle, following the rule of CC art. 7:760(2). This rule also applies if the non-performance is the consequence of the client's inadequate instructions (cf. CC art. 7:760(3); Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 423 and 466-467).

23. POLISH law clearly regulates this situation for the contract of specific work. First, the service provider has an obligation to immediately notify the client if the material delivered by the client is not suitable, or if there are any other circumstances, which may prevent the proper performance of the work (CC art. 634). Further, if the work is destroyed or damaged due to defects of the material delivered by the client or as a result of the work having been done in accordance with the client's instructions, the service provider may demand the agreed remuneration or its appropriate part for the work done, if the client has been warned of the danger of destruction or damage (CC art. 641(2)). There are similar rules specifically for building contracts. (CC arts. 651 and 655).

24. If the service is qualified as empreitada, under PORTUGUESE law, inadequate input by client, such as directions, tools and materials, may give rise to contributory negligence resulting in the exclusion or mitigation of the service provider's liability (cf. CA Porto, 21 January 1977, CJ, 1977, I, 73; Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 443; Sá Gomes, Breves notas sobre o cumprimento defeituoso na empreitada, 614). The service provider remains liable for the performance of subcontractors nominated by the client when these subcontractors are acting under the supervision of the service provider (cf. STJ 15 January 1992, BolMinJus, 413; Sá Gomes, Breves notas sobre o cumprimento defeituoso na empreitada, 1998, 615).

25. In SCOTTISH construction contract forms, failure of the contractor to comply with the client's lawful instructions enables the latter to get the work done by another at the contractor's expense (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 42).

IV.C.–2:108: Contractual obligation of the service provider to warn

(1) The service provider must warn the client if the service provider becomes aware of a risk that the service requested:

(a) may not achieve the result stated or envisaged by the client at the time of conclusion of the contract;

(b) may damage other interests of the client; or

(c) may become more expensive or take more time than agreed on in the contract either as a result of following information or directions given by the client or collected in preparation for performance, or as a result of the occurrence of any other risk.

(2) The service provider must take reasonable measures to ensure that the client understands the content of the warning.

(3) The obligation to warn in paragraph (1) does not apply if the client:

(a) already knows of the risks referred to in paragraph (1); or

(b) could reasonably be expected to know of them.

(4) If a risk referred to in paragraph (1) materialises and the service provider did not perform the obligation to warn the client of it, a notice of variation by the service provider under IV.C.–2:109 (Unilateral variation of the service contract) based on the materialisation of that risk is without effect.

(5) For the purpose of paragraph (1), the service provider is presumed to be aware of the risks mentioned if they should be obvious from all the facts and circumstances known to the service provider without investigation.

(6) For the purpose of paragraph (3)(b), the client cannot reasonably be expected to know of a risk merely because the client was competent, or was advised by others who were competent, in the relevant field, unless such other person acted as the agent of the client, in which case II.–1:105 (Imputed knowledge etc.) applies.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article imposes a contractual obligation to warn on the service provider which is very similar to the duty under IV.C.–2:102 (Pre-contractual duties to warn). The obligation is supplemented by the obligation in paragraph (2) to take reasonable measures to ensure that the client understands the content of the warning. A warning is writing is generally not required. Which measures are adequate depends on the circumstances of the case.

Again, the obligation to warn relates to typical risks which might occur in the course of the service and which would go to the very heart of the contract. The risks are identified in paragraph (1). The service provider will only have to warn on becoming aware of the risks but will not be under an obligation to warn if the client already knows of the risks or could reasonably be expected to know of them. That principle is reflected in paragraph (3) in conjunction with (5) and (6). Under paragraph (5) the service provider is presumed to be aware of the risks mentioned if they should be obvious from all the facts and circumstances known to the service provider without investigation.

The obligation under the present Article differs from the pre-contractual duty to warn. The extent of the pre-contractual duty to warn is dependent on risks that are obvious or actually discovered by the service provider, given the information the service provider ought to have collected in order to make an informed offer to the client as regards the service that can be supplied. The information to be collected by the service provider particularly relates to the relevant wishes and needs of the client, as well as to important circumstances in which the service is to be performed. It may very well be the case that such information – prior to the conclusion of the contract – will not give rise to a duty to warn under IV.C.–2:102 (Pre-contractual duties to warn) paragraph (1). The reason for that may be that the risks are neither obvious nor discovered in the process of preparing an offer for the required service. But they may subsequently become obvious or may even be actually discovered after the conclusion of the contract, for two reasons.

One reason could be that the service provider will now have to look at the information, supplied before the conclusion of the contract, from a different perspective. That perspective is no longer the preparation of an offer, but the actual carrying out of the service in order to achieve the result envisaged by the client. Risks that were previously undetected, could now become obvious, particularly if the service provider collects additional information as part of the performance of the service. Another reason could be that the client has supplied additional information, directions, permits or licenses after the conclusion of the contract. If the service provider analyses these additional data in the context of the information previously supplied, the risks might become obvious or might be actually discovered.

Having regard to the purpose of the analysis of the information and directions sketched out above, the service provider is not bound to actually check whether observing the information or directions might give rise to one or more of the risks referred to in paragraph (1) but should be normally attentive given the purpose of the analysis. That principle is reflected in paragraph (5).

If the service provider does not perform the obligations under paragraphs (1) and (2) leading to the occurrence of one of the risks mentioned in paragraph (1)(a) or (b), the client may resort to the normal remedies under Book III, Chapter 3. In addition to the client's right to resort to these remedies, paragraph (4) of the present Article contains a further rule protecting the client, in the event that the failure to warn results in the risk mentioned in paragraph (1)(c). That rule is particularly relevant if payment of either a fixed price or a fee based on a no result, no pay-basis was agreed at the time of conclusion of the contract. It prevents the service provider from claiming compensation for the extra cost incurred, as well as an extension of time, under the following Article.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The main issue is whether an obligation to warn is to be imposed on a service provider at all. It could be argued that the service provider should only have to act in conformity with the client's wishes and specifications stated at the time of conclusion of the contract, and with other directions supplied by the client. The argument would be that the service provider should respect the wishes of the client and live up to freely assumed contractual obligations. On the other hand, it could be argued that the service provider is in a much better position than the client to discover mistakes in the client's directions. Before carrying out the service, the provider will normally have to analyse the client's wishes in order to determine what exactly has to be done. The same will go for directions issued later on. In doing so, the provider might discover all sorts of gaps, ambiguities, inconsistencies, and mistakes which might cause problems if they were followed without clarification or correction in advance.

Warning the client in such situations will hardly impose extra costs on the service provider. It may even be beneficial, given that it would prevent future disputes.

This leads to a second issue. What should trigger the obligation to warn, having regard to the content of the information and directions either supplied by the client or collected by the service provider? Is a mere gap, an ambiguity or a similar form of uncertainty sufficient to give rise to the obligation? Or should the obligation require some inconsistency or incorrectness? An argument for accepting an obligation to warn in the first situation is that the ambiguity or uncertainty brings about the need for a choice, and that it will not be much of an effort for the service provider to consult the client before taking the decision. On the other hand, it would be highly impractical for the service provider to have to consult the client on every choice to be made in the course of the service process. This would also be inconsistent with the system of the preceding Article, which gives both the service provider and the client the possibility to make such choices. So that would be an argument not to accept an obligation to warn in case of a mere gap as to the content of the information or directions.

A third issue is how attentive the service provider should be in analysing the information and instructions, in order to be able to signal a problem that gives rise to an obligation to warn. Is it necessary to focus on gaps, ambiguities, inconsistencies, and mistakes? Is it necessary to search for them? An argument against that proposition would be that an obligation to inform is more costly when the service provider is expected to actively search for possible problems in the information and directions. On the other hand, in many cases the client would be better off if the service provider had such an extended obligation and better able to take advantage of the latter's expertise. But the service provider will not know where gaps or mistakes may be hidden and such a more extensive obligation will therefore be an important burden.

Another issue is whether there should be an obligation to warn if the client already knows of the problem or if the service provider believes that the client already knows of the problem, for instance because the client is more competent than the average client, or is assisted by someone else who has – or is deemed to have – the capacity of a professional and competent adviser. Imposing an obligation to warn on the service provider would then not only be unnecessary but would also become very costly for the client. But a choice has to be made between an unnecessary warning and the occurrence of a risk that is not discovered in time. In general, the costs of a warning will be insignificant in comparison with the costs of coping with any risk which occurs.

C. Preferred option

The present Article imposes an obligation to warn on the provider of a service. The arguments for doing this have been addressed in Comment B. This obligation has a firm basis in the jurisdictions that have been investigated. (See the Notes below.)

The obligation is triggered by inconsistencies in the information or directions supplied by the client, if it is expected that following the information or directions might lead to a risk that would go to the very heart of the contract from the client's perspective.

The system chosen in most countries is that the service provider only has to warn for inconsistencies actually discovered or for other obvious inconsistencies. This system is attractive because it imposes no extra costs on the service provider. A diligent service provider will have to examine the client's information and directions carefully, because they are the very basis for the service. Inconsistencies that will not escape attention when the information and directions are studied as thoroughly as is necessary to carry them out have to be mentioned to the client. Any active inspection aimed at discovering inconsistencies is therefore not required.

Paragraph (5) provides that the service provider is presumed to be aware of the risks mentioned if they should be obvious from all the facts and circumstances known to the service provider without investigation. The approach adopted here is similar to the concept of 'reason to know' acknowledged in American law (see: Restatement (2nd) Contracts § 19, comment b) where it is clarified as follows. A person has reason to know a fact, if the person has information from which a reasonable person would infer that the fact does or will exist based on all the circumstances, including the overall context and ordinary expectations. 'Reason to know' must be distinguished from knowledge. Knowledge means an actual conscious belief in or awareness of a fact. Reason to know need not entail a conscious belief in or awareness of the existence of the fact or its probable existence in the future. Reason to know is also to be distinguished from 'should know'. 'Should know' imports an obligation to ascertain facts; the term 'reason to know' does not entail or assume an obligation to investigate, but is determined solely by the information available to the party. Under American law, the amount of knowledge expected from the service provider depends on the situation. The person is charged with commercial knowledge of any factors in a particular transaction that in common understanding or ordinary practice are to be expected, including reasonable expectations from usage of trade and course of dealing and widespread business practice. If a person has specialised knowledge or superior intelligence, reason to know is determined in the light of whether a reasonable person with that knowledge or intelligence would draw the inference that the fact does or will exist.

The same approach is adopted for the purpose of establishing whether the client's competence or knowledge is such as to negate the obligation to warn under paragraph (3) in conjunction with (6). The latter provision gives an additional clarification on the question whether, and to what extent, the client can reasonably be expected to know of a risk merely because the client was competent, or was advised by others who were competent, in the relevant field. The principle underlying the rule is that mere competence of the client is insufficient to support the prima facie conclusion that the client can reasonably be expected to know of a risk. The same goes for the situation where someone else advises the client. Mere competence of that other person does not automatically lead to the conclusion that the client can reasonably be expected to know of the risk. This is particularly to protect the interests of SME's and consumers who are – often for free – advised by family or friends. The situation becomes different, however, if a client specifically hires a professional adviser for the specific purpose of acting as an agent under the service contract. Any knowledge or competence of such agent will be imputed to the client under paragraph (6) in conjunction with II.–1:105 (Imputed knowledge etc) and this could then negate the obligation to warn of the service provider under paragraph (3).

The burden of proving that the service provider has an obligation to warn is eased to some extent by the presumption in paragraph (5).

This Article contains default rules in principle. However, given the character of the obligation to warn and its basis in good faith, one should not interpret a service contract too easily in the sense that the client has renounced the protection granted under the obligation to warn. It should be noted that the underlying duty of good faith and fair dealing under III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing) cannot be excluded or restricted by contract.

D. Remedies

If the obligation to warn is not performed and the service does not achieve the required result (paragraph (1)(a) there are in fact two obligations the service provider failed to perform: (1) the main obligation and (2) the ancillary obligation under this Article. With regard to the main obligation, the client's supply of incorrect or inconsistent information or directions will normally prevent resort to any remedy because the client will have caused the non-performance. However, in the present situation the client's act is not the only cause of the unfortunate end-result. A secondary cause is the service provider's failure to warn. This justifies the conclusion that the client's remedies remain available. Non-performance of the service provider's main obligation is not excused under III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment) because the impediment was not beyond the service provider's control: a warning could and should have been given. With regard to the non-performance of the service provider's ancillary obligation to warn, the only reason why the client would probably want to claim a remedy on this basis is to obtain damages. Such a claim will be barred, however, if the client also claims damages on the basis of the non-performance of the service provider's main obligation. The client could not claim double compensation.

If the service provider does not perform the obligation to warn and the risk of paragraph (1)(b) occurs – other interests of the client are damaged – a claim for non-performance of the service provider's main obligation would not provide relief to the client. The client could however seek a remedy for non-performance of the obligation to warn. The main remedy will be damages. In that case the client's supply of incorrect or inconsistent information or directions could be regarded as a contribution to the non-performance or its effects and might therefore reduce the damages payable. (III.–3:704 (Loss attributable to creditor))

Finally, if the service provider fails to warn and the risk referred to in paragraph (1)(c) occurs – the service becomes more expensive or may take more time to perform than agreed on in the contract – the client will not be the one seeking a remedy. In practice it will be the service provider who will try to seek compensation for the loss, particularly if the service was to be performed for a fixed price or on a no result, no pay basis. This is the type of situation for which the rule of paragraph (4) is stated, although the rule is also relevant when the service provider failed to warn for the possible occurrence of any other risk mentioned in paragraph (1). The rule of paragraph (4) prevents the service provider from seeking compensation under IV.C.–2:109 (Unilateral variation of the service contract). It is similar to its pre-contractual counterpart under IV.C.–2:102 (Pre-contractual duties to warn). The difference is, however, that when the service provider fails to warn under IV.C.–2:102, a claim for compensation for extra cost and extension of time is still available under IV.C.–2:109 if the service provider proves that the client would have entered into the contract, even if aware of the risk in question. A similar rule has not been adopted in paragraph (4) of the present Article, given that it is intended for the situation where the contract has already been concluded

The rule therefore is that paragraph (4) stops the service provider from claiming compensation of cost and extension of time under IV.C.–2:109 (Unilateral variation of service contract) if extra cost and delay are indeed the consequence of a failure to warn under paragraphs (1) and (2). But there is always the alternative possibility that the service provider tries to claim damages directly for the client's non-performance of the obligation to co-operate. Here, however, the service provider's claim would be affected by the rule of III.–3:704 (Loss attributable to creditor), given that the service provider's failure to warn contributed to the effects of the client's non-performance of the obligation to co-operate. In order to get to a solution that is consistent with the application of the rule under paragraph (4) of the present Article, it would be logical to apply the rule of III–3:704 to the detriment of the service provider.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. Case law and textbooks dealing with contracts for the supply of services generally acknowledge the importance of this ancillary obligation. Its relevance is particularly recognised if the client asked for a service specifically tailored to the client's wishes and needs – especially when they are abundant, detailed, and technical – and more particularly if the result envisaged by the client greatly depends on the control of the interrelationship between these wishes and needs, the solution devised by the service provider to meet these needs, and the circumstances in which that solution is to be applied in order to achieve the result required. This explains why the obligation to warn is considered to be particularly relevant in construction contracts and design contracts. Its relevance is further recognised in the framework of contracts for the processing or storage of a thing, information contracts, or treatment contracts, to the extent that the above characteristics are present. It is less relevant in contracts concerning a rather standardised processing, storage, information, or treatment service.

2. The obligation to warn of the service provider follows from the general obligation to carry out the service with reasonable care and skill in all countries investigated. This means that the obligation can be seen as a particularisation of (IV.C.–2:105 Obligation of skill and care) and the reader is referred to the notes on that provision. In some countries, however, the obligation can additionally be found in specific provisions, particularly those on contracts for work: AUSTRIA (CC § 1168a), FINLAND (Consumer Protection Act, Chapter on Certain Consumer Services Contracts, chap. 8 § 14), GREECE (CC arts. 685, 691 and 699), ITALY (CC art. 1663), THE NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 7:752(2), 7:753(3), 7:754 and 7:755), POLAND (CC arts. 634, 641(2) and 651), SPAIN (CC art. 1590). The obligation to warn can also be seen as an aspect of the general duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing stated in III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing). In all countries investigated, the obligation to warn the client is owed whenever the inadequacy of materials or directions supplied by the client should be obvious to the service provider, given the expertise that may be expected from the service provider. Expertise of the client is not relevant for the purpose of establishing the obligation to warn in concrete cases: Austria, ENGLAND, FRANCE, Germany, Greece, The Netherlands.

3. A service provider who fails to perform the obligation to warn is liable to the client for the consequences of that failure. The supply of inadequate materials or directions may, however, give rise to contributory negligence of the client in AUSTRIA, ENGLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY, GREECE, PORTUGAL and THE NETHERLANDS, in which case the expertise of the client can be a relevant factor: France, The Netherlands.

II. The contractual obligation to warn

4. In a contract for work in AUSTRIAN law the service provider has an obligation to warn the client following CC § 1168a. It is stated in this Article that the obligation is owed in case of obvious defects in the material furnished by the client or obviously incorrect directions issued by the client. The criterion of 'obvious' has to be assessed in the light of CC § 1299 (cf. Klang [-Adler and Höller], ABGB V[3], § 1168a, nos. 407 ff.; JBl 1966, 562, JBl 1987, 44, 622). The service provider will only have to analyse the client's input to the extent that this is justified by economic considerations, given that the criterion points to an easy-to-establish inadequacy for experts (Iro, ÖJZ 1983, 505, 507; Illustration JBl 1973, 151). The obligation to warn does not cease to exist if the client is to be seen as an expert (Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], § 1168a, no. 32).

5. In a contract for work under BELGIAN law the service provider owes an obligation to the client to warn if the latter supplies inadequate materials or directions. This obligation emanates from the obligation to perform the service with reasonable care and skill (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 290-291; Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 872 ff). The obligation only exists if the inadequate input from the client should have been obvious to a competent service provider (cf. Trib.Anvers, 12 February 1970, RW 1969-1970, col 1393; Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 299-301).

6. The obligation to warn of the provider of services under ENGLISH law stems from the implied obligation of any service provider to carry out the service with reasonable care and skill (cf. Duncan v. Blundell (1820) 3 Stark 6, 171 ER 749; Pearce v. Tucker (1862) 3 F & F 136, 176 ER 61; Brunswick Construction Ltd. v. Nowlan (1983) 21 Build LR 27; Lindenberg v. Canning (1993) 9 Const LJ 43; Worlock v. SAWS and Rushmoor Borough Council (1982) 22 BLR 66 (CA); Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 288-289). The obligation is imposed where it would have been obvious to a competent service provider that the service could not be carried out properly as a result of the inadequate input supplied by the client (cf. Lindenberg v. Canning (1993) 9 Const LJ 43), although additional expertise of the service provider is considered to be relevant as well (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 300-301). No suggestion was found in the relevant cases that the client's expertise is a factor to be taken into account when determining whether or not an obligation to warn exists.

7. Under the FINNISH ConsProtA chap. 8 § 14 the service provider must without delay inform the client if the service is likely to be considerably more expensive than would reasonably be accepted or evidently not appropriate from the client's point of view.

8. In FRANCE, if the contract is one for work, the service provider must warn the client if the latter supplies inadequate materials or directions. This obligation stems from the obligation of the service provider to perform the service with reasonable care and skill (cf. Cass.civ. III, 5 June 1968, D. 1970, p. 453, note Jestaz; Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], nos. 750 ff; Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 290-291). The obligation is owed whenever inadequate input from the client should have been obvious to a competent service provider (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 300-301), irrespective of the client's expertise (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, p. 302).

9. Under GERMAN law the service provider owes an obligation to warn the client if the client supplies inadequate materials and directions. The obligation is said to follow from the general obligation of the service provider to carry out the service with reasonable care and skill (Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 291-292). The service provider will have to warn whenever inadequate input from the client should have been obvious to a competent service provider (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 300-301). The client's expertise is not relevant in this respect (cf. BGH 10 July 1975, BauR 1975, p. 420; Jansen, Defects liability, p. 302).

10. It follows from the GREEK CC arts. 685, 691 and 699 that the service provider owes an obligation to the client under a contract for work to warn if the client supplies inadequate materials or instructions, provided that the inadequacy is objectively detectable. The fact that the client, or any professional assisting the client, should or could have noticed the inadequacy, does not release the service provider from the obligation to warn.

11. It follows from the ITALIAN CC art. 1663 that, in case of services qualified as appalto, the service provider must warn the client if the latter supplies inadequate materials. Following the general obligation of the service provider to carry out the service with the required care and skill, the service provider owes an obligation to warn with respect to any inadequate input from the client in the service process which the service provider should have noticed taking into account the service provider's expertise and diligence (cf. Voltaggio Lucchesi, Giust.civ. 1959, I, p. 1780; Trib. Torino, 24 August 1979, Rep.Foro it., 1980, V° Appalto).

12. The obligation of the service provider under a contract for work in DUTCH law developed from the general obligation to carry out the service with reasonable care and skill (cf. Van den Berg, Samenwerkingsvormen in de bouw, no. 69; Asser (-Kortmann), Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 537; Jansen, Defects liability, p. 285; HR 25 November 1994, NedJur 1995, 154 (Bouwbedrijf Stokkers/Vegt Vloeren)). The obligation has recently been enacted in CC art. 7:754 which states that the service provider must warn the client in the course of the service about any errors in the contract, in so far as the provider knew or should have known of these errors. When applying the latter criterion, the expertise of the client is deemed to be irrelevant (cf. HR 18 September 1998, NedJur 1998, 818 (KPI/Leba)). Relevant factors are, however, the obviousness of the inadequacy of the input of the client, given the required intensity of the analysis of that input and given the expertise that may be expected from, or is claimed by, the service provider (cf. Asser (-Kortmann), Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 538). The service provider is not under an obligation to warn if the client has the same knowledge as the service provider with respect to facts that are considered relevant for the obligation and if the client, although supported by an expert and despite this knowledge, failed to carry out any further investigation that ought to have been undertaken on the basis of these facts (cf. HR 8 October 2004, JOL 2004, 506). The obligation to warn stated in CC art. 7:754 covers inadequacies in materials supplied by the client, as well as errors or defects in plans, drawings, calculations and instructions provided by the client for the purpose of performance of the service. Additional obligations to warn about price risks are further stated in CC arts. 7:752(2), 7:753(3) and 7:755. The obligation to warn is also imposed on the service provider in case the service is qualified as opdracht and follows from the general obligation to carry out the service with reasonable care and skill (cf. CC art. 7:401).

13. In a contract for work under POLISH law, the service provider's obligation to warn the client about the supply of inadequate materials follows from CC art. 634. Likewise, the service provider owes an obligation to warn in case inadequate directions are issued by the client: cf. CC art. 641(2) and the decision of the Supreme Court 22 April 1986 (II CR 531/80, OSNCP 1981, z. 9, poz. 174. A similar obligation exists under building contracts (CC art. 651).

14. If the service is qualified as empreitada, under PORTUGUESE law, the service provider owes an obligation to the client to warn in case of inadequate materials or directions supplied by the latter. This obligation follows from the general obligation to carry out the service with reasonable case and skill (cf. Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], nos. 354 and 443; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado II[3], 796 art. 4).

15. In SCOTLAND as in England the obligation of the service provider to warn stems from the implied obligation of any service provider to carry out the service with reasonable care and skill, although there is not much Scottish case law on the point (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.37; Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 35; Wagner Associates v Joseph Dunn (Bottlers) Ltd 1986 SLT 267). In the construction context, the contractor must comply with the requirements of the contract, and it is not usually the contractor's concern that the building may be completely unsuitable for the employer's purposes (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts', para. 34).

16. In SPAIN the service provider's obligation to warn follows from the general obligation to carry out the service with reasonable care and skill (cf. CC art. 1258 and several decisions of the Supreme Court: TS 14 June 1976, RJ 1976/2753; TS 27 January 1977, RJ 1977/121; TS 14 November 1984, RJ 1984/5554). A specific obligation to warn in a contract for work follows from CC art. 1590 if the client supplies inadequate materials. The obligation is owed in the event of obvious inadequacy given the diligence which can be required from the service provider (cf. F. Martinez Mas, La recepción en el contrato de obra, p. 20).

III. Consequences in case of breach of the obligation to warn

17. In AUSTRIA the service provider is liable for failure to warn the client about the consequences of the supply of inadequate tools or materials (CC § 1168a). But under certain circumstances the liability of the service provider can be reduced on the basis of contributory negligence on the part of the client (Iro, ÖJZ 1983, 505, 510 ff).

18. If the service provider fails to warn under a contract for work under BELGIAN law, the consequences of carrying out the service on the basis of inadequate materials or directions supplied by the client will be attributed to the service provider entirely (Cass. 15 December 1995, Entr. et dr. 1997, p. 177, particularly at 195 in fine. Cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 487-488).

19. Under ENGLISH law, following less recent case law, the consequences of the service provider's failure to warn are attributed to the latter in their entirety (cf. Duncan v. Blundell (1820) 3 Stark 6, 171 ER 749; Pearce v. Tucker (1862) 3 F & F 137; Brunswick Construction Ltd. v. Nowlan (1983) 21 Build LR 27). More recent case law, however, allows the service provider to raise contributory negligence of the client as a defence, in the event that the client's inadequate directions have contributed to the occurrence of the non-performance (cf. Lindenberg v. Canning (1993) 9 Const LJ 43). This latter approach is also supported by The Law Commission, Contributory negligence as a defence in contract, no. 219, para. 3.41, p. 23 and para. 4.15(4), p. 34; cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 502 ff.

20. Under the FINNISH ConsProtA chap. 8 § 14 the service is considered defective if the contractor fails in the duties to warn.

21. Under a contract for work in FRENCH law the consequences of carrying out the service on the basis of inadequate materials or directions supplied by the client will be attributed to the service provider entirely (cf. Cass.civ. III, 19 March 1969, Bull.civ. III, no. 243; Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 486-489). However, if the service provider failed to warn a client known to be competent, it is possible to mitigate the damages claim of the client on the basis of contributory negligence (Cass.civ. I, 2 July 1991, Bull.civ. I, no. 228; Cass.civ. III, 20 November 1991, Bull.civ. III, no. 284; Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 498 ff).

22. Under GERMAN law, the service provider is liable for failing to warn the client and thereby causing the service not to be performed in accordance with the contract (CC §§ 633, 645). But the service provider's liability can be mitigated on the basis of the client's contributory negligence (CC § 254) given the latter's inadequate input in the service process, unless the service provider actually knew this would lead to non-performance of the service (cf. BGH 18 January 1973, NJW 1973, p. 518; Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 491-493). It is undisputed that damages and costs that would have incurred anyhow, must be borne by the client (cf. BGH 29 October 1970, BauR 1971, 60).

23. A service provider who fails to perform the obligation to warn under a contract for work in GREEK law is liable to the client for the consequences. The provider may, however, fall back on the rule of CC art. 300 and raise the client's contributory negligence, given the fact that the client contributed to the damage by supplying inadequate materials or directions.

24. Under ITALIAN law, the service provider is liable to the client for the consequences of a failure to warn (cf. Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, Mangini, Il contratto di appalto[2], p. 134; Voltaggio Lucchesi, Giust.civ 1959, I, p. 1780; Trib. Torino, 24 August 1979, Rep.Foro it., 1980, V° Appalto).

25. Failure to perform the obligation to warn under the DUTCH CC art. 7:754 will invoke the service provider's liability towards the client. It follows from an obiter dictum in HR 18 September 1998, NedJur 1998, 818 (KPI/Leba) that the service provider, in order to mitigate the claim for damages, may bring up contributory negligence of the client (cf. CC art. 6:101) consisting of the supply of inadequate materials, plans or directions. It is at this stage that the expertise of the client is to be taken into account. It is generally accepted that damages and costs which would have been incurred anyhow must be borne by the client (Jansen, De toepassing van de "Sowiesokostenregel" door de Raad van Arbitrage voor de Bouw, p. 253). Failure to perform the obligations to warn stated in CC art. 7:752(2), CC art. 7:753(3) and CC art. 7:755 will prevent the service provider from claiming payment of the extra costs incurred.

26. In POLISH law the service provider is liable to the client for the consequences of a failure to warn: cf. CC arts. 634 and 641(2) and the decision of the Supreme Court, 22 of April 1986 (II CR 531/80, OSNCP 1981, z. 9, poz. 174.

27. Under PORTUGUESE law the service provider is liable to the client for the consequences of failure to perform the obligation to warn, although inadequate input provided by the latter may give rise to contributory negligence, resulting in the exclusion or mitigation of the service provider's liability (cf. CA Porto, 21 January 1977, CJ, 1977, I, 73; Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 443; Sá Gomes, Breves notas sobre o cumprimento defeituoso na empreitada, p. 614).

28. There is no SCOTTISH case law on this subject, and the courts would probably be inclined to follow the relevant English law (above).

29. The service provider must bear the consequences of failure to warn under SPANISH law. This follows particularly from CC art. 1590 in case of failure to warn for the inadequacy of materials supplied by the client under a contract for work.

IV.C.–2:109: Unilateral variation of the service contract

(1) Without prejudice to the client's right to terminate under IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate), either party may, by notice to the other party, change the service to be provided, if such a change is reasonable taking into account:

(a) the result to be achieved;
(b) the interests of the client;
(c) the interests of the service provider; and
(d) the circumstances at the time of the change.

(2) A change is regarded as reasonable only if it is:

(a) necessary in order to enable the service provider to act in accordance with IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care) or, as the case may be, IV.C.–2:106 (Obligation to achieve result);
(b) the consequence of a direction given in accordance with paragraph (1) of IV.C.–2:107 (Directions of the client) and not revoked without undue delay after receipt of a warning in accordance with paragraph (3) of that Article;
(c) a reasonable response to a warning from the service provider under IV.C.–2:108 (Contractual obligation of the service provider to warn); or
(d) required by a change of circumstances which would justify a variation of the service provider's obligations under III.–1:110 (Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances).

(3) Any additional price due as a result of the change has to be reasonable and is to be determined using the same methods of calculation as were used to establish the original price for the service.

(4) In so far as the service is reduced, the loss of profit, the expenses saved and any possibility that the service provider may be able to use the released capacity for other purposes are to be taken into account in the calculation of the price due as a result of the change.

(5) A change of the service may lead to an adjustment of the time of performance proportionate to the extra work required in relation to the work originally required for the performance of the service and the time span determined for performance of the service.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The performance of the obligations under a service contract frequently extends over a long period of time. Often it becomes apparent that the terms of the contract no longer fit the changing situation. There may be unforeseen difficulties which have to be worked around. The client's needs and wishes may change. The parties can always change the terms of the contract by agreement but in the particular context of a service contract there may be a need for some unilateral power to change the service provider's obligations, subject to an equitable adjustment of the price and other relevant terms. This Article deals with this situation. It enables either party to change the terms relating to the service to be provided and, in effect, requires the other party to accept that change. However, as a unilateral power to change the terms of a contract is a potentially powerful and undesirable weapon, there are stringent restrictions built into the article.

The situation which arises when a service provider wishes to change the service is similar to the situation of benevolent intervention but differs in that the service provider may be acting largely in the service provider's own interests. Also, the contract sets an initial framework which has to be taken into account.

The client has several protections under the Article. First, the change must be reasonable. In determining whether it is reasonable, paragraph (1) states that the interests of both parties need to be weighed and balanced. Secondly, a client who is not willing to accept a change may walk away from the contract in any event using the right to terminate under IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate). This is made clear by the opening words of paragraph (1). The client is also protected from variations due to circumstances of which the service provider ought to have given a pre-contractual warning. See paragraph (3) of IV.C.–2:102 (Pre-contractual duties to warn). Finally, the client is protected by the restricted definition in paragraph (2) of what is regarded as reasonable.

The interests of the service provider who objects to a change are protected by the reasonableness requirement and are further protected by the provisions of paragraphs (3), (4), and (5) as explained below.

Paragraph (2) identifies various situations in which a change of the contract is regarded as reasonable.

Paragraph (2)(a) deals with the situation where the service provider is prevented from performing the main obligation under the contract at all due to a cause that has nothing to do with the failure of either party to perform a duty or obligation prior to or after the conclusion of the contract.

> Illustration 1
> An engineer is ordered to repair the defective part of a conveyor belt. The purpose of the job is clearly to get the conveyor belt moving again. While performing the service, the engineer discovers that the repair of the specific part will not bring the conveyor belt back into operation, given that another part of the belt is defective as well. When the parties entered into the contract, however, they did not agree on the repair of this other defective part. Moreover, this latter defect was not something that could be expected to be noticed by the engineer at the time of conclusion of the contract. Repair of the second defect will cost extra and also delay the service. The engineer may change the service and repair the other defective part.

Paragraph (2)(b) identifies a second situation in which a change of the contract by the service provider is regarded as reasonable. If the client gives the service provider a direction which would lead to a variation of the contract, the service provider must warn the client that that would be the result. If the client does not revoke the direction, the service provider may vary the contract accordingly and the variation is deemed to be reasonable.

> A real estate agent is asked by a growing law firm to find a suitable office building in the area of Berlin. The law firm would like to locate itself within a maximum distance of 5 kilometres from the German capital. After a few weeks, the firm directs the agent to look for a possible location 'in either Berlin, Munich or Frankfurt'. The agent informs the law firm that this sudden switch of preference will lead to an increase in the required search activities, and that it will cost extra to carry out the adjusted service. The client does not revoke the direction. The agent may vary the contract accordingly.

A third situation is the one referred to in paragraph (2)(c). The client may need to initiate a change of the contract in response to a risk about which the service provider has given a warning. In so far as that change is a reasonable response to the warning, it is deemed to be a reasonable variation of the terms of the contract.

A geo-technical surveyor is asked by a client to investigate the subsoil conditions of a piece of land which the client would like to use for the erection of a building. The client designates the exact area to be investigated. While performing the investigation, the surveyor discovers the presence of a small stream below the surface of the land investigated. The origin of the stream is located somewhere outside the area designated for investigation. The surveyor warns the client that further investigation of the stream is needed in order to find out its effects on a possible future building. This further investigation, however, is outside the scope of the present service contract. Hence the client expands the surveyor's task under the contract. That is deemed to be a reasonable variation.

There is a fourth situation in which a change of the contract is deemed to be reasonable. This is where there has been a change of circumstances which would justify a variation of the service provider's obligations under III.–1:110 (Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances). The reference to this Article is made in order to provide flexibility while preventing the service provider from shifting all kinds of risks to the client – besides the ones that fall within the boundaries of the situations already described above. It has to be established that performance of the contractual obligations has become excessively onerous because of a change of circumstances which should not be for the service provider's account.

All the situations set out above are subject to paragraphs (3), (4), and (5) of the present Article, providing rules for the consequences of a reasonable change of the contract.

Paragraphs (3) and (4) deal with adjustment of the price. The rule of paragraph (3) basically states that the new price has to be reasonable and has to be calculated in accordance with the method used to determine the original price. A change of a contract may result in either an increase or a decrease of the price. If the change of the contract would lead to extra work for the service provider, the remuneration would increase accordingly. In addition, it has to be taken into account that the service provider may have other than financial interests at stake, for instance because there are contracts with other clients and insufficient time and staff to perform the extra work that results from the change. If the change of the contract implies a reduction of the service, the rule of paragraph (4) states that the parties will have to take into account the expenses spared as a result of the reduction, the loss of profit for the service provider, and the options the service provider has available to use earning capacity otherwise.

Paragraph (5) deals with the consequences of the change of the contract on the time for performance, if the change results in an increase of the work to be performed under the contract. An extension of time will then have to be granted to the service provider to the extent that extra time is needed to carry out the changed service, taking into account the time for performance agreed upon for the initial service.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

A change of the service to be supplied under a service contract is a frequently occurring situation. Changes initiated by the client are usually not a problem, provided that the service provider gives a warning to the client as regards the consequences of such initiatives.

Changes of the service become an issue, however, if they are rooted in undesired circumstances that are outside the control of the parties. One could question whether it is then desirable to have a rule that forces either the one party or the other to accept the change of the service. The alternative would be to leave changes to the agreement of the parties. The main objection to a unilateral power to vary is of course that a forced change of the service could lead to a non-voluntary change of the mutual obligations under the contract. On the other hand, if these obligations have become unbalanced due to the event that gives rise to the change of the service, general contract law does not oppose the changing of the contract, provided that this is done having regard to concepts of fairness and reasonableness.

This brings up the related issue whether it is necessary to have a separate rule for service contracts stating that a change of circumstances in accordance with III.–1:110 (Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances) is deemed to justify a unilateral change of the service, allowing the service provider to ask for extra payment and extension of time under paragraphs (3), (4), and (5) of the present Article. One could argue that such a rule is not needed, given that III.–1:110 already provides a solution. On the other hand, one could argue that the latter provision needs particularisation in the context of service contracts, especially since III.–1:110 would require the party instigating the change to rely on the courts, which would have discretionary powers here. This is rather impractical in the case of a service contract which is already being performed.

C. Preferred option

It is thought wise to have a rule that allows for unilateral variation of the service in a number of situations, provided that the power to vary is limited and that the interests of the parties are kept in balance. The rules of the Article try to do this. The interests of the client in particular are safeguarded by the various restrictions built into the Article. It is worth bearing in mind that the client always has the right to terminate the contractual relationship under IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate) even if a proposed change of the service is considered to be reasonable.

It is thought that the rule in paragraph (2)(d) of the present Article is needed in order to allow the service provider – in the event of a change of circumstances – to ask for extra payment and extension of time under paragraph (3), (4), and (5). It is true that III.–1:110 (Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances) provides a general remedy in the event of an exceptional change of circumstances, but that Article is intended to apply only to exceptional cases and requires an application to a court. Going to court is a final and radical option, which would take a considerable amount of time. In the meantime, the service provider is still in the middle of the performance of a service contract which is costing extra money and time. It seems reasonable to protect the service provider's interests by allowing recovery for these extras directly under paragraph (2). This might also give an incentive to the client to reconsider the future of the contractual relationship given that the client has the escape route of termination.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. In many of the countries investigated (BELGIUM, ENGLAND, FINLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY, GREECE, ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS, POLAND, PORTUGAL, SWEDEN) general contract law concepts and provisions exist on the basis of which a service contract can be changed in answer to unforeseen external cost-increasing circumstances, causing the equilibrium between the costs and benefits of performing the obligations of the parties to be seriously disrupted: Belgium and France (imprévision), England (frustration), Germany (CC § 313), Greece (CC art. 388), Italy (CC art. 1467), The Netherlands (CC art. 6:258) and Portugal (CC art. 437). Successful application of these concepts and provisions, however, will be possible in very limited situations only or will hardly be possible at all. In SCOTLAND frustration of contract discharges the parties' obligations; the contract can only be adjusted by parties' agreement. In addition to such general contract law provisions, particular rules exist in the countries investigated in order to deal with unforeseen external cost-increasing circumstances in the framework of particular services contracts. Greece (CC arts. 696-697), Italy (CC art. 1664), The Netherlands (CC arts. 7:406, 7:753 and 7:601(3)) and Poland (CC art. 632). These additional rules are particularly needed in the event that parties agreed on payment of a fixed price for the initial service, which is why many of these provisions relate to cost-increasing circumstances occurring in the supply of construction and processing services. It appears that these additional rules are less severe for the service provider than the general contract law concepts and provisions. A specific provision for consumer services exists in Sweden (Consumer Services Act § 38).

2. An express unilateral right of the client to change the service exists in BELGIUM and FRANCE services pertaining to the construction of an immovable structure (CC art. 1793), in THE NETHERLANDS work (CC art. 7:755) and in ITALY (CC art. 1661) and PORTUGAL (CC art. 1216) for construction and processing services, although agreement of the parties is sometimes needed in Portugal (CC arts. 1214-1215). As for consumer services in SWEDEN, the unilateral right indirectly follows from art. 38 of the Consumer Services Act. In GERMANY the unilateral right of the client is not undisputed for contracts for work (CC § 632), although the law allows price adjustment to the service provider in the event of substantial and unexpected extra work induced by the client. This is also the solution in Belgium and France for all contracts for work outside the scope of the specific rule of CC art. 1793. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the unilateral right of the client to change the contract must follow from express wording in the contract. In all countries investigated (Belgium, England, Finland, France, Germany, Italy, The Netherlands, Portugal, Sweden), the client must, in principle, pay the service provider for extra work resulting from a change of the service as ordered by the client. The requirements that need to be fulfilled, however, in order for the service provider to be able to pursue this payment claim, may differ (see particularly the strict rule of CC art. 1793 in Belgium and France as regards construction services).

II. External cost-increasing circumstances

3. If the parties agreed on payment of a fixed price then, under BELGIAN law, the general rule under contracts for work is that the service provider must bear the consequences of external cost-increasing circumstances (Goossens, Aanneming van werk, no. 619). Case law and legal doctrine, however, firmly accept that the service provider is entitled to price adjustment when confronted with conditions unexpected at the time of conclusion of the contract, causing considerable difficulties in the performance of the service and leading to serious disturbance of the balance of the contract (Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 682 and 688 ff). Case law generally acknowledges that the entitlement to price adjustment can be based on general contract law provisions on the construction of contracts (CC art. 1163), whereas legal doctrine seeks its basis in the doctrine of imprévision (Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 685-686).

4. If cost-increasing external consequences occur in the course of a service process, the question to be answered under ENGLISH contract law is whether or not performance of the service may considered to be frustrated. Frustration occurs if a contract is impossible to perform because its object is no longer attainable due to something beyond the control of either party, or where to require performance would be to render the obligation something radically different from what was undertaken by the contract (Chitty on Contracts I[29], nos. 24-007 ff). The fact, however, that unforeseen events make a contract more onerous than was anticipated do not frustrate it (cf. Davis Contractors v. Fareham Urban DC [1956] AC 696; Tsakiroglou & Co. Ltd. v. Noblee, and Thorl GmbH [1962] AC 93). In case performance of the contractual obligations becomes more difficult or onerous, frustration may be accepted if it can be argued that, assuming the consequences of the unforeseen cost-increasing circumstances are to be borne by the service provider, the obligations of the parties will radically change from their original intentions. If frustration is accepted in a case like this, the service provider is not entitled to adjustment of the price. The doctrine of frustration operates to discharge the contract and the legal consequences of a frustrated contract will be that the parties are relieved of all obligations under the contract. If the parties wish to suspend or vary a service contract that is frustrated they must do so by entering into a new contract in clear and unambiguous terms. If the service provider is allowed to carry on with the service process after the frustrating event, then, unless a new contract is made, the work is not done pursuant to the initial contract. Nevertheless, a fair remuneration must be paid for any work done, on the basis of quantum meruit or restitution (Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 24-096). Frustration cannot be argued in a case where – often the case in English contract law practice – the parties have made specific provisions in the contract for what might otherwise have been a frustrating event (Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 24-056).

5. According the main rule in the FINNISH Consumer Protection Act, Chapter 8 on Certain Consumer Services Contracts (chap. 8 § 6) the service provider must ask for permission to undertake extra cost-increasing work which is appropriately undertaken in the same connection. If the client cannot be reached within a reasonable period, the extra work may be done only if the costs charged for the work are minor. Should the service provider notice that there is a need for extra work that cannot be postponed without causing hazard to health or property the service provider must, without delay, notify the client of that fact.

6. The doctrine of imprévision is accepted in FRENCH law in exceptional circumstances only (see Starck/Roland/Boyer, Obligations II[6], no. 1222). The doctrine is applied, however, by administrative courts to contracts concluded with public entities. Given the restricted application of the doctrine, the provider of a service under a contract for work is not entitled to adjustment of the agreed fixed price in the event of external cost-increasing circumstances, even if these circumstances were unexpected at the time of conclusion of the contract (cf. Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], no. 563; Cass.civ. III, 6 May 1998, Bull.civ. III no. 94). As regards construction contracts for a fixed price, this rule is stated in CC art. 1793. In what appears to be an isolated case, price adjustment was allowed in a situation where the service provider encountered difficulties unverifiable at the moment of the conclusion of the contract, leading to unexpected extra work (Cass.civ. III, 17 May 1995, Mon.TP 18 August 1995, p. 28).

7. In GERMANY the general contract law rule relevant for external cost-increasing circumstances in the framework of services is to be found in CC § 313. Under a contract for work the occurrence of external cost-increasing circumstances cannot give rise to adjustment of the price in case the initial price has been fixed by the parties. But this principle can nevertheless be set aside if the requirements of CC § 313 are met (cf. BGH VersR 1965, 803).

8. External cost-increasing circumstances occurring in the service process may first of all be regarded as an issue of unforeseen change of circumstances in GREEK law. This concept is rooted in good faith and is dealt with by CC art. 388. The service provider is allowed to ask the court to reduce the obligations or to terminate the contractual relationship in whole or in part in the event that unforeseen circumstances have caused the performance of the service to become excessively onerous. In addition to this general provision, specific provisions apply to contracts for work dealt with in CC arts. 681 ff. If the parties have concluded the contract on the basis of a fixed price, the service provider bears the risk for the cost of subsequent extra work and additional labour which was not calculated in advance (subject to a change of the service ordered by the client). In such a case any rise in the price of the materials or wages will also be for the risk of the service provider. If the parties have explicitly agreed the service on a cost estimation and if the service provider has guaranteed that cost estimation, the service provider is not entitled to price adjustment on the occurrence of cost-increasing circumstances (CC art. 696). In no guarantee has been provided, the client will have to bear the consequences, although CC art. 697 allows the client to terminate the contractual relationship if the financial consequences of the cost-increasing circumstances are substantial. It is stated in CC art. 696 that it is to be applied subject to the general provision of CC art. 388.

9. The relevant provision in the ITALIAN CC is art. 1467 on unforeseen circumstances. The provision entitles the service provider to ask the court to terminate the contractual relationship on the ground of excessive onerousness of the performance of the service. The rule is particularised for construction and processing services qualified as appalto (CC arts. 1655 ff). According to CC art. 1664, a claim for price adjustment is available on grounds of an increase of costs for material, staff and production due to unforeseeable events (cf. Cass., 17 July 1976, no. 2845, Rep.Foro it., 1976, V° Appalto, c. 115, no. 8. The limit of normal risk of consequences of unforeseeable events to be borne by the service provider is set at an increase of more than 10 per cent of the initial price (Cass., 5 February 1987, no. 1123, Rep.Foro it., 1987, V° Appalto, c. 144, no. 47; Cass., 25 September 1953, no. 3042, Rep.Foro it., 1953, V° Appalto, c. 109, no. 16).

10. In addition to the rather strict provision of the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:258 on unforeseen circumstances, CC art. 7:753(1) provides a rule for contracts for work in the event that cost-increasing circumstances occur after the conclusion of the service contract. If these circumstances cannot be attributed to the service provider, and if the service provider did not have to take these circumstances into account when calculating the price for the service, the court may be asked to adjust the price initially agreed. A further requirement is to be found in CC art. 7:753(3), stating that the service provider cannot ask the court for price adjustment if the client was not properly warned of the need for such an adjustment. Costs incurred and damage suffered by the service provider in the framework of the performance of other types of services are to be compensated if these costs are not included in the price following CC art. 7:406 (services qualified as opdracht and overeenkomst inzake geneeskundige behandeling, with the exception of damage that can be attributed to the service provider) and CC art. 7:601(3) (services qualified as bewaarneming).

11. If, under POLISH law, the supply of a material service is qualified as a contract for work (CC arts. 627 ff) and if the parties agreed on payment of a fixed price, the issue of external cost-increasing circumstances is to be considered on the basis of CC art. 632. According to paragraph 1, the service provider cannot demand an increase of the price, even if it was impossible at the time of conclusion of the contract to foresee the amount of work or the cost of the work to be carried out. The consequences of this rule are mitigated, however, by paragraph 2. This provides that if the performance of the service contract in case of unforeseen cost-increasing circumstances would cause a considerable loss, the court may adjust the price or terminate the contractual relationship.

12. In PORTUGAL, if the parties to a service contract did not agree on a price revision clause, unforeseen external cost-increasing circumstances can only lead to adjustment of the price on the basis of the general contract law provision on change of circumstances (CC art. 437) which is rooted in the concept of good faith.

13. The SCOTTISH doctrine of frustration is very similar to that of English law (above), save that the adjustment of the parties' positions in respect of incomplete performances is carried out by way of the common law of unjustified enrichment (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, chap. 21).

14. A service provider may be entitled to payment for extra work in the framework of a service supplied to a consumer on the basis of § 38 of the SWEDISH Consumer Services Act. Having regard to that provision, a situation that would probably amount to an external unforeseen cost-increasing circumstance would be where the service provider carries out the service in accordance with § 8 of the Consumer Services Act. This provision states that if, in the course of performing the service, it appears that other work is needed which, by reason of its relationship with the service, ought to be performed simultaneously with such service, the service provider must notify the consumer and request instructions. If the consumer cannot be reached, the service provider is allowed to perform the additional work but only if the price for the extra work is insignificant, or where there are special grounds for assuming that the client would have opted for carrying out the extra work. Furthermore, the provision includes the situation where the service provider is obliged to perform any additional work which cannot be postponed without exposing the consumer client to a risk of serious damage.

III. Change of the service ordered by the client

15. Changes ordered by the client under a contract for work in BELGIAN law will either fall under the application of general contract law rules or, in the event of services pertaining to the construction of an immovable structure, under the specific provision of CC art. 1793 (Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 652 and 666). As regards the former category, it is disputed whether or not the client can change the service without the provider's consent (Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 809-814). If the service provider demands adjustment of the price on the grounds of a change of the service induced by the client, such demand is to be assessed following the normal rules on formation of contracts and on evidence (Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 653 ff). The specific provision of CC art. 1793 is less problematic in the sense that it allows the client to change the construction service unilaterally (Goossens, Aanneming van werk, no. 678). The provider of the construction service, however, may only demand adjustment of the price on demonstrating that the changed order was issued in writing and that, following the order, the price adjustment was approved by the client (Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 658 ff).

16. In ENGLAND the general rule is that the parties to a contract may effect a variation of the contract by modifying or altering its terms by mutual agreement (Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 23-033). A service provider will generally not be able to claim payment for extra work. Express wording in the contract may give the client the power unilaterally to vary the obligations of the parties to the contract (Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 23-038). If the client exercises that power and if the contract provides for the payment of extra work done, the service provider may claim payment for that work under the contract.

17. Under FRENCH law, if the service provider can demonstrate that extra work has been carried out, not being work resulting from unexpected circumstances, and that the extra work has been ordered by the client, the general rule for all contracts for work is that the service provider is entitled to adjustment of the price (Bénabent, Contrats spéciaux[6], no. 564). Whether the client agreed to the extra work is a matter to be resolved on the basis of the ordinary rules on formation of contracts and on evidence. This general rule is particularised by CC art. 1793 for services related to the construction of an immovable structure. In order for the service provider to be entitled to adjustment of the price, written approval by the client of both the extra work and the price adjustment are required. There is case law, however, allowing price adjustment without approval of the client in the event that the equilibrium of the contract has been disturbed as a result of the client's changed order (see Cass.civ. III, 24 January 1990, D. 1990, 257, note Bénabent; Cass.civ. III, 8 March 1995, Bull.civ. III, no. 73; Cass.civ. III, 20 January 1999, Bull.civ. III, no. 16; Def. 1999, 1128, note Périnet-Marquet).

18. As regards contracts for work under GERMAN law it is not undisputed whether the client is allowed to order a unilateral change of the service (Jansen, Defects liability, p. 165; Goossens, Aanneming van werk, no. 812). Nevertheless, a service provider who carries out extra work without an additional agreement supplementing the initial contract may be entitled to payment for the extra work under CC § 632, provided the extra work is substantial, unexpected, and induced by the client (cf. BGH 8 January 2002, X ZR 6/00, not published).

19. In ITALY the client has a unilateral right to change the service if the service qualifies as appalto (CC arts. 1655 ff) on the basis of CC art. 1661. In the case of changes ordered by the client, compensation is due to the service provider (Rubino and Iudica, Dell´Appalto[3], p. 161; Giannattasio, L´appalto, p. 184).

20. In contracts for work under DUTCH law the client may in principle order a change of the service. In that case the service provider may increase the price following the rule of CC art. 7:755, but only if the client has been told in due time that the price will have to be increased as a result of the order, unless the client should have understood this without such warning. Changes ordered by the client under a service contract qualified as opdracht are dealt with by CC art. 7:402(1). Such orders, like any other direction given by the client, must be given in time and within the boundaries of the framework of the contract. The characteristics of the particular opdracht may limit the duty of the service provider to follow the order as well (Parl. Gesch., p. 324), particularly if such an order would be in conflict with professional ethics, a professional codes of conduct or the independent position the service provider may have to take towards the client (Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 61). Changes ordered under opdracht are paid for according to the general rules on price for such services, which are stated in CC art. 7:405(2).

21. In general, POLISH law does not provide for any possibility to change a contract unilaterally.

22. In PORTUGAL, in the case of construction and processing services, changes in the service must be agreed upon by the client (CC art. 1214), unless the changes are necessary: in the latter case, if the parties disagree on the subject matter, the court is to decide whether the change is necessary (CC art. 1215). If as a consequence of such changes the price is increased by more than 20 per cent, the service provider is entitled to equitable compensation. If the client orders a change of the service, the service provider must follow the order as long as the change neither amounts to an increase of 20 per cent of the price initially agreed, nor to a substantial change of the nature of the work originally ordered (CC art. 1216).

23. In SCOTTISH law parties may agree to vary or altogether replace (novate) their contract (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, paras. 25.01-25.28). Work done under a frustrated contract may be paid for by way of an unjustified enrichment or a quantum meruit claim if there is no contractual provision (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, paras. 21.47-21.48).

24. In SPAIN, the general contract provisions rule also in the area of a service contract and according to the CC art. 1256 a contract is binding and obligatory for the parties. Therefore prima facie it is forbidden to introduce unilateral modifications. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court recognises that a sudden change of circumstances that could not be foreseen by the parties at the moment of concluding the contract and that affects seriously the equity of the contract, may result in variation of its terms by the court, due to the principle of rebus sic stantibus (TS 11 June 1951, RJ 1951/1649). In any case, the contract itself may contain internal rules of modification of the terms in case of a change of circumstances. The supplier of the service has to follow the instructions on the method of execution of the service given by the client that could specify the character of the service and modify it (SAP Baleares 8 April 2002, BDA JUR 2002 /153765). The ius variandi of the terms of the contract by the client is justified by an analogical application of the possibility of desisting from the contract provided by the CC art. 1594 (Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles I^3, p. 672), but in any case, the client must not change unilaterally the essence of the contract and the supplier of the service should not suffer any economical prejudices as a consequence of those changes, due to the general contract principle of good faith (CC art. 1258). The price established for the service may not vary, according to the general rule that states that prices are unchangeable (CC arts. 1471 and 1593; Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles I^3, p. 672), as it is an essential element of the contract. Nevertheless, if the change introduced to the contract by the client signifies an increase of the amount of work for the provider of the service or a need for more materials, the rule of indemnity implies a proportional increase of the price. The Supreme Court though does not consider it as a change, but rather a complement of the consent on the price expressed in the contract (TS 10 May 1997, RJ 1997/3831). In any case, the increase of the price requires the consent of the client: if the price established is a fixed amount, the change of the economic circumstances does not imply the provider's right to raise the price without the client's authorisation (CC art. 1593). Nevertheless, a tacit consent is valid as well (TS 18 April 1995, RJ 1995/3420).There are no specific rules of calculating the price if the service is reduced. The provider of the service should warn the client if there is a risk that the service may not achieve the envisaged result or damage another interests of the client. In such a case, the provider of the service has the obligation to notify the client of the existing risk, in order to avoid the frustration of the contract's purpose by modifying the content of the service (TS 30 December 2002, RJ 2003/333). The modifications of the contract on the framework of the construction are regulated by the Building Regulation Act in its articles 9.2.b) and 12.3.d): the director of the construction has to communicate to the developer any changes to be made on the first project elaborated by the parties as a consequence of the development of the works and the developer has to authorise those changes.

25. A service provider will be entitled to payment for extra work in the framework of a service supplied to a consumer on the basis of § 38 of the SWEDISH Consumer Services Act in the event that the extra work has been ordered by the consumer client and was unforeseeable at the time of conclusion of the contract.

IV.C.–2:110: Client's obligation to notify anticipated non-conformity

(1) The client must notify the service provider if the client becomes aware during the period for performance of the service that the service provider will fail to perform the obligation under IV.C.–2:106 (Obligation to achieve result).

(2) The client is presumed to be so aware if from all the facts and circumstances known to the client without investigation the client has reason to be so aware.

(3) If a non-performance of the obligation under paragraph (1) causes the service to become more expensive or to take more time than agreed on in the contract, the service provider is entitled to:

(a) damages for the loss the service provider sustains as a consequence of that failure; and

(b) an adjustment of the time allowed for performance of the service.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article deals with the situation where the client becomes aware during the performance of the service that the service provider is going to fail to achieve the required result. The client has an obligation to notify the service provider of that fact. This is an aspect of the obligation to co-operate.

This situation must be distinguished from the situation which arises when the client becomes aware of a non-conformity after the period for performance of the service has ended. There is then a requirement to notify the service provider within a reasonable time if the client is not to lose remedies. This is an aspect of the duty to exercise remedies in good faith and is dealt with by the general provision in III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity). Article III.–3:107 does not apply to consumers: in their case only the general rule on good faith and fair dealing and the rules applicable to particular remedies or particular situations apply.

The justification for the obligation imposed by this Article is fairness to the service provider. Correct performance of the contractual obligations may still be possible, provided that the risk is brought to the attention of the service provider.

> A client has entered into a contract with a lawyer for the purpose of bringing a case to court. The court of first instance dismisses the client's case. The lawyer tells the client that it is possible to appeal within 6 weeks of the date of the court's decision. After 3 weeks, the client reads the court's decision and finds out that the appeal must be made within 4 weeks of the date of the decision.

The client will only have to notify, however, if the client becomes aware of the likely non-conformity, taking into account the presumption in paragraph (2). The client is not bound to investigate whether or not the service provider is carrying out the service in accordance with the obligations imposed. But if the client actually follows what is happening in the service process, as a consequence of the communication that will sometimes necessarily have to take place, the client should be normally attentive.

If the client does not perform the obligation under paragraph (1), the service provider may be prejudiced. This is where paragraph (3) becomes relevant. A further possibility is that the client notifies the service provider before the service process has finished, but does so too late.

> A client has entered into a contract for a fixed price with a builder for the purpose of designing and building a house with two floors. The client has asked the builder to design a large window in the roof of the house. The client needs that large window for his hobby: artistic painting. When the builder presents the first basic design to the client, the paper shows no window in the roof. The client does not mention this to the builder, who continues with the service by making a more detailed design and by submitting that design to the local authorities for the purpose of obtaining building permission. At that stage, the client tells the builder that he has noticed the absence of the large window. The builder can adjust the design, but he will have to make extra technical calculations. Moreover, he will have to restart the procedure of asking for building permission.

The service provider might still be able to perform the main obligation under the contract, but it is likely that the service will have become more costly and that more time will be needed to achieve the required result. This will not cause problems if payment of a fee based on an hourly rate was agreed upon at the time of conclusion of the contract. But if payment of either a fixed price or a fee based on a no result, no pay basis was agreed, the service provider would incur a loss due to the client's late notification. The service provider may then claim compensation for that loss or extension of the time to perform the service or both (paragraph (3)).

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The question is whether it is necessary to impose an obligation on the client to notify the service provider of anticipated non-performance while the service is still underway. It is true that the interests of both parties to the service contract are met when the client signals that performance of the service may not lead to the outcome required. But it is also true that it is the service provider's job to achieve that result, and that it may be considered undesirable to burden the client with taking care of problems which should be dealt with by the service provider. Moreover, imposing an obligation to notify on the client in the course of the service process raises the question whether and to what extent the client must also investigate the performance of the service in order to discover failures that could be the object of notification.

C. Preferred option

If the client discovers in the course of the service process that there is a risk that the required result might not be achieved, it would be inefficient to allow the client to refrain from notifying the service provider. The client will generally have ample opportunity to find out that there might be a problem with the performance of the service. At the same time, the service provider has the prime responsibility for the performance of the service. The service provider should not be allowed to shift that responsibility to the client, by stating that the latter failed to discover a risk of non-performance in the course of the service process. It is thought inefficient to actually impose a duty to investigate on the client. The responsibility of the service provider can only be mitigated by the non-performance of the client's obligation to notify of a likely failure to achieve the required result. This latter obligation is only imposed on the client if the client becomes aware of the failure. It would not make sense to impose an obligation to notify something of which the client was unaware. That would be an obligation to do the impossible. However, the client is presumed to be aware of a failure or a risk of failure if from all the facts and circumstances known to the client without investigation the client has reason to be aware of it. This latter approach is similar in effect to the concept of 'Reason to Know' that is acknowledged in American law (see: Restatement (2nd) Contracts § 19, comment b). In the context of the client's obligation to notify under the present Article, it implies that the client will have to give notice of any failure that leaps to the eye whenever the service process is checked or followed. It also implies that if, for instance, the client decides not to take advantage of an opportunity to check the process of the performance under IV.C.–2:103 (Obligation to co-operate) paragraph (1)(d), there will be less possibility for the service provider to allege that the client had reason to know of a non-performance and must be presumed to have been aware of it.

D. Remedies

The consequences of a non-performance of the obligation to notify an anticipated failure to achieve the required result are set out in paragraph (3) of the Article. If the client fails promptly to notify the service provider that the latter will fail to achieve the result stated or envisaged by the client, causing the service to become more expensive or to take more time than agreed on in the contract, the service provider is entitled to claim both compensation for the loss incurred and extension of time to perform the obligations under the contract. The service provider would be entitled to damages anyway under the general rules on remedies for non-performance of an obligation but the right is restated here for the sake of completeness.

There are in Book III various provisions which might result in a remedy not being available or being lost or diminished if the creditor does not give notice to the debtor. See e.g. III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing) paragraph (3); III.–3:101 (Remedies available) paragraph (3); III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity); III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations) paragraph (4); III.–3:508 (Loss of right to terminate); III.–3:704 (Loss attributable to creditor). These provisions are not affected by the present Article. The present Article does not itself, however, provide for a client to lose any remedies as a result of a failure to notify of an anticipated failure to achieve the required result.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. The situation where the client becomes aware, while the service is proceeding, of a likely failure to achieve the required result appears to be rarely distinguished from the situation where the client becomes aware of a non-conformity after the service has been performed. These notes therefore deal with failure to notify in general. In fact it is failure to notify after the service has been performed (dealt with here in III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity)) which attracts most attention in the national laws.
2. An express duty of the client to notify the service provider in the event of defects discovered in the service is only to be found in FINLAND in the framework of consumer services (ConsProtA chap. 8 and chap. 9 § 16(1)). A duty to give notice can be implied indirectly on the basis of general concepts stemming from good faith in FRANCE, GERMANY, THE NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:89), PORTUGAL (CC art. 334) and SPAIN (CC art. 1258). The equitable doctrine of laches appears to be to the same effect in ENGLAND although the doctrine is considered relevant only if a remedy is pursued in equity. Discussion of such a duty in SCOTLAND has denied its existence. For some services, notably under contracts for work, implied duties to notify at the time of acceptance of the result of the service are specifically recognized: France (construction and processing services), Germany (CC § 640(2)), The Netherlands (CC art. 7:758(3)), POLAND (CC art. 563) and Portugal (CC art. 1219(2)). In England, Finland, France, Germany, The Netherlands, Poland, Portugal and Spain failure by the client to notify the service provider in the case of discovered defects may prevent the client from seeking resort to remedies. In Germany, however, failure to notify defects at the time of acceptance of the result of a service under a contract for work will cause the client to lose some remedies only.

II. The duty to notify of the client

3. Apart from the rules on limitation of actions the most relevant doctrine in ENGLISH law is the equitable defence of laches (cf. Chitty on Contracts I[29], nos. 29-140 ff). The essence of the doctrine is that the claimant must be reasonably diligent in seeking an equitable remedy and in consequence not prejudice the position of the defendant (cf. Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 29-140).

4. According to FINNISH ConsProtA chaps. 8 and 9 § 16(1) , the consumer client must notify the service provider within a reasonable period from the time the client noticed or should have noticed the defective service.

5. In FRANCE the client's duty to notify the service provider in case of a defective service may arise under the general principles of tacit renunciation. The duty of the client is indirectly acknowledged in the framework of services related to the construction or processing of an immovable structure (CC art. 1792). The client must notify the contractor at the time of reception of the work of apparent defects, although the notion of apparent defects has been construed in case law in a manner protecting the interests of the client to a far reaching extent (cf. Cass.civ. III, 3 November 1983, GazPal 1984, 2, 577, note Liet-Veaux; see also Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 399 ff).

6. In GERMANY a duty of the client to notify the service provider in the event of a defect in the service may be acknowledged on the basis of Verwirkung. This concept has been developed in German law as a particularisation of the principle of venire contra factum proprium and is nowadays based on the concept of Treu und Glauben (CC § 242). Verwirkung may be invoked if a party, due to the passing of time and the specific circumstances of the case, may reasonably assume that the other party will no longer exercise a right to which that party is entitled. An additional requirement is that the party has acted on the basis of its reasonable assumption (BGH NJW 1980, 880). If the service can be qualified as a contract for work, the client's duty to notify indirectly follows from CC § 640(2) in the sense that the client may be under a duty to reserve rights at the time of acceptance of the result that has been accomplished by the service provider. The duty is limited to defects in the service the client actually knows of.

7. The duty to notify of the client, in the event that the service provider does not supply the service in accordance with the contract, follows indirectly from the general contract law provision in the DUTCH CC art. 6:89. According to this provision, the client must inform the service provider within due time as soon as the client discovers or should reasonably have discovered the breach of the service contract. In contracts for work CC art. 7:758(3) is to the same effect although the duty of the client can then only arise as from the time upon which acceptance of the (modified) thing or structure, resulting from the service process, occurs.

8. The client's duty to notify in case the service provider breaches the service contract follows from POLISH CC art. 563. The duty is to be performed within one month from discovery of the breach. According to CC art. 563(1), in the event that it is customary to inspect the service process, the client must notify the service provider within one month after the passing of the period during which the client could have discovered the breach by observing due diligence.

9. In PORTUGAL general contract law imposes an obligation upon the client to promptly notify the service provider in the event that a defect in the service is noticed (CC art. 334; cf. Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 343). In case of construction or processing services evident defects are presumed to be known by the client according to CC art. 1219(2). Furthermore, evident defects are those which the client in due diligence should have noticed (CA Porto, 17 November 1992, CJ 1992, V, 224).

10. SCOTTISH law has a doctrine of mora barring the exercise of rights if an invasion thereof was done with the knowledge of and without objection from the right-holder. The plea was not sustained in a case where the party did not intervene while the other party was carrying out work even though it may have been obvious that the work and expenditure would be useless without a further invasion of the first party's rights (Earl of Kintore v Pirie (1903) 5 F 818).

11. Under SPANISH law the duty of the client to notify the service provider in the event that defects in the service are noticed or should have been noticed, given the due diligence to be observed by the client, stems from the general contract law provision on good faith (CC art. 1258). The duty is particularly recognized in the framework of construction and processing services (cf. Martinez Mas, La recepción en el contrato de obra, p. 73).

III. Consequences of failure to notify

12. The effect of limitation under ENGLISH law is merely to bar the client's remedy and not to extinguish the right (cf. Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 29-129). If a party can raise the equitable defence of laches, the other party will be barred from pursuing the remedy.

13. A consumer client who fails to notify under FINNISH ConsProtA chap. 8 § 16(1) (16/1994) cannot invoke the defect. Notwithstanding the failure to notify, however, the consumer client may invoke the defect following § 16(2) if (i) the service provider's conduct has been grossly negligent or incompatible with honour or good faith; (ii) the defect is based on the fact that the service does not conform to the requirements issued in provisions for the protection of health and property; (iii) the defect is based on the fact that the result of the service is otherwise hazardous to health or property. § 16(2) on construction services is to the same effect, and includes the client's right to invoke defects based on the fact that the service does not conform to the requirements set for it in the Product Safety Act.

14. In the event that tacit renunciation of a party is demonstrated, that party will no longer be able to exercise its rights under FRENCH law (cf. Ranieri, Verwirkung et rénonciation tacite, p. 427 at 440). Likewise, if the client of a construction or processing service involving an immovable structure fails to notify the service provider of defects apparent at the time of reception of the work, the client can no longer invoke the provider's liability for such defects (Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 399 ff). The rule is said to be applied to all service contracts and not only to construction contracts (Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 32331-32332).

15. If, under GERMAN law, a party is able to establish Verwirkung, the other party can no longer exercise the right to which it is entitled. In a contract for work, a client who does not perform the duty to notify under CC § 640(2) loses all rights and remedies granted by GERMAN CC § 633 and CC § 634. The client will still be able, however, to claim damages under CC § 635 according to case law (BGHZ 61, 369 at 371) unless it is apparent that the client has renounced the right to pursue damages (cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 405-406).

16. If the client fails to notify the service provider under the general contract law provision of the DUTCH CC art. 6:89, the client will not be able to seek resort to a remedy. As regards services under contracts for work CC art. 7:758(3) is to the same effect.

17. Failure to notify according to POLISH CC art. 563 will put a bar to the client's normal remedies under the contract.

18. If the client does not promptly notify the service provider on the basis of PORTUGUESE CC art. 334, the latter is excluded from liability for defects in the service (cf. Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 343).

19. Mora is merely a bar in SCOTTISH law, not an extinction of the right.

20. Under SPANISH law, the client must notify in order not to lose any of the remedies under the contract as regards the defective service.

IV.C.–2:111: Client's right to terminate

(1) The client may terminate the contractual relationship at any time by giving notice to the service provider.

(2) The effects of termination are governed by III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (3).

(3) When the client was justified in terminating the relationship no damages are payable for so doing.

(4) When the client was not justified in terminating the relationship, the termination is nevertheless effective but, the service provider has a right to damages in accordance with the rules in Book III.

(5) For the purposes of this Article, the client is justified in terminating the relationship if the client:

(a) was entitled to terminate the relationship under the express terms of the contract and observed any requirements laid down in the contract for doing so;
(b) was entitled to terminate the relationship under Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5 (Termination); or
(c) was entitled to terminate the relationship under III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (2) and gave a reasonable period of notice as required by that provision.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Paragraph (1) of this Article gives the client the right to terminate the contractual relationship at any time. This is quite distinct from any right there may be to terminate for fundamental non-performance or the equivalent under Book III, Chapter 3. The client's right to terminate under the present Article does not depend on any non-performance by the service provider. The client under the present Article has the option of termination whenever the client would like to walk away from the contract for any reason, whether or not there is an alleged non-performance on the side of the service provider.

Illustration
A house owner has entered into a contract with an architect for the purpose of designing an extension to the house. After a few weeks, the house owner decides he no longer wants to have the extension and terminates his contractual relationship with the architect.

Termination under this Article is therefore not to be regarded as a remedy. It is basically a recognition of the fact that the client may no longer want the service to be performed even though the service provider is adequately performing the obligations under the contract.

The client, however, will have to pay the price for walking away from the contract. Firstly, the normal restitutionary rules will apply. What has been transferred under the contract will have to be returned. The service provider will be entitled to the value of any services rendered or any other non-transferable benefits conferred on the client. This is the effect of paragraph (2) and it is the same whether or not the client had other grounds for termination. Secondly, where the client was not justified under paragraph (5) in terminating the relationship the client will have to pay damages to the service provider to ensure that the service provider will not lose by virtue of the client's exercise of the right to terminate without cause (paragraph (4)). The situations in which the client would have been justified in terminating under paragraph (5), and will consequently not be liable to pay damages for terminating (paragraph (3)), are (a) where termination was allowed by the express terms of the contract and the client observed any requirements set out in the contract (such as giving a prescribed period of notice) (b) where the client was entitled to terminate the relationship under Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5, which deals with termination for fundamental non-performance or the equivalent and (c) where the client was entitled to terminate the relationship under III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (2), which deals with contracts of indefinite duration, and gave a reasonable period of notice as required by that provision. (Termination of the relationship arising under a contract of indefinite duration by giving an inadequate period of notice would come under the present Article and would give rise to a right to damages.) Paragraph (4) applies the normal rules on damages. This means that the service provider is entitled to be put as nearly as possible into the situation which would have prevailed if the contractual obligations had been duly performed. The compensation payable is to cover the loss which the service provider has suffered and the gain of which the service provider has been deprived. In other words, the client must reimburse both the costs already incurred by the service provider as a consequence of carrying out the service and any profit lost as a consequence of the termination.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The main issue is whether the client should be allowed to terminate without cause. It could be asked what is so special about service contracts that the client should be entitled to unilaterally bring the contractual relationship to an end for no reason. The normal rule is that, unless conferred by the contract, such a right exists only for contracts concluded for an indefinite period. (See III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (2).)

On the other hand, circumstances may change after the conclusion of the service contract and may give the client a legitimate interest in terminating. It is true that this situation could also arise under any other type of contract – for instance a sales contract – but in such a case a party sometimes has other options to deal with the new situation, without having to terminate the contractual relationship. A buyer could for instance still buy the things but subsequently resell them. Reselling the finished – though unwanted – result of a completed service, however, will not always be practically possible. Also, a client will not always be sufficiently protected either by ordering a change of the contract under the provisions permitting this or by renegotiating the contract. Hence termination could be regarded as a useful instrument, particularly if the service provider's financial interests are also sufficiently protected.

C. Preferred option

The client's right to terminate the contractual relationship is accepted in principle in paragraph (1) of the present Article. The arguments in favour of that position have been set out above and have been put forward in various legal systems. The client's right is balanced by the rules in paragraphs (4) and (5) allowing the service provider financial compensation for the consequences of an unjustified termination. This approach is followed in many legal systems.

The actual results under the system adopted in the Article will in most cases be the same as the results which would be reached by saying that the client had no right to terminate without cause. If that other approach were adopted the client could still in practice repudiate the contract and withdraw co-operation. The client would then have to pay damages, on exactly the same basis, for non-performance or anticipated non-performance of the client's contractual obligations. The difference between the two systems lies in specific performance. Under the alternative system the client would, in some unusual types of case, have to accept performance of an unwanted service. This could happen if the service was not of such a personal nature that it would be unreasonable to enforce specific performance of the client's obligation to co-operate and if the service provider had such a legitimate interest in continuing performance that it would be reasonable to allow the service provider to recover payment for the unwanted service. (See III.–3:301 (Enforcement of monetary obligations) and III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations.) The approach adopted in the present Article places the client's interest in not having to accept a service which is no longer wanted above the service provider's interest in being able to continue to provide it, while recognising that the service provider is always entitled to restitution of anything provided under the contract and full monetary compensation for any loss caused by an unjustified termination. Even if there were to be no right to enforce specific performance of the client's obligations under a service contract, the approach adopted in the present Article would be preferable because it is more likely to promote respect for the law. It openly confers a right to terminate on paying compensation, rather than pretending that there is no such right but covertly giving it by pointing out that the client can choose to fail to perform the obligations under the contract.

D. Other relevant provision

The provisions on notice in Book II include a provision to the effect that notice becomes effective when it reaches the addressee, unless it provides for a delayed effect. I.–1:109 (Notice) paragraph (2). So the client can either cancel immediately or give a period of notice. The notice may be given by any means appropriate to the circumstances. (I.–1:109(3)).

The effects of termination under III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (3) are as follows. Where the parties do not regulate the effects of termination, then:

> (a) it has prospective effect only and does not affect any right to damages, or a stipulated payment, for non-performance of any obligation performance of which was due before termination;
> (b) it does not affect any provision for the settlement of disputes or any other provision which is to operate even after termination; and
> (c) in the case of a contractual obligation or relationship any restitutionary effects are regulated by the rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) with appropriate adaptations.

The restitutionary effects include payment (by reference to the contractual rate) for any services which had already been rendered by the time of termination but for which payment had not yet fallen due. (III.–3:512 (Payment of value of benefit)). As termination has prospective effect only, any payments which had fallen due by the time of termination would still remain due.

NOTES

I. The right of the client to terminate the service

1. It is established law in the countries investigated, particularly in relation to contracts for work, that the client may cancel the service at any time: AUSTRIA (CC § 1158(4) in connection with CC §§ 1159, 1162, 1162b and 1168), BELGIUM (CC art. 1794) and FRANCE (CC art. 1794), GERMANY (CC § 649), GREECE (CC art. 700), ITALY (CC arts. 2227 and 1671), THE NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 7:408(1) and 7:764(1)), POLAND (CC art. 644), PORTUGAL (CC arts. 1156 and 1170), SPAIN (CC art. 1594 and cf. TS 13 May 1993 RJ 1993/3546, TS 4 February 1997, RJ 1997/675, TS 9 March 1999, RJ 1999/1408), SWEDEN (consumer services; § 42 of the Consumer Services Act; under non-consumer contracts, the client has a similar, but more limited, right. Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 101). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the client is free to repudiate the contract at any time but that is regarded as an anticipatory breach of contract. The philosophy is different but the results are not dissimilar.

II. Consequences of termination by the client

2. If the client ends the service, the client must compensate the service provider. This is an established principle, at least for contracts for work, in all countries investigated. There are various ways of calculating the amount of the compensation. One way is to give the service provider a right to be indemnified for all costs actually incurred as a result of the partial performance of the service and to be compensated for the benefit which could have been obtained from the cancelled service: BELGIUM and FRANCE (CC art. 1794), ITALY (CC arts. 2227 and 1671), SPAIN (CC art. 1594), SWEDEN (consumer services; Consumer Services Act §. 42, unless the purpose of the contract has been frustrated due to certain circumstances). Another way is to take as a starting point the price which the client agreed to pay the service provider and to deduct from this all money which the service provider was able to save as a result of the termination of the service: THE NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 7:411(2) and 7:764(2)), POLAND (CC art. 644). This deduction can sometimes include the benefit which the service provider actually gained as a result of the cancellation, or which the service provider could have gained, but deliberately failed to do so, by using the earning capacity for other services instead: AUSTRIA (CC §§ 1162b and 1168), GREECE (CC art. 700), GERMANY (CC § 649). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND repudiation of the contract by the client entitles the service provider to damages for loss, including loss of profit, in accordance with the normal rules applying to anticipatory breach.

CHAPTER 3: CONSTRUCTION

IV.C.–3:101: Scope

(1) This Chapter applies to contracts under which one party, the constructor, undertakes to construct a building or other immovable structure, or to materially alter an existing building or other immovable structure, following a design provided by the client.

(2) It applies with appropriate adaptations to contracts under which the constructor undertakes:

(a) to construct a movable or incorporeal thing, following a design provided by the client; or

(b) to construct a building or other immovable structure, to materially alter an existing building or other immovable structure, or to construct a movable or incorporeal thing, following a design provided by the constructor.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

A contract for construction is defined in Annex 1 as "a contract under which one party, the constructor, undertakes to construct something for another party, the client, or to materially alter an existing building or other immovable structure for a client". However, this Chapter does not apply to all construction contracts in precisely the same way. The present Article, which is a "scope" provision rather than a "definition" provision, sets out its primary area of application and those cases where it applies "with appropriate adaptations".

This Chapter covers services whose aim it is to bring about a new structure or thing. The core area of application is the building of immovable structures, based on a design by an architect hired by the client or a design otherwise provided by the client.

The building of houses, offices, roads and other infrastructure are examples of activities falling under this Chapter.

The rules are drafted in such a manner, however, that they can also be applied, with any appropriate adaptations, to the construction of movable or incorporeal things.

Illustration 2
The construction of tailor-made machinery, software and websites are examples of this.

The rules can also be applied to the construction element in mixed contracts, including 'design and construct' contracts, where the constructor is also responsible for the design of the structure. On mixed contracts generally, see II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts) and on contracts for construction and sale, see IV.A.–1:102 (Goods to be manufactured or produced).

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This Article covers the scope of application of the rules on construction. The main policy issue is whether the rules should only cover the building of immovables or also the formation of other structures and things. A limited scope of application would be supported by the argument that extensive case law exists on building contracts, so that there is a firm basis for codification in this field. However, many activities which are very similar economically – in the sense that they are also oriented towards creating an object and require very similar interaction processes between the parties in order to achieve this – would then be excluded from the application of this Chapter: the building of ships, airplanes and machinery or the construction of software, databases, websites and the like.

C. Preferred option

In the present Article, the solution chosen is that of a main scope of application for the rules on construction, that is, building contracts regarding immovables. Outside this scope, the rules are applicable with 'appropriate adaptations' to other construction activities. This solution reflects the idea that such activities are very similar economically, require very similar interaction processes between the parties in order to effectuate the envisaged structure and therefore can be governed by similar rules. At the same time, the solution acknowledges that the law regarding such activities is less well established, that these activities relate to many different objects and that the relevant business practices may vary considerably. Thus, although it is very likely that the rules can be applied without modification to those situations, the rules may need to be adapted to these specific situations by the courts.

The rules of this Chapter may apply to the construction of software. An appropriate modification may be warranted for the conformity rule, in situations where the software is highly innovative, for instance. If the construction of the software entailed substantial risk, a court may find that the 'fitness for purpose' test is too harsh for the provider of the software A court may try to find an appropriate solution by looking to the result stated or envisaged by the client or by applying the general rule on the standard of care and skill required of a service provider.

D. Relation to other parts of the model rules

Construction contracts, and the rights and obligations arising from them, are governed by the general rules in Books I to III, by the rules on service contracts contained in Chapter 1 of the present Part of Book IV and by the specific rules of the present Chapter.

The question of mixed contracts is dealt with generally in II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts). The rules on mixed contracts are intended to apply not only to contracts which are partly for services and partly for something else but also to contracts which are wholly service contracts but which are partly for a construction service and partly for another service. The rules in the present Chapter will apply to the construction part of the service.

E. Design by the client or the constructor

The main area of application is delimited further by presupposing that what is to be constructed is designed by the client or by an agent of the client, such as an architect. In these situations, the structure to be made is defined by the client to a greater or lesser extent and the choices made by the client are part of the initial contract or become binding on the constructor by way of directions. In these situations, the client generally bears the risk of mistakes in the design, unless the constructor has a duty to warn.

If the structure is only described in a more general manner and the constructor is to design the structure before the construction work begins, the rules of the present Chapter apply with appropriate adaptations. Generally, however, no adaptations will be necessary for such 'turnkey' or 'design and construct' contracts. In these contracts, the constructor will bear more responsibility for the result. That, however, is exactly what the present rules lead to. According to these rules, the responsibility for the design shifts to the constructor because the contract only describes the construction in general terms and it is the constructor who has the responsibility to ensure that the design is such that the structure becomes fit for its purpose. In situations where the designer and the constructor are one and the same person or entity, the rules of Chapter 6 (Design) are not applicable to the 'design' part of the work undertaken by the constructor. These rules are only applicable when the designer and the constructor are different persons or entities.

F. Construction work on existing immovables or processing?

The rules of this Chapter also apply to contracts whereby the constructor is to perform construction work on an existing building or other immovable structure, following a design provided by the client. In general, processes applied to existing structures and things are covered by the rules on processing. So, maintenance work on buildings, such as painting, repairs to sewage systems and wiring and the cleaning of windows, is classified as processing. Extensive reparations, however, such as the removal and renewal of an entire roof structure or restoration work on old buildings with a value similar to the value of the building prior to the restoration, constitute construction work covered by the present Chapter because it is more similar to construction than to processing.

The exact borderline between construction and processing may, in some situations, be difficult to determine. At this borderline, however, the rules regarding processing and construction are very similar. Processing services which are similar to construction work on existing immovables will consist mainly of repairs. Contracts involving important repairs to buildings will generally be successful, so that a reasonable client will have no reason to believe that the result will not be achieved by the service provider. Thus, the repairer will generally be under an obligation to achieve a specific result, as would also be the case for the constructor under the regime of the present Chapter.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. ENGLISH, SCOTTISH, SWEDISH and FINNISH law have no codified rules regarding construction activities, see Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 1-001, Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 37-001, Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts'; Connolly, Construction Law, chap.1, and Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 122. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, however, note the relevant provisions of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996, Part II. Sweden and Finland, however, do have rules regarding consumer contracts, SWEDISH Consumer Services Act § 1 and chaps. 8/9 of the FINNISH Consumer Protection Act. Most other European jurisdictions have codified rules that cover all construction activities, see CC arts. 7:750 ff (THE NETHERLANDS), CC arts. 1710 and 1787 (BELGIUM), CC arts. 1787 ff (FRANCE), CC art. 1544 (SPAIN), CC arts. 1655-1677 (ITALY), CC §§ 631 ff (GERMANY), CC § 1151(1) (AUSTRIA), CC § 681 (GREECE). In ITALY and PORTUGAL, see CC art. 1207 and STJ 29 September 1998, CJ 1998 III, p. 34 intellectual work is not covered by the same rules, however. Some countries have additional rules for construction of immovables, DUTCH CC arts. 7:765 ff (only for consumer contracts), FRENCH CC arts. 1792-1793, SPANISH CC arts. 1588 to 1600 and POLISH CC arts. 647-658.

2. In all countries dealt with, building contract law is covered to a large extent by standard conditions, which have to be agreed on by the parties to be relied on directly but which also influence case law indirectly. See for details under National Systems. International conditions are provided by FIDIC (Féderation International des Ingenieurs Conseils) http://www.fidic.org and ICE (Institution of Civil Engineers) http://www.ice.org.uk standard contract terms.

II. Scope of the rules on construction

3. The AUSTRIAN CC § 1151(1) defines the contract for work (Werkvertrag). That contract is commonly defined as an achievement of a certain result. The result has to be understood in the broadest sense possible in order to cover a wide range of activities: manufacture, treatment, amending, restitution, or improvement of a corporeal thing, but also creation of non-corporeal works as well (writing of a play, data processing program), see Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I^2 , arts. 1165, 1166, no. 9.

4. The BELGIAN CC art. 1710 defines a contract for work (louage de services). More specific rules are given in arts. 1787 ff for contracts that relate to the construction of material and immaterial objects.

5. There is no specific legal regime for construction under ENGLISH law. Writers tend to concentrate on the creation of immovable property, Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 1-001 and Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 37-001. The Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996 ss. 104-105 define a construction contract in terms relating entirely to buildings and other immoveable structures, although it also includes agreements to perform architectural, design or surveying work and advice on building, engineering, interior or exterior decoration or on the laying-out of landscape, in relation to construction operations. The Act also applies in SCOTLAND.

6. Chapter 8 of the FINNISH Consumer Protection Act covers work or other performance relating to movables, immovables and other structures, including production of movables. Chapter 9 covers construction of immovables. Other construction contracts are covered by general contract law.

7. A contract for work under FRENCH law (louage d´ouvrage, contrat d´entreprise) regulated by CC arts. 1787 ff is a contract by which one party (the entrepreneur) undertakes to perform a work independently. This general contract concerns every kind of work both material and intellectual (Cass.civ. III, 28 February 1984, Bull.civ. III, no. 51). The CC contains specific provisions concerning the building construction contract (CC arts. 1792-1793).

8. Construction activities fall under the scope of the law on the contract for work (Werkvertag) in the GERMAN CC §§ 631 ff. These rules apply not only to construction but also to works at facilities of the client (e.g. installations, cleaning of a house), work at things which were handed over by the client (e.g. cleaning of clothes, reparation of a car), handcraft, intellectual works, processing work and others.

9. The GREEK CC art. 681 defines a contract for work, which could be of material or immaterial nature. When the contract for work involves the supply of services, specific rules apply in the context of consumer contracts (Act 2251/94, art. 8).

10. A construction contract falls within the scope of application of the provisions on the contratto d´appalto regulated in ITALIAN CC arts. 1655-1677. The appalto is a contract whereby a party undertakes to perform a work or a service. There is an often-debated borderline dividing an activity on tangible materials (to which provisions on appalto apply) and one on immaterial ideas (governed by rules on intellectual work). The contract of engineering is governed by the provisions on appalto even where only an intellectual activity is required (preliminary studies, drafting of a project, advice on technical and administrative matters, etc.).

11. The DUTCH CC art. 7:750 describes a contract for work on goods as a contract relating to a work of a physical nature. Subchapter 2 (CC arts. 7:765 ff) contains specific rules for construction of houses ordered by a consumer.

12. A building contract is regulated by the POLISH CC arts. 647-658. It is treated as a special kind of contract for specific work (CC art. 656 envisages corresponding application of provisions on the contract for work to the effects of the delay by the constructor of the beginning of the building work or the finishing of the object or performance of building work in a manner which is defective or inconsistent with the contract, to the warranty for the defect of the object built, and to the client's right to renounce the contract before the object is completed). Nevertheless, the building contract constitutes a separate type of contract (judgment of the Supreme Court of 12 December 1990, I CR 750/90 (OSNCP 1992 no. 5, poz. 81), although historically it derives from the contract for work (judgment of the Supreme Court of 12 February 1991, III CRN 500/90, OSNCP 1992, no. 7-8, poz. 137). The position of the parties to a building contract is also determined by the provisions of the administrative building law, which imposes certain obligations on both – the contractor and the client. Non-observance of such obligations may cause civil law consequences. Applicability of the administrative building law provisions constitutes the criterion, which distinguishes the contract for work from the building contract. Provisions on the building contract apply also to contracts for repair of a building or a construction (CC art. 658).

13. The contract for work (empreitada) is regulated by PORTUGUESE CC art. 1207 and following, but the trend of recent case law is that provisions on the contract for work do not apply to immaterial works: STJ 2 February 1988, BolMinJus 374, p. 449; STJ 17 June 1998, CJ 1998 II, p. 116; STJ 29 September 1998, CJ (STJ) 1998 III, p. 34.

14. Contracts for work (contratos de obra) are regulated together with services contracts by the SPANISH CC art. 1544. Construction contracts, but not of movables, are further regulated in CC arts. 1588 to 1600, see Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II[9], pp. 433 ff. On the classification of contracts for work, TS 6 November 1982, RJ 1982/6530. The most important legal source regarding construction contracts is the new Building Regulation Act

15. Construction work for immovables is covered by general SWEDISH contract law and standard conditions, see Hellner, Speciell avtalsrätt II, first book, p. 122. Consumer services with respect to movables are regulated in the Consumer Services Act. They include work on movables (lösa saker), KTjL art. 1 second sentence, and work on immovables, buildings or other constructions on land, in water and other stationary objects. Consumer Services Act § 2 exempts production of movables, except when the consumer supplies a major part of the material.

III. Standard terms

16. The norms of the AUSTRIAN Standards Institute [Österreiches Normungsinstitut; www.on-norm.at deal with contractual and technical aspects of various types of construction contracts. Important examples of such norms are ÖNORM A 2060 (Allgemeine Vertragsbestimmungen für Leistungen/General conditions for contracts – Works contract) and ÖNORM B 2110 (*Allgemeine Vertragsbestimmungen für Bauleistungen/*General conditions of contracts for works of building and civil engineering construction).

17. The most commonly used general conditions under ENGLISH law are the Joint Contracts Tribunal (JCT) forms of the Royal Institute of British Architects, and the Institute of Civil Engineers (ICE) standard form, Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], nos. 1007-1008 and Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 37-002. International contracts may be covered by the FIDIC models. There are SCOTTISH editions of most of these forms, as well as a number of indigenous models (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' paras. 10-12 (with update)); Connolly, Construction Law, chap. 2.

18. In FINLAND the most frequently used standard forms are General Conditions for Building Contracts, YSE 1998, and Conditions Concerning Sub-Contracts, RT 16-10205, see Liuksiala, Rakennussopimukset.

19. The most important standard conditions for the public sector in FRANCE are found in the Cahier des clauses administratives générales applicables aux marchés publics de travaux (CCAG-Travaux), enacted by the Decree no. 76-87 of the 21 January 1976. In the private area such standard conditions do exist as well, see the AFNOR norm NF P 03-001.

20. Verdingungsordnung für Bauleistungen (VOB) is the most important source of standard conditions in GERMAN law Part A deals with procurement, Part B contains standard conditions and Part C the technical norms (DIN-Normen).

21. The use of standard contract terms is common practice in GREECE, particularly in the area of building construction.

22. In practice, use is made of national standard contract terms, in the NETHERLANDS, the most important of which are the Uniforme Administratieve Voorwaarden voor de uitvoering van werken (UAV 1989). Construction of houses for consumers is usually covered by the Algemene Voorwaarden voor Aannemingen in het bouwbedrijf (AVA 1992) For design and construct contracts the Uniforme Administratieve Voorwaarden voor geïntegreerde contractvormen (UAV-GC 2000) are now available.

23. In POLAND, there are a few typical variations of the building contracts. These are: (1) contract of a general performance of the building, concluded by the client or the general executor of the project with the party that accepts position of the prime contractor, (2) contract of realisation of the building investment, concluded by the client with a so-called general executor of the project, (3) contract of a performance of building or assembling works concluded by the prime contractor with a subcontractor, (4) contract of a part-performance, concluded by the prime contractor with a so-called part-subcontractor, in cases when the main functions of the prime contractor are executed by the client, (5) contract of investment substitution, (6) so-called developer contracts (Rajski [-Strzępka] System Prawa Prywatnego, VII^{2}p. 398).

24. Contracts are sometimes based on FIDIC and ICE standard contract terms in PORTUGUESE law. Most times, however parties base some clauses of the contract on the REOP. Although this is a statute on public construction, even in private contracts parties opt to incorporate them in the contract, see Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 296.

25. In SPAIN contracts of construction which are concluded with the Public Administration are subject to the provisions of the Public Sector Contracts Act 2007.

26. The most frequently used standard contract form in SWEDEN is the AB 92 (allmänna bestämmelser för byggnads-, anläggnings- och installationsentreprenader), see Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 122. Another important standard contract is the ABS 95 (Allmänna bestämmelser för småhusentreprenader) used between a constructor and a consumer, who has received governmental financial support for the contract work. In such cases, the Consumer Services Act is not applicable. The ABS 95 can however be said to be a mixture between AB 92 and the Consumer Services Act.

IV.C.–3:102: Obligation of client to co-operate

The obligation of co-operation requires in particular the client to:

(a) provide access to the site where the construction has to take place in so far as this may reasonably be considered necessary to enable the constructor to perform the obligations under the contract; and

(b) provide the components, materials and tools, in so far as they must be provided by the client, at such time as may reasonably be considered necessary to enable the constructor to perform the obligations under the contract.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article sets out specific instances of the general obligation to co-operate in III.–1:104 (Co-operation), as already particularised for services in general in IV.C.–2:103 (Obligation to co-operate). From the latter Article, it is already clear that the client must answer reasonable requests for information by the constructor, for instance regarding the existing situation. Moreover, directions – such as drawings or other specifications to be delivered by an architect – should be given in good time. The same holds for permits and licences. The constructor is to enable the client to follow the construction process in order to determine whether the constructor is performing the obligations under the contract. The parties are also to co-ordinate their efforts.

The present Article mentions two additional issues for which the co-operation of the client is essential. The client must provide access to the construction site and, in so far as the client is to provide components, materials and tools, must provide these in time.

Illustration

The owner of a farm wants a constructor to build a shed on his premises. The constructor is to use the wood from the old shed, which the owner will tear down himself. The owner must give the constructor access to the place where the shed is to be built and must deliver the wood in time.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Access to the input provided by the client, and to the construction site, are particular examples of essential co-operation. If such access is not given in good time, the construction process may be delayed, and the constructor may be precluded from using the workforce and other resources optimally. The issue is whether the constructor or the client is to have the primary responsibility for organising these efforts.

C. Preferred option

Both specific instances of co-operation mentioned in this Article are essential elements of a well co-ordinated construction effort. Placing this burden on the client is a solution that is sufficiently supported by construction law in various jurisdictions. There are no indications that such duties are contested in other jurisdictions. The client usually is in the best position to ensure that these elements of the co-operation are taken care of.

D. Other issues for co-operation

Apart from the topics mentioned in the Article, there are other issues for co-operation. When undertaking construction activities, the parties may find it useful to design procedures for some aspects of co-operation. In standard conditions, it is common to have a detailed procedure for handing over of the structure, for inspection of the end result, for complaints resulting from this inspection, for discussing the progress of the project and for recording the outcomes of such discussions. Whether such elaborate procedures are useful and which procedures are pertinent depends on the size of the construction project and the ability of the parties to meet the procedural requirements. The costs of designing and implementing these procedures should be weighed against the expected benefits. Keeping written records of all the essential communications that take place is costly, but may lead to important savings in dealing with quality problems and other potential disputes later on.

Procedures for directions, variations, inspections, acceptance and handing over of the structure are very common in the standard conditions, but this is not yet the case with provisions regarding disputes, with the exception of arrangements regarding the court or arbitration tribunal that should deal with disputes and the law applicable. In the construction industry, and also in the software business, there is an increasing awareness of the necessity to solve disputes early and in an efficient manner. This is reflected in the development of the concept of 'Partnering' and in the establishment of 'Dispute Review Boards' for larger construction projects. Stimulating co-operation through the development of such procedures, or resorting to them when disputes arise, may be very useful.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. All jurisdictions accept a rather extensive obligation to co-operate of the client.
2. The obligation to co-operate arises from implied terms in ENGLAND (see Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 1-186 and Chitty on Contracts II[29], nos. 37-067 and 068) and SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts', paras. 52-59), from a specific rule for construction contracts in GERMANY (art. 642 para. 2 and CC art. 643) and AUSTRIA, (CC art. 1168 para. 2), or from general good faith, see art. 6:248 DUTCH CC, art. 1134 BELGIAN CC, art. 1258 SPANISH CC, art. 1375 ITALIAN CC (see also the general principles of correctness in performance of CC Article 1175) and arts. 762, 813 para. 2 PORTUGUESE CC.
3. In the SCANDINAVIAN countries and in POLAND the situation is less clear, but there are many specific rules on co-operation, see art. 3:12 and 17 SWEDISH AB 92 and chap. 9 § 31 of the FINNISH Consumer Protection Act, as well as FIDIC Conditions Clause 42. In FRANCE, the duty to co-operate of the client is more limited, but there may be duties in good faith, see CC art. 1134(3).
4. An obligation to give access is an implied term in ENGLAND (see Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 4-150 and Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 37-067) and SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts', para. 53). Other countries derive it from good faith or the duty to co-operate: BELGIUM (Goossens, Aanneming van werk, no. 987), GERMANY (CC art. 242 and art. 642), SPAIN (CC art. 1258), PORTUGAL (Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 344) and POLAND (see art. 635). Many standard conditions mention it as well, for instance in SWEDEN (AB 92 art. 3:14) THE NETHERLANDS (UAV 1989 art. 5-1, sub b and AVA 1992 art. 3(1)), AUSTRIA (ÖNORM B 2110 5. 9. 1). See also FIDIC Conditions Clause 42.

II. Obligation to co-operate in general

5. If the client does not co-operate, AUSTRIAN CC art. 1168(2) grants the constructor a right to rescind the contract under certain conditions. Positive obligations to co-operate can be found in ÖNORM B 2110, which contains many provisions stipulating an indirect obligation to co-operate, for instance a duty to ensure a proper co-operation between contractors, especially to co-ordinate their work, para. 5.14. The contractor is under a similar obligation vis-à-vis suppliers and sub-contractors.

6. A duty of the client to enable the work to be realised or to make this easier is generally assumed in DUTCH law. It is based on good faith (CC art. 1134), see Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 979 ff.

7. The doctrine of implied terms results in both parties having a positive obligation to do all that is necessary to enable the other party to perform, and to refrain from hindering the other's performance in ENGLISH law (Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 1-186 and Chitty on Contracts II[29], nos. 37-067 and 37-068). The same holds true in SCOTTISH law (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts', para. 52.

8. Chapter 9 § 31 of the FINNISH ConsProtA deals with delays due to failure to co-operate by the consumer-client, entitling the constructor to compensation and other remedies. Also, the General Conditions for Building Contracts YSE 1998 art 8 defines the client's general duty to co-operate.

9. The duty to co-operate of the client is limited to delivering the information necessary for the performance of the work under FRENCH law. If the client conceals this information, this can be regarded as contributory negligence and may lead to the partial exoneration of the constructor (Cass.civ. I, 17 March 1969, D. 1969, 532, knowledge of the client of particular characteristics of the soil), but there may be other duties in good faith, see CC art. 1134(3).

10. The GERMAN CC art. 642 entails a general duty to co-operate and contribute to the work for the client. The client may have to provide the material, get official permissions, deliver the design, and provide technical support (e.g. electricity, water). Article 6 no. 6 VOB/B also states that it is a lack of co-operation if another service supplier hired by the client does not provide the work on which the constructor has to build its contribution. Under the CC the duty to co-operate is not enforceable (BGH NJW 1954, 229). But the constructor may ask for compensation for the fruitless keeping ready of facilities and may terminate after setting an additional period of time, see CC art. 642(2), art. 643 and art. 9 VOB/B. If the lack of the client's contribution is of such intensity that it is unreasonable to continue the contractual relationship, the contractor may rescind immediately and demand damages because of non-performance (BGH NJW 1954, 229).

11. A general duty to co-operate may, in ITALIAN law, be deduced from the general principles of correctness in performance (CC art. 1175) and of good faith both at the pre-contractual (art. 1337) and contractual stage (art. 1375).

12. In the NETHERLANDS, the client's duty to co-operate is not codified but standard conditions deal with the contractor's duty to provide access to the client or persons acting on the client's behalf to exercise the right to supervision of the work (cf. art. 6-20 and 6-22 UAV 1989) and to be represented at the construction site at all times in order to receive and carry out directions given by or on behalf of the client (cf. art. 6-19 UAV 1989).

13. Both of the parties are under an obligation to co-operate in POLISH law which follows from the general rules of contract law (CC arts. 354 and 355). Additionally, parties to a building contract are obliged to co-operate in all phases of the building process, which follows from CC arts. 651 and 655 (Rajski [-Strzępka] System Prawa Prywatnego, VII,[2] p. 407).

14. No express provision exists on the duty to co-operate in PORTUGAL. It follows however from the general principles of good faith in CC arts. 762, 813(2). It includes the supply of the terrain, the plan, materials, tools, instructions, and co-operation to obtain administrative licenses, see Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 344.

15. In SPAIN, the obligation of the parties to co-operate, even when not expressly codified or agreed by the parties in their contracts, is to be enforced because it stems from good faith, usages and the law (CC art. 1258). Construction Actart. 9(2) imposes specific obligations on the client. Some of those are within the framework of co-operation: to deliver documents and information to allow the performance by the constructor and to authorise variations; to get all necessary licenses and administrative permits; to subscribe the mandatory insurance (art. 19).

16. Under SWEDISH law, the AB 92 does not contain any general obligation for the parties to co-operate. The provisions are instead rather detailed, for instance art. 3:12 laying upon the client the responsibility to coordinate his own work and work of other side-contractors with the constructor. Moreover, the parties are obliged to attend building meetings, which should address questions relevant to both parties and be held when necessary, art. 3:17.

III. Obligation to give access

17. Under the AUSTRIAN ÖNORM B 2110 the client has to provide for working and storage facilities at, access roads or railroads to, and gas, water, and electricity supplies for, the construction site in as far that is required to enable the contractor to perform the contractual obligations (5. 9. 1).

18. The duty to enable the constructor to carry out the work is a general principle of BELGIAN law regarding construction, see Goossens, Aanneming van werk, no. 987.

19. There is an implied term requiring the client to give possession of the site within reasonable time under ENGLISH law (Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], 1995, no. 4-150 and Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 37-067) and under SCOTTISH law (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts', para. 53).

20. The client is generally considered to have an obligation to give access to the constructor under FRENCH law (Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 32329; Picod, JCP éd. G 1988, I no. 3318).

21. Under GERMAN law the client has to give access to his territory if necessary. This obligation results from CC art. 242 (good faith) as well as CC art. 642.

22. Under DUTCH law, the client's duty to give access to the construction site is implied in UAV 1989 art. 5-1, sub b and AVA 1992 art. 3(1).

23. The POLISH CC does not contain in so many words an obligation to give access in the case of a building contract; it may be however derived from, for example, CC art. 636, which applies to the building contract on the basis of CC art. 656 para. 1.

24. Giving access to the terrain is part of the obligation to co-operate under PORTUGUESE law, see Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 344.

25. Although in SPANISH law there is no special legal provision on this point, the client-proprietor is obliged to grant the constructor the instrumental possession (posesión instrumental o servil) of the place where the construction work is to take place. This duty stems from the general principle according to which creditor is obliged to make the debtor's performance possible (TS 21 November 2002, RJ 2002/10269).

26. In SWEDISH law the constructor has a right to use the construction site in a way that is necessary for carrying out the contract work, in consultation with the client, Swedish AB 92 art. 3:14.

IV.C.–3:103: Obligation to prevent damage to structure

The constructor must take reasonable precautions in order to prevent any damage to the structure.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The general rule for all service contracts in IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care) already requires the constructor to comply with the statutory and disciplinary rules applicable to the activity (paragraph (1)(b)), and to take reasonable precautions in order to prevent the occurrence of damage as a consequence of the performance of the service. During the construction activity, the constructor must also take reasonable precautions against foreseeable damage to the structure.

Illustration

The constructor of a building is to protect the structure against external harm such as weather conditions and theft. This may require the building site to be covered in a way that protects it against rain and wind. If valuable materials are present on the site, the site may have to be fenced or even guarded.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

When construction activities take place, the risk of damage to the structure is usually higher than when the building is completed and in use. The structure is generally more easily accessible, more exposed to the elements and less stable than a completed building. Protection is therefore needed. The issue is: who is to provide protection, the constructor or the client?

Because the constructor will normally supervise the site where construction takes place, or at least the structure, and will also be accessing the structure regularly and frequently, the constructor is usually in the best position to take protective measures.

More generally, the constructor is usually in the best position to take safety measures and measures limiting a negative impact of the activity on goods and on third parties. Construction, by its nature, is a process which easily leads to damage to goods or even personal injury. The constructor will have to protect the constructors own materials and workforce anyhow, and protecting other goods and people is therefore not burdensome. Insurance cover is widely available. In exceptional cases, the client may be in a better position to take safety measures, and the parties may then wish to deviate from this default regime.

C. Preferred option

According to this Article, the constructor is the one who has the principal responsibility for safeguarding the structure during construction, for the reasons set out under B.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. First, it may be useful to note how different jurisdictions solve the general question of the obligation of skill and care imposed on the constructor.

2. Some jurisdictions use a general obligation to carry out the work with reasonable (professional) skill, notably ENGLAND (see Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 4-124, Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 37-069, Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s. 13), SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' paras. 34-36), SWEDEN (AB 92 art. 2:1 and Consumer Services Act § 4) and THE NETHERLANDS (Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 252-253).

3. Most jurisdictions, however, have a strict liability for the result of the construction efforts, and use a standard of care liability only for damage to the work, to other goods, or to persons, as well as in respect of other structures than immovables, see FINLAND (ConsProtA chap. 8 § 12 and chap. 9 § 13), FRANCE (Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], no. 740 and Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civils et commerciaux[7], nos. 727 ff), SPAIN Carrasco Perera/Cordero Lobato/González Carrasco, Derecho de la Construcción y la Vivienda[4], 353 para. 2 LOE, ITALY (CC art. 1176 and Mangini, Il contratto di appalto[2], p. 134), GERMANY (BGH NJW 1998, 3707, art. 13 no. 1 VOB/B and CC art. 633), AUSTRIA (CC art. 1299, Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], arts. 1165, 1166, no. 86 and ÖNORM A 2060), 2.10, GREECE (CC art. 685(1)), PORTUGAL (CC art. 1208, Urban Constructions Decree Law art. 15, CC art. 762(2)) and POLAND (CC art. 355).

4. The constructor's duty to prevent damage to the structure is established in SWEDEN, AB 92 art. 5:4, In other countries there is a more general duty to prevent damage to goods and persons, see ENGLAND (Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], nos. 1-273 ff), SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 149), FINLAND (ConsProtA chap. 8 § 20, chap. 8§ 21 and chap. 9 § 20 (but with some restrictions)), THE NETHERLANDS (art. 6-6 and art. 6-16 UAV 1989, art. 5, para. 1, AVA 1992) SPAIN (preamble and LOE art. 3 b.3*)*, GERMANY (BGH VersR 1969, 927; BGH NJW 83, 113; CA Karlsruhe VersR 1985, 297; Staudinger [-Peters], BGB [2003][13], art. 635 nos. 6-7), AUSTRIA (ÖNORM B 2110, 5.13 and 5.41.2), PORTUGAL (RGEU arts. 15 ff, and art. 135), and POLAND (CC art. 652). This duty even tends to go in the direction of a strict liability in FRANCE (see with regard to this obligation de sécurité: Le Tourneau and Cadiet, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats (2002/2003), no. 1827, and Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], no. 748 (against), but case law is not clearly established).

II. General standard of care

5. The AUSTRIAN CC art. 1299 requires the usual degree of care and attention that is necessary for the task in question, see JBl 1962, 152; SZ 34/153, JBl 1962, 322; SZ 35/130, EvBl 1963/164; JBl 1982, 245, EvBl 1981/159; Gschnitzer, Schuldrecht, Besonderer Teil und Schadensersatz[2], 482, and Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VI[3], art. 1299, no. 2. If the mode of construction is not contractually agreed, the contractor has to perform pursuant to the usage, local custom and technical rules, see Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], arts. 1165, 1166, no. 86 and ÖNORM A 2060, 2.10.

6. In BELGIUM art.1135 CC (contractual good faith) is a basis for such obligations, see Goossens, Aanneming van werk, 2003, nos. 955 ff.

7. In ENGLAND, there is a general 'workmanship' obligation, to carry out the work with reasonable skill, (Young & Marten Ltd. v. McManus Childs Ltd. [1969] 1 AC 454, see Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 4-124 and Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 37-069). Where a service is supplied in the course of a business, there is an implied term that it will be carried out with reasonable skill and care, Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s. 13.

8. For minor work on immovables delivered to consumers, FINNISH law requires the service to be carried out with professional skill and care, taking into account the interests of the client, see ConsProtA chap. 8 § 12. For other construction work the requirements of good building practice and the reasonable expectations of the consumer are relevant, see ConsProtA chap. 9 § 13.

9. Under FRENCH law, the constructor of a corporeal thing is generally under an obligation of result with respect to the construction itself. Other entrepreneurs may be under an obligation de moyens, however. Additional responsibilities may also arise, in relation to the conservation of the thing on which the construction work is performed, or the safeguarding of other goods, see Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], no. 740 and Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civils et commerciaux[7], nos. 727 ff.

10. GERMAN law does not focus on the quality of the construction activity itself, but more on the outcome of the work. The construction work has to be fit for its normal purpose (BGH NJW 1998, 3707). The work is defective if it is not built according to the general standard of technique (Regeln der Technik), see art. 13 no. 1 VOB/B and CC art. 633 (BGH BauR 1981 577, 579).

11. The constructor must, under GREEK law, exercise the care required in the respective trade or business, CC art. 330. Moreover, CC art. 685(1) states that a contractor is bound to use with care materials supplied by the client, to render account in respect thereof and to return to the client any left over.

12. In ITALY the constructor is required to perform with the diligence and knowledge which are inherent to the exercise of the professional activity in question (ITALIAN CC art. 1176). The constructor is entitled to perform in a position of autonomy and thus has to abide by the general standard of care which is typical of the profession, see Mangini, Il contratto di appalto[2], p. 134; Marinelli, Giust.civ. 1982, II, p. 116).

13. Under DUTCH law, the constructor has to process the things in a competent manner, carrying out the work with reasonable skill. Cf. Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 252-253.

14. The constructor, in POLISH law, must observe the generally required standard of care, higher in the case of professionals, see CC art. 355.

15. In PORTUGAL the constructor is under an obligation to produce a flawless and fit for purpose work in conformity with the contract (CC art. 1208). In building construction the best standards of construction practice must be observed, Urban Constructions Decree Law art. 15. This is complemented by duties of information, security, secrecy, etc., stemming from the principle of good faith, see CC art. 762(2) and Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 350.

16. In SCOTTISH law the contractor's general obligation is one of care and skill, which includes the selection and installation of materials that are fit for purpose (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' paras. 34-36; Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 ss.11A(3), 11D). A more general term of fitness for purpose may be expressed or implied in the particular circumstances of the case.

17. The contract for work imposes an obligation of result under SPANISH law. However, this obligation of result is complemented by the LOE with specific obligations to be observed by the constructor during the construction process. These are intended to guarantee that the constructor will achieve the expected result, see LOE art. 11(2). The constructor is obliged to carry out the construction work in accordance with the designed project, applicable legislation and the instructions of the technicians in order to achieve the quality required in the project.

18. In SWEDEN the contractor must perform the work in a professional manner, AB 92 art. 2:1 and Consumer Services Act § 4. Regarding consumers, the professional must also consider the interests of the consumer and consult him or her to the extent necessary and possible, Consumer Services Act § 4.

III. Prevention of damage to the existing part of the structure and to other persons and goods

19. It is a general principle of law in AUSTRIA that the contractor has to perform the contractual obligations without causing any damage to other persons and goods. Liability may be contractual in relation to contractual partners (based on the contractual obligation of skill and care) or non-contractual in relation to third parties (according to the law of delict; S. ÖNORM B 2110 contains more detailed provisions in that regard: the contractor is obliged to secure the construction site (5.13) and is liable vís-a-vís third parties for certain damage caused by the construction activity (Schaden Dritter, 5.41.2).

20. The liability will be based on the tort of negligence under ENGLISH law, see Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], nos. 1-273 ff.

21. In FINLAND, in relations with consumers, the constructor is liable for damage in relation to personal injury and property, see ConsProtA chap. 8 §§ 20-21 and chap. 9 § 20, but with some restrictions.

22. A part of the legal doctrine in FRANCE is of the opinion that the entrepreneur and more particularly the constructor are under an obligation de sécurité (Le Tourneau, Cadiet, Droit de la Responsabilité, no. 1827). On the other hand some are against this idea (Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], no. 748). The case law is not clearly established. Additional responsibilities may also arise, in relation to the conservation of the thing on which construction work is performed, or the safeguarding of other goods, see Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], no. 740 and Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civils et commerciaux[7], nos. 727 ff.

23. The constructor has secondary obligations, under GERMAN law, arising from the principle of good faith (CC art. 242) to act with consideration regarding the property of the client (BGH VersR 1969, 927; BGH NJW 83, 113) and may not endanger the client's life or health (CA Karlsruhe VersR 1985, 297). The constructor also has to compensate the client for damages sustained by third parties, e.g. neighbours (Staudinger [-Peters], BGB [2003], § 635 nos. 6, 7).

24. In ITALY, the constructor is liable for any damage caused to third parties from the performance of the work. Only in those situations in which the constructor has no room to decide and acts as a nudus minister of the client, or when the damage to the third party was caused by a decision taken by a director of the work, nominated by the client, is there room for liability of the client, Danovi, Foro pad. 1991, IV, 2, pp. 99-110).

25. In the NETHERLANDS the contractor must carry out the work in such a manner that the client and others are not unnecessarily hindered and that damage to persons, goods or the environment is limited as much as possible (art. 6-6 UAV 1989, art. 5, para. 1, AVA 1992). The contractor further has to provide order and safety at the construction site, as well as sufficient illumination for a proper execution of the work (art. 6-16 UAV 1989).

26. With regard to the prevention of damage on a building site there is a specific regulation in POLISH law. If the contractor has taken over site from the client the contractor is liable, until the time of handing over the work, for any damage occurring on that site (CC art. 652).

27. In PORTUGUESE law, during the execution of works of any sort, measures must be taken not only to avoid damage to property but also to guarantee the security of the public and the workers, and to safeguard, so far as possible, the normal circulation of traffic on public roads. See arts. 15 ff, and Urban Constructions Decree Law art. 135.

28. The liability in SCOTTISH law depends upon general principles of negligence in the law of delict (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 149; Connolly, Construction Law, chap. 6).

29. Under SPANISH law, in the preamble of the LOE, it is stated that the enactment of the new statute responds, among other things, to the demands of society regarding the quality of buildings. This refers not only to safety and protection against fire, but also to other aspects such us protection against noise, thermal insulation or accessibility for handicapped persons, see also LOE art. 3 b 3. However, the LOE only deals with the consequences of material damage and not of personal injury. LOE art. 19(1) imposes on the constructor the obligation to take out insurance for material damage caused by the construction work.

30. The constructor is liable under SWEDISH AB 92 art. 5:4 for damage to any part of the contract work not yet delivered. The constructor is also obliged to effect an all-risks insurance, art. 5:22(2).

IV.C.–3:104: Conformity

(1) The constructor must ensure that the structure is of the quality and description required by the contract. Where more than one structure is to be made, the quantity also must be in conformity with the contract.

(2) The structure does not conform to the contract unless it is:

(a) fit for any particular purpose expressly or impliedly made known to the constructor at the time of the conclusion of the contract or at the time of any variation in accordance with IV.C.–2:109 (Unilateral variation of the service contract) pertaining to the issue in question; and

(b) fit for the particular purpose or purposes for which a structure of the same description would ordinarily be used.

(3) The client is not entitled to invoke a remedy for non-conformity if a direction provided by the client under IV.C.–2:107 (Directions of the client) is the cause of the non-conformity and the constructor performed the obligation to warn pursuant to IV.C.–2:108 (Contractual obligation of the service provider to warn).

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This is one of the central rules on construction. The constructor is to guarantee the fitness for purpose of the structure. When the structure is not fit for its purpose, the constructor will have to prove that the cause of that was beyond the constructor's control. The rule is a specific application and refinement of IV.C.–2:106 (Obligation to achieve result). The client may expect that the result will be achieved.

The structure must conform to a particular purpose made known to the constructor at the time of conclusion of the contract. If such a particular purpose is made known to the constructor at a later time, the constructor is obliged to make sure the structure will be fit for that particular purpose if the content of the contract is changed in accordance with IV.C.–2:109 (Unilateral variation of the service contract).

Furthermore, the structure must be fit for the purpose or purposes for which a structure of the same description would normally be used. Without indications to the contrary, the client may reasonably expect that the structure will be fit for such a normal purpose. If the constructor is not able to render the structure fit for such a purpose, the client should be so informed.

A client and a shipbuilder agreed on a contract for the construction of a large sailing ship. The client may expect a sufficiently large sailing ship to be seaworthy. If the client made known to the shipbuilder that he wishes to use the ship for trips with groups consisting of a maximum of ten people, he may expect the ship to offer sufficient sleeping and sitting space for ten persons, albeit perhaps in shifts.

Similarly, the structure does not conform to the contract if a part or component is not fit for its particular or normal purpose, even though the whole structure may be fit for its purpose. Of course, such a partial non-conformity would only lead to an adjusted remedy.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Liability with regard to the quality of the outcome is an important issue for both parties. When the liability for the quality is strict, the constructor will have to remedy defects even when every relevant quality criterion was met regarding the assessment of the existing situation, the input and the process of construction. The only escape is to show that specific defences apply. When there is no liability for 'fitness for purpose', the central issue will be whether the constructor satisfied the quality criteria set for the activities. In practice, the difference between the two approaches should not be overstated, especially when the burden of proving that the duties were performed is on the constructor. In that case, the question is rather which defences are allowed under both regimes.

An advantage of the former approach is that the quality of the outcome may be easier to discuss and to establish than the quality of the processes and interactions that led to that outcome. It may, for instance, be hard to reconstruct the events that preceded the apparent defect in the outcome and to what extent the constructor exercised care with respect to these events. So, the legal and other administrative costs of the stricter liability system are likely to be lower. Another issue to take into account is the possibility of insurance. In most countries, there is 'construction all risk' coverage available with regard to the risks of construction of buildings. In France, this coverage is even obligatory for most building projects.

The costs of stricter liability and insurance will be reflected in the price. So, accepting the former system will lead to somewhat higher prices of construction. There may be only an effect on the initial price, however. Under a fault liability for defects, the client will in many cases let the constructor repair the defects anyhow, because the client will wish to obtain a structure that is fit for its purpose. Thus, the client will in most cases pay the extra price for remedying, even if this is under the heading of costs for extra work and not under the heading of an element of the initial price intended for coverage of the stricter liability.

Whether liability for the fitness for purpose of the outcome or an obligation of means is the more acceptable system will also depend on the frequency of constructors not being able to attain the result envisaged. When it is normally relatively easy for the constructor to construct a structure that is fit for its purpose, stricter liability is more acceptable than in situations where it is rather uncertain whether a structure will be fit for its purpose. Taking normal precautions in most circumstances may prevent major defects. This may be different for highly innovative structures or things, such as entirely new and tailor-made machinery or software, but in such situations special contractual arrangements will be necessary anyhow, and the parties can adjust the liability regime to these specific needs. In many construction projects, the problem will rather be that some small defects are virtually unavoidable. The main issue there is probably who is generally in the best position to prevent as many of these defects as possible. Furthermore, it is a matter of how the various solutions work in terms of costs of sorting out whether the constructor is liable and, if not, of negotiating for extra work.

A related issue is the extent of control the constructor has over the construction process. If the client or experts hired by the client make decisions on the design and on the other input, the constructor may have less influence on the final outcome. Whether this should lead to diminished liability will depend to some extent on the care expected from the constructor with respect to input and instructions from the client. This issue is generally covered by the constructor's obligation to warn; see IV.C.–2:108 (Contractual obligation of the service provider to warn).

C. Comparative overview

The principle that the final outcome of the construction process (the structure) should be fit for its purpose or – which amounts to the same thing – should not contain defects is a central idea in French, Spanish, German, Austrian and Greek law. In these countries, the constructor has an obligation to construct a structure that is fit for its intended use, which may be either the purpose for which it is generally considered to be used or a specific purpose for this specific structure. Therefore, in these countries the principle of perfect final result is accepted: the constructor is under an obligation de résultat. This implies that the constructor will be liable unless the constructor proves that the client's specifications were the cause of the problem and amount to an impediment beyond the constructor's control, excusing the bad performance as force majeure. Whether force majeure can be proved of course heavily depends upon the way in which the concept is interpreted.

Although English courts now apply the 'fitness for purpose' test to the building of houses and some other structures, the traditional rule in English law is different. If the client provides the constructor with more or less detailed instructions, the constructor is not under an obligation to produce a structure which is fit for its purpose, but is only bound to prove that the work was carried out in accordance with the plans and specifications in a workmanlike manner, using proper materials. If the constructor proves that the instructions were followed conscientiously and that proper care was exercised, the constructor will not be liable if the structure is not fit for its purpose. Where the client, however, relies on the constructor's skill and judgement, such as in a contract to build a house for use by the client, there will be an implied warranty that the house will be reasonably fit for its purpose. In Belgium, the Netherlands and Sweden, the systems are in between the English and the 'obligation of result' system.

Under the English system, the constructor can avoid liability by proving that the work was carried out in accordance with the quality requirements set in the contract. With respect to those issues on which the contract is silent, the constructor has to prove that high-quality materials were used and processed in a good and workmanlike manner, which includes warning the client against apparent defects in instructions or other input from his side. Swedish, Spanish, Portuguese, German and Dutch law give the constructor the possibility of proving that the defect is caused by contractual requirements or other decisions for which the client is responsible, unless the constructor had to warn the client against the possible defects resulting from this. The French system is different in that it allows a defence based on decisions for which the client is responsible only when the client knew or had reason to know the unsuitability of the decision – a rule that is seldom applied. All systems are similar in that they allow a defence in real force majeure cases, which, however, are extremely rare.

D. Preferred option

Although the results may in the end be very similar, depending largely on the way the concept of force majeure is understood, the interpretation of the duty of a careful constructor and the burden of proof in this respect, the two approaches fundamentally differ from each other. Therefore, an explicit choice between the two approaches has to be made.

A solution may be to distinguish between traditional contracts and 'design and build' contracts. In the latter type of contract, the constructor is able to control to a large extent the achievement of a perfect final result and it will also be much easier to establish that the defect occurred due to a circumstance that was beyond the constructor's control. On the other hand, in a traditional building contract the decisions made by the client – and, in particular, by the client's architect – may diminish the constructor's ability to achieve the perfect final result too much to put such a heavy liability on the constructor. However, with regard to the extent of control left to the constructor, probably no fundamental difference exists between a traditional building contract on the one hand and a design and build contract on the other. Certainly, the constructor's freedom is more restricted in a traditional building contract, where important decisions are usually taken by the client, whereas in a 'design and build' contract, such decisions will usually be taken by the constructor. Nevertheless, the constructor's freedom in a traditional building contract may be far greater if the client does not take these decisions, whereas the constructor's supposed freedom under a 'design and build' contract may be limited considerably by a client's interference.

Therefore, the amount of influence the client may exercise on the outcome of the construction process is not necessarily related to the choice of a modern or traditional model, but to the extent of the control of the constructor over the choices that are to be made. Making the amount of influence exercised by the other party the decisive criterion is problematic, however. It is difficult to determine the right borderline, and such a criterion would therefore lead to considerable uncertainty.

If a choice between the two systems has to be made, the fitness for purpose rule seems to be preferable. If the structure is unfit for its purpose, the constructor is generally in a much better position to explain the reasons for this than the client. Moreover, the constructor will generally be in the best position to repair the defect perceived, irrespective of who has to bear the costs in the end. Finally, in most countries insurance is available which covers the main risks of construction.

The burden on the constructor will also depend on what must be proved in order to escape liability. In this respect, the system followed here is that the constructor can be discharged by proving that the defect is caused by decisions made by the client. Such decisions may either be contained in the contract or in subsequent directions, unless the constructor had a duty to warn. In this manner, liability is linked to the extent of control the constructor has over the process. Finally, liability may be avoided if an impediment beyond the constructor's control was the cause of the non-performance, and if the constructor could not reasonably be expected to have taken the impediment into account at the time of conclusion of the contract, or to have avoided or overcome the impediment or its consequences; see III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment).

This Article can be seen as an application of IV.C.–2:106 (Obligation to achieve result). For construction, the general rule is that the constructor must achieve the specific result stated by the client: 'fitness for purpose'.

It should be noted that a contract for the construction and sale of goods or other assets within the scope of Book IV.A. will be regarded as primarily a contract for the sale of those goods or assets. (IV.A.–1:102 (Goods to be manufactured or produced) The construction rules will apply only so far as necessary to regulate the construction elements in the contract and only to the extent that they do not conflict with the sales rules. (II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts)) The sales rules on conformity and remedies for non-conformity will therefore apply. This prevents conflicts between two sets of rules.

According to subparagraph (2)(a), the structure must be fit for the particular purpose made known to the constructor at the time of the conclusion of the contract or at the time the contract was changed in accordance with IV.C.–2:109 (Unilateral variation of the service contract). There is no exception, as there is in the case of sales (IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging etc.) paragraph (a)), for those situations where the client did not rely, or where it was unreasonable for the client to rely, on the constructor's skill and judgement. In a construction case the client will normally rely, and will be entitled to rely, on the constructor having or being able to acquire the necessary skills and competence to make the structure fit for that purpose if the constructor does not make known to the client that this is not the case. In other words, if the constructor keeps silent when confronted with the particular purpose the client has for the structure, the constructor more or less guarantees that the necessary skills and competence will be available.

The national laws on construction support this solution. There, such a defence is not common. In construction situations, it will generally be less burdensome for the constructor to state expressly that the fitness of a structure for a particular purpose is not guaranteed, because the parties will communicate frequently. It is different in important categories of pure sales transactions, such as consumer transactions and trading, where the parties will not communicate so frequently.

As in the Article on sales, the present Article also refers to the normal purpose of a structure of the kind in question. In construction cases, a specific purpose will often be made known to the constructor. This may happen during the negotiations preceding the contract or at the time of later variations or directions. In the latter case, the purpose made known to the constructor will generally be a more specific one.

The burden of proof that the structure is not fit for its purpose is on the client. The client will not have much difficulty in proving communication about the structure's normal purpose. Proving that a specific purpose has been communicated to the constructor will be less easy, but it is reasonable to require this of the client. With respect to claims under paragraph (4), the burden of proof is on the constructor.

The rules in this Article are default rules. They apply only unless otherwise agreed.

NOTES

I. General

1. The European jurisdictions generally accept strict liability for failure to meet the specifications of the structure expressed in the contract, ENGLAND (Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 4-080), SWEDEN (AB 92, art. 4:7 and 5:6), FINLAND (in consumer construction projects regarding immovables, ConsProtA chap. 9 § 13), THE NETHERLANDS (cf. Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 513), SPAIN (TS of 30 January 1997, Aranzadi Civil 845), ITALY (L´appalto, Rassegna di giurisprudenza commentata, directed by A. Jannuzzi, I, Milano, p. 310), AUSTRIA (ÖNORM A 2060).

2. On top of this, some countries have a fitness for purpose requirement, at least for some contracts or for some (generally important) defects: ENGLAND (where the client relies generally on the constructor and in a contract to build a residential house, see Hancock v. B.W. Brazier (Anerly) Ltd. [1966] 1 WLR 1317, Court of Appeal, Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 4-105 and Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 37-071), FRANCE (Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civils et commerciaux[7], pp. 81, 97, 99-100 and Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 32246 and 32276), SPAIN (Martinez Mas, La recepción en el contrato de obra, p. 87), ITALY (CC arts. 1667-1669; Cass. 7 October 1970, no. 1834, Giust.civ.Mass., p. 979), GERMANY (BGH NJW 1998, 3707), AUSTRIA (CC arts. 922 ff and 1167), GREECE CC (arts. 688, 689, but fault is required with regard to the award of damages), PORTUGAL (CC art. 1208 and CA Lisboa, 27 November 1981, CJ 1981, V, 164), and POLAND (CC arts. 556, 568, 637, 638). Others only require the service to be performed professionally SWEDEN (AB 92 art. 2:1 first paragraph and Consumer Services Act § 4 for consumers), THE NETHERLANDS (Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 513) and England (Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 4-105, Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 37-071, for other structures).

II. Fitness for purpose

3. The AUSTRIAN CC arts. 922 ff contain basic rules on a legal warranty of performance valid for all types of contracts for consideration. Basically, this regime is one of liability without the requirement of fault on the part of the contractor: art. 1167 is a special provision on warranty for defects in the field of contracts of work, specifying the remedies. Art. 928 exempts obvious defects from warranties but should not apply in cases of contract of work. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], art. 1167, no. 6, arguing that art. 928 deals with the situation at the point of conclusion of the contract ('Augen auf, Kauf ist Kauf'). ÖNORM A 2060 repeats and clarifies the regime of legal warranty.

4. Fault is a requirement for liability of the constructor in BELGIAN law, see Jansen. Defects liability, pp. 265 ff.

5. In ENGLAND, the question whether there is an obligation to construct a building fit for its purpose depends on the contract, Viking Grain Storage v T.H. White, (1985) 33 BLR 10, Court of Appeal, – simple contract to supply and erect a grain storage building, no architects employed by client, held constructor liable when unfit for its purpose. When detailed instructions are given by the client, there is an obligation to follow the instructions but no general fitness for purpose obligation, Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 4-080. Where the client relies generally on the constructor, there is likely to be an implied term that the work carried out by the constructor will on completion be reasonably fit for its purpose, Duncan v. Blundell (1820) 3 Stark 6, 171 ER 749 ("Where a person is employed in a work of skill the employer buys both his labour and his judgment; he ought not to undertake the work if it cannot succeed and he should know whether it will or not; of course it is otherwise if the party employing him chooses to supersede the workman's judgment by his own", per Bayley J., see also Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 4-081, Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 37-071. It is clear law that a contract to build a residential house includes a implied warranty that the house will be reasonably fit for its purpose, i.e. human habitation, Hancock v. B.W. Brazier (Anerly) Ltd. [1966] 1 WLR 1317, Court of Appeal, Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 4-105.

6. In consumer construction projects regarding immovables, the performance of the constructor is defective under FINNISH law if it does not in content, quality or other characteristics conform to what can be deemed agreed, the ConsProtA chap. 9 § 13.

Regarding defective work or other performance relating to movables, immovables and other structures, the service provider has the option to prove that the service has been provided with professional care and skill, ConsProtA chap. 12 § 4.

7. Under FRENCH law, the quality of the materials and the way they are processed have to be such that they render the final construction fit for its purpose; Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civils et commerciaux[7], pp. 81, 97, 99-100; Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 32246 and 32276. This relates to three types of defect: 1. defects which compromise the solidity of the work or render it unsuitable for its purpose (CC art. 1792); 2. defects which compromise the functioning of the equipment separable from the work; 3. defects reported by the client at the moment of the reception of the work (CC art. 1792-6). On other defects, what French lawyers call "dommages intermédiaires", the legal regime of guarantee is not applicable, but the general provisions on contractual liability are. They require a fault.

8. The construction work has to be fit for its normal purpose under GERMAN law (BGH NJW 1998, 3707). The work is defective if it is not built according to the general technical standard. This is not explicitly laid down in the CC but only in VOB/B art. 13 no. 1. Nevertheless this principle is to be applied for CC art. 633 as well (BGH BauR 1981 577, 579). An important means to determine the general technical standard are the DIN-Normen (published by the Deutsche Institut für Normung e.v.), the guidelines by the German society of engineers (VDI-Richtlinien).

9. GREEK law starts from the position that the contract for work is primarily a contract directed towards the production of a certain result. That alone indicates that the contractor is accountable for the quality of the final result. The contractor is liable for defects in the work (CC arts. 688, 689). Fault is required only with regard to the award of damages, but not for other remedies, See A.P. 620/1995 EEN 1996, p. 536.

10. Under ITALIAN law the constructor has to deliver a structure which is in conformity with the contractual provisions and made following the rules of the art. In the case of defects or non-conformities which do not affect the stability and solidity of the structure, the constructor is liable pursuant to CC arts. 1667 and 1668. In the case of a defect which endangers the stability of the structure, the constructor is liable under CC art. 1669. Both liabilities constitute, together, typical manifestations of the general and ordinary liability of the constructor in relation to the outcome of the construction process (Cass. 7 October 1970, no. 1834, Giust.civ.Mass., p. 979). A structure is thus regarded as defective when, even if normally conform to the contractual agreement, it does not respect the relevant rules of art (Januzzi, L´appalto: rassegna di giurisprudenza commentata I, p. 310). Therefore a structure may not conform and be defective, or conform but be defective, or not conform and not defective (Rubino-Sammartano, Foro pad. 1986 I, 1, pp. 43-47). If a specific use was agreed upon and the structure is fit for a normal use, but not for this unusual one, there is a case of non-conformity.

11. There is no fitness for purpose rule, merely an obligation to materialise a work that meets the level of quality specified in the contract, under DUTCH law, Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 513; Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 265 ff. Many authors have argued that this obligation is to be regarded as an obligation de résultat, see for instance Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], nos. 509 ff, but only for conformity with the contract, not general fitness for purpose, Cf. Van den Berg, Samenwerkingsvormen in de bouw, nos. 69-70; Jansen, Defects liability, p. 271.

12. In POLAND the work has to be performed 'correctly' and in a manner consistent with the contract. If the contract does not specify otherwise, the constructor is liable for defects and the rules on sales apply respectively (POLISH CC arts. 556, 568, 637, 638). Physical defects are defined as: defects, which reduce the value or utility of the work with respect to the purpose stipulated in the contract or resulting from the circumstances or the destination of the work; defects which mean that the work does not have the properties which the constructor assured the client it would have; and defects resulting from the fact that the work was released to the client in an incomplete condition (CC art. 556 para. 1). A legal defect, in the case of a building contract, occurs if the work is the property of a third party or if it is encumbered with a right of a third party (CC art. 556 para. 2).

13. The work must be flawless and fit for purpose under the PORTUGUESE CC art. 1208. This is an obligation of result: the constructor is liable for defects in the work, even in the absence of fault. Fault is presumed: CC arts. 798, 799. CA Lisboa, 27 November 1981, CJ 1981, V, 164. In building contracts the contractor is liable for defects of construction or soil towards the client and third parties acquiring the structure or a part of it (CC art. 1225).

14. In SCOTTISH law the contractor must select and install materials that are fit for purpose (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' paras. 34-36; Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 ss.11A(3), 11D). A more general term of fitness for purpose of the whole construction may be expressed or implied in the particular circumstances of the case, especially where the contractor has also supplied the design (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 37; Connolly, Construction Law, chap. 4.67-4.71).

15. In SPANISH law the construction work is not in conformity when the structure is not fit for the purpose or purposes for which a structure of the same description would normally be used; Martinez Mas, La recepción en el contrato de obra, p. 163) and thus the expectations of the client are frustrated. The Supreme Court has repeatedly stated that for there to be liability for a defective construction it is enough that the construction is not fit for its purpose (TS 17 February 1986, RJ 1986/683). The TS of 30 January 1997 (RJ 1997/845) points out that the obligation of the constructor is to execute and deliver the construction work and assure that it is adequate, correct, and the one agreed. Doctrine and jurisprudence regard the general fitness for purpose test as the criterion for conformity. It may be concluded that if the structure must conform to a particular purpose, the client must have informed the constructor of such circumstance.

16. According to the SWEDISH AB 92, the constructor can be said to be strictly liable for remedying defects emerging during the two-year guarantee period, arts. 4:7 and 5:6. In AB 92 the general rule is that the work performed must conform to what is agreed upon in the contractual documents and other documents and other instructions submitted before the ending of the contracting time aimed at specifying and clarifying the contract documents. If there is no special agreement on the level of quality of a certain part of the work, the work must be performed in accordance with the standard of the contract works in general, AB 92 art. 2:1 first paragraph. Concerning consumer contracts, Consumer Services Act § 4 states that the contractor must perform the service professionally.

IV.C.–3:105: Inspection, supervision and acceptance

(1) The client may inspect or supervise the tools and materials used in the construction process, the process of construction and the resulting structure in a reasonable manner and at any reasonable time, but is not bound to do so.

(2) If the parties agree that the constructor has to present certain elements of the tools and materials used, the process or the resulting structure to the client for acceptance, the constructor may not proceed with the construction before having been allowed by the client to do so.

(3) Absence of, or inadequate, inspection, supervision or acceptance does not relieve the constructor wholly or partially from liability. This rule also applies when the client is under a contractual obligation to inspect, supervise or accept the structure or the construction of it.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article deals with the options of the client to control what the constructor does in order to perform the obligations under the contract. Reasonable supervision and inspection are allowed. The parties may agree that certain input, elements of the process, or parts of the final structure have to be presented to the client for acceptance. If they do so agree, the constructor must wait for the client's answer before proceeding with the construction.

The general approach is that all these measures are deemed to serve the interests of the client only. This means that the client has no obligation or duty to inspect or supervise. The client's failure to do so does not relieve the constructor from any obligations even if the contract provides for inspection or supervision. A provision that certain matters must be accepted by the client before the constructor can proceed is also seen as an extra check for the client. The constructor's position is, however, protected to some extent by the rules on failure to notify in III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity).

The client of a provider of tailor-made machinery for a production facility is entitled to supervise and inspect the work of the constructor. He may also require the constructor to submit parts of the machinery for testing. If the constructor delivers machinery that is not fit for its purpose, however, he cannot defend himself by indicating that the client should have discovered the defect during an appropriate inspection or while supervising the construction process. Acceptance by the client is no defence either, because acceptance is deemed to take place in the interest of the client. The constructor may however, show that the allegedly defective performance was a result of a direction by the client, or of a variation of the contract.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The client will often want to monitor the input, process and results of construction activities during construction. Inspections, or even constant supervision of the activity, may cause some disturbance to the constructor, but when well timed and organised they usually can be carried out with minimal costs to the constructor. When there are important choices to be made by the constructor, the client may want the constructor to submit the choices and ask for agreement. Similarly, the client may wish the constructor to present certain input, elements of the process or results for approval before the constructor proceeds to the next stages of construction. But what are the consequences of inspection, supervision or acceptance for the liability of the service provider?

Inspections – or supervision as a more intensive type of monitoring – are beneficial to the constructor as well. Costs may be saved by early discovery of potential defects or of changes in preferences of the client which might have led to repair or to variations. When inspections are carried out by well-informed clients, or by experts hired by the client, the constructor will probably even take advantage of their knowledge and use it to reach superior results against lower costs. In some construction activities, the roles of the constructor and the supervisor may even be reversed. The constructor then is just the one who carries out the detailed instructions by the supervisor; the supervisor provides the expertise.

The position of the client needs careful consideration in this respect. The supervision provided or hired by the client will lead to some overlap in expertise. Both the supervisor and the constructor will, for instance, spend time considering the advantages and disadvantages of certain alternatives. This overlap is essential and intended, because the interaction will presumably lead to better results, but it also leads to extra costs. There will be a point where the doubling of expertise starts to become detrimental to the client's interests. On the other hand, situations may develop where the experts rely excessively on each other to solve a particular problem. Hiring a supervisor, for instance, may lead to the constructor's relying on the supervisor's expertise for every minor decision, which will drive up the costs of supervision and not substantially diminish the costs on the part of the constructor, whose contract may be at a fixed price. And when the constructor relies on the supervisor to solve an issue, whilst the supervisor expects the constructor to deal with it, the client may suffer in the end. The client may be confronted with a defect, and will have difficulties attributing the responsibility for this defect.

What is needed here, therefore, is a clear division of responsibilities, or at least a procedure that leads to that state of affairs. The rule adopted should prevent an unnecessary overlap of the efforts of the parties involved, but also cover situations where no party is responsible. At the same time, the rule should facilitate valuable types of co-operation between constructor, supervisor and client.

With respect to the acceptance of certain elements by the client, the situation is somewhat different. The client may want the constructor to submit choices. The constructor, on the contrary, may want to obtain the client's approval in order to be protected against future claims, especially in cases where there is uncertainty as to the quality of particular alternatives.

C. Comparative overview

In all countries, inspection or supervision is a right of the client, subject to qualifications designed to prevent unnecessary disturbance of the activities of the constructor. In no EU country is the client under a duty to inspect or supervise the construction activity regularly. In most countries supervision is very common in larger construction projects. In other countries (e.g. France and Spain), even in small construction projects an architect is likely to be in charge.

Even if the parties agreed that the client is to supervise or inspect, this is generally thought to be purely in the interest of the client. In most jurisdictions (England, Sweden, France, Italy, Germany, Austria, Portugal), the highest courts have ruled that inadequate supervision by the client is no reason to diminish the constructor's liability regarding defects, or standard conditions provide for this (Sweden). In other countries, the legal position is still unclear (Greece). In the Netherlands, case law has gone in a different direction, but this approach is heavily criticised.

D. Preferred option

The EU systems seem to agree on the position with regard to inspection and supervision. As a rule, supervision or inspection is a right of the client even if it has been explicitly agreed that it must take place. Inadequate inspection or supervision should not lead to a shift in liability for defects. This means that, under the default rule, there is no room for a shift of responsibilities from constructor to client (or the supervisor hired by the client).

In practice, the system provided by the present rules will be flexible enough to cover the situation where the client – or, more likely, the supervisor – is the more knowledgeable person and the constructor relies on this knowledge. When the constructor relies on the supervisor, and the supervisor actually takes the decisions on behalf of the client, the rules on directions will apply and will shift much of the responsibility to the client, who in turn will be able to take action against the supervisor if the supervisor acted negligently.

> An architect hired by a client tells the builder of a house how to construct a part of the roof. The architect provides the solution. This will count as a direction under IV.C.–2:107 (Directions of the client). The liability of the constructor will now be limited to liability under IV.C.–2:108 (Contractual obligation of the service provider to warn).

There is a difference in consequences between a direction and acceptance. Directions lead to a shift in responsibilities; acceptance – as defined in paragraph (2) as a decision during the construction process – does not. In practice, it may be very difficult to distinguish between the two situations. The constructor may even strategically use this difference and try to redirect liability in situations where that is undesirable.

> A constructor is uncertain which of two possible solutions for part of the roof will be better; one looks slightly more promising, but is also slightly more expensive. He puts the issue before the architect hired by the client. After some deliberation, they jointly choose one solution. The solution chosen turns out to be inferior. If this is considered to be a direction by the client, the client will have to prove that the constructor should have warned against the probable inferiority whereas if this is regarded as acceptance, the constructor will be liable for the defect.

The distinguishing criterion is which of the parties – the constructor or the client (or the client's representative), actually made the choice. Was it the constructor who had the biggest influence on the decision? Or was it the client or the supervisor who made the choice? Sometimes it will be very difficult to reconstruct the communication that took place between the parties and to establish what each party knew at what moment in time. A guideline may be to determine which party was the most knowledgeable about the issue in question. In some cases, the courts may have to decide that it was a joint decision by people with equal knowledge. Application of III.–3:704 (Loss attributable to creditor) may then provide a solution: the constructor will not be liable for loss suffered by the client to the extent that the client contributed to the non-performance or its effects.

The rules contained in this Article are again default rules. The parties may opt for a regime according to which insufficient inspection, inadequate supervision or acceptance wholly or partially relieves the constructor from liability. As indicated above, the mere fact that the contract provides for inspection, supervision or acceptance is not sufficient to warrant such consequences. The presumption is that inspection, supervision and acceptance are agreed upon solely in the interests of the client. When a change in the distribution of risks is intended, this consequence should be contracted for explicitly.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. All jurisdictions accept a right of the client to supervise the construction process or to inspect the structure, to be exercised in a reasonable manner, without unnecessary interference with the construction activities. In most countries, this is even considered to be self-evident. Explicit references to such a right were found for ENGLAND (Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], nos. 2-182 ff), for SWEDEN (AB 92 art. 3:5 first paragraph), for THE NETHERLANDS (Van den Berg, Samenwerkingsvormen in de bouw, no. 112; Van den Berg, Verdeling van aansprakelijkheden en risico's bij moderne bouwcontractvormen, p. 83; art. 3-2 UAV 1989*)*, for ITALY (CC art. 1662 and Cass., 18 January 1980, no. 434 Rep.Foro it., V° Appalto, c. 115, no. 13), for GERMANY (VOB/B art. 4 no. 1 para. 2, where even a duty of the constructor to disclose information may exist, see VOB/B art. 4 no. 1 para. 2 sent. 2), for AUSTRIA (ÖNORM A 2060 2.11), and for PORTUGAL (CC art. 1209(1)).
2. In most countries, there is no positive duty to inspect the structure at the time it is finalised and delivered to the client, not even when an acceptance procedure is envisaged, see for THE NETHERLANDS Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 562, for ITALY CC art. 1665, for AUSTRIA Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], art. 1170, no. 5. The exceptions where a duty to inspect is assumed are BELGIUM (Goossens, Aanneming van werk, no. 1018), PORTUGAL (CC art. 1218) and POLAND (for contracts between businesses and when inspection is customary, see CC art. 563(2)). But this may be a matter of what is called a duty and what remedies exist, because in most jurisdictions the client who does not inspect the structure may lose rights, in particular with regard to manifest defects.
3. In ENGLAND (Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 5-021) and GERMANY (Staudinger [-Peters], BGB [2003], § 640 no. 1) liability is unaffected by inspection or its absence. Most jurisdictions, however, attach consequences to inadequate inspection. Many countries exclude liability for manifest defects, if they are not notified to the constructor at the time of final inspection or shortly thereafter, see AB 92 art. 7:13 (SWEDEN), CC art. 758(3) (THE NETHERLANDS), CC art. 692 (GREECE) and CC art. 1219(2) (PORTUGAL). FRENCH case law reversed the burden of proof, presuming that the defect is hidden at the moment of the reception of the work, using the normally diligent client (and not an architect or a third adviser, see Cass.civ. II, 19 May 1958, JCP 1958.II.10808, note B. Starck; Cass.civ. III, 14 May 1985, D. 1985, 439, note Rémery) at the moment of the reception as the criterion, see Cass.civ. III, 23 November 1976, Bull.civ. III, no, 415. For AUSTRIAN law, the position is uncertain. The standard for the discoverability of defects varies. GREEK law (CC art. 692) seems to be the most favourable for the constructor, requiring an inspection that lives up to the standards of an expert who has the necessary expertise to detect defects of a given construction, followed by PORTUGAL, where evident defects are those the duly diligent client should have noticed and hidden defects are those not detectable by due diligence, even of an average technician proficient in that field (CA Porto, 17 November 1992, CJ 1992, V, 224). In other countries, the diligence of the client is the focus, whereas the standard may be subjective, referring to the degree of expertise of the client, the way the supervision is organised and the nature and seriousness of the defect, see Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 566 (The Netherlands), and Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 178-1083 (Belgium) or be more objective, see for France Cass.civ. III, 3 November 1983, GazPal 1984, 2, 577, note Liet-Veaux and for SPAIN LOE art. 17. In Italian law, the literature is divided between the objective approach, (see Stolfi, Appalto, p. 58) and a more subjective one (see Giannattasio, L´appalto, p. 197).

4. Under ENGLISH law, inadequate performance of an agreed duty to supervise is not available as a defence for the constructor, *Kingston-upon-Hull Corp. v. Harding [*1892] 2 QB 494, Court of Appeal, see also Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], nos. 5-021, 5-022, 5-0245, opposing the application of contributory negligence. The same is true for SWEDEN, see AB 92 arts. 3:2 and 3:5, first paragraph, for GERMANY (BGH NJW 1973, 518; CA Cologne BauR 1996, 548, BGH NJW 1999, 893), for AUSTRIA (ÖNORM A 2060 2.11.4 and 2.27.1, Dittrich and Tades, ABGB[35], 1168a E 111 and Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], art. 1168a, no. 34), and most likely for FRANCE, where the liability is shifted to the supervisor, GREECE, where CC art. 691, is not interpreted in that manner in doctrine or case law, PORTUGAL (cf. art. 1209 para. 2 CC and CA Porto, 10 April 1970, BolMinJus 196, 299) as well as for ITALY, where some scholars assume that a check during the performance sets the contractor free to the extent of what has been verified as regular and conform to contractual provisions; Vitale, Dell´appalto, p. 388. In THE NETHERLANDS, however, the Raad van Arbitrage and art. 12-3 of the UAV 1989 allow contractors to be released from liability for defective work if it can be established that either the client or the client's agent might have been capable of noticing the defective work at any stage of the construction process but failed to do so, but this approach has been criticised, see Van den Berg, Samenwerkingsvormen in de bouw, no. 116, and especially Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 378-392.

II. Right to supervise and inspect during the performance of the service?

5. AUSTRIAN ÖNORM A 2060 establishes a right to supervise (2.11) the construction activities at the construction site. The contractor has to enable a supervision of the sub-contractors as well. Supervision includes a right to check the relevant documentation of the building process; the client has to inform the contractor about doubts raised in the supervision.

6. In ENGLAND, the client has the right to supervise the construction process or to inspect the structure. Architects and engineers may be under a duty to perform these activities in relation to the client, see Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], nos. 2-182 ff. There is no apparent authority or doctrinal statement to the effect that the constructor has to allow this, because it would seem too obvious. This is also true in SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 137).

7. The FINNISH Consumer Protection Act does not contain provisions on inspection or supervision but the General Conditions YSE 1998 arts. 59-62 contains rules on the client's supervision.

8. The client can supervise the work, but is not obliged to do so, under FRENCH law. Most of the time in building construction practice a person is appointed to supervise the work and to coordinate the construction process between the different constructors. This person is the maître d´œuvre, very often a function given to the architect.

9. The client does have the right (but not an obligation) of supervision according to the GERMAN VOB/B art. 4 no. 1 para. 2. The constructor is obliged to tolerate any supervision and even has to disclose information (VOB/B art. 4 no. 1 para. 2 sent. 2). According to the VOB/B the client may have access not only to the building site but also to the workshop of the constructor in which preparatory work is undertaken. The client also has access to documents. The border-line is drawn where business secrets are endangered: business secrets are those facts in respect of which the constructor has an objective economic interest that they will not be made known. The client, furthermore, may not impede the constructor's work.

10. The right to supervise is not codified, but follows from the cooperative nature of the construction contract, in GREEK law. The right to inspect is assumed by Ef. Thessalonikis 1864/1999 Arm 1999, 8 p. 1054.

11. The ITALIAN CC art. 1662 establishes an option for the client to examine the constructor's activity while performing, paying all costs, see also Cass., 18 January 1980, n. 434, Rep.Foro it., V° Appalto, c. 115, no. 13. The examination should not cause unnecessary difficulties to the constructor (Cass., 10 May 1965, no. 891, RGE, 1965, I, p. 945, comment of E. Favara, Limiti del controllo del committente sull´opera dell´appaltatore).

12. The right to supervise is considered to be self-evident under DUTCH law. There is normally no duty to supervise, unless the contract provides otherwise, although there may be exceptional circumstances under which such a duty could arise, see HR 4 December 1970, NedJur 1971, 204 (Bouchette and Van Limburg); Van den Berg, Samenwerkingsvormen in de bouw, no. 112; Van den Berg, Verdeling van aansprakelijkheden en risico´s bij moderne bouwcontractvormen, p. 83; Jansen, Defects liability, p. 380; UAV art. 3-2 1989. This Article, however, provides that if the client does not want to supervise the work, the contractor must be so informed in writing before the execution of the work commences. If, as a result of the decision not to supervise the work, the demands on the contractor exceeds what can reasonably be expected, the contractor is entitled to extra payment, see cf. Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 718. An obligation to inspect probably does not exist, see Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 562, but failure to inspect can have consequences for the client, because CC art. 7:758 para. 3 provides that the constructor is not liable for defects that the client could reasonably have discovered at the time of delivery and CC art. 7:758 para. 1 implies a certain amount of inspection at that time.

13. The right to supervise during the performance of the service is not directly mentioned in the POLISH CC. However, it may be deduced form CC art. 636 para. 1, which applies on the basis of CC art. 656 para. 1. According to CC art. 363 para. 1 if the work is defective or not in conformity with the contract the client may ask the contractor to rectify it and set an appropriate time limit, after the lapse of which the client may terminate the contractual relationship or entrust another person with the rectification or completion of the work.

14. The PORTUGUESE CC art. 1209 para. 1 says that the client may supervise the execution of the work as long as this does not interfere with the regular flow of the construction process. The only interests protected by supervision are the client's: CA Porto, 15 June 1973, BolMinJus 229, 235. This is a strict rule, see Antunes Varela, Código Civil anotado, vol. II, p. 793.

15. In SPAIN, supervision of the construction work is not a legal obligation for the client. It is not contained in the new LOE, nor in the regime of the CC. The client has a right to supervise but not an obligation.

16. The SWEDISH AB 92 art. 3:5 first paragraph states that the client may supervise the contract work as the client deems suitable. This supervision must so far as possible be performed in a way which does not impede the contractor's work.

III. Obligation to inspect the finalised structure?

17. The AUSTRIAN CC contains no duty to inspect or to point out defects. The client, however, can inspect the work before acceptance, see Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I^2, art. 1170, no. 5, EvBl 1959/107. ÖNORM A 2060 2.24 mentions quality inspections and operational tests, and art. 2.25 deals with test runs that are contractually agreed upon. Acceptance (art. 2.26) is a tool to determine when the contractor has performed (art. 2.26.1) and to trigger the passing of risk (art. 2.26.10). In the case of a formal acceptance (as opposed to an informal one), there is mention of a record in which, inter alia, defects are to be noted (art. 2.26.5), but it is not entirely clear what the legal consequences of acceptance are as a possible waiver of rights. Art. 2.26.8 says that 'if the client accepts the work despite essential defects the rules on legal warranties apply', which implies a need to check for, and notify, non-essential defects at the point of acceptance, since the regime on legal warranties differentiates between essential and non-essential defects (for a definition see art. 2.27.4).

18. The client is required under BELGIAN law to inspect the result of the construction activities, and to accept the result if the work has been done adequately, see Goossens, Aanneming van werk, no. 1018.

19. The FINNISH Consumer Protection Act does not contain provisions on final inspection. Detailed provisions can be found in the General Conditions YSE 1998, arts. 70-74.

20. The client is not under an obligation to inspect the construction at the end of the work under FRENCH law. It is only his interest to inspect the work, but he can accept the work without inspecting it. In practice the client will inspect the work before the acceptance, because the consequences of such an acceptance are important: transfer of risks, impossibility for the client to seek the liability of the contractor for manifest defects (Cass.civ. III, 1 February 1984, RD imm. 1984, 314; Cass.civ. III, 9. October 1991, Bull.civ. III, no. 231).

21. As the acceptance of the work according to the GERMAN CC art. 640 also means that the client considers the work to have been done according to the contract the client has the right to inspect the work in detail and try it out. VOB/B art. 12 no. 5 para. 2 prescribes a period of 6 working days for construction works. This period is rather short and may be longer for other works, e.g. Computer software (CA Cologne BB 1993 enclosure 13 to issue 19 page 12). The client is not obliged to use the possibility of inspection but is obliged to accept the work if it was done according to the contract and is finished and if acceptance is not impossible, which according to CC art. 646 may be the case for immaterial works as well as works which have always remained in the possession of the client, such as a teeth-prosthesis. VOB/B art. 12 requires the constructor to send a demand for acceptance, which has to be undertaken within 12 working days, but partial acceptance is allowed.

22. The GREEK CC art. 692 provides that after acceptance of the work by the client, the contractor is released from liability for defects unless such defects could not be discovered by a proper survey on delivery of the work or were fraudulently concealed by the contractor.

23. The ITALIAN CC refers to a right of the client to check the finished work (art. 1665). Inspection is necessary in order not to lose guarantees for defects and non-conformities (Stolfi, Appalto, p. 52). The constructor must put the client in a position where the client can test the finished work (Cass., 15 December 1955, Giust.civ, 1956, I, p. 1096, with comment of Voltaggio Lucchesi, Verifica dell´opera appaltata e presunzione di accettazione). Where, despite the constructor's offer of an opportunity for inspection, the client does not inspect without justified reasons, the work is considered accepted, as is the case when the client does not inform the contractor about the results of inspection within a short period of time.

24. An obligation to inspect probably does not exist in DUTCH law, see Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 562, but failure to inspect can have consequences for the client, because DUTCH CC art. 7:758(3) provides that the constructor is not liable for defects that the client could reasonably have discovered at the time of delivery and CC art. 7:758(1) implies a certain amount of inspection at that time.

25. The existence of the duty to inspect depends on the nature of the contractual relationship under POLISH law. If the contract is concluded between businesses, inspection is obligatory (art. 563(2)). Otherwise, it is seen as a duty only if the inspection is customary in the given relationship (art. 563(1)).

26. The PORTUGUESE CC art. 1218 obliges the client to inspect the work before accepting it, in order to verify if it is in conformity with the contract and lacks defects. The client has the burden of inspecting the work; failure to inspect it resulting in full acceptance.

27. In practice in SCOTLAND construction contract forms generally provide that the contract works are not completed until done to the approval or satisfaction of the employer, the architect or engineer to the project, or a third party. Approval will usually entail inspection but this is a matter of practice rather than legal right (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 38).

28. Two different steps must be distinguished in SPANISH law (Carrasco Perera/Cordero Lobato/González Carrasco, Derecho de la Construcción y la Vivienda[4], 327 ff) : 1) delivery of the construction work and 2) reception of the construction work. Material delivery of the work consists in putting the work at the disposal of the client. Reception of the work consists in the client accepting its characteristics and qualities). Delivery may take place before, at the same time as, or after reception of the work, and does not imply tacit acceptance. With reception the party accepts the work, unless it has defects. If such is the case, the client can refuse reception but has to indicate in writing the reasons for refusal (LOE art. 6(3)). Unless otherwise agreed, reception is to take place within 30 days after the construction work is finalized. Finalisation is to be communicated to the client by means of a certificate. The period of 30 days starts from the moment the client receives the certificate. There is tacit reception when after 30 days the client does not communicate the existence of defects, and also when the client pays the price without giving notice of any non-conformity of the work, or when the client takes possession and makes use of the construction work without giving notice of a defect

IV. Liability for defects not noticed during inspection

29. In AUSTRIAN law, an acceptance without reservation cannot be deemed a waiver of the rights based on defects that were neither apparent nor known to the client unless there is an express or factual approval, see Klang (-Adler-Höller), ABGB V[3], art. 1167, no. 398. CC art. 928 exempts an obvious defect from warranties, but it is disputed whether this provision applies in the context of contracts of work, see Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], art. 1167, no. 6 (against) and Gschnitzer, Schuldrecht, Besonderer Teil und Schadensersatz[2], 239 (in favour). However, the client can still reserve rights upon acceptance, see Dittrich and Tades, ABGB[35], art. 1167 E 86.

30. In BELGIAN law liability for defects after acceptance is limited to hidden defects. These depend on the type of defect, and on the qualifications of the client, see Goossens, Aanneming van werk, no. 178-1083.

31. Liability in ENGLISH law is unaffected by whether or not there has been an inspection, see Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 5-021.

32. In FRANCE, case law reversed the burden of proof, presuming that the defect is hidden at the moment of the reception of the work, using the test of the normally diligent client (and not an architect or a third adviser, see Cass.civ. II, 19 May 1958, JCP 1958.II.10808, note B. Starck; Cass.civ. III, 14 May 1985, D. 1985, 439, note Rémery) at the moment of the reception as the point of reference, see Cass.civ. III, 23 November 1976, Bull.civ. III, no. 415. The evaluation is made in abstracto and the actual competence of the client is of no relevance. This standard is applied rather strictly in case law. The defect must be visible, the causes (the origin) of the defect must be identified and the consequences (the damage) must be foreseeable, see Cass.civ. III, 3 November 1983, GazPal 1984, 2, 577, note Liet-Veaux. But the contractor can prove that the client had effective knowledge of the defect, even if it is hidden (Cass.civ. III, 20 October 1993, Bull.civ. III, no. 122). Even if the client gives a mandate to a professional (e.g. an. architect) to receive the building, the evaluation of the obviousness of the defect is made in the same way (Cass.civ. III, 17 November 1993, Bull.civ. III, no. 146).

33. If the work was accepted but the client did not notice the defect, the constructor can still be held liable in GERMAN law. Important is whether the client really knew about the defect. It is irrelevant whether the client ought to have noticed it or not as there is no duty of inspection (see above). The main consequence of acceptance is a shifting of the burden of proof: instead of the constructor having to prove the non-existence of a defect, the client has to prove the existence of it, see Staudinger (-Peters), BGB (2003), art. 640 no. 1.

34. The GREEK CC art. 692 regarding approval of the work, releases the constructor from liability for defects after acceptance, unless they could not be discovered by a proper inspection or were fraudulently concealed by the contractor. In general, if the client accepts the work without inspection, the client bears the risk of detectable failures. Given the fact that acceptance of the work may be explicit or tacit, the latter presumed from acceptance without reservation of rights, the distinction between manifest and non-detectable defects is central to the rights and obligations of the parties. The only direction the code gives for the definition of a manifest defect stems from the premise that a defect is manifest if it can be ascertained by due inspection.

35. The constructor is not liable if the client does not inspect the completed construction or performs an inadequate inspection under ITALIAN law. A manifest defect is a defect that can easily be detected at the moment of delivery. The inspection of the completed work can be carried out by the client or by a trusted technician. According to one view, the criterion is the knowledge of a person with medium technical diligence (Stolfi, Appalto, p. 58; Voltaggio Lucchesi, Vizi, p. 44; Albano, Foro it. 1956, I, 219; Cass., 16 February 1955, no. 452, Foro it., 1956, I, c. 219 with comment Albano, CA Genova, 30 March 1951, Rep.Foro it., 1951, V° Appalto, c. 97, no 51). Another view considers that the point of reference varies: inspection by an inexperienced client triggers the criterion of the knowledge that can be expected from an inexperienced person; if the client is a technician of the art or is assisted by a professional supervisor the identification of defects has to be established in relation to the medium expertise of a technician of the art (Giannattasio, L´Appalto, p. 197; Rubino and Iudica, Dell´appalto[3], p. 251; Mirabelli, Dei singoli contratti, p. 464; Cass., 27 April 1957, no. 1423, Rep.Foro it., 1957, V° Appalto, c. 118, n. 36; CA Milano, 12 February 1957, Rep.Foro it., 1957, V° Appalto, c. 119, no. 42; CA Firenze, 28 May 1954, Rep.Foro it., 1954, V° Appalto, c. 116, no. 22).

36. The DUTCH CC art. 7:758(3), implies an exemption of liability for any defects the client should have discovered at delivery. By accepting the work without reservations, the client loses the right to claim damages or other remedies for any defect that is not hidden. Cf. Jansen, Defects liability, p. 398. A defect is 'hidden' if the client could not have noticed the defect at or before the acceptance of the work or if the defect manifests itself only after acceptance of the work. Whether or not a defect should have been noticed before or at acceptance of the work, depends on (1) the degree of expertise of the client, (2) the way the supervision is organised and (3) the nature and seriousness of the defect. Cf. Rb Roermond 10 January 1985, BR 1986, p. 145; Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 566. From a client who cannot be considered to be an expert, only a reasonable degree of attentiveness may be expected. Cf. van Wijngaarden and Chao-Duivis, Hoofdstukken Bouwrecht[4], no. 113, with references to case law of the RvA. If, on the other hand, the client is assisted by a professional supervisor, a defect can only be considered 'hidden' if it could not have been revealed by a normally careful and skilful supervision during the execution of the construction. Cf. van Wijngaarden and Chao-Duivis, Hoofdstukken Bouwrecht[4], no. 111, with references to case law of the RvA. If the supervision did not take place on a planned basis but merely incidentally, a defect will more readily be considered hidden. Cf. RvA 7 January 1980, no. 9329, BR 1980, p. 395, note Thunnissen (standing case law). If in fact supervision did not take place at all, a defect will indeed be considered to be hidden. Cf. RvA 3 April 1981, no. 9979, BR 1981, p. 625, note Thunnissen. Thus, the risk of not noticing a defect in the construction partly shifts towards the client if the client exercises the right to supervise, and less intensive supervision increases the odds that a defect is considered 'hidden'.

37. If it was possible to notice the defects observing due diligence, the client loses the right to found on them under POLISH law (CC art. 563). If the defect is only discovered later, the client should notify immediately the contractor (CC art. 563).

38. In PORTUGAL evident defects are presumed to be known by the client, even in the absence of an inspection (CC art. 1219 para. 2). Evident defects are those which a duly diligent client should have noticed (CA Porto, 17 November 1992, CJ 1992, V, 224). Hidden defects are those not detectable by due diligence, even of an average technician proficient in that field. Generally, the constructor's liability for evident defects ceases on acceptance by the client.

39. SCOTTISH forms of construction contract commonly provide for a defects liability period (often of a year's duration) after practical completion of the project, during which time the contractor remains liable to remedy any emerging defects in the work (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 46).

40. The SPANISH LOE art. 17 regulates the responsibility of the constructor for hidden defects (those not noticeable during inspection applying a simple diligence). It establishes three different periods of guarantee of ten, three and one year, which start from the moment the construction work is accepted: ten years for defects in the foundations, supports, walls and other structural elements of the building; three years for defects in the structure or installations which lead to non- compliance with the habitability requirements; and one year (only for constructors) for defects in finishing.

41. The SWEDISH AB 92 makes a distinction between hidden and manifest defects. A hidden defect is a defect existing at the time of the final inspection, which was not, and could not reasonably be expected to have been, noticed then, art. 7:13. All other defects are manifest defects. According to the general rule in art. 7:13 the contractor can only be made liable for defects noticed and recorded in the inspection protocol. However, the provision states that this rule does not apply to hidden defects and all kinds of defects can be reported in writing to the contractor within a period of three month after the final inspection, whether or not they should have been noticed at the inspection.

V. Inadequate performance of agreed duty to supervise: defence or contributory negligence?

42. It is expressly stated in AUSTRIAN ÖNORM A 2060 that supervision by the client does not exempt the constructor from liability (arts. 2.11.4 and 2.27.1). Case law and doctrine similarly assume that supervised contractors do not have their liability removed or reduced because of contributory negligence on the part of the client based on insufficient supervision (Dittrich and Tades, ABGB[35], 1168a E 111 and Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], art. 1168a, no. 34).

43. Inadequate performance of an agreed duty to supervise is not available as a defence for the constructor in ENGLISH law, *Kingston-upon-Hull Corp. v. Harding [*1892] 2 QB 494, Court of Appeal. This includes noticing defective work and not informing the constructor of it, This East Ham Corp. v. Bernard Sunley & Sons Ltd. [1966] AC 406, Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], nos. 5-021, 5-022, suggesting that the constructor must expressly ask for approval of defective work and receive express approval in order to be absolved from liability. There are no cases in which a contractor used the defence of contributory negligence, Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 5-0245 and such a defence is there opposed.

44. The master of works can be liable if the contractual obligation of supervision and coordination is not properly performed in FRENCH law. The client cannot be held liable (i.e. contributory negligent) for failure to supervise correctly the construction, since this is not an obligation of the client.

45. The client has the right to supervise but is not obliged to do so under GERMAN law. Therefore the constructor does not obtain any rights from inadequate performance of the supervision. The constructors liability for defects cannot be reduced because of contributory negligence of the client (BGH NJW 1973, 518; CA Cologne BauR 1996, 548, BGH NJW 1999, 893).

46. Support – albeit very limited – for recognising an obligation to supervise may be provided by GREEK CC art. 691, which states that a contractor may not be held liable for defects in the work which can be attributed to the fault of the client manifested by directions or in any other way, but the Article is not interpreted in that manner in doctrine or case law.

47. The right to check the progress of work can be exercised during the performance, when the client feels the need to, under ITALIAN law. Leading scholars such as Giannattasio, Dei singoli contratti, p. 442; Mangini, Il contratto di appalto, pp. 148, ff see it as having a different nature from the right to a final inspection. Because it is a right and not an obligation, non-exercise does not lead to a loss of the right. Some scholars assume that a check during the performance relieves the contractor from liability to the extent of what has been tested as regular and conform to the contract. Vitale, Dell´appalto, p. 388. Case law seems to share the first opinion CA Torino, 17 July 1959, Giust.civ.Mass., 1959, p. 814.

48. In DUTCH case law the Raad van Arbitrage allows contractors to be released from liability for defective work if it can be established that either the client or the client's agent might have been capable of noticing the defective work at any stage of the construction process but failed to do so. Cf. Van den Berg, Samenwerkingsvormen in de bouw, no. 115. Although this approach has been heavily criticised by some Dutch authors, see Van den Berg, Samenwerkingsvormen in de bouw, no. 116, and especially Jansen, Defects liability, pp. 378-392, the approach has been 'codified' in art. 12-3 of the UAV 1989. A failure to supervise correctly, where supervision has been agreed upon, will therefore constitute a full defence for the contractor.

49. According to the POLISH CC art. 655 if the structure is destroyed or damaged as a result of the work being done in accordance with the client's instructions, the contractor may demand the remuneration agreed upon or an appropriate part of it if the contractor warned the client of the danger of destruction or damage, or if in spite of observing due diligence the constructor could not have found it

50. PORTUGUESE law regards supervision as a right, not a duty. Supervision does not exclude the constructor's liability, even if defects were evident or the bad execution of the work was obvious (CC art. 1209 para. 2). CA Porto, 10 April 1970, BolMinJus 196, 299.

51. Since the contractor is strictly bound to complete the works in accordance with the contract, SCOTTISH law is probably the same as English law (41, above). There is some old authority that where defective work has been approved by the employer's representative, the employer is barred from making claims; but this is difficult to reconcile with the general rule that the representative cannot authorise deviations from the contract (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 46)

52. Under SPANISH law also supervision of the construction work is not a legal obligation for the client, see under note 15.

53. The general rule in the SWEDISH AB 92 art. 3:2, is that the contractor alone is responsible for the execution of the contract work. Furthermore, art. 3:5, first paragraph, states that the client may supervise the contract work as the client deems suitable, but that such supervision does not limit the contractual liability of the contractor.

IV.C.–3:106: Handing-over of the structure

(1) If the constructor regards the structure, or any part of it which is fit for independent use, as sufficiently completed and wishes to transfer control over it to the client, the client must accept such control within a reasonable time after being notified. The client may refuse to accept the control when the structure, or the relevant part of it, does not conform to the contract and such non-conformity makes it unfit for use.

(2) Acceptance by the client of the control over the structure does not relieve the constructor wholly or partially from liability. This rule also applies when the client is under a contractual obligation to inspect, supervise or accept the structure or the construction of it.

(3) This Article does not apply if, under the contract, control is not to be transferred to the client.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article deals with the actual handing over of the structure at the time the structure is sufficiently completed. Paragraph (1) contains the idea that the constructor takes the initiative for the transfer of control and that the client is to accept control, unless there are serious defects. Minor defects and defects that can be repaired in a short period of time do not prevent the constructor from transferring control. The client may refuse control if the defects make the structure unfit for use.

The transfer of control is detached from rights related to non-performance. To that extent, paragraph (2) provides that acceptance by the client of the control over the structure may not be construed as a waiver of any rights related to non-performance. The client's position as to remedies for non-performance only becomes less strong when the client does not notify the constructor of defects within a reasonable time after becoming aware of them.

Paragraph (2) does not, however, deny the constructor the possibility of bringing to the attention of the client situations that might lead to complaints regarding the way the constructor performed.

Illustration 1
A constructor of a building wishes to transfer the control of the building to the client. He notifies the client. The client is obliged to take over control, unless the building is unfit for use. The client does not have to refuse to take over control for fear of losing rights with respect to non-performance. The present Article expressly provides that the client keeps such rights notwithstanding acceptance of control over the structure.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

With respect to the handing over of the structure, several issues arise which are best discussed separately. The first issue is that the constructor has an interest in transferring the control over the structure to the client because duties and liabilities connected to the safeguarding of the structure translate into costs, for instance the costs of insurance. The client has an obvious interest in obtaining control, so that the structure can be used for its purposes. The client will also need to know when control is transferred, for purposes of security and insurance. The transfer of control is a burden on the client, however, if the structure cannot yet be used for its purpose because it is not finished yet or if there are serious defects.

Another point is the right to payment. Under most contracts, and under the default rule contained in the following Article, at least a substantial part of the price will be due at the time the structure, or the control over it, is handed over. The constructor has an obvious interest in collecting the money, whereas the client may want to postpone payment in order to keep the constructor under pressure to perform or for other reasons.

When the structure is completed, it is in the constructor's interest to be informed about what else will be expected. The constructor will want to know whether the client is satisfied with the result and, if not, what the client perceives to be defects which need to be remedied. At some time, the constructor also wishes to be certain that no additional effort is expected, except perhaps the remedying of any future defects. For the client, it may also be important to bring additional wishes to the attention of the constructor. The sooner this is done, the higher the probability that the constructor will be prepared to fix the problem without delay or extra charge. In this respect, the client will want to inspect the structure thoroughly. But the time and money that need to be invested in inspection compete with other preferences of the client. So the intensity of inspections undertaken will vary greatly across clients. The problem is similar to the ones arising in the context of monitoring before the handing over of a structure that were discussed in the Comments to the preceding Article. Early detection of problems is still important. Added to this, there is now the desire of both parties to end their co-operation and to be able to use their resources on other projects.

If not adequately inspecting the structure means that the client risks losing rights relating to non-performance, this is a powerful extra incentive for inspection. But the optimum level of inspection will be hard to determine. Because of the difficulties the courts will have in establishing what level of inspection is reasonable, some clients will inspect very thoroughly and will issue many complaints in order to cope with the resulting uncertainty. Other clients may think they have inspected sufficiently, but lose their rights because the courts decide differently. The constructor may also strategically use such rules. There may be an incentive to hide defects. Generally speaking, the constructor has superior expertise, and during the construction process will have gathered even more information regarding potential defects. If this presupposition holds, it will be more efficient to urge the constructor to disclose this information than to have the client searching for potential defects while not knowing where to look.

C. Preferred option

In the present Article, acceptance and the transfer of control are separated. Transfer of control is a part of the obligations of the constructor. The time when or within which it is to take place is determined by the contract or the general rules on time of performance. (III.–2:102 (Time of performance)). The client is to accept control within a reasonable time span after having been informed by the constructor of the latter's wish to transfer. It is the constructor who determines whether the structure is sufficiently completed in order to transfer control. In many cases, the right time to transfer control is when the structure is completed in every respect and every defect is remedied. A partly finished structure may already be very useful to the client, but the client is not obliged to accept control as long as the structure still has essential defects and cannot be used for the client's purposes. This situation is captured in paragraph (1), by referring to fitness for use. The idea is that small defects, which are more or less inevitable in large construction projects, and minor elements of the construction work which still need to be finished are no obstacle to transfer of control.

Thus, the date on which control is transferred is not necessarily the date on which the constructor has performed all the obligations under the contract. It may very well be that some elements of the performance are not yet ready.

Illustration 2
The control over a house is transferred to the client. The constructor still has to finish the painting part of the job and to construct the parking bays in front of the building. Thus, the constructor has not yet fully performed the contractual obligations. Whether the remaining part of the obligations will be performed in time is a matter of interpretation of the contract or of application of the general rule on time of performance.

In principle, the rules for final acceptance and inspection are the same as for the intermediate ones on which the preceding Article focuses. No investigation of any kind is required. The client is just expected to be as attentive as could be expected from a comparable client in that situation. The client is not obliged to inspect the structure, not even to take a look at it. But the interests of the constructor are protected because there is the opportunity to bring elements to the attention of the client, so that the client will risk losing remedies through inaction and failure to notify.

If the client does not accept the control over the structure when bound to do so, the constructor of a corporeal movable may be able to invoke III.–2:111 (Property not accepted). In particular, the constructor may deposit the structure with a third party, or even sell it, though only after reasonable notice to the client. The rules regarding these remedies should be applied, however, taking the interests of the client into account. Usually, the client in a construction contract will have chosen the construction of a specific structure because it is not available on the market for existing goods. When the structure is sold to another person, the client will often again have to hire another person to construct the object. The costs and delay involved will generally be substantial. This has to be reflected in the appropriate means of giving notice (explicitly and in writing, in most cases) and in the reasonable time for the notice.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. Most jurisdictions have a system where the constructor takes the initiative for transfer of control to the client, with the client having to accept within a reasonable time (in which inspection may take place), unless refusal is warranted by serious defects. If no explicit acceptance takes place within that period of time, there is usually implicit acceptance. The rights as to defects may also be reserved, see SWEDEN (AB 92 art. 7:15), THE NETHERLANDS (CC art. 758), FRANCE (CC art. 1792-6), SPAIN, (Carrasco Perera/Cordero Lobato/González Carrasco, Derecho de la Construcción y la Vivienda[4], 328 ff) ITALY (Cass., 11 January 1975, no. 1787, Rep.Foro it., 1976, V° Appalto, c. 116, n. 17; Cass., 27 July 1987, no. 6489, Rep.Foro it., 1988, V° Appalto, c. 137, no. 49, and Giust.civ., 1988, I, p. 2357), GERMANY (CC §§ 638, 641, 644),

AUSTRIA (CC § 1048, Klang [-Adlerand Höller], ABGB V[3], art. 1168a, no. 406; Karesek, ecolex 1996, 836; Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], art. 1168a, no. 10), GREECE (cf. CC art. 694) and PORTUGAL (CC art. 1218, CC art. 1218(4), CC art. 1218(5)). The term delivery is sometimes used for the unilateral act of offering transfer of control by the constructor, which then requires acceptance by the client in SPAIN (Martinez Mas, La recepción en el contrato de obra, p. 40) and ITALY, and sometimes for the completion of the bilateral procedure of offering transfer of control and (explicit or tacit) acceptance (see for instance The Netherlands CC art. 758 and SWEDEN AB 92 art. 7:15)

.II. Procedure of handing over of the structure: delivery and acceptance

2. Acceptance and delivery tend to be identified in the AUSTRIAN CC § 1048, see Klang [-Adler and Höller], ABGB V[3], § 1168a, no. 406. The systems of ÖNORM B 2110 and the CC differ. Pursuant to the CC the ordering party can refuse to accept the work even on grounds of non-essential defects, subject only to a ban on chicanery (Schikaneverbot). 'Übernahme' is understood as consisting of both the actual handing over and the acceptance of the work as performance pursuant to the contract. Decisive is the taking over of the work into the ordering party's sphere of influence and disposition. There may be a whole procedure of acceptance, e.g. in the field of installations or plants, see Karesek, ecolex 1996, 836. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], § 1168a, no. 10.

3. The general principles on performance of contractual obligations apply in ENGLISH law, 1995, nos. 4-003 ff). Acceptance is no bar to a claim for damages (Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], nos. 5-007).

4. According to the FINNISH General Conditions for Building Contracts YSE art 71, the handover inspection must e.g. state whether the finished result is in accordance with the provisions of the contract.

5. In FRENCH law the relevant moment is the acceptance of the work, because it triggers a large number of consequences regarding the future claims of the client. The acceptance can be simple, i.e. accepting the work as is. But the acceptance can be made with reservations, CC art. 1792-6.

6. The GERMAN CC § 640 requires the client to accept the structure if it is in accordance with the contract. The acceptance cannot be refused in case of a minor defect. If the client accepts the structure, knowing it is defective, the client loses some rights.

7. The GREEK CC does not clearly distinguish the notions of delivery, approval and acceptance. For example, according to art. 694 payment of the contractor is due on delivery of the work and the risk passes also on delivery of the work, whereas the prescription period starts on acceptance of the work.

8. The simple delivery and obtaining control of the construction does not correspond to acceptance of the work under ITALIAN law. Where there is no explicit acceptance, a presumption of acceptance operates when the client acts in a way not compatible with the intention not to accept or accepting with a reserve (Cass., 11 January 1975, no. 1787, Rep.Foro it., 1976, V° Appalto, c. 116, no. 17; Cass., 27 July 1987, no. 6489, Rep.Foro it., 1988, V° Appalto, c. 137, no. 49, and Giust.civ., 1988, I, p. 2357).

9. According to the DUTCH CC art. 7:758, the constructor will notify that the structure is ready to be delivered and the client has then to inspect and accept, possibly with reservations, or refuse under notification of the defects that prevent acceptance.

10. In POLAND, according to the opinion of the Supreme Court (judgment of the Supreme Court of 5. 3. 1997, II CKN 28/97, OSNC, nos. 6-7, poz. 90) if the contractor has notified the end of the building work, the client is obliged to accept it. The acceptance protocol should contain statements of the parties concerning the quality of the work and any defects together with the time for their removal, or concerning the client's choice of another remedy. The constructor's obligation to deliver is mirrored by the obligation to accept and pay the price on the side of the client. The obligation to accept is independent of the approval of the quality of the performance, because whether the constructor has properly performed the work may be questioned. This opinion of the Supreme Court has been heavily criticised in the legal writing (Radwański [-Strzępka] System Prawa Prywatnego VII[2], p. 409), which claims that the client does not have a duty to accept a building constructed in a way contrary to the constructor's obligations.

11. The first step under PORTUGUESE law is inspection (CC art. 1218), followed by a notice of its results to the constructor (CC art. 1218(4)). If notice is not given in due time, acceptance is presumed (CC art. 1218(5)). If this notice does not mention any defects, it is taken as silent acceptance. If defects are mentioned, the result is non-acceptance and the consequences of defective performance. Acceptance may also be express. Transfer of property and the immediate duty to deliver work occurs upon: (1) acceptance if a movable is concerned; (2) accession of materials to the land, in the case of a building construction where the landowner is the client (CC art. 1212). Cf. Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], nos. 403 ff.

12. In SCOTLAND construction contract forms generally provide for two stages of completion: (i) practical, when the employer can take possession of and use the works; (ii) final, after expiry of a defects liability period, during which time the contractor remains liable for defects in the works. Each stage is certified by the employer's representative, and the final account between the parties is not settled until the final certificate indicating approval and satisfaction is issued. Approval will usually entail inspection (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 39; Connolly, Construction Law, chaps. 4.135 et esq.).

13. Delivery, under SPANISH law, consists in the constructor putting the work at the disposal of the client. Acceptance of the work consists in the client accepting the characteristics and qualities of the work (Carrasco Perera/Cordero Lobato/González Carrasco, Derecho de la Construcción y la Vivienda[4], 334)). Acceptance of the construction work is an obligation established in LOE art. 6. In order for the client to accept with all guarantees, the client must have inspected the structure. Otherwise the client may accept without noticing non-hidden defects and thus lose remedies.

14. The SWEDISH AB 92 art. 7:15 states that the contract works are delivered after acceptance at the final inspection. The final inspection is essential according to AB 92, since the approval at the inspection leads to delivery of the contract work, art. 7:15.

IV.C.–3:107: Payment of the price

(1) The price or a proportionate part of it is payable when the constructor transfers the control of the structure or a part of it to the client in accordance with the preceding Article.

(2) However, where work remains to be done under the contract on the structure or relevant part of it after such transfer the client may withhold such part of the price as is reasonable until the work is completed.

(3) If, under the contract, control is not to be transferred to the client, the price is payable when the work has been completed, the constructor has so informed the client and the client has had a chance to inspect the structure.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article determines the time at which the price generally should be paid. This is the time of the transfer of control. If the transfer of control is to take place but the client does not accept control, the price becomes payable as well; see IV.C.–3:106 (Handing-over of the structure) paragraph (1), second sentence read in conjunction with the present Article.

Illustration 1
The constructor of a private road has put the road at the disposal of the client in conformity with IV.C.–3:106 (Handing-over of the structure). The payment of the price is now due. The client may only refuse to pay the price if entitled to refuse to accept control under that Article, that is, if non-conformity makes the road unfit for use. If there are minor defects to be remedied the client may withhold a small part of the price under paragraph (2) until the work is done.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The time of payment of the price is unproblematic if the contract is completely performed at the time of transfer of control. In construction projects, however, it is quite common for there to be some defects at the time of delivery. This may be a matter of delays in the delivery of some elements of the structure or of defects that show up in the final stage of the construction process. The system of IV.C.–3:106 (Handing-over of the structure) is that these defects do not prevent the transfer of control to the client. Under this system, the structure will often not yet be completed at the time of transfer of control. This will induce the client to withhold payment partially, because the client will want the constructor to finalise the structure. The constructor, however, will feel entitled to payment because the greater part of the work has been completed and there will be some loss of power over the client when control over the structure is transferred to the client and the client starts to use it.

The general rule in the legal systems is that payment is due at the time of the transfer of control (Netherlands, Belgium, Spain and Greece) or the moment of acceptance (France, Italy, Germany, Portugal, Finland). England and Austria opt for the moment of completion of the structure.

C. Preferred option

The time of payment is certainly an issue to which the parties should give attention when drafting a construction contract. As a default rule, the moment of transfer of control is a better solution than the moment of acceptance, because there may be discussions about defects, which can be difficult to solve. The client is protected because control does not have to be accepted if the structure does not conform to the contract and such non-conformity makes it unfit for use (see the preceding Article). The solution where payment is due at the time of the transfer of control may be problematic because in most projects the client will want to withhold part of the payment if the work is not entirely finished. If the parties did not take this into account in their contract – for instance by giving the client the right to withhold 10 per cent of the price for a period of six months – the client may wish to invoke paragraph (2) and withhold such part of the price as is reasonable until the work is completed. The general provision in III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation) is not sufficient because, in the present situation, the client could withhold payment only if the client reasonably believed that the constructor would not complete the work. (See paragraph (2) of that Article.)

A website built for a client is not entirely free of defects at the time control is transferred to the client. The client starts using the site. According to paragraph (1) of the present Article, the client is to pay the price. Paragraph (2) however, allows the client to withhold a percentage of the price until the constructor's obligations are fully performed.

Paragraph (3) of the Article deals with the comparatively rare situation where control is not to be transferred to the client. For example, the constructor is obliged to construct a prototype just to see how easy or difficult it will be to make it. The client wants to be able to inspect the process and the result but has no interest in having the prototype handed over. For this unusual type of case the normal rule is obviously inappropriate and paragraph (3) provides that the price is payable when the work has been completed, the constructor has so informed the client and the client has had a chance to inspect the structure.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. In ENGLAND (see Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 4-140) and AUSTRIA (CC § 1170) payment is due at the moment of completion of the structure. In SCOTLAND final payment is generally due on final completion certified by the employer's representative (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' paras. 39, 65). Most countries opt for the moment of delivery: THE NETHERLANDS (CC art. 7:758, following the general principle of reciprocity), BELGIUM (see Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 768 and 821), SPAIN (CC art. 1599), GREECE CC art. 694 or the moment of acceptance: FRANCE (see Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civils et commerciaux[7], no. 732), ITALY (CC art. 1665), GERMANY (CC § 641), PORTUGAL (CC art. 1211) and FINLAND (for consumer construction contracts, the client will pay on demand of the constructor, but not before delivery and before the client has had a reasonable period to examine the performance, see Section 8.25.1 and 9.25.1 Consumer Protection Act).

II. Moment of payment of the price

2. In AUSTRIA payment is due at the moment of completion of the structure, see CC § 1170.

3. The price has to be paid at the moment of delivery under BELGIAN law, see Goossens, Aanneming van werk, nos. 768 and 821.
4. Generally, under ENGLISH law, payment does not have to be made until the whole of the contractor's contractual obligations have been performed, subject to the doctrine of substantial performance, see Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], no. 4-140.
5. In FINLAND, in consumer construction contracts, the client will pay on demand of the constructor, but not before delivery and before the client has had a reasonable period to examine the performance, see FINNISH ConsProtA chap. 8 § 25(1) and chap. 9 § 25(1).
6. The relevant moment in time is the acceptance of the work under FRENCH law, see Collart Dutilleul and Delebecque, Contrats civils et commerciaux[7], no. 732.
7. For the remuneration of the work (if not otherwise contracted), the time of acceptance is decisive in GERMAN law (CC § 641).
8. According to the GREEK CC art. 694 payment of the contractor is due on delivery of the work.
9. Unless the parties have agreed otherwise, the moment of acceptance is the decisive moment for payment of the price under ITALIAN law. (CC art. 1665).
10. The price is due, under DUTCH law, at the moment of delivery, which is completed at the moment of (explicit or tacit) acceptance, see CC art. 7:758, following the general principle of reciprocity.
11. Unless the parties decided otherwise, payment is due under POLISH law upon the acceptance of the structure (CC art. 455) as it follows from the nature of the obligation. However, if, in the absence of a different stipulation in the contract, the contractor demands acceptance of the work done partially, as it is completed, the client is obliged to do so and pay an appropriate part of the remuneration (CC art. 654).
12. In PORTUGAL the price has to be paid at the moment of acceptance of the work, see CC art. 1211.
13. In SCOTLAND final payment is generally due on final completion certified by the employer's representative (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' paras. 39, 65; Connolly, Construction Law, chaps. 4.341 et esq.). In practice, payment is often staged, with use of interim certification (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' paras. 62-64; Connolly, Construction Law, chap. 4.342-346).
14. The price is to be paid at the moment of delivery under SPANISH law (CC art. 1599).

IV.C.–3:108: Risks

(1) This Article applies if the structure is destroyed or damaged due to an event which the constructor could not have avoided or overcome and the constructor cannot be held accountable for the destruction or damage.

(2) In this Article the "relevant time" is:

(a) where the control of the structure is to be transferred to the client, the time when such control has been, or should have been, transferred in accordance with IV.C.–3:106 (Handing-over of the structure);

(b) in other cases, the time when the work has been completed and the constructor has so informed the client.

(3) When the situation mentioned in paragraph (1) has been caused by an event occurring before the relevant time and it is still possible to perform:

(a) the constructor still has to perform or, as the case may be, perform again;

(b) the client is only obliged to pay for the constructor's performance under (a);

(c) the time for performance is extended in accordance with paragraph (6) of IV.C.–2:109 (Unilateral variation of the service contract);

(d) the rules of III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment) may apply to the constructor's original performance; and

(e) the constructor is not obliged to compensate the client for losses to materials provided by the client.

(4) When the situation mentioned in paragraph (1) has been caused by an event occurring before the relevant time, and it is no longer possible to perform:

(a) the client does not have to pay for the service rendered;

(b) the rules of III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment) may apply to the constructor's performance; and

(c) the constructor is not obliged to compensate the client for losses to materials provided by the client, but is obliged to return the structure or what remains of it to the client.

(5) When the situation mentioned in paragraph (1) has been caused by an event occurring after the relevant time:

(a) the constructor does not have to perform again; and

(b) the client remains obliged to pay the price.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article deals with the liability for external causes of harm to the structure. According to IV.C.–3:104 (Conformity), the constructor is liable when the structure is not fit for its purpose (and the defect is not attributable to the client because it is caused by a direction for which no duty to warn existed). In theory, III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment) could apply. But that Article requires that the impediment was outside the debtor's sphere of control, that it could not be taken into account and that it was insurmountable. That the sphere of control of the constructor includes protecting the structure against outside harm is provided for in IV.C.–3:103 (Obligation to prevent damage to structure).

Before delivery – the transfer of control over the structure pursuant to IV.C.–3:106 (Handing-over of the structure) – the risks identified in paragraphs (3) and (4) remain with the constructor, subject to the limitations in these paragraphs. After the transfer of control, the liability regime changes; the client becomes responsible for external harm (paragraph (5)).

Illustration 1
During construction, an office building is severely damaged by a storm. Assuming that the constructor has done everything that can reasonably be expected to prevent the harm, the constructor will have to rebuild the building. The time span for performance will be adjusted. Materials delivered by the client that were lost will have to be provided by the client again or paid for by the client.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Nowadays, the topic of risk is only of limited practical interest. The causes for non-performance will usually be attributed to one or the other party. In construction contracts, each party will generally bear the consequences of its own choices if the outcome of the contractual co-operation is not satisfactory. Residual risk will be limited. Damage caused by natural disasters such as landslides and flooding is likely to occur less frequently in the future, because national authorities in the EU have been taking preventive measures for years. Still, the responsibility for external harm to the structure has to be distributed over the parties. This will have to change in time. Whilst it is reasonable that the constructor bears much of the risk when in the best position to take preventive measures, there will be a time when the client has to take over responsibility.

External harm may have various consequences. One issue is whether the constructor has to do again what has already been done in performing the contractual obligations. Another issue is what happens to any materials or components provided by the client but lost due to the external harm. Is it to be supplied by the constructor or again, by the client? And what about the payment of the price by the client?

EU countries differ with respect to risk distribution in the period before the constructor has finished the structure. Some countries are more lenient to the debtor than others. This is discussed in the Notes to III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment). The present Article follows the system of that Article.

With respect to materials provided by the client the general rule in most countries is that the constructor is only under a duty to guard these with the care that is appropriate in the circumstances. The natural corollary of this is that, in the case of an unfortunate event not related to non-performance of one of the duties of the constructor, the client has to supply the materials again, and still has to pay the price and is not entitled to compensation from the constructor. Such is the system in England, Sweden, the Netherlands, Belgium, France, Italy, Germany, Austria, Greece and Portugal.

There is no significant difference between the systems relating to risk distribution after the completion of the construction contract. It will be clear that prevention against external harm then is to be taken care of by the client. But the constructor remains responsible for the non-performance of obligations under the contract, which may include an obligation to make the structure resistant to particular causes of external harm.

The duty to deliver a structure fit for its purpose will normally entail several measures to make it less susceptible to external harm. A building should normally be protected against rain, storm and lightning. It should not have exterior parts that are easy to remove by thieves.

The third issue the Article deals with is when the first type of distribution of responsibilities switches to the second one. In most countries, risk passes at the time the control of the structure is transferred (England, Sweden, the Netherlands, Belgium, France, Germany, Austria). In some countries ownership is decisive (Portugal).

C. Preferred option

Many events that were once considered unforeseeable or insurmountable are now within the reach of affordable preventive measures. As a consequence, the constructor will have far-reaching obligations under IV.C.–3:103 (Obligation to prevent damage to structure) to protect the structure against the consequences of external events. But unexpected events may still occur, and the constructor is not accountable for them. Before delivery, this is dealt with by III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment).

If the non-performance is not excusable under that Article, the constructor has to perform again. The constructor is then considered not to have performed yet, so the rules on non-performance apply. If the non-performance is excusable, however, the client will not have a right to specific performance or damages, and termination of the contract may be the result. The client will also have to pay the price, which may be reduced, however; see III.–3:601 (Right to reduce price). According to subparagraph (3)(c) of the current Article, the time of performance will need to be extended since the constructor, due to the unfortunate event, can no longer perform in time. The idea is that the time of performance will be extended proportionally.

The situation is different when an excusing impediment has made performance completely and permanently impossible. In that case, the obligations of both parties will be extinguished. See III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment), in particular paragraph (5).

After completion of the structure, there will be a time from which the structure is no longer within the constructor's sphere of control. In the case of external harm to the structure, the constructor will still be liable for non-performance of obligations to protect the structure but is not liable if the damage cannot be traced back to non-fulfilment of one of these obligations.

With regard to the time of switching, this Article follows the system of most EU countries: the time of the transfer of control is normally decisive. In those comparatively rare cases where control is not to be transferred, the time when the work has been completed and the client has been informed of this is the relevant time.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. The general rule is that the contractor is liable for deterioration on non-delivered parts of the contract work, see ENGLAND (Brecknock Co. v. Pritchard (1976) 6 T. R. 750, 101 ER 807, Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], nos. 4-248, 5-001), SCOTLAND (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], para. 11.06), SWEDEN (AB 92 art. 5:4, first paragraph and Consumer Services Act § 39), FINLAND (ConsProtA chap. 9 § 6(1), General Conditions YSE 1998, Chapter 3), THE NETHERLANDS (CC art. 7:758 para. 2, Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 521), BELGIUM (CC art. 1788), FRANCE (CC art. 1788, but with special provisions for the contract of sale of a building to be built), SPAIN (CC arts. 1589 and 1590, see also TS 10 May 1997, RJ 1997/3831, Europea de Derecho, N. 3006028509), ITALY (CC arts. 1672 and 1673), GERMANY (CC art. 644), AUSTRIA (CC art. 1168a, ÖNORM B 2110 5.41, see also ÖNORM A 2060 2.26.10), GREECE (CC art. 698) and PORTUGAL (CC art. 1228 para. 1; STJ 24 October 1995: BolMinJus, 450, 469).
2. In the majority of European jurisdictions the risk of deterioration of materials falls on the client, if the client supplies these, see for SWEDEN Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 100, AB 92 art. 5:5, THE NETHERLANDS (CC compare art. 7:757), FRANCE CC art. 1789, with reversal of burden of proof to the detriment of the constructor, see Cass.req. 19 June 1886, D.P. 1886, 1, 409; Cass.civ. I, 7. October 1963, D. 1963, p. 748; Cass.civ. III, 17 February1999, CCC 1999, no. 67 with note L. Leveneur, ITALY CC art. 1673, Cass., 1 February 1950, no. 271, Giust.civ, 1950, II, p. 37, with comment of D. Rubino, Il perimento fortuito dell´opera, prima dell´accettazione nel contratto d´opera. GERMANY CC § 644(1), AUSTRIA CC § 1168a sent. 2, GREECE CC art. 698 and PORTUGAL CC art. 1228(1). In SPAIN, pursuant to CC arts. 1589 and 1590 the constructor is to bear the risk if the construction work is lost before delivery both when the constructor has provided the construction material and when it has not, subject to the possibility of a warning about the defective quality of the material.

II. General system of risk

3. The AUSTRIAN CC allocates the risk according to the spheres from which the risk stemmed [Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 409; Gschnitzer, Schuldrecht, Besonderer Teil und Schadensersatz[2], 250 ff]. Art. 1168a operates if the work is destroyed by accident before it has been accepted. The contractor is then not entitled to demand the price and the risk of loss of the material is upon the party who furnished it. The contractor also has to bear a risk materializing in the 'neutral' sphere since there is an obligation to achieve the result. ÖNORM B 2110 has a similar system in 5.41, see also ÖNORM A 2060 2.26.10.
4. In BELGIAN law risk passes at the moment of delivery if the contractor has supplied the materials, see CC art. 1788.
5. The constructor is generally liable for work until it has been accepted or should have been accepted under ENGLISH law, Brecknock Co. v. Pritchard (1976) 6 T. R. 750, 101 ER 807, Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], nos. 4-248, 5-001. In large contracts this moment is normally indicated by an architect's certificate.
6. In consumer construction contracts under FINNISH law, the constructor bears the risk before delivery of elements being destroyed, lost or damaged for a reason not attributable to the client, see Chapter 9 art. 6(1) Consumer Protection Act.

7. If the material is furnished by the constructor, the FRENCH CC art. 1788 states that risk is for the constructor if the thing has not been delivered and the client is not urged (en demeure) to receive the construction. This means that the risks are transferred to the client at the time of the delivery of the construction. This is the application of the rule res perit domino for movables, but not for immovables. If the client is the owner of the land the property is transferred at the time of the accession of the construction to the land, but the risks remain with the constructor until delivery. The Cour de cassation said explicitly that, for immovables, art. 1788 determines only the burden of risks, independently of the question of the passing of ownership (Cass.civ. III, 23 April 1974, D. 1975, 287, with note J. Mazeaud). The risks are not just those of the constructed work, but also the risks of the contract: the contractor cannot claim any remuneration and is obliged to pay back any down payment to the client (Cass.civ. III, 27 January 1976, Bull.civ. III, no. 34). Special provisions exist for the contract of sale of a building to be built. For this contract the transfer of risks depends on the date of the passing of the property. The law of 3 January 1967 provides two sorts of contracts: the vente à terme and the vente en état futur d´achèvement, between which the parties can choose. In the first contract the transfer of property occurs on the day of completion of the building, but it produces effects retroactively at the date of the conclusion of the contract (CC art. 1601-2). In the second contract, the passing of the property occurs immediately according to the performance of the construction (CC art. 1601-3), as for the contrat d´entreprise.

8. In GERMANY the constructor has to bear the risk for any fortuitous event prior to delivery (CC art. 644). The only exception is the accidental destruction or deterioration of materials which were supplied by the client. The emphasis lies here really on “fortuitous events”, i.e. the impact of this event can even with utmost diligence not be averted (BGH NJW 1997, 3018; 1998, 456). Therefore, even extreme weather conditions do not fall under the scope of this rule. The VOB/B does not provide any greatly different solutions in arts. 7, 12 no. 6. Events like strikes generally lead only to a prolongation of the construction time.

9. The GREEK CC art. 698 states that until delivery the risk attaching to the work is to be borne by the contractor. If the client was put on notice to accept, the risk is to be borne by the client. The client bears the risk of accidental destruction or deterioration of materials supplied by the client.

10. In ITALY the constructor bears the risk if the work becomes impossible due to a fact not attributable to the client. In the case of partial impossibility the client may only be asked to pay for the part already performed, so far as it is useful, in proportion to the price agreed for the entire work (CC art. 1672). Secondly, the constructor bears the risk if, for a cause which is not attributable to any of the parties, the work is destroyed or damaged before it is accepted by the client or before the client is late in verifying it. The constructor loses any entitlement to remuneration for work already performed and also bears the risk of loss of the material, in those situations in which the constructor supplied it (CC art. 1673). In those cases in which the client supplied the material, the risk is on the client, as far as the material is concerned, and for the rest it is on the constructor.

11. On the basis of the DUTCH CC art. 7:758, the risk of deterioration or destruction of the work before delivery lies on the contractor, whether the contractor only provides the labour or also the materials. Cf. Van den Berg, Samenwerkingsvormen in de bouw, nos. 76-77; Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 521.

12. In POLAND a constructor who has taken over the building site from the client by protocol, is liable, until the structure is handed over, for damage occurring on that site (CC art. 652).

13. The general rule in PORTUGAL when an unexpected event or "act of god" destroys or damages property is that the owner bears the risk. (Res suo domino perit) (CC art. 1228 para. 1; STJ 24 October 1995: BolMinJus, 450, 469. It is not applied though when the constructor is in delay: the risk is then on the constructor (CC art. 807 and 1228 para. 2) unless it can be proved that the damage or destruction would have occurred anyway even if the work had been delivered in due time. Whenever the creditor is in delay in accepting the work, the risk is immediately transferred to the creditor, Mesquita, RLJ 128 [1996], 154. The constructor bears the risk of damage to or destruction of materials and tools applied to the construction. Cf. Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], no. 419.

14. In SCOTTISH law the general principle is res perit domino (McBryde paras. 9.50-9.51). When a building in the course of construction is accidentally destroyed, the unfinished building is the property of the owner of the ground on the principle of accession, and the loss falls on the owner with the builder having a claim for payment for work and materials (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], para. 11.06). This may be shifted by contract. The location of risk to and concomitant insurance of the works is generally determined by express provision in the SCOTTISH standard forms of construction contract (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 92; Connolly, Construction Law, chaps. 4.194 et esq.). The doctrine of frustration may however apply to discharge construction contracts altogether but this is very rare (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 96).

15. The SPANISH CC regulates risk in construction contracts in arts. 1589 and 1590. Art. 1589 states that when the constructor undertakes the obligation to provide the construction material, it bears the risk if the construction work is lost before delivery, unless the client was in delay in receiving the work. (TS 3 May 1993, RAJ 1993/3400). The client is in delay when the agreed time to receive the work has passed and the reception of the work has not taken place due to causes attributed to the client. Pursuant to CC art. 1590, if the constructor only undertakes the obligation to execute the work but not to provide the construction material, it has also to bear the risk of losing the material before delivery, unless the client was in delay in receiving the work or the loss is due to the poor quality of the construction material, provided the constructor has warned the client of such circumstance. Case law confirms that the constructor bears the risk until the construction work is delivered (TS 10 May 1997, RAJ 1997/3831). The rules on risk are concerned with cases of force majeure or accidental damage and not cases where the loss is due to the constructor's fault, which are to be regulated by the general norms on contractual liability (CC arts. 1124 and 1101).

16. The general rule in SWEDEN is that the contractor is liable for the loss or deterioration of non-delivered parts of the contract work, AB 92 art. 5:4, first paragraph. The rules on consumer services are mainly identical with the regime in the AB 92. Accordingly, Consumer Services Act § 39 states that the consumer is not obliged to pay for work or material which the professional has performed or supplied, if the work or material is accidentally lost or damaged before delivery.

III. Risk as to materials and goods provided by other party

17. The AUSTRIAN CC art. 1168a sentence 2 states that the risk of loss of the material is upon the party who furnished it.

18. Under FRENCH law, if the material is furnished by the client, the risks of the constructed work burden the client in principle. The CC art. 1789 says that the contractor is liable only for fault. But according to case law, it is up to the contractor to prove the absence of fault, Cass.req. 19 June 1886, D.P. 1886, 1, 409; Cass.civ. I, 7 October 1963, D. 1963, p. 748; Cass.civ. III, 17 February 1999, CCC 1999, no. 67 with note L. Leveneur. This solution has been criticised by some writers (Mazeaud, Principaux contrats[5], no. 1350; L. Leveneur, note cit) because it seems unfair to impose the risk of loss due to indeterminate reasons on the contractor or the contractor's insurers instead of the client, who is still the owner, or the client's insurers.

19. If the client supplies the constructor with the material and it is destroyed by a fortuitous event, the client has to bear the risk under GERMAN law (CC art. 644 para. 1)

20. The GREEK CC art. 698 says that the client bears the risk of a fortuitous destruction and deterioration of materials supplied by the client, see also CC art. 699: If by reason of a defect in the materials supplied by the client, or of the method of performance determined by the client, the work has been destroyed or damaged before delivery or its performance has become impossible the contractor is entitled (provided the client's attention has been drawn to such risk in time) to claim remuneration in respect of the work performed and reimbursement of the expenses incurred which have not been included in the contractor's remuneration.

21. Following the ITALIAN CC art. 1673, II co, the risk of loss or deterioration of material supplied by the client is on the client. The remaining risk is on the constructor. Case law accepts that the general principle that the owner bears the risk (res perit domino) applies: (CC art. 1465, Cass., 1 February 1950, no. 271, Giust.civ, 1950, II, p. 37, with comment of D. Rubino, Il perimento fortuito dell´opera, prima dell´accettazione nel contratto d´opera).

22. In THE NETHERLANDS, with regard to the structure itself, the owner bears the risk of deterioration or destruction, be it the contractor or the client, unless fault can be proved, see CC art. 7:757 in conjunction with art. 6:75.

23. According to the POLISH CC art. 655 if the object undergoes destruction or damage as a result of the materials, machines or facilities supplied by the client, the constructor may demand the remuneration agreed upon or an appropriate part of it if the client was warned of the danger of destruction of, or damage to, the object or if, in spite of observing due diligence, the constructor could not have found the defects in the materials, machines or facilities supplied by the client.

24. Generally, the owner of the materials bears the risk under PORTUGUESE law (CC art. 1228(1)). If materials are provided by the constructor, the constructor bears the risk. If materials are provided by the client, the constructor is obliged to execute the construction and the client is obliged to provide replacement materials.

25. In SCOTTISH law the general principle is res perit domino (above, 14). This may be shifted by contract.

26. Under the SPANISH CC arts. 1589 and 1590, the constructor is to bear the risk if the construction work is lost before delivery both when the constructor has provided the construction material and when it has not. However, in the latter situation, the constructor can shift the risk to the client, if the former warns the client about the defective quality of the material.

27. The general rule is that the owner of the things or material has to bear the risk in SWEDISH law, see Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 100. The other party can only be held liable if on the basis of negligence, AB 92 art. 5:5. As for a consumer service, the same principles mainly apply as in the AB 92. The consumer bears the risk in relation to material supplied by the consumer, see Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 100. Cf also Consumer Services Act § 32.

CHAPTER 4: PROCESSING

IV.C.–4:101: Scope

(1) This Chapter applies to contracts under which one party, the processor, undertakes to perform a service on an existing movable or incorporeal thing or to an immovable structure for another party, the client. It does not, however, apply to construction work on an existing building or other immovable structure.

(2) This Chapter applies in particular to contracts under which the processor undertakes to repair, maintain or clean an existing movable or incorporeal thing or immovable structure.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

A contract for processing is defined in Annex 1 as "a contract under which one party, the processor, undertakes to perform a service on an existing movable or incorporeal thing or to an immovable structure for another party, the client (except where the service is construction work on an existing building or other immovable structure)". This is the same, in definition form, as the rule on scope in the present Article.

Processing may be further described as the performance of a service on an existing thing, in order to effect or prevent a change in it. Usually, but not always, the objective will be an improvement in the thing or an increase in its value.

Illustration 1
A car has broken down and is repaired by a garage.

This is a simple example of work on an existing thing. A contract for such work falls clearly within the scope of this Chapter.

To enable the obligation to be performed, the thing will normally – though not necessarily – be brought into the care of the provider of the service (the processor). Like storage, processing will therefore often go together with the handing over of the thing to the provider of the service. In contrast to storage, the thing is not handed over for safeguarding, but to be worked on by the provider of the service. In performing the service, many things may go wrong, thus damaging the thing. The risk of such damage occurring is the main issue in processing contracts.

When the contract concerns the processing of immovable property, the property will of course not be handed over. The client will, however, have to hand over to the processor the control over the immovable property or part of it. This will often be done by giving access to the property. The main issue for the work on immovable property, again, is the risk of damage, in this case not only to the thing itself but also to other things located at or near the thing.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The main policy issue is why some types of contracts are to be covered by the concept of processing. Contracts for work on existing things are traditionally covered by the same rules as construction contracts. However, those rules were designed to regulate the creation of a new thing instead of its alteration or maintenance and are not always very apt for dealing with the specific problems of processing. The fact that the processor takes control over the thing implies that one of the main risks to be guarded against is that the thing is damaged during the performance of the service.

C. Preferred option

The preferred option is to have separate rules for processing contracts but to give them a broad scope. So the Chapter applies to all contracts whereby a party is to perform a service on an existing thing. Paragraph (2) specifies that it applies in particular to contracts whereby the processor is to repair, maintain or clean an existing thing. The Chapter, however, also applies to modern types of services, e. g. a contract by which a software program is to be reprogrammed or a computer system is to be maintained. It also applies to purely commercial contracts, e. g. where the packaging of things produced by a client is outsourced to a professional packaging or wrapping service provider.

D. Relation to other provisions

The relation between the rules on processing and the rules on construction is a close one as the services rendered are rather similar. For this reason, the rules in the Chapters on construction and processing have been closely aligned. Nevertheless, it may be difficult to qualify a specific contract as either a processing or a construction contract.

> Illustration 2
> A thatcher replaces the existing roof of a cottage by new thatch. This is a rather traditional example of a contract for work on an existing thing, but its qualification is not as simple as it seems.

The replacement of an old roof of a building by a new one may be regarded as repair of the old building, in which case the service would be qualified as processing, but it may also be regarded as the building of a new thing (the new roof) on top of an existing structure (the rest of the building). In the latter case, the exchange of the roof would be qualified as construction. Even though this qualification seems to make less sense than qualification as a processing contract, construction work on existing immovable property is traditionally considered to be governed by the rules on construction. To avoid these specific qualification problems, IV.C.–3:101 (Scope) in the construction Chapter explicitly provides that the rules on construction apply, with appropriate adaptations, to contracts by which the service provider undertakes to materially alter an existing building or other immovable structure. The second sentence of paragraph (1) of the present Article excludes such cases from the present Chapter. Consequently, the rules on processing do not apply.

Under Article 2 of the Consumer Sales Directive (Directive 1999/44/EC, OJ 1999, L 171/12), the rules on consumer sales also apply if the seller, in addition to selling a thing, undertakes to install or assemble the thing. Under the present Chapter the installation or assembly of the thing would be considered a processing service. However, the rules on processing and sales have been closely aligned, especially with regard to the applicable remedies.

E. Scope of application of the rules

The following illustrations may provide more insight into the borderline between processing and other services.

Illustration 3
A piece of furniture is made to look antique by applying specialised techniques.

The Chapter applies. It does not matter that the service appears to be directed to producing a deterioration. A service is being performed on the item.

Illustration 4
A car has broken down and is towed to a garage.

The towing of the car does not do anything to change the condition of the car. No work is done on the car. This situation is not within the Chapter.

Illustration 5
A car is to be demolished.

The condition of the car will definitely be changed. Work is to be done on the car. It does not matter that the work on the car is not meant to improve or even to maintain the condition of the car. The rules on processing apply.

Illustration 6
A surveillance company supervises the building in which a factory is located.

Although the control over the building is – partly – handed over to the surveillance company, the building is not worked on by the surveillance company. Therefore, the rules on processing do not apply.

The rules of the present Chapter apply with appropriate adaptations to the processing parts of mixed contracts such as those where, in addition to a sale, processing services are rendered.

Illustration 7
A man buys a wardrobe in flat-pack form. As he is manually incompetent, the parties agree, as part of the same contract, that the seller will put the wardrobe together, in return for extra money.

The rules on processing will apply to the assembly part of the contract.

Illustration 8
A woman buys some 4 m planks from a do-it-yourself shop. She wants to use the planks to construct a small wooden shed. As part of the same contract the shop agrees to saw the planks into 2m lengths. The employee of the shop carelessly makes some of the cuts at 1.80 m.

The rules on processing will apply to the sawing part of the contract.

Illustration 9
A chimney sweep is contracted to sweep the chimney of a house.

This might be considered a borderline situation because the building as such does not change much by the work. Yet the house is to be worked on. The contract is for a type of cleaning and is covered by the rules in this Chapter.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. In most systems, processing services are covered by the general rules on the contract for work (Werkvertrag, contrat d´entreprise), even though that contract type usually primarily focuses on the creation of goods – more specifically, the creation of buildings or immovable structures. The rules on the contract for work apply to processing services that are performed on movable goods and immovable property alike, and in some countries also on intangible things such as software programs. Mostly, they are also applied to gratuitous services, either directly or by way of analogy.

2. Processing is covered by the rules on contract for work in AUSTRIA (CC §§ 1165 ff), FRANCE (CC arts. 1787 ff), GERMANY (CC §§ 631-650), GREECE (CC art. 681-702), ITALY (CC arts. 1655-1677) and POLAND (CC arts. 627 ff); in practice, the same holds true for THE NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 7:750-764), PORTUGAL (CC arts. 1207 ff) and SPAIN (CC arts. 1544 ff). In ENGLAND, the contract is governed by the general requirements of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 and, often, may be qualified as bailment (cf. Miller/Harvey/Parry, Consumer and Trading Law, p. 179). In SCOTLAND the contract is governed by the general principles of the law of contract, although there may be elements of location custodiae, as when a car is left in a garage for repair (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland para. 9.52). In SWEDEN and FINLAND specific legislation governs consumer contracts (Consumer Services Act, respectively Chapter 8 of the Consumer Protection Act on certain consumer service contracts). If the contract is not a consumer contract, in Sweden sales law is applied by way of analogy when this is considered appropriate.

3. The rules on processing contracts are normally applied both when the object of the contract is a movable and when it is an immovable, e. g. a building. This has been explicitly regulated in SWEDEN (Consumer Services Act art. 1, sent. 2), but is considered to be self-evident in most other systems. In FRANCE, the Cour de Cassation decided that in the case of repair of a roof on a building, the rules on the contract for work are to be applied (and not those on construction), unless the whole roof is replaced (Cass.civ. III, 9 November 1994, Bull.civ. III, no. 184). An exception is FINLAND, where, for consumer contracts, specific rules have been developed regarding processing services on immovable goods (cf. Chapter 9 Consumer Protection Act).

4. In most legal systems, the rules on processing are applied either directly or by way of analogy to gratuitous services. The situation is different in GERMANY, ITALY, FINLAND and SWEDEN, where application of the rules on the contract for work is explicitly limited to contracts for remuneration.

II. Place in existing laws

5. In AUSTRIA processing contracts are covered by the wide ambit of the contract for work (CC arts. 1165 ff), which require the processor to achieve a specific result. Cf. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], §§ 1165-1166, no. 9; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], p. 242; cf. also, explicitly for the contracts for repair and maintenance, Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], arts. 1165-1166 nos. 56 and 65. If the processor (explicitly) only promises to try to achieve a result, the contract is a freier Dienstvertrag, for which no statutory rules have been developed.

6. In ENGLISH law, processing contract may be qualified as a contract of bailment, cf. Miller/Harvey/Parry, Consumer and Trading Law, p. 179, albeit that bailment as such is not necessarily based on a contractual relationship, cf. Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-002. A processing contract is subject to the general requirements of ss. 13-17 of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 to the extent that a service is carried out; cf. art. 12 (3). Miller/Harvey/Parry, Consumer and Trading Law, pp. 85-86, 151, 153, state that when materials are used in the performance of the contractual obligations, ss. 1-5a apply to that part of the contract, including the requirement that these materials are fit for purpose (s. 4(5)); if the materials used are dissipated by their use, common law provides the same standard of quality, cf. Ingham v. Emes [1955] 2 QB 366. In SCOTLAND the contract is governed by the general principles of the law of contract.

7. For consumer contracts, processing contracts are generally covered by Chapter 8 of the FINNISH Consumer Protection Act on Certain consumer service contracts.

8. Under FRENCH law this contract falls under the scope of application of the more general contrat de louage d´ouvrage et d´industrie, often called contrat d´entreprise (contract for work, CC arts. 1787 ff).

9. In the GERMAN CC §§ 631-650 on the contract for work apply to a processing contract, as the contract concerns a clearly outlined object of the service (rather then a general activity), cf. BGH NJW 2000, 1107; BGH NJW 2002, 595.

10. Any activity that involves processing is considered to be a service and is regulated by the contract for work in the GREEK civil code (arts. 681-702).

11. A processing contract falls within the scope of application of the provisions on the contratti d´appalto regulated in the ITALIAN CC arts. 1655-1677, the appalto being a contract whereby a party undertakes to perform a work or a service.

12. Processing will normally be qualified as aanneming van werk (contract for work) under the DUTCH CC arts. 7:750-764, cf. den Boer and Wildenburg, TvC 1993, p. 294. Since the rules on the contract for work are not very apt for processing contracts, parties normally make use of standard contract terms, which often have been drafted after negotiations with consumer organisations.

13. Normally processing would be classified as a contract of specific work under the POLISH CC art. 627. In some cases also the rules on building contracts could apply on the basis of CC art. 658, according to which these rules apply to contracts for repairs to a building or structure.

14. Normally, a processing contract is considered in PORTUGAL to be a contract for work (CC arts. 1207 ff); the processor is then under an obligation of result. However, qualification may be problematic. Activities such as finishing works in a new structure (e. g. paperhanging) have been regarded as a contract for work (CA Coimbra, 20 June 1990, BolMinJus 398, 593) but also as a contract for services (STJ 25 September 1991, BolMinJus 409, 764).

15. In SPAIN processing contracts are not covered by the rules on service contracts but by those on construction contracts (CC arts. 1544 ff) if the main obligation for the service provider is to come up with a final outcome in conformity with the expectations of the client. When such is not the case, the rules on service contracts (CC arts. 1583 ff) do apply, leading to a mere obligation of means.

16. Rules for consumer services can be found in the SWEDISH Consumer Services Act, which cover work on movables and immovables alike (cf. Consumer Services Act art. 1, sent. 2). Apart from this it is an unregulated area. However, the Sales Act can be used by way of analogy when appropriate.

III. Application to movables and immovables?

17. In AUSTRIAN law, the rules on the contract for work apply irrespective of the type of property that is the object of the contract, as they apply to the construction of a building, the repair of a thing and the programming of software alike. Cf. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], §§ 1165-1166; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], p. 242.

18. The Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 under ENGLISH law applies to services on movables and immovables, as long as a service is carried out; cf. art. 12 (3).

19. In the case of repair or renovation of a consumer's house, not Chapter 8 but Chapter 9 of the FINNISH Consumer Protection Act on Sale of building elements and construction contracts applies, cf. Chapter 9, Section 1 (3) Consumer Protection Act.

20. The rules on the contract for work in principle apply irrespective of the type of property that is the object of the contract under FRENCH law. However, the borderline with construction contracts is difficult to draw (yet important for its far-reaching consequences). To give an example: the Cour de Cassation decided that repair of a roof is to be considered a construction contract if the structure of the roof is replaced, and a contract for work otherwise, cf. Cass.civ. III, 9 November 1994, Bull.civ. III, no. 184.

21. The GERMAN CC § 631(2) provides that both the creation and the change of something can be the object of a contract for work, as well as another service if a certain result is to be achieved. A division as to the type of property that is the object of the contract is not made.

22. The rules on the contract for work apply irrespective of the type of property that is the object of the contract under GREEK, ITALIAN and DUTCH law.

23. In POLAND the rules on the contract for specific work apply to the contract of specific work to be performed on immovables and movables alike. However, if the administrative rules of building law are applicable to a given contract, then it is classified as a building contract (CC art. 647).

24. In SCOTLAND the principles apply to movables and immovables alike. Under the Housing Grants, Construction Contracts and Regeneration Act s.105 construction operations include repair, maintenance and cleaning (internal and external) of buildings.

25. The SWEDISH Consumer Services Act covers work on movables and immovables alike (cf. art. 1, 2nd sentence). This means for instance that construction, repair, painting, wall-papering, laying out a garden and digging work is covered by the same regime, see Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], pp. 86 ff.

IV. Application to gratuitous processing services

26. According to the prevailing opinion in AUSTRIAN law, gratuitous processing contracts are not covered by the rules on the contract for work but by the rules on mandate. However, the rules on the contract for work are generally applied by way of analogy if and in so far as this may be considered appropriate. Cf. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], §§ 1165-1166 no. 100; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], pp. 243-244.

27. The Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 in ENGLISH law only applies if there is a contract and the supplier of the service acts in a professional capacity, cf. Miller/Harvey/Parry, Consumer and Trading Law, p. 153. The client must perform at least some kind of obligation, otherwise consideration for the contract is lacking. Cf. McKendrick, Contract Law[4], p. 74. Yet, the rules on bailment may apply to gratuitous processing contracts, cf. Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-029.

28. The FINNISH Consumer Protection Act does not apply to gratuitous contracts, as may be deduced from Chapter 1, Section 5, where the definition of business is restricted to cases where the party concluding the contract with the consumer offers the services for consideration.

29. Under FRENCH law the same rules apply in principle to gratuitous processing services, cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 32113. Yet, the parties are presumed to have agreed upon a remuneration for the processor, cf. Cass. civ., III 17 December 1997, Bull. civ. III, no. 226.

30. In GERMANY the rules on the contract for work only apply if the client undertakes, even if only tacitly, to pay a price (cf. CC §§ 631(1), 632; Staudinger [-Peters], BGB [2003], § 632 no. 1; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 631 no. 12).

31. Under ITALIAN law, in order to qualify a processing contract as a contratto d´appalto, the work has to be performed in exchange for a sum of money (CA Palermo 31 October 1947, Foro. Sic., p. 22).

32. In principle, the same rules will apply to gratuitous processing services under DUTCH law. However, the standard of care will probably be lower than for a service provided for a remuneration.

33. In POLAND the contract for specific work is to be performed against remuneration (CC art. 627). If the parties did not agree on the price a number of rules indicate how to calculate the due remuneration (CC arts. 628-630). Also the building contract is classified as a remunerative contract (CC art. 647).

34. Given the recognition of gratuitous contracts and unilateral promises in SCOTTISH law, there is nothing to prevent the application of these concepts to processing contracts. The distinction between gratuitous and onerous transactions and resultant liabilities where a person is put in possession of goods to work upon them has been minimised in modern Scottish law (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.54).

35. The SWEDISH Consumer Services Act does not apply to gratuitous services. This limitation is not expressly provided in the text, but can be derived especially from the provisions concerning price, Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 251.

IV.C.–4:102: Obligation of client to co-operate

The obligation to co-operate requires in particular the client to:

(a) hand over the thing or to give the control of it to the processor, or to give access to the site where the service is to be performed in so far as may reasonably be considered necessary to enable the processor to perform the obligations under the contract; and

(b) in so far as they must be provided by the client, provide the components, materials and tools in time to enable the processor to perform the obligations under the contract.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The obligation to co-operate mentioned in the Article is the general obligation under III.–1:104 (Co-operation) as expanded for service contracts by IV.C.–2:103 (Obligation to co-operate). The client is to enable the processor to perform the service the client has asked for. This means, first, that the client must provide the processor with the thing to be worked on; and secondly, that, if the parties agreed that materials, tools or components are to be supplied by the client, they must be supplied in good time so as not to hold up the performance of the service.

Illustration 1
A car owner agrees with a garage for the car to be serviced the next day. The client is to take the car to the garage at the agreed time and place.

Illustration 2
A client is no longer able to regularly clean his house, and requests the services of a cleaning company. The parties agree that the client will provide the cleaning materials, brooms and mops. The client is to make sure that sufficient materials and tools are available in good time.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

It might be argued that these rules are unnecessary - first because there are already provisions on the obligation to co-operate in other Articles (III.–1:104 (Co-operation) and IV.C.–2:103 (Obligation to co-operate)) and secondly because meeting these requirements clearly is in the client's own interest. Performance will be held up until the client does meet them. However, there is an argument for particularising aspects of the client's obligation to co-operate in relation to processing contracts. And the processor will often have an independent interest in the client meeting these requirements, as the price may have been calculated in accordance with the duration of performance and it may not be possible to use the workforce for another job. The Article takes that interest into account.

C. Preferred option

The preferred option is to include an Article making more specific certain aspects of the general obligation to co-operate so far as the client is concerned. The most important specification, which is particular to processing contracts, is that the client must hand over the thing or the control of it to the processor in order for the service to be performed on that thing. If immovable property is to be worked on, or if the processor is required to collect the thing, the client must give the processor access to it. In all cases, the client must perform the obligation in time to enable the processor to perform the processor's obligations under the contract.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. The client is under an implied obligation to hand over the item to be worked on (or control over it) or give access to it on time in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND (cf. Mackay v. Dick (1880-81) 6 App. Cas. 251, at p. 263), GERMANY (cf. CC § 642(1), BGH BGHZ 11, 80, 83) and POLAND (CC art. 640). A similar duty may arise from good faith in GREECE (CC art. 288), ITALY (CC art. 1175 and 1375) and PORTUGAL (CC art. 762 para. 2 and 813 para. 2). A comparable result is achieved for consumer contracts in SWEDEN (Consumer Services Act arts. 45, 46) and FINLAND (Chapter 8, section 29 para. 3 of the Consumer Protection Act), where the processor may terminate for failure to co-operate if the client does not enable the processor to perform the service. In AUSTRIA (cf. CC § 1168), FRANCE (cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 32328-32329) and THE NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 6:58 ff), the rules on mora creditoris and contractual provisions lead to the same result.

II. Client's obligation to hand over or give access to the item to be worked on

2. In AUSTRIA the client is normally not obliged to hand over the item to the processor or to give access to it on time, but failure to do so leads to mora creditoris. Cf. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], §§ 1165-1166 no. 113; § 1168 no. 33. In such a case, the processor may cancel the contract after having set a reasonable period of time for the client to perform (CC § 1168); in case of cancellation under this provision, the client would still be required to pay the price for the service. Cf. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], § 1168 nos. 33, 35-36.
3. In ENGLAND the client is under an implied obligation to hand over the item if such an implied term is necessary to give business efficacy to the contract and the term is so obvious that 'it goes without saying'. Cf. BP Refinery (Westernport) Pty Ltd. v. Shire of Hastings 52 ALJR 20, 26. These conditions will normally be met, for the processor cannot perform the service unless the client performs this particular obligation to co-operate. Cf. Mackay v. Dick (1880-81) 6 App. Cas. 251, at p. 263. SCOTTISH law is the same.
4. In consumer contracts in FINLAND the processor may terminate the contractual relationship if the client fails to co-operate in the delivery of the item as required for the rendering of the service (Chapter 8, section 29 (3) of the Consumer Protection Act. From this, an obligation to hand over the item or the control over it may be deduced if and in so far as this is necessary for the proper performance of the service. For contracts leading to, e. g., the repair or renovation of a house, Chapter 9, section 31 of the Consumer Protection Act leads to the same result.
5. Under FRENCH law the client is required to hand over the item that is to be worked on, or to give access to it, at such a time as is necessary for the performance of the service. Cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 32328-32329.
6. Under the GERMAN CC § 642(1), the client is required to give the necessary co-operation; in a processing contract, this includes at least the obligation to hand over the item (or control over it) or give access to it on time. This is regarded as a contractual obligation and not just a matter of mora creditoris. Cf. BGH BGHZ 11, 80, 83.

7. Under GREEK law, an obligation to hand over item on time may be deemed to arise from the general provision on good faith (CC art. 288).

8. In ITALY a general duty to co-operate may be deduced from the general principles of correctness in performance (CC art. 1175) and of good faith (CC art. 1375). Under these provisions, the client would be required to provide the processor on time with the item or the control over it.

9. The client, in THE NETHERLANDS, has to enable the processor to perform the obligations under the contract. This duty to co-operate, following from the rules on mora creditoris (CC arts. 6:58 ff) and good faith and fair dealing, is often explicitly or impliedly regulated in standard contract terms. From this general duty to co-operate, a duty to hand over the item or the control over it may be derived when such is needed for the fulfilment of the processor's obligations. Cf. Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 558.

10. A duty to co-operate exists as a general rule concerning performance of obligations under POLISH law (CC art. 354). In the contract for specific work, the client's duty to co-operate is specially underlined in CC art. 640, according to which, if co-operation on the part of the client is required for the making of the work and such cooperation is lacking, the service provider may set the client an appropriate time limit with the sanction that after an ineffective lapse of that time the processor will be entitled to renounce the contract. In such a case the service provider may also demand remuneration, but the client may deduct what the service provider has saved by not making the work (CC art. 639). The service provider may ask for damages, based on the general rule of CC art. 471. In the case of building contracts the client is obliged to hand over or give access to the building site and the agreed machines and devices (Radwański [-Strzępka], System Prawa Prywatnego VII[2,] p. 407).

11. Although not expressly provided for in PORTUGUESE law, the client's obligation to hand over the item is ascertainable from CC art. 762 para. 2 and 813 para. 2 regarding good faith in the execution of a contract. Cf. Romano Martinez, Direito das Obrigações[2], 342.

12. Under the SWEDISH Consumer Services Act arts. 45, 46, the professional has a right to suspend its work, and to terminate the contractual relationship, if the consumer's failure to render assistance constitutes a delay which is of material significance to the professional. From this, indirectly a duty to co-operate follows.

13. The SPANISH CC does not have any specific rules on processing contracts. Art. 1544 distinguishes only between the contract for work and the service contract, according to the terms of the obligation: the first obliges the supplier to achieve a particular result, while the second imposes only a duty of acting with the skill and care reasonably expected by the client. Therefore, a processing contract should be considered as a subtype of one of those contracts depending on the character of the obligation. The general obligation of co-operation stems from the CC art. 1258 (good faith) and it includes all the operations that are necessary so that the processor may fulfil the obligation. If the client impedes the processor's performance by a lack of co-operation, this is regarded by the Supreme Court as a cause for termination of the contract (TS 21 November 2002, RAJ 2002\10269). The materials may be provided either by the client, or by the supplier of the service, depending on the terms of the contract. If the character of the service implies that the materials should be provided by the client, this obligation may be derived from the CC art. 1258 as well.

IV.C.–4:103: Obligation to prevent damage to thing being processed

The processor must take reasonable precautions in order to prevent any damage to the thing being processed.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

A significant risk for the client is that the processor may damage the thing being worked on. The present Article contains a specification of the obligation of skill and care imposed on any service provider. See IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care) paragraph (5). The processor must take reasonable precautions to prevent unnecessary damage to the thing being worked on, whether such damage is caused by the processor, by third parties or by other external causes. "Damage" means any type of detrimental effect: it includes loss and injury. (Annex 1).

Illustration 1
A cleaning company is contracted to clean an office building daily between 6 and 8 p. m. After having finished an individual office, the employee of the cleaning company is to lock the doors of that office in order to prevent theft.

Illustration 2
A cabinetmaker is requested to restore a precious Chinese folding screen. In the cabinetmaker's workshop, the folding screen is to be placed in such a manner that it will not be damaged by an opening door.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

When an existing thing is worked on, there is an almost inherent risk of damage to the thing. Because the processor will normally have control over the thing, the processor is usually in the best position to take protective measures. More generally, the processor is usually in the best position to take safety measures and measures limiting any adverse impact of the activity on property and other people. The main policy issue is the extent of the obligation on the processor. Damage is to be prevented as much as possible, but there is a limit to the protective measures the processor can be expected to take: damage cannot always be prevented, or only at very high costs. It would not be reasonable nor economic to require the processor to take all possible precautionary measures.

C. Preferred option

The preferred option is to require reasonable precautions to be taken to prevent damage occurring to the thing being worked on. See further the Comments to IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care). Paragraph (5) of that Article imposes a general obligation to take reasonable precautions to prevent the occurrence of any damage as a consequence of the performance of the service.

The obligation under this Article may be overridden by the terms of the contract if, in particular, the contract requires damage to be caused by, or as an incidental effect of, the processing. Such may be the case if the initial infliction of damage is necessary in order to subsequently improve the thing, but may also be the actual purpose of the contract.

Confidential records are handed over to be shredded.

Destruction of the records could be seen as the infliction of damage on the thing, but liability is of course excluded because that damage is intended by both parties.

Illustration 4
A table is handed over to a furniture maker to be revarnished. Prior to the application of new varnish, the old varnish is removed and the table is sandpapered.

Although the removal of the varnish and the sandpapering temporarily worsen the condition of the table, it is clear that this procedure is needed to enable the furniture maker to revarnish the table properly. There is no obligation to take any measures to prevent such temporary damage.

The processor's obligation extends to the taking of reasonable steps to prevent damage arising from external causes.

Illustration 5
A museum has Egyptian artefacts restored. The restorer is to protect the artefacts against humidity, wind and changes in temperature, and to guard them from theft by his staff or third parties.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. It is undisputed in all systems that the processor has an obligation to prevent damage to the item on which the service is executed. This follows in most systems from an explicit or implied contractual term to use due diligence and care (AUSTRIA, cf. CC § 1169; ENGLAND, cf. Brabant & Co. v. King [1895] AC 632, at. p. 641; SCOTLAND: Hinshaw v. Adam (1870) 8 M 933) or the general provision of good faith (GERMANY, cf. CC §§ 241, 242, BGH NJW 1983, 113). In consumer contracts in FINLAND (cf. ConsProtA chap. 8 § 12(2) and chap. 9 § 13(2) under 5) and SWEDEN (cf. Consumer Services Act art. 32), damage to the item being worked on will be considered a defect of the service if the client would have had reason to expect that the performance of the service would not lead to such damage. In England and Scotland, in the case of damage to the item, a reversal of the burden of proof occurs, cf. Levison v. Patent Steam Carpet Cleaning Co. Ltd. [1978] QB 69, (CA); Hinshaw v. Adam, above.

II. Obligation to prevent damage to item being processed

2. Under AUSTRIAN law the processor is required to safeguard the client's interests. To that extent, the processor is under duties of diligence and care (CC art. 1169 and must care for the things being worked on in the same diligent way as a storer would have to, cf. OGH, SZ 2/11.
3. As a processing contract may generally be qualified as bailment in ENGLISH law, the processor is required to prevent damage to the item handed over by the client, cf.

Brabant & Co. v King [1895] AC 632, at. p. 641. In case of damage, the processor must prove all the known circumstances in which the loss or damage occurred; failure to do so leads to liability; cf. Levison v Patent Steam Carpet Cleaning Co Ltd. [1977] 3 All ER 498, [1978] QB 69, Court of Appeal. In practice, this leads to a reversal of the burden of proof.

4. Section 32 of the FINNISH Consumer Protection Act entitles the client to compensation for damage to the thing while it is in the possession or under the supervision of the processor, unless the processor proves the occurrence of damage was not due to negligence on the processor's part.

5. The loss of or damage to the thing is governed by the FRENCH CC art. 1789, leading to a fault-based liability of the processor; yet, the processor bears the burden of proof that due care was taken (obligation de résultat attenué), cf. Cass. civ. I, 14 May 1991, D. 1991, 449, note J. Ghestin (standing case law). The processor has especially to prove that normal precautions were taken for the protection of the thing processed.

6. In GERMANY the processor is under an obligation to act with consideration regarding the property of the client, cf. CC §§ 241, 242 (BGH VersR 1969, 927; BGH NJW 1983, 113). There is no difference between the care required as to the item that is the object of the contract, and other goods of the client.

7. The processor has obligations to prevent the processing from causing damage under ITALIAN law. Cf., more specifically for construction, Marando, Resp.civ. e prev. 1998, pp. 33-56.

8. Under DUTCH law the processor is liable for any damage occurring to the thing that can be attributed to its actions, cf. CC arts. 6:74 ff (general contract law). An explicit obligation not to damage the client's good is recognised in standard contract terms, cf. art. 5, para. 4, VNI-Installatievoorwaarden.

9. In POLAND, if damage to the work occurs due to any reason covered by the contractual liability of the processor, the work does not conform and the processor is liable. If however the work is destroyed or damaged due to defects of the material delivered by the client or as a result of the work having been made in accordance with the client's instructions, the person who received the order may demand the agreed remuneration or the appropriate part for the work made, provided that the client was warned of the danger of destruction of, or damage to the work (POLISH CC art. 641 para. 2).

10. According to the PORTUGUESE CC art. 1228, it must be ascertained if the damage is imputable to processor; if so the processor is liable for that damage. However, in CA Porto, 21 October 1991, BolMinJus 410, 874, is was made clear that sometimes not a contractual, but a tortious claim is to be made. In this particular case, a client delivered his car to a garage for repair. The car mechanic applied an oil pump that was inadequate for that engine, resulting in the total destruction of the engine. The court held that the damage, although resulting from the non-performance of a contract for work, was to be indemnified in tort since the act causing the damage was forbidden and faulty under the law of torts.

11. In SCOTTISH law, if work is to be done on an item and it is returned damaged, prima facie the processor is liable (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.37). The onus is on the processor to show that reasonable care was taken (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.56).

12. In SPAIN the framework for the precautions to be taken by the processor is the ordinary diligence and care that should be taken by the debtor according to the character of the contractual obligation (CC art. 1104). It may derive as well from the principle of good faith (CC art. 1258). The processor is liable for any damage caused to the client's property by the processor's negligence, fault or delay (CC art. 1101 - contractual liability).

13. According to the SWEDISH Consumer Services Act art. 32 the service provider is presumed liable for damage to the things while in its possession, or otherwise subject to its control. For commercial contracts, the general rules on tort will be applicable, presuming liability for goods in the possession of the service-provider, but otherwise limiting liability to proven causation, Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 118.

IV.C.–4:104: Inspection and supervision

(1) If the service is to be performed at a site provided by the client, the client may inspect or supervise the tools and material used, the performance of the service and the thing on which the service is performed in a reasonable manner and at any reasonable time, but is not bound to do so.

(2) Absence of, or inadequate inspection or supervision does not relieve the processor wholly or partially from liability. This rule also applies when the client is under a contractual obligation to accept, inspect or supervise the processing of the thing.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The client may, but is not obliged to, watch the processor executing the contract when the service is performed on the client's premises. If the client does not exercise the right to watch the performance of the service, or does so inattentively, this does not have negative consequences.

> Illustration 1
> A security company is requested to install a security camera system on the outside of an office building. The client is entitled to supervise the installation of the cameras. When attaching the cameras to the building, the security company accidentally uses the wrong type of screws. As a consequence, the cameras become detached and fall down damaged beyond repair.

The client's failure to notice the use of the wrong screws when supervising the installation of the cameras does not exempt the processor in whole or in part from liability.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The client has an interest in inspecting the performance of the service, for during the inspection the client may notice that the processor is not fulfilling obligations under the contract. In that case, the client would be able to intervene by giving the processor a direction or by insisting on specific performance. On the other hand, conflicting interests of the processor – especially the risk of disclosure of trade secrets – and of third parties – especially the right to privacy – may be at stake.

A second issue is what is to happen if the client was entitled to inspect or supervise, but did not do so, or if the client actually did inspect or supervise, but did so inadequately. One could think that in such a case the client forfeited the right to claim damages for non-performance as the non-performance could have been noticed earlier. On the other hand, one could argue that there is no reason why the client should lose rights when, after all, it was the processor whose non-performance led to damage.

C. Preferred option

The system preferred here is that the client has no duty to inspect, and that an absence of inspection or inadequate inspection does not relieve the processor from any obligations. If the client noticed a defect and did not notify the processor within a reasonable time consequences might follow but they would follow from the failure to notify.

As the interest of the client in inspection and supervision of the performance of the service, the processor's conflicting interest concerning the risk of the disclosure of trade secrets and the interests of third parties need to be balanced, the right to inspection and supervision in processing contracts is restricted to cases where the service is performed on the client's premises.

Inspection and supervision are a mere right of the client. It is not considered an obligation of the client in any legal system, and it is not considered as such under this Article either. Therefore, it does not seem justified to deprive the client of any rights if the client could have discovered the non-performance, but in fact did not do so, for instance because the client did not inspect at all. Even inadequate inspection should not lead to such a result, for that would provide an incentive not to inspect at all.

The present Article to a large extent mirrors the similar Article in the Chapter on Construction. The Article differs from that provision in two respects. Firstly, given the weight of the processor's interests in defending trade secrets and the right of third parties (other clients of the processor) to their privacy, the right to inspection and supervision in processing contracts is restricted to cases where the service is performed on the client's premises. Secondly, a specific provision as to the presentation of elements in the process to the client for acceptance is not needed for processing contracts and has therefore been left out. Given the default character of the present Article, the parties may of course include such a provision in their contract.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. The client is not obliged to inspect, but is entitled to do so, in AUSTRIA (cf. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I^2, § 1170 no. 5), GREECE (CC art. 692), ITALY (CC art. 1662). A right to inspect the service probably does exist in GERMANY (analogous application of construction law) and may also exist in SWEDEN at least in some cases. Such a right does not exist in ENGLAND or SCOTLAND.

II. Right to inspect

2. The AUSTRIAN CC contains no duty to inspect or to point out defects. The client, however, can inspect the work before acceptance, a right that cannot be denied. Cf. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I^2, § 1170 no. 5.
3. The Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 does not recognise an implied term entitling the client to inspect the service under ENGLISH law. It is unlikely that under common law such a right would exist, since inspection is not a necessary condition to give business efficacy to the contract and a term allowing it does not 'go without saying'. Therefore, the conditions for an implied term to that extent, set out in BP Refinery (Westernport) Pty Ltd. v. Shire of Hastings 52 ALJR 20, 26, would not be met.
4. In GERMANY the client has the right, but not an obligation, to inspect or supervise the performance of the service under § 4 no. 1(2) VOB/B. The VOB/B is applicable to construction contracts, but there is no reason not to apply the provision to processing contracts.

5. Under GREEK law there is no duty to inspect but rather a right the client may exercise (CC art. 692).

6. The ITALIAN CC art. 1662 establishes an option for the client to examine the processor's activity while performing the contract, provided that the client pays for the costs of such inspection and that the inspection does not cause needless difficulties to the processor, cf. Cass., 10 May 1965, no. 891, RGE, 1965, I, p. 945, comment of E. Favara, Limiti del controllo del committente sull´opera dell´appaltatore. Absence or inadequate inspection during the performance of the obligations under the contract does not lead to the loss of remedies, cf. CA Torino, 17 July 1959, Giust.civ.Mass., p. 814.

7. An obligation and possibly even a right to inspect does not exist in DUTCH law, see Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 562. However, it is thought that if the client does inspect or supervise the service during its performance, defects sometimes should be discovered. A failure to inform the processor of the defects at that time would then lead to a loss of remedies, cf. Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 569.

8. In the POLISH law the manner in which the contract of specific work is to be performed is in principle left for the service provider to decide. The client has only a right to control the performance from the point of view of its correctness and accordance with the contract (CC art. 636(1)) (Radwański [-Strzępka], System Prawa Prywatnego VII[2], pp. 336-337).

9. SCOTTISH common law recognises no right like that in this Article.

10. There is no duty on the client to supervise the execution of the service in SPANISH law. In a contract for work, the manner in which the service should be performed is generally left to be decided by the supplier (Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles, p.671). Therefore, the processor is liable in any case for the defects that may result from the work and the lack of inspection by the client of the service being carried out is irrelevant (CC art. 1591 and art. 17 of the Building Regulation Act). There is no express provision about a right of the client to supervise the work. Nevertheless, the client has a right to give instructions to the provider of the service (SAP Baleares 8 April 2002, JUR 2002/153765), but must not hinder the performance of the service, as that would be a cause for termination of the contract (TS 21 November 2002, RAJ 2002 /10269).

11. In SWEDISH and FINNISH law, for commercial services, the client will have a duty to inspect the work after the passing of risk, cf. the Sales Act art. 31, which is applied by analogy. Whether there is a right to inspect while the service is being performed, will depend upon the circumstances, whether the inspection hinders the service-provider in its performance and if the performance of the service will take a long time or not.

IV.C.–4:105: Return of the thing processed

(1) If the processor regards the service as sufficiently completed and wishes to return the thing or the control of it to the client, the client must accept such return or control within a reasonable time after being notified. The client may refuse to accept the return or control when the thing is not fit for use in accordance with the particular purpose for which the client had the service performed, provided that such purpose was made known to the processor or that the processor otherwise has reason to know of it.

(2) The processor must return the thing or the control of it within a reasonable time after being so requested by the client.

(3) Acceptance by the client of the return of the thing or the control of it does not relieve the processor wholly or partially from liability for non-performance.

(4) If, by virtue of the rules on the acquisition of property, the processor has become the owner of the thing, or a share in it, as a consequence of the performance of the obligations under the contract, the processor must transfer ownership of the thing or share when the thing is returned.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article deals with the return of the thing or the control of it to the client. Firstly, when the processor has completed the service – and, if need be, has informed the client – the client must enable the processor to return the thing.

> Illustration 1
> A garage owner has repaired a car. When the repair is completed, the garage owner rings the client informing him that the car is ready. The client is to go to the garage and collect the car.

However, the client is not required to accept the return of the thing if it becomes clear that the service was not rendered correctly and the defects are so serious that the client would be entitled to terminate the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance.

> Illustration 2
> A handyman has repaired a washing machine. When the handyman delivers the washing machine at the client's house and does a final test run, the washing machine does not function at all. As this clearly constitutes a fundamental non-performance, the client may refuse the return of the washing machine.

Equally, the client may request the return of the thing at any time. If the client orders the return of the thing before the service has been performed, this may amount to a termination of the contractual relationship under IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate), which means that the processor is still entitled to receive the price for the service.

> Arthur is the owner of a sophisticated mobile radio, with which supposedly transmissions from all over the world can be received. At some point, only the FM wave functions. So Arthur takes the radio to the shop for repair. One week later, the Olympics start. Arthur, a sports fan, demands the return of the radio, even though the repair has not yet taken place. The radio is to be returned, yet Arthur remains obliged to pay the price for the service that was requested.

Where, in the course of the performance of the service the processor has become the owner of the thing, the processor must return ownership of the thing to the client together with the thing itself.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The processor who has possession of the thing must take proper care of it and prevent it from being damaged. The processor therefore has an interest in being freed from these obligations when the service is finished. The client may want the thing returned, either after being told about completion of the service or before it is performed. The present Article deals with these interests, as well as with the consequences of the return of the thing: does acceptance of the return of the thing imply acceptance of any defects in the service or damage to the thing?

A different problem may arise if the processing has resulted in the processor becoming the owner of the thing or a share in it. The present Article must remedy that when the thing is returned to the client.

C. Preferred option

As the processor may have an interest in being freed from the obligation to take proper care of the thing once the service has been rendered, the present Article introduces an obligation of the client to accept the return of the thing. However, as the client is not to refuse the return of the thing (unless in the case of fundamental non-performance), mere acceptance of the thing implies nothing more than that the client performs this obligation. In other words, the mere acceptance of the thing should not be interpreted as acceptance of a non-reported defect. Moreover, in processing contracts, especially when a movable has been worked on at the premises of the processor, packaging of the thing in order to enable safe transportation is not uncommon. In such circumstances, there does not seem to be a compelling reason to oblige the client to inspect the thing immediately or at the processor's premises when it is returned to the client.

Where performance of the contractual obligations led to the transfer of ownership, that transfer is to be undone when the thing is returned to the client. To that extent, the present Article introduces an obligation on the processor to accomplish also a retransfer of ownership. The provision, of course, only applies if ownership did in fact pass. Whether such is the case, is a matter for the Book on the Transfer of Movables.

The present Article is the functional equivalent of the Article on the handing over of the structure in the Chapter on Construction and the Article on the return of the thing in the Chapter on Storage. In this respect, these Chapters have in common that they all primarily deal with tangible things that are in the possession of a service provider and need to be transferred to the client. The Articles mentioned serve to facilitate such transfer.

Occasionally, the law of property may mean that the processor becomes owner or part owner of the thing. When the thing is returned, ownership of the thing or share must be returned free from rights of third parties that did not exist when the thing was handed over to the processor.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. If the client accepts the outcome of the service without protesting against a defect in the service that could have been noticed by inspection at the end of the service, e. g. by examining the thing processed, then the processor can no longer be held liable in FRANCE (cf. Cass.civ. III, 16 December 1987, Bull.civ. III, no. 208), GERMANY (CC § 640(1) and (3)), GREECE (CC art. 692), ITALY (CC art. 1665 para. 3 and 4, Cass. 1 May 1967, no. 809, Rep.Foro it., 1967, V° Appalto, c. 103, n. 59), THE NETHERLANDS (CC art. 7:758(1) and (3)) and, if the client is a commercial party, in FINLAND and SWEDEN (by way of analogous application of the Sales Act art. 31).

2. On the other hand, the mere acceptance of the return of the thing processed, or the control over it, is not regarded as an acceptance of the proper performance of the service in AUSTRIA (cf. Klang [-Adler and Höller], ABGB V[3], § 1167, 398), ENGLAND (cf. Hudson nos. 5-021, 5-022, commenting on the construction case East Ham Corp. v. Bernard Sunley [1966] AC 406, House of Lords), FINLAND (if the client is a consumer, Consumer Protection Act Chapter 8, Section 16) and SWEDEN. However, in Finland (ConsProtA chap. 8 § 16) the client is required to notify the processor of the existence of a defect within a reasonable time after the client notices or should have noticed that defect; in POLAND, the period is one month after the return of the thing or, in the case of a hidden defect, after the moment when the client notices or should have noticed that defect (CC art. 563(1)). Notification of a discovered hidden defect by a commercial party is to take place immediately after the discovery (cf. art. 563(2)).

II. Acceptance of the return of the thing: consequences for claim for non-performance

3. An obligation for the client to accept the work does not exist, but a refusal to accept the work leads to mora creditoris if the work conforms to the contract under AUSTRIAN law. Cf. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I[2], §§ 1165-1166, no. 111. An acceptance without reservation cannot be deemed a waiver of the rights based on defects that were neither apparent nor known to the client, unless there is an express or factual approval. Cf. Klang [-Adler and Höller], V[3], § 1167, no. 398.

4. The fact that the client accepts the return of the thing (or the control over it) cannot be construed as an acceptance of the conformity of the work under ENGLISH law. Only in the case of express approval of the result by the client is the processor absolved from liability. Cf. Hudson nos. 5-021, 5-022, commenting on the construction case East Ham Corp. v. Bernard Sunley [1966] AC 406, House of Lords, which is to the same effect.

5. The FINNISH ConsProtA chap. 8 § 16 requires the client to notify a defect within a reasonable time after it has been noticed or should have been noticed. The mere acceptance of the return of the thing without protest therefore does not, by itself, lead to the immediate loss of remedies. Moreover, in certain cases the client may claim the application of a remedy even after the 'reasonable period' has expired.

6. The client is under an obligation to accept the return of the thing (or the control over it) under FRENCH law. At that point, the client is required to verify whether the service is in conformity with the contract. Acceptance without protest against defects that are or should have been recognised by the client at that time (manifest defects) amounts to an acceptance of these defects, exonerating the processor from liability. Cf.

Cass.civ. III, 16 December 1987, Bull.civ III, no. 208; Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 32330-32332.

7. In GERMANY the client is required to accept delivery of the work if the service has been performed correctly; acceptance may not be refused for minor defects (CC § 640(1), sent. 1 and 2). The client is not required to inspect the service when it is completed, but when the client, although required to do so, does not take delivery within a reasonable period determined by the processor, the client is deemed to have accepted the work (CC § 640(1), sent. 3). Acceptance of a work with defects the client knows of, is deemed to be a waiver of the rights arising out of non-performance unless the client reserves the rights at acceptance (para. 3). After acceptance, the client bears the burden of proving the existence of the defect, cf. Staudinger (-Peters), BGB (2003), § 640, no. 1.

8. According to the GREEK CC art. 692 the processor after inspection is exonerated from liability for defects unless these could not be ascertained with a dutiful inspection or the processor maliciously kept them secret.

9. The ITALIAN CC art. 1665 para. 1 gives the client the right to verify the completed work. A defect which could be detected during an inspection at such time must be mentioned to the processor; failure to do so leads to the loss of any action against the processor (CC art. 1665 para. 4). Cf. Cass., 1 May 1967, no. 809, Rep.Foro it., 1967, V^{o} Appalto, c. 103, no. 59. Where the client does not inspect without justified reasons, the work is considered accepted unconditionally (CC art. 1665(3)), leading to the loss of guarantees for any defects and non-conformities that should have been detected at such an inspection, cf. Stolfi, Appalto, p. 52. Notification of hidden defects must take place within sixty days from their discovery, CC art. 1667(2).

10. In THE NETHERLANDS failure to inspect the work within a reasonable period of time amounts to an unconditional acceptance of the work, cf. CC art. 7:758(1) sent. 1, which implies exemption of liability for any defects the client should have discovered at delivery, cf. CC art. 7:758(3), AVA 1992 art. 8(1), and, yet only implicitly, AVA 1992 art. 12, are to the same extent.

11. According to the POLISH CC art. 643 the client is obliged to accept the return of the work, which the service provider releases in accordance with the contract. This means that the work has to be done according to the contract and offered at the place and time as indicated in the contract or by the default rules of CC arts. 454 and 455. If these conditions are not met, the client is not obliged to accept the work. Claims of the client may be based on the general rules on the non-performance or on the rules concerning warranty for defects in the sales contract. (Radwański [-Brzozowski], System Prawa Prywatnego VII[2], p. 358).

12. In SCOTTISH law the client would have to have had reasonable time for an opportunity to inspect the returned goods before the client would be deprived of the right to reject the processor's performance (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland para. 20.121).

13. Under SPANISH law the returning of the processed thing is governed by the general provisions on the delivery under the contracts with a dare obligation (liability for any damage which has occurred as a result of the delay, bad faith or negligence of the debtor: CC arts. 1094, 1101) and the rules on handing over the structure in the contract for work. Therefore, the delivery should be followed by an acceptance of the result of the work expressed by the client (art. 6 Building Regulation Act). The client may refuse the thing if it is not fit for use and the purpose of the contract expressed in the terms of the obligation has been frustrated; as the obligation has not been performed in accordance with the contract, the thing is useless to the client and there is no duty to accept it (6.3 LOE and CC art. 1124). Nevertheless, if the work has been performed correctly, the refusal of acceptance by the client produces mora creditoris. The acceptance of the delivered thing by the client relieves the processor from liability for obvious defects which could be noticed by an ordinary person (application by analogy of CC art. 1484; Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles; p. 700). The time of the delivery should be fixed by the parties in the contract. The LOE art. 6.4 provides for the contract for work that if the parties do not agree otherwise, the structure must be handed over for acceptance by the client within thirty days from the day the work is finished.

14. In consumer services in SWEDEN, the client is not obliged to inspect (Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p 110.) For commercial services, the client does have a duty to inspect the work when the thing is returned, cf. Sales Act art. 31, which is applied by analogy. Normally an obligation to notify exists only if the client actually detects a defect in the performance, not if it merely should have been detected. Failure to notify discovered defects leads to the loss of remedies.

IV.C.–4:106: Payment of the price

(1) The price is payable when the processor transfers the thing or the control of it to the client in accordance with IV.C.–4:105 (Return of the thing processed) or the client, without being entitled to do so, refuses to accept the return of the thing.

(2) However, where work remains to be done under the contract on the thing after such transfer or refusal the client may withhold such part of the price as is reasonable until the work is completed.

(3) If, under the contract, the thing or the control of it is not to be transferred to the client, the price is payable when the work has been completed and the processor has so informed the client.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The central question in this Article is when the client has to pay for the service rendered or to be rendered. The normal rule under the Article is that this is when the processor has performed the service and returns the thing to the client.

Illustration 1
An electrician has repaired a client's electrical appliance. Upon return of the appliance, the client is to pay the agreed price.

The client is not to frustrate the processor's right to payment by unjustifiably refusing the return of the thing. The client may, however, refuse the return of the thing if the service clearly has not been performed properly.

Illustration 2
When the electrician returns the appliance, electric wires are sticking out of it on all sides. Obviously, it has been repaired very sloppily. The client need not accept the return of the thing and therefore does not yet have to pay the price for the service rendered.

Illustration 3
A washing machine has been repaired by an engineer. When the engineer delivers the washing machine at the client's house and does a final test run, the washing machine does not function at all. The client may refuse the return of the washing machine and does not yet have to pay the price for the service.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Under Book III the normal rule is that when obligations can be performed simultaneously the parties are bound to perform simultaneously. (III.–2:104 (Order of performance)) In processing contracts, however, performance of the processor's obligation will normally take some time. This implies that normally the parties cannot perform simultaneously. The party who is required to perform first therefore runs the risk of performing without having any certainty about the other party's intention to perform the reciprocal obligations. A choice has to be made whether the uncertainty is to be placed on the processor or on the client.

In most countries the normal situation is that, unless the parties have agreed otherwise, the client is obliged to pay when the service is completed and the thing is returned; in practice, this means that the processor's obligation to return the thing is performed simultaneously with the client's obligation to pay. In a few countries the client is even allowed a reasonable period to examine the thing after its delivery before having to pay.

C. Preferred option

In processing contracts, usually the service is provided before the processor requests payment, although it is not uncommon that the order is reversed. In the present Article, the general trend is followed, stating – by way of a default rule – that the client is only obliged to pay when the service has been completed, either because the processor so notifies to the client or because the client requests the return of the thing. However, the client is to be prevented from frustrating the coming into being of his obligation to pay by failing to accept the return of the thing. Therefore, the present Article sets out that the processor is also entitled to the remuneration if the client unjustly refuses to accept the return of the thing, i.e. when the processor did not deliver a fundamental non-performance.

One consequence of the rule in paragraph (1) is that the price may have to be paid even when minor defects remain to be corrected. In such a situation the client is entitled under paragraph (2) to withhold a reasonable amount until the work is completed.

Paragraph (3) deals with the situation where there is to be no return of the thing, or control over it, to the client. This will be the case where the work, such as cleaning work on a building, is done on premises or on a site under the client's control at all times. In such a case the price is payable when the work is completed.

A processing contract may be a long-term contract. This is especially true for maintenance contracts. In such a contract, which may be concluded for a definite or an indefinite period of time, it is common for the parties to agree upon payments during the performance of the contractual obligations, for instance before or after a specific period has started or ended. A specific provision to this extent is not deemed necessary here, as parties will agree upon such payments when needed.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. Remuneration is normally due when the service is completed in FRANCE, GERMANY, THE NETHERLANDS and POLAND. In AUSTRIA, ENGLAND, SWEDEN and, in a consumer case, in FINLAND the client is even entitled to a reasonable period to examine the performance after delivery.

II. Time when payment is due

2. Unless the parties have agreed differently, the price is due when the service is completed and the client has had a chance to inspect the result of the work under AUSTRIAN law, cf. Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I^{2}, § 1170 no. 5; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II^{12}, p. 244.

3. Under ENGLISH law, where the processor contracts to work on the client's property and no time for payment has been fixed, the client must pay as soon as the processor has completed the work and given the client a reasonable opportunity of seeing that the work has been properly done, Hughes v. Lenny (1839) 5 M & W 183, 151 ER 79, as quoted in Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 22-053; see also Collins, The Law of Contract[3], p. 342. If the work is delivered in parts and no time for payment has been fixed, the processor may sometimes be entitled to claim payment for the parts of the work already completed, Roberts v. Havelock (1832) 3 B & Ad 404, 110 ER 145, as quoted in Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 22-053. However, in the interest of protection of the client (especially if a consumer), sometimes an 'entire obligation' is imposed upon the processor, i.e. an obligation which must be substantially performed before any payment falls due, cf. Bolton v. Mahadeva [1972] 1 WLR 1009.

4. The FINNISH Consumer Protection Act chap. 8 § 25 provides that if no time has been agreed for the payment of the service price, the processor is entitled to payment when the service is delivered, i.e. when the thing or the control thereover is returned to the consumer, and the consumer has had a reasonable period of time to examine the performance of the service.

5. Payment is normally due under FRENCH law when the service is completed, cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 32335.

6. Unless agreed otherwise, payment is due under GERMAN law when the item is returned to the client (CC § 641(1)), cf. Schlechtriem, Schuldrecht, Besonderer Teil[5], no. 367.

7. In THE NETHERLANDS, unless agreed otherwise, payment is due when the service is completed in accordance with the contract and the item is returned to the client. Cf. Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], no. 607.

8. In POLAND, if the parties did not agree otherwise, the remuneration is due at the moment of completion of the service (art. 642(1)). If the work is delivered in parts and the remuneration was calculated for each part separately, remuneration is due at the completion of each part of the performances (art. 642(2)).

9. In SCOTTISH law, although there appears to be no general rule about the time when payment is due, the processor may retain possession of the goods worked upon until paid for the contract work (the repairer's lien). The client must not have been disentitled from creating the lien. See McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, paras. 20.74-20.85.

10. In SPAIN the price should be paid when the thing is transferred to the client, if the parties do not agree otherwise (CC art. 1599). If the result does not conform totally to the contract and there are defects to be corrected, the client may demand repairs, but there is no specific provision in Spanish law that would entitle the client to withhold a part of the price until the work is completed. The only provisions on withholding performance are those for the sale contract in the CC arts. 1466 and 1467 (allowing the seller not to perform if the other party has not paid).

11. Under consumer service contracts in SWEDEN, unless agreed otherwise, the consumer must pay upon request after the processor has completed the service, Consumer Services Act § 41(1). If the consumer in due time has requested a receipt, payment is not due until the receipt is provided, Consumer Services Act § 41(2). The same principles will mainly be applicable to non-consumer service contracts, Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 102.

IV.C.–4:107: Risks

(1) This Article applies if the thing is destroyed or damaged due to an event which the processor could not have avoided or overcome and the processor cannot be held accountable for the destruction or damage.

(2) If, prior to the event mentioned in paragraph (1), the processor had indicated that the processor regarded the service as sufficiently completed and that the processor wished to return the thing or the control of it to the client:

(a) the processor is not required to perform again; and
(b)the client must pay the price.

The price is due when the processor returns the remains of the thing, if any, or the client indicates that the client does not want the remains. In the latter case, the processor may dispose of the remains at the client's expense. This provision does not apply if the client was entitled to refuse the return of the thing under paragraph (1) of IV.C.–4:105 (Return of the thing processed).

(3) If the parties had agreed that the processor would be paid for each period which has elapsed, the client is obliged to pay the price for each period which has elapsed before the event mentioned in paragraph (1) occurred.

(4) If, after the event mentioned in paragraph (1), performance of the obligations under the contract is still possible for the processor:

(a) the processor still has to perform or, as the case may be, perform again;
(b) the client is only obliged to pay for the processor's performance under (a); the processor's entitlement to a price under paragraph (3) is not affected by this provision;
(c) the client is obliged to compensate the processor for the costs the processor has to incur in order to acquire materials replacing the materials supplied by the client, unless the client on being so requested by the processor supplies these materials; and
(d) if need be, the time for performance is extended in accordance with paragraph (6) of IV.C.–2:109 (Unilateral variation of the service contract).

This paragraph is without prejudice to the client's right to terminate the contractual relationship under IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate).

(5) If, in the situation mentioned in paragraph (1), performance of the obligations under the contract is no longer possible for the processor:

(a) the client does not have to pay for the service rendered; the processor's entitlement to a price under paragraph (3) is not affected by this provision; and
(b) the processor is obliged to return to the client the thing and the materials supplied by the client or what remains of them, unless the client indicates that the client does not want the remains. In the latter case, the processor may dispose of the remains at the client's expense.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Sometimes the thing handed over to be worked on is damaged or destroyed without any fault or other cause attributable to either the client or the processor. In this case, the damage to or destruction of the thing is to be borne by the client. It is, however, unclear whether the client still has to pay for the service.

In this Article, a distinction is made between the situation where the processor had already informed the client that service was completed and the situation where that had not yet been done. In the former situation, the client bears the consequences of the unfortunate event, and must still pay the price for the service rendered, even though the benefits can no longer be enjoyed.

> A DVD player is being repaired. When the job is completed, the processor informs the client by phone. Before the DVD player is collected, the processor's workshop is struck by lightning; in the subsequent fire, the DVD player is damaged. The processor is not required to try to repair the DVD player again. The client, however, is required to pay the price for the service rendered.

In the latter situation, a further distinction is to be made, viz. whether performance of the service is still possible or not. If performance is still possible, the processor must still perform; if the service had already been completed but the client had not yet been so informed the processor has to perform again. The processor will be paid only for this performance. Extra costs resulting from performance after the unfortunate event must be compensated for by the client, and if the processor needs extra time to be able to perform the service, an extension of the time originally agreed upon for the performance is to be allowed.

> A DVD player is repaired by a processor. Before the processor has had time to inform the client, a fire breaks out. Because of water damage, the DVD player no longer works, but the processor can repair the machine. The processor is required to do so, and only receives payment for the second repair.

If performance is no longer possible, the processor is not entitled to payment, and must return the thing or what remains of it to the client if the client gives notice of a wish to receive the thing or what remains of it.

> Illustration 3
> The DVD player is damaged so severely by the fire that repair is no longer possible. In this case, the processor is to return the remains of the DVD player to the client if the client so wishes, but does not have the right to payment.

A specific situation exists in the case of a long-term processing contract. In such a contract, the parties will often have agreed upon payment per period. The client is still required to pay for the periods that have ended, even if future performance is no longer possible.

> Illustration 4
> A company renders daily cleaning services. When the building where the service is performed has collapsed as a result of an earthquake, further performance is no longer possible. The cleaning services that have been rendered before the building's collapse are still to be paid for by the client.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Nowadays, the topic of risk is of only limited practical interest. The causes for non-performance will mostly be attributed to one or the other party. Residual risk will be limited.

Damage caused by natural disasters like landslides or flooding, for instance, will occur less frequently, because processors will have taken precautionary measures – failure to do so when such measures should have been taken implies non-performance by the processor – and public authorities will have taken preventive measures as well. Yet, where such damage does occur and no duty of care or other obligation on the processor was breached, the question needs to be answered who should bear the consequences of the unfortunate destruction or deterioration of either the thing that was worked on or the materials supplied by the client. In this respect, the question also arises whether the processor may still claim performance of the client's obligation to pay the price when the thing has been destroyed or damaged due to an accident for which the processor cannot be held liable.

C. Preferred option

If such an unfortunate event occurs before the processor has indicated to the client that the service has been completed and that the thing is ready to be returned to the client, the consequences of the occurrence of the unfortunate event are dealt with by III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment). If the non-performance is not excusable under that Article, the processor has to perform again if that is still possible. The processor is then considered not to have performed yet: so the rules on non-performance apply. If the non-performance is excusable, however, the client will not have the right to specific performance or damages, and termination of the contractual relationship may be the result. The client will also have to pay the price. According to subparagraph (4)(d) of the current Article, the time needed for performance will have to be extended, since the processor, due to the unfortunate event, can no longer perform in time. The idea is that the time for performance will be extended proportionally. The situation is different when performance has become impossible. Then, termination may be the optimal solution.

After completion of the service, the situation changes, provided that the processor has notified the client that the service has been completed and that the thing is ready to be returned to the client. In the case of external harm to the thing, the processor is still liable for non-performance of the processor's obligations; see paragraph (1). The processor is not liable, however, if the damage cannot be traced back to non-performance of one of the processor's obligations. In other words, in accordance with case law and legal doctrine throughout Europe, the risk of unfortunate destruction or deterioration of the thing or the material supplied by the client is on the client. The same applies if the client had notified the processor that the client wished the thing to be returned, but had not yet collected it. The reason for this is that the only reason why the processor still had the thing is that the client had not yet collected it. In both cases, it is deemed to be fair that the client bears the consequences of failure to collect the thing.

The subject of the present Article is the same as that of the articles on risk in the Chapters on construction and storage. However, unlike the situation under a construction contract, but as in the situation under a storage contract, the client is the owner of the thing and of the materials supplied by the client. So the situation where the risk is completely on the processor does not occur in processing contracts. Moreover, as to the transfer of the risk a slightly different moment is chosen: whereas the moment of the transfer of control is normally decisive in a construction contract, in the present Chapter the decisive moment is when the processor notifies the client that the processor regards the service as sufficiently completed and wishes to return the thing or the control of it to the client. The reason for this is that, as from that moment, it is up to the client as owner to prevent the accidental destruction or damage by simply performing the obligation to accept the return of the thing. The outcome is different only if the client was entitled to refuse the return of the thing under IV.C.–4:105 (Return of the thing processed) paragraph (1).

Paragraph (3) deals with the situation in which the parties have agreed upon payment per period that has elapsed. Such payments will normally be agreed upon in the case of processing contracts concluded for an indefinite period of time, e. g. maintenance contracts, but may also be agreed upon in other contracts that need a considerable period of time before completion. The paragraph provides that a price which has become due remains due, irrespective of whether performance is still possible (paragraph (4)) or not (paragraph (5)).

Paragraph (4) sets out than when performance is still possible, the processor is required to perform – or perform again. The processor is entitled to payment only for the new performance. However, the final sentence of the paragraph makes clear that if further performance has become of no use to the client, the client may terminate the contractual relationship. In that case, the consequences as to the price will be dealt with under IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate). Clearly, this provision does not apply if, prior to the unfortunate event, the processor had notified the client that the processor regarded the service as sufficiently completed and wished to return the thing to the client. As paragraph (2) states, in this particular case the processor does not have to perform again, but the client still must pay the price for the service rendered. Paragraph (5), finally, provides that if performance is not or no longer possible, the processor is not required to complete performance and the client does not have to pay the price for the service that did not lead to a positive outcome. Paragraphs (4) and (5) therefore impose the so-called Preisgefahr, i.e. who has to suffer the financial consequences in the case of an unfortunate event, on the processor. The processor, however, may – by demanding payment per period – burden the client with that risk.

It will be for the processor to prove the unfortunate nature of the event which has caused the destruction or deterioration of the thing or the materials supplied by the client in order to escape liability. The processor will further have to prove entitlement to the price or a part of it.

The parties may, of course, modify the rules in this Article.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. In processing contracts, following the general principle that the owner bears the risk of damage or destruction (res perit domino), the risk of accidental destruction or deterioration of the thing being processed is generally on the client, as the owner. The processor is normally only then liable if at fault; yet will have to prove the fortuitous nature of the destruction or deterioration of the thing, since the processor is often under an obligation of result or an obligation of means with a reversal of the burden of proof (AUSTRIA, CC § 1168a; FINLAND, ConsProtA chap. 8 § 12(4); FRANCE, art. 1789 CC; GERMANY, CC § 644(1); GREECE, CC art. 698; ITALY, CC art. 1673; The NETHERLANDS, Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], nos. 516-517 and CC (old) art. 7A:1642; POLAND, CC art. 641 para. 1; PORTUGAL, CC art. 1228 para. 1 and STJ 24 October 1995, BolMinJus, 450, 469; SWEDEN, Consumer Services Act art. 32 and 39 and Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 100). As to the consequences of the fortuitous deterioration or destruction of the thing for the client's main obligation, art. 7:757 para. 2 of the DUTCH CC explicitly provides that the client need not pay the price if and in so far as the thing was under the control of the processor.

II. General system of risk

2. Under the AUSTRIAN CC § 1168a, the risk of fortuitous destruction of the thing is on the client. Cf. Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], p. 250.

3. In FINLAND the risk of fortuitous destruction or deterioration of the thing rests on the client, as owner. However, under the Consumer Protection Act Chapter 8, s. 12 para. 4, the processor must prove that the service was performed with reasonable care and skill, i.e. must prove the absence of negligence.

4. In FRANCE, the principle res perit domino applies, which implies that the fortuitous destruction or deterioration of the thing burdens the client. The CC art. 1789 provides that the processor is liable only in case of fault but must prove the fortuitous nature of the event (reversal of the burden of proof), cf. Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[14], no. 781.

5. As the thing was provided by the client, the processor is not liable under GERMAN law for destruction or deterioration of the materials by fortuitous events. Cf. CC § 644(1). According to the Bundesgerichtshof, an event is only fortuitous if its impact cannot even with the utmost diligence be averted (BGH NJW 1997, 3018; BGH NJW 1998, 456).

6. The position is similar under the GREEK CC art. 698.

7. It follows from the ITALIAN CC art. 1673 that, since the client supplied the thing, the client will have to bear the risk; the same follows from the general principle in CC art. 1465: res perit domino. Cf. Cass., 1 February 1950, n. 271, CC, 1950, II, p. 37, with comment of D. Rubino, Il perimento fortuito dell´opera, prima dell´accettazione nel contratto d´opera.

8. Under the DUTCH CC (old) art. 7A:1642, it was stated explicitly that if the client is required to provide the thing, the processor is only liable for the destruction or deterioration of the thing in case of negligence; the rule was thought to be an application of the principle res perit domino, cf. Asser [-Kortmann], Bijzondere Overeenkomsten III[7], nos. 516-517. The new CC does not contain a provision to this extent any more, but there is no reason to assume that the law has changed in this respect. CC art. 7:757 only deals with the consequences as to the processor's right to payment; para. 2 provides that the client is not required to (also) pay the price if and in so far as the thing was under the control of the processor.

9. In POLAND the risk of accidental loss or damage to the material for the performance of the work lies on the person who supplied the material (CC art. 641(1)).

10. The general rule in PORTUGAL when an unexpected event or 'act of god' occurs is res suo domino perit (CC art. 1228(1); STJ 24 October 1995, BolMinJus, 450, 469).

11. The general rule in SCOTTISH law is res perit domino, but the processor may have the onus of proving that work was done before the risk materialised (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.50-9.51).

12. The SPANISH CC art. 1589 provides that the supplier of the service has to bear the consequences of a fortuitous event before the delivery of the thing if the work is damaged or destroyed and the processor provided the materials, except for the case when the client is in mora accipiendi (TS 3 May 1993, RAJ 1993/3400). Moreover, the processor not only is not entitled to claim the price, but also remains obliged to execute the work (Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos mercantiles; p. 689 and TS 15 June 1994, RAJ 1994/4925). However, if the work cannot be finished due to the lack of materials or any other specific circumstances, the obligation is extinguished because of the impossibility of performance and the client has to pay the value of the work that has not been destroyed and the value of the materials if they are useful for the client (CC art. 1595 II). The processor has a right to remuneration only in cases of mora accipiendi and bad quality of the materials provided by the client, if the processor has warned the client of that circumstance (Bercovitz, Comentarios al Código Civil, 1590 CC). Nevertheless, the rule on the risk in case of a fortuitous event is a dispositive rule and the parties may agree otherwise in the terms of the contract (Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos mercantiles; p.688). In case of a partial performance and when the obligation is divisible, the processor should be paid for the part of the work that remains and may be useful for the client (Alberto Bercovitz, Contratos mercantiles; p. 690). The parties may establish that the work is to be done by parts. In that case, the processor has a right to be paid proportionally every time a part of the work is delivered (CC art. 1592). Therefore, the processor is entitled to remuneration for the work done before the fortuitous event has happened.

13. SWEDISH law takes the view that there are two aspects of risk in this case. Firstly, there is the question what happens if the result of the service is lost, that is if the work already done has to be performed again, or if material provided in order to perform the service is destroyed. Accordingly, Consumer Services Act § 39 states that the consumer is not obliged to pay for work that the professional has performed or material supplied, if the work or material fortuitously deteriorates before delivery. Here, the risk is on the processor, until the service has been finished, Consumer Services Act §§ 12 and 39. If the service is on an object which has been handed over to the processor seller, or for another reason is in the processor's possession, the service is not regarded as finished until the object has come into the consumer's possession. For instance, if the seller is to provide a new roof to the consumer's house and during a storm the half-finished roof gets blown away, the consumer does not have to pay the costs for the extra work and extra material required, since the damage occurred while the risk was on the processor, Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 103. In contrast, if the consumer has supplied the material, the consumer must also bear the risk, see Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 103. Secondly, there is the question who is to bear the risk if the object on which the service is performed is damaged. As a general rule, since the thing is owned by the client, the client has to bear the risk, cf. Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 103. However, concerning existing goods belonging to the consumer which deteriorated while in the possession of the processor or otherwise under the control of the latter, it is presumed that the processor is liable, Consumer Services Act § 32. The professional can only escape liability by demonstrating that the damage was not caused by negligence.

IV.C.–4:108: Limitation of liability

In a contract between two businesses, a term restricting the processor's liability for non-performance to the value of the thing, had the service been performed correctly, is presumed to be fair for the purposes of II.–9:405 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between businesses) except to the extent that it restricts liability for damage caused intentionally or by way of grossly negligent behaviour on the part of the processor or any person for whose actions the processor is responsible.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The present Article creates a relatively safe haven for a specific type of limitation clause in processing contracts. If in a contract between two businesses the processor's liability is limited to the value of the thing before the service is performed, that clause is presumed to be fair for the purposes of the rules on unfair contract terms (II.–9:405 (Meaning of unfair in contracts between businesses)). Only to the extent that the clause restricts liability for damage caused intentionally or by grossly negligent behaviour – i.e. such reckless behaviour that it is tantamount to intentional infliction of damage – does the presumption not hold true.

> A mechanic repairs the tyre of a car, owned by a lease company. The mechanic forgets to bolt the wheel on the car properly. As a result, the wheel comes off at a bend and the car hits a tree. The driver is not hurt, but the car is a complete write-off. Furthermore, the lease company is held liable by the municipality which owns the tree. The lease company claims damages, but is confronted with a standard term limiting damages to the amount of the value of the car at the time the car was repaired.

Under the present Article, as both the garage owner and the lease company act in the course of their business, the limitation clause is presumed to be fair. Had the client been a private individual, or had the garage owner acted intentionally or had the damage been caused by way of grossly negligent behaviour of the mechanic, the presumption would not have applied, and the limitation clause would have to be tested against II.–9:405 (Meaning of unfair in contracts between businesses).

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The main question is whether this Chapter should contain a specification of the general provisions on unfair contract terms, indicating that certain clauses are deemed or presumed to be fair in a processing contract. A further question would be whether such a clause should also be upheld in a relation to damage caused intentionally or by grossly negligent conduct. It could be argued that such specification would be helpful. On the other hand, it could be said that it would take away the flexibility of the general rules. Moreover, one could argue that a rule for processing contracts is more acceptable in commercial contracts than in consumer cases.

C. Preferred option

The legal systems at present are divided as to the acceptability of limitation clauses. In this Chapter, an intermediate solution is found by the introduction of so-called safe havens for commercial processing contracts. In such contracts, a clause restricting the processor's liability for non-performance to the value of the thing had the service been performed correctly, is presumed to be fair. The presumption, however, does not apply in relation to damage caused intentionally or by grossly negligent conduct. In this respect, it is remarked that even though it can be argued that a clause excluding or limiting liability may sometimes be fair and needed, it cannot be argued convincingly that a clause limiting or excluding liability even in those cases should always or even normally be considered to be fair. Therefore, clauses excluding liability for damage caused intentionally or by way of grossly negligent conduct need to be excluded from the present Article.

The client may prove that, despite the presumption in this Article, in the particular case the clause cannot be considered fair. This will be difficult, as the Article aims at providing practice with hard and fast rules for one of the most important types of exclusion or limitation clauses in processing contracts. That goal cannot be achieved if proof of the opposite is easily accepted.

The presumption applies only in commercial cases. In consumer cases, the damage inflicted by non-performance on the part of the processor is normally fairly limited. Usually, both the extent of the damage and the risk of its occurrence are not so extreme that that this cannot be borne by the processor. There is, therefore, insufficient reason to introduce a safe haven for consumer cases. This does not mean that a clause limiting liability in a consumer case cannot be accepted; whether the clause is valid is to be determined in accordance with the general rules on unfair contract terms as they apply to consumer contracts.

The present Article is also related to III.–3:105 (Term excluding or restricting remedies). According to that provision it may be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to invoke a contractual exclusion or restriction of a remedy. In so far as a clause is valid under the present Article, its application may be blocked by III.–3:105 if, under the specific circumstances of the case, it would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to invoke it.

The present Article is similar to equivalent articles in the chapters on storage and design.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. Limitation of liability to the amount of the fee received by the processor is in principle allowed, subject to the general rules on unfair contract terms, in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND (cf. Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 ss. 2, 16 and 17), ITALY (CC art. 1469-bis) and THE NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:237 under f). The same holds true for GERMANY; however, such a clause, used in standard contract terms, is there considered invalid under general rules on unfair contract terms when the fee would not reach the amount of the damage by far (CC §§ 138, 307(2) no. 2); exclusion or limitation of liability for hidden defects is not allowed in GERMANY (CC § 639) and The Netherlands (CC art. 7:762) if these defects were known to the processor and not disclosed to the client. In SWEDEN, such clauses are normally not considered unreasonable, as long as the client has access to other remedies. In ENGLAND, if damage occurs to the thing while it is in the hands of the processor, the processor may invoke an exemption or limitation clause only if the processor proves the circumstances in which the damage occurred, cf. Levison v. Patent Steam Carpet Cleaning Co. Ltd. [1978] QB 69. In FINLAND, a clause limiting the processor's liability is not allowed if the client is a consumer (ConsProtA chap. 8 § 2). Finally, in PORTUGAL, legal doctrine is divided as to the validity of limitation clauses (cf. Varela, Das Obrigações em geral II[6], p. 134). in FRANCE these clauses are in principle valid and general contract law applies.

II. Limitation of the processor's liability to the processor's fee or to a fixed amount

2. In ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law the general rules in the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 apply. See Levison v. Patent Steam Carpet Cleaning Co. Ltd. [1978] QB 69. A clause limiting damages to the value of the processed good was held to be unreasonable and therefore ineffective in a consumer case where the processing of a roll of film containing wedding photographs led to the loss of most of the photographs, cf. Woodman v Photo Trade Processing (1981) 131 NLJ 933. Under the Scottish part of UCTA 1977, the onus rests on the party wishing to rely on the clause to establish its fairness and reasonableness (s.24(4)).

3. Limitation of the processor's liability is not allowed under FINNISH law if the client is a consumer, cf. ConsProtA chap. 8 § 2.

4. A clause limiting damages to a maximum corresponding to the amount of fees the processor received under the contract, is in principle valid under FRENCH law. However, full compensation of the damage can be sought in case of intentional or grossly negligent non-performance (CC art. 1150). Moreover, regarding an essential obligation of the contract, such limitation of liability seems to be an invalid term, because it allows the professional to choose either to perform or not. This had in the past led to invalidation on the ground of lack of consideration (cause), Cass.com., 22 October 1996, D. 1997, 121 note Sériaux (Chronopost case).

5. In GERMANY limitation of the processor's liability in standard contracts to the fee for the work is prohibited if the fee would not reach the amount of the damage by far (CC §§ 138, 307(2) no. 2). CC § 639 adds that a limitation or exclusion of liability for hidden defects is not allowed if these defects were known to the processor and not disclosed to the client, nor if the processor had given a guarantee for the conformity of the work.

6. In GREECE the parties may exclude liability for negligence, though any agreement that limits or excludes liability for intention or gross negligence is null (CC art. 332). Thus, limitation is envisaged only with regard to the degree of fault and not with reference to the fees or otherwise. Nevertheless, freedom of contract prevails and the parties may limit the ceiling of liability accordingly.

7. Parties may, under ITALIAN law, modify the system of the legal guarantee for defects of the work; cf. Januzzi, L´appalto Rassegna di giurisprudenza commentata I, p. 362. However, parties cannot derogate from the principle established in CC art. 1229: any agreement which excludes or limits liability of the debtor in case of fraud or grave fault is null. Furthermore, under CC art. 1469-bis, clauses limiting or restricting the processor's liability or the consequences of the non-performance are presumed to be unfair.

8. In THE NETHERLANDS a limitation to the amount of the fee or a fixed amount is in principle allowed, with the usual limitations: no limitation for gross negligence by the processor or managing staff under DUTCH law (HR 20 February 1976, NedJur 1976, 486, Pseudovogelpest); presumption of unfairness if the client is a consumer and the limitation is included in standard contract terms, CC art. 6:237 sub f). CC art. 7:762 adds that a limitation or exclusion of liability for hidden defects is not allowed if these defects were known to the processor or to the person(s) in charge of the management of the actual performance if these defects were not disclosed to the client.

9. In principle limitation of liability is allowed in POLAND, with the exception of exclusion of a liability for damage caused intentionally (CC art. 473 para. 2). If the liability is limited to a fixed amount, one may consider if the parties did not agree on a contractual penalty (CC arts. 483 and 484). A limitation in a consumer contract is deemed to be unfair if it excludes or limits essentially liability of the service provider for non-performance or improper performance of the obligations under the contract (CC art. 385^3 para. 2).

10. Liability limitations are certainly void in PORTUGAL in case of dolus or gross negligence, according to CC art. 809. Doctrine is divided on the issue of limitation in case of negligence (limitation allowed: Pinto Monteiro; limitation void even in case of minor negligence: Varela, Das Obrigações em geral II^6, p. 134; l). The same goes in the case of standard contracts: Article 18 sub d) DL no. 446/85. Case law is divided. Limitation of liability is usually not upheld regardless of the degree of fault.

11. Nowadays in SWEDEN most standard agreements do not rule out the right to damages altogether, but limit the amount of damages in relation to the contract price. For example IML 2000 limits the liability to 50 per cent of the price, NL 01 and AB 04 respectively to 15 per cent, except for damage due to gross negligence. Normally such limitation clauses are not considered unreasonable, as long as the client has access to other remedies. Whether the limitation to a fixed amount is allowed, will depend upon the relationship between the amount compared to the contractual work as a whole.

12. In SPAIN the parties may establish clauses of limitation of liability. Nevertheless, liability derived from fraudulent conduct may not be limited, according to the CC art. 1102. Therefore any clause which purports to exempt the debtor form liability in case of a fraud is invalid, whether the parties are private persons or businesses. In the case of negligence, the CC art. 1103 does not provide explicitly for the invalidity of exemption clauses. Therefore, a contrario, they are valid (Serra Rodriguez, Las claúsulas abusivas en la contratación, p.105). Nevertheless, the Supreme Court assimilates gross negligence to fraud (TS 2 July 1875, Jur Civ 271) and states that clauses of limitation of liability can neither relieve the debtor from liability nor limit the debtor's liability for gross negligence or fraud (TS 2 July 1992, RJ 1992/6502). This opinion is followed also by the writers on commercial law (Garrigues, Curso de Derecho Mercantil II, p.233 and de la Cuesta Rute, Contratos Mercantiles II, p.445), as the invalidity of clauses exonerating the debtor from liability in case of a fraud or gross negligence in the commercial law may be inferred by analogy from the Ccom art. 620 and from art. 3.4 of the Ground Carriage Regulation (in a transport contract, there can be no limitation of liability in the case of a fraud).

CHAPTER 5: STORAGE

IV.C.–5:101: Scope

(1) This Chapter applies to contracts under which one party, the storer, undertakes to store a movable or incorporeal thing for another party, the client.

(2) This Chapter does not apply to the storage of:

(a) immovable structures;

(b) movable or incorporeal things during transportation; and

(c) money or securities (except in the circumstances mentioned in paragraph (7) of IV.C.–5:110 (Liability of the hotel-keeper)) or rights.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

A contract for storage is defined in Annex 1 as "a contract under which one party, the storer, undertakes to store a movable or incorporeal thing for another party, the client". This, in definition form, is the same in substance as the scope provision in paragraph (1) of the present Article. Three exclusions from the scope of the Chapter are listed in paragraph (2).

Storage takes place when a person (the client) places things elsewhere and leaves them in the care of somebody else (the storer) to be kept or stored, generally with a view to later use or disposal. Storage is characterised by the fact that the client hands over things to the storer, with the mutual intention of the parties to ultimately have the things returned to the client.

A client hands over 1,500 oranges to be stored at a warehouse.

This is the 'classical' example of storage. Of course it falls within the scope of this Chapter.

In a storage contract the storer only needs to make sure the thing can ultimately be returned to the client in the same condition as it was in when it was handed over to the storer, or in such a condition as the client could reasonably expect the thing to be in when returned. When the storer does not properly store the thing, the client runs the risk that the thing is damaged during storage.

This Article describes the scope of application of the Chapter. It mainly applies to the storage of movable things. However, as it is possible to store other things, such as information on a computer server, the scope of application of the Chapter is not limited to purely physical things, as is clarified by the reference to incorporeal things in paragraph (1). Where, apart from storage, another service is rendered, the provisions in Book II on mixed contracts (II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts)) ensure that the rules of the present Chapter apply to the part of the contract that involves storage, but these rules may be modified so as not to conflict with the rules governing the other service.

An Internet service provider (ISP) offers its clients access to the Internet, e-mail facilities and the possibility of storing files on its server.

The present Chapter applies to the storage of files on the ISP's server, but the rules of the present Chapter may be adapted to accommodate the fact that other services are offered too.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The main policy issue is whether a contract of storage can be concluded consensually or only by the actual handing over of the thing. The latter approach is in accordance with the Roman-law background of the storage contract and relates to the second main issue to be dealt with: traditionally, storage was a gratuitous contract. As the storer was not to receive any benefit from the contract, a strict rule on constitution was justified. Before the storer came under a legal obligation, there had to be not only a promise to care for the thing but also actual acceptance of it being handed over. However, such a formal way of concluding storage contracts is somewhat problematic in a commercial setting, where the client has an interest in being able to demand that the thing be taken into the storer's custody. As a consequence, it seems better to accept a more flexible way of concluding storage contracts, at least if the traditional concept of storage as a gratuitous contract is abandoned.

Another traditionally important issue to be decided is whether this Chapter should apply to gratuitous storage, to storage for a price or to both and whether, if the latter option is chosen, specific rules are needed to accommodate the fact that both gratuitous and remunerated contracts are governed by the storage rules, e. g. more stringent rules if the contract is for a price, or more lenient rules if the contract is to be performed by the storer for nothing.

A third issue is whether the rules on storage should apply to all things or only to some. For the storage of particular types of things, notably money, securities and rights, legislatures have developed specific rules. Should the present Chapter govern the storage of these types of things or should the existing specific rules be upheld? Similarly, international treaties deal with things being stored in the course of the performance of a transportation contract. Does this mean that storage in combination with transportation should be left outside the scope of the present Chapter? Finally, there is the question whether so-called surveillance contracts – in which immovable property is guarded or otherwise taken into the care of a professional service provider – should be governed by these rules or, alternatively, be subject only to Chapter 1 (General Provisions).

A difficult question is whether the Chapter should apply to contracts by which a client parks a car in a privately owned car park. Is the client storing the car or simply renting a space?

Another question is whether the Chapter should apply to contracts by which a client hands over things to be stored in a safety deposit box. An argument against qualification as a storage contract would be that the service provider does not know what is being taken into custody. Therefore, the service provider cannot take specific precautionary measures to prevent damage to the thing. General precautionary measures, such as to prevent theft and fire, can be taken. The service provider can guarantee that the safety deposit box will be returned in the state in which it was received it and that nobody has opened it in the meantime. However, that does not necessarily qualify the contract as a storage contract: a landlord, or lessor may also be under an obligation to take such measures.

C. Preferred option

The requirement of the actual handing over of the thing is no longer needed and is not in line with the developments in the newer civil codes nor with the needs of commercial practice. The present Chapter therefore accepts consensus as the method of conclusion of the contract.

As is the general approach to gratuitous services, this Chapter applies not only to commercial and remunerated contracts, but also – albeit with appropriate modifications – to gratuitous storage contracts. In practice, this means that the gratuitous nature of the service may be taken into account when determining whether or not the storer is liable, as the fact that storage is provided free of charge may influence the extent of care that may be expected from the storer, and the reasonable expectations of the client as to the condition in which the thing will be returned.

> The owner of a yacht has it stored during winter. In spring, he finds out that the yacht is stolen. If the service is performed gratuitously, the storer's obligation to exercise due care does not include the obligation to have the place of storage guarded, whereas such an obligation may exist if storage was not gratuitous.

Storage during actual transportation is usually provided for in treaties and special laws on transportation contracts. Specific legislation also exists for the storage of money, securities and rights. Such storage is excluded from the scope of application of the present Chapter in order to prevent interference with these treaties and specific legislation, which are adapted to the needs of these atypical kinds of storage. However, an exception is made if money or securities are handed over for storage in a hotel safe.

This Chapter also does not apply to the storage of immovable things as this type of storage is of a different nature, e. g. the thing is not stored at the storer's place of business, but remains on site. As the rules in this Chapter are not aimed at taking the specificities of such contracts into account and storage of immovable property is not recognized in Belgium, Germany, Poland and Spain, the scope of this Chapter does not cover the 'storage' of immovable property. The rules on service contracts in general will apply to such contracts. Of course, the exclusion of the applicability of the present Chapter to such contracts does not stand in the way of analogous application.

As to the applicability of the present Chapter to the 'storage' of cars parked in a car park, a dividing line may be drawn where the car park is, in some manner, guarded. When such is the case, the contract is to be considered a storage contract, as the operator of the car park is in a position to prevent damage to the car and to take precautionary measures.

> Illustration 4
> A client parks his car in a multi-storey car park, which is secured at both the exit and the entrance with a barrier; the exit barrier only opens when the client produces the ticket he received at the entrance and has paid the price for the use of the car park. The contract concluded by the parties is a storage contract.

Illustration 5
A client parks his car in a privately owned car park. The price for the use of the car park is to be paid when entering the car park. As is clear before the client enters the car park, there is no check whatsoever whether the person leaving with a car is the same as the person who entered with the car. The contract concluded by the parties is not a storage contract.

The present Chapter applies when a client hands over things to be stored in a safety deposit box. It does not matter that the storer cannot take specific precautionary measures to prevent damage to the thing as its nature is not known: general precautionary measures, for instance to prevent theft and fire can be taken. Moreover, in the case of the storage of sealed things, the storer does not know what the container stored contains either; nevertheless, such a contract is generally seen as a contract for storage. That being the case, there is no convincing reason why the contract to make use of a safety deposit box should not be considered storage. The fact that the storer does not know what is being kept of course influences what the client may expect under the contract and, therefore, influences the extent of the storer's obligations under this Chapter.

A client has a sixteenth-century painting stored in a large safety deposit box. As the storer does not know that he is storing such a painting, he cannot be required to use specific installations rendering a stable temperature and humidity level. However, the storer can be expected to prevent theft from the safe by, e. g., providing a closed-camera circuit.

The Chapter contains special rules for hotel-keepers, to acknowledge the fact that the 1962 Convention on the Liability of Hotel-Keepers concerning the Property of their Guests and national legislatures implementing the Convention regulate the matter specifically.

The Chapter may apply even where the storage contract constitutes only a minor part of the whole relationship between the parties.

A client hands over his coat at the guarded cloakroom of a theatre.

If the safekeeping of the coat is seen as a separate contract the rules of this Chapter apply. Even if the theatre's obligation as to the storage of the coat could be seen as a mere additional obligation under the contract entitling the client to attend a play at the theatre, the rules of this Chapter apply to some extent to the storage of the coat. See below on mixed contracts.

The Chapter applies to the storage of animals, but it is clear that such contracts will usually entail more obligations for the storer than is normally the case in a storage contract. Some such contracts may be a mixture of storage and maintenance or processing.

Storage for commercial purposes is often combined with other activities, for instance stock administration, combining things into parcels destined to go to one client, packaging things and the like. And the performance of another service, e. g. processing, may involve storage. The question arises whether the rules on storage should also apply when these other services are the primary object of the contract, i.e. when storage of the thing may be seen as merely a prerequisite to the fulfilment of the main obligation under the contract (for instance, an obligation to process or transport the thing). The preferred option in many countries (Austria, Belgium, England, France, Germany, the Netherlands and Spain, and probably also in Italy and Portugal) is to apply the storage rules to the storage part of the contract with appropriate modifications. This is also the solution adopted under the rules on mixed contracts in II.–1:107. However, in any case where the storage element is manifestly only an incidental element of a contract which is primarily of another kind, the storage rules will apply only so far as necessary to regulate the storage element and only so far as they do not conflict with the rules applicable to the dominant part of the contract. Mandatory rules applicable to the dominant part will apply. See II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts) paragraph (2).

Illustration 8
A computer repairer is to repair the software on a computer and needs to save the computer files on the hard disk temporarily on a durable medium.

This Chapter applies with appropriate modifications to the storage of the computer files. This implies that the durable medium used must be fit to return the files in the same condition as they were in when they were moved from the computer.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. The storage contract is known in all legal systems. In most of them, the contract is regulated in the Civil and Commercial Codes; in ENGLAND, storage is, like many other services, covered by the rules on bailment. In SCOTLAND the common law of deposit, based on the Roman depositum, applies, but has developed with assistance from rules on locatio conductiae and locatio operis faciendi to meet modern commercial conditions.

2. In ROMAN law, the storage contract was a so-called real contract, meaning that the contract was concluded not by mere consensus between the parties, but by the actual handing over of the thing that was to be stored. In the codifications of the 19th and early 20th century, this remained the case. At present, the storage contract is still a real contract in AUSTRIA (CC art. 957, first sentence), BELGIUM (CC art. 1919), FRANCE (CC art. 1919), GERMANY (CC § 688), Italy (CC art. 1766), POLAND (CC art. 835 and 853) and PORTUGAL (CC art. 1185), albeit that the handing over may be fictitious in a case where the item already is in the hands of the storehouse. Somewhat unclear is the situation in SPAIN, where CC art. 1758 requires handing over of the thing for the conclusion of the contract, but the Spanish Tribunal Supremo, already on 29 December 1928, accepted that the handing over of the thing could be symbolic as well (tradition ficta). In a ruling from 16 April 1941, the TS appears to have moved back to its more traditional case law. Yet, some of these legal systems do recognise the possibility of a binding precontract, at least obliging the storehouse to accept the thing for storage when the client offers the thing to the storehouse for that purpose. The situation is the same in ENGLAND, where bailment requires possession of the thing, but a contract of custody for reward may be concluded. The concept and terminology of real contracts is largely obsolete in SCOTLAND, despite its Roman law roots: see, in the context of loan, Graham-Stewart v Feeney 1995 GWD 35-2048. Cf. Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit'.

3. In some of the newer codes, the contract has become a consensual contract; cf. HUNGARY (CC art. 462), THE NETHERLANDS (CC Art. 7:600), POLAND (CC arts. 835 and 853). The same goes for SWITZERLAND (LOA art. 472). In the Civil Code of the RUSSIAN FEDERATION, a distinction is made between storage by a commercial or professional party, and storage by others. In the first case, the contract is consensual, otherwise the contract is concluded only when the thing is handed over to the storehouse; in both cases, often form requirements must be upheld, cf. CC arts. 886-887. Moreover, in the case of commercial storage, some of the older commercial codes also accept consensus in stead of actual handing over of the thing as the method of conclusion of the contract, cf. Ccom art. 467.

4. In the Civil Codes, storage traditionally was regulated as a gratuitous service, e. g. art. 1917 of the FRENCH and BELGIAN Civil Codes. In the AUSTRIAN CC of 1811, however, the possibility of a remunerated storage contract was explicitly recognised (§ 969), as was also done in the GERMAN CC of 1896 (§ 688). The law has further developed in the direction of a remunerated contract, as the POLISH CC (art. 853), the RUSSIAN CC (art. 896) and the DUTCH CC (art. 7:601) explicitly provide that a professional storehouse is entitled to remuneration. In commercial codes, such as the Austrian and GERMAN Ccom and the SPANISH Ccom, the storage contract is always for remuneration. In ENGLAND, bailment – which need not be contractual – can be gratuitous or for remuneration. In SCOTLAND deposit may be gratuitous or for remuneration, the distinction possibly affecting only the liability of the depositary (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.54-9.55). When for remuneration the contract is sometimes labelled 'custody' (locatio conductiae) rather than deposit (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit'., para. 3).

5. Storage of immovable goods is possible in AUSTRIA, but not in BELGIUM, GERMANY, POLAND and SPAIN. Storage of incorporeal goods and rights is not possible in Austria, Germany and Spain. Deposit is limited to corporeal moveables in SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit' paras. 4-7). Specific legislation exists for the storage of money and securities in Austria, Germany and Greece, but the rules on storage – with some modifications – do apply in France. In the case of car parking contracts, the rules on storage apply in Spain. In Austria, Belgium, France and Germany, where the car is parked in a guarded place, the contract is storage, otherwise it is considered to be rent. In ENGLAND, such a contract is qualified as bailment only when the client also hands over the keys of the car, thus giving possession to the storehouse. The contract to use a safety deposit box is again a rental contract in Austria, Germany, THE NETHERLANDS, but most likely qualifies as a storage contract in France. Finally, the rules on storage do not apply in the case of 'storage' of animals in France, but they do apply in Germany.

6. When the storehouse is obliged not only to take care of the thing but also to undertake measures of administration exceeding the normal obligation of care, in AUSTRIA a mixed contract is concluded to which both the rules of storage and mandate apply. In FRANCE, the rules on storage apply along with the rules on the contract for work. In THE NETHERLANDS and SPAIN, the type of other services to be provided determine which rules, besides those on storage, apply to the contract.

7. When storage is an additional obligation under another contract, the obligation to take care of the thing applies accordingly in AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, ENGLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY, THE NETHERLANDS, SCOTLAND and SPAIN and probably also in ITALY and PORTUGAL; liability usually follows the rules governing the main obligation under the contract. In France, in such a case exemption of liability is allowed if the storer clearly indicates that it will not look after the thing; e. g., the mere fact that a client hangs a coat on the coat rack of a restaurant does not lead to the conclusion of a contract of storage, especially not if the restaurateur informs the client that the coat will not be looked after, cf. Cass.civ. I, 1 March 1988, Bull.civ. I, no. 57.

II. Place in existing laws

8. Storage is regulated in the AUSTRIAN CC §§ 957-969. The Ccom deals with commercial warehousing (§§ 416-424).

9. The contract of storage is regulated in the BELGIAN CC arts. 1915-1963.

10. A storage contract may be qualified as a contract of bailment in ENGLISH law, cf. Miller/Harvey/Parry, Consumer and Trading Law, p. 179, albeit that bailment as such is not necessarily based on a contractual relationship, cf. Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-002; Charlesworth/Dobson/Schmitthoff, Charlesworth's Business Law[16], p. 545. A storage contract is subject to the general requirements of ss. 13-17 of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982.

11. Consumer storage contracts are not covered by Chapter 8 of the FINNISH Consumer Protection Act on Certain consumer service contracts, cf. ConsProtA chap. 8 § 1(2).

12. In FINNISH law there are old rules still in force in the Commercial Code (Handels Balken) from 1734, Chap. 12, s. 2, according to which "… goods held in charge should be kept as one's own". Modern regulations are found in the Consumer Protection Act, chaps. 6:23 and 8:32 and Act 1988/688 on Business Right to Sell Stored Goods.

13. The contract of storage is regulated by the FRENCH CC arts. 1915-1963. It is defined as the contract by which one party receives something belonging to the other party with the obligation to keep it safely and give it back.

14. The storage contract is regulated in the GERMAN CC §§ 688-700. There are special rules for commercial storage contracts, such as for the storage of goods (Ccom §§ 467-475h, applicable only if the storing and safekeeping is part of the operation of a commercial enterprise).

15. Storage is regulated in the GREEK CC arts. 822-833.

16. Storage is regulated in the ITALIAN CC arts. 1766-1797.

17. The storage contract is regulated in the DUTCH CC arts. 7:600-609.

18. The contract of safe-keeping is regulated in the POLISH CC arts. 835 ff. Art. 835 states that the keeper has an obligation to keep the thing in an undeteriorated condition. The (remunerated) contract of storage is regulated in arts. 853 ff; the storehouse is then always a professional.

19. The contract of storage is regulated in the PORTUGUESE CC and Ccom arts. 1185 ff.

20. Storage contracts are regulated by the common law (based on Roman law) in SCOTLAND.

21. The storage contract is regulated in SPANISH Ccom arts. 1758-1780. These rules apply when the provider of the service receives a thing which belongs to another person with the obligation to look after the thing and to return it, cf. Sierra, Comentario del Código Civil, p. 1028. When the storehouse is a professional party, the things that are to be stored are merchantable and the storage is undertaken as a commercial activity, Ccom arts. 303-310, apply, cf. Ccom art. 303.

22. Storage is generally an unregulated area in SWEDEN. However, the provisions in the Consumer Services Act will apply to consumer transactions, with the exception of the storage of living animals (cf. Consumer Services Act para. 1(3)).

III. Handing over required for conclusion of contract?

23. Storage is a so-called real contract in AUSTRIA, implying that handing over of the thing is required for conclusion of the storage contract, cf. CC art. 957, first sentence; Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I[2], § 957 no. 1; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], p. 183. Yet, the parties may conclude a binding precontract, cf. CC § 957, second sentence, and § 936; Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I[2], § 957 no. 1.

24. Similarly in BELGIUM the contract of storage is not concluded before the thing is handed over factually or fictitiously. Fictitious handing over of the thing suffices when the storehouse already has the thing under its control (CC art. 1919).

25. Handing over is required for the creation of the relationship of bailment under ENGLISH law, cf. Chitty on Contracts II[29], nos. 33-002 to 33-003. See e. g. Ashby v. Tolhurst [1937] 2 KB 242, no handing over of possession in a case where a car was parked in a car park and the keys were not handed over, therefore no bailment. However, a contract of custody for reward may already have been concluded, obliging the client to hand over the possession of the thing to the storehouse.

26. Traditionally, the contract of storage is considered to be a real contract in FRENCH law, i.e. handing over of the thing is necessary for the formation of the contract, cf. CC art. 1919. Handing over of the thing is not required if the thing is already in the possession of the storehouse, cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33105. However, the parties may conclude a binding precontract; such a precontract produces the same effects as the storage contract itself, cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33129. In practice, storage has therefore a consensual character, cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33136.

27. Handing over of the thing is not required for conclusion of the contract under GERMAN law; cf. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 688 nos. 1, 3.

28. Storage is a real contract in ITALIAN law, requiring handing over of the thing to the storehouse, cf. CC art. 1766. Sometimes, a fictitious delivery will suffice if the thing is already at the disposal of the storer, cf. Cass.civ.sez. III, 25 September 1998, no. 9596, Orland c. Fabbri, Giust.civ.Mass. 1998, 1943.

29. Under the old DUTCH CC, handing over of the thing was required for conclusion of the contract. Under the present CC, that is no longer necessary, cf. art. 7:600; de Klerk-Leenen and Wessels, Bijzondere overeenkomsten, note 3.1 to CC art. 7:600, with references.

30. The contract of safe keeping contract is a real contract in POLISH law, while the contract of storage is a consensual contract (Radwański [-Napierała], System Prawa Prywatnego VII[2], pp. 616 and 641).

31. Delivery of the thing is essential for the formation of the storage contract in PORTUGUESE law, i.e. the contract is a real contract, cf. CC art. 1185; Antunes Varela, Das Obrigações em geral II[6], 304.

32. Storage is traditionally a contract requiring delivery of possession of the thing deposited for its constitution in SCOTTISH law (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit' para. 8), but this is not emphasised in modern treatments of contract law such as McBryde or MacQueen & Thomson. The possession must be such as to give the depositary control of the thing deposited.

33. Both under the SPANISH CC art. 1758 and under Ccom art. 305, the storage contract is a 'real contract', which is concluded only when the thing is handed over to the storehouse. The handing over may be material or, if the storehouse is already in the possession of the thing, fictitious, cf. TS 29 December 1928, and TS 16 April 1941. Nevertheless, it is under debate whether the mere promise to store a thing already may amount to a storage contract. Cf. Serrera, El contracto de depósito mercantil, p. 22, with references. A precontract to conclude a storage contract is, however, binding upon the storehouse.

34. In HUNGARY (CC art. 462) and SWITZERLAND (LOA art. 472), the contract of storage is consensual.

IV. Application of rules to gratuitous services

35. A contract of storage can be either for a price or gratuitous in AUSTRIA, cf. CC § 969; Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^{2}, § 957 no. 1 and to CC § 969 no. 1; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II^{12}, p. 183. Commercial warehousing excludes gratuitous contracts. The fact that a storage contract is gratuitous does not affect the care required of the storehouse, cf. Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^{2}, § 964 no. 1.

36. Storage is traditionally a gratuitous contract in BELGIUM (CC art. 1917).

37. In ENGLAND the rules of bailment apply irrespective of the existence of a contract, in particular it can arise without the payment of consideration by the client. Yet, the obligations of the storehouse will in many cases not be as strict (i.e. the assessment of what is 'reasonable care' may be affected by the gratuitous nature of the contract):, cf. Chitty on Contracts II^{29}, nos. 33-002, 33-029 ff.

38. Originally storage was a gratuitous contract in FRANCE (cf. CC art. 1917). Therefore, normally the same rules apply to remunerated as to gratuitous storage contracts, albeit that in the case of a gratuitous contract, the amount of care required by the storehouse will be lower than in a storage contract where the storehouse receives a remuneration, cf. CC art. 1928 para. 2; Cass.civ. I, 12 December 1984, Bull.civ. I, no. 335; Huet, Contrats spéciaux^{2}, nos. 33109, 33145.

39. The GERMAN CC provisions apply to gratuitous services, cf. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 689 no. 1, albeit that for a gratuitous storage contract the storehouse is only liable if it has not acted with the care one would use for one's own goods, cf. CC § 690.

40. The rules on storage contracts in ITALY apply equally to gratuitous contracts, but the degree to which fault liability is evaluated in the case of a gratuitous service is less strict, cf. CC art. 1768 para. 2 and CC art. 1783.

41. In THE NETHERLANDS the rules on storage apply to remunerated and gratuitous services alike. Even though it is possible that the standard of care that may be expected of the non-professional storehouse is lower, the obligation to return the thing in its original state is not affected by the gratuitous nature of the contract. The one exception is where substorage is allowed – that is: if substorage was needed to protect the client's interests and for reasons that cannot be attributed to the storehouse. If, and only if, such is the case, the storehouse is not liable for the actions of the substorehouse, as it would be under CC art. 6:76, cf. CC art. 7:603, para. 2 and 3.

42. A contract for storage under the POLISH CC art. 853 ff is always remunerated; a contract for safe-keeping (CC arts. 835 ff) not necessarily.

43. In SCOTLAND storage contracts may be gratuitous or for remuneration (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, para. 9.54-9.55). When for remuneration the contract is sometimes labelled 'custody' (locatio conductiae) rather than deposit (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit'., para. 3).

44. In SPAIN the storage contract is gratuitous unless otherwise agreed, cf. CC art. 1760.

V. Application or exclusion of storage rules in specific cases

45. Storage may relate to movable or immovable goods in AUSTRIA (CC § 960); Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], p. 183. Incorporeal goods and rights cannot be the object of a storage contract, unless they are incorporated in physical objects (e. g. securities). However, storage of securities is covered by a specific law (Depotgesetz). Cf. Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I[2], § 957 no. 5, to CC § 961 no. 1; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], p. 185. When a car is parked for a price in a guarded parking place, a storage contract is concluded, cf. OGH, SZ 43/84; when the parking place is not guarded, the relationship is a rental contract, cf. OGH, EvBl 1976/21; Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I[2], § 957 no. 3. The contract to use a safety deposit box is again a rental contract, cf. OGH, SZ 50/25.

46. Storage is only possible for movables in BELGIUM (CC art. 1918). Where a parked car is guarded or placed in a secured place (e. g. a parking garage), a storage contract is concluded, otherwise the rules on rent apply, cf. Herbots, Bijzondere overeenkomsten, p. 270. Decisive is whether the parking place is under the surveillance of a professional operator and whether the owner of the car may expect the car to be under surveillance.

47. In ENGLAND, unless the client not only parks the car but also hands over the keys, the contract is not a storage contract but a contract of license under which the owner of the car park is not under an obligation to look after the car. Cf. Ashby v. Tolhurst [1937] 2 KB 242.

48. The contract to park a car in a guarded parking place is generally considered to be a storage contract under FRENCH law, cf. Cass.civ. I, 2 November 1966, D. 1967.319, note Pélissier, RTD civ 1967.411, obs. G. Cornu. Where the operator of the car park is not required to look after the car, a contract of rent is concluded, cf. Cass.civ. III, 26 October 1977, Bull.civ. III, no. 362. The 'storage' of something in a safety-deposit box was traditionally considered to be a contract of rent, but nowadays is often seen as a proper storage contract, cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33116. 'Storage' of an animal is covered by the rules on storage, cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33117. 'Storage' of immovable goods is covered by the rules on the contract for work (louage d´ouvrage or contrat d´entreprise); cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 33117, 33126-33127. 'Storage' of money is in principle covered, albeit with modifications, cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 33502-33507. Case law is used to apply the provision of the CC on deposit to regulate several aspects of the bank-account contract.

49. In GERMANY storage is only possible for movable goods (including animals), cf. BGH BGHZ 34, 349, but not for rights or immovable goods, cf. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 688 no. 2. The rules on storage apply to car park contracts when a car is parked on a guarded parking place, cf. BGH BGHZ 63, 333. The 'storage' of something in a locker is considered to be a contract of rent as the supplier of the locker does not have access to the interior of the locker and therefore cannot care for the thing (RG, RGZ 141, 99). Storage of securities is regulated in specific legislation.

50. Specific legislation exists in GREECE for general warehouse services (Law 3077/1954), and for the 'storage' of money.

51. Storage of goods in a rented safety-storage box is covered by the rules on rental contracts under DUTCH law, cf. Geschillencommissie Bankzaken 6 August 2001, TvA 2002, p. 115. Storage of immovable goods is possible, cf. Wessels, WPNR 1990, no. 5982, p. 749-750; Rutgers, Bewaarneming.

52. The rules on safe-keeping contracts only apply to movable goods under the POLISH CC art. 835. According to the prevailing opinion in legal literature, the same holds true for the contract of storage, cf. Bieniek, Komentarz, p. 453.

53. Specific rules exist for the storage of agriculture and industrial products under PORTUGUESE law (Statutes Decreto no. 206 of 7 November 1913 and Decreto no. 783 of 21 August 1914).

54. The SCOTTISH rules on storage do not apply to incorporeals and intangibles (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit' para. 4), but a depositary is normally depositary of the thing deposited and its contents, even if the container is sealed (ibid, para. 6). Fungibles such as money may be deposited where the depositary is obliged to return them in forma specifica, for example as the contents of a box or a purse (ibid, para. 7). The case of car parking may depend on the degree of control over the vehicle given to the store-keeper (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, , paras. 9.57, 9.59). There are special rules imposing a slightly higher degree of liability for innkeepers and livery stable keepers, based on the Praetorian Edict nautae, caupones, stabularii (D.4.9.1), making such parties liable for loss of clients' property by theft or the wrongful act of third parties unless it can be proved to have resulted from the owner's negligence. Livery stable keepers do not include keepers of motor garages (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland, paras. 15.07-15.08). Hotel proprietors are innkeepers but their position is mainly regulated by the Hotel Proprietors Act 1956, for which see notes to IV.C.-5:110.

55. The SPANISH CC art. 1761 provides that only movable things can be the object of a storage contract. The rules therefore do not apply to 'storage' of immovable goods or of incorporeal goods, cf. TS 16 April 1941. The rules on storage apply to the contract of parking, cf. Serrera, El contracto de depósito merchantil, pp. 34 ff.

56. In SWEDEN the provisions of the Consumer Services Act do not apply to immovable goods. Moreover, Consumer Services Act § 1(3) excludes the application of the law to the storage of living animals.

57. Storage is in Switzerland only possible for movable goods, cf. OR art. 472.

VI. Application to other duties to store

58. When the storehouse is not only obliged to take care of the thing but also to undertake measures of administration exceeding the normal obligation of care, a mixed contract is concluded; both the rules of storage and mandate apply, cf. AUSTRIAN CC § 960; Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^2, § 960 no. 2. Storage may also be an additional obligation under another contract. The obligation to take care of the thing then applies accordingly, Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^2, § 960 no. 3.

59. Storage, especially gratuitous storage, often takes place in addition to something else under BELGIAN law, e. g. in addition to a sale, cf. Cass. 2 May 1964, Pas., 1964, I, 932; or processing, cf. Rb Brussel 3 November 1964, JT 1965, 676.

60. The scope of the rules on bailment cover a wide range of services in which a thing is handed over into the possession of another under ENGLISH law. These rules govern storage contracts, but also processing contracts. As a consequence, the rules on bailment apply to situations where storage is but a subsidiary contractual obligation, cf. Andrews v. Home Flat Ltd. [1945] 2 All ER 698 (landlord providing storage space for tenant's goods); Charlesworth/Dobson/Schmitthoff, Charlesworth's Business Law^{16}, p. 545.

61. In FRANCE when services other than storage are provided, the rules on the contract for work (CC art. 1989 ff) are applied along with the rules on storage contracts, cf.

Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33117. When a service provider, in the course of a contract for work, assumes an obligation to guard a thing, the rules on storage contracts may be applied either directly or by way of analogy; cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 33117, 33120. Liability will then normally follow the rules of the main contractual obligations, cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33120.

62. If storage – necessarily including an obligation to look after the thing – is an additional obligation under another contract, in principle the rules governing that contract also govern the storage obligation; the rules on storage may be applied in addition to these rules, with the exception of the lower liability scheme of GERMAN CC § 690. In the case of – even gratuitous – storage in the cloakroom of a theatre – but not in a restaurant, cf. BGH NJW 1980, 1096 – or in a case where storage is necessary or compulsory (e. g. in a swimming pool), such an obligation does exist; in any case where storage tokens are given or a price for the storage is to be paid, the storage rules may apply, cf. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 688 no. 6. Limitation of liability is possible according CC § 276, but the storehouse must articulate it in clear easily readable words, cf. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 688 no. 7.

63. In ITALY the owner of a garage was considered liable for the theft of a car that was parked outside his garage in order to be repaired, cf. Tribunale Roma 20 February 1958, Gius. 1998, 2015.

64. When a contract is concluded in which the storage of goods is an important element, the DUTCH CC art. 6:215 requires the court to simultaneously apply the rules of the storage contract and those of the other specific contract, e. g. transportation. Only if the 'storage' of the thing is completely subordinate to the main obligations arising from the contract is qualification as a storage contract not possible, cf. Pitlo [-du Perron], VI[9], p. 292; de Klerk-Leenen and Wessels, Bijzondere overeenkomsten, note 5 to the Introduction to CC Title 7.9. Such is the case, Du Perron argues, if a car is brought to a garage in order to be repaired. He concludes, pp. 292-293, that in such a case the rules on storage may not be applied 'in their entirety'.

65. In POLAND the duty to keep something safe may constitute an integral part of other typical, nominate contracts. It exists when a party, performing an obligation arising from another contract (sale, leasing, carriage) holds a thing and is obliged to release it (Radwański [-Napierała], System Prawa Prywatnego VII[2], p. 620). The duty to keep something safe can also be established by accidentalia negotii of certain contracts, such as lease (CC art. 670), precontracted deliveries of agricultural produce (CC arts. 613 and 1615) or contracts of forwarding (CC art. 794 para. 1) (Grzybowski, RPEiS 1967 (1), 41). The Supreme Court in its judgment of 11.13.1957 1 CR 183/57, OSN 1959, poz. 43 stated that the rules on safe-keeping apply accordingly in a situation, when the creditor did not collect the thing timely. The rules on safe-keeping apply also to: a quasi contract between a court enforcement officer and a caretaker in the enforcement proceeding on movables (Code of the civil procedure, arts. 856-862), a safe-keeping of things found (CC arts. 184-185), a safe-keeping of a thing by a pledgee (CC art. 318) and in some other situations created by administrative decisions or court judgments (Radwański [-Napierała], System Prawa Prywatnego VII[2], pp. 621-623).

66. An ancillary obligation to store a thing or keep it safe may emerge from other contracts under PORTUGUESE law, e. g. contract for work, leasehold, transportation, etc., cf. CA Porto, 11 May 2000, www.dgsi.pt.

67. Mixed contracts are found in SCOTTISH law, e.g. if the store-keeper is also to carry out work on the thing deposited, the contract has elements of location operis faciendi (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit' para. 3).

68. Under SPANISH law the rules on storage may apply even to contracts of a mixed nature, to the part of the contract imposing the obligations to store. This is the case even when the obligation to store is not the main one. For example, to the contract of parking the rules on storage are applied, cf. Serrera, El contracto de depósito merchantil, pp. 34 ff.

IV.C.–5:102: Storage place and subcontractors

(1) The storer, in so far as the storer provides the storage place, must provide a place fit for storing the thing in such a manner that the thing can be returned in the condition the client may expect.

(2) The storer may not subcontract the performance of the service without the client's consent.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The fact that the storer takes control over the thing implies the main risk involved in the performance of the service on behalf of the client: the risk that the thing is damaged in storage. The rules in this Chapter aim at minimising that risk by imposing quality standards on the storer. This is especially important as regards the place of storage. The present Article deals specifically with the latter aspect. It states that when the storer provides the location for storage – which normally is the case – that location must be safe for storage of the thing. The Article indicates what may be expected of the storer in the process of the performance of the service. The Article is also in the storer's interests, as it provides guidance as to what is expected in order to prevent liability.

> Illustration 1
> A client wants to have cocoa beans stored. The storer must make sure that the location where the cocoa beans are stored is suitable for such storage taking account of such factors as the level of humidity and the temperature. If necessary, in order to perform the service correctly, the storer must see to it that the location is adjusted to enable safe storage.

The Article further states that the storer (or the storer's staff) must perform the contractual obligations without subcontracting; in other words, performance cannot be left to a third party, unless the client has agreed to such substorage.

> Illustration 2
> As the storer's warehouses are fully packed, the storer cannot properly store the cocoa beans he has agreed to store. The storer wants to have the storage done by a competing firm, whose services he commonly makes use of when he lacks storage capacity. Such substorage is allowed only if the client consents to it.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The main issue is whether this Article is necessary. It is logical to require the storer to provide a safe location for storage. On the other hand, as long as the storer is able to return the thing in the condition the client may reasonably expect it to be, there does not seem to be much reason to burden the storer with yet another obligation. It could therefore be argued that such an obligation should not be imposed upon the storer.

A different issue is whether substorage should be allowed in the case of a storage contract. For storage, there are three reasons why subcontracting without the client's consent perhaps should not be allowed. Traditionally, a storage contract is said to be based on a relation of trust between the parties, leading to the personal nature of such a contract. It should be noted that this argument has lost most of its importance over the years, as even in non-commercial storage a fiduciary relationship is only occasionally needed: whether patient records are stored by one storer or by another is of hardly any relevance as long as the patient's privacy and the confidentiality of the records are safeguarded. A more relevant objection to allowing substorage is that the client may have a need to know where the thing is actually stored, for instance to be able to get it back fast ('just-in-time-deliveries'). Finally, the client's insurance may not cover substorage. One could argue, however, that an exception should be made for 'emergency cases', as substorage then is in the client's best interests because the thing would otherwise be damaged or destroyed.

C. Comparative overview

Case law in England and the Netherlands explicitly states that the storer is required to provide a location which is fit for the proper storage of the thing. In other legal systems, an obligation to that extent is considered to be implied; failure to provide such a location will lead to damages for failure to return the thing in accordance with the client's reasonable expectations as to its condition.

In most legal systems, substorage is traditionally permitted only with the client's consent, as it is thought that the contract requires the client's trust in the person of the storer. Nevertheless, a minority view in these systems holds that personal considerations are no longer so important, especially not in the case of storage by a professional party; this view therefore denies that substorage without the client's consent should be prevented.

A problem may arise if, in the case of an emergency, the storer is required to have the thing temporarily stored elsewhere and there is no time to contact the client. In some countries, notably Spain and the Netherlands, substorage is allowed in such a case without the client's consent.

D. Preferred option

Given the importance of a location suited for the storage of the thing, an obligation to provide such a location is needed. The advantage of such an obligation is that the client, instead of having to wait for the return of the thing or having to demand adequate assurance of performance, may simply claim specific performance of the obligation on learning that the thing is not stored in a location suited for its storage.

Substorage without the client's consent should not be allowed. The traditional idea that a storage contract is of a personal nature is no longer a convincing argument. Nowadays, the main reasons for not allowing substorage by way of a default rule are the fact that the client's insurance may not cover substorage, and the practice of 'just-in-time deliveries', which require the client to be able to demand the immediate return of the thing. This practice applies especially to modern commercial storage contracts where stocks are often kept to a minimum in order to cut down on expenses. In such a case, the client may need to have direct access to what is in store to supplement stock at the place of business. To that extent, the client will need to know the exact location of the thing. This will already be difficult when the storer has more than one storage location. However, a default rule allowing substorage would compromise the client's legitimate interests too much. Therefore, under the present Article, subcontracting is not allowed for storage unless agreed otherwise. Such derogating contractual agreements will often be made if the storer uses outsourcing methods.

In the case of an emergency situation, substorage may be the only means to preserve the thing. The obligation to hand the thing over to a third party for storage then follows from the storer's obligation to take reasonable measures to prevent unnecessary deterioration, decay or depreciation of the thing. A specific provision stating that substorage is allowed in such a case is not needed.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. From the storehouse's obligation to take good care of the thing, it follows that the storehouse must store the thing in a location fit for that purpose. This has been explicitly decided in ENGLAND, cf. Searle v. Laverick (1873-74) LR 9 QB 122; Brabant & Co. v. King [1895] AC 632 and THE NETHERLANDS, cf. HR 28 November 1997, NedJur 1998, 168 (Smits/Royal Nederland), but holds true for all legal systems. Where the storehouse has not provided a proper place for storage, it will not be able to prove the absence of negligence on its part, as was made clear in FRANCE in a case of storage of a horse; in this particular case, the storehouse could not prove that the doors of the horse's box were sufficiently solid and was therefore held liable for the injuries to the horse, cf. Cass.civ. I, 2 October 1980, Bull.civ. I, no. 240.

2. Substorage needs the client's consent in most legal systems as it is generally perceived that personal considerations are involved in the client's choice of the storehouse, cf. AUSTRIA, Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^{2}, § 965 no. 2; ENGLAND, Edwards v. Newland & Co. [1950] 2 KB 534; Metaalhandel JA Magnus BV v. Ardfields Transport Ltd. [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep 197; GERMANY, cf. CC § 691, Ccom § 472(2), THE NETHERLANDS, CC art. 7:603; cf. also art. 895, first sentence, of the Civil Code of the RUSSIAN FEDERATION. A general exception to the need to ask for the client's consent seems to be accepted where substorage is urgently needed to preserve the thing, yet it is thought that as soon as it is possible to inform the client, the storehouse must do so. Yet, a different view is advocated as well, as it is argued that personal considerations in the case of storage by a professional party are no longer considered to be very important, cf. FRANCE, Huet, Contrats spéciaux^{2}, no. 33111; in England, this has been argued by Charlesworth/Dobson/Schmitthoff, Charlesworth's Business Law^{16}, p. 546. Where consent to the substorage is given by the client, the storehouse is liable only if the choice of the substorehouse was bad in Germany, cf. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 691 no. 1, as the substorehouse there is not seen as an auxiliary person for whose actions the storehouse is liable. By contrast, in The Netherlands (CC arts. 6:76 and 7:603 para. 3) and the Russian Federation (CC art. 895(3)), the storehouse is responsible for the actions of the substorehouse in the same way as for its own actions and of those of its staff, although in The Netherlands, the liability regime is somewhat more lenient when storage was gratuitous and the storehouse was more or less forced to hand over the thing for substorage for reasons that cannot be attributed to the storehouse (CC art. 7:603(3)).

II. Location

3. Storage in a location which is not proper for storage of the thing leads to liability under AUSTRIAN CC § 964 if the storehouse therewith breaches the obligation to take due care of the thing.

4. The storehouse must take reasonable care to see that the place where the things are kept is fit for the purpose of storage under ENGLISH law, cf. Searle v. Laverick (1873-74) LR 9 QB 122; Brabant & Co. v King [1895] AC 632. Moreover, the storehouse must prove that the things were properly protected from theft and that the storehouse has taken all reasonable precautions against theft, cf. Brook's Wharf & Bull Wharf Ltd. v. Goodman Bros [1937] 1 KB 534. Cf. Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-045.

5. If the location for storage was unsuitable for storage of the things, the storehouse will not be able to prove that the carelessness or negligence of the client was the cause of the defect, and will therefore be held liable for deterioration or destruction of the things under FRENCH law; cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 33143, 33147.

6. The storehouse is required to take care of the things under GERMAN law. To that extent, it must store the things in a suitable location, cf. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 688 no. 4.

7. The storehouse must provide a location which is fit for the proper storage of the things under DUTCH law, cf. HR 28 November 1997, NedJur 1998, 168 (Smits/Royal Nederland) (storage of cheese powder). To that extent, the storehouse's obligation of care implies that it must provide adequately functioning cooling rooms and that it will be liable to the client under art. 6:74, 75 and 77 if the cooling installation malfunctions, even if the malfunctioning of the machine is due to inadequate installation by a certified processor of such machines.

8. In POLAND there is no express regulation of this question. However, there are rules which indicate that the location must allow a correct performance of the contractual obligations. In the safe-keeping contract, the keeper must keep the thing in the manner determined in the contract and, if it is not agreed upon, in a manner which results from the nature of the thing kept and other circumstances (CC art. 837). The keeper is also authorised (and even obliged) to change the place and the manner of safe-keeping of the thing specified in the contract if that proves to be necessary for its protection against loss and deterioration (CC art. 838). In the storage contract, the storehouse is obliged to observe due diligence in preventing the loss or deterioration of, or damage to, the things accepted for the storage (CC art. 855(1)), which indicates that the storehouse should choose a location suitable for the performance of the service.

9. In SCOTTISH law the store keeper's duty of care is 'such diligence as the person entrusted uses, or men ordinarily do in their own affairs' (Stair, Institutions I[5], 13,2), and liability has been established when e.g. cars were left in unsuitable locations overnight (Miller v. Howden, 1968 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 82; Verrico v. Hughes & Son Ltd., 1980 SC 179).

10. There is no specific provision in SPANISH law regarding the location where the activity is to be executed. The storehouse must keep the things in a place which allows it to carry out its activity with due diligence (CC arts. 1094 and 1104), which is of a qualified nature if the storehouse is a professional. Bercovitz, Comentarios al Código Civil, 2033 explicitly indicates that the obligation to guard includes an obligation to watch, if not directly the things in storage, at least the place where the things are located. The storer must watch over the thing in such a way that it may be returned to the client in the same condition as when it was left by the client (Martín Santisteban, El depósito y la responsabilidad del depositario, 2002, p. 54).

III. Subcontracting

11. Under AUSTRIAN law, subcontracting is only allowed if the client consents to the subcontracting or, in the case of an emergency, if substorage is necessary to preserve the thing; consent may be given tacitly. Cf. Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I[2], § 965 no. 2.

12. Under ENGLISH law the storehouse normally does not have the authority to subcontract the storage of the things without the client's consent, since personal considerations are involved in the client's choice of the storehouse, cf. Edwards v. Newland & Co. [1950] 2 KB 534; Metaalhandel JA Magnus BV v. Ardfields Transport Ltd. [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep 197; a different view is also advocated, arguing that personal considerations in the case of commercial storage are no longer so important, cf. Charlesworth/Dobson/Schmitthoff, Charlesworth's Business Law[16], p. 546.

13. Traditionally, under FRENCH law, given the original benevolent character of the storage contract, a storage contract was often regarded as strictly personal, so that subcontracting was not allowed. Nowadays a different view is taken where a remuneration has been agreed upon and the storehouse is a professional party, cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33111.

14. Substorage is allowed under GERMAN law only with the client's consent, cf. CC § 691, Ccom § 472(2). In this case, the third party is a substitute storehouse and not an auxiliary person, i.e. the storehouse is only liable for a bad choice of third party. Cf. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 691 no. 1.

15. In THE NETHERLANDS, in principle, substorage is not allowed without the consent of the client,. An exception is made if substorage is needed to protect the client's interests and for reasons that cannot be attributed to the storehouse. If, and only if, such is the case, the storehouse is not liable for the actions of the substorehouse, as it would be under CC art. 6:76, cf. CC art. 7:603, para. 2 and 3. The storehouse is responsible for the actions of the substorehouse in the same way as for its own actions and of those of its staff (CC art. 6:76 and art. 7:603, para. 3). However, the latter paragraph contains a more lenient provision for those cases where the storage was gratuitous and the storehouse was more or less forced to hand over the thing for substorage for reasons that cannot be attributed to the storehouse.

16. In the case of the safe-keeping contract under POLISH law the keeper cannot deposit the thing for safe-keeping with another person unless forced by the circumstances to do so. Such circumstances include situations which make it impossible for the keeper to continue to keep the thing (sudden illness of the keeper, destruction of the location, change of the keeper's residence, etc) (Bieniek, III(2)[6], p. 382). In such a case the keeper is obliged to immediately notify the depositor where and with whom the thing has been deposited, and a the keeper who complies with this requirement is only liable for a lack of due diligence in choosing the substitute (CC art. 840 para. 1). The substitute is liable also to the depositor. If the keeper is liable for the acts of the substitute, their liability is joint and several (CC art. 840 para. 2).

17. There do not appear to be any SCOTTISH decisions on this question.

18. Under SPANISH law there is no specific provision for storage subcontracting, but since storage is a service contract, the general rules for mandate, applicable for all service contracts, may be applied as well. According to the CC art. 1721 , the representative may designate a substitute if the principal has not forbidden it explicitly.

IV.C.–5:103: Protection and use of the thing stored

(1) The storer must take reasonable precautions in order to prevent unnecessary deterioration, decay or depreciation of the thing stored.

(2) The storer may use the thing handed over for storage only if the client has agreed to such use.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The Article contains a specification of the standard of care required of the storer: the storer must take reasonable precautions to prevent unnecessary damage to the thing accepted for storage, whether such damage is caused by the storer or the storer's staff, by third parties or by other external causes.

Illustration 1
A museum has Egyptian artefacts stored. The storer is to protect the artefacts against humidity, wind and changes in temperature.

Unless agreed otherwise, the obligation to exercise due care and to take precautionary measures does not require the storer to examine the thing regularly during storage, e. g. in order to discover potential diseases if perishable things are stored. Such an examination may, however, be required if the storer received information to that effect.

Illustration 2
A storer is requested to store onions. If the storer has reason to expect the occurrence of diseases after the onions have been handed over for storage, he must, in so far as this is reasonable, examine them.

The second paragraph deals with the question whether the storer may make use of the thing stored. It states that such use is only allowed if the client has agreed to such use. In some cases, the thing stored will lose all or some of its value if it is not regularly used. In such a case, agreement may be implied; failure to use the thing would then even constitute a breach of the storer's obligation to prevent deterioration or depreciation of the thing.

Illustration 3
A racehorse is kept in a stable not belonging to the owner of the horse. Whether or not the parties have explicitly agreed to this, the stable owner is both allowed and required to ride the horse regularly in order to keep the horse fit. Unless the client agrees thereto, the storer is not entitled to enter it into horse races, as such is not needed to keep the horse in good condition.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The storer is usually in the best position to take protective measures to prevent damage to the thing while in storage. Damage must be prevented as much as possible, but there is a limit to what protective measures the storer can be expected to take: damage cannot under all circumstances be prevented, or only at very high costs. It would not be reasonable or economic to require the storer to take all possible precautionary measures.

Another issue is whether the storer may use the thing handed over for storage. Generally, the storer will not be allowed to do so without the client's consent, but this may be different when use of the thing is needed to prevent the thing from deteriorating. It could be argued that in such a case, consent to its use may be considered to be implied. On the other hand, one could also argue that if the client had agreed to such use, the client would have lent the thing to the 'storer'; if the client did not state such intention, the storer is only allowed to indeed take care of the thing, not to use it.

C. Comparative overview

In all legal systems, the storer's obligation of care requires the storer to undertake all reasonable measures to maintain the thing or prevent deterioration thereof. In Poland, this rule is mandatory even in a commercial contract; in Sweden, this is the case only if the client is a consumer. The storehouse is not liable if it could not have prevented the damage to the thing by exercising due care. In determining the extent of the care that may be expected, the price for storage is to be taken into account. In all legal systems reported, the burden of proof that the damage to the thing was not caused by a lack of care is on the storer.

Use of the thing by the storer without the client's consent is generally not permitted. However, in many legal systems an exception is made if use is actually needed to preserve the thing. In these systems, the use of the thing follows from the storer's obligation to take care of the thing.

D. Preferred option

The storer is to take proper care of the client's interests when storing the thing. This implies that any measure, in so far as can reasonably be expected from the storer, must be taken to prevent unnecessary deterioration or decay of the thing during the period of storage. The storer must avoid any damage to the thing that can be avoided relatively easily.

The present Article may be seen as a particularisation of IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care). That Article, which applies to all service contracts, must be taken into account in determining the obligations of a storer. Its provisions need not be repeated here.

An express provision that the storer may use the thing only if the client has agreed to such use is useful as it implies that, as a default rule, the use of the thing is generally not reconcilable with the nature of the contract. However, in a case where use of the thing is needed to prevent unnecessary deterioration or decay of the thing or of its value, consent may be considered to have been given tacitly. Moreover, in such a case, the storer will often be under an express or implied obligation to make use of the thing.

In the case of so-called irregular storage (irregular deposit) of generic things, the storer is not required to return the original things, but may sometimes be allowed to replace them with other things of the same quality and quantity. Where storage of such generic things is agreed upon, consent to the use of the thing may sometimes be implied. In fact, the contract may be then a mixed contract of storage and hire, loan or even sale. To such a contract, the rules on storage apply, with appropriate modifications, to the part of the contract that involves storage.

Similarly, if the client has impliedly or explicitly consented to the use of the thing – e. g. because use of the thing is needed for its preservation – the contract is probably of a mixed nature. This will often be a mixture of storage and loan, but may also be a mixture of storage and processing.

A racehorse is kept in a stable not belonging to the owner of the horse. The stable owner is both allowed and required to ride the horse regularly in order to keep the horse fit.

In this case, the contract concerns a mixture of storage as the main object of the contract and maintenance as a type of processing as an ancillary obligation under the contract. In this case, the maintenance of the horse consists in riding it. The mixed nature of the contract implies that, with appropriate modifications, the present Chapter applies to the part of the contract that involves storage and the Chapter on Processing applies, with appropriate modifications, to the part of the contract that involves maintenance; cf. II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts). As both the storer and the processor are under an obligation to take precautionary measures to prevent damage or injury to the horse this will most likely not lead to practical differences.

When a storage contract is performed for nothing or for a merely symbolic price, the gratuitous or almost gratuitous nature of the contract may influence what the client may expect of the storer.

Illustration 5
At the price of € 0.20, a client stores his motor scooter in a garage before he goes shopping. When the client comes back, the scooter is missing. As the service was performed almost gratuitously, the garage owner's obligation to exercise due care does not include the obligation to have the garage guarded, but he is to introduce a way of preventing theft, e. g. by issuing tickets that may serve as proof of storage.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. The obligation of a storehouse to exercise due care is widely known in legal systems throughout the European Union. That obligation requires the storehouse to take all measures provided by the contract to ensure the preservation of the things and, where the contract does not provide (all) terms, to take all measures that correspond to the customs of trade and the nature of the obligation, including the qualities of the stored goods, unless the necessity of taking these measures is excluded by the contract. The obligation is recognised either as an element of the obligation of (alleviated) result, as in FRANCE (cf. Cass.civ. I, 11 July 1984, Bull.civ. I, no. 230; Cass.civ. I, 28 May 1984, Bull.civ. I, no. 173), or as an independent main obligation, e. g. in AUSTRIA (cf. CC § 961), FINLAND (CC 1734, 12:2, Supreme Court Cases KKO 1951 II 71, 1961 II 94), ENGLAND, THE NETHERLANDS (cf. Article 7:602; HR 30 September 1994, NedJur 1995, 45, Diepop Bossche Vrieshuizen/Nouwens), POLAND (contract of safe-keeping CC arts. 385, 837–839, storage CC arts. 855 para. 2, 857, 859), SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit' para. 13; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, paras. 9.56-9.58), SPAIN (CC arts. 1094 and 1104), SWEDEN

(Consumer Services Act § 4), RUSSIAN FEDERATION (CC art. 891). This implies that the storehouse must take precautionary measures to enable safe storage of the things, such as providing adequate refrigerators, regulating the temperature in the cells, checking the persistence and intensity of refrigerating energy, etc. Cf. ITALY, Cass.civ.sez. III, 18 July 1996, no. 6489, Soc. De Lucia c. D´Addio, Contratti (I) 1997, 141 with note of Natale. Generally, a lower amount of care is required in the case of a gratuitous contract, cf. BELGIUM (CC art. 1927); GERMANY (CC § 690); GREECE (CC art. 823); Spain (CC art. 1094 and 1104).

2. The storehouse is not liable if it could not have prevented the damage to the things by exercising due care, cf. AUSTRIA (CC § 964). In determining the amount of care that may be expected, the price for storage is to be taken into account, cf. BELGIUM (KHz. Antwerp 15 September 1970, RW 1970-1971, 620). In all reported legal systems, the burden of proof that damage to the things is not caused by a lack of care is on the storehouse, cf. Austria (OGH, SZ 10/87; OGH, SZ 56/143 = EvBl. 1984/11); FRANCE (Cass.civ. I, 11 July 1984, Bull.civ. I, no. 230; Cass.civ. I, 28 May 1984, Bull.civ. I, no. 173); Houghland v. R.R. Low (Luxury Coaches) Ltd. [1962] 1 QB 694; Levison v. Patent Steam Carpet Cleaning Co. Ltd. [1978] QB 69; THE NETHERLANDS (T&C/Masterminds, to CC art. 7:605, note 5), SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit' para. 13; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, paras. 9.56-9.57).

3. Use of the things by the storehouse without the client's consent is not permitted in AUSTRIA (CC § 958); BELGIUM (CC art. 1930); FRANCE (CC art. 1930); THE NETHERLANDS (CC art. 7:603 para. 1); POLAND (CC art. 839); SPAIN (CC art. 1767). In Austria, it is added that if use is permitted, not a storage contract but a loan contract is concluded, whereas if consent is given later, the storage contract is by operation of the law changed into a loan contract, cf. Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^2, § 958 no. 1; § 959 no. 1. In Spain, the contract would then be qualified as exchange or commodious (CC art. 1768). In many legal systems, an exception is made if use is actually needed to preserve the thing; the example of the need to ride a horse is often given to illustrate this point; cf. ENGLAND Coldman v. Hill [1919] 1 KB 443; France cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux^2, no. 33107, 33154; The Netherlands (CC art. 7:603, para. 1); Poland (CC art. 839); abide RUSSIAN FEDERATION (CC art. 892); SCOTLAND (Central Motors (Glasgow) Ltd v Cessnock Garage & Motor Co, 1925 SC 796).

II. Protection of the things

4. The storehouse's obligation of care requires the storehouse to undertake all reasonable measures to maintain the things or prevent deterioration thereof under AUSTRIAN law. Cf. OGH, EvBl 1984/11; Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^2, § 957 no. 2; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II^{12}, p. 183. The amount of care that is required of the storehouse depends on the circumstances of the case, cf. Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^2, § 964 no. 2. The storehouse is not liable if it could not have prevented the damage to the things by exercising due care; it cannot be required to take such measures as would save the things but sacrifice its own interests, cf. CC art. 964. The burden of proof that the damage to the things is not caused by a lack of care is on the storehouse, cf. OGH, SZ 10/87; OGH, EvBl 1984/11; Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^2, § 965 no. 3. In a commercial case, Ccom § 388 explicitly allows for a right to sell the things in case of deterioration.

5. In BELGIUM the storehouse is required to care for the things as it would care for its own goods, cf. CC art. 1927, i.e. as a 'good housefather'; in case of a remunerated storage contract, a higher level of diligence is required, cf. CC art. 1928. The storehouse is required to take reasonable measures to prevent theft of the things, but the type of measures that can be expected also depend on the price for the storage, cf. Kh. Antwerp 15 September 1970, RW 1970-1971, 620.

6. In ENGLAND, in the case of storage services which are provided for reward, a storehouse acting in the course of a business is obliged, under both the common law (cf. Coggs v. Bernard (1703) 2 Ld Raym 909, 92 ER 107) and the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 (s. 13), to perform the service with reasonable skill and care (the storehouse also has a duty in tort to take reasonable care of a client's goods). The storehouse bears the burden of proving that there was no negligence, cf. Houghland v. R.R. Low (Luxury Coaches) Ltd. [1962] 1 QB 694; Levison v. Patent Steam Carpet Cleaning Co. Ltd. [1978] QB 69. To that extent, it must, among other things, prove it had taken reasonable precautionary measures to prevent unnecessary deterioration or destruction of the things, cf. Sutcliffe v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire [1996] RTR 86 and to protect the things against imminent danger, cf. Brabant & Co. v. King [1895] AC 632 at 641) and that it has a proper system for looking after the things and was not negligent in selecting employees, cf. Bullen v. Swan Electric Engraving Co. (1907) 23 TLR 258.

7. According to the old FINNISH rule on custodial liability in the Commercial Code Chap. 12, s. 2 "… goods held in charge should be kept as one's own". If the goods are damaged without negligence "there is no liability". The modern regulations found in the Consumer Protection Act and Sale of Goods Act are based on a reversed burden of proof. In order to avoid liability the custodian must show that any damage to the property has not been caused by the storer's negligence.

8. The care required from a storehouse under FRENCH law is that of a 'bon père de famille', CC art. 1927; yet it is up to the storehouse to prove it has lived up to that standard, cf. Cass.civ. I, 28 May 1984, Bull.civ. I, no. 173; Cass.civ. I, 11 July 1984, Bull.civ. I, no. 230. Therefore, in practice, a reversal of the burden of proof occurs: the storehouse will have to prove that the carelessness or negligence of the client is the cause of the defect; cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 33143, 33147. In a case of a fire due to unknown causes, the storehouse was held liable for not having taken sufficient precautions, cf. Cass. com., 10 February 1959, Bull. civ. III, no. 72.

9. The commercial storehouse is entitled under GERMAN law to carry out itself the work necessary for the preservation of the things. If, after the things have been received, their condition has changed in a way which is likely to lead to them being lost or damaged or causing damage to the warehouse keeper or if such a change is likely, the storehouse must without delay inform the client or, if a warrant has been issued, the last known legitimated holder of the warehouse warrant, and ask for instructions. If the storehouse cannot obtain instructions within a reasonable period, it must take such measures as seem to be appropriate. In particular, it may have the things sold, cf. CC § 471. In the case of a gratuitous storage contract the storehouse is only liable if it has not acted with the care one would use for one's own goods, cf. CC § 690.

10. With regard to the contract of storage, the GREEK CC art. 823 requires that a storehouse is bound to exercise the same care as it bestows on its own affairs, unless the storage is for remuneration, in which case the storehouse will be responsible for any fault (CC art. 330).

11. In the performance of the obligation to preserve the things in a good condition (and to give them back as they were handed over), the service provider may need to take precautionary measure under ITALIAN law. E. g. in the case of storage of food, it must provide refrigerators, regulating the temperature in the cells, checking the persistence and intensity of refrigerating energy, etc., cf. Cass.civ.sez. III, 18 July 1996, no. 6489, Soc. De Lucia c. D´Addio, Contratti (I), 141 with note of Natale. The storehouse is expected to actively prevent any decay or deterioration of the things even by acting beyond the conditions agreed upon, cf. Ccom art. 1770 para. 2.

12. In THE NETHERLANDS the storehouse's obligation to take due care of the things and to return them in the original condition includes an obligation to store them in a safe manner and, therefore, to take precautionary measures to prevent unnecessary deterioration or decay, cf. Paquay, RM Themis 1994, p. 493-494. Rutgers, Bewaarneming, no. 12; HR 30 September 1994, NedJur 1995, 45 (Diepop Bossche Vrieshuizen/Nouwens, in a case of storage of fruit by a professional storehouse). Therefore, a stored animal must be fed (T&C/Castermans, to CC art. 7:602, note 2) and looked after (Pitlo [-du Perron], VI[9], p. 295), a piano must be sheltered from humidity and dehydration (T&C/Castermans, to DUTCH CC art. 7:602, note 2), and, in case of frost, a car must be provided with antifreeze (Asser-Kleijn, no. 7). The obligation to exercise due care further implies an obligation for the storehouse to insure against theft, fire and – if customary – other unfortunate accidents, cf. Pitlo [-du Perron], VI[9], p. 295; de Klerk-Leenen and Wessels, Bijzondere overeenkomsten, to CC art. 7:602, note 3; Rb Dordrecht 19 April 1989, NedJur 1990, 178 (Error Free/Kasteel). However, as the subsequent obligation to return the thing in its original state (CC art. 7:605(4)) is considered to be an obligation of result, in practice, the burden of proof of the breach of the standard of care is reversed, cf. T&C/Castermans, to CC art. 7:605, note 5.

13. In the contract of safe-keeping under POLISH law the keeper is obliged to keep the thing in an undeteriorated condition (CC art. 835). So the thing must be kept in a manner determined in the terms regulating the obligation, or in a manner which results from the nature of the thing and from the circumstances (CC art. 837). If it is necessary for the protection of the thing against loss or deterioration the keeper is authorised or even obliged to sell the thing (CC art. 838). If it is necessary for preserving the thing in an undeteriorated condition, the keeper is allowed to use the thing without the consent of the depositor (CC art. 839). In the case of the storage contract, the storehouse is obliged to take appropriate conservation measures. This obligation is deemed to be so important that the parties cannot agree otherwise; cf. CC art. 855 para. 2. The storehouse is obliged to secure the things and the rights of the depositor, if the things are in a condition that suggests loss, deterioration or damage (CC art. 857), and if the things are perishable and it is not possible to wait for the instructions of the depositor, the storehouse is entitled or even obliged to sell the things (CC art. 859). Generally, the keeper in the case of the contract of safe-keeping is liable for not observing due diligence (CC art. 472), and may escape from liability by proving that the damage was due to circumstances for which he or she is not liable (CC art. 471). Liability of the keeper is modified in the case of depositing the thing with another person. If the keeper forced by the circumstances to do this and if the depositor is immediately informed with whom and where the thing has been deposited, then the keeper is liable only for lack of due diligence in choosing the substitute (CC art. 840 para. 1). The burden of proof concerning lack of fault in choosing the substitute lies with the keeper, otherwise liability is risk based "like for his own actions" (CC art. 474), and liability of the keeper and the substitute is solidary (CC art. 840 para. 2, sent. 2). If the keeper proves that there was no fault in choosing the substitute, the liability rests on the substitute (CC art. 840, para. 2 sent. 1). In the case of the storage contract, the storehouse is liable for the loss or deterioration of, or damage to, the things accepted for the storage, during the period between their acceptance and their return to the person entitled, unless the keeper proves that the damage could not have been prevented even by observing due diligence (CC art. 855 para. 1). The storehouse is not liable for decrease in value within the limits specified in the relevant provisions of law, and in the absence of such provisions, within the limits accepted customarily (CC art. 855 para. 3). The redress cannot exceed the ordinary value of the things, unless the damage results from the intentional guilt or gross negligence of the storehouse (CC art. 855 para. 4).

14. Under PORTUGUESE law the storehouse must adopt all methods necessary to conserve the stored thing, avoiding danger, loss and interference from third parties, using the diligence of an average man. Cf. Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geralII[6], p. 759. In doing so, the storehouse must avoid damage to other goods and third parties. If the storehouse knowingly accepts the storage of inflammable products or of an ill animal, the storehouse will be liable in tort towards third parties in case of explosion or contamination of other animals if it did not avoid those possibilities. Cf. Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral. II[6], p. 776.

15. In SCOTTISH law the store keeper is obliged to take reasonable care of the thing stored while it is in storage, the obligation being to show 'such diligence as the person entrusted uses, or men ordinarily do, in their own affairs' (Stair, Institutions I[5], 13,2). This may include a duty of reasonable inspection to check that the goods are not being damaged (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland, para. 15.10). The keeper is liable in damages if the thing is returned damaged or is lost unless the keeper can prove that the loss happened otherwise than through the keeper's fault (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit', para. 13; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland. paras. 9.56-9.58).

16. The main obligation for the storehouse under SPANISH law is to preserve the things in storage, by protecting them and using the care required by the nature of the things. To that extent, it must carry out the activities needed to ensure the preservation of the things, cf. Sierra, Comentario del Código Civil, pp. 1038-1039. It must act in conformity with the agreement reached and, in the absence of such term, with the diligence of a bonus paterfamilias, cf. CC arts. 1094 and 1104. In the case of a commercial storage contract, the storehouse is under a higher standard of care: Ccom art. 306, para. 2 has the effect that the storehouse is liable if the things in storage suffer damage due to the storehouse's intentional or negligent behaviour and to defects resulting from the nature of the things if, in the latter case, the storehouse did not do what was necessary to prevent or cure such damage and did not warn the client.

17. Under the SWEDISH Consumer Services Act § 4, the storehouse is required to perform the service in a professional manner. This obligation includes using an adequate method of storage. A term limiting or excluding the obligation is void, cf. Consumer Services Act § 9. Under that provision, even in the absence of negligence, the service is deemed to be non-conform if the non-conformity is the result of an accident or other similar event, cf. ARN 25 May 1992, 1991-5176 (damage to a stored sofa and armchairs by rats in a case where the storehouse had regularly had the things examined and the parties had agreed that it was up to the client to have the things insured). However, when a consumer left her wallet for three hours in the pocket of a jacket in a guarded cloakroom in a restaurant, the restaurant was not liable for the theft of the wallet if the jacket was still in the cloakroom, cf. ARN 9 October 1997, 1997-2289.

III. Use by storehouse

18. Use of the things by the storehouse is not permitted in AUSRIAN law (CC § 958). Where use is permitted, a loan contract is concluded, cf. Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB

I[2], § 958 no. 1. If during storage the client permits the storehouse to make use of the things, then as of that moment or, if the consent to make use of the things was not requested by the storehouse, as of the moment that the storehouse makes use of the thing, the contract is qualified by law as a loan contract, cf. CC § 959; Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I[2], § 959 no. 1 and Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], p. 183.

19. In BELGIAN law the storer may not use the things without the client's tacit or explicit consent, cf. CC art. 1930.

20. In ENGLAND, in the case of gratuitous storage the storehouse is not entitled to use the things for its own advantage without the consent of the client unless such use is necessary for their preservation, cf. Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-031; Coldman v Hill [1919] 1 KB. The same principle would seem to apply to storage contracts for consideration, cf. Charlesworth/Dobson/Schmitthoff, Charlesworth's Business Law[16], p. 549.

21. The storehouse is not allowed to use the stored goods under FRENCH law (CC art. 1930). This is different if the use is necessary to preserve the value or condition of the thing stored, e. g. riding a horse; cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 33107, 33154.

22. Normally, the storehouse is not allowed to use the things under GERMAN law, unless this is necessary for their preservation, cf. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 688 no. 4.

23. Under the DUTCH CC use of the things by the storehouse is permitted only if the client has agreed to such use or if use is needed to preserve or restore the things (CC art. 7:603, para. 1).

24. The keeper is not allowed under POLISH law to use the thing without the consent of the client, unless that it is necessary to preserve it in a non-deteriorated condition (CC art. 839). The storehouse is in principle not allowed to use the things.

25. In SCOTLAND, in general, the store-keeper acquires no rights of use over the thing deposited without the client's consent (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit' para. 17). Inappropriate use by the store-keeper leads to liability for damage or loss caused (Central Motors (Glasgow) Ltd v Cessnock Garage & Motor Co 1925 SC 796).

26. Under the SPANISH CC art. 1767, the storehouse is forbidden to use the things in storage without the client's consent. Art. 1768 adds that if the client does give consent, the contract is deemed to be a contract of loan or comodatus; consent must further be proved by the storehouse. Ccom art. 309 is to the same effect. However, it is different if the use of the thing is necessary for its adequate preservation. More generally, some authors argue that if use of the things is compatible with the obligation of care or if the consent to use the things is meant to reward the storehouse, then it is to be allowed, cf. Bercovitz, Comentarios al Código Civil, p. 2047.

IV.C.–5:104: Return of the thing stored

(1) Without prejudice to any other obligation to return the thing, the storer must return the thing at the agreed time or, where the contractual relationship is terminated before the agreed time, within a reasonable time after being so requested by the client.

(2) The client must accept the return of the thing when the storage obligation comes to an end and when acceptance of return is properly requested by the storer.

(3) Acceptance by the client of the return of the thing does not relieve the storer wholly or partially from liability for non-performance.

(4) If the client fails to accept the return of the thing at the time provided under paragraph (2), the storer has the right to sell the thing in accordance with III.–2:111 (Property not accepted), provided that the storer has given the client reasonable warning of the storer's intention to do so.

(5) If, during storage, the thing bears fruit, the storer must hand this fruit over when the thing is returned to the client.

(6) If, by virtue of the rules on the acquisition of ownership, the storer has become the owner of the thing, the storer must return a thing of the same kind and the same quality and quantity and transfer ownership of that thing. This Article applies with appropriate adaptations to the substituted thing.

(7) This Article applies with appropriate adaptations if a third party who has the right or authority to receive the thing requests its return.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

One of the main characteristics of a storage contract is that the thing ultimately is to be returned to the client by the storer, in principle unaffected by its storage. A storage contract basically states that both parties have, in normal situations, the right to enforce the return of the thing and that the mere fact that the client has accepted the return of the thing does not mean acceptance that the storage has been done in conformity with the contract. Therefore, by accepting the return of the thing the client does not lose the right to terminate the contractual relationship (leading to extinction of the obligation to pay the price) or to damages.

> Illustration 1
> Cocoa beans were stored in a warehouse. Upon the request of the client, the storer returns the cocoa beans. The fact that the cocoa beans were not stored properly and have become mouldy does not entitle the client to refuse their return. However, the client remains entitled to claim damages and to terminate the contract on the ground of fundamental non-performance.

The use of the word "return" in this Article does not imply that the storer has to take the thing to the client. The general rule is that a non-monetary obligation (such as the obligation to return the thing) has to be performed at the debtor's place of business. If the debtor has more than one place of business the relevant place is the place having the closest relationship to the obligation. (III.–2:101 (Place of performance)) So the place of return will normally be the place where the thing is stored. Of course, this will often be regulated by the terms of the contract.

If the client, because of the damage inflicted upon the thing by the storer refuses to accept the return of the thing, the client is in breach of the obligation to that effect. Paragraph (4) introduces a specific remedy for the storer: escaping from the obligation to continue storing the thing by selling the thing to a third party. Under deduction of the price for storage, the storer must pay the proceeds of the sale to the client. The storer may only do so after having warned the client of that sanction.

The client may request the return of the thing at any time, even if the contractual period for storage has not yet lapsed. If the client requests the return of the thing before the service has been performed, this may amount to termination of the contract under IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate), which means that the storer is still entitled to receive the contract price.

Carlos holds 10,000 DVD players in storage for Eric, the owner of a number of retail shops. Due to an unexpected increase in demand, the stocks in Eric's shops are sold out. Even though the parties agreed that Carlos would store the DVD players for a period of two months, Eric may claim the instantaneous return of the DVD players, but he must pay the price for storage of the DVD players for the entire contract period.

If, during storage, the thing has borne fruit, the storer must return the fruit together with the thing itself.

Illustration 3
A farm is struck by lightning. The farmer succeeds in saving his cows, one of which is pregnant at the time. As the cowshed was destroyed, the cows are kept at a neighbouring farm. After the cowshed has been rebuilt, the farmer claims back his cows and the calf that was born in the meantime.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The storer is required to store the thing in accordance with the contract, which entails costs for the storer; moreover, continued storage of the thing may prevent the storer from concluding or performing other storage contracts for lack of storage capacity. Moreover, the storer has an interest in being able to demand acceptance of the return of the thing by the client, as acceptance of the return of the thing or an unjustified refusal to accept return by the client has the effect that payment becomes due. Similarly, the client has an interest in having the thing returned whenever it is needed. The present Article deals with these interests, as well as with the consequences of the return of the thing: does acceptance of the return of the thing imply acceptance of any defects in the service or damage to the thing?

Another question is whether the client needs personally to demand the return of the thing (and go and collect it). In practice, it will often happen that the client has sold the thing to a third party and is no longer interested in its return. The third party does have an interest in the return of the thing, but does not have a contract with the storer. In some cases, the law of property may have resulted in ownership passing to the third party. Then the question arises whether the storer is entitled to withhold the thing until payment has been made for the storage. Moreover, the storer will need sufficient proof that the third party is indeed entitled to claim the return of the thing in order to prevent the client from claiming non-performance of the storer's obligation to return the thing.

A different problem may arise if the thing is commingled with other things of the same kind belonging to the storer or other clients of the storer and, therefore, can no longer be identified as belonging to a particular client. In such a case, the law of property may bring about the transfer of ownership of the thing. Unless the client has – explicitly or impliedly – consented to such a mode of storage, storing generic things in such a manner that the client loses ownership will not be in accordance with the contract. (See IV.C.–5:105 (Conformity)). However, it is not uncommon for the parties to agree either expressly or impliedly to such a mode of storage. For such cases, it must be asked what thing the storer needs to return to the client and how the ownership of that thing is transferred or retransferred.

C. Comparative overview

When no period was determined for the duration of the storage, the thing – together with any fruits it may have borne during storage – is to be returned when the client or the storer so demands. When a period for storage was fixed in the contract, the client may nevertheless demand earlier return in most legal systems, provided that the client compensates the storer for the earlier return of the thing. When the agreed period for storage has ended, the storer may demand acceptance of the return of the thing. In some legal systems, the client may be forced by court order to accept earlier return of the thing if the situation is such that the storer cannot be required to store the thing any longer as this has become impossible or immensely difficult.

When the client does not accept the return of the thing, in Austria the storer is entitled to have the thing stored by a third party at the cost of the client or to continue storage; in the latter case, the storer's liability is reduced and the client will be accountable for all the damage that results from the failure to accept the return of the thing. In Germany, non-acceptance of the thing by the client may occasionally amount to non-performance, but in any case leads to the applicability of the doctrine of mora creditoris. Under this doctrine, the client is not under a 'real' obligation to co-operate, but cannot invoke a non-performance on the part of the storer if, following the failure to co-operate, the thing is lost or deteriorates and the loss or deterioration cannot be attributed to the storer's conduct. In Spain, the storer may ask the court to order consignment of the thing with a third party. Alternatively, the storer may sell the thing in Austria, in England and Sweden. In France, Germany, the Netherlands and Spain, such a right does not exist; the storer may, of course, invoke other remedies, e. g. claim damages or demand specific performance of the obligation to accept the return of the thing.

D. Preferred option

The storer has a legitimate interest in being freed from the obligation to safely store the thing after the contractual period for storage has ended, and may moreover have an interest in ending storage of the thing, as there may be a need to make room for the storage of other things. Therefore, paragraph (2) is intended to enable the storer to force the client to accept the return of the thing. Paragraph (4) contains a solution for the situation in which the client fails to perform the obligation to accept the return of the thing: if the storer has sufficiently warned the client and the client nevertheless refuses to accept the return of the thing, the storer may sell the thing and – subtracting the costs of selling the thing and the price for storage – pay the proceeds to the client. The provision is the logical complement to the forced return of the thing under paragraph (2). However, given the fact that the client is not free to refuse the return of the thing, mere acceptance of the return of the thing cannot be construed as a waiver of any of the client's rights as regards non-performance of the storer's obligations.

The thing is in principle to be returned to the client. However, the client may not want to receive the thing, but may want to allow a third party to claim the return of the thing. This will often be the case in commercial storage contracts where the thing is sold during storage. Under the present Article the storer is both authorised and obliged to hand over the thing to such a third party. However, the storer does not lose the right to withhold the thing until either the client or the third party pays the price for storage, as the storer should not be worse off as a consequence of the transfer of ownership.

The present Article does not deal with the question whether the storer has become the owner of things handed over for storage because they have been commingled with other things stored by the storer. However, when such a mode of storage has been agreed upon, the client is not entitled to receive the same goods back. Instead, the client is entitled to receive goods of the same kind, quantity and quality. Moreover, the client is entitled to becoming the owner of the replacement goods. How ownership is transferred, is again a matter for the law of property.

A farmer harvested 15,000 kilograms of grain. As he lacks storage capacity himself, he has the grain stored in a huge silo operated by a professional storer of grain. As the farmer knows and accepts, the silo does not contain compartments, implying that the grain cannot be separated from the grain handed over for storage by other farmers. When the farmer requests the return of the grain, the storer may return 15,000 kilograms of grain of the same kind and quality and transfer ownership thereof. This does not constitute non-conformity under IV.C.–5:105 (Conformity) as the farmer, when the contract was concluded, knew that the grain would be commingled with grain delivered by other farmers and therefore accepted the method of storage of the grain and the resulting loss of ownership thereof during storage.

The present Article encompasses the obligation of the storer to actually return the thing. After the return of the thing, the client will usually be able to determine whether or not the service has been performed correctly and will then be required to inform the storer thereof within a reasonable time. More importantly, as the client bears the burden of proving that the damage to the thing occurred prior to its return, the client in fact has an interest in reacting quickly and in investigating the thing upon its return for apparent defects: proof of the prior existence of the damage becomes very difficult as time goes by.

Under a later Article (IV.C.–5:106 (Payment of the price)) the price becomes due when the storer returns the thing. Consequently, the obligation to return the thing and the obligation to pay the price for the storage are normally to be performed at the same time. Where and as long as the client refuses to pay, the storer may withhold performance of the obligation to return the thing in accordance with III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligations), as is explicitly regulated in IV.C.–5:106 (Payment of the price). This applies even when a third party holding sufficient title to the thing claims the return of the thing, as the right to withhold the thing exists as long as the client (or the third party) has not paid the price for storage.

Both parties are in need of the other party's co-operation in order to establish the return of the thing. Paragraphs (1) and (2) of the present Article include an obligation for each party to contribute to the return of the thing. Non-performance of such an obligation entitles the other party to claim damages or to demand specific performance. However, these remedies offer insufficient relief if the client is negligent in the performance of the obligation to take the thing back and the storer has an immediate need to end the storage. To remedy that, III.–2:111 (Property not accepted) provides a particular remedy for the storer, i.e. to sell the thing and to pay the proceeds, less the costs incurred in selling the thing and, of course, the price for the storage. Paragraph (4) explicitly refers to that provision. However, before being allowed to exercise this right, the storer is required to give the client a reasonable warning of the intention to do so. By such a warning, the client is alerted to the possible consequences of the failure to accept the return of the thing; and is then given a final chance to perform the obligation to accept the return of the thing, thus preventing the loss of ownership over it. The notion of a reasonable warning implies that the storer must take reasonable measures to ensure that the client understands the content of the warning.

The present Article does not deal with the question whether or how ownership has been transferred because the thing has been sold to a third party or was commingled with other things stored by the storer. Such questions are left to the law of property. Of course, as is provided in IV.C.–2:106 (Obligation to achieve result) paragraph (2), the thing that is returned must be free from any right of a third party that did not exist prior to the conclusion of the contract.

The law of property is also to determine when the third party has sufficient right or authority to receive the thing. This will usually be the case if the third party produces a store warrant issued by the storer when the thing is stored.

NOTES

I. Storehouse's obligation to return the thing within reasonable time after request

1. When no period was determined for the duration of the storage, the thing stored is generally to be returned when the client so demands, cf. AUSTRIA, CC § 963; BELGIUM, CC art. 1944; ENGLAND Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 s. 14(1); FINLAND Ccom chap. 12, s. 6; FRANCE, CC art. 1944; GERMANY, CC § 695; THE NETHERLANDS, CC art. 7:605, para. 1; SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit' para. 14). Yet, in Germany, in the case of a commercial storage contract concluded for an indefinite period of time, the period of notice for ending the contractual relationship is one month, unless there are special reasons for allowing an immediate termination, cf. Ccom § 473. When a period for storage has been determined, the client can nevertheless demand earlier return in most legal systems, provided that the storehouse is compensated for the early return; cf. Austria, CC § 962; Belgium, CC art. 1944; France, CC art. 1944 and cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33161; GERMANY, CC §. 695; RUSSIAN FEDERATION, CC art. 904. This may be different in England and The Netherlands. In any case, as is clearly stated in GERMAN doctrinal works, the storehouse must be given a reasonable time to perform the obligation to return, and the client's demand must be made at a reasonable time (e. g. during normal office hours), cf. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 695 no. 1. Under SPANISH law, the storer must return the thing as soon as requested to do so by the client (CC art. 1766).

II. Client's obligation to accept return

2. When no time for storage has been agreed upon, the storehouse may at any time ask the client to accept the return of the thing stored: the client must be allowed a reasonable period of time to accept the return, cf. AUSTRIA, CC § 963; FRANCE, Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 33140, 33162; GERMANY, CC § 696; ITALY, Ccom art. 1771 para. 2; THE NETHERLANDS, CC art. 7:605 para. 1; POLAND, CC art. 354. When the parties have agreed upon a definite period of storage, the storehouse is normally required to store the thing for the duration agreed between the parties. When the agreed time for storage has ended, the storehouse may demand that the thing be taken back, cf. Austria, Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I[2], § 961 no. 4; France, Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], nos. 33140, 33162; Germany, CC § 696; The Netherlands, CC art. 7:605 para. 1;; implicitly also England, cf. Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-043. In The Netherlands, CC art. 7:605 para. 2 authorises the storehouse to obtain a court order for earlier return in case of important reasons. These include situations where further storage is either impossible or very arduous for the storehouse, cf. Rutgers, Bewaarneming, no. 17. Austrian law is to the same effect if, due to unforeseen circumstances, the storehouse is no longer capable of taking care of the thing or can do so only at a loss, cf. CC art. 962. When the client does not accept return, in Austria the storehouse is entitled to have the thing stored by a third party at the cost of the client or to continue storage; in the latter case, the storehouse's liability is reduced and the client will be accountable for all damage that result from the failure to accept the return, cf. Austria, Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I[2], § 961 no. 4. In Germany, non-acceptance of return by the client may occasionally amount to non-performance, but in any case leads to mora creditoris, cf. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 696 no. 1. In SPAIN, the storehouse may ask the court to order consignment of the thing to a third party, cf. CC art. 1776.

III. Storehouse's right to sell on failure to accept return

3. If the client does not accept the return of the things stored when required to do so, in AUSTRIA (CC §§ 389, 417(1) and 373) and ENGLAND (ss. 12, 13 of the Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977 and Schedule 1, Part 1, para. 4(1) the storehouse may sell the things. In England, the client requires a court order if there is a dispute with the client over any payment claimed by the storehouse, cf. Chitty on Contracts II[29], nos. 33-052. In FINLAND the storehouse has under certain strictly defined conditions the right to sell stored goods (Act on Business Rights to Sell Stored Goods 1988/688 arts. 3-6).

4. In FRANCE, GERMANY, THE NETHERLANDS, SCOTLAND and SPAIN, such a right does not exist; the storehouse may, of course, invoke other remedies, e. g. claim damages or demand specific performance of the obligation to accept the return of the thing. In The Netherlands, a demand for specific performance of the obligation to take the thing back immediately may be made in summary proceedings, cf. Rutgers, Bewaarneming, no. 17; de Klerk-Leenen and Wessels, Bijzondere overeenkomsten, to CC art. 7:605, note 2.

IV. Fruits

5. Where the thing stored has borne fruits during storage, the storehouse must provide the client with these fruits when the thing is returned, cf. AUSTRIA, CC § 961; BELGIUM, CC art. 1936; FRANCE, CC art. 1936; SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit' para. 14; SPAIN, CC arts. 1766 and 1770 and Ccom art. 306.

IV.C.–5:105: Conformity

(1) The storage of the thing does not conform with the contract unless the thing is returned in the same condition as it was in when handed over to the storer.

(2) If, given the nature of the thing or the contract, it cannot reasonably be expected that the thing is returned in the same condition, the storage of the thing does not conform with the contract if the thing is not returned in such condition as the client could reasonably expect.

(3) If, given the nature of the thing or the contract, it cannot reasonably be expected that the same thing is returned, the storage of the thing does not conform with the contract if the thing which is returned is not in the same condition as the thing which was handed over for storage, or if it is not of the same kind, quality and quantity, or if ownership of the thing is not transferred in accordance with paragraph (6) of IV.C.–5:104 (Return of the thing stored).

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The present Article states that a storage contract, unless of course the parties agreed otherwise, implies an obligation of result: normally, if the thing is not returned in the same condition as it was in when it was handed over to the storer, the contract has not been performed correctly. The present Article thus enables the client to establish the storer's liability.

> Illustration 1
> A shipment of DVDs is stored in a warehouse. When the client claims their return, it turns out that they are damaged. The storer is, in principle, liable for non-conformity of the service.

However, the storer may still prove that the fact that the thing is not returned in its original condition is due to force majeure. Moreover, the detrimental consequences of this strict liability of the storer are, to a large extent, redressed by the storer's possibility of limiting liability in a commercial storage contract to the value of the stored thing.

The nature of the thing handed over for storage may imply that the thing may or has to be returned in a different condition. The thing then is to be returned in the condition that the client could reasonably expect it to be in upon return, be it in a better or a worse condition than it originally was.

> Bananas that are already ripe are stored. The mere fact that the bananas have coloured brown when they are returned does not mean that the storer is liable, since the brown colouring of overripe bananas is a natural process.

> Illustration 3
> Cheese is stored in order to mould. The storer only needs to preserve the cheese and is not required to do anything with the cheese but to store it safely. From the nature of the thing handed over for storage it follows that the cheese cannot be returned in the same condition as it was in when it was handed over. Instead, it will be returned in a better and more valuable condition.

Illustration 4
Because a town's refuse dump is closed due to a strike, the rubbish is temporarily stored. Given the natural decay of the rubbish, the storer is not obliged to return the rubbish in the same condition as it was in when it was handed over to the storer.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

While in most services contracts the service provider is merely under an obligation of best efforts (obligation of means) and obligations of result are mainly limited to secondary obligations, on the basis of a storage contract the client may normally expect a concrete result, i.e. that the thing will be returned in the condition it was in when it was handed over for storage. In this sense, storage implies the safekeeping of the thing. However, in some cases it follows from the nature of the thing stored that return of the thing in its original condition cannot reasonably be expected. An important example is the storage of perishable things, such as fruit.

The question then arises whether the default rule should be that the storer is under an obligation to return the thing in its original condition unless that cannot reasonably be expected given the nature of the thing, or that there should only be an obligation to use best efforts to bring this about. In practice, the difference is primarily a matter of proof: does the client only have to prove that the thing was not handed back in its original condition, allowing the storer to prove that due care was exercised and that the change of the condition of the thing could not have been prevented, or is it up to the client to prove not only the change in the condition of the thing, but also negligence on the part of the storer?

C. Comparative overview

In some legal systems, notably Belgium, France, England, Germany and Italy, the storer is required to return the thing to the client in the condition the client may expect; the risk of natural deterioration or decay of the thing is to be borne by the client, but it is up to the storer to prove that loss of, or damage to, the thing was not due to any negligence on the storer's part. In other legal systems, notably Austria, the Netherlands and Spain, the starting point is that the thing is to be returned in its original condition, together with all the increases (fruits), but here, too, the risk of natural deterioration or decay of the thing is to be borne by the client, and again the burden of proof of non-negligence is on the storer. In practice, the two approaches lead to the same result, requiring the storehouse to prove that it cannot be held liable for any loss of or damage to the thing.

D. Preferred option

Storage is to take place in accordance with the contract; if the thing is not stored accordingly, the storer is liable for any resulting damage. Moreover, the storer is normally required to return the thing in its original condition (paragraph (2)) – which would qualify as an obligation of result – whereas paragraph (3) states that only an obligation to return the thing in as good a condition as could be expected exists if return of the thing in its original condition could not be expected given the nature of the thing handed over for storage. Paragraph (4) deals with the situation where, in conformity with the contract, the thing stored is commingled with other things of the storer or of third parties, and the storer is required to return another thing of the same kind, quality and quantity and, if need be, to transfer ownership. Since paragraph (2) contains the main rule and paragraphs (3) and (4) the exceptions, the burden of proof that either paragraph (3) or paragraph (4) applies is on the party who wishes to rely on it. In most cases, that party will be the storer; however, in Illustration 3, that party is the client.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. In most legal systems reported, the storehouse is required to return the things to the client in the condition the client may expect; natural deterioration or decay of the things is to be borne by the client, but it is up to the storehouse to prove that loss of, or damage to, the things was not due any negligence on its part. Cf. BELGIUM, Cass. 29 February 1996, RW 1998-1999, 1385 (Faillissement V./N. V. E.); FINLAND (Ccom Chap. 12 s. 2); FRANCE, CC art. 1933; ENGLAND, Coldman v Hill [1919] 1 KB 443; GERMANY, Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 695 no. 1; ITALY, Cass. 8 August 1997, no. 7363, Soc. S. Andrea c. Soc. Velo, Giust.civ.Mass. 1997, 1373. In AUSTRIA, CC § 961; THE NETHERLANDS, CC art. 7:605 para. 4; SCOTLAND Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit' para. 14; and SPAIN, cf. CC arts. 1766 and 1770, Ccom art. 306, the starting-point is that the things are to be returned in their original condition, together with any increases (fruits), but here, too, natural deterioration or decay of the things is to be borne by the client, and again the burden of proof is on the storehouse. In effect, the two approaches lead to the same result, requiring the storehouse to prove that any loss of, or damage to, the things cannot be imputed to the storehouse.

II. Condition of the thing upon return; burden of proof in case of damage

2. The storehouse is required to return the thing to the client in the state in which it was received, together with the fruits, cf. AUSTRIAN CC § 961. Return of the thing in a changed condition therefore normally means that the performance is not in conformity with the contract. The fact that the client did not supervise the performance of the service, does not lead to contributory negligence, cf. OGH, SZ 5/18. However, if the client knew the mode of storage, the client cannot argue afterwards that that mode was insufficient, cf. OGH, EvBl 1976/21. The storehouse is not liable if it could not have prevented the damage by exercising due care cf. CC § 964. The burden of proof that the damage was not caused by a lack of care is on the storehouse, cf. OGH, SZ 10/87; OGH, EvBl 1984/11; Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^2, § 965 no. 3.

3. Under BELGIAN law the storehouse is liable if it does not return the thing, unless it proves force majeure and that it has not made an error in storing the thing, cf. Cass. 29 February 1996, RW 1998-1999, 1385 (Faillissement V./N. V. E.). The mere fact that the thing was stolen, does not constitute force majeure by itself, cf. Kh. Hasselt 6 February 1996, RW 1999-2000, 446. The storehouse must rather prove that it had taken all reasonable measures that could be expected, cf. Herbots, Bijzondere overeenkomsten, Actuele problemen, 1980, pp. 272-273. The thing is to be returned in the condition it is in at the time of return, cf. CC art. 1933; natural deterioration or decay is to be accepted by the client.

4. The liability of the storehouse is fault-based, not strict, under ENGLISH law. However, the burden of proof is on the storehouse to prove that loss of, or damage to, a thing while in its possession was not due any negligence on its part, cf. Coldman v. Hill [1919] 1 KB 443; Houghland v. R.R. Low (Luxury Coaches) Ltd. [1962] 1 QB

694. To that extent, the storehouse must prove all the circumstances known to it in which the damage occurred, cf. Levison v. Patent Steam Carpet Cleaning Co. Ltd. [1978] QB 69.

5. Art. 1932 of the FRENCH CC requires the storehouse to return to the client the same thing that was received; if the thing has produced fruits, the storehouse must return these as well, cf. art. 1936 CC. The storehouse may not require the client to prove ownership of the thing, unless it suspects that the thing was acquired by theft; cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33150. The thing must be returned in the condition it is in at the moment of the restitution (art. 1933 CC), implying that ageing and wear and tear not imputable to the storehouse are to be borne by the owner. However, in practice, a reversal of the burden of proof occurs: the storehouse must prove that it exercised due care and that the deterioration of the thing is not due to a lack of maintenance on its side, cf. Cass.com., 10 February 1959, Bull.civ. III, no. 72 (garage) (fixed line of case law); cf. Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33147.

6. Under the GERMAN CC the thing has to be returned in the condition that may be expected. If the storehouse cannot return it or can return it only in a damaged form, it is liable for non-performance; to escape liability, the storehouse must prove that the damage or loss was not caused negligently, cf. Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 695 no. 1.

7. With regard to the contract of storage, the GREEK CC art. 823 provides that a storehouse is bound to exercise the same care as it bestows on its own affairs, unless the storage is for remuneration, in which case the storehouse will be responsible for any fault (CC art. 330).

8. Under ITALIAN law the thing is to be returned to the client as it was at the time it was handed over. The obligation is considered to be an obligation of result. The storehouse avoids liability only by proving that deterioration or decay, etc., was due to sudden and unforeseeable circumstances falling outside its control, cf. ITALIAN CC art. 1218. The mere proof that the things were stored with the diligence of a good father of a household, as CC art. 1768 prescribes, does not suffice. Cf. Cass.civ.sez. III, 8 August 1997, no. 7363, Soc. S. Andrea c. Soc. Velo, Giust.civ.Mass. 1997, 1373; Cass.civ.sez. III, 12 June 1995, no. 6592, Giro c. Melioli, Giust.civ.Mass. 1995, fasc. 6.

9. The storehouse is under an obligation to return the thing in its original state under the DUTCH CC art. 7:605 para. 4. This is considered to be an obligation of result, cf. Paquay, RM Themis 1994, p. 494; Rutgers, Bewaarneming, no. 12. In practice, this means a reversal of the burden of proof: the storehouse must prove that it has not breached the duty of care, in which case the non-performance of the obligation to return the thing in its original state cannot be attributed to the storehouse, cf. Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk (-Castermans), T & C Burgerlijk Wetboek, to CC art. 7:605, note 5.

10. In the case of a safe-keeping contract under POLISH law, the keeper should return the thing in an undeteriorated condition (CC art. 835). Rules on the storage contract specify that the storehouse is not liable for deterioration of the things not exceeding the limits specified in the relevant provisions of law, and in the absence of such provisions, within the limits accepted customarily (CC art. 855 para. 3). The keeper and the storehouse must prove that the damage occurred despite observing due diligence.

11. Under PORTUGUESE law the storehouse is in principle under an obligation of result to return the thing to the client in the same condition as when it was handed over.

12. In SCOTTISH law the store-keeper must restore the thing deposited with its fruits and accessories. The burden of proving restoration is on the store-keeper, who is liable for all loss suffered by the client as a result of failure to restore (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit' para. 14). There is no discussion of the problem of goods which by their nature deteriorate over time.

13. The basic obligation of the storehouse under SPANISH law is the custody of the thing in storage in order to return it to the client in the same condition as when it was handed over, plus any fruits and accessories, cf. CC arts. 1766 and 1770 and Ccom art. 306. There is no provision dealing with the situation where the nature of the thing implies that it is to be returned in a worse condition; in the absence of a contractual agreement, the storehouse can only invoke and prove force majeure, i.e. a fortuitous event or the intervention of a third party or the client to escape liability, cf. CC art. 1183; Bercovitz, Comentarios al Código Civil, p. 2045 . Regarding the storage of things that are fungible by nature, such as money, under SPANISH law the contract may be qualified as an irregular storage contract (not regulated by the Civil Code but admitted by the authors, cfr. Martín Santisteban, El depósito y la responsabilidad del depositario, pp. 82 and ff), where, due to the nature of the thing, the storer is only obliged to restore a thing of the same kind, quality and quantity as the one received.

14. The SWEDISH Consumer Services Act § 15 provides that if the service is storage, the consumer can require that the storage is performed in a professional manner (i.e. in accordance with Consumer Services Act § 4). A term limiting or excluding the obligation is void, cf. Consumer Services Act § 9. Under that provision, even in the absence of negligence, the service is deemed to be non-conform if the non-conformity is the result of an accident or other similar event, cf. ARN 25 May 1992, 1991-5176.

IV.C.–5:106: Payment of the price

(1) The price is payable at the time when the thing is returned to the client in accordance with IV.C.–5:104 (Return of the thing stored) or the client, without being entitled to do so, refuses to accept the return of the thing.

(2) The storer may withhold the thing until the client pays the price. III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation) applies accordingly.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The central question in this Article is when the client is to pay for the service rendered or to be rendered. The Article states that the price is normally due when the thing is returned to the client.

> Illustration 1
> Oranges were stored in a warehouse. Upon request of the client, the storer returns the oranges. Payment becomes due when the client accepts the return.

However, as the client is not entitled to refuse the return of the thing, the client should not by doing so be able to frustrate the storer's right to payment. To prevent this, the Article states that the right to payment also emerges when the client refuses to accept the return of the thing. This does not, however, mean that the client always has to pay the price for storage. If the client terminates the contract for fundamental non-performance, the obligation to pay the price is extinguished: if the client has already paid, restitution of the payment may be demanded.

The rule in the Article is only a default rule. The parties are free to derogate from this provision, and will often do so, especially in the case of a storage contract for a relatively long period of time.

> Illustration 2
> Oranges are stored in a warehouse. The parties have agreed upon payment for each month during which the oranges are stored, to be paid at the beginning of the month. In accordance with the contractual agreement of the parties, payment is due at the beginning of the relevant month.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The general rules in Book III start from the assumption that both parties will perform their obligations simultaneously. In storage contracts, which by definition imply that the storer must perform the main obligation for a reasonably long period of time, simultaneous performance would mean that the client is also under a continuous obligation to perform, i.e. to pay. This, of course, would not be very practical. This implies that normally either the storer or the client is required to perform first. The party who must perform first has no certainty about the other party's intention to perform. A choice must be made whether the uncertainty is to be placed on the storer or on the client. An in-between position could be reached if the client were to pay part of the price after a period of storage has ended or before a new period starts. In this way, the risk on the party that is to perform first is reduced.

C. Comparative overview

In most legal systems, payment for storage is due when the storage ends, although in any legal system the parties may agree to a different time for payment and often do so. Especially in the case of commercial storage, a contractual arrangement to the extent that payment is due per period of storage is more common.

In the case of non-payment by the client, in most legal systems the storer may invoke the right of retention or otherwise withhold the thing. However, such a right to withhold the thing does not exist in Austria and in England.

D. Preferred option

In the present Article, the general trend in the European legal systems – that payment is due when the storer returns the thing – is followed. Thus the storer is to perform first. However, to prevent the storer from having to bear the risk of non-performance by the client completely, the storer is given a specific right to withhold the thing. Moreover, as the Article only contains a default rule, the parties may agree to a different time for payment to become due. In the case of a contract for an indefinite period of time, which will occur primarily in commercial storage contracts, the parties will normally make different arrangements as to the time when the price for the storage is to be paid.

NOTES

I. Time when payment is due

1. The contractual agreements, if any, are decisive as to the time when payment is due. In the absence of agreement, payment is due when storage has ended in AUSTRIA, cf. Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^2, § 969 no. 1; GERMANY, CC § 699; POLAND, CC art 455 (Radwański [-Napierała], System Prawa Prywatnego VII^2, p. 629) and SPAIN, CC art. 1780. However, especially in the case of commercial storage, a contractual arrangement that payment is due per period of storage is more common, cf. FRANCE, Huet, Contrats spéciaux^2, no. 33137; GERMANY, CC § 699. This is probably also the case in THE NETHERLANDS. When storage for a determined of time has been agreed upon and the client demands the return of the thing before that period has ended, then the storehouse is normally entitled only to a reasonable part of the price in Austria, cf. OGH, JBl 1974, 622.

2. Under SPANISH law, the storage contract is prima facie gratuitous, unless the parties agree otherwise (CC art. 1760); although a commercial storage is always presumed to be an onerous contract (Ccom art. 304). Apart from any agreed payment for the storage, the client is obliged to reimburse the storer for any expenses incurred in order to maintain the thing in its original condition.

II. Storehouse's right of retention in case of non-payment

3. In case of non-payment by the client, the storehouse may invoke a right of retention (i.e. withhold the thing) in BELGIUM (art. 1948 CC); FINLAND (CC Chap. 12 s. 8); FRANCE (art. 1948 CC); GERMANY (CC §§ 273, 320(1)); THE NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 6:262, 6:52 and 3:290 ff); POLAND (CC art. 488 para. 2 and art. 859^3); SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland VIII, 'Deposit' para. 15) and SPAIN (CC art. 1780). The storehouse does not have such a right in AUSTRIA, cf. Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I[2], § 967 no. 3 and § 969 no. 1; nor in ENGLAND Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 33-051.

IV.C.–5:107: Post-storage obligation to inform

After the ending of the storage, the storer must inform the client of:

(a) any damage which has occurred to the thing during storage; and

(b) the necessary precautions which the client must take before using or transporting the thing, unless the client could reasonably be expected to be aware of the need for such precautions.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article imposes a specific obligation on the storer to give the client two different types of information. Firstly, if for some reason the thing was damaged during storage, the storer must inform the client of that. This is especially important if there is a chance that the client would not notice the damage immediately and would run the risk of greater damage if prompt action were not taken.

Illustration 1

A computer company has stored a hospital's electronic patient records. During storage, a major power cut has damaged the computer company's mainframe computer, damaging some of the records. The hospital will only be able to notice the damage if it specifically looks for information which is stored in the damaged files. The computer company is obliged to inform the hospital of the damage. After having been warned, the hospital can try to access backup files it may still have. If the hospital is not duly warned, the chances increase that such backup files will have been deleted.

Secondly, the storer may be under a duty to warn the client that precautions need to be taken before the thing is transported or used by him. Such a warning is, however, not necessary if the client can be expected to be aware of the need to take precautions.

Illustration 2

A woman has her furniture, including a refrigerator, temporarily stored because she has moved out of her old house but has not yet got entry to her newly built house. As the storer knows, a refrigerator should not be used for two or three days after it is moved from one place to another. The storer has, in principle, an obligation to warn the client of this when the refrigerator is handed back, unless the client could reasonably be expected to be aware of it already. As this is most likely the case, the storer will most probably not be under an obligation to warn the client.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

During storage, all sorts of things may happen to the thing, including damage. Often, such damage will be noticed by the client at the time or shortly after the thing is returned. However, certain types of damage may be hidden to the client while the storer may be aware of them, either because of professional expertise or because of awareness of the event causing the damage. If the storer does not inform the client, the damage to the thing may increase considerably as the client may fail to take the necessary measures to control the damage. On the other hand, imposing an obligation upon the storer to inform the client of damage that occurred during storage implies that the storer may have to report the storer's own non-performance of a contractual obligation.

A second question is whether the storer should have an obligation to warn against dangers when using or transporting the returned thing. One could argue that when the storer has properly taken care of the thing and returns the thing undamaged, the storage obligations have been fully performed. On the other hand, one could argue that it follows from the storer's obligation to take due care and to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing that the storer must warn the client if aware of such dangers, even if these dangers have nothing to do with the performance of the service. An in-between solution would be that a duty to warn only emerges if the client would have no reason to be aware of the need to take these precautions.

C. Comparative overview

In most legal systems, an obligation to inform the client of the condition of the thing and the necessary precautions that the client must take before using or transporting the thing may occasionally follow from the storer's obligation of care or from the principle of good faith. In Spain, such an obligation is explicitly provided for in the case where the client is a consumer. Moreover, in several legal systems, e. g. Austria, England and Spain, the storer must inform the client about any damage that occurred to the thing during storage.

D. Preferred option

If damage occurred during storage, the client must be informed thereof, either upon return of the thing or before that. If duly informed, the client may be able to take appropriate measures to prevent further damage from occurring. Such is the case even if this means that the storer must inform the client of a non-performance, thus opening up the possibility of liability. It should, however, be noted that if the storer properly informs the client and the client takes appropriate measures in time, the extent of the damage may be limited. This would mean that the storer would be liable to pay damages to a lower amount, either because not all foreseeable damage has occurred or because the occurrence of part of the damage should have been prevented by the client, which would mean that that part of the damage is to be attributed to the client rather than to the storer.

The storer is, of course, only required to inform the client of such damage and of such dangers that the storer can be aware. When the thing handed over was sealed, the storer is not allowed to break the seal and cannot investigate it. Consequently, in the case of the storage of sealed things, obligations under this Article must be restricted to those cases where the seal was broken or where the damage can be noticed even though the seal has not been broken.

> Illustration 3
> A firm is preparing to move from one building to another. It has confidential records and office materials stored in a sealed wooden container. The storer may not investigate the container's contents and therefore cannot report the fact that an employee's fishbowl, stored in the container, was broken during transport. However, the storer must inform the client that the wooden container and its contents were destroyed by a fire in the warehouse where the container was stored.

The storer is under an obligation to warn the client that the client needs to take precautionary measures before transporting or using the thing if the storer is aware of dangers connected with its transportation or its use by the client, even if these dangers are inherent to the fact that the thing was stored or is transported by the client. The reason for such an obligation is that the storer may be aware of the dangers but the client may not. However, it would not be fair or reasonable to burden the storer with an obligation to warn against dangers the client can reasonably be expected to know of.

Both the obligation to inform under paragraph (1) and the obligation to warn under paragraph (2) operate at or after ending of the storage. The provision may be applied if the storage is temporarily suspended while the contract is still in force but, more importantly, also when the contractual relationship has come to an end for whatever reason.

NOTES

1. An obligation to inform about the condition of the thing or risks that may occur or have occurred as a consequence of storage is accepted in AUSTRIA, cf. Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], p. 183; Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I[2], § 964 no. 2. There is no specific provision on this matter under SPANISH law, although such an obligation for the storer may be inferred from the principle of good faith (CC art. 1258). Such an obligation may follow in GERMANY and THE NETHERLANDS from the obligation to take the interests of the client into account or from good faith, cf. CC art. 241 para. 2 and CC arts. 7:602, 6:2 and 6:248; probably the same holds true for FRANCE, especially if the storehouse is a professional party. Moreover, in Austria (cf. Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I[2], art. 964 no. 2), ENGLAND (cf. Coldman v. Hill [1919] 1 KB 443) and Spain (cf. CC arts. 1102 and 1103), the storehouse must inform the client about any damage that has occurred to the thing during storage. In POLAND, in the case of a contract for safe-keeping, not informing the client about important events affecting the goods may sometimes be qualified as contrary to CC art. 56 (Radwański [-Napierała], System Prawa Prywatnego VII[2], p. 629). According to the rules on the storage contract (CC art. 858) the storehouse is obliged to inform the client about events important from the point of view of the client or relating to the condition of the thing accepted for storage, unless such a notification is not possible. There is no discussion of these matters in SCOTTISH law.

IV.C.–5:108: Risks

(1) This Article applies if the thing is destroyed or damaged due to an event which the storer could not have avoided or overcome and if the storer cannot be held accountable for the destruction or damage.

(2) If, prior to the event, the storer had notified the client that the client was required to accept the return of the thing, the client must pay the price. The price is due when the storer returns the remains of the thing, if any, or the client indicates to the storer that the client does not want those remains.

(3) If, prior to the event, the storer had not notified the client that the client was required to accept the return of the thing:

(a) if the parties had agreed that the storer would be paid for each period of time which has elapsed, the client must pay the price for each period which has elapsed before the event occurred;

(b) if further performance of the obligations under the contract is still possible for the storer, the storer is required to continue performance, without prejudice to the client's right to terminate the contractual relationship under IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate);

(c) if performance of the obligations under the contract is no longer possible for the storer the client does not have to pay for the service rendered except to the extent that the storer is entitled to a price under subparagraph (a); and the storer must return to the client the remains of the thing unless the client indicates that the client does not want those remains.

(4) If the client indicates to the storer that the client does not want the remains of the thing, the storer may dispose of the remains at the client's expense.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Sometimes the thing handed over for storage is damaged or destroyed without any fault or other cause attributable to the storer. Under the previous Article, the client must be informed of this when the thing is returned to the client. If the storehouse proves that the damage was caused by an impediment beyond its control, it is not liable for the damage. In that case, the damage to, or destruction of, the thing is to be borne by the client. It is, however, not clear whether the client still has to pay for the storage service.

In this Article, a distinction is made between the situation where the storer had already informed the client that the client was required to accept the return of the thing or the client had asked its return and the situation where the storer had not yet indicated that. In the former situation, the client bears the consequences of the unfortunate event: the client must still pay the price for the service rendered, even although the benefit of the thing can no longer be enjoyed.

Illustration 1

A shipment of 1,000 DVD players is stored at a warehouse for two months. When the two months have passed, the storer requires the client to take the DVD players back, as the storage facility is needed for storage of other things. Before the DVD players are collected, the warehouse is struck by lightning; in the resulting fire, the DVD players are damaged. The storer need only return the remains of the DVD players if the client is still interested in them, but the client is required to pay the price for the service that was rendered.

In the latter situation, a further distinction must be made as to whether performance of the service is still possible or not. If prolonged storage is still possible (and reasonable), the storer is to continue storing the thing, unless the client terminates the contractual relationship.

Illustration 2
A shipment of 1,000 DVD players is stored at a warehouse for two months. Before the contractual period has ended, a fire breaks out. Because of water damage, the DVD players are damaged, but not destroyed. The storer must continue storage, unless the client terminates the contractual relationship.

If storage is no longer possible, the storer is not entitled to payment and must return the thing or what remains of it to the client if the client wants to receive the thing or what remains of it.

Illustration 3
The DVD players are damaged to such an extent that they are of no further use. In this case, the storer must return the remains of the DVD players to the client if the client so requests, but does not have the right to payment.

As storage contracts usually are long-term contracts, the parties will often have agreed upon payment per period. The client is still required to pay for the periods that have ended even if future performance is no longer possible.

Illustration 4
A shipment of 1,000 DVD players is stored at a warehouse for two months. The parties have agreed upon monthly payment, to be paid after the relevant month has ended. When exactly one month has passed, a fire breaks out, destroying the entire shipment. The client need only pay for the first month of storage.

B. Interests at stake

The question to be answered here is who should bear the consequences of the unfortunate destruction or deterioration of the thing. In most cases, the causes for non-performance will be attributed to one or the other party. Damage caused by natural disasters such as landslides and flooding, for instance, will occur less frequently because storers will have taken precautionary measures – failure to do so when such measures should have been taken implies a non-performance by the storer – and public authorities have taken preventive measures as well. Yet, where such damage does occur and no obligation of the storer was breached, the question needs to be answered.

In this respect, the question also arises whether the storer may still claim performance of the client's obligation to pay the price when the thing has been destroyed or damaged due to an incident for which the storer cannot be held liable.

D. Preferred option

The practical relevance of the present Article is relatively low. Many events that were once considered unforeseeable or insurmountable are now within the reach of affordable preventive measures. As a consequence, the storer will have far-reaching obligations to protect the thing against the consequences of external events. However unexpected events for which the storer cannot be held accountable may still occur.

Paragraph (1) states when the Article applies. The essence is that there must be some unforeseen event and that the storer must not be accountable for the destruction or damage caused.

If the client or the storer had already indicated that the thing was to be returned, but the client had not yet collected the thing, the client bears the consequences of the unfortunate event, and must still pay the price for the service rendered. For the only reason why the storer still had the thing was that the client had not yet collected the thing; in such cases, it is deemed to be fair that the client bears the consequences.

In the situation where the desire to have the thing returned had not yet been communicated to the other party, the consequences of the unfortunate event are covered by the principles of III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment). If the non-performance is not excusable under this Article and prolonged storage is still possible (and reasonable), the storer is to continue storing the thing, unless the client terminates the contractual relationship. If the storer continues storing, the storer is entitled to the contractual price; if the client terminates, the storer is entitled to the value of the services already rendered. (IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate) paragraph (2)). Where the parties had agreed upon payment per period, the client need only pay for the periods that passed before the unfortunate event took place. If storage is no longer possible or reasonable, the storer is not entitled to payment and is to return the thing or what remains of it to the client if the client wants to receive the thing or the remains. However, as storage contracts usually are long-term contracts, the parties will often have agreed upon payment per period.

Contrary to the situation under a construction contract, and unless the thing is commingled with other things, the client is normally the owner of the thing. So the situation where the risk is completely on the storer normally does not occur under a storage contract. The risk of the loss of the thing itself is on the owner of the thing (res perit domino). Total loss of the thing, therefore, will normally have to be borne by the client, who is the owner. The present Article is primarily concerned with the effect of destruction or damage on the obligation to pay the price.

NOTES

1. The consequences of force majeure on the performance of the obligations under a storage contract do not attract much attention in legal systems. In storage contracts, the risk of fortuitous destruction or deterioration of the thing is generally on the client, who is the owner of the thing. However, the storer will have to prove the fortuitous nature of the destruction or deterioration of the thing, since there is an obligation of result. For the rest, the matter appears to be left generally to the rules on force majeure or impossibility of further performance. Only in Germany has some attention been paid to the question whether the destruction of the thing leads to the storer losing the right to payment.
2. SPANISH law also lacks specific rules on the question of risk under storage contracts. Therefore the general provisions are applicable. According to those, the storer may escape from liability only by proving the fortuitous nature of the event and that it occurred before the storer incurred delay (CC art. 1182; Martín Santisteban, El depósito y la responsabilidad del depositario, p. 118).

IV.C.–5:109: Limitation of liability

In a contract between two businesses, a term restricting the storer's liability for non-performance to the value of the thing is presumed to be fair for the purposes of II.–9:405 (Meaning of unfair in contracts between businesses), except to the extent that it restricts liability for damage caused intentionally or by way of grossly negligent conduct on the part of the storer or any person for whose actions the storer is responsible.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The present Article creates a relatively safe haven for a specific type of limitation clause in storage contracts: if in a contract between two businesses the storer's liability is limited to the value of the thing before storage, that clause is presumed to be fair for the purposes of II.–9:405 (Meaning of unfair in contracts between businesses) which deals with unfair contract terms in contracts between businesses.

> Illustration 1
> A company specialising in improving foodstuffs harvested 15,000 kilograms of genetically modified grain. As the company lacks storage capacity, the grain is stored in a huge silo operated by a professional storer of grain. At the time of storage, genetically modified grain is not approved for consumption or distribution in the food chain. Due to the somewhat negligent behaviour of an employee of the storer, the grain is accidentally mixed with normal grain and sold as seed for new crop. When the error is noticed, the harvest of 2,000 farmers is destroyed; the farmers claim damages from the producer of the genetically modified grain on the basis of public regulations, which state that the producer of grain is strictly liable for any damage caused by the grain before approval for distribution in the food chain. When the producer claims damages from the storer, the storer invokes a standard term restricting liability to the market value of the grain at the time it was stored.

As both the producer of the grain and the storer act in the course of their business, the limitation clause is presumed to be fair.

The presumption of fairness does not apply to the extent that the term restricts liability for damage caused intentionally or by way of grossly negligent behaviour on the part of the storer or any person for whose actions the storer is responsible.

> Illustration 2
> A large oil company has 10,000 barrels of oil temporarily stored at a storage location, owned by a commercial refinery. The standard terms of the storer form part of the contract and include a clause limiting the refinery's liability to the value of the oil at the time of storage. An employee of the refinery, against regulations, smokes a cigarette and carelessly throws away the stub. The stub causes the oil barrels to explode, leading to an inferno at the refinery.

As in this case the employee's actions may be considered to constitute grossly negligent behaviour, the presumption of the present Article does not apply; whether the clause is regarded as unfair in relation to such situations is to be determined under the general rules on unfair contract terms in contracts between businesses.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

There are general rules on unfair contract terms in Book II, Section 4. This does, however, lead to case-by-case appreciation of exemption and liability clauses, causing uncertainty as to the validity of such clauses. As a result, parties will have an interest in litigating the question whether or not the clause can be invoked. It would certainly benefit commercial practice if more guidance could be given in this matter. The question then arises whether the present Chapter should contain a specification of the general provision, indicating that particular clauses are presumed to be fair in a storage contract. A further question would be whether such a clause would also be upheld in a case where damage was caused intentionally or by way of grossly negligent conduct. On the other hand, introducing such a rule would take away some of the flexibility of the general rules on unfair contract terms. Moreover, one could argue that one should distinguish between commercial contracts and consumer contracts, in the sense that a general rule is more acceptable in commercial contracts than in consumer contracts.

C. Preferred option

At present, the legal systems are divided as to the acceptability of limitation clauses. In this Chapter, an in-between solution is followed by the introduction of a so-called safe havens for commercial storage contracts. In such contracts, a clause restricting the storer's liability for non-performance to the value the thing had before storage is presumed to be fair and reasonable. The presumption, however, is not generally applied. Firstly, it does not apply to the extent that the clause restricts liability for damage caused intentionally or by way of grossly negligent conduct. In this respect, it cannot be argued convincingly that a clause limiting or excluding liability even in those cases should always or even normally be considered to be fair. Therefore, clauses excluding liability for damage caused intentionally or by way of grossly negligent conduct must be excluded from the present Article. Whether such clauses are effective or not is to be determined on the basis of the general rules on unfair contract terms.

Secondly, the client may prove that, despite the presumption in this Article, in the case at hand the clause cannot be considered fair. Such proof will be difficult, but that is no bad thing. The Article aims at providing practice with hard and fast rules for one of the most important types of exclusion or limitation clauses in storage contracts. That goal would be achieved if proof of the opposite were easily accepted.

Thirdly, the presumption only applies to commercial cases. In consumer cases, the damage inflicted by a non-performance on the part of the storer is normally fairly limited. Usually, both the extent of the damage and the risk of its occurrence are not so extreme that they cannot be borne by the storer. There is, therefore, insufficient reason to introduce a safe haven for consumer cases. This does not mean that a clause limiting liability in a consumer case cannot be accepted; whether the clause is effective is to be determined in accordance with the general rules on unfair contract terms.

NOTES

I. Limitation of liability in case of damage caused intentionally or by gross negligence

1. Exemption or limitation of liability of the contracting party itself or its managerial staff is generally considered to be void if the damage was caused intentionally or by grossly negligent behaviour, cf. AUSTRIA, CC § 879(1); BELGIUM, Herbots 1980, p. 275; FINLAND (e.g. Supreme Court Cases KKO 1993: 166, 1995:71, 2001:17); FRANCE, Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33158; GERMANY, Palandt [-Sprau], BGB, § 688 no. 7; GREECE, CC art. 332; ITALY, CC art. 1229; THE NETHERLANDS, HR 30 September 1994, NedJur 1995, 45 (Diepop/Nouwens); PORTUGAL, CC art. 809; SPAIN, CC arts. 1102 and 1103; SWEDEN, Bernitz, Standardsavtalsrätt, p. 88. Under POLISH law there is no possibility to exclude liability for a damage caused intentionally (CC art. 473 para. 2), however, it is possible to exclude liability for a damage resulting from a gross negligence (judgement of the Supreme Court of 6. 10. 1953, II C 1141/53, OSN 1955, no. 1, poz. 5). Moreover, the Polish CC perceives as unfair clauses which: exclude liability for death or personal injury (CC art. 385^3 para. 1), or which exclude or limit in a significant way the liability of the professional for non-performance or improper performance of the contractual obligations (CC art. 385^3 para. 2).

II. Limitation in commercial cases

2. In some legal systems, exclusion clauses in standard contract terms are considered void even in a commercial case, and limitation clauses are at least viewed with suspicion, cf. GERMANY, CC § 307(2); ITALY, CC art. 1469-bis; PORTUGAL, art. 18 sub d DL no. 446/85. In other legal systems, it is even thought that any exclusion clause is to be considered void, and limitation clauses are viewed with suspicion, cf. FRANCE, Huet, Contrats spéciaux[2], no. 33158; possibly also BELGIUM, Herbots 1980, p. 275; Portugal, Appeal Court Oporto 6 October 1987, CJ 1987, IV, p. 231. By contrast, in AUSTRIA, ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, FINLAND and SWEDEN, exclusion or limitation of liability is normally allowed, cf. Austria, Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I[2], § 964 no. 3; ENGLAND, Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry Ltd. [1945] KB 189; Sweden, Bernitz, Standardsavtalsrätt, p. 88. Yet, in England the clause may be invoked only if the storehouse can prove all the circumstances known to it in which the loss or damage occurred, cf. Levison v. Patent Steam Carpet Cleaning Co. Ltd. [1978] QB 69. In THE NETHERLANDS, it is thought that such clauses have to be scrutinised carefully if storage is for a price, but that they may be justified by specific risks attached to the storage, for instance storage of a vulnerable good in which the storehouse is not specialised, cf. Pitlo [-du Perron], VI[9], p. 296. This is even true if the clause is included in a contract concluded with a consumer, cf. Hof Den Bosch 12 November 1990, NedJur 1991, 537, TvC 1991, p. 128 (Herrny/Hubertushuis).

III. Limitation in consumer cases

3. In a consumer case, exemption or limitation of liability is not valid in England, cf. s. 3(2)a Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977; SPAIN, ConsProtA art. 86(7); SWEDEN, cf. Consumer Services Act §§9, 31; ARN 1991-5176 of 25 May 1992. Such a clause may very well be valid in The Netherlands, cf. Hof Den Bosch 12 November 1990, NedJur 1991, 537, TvC 1991, p. 128 (Herrny/Hubertushuis); and in Austria, as KSchG, art. 6 para. 2 no. 5 only bans limitation clauses that were not the object of negotiations between the parties. In SCOTLAND a fairness and reasonableness test will apply (Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 s. 17).

4. For further notes, see PEL SC pp. 597 to 599 and the Notes to Book II, Section 4 on unfair contract terms.

IV.C.–5:110: Liability of the hotel-keeper

(1) A hotel-keeper is liable as a storer for any damage to, or destruction or loss of, a thing brought to the hotel by any guest who stays at the hotel and has sleeping accommodation there.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1) a thing is regarded as brought to the hotel:

(a) if it is at the hotel during the time when the guest has the use of sleeping accommodation there;

(b) if the hotel-keeper or a person for whose actions the hotel-keeper is responsible takes charge of it outside the hotel during the period for which the guest has the use of the sleeping accommodation at the hotel; or

(c) if the hotel-keeper or a person for whose actions the hotel-keeper is responsible takes charge of it whether at the hotel or outside it during a reasonable period preceding or following the time when the guest has the use of sleeping accommodation at the hotel.

(3) The hotel-keeper is not liable in so far as the damage, destruction or loss is caused by:

(a) a guest or any person accompanying, employed by or visiting the guest;

(b) an impediment beyond the hotel-keeper's control; or

(c) the nature of the thing.

(4) A term excluding or limiting the liability of the hotel-keeper is unfair for the purposes of Book II, Chapter 9, Section 4 if it excludes or limits liability in a case where the hotel-keeper, or a person for whose actions the hotel-keeper is responsible, causes the damage, destruction or loss intentionally or by way of grossly negligent conduct.

(5) Except where the damage, destruction or loss is caused intentionally or by way of grossly negligent conduct of the hotel-keeper or a person for whose actions the hotel-keeper is responsible, the guest is required to inform the hotel-keeper of the damage, destruction or loss without undue delay. If the guest fails to inform the hotel-keeper without undue delay, the hotel-keeper is not liable.

(6) The hotel-keeper has the right to withhold any thing referred to in paragraph (1) until the guest has satisfied any right the hotel-keeper has against the guest with respect to accommodation, food, drink and solicited services performed for the guest in the hotel-keeper's professional capacity.

(7) This Article does not apply if and to the extent that a separate storage contract is concluded between the hotel-keeper and any guest for any thing brought to the hotel. A separate storage contract is concluded if a thing is handed over for storage to, and accepted for storage by, the hotel-keeper.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The Article deals with the general liability of hotel-keepers for loss of, or damage to, things brought to the hotel by guests staying at the hotel. It does not deal with cases where there is a special storage contract between the guest and the hotel (paragraph (6)) Such cases are quite common.

Illustration 1

A Viennese hotel offers its guests the possibility of storing valuables in the hotel safe. A hotel guest hands over her passport, money and air ticket to the hotel-keeper for safekeeping in the hotel safe.

Illustration 2
A hotel guest stays in a hotel in Rome for three nights. As, on the day of his departure, his plane does not leave until 18.00 hrs., he asks the hotel-keeper whether he can leave his luggage at the hotel. The hotel-keeper offers to store the luggage in a special room.

According to paragraph (6), the two cases described above do not fall within the scope of the present Article, but under the rest of this Chapter. This also applies for the storage of money in the hotel safe, as follows from the last sentence of the paragraph.

A separate storage contract is not normally concluded for things stored in a hotel room, even if the thing is locked into a safe contained in the room, as the hotel is not in a position to supervise the contents of such a safe. The present Article nevertheless provides that the hotel-keeper is to be treated as a storer with regard to the things the guest has brought to the hotel. This means that the obligations mentioned in the previous Articles apply so far as possible. Treating the hotel-keeper as a storer only applies in relation to a thing 'brought to the hotel' by the hotel guest. It follows from paragraph (2) that a thing is considered to have been brought to the hotel if it is brought by a guest to the guest's hotel room or if it is outside the hotel but the hotel-keeper otherwise accepted responsibility for it.

A hotel guest has brought a suitcase into her room and has left her car, with the permission of the hotel-keeper, in the hotel's secured parking place. Both the suitcase and the car have been brought to the hotel. Had the car been parked in the public street, the hotel-keeper would have been responsible for the car and its contents.

Moreover, the hotel-keeper is also responsible for the guest being able to take things from and bring things to the room. Therefore, things are also considered to have been brought to the hotel in the period that precedes or follows the moment the client has checked in and gone to the room, and has checked out and left.

Illustration 4
A guest wants to check into a hotel. A pickpocket steals his wallet in the hotel lobby. The hotel is liable if it did not take appropriate measures to prevent such theft in the hotel.

The hotel is, of course, only liable if it could or should have prevented anything occurring to a thing brought to the hotel.

Illustration 5
A wallet is stolen from the room of a guest. The hotel-keeper is not liable if the wallet was stolen by a visitor who had entered the room with the guest's consent, but is liable if a chambermaid took the wallet.

Illustration 6
A fire breaks out in a hotel. The hotel staff quickly extinguish the fire but one room is completely destroyed, together with the things brought into it by the guest. Unless the damage can somehow be attributed to a failure on behalf of the hotel-keeper (e. g. because not enough fire-preventing measures were taken), the hotel-keeper is not liable for damages.

Illustration 7
A hotel guest brought overripe bananas to his room. The fact that the bananas will rot unless the guest immediately eats them follows from the nature of the thing brought to the hotel. The hotel-keeper will not be liable if the bananas indeed rot, nor if that causes damage to other things belonging to the guest.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The present Chapter primarily deals with contracts where storage is the main object of the contract. Often, storage goes together with the performance of another service. If there is only one contract, the general rule on mixed contracts (II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts)) has the effect that the rules of this Chapter apply to the storage part of the contract, with any appropriate modifications. A typical situation in which a combination of services exist is when valuables are stored in a hotel safe or when luggage is temporarily stored in a special room after the guest has checked out. One could argue that the storage rules could be applied, though modified to take into account that storage is only an ancillary obligation under the contract, which has the provision of accommodation as its main obligation. On the other hand, one could also argue that in such a case, the parties have in fact concluded two separate contracts: one for accommodation – a contract which is governed by Chapter 2 (Rules Applying to Service Contracts in General) only – and a storage contract as to the storage of the valuables or the luggage. One could, however, doubt whether the storage rules should apply to the hotel-keeper who upon the guest's request stores the guest's money in the hotel safe, as the present Chapter does not generally apply to the storage of money (IV.C.–5:101 (Scope)). On the other hand, the reason for the non-applicability of the storage rules to the storage of money is that normally specific regulations apply to such contracts. These rules, however, do not apply to the situation where, in the course of a contract with a hotel-keeper, money is stored in the hotel safe.

In the contracts with a hotel-keeper, a second issue may arise: is the hotel-keeper responsible for damage to the guest's things while the guest is staying at the hotel? The question is difficult to answer as regards the things the guest brought into the room: the hotel-keeper does not have control over the things that are kept in the room. From this it follows that for such things the hotel-keeper does not act as a storer. One could, therefore, argue that the present Chapter should not govern the liability of a hotel-keeper. On the other hand, the hotel-keeper's liability for things brought to the hotel by a guest has traditionally been regulated in the same or a very similar manner as the liability of a storer. Moreover, as the hotel-keeper normally provides cleaning services and therefore does have access to the room, even if the guest has locked it, there is a serious chance that any damage that is inflicted on a thing brought to the hotel is in fact inflicted by the hotel-keeper or hotel staff. The situation, therefore, is not so different from real storage. One could therefore argue that the present Chapter should contain a provision on the liability of a hotel-keeper, regulating the matter in a manner similar to the storer's liability.

If a specific provision were to be included, one could argue that a hotel-keeper should only be liable for damage to the things brought to the hotel if the guest informed the hotel-keeper of the damage promptly after discovering it: if the guest does so only after returning home, it is far more difficult for the hotel-keeper to prove that the damage was caused by somebody for whose actions the guest was responsible; moreover, the guest also deprives the hotel-keeper of the possibility of reducing the damage. This would imply that the guest should lose the right to claim damages when the hotel-keeper is not informed without undue delay.

Another question could be whether the hotel-keeper should have less freedom than other storers to limit or exclude liability. An argument in favour of this might be that the amount of damages would almost always be relatively low – especially if it were regarded as contributory negligence for a guest not to keep valuables in the hotel safe when offered the possibility of doing so. An argument in favour of a less stringent liability is that a hotel-keeper, unlike a storer, often does not have the thing under direct control and may be able to do little to prevent damage, deterioration or loss.

C. Comparative overview

On 17 December 1962, under the auspices of the Council of Europe, the Convention on the Liability of Hotel-Keepers concerning the Property of Their Guests was adopted. The Convention has been ratified by twelve of the present EU Member States (Belgium, Cyprus, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Lithuania, Luxemburg, Malta, Poland, Slovenia and the United Kingdom). The Convention has been signed, but not or not yet ratified by three countries (Austria, Greece and the Netherlands). A total of ten countries (the Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, Hungary, Latvia, Portugal, Slovakia, Spain and Sweden) have neither signed nor ratified the Convention (status at 11 May 2007).

As the Convention has been ratified by many of the reported legal systems, it is not surprising that the rules on the liability of hotel-keepers are more or less the same in many legal systems in the European Union. Even in countries which have not yet ratified, the rules are more or less the same. As a result of the Convention, in many of the existing codifications, hotel- and innkeepers are by statutory provision considered to be storers as regards the luggage, clothes and other objects brought to the hotel or inn by the client. In the case of damage to or loss of such things, the hotel-keeper can escape liability only by proving that the damage was not caused by hotel staff or another person who came to the hotel.

Things handed over to the hotel-keeper or hotel staff are considered to have been brought to the hotel. The Convention leaves it up to the national systems how to treat the hotel-keeper's liability for the client's car and its contents, and for animals brought to the hotel: Article 7 of the Annex to the Convention excludes these from the scope of the hotel-keeper's liability and Article 2 (e) of the Convention allows the parties to the Convention to decide differently. In Belgium, Article 7 of the Annex is followed; in England, only the liability for the client's car and its contents is excluded. By contrast, if the car is parked in a designated area, the hotel-keeper is liable in Austria, Germany and the Netherlands.

In the Netherlands, all rules governing the hotel-keeper's liability are default rules and no statutory limitations exist. In other legal systems, the hotel-keeper may not limit liability if the keeper or hotel staff is the cause of the damage or the thing has been handed over into the care of the hotel-keeper. In other cases, the hotel-keeper's liability is limited: in Austria to € 1,100 for most objects and to € 550 in the case of precious objects, money or securities. In England and Scotland, under the Hotel Proprietors Act 1956, the hotel-keeper is liable for an amount no greater than £50 for one thing or a total of £100 per guest. In Belgium, France and Italy, the ceiling is set at 100 times the amount of the price of accommodation for one night. In Germany, the same ceiling exists, with a minimum of € 600 and a maximum of € 3,500; in the case of money, securities and other precious things such as fur not used as clothes, a maximum of € 800 applies. In France, liability for damage to or loss of objects placed in the client's car, parked in a closed parking place belonging to the hotel, is limited to 50 times the amount of the daily accommodation. Further exclusions or limitations of liability are normally considered to be void in Austria, Belgium and Italy.

Probably as a counterbalance to the hotel-keeper's liability, in Austria, England, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Scotland and Spain the hotel-keeper is awarded a specific right of retention of the thing brought to the hotel until all charges have been paid by the client and for which the hotel would be held liable in the case of damage; a similar right exists in Sweden, where specific legislation regarding the hotel-keeper's liability otherwise does not exist.

D. Preferred option

For those things that actually are taken into the hotel-keeper's custody, there is no reason to deviate from the rules on storage at all. Therefore, in such a situation, the present Article does not apply: a separate storage contract is concluded. As specific legislation regulating the storage of money does not apply to the storage of money in a hotel safe during the guest's stay at the hotel, the present Chapter should apply to such storage as well. The present Article therefore explicitly states that its rules do apply to the storage of such things. This is in conformity with the Convention on the Liability of Hotel-Keepers concerning the Property of Their Guests, which contains provisions on the liability of hotel-keepers for theft of money brought into their hotels.

Such a specific contract is not concluded concerning the things brought into the guest's room. Yet, even though hotel-keepers are, as regards the luggage a client leaves in the hotel room, not storers in the actual sense of the word, there is a close resemblance to the issues at stake in storage contracts. The reason for the application of the storage rules is that because of the open character of these places – implying that not only the staff, but also other guests and third parties may enter and leave the hotel – the client runs the risk of theft or property damage, while not being in a position to establish who is responsible. To remedy that, hotel-keepers are urged to take precautionary measures to prevent theft or damage, the aim of the rules being that hotel-keepers have to assure the safety of the things their clients bring into their establishments. This implies that the present Chapter should indeed regulate the liability of hotel-keepers in a manner similar to storage contracts.

The hotel-keeper has a legitimate interest in being informed about damage in time, but there is no particular incentive for the guest to speedily inform the hotel-keeper. To provide such an incentive for the guest, the Article states that the guest loses the right to damages if the hotel-keeper is not informed without undue delay.

> Illustration 8
> A guest's suitcase is stolen in the hotel lobby; the hotel-keeper did not take sufficient precautions and can therefore be held liable. The guest decides not to tell the hotel-keeper immediately, as she does not want to cause a scene before she has received the contents of her safety deposit box, where her passport and plane ticket are stored. Three hours later, when these are returned to the guest, she complains about the missing suitcase. Had the guest promptly informed the hotel-keeper, the hotel-keeper might have tried to catch the thief. The guest's failure to inform the hotel-keeper promptly means that the hotel-keeper can no longer be held liable.

It is different, however, if damage was caused intentionally or by way of grossly negligent behaviour on the part of the hotel-keeper or hotel staff: in such a case, the guest must of course inform the hotel-keeper of the claim, but there is insufficient reason to protect the interests of the hotel-keeper to the detriment of interests of the guest.

Illustration 9
A guest succeeds in proving that a chambermaid has stolen his wallet. The fact that the guest told the hotel-keeper about the theft only at the time when he was able to prove the chambermaid had taken the wallet does not deprive him of his right to damages.

The hotel-keeper may, in principle, limit or exclude liability in the same manner as a storer may. However, in a contract with a hotel-keeper, the relevant damage almost always pertains to the personal belongings of the guest, even if the guest is a travelling salesman. Given the fact that the amount of damages that would have to be paid is almost always relatively low, limitation or exclusion of the hotel-keeper's liability should not be possible if the damage was caused intentionally or by way of grossly negligent behaviour of the hotel-keeper or hotel staff. Paragraph (4) therefore provides that a term excluding or limiting the liability of the hotel-keeper even in such cases is deemed to be unfair for the purposes of the rules on unfair contract terms in Book II, Chapter 9. Those rules are mandatory.

E. Relation to the Convention on the Liability of Hotel-Keepers concerning the Property of Their Guests

The present Article closely follows the Convention by copying the annex to that Convention, except the provisions on the limitation of liability. As to that exception: the Convention allows parties to the Convention to impose different limitations. Given the general rules on unfair contract terms in Book II, Chapter 9, it seems sufficient in the present Article to include a specific provision banning limitation and exclusion clauses that apply to damage caused intentionally or by way of grossly negligent behaviour on the part of the hotel-keeper or his staff.

NOTES

I. Application of storage rules to hotel-keepers

1. In some legal systems, the rules on storage contracts are applied by statutory provision to the liability of hotel-keepers. Cf. AUSTRIA, CC § 970(1), BELGIUM, CC arts. 1952 ff, FRANCE, CC art. 1952; GERMANY, CC §§ 701 ff; ITALY, CC arts. 1783-1786; THE NETHERLANDS, CC art. 7:609; SPAIN, CC art. 1783. The hotel-keeper can escape liability only by proving that the damage is not caused by the keeper or hotel staff or another person who has come to the hotel, cf. Austria, Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^2, § 970 no. 13; ENGLAND, Shacklock v. Ethorpe Ltd. [1939] 3 All ER 372; SCOTLAND, Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland, para. 15.09; Spain, CC art. 1784. In Austria, the liability of the hotel-keeper is extended to the proprietor of a swimming pool (CC § 970(3)) and to rental contracts regarding private rooms or guesthouses, provided that the risk of an 'open house' exists, but not to hospitals, restaurants, boarding schools etc.; cf. Rummel [-Schubert], ABGB I^2, § 970 no. 2. In Italy, the rules applicable to hotel-keepers similarly apply to nursing homes, bathing establishments, boarding houses (pensioni), trattorias, sleeping carriages and others, cf. CC § 1786. Goods handed over to the hotel-keeper or hotel staff are considered to have been brought into the hotel, cf. Austria, CC § 970(2); ENGLAND, Charlesworth/Dobson/Schmitthoff, Charlesworth's Business Law^{16}, pp. 551-552. The same holds true for cars and their contents if they are parked in a designated area in Austria, CC § 970(2); France, CC art. 1953(3) and The Netherlands, Reehuis, Parlementaire geschiedenis van het nieuwe Burgerlijke Wetboek, Boek 7, 1991, p. 411; but not in England, Charlesworth/Dobson/Schmitthoff, Charlesworth's Business Law[16], pp. 551-552; Belgium, CC art. 1954 quater; in Belgium, the same provision excludes the hotel-keeper's liability for the animals brought to the hotel.

2. In BELGIUM, the client must report the damage immediately after becoming aware of it, otherwise all rights will be lost unless the damage has been caused negligently by the hotel-keeper or hotel staff, cf. CC art. 1954bis. The same holds true for AUSTRIA, where in addition a formal claim must be brought before the court within 30 days, cf. CC § 967; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], p. 189.

3. Liability of hotel-keepers is regulated separately in the POLISH CC arts. 846-852. The general rule (CC art. 846 para. 1) is that the persons who run hotels and similar establishments for profit are liable for the loss of, or the damage to, the things brought in by persons availing themselves of the services of the hotel or a similar establishment unless the damage resulted from the nature of the thing brought in, or force majeure, or was caused solely by a fault of the guest or his or her employee or visitor.

4. FINLAND is one of the countries which has not ratified the Convention on the Liability of Hotel-Keepers. Liability thus follows general contractual principles (see Sisula-Tulokas, Hotel Liability).

5. Although the SPANISH CC seems to require the client to notify the hotel-keeper of the introduction of things brought to the hotel, according to the authors, an express notification is not an essential requirement for the application of the CC art. 1783: a mere introduction of the objects, as long as it is not hidden, suffices (Martín Santisteban, El depósito y la responsabilidad del depositario, p.165). However, if the client does not follow the instructions given by the hotel-keeper as to the vigilance to be exercised in relation to the object introduced, the latter is not liable for any loss or damage which occurs (SAP Zaragoza 10 July 2001, AC 2001/1804).

II. Specific limitations to the hotel-keeper's liability

6. When the hotel-keeper or staff is the cause of the damage or the thing has been handed over into the care of the hotel-keeper, the hotel-keeper cannot limit liability in AUSTRIA, cf. OGH, SZ 55/7; BELGIUM, cf. CC art. 1953 para. 2; FRANCE, CC art. 1953 para. 2; GERMANY, CC § 702; ITALY, CC art. 1784; possibly also ENGLAND, Charlesworth/Dobson/Schmitthoff, Charlesworth's Business Law[16], p. 552. The hotel may require valuable objects to be handed over and may decline liability otherwise in Austria, OGH, EvBl 1977/245. In other cases, the hotel-keeper's liability is limited in Austria to € 1.100 for most objects and to € 550 in the case of precious objects, money or securities, cf. CC art. 970a. In England and SCOTLAND, under the Hotel Proprietors Act 1956, the hotel-keeper is liable for no greater amount than £50 for one article or a total of £100 per guest. In Belgium, France, Italy, the ceiling is set at 100 times the amount of the daily accommodation, cf. CC art. 1953 para. 3, CC art. 1953 para. 3, CC art. 1783 para. 3. In GERMANY, the same ceiling exists, with a minimum of € 600 and a maximum of € 3.500; in the case of money, securities and other precious things such as fur not used as clothes, a maximum of € 800 applies, cf. CC § 702. In FRANCE, liability for damage to or loss of objects placed in the client's car, parked at a closed parking place belonging to the hotel, is limited to 50 times the amount of the daily accommodation, cf. CC art. 1953 para. 3. Further exclusions or limitations of liability is are void; cf. Austria, CC § 970a;

Belgium, CC art. 1954ter; Italy, CC art. 1785. In POLAND liability of the hotel-keeper in the case of the loss of or damage to the things brought in is limited to 100 times the payment for one night's lodging; however liability for one thing cannot exceed 50 times the value of such payment (CC art. 849 para. 1). These limitations do not apply if the hotel-keeper accepted the things for safe-keeping or refused to accept them, although was obliged to do so, as well as in a case, when the damage results from the intentional fault or gross negligence of the hotel-keeper or hotel staff (CC art. 849 para. 2).

7. Under SPANISH law, the only situations calling for the exemption the hotel-keeper from liability are when the loss or damage was caused by force majeure or an armed robbery (CC art. 1784).

III. Specific right to withhold return of goods for hotel-keeper

8. As a counterbalance to the hotel-keeper's liability, the hotel-keeper is awarded a specific right of retention of the things brought to the hotel until all charges have been paid by the client and for which the hotel would be held liable in case of damage, cf. AUSTRIA, CC § 970c; ENGLAND, Charlesworth/Dobson/ Schmitthoff, Charlesworth's Business Law[16], p. 552; FRANCE, CC art. 2102 para. 3; GERMANY, CC § 704; THE NETHERLANDS, CC art. 7:609 para. 3; POLAND, CC 850; SCOTLAND, Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland, para. 37.24.

9. SPANISH law establishes only a right to retain the thing by the storer until the client pays the expenses incurred in order to maintain the thing in its original condition (CC art. 1780), but there is no such rule regarding the costs of keeping the thing and this problem has not been treated by the case law.

CHAPTER 6: DESIGN

IV.C.–6:101: Scope

(1) This Chapter applies to contracts under which one party, the designer, undertakes to design for another party, the client:

(a) an immovable structure which is to be constructed by or on behalf of the client; or
(b) a movable or incorporeal thing or service which is to be constructed or performed by or on behalf of the client.

(2) A contract under which one party undertakes to design and to supply a service which consists of carrying out the design is to be considered as primarily a contract for the supply of the subsequent service.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The act of designing can be described as the initial stage of a process in which conceptual or detailed (technical) ideas are put on paper by one party (the designer) for another party (the client). The second stage of the process consists in the realisation of these ideas, usually by a constructor under a separate construction contract. However, design may be part not only of construction projects but also of, e. g., industrial projects, software, fashion or logistics schemes. The present Chapter basically applies to the design of new immovable structures but can also be applied to the design of movable or incorporeal things and to the design of a service.

Illustration 1
A well-known brewery requests a designer to design a drinking glass for a new type of beer. The present Chapter applies.

The rules of this Chapter also apply to contracts under which the designer, apart from the design activity, has to carry out other services. In that situation, this Chapter applies only to the design part of the contract. (See II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts)). If the contract obliges the designer to carry out the design as well, for instance by constructing a new structure or by processing an existing movable or intangible thing, paragraph (2) provides that the contract is to be regarded as primarily one for supplying the subsequent service. This means that the rules applicable to the subsequent service will prevail in any case of conflict: the design rules will be applied only subsidiarily and only so far as necessary to regulate the design parts of the contract (II.–1:107 paragraphs (2) and (3)).

Illustration 2
A designer and a client concluded a contract under which the designer is to design and construct a building. The rules of the present Chapter do not apply if and in so far as its rules conflict with the provisions of the Chapter on Construction. If the latter Chapter is silent on a particular issue, the rules of this Chapter may however apply so far as necessary.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The main question is whether the Chapter should cover only the traditional design contracts (in the field of construction) or also other types of design activity, such as software design, fashion design and, more generally, the design of any type of movable thing.

Another question is whether the Chapter should apply only to design contracts or also to design contracts in combination with another service contract (e. g. construction and processing). The extensive approach by which the rules of the present Chapter are applicable to the design part of a mixed contract would have the advantage of providing for a similar regulation for two rather similar activities. Indeed, in a certain aspect, the design activity on the one hand and the carrying out of the design on the other hand are not very different for these activities are both oriented towards creating a structure.

On the other hand, the limited approach – by which a mixed contract involving the activity of designing is entirely governed by the provisions for the subsequent activity – has the advantage of avoiding borderline issues and will probably limit litigation. This may also be justified by the fact that, in practice, the quality of the design – and therefore the liability of the designer – is assessed after the design has been carried out. The rules on the subsequent service, carried out by the author of the design, will then suffice.

C. Comparative overview

In most of the European legal systems, there is no specific statutory law on design contracts. Usually, design contracts are dealt with in rules on more general contracts, such as service contracts (or contracts for work), construction contracts or assignment contracts. However, the design contract is also extensively dealt with in standard terms, which are frequently used in most European countries. In Belgium and France, standard terms are of less importance because there is mandatory statutory law dealing with the legal status and liability of architects but in the Netherlands, England, Germany, Scotland and Sweden standard contract terms are often of greater significance than the rather general rules on contract law (though only to the extent that the contracting parties actually agreed on the standard contract terms).

D. Preferred option

The option preferred here is to apply the design rules primarily to the case where the design is for the construction of an immovable structure but to apply the rules also to other design activities, such as the design of movable or incorporeal things: fashion, websites or art design. This is provided for in paragraph (1). The underlying idea of this extensive scope of application is that all design activities involve rather similar processes and can therefore be governed by the same rules.

As regards mixed contracts involving design and another service, the general rules on mixed contracts in II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts) apply. The rules of this Chapter apply to the design part of such mixed contracts and the rules applicable to the other service (e. g. supervision of the actual carrying out of the design by another service provider, marketing and publicity services) will apply to the other part of the contract. However, if the other service consists of the carrying out of the design, paragraph (2), when read with II.–1:107 paragraphs (2) and (3), gives priority to the provisions governing the subsequent service. The provisions for design will only apply in the event that the provisions for the other service do not contain rules concerning a particular issue and only so far as there is no conflict with those other rules.

A new cooling system for the production of flat screens for televisions is being designed and applied by a service provider under a single contract. The provisions of the Chapter on Processing apply and prevail over the provisions on design.

So, for example, the Processing rules on limitation of liability and conformity will apply and not the Design rules. However, the design rules on keeping records will apply since the rules on processing do not provide for keeping records of design documents.

Where the contract is for design, construction and sale of a movable, the combined effect of paragraph (2) of the present Article and the rule in IV.A.–1:102 (Goods to be manufactured or produced) may be that the sales rules will be those which apply, particularly in relation to conformity and remedies for non-conformity. The rationale for this is that in such a case the design and construction are simply means to an end: the client is interested in the end product.

The contractual duties of a designer often include supervision of the service to be undertaken subsequently. This is, of course, especially the case with an architect or engineer who undertakes to supervise the building or construction work carried out on the basis of the design. However, this may also apply to a software designer who supervises the actual production of the designed software program. The rules in this Chapter are, however, not based on the presumption that the duty to supervise is implied in the duty to design. Although it is true that supervision can be performed in connection with a design service, in practice supervision is also supplied as a separate service. This is the reason why this Chapter does not contain rules on supervision. Supervision services will be subject to the rules of Chapter 2 (Rules Applying to Service Contracts in General).

NOTES

I. Regulation of design contracts

1. In most of the legal systems there is some regulation of design contracts. However this is not always expressly provided for in a civil code, nor is it always explicitly stated. It can implicitly follow from legal terms or derive from other kind of regulation. The countries that have regulated the design contract in their civil code are the following, AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, FRANCE, GERMANY, GREECE, ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS, POLAND, PORTUGAL and SPAIN. In Austria and Belgium the design contract is qualified as a service contract. In Belgium however, the design contract can also be defined as a building contract. In France the design contract is called contrat d´entreprise or louage d´ouvrage (and sometimes mandat). This also goes for Portugal, where the empreidata is similar to le contrat d´entreprise. Polish and Dutch contract law have the similarity that the design contract is qualified as an assignment contract, or overeenkomst van opdracht. In some other countries the design contract is placed in the category of contracts for work, see Germany and Greece. In German law a distinction has been made in case law between the regulation for a design and an architect contract. In Italy design contracts are regarded as contracts for an intellectual service. Spanish law does not know a specific rule or definition for the design contract; it falls under the scope of the general construction contract for which the Spanish Building Act is of great importance. Besides the Civil Code regulation, in Belgium and France deontological rules are significant, codified in the Déontologische Norm no. 2 and le Code de Déontologie des Architectes. Thus, in most of the legal systems the design contract is embedded in the civil code in one way or another. In England the regulation of design and build contracts is rather extensive but separate legislation on design contracts does not exist. However there are many statutory provisions applicable to design contracts, such as the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, the Defective Premises Act 1997, the Building Act 1984 and the Damages Act 1996. In the Construction (Design and Management) Regulations 1994 some obligations have been imposed on the designer concerning health and safety. The last of these also applies in SCOTLAND, which is otherwise somewhat dependent on the general principles of contract law. Part III of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996 contains rules on architects. Furthermore, the Architects Act 1997 and The Architects' Qualifications (EC Recognition) Order 1988 provide deontological rules for architects. In the Building Act 2003 general rules are established for the architect as well. In the Building Act 2003 general rules are established for the architect as well. In SWEDEN design contracts are governed by general contract law.

II. Importance of standard terms

2. In general, in the field of construction law, standard terms are of great importance. In international construction contracts the FIDIC (Fédération Internationale Des Ingenieurs-Conseils) conditions are commonly used. Most of the national systems know standard contract terms. In THE NETHERLANDS, for example, there are widely used standard terms for design contracts involving architects and constructors. These standard terms are in practice far more important than the Dutch Civil Code. For design contracts, especially the SR 1997 (Standaardvoorwaarden 1997 Rechtsverhouding opdrachtgever-architect), RVOI 2001 (Regeling van de verhouding tussen opdrachtgever en adviserend ingenieursbureau) and DNR 2005 (De Nieuwe Regeling 2005, Rechtsverhouding opdrachtgever-architect, ingenieur en adviseur) are applicable. The position is similar in ENGLAND, where the law regulating the services of architects is mainly based on standard contract terms such as the Standard Forms of JCT (Joint Contracts Tribunal) Contract (for building contracts), the SFA/99 (Standard Form of Agreement for the Appointment of an Architect) and the ICE (Institution of Civil Engineers) Form of Contract. There are SCOTTISH editions of these forms (see e.g. Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 128 (with updates)). Concerning health and safety regulations, the Construction (Design and Management) Regulations 1994 are applicable in both England and Scotland. Concerning health and safety regulations, the Construction (Design and Management) Regulations 1994 are applicable. SWEDEN too makes use of many standard terms for design contracts. Here the ABK 96 (Allmänna bestämmelser för konsultuppdrag inom arkitekt och ingenjörsverksamhet av år 1996), the AB 04 (Allmänna bestämmelser för byggnads-, anläggnings- och installationsentreprenader), the BKR Regulations and the Building Regulations (BRR) can be applied. The situation in FINLAND is very similar. Of importance are e.g. KSE 1995, General Conditions for Consulting, YSE 1998, General Conditions for Building Contracts and RT 10-10836, Small Houses, Designers Consumer Contract, Scope of Works. Also the Consumer Protection Act is used as a set of standard contract terms. In GERMANY the Honorarordnung für Architekten und Ingenieure (HOAI) is applicable to architects' contracts. In AUSTRIA the O-Norm is used as a standard contract term and in SPAIN the Basic Norms on Construction can be used for design contracts as well. On the other hand, in POLAND and PORTUGAL national standard conditions on design contracts do not exist. In Poland the contracting parties themselves have the ability to make use of self-regulation and in Portugal sometimes the ICE Form of Contract are used. In FRANCE and Belgium the mandatory statutory laws on the liability of the designer are far more important that standard contract terms. In DENMARK the standard condition of sale, work and delivery and the FIDIC are being used. In GREECE the Consumer Protection Act 2251/1994 is being used.

IV.C.–6:102: Pre-contractual duty to warn

The designer's pre-contractual duty to warn requires in particular the designer to warn the client in so far as the designer lacks special expertise in specific problems which require the involvement of specialists.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article imposes a specific duty on the designer to inform and to warn the client before the contract is concluded. This duty is a particularisation of the pre-contractual duty of any service provider to warn under IV.C.–2:102 (Pre-contractual duties to warn), which states that both contracting parties are to exchange information about the service to be provided. Because the designer will base the performance of the design service upon the wishes and needs of the client, the designer will have to warn the client in time id any failures or inconsistencies are noticed. This means that the designer will have to point out to the client which additional experts may be needed in order to carry out the design optimally. As the designer may not have all the expertise required to achieve the result the client has in mind, the designer will have to warn the client if such expertise is needed. Failure to warn may lead to the result envisaged by the client not being achieved by the designer.

> Illustration 1
> A designer recognises that special analysis of the soil is needed and that he is not able to carry out such analysis himself. Before the contract is concluded, the designer warns the client and recommends the employment of a geodesist.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The main question here is whether, apart form the general pre-contractual duty to warn, the designer should have a specific duty to inform the client when he lacks the special expertise to deal with problems that require the involvement of specialists. In favour of such a duty it can be argued that design is a very complex activity, often requiring knowledge about many fields and that it is reasonable to expect the designer to inform the client of any need there may be to engage further experts.

> In order to design the body of a car, the designer needs to be knowledgeable not only about aesthetics and aerodynamics, but also about the functioning of the engine and legal requirements concerning safety. If the designer does not have all this expertise, it is reasonable to expect the client to be warned before the contract is concluded of the need to hire specialists.

On the other hand, it could be argued that, if at the time of the conclusion of the contract the designer does not have all the expertise necessary, it is up to the designer to hire specialists during the performance of the service. This will in any case be required in order to supply a design fit for its purpose. However, the client may want to know before deciding to conclude the contract whether the designer has the necessary expertise, as this will probably save time and costs.

C. Comparative overview

The pre-contractual duty of the designer to warn is not commonly accepted in the European legal systems. An express rule on this duty could not be found. The pre-contractual duty to warn is usually derived from other general duties such as good faith, the contractual duty to inform and the contractual duty to warn the client (Belgium, France, Germany and Spain). Sometimes it is also established in case law (the Netherlands and Portugal), but it has not been found in enacted law.

D. Preferred option

It seems preferable to place a duty on the designer to inform the client in so far as the designer lacks special expertise regarding specific problems which require the involvement of specialists. Exchange of information needs to take place before the conclusion of the contract. This will allow the client to make an informed decision about the designer. Furthermore, it will allow both contracting parties to decide whether any specialists needed will be engaged by the client or by the designer.

The duty of the designer to warn – whether pre-contractual or contractual – has become one of the central issues in general construction law and related areas. Many disputes are eventually dealt with by deciding whether the designer was under a duty to warn the client or not. This rule, when read along with the general pre-contractual duty to warn under IV.C.–2:102 (Pre-contractual duties to warn), is intended to help to resolve such questions. The sanctions for breach of the duty are those laid down in that Article.

If the designer does warn the client before a contract is concluded that additional expertise will be needed, then it will be up to the client to decide how to react. In some cases the client may decide not to conclude a contract at all.

> A house owner wishes to have a design for the installation of solar panels and approaches an ordinary architect. The architect warns the client that he has no expertise in this specialised area but could do the plans for any structural alterations necessary. He supplies the names of some specialists. On making further enquiries the client discovers that the design and installation of a system would be much more expensive than thought and decides not to proceed with any contract.

If the client does decide to proceed with the contract it may be expected that the parties would resolve the question of whether the employment and payment of specialists is to be part of the designer's functions under the contract or if it is to be left to the client to conclude separate contracts with the necessary specialists. This would clearly have a significant bearing on the price. In practice the designer would take care not to undertake any obligation which would imply the possession of expertise which has already been expressly disclaimed. For these reasons, and because the post-warning situations could be very varied, it is not thought that a default rule on who has to engage specialists is necessary or desirable.

1. There is not much in the way of express regulation of this question in the national laws. Some countries have no regulation, some have an implicit regulation and in some there are rules which could possibly be used as the basis of a pre-contractual duty to warn.

2. In AUSTRIAN architectural law a pre-contractual duty of the designer to warn does not exist. In BELGIUM a pre-contractual duty to inform is commonly recognised: a pre-contractual duty to warn however cannot be found. Verbeke [-Deketelaere and Schoups], Handboek Bouwrecht, p. 418). In FRANCE the designer is under a contractual obligation to inform the client, but there is no such pre-contractual duty. In GERMAN contract law in CC § 241(2) and § 311(2) no. 1 rule of equity has been established which controls the pre-contractual phase in contract law, including the pre-contractual duty to warn. The position is similar in SPAIN. In ENGLAND the duty to warn of the designer is accepted even in the pre-contractual stage of the parties' relationship (Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], p. 542, no. 4-100). There are some countries in which the pre-contractual duty to warn might be established from the general principle of good faith. So in GREECE, ITALY and PORTUGAL the pre-contractual duty to warn is implicitly covered by good faith. In Italy a breach of that duty (CC art. 1337) may lead to pre-contractual liability (CC art. 1338). And in Portugal case law has explicitly acknowledged the principle of good faith in the pre-contractual phase in design contracts (STJ 17 June 1998, BolMinJus 1978, 351). It is the same in THE NETHERLANDS where in case law a pre-contractual phase between contracting parties has been established. (HR 18th June 1982 (Plas/Valburg) NedJur 1983, 723) However, a pre-contractual duty to warn has not been explicitly established in this matter. The pre-contractual duty to warn has not been explicitly described in the existing codes and regulations in Dutch law.

3. In SCOTLAND an architect's professional duty to the client may entail providing advice amounting to warnings, e.g. on comparative shortcomings of a design, costs, suitability of a site (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' paras. 131-135). In the FINNISH Consumer Protection Act, chap. 8, s. 14 there is a general duty to inform the consumer.

4. SPANISH law lacks a similar rule on a necessary pre-contractual warning. Nevertheless, the general provision of the CC art. 1270 is applicable, as the designer is obliged by the good faith duty (CC art. 1258) and the lack of warning, if the other party had concluded the contract trusting in the abilities of the designer, is considered a wilful misconduct that makes the contract void.

IV.C.–6:103: Obligation of skill and care

The designer's obligation of skill and care requires in particular the designer to:

(a) attune the design work to the work of other designers who contracted with the client, to enable there to be an efficient performance of all services involved;

(b) integrate the work of other designers which is necessary to ensure that the design will conform to the contract;

(c) include any information for the interpretation of the design which is necessary for a user of the design of average competence (or a specific user made known to the designer at the conclusion of the contract) to give effect to the design;

(d) enable the user of the design to give effect to the design without violation of public law rules or interference based on justified third-party rights of which the designer knows or could reasonably be expected to know; and

(e) provide a design which allows economic and technically efficient realisation.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The present Article is a specification for design contracts of the general obligation of skill and care that is imposed upon any service provider under IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care). According to paragraph (a), the designer is to attune the design to the work of other designers with whom the client has contracted so as to enable there to be an efficient performance of all the services involved.

Illustration 1
An aesthetic designer is engaged to design a new type of sports car for a well-known car manufacturer. While doing the work, the designer will have to attune the work to the technical design for the car, which is supplied by another designer hired by the client.

According to paragraph (b), attuning of the design to the work of other designers may include integrating their work.

Illustration 2
While designing a new sports centre, the main construction designer will have to integrate into the design the work done by other designers such as those designing the air conditioning system and the floor coating.

According to paragraph (c), the designer is to include the necessary information for the interpretation of the design that is needed to perform the subsequent service.

Illustration 3
A fashion designer is requested to design a new men's clothes fashion line. After completion of the design, the designer will have to give all the information to the client which is reasonably necessary to enable the client, or another party on the client's behalf, to start producing the clothes.

The designer must either focus on a user of average competence or on a specific user made known to the designer at the time of conclusion of the design contract. If special needs of a particular user of the design are made known after the conclusion of the contract, the rules of IV.C.–2:107 (Directions of the client) apply, i.e. such a direction would probably have to be accepted by the designer, but additional costs would have to be borne by the client.

For the design to be fit for its purpose it will have to be in accordance with public law provisions and will have to respect private rights, as established in paragraph (d) of the present Article.

Illustration 4
A timetable for public transport is being designed. The designer has to take into account the fact that buses are not to exceed speed limits.

Illustration 5
An architect is requested to design a house which is to be built on land that is subject to a servitude or other right of a third party. The architect will have to take this fact into account when designing the house.

The designer is to have reasonable knowledge of public law rules as well as of third-party rights. It is not the designer's responsibility to obtain permits or licences, unless agreed otherwise, but the designer has to make the design in accordance with public law provisions. There will often be some uncertainty about whether work based on the design will be granted permission. Political decisions in particular cannot be foreseen. A reasonable service provider is not expected to foresee what cannot reasonably be foreseen.

A very important issue in design concerns economical and technically efficient planning. A corresponding duty is stated in paragraph (e). This provision implies the duty to stay within the cost estimate of the client, not to make any mistakes in the calculation of the costs and not to include any parts or steps in the process of the subsequent service that are unnecessary.

Illustration 6
A municipality wants to have a low-cost bus station designed. The designer, who would prefer to include modern but expensive materials in the design, must pay attention to not exceeding the client's cost limits.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The designer is – like any other service provider – under the general obligation of skill and care laid down in IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care). It may be asked whether additional, specific duties are needed for design contracts.

On the one hand it could be argued that the general rules are flexible enough and comprehensive enough to cover all that needs to be covered. On the other hand it could be argued that there are special features of the design contract which make some extra specification useful even if it is not essential. It could avoid disputes and save expense to have a checklist of the most important obligations of the designer regarding the care and skill required. Standard terms often specify such obligations but there are cases where standard terms are not used and where default rules could be useful.

C. Preferred option

Although a general rule on the obligation of skill and care already exists, it is thought useful to add some necessary elements which are typical for the obligation of skill and care to be expected from designers. The particular duties imposed by the present Article will induce the designer to make a design which meets the wishes and needs of the client. The paragraphs of this Article describe the most important tasks a designer has to carry out during the design process. One idea behind this Article is to encourage a very close relationship between the client and the designer. They are dependent on each other for the creation of a design that is in conformity with the contract.

This Article must be read in conjunction with the general provision in IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care).

NOTES

I. Designer's obligation of skill and care

1. In all European legal systems a general obligation of skill and care applicable to designers has been established. Mostly this obligation does not only concern the designer but every contracting party. In ENGLAND, for example, a service must be performed with professional workmanship. The implied duty of the designer is to carry out the contractual obligations with reasonable care and skill. This means 'the standard required of the ordinary skilled and competent practitioner in the profession concerned' (James, Construction law[2], pp. 148-149; Bolam v. Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 WLR 582, at 587). This duty is usually laid down in standard contract terms. See for example (JCT, ICE, SFA99). The duty is also recognised in the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 and in case law. The Defective Premises Act 1972 s.1 also provides for such a general duty. (See generally May, Keating on Building Contracts[6], p. 347. The position is not dissimilar in POLAND. According to the CC art. 355 para. 1, the designer as a professional must perform with due diligence. The Supreme Court has clarified (SN 25 September 2002, I CKN 971/100, Lex no. 56902) that the due diligence of the professional does not mean any exceptional diligence, but a diligence adjusted to the acting party, the subject and the circumstances in which obligations are to be performed.
2. In FRANCE the designer is in principle under an obligation of result: therefore the duty of care is of no relevance in principle. The architect must furthermore apply les règles de l´art (Malinvaud, Dalloz Action Construction, no. 36). Therefore in general FRENCH contract law the garantie de bonne exécution has been established.
3. Sometimes the principle of good faith and usages imply the duty of care of the designer In GERMAN contract law the duty of care is based on the good faith provision in CC § 242. The Building and Technical Regulations (Regeln der Baukunst und Technik) must also be followed by the designer. The latter duty is considered to be a minimum standard for the care to be performed by the designer (Niestrate, Die Architektenhaftung[2], p. 14). For determining the standard of technique that is required the DIN-Normen (DIN standards) and the VDI-Richtlinien (VDI guidelines) are important. Especially when new materials and techniques will have to be used in the design or construction, the architect should be extra careful and should therefore be in full agreement with the client on this matter (Niestrate, Die Architektenhaftung[2], pp. 14-15). In SPAIN also good faith is the usual basis of the designer's duty of care.

Spanish law however also contains an explicit standard of care in CC art. 1104. In PORTUGAL too, good faith is the basis of the duty of care (CC art. 762 para. 2).

4. In AUSTRIA (CC §§ 1279 and 1299), GREECE (CC art. 330), ITALY (CC art. 1176 para. 2), THE NETHERLANDS (CC art. 7:401, SR 1997 art. 13 para. 4, DNR 2005 art. 11 para. 1a and 2), PORTUGAL (CC art. 1208) a general standard of care is also included; SCOTLAND (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 135). A designer must exercise the skills of a reasonably competent representative of that profession. In BELGIUM a general duty of care of the designer is not established in the CC, but the Reglement van Beroepsplichten. Art. 1 para. 3 requires that the designer performs the service with due competence and efficiency and according to the state of the art. In SWEDEN the standard conditions provide for a good professional practice (ABK 1996 art. 4:1, AB 04 art. 2:1 (2) and BSF 1998:39). The situation is much the same in FINLAND. According e.g. KSE 1995 3.11. the consultant in the capacity of an expert must perform the assigned task in a professional and objective manner in compliance with good technical practice and attempt to achieve the objectives jointly agreed upon. According to the Consumer Protection Act, chap. 8, s. 12, a service must be provided with professional skill and care. The general duty of care is usually based on the principle of due diligence and performance in accordance with the leges artis. The requirements of the design being in conformity with the state of the art are accepted in every legal system researched. Each country however has its own specifications. In SPAIN the service must be performed according to the leges artis and in a professional way. The duty of care in the specific profession of a designer is commonly measured by the standard of a reasonably competent representative of that profession.

II. Specific rules on the duty of care

5. There are some specific rules on the duty of care which occur in most of the legal systems. These are the duty to make a design that is in compliance with the public and private legal and regulatory rules. Thus the designer will have to take account of the legislation applicable to the design activity. This specific duty of care is established in the legislation of BELGIUM (Reglement van Beroepsplichten art. 17), FRANCE (implicitly follows from general contract law), England (JCT clause 6.1), ITALY (according to the disciplinary rules) and THE NETHERLANDS (SR 1997 art. 11 and DNR 2005 art. 11) and Spain (LOE art. 10 and 11 para. 2).

6. The duty of the designer to make a design that is technically, financially and professionally feasible is also generally established. So in FRANCE the designer has to take into account the available budget and in Italy the disciplinary rules require the technical and professional preparation of the design. In THE NETHERLANDS the SR 1997, art. 11 and DNR 2005 art 11, require the designer to make a technically and financially feasible design and to have full competence to perform the service.

7. Other duties are also found. In the PORTUGUESE Architects' Statutes (Estatuo da Ordem dos Arquitectos, Decreto-Lei no. 176/98), art. 49 para. 1, the designer is required to perform the service with due professionalism, efficiency, loyalty, knowledge, creativity and talent. Under the SPANISH Building Code art. 10 para. 2, the designer has to comply with applicable knowledge-based and professional requirements. The ITALIAN disciplinary rules are rather detailed and include duties to carry out the duty in conformity with existing regulations, in conformity with the contract and with respect to the general interest of society, to carry out technical and professional preparation and to safeguard the client's best interests. Another common duty is the duty of the designer to examine the existing circumstances and surroundings and the condition of the soil. In BELGIUM and FRANCE this too stems from general contract law.

8. In BELGIUM the Reglement van Beroepsplichten (art. 17) imposes a duty on the designer to observe professional secrecy. In ENGLAND the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 requires the designer to operate in a good and workmanlike manner and to use materials of good quality. The duty may normally be discharged by following established practice. In GERMANY the Honorarordnung für Architekten und Ingenieure (HOAI) art. 15 contains very specific regulations on several matters. (Locher, Das private Baurecht[5], pp. 181-185). Besides rules on the remuneration of the designer, there are rules on what the specific duties of the architect are concerning the preparation of the design activity and cooperation during the putting out to tender of the design. Some of the specific duties mentioned are the choice of specialists to be made by the architect, the duty to inform the client on new materials to be used in the construction, the duty to provide information about the licences required for the construction, and the duty to provide information about financial and fiscal aspects of the design (Niestrate, Die Architektenhaftung[2], pp. 103-113).

9. In SPAIN the standard of care required in carrying out the obligation of design in a construction process is regulated by the norms on the profession (leges artis). The architect will be liable for failure to carry out the obligations in accordance with the current techniques on construction (TS 26 February 2004, RJ 2004/1647). In the Spanish Building Code art. 10 para. 2, is provided that the designer should "hold the pertinent academic and professional degrees in architecture and engineering, whichever applies" and should meet "the conditions established for practising the profession in question". Further the designer should prepare the project in accordance with the legislation in force and under the terms of the contract and should submit the project with all the necessary approvals.

IV.C.–6:104: Conformity

(1) The design does not conform to the contract unless it enables the user of the design to achieve a specific result by carrying out the design with the skill and care which could reasonably be expected.

(2) The client is not entitled to invoke a remedy for non-conformity if a direction provided by the client under IV.C.–2:107 (Directions of the client) is the cause of the non-conformity and the designer performed the obligation to warn under IV.C.–2:108 (Contractual obligation of the service provider to warn).

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The effect of the Article is that the design must be fit for its purpose. Design is to be seen as the starting point for a subsequent service, such as construction or processing. If the design is not fit for its purpose, the subsequent service cannot be carried out in a way which will meet the client's expectations.

This Article provides further specification, for design services, of the obligation to achieve the required result. The reasonable client may expect a designer to achieve the particular result through the performance of the service requested. Paragraph (1) states that the design is not in conformity with the contract unless it enables the client to achieve a specific result by carrying out the design, according to the standard of care required.

> Illustration 1
> An architect's firm has been requested to make a design for the restoration of a historical building. The facade with its fabulous step gable is to be integrated in the design. However, the step gable is not included, and this means that the subsequent service of the constructor will not be in conformity with the client's wishes. The designer did not perform the obligation under the present Article.

> Illustration 2
> In the same example, the design turns out to have perfectly integrated the step gabled facade of the building, but the constructor does not renovate the facade in the way set out in the design. Here, the designer did meet the obligation under the present Article, even though the result envisaged by the client has not been achieved.

The rule in the Article is a default rule, applying unless the parties agree otherwise.

If the design is defective, as a result of which the subsequent service cannot be carried out in conformity with the requirements of the subsequent contract, the designer and the subsequent service provider may have solidary liability, particularly if the subsequent service provider failed to perform an obligation to warn of the risk. This means that the client can claim damages from both.

When the design is not in conformity with the contract due to a direction of the client and the designer did not fail to perform an obligation to warn, the client is not entitled to invoke a remedy for the non-conformity. This follows from paragraph (2).

Illustration 3
An architect is requested by a housing company to design a new apartment building in the centre of the city, with sufficient parking space in the basement of the building. During the design process the client instructs the designer to change the initial design of the basement so as to ensure that the residents will have more room for storage. The designer warns the client that this will result in fewer parking spaces, but the client is determined. When the design is completed, it appears that there is not enough room for all the residents' cars. Since the designer warned the client of the risk, the client is not entitled to invoke a remedy for this non-conformity of the design.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Design liability is an important issue for both parties. The difficult question is the basis on which the liability of the designer should be established. This may either be a failure to exercise the design activity with the care and skill required, or the fact that the design service did not achieve the result that was expected by the client.

When liability for the defective design is established on the latter basis, the designer will have to remedy defects even when the designer met every relevant requirement regarding the assessment of the existing situation, the input of tools and materials in the design process and the skilful and careful carrying out of the design process. The only escape would be to show that one of the specific defences applied. This is the French approach, or the fitness-for-purpose test. When there is no fitness-for-purpose liability, the basic question will be whether the designer met the quality requirements in the course of the design process. In the first instance, one might argue that these two approaches are each other's opposites and that the designer's interests are best protected in the second approach. In practice, the differences may not be too big, however, especially when the burden of proving that all design process requirements have been met is put on the designer. In that case, the question would rather be which defences are allowed under both regimes. This question would be particularly relevant to those design defects the occurrence of which is difficult to prevent and to control by the designer. The French approach would seem more client-friendly as it gives the client the choice of suing one of the service providers involved in the whole project.

Problems may arise when the fitness-for-purpose test does not apply. It would seem to be inconsistent to hold the designer liable for more than the subsequent service provider. Choosing the French approach would then raise the question whether the scope of application of the present Article should be limited to contracts for designs to be realised by subsequent service providers that are under a similar fitness-for-purpose obligation.

An advantage of the French approach would be that the quality of the outcome of the design activity might be easier to establish and to discuss than the quality of the overall design process itself that leads to such an outcome. It may, for instance, be hard to establish which inadequate choices in the design process preceded the occurrence of the apparent defect in the outcome of that process. Likewise, it will be difficult to establish the amount of care the designer showed whilst making these choices. Hence, it appears that the legal and other administrative costs of the liability system that is based on the French approach will probably be lower.

One might argue that the French approach may work better in connection with a compulsory insurance system, as the designer would have to pre-finance the whole amount of compensation if held liable to the client. In addition, it would seem appropriate to ensure that the subsequent service provider participates in the insurance system as well. However, the costs of liability insurance may increase the price the client has to pay for the design service. Under the alternative liability system, where the designer is under a duty of care and skill only, the client will in many cases allow the designer to remedy the design defects anyhow because the client wishes to obtain a structure that is fit for its purpose. This means that the client will also pay an extra price for the remedying, be it under the heading of a price for extra work and not under the heading of an element of the initial price destined for the coverage of the strict liability.

The choice of an acceptable designer's liability system will also depend on the frequency with which the designer is not able to achieve the result the client has in mind. Normally, where it will be relatively easy for the designer to create a design that is fit for its purpose, rather stringent liability is more acceptable than in situations where it is uncertain whether a design fit for its purpose will be accomplished.

> An architect has been engaged by a municipality to design an underground station. As solid soil conditions are needed for such a construction the designer has thoroughly examined the subsoil. The subsoil turns out to be too swampy. In this situation, it will be difficult for the designer to create a design that will be fit for its purpose. Therefore stringent liability is not appropriate.

Taking normal precautions may under most circumstances prevent major defects. This may not be the case for innovative structures, where the occurrence of design defects is difficult to prevent and control beforehand. One might argue that for such situations, provided that the liability rule is of a default nature, parties can modulate their duties and obligations and come up with special contractual arrangements adjusting the liability regime to their specific needs.

The European legal systems are divided on the issue of conformity. Some countries have a fitness-for-purpose liability system; others have a liability system based on negligence. Yet others have a mixed system with elements of both approaches.

D. Preferred option

The present Article takes the fitness-for-purpose approach.

The reason for this choice is that it is easier for the client to prove that the outcome of the design process is not in conformity with the result envisaged, than to prove that the designer made inadequate choices in the course of the design process, as a result of which a defect occurred. It will be hard to reconstruct what occurred during the design process and what went wrong. Furthermore, if the design is not fit for its purpose, the designer will be in the best position to correct the failure in the design (in order to arrive at an improved version of the defective design), so that the constructor is able to repair the defective building. Improvement of the design can best be done by the original designer.

Given that, in general, the designer is expected to be able to create a design that is fit for its purpose, the approach adopted seems the more acceptable one. However, this rather stringent system of liability may sometimes create problems for the designer. For instance, when the client instructs the designer to use rather innovative structures for the design, the risk of defects in the design cannot be prevented or controlled beforehand. It may also be difficult for the designer to determine how the subsoil conditions, on the basis of which the building that is to be designed will be constructed, will be influenced by the actual construction of the building. This means that the designer is not always able to establish beforehand how the design and the conditions of the soil are to be attuned to one another. If the designer has conducted a state-of-the-art investigation and nevertheless overlooks something, the design will be defective and the designer will be liable under the present Article. In these difficult cases, the fitness-for-purpose test is a heavy burden on the designer, who will be held liable for the outcome of the design even though everything possible has been done to control that outcome. In this case, parties may safeguard the interests of the designer by explicitly deviating in the contract from the stringent liability system. The designer may also insert a limitation clause in the contract with the client. This choice of approach may have as a consequence that a compulsory insurance system is needed to cover the main risks of the designing process.

NOTES

I. Conformity of the design

1. The obligation to perform the designing service in conformity with the client's expectations and the contract is a frequently occurring rule in the legal systems studied. In some countries it is established in the national Civil Code. So FRANCE has a rule (CC art. 1792) that requires the design to be in accordance with the needs and wishes of the client. The designer has the duty to render a design in conformity with the result envisaged by the client while concluding the underlying contract. Thus in France the fitness for purpose system is used to establish the designer's liability. A similar rule can be found in ITALY (CC art. 1176 para. 2), POLAND (CC arts. 556, 568, 737 and 638) and PORTUGAL (CC art. 1208, and cf Moitinho de Almeida, BolMinJus 228 (1973), pp. 10 ff), where it is also stated that the design must be in conformity with the contract. In GREECE it is general contract law that the design has to conform to the expectations of the client and be of the required quality, which is an obligation of result. When the required result is not met, this presupposes liability.

2. In SWEDEN, FINLAND, THE NETHERLANDS, ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, SPAIN and the rules on conformity of the design are often set out in standard contract terms but the underlying legal position is that the designer is under an obligation to use the required degree of care and skill, an obligation of means. According to the AB 04 art. 2:1 (Sweden), the design has to conform to the contract but the designer is under an obligation of means. According to KSE 1995 art. 3.21 (Finland) the conditions require the performance to be of good technical practice and attempt to achieve the objectives jointly agreed upon. In the SR 1997 art. 11 and DNR 2005 art. 11 (The Netherlands) the designer is under an obligation of means to meet the requirements of the client. In English law both the RIBA conditions and the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 provide rules on the conformity of the design. The RIBA conditions require the design to be suitable for its purpose, and so does the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, ss. 2-5. However, in general the designer is only expected to come up to the standard of the ordinary skilled person exercising and professing to have that special skill. This is liability based on negligence. Of course, the parties may agree on a stricter liability, such as fitness for purpose; in appropriate cases a term to this effect may be implied (Greaves & Co. Ltd. v. Baynham Meikle & Partners [1975] 1 WLR 1095.). The general position is the same in Scotland (Stair, The Laws of Scotland III, 'Building Contracts' para. 135). In AUSTRIA, under general rules applicable to all types of contract (CC art. 922), the designer is liable when fault is established. SPAIN, too, knows a system of liability based on negligence, in which proof of the designer's fault is needed in order to establish liability (TS 31 December 2003, RJ 2003/337. See also art. 10.2 of the Building Regulation Act)). According to the DANISH Standard conditions of sale, work and delivery, the liability of designers is based on the principle of negligence. In order to avoid liability, the designer will have to present a work in conformity with the state of the art. When the designer has made sure that the client's choice was an informed one, the designer will not be liable for giving effect to this choice, even if it turns out that the design chosen was unsuitable.

3. BELGIUM has a mixed system. Regarding the producing of plans, the duty to inform and advise the client, and the supervision of the works, the architect is under an obligation of means. It will have to be proved that the architect has not made all the necessary efforts that a similar architect in the same circumstances would have. Regarding the requirements of solidity, waterproofing and isolation (the essential elements of the design) the designer has an obligation of result. The mere fact that the design fails to ensure these essentials presupposes the architect's liability. In the Deontologische norm no. 2 it is stated that the architect's final design has to enable the constructor to perform his construction activity in good competence (art. 9). Further the design needs to be in conformity with the client's construction program and all the technical requirements. It depends upon the underlying contract whether the design is in conformity or not.

IV.C.–6:105: Handing over of the design

(1) In so far as the designer regards the design, or a part of it which is fit for carrying out independently from the completion of the rest of the design, as sufficiently completed and wishes to transfer the design to the client, the client must accept it within a reasonable time after being notified.

(2) The client may refuse to accept the design when it, or the relevant part of it, does not conform to the contract and such non-conformity amounts to a fundamental non-performance.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article is based on the idea that the designer takes the initiative for the transfer of the design and that the client should accept the design unless there are serious design defects. The act of acceptance implies that the client confirms that the designer has performed the obligations in accordance with the contract. This may be done either explicitly by means of a statement or implicitly by the actual taking of the design. Minor defects and defects that can be remedied in a short period of time do not allow the client to refuse acceptance of the design. Only when defects amount to a fundamental non-performance (as defined in Annex 1) is the client allowed to refuse to accept the design.

Illustration 1
An architect has been engaged to design an underground car park. After the design has been finalised, the architect offers the design to the client. By accepting the design, the client confirms that the architect has performed the obligations under the contract.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

With respect to the handing over of the design, an important issue is whether the client should be allowed to reject the design in all cases. Acceptance of the design by the client is a confirmation of the fact that the design has been performed according to the contract. This is an important event for the designer; the transfer of the design to the client implies that the designer – in general – will be paid for the service. At least a substantial part of the price to be paid according to the contract will be due. This may justify a specific regulation on this topic.

The handing over of the design furthermore enables the client to check whether the design is in conformity with expectations. The client may not reject the design, unless the non-conformity of the design is a fundamental non-performance. Remedying a defective design may take some time and will raise costs, but the sooner defects are discovered, the easier it will be for the designer to correct them. Therefore, a regulation on the issue of handing over the design seems helpful. All of the legal systems studied contain some regulation of this matter.

However, it could be argued that a rule on acceptance of the design is not necessary. It might be better to have the contracting parties regulate themselves how and when the design is to be handed over to the client.

C. Preferred option

It is considered preferable to have a specific provision on acceptance of the design. The client is to accept it within a reasonable period, when the designer considers that it is fit for carrying out. This does not have to concern the design in total but may concern an independent part of the design which has already been finalised. As the designer knows the design best, the designer is to take the initiative in deciding whether the design is ready for acceptance by the client. This choice is based on the general idea of co-operation between the parties. The co-operation of the client in accepting the design or a part of it is essential to the performance of the contractual obligations. This acceptance of the design has an important meaning, as it is an act of approval that the design has been performed in conformity with the contract. However, the client is allowed to reject the design, though only in some cases. There is only room for rejection when the defects in the design or relevant part of the design constitute a fundamental non-performance. Acceptance of the design by the client enables the client to check whether the designer has performed the contract well.

NOTES

1. Specific rules on handing over the design are not common in Europe. There are many rules on handing over the structure in construction cases, but not on the handing over of the design. Where handing over is mentioned in the laws (and various terms are used) it is often regarded as marking the end of the designer's obligations under the design contract and the start of a guarantee period or period of prescription.
2. In BELGIUM the rule is that when the design is ready for handing over, the client must accept it. Only when the design is fully handed over do the designer's contractual obligations come to an end (CC art. 1234). This activates the ten-year liability period of the designer. See Verbeke [-Deketelaere and Schoups], Handboek Bouwrecht, p. 434. In ENGLAND the design has to be partially or fully handed over when it is in compliance with the contract. (Hudson, Building and Engineering Contracts[11], pp. 682-683). In FRANCE the handing over of the design and the acceptance of the design by the client have the effect that the liability period of ten years starts running. (Liet-Veaux and Thuillier, Droit de la construction[11], p. 286). Both contracting parties have to be present at the handing over of the design, for the client declares acceptance of the design with or without reservation. This follows from the CC art. 1792-6. Visible defects must be pointed out at the time of the handing over. Hidden defects in the design may become manifest in the one-year period of guarantee and the architect will be liable to remedy them.
3. In GERMANY intellectual work is, according to the case law of the Bundesgerichtshof, capable of being literally 'handed over'. That applies to designs. HOAI § 15 (Leistungsbild) (Locher, Das private Baurecht[5], pp. 192 and 193). The key stage is the reception of the design, combined with the statement that the client acknowledges the performance of the designer as being in conformity with the contract (CC art. 640 and Niestrate, Die Architektenhaftung[2], p. 51). The reception requires the completion of the work. According to the HOAI, the design is not completed until all the duties following the Leistungsbild have been fulfilled. The handing over of the design implies that the time of performance for the architect comes to an end. When the client does not accept the design when obliged to do so, the architect is entitled to terminate the contract according to the CC arts. 642 and 643 (Niestrate, Die Architektenhaftung[2], p. 220).

4. In the GREEK CC the handing over is mentioned only in art. 694 which provides that payment is due. In THE NETHERLANDS the designer's contractual obligations end when the design activity is completed (SR 1997 art. 19 (1) and (2)). From the time of completion, the period of liability of the designer starts running for five years. The client must approve the architect's design before the successive stage in the construction process may start (SR 1997, art. 47 (2) and (3). In POLAND the client is obliged to receive the design when it is released by the designer in accordance with the contract (CC art. 643). If it is not in accordance with the contract, the client is not obliged to accept the work. See Radwański [-Brzozowski] System Prawa Prywatnego VII^2, p. 341. In PORTUGAL handing over of the design implies that the client may accept the work, which frees the designer from liability. Further rules on this handing over may be agreed upon by the contracting parties. In that case the service provider is obliged to follow the client's instructions (CC art. 1161 para. a). There is no specific rule in SCOTLAND. In SPAIN, according to LOE art. 6 the acceptance of the work means that the client accepts the design with its characteristics and qualities at that moment. In SWEDEN and FINLAND the rules on handing over and acceptance concentrate on the construction rather than the design.

5. As the design contract is not specifically regulated under SPANISH law, the rules on handing over provided by the Building Regulation Act in relation to the construction as a whole, rather than to the design, could apply. Pursuant to those rules, the acceptance (explicit or tacit) by the client has to be expressed within thirty days after the construction has been finished, unless the parties agreed otherwise (art. 6.4 of the Statute on Building). The client may refuse to accept the construction if it has not been finished yet or if it does not conform to the contract (art. 6.3). However, these rules probably appear too stringent to be applied outside the handing over of buildings.

IV.C.–6:106: Records

(1) After performance of both parties' other contractual obligations, the designer must, on request by the client, hand over all relevant documents or copies of them.

(2) The designer must store, for a reasonable time, relevant documents which are not handed over. Before destroying the documents, the designer must offer them again to the client.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The designer is under an obligation to hand over all the documents concerning the design to the client, or copies of them, on request by the client. This obligation normally arises after the performance of all other contractual obligations – i.e. after the client has accepted and paid for the design. The designer may withhold performance of the obligation to hand over the documents until the client pays (III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation)).

If the client does not ask for the documents after having paid, the designer is obliged to store them for a reasonable time. Some standard terms for design contracts mention a period of ten years. The periods of prescription are relevant in this respect. After ten years most claims against the designer are cut off, even in the case of hidden defects: in the case of personal injury, however, the maximum period is thirty years (III.–7:307 (Maximum length of period). In any case, when the designer no longer wishes to keep the documents they must be re-offered to the client before being destroyed.

The Article refers to "relevant" documents. These will include the detailed design, designs used to receive permission from a public authority, certificates and expert opinions.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The main question is whether the designer should be obliged to keep the relevant documents for a particular period.

Such an obligation would safeguard the interests of the client, who might need the documents for practical purposes, such as enabling a contractor to realise the design or alter the structure at a later stage, or facilitating a sale of the structure. On the other hand it might be in the interests of the designer to keep the documents, for example to protect intellectual property rights.

C. Preferred option

The reason for imposing an obligation on the designer to keep records is that the interests of the client are regarded as more important in this respect than the interests of the designer. The designer suffers hardly any disadvantage when obliged to store documents for a period. The client has a greater benefit from obtaining the records than the designer has from keeping them. Furthermore, the designer need only supply copies and can use the originals for the purpose of future tasks or for intellectual property purposes. Also, the rule is only a default rule. The parties can make other arrangements in the contract.

NOTES

1. Most of the legal systems studied have no rules on this question, leaving it to the parties to settle in the contract. However, there are rules in GERMANY, THE NETHERLANDS and PORTUGAL.
2. In GERMANY the architect has an obligation to offer the design documents to the client. (Locher, Das private Baurecht[5], p. 243). This obligation prescribes in 3 years (CC § 195). Under HOAI § 15-9 the designer has a duty to document the final results of the contract.
3. In THE NETHERLANDS the standard terms in SR 1997 include an obligation to store documents relating to the contract (art. 42). The period of storage is 10 years from the date on which the designer's contractual obligations were otherwise fully performed. If the client wishes, the designer can place copies at the client's disposal (para. 3). The designer is freed from the obligation to store when the documents are offered to, and accepted by, the client (paragraph 4). In De Nieuwe Regeling 2005 there is a similar rule (art. 11 sub 11 to 13). Under the CC art. 7:412 the client's right to claim the records prescribes in 5 years.
4. Also in FINLAND the standard terms KSE 1995, chap. 6 regulates the safekeeping of documents. The consultant must retain the original documents received from the client and the documents the consultant has drafted for a period of 10 years.
5. In PORTUGAL the designer has an obligation to keep records of the design (CC art. 1161 para. (d)).
6. Under SPANISH law, as design contracts are not specifically regulated and are considered a subspecies of construction contracts, the obligation to hand over all the relevant documentation regarding the contract executed is not a duty of the designer, but of the director of the construction (director de obra). According to art. 7 of the Building Regulation Act, after the performance the director of the construction must deliver to the client the original design with all the modifications added in order to proceed with the administrative procedures. Spanish law lacks any regulations on storing the documentation not handed over, as art. 7 imposes an obligation, not a right of the client. The documentation regarding the construction constitutes the Building Book (Libro del Edificio) which must be kept by the owners and users of the building, in order to transfer it to later users (art. 16).

IV.C.–6:107: Limitation of liability

In contracts between two businesses, a term restricting the designer's liability for non-performance to the value of the structure, thing or service which is to be constructed or performed by or on behalf of the client following the design, is presumed to be fair for the purposes of II.–9:405 (Meaning of unfair in contracts between businesses) except to the extent that it restricts liability for damage caused intentionally or by grossly negligent conduct on the part of the designer or any person for whose actions the designer is responsible.

COMMENTS

During the design process much can go wrong. If, as a result, the design becomes defective, the client may as a consequence suffer damage, often exceeding the price agreed for the designer. The designer will want to anticipate this by limiting or excluding liability. There are provisions in Book II, Chapter 9 on unfair contract terms which may in certain cases make such limitation clauses ineffective. However, these rules are of necessity general as they have to apply to all contracts. The purpose of the present Article is to provide more clarity for the particular situation of design contracts by establishing that a limitation clause within the scope of the Article is presumed to be fair if it is used in a commercial contract, except to the extent that it restricts liability for damage caused intentionally or by way of gross negligence on the part of the designer. The presumption applies if liability is restricted to the value of the structure, thing or service which is to be made or performed following the design.

Illustration 1

An architect is engaged by a private company to design a new air terminal for the national airport. As this is an enormous assignment and the risk of damage is high owing to the public function of an air terminal, the architect manages to achieve a contractual limitation of liability to an amount less than the value of the air terminal once it has been constructed. After the air terminal has been built and has been in use for several months, a part of the roof collapses, causing huge damage, the costs of which exceed the designer's limitation of liability. Although it is a commercial contract (both parties acted in the course of their business), the agreed limitation of liability is not presumed to be fair. Whether the general rules on unfair contract terms apply must be decided without the aid of the presumption.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

It may be questioned whether the general rules on unfair contract terms are sufficient and whether a specific regulation for design contracts is needed. The issues are the same as in relation to processing and storage contracts. On the one hand it can be argued that there is a loss of flexibility in having a particularised rule. On the other it can be argued that there is greater certainty and more guidance.

C. Preferred option

It is preferred to have a separate Article on the limitation of liability for design contracts, in addition to the general provisions on unfair contract terms. Since this issue has been regulated in different ways in the European legal systems, the provision on the limitation of liability in this Chapter only concerns a specific type of limitation clauses in design contracts, which is needed to give guidance. It only concerns commercial contracts between two professional contracting parties, limiting the designer's liability to the value of the structure, thing or service to be designed. In the field of commercial contracts hard and fast rules are required. In other situations – i.e. when at least one of the contracting parties is not a professional (especially when the client is a consumer) – it is thought preferable to let the general rules apply.

A clause restricting the designer's liability for non-performance to the value of the structure (service or thing) is presumed to be fair and reasonable. However, this presumption does not hold in relation to intentional damage or damage due to gross negligence. Whether or not such clauses are effective must be determined on the basis of the general rules on unfair contract terms.

It should be noted that even if a term is regarded as fair under the Article reliance on it in a particular case may still be blocked by III.–3:105 (Term excluding or restricting remedies) if invoking the term would in the circumstances be contrary to good faith and fair dealing.

NOTES

1. BELGIAN law provides for professional liability of the designer for a period of ten years (CC art. 1792, Reglement van Beroepsplichten art. 15). The liability is covered by a ten-year insurance. After ten years the designer's liability ceases to exist (CC art. 2270). The designer is not allowed to contractually limit this liability, for the regulation is regarded as a matter of public order. Furthermore it is not possible to suspend or stop the ten-year period (Verbeke [-Deketelaere and Schoups], Handboek Bouwrecht, p. 850).
2. Provisions limiting or excluding a designer's liability are generally valid under DANISH law, unless the client proves that the designer has caused the damage intentionally or by gross negligence. Under the Standard conditions of sale, work and delivery the designer is not liable for consequential loss, loss of profit or other indirect loss (Clause 14.3). The same is true for DUTCH law with the proviso that standard conditions (Rechtsverhouding opdrachtgever-architect, ingenieur en adviseur DNR 2005) not only exclude liability of the designer for consequential loss, loss of profit and other indirect loss (clause 14), but also restrict it to the value of the service which is to be performed with a maximum of € 1.000.000 (clause 15).
3. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND design contracts often contain exclusion or limitation clauses. The normal rules on unfair contract terms apply. The Architect's Standard Contract provides for a blank fixed limit, to be completed in each individual contract. One of the most important standard form agreements for the limitation of the architect's liability is the RIBA Code of Conduct (arts. 3.2.2, 4.1.7 and 4.2.5).
4. Under the FRENCH CC art. 1792-5 a contractual clause which limits or excludes the liabilities under CC art. 1792 is void. (CC art. 1792-6 provides a one-year guarantee against visible defects. CC art. 1792-3 provides a two year guarantee of proper functioning.)
5. In GERMAN law a complete exclusion of an architect's liability is not permitted. However, limitation of liability is possible. Liability is often limited to the amount of insurance cover, with an exclusion for gross negligence or fault. Clauses limiting liability for damage to the building itself are prohibited (CC § 309(8)). Clauses making the liability of the architect subsidiary to the liability of the contractors are void (CC § 309(7)). If a limitation clause of a permitted type does not contradict the principle of good faith or the law on standard contracts, it will be upheld (Niestrate, Die Architektenhaftung[2], p. 184).

6. The general rule of the POLISH CC art. 473 para. 2 applies to designers. According to this there is no possibility of excluding liability for damage caused intentionally. However, it is possible to exclude liability for damage resulting from gross negligence (judgment of the Supreme Court of 6. 10. 1953, II C 1141/53, OSN 1955, no. 1, poz. 5).

7. In PORTUGAL standard contract terms limiting liability for loss of life, pecuniary torts and definitive non-performance are considered to be void in any case of fraud, recklessness or gross negligence (Decr.-Lei no. 446/85 art. 18). Doctrine is divided on the issue of limitation in case of negligence (Antunes Varela, Das Obrigações em geral II[6], p. 134). Limitation of liability is generally not upheld regardless of the intensity of fault (CA Oporto, 6 October 1987, CJ 1987, IV, p. 231).

8. The designer is fully responsible under SPANISH law for damage caused by a design that does not comply with the contract clauses (art. 10.2 of the Building Regulation Act), as well as for the damage resulting from an incorrect, insufficient or inexact design (art. 17). In practice, designers conclude a civil liability insurance contract, which will cover the claims of clients. The only cases when the designer will not be liable are: force majeure or when the damage was caused by the victim of the damage or by a third party (art. 17). The parties may establish clauses of limitation of the liability. Nevertheless, under Spanish law liability derived from fraudulent and intentional conduct cannot be limited, according to the CC art. 1102. In the case of negligence, the CC art. 1103 does not provide explicitly for the invalidity of exemption clauses. Therefore, a contrario, they are valid (Serra Rodriguez, Las claúsulas abusivas en la contratación, p.105). Nevertheless, the Supreme Court assimilates gross negligence to fraud (TS 2 July 1875, jur. Civ. 271;TS 2 July 1992, RJ 1992/6502).

9. In SWEDEN standard contract terms contain limitation clauses, limiting the liability for damages to a certain percentage of the price for the work, for example 15 per cent in art. 5:11 of the AB 04 (standard contract terms for construction works). The designer will be liable for a greater amount if the insurance cover is higher. A party cannot exclude liability for intentional breach or gross negligence. The designer must have an all-risk insurance against damage caused to the works, AB 04 art. 5:22.

CHAPTER 7: INFORMATION AND ADVICE

IV.C.–7:101: Scope

(1) This Chapter applies to contracts under which one party, the provider, undertakes to provide information or advice to another party, the client.

(2) This Chapter does not apply in relation to treatment in so far as Chapter 8 (Treatment) contains more specific rules on the obligation to inform.

(3) In the remainder of this Chapter any reference to information includes a reference to advice.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article determines the scope of application of the rules on the particular type of service contract which involves the provision of information or advice. To avoid the constant repetition of the expression "information or advice" paragraph (3) provides that references to "information" in the rest of the Chapter include references to "advice". The concept of information in the rest of the Chapter therefore encompasses factual information, evaluative information and recommendations. Information is considered factual when it concerns material facts and the provision of the service thus merely involves the description of an observable situation. Information is evaluative when it involves a subjective judgement on the side of the provider and the evaluation of material facts. A recommendation involves the provision of advice, i.e. the suggestion to take a particular decision or, more generally, to embark on a particular course of action.

This threefold classification of information is not only necessary because it helps in determining the scope of application of the rules of this Chapter; since providing information involves heterogeneous activities, the regimes governing the types of information vary in some respects. As will be seen in the following Articles, there are specific provisions to regulate these different situations. Moreover, the performance of information contracts frequently requires the provision of a combination of different types of information. If such is the case, each type of information is governed by its specific rules.

> A lawyer giving legal advice will generally provide factual information about statutes and case law, an evaluation of these facts, such as a personal interpretation and their application to the situation at hand and, finally, formulate a recommendation. The rules on factual information will apply to the information about statutes and case law; the rules on evaluative information will apply to the lawyer's personal interpretation of the facts; the rules on recommendations will apply to the formulation of the advice itself.

The provisions of this Chapter are intended to apply primarily to contracts whose main objective is to provide information. However, according to the general rules in II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts) the provisions of this Chapter also apply to obligations to inform arising from contracts whose objective is not only to provide information, but also to provide another service or indeed something else altogether. Such an obligation to inform can be either a main obligation or an ancillary one. The provisions of this Chapter do not regulate the entire contract but are applicable only to the part of the contract which relates to the supply of information. Where the provision of information is so incidental and ancillary that it would be unreasonable to regard the contract as not being primarily of another kind, the rules of this Chapter will apply in a subsidiary way – that is to say, only so far as necessary to regulate the information part of the contract and only so far as they do not conflict with the rules governing the primary part of the contract (II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts)).

A service contract is concluded between a bank and a client. According to the contract, the bank is to provide a considerable variety of services to the client, including investment advice. The provisions of this chapter only regulate the obligations relating to information and not to the other services provided by the bank.

The Chapter applies not only to contracts where information is to be provided for remuneration but also, with any appropriate adaptations, to contracts where it is to be provided free. This follows from IV.C.–1:101 (Scope) paragraph (1)(b).

The Chapter on Treatment contains specific rules on the obligation of the treatment provider to inform the patient. These rules regulate in particular the content of the information to be provided to the patient in order to allow the patient to give informed consent to the treatment proposed. Paragraph (2) of the Article makes it clear that these rules prevail over the rules in the present Chapter. However, the rules of the present Chapter may apply to aspects of the obligation to inform not regulated by the Treatment Chapter.

Illustration 3
A doctor failed to inform his patient of a risk of the treatment suggested, disclosure of which had to be made according to IV.C.–8:105 (Obligation to inform). The patient claims damages and has to prove that the non-performance of the obligation to inform caused the damage suffered. The causation can be proved following the provisions of IV.C.–7:109 (Causation): the patient only has to substantiate that, in the absence of the non-performance, a reasonable patient in the same situation would seriously have considered taking an alternative subsequent decision.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The first policy issue is whether it is necessary to have specific rules governing information contracts. Might the provisions of Chapter 2 (Rules Applying to Service Contracts in General) be sufficient to regulate such contracts? The traditional approach is to include information contracts in the general regulation of service contracts. The modern approach, however, takes into account the specificity of contracts related to information and, more generally, intellectual services. The peculiarity of intellectual services, compared with material services, is often stressed. Thus it appears necessary, or at least useful, to have special regulations.

The second issue is whether it is possible to include advice activities in the category of contracts regulated by the Chapter. The main argument in favour of including them is that, in practice, the formulation of a recommendation, which is characteristic of the work of an adviser, very often involves the supply of information as well. Advice might even be considered as a particular kind of information.

C. Preferred option

In European laws, contracts for the provision of information are generally regarded as service contracts and provisions regarding work contracts or service contracts regulate this activity. In general, there are no specific legislative provisions governing information contracts. Solutions tend to be found in case law, which has in the last decades become abundant. Nowadays, common European principles can be derived from case law, especially with regard to information supplied by doctors, lawyers, banks, investment advisers and insurance advisers. The exception to this approach can be found in Italian law, which has specific rules for intellectual services. However, this category is broader than information contracts.

The regulation of the provision of information and that of advice is very similar according to positive law in several European jurisdictions. With the exception of some particular rules, the European legal systems do not distinguish between the two concepts.

The preferred option is to build on this modern approach, even if it is generally found in case law rather than in codes, and regard the provision of information and advice as worthy of particular regulation. Certainly there can be no doubt about the importance of the activity. Most provisions can apply to all kinds of information, but some particular provisions are designed to govern specific types of information.

There appears to be no good reason to disapply the general rules on mixed contracts. So the Chapter will regulate the obligations to inform arising from contracts dealing also with other matters. The rules will apply either in parallel or, where the provision of information is merely incidental and ancillary, in a subsidiary way. Therefore, ancillary obligations to inform will generally not be under a different regime than obligations to inform arising under contracts having information as the main objective.

D. The distinction between information and advice

Information and advice are in some respects similar and can be seen as points of a continuum. Advice can be seen as a specific type of information. Essential to the concept of advice is that it contains a recommendation to the client on a specific course of action. The aim of advice is to enable the client to make a reasoned choice from among alternatives. To that extent, advice aims at providing a person with the information which can reasonably be considered necessary for the making of a decision. It will generally include information about possible alternative courses of action and the risks of following them.

Another way of looking at the difference is that in a relationship where there is an obligation to advise, the responsibility for the quality of the choice is in a sense shifted to the adviser. The relationship between an adviser and the client is no longer a normal relationship at arm's length, but a closer relationship in which the adviser is bound to serve the interests of the client, even in the presence of conflicting interests. In some countries, a contract for advice is sometimes qualified as a fiduciary relationship implying fiduciary duties on the side of the provider. This is not the case when the provider is merely under the obligation to supply factual information.

Advice is information organised and limited in a specific way, normally by the needs of the client who wants to solve a problem. In order to find the best solution for this problem, the client needs information about possible solutions, especially about their advantages and disadvantages. The information is therefore organised around the alternatives which might possibly meet the needs of the customer and is also limited by these alternatives and needs. Moreover, in order to establish the needs of the customer, the adviser has to explore them. This may be stated somewhat differently by saying that an adviser undertakes not only to give information, but also to help the client to take a decision. These elements are not always present in cases where the agreement is simply for the supply of information.

In this Chapter, the main criterion of distinction between information and advice is whether a recommendation is to be given or not. When no recommendation is to be given the service is to be considered mere information, either factual or evaluative. Moreover, when the information provider is to recommend a specific course of action, the service is considered to be advice. In this Chapter, contracts are considered to be advice contracts 'when the provider expressly or impliedly undertakes to provide the client with a recommendation to enable the client to make a subsequent decision.' The criterion is important since IV.C.–7:104 (Obligation of skill and care) paragraph (2) and IV.C.–7:107 (Conflict of interest) state specific obligations which bind only advisers.

However, in some cases where no recommendation is given expressly, the service provided may still be qualified as advice; for example, when the information supplied is sufficiently detailed and involves the mentioning of the consequences to which each possible course of action could lead, even in the absence of an explicit formulation of a recommendation.

> Illustration 5
> A professor of law gives legal advice to a client, explaining the possible legal arguments to raise in a lawsuit, without advising a specific course of action. The professor only explains the possible alternatives and the risks involved. Even if no explicit recommendation is given, such a legal consultation constitutes advice and the contract concluded between the parties is an advice contract. The adviser is under the specific obligations arising from this contract.

In other cases, a recommendation cannot be seen as advice. This is the case, for example, when a recommendation is given to the public in general and is therefore not adapted to the needs of a specific client.

NOTES

I. Definition of information and advice

1. There is in general no legal definition of information or advice. Legal doctrine commonly distinguishes the two concepts. Information is often defined as the statement of a factual situation. It differs from advice which includes an express or implied proposal to act. This can be noticed in AUSTRIA (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht II[2], 186 ff), ENGLAND (South Australia Asset Management Corp. v. York Montague Ltd. [1997] AC 191*; United Bank of Kuwait Plc. v. Prudential Property Services Ltd. [1997] AC 191; Nykredit Mortgage Bank plc. v. Edward Erdman Group Ltd.*, [1997] 1 WLR 1627), FRANCE (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[8], no. 258; Savatier, D. 1972, Chron. 157; Veaux, Contrat de conseil, fasc. 430; Delebecque, Contrat de renseignement, fasc. 795), THE NETHERLANDS (Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners), POLAND (Lewaszkiewicz-Petrykowska:

Uwagi o zawodowym obowiązku udzielania informacji, no. 21, pp. 47-54) and SPAIN (Cervilla Garzón, La prestación de Servicios Profesionales, p. 246). In GERMANY a threefold classification is often given – information, recommendation, advice - (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[60], § 675, no. 33). This threefold classification is also found in PORTUGAL (Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade por conselhos, p. 15 - a recommendation being regarded as more than mere information but as less intense or directive than advice). In GREECE, ITALY, SCOTLAND and SWEDEN there seems to be no accepted definition of information or advice.

II. Regulation of contracts for information and advice

2. In no legal system studied is there particular regulation of contracts for information and advice.

3. The contract for the provision of information or advice is generally regulated by the rules on contracts for services, BELGIUM (Civ. Brussels, 6 February 1991, JT 1991, 661) ENGLAND (Supply of Goods and Services Act, Section 13, same solution under the common law), FRANCE (CC arts 1779-1799) GERMANY (CC § 611), THE NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 7:400 ff), PORTUGAL (CC art. 1154). In ITALY there are particular rules for intellectual services as opposed to material services (CC arts. 2229-2238). In SWEDEN there is no general legislation in this area. However, at least in consumer contracts, guidance can be found in different Acts with a more limited scope, such as the Act on Financial Advice to Consumers (Lag (2003:862) or in art. 16 of the Real Estate Agents Act and in art. 13 of the Insurance Agents Act .

4. In SCOTLAND the matter is regulated by the common law of contract. In FINLAND the situation is very much the same (Real Estate Agents Act 200/1074, ss. 8-11, Insurance Agents Act 2005/570 s. 22, Consumer Protection Act chap. 6a, Securities Marketing Act 1989/495 chap. 6).

5. As SPANISH law lacks specific rules on advice contracts as well, they are regulated by the provisions on service contracts contained in the CC (Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles[3],p.697).

III. Further information

6. For further notes arranged on a country by country basis, including some discussion of non-contractual liability for information or advice, see PEL SC pp. 707–714.

IV.C.–7:102: Obligation to collect preliminary data

(1) The provider must, in so far as this may reasonably be considered necessary for the performance of the service, collect data about:

(a) the particular purpose for which the client requires the information;
(b) the client's preferences and priorities in relation to the information;
(c) the decision the client can be expected to make on the basis of the information; and
(d) the personal situation of the client.

(2) In case the information is intended to be passed on to a group of persons, the data to be collected must relate to the purposes, preferences, priorities and personal situations that can reasonably be expected from individuals within such a group.

(3) In so far as the provider must obtain data from the client, the provider must explain what the client is required to supply.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The supply of information involves a large number of actions on the side of the information provider. An information contract entails several obligations. Before the information is supplied, the provider has to know what kind of information the client needs. The first obligation of the information provider is therefore to ascertain the needs of the client. The present Article provides a particular regulation of this obligation, which in practice is very important for the provision of the service. In so far as it may reasonably be considered necessary for the performance of the service, the information provider must ascertain the purposes, preferences and priorities of the client. Moreover, according to paragraph (1) subparagraph (d) the information provider will have to ascertain the situation of the client if this is necessary for the performance of the contractual obligations.

Paragraph (2) limits the obligation of the information provider to collecting data about the purposes, preferences, priorities and the specific situation of the client if the service is offered to a group of people. If such is the case, the information provider will be able to determine the purposes, priorities and preferences of the clients objectively, by reference to the standard of the normal member of the group. This paragraph also concerns standardised information, whose content is determined in advance by the provider. In such a case, the information provider has a more limited obligation to investigate the needs of the clients and can base the information supplied on the situation of the group of potential clients who will need the information.

> A company offers a mobile telephone service which provides the weather forecast, weather reports and a warning system for skiers and climbers in the French Alps. The service is not provided for the Italian and Swiss Alps. Thus, the information provider is only bound to collect information about the circumstances that apply to climbers and alpinists in the French Alps.

Paragraph (3) imposes on the provider the obligation to explain what is needed from the client.

Illustration 2
An international publisher requests a lawyer to give pre-publication advice, viz. to determine whether a biography the publisher intends to publish contains items that may lead to claims for breach of privacy. The lawyer needs to know the citizenship and domicile of the persons involved and the countries in which the book will be distributed. Determination of the applicable law is essential since legal systems may diverge on the definition of privacy and the criteria for its breach. The lawyer is to inform the publisher what kind of information is needed and the publisher is obliged to give that information on the basis of the obligation to co-operate.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The first question is the extent of the data to be collected by the information provider about the purposes, preferences and priorities of the client. This depends on the kind of service offered and on the type of clients involved. It is in the interest of both parties to have a complete exchange of information before the performance of the service begins, in order to allow its correct performance. However, having to supply too much information may increase the costs for the client. Limiting the extent of information may reduce some of these extra costs.

The second question to answer is whether the information provider is to assess the circumstances under which the contract is to be performed in concreto, i.e. by reference to each particular client, or in abstracto, i.e. by reference to a reasonable client in the same situation. There is little doubt concerning information meant to be tailor-made to the needs of a particular client. However, the duty contained in this Article may lead to problems with regard to standardised information and, more generally, with regard to information to be provided to a group of persons. Often, the information to be supplied is determined in advance by the provider, who does not take into account the needs of a particular client. Standardised information is very frequent in non-contractual relationships. However, people often enter into contracts in order to receive services which are socially desirable. In such a case, the obligation for the information provider to collect information about the purposes, the priorities and the preferences of the clients should be more limited. Moreover, when an obligation exists with regard to standardised information, it is desirable that the information provider assess the circumstances in which the service is to be performed objectively, not subjectively. In other words, the more the information is supposed to be tailor-made to the needs of a particular client, the more the circumstances in which the service is to be performed need to be assessed in concreto. In contrast, the more the information is standardised, the more such circumstances can be efficiently assessed in abstracto.

The obligation to assess the circumstances in which the service is to be performed is widely accepted in the European legal systems. When the information to be provided is not standardised, the information provider has to deliver information tailored to the specific needs and situation of the client. This obligation requires the provider to make a preliminary assessment before providing the service. This obligation is generally deduced from the general provisions on the standard of care. The supply of a service which is not tailored to the needs and situation of the particular client is, in such a case, not given in conformity with the standard of care.

C. Preferred option

The preferred option is to impose an obligation to collect preliminary data but to limit the amount of data to be collected to what may reasonably be considered necessary for the proper performance of the service. This criterion allows the parties and the judge, in assessing liability, to determine the amount of preliminary data to be collected by the information provider or to be exchanged by the parties on a case-by-case basis. In doing this, one will need to turn to a subjective standard when the object of the contract is to supply tailor-made information and to an objective standard with regard to standardised information, i.e. information whose content is determined in advance by the provider.

As a consequence, with regard to standardised information it is up to the client to choose a service provider who offers a service which corresponds with the client's needs. Providers of this kind of information are not under the obligation to collect data about the needs of each particular client before performing the service. They offer to the public a specific service and it is up to the client to determine what is needed, before requesting the service. Thus, the data to be collected relate to the purposes, preferences, priorities and personal situations which could reasonably be expected in relation to persons in the relevant group.

NOTES

1. In AUSTRIA there seems to be an obligation for the provider to ask the client for information about the client's situation. On the other hand, the client is also under an obligation to co-operate. If the client fails to perform this obligation the damages due are reduced pursuant to CC § 1304 (contributory negligence).
2. Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law a contract for advice, at least, would usually be considered to contain an implied term that the client will answer such questions as might reasonably be put by the adviser.
3. Under FINNISH law the information provider has a general obligation to fulfil the commission carefully (see Supreme Court Cases KKO 1998: 57; 1999: 19; 1999:80 and 2001:128 and Hemmo, Sopimusoikeuden oppikirja, p. 154). More specific obligations are found in various special acts, e.g. the "know your customer" principle in the Security Markets Act 1989/495 chap. 4 on investment services, s. 3a and the Insurance Agents Act 2005/570 s. 22.
4. In FRANCE it is in principle up to the information provider to collect any necessary preliminary data (Cass.com. 1 December 1992, Bull. no. 391, a professional salesman must collect information about the needs of the client; Cass.civ. I, 7 April 1998, Bull.civ. I, no. 150; CCC 1998, no. 97 with note L. Leveneur; Cass.civ. I, 17 February 1998, Bull.civ. I, no. 61 for the fitter). It is up to the provider to ask the client for appropriate information. The client also must inform the provider and concealment of essential elements may amount to contributory negligence (Cass.civ. I, 27 June 1995, JCP éd. N 1996.II, p. 1213, with note Sanséau). The solution is very general, since the Cour de cassation decided that every fault of the client could limit the damages due by the adviser (Cass.civ. I, 30 January 1996, Defr. 1996, p. 361, obs. J.-L. Aubert).
5. The rules on contributory negligence in GERMAN law apply if the client fails to do something that is part of the client's own responsibility (BGH 17 October 1991, WM 1992, 62, 66; BGH 17 November 1994, WM 1995, 212, 214), especially if the client fails to inform the adviser of all necessary facts (BGH 20 June 1996, WM 1996, 1832, 1835 ff).

6. In ITALIAN law an obligation to collect relevant preliminary data may be deduced from a variety of articles: CC art. 1175 requiring a correct behaviour from both parties in performing; CC art. 1337 on good faith at the pre-contractual stage, and CC art. 1375 on good faith at the contractual stage.

7. As a rule, an obligation for the client to inform the information provider does not exist under DUTCH law (Cf. Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, no. 61). This obligation is, however, sometimes acknowledged in the patient-doctor relationship (CMT 31 October 1996, Stcrt. 1996, 221.) However, failure to give the necessary information may lead to mora creditoris if the failure can be imputed to the client. If the client does give information, the adviser may, in principle, rely upon that information in so far as it is of a factual nature, unless the information given is superficial or incomplete, in which case the adviser is obliged to do further research (i.e. to put new questions to the client) (Cf. Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, nos. 126, 343).

8. In POLAND the duty to ascertain the needs of the client may be deduced from the general rules on the performance of obligations, which require loyal contracting (CC art. 354 para. 1). The obligation of the client to co-operate arises from CC art. 354 para. 2. More specifically, in the case of a contract of specific work the client's obligation to co-operate is confirmed by CC arts. 639 and 640.

9. The client is obliged under PORTUGUESE law to supply the provider with such data as are necessary to enable the advice or information to be supplied (CC art. 1667 a)). This is a default rule. If the data supplied are insufficient, the information provider will have the defence of contributory negligence (CC art. 570), but bears the burden of proof (CC art. 572).

10. In SPAIN the client's obligation to co-operate in informing the service provider may be deduced from the principle of good faith in its objective variant: Ccom art. 57 and CC arts. 7, 1258. The client's obligation to inform is however codified for those contracts where utmost good faith is required. In the case of insurance relationships the client is compelled (Insurance Act art. 16) to inform the service provider regarding the existing situation at the time the contract is concluded and of any other situation arising during the contractual period which may have an impact on the agreement, although in case of conflict it is for the provider of the service to prove that it was not properly informed (TS 5 July 1990, RAJ 1990/5776).

11. The information provider has a general obligation to fulfil the commission carefully under SWEDISH law (See Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 217). Within this general obligation, there is normally an obligation to collect preliminary data from the client, as far as this is relevant to the provider's ability to fulfil the commission carefully. This is also the case under various special acts, for example, art. 13 of the Act on Insurance Brokers, requires the insurance agent to clarify the client's need of insurance. In the Financial Advice to Consumers Act art. 5(1), the adviser must take the client's interest duly into account. Moreover, the advisor must adjust the advice to the wishes and needs of the client, and only recommend solutions suitable for the client. The client has a general duty of loyalty towards the information provider (See Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], p. 225). This may possibly include a duty to give the information necessary for the information provider to perform the obligations under the contract.

IV.C.–7:103: Obligation to acquire and use expert knowledge

The provider must acquire and use the expert knowledge to which the provider has or should have access as a professional information provider or adviser, in so far as this may reasonably be considered necessary for the performance of the service.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

It is up to the information provider to acquire and use the expert knowledge necessary for the proper performance of the obligations under the contract.

> Illustration 1
> A rich businessman, who has financial interests in various countries and members of his family living abroad, requests the advice of an estate planning lawyer with a view to minimising taxes for his heirs. In order to be able to give the advice, the lawyer must be knowledgeable and collect information about inheritance tax law, marital law, succession law and international private law in the jurisdictions connected with the case.

The phrase 'may reasonably be considered necessary for the performance of the service' primarily refers to the result expected by the client and agreed upon by the parties. In other words, the input necessary depends on the output agreed upon. Defective input will generally lead to defective output, and thus to liability of the information provider on the basis of the provisions regulating the output. However, the collection and use of particular expert knowledge is an obligation in itself. Failure to perform it may lead to independent sanctions.

The main goal of this provision is therefore to allow the client to react as soon as the client becomes aware of the information provider's use of improper, incomplete or defective expert knowledge; the client does not have to wait until the performance of the service has been completed.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

There is no doubt that a professional information provider needs to acquire and make use of the expert knowledge necessary for the performance of the service. The main issue is the amount of knowledge needed in order to live up to the standard of care required. What should be the extent of the obligation? What criterion should be used to determine that extent?

Requiring too much expertise from all information providers will lead to costs which will often be unnecessary for the provision of a good service. In some cases, this may even discourage providers from performing the service requested, because it may become too risky for them: they may too easily be held liable. On the other hand, if information providers are allowed to provide services regarding matters in which they are not sufficiently competent, the client may be seriously harmed. A middle course needs to be found.

The way to establish the extent of expert knowledge information providers need to have and to apply can be difficult to determine. In the sciences, the reference to the state of the art of the discipline at the moment of the provision of the service can be considered to be a guideline. This is probably not possible for other fields or practices. In such cases, reference may be made to the prevailing opinions in the community in which the information provider works or to deontological principles.

C. Preferred option

The preferred option is to impose an obligation but to limit it, first, by referring to the expert knowledge to which the provider has or should have access as a professional information provider or adviser and then by using the criterion of "in so far as may reasonably be considered necessary for the performance of the service". This will enable courts to take into account the particular circumstances of each case and to refer to the general obligation of skill and care under IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care) and to the particular obligation of skill and care for information providers and advisers under IV.C.–7:104 (Obligation of skill and care) paragraph (1)(b).

Where the information to be provided is factual information, the obligation under the present Article will often be overridden by the obligation under paragraph (2) of IV.C.–7:105 (Conformity) to provide correct information. This means that the contractual obligation of the information provider will not be performed if the expert knowledge passed on to the client is incomplete or incorrect, regardless of the fact that the provider has acted with reasonable care and skill in researching the expert knowledge.

A client requests a law firm to make an inventory of the current law on employer liability. The law firm consults the LEXIS database. If some relevant cases are lacking in that database, due to which the information provided to the client is not correct or is simply incomplete, the firm has not performed its contractual obligation, regardless of the fact that it acted with reasonable care and skill in collecting expert knowledge and in deciding to consult the LEXIS database.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. This obligation is generally derived from the general provisions on the skill and care required of the information provider. However, legal systems do not agree on how much expert knowledge is necessary to enable the contractual obligations to be performed in conformity with the required standard of care. In BELGIUM, ENGLAND, FRANCE, THE NETHERLANDS, ITALY, SCOTLAND and SWEDEN the information provider is required to have regard only to factual and established expert knowledge. GERMANY, however, sometimes imposes an obligation to foresee a future evolution and therefore to take into account the probable incorrectness of the state of the art (BGH 30 September 1993, IX ZR 211/92; NJW 1993, 3323, legal adviser).

II. Obligation to acquire and use expert knowledge

2. In BELGIUM the district Court of Brussels stated that a lawyer, although bound to collect professional information carefully, is not liable merely for interpreting an ambiguous legal provision differently from the judge (Civ. Brussels, 21 February 1963, RGAR 1963, no. 7135).

3. In ENGLAND a physician is expected to have the professional knowledge of a reasonably skilled professional in the relevant field (Sidaway v. Board of Governors of the Bethlem Royal Hospital [1985] AC 871).

4. An information provider or adviser is under an obligation to have or acquire relevant expert knowledge under FRENCH law. For example a legal adviser must know the current law at the moment of the provision of the service (Cass.civ. I, 15 October 1985, Bull. no. 257; RTD civ 1986, 759 Huet). The provider must ascertain that the information is not out-of-date (Cass.com. 30 January 1974, D. 1974, 428 with note Tendler). The provider who does not accomplish the researches necessary for the security of the client will fail to perform the contractual obligations (Cass.civ. I, 3 May 1983, D. 1983, 559, note J.-L. Aubertt, for a notary). A legal adviser is not obliged to foresee a reversal of the case law (Cass.civ. I, 25 November 1997, Bull.civ. I, no. 328; Defr. 1998, 354 obs. J.-L. Aubertt; RTD civ 1998, 367, obs. J. Mestre (notary). Already ruled by Cass.com. 12 July 1993, Bull.civ. IV, no. 298). In any case, legal uncertainty does not relieve the provider from the obligation to advise; therefore the client must be told of the uncertainty (Trib. civ. Seine, 22 April 1953, JCP éd. N 1953.II.7656; CA Amiens, 29 January 1959, JCP éd. N 1959.II.11212; Cass.civ. I, 9 December 1997, Bull.civ. I, no. 362; Defr. 1998, p. 354, obs. J.-L. Aubertt, notary). A lawyer is liable for not advising the client against suing when the claim will certainly be dismissed (Cass.civ. I, 29 April 1997, Bull.civ. I, no. 132; JCP 1997.II.22948 with note R. Martin; CCC 1997, no. 111, with obs. L. Leveneur).

5. The information provider must have the expert knowledge expected by a professional of the same type under GERMAN law. A legal adviser must know the positive law, even the solution of cases criticised by legal doctrine (BGH 29 March 1983, NJW 1983, 1665, solicitor). The adviser is also under an obligation to keep up to date and study the decision of the BGH as soon as they are published in legal journals (BGH 20 December 1978, NJW 1978, 887). In assessing the extent of knowledge a legal adviser should have, German case law is more demanding than other legal systems. A legal adviser must conform to the case law of the Supreme Court, even if these rulings are fiercely criticised in the professional literature and it cannot be ruled out that case law will be changed (BGH 29 March 1983, NJW 1983, 1665 (solicitor); BGH VersR 1993, 1413, tax consultant; BGH 27 October 1994, VersR 1995, 303, NJW 1995, 330, notary public). The court held a lawyer liable for an incorrect legal opinion, even though a three-person panel of professional judges had followed that opinion (BGH NJW 1983, 820). Even the invocation of an expert legal opinion – the one of a university professor – is not sufficient to release the lawyer from liability (BGH NJW 1993, 1179). The court has also held a lawyer liable because he relied on an old case of the court, without considering the possibility of a reversal of the line of the case law (BGH 30 September 1993, IX ZR 211/92; NJW 1993, 3323).

6. In ITALY the information provider has to keep up with the “state of the art” and has to be aware of scientific solutions unanimously accepted in the relevant field of knowledge or practice. Knowledge of such solutions is indispensable for professionals who want to be active in a particular intellectual field (Cass. 18 June 1975, no. 2439, Giur.it., 1976, I, 1, 953; Cass. 29 March 1976, no. 1132, Giur.it., 1977, I, 1, 1980). This principle is valid for every single professional category. A lawyer, for instance, is liable in case of ignorance of the rules of law to be applied and, in general, when negligence and incompetence compromise the good outcome of a trial. Only in those situations in which interpretation of a case is arguable, or the rules to apply are doubtful and under discussion, may liability be excluded to the extent that there is no fraud or serious fault (CC arts. 2236 and 1176).

7. In the law of THE NETHERLANDS the provider of a service must apply the care of a reasonably skilled and reasonably acting provider of such a service. This criterion was explicitly accepted in HR 9 November 1990, NedJur 1991, 26 (Speeckaert/Gradener, liability of a doctor), and applies to all providers of services. Cf. also HR 26 April 1991, NedJur 1991, 455 (Benjaddi/Neve, liability of a bailiff for bad advice). This means that the provider must possess or obtain the professional knowledge which a reasonably skilled provider may be expected to have. (Michiels van Kessenich-Hoogendam, Beroepsfouten[3], no. 18). A recent Dutch case shows the practical consequences of the obligation for a legal adviser to have professional knowledge. In this case, a firm had paid a former employee a large amount of money by way of a "golden handshake" in order to have the employee consent to the termination of his employment contract. Later it became known that the former employee, while employed, had accepted payments from an important supplier of the employer, without his employer's knowledge. The client, who had engaged a lawyer to assist him in a criminal case against the former employee, asked the lawyer how to claim back the money he had paid to the former employee. The lawyer advised his client to wait, for tactical reasons, until the former employee was criminally charged with the case and then to initiate legal proceedings alongside the criminal lawsuit. The client followed the advice and waited for the criminal charges to be brought to court. However, when the criminal charges were finally brought to court, the time limits for claiming the money paid by the employer had already lapsed, and the claim was dismissed. The employer then sued the lawyer on the grounds that he was liable for bad advice. The lawyer defended his position by arguing that he had acted as the employer's criminal lawyer only and that he, as a criminal lawyer, could not have known that the money was only to be claimed back through a specific procedure. The District Court of Leeuwarden found that the advice itself was wrong (CFI Leeuwarden, 14 August 2002, case number HAZA 01-728). Moreover, the Court found that if the lawyer's argument that he was only employed as a criminal lawyer and that he could not have known of the specific procedure were true, the lawyer should have refrained from giving advice altogether and should have referred the client to a civil lawyer. This case shows that a lawyer is always under the obligation to have or to collect professional knowledge in order to give legal advice. Ignorance of legal matters is never an excuse for a lawyer. A lawyer who is aware of not having sufficient knowledge in a specific area should abstain from acting and refer the client to a lawyer competent in that area. It still remains to be determined, however, how much knowledge the lawyer should have.

8. In POLAND the obligation to have or acquire the relevant expert knowledge may be derived from the obligation to act with due diligence (CC art. 355) and the obligation of loyal contracting (CC art. 354). The level of knowledge to be expected in a given contract depends on the qualifications and professional experience of the service provider, the case, and the circumstances in which obligations are to be performed (judgment of the Supreme Court of 25. 9. 2002, I CKN 971/00, Lex no. 56902). In the case of professionals the standard of knowledge and experience is set higher (CC art. 355 para. 2). For example, in its decision of 14. 08. 1997 (II CZ 88/97, OSNC 1998/3/40) the Supreme Court has stated that the party contracting with an advocate may expect that the advocate will act with a full knowledge of the law.

9. SCOTTISH law holds the professional adviser to the standards of knowledge to be reasonably expected of a member of the profession in question, given the state of the art at the time of providing the information or advice (Hunter v. Hanley 1955 SC 200).

10. In SPAIN it is of paramount importance in the so-called liberal professions that the service provider has up to date professional knowledge. The professional is expected to be aware of the state of the science at the time the service is provided. See, for the legal advice contract, SAP Madrid 30 June 2003, JUR 2003/248779, and for the medical profession, SAP Zaragoza 24 April 2000, AC 2000/1292.

11. Some professions in SWEDEN (such as accountants and practising lawyers) have a special high standard of care of their own. The professional must comply with these standards. For instance, a lawyer can be expected not to overlook rules and easily found cases (NJA 1957 p. 621). A specialist has normally a higher standard of care than the generalist (cf. NJA 1981 p. 1091). The same principles are applied in FINNISH law (see e.g. Supreme Court Cases KKO 1999:19, 1999:80 and 2001:128).

IV.C.–7:104: Obligation of skill and care

(1) The provider's obligation of skill and care requires in particular the provider to:

(a) take reasonable measures to ensure that the client understands the content of the information;

(b) act with the care and skill that a reasonable information provider would demonstrate under the circumstances when providing evaluative information; and

(c) in any case where the client is expected to make a decision on the basis of the information, inform the client of the risks involved, in so far as such risks could reasonably be expected to influence the client's decision.

(2) When the provider expressly or impliedly undertakes to provide the client with a recommendation to enable the client to make a subsequent decision, the provider must:

(a) base the recommendation on a skilful analysis of the expert knowledge to be collected in relation to the purposes, priorities, preferences and personal situation of the client;

(b) inform the client of alternatives the provider can personally provide relating to the subsequent decision and of their advantages and risks, as compared with those of the recommended decision; and

(c) inform the client of other alternatives the provider cannot personally provide, unless the provider expressly informs the client that only a limited range of alternatives is offered or this is apparent from the situation.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article provides further specification of the information provider's obligation of skill and care. It is the core of the regulation of information contracts.

The information provider is under an obligation to provide clear and understandable information, to act with reasonable care and skill with regard to evaluative information and to inform the client about risks. Moreover, the information provider who provides the client with a recommendation, i.e. the adviser, is under the obligation to mention alternatives.

Since the purpose of the information provided is to enable the client to make an enlightened subsequent choice, the information must be understandable and, if in writing, legible. According to paragraph (1)(a), the provider is to take reasonable measures to ensure the client understands the information. The more the provider gives the client the impression that the information is expressly tailored to the client's individual needs, the heavier the obligation in this respect. If, however, only a very limited service is given, especially if the information is given in a standardised form without actual contact between the parties, the provider's obligation to make sure a particular client understands the information is more limited.

Paragraph (1)(b) is the core of the Article. It provides that the information provider is to "act with the care and skill that a reasonable information provider would demonstrate under the circumstances when providing evaluative information".

An adviser advises a client to make a particular long-term investment. After ten years, it turns out that another investment would have been more profitable for the client.

The adviser is not liable, unless it is shown that he or she did not act with reasonable care and skill.

According to paragraph (1)(c), the information provider is to inform the client about the risks involved in the various courses of action available. The obligation to inform about risks exists when the client is expected to make a subsequent decision on the basis of the information received. It is generally accepted that the information provider has to inform the client about the risks involved in the latter's subsequent decision. This is considered to be one of the essential features of the obligation to inform.

When the information provider provides the client with a recommendation, i.e. in the case of advice contracts, special provisions are to be found in paragraph (2). The adviser's main obligation is to recommend a specific course of action from among the alternatives available. In order to do so, subparagraph (a) states that the adviser is to make a skilful analysis of the information gathered and, on the basis of that analysis, recommend a particular course of action to the client. In the analysis, the adviser must take into account all the alternatives at hand and the risks they involve. These alternatives may include not doing anything at all.

A patient can decide not to undergo treatment; a client of a lawyer can decide not to sue; an adviser on company strategy can advise against the merger with another company. If not doing anything is the best alternative for the client, the adviser should so advise the client.

Subparagraphs (b) and (c) impose on the adviser an obligation to inform the client of the alternatives available. However, as a rule the information provider is not under an obligation to mention alternatives to the client. Even when the adviser is in a position to provide one of the alternatives personally, the client should be informed about the alternatives the provider cannot supply, unless the information provider expressly informs the client that only a limited range of alternatives is offered or this is apparent from the situation.

An insurance broker does business with only a limited number of insurance companies, and recommends to his client the best alternative from among the insurance policies offered by those companies. He is obliged to disclose this situation to the client. This is also the solution of the EU Directive on insurance brokerage.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Several issues arise from this provision. If the existence of an obligation to give clear and understandable information is not debated, the other obligations of the information provider involve difficult choices and the reconciling of conflicting interests.

With regard to paragraph (1)(b), the issue is to determine whether the information provider is under an obligation of best efforts only or under an obligation to guarantee the result as envisaged by the parties by providing evaluative information (for discussion of the issue regarding factual information, see Comment B to IV.C.–7:105 (Conformity)). It is in principle difficult for the information provider to guarantee the exactness of evaluative information. This is usually the case when the information is not yet available or concerns a future event.

For every kind of forecast or prediction it is difficult for the information provider to guarantee the exactness of the information.

Illustration 4
A weather forecast agency predicts sunshine for the next day. However, a storm rages that day. The agency is not liable if it acted with the care of a professional of the same profession.

Illustration 5
A bank willing to lend money to a company requires a mortgage on a building belonging to the debtor. The bank requests a valuation of the building. The valuer is not under an obligation to guarantee the bank that it will effectively receive the valuation amount in case of enforcement of the guarantee. The bank must take the risks of market developments. The valuer's obligation is only to perform a valuation with reasonable care and skill.

Besides the supply of information about future and unknown events, i.e. predictions, more generally the question arises whether the information provider ought to be under an obligation of best efforts in all cases in which the information is not factual, but evaluative. When information has to be processed by the provider in order to perform the contractual obligations, it is usually unfair to impose on the provider a guarantee of the correctness of the information.

An estate agent is requested to provide information about the value of a villa. In order to do so, the estate agent has to process many factual data (surface, neighbourhood, recent sale prices of similar estates in the area …). This involves several hazards, and the agent cannot guarantee that the client will find a buyer at the valuation price given. The agent is under an obligation of best efforts, and is liable only if the required standard of care was not met.

As in the case of the provision of evaluative information, the adviser cannot guarantee that the result expected by the client will be achieved if the client acts on the recommendation. In other words, it is not possible to require from a professional adviser that the course of action advised is the best one for the client.

With regard to the obligation to mention the risks, the main issue is to assess precisely the extent of the risks that the information provider is to disclose. Since the information is provided in order to allow its recipient to take a subsequent decision, it seems logical to link the risks directly with the subsequent decision in such a way that only the risks that could reasonably be expected to influence the client's decision are to be disclosed. Since the information provider does not necessarily know what kind of risk might influence the decision of the client, it might be said that this solution places the provider in a position of uncertainty. It might be suggested that it would be better to specify in advance the risks to be disclosed. However, this solution would be possible only in relation to some types of information; for example in relation to the risks of certain medical treatments, where clear statistics exists, it might be possible to require the disclosure of those risks which turn up in statistics with a particular frequency. This solution would, on the other hand, be difficult to apply to other areas where such a calculation of frequency cannot be made and where it is impossible to regulate any particular situation. For this reason, it may be preferable to have a more general provision.

The question whether the adviser should be under an obligation to mention alternatives is not really an issue, as this principle is widely accepted. The main question is to determine whether the adviser should be bound to mention alternatives the adviser cannot provide personally. This situation occurs when the adviser also provides other kinds of services. This is frequently the case in the field of insurance advice. An argument in favour of such an obligation would be the faith placed in the adviser by the client, who may not know that the adviser may not be the best qualified person to execute the service. For this reason an adviser is, in principle, obliged to mention alternatives. This may in particular be the case if a specialisation has been developed within a particular profession. It is generally accepted that the standard of care a doctor has to meet may require the doctor (e.g. a general practitioner) to refer patients to another doctor (e.g. a specialist). On the other hand, in some situations the provider of a good or service is not obliged to refer to a competitor who can deliver better goods or services.

The duty to provide clear and understandable information is generally accepted in all European legal systems as part of the general standard of care required from the information provider. The case law is generally to the effect that the information provider is merely under an obligation to make the best efforts to provide correct information. Strict liability or obligations of result are generally not found in this area.

Several techniques are used in European jurisdictions to determine the risks to be disclosed: a priori determination, causation reasoning and standard-of-care reasoning. Apart from the type of legal reasoning applied, legal systems also diverge with regard to the determination of the extent of the risks that have to be mentioned. Especially concerning medical treatment, some legal systems impose on the provider the duty to inform the other party about all possible risks, even those that materialise exceptionally. This is, for example, the case for French law. In other legal systems there is no a priori statement of the risks which have to be disclosed. The risks to be disclosed are those that may influence the decision of the client (Germany, Austria). In yet other systems, the determination is made by applying a normal standard-of-care reasoning; the risks to be disclosed are the ones that a reasonably competent and skilful professional would have disclosed (England). Reference is made to professional literature and codes of ethics to determine what a reasonable professional would have disclosed.

No common position is to be found in European legal systems with regard to the obligation to mention alternatives. If the principle of this duty seems to be widely accepted for the adviser, there is divergence with regard to the information provider who does not provide a recommendation. The most important divergence probably concerns the duty of the adviser to mention alternatives that the adviser is not able to provide personally.

D. Preferred option

With regard to evaluative information, in this Article the obligation of best efforts is opted for. The information provider must provide the service with reasonable care and skill.

In paragraph (1)(c), causation reasoning is followed in order to determine the extent of the risk to be disclosed. The information provider only has to mention risks the awareness of which could reasonably influence the other party’s choice. Specific provisions exist with regard to information about risks in the treatment Chapter (IV.C.–8:105 (Obligation to inform)). However, according to paragraph (2) of this Article, the regime of the duty of the service provider to inform about therapeutic risks is governed by the provisions in the present Chapter.

The obligation to mention alternatives is imposed only on the adviser, not on the information provider who does not give a recommendation to the client. Concerning alternatives the adviser cannot personally provide, paragraph (2)(c) states an in-between solution, providing that in principle the adviser is to mention such alternatives. However, the adviser can exclude the obligation to mention such alternatives by explicitly stating that the advice given concerning only alternatives the adviser can personally provide or a limited range of alternatives provided by others. This statement must be given, as soon as the adviser comes into contact with the client. Moreover, sometimes it is obvious that the professional will only advise the client about alternatives the adviser can personally provide. If this is the case, there is no need to make the statement mentioned above.

A private individual requests a loan for the acquisition of a piece of an estate. The bank will only advise the potential client on the various types of loans it can offer him. The bank is not obliged to advise in favour of loan contracts offered by other banking institutions.

This Article contains default rules. The parties may agree that the information provider is to guarantee the exactness of the information even in providing evaluative information or advice. The standard of care can also be lowered by contractual stipulation. Frequently a client chooses not to be informed about the risks of a specific course of action.

Illustration 8
A patient decides not to be informed about the risks and the alternatives of the treatment recommended. In other words, the patient entirely trusts the physician and, in fact, asks the latter to take the decision in his place. This wish must be followed by the treatment provider and, as a consequence, his duty to inform is alleviated.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. As a principle, in ENGLAND, FINLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY, THE NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL, SCOTLAND, SPAIN and SWEDEN, the obligation of the information provider is an obligation of means. According to this the mere fact that the information provided is wrong or turns out to be wrong does not lead to liability on the part of the provider. It will be necessary to prove that the provider did not act with reasonable care and skill. As an exception in FRANCE some cases (e.g. CA Paris 22 November 1996, Juris-Data no. 024274) and authors (Delebecque, Contrat de renseignemen, fasc. 795, no. 83; Veaux, Contrat de conseil, fasc. 430, no. 116) are of the opinion that the provider is under an obligation of result in providing factual and verifiable information. In GERMANY such is the case when the information contract is qualified as a Werkvertrag. For a comparative analysis of this issue, see Pinna, The Obligations to Inform and to Advise, nos. 107-123.

2. When the obligation is of means, the standard of care is generally the one of the reasonably skilled professional taking reasonable care. This depends on the circumstances of the case and the nature of the information provided. Reference to the standards of the profession is made. In ITALY, a further alleviation of the obligation is to be found when the performance of the service is of particular difficulty (CC arts. 1176(2) and 2236). If such is the case the information provider is only liable in case of fraud or gross negligence. In SWEDEN, the degree of specialisation of the provider is taken into account to modulate the standard of care.

3. Although the existence of the information provider's obligation to disclose risks is generally accepted, the nature and the extent of the risks to be disclosed has led to an important dispute in doctrine and case law. In determining this, the solutions adopted by European legal systems diverge substantially. They diverge both with regard to the method followed in solving the issue and with regard to the final solution, i.e. the extent of risks that have to be disclosed. For a comparative analysis of this issue, see Pinna, The Obligations to Inform and to Advise, nos. 180-197.

4. The obligation to mention alternatives is generally accepted in some fields of practice, especially in medical information.

5. The obligation to mention alternatives that the service provider cannot provide is generally acknowledged in the medical field, with the exception of GERMANY (BGH 22 September 1987, IV ZR 238/86). In other fields of practice, the main solution takes into account the role played by the information provider. Especially if the provider gives the impression of being an independent adviser or of acting independently will there be an obligation to mention alternatives the provider cannot supply personally. A provider who does not intend to do so, must disclose the lack of independence. Most legal systems analyse this issue as one of conflict of interest.

II. Obligation of means or obligation of result

6. The nature of the obligation stemming from the contract depends upon the construction of the contract itself in ENGLAND. Although the general starting-point is that it is an obligation of means ("reasonable skill and care" under Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, art. 13), given the nature of the contract it will often be interpreted as containing a warranty that the information is correct, so that the obligation is in practice one of result. Information providers who wish to avoid such an obligation can exclude it (subject to the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977). In the case of advice the courts will be far more reluctant to read any warranty as to result into the contract, see e.g. Thake v. Maurice [1986] QB 644 in which the court held that a doctor performing a sterilisation operation had not given a contractual warranty that the patient would become permanently sterile, although he did demonstrate to the claimants (husband and wife) how the ends of the vas were to be cut and tied back.

7. Some cases in FRANCE have stated that the obligation to inform is an obligation of result and the obligation to advise is an obligation of means. The consequence of this is that wrong information is sufficient to lead to the liability of the provider (CA Paris 22 November 1996, Juris-Data no. 024274). However, the main line of the case law is in favour of the characterisation of the obligation as an obligation of means also when information is provided, i.e. wrong information must be the consequence of a faulty performance of the obligation to lead to liability of the provider (Delebecque, Contrat de renseignement, fasc. 795, no. 72). The Cour de cassation ruled that the client must establish that the provider did not act with the required diligence to collect exact information (Cass.com. 30 January 1974, D. 1974, 428 with note Tendler. For the appeal case, CA Lyon 27 October 1971, JCP 1972.II.17012, with note R. Savatier; D.

1972, 327 with note Tendler. For other cases, see CA Rennes 21 May 1974, Banque 1974, 848; RTD com 1974, 566 obs. Cabrillac, Rives-Lange). In a case of 1988 the Cour de cassation stated as a general principle that a bank is under a mere obligation of means in providing information (Cass.com. 10 October 1988, Bull. July, 1988, 931, no. 303; RD banc 1989, no. 12, p. 66, obs. Crédot, Gérard). In the case in question a client who wanted to acquire shares of a company asked his bank for information about the company and its creditworthiness. Following the receipt of such information he did buy the shares and a few months later the company went bankrupt. The client could not recover the loss from the bank, because no fault on the part of the bank could be established. (For other cases see Delebecque, Contrat de renseignement, fasc. 795, nos. 75 ff). However, in other cases wrong information has been regarded as sufficient to indicate fault on the part of the provider (Cass.com. 14 March 1978, D. 1979, 549 with note Tendler). In another case concerning the information exchanged between two banking institutions, the Cour de cassation ruled that providing wrong information was sufficient to lead to liability. (Cass.com. 9 January 1978, D. 1978 IR 308, obs. Vasseur; Cass.com. 9 June 1980, D. 1981 IR 192 obs. Vasseur; Cass.com. 24 November 1983, D. 1984 IR 707 obs. Vasseur). In legal doctrine it is considered that, concerning information accessible to everyone, the provision of wrong information leads directly to the liability of the provider (Delebecque, Contrat de renseignement, fasc. 795, no. 83). In other words in such cases the provider of information is under an obligation of result. More generally a part of the doctrine considers that the obligation to provide information which is verifiable should be in principle an obligation of result (Veaux, Contrat de conseil, fasc. 430, no. 116). The reason is that there is no hazard in the performance of such an obligation and the debtor should guarantee a result. This is the general criterion of the determination of an obligation of result in FRENCH law (See especially, Tunc 1945, and generally Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[8], no. 586). In any case it is easier for the client to establish fault on the part of an information provider than on the part of an adviser. Indeed it is easy to know when the information is wrong, while the judgement of the quality of advice is always subjective. Finally the recent case law of the Cour de cassation concerning ancillary obligations to inform and especially the burden of proof seems to go in the direction of the recognition of an obligation of result (see infra). On the other hand, for the obligation to advise, the general rule is that advice is not bad advice merely because it does not produce the result expected by the recipient. The Cour de cassation ruled that the adviser is under an obligation of means and not of result (Cass.com. 14 March 1978, D. 1979, 549 with note Tendler – for a commercial information office). The comparison between the advice expressed by the adviser and the result obtained in practice is not the criterion of the liability of the adviser (Cass.civ. III, 30 March 1982, Bull.civ. III, no. 67. A construction engineer who advised a client on the possibility of obtaining a building permit was not liable merely because no permit was granted: CA Paris 18 November 1988, D. 1989. IR 11. A legal consultant, who advises a client in favour of suing, does not give bad advice merely because the client does not win the case). The second consequence of this principle is that the adviser can ask for the remuneration of the work done even if the result is not obtained (Cass.com. 12 April 1988, Bull.civ. IV, no. 125. A consulting engineer in patents can ask for fees even if during his researches he found a similar patent already registered). On the other hand the adviser is liable for breach of the contract if the adviser has committed a fault (Cass.civ. I, 21 December 1964, Bull.civ. I, no. 585 – organisational adviser. CA Paris 22 November 1988, JCP 1989.II.21330 with note G. Raymond – recruitment adviser). In some exceptional cases the adviser has to guarantee the advice (obligation of result). This is the case when the adviser is at the same time a building constructor in the meaning of arts. 1792 and 1792-1 CC and if the advice leads to a defect in the construction. In this situation the adviser-constructor is under an obligation of result, because art 1792, which introduces a strict liability, is applicable (See for example, CA Paris 29 January 1987, D. 1988, somm. 115; RGAT 1987, 233 obs. J. Bigot – liability of a construction technical control agency which did not report the inadequacy of a roof).

8. In GERMANY contracts for information can fall under the contract for services (obligation of means) or the contract for work (obligation of result). Normally a contract for information can be considered as a contract for services (see e.g. for accountants: BGHZ 54, 106, 107 f.; BGH 1 July 1971 – VII ZR 295/69, WM 1971, 1206, BGH 6 December 1979 – VII ZR 19/79, VersR 1980, 264, 265; BGH 3 February 1988 – IVa ZR 196/86, WM 1988, 763, 764; Palandt [-Thomas], BGB[60], § 631 no. 18; Gräfe/Lenzen/Rainer, Steuerberaterhaftung[2]. nos. 123 ff, 127 ff; BGH 6 November 1980 – VII ZR 237/79, WM 1981, 92). Only rarely will a contract for information be a contract for work. This will be the case if an actual piece of work is to be carried out by the service provider – e.g. an attorney writing a legal opinion (BGH NJW 1965, 106), or an accountant drafting a contract on the basis of advice regarding the most advantageous tax-model for an enterprise (CA Cologne OLGZ 80 no. 105). In some German cases regarding liability for incorrect information liability is based on CC §§ 276 and 278, which are the general grounds for contractual liability for loss caused by negligence (BGH 12 February 1979, WM 1979, 548; NJW 1979, 1595 - contractual liability of a bank for wrong information regarding the creditworthiness of a client.). The motivation of this case is however ambiguous because the court asserted that, in application of these provisions, the bank was under an obligation "to supply objectively correct information". That could mean that, as in some FRENCH creditworthiness cases, a fault is present as soon as the information delivered is incorrect. In other words, the practical consequence of this is that the obligation of means has become an obligation of result.

9. The mere fact that the analysis on which advice is based is wrong does not mean that the adviser is liable under DUTCH law. The adviser is in that sense not under an obligation of result. Cf. Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, no. 347.

10. In POLAND, when the contract may be classified as one of the nominate contracts the line is easy to draw: the contract of specific work is classified as an obligation of result, while the mandate contract is an obligation of means. In a case of mixed contracts or innominate contracts classification of a given contract as embodying obligations of means or obligations of results depends on the contents of the contract and qualifications of the service provider.

11. The obligation to inform and to advise is an obligation of means in PORTUGAL. If the information is incorrect, but the standard of care was not breached, the adviser is not liable. (Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade por conselhos, 387, Código Civil Anotado I, ad art. 485.)

12. In SCOTTISH law the obligation to inform and advise is one of professional skill and care (Stair, The Laws of Scotland XV, para. 359 et seq). For example, a solicitor is not liable simply for making an error in providing advice, so long as he or she acted with the skill and care of a reasonably competent member of the profession.

13. Under SPANISH law, in principle, the information provider must act with the care and skill of a reasonable professional in the same situation. Because the service provider is under an obligation of means, it is in principle up to the client to prove that the service provider did not act according to the standard of care required. The Supreme Court regards the obligation of medical practitioners to inform as an essential requirement of the lex artis ad hoc (TS 2 October 1997, RJ 1997/7405; TS 13 April 1999 RJ 1999/2583). In other decisions the Tribunal Supremo considered the obligation to be part of the obligation of means assumed by the professional (TS 25 April 1994, RJ 1994/3073 AC 1994/3; TS 11 February 1997, RJ 1997/940). However, when the information regards objective facts a higher standard of care is to be observed since the professional is under the obligation to provide truthful and correct information and to verify such information, the obligation being a real obligation of result (See the opinion of M. Casals and J. Feliu, note under TS 7 June 2002, www.asociacionabogadosrcs.org/doctrina/). Regarding the legal advice contract, the courts point out that it is impossible to enumerate all the specific items of information to be given to the client, as the content of the lex artis ad hoc differs depending on the specific case; however, as the obligation in this contract is one of means and not of result, the professional must comply with the required standard of diligence and the information given must suffice so that the risk of the legal operation may be transferred to the client (SAP Tenerife 20 January 2006, AC 2006/655).

14. The mere fact that the analysis on which the advice is based is wrong does not mean that the adviser is liable in SWEDEN. The adviser is in that sense not under an obligation of result. Normally, one can distinguish between the result of the commission as a whole, where only significant discrepancy from the expected standard is considered as a lack of conformity, and special measures where the requirements are much higher (See Hellner/Hager/Persson, Speciell avtalsrätt II(1)[4], pp. 217 ff). As an example, a lawyer can be expected not to overlook rules and easily found cases, but will not be liable merely because a case is lost due to the fact that the lawyer was not as skilled as the client had hoped (Cf. NJA 1957 p. 621, where a lawyer had overlooked a case which was referred to in a well known legal book and was found liable for damages). In many cases the result of the commission can vary considerably since the advice given is always subjective, for example a stockbroker's investment advice or an official valuer's estimation of the value of a real estate (Kleineman, SvJT 1998, p. 190). In those cases the liability for the result will only arise in extreme cases and the adviser has a wide margin when it comes to the result, (cf. NJA 1987 p. 692 concerning evaluation of the market price of real estate).

III. Determination of the standard of care

15. In AUSTRIA the required standard of care depends on the circumstances of the case, mainly the contractual relationship and the necessary diligence according to the objective standard set out in CC art. 1299 (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht II[2], p. 183; SZ 49/47; ÖRZ 1981/15; JBl 1982, 534, EvBl 1982/3).

16. In ENGLAND the standard is an objective one – that of a reasonable information provider or adviser. (Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, art. 13, and in common law Bolam v. Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 WLR 582.)

17. In FRANCE if the obligation of the provider is an obligation of means, the standard of care is that of the "bon père de famille" (CC art. 1137). In case of a professional, comparison is made with a reasonably skilled professional exercising reasonable care.

18. In theory, no special rules on this question exist in GERMANY. In determining whether or not the adviser is liable, it needs first to be established that the advice was incorrect. This implies that the client (or the third party who relied on the advice) needs to show that the facts were misrepresented. Then the court has to be convinced that the adviser knew or should have known that the advice was incorrect (Cf. Müssig, NJW 1989, 1698). The criterion for liability does not differ according to the service provided: there is liability if the adviser did not live up to the standard of care that could be expected. However, what that standard is will be determined primarily according to the standards of the relevant profession (Cf. BGH 29 November 1994, VI ZR 189/93, VersR 1995, 659). If it results from the contract that the advice ought to protect the principal from certain risks and these risks materialise as a consequence of the poor quality of the advice, then the adviser is liable for the damage (Cf. BGH 26 June 1997, IX ZR 233/96, VersR 1997, 1489). For a legal adviser, this implies that the advice must conform to the case law of the supreme courts, even if these rulings are fiercely criticised in the professional doctrinal works and it cannot be ruled out this case law will be changed (Cf. BGH 29 March 1983, VI ZR 172/81, NJW 1983, 1665 (solicitor); BGH VersR 1993, 1413 (tax consultant); BGH 27 October 1994, IX ZR 12/94, VersR 1995, 303, NJW 1995, 330 (notary public)). An advice on possible investments needs to be correct, complete, understandable and careful (BGH 6 July 1993, XI ZR 12/93, NJW 1993, 2433, MDR 1993, 861, BB 1993, 1903, ZIP 1993, 1148).

19. The standard of care to be met in ITALY is the one specified in CC art. 1176, para. 2, according to which the professional care and skill has to be evaluated with regard to the kind of activity performed. The intellectual professional avoids incurring liability by performing the service with exacta diligentia, that is to say, the diligence required by the art. The care and skill required by this provision are of a high standard because of the particular interests involved, and, more generally, because the client has to rely on the professional's knowledge and skills. It still remains to be determined what is the content of professional diligence. The professional has to be aware of accepted scientific and practical solutions; knowledge of these solutions is indispensable for professionals who want to be active in a particular profession (Cass. 18 June 1975, no. 2439, Giur.it., 1976, I, 1, 953; Cass. 29 March 1976, no. 1132, Giur.it., 1977, I, 1, 1980). This principle is valid for every single professional category. The CC contains an exception to the provision of art. 1176 para. 2, regarding professionals providing intellectual services. When the performance of the service is of particular difficulty, the provider is liable only in the case of fraud or gross negligence according to art. 2236. The Corte di cassazione states explicitly that art. 2236 is an exception to the general rule determining the standard of care (Cass. 11 August 1990, no. 8218). The doctrinal interpretation of this provision goes in the direction of the limitation of its scope of application only to the performance of services that require a greater expertise than normally required by the same category of professionals (Bianca, Diritto civile V, no. 18; Cattaneo, La responsabilità, p. 72; Perulli, Contratto d´opera e professioni intellettuali, pp. 611 ff). Therefore, a reduction of the standard of care exists only in rare situations. The discussions during the drafting of the CC showed the interests which need to be reconciled: firstly, not to reduce the initiative of the professional because of a liability too easily engaged; secondly, not to allow the professional not to be diligent just because the performance of the service in question is particularly difficult. The Supreme Court continues to reconcile these two purposes in the assessment of serious fault by deciding that non-compliance with basic knowledge of the profession is a serious fault (Cass. 26 March 1990, no. 2428, concerning medical liability. In the court's opinion there could be particular difficulty only in the case of new clinical cases not yet treated by practice.). Every professional has to ascertain the particular difficulty of a case and if necessary has to inform the client of this situation and advise the client to consult a specialist (See, e.g., Cass. 26 March 1990, loc. cit.).

20. The criterion in the NETHERLANDS is whether or not a reasonably skilled professional acting reasonably, in the given circumstances – including the information that has or should have been collected – could not have given the information or advice which was in fact given. Cf. HR 26 April 1991, NedJur 1991, 455 (Benjaddi/Neve). Unless the adviser has confessed – preferably in advance – to a substandard level of expertise, the adviser must at least provide advice of good average quality, meaning the quality that can reasonably be expected of a reasonably skilled professional acting reasonably. Cf. Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, no. 349. The above is clear for advice, but there is no good reason to judge differently for contracts to provide plain information.

21. In POLAND the relevant rule is CC art. 355. It requires acting with the diligence generally required in the particular type of relationship. The due diligence of a professional is to be assessed by reference to the professional nature of the activity (CC art. 355 para. 2). The Supreme Court has clarified (Judgment of the Supreme Court of 25. 9. 2002, I CKN 971/100, Lex no. 56902) that the due diligence of the professional does not mean any exceptional diligence, but a diligence adjusted to the acting party, the subject and the circumstances in which the obligations are to be performed.

22. In PORTUGAL an adviser must act with the diligence of a good paterfamilias (art. 487/2 CC). A professional is bound by the standard of care of a good professional: cf. CA Lisboa, 27 July 1998, CJ, 1998, 4, 130. There is a duty to follow directions of the client as well as a duty to give account (art. 1161 CC). The adviser must acquire the facts needed to formulate an opinion and make an accurate technical application of them, in conformity with the leges artis to be appreciated in the light of the most recent information available at the time the opinion was issued. Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade por conselhos, p. 388. Standard of care of attorneys: art. 83/1c) d) Estatuto da Ordem dos Advogados. Standard of care of doctors: 26 Código Deontológico.

23. The standard is an objective one in SCOTLAND (Hunter v. Hanley 1955 SC 200).

24. The due diligence to be observed under SPANISH law by the provider of a service is that imposed by the “lex artis” which regulates the service provider’s profession. In giving both information and advice, the provider must act with the care and skill that a reasonable information provider would demonstrate under the given circumstances in accordance with the lex artis of the profession. It is a qualified standard of care if compared with the general diligence of the good father (art. 1104, para. 2 CC) as a result of the relationship of confidence arising in services contracts where the client relies on the expertise of the professional and expects the professional to execute the service so as to comply with the client’s interests under the contract. In accordance with art. 1104, para. 1, the due diligence required by the nature of the obligation is also modulated by the circumstances of the parties, and the time and place where the obligations are to be performed. (TS 11 March 1991, RJ 1991/2209; SAP Segovia 13 April 2000, AC 2000/1005, concerning a solicitor).

25. There is no fixed standard of care in SWEDEN and FINLAND; this will depend on the situation and the parties. However, some professions have a special standard of care of their own. In the Swedish Act on Financial Advice to Consumers a standard of care for sound advice practice is introduced, see art. 5 (1). The meaning of this standard will be decided through a general assessment of trade organisations’ agreements, directions, general advice, case law etc. (Lycke/Runesson/Swahn, Ansvar vid finansiell rådgivning, p. 106). A corresponding rule is found in the FINNISH Security Markets Act s. 4. In other cases it must firstly be established which norm the professional has breached. Secondly, it must be decided whether the breach was so serious that the deviation should be considered as negligent (Kleineman, SvJT 1998, p. 189). A specialist has however normally a higher standard of care than the generalist, which is shown in NJA 1981 p. 1091, where a lawyer in a case regarding expropriation had only claimed that the compensation should be index-bound to a certain date. However, it would have been possible to make this claim until a later date, which would have been more favourable to the client. The HD found that the lawyer had acted negligently since he was regarded as a specialist in this field, and he was found liable for damages (See Kersby, JT 1997-98, p. 157).

IV. Obligation to mention risks and alternatives

26. It has been established by AUSTRIAN case law that the adviser is under a duty to mention alternatives and risks (OGH 23 February 1999, 4 Ob 335/98p, JBl 1999, 531, physician).

27. In BELGIUM a physician has to inform the patient about any risks of the operation which are relevant to the patient's choice (art. 8 of the act of 22 August 2002 on the rights of the patient).

28. In ENGLISH law there is in principle an obligation to mention risks that the ordinary client might reasonably regard as relevant (Sidaway v. Board of Governors of the Bethlem Royal Hospital [1985] AC 871; for a physician). There is generally no obligation to mention alternatives. In doctrine, see Hodgin, Professional Liability, p. 516 (risks which the ordinary client might reasonably regard as relevant).

29. In FRANCE it is a part of the information provider's obligation to inform the client about risks. For example a notary must inform the client of the uncertainty of the case law (Cass.civ. I, 9 December 1997, Defr. 1998, p. 353, obs. J.-L. Aubertt). The notary must inform a buyer of the risk that the tax administration will exercise its pre-emptive right (Cass.civ. I, 8 January 1986, Bull.civ. I, no. 104). A construction engineer must inform the client of the risks involved in the construction process (Cass.civ. III, 4 May 1976, no. 184; D. 1977, 34, annotation J. Mazeaud). The doctor who has a secondary obligation to advise must make the patient aware of the risks, even exceptional risks, of the operation (Cass.civ. I, 7 October 1998, JCP 1998.II.10179 with concl. Sainte Rose and annotation P. Sargos; CCC 1998, no. 160, annotation Leveneur; D. 1999, 145; RTD civ 1999, 111 obs. Jourdain). (Nowadays art L. 1111-2 Code de la santé publique). When the risks are too important compared to the necessity of the operation the doctor has an obligation to refuse to perform it. This special obligation, which is very different from the obligation of advice or information, has been discovered by the Cour de cassation in application of the Code of medical ethics (Cass.civ. I, 27 May 1998, Bull.civ. I, no. 187; Resp. civ. et assur. 1998, no. 276; D. 1998, 530 note Laroche-Gisserot). It is included in the definition of the advice itself that the adviser has to mention the alternatives. The obligation of the provider is to inform the recipient about the advantages of a specific course of action and then to guide the client to take a decision and explain why (confirmed for medical information, art L. 1111-2 Code de la santé publique).

30. As a general rule in GERMANY, the information provider is obliged to inform the client both of the risks involved and the alternatives at hand. Failure to inform amounts to a non-performance of either primary or secondary obligations and may lead to liability. However, liability may be reduced if the client culpably neglects to mention information which the client knows or should have known are relevant to the advice (Cf. BGH 11 February 1999, IX ZR 14/98, MDR 1999, 571, VersR 1999, 1417). The content and the extent of the obligation to inform depend on a number of circumstances, some of which relate to the client and others to the object of the advice. According to the BGH the circumstances of the case at hand are decisive (Cf. BGH 6 July 1993, XI ZR 12/93, NJW 1993, 2433, MDR 1993, 861, BB 1993, 1903, ZIP 1993, 1148). In general, circumstances relating to the client which are almost always considered to be relevant are the client's knowledge and experience of the area of the advice and willingness to take risks. With regard to the object of the advice, the relevant circumstances tend to differ according to the object at hand. In the doctor-patient-relationship, the right to self-determination is thought to form the basis of the obligation to inform the patient of the risks involved, of the necessity of the advised procedure and of the existence or non-existence of alternatives. (See for instance Kullmann, VersR 1999, 1190.) Information on possible detrimental consequences is not necessary if these consequences occur only in very rare cases and it is unlikely that a reasonable patient would seriously take them into account in deciding whether or not to consent to the treatment (Cf BGH 9 December 1958, VI ZR 203/57, BGHZ 29, 46). However, exceptions to this rule exist, a major one being the obligation to inform about rare risks which, if they materialised, would have very serious consequences for the patient (Cf. BGH 7 July 1992, VI ZR 211/91, VersR 1993, 228). If the procedure is not of absolute medical necessity, but is merely to reassure the patient's mind, the doctor needs to make that clear to the patient. When alternatives to the advised treatment exist, the obligation to inform the patient includes the mentioning of risks which are thought to exist by a respectable school of thought but have not yet led to an established scientific opinion (Cf. BGH 21 November 1995, VI ZR 329/94, NJW 1996, 776). A doctor is not obliged to inform the patient of risks which could only occur in case of errors in the treatment (Cf. BGH 20 October 1961, VI ZR 39/61, VersR 1962, 155; BGH 19 March 1985, VI ZR 227/83, NJW 1985, 2193, VersR 1985, 736). An attorney is obliged to inform the client about the risk involved in the litigation (BGH NJW 1984, 791; BGH 6 February 1992, NJW 1992, 1159). On the other hand, a bank is not obliged, on the sale of stock options, to inform the client of alternatives or risks if the client is familiar with the market (BGH 04 February 1992, quoted by Canaris, Bankvertragsrecht[2], no. 1881).

31. In many situations in ITALY the obligation to inform about risks has been acknowledged. The amount of information to be given about risks depends on the mental conditions and the education of the client (Cass. 6 December 1968, no. 3906, Giust.civ.Mass. 1968, 2051, medical information). In the case of aesthetic surgery, the client has to have the maximum awareness of the risks of the intervention (Cass. 8 April 1997, n. 3046, Foro it., 1997, I, c. 1801).

32. A duty to mention alternatives in THE NETHERLANDS will probably not exist in the case of a contract for information, unless the information would not be considered complete or in conformity with the contract otherwise. Such would be the case if the client explicitly asked for information regarding all available alternatives, which would imply a rather sophisticated contract, closely resembling an advice contract. With regard to advice, the following could be mentioned. The adviser needs to make clear that all the options have been examined, but it is, in the end, the client who has to make the choice whether or not to follow the advice. In order to do so, the client will need all the information on risks and alternatives the adviser can give. Therefore, the duty to mention alternatives and risks seems to be a logical consequence of the obligation to advise, since the client is to know why the recommended course of action is in fact recommended. Cf. Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, no. 354. Michiels van Kessenich-Hoogendam, Beroepsfouten[3], no. 16, states that the client is entitled to an honest, complete and clear description of the state of affairs. It is not disputed that risks should be mentioned. Cf. Michiels van Kessenich-Hoogendam, Beroepsfouten[3], no. 17. In so far as the mentioning of alternatives adds to the clarity of the risks at stake, it is generally accepted there is such a duty as well. Cf. Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, no. 355. One 'alternative' should always be mentioned: what will happen if the client chooses to do nothing at all. This is clear for a doctor's advice to a patient, since the patient's right to self-determination is at stake, but also applies to other obligations to advise. Cf. Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, nos. 354-356.

33. In POLAND an obligation to mention risks and alternatives can be deduced from the obligation to act with due diligence (CC art. 355) and the general rules on the performance of obligations (CC art. 355).

34. The information provider is bound under PORTUGUESE law to cover broadly the several problems posed by the service, especially regarding disputed questions, while employing the sources available, so that the client will be able to safely take a decision based on the information and the advice provided. Cf. Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade por conselhos, p. 388. This obligation covers the risks and alternatives regarding the topic. Cf. Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade por conselhos, p. 393. See also the conduct codes for Attorneys (Estatuto da Ordem dos Advogados), art. 83.1.c) and for physicians (Código deontológico) art. 38.

35. In SCOTLAND the information provider's duty of care includes an obligation to warn of risks, for example in relation to a proposed medical intervention (e.g. Moyes v Lothian Health Board 1990 SLT 444, McFarlane v Tayside Health Board 2000 SC (HL) 1).

36. In SPANISH law, the obligation to advise (unlike the obligation to inform) obliges the debtor to mention alternatives. According to Gomez Calle (Los deberes precontractuales de informacion, p. 120), for an advice obligation to exist the provider must have undertaken such an obligation expressly or the obligation must be implied because of the relationship of confidence which arises between the parties. In other cases, it is the nature of the client's interests (health, freedom), which imposes the obligation on the provider to disclose all alternatives and make a recommendation. However, the fact that an information provider is a professional does not necessarily imply an obligation to advise the client. For instance, a bank is under an obligation to provide the client with updated information concerning different investment possibilities, but it does not seem appropriate to require the bank to indicate which of the possibilities is the better one. Requiring the bank as a professional to do so would result in imposing on the bank an obligation to carry out a deep research into the needs and patrimonial circumstances of the client (E. Gomez Calle, op. cit. loc. Cit). However, the Spanish Lawyers Code of Conduct in its art. 13 provides that the solicitor should give his or her opinion on the legal matter and inform the client about the predictable result. The advice contract is not specifically regulated under Spanish law. However, the writers consider that the appropriate dispositions of the Civil Code on the service contract are applicable, mutatis mutandis (Bercovitz, Contratos Mercantiles[3], p.696). As the case law considers that in this type of contract the obligations of the provider are of means, not of result (TS 7 February 2000, RJ 2000/283) which, consequently, transfers the risk of the success of the operation to the client, a provider's duty to inform about the risks and alternatives may be inferred from the principle of good faith (CC art. 1258) and the obligation of applying lex artis ad hoc.

37. Under SWEDISH and FINNISH law the information provider should normally and at least to a certain extent inform about alternatives and risks. This would however also depend upon whether or not the other party is a consumer. Normally at least the scope of the duty to mention risks is limited through the competence and knowledge of the buyer. In the SWEDISH NJA 1994 p. 598 (concerning a bank acting as a tax adviser), the Supreme Court stated that the duty to mention risks must always be judged depending on the situation and especially on the knowledge of the buyer. In the FINNISH case KKO 2007:72 a bank taking care of the financial arrangements in a transaction concerning immoveable property was held to have a duty to inform the buyer of a note secured by a mortgage on the property. In KKO 2001:121 an estate agent was held to be under an obligation to inform the buyer of plans for a new railway line near the house.

V. Alternatives the service provider cannot provide

38. The obligation of advisers to mention alternatives that they cannot provide themselves does not concern all categories of advisers. Indeed, some advisers are independent or must be independent, and some are not. This difference has been explicitly made in several cases, especially in ENGLAND. In one case, the Court of Appeal noted that in insurance services there are tied-agents and independent advisers. In the case in question, the agent was a company representative who was required not to recommend other companies' products. The Court ruled that the agent was only under a duty to advise the client against buying the products of the company he represented where such a purchase would not be in the client's interest; his duty did not extend to recommending other companies' products (Gorham v. British Telecommunications plc. [2000] 1 WLR 2129.). The position of an independent adviser would certainly have been different, as is shown by the reasoning in the case.

39. In FRANCE it has been held that a professional seller is not obliged to carry out a comparative assessment in favour of competitors (Cass.com., 12 November 1992, D. 1993, somm., p. 237, obs. Tournafond; RTD civ 1993, p. 116, obs. Mestre). But an adviser who claims to be independent must mention alternatives he or she cannot provide personally. This is regarded as a rule concerning conflict of interest.

40. In the case of medical treatment in GERMANY there is no duty to mention alternatives of better personnel or better means as long as the treatment offered comes up to the necessary medical standard (BGH 22 September 1987, IV ZR 238/86).

41. In ITALY this issue is closely related to the issue of the influence of personal interests of the service provider in the case at hand (see infra). In general, the information provider is not required to inform about alternatives which could be supplied by third parties. However, such alternatives must be mentioned if the provider claims to be an independent adviser. For instance a purportedly independent broker cannot hide behind such a facade the activity of promoting contracts with some specific insurance companies.

42. In his book on the position of the solicitor under DUTCH law, Sanders, De advocaat met raad en daad, p. 29) clearly states that the solicitor's interest in carrying out the recommended course of action should in any case not play any role in the advice. More generally, Michiels van Kessenich-Hoogendam, Beroepsfouten[3], no. 18, states the adviser is not allowed to be led by his or her own interests. It is debated whether or not the adviser has the duty to advise a client to turn to a more specialised colleague. For a doctor, this is generally accepted, cf. Michiels van Kessenich-Hoogendam, Beroepsfouten[3], no. 23; Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, no. 392. However, for providers of other kinds of advice, it is doubted whether it would be wise to impose such a duty. An argument in favour of such a duty would be the faith entrusted in the adviser by the client, who might not know the adviser is not the best qualified person to execute the advice. On the other hand, a provider of a service usually does not have the obligation to point out that a competitor can perform the service better. Imposing an obligation to include this in the advice might therefore be considered odd. See for hesitations both Michiels van Kessenich-Hoogendam, Beroepsfouten[3], no. 23 and Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, nos. 392-393. These authors (at no. 394) recommend an in-between position, namely that such a duty ought to be imposed if within the group of professionals executing the service, the service usually is performed by specialised professionals. This is to be assumed, they argue, if within the service, specialisms exist.

43. In POLAND an obligation to mention alternatives the service provider cannot provide can be deduced from the obligation to act with the due diligence (CC art. 355) and the general rules on the performance of obligations (CC art. 355). Moreover, in the case of the contract of specific work, if there any circumstances which may prevent it being properly carried out, the person receiving the order is obliged to immediately notify the service provider about that fact (CC art. 634).

44. Duties of referral exist under PORTUGUESE law for professionals if their skills fall below the expected standard of care. Codes of conduct will usually be the source of such obligations: e.g. doctors have a duty of referral if specialised skills are demanded (arts. 29 and 112 Código deontológico).

45. Doctors must inform the patient, according to the SPANISH TS of 25 April 1994, RJ 1994/3073 if the material, instruments or tools which are to be used to provide the service may turn out to be insufficient. The information must be given in such a way as to allow the patient or the family to have recourse to other medical providers (also in TS 7 May 1997, RJ 1997/3874). The obligation to refer to other professionals involves a conflict of interests: the interests of the client (who expects to be provided with the best alternative) against the interests of the professional (who does not want to give clients to competitors in the market). When the interests of the client deserve higher protection (health, freedom) the information provider is obliged to recommend another professional (SAP Segovia 13 April 2000, AC 2000/1005 - where the Court of appeal expressly argues that the sickness of the lawyer is not a defence since the professional should have referred the client to another lawyer).

46. In SWEDEN the adviser is probably not bound to inform about services provided by others. Where banks are acting as financial advisers, it is common practice only to promote alternatives provided by the bank in question. The financial adviser here seems to have as a primary task to sell the products provided by the bank, (Pålsson and Samuelsson, SvJT 1999, p. 554). However, according to the Act on Financial Advice for Consumers, art. 5 (1), the adviser is obliged to take due care of the interests of the client, which includes informing the consumer whether the adviser can only recommend the products of one provider or can give a broader picture of the products supplied by the market as a whole and sometimes even pointing out to the consumer that the consumer may need more advice from another source, SOU 2002:41, p. 122.

IV.C.–7:105: Conformity

(1) The provider must provide information which is of the quantity, quality and description required by the contract.

(2) The factual information provided by the information provider to the client must be a correct description of the actual situation described.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Paragraph (1) states the obvious – namely that the information provider is obliged to provide information of "the quantity, quality and description required by the contract". What the contract requires will depend on its terms and may involve a question of interpretation. There is normally little difficulty in relation to the quantity and description of the information required. So far as the quality of the information is concerned, in the case of evaluative information or advice there will normally be no obligation to achieve a specific result envisaged by the client, such as perhaps a completely accurate valuation or prediction. This will follow from the application of IV.C.–2:106 (Obligation to achieve result) because of the inherent risks involved in evaluations and predictions. The contract, properly interpreted, may impose no obligation at all relating to the quality of the information to be provided, in which case the obligation of skill and care will be the only relevant obligation in this respect. The obligation will simply be one of means, not result. Alternatively, the normal default rule on quality may apply, in which case the quality required is that "which the recipient could reasonably expect in the circumstances". (II.–9:108 (Quality)). This will normally be something within the range of what would be provided by a competent information provider exercising the normally required degree of skill and care.

As a consequence, in the case of bad performance of an obligation to provide evaluative information or advice the liability of the information provider will often be determined by reference to the default rules on the obligation of skill and care. In the case of absence of performance or incomplete performance, the present Article applies.

> A publisher contracts with a lawyer to give pre-publication advice as to whether two manuscripts might infringe rights to privacy. The lawyer is under an obligation to supply the service requested, viz. to determine whether the books contain items that may lead to claims for breach of privacy. This is an obligation of result. The lawyer is liable if he does not perform the contractual obligations or if he performs them only partially, e.g. by providing advice regarding only one of the manuscripts, or if he provides advice of the wrong description, e.g. advice on defamation instead of advice on breach of privacy rights. On the other hand, after the service has been provided the way in which it was provided is assessed by reference to the due standard of skill and care.

Paragraph (2) introduces a particular provision with regard to factual information as opposed to evaluative information or advice. In the case of factual information, the information provider is to guarantee, on principle, the correctness of the information provided. There is an obligation to achieve this result when the information is merely factual.

Illustration 2
A lawyer is contracted to provide information about the latest case law of the Supreme Court on a particular issue. If the information is wrong, e.g. if a recent reversal of the line of the case law is not mentioned, the provider is in breach of contract, whether the incorrectness of the information is the consequence of the negligence of the information provider in collecting or supplying that factual information or not.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The main issue here is whether the provider who supplies factual information is to be obliged to guarantee its correctness or will be liable only if it is proved that there was a failure to come up to the required standard of skill and care. In Comment B to the preceding Article, it was explained that it was difficult to accept that the information provider who supplies evaluative information should be liable merely because the information is incorrect. One reason is that evaluative information may amount to a prediction, which in itself means uncertainty. Moreover, evaluative information, when it is not a prediction, is in itself an opinion, whose correctness is not verifiable. It is also arguable that the correctness check cannot be applied to an opinion. These arguments do not apply when the information provider is to supply information of a purely factual nature, i.e. when the service concerns facts which can be collected and verified with certainty. If the information is factual, it is generally easy for it to be checked and its provision does not involve any uncertainty. In such a case, the client will expect to receive correct information, not wrong and misleading information.

European legal systems do not expressly follow the distinction that is made in this Chapter between factual and evaluative information. However, in many jurisdictions it appears that a breach of the obligation of skill and care is more easily found when objective information is provided. Moreover, in situations concerning the mere provision of factual information, an important trend in legal literature is of the opinion that the information provider should guarantee its accuracy.

C. Preferred option

The preferred option is that in the case of factual information the information provider is to guarantee the correctness of the information. The reason is that there is no uncertainty involved in the performance of such an obligation, and the information is easy to check. The contracting parties can expect achievement of an accurate result. Indeed, when factual information is obtained contractually, the customer will generally rely on its exactness. As a consequence, the information provider is liable when the client proves that the factual information provided is incorrect. The information provider can be relieved of liability only by proving that the incorrectness of the information is due to an excusing impediment within the meaning of III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment). The information provider, on the other hand, is not excused by proving that the service was performed with reasonable care and skill.

Paragraph (2) is a particularisation of IV.C.–2:106 (Obligation to achieve result) because a reasonable client requesting objective information would have no reason to believe that there is a substantial risk that the information provided would be incorrect.

D. Distinction between evaluative and factual information

The question may arise whether the information to be provided is factual or evaluative.

Illustration 3
Information exchanged between banks on the creditworthiness of clients is a delicate issue. When creditworthiness only concerns the financial situation of the debtor at the time of the provision of the information, the information provider guarantees the correctness of that information: it is considered to be factual. However, when future creditworthiness is concerned, the information is considered to be evaluative, i.e. it concerns the processing of actual information to predict the future situation of the debtor and its capacity to reimburse his debts. In such a case, the information provider is merely under the obligation to act with reasonable care and skill.

Even if the information provided is factual, that information may not always give a precise answer to the client's problem. An example is a lawyer's knowledge of positive law. If there are uncertainties about the interpretation of a court case or of a statute, the information provider must inform the client of that. Difficulties in interpretation are in themselves facts that must be disclosed.

A tax adviser is requested to explain the criteria for exemption from plus-value taxes on the resale of houses by non-residents. It appears that the tax authorities and the courts do not treat the improvements made to houses in the same way. The tax adviser in answering must make this difference in opinion clear to the client.

However, even if purely factual information was to be provided it is sometimes impossible for the provider to guarantee its correctness. Even if the information requested by the client exists, it cannot always be collected in its entirety or be verified. If this is the case, the provider is to notify the client that the exactness of the information cannot be guaranteed. The provider is to notify the client on becoming aware of this circumstance. Sometimes the provider is in the position to inform the client before the performance of the service begins. In other situations, the uncertainty about the reliability of the information collected is known only after verification, and therefore after the performance of the service has started. Such is the case concerning information about the creditworthiness of a merchant. The provider is relieved of this obligation to notify only when it is self-evident that the exactness of the information cannot be guaranteed. Here IV.C.–2:102 (Pre-contractual duties to warn) and IV.C.–2:108 (Contractual obligation of the service provider to warn) apply.

A detective agency is engaged by a woman to assess the fidelity of her husband. After several weeks of surveillance and investigation, the detective agency does not find any evidence of infidelity. Even if this is the provision of factual information, it is evident that the agency is not liable merely because it did not discover the truth. The betrayed woman must prove that the agency acted negligently.

The Article contains default rules. The parties are free to decide precisely on the nature and the content of their obligations. The existence of default rules is, however, of relevance in information contracts, because in practice such contracts are often concluded orally and the parties do not precisely describe the obligations of the information provider.

NOTES

1. See the Notes to the preceding Article.

IV.C.–7:106: Records

In so far as this may reasonably be considered necessary, having regard to the interest of the client, the provider must keep records regarding the information provided in accordance with this Chapter and make such records or excerpts from them available to the client on reasonable request.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The purpose of the rule is two-fold. The first purpose is to give the client the opportunity to check what the information provider has done under the contract and, more precisely, the steps taken in performing the contractual obligations. In order to evaluate the way the service has been performed, the client may need to know the way in which the information provider organised the performance.

Illustration 1
The managing director of a company engages an auditors' firm to make a valuation of a target company for the purpose of its acquisition. Since there are several methods in corporate finance for determining the value of a company, the client is entitled to request the auditors to disclose the method applied to determine the value of the company and the elements taken into account.

The second purpose of this Article derives from the consideration that, when dealing with liability for non-performance of an obligation to inform and to advise, the burden of proof is of great importance. This Article is an attempt to solve the issue of burden of proof. With regard to the non-performance, the allocation of the burden of proof is not stated explicitly in the Article, but can be derived from it. Since the information provider is under an obligation to account for what has been done, there will in effect be an obligation to prove that the contractual obligations were performed and the way in which they were performed. Such an obligation may also become relevant in the case of litigation. At this stage, the information provider is bound to supply evidence of the way the contractual obligations were performed. On the other hand, this provision does not impose on the information provider an obligation to prove that there was no failure to perform any obligation arising from the contract; the obligation is merely to provide the elements necessary to assess this.

The managing director of a company engages an auditors' firm to make a valuation of a target company for the purpose of its acquisition. On the basis of this valuation, the target company is purchased. Shortly after the acquisition, the value of the company turns out to be much lower than the price paid and the value assessed by the auditors. In the litigation between the client and the auditor, the latter is to inform the court about the elements of the valuation and the method applied.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The issue whether or not to shift the burden of proof is a controversial one. Placing that burden on the client without further consideration will result in a situation in which clients will want to file claims they cannot substantiate. It will indeed be very difficult for a client to prove that the information requested was not received. Very often the information is delivered orally and no written evidence exists. Even if the information was supposed to be supplied in writing, it may still be problematic for the client to prove that the contract was not performed. On the other hand, even if the client received the information or the advice in writing, it may be difficult to prove a failure of the provider to perform the contractual obligations if the client does not have information on how the information provider carried out the task.

On the basis of these arguments, one may argue that the burden of proof should be imposed upon the information provider. However, this would not justify a complete reversal of the burden of proof. The negative proof (probatio diabolica) argument supports a shift of the burden of proof with regard to effective performance of the contractual obligations and with regard to the way they have been carried out. This argumentation does not justify a reversal of the burden of proof on whether there has been a failure of performance. In fact, as soon as the client has information on all the elements needed to evaluate the performance of the service, the burden of proving that the information provider did not perform the obligation of skill and care may appropriately be placed on the client. Moreover, placing the burden of proof entirely on the information provider may place the provider in a very unfavourable situation and, as a consequence, may lead to a refusal to perform the service requested. This is the case especially if the burden of proof is completely shifted and the provider is under the obligation to prove that the performance was in conformity with the required standard of skill and care.

Finally, there is also an argument of legislative policy that might favour a shift of the burden of proof. This is related to the preventive role this may have when the provider has to prove performance of the obligation. Facilitating the assessment of the liability of the information provider is a tool to force the information provider to effectively supply the information the client needs to decide whether the contractual obligation has been duly performed. Legal systems have been very sensitive to this argument especially with regard to medical information and advice and the issue of informed consent.

C. Preferred option

For the reasons given above, the Article imposes on the information provider an obligation to keep records regarding the information provided to the client and make them available to the client on reasonable request. In effect, therefore, the provider is under an obligation to give account for the performance of the service. In particular, it is up to the provider to prove that the information was supplied and to make clear how the information was collected and processed. The proof of incorrect performance of the service remains on the client.

The Article can be applied differently depending on whether the provision of information is the main object of the contract or merely an ancillary obligation. The obligation to keep records and make them available does not generally involve extra efforts when the provision of information is the main obligation. If this is the case, the provider will often give account simultaneously with providing the service.

Illustration 3

A client receives legal advice from a lawyer. It is a written document of 50 pages. It turns out that the course of action recommended is not the best one for the client and leads to a substantial loss of money. To recover damages, the client will have to prove that the advice was not based on a skilful analysis of the information gathered.

In this case, the client has all the elements needed to try to prove that the provider did not perform the obligation of skill and of care.

On the other hand, with regard to ancillary obligations, the performance of the obligation will more often require a particular action on the side of the information provider. In such a case, the client usually receives only the outcome of a complex effort on the part of the provider, i.e. information or a recommendation, without details about the reasons and the elements considered in the process up to the conclusion. Moreover, ancillary obligations to inform are usually fulfilled orally.

A patient claims he did not receive adequate information from his physician and that, as a consequence, his consent to the treatment cannot be classified as informed consent. Since it is impossible for him to indicate what information he did receive as it was delivered orally and since he cannot explain why he was advised to undergo that treatment, the physician has to produce the relevant records concerning the giving of the information.

This Article seems to be in conformity with the actual practice of many providers of information services. The Article will probably have the practical consequence of inducing information providers to pre-establish a written document. This written document will prevent disputes and litigation on proof issues.

A civil-law notary, after having provided advice for the drafting of a contract that the client does not wish to follow, requires from the client a letter of confirmation stating that the client received the information and the advice and decided to choose a different course of action. By this means the notary has proof of the fulfilment of the obligation to inform and advise.

The Article contains a default rule. Contracting parties may agree to relieve the information provider of the obligation to keep records and make them available. This stipulation may be of use in case of confidentiality, such as when the information provided includes particular know-how. In such a case the client may prefer there to be no records in the hands of anyone else.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. The general rule is that it is up to the client who seeks a remedy to prove that the provider of a service did not perform the obligations under the contract with reasonable care and skill. With regard to information duties this solution is disputed. While some legal systems (such as the ENGLISH) tend to follow the traditional solution, others, using different techniques and different grounds, reverse the burden of proof at least in some cases (FRANCE, GERMANY, ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS, SPAIN). In some European directives regarding consumer protection there is a particular provision reversing the normal burden of proof in relation to duties of information. A comparative panorama can be found in Pinna, The Obligations to Inform and to Advise, nos. 152-167.

II. Burden of proof on breach of duty

2. Under AUSTRIAN law the issue is dealt with by interpreting the provisions of the CC concerning the issue of the burden of proof in the performance of contractual and legal obligations (On this issue, see, especially, Welser, Schadenersatz statt Gewährleistung, pp. 52-74). The interpretation of these Articles originated a very important doctrinal debate, the outcome of which for our topic is that the burden of proof in the case of breach of duty remains with the creditor of the obligation to inform and to advise. The most general of all rules is that a person making a claim has to substantiate all the prerequisites of the claim and, especially, has to prove fault if that is alleged (art. 1296 CC). In the field of claims arising from the breach of a contractual or legal obligation, art. 1298 CC introduces an important exception to that rule. According to this Article, "a person who asserts that he has been prevented from the performance of a contractual or legal obligation without any fault on his part must bear the burden of proof thereof […]". In other words, this provision contains a reversal of the burden of proof. Only the question of fault is affected; the claimant still has to substantiate the damage itself, especially the degree or amount, and the cause of it. The issue was raised whether this provision, reversing the burden of proof on breach of duty, had to be applied only to obligations of result or also to obligations of means. Since the duty of the information provider and the adviser are mainly qualified as obligations of means in Austrian law, the answer to this question is crucial to the allocation of the burden of proof in informational duties. Doctrine was not unanimous on the answer to be given (Restricting the application of art. 1298 to obligations of result, see Rummel [-Reischauer] ABGB II^2, art. 1298, nos. 2, 3. In favour of the large application of this Article, including obligations of means, see Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I^2, p. 334). Case law did not take a clear position on this issue, and in 1990 the Oberster Gerichtshof ruled that art. 1298 does not apply in cases of obligations of means (OGH 15 February 1990, 8 Ob 700/89). Two years later, concerning the liability of a notary public, the same Court ruled the exact opposite (OGH 10 December 1992 8 Ob 664/92). This new line of the case law has been confirmed with regard to informational duties in a case regarding the pre-contractual duty of a lawyer to inform the client (OGH 18 December 1996, 6 Ob 2174/96. Cf. for the liability of a bank, OGH 8 November 2000, 9 Ob 219/00).

3. In ENGLAND, in line with general law, the client retains the burden (Whitehouse v. Jordan [1981] 1 WLR 246).

4. Since 1997, FRENCH law explicitly states that it is up to the provider of the service to prove that there was no breach of any duty and, positively, that the information and advice required was supplied to the other party. This solution has been applied to professionals under ancillary obligations to inform and advise; this has been the case so far for doctors (The leading case of the new line of the case law is, Cass.civ. I, 25 February 1997, Bull.civ. I, no. 75; Defr. 1997, p. 751; CCC 1997 no. 76, with obs. L. Leveneur, RTD civ 1997, p. 924 obs. J. Mestre. Now codified, art L. 1111-2 Code santé publique), lawyers (Cass.civ. I, 29 April 1997, Bull.civ. I, no. 132; JCP 1997.II.22948 with note R. Martin; CCC 1997, no. 111, with obs. L. Leveneur), notaries (Cass.civ. I, 3 February 1998, Bull.civ. I, no. 44; JCP N, 1998, 701 with note Pillebout; Defr. 1988, 743 with note Aubert; RTD civ 1998, 381 with obs. Jourdain), insurers (Cass.civ. I, 9 December 1997, Bull.civ. I, no. 356.), bailiffs (Cass.civ. I, 15 December 1998, Bull.civ. I, no. 364; GazPal 1999, 1, 208 with note Loyer), and even professional sellers (Cass.civ. I, 15 May 2002, Bull.civ. I, no. 132). The burden of proof has been reversed and is not allocated according to the general principle actori incumbit probatio. According to the Cour de cassation, the party who is legally or contractually under a particular obligation to inform has to substantiate the performance of this obligation. In France, a purely legal argument was put forward in favour of this solution. This argument can be found in the interpretation of art. 1315 of the French Civil Code. M. Fabre-Magnan asserted that the ancillary obligation to inform is an obligation of result (Fabre-Magnan, De l´obligation d´information dans les contrats, nos. 541 ff).

5. In GERMANY in principle it is the client on whom the burden of proof rests as to whether or not the information was given and whether or not the information was correct. Proof that information has not been given is almost impossible to provide. The courts therefore insist that the adviser has to substantiate the claim that the necessary information was given. The client needs only to prove the incorrectness of that substantiation (Cf. BGH 21 January 1986, IVa ZR 105/84, NJW 1986, 2570 (tax consultant); BGH 5 February 1987, IX ZR 65/86, NJW 1987, 1322 (solicitor); Haug, Die Amtshaftung des Notars, nos. 827-828, p. 259 (notary public)). As regards medical cases, the doctor has to prove the receipt of informed consent (Cf. BGH 26 June 1990, VI ZR 289/89, VersR 1990, 1238), allowing only limited space to prove the consent would have been given if the information had been given (BGH 16 April 1994, VI ZR 260/93, NJW 1994, 2414). In other cases, the client might even rely on the rule of res ipsa loquitur, reversing the burden of proof altogether (Cf. BGH 19 December 1996, IX ZR 327/95, NJW 1997, 1235, VersR 1997, 588 (tax consultant)). It must be noted, however, that these alleviating procedural rules especially apply to secondary obligations such as the obligation to inform completely and on time.

6. According to ITALIAN case law, the burden of proof concerning the non-performance of ancillary obligations to inform and to advise rests with the client who claims compensation from the professional (CA Milano 30 April 1991, Foro it. 1991, I, 2855). Several authors, however, strongly criticised this solution especially concerning medical treatment. The argument is that it is up to the physician to prove that the patient accepted the contract and the treatment. Since it is considered that the information has an influence on the essential prerequisites for the consent of the patient, the physician, in proving the existence of this consent, has to prove that he or she supplied the information that was required (Nannini, Il consenso al trattamento medico, p. 468; Perulli, Contratto d´opera e professioni intellettuali, p. 486).

7. In principle, the burden of proof lies on the client in THE NETHERLANDS. In cases where the client is to prove a negative fact – the non-receipt of certain information, the courts may decide that the provider of the service is under a duty to substantiate the claim that the information was given. The client can than invalidate the presumption of conformity by proving the substantiation is in fact incorrect (Cf. Giesen, Bewijslastverdeling, pp. 21-24. Giesen then argues this may lead to the making of notes by the provider of the service, and criticises the conclusions that may be deduced from the absence or presence of such notes).

8. According to a general rule in POLISH law, the burden of proof relating to a fact rests on the person who attributes legal effects to that fact (CC art. 6). The client must prove that the damage was caused by the service provider (the factual circumstances due to which the damage occurred) and the amount of the damage (Bieniek [-Rudnicki] I, p. 30). The client does not have to prove fault of the service provider, as according to CC art. 471 it is the service provider who must prove that the non-performance or improper performance is due to circumstances for which the provider is not liable.

9. In PORTUGAL, in an obligation of means, the burden of proof lies with the client (art. 487 CC), though prima facie evidence (res ipsa loquitur) may shift the burden of proof to the adviser in some circumstances.

10. The burden of proof of negligence will fall on the client in SCOTTISH law, although if the client establishes a prima facie case of negligence the burden may be transferred to the adviser, and the law has also recognised a doctrine of res ipsa loquitur where the accident is of such a type as does not ordinarily happen if proper care and skill are shown (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland, para. 27.13).

11. With regard to the obligation to inform and to advise under SPANISH law, even if this is analysed as an obligation of means, courts have accepted a reversal of the burden of proof. It is very difficult for the client, who does not have access to the information held by the provider of the service, to prove the negative, that is to say, that the information was not received. (For medical information, see de Ángel Yágüez, Responsabilidad civil por actos medicos, pp. 69 ff. In general, see Yzquierdo Tolsada, La responsabilidad civil del profesional liberal, pp. 400 ff). Courts have settled that it is for the service provider to prove that the information has been given (SAP Zaragoza 11 December 1998, AC 1998/2449). According to the Court of Appeal of Las Palmas, the client would be required to do the impossible if compelled to demonstrate the inadequacy of the service provided because the client has access neither to the archives of the service provider nor to any other technical means to reach that information (SAP Las Palmas, 1 September 1998, AC 1998/1774). This is especially the case regarding medical services. The medical treatment provider must prove compliance with the obligation to inform (See TS 28 December 1998, RJ 1998/10164; TS 13 April 1999, RJ 1999/2583; TS 19 April 1999, RJ 1999/2588.). The treatment provider possesses the information, and can therefore prove that the information was given more easily than the patient can prove the reverse. According to the Tribunale Supremo, if the treatment recommended could engender the realisation of important risks, the patient should have been informed of such risks and should have given consent to the treatment in an explicit and clear manner (which was not proven by the physician) in order to exempt the physician from liability. The medical treatment provider is thus liable in the absence of proof that the information required was given to the patient (TS 31 July 1996, RJ 1996/6084). Despite rare cases in which the Courts decided the opposite (See, e.g., TS 12 July 1994, RJ 1994/6730), Spanish law accepts the reversal of the burden of proof on the performance of the obligation to inform. The solution found by courts is now generally implemented by the law itself. The recent Spanish law on civil procedure obliges courts to have regard to the difficulty of proving something when they assess the burden of proof (art. 217.7, Ley de Enjuiciamiento Civil 1/2000).

12. The burden of proof is not regulated in SWEDEN and FINLAND, but it is reasonable to assume that it will generally rest on the client. However, this is up to the court to decide depending upon the circumstances of the case and the burden of proof will often rest upon the party who most easily can bring the evidence (See Ramberg, Köplagen, pp. 115 ff). Through case-law it has therefore been established that it is mostly up to the adviser to ensure that the client really has understood the meaning of the advice given, and also to prove that this was actually the case (See Ramberg, Köplagen, pp. 115 ff). In the SWEDISH Act on Financial Advice to Consumers, the obligation to document the commission rests upon the adviser. In case the adviser ignores this obligation, the consumer's version of the circumstances at hand when the advice was given will be the starting point while judging possible negligence on behalf of the adviser, unless the latter in another way can demonstrate that the assertions of the client are incorrect. Since the adviser has an obligation to fulfil the commission carefully, it normally makes no difference whether there is faulty advice or none at all, if this results in a failure to perform the obligation. However in some cases the adviser will not be held liable for refraining from giving advice, namely when it comes to highly complicated and subjective advice. This is illustrated through NJA 1992 p. 502 where a client sued his accountant for not having advised him to perform a complicated tax transaction which would have saved him a great deal of money. However the HD stated that there is no existing duty to advise about "problem-solving of a complicated construction or which is difficult to calculate concerning the outcome in relation to tax law."

13. The recent tendency of shifting the burden of proof in the matter of performance of the obligations to inform and to advise can also be noticed in the law of the European Union. The Directive of 23 September 2002 concerning the distance marketing of consumer financial services gives Member States the possibility, in implementing the directive into domestic law, of placing the burden of proof in the matter of performance of the obligation to inform on the provider of the financial service, i.e. the debtor of such an obligation (art. 15(1) of the Directive 2002/65/EC, OJ L271, 9 October 2002, pp. 16-24). An identical provision can be found in art. 11(3)a of Directive 97/7/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 20 May 1997 on the protection of consumers in respect to distance contracts, OJ L144, 4 June 1997 pp. 19-27.

IV.C.–7:107: Conflict of interest

(1) When the provider expressly or impliedly undertakes to provide the client with a recommendation to enable the client to make a subsequent decision, the provider must disclose any possible conflict of interest which might influence the performance of the provider's obligations.

(2) So long as the contractual obligations have not been completely performed, the provider may not enter into a relationship with another party which may give rise to a possible conflict with the interests of the client, without full disclosure to the client and the client's explicit or implicit consent.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article provides that the adviser – i.e. the information provider who undertakes to provide the client with a recommendation – is under an obligation of loyalty. In advising the client, the adviser is to act in the best interest of the client and in the case of a conflict between the provider's own interest and that of the client, the latter must prevail. This provision does not apply to information providers who limit themselves to providing their clients with factual or evaluative information without recommending a particular course of action. Taking into account the obligation of loyalty, paragraph (1) imposes on the adviser an obligation to disclose any conflict of interest that might influence the performance of the provider's obligations under the contract. If the adviser fails to disclose a situation of conflict of interest, this amounts to non-performance of an obligation, thus allowing the client to resort to a remedy such as damages or, if the non-performance is fundamental, termination of the contractual relationship.

Illustration 1
Insurance advisers frequently advise clients in favour of products that they provide themselves or that generate a particular advantage for them, such as extra fees. For example, the insurance broker who has privileged relations with only a few insurance companies will be very much inclined to advise in favour of products offered by these insurance companies and not by those of other companies, even if their products are more suitable to the needs of the client. Such a situation will have to be disclosed to the client.

Illustration 2
A bank advises one of its clients to invest in the shares of a company on the ground that the company is financially sound and that it would make a good investment, without disclosing that the company in question is in debt to the bank. The bank has its own interest in advising such an investment, which will financially benefit it. In this case, there is a conflict of interest that has to be disclosed (see Woods v. Martins Bank Ltd. [1958] 3 All ER 166; [1959] 1 QB 55).

Paragraph (2) prevents the adviser from entering into a relation with another party that has an interest conflicting with that of the actual client. The adviser may only do so after full disclosure of the potential conflict of interest to the actual client and the client's consent. The giving of consent may be explicit or implicit.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The question whether the information provider is bound to act in the best interest of the client and to disclose a potential conflict of interest is very controversial. There are two questions. First, is such an obligation needed and, secondly, should all or only some information providers be bound by such an obligation?

The consequence of the imbalance of competence and knowledge between the parties to an information contract is that the position of the client is usually very weak. It is, therefore, necessary to prevent the information provider from not performing the contract in conformity with the interest of the client. The personal interest of the information provider should not determine the content of the service provided. The interest of the client is to have the possibility of appreciating the service received in the light of full knowledge of the situation. Information provided by an independent provider will involve less insecurity and risk for the client than information provided by a provider in a situation of conflict of interest. In other words, imposing the obligation to disclose a potential conflict of interest allows the client to decide whether or not to run the risk to take a decision on the basis of information given by a provider in a situation of conflicting interests.

However, the risk that the client runs seems to be less important when the information provided is factual. The more the information tends to be evaluative or even leads to a recommendation, the more the risks the client runs matter. Indeed, evaluation of the quality of the information is easier in the case of factual information. However, when it concerns expressing an opinion or giving a recommendation on a particular course of action, the client is dependent on the information provider.

C. Preferred option

According to paragraph (1), the adviser is under an obligation to disclose such a situation to the client. The motivation behind this provision is that the adviser is under a general duty to act in the best interest of the client. When personal interests of the adviser are involved, there is a risk that these affect the interests of the client. Disclosure will allow the client to evaluate the risks of letting a provider in the situation of conflict of interest perform the service. If such interests are not disclosed, the client may resort to the remedies available for non-performance of an obligation. Such is the case even if it has not been proved that the adviser did not act in conformity with the required standard of skill and care or gave incorrect advice; it is sufficient to prove that, at the time of the performance, the adviser was in a situation of conflict of interest and that the damage suffered is caused by the service provided.

Such a provision is considered essential with regard to contracts concerning the provision of advice. Such contractual relations are generally based on confidence and can often be regarded as fiduciary relationships. For this reason, the line is drawn between, on the one hand, the provision of advice – where a conflict of interest must be disclosed – and, on the other hand, the provision of factual and evaluative information – where the provider is not bound to disclose a situation of conflict of interest.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. The disclosure of conflict of interest situation can be derived from the duty of good faith and fair dealing. However very little case law is available on the issue with regard to contracts for the provision of an advice or more generally evaluative information. For particular professions, statutory and deontological rules introduce such a duty: lawyers, physicians and sometimes financial service providers (Fisch, Professional services). However, a common solution for this type of contracts does not exist.

II. Conflict of interest in advice and information contracts

2. Under ENGLISH law there is a duty to disclose conflicts of interest. In Woods v. Martins Bank Ltd. [1959] 1 QB 55 a bank advised one of its clients to invest in the shares of a company on the grounds that the company was financially sound and that it would make a good investment, without disclosing that the company in question had a debt to the bank. The bank had an interest in recommending such an investment. There was a conflict of interest, and the bank should have disclosed this situation. More generally, in common law countries, the issue is solved by determining whether the advice contract involves fiduciary duties. In some cases, the answer is negative because the client should have known that the adviser was not independent, thus avoiding a duty to disclose conflicts of interest. (Goldsworthy v. Brickell [1987] Ch. 378, at 405).

3. In FRANCE there is not an explicit general provision regarding conflict of interest of the adviser. Doctrinal works regarding advice contracts do not deal with this issue. The provisions concerning the lawyer-client relations state that a conflict of interest is forbidden unless there is a full disclosure (art. 55 law 31 December 1971; art. 155 paragraph 3 Decree 27 November 1991). However no clear definition is given of what a conflict of interest is. Case law is very rare, because disputes are resolved by the batônnier of the local bar institution. The Cour de cassation has ruled that there is a conflict of interest when the lawyer is not independent (Cass.civ. I, 18 March 1997, Bull.civ. I, no. 95). The same can be said for the financial adviser, art L. 533-4 6° Code monétaire et financier: these service providers must avoid conflicts of interest, be loyal to their client and act in their best interests. (Adde, CA Paris 27 September 1996, Banque et Droit 1997, no. 51, p. 38, obs. H. De Vauplane). French law does not know a general principle of prohibition of conflict of interest, even in advice services. However, an author considers that such principle does exist whenever the contractual relation is based on confidence. (Ripert, La règle morale[4], no. 48).

4. In ITALY, because of the asymmetry of knowledge between the parties, the party requiring the intellectual service is protected. Therefore, the professional provider of intellectual services is asked to disclose any conflict of interest. The code of conduct of lawyers, in art. 10, deals with this issue. Art. 4 of the medical deontological code states clearly that the exercise of a medical profession is founded on freedom and independence. Art. 6 clarifies that a doctor cannot abuse his or her personal status. For instance, a doctor who is also in charge of public positions cannot use them to acquire personal advantages.

5. In THE NETHERLANDS it is recognised that conflicts of interest may be caused by the fact that the provider may have a financial interest in the way in which the information or advice is provided. For example, the provider's remuneration may be influenced by the content of the information or advice provided, or by the duration of the time necessary to provide it. In Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, nos. 380-386, it is argued that a general duty to disclose such interests should only arise if the existence of that financial interest or the way it would be calculated would not be apparent to the client. In the case of advice, other conflicts of interest may appear due to the fiduciary nature of such contracts. For example, the adviser may wish to execute the service the client is advised to choose, or may be paid by the party whose services are recommended. In Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, nos. 389 and 397 it is argued that such conflicts should be disclosed, but they usually are not. The authors also state that it is the duty of the adviser to warn the client if the adviser has an interest of which the client cannot reasonably be aware and which could prevent the adviser from giving objective and correct information or advice.

6. POLISH law does not regulate this subject and the approach is suggested by the ethical principles of professional behaviour. The normal practice in the case of conflict of interest in, for example, a law firm, would be to either refer the client to another law firm (firms do co-operate in this respect) or simply reject the client's offer.

7. PORTUGUESE codes of conduct (e.g. 83/1 a) b) Estatuto da Ordem dos Advogados) and some statutes impose some specific duties to disclose conflicts of interests. As a last resort, good faith (arts. 227, 762 CC) can be used as the basis of such a duty.

8. Conflict of interest is a well-recognised concept in SCOTTISH law and professional practice, for example preventing solicitors from acting for two or more parties whose interests conflict, subject to some exceptions and requirements of disclosure (Stair, The Laws of Scotland XIII, para. 1188).

9. In SPAIN all codes of conduct include reference to the obligation of the provider of the service to look after the interest of the client loyally and with due diligence. It is contrary to this obligation to represent interests which are contrary to the client's interest. For example, under the Lawyers Code of Conduct art. 13 (4): the lawyer cannot defend interests which are opposed to the lawyer's own interests or those of other clients. If the interests of two clients are in conflict, the lawyer must decline to represent them, unless both clients authorize the lawyer to represent one of them. However, the lawyer could intervene in the interests of both clients as a mediator or in the elaboration of contractual documents, in so far as the lawyer maintains a strict objectivity. There are also detailed provisions on conflicts of interest in the Labour Consultants Code of Conduct, arts. 5.8 and 11: in the Estate Agents Code of Conduct, arts. 11 and 13; and under the Financial and Tax Consultants Code of Conduct.

10. This question is not touched upon much in literature in SWEDEN (concerning financial advice cf. however Lycke/Runesson/Swahn, Ansvar vid finansiell rådgivning, pp. 59 ff). However, both parties have an obligation to act loyally towards each other. The same principle is found in FINNISH law. In the Swedish Act on Financial Advice to Consumers, the adviser also has an obligation to act with due care in accordance with the consumer's interests, art. 5. This requirement includes an obligation to put the interests of the consumer before other, maybe conflicting, interests. The adviser must therefore inform the consumer about the basis of which the advice is given, for instance that the adviser may only recommend solutions from one provider. See also the Finnish Security Markets Act, chap. 4, s. 4, and the Real Estate Agents Act, s. 9.

11. For insurance brokerage, the EU Directive of 9 September 2002 includes the obligation to disclose conflicts of interest (art 12 of Directive 2002/92/EC of 9 September 2002 on insurance mediation, OJ L9 15 January 2003, p. 3.). Indeed, an insurance broker having privileged relations with only a few insurance companies will be very much inclined to advise in favour of products offered by these insurance companies and not by others, even if their products are more suitable to the needs of the client.

IV.C.–7:108: Influence of ability of the client

(1) The involvement in the supply of the service of other persons on the client's behalf or the mere competence of the client does not relieve the provider of any obligation under this Chapter.

(2) The provider is relieved of those obligations if the client already has knowledge of the information or if the client has reason to know of the information.

(3) For the purpose of paragraph (2), the client has reason to know if the information should be obvious to the client without investigation.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article deals with the possibility that the information provider might invoke the client's competence as a defence for excluding or at least limiting liability. According to this provision, the mere fact that the client has some knowledge in the field in which the information is provided is not a defence for the provider. The fact that the client is assisted by another competent professional is not a defence either.

The only defence for the information provider is to prove that the client had concrete knowledge of precisely the information that was not provided and should have been provided. This defence also exists when the client had reason to know the information in question. A client has reason to know the information when such information should be obvious without investigation.

> An experienced CEO of a multinational group requests the advice of his lawyers with regard to the plan to acquire the shares of companies quoted on foreign markets. The advisers do not inform the client about the obligation to pay higher plus-value taxes on reselling abroad. The fact that the client is an experienced businessman, with knowledge about stock market operations, is not a defence relieving the advisers of liability. The advisers would have to show that the client knew of this fact or that it should have been obvious without investigation.

The reference to the absence of investigation stresses the fact that the duties of the information provider are not modulated according to the existence of an obligation of the client to acquire information. The existence of such an obligation may involve contributory negligence, as will be explained in Comment E.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

If the client is competent or has the assistance of other information providers, the question arises whether that assumed competence influences the information that is to be provided.

Assuming that the obligation of the information provider is not alleviated by the competence of the client or the assistance of another information provider would have the advantage of legal certainty and clarity: the information provider would know that there was always an obligation to inform the client fully. Such a rule may also be regarded as very client-orientated. Several other arguments may be put forward in favour of this option. First of all, even a partly competent client may not always be the best judge of his or her own affairs. The client, appreciating that problem, might even have asked for the service for exactly that reason. Secondly, the contrary solution would incite the information provider to be passive in the presence of a professional or assisted client. A third argument, which primarily relates to the situation in which the information is the main object of the contract, is that if the client had wanted less than full information, the contract could have so provided. A fourth argument rather relates to the situation in which the obligation to inform and to advise is an ancillary obligation. In such a situation, with regard to the 'borrowed' knowledge of the third information provider, it should be mentioned that the client runs the risk of the two information providers blaming each other; both stating they thought the other information provider had already given the information.

However, on the other hand the modulation of the content of the obligation according to the competence of the client seems more economical. Gathering and supplying information adds to the costs of the service, whereas – if the client is competent – these extra costs are probably incurred unnecessarily.

C. Comparative overview

The solutions adopted in the Member States of the European Union seem to clash at this point. Under French law, case law since 1995 has taken the position of not allowing the obligation of the information provider to be affected by the fact that the client is competent in the relevant field or is being or has been informed by a third information provider, unless it is proved that the client had knowledge of the concrete information. French doctrine summarises this line of the case law by stating that the obligation to inform and to advise is not relative, according to the competence of the client, but absolute. German case law has consistently ruled that an information provider does not need to inform the client about what the client already knows. But here and in other countries, it is less clear whether the mere competence of the client or the presence of other information providers influences the duties of the information provider.

Case law can be found especially in the field of financial information. According to the traditional line of the case law in many European legal systems, the supplier of financial services is not bound to inform the competent client, especially the one who is experienced in operations on the stock exchange market. This solution will probably partially change as a consequence of the future implementation of EU Directive 2002/65 on distance marketing of consumer financial services, which introduces informational duties. The Directive follows the traditional definition of the consumer, i.e. the natural person who acts for purposes outside his or her trade, business or profession. By rejecting a definition of 'consumer' containing reference to the criterion of competence in the field of the contract at hand, the Directive excludes defences on the basis of the client's competence, thus implying that informational duties arising from the Directive are to be performed regardless of this fact.

D. Preferred option

An intermediate position is preferred. In principle, the information provider has to provide full information even if the client is assisted by a third information provider or has some degree of competence.

Illustration 2

A solicitor consults a civil-law notary concerning a personal inheritance matter. The civil-law notary, in charge of the formalities of the settlement of the estate does not inform the solicitor of the time limit for deciding on acceptance or refusal of the succession. The time limit elapses without decision and the solicitor is then considered to have renounced the succession. The fact that the client is a lawyer is no defence for the civil-law notary.

As a rule, the obligation to inform and to advise remains unaffected by the presumed competence of the client or by the fact that information is provided by others. However, the economical argument in favour of limiting the obligation is taken into account if the client has not merely theoretical but also concrete knowledge of the information the provider is to supply, or the information provider could reasonably expect the client to have such concrete knowledge.

A lawyer, acting for his private purpose, requests a civil-law notary to draft a contract for the purchase of an apartment along lines suggested by him, stating that he has already sorted out all the issues concerning tax law and civil law. In this case, the civil-law notary can reasonably rely on the lawyer's statement and the lawyer cannot claim damages for not having been fully informed and advised not to choose such a course of action. The reason is that the civil-law notary can assume his client has the concrete knowledge mentioned above.

In such a case, none of the parties is served by requiring the information provider to collect the information anyway and to supply that information to the client, which costs both time and money. As the alleviation of the duty to inform is the exception to the rule, it is up to the information provider to prove the exception applies. The mere fact of the client's competence or the presence of another information provider is not sufficient reason to assume that the client was aware of the concrete information.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. Very little information is available on this issue. The reason is that the answer to this question depends on the way the content of the main duty of the information provider is assessed. For legal systems which adopt an objective assessment of the information to be provided the ability of the client has no influence. Such is the case in FRANCE. On the other hand, legal systems which determine the extent of information to be provided by reference to the actual situation of the recipient regard the ability of the client as having a great influence on the standard of care and therefore give a defence to the information provider. Such solution is more generally accepted in FINLAND, GERMANY, ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL, SPAIN and SWEDEN. However, most of the solutions in case law concern financial services. In this field also in France the ability of the client is a defence for the provider.

II. Influence of the ability of the client on the service to be provided

2. The Cour de cassation in FRANCE used to take into consideration the competence of the client to modulate the intensity of the obligation of the adviser (Cass.civ. I, 7 February 1990, Bull.civ. I, no. 37; Cass.civ. I, 2 July 1991, Bull.civ. I, no. 228; Defr. 1991, p. 1272, obs. crit. J.-L. Aubertt). The obligation to advise was said to be relative, depending on those circumstances. From 1995 on the Supreme Court has changed the line of the case law and the obligation to advise has become absolute. The obligation of the adviser is no longer lightened because the client has already another adviser (Cass.civ. I, 10 July 1995, Bull.civ. I, no. 312 ; Defr. 1995, p. 1413, obs. J.-L. Aubertt) or because the client has competence in the relevant field (Cass.civ. I, 28 November 1995 and 30 January 1996, Defr. 1996, p. 361, obs. J.-L. Aubertt). The change of approach started with notaries, but now also applies to solicitors and other legal advisers (Cass.civ. I, 29 January 1997 (second part of the case), Bull.civ. I, no. 132 ; JCP 1997.II.22948 with note R. Martin; CCC 1997, no. 111, with obs. L. Leveneur; Cass.civ. I, 24 June 1997, Bull.civ. I, no. 214 ; JCP 1997.II.22970, with note E. du Rusquec; CCC 1997, no. 162, with obs. L. Leveneur). This is however not the case for the seller when the buyer is a professional (Cass.civ. I, 3 June 1998, RTD civ 1999, p. 89, obs. J. Mestre), nor for stock market operations (Cass.com. 18 February 1997, Bull.civ. IV, no. 51).

3. In GERMANY a bank selling stock options is not obliged to inform the client of alternatives or risks if the client is familiar with the market (BGH 4 February 1992, quoted by Canaris, Bankvertragsrecht[2], no. 1881).

4. In THE NETHERLANDS it is thought that if the client is competent in the relevant field or has other advisers, it cannot be excluded that the adviser could have relied upon the client's apparent knowledge of the risks and alternatives. In that case, the absence of information from the adviser might be excused (Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, no. 364-367).

5. The service provider in POLAND should evaluate the ability of the client and adjust the service provided to it. This requirement can be deduced from the rules which set the standard of due diligence (CC art. 355), and the general rules on performance of obligations, which require co-operation of the parties (CC art. 354).

6. In PORTUGAL, according to legal doctrine, the less the competence of the lay client, the more thorough should be the information provider's diligence (Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade por conselhos, p. 387).

7. In SPAIN there is a specific pronouncement on this issue regarding the obligation to inform for a medical provider: the medical provider may be exempted from the obligation to inform the patient only when the latter has already received the same treatment for the same sickness or when the patient is a specialist in the field. The protection specifically granted to consumers under art. 12 of the Statute on Consumers (which states that the client is to be informed by the provider of the service) will not apply when the provider and the client are specialists in the same field (Cervilla Garzón, La prestación de Servicios Profesionales, p. 255).

8. Normally in SWEDEN and FINLAND the scope of the adviser's duty to provide information and mention risks is limited by the competence and knowledge of the client. In SWEDISH a case of a bank acting as tax adviser the HD ruled that the duty to mention risks must always be judged depending on the factual circumstances and especially on the knowledge of the client (NJA 1994 p. 598). In another case it was held that there was no obligation on a stockbroker to inform the client about the risks involved in the trade in index options, when the client was a businessman with good knowledge of financial markets and stock trading (NJA 1995 p. 693).

IV.C.–7:109: Causation

If the provider knows or could reasonably be expected to know that a subsequent decision will be based on the information to be provided, and if the client makes such a decision and suffers loss as a result, any non-performance of an obligation under the contract by the provider is presumed to have caused the loss if the client proves that, if the provider had provided all information required, it would have been reasonable for the client to have seriously considered making an alternative decision.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The existence of a causal link between a non-performance of a contractual obligation by the provider and damage to the client is an essential element of the liability of the information provider and the availability of the remedy of damages. The determination of a causal link involves specific issues with regard to contracts for the provision of information. It is often difficult for the client to substantiate the existence of a causal link between the non-performance of the information provider's obligations and the damage suffered. In order to enable the client to substantiate a causal link, this Article introduces a modification of the burden of proof. The client can establish the existence of a causal link by proving that, if there had been proper performance, it would have been reasonable for the client to have seriously considered making a decision other than the one actually taken.

The phrase 'alternative decision' is to be interpreted broadly. It includes not only a completely different decision, but also the hypothesis of a decision having the same nature, though different conditions.

> A client acquires company A on the basis of wrong advice of a market analyst. In order to claim damages, the client does not have to prove that he would not have taken the decision he took nor that he would have taken the same decision though on different financial terms. The existence of a causal link between the wrong advice and the damage is presumed by the proof that a reasonable investor would have seriously considered either not investing in or acquiring another company or acquiring company A at a lower price.

This Article introduces two presumptions. The first operates a modification of the object of proof. The client is not required to prove causation on the basis of the particular client test – i.e. what the client would have done – but on the basis of a reasonableness test – i.e. what it would have been reasonable to have done if correctly informed. The second alleviates the object of proof. The client is not required to prove that a reasonable client would have taken a different decision; it is sufficient that a reasonable client would have seriously considered taking another decision.

The information provider can rebut the two presumptions in the same way. In order to establish the absence of the causal link, the information provider needs to show that, even if there had been due performance, the client would have taken the same decision.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The requirement of causation is frequently a key issue in claims for damages for non-performance of obligations under an information contract. The main issue is to determine whether the basic principles of causation are still to be applied or whether it is necessary to alleviate the requirement in favour of the client.

The argument in favour of alleviation of the usual burden of proof allocation with regard to causation can be explained as follows. The client requested information or advice to make a sound decision. It is therefore likely that the client will base a decision on the information supplied and will follow the advice given. For the same reason, it may be assumed that the client would have relied on correct information or followed correct advice or at least would have hesitated to take the decision actually taken on the incorrect recommendation of the provider. The result of this reasoning is that, in such a case, the information provider has to prove it would not have mattered if the information or the advice had been correct because the client's decision would have been the same as the one taken. If the provider cannot prove that, the causal link between the non-performance and the damage the client suffered is taken as established.

More practically, leaving the burden of proof of the existence of a causal link on the client would lead to a very difficult situation for the client. It would be necessary to prove that, if the provider had fulfilled the obligation correctly, the damage would not have occurred, which is usually impossible.

However, reversing or considerably alleviating the burden of proof on the client will place the information provider in an unfavourable position. It will be very difficult indeed to prove that the client, properly informed or advised, would have taken the same course of action. Thus, according to the solution chosen each party will face difficulties in establishing evidence.

Finally, the solution depends on a policy decision with regard to compensation for the client. The fact that professional information providers are often insured – which is sometimes a1946mandatory requirement – might justify alleviation of the causation requirement to allow speedy compensation of the damage suffered by the client, who is generally not insured agains4 the consequences of such a breach.

C. Comparative overview

Alleviation of some sort of the burden of proof concerning a causal link between the non-performance by the information provider and the damage suffered by the client can be found in several Legal systems. The techniques used to achieve this result, however, differ. In Germany and Austria, especially with regard to medical information and advice, there is a partial modification of the object of proof in the application of the Entscheidungskonflikt ('conflict of decision') theory. In France, Belgium and Spain, courts turn to an unorthodox application of the loss-of-a-chance theory. In other words, courts consider that the client has lost the chance to take a decision on the basis of all the information needed.

D. Preferred option

The Article provides an alleviation of the client's burden of proof with regard to causation. The client does not have to prove that a different decision would have been taken if correct advice had been given, but merely that in such a case the client would have seriously considered taking another decision, thus avoiding the damage. Such a solution is very similar to the German Entscheidungskonflikt theory.

This Article applies an objective standard-client test, not the particular-client test. The existence of causation is assessed objectively, with particular regard to the situation of a reasonable client, not the one of the client in question. Following the standard-client test further facilitates the assessment of a causal link between the breach of duty and the damage.

> Illustration 2
> A company engages a firm of auditors to give advice in connection with a takeover. The auditors advise the client in favour of the takeover not noticing and therefore not mentioning in their advice the considerable risk that antitrust authorities would refuse to approve the acquisition due to the future monopolistic nature of the company. After the acquisition, it turns out that the European Commission is willing to approve the acquisition on the condition that the buyer resells 60 per cent of the assets of the target company. In order to receive compensation for the damage suffered, the client only has to prove that, if correctly informed of the risk that materialised, the company would have hesitated to go ahead with the takeover. It is then up to the adviser to prove that the client would have acquired the target company even if correctly informed.

By introducing a presumption with regard to the proof on causation, the Article implicitly excludes the application of the theory of the loss of a chance, applied in some legal systems to facilitate the assessment of the causal link in the case of breach of an information duty and, therefore, compensation for the damage suffered. In applying the loss-of-a-chance theory as a surrogate for the proof of causation, courts compensate for the fact that the client lost the chance to take a decision on the basis of all the information needed. The consequence of this is that the client cannot be awarded compensation corresponding with the entire damage suffered. Damages correspond only to a percentage of the entire damage suffered. The percentage is determined according to the existence of chances to take a different decision and avoid the detrimental consequences of the decision actually taken. In practice, this leads to complex assessments of damages, which often require the appointment of experts.

The system of the present Article leads to full compensation for the damage suffered or to no compensation at all. Partial compensation – as following the loss-of-a-chance theory – is avoided. In other words, this Article is based on the consideration that non-performance by the provider is either the cause of the entire damage or not the cause of the damage.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. If the principle remains that the claimant has to prove the existence of a causal link between the non-performance and the damage suffered (ENGLAND, FINLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY, ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL, SCOTLAND, SPAIN, SWEDEN), many of these legal systems, at least in some areas, have alleviated the burden of proof, having recourse to different techniques. In France, the theory of the loss of a chance is used to palliate the absence of proof on causation.

In Germany, the theory of Entscheidungskonflikt requires a limited proof on the side of a patient in case of incorrect or incomplete information or advice.

II. Burden of proof on causation

2. Generally the client retains the burden of proof of causation under ENGLISH law. When the claim is based on medical negligence, the patient must prove not only the breach of the duty to inform but also that had the duty been broken he or she would not have chosen to have the operation (Chatterton v. Gerson [1981] QB 432.). However, in cases of breach of fiduciary duty the burden of proof seems to be reversed. In an old Privy Council case it was held that where the breach is a non-disclosure of material information, the burden of proof as to causation is reversed (Brickenden v. London Loan and Savings Co. [1934] 3 DLR 465 at 469). See also Ferris [1983] 9 DLR 183 where a solicitor breached his fiduciary duty in advising a lender when already acting for the borrower. In Brickenden, Lord Thankerton said that "when a party, holding a fiduciary relationship, commits a breach of his duty by non-disclosure of material facts, which his constituent is entitled to know in connection with the transaction, he cannot be heard to maintain that disclosure would not have altered the decision to proceed with the transaction, because the constituent's action would be solely determined by some other factor. Once the court has determined that the non-disclosed facts were material, speculation as to what course the constituent, on disclosure, would have taken is not relevant." This solution, however, finds its ground in the specificity of a fiduciary relationship. The reversal of the burden of proof on causation is consistent with the draconian nature of the fiduciary duty. In determining the issue of liability, it is irrelevant to consider the issue of causation between the breach of duty and the alleged loss. Liability will be imposed where the fiduciary has placed himself or herself in a position of conflict or potential conflict. It is immaterial that the breach did not cause any loss.

3. Causation between the breach of a duty to inform or to advise and the damage must in principle be proven by the client under FRENCH law (Cass.civ. I, 10 July 2001 Resp. civ. et assur. 2001 no. 321; with regard to bad tax advice given by a lawyer, the client must prove that the damage suffered is the consequence of the breach of duty.) The Court adopts the équivalence des conditions theory, which means that the breach of duty to inform or advise is the cause of the damage if the client proves that, correctly informed or advised, he or she would have decided in favour of another course of action. This means that the client has to prove beyond doubt that the damage suffered would not have occurred. The client cannot usually provide this proof. For this reason a part of the case law found another way to allow compensation, using the loss of a chance theory. The client is entitled to compensation for having lost the chance to take a decision with sufficiently enlightened advice (Cass.civ. I, 7 February 1990, Bull.civ. I, no. 39; RTD civ 1991, p. 112 with obs. Jourdain; CE 5 January 2000, Consorts Telle; 5 January 2000, Assistance Publique-Hôpitaux de Paris, JCP 2000.II.10271, with note J. Moreau). The consequence of this reasoning is that the doubt about the decision of the client taking another decision is sufficient to find a connection between the breach of duty of the provider and the damage. This solution is criticised by a part of the doctrine and the case law. Quoting a case of 1982 some authors assert that the loss of a chance can only be of use for the determination of the quantum of the damage and not as a surrogate for causation (Cass.civ. I, 17 November 1982, Bull.civ. I, no. 333; JCP 1983.II.20056 with note Saluden; D. 1984, p. 305 with note Dorsner-Dolivet. See also, Fabre-Magnan, De l´obligation d´information dans les contrats, nos. 605 ff). There are however dissident opinions (Huet, RTD civ 1986, 119; G. Durry, RTD civ 1967, 181; 1969, 797). It is disputed whether this solution is applicable also to information and advice duties. According to the cases of 1990 and 2000 quoted above it seems that the loss of a chance theory remains applicable and could lead to the establishment of a partial causation. The consequence of such a partial causation leads to a partial compensation of the damage as well. For example the damage compensated to a student victim of an accident who cannot attend an examination does not coincide with the benefits of passing the examination, because success is not certain (Cass.civ. II, 17 February 1961, GazPal 1961, 1, 400). The same can be said for the situations in question. Since it is not certain that, correctly informed or advised, the client would have adopted the best solution, it is impossible to compensate the loss of benefit that such course of action would have brought about. Assessing loss is very difficult and there are no clear directions on how to proceed. This is certainly the major inconvenience of the loss of a chance theory. Very often in practice courts appoint experts to determine the amount of damage to be compensated.

4. In GERMAN medical law, if it has been proved that the provider breached a duty and the client substantiates that he or she might have decided differently if given the correct information or advice, the burden of proof is shifted. This solution is accepted case law for medical information and advice (BGH 26 June 1990, NJW 1990, 2928; VersR 1990, 1238; BGH 11 December 1990, NJW 1991, 1543; JZ 1991, 673; BGH 7 April 1992, VersR 1992, 960; NJW 1992, 2351; BGH 14 June 1994, VersR 1994, 1302; NJW 1994, 2414; BGH 17 March 1998, VI ZR 74/97, NJW 1998, 2734). It is the so-called Entscheidungskonflikt ('conflict of decision'). Liability is in any case excluded if the doctor convincingly indicates that, if the necessary information had been given, the patient would have consented to the procedure advised and the patient cannot plausibly show that he or she would have been in doubt whether or not to consent (See, e.g., BGH 17 March 1998, VI ZR 74/97, NJW 1998, 2734). In such a case, the provider proves it would not have mattered for the client's decision if the information or the advice had been correct, as the decision would have been the same anyway. If the provider cannot prove that, the causal link between the breach of duty and the damage the client has sustained is taken as proved. The technique of the Entscheidungskonflikt is of interest when the consequences of the lack of information or advice about risks would have serious effects on the situation of the other party. If such is not the case even if a breach of duty is present, the causal link cannot be established. Indeed, if the chance of the risk materialising and the effects of it would not be serious, providing the information could hardly influence the client's decision, for he or she would probably have taken the risk anyway. As a consequence of this there is no Entscheidungskonflikt. The opposite is also true. In some cases, it is not necessary to partially reverse the burden of proof on causation in application of the theory of the Entscheidungskonflikt, because it is clear that the patient correctly informed of the risks would have taken another decision and avoided the damage. BGH 30 January 2001, NJW 2001, 2798. In this case the physician did not inform the patient about the risk of impotence. The Bundesgerichtshof first asserted that the patient would have found himself in a real conflict of decision if sufficiently informed, but it also asserted that the patient would have decided against the operation if he had known of the risk of impotence. There is no need to argue of the hesitation of a correctly informed patient, while there is the certainty that he would have taken another decision. Outside medical law, the theory of Entscheidungskonflikt is generally not applied and the client still has to substantiate how he or she would have reacted if the right advice or information would have been provided (BGH 16 February 1995, NJW-RR 1995, 619, for a case of liability for wrong information provided by an accountant).

5. According to the general rules on contractual and tortious professional liability in ITALY, the proof of the causal link between the breach of duty and the damage rests in principle on the client (Cass. 18 June 1975, no. 2439, Foro it. 1976, I, 745; Cass. 8 May 1993, no. 5325).

6. In principle, the burden of proof lies on the client in THE NETHERLANDS. Cf. Giesen, Bewijslastverdeling, p. 49; Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, no. 446-447. This implies that the client must prove that if informed or advised properly, he or she would have made another decision. However, it is hardly ever possible to prove this unconditionally, since there remains almost always a possibility that the client would not have acted upon the information or advice, and would have decided otherwise. Giesen, Bewijslastverdeling, p. 49, concludes that this division of the burden of proof leads to a structural problem for the client to prove the case. Especially for medical cases, it is more or less accepted that the patient would have acted upon the information or advice, especially if the illness the patient suffered from was life-threatening and an effective cure is available. The German doctrine of 'Entscheidungskonflikt' more or less is copied in the Netherlands. Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, no. 449-450, argue that this doctrine could be extended outside medical situations, starting from the presumption that a reasonably acting and informed client would have followed the information or advice. This is even stronger in those situations where the client especially asked to be informed or advised, as is the case where a contract for the provision of information or advice has been concluded. In the case of safety measures, the causal link between the breach of such measures and the damage that occurred is presumed to exist, leading to a shift of the burden of proof. Cf. Giesen, Bewijslastverdeling, pp. 66 ff, 79 ff. The Hoge Raad seems to be inclined to extend this rule to other situations where an act – including an omission, such as the failure to inform or advise [properly] – brings a risk into being and that risk materialises. Cf. HR 26 January 1996, NedJur 1996, 607 (Dicky Trading II), a case in which a notary was held liable for a failure to warn of the risks involved in a transaction. The causal link was deemed to be established since the failure to warn had increased the risk of damage and that risk had materialised. Cf. Giesen, Bewijslastverdeling, p. 67; Barendrecht and van den Akker, Informatieplichten van dienstverleners, no. 447. Yet, the HR recently explicitly declined in general and broad terms to extend this rule to cases where a duty to inform a patient of a risk was breached and that risk subsequently materialised. The Hoge Raad argued that the duty to inform is meant to enable the patient to make an informed decision on whether or not to consent to the suggested treatment. The duty to inform is therefore not as such meant to protect the patient from the occurrence of a medical risk, but only to prevent the risk of the loss of the opportunity to properly choose. Cf. HR 23 November 2001, case C99/259HR.

7. According to a general POLISH rule, the burden of proof relating to a fact rests on the person who attributes legal effects to that fact (CC art. 6). The client must prove that the damage was caused by the service provider (the factual circumstances due to which the damage occurred) and the amount of the damage (Bieniek (-Rudnicki) I, p. 30).

8. In PORTUGAL The client bears the burden of proof of causation. The most followed criterion in case law is the adequate causation, in the negative formulation of Enneccerus-Lehmann (STJ, 3 December 1992, BolMinJus, 422, 365; STA 21 April 1994, BolMinJus 436, 421).

9. In SCOTTISH law the client generally has the burden of proving causation. But in medical cases about failure to warn, the client may recover damages for the loss suffered even if unable to prove that the operation would have been avoided had the knowledge been available (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland, para. 27.10; cf Hogg, (2005) 9 Edinburgh LRev, 156; Mason and Brodie, (2005) 9 Edinburgh LRev, 298; Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, paras. 260-262).

10. Under SPANISH law it is in principle up to the client to prove that the provider of the service has not acted with the required due diligence (lack of information), that the client it has suffered damage and that there is a causal link between the lack of due diligence and the damage suffered. Courts have shifted the burden of proof on breach of the obligation to inform or advise to the provider of the service since it is easier to prove the positive (that the information has been provided) than for the client to prove the negative (that the information has not been provided). However, the client retains the burden of proof on causation and thus has to give evidence that the non-observance of the standard of care regarding the obligation to inform constituted the cause of the damage suffered - that is, that if properly informed or advised the client would have taken another decision or done otherwise. Regarding medical services, the lack of information makes the medical provider liable for the damage inflicted. TS 31 July 1996 (RJ 1996/6084) reads as follows: "if treatment was to be considered a high risk obligation, with foreseeable negative results, the patient should have been informed regarding such risks and should have consented to the treatment in an explicit and clear manner, in order to exempt the doctor from liability. The medical treatment provider is thus liable for the damage inflicted". Therefore, only when the patient gives an informed consent based on the information or advice given by the professional does the risk shift to the patient. The situation varies with regard to the risks to be disclosed concerning curative and non-curative medicine. In the latter case, also atypical risks must be disclosed.

11. In SWEDEN and FINLAND it is principally up to the client to prove that he or she would have acted differently if given correct information. In the Swedish case NJA 1991 p. 625 a real estate agent had given the client incorrect information concerning taxation on a capital gain. The question was now if the client had suffered economic loss and how the damages should be calculated. The HD stated: "If incorrect information concerning the possibility to postpone tax for capital gain shall lead to a right to compensation in damages, principally the client has to show that he would not have sold the real estate at this point in time if he had received correct information." (See Kleineman, SvJT 1998, p. 199). The loss of a chance theory is not accepted under Swedish law.

CHAPTER 8: TREATMENT

IV.C.–8:101: Scope

(1) This Chapter applies to contracts under which one party, the treatment provider, undertakes to provide medical treatment for another party, the patient.

(2) It applies with appropriate adaptations to contracts under which the treatment provider undertakes to provide any other service in order to change the physical or mental condition of a person.

(3) Where the patient is not the contracting party, the patient is regarded as a third party on whom the contract confers rights corresponding to the obligations of the treatment provider imposed by this Chapter.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article presents the notion of a treatment contract. The treatment activity consists in all the processes applied to a person in order to change his or her physical or mental health. The main example of a treatment contract is one for medical treatment. However, that is not the only example. Accordingly Annex 1 defines a contract for treatment as "a contract under which one party, the treatment provider, undertakes to provide medical treatment for another party, the patient, or to provide any other service in order to change the physical or mental condition of a person".

Illustration 1
A patient suffering from the flu goes to a doctor. The doctor takes the various steps in the treatment procedure and prescribes drugs that may cure the illness, i.e. change the physical condition of the patient.

There will usually be "treatment" whenever a health-care professional takes the necessary steps to effectively change or maintain the condition of a patient or – where this is not or no longer possible – to mitigate the effects of chronic or incurable ailments.

Illustration 2
A patient who has incurable, terminal cancer is given palliative care. This treatment mitigates the pain suffered by the patient and comes within the scope of the Article.

Treatment may consist in making efforts to cure a certain ailment, in taking steps to prevent ailments from materialising in the future (preventive medicine) or in administering painkillers in the case of a deadly disease. It may also consist in changing the physical or mental condition of a person where there is no need from a strictly medical point of view to do so (aesthetic surgery, sterilisation, etc.).

Illustration 3
A person who is planning to travel to an area where malaria is prevalent has an appointment with a health-care provider well before his departure. He is given appropriate medication. This situation concerns preventive medicine, and this Chapter applies.

The present Chapter also applies, with appropriate modifications, in situations where the treatment provider performs another service in order to change the physical or mental condition of the patient, such as providing information regarding treatment, referring to another health-care provider or institution, etc. (paragraph (2)).

Paragraph (3) states that the provisions of this Chapter also apply to contracts concluded by a third party on behalf of a patient and that that patient has the right to demand performance by the treatment provider. Although usually the patient is the contractual party, it may happen that the patient is not the contractual party. This is, for instance, the case when a treatment provider is employed by a party who has some legal connection with the patient, such as treatment providers employed by the patient's employer or by an insurance company.

A woman applying for a life insurance policy gets a check up in a clinic contracted by the insurer. The woman is contractually protected vis-à-vis the clinic under this Chapter.

Paragraph (4) extends the application of these rules, by way of analogy, to some borderline situations where the provider of another service provides treatment to a person.

Illustration 5
A person goes to the hairdresser's to have his hair cut. This is a process that changes a person's physical (aesthetic) condition (though not his health). Although this Chapter does not cover such a situation, the provisions may apply by way of analogy.

Illustration 6
The hairdresser notices that the client has a severe case of dandruff (diagnosis) and recommends a special shampoo (therapy) to cure it. Although this Chapter does not cover such a situation, the provisions may apply by way of analogy.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This Article covers the scope of application of the rules in this Chapter. The most common application will be that of a patient entering into a contract with a treatment provider in order to receive treatment. However, an important policy issue is whether the Chapter should apply to situations where a clear contractual link is lacking. On the one hand, it may be argued that for conceptual reasons only treatment provided after a treatment provider and a patient concluded a contract should fall within the scope of this Article. On the other hand, not broadening the scope of these rules to the aforementioned situations would amount to discrimination, not treating identical situations alike, without any practical reason. In fact, it often happens that the patient and the person or entity concluding the treatment contract are not the same. This is the case when treatment is provided to minors lacking contractual capacity or incompetent adults. It is also the case when an employer, an insurance company, a hotel or a similar organisation enters into a contract with a treatment provider in order to provide treatment for employees, insured persons and hotel guests. In such a situation, there are two levels: the 'client'-treatment provider relationship and the patient-treatment provider relationship.

Illustration 7
A passenger of a cruise ship feels ill during the cruise. The ship's doctor, employed by the company, treats the passenger. In this situation, the passenger/patient was treated by a doctor whose contractual relationship is with the company, not with the patient. The present Chapter applies nevertheless.

Another question to be answered is whether there can be a contractual relationship between a patient and a public hospital. Such a contractual relationship would contribute to a unified legal regime of the obligation to treat, bringing out the advantages of clarity, certainty and protection of the patient as a consumer. However, from a political and economic point of view, such an option would meet with heavy resistance in many countries, as many hospitals are public hospitals, and as such ruled by administrative law.

Besides, some conceptual arguments tend to classify relationships between hospitals and patients as different from contracts, rather as 'mass factual relationships'. The law on non-contractual liability for damage or administrative law deals with liability as regards the liability of public entities.

Another policy issue concerns the scope of the rules on treatment, especially with regard to borderline situations. In fact, improving the physical or mental health of a person is a broad definition of the activity, likely to cover treatment activities such as grooming, hairdressing and body piercing as well. Apart from fitting the normal scope of treatment, broadening the scope of this Chapter to such activities would result in an increase in the quality of those services as well as in the extended protection of the client of such services. This may especially be relevant in situations where performance of such services may have similar consequences for the health of the patient as medical treatment. On the other hand, restricting the scope of the Chapter entails that treatment can be narrowed down to standard medical practice. This would be more in line with what traditionally is regarded as treatment, and has the advantage of focusing on the main issue, medical treatment, or at least the issue that has the greatest impact on society and the economy. Besides, incorporating the aforementioned services would result in fierce resistance from the medical community.

C. Comparative overview

In most European countries, the contract for treatment falls into the existing categories of contracts for services (Germany, Spain, and Portugal), or contracts for work (France). In some legal systems it is not clear if treatment is qualified as a contract for work or services or if it is a specific innominate sui generis contract (Austria and Greece). The only country regulating the contract for treatment as a nominate contract in the CC is The Netherlands.

In the United Kingdom, the relationship between a patient and a public hospital is regarded as non-contractual, rather disciplined by the law on non-contractual liability for damage. In Finland and Sweden the relationship is not contractual and specific regulation for medical healthcare, in particular the no-fault patient insurance scheme applies.

D. Preferred option

In principle, the Chapter applies only in so far as there is a contractual relationship between a treatment provider and the patient. However, if under national law the relationship cannot be qualified as a private law contract, the present Chapter does not apply; administrative courts may, irrespective of its private law nature and of their own accord, apply the rules of this Chapter by analogy.

The scope of application is extended to treatment provided on behalf of a person who is not a contractual party; see paragraph (3). The underlying reason is the protection of patients and treating like situations alike. In exceptional circumstances, where treatment must be performed immediately to serve the best interests of the patient and the patient cannot express agreement to the contract the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs may apply.

In situations where a service is provided in order to change the physical or mental health of a person outside the scope of medical treatment, this Chapter applies by way of analogy; see paragraph (2); The underlying reasoning relates to the functional character of the rules and to the provision of normative guidelines for adjudicating legal problems emerging from the sector of unconventional medicine, which is becoming more and more important from an economic point of view. Likewise, this Article serves the objectives of patient protection and public interest in the quality of health care.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. With the exception of THE NETHERLANDS, none of the other legal systems has a specific regulation of treatment contracts in its civil code (sec. CC art. 7.7.5). The contractual nature of the duties inherent to the obligation to treat is accepted in AUSTRIA, FRANCE, GERMANY, ITALY, SPAIN and PORTUGAL, though the duties of the treatment provider may also derive from the law on non-contractual liability for damage. In these countries the nature of the contract varies: in Austria and Greece it is debated whether it should be qualified as a contract for work, a contract for services or an innominate contract. In Germany, Spain and Portugal it is considered to be a contract for services. In the UNITED KINGDOM, though there are treatment contracts, in practice most medical treatment is performed in the national health service and is regulated by the law on non-contractual liability for damage and specific public regulation. In FINLAND and in SWEDEN medical treatment is not considered to be a contractual relationship, and public law regulations apply. Separate administrative courts entertain jurisdiction over disputes related to medical treatment carried out in public hospitals in France, Italy, Spain and Portugal. In addition to private law sources, medical treatment is also regulated by public law, medical ethics and conduct codes and standards in all countries. The impact of consumer law regulation is reported in England, Scotland, Greece and Spain. In most countries the legal regime of medical treatment derives from the general principles of contract, non-contractual liability for damage and public regulation. Though not much information is available from the analysed countries, services similar to medical treatment, such as non-conventional medicine, and other services whereby the physical or mental condition of a person is changed outside the framework of medical treatment, appear to be addressed by the general principles of services law.

II. Scope of the rules on treatment in the national laws

2. AUSTRIA has a Law of Doctors (Ärztegesetz 1998) and a Law of hospitals (Krankenanstaltengesetz 1954). The prevailing opinion understands the treatment contract as a so-called free employment contract; cf. (Völkl-Torggler, JBl 1984, p. 74). Others classify it as a mere contract for work. Yet a slightly different definition can be found in recent case law. 'The treatment contract has to be qualified as an agreement – not defined in the Code – pursuant to which a doctor owes the patient a professional treatment, living up to the objective standards of a certain branch, but without guaranteeing a certain success or result.'(Dittrich and Tades, ABGB[35], § 1151 E 25 referring to SZ 57/98, RdW 1992, 8=EvBl 1993/3). The ABGB starts from a clear-cut division between contracts of work and contracts of employment under the heading of 'contracts for services'. CC § 1151 sets forth a short definition of both notions, followed by the rules regarding the employment contract (CC §§ 1153 ff); the contract for work is dealt with in CC §§ 1165 ff. The advocates of the so-called free employment contract argue that a doctor cannot owe a result (a cure) but only an effort, just like an employee. But since the position of doctors is not entirely the same as that of employees not all rules on employment contracts are to apply. Doctors are not part of a hierarchical organisation; they rather work autonomously. However, other elements are the same. For those reasons the treatment contract is classified as a free employment contract indicating that this is not exactly the same as a regular employment contract (Völkl-Torggler, JBl 1984, p. 74). The prevailing opinion argues that treatment differs from the contract of work in a few substantial items and contains elements of the employment contract. The resulting so-called free employment contract is not regulated in the CC, the author calls it a contractus sui generis created by doctrine. Basically, all the provisions designed at protecting the employee do not apply. Nonetheless, there is some uncertainty left as to which rules of the employment contract apply. Völkl-Torggler, JBl 1984, p. 74, points out the legal uncertainty and therefore opts for adopting the contract of work approach (p. 83). Irrespective of the regime to be applied rules tackling the specific issues arising in the context of treatment are somewhat missing. Since treatment contracts really fit neither the codified rules on contracts for work nor the rules on free employment contracts recourse to case law can often provide the only satisfactory solution.

3. In ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law, treatment is not subject to special regulation. The duties of treatment-providers to their clients may derive from contract or tort or delict. The duties in each are co-extensive. In contract, those who provide a service in the course of a business have an obligation both under the common law and under statute to exercise reasonable care and skill in performance, Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s.13 (England only). In cases turning on non-contractual liability the same duty is derived from case-law on negligence, see e.g. Bolam v. Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 WLR 582, 586, (fractured hip during electro-convulsive therapy, some doctors would have used muscle relaxant to guard against such risk, some not, doctor not liable as acted according to a responsible body of professional opinion, thus with 'reasonable care and skill'). Cases on medical liability are generally framed in tort or delict and legal writing deals with the issues largely in texts on these subjects (in Scotland see e.g. Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, paras. 136-280), the main reason being that medical services are typically provided within a public framework which does not include a contractual relationship.

4. FINLAND has an Act on the Status of Patients (no. 785/1992) and a Patient Injury Act (no. 585/1986)]. The cardinal ideas in the Finnish system are: strengthening of the patients' freedom rights, procedural guarantees of their legal protection and enhancement of the individual's social rights. (Cf. Lahti, Towards a comprehensive legislation governing the rights of patients, p. 208; Pahlman et. al., Three years in force: has the Finnish act on the status and rights of the patients materialized? Medicine and Law, p. 1).

5. In FRANCE the most important act regarding treatment is the Code de la Santé Publique (cited from now on as CSP), as recently amended by the law of 4 March 2002 on the rights of patients and the quality of health system. Other applicable rules are the general rules of the CC on contract and the rules on the service contract (contrat d´entreprise), arts. 1779 ff. Regarding informed consent, provisions can also be found in the Civil Code, art. 16-3. The Code of medical ethics (decree 6 November 1995) is also applicable, not only in disciplinary tribunals but also in the ordinary courts (See Cass.civ I, 27 May 1998, Bull.civ. I, no. 187; Resp.civ. et assur. 1998, no. 276; D. 1998, 530 note Laroche-Gisserot, in which the Court applied this Code determining the duties of a surgeon. In the situation in question it was held that the surgeon was under the obligation to refuse the treatment asked by the patient.) There is however still room for regulation of a treatment contract by case law. Many of the most important rules governing a treatment contract have been "discovered" by the Cour de cassation and the Conseil d´Etat, in applying the very general provisions on service contracts, especially the determination of the standard of care. Most of these rules are now codified by the law in the Code de la Santé Publique.

6. The contract for medical treatment under GERMAN law is considered as a contract for services regulated by CC arts. 611-630, according to the overwhelming majority of doctrine and case law: BGH 9 December 1974, BGHZ 63, 306, 309; BGH 18 March 1980, BGHZ 76, 249, 261; BGH 10 March 1981, NJW 1981, 2002; BGH 25 March 1986, BGHZ 97, 273; CA Düsseldorf 31 January 1974, NJW 1975, 595; CA Zweibrücken 10 March 1983, NJW 1983, 2094; CA Cologne 17 September 1987, VersR 1988, 1049; CA Braunschweig 9 August 1979, VersR 1980, 853, 854; CA Koblenz 17 December 1980, VersR 1981, 689; CA Cologne 7 March 1979, VersR 1980, 434; CA Munich 27 February 1981, VersR. 1981, 757, 758; CA Koblenz 7 January 1993, NJW-RR 1994, 52; LG Cologne 31 July 1979, VersR 1980, 491; Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 39; Staudinger (-Richardi), BGB [2005], § 611; Palandt (-Putzo) BGB, § 611; MünchKomm (-Müller-Glöge), BGB, § 611 and MünchKomm (-Soergel), BGB, § 631. The treatment provider's main obligation does not consist of achieving a certain cure or treatment result (BGH loc.cit.); Cf. Gehrlein, Leitfaden zur Arzthaftpflicht, p. 3, rather of providing conscientious and dutiful treatment according to the standards of accepted, approved and up to date medical science (Gehrlein, Leitfaden zur Arzthaftpflicht, p. 3). However, according to the Federal Court, the relationship between a treatment provider and the patient is not to be considered as a normal private law contract, as factors such as the dignity of the human being and the special trust relationship must be taken into account: BGH 9 December 1958, BGHZ 29, 46, 52 f = NJW 1959, 811, 813; BGH 4 July 1984, BGHZ 32, 367, 379 = NJW 1984, 2639. Therefore treatment contracts deviate in some respects from the normal regime of services contracts. It must also be noted that the nature of liability for treatment is always one of private law, not public law if a public hospital is involved, and as such common courts entertain jurisdiction over such claims: Gehrlein, Leitfaden zur Arzthaftpflicht, p. 2.

7. Under GREEK law liability with regard to the supply of medical services may be either contractual or delictual. The provisions on the liability of the service supplier in the Consumer Act are also applicable. There is no indication to what extent standard contract terms are being used in treatment contracts. The supply of medical services is not dealt with as such in the civil code. The latter provides only for service contracts in abstract terms. The code provisions that may be applicable to the agreement between patient and doctor are those with regard to the employment contract (CC arts. 648-680) and the contract for work (CC arts. 681-792). It is maintained that the employment contract provides the most adequate legislative framework to cover the usual agreement between patient and doctor, though there are instances in which the contract of work provisions are deemed to be more appropriate (Androulidaki-Dimitriadi, The duty to inform the patient, pp. 106 ff). However, it has been argued that the employment contract and the contract for work fall short of meeting all the particularities of the contract for the provision of medical treatment. Therefore, it is argued that the agreement between patient and doctor does not fall squarely into an employment contract or a contract for work framework. Instead, it is rather a sui generis contract for the provision of medical services, to which the provisions of the previous two set of contracts apply by analogy, alongside other rules such as those in codes of ethics (Androulidaki-Dimitriadi, The duty to inform the patient, p. 110). From 1994 a new liability regime applies to the provision of medical services. The Act 2251/94 on Consumer Protection provides in article 8 rules concerning the liability of the service supplier. The suitability of the provisions on the liability of the service supplier to regulate the medical profession has been subjected to criticism. However, it still does not seem to have triggered significant case law to justify such concerns (Georgiadis, The liability of service supplier, pp. 143-155); for doctors particularly at pp. 151-152; (Foundedaki, Medical liability in civil law, pp. 179-204). According to the above provision, the supplier of services is liable for all damage caused due to the service. The consumer needs to prove the damage and the causal link between damage and the provision of the service, whereas the professional supplier of the service needs to prove that he or she was not at fault in providing the service. Thus, the doctor will have to prove not only that he or she was not negligent but also that the services were lawful, i.e. that it was according to the rules, the contract and the duty of care (Foundedaki, Medical liability in civil law, p. 188). On the other hand, the client needs to prove the causal link between the provision of medical services and the damage. It is however well known that proof of a causal link in cases of medical negligence is particularly difficult (Foundedaki, Medical liability in civil law, p. 191). However, in practice a patient is less likely to claim on the basis of contract than on the basis of non-contractual liability for damage (CC arts. 914 ff) [A.P. 1270/1989 EllDik 1991, 765; Court of Appeals of Athens 197/1988 EllDik 1988, 1239]. Finally, some aspects of the provision of medical services and the exercise of the medical profession are regulated in a code of conduct and ethics of the medical profession (25.5/6/7/1955) and a code for the exercise of the medical profession (1565/1939) (Foundedaki, Medical liability in civil law, p. 183).

8. The contract for treatment in ITALY is mainly regulated by provisions on the intellectual professions (CC arts. 2229-2238) together with provisions on autonomous work (CC arts. 2222-2228), where there is compatibility. Moreover, the medical deontological code provides for disciplinary rules and measures.

9. In THE NETHERLANDS the most important rules on treatment are codified in the Medical Treatment Contract Act (known as the WGBO) which is included in the DUTCH CC art. 7.7.5. This implies that the treatment contract is treated as a species of the contract of services in general. (CC arts. 7.7.1 and 7.7.5.) Cf. Sluyters and Biesaart, De geneeskundige behandelingsovereenkomst,p. 6. In so far as the rules of the treatment contract do not directly apply to para-medical treatment, the rules on services in general are to be applied. The rules on treatment might, however be applied by way of analogy (Sluyters and Biesaart, De geneeskundige behandelingsovereenkomst, p. 6).

10. In POLISH law the treatment contract is normally classified as a civil law contract similar to the contract of mandate (CC art. 750), which indicates an obligation of means. The civil code establishes only a framework for construction of such a contract as most of the obligations arising from such a contract are regulated in special acts, for example: the act on the profession of a doctor and dentist of 5. 12. 1996 (Dz. U. of 2002, nr 21, poz. 204 with changes, the act of 19. 8. 1994 on protection of mental health (Dz. U. of 1994, no. 111, poz. 535 with changes), or the act on medical care institutions of 30. 8. 1991 (Dz. U. 1991, no. 91, poz. 408 with changes). To the civil law liability of the treatment provider rules of the civil code apply.

11. In PORTUGAL article 64 of the Constitution grants citizens universal access to healthcare and sets the framework for the organisation of the national healthcare system, which is regulated by Lei 48/90 of 21/08. In addition, Portugal is a party to the CHRM, which produces direct effects in Portuguese law. Treatment contracts are not specifically regulated by the law. If treatment is performed in a public hospital of the National Healthcare System (the main treatment providers), administrative law applies. If it is carried out in private hospitals or by private practitioners, civil law applies (services contract and the law on non-contractual liability).

12. The provision of treatment is classified in SPAIN as a service contract, regulated in the CC arts. 1583-1587. The Spanish Supreme Court has established the main obligations for the treatment provider. In the TS of 25 April 1994 (RJ 1994/3073) the court gives content to the obligation of means. The treatment provider must (a) apply all available means according to the medical science in the concrete situation so as to comply with the lex artis ad hoc (TS 7 May 1997 , RJ 1997/3874); (b) inform the patient, or if applicable the patient's family, about the diagnosis, proposed treatment, prognosis, risks which may materialize and finally about the means (material, instruments or tools) used to provide the service; and when these means may turn out to be insufficient, inform the patient to allow recourse to another medical provider (c) continue with the treatment service until the patient is allowed to leave the medical centre and inform the patient on the risks which may materialize (d) In case of a chronic illness, inform the patient about the necessary care to be observed in order to prevent the deterioration of the health situation or its repetition. The most important rules on treatment are codified in the General Act on Healthcare of April 25th 1986 (Ley General de Sanidad). There are many other statutory regulations on specific medical fields and administrative rules to develop such statutory provisions.

13. The SWEDISH rules on medical treatment can be found in the Medical Care Act (1982:763), HSL. According to art. 1:2, first para, the goal is to provide good health and medical care to the same standards for the whole population. Furthermore the health care is to be provided with respect for the equal value of all humans and for the dignity of the individual: those who have the greatest need are to be given priority in medical care, HSL art. 1:2, second para. Concerning the professionals providing medical care, the Act (1998:531) on exercising a profession within the area of health service and medical care applies. The general rule in art. 2:1 provides that the medical personnel must perform their work in accordance with science and reliable experience. A patient must be given competent and careful health service and medical care, fulfilling these requirements. The treatment must so far as is possible be designed and executed in consultation with the patient. The patient is to be treated with consideration and respect. Similar rules are also to be found in the Act on dental care (1985: 125). The medical Deontological Code of 1990 includes obligations for the medical service provider.

IV.C.–8:102: Preliminary assessment

The treatment provider must, in so far as this may reasonably be considered necessary for the performance of the service:

(a) interview the patient about the patient's health condition, symptoms, previous illnesses, allergies, previous or other current treatment and the patient's preferences and priorities in relation to the treatment;

(b) carry out the examinations necessary to diagnose the health condition of the patient; and

(c) consult with any other treatment providers involved in the treatment of the patient.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article states the steps the treatment provider is to take in order to assess the condition of the patient and to determine adequately the phases of treatment. In order to be able to meet the core obligation to treat, the treatment provider is required to investigate the health status of the patient. This will typically consist of anamnesis (information received from the patient), requiring the co-operation of the patient, and of diagnosis, i.e. the interpretation of the symptoms of the patient, possibly involving analyses or examinations that the patient has undergone.

During diagnosis, the symptoms and the data gathered by the treatment provider will be interpreted according to his or her technical knowledge and experience, and the result will be the identification of the cause of the ailment. This is the first step in the treatment provider's obligation to treat. After having received the information, the treatment provider needs to diagnose the ailment.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

A correct diagnosis is crucial for the success of treatment. A diagnosis which is based on the assessment of the existing health situation, i.e. a probability judgement of the condition of the patient, will provide the basis for the development of an adequate treatment strategy. The diagnosis itself is based on data gathered, followed by an analysis of that data. Medicine can never be 100 per cent exact, and a diagnosis is but a judgement based on scientific probability. Assessment of the existing physical condition of a patient and the subsequent diagnosis must thus conform to the standard of care of the average competent treatment provider.

It is debated, however, whether an incorrect diagnosis can be a ground for liability. It is widely held that an incorrect diagnosis does not constitute a breach of the standard of care, as it would be an error of judgement due to the existence of several possible causes of the ailment. It is often argued that only a blunt mistake in appreciating simple medical data and in interpreting that data, constitutes a breach of the standard of care.

Another issue is how far-reaching this obligation should be. A thorough diagnosis demands time and resources. Overdiagnosis will be lengthy, expensive, unnecessary and risky. Many diagnostic techniques, in particular invasive diagnostic procedures, present risks. They may also be a waste of limited health-care resources.

Illustration 1
During the process of diagnosis, physicians conclude that the patient most probably suffers from tuberculosis. There is, however, a very slight chance that he suffers from Hodgkin's disease, a malignancy of lymph tissue. The physicians decide that the patient should undergo an invasive diagnostic technique, mediastinoscopy, which presents the risk of injury to the vocal cords. The risk materialises in this case. The patient, apart from arguing the fact that he did not consent to the examination, argues that the diagnostic examination was disproportionate to the condition he was in.

On the other hand, incomplete diagnosis will very often contribute to a defective performance of treatment, as not enough data was available in order to enable a standard quality treatment.

C. Preferred option

A reasonableness test is the preferred criterion for assessing how thoroughly the treatment provider must execute the diagnosis. This is in line with the provision in IV.C.–8:104 (Obligation of skill and care). The treatment provider must, in so far as this may reasonably be considered necessary, interview the patient, carry out examinations and consult with other treatment providers in order to assess the underlying health status of the patient. Arguments excluding or limiting the establishment of liability for a defective diagnosis do not seem to be persuasive. Liability exists in so far as the treatment provider failed to carry out the examinations reasonably considered necessary, or the diagnosis judgement was sub-standard.

This reasonability test seems the most adequate approach to how thorough the diagnosis should be and consists in balancing the following factors: (a) standards and guidelines of approved, sound medical practice; (b) economic efficiency in healthcare resources allocation and (c) risk–benefit analysis.

Under this Article, the treatment provider, in so far as may reasonably be considered necessary, is to consult with other treatment providers involved in the treatment or previous treatment of the patient, in order to obtain important information on clinical history, allergies, medication, other treatment the patient is receiving, etc., so as to acquire more data relevant to the diagnosis.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. A duty to perform an adequate diagnosis exists in all countries analysed, though the strictness of the standard of care that the treatment provider must employ in the diagnosis varies. In ENGLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY, ITALY, SCOTLAND, SPAIN, THE NETHERLANDS and PORTUGAL diagnosis must be carried out according to the standard of care of an average, dutiful treatment-provider. In DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN, the standard of care of diagnosis is higher: in Finland the standard is that of an experienced treatment-provider and in Denmark and Sweden that of a specialist treatment-provider. In England, Scotland, The Netherlands, and Portugal, the treatment-provider enjoys a large discretion in the choice of the diagnostic methods. In these countries, due to the evaluative nature and uncertainty of diagnosis, it is considered that there are only liability consequences for an imperfect diagnosis if the treatment-provider deviated from acceptable medical standards or respectable medical opinion. In Germany, a fundamental mistake in diagnosis may have as a consequence a shift of the burden of proof to the treatment-provider.

II. Liability for a defective diagnosis

2. In DENMARK provided that the treatment was carried out in a public hospital, the patient can be compensated irrespective of any diagnosis fault committed by the treatment provider. According to art. 2(1) of the Patient Insurance scheme, avoidable injury caused by diagnosis can be compensated by applying either one of two rules: the specialist rule or the equipment rule. According to the first rule, injury is deemed avoidable if the optimal use of the best specialist skill would have prevented it. According to the second rule, any failure of medical equipment used to perform diagnosis or treatment objectively triggers compensation for the injury suffered. Cf. Erichsen, Medicine and Law 2001, p. 359; Von Eyben Domstols afgørelser after patientforsikringsloven, 31; Grünfeld, De nordiske patientforsikrings ordninger-ligheder og forskelle, p. 70.

3. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the doctor would be liable for a defective diagnosis if it amounts to a failure to exercise reasonable care and skill. (Maynard v. West Midlands RHA [1985] 1 All ER 635), Moyes v Lothian Health Board 1990 SLT 444).

4. In FINLAND injury caused by diagnosis is compensated under art. 2(1) of the Finnish Patient Injury Law if an experienced treatment provider could have conducted the diagnosis in such a way that the injury would have been avoided. Cf. Lahti, Towards a comprehensive legislation governing the rights of patients, 211.

5. A treatment provider can be held liable in case of a mistake in diagnosis in GERMANY. The standard of care in diagnosis is influenced by the diagnosis media available (BGHZ 72, 132; BGH NJW 1982, 697; 1994, 801; Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 50 III; Gehrlein, Leitfaden zur Arzthaftpflicht, p. 38). Due to the fact that the patient must prove causation, normal diagnosis mistakes are irrelevant in practice (Gehrlein, Leitfaden zur Arzthaftpflicht, p. 38). However, in case of a fundamental mistake in diagnosis the burden of proof shifts to the treatment provider. Cf. Gehrlein, Leitfaden zur Arzthaftpflicht. BGH NJW 1996, 1589; 1992, 2962; 1988, 1513; VersR 1981, 1033; CA Saarbrücken 26 August 1998, NJW-RR 1999, 176. A fundamental mistake in diagnosis is one which is seriously disconform to sound, accepted medical practice. One example of a fundamental diagnosis mistake is that of a physician who failed to understand the patient's need of urgent cancer therapy from a histologic examination (BGH NJW 1989, 2318). In another case, the doctor failed to diagnose a bacterial infection despite the manifestation of obvious symptoms (CA Karlsruhe VersR 1989, 195). Long distance diagnosis is forbidden (Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 50 VI; BGH VersR 1959, 589; 1961, 1039; 1971, 1123; 1975, 283; BGH DMW 1983, 1571; CA Hamm VersR 1980, 291.) unless in emergency or other exceptional circumstances (Gehrlein 2000, 39; BGH NJW 1979, 1248). Excessive diagnosis is addressed in the same way as a mistake in diagnosis (Cf. Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 50 III; CA Zweibrücken VersR 1991, 427), as it involves increased risks for the patient.

6. Under GREEK law if a patient suffers damage to health due a defective diagnosis, on the basis of which the patient acted or did not act, then the provider of medical services is liable for that damage. (For an omission to diagnose, see A.P. 1063/2000).

7. In FRANCE if diagnosis is not in conformity with the treatment provider's obligation to provide attentive, diligent care according to accepted sound medical practice, the treatment provider can be liable, cf. CA Paris 13 December 1996, GazPal 1998, 1, somm, 69, note H. Vray.

8. In ITALY surgical activity also includes a preliminary diagnostic and prognostic phase. In fact, the first obligation a treatment provider has to fulfil is collecting the information about the existing health situation of the patient (Alpa, Riv.it.med.leg. 1999, fasc. 1 (February), p. 26). For this, the provider needs the collaboration of the patient. Therefore, in those cases in which the patient is in a state of incapacity, the doctor will have to seek the help of relatives or friends and in any case the family doctor. Since this is the beginning of the performance of the obligations under a treatment contract, a treatment provider who does not perform a correct diagnosis will be liable for non-performance of those obligations.

9. A diagnosis must be based on adequate research and adequate information in THE NETHERLANDS. A failure to adequately research cannot be justified by external factors such as a bad organisation of the unit, lack of staff etc. The doctor may restrict the research to those examinations which may reasonably be considered to be required. If the patients have serious complaints or symptoms a duty to examine more scrupulously may arise as long and in so far as there is no sufficient explanation for these complaints or symptoms available. The doctor is not required to investigate the presence of an improbable risk without indications of such a risk manifesting itself. An incorrect diagnosis may amount to a non-performance even if it was based on sufficient research. Such will be the case if the doctor has not taken the possibility of a danger seriously enough. However, the mere fact that, with the benefit of hindsight, the diagnosis turns out to have been wrong, does not lead to liability. Such would, for instance, not be the case if the doctor‘s conclusions were scientifically sound, which may be the case with very rare disorders or disorders that are difficult to diagnose. Moreover, any diagnosis – as does the anamnesis – calls for a certain element of evaluation: in order to be absolutely certain about a diagnosis, it may be necessary to perform certain operations that may be risky or otherwise unwelcome. In such a case, a certain degree of incertitude is to be accepted, as long as the risk that comes along with the incertitude is acceptable, taking all circumstances into account. With regard to the choice of diagnostic methods, a large discretion is allowed to the doctor provided that the course followed is in compliance with generally accepted medical-technical views. Cf. HR 9 November 1990, NedJur 1991, 26, Speeckaert/Gradener; Gevers, De rechter en het medisch handelen[3], p. 18.

10. A diagnosis is listed as one of the activities of the doctor under POLISH law. (The Act on the Profession of a Doctor, art. 2 para. 1). The diagnosis should be made in accordance with the current medical knowledge, available methods of diagnosing, rules of the professional ethics and due diligence (art. 4). Therefore if the diagnosis is defective the doctor may be held liable.

11. The treatment provider can be held liable in case of defective diagnosis under PORTUGUESE law: CA Coimbra, 4 April 1995; CJ XX-1995, II, 31; STA 17 June 1997; AD XXXVII-1998, 436, 435; Faure and Koziol (-Sinde Monteiro and Veloso), Cases on Medical Malpractice, p. 175 if the leges artis are not met. Esperança Pina, A Responsabilidade dos Médicos[3], p. 102, suggests that the standard of care in this case is not that of the average competent doctor, rather consisting of the evaluation of the methods employed in the given circumstances.

12. Interpreting the symptoms of the patient is one of the services provided by the treatment provider and must be fulfilled in accordance with the requirements of the "lex artis ad hoc" under SPANISH law. Therefore, when a diagnosis is provided without observing due diligence, the doctor may be held liable. However, a wrong diagnosis does not necessarily imply by itself that the treatment provider will be liabile: according to the Supreme Court, some damage caused by the negligence of the doctor must be proven in any case, in order to trigger liability (TS 20 June 1997, RJ 1997/4881).

13. According to the SWEDISH Patients Injury Act (hereinafter PL) compensation is granted if it is predominantly probable that the damage was caused by a wrong diagnosis, PL § 6 at 3. This is the case if factually recognisable signs of disease or damage are ignored or incorrectly interpreted, so that treatment does not take place or goes in the wrong direction. A prerequisite is however, that an experienced specialist would have come to the right conclusion if he or she had had the same basis for a diagnosis, see Sverne and Sverne, Patientens rätt[3], pp. 91 ff.

IV.C.–8:103: Obligations regarding instruments, medicines, materials, installations and premises

(1)The treatment provider must use instruments, medicines, materials, installations and premises which are of at least the quality demanded by accepted and sound professional practice, which conform to applicable statutory rules, and which are fit to achieve the particular purpose for which they are to be used.

(2) The parties may not, to the detriment of the patient, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

This Article addresses the obligations of the treatment provider regarding the instruments, medicines, materials, installations and premises used for the treatment. One of the characteristics of contemporary medical practice is technological evolution. Medical science and practice are more and more dependent on sophisticated technological devices, presenting specific risks. Although the efficiency of treatment has significantly improved, the chance of an unpredictable adverse event remains and in some respects may even have increased (cf. G. Viney, (ed.), L´indemnisation des accidents médicaux, L.G.D.J., Paris, 1997, p. 108).

The medical products used, including devices, instruments and drugs, must conform to approved professional standards and should be adequately inspected, monitored and maintained. Treatment providers must avoid using obsolete or malfunctioning devices, materials and installations.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

The materials, instruments, devices, installations and products used during treatment are essential for the performance of the treatment contract. They must be of at least standard quality, and must be adequately maintained and operated in order to insure the safety of patients. This input brings, especially in modern high-technology based medicine, an increase in the potential benefits of treatment, but sometimes also an increase in the risks because of the complexity or inherent hazardousness of such input.

Defective input is, according to statistical data, a common cause of failure to perform properly the obligation to treat. Quite often in hospital settings, such defective input is a latent source of potential errors.

> Illustration 1
> A patient undergoes an X-ray examination. Radiation exposure should be between 50 and 200 millirem, but due to a defect in the X-ray machine, the patient was exposed to 1 rem, a very high and potentially harmful dose of radiation. In this case, a medical device malfunctioned, and the patient may have sustained injury resulting from the examination.

The installations where treatment is carried out can also contribute towards non-performance: a good example is ‘nosocomial’ infections, infections endemic in hospital premises. Some of these pathogenic agents are drug resistant. Patients who are subject to invasive diagnosis or treatment as well as prolonged hospitalisation are often prone to contract such infections. Measures can be taken in order to reduce the impact of nosocomial diseases in a hospital, but they can never be eliminated: minimising time between admission and surgical procedures, choosing appropriate surgical prophylaxis, isolation facilities, screening procedures, effective hospital cleaning and disinfection. In Britain, approximately 15 per cent of all patients admitted to hospitals contract hospital-related infections. In France, the probability of contracting a serious infection after complex surgery is 33 per cent; in Denmark, however, only 2 per cent.

> A patient who underwent heart surgery contracts a nosocomial, drug-resistant infection in spite of all the aseptic measures taken. The patient sustains an illness as a consequence of the defective nature of the installations used for the performance of the treatment.

The main policy question in relation to this Article is the intensity of the duty of care of the treatment provider while employing this sort of input. On the one hand, it can be argued that the treatment provider should be liable only if there is a breach of the duty of care while employing this kind of input, i.e. not operating, servicing or maintaining the input in conformity with applicable regulations, equipment instructions or approved practise, or not meeting the required standard of care. This is the traditional view on medical malpractice, which stresses the importance of the deterrent effect of fault-based liability.

On the other hand, it is sometimes held that the treatment provider should be strictly liable, as there should be an obligation to ensure the safety of the patient. According to this position, the treatment provider has an obligation of result regarding the safety of the patient, meaning that it must shield the patient from harm from defective or insufficient choice, servicing, maintenance, operation or design of medical equipment, devices and installations.

A middle position establishes a presumption of fault on the part of the treatment provider, allowing the provider to prove that it has acted according to the required standard of care and applicable regulations or approved medical practice in order to avoid harm to the patient.

C. Comparative overview

The duty of the treatment provider concerning the use of adequate input such as instruments, medicines and materials exists in all analysed legal systems, though the consequences of the breach of this duty varies. In The Netherlands and Portugal the treatment provider is held liable in so far as it breached the standard of care while using or administering this input. The same is true in France, Germany and Spain, though the burden of proof of breach of this duty may shift to the treatment provider. In Denmark, Finland and Sweden, liability is strict.

The duty of the treatment provider to use adequate installations is also recognised in all countries, and is of particular importance in the case of hospital-acquired infections. However, in Germany, France and Spain the burden of proof of breach of the duty may shift to the treatment provider. In Denmark, Finland and Sweden injury caused by preventable infections is compensated.

D. Preferred option

The preferred option is a strict liability of the treatment provider regarding the materials, instruments, devices, products and installations used in performing the treatment obligations. This input must be fit for its purpose.

Given the complexity of, and inherent risk associated with, much of that input a strict liability seems appropriate. The complexity of such devices and the possibility of a technical or human malfunction while operating them render such a strong liability a necessity. There is also a significant risk of an unexpected random failure of the equipment, especially if it is very sophisticated or complex.

This approach is in the interests of patients as it makes it easier to obtain compensation for treatment injury: it is not necessary to establish fault on the part of the treatment provider. To some extent, it is also in the interests of healthcare professionals as there is no need to establish that a particular professional is to be 'blamed' for the occurrence of the injury. The presence of defective equipment in a treatment providing institution is regarded as something which can be adequately controlled and prevented only at the level of the system or institution. This is a shift from personal to collective or organisational liability.

Moreover, empirical studies suggest that the deterrent effect of fault-based liability at the individual level in relation to defective input is ineffective. Studies point out that integrated proactive measures (surveillance and checking of material, equipment, devices and products) are more suitable to prevent such medical accidents.

In the aftermath of several tragedies related to defective input in treatment (HIV and Hepatitis B/C contaminated blood; Thalidomide-related handicaps, etc.) as well as the high statistical incidence and impact of the materialisation of some input risks (e.g. in France more people are affected by nosocomial infections than by car accidents), public opinion became very sensitive regarding the issue. Understandably, policy-makers are very keen on this approach as it is a more adequate way of achieving efficient compensation for such injuries and preventing mass litigation and the difficult financial consequences that can emerge from it.

With regard to paragraph (2) it should be noted that the prohibition on contracting out does not exclude derogations to the benefit of the patient. This could be particularly important in an emergency where the choice may be between using inadequate instruments and materials or allowing the patient to die or suffer irreparable harm. In such a case, of course, the patient could consent to the use of the best instruments or materials available.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. In all countries the treatment provider has a duty to use adequate material, instruments, devices, products and premises while carrying out treatment on patients, though the consequences of the use of defective input media by treatment providers differs significantly in the different countries. In THE NETHERLANDS, the healthcare provider is liable if it breaches its standard of care while using defective materials and instruments. The regime is similar in PORTUGAL, though the burden of proof that due care was used shifts to the treatment provider in so far as high-risk equipment is employed. In GERMANY, the treatment provider can be held liable if it used defective input. In addition, if the injury could have been prevented, the burden of proof shifts to the treatment provider. In FRANCE and in SPAIN the law moved towards imposing a shift of the burden of proof to the treatment provider, who will have to prove that it took due care in the use of medical devices, instruments and input. This shift is now consolidated in French law, though in Spain the law is still not defined regarding this aspect. Finally, in DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN, if defective equipment is used, the treatment provider is strictly responsible (the Equipment Rule). In Denmark, the underlying causes of the defectiveness are not relevant.

2. Other specific objective liability regimes exist in several countries concerning vaccine accidents, use of contaminated blood and blood products and hospital-acquired infections. Concerning this category of infections, in DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN preventable infections are compensated. In GERMANY the burden of proof that all hygienic measures were taken shifts to the treatment provider. The burden of proof is also shifted to the treatment provider in FRANCE and in SPAIN, though the only valid defence of the treatment provider is the endogenous origin of the infection, i.e., that the patient carried the pathogenic agent, a difficult burden to discharge.

II. Materials, instruments and tools

3. In DENMARK, in the public sector, any injury caused by defective equipment is compensated under the "equipment rule" of Patient Insurance Act § 2(1)(b). The criterion is totally objective, and the underlying causes of the defectiveness are not relevant to compensation. Cf. Grünfeld, De nordiske patientforsikrings ordninger-ligheder og forskelle; Erichsen, Medicine and Law 2001, p. 362. Avoidable infections can be compensated according to the specialist rule of Patient Insurance Act § 2(1)(a) or the alternative treatment rule of § 2(1)(c). Unavoidable, unendurable infections that the patient cannot be expected to tolerate are compensated according to the "reasonableness rule" of § 2(1)(d). Cf. Grünfeld, De nordiske patientforsikrings ordninger-ligheder og forskelle.

4. Treatment providers can be held liable for the use of medical products and devices under section 2 of the UK Consumer Protection Act 1987. A special vaccine damage scheme (Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979) imposes strict liability on the entity administering the vaccine.

5. In FRANCE, the use of medical devices and products is considered as an obligation de sécurité de résultat, which results in an irrefutable presumption of fault of the treatment provider (strict liability). Regarding the use of defective medical devices, see: Cass.civ. I, 9 November 1999: D. 2000, 117, note P. Jourdain; JCP 2000.II.10251, note P. Bruin; Cf. Lambert-Faivre, Droit du dommage corporel[5], nos. 594 ff; Castelletta, Responsabilité médicale[2], p. 108); (Tabouteau, La sécurité sanitaire[2], p. 257. Art. L.1142-1 CSP. There are some doubts whether the obligations de résultat de sécurité developed by case law regarding the use of defective equipment are still valid after the changes in the law of 4 March 2002. Cf. (Jourdain, La réforme de l'indemnisation des dommages médicaux, p. 92. The same solution is used regarding products used, such as pharmaceutical products (Cass.civ. I, 7 November 2000, Bull.civ. I, no. 279; JCP 2001.I.340 no. 23, G. Viney). The FRENCH system is very sensible to the problem of compensation of nosocomial infections. The awareness and surveillance of the national healthcare system, as well as the fact that such infections cause more accidental deaths than vehicle, working and domestic accidents certainly contribute to that sensibility. Hence, case law has tended to impose a presumption of fault in the case of nosocomial infections based on an obligation de résultat (Cass.civ., 29 June 1999, Staphilocoques dorés, JCP 1999.II.10138 rapport Sargos: "Attendu qu´un médecin est tenu, vis-à-vis de son patient, en matière d´infection nosocomiales, d´une obligation de sécurité de résultat, dont il ne peut se libérer qu´en rapportant la preuve d´une cause étrangère."; Cass.civ. I, 21 May 1996, D. 1997, Somm. P. 287 (arrêt Bonicci); CE 9 December 1988, arrêt Cohen; CE 1 mars 1989, arrêt Bailly; CE 14 juin 1991, arrêt Maalem. Cf. (Lambert-Faivre, Droit du dommage corporel[5], no. 723); (Castelletta, Responsabilité médicale[2], p. 109); (Jourdain, La réforme de l'indemnisation des dommages médicaux, p. 90)). The only defence that the treatment provider can oppose is the endogenous character of the infection, i.e., that the infective pathogenic agent was carried by the patient, which is quite difficult to prove. After the law of 4 March 2002, this case law has been confirmed art. L. 1142-1 CSP. The only difference is that the responsible person can only be a hospital or a clinic and not the individual physician.

6. Injury caused by the use of defective equipment is compensated according to FINNISH art. 2 (1,2) PSL and infections according to art. 2 (1,3) FPL. Cf. Mikkonen, Medicine and Law, p. 347.

7. In case of injuries caused by the use of defective input, the treatment provider can be held liable under GERMAN law. If that injury could have been prevented, the burden of proof shifts to the treatment provider (BGH NJW 1978, 584; CA Hamm NJW 1999, 1787; Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 109; Gehrlein, Leitfaden zur Arzthaftpflicht, p. 52). In case of injury caused by nosocomial infections, the burden of proof shifts to the treatment provider, who must prove that it employed all necessary hygienic measures to prevent such infections in the premises (BGH NJW 1991, 1541; 1999, 3408).

8. The health provider is responsible for the adequacy of the materials, instruments and tools used for the performance of the treatment under the law of THE NETHERLANDS. This was first accepted by the Hoge Raad in the case of Cadix/Aluminium (HR 13 December 1968, NedJur 1969, 174) and has been codified in CC art. 6:77. If the inadequacy of the materials, instruments and tools lead to a non-performance, the health provider is liable for that.

9. Under POLISH law equipment in hospitals must be of at least average quality. This does not mean, however, that the average quality is always sufficient, and in some cases requirements concerning quality should be set on a higher level. Non-fulfilment of these requirements constitutes fault on the part of the hospital or the doctor. In the case of a doctor a lack of sufficient knowledge is also considered as a fault (Nesterowicz, Prawo i Medycyna 2000, 163).

10. Under SPANISH law the means used to provide medical services must be of average quality in accordance with the current status of the medical science, and appropriate to the specific circumstances of the case. TS 26 May 1997, RJ 1997/4114: the medical institution is under the obligation to maintain the medical instruments and installations in good condition. In TS of 1 July 1997, RJ 1997/5471 and TS 21 July 1997, RJ 1997/5523 the Supreme Court imposes an objective liability. It considers the medical institution as objectively liable in accordance with the General Consumers Act because the patient was a consumer (art. 3 ConsProtA) who was provided with a medical service (arts. 147 and 148 ConsProtA) and suffered damage which gave rise to objective liability (arts. 147 and ff ConsProtA). When the products or services provided to patients by treatment providers do not comply with the levels of purity presumed in the General Consumers Act, the risks are to be assumed by the medical institution. TS 25 April 1994, RJ 1994/3073: in the case that the materials, tools or instruments turn out to be insufficient to provide the treatment, the medical provider must inform the patient to allow recourse to another medical provider.

11. The patient may obtain compensation according to the SWEDISH PL art. 6, first para, art. 2, if it is predominantly probable that the injury was caused by defects in a medical technical product or hospital equipment used for examination, care, treatment or other similar measure or the improper use thereof. According to HSL art. 2e, the personnel, location and equipment necessary to provide good health care must be at hand where health and medical care is carried out.

12. In PORTUGAL an obligation of security exists if the materials, instruments and tools are dangerous by their very nature. The treatment provider is presumed liable unless it proves that all care was used to prevent injury (CC art. 493 para. 2; Figueiredo Dias and Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade médica na europa ocidental, p. 38; Faure and Koziol (-Sinde Monteiro and Veloso), Cases on Medical Malpractice, p. 176).

IV.C.–8:104: Obligation of skill and care

(1) The treatment provider's obligation of skill and care requires in particular the treatment provider to provide the patient with the care and skill which a reasonable treatment provider exercising and professing care and skill would demonstrate under the given circumstances.

(2) If the treatment provider lacks the experience or skill to treat the patient with the required degree of skill and care, the treatment provider must refer the patient to a treatment provider who can.

(3) The parties may not, to the detriment of the patient, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

The treatment provider has, as a service provider, an obligation of skill and care under IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care). This Article provides some further guidance. It uses the objective standard of a reasonable treatment provider exercising and professing care and skill.

The objective standard can be modulated by specific subjective or concrete factors, such as the specialisation of the treatment provider, the circumstances or the agreement of the parties. Thus, the criterion for assessment of the standard required is that of the reasonably competent professional, acting in conformity with the guidelines, Directives and protocols set by the current state of the medical science, under the concrete circumstances in which treatment must be performed (lex artis ad hoc).

Illustration 1
A patient has broken her leg when she fell during a hike. She is treated at a hospital. The doctor, a general practitioner attached to the hospital, is to treat the patient with the skill and care of a reasonable general practitioner. He treats the patient, after having judged the data from an X-ray examination, by putting on a splint.

Illustration 2
The same doctor is called later at night to accompany ambulance personnel and to help the victim of a car crash on the spot. No X-ray device is available. In this case, the circumstances (time, place, lack of means) significantly decrease the demands as regards the skill and care required from the doctor.

Specialised medical skills and experience will raise the standard of care required from the health-care professional. The more specialised or experienced a health-care professional is, the greater the skill which can be expected to be demonstrated. Inexperience is no defence, as even a starting health-care professional is expected to have at least average skill and competence.

Illustration 3
A patient, whose particular type of skin rash was wrongly diagnosed by a general practitioner, receives inadequate treatment. After some time, she decides to consult a dermatologist, who diagnoses a rare skin disease and prescribes adequate therapy. This specific knowledge of skin diseases may not be expected from a general practitioner, but it would be expected from a dermatologist.

The treatment provider must meet the standard of the average reasonable health-care professional. Whenever a treatment provider acknowledges that he or she is not skilled enough, or does not have the specialised skill fit for the treatment of the concrete ailment of the patient, there is an obligation to refer the patient to a specialist in that field, or alternatively, to consult with such a professional.

An "unconventional" or "alternative" health professional (e.g. an acupuncturist) has to live up to the normal standard of care expected in that field and what may reasonably be expected of the treatment provider given the normal care that the patient may expect and what care could have been expected in regular medicine.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

This is a key provision in establishing liability for non-performance of the treatment provider's obligations. There are two contrasting approaches to this problem in Europe. The traditional negligence approach holds the treatment provider liable only in so far as it did not duly perform the obligation of skill and care. According to the second approach, the compensation of the patient does not depend on any such non-performance, and compensation is provided or backed up by a special compensation scheme.

In the case of negligence, several interests are at stake in defining and interpreting the standard of care. A very stringent standard of care will trigger lower activity levels, as the treatment provider will perform treatment more thoroughly, as well as the engagement of treatment providers in defensive medicine, avoiding the use of any risky techniques, even if, after a cost–benefit balance these seem to be more in the interests of the patient. Another economic consequence is the inflation of insurance premiums, the cost of which will eventually spread to the final costs of health care. On the other hand, a less stringent standard of care would make it more difficult for a patient to obtain compensation, a fact that could result in unfairness, professional impunity and costly consequences for the patient or the welfare system. Besides, the overall quality of health care might potentially decrease, unless other accountability mechanisms (disciplinary or penal) are reinforced.

Another important discussion relates to the modulation of the standard of care when inexperienced health professionals are concerned. It is traditionally held that the standard of care is an objective threshold that cannot be lowered. If a healthcare professional cannot comply with the minimum standard of care due to inexperience, the patient should be referred to an experienced health professional. On the other hand, it is held that, in the field of medicine, experience only comes with practice, and as the training of health-care professionals benefits society at large, society should internalise the risks inherent to their training.

Extending liability beyond fault, in situations where treatment accidents are concerned, presents many problems of both a legal and economic character that only with difficulty can be solved in the field of traditional liability law. A system can be developed in which such treatment accidents can be compensated, shifting the treatment risks away from the patient or welfare system. However, it would not be reasonable or fair to impose them on the treatment providers. Though comparative research shows that several countries have successfully implemented compensation of treatment accidents independent of any breach of a duty of care, these compensation schemes are implemented either through insurance law or through administrative law, sometimes replacing liability law for most practical purposes.

C. Comparative overview

In Austria, England, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, The Netherlands, Scotland, Spain, Portugal the treatment provider owes the patient the care and skill of a reasonable treatment provider of average competence. This is an objective standard of care. In Denmark, Finland and Sweden, where no-fault patient insurance schemes operate, the standard of care is more stringent: patients will obtain compensation if the injury sustained could have been prevented had the patient been treated by a specialist treatment provider.

It is unanimously held that the standard of care is not lowered below the general standard if the treatment provider is inexperienced. If the treatment provider is a specialist, the standard of care is raised in Austria, England, Germany, The Netherlands, Scotland, Spain and Portugal, but not in France and Italy. In Denmark, Finland and Sweden the general standard of care is already that of a specialist treatment provider.

In medical experimentation, the standard of care does not change in France, Germany, Italy, The Netherlands, Scotland, Spain and Sweden. The standard of care is, in practice, more stringent in Austria, England and Greece, and strict liability exists in Portugal. In the case of unconventional treatment, the treatment provider appears to be bound by the general standard of care.

The patient bears the burden of proof of the breach of this duty in Austria, England, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, The Netherlands, Portugal, Scotland and Spain. In Italy, Germany, Greece, The Netherlands, Portugal and Spain the burden of proof can be alleviated or shifted to the treatment provider in exceptional circumstances. In Denmark, Finland and Sweden, due to the non-adversarial nature of the no-fault patient insurance schemes, the circumstances concerning the injury sustained by the patient are investigated ex officio by the patient insurance consortium.

D. Preferred option

This Article establishes, as a general principle, a fault-based liability system for treatment contracts, apart from the obligations under IV.C.–8:103 (Obligation regarding instruments, medicines, materials, installations and premises). The main reason is that a non-fault system demands complex political decision-making and a financial mechanism to back it. A system compensating treatment accidents regardless of fault, where the costs of accidents could be spread and reduced, can only reasonably be addressed by specific insurance or social solidarity fund schemes, beyond the scope of liability law.

This does not preclude the implementation of voluntary or statutory insurance or social schemes in order to compensate some treatment accidents on a strict liability or no-fault basis. Additionally, specific statutes or regulations of the national healthcare systems may impose a different approach beyond this general principle.

Fault thus consists in non-conformity with the required standard of care. The standard of care set by this provision is a carefully balanced objective or abstract standard, though it can be modulated by some subjective or concrete factors, such as experience, circumstances and magnitude of the risks involved.

The standard of care required from an experienced health-care professional should not be below that required from an average competent health-care professional. This introduces more certainty and a higher level of patient protection. It should be noticed, however, that, although inexperienced health-care professionals are not exempted from the general standard of care, society as a whole benefits from their training, and so society and the healthcare system should internalise the consequences of mishaps caused by those inexperienced healthcare professionals. This is reflected in some other provisions in this Chapter which provide to some extent for collective and organisational liability instead of personal liability. See IV.C.–8:103 (Obligations regarding instruments, medicines, materials, installations and premises) and IV.C.–8:111 (Obligations of treatment-providing organisations). Likewise, paragraph (2) of this Article recognises the problem of inexperienced practitioners by providing for the patient to be referred to a treatment provider having the necessary experience or specialised skill.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. In AUSTRIA, ENGLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY, GREECE, ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS, SCOTLAND, SPAIN, PORTUGAL, the treatment provider is held liable in so far as it breached its duty of care to the patient. This duty of care is benchmarked by an objective standard set by the law. The standard of care consists of the care that a reasonable averagely skilled healthcare provider would employ in that circumstance. In addition, the healthcare provider is bound to respect the standards of medical practice (leges artis). While in England compliance with the standard of care is benchmarked by the execution of the treatment in a fashion that could be accepted by a respectable body of medical opinion (even though a minority opinion), in Austria, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, The Netherlands, it is benchmarked by the compliance with medical standards and regulations. In a contrasting way, in DENMARK, FINLAND, SWEDEN, no-fault patient insurance schemes set up the compensation regime, which will compensate injured patients in so far as the treatment was carried out below the care that would be expected from a specialist treatment provider, or in Denmark and Sweden if, in hindsight, an alternative treatment technique existed, and had it been employed, would probably not have caused the injury to the patient.
2. It is unanimously considered that the standard of care cannot be lowered below the level of the average treatment provider.
3. Regarding the increase of the standard in case of specialised medical treatment, there are several solutions. In AUSTRIA, ENGLAND, GERMANY, THE NETHERLANDS, SCOTLAND, SPAIN, PORTUGAL, the standard of care is raised if the treatment provider is a specialist. It is raised to the standard of a reasonable averagely skilled specialist treatment provider. On the other hand, in FRANCE and ITALY, the standard of care is not raised by expertise. It is unclear if expertise raises the standard of care in GREECE. In DENMARK, SWEDEN the standard for all medical treatment is that of a specialist treatment provider, and in FINLAND that of an experienced treatment provider.

4. In the different countries analysed, the law provides different solutions to the standard of care in medical experimentation. In FRANCE, ITALY, SCOTLAND, SPAIN and SWEDEN the standard of care set by the law does not change. In THE NETHERLANDS the standard is the same, though the treatment provider would not be responsible for the materialisation of an unforeseen risk. In AUSTRIA, ENGLAND and GREECE, especially due to the influence of ethics committees, the standard of care is, in practice, more stringent. In GERMANY the standard of care is not raised, though a cost-benefit analysis must be carried out and have a positive outcome so that the clinical trial is allowed. In addition, insurance is compulsory. Finally, in PORTUGAL there is strict liability and compulsory insurance in case of experimental treatment.

5. In AUSTRIA, ENGLAND, FRANCE, GREECE, ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL, SCOTLAND AND SPAIN, the patient bears the burden of proof of the breach of standard of care by the treatment provider, the causal link between the treatment and the injury. In England, the patient must discharge the burden of proof even if the treatment provider deviated from approved medical practice. In Italy, GERMANY, Greece, Portugal and Spain the burden of proof can be facilitated or shifted in exceptional circumstances. In The Netherlands the treatment provider has a duty to help the patient to substantiate the claim in a court of law. In DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN the patient insurance consortium investigates and handles claims of its own motion.

6. Though information on this issue is scarce, in FRANCE, THE NETHERLANDS and PORTUGAL, the standard of care expected from an unconventional treatment provider is the general standard of care of a conventional medical treatment provider.

7. DENMARK, FINLAND, ICELAND and NORWAY operate no-fault patient insurance schemes. In FRANCE, there is strict liability in some cases, and there is a compensation mechanism for serious treatment accidents, irrespective of fault, under the principle of solidarity. In SPAIN there is an ongoing shift towards objective liability regarding medical injury in hospitals. In ITALY there is an almost strict liability for routine treatment. In PORTUGAL liability is strict if high-risk equipment is used, or in case of experimental treatment. In the UNITED KINGDOM and THE NETHERLANDS the adoption of a no-fault compensation system has been debated by the competent public authorities, though in the UK the decision was not to adopt it.

II. General standard of care

8. The AUSTRIAN law on doctors expresses the required standard of care in wide and vague terms. § 49(1) refers to a diligent treatment whereby the doctor has to act according to the insights of science, experience, and existing regulation in order to protect both the sick and the healthy. The following paragraphs state that a doctor has to practice his or her profession personally and directly, however, allowing for the possibility of assistance under direction or transfer to specialists. In general, everyone has to comply with the ordinary degree of care and attention (CC § 1297). Now CC § 1299 raises that (standard) level of diligence up to the usual degree of care and attention that is necessary for the task in question. The criterion for establishing what amounts to a bad treatment consists of a comparison of the actual behaviour and the course of action of a reasonable and diligent expert. In other words, the treatment in question is assessed against the background of (hypothetical) standards of a profession. What exactly these standards are depends on the circumstances of the case, mainly the contractual relationship and the necessary diligence according to CC § 1299. Nonetheless, one can establish beyond feasible doubt that a doctor is not obliged to live up to the highest standards of the profession but merely has to possess the knowledge of an average expert in the field. Case law, Codes of Conduct and expertise can help in assessing the skills and expertise required by the medical profession.

9. In DENMARK in public medical practice, the patient is entitled to compensation for treatment injury regardless of fault, according to PIA art. 2, provided that the injury was avoidable. See the Notes to the preceding Article.

10. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND there is an objective standard (Glasgow Corp. v. Muir [1943] AC 448 at 457. The standard of care is objective and impersonal in the sense that it eliminates the personal equation and is independent of the idiosyncrasies of the particular person whose conduct is in question. Breach of duty is tested by the 'standard of the ordinary skilled man exercising and professing to have that special skill' (McNair J. in Bolam v. Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 WLR 582, 586, developing the Scottish case of Hunter v. Hanley 1955 SC 200). This test does not demand an optimal level of care from the professional, just the ordinary skill of an average practitioner. Thus the treatment provider will not be held liable in so far as he or she acted 'in accordance with a practice accepted as proper by a responsible body of medical men skilled in that particular area (…) a man is not negligent merely because there is a body of opinion who would take a contrary view' (Bolam v. Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 WLR 582, 586). The doctrine of Bolam was confirmed by further case law: Whitehouse v. Jordan [1981] 1 WLR 246; Maynard v. West Midlands RHA [1985] 1 All ER 635. Cf. Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 416); Brazier, Medicine, patients and the Law, p. 71; Markesinis and Deakin (-Grubb), Tort Law, p. 268 , developing the Scottish case of Hunter v. Hanley 1955 SC 200. The conformity with the standard of care, the generally accepted medical practice, is evaluated by healthcare professionals. This is criticised, as 'experts may blind themselves with expertise'. Cf. Montrose, Is negligence an ethical or a sociological concept?, p. 259. This author considers that treatment providers should be held liable for failure to take precautions against risks known to the profession, or reasonable risks. Since Bolitho v. City and Hackney HA (1993) 13 BMLR 111, expertise can be overruled if the court decides that treatment, in spite of being executed according to generally accepted practice, unreasonably and unnecessarily puts the patient at risk. Cf. Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 441.

11. Under the FINNISH Status and Rights of Patients Act (1992/785) § 3 patients have a right to good quality healthcare and medical care. The care has to be arranged so that the patient's human dignity is not violated and the patient's convictions and privacy are respected. According to art. 2(1) of the FINNISH PIA, compensation is allowed to a patient suffering from an avoidable injury, providing that an experienced healthcare provider would have acted otherwise and would thereby probably avoided the injury. Cf. Pichler, Arzthaftungsdynamik, p. 338.

12. Since 1936 the FRENCH Cour de cassation considers that a doctor is in principle under an obligation of means, Cass.civ 20 May 1936, arrêt Mercier, D.P. 1936 1, 88 concl. P. Matter; rapp. L. Josserand; note E.P.; S. 1937, 1, 321, note A. Breton: "the contract between the doctor and his patient involves for the doctor, the obligation, not to cure the patient, but to give him a treatment, not ordinary but conscientious, scrupulous and, if there are no exceptional circumstances, conform to the knowledge of the science". Since that date the case law always uses the same expression to describe the obligation of the doctor but recently the "knowledge of the science" has become “the actual knowledge of the science”. It seems that this has no consequences: the Cour de cassation only stresses the obligation for the doctor to keep informed of the evolution of medical science.

13. The criterion under ITALIAN law by which the activity of the treatment provider is judged is professional diligence (CC art. 1176 para. 2). The doctor has to exercise a diligence which is superior to that of the ordinary person (CC art. 1176 para. 1). Therefore, the doctor’s performance will be compared to that of a professional with a medium preparation and attention. Like all professionals, the treatment provider will have to keep up to date and adapt to scientific clinical progress. The criterion of this higher standard of diligence is however mitigated by CC art. 2236, which, in relation to particularly difficult problems, makes the professional answerable only for fraud or grave fault. Moreover, a restriction derives from the identification of an obligation of means (and not of result) upon the provider. The distinction between an obligation of means and an obligation of result regards the ‘measure’ of the liability (Alpa, Riv.it.med.leg. 1999, fasc. 1 (February), p. 19). The question is whether it is sufficient to have employed the necessary means required by the professional diligence, or if in any case there has to be the integral satisfaction of the interest of the creditor. Briefly, the question is whether the criterion of evaluation of the behaviour is represented by the best endeavours or by a specific result. While doctrine has refused such a distinction, introduced under the influence of the FRENCH doctrine and case law (Giorgianni, Nov.Dig.it 1965, vol. XI, pp. 581), case law has accepted it in relation to specific cases such as doctors. While some doctrine continues to repudiate such distinction (Vincenzo and Sviluppi, Danno e resp. 2000, fasc. 12 (December), pp. 1173-1175; Carusi, Rass.dir.civ. 1991, pp. 485 ff; Fortino, La responsabilità civile, p. 42 ff), some part of the scholarship considers the distinction useful in relation to the burden of proof.

14. Under GERMAN law liability for treatment injury can be either contractual, as the contract for medical treatment is considered as a contract for services regulated by the CC §§ 611-630, or non-contractual under CC § 823(1). Cf. Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 97. A treatment provider is held liable in so far as it committed a treatment error. A treatment error is equivalent to breach of the required standard of care, which is objective (Gruppenfahrlässigkeit). According to this standard, the treatment provider must act according to the care expected from the skills and abilities expected from its profession. The standard is thus that of an average treatment provider of its profession, acting according to accepted medical practice. Cf. Gehrlein, Leitfaden zur Arzthaftpflicht, p. 32; Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 99. The required standard of care is set in court with the help of medical expertise (BGH NJW 1999, 1778; 1999, 863; 1995, 776).

15. Under GREEK law the standard of care is defined with reference to the qualities that a reasonably skilled representative of the profession is expected to possess. Medical treatment must abide by the generally accepted rules of medical science and medical practice. A doctor must provide a lege artis treatment, though in most cases the obligation is not one of result, but rather one of means. Katerina Foundedaki, 182, 185-6; see generally CC arts. 330 and 914; also art. 8 of the Consumer Protection Law 2251/1994; and art. 24 of the code for the exercise of the medical profession (1565/1939)].

16. The leading case on the determination of the standard of care under DUTCH law is the case of Speeckaert/Gradener, HR 9 November 1990, NedJur 1991, 26. In this case it was established that the criterion is “the care that may be expected of a reasonably skilled and reasonably acting specialist”. CC art. 7:453 is to the same extent. The article reads as follows: 'The provider of the service, in the execution of his business, has to comply with the care of a good provider of the service, and acts in accordance with the responsibility he bears, arising from his professional standard.' From the wording of the article, it may appear that not the care of a reasonably skilled professional, but the (higher) skill of a good professional is the criterion. However, according to parliamentary history, introduction of the criterion 'good provider of the service' was not meant to change existing case law on this point. Cf. H.TK. 1989-1990, 21 561, no. 3, p. 33. See also Sluyters and Biesaart, De geneeskundige behandelingsovereenkomst, p. 57. However, if the present standard of the profession is deemed below what is acceptable, the court may impose a higher standard. The standard of care is influenced by the protocols, guidelines, standards and codes of conduct that have been drafted by organisations of providers of the service. The Hoge Raad recently decided that when a doctor ignores the procedures introduced in a protocol that was agreed upon by the group of doctors to which the doctor in question belongs, and when the departure from the protocol was not based on a concrete evaluation of the patient's best interests, the doctor has in fact breached the standard of care. Cf. HR 2 March 2001, NedJur 2001, p. 649 note F.C.B. van Wijmen and JMBV (Medisch Centrum Leeuwarden e.a./H.)

17. In POLAND the standard of care for doctors is set according to CC art. 355 para. 2. It is very much underlined that due to the subject of their performance, which is a human being, and the possible irreversible consequences of the defective treatment, a higher standard of care should be required. (Nesterowicz, Prawo i Medycyna 2000, 163). On the other hand the CA Warsaw, in its judgment of 3. 3. 1998 (1 Aca 14/98, Wokanda 10/1998, stated that the general high standard of care required from doctors does not mean imposing obligations which are practically impossible to perform and accepting a risk-based liability.

18. In PORTUGAL liability is fault-based (CC arts. 483 and 798 ff). The treatment provider must act like a competent, wise and sensible qualified treatment provider (objective/abstract criterion) according to the circumstances (subjective/concrete criterion): lex artis ad hoc. Cf. CC art. 487 para. 2; CA Lisboa, 27 October 1998; STA 13 July 1993; Faure and Koziol (-Sinde Monteiro and Veloso), Cases on Medical Malpractice, p. 176; Figueiredo Dias and Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade médica na europa ocidental, p. 23; Álvaro Dias, Procriação Assistida e Responsabilidade Médica, 29.

19. The "lex artis ad hoc" is the criterion to determine the required standard of care for the medical service provider under SPANISH law (TS 23 May 2006, RJ 2006/3535). The diligence required by the lex artis is the average skill that a competent medical treatment provider would observe in a similar case in accordance with the rules of the profession, although taking into consideration the specific circumstances surrounding the case (nature of the obligation, time and place where the obligations are to be fulfilled, characteristics of the provider). (TS 11 March 1991, RJ 1991/2209). All medical service providers must act with the average skill and competence as determined by the "lex artis ad hoc". The majority of the doctrine says that the obligation of due diligence is to be established with minimum terms of generality, flexibility and objectivity and not in an individualised manner (Martín, Responsabilidad médica, p. 285). The general standard of care required in the provision of medical treatments (lex artis) is to be considered in accordance with the specific circumstances of the case (lex artis ad hoc): nature of the obligation, means available to carry out the treatment, time and place where the obligations are to be fulfilled, characteristics of the provider. The same approach is taken by CC art. 1104 regarding the diligence of the good father. Regarding the lack of skill or experience to treat the patient, the Medical Code of Conduct in its art. 34.2 provides that if the doctor believes it appropriate, he or she should recommend another treatment provider who in his or her opinion is more suitable for the patient's case.

20. According to the SWEDISH PL art. 6, compensation from the patient damage insurance cover is payable for personal injury of a patient if it is predominantly probable that the injury was caused by: examination, care, treatment or other similar measure, if the injury could have been avoided either through another execution of the chosen measure or through the choice of another available procedure that according to a later judgement from a medical point of view would have satisfied the need of medical care in a less risky way; defects in a medical technical product or hospital equipment used for examination, care, treatment or other similar measure or the improper use thereof; wrong diagnosis; the transfer of contagion leading to infection, connected to examination, care, treatment or other similar measures; accidents connected to examination, care, treatment or other similar measures or during the transportation of the patient or connected to fire or other damage to the premises or equipment or prescription or distribution of medicines against regulations and instructions. As for the first and the third situations, the standard of care of an experienced specialist or other experienced practitioner is applicable. PL art. 7 contains some exceptions to the general rule, namely that no compensation will be given if the injury was a consequence of a necessary procedure for diagnosing or treating a disease or injury that without treatment would be directly life threatening or would lead to a major disability, or if the injury was caused by medicine in other cases than mentioned in art. 6 (6). Such injury caused by medicine is covered by the medicine insurance, the counterpart to the PL when it comes to compensation of damage caused by medicines.

III. Modulation of the standard of care

21. The AUSTRIAN CC § 1299 introduces an objective standard as regards the question of fault whereas – basically – one has to judge upon the subjective skills of a person. As a result an expert might be held liable even if not to blame for he or she did not possess the knowledge necessary for the task. The reasoning is that everybody should be able to assume that an expert has the skills and expertise necessary for the task or profession. Against that background it becomes clear that the standard of care cannot simply be lowered just because the patient knew of that factor (and as an implied requirement, consented to the treatment). As soon as a doctor fails to live up to the standard of care that is required from the respective branch of the medical profession the doctor is liable.

22. The standard set up by the DANISH PIA in the "specialist rule" is that of the best specialist medical care.

23. A specialist physician is bound by a more stringent duty of care under ENGLISH law, i.e. the specialist must act with the diligence of an average competent specialist in that field of medicine (Lord Scarman in Maynard v. West Midlands RHA [1985] 1 All ER 635; De Freitas v. O'Brien [1995], 6 Med LR 108). On the other hand, normally inexperience is not a valid defence (Nettleship v. Weston [1971] 2 QB 691; Wilsher v. Essex Area Health Authority [1987] QB 730). In the latter case, Glidewell LJ pointed out that inexperienced junior doctors must seek the help of more experienced colleagues. However, often injury to patients occurs because of problems in supervision of intern doctors (R. v. Adomako & Sullman & Holloway & Prentice [1994] QB 302). Cf. Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 418.

24. The standard set in FINNISH law is that of an experienced treatment provider.

25. In FRANCE the standard of care is always the same in spite of the difference of competence of the doctor. The criterion established in 1936 is always applied in the same way. The contracting parties can however agree on a different standard of care. If it can hardly be lowered because of the prohibition of limitation terms, it can be raised or even replaced by the promise of a result. But it seems that such terms are not usual in practice.

26. The general practitioner, the specialist physician and the hospital physician must each follow the standard set for their respective areas under GERMAN law. (Gehrlein, Leitfaden zur Arzthaftpflicht, p. 33; BGH NJW 1998, 814; BGH NJW 1991, 1535; BGH NJW 1996, 779; BGH NJW 1987, 1479; BGH NJW 1984, 655; BGH NJW 1997, 3090; BGH NJW 1991, 1535).

27. The average skilled doctor sets the standard of care required under GREEK law. For obvious reasons, in the medical services a standard of care below that level is unacceptable. The standard of care is not lowered in case of an inexperienced doctor despite the fact that the patient may be aware of that fact. Moreover the standard of care may not be lowered in case of experimental treatment. The latter only imposes a heavier duty on the doctor to inform the patient fully about the nature of the treatment and the risks associated with it and to obtain a fully informed consent. Also, even if a doctor has exceptional skills or is an authority in the field the standard of care seems not to be raised to the height of these exceptional individual standards. In such a case the standard of care will remain that of a reasonably skilled representative who might be an expert or a specialist in a particular field, depending on the circumstances.

28. In ITALY the same standard of care, the minimum set forth in the CC art. 1176, applies to all practitioners.

29. Under PORTUGUESE law the standard of care may be increased if a doctor is a specialist. Cf. Faure and Koziol (-Sinde Monteiro and Veloso), Cases on Medical Malpractice, p. 176; CA Évora, 3 October 1996.

30. Under DUTCH law inexperience is not an excuse: each doctor has to live up to the standard of care of the profession. Cf. Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[11], no. 336; Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, pp. 618 ff. It has even been said that from an inexperienced doctor one might expect a higher degree of care when compared with an experienced doctor who performs an operation that is somewhat routine. Cf. Stolker, Aansprakelijkheid van de arts voor mislukte sterilisaties, p. 54. On the other hand, if a more experienced doctor is involved, occasionally the standard of care may be raised if because of experience the doctor must be considered as a specialist. In that case, the criterion is 'the reasonably acting and reasonably skilled specialist', as follows from HR 9 November 1990, NedJur 1991, 26 (Speeckaert/Gradener).

31. In POLAND the general standard of care is not rigid and its specification in a given case depends on the qualifications of the doctor (a general practitioner or a high class specialist), and on the hospital (a small hospital in a countryside or a highly specialised clinic). However, a certain minimum standard must be observed by all the treatment providers (Nesterowicz, Prawo Medyczne[7] p. 47).

32. The general duty in SCOTTISH law is the objective one of the practitioner of ordinary skill and competence, and a recently-qualified doctor cannot claim inexperience as a defence (Stair, The Laws of Scotland, Reissue Medical Law, para. 177).

33. Courts and doctrine coincide in qualifying the obligation to provide treatment as an obligation of means under SPANISH law (TS 25 April 1994, RJ 1994/3073). The diligence required is the diligence imposed by the norms which regulate the medical profession (lex artis), adapting them to the concrete circumstances of the person involved, time and place where the obligation is to be performed, means to execute the service and so on (situation ad hoc). Therefore, the medical service provider has to comply with the "lex artis ad hoc".

34. The standard of care applicable to obtain compensation from the SWEDISH PL is objective and hence the patient's knowledge of the inexperience is irrelevant.

IV. Standard of care in medical experimentation

35. In AUSTRIA severe criteria have to be met in order to get permission to test on human beings. Ethic commissions make sure that the research clinics abide by the rules and that other aspects of the treatment are discussed as well. In that regard the standard of care is somewhat 'raised' since controls are tough. These days, state-of-the-art issues are overshadowed by the obligation to inform .

36. The standard of care in ENGLAND is the normal standard, though in practice regulation is stricter due to the influence of Ethics committees. Though the Royal Commission on Civil Liability and Compensation for Personal Injury [1978], sections 1339-1341, recommended strict liability for experimental treatment, no progress was observed in the law. The normal procedure in such claims is an ex gratia payment to the patient. Cf. Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 1736.

37. The standard of care in FRANCE is always the same. The criterion established in 1936 is always applied in the same way.

38. In GERMANY § 40 of the AMG provides for compulsory insurance for experimental treatment. Besides the normal standard of care, the treatment provider must perform a positive cost-benefit balance. The hospital is liable if it fails to control and monitor the experiment. Cf. Laufs and Uhlenbrück, Handbuch des Arztrechts[2], no. 130.

39. The standard of care may not be lowered in case of experimental treatment in GREECE. There is a heavier duty on the doctor to inform the patient about the nature of the treatment and the risks associated with it and to obtain a fully informed consent.

40. The doctor would still be bound to perform as a 'reasonably skilled and reasonable acting' doctor under DUTCH law. This would mean that the decision to use an experimental treatment would be scrupulously considered. However, it is not impossible that the standard of care in effect is to some extent lowered if the decision to go ahead with the procedure was sound, since a 'reasonably skilled and reasonable acting' doctor would not know all the dangers related to the treatment either and might, therefore, not be able to foresee and prevent a risk to the treatment from materialising.

41. Only doctors with relevantly high qualifications may direct a medical experimentation in POLAND. (The act on the profession of a doctor, art. 23); hence the standard of care in the case of medical experimentation is set on a higher level than the standard of care in a normal treatment.

42. In PORTUGAL strict liability, covered by compulsory insurance, is imposed in case of experimental treatment, (PORTUGAL art. 14/1, DL 97/94, 9/4). Cf. de Oliveira, O direito do diagnóstico pré-natal[2], p. 199.

43. The lex artis ad hoc regarding experimental treatment will indicate the required standard of care in SPAIN. Therefore, current regulations on experimental treatments such us the General Medicines Act are to be complied with.

44. In SWEDEN the medical personnel must perform the treatment in accordance with science and reliable experience, which means that they in some cases could be punished in a disciplinary ruling if this criteria is not fulfilled. However, for compensation the standard of care is the same in all cases. As stated in PL art. 1:4 the patient can receive compensation if there was another method of treatment, in this case not experimental, that could have been used to avoid the damage. If however there is no established treatment, experimental treatment will probably be accepted.

V. Burden of proof allocation

45. According to general rules of evidence the patient has to prove both the existence of a defective treatment (resulting in a damage) and the causal link between damage suffered and the doctor's conduct under AUSTRIAN law. In other words, the patient has to establish that the damage to health was caused predominantly by the doctor's conduct. The doctor can then prove the absence of fault.

46. In DENMARK the insurance consortium investigates the claim of its own motion. art. 14(8) PFL; Grünfeld, De nordiske patientforsikrings ordninger-ligheder og forskelle, 67.

47. The patient bears the burden of proof of breach of duty of care under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law (Hunter v. Hanley 1955 SC 200, even if the treatment provider deviated from approved practice, though in the latter case the patient's case will be much stronger. Cf. Kennedy and Grubb, Medical Law[3], p. 453.

48. In FINLAND the insurance consortium investigates the claim of its own motion. Cf. art.11(b) PSL; Lahti, Towards a comprehensive legislation governing the rights of patients, p. 210.

49. It is, in principle, up to the patient to prove the fault of the doctor under FRENCH law. When the obligation of the provider is characterised as an obligation of result, the burden of proof is always on the patient, but the object of the proof is lighter. It is up to the patient to prove the damage suffered, but in practice this does not lead to serious problems, in contrast to the question of causation. It is up to the patient to prove the causation. But, in practice the issue is very complicated and very often an expert is appointed to establish this.

50. ITALIAN case law tends to render proof of medical negligence easier by means of presumptions (Trib. Roma, 10 October 1992, Giur.it., 1992, I, 2, c. 337; Cass. 16 November 1988, no. 6220, Rep.Giur.it., 1988, V° Professioni intellettuali, no. 49; Cass. 21 December 1978, no. 6141, Foro it., 1979, I, c.4). In fact, when the treatment is easy to perform, in order to prove the non-performance the patient only has to outline the bad outcome and the causal link. In the case of routine treatments fault is presumed when something goes wrong. It is up to the treatment provider to prove the contrary, namely that there has been adequate and diligent performance and that the outcome is the result of an event which was unforeseen and unforeseeable by using the normal standard of care (Ferrando, Riv.crit.dir.priv. 1998, p. 86). When the performance is of particular difficulty, CC art. 2236 avoids automatic liability in case of an unsatisfactory result. In fact, the treatment provider will have to prove the complex nature of the treatment, while the patient will have to prove which aspects of the treatment were unsuitable. (Grazia, Giur.it. 2000, I, fasc. 10 (October), pp. 1817-1819, note to Cass. 21 January 2000, no. 632).

51. If the basis of liability is non-contractual the patient will have to prove the fault of the doctor under GREEK law. However, given a prima facie medical error, fault is presumed. In case of serious medical error it will be very difficult for the doctor to rebut this presumption. In the case of contractual liability the burden of proof of fault is reversed. That means that the doctor will have to prove the absence of fault. If contractual and non-contractual liability are concurrent, in both cases the beneficial contractual rule of reversal of the burden of proof must apply. In effect, both in contractual and non-contractual liability the patient will have to prove the unlawful act, the damage and the causal link between damage and unlawful act, whereas the doctor will have to prove the absence of fault. Though, it seems that the Consumer Act restates the allocation of the burden of proof as described above, in effect a closer look reveals that the position is more complicated. According to paragraphs 3 and 4 of article 8 of the Act, the patient will have to prove the damage and the causal link between damage and the provision of the service, whereas the doctor would have to prove the absence of fault. According to the theoretical criticism, the deficiency of the provision is twofold: first, it imposes a very onerous obligation upon the doctor, since the latter will have to prove not only the absence of fault as personal guilt but also that the service was not unlawful, that a duty was not breached. On the other hand, the patient will need to prove the causal link between the provision of the service and the damage caused. Apart from any other complications that may arise from the fact that the rule does not focus on the adequate cause of the damage which is the medical error but on the provision of the medical service and the different interpretations this may cause, the duty of the patient as such to prove the causal link is extremely onerous due to the intrinsic difficulties such a proof presents in case of medical errors.

52. If a claim is disputed, art. 150 (ex art. 177) of the Rome Treaty applies, according to which the claimant bears the burden of proof to sustain the claim, unless another distribution of the burden of proof follows from the law or is dictated by the requirements of reasonableness and equity. However, the doctor has to supply sufficient information to substantiate the rejection of the patient's claim, in order to provide the patient with a starting-point to prove the claim. Cf. HR 20 November 1987, NedJur 1988, 500, note WLH (Timmer/Deutman); HR 7 September 2001, NedJur 2001, 615 (R. and B./Stichting Ignatius Ziekenhuis). In order to fulfil this 'duty to substantiate', the doctor must – as precisely as possible – give an account of what has happened during the treatment, and hand over the relevant medical data. The patient can then prove the claim by proving or making plausible that the facts stated or data provided by the doctor are incorrect. Cf. HR 7 September 2001, NedJur 2001, 615 (R. and B./Stichting Ignatius Ziekenhuis). This principle could also apply to the question of causation. Cf. Giesen, Bewijslastverdeling, pp. 49 and 110. What and how much data and detail the doctor must provide is also dependent on the time that has passed since the treatment: the doctor cannot be expected to remember every detail of an operation that took place years ago. This has been recognised by the Hoge Raad in its ruling of 7 September 2001, NedJur 2001, 615 (R. and B. v. Stichting Ignatius Ziekenhuis).

53. The patient must prove the basis of the claim, including the fault of the doctor, under POLISH law. The doctor should prove that the treatment obligations were fulfilled properly and that he or she acted according to the state of medical knowledge (Nesterowicz, Prawo Medyczne[7], pp. 51-52)

54. In PORTUGAL, in the case of contractual liability, while the debtor's fault is in principle presumed (CC art. 799 para. 2), an obligation to treat is usually considered to be an obligation of means, and as such the presumption of fault of the debtor does not apply, cf. CA Coimbra, 4 April 1995; CJ XX-1995,II, 31. The obligation to treat may be considered as an obligation of result in the following circumstances: by agreement of the parties; by operation of a legal provision or depending upon the nature of the obligation (prosthesis, routine surgery, aesthetic interventions. There is an obligation of result in case of organisational fault of a hospital (STA 17 June 1997; AD XXXVII-1998). Res ipsa loquitur may shift the burden of proof to the treatment provider (CC arts. 349 ff). Cf. Figueiredo Dias and Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade médica na europa ocidental, p. 23; Faure and Koziol (-Sinde Monteiro and Veloso), Cases on Medical Malpractice, p. 176.

55. Under SPANISH law, the patient normally has to prove the negligent behaviour of the treatment provider and the causal link between the medical act and the damage suffered. It is very difficult for the patient to prove these things, since the information on the treatment is maintained and kept by the medical provider. On a case by case basis, courts have therefore applied less strict evidence requirements by accepting mere circumstantial evidence or applying judicial presumptions of fact The medical provider is also bound to produce relevant medical records to the patient and when this is not done the courts presume that there is negligence and a causal link and it is for the medical service provider to prove the contrary (Vilalta and Méndez, Responsabilidad Médica, p. 18). The Consumer General Protection Act 2007 provides a more objective system. The patient may have recourse to the provisions of LCU arts. 147 and 148. Under LCU art. 147, acts or omissions by a service provider which cause damage to a client will give rise to liability on the part of the provider, unless it is proved that the provider has complied with the applicable regulatory provisions and has shown the diligence required for the type of activity provided. LCU art. 148 establishes a specific regime of liability in areas where the consumer is especially protected, such as medical treatment, and where the character of the services provided implies that specific levels of efficiency and safety must be attained.

56. As for the SWEDISH PL, it is the duty of the insurance consortium to investigate the case. While establishing the causal link between the treatment and the damage, it is sufficient that it is more probable that the damage was caused by the treatment than by something else, Hedman, Ansvar och ersättning vid medicinsk verksamhet, p. 85. However, when it comes to fulfilling the requirements for compensation, the patient bears the risk, and in this aspect the burden of proof rests upon the patient. Finally, it is important to remember that the PL does not require a breach of the standard of care for the patient to obtain compensation. It is for example sufficient that the damage could have been avoided through the choice of another method of treatment, even if the treatment actually chosen was performed perfectly. As for claiming damages according to the Damages Liability Act (SKL), the patient has the burden of proof for all categories mentioned above.

VI. Standard of care in unconventional treatment

57. A differentiation is generally not made under FRENCH law.
