9. In the NORDIC countries the principle is recognized by the courts and the legal writers. Although it has not been expressed in the statutes in the same general terms as it has in the countries mentioned above, several statutory provisions presuppose its existence, see for instance Contracts Acts § 33 (on validity) and § 36 (DANISH law see Ussing, Obligationsretten4, 23; Bryde Andersen I 472 f. The rule in para. 2 that breach of the duty to observe good faith does not give rise directly to the remedies for non-performance of an obligation is unknown to Danish law. For other Nordic countries see Telaranta 344; Ramberg, Avtalsrätt 39; Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I 368-384).

10. In AUSTRIA the good faith principle is a generally acknowledged ethical rule (cf. OGH 29 April 1965, SZ 38/72), which is derived from the Imperial Decree of 1 June 1811, introducing the General CC, where "the general principles of justice" are recognized as the basis of civil law (cf. OGH 7 October 1974, SZ 47/104). The Austrian CC expressly refers to the good faith principle in § 879 (relating to contract conclusion); "Fair dealing" (Verkehrssitte) is expressly mentioned in CC §§ 863 and 914. and expressly mentioned as "fair dealing" in the Code: see ABGB §§ 863, 914. From this it is clear that performance of contractual obligations is subject to "good faith and fair dealing" see Ehrenzweig/Mayrhofer, Schuldrecht AT, 20; Binder in Schwimann, ABGB IV, 3rd ed., § 914 no. 67). However, in Austria the concept is not as settled as the "good faith requirement" and is not as extensively construed as "Treu und Glauben" in the GERMAN CC § 242. The position is similar in SLOVENIAN law with the distinction that there is a general principle of good faith provided in LOA § 5.

11. As has been recognised by the House of Lords in Smith v. Bank of Scotland 1997 SC (HL) 111, there is also an underlying principle of good faith in the SCOTTISH law of obligations which is of an explanatory and legitimating rather than an active or creative nature, and otherwise exists more to exclude bad faith than to impose standards of conduct beyond those found in other more concrete rules of law (Gloag & Henderson para. 3.02).

(b) Degree of penetration

12. It is not easy to measure and compare how deeply into the law the good faith principle has been integrated in the various legal systems.

13. The DUTCH CC art. 6:2 uses strong language. Good faith will not only supplement obligations arising from contract but may also modify and extinguish them. Under art. 6:2(2) a rule which binds the parties by virtue of law, usage or legal act does not apply to the extent that under the circumstances this would be unacceptable under the standards of reasonableness and equity, see also art. 6:248 (see Hartkamp, Civil Code XXI). In some ways the CC goes further than German law: under exceptional circumstances arts. 6:2 and 6:248(2) allow the court to replace the effects of a contract or of a statutory provision by an outcome which it believes to be more fair and equitable. Similarly, under ESTONIAN law in addition to the general duty to act in accordance with good faith (see GPCCA § 138(1), LOA § 6(1)). The LOA § 6(2) provides courts with power to set aside any term arising from law, a usage or a transaction if the result of its application would be contrary to the principle of good faith. According to special provisions, the principle of good faith serves as the means for determining the content of the parties' obligations (e.g. in pre-contractual relations (LOA § 14), implied obligations (LOA 23(4)), requirements for performance (LOA § 76(2), release in case of change of circumstances (LOA § 97)) or restrictions on abuse of rights (e.g. to preclude reliance on non-performance and resort to remedies in so far as such non-performance was caused by an act of the creditor or by circumstances dependent on the creditor (LOA § 101(3)), loss of rights in case of undue delay in exercising them (LOA §§ 118, 159). The importance of the principle of good faith in Estonian law has repeatedly been emphasized in legal literature (see Kull/Käerdi/Kõve 69ff., Varul et al (-Kull) § 6 n 4.1.). The principle is relatively widely accepted in court practice (see e.g. Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decisions from 21 May 2002, civil matter no. 3-2-1-56-02, from 29 November 2004 civil matter no. 3-2-1-120-04 and from 14 February 2007, civil matter no. 3-2-1-140-06).

14. Extensive application of the good faith principle is also found in PORTUGUESE and GREEK law. In Portugal the principle is expressed not only generally in the CC art. 762(2), but also in special provisions such as art. 227 on culpa in contrahendo, art. 239 on omitted terms, art. 334 on abuse of rights and art. 437 on change of circumstances. In Greece the courts have given the principle as laid down in CC arts. 200, 281, 288 and 388 a broad application, see Full Bench of A.P. 927/1982, NoB 31 (1983) 214 and A.P. 1537/1991, EllDik 34 (1993) 318 on the courts' power to change the terms of the contract, and A.P. 433/1953, NoB 1 (1953) 747-748, note Sakketas, on adaptation of money obligations.

15. Several provisions of the ITALIAN CC refer to good faith and fair dealing, see on good faith arts. 1337 (negotiation of contracts), 1366 (interpretation) and 1375 (performance). Art. 1175, dealing with obligations in general, provides that the debtor and creditor must behave in accordance with the rules of fair dealing (correttezza). The scholars point out that good faith and fair dealing are objective concepts which refer to the behaviour of the honest business person (Betti 65 ff; Antoniolli, General Duties, 50 ff; D'Angelo, 1 ff). They operate as a limitation on a party's exercise of rights and protect the other party's interests in matters other than the main performance: Castronovo, Protezione, passim.

16. Arts. 1134 of the FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CC provide that contracts must be performed in good faith, and the principle has been extended to the formation and the interpretation of contracts. The French courts have not given the rule the same importance as have the courts of Germany and other countries mentioned above in the determination of the parties' obligations. However, the principle of good faith has constantly expanded and the Cour de cassation has felt it necessary to distinguish between a "prérogative contractuelle", which cannot be exercised in bad faith and which the judge can control, and the very "substance" of the rights and obligations, which cannot be modified by the judge (Cass. Com. 10 July 2007, RDC 2007.1107 note L. Aynès and 1111 note D. Mazeaud). Besides, similar results have often been obtained without reference to good faith, for instance by using the well-established theory of abuse of rights (see Malaurie & Aynès, Obligations 50 ff) and apparence. In the last two decades the courts have frequently and openly used the good faith principle in the determination of the parties' obligations. The writers invoke the principle in order to impose upon the parties a duty of mutual loyalty, of information and co-operation and to restrict the operation of clauses exempting a party from liability for breach of contract, etc., see Malaurie & Aynès, Obligations no. 622; Marty & Raynaud, Obligations I no. 246; and Cass.com. 22 October 1996, D. 1997 121 (SA Banchereaus v. Sté Chronopost).

17. In BELGIUM the courts have used good faith extensively to interpret contracts and to supplement contractual obligations including i.a. a duty to deliver accessories of goods (Cass. 6 June 1974, Arr.Cass. 1974, 1102) or a duty to limit damages (Cass. 17 May 2001, pas. 2001 I 889) but have used it to limit obligations only in cases of disproportion and abuse of rights (e.g. Cass. 17 September 1983, RW 1983-84, 1482, and RCJB 1986, 282) and some more specific applications (e.g. a clause having lost its purpose, Cass. 21 September 1989, Pas. 1990 I 84). The principle is also applied to contract formation (Cass. 7 February 1994, JTT (1994) 208, RW (1994-95) 121). Some of the German ideas described earlier have been accepted. See van Ommeslaghe, TBBR 1987, 101; Fagnart, RCJB 1986, 285; Dirix TBH 1988, 660; M.E. Storme, Invloed; van Gerven & Dewaele 103. The same is true of SPANISH law, CC art. 7 imposes a duty to act in good faith when exercising rights. Furthermore, as in the FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1135, SPANISH CC art. 1258 provides that once a contract has come into existence the obligations of the parties extend not only to what is expressly stipulated but also to everything that by the nature of things, good faith, usage and law is considered as incidental to the particular contract or necessary to carry it into effect. The Spanish Ccom art. 57 requires the parties to execute commercial contracts in accordance with the standards of good faith (see Lacruz (-Rams), II, 11, §§ 69, 534).

18. The CZECH law applies the legal concept good faith above all to protect rights acquired in good faith (CC § 35.3). But there is also a general principle that parties to a contract are bound to see to it that in regulating their contractual relationship they eliminate everything which could give rise to conflicts or litigation (CC § 43) and that all debts must be duly fulfilled (CC § 559.2). Due fulfilment is also performance in good faith. So there is an obligation to execute a civil contract in good faith. Also the correct performance of a contractual duty requires a fulfilment consistent with the principles of proper morality (CC § 3.2). This is a general obligation to act as a person of good manners (for the liability, see the general rule in CC § 424). For a particular application of this rule, see Ccom art. 655(2). A positively existing obligation to act in good faith is also very close to the expressly stated principle of general prevention of harm (see CC § 415: everyone is obliged to behave in such a way that no damage occurs), it is for instance the meaning of Jehlička, Švesktka, Škárová a kol., p. 485. Fair dealing: A commercial legal rule says that an exercise of a right which is contrary to the principles of fair business dealings is not granted a legal protection (Ccom art. 265).

19. In SLOVAK law there is anchored in CC § 3 a general rule that performance of obligations must not be contrary to good morals (which means rules of a moral character dependent on the objective valuation of recent society). According to CC § 39, a legal act is not valid if it is contrary to such moral rules. The law also deals with the good faith of the person in whose favour a juridical act is made (CC § 35).

According to CC § 586, an agreement on disputable rights between contracting parties concluded in good faith is valid, even if a contracting party did not have stipulated rights at the time of conclusion of agreement. In the Commercial Code there is a general rule in art. 265 that legal protection is not provided for an exercise of rights which is not in accordance with fair dealing.

20. In POLISH law CC art. 354 states that an obligation should be performed by the debtor in accordance with its contents, and the manner in which it is performed should comply with the socio-economic purpose of the obligation and with the rules of social co-existence. If there exists a custom, it also shapes the way an obligation is to be performed. The creditor should co-operate with the debtor in the same manner. The reference to the rules of social co-existence means that performance should comply with the general commonly accepted standards manifested, e.g., in the principle of loyalty of the debtor. A debtor's failure to act loyally, if it harms the creditor's legitimate interests, may lead to liability for non-performance or improper performance.

V. Mandatory

21. In GERMANY and in the systems mentioned in note 8 above the good faith rule as such is mandatory. But it is self-evident, that the several rules derived from the general principle are basically non-mandatory, see AnwKomm [-Krebs], BGB, § 242 no. 36.

22. Illustration 3 is based on Deutsche Bank v. Beriro (1895) 73 I.T 669, cited in Zweigert & Kötz 586.

III.–1:104: Co-operation

The debtor and creditor are obliged to co-operate with each other when and to the extent that this can reasonably be expected for the performance of the debtor's obligation.

COMMENTS

A. Terminology

The Article refers to an "obligation" to co-operate rather than a "duty" to co-operate because in this case the policy is that the normal remedies for non-performance of an obligation are to be attracted. See Comment G. The Principles of European Contract Law achieved this result indirectly by first providing that there was a duty to co-operate (Article 1:202) and then providing that non-performance of a contractual obligation included failure to co-operate in order to give full effect to a contract. (Article 1:301). This should not be seen, however, as a deliberate choice of an unnecessarily complicated approach. The truth is that the Principles did not distinguish clearly between duties and obligations.

B. The obligation to co-operate

Where a debtor owes an obligation, the debtor and creditor each have a subsidiary obligation to co-operate with the other when this can reasonably be expected for the performance of the debtor's obligation. This can be regarded as a particular application of the duty of good faith and fair dealing.

The obligation to co-operate includes an obligation to allow the debtor to perform and thereby earn any fruits of the performance.

> Illustration 1
> S in Hamburg agrees to sell goods to B in London at a stated price f.o.b. Hamburg. B fails to nominate a vessel to carry the goods. Such failure constitutes non-performance of B's obligations under the sales contract and also infringes this Article by preventing S from performing S's own obligation to ship the goods and thereby earn the contract price. S can terminate the contractual relationship and recover damages.

> Illustration 2
> B contracts to erect an office building for O. As the result of O's failure to apply for a building licence, which it is clearly O's responsibility to obtain, and which would have been granted, B is unable to proceed with the building works. O thereby infringes the requirements of this Article, whether or not the contract with B imposed on O an express obligation to apply for the licence. O has no remedy against B for failing to build and is liable to B for non-performance of the obligation to co-operate.

A party to a contract has to inform the other party if the other party in performing the contract may not know that there is a risk of harm to persons or property.

> Subcontractor S of country A is about to send some staff to perform S's contractual obligation to Contractor C, also from country A, to assist in building a dam in country Y. C learns that the government of Y intends to detain any citizens from A who are found in Y as hostages, in order to exert pressure on the government of A to release some of Y's citizens who have been detained in A charged with terrorism. C has an obligation to inform S of the risks involved in sending staff to Y.

The obligation to co-operate may be particularly important in relation to the obtaining of licences or permissions on which the performance of a primary obligation depends. Often there will be an express or tacit term on such matters but in the absence of such a term the obligation to co-operate will come into play.

C. Obstruction of performance

Non-performance of the obligation to co-operate may take the form of obstruction of performance of the main obligation. Obstruction of performance may result either from non-performance of a specific obligation imposed on a party by a contract or by the law (such as the obligation of the buyer of goods to accept delivery) or from some other act which has the effect of preventing or inhibiting performance by the other party. For example a party's refusal to accept performance constitutes a breach of the obligation to co-operate where the other party has an interest in having performance accepted.

Illustration 4
S contracts to do something which requires access to B's land. S has an obvious interest in performing the contractual obligation. B, however, refuses to accept performance and denies S access. This constitutes non-performance by B of the obligation to co-operate.

D. Right to withhold performance

A party may in certain circumstances withhold performance of the party's own obligations until the other party has performed. This will include the right to withhold performance of the obligation to co-operate.

E. Co-operation required only so far as this can reasonably be expected

An absolute obligation of co-operation in order to enable the main obligation to be performed would go too far and might, for example, interfere with a contractual allocation of obligations. This is why the obligation is to co-operate only when and to the extent that this can reasonably be expected for the performance of the debtor's obligation. There are, for example, cases where co-operation cannot reasonably be expected until the other party has first taken some step.

The facts are as in Illustration 1 except that S is given the right to ship the goods at any time during July or August. B is under no obligation to nominate a vessel until B has received notification from S of the time at which S intends to ship the goods.

F. Effects of failure to perform obligation to co-operate

Failure to perform the obligation to co-operate has the same effects as failure to perform any other contractual obligation and attracts the various remedies prescribed for non-performance of a contractual obligation. These remedies include specific performance. So, for example, if X needs access to Y's land in order to perform the obligations under a contract between them and if Y refuses access for no good reason, X could obtain a court order compelling Y to grant access. It should be noted, however, that there are general restrictions on the remedy of specific performance which could be particularly relevant in relation to the obligation to co-operate. For example, a person could not be forced to accept services or work of a personal character.

NOTES

1. In many systems the duty to co-operate is derived from the principle of good faith and fair dealing.
2. Thus under the GERMAN CC § 242 the debtor and the creditor have a duty to co-operate in the performance of the obligation (Prütting/Wegen/Weinreich (-Schmidt-Kessel), BGB[3], § 242 no. 60). For instance, they must both help to obtain a permission from a third party or a government authority, where this is required. The duty to co-operate may also oblige a party to support the other party to a contract when a third party may threaten that other party's rights, but CC § 242 does probably not entail a duty to safeguard the other party's interests in general, see Staudinger (-Olzen), BGB, § 241, no. 172 et seq. . Under AUSTRIAN law, it follows from the requirement of fair dealing (ABGB § 1914) that the partners to a contract are subject to a collateral contractual duty to take the necessary efforts to make sure that the contract is correctly performed (Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB IV[3], § 914 no. 67). The position is similar in SLOVENIAN law, LOA §§ 5, 9 and 271.
3. A similar duty to assist the other party in the performance of the contract, and derived from the good faith principle, is to be found in GREECE, A.P. 179/1956, NoB 4 (1956) 707, see Tsirintanis II/1 art. 288 no. 6 (1949); ITALY, CC art. 1175 (see Breccia 413, with references, Bianca, Il contratto 500-511 and Sacco(-De Nova), Il contratto, II, 436-438, see also Cass. 18 October 2004, no. 20399, in I Contratti. 2005, 429 ff); THE NETHERLANDS, CC arts. 6:2, 6:248, see also 6:58 on mora creditoris; PORTUGAL, Varela II 10 ff, see also CC arts. 762(2) and 813; ESTONIA LOA § 23(2), which is however unclear as to the enforceability of the obligation (Varul et al (-Kull) § 23 no. 4.3; see also LOA § 119 on mora creditoris and LOA § 101(3) on restrictions on relying on non-performance and resort to remedies in so far as such non-performance was caused by an act of the creditor or by circumstances dependent on the creditor; and SPAIN, Díez-Picazo I 733; Lacruz(-Rams), II, 1 Obligaciones, § 69, no. 320, 534).
4. In FRANCE the duty to co-operate has recently been accepted as flowing from the principle of good faith (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], n° 43. The courts have applied it to contracts for the supply of sophisticated products such as computer software, see Picod JCP 1988 I 3318. In BELGIUM also good faith has been used as the basis for a duty to co-operate (Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, p. 99).
5. NORDIC statutes do not provide a general duty to co-operate in the performance of contractual obligations, but this duty pervades the provisions of the Sale of Goods Acts (DENMARK, 1906; FINLAND and SWEDEN 1987-1990) which in many respects are considered to provide general principles of contract law. See also the emphasis on the duty to co-operate in authors such as Taxell, Avtalsrättens normer II and Wilhelmsson, Perspectives 21; Ramberg, Avtalsrätt 39. In Nordic countries this duty is also often characterised as a "duty of loyalty".
6. In POLISH law the parties' duty to co-operate is derived from CC art. 354. According to CC art. 354 § 1, the debtor should perform the obligation in compliance with its terms, with its economic aim and with established customs and according to art. 354 § 2 – the creditor should co-operate in the same manner.

7. ENGLISH law will impose an implied duty to co-operate where this is necessary in order to give business efficacy to the agreement: see The Moorcock (1889) 14 PD 64. Beyond this the attitude of the English courts has not been very consistent. See Burrows (1968) 31 MLR 390. The strongest recognition has perhaps been in relation to contracts of employment: see Secretary of State for Employment v. Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen (No. 2) [1972] 2 QB 455.

8. In SCOTTISH law too it may be possible to imply into a contract a term imposing an obligation to co-operate (see Mackay v. Dick (1880-81) 6 App. Cas. 251, per Lord Blackburn) but the technique of ad hoc implication of terms is not so reliable as having a general rule.

9. A general duty of contractual co-operation cannot be found in the CZECH statute law, but in fact it could be derived, case by case, from the general rule of good faith and the commercial principle of the fair dealing. Moreover, a duty of co-operation is recognised for some kinds of contracts (for instance: the buyer is obliged to co-operate with the seller, see Štenglová, Plíva, Tomsa a kol. Obchodní zákoník – komentář, C.H. Beck Praha 2004, p. 1109, under Ccom art. 447).

10. In SLOVAK law, a debtor is not considered to be in delay in performing the obligation if the delay is due to the creditor's lack of co-operation at the time of performance (see CC § 520). The creditor who fails to co-operate may be regarded as being in delay (see CC § 522).

11. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 277(4) the parties are under an obligation to co-operate in the performance of the obligations under a contract. The debtor must act to perform in the manner that can generally be expected in the given situation, while the creditor must promote performance in the same manner. Under CC § 277(5) the parties are under an obligation to inform each other of all important circumstances affecting performance. See also CC Introductory provisions § 4(1) which provides that in exercising civil rights and fulfilling obligations, all parties should act in the manner required by good faith and fair dealing and are obliged to co-operate with one another.

III.–1:105: Non-discrimination

Chapter 2 (Non-discrimination) of Book II applies with appropriate adaptations to:

(a) the performance of any obligation to provide access to, or supply, goods, other assets or services which are available to members of the public;

(b) the exercise of a right to performance of any such obligation or the pursuing or defending of any remedy for non-performance of any such obligation; and

(c) the exercise of a right to terminate any such obligation.

COMMENTS

This Article is needed because the provisions in Chapter 2 (Non-discrimination) of Book II apply only to contracts and juridical acts and not to the obligations and corresponding rights arising out of them. It is clear, however, that the principle of non-discrimination in that Chapter is as important in relation to the performance of the relevant obligations and the exercise of corresponding rights to performance as it is in relation to such matters as the initial decision to conclude or not to conclude a contract. The same goes for the decision to terminate any such obligation.

On the content of the Article see the Comments to the Articles in Book II. Chapter 2 (Non-discrimination).

NOTES

1. See the Notes to Book II, Chapter 2 (Discrimination).

III.–1:106: Conditional rights and obligations

(1) The terms regulating a right, obligation or contractual relationship may provide that it is conditional upon the occurrence of an uncertain future event, so that it takes effect only if the event occurs (suspensive condition) or comes to an end if the event occurs (resolutive condition).

(2) Upon fulfilment of a suspensive condition, the relevant right, obligation or relationship takes effect.

(3) Upon fulfilment of a resolutive condition, the relevant right, obligation or relationship comes to an end.

(4) When a party, contrary to the duty of good faith and fair dealing or the obligation to co-operate, interferes with events so as to bring about the fulfilment or non-fulfilment of a condition to that party's advantage, the other party may treat the condition as not having been fulfilled or as having been fulfilled as the case may be.

(5) When a contractual obligation or relationship comes to an end on the fulfilment of a resolutive condition any restitutionary effects are regulated by the rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) with appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

A. Need for provision

Most of this Article is not necessary for substantive purposes. It already follows from the principle of party autonomy that contracting parties can make a right or obligation, or the whole complex of rights and obligations involved in their contractual relationship, or indeed any other result, conditional on the occurrence or non-occurrence of an uncertain future event. And it goes without saying that a legislator could do the same. In the absence of provision to the contrary, a term providing that a right or obligation would come into effect, or would cease to have effect, on the occurrence of an event would not have retrospective effect. So substantively the first three paragraphs of the Article do nothing. They are, however, useful for the purposes of establishing a recognised terminology on suspensive and resolutive conditions. Paragraph (4) does have a substantive effect. It is considered below.

B. Meaning of "conditional"

A right or obligation is conditional if it is subject to an "if" provision. Either it becomes effective "if" something happens or it ceases to be effective "if" something happens. The "something" must be an uncertain future event.

Illustration 1
The Government of Bettaravia has suspended indefinitely all exports of sugar beets from its ports. A contract requires the seller to ship beets on 31 July if the export embargo has been lifted by that date. This is a suspensive condition affecting the seller's obligation.

Illustration 2
Under a joint venture agreement, a landscape gardener and a water engineer agree to develop land for a theme park if an environmental permit becomes available. This is a suspensive condition affecting both parties' obligations.

An obligation may be conditional on the occurrence of a future uncertain event even although the condition is expressed negatively and refers to the non-occurrence of the event.

Illustration 3
A contract for the sale of sugar beets f.o.b. a named port in the country of Bettaravia provides that the seller's obligation to deliver is dependent upon the Government of Bettaravia not introducing export restrictions on sugar beets before the date fixed for delivery. Here the uncertain event is the introduction of the restrictions. The seller's obligation to deliver on the due date is subject to a resolutive condition. It will come to an end if the Government introduces export restrictions before that date.

C. An uncertain event

The essence of a condition, within the meaning of the Article, is its uncertain character. This uncertainty stems from external events which the parties to the contractual or other legal relationship may in certain cases be able to influence but which they do not control. The reference to an "uncertain future event" is not intended to cover the performance or non-performance by the debtor of the debtor's own obligations under the contract. The consequences of the "bringing about" by a debtor of the performance or non-performance of the debtor's obligations are regulated by the terms regulating the obligations and the rules on the remedies for non-performance and not by paragraph (4) of the present Article. By exercising due diligence, a party may help to bring about the fulfilment of a suspensive condition or prevent the occurrence of a resolutive condition. For example, in a contract for the export of goods the seller's obligation may be conditional on the award of an export licence. This may be subject to a quota or other system of discretionary control operated by the authorities. The award of an export licence may therefore be affected by the diligence and skill with which the applicant makes a case to the authorities. The seller's obligation to deliver the goods is nevertheless conditional upon the award of the licence.

Some conditions, however, will be so heavily dependent upon the will of one party as to signify a total lack of contractual commitment by that party and hence the absence of a binding contract. For example, a company may say that it will do something or pay a sum of money if, as a matter of pure discretion, it chooses to do so. This is not a conditional obligation: it is not an obligation at all. Such arbitrary conditions are to be distinguished from valid conditions where one party's obligation is dependent upon the will of another. A seller, for example, may be bound to supply raw materials to a buyer at a stated price in the event of the buyer deciding to accept an offer by a third person to purchase goods specially manufactured by the buyer.

D. A future event

An obligation may appear to be conditional upon a past event in those cases where the parties do not know whether the event has occurred. Uncertainty concerning past events may play a vital role in shaping rights and obligations, even in a world of rapid communication. Nevertheless, on a true interpretation of the situation, it is often not the past event that forms the basis of the condition but the future publication or availability of information concerning that event.

A agrees to purchase from B a number of shares in company C if C's net profits in the preceding financial year reached a stated minimum figure. It is not known at the time of the agreement whether the profits did reach the figure. The past profits of C will become known only when its accounts have been finalised. A's obligation falls to be interpreted as conditional on an uncertain future event – whether or not the amount of net profits brought out in the final accounts reaches the stated figure.

E. Operation of law

A right or obligation may be conditional on compliance with a country's law which is not the law applicable to the obligation.

Illustration 5
A contract for the export of works of art from Pictoria provides that the seller's obligation is conditional upon the export being lawful according to Pictorian law, which is not the law governing the contract. Pictorian law requires an export licence. The seller's obligation is therefore conditional upon the grant of a licence by the Pictorian authorities.

In the above illustration, the seller may be under a separate contractual obligation, express or implied, to obtain the licence or to use due diligence to obtain the licence and may be in breach of that obligation, as opposed to the delivery obligation, if unsuccessful in obtaining the licence.

F. Suspensive and resolutive conditions

In the case of a suspensive condition, the creditor may not demand performance from the debtor whose obligation is suspended for that would be to alter the basis of the bargain. This does not prevent a debtor from incurring liability for anticipated non-performance in accordance with the rules on that subject.

As is the case with suspensive conditions (see Illustrations 1 and 2 above), a resolutive condition may qualify the obligations of one party or both parties.

Illustration 6
A contract for the sale of five separate weekly shipments of 10,000 Russian Birchwood standards to be shipped from a northern Russian port provides for the parties' future obligations under the contract to come to an end if, contrary to expectations, the port is closed by ice before all the shipments have been made. The port is closed by ice after four shipments have been made. The parties' obligations were subject to a resolutive condition. In relation to the last shipment the condition has been fulfilled. The seller is no longer liable to make the last shipment and the buyer is no longer bound to pay for it.

G. Effect of fulfilment of conditions

The rule expressed in paragraphs (2) and (3) of the Article ascribes a prospective (or ex nunc) effect to the fulfilment of a condition unless otherwise provided. This is the simplest default rule. A rule giving retrospective effect to the fulfilment of a condition would have had to be subject to significant exceptions.

An example of prospective effect in the case of a suspensive condition is the following.

Illustration 7
A contract for the sale of a house in Bordeaux provides that the seller's obligation to sell is subject to the seller being appointed to a senior civil service position in Paris by a stated date. The seller is duly appointed.

It is only when that appointment is made that the seller's obligation to sell the house takes effect as an unconditional obligation. Before that there is only a conditional obligation.

An example of prospective effect in the case of a resolutive condition is the following.

A carrier enters into a contract with a farmer to transport water by lorry to the farm for four weeks but this obligation is to come to an end if the local drought comes to an end within that time. Under the contract, the farmer pays carriage charges 30 days after each delivery.

The end of the drought within the four week period brings to an end the carrier's obligation. The farmer, nevertheless, remains bound to pay outstanding charges for deliveries made before the end of the drought. These charges are not affected by the condition: they accrue with each delivery even if payable in the future.

Problems regarding the recovery of money or property paid or delivered in the expectation that a condition will be fulfilled or not fulfilled may be resolved by the terms regulating the relevant obligations. For example, it may be expressly provided that a deposit is to be forfeited or returned. If the matter is not regulated it will be resolved by the rules in Chapter 8 which deal with such matters generally in relation to obligations which are extinguished otherwise than by performance.

H. Interference

Paragraph (4) deals with the situation where the debtor or creditor interferes with events so as to prevent a condition from being fulfilled or bring about fulfilment, in breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing or the obligation to co-operate. It gives the other party an option to treat the condition as fulfilled or not fulfilled as the case may be.

Illustration 9
The licensing of a software package by D to E is agreed by the parties to be dependent upon the professional approval of the package by an independent computer engineer, F, who is nominated by D. The contract is favourable to D and unfavourable to E. Despite F's professional misgivings, D persuades F to approve the package. D, having acted contrary to good faith and fair dealing, cannot rely on F's approval, so that E is under no obligation to perform the licensing agreement and may have a right to damages for any loss caused by D's breach of the obligation to co-operate.

The above example is an illustration of interference in the case of a suspensive condition. Similar results may follow in the case of a resolutive condition.

S enters into a contract to sell a horse to B. B expects to sell the horse on to T. S and B agree that B's obligation under the contract is to come to an end if T does not take the horse by a certain date. B also obtains another horse from a different seller and sells this horse to T instead, making no effort to sell T the horse purchased from S.

If the innocent party chooses not to exercise the option conferred by this paragraph the normal consequences of a breach of the duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing or a non-performance of the obligation to co-operate will follow. This means that the interfering party may not be able to rely on any right which would have accrued as a result of the wrongful interference and may be liable in damages for non-performance of the obligation to co-operate. In many cases the innocent party will also be able to terminate the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance.

It should be noted that the result of an improper interference which prevents a condition from being fulfilled is not necessarily that the condition is deemed to be fulfilled for all purposes. That could produce rigid and unacceptable results. For example, it could preclude the innocent party from terminating the contractual relationship or obtaining damages.

The licensing of a software package by B to A is agreed by the parties to be dependent upon the professional approval of the package by an independent computer engineer, C, who is nominated by A. Regretting the bargain, A bribes C, against C's better judgement, to disapprove the software package.

If the condition were deemed to be fulfilled then both A and B would be bound to proceed with the contract. However, given A's cynical and serious breach of the duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing and A's non-performance of the obligation to co-operate, B may prefer to terminate the contractual relationship and claim damages for any loss caused by A's conduct. There can also be cases where deeming a condition to be fulfilled makes no practical sense. For example, there is no point in deeming a condition relating to the obtaining of an export licence to have been fulfilled if the licence has not in fact been obtained. Damages are a much better remedy.

I. Restitutionary effects

It may happen that when a contractual obligation or relationship comes to an end because of the fulfilment of a resolutive condition there has been part performance of an obligation, or performance of a reciprocal obligation. The question whether either party is bound to return or pay the value of whatever has been received from the other in such circumstances is regulated by the rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) .

Illustration 12
X has paid in advance for something which is to be supplied by Y. Y's obligation comes to an end because of the fulfilment of a resolutive condition. The rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) mean that Y has to return the payment.

If a person has paid or transferred something in the anticipation that a suspensive condition will be fulfilled and the condition is not fulfilled, the situation is different. The payment or transfer would have taken place in the absence of any legal obligation and with no intention of donation. In such circumstances the law on unjustified enrichment would come into operation and the payment or property transferred would normally be recoverable on that basis.

NOTES

I. History

1. The rules on conditions have a long history. They can be traced back in some instances to the earliest records of Roman law and have formed an unbroken thread in the European legal tradition for many centuries. See generally Zimmermann, Obligations 716 ff.

II. Suspensive and resolutive conditions

2. The distinction is common to many legal systems. See the BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1168; the GERMAN CC § 158; the DUTCH CC art. 6:22; the AUSTRIAN CC § 696; the SPANISH CC art. 1113; the ITALIAN CC arts. 1353-1361; the GREEK CC arts. 201-02; the SLOVAK CC § 36(2); the SLOVENIAN LOA § 59; the ESTONIAN GPCCA § 102; the POLISH CC art. 89; and the PORTUGUESE CC art. 270. See also for DENMARK Ussing, Aftaler[3], 447-457; for the CZECH law CC § 36(2) and for SCOTLAND Gloag chap. XVI, McBryde para. 5.35 ff. The distinction is known in ENGLISH law though it is more usual to refer to suspensive conditions as conditions precedent and to resolutive conditions as conditions subsequent (Chitty para. 2-144; Treitel, Contract, 2-109–2-110) IRISH law generally follows the English approach (Clark 198-205). For CZECH law see (Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová et coll. Občanský zákoník - komentář. C.H. Beck Praha 2004, p.219). DANISH and FINNISH law have no general legislative provisions on the subject, though the distinction is known in the Land Act (Maakaari 12.4.1995/540). More recent Finnish authors subsume conditions in the discussion of interpretation, though an earlier text (Kivimäki & Ylöstalo 291-297) devotes separate space to the subject. On Danish law see Bryde Andersen II 201 ff. For SWEDEN see e.g. Hagstrom, p. 766 et seq.

III. Uncertain events; past and future events

3. It is generally recognised that the event on which an obligation may be conditional must be uncertain. See the FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs (arts. 1168 and 1181), the DUTCH CC (art. 6:21) and the SPANISH CC (art. 1113) where it is provided that the event may be either a future event or (in contrast with these rules) a past event that is not known to the parties. If only the time of arrival is uncertain, it is not a condition (e.g. death of a person), see Notes under III-1:107. See also the AUSTRIAN CC § 704; SLOVENIAN LOA § 59; PORTUGUESE CC art. 270; ITALIAN (e.g., Barbero 1099, Bianca, Il contratto, 543-544, contra Gazzoni, 938); GERMAN (e.g. MünchKomm (-Westermann) § 158 no. 8); ENGLISH (e.g., Treitel, Contract 2-109–2-110); SCOTTISH (e.g. Stair 1.3.7); and IRISH (e.g., Clark 198-205) authors recognise the uncertain character of conditions. GREEK law insists on an uncertain future event (CC arts. 201 and 202) and so does ESTONIAN GPCCA § 102 and the POLISH CC art. 89. If the event is uncertain, yet past, there is no real condition but only a subjective uncertainty (see Balis 255). See generally Treitel, Remedies 255-265.

IV. Conditions and party interference

4. FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG laws have a provision similar to para. (4) (CC art. 1178), as does GERMAN law (CC § 162); DUTCH law (CC art. 6:23); SLOVENIAN law (LOA § 59 (4)); ESTONIAN law (GPCCA § 104); POLISH law CC art. 93; and ITALIAN law (CC arts. 1358-1359; Cass. 16 December 1991, no.13519, in Giust. Civ. 1992, I, 3095, and Cass., SS. UU., 19 September 2005, no.18450, in Vita not. 2006, 289); jurisprudence requires the interfering party's behaviour to be in breach of an obligation or contrary to good faith (Cass. 22 April 2003, no.6423 and Cass. 28 July 2004, no.14198, in Giust.civ. 2004, I, 2793 and 2539). A similar rule exists in PORTUGUESE law (CC art. 275(2)); GREEK law (CC art. 207); AUSTRIAN law (see the jurisprudence of the Austrian Supreme Court (-OGH) 27 March 1996, JBl 1996, 782; ÖBA 1996, 892; 19 December 1990, JBl 1991, 382; 21 February 1989, JBl 1990, 37); FINNISH law (Kivimäki & Ylöstalo 295). The principle is the same in the CZECH law (CC § 36). Any fact in law should become unconditional, if a party to whom non-fulfilment of a condition is advantageous intentionally frustrates its fulfilment and any fulfilment of a condition should be ignored if its fulfilment was intentionally brought about by a party who had no right to do so and for whom its fulfilment is advantageous. Some abusive conditions are considered unwritten when stipulated in a consumer contract (CC § 56). A similar principle is also to be found in the SPANISH CC (art. 1119); fraud is not a requirement and a mere conscious act attributable to the party suffices; and the SLOVAK CC (§ 36). DANISH law recognises an obligation of non-interference but would deem fulfilment or non-fulfilment as the case may be to occur only in appropriate cases (Ussing, Aftaler[3], 448 ff and Bryde Andersen II 203). SCOTTISH law may in appropriate cases deem a condition to be fulfilled or not fulfilled if a party has improperly brought about fulfilment (cf. Mackay v. Dick & Stevenson (1881) 8R (HL) 37; Credential Bath Street Ltd. v. Venture Investment Placement Ltd. [2007] CSOH 208). ENGLISH law would often treat the action of the interfering party as the breach of an implied term of the contract but, though Mackay v Dick is frequently cited, would not deem fulfilment or non-fulfilment to have occurred: Treitel, Contract 2-116. IRISH law appears to adopt a similar approach to English law, the courts intervening only where there is an express or implied obligation to do or not to do something (see Clark 200-01).

V. Contractual obligations ancillary to conditions

5. Whether a contracting party has undertaken expressly or impliedly to exercise due diligence to assist the occurrence of a suspensive condition, or has even undertaken to bring about its occurrence, will be a question of interpretation of the contract. For examples in ENGLISH law see Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders Ltd. [1917] 2 KB 679; Pagnan SpA v. Tradax Ocean Transportation SA [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep 342 National laws do not generally provide for these specific obligations (as opposed to general obligations to act in good faith) to arise by operation of law.

VI. Effect of fulfilment of condition

6. The activation of a condition does not have retrospective effect in GERMAN law. An agreement that it should do so has only personal effect. (CC §§ 158(2) and 159). In DUTCH law the same hold true: fulfilment of a condition does not have retrospective effect (CC art. 6:22) and has only personal effect (CC art. 6:24). A prospective effect is also the rule in GREEK law (CC art. 203(1) and (2)) and AUSTRIAN law (CC § 696 - for resolutive conditions - and OGH 13 July 1987 SZ 55/109 - for suspensive conditions) as well as in ESTONIAN law (GPCCA § 105). In FINNISH law, conditions operate prospectively, unless otherwise agreed (Kivimäki & Ylöstalo 296-97); the same rule follows from POLISH CC art. 90. SCOTTISH law appears to be the same (Gloag & Henderson para. 3.12). It appears to be a matter of contractual construction in DANISH law just as it would be in ENGLISH and IRISH law whether conditions operate prospectively or retrospectively. In CZECH law, the principle is that the condition has only a prospective effect. Nevertheless, for a suspensive condition, a retrospective effect is possible if agreed (CC § 36, interpretation by Jehlička, Švestková, Škárová a kol., abovementioned, p. 218; the same meaning: Josef Fiala in D.Hendrych a kol. Právnický slovník, Praha 2006, p. 857). The principle of retrospective effect upon the occurrence of a condition is firmly recognised by FRENCH law (CC art. 1179) but there are significant exceptions arising for example out of contrary agreement (Malaurie & Aynès n. 184), fiscal law and the transfer of risk (CC art. 1182(2)). The same principle of retroactivity is to be found in BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law (CC art. 1179), with similar exceptions, (see for Belgium J. de Coninck, De voorwaarde in het contractenrecht (2007), p. 408 ff) and in ITALIAN law (CC art. 1360), where it is subject to contrary agreement and where a rule to the opposite effect applies in the case of long-term contracts (CC art. 1360(2)). Retroactivity is the rule in PORTUGUESE law (CC art. 276) but again there are exceptions. Again, it is the rule (but with exceptions) in SPANISH law (CC arts. 1120(1) and 1123(1)).

7. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 228(1) if the parties have made the coming into effect of a contract contingent upon an unpredictable future event (suspensive condition), the contract becomes effective when such condition occurs. Under paragraph (2) of the same article if the parties have made the termination of a contract contingent upon an unpredictable future event (resolutive condition), the contract expires when such condition occurs. Under paragraph (3) incomprehensible, contradictory, illegal or unattainable conditions are void; the provisions of limited invalidity (§ 239) apply to contracts with such conditions. Under CC § 229(1) as long as a condition is pending, neither party is entitled to do anything that would infringe or violate the other party's rights upon the realisation or frustration of the condition. This provision does not affect the rights of third persons acquired in good faith and for consideration. Under CC § 229(2) persons who have wrongfully caused the realisation or frustration of a condition are not entitled to establish any right as a result. Under CC § 229(3) the provisions on conditions are also applied to time clauses by which the parties link the coming into effect or termination of a contract to a certain date.

III.–1:107: Time-limited rights and obligations

(1) The terms regulating a right, obligation or contractual relationship may provide that it is to take effect from or end at a specified time, after a specified period of time or on the occurrence of an event which is certain to occur.

(2) It will take effect or come to an end at the time or on the event without further steps having to be taken.

(3) When a contractual obligation or relationship comes to an end under this Article any restitutionary effects are regulated by the rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) with appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

A. Time clauses and conditions

Terms relating to time must be distinguished from conditions. A debtor may be obliged to perform on a future date which is fixed and sure to arrive, as would be the case where a contract of sale is concluded on July 1 with delivery to be made by the seller on July 15. It would be a misuse of language to say that the obligation to deliver is conditional upon the arrival of the due date, for July 15 is sure to arrive. The obligation does not depend on the occurrence of a future uncertain event. It is an existing, unconditional obligation to perform in the future. The right which corresponds to it is an existing, unconditional right to future performance.

Similarly an obligation which is to come to an end on a specified time or after a specified period of time is not subject to a resolutive condition, although the effect is rather similar.

The line between conditional and temporal terms is not always clear-cut. Some events must occur though the date of their occurrence cannot be known. Provisions referring to such events will often be temporal terms as is recognised in the Article, but may involve a hidden condition if the obligation is contingent on something else happening or not happening before the specified event.

X is bound to pay Y €5000 when Z dies. This is not a condition but a simple time term. Z is bound to die. The term is a "when" term, not an "if" term.

Illustration 2
The trustees of a family settlement undertake to provide A with alimentary support on the death of B, her father. Since B's death is sure to happen, this may look at first sight like an obligation which is future but not conditional. However, A may die before B, in which event the trustees would be under no obligation. So in fact the obligation is conditional on A surviving B.

B. Restitutionary effects of extinction of contractual obligation by expiry of time

In many cases the parties to a contract will know in advance when an obligation is going to come to an end by the expiry of a specified time and will ensure that it is fully performed and that any reciprocal obligation is also fully performed. It may happen, however, that an obligation comes to an end unexpectedly by the arrival of a time limit - for example, one expressed by reference to an event which is certain to arrive but not at a time which can be known in advance. In such cases the situation is effectively the same as when a resolutive condition is fulfilled. At the moment when the obligation comes to an end something may have been transferred from one party to the other in part performance or attempted performance. Or one party may have performed in expectation of a reciprocal performance which is no longer forthcoming because of the unexpected extinction of the relevant obligation. The rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) regulate such questions. Normally there would be an obligation on the part of the recipient to return what had been received.

X has paid in advance for something which is to be supplied by Y. Y's obligation comes to an end because of the unexpected arrival of a time limit. The rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) mean that Y has to return the payment.

Not only specific rights and obligations but also whole contractual relationships can be subject to a time clause, as in leases, charterparties and agencies.

NOTES

1. The distinction between a condition and a time clause (whether relating to a fixed time or an uncertain time which is nonetheless bound to arrive) is of very long standing in the European legal tradition and is generally recognised. See e.g. for FRENCH law CC art. 1185 and Civ. 3ème, 4 déc. 1991, pourvoi nº 90-15153; for ENGLISH law Chitty on Contracts para. 2-142; for GREEK law CC art. 201; 210 for DUTCH law (CC art. 6:39 and Asser-Hartkamp 4-I, no. 155); for POLISH law CC art. 116; and generally Zimmermann, Obligations 741 ff. The same is held for SLOVAK law. The CZECH CC and also the Ccom ignore the concept of time clause; however, practice recognises exactly the same distinction between a condition (podmínka) and a time clause (doložení času) (Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová et coll. abovementioned, p. 219). The distinction is taken for granted in SCOTTISH law. For example, in Credential Bath Street Ltd v. Venture Investment Placement Ltd. [2007] CSOH 208 the guarantor's obligation was both conditional and subject to a time clause.
2. SPANISH law also distinguishes between a condition and a time clause. The CC (art. 1125) points out that a time clause exists when the day established in the terms of an obligation is certain to occur, no matter if it is known when it will happen (término cierto and término incierto). But when there are doubts about whether the event will ever occur, CC art. 1125.3 regards such a term as a condition. A time clause in Spanish law takes effect automatically when the established event occurs and no specific declaration by the parties is needed.

III.–1:108: Variation or termination by agreement

(1) A right, obligation or contractual relationship may be varied or terminated by agreement at any time.

(2) Where the parties do not regulate the effects of termination, then:

(a) it has prospective effect only and does not affect any right to damages, or a stipulated payment, for non-performance of any obligation performance of which was due before termination;

(b) it does not affect any provision for the settlement of disputes or any other provision which is to operate even after termination; and

(c) in the case of a contractual obligation or relationship any restitutionary effects are regulated by the rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) with appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

The debtor and creditor can always agree to vary or terminate the obligation and corresponding right; the parties to a contract can always agree to vary or terminate their relationship. The agreement need not be express. It may be implied from what the parties have said or done. For example, the extinction of a contractual obligation may sometimes be inferred from the fact that a new contract has been concluded on, or in relation to, the same subject-matter. This is sometimes known as novation but that term is used in different senses in different legal systems. The extinction of a right or obligation should not, however, be readily implied. Only if that is clearly the intention of the parties should that result follow.

The parties will normally regulate the effects of a termination by agreement. Paragraphs (2) and (3) of the Article merely provide default rules. In the absence of agreement to the contrary, termination is prospective in effect. It does not affect liability for damages caused by past non-performance. It does not affect provisions of a contract, such as an arbitration clause, intended to survive termination.

When an obligation is terminated by agreement the parties will normally regulate what is to happen to anything already transferred from one to the other in part performance or attempted performance of the obligation or under a reciprocal obligation. In any case where, unusually, they forget to do so, the rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) would come into play. Those rules would normally require the recipient party to return what had been received.

Illustration

X has paid in advance for something which is to be supplied by Y. Circumstances change and the parties agree to terminate Y's obligation. X assumes that the advance payment will be returnable but forgets to mention this. So nothing is said about it in the agreement. The rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) mean that Y has to return the payment. Of course, if the parties want Y to keep the advance payment they can easily provide for this, but the default rule is that it is returnable.

As an agreement to vary or terminate a right, obligation or contractual relationship will be a contract (see II.–1:101 (Meaning of "contract" and "juridical act")) it follows that no form or other requirement such as consideration will be required (see II.–4:101 (Requirements for the conclusion of a contract)).

1. This rule generally follows from the principle of freedom of contract.
2. Under FRENCH and BELGIAN law, for example, the parties can always agree to vary or terminate their contract (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 476 ff) but depending on the variation the result may be another contract (a "novation") which terminates the first (arts. 1271 ff) or the same contract with modification. The prospective or ex nunc effect can be decided by the parties. The position of POLISH law is that a contract to terminate another contract has an effect for the future; a contract to vary an existing contract may either waive or modify the contractual provisions (P. Machnikowski in E. Łętowska, System prawa prywatnego. Prawo zobowiązań – część ogólna, 463).
3. In GREEK law (CC art. 361) in order to create or amend an obligation a contract is required, provided that the law does not determine otherwise (see Michael P. Stathopoulos, Contract Law in Hellas, no. 13 and Penelope Agallopoulou, Basic Concepts of Greek Civil law, Athens 2005, p. 235).
4. Under DUTCH and GERMAN law the parties can always agree to vary the contract or terminate the contractual relationship with prospective effect (Asser-Hartkamp 4-II, no. 27; Staudinger (-Löwisch), BGB [2005], § 311 nos. 4, 76 et seq.).
5. In SCOTTISH law the parties may agree to discharge or vary their contractual rights and obligations (McBryde, chap. 25.04). Subject to the possibility of waiver of rights, termination or variation would in principle be prospective in effect (McBryde, chap. 25; E Reid and J Blackie, Personal Bar (2006)).
6. Under SPANISH law, the mutual agreement to terminate has only efficacy ex nunc. This rule flows from a more general principle according to which if parties "novate" a pre-existing obligation, the substitution has as a rule no extinctive effect as to the matured duties: TS 28 December 2000, RAJ 2000/10382.
7. In ENGLISH law an agreement to vary or terminate an obligation in principle requires consideration in the same way as consideration is required to form a contract. If the change is wholly to the benefit of one party – as when one party agrees to let the other off paying an outstanding debt, see Foakes v. Beer (1883-84) 9 App. Cas. 605, or promises to pay the other extra for performing an existing contractual obligation, see Stilk v. Myrick (1809) 2 Camp 317, 170 ER 1168 – the traditional position is that the agreement is ineffective for want of consideration. However in recent years the requirement of consideration has been severely attenuated, in the first type of case by the development of the doctrine of promissory estoppel (see Central London Property Trust Ltd. v. High Trees House Ltd. [1947] KB 130) and in the second by finding that if the promisor made the promise freely and derived a practical benefit from having the obligation performed, there is consideration: see Williams v. Roffey Brothers & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd. [1991] 1 QB 1. See Chitty on Contracts paras. 3-072–3-136.
8. Under SLOVAK law, in compliance with the principle of freedom of contract, the parties may vary their mutual rights and obligations (CC § 516(1)), replace an existing obligation with a new one and terminate the existing obligation (CC § 570(1)) or terminate an obligation not yet performed (or a part of it) without forming a new obligation (CC § 572(2)) by agreement. Moreover, an obligation can also be replaced with a new obligation by settlement pursuant to CC § 585 et seq. A distinction has to be made between an agreement resulting in a new obligation being formed instead of the existing one ("novatio privativa") and an agreement merely modifying the existing obligation or forming a new obligation beside the existing one ("novatio cumulativa"). In this respect, CC § 516(2) stipulates that, unless it unequivocally results from the agreement that, by forming a new obligation, the existing obligation is to be terminated, a new obligation is formed beside the existing obligation, provided that the conditions required by law for forming such an obligation are met. Furthermore, under CC § 571, in case of replacement of an existing obligation, it is deemed replaced only as far as this unequivocally results from the agreement on forming a new obligation. The obligation is terminated, unless otherwise agreed by the parties, by the acceptance of the proposal for terminating it by the other party (CC § 572(2)). Such termination is, in principle, prospective in effect. In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, once the obligation is terminated, the parties have to return what they have accepted under the obligation. Any consideration thus received and not returned would be qualified as an unjustified enrichment (see CC §§ 451 and 457).

9. In CZECH law, the general rule is similar to that in the Article parties may, by agreement, modify or terminate their mutual rights and obligations (see CC § 516.1 for modification, CC § 570.1 for replacement of an already existing obligation by a new one, CC § 572.2 for termination). This novation has an ex tunc and reciprocal effect (CC § 573) unless otherwise agreed (CC §§ 573 ff). For both the variation and termination of an obligation, the obligation is regarded as varied or terminated only so far as that undoubtedly follows from the new agreement; if there are doubts about the scope of the variation or substitution by a new obligation, the agreement is to be judged as constituting a new relationship in addition to the old one (CC § 516(2) and § 571). The CZECH CC distinguishes between a simple waiver of right and a complex dissolution of reciprocal rights and obligations; both must be executed in the form of an agreement, which must be in writing in the former case, but may be informal in the later (unless the terminated obligation is agreed in writing itself) (CC §§ 572(2) and (3), 574(1)). The terminated obligation is extinguished ex nunc (CC § 572(2), § 573) further specifies that a written agreement on termination of an obligation of one party entails the termination of the reciprocal obligation of the other party (unless expressly agreed otherwise), and if this obligation has been already performed, the first party may claim the return of the performance […].

10. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 240(1) unless otherwise provided by legal regulation, the parties are entitled to amend the content of a contract by mutual consent or change the legal title of their commitment. Under CC § 319(1) parties are entitled to terminate or cancel contracts by mutual consent. Under CC § 319 (2) in the case of termination, the contract is extinguished with prospective effect, and the parties owe no further obligations. The contractual price for obligations performed before termination must be paid, and if the other party has not yet performed the reciprocal obligation for a price that has already been paid, the money must be refunded. Under CC § 319(3) in the case of cancellation of a contract, the contract is extinguished with retroactive effect as of the date of conclusion, upon which benefits already received under the contract must be returned.

III.–1:109: Variation or termination by notice

(1) A right, obligation or contractual relationship may be varied or terminated by notice by either party where this is provided for by the terms regulating it.

(2) Where, in a case involving continuous or periodic performance of a contractual obligation, the terms of the contract do not say when the contractual relationship is to end or say that it will never end, it may be terminated by either party by giving a reasonable period of notice. In assessing whether a period of notice is reasonable, regard may be had to the interval between performances or counter-performances.

(3) Where the parties do not regulate the effects of termination, then:

(a) it has prospective effect only and does not affect any right to damages, or a stipulated payment, for non-performance of any obligation performance of which was due before termination;

(b) it does not affect any provision for the settlement of disputes or any other provision which is to operate even after termination; and

(c) in the case of a contractual obligation or relationship any restitutionary effects are regulated by the rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) with appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article provides for two situations in which a right, obligation or contractual relationship may be terminated by unilateral notice. The first is where this possibility is provided for by the terms regulating the obligation. The second is where the contract is for an indefinite or perpetual duration.

B. Variation or termination by notice as provided for by terms regulating right or obligation

The principle of party autonomy means that it is possible for the parties to agree on rights to terminate for any reason or none. The effects of exercising such an agreed right to terminate in a case not involving fundamental non-performance will depend primarily on the terms of the provision conferring it. In the absence of clear provision to the contrary, accrued rights to damages would not be affected but neither party would be entitled to damages for the fact that any performance falling due in the future would not any longer have to be made.

A long-term supply contract under which a certain quantity of goods has to be delivered every month for ten years provides that the purchaser can terminate the relationship on giving one month's notice if the purchaser no longer needs the supply to be continued. In due course the purchaser exercises this right in good faith. The purchaser is not liable to pay damages for terminating the contractual relationship. The seller is not liable to pay damages for not performing in the future.

A long-term supply contract under which a certain quantity of goods has to be delivered every month for ten years provides that the purchaser can terminate the whole contractual relationship on giving one month's notice and without giving any opportunity to cure if there is even a minor non-conformity in any delivery. After some years of satisfactory performance there is, because of the negligence of a temporary employee of the seller, a minor non-conformity in one delivery. There is no reason to suppose that there will not be satisfactory performance in the future. The purchaser exercises the right to terminate, returns the goods to the seller and buys elsewhere. The purchaser is not liable to pay damages for terminating the contractual relationship. The seller is liable to pay damages for loss caused by the non-conforming delivery but is not liable to pay damages for not performing in the future. The contractual relationship has been terminated. Neither party has any further obligations to perform under it.

In some cases the parties may wish to provide not only for an agreed right to terminate but also for the payment of compensation or extended damages (going beyond what would be payable under the normal rules) by one or the other. For example the purchaser under a long-term supply contract may be given the right to terminate by notice but only on compensating the supplier for extra costs incurred in gearing up to meet the purchaser's special requirements. Or the purchaser may be given the right to terminate for a minor breach and also the right to damages for the extra costs of obtaining supplies elsewhere for the whole remaining period of the contract. Whether the parties have provided not only for a right to terminate but also for compensation or damages beyond what would be due under the normal rules will depend on the terms of the contract, interpreted in accordance with the rules on interpretation.

C. Contracts of indefinite or perpetual duration

Paragraph (2) applies both to contractual relationships which purport to be everlasting and to such relationships which are for a period the duration of which cannot be determined from the contract. It expresses two principles:

(1) even a contractual relationship which purports to be everlasting may be ended: no party is bound to another for an indefinite period of time.

(2) to end such a relationship, or one which is for an indeterminate period, either party must give reasonable notice.

The paragraph applies only where the case involves continuous or periodic performance under a contract and only where the time when the contractual relationship is to end cannot be determined from the terms of the contract. Accordingly it will not apply if the contract provides for a fixed duration or a fixed time of termination. Also, it will not apply if the contractual relationship is to last for a "reasonable time" because that expression can be interpreted and applied to the circumstances: a time for the relationship to end can be determined from the terms of the contract. Similarly, a contract for life will not be within the scope of the paragraph. Whether such a contract is valid will depend on other provisions of these rules. If it is in effect a contract of quasi-servitude then it could be void on the ground that it infringes the fundamental right to liberty. Again, a contractual relationship which is to last until a particular job is completed, or until the occurrence of an uncertain event, would not be within the paragraph. It is, in one sense, for an indefinite duration but a time for it to end is determinable from the contract.

In practice certain types of contract often give rise to relationships which are to last for indefinite periods. This is often the case under agency and distributorship contracts, under franchising contracts, partnerships and joint ventures, for contracts for the supply of services, goods and electricity and for leasing. Such contracts often do not contain any provision for the termination of the relationships to which they give rise.

The principle does not cover cases where the contract provides a method of termination – for example, a period of six months notice. In such cases the contract says when the contractual relationship will end.

The principle may, however, apply to contractual relationships which were originally for a definite period, but which the parties have tacitly continued after the end of that period although they have not expressly agreed to renew them.

The scope of the paragraph may be regarded as rather arbitrary from the policy point of view. Why, it may be asked, does it not apply to a contractual relationship which is to last for 200 years, or until the occurrence of an event which in practice is very unlikely to occur? The answer is that the autonomy of the parties is to be respected. The results are not so dramatic as might at first sight be supposed because in the case of contracts for such very long periods the rules on change of circumstances and termination for serious grounds (see next paragraph) would often provide a means of escape.

The party intending to end the contractual relationship under paragraph (2) must give a reasonable period of notice. What is reasonable depends, among other things, upon the period the contractual relationship has lasted, the efforts and investments which the other party has made in performance of the contract, and the time it may take the other party to obtain another contract with somebody else. The length of notice will often be governed by usages. The second sentence of paragraph (2) makes it clear that, in cases where performance or counter-performance is due at regular intervals, regard may be had to these intervals in assessing what is a reasonable period of notice. Often, but not necessarily always, the interval between performances (or counter-performances, if longer) could be regarded as a reasonable period of notice.

D. Time when notice takes effect

Following the general rules on notices, the notice which purports to end the contractual relationship will not be effective unless and until it reaches the person to whom it is sent.

E. Restitutionary and other effects

The question whether either party is bound to return or pay the value of whatever has been received from the other when an obligation is extinguished as a result of a notice given under this Article is regulated by the rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution).

Illustration 3
A contractual relationship of indefinite duration is terminated by notice under paragraph (2). At the time of termination one party has supplied part of a consignment of goods. Payment for the whole consignment is due 28 days after the whole consignment has been delivered. Termination extinguishes both parties' obligations for the future. The effect of the rules in Articles Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4

(Restitution) is that the supplier is entitled to the return of what has been supplied in part performance of the extinguished obligation.

The other effects are the same as for the preceding Article. In other words, termination has prospective effect only but does not affect provisions intended to survive termination.

Of course, the terms regulating the obligation may provide for more extensive effects than would normally follow. A contract for example may give one party a right to terminate the whole contractual relationship for even a minor and non-fundamental non-performance by the other and may provide for a stipulated sum or extended damages to be paid not only for loss caused by that non-performance but also for the fact that the terminating party will lose the benefit of future performance of the extinguished obligations. There are some limited controls on unfair contract terms, acting contrary to the requirements of good faith and fair dealing and excessive stipulated payments in lieu of damages but, if these usual controls do not come into play, such contractual provisions have to be respected and applied. It may be expected, however, that a party who wishes to have extended or unusual rights to payment from the other party after termination should provide for such rights in clear terms.

I. Party autonomy

1. The rule in paragraph (1) is universally recognised, even if not expressly stated.

II. Eternal engagements prohibited

2. One principle underlying paragraph (2) - that nobody can be contractually bound to another eternally - is generally accepted. art. 4(1) of the European Convention of Human Rights prohibits slavery and bondage. Therefore, a servant cannot be bound to work for an employer indefinitely. The GERMAN CC § 624 provides that an employment contract for the lifetime of the employee or employer or for more than five years can always be ended by a six months notice after five years; and this Article represents the general prohibition of an eternally binding contract under German law, cf. Oetker, Das Dauerschuldverhältnis und seine Beendigung, 254. FRENCH and LUXEMBOURG law prohibit “eternal undertakings” (Malaurie & Aynès Obligations no. 884). SPANISH law is the same, CC art. 1583 and art. 1705. Under BELGIAN, ITALIAN, SLOVENIAN and PORTUGUESE law contracts entered into for an indefinite period may be ended, see respectively Belgian Cass. 22 November 1973, Arr.Cass. 327; Bianca, Il contratto 736, contra (Sacco-)De Nova, Il contratto, II, 729 ff; Cass. 4 August 2004, no.14970, in Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, 7-8, and, for employment contracts, Italian CC art. 2118; Slovenian LOA § 333; Martinez, Da cessação do contrato 59 ff. Under AUSTRIAN law there is a general principle that obligations for an unlimited period can be terminated if there is a serious reason, but generally also without such a reason, if a reasonable period of notice is given. Moreover, obligations for a very long time might be regarded as being against good faith, although the Austrian courts take a fairly liberal approach towards this (a contract regarding the lease of a telephone operation system for 10 years was considered valid, see OGH 30 May 2006, RdW 2006, 626) based on a number of provisions of the CC (§§ 1117, 1118, 1162, 1210) that obligations for an indefinite period of time may be terminated by notice for serious reasons. Despite a principle prohibiting eternal engagements in CZECH law, a contractual obligation to refrain from a certain activity could be interminable if so agreed between the parties (see CC § 582 and Ccom art. 1).

3. ENGLISH law does not in principle refuse to admit an everlasting contract but a contract term creating an obligation to supply water at a fixed price "at all times hereafter" has been construed to mean that the contract may be ended by giving notice, see Staffordshire Area Health Authority v. South Staffordshire Waterworks Co. [1978] 1 WLR 1387. In SCOTTISH law the position is not clear (McBryde chaps. 9.15-9.21). In SWEDISH law the question whether an everlasting contract should be upheld depends upon the circumstances, NJA 1994 p. 359. SLOVAKIAN law generally recognises that it is possible to terminate an obligation of indefinite period with continuous or periodical performance (CC § 582). The Labour Code provides a possibility for employees to terminate the contractual relationship without giving any reasons.

III. Contracts for indefinite period determinable on reasonable notice

4. A general principle by which a contract for an indefinite period of time may be ended after a reasonable period of notice is found in DANISH law (Gomard, Obligationsret I, 26); ENGLISH law (see the Staffordshire case above, note 2); SCOTTISH law, see McBryde para. 9.16); GERMAN law (cf. Oetker, Das Dauerschuldverhältnis und seine Beendigung, 254)FRENCH, and LUXEMBOURG law, where it is founded on the doctrine of abuse of rights (Malaurie & Aynès, loc.cit.); BELGIAN law (Cass. 9 march 1973, Arr.Cass. 1973, 671; Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht p. 255); ITALIAN law (Bianca, loc.cit., Roselli, Recesso dal contratto, 267 ff) and PORTUGUESE law (Martinez, loc.cit.). In SPANISH law contracts for an indefinite period may be terminated at will (mandate, CC art. 1732), or according to the uses (loan for use, CC art. 1750) or after a reasonable period if the circumstances so require and, always, according to the good faith principle (CC art. 1705). See also CC art. 1581 (land leases).

5. Many laws provide for special periods of notice for specific contracts (e.g. SWEDISH Partnership Act § 2:24; FRENCH and BELGIAN CC arts. 1869, 1870). GERMAN law does not provide a general principle of reasonable notice, but the CC lays down special rules on notice for leases (§ 565), services (§§ 620(2), 622 and 624), cf. also mandate (§ 671) and civil companies (§ 723). The same holds true of other laws such as DUTCH, FINNISH, ESTONIAN and GREEK law which do not provide a general principle. For AUSTRIA see note 2 above and special rules e.g. in regard to leases CC § 1116, for employment contracts CC § 1159.

6. In POLISH law the general provision of CC art. 365^1 allows either party to terminate a contract for an indefinite period by giving notice. The notice period is fixed by law (e.g. CC art. 673 § 2 for lease), by contract or by custom. If nothing else appears from law, contract or custom, the contract expires immediately the notice is given (CC art. 365^1 in fine). The same applies in SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 333. In CZECH law, under CC § 582, an indefinite contractual engagement may be terminated by notice at the end of a calendar quarter. The notice period in civil law is generally fixed ex lege at 3 months, unless otherwise agreed between the parties. There is an exception for labour contracts for an indefinite period. Here the notice period is fixed at two months without any possibility for the employer or the employee to change its duration (Czech law 262/2006 art. 51, unless it has been agreed that the contractual relationship is to end at an exactly agreed date. In SLOVAK law the notice period is fixed by law at 3 months to the end of a calendar quarter (CC § 582) if the matter is not regulated by the contract.

IV. Determination at short notice in special cases

7. In some laws shorter periods of notice (or no notice) may apply in case of hardship. This is the case in GERMANY (CC § 242); ITALY (CC art. 1467); SLOVENIA (LOA § 333(3)) and in the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:258). In CZECH law, a shorter notice or withdrawal without notice may be legal in some circumstances. A commercial contract may be determined by short notice (shorter than 3 months) of one contractual party if the performance is delayed on the part of the other contractual party and if the delay constitutes a non-fundamental breach of contract (Ccom arts. 345 and 346).

V. Termination by notice for extraordinary and serious reason

8. On the basis of rules in the CC on premature ending of some continuous contracts for an important reason, GERMAN case law had developed a general rule by which continuous contracts may be ended without notice or with a shorter notice if evidence is brought showing that, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case and weighing the interests of both parties, the person giving notice cannot reasonably be expected to continue the relationship until it ends or may be ended under the contract. This general principle is now dealt with (since 2002) in a special provision, CC § 314. See also on employment contracts, CC § 626(1); on mandate, § 671(2); and on partnership, § 723(1) and (2). Rules on extraordinary termination under ESTONIAN law are similar (see e.g. on lease contract LOA § 313, on agency contracts LOA § 687). In ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law similar results would often be achieved indirectly by implying a term allowing the contractual relationship to be terminated in the exceptional circumstances which have arisen. In AUSTRIA continuous contracts can be terminated for serious reasons whether they are concluded for a limited or an unlimited period of time. For the former this states the exception as they normally only end after termination of the stated period (see Bollenberger in Koziol/Bydlinsky/Bollenberger, ABGB, 2nd ed., § 859 no. 7). In CZECH LAW, the withdrawal of either party to any commercial contract constitutes a legal termination of the contractual relationship if the performance by the other party constitutes a fundamental breach of a contractual obligation and the withdrawal has been notified to this other party without undue delay on the side of the first party (Ccom art. 345). In SPANISH law, a right of withdrawal for serious reasons in long term contracts with a definite duration is recognised in certain cases (CC art. 1586- services- and art. 1707- partnership).

9. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 320(1) a person who is entitled to withdraw on the basis of a contract or legal regulation may exercise this right by making a statement to the other party. Withdrawal cancels the contract retrospectively (ex tunc). Under § 321(1) a person authorised to rescind by virtue of a contract or a legal regulation may exercise the right by issuing a statement to the other party. Rescission terminates the contract prospectively (ex nunc).

III.–1:110: Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances

(1) An obligation must be performed even if performance has become more onerous, whether because the cost of performance has increased or because the value of what is to be received in return has diminished.

(2) If, however, performance of a contractual obligation or of an obligation arising from a unilateral juridical act becomes so onerous because of an exceptional change of circumstances that it would be manifestly unjust to hold the debtor to the obligation a court may:

(a) vary the obligation in order to make it reasonable and equitable in the new circumstances; or

(b) terminate the obligation at a date and on terms to be determined by the court.

(3) Paragraph (2) applies only if:

(a) the change of circumstances occurred after the time when the obligation was incurred,

(b) the debtor did not at that time take into account, and could not reasonably be expected to have taken into account, the possibility or scale of that change of circumstances;

(c) the debtor did not assume, and cannot reasonably be regarded as having assumed, the risk of that change of circumstances; and

(d) the debtor has attempted, reasonably and in good faith, to achieve by negotiation a reasonable and equitable adjustment of the terms regulating the obligation.

COMMENTS

A. General

The majority of countries in the European Community have introduced into their law some mechanism intended to correct the situation which may arise in very exceptional cases when performance of a contractual obligation, although not completely impossible, has become so excessively and disproportionately onerous as a result of supervening events which the parties to a contract could not reasonably have foreseen when they made the contract that it would be grossly unjust to hold them to their obligations. In practice contracting parties often adopt the same idea, supplementing the general rules of law with a variety of clauses, such as "hardship" clauses. If they do not do so, the reasonable conclusion may often be that they assumed the risk. However, this will not always be a reasonable conclusion. There may be cases where the parties simply overlooked the need for a hardship clause or the need for a clause to cover the circumstances which in fact arose.

This Article begins by recognising the important principle that obligations must be performed even if performance turns out to be more onerous than anticipated. It then recognises that there may, however, be cases where an exceptional change of circumstances, which could not reasonably have been taken into account, is so extreme that it would be manifestly unjust to hold the debtor to the obligation. It provides a mechanism whereby, if certain rather demanding requirements are satisfied, a court may adapt the obligation to the changed circumstances or even terminate it altogether.

This Article must be read along with the Article on "impossibility". Although in either case an unforeseen event has occurred, impossibility presupposes that the event has caused an insurmountable obstacle to performance, whereas in the situation covered by this Article performance may still be possible, although ruinous, for the debtor. The consequences are different under the two Articles. Impossibility of performance, if it is total, can only lead to the end of the obligation. Exceptional hardship, under this Article, gives the court the choice of revising the terms regulating the obligation or terminating it altogether. Of course there is sometimes a very fine line between a performance which is only possible by totally unreasonable efforts, and a performance which is only very difficult even if it may drive the debtor into bankruptcy. It is up to the court to decide which situation is before it.

This Article must also be read along with the rules allowing an obligation to be brought to an end in other circumstances, for example the rule allowing an obligation of indefinite duration to be terminated by giving notice. Where an obligation can be terminated by the debtor there will be no need to rely on the present Article.

B. Scope of Article

The court's powers arise only in the case of contractual obligations and obligations arising under a unilateral juridical act. It would not be appropriate to allow a court to modify or terminate an obligation which arises by operation of law, even if the obligation is one which is within the intended scope of these rules. In some cases, as in the obligation to reverse an unjustified enrichment, the question of change of circumstances is already addressed by the relevant rules. In others, as in the case of an obligation to pay damages for loss caused to another, relief based on a change of circumstances does not seem appropriate. And, generally, the idea of assumption of risk which is crucial to the rules on change of circumstances is not applicable in the case of obligations which are not voluntarily undertaken. On the other hand, there is no reason to exclude obligations arising under unilateral juridical acts from the scope of the provision. Indeed there may be a stronger case for including such obligations, which are often gratuitously undertaken, than for including many contractual obligations.

X has promised to pay to put his niece Y through a 5 year university course. The promise is legally binding. At the time of the promise 90% of university fees are met by the government and there is no reason to suppose that this will change. By the time, some years later, when Y is ready to embark on the course this government support has been withdrawn and X, who is retired and on a fixed income, cannot afford to perform his obligation without selling his house. X asks Y to accept a lower contribution and to take advantage of the state-backed student loan scheme which has replaced the old system but Y insists that X should sell his house and perform his obligation in full. The obligation can be modified or terminated.

C. The role of negotiation

The Principles of European Contract Law (Art. 6:111) imposed an obligation on contracting parties to enter into negotiations with a view to adapting the contract or ending it: damages could be awarded for loss caused by a refusal to negotiate or by breaking off negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing. Only if negotiations failed did a court have power to modify or terminate. On consultation, this technique was criticised by some stakeholders as being undesirably complicated and heavy. It was pointed out, for example, that a creditor in an obligation might be acting in a fiduciary capacity and might be placed in a difficult situation of conflict of interests if obliged to negotiate away an advantage.

The present Article takes account of these criticisms. It does not impose an obligation to negotiate but makes it a requirement for a remedy under the Article that the debtor should have attempted in good faith to achieve a reasonable and equitable adjustment by negotiation. There is no question of anyone being forced to negotiate or being held liable in damages for failing to negotiate. The Unidroit Principles (art. 6.2.3) adopt a similar basic approach but use a slightly different drafting technique. They provide that in case of hardship the disadvantaged party is entitled to request renegotiations and that only if there is a failure to reach an agreement within a reasonable time may the party resort to the court. However, as a matter of drafting, there seems to be no need to provide that a party is entitled to request renegotiations. A party to a contract is entitled to request renegotiations at any time.

D. When do court's powers arise

The Article places strict limits on the powers of the court to vary or terminate an obligation because of a change of circumstances. It is essential that it should do so. Consultation on this topic revealed a great concern that any mechanism for adjusting obligations on the basis of hardship might, if not strictly controlled, undermine fundamental principles of the law of contract and the stability of contractual relations.

Change of circumstances must be exceptional. This requirement was implied in the equivalent Article in the Principles of European Contract Law but was not expressly stated. On consultation, the lack of such a statement was criticised by stakeholders. The present Article makes it clear that the court's power arises only if the change of circumstances is exceptional.

> A canning business buys the whole of a producer's future crop of tomatoes at 10 cents per kilo. It could not obtain an adjustment merely because by harvest time the market price had fallen to 5 cents per kilo as a result of an unexpected flood of imported tomatoes. This sort of situation is not exceptional. (There are other ways of reaching the same result under the Article. For example it could be said that the risk was one which the business must be regarded as having assumed. See below.)

Performance must have become unjustly onerous. The change in circumstances must have made performance of the obligation so onerous that it would be manifestly unjust to hold the debtor to the obligation. When this happens in a contractual situation there will be a major imbalance in the parties' respective obligations. The whole basis of the contractual relationship can be regarded as completely overturned by events.

The excessive onerosity may be the direct result of increased cost in performance - for example, the increased cost of transport if the Suez Canal is closed and ships have to be sent round the Cape of Good Hope. Or, as indicated in paragraph (1), it may be the result of the expected counter-performance becoming valueless; for example if a drastic and unforeseeable collapse in an index of prices means that the debtor will be expected to do demanding and extensive work for practically nothing.

Change must have occurred since obligation was incurred. The next requirement is that the change of circumstances must have occurred after the obligation was incurred. In the case of a contractual obligation this will normally be the time when the contract was made. If, unknown to either party, circumstances which make the contract excessively onerous for one of them already existed at that date, the present Article does not apply. In certain cases, but not in all, the rules on mistake may come into operation.

A building contractor submits an estimate for replacing some stonework in a house. The house owner accepts the estimate. After the old stonework has been removed the contractor asks for an increase in the price on the ground that when he submitted the estimate he did not realise that the price of new stone had recently gone up considerably. The customer is entitled to reply that this is something which the contractor should have checked before submitting the estimate. There has been no change in circumstances since the contract was concluded. The contractor would have no remedy under the present Article.

Circumstances could not have been taken into account. The court's powers will not arise if at the time when the obligation was incurred the debtor took into account, or could reasonably be expected to have taken into account, the possibility or scale of the change of circumstances.

During a period when the traffic in a particular region is periodically interrupted by lorry drivers' blockades, a reasonable person would not choose a route through that region in the hope that on the day in question the road will be clear; a reasonable driver would choose another route.

Hardship cannot be invoked if the matter would have been foreseen and taken into account by a reasonable person in the same situation as the debtor. A professional can reasonably be expected to take into account matters within the area of professional knowledge or experience, such as the fact that a particular market for a certain raw material is known by those in the trade to be very volatile, even if a consumer could not be expected to be aware of this.

In modern times it is reasonable to expect a considerable degree of fluctuation in the values of currencies and in market prices to be taken into account, particularly over the course of a contractual relationship of long duration, but the same would not necessarily apply to altogether exceptional and sudden fluctuations of a kind which no reasonable person could expect.

Assumption of risk. The court will have no power to vary or terminate the obligation if the debtor assumed the risk of the change of circumstances. Even if there was no actual assumption of risk the court will have no power if the circumstances are such that the debtor can reasonably be regarded as having assumed the risk of the change. It would generally be reasonable to take this view if the obligation arose out of an inherently speculative transaction (for instance a sale on the futures market) or if the events which occurred were within the debtor's own control. Where a professional contracts with a consumer it would also generally be reasonable to regard the professional as having assumed the risk of changes of circumstances in relation to matters within the area of professional expertise.

Debtor must have attempted a negotiated settlement. As noted above, the Article does not impose an obligation on the parties to negotiate. In order to encourage negotiated solutions to the problems caused by changes in circumstances it does, however, make it a requirement for relief that the debtor has attempted, reasonably and in good faith, to achieve a satisfactory negotiated adjustment. The words "reasonably and in good faith" imply that a reasonable time must have been allowed for the negotiation process. It is not expressly stated that the debtor's attempt must have failed but this goes without saying. There would be no point in litigation if a satisfactory adjustment has been negotiated. It will be for the debtor to decide whether an offer by the creditor is so inadequate that the risk of a court application is worth taking.

E. The court's powers

The court is given power to terminate the obligation or modify the terms of the contract or juridical act regulating it. The modification must be aimed at making the obligation reasonable and equitable in the new circumstances. In the case of a contractual obligation this will normally mean re-establishing the contractual balance by ensuring that any extra costs caused by the unforeseen circumstances are borne fairly by the parties. They should not be placed solely on one of them. The assumption is that, unlike the risks which result from total impossibility, the risks of unforeseen events are to be shared.

A modification could take various forms, including an extension of the period for performance, an increase or reduction in a price, or an increase or reduction in what is to be supplied or provided. Any modification must only be such, however, as will make the obligation reasonable and equitable in the new circumstances. It would not be reasonable and equitable if the effect of the court's order were to introduce a new hardship or injustice.

In some cases the only option open to the court would be to terminate the obligation. The court will have to fix the time as from which termination takes place, taking into account the extent to which performance has already been made. It is this time which will determine the extent of restitution which will become due. The Article also empowers the court to terminate upon terms, for instance by providing that an indemnity is given. It may also order the payment of an addition to the price or of compensation for a limited period and termination at the end of the period.

Although the court has wide powers, the experience of countries which already have a similar rule suggests that these powers are likely to be used in moderation and in such a way as to avoid any reduction in the vital stability of contractual relations.

NOTES

1. UNIDROIT arts. 6.2.1-6.2.3 are similar to the present Article. The various national laws solve in very different ways the problem of changes of circumstances which make the obligations of one party to a contract much more onerous but which do not amount to impossibility or force majeure. Some accept it as a basis for modifying the contract, others do not.

I. Change of circumstances accepted as basis for modifying contract

2. A famous example, though applying only to administrative contracts, is the FRENCH doctrine of imprévision. Under this doctrine, change of circumstances may lead to the ending of the contract or its modification by the court granting a monetary compensation, see the Gaz de Bordeaux case, Conseil d'Etat 30 March 1916, D.P. 1916 3:25; Ghestin, Billiau & Jamin No.283.

3. Several laws, whether by statute or case law, admit as a general principle that the contractual relationship may be terminated or modified, when as expressed in a GERMAN case, "to maintain the original contract would produce intolerable results incompatible with law and justice". See BGH 25 May 1977, NJW 1977, 2262, 2263; BGH 13 November 1975, NJW 1976, 565, 566. According to another German case, RG 3 February 1922, RGZ 103, 328, 33, the normal consequence is that the contract will not be terminated unless it is impossible to adapt it. The German case law originally was based on the good faith principle in CC § 242 and is today merged in the new CC § 313. In a case of fundamental change of circumstances both parties may claim an agreement to adapt the contract; if that adaptation is not reasonable the party aggrieved by the change may terminate the contractual relationship. Also the DUTCH CC art. 6:258 applies the good faith principle to provide for a termination or modification of the contract in the case of changed circumstances. This provision was "applied" by the Dutch courts under the former Code's good faith rule before the new provision came into force in 1992.

4. Art. 1467 of the ITALIAN CC provides that in contracts for continued or periodic performance or for deferred performance, if extraordinary and unforeseeable events make the performance of one of the parties excessively onerous the party who owes such performance may demand dissolution of contract (CC art. 1467 (1)). The other party may avoid dissolution by offering to modify equitably the conditions of the contract (CC art. 1467(3)). Under ITALIAN law the offer of an equitable modification can be made only by the party against whom dissolution is demanded, while an obligation to renegotiate the terms of the contract is not expressly provided for in CC art. 1467(3). Traditional ITALIAN scholarship does not allow judicial revision of the agreement by the court. See Boselli, Eccessiva onerosità, in Nuoviss. D.I., VI, 1960, 331 ff and in case law Cass. 30 April 1953, no. 1199; 5 January 200, no. 46. More recent Italian scholarship and some judicial decisions, however, allow the court to determine equitable modifications of the contract, if it considers the indications given by the party not to be adequately specified. See for all Macario, Eccessiva onerosità, riconduzione ad equità e poteri del giudice, in Foro it., 1990, I, 573 ff; ID., in Antoniolli-Veneziano, Principles of European Contract Law, 2005, 316; Cass. 25 May 1991, no. 5922; Cass. 11 January 1992, no. 247. SPANISH case law permits the court to end the contract if a less radical way of preserving it cannot be found (Díez Picazo, II 873: "rebus sic stantibus" clause, TS 23 December 1963, 12 November 1990, 23 April 1991, 8 July 1991, 10 February 1997); but the principle is applied only exceptionally ("pacta sunt servanda": see Albaladejo II, 1, § 78); it is noteworthy that over the past century the Supreme Court has applied the clause rebus only to contracts affected by disruptions caused by the Spanish Civil War, and never to duties consisting in payment of money.

5. GREEK CC art. 388 gives the judge wide powers to adapt the contract to new circumstances or to end it altogether. The same solution appears in PORTUGUESE law, if the enforcement of the obligation is against good faith and not covered by the risk of the contract (CC art. 437).

6. In AUSTRIAN CC §§ 936, 1052, 1170a form, by way of analogy, were the statutory starting point foundation for the development recognition of the clausula rebus sic stantibus-rule that a fundamental change of circumstances may, under certain rather restrictive conditions, affect the validity of a contract. The change must have been unforeseeable for both parties at the time of the conclusion of the contract and relate to characteristic features of the type of the relevant agreement (Pisko in Klang II/2, 1st ed., 348 ss). There is, however, no general principle that every contract can be terminated or adapted, if the circumstances change.

7. The POLISH CC art. 357^1 accepts that if an unusual and unexpected change of circumstances causes particular difficulties to one of the parties or endangers one of the parties with an excessive loss – and this situation has not been foreseen by the parties at the time of the conclusion of the contract – the court may modify the amount of performance, the way of performance or even dissolve the contract. The same is true in SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 112.

8. In a few decisions NORDIC courts, which generally do not accept change of circumstances as a ground for the revision of a contract, have modified the terms of long-lasting continuing contracts, at first by invoking an "implied condition" but lately by applying § 36 of the Contracts Act on unconscionable clauses, see for DENMARK, Gomard, Kontraktsret 179 ff, and Bryde Andersen & Lookofsky 188 ff, who comparing Danish law with UNIDROIT maintain that Danish courts may probably not adapt the contract as provided in UNIDROIT art. 6.2.3. See for FINLAND, Wilhelmsson, Standardavtal 130 ff; for SWEDEN, Hellner, Speciell avtalsrätt II; 2, 59 ff. In the U.S. change of circumstance has made a hesitant appearance, see e.g. Aluminum Company of America v. Essex Group 499 F.Supp 53 (W.D.Pa. 1980); U.C.C. § 2-615 and Restatement 2d. of Contracts, § 261 comment (a). For any contract concluded under the CZECH law (both civil and commercial contracts), the debtor of an obligation is discharged if the performance becomes strictly impossible (CC § 575).

9. § 97 of the ESTONIAN LOA provides that the injured party may demand (i.e. file the court action) amendment of the contract if the circumstances unexpectedly change after the conclusion of the contract and this results in a material change in the balance of the obligations of the parties due to which the costs of one party for the performance of an obligation increase significantly or the value of that which is to be received from the other party under the contract decreases significantly. Provided that the risk of a change in the circumstances is not borne by the injured party, the amendment of a contract may also be demanded if the circumstances under which the contract was entered into had already changed before the contract was entered into but became known to the injured party after the contract was entered into. Only if the amendment of the contract is obviously not possible or would not be reasonable with respect to the other party, may the aggrieved party terminate the contractual relationship by unilateral notice (see also Varul et al (-Kull) § 97, nos. 4.5.1., 4.6). In SLOVAK law only objective impossibility effects termination of the obligation (CC § 575). The court may modify only the compensation of damage or a contractual penalty (Ccom art. 301).

10. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 241 the court may amend a contract when it becomes injurious to any substantial lawful interest of one of the parties in consequence of a circumstance arising in the long-term relationship of the parties following the conclusion of the contract. Clausula rebus sic stantibus.

II. Change of circumstances not accepted as basis for modification

11. Some legal systems do not give any relief. This is the case for FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law except for administrative contracts, see note 1 above, though in Belgium relief may be given on the basis of other doctrines, such as abuse of right; see generally Philippe. ENGLISH law seems to reject any notion of relief for changed circumstances not amounting to impossibility: Davis Contractors v. Fareham

Urban District Council [1956] AC 696 The only possible exception, frustration of the venture, may follow from the isolated decision in Krell v. Henry [1903] 2 KB 740 where a change of circumstances rendered the contract pointless. It has to be said, however, that the courts have on occasion been ready to interpret the agreement in such a way that it will not apply when there has been a severe change of circumstances: Staffordshire Area Health Authority v. South Staffordshire Waterworks Co. [1978] 1 WLR 1387 (effect of drop in value of currency over a long period). In SCOTTISH law it is accepted that a contract may be frustrated by a change of circumstances, but the effect is to bring the contractual relationship to an end, not to permit modification or termination by a court: see McBryde chapter 21. The law of IRELAND appears to be the same as English law, see Clark 422-438. CISG art. 79 appears to be limited to cases of impossibility though there is disagreement among the various commentators. The fundamental principle of the CZECH law (except the abovementioned situation of strictly impossible performance), is that any modification of contractual obligations in the case of simple change of circumstances cannot be recognised. A change of circumstances does not have any influence on the scope of contractual obligations. So the principle is that parties are bound whatever happens to fulfil their obligation if performance is still possible. The result is that a contract can be modified only if a partial impossibility of performance is found by the judge. Another sort of exception exists: a contractual obligation to conclude a future contract or an obligation to supplement the missing content of a contract is extinguished in the case of a change of circumstances under condition of notification of the creditor of the change of circumstances without undue delay. Furthermore, as a result of the power to construe contracts (cf. Ccom art. 292.5) a judge can by way of interpretation in concreto proceed to some justified modifications of the content or extent of interpreted contractual obligations or to some adaptations of these obligations if the judge construes the contract after the change of circumstances has occurred. In SLOVAK law a change of circumstances would not be a basis for a modification of an obligation by a court.

12. See generally Zweigert and Kötz 516-536; Abas; Philippe; Rodière and Tallon; Chambre de Commerce Internationale: Force majeure et imprévision; on CISG art. 79 see Bianca & Bonell (-Tallon) 572; Honnold § 423 ff; von Caemmerer and Schlechtriem 675 ff.

III.–1:111: Tacit prolongation

Where a contract provides for continuous or repeated performance of obligations for a definite period and the obligations continue to be performed by both parties after that period has expired, the contract becomes a contract for an indefinite period, unless the circumstances are inconsistent with the tacit consent of the parties to such prolongation.

General

This Article expresses a rule commonly found in relation to leases, contracts of commercial agency and other similar contracts of a continuing nature. However it can be regarded as a rule of general application to any contract providing for continuing or repeated performance of obligations for a definite period. The thinking behind it is that if the parties choose, to the knowledge of each other and without objection from either, to continue performing the obligations under the contract, they are tacitly agreeing to its prolongation, unless the circumstances are inconsistent with such consent. The prolongation will be on the same terms so far as this is consistent with the new circumstances, with the exception that the contract becomes one for an indefinite period. The result is that either party will be able to terminate the contractual relationship by giving a reasonable period of notice. See III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (2).

For the application of this rule to the leases of goods, see the Comments to IV.B.–2:103 (Tacit prolongation).

NOTES

1. Reference may be made to the notes on IV.B.–2:103 (Tacit prolongation) for the application of this doctrine in relation to leases of goods, to the notes on IV.D.–1:103 (Duration of the mandate contract) for its application to mandate contracts and to the notes on IV.E.–2:301 (Contract for a definite period) for its application in relation to commercial agency, franchise and distributorship contracts.
2. Under GERMAN law there is no clear general tendency to restrict termination by rules on tacit prolongation. On the one hand parties' attempts to agree on such a rule are in some cases analysed as a circumvention of the prohibition of eternally binding contracts, cf. Oetker, Das Dauerschuldverhältnis und seine Beendigung, 624 et seq. On the other hand a party who continues performance after termination, is seen contravening good faith if it subsequently denies being bound to the contract.

CHAPTER 2: PERFORMANCE

III.–2:101: Place of performance

(1) If the place of performance of an obligation cannot be otherwise determined from the terms regulating the obligation it is:

(a) in the case of a monetary obligation, the creditor's place of business;

(b) in the case of any other obligation, the debtor's place of business.

(2) For the purposes of the preceding paragraph:

(a) if a party has more than one place of business, the place of business is that which has the closest relationship to the obligation; and

(b) if a party does not have a place of business, or the obligation does not relate to a business matter, the habitual residence is substituted.

(3) If, in a case to which paragraph (1) applies, a party causes any increase in the expenses incidental to performance by a change in place of business or habitual residence subsequent to the time when the obligation was incurred, that party is obliged to bear the increase.

A. Significance

The place of performance is significant in several respects. A party who is to perform services will have to bear the inconvenience and the costs of appearing at the place and tendering performance there. For a debtor to tender or offer performance at a wrong place will often constitute a non-performance. In a contract for the delivery of goods the party who is to perform will in general have to bear the costs and carry the risk of the goods until they have been put at the disposal of the creditor at the place of performance. A creditor who makes a mistake about the place of performance and who accordingly is unable to receive performance in due time may also fail to perform obligations or may bear the risk of a non-performance by the debtor.

This makes it very important to have a clear rule as the place of performance when that has not been agreed by the parties, the more so because the laws of the Member States do not reach the same results, particularly when the question is the place of performance of a monetary obligation. The Article adopts the solution found in the majority of the national systems and international conventions.

B. Place otherwise determinable

Very often the place of performance is fixed by, or otherwise determinable from, a contract. A catering company will bring the food and cater for the party at the address given to the company by the host. A contract for the sale of goods may provide for the goods to be delivered to a particular place. In many cases terms derived from usages and practices will determine the place of performance. In many cases the place of performance will be only tacitly agreed and in such cases the knowledge of the parties at the time of concluding the contract may be relevant. For example, if both parties to a contract for the sale of bulky goods know that the goods are in a third country and are required there by the buyer, it may be easy to conclude that there is a tacit agreement that the goods are to be delivered there. Similar situations can arise in relation to contracts for the provision of services.

Company A which has its headquarters with an accounts department and a shipbuilding yard in Hamburg runs a shipbuilding yard in Bremerhaven as well. By an email to A in Hamburg B, who is a shipowner in London, asks if A can carry out certain repairs to his ship which, known to both parties, is on its way to Bremerhaven. A offers to do the work and quotes a price which A accepts. Nothing is said about the place of performance but because both parties know the ship is going to Bremerhaven it is reasonable to suppose that there was a tacit agreement that the ship is to be repaired there. It would be contrary to good faith for A to remain silent if intending to do the repair in Hamburg.

Similarly, the place of performance may be fixed by, or otherwise determinable from, the terms of a unilateral juridical act, a law, a court order, or a usage or practice imposing or regulating the obligation.

C. Monetary obligations

If the place of performance is not otherwise determinable, the place of performance of a monetary obligation is normally the creditor's place of business. "The debtor must seek the creditor". This rule will leave the debtor with a free choice of how to send or transfer the money to the creditor, who, when the debtor carries the risk of transmission, will have no right to interfere with the mode of transportation or transfer used.

Illustration 2
In the facts given in Illustration 1, the payment for the repair is to be made to Hamburg.

D. Other obligations

As far as non-monetary obligations are concerned, the place of performance is normally the debtor’s place of business. This is in conformity with the general principle that in cases of doubt the debtor is assumed to have undertaken the least burdensome obligation.

E. The "place of business"

It is difficult to give an exact definition of "place of business". In most cases it is a party's permanent and regular place for the transaction of general business and not a temporary place of sojourn during sales negotiations.

Illustration 3
Seller A wants to make a sales drive in country B and hires salesrooms in a hotel in the capital of B for a week. From these rooms it solicits orders from buyers. Thereafter the salesrooms are closed down. A has not had a place of business in the capital of B.

F. Several places of business

If a party at whose place of business performance is to be made has more than one place of business, the place of performance is that which has the closest connection with the obligation. The word “party” here refers to a party to the debtor/creditor relationship: it may, depending on the facts, be either the debtor or the creditor.

Illustration 4
A firm has two places of business – a headquarters where legal and other paperwork is done and a factory where manufacturing and delivery take place. It concludes a complicated contract, requiring a lot of negotiation over several weeks and many meetings at the headquarters, for the manufacture of a piece of machinery. The first place of business, the headquarters, has more connection with the contract. The second place of business, the factory, has more connection with the firm’s obligation under the contract. It is the second place of business where the machinery is to be produced.

G. Habitual residence

If a party at whose place of business performance would normally be made has no place of business, or if the obligation relates to a non-business matter, performance is to be effected at that party’s habitual residence. Habitual residence is a "factual" not a "legal" concept. A person’s habitual residence is at the place where that person actually lives, regardless of whether the residence is lawful, and whether the person sometimes goes to another place to stay for some time, provided that the person normally returns to the first place, see Resolution 72 of the Council of Europe of 18 January 1972.

I. Change of the place of business or habitual residence

The place of performance is the party's place of business (or habitual residence) at the time when performance falls due. However, if the party causes an increase in the cost of performance by the other party by changing a place of business (or habitual residence) between the time when the obligation was incurred and the time when performance falls due, that party must bear the increase. This is provided for by paragraph (3) of the Article. In assessing the impact of this provision it must be borne in mind that it operates only in cases to which paragraph (1) applies. It has no effect in the many normal cases where the place of performance is determinable from the terms regulating the obligation. A party who intends to change a place of business can easily displace paragraph (3) by making it clear at the time of contracting that performance will be due at the new place of business. It must also be borne in mind that a creditor who causes a debtor’s non-performance (as might sometimes happen in the case of an uncommunicated change in the place where performance is to be made) has no remedy for that non-performance. (III.–3:101 (Remedies available) paragraph (3)).

NOTES

I. Monetary obligations

1. In many systems the place of performance of a monetary obligation, if it has not been agreed expressly, is the creditor's residence or place of business, see for the NORDIC countries Instrument of Debts Acts (1938) § 3(1); GREECE CC art. 321(1); ENGLAND and IRELAND, Chitty para. 21-043; SCOTLAND, Bank of Scotland v. Seitz 1990 SLT 584, I.H.; ITALY CC art. 1182(3) (the rules set forth in art. 1182 are default rules, see Gazzoni (2004), p. 573); NETHERLANDS CC’s arts. 6:115 - 6:118, especially art. 6:116; PORTUGAL CC art. 774; POLAND CC art. 454 § 1; ESTONIA LOA § 85(2) sentence 1; SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 337. In CZECH law the rule is the same, under Ccom art. 338, for the performance of commercial monetary obligations. However, the general principle for other monetary obligations is that the place of performance is the debtor's residence or place of business unless otherwise agreed, see CC § 567. Every monetary obligation (commercial or non- commercial) may also be settled by the debtor through a bank by crediting the payment to the creditor's account (CC § 567.2; Ccom art. 339.1).

2. Usually, the place of payment is the creditor's place of business at the time of payment, subject to provisions protecting the interests of the debtor in case the place of payment is different from the place at the time of the conclusion of the contract, see AUSTRIAN CC § 905(2); NORDIC Instruments of Debts Acts § 3(1) second sentence; GERMANY CC § 270(3); GREECE CC art. 322; ITALY CC art. 1182(3); NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:117; PORTUGAL CC arts. 772(2) and 775; POLAND CC art. 454 § 1; SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 337.2; CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 337.2; and SLOVENIA LOA § 295. CISG art. 57 is similar; see also ULIS art.59 and UNIDROIT art. 6.1.6(1)(a). In ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law, however, the place is the creditor's place of business at the time the contract is made: Chitty para. 21-043, Gloag & Henderson para. 3.29. Under ESTONIAN law, although the place of payment is determined by the creditor's place of business at the time when the obligation arose (LOA § 85(2) sentence 1), the creditor may require performance of the obligation at the changed place of business, provided that the creditor bears any related additional expenses and risks (LOA § 85(3), see also Varul et al (-Varul) § 85, no. 4.4.).

3. In some of the laws the debtor's residence or place of business is the place of performance of a money obligation, see SPANISH CC art. 1171(3); FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1247(3), except that if the price for goods is payable on delivery it is payable at the place of delivery, arts. 1609 and 1651. In CZECH Law, this general rule of payment, i.e. performance of monetary obligation, in the debtor's residence or place of business can be found in CC § 567 but this principle is applicable only if not otherwise stated by a statutory disposition, i.e. only for non-commercial obligations, furthermore if not otherwise agreed. The debtor who sends money to the creditor bears the risk of loss or delay, see for Belgian law Cass. 6 January 1972, Arr.Cass., 441; Cass. 23 September 1982, Pas. I, 118; similarly Luxembourg District Court 31 January 1874, 1, 128.

4. In GERMAN law it is the debtor's place of business which for the purposes of jurisdiction and venue is the place of performance, see CC §§ 269 and 270(4). However, the debtor is responsible for transferring the money to the creditor and bears both the expense and the risk of loss and of delay in transfer, CC § 270. The former case law, which left the risk of delay with the creditor (RG 11 January 1912, RGZ 78, 137, 140; BGH 5 December 1963, NJW 1969, 499), is overruled by the ECJ, 3 April 2008, ECJRep 2008 (not yet published) (01051 Telecom GmbH/Deutsche Telekom) as contrary to the Late Payment Directive 2000/35/EC (see Gebauer/Wiedmann (-Schmidt-Kessel), Zahlungszeit und Verzug no. 19-23). For a similar outcome under ESTONIAN law see CCP § 89(2). Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 292(1) unless otherwise provided by legal regulation, the place of performance of a monetary obligation is the creditor's domicile or registered place of business.

II. Non-monetary obligations

5. It seems to be generally accepted that for obligations other than monetary obligations the place of performance is, unless otherwise agreed, the debtor's residence or place of business (e.g. in AUSTRIA according to CC § 905(1) if the parties did not agree on another place of performance). This is a general rule of CZECH civil law and is applicable as abovementioned for non-commercial non-monetary obligations (CC § 567).

6. However, some laws provide that the place of performance of an obligation relating to specific goods is the situs of the goods: FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, CCs art. 1247(1); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, for sale of goods, see Sale of Goods Act s. 29(2); IRELAND, Sale of Goods Act 1893 s. 29(1); ITALY, CC art. 1182(2), but see also CC art. 1510 concerning the delivery of movables, which should take place where the thing was at the time of the sale if such place was known to the parties, otherwise at the domicile or place of business of the seller; NETHERLANDS, CC art 6:41(a); PORTUGAL, CC art. 773; SPAIN, CC art. 1171(1) and (2); FINLAND and SWEDEN, SGA § 6; ESTONIA, LOA § 85(2), (3). According to the SLOVAK Ccom art. 336 the debtor is obliged to perform the obligation not at the debtor's registered place of business but at the relevant business premises if the obligation arose in connection with those business premises.

7. According to the POLISH CC art. 454 § 1 the place of performance of a non-monetary obligation, if it is not agreed and does not appear from the nature of the obligation, is the place of the debtor's seat at the time of the conclusion of the contract. The same applies in SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 294. The same rule is expressly stated in CZECH law for commercial non- monetary obligations: if the place where performance is to be rendered is not specified in the contract, and nothing else ensues from the nature of the obligation, the debtor must render performance at the place of the debtor's seat, place of business or home address, at the time when the contract is concluded (Ccom art. 336).

8. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 278(1) the place of performance is the domicile or registered place of business of the debtor unless (a) it is otherwise provided by legal regulation (b) the object or purpose of the service suggests otherwise or (c) the object of the service is at a different location, which is known to the parties. Under CC § 278(2) if the object of a service is to be sent to a place other than the domicile or registered place of business of the debtor, and if such place or an intermediate location has not been stipulated as the place of delivery, performance is regarded as accomplished when the debtor delivers the object to the beneficiary, a shipping agent, or a carrier. In the case of consumer contracts, performance is deemed to be effected upon delivery to the consumer. Under CC § 278(3) if the debtor delivers the thing by its own means of transportation or through its representative, the place of performance is the domicile or registered place of business of the latter. Under CC § 278(4) regarding contracts between economic organisations, the place of performance is the registered office (place of business) of the beneficiary, unless otherwise requested by the beneficiary, or the destination if performance is effected through a carrier. Legal regulations can prescribe otherwise. Under § 279 if one of the contracting parties changes domicile or registered address prior to performance, that party bears the extra expenses resulting from the change. The risk of damage falls on the other contracting party upon performance, unless otherwise provided by law.

9. See also CISG art. 31, ULIS art. 23(2) and Unidroit art. 6.1.6. Paragraph (2) of the Article is based on CISG art. 10.

III.–2:102: Time of performance

(1) If the time at which, or a period of time within which, an obligation is to be performed cannot otherwise be determined from the terms regulating the obligation it must be performed within a reasonable time after it arises.

(2) If a period of time within which the obligation is to be performed can be determined from the terms regulating the obligation, the obligation may be performed at any time within that period chosen by the debtor unless the circumstances of the case indicate that the creditor is to choose the time.

(3) Unless the parties have agreed otherwise, a business must perform the obligations incurred under a contract concluded at a distance for the supply of goods, other assets or services to a consumer no later than 30 days after the contract was concluded.

(4) If a business has an obligation to reimburse money received from a consumer for goods, other assets or services supplied, the reimbursement must be made as soon as possible and in any case no later than 30 days after the obligation arose.

COMMENTS

A. Significance

The time for performance has significance in several connections. An early performance by a party may be, and a late performance is almost always, a non-performance of an obligation. A party who is to receive performance which is duly tendered at the time for performance and who does not do so at that time will often bear the risk of performance not being effected.

B. Time determinable from the terms regulating the obligation

If a time for performance is otherwise determinable from the terms regulating the obligation, performance must be made at that time. This may be a date which is fixed by the calendar, for instance "delivery on October 15", or it may be otherwise determined.

Illustration 1
A and B have agreed that B will begin to harvest A's crop one week after A has called for it. The time is determinable from the contract.

C. Performance within a period of time

It may also occur that under the terms regulating the obligation the time of performance is to be within a period of time or by a certain time. In such a case it goes without saying that performance is to be made within that time. Paragraph (2) deals with the question of which party may choose the actual time when performance is to be made within the period. Normally the choice is the debtor’s but the circumstances may indicate otherwise.

An example of where the time for performance is to be determined by the creditor is the f.o.b. sale where delivery is to be made during a period of time. Here it is for the buyer to provide the vessel (see INCOTERMS 1990 f.o.b. under B7) and thus decide the date when the goods will be received on board the ship.

It may follow from the circumstances of the case that the period of time fixed for the performance begins as soon as the contract is made and as soon as the creditor - or in an appropriate case the debtor - requires performance.

A makes an agreement with bank B for a cash-credit in favour of A up to €100,000. The agreement does not mention anything about when A can begin to draw money under the credit, but it follows from the circumstances that A can start drawing at once.

D. Performance within reasonable time

If no time when, or period within which, performance is to take place is otherwise determinable from the terms regulating the obligation, performance is to be made within a reasonable time after the obligation arises. What is a reasonable time is a question of fact depending upon such factors as the nature of the goods or services to be supplied. In the case of a monetary obligation it will not be reasonable to expect performance before the amount has been quantified and, in some cases, an invoice rendered.

NOTES

I. Time of performance agreed

1. It follows from the parties' freedom of contract that an agreed time for performance rules.

II. No time for performance agreed

2. The rule in paragraph (1) is in accordance with the rule in the U.K. Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 29(3); IRISH Sale of Goods Act 1893 s. 29 and Macauley v. Horgan [1925] I.R. 1; FINNISH and SWEDISH SGA § 9(1); ESTONIAN LOA § 82(3). It has also been adopted by CISG art. 33(c) and UNIDROIT art. 6.1.1(c).

3. Most of the other laws provide rules which are different but which will often bring about the same or very similar results as the rule on performance within a reasonable time laid down in paragraph (1). See for FRANCE CC art. 1901 and Ponsard & Blondel nos. 136 and 137; AUSTRIA, CC § 904; DENMARK, Sales Act § 12; GERMANY, CC § 271(1); GREECE, CC art. 323; ITALY, CC art. 1183; NETHERLANDS, CC art. 6:38; PORTUGAL CC art. 777(1); ITALIAN CC art. 1183(1), according to which, in the absence of agreement between the parties, the time is fixed by the judge; PORTUGUESE CC art. 777(2); SLOVENIA LOA § 289; and SPAIN, CC art. 1128, under which the court may fix the time for performance, but only where the contracts provide for a time limit and this limit is not agreed. As a general rule, the Spanish CC (art. 1500) requires immediate performance when the other party tenders its own performance, unless the contract provides otherwise. In GERMANY the rule on immediate performance is tempered by the principle of good faith, CC § 242, and by the fault principle, CC §§ 280(1) sentence 2, 286(4), and the same applies in DENMARK (semble), Court of Appeal (East) 31 March 1987, U.f.R.

1987, 738; GREECE, CC art. 288; BELGIUM and the NETHERLANDS, CC art. 6:2. Under the CZECH CC, § 563 if no time for performance has been agreed, stipulated by some written provision or specified by a judgment, the debtor is obliged to render performance on the first day following the day when performance was requested by the creditor and under the Ccom, art. 340.2 the creditor of a commercial obligation has a right to require performance of this obligation immediately after conclusion of a contract if the time of performance is not stated; in this situation, the debtor is obliged to perform the obligation without undue delay. However usage, the nature of the contract or other circumstances will often prevent the creditor from demanding immediate performance:

4. Under the POLISH CC art. 455, if the time of performance is not defined or apparent from the nature of the obligation, the obligation should be performed upon demand (in a reasonable period after the creditor's demand). In SLOVAK law, if the time of performance cannot be determined from the contract, legal regulation or decision, the debtor is obliged to perform on the first day after the demand of the creditor (CC § 563). For business matters, Ccom art. 340 determines that the debtor is obliged to perform without any delay on the demand of the creditor. The creditor is entitled to demand performance immediately after the formation of the contract.

5. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 280(1) if the time of performance is not specified, (a) either of the parties may demand simultaneous performance by the other party, (b) in the case of a gratuitous contract, the beneficiary is entitled to invite the debtor to tender performance at any time.

III. Performance within a period of time

6. The rule in paragraph (2) seems to be widely accepted, see BELGIAN CC art. 1187; GERMAN CC § 271(2), ESTONIAN LOA § 82(2), ITALIAN CC art. 1184 and PORTUGUESE CC art. 779. The same rule probably applies in FRANCE, compare CC art. 1187 and Malaurie & Aynès no. 1100; in DENMARK, see Sales Act § 13, which applies to other kinds of contract also; and FINLAND and SWEDEN, SGA § 9(2). See also CISG art. 33(b) and Unidroit art. 6.1.1(b). In CZECH Commercial Law, the same rule exists as a clear consequence of expressly stipulated provision: If the time of performance is determined to the advantage of the debtor, the creditor is not entitled to demand performance of the obligation prior to this time; however, the debtor may perform the obligation earlier than at the determined time. (Ccom art. 342.2) The rule mentioned in the paragraph (2) of the Article is applied in SLOVAK law although it is not expressly specified in legislation.

III.–2:103: Early performance

(1) A creditor may reject an offer to perform before performance is due unless the early performance would not cause the creditor unreasonable prejudice.

(2) A creditor's acceptance of early performance does not affect the time fixed for the performance by the creditor of any reciprocal obligation.

COMMENTS

A rule to the effect that a debtor may always perform the obligation early would not meet the needs of modern contractual relations. Usually the performance is scheduled in accordance with the creditor's activities and availability and an earlier performance may cause the creditor extra expense or inconvenience.

Illustration 1
A sells to B 10 tons of perishable goods. The date of delivery provided in the contract is October 1. Since the ship on which the goods were loaded arrives at the place of destination earlier than expected, A asks B to take delivery of the goods on September 20. B is entitled to refuse the earlier performance.

On the other hand, although some of the laws always allow the creditor to decline to receive early performance, there is no reason to allow this when the creditor will not suffer any inconvenience through early performance and has no other legitimate interest in refusing.

The facts are the same as in Illustration No. 1, except that B has storage room available and A is ready to cover the expenses and to carry the risk for the storage of the goods during the period from September 20 to October 1. B must accept the earlier performance, having no legitimate interest in refusing.

The rule requiring acceptance of an early tender if it would not cause the creditor unreasonable prejudice will usually apply in the case of monetary obligations, where the creditor faces no prejudice in receiving the money before the expected time, provided that an earlier payment does not affect the interest due.

The date for the payment of the price fixed in a contract is July, 1. In order to avoid late payment, the debtor instructs its bank to transfer the funds to the creditor's account well in advance. The price is credited to the creditor's account on June 20. The creditor may not refuse the payment.

A party's acceptance of an earlier performance does not affect the time fixed for the performance of that party's own obligation, even if the other party's right to withhold performance is lost.

The facts are the same as in Illustration 2 with the addition that payment is to be made at the time agreed for delivery on October 1 when the goods are to be handed over to

B. B is not obliged to pay the price when he receives the goods on September 20. A cannot withhold the goods because it is not paid on September 20.

This is, however, only a default rule. The terms regulating the creditor's reciprocal obligation may provide for it to be performed at a time which is to be determined by reference to the actual time of the debtor's performance even if that is early.

NOTES

I. Early tender may be refused

1. An early tender may be refused in SPAIN (CC art. 1127: time of performance is presumed to have been fixed for the benefit of both the parties. Similarly the creditor cannot be compelled to accept early performance under AUSTRIAN law: CC § 1413 or in the CZECH REPUBLIC (Ccom art. 342.1) unless the time for performance has been fixed exclusively in favour of the debtor (Ccom art. 342.2 and 342.3).

2. In ENGLISH and SCOTTISH laws a buyer of goods may refuse an early tender, see Benjamin § 8-039, and in DENMARK the buyer may do so if an early delivery of the goods will amount to a substantial breach of contract: Nørager-Nielsen & Theilgaard 293. In ITALY the creditor may refuse early performance but not if the time was fixed in the interests only of the debtor as provided by CC art. 1184 (see di Majo 167-168). On the other side, CC art. 1185 states that if time is fixed in favour of the creditor, the creditor may claim performance before it becomes due, but always within the limits set by the fair dealing principle, see Gazzoni (2004), 574. CISG art. 52(1) provides that the buyer may take delivery or refuse to take delivery but this rule is probably subject to the good-faith principle provided in art. 7(1), see Bianca & Bonell (-Will) 380. In SLOVAKIA, in business matters, an early tender may be refused, if the time of performance is determined in favour of the creditor or in favour of both of the contracting parties (Ccom art. 342).

II. Early tender must be accepted

3. In some laws there is a presumption that the time for performance is fixed in favour of the debtor, and that, therefore, the creditor must accept an early performance, see on BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURG law CC art. 1187; GREEK CC art. 324; POLISH CC art. 457; SLOVAK CC § 342 for business matter; SLOVENIAN LOA § 290; ESTONIAN LOA § 84(1); PORTUGUESE CC art. 777(1) and 779 (see e.g. Leitão II 159 ff.). The same presumption is found in GERMAN law (CC § 271(2), DUTCH law (CC art. 6:39) and, for money debts, NORDIC law, see Instrument of Debts Act § 5 (note that in FINNISH law it is said that a creditor need not accept early performance of an interest-bearing money obligation if not compensated for loss of the interest which would have been received according to the contract: Hakulinen, Velkakirjelaki 61). The presumption is rebutted when this follows from the agreement or from the circumstances of the case. Thus in FRANCE, BELGIUM, LUXEMBOURG and DENMARK money debts carrying interest cannot be repaid in advance, and a person who has agreed to provide services at a certain time cannot choose to perform earlier. In the CZECH REPUBLIC, money debts can be paid in advance but the general commercial rule is that if the debtor settles a monetary obligation prior to the determined time of performance, the debtor may not, without the creditor's consent, deduct an amount corresponding to the interest on the sum in respect of the length of time by which payment was premature (Ccom art. 343). This rule is not applicable to consumer's debts which can be paid in advance and this payment gives a right to modify the interest (see art. 11, L. 321/2001 Sb., 17 August 2001). Under ESTONIAN law, the creditor should have a legitimate interest in order to refuse early performance. While the creditor may claim interest until the due date (LOA § 84(4), except in consumer credit contracts, where interest may be claimed for the first nine months of a credit contract (LOA § 411(1), (3)), the creditor has generally no legitimate interest to refuse money debts being repaid in advance (Varul et al (-Varul) § 84 no. 4.6.). Additional expenses arising from the early performance should not generally constitute legitimate interest to refuse as those are borne by the debtor (LOA 84 (3)). Under GERMAN law early repayment of monetary loans at a fixed interest rate is possible only in exceptional circumstances and subject to paying compensation to the lender, see CC § 490(2); but under consumer credit agreements early repayment is always possible without compensation, CC § 489(1) no. 2, which is based on Consumer Credit Directive (2008/48/EC) art. 16.

III. No duty for the creditor to perform earlier

4. The rule in paragraph (2), under which an earlier performance does not affect the time for performance of the receiving party's obligation, seems to be accepted by those systems which have addressed the issue, see e.g. for DANISH law, Nørager-Nielsen & Theilgaard 293 and for SWEDISH LAW, Ramberg, Köplagen 263 and for CZECH LAW, where the general principle is expressly recognised that an obligation cannot be modified in any case without the consent of the parties concerned (CC §§ 493 and 516.1). ESTONIAN LOA § 84(2) specifies that the rule takes effect only if a time for the creditor's own performance has been set irrespective of the performance of the other party's obligations.

5. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 282 (2) a debtor may complete performance before the deadline or prior to the initial date of the performance period with the consent of the creditor. In the absence of consent, the creditor must observe the provisions on responsible custody. In the case of monetary obligations CC § 292 (2) provides that the creditor must accept performance that is provided before the deadline or prior to the initial date of the performance period; in such cases, no interest or compensation is due for the period between performance and the deadline. Any agreement between the parties concerning interest or compensation, as such agreements are not permitted by law, is void; the invalidity does not affect other provisions of the contract.

6. UNIDROIT art. 6.1.5(1) and (2) are similar to the Article.

III.–2:104: Order of performance

If the order of performance of reciprocal obligations cannot be otherwise determined from the terms regulating the obligations then, to the extent that the obligations can be performed simultaneously, the parties are bound to perform simultaneously unless the circumstances indicate otherwise.

COMMENTS

Where there are reciprocal obligations it must be determined whether the parties are to perform their obligations simultaneously or whether one is to perform before the other.

In many cases the matter will be resolved by the terms regulating the obligations. It will often be expressly or tacitly agreed, for example, that one party to a contract must perform before the other. Usages and practices may be particularly important. In contracts for services it is common to find the custom, "work first, payment later", which may reflect the fact that the employer is a better credit risk than the service provider or may simply be a reflection of market power or social standing.

> A employs B to spend three afternoons a week tending the garden of A's villa. The time for payment is not discussed when the contract is made. B demands payment in advance. A may refuse to pay B until each afternoon's work has been done.

There may, however, be a usage to the effect that A can refuse to pay in advance.

> C books theatre tickets in advance over the phone and comes to collect them from the box office. There will almost certainly be a usage to the effect that the theatre may demand payment before A is admitted to the show.

Even where simultaneous performance is feasible there may be a usage to the effect that one party must perform before the other. Thus it is possible for food in a restaurant to be handed over in exchange for an immediate cash payment, as happens in some cheaper restaurants and bars; but in other types of restaurant the usage may be that the customer is obliged to pay only after the meal has been finished.

This Article provides a default rule for the situation where the question of the order of performance is not solved by the terms regulating the obligations. The default rule is to the effect that, where performances can be rendered simultaneously, the parties are in general bound to perform simultaneously. This is because the party who is to perform first will necessarily have to extend credit (in one form or another) to the other party, thereby incurring a risk that the other will default when the time for the counter-performance comes. This additional risk is avoided if the performances are made simultaneously. Thus it is the general rule in sales contracts that, unless otherwise agreed, delivery and payment are to be simultaneous.

However, simultaneous performance is often impracticable. A person employing a builder cannot realistically be expected to pay the builder brick by brick. Either the employer must pay in advance or, as is more usual, the builder must complete some or all of the work before payment. The Article does not provide a rule as to which party should perform first if simultaneous performance is not appropriate. The variety of circumstances is too great for this to be practical. Almost every general rule would require many exceptions. Sometimes the very nature of the obligations will provide the answer. For example, an obligation to co-operate in order to enable a main obligation to be performed will, of its very nature, fall to be performed first. In contractual cases the gap caused by the absence of a default rule may have to be filled by the creation of an implied term, having regard in particular to the nature and purpose of the contract; the circumstances in which the contract was concluded; and the requirements of good faith and fair dealing.

Hamlet engages a troupe of players to perform at his country house. Nothing is said about when payment is due. Whether the players may demand payment in advance will depend on usages in the country or previous practices between the parties. If there are none, the question will depend on other factors such as whether the play to be performed had to be specially written and rehearsed.

NOTES

1. This provision is in line with the law in most jurisdictions in Europe, such as AUSTRIA, CC § 904 (expressly for sales contracts in CC § 1062 and barters in CC § 1052); FRANCE (case-law as set out by Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], n° 616); GERMANY CC § 320 (and sometimes CC § 273 or Ccom § 369); SLOVENIA LOA § 101; SPAIN, CC arts. 1124 and 1500; DENMARK Sales Act § 14; POLAND CC art. 488 § 1; ESTONIA LOA § 82(5); ENGLAND (see Beale, 28-34 and Treitel, Contract 17-013–17-023); SWEDEN (see e.g. Almén, 133, Hellner, Hager and Persson, 49 and Ramberg, Köplagen 78 and 202 et seq.); and SCOTLAND (expressly for sales contracts in the Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 28) - and with UNIDROIT art. 6.1.4. In other European jurisdictions, the rule is the same although there is no express provision. This is the case in ITALY, GREECE, THE NETHERLANDS and in the CZECH REPUBLIC, where the rule set forth in Italian CC art. 1460, Greek CC art. 374, Dutch CC art. 6:52 or Czech law (CC § 560; Ccom art. 325) is not concerned with the simultaneity of performance, but with the consequences of failure to respect that simultaneity. Under the Italian CC art. 1460 andGreek CC art. 374, for example, each party may refuse to perform if the other party does not perform or offer to perform at the same time, unless different times for performance have been established by the parties or appear from the nature of the contract. The right to refuse performance, however, is limited by the good faith principle (art. 1460(2)), therefore refusal is justified only if the other party's failure to perform is of a serious nature (see Cass, 4743/1998, Giust.civ.Mass. 1998, 998, and Cass. 7 November 2005, no. 21479, Dir. e Giust. 2005, fasc. 46, 14). The position is similar in PORTUGAL. According to art. 376 of the Greek CC, if one of the parties has partially fulfilled an obligation, the other party may not refuse counter-performance, when this refusal contravenes the good faith principle under the special circumstances and in particular when the part of the remaining performance is not substantial.
2. In all systems, the rule that performances are due simultaneously is only a default rule which will not apply if the parties have agreed otherwise, for example when credit is given by one party to the other, or if the circumstances make it inappropriate, e.g. when the performance by one party is necessary before the other party can perform (see e.g. in BELGIUM, Cass. 5 May 1971, Arr. 871, RW 1971-72, 147, JT 1972, 85). In the CZECH REPUBLIC the rule of simultaneous performance applicable to reciprocal obligations is a sort of exception to the ordinary rules on when performance is required. Normally a debtor has to perform, if not otherwise agreed, on the first day following the day when the creditor has requested performance for non-commercial obligations, (see CC § 563) or without undue delay after the request for commercial obligations (Ccom art. 340). In SLOVAKIA the order of performance results from the contract, legal regulation or from the nature of the obligation. CC § 560 provides that if the parties are bound to perform simultaneously, performance can be required only by the party who has already performed or is prepared to perform. A party has the right to refuse performance until simultaneous performance is secured or provided, if the performance of other participant is endangered by facts related to that other participant. Ccom art. 325 provides a similar rule.

3. Some jurisdictions provide a further rule for the case where performance by one of the parties requires some time. The other party will then only have to perform after the performance of the former party has been rendered. Thus in BELGIAN law, when the obligation of one party concerns a continuous performance, and the other one not, the former party normally has to perform first. For the relevant express rule in ESTONIAN law see LOA § 82(5). Similarly, UNIDROIT art. 6.1.4(2) provides that to the extent that the performance of only one party requires a period of time, that party is bound to render its performance first, unless the circumstances indicate otherwise. But in all systems there are customary exceptions: for example, it is customary for theatre-goers to have to pay in advance of seeing the performance.

4. Under HUNGARIAN CC § 280(1) if the time of performance is not specified, (a) either of the parties may demand simultaneous performance by the other party, (b) in the case of a gratuitous contract, the beneficiary is entitled to invite the debtor to tender performance at any time.

III.–2:105: Alternative obligations or methods of performance

(1) Where a debtor is bound to perform one of two or more obligations, or to perform an obligation in one of two or more ways, the choice belongs to the debtor, unless the terms regulating the obligations or obligation provide otherwise.

(2) If the party who is to make the choice fails to choose by the time when performance is due, then:

(a) if the delay amounts to a fundamental non-performance, the right to choose passes to the other party;

(b) if the delay does not amount to fundamental non-performance, the other party may give a notice fixing an additional period of reasonable length within which the party to choose is required to do so. If the latter still fails to do so, the right to choose passes to the other party.

COMMENTS

This provision lays down some rules for the not infrequent situations where a debtor must perform one of alternative obligations or an obligation may be performed in one of two or more ways. It can often be difficult to distinguish between these two situations but that does not matter because the Article lays down the same rules for both. The basic rule is that the debtor may choose which alternative to perform. However, this is only a default rule. The terms regulating the obligations (or the obligation, if there is only one) may indicate that it is the creditor who is to make the choice.

Illustration 1
A contract provides that X must by a certain date either pay Y €1000 or remove certain rubbish from Y's land. This is a case of alternative obligations and the default rule is that X can choose.

A contract provides that X must clear Y's land of bushes by a certain date either by uprooting them or by cutting them down to ground level and poisoning the roots. This is a case where there is one obligation (to clear the land) but alternative methods of performing it. Again the default rule is that X can choose.

If the person who has the right to choose does not exercise the right within a reasonable time, especially after having been asked to do so by the other party,. the right to choose may pass to the other party. The point at which the right to choose will pass depends on how serious the delay is in the circumstances. If it is fundamental the choice passes to the other party; if it is not, the other party can serve a notice fixing a period of reasonable length for the choice to be made. If it is still not made by the end of that period then paragraph (3) makes the choice pass to the other party.

NOTES

1. Paragraph (1) of the Article is in line with many national rules - see for instance DUTCH CC art. 6:19, FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs arts. 1189-1196; GERMAN CC §§ 262, 263; AUSTRIAN CC § 906; ESTONIAN LOA § 86(1); GREEK CC arts. 305 and 306, in addition GREEK CC arts. 308 and 309 are used when the right to choose passes to the third party; ITALIAN CC art. 1286(1); PORTUGUESE CC arts. 543(2) and 548; POLISH CC art. 365 § 1; SLOVAKIA CC § 561 and Ccom art. 327; SLOVENIAN LOA § 384; and SPANISH CC art. 1132. The basic rule is the same under SWEDISH law (see Ccom chap. 9 § 5, NJA 1944 s. 536 and Rodhe, 162 et seq.). The position is the same in the CZECH REPUBLIC. Under CZECH CC § 561.1: "If an obligation can be fulfilled in two or more ways, the debtor shall have the right to select the manner of its performance unless the parties have agreed otherwise". This disposition is construed by Knappová M, Švestka J, a kol., Učebnice Občanské právo hmotné, vol. II, ASPI Praha 2002. The same rule is applicable in commercial legal relationships, see Ccom art. 327. In SCOTTISH law the same result would probably be reached by interpretation of the terms regulating the obligation; in a case of unresolvable doubt the preference would be for the interpretation least burdensome to the debtor, see Bankton, An Institute of the Laws of Scotland I.11.56. As for DENMARK see Gomard, Obligationsret I, 37 and Ussing, Obligationsretten[4], 24. However, the law in ENGLAND is less certain - see Treitel, Contract 17-005. Rules equivalent to the second paragraph are less common but similar rules are found in some countries, e.g. Dutch CC art. 6:19. In POLISH law, if the party entitled to choose does not make the choice, the other party may set an appropriate period and after the passing of that period the right to choose passes to that party (CC art. 365 § 3). This rule does not exist in CZECH REPUBLIC where the debtor of alternative obligation holds his right to choose till the performance or till the judicial decision (see Jehličkа, Švestka, Škárová a kol. Občanský zákoník – komentář, 8. vydání, Praha 2003, pp. 718-719). In SLOVAKIA in business matters, if the creditor is entitled to choose and fails to choose, the right passes to the debtor. (Ccom art. 327). Under ESTONIAN law, the right to choose passes to the other party if the choice is not made during the time period agreed upon or, if no agreement exists, within a reasonable period of time before the obligation falls due (LOA § 87(1)). In Italian law, CC art. 1287 states that if a party fails to perform within the time fixed by the court, the election belongs to the other party, but if the election is referred to a third person and that person fails to exercise it within the allotted time, it is made by the court.

2. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 230(1) if the parties have defined several services as the subject matter of a contract in a manner that makes it possible to choose among the services, the debtor has the right to choose, unless otherwise prescribed by legal regulation. This right of the debtor passes to the creditor upon the expiration of the performance deadline stipulated by court decision. Under CC § 230(2) if the creditor is presented with a choice, but is late in making it, the right to choose passes to the debtor.

III.–2:106: Performance entrusted to another

A debtor who entrusts performance of an obligation to another person remains responsible for performance.

COMMENTS

A. General

Under modern conditions, many obligations are not performed in fact by the debtor personally. This provision deals with one aspect of this modern division of labour, namely the debtor's responsibility for non-performance. Two other aspects, namely the imputation of actual or constructive knowledge as well as of certain states of mind of persons assisting in the performance of the contract, are dealt with by an earlier Article.

B. Purpose

The basic principle is that if the debtor does not perform the obligation personally but entrusts performance to a third person, the debtor remains nevertheless responsible for the proper performance of the obligation vis-à-vis the creditor. The internal relationship between the debtor and the third person is irrelevant in this context. The third person may be subject to instructions of the debtor, such as an employee or an agent; or may be an independent subcontractor.

NOTES

1. In several countries there are code provisions which are either close equivalents to the Article (see DUTCH CC art. 6:76; ITALIAN CC art. 1228 and PORTUGUESE CC art. 800(1)) or which in other terms lay down the same principle, see AUSTRIAN CC § 1313a; in DENMARK Ancient Danish Code § 3.19.2; GERMAN CC § 278; ESTONIAN GPCCA § 132; GREEK CC arts. 317 and 477; SLOVENIAN LOA § 434 and POLISH CC art. 474, SLOVAK Ccom art. 331. Under SPANISH law the debtor may entrust performance to another unless the contract requires personal performance, CC art. 1161; but unless the creditor accepts the substitution, the debtor remains responsible, (CC arts. 1596 and 1721). The general principle in CZECH written law that the debtor is discharged by performance of the obligation (CC § 559.1: "A debt is discharged by its fulfilment"), is construed in the same way (see Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová a kol. Občanský zákoník – komentář, 8. vydání, Praha 2003, p.711).
2. In other countries, the principle is not provided by legislation but is recognized by the courts or writers. This is the case in FINLAND, see Hoppu 130; FRANCE see Viney, la Responsabilité nos. 813-847 whereas the CC does not provide for a general principle but merely specific rules for specific situations (see for instances CC arts. 1245, 1735, 1797, 1953, 1994 , Viney, n° 816), there still is a general and autonomous principle of "responsabilité contractuelle du fait d'autrui", as a result of case law. Consequently, the debtor who has wilfully entrusted performance to a third person remains responsible and this can be justified by the fundamental principle of the law of contracts, which prohibits any transfer of debt without the creditor's explicit consent (Viney, Les conditions de la responsabilité, n° 818 and 919). BELGIUM, Cass. 5 October 1990, Arr. Cass., 125 no. 58; De Page II, no. 592; van Oevelen, R.W. 1987-88, (1168) 1187 ff; Dirix, Aansprakelijkheid 341 ff; ENGLAND: Treitel, Remedies §

15; SCOTLAND: McBryde chaps. 12.12, 12.44. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 315 those who employ another person to perform their obligations or exercise their rights are liable for the conduct of that person. The rule is the same in SWEDISH law, see SGA 1990 §§ 11 and 48, being an expression of a general principle of Swedish law. See also Ramberg, Köplagen, 206 et seq and 487 et seq.

III.–2:107: Performance by a third person

(1) Where personal performance by the debtor is not required by the terms regulating the obligation, the creditor cannot refuse performance by a third person if:

(a) the third person acts with the assent of the debtor; or

(b) the third person has a legitimate interest in performing and the debtor has failed to perform or it is clear that the debtor will not perform at the time performance is due.

(2) Performance by a third person in accordance with paragraph (1) discharges the debtor except to the extent that the third person takes over the creditor's right by assignment or subrogation.

(3) Where personal performance by the debtor is not required and the creditor accepts performance of the debtor's obligation by a third party in circumstances not covered by paragraph (1) the debtor is discharged but the creditor is liable to the debtor for any loss caused by that acceptance.

COMMENTS

A. Scope

This Article addresses the questions, under what conditions does performance of a debtor's obligation by a third person constitute due performance in relation to the creditor who cannot then refuse performance, and under what conditions does the performance by a third person discharge the debtor vis-à-vis the creditor.

Nothing in the Article relieves the creditor of any obligations towards the debtor.

B. When will a tender constitute performance?

The third person making the performance may be acting on behalf of the debtor as the debtor's representative. In that situation the legal position is the same as if the debtor were performing. Even in the absence of representation, however, a third party who performs is often acting with the assent of the debtor. In such cases paragraph (1)(a) provides that the creditor cannot refuse performance, unless the terms regulating the obligation require personal performance.

However, performance by a third person may also be made without the volition of the debtor. The third person may have a legitimate interest in doing so. A surety pays a debt in order to avoid costly proceedings against the debtor which eventually the surety will have to pay. A tenant pays the mortgage in order to avoid a forced sale of the property. In the interests of the family, a wife pays the debt of her husband for which she is not liable. A parent company pays the debt of its subsidiary to save the latter's credit rating. In these cases it seems sensible to permit payment by the third person even though this is not allowed under the laws of all the Member States (where unauthorised payment by the third person will not have the effect of discharging the debtor). So paragraph (1)(b) has the effect that the creditor cannot refuse performance by the third person provided that the debtor has failed to perform when performance fell due or it is clear that the debtor will not perform at the time when it falls due.

C. Is the debtor discharged?

Due performance by the third person who is entitled to perform discharges the debtor. This is the effect of paragraph (2). Of course, the debtor will not be discharged to the extent that the third party takes over the creditor's right by assignment or subrogation.

It follows from the Article that the debtor remains responsible if a third person who has promised to perform and who has got the debtor's assent to performance fails to perform or makes a defective tender. Where performance has been undertaken or carried out by a third person who has a legitimate interest in performance the debtor will also remain responsible if the third person fails to tender performance when it is due, or if the tender is refused because it is defective. The debtor will not be excused for a failure to perform by a third person unless the third person's non-performance was due to an impediment which would also have excused the debtor.

A creditor who refuses to accept a performance by a third person made in pursuance of paragraph (1) will normally have failed to perform a reciprocal obligation and will be precluded from exercising any of the remedies for non-performance.

D. When may a tender be refused?

There are, however, situations where the creditor is entitled to refuse performance by a third party. Such performance may be excluded by the terms regulating the obligation. There are also situations where it follows from the nature or purpose of the obligation that it cannot be performed vicariously.

Where in contracts for the performance of personal services it can be inferred that the debtor has been selected to perform because of skill, competence or other personal qualifications, the creditor may refuse performance by a third person. However, if it is usual in the type of contract to allow delegation of the performance of some or all of the services, or if this can be done satisfactorily by third persons, the creditor must accept such performance.

Where the third person cannot show any assent by the debtor or any legitimate interest the creditor is entitled to refuse the tender of performance. Thus the creditor can refuse payment from a person who attempts to collect claims against the debtor. If the debtor has not assented to the performance the creditor may also refuse performance by a friend of the debtor whose motive is unselfish.

E. Where creditor voluntarily accepts performance by third party

Paragraph (3) deals with the situation where the contract does not require personal performance by the debtor but the creditor, although not bound to do so, voluntarily accepts performance of the debtor's obligation by a third party. In such cases it would be contrary to the requirements of good faith and fair dealing to allow the creditor to continue to hold the debtor liable. On the other hand there may be cases where the debtor suffers some prejudice as a result of the creditor's acceptance of performance by a third party. The paragraph therefore provides that the debtor is discharged but that the creditor is liable for any loss suffered by the debtor as a result of the creditor's acceptance of performance.

F. Recourse against the debtor

Whether the third party who discharges the debtor's obligation has any recourse against the debtor will depend on the circumstances and on other rules which may be applicable. If the third party is the debtor's representative then their internal relationship will regulate recourse. In other cases where the third party pays with the debtor's assent the matter may be regulated by a contract between the third party and the debtor. In certain other cases special subrogation rules applicable to particular relationships may apply. In yet others the rules on benevolent intervention may come into operation. Finally, there may be cases where the law on unjustified enrichment will apply. It should be noted, however, that under the rules on that subject a person who voluntarily, and without error, confers a benefit on another cannot normally recover.

NOTES

I. Debtor assents to vicarious performance

1. The legal systems all seem to agree that performance by a third person which is agreed to by the debtor before or after it is made (vicarious performance) is, in principle, admitted (for AUSTRIA see CC § 1423). However, it may not be permitted if it is against the interests of the creditor. This idea is expressed differently in the legal systems.

2. GREEK and PORTUGUESE law will not permit vicarious performance when it is prejudicial to the interests of the creditor, see Greek CC art. 317 in fine and PORTUGUESE CC art. 767(2). Under DUTCH law a third party may perform an obligation "unless this is contrary to its content or necessary implication", see CC art. 6:30.

3. Most of the laws exclude vicarious performance of obligations which have a personal character: DENMARK, see Ussing, Obligationsretten[4], 58; FINLAND, see Saarnilehto, Hemmo & Kartio, 171; FRANCE and BELGIUM, CC art. 1236, see Malaurie & Aynès, Obligations no. 962 and for Belgium Cass. 28 September 1973, RW 1973-74, 1158, RCJB 1974, 238 obs. van Damme; ENGLAND, Treitel, Contract 15-001 - 15-004; AUSTRIA, a generally acknowledged principle based on provisions for specific contracts: CC § 1153 (labour employment contract), § 1171 (work contract for work and services), etc.; GERMANY, see CC § 267(1); ITALY, CC art. 1180; GREECE: Zepos in Ermak II/1 art. 317 no.13 (1949) Georgiadou in Georgiadis & Stathopoulos art. 317 no. 12, Stathopoulos, Obligations §17 no. 36; NETHERLANDS, CC art. 6:30(1); SCOTLAND, McBryde chap. 12.33-12.41; SLOVENIA, LOA § 271(3); SPAIN, CC arts. 1158, 1161 and see Díez-Picazo II, 481; SWEDEN, see Rodhe, Obligationsrätt 158; CZECH REPUBLIC, general rule of civil law, see Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová a kol., Občanský zákoník – komentář, p. 711 and for commercial cases stated in Ccom art. 332; ESTONIA LOA § 78(1); POLAND CC art. 356 § 1; and SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 332.

II. Performance without the consent of the debtor

4. Provided the performance by the third party is not excluded as being against the interests of the creditor under the rules discussed in note 1 above, most other systems seem to allow it on varying conditions. Under AUSTRIAN law, the debtor's consent is not necessary, if the creditor accepts performance by the third party (see CC § 1423). In GERMANY, CC § 267(2), ESTONIA, LOA § 78(2), SLOVENIA LOA § 271(4) and ITALY, CC art. 1180 the creditor must accept performance but may refuse if there is an actual interest in having the debtor perform personally, or if the debtor has notified an objection to the creditor. However, as this paragraph is an expression of the favor creditoris principle, if the debtor objects to it the creditor is not obliged to reject performance but has a choice whether or not to accept (but see the GERMAN exception of CC § 268 to protect some particularly interested third parties). This rule also applies in DENMARK, see Ussing, Obligationsretten[4], 307; the NETHERLANDS, CC art 6:30(2); PORTUGAL, CC arts. 592(1) and 768(2); SWEDEN, Rodhe, Obligationsrätt 66; and probably SCOTLAND, Gloag and Henderson 3.22, although the Scottish law in this area is unclear. In FRANCE the debtor can oppose performance if it would be prejudicial, see Malaurie & Aynès, Obligations, no. 962. In BELGIUM the debtor cannot oppose performance, but the third party will not acquire the rights of the creditor by subrogation unless the third party acted with the debtor's consent or had a legitimate interest in performance, CC art. 1236.

5. Similarly, under ESTONIAN law, if a third party performs the obligation in order to avoid compulsory execution with regard to an object which belongs to the debtor but is in the lawful possession of the third party or for which the third party has some other right and if, in the case of compulsory execution, such possession or right would terminate, the creditor may not refuse to accept performance even if the debtor has objected to such performance (LOA § 78(3)).

6. Under SPANISH law the creditor must accept performance by a third party even if the debtor opposes it, but the third party will then not have a right of subrogation but only a claim for enrichment (CC arts. 1158(3) and 1159; Díez-Picazo II, 484; Albaladejo II, 1 § 24.3; TS 26 June 1925, 16 June 1969, 30 September 1987 and 12 November 1987).

7. In GREECE the creditor may not accept performance by a third party if the debtor opposes it, see CC art. 318.

8. Under POLISH law, as far as obligations to pay a sum of money are concerned, the creditor cannot refuse payment by a third party, even if made without the debtor’s knowledge or consent (CC art. 356 § 2). CC art. 518 provides that in certain cases the third party will acquire the paid debt and will become the debtor’s new creditor.

9. In ENGLISH law a performance made without the permission of the debtor is not admitted. This holds true when the effect would be a subrogation in favour of the third party: "a man cannot make himself the creditor of another without his knowledge or consent". The same seems even to hold true when there is no subrogation, see Chitty para. 29-093. It is probably now settled that payment by a third party will only discharge the debtor if the debtor authorized or subsequently ratified the payment, see Goff and Jones 17. There are, however, specific provisions allowing a subtenant of a lease to intervene to prevent forfeiture of the head lease, see Law of Property Act 1925, s. 146. Also in the CZECH REPUBLIC the debtor’s agreement is necessary under civil law, (CC § 559 as construed by Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová a kol., Občanský zákoník – komentář, p. 711) but not under commercial law (this is expressly stated by Ccom art. 332.1 as a general principle of commercial law).

10. Under SLOVAK law the consent of the debtor is not necessary if the third person secures the performance by guarantee or by other legal manner and the debtor did not perform the obligation (Ccom art. 332}.

11. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 286 the creditor must accept performance offered by a third person if the debtor has consented to this and the service is not bound to a specific person and does not require any expertise that is not possessed by the third person. The debtor's consent is not required if the third party has a lawful interest in completing performance. In such case, any security securing the right remains in force if the right passes to a third person who effects performance or if such third person is entitled to demand reimbursement from the debtor.

III.–2:108: Method of payment

(1) Payment of money due may be made by any method used in the ordinary course of business.

(2) A creditor who accepts a cheque or other order to pay or a promise to pay is presumed to do so only on condition that it will be honoured. The creditor may not enforce the original obligation to pay unless the order or promise is not honoured.

A. General remarks

Payment is not only made by legal tender but also by bank transfer, handing over of a cheque and in many other ways. The development of new techniques for payment must not be prevented by a detailed enumeration of possible manners of payment. It is in the general interest of business to allow payment to be made in any manner which is currently being used and is easy, quick and reliable. Without special permission the debtor can pay in such manner, e.g. by cheque, and the creditor is bound to accept it (see on this specific way also paragraph (2)).

B. Manner of payment

Many national laws provide that payment must be made by legal tender and that the creditor is not entitled to demand any other method of payment except where a contract so provides. However, the debtor may prefer another manner of payment, provided this is in conformity with the ordinary course of business. The creditor must be protected against a surprising, unusual or burdensome manner of payment.

> Illustration 1
> A owes B €5000. As A wants to annoy B, A takes 500,000 pieces of one cent and sends them to B. Since it is not in the ordinary course of business to pay such a large sum by such a small unit, A is not allowed to make payment in this manner.

What manner is usual depends on the nature of the transaction involved and on the usages prevailing at the place of payment. The creditor does not have the right unilaterally to demand or refuse any particular manner.

C. Acceptance of promise to pay or order to pay conditional only

It often occurs that the creditor, in order to accommodate the debtor, accepts in lieu of cash a cheque, a bill of exchange, or some other promise to pay or order to a third party to pay. In all these cases the creditor generally does not wish to run the risk that the cheque or other claim for payment will not be honoured. Therefore paragraph (2) sentence 1 makes it clear that the original right to payment subsists until satisfaction of the substituted performance has in fact been achieved. If this is not done the creditor may enforce the underlying right. But the creditor cannot proceed with the latter until the substituted performance becomes due and remains unperformed (paragraph (2) sentence 2).

> A owes B €3000. A accepts B's request to give it a promissory note payable two months later. B's remedies for non-performance of the original obligation are suspended until the promissory note is due but revive if the note is dishonoured (see Comment D).

As paragraph (2) sentence 1 establishes a rebuttable presumption, parties may expressly or impliedly stipulate otherwise.

D. Consequences of dishonouring the substituted performance

If the substituted right is not honoured the creditor may proceed with the underlying right to payment as if no substituted performance had been accepted. If interest was due on the debt, it is recoverable. But a creditor who takes a promissory note or another negotiable instrument in substitution for the original obligation to pay will usually find it more efficient to ignore the original obligation and sue on the instrument.

However, a creditor who fails to take any steps necessary to enforce the right received as a substitute cannot then revert to the original remedies for non-performance except to enforce the payment due itself.

Illustration 3
B owes A €5000 from a contract of sale. A has declared that it will accept the €5000 no later than August 1: otherwise it wants to terminate the contractual relationship. On this day B gives A a cheque which A accepts. The cheque is not presented to B's bank until several months later and is not honoured by the bank because of the expiry of the period of presentation. A cannot terminate since it has not presented the cheque in the ordinary way.

I. Ordinary method of payment

1. In many countries the ordinary method of paying a monetary obligation is by transfer of legal tender. This rule is expressly fixed in ITALY (CC art. 1277(1), but see also arts. 1278, 1279 and 1281); PORTUGAL (CC art. 550); POLAND (CC art. 358^1 § 1); and SPAIN (CC art. 1170), but exists also in several other countries, especially in those of the French-inspired legal orbit (e.g. FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG); in GREECE, see Stathopoulos Law of Obligations, 2004, § 18, 986 in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, see Chitty para. 21-044 and Wilson, Debt paras. 1.2, 12.1; and in IRELAND, see Forde para. 1.086. In AUSTRIA CC § 1054 requires in respect of sales that payment of the price be “in cash”; this provision is liberally interpreted, however. Payment by bank transfer or cheque is recognised as an alternative if the creditor assents which is normally presumed according to the rules of fair trading (see CC § 1414). Special legislation in these countries often authorises or even obliges a debtor to make payment of substantial sums of money in cashless form, e.g. by bank transfer or cheque. DUTCH CC art. 6:112 allows payment in "current" form and art. 6:114 authorizes a bank transfer if the creditor has a bank account in the country of the place of performance, unless the creditor has validly objected. In BELGIUM a Royal Decree of 10 November 1967 makes it obligatory to accept a bank transfer or cheque for payments of more than a certain amount in commercial transactions (currently 2,500 Euro); similarly in FRANCE (L. 22 October 1940). According to ESTONIAN LOA § 91(1) monetary obligations may be performed in cash (subject to the limits of special regulation or the good faith principle (Varul et al (-Varul) § 91 no. 4.1.), but may also be performed in some other form if so agreed by the parties or if such form is used in the ordinary course of business at the place of payment. If the creditor has a settlement account in a credit institution in the state in which a monetary obligation is to be performed, the debtor may perform the obligation by transferring the amount due to the account unless the creditor has expressly prohibited this option (LOA § 91(2)). Payment in cash above a certain amount may, however, be forbidden by money laundering legislation (in Belgian law maximum 15,000 Euro: art. 10ter Money laundering prevention Act of 11 January 1993).

2. There is no rule of legal tender in the CZECH REPUBLIC. The law is silent. It is construed as a freedom for all parties to determine any currency of performance as they want. Only for an international monetary obligation is it stated expressly that the debtor has to fulfil it "in the currency which was agreed on" (Ccom art. 731). Under SLOVAK law the debtor is allowed to pay by any method if it is agreed in the contract. The CC and the Ccom directly mention paying by "cash" in the place of performance, paying on account of creditor in the bank of creditor and by the Post Office (cheque). Other countries allow payments to be made in any form that is current and acceptable for present-day business (DENMARK: Gomard, Obligationsret I 127; SWEDEN: Rodhe, Obligationsrätt 33; but in FINLAND a creditor is usually not obliged to accept payment by cheque, Aurejärin 13).

II. Substituted payment

3. The disadvantage of most forms of substituted payment is that they do not immediately transfer a monetary value to the creditor. Therefore in most countries the acceptance of a cheque or the production of a credit card or any transfer of a similar form of substituted payment is considered to be a conditional acceptance of performance of the monetary obligation, the condition being that the substituted obligation will be honoured. See e.g. the GERMAN CC § 364(2), ESTONIAN LOA § 91(4) and DUTCH CC art. 6:46. The same rule is applied in SCOTLAND (Leggat Brothers v. Gray 1908 SC 67).

4. In FRANCE it is held on the basis of CC art. 1243 and special texts that the collection, not the handing over, of a cheque is a performance of the monetary obligation (Cass. Req. 21 March 1932, D.P.33.1.65). However, case law has sometimes moderated this rule(François, Les Obligations, Régime général, n° 42). A presumption has been established in ENGLAND (D. & C. Builders Ltd. v. Rees [1966] 2 QB 617; Chitty paras. 21-061-062),) and IRELAND (Forde para. I.087, though it can be rebutted: P.M.P.S. v. Moore [1988] ILRM 526). According to the SPANISH CC art. 1170(2) and (3) the transfer of a negotiable instrument or similar commercial instrument has the effect of payment only after the instrument has been honoured, the underlying obligation being in the meantime suspended. The same applies under BELGIAN law (See i.a. Cass. 6 January 1972, Arr.Cass. 1972, 441). In PORTUGAL it is assumed that acceptance of those instruments normally is a datio pro solvendo and therefore does not constitute payment until the instrument is actually honoured (Varela II 175). This latter rule is expressly laid down in ITALY: in pecuniary obligations, performance by a bank cheque, or by bill of exchange, banker's draft instead of cash constitute a different performance (on this point, Bianca (2002), 431), therefore, according to CC art. 1197(1) sentence 2 the creditor may refuse payment in such form unless it has been accepted on a previous occasion (Cass. 13 June 1980, no. 3771, Giur.it. 1981 I, I 1984). The rule is also confirmed by case law in GREECE (A.P. 209/1963, NoB 11 (1963) 1050, 1739/2002 ChrID 2003, 230). For FINLAND see Wilhelmsson, Sevón 150.

5. In SLOVAKIA for business matters the position is similar in effect to that under paragraph (2) of the above Article. Under Ccom art. 334, offering a letter of credit, bill of exchange or cheque is not in itself performance of an obligation. But the creditor is entitled to demand performance of the underlying obligation only if it is impossible to achieve fulfilment by these means.

6. In some countries, commercial practice and case law turn the suspensive condition of factual honouring into a resolutive condition: payment is regarded as effected by handing over the substituted form of payment, unless it later turns out that the instrument is not in fact honoured (FRENCH Cass.Civ.I, 2 December 1968, JCP 1969.II.15775; banking practice in GERMANY and AUSTRIA).

7. UNIDROIT art. 6.1.7 is similar to the present Article.

III.–2:109: Currency of payment

(1) The debtor and the creditor may agree that payment is to be made only in a specified currency.

(2) In the absence of such agreement, a sum of money expressed in a currency other than that of the place where payment is due may be paid in the currency of that place according to the rate of exchange prevailing there at the time when payment is due.

(3) If, in a case falling within the preceding paragraph, the debtor has not paid at the time when payment is due, the creditor may require payment in the currency of the place where payment is due according to the rate of exchange prevailing there either at the time when payment is due or at the time of actual payment.

(4) Where a monetary obligation is not expressed in a particular currency, payment must be made in the currency of the place where payment is to be made.

COMMENTS

A. Definitions

Three different currencies may be involved in an international contract. The currency of account indicates in which currency the primary payment obligation, i.e. typically the price, is measured. The parties or the circumstances usually clearly indicate this currency. The agreed currency of payment may and often does, on grounds of convenience, differ from the currency of account. It is one agreed upon by the parties (paragraph (1)). Absent such an agreement, the currency of account will normally be the currency of payment. The currency of the due place of payment may differ from the agreed currency of payment and become relevant under certain circumstances (paragraphs (2)-(3)).

> Illustration 1
> A merchant in Colombia sells a quantity of coffee for 100,000 US$ (currency of account) to a trader in London. It is agreed that payment of the purchase price be made in Euros (agreed currency of payment) to the seller's account at a bank in Geneva (Swiss francs being the currency of the due place of payment).

B. Payment in the agreed currency of payment

This is clearly a matter of great practical importance and one on which it is highly desirable to have uniformly recognised rules. The laws of the Member States currently diverge to some extent. The rules laid down in this Article are based on two widely adopted uniform laws – the Uniform Law on Bills of Exchange of 1930, art. 41 and the Uniform Law on Cheques of 1931, art. 36.

The rule of the Article starts from the assumption that in the first place the creditor may require and the debtor must make payment in the agreed currency of payment, i.e. the currency in which the obligation to pay is expressed. This is but a consequence of the creditor's right to require performance. Whether the courts at the place of payment or elsewhere are willing to give judgment in a currency which is foreign to them, is a matter of procedure; it is not affected by these rules.

C. Payment in the currency of the due place of payment

If a monetary obligation is expressed in another currency than that of the due place of payment, the debtor may wish to make payment in the local currency; usually this is also in the creditor's interest. The rule of paragraph (2) presupposes that the agreed currency of payment and the currency of the due place of payment differ.

> A Canadian manufacturer sells machines to a foreign buyer for a purchase price of 540,000 Canadian $ but it is provided that the purchase price of $540,000 is to be paid in London.

Two basic issues arise: First, does either party have the right to effect such a conversion, or does only one have such a right or even a duty to effect the conversion? Second, if so, which rate of exchange is to apply? The latter question is of special interest if the debtor delays payment and the currency of account, the agreed currency of payment or the currency of the due place of payment has depreciated in the meantime.

D. Right of conversion

The Article adopts the widely accepted rule that the debtor has the option of effecting payment in the currency of the due place of payment rather than in the currency of payment (see Comment A). This is usually practical for both parties.

A creditor who wants to avoid this result must stipulate that payment be made only in the currency of the money of account (or in the agreed currency of payment). This right of the parties to agree on a different solution is stated expressly in paragraph (1).

E. Rate of exchange

The debtor's right of conversion must not be allowed to diminish the extent of the monetary obligation. Consequently, the rate of exchange for the conversion into the currency of payment must be that prevailing at the due place of payment at the date of maturity (paragraph (2)).

This rule also covers the case where payment is made before the date of maturity.

Difficulties arise where the debtor pays after the date of maturity and in the meantime either the currency of account, the agreed currency of payment or the currency at the due place of payment has depreciated. Should the date of maturity or the date of actual payment determine the rate of exchange? Neither solution is fully satisfactory. If after maturity the currency of account has depreciated, the creditor would be disadvantaged if the rate of exchange on the date of payment were selected. If, on the other hand, after maturity the agreed currency of payment or the currency of the due place of payment has depreciated, the creditor would be injured if the debtor were to be allowed to convert at the rate of exchange of the date of maturity, because this exchange rate places the risk of depreciation of the local currency on the creditor.

The guiding principle for an equitable solution ought to be that the defaulting debtor, and not the creditor, must bear the risk if a currency depreciates after the date of maturity of a monetary obligation. A creditor who had been paid in time would bear both the chances and the risks of depreciation and could have avoided any foreseeable currency risk by converting the money received in a weak currency into money of a strong currency. It is the debtor who, actually or in effect, is speculating by delaying payment. Two solutions may be envisaged.

One would be to select the rate of exchange of the date of maturity and to grant, in addition, a claim for those damages that have been occasioned through currency depreciation during the debtor's delay. However, this route relies on two separate remedies and may entail a duplication of proceedings.

It is therefore preferable to allow a choice of the dates for the rate of conversion, and this choice must be the creditor's. The creditor may choose between the date of maturity and the date of actual payment. This rule is laid down in paragraph (3).

Of course, the parties may agree on a fixed rate of conversion, and such an agreement takes precedence.

F. Exchange restrictions

The rules of the Article may not operate if and insofar as exchange restrictions affect the payment of foreign money obligations. The question as to which country's exchange restrictions must be taken into account is not addressed.

G. Currency not expressed

Paragraph (4) deals with the problem which arises if the contract does not express any currency. For example, it may just refer to a price to be fixed by a third person without mentioning any currency. In such circumstances the rule provided by paragraph (4) is that payment must be made in the currency of the place where payment is to be made.

NOTES

I. Uniform laws

1. This Article has been modelled upon two widely adopted uniform laws: (Geneva) Uniform Law on Bills of Exchange of 1930, art. 41 and (Geneva) Uniform Law on Cheques of 1931, art. 36. Both laws are in force in more than 30 continental European countries. (See also UNIDROIT art. 6.1.9) A closely related, more elaborate model is the European Convention on Foreign Money Liabilities of 1967 (not yet in force).
2. The national laws are more diversified.

II. Currency clause

3. Almost all national laws recognize a currency clause, i.e. a stipulation that the debtor must make payment in an agreed currency. Some countries have express provisions (NORDIC Instrument of Debts Act 1938 § 7(1); ITALIAN CC art. 1277 laying down the so-called nominal principle, and arts. 1278, 1279; SPANISH CC art. 1170; SLOVAK Ccom art. 732; AUSTRIAN CC § 905a(1)). Other laws recognise a currency clause only implicitly (BELGIUM: Cass. 4 September 1975, Pas. I 16 RW 1975-76, 1561); GERMAN CC § 244(1); GREEK CC art. 291; LUXEMBOURG CC art. 1153-1(1); NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:121(2); PORTUGUESE CC art. 558; CZECH Ccom art. 732 (currency clause expressly recognised only for international commercial relationships); SLOVENIA Act on Foreign Currencies arts. 4 and 18; and ESTONIAN LOA § 93(3). In SCOTLAND the rule in paragraph (1) would follow from the principle of freedom of contract, Gloag and Henderson 3.28.

4. In FRANCE such a clause is void in so far as payment is to be made in France (Civ.I, 11 October 1989, JCP 1990 II 21393). The position in POLAND is similar – according to CC art. 358 § 1, except as otherwise provided by the law, obligations to pay money in Poland may be expressed only in Polish currency.

III. Payment in local currency

5. In the absence of a currency clause, payment in the local currency of the due place of payment, irrespective of the currency of account, is permitted almost everywhere. This rule is often based upon statutory provisions: see NORDIC Instrument of Debts Act 1938 § 7(1); GERMAN CC § 244(1); GREEK CC art. 291; ITALIAN CC art. 1278; PORTUGUESE CC art. 550; NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:121(1); ESTONIAN LOA § 93(3); AUSTRIAN CC § 905a(1) law: 4th Introductory Regulation of the Commercial Code (4. EVHGB) § 8 no. 8(1) which also applies in matters of civil law; CZECH Ccom art. 744 (only for international commercial relationships); and SPANISH CC art. 1170(1), the meaning of which is debated by scholars, see Díez Picazo II, 278. Sometimes the rule is based on case law: see ENGLAND: Barclays International Ltd. v. Levin Brothers (Bradford) Ltd. [1977] QB 270, 277 ; FRANCE: Cass.req. 17 February 1937, S. 1938.1.140; BELGIUM: Cass. 4 May 1922, Bull. Institut Belge Droit Comparé 1923, 299. Dekkers-Verbeke, Handboek burgerlijk recht III no. 569.

IV. Exchange rate

6. The exchange rate is controversial. If payment is made at maturity, so that the dates of payment and of maturity coincide, the exchange rate of this day applies.

7. Difficulties appear to exist on late payment. Under one approach, the rate of exchange is that of the day of payment (NORDIC laws: Instrument of Debts Act § 7(1); ENGLAND: Miliangos v. George Frank (Textiles) Ltd. [1976] AC 443; AUSTRIAN law, 4. EVHGB § 8 no. 8(2); GERMAN CC § 244(2); GREEK CC art. 291; NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:124). Under another approach, the rate of exchange is that at the date of maturity (FRANCE: case law, Cass.req. 17 February 1937, S. 1938 I 140; ITALY: CC art. 1278 considering also the limitation laid down by art. 1281 as far as special laws are concerned; also BELGIUM, LUXEMBOURG, SLOVENIA and PORTUGAL).

8. The two conflicting approaches are, however, mitigated by supplemental rules. Where the exchange rate is that of the date of maturity and the currency of account has been devalued between that date and the time of payment, several countries grant damages to the creditor for delayed payment. These damages are based either on the general rules on late performance (BELGIUM: case law, e.g. Cass. 4 September 1975, Pas. belge 1976.I.16 (impliedly); Cour d'appel Bruxelles 15 Jan., 5 February 1965, Pas. belge 1965.II.310 - damages after debtor's default; NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:125; CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 733; PORTUGAL: Varela I 868; Costa 693 and 694); or they comprise the difference between the rates of exchange at maturity and at payment (ITALY: Cass. 12 March 1953 no. 580, Giust.civ. 1953, I 830; LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 1153-1, as inserted by Law of 12 July 1980, with qualifications in favour of the debtor which are in accordance with the general rules as to liability for non-performance).

9. Conversely, in those countries which use the exchange rate at the date of payment, the debtor has to pay the difference between the exchange rates at the date of payment and a higher rate either at default (formerly in AUSTRIA: OGH 10 January 1989, ÖBA 1989, 735; GERMANY: RG 13 May 1935, RGZ 147, 377, 381; GREECE: Athens 3030/1969, Hazm 24 (1970) 409; 1905/1978, NoB 27 (1979) 221, 222, under a theory of damages) or even at the date of maturity (NORDIC countries: Instrument of Debts Act § 7(2); ENGLAND: Ozalid Group (Export) Ltd. v. African Continental Bank Ltd. [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep 231).

10. An alternative remedy allows the creditor to elect between the exchange rates of the date of payment and of maturity (FRANCE: semble Civ. 2, 29 May 1991, B.II, no. 165, p. 89: creditor allowed to elect the date of mise en demeure. In SPAIN the same solution ought to be adopted applying the common principles of compensation for loss: the creditor has the right to be put in the situation the creditor would have been in had the obligation been duly performed; now also AUSTRIA CC § 905a(2) and ESTONIA, LOA § 93(4)). This solution corresponds to para. (3) of the present Article.

11. The SLOVAK CC does not contain any legal regulation of currency of payment. The Ccom regulates this matter for obligations in international business (i.e. obligations with at least one contracting party resident in a country different from that in which the other parties are resident). Ccom art. 732 provides that the debtor is obliged to pay in the currency stipulated by the contract (any damages being payable in the same currency). If the law does not allow payment in the stipulated currency, the debtor is obliged to pay damages for any loss which arises from payment in a different currency. Conversion of the currency is governed by the Ccom art. 733. If a monetary obligation is expressed in one currency, but the debtor is obliged to pay in a different currency, the rate is the middle exchange rate between the currencies at the time of performance in the place determined by the contract, which failing, the place of creditor’s residence. Contracting parties can agree on a currency clause for the purpose of protection from the risk of conversion of the exchange rates, see Ccom art. 744.

III.–2:110: Imputation of performance

(1) Where a debtor has to perform several obligations of the same nature and makes a performance which does not suffice to extinguish all of the obligations, then subject to paragraph (5), the debtor may at the time of performance notify the creditor of the obligation to which obligation the performance is to be imputed.

(2) If the debtor does not make such a notification the creditor may, within a reasonable time and by notifying the debtor, impute the performance to one of the obligations.

(3) An imputation under paragraph (2) is not effective if it is to an obligation which is not yet due, or is illegal, or is disputed.

(4) In the absence of an effective imputation by either party, and subject to the following paragraph, the performance is imputed to that obligation which satisfies one of the following criteria in the sequence indicated:

- (a) the obligation which is due or is the first to fall due;
- (b) the obligation for which the creditor has the least security;
- (c) the obligation which is the most burdensome for the debtor;
- (d) the obligation which has arisen first.

If none of the preceding criteria applies, the performance is imputed proportionately to all the obligations.

(5) In the case of a monetary obligation, a payment by the debtor is to be imputed, first, to expenses, secondly, to interest, and thirdly, to principal, unless the creditor makes a different imputation.

A. The problem

Sometimes a party is obliged, not necessarily contractually, to accomplish two or more performances of the same nature - in particular, to pay money. If a performance does not suffice to meet all these obligations, the question arises which obligation has been extinguished by the performance, i.e. to which obligation such performance is to be imputed. The question may become relevant if different securities have been created for the different obligations, or if they bear interest at different rates, or if the periods of prescription expire at different dates. This Article sets out clear rules for imputation, reflecting what is found in the laws of the Member States, which show only minor variations.

B. Debtor's right to impute performance to a particular obligation

The generally accepted principle is that the debtor may at the time of payment expressly or impliedly declare to which obligation the payment is to be imputed.

> Illustration 1
> Bank B grants to A a loan of €2000 for buying a Peugeot car and some months later a loan of €2500 for buying another car, a Ford. Security interests are created in both cars for B. When later paying €2000 to B, A may declare that his payment concerns the loan for the Peugeot. B cannot object and the security interest in the Peugeot lapses.

A debtor may distribute a payment among various outstanding obligations, thus liquidating them partially. However, the effects of such partial performance are subject to the general rules on non-performance.

To be effective the debtor's imputation must, in general, be declared to the creditor. Otherwise the latter would not know to which of the several obligations the debtor wishes to impute the performance. Usually, such a declaration must be express. An implied imputation may, however, be inferred from the fact that the debtor paid the exact amount of one of the debts or that the other debts are barred by limitation.

The debtor's right of imputation is limited in two ways. First, an agreement on a mode or sequence of imputation prevails. This is simply a consequence of the parties' right to contract out of default rules.

> A and B, to whom A owes different sums, including interest, agree on a scheme for discharge of A's debts. The payments then made by A are imputed according to the scheme for discharge and not according to declarations which A may make on payment.

Second, the debtor of a sum of money is in certain cases prevented from imputing a payment. Paragraph (5) prescribes that the sequence of imputation is: expenses - interest - principal; the term "interest" covers both contractual and statutory interest. Such sequence even applies if the creditor has accepted a tender of performance in which the debtor has declared a different imputation, unless the creditor has clearly consented to such declaration.

> A owes B €50,000. B starts enforcement proceedings and obtains a judicial mortgage of €50,000 on A's land; the costs of these proceedings are €10,000. A then pays to B €50,000. B accepts this payment but refuses to sign a receipt stating that payment is made on the principal and not the costs. According to paragraph (5) the costs and 40/50 of the principal are discharged. Consequently, the remaining €10,000 are still secured by the mortgage.

C. Creditor's subsidiary right to impute

Where there is no agreed rule of imputation and the performing party fails to impute the performance the law must supply a solution. Basically, there are two different approaches: either the right of imputation is granted to the creditor; or objective criteria are fixed for the imputation. Paragraphs (2) to (4) combine those two approaches but give a preference to the first. According to paragraph (2) the right to impute devolves upon the creditor if the debtor does not impute the performance. But, for the imputation to be effective the creditor must exercise this right within a reasonable time after receiving the performance and must notify the debtor, who has a legitimate interest in knowing which obligations are still outstanding; otherwise the performance is imputed according to paragraphs (4) and (5).

In order to protect the debtor from being prejudiced by the creditor's imputation the latter's choice is further restricted by paragraph (3). The creditor cannot impute the performance to an obligation which is not yet due, which is illegal or which - on whatever grounds - is disputed. If none of the obligations is yet due, imputation is regulated by paragraph (4)(a), the effect of which is that the performance will be imputed to the obligation which will be the first to fall due. This is a reasonable result since the debtor would presumably intend to satisfy that obligation rather than one which is to fall due later.

The creditor is not prevented from imputing performance to an obligation which has prescribed. This follows from the fact that, under these rules, prescription does not extinguish the obligation but merely entitles the debtor to refuse performance.

D. Imputation by law

Where neither the debtor (under paragraph (1)) nor the creditor (under paragraphs (2) and (3)) has validly imputed the performance, the law determines to which obligation a performance is imputed.

Under paragraph (4) the performance is imputed to that obligation which according to the sequence of the criteria is the first to correspond to one of the following criteria:

a) earlier date of falling due;

b) less security - this criterion must be interpreted in accordance with its economic bearing: also a debt for which a third person has solidary liability or for which enforcement proceedings can already be started offers more security;

c) more burdensome character - e.g. producing interest at a higher rate, or a penalty,

d) earlier date of creation.

B grants a loan of €240,000 to A, which is guaranteed by C. Later, B grants another loan of €220,000 to A. A pays back to B only €220,000 . B may sue C for €240,000 because according to paragraph (4) (b) the payment of €220,000 is imputed to the unsecured second loan.

This sequence of criteria is considered to correspond to the interests of both parties. If none of the four criteria leads to imputation of the performance, it is imputed proportionally.

E. Imputation to part of single obligation

The Article presupposes that there are several distinct obligations (cf. paragraph (1)). Some rules of the Article may, however, be extended to cases where partial payment of a single debt needs to be imputed to a proportion of the debt.

B grants a loan of €240,000 to A which is guaranteed by C up to €150,000. If A repays €50,000, this amount is imputed to the unsecured part of B's loan if neither A nor B makes an imputation.

Whether the Article applies directly if payment is made on a current account being in debit depends on the nature of the current account, which must be determined under the applicable law. The rule applies directly and fully if the (negative) current account is not regarded as an integration (novation) for the individual obligations constituting the account; in this case, the current account in law still consists of the original number of several obligations towards the creditor. If, by contrast, the negative balance of the current account is regarded as constituting an integrated single obligation, the Article does not apply.

NOTES

I. Debtor's choice

1. The principle expressed in paragraph (1) is generally accepted, but there are certain restrictions: FRANCE: CC art. 1253, cf. Couturier, JClCiv, arts. 1253-1255, fasc. 84-85 nos. 21-30; BELGIUM: CC art. 1253, De Page III no. 488; DENMARK: Bryde Andersen & Lookofsky, 126; ENGLAND: Chitty § 21-046 et seq.; FINLAND: Ccom of 1793 chap. 9 § 5 and Consumer Protection Act chap. 7 § 15; GERMANY: CC § 366(1); GREECE: CC art. 422 sent. 1; ITALY: CC art. 1193(1) (however, the debtor's freedom to choose which debts to pay first is limited by art. 1194 according to which the debtor is not allowed to appropriate the payment to the principal rather than to the interest and costs without the consent of the creditor); NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:43(1); ESTONIA: LOA § 88(1); PORTUGAL: CC arts. 783-785; SCOTLAND: McBryde, paras. 24.34-24.36; SLOVENIA: LOA § 287(1); SPAIN: CC art. 1172(1); and SWEDEN: Rodhe, Obligationsrätt USA: Restatement of Contracts 2d s. 258(1), but with a restriction for cases where the debtor is obliged to a third party to devote the performance to the discharge of another obligation, cf. § 258(2). A very similar rule can be found in the CZECH REPUBLIC where it is codified in Ccom art. 330 (however the rule is applicable as a general principle for both commercial and civil law, see I. Pelikánová, Komentář k § 330 OZ, Lit. ASPI 8947): under this rule, it is up to the debtor to determine which obligation is discharged. If the debtor fails to impute the payment to any obligation, the payment is imputed to the obligation which is the first to the mature (see Ccom art. 330). The position is similar in SLOVAKIA: Ccom art. 330. In AUSTRIA, CC § 1415 requires the creditor's consent to the debtor's choice.
2. Illustration 1 is based on French Cour de cassation Civ. I, 4 Nov. 1968, Bull.civ. I no. 261 p. 199.

II. Express provision in contract

3. It is probable that a contractual stipulation prevails (cf. FRANCE: Couturier, JClCiv arts. 1253-1255, fasc. 84-85 no. 15; GERMANY: Reichsgericht 25 April 1907, RGZ 66, 54, 57-59); CZECH REPUBLIC: I. Pelikánová, Komentář k § 330 ObchZ, Lit. ASPI 8947 (the meaning of this author is that the legal rule expressed in Ccom art. 330 is not imperative but a convincing judgment on this point is still missing); AUSTRIA CC § 1415. A contractual stipulation prevails in BELGIUM (Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, p. 614).

III. Debtor has not imputed payment

4. If the debtor has not declared any imputation, the laws show two different approaches:

(a) Creditor's choice

5. Like the Article, ENGLISH, IRISH, SCOTTISH, BELGIAN, ESTONIAN, DANISH and SWEDISH law devolve the right to impute to the creditor if the debtor has not made an imputation (ENGLAND: Chitty para. 21-046, but Consumer Credit Act 1974 s. 81 deviates from the general rule; SCOTLAND: McBryde, para. 24.34(b); BELGIUM and FRANCE: CC art. 1255 (in effect); ESTONIA: LOA § 88(4), subject to the immediate objection to the creditor's choice and imputation of the performance by the debtor; DENMARK: Bryde Andersen & Lookofsky, 126; SWEDEN, Rodhe, Obligationsrätt and Handelsbalken chap. 9 § 5; but cf. also the ius commune, Windscheid & Kipp § 343). But there are restrictions on the creditor's right to impute: performance may not be imputed to an obligation which is not yet due if there are debts which are already due or to an obligation which is illegal (ENGLAND: Chitty para. 21-049; SCOTLAND: Walker no. 31. 36; ESTONIA: LOA § 88(4)) or to an obligation which is disputed (SCOTLAND: Walker no. 31. 36; ESTONIA: LOA § 88(4)). However, the fact that an obligation is barred by the statute of limitation does not hinder imputation to such obligation by the creditor (England: Chitty para. 21-050; to the contrary: SCOTLAND: Walker no. 31. 36 but this is because in Scotland prescription extinguishes the obligation). In BELGIUM the creditor may not make an imputation without having a legitimate interest, De Page III p.494; van Ommeslaghe, RCJB 1988, and p. 110 no. 203. In POLISH law the appropriation made by the creditor is definite only when the debtor has accepted a receipt indicating the appropriation (CC art. 451 § 2).

(b) Objective criteria

6. By contrast, many legal systems lay down objective criteria (cf. AUSTRIA: CC § 1416; GERMANY: CC § 366(2); GREECE: CC art. 422 sent. 2; ITALY: CC art. 1193(2); NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:43(2); PORTUGAL: CC art. 784; SLOVENIA: LOA § 287(2); SPAIN: CC art. 1174; CZECH REPUBLIC: Ccom art. 330, maturity of the obligation; SLOVAKIA: Ccom art. 330). Even systems following the first approach are forced to fall back on objective criteria if the creditor also fails to impute (cf. SCOTLAND: Walker 31. 36; FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG CC art. 1256; BELGIUM CC art. 1256; POLAND CC art. 451 § 3, referring to the time factor); ESTONIA: LOA § 88(6)).

7. Illustration 4 is modelled upon French Cour de cassation Civ. I, 29 October 1963, D. 1964.39 (which, however, reached the contrary result).

IV. Receipt accepted

8. Some codes contain express provisions on the effect of the acceptance of a receipt which indicates the imputation (cf. FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 1255; ITALY: CC art. 1195 (if the debtor accepts the release it means acceptance of the appropriation made by the creditor; hence the debtor cannot claim that the payment be otherwise imputed, unless the creditor has used fraud or surprise to force the debtor to accept (see Bianca (2002), 342)); SPAIN: CC art. 1172(2); POLAND, CC art. 451 § 2. In the NETHERLANDS such a provision, previously contained in the old CC art. 1434, was considered to be superfluous for the NCC, cf. Parlementaire Geschiedenis Boek 6, 180 note 1). In France and Belgium it is controversial whether this means that the creditor has the right to impute where the debtor has failed to exercise the option (in this sense De Page III no. 489) or whether the rule concerns imputation by agreement of both parties (Couturier, JClCiv arts. 1253-1255, fasc. 84-85, no. 56; Planiol & Ripert (-Esmein/Radouant/Gabolde) VII no. 1204).

V. Money debts

9. The rule of paragraph (5) of the Article is, as far as general private law is concerned, common to many legal systems (cf. BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 1254; AUSTRIA: CC § 1416 (interest before principal, the obligation already challenged before other obligations, and – in case the obligation is not challenged – the obligation that is due and then the obligation that is the most burdensome); FINLAND, Ccom chap. 9 § 5 (interest); GERMANY: CC § 367; GREECE: CC art. 423; ITALY: CC art. 1194; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:49; ESTONIA: LOA § 88(8); POLAND: CC art. 451 § 1; PORTUGAL: CC art. 785; SPAIN: CC art. 1173 (for interest); SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 330).

10. However, in consumer credit legislation special provisions deviating from this rule exist (GERMANY: CC § 497(3) and (4) because the indebted consumer is to be encouraged in efforts to repay; see also DANISH Credit Contract Act § 28; SWEDISH Consumer Credit Act, § 19; ESTONIAN LOA § 415(2). Further, the rules on imputation are subject to a different imputation declared by the debtor, if the creditor has accepted the performance (FRANCE: Couturier, J.Cl. civil art. 1253-1255, fasc. 84-85 no. 36; GERMANY: CC § 367(2); NETHERLANDS: Parlementaire Geschiedenis Boek 6, 182; GREECE A.P. 702/1976, NoB 25 (1977) 51).

11. Illustration 3 is modelled upon CA Düsseldorf 27 May 1975, RPfleger 1975, 355 (which, however, reached the opposite result).

VI. Debt partially secured

12. Whether the principle of paragraph (1) can be applied to partial payment on a debt which is only partially secured is disputed (cf. contra for FRANCE: Couturier, JClCiv arts. 1253-1255 nos. 28, 29 with ref.; pro for GERMANY: BGH 13 July 1973, NJW 1973, 1689). In LUXEMBOURG it has been decided that where the debt is unsecured and another is secured by a guarantee from a third party, partial payment is imputed to the latter debt: 11 November 1987, Pasicrisie XXVII, p. 319. In SPAIN, the question is still disputed (pro the application of paragraph (1) Guilarte, Comentarios al Código Civil y Compilaciones Forales, XXIII, 298; contra Carrasco/Cordero/Marín , Tratado de los Derechos de Garantía, 2002, 146). In commercial loans and financial transactions it is very common to agree the imputation to unsecured debt. In AUSTRIA the creditor cannot be forced to accept partial payment (CC § 1415 first sentence). In SLOVENIA where one debt is secured and the other is not, the payment is imputed to the non-secured debt. See LOA § 287(3). See also the SLOVAK Ccom art. 330 under which, in the case of monetary obligations where the debtor has not imputed payment, payment will be imputed first to the obligation with least security and then to the obligation which is first to fall due.

VII. Current accounts

13. The rules on imputation of performance usually are not applied to payments made on a current account (cf. for BELGIUM: Cass. 26 February 1886, Pas. belge 1886 I 90; ENGLAND: Clayton's Case (1816) 1 Mer. 572, 608; 35 ER 781, 793; FRANCE: Chavanne & Ponsard no. 46; GERMANY: RG 7 January 1916, RGZ 87, 434, 438, BGH 11 June 1980, BGHZ 77, 256, 261; SCOTLAND: Royal Bank v. Christie (1841) 2 Rob. 118 (H.L.)). In AUSTRIA this used to be the case but now the new UGB § 355(2) refers to the general provisions; see Koziol in Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger, ABGB, 2nd ed., § 1416 no. 11.); PORTUGAL: Varela II 59 (note 1), Leitão II, 173.

III.–2:111: Property not accepted

(1) A person who has an obligation to deliver or return corporeal property other than money and who is left in possession of the property because of the creditor's failure to accept or retake the property, has an ancillary obligation to take reasonable steps to protect and preserve it.

(2) The debtor may obtain discharge from the obligation to deliver or return and from the ancillary obligation mentioned in the preceding paragraph:

(a) by depositing the property on reasonable terms with a third person to be held to the order of the creditor, and notifying the creditor of this; or

(b) by selling the property on reasonable terms after notice to the creditor, and paying the net proceeds to the creditor.

(3) Where, however, the property is liable to rapid deterioration or its preservation is unreasonably expensive, the debtor has an obligation to take reasonable steps to dispose of it. The debtor may obtain discharge from the obligation to deliver or return by paying the net proceeds to the creditor.

(4) The debtor left in possession is entitled to be reimbursed or to retain out of the proceeds of sale any costs reasonably incurred.

COMMENTS

A. Scope of the rule

This Article deals with a specific form of prevention of performance, namely the creditor's failure to take delivery or to retake corporeal property, other than money, tendered by the debtor. The effect of failure to accept a tender of money is covered by the next Article.

The scope of the provision is fixed in paragraph (1) and comprises three different situations. In the first a party who is obliged to deliver corporeal property (e.g. under a contract of sale) has made a tender conforming to the terms regulating the obligation but the other party refuses to take delivery. In the second situation the party to whom delivery was to be made has received the property but has lawfully rejected it, and the other party fails to retake it. In the third situation an obligation has been lawfully terminated and a party who had received property under it has then to return the property to the other party. If the other party refuses to accept it, the present Article applies.

For the application of the Article it is irrelevant whether or not the refusal to accept property is a non-performance of an obligation.

The laws of the Member States often regulate the situations covered by this Article by scattered and fragmentary rules but some have an integrated approach like that of the present Article.

B. Protection and preservation of the property

Where this provision applies, the party who is unwillingly left in possession of property is not on that account entitled to abandon the goods or wantonly to leave them exposed to loss, damage or theft. The party must take reasonable steps for their protection, e.g. by taking them back or depositing them in a store or warehouse (paragraph (2)).

C. Perishables and goods expensive to preserve

In the case of perishables, the obligation to protect encompasses sale of the perishables where they are in danger of deteriorating. The same applies if the expenses of preserving the goods are unreasonably high, i.e. disproportionate to the value of the goods; this covers also the case where the goods take much space which is urgently needed by the debtor. In both cases the party must take reasonable steps for disposition, depending on the value of the goods on the one hand and the trouble and expense of finding a favourable opportunity for sale on the other hand (paragraph (3)).

D. Legal consequences

The Article imposes an obligation to protect and preserve the goods. However, the party left in possession of them is not relieved from the original obligation to deliver or return them.

If the party left in possession wishes to be freed from the obligation to deliver, or to return, the property or its substitute must be made available to the other party. The steps which can be taken to achieve this purpose are prescribed in paragraph (2) for property in general and in paragraph (3) sentence 2 for perishables and equivalent goods.

E. Discharge of party left in possession

In paragraph (2) two ways are set out by which the party left in possession of property (the debtor) may be discharged from the obligation to deliver or to return the property.

The debtor may deposit the property on reasonable terms with a third party to be held to the order of the creditor. The debtor can recover under paragraph (4) all storage charges reasonably incurred. In most cases, the deposit is likely to be a prelude to the debtor's exercise of the power of sale under sub-paragraph (b), for the debtor will be responsible to the depositary for the latter's charges and may find it impossible to recover these from the creditor.

Alternatively, the debtor may sell or otherwise dispose of the object on reasonable terms. The interests of the creditor are protected by requiring that the debtor normally act only after reasonable notice; in the case of perishables this notice may be very short or no notice may be needed at all. The debtor must then account to the creditor for the net proceeds of the disposal. The debtor may be entitled to set off a right (e.g. to the payment of damages for non-performance of an obligation) against the creditor's entitlement to the net proceeds.

If the debtor had already sold the goods according to paragraph (2) sentence 1, discharge from the obligation to deliver or return may be obtained by paying the net proceeds (see paragraph (4)) of the sale to the creditor.

F. Other remedies unaffected

If by not taking delivery the creditor fails to perform an obligation, the debtor is entitled to exercise any of the remedies available for non-performance, including damages.

NOTES

1. In combining in one rule several factual situations where a party has not accepted property, the Article uses a new and original approach.

I. Duty of preservation

2. Some European laws expressly provide that if the buyer without justification fails to take delivery of the goods, the seller must take reasonable care of them (U.K. Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 20(3); DANISH SGA § 33; FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs §§ 72-78; see also CISG art. 85. In the CZECH REPUBLIC (despite the fact that there is no general rule of transfer of property by consensus on the sale of a determined thing; even for movable property, the transfer of property takes place on the basis of a contract by the act of delivery, see CC § 133, for immovable property later, by the registration of buyer as a new owner in the land register) in case of mora creditoris, legislation, doctrine and jurisprudence organise a very similar debtor's obligation to preserve the goods during a reasonable time and – at the same time – allow to this debtor the right to take appropriate measures to prevent damage, see Ccom art. 462 and Štenglová, Plíva, Tomsa a kol., Obchodní zákoník – komentář, C.H. Beck Praha 2004, p. 1117. In other European laws, there is no special duty of protection which would exceed what is required by good faith and fair dealing (for PORTUGAL Soares & Ramos 243 and 245). By contrast, for the case of mora creditoris it is expressly provided in some systems that the debtor is responsible only for deliberate or reckless acts or omissions (GERMAN CC § 300(1); GREEK CC art. 355; PORTUGUESE CC art. 814(1); ESTONIAN LOA § 119(2); this is acknowledged by AUSTRIAN courts also as a result of the general rule laid down in CC § 1419); compare BELGIAN CA Antwerp 29 October 1980, R.W. 1981-82, 1563, and see Pothier no.55. See also NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:90 which includes both non-performance and mora creditoris. In SPANISH law there is a duty of preservation as a result of CC arts. 1167 ff, 1185, 1452(3), 1505, 1589 and 1590; as a general rule, CC art. 1094 subjects the debtor in this situation to the duties of a depositary. There is a duty of preservation in SLOVAK law, in a contract to purchase, under CC § 592 and in SLOVENIAN law under the LOA § 301.

3. The other factual situation covered by paragraph (1), i.e. that of the party left in possession of non-conforming goods, is in the NETHERLANDS governed by a general rule in CC art. 7:29, in FINLAND and SWEDEN by SGA § 73; in ESTONIA by special rule for contracts of sale (LOA § 229); and in CISG by art. 86. In GERMANY and AUSTRIA a corresponding rule applies to commercial transactions and where delivery is made from one place to another (Ccom § 379 and AUSTRIAN UGB § 379, respectively - Distanzkauf; see Heymann (-Emmerich) HGB, § 379 nos. 3 and 4). In non-commercial cases, good faith and fair dealing may require the party not to let the goods perish, but they may be sent back (Schlegelberger (-Hefermehl) § 379 HGB no. 1).

4. Some countries have specific provisions placing the cost of preserving goods on a party who has failed to accept them (e.g. a buyer who has failed to accept delivery, UK Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 37, CISG art. 85 sent 2; a seller who has failed to take back goods properly rejected by the buyer, CISG art. 86(1) sentence 2; or generally, DANISH SGA § 36, FINNISH and SWEDISH SGA § 75; CZECH commercial law, see Ccom art. 462). Other laws deal with the issue in the context of mora creditoris, and therefore impose the costs on the creditor (GERMAN CC § 304; GREEK CC art. 358 and A.P. 115/1970, NoB 18 (1970) 811, 812; POLISH CC art. 486; PORTUGUESE CC art. 816; ESTONIAN LOA §§ 120(5), 125(6)). ITALY CC art.

1207(2). Moreover, a general duty of preservation may be inferred from the general principle of good faith and fair dealing set forth in art. 1175, and by the provisions laid down in arts. 1176 and 1177 concerning diligence in performance and the obligation to safeguard). In AUSTRIA this is deduced from the general rules on benevolent intervention (Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag).

II. Depositing goods

5. A party left with goods after a failure to take them by the other (mora creditoris) is expressly given a right of deposit by CISG art. 87 as well as in FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG (CC arts. 1264 and 1961(3), M.E. Storme, Invloed no. 451); AUSTRIA (CC §§ 1525, 1425); THE NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:66); FINLAND and SWEDEN (SGA § 74); ESTONIA (LOA § 124, with effect of discharging the debtor, unless deposited with right of reclamation LOA § 122(1)) and ITALY (CC art. 1210 - see also arts. 1212, 1514-1515, 1686 and 1690. In the case of immovables, where deposit is obviously not possible, the Italian CC art. 1219 provides for the possibility of a discharging seizure of the goods). There is also a right of deposit in the CZECH REPUBLIC in commercial cases (Ccom art. 462); SLOVAKIA (CC § 568, but judicial permission is required) and SLOVENIA (LOA §§ 302–310, but rigid procedural rules must be complied with). The situation is similar SPAIN (CC art. 1176, Ccom art. 332 and old Civil Procedure Code art. 2.127 (still in force as to this issue); POLAND (CC art. 486 § 1 and arts. 467-470); and PORTUGAL, where deposit discharges the obligation (see CC arts. 841 ff) but a court procedure is necessary (CCP arts. 1024 ff, see Varela II 186, Cordeiro II 217, Leitão II 191). In GERMANY, discharge by deposit is provided for in CC § 378 only for money and valuables, but in commercial cases deposit of other goods is possible under Ccom § 373.

6. In FRANCE, the party left in possession has an effective alternative to the complicated method of depositing: asking for a court order compelling the creditor to take away or accept the goods, combined with an astreinte (judicial penalty) in case of disobedience (Malaurie and Aynès, Obligations no. 1019). In SCOTLAND a decree of specific implement of the obligation of the other party to take or accept the goods, combined with penalties for contempt of court in case of disobedience, would also be available in theory but does not seem to be used much, if at all, in practice.

7. In GERMANY deposit in a case of mora creditoris between merchants does not discharge the debtor under Ccom § 373(1) as opposed to a deposit under CC § 378. This is the same in AUSTRIA (§ 373(1) UGB). Nor is there a direct equivalent to paragraph (2)(a) in ENGLAND. If a buyer refuses to take the goods and the property has not yet passed, the seller's only remedy will be to terminate the contractual relationship and claim damages from the buyer (see e.g. Stein, Forbes & Co. Ltd. v. County Tailoring Co. Ltd. (1916) 86 L.J.K.B. 448 (K.B.)).

III. Resale

8. Resale as a means of self-help in paragraph (2)(b) is known in AUSTRIA in Ccom § 373(2)-(5) in cases of mora creditoris between merchants and in the GERMAN CC §§ 383-386; and similarly under the PORTUGUESE Ccom art. 474; and the FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs § 76. Except in the Scandinavian laws and the CZECH law, however, generally only sale by auction is permitted. Only when the goods have a market price is a sale through officially licensed brokers or auctioneers for the current price admitted (GERMAN CC § 385 and Ccom § 373(2)). The place and time of such sale are not expressly regulated, but are subject to the seller's diligent determination (Baumbach/Hopt (-Hopt), HGB, §§ 373, 374 no. 19-22). Outside commercial sales contracts the place of the sale is the place of performance (CC § 383(1)) subject to some exceptions (CC § 383(2)). In DENMARK (SGA § 34), FINLAND and SWEDEN (SGA § 76(3)), the CZECH REBUBLIC (Ccom art. 466), AUSTRIA and GERMANY (UGB § 373(2) and Ccom § 373(2) and GERMAN CC § 384) prior notice of the sale must be given; it must be so timely and sufficiently clear as to give the buyer the opportunity to take proper steps to protect his interests (ROHG 11 January 1876, ROHGE 19, 293 (293 f.)). The notice is dispensed with for emergency sales and when it is not reasonably feasible (Ccom § 373(2) sentences 3 and 4 and CC § 384(1) and (3)). According to Ccom § 373(3) resale which is justified as self-help takes place for the account of the defaulting buyer; the latter remains liable for that part of the purchase price which is not covered by the proceeds of the resale; and the same result follows from CC § 383(1). ESTONIAN law is generally similar. However, LOA § 125(1) provides for a right to resale only if depositing is unreasonable or impossible due to the nature of the goods, in case of rapid deterioration or unreasonably expensive preservation or if the period of deposit may be of unpredictable length because the debtor does not know and does not have to know the identity of the creditor.

9. Also GREEK law allows the debtor, during the creditor's default and after notice to the latter, to dispose of the object at public auction and to pay the proceeds to a public entity ("Deposits and Loans Fund") for the creditor's account; notice may be dispensed with if the object is liable to perish or if notice is particularly difficult (CC art. 428). An auction can be dispensed with by leave of the judge, if the object has a market price or small value (art. 429). On sale by auction or "in a similar reasonable way", see also DANISH SGA § 34. In ITALY, resale on merely "reasonable terms" is allowed only in the special case of deposit of goods in a public warehouse (CC art. 1789 but see also art. 1211 allowing the debtor, in the case of perishable goods or goods whose custody is expensive, to sell them). Under SPANISH law, resale is permitted after termination of the contractual relationship and may even be required in order to mitigate the damages (Carrasco, Comentario, p. 736 and TS 23 May 2005, RAJ 2005/ 6364).

10. BELGIAN law has different provisions for different contracts: sales, see CC art. 1657; carriage, see Transport Contract Act art. 8; on contracts for custody, cleaning, repair, etc. of goods, see Act of 21 February 1983.

11. In the CZECH REPUBLIC, in cases of mora creditoris between merchants, the party in delay (i.e. the buyer) can be urged by the seller to take delivery of the goods. Notice of the seller’s intention to resell the goods can be sent to the buyer and then a reasonable period for response can be set. After this period has expired without result, the seller is entitled to sell the goods in an appropriate manner to another buyer (see Ccom art. 466 in fine, the commentary by Štenglová, Plíva, Tomsa a kol., Obchodní zákoník – komentář, C.H. Beck Praha 2004, p. 1119, and an elementary but accurate synthesis by Miloš Tomsa in Hendrych a kol. Právnický slovník, C.H. Beck Praha 2006, p, 1055).

12. In ENGLAND, resale according to the Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 48 has the effect of terminating the original contractual relationship. The resale is on the seller's own account and the buyer is liable in damages for the seller's net loss (R.v. Ward Ltd. v. Bignall [1967] 1 QB 534. SCOTTISH law is the same.

13. In SLOVENIA a resale is only allowed in cases of rapid deterioration or when goods are not suitable for deposit, or when the cost of deposit is excessive with regard to the value (see LOA § 308).

IV. Rapid deterioration

14. In sales, the party's duty to effect a resale in case of rapid deterioration or unreasonably expensive preservation is recognised in AUSTRIA; see, however, AUSTRIAN UGB § 379(2): such goods "can" be sold, DENMARK (SGA § 35), FINLAND and SWEDEN (SGA § 76(2)), the CZECH REPUBLIC (see Ccom art. 467: if the goods are perishable or if the preservation involves excessive costs, the seller is legally bound to take measures to sell the goods and has to notify the other party only if this notification is still possible) and the NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 6:66 and 7:30). BELGIAN case law reaches the same result: Court of Appeals Brussels 3 July 1931, Jur. P. Anvers 418; see M E Storme, Invloed N° 393; Demogue VI, nos. 26 and 45. In ITALY, CC art. 1211 on mora creditoris is similar, but it requires judicial approval and merely authorises, but does not oblige, the debtor to resell (Cattaneo 217). CISG art. 88 also allows resale as a form of self-help; similarly SPANISH law, Vicent Chuliá II 108. Under ESTONIAN law, the debtor must effect a resale if sale is clearly in the interests of the creditor or if the creditor gives notice that the creditor requires the movable to be sold (LOA § 125(3)). The GERMAN Ccom only gives an option to sell rejected goods.

15. In HUNGARIAN civil law the provisions on so called "responsible custody" are applicable in all the situations where someone has to keep a thing in the interest of another person without being entitled or obliged to do so. These general provisions are located in the law of things in the Hungarian CC. Under CC § 196(1) a person who keeps a thing in the interest of another person without being entitled or obliged to do so by a special legal relationship must provide for the safekeeping of the thing at the cost and risk of the entitled party until such party takes over the thing (responsible custody). Responsible custodians may retain the thing until their expenses are reimbursed. Under CC § 196(2) responsible custodians must not use the thing during the period of responsible custody, unless its use is required for maintenance. If they use the thing in spite of such prohibition, they are liable to the entitled party for all damage that would not otherwise have occurred. Under CC § 196(3) a responsible custodian must surrender the existing proceeds of a thing and reimburse the value of the proceeds consumed or not collected, less any claims proceeding from the custody. Under § 197(1) if an entitled party fails to remove a thing within a reasonable period of time, despite being requested to do so, and the relocation of the thing would involve unreasonable difficulties or require an advance on costs, the responsible custodian is allowed to sell or use the thing. Under § 197(2) perishable things, whenever possible, must be sold or utilised. Under § 197(3) the sum received from the sale or consideration of a utilised thing is due to the entitled party.

III.–2:112: Money not accepted

(1) Where a creditor fails to accept money properly tendered by the debtor, the debtor may after notice to the creditor obtain discharge from the obligation to pay by depositing the money to the order of the creditor in accordance with the law of the place where payment is due.

(2) Paragraph (1) applies, with appropriate adaptations, to money properly tendered by a third party in circumstances where the creditor is not entitled to refuse such performance.

COMMENTS

A. Explanation

This provision enables the debtor in a monetary obligation, after notice, to be freed from the obligation to pay by depositing the money in any manner authorised by the law of the place for payment, e.g. by paying it into court. (The question of which methods of payment are authorised falls outside the scope of these rules.) This possibility is now recognised in many, though not all, Member States and is clearly convenient to the debtor while (because of the conditions imposed) posing little or no risk to the creditor.

The deposit must be to the order of the creditor so that the creditor obtains the right to dispose of the money deposited. The notice to the creditor must be reasonable both with respect to the method of transmission and with respect to the time given to the first party to reply.

B. Scope of application

The provision applies to any obligation to pay whether or not contractual. So it applies, for example, both to an obligation to pay the price under a contract for the sale of goods and to an obligation to pay damages. The tender of payment must have been properly made - i.e. it must have been in conformity with the terms regulating the obligation to pay.

For the application of the Article it is irrelevant whether or not the refusal to accept money is a non-performance of an obligation.

C. Payment by a third person

There are situations where an obligation which does not require personal performance can be performed by a third person and where the creditor cannot refuse performance. The payment of money will not usually require personal performance. Paragraph (3) of the Article covers this situation.

NOTES

I. Depositing money

1. European laws generally have detailed rules on deposit of money for cases of mora creditoris (DENMARK: Depositing Act 1932 § 1; FINLAND: Depositing Act 1931; FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CC arts. 1257-1264; GERMANY: CC §§ 372 et seq.; GREECE: CC art. 427; ITALY: CC art. 1206 ff, PORTUGAL: CC art.

841(1) (b); SPAIN: CC art. 1176; SLOVAKIA: CC § 568; CZECH REPUBLIC: CC § 568, Občanský soudní řád § 352, Vyhláška ministerstva spravedlnosti č. 37/1992 Sb. § 105 ff; ESTONIA: LOA §§ 121-123; SWEDEN: Act on Depositing 1927 § 1). In SWEDEN, depositing is permitted only in certain cases, particularly when the debtor has difficulty in discovering the correct payee: Rodhe, Obligationsrätt 130. In contrast, ENGLAND and SCOTLAND have no equivalent rule. In IRELAND payment may be made into court, Clark 403. In the CZECH REPUBLIC, the payment has to be made into official custody if the debtor is unable to pay the creditor who is absent or in default or unknown or if there are justified doubts about the creditor's identity (see CC § 568 and its commentary by Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová a kol., Občanský zákoník – komentář, p. 730-733).

2. Deposit is to be made either with a court (AUSTRIA: CC § 1425; GERMANY: Regulation on Deposits, § 1(2); POLAND: CC arts. 467-470 and art. 486; SLOVENIA: Act on Non-contentious Civil Procedure arts. 168–177; SPAIN: CC art. 1178; SLOVAKIA CC § 568; CZECH REPUBLIC: Občanský soudní řád § 352) or with a special Deposits and Loans Fund (BELGIUM: Royal Decree of 18 March 1935, though there is some flexibility in judicial practice; FRANCE: Law of 28 July 1875, D. 15 December 1875; GREECE: CC art. 430 and Presidential Decree of 30 December 1926/ 3 January 1927) or the enforcement authority or a financial institution (DENMARK: Law on Depositing § 6; FINLAND and SWEDEN, Laws on Depositing, § 1) or a person whose business it is to take custody of sums of money (NETHERLANDS: CC arts. 6:67, 6:68) or a public notary (ESTONIA: LOA § 120(1)). According to ITALIAN law, the deposit can be made at a banking institution, as provided by art. 1212(5). As far as deadlines are concerned, see Cass. 9 March 2001, no. 3481 in Giur. It. 2001, 2581.

3. A deposit often has the effect of liberating the debtor from the monetary obligation (for BELGIUM, FRANCE, the NORDIC countries and PORTUGAL see above, para. 1). In the CZECH REPUBLIC, the placement of money into official custody has an effect of performance, see CC § 568. The same applies in GERMANY, provided the depositor waives the right of reclaiming the money (see CC § 378), AUSTRIA (CC § 1425) after a definite refusal, POLAND (CC art. 470) and in ITALY and SPAIN when the deposit is accepted by the creditor or approved by the court (Italian CC art. 1210(2), Spanish CC art. 1180). The position is similar in SLOVAKIA (CC § 568). Under ESTONIAN law, deposit has the effect of discharging the debtor, unless it is made with right of reclamation by notifying the depositary of the intention to retain the right to reclaim the property (LOA §§ 121(1), 122(1)).

4. In DENMARK and GERMANY if the depositor does not waive the right to reclaim the money, and generally in SPAIN, deposit does not discharge the debtor from the obligation. In Germany, the debtor has merely the right to refer the creditor to the deposited asset; the debtor no longer bears the risk and need no longer pay interest or compensation for fruits reaped (German CC § 379).

II. Notice to creditor

5. A prior notice to the creditor is, in contrast to the Article, not required in GREECE (Capodistrias in ErmAK II/2 art. 427 no. 11 (1954)) Stathopoulos, Obligations § 24, no. 22; the CZECH REPUBLIC (see CC art. 568 as commented by Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová a kol., Občanský zákoník – komentář, p. 730-732) or GERMANY, where a subsequent notice given without undue delay suffices (CC § 374(2) sent. 1). ESTONIAN law is similar, see LOA § 120(3). See also the FINNISH Act on Depositing § 2(2)) and the SWEDISH Act on Depositing § 3. A notice may sometimes even be dispensed with (GREEK CC art. 430; GERMAN CC § 374(2) sentence 2).

Prior notice is also not required in AUSTRIA. In GERMANY, GREECE, DENMARK and POLAND, if notice is omitted, the deposit is nevertheless valid (Palandt (-Heinrichs) BGB, § 374 no. 1), but it may give rise to a claim for damages (Germany: CC § 374(2) sentence 1; Greece: AP 161/1977, NoB 25 (1977) 1156, 1157, CA Athens 4534/1987 HellDni 29 (1988) 945, CFI Thessaloniki 2344/1988 Harmenopoulos MB (1988) 588; Danish Law on Depositing § 1(3)); and POLISH CC art. 468). Other countries require a judicial or other procedure (FRANCE: CC art. 1258(7); ITALY: CC art. 1212; PORTUGAL: CCP arts. 1024 ff; SPAIN: CC art. 1178, Royal Decree 34/1988, CCP art. 2127 (third parties who are interested must be given prior notice, CC art. 1177)).

III. Costs of deposit

6. The costs of deposit are imposed upon the creditor who failed to accept the money (FRANCE: CC art. 1260; GERMAN CC § 381, ITALIAN CC art. 1215; (inverting the general rule set forth in art. 1196, placing the expenses upon the debtor) POLISH CC art. 470; SPANISH CC art. 1179; SLOVAKIA CC § 568; CZECH CC § 568 in fine; ESTONIAN LOA § 120(5)).

7. In the HUNGARIAN CC § 287(1) if the identity of the creditor is uncertain, if the creditor's domicile or registered place of business is unknown, or if the creditor is late, an obligation to pay cash or deliver securities or other documents can also be performed through deposit in court. Under CC § 287(2) when making the deposit, the debtor is entitled to stipulate that the deposit can only be surrendered to the creditor upon their performance of consideration or upon the provision of security therefore; the deposit may be withdrawn until the creditor is notified thereof. Under CC § 287(3) the deposit is effected at the court having jurisdiction for the place of performance or the domicile or registered office of the debtor. The costs of the deposit are borne by the creditor.

III.–2:113: Costs and formalities of performance

(1) The costs of performing an obligation are borne by the debtor.

(2) In the case of a monetary obligation the debtor's obligation to pay includes taking such steps and complying with such formalities as may be necessary to enable payment to be made.

COMMENTS

The performance of obligations usually entails costs and often involves complying with formalities. Transportation, money transfers, government licences, risk insurance, etc. will all have to be paid for. Paragraph (1) lays down that such costs are to be borne by the debtor, the performing party. Paragraph (2) particularises this for the case of monetary obligations, making it clear that the debtor bears the responsibility of taking such steps and complying with such formalities as may be necessary to enable payment to be made. The rule is commonly found in relation to sale but is included here because it is of a more general nature.

Illustration

A orders a book from Publishers B, located in another country, after B has stated a price for the book knowing that A resides in another country. The Publishers may not invoice A extra for the costs of mailing the book, unless this was agreed. Likewise, A has to bear the costs of paying for the book through an international money order or other means of payment.

NOTES

1. This provision is in line with the law in most jurisdictions in Europe. See for instance FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs art. 1248, DUTCH CC art. 6:47, ESTONIAN LOA § 90 (§ 215 for contracts of sale), GERMAN CC § 364, SPANISH CC art. 1168, ITALIAN CC art. 1196 and the FINNISH Act on Depositing § 6(2). The rule is considered self-evident under AUSTRIAN, SLOVENIAN and POLISH law. The same applies to ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law: there is no explicit statement of a general rule but the principle is illustrated by Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 29(6), under which the seller must bear the expenses of putting goods into a deliverable state: see Chitty on Contracts II, no. 41-195. The rule also applies in PORTUGAL (Telles 294), although the present CC has dropped the express provision to this point contained in art. 746 of the old Code of 1867. UNIDROIT art. 6.1.11 is to the same effect as this Article. In CZECH law, the rule is applied for both non-monetary and monetary obligations in civil (see Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová a kol. Občanský zákoník – komentář, 8. vydání, Praha 2003, p. 728 ad § 567 para. 2 in fine) or commercial relationships. Nevertheless, it is expressly stated only for commercial monetary obligations (see Ccom art. 337.1: the debtor performs the monetary obligation at the debtor's own risk and cost; and cf., for settlement of a monetary obligation through a bank, Ccom art. 339.1: the obligation is settled by crediting the payment to the creditor's bank account). There is no general rule stated in SLOVAK law but specific provisions are found for particular types of contracts, for example contracts to purchase (CC § 593).
2. In the HUNGARIAN CC § 283(3) unless otherwise provided by legal regulation, the costs of physical delivery, including the costs of packaging and measuring, are to be borne by the debtor, while the costs of receiving delivery are to be borne by the creditor.

3. In the GREEK law, CC art. 425 stipulates that the costs of the pay-off receipt are borne by the debtor, if something else does not derive from the relationship with the creditor. In relation to sale, in CC art. 526 it is mentioned that the seller bears the costs for the delivery of the thing which was sold and especially for weighing or measuring or numbering; the buyer bears the expenses of taking over and of dispatching to a place other than the place of performance. On the other hand as far as expenses of the contract of sale and of transcription are concerned, it is mentioned in CC art. 527 that the expenses and the charges required for the written drawing up of a contract charge both parties in equal shares. The buyer of an immovable or of a right in an immovable is burdened with the transcription expenses (see Ap. Georgiadis, Law of Obligations, Special Part, I, 2004, § 6 no. 23).

III.–2:114: Extinctive effect of performance

Full performance extinguishes the obligation if it is:

(a) in accordance with the terms regulating the obligation; or

(b) of such a type as by law to afford the debtor a good discharge.

COMMENTS

It is obvious that full performance in accordance with the terms regulating the obligation will extinguish the obligation. It is the corollary which is important: performance which is not full or not in conformity with the terms regulating the obligation will not extinguish the obligation. This, however, is subject to the qualification that there are various situations where these rules provide for the debtor to obtain a good discharge even if performance is not strictly in accordance with the obligation. For example the rules on assignment sometimes enable the debtor to obtain a good discharge by paying the "wrong" creditor in good faith. And III.–2:107 (Performance by a third person) provides for performance by a party other than the debtor to be effective in some situations. Other rules of this nature are to be found in the Chapter on Plurality.

NOTES

1. This rule is generally accepted even if not always considered worthy of express legislative statement, but see for GERMANY CC § 362. In SLOVAK law CC § 562 provides that an obligation is discharged by performance to the person with creditor's confirmation. In CZECH law, see CC §§ 559 ff ("a debt is discharged by its performance"; "a debt must be duly and timeously fulfilled") as commented by Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová a kol. Občanský zákoník – komentář, 8. vydání, Praha 2003, pp. 711 ff and Ccom arts. 324 ff ("an obligation is discharged when performed to the creditor duly and in time") as commented by Štenglová, Plíva, Tomsa a kol. Obchodní zákoník – komentář, pp. 1012 ff. In SCOTTISH law it is accepted that an obligation is extinguished by due performance, Gloag and Henderson 3.20. In DUTCH law the same holds true, but was not considered worthy of express legislative statement (Parl. Gesch. Boek 6, p. 153). The rule is fully recognised, but is not expressed in the POLISH CC. In ENGLISH law a contractual promise will be discharged by due performance (Halsbury's Vol. 9(1) 4th ed. 1998, Reissue para. 920).
2. The SPANISH CC regulates the different ways of extinction of an obligation in art. 1156; full performance is one of them and art. 1157 states that it has to be not only in accordance with the obligation, but also it has to be complete. Regarding the discharge, CC art. 1164 enables the debtor to obtain a good discharge of an obligation by paying in good faith to the person who seems to be the creditor, when there is a sufficient legal appearance, e.g. when the creditor has transferred the right to a third party and the debtor does not know that this has been done (vide CC art. 1527). The Supreme Court does not consider a fake signature as a sufficient legal appearance to cause a good discharge (i.e. TS 1 March 1994, RAJ 1994/1636). In any case, the good or bad faith of the creditor is irrelevant in this case, but the objective good faith of the debtor has to be proved (cfr. TS 17 October 1998, RAJ 1998/7439). However, the receipt of payment by the person who does not have the right to be paid creates an obligation to restore it (CC art. 1895).

3. In FRANCE and BELGIUM CC art. 1235 expressly provides that an obligation is discharged upon: payment, delivery (as in the present article), novation, set-off, confusion, loss of thing, nullity or rescinding, fulfilment of a resolutive condition and prescription (Bénabent no. 780 et seq.). However, the list is rather diverse and it is an open list and not limitative.

4. In GREEK LAW, see CC art. 416, the obligation is extinguished by payment. The CC means by payment the fulfilment of the performance, that is, the satisfaction of the creditor in accordance with the aim of the obligation (see Stathopoulos, Contract Law in Hellas, no. 228).

CHAPTER 3: REMEDIES FOR NON-PERFORMANCE

Section 1: General

III.–3:101: Remedies available

(1) If an obligation is not performed by the debtor and the non-performance is not excused, the creditor may resort to any of the remedies set out in this Chapter.

(2) If the debtor's non-performance is excused, the creditor may resort to any of those remedies except enforcing specific performance and damages.

(3) The creditor may not resort to any of those remedies to the extent that the creditor caused the debtor's non-performance

COMMENTS

A. Remedies available

The remedies available for non-performance of an obligation depend upon whether the non-performance is not excused, is excused due to an impediment or results from behaviour of the other party. This represents the common core of the laws of the Member States, though some reach broadly similar results through a rather different conceptual structure.

Non-performance which is not excused. A non-performance which is not excused may give the creditor the right to claim performance - recovery of money due or specific performance - to claim damages, to withhold performance of a reciprocal obligation, to terminate the contractual relationship in whole or in part and to reduce the price (if a price is payable). If a party violates an obligation to receive or accept performance the other party may also make use of the remedies just mentioned.

Non-performance which is excused. A non-performance which is excused due to an impediment does not give the creditor the right to claim specific performance or to claim damages. However, the other remedies may be available.

A has let his land to B for ten years and B has undertaken to grow vines on the land. B plants vines but the vines die from phylloxera which invades the region. Although B's failure to grow vines is excused, and B therefore is not liable in damages, B has not performed his obligations under the contract and A can terminate the lease, with the effect that the whole contractual relationship will come to an end.

Illustration 2
A in Torino has undertaken to lease a motor lorry to B in Grenoble from December 1 and to deliver it on that day in Grenoble. The lorry is held up at the frontier due to a road block unexpectedly effected by French farmers, and arrives in Grenoble on December 15. Although A is not liable for the delay, B can withhold payment until delivery is made of the lorry, and may then deduct 15 days rent from the sum to be paid.

Non-performance wholly or partially caused by the creditor. The fact that the non-performance is caused by the creditor's act or omission has an effect on the remedies open to the creditor. This is expressed by the third paragraph of the text. It would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing for the creditor to have a remedy when responsible for the non-performance.

The most obvious situation is the so-called mora creditoris, where the creditor directly prevents performance (e.g.: access refused to a building site). But there are other cases where the creditor's behaviour has an influence on the breach and its consequences. For example, when there is an obligation to give information to the other party, and the information given is wrong or incomplete, the contract is imperfectly performed.

A has contracted to design schools to be built by B in the Tripolis area, and is expecting instructions from B as to the exact location of the schools. Due to dissensions in its staff, B fails to give the instructions within the stipulated period of time, which prevents A from designing the schools. The non-performance on A's side does not give B the right to exercise any remedy, but A will have a remedy against B.

Illustration 4
The facts are the same as in Illustration 3 except that B's failure to give instructions is due to the fact that the relevant member of B's staff has been killed in an air crash on the way to Libya. Although B is not liable for the failure to instruct A, the non-performance on A's side does not give B any remedies either.

In other cases where there is also a non-performance by the debtor, the creditor may exercise the remedies for non-performance to a limited extent.

When the loss is caused both by the debtor - who has not performed - and the creditor - whose behaviour has partially caused the breach - the creditor should not have the whole range of remedies.

The creditor's contribution to the non-performance has an effect on the remedy "to the extent that the creditor caused the debtor’s non-performance". This effect may be total, that is to say that the creditor cannot exercise any remedy, or partial.

Illustration 5
A agrees to carry B's glassware from Copenhagen to Paris but subjects the packages to rough handling. This would have broken some of the glass which is fragile but not some heavy pieces of thick glass. B, however, has not packed any of the glass properly and all is ruined. B can refuse to pay the carriage charges and recover damages in respect of the fragile glass, but not in respect of the heavy glass.

The word “caused” does not carry any implication that the creditor is at fault. Even if the creditor has been unavoidably prevented from doing something which was necessary to enable the debtor to perform, the creditor is still barred from resorting to remedies for the non-performance.

Illustration 6
A has concluded a contract with B under which B is to paint some rooms in A's house. On the day when the work is to begin A is unavoidably and unexpectedly detained somewhere, is unable to contact anyone and cannot open the house or arrange for it to be opened to allow B access. A cannot recover damages from B for non-performance.

In the situation described in this last example B could also not recover damages from A because A's non-performance of the obligation to co-operate would have been due to an impediment beyond A's control. (See III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment).

B. Normal remedy for non-performance of monetary obligation

The normal remedy for non-performance of a monetary obligation will be recovery of the sum due plus interest for any delay in payment. However, damages may also be recoverable if there is any further loss.

NOTES

I. Remedies covered - the excused non-performance

1. Several legal systems use the concept of non-performance both for excused and non-excused non-performance. This is true of kontraktsbrott and misligholdelse in NORDIC (or sopimusrikkomus in FINNISH law, of kohustuse rikkumine in ESTONIAN law, of tekortkoming in DUTCH and BELGIAN law and of breach under CISG, see arts. 45, 61). Remedies such as termination and price reduction are available to the creditor in both situations. Thus a performance prevented by force majeure is treated as a non-performance. In the CZECH REPUBLIC, the concept of excused non-performance is not frequently used but exists especially in commercial legal relationships (see Ccom arts. 367 and 382).
2. Some laws follow another system. In ENGLISH and IRISH laws there is breach of contract only in the case of a non-excused non-performance. Under theses systems, however, contract liability is strict liability, and will occur in most cases of non-performance. In the rarer case where the failure to perform is excused, the creditor's remedies will be circumscribed. The most obvious case is if the contract has been discharged by frustration, when the remedies will be of a generally restitutionary nature (see Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943, but this Act does not apply in IRELAND; there the common law still applies. In SCOTLAND the notion of breach of contract is similar but the remedies for frustrated contracts depend upon the general law of unjustified enrichment, see Cantiere San Rocco SA v. Clyde Shipbuilding & Engineering Co. Ltd. 1923 SC (HL) 105. However, under all three systems a party may be excused from a particular obligation without this invalidating the rest of the contract. It appears that the outcome is that the creditor may not claim damages in respect of the portion which is impossible but may enforce the remainder, H. R. & S. Sainsbury Ltd. v. Street [1972] 1 WLR 834. If the failure to perform deprives the creditor of the substance of what was contracted for then the creditor may terminate (Poussard v. Spiers and Pond (1875-76) 1 QBD 410). It will be seen that the outcome is similar to that under the Article.

3. In GERMAN law "Pflichtverletzung" does not presuppose that the debtor's non-performance was attributable to the debtor's fault, and apart from damages the remedies for non-performance, including specific performance, are available even in case of an excused failure to perform. For damages the rules on fault apply, see CC § 276. In several cases, however, the liability of the debtor is strict, of which the most practical is a failure to deliver generic goods, see the list at Staudinger (-Löwisch), BGB [2004], § 276 nos. 141 et seq. In most other cases the debtor's fault is presumed and the burden of disproving fault will be on the debtor, see CC § 280(1) sentence 2 and § 311a(2). The rules on impossibility no longer influence the standard of liability for damages but only provide a defence for the debtor against claims for specific performance. AUSTRIAN law is basically similar, see AGBG §§ 918 ff, damages may be awarded only if the non-performing party was at fault. Similarly, PORTUGUESE CC arts. 792, 793, 795, 801 ff. The position is the same in SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 246 in connection to § 131.

4. For certain obligations some systems will grant remedies for non-performance only if the non-performance was attributable to the debtor, and this frequently requires fault. Thus in BELGIAN, DUTCH, FRENCH, AND LUXEMBOURG law there is non-performance of an obligation de moyens only if there has been fault. The creditor must prove that the debtor did not act with the care required. However, in case of an obligation de résultat, the creditor must only prove that the result which the debtor undertook to provide has not been achieved. In either case the debtor is excused by force majeure which extinguishes the obligation. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1101, remedies for breach of contract in general do not depend on the debtor's fault. The essential wording is contravención a la obligación. However, the action for damages depends on fault, pursuant to CC art. 1105. But other remedies, such as rescission for breach (CC art. 1124) or reduction of price (CC art. 1486) or withholding of performance (CC art. 1467) are independent of fault, and should be granted in case the expectation of the creditor be frustrated (Carrasco, Comentarios al Código Civil y Compilaciones Forales, XV-1, 1989, 392 ff). In ITALIAN law CC art. 1218 provides for the debtor's liability without fault; scholars and case law, however, have recognized the difference between obligation de moyens and obligation de résultat for certain obligations (see Mengoni, Obbligazioni "di risultato" e "obbligazioni di mezzi" (studio critico) in Riv. Dir. Comm., 1954, I, 185 ff).

5. Under POLISH law the remedies are not available if the debtor proves that the non-performance or improper performance of the obligation was a result of circumstances for which the debtor is not liable (CC art. 471). Failing any stipulation to the contrary, the debtor is liable for not observing due diligence (CC art. 472 and art. 355), but the scope of circumstances for which the debtor will be liable can be determined by the parties in the contract (CC art. 473 § 1). The relevance of the distinction between "obligation de moyens" and "obligation de résultat" under Polish law is controversial. It seems that – under Polish law – the type of performance (which can be described either by "moyens" or by "résultat") does not influence the principles on the liability of the debtor, who can still prove the non-imputability of the non-performance. However, de facto the type of performance may have an influence on the allocation of the burden of proof as far as the non-performance is concerned. (For the controversies regarding this distinction under Polish law – see T. Dybowski, System Prawa Cywilnego (t. III, part 1), Ossolineum 1981, pp. 81-85; T. Pajor, Odpowiedzialność dłużnika za niewykonanie zobowiązania, Warszawa 1982, pp. 70-92).

6. In SLOVAK law the concept of non-performance is used both for excused and non-excused non-performance. The debtor who fails to perform the obligation duly and properly is considered to be in default. If the debtor fails to perform even within an additional adequate period granted by the creditor, the creditor is be entitled to withdraw from the agreement. As for a default with performance of a pecuniary debt, the creditor is entitled to ask the debtor to pay also default interest unless the CC stipulates that the debtor must pay a default charge. As for a default with performance of a thing, the debtor is liable for its loss, impairment or destruction unless this damage would have occurred even otherwise (CC § 517). The creditor's right to damages for loss caused by the debtor's default is not affected (CC § 519). Within commercial relationships the rule is that whoever breaches a contractual obligation is liable for compensation for the damage thus caused to another party, unless it is proved that the breach was caused by circumstances excluding the debtor's liability (Ccom art. 373).

II. Non-performance caused by the creditor

7. There is agreement among the legal systems that a non-performance which is due solely to the other party's wrongful prevention does not give the latter any remedy. In most of the systems the party who has prevented performance will be the non-performing party against whom the remedies may be exercised. However, in BELGIAN, DUTCH, GERMAN, GREEK and NORDIC law it is not generally considered to be a tekortkoming, Vertragsverletzung, (DANISH) Misligholdelse or (SWEDISH) Kontraktsbrott to prevent performance by the other party. It will depend upon whether the acceptance of the performance is an obligation of the creditor or whether it is only a kind of onus (Obliegenheit). Such an onus only protects the interest of the debtor in the reward and gives the debtor a defence against the creditor's remedies for non-performance; this last part is completely in line with III.–3:101(3). However, the party who has prevented performance by the other party remains bound to perform itself. In ITALIAN law CC arts. 1206 et seq. regulate the mora creditoris, which applies to the creditor who refuses performance without a legitimate reason or fails to do what is necessary to enable the debtor to perform (see Veneziano, in Antoniolli – Veneziano, Principles of European Contract Law and Italian Law – A Commentary, 360 ff). Similarly, PORTUGUESE CC art. 801(2) regulates the matter, although there is controversy among authors and court decisions as to the measure of damages.

8. Under SLOVAK law the debtor is not in default if the creditor fails to accept the debtor's duly and properly tendered performance or fails to grant the debtor assistance necessary for performance. In such cases, the creditor is liable to compensate the debtor for all costs that arose due to this default. Furthermore, the risk of an accidental destruction of the thing passes to the creditor. The debtor is also entitled to damages from the creditor for other losses caused by the default if the creditor can be charged with a fault (CC §§ 520 and 522).

9. See generally Mengoni, Contractual responsibility 1072; Zweigert and Kötz, Chapter 36; Treitel, Remedies passim.

III.–3:102: Cumulation of remedies

Remedies which are not incompatible may be cumulated. In particular, a creditor is not deprived of the right to damages by resorting to any other remedy.

A. Cumulation of remedies

Remedies which are not incompatible are cumulative. A party entitled to withhold performance of a reciprocal obligation and to terminate the contractual relationship may first withhold and then terminate. A party who pursues a remedy other than damages is not precluded from claiming damages. This applies in the exceptional case where damages can be claimed in addition to interest under III.–3:101 (Remedies available) paragraph (4). A party who terminates for fundamental non-performance may also claim damages.

B. Incompatible remedies

It is obvious that a party cannot at the same time pursue two or more remedies which are incompatible with each other. So a party cannot at the same time terminate an obligation and claim specific performance. A creditor who has accepted a non-conforming tender, the value of which is less than that of a conforming tender, and who has obtained a reduction of the price corresponding to the decrease in value, cannot also claim compensation for that same decrease in value as damages.

When two remedies are incompatible with each other, the creditor will often have to choose between them, see Comment C below.

C. Change of remedy

However, a creditor who has chosen one remedy is not precluded from shifting to another later, even though the later remedy is incompatible with the first elected. If, after having claimed specific performance, the creditor learns that the debtor has not performed or is not likely to do so within a reasonable time, the creditor may terminate for fundamental non-performance. On the other hand, an election of a remedy is often definite and will preclude later elections of incompatible remedies. A party who has terminated a contractual relationship cannot later have a change of mind and claim specific performance of the primary obligation, because by giving notice of termination the creditor may have caused the debtor to act in reliance on the termination. If the debtor has adapted to a claim for specific performance and taken measures to perform within a reasonable time, the creditor cannot change position and terminate for fundamental non-performance. This applies when the defaulting debtor has received a notice fixing an additional time for performance. The rule is in accordance with the widely accepted principle that when a party has made a declaration of intention which has caused the other party to act in reliance on the declaration the party making it will not be permitted to act inconsistently with it. This follows from the general principle of exercising rights and remedies in accordance with good faith and fair dealing.

1. The rule in the Article is in accordance with CISG art. 45 (2) and with the laws of the Member States. GERMANY switched to the general European standard in 2002, when the legislator i.a. introduced the new CC § 325, but the relationship between several remedies remains a weak point of the German system of remedies for non-performance, which suffers mainly from the idea of a general prevalence of the claim for specific performance. Similarly also under SLOVAK law the creditor's right to compensation for loss caused by the debtor's default is not affected by termination; however, in case of default with performance of a pecuniary debt, damages can be claimed only if the loss is not covered by the default interest or default charge, CC § 519. The same rule is applicable in CZECH law: although not precisely expressed in the CC, the principle of cumulation of remedies is widely recognized. The right of the creditor to compensation for damage caused by the debtor's default shall not be affected by termination but compensation may only be claimed if the damages are not covered by interest or by any penalty for default (see CC § 510, § 519 as commented by Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová, pp. 658-659; Ccom art. 367). In AUSTRIAN law also termination of the contract does not prevent a claim for damages for non-performance against a party at fault, see e.g. CC § 921, if additional damages occurred and were caused by the non-performing party's acts or omissions. The same applies in SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 103. The DUTCH CC art. 6:277 expressly provides that a creditor who has terminated a synallagmatic contract may ask for damages under the contract (expectation interest). Under GREEK CC art. 387 the creditor who has terminated a synallagmatic contract may ask for equitable damages (AP 33/1980, NoB 28 (1980) 1145-1146, 1417/1999 HellDni 41 (2000) 767; CA Athens 3906/2002 Hell Dni 44 (2003) 224. It is similar under POLISH law, where CC art. 494 provides that the party terminating a synallagmatic contract may claim damages resulting from non-performance. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1124, the creditor may ask for compensation, for specific performance plus compensation and for rescission plus compensation up to the amount of the expected value of the contract. In ITALIAN law the CC art. 1453(1) provides for the cumulation of remedies with regard to contracts with mutual counter-performance offering the aggrieved party the choice between specific performance and termination and at the same time allowing damages as an addition to the chosen remedy. For the similar outcome under ESTONIAN law see LOA § 115(1) and for SWEDEN, see e.g. Hellner, Hager and Persson, 146. The principle of cumulation of remedies which are not incompatible applies also under SCOTTISH law, Gloag and Henderson 10.01.

2. In FRANCE and BELGIUM, CC art. 1184(2) contains the same principle. The creditor can elect to pursue specific performance, if it is possible, or termination of the contract. In either case, the creditor is not deprived of the right to damages. However, this solution rests on a paradox, as noted by a legal author (See Philippe Rémy: "how is it that the creditor may pursue the retroactive termination of the contract for non-performance and at the same time claim the resultant damages"). In accordance with the principle of full reparation, compensation covers suffered harm (damnum emergens) and lost profits (lucrum cessans) (CC art. 1149). This serves the creditor's interest in being put in as good a position as the creditor would have been in had the contract been performed. It follows that only "positive interest" is envisaged and (practically) never "negative interest". Some scholars argue that the distinction between positive interest and negative interest, which is inspired by Jhering and widely admitted in other legal systems, should be introduced in French law (See Projet de Cadre Commun de Référence, Terminologie contractuelle commune, AHC/SLC).

According to Prof. Viney, recent case law may have paved the way for such introduction (Cass. Com., 26 nov. 2003: in a case of termination of a contract, the Court of cassation denied a party to a contract compensation for loss of opportunity to have the benefit of one's bargain under the contract; however, the Court left open the issue of compensation of loss of opportunity to conclude a contract with a third person, had the contract not been concluded) and thus resolve the paradox which arises out of cumulative remedies (supra, in particular in the case of damages resulting from termination of a contract). Lastly, as recently suggested by scholars, legal terminology should reflect the new functions assigned to damages, (See Projet de Cadre Commun de Référence, Terminologie contractuelle commune, AHC/SLC). While the terms "dommages et intérêts" (CC art. 1149) et "dommages-intérêts" (CC art. 1152) are generally considered interchangeable in FRENCH law, the terms "compensatory damages", "exemplary/punitive damages" or "restitutionary damages" should be used for purposes of legal security.

3. See generally Treitel, Remedies § 288.

III.–3:103: Notice fixing additional period for performance

(1) In any case of non-performance of an obligation the creditor may by notice to the debtor allow an additional period of time for performance.

(2) During the additional period the creditor may withhold performance of the creditor's reciprocal obligations and may claim damages, but may not resort to any other remedy.

(3) If the creditor receives notice from the debtor that the debtor will not perform within that period, or if upon expiry of that period due performance has not been made, the creditor may resort to any available remedy.

COMMENTS

Paragraph (1) of this Article is not necessary by itself. Even without the paragraph a creditor could by notice allow the debtor an additional period of time for performance. However the paragraph sets the scene for the rest of the Article.

The main effect of paragraph (2) is that if the creditor has by notice given the debtor an additional period of time for performance, the creditor may not change course without warning and exercise remedies inconsistent with the allowance of extra time – such as enforcing specific performance or terminating the contractual relationship. This could be regarded as a specific example of the requirement to exercise remedies in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. The creditor may, however, withhold performance of reciprocal obligations or even claim damages for any loss already suffered by the delay because these remedies are not inconsistent with the allowance of additional time.

> A company leases a new car to B for 2 years, and B collects it from the company's premises. The car breaks down and B has to have it towed back to the company's premises. The defect in the car amounts to a fundamental non-performance but B tells the company that the car will be accepted if it is fixed within 3 days. B may refuse to pay the rental and may claim damages for any inconvenience in not having the car while it is repaired and for the cost of the tow, but may not demand delivery of another car or terminate for fundamental non-performance unless the car is not repaired and redelivered within the 3 days.

Paragraph (3) makes it clear that the creditor will not lose remedies (e.g. by the lapse of time for the exercise of the remedy of enforcing specific performance) by allowing additional time.

A later Article provides that, where there has been a delay in performance, failure to comply with a notice allowing additional time for performance may give the creditor the right to terminate the contractual relationship in whole or in part. Quite apart from that, however, the notice procedure may be useful. The creditor may not wish to terminate immediately even where the delay or other non-performance is fundamental but may be prepared to accept a proper performance by the debtor provided it is rendered within a certain period. The procedure set out in the Article permits the creditor to give the debtor a final chance to perform (or to correct a defective performance), without the creditor losing the right to seek specific performance or to terminate if by the end of the period of notice the debtor has still not performed in accordance with the contract. At the same time, however, the rule that the creditor may not seek specific performance or terminate during the period of notice protects the debtor from a sudden change of mind by the creditor. The debtor may have relied on having the period set in the notice in which to perform.

The notice procedure may also be used when a performance is prompt but defective in a way which is not fundamental. In such a case the creditor will not have the right to terminate and serving a notice fixing an additional time for performance will not confer that right. Nonetheless, serving a notice may still perform the useful functions of informing the debtor that the creditor still wants proper performance and of giving the debtor a last chance before the creditor seeks specific performance. In these respects the notice serves the same function as a mise en demeure in French law or Mahnung in German law.

1. The case of the creditor who indicates a willingness to accept performance or the cure of a defective performance but then has a change of mind, gives rise to little problem in systems where a court order is traditionally needed for termination. This was formerly the case in FRANCE and BELGIUM (CC art. 1184(3)); however, French courts now admit, in certain circumstances, unilateral termination). Instead of terminating the contract at once the court can simply grant a further delay for performance Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 641, no. 652.
2. Systems which allow termination by simple notice without prior warning have often developed rules to prevent a sudden change of mind by the creditor. In ENGLAND e.g. there is a rule that if the creditor has "waived" the right to terminate for the time being the waiver can be withdrawn only by giving reasonable notice: Charles Rickards Ltd. v. Oppenhaim [1950] 1 KB 616. In SPAIN, creditors cannot change their mind, and seek termination, when they have previously granted the debtor a new opportunity to comply: the prohibition of venire contra factum proprium (CC art. 7) applies. In the DUTCH CC there is no specific provision against the change of mind of the creditor envisaged in this Article, but interpretation of the creditor's waiver will mostly produce the same effects.
3. Many other systems also recognise that creditors should not be allowed to terminate the contractual relationship during the period in which they indicated that they would still accept performance: e.g. AUSTRIAN law, e.g. OGH 21 December 1987, SZ 60/287 (regarding CC § 918; the creditor cannot terminate without setting an additional period after the due date, within which the debtor can perform); 12 March 1991, JBI 1992, 318 (also regarding CC § 918; the creditor can terminate without granting an additional period if it is clear that the debtor will not perform); GERMAN law, see MünchKomm (-Ernst), BGB[5], § 323 no. 148; FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs, §§ 25(3), 54(3) and 55(3); GREEK law (Michaelides Nouaros Erm.AK vol. II/1 art. 383 nos. 17-18 (1949) Stathopoulos in Georgiadis & Stathopoulos arts. 383-385 no. 6; in SLOVENIAN law (LOA §§ 104(2) and 105(2). The creditor may also be barred from seeking performance in natura, as, for example, in ITALIAN law (CC art. 1454(3) which provides that if the time elapses without performance having been made, the contract is dissolved by operation of law) but contra for GERMAN law, see MünchKomm (-Ernst), BGB[5], § 323 no. 161. It is often recognised that the creditor may resort to termination immediately, however, if the other party indicates that there will be no performance within the time allowed (GREEK law, ibid., no. 18; GERMAN law: CC § 323(2) no. 1 and (4). In POLISH law, in case of delay, the creditor cannot terminate at once (except a lex commissoria-clause and Fixgeschäft – CC art. 492), but has to set an additional period (CC art. 491). Setting an additional period can be cumulated with a claim for damages caused by delay, but – after setting the additional period –termination is not possible until the expiry of the additional period. A similar solution is seen in the PORTUGUSE CC art. 808. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the buyer of materially defective goods who has accepted an offer of repair by the seller does not thereby lose the right to reject the goods but must allow the seller to complete the attempt to repair: see J. & H. Ritchie Ltd. v. Lloyd Ltd. 2007 SC (HL) 89, applying Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 35(6) (a). Consumer buyers have a right to repair or replacement of defective goods unless this is impossible or disproportionate; while repair or replacement is being carried out, the buyer's right to terminate is suspended until the seller has had a reasonable opportunity to complete: Sale of Goods Act 1979 ss. 48A, 48C. Under ESTONIAN law, similarly to the Article, LOA § 114(3)-(4) provides that during the additional period the creditor may withhold performance, claim damages caused by the non-performance or payment of a penalty for late payment, while other remedies (incl. damages in lieu of performance or termination of the contractual relationship) are available only after receipt of a notice that the debtor will not perform an obligation or if the additional period expires without proper performance by the debtor. Unless the non-performance is fundamental, fixing an additional period is a necessary precondition to termination or a claim for damages in lieu of performance (LOA §§ 115(2), 116(4)). Similarly in CZECH law, in the case of mora debitoris, the creditor cannot terminate without a "reasonable extension of time-limit granted" for performance (see CC §§ 517.1 and 656; Ccom art. 350). Some exceptions to this principle exist, especially in commercial law, if the non-performance constitutes a "fundamental breach of obligation", the creditor may terminate after notice to debtor (Ccom art. 353). Also in SLOVAK law; according to CC § 517(1) if the debtor fails to perform even within an additional adequate period granted by the creditor, the creditor is entitled to withdraw from the agreement. In SLOVAKIA setting an additional adequate period can be cumulated with a claim for damages caused by delay, but – after setting the additional adequate period – termination is not possible until the expiry of the additional period.

4. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 316(1) if a creditor accepts performance in the knowledge that it is defective, the creditor can later raise a claim on the basis of the defective performance only if the creditor has retained the rights to that effect. Under CC § 300(1) a creditor is entitled to demand performance or, if performance no longer serves the creditor's interest, to withdraw from the contract irrespective of whether or not the debtor has offered an excuse for the default. Under CC § 316(2) it is not necessary to prove the cessation of an interest in performance if, according to the agreement of the parties or due to the imminent purpose of the service, the obligation had to be performed at a definite time and no other, or if the creditor has stipulated a reasonable deadline for subsequent performance and this period too elapsed without result.

5. A rule preventing the creditor suddenly changing direction may be inferred from ULIS art. 44(2); it is explicit in CISG arts. 47(2) and 63(2).

III.–3:104: Excuse due to an impediment

(1) A debtor's non-performance of an obligation is excused if it is due to an impediment beyond the debtor's control and if the debtor could not reasonably be expected to have avoided or overcome the impediment or its consequences.

(2) Where the obligation arose out of a contract or other juridical act, non-performance is not excused if the debtor could reasonably be expected to have taken the impediment into account at the time when the obligation was incurred.

(3) Where the excusing impediment is only temporary the excuse has effect for the period during which the impediment exists. However, if the delay amounts to a fundamental non-performance, the creditor may treat it as such.

(4) Where the excusing impediment is permanent the obligation is extinguished. Any reciprocal obligation is also extinguished. In the case of contractual obligations any restitutionary effects of extinction are regulated by the rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) with appropriate adaptations.

(5) The debtor has a duty to ensure that notice of the impediment and of its effect on the ability to perform reaches the creditor within a reasonable time after the debtor knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of these circumstances. The creditor is entitled to damages for any loss resulting from the non-receipt of such notice.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article governs the consequences when an event which is not the fault or responsibility of the debtor prevents the debtor from performing the obligation. It reflects the results that, broadly speaking, are reached in the laws of all the Member States though in some a different conceptual structure is employed. Paragraph (5) does not have an equivalent in many of the laws but is clearly commercially sensible.

The rules in the Article are not mandatory. The parties to a contract may modify the allocation of the risk of impossibility of performance, either in general or in relation to a particular impediment; usages (especially in carriage by sea) may have the same effect. Also, in accordance with the rule that specific provisions prevail over more general provisions, special rules on the passing of risk in particular situations (such as sale of goods) may modify the effects of this Article.

B. Scope

The excuse may apply to any obligation, including obligations to pay money. While insolvency would not normally be an impediment within the meaning of the text, as it is not "beyond the control" of the debtor, a government ban on transferring the sum due might be.

The term "impediment", covers every sort of event (natural occurrences, restraints of princes, acts of third parties).

It is conceivable that an impediment existed, without the parties knowing it, at the time when a contract was concluded. For example, the parties might sign a charter of a ship which, unknown to them, has just sunk. This situation is not covered by the Article but the contract might be avoidable under the rules on mistake.

There is less need for the doctrine of excused non-performance in the case of an obligation which is merely to make reasonable efforts to do something ("obligation de moyens"). There will be cases where the debtor makes all reasonable efforts but some unforeseen impediment beyond the debtor's control prevents the result being achieved. In such a case there will not be excused non-performance; there will simply be no non-performance at all. There may also, however, be cases where an impediment prevents the debtor from making reasonable efforts and in such a case the Article may apply.

C. The circumstances of the impediment

The requirements laid down for the operation of the Article are analogous to the traditional requirements for force majeure. They are necessarily in general terms, given the great variety of fact situations to which they must apply. It is for the party who invokes the Article to show that the requirements are satisfied.

Outside the debtor's control. First, the obstacle must be something outside the debtor's sphere of control. The risk of the debtor's own activities must be borne by the debtor. Thus the breakdown of a machine under the debtor's control, even if unforeseeable and unpreventable, cannot be an impediment within the article and this avoids investigation of whether the breakdown was really unforeseeable and the consequences unpreventable. The same is true of the actions of persons for whom the debtor is responsible, and particularly the acts of the people the debtor puts in charge of the performance. The debtor cannot invoke the default of a subcontractor unless this was outside the debtor's control - for instance because there was no other subcontractor who could have been employed to do the work; and the impediment must also be outside the subcontractor's sphere of control.

> In consequence of an unexpected strike in the nationalised company which distributes natural gas, a chinaware manufacturer which heats its furnaces only with gas is obliged to interrupt its production. The manufacturer is not liable toward its own clients, if the other requirements of the Article are fulfilled. The cause of non-performance is external.

> Illustration 2
> The employees of a company unforeseeably go on strike in order to force the management to buy foreign machines which will improve the working conditions. For the time being it is actually not possible to obtain these machines. The company cannot claim as against its customers that the strike is an excuse, as the event is not beyond its control.

There will be no excuse if an unforeseeable event impedes performance of the obligation when the event would not have affected the obligation if the debtor had not been late in performing.

> A French bank, A, is instructed by company B to transfer a sum of money to a bank in country X by 15 July. It has not carried out the instruction by 18 July when all transfers of money between France and X are suspended. Bank A cannot claim to be excused from its obligation to B; the transfer could have been made if it had been done in the time allowed under the contract.

Could not have been taken into account. In the case of an obligation incurred by contract or other juridical act the impediment must also be one that could not have been taken into account by the debtor at the time the obligation was incurred. If it could have been, one may say that the debtor took the risk or was at fault in not having foreseen it. These notions are not applicable in the case of an obligation which arises by operation of law. This is why paragraph (2) is confined to obligations which arise from contracts or other juridical acts.

However, it may be relevant whether the debtor could have taken into consideration not just the event itself but the date or period of its occurrence. A price control for some period may be foreseeable, but it could be an excuse if the period for which it is kept in force was not foreseeable. Equally it is stated that the test is whether the debtor could "reasonably" have been expected to take the impediment into account: that is to say, whether a normal person, placed in the same situation, could have foreseen it without either undue optimism or undue pessimism. Thus in a particular area cyclones may be foreseeable at certain times of year, but could not reasonably be expected to be foreseen at a time of year when they do not normally occur.

Insurmountable impediment. Reasonableness also qualifies the requirement that the impediment must be insurmountable or irresistible. It must be emphasised that both conditions - that the debtor could not have avoided it and could not have overcome it - must be fulfilled before an excuse can operate.

Whether an event could have been avoided or its consequences overcome depends on the facts. In an earthquake zone the effects of earthquakes can be overcome by special construction techniques, though it would be different in the case of a quake of much greater force than usual.

One cannot expect the debtor to take precautions out of proportion to the risk (e. g. the building of a virtual fortress) nor to adopt illegal means (e.g. the smuggling of funds to avoid a ban on their transfer) in order to avoid the risk.

D. Effects

A temporary impediment to performance which fulfils the requirements just set out relieves the debtor from liability for as long as it lasts. This means that the creditor cannot obtain an order for specific performance and cannot recover damages for the non-performance. The creditor can, however, withhold performance of reciprocal obligations or reduce the price payable (if any) or, if the impediment leads to a fundamental non-performance, terminate the contractual relationship.

Illustration 4
If A has leased a warehouse to B and subsequently it is partially destroyed by fire, causing a temporary impediment, B may terminate the lease if occupation of the whole of the premises was an essential part of the contract. If, on the other hand, B does not give notice of termination, B cannot obtain damages for loss of occupation but the rent will be reduced proportionately.

A temporary impediment means not only the circumstances which cause the obstacle but also the consequences which follow; these may last longer than the circumstances themselves. The excuse covers the whole period during which the debtor is unable to perform.

Illustration 5
The warehouse containing a pharmaceutical manufacturer's raw materials is unforeseeably flooded and the raw materials are rendered unusable. The delays in delivering to clients which will be excused include not only the period of the flood itself but also the time necessary for the manufacturer to obtain new supplies.

It may be, however, that late performance will be of no use to the creditor. Therefore the creditor is given the right to terminate provided that the delay is itself fundamental.

An impresario in Hamburg has engaged a famous English tenor to sing at the Hamburg Opera from 1 to 31 October. The singer catches flu and has to retire to bed (which would constitute an impediment within paragraph (1)); he tells the impresario that he will be unable to come to Hamburg before 10 October. Assuming that the tenor's presence for the whole month is an essential part of the contract, the impresario may terminate for fundamental non-performance. If this is not done, the obligations on both sides remain in force for the remaining period but the tenor's fees will be reduced proportionately.

Equally in the case of a temporary excuse, the creditor can use the procedure of serving a notice fixing an additional period of time for performance with a right to terminate if there is no performance within that period.

If the excusing impediment is permanent the obligation is extinguished (paragraph (4)) The main reason for making extinction automatic in this situation, rather than leaving the matter to the rules on termination by notice for non-performance, is that it would be unnecessary and unrealistic to require the creditor to terminate by notice. It could also be pernicious. Notice of termination for non-performance must be given within a reasonable time. If it is not, the creditor loses the right to terminate. However, this would result in an unfortunate situation in the case of a permanent excusing impediment. The obligation could never be performed and could never be terminated. It would continue to exist in a sort of ghostly state. The cleaner solution is to provide for automatic termination both of the obligation in question and any reciprocal obligation. Any restitutionary effects are regulated by the rules in Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) with appropriate adaptations. Again, it should be noted that these rules will be subject to any specific rules on the passing of risk. There may be cases where an obligation (e.g. to transfer the ownership of goods) is extinguished but where the reciprocal obligation (e.g. to pay the price) still has to be performed because the risk of destruction has passed to the buyer.

Whether an impediment is temporary or permanent must be assessed in relation to the nature of the obligation. There are cases where late performance would manifestly not be performance at all, whatever the attitude of the creditor to delay. In such cases an impediment may permanently prevent performance of the obligation even if the cause of the impediment is not itself permanent.

Illustration 7
The tenor in the previous illustration is, two days before the first night of the opera, injured in a car crash and confined to a hospital bed in plaster for at least six weeks. He notifies the impresario immediately. There is a permanent impediment to performance in relation to this obligation (even although his debilitated condition is hopefully not permanent).

If the debtor's obligation is extinguished it follows that any reciprocal obligation of the creditor must also be extinguished. In cases where one of the debtor's obligations is extinguished but the creditor has to pay a global price for performance of all of them the remedy of price reduction may come into play.

A company is under an obligation to a landowner to plant trees on three islands. One of the islands disappears under the sea as a result of a geological event. The landowner had a reciprocal obligation to pay for the work. If the obligation was to pay a separate sum for the planting on each island then the obligation to pay for the planting on the sunken island is extinguished entirely. If the obligation was to pay a lump sum for the whole work but the landowner is willing to accept performance in relation to the two surviving islands then the landowner can reduce the price under III.–3:601 (Right to reduce price).

It may happen that the extinguished obligation of the debtor is just one of several obligations under a contract and that performance of the remaining obligations has become valueless to the creditor as a result of the extinction of the one obligation. In such a case the creditor will have the option of terminating the whole contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance.

Another reason for providing for the extinction of the obligation, rather than just allowing it to continue in a sort of limbo, is that extinction attracts the provisions of chapter 8 on the restitutionary effects of prematurely ended obligations At the time when an obligation is affected by a permanent impediment which excuses further performance completely and for ever, one party may have supplied something to the other. The only fair solution may be to require restitution of the benefit or payment of its value. This can most easily and appropriately be achieved by applying the provisions of Chapter 8.

E. Notice by debtor

Paragraph (4) of the Article is an application of the general duty of good faith and fair dealing. The debtor has a duty to warn the creditor, within a reasonable time, of the occurrence of the obstacle and of its consequences for the obligation to perform. The purpose is to allow the creditor the chance to take steps to avoid the consequences of non-performance. It is also necessary in order for the creditor to be able to exercise any right to terminate when performance is partial or late.

In the example given in illustration 5, the manufacturer must notify its customers of the loss of the raw materials and also of the time it will take to replace them and the probable date for resumption of deliveries.

The reasonable time may be a short one: circumstances may even require immediate notification. The time starts to run as soon as the impediment and its consequences for the performance of the obligation become known (see above); or from when the debtor could reasonably be expected to have known. Good faith may even require two successive notices, if for example the debtor cannot immediately tell what the consequences of the impediment will be.

The sanction for failing to give this notice is liability for the extra loss suffered by the creditor as the result of not being informed; normally the creditor will recover damages.

Illustration 10
In the example given in Illustration 6, if the tenor does not warn the impresario immediately of his unavailability, the latter may recover compensation for being deprived of the chance to obtain a replacement, so reducing his loss.

NOTES

I. Force majeure and impossibility

1. Paragraph (1) is modelled on CISG art. 79(1), which has been followed in the FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs §§ 27 and 40 and ESTONIAN LOA § 103. See also UNIDROIT art. 7.1.7.
2. Even if all legal systems now admit that impossibility of performance should be recognised as an excuse, the way the excuse is given effect varies considerably.
3. Some legal systems rest on the theory of force majeure laid down in arts. 1147 and 1148 of the FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs, on which has developed detailed case law on the conditions under which the debtor will be excused.
4. In FRANCE these conditions are strict. Performance must be impossible and this must be due to circumstances which were unforeseeable at the time when the contract was made and which are outside the control of the debtor (cause étrangère). However, some recent cases tend to put aside the condition of unforeseeability. This condition has been criticised by some authors who doubt that the two Assemblée plénière cases of the Cour de cassation (14 April 2006, D. 2006.1577, note P. Jourdain) should be interpreted as imposing systematically this condition (Viney, Conditions de la responsabilité, no. 396). In SPAIN there exist two rules with different scopes. According to CC art. 1182, the duty to deliver a specific asset becomes extinct where the thing is lost due to force majeure. A more general rule is framed in CC art. 1105, which applies outside the field of the extinction of obligations. Pursuant to this general rule, a debtor is not liable for damages if the performance is prevented by unforeseeable events as well as by events outside the debtor's control.
5. A related doctrine of impossibility is found in AUSTRIAN, ITALIAN, SLOVENIAN law and PORTUGUESE law; see AUSTRIAN CC § 1447, CC § 275; Italian CC arts. 1218 and 1256; Slovenian LOA § 116; and Portuguese CC art. 790. For AUSTRIA see also CC § 920 which sets out the remedies for an impediment (impossibility) the debtor can be held liable for: The remedy is withdrawal and – in cases of fault – damages. The GERMAN doctrine of impossibility, see CC § 275, since 2002 no longer provides the debtor with a general excuse but only excludes the claim for specific performance. The question, whether a certain impediment is relevant in the field of damages, is answered by the fault principle by way of exceptions only, see CC § 276.

6. Some laws take a more flexible approach. CISG art. 79; the FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs §§ 27, 40 and 57; and DANISH SGA § 24, which is held to embody a general principle of contract law, include impediments which must be equated with impossibility: see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schwenzer), CISG[4], art. 79 no. 4; Honnold 542; Ramberg, Köplagen 346 f; and Gomard, Obligationsret II 161. In DANISH law this strict liability only applies to performances of a generic nature. In other cases fault is required. In DANISH law this strict liability only applies to goods and other performances of a generic nature. In other cases fault is required. DUTCH and GREEK law will also excuse the debtor in cases other than absolute impossibility, see respectively CC arts. 6:74 and 6:75, Greek CC arts. 336 and 380. Traces of a more flexible attitude are also to be found in recent BELGIAN case law, see Trib. Comm. de Bruxelles 9 March 1981, JCB/BRH 1982 I 182; compare. Cass. 13 April 1956, Arr. Cass. 670, R.C.J.B., 1957, 85, obs. Heenen. See Kruithof, Hommage Dekkers 281. Similarly, CZECH law discharges the debtor if the performance becomes impossible (see CC § 575.1). If the debtor is found responsible for this objective impossibility of performance the debtor can be obliged to pay damages (see Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová a kol. p. 742. Similarly, in the absence of any agreement between the parties or stipulation by law, under the default rule for existing obligations in ESTONIAN law (LOA § 103) the non-performance of the debtor is excused if it is caused by circumstances which are beyond the control of the debtor and which, at the time the contract was entered into or the non-contractual obligation arose, the debtor could not reasonably have been expected to take into account, avoid or overcome (force majeure).

7. POLISH law does not have any provision referring to force majeure and its importance for the imputability of non-performance. Generally, the debtor has to prove that the non-performance is a result of circumstances for which the debtor is not liable (CC art. 471). The debtor may invoke a cause étrangère, which became the source of non-performance, and such a proof will excuse the debtor. Normally – failing any stipulation to the contrary – the debtor is liable only for negligence (not observing due diligence – CC art. 472) and the negligence of entrustees (CC art. 474), Proving an occurrence of cause étrangère or force majeure will excuse the debtor, since the occurrence of cause étrangère or force majeure is not connected to any negligence of the debtor nor of the persons entrusted by the debtor with the performance.

8. However, a party may accept liability for a broader set of circumstances, including not only negligence, but also other potential causes of non-performance (CC art. 473 § 1). It may be stipulated, that the debtor will be liable for any non-performance, except non-performance caused by strictly defined circumstances (like for example force majeure, fait d'un tiers or fait du créancier) – see Supreme Court's judgments of 11 January 2001 (SN 11 January 2001, IV CKN 150/00, OSNC 2001, No 10, text 153) and of 26 July 2001 (SN 26 July 2001, II CKN 1269/00, OSP 2002, No 9, text 121). It can be agreed, that the debtor will be liable for any sort of non-performance, independent of its source. This kind of liability would be absolute liability; including the risk of any causes étrangères (compare Supreme Court's judgment of 29 November 2002 – SN 29 November 2002, IV CKN 1553/00).

9. Several legal systems, and notably the AUSTRIAN, DUTCH, ESTONIAN, GERMAN, GREEK, ITALIAN, PORTUGUESE, SLOVENIAN and SPANISH have, in addition to the rules on impossibility or force majeure, accepted that changed circumstances may excuse the debtor under restricted circumstances.

10. In ENGLISH and IRISH law a party is normally obliged to fulfil obligations and will be liable in damages for failure to perform. However, a debtor is sometimes excused where performance has become impossible without fault, e.g. because the subject matter of the contract has been destroyed. If the impossibility occurred after the contract was made, and it is impossible to perform the contract as a whole, the debtor may be excused under the doctrine of frustration, see Taylor v. Caldwell (1863) 3 B & S 826, 122 ER 309. The results of frustration are similar to those under the Article, in that both parties are discharged automatically. SCOTTISH law is broadly similar.

11. SLOVAK law does not have any provision referring to force majeure and its importance for liability for non-performance. However according to CC § 575(1) and (2) if the performance becomes impossible, the debtor's obligation to perform is extinguished. The performance is not regarded as impossible if it can be realised even under aggravated circumstances, with higher costs or after the agreed date. According to the SLOVAK CC § 577 the debtor must inform the creditor without undue delay after learning about the facts which make the performance impossible; otherwise the debtor is liable for damages for loss caused to the creditor by the lack of timely information about the impossibility. The right to a reversal of unjustified enrichment is not affected by this rule. The special regulation for commercial relationships provides that the performance of an obligation is deemed unattainable if legal regulations with an unlimited time validity passed after the conclusion of the contract prohibit what the debtor is bound to do under the contract, or require a licence for it which the debtor cannot obtain (Ccom art. 352(2)). The debtor, whose obligation was extinguished due to the impossibility of performance, is obliged to pay damages for loss thereby caused to the creditor, unless the impossibility of performance was caused by circumstances excluding responsibility (i.e. by a hindrance which occurs independently of the debtor’s will and which prevents the debtor from performing the obligation, if it cannot reasonably be assumed that the debtor could have prevented or overcome such a hindrance or its effects, or anticipated it at the inception of the obligation) (Ccom arts. 353 and 374).

II. Effect of impediment

12. CISG art. 79(3) is equivalent to the first sentence of paragraph (3). CISG does not address the question of termination but writers support the rule laid down in the second sentence of paragraph (3), see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schwenzer), CISG[4], art. 79 no. 42. It is probably the rule in all legal systems that the excuse has effect as long as the impediment lasts. The rule is expressed in ESTONIAN LOA § 103(3), ITALIAN CC art. 1256(2); PORTUGUESE CC art. 792, and CZECH CC § 575.2 in fine (the performance is not impossible if it can be fulfilled after an agreed time limit) and is accepted in GREEK law, see Gasis in Erm.AK II/1, intro. to arts. 335-348 no. 42, art. 336 no. 7 (1949) Stathopoulos, Obligations, § 19 nos. 70-73, Georgiadis, Obligations, § 24 nos. 35-36.

13. Under several legal systems the creditor may terminate the contractual relationship if the delay has lasted so long that there would be a right to terminate under the rules on non-performance. This holds true of ITALIAN law (see art. 1256(2) CC with reference to the source of the obligation or the nature of its subject matter) and PORTUGUESE law, see the provisions cited above, of AUSTRIAN law, see CC § 918 (right of withdrawal in the case of late performance, which only takes effect after a certain period of time set by the creditor); of DUTCH law, see CC art. 6:74(2); of ESTONIAN law, see LOA §§ 105, 116 (implicitly); and of BELGIAN law (Kruithof, TPR 1983, 629 no. 119, see also Cass. 13 June 1956, Arr. Cass., 367). GREEK and DANISH case law support the same rule: Greece, Athens 3384/1976, NoB 25 (1977) 389 II. It is unlikely that this rule would follow from ENGLISH and IRISH law or SCOTTISH law but a long delay may frustrate the contract. In SPANISH law a temporary impediment may justify termination if it frustrates the purpose of the contract (Díez Picazo, II 660; Lacruz-Delgado II, 1, § 25. 193; Margarita Castilla Barea, La imposibilidad de cumplir los contratos, 2001*Castilla*, La imposibilidad de cumplir los contratos, 2001, pp. 462 ff).

14. Several systems recognise that an obligation comes to an end automatically if performance becomes permanently impossible for a reason not imputable to the debtor: e.g. ITALIAN CC art. 1463. Under SLOVAK law also if the performance becomes impossible the debtor's obligation to perform is extinguished. If the impossibility concerns only a part of the performance, the obligation is extinguished only for this part; however, the creditor may withdraw from the agreement as for the rest of performance, CC § 575(3). In SCOTTISH law the effect of a permanent impossibility of contractual performance which is not imputable to the debtor is also that the contract is dissolved and therefore that the obligations of both parties under it are extinguished. This does not necessarily mean that the debtor is not liable for damages or a stipulated payment under a term of the contract imposing such liability whatever the reason for the non-performance. See Gloag and Henderson 11.01 to 11.05.

III. The duty to give notice

15. Paragraph (5) is similar to CISG art. 79(4), and see the FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs, §§ 28, 40 and 58; the SLOVAK Ccom art. 377; and the CZECH CC § 557.2. The duty of the defaulting party to give notice of the impediment has been stated in DANISH, GREEK and GERMAN case law: see respectively Ussing,Obligationsretten[4], 141; 4271/1956 EEN 25(1958) 226, 227 II; and CA Hamburg 13 May 1901, OLGE 3 no. 4 p. 8, but at least in GERMANY was left open by the legislator, see Medicus, NJW 1992, 2384, 2385. In ITALY writers have expressed the view that the duty follows from the principle of good faith and CC art. 1780 imposes a duty on the depository to notify loss of goods in custody. In some other countries the duty to give notice may also follow from good faith or from the debtor's duty to warn of risks which may affect the performance due, e.g. SPANISH CC art. 1559. Under AUSTRIAN law a duty to inform derives from the (implied) contractual duties to inform the contractual partner of all relevant circumstances.

16. Under ENGLISH, IRISH, POLISH and SCOTTISH law there is no such principle. It is the same in PORTUGUESE law, although, under particular circumstances, an argument in favour of a duty might be made under the CC art. 762 (general principle of good faith performance).

17. In the HUNGARIAN CC § 312(1) if performance has become impossible for a reason for which neither of the parties is liable, the obligation is extinguished. The party gaining knowledge of the impossibility should immediately notify the other party. A party who fails to give such notification is liable for loss thereby caused. Under CC § 312(2) if performance has become impossible for a reason for which the debtor is liable, the creditor may demand damages for the non-performance. Under CC § 312(3) if performance has become impossible for a reason for which the creditor is liable, the debtor is relieved of the obligation and is entitled to demand compensation for loss caused. Under CC § 312(4) if performance of any one of a set of alternative obligations becomes impossible, the contract is limited to the other obligations. Under CC § 312(5) if the party who has no right to choose is liable for subsequent impossibility, the other party may choose either the possible obligation or the consequences of subsequent impossibility. Under CC § 312(6) if the remnants of the object of a service that has become impossible have remained in the possession of the debtor, or if the debtor has received or might demand compensation instead of the object of the service from another person, the creditor is entitled to demand surrender of the remainder or compensation against a proportional part of the consideration.

III.–3:105: Term excluding or restricting remedies

(1) A term of a contract or other juridical act which purports to exclude or restrict liability to pay damages for personal injury (including fatal injury) caused intentionally or by gross negligence is void.

(2) A term excluding or restricting a remedy for non-performance of an obligation, even if valid and otherwise effective, having regard in particular to the rules on unfair contract terms in Book II, Chapter 9, Section 4, may nevertheless not be invoked if it would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to do so.

COMMENTS

A. General

It is very common for parties to contracts to try to limit their liability by an exclusion or limitation clause. Many such clauses are perfectly reasonable and acceptable. There is no reason why parties should not, in general, allocate the risks of certain events as between themselves and reflect this allocation in the price. Some such clauses may, however, be oppressive and unfair. This problem is dealt with to some extent by the rules in Book II, Chapter 9, Section 4 on unfair contract terms, but those rules do not cover all cases. Often they are confined to terms which are standard terms or not individually negotiated. The present Article goes further. It adopts two different techniques. Paragraph (1) makes certain types of exclusion or limitation clause void and therefore completely ineffective. Its scope is, however, deliberately very limited. Paragraph (2) comes into operation only if an exclusion or limitation term is valid and otherwise effective. It provides, as a sort of residual protection, that the term cannot be relied on if it would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to do so. Paragraph (2) is, strictly speaking, unnecessary. The result follows from the general duty to exercise rights in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. It is included, however, because of the practical importance of the subject and because it is useful to make clear the potentially powerful effect of the good faith requirement in this area.

Close equivalents to both paragraphs can be found in the laws of many Member States, but each is somewhat more demanding than the controls the law imposes on exclusion clauses in other Member States. Nonetheless each paragraph represents a balanced approach that seems to be widely accepted within Europe. As to paragraph (1), it is almost impossible to envisage a situation in which the potential victim of intentional or grossly negligent personal injury would wittingly agree that he or she should have no remedy for it, or in which the other party could have any legitimate interest in excluding liability. As to paragraph (2), while a party should be permitted to rely on an exclusion or restriction of other kinds of liability when that is what was genuinely agreed, that should not be the case when, exceptionally, the particular circumstances - typically, the party's own conduct - make it contrary to good faith and fair dealing to do so.

B. Terms excluding or restricting liability for damages for personal injury

Paragraph (1) is based on the consideration that it is always unacceptable for a party to try to contract out of liability for damages for causing personal injury (fatal or non-fatal) intentionally or by gross negligence. Annex 1 provides that there is "gross negligence" if a person is guilty of a profound failure to take such care as is self-evidently required in the circumstances. It is important to note that paragraph (1) does not say that there is liability. Whether or not there is liability will depend on the law and the facts quite apart from the exclusion or limitation clause. There can be cases where there is no liability for causing personal injury intentionally. For example, a doctor who has a contractual obligation to amputate a limb will cause personal injury intentionally but, far from this being a non-performance of an obligation giving rise to liability, it will be the performance of an obligation.

C. Other terms excluding or restricting remedies

Paragraph (2) is very general and covers all terms which in practice prevent the creditor from obtaining the normal remedy. No distinction is drawn between terms which limit responsibility and those which exclude it altogether. It is difficult to distinguish them anyway since a derisory limit on recovery is effectively an exclusion, and there is no good reason for imposing different controls in the two cases.

The limitation of liability may be fixed directly as a figure or by a formula (e.g. so may times the contract price).

Agreed payments for non-performance may operate so as to limit the recovery of the creditor. In this case the creditor can demand full compensation if the requirements of the Article are met.

> The contract for the construction of a factory contains a term imposing liability for €10,000 per week for late completion. The work is completed late because the contractor has deliberately neglected the job in favour of another, more profitable, one. If the loss suffered by the employer amounts to €20,000 per week, the latter may recover this amount despite the term, as for the contractor to invoke it when it has deliberately disregarded the contract would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing (see further below).

Exclusion or limitation terms most frequently concern liability for damages. However, nothing in the Article prevents its application to terms limiting or excluding other remedies for non-performance (termination for fundamental non-performance, reduction of the price, etc.).

D. Contrary to good faith to invoke the term

The criterion applied by paragraph (2) is whether it would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to invoke the term. The paragraph applies whether or not the term has been individually negotiated and whether or not it was contrary to good faith and fair dealing to include the term in the contract.

It may still be contrary to good faith and fair dealing for the other party to invoke the term, even if it has been individually negotiated and even if it escapes the rules on unfair contract terms, particularly if this is done in circumstances which the first party would not have contemplated, such as a deliberate decision by the party invoking the term to perform the contract in a quite different way not in accordance with its other terms.

A security firm agrees to send men to check on a customer's premises once an hour during the hours of darkness. It limits its responsibility to the customer. It deliberately decides to send men only every three hours. It would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to invoke the limitation of responsibility term.

An intentional disregard of the other terms of the contract may make it contrary to good faith to invoke the term even if there was no intention to harm the other party.

It should suffice that the non-performance was committed knowingly.

Illustration 3
A carrier which has undertaken to provide a lorry capable of carrying a refrigerated load at minus ten degrees, but which does not have one, provides a lorry capable of refrigeration only to minus five. The carrier thinks that for the short journey involved this will not matter. The goods are damaged. The contractor cannot rely on a term limiting its liability for damage caused by inadequate refrigeration.

Some breaches, though intentional, may be within the contemplation of the parties as a decision one of them may have to make. Such intentional breaches would not mean that it is contrary to good faith to invoke the term.

A voyage charter allows a certain number of ‘lay days’ for the charterer to have the ship loaded and unloaded; if the lay days are exceeded, the charterer must pay damages for demurrage, but the amount is limited to €1,000 per day. As both parties are aware, the loading port is subject to congestion, and the charterer deliberately delays having the ship loaded until after another of its vessels has been loaded. Loading of the chartered vessel is not completed within the lay days. The loss to the owner exceeds the limit set in the demurrage term. Even though the delay by the charterer was deliberate, it is not contrary to good faith for it to invoke the €1,000 per day limit.

It should be noted that the test in the present Article is based on the actual facts, not on the unfairness or otherwise of the term in the abstract. It may be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to include a very broad limitation of liability term when the term has not been negotiated: nonetheless if the same term had been individually negotiated it may not be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to invoke it in a particular situation.

A contract for the carriage of goods in a refrigerated lorry limits the carriers’ liability, in the event of inadequate refrigeration however arising, to €100 per box of food. The food is damaged because the refrigeration machinery, despite proper maintenance, breaks down. If the term were not individually negotiated, it might not be binding on the client as it is capable of limiting liability even when the carrier had been reckless or grossly negligent. If it has been individually negotiated and is therefore outside the rules on unfair contract terms, it does not seem contrary to good faith and fair dealing for the carrier to invoke it on the actual facts.

Compare also II.–7:215 (Exclusion or restriction of remedies) which covers the exclusion or restriction of remedies for mistake and incorrect information.

E. Negotiated term which is still contrary to good faith.

Even though there has been some negotiation over a term, so that it is outside the rules on unfair contract terms, in an extreme case it might still be contrary to good faith to invoke it. If the party in whose favour the term operated had refused to make more than marginal concessions and the other party had no real choice but to accept, the court may decide under this Article that the term cannot be invoked.

> Illustration 6
> A seed company offers seed to a farmer on terms that its liability if the seed is defective is limited to returning the contract price. The farmer protests at this but the seed company refuses to amend the term except by adding that, in the event of seed failure, the farmer will be entitled to a 10% discount on the next purchase of similar seed. Other seed companies all take a similar attitude. The seed companies could cover liability in defective seed by insurance; the farmer cannot easily insure against crop failure due to defective seed. The seed supplied is of completely the wrong type and the farmers' crop fails. It is contrary to good faith and fair dealing for the seed company to invoke the term.

In practice mandatory laws on consumer protection will often supersede the rule in paragraph (2)the present Article.

It should not be possible to set aside by agreement the restrictions on the availability of terms under the Article; this exclusion would be contrary to the duty of good faith and fair dealing.

F. The consequences under paragraph (2)

If to invoke the term is found to be contrary to good faith and fair dealing, the term will not operate. Paragraph (2) The Article does not give the court a discretion simply to increase the liability but leaves it to be assessed in accordance with the normal rules, as there is no effective limitation of liability.

NOTES

I General

1. In principle clauses excluding or limiting a party's liability are valid in all the Member States. There are, however, restrictions on the validity of such clauses. The techniques of these restrictions differ. Some systems refer to a test of good faith or a very close equivalent; some employ a test of reasonableness; some have rules about intentional or grossly negligent non-performance; and some have rules about death or personal injury. There are often distinctions between consumer contracts and other contracts.

II. Good faith

2. A test of good faith was employed by GERMAN courts, applying CC § 242 (e.g. BGH 29 October 1956, BGHZ 22, 90; see Kötz, European Contract 141-142); it is still used where the special rules on unfair terms (CC §§ 307 et seq.) do not apply. Under AUSTRIAN § 879((1) for individual clauses and (3) for pre-formulated clauses) invokes a good faith test which was subject to elaborate and extensive case law (see also ConsProtA § 6 for consumer contracts). The Council Directive 93/13/EEC of 5 April 1993 on Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts uses more or less the same test. All Member States were required to implement this by 31 December 1994.

III. Unreasonable clauses

3. Exclusion and limitation clauses are covered by the general principles in DUTCH CC art 6:248(2) and of NORDIC Contracts Acts § 36 under which unreasonable contract clauses are invalid. In BELGIAN case law they are invalid if they take away the essence of the obligation, see Cass. 25 September 1959, Arr.Cass. 1960, 86; even if valid, it may be an abuse of right to invoke them under the circumstances. The ENGLISH Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 applies rules dealing with contracts between businesses and with consumer contracts. Exemption and limitation clauses may either be invalid per se or valid only if they are reasonable. The Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 is in force also in SCOTLAND. These rules are not restricted to clauses which were not individually negotiated: e.g. the Unfair Contract Terms Acts invalidates certain types of clause (such as restrictions on liability for death or personal injury caused by negligence in the course of a business, s. 2(1)), and holds others valid only if they are reasonable (such as restrictions on a seller's liability if the goods are not of satisfactory quality, s. 6(3)), even if the clauses were negotiated. In matters not covered by the Act, such as most international contracts, the House of Lords after some judicial hesitation has laid down a rule of interpretation that an exclusion clause will normally not apply when there has been a breach of a fundamental term, a fundamental breach or simply a serious breach, see Photo Production Ltd. v. Securicor Transport Ltd. [1980] AC 827. But the courts have frequently used such rules of construction to prevent a party relying on a clause when the circumstances of the case seem outside what could have been contemplated by the parties. See Treitel, Contract 6-028–6-032; Kötz, European Contract 141.

4. In IRELAND, some unreasonable exclusion clauses are regulated by the Sales of Goods and Supply of Services Act 1980. Beyond that, case law favours the rule that an exclusion clause cannot excuse a fundamental breach of contract (Clayton Love v. B. & I. Line (1970) ILTR 157) while doctrine favours the position reached under the English cases, see Clark 150.

IV. Intentional and grossly negligent non-performance

5. ITALIAN CC art. 1229 and SPANISH CC arts. 1102, 1256 and 1476 also invalidate clauses which exonerate the debtor from liability or limit liability for fraud, malice or gross negligence; in Spain it is thought that clauses excluding or limiting liability for simple negligence are valid, Díez-Picazo 730-731. Rules on specific contracts are found in the Italian CC in arts. 1490(2), 1579, 1580, 1581 and 1838(5). This latter provision also covers clauses which exclude or limit a bank's liability for ordinary negligence. AUSTRIAN case law has established a clear and undisputed rule that liability for intentional wrongdoing can neither be excluded nor restricted by party agreement (OGH 24 April 1958, SZ 31/67; 22 October 1968, SZ 41/139; 19 November 1968, Jbl 1970, 201). In SLOVENIAN law an obligation of the creditor is extinguished, but the claim against the debtor remains in force. See LOA § 117.

6. FRENCH case law also invalidates clauses excluding or limiting liability for intentional and grossly negligent non-performance, see Cass.req. 24 October 1932, S.1933.1.289 and Cass.civ, 4 February 1969, D.69.601. The general rule is that it is not possible to escape liability in case of "dol" or intentional fault. The "faute lourde" is generally assimilated to intentional fault (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 615). The "Chronopost" case (Cass.com. 22 October 1996, D.1997, 121, note A. Sériaux) is now expanded to other types of contracts under the "visa" of CC art. 1131 on the "cause". It results from these "Chronopost" cases that a limitation clause cannot be enforced in the case of non-performance of an "essential obligation". However, when such clauses originate in a decree, they are valid because of their legal origin and the only way to invalidate them is to establish a "dol" or a "faute lourde" . The Cour de cassation has specified that a mere breach of contract does not by itself constitute a "faute lourde". The latter must be inferred from the gravity of the behaviour of the debtor (Cass.ch.mixte, 22 April 2005, D. 2005, 1864, note Tosi). In PORTUGAL, according to the prevailing opinion, only vicarious liability may be excluded, CC arts. 809 and 800; clauses limiting liability are valid except for intentional or grossly negligent non-performance (recent Constitutional Court decisions confirm this view). Under the Law of 25 October 1985 (modified in 1995, 1999 and 2001) general conditions of contract exempting the defaulting party from liability for intentional and grossly negligent non-performance are invalid. Under BELGIAN case law, exclusion or limitation of liability for intentional non-performance is not permitted, but exclusion for grossly negligent non-performance is, see Cass. 22 March 1979, RCJB 1981, 196, unless it goes to the essence of the obligation, see Cass. 25 September 1959, Arr.Cass. 1960, 86 and above.

7. Under POLISH law, CC art. 473 § 2 provides that a clause excluding liability for damage which the debtor may cause intentionally, is not valid. This regulation implies a general validity of exclusion clauses. Clauses that exclude liability for intentional non-performance are invalid by virtue of art. 473 § 2. Other clauses – excluding or limiting the debtor's liability are generally valid - but they can underlie a "test of good faith". The exclusion cannot be inequitable having regard to the nature and the purpose of the contract. There is no general rule of invalidity of clauses which would exclude liability for gross negligence, because art. 473 § 2 invalidates only clauses that would exclude or limit the redress of intentionally caused damages. However, art. 473 § 2 does not affect the court's power to judge other exclusion clauses as invalid, if they are contrary to good faith – see Supreme Court's judgment of February 17th 1972 (SN 17 February 1972, II CR 72/71).

8. In other systems it is frequently accepted that liability for intentional acts cannot be excluded. In DENMARK and FINLAND clauses limiting liability for intentional non-performance as well as gross negligence have usually not been accepted as valid, see Gomard, Obligationsret II 236, Taxell, Avtal och rättsskydd 457-457 and Finnish Supreme Court 1983 II 91. Liability for intentional non-performance cannot be excluded or limited in GERMANY, see CC § 276(2). However such limitation clauses are valid as regards the acts of persons to whom the debtor has entrusted performance, and for whose acts the debtor is responsible, see CC § 278 sent. 2. The rules on unfair terms prevent standard terms excluding the liability for gross negligence, see CC § 309 no. 7 limb b) (for consumers), and this applies to a certain extent even to businesses, see MünchKomm (-Kieninger), BGB[5], § 309 Nr. 7 no. 36. Vicarious liability cannot be excluded by standard terms altogether, see CC § 309 no. 7 limb b) (for consumers) MünchKomm (-Kieninger), BGB[5], § 309 Nr. 7 no. 36 (for businesses). A rule similar to the GERMAN CC § 276(2) is found in GREEK CC art. 332. After the amendment of GREEK CC art. 332 § 2 by art. 2 § 1 of the law 3043/2002, the same also applies if the exclusion clause is included in a term of the contract that has not been individually negotiated or if by the exclusion clause the debtor is liberated from liability for certain very serious wrongs - in particular for infringements of the rights to life, health, freedom or honour. In addition, GREEK CC art. 334, as it has been amended by art. 2

§ 2 of the law 3043/2002, applies the same rule on exclusion clauses covering persons entrusted with performance by the debtor and for whose acts the latter is responsible. However, liability towards persons in the service of the debtor and liability arising out of a licensed business cannot be excluded or limited even in cases of ordinary negligence, see art. 332(2). In the NETHERLANDS, the Hoge Raad has stated that a clause may not be invoked to limit liability for damage caused by intentional or grossly negligent conduct by the debtor or a person charged by the debtor with the direction of a business: e.g. HR 31 December 1993, NedJur 1995, 389; 5 September 1997, RvdW 1997, 161. Under ESTONIAN law, agreements under which liability is precluded or restricted in the case of intentional non-performance or which allow the debtor to perform an obligation in a manner materially different from that which could be reasonably expected by the creditor or which unreasonably exclude or restrict liability in some other manner are void (LOA § 106(2)). The rule applies also in cases of the acts of persons to whom the debtor has entrusted performance. ESTONIAN LOA §§ 42 ff further limits the validity of exclusion clauses included in a term not individually negotiated. Also, some room may have been left for the good faith principle as according to LOA § 6(2) a term of the contract will not be applied if it is contrary to the principle of good faith (see also Varul et al (-Kõve) § 106, n. 5).

9. In ENGLISH law there is no special rule about intentional breaches, either at common law, see Photo Production Ltd. v. Securicor Transport Ltd. [1980] AC 827, or under the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977. But clauses are less likely to be interpreted as applying to such breaches than to mere negligence, and the fact that a clause may exclude liability for intentional breaches may be a factor in holding it to be unreasonable, see Thomas Witter Ltd. v. TBP Industries Ltd. [1976] 2 All ER 573.

V. Death or personal injury

10. As regards clauses excluding or limiting liability for death or personal injury, the distinction between consumers and non-consumers is often relevant (ENGLAND, FINLAND, GERMANY, AUSTRIA, THE NETHERLANDS). This is even true in FRANCE, where the leading view is that clauses excluding or limiting liability for death or personal injury are not valid because the integrity of the human person is a matter which falls within the range of public order (Bénabent, no. 423; for a more nuanced approach based on the idea that such clauses only relate to the amount of damages, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 615 and the references). In the event of services provided to consumer clients, contract clauses limiting or excluding liability for death or personal injury may be considered as unfair on the basis of art. 1(a) on the annex related to art. 3(3) of the Unfair Contracts Terms Directive. A similar provision is to be found in the legislation of England (schedule 2, para. 1(a) of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999), France (annex to ConsC art. L. 132-1) and Germany (CC § 309 no. 7a), although the provision in Germany may (together with CC § 310(3)) be interpreted in the stricter sense that limitation or exclusion of liability for death or personal injury in consumer contracts is not allowed at all. This is also the approach in AUSTRIA (ConsProtA § 6(1) no. 9) and Finland (chap. 8 § 2 in conjunction with § 20(1) and § 21(3); chap. 9 § 2 in conjunction with § 20(3) (16/1994) of the Consumer Protection Act). In Poland a limitation or exclusion of liability for death or personal injury is expressly excluded in the case of consumer contracts (CC art. 385^3 § 1). Outside the scope of consumer services, clauses limiting or excluding liability for death or personal injury are often not prohibited in principle, although they may turn out to be invalid after the application of rules that exist for reviewing limitation and exclusion clauses in general (for AUSTRIA see Rummel in Rummel, ABGB I, 3rd ed., § 879 nos. 113 et seq.). Clauses limiting or excluding liability for death or personal injury are however prohibited in THE NETHERLANDS in the case of some treatment services (CC art. 7:463). A prohibition can also be found for all types of services in ENGLAND in art. 2(1) of the Unfair Contract Terms Act, which states that exemption from liability for death or personal injury caused by the negligence of a service provider is not allowed.

11. A general principle of CZECH law is that the legal rules on liability and remedies cannot be excluded in advance by private agreement. Clauses agreed inter partes and excluding or limiting a party's liability for non performance or for a bad performance are however valid, as an exception to this general rule, in certain very restricted cases, essentially in commercial law. For instance, after a permissive, till now uncertain, interpretation of the Ccom art. 386 (see Štenglová, Plíva, Tomsa commentary p. 1054), the liability of the debtor could be restricted to the payment of a penalty fixed in advance by agreement inter partes. This construction is not still clearly confirmed by jurisprudence.

12. In SLOVAKIA the general principle is that an agreement by which a person waives rights which can arise in the future is invalid, CC § 574(2). This means that remedies for non-performance of an obligation may not be excluded or restricted by contract because the exclusion relates to rights which can arise in the future (a right to compensation for future damage, rights resulting from the liability for prospective defects etc.), see Svoboda (-Górász) Občiansky zákonník, § 574, pp. 524-525. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 314 (1) liability for a non-performance caused intentionally or by gross negligence or by a criminal act and liability for a non-performance damaging life, physical integrity or health cannot be validly excluded. Under CC § 314(2) unless otherwise prescribed by law, liability for non-performance of a contractual obligation cannot be excluded or restricted, unless the disadvantage incurred thereby can be offset by the adequate reduction of the consideration or by some other advantage. Under CC § 314(3) legal regulations on domestic contracts connected with foreign trade contracts can provide for non-performance and for its consequences differently from this Act and can allow limitation or exclusion of liability with the exception contained in (1).

VI. Consumer contracts

13. Special rules against the use of exclusion clauses in consumer contracts are now found in several Member States, see AUSTRIAN ConsProtA (KSchG) § 6(1) no. 9; art. 32(11) and (12) of the BELGIAN Law on Trade Practice and Information and Protection of Consumers of 14 July 1991; DANISH SGA § 80(1); FRANCE: Ccom art L. 132-1; GERMAN CC § 309 no. 7; GREEK ConsProtA no. 2251/1994 arts. 2(7) nos. 12, 13, 6(12) and 8(6); LUXEMBOURG Consumer Protection Acts 1984 and 1987, CC art. 1135(1); DUTCH CC art. 6:237(f); POLISH CC art. 385^1 and art. 385^3 pts. 1-2; PORTUGUESE Decree Law of 25 October 1985 arts. 18(c) and 20; and the SLOVAK CC § 53 [3, c–d)]. ITALIAN Codice del Consumo, d.lgs. 6 September 2005, no. 206 (see arts. 33, 36, 78, 124). In FINLAND and SWEDEN general consumer protection legislation generally invalidates exclusion clauses when the consumers in that field or a related field have a mandatory right to some remedies. The DUTCH rule may, as in GERMANY, have repercussions on the validity of exclusion clauses in contracts between businesses. The IRISH legislation referred to in note 2 is designed to protect consumers. According to LOA § 42 in ESTONIAN law, exclusion clauses like those which preclude the liability arising from law of the party supplying the standard term or restrict such liability in the case where the death of the other party or damage to the health of the other party is caused or in other cases where damage is caused intentionally or due to gross negligence are considered to be unfair and therefore void in consumer contracts (and only presumably unfair in business contracts, LOA § 44). There are no special rules prohibiting exclusion clauses in the CZECH law of consumer contracts. Thus the abovementioned civil principle is applicable. The consumer law protects consumers against abuses of professionals, a fortiori the situation of consumers has to be protected by the judge at least to the same level as in the case of non-consumer contracting parties (see Jehličkа, Švestka, Škárová, p. 267). There is no special rule in consumer law (see L. Tichý, Seminar Consumer's protection under Czech Civil Law.

VII. Stipulated payment

14. In some Member countries the courts will treat a penalty or liquidated damages clause as a clause limiting liability if the stipulated sum is below the damages which the creditor could recover. Thus, the reasonableness test dealt with in note 2 can apply to increase an unreasonably low payment, especially if the purpose of the clause is to limit liability. For BELGIAN law see Kruithof TPR 1986 no. 6. In FRENCH law a stipulated payment which is a "clause pénale" can be diminished or increased if it is "manifestement excessive ou dérisoire", see CC art. 1152(2) and Malaurie & Aynès, Obligations nos. 864-869. In POLISH law the penalty clause also can act as a limitation clause (see CC art. 484 § 1), therefore such a clause has to be judged according to CC art. 473 § 2 –it may not exclude nor limit the liability for intentionally caused damage. If the non-performance was intentional, the aggrieved party may claim full damages irrespective of the sum agreed as penalty. For CZECH commercial law, we can find the same opinion (see for ex. K.Marek, K limitaci náhrady škody a smluvním pokutám, Právní fórum 6/2005, ed. ASPI a.s.) but there is so far no judicial confirmation.

III.–3:106: Notices relating to non-performance

(1) If the creditor gives notice to the debtor because of the debtor's non-performance of an obligation or because such non-performance is anticipated, and the notice is properly dispatched or given, a delay or inaccuracy in the transmission of the notice or its failure to arrive does not prevent it from having effect.

(2) The notice has effect from the time at which it would have arrived in normal circumstances.

COMMENTS

A. The dispatch principle for cases of default

The normal rule on the giving of notices for the purposes of these rules is that a notice takes effect when it reaches the addressee. See article . This normal rule applies only "unless otherwise provided". The present Article provides otherwise for one special situation. Where a creditor gives notice to a debtor because the debtor is in default, or because it appears that a default is likely it seems appropriate to put the risk of loss, mistake or delay in the transmission of the message on the defaulting debtor rather than on the creditor. The dispatch principle thus applies to notices given under the following articles:

III.–2:111	Property not accepted
III.–2:112	Money not accepted
III.–3:302	Enforcement of non-monetary obligations
III.–3:503	Termination after notice fixing additional time for performance
III.–3:505	Termination for inadequate assurance of performance.

The dispatch rule does not apply to a notice which is to be given by the defaulting debtor, e.g. under III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment), or by a debtor who wishes to invoke hardship under III.–1:110 (Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances), or who gives an assurance of performance under III.–3:505 (Termination for inadequate assurance of performance).

The dispatch principle for notices of this kind is not recognised in all systems but it seems a fair allocation of the risk that the notice will be delayed or lost in the course of transmission.

B. Means of notice given on default must be appropriate

The dispatch principle will not apply if the means of notice was not appropriate in the circumstances. For instance, for the dispatch principle to apply, the means chosen must be fast enough. If great speed is needed a letter sent by air mail may not be appropriate and the sender may not rely on the fact that it was dispatched. The sender will be able to rely on it only if and when it arrives.

C. Time at which notice takes effect

A notice subject to the general "receipt" principle takes effect when it is received. A notice subject to the dispatch principle may be effective even though it never arrives or is delayed, but it is not effective from the moment it is dispatched. It would not be fair that even a non-performing debtor should be affected by a notice as from that time. Accordingly the notice takes effect only from the time at which it would normally have been received.

Dispatch principle when notice because of a default

1. The DANISH SGA § 61 explicitly provides that as long as a notice by the buyer objecting to an unreasonable price or by an aggrieved party who wishes to use a remedy in case of the other party's non-performance, is properly dispatched, it does not cause a loss for the sender that the notice is delayed or does not reach the person to whom it is given. The FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs provide that certain notices, in particular notices sent to a party who is in breach of contract, will be effective even though they do not reach the recipient, § 82. See also Nordic SGAs § 40 concerning notices to be given by a party who wishes to avoid a contract; reasonable means of communication must be used. Similarly, GPCCA § 70 in ESTONIA provides that the dispatch rule applies if the creditor's notice concerns breach of contract by the debtor. In AUSTRIAN and GERMAN law a number of rules of consumer protection and commercial law - especially UGB § 377(4) and Ccom § 377(4), respectively, as well as AUSTRIAN ConsProtA §§ 3(4), 3a(5) and 5e(1) - provide that timely sending of certain notices is sufficient. However, these rules do not relieve the sender from the risk of loss, only from the risk of delay (BGH 13 May 1987, BGHZ 101, 49, 53). In ITALY, according to case law (see e.g., Cass. N. 953/1973 and 639/1996) the declaration served by the creditor to the non-performing party is "recettizia": thus the defaulting party is in breach only in so far as that party knows or should have known of the notice.
2. ULIS art. 39(3) applies the dispatch principle to notices of non-conformity and CISG art. 27, in contrast to its provisions on most other statements (see note 1 above), applies the dispatch principle to notices which the creditor gives to the other under Part III relating to non-performance: see Honnold §§ 162 and 189-190.
3. There is no such expressly stated provision in CZECH law where an opposite view may be seen in at least two express legal provisions. For the civil law, CC § 517.1 recognises the right to withdraw if an additional reasonable extension of the time-limit is granted to the debtor which may be construed as meaning a time-limit "effectively granted". According to this interpretation, the creditor's right to withdraw arises only if the notice reaches the debtor. There is no conclusive case law yet but the Czech supreme court appears to be going this way (see decision under Sou R NS no. 3/2001 C 292, p. 131). The principle seems to be the same in the commercial law (see Ccom art. 344 ff) but the construction is less certain; the creditor has the right to withdraw if the creditor notifies the debtor of the withdrawal. This different formulation could be construed, perhaps according to the circumstances of a case, in two ways, as permitting the withdrawal after dispatching the notice or as linking the right of withdrawal to the effective receipt of the notice by the defaulting debtor. There is as yet no fixed case law on this question.
4. In SLOVAK law only general provisions dealing with the dispatch principle in relation to the acceptance of an offer to conclude an agreement can be found, but no special regulation on the effect of notices relating to non-performance. The position is similar in SCOTTISH law where the dispatch principle (the "postal rule") applies in relation to certain acceptances of offers but not more widely.

5. In DUTCH and BELGIAN law the general rule that a notice takes effect when it reaches the addressee (Dutch CC art. 3:37; Belgian CC art. 2281) applies also to this special situation where the creditor gives notice to a debtor because the latter is in default and the exceptions to this rule do not specifically relate to this special situation (for Belgium, See e.g. Cass. 22 December 1994, Pas. 1994 I 754 = RW 1994-95, 1264 on the effect of a notice of termination).

6. As a general rule, notification is not a requirement of the debtor's liability for non-performance in SPANISH law. However, a notice dispatched by the creditor requiring performance puts the debtor in the situation of qualified delay (mora). No specific form of that notification is required. However, the notification of default is considered in Spanish law as an act producing a legal effect when the debtor becomes aware of it (R. Bercovitz (ed.) Comentarios al Código Civil, 2006, art. 1100; Lacruz, Elementos de Derecho Civil II-2 1987, p. 181, Albaladejo, Comentarios al CC y Compilaciones Forales, XVI-1, 1989, p. 361, Diez Picazo, Fundamentos, p. 632). Nevertheless, relying on the analogy with the CC art.1262 which provides that an acceptance of an offer may take legal effect from the moment it was sent if the offeror cannot ignore it without infringing good faith, a notice of non-performance also may take effect if it does not reach the debtor because of the debtor's lack of good faith.

7. In some countries, only judicial termination is permitted in the CC. This used to be the case in FRANCE (CC art. 1184) and for this reason, there is no specific provision in the Civil code on notices relating to non-performance. However, CC art. 1146 provides that the debtor is liable to pay damages once notice has been given ("est en demeure"), except as otherwise provided by law (for instance, notice is not required when the creditor withholds performance by virtue of the principle of non adimpleti contractus) or otherwise agreed by the parties (for instance, it was held that the parties agreed to equate mise en demeure with the mere occurrence of the term). Case law adds more exceptions to this requirement, notably in case of compensatory damages (Cass.ch.mixte, 6 July 2007, D. 2007, 2975 obs. B. Fauvarque-Cosson, p. 2642, note G. Viney). A letter (lettre missive) may constitute a sufficient notice provided the notification resulting therefrom is sufficient ("s'il en ressort une interpellation suffisante" (CC art. 1146, as amended by an Act passed in 1991). Some scholars have suggested that a general requirement of notice may be found in the CC. In the "Avant-projet de réforme du droit des obligations et de la prescription (Avant-Projet Catala), recent case law has been taken into account and termination by notice is allowed in relation to non-performance (art. 1158 of this Avant-projet). Notice takes effect when the defaulting party receives it.

8. In ENGLISH law it seems to be assumed that default notices, such as notices to terminate a contract for non-performance, must reach the other party to be effective; but if the other party is deliberately hiding then it may be that notice to a third party in an official position (such as the police) may suffice: cf Car & Universal Finance Co. Ltd. v. Caldwell [1965] 1 QB 525 (rescission for fraud). See Treitel, Law of Contract, para. 18-009.

9. POLISH law recognises a rule that a declaration of will takes effect when it reaches the addressee so that the addressee has an opportunity to get acquainted with it (CC art. 61). The Code provisions regulating the statutory warranty for defects in the thing sold, however, while obliging the buyer to notify the defect to the seller within one month of discovering the defect (such notification being necessary so that the buyer can enforce the claims), also state that it is enough that notice is sent by registered letter prior to expiry of that deadline (CC art. 563), so the date of dispatch is conclusive.

III.–3:107: Failure to notify non-conformity

(1) If, in the case of an obligation to supply goods, other assets or services, the debtor supplies goods, other assets or services which are not in conformity with the terms regulating the obligation, the creditor may not rely on the lack of conformity unless the creditor gives notice to the debtor within a reasonable time specifying the nature of the lack of conformity.

(2) The reasonable time runs from the time when the goods or other assets are supplied or the service is completed or from the time, if it is later, when the creditor discovered or could reasonably be expected to have discovered the non-conformity.

(3) The debtor is not entitled to rely on paragraph (1) if the failure relates to facts which the debtor knew or could reasonably be expected to have known and which the debtor did not disclose to the creditor.

(4) This Article does not apply where the creditor is a consumer.

COMMENTS

A. General

The starting point for a consideration of this Article is that there is a general duty to exercise remedies in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. In certain cases that would mean that a person supplied with goods, other assets or services which did not conform to the contract would be prevented from relying on the non-conformity because of that person's conduct – for example, by sitting on the remedies for an excessive length of time knowing that the supplier was suffering prejudice by the delay. Similarly, a person who withheld performance or reduced the price without saying why would hardly be acting in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. However, a mere delay in notification of a non-conformity would not always fall under the provision on good faith and fair dealing. This Article is therefore designed to concretise the requirement to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing in this situation. One rationale for the requirement of notification is that the supplier should be given an opportunity to put things right.

The reason for limiting the requirement to non-conforming goods, other assets or services and not any non-performance is that it is only in relation to defects that notification becomes important. The debtor who has not performed at all knows the position and does not need to be notified and the creditor should not lose any remedies by not notifying. This applies also to an obligation not to do something or to cease doing something. It is safer to confine the requirement to non-conforming goods or services.

Not all the laws of the Member States recognise this rule in full, though most will in some circumstances prevent a party who has delayed in telling the other party about the defect from exercising some remedy, particularly remedies that involve rejection of non-conforming goods. The Article, which applies only to non-consumer contracts for goods, other assets and services, mirrors the broader approach found in the CISG.

B. Requirement of notification

Paragraph (1) lays down the requirement that the supplier be notified within a reasonable time, if the person supplied is to be able to rely on the non-conformity. This is a requirement, not a duty or an obligation. The supplier cannot recover damages for failure to notify. That would go far too far: the person supplied may not be troubled by a particular non-conformity and may not wish to pursue the matter. In such a case there is no reason why that person should be under any duty or obligation to notify. The only effect of a failure to notify is that the person supplied loses the right to rely on the non-conformity. This is of particular importance in relation to damages, price reduction and withholding performance. There are already requirements of giving notice within a reasonable time in the case of the remedies of specific performance or termination of the contractual relationship. So the Article is of less importance in relation to those remedies.

The notice must specify the nature of the non-conformity. What is sufficient specification will depend on the circumstances but the provision must be interpreted in the light of its purpose, which is largely to give the supplier a fair opportunity to cure the non-conformity. The relevant circumstances would include the buyer's knowledge and expertise. A buyer or client who is not an expert cannot be expected to diagnose a problem but can be expected to describe what seems to be wrong.

C. When time begins to run

Paragraph (2) provides that the period for notification begins to run from the time when the goods or other assets are supplied or the service is completed or from the time, if it is later, when the creditor discovered or could reasonably be expected to have discovered the non-conformity. The situation where the creditor in the obligation becomes aware during the period for its performance that there is or will be a non-conformity is dealt with by other provisions in later Books. The present provision is designed to deal with the situation where goods or assets have been supplied or a lease period has ended or a service has been completed. So the period runs at earliest from that time. However, it will not begin to run until the person supplied has discovered or could reasonably be expected to have discovered the non-conformity. The second part of this formula ("could reasonably be expected to have discovered") is necessary to maintain a fair balance between the parties. Without it, it would be all too easy in many cases for the creditor to deny knowledge. However, it is a flexible formula which enables all relevant circumstances to be taken into account.

D. Defects known to supplier

Paragraph (3) provides an exception for those cases where the failure to notify relates to facts which the debtor knew or could reasonably be expected to have known and which the debtor did not disclose to the creditor. This is consistent with the idea of good faith and fair dealing which underlies the Article. A supplier who has knowingly concealed defects should not be able to insist on being notified of them.

E. Consumer exception

Paragraph (4) exempts consumers from the requirement to notify. The rationale is that lay people may be unaware of such a legal requirement and that it could be harsh to deprive them of remedies for failure to observe it. This does not mean, however, that consumers are not subject to any requirements to notify and can sit on remedies indefinitely regardless of the circumstances. Any person, consumer or not, who wishes to exercise the remedy of specific performance must give notice within a reasonable time. The same applies to the remedy of termination of the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance. These remedies can place the creditor in a particularly difficult position and fairness between the parties requires a general requirement of notice within a reasonable time. Further, as noted above, any person exercising a remedy for non-performance of an obligation is bound to exercise it in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. The argument that consumers may be unaware of legal requirements does not apply here because everybody can be expected to be aware of the need to act in accordance with such basic criteria of decent behaviour. The general duty of good faith and fair dealing will, however, be less strict on consumers than the notification rules in the Article in at least two respects. First, it would normally only be actual knowledge which will trigger any duty and secondly some prejudice or likely prejudice to the supplier would normally be required. Finally, it may be noted that these rules contain a relatively short period of prescription – three years – in those cases where the creditor is aware of all relevant facts.

1. Most national laws on the sale of goods have a requirement of notification of non-conformity within a reasonable time or even a short time. This is true under the HUNGARIAN CC § 307. For further details see the Notes to IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity). For requirements to notify in relation to service contracts see the Notes to IV.C.–2:110 (Client's obligation to notify anticipated non-conformity). DUTCH law has a general duty in CC 6:89. A similar rule can be found for most contracts (with some exceptions for consumers) in BELGIAN law, see Storme, Invloed.
2. CISG provides in art. 39(1) that the buyer "loses the right to rely on a lack of conformity of the goods if he does not give notice to the seller specifying the nature of the lack of conformity within a reasonable time after he has discovered it or ought to have discovered it". GERMAN law has a general rule in CC § 363, which shifts the burden of proof of a defective performance to the creditor, when the creditor accepts the performance as performance.
3. See further for requirements of notification in relation to claims for damages, Notes 5 to 8 to III.–3:701 (Right to damages).

III.-3:108: Business unable to fulfil consumer's order by distance communication

(1) Where a business is unable to perform its obligations under a contract concluded with a consumer by means of distance communication, it is obliged to inform the consumer immediately and refund any sums paid by the consumer without undue delay and in any case within 30 days. The consumer's remedies for non-performance remain unaffected.

(2) The parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

Section 2: Cure by debtor of non-conforming performance

III.–3:201: Scope

This Section applies where a debtor's performance does not conform to the terms regulating the obligation.

COMMENTS

A. General

The rules in this Section give the debtor a right to cure a non-conforming performance. The allowance of a reasonable opportunity to cure is consistent with the notion of good faith and fair dealing and with the desire to uphold contractual relations where possible and appropriate. However, the interests of the debtor in being given a chance to rectify matters must be balanced by due regard for the interests of the creditor. After all, it is the debtor who has been guilty of the non-performance. If there is any doubt about the fairness of allowing an attempted cure it ought to be resolved in favour of the innocent creditor.

The rules in the present Section are wider in scope than the corresponding Article in the Principles of European Contract Law (Art. 8:104) which (as in some of the Member States' laws) applied only when the tender of performance had not been accepted because it was non-conforming. In effect, the PECL rule operated only as a restriction on the right to terminate the contractual relationship. That is probably the case which is most likely to be problematic. If, for example, the contract is for the sale of goods and, since it was made, the market price for the goods has fallen, the buyer has a strong incentive to use the non-conformity as a ground on which to escape from the contract. It seems contrary to good faith for the buyer to terminate when the seller can still deliver satisfactory goods in time. However, this is not the only case in which a right to cure may be appropriate.

The PECL provision did not apply if the buyer accepted the defective goods – so, for example, the buyer could reduce the price or claim damages for the cost of repairing the goods or the reduction in their value, without first giving the seller a chance to repair or replace them. In contrast, the Directive on certain aspects of the sale of consumer goods and associated guarantees (1999/44/EC) envisaged the seller having the opportunity to repair or replace the goods before the buyer could reduce the price or have the contract rescinded (art 3. The Directive does not deal with damages.) When work was being done on the Books on Sales and Leases of Movables it became obvious that a broader approach, along the lines of the Directive, would be appropriate for contracts in general. There is not such a broad "right to cure" in the laws of all the Member States, but in commercial sales such a provision is often expressly agreed. The PECL Article has therefore been considerably expanded.

B. Non-conformity

The opportunity to cure arises only where there is a non-conforming performance. This means a performance which does not conform to the terms regulating the obligation. In most cases these will be the terms of a contract but the Article is not confined to contractual obligations. Similar fact situations involving defective performances could arise in relation to other obligations.

III.–3:202: Cure by debtor: general rules

(1) The debtor may make a new and conforming tender if that can be done within the time allowed for performance.

(2) If the debtor cannot make a new and conforming tender within the time allowed for performance but, promptly after being notified of the lack of conformity, offers to cure it within a reasonable time and at the debtor's own expense, the creditor may not pursue any remedy for non-performance, other than withholding performance, before allowing the debtor a reasonable period in which to attempt to cure the non-conformity.

(3) Paragraph (2) is subject to the provisions of the following Article.

COMMENTS

A. Still time for conforming performance

There will be many cases where the debtor has performed before the expiry of the period of time allowed for performance and where there is still time to make a conforming performance within the period. In this situation paragraph (1) provides that the debtor may make a new and conforming tender within the time allowed.

Illustration

In May S, a commodity dealer, contracts to sell a quantity of cocoa to B and to deliver this by 1st September. In mid-July S delivers the cocoa to B but upon arrival the cocoa is lawfully rejected by B as not in accordance with the contract description. S has until 1st September to deliver a fresh quantity of cocoa which conforms with the terms of the contract.

B. Conforming performance would be later than provided for

In this situation, the debtor may still make a prompt offer to cure the defective performance and the creditor cannot pursue any remedy other than withholding performance of reciprocal obligations until the debtor has had a reasonable chance to attempt a cure. This is the general rule provided for by paragraph (2). At first sight it seems very favourable to the debtor. However, this rule is heavily qualified by the restrictions in the next Article.

C. Notification of non-conformity

The debtor must make the offer to cure promptly after being notified of the lack of conformity. There is no separate requirement of notification but it is an essential element in all remedies except withholding performance. In practice a creditor would usually have an interest in giving prior informal notice of non-conformity in any event before taking steps to exercise legal remedies. In many cases the giving of notice could be regarded as required by the duty to exercise remedies in accordance with good faith and fair dealing.

NOTES

1. Most national laws recognise in some form a defaulting party's right to cure a non-performance. However, except for the U.S. UCC § 2.508 on the seller's right to cure, no statutes have expressed the rule in the same general terms as the Article. However the first paragraph seems to correspond to ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law: for England see Borrowman, Phillips & Co. v. Free & Hollis (1878) 4 QBD 500 and Goode, Commercial Law 298-301; for SCOTLAND, McBryde paras. 20.122-20.127, and Strathclyde Regional Council v. Border Engineering Contractors 1998 SLT 175. ENGLISH law also allows cure after the time for performance if time is not of the essence of the contract, since until it is, the other party will not be entitled to terminate. If the seller cannot perform correctly within that time, there is no further right of cure. See Beale, Remedies for Breach of Contract (1980), 92. Consumer buyers have a right to repair or replacement of defective goods unless this is impossible or disproportionate: Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 48A, but these provisions do not require the buyer to give the seller an opportunity to cure.

2. CISG art. 48 and ULIS art. 37 provide a general right for the seller to cure even after the date for delivery, as long as the buyer has not terminated the contract. However the seller cannot cure in cases where this would lead to unreasonable inconvenience or uncertainty of reimbursement for the creditor.

3. The DANISH SGA § 49 gives the seller a right to cure if this can be done before the buyer becomes entitled to terminate because of late performance, and it is apparent that the buyer will not be put to expense or inconvenience thereby. In contracts other than sale of goods and related contracts (such as leasing), the right for the defaulting party to cure is wider. Cure is permitted unless the creditor will suffer serious inconvenience thereby. The creditor will not be permitted to terminate unless the request for cure has proved in vain, see Gomard, Obligationsret II 55 f. The FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs allow the seller a right to cure in the same manner as CISG, see SGA § 34 and Ramberg, Köplagen, 402 H.

4. DUTCH law has introduced the right to cure a non-performance. The creditor may refuse performance if the defaulting debtor does not offer payment of due damages and costs at the same time (cf. CC art. 6:86). This right to cure ends at the moment the creditor notifies the defaulting debtor that the creditor claims damages instead of performance (CC art. 6:87) or terminates the contract (CC art. 6:265). This right to cure is not subject to provisions like the ones mentioned in the following Article, but may be frustrated in advance by the creditor in cases where the creditor has to give notice to the debtor in order to put the debtor in default and also notifies the debtor in advance that the creditor claims damages instead of performance or terminates in case the debtor still has not performed the obligation.

5. Under GERMAN law the debtor normally has a possibility to cure, which is not a right in the strict sense of the word but only results in an onus of the creditor to accept or otherwise co-operate, the breach of which gives the debtor defences against the creditor's remedies but no claim for damages or for specific performance. The debtor's possibility to cure is not provided for explicitly in the code but follows from the Nachfrist prerequisite for the most relevant remedies apart from specific performance, see particularly CC §§ 323(1), 281(1).

6. The only provision in the ITALIAN CC which provides the right to cure a non-performing tender is art. 1192 which gives the seller who has performed by delivering goods of which there was no right to dispose the right to tender goods which there is a right to dispose of. However case law and legal writers agree in general that, whenever the creditor does not accept a tender of performance because it does not conform to the contract, the defaulting debtor may make a new and conforming tender as long as the creditor has not brought an action for termination (Giorgianni 80; Cass. 31 July 1987 no. 6643, in Foro It., 1988, I, c. 138). CC art. 1512 allows the court to give the debtor extra time to repair or replace defective goods if the contract on usages provide a warranty that the goods will operate correctly for a period of time, see Castronovo,

Contract and Tort 281 ff. If the contract of sale is a consumer contract, art. 133 d.lgs. 6 September 2005 no. 206 (Codice del Consumo) on guarantees applies.

7. In SPANISH law the defaulting debtor may cure the default at any time before the creditor has given notice of default or, according to some writers, before the creditor has terminated the contractual relationship (Díez Picazo II, 622; Lacruz-Delgado, II, 1, § 23, 184; contra, Albaladejo, II, 1, § 32.4). There is no explicit provision to this effect, apart from the rule laid down in the law on consumer sales, but it is a necessary consequence of the requirements for rescission. The cases take a pragmatic approach, requiring the creditor to accept the performance if refusal would be contrary to good faith: see Carrasco, ZEuP 3/2006, 574 ff. In the Law on Real Estate Sales late payment must be accepted before the seller has specifically demanded termination, CC art. 1504.

8. In GREEK law a result allowing cure can be reached on the basis of CC art. 288. This article requires performance in accordance with good faith and business usage. CC art. 383 provides that when a creditor has set a reasonable term for the debtor to perform and the term has elapsed without performance, the creditor is entitled to either claim damages instead of performance or rescind the contract (cf. CC art. 385 on cases where setting a term for performance is not required).

9. In PORTUGUESE law a result allowing cure may be reached in that before the time for performance has expired, or even after that time but before a Nachfrist has expired, the defaulting debtor may offer a conforming tender. Since the creditor will still have an interest in performance the tender cannot be refused (Telles 309, Leitão II 242).

10. In FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law an offer to cure made in an action for résolution will sometimes prevent the remedy being granted by the judge. The court's decision on this matter cannot be reviewed by the Cour de Cassation, (Cass.civ. 1, 15 February 1967, B.I No.68, p. 50). In other cases when the offer has been made slightly late the court has held that the delay did not amount to a sufficiently serious non-performance to justify termination, see Cass.civ. 24 February 1970, Bull.civ. I no. 67 p. 54. In French law, there is no express provision that would correspond to the present article.

11. In AUSTRIAN and SLOVENIAN law there is no express provision that would correspond to the Article. However a supplier of a defective item may prevent termination by replacing it by a conforming one or by repairing it under the rules regarding bad performance (see CC § 932 esp. (2)). Under circumstances similar to those laid down in the preceding Article the remedy available is termination (see CC § 932(4)).

12. In POLISH law – similar to Austria – there is no general and express regulation corresponding to the Article. A similar solution can be found among rules concerning specific contracts – e.g. for sale CC art. 560 § 1 provides that the buyer cannot renounce the contract if the seller immediately exchanges the defective performance or removes its defects.

13. In ESTONIAN law, LOA § 107 has an express provision on the debtor's right to cure modelled generally on the UNIDROIT Principles art. 7.1.4. However, the debtor's right to cure ends if the creditor gives notice exercising the right to terminate the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance, LOA § 116.)

14. In CZECH law, there is no similar general disposition. Generally, if a debtor fails to perform the obligation properly and timeously, that is a default (except in the case of non-performance by application of the general principle exceptio non adimpleti contractus if the creditor is the first one to default, CC § 520) and the other party – the creditor – has immediately and ipso facto the right to every remedy except termination

(cf. CC § 517, Ccom arts. 345-346, 366 ff). For the requirements for termination, see CC § 517.1, Ccom arts. 345-346 and abovementioned notes). There are no special civil law or commercial law rules on this question (see CC §§ 588–627 and Ccom arts. 409–470).

15. In SLOVAK law – similar to Austria and Poland – there is no general and express regulation corresponding to the Article. A similar solution can be found among rules concerning specific contracts, e.g. a right of the buyer in a commercial relationship to demand the removal of defects of the goods by replacement of the defective goods or by providing missing goods etc. (Ccom art. 436). The situation when the debtor performs an obligation prior to the agreed term is regulated only in the Ccom and therefore only for commercial relationships, and it deals only with a monetary obligation. According to Ccom art. 343 if the debtor performs a monetary obligation prior to the agreed term, the debtor is not entitled, without the creditor's consent, to deduct the amount corresponding to the interest from the sum in arrears for the period by which the obligation was performed earlier.

16. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 306(1) in the case of non-conformity with the contract, (a) the creditor is, in the first place, entitled to choose either repair or replacement unless this is impossible or it results in disproportionate expenses on the part of the debtor as compared to the alternative remedy, taking into account the value the goods would have had there been no lack of conformity, the significance of the lack of conformity, and whether the alternative remedy could be completed without significant inconvenience to the creditor; (b) if the creditor is entitled to neither repair nor replacement or if the debtor refuses to provide repair or replacement or is unable to meet the conditions described in paragraph (2), the creditor may require an appropriate reduction of the price or have the contract withdrawn. The creditor is not entitled to have the contract withdrawn if the lack of conformity is minor. Under CC § 306(2) any repair or replacement must be completed within a reasonable time and without any significant inconvenience to the creditor, taking account of the nature of the goods and the purpose for which the creditor required the goods. Under CC § 306(3) if the debtor is unable or unwilling to repair the goods within a reasonable time, the creditor is entitled to repair the goods personally or have them repaired by others at the expense of the debtor. Under CC § 306(4) until repair or replacement is completed, the creditor is entitled to withhold a proportionate portion of the purchase price of the goods in question. Under CC § 306(5) any clause in a consumer contract that deviates from the statutory guarantee rights to the detriment of the consumer is void.

III.–3:203: When creditor need not allow debtor an opportunity to cure

The creditor need not, under paragraph (2) of the preceding Article, allow the debtor a period in which to attempt cure if:

(a) failure to perform a contractual obligation within the time allowed for performance amounts to a fundamental non-performance;

(b) the creditor has reason to believe that the debtor's performance was made with knowledge of the non-conformity and was not in accordance with good faith and fair dealing;

(c) the creditor has reason to believe that the debtor will be unable to effect the cure within a reasonable time and without significant inconvenience to the creditor or other prejudice to the creditor's legitimate interests; or

(d) cure would be inappropriate in the circumstances.

A. General

This Article protects the reasonable interests of the creditor by placing some essential restrictions on the debtor's right to be allowed an opportunity to cure a non-conformity.

B. No chance to cure if performance late and the delay is a fundamental non-performance

The first essential restriction is, in the case of a contractual obligation, that the debtor has no opportunity to cure if performance is late and the delay is a fundamental non-performance. This is laid down by sub-paragraph (a) when read with paragraph (2) of the preceding Article. If the delay does not amount to a fundamental non-performance then the debtor may still attempt a cure if no other restrictions apply. The definition of "fundamental non-performance" in Annex 1 provides that a non-performance of a contractual obligation is fundamental if (a) it substantially deprives the creditor of what the creditor was entitled to expect under the contract, as applied to the whole or relevant part of the performance, unless at the time of conclusion of the contract the debtor did not foresee and could not reasonably be expected to have foreseen that result; or (b) it is intentional or reckless and gives the creditor reason to believe that the debtor's future performance cannot be relied on.

In May S, a commodity dealer, contracts to sell a quantity of cocoa to B and to deliver this by 1st September. It is not delivered until 2nd September, on which date B rejects it. Assuming (as is usually the case upon a commercial sale of a commodity of this nature) that any delay in delivery will amount to a fundamental non-performance, it is too late for S to make a new and conforming tender.

Illustration 2

A agrees to build a house for B by 1 March. By 1 March some important items of work remain incomplete. Since a minor delay of this type would not normally be a fundamental non-performance of a building contract, A may complete the work at any time before the delay has become a fundamental non-performance, e.g. through the giving and expiry of a notice allowing extra time for performance.

C. Debtor in bad faith

Paragraph (b) contains an important rule. If the creditor has reason to believe that the debtor knew of the non-conformity and was not acting in accordance with good faith and fair dealing in making the defective performance, then the creditor need not offer an opportunity to cure. This is important because one of the dangers of a cure regime is that it could encourage debtors to take chances with defective performances knowing that if they were noticed there would still be an opportunity to cure. The principle of good faith and fair dealing which lies behind the provisions in this Article does not require any favours to be given to opportunistic debtors who themselves are acting in bad faith.

D. Further protection of creditor's interests

Paragraph (c) protects the creditor's interests in a more general way by providing that an opportunity to cure need not be made available if the creditor has reason to believe that the debtor will be unable to effect the cure within a reasonable time and without significant inconvenience to the creditor or other prejudice to the creditor's legitimate interests. Paragraph (d) adds that an opportunity to cure need not be offered if cure would otherwise be inappropriate in the circumstances. This is a sweeping up provision designed to catch situations which cannot be foreseen and which might not fall under any of the preceding paragraphs. It is justified by the policy of erring on the side of protecting the innocent creditor rather than the defaulting debtor.

1. Art. 7.1.4 of the UNIDROIT Principles is along similar lines.
2. Similarly, the ESTONIAN LOA § 107(1) provides that the creditor may have a legitimate interest in refusing cure, mainly if cure is unreasonable in the circumstances or causes unreasonable inconvenience or expenses to the creditor. The POLISH CC art. 491 provides that in case the performance is delayed, the creditor may fix an additional time for the debtor to perform and state that if the time lapses without performance being provided the creditor will withdraw from the contract. The creditor may demand performance and reparation of the damage caused by the delay without fixing an additional time or after the time fixed lapsed without the performance being provided. The same rule applies also to obligations in which the performance is divisible and the creditor delays a part of the performance; the creditor may withdraw with respect to the delayed part or to all of the remaining parts of the performance. The creditor has a right to withdraw with respect to the entire contract if partial performance does not satisfy the creditor's interest due to the nature of the performance or to the purposes the contract was supposed to serve of which the debtor was aware. ENGLISH law applies the restriction in (a), see note to previous article, but not the other restrictions.
3. The SPANISH CC barely provides any regulation of cure. However, the CC art. 1100 sets forth that if the time established for the performance was of the essence, the default becomes automatically a non-performance and there is no possibility of cure. Regarding bad faith, the Supreme Court's decisions show that when the performance is still possible, but the debtor's attitude shows bad faith and no intention to fulfil the obligation, the creditor is allowed to terminate the contract immediately in accordance with the CC art. 1124 (TS 30 June 1981, RAJ 2622; TS 13 March 1986, RAJ 1250). Nevertheless, if the chosen option was not carried out in a reasonable time or it was performed causing a significant difficulty for the consumer, or neither replacement nor repair may cure the nonconformity, there is no further opportunity of cure. In that case, the consumer has the possibility of choosing between reduction of the price or termination of the contract; but if the lack of conformity is not essential, there is no possibility of terminating the contract. However, according to ConsProtA art. 123.4, the consumer has to inform the seller of the lack of conformity of the product within two months of becoming aware of it, or the consumer loses the right to claim the cure.

4. Regarding SLOVAK law see also Notes to proceeding Article.

5. There is no such general requirement in CZECH law (see above-mentioned notes, p. 137). Only the Ccom contains provisions similar to the present article (arts. 345, 346, 436 and 437: no additional period to cure is needed if the failure to perform is a fundamental non-performance or if the obliged party declares that it will not perform). CC makes no exception from the additional-period rule, unless the obligation is to be performed at an exact time, which extinguishes per se if not timely performed. However, as mentioned in Notes to III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules), the additional period is required only in the context of termination

6. Under FRENCH law, there is no statutory provision similar to the present article. When termination has been requested by the creditor, it is left to the judge's discretion to determine if the requirements for termination are satisfied. Depending on circumstances, the judge may either declare the contract terminated or merely award damages to the creditor; the judge may also have regard to the debtor's offer to perform when it is made during the proceedings (Req. 17 July 1923, Civ. 17 May 1954) or grant a "délai de grâce" to the debtor and this amounts to the granting of an opportunity to cure. Termination clauses have the automatic effect of terminating the contract when they are invoked. In principle, the judge is thus bound to declare the contract terminated, to the extent that non-performance is established, and the debtor may not offer to perform. In order to avoid some harsh results, French judges resort to the good faith principle ; however, this does not enable them to exercise a control of the proportionality between the termination of the contract and the breach (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 664).

7. Under GERMAN law the exceptions to the debtor's possibility to cure are encapsulated in exceptions to the Nachfrist requirement. So the creditor is not forced to allow the debtor an opportunity to cure in the case of a Fixgeschäft which is the equivalent to this Article limb (a) (see CC § 323(2) no. 2, Ccom § 376), in case of repudiation (see CC §§ 281(2), 323(2) no. 1), in case of impossibility or impracticability (see CC §§ 283, 326(5)), in case of a very severe breach of duties (see CC §§ 282, 324) and in cases which come under the general clauses of CC § 323(2) no. 3 and § 281(2) respectively. These cases are supplemented by rules for special contracts, e.g. CC §§ 440, 536a(2) and 536c, 636.

8. For the HUNGARIAN law see CC § 306 which is explained in the notes to the preceding Article.

9. According to the GREEK CC art. 385, it is not necessary for a time-limit to be set, that is, the creditor may exercise the rights of CC art. 383 immediately after the debtor is in default, if (1) it can be seen from the whole attitude of the debtor that it would be pointless to set a time-limit or (2) the creditor, on the debtor's failure to perform, no longer has an interest in the execution of the contract (see Stathopoulos, Contract Law in Hellas, no. 277).

III.–3:204: Consequences of allowing debtor opportunity to cure

(1) During the period allowed for cure the creditor may withhold performance of the creditor's reciprocal obligations, but may not resort to any other remedy.

(2) If the debtor fails to effect cure within the time allowed, the creditor may resort to any available remedy.

(3) Notwithstanding cure, the creditor retains the right to damages for any loss caused by the debtor's initial or subsequent non-performance or by the process of effecting cure.

COMMENTS

A. Consequences of allowing opportunity for cure

The consequence for the creditor of allowing the debtor an opportunity to cure is that during the period allowed for cure the creditor may withhold performance of reciprocal obligations but may not resort to any other remedy. In particular, the creditor may not terminate for fundamental non-performance. If the debtor fails to effect cure within the time allowed, the creditor may resort to any available remedy.

Paragraph (3) makes it clear that even if the debtor does cure the non-conformity within the time allowed, the creditor retains the right to damages for any loss caused by the debtor's initial or subsequent non-performance or by the process of effecting cure. This could include compensation for any inconvenience caused or any consequential loss caused by the temporary non-availability of what is being cured.

1. This provision is similar in effect to art. 7.1.4 (3) to (5) of the UNIDROIT Principles. See also Notes to III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules). ESTONIAN LOA § 107(3)-(4) correspond to the present Article. POLISH CC art. 491 is similar in effect. In SCOTLAND there is no statutory provision and in relation to the case law the discussion has been mainly about the effect of remediability on the remedy of termination (McBryde 3rd edn nos. 20.122–20.127) but there seems little doubt that if the creditor did allow a period for cure the consequences would be as stated in the Article. ENGLISH law has the effect of restricting the right to terminate the contract pending cure. In principle other remedies are not affected but the practical effect seems to be much the same as the article.
2. In the SPANISH CC there is no specific provision of withholding the creditor's performance until the cure is carried out. The only cases of withholding it are regulated in the CC arts. 1466 and 1467 which establish that the seller is not obliged to perform if the other party has not paid or when the buyer seems to be insolvent. It is logical that during the period of cure the creditor cannot resort to any other remedy besides withholding performance, such as terminating the contract because it would signify contradiction of the creditors own acts (allowing the cure) and abuse of law which is explicitly prohibited by the CC art. 7. Damages for any loss caused by the default are recoverable in any case, even if a period of cure is given by the creditor (CC 1101).

3. In CZECH law, a comparable provision can be found only in the Ccom within the provisions on sale of goods (§ 437(3)), but the same result undoubtedly follows from common sense (see e.g. Knappová (-Knapp, Knappová, Švestka) Civil Law, II, 109.Knappová (-Knapp, Knappová, Švestka), Civil Law, II, 110. For HUNGARIAN law see CC § 306 discussed in the Notes to III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules).

4. Under FRENCH and BELGIAN law, there is no statutory provision similar to the present Article. As a general rule, the creditor may invoke the principle of non adimpleti contractus, allowing the creditor to withhold reciprocal obligations when the debtor does not perform. If non-performance persists, the creditor will be entitled to request the court to order termination and grant damages for loss caused.

5. The rules under GERMAN law have the same starting point, but the creditor may resort to other remedies in case of a supervening reason which makes the Nachfrist unnecessary.

III.–3:205: Return of replaced item

(1) Where the debtor has, whether voluntarily or in compliance with an order under III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations), remedied a non-conforming performance by replacement, the debtor has a right and an obligation to take back the replaced item at the debtor's expense.

(2) The creditor is not liable to pay for any use made of the replaced item in the period prior to the replacement.

Section 3: Right to enforce performance

III.–3:301: Enforcement of monetary obligations

(1) The creditor is entitled to recover money payment of which is due.

(2) Where the creditor has not yet performed the reciprocal obligation for which payment will be due and it is clear that the debtor in the monetary obligation will be unwilling to receive performance, the creditor may nonetheless proceed with performance and may recover payment unless:

(a) the creditor could have made a reasonable substitute transaction without significant effort or expense; or

(b) performance would be unreasonable in the circumstances.

COMMENTS

A. The principle

As a rule it is always possible to enforce monetary obligations. The procedural mechanisms are for national laws but the assumption is that a suitable procedure will be available.

This is the basis of the rule in paragraph (1). A monetary obligation for the purposes of this rule is every obligation to make a payment of money, regardless of the form of payment or the currency. This includes even a secondary obligation, such as the payment of interest or of a fixed sum of money as damages. But in each case, the monetary obligation must be due before it can be enforced.

The first paragraph of this Article represents the general position in all the legal systems. The restriction in the second paragraph is less commonly found. It is derived from the experience of a number of legal systems which have confronted the problem addressed by the paragraph. In some other systems similar results have been obtained by application of the principle of good faith. It seems better to have a clear provision on the issue.

B. Money not yet due

The principle that monetary obligations always can be enforced is not quite so certain where the monetary obligation has not yet been earned by the creditor's own performance and it is clear that the debtor will refuse to receive the creditor's future performance. This is the situation regulated by paragraph (2).

Basic approach. The basic approach underlying the rules of paragraph (2) is obvious. Obligations are generally binding according to their terms. The creditor is normally entitled to perform and thereby to earn the price. The debtor's unwillingness to receive the creditor's performance is therefore, as a rule, irrelevant.

However, according to sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) there are two situations where the above principle does not apply.

Cover transaction. A creditor who can make a reasonable cover transaction without significant trouble or expense is not entitled to continue with performance against the debtor's wishes and cannot demand payment of the price for it (paragraph (2) sub-paragraph (a)). The creditor should terminate the contractual relationship and either make a cover transaction, thus becoming entitled to the difference between the cover price and the contract price, or simply claim damages without making any cover transaction. The debtor cannot invoke paragraph (2)(a) unless two conditions are satisfied. The first is that the creditor can make a cover transaction on reasonable terms because there is a market for the performance or some other way of arranging a substitute transaction. The second is that the cover transaction does not substantially burden the creditor with effort or expense.

> A sells 10,000 ball bearings to company B for €50,000,- payment to be made in advance. If B indicates that it will not accept delivery, A cannot force the ball bearings on B (e.g. by simply leaving them in B's yard) and sue for the price if there is a ready market for ball bearings or if A can easily find a new customer. In contrast, if A would have to make considerable efforts in finding a new customer and would have to shoulder the costs of transportation to another continent, A would not be obliged to make a cover transaction. A could sue for the price under the contract and, if B maintains its refusal to accept the goods, could deposit the goods with a third party to be held to B's order.

In certain situations the creditor may even be bound by commercial usage to effect a cover transaction. Whenever the creditor makes, or would have been obliged to make, a cover transaction, the creditor may claim from the debtor the difference between the contract price and the cover price as damages.

Unreasonable performance. A very different situation is dealt with in paragraph 2(b): Here performance by the creditor would be unreasonable. A typical example is where, before performance has begun, the debtor makes it clear that performance is no longer wanted. This situation can arise, for example, in construction contracts, other contracts for services and especially long term contracts. It should be noted, however, that under the model rules for contracts for services in Book IV the client in this type of case could simply terminate the contractual relationship subject to a claim for damages by the service provider if the termination is unjustified. See IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate).

> H has hired for a period of three years advertising space on litter bins supplied to local councils by C. Before commencement of that period and before preparation of the advertisement plates by C, H purports to cancel the contract. Even though paragraph 2(a) does not apply because there is plenty of advertising space available, C may not proceed to perform the obligations under the contract and then claim the hire charges, for it is unreasonable to undertake performance after H has indicated that it is no longer wanted.

The non-performance may be actual (i.e. the date for performance has passed) or anticipated.

An instance where performance might be reasonable is where the creditor has an interest in performing in order to occupy and train a workforce which must be kept on.

Common features. The feature common to the two cases dealt with in paragraph (2) is that the debtor is at risk of being forced to accept a performance which is no longer wanted.

However, neither of the two exceptions laid down in paragraph (2) affects the right of a beneficiary under a letter of credit to claim payment from the bank. This is because letters of credit are treated as independent of the underlying contract.

Legal consequences of exceptions. One of the consequences that arise if either one of the exceptions applies, is spelt out in paragraph (2): the creditor may not demand the money owed under the contract for the counterperformance, in particular the price. However, damages for non-performance may be claimed.

NOTES

I. Money due generally recoverable

1. In accordance with the general principle of pacta sunt servanda, most European legal systems allow a creditor to require performance of a contractual obligation to pay money; see for DENMARK Gomard, Obligationsret II 24). Also according to ENGLISH and IRISH law an action for an agreed sum is often available, although it is limited in certain respects: unless the contract provides otherwise, it may be brought only when the price has been "earned" by performance, e.g. the performance of a service or the passing of property in the goods (e.g. U.K. Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 49(1), IRISH Sale of Goods Act 1893 s. 49(1)). For ITALIAN law the rule can be derived from CC art. 1453(1). In SCOTLAND the standard remedy for non-performance of a monetary obligation is an action for payment. See Macdonald v. North of Scotland Bank 1942 SC 369.

II. Resale possible without unreasonable effort or expense

2. The restriction in paragraph (2) (a) has a precursor in ULIS art. 61. ULIS art. 61(2) restricts the seller's right to require payment of the price where a resale was in conformity with usage and reasonably possible. CISG art. 62 have dropped this restriction. The seller is bound to the contract; and is therefore obliged to tender performance to the buyer even if the latter is unwilling to receive performance, and may claim the purchase price. This approach expresses the general rule which seems to prevail in most European countries.

III. Performance would be unreasonable

3. Paragraph (2) (b) is based on considerations to be found in experience gained from ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH practice. Once an action for the price was available there was no requirement that it must be reasonable to pursue it rather than to enter a cover transaction. This gave rise to difficulties when a party had announced in advance that a service was no longer required but the other performed it nonetheless and then sued for the price: see White & Carter (Councils) Ltd. v. McGregor [1962] A.C. 413 (H.L.) (see Illustration 2 of the Comment). The rule in contracts other than sale of goods now appears to be that if at the date of the repudiation the innocent party has not yet performed, the performance may be made and the price claimed only if there is a legitimate interest in doing so: see Attica Sea Carriers Corporation v. Ferrostaal

Poseidon Bulk Reederei GmbH [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep 250. A party who has no legitimate interest in performing is confined to an action for damages, and recovery will be limited by the principle of mitigation. SCOTTISH law is the same - White & Carter (above) is a Scottish case. The guilty party has the onus of showing that the innocent party has no legitimate interest in performing (Scotland: Salaried Staff London Loan Co. Ltd. v. Swears & Wells Ltd. 1985 S.L.T. 326, I.H.). The Scottish Law Commission has recommended that Scottish law be brought into line with the provision in the Article: Report on Remedies for Breach of Contract (Scot. Law Com. No. 174, 1999).

4. Continental European legal systems do not generally know the general restriction upon a claim for payment provided for in paragraph (2)(b). Their general solution is the mora creditoris solution: The "price-creditor" may claim the price even if its own performance is prevented by lack of co-operation of the "price-debtor". If due performance can no longer be obtained, the price claim is (ipso iure and even retroactively) reduced by the costs the price-creditor has or should have saved and by a gain obtained from a substitute transaction (cf. for GERMAN law CC §§ 326(2), 537, 615). The result of keeping the claim for the price in existence is the most important function of the continental concept of mora creditoris, see for GERMAN law AnwKomm (-Schmidt-Kessel), BGB [2005], § 293 no. 7. This solution in most cases co-exists with the well known combination of termination and damages which applies under English law. The price-creditor, therefore, has an option how to proceed.

5. However in BELGIAN and DUTCH law there are a number of situations in which the creditor is obliged to terminate and claim damages, e.g. in a construction contract, CC art. 1794, or more generally in all obligations to be rendered in exchange for work or services (Dutch Code arts. 7:764 and 7:408 respectively). The creditor must also terminate when to insist on performance would be contrary to good faith or an abuse of right, see Cass. 16 January 1986, Arr.Cass. no. 317, R.W. 1987-88, 1470 obs. van Oevelen, R.G.D.C. / T.B.B.R. 1987, 130. Due to the expansion of the principle of good faith, a similar solution should be possible in FRANCE. The FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs § 52 provide that, in the case of goods which the seller must procure or produce specifically for the buyer, if the buyer cancels the contract the seller may not procure or produce the goods and claim the price. The seller may only claim damages, including any loss of profit. However, this does not apply if the cancellation would result in substantial inconvenience for the seller or if the seller would be at risk of not being reimbursed for losses resulting from the cancellation. See Ramberg, Köplagen 512 ff. In POLISH and in CZECH law there are no provisions corresponding to the Article. Money due is generally recoverable and the laws do not provide any exceptions similar to those in paras. (2)(a) and (b) of the Article. The position is similar in SLOVAK law. The same holds generally true for ESTONIAN law. However, ESTONIAN LOA § 655, providing for the client's right to terminate the contractual relationship under a contract for services at any time (subject to the contractor's right to demand payment of the agreed remuneration from which the savings made by the contractor due to the termination and anything which the contractor obtained or could reasonably have obtained by using the labour force thereof for different purposes are deducted) substantially decreases the necessity for general exceptions. Also, it is suggested that the creditor may be barred from exercising the right to payment if the result would not be acceptable under the principle of good faith (LOA § 6(2), see Kull/Käerdi/Kõve, 219).

6. According to SPANISH case law, the creditor cannot proceed to performance when it is clear that the debtor will fail to perform in the future and that the creditor's performance would lead to an unreasonable increase in the amount payable by the debtor (TS 14 May 2003, RAJ (2003), 4749; TS 23 May 2005 RAJ (2005), 6364).

III.–3:302: Enforcement of non-monetary obligations

(1) The creditor is entitled to enforce specific performance of an obligation other than one to pay money.

(2) Specific performance includes the remedying free of charge of a performance which is not in conformity with the terms regulating the obligation.

(3) Specific performance cannot, however, be enforced where:

(a) performance would be unlawful or impossible;
(b) performance would be unreasonably burdensome or expensive; or
(c) performance would be of such a personal character that it would be unreasonable to enforce it.

(4) The creditor loses the right to enforce specific performance if performance is not requested within a reasonable time after the creditor has become, or could reasonably be expected to have become, aware of the non-performance.

(5) The creditor cannot recover damages for loss or a stipulated payment for non-performance to the extent that the creditor has increased the loss or the amount of the payment by insisting unreasonably on specific performance in circumstances where the creditor could have made a reasonable substitute transaction without significant effort or expense.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article allows the creditor to enforce specific performance of a non-monetary obligation by the debtor. The creditor has not only a substantive right to the debtor's performance but also a remedy to enforce this right specifically, e.g. by applying for an order or decision of a court. Again the procedural mechanisms available for the enforcement of specific performance are for national laws, as are the sanctions for non-compliance with any judgment ordering specific performance.

The Article covers all non-monetary obligations - e.g. to do or not to do an act, to make a declaration or to deliver something. It covers an obligation to accept performance. In some cases a court order itself will act as a substitute for performance by the debtor.

> A who had first rented his immovable to B and later on agreed to sell it to him, refuses to transfer ownership to B. Unless paragraph (2) applies, B is entitled to a court order directing A to transfer ownership to B or, in some countries, a court order which itself takes the place of a document of transfer executed by A.

The right to enforce specific performance of a non-monetary obligation applies not only where no performance at all is tendered by the debtor but also where the debtor has attempted to perform but the attempt does not conform to the terms regulating the obligation. This is made clear by paragraph (2).

However, the right to enforce specific performance is subject to the exceptions in paragraph (3) and to the time limit in paragraph (4).

B. The principle and exceptions

Whether a creditor should be entitled to enforce specific performance of a non-monetary obligation is controversial. In England and Ireland specific performance is regarded as an exceptional remedy but in other European countries, including Scotland, it is regarded as an ordinary remedy. There is reason to believe, however, that results in practice are rather similar under both theories. The Article takes a pragmatic approach. A right to enforce specific performance is admitted in general (paragraphs (1) and (2)) but excluded in several special situations (paragraphs (3) and (4)). Paragraph (5) also operates indirectly as a restriction in cases in which the creditor could have avoided losses by making a substitute transaction instead of insisting upon enforcing specific performance.

A general right to enforce specific performance has several advantages. Firstly, through specific relief the creditor obtains as far as possible what is due; secondly, difficulties in assessing damages are avoided; thirdly, the binding force of obligations is stressed. A right to enforce specific performance is particularly useful in cases of unique objects and in times of scarcity.

On the other hand, comparative research of the laws and especially commercial practices demonstrate that the principle of allowing the enforcement of specific performance must be limited. The limitations are variously based upon natural, legal and commercial considerations and are set out in paragraphs (3) and (4). In all these cases other remedies, especially damages and in appropriate cases termination, may be adequate remedies for the creditor.

C. Right to require remedying of defective performance

If the debtor attempts to perform, but the attempted performance does not conform to the terms regulating the obligation, the creditor may choose to insist upon a conforming performance. This may be advantageous for both parties. The creditor obtains what is due and the debtor obtains a discharge (and any price or other counter-performance which is due) and preserves a reputation as a person who fulfils obligations.

A conforming performance may be achieved in a variety of ways: for example, repair; delivery of missing parts; or delivery of a replacement.

The right to enforce a conforming performance is, of course, subject to the same exceptions as the general right to enforce performance (see Comments D-J). Thus a debtor cannot be forced by court order to accomplish a performance conforming to the contract if this would be unduly burdensome or expensive or if the creditor has failed to demand performance within a reasonable time.

D. Exceptions, but no judicial discretion

Under the Article the creditor has a right to enforce performance of a non-monetary obligation. Granting an order for performance thus is not in the discretion of the court; the court is bound to grant the remedy, unless the exceptions of paragraphs (3) or (4) apply.

E. Impossibility and illegality

For obvious reasons, there is no right to enforce performance if it is impossible (paragraph (3)(a)). This is particularly true in case of factual impossibility, i.e. if some act in fact cannot be done. The same is true if an act is prohibited by law. Similarly, specific performance is not available where a third person has acquired priority over the creditor to the subject matter of the obligation.

If an impossibility is only temporary, enforcement of performance is excluded during that time.

Whether or not the impossibility makes the debtor liable in damages is irrelevant in this context.

F. Performance unreasonably burdensome or expensive

Performance cannot be required if it would be unreasonably burdensome or expensive for the debtor (paragraph (3)(b)). Burdensome does not mean financially burdensome. It is wider than that. It could cover something which involved a disproportionate effort or even something which was liable to cause great distress, vexation or inconvenience. No precise rule can be stated on when a performance would be "unreasonably" burdensome or expensive. However, considerations as to the reasonableness of the transaction or of the appropriateness of the counter-performance are irrelevant in this context. Nor is paragraph (3)(b) limited to the kind of supervening event cases covered by III.–1:110 (Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances) .

> A, who has sold his yacht "Eliza" to B, promised to deliver it at B's domicile. On the way "Eliza" is hit by a ship and is sunk in 200 metres of water. The costs of raising her would amount to forty times her value. The cost of forcing A to perform would be unreasonable.

Performance may have become useless for the creditor. In such cases it may then be vexatious and unreasonably burdensome to force the debtor to perform.

> Illustration 3
> A leased his farm for five years to mining company B for strip mining. In addition to paying rent, B promised to restore the land after completing the mining operation. In the meantime, A decides to lease the land after its return from B to the army for use as a training area for tank crews. If B would have to spend a large amount of money in order to restore the land and its value would thereby increase by only marginally, the restoration would be unreasonably burdensome.

In deciding whether performance would be unreasonably burdensome or expensive it may be relevant to take into account whether the creditor could easily obtain performance from another source and claim the cost of doing so from the debtor.

> Illustration 4
> Company A sells and delivers to company B a piece of machinery. On delivery B discovers that an adjustment of the machinery is defective. The defect can easily be cured by a competent engineer. A has no engineers within 300 km of B's place of business. It would cause A unreasonable expense to send one of its own engineers to do something which could be done locally. A offers to pay for the adjustment to be done by a local engineer. If B can easily get a local firm to do the adjustment B cannot require A to do it.

G. Performance would be of such a personal character that it would be unreasonable to enforce it

Paragraph (3)(c) is based partly on considerations of practicality. It might be pointless to try to enforce specific performance of certain obligations of a highly personal character. Mainly, however, it is based on respect for the debtor's human rights. The debtor should not be forced to perform if the performance consists in the provision or acceptance of services or work which is of such a personal character or is so dependent upon a personal relationship that enforcement would infringe the debtor's human rights. The criterion here is not simply the personal nature of the work or services to be provided. To exclude enforcement of specific performance of all obligations to provide work or services of a personal character would be far too broad. The criterion is whether enforcing performance would be unreasonable. In deciding that question regard would have to be had to the debtor's human rights and fundamental freedoms, including in particular the rights to liberty and bodily integrity. For example, an obligation to take part in a medical experiment involving surgical procedures on the debtor would not be specifically enforced. There is no reason, however, why a firm of professional carers should not be forced to perform their contracts to supply personal caring services. And there is no reason why many ordinary employment contracts should not be enforced, although certain employment contracts requiring work or services of a highly personal nature from the debtor's point of view, or the continuance of a highly personal relationship, might be caught by this sub-paragraph. The position is similar in relation to partnership contracts or contracts to form a company. Some might involve such a close personal relationship that the exception would apply. Others might not.

The six heirs of a factory-owner conclude a contract in due form to establish a limited company in order to continue the inherited business. Later A, one of the heirs, who was not to assume any management functions in the company, refuses to co-operate in the creation of the company. The other heirs may enforce performance of A's obligation under the agreement. The result might be different if the agreement were one to create a partnership in which all the partners were to play an active role.

The expression "of a personal character" does not cover services or work which may be delegated. However, a provision in a contract that work may not be delegated does not necessarily make the work of a personal character. If the contract does not need the personal attention of the contracting party but could be performed by employees, the term prohibiting delegation may be interpreted as preventing only delegation to another enterprise, e.g. a sub-contractor. The signing of a document would not usually constitute performance of a personal character. An obligation to sign a document can mostly be enforced since the debtor's act can often be replaced by a court decree (See Comment A).

The reason for the exception in paragraph (3)(c) is not that the work or services, if forced, might not be satisfactory for the creditor. That is a question for the creditor to decide, not a reason for a sweeping automatic exception. A creditor who has doubts about the value of enforced performance does not need to seek an order for specific performance. It would be for the creditor to decide, for example, whether it would be advisable to seek an order to enforce specific performance by an artist of an obligation to paint a portrait. There might be situations (e.g. portrait almost finished apart from some routine background work; completion and signature by the artist would greatly increase the value) where the creditor might wish to enforce specific performance of such an obligation and where it would be entirely reasonable to do so. There might be other situations where the creditor might consider that enforced performance would result in a ghastly portrait. It is for the creditor to decide.

H. Reasonable certainty

There is another restriction on the availability of a court order enforcing specific performance, under the sanction of imprisonment or a fine, which stems from human rights requirements and therefore does not need to be set out in the Article. The court order would have to make it reasonably clear what the debtor was required to do in order to comply. It would be unacceptable to imprison or fine someone for disobeying a court order if the order did not make it clear what had to be done.

I. Reasonable time

A request for performance of a non-monetary obligation must be made within a reasonable time (paragraph (4)). This provision is supplementary to the normal rules on notification of non-conformity and on prescription and is intended to protect the debtor from hardship that could arise in consequence of a delayed request for performance by the creditor. Where the creditor is a consumer, the creditor's interests are not seriously affected by this limitation because other remedies are still available. (See III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity))

The length of the reasonable period of time is to be determined in view of the rule's purpose. In certain cases, it may be very short, e.g. if delivery can be made out of the debtor's stock in trade. In other cases it may be longer. The rules on prescription in Chapter 7 will come into operation if there is a sufficiently long delay.

It is the debtor who will have to show that the delay in requesting performance was unreasonably long.

J. Limitations on abuse of remedy

There could be a danger that a creditor, by insisting unreasonably on specific performance by the debtor when the creditor could easily obtain performance elsewhere, could inflate the damages payable for non-performance by the debtor or the amount of a stipulated payment for non-performance which is calculated by the day or week. One control on such abuse is the general provision that remedies must be exercised in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. Another, more specific, control is provided by paragraph (5) which prevents the creditor from recovering damages or a stipulated amount for non-performance to the extent that the creditor has increased the loss or the amount of the payment by insisting unreasonably on specific performance in circumstances where the creditor could reasonably be expected to obtain performance from another source.

NOTES

I. General approaches

1. With respect to non-monetary obligations, traditionally there are important differences between the legal systems, at least in theory.

2. In ENGLISH and IRISH law specific performance is a discretionary remedy that will only be granted if damages are inadequate (ENGLAND: Chitty § 27-005; IRELAND, Keane, §§ 16.01 ff; cf. USA: Restatement of Contracts 2d §§ 345(b), 357-369). There is also some doubt as to whether specific performance will be given of a continuing obligation, see e.g. Co-Operative Insurance Society Ltd. v. Argyll Stores (Holdings) Ltd. [1998] AC 1. In SCOTLAND specific implement is usually said to be a remedy available as of right but in fact it is not granted in the cases set forth in paragraph (3) (McBryde paras. 23.15-23.22). But in Scotland the idea of the right to performance has meant that continuing obligations may be enforced more readily than in England; see Highland & Universal Properties Ltd v Safeway Properties Ltd 2000 S.C. 297. However, in England injunctions for enforcement of express negative stipulations are sometimes said to be granted as a matter of course (Chitty § 27-059).

3. In the other European countries the creditor's right to performance is generally recognised. In the German legal family this is widely seen as "axiomatic" (Zweigert and Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative law[3], 472) and seen as "das Rückgrat der Obligation" (Rabel, Recht des Warenkaufs I, p. 375). But under the new law of obligations this view is doubted nowadays in academic writing, see Schlechtriem and Schmidt-Kessel, Schuldrecht, Allgemeiner Teil[6], 465 et seq. The AUSTRIAN CC §§ 918, 919 (regarding delay), ITALIAN CC (art. 1453(1)), SLOVENIAN LOA (§ 103) and the DUTCH CC (art. 3:296(1)) expressly provide that the creditor can insist on performance. So do the DANISH SGA § 21 which is expressive of a general principle of contract law, see Gomard, Obligationsret II 21 and the FINNISH, SWEDISH SGAs § 23 and subject to several exceptions (see note III below), also ESTONIAN LOA § 108(2).

4. The principle of enforced performance in natura is particularly emphasised in FRENCH law. It follows from CC art. 1184(2) and from the contemporary interpretation of CC art. 1142. Also, CC art. 1143 empowers the creditor to demand destruction of anything that has been produced contrary to an agreement. And art. 1 of the Law of 9 July 1991 on the reform of civil enforcement proceedings also establishes the principle that every creditor may force the debtor, in accordance with legal provisions, to perform. Performance in natura is facilitated by the liberal use of judicial penalties (astreinte) (Malaurie and Aynès, Obligations, nos 1017-1023). Whether enforced performance in natura is available as a matter of right for the creditor (and therefore the judge must grant it if it is asked for) is, however, unsure. According to traditional case law, the judge holds a sovereign power to choose the mode of reparation that appears the most appropriate, and in particular can reject enforced performance in natura asked for by the creditor, based on CC art. 1142 (see Cass.Civ. 1, 30 June 1965, Bull.civ. I no. 437, p. 327, Gaz.Pal. 1965.2.329). But there is a new move to grant specific performance, based on the literal wording of CC art. 1184(2) (Cass., com., 3 December 1985, Bull.civ., IV, no. 286 p. 244; 28 February 1969, motifs, Bull.civ. III No. 182 p. 139; Cass., Civ. 1ère, 16 January 2007, RDC 2007. 719, obs. D. Mazeaud, adding that the judge can order the necessary measures for this by way of an "astreinte"). However, according to the Cour de cassation, a breach of a promise of sale may only give rise to damages, and not to specific performance (Cass., Civ. 3ème, 15 December 1993, Somm., Comm. p. 230, obs. L. Aynès). This is not very consistent and has given rise to fierce criticism, especially considering the fact that the Chambre Mixte of the Cour de cassation has adopted the opposite solution for a "pacte de préférence" (Cass., Ch. Mixte, 26 May 2006, D. 2006, p. 2644, obs. B. Fauvarque-Cosson; on specific performance under French law, see more generally the special issue of Revue des Contrats 2005, no. 1, "Exécution du contrat en nature ou par equivalent").

5. In BELGIAN law the pre-eminence of specific performance is acknowledged (Cass. 30 January 1965, Pas. I 58; Cass. 5 January 1968, Pas. I 567) (though subject to the fact that the demand must not be an abuse of right) and the same is true for PORTUGAL (CC art. 817). In SPAIN specific performance is an ordinary remedy (CC arts. 1096, 1098; Díez Picazo, II 679; Lacruz-Delgado, § 21, 170) What is under discussion is whether the creditor can rely on this remedy in every circumstance and whether the creditor is entitled to resort to a cover contract before giving the debtor an opportunity to cure (see Carrasco, INDRET 1/2006, www.indret.com). Under the ITALIAN law an action for specific performance has different requirements according to whether the right being enforced regards non-performance of an obligation to perform, to abstain, to give consent or to pay (see CC arts. 2930–2933 and Sartori, 395 ff)

6. In POLISH law specific performance (in natura) remains the primary content of the debtor's obligation. The principle of "real performance" was strongly emphasized during the past decades (see W. Warkałło, Wykonywanie zobowiązań i skutki ich niewykonania według kodeksu cywilnego, PiP 1965, nos. 8-9; W. Warkałło, Ogólne zasady wykonywania zobowiązań, Studia Prawnicze 1973, No 37). Although now – after the transition to a free market economy – the importance of specific performance has decreased, it remains a general principle that specific performance is enforceable (see W. Czachórski [et al.] Zobowiązania. Zarys wykładu, Warszawa 2002, p. 316). In CZECH law specific performance is positively also the primary content of the debtor's obligation. The debtor is obliged to perform the obligation and the creditor has a corresponding right to obtain this performance. Nevertheless the general remedy granted by judges in cases of non-performance seems to be still today a monetary compensation in the form of damages. But since the applicable general principle (common to other laws of the European tradition) is restitutio in integrum if it is possible (see CC art. 442), restitutio in natura appears as a subsidiary form of compensation and the order of specific performance is generally recognized as lawful in cases where a compensation in natura is found really possible and useful (this unwritten general legal principle is widely accepted, for confirmation see a basic literature, for ex. Věra Korecká in D. Hendrych a kol., Právnický slovník). Certainly the idea of an order to perform exists. It can be found occasionally in some of the comments on general provisions of civil and commercial law (for ex. *Jehličk*a, Švestka, Škárová a kol., p. 724) and the Court Civil Procedure law recognises a regulated power of every judge to grant a decree for the performance in natura of the debtor's obligation.

7. Also in SLOVAK law specific performance remains the primary content of the debtor's obligation. Generally all performances are enforceable except in the case of merely natural obligations (e.g. those arising from a game of chance or a bet concluded between individuals, a statute-limited debt etc.). Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 277(1) contractual obligations must be performed as stipulated; performance can be enforced.

8. ULIS and CISG give the buyer generally a right to performance (ULIS arts. 24, 26, 30, 42; CISG art. 46). However, courts are not bound to decree performance if they would not do so according to their national law (ULIS art. 16 and art. VII of the convention relating to ULIS; CISG art. 28).

II. Practical convergence

9. The basic differences between the systems are of theoretical rather than practical importance. Even in countries where enforcing specific performance is the primary remedy it appears that a creditor will pursue an action for performance, in general, only if having a special interest in performance which would not be satisfied by damages (cf. Zweigert & Kötz 484). See also the comments on CZECH law in note 6 above.

III. Exceptions to specific performance

(a) Judicial discretion and exceptions

10. In ENGLISH and IRISH law specific performance is a discretionary remedy. Nevertheless, this discretion will be exercised in accordance with settled principles (cf. Hanbury & Maudsley 651 with refs.; Martin, Modern Equity (17th ed, 2005)), some of which are similar to the exceptions in the Article. Also in FRANCE it has been said that in principle the judge was free to grant damages even though performance in natura has been demanded (Cass. civ. 1ère, 30 June 1965, Gaz. Pal. 1965.329). However the cases where this has in fact been done seem to fall under para. (3)(b) (performance would be unreasonably burdensome or expensive) or to have been cases where other sources of supply were available. In SPANISH law the courts may refuse specific performance if it would not be reasonable in the circumstances to grant it: Díez Picazo II, 696; Lacruz-Delgado II, 1, § 26, 204; Albaladejo, II, 1, § 33.1.B. For BELGIAN law see note 5 to the preceding Article. In SCOTTISH law the remedy may exceptionally be refused and damages awarded instead if such is the proper and suitable remedy (McBryde para. 23.15). In GERMAN law the right to performance and its enforcement do not depend upon the judge's discretion; the same is true of AUSTRIAN, PORTUGUESE and ESTONIAN law. But the far reaching exceptions in general clauses, in particular in defences for reason of impracticability (see GERMAN CC § 275(2) and (3)), give the judge a power which in practical terms frequently comes close to discretion. For CZECH law see Note 6 above.

11. Under CISG art. 28 and under ULIS art. 16 in connection with art. VII of the covering convention, restrictions under national laws are preserved even under the uniform sales laws.

(b) Performance impossible

12. The rule that no-one will be forced to perform the impossible seems to be common to the laws of Europe (cf. ENGLAND: Forrer v. Cash (1865) 35 Beav. 167, 171; 55 E.R. 858, 860; IRELAND, Keane § 16.10; SCOTLAND, McBryde, para. 23.18; FRANCE and BELGIUM: CC arts. 1184(2) sentence 2, 1234, 1302; CZECH REPUBLIC: CC § 37.2 (for impossibility ab initio), CC § 575.1 (for performance becoming impossible); GERMANY: CC § 275(1); AUSTRIA: CC § 1447 (if the impossibility can neither be attributed to the sphere of the debtor nor the creditor, see also CC § 920); GREECE: CC art. 336; ITALY: CC arts. 1256, 1463; POLAND: CC arts. 475 § 1, 493, 495; PORTUGAL: CC art. 828; SLOVENIA: LOA § 329; SPAIN: CC arts. 1182, 1184; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:236; ESTONIA: LOA § 108(2)(1); DENMARK: Gomard, Obligationsret II 33; FINLAND: Taxell, Avtal och rättsskydd 196 and SGA § 23; SWEDEN: Rodhe, Obligationsträtt 348 ff, SLOVAKIA CC § 575. CISG art. 79(5) appears to be to the contrary, but this is controversial (cf. Schlechtriem 51, 96-97 with references; Audit nos. 185 - 186).

(c) Performance unreasonably burdensome or expensive

13. Paragraph (3) (b) corresponds to a view which is widely accepted in NORDIC case law and literature (cf. Ussing, Obligationsretten[4], 68, Gomard, op.cit. 46 Taxell, op.cit. 197; Ramberg, Köplagen 313 ff.; FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs § 23; ESTONIAN LOA § 108(2) 2); and is accepted in GERMANY by CC § 275(2) and (3); ITALY

(Mengoni, Contractual responsibility 1089-1090) and POLAND (for the controversial concept of "economic impossibility" which corresponds to "unreasonably burdensome" – see W. Czachórski [et al.], Zobowiązania, p. 72). It is a clear rule under AUSTRIAN law that specific performance is not available if it would be unreasonable if the unreasonableness amounts to an impossibility: see Mayrhofer/Ehrenzweig, Schuldrecht AT, 396 et seq., e.g. OGH 20 March 1963 SZ 36/44. In PORTUGAL, such a rule is expressly provided for in the case of an obligation to demolish a building erected in violation of a duty not to do so (CC art. 829 no. 2). IRISH law achieves this position, Keane § 16.12. GREEK courts have refused a claim for performance in natura where that would burden the debtor with excessive and disproportionate sacrifices (A.P. 93/1967, NoB 15 (1967) 791, 595/1999 HellDni 41 (2000) 34; cf. Athens 5917/1976, NoB 25 (1977) 401). In FRANCE, the cases which recognise the judge's sovereign power to refuse performance in natura (see above, note 1) are sometimes based on the excessive cost of the operation (see e.g. Cass. req. 23 March 1909, S. 1909.1.552; Cass.civ.1, 8 June 1964, Bull.civ. I, no. 297, p. 232). However, recent case law favours specific performance, whatever the cost is (e.g. Cass. civ. 3, 9 December 1975, B. III, no. 363, p. 275; Cass. Civ. 1ere, 16 January 2007, RDC 2007. 719, obs. D. Mazeaud) This rigorous solution is based upon the binding force of the contract. In SCOTTISH law the court will in its equitable discretion not order implement if the performance involves disproportionate effort and expense: McBryde, para. 23.22. In BELGIAN law the restrictions mentioned in note 5 to the preceding Article apply also to the choice between specific performance and damages: Cass. 10 September 1971, Pas. 1972, I, 28 note Ganshof, R.C.J.B. 1976, note van Ommeslaghe. Specific performance will not be ordered if the performance would be quite different to the original obligation, e.g. a lessee who has carelessly burned down the leased premises will not be ordered to re-build them. SLOVENIAN law provides for several situations where a specific performance is unreasonable and a contract is terminated ipso iure. E.g. LOA § 104. In the CZECH Republic, the judge is to make a reasonable reduction of monetary compensation in cases of non-intentionally caused damage if there are reasons which merit special consideration. This general legal provision of CC § 450 introduced to the Czech written law a so-called principle of moderation (see commentary Jehličkа, Švestka, Škárová, pp. 561-562). As a result, the judge is obliged to try to find an equitable solution to every case involving responsibility which the judge has to decide.

14. Illustration 3 is modelled upon Peevyhouse v. Garland Coal & Mining Company 382 P. 2d 109, 116 (Okl. 1962), which, however, deals with a claim for damages for a substitute transaction.

15. In SLOVAKIA the performance is not to be deemed to be impossible if it can be realised even under aggravated circumstances, with higher costs or after the agreed date (CC § 575(2)). This means that such a performance is possible and therefore also enforceable.

(d) Performance of a personal character

16. Paragraph (3)(c) is based on considerations common to the laws of Europe (see Remien, (1989) RabelZ 53, 165 ff).

17. Thus, in ENGLAND, IRELAND and SCOTLAND specific performance is not available for contracts involving personal services (cf. Treitel, Contract 21-035; Keane § 16.05; McBryde, para. 23.20; but note MacQueen & Thomson para.6.14. Similarly in FRENCH law under CC art. 1142 there is no right to enforcement of certain personal obligations to do or not to do (Cass.civ. 20 January 1953, JCP 1953, 7677 note Esmein). In BELGIUM the rule is also applied though only where specific performance would involve physical coercion, (Cass. 23 December 1977, Arr. Cass. & Pas 505) and agency cases (CC art. 2007). In SPAIN it is admitted that there is no right to specific performance of obligations consisting in the provision of services or work of a personal nature (CCP arts. 706, 709; CC art. 1098; Díez-Picazo, II 124 and 680). In NORDIC law a claim for performance in kind is excluded for employment contracts and in some other cases (DENMARK Lyngsø 125; and generally when performance consists of work of a personal character, Gomard, op.cit. 48 f; FINLAND: Taxell, op.cit. 192; SWEDEN: Ramberg, Avtalsrätt 43 and Hellner, Hager & Persson, Speciell Avtalsrätt II: 2, 155 et seq). An exception to specific performance corresponding to paragraph (3) (c) can be found in ESTONIAN LOA § 108(2) sent. 4. AUSTRIAN law in general allows for a claim to enforce contracts for personal services. While GERMAN law allows a claim for personal services as long as CC § 275(3) does not apply, CCP § 888(2) excludes the enforcement of judgments for non-delegable personal services. GREEK CCP art. 946(2) takes a similar position and so does POLISH law (KPC arts. 1050-1059). Under PORTUGUESE law this would be a case of impossibility of specific performance, damages being the solution (CC art. 566(1)).

18. ITALIAN law, however, does not have a rule about specific performance of contracts involving personal services and difficulties have arisen: Mazzamuto.

19. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND specific performance of an agreement for partnership will be granted only in some special situations (Lindley on Partnership 536). FRENCH law, too, excludes a right to performance in natura of a promise to form a "société" (Perrot, J.Cl. Sociétés Fasc. 7bis, nos. 23 and 37). GERMAN law, however, allows the enforcement of preliminary contracts to form a limited liability company (Schlosser (-Emmerich) § 2 no. 81 with references).

20. SLOVAK law does not provide for rules concerning specific performance of contracts regarding personal services.

IV. Delay

21. Paragraph (4) takes up the ENGLISH view that a creditor who delays unreasonably in requiring performance in natura may lose the right (cf. Hanbury & Maudsley 677; Keane § 3.10). A similar rule is found in the FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs § 23, and in ESTONIAN LOA § 108(3). In DENMARK SGA § 26 provides that the creditor must give a notice to the debtor within a reasonable time that the contract continues; otherwise the creditor will lose the right to claim specific performance (see Ussing, Obligationsretten[4], 70 and Bryde Andersen & Lookofsky, 275). This idea can be found in CISG, too, but it is limited to cases where the buyer claims delivery of substitute goods and repair of non-conforming goods (art. 46(2) and (3)). No equivalent rule exists in AUSTRIA, FRANCE, GERMANY, POLAND, PORTUGAL, SLOVAKIA or SPAIN but in BELGIAN law a similar rule has been accepted: Cass. 5 December 1946, Arr.Cass., 428, Cass. 29 November 1962, Pas. 405; see M.E. Storme, Invloed nos. 394 and 389-391. CZECH law provides for specific performance only if the judge finds a compensation in natura possible and useful. Specific performance which is non-useful cannot be granted to the creditor. A fortiori specific performance is not available if it would be unreasonable. Under HUNGARIAN law the case of delay is regulated by CC § 300(1); a creditor is entitled to demand performance or, if performance no longer serves the creditor's interest, to withdraw from the contract irrespective of whether or not the debtor has offered an excuse for the default.

V. Defective performance

22. The rules on performance in natura after a non-conforming tender has been made differ very much.

23. The uniform laws on international sales grant a right to performance in natura in case of "non-conforming" goods (cf. ULIS arts. 42, 52; CISG arts. 41, 46). However, the right to require delivery of substitute goods in CISG art. 46(2) is limited to cases of fundamental "breach of contract".

24. Recent European codifications tend to grant a right to demand cure of non-conformities as does the Consumer Sales Directive (1999/44/EC) art. 3. The DUTCH CC provides for such a right in case of lack of full title (art. 7:20) and in case of "non-conforming" goods (art. 7:21 litt. b) and c)). The same is true under the new GERMAN law of obligations, which gave up the former restrictions under sales law, see CC §§ 437 no. 1, 439. In DENMARK the SGA, which formerly provided only for a right to delivery of substitute goods in case of sale of generic goods (§ 43(1)), has been amended by the addition of a new § 78 which provides for consumer sales in general a right to demand cure of defects. The New Nordic SGA § 34 which is now in force in FINLAND and SWEDEN provides a right (with certain limitations) to demand cure of defects in commercial sales in general. In PORTUGAL a right to have a defective performance corrected or to receive a new delivery is expressly provided for contracts of sale and for work (CC arts. 914, 1221); it can be considered as an application of a general principle relating to defective performances (Jorge 479). In ESTONIAN law, LOA § 108(6) as a general provision states that the right to require performance of an obligation includes the right of the creditor to require repair, replacement or other cure of a defective performance in so far as this may be reasonably expected from the debtor. However, a special regulation on specific performance applies for contracts of sale (LOA § 222) and contracts for services (LOA § 646): a demand for repair or substitute delivery/work is an available remedy if the chosen remedy is possible and does not cause the debtor unreasonable costs or unreasonable inconvenience. Instead of repairing, the debtor has always the right to provide for substitute delivery/work. A non-consumer creditor could demand substitution only in a case of fundamental non-performance.

25. AUSTRIAN law provides in respect of all contracts for consideration a general right to have a defective performance cured: see CC § 932(1) granting the creditor first the right either to demand repair or replacement (the debtor gets a “second chance”) and if that is not possible or unreasonable or not done within a reasonable period of time the right to a reduction of the price or the cancellation of the contract., or the repair of the defect or the addition of missing parts of the performance by the debtor. The exchange or repair of the defective piece may be seen as a secondary duty to perform (see for all this and the recently modified rules on bad performance Koziol/Welser II, 13th ed., 63 ss). Similar is the provision of the SLOVENIAN Code of Obligations art. 468, whereby a creditor has first to demand a cure of performance and can only then exercise other remedies.

26. ITALIAN and SWISS law (for cases of lack of quality) are similar to the former state of German law (cf. Italian CC arts. 1482(2), 1512(2), 1668(1) and e.g. ConsC art. 126); Swiss LOA arts. 689, 206, 368(2)). In Greece, after the amendment of GREEK CC art. 540 by art. 1 § 1 of l. 3043/2002, a rule has been introduced for all sales providing for the buyer’s right to demand cure of defects or the replacement of the sold goods, without any additional cost, unless such a cure or replacement is impossible or demands disproportionate costs. In GREECE a general right to have non-substantial defects cured also exists for lack of quality in contracts for work (GREEK CC art. 688). In SPANISH law, both writers and the courts accept that a buyer may demand cure in the form of replacement of defective goods (cf. CC arts. 1166, 1484 ff, 1553 and 1591; see Díez Picazo II, 670; Albaladejo II, 1 §§ 23.5 and 31.3; TS 3 March 1979, RAJ (1979), 1184; TS 14 March 1981, RAJ (1981), 913 and TS 28 June 1982, RAJ (1982), 3447). POLISH CC art. 561 § 1 provides that the buyer may demand replacement of the defective performance in case of generic goods. In case of goods defined by identity, the buyer may demand removal of the defect, but the seller may refuse to remove the defect if the removal would require excessive expenditures (CC art. 561 § 2). The above rights do not affect the right to renounce the sale contract (CC art. 561 § 3).

27. According to the SLOVAK Ccom art. 324(3) (applicable only for commercial relationships) if the debtor provides inadequate performance and the creditor is not entitled to terminate the contractual relationship or fails to exercise this right, the contents of the obligation are to be modified in a manner corresponding to the creditor's rights arising from inadequate fulfilment of contractual obligations, and the obligation terminates when it is met .

28. In FRANCE and BELGIUM it is uncertain whether the debtor can be constrained to cure or to provide cure of a defective performance (generally, no distinction is made between cases where it is for the debtor or the creditor to have the cure made). Formerly, in such cases the Cour de cassation appeared to deny a duty of performance in natura (Cass.civ. 4 June 1924, S. 1925.1.97 with note Hugueney, D.P. 1927.1.136 with note Josserand; Cass.civ. 15 March 1968, D. 1968.346, S. 1968.1.100) but at present the courts are more willing to order specific performance.

29. In the UNITED KINGDOM the consumer's right to repair or replacement under Directive 1999/44 is implemented by making available specific performance under a new Part 5A of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 (see Chitty §§ 43-114 ff.), but the change does not affect non-consumer contracts.

30. In the CZECH REPUBLIC there is no express legal provision allowing a general right of the creditor to have defects of performance cured. It appears in different special situations. For instance the buyer has a right to obtain an appropriate reduction in the price of the thing, repair of the thing or supply of that which is missing (CC § 507.1). Similarly under the commercial law the buyer is allowed to demand an order of specific performance to force delivery of the missing goods or elimination of defects of goods sold (see Ccom arts. 436.1 and 437.1). For the HUNGARIAN law see CC § 306 discussed in the Notes to III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules).

VI. Relevance of cover transaction

31. Under ENGLISH and IRISH law the possibility of a cover transaction is an important consideration for denying specific performance (Treitel, Contract 19-114; and cf. Restatement of Contracts 2d §§ 360 (b), 359). In SCOTLAND a similar approach is taken, in spite of the fact that specific performance is regarded as a normal remedy (McBryde, para. 23.21). Some BELGIAN authors have suggested a similar approach in certain, mainly commercial, contexts, Fredericq, III no.1432, van Ryn and Heenen III, no. 688. In most systems, the buyer has the option of a cover transaction but is not obliged to use it, unless there is a usage to that effect. In ESTONIAN law the availability of a cover transaction has been formulated as a possible restriction to a claim for specific performance (LOA § 108(2) sent. 3). However, writers emphasise its relevance more as one argument in weighing the parties' interests than as an independent basis for exclusion of specific performance (see e.g. Varul et al (-Kõve) § 108, no. 7.4.).

III.–3:303: Damages not precluded

The fact that a right to enforce specific performance is excluded under the preceding Article does not preclude a claim for damages.

A. The basic situation

This Article makes it clear that even in those exceptional cases where specific performance cannot be enforced the creditor may still recover damages, if they are otherwise available. Damages are always available if the non-performance has caused the creditor to suffer loss, unless the non-performance is excused.

B. Other consequences

The provision does not deal with the question whether in the cases in which a claim to performance of a contractual obligation is excluded the creditor may terminate the contractual relationship in whole or in part. This will depend on the application of other Articles. In some cases it might be possible to imply an agreement between the parties to terminate their mutual obligations. For example, if the creditor accepts that it would be unreasonably burdensome for the debtor to perform and obtains performance elsewhere with the debtor's express or implied assent, it may be possible to imply an agreement between the parties that their obligations to provide and pay for that particular performance are at an end.

NOTES

1. The rule in the Article is in accordance with NORDIC, ENGLISH, SCOTTISH, CZECH, FRENCH BELGIAN, DUTCH, LUXEMBOURG, ITALIAN, PORTUGUESE and SPANISH law, see e.g. Czech CC §§ 100, 583 and Czech Ccom art. 387.2; French CC art. 1184(2) and Italian CC arts. 1218 and 1453. Generally speaking it also corresponds to GERMAN law, POLISH law; ESTONIAN law; SLOVENIAN law (see LOA § 103); AUSTRIAN law (see CC § 921 and SLOVAK law CC § 519). In SCOTLAND it is common practice for parties to seek specific implement which failing damages to cover the possibility of the court refusing the former remedy (McBryde, para. 23.10-23.12).

Section 4: Withholding performance

III.–3:401: Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation

(1) A creditor who is to perform a reciprocal obligation at the same time as, or after, the debtor performs has a right to withhold performance of the reciprocal obligation until the debtor has tendered performance or has performed.

(2) A creditor who is to perform a reciprocal obligation before the debtor performs and who reasonably believes that there will be non-performance by the debtor when the debtor's performance becomes due may withhold performance of the reciprocal obligation for as long as the reasonable belief continues. However, the right to withhold performance is lost if the debtor gives an adequate assurance of due performance.

(3) A creditor who withholds performance in the situation mentioned in paragraph (2) has a duty to give notice of that fact to the debtor as soon as is reasonably practicable and is liable for any loss caused to the debtor by a breach of that duty.

(4) The performance which may be withheld under this Article is the whole or part of the performance as may be reasonable in the circumstances.

COMMENTS

A. General

Although this Article applies to all reciprocal obligations (provided they are within the intended scope of these rules) it will find its main application in relation to contractual obligations. Where under a synallagmatic contract (that is, one in which both parties have obligations) one party is to perform first but has not yet done so, or is to perform simultaneously with the other but is not able or willing to do so, it is both just and commercially convenient for the other party to have the right to withhold or suspend the counter-performance. This both protects the withholding party from having to advance credit to the non-performer and gives the latter an incentive to perform in order to receive the counter-performance. The well-known exceptio non adimpleti contractus is an expression of this idea. Performance of one obligation may be withheld so long as the other is not fully performed.

Illustration 1
A employs B to build a house for him; the contract provides that within two days of the contract being signed, A will make an advance payment to B. B need not start work until the payment has been made.

A party whose own conduct causes the other party's non-performance may not invoke this Article to withhold performance. See III.–3:101 (Remedies available) paragraph (3).

Illustration 2
The owner of a house enters a contract with a municipal organisation for communal steam heating. The account is to be sent out by the 15th of one month and to be paid by the 15th of the next month. Because of a computer breakdown the organisation does not send out the account for 15 January until 10 February, and the house-owner has not paid by 15 February. The municipality cannot suspend the supply of steam.

B. Non-performance need not be fundamental

A party's non-performance need not be fundamental in order to entitle the other party to withhold performance. This is balanced, however, by a reasonableness requirement and by other provisions for the protection of the debtor. The Article on good faith and fair dealing must also be kept in mind.

C. Reasonableness

Paragraph (4) introduces a reasonableness requirement which applies to the whole Article. The performance which may be withheld under the Article is the whole or part of the performance as may be reasonable in the circumstances.

> Illustration 3
> A agrees to buy a new car from B, a dealer. When A comes to collect the car there is a scratch on the bodywork. A may refuse to accept the car or pay any part of the price until the car is repaired.

> Illustration 4
> The same except that the car is to be shipped to A's home in another country, where B has no facilities. Since it would be unrealistic to expect B to repair the scratch, it would be unreasonable and contrary to good faith for A to withhold more than the cost of having the car repaired locally.

In some cases the creditor cannot practicably withhold performance in part - for instance, many obligations to perform a service must realistically be performed in full or suspended in full. The creditor may only withhold performance in full if in the circumstances that is not unreasonable. However, it may be expressly provided in a contract that a performance is made reciprocal to the other performance.

The restriction in this paragraph is not found in the laws of all the Member States, at least in such a clear form, but it seems only consistent with the general duty of good faith and fair dealing.

D. Party who is to perform at same time or after the other

Paragraph (1) provides that a creditor who is to perform a reciprocal obligation simultaneously with or after the debtor performs has a right to withhold performance of the reciprocal obligation until the debtor has tendered performance or has performed. This will be the normal case for a withholding of performance.

E. Party who is to perform first

It is obvious that a party who is obliged to tender performance first is not entitled to withhold performance merely because the other is not willing to perform at that stage.

> Illustration 5
> A contracts with B to have a wall built in A's garden for a fixed sum payable on completion. B cannot require an advance payment as a condition of starting work.

However, paragraph (2) provides for the remedy of withholding performance to be available in certain cases of anticipated non-performance. It is available if the creditor reasonably believes that there will be non-performance by the debtor when the debtor's performance becomes due. The creditor may withhold performance of the reciprocal obligation for as long as the reasonable belief continues. An unqualified right to withhold performance in such situations could be open to abuse. However the debtor is protected in two ways. First, if the creditor's belief is not reasonable – an objective test – the creditor will be liable for non-performance. Secondly, the right to withhold performance is lost if the debtor gives an adequate assurance of due performance. So as to enable the debtor to clarify the situation (and thereby perhaps destroy the reasonableness of the creditor's belief) or make an adequate assurance of due performance, the Article provides in paragraph (3) that the creditor has a duty to give notice of the withholding to the debtor as soon as is reasonably practicable. This is not a requirement for withholding performance. That would be unrealistic in some cases. But the creditor will be liable for any loss caused to the debtor by a breach of the duty.

Illustration 6
In January B agrees to build a house for O and to start work on 1st May. O undertakes to make an advance payment as part of the price by not later than 1st June, time of payment being regarded as fundamental. During May O tells B that because of recent heavy expenditure it will not be possible to pay the advance payment until the beginning of July. Instead of terminating for non-performance, B may keep the obligations in being for performance by O and may meanwhile suspend the building works. B must notify O that this is being done so that O has a chance to raise the money or provide security for payment.

I. Presumption on concurrent performances

1. The GERMAN CC § 320 provides that, unless obliged to perform first, the debtor of a reciprocal obligation may withhold performance until the counter-performance has been tendered. This corresponds to the POLISH CC art. 488 § 1, and generally also to the ESTONIAN LOA § 111(1)-(3) and the SLOVENIAN LOA § 101. A similar presumption on concurrent obligations has been established in GREECE, see CC arts. 374 and 378; ITALY, see CC art. 1460(1); the NETHERLANDS, see CC art. 6:262; and AUSTRIA (for barter and sale: see CC § 1052 first sentence and § 1062 which are applied analogously to other contracts); see e.g. OGH 16 September 1985, SZ 58/144 regarding a leasing contract; PORTUGAL, see CC § 428(1).
2. The FRENCH, BELGIAN, LUXEMBOURG and SPANISH codes and the NORDIC statutes do not have general provisions but only fragmentary rules to the same effect as the CC, see on sales French, Belgian and Luxembourg CCs art. 1651, Spanish CC arts. 1100, 1466, 1467, 1500 and 1502, DANISH SGA § 14 and FINNISH and SWEDISH Sale of Goods Acts §§ 10, 49. However, in these countries the courts have established a general principle similar to the one just mentioned: see on FRANCE, Huet JJCLCiv art. 1184; on BELGIUM, de Bersaques RCJB 1949, 125, no. 8, and Storme, RW 1989-90, 317 no. 12; on SPAIN, Díez-Picazo II 692; Albladejo II, 1, § 20.1; on DENMARK, Gomard, Obligationsret II 61 ff; on SWEDEN, Ramberg, Köplagen 202 ff. For sale of goods CISG art. 58(1) also provides for concurrent performances.
3. It may however follow from the parties' agreement or from the circumstances of the case that one party has to perform or to begin performance first. This is the case when concurrent performance is impossible such as in contracts for lease and services. Cf. for BELGIUM M.E. Storme De Exceptio, R.W. 1989-90, 317.

4. In ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law s. 28 of the UK Sale of Goods Act 1979 provides that unless otherwise agreed, delivery of goods and payment of the price are concurrent conditions, that is to say, the seller must be ready and willing to give possession of the goods to the buyer in exchange for the price and the buyer must be ready and willing to pay the price in exchange for possession of the goods. The IRISH Sale of Goods Act 1893 s. 28 is to the same effect. Also in other contracts than sales there is a tendency to treat the parties' promises as concurrent conditions, see Treitel, Remedies § 214; but it may follow from the circumstances that one of the parties will have to perform first, such as where simultaneous performances are not possible.

5. Under CZECH civil law (CC § 560) performances are considered as reciprocal only in cases when this is required (the provision states "if the parties to a contract are required to render a reciprocal performances, one party may only demand performance of the obligation from the other party if this party has already performed, or is ready to perform, its obligation"). This presumption on concurrent performances is not recognized in CZECH law. For this interpretation see Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová, p. 716 (an explicit agreement on reciprocity is required) and established case law from 1979 (see decision R 1/19779). Nevertheless the same authors seem to recognise liability to reciprocal performance as "typical" for any synallagmatic contract (and so for major agreements inter partes); see Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová, p. 715. The same principle is applied in commercial law (see Ccom art. 325 and commentary by Štenglová, Plíva, Tomsa, p. 1013).

6. Also under SLOVAK law if the parties are to give performance to each other according to the agreement, performance may be demanded only by the party who has already performed the reciprocal obligation or who is prepared to perform it (CC § 560 and Ccom art. 325).

II. Withholding performance of a reciprocal obligation

(a) In general

7. The rule laid down in paragraph (1) seems to be widely accepted in most countries where a party may withhold performance until the other party performs, both in cases of concurrent obligations and where the other party has to perform first. See on contracts in general GERMAN CC § 320; GREEK CC art. 374; ITALIAN CC art. 1460(1); DUTCH CC art. 6:52; POLISH CC art. 488 § 2; ESTONIAN LOA § 111(1)-(3); CZECH law (see explicit provisions of CC § 560 first phrase and Ccom art. 325); SLOVENIAN LOA § 101 and PORTUGUESE CC art. 428. In FRANCE, BELGIUM, LUXEMBOURG, AUSTRIA, SPAIN and DENMARK the courts have established this rule as a general principle (exceptio non adimpleti contractus: Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 629 et seq.) based on specific provisions and the spirit of the law: see on sales French, Belgian and Luxembourg CCs arts. 1653, 1707 and (semble) 1612 and 1613; on recognition as a general principle in Belgian case law, Cass. 26 April 1945, Pas. I; 24 April 1947, RCJB 1949, 125; 12 September 1973, Arr.Cass. 1974, 36. For AUSTRIA see CC §§ 1052, 1062 and Jabornegg; for SPAIN, CC art. 1466, and the literature cited above, para 1(a). For DENMARK see Ussing,Obligationsretten[4], 79 and Bryde Andersen & Lookofsky 144 ff. For FINLAND and SWEDEN see SGA §§ 10 and 42 and respectively Taxell, Avtal och rättsskydd 237 and Rodhe, Obligationsrätt 391. In SCOTTISH law, the principle of mutuality of contract enables a party to withhold performance in response to the other party's breach, so long as there is a link between the breach and the performance withheld: Bank of East Asia Ltd. v. Scottish Enterprise 1997 SLT 1213; McBryde, paras. 20.44-20.61. CISG art. 58 gives each party a similar right to withhold performance. See also UNIDROIT art. 7.1.3.

(b) Proportionality (reasonableness test)

8. Provisions to the same effect as paragraph (4), under which a party may withhold performance in whole or in part as may be reasonable in the circumstances are found in some of the systems. Thus the DUTCH CC art. 6:262(2) provides that in the event of partial or defective performance, withholding of the creditor's own performance is allowed only to the extent justified by the non-performance. GREEK law (CC art. 376) prevents the creditor from withholding performance when the other party has partly performed and the withholding of the counter-performance would be contrary to good faith under the specific circumstances and in particular because the part of the performance still delayed is non-substantial. ITALIAN law (CC art. 1460(2)) prevents the creditor from withholding performance when this would be contrary to good faith. GREEK case law holds that part performance by one party may only entitle that party to a corresponding counter-performance from the other: A.P. 574/1990, EEN 58 (1991) 166-167. Italian writers have argued in favour of a partial withholding when the non-performance by the defaulting party does not justify a withholding of the entire performance, see Persico 145. Similarly GERMAN CC § 320(2) provides that after partial performance the creditor may not withhold performance in so far as this would be contrary to good faith. ESTONIAN LOA § 111(3) states that a party's right to withhold performance is limited if this would be unreasonable in the circumstances or contrary to the principle of good faith, in particular if the other party has performed the obligations for the most part or without significant deficiencies. Under AUSTRIAN law the right to withhold performance is limited by the provision of CC § 1295(2) prohibiting the vexatious abuse abusive exercise of a legal right: such abuse of the right to withhold performance may be found in a flagrant disproportion in of the parties' the interests of the parties, see e.g. OGH 31 October 1989, JBI 1990, 248. The POLISH CC and the PORTUGESE CC do not have explicit provisions. However, Portuguese writers have invoked the rule on the creditor's right to reduce performance to reach the same result; see Varela I 404, Leitão II 276, 277. Also SPANISH, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURG courts have adopted the proportionality test, the exercise of which in France is left to the free and final appreciation of the trial judge. For SPAIN see Supreme Court 27 March 1991 (Díez Picazo II 693) and 11 July 1991 (Lacruz-Delgado § 26, 199). On BELGIAN law see Storme, RW 1989-90, 313, 319-321.

9. In ENGLISH and IRISH law a party may only withhold performance because the other has not performed if:

   (a) the first party's obligation to perform is expressly or by implication made dependent on the performance by the second party, or

   (b) the court construes the second party's obligation as being a condition of the contract, or

   (c) the second party's non-performance will have the effect of depriving the first party of the substance of what was contracted for.

   In other words the test for withholding performance is the same as for termination save that termination also requires the time for performance to have expired, see Beale chapters 2 and 3. Under this approach there is only the right to withhold performance for a non-performance that is sufficiently serious to justify termination. However, when the non-performance is less serious, much the same result as under the present

Article is reached by alternative means. In contracts for the sale of goods, the buyer may set up the non-conformity "in diminution or extinction of the price" (Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 53(1)(a)). In other contracts, the aggrieved party may set off a claim in damages against the price.

III. Anticipated non-performance

10. CISG art. 71(1) provides that a party may suspend the performance of that party's obligations if, after the conclusion of the contract, it becomes apparent that the other party will not perform a substantial part of that other party's obligations as a result of:

    (a) a serious deficiency in ability to perform or creditworthiness; or

    (b) conduct in preparing to perform or in performing.

11. A very similar rule is adopted by the FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs § 61, see Ramberg, Köplagen 586 ff.

12. GERMAN CC § 321 provides that a party who is to perform first may withhold performance if, due to an essential deterioration of the other party's financial position after the conclusion of the contract, the first party's claim for the counter-performance is endangered. AUSTRIAN CC § 1052 second sentence provides for basically the same remedy and so does DANISH law see Gomard Obligationsret II 14f and III Chapter 17. This is also the case under the SLOVENIAN LOA § 102 and the PORTUGUESE CC arts. 429 and 780. The GREEK CC art. 377 is wider: it covers cases of pre-existing financial difficulties of which the first party did not and had no reason to know, Michaelides-Nouaros in Erm. AK II/1, art. 377 no. 4 (1949), Stathopoulos in Georgiadis and Stathopoulos, arts. 374-378 nos. 18-19, the same, Obligations §17 nos. 72-73. See also DUTCH CC arts. 6:80 and 6:263; ITALIAN CC art. 1461. The scope of application of AUSTRIAN CC § 1052 second sentence which expressly refers only to barters was extended by applying the provision analogously to other contracts. The ESTONIAN LOA § 111(4) provides that if circumstances which become evident to the party after the conclusion of the contract give sufficient reason to believe that the other party will not be able to perform the other party's contractual obligation due to insolvency, or the other party's conduct in preparing for performance or during performance or any other similar circumstance giving reason to believe that the party will not perform the obligation, the party who is obliged to perform first may withhold performance. If what is anticipated is partial performance or performance which is defective in any other manner, the right to withhold performance is justified only if it can be presumed that there will be a fundamental breach of the contract by the other party. The party entitled to withhold performance may require the other party to perform at the same time as the first party and may set a reasonable term for the performance of the obligation, for confirmation of the performance or for the provision of security (LOA § 111(5)). Failure to fulfil those requirements gives the party who is entitled to withhold performance a right to terminate the contractual relationship under special provisions in LOA § 117.

13. In POLISH law, if the performance of an obligation under a synallagmatic contract is doubtful because of one party's financial state (bankruptcy not necessary), the other party may withhold performance until the party with financial problems performs the obligation or provides a security (CC art. 490(1)). A party who knew about the difficult financial state of the second party at the time of conclusion of the contract is not entitled to withhold performance (CC art. 490(2)).

14. CZECH civil law (see CC § 560 in fine) allows every contractual party to withhold its own performance until the reciprocal performance of the other party if the other's party performance is put at risk by circumstances which affect the other party and were not known at the time the contract was concluded. The law specifies that it concerns “even a party bound to render its performance in advance”. The applicable commercial rule is very similar. One party to a commercial contract may refuse its performance if - after conclusion of the contract - it becomes obvious that the other party will not perform its obligation because of a lack of capacity to do so or a lack of preparation to perform (see Ccom art. 326.1 in fine).

15. Provisions which provide a right to withhold the goods in case of the buyer's insolvency or bankruptcy are found in the DANISH Sales Act § 39; FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1613; SPANISH CC arts. 1467 and 1502; PORTUGUESE CC art. 429; and UK Sale of Goods Act 1979 ss. 39(1)(b) and 41(1). For IRELAND see Sale of Goods Act 1893 ss. 39 and 41. Furthermore, the French and Belgian CCs art. 1653 and the Spanish CC art. 1502 permit the buyer to suspend payment of the price if the buyer has reason to fear that a third party's claim to the goods will disturb the possession of them. In Belgian law the existence of a more general principle is disputed: see van Ommeslaghe RCJB 1975, 615, no. 68; Storme, Invloed, nos. 299 ff; Vanwijck-Alexandre.

16. In SLOVAKIA even the party who must perform in advance may withhold performance until the reciprocal performance is received or secured if the other party's performance is jeopardized by facts affecting the other party which were not known to the first party at the time of concluding the contract (CC § 560 and Ccom art. 326). For HUNGARY see CC § 306(4) discussed in the Notes to III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules).

Section 5: Termination

III.–3:501: Scope and definition

(1) This Section applies only to contractual obligations and contractual relationships.

(2) In this Section "termination" means the termination of the contractual relationship in whole or in part and "terminate" has a corresponding meaning.

COMMENTS

A. Termination as a remedy

This Section appears in a Chapter headed "Remedies for non-performance". It follows that it is dealing only with termination as a remedy for non-performance of an obligation or, in a few cases, for something (such as a failure to give an adequate assurance of performance) which is treated as the equivalent of non-performance.

B. Contractual obligations

Unlike most of this Chapter, the present Section applies only to contractual obligations and contractual relationships. There are two reasons for this. First, it will be extremely unusual for the remedy of termination to be useful in relation to non-contractual obligations. The main usefulness of termination is that it frees the creditor to obtain goods or services elsewhere and, in certain situations, to recover what has been paid or provided already under the contract. In the case of reciprocal non-contractual obligations other available remedies - withholding performance, enforcing specific performance, damages and interest - should be adequate. Secondly, it could be regarded as inappropriate to allow private citizens to terminate by notice obligations arising by operation of law.

C. Meaning of "termination"

There is great variation between, and sometimes even within, legal systems in the terminology used for the remedy provided by this Section. These rules opt for the neutral "termination" instead of any technical term such as "rescission". It is hoped that this may help to avoid the translation problems which are inherent in the use of technical terms and may help to make it clear that the general effect of the remedy is prospective, not retrospective.

The use of the word "termination" immediately raises the question of what is terminated.

The Principles of European Contract Law talk of "termination of the contract". However, in the context of these rules the expression "termination of the contract" is inaccurate. It is not the contract as defined in these rules (i.e. an agreement of a certain kind; a type of juridical act) which is terminated. The juridical act took place. It was done and cannot be terminated. It is the contractual relationship between the parties which is terminated. However, the relationship is not necessarily terminated completely. There may be cases where, for example, only a separable part of the parties' obligations and rights under the contract is terminated. In such cases the relationship may continue with a more limited content: only part of it is terminated. A particular case is where aspects of the relationship relating to arbitration, or payment of a fixed sum by way of compensation for losses, or the return of property may survive. This is why the Article refers to termination of the contractual relationship in whole or in part.

D. Grounds for termination in general

The grounds for termination under this Section are essentially of two types. First there is fundamental non-performance by the debtor, regulated by III.–3:502 (Termination for fundamental non-performance) . And secondly there are what might be called equivalents to non-performance, regulated by the succeeding three Articles. These are:

> (a) where the creditor has allowed the debtor a further time to perform but the debtor has not performed within that time (III.–3:503 (Termination after notice fixing additional time for performance)).
> (b) where there is an anticipated fundamental non-performance (III.–3:504 (Termination for anticipated non-performance)); and
> (c) where the debtor has failed to give an adequate assurance of performance when called upon to do so (III.–3:505 (Termination for inadequate assurance of performance)).

Termination under this Section may be effected by the act of the creditor alone; there is no need to bring an action in court. Termination is effective only if notice of termination is given by the creditor to the debtor. This is regulated by subsequent Articles.

If the requirements for termination are satisfied these rules do not provide for any period of grace to be granted to the debtor by a court or an arbitral tribunal.

Sub-section 1: Grounds for termination

III.–3:502: Termination for fundamental non-performance

(1) A creditor may terminate if the debtor's non-performance of a contractual obligation is fundamental.

(2) A non-performance of a contractual obligation is fundamental if:

(a) it substantially deprives the creditor of what the creditor was entitled to expect under the contract, as applied to the whole or relevant part of the performance, unless at the time of conclusion of the contract the debtor did not foresee and could not reasonably be expected to have foreseen that result; or

(b) it is intentional or reckless and gives the creditor reason to believe that the debtor's future performance cannot be relied on.

COMMENTS

A. Termination for fundamental non-performance

Whether, in the case of a non-performance of a contractual obligation, the creditor should have the right to terminate the contractual relationship in whole or in part depends upon a weighing of conflicting considerations.

On the one hand, the creditor may desire wide rights of termination. The creditor will have good reasons for terminating if the performance is so different from that due that the creditor cannot use it for its intended purpose, or if it is so late that the creditor's interest in it is lost. In some situations termination will be the only remedy which will properly safeguard a creditor's interests, for instance when the debtor is insolvent and cannot perform the obligation or pay damages. The creditor may also wish to be able to terminate in less serious cases. A creditor who fears that the debtor may not perform may wish to able to take advantage of the threat of termination to ensure that the debtor performs in complete compliance with the terms regulating the obligation. A creditor may also wish to terminate for less appropriate reasons. The creditor may, for example, hope to escape from a contract that has turned out to be unprofitable because of a change in the market price since the contract was concluded.

For the debtor, on the other hand, termination usually involves a serious detriment. In attempting to perform the debtor may have incurred expenses which are now wasted, and may lose all or most of the value of the performance when there is no market for it elsewhere. When other remedies such as damages or price reduction are available these remedies will often safeguard the interests of the creditor sufficiently so that termination should be avoided.

For these reasons it is only a fundamental non-performance which will justify termination under this Article. The debtor's interests are also protected by the provisions on cure; subject to important exceptions, a creditor cannot terminate without giving the honest and willing debtor another chance to perform. See III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules) and Comment C below.

In one respect the present Article differs from both the law in some Member States and the provision in PECL which defined "fundamental non-performance", art. 8:103. PECL 8:103(a) provided that a non-performance would also be fundamental if strict compliance with the obligation was "of the essence" of the contract. This left it open to a court to treat an obligation as "of the essence", so that any failure to perform it would give the other party the right to terminate the contractual relationship, even if the non-performance had no serious consequences for the other party. In some situations the parties may wish certain obligations to be treated in that way, for example time provisions in commodity contracts. However it does not seem appropriate to apply the same approach as a general rule for all contracts. If the parties wish non-performance of an obligation to have that effect, they remain free to provide for it in their agreement, see Comment C; or there may be a usage to that effect in the trade concerned.

B. Meaning of fundamental non-performance

Paragraph (2)(a) provides that where the effect of non-performance is substantially to deprive the creditor of what the creditor was entitled to expect under the contract, as applied to the whole or relevant part of the performance, then in general the non-performance is fundamental. This is not the case, however, where the debtor did not foresee and could not reasonably be expected to have foreseen those consequences.

There are three elements in the definition.

First, what was the creditor entitled to expect? This depends to a large extent on the nature and terms of the contract. If the contract allows the debtor a certain latitude in performing then the creditor will not be entitled to expect conformity with some more exacting standard. If it provides for strict compliance with certain provisions then the creditor is entitled to expect such strict compliance. Usages and practices may be important in deciding what a party is entitled to expect. For example, in certain fields of activity strict adherence to the precise time of delivery, or the provision of documents in a precise form may be expected. In some cases the nature of the contract may be decisive. For example, where a contract is for the delivery of flowers for a wedding at a stated time the purchaser will be entitled to expect delivery in time for the wedding and not the next day. What the creditor is entitled to expect will also depend on the qualifications and experience of the party concerned. It is reasonable to expect more skill and knowledge from a highly paid specialist than from an unskilled, modestly paid employee.

The second question is whether the non-performance substantially deprives the creditor of what the creditor was entitled to expect. This will be a question of fact to be answered on the circumstances of each case.

> Illustration 1
> A, a contractor, promises to erect five garages and to build and pave the road leading to them for B's lorries, all the work to be finished before October 1st, when B opens its warehouse. On October 1st the garages have been erected; the road has been built but not paved, which prevents B from using the garages. B has been substantially deprived of what he was entitled to expect under the contract. A's non-performance is fundamental.

Illustration 2

The facts are as in Illustration 1 except that the unpaved road is sufficiently smooth that the garages may be used by B's lorries in spite of the fact that the road is not yet paved, and A paves the road soon after October 1st. B has not been substantially deprived of what he was entitled to expect. A's non-performance is not fundamental.

The third question is whether the debtor foresaw or could reasonably be expected to have foreseen the result.

Illustration 3

A agrees to install a temperature control system in B's wine cellar which will ensure that his fine wines are not adversely affected by substantial temperature fluctuations. Owing to a defect in the installation the control system proves ineffective, with the result that B's stock of fine wines is made undrinkable. A's non-performance is fundamental. B has been substantially deprived of what he was entitled to expect under the contract. Moreover A was aware, or could reasonably be expected to have been aware, of the likely consequences of an inadequate system.

A agrees to install central heating in B's house with a temperature control system which will enable the temperature to be maintained at a constant temperature of 20 degrees centigrade. Unknown to A one room is required to develop and preserve certain rare species of plant which are extremely sensitive to changes in temperature and which have taken several years' intensive work to breed. As a result of a defect in one of the heating pipes in the room the temperature falls by two degrees centigrade and all the plants die, rendering abortive years of work. A's non-performance is not fundamental, as it could not reasonably be expected to have foreseen that such grave consequences would ensue from a slight temperature fluctuation in the room of a private house.

The reference to the relevant part of the performance in sub-paragraph (a) is important in relation to cases where the contractual obligations are to be performed in parts or are otherwise divisible. In such cases, the effect of III.–3:506 (Scope of right to terminate) is that if a separate counter-performance can be allocated to each part, the creditor will not normally be able to terminate the entire contractual relationship merely because substantially deprived of what was expected in relation to one divisible part. So, in a contract for the delivery of supplies monthly over a period of ten years a delay or non-conformity in one month’s instalment may amount to a fundamental non-performance in relation to that month but not in relation to the contract as a whole.

Paragraph (2)(b) makes it clear that even where the non-performance of an obligation does not substantially deprive the creditor of what the creditor could have expected to receive the creditor may treat the non-performance as fundamental if it was intentional or reckless and gives the creditor reason to believe that the debtor’s future performance cannot be relied on.

A, who has contracted to sell B's goods as B's sole distributor and has undertaken not to sell goods in competition with those goods, nevertheless contracts with C to sell C's competing goods. Although A's efforts to sell C's goods are entirely unsuccessful and do not affect his sales of B's goods, B may treat A's conduct as a fundamental non-performance.

P's agent, A, who is entitled to reimbursement for his expenses, submits false vouchers to P. Although the amounts claimed are insignificant P may treat A's behaviour as a fundamental non-performance and terminate his agency.

But where no future performance is due from the debtor, other than the remedying of the non-performance itself, or where there is no reason to suppose that the debtor will not properly perform future obligations under the contract, the creditor cannot invoke sub-paragraph (b).

Illustration 7
A contracts to build a supermarket for B. A completes performance except that, angered by a dispute over an unrelated transaction, it refuses to build a cover over a compressor. B can have the cover built by another contractor for a trifling sum. A's non-performance, even although intentional, is not fundamental.

Illustration 8
A contracts to build a supermarket for B; the specification calls for the building to be faced with an expensive type of brick. A's supervisor orders a cheaper type of brick to be used to face a wall which is not easily visible but, as soon as B points out the discrepancy, A agrees to remove the cheaper bricks and to use the proper sort in future. A's non-performance does not give B reason to believe that it cannot rely on A's performance in future.

C. Relationship to right to cure

In many contracts, a party's obligation has a double aspect: it is to do x by date y. Until y, the time for performance, has arrived the obligation is not due and there will, by definition, be no non-performance. This is why the debtor has the right to cure a non-conforming performance if this can be done before the time for performance has arrived (see III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules) paragraph (1)). The debtor should be in no worse position than if performance had not been attempted at all: if the debtor can perform properly by y, the performance will have been in accordance with the contract.

Even when the time for performance has arrived, the debtor who has tendered a performance which does not meet the requirements of the contract may still have the right to cure provided that the delay is not already fundamental (see III.–3:203 (When creditor need not allow debtor an opportunity to cure) sub-paragraph (a)). Again, the starting position is that the debtor who has tried to perform but has not done it well enough should not be in a worse position than one who had not performed at all. Had the debtor not performed at all by the time performance was due, the creditor would not necessarily be entitled to terminate immediately. Termination would be available as a remedy only if the delay was, or when it became, sufficiently serious that it deprived the creditor of the substance of what the creditor was entitled to expect (see III.–3:502 ((Termination for fundamental non-performance) paragraph (2)(a)); or after the creditor had set a reasonable time for performance under III.–3:503 (Termination after notice fixing additional time for performance) paragraph (1) and the debtor had failed to perform within that time. However, in this case allowing the debtor "a second chance" might be inconvenient to the creditor, or in some cases may be too generous to the debtor. Therefore III.–3:203 (When creditor need not allow debtor an opportunity to cure) imposes other restrictions.

It follows that the creditor's right to terminate is in effect subject to the debtor's right to cure. There is no right to cure, however, in cases that fall within paragraph (2)(b) of III.–3:502 (Termination for fundamental non-performance), since in that case the creditor has the right to terminate immediately (cf the parallel right to terminate immediately when fundamental non-performance is anticipated, see III.–3:504 (Termination for anticipated non-performance).

D. Agreed rights to terminate not covered by this Section

The terms of the contract will, as we have seen, always be important in deciding whether or not a non-performance is fundamental under the present Article. What a party is entitled to expect depends on what the contract provides. However, the parties may wish to go beyond merely indicating what the creditor is entitled to expect. They may wish to confer an express right to terminate for any non-performance, however minor, or even for something which is not a non-performance at all. They are free to do so. Such express rights to terminate are not, however, within the present Section. They are governed by an earlier Article. (See III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice.)) In some cases the parties may wish to provide not only for a right to terminate but also for the payment of compensation or extended damages or a stipulated sum for non-performance. Again they are free to do so. The effect of any such provisions will depend primarily on their terms, interpreted if need be. It is in the interest of any party who wishes to rely on such terms to ensure that their meaning and effect is clear.

NOTES

I. Termination when non-performance is fundamental

1. Not all systems allow the creditor to terminate by giving notice. FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1184 requires that résolution be by judicial pronouncement, and the court must decide whether the non-performance is sufficiently important to justify it; but, as noted above, clauses allowing automatic termination (clauses résolutoire de plein droit) are permitted (Malaurie & Aynès, Obligations, nos. 735-759) to the extent that the creditor invokes them in accordance with good faith, as will be decided ex post by the court (on this judicial control and its limits, see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 652). The broad language of CC art. 1184 ("where one of the parties does not fulfil its obligation") indicates that even partial non-performance gives rise to the right to pursue termination of the contract (Cass. Com., 2 July 1996). However, this should not be strictly applied in circumstances where such remedy is out of all proportion with the breach. It is argued in legal writings that judges should use their discretion to make such a determination (See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 650 (b)). Besides, French law contains specific provisions which in specific cases allow unilateral termination (e.g. CC art. 1657). French case law has also considerably evolved since 1998: unilateral termination is now admitted under certain conditions (Cass.civ. 1re, 13 October 1998, D. 1999.198, note C. Jamin). The French Avant-projet also provides for unilateral termination (art. 1158). In BELGIAN law, there is a distinction between resolutory conditions which apply automatically and resolutory clauses, which apply when the creditor invokes them. Parties can thus define which non-performances are sufficient for an automatic or for a unilateral termination, subject to the abuse of right test. Such clauses will, however, be interpreted restrictively (Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht p. 202). As to the question whether termination can be done by notice, see Notes under Art. III-3:507. See also ITALIAN CC art. 1453 for the general rule on judicial termination and art. 1456 for automatic termination. However, similar results appear to be reached in most systems, even those which rely on judicial discretion to decide when there should be termination.

2. In cases of non-performance, termination by withdrawal after notice and a reasonable extension of the time-limit to perform is allowed to the creditor in both civil and commercial CZECH law (see CC § 517.1 and Ccom arts. 344 ff). However in the case of fundamental breach of contract, the commercial law allows the creditor to terminate immediately after notification of the non- performance (Ccom arts. 345 ff).

3. A distinction between fundamental and non-fundamental non-performance is regulated in the SLOVAKIAN Ccom (arts. 344 et seq.) and hence applies only for commercial relationships. Where a party's performance is overdue and constitutes a breach of a fundamental contractual obligation, the other party is entitled to terminate the contractual relationship provided that after having learned of such a breach, it informs the delinquent party without undue delay (Ccom art. 345(1)). The new GERMAN law of obligations adhered to that view in 2002: The new CC § 323(2) no. 3 contains a general clause which together with CC § 323(5) allows termination for fundamental non performance. In case of permanent impossibility or impracticability of performance (CC § 275) CC § 326 provides for a kind of ipso facto avoidance. These rules apply independently of fault and apply also to contracts involving continuing or periodic performance, see CC § 314(2).

II. Excused and non-excused non-performance

4. DUTCH CC arts. 6:74 and 6:265, ESTONIAN LOA § 116 (additionally LOA § 196 in case of contracts of successive performance), NORDIC law (see Taxell, Avtal och rättsskydd 225 and Håstad, Den nya köprätten 52), ULIS (for excused non-performance see art. 74), CISG (see art. 79) and UNIDROIT see art. 7.3.1. use the same rules for termination whether or not the non-performance was excused; the creditor may give notice of termination. In many systems, however, the case of termination because performance has become impossible is treated separately from the case of termination because of a breach of contract. Thus in FRENCH and BELGIAN law in the case of impossibility the contract will be determined according to the theory of risks, the question being which of the parties must bear the risk of the impossibility to perform (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 666); where the risk has not passed, both obligations will be terminated automatically (although in practice at least one of the parties will have to invoke it). In the SPANISH CC excused non-performance (impossibility by force majeure: arts. 1182 and 1184) is treated separately from non-excused non-performance (art. 1124). The current doctrine of courts and authors is that the remedy of rescission (termination) is available for non-excused failure to perform. (San Miguel, Resolución del contrato por incumplimiento y modalidades de su ejercicio, 2004; Carrasco, Failure, Breach and Non-conformity in Contracts. A Spanish and European Approach, 297 ff, in Espiau / Vaquer Bases de un Derecho Contractual Europeo / Bases of a European Contract Law, 2003).

5. In GERMAN law a separate paragraph of the CC, § 323, formerly applied to impossibility due to circumstances for which neither party is responsible (see Treitel, Remedies § 255), a similar approach is taken by the AUSTRIAN CC §§ 1447, 1147; the GREEK CC art. 380; CZECH law (see CC § 575; Ccom arts. 352 ff and some special rules, e.g. Ccom art. 731 applicable for impossibility in international relationships) and the POLISH CC art. 493. However, in ITALIAN law there is a separate regime for supervening impossibility, CC arts. 1463-1466. In ENGLISH, SCOTTISH and IRISH law the doctrine of frustration will apply. In SLOVENIAN law an obligation terminates by law if neither party is responsible. See LOA § 329. In case of other non-performance, the result depends on whether a late performance is still reasonable or not. If a late performance is no longer reasonable, a contract is terminated by law immediately, otherwise an additional time for performance has to be given. See LOA §§ 104–105.

6. In SLOVAK law the case of termination because performance has subsequently become impossible is treated separately from the case of termination because of a breach of contract (CC § 575, Ccom art. 352 et seq. - for commercial relationships).

III. No additional time once right to terminate has arisen

7. It should be noted that these rules do not permit the debtor to be given extra time once the non-performance is fundamental; compare the FRENCH and BELGIAN délai de grâce (CC art. 1184; similarly, POLISH CC art. 491 § 1; SPANISH CC art. 1124(3); SLOVAK Ccom art. 345(1)) and ITALIAN statute no. 392/1978 on protection of tenants) or relief against forfeiture in the ENGLISH and IRISH systems (in which, for instance, a tenant may be able to obtain relief against forfeiture of a lease by the landlord for non-payment of rent: see Treitel, Remedies § 247). ESTONIAN law is similar to the rule in the above Article, see LOA § 116(1). However, (extraordinary) termination of contracts of successive performance can only be effected if the party terminating cannot reasonably be expected to continue performing until the due date agreed upon, taking into account all the circumstances and the mutual interests of the parties (LOA § 196(1)). Unless strict compliance with the obligation which has not been performed is the precondition for the other party's continued interest in the performance of the contractual obligations, non-performance was intentional or grossly negligent (LOA § 116(2) sent. 3) or there is reason to believe that the debtor's future performance cannot be relied on (LOA § 116(2) sent. 4) termination for fundamental non-performance of an obligation is generally not allowed without providing additional time for performance to the debtor (LOA § 196(2)).

8. CZECH law generally recognises a reasonable extra time in cases of non- performance (see abovementioned provisions: CC art. 517.1 and Ccom arts. 344 ff). Nevertheless the creditor of a commercial obligation may terminate immediately after notification of the non-performance if the non-performance is qualified as a fundamental breach of a contractual debtor's obligation (see above and the provision of Ccom arts. 345 ff).

IV The notion of fundamental non-performance

9. The concept of fundamental non-performance as set out in this Article corresponds very closely to ENGLISH law. In particular there is a direct correspondence to the following cases: (i) where the effect of the breach was to deprive the creditor of the substance of what was contracted for (see Hong Kong Fir Shipping Co Ltd. v. Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd. [1962] 2 QB 26 (CA)) and (ii) where the breach evinces an intention not to perform the remainder of obligations under the contract (e.g. Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 31(2)). However, whereas paragraph (2)(b) is confined to intentional or reckless breaches, it is established in English law that even an unintentional breach may give rise to an anticipatory repudiation of the rest of the contract (cf. Universal Cargo Carriers Corp. v. Citati [1957] 2 QB 401, 438). IRISH law is similar. SCOTTISH law uses the concept of "material breach", meaning breaches going to the root of the contract (McBryde, paras. 20.88-20.120; see e.g. Macari v. Celtic FC 1999 SC 628).

10. Note that "fundamental non-performance" is not equivalent to the notion of "fundamental breach" in English law. The doctrine of "fundamental breach" was developed to declare certain exclusion clauses void. It has been overruled in Suisse Atlantique Societe d'Armement Maritime S.A. v. N.V. Rotterdamsche Kolen Centrale [1967] 1 AC 361 (HL). In IRELAND case law still accepts the doctrine, Clayton Love v. B. & I. Line (1970) 104 ILTR 157, but writers favour the Suisse Atlantique approach, Clark 150.

11. UNIDROIT art. 7.3.1. also provides for termination for fundamental non-performance. Art 7.3.1(2) provides a list of factors relevant to deciding whether the non-performance was fundamental, including the situations mentioned in paragraph (2) of the Article.

12. In the laws of the NORDIC countries the creditor can terminate for non-performance or claim that a defective performance be replaced by a conforming tender only if the non-performance is substantial. This rule is provided in the DANISH SGA §§ 21, 28, 42 and 43 and is applied to other contracts as well. The same rules are laid down in CISG arts. 45, 49 and 64. The corresponding sections of the Sale of Goods Acts in FINLAND and SWEDEN (§§ 25, 39, 54 and 55) are to similar effect as the Article. CISG art. 25 provides that a "breach ... is fundamental if it results in such detriment to the other party as substantially to deprive it of what it is entitled to expect under the contract, unless the party in breach did not foresee and a reasonable person of the same kind in the same circumstances would not have foreseen such a result." CISG has no provision on intentional or reckless non-performance like the one provided in the Article. Nor do the Nordic Acts, but it is generally held that the creditor can terminate if the defaulting debtor has committed fraud either when making the contract or performing the obligations under it, see DANISH SGA §§ 42 and 43. It is the prevailing view that in sales governed by CISG the remedies for fraud are to be found in national law, see e.g. Honnold, no. 65.

13. The approach of CZECH commercial law is in fact very similar. A breach of contractual obligation (see notes above) is considered to be fundamental if the debtor breaching knew or could have reasonably predicted at the time of the conclusion of the contract that the creditor would not have been interested in performance of the obligation in the event of such a breach of contract (see Ccom art. 345.2).

14. Most of the other legal systems do not apply the doctrine of fundamental non-performance but approach it in various ways.

15. Those systems which like AUSTRIAN, GREEK and PORTUGUESE law have no unitary concept of non-performance have different rules for the various kinds of non-performance. For delay and impossibility Greek law makes a distinction between non-performance of the "main" obligation and of a "subordinate" obligation; only the non-performance of the main obligation permits the creditor to terminate. Under these laws termination is possible in certain cases of "qualified delay", such as when the contract has provided for performance at a definite time which has not been met, or if the creditor has lost any interest in performance, see AUSTRIAN, Ccom § 376 and CC § 919 (the equivalent provision of Ccom § 376 has been cancelled); GREEK CC arts. 401 and 385(2); PORTUGUESE CC art. 808.

16. In a case of defects in goods sold, the former GERMAN law permitted the buyer to reduce the price or to terminate unless the defect is trifling, see the abolished CC §§ 459 and 462, or the termination would be contrary to good faith. See also GREEK CC arts. 534, 540. Under AUSTRIAN law there is a remedy of termination in the case of bad performance, if the debtor does not repair or replace the item in time or is not able to repair or replace (see CC § 932(2) and (4)). is similar to former GERMAN law but provides in addition a right to demand repair, CC § 932(1). PORTUGUESE law permits the buyer to terminate if repair is impossible or if the goods delivered are so different from the goods contracted for that the buyer cannot be fully satisfied (Telles 337; Varela II 128).

17. Under the new GERMAN law a fundamental breach in the sense of CC § 323(2) no. 3 relieves the creditor from the need to give the debtor a Nachfrist and the additional requirements under CC § 323(5) as to the weight of the breach normally do not apply then but restrict only termination in the case of a Nachfrist.

18. DUTCH law does not apply the concept of fundamental non-performance. In principle any non-performance will entitle the creditor to terminate. However the law requires that, unless the contract provides for performance at a definite time, the creditor must give the debtor a Nachfrist in case of delay, and provides that a non-performance of minor importance for the creditor will not justify termination, see Dutch CC art. 6:82-83 and 6:265.

19. Under ITALIAN law termination is not allowed when the non-performance has little importance for the other party, CC art. 1455 (see Cass. 20 April 1994, no. 3775 in Corr. Giur. 1995, 566 ff; Antoniolli in Antoniolli – Veneziano, Principles of European Contract Law and Italian Law – A Commentary, 406ff; Cubeddu, L'importanza dell'inadempimento; Sacco(-De Nova), Il contratto, II, 631 ff).

20. In SPANISH law, termination is permitted if the non-performance is material even if it is less than total. The traditional view that only an intentional non-performance will justify termination has been rejected by recent case law, see Díez Picazo II, 716; Lacruz-Delgado II, 1 § 26, 200; Albaladejo II, 1, § 20.2 and Carrasco, ZEuP 3/2006, 565 ff.

21. In FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law the question of termination is in principle left to the discretion of the trial judge. However it appears that the gravity of the non-performance is an important factor to be taken into account: see, e.g., Belgian Cass.8 December 1960, Pas 1, 382; Cass. 12 November 1976, Arr. Cass. 1977, 293; Cass. 13 March 1981, R.W. 1982-83, 1049. When there is a resolutive clause, termination is subject, to a certain extent, to the good faith principle (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 664; Nicholas 242 ff. The French Cour de Cassation has held that a buyer could not use a clause in a sales contract allowing termination without previous notice and without the court's intervention unless the time for delivery of the goods was a "condition essentielle et déterminante" (Cass.Com 13 April 1964, Bull. 3 no. 180, p. 153). For unilateral termination (see Notes under III-3:507), the criterion used by French and Belgian courts is not only that of the "gravité du comportement"; the creditor who unilaterally terminates does this at the creditor's own risk ("à ses risques et perils"). This means that en ex post control will be done by the judge. The French Avant-projet also provides for such an ex post control which may go so far as enabling the judge to order performance of the contract (art. 1158-1). In the avant projet, there is no express condition as to the importance of the breach; this lacuna has been criticised.

22. POLISH law does not apply the notion of fundamental non-performance. In case of synallagmatic contracts, the debtor's imputable delay entitles the creditor to terminate after setting an additional period for the debtor (CC art. 491 § 2). Setting an additional period is not necessary if there was a stipulation giving the creditor a right to terminate in case of delay. Moreover, setting an additional period is not necessary for termination in all these cases, when it appears from the nature or purpose of the contract, which is known to the debtor that late performance will have no significance for the aggrieved party (CC art. 492). If the performance of a synallagmatic obligation became impossible due to circumstances for which the debtor is liable, the other party may claim damages or terminate (CC 493 § 1), regardless of the gravity of the non-performance. The termination may be cumulated with a claim for damages resulting from the non-performance (CC art. 494).

23. ESTONIAN LOA § 116(2) sent. 1-4 generally correspond to the UNIDROIT Principles art. 7.3.1.(2) lit. a)-d) providing an open list of characteristics inherent to fundamental breach. Differently from the present Article, intentional or grossly negligent non-performance (LOA § 116(2) sent. 3) and reason to believe that the debtor's future performance cannot be relied on (LOA § 116(2) sent. 4) may independently constitute a fundamental non-performance (see for critics Varul et al (-Kõve) § 116 n. 4.4.3.3). The concept of fundamental non-performance has central meaning as a precondition of the right to withhold performance for anticipated partial non-performance (LOA 111(6)), to terminate the contractual relationship for non-performance (LOA § 116(1)), to terminate the contractual relationship for anticipated non-performance (LOA § 117), to claim damages in lieu of performance (LOA § 115(2)-(3)) and to require substitute performance in contracts of sale or services (LOA §§ 222(2), 646(2).

24. In SLOVAKIA according to Ccom art. 345(2) (only for commercial relationships) a breach is deemed fundamental if the party breaching the contract knew or could have anticipated at the time of its conclusion from the contents of the contract or the circumstances under which it was concluded, that the other party would not have an interest in its performance in the event of a breach of the contract. If in doubt, it is presumed that the breach of the contract is non-fundamental.

25. See generally Treitel, Remedies § 253 ff.; Honnold no. 181ff.; Bianca & Bonell (-Will) 205; Flessner.

III.–3:503: Termination after notice fixing additional time for performance

(1) A creditor may terminate in a case of delay in performance of a contractual obligation which is not in itself fundamental if the creditor gives a notice fixing an additional period of time of reasonable length for performance and the debtor does not perform within that period.

(2) If the period fixed is unreasonably short, the creditor may terminate only after a reasonable period from the time of the notice.

COMMENTS

A. General

The effect of this Article is that where there has been a delay in performance but the delay is not yet fundamental the creditor may terminate after having given the defaulting debtor reasonable notice. This very practical rule is now to be found in the laws of many Member States, though not always in precisely the same form or with precisely the same effects.

B. Setting a time-limit for performance in cases of non-fundamental delay

Not every delay in performance of an obligation will constitute a fundamental non-performance and so the creditor will not necessarily have the right to terminate immediately merely because the date for performance has passed. In cases of non-fundamental delay, however, the creditor can fix an additional period of time of reasonable length for performance by the debtor. If upon expiry of that period of time performance has not been made, the creditor may terminate.

> C employs D to build a wall in C's garden. The work is to be completed by April 1st but prompt completion is not fundamental. By that date D has not completed the work and appears to be working very slowly. Less than a week's work is necessary to complete the wall. C may give D a further week in which to complete the wall and, if D does not do so, C may terminate the contractual relationship.

The notice procedure may be useful when the non-performance is of an accessory obligation to accept or to allow performance of a primary obligation by the other party.

> E employs F to decorate the interior of an empty apartment owned by E but E fails to give F a key to the apartment by the date on which it was agreed that F should start work. F may give E a reasonable time in which to arrange access for F and, if E fails to do so, F may terminate.

It should be noted that this Article applies even if the non-performance is excused because of a temporary impediment.

C. When the notice must be for a definite reasonable period

When a notice fixing an additional period for performance is served after a non-fundamental delay, it will only give the creditor the right to terminate if, first, it is for a fixed period of time, and secondly, the period is a reasonable one.

If the notice is not for a fixed period of time it may give the defaulting party the impression that performance can be postponed indefinitely. It will not suffice to ask for performance "as soon as possible". It must be a request for performance, say, "within a week" or "not later than July 1". The request must not be couched in ambiguous terms; it is not sufficient to say that "we hope very much that performance can be made by July 1".

Because in cases of non-fundamental delay the notice procedure is conferring an additional right on the creditor, the period of notice must be reasonable. If the creditor serves a notice of less than a reasonable period a second notice is not needed; the creditor may terminate after a reasonable time has elapsed from the date of the notice.

D. What period of time is reasonable?

The determination of what is a reasonable period of time must ultimately be left to the court. Various factors may be important. The period of time originally set for performance may be relevant: if the period is short, the additional period of time may also be short. The need of the creditor for quick performance may be relevant, provided that this is apparent to the defaulting debtor. The nature of the goods, services or rights to be performed or conveyed may be important: a complicated performance may require a longer period of time than a simple one. The nature of the event which caused the delay may also be relevant; a party who has been prevented from performance by bad weather should be granted a longer respite than a party who merely forgot about the obligation .

E. The creditor may provide for automatic termination

If the defaulting debtor has not performed the obligation by the expiry of the period of time fixed for performance, or has before that time given notice of a refusal to perform, the creditor may then give notice of termination. However, the creditor may provide for automatic termination. The notice may, for example, say that the creditor will be free from liability if the defaulting debtor fails to perform within the period of the notice.

If the defaulting debtor in fact tenders performance after the date set in the notice, the creditor may simply refuse to accept it. However, if the creditor actually knows that the debtor is still attempting to perform after the date, good faith requires the creditor to warn the debtor that the performance will not be accepted. If the debtor asks the creditor whether performance will be accepted after the date set, good faith requires the creditor to give an answer within a reasonable time.

1. Several systems provide that even if the creditor has no immediate right of termination for delay (because for instance in Germany there was no Fixgeschäft or in England time "was not of the essence"), the right to terminate may be acquired by giving the debtor a reasonable time in which to perform, provided that the obligation which remains unperformed at the end of the period of notice is sufficiently serious to warrant termination.

2. The best known device, and the one which has inspired the present Article, is the GERMAN Nachfrist under CC § 323(1). This applies to all kinds of non-performance but Nachfrist is not necessary in case of impossibility, Fixgeschäft, repudiation or other cases of fundamental breach. The Nachfrist is primarily aimed at protection of the debtor (see Treitel, Remedies § 245) but the practical effect is the same as that of the Article. Like the Article, the German rule will in general apply if the debtor is in delay in performing a major obligation; the creditor may then withdraw from the contract or claim damages for non-performance. If the debtor does not comply with a minor obligation, the creditor can only use the Nachfrist procedure if the breach of that obligation imperils the purpose of the whole transaction (see CC § 323(5) sentence 1). In case of defect the creditor cannot use the Nachfrist procedure if the defect is trifling (see CC § 323(5) sentence 2).

3. Some other systems, e.g. AUSTRIAN (CC §§ 918 and 919) and PORTUGUESE law, follow the German model closely, but very different systems also produce close parallels. The FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs §§ 25(2), 54(2) and 55(2) give a right to terminate after expiry of a Nachfrist. The same applies in SLOVENIAN law (LOA § 105), with the difference that no special notice of termination is necessary. A contract is terminated by law unless a creditor immediately declares otherwise. It is similar in POLISH law, where termination is possible only after passing of the additional period (CC art. 491 § 1) – except in the case of a lex commissoria-clause and Fixgeschäft (CC art. 492). In ENGLISH and IRISH law the creditor may sometimes be able to "make time of the essence" once the date for performance has passed by serving on the debtor a notice to perform within a reasonable time; if the non-performance continues the creditor may terminate at the end of the period. There is some doubt as to the scope of the rule: the traditional view is that it applies only to certain categories such as sale of land and sale of goods (see Treitel, Remedies § 249) but the House of Lords has on two recent occasions approved a passage from Halsbury 9 § 481 which states as a general rule that a party may make time of the essence by serving a reasonable notice on the defaulting party, just as the Article envisages (United Scientific Holdings Ltd v. Burnley Borough Council [1978] A.C. 904; Bunge Corporation v. Tradax SA [1981] 1 WLR 711; for SCOTLAND see Rodger (Builders) v. Fawdry 1950 S.C. 483 (I.H.)). Under the DANISH SGA the creditor can always terminate in case of a fundamental non-performance, and may do so without having given the debtor a Nachfrist. In other contracts a notice of a reasonable length may sometimes make time of the essence, see Gomard, Obligationsret II 93 ff. SCOTTISH law has an “ultimatum” procedure by which a failure to perform timeously (and probably other forms of failure to perform) may be converted into a material breach justifying termination: the notice must set a reasonable time for the party in breach to comply (McBryde, paras. 20.128-20.131). ESTONIAN LOA § 116(2) sent. 5 provides that not only non-fundamental delay, but non-performance of any obligation not amounting to fundamental non-performance under LOA § 116(2) sent. 1-4 (see note 3 to art. III.-3:502 above) is considered as fundamental non-performance (and as such gives rise to the right to terminate the contractual relationship under LOA § 116(1)) after an additional period for performance set by the creditor lapses without conforming performance by the debtor (solution criticised by Varul et al (-Kõve) § 116, n. 4.4.2.).

4. CZECH law considers delay in performance to be a breach of contractual obligation (see notes above). The creditor has a right to terminate after notice and a reasonable extra time in both civil and commercial law (see CC art. 517.1 and Ccom art. 344 ff).

5. Also under SLOVAK law if a party's default constitutes a non-fundamental breach of a contractual obligation, the other party may terminate the contractual relationship only if the delaying party fails to perform even within an additional reasonable period which has been provided for such performance. (Ccom art. 346(1) - only for commercial relationships). If the delaying party declares that it will not perform the obligation, the other party may terminate without providing an additional reasonable period for such performance, or may terminate before the expiration of this period (Ccom art. 346(2)).

6. Under DUTCH law if a party's default constitutes a non-fundamental breach, the other party may as a rule terminate the contract and may only not do so by way of exception (CC art. 6:265 paragraph 1 in fine). Only in case such an exception applies is it imaginable under Dutch law that the creditor has to give a notice fixing an additional period of time in order to obtain the right to terminate the contract.

7. The idea that the creditor may terminate for non-fundamental delay after giving reasonable notice is not accepted by all systems: for instance it is unknown to FRENCH law. SPANISH law delay justifies termination only if it is fundamental or frustrates the purpose of the contract, according to case-law (Supreme Court 5 January 1935; see Díez Picazo II, 714.) In such cases prior warning to the debtor is not required (Lacruz-Delgado, II, 1 § 36, 201). However many systems have accepted rules permitting termination after notice (e.g. GREEK CC art. 383 sentence 1; ITALIAN CC art. 1454(1), (3) according to which the aggrieved party can serve on the other a written notice to perform within a specified time, declaring that, unless performance takes place within such time, the contract is deemed dissolved; if the time elapses without performance having been made, the contract is dissolved by operation of law).

8. In BELGIUM doctrine and case law now accept that sometimes termination may be effected by the creditor; whether notice has been given to the debtor is a relevant factor, though it is not necessary if the debtor has indicated a refusal to perform. See De Page II, no. 891; Cass. 24 March 1972, Arr. Cass., 707; Cass. 17 January 1992, TBH/RDC 1993, 239.

9. The rule contained in the Article is also adopted by ULIS (arts. 27(2), 44(2), 62(2) and 66(2)) and by CISG (arts. 47, 49(1)(b), 63 and 64(1)(b)).

10. There are differences in detail between the various national rules. For instance in GERMAN law at the end of the notice period the creditor lost the right to seek performance in natura at the end of the Nachfrist (this has changed under the new law, see CC § 281(4)), whereas in ENGLISH and IRISH law the creditor can probably simply set a fresh period of time. In German law a notice which was too short will automatically be extended, so that the creditor may still terminate after a reasonable time, unless the period set was so short that it indicated a lack of good faith (see Schlechtriem and Schmidt-Kessel, Schuldrecht, Allgemeiner Teil[6], 246). The position is similar in ESTONIAN law, LOA § 114(1). In ENGLISH and IRISH law a fresh notice may have to be served, as a notice which is too short seems to be treated as having no effect (e.g. Behzadi v. Shaftesbury Hotels Ltd. [1992] Ch 1. If the notice period given is too short, AUSTRIAN law effects the termination after a reasonable period of time (OGH 5 December 1951, SZ 24/332).

11. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 300(1) a creditor is entitled to demand performance, or, if performance no longer serves the creditor's interest, to withdraw from the contract irrespective of whether or not the debtor has offered an excuse for the default. Under CC § 300(2) it is not necessary to prove the cessation of an interest in performance if, according to the agreement of the parties or due to the imminent purpose of the service, the contractual obligation had to be performed at a definite time and no other, or if the creditor has stipulated a reasonable deadline for subsequent performance and this period has elapsed without result.

12. See generally Zweigert and Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative law[3], 492-494; Treitel, Remedies §§ 252.

III.–3:504: Termination for anticipated non-performance

A creditor may terminate before performance of a contractual obligation is due if the debtor has declared that there will be a non-performance of the obligation, or it is otherwise clear that there will be such a non-performance, and if the non-performance would have been fundamental.

A. Terminology

The neutral and descriptive expression "anticipated non-performance" is used here rather than the expression "anticipatory non-performance" which is the technical term of art in some legal systems and which is used in the UNIDROIT Principles (Article 7.3.3). "Anticipated" is more accurate in relation to the content of the present Article. The Article does not deal with actual non-performance of a special type, requiring a special adjective. It deals with the situation where future non-performance of a type which would justify termination is clearly anticipated.

The right of a creditor to terminate the contractual relationship in a case of anticipated fundamental non-performance is recognised in many laws. That is not so in some systems, especially those in which a contractual relationship can be terminated normally only by the decision of a court (see Comments to III.–3:507 (Notice of termination)), but at least some of these systems have used other means to reach the same, very convenient, result.

B. Anticipated non-performance equated with actual non-performance

The Article entitles the creditor to terminate if the debtor has repudiated the contract by saying that there will be no performance or if it is otherwise clear that there will be a fundamental non-performance by the debtor. There will have to be an obvious unwillingness or inability to perform where the failure in performance would be fundamental. The creditor's right to terminate rests on the notion that the creditor cannot reasonably be expected to continue to be bound by such obligations once it has become clear that the debtor cannot or will not perform the main obligation at the due date. The main effect of the Article is that for the purpose of the remedy of termination a clearly anticipated fundamental non-performance is equated with an actual fundamental non-performance after performance has become due.

Illustration 1
In January a construction company agrees to build a house for O and to start work on 1st May. In April the company tells O that owing to labour troubles it will not be able to carry out the contract. O may immediately terminate the whole contractual relationship.

C. Threatened non-performance must be fundamental Termination under this Article is permitted only where the main obligation is of such a kind that its non-performance would entitle the creditor to terminate. This applies also to a threatened delay in performance. If a debtor indicates that there will be performance but that it will be late this, in the absence of an agreed right to terminate, does not satisfy the requirements of the Article except where the threatened delay is so serious as to constitute a fundamental non-performance.

Illustration 2
B has agreed to build a house to O's design. B informs O that the double glazing specified by O is no longer available but that it can install double glazing from a different supplier which is almost identical. The failure to provide the double glazing originally specified would not, in these circumstances, be a fundamental non-performance, and O therefore cannot terminate under the Article.

Illustration 3
In January S contracts to sell goods to B for delivery on 1st March. In February S tells B that delivery will be a few days late. B can terminate immediately if in the circumstances this delay would be a fundamental non-performance, but not otherwise.

D. Inability or unwillingness to perform must be manifest

In order for the Article to apply it must be "clear" that the debtor is not willing or able to perform at the due date. An express repudiation by the debtor will satisfy this requirement but even in the absence of a repudiation the circumstances may make the situation clear. If the debtor's behaviour merely engenders doubt as to willingness or ability to perform, the creditor's remedy is to demand an assurance of performance.

E. Remedies consequent on termination

A later Article (III.–3:509 (Effect on obligations under the contract)) makes it clear that a creditor who exercises a right to terminate for anticipated non-performance has the same rights to damages as on termination for actual non-performance.

F. Time for notification of termination

The creditor may terminate at any time while it remains clear that there will be a fundamental non-performance by the debtor.

NOTES

I. Termination for anticipated non-performance a recognised doctrine

1. The root of this provision lies in ENGLISH law (cf. Hochster v. de La Tour (1853) E & B 678 (QB); Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v. Citati [1957] 2 QB 401 (QB); Clark 414). SCOTTISH law has adopted the same doctrine. (McBryde, paras. 20.22-20.43). UNIDROIT art. 7.3.3, CISG art. 72(1) and ULIS art. 76 also adopt the notion. The FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs § 62 adopt the CISG rule: see Ramberg, Köplagen, 583 ff. There is a similar provision in SLOVAK law (Ccom art. 348 - only for commercial relationships).

II. Some equivalent rule recognised

2. The GERMAN CC since 2002 contains an express provision, see CC § 323(4). In AUSTRIA an unambiguous and definite refusal to perform is considered a non-performance, see Reischauer in Rummel, ABGB I, 3rd ed., § 918 no. 14. Rummel (-Reischauer) CC § 918 no. 14. The SLOVENIAN LOA § 106 has a similar rule.
3. Under DANISH law the right of a creditor to terminate in case of anticipated non-performance is, in general, limited to cases where there is certainty, or probability amounting almost to certainty, that there will be a fundamental non-performance by the debtor. This rule, however, is qualified: (1) when a buyer goes bankrupt or becomes insolvent and the time for delivery has come, the seller may terminate unless security is provided (cf. SGA § 39; Bankruptcy Act § 57); (2) where the buyer of goods has been declared bankrupt and the administrator of the estate does not confirm the take-over of the contract within a reasonable time, the seller may terminate (cf. SGA § 40); (3) in a sale where the goods are to be delivered in instalments and where the delay or defect in respect of one instalment or payment for one instalment amounts to a fundamental non-performance (cf. SGA § 29: "unless there is no reason to expect a future delay"; see also §§ 22 and 46). See also Gomard Obligationsret III 16 ff, and Bryde Andersen & Lookofsky 222 ff.

4. In DUTCH law, CC art. 6:80 provides that the consequences of non-performance – for instance termination of the contractual relationship - operate although the obligation is not yet due (a) if conforming performance is not possible; (b) if from a communication of the debtor the creditor cannot but conclude that there will be a non-performance; (c) if the creditor has good reasons to fear a non-performance by the debtor, and has not received adequate assurance of the debtor's willingness to perform. The breach that is thus anticipated does not have to be fundamental in order to bestow on the creditor the right to terminate.

5. Under GREEK law, genuine anticipated non-performance exists where the debtor before the date for performance expressly declares (A.P. 339/1982, NoB 30 (1982) 1459 at 1460) or by conduct necessarily implies (Athens 2671/1957, EEN 25 (1958) 538-539), that there will be non-performance. In such situations, CC art. 385(1) equally relieves the creditor from setting an additional period for performance, and allows the remedies of damages and termination even prior to the date of performance (Gasis Erm. AK II/1 Introd. remarks to arts. 335-348 no. 62 (1949); Stathopoulos, Georgiadis & Stathopoulos Introd. remarks to arts. 335-348 no.6 (1979), Stathopoulos, Obligations § 19, nos. 130-132, Filios, Obligations, § 64 B III.; also cf. CC art. 686; in any case, the notice of termination, in terms of time and otherwise, may not result in an abuse of right (CC art. 281)).

6. In ITALIAN law CC art. 1219 provides an automatic mora debitoris if the debtor declares in writing an unwillingness to perform. The way is then open for termination. On insolvency of the debtor, see CC art. 1461 which gives a party a right to withhold performance if the patrimonial conditions of the other party have become such as obviously to endanger fulfilment of the counter-performance, unless adequate security is given.

7. Under POLISH law an equivalent solution (the creditor's right to terminate for anticipated non-performance) can be adopted despite the lack of any explicit regulation (see J. Napierała, Odpowiedzialność dłużnika za nieuchronne niewykonanie zobowiązania, Warszawa 1997, p. 174 and p. 182).

8. Although there is no general rule as to termination for anticipated non-performance under PORTUGUESE law, authors discuss whether the refusal to perform constitutes a non-performance or an equivalent, allowing the creditor to terminate the contractual relationship, or simply a mora debitoris which obliges the creditor to notify the debtor fixing an additional period of time to performance before termination (see e.g., respectively, Almeida 317, Leitão II 236, 237). The Supreme Court of Justice has considered that an unambiguous and serious refusal to perform is equivalent to a non-performance (see v.g. STJ 7 March 2006, STJ 21 January 2003, STJ 13 March 1997, STJ 10 December 1996). A similar rule can be found in CZECH commercial law but the creditor may terminate for this objective anticipated non-performance (as opposed to a repudiation by the debtor) only in cases of inadequate assurance of performance. The requirements are strict. It is possible to terminate only if it indisputably appears that the debtor will breach a contractual obligation in a substantial manner and only if, after a request by the creditor, the debtor fails to provide sufficient security for the performance without undue delay. The appreciation of this future non-performance is based on the real observed conduct of the debtor or on other circumstances occurring before the time limit set for performance (see Ccom art. 348.1). A second ground for termination for anticipated non-performance is repudiation by the debtor: if the debtor declares a refusal to perform, the creditor can terminate (see Ccom art. 348.2).

9. ESTONIAN LOA § 117 generally follows the pattern of CISG art. 72 (Varul et al (-Kõve) § 117, no. 2), also in restricting the right to terminate in case of anticipated fundamental non-performance. There is a requirement of prior notice to the debtor of the intended termination in order to allow the latter to confirm the future performance or provide assurance within a reasonable time after such notice (LOA § 117(2); cf. the right to withhold own performance and require assurance provided in LOA § 111(4)-(5)). Prior notice of intended termination by the creditor is not necessary, if the debtor has given notice that the debtor will not perform the obligation (LOA § 117(3)). Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 313 if a debtor refuses to perform without legitimate reason, the creditor is entitled to invoke the consequences of either delay or subsequent impossibility.

III. No equivalent doctrine

10. In contrast, there is no general rule as to termination for anticipated non-performance in FRENCH law and SPANISH law. This problem has hardly been subject to academic discussion nor regulated in the Codes. In general, the law is reluctant to support the creditor prior to the time of performance (cf. SPAIN: Lacruz-Delgado II, 1, § 26, 200; Albaladejo II. 1, § 20.4 K and M; but termination for anticipated non-performance is possible if the debtor's behaviour makes it clear that performance will not take place: CC arts. 1129 and 1183). In Portuguese law, some of the results of anticipated non-performance are also reached in other ways: Soares-Ramos 195 ff.; STJ 15 March 1983, BMJ 325, 561; STJ 19 March 1985, BMJ 345, 400; STJ 19 February 1990, Act. jur., 1990. 2. 10. The same is true for BELGIUM: Cass. 5 June 1981, R.W. 1981-82, 245, R.C.J.B. 1983, 199; Cass. 15 May 1986, R.C.J.B. 1990, 106, Arr.Cass. no.565; Vanwijck-Alexandre nos. 177 and 199 ff; M.E. Storme, Invloed no. 299 ff.

11. In CZECH Civil law, there is no equivalent rule to the Article.

III.–3:505: Termination for inadequate assurance of performance

A creditor who reasonably believes that there will be a fundamental non-performance of a contractual obligation by the debtor may terminate if the creditor demands an adequate assurance of due performance and no such assurance is provided within a reasonable time.

A. Purpose of rule

This Article is intended to protect the interests of a party to a contract who believes on reasonable grounds that the other party will be unable or unwilling to perform an obligation at the due date but who may be reluctant to terminate for anticipated non-performance in case it transpires that the other party would after all have performed. In the absence of a rule along the lines of this Article the creditor will be in a dilemma. To wait until the due date for performance may mean heavy losses if performance does not take place. To terminate for anticipated non-performance may mean a liability for damages if it is later found that it was not clear that the other party would commit a fundamental non-performance. The present Article enables the creditor to demand an assurance of performance, in default of which the remedy of termination can be safely used.

This rule is not found, at least in such a developed form, in the law of any of the Member States, though several have something similar that applies if one party has become insolvent. The general rule of "adequate assurance of performance" was developed in the American Uniform Commercial Code (art. 2-609). It reflects what parties reasonably expect to be their rights and it has proved to be of considerable practical value.

B. Right to withhold performance

So long as the creditor's reasonable belief in future non-performance by the debtor continues the creditor may withhold performance of reciprocal obligations, until adequate assurance of performance has been received. This is regulated by III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligations))

C. Effect of non-receipt of adequate assurance

If the creditor does not receive adequate assurance of performance and still believes on reasonable grounds that performance will not be forthcoming, the creditor may terminate. On termination, the debtor's failure to give the assurance requested is itself treated as a non-performance of the obligation, giving the creditor the right to damages where the deemed non-performance is not excused (III.–3:509 (Effect on obligations under the contract)).

Illustration 1

A, a caterer, contracts with B to cater for the reception at the wedding of B's daughter in three months' time. A month before the wedding B telephones A to discuss some outstanding details of the arrangements and is then told by A: "I am having some staff problems and there is a slight risk that I will not be able to organize the reception. But do not worry too much; everything should turn out all right." B is entitled to demand an adequate assurance that the reception will be provided. If this is given, as by A informing B that its staff difficulties have now been resolved, both parties remain bound by the contract and there is no non-performance of any obligation by A. If the assurance is not given, B is not expected to court disaster on the occasion of his daughter's wedding. He is entitled to terminate the contractual relationship, engage another caterer and recover from A any additional expense involved.

A, a boat builder, agrees to build a yacht for B, to be delivered in three months' time. B stipulates that time of delivery is of fundamental importance. Soon after the making of the contract B learns that A's boatyard has been seriously damaged by fire. B is entitled to ask for an adequate assurance from A that the yacht will be delivered on time. A might give this assurance by showing that it has rented facilities to build the yacht at another yard.

D. What constitutes an adequate assurance

This will depend on the circumstances, including the debtor's standing, integrity and previous conduct in relation to the obligation and the nature of the event that creates uncertainty as to the ability and willingness to perform. In some cases the debtor's declaration of intention to perform will suffice. In other cases it may be reasonable for the creditor to demand evidence of the debtor's ability to perform.

Illustration 3
B enters into three successive contracts for the purchase of goods from S. Subsequently B defaults in payment of the price under each of the first two contracts. S is entitled to demand a bank guarantee of the purchase price under the third contract or other reasonable assurance that payment will be made and is not obliged to rely solely on B's promise of payment.

I. Likelihood of non-performance

1. Several European systems have rules which entitle a party to terminate when it is clear that the other party will not perform, see the notes to the preceding Article. Further, many systems allow a creditor to withhold performance of a reciprocal obligation when there is a real and manifest danger that the debtor will not perform when the debtor's obligation falls due. Most of the laws deal with the situation where the other party becomes insolvent. See the Notes to Article III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation).
2. The right to withhold performance generally persists until the other party provides adequate security, or performs the obligation: e.g. AUSTRIAN CC § 1052 second sentence; FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs § 61(4); GERMAN CC § 321(1); SPANISH CC art. 1467(2); ESTONIAN LOA § 111(4)-(5) and CZECH commercial law (Ccom art. 348.1). If security is not provided the DANISH Sales Act § 39 gives the seller the right to terminate when the time for delivery of the goods has come. In GERMAN law not to provide security gives the creditor a right to terminate (CC § 321(2)). The position is similar under GREEK law, see Michaelides-Nouaros in Erm.AK II/1 art. 377 nos. 8, 11 (1949) Stathopoulos in Georgiadis & Stathopoulos arts. 374-378 no. 22. Similarly, a failure to provide assurance within a reasonable time after the creditor's relevant request gives the creditor a right to terminate under ESTONIAN LOA § 111(5). In addition, LOA § 98 provides specific rules for the obligation to provide assurance. Under ITALIAN CC art. 1461 the creditor can withhold performance, but cannot terminate. However under CC art. 1186, if a debtor is insolvent the creditor can demand immediate performance and, if this is not forthcoming or security provided, may terminate. Under DUTCH law, if a debtor is insolvent, the creditor may also demand immediate performance (art. 6:40) and the trustee in bankruptcy will lose the right to performance if the trustee does not show a willingness to perform or does show this willingness but fails to provide adequate assurance (Faillissementswet art. 37). Under POLISH law, where the debtor becomes insolvent or where due to circumstances for which debtor is liable, the value of a security previously given materially decreases, the creditor may demand immediate performance (CC art. 458). The CC also provides that in reciprocal obligations, unless otherwise stipulated, the two performances should be rendered at the same time, and one of the parties may withhold its performance until the other party offers its performance (CC art. 488).

3. In those laws in which only insolvency is a ground for demanding an assurance, to demand an assurance of performance in other circumstances may be wrongful. Thus in SCOTLAND a party who threatened to terminate unless assurance of performance was given was held to be in material breach: GL Group plc v. Ash Gupta Advertising Ltd 1987 SCLR 149.

4. In SPAIN the termination of an obligation because of a reasonable belief that it will not be performed before the deadline expires is possible according to the Supreme Court's decisions if the debtor acts with bad faith and has no intention to fulfil the obligation (TS 30 June 1981, RAJ 1981/2622; TS 13 March 1986, RAJ 1250). Regarding the creditor's right to demand an adequate assurance so that, it is not provided, the creditor may terminate the obligation, the SPANISH Civil Code only provides (for the contract of sale) that the seller may withhold performance on becoming aware of the buyer's insolvency (CC art. 1467), but if the debtor gives an assurance of payment, the creditor has to deliver the product. The assurance may be of any kind allowed by law. However, not getting an adequate assurance does not give the creditor a right to anticipate the termination of the obligation, even if there are reasons to believe in the non-performance of the debtor (R. Bercovitz (ed.) Comentarios al Código Civil, 2006, art. 1467).

5. Under FRENCH and BELGIAN law, there are no general rules which entitle the creditor to terminate if it is clear that the debtor will not perform, except in cases of insolvency. The seller may simply withhold performance (as an application of the exception non adimpleti contractus) or use a right of retention (on the distinction between these two concepts, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 636).

6. There is no precise equivalent of the Article's rule in ENGISH law, but see the Notes to II.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation).

7. See generally Treitel, Remedies 405 ff.

Sub-section 2: Scope, exercise and loss of right to terminate

III.–3:506: Scope of right to terminate

(1) Where the debtor's obligations under the contract are not divisible the creditor may only terminate the contractual relationship as a whole.

(2) Where the debtor's obligations under the contract are to be performed in separate parts or are otherwise divisible, then:

(a) if there is a ground for termination under this Section of a part to which a counter-performance can be apportioned, the creditor may terminate the contractual relationship so far as it relates to that part;

(b) the creditor may terminate the contractual relationship as a whole only if the creditor cannot reasonably be expected to accept performance of the other parts or there is a ground for termination in relation to the contractual relationship as a whole.

COMMENTS

In relation to this Article it is important to remember that termination is prospective only. A contractual relationship can be terminated only for the future.

Paragraph (1) states the general rule that if the debtor's obligations under the contract are indivisible the creditor may only terminate the contractual relationship as a whole, assuming of course that there are grounds for termination.

Paragraph (2) deals with the situation where the debtor's obligations under the contract are divisible. There are two types of divisibility. One type is where the debtor's future obligations are to be performed in separate parts or instalments. The other is where the performance of the obligations is divisible as to content but not necessarily as to time – for example, where a farmer has in one contract agreed to buy two identical tractors and one of them is fundamentally disconform to contract while the other is in conformity with the contract.

Where a contract calls for a series of performances by one party, each with a matching counter-performance (typically, a separate price for each performance), the contractual obligations may be seen as divisible into a series of separate parts. The same may apply when the obligations under the contract are to be performed continuously over a period of time: even if performance is not broken down into discrete parts it may be possible to apportion payment on a daily or weekly basis.

If the debtor fails to perform one part, the creditor may want to put an end to the obligations of both parties relating to that part, including the obligation to accept performance of that part: for instance, in a contract for services the employer may want to arrange for someone else to do the work. However, it may not be appropriate for the creditor to have the right to terminate all the remaining obligations under the contract because the failure, although fundamental in relation to the relevant part of the debtor's obligations, may not be fundamental in relation to the whole. The part of the obligations not performed may not affect the rest of the contractual rights and obligations significantly, and the non-performance may not be likely to be repeated. In these circumstances, it is appropriate to allow the creditor to terminate the contractual relationship only in relation to the part of the debtor's obligation not performed, leaving the rest untouched.

The lessor of a machine under a 5 year lease, with rent payable monthly, announces in year 2 that a fault has been discovered in machines of that type and that the machine must be recalled immediately for repairs. Repairs will take at least 10 days but the machine will be returned as soon as possible. The lessor is unable to provide a replacement. This is a non-performance of obligations of the lessor under the contract. The lessee could simply reduce the price for the period during which the machine will be out of service but needs to be able to hire a substitute machine for the period. The minimum period of hire of such a machine is a month. The lessee can terminate the contractual relationship for the month during which the machine will be largely out of service.

An office cleaning company agrees to clean a law firm's office on Saturday of each week for a fixed price per week. One Saturday the cleaning company's employees hold a one day strike. The law firm may terminate the obligations relating to that Saturday's work (including, in particular, the obligation to accept and pay for it) and bring in another cleaning firm to clean the office for that week. They may not terminate the contractual relationship as a whole unless it is clear that the strike will be repeated and that therefore there will be a fundamental non-performance of the whole of the cleaning company's obligation. This would then be a case of anticipated non-performance.

Sometimes one party's obligation to perform consists of distinct parts, and the non-performance affects only one of those parts, but the payment to be made for them is not split up into equivalent sums. If nonetheless the first party's performance is really divisible and the payment can be properly apportioned, the Article applies and termination is allowed in respect of the part affected.

The facts are as in Illustration 2 but the price is a lump sum for the fifty week period. This price was initially calculated by the cleaning company simply by multiplying the weekly charge by 50. The creditor may terminate the contractual relationship, and thereby bring to an end the obligations of both parties, in respect of the week missed.

Paragraph (2)(b) deals with situations where, even although the performance is divisible, the creditor can terminate the whole relationship. One such situation is where the creditor cannot reasonably be expected to accept the remaining performance.

A farmer has ordered some harvest machinery which is to be delivered in two parts with a separate price for each. The supplier tells the farmer that one part is ready for delivery at the due time but that the second part cannot be delivered at the time when it is due to be delivered and indeed cannot be delivered until after the harvest time. In this situation the farmer has no use for the first part and can terminate the contractual relationship as a whole and not merely the part relating to the second instalment of the machinery.

Another situation where the whole relationship can be terminated is where, notwithstanding the divisibility of the obligations, it is clear that there is a ground for termination in relation to the whole. Usually the ground in this type of case will be anticipated non-performance of the remaining parts.

The contract is as in Illustration 2. The cleaning work done in the first week is completely inadequate. It is clear that the cleaning company is trying to do the work using too few employees to cover an office of that size. The cleaning company refuses to use more employees. The law firm may terminate the contractual relationship as whole.

1. Where an obligation is to be performed in instalments or separate parts, most systems recognise that the creditor should have the right to refuse to accept, and to refuse to render the counter-performance for a defective instalment or part, without necessarily having the right to refuse to accept further performance of the remaining parts of the obligation; but the creditor may be entitled to refuse to accept any further performance when the non-performance affects the whole contract. This is provided, for instance by DANISH SGA §§ 22, 29 and 46; FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs §§ 43, 44 (see Ramberg, Köplagen 462); IRISH Sale of Goods Act 1893 s. 31(2); UK Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 31(2) (and in the case law similar results are reached for other contracts; see Treitel, Remedies § 278); GREEK CC art. 386 (under which the creditor may choose between damages and termination even with respect to parts already performed: Michaelides-Nouaros Erm. AK vol. II/1 art. 386 nos. 7-14), Stathopoulos in Georgiadis & Stathopoulos, art. 386 nos. 3-6, the same, Obligations § 21 nos. 82-85 and ESTONIAN LOA § 116(3). GERMAN law reaches similar results by applying the restrictions to the Nachfrist solution under CC § 323(5). Virtually the same rule applies in AUSTRIAN law, see CC §§ 918(2) and § 920 second sentence; in the case of contracts which provide for delivery in instalments a partial termination is also possible where the performance is divisible according to the parties' intention or the economic scope of the contract. Such a rule is also to be found in SLOVENIAN LOA § 108. In BELGIUM, the scope of termination depends on the divisibility in parts or indivisibility of the contractual relationship, given the economy of the contract; the resulting rule is identical to the proposed rule, see Lefebve Rev. de Notariat Belge (1988) 266 ff; Fontaine R.C.J.B. 1990, 382 ff; M.E. Storme T.B.B.R/R.G.D.C 1991, 112, no. 12 ff; Cass. 29 May 1980, Arr.Cass. no. 310, R.W. 1980-81, 1196; Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, pp. 207-208. Similar results are reached in FRANCE, where according to its pouvoir souverain, the court may partially terminate for a partial non-performance (Malaurie et Aynès nos. 742-744); it will take into account the divisibility of the performance. (See Cass. 1ière, 13 January 1987, Gaz.pal. 1987 II 20860 obs. G. Goubeaux.) ITALIAN CC art. 1564 provides that in contracts for the periodical supply of goods the whole contract may be terminated if the non-performance is of major importance and leads to loss of confidence in future performance, but according to CC art. 1458(1) termination does not extend to performances already executed; on the question of partial termination see Corrado 363 ff and Gentili, La risoluzione parziale. PORTUGUESE CC art. 434(2) provides for termination of the whole of a contract for performance by instalments or over a period of time when the ground for termination relates to the unperformed instalments. DUTCH CC art. 6:265 allows the creditor in all cases to choose between termination in part or of the whole, but subject to the general principle that the failure must justify the type of termination chosen. POLISH law does not expressly provide for termination in part, but the concept is accepted under CC art. 491 § 1 and art. 493 § 1 as far as the performance is divisible (compare W. Czachórski [et al.], Zobowiązania, p. 337; Z. Radwański, A. Olejniczak, Zobowiązania – część ogólna, Warszawa 2005, pp. 305-306). Moreover, CC art. 493 § 2 provides that in case of partial impossibility the aggrieved party may terminate the whole contractual relationship if a partial fulfilment would have no significance for that party. In CZECH REPUBLIC, the creditor is obliged to accept partial performance (CC § 566; Ccom art. 329) and he can refuse to render the counter-performance for defective part (by application of the principle exceptio non adimpleti contractus, see notes above) or cancel the contract in part (CC § 517.1 in fine; Ccom art. 347.1). SLOVAK CC § 517(1) allows the creditor to choose between partial termination or complete termination.

2. ULIS arts. 45 and 75 and CISG art. 73 are similar to the present Article.

3. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1124, the contract may be terminated even if the non-performance refers only to a part of an obligation (Lacruz, Elementos, p. 199: the CC art. 1124 does not distinguish between non-performance of a part and of the whole obligation). Nonetheless, in order to terminate the contract, this partial non-performance must imply the frustration of the whole contract's purpose (TS 18 October 1993, RAJ 1993/7615; TS 11 April 2003, RAJ 2003/3017). If the debtor fails to carry out an accessory or complementary counter-performance, the termination of the whole contract is not allowed (TS 26 July 1999, RAJ 1999/6777). But when the obligations are divisible, a partial termination of a contract is admitted by the Supreme Court (TS 26 October 1990, RAJ 1990/8052).

4. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 317(1) in the case of a non-performance of an obligation forming a part of a divisible service, the consequences of non-performance have effect only in respect of that part. However, the creditor is entitled to exercise the rights originating from the non-performance with regard to the entire contract if the creditor is able to prove that further performance is of no further interest due to the non-performance. Under CC § 317(2) if a non-performance concerns a part of an indivisible service, its consequences affect the entire contract.

III.–3:507: Notice of termination

(1) A right to terminate under this Section is exercised by notice to the debtor.

(2) Where a notice under III.–3:503 (Termination after notice fixing additional time for performance) provides for automatic termination if the debtor does not perform within the period fixed by the notice, termination takes effect after that period or a reasonable length of time from the giving of notice (whichever is longer) without further notice.

A. The requirement of notice.

Fair dealing requires that, as the minimum, a creditor who wishes to terminate for non-performance of an obligation should normally give notice to the defaulting debtor. The debtor must be able to make the necessary arrangements regarding goods, services and money. Uncertainty as to whether the creditor will accept performance or not may often cause a loss to the debtor which is disproportionate to the inconvenience which the creditor will suffer by giving a notice. When performance has been made, passiveness on the side of the creditor may cause the debtor to believe that the former has accepted the performance even if it was too late or defective. If, therefore, the creditor wishes to terminate, notice must be given to the debtor within a reasonable time.

The laws of some Member States are more demanding, in that at least in principle they require a court order to terminate a contractual relationship. This traditional approach has been found to be inconvenient and is now subjected to more and more exceptions. Therefore these rules adopt the now more common rule that termination may be effected by notice to the other party.

Notice may be given in any form. It need not use any particular words or expressions. It need only indicate in one way or another that the creditor regards the contract or the contractual relationship as terminated. This may be indicated by, for example, words to the effect that a contract is ended or over or finished or rescinded; or that a contractual relationship (dealership, franchise, agency or whatever) is terminated or at an end; or that the creditor considers himself or herself to be no longer bound by the contract or, in a case of partial termination, by the contract as applied to a particular part of the performance; or that the debtor need not bother to perform. Whether rejection of a performance can be regarded as notice of termination will depend on the circumstances and on what else is said or done: it may only be a prelude to a withholding of payment until the debtor's obligation is properly performed. The duty to exercise rights in accordance with good faith and fair dealing (III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing) may, in appropriate cases, require the notice to indicate the reason for the termination and, if it is partial, the extent of the termination.

B. When additional notice not required

Paragraph (2) deals with the situation where a notice under III.–3:503 (Termination after notice fixing additional time for performance) setting a reasonable period during which the defaulting debtor must perform has provided that at the end of the period termination will occur automatically if performance has still not been made. In such a case an additional notice of termination is not required.

NOTES

1. Legal systems differ in their approach to the question of how termination is to be effected and how quickly the creditor must act if the right is not to be lost. See Treitel, Remedies §§ 243-252.

I. Termination by notice to debtor

2. The Article merely requires notice to the non-performing debtor in order to effect termination. This accords with ENGLISH and IRISH law; DANISH SGA §§ 27, 32, and 52 see Gomard Obligationsret II 80; CZECH law (see above); GERMAN law, see CC § 349; FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs §§ 29, 39, 59. The PORTUGUESE CC art. 436(1); and the DUTCH CC art. 6:267 allow rescission by notice. In SCOTTISH law, even notice is not always required; conduct showing that the contractual relationship is regarded as terminated may be enough: McBryde para. 20.107. In SPAIN the creditor may terminate by giving notice of termination. Court proceedings are needed only when the debtor challenges the termination or when a decision is required on compensation or restitution Díez-Picazo, II, 722; Lacruz-Delgado II, 1, § 26, 204. Also in ESTONIAN law, termination is exercised by notice to the other party (LOA § 188(1)). The notice does not need specific form, unless the form is prescribed for specific contracts (e.g. LOA § 325 on residential lease requires notice of termination to be submitted in form which can be reproduced in writing). In certain circumstances declaration to similar effect may be inferred from the creditor's conduct, i.e. claiming damages in lieu of performance (Varul et al (-Kõve) § 115 no. 11.1.) or returning the non-conforming goods (special rule for consumer contracts: LOA § 19(2), see Varul et al (-Kõve) § 188 no. 4.2. and Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 19 April 2006, civil matter no. 3-2-1-29-06). Similarly to the paragraph (2) of the present Article, exceptionally no separate notice is required if the debtor has been given conditional notice to that effect when granted an additional period for performance (LOA § 116(5)). SLOVAK CC § 517 (1) also requires notice to the non-performing party for termination of the contractual relationship. But if the creditor is obliged to grant an additional adequate period the creditor may terminate after this additional period. The creditor has to first give notice to the debtor to grant an additional period and subsequently after this additional period the creditor may give notice of termination to the debtor. The position of POLISH law is similar (CC art. 491). The provision of the GREEK CC art. 341 § 2 is similar to the one in paragraph (2) of the commented Article.

3. The FRENCH, BELGIAN and ITALIAN laws at least in general principle require court proceedings to effect termination: see FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CC art. 1184(2). The time limit on the court's power to order termination is the general period of limitation (see French CC art. 2262 and Ccom art. 189bis); but in the case of defective goods the buyer, if electing for résolution, must do so "within a two-year period running from the date the defect was known by the creditor" FRENCH CC new art. 1648 (as amended in 2005), The ITALIAN CC arts. 1454, 1456 and 1457, and Belgian case law, recognise exceptions to the rule that the creditor needs a court order to terminate: see Dirix and van Oevelen, RW1992-93, 1236; van Ommeslaghe RCJB 1986, nos. 98-100; M.E. Storme TBBR 1991, 110-11, no. 12; Cass. 2 May 2002, RW 2002-2003, 501 obs Van Oevelen. In AUSTRIA CC § 918(1) provides that notice of termination in the case of delay needs at the same time the statement of a Nachfrist. In practice, however, it is seen as sufficient that the creditor waits for a reasonable period of time after notice of termination. After that period termination takes effect automatically (see Koziol/Welser II, 13th ed., 54).

4. CISG arts. 49 and 64 and UNIDROIT art. 7.3.2 adopt an approach similar to that of the Article.

III.–3:508: Loss of right to terminate

(1) If performance has been tendered late or a tendered performance otherwise does not conform to the contract the creditor loses the right to terminate under this Section unless notice of termination is given within a reasonable time.

(2) Where the creditor has given the debtor a period of time to cure the non-performance under III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules) the time mentioned in paragraph (1) begins to run from the expiry of that period. In other cases that time begins to run from the time when the creditor has become, or could reasonably be expected to have become, aware of the tender or the non-conformity.

(3) A creditor loses a right to terminate by notice under III.–3:503 (Termination after notice fixing additional time for performance), III.–3:504 (Termination for anticipated non-performance) or III.–3:505 (Termination for inadequate assurance of performance) unless the creditor gives notice of termination within a reasonable time after the right has arisen.

COMMENTS

A. Notice must be given within reasonable time

A creditor is normally required to give notice of termination within a reasonable time or the remedy will be lost. This provision is required for the protection of the debtor who may be continuing to spend time, effort and money on performance.

However, paragraph (1) applies only where performance has been tendered, but is either late or defective. If performance is simply not tendered at all the creditor can wait. The creditor may hope that the debtor will still perform and should not be put into the position where allowing the debtor more time would cause a loss of a right to terminate. The effect of that would be that the greater the delay the more likely it would be that the right to terminate would have been lost. The creditor, who already has a difficult decision to make, should not be put under pressure to act on what may only be a belief or fear, but should be able to allow the situation to clarify itself further before taking any action.

When a tender of performance is due but has not been made, the courses of action open to the creditor will depend on the circumstances.

(1) The creditor does not know whether the debtor intends to perform or not but wants performance. In that case the creditor should request specific performance within a reasonable time after the creditor has, or could reasonably be expected to have, become aware of the non-performance.

(2) The creditor does not know whether the debtor intends to perform and either does not want the performance or is undecided. In this case the creditor may wait to see whether performance is ultimately tendered and may make a decision if and when this happens. The debtor may ask the creditor whether performance is still wanted, in which case the creditor must answer without delay or risk being in breach of the duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing.

(3) The creditor has reason to know that the debtor is still intending to perform within a reasonable time, but no longer wishes to receive the performance. In this case it would be contrary to good faith for the creditor to allow the debtor to incur further effort in preparing to perform and then to terminate when the debtor eventually performs. The creditor in this situation would therefore have to notify the debtor that the performance will not be accepted, on pain of losing the right to terminate if the debtor does in fact perform within a reasonable time.

What is a reasonable time will depend upon the circumstances. For instance the creditor must be allowed long enough to be able to know whether or not defective goods will still serve their purpose. If delay in making a decision is likely to prejudice the debtor, for instance because the debtor may lose the chance to prevent a total waste of effort by concluding another contract, the reasonable time will be shorter than if this is not the case. If the debtor has tried to conceal the defects, a longer time may be allowed to the creditor.

B. When period begins to run

Paragraph (2) specifies the starting point for the period allowed under paragraph (1). Where the creditor has given the debtor a period of time to cure the non-performance under III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules) the time mentioned in paragraph (1) begins to run from the expiry of that period. In other cases the time begins to run from the time when the creditor has become, or could reasonably be expected to have become, aware of the tender or the non-conformity.

C. Time limit in cases equivalent to non-performance

Paragraph (3) applies the reasonable time rule to situations equivalent to non-performance – that is where additional time has been allowed for performance but the debtor has not complied, or there is anticipated not-performance by virtue of a repudiation by the debtor or other circumstances, or the debtor has failed to give an adequate assurance of performance when called upon to do so. See III.–3:503 (Termination after notice fixing additional time for performance), 3:504 (Termination for anticipated non-performance) and 3:505 (Termination for inadequate assurance of performance). In these cases the creditor loses the right to terminate by notice unless notice of termination is given within a reasonable time after the right has arisen.

D. Other ways in which right to terminate lost

The creditor may also, on the application of the general rule on good faith and fair dealing, lose the right to terminate by indicating that the right will not be exercised on the ground of a non-performance that has occurred.

Illustration
A orders a sweater in a particular shade of red from Shop B. When the sweater arrives and A goes to collect it, she discovers that it is not the correct colour. She nonetheless says to B that she will take it. She cannot later reject the sweater and terminate the contractual relationship on the ground that it was not the correct colour. A would not, of course, be prevented from terminating on the ground of some other non-performance, e.g. if the sweater turns out to be defective and B fails to replace it within a reasonable time (see III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules)).

Unlike some laws, the Article does not prevent the creditor from terminating the contractual relationship simply because the creditor is unable to return a tangible benefit which has been received under the contract. Thus a buyer of goods which were not in conformity with the contract may terminate the contractual relationship, and restitutionary remedies under this chapter will apply, despite the fact that the buyer cannot return the goods because, for example, they have been sold on.

NOTES

I. Notice of termination must be given within reasonable time

1. In the case of non-conformity the notice must generally be within a reasonable time of the defective performance. This corresponds broadly to many systems: e.g. DANISH SGA §§ 27, 32 ("promptly" or "within a short time"); FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs §§ 29, 32, 39, 59 (“reasonable time”); ESTONIAN LOA §§ 118(1), 196(3) (“reasonable time”); DUTCH CC art. 6:89 ("promptly"); GERMAN CC § 314(3) (only for contracts involving continuous or periodic performance but not for the normal right to terminate under CC § 323); FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CC art. 1648 for garantie des vices cachés (within “a two-year period from the date at which the defect was known by the creditor”) and, in Belgium, in some other cases on the basis of good faith, see Cass. 18 May 1987, Arr. Cass. 546 and Cass. 8 April 1988, Arr.Cass., no. 482; ITALIAN CC art. 1495 on sales contracts ("within eight days of its discovery") and art. 1667(2) on work contracts ("within sixty days of its discovery"); IRELAND "promptly and decisively", Clark 420; UK Sale of Goods Act 1979 ss.34 and 35 (and see Treitel, Contract 18-062); PORTUGUESE CC art. 436(2); or the same result may be reached by application of the doctrine of good faith, e.g. in SPAIN and in GERMANY, see Staudinger (-Otto), BGB, § 323 no. E22. AUSTRIAN and GERMAN law have special time limits for claims to terminate in cases of defects, e.g. CC §§ 932, 933, UGB § 377 (see the Notes to III.–3:107). The same is true for SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 462. In cases not involving defective goods in FRANCE the time limit on the court's power to order termination is the general period of limitation (see CC art. 2262 and Ccom. art. 189bis). In SCOTTISH law the right to terminate may be lost by (1) waiver or personal bar; (2) lapse of a reasonable time; or (3) tender of effective performance (McBryde, para. 20.121).
2. In CZECH civil law, termination for non-conformity of performance is possible only in cases when a defect of the performance cannot be remedied (CC § 507) and if the defective performance was notified without undue delay (CC § 504). This condition of notification without undue delay does not exist in cases of non- performance. The rules of CZECH commercial law are different. A debtor who renders defective performance is still in delay (Ccom art. 365) and the creditor has a right to terminate under condition of notification without undue delay and only in cases when the delay constitutes a fundamental breach of the debtor’s contractual obligation (Ccom art. 345.1).
3. Some systems offer protection to the debtor by requiring that reasonable notice be given before termination: for example AUSTRIA provides for the necessity to provide for a reasonable Nachfrist in cases of late performance (see CC § 918(1)). This is not required in cases of a contractual obligation that has to be performed at an exact date (Fixgeschäft) or in cases where the debtor refuses to perform the obligation. DUTCH law also requires notice of default, unless the contract provides for a fixed time for performance, or the creditor must conclude from a communication by the debtor that the latter will fail to perform (CC arts. 6:82 and 6:83).

4. GREEK law is not alone in allowing the non-performing debtor to set a reasonable time within which the creditor must decide whether or not there will be termination (CC arts. 546, 395, 387(2): see Michaelides-Nouaros ErmAK II/1 art. 382 no. 15, art. 383 no. 22 (1949), Stathopoulos in Georgiadis & Stathopoulos, art. 382 no. 8, the same, Obligations § 21 no. 42, Papanikolaou in Georgiadis and Stathopoulos, art. 395 nos. 1-7); see PORTUGUESE CC art. 436(2); and POLISH CC arts. 491(1) and 492. There are no special provisions on this issue in SLOVAK law.

II. Inability to restore property may be a bar to termination.

5. Under some systems a party who has received property may not be permitted to terminate either the contractual relationship as a whole, where the contract was for a single performance, or, where performance was by instalments, in relation to the part already received, if what has been received cannot be returned, for instance because it has been consumed or resold. Generally this rule applies where the inability to restore is attributable to the acts of the party who received the goods: DANISH SGA §§ 57 and 58; FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs § 66 (see Ramberg, Köplagen 637 f.); BELGIAN case law, e.g. CA Gent 22 October 1970, R.W. 1970-71, 893; CA Liège 10 November 1982, J.L. 1983, 153; GREEK CC arts. 391-394; PORTUGUESE CC art. 432(2). This was also the position in GERMAN law but it was abandoned by the Schuldrechtsmodernisierungsgesetz (Law Modernising the Law of Obligations) (2002); the CC § 346 today treats this case as one of non-performance of the obligation to restore. The rule does not apply when the defect constitutes a non-performance: FRENCH CC art. 1647(1); ITALIAN CC art. 1492(3); ENGLISH law, Rowland v. Divall [1923] 2 KB 500, (CA). It is not clear that SCOTTISH law would reach the same result: see Atiyah, Adams and MacQueen, Sale of Goods (11th ed. 2005), 114 n. 12. When the inability is due to accidental destruction, solutions differ: see the discussion in Treitel, Remedies § 285. Though no authoritative decision is yet available, this solution should be applied in SPANISH Law, by analogy to CC art. 1308.

6. With services, in contrast, the usual rule seems to be that the fact that there is nothing to be returned does not prevent termination. Systems differ as to whether the creditor must make restitution of the value of what has been received.

7. These rules, like AUSTRIAN (see CC § 921), FRENCH law (see Malaurie and Aynès § 762), GERMAN (CC § 346(2) and (3)) and the DUTCH CC, do not follow this distinction. In neither case is inability to restore a bar to termination; the creditor will however be expected to pay for benefits received, see below. In this these rules differ from CISG art. 82.

III. Completed performance may be a bar to termination

8. In some systems, e.g. ENGLISH law, there is a rule that if the claiming party has completed its performance, or a severable part of it, the only remedy is an action for the agreed price. Thus a seller of goods who has delivered them to the buyer but has not been paid cannot terminate and recover the goods but can only bring an action for the price. The only exception is if the property in the goods has not passed to the buyer, for instance because the contract provided that property would not pass until the goods were paid for (see Aluminium Industrie Vaassen B.V. v. Romalpa Aluminium Ltd. [1976] 1 WLR 676). DANISH SGA § 28(2), FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs § 54(4) and GREEK CC arts. 531 and 532 provide the same rule. The equivalent AUSTRIAN provision in the Commercial Code has been cancelled, 4.EVHGB art. 8 no. 21. POLISH law does not adopt this rule. Under CC art. 552, if the buyer is in delay with payment of the price, the seller may withhold any remaining performance and set a period for the buyer to pay or secure the payment of the price. After the passing of that period, the seller may terminate.

9. The functional equivalents in GERMANY to the English rule are special rights to terminate in the case of contracts involving continuous or periodic performance (Kündigung). In these contracts most of the retroactive effects of general termination rules (Rücktritt) are excluded once performance has begun; see Schlechtriem and Schmidt-Kessel, Schuldrecht Allgemeiner Teil[6], 211 et seq.

Sub-section 3: Effects of termination

III.–3:509: Effect on obligations under the contract

(1) On termination under this Section, the outstanding obligations or relevant part of the outstanding obligations of the parties under the contract come to an end.

(2) Termination does not, however, affect any provision of the contract for the settlement of disputes or other provision which is to operate even after termination.

(3)A creditor who terminates under this Section retains existing rights to damages or a stipulated payment for non-performance and in addition has the same right to damages or a stipulated payment for non-performance as the creditor would have had if there had been non-performance of the now extinguished obligations of the debtor. In relation to such extinguished obligations the creditor is not regarded as having caused or contributed to the loss merely by exercising the right to terminate.

COMMENTS

A. What obligations are terminated?

The main point of termination is generally to terminate the debtor's unperformed obligation which gives rise to the right to terminate and any obligations of the creditor which are reciprocal to that obligation, including in particular the obligation to accept and pay for the debtor's performance. In many cases the creditor is essentially saying "I do not want your performance any more and I am not going to pay for it. I regard myself as free to get what I want elsewhere." In other cases, where the creditor is the supplier of goods who has not been paid and who has probably given plenty of extra time for payment, the creditor is essentially saying "I've waited more than long enough. I don't want any more promises to pay. Return the goods and I'll sell them (or lease them) to someone else."

However, termination goes further than this. Paragraph (1) provides that the outstanding obligations or relevant part of the outstanding obligations of the parties under the contract come to an end. An obligation will be "outstanding" for this purpose if it has not been fully performed, whether or not it was due. An obligation will not be fully performed if what has been supplied is not in conformity with the terms of the contract.

There are exceptions (paragraph (2)) for contract terms relating to such matters as arbitration or the settlement of disputes. And in some cases where performance is divisible only partial termination will be possible.

This wider effect of termination is plainly necessary when the obligation which is not performed by the debtor is not the debtor's primary obligation.

> F, a farmer, is bound to allow C, a contractor, access over F's land in exchange for a monthly payment but subject to certain restrictions on the manner of use. C deliberately and blatantly disregards these restrictions. This is a fundamental non-performance of C's obligations regarding the manner of exercise of the right of access. F notifies C that, because of his conduct, access is no longer allowed and that F regards himself as no longer bound by the contract. This operates as a termination of the whole contractual relationship. F is no longer bound to allow access. C no longer has a right of access. C no longer has to pay future monthly payments.

It is important to note that termination operates for the benefit of both parties.

Illustration 2
A seller of goods fails to deliver on time and makes it clear that delivery will be so late that the buyer will no longer have a use for the goods. The buyer says "That's too late to be of any use to me. I'll get what I want elsewhere." Although no technical words are used, this is an effective notice of termination for non-performance. The main effect desired by the buyer is to terminate the buyer's own obligations to accept and pay for the goods. However, the buyer's notice also has the effect of terminating the seller's obligation to deliver the goods. If the buyer is unsuccessful in obtaining goods elsewhere it is too late to hold the seller to the original obligation.

B. Corresponding rights also terminated

It goes without saying that if obligations are terminated corresponding rights are also terminated.

Illustration 3
The facts are as in Illustration 1. The contractor cannot argue that a continuing right has been granted and cannot be taken away. Termination for the future of the farmer's obligation to allow access also terminates for the future the contractor's right to access.

C. No retrospective effect

The outstanding obligations of both parties under the contract "come to an end". This means that they have existed but are now extinguished for the future, subject to the exceptions already noted. Termination does not have retrospective effect.

Illustration 4
A cleaning company is employed to clean a law firm's office for 50 weeks at a fixed sum per week. In the 25th week the cleaning company ceases trading and the law firm justifiably terminates the contractual relationship. The first 24 weeks' work have already been paid for; the payments are not affected by the termination.

The fact that later provisions in this Chapter provide for the restitution of certain benefits received by the other party's performance or part-performance under the contract is not an exception to the rule of prospective effect. These provisions are not based on any fiction that the contract and contractual relationship did not exist. They are based on the reality that they did exist and have now come to an end. They impose new obligations to redress economic imbalances resulting from the termination. Of course, there will have to be some looking backwards in order to discover what has to be returned but that is a different matter. It could be said that there is a prospective effect based on a retrospective investigation.

D. Certain rights and obligations survive

Paragraph (2) makes it clear that termination does not affect any provision of the contract for the settlement of disputes or any provision which is to operate even after termination.

> Illustration 5
> The holder of a patent licences a firm in another country to make its product but forbids it to sell it under anything but the patent holder's trademark. The licensee receives confidential information about production methods which it undertakes not to divulge so long as it is not publicly known. The contract contains a term referring all disputes to arbitration. The licensee, in breach of the licence, markets the patented product under its own brand name, and the patent holder justifiably terminates the contractual relationship. This extinguishes both parties' obligations for the future, including in particular the patent holder's own obligation to allow continued manufacture by the licensee. Termination ends the licensee's corresponding rights under the licence for the future but does not prevent the patent holder from seeking damages for non-performance of the contractual obligation; nor does it release the licensee from its obligation to keep the production information confidential. The dispute must be referred to arbitration.

Where there are such provisions in the contract the result is in effect partial termination – termination of the main relationship but preservation of the ancillary relationship.

E. Damages

In some cases the effect of termination is that the debtor no longer has a chance to perform an obligation which might have been performed if there had been no termination. Termination prevents there being a non-performance or further non-performance by the debtor. Nonetheless the creditor, if the whole contractual relationship is terminated, loses the whole benefit to which the creditor was entitled under the contract and the reason for that loss was the debtor's initial non-performance or the equivalent (anticipated non-performance or failure to give an adequate assurance of performance). Paragraph (3) therefore makes it clear that a creditor who exercises a right to terminate under this Section not only retains rights to damages for actual non-performance (which would follow anyway from the normal rules) but also has the same right to damages or a stipulated payment for non-performance as the creditor would have had if there had been actual non-performance of the now extinguished obligations of the debtor.

> Illustration 6
> A contracting company repudiates a contract by saying that there will be no performance because it is going to give priority to another job which will absorb all its resources for a number of years. The other party terminates for anticipated non-performance. The terminating party is entitled to damages for the loss caused by the contractor's failure to perform the obligations under the contract. The contractor cannot argue that it might have changed its mind and that it has been prevented from performing by the termination of the contract.

> Illustration 7
> A contracting company is guilty of such repeated and serious delays and incompetence that the other party concludes that it will never complete the job in a satisfactory way and terminates the contractual relationship. A court holds that there was fundamental non-performance by the contracting company. The other party is entitled to damages for loss caused not only by the past non-performance but also for loss caused by the non-performance of the rest of the contractual obligations. The contracting company cannot argue that it was prevented by the termination from rendering such further performance.

The second sentence of paragraph (3) is inserted so as to avoid the possibility of any argument based on III.–3:101 (Remedies available) paragraph (3), which provides that the creditor may not resort to any remedies to the extent that the creditor caused the debtor's non-performance, or III.–3:704 (Loss attributable to creditor), which provides that the debtor is not liable for loss suffered by the creditor to the extent that the creditor contributed to the non-performance or its effects.

In long-term contracts involving periodic performances there might be thought to be a danger of injustice in the rule under paragraph (3). If there is a contract for monthly deliveries over a period of ten years, and if the purchaser terminates the whole contractual relationship merely because there is a non-performance, which is unlikely to be repeated, in relation to one delivery at the end of the second year it might seem unfair to allow the creditor to recover damages for loss caused by the non-performance of the obligations for the remaining eight years. In such a case it would not be unrealistic for the debtor to argue that it was perfectly willing and able to perform the rest of the contractual obligations and that in reality it was the creditor's act in terminating which caused any loss the creditor suffered in relation to the last eight years. The answer is that in such a case the creditor would not be able to terminate the whole contractual relationship under this Section. The creditor would at most be able to terminate in relation to the month in which the defective delivery occurred. Indeed if the creditor insisted on withdrawing from the whole relationship because of one defective delivery it would itself be guilty of a repudiation of the contract and would be liable in damages to the supplier.

On the other hand, if the supplier's breach was intentional and gave the purchaser good grounds for believing that it could no longer count on the supplier's performance in the future (cf III.–3:502 (Termination for fundamental non-performance) paragraph (2)(b)), the purchaser would be entitled to terminate the contractual relationship as a whole and in principle would be entitled to claim damages for loss caused by the non-performance of all the supplier's obligations. In practice, however, the purchaser's damages will be limited because it will be able to make alternative arrangements to cover its needs, and it will not be entitled to damages for any loss that it could have avoided by doing so (cf III.–3:705 (Reduction of loss)). However, if there are foreseeable loses that it is not able to prevent (for example if the price of "forward contracts" for the goods in question has risen), it may claim for them.

There may be cases where at the time of termination both parties have rights to damages for past non-performances by the other. The debtor's rights are not lost by termination. This follows from the general rules on damages.

1. The various legal systems exhibit great differences in concepts and terminology in this area. The differences in the practical results obtained are not so great but are still significant.

2. The most apparent difference is between systems such as the FRENCH which treats résolution as essentially retrospective (this is the approach of CZECH law where the termination is retrospective – operated ab initio – and is frequently called cancellation, "odstoupení", see for instance CC § 517) and those such as ENGLISH law which sees termination (or "rescission for breach") as essentially prospective (see Treitel, Remedies §§ 282-283). However, as the differences are sometimes more apparent than real, it may be helpful to consider the effect of "termination" in the various systems in a number of factual situations.

I. Effect on claims by either party which arose before the date of termination.

3. In "prospective" systems such as ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law these claims are largely unproblematic: they are not affected by subsequent termination, except that if money due but as yet unpaid would in any event have to be repaid after termination, it will for obvious reasons cease to be payable (see Treitel, Contract 19-096, McBryde, para. 20.108). It seems likely that other systems would reach the same result even if in theory termination was retrospective; for instance, in FRENCH law for a contract à exécution successive only résiliation for the future might be ordered. The position is similar, as a rule, under the PORTUGUESE CC art. 434 (2). The same holds true for ITALIAN law where the retrospective effects do not prejudice rights acquired in good faith by third parties and where an exception for long-term contracts is also provided (see CC art. 1458). In BELGIAN law, the question is which parts of the contract are terminated and which ones not, a question dealt with under these rules by III-3:506. Obligations relating to terminated parts are no longer due; those relating to parts not terminated are still due, whether or not they arose before the date of termination.

4. In GERMAN law it used to be said that Rücktritt had a retrospective effect but this view is no longer accepted. Contractual claims for damages which arose before termination are treated as surviving termination which is said only to end the primary duty to perform (Staudinger (-Kaiser), BGB [2004], § 346 no. 67). In AUSTRIA termination because of late or bad performance does not deprive the creditor of a claim for damages (see CC § 918(1) and § 933a(1)).

5. In DUTCH law termination does not have a retroactive effect: CC art. 6:269. It is the same under ESTONIAN law: LOA §§ 188(2), 195(2). In SPANISH law some writers favour prospective termination (Díez-Picazo, II, 724), others maintain the traditional, retrospective approach (Lacruz-Delgado, II, 1, § 26.206 and Albadejo II, 1, § 24.45) The Supreme Court, 28 June 1977, has adopted prospective termination when past performances were unaffected. This is today an undisputed doctrine when contracts bring about mutual duties that arise and have been performed before the rescission. In the Spanish case law it has never been doubted that the penalties and jurisdiction agreements set out for the case of non-performance remain valid and effective after the rescission. DANISH law also starts from the assumption that termination has effect ex nunc, see Bryde Andersen and Lookofsky 208. The rules are the same under SWEDISH law, see e.g. Rodhe, 420 et seq. and Hellner, Hager and Persson, 192 et seq. See also UNIDROIT art. 7.3.1.

6. Under POLISH law the majority view is that the termination has retrospective effect and the contract is regarded as not concluded (see e.g. W. Czachórski [et al.], Zobowiązania, p. 337; Z. Radwański, A. Olejniczak, Zobowiązania, p. 300 – prospective effect only in contracts with successive performance). Some writers, however, accept only the notion of prospective termination (A. Klein, Ustawowe prawo odstąpienia od umowy wzajemnej, Wrocław 1964, p. 165). Despite the retrospective effect of termination, Polish law entitles the terminating party to claim full damages (CC art. 494). This is also the position of SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 111 in connection to § 103.

7. Under SLOVAK law termination has retrospective effect and results in cancellation of the agreement ex tunc unless an act or an agreement of the participants stipulates otherwise (CC § 48(2)).

8. In SCOTTISH law termination has prospective effect (McBryde, para. 20.109).

9. In CZECH civil law the termination is called "odstoupení" (translated generally as "cancellation") and its retrospective effect ab initio is expressly stated (see CC § 517.1 and § 48). Some problems of application of this principle have arisen in cases of cancellation of sales of immovable property (see for instance Štenglová, Plíva, Tomsa, pp. 239-241). The rule in commercial cases is very different. The termination in commercial relationships is called also "odstoupení" (but this expression is translated generally as "withdrawal") and operates ex nunc (see Ccom art. 349 as commented by Štenglová, Plíva, Tomsa, p. 1028 and Ccom art. 351 stating expressly that "all rights and duties arising from the contract are discharged upon withdrawal", see commentary by Štenglová, Plíva, Tomsa, p. 1030).

II. Damages for the non-performance itself.

10. Most systems now allow full damages despite termination. For instance: full damages are available in CZECH law (see commentaries by Štenglová, Plíva, Tomsa, under CC § 48 and § 420, pp. 239 and 493; see also Ccom art. 351.1). In SPANISH law this rule has been uncontroversially held by the doctrine of the Supreme Court: see TS 4 February 2003, RAJ (2003) 846 and TS 17 November 2000, RAJ (2000), 9343. For GERMAN law see CC § 325.

III. Effect on contract clauses intended to apply even after termination.

11. All systems now accept that termination will not affect the application of clauses such as arbitration clauses which were intended to apply despite termination. E.g. ENGLISH law: Heyman v. Darwins [1942] A.C. 356, H.L.; cf. in SCOTLAND the very special case of Johannesburg Municipal Council v Stewart & Co. Ltd. 1909 S.C. (H.L.) 53; but in general in Scottish law clauses intended to apply after termination continue to take effect: Lloyds Bank plc v Bamberger 1993 S.C. 570, and see McBryde, paras. 20.110, 119; BELGIUM a fortiori ex art. 1697 II Judiciary Code on invalidity; FINLAND: Aurejärvi 106; FRANCE: clause compromissoire (NCPC art. 2061) and penalty clause (Malaurie & Aynès, Obligations no.543); GERMANY, see Staudinger (-Rieble), BGB [2004], § 340 nos. 61, 62; in GREEK law see Kerameus 171-173, with further refs., and Papanicolaou in Georgiadis & Stathopoulos art. 389 no. 14 (1979); ITALIAN law: no specific provision but see Satta 852; Cass. 5 August 1968 no. 2803, in Foro It., 1969, I c. 445 and Cass. 27 May 1981 no. 3474, in Foro It., 1982, I c. 199; NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:271; PORTUGUESE CC art. 434(1); CZECH Ccom art. 351.1; SLOVENIAN law: no specific provision but see Ude, Arbitražno pravo, 82; SPANISH Arbitration Act 1988 (see Bercovitz, Arbitraje, arts. 1, 17 ff; ESTONIAN LOA § 188(3) and UNIDROIT art. 7.3.5(3). SLOVAK Act on Arbitration no. 244/2002 § 5(3).

Sub-section 4: Restitution

III.–3:510: Restitution of benefits received by performance

(1) On termination under this Section a party (the recipient) who has received any benefit by the other's performance of obligations under the terminated contractual relationship or terminated part of the contractual relationship is obliged to return it. Where both parties have obligations to return, the obligations are reciprocal.

(2) If the performance was a payment of money, the amount received is to be repaid.

(3) To the extent that the benefit (not being money) is transferable, it is to be returned by transferring it. However, if a transfer would cause unreasonable effort or expense, the benefit may be returned by paying its value.

(4) To the extent that the benefit is not transferable it is to be returned by paying its value in accordance with III.–3:512 (Payment of value of benefit).

(5) The obligation to return a benefit extends to any natural or legal fruits received from the benefit.

COMMENTS

A. General

When a contractual relationship is terminated for fundamental non-performance or the equivalent under this Section it may easily happen that one or other party is left with some property or other benefit which ought to be returned if unfairness is to be avoided.

> Illustration 1
> A firm of accountants agrees to lease a computerised accounts system, which requires a particular kind of computer. The lessor supplies the hardware but completely fails to supply the software. The accountants have not yet paid anything under the contract. They terminate for fundamental non-performance. They should not, however, be allowed to keep the hardware.

This Sub-section regulates the circumstances in which, the way in which and the extent to which restitution is to be made when a contractual relationship is terminated for fundamental non-performance or the equivalent.

This Article provides wide and flexible restitutionary remedies, as are found in most (but not all) the laws of the Member States, in order to ensure that neither party is left unjustly enriched after termination of the contractual relationship. It must be read together with the following Article, which defines its scope of application

B. Requirement of restitution

The basic rule is that the recipient is obliged to return any benefit received by the other's performance. The way in which restitution is effected depends on the nature of the benefit. Where money has been received, the amount received (i.e. not necessarily the actual notes) is to be repaid. Transferable property other than money must be returned in kind. In many cases, however, an actual return is not possible. This applies to work and labour, services, the hiring out of goods, the letting of premises, and the carriage and custody of goods. A party who has received a performance of this kind cannot give it back. In contracts for sale or barter restoration may become impossible when the goods have perished or have been consumed or resold. In these situations the recipient is obliged to pay the value of the benefit.

C. Repayment of money paid

Under the Article a party may claim back money paid in advance for a performance which the party did not receive because the obligation was extinguished before it was fully performed. This rule has general application where a party who has prepaid money rightfully rejects performance by the other party or where the latter fails to effect any performance. It applies equally, for example, to contracts of sale, contracts for work and labour and contracts of lease.

The party claiming repayment of money paid may also claim interest (III.–3:708 (Interest on late payments)).

D. Return of transferable property other than money

The Article provides for the actual return of property other than money which is of a type which can be restored. On the extinction of the obligation by termination under the Section such property must be re-transferred.

> Illustration 2
> A contract called for A to deliver goods to be paid for by B upon their receipt. B did not pay for the goods on receipt. This, in the circumstances, is a fundamental non-performance. A may terminate the contractual relationship and claim back the goods from B.

The rule applies to contracts under which the obligations are to be performed in parts. If the creditor is entitled to terminate in respect of a part, the creditor may recover property transferred under that part of the contract.

Even if the actual subject-matter of an obligation is not returnable, restoration may be possible of things which attach to the subject-matter. Know-how and literary works are written on paper, paintings are made on canvas, sculptures cast in bronze. Tangible things which in this way materialise the product of the mind may be restored on termination. These things often have a value.

> Illustration 3
> A famous artist contracts with B to make illustrations for a new edition of Homer's Odyssey to be published by B; the copyright is to vest in B. When B receives the drawings he does not pay for them. The artist may terminate the contractual relationship and claim the illustrations back; the copyright must also be revested in him.

E. Return of property in case of bad bargains

Return may be claimed when one party has fully performed obligations to transfer property under a contract and only the other party's obligation to pay the price remains outstanding. It does not matter that the property is worth more than was to be paid for it so that by obtaining return the party escapes a bad bargain.

Illustration 4
A has sold a Renoir painting to B for €200,000; the true value of the painting is over €250,000. When the picture is delivered, B does not pay for it and makes it clear that he has no intention of paying for it. A is entitled to terminate and claim back the painting.

F. Return too onerous

Paragraph (3), second sentence, allows the value to be paid where the return of property would involve the recipient in an unreasonable effort or expense.

Illustration 5
A has painted a fresco which has been mounted on a wall in B's house and for which B has not paid A. Although it would be physically possible to dismantle the fresco the costs would be disproportionately high. A cannot claim back the fresco but only a payment representing its value.

G. Payment of value of non-transferable benefits

To the extent that a benefit is not transferable its value must be paid. Further provision on the calculation of value is made in III.–3:512 (Payment of value of benefit).

H. Fruits also to be returned

It may happen that something received in part performance or attempted performance of an obligation produces natural fruits (e.g. lambs or calves) or legal fruits (e.g. rents or interest or dividends) while in the possession of the recipient and before it can be returned. In such a case the fruits must be handed over along with the return of what was received. The obligation to return fruits corresponds to an obvious requirement of justice. Without this obligation there would, in a case where fruits had been produced, be no adequate restitution. Moreover the results of termination would be entirely arbitrary depending on whether notice of termination was given just before or just after fruits had been produced.

Illustration 6
F has bought ten sheep guaranteed to be pregnant. The seller extends a month’s credit. The month expires shortly before lambing is due to begin. F does not pay. The seller gives more time for payment but says that if payment is not made by the end of that time the contract will be cancelled. F has still not paid by the end of the additional time allowed for payment. The seller gives notice of termination and calls for the return of the sheep. By that time some of them have lambed.

It would be manifestly unjust to allow F to keep the lambs and manifestly arbitrary to allow the economic consequences of termination to depend on whether lambs had or had not been produced by the time termination took effect.

1. Most systems recognise a general obligation to return or pay the value of whatever is received in part performance of an obligation which is extinguished on the termination of a contractual relationship or in performance of an obligation reciprocal to such an obligation. The matter is complicated because in some systems certain types of extinction have retrospective effect. Where there is such retrospective effect the rules on unjustified enrichment can readily apply.

(a) Money paid

2. If money has been paid before the date of extinction, and assuming that it was not paid as a deposit or on terms that it would be forfeited if the obligation was not performed, most systems will normally allow the money to be recovered. It does not matter whether the party seeking to recover the money is the creditor or the non-performing debtor: FRENCH law, Malaurie and Aynès, Obligations no. 376 and FRENCH and BELGIAN CC arts. 1376 - 1377; DUTCH CC arts. 6:271-272; ITALIAN CC arts. 1458, 2033 and, for sales, arts. 1479(2) and 1493(1); GERMAN law, Staudinger (-Kaiser), BGB [2004], § 346 no. 73; DANISH law, SGA § 57 and Nørager- Nielsen and Theilgaard, 981 ff; FINNISH and SWEDISH law, see SGAs § 64 and Ramberg, Köplagen 614 ff; SLOVAK CC § 457; CZECH CC § 457 and POLISH CC art. 494. The same is true for SLOVENIAN law and a party returning money also has to pay interest, see LOA § 111(5). For the requirement of reciprocal restitution (together with a claim for fruits and other gains) under ESTONIAN law see also LOA § 189(1).

3. ENGLISH law is more restrictive. Except in cases of frustration (now governed by the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943 s. 1(2)), it allows recovery by the creditor only where there has been "a total failure of consideration" and by the non-performing party only where the party who had received the money can be restored to the original position (see Treitel, Remedies, para. 284; Treitel, Contract, 822-824, 906-907, and 911).

4. The position in SCOTTISH law is controversial and not yet settled: see McBryde, paras. 20.132, 142-143, for the debate. It is however settled that a party unable to claim in contract because it is in breach may have a claim against the other party in unjustified enrichment (McBryde, paras. 20.133-20.140).

5. ULIS art. 78(2) and CISG art. 81(2) take the same broad approach as the Article.

(b) Property transferred

6. If the property remains in the possession of the recipient, and is not claimed by a third party, many systems allow the transferor to recover it: e.g. FRENCH law, Malaurie & Aynès, Obligations no. 376 and FRENCH and BELGIAN CC art. 1379; ITALIAN CC arts. 1458(2) and 1493(2) (sales); FINNISH and SWEDISH SGA § 64(2); SPANISH CC art. 1295; PORTUGUESE CC art. 433 and 289(1); SLOVENIAN LOA § 111(2); CZECH CC §§ 457 and 458(1); and for ESTONIAN law see note 2 above.

7. Systems differ where a third party such as a creditor of the recipient claims the property. In GERMAN law the right to the return of the property is only “obligational" and third parties' interests will not be affected (Staudinger (-Kaiser), BGB [2004], § 346 nos. 43, 68). See also AUSTRIAN CC § 921 second sentence; SPANISH law (Albaladejo, II, 1,§ 20.4.U: Supreme Court 1 October 1986); GREEK CC art. 393. This result is consistent with SLOVAK judicial practice in interpretation of provisions of CC (§ 458(1)) and the same construction of CZECH law (see CC § 458(1) as commented by Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová, pp. 574 ff: everything must be restored if possible). The result is the opposite in FRENCH law, where the effect is in principle (but subject to important restrictions) "proprietary" (see Malaurie et Aynès, Obligations, no. 143; Nicholas, 245-246; Treitel, Remedies, § 282). The same is true under BELGIAN law, but the proprietary right will be overridden in the case of bona fide acquisition by an acquirer of movables in possession, in the case of seizure by creditors or insolvency proceedings; in the case of land, the proprietary right of the transferor will in principle only stand if it was reserved in the land register. Also under CZECH law proprietary aspects, at least to some extent, play a role, see Švestka (-Škárová, Pokorný, Salač), OZ, § 805.

8. ENGLISH law provides that if, on termination for non-performance, the claiming party has completed performance, or a severable part of it, the only remedy is an action for the agreed price. In the situation of partial performance it distinguishes between cases of frustration (impossibility) and cases of breach. Where the contract has been frustrated, the court has a discretion under the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943 s. 1(3) to award what are basically restitutionary awards (see the judgment of Robert Goff J in BP Exploration Co. (Libya) Ltd. v. Hunt (No. 2) [1979] 1 WLR 783, though see also Lawton LJ in [1981] 1 WLR 232 (CA)). Where there is termination for breach, the creditor may recover a reasonable sum; the defaulting party may recover nothing (see Treitel, Contract, 696-699, 592). As noted above, the law in SCOTLAND is controverted and undecided, but it is clear that the law of unjustified enrichment governs the relations of parties to a frustrated contract: Cantiere San Rocco SA v. Clyde Shipbuilding Co. Ltd. 1923 SC (HL) 105.

9. The termination of a contract in SPANISH law creates an obligation of mutual restitution of the counter-performances, the purpose of which is to place the parties in the hypothetical financial situation that they would have had if the contract had never taken place (Lacruz, p. 241). Regarding the price, it is always considered as a quantitative debt which means that for the purposes of restitution it stays the same, even if the economic circumstances vary. Nevertheless, the party who terminates has always the right to claim damages for any loss. There are some specific provisions in the Consumers' Laws: art. 9.1 of the Hire Purchase of Movable Assets Law provides that the consumer who withdraws from the contract has to restore the property in the state in which it was received. Nevertheless, the Law on Contracts Negotiated away from Business Premises in its art. 7.2 provides that the consumer who exercise the right to revoke the contract and cannot restore the property in natura, must pay the equivalent which is taken to be the market value of the property at the moment of exercising the right to revoke, except when that value is higher than the price paid (when the equivalent to pay will be equal to the price). The Supreme Court (TS 1 July 2005, RAJ 2005/5090) considers that the restitutionary effects of termination for non-performance under CC art. 1124 are the same as those provided for resolutive conditions (CC arts. 1122 and 1122). This means that if the property is damaged without the debtor's fault, the debtor is not liable for the reduction in value. In relation to the consequences of the benefit being disposed of, supposing the good faith of the holder, the holder would only restore in quantum sit locupletior (CC art. 1778). However, as the debtor knew exactly the title of the possession and the obligation to restore derived from the termination, the debtor will have to restore all the value of the counter-performance and compensate any loss caused to the creditor (CC arts. 1295.3, 1298). (cfr Monfort, La restitución en la resolución por incumplimiento de los contratos traslativos de dominio, 2000).

10. Again these rules follow ULIS, CISG and UNIDROIT art. 7.3.6(1) in taking a broad flexible approach.

III.–3:511: When restitution not required

(1) There is no obligation to make restitution under this Sub-section to the extent that conforming performance by one party has been met by conforming performance by the other.

(2) The terminating party may elect to treat performance as non-conforming if what was received by that party is of no, or fundamentally reduced, value to that party because of the other party's non-performance.

(3) Restitution under this Sub-section is not required where the contract was gratuitous.

COMMENTS

A. Exception for completed and conforming reciprocal performances

The essence of termination of a contractual relationship under these rules (as opposed to the avoidance of a contract for invalidity) is that it is prospective in effect. There may have to be restitution in so far as termination leaves an unbalanced situation but there is no need to unravel performances which have been properly made on both sides. The most common application of this rule is in relation to obligations which are to be performed in parts or instalments or are otherwise divisible (for example, if an obligation is to be performed continuously over a period of time and separate payments can be apportioned to units of time within the period). The duly completed parts of the performance on both sides do not normally have to be unravelled. The rules on restitution apply, however, to payments made in respect of so much of the obligation as was not fully performed.

Illustration 1
A has given B advance payment for the construction of 12 houses. B builds only 3 houses and then declares that no further work will be done as a more profitable contract has been obtained. The three houses already built are entirely satisfactory and A is content to keep them. A terminates the whole relationship for the future. A can claim back the advance payment for the 9 houses still to be built but not for the three which were built.

Company X has leased machinery from company Y for a period of 24 months. Y has to inspect the machinery once a week and perform maintenance operations. Payment of rent is to be made monthly. For 10 months the obligations are properly performed on both sides. Then Y's performance becomes fundamentally unsatisfactory to such an extent that X can hardly use the machinery. After 3 months of this, X concludes that it cannot rely on Y's performance improving for the future and terminates the whole contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance. X will have a claim for restitution of all or part of the rent paid for the 3 months when Y's obligations were not performed but has no claim in relation to the first 10 months when the parties' obligations were performed on both sides.

The rule in paragraph (1) is not, however, confined to obligations which are to be performed in parts or instalments. That could be too narrow – particularly when it is remembered that these rules apply to cases of termination other than for fundamental non-performance (e.g. fulfilment of resolutive condition; arrival of time limit). For example, there may be only a single set of reciprocal obligations but the contractual relationship may continue for an incidental purpose after they have been fully performed and may then be terminated by, say, the arrival of a time limit. There should be no requirement of restitution in such cases.

B. Exception for cases where what was received is now of no or little value to recipient

A party who terminates a contractual relationship may have received from the other some property or some service which conformed to the contract at the time but which is now of no value to the recipient because the termination of the contractual relationship means that the recipient will not receive the rest of the performance. In such cases the recipient may opt under paragraph (2) of the Article to treat the performance as non-conforming. There will then be an obligation to make restitution both ways.

> Illustration 3
> A complete computer system is to be installed and paid for one component at a time so that it can be fitted into a new office as the building is being built. An essential item is not delivered and the buyer terminates the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance. The buyer may elect to regard the components already received as non-conforming. The buyer will then have to return them but will be entitled to recover the price paid for them.

The recipient could in the alternative claim damages or a reduction in the price for the reduced value that the property received now has. However it will often be more convenient simply to return the unwanted property than to have to dispose of it some other way.

C. Exception for gratuitous contracts

Gratuitous contracts are by their nature unbalanced. To require restitution when the contract is terminated prospectively could therefore, in the case of a non-returnable benefit like a service, oblige the recipient to pay for something which was always intended to be provided for nothing. Paragraph (3) therefore provides that restitution is not required on the termination of a relationship resulting from a gratuitous contract. This is, of course, without prejudice to the rules on revocation of donations.

NOTES

1. It is generally accepted that where an obligation for performance in successive parts or instalments is extinguished after some parts of it have been performed but before completed performance, there is no need to undo the completed parts (see Treitel, Remedies, § 283). In BELGIAN law, the problem in the case of termination for non-performance is solved by the rule that where the scope of termination relates only to part of the contractual relationship, the rest remains unaffected. The rule in para (3) deviates from BELGIAN law, which does not make this exception. In FRENCH and LUXEMBOURG law, résolution for non-performance is only retroactive when the contractual obligations are to be performed at one time: for a contract à exécution successive the contract is treated as disappearing only from the date at which the debtor ceased performing or was given notice of termination by the creditor. In this context the process is often termed résiliation (Malaurie and Aynès, Obligations nos. 743 and 744). In ITALIAN law termination for non-performance is in principle retrospective but there is an exception for contracts involving continuous or periodic performance (see CC art. 1458). In PORTUGUESE and DUTCH law termination does not affect performances already rendered unless they are affected by the non-performance, CC art. 434(2) respectively CC art. 6:270 and Parlementaire Gescheiedenis Boek 6, pp. 1018 ff. In SPANISH law termination is not necessarily retroactive and does not affect past performance if this is not rendered useless by the non-performance (Montés, Comentarios al Código Civil y Compilaciones Forales, XV-1, 1989, 1246 f). In CZECH commercial law termination is never retroactive (see Ccom arts. 344 and 349) and so a partial withdrawal may intervene in case of a partial non-performance by the other party (see Ccom art. 347). In SCOTLAND termination is not retrospective. However, restitution of benefits which have ended up in the "wrong" hands (e.g. payments made for which nothing has been received in return) would normally be required (Gloag and Henderson, 10.19, 25.13) but this would not apply in the situation covered by paragraph (1). In GERMAN law termination of the whole contract is allowed only if the creditor has no interest in partial performance (CC § 323(5)); for contracts for the performance of a continuing obligation termination does not lead to restitution, because the general rules of termination (Rücktritt) in CC §§ 323 et seq. and §§ 346 et seq. are replaced by a special kind of termination, which has hardly any restitutionary effects (Kündigung), see CC § 314. Under ESTONIAN law, on terminating contracts of successive performance (kestvuslepingu ülesütlemine) parties are only required to return that which has been delivered in advance with respect to the time of termination (LOA § 195(5)). Restitution is optional in the situation where, due to the termination, a party is no longer interested in the previous performance (LOA § 196(4)). In SLOVAKIA restitution is principally retrospective unless there is partial termination (CC § 517(1)). In POLAND in obligations in which the performance is divisible and the creditor delays a part of the performance, the creditor may withdraw with respect to the delayed part or to all of the remaining parts of the performance. The creditor has a right to withdraw with respect to the entire contract if partial performance does not satisfy the creditor's interest due to the nature of the performance or to the purposes the contract was supposed to serve of which the debtor was aware (CC art. 491(2)).

2. The rule in paragraph (2) is derived from PECL art. 9:306. Most systems recognise the rule that the party terminating the contractual relationship may elect to reject property which has already been delivered and which was itself in conformity with the contract if the subsequent non-performance has rendered it of no use or interest. In GERMAN law, if the performances are inter-related either party may demand return of the part delivered earlier. In ENGLISH, SCOTTISH and IRISH law, where a part of the goods to be delivered are defective, the buyer may reject the whole (for England and Scotland, see UK Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 30; for Ireland see Forde § 1.192) and this will apply even if the goods are to be delivered in instalments provided that the instalments are similarly inter-connected and thus the contract is not severable (see Gill & Dufus SA v. Berger & Co. Inc. [1983] 1 Lloyd's Representative 622, reversed without reference to this point [1984] AC 382 (HL); Atiyah 452). The position with severable contracts is less clear but probably there is a right to reject instalments already received if they are rendered useless by the later breach (Atiyah, 455; Forde, § 1.198*).* The DANISH SGA § 46, and the FINNISH and SWEDISH SGA §§ 43 and 44 (see Ramberg, Köplagen 462) provide that a buyer who has received a defective instalment can reject instalments received earlier if the instalments are so inter-connected that it would be detrimental to the buyer to have to keep earlier ones. In DUTCH law the same holds true as a general rule of contract law (cf Parlementaire Geschiedenis Boek 6, p. 1023).

3. Under ITALIAN law there is no general rule but it is generally held that the aggrieved party may claim compensation to an amount corresponding to the decrease in value of the thing (see for references Mancaleoni in Antoniolli – Veneziano, Principles of European Contract Law and Italian Law – A Commentary, 436 ff). Under POLISH law – see CC art. 494: the terminating party should return to the other party everything it has received from it under the contract and it may demand everything it gave, independent of the importance of the non-delivered parts.

4. The rule is reminiscent of the AUSTRIAN doctrine of divisibility which follows the parties' intention or the economic scope of the contract (P. Bydinksik in Bydlinski/Koziol/Bollenberger, ABGB, § 918 no. 15).

5. Under SLOVAK law there is a different approach. According to CC § 518 if the agreement stipulates an exact time of performance and if it follows from the agreement or from the nature of the case that the creditor cannot have any interest in the delayed performance, the creditor must notify the debtor without undue delay that the creditor insists on the performance; unless the creditor does so, the agreement is cancelled ex tunc (terminated). And if the contract has been terminated, each party must return to the other party everything that it gained according to the agreement (see CC § 457).

6. When terminating a contract, in SPANISH law the parties are obliged to restore mutually the properties that were the object of the contract (CC art. 1124 in relation with CC art. 1295), returning everything received. But in any case, a synallagmatic relation may be terminated under the CC art. 1124 only if the terminating party's performance has been carried out. The termination of a contract has a retroactive effect (CC art. 1295) except for two kinds of contract: a contract of continuous fulfilment (e.g. a lease) and a supply contract, where the counter-performance is divisible (Diez Picazo, p. 249) - in those kinds of contracts the effects are ex nunc and the Supreme Court (TS 20 April 1994, RAJ 1994/3216) considers that until the moment of termination of the contract the counter-performances had properly fulfilled the pursued purpose.

7. The CZECH rules on this question are laid down by CC §§ 518 and 457. If the non-performance concerns merely a part of the obligation the creditor may terminate only as to this part. However, the creditor may terminate the entire contract if a partial performance would be contrary to the agreement or to the nature of the obligation (CC § 566). A similar provision can be found in the Commercial Code for commercial relations (the right to terminate the whole is connected with lack of economic significance of partial performance, see § 347(3)). If the entire contract is terminated the parties must return to each other every benefit already provided by performance.

8. Paragraph (2) first part is the same as English law but the second part is different in cases of "breach". A terminating party who has received a benefit and who has not rejected it will normally not be able to claim back the counter-performance by way of restitution because there will have been no total failure of consideration, see Whincup v. Hughes (1871) LR 6 CP 78 ; but the party may be able to claim damages instead. See Beale, Remedies, 205. In cases of frustration, money paid or the value of other benefits transferred may be claimable under the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943 s. 1.

III.–3:512: Payment of value of benefit

(1) The recipient is obliged to:

(a) pay the value (at the time of performance) of a benefit which is not transferable or which ceases to be transferable before the time when it is to be returned; and

(b) pay recompense for any reduction in the value of a returnable benefit as a result of a change in the condition of the benefit between the time of receipt and the time when it is to be returned.

(2) Where there was an agreed price the value of the benefit is that proportion of the price which the value of the actual performance bears to the value of the promised performance. Where no price was agreed the value of the benefit is the sum of money which a willing and capable provider and a willing and capable recipient, knowing of any non-conformity, would lawfully have agreed.

(3) The recipient's liability to pay the value of a benefit is reduced to the extent that as a result of a non-performance of an obligation owed by the other party to the recipient:

(a) the benefit cannot be returned in essentially the same condition as when it was received; or

(b) the recipient is compelled without compensation either to dispose of it or to sustain a disadvantage in order to preserve it.

(4) The recipient's liability to pay the value of a benefit is likewise reduced to the extent that it cannot be returned in the same condition as when it was received as a result of conduct of the recipient in the reasonable, but mistaken, belief that there was no non-conformity.

COMMENTS

A. Non-transferable benefit

It frequently happens that after a contractual relationship has been terminated one party is left with a benefit which cannot be returned - either because the benefit is the result of work which cannot be returned, or because property which has been transferred has been used up or destroyed - but for which the party has not paid. The other party may have a claim for the price, but this will depend upon the agreed payment terms and the price may not yet be payable. The other party may have a claim for damages, but the party who has received the benefit may be the creditor in the relevant obligation, or may be a debtor who is not liable for damages because the non-performance was excused. It would be unjust to allow the party to retain this benefit without paying for it.

Illustration 1

A contract to build a garage on to a house provides that the builder is to be paid upon completion of the work. After doing two-thirds of the work, the builder becomes insolvent and stops work. The employer terminates the contractual relationship and gets another builder to finish the garage. The amount the employer has to pay the second builder is less than the original contract price and the employer receives a net benefit. Under the Article the employer must pay the first builder a reasonable sum for the value of the work received. The employer might have a claim against the first builder for damages for the inconvenience caused, but that is a separate matter.

A purchases from B a car for €12,000. As a result of a road accident, the car is damaged beyond economic repair and is later disposed of for scrap. An examination of the car after the accident reveals, however, that the car was fitted with defective cylinders. In view of that defect the car was actually only worth €4,000 when A bought it, although it would have been worth €8,000 if the cylinders had been of the quality demanded by the contract. On the basis of the severe defect, A terminates for fundamental non-performance. A is entitled to a return of the purchase price but is liable to pay B the value of the car as this cannot be returned. As the parties agreed a price and A obtained a performance only half as valuable as the one he should have received under the contract, B is entitled to retain half the price as representing the value of the benefit received by A.

The rule in this Article seems to represent a common position, though in some systems the risk of accidental loss or damage to property transferred is placed on the party to whom it would otherwise have been returned.

1. Many systems have little difficulty in allowing either party upon termination to recover the value of services rendered. On FRENCH law, see Ghestin, Jamin & Billiau § 482ff.; BELGIAN law, Cass. 27 March 1972, Arr. Cass. 707; ITALIAN law, where there is no provision as to contracts in general (but see CC art. 1672 and Cass. 5 August 1988 no. 4849, in Mass. Foro It., 1988; Cass. 23 June 1982 no. 3827, in Mass. Foro It., 1982; Cass. 13 January 1972 no. 106 in Rassegna Avvocatura Stato, part I, 1972, 161); PORTUGUESE CC art. 434(1) and, when the performance cannot be returned, CC art. 289(1); for SCOTTISH law, see Graham v. United Turkey Red Company 1922 SC 583. In SPANISH case law this is an uncontroversial rule, according to the principles of unjustified enrichment and of the prospective effect of rescission in contracts with successive execution. As to property which cannot be returned, FRENCH and BELGIAN law distinguish whether the loss or deterioration is due to the fault of one of the parties or to force majeure. See CC art. 1379. Where the loss or deterioration of the goods is caused by the fault of one of the parties, that party will be liable to compensate the other party (Cass. Com., 16 December 1975). Where the loss of the goods is due to force majeure, the adage res perit domino is applied: in the case of contracts transferring property, the risk of the loss of generic goods (chose de genre) falls on the seller, who is deemed the owner up until the delivery. Upon termination of the contract, the seller must reimburse the price to the buyer who has paid. However, res perit domino does not apply in the case of the mere deterioration of the goods: the seller does not bear the risk of deterioration of the goods which occurred between delivery and restitution (Cass. Com., 21 July 1975). In the case of unique goods (corps certain), the risk of the loss or deterioration falls on the buyer, who is deemed the owner as at the conclusion of the sale contract, unless otherwise stipulated (CC art. 1308). Upon termination, the seller keeps the benefit of the price, unless the loss was attributable to the seller or the seller had not delivered the goods upon notice by the buyer or the loss was caused by fault.
2. For this case GERMAN law has a special rule that where the counter-performance has been fixed in money this amount is to be taken as a basis for calculation: CC § 346(2) sentence 2 (see further Staudinger (-Kaiser), BGB [2004], § 346 nos. 155-159). To similar effect is the ESTONIAN LOA § 189(2)–(4). GREEK law reaches the same result: Gasis in Erm.AK II/1, art. 389 no. 11 (1949) Papanikolaou in Georgiadis and Stathopoulos, art. 389 no. 15. A similar rule should be applied under POLISH law. In DANISH law the party who has rendered a performance which cannot be returned is not entitled to its value or the enrichment which the other party has received if a claim for counter-performance or damages is available, Ussing, Obligationsretten[4], 98. Under DUTCH CC art. 6:272 the party who has rendered performance is entitled to its value. In AUSTRIA the rules of unjustified enrichment (CC §§ 1431 ff), which are decisive irrespective of a fault requirement, are applicable. The same is true in SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 111(3) in connection to § 190. In the CZECH REPUBLIC there is no special provision but a similar result is reached in civil law by the application of a general principle of restitutio in integrum (see CC § 457). There is no similar general provision in commercial law because for commercial relationships termination has no retroactive effect.

3. In ENGLISH law it has been held that the buyer of goods may terminate the contractual relationship, and recover the price paid, on the grounds that the goods did not conform to the contract, even though the buyer cannot return the goods because they have been destroyed in an accident: Head v. Tattersall (1871-72) LR 7 Ex. 7.

4. ESTONIAN law generally corresponds to the Article, see LOA §§ 189(2)-(5) and 190(1). If not liable to compensate under those special rules, the party may still be obliged, under the provisions on unjustified enrichment, to return what was received (LOA § 190(2)).

5. The basic rule under SWEDISH law is the same as in the Article. See SGA § 65, which is an expression of a general principle of Swedish law.

6. Under SLOVAK law the recipient must give back everything that was gained from the unjustified enrichment. If this is not possible, particularly if the enrichment consisted of a non-monetary performance, the recipient must grant a cash compensation. Unless the recipient gained the enrichment in good faith, any proceeds from the unjustified enrichment must also be handed over. The value of the monetary compensations depends on the economic value of the unjustified enrichment at the time when it arose (CC § 457 and § 458).

III.–3:513: Use and improvements

(1) The recipient is obliged to pay a reasonable amount for any use which the recipient makes of the benefit except in so far as the recipient is liable under III.–3:512 (Payment of value of benefit) paragraph (1) in respect of that use.

(2) A recipient who has improved a benefit which the recipient is obliged under this Section to return has a right to payment of the value of improvements if the other party can readily obtain that value by dealing with the benefit unless:

(a) the improvement was a non-performance of an obligation owed by the recipient to the other party; or

(b) the recipient made the improvement when the recipient knew or could reasonably be expected to know that the benefit would have to be returned.

COMMENTS

The rule in paragraph (1) obliges the recipient of a returnable benefit to pay a reasonable amount for any use made of the benefit. The exception in the second part of the paragraph prevents a double liability from arising. In so far as the use of the benefit led to a reduction in the value of the (returnable) benefit the debtor is already obliged to pay recompense under III.–3:512 (Payment of value of benefit) paragraph (1) and so does not need to pay again.

A purchases a kitchen stove from B for €500. A uses the stove for five months, at which time A notices that the frame of the oven is becoming seriously distorted. A exercises her right to terminate the contractual relationship for fundamental non-performance. The value of the stove in its much changed condition is €50. As the change in condition is the result of A's use of the stove in the legitimate assumption that it was not defective, A is not liable to pay recompense for the deterioration in the stove's condition: see III.–3:512 (Payment of value of benefit) paragraph (4), reducing liability under paragraph (1) of that Article to nil. However, A is liable under paragraph (1) of the present Article to pay a reasonable amount for the use of the stove for five months. The reasonable amount will take account of the fact that the stove which A has used was defective and will not reflect the full sum that would be appropriate for the use of a fully-functioning appliance.

The rule in paragraph (2) deals with what is functionally the reverse situation – namely, where the recipient has improved the benefit so that the other party would actually be better off on the return of the benefit than if there had been no improvements. The improver has in such circumstances a right to payment of the value of the improvements but only if the other party can readily obtain that value by dealing with the benefit. It would be unfair to saddle the other party with a liability to pay for improvements which had not been asked for and which could not be translated into realised value. There are two other restrictions in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) of paragraph (2). The policy behind both is that the improver has no right to payment for improvements if the improver was, so to speak, in the wrong in making the improvements. Sub-paragraph (a) deals with the situation where the improvement was actually a non-performance of an obligation owed to the other party. Clearly in this situation the improver cannot be allowed to profit from the non-performance. Sub-paragraph (b) deals with the situation where the improver knew or could reasonably be expected to have known at the time of making the improvements that the benefit would have to be returned. This can be regarded as an application of the principle of good faith.

D, a motor cycle dealer, purchases a dozen prestige motor bikes from their manufacturer M. D customises the bikes by replacing various parts with more expensive components of superior quality and reputation. D is unable to re-sell the bikes because, contrary to the terms of the contract, the bike frames in their delivered condition do not satisfy safety regulations which govern the use of motor cycles on the road in D's country. Restoring the bikes to their original condition is no longer possible as most of the components have been welded to the bikes. While, on termination of the contractual relationship, D is liable to return the bikes to the manufacturer under III.–3:510 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) paragraph (3), M is liable to pay to D the value of the improvements made to the bikes if M can sell them without difficulty and thus realise that value.

1. In SPANISH law, although with diverse motivations (i.e. application of the rules on unjustified enrichment or of the rules on eviction of possession), the case law now grants the debtor the right to reimbursement for improvements, whether or not the non-performance was due to the debtor's fault (TS 13 October 1995, RAJ (1995), 7080; TS 19 June 1996, RAJ (1996), 5102; TS 23 July 1996, RAJ (1996), 5567. CZECH law states expressly that everything must be returned which was acquired through unjustified enrichment but the person who returns the benefit has the right to be compensated for necessary expenses (see CC §§ 458.1, 458.2 and 458.3). These provisions can be construed in the above-mentioned meaning (see construction based on CC § 458.1 in Sbírka soudních rozhodnutí a stanovisek 65/1972, p. 144). There is a similar specific rule in the SLOVENIAN LOA § 111(4). GERMAN law follows the same approach as paragraph (1) of the present Article the recipient is obliged to pay for any use made of the benefit except and in so far this would amount to double compensation for a reduction in value resulting from the use (CC § 346(1) and (2) sentence 1 no. 3; Staudinger (-Kaiser), BGB [2004], § 346 no. 141). A recipient who is obliged to return or pay the value of the benefit has a right to payment of the value of improvements if they were necessary (for example to maintain the benefit) (CC § 347(2) sent. 1); in respect of other improvements the recipient has a right to payment of their value only if and in so far as the other party is enriched (CC § 347(2) sent. 2).
2. The ESTONIAN LOA § 189(1) sets requirements for the restitution of any benefit, including any advantages derived from the use of an object and any potential benefit which the party could have received upon adherence to the requirements for regular management, exercising of such care in the receipt of fruits and gain as the party would exercise in the party's own affairs (LOA § 191(1)). LOA § 191(2) provides that if a party returns an object or compensates for the value of the object or if the obligation to compensate for the value of the object is precluded because the circumstances on which termination is based become evident only upon processing the thing, or deterioration or destruction occurred due to circumstances dependent on the other party or due to circumstances the risk of which is borne by the other party, or if the damage would also have occurred if that which was received had been in the possession of the other party (LOA § 190(1) sent. 1 or 2), the other party must compensate the first party for the necessary expenses incurred with respect to the object. Other expenses may be compensated pursuant to the provisions concerning unjustified enrichment. POLISH law provides in CC art. 494 a rule applicable in case of withdrawal from a reciprocal contract, namely that a party who withdraws from a reciprocal contract should return to the other party everything that they received from the other party under the contract; it may demand that everything they provided should be returned and that damage arising from non-performance should be repaired. The performances should as a rule be returned in kind, unchanged, unless the change is a result of ordinary management. The Supreme Court has ruled that the recipient is not obliged to pay for using the thing in accordance with its purpose, and a contractual stipulation attempting to create such an obligation would be ineffective (SN, 26 October 1972, III CZP 48/72, OSNCP 1973.2.23).

3. There is no express regulation of, or case law precisely on, this topic in FRENCH law (see however, in the French Avant Projet, the detailed provisions on restitutions, particularly, on this point, art. 1164-4). Nor is there any express regulation in SCOTTISH law but, given that the principles of unjustified enrichment apply in cases of termination (rescission), it is likely that the results reached by the Article could be reached in appropriate cases. There is no express regulation in DUTCH law either; unjustified enrichment might lead to a claim against the recipient for compensation for use but not in cases where it is the non-performing party that makes the claim. In SLOVAKIA there are no special provisions on this topic but similar rules can be reached by application of the general provisions on unjustified enrichment (CC § 458) and good faith.

4. In ENGLISH law the results in (1) would probably follow if the claim were made by the victim of a breach of contract (Planché v. Colburn (1831) 8 Bing 14, or under the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943, s 1; but a party who was guilty of a breach of contract would not have a restitutionary claim, Sumpter v. Hedges [1989] 1 QB 673. The question of improvements seems not to have been discussed in the context of non-performance, cf Chitty on Contracts, nos. 29-052-29-053.

5. As to paragraph (1), in FRANCE and BELGIUM, termination for non-performance of a contract has a retroactive effect, which gives rise to a right to a "return to the status quo ante, by way of restitution, in natura or in value, or in natura and in value" (see Cass.com. 11 May 1976), involving, as appropriate, the payment of an indemnity (indemnité d'occupation ou d'usure). The payment of the benefit received is founded on the doctrine of the unjustified enrichment of the receiver. In BELGIAN and FRENCH law, the question of paragraph (2) is dealt with by CC art. 1381: the improver is entitled to compensation for necessary and useful improvements. In the Projet de réforme du droit des contrats, article 107 provides for a compensation for the costs of conservation and improvements.

6. According to the CZECH CC, any fruits of the benefit must be surrendered along with the benefit, unless the recipient acted in good faith, and the recipient has the right to be compensated for the necessary expenses incurred with regard to the benefit (§ 458(2)(3)). Any conclusions as to compensation for improvements to be inferred from the CC are limited to dealings by the recipient in good faith (cf. § 130(3)).

III.–3:514: Liabilities arising after time when return due

(1) The recipient is obliged to:

(a) pay the value (at the time of performance) of a benefit which ceases to be transferable after the time when its return was due; and

(b) pay recompense for any reduction in the value of a returnable benefit as a result of a change in the condition of the benefit after the time when its return was due.

(2) If the benefit is disposed of after the time when return was due, the value to be paid is the value of any proceeds, if this is greater.

(3) Other liabilities arising from non-performance of an obligation to return a benefit are unaffected.

COMMENTS

Where the benefit conferred under a contract ceases to be transferable or deteriorates before termination of the contractual relationship takes place, the legal consequences are determined by III–3:512 (Payment of value of benefit). The present Article, by contrast, governs the consequences for the recipient's liability under III.–3:510 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) paragraph (3) to return the benefit by transferring it when the benefit ceases to be transferable or its condition deteriorates in the period following termination of the contractual relationship and before return of the benefit. As provided for by paragraph (3), these rules partially displace the general rules which otherwise apply in the case of a non-performance of the obligation to return the benefit.

Illustration
In 2006 W purchases from Z a substantial stamp collection on the agreed basis that the collection includes a complete series of South African commemorative stamps for 1952 to 1968. A sale price of €22,000 is agreed. Z terminates the contractual relationship after W fails to pay the third of the ten instalments due. After termination, W, instead of returning the collection, arranges for it to be auctioned, where it is sold in 2007 for €26,500. W is liable to pay to Z the proceeds of sale from the auction in accordance with paragraph (2), but can set-off the right to repayment of €6,600 paid by W before termination.

NOTES

1. Under GERMAN and POLISH law the general rules apply to the obligations arising after termination. If the recipient disposes of the benefit after the time return was due, this is regarded as non-performance of the obligation to return and the other party may demand surrender of what has been received as substitute (CC § 285 and POLISH CC art. 475 § 2). In CZECH law this benefit is an unjustified enrichment (CC arts. 457 ff and the commentaries on this subject by Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová, pp. 564-575). Under DUTCH law if the recipient disposes of the benefit after the time return was due, this is also regarded as non-performance by the recipient which will however only lead to a claim for damages.
2. The ESTONIAN LOA § 189(2) and (4), imposing an obligation to pay the value or compensate, does not distinguish between the cases where the reasons for this obligation arise before or after the time return was due. In any case, the price is deemed to be the value of that which was received (LOA § 189(3)). However, upon exercising the right of termination arising from the law, e.g. in case of fundamental non-performance, a party is exempted from paying the value or compensating in so far as that party exercised such care as the party would exercise in the party's own affairs (LOA § 190(1) sent. 3). LOA § 189(5) prescribes that a party who, under the circumstances, should reasonably be able to foresee the possibility of termination of the contract should ensure that it is possible to return what was received, thus setting higher standard for liability for after cases. This is highly controversial: LOA § 190 might be applicable to the obligation to pay the value or compensate exclusively, leaving LOA § 189(5) to apply to the question of possible compensation of damages, see Varul et al (-Kõve) § 189, no. 6, § 190, no. 4.3.3. There is no specific regulation similar to paragraph (2) of the Article; the applicability of LOA § 108(7) (right to require transfer of the proceeds, if claim for specific performance is unenforceable, e.g. for impossibility) is also doubtful. However, damages for non-performance of the obligation in LOA § 189(5) (see notes above) could be obtained.

3. SCOTTISH law has not so far distinguished between the situations where the reason for the non-returnability in kind arises before or after the date when the return was due. Nor do these issues appear to be covered in ENGLISH law. Under SLOVAK law it is not important whether liabilities arise after the time when the return was due or not.

4. Under (FRENCH) and BELGIAN law, the rules on non-performance of the obligation to return will also apply. The risk of force majeure is on the party who has to return the goods from the moment the contractual relationship is terminated, as this is equivalent to a mise en demeure and thus Article 1302 applies. That party will have to pay the value of the benefit which can no longer be returned, unless it proves that the benefit would also have been destroyed or would have deteriorated if it had been returned already.

5. In CZECH law, the general provisions on unjustified enrichment apply, according to which everything which was acquired through unjustified enrichment must be surrendered, and if this is not feasible, particularly when such enrichment resulted from performance of services, monetary compensation must be provided (CC § 458(1)). The duty to surrender everything which was unjustifiably acquired is to be fulfilled in such a way as to restore the original situation, or to constitute a situation which would be economically equivalent to the original situation (Supreme Court R 1/1979).

Section 6: Price reduction

III.–3:601: Right to reduce price

(1) A creditor who accepts a performance not conforming to the terms regulating the obligation may reduce the price. The reduction is to be proportionate to the decrease in the value of what was received by virtue of the performance at the time it was made compared to the value of what would have been received by virtue of a conforming performance.

(2) A creditor who is entitled to reduce the price under the preceding paragraph and who has already paid a sum exceeding the reduced price may recover the excess from the debtor.

(3) A creditor who reduces the price cannot also recover damages for the loss thereby compensated but remains entitled to damages for any further loss suffered.

(4) This Article applies with appropriate adaptations to a reciprocal obligation of the creditor other than an obligation to pay a price.

COMMENTS

A. The principle of price reduction

Under this Article the creditor is entitled to a reduction in the price where the debtor's performance is incomplete or otherwise fails to conform to the terms regulating the obligation. The remedy is given whether the non-conformity relates to quantity, quality, time of delivery or otherwise. The remedy is designed both as an alternative to damages (see Illustration 2 below) and for cases where the debtor is excused from liability for damages (see Comment B below). The Article applies only where the creditor accepts the non-conforming performance. In other cases, the remedy is either to pursue a restitutionary claim under III.–3:510 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) or to claim damages under Section 7.

Price reduction is a normal remedy in most European legal systems. The common law systems, however, did not know it as such until they implemented the Directive on certain aspects of the sale of consumer goods and associated guarantees (1999/44/EC), which refers to price reduction; but in most cases they reached broadly similar results by other means.

The amount of the price reduction is proportional to the reduction in the value of what is received compared to the value of what would have been received if there had been conforming performance. In some cases the value received will be directly related to the proportion of the obligation performed and the price may simply be reduced accordingly.

> S contracts to sell 50 tonnes of coffee to B at a price of €2,400 a tonne. S tenders only 30 tonnes. B may accept the short tender and reduce the price under this Article from €120,000 to €72,000 (see Illustration 3). Alternatively B can reject the short tender, in which case it can either claim recovery of the price under III.–3:510 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) or claim damages under Section 5, but it cannot invoke the present Article.

In other cases the value of the performance may be reduced by a greater (or less) proportion.

B agrees to build a house for O for €150,000. If the work had been properly executed the house would have been worth €100,000 when completed, but because of B's defective workmanship it is worth only €80,000. As an alternative to claiming damages of €20,000, O may withhold or recover one-fifth of the price, i.e. €30,000.

B. Price reduction available even where non-performance excused

The fact that a shortfall in performance is excused does not affect the creditor's right to a price reduction under this Article, for the only remedies which are excluded in the case of an excused non-performance are specific performance and damages.

Illustration 3
S in Marseilles contracts to sell 20 hospital scanning machines to B in London. As the result of the introduction of a quota system governing the export of scanning machines S is only able to supply B with 15 machines. S's non-performance is excused but if B decides to accept the 15 machines it is entitled to a price reduction of 25 per cent.

C. Price reduction may be obtained before or after payment

The creditor may obtain a price reduction under this Article either by withholding payment, if the price has not yet been paid, or by recovering the amount of the price reduction if the price has already been paid.

D. Price reduction is alternative to damages for reduction in value

A creditor who reduces the price under this Article cannot also claim damages for the difference in value between what was received and what would have been received by virtue of conforming performance (see Illustration 1). The two remedies are incompatible so that there is no right to cumulate them. However, other loss remains recoverable within the limits laid down by Section 7.

Illustration 4
The facts are as in Illustration 2. O cannot live in the house until the defects in it have been put right and incurs a loss of €500 in renting an apartment to live in meanwhile. The €500 remains recoverable whichever of the above remedies is pursued.

I. The actio quanti minoris

1. The right to reduce the price, as provided in this Article, is found in most European legal systems and in CISG art. 50. It is primarily applied when goods sold are defective, see AUSTRIAN CC § 932(1) and (4) but only as a secondary device; DANISH SGA §§ 42 and 43; FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs §§ 37, 38; FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CC art. 1644; GERMAN CC §§ 437 no. 2, 441; GREEK CC arts. 534, 535, 540; ITALIAN CC art. 1492(1)(sales contracts); POLISH CC art. 560 § 1 and § 3; CZECH CC §§ 507, 622.3, 624; SLOVENIAN LOA § 478; and PORTUGUESE CC arts. 911 and 913. However, in many countries the rule also applies to other contracts, see DANISH Lease Act §§ 11(2), 15 and 16(2) and on construction contracts, Gomard, Obligationsret II 115 ff; FINLAND, Sale of real property and service contracts, see Sisula-Tulokas 18 - 36. GERMAN CC §§ 515 (barter), 536 (lease), 634 no. 3, 638 (work, but not services) and 651(d) (travel) and for the view that price reduction is a remedy under general contract law see Schlechtriem and Schmidt-Kessel, Schuldrecht Allgemeiner Teil[6], 258 et seq.; GREEK CC arts. 573 (barter), 576 (lease) and 688 and 689 (work); ITALIAN CC art. 1668 (construction contracts) and recently ITALIAN ConsC art. 130; POLISH CC arts. 560 and 604 (barter), art. 637 § 2 (work contract), 664 § 1 (lease), 700 (tenancy); PORTUGUESE CC art. 1222 (work); and SPAIN CC art. 1486 (sales). In FRANCE, outside cases of defects, price reduction (réfaction) is limited to commercial cases, as a consequence of usages: Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 630, in fine; but there is a tendency to generalise it to other contracts, through various mechanisms (Bénabent, no. 299) such as in services contract, the judicial reduction of price or the judicial deletion of illicit clauses or the substitution by the judge of a valid clause for an invalid one. The ESTONIAN LOA § 112 provides for price reduction as a general remedy for non-performance of a contractual obligation, subject to several special regulations (e.g. LOA §§ 220(3) and 224 for contracts of sale). Price reduction as a remedy can be exercised even if non-performance is excused (LOA § 105).

2. The DUTCH CC treats price reduction as partial termination which in principle is available in all contracts, see CC arts. 6:265 and 6:270. SLOVAK CC § 507(1) applies the right to reduce the price generally for all contracts that contain reciprocal obligations. The general right to reduce the price is restricted only for obligations relating to things. There are also special provisions on price reduction (for example § 623(2) (sale), § 648(2) (works), § 674(lease)).

3. In some systems price reduction applies also where the non-performance is excused.

4. Although SCOTTISH law once recognised the actio quanti minoris, it is not a general part of the modern law (McBryde, para. 22.10). However, the Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 53(1) allows the buyer in case of defects to set up certain claims "in diminution or extinction of the price". And see notes under V. below.

5. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 306(1) in the case of non-conformity with the contract (a) the creditor is, in the first place, entitled to choose either repair or replacement unless this is impossible or it results in disproportionate expenses on the part of the debtor as compared to the alternative remedy, taking into account the value the goods would have had there been no lack of conformity, the significance of the lack of conformity, and whether the alternative remedy could be completed without significant inconvenience to the creditor; (b) if the creditor is entitled to neither repair nor replacement or if the debtor refuses to provide repair or replacement or is unable to do so in the way required by the law, the creditor may require an appropriate reduction of the price or have the contract withdrawn. The creditor is not entitled to have the contract withdrawn if the lack of conformity is minor.

II. Calculation of the reduction

6. As in the Article, CISG art. 50 provides that the buyer may reduce the price in the same proportion as the value that the goods actually delivered had at the time of delivery bears to the value that conforming goods would have had at that time, and the same rule applies in most European countries, see e.g. GERMAN CC § 441(3) (value at the time of contracting). Although in ITALIAN law there is no general rule providing for a proportional reduction of price, it is unanimously accepted that the buyer may reduce the price in proportion to the lower value of the defective goods.

See Bianca, La responsabilità, V, 325 ff; Trabucchi, Istituzioni di diritto civile, 774 ff; Gazzoni, Manuale di diritto privato, 1099 ff.

III. Recovery of the excess paid

7. The rule stated in paragraph (2) under which a party who has paid the full price may recover the excess is widely accepted, see GERMAN CC § 441(4).

IV. Damages not excluded

8. It is in the nature of things that a party who reduces the price cannot also claim a sum equal to the reduction in value as damages. However, most laws allow the creditor to recover damages for further loss. See e.g. AUSTRIAN CC § 933a; § 933a(2) states in addition to the possibility to claim damages for further loss that also the reduction in value itself can found a claim for damages if the badly performing party was at fault. Compensation in such a case is modelled according to the provisions on bad performance. CC § 2(1) last sentence stating, that "in all cases, the transferor is liable for damages caused by his fault" or CZECH law (CC arts. 420 ff, 510, 519). See also CISG art. 45(2). In GREECE, however, damages and reduction of price exclude each other, but further loss may be recovered: Deliyannis & Kornilakis I 243-244. GERMAN law had the same solution until 2002, when it was abolished by CC § 325. Under ITALIAN law reduction of price can be cumulated with a claim for damages (see Cass. 2000/7718; Cass. 2001/15481 and 2004/6044. Pursuant to CC art. 1494 (2), the buyer can also recover damages caused by defective goods. Under SPANISH law the creditor can recover damages if the debtor acted in bad faith (CC art. 1486(2)), but case law since TS 6 May 1911 (Jur. Civ. T. 121, no. 53) has extended this rule to any debtor in fault. In POLISH law, in sale contracts, price reduction can be cumulated with a claim for damages (CC art. 561 § 3). ESTONIAN court practice (Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 30 November 2005, civil matter no. 3-2-1-131-05) has confirmed that damages for the same interest as is remedied by the price reduction cannot be claimed; damages for other types of loss is not excluded (see also Varul et al (-Kõve) § 112 no. 8). The same applies in SLOVENIAN Loa § 468(2).

V. Systems not having price reduction

9. The remedy of price reduction is unknown in ENGLISH and IRISH law but when the non-performance is not excused the law reaches very similar results.

(a) Cases of breach

10. Where goods are defective the prima facie rule is that the buyer can recover as damages the difference between the value of the goods actually delivered and the value which the goods would have had if they had been in accordance with the contract, see Treitel, Remedies §100. Further,

(i) where the performance is incomplete and the price can easily be apportioned, the buyer may treat the contract as apportionable and pay only for the units delivered (e.g. Dawood Ltd. v. Heath Ltd. [1961] 2 Lloyd's Rep 512 (QB));

(ii) the UK Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 53(1) allows the buyer in case of defects to set up certain claims "in diminution or extinction of the price"; and

(iii) the creditor may also - and this applies to all contracts - set off claims arising out of the same transaction against sums otherwise payable.

On (ii) and (iii) see Beale, Remedies 50-52 and Goode, Commercial Law, 621. As in most other countries, further loss may be claimed as damages.

The position is similar in SCOTLAND.

(b) Non-performance excused

11. In cases of frustration the position in ENGLAND is normally governed by the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943 s. 1(3). As a measure, sometimes described as essentially restitutionary (see Robert Goff J. in BP Exploration Co. (Libya) Ltd. v. Hunt (No. 2) [1979] 1 WLR 783, though see also Lawton LJ in the CA [1981] 1 WLR 232), the court may order the return of money paid and payment for benefits (other than money) received before the time of discharge of the obligation, subject to deductions for expenses incurred, see Treitel, Contracts, no. 19-098.

12. In the unusual case where the contract is not frustrated but non-performance of part of the obligation is excused, whether the price may be reduced will probably depend on whether the performance can easily be apportioned, see (a)(i) above.

13. In SCOTLAND if a contract is frustrated the obligations of the parties under the contract cease but there may be an equitable adjustment of the rights of the parties under the principles of unjustified enrichment (Cantiere San Rocco v. Clyde Shipbuilding and Engineering Co 1923 S.C. (H.L.) 105).

Section 7: Damages and interest

III.–3:701: Right to damages

(1) The creditor is entitled to damages for loss caused by the debtor's non-performance of an obligation, unless the non-performance is excused.

(2) The loss for which damages are recoverable includes future loss which is reasonably likely to occur.

(3) "Loss" includes economic and non-economic loss. "Economic loss" includes loss of income or profit, burdens incurred and a reduction in the value of property. "Non-economic loss" includes pain and suffering and impairment of the quality of life.

COMMENTS

A. Scope of Article

The Article covers damages for non-performance of an obligation which is within the scope of these rules. It does not apply to damages recoverable under Book VI (Non-Contractual Liability Arising out of Damage Caused to Another); they are recoverable not for non-performance of an obligation but for breach of a more general duty not to harm others in certain ways or circumstances. Also the rules in this Section are not intended to be used, or used without modification, in relation to damages for non-performance of public law obligations or family law obligations.

It has already been noted that damages cannot normally be recovered for non-performance of a monetary obligation unless there are exceptional circumstances which make interest an insufficient remedy. It follows that there could not normally be a claim for damages for non-payment of an award of damages.

B. No damages without loss

This Article enables the creditor to recover damages whenever the creditor suffers loss from the debtor's unjustified failure to perform an obligation. The section does not provide for nominal damages for a breach which has caused the creditor no loss.

A few of the laws permit the creditor in particular circumstances to recover the gains made by the debtor through the non-performance, even if these exceed the loss to the creditor. The situations are so limited that this approach has not been adopted in these rules.

C. No fault necessary

Where a debtor's obligation is to produce a given result, failure to do so entitles the creditor to damages whether or not there has been fault by the debtor, except where performance is excused. Where the obligation is not to produce a result but merely to use reasonable care and skill the debtor is liable only if that obligation has not been performed, that is to say if the debtor has not exercised the care and skill required. In the absence of a term specifying the required degree of care and skill, this is equivalent to the commission of a fault.

Illustration 1
A contracts to supply and install in B's house a central heating system that will provide a temperature of up to 22 degrees when the outside temperature is no greater than 0 degrees. A installs the system but despite the exercise of all reasonable care and skill on its part the maximum temperature it can achieve is 18 degrees. A is liable for damages.

Illustration 2
A, a surgeon undertakes to carry out a major operation on B. Despite all reasonable care and skill on A's part, the operation is unsuccessful. A is not liable, for the undertaking was merely to act with due care and professional skill, not to guarantee a successful outcome.

D. All forms of failure in performance covered

This Article applies to all forms of failure in performance. There is no requirement that the creditor serve a notice to perform before being able to recover damages for delay.

Illustration 3
S agrees to build a boat for B for €100,000. No time for completion is fixed by the contract but a reasonable time would be six months. S takes nine months to complete the boat and make it available to B. S is liable for damages for the delay, whether or not B has given notice requiring the boat to be finished within a given period.

E. Loss that would not have occurred without the failure in performance

The creditor may not recover damages for loss not caused by the failure to perform. However, not every intervening event, even if unforeseeable, which exacerbates the loss falls within this principle. The question in each case is whether that event would have had an impact on the loss if the failure in performance had not occurred. Only if this question is answered in the affirmative will the event in question be treated as breaking the chain of causation.

Illustration 4
S agrees to sell to B machinery which S knows is required by B to manufacture goods in its factory. The machinery is due to be delivered on 1st June but S fails to make delivery. B is losing profit at the rate of €10,000 for each week's delay. This is a normal level of profit for a business of this kind. On 29th June a fire breaks out in B's factory, which is burnt to the ground. On 16th July S delivers the machinery. B, which would not have been able to put the machinery to use elsewhere during this period, can recover €40,000 damages for the loss of profit up to 29th June but nothing for loss suffered beyond that date.

Illustration 5
In June a company, S, in London agrees to sell a quantity of machine guns to a weapons dealer, B, in Serbia for £50,000, the guns to be shipped by 30th September against payment. In July S decides that it does not wish to support B's arms business and informs B that it does not intend to ship the guns. In August the British government places an embargo on the exportation of arms to the former Yugoslavian Republics and this is still in force when B's claim for damages is heard 18 months later. B is not entitled to damages.

Illustration 6
In June S in Paris contracts to sell a Seurat painting to B in Hamburg for €1,000,000, the painting to be shipped to B in Hamburg by the end of August. Because of the delays on the part of its staff S is unable to arrange shipment earlier than 1st October. On 5th September the French government impose a ban on the exportation of works of art without a licence, and despite using its best endeavours S is unable to obtain a licence to export the Seurat painting. The value of the painting at the end of August is considered by experts to be €2,000,000. B is entitled to damages of €1,000,000, the difference between the value of the painting and its price, since but for S's delay in shipping the painting its export would not have been affected by the ban.

F. Non-economic loss

Recoverable loss is not confined to economic or pecuniary loss but may cover, for example, pain and suffering, inconvenience, mental distress and any other impairment of the quality of life resulting from the failure to perform.

Illustration 7
A books a package holiday from B, a travel organisation. The package includes a week in what is described as spacious accommodation in a luxury hotel with excellent cuisine. In fact, the bedroom is cramped and dirty and the food is appalling. A is entitled to recover damages for the inconvenience and loss of enjoyment suffered.

Of the issues dealt with by this Article, the recovery of damages for non-economic loss, particularly for disappointment, is the principal one on which the national laws differ: see Case C-168/00 Simone Leitner v TUI Deutschland [2002] ECR I-2631. Paragraph (3) follows the guidance given by the ECJ in that case.

G. Future loss

The loss recoverable by the creditor includes future loss, that is, loss expected to be incurred after the time damages are assessed. This requires the court to evaluate two uncertainties, namely the likelihood that future loss will occur and its amount. As in the case of accrued loss before judgment this covers both prospective expenditure which would have been avoided but for the non-performance and gains which the creditor could reasonably have been expected to make if the non-performance had not occurred. Future loss often takes the form of the loss of a chance.

Illustration 8
E is appointed sales manager of F's business under a three-year service contract. She is to be paid a salary and a commission on sales. After 12 months E is wrongfully dismissed, and despite reasonable efforts to find an alternative post she is still out of work when her action for wrongful dismissal is heard six months later. E is entitled to damages not only for her accrued loss of six months salary but also for the remaining 18 months of her contract, due allowance being made for her prospects of finding another job meanwhile. She is also entitled to damages for loss of the commission she would probably have earned.

NOTES

I. Loss

1. It is a common feature of the legal systems in the European Union that damages are awarded only if and to the extent that the creditor has suffered a loss as a consequence of the non-performance of the debtor's obligation. This applies both to pecuniary and to non-pecuniary loss. See on the latter note 4 below. There are however some exceptions. In ENGLISH and IRISH law, apart from recent case law on "restitutionary damages", it is recognised that even if the creditor has suffered no loss, nominal damages are allowed in case of breach of contract. In SCOTLAND, while what are described as nominal damages have been awarded, it would appear that in the cases concerned there has been loss in the form of inconvenience, see McBryde. paras. 22.98-22.100; Mack v. Glasgow City Council 2006 SC 543.

2. In FRANCE, there are some exceptions to the compensatory nature of damages (i.e.: a loss must have been suffered); when the obligation is to abstain from doing something, CC art. 1145 provides that the mere violation of this obligation gives rise to damages and case law has applied this text on several occasions where no loss had been suffered (Cass.civ. 1re, 31 May 2007, D. 2007.2974, obs. B. Fauvarque-Cosson) ; moreover, it results from the distinction between the concept of « reparation » and that of « execution » that no prejudice is required when forced "execution" is asked for A. Bénabent, Les obligations, § 403-1 (Bénabent, n ° 403-1).

3. Subject to these exceptions, the legal systems seem to agree that damages are not awarded if there has been a gain for the defaulting debtor but no loss to the creditor. Nor are punitive damages awarded.

II. Strict liability or fault liability

4. Some laws impose strict liability on the defaulting party, others require fault, and others again have a mixed system, where the defaulting party is strictly liable in some cases but liable only for fault in other cases.

III. Notice

(a) Notice of non-performance not required

5. Notice of the non-performance is not a condition for claiming damages in ENGLISH, SCOTTISH or IRISH law. Performance is due without demand even when no time for performance has been set. The same rule is followed in CISG as far as delay of performance is concerned, see Treitel, Remedies § 115; on defects see (b) below. It is the same under ESTONIAN law. A notice is not required under POLISH law or under CZECH law, neither for a claim for damages nor for any other effects of delay (POLISH CC art. 476 and CZECH CC §§ 517, 420 ff and Ccom art. 373). The position is the same in SLOVENIAN law (see LOA § 239). A notice is not generally required under SLOVAK law. But special notice of defects (given without delay) is necessary in a sale (CC § 599(1)) and works (CC § 649).

(b) Notice of non-performance necessary

6. Several laws require that the creditor gives notice of the non-performance. However, the effects of the notice vary.

7. In a sale of goods between merchants, GERMAN Ccom § 377 and AUSTRIAN UGB Ccom §§ 377 and 378 require notice of defects to be given without delay, or the buyer will lose all remedies, including the claim for damages. The same rule applies for all sales in DENMARK, see SGA § 52, and in CISG, see art. 39. See also DUTCH CC art. 7:23 and ESTONIAN LOA § 220 (contracts of sales) and similar provision for contracts of services (LOA § 644) and the FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CC art. 1648. The AUSTRIAN CC § 933 deprives the buyer of the right to damages for defects if the seller is not sued within certain time limits, i.e. within two years as from the date the defect is known and within 6 months respectively. In Belgian law this is considered to be an application of a more general rule based on good faith: Cass. 8 April 1988, Arr.Cass. no. 482; Foriers 261 no. 4; M.E. Storme Invloed no. 461 ff. See also GREEK CC arts. 554-558 which used to provide for a six-month prescription, but now, after their amendment by art. 1 § 1 of l.3043/2002, provide for a prescription period of 2 years; ITALIAN CC art. 1495.on sales contracts which requires the buyer to give notice of non-conformity of the goods within eight days of its discovery and is applicable to claims for damages as well (see Cass. 3 August 2001, no. 10728 in Giust. Civ. 2002, I, 2234 ff) See also FINNISH and SWEDISH SGA §§ 29 and 59, see Ramberg, Köplagen 371 and 573 f.

8. Most other rules requiring notice do not deprive the creditor who has not given notice, or sued the other party within certain time limits, of all rights. However, whether notice has been given has other effects. Damages may not be recovered unless notice has been given. Notice may also increase the debtor's liability: damages for delay will start to run, and some losses will be recoverable, only if they occur after notice has been given. On notice, see FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CC arts. 1139 and 1146; SPANISH CC art. 1100; ITALIAN CC art. 1219; AUSTRIAN CC § 904 (Mahnung; the notice that requests the debtor to perform if no date is stipulated in the contract); DUTCH CC art. 6:82; and GREEK CC art. 340. See also Treitel, Remedies §§ 111-114.

IV. Non-pecuniary loss

9. Non-pecuniary loss may be pain and inconvenience following from physical harm or from disappointment or vexation, and may be due to attacks on a person's personality, reputation or honour or to the death of a spouse or other closely related person. The legal systems differ not only in the extent to which they award damages but also as to which harm they will compensate. The European Court of Justice, when interpreting the Package Travel Directive, asked the member states to provide the consumer with a claim for non-pecuniary loss, ECJ 12 march 2002, ECJRep 2002, I-2631 nos. 23 et seq. (Simone Leitner/TUI Deutschland); a similar tendency was shown in some anti-discrimination cases, see e.g. ECJ 10 April 1984, ECJRep 1984, 1891, no. 28 (Colson and Kamann).

(a) Préjudice moral

10. Important developments have occurred in FRANCE and BELGIUM. Non-pecuniary damages were formerly seldom awarded, but today damages are allowed for "préjudice moral" which includes damages for attacks on a person's honour or reputation, loss of a closely related person, certain kinds of physical harm which do not entail economic loss (loss of sense of smell, disfiguring scar) and disappointment. See Viney, Conditions nos. 253 ff.; Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, pp. 454-455 and Treitel, Remedies, § 156.

11. PORTUGUESE law also provides rules on damages for non-pecuniary loss; see Telles 383, Jorge 597 and Costa, Obrigações 549 ff, Leitão I 318 and II 256, as well as several court decisions. So does SPANISH law, Supreme Court 9 May 1984, 13 December 1984, 16 December 1986, 3 June 1991 (Lacruz-Delgado, II, 1, § 27, 211-212; Díez-Picazo II, 688. CZECH law protects a right of personhood (CC § 13). A monetary compensation can be allowed for if the individual's dignity or reputation in society was diminished (CC § 13.2).

(b) Pain and suffering and disappointment distinguished

12. In ENGLISH law damages for non-pecuniary loss such as pain and suffering or physical inconvenience may be recovered for breach of contract: e.g. Godley v. Perry [1960] 1 W.L.R. 9, Q.B.; Hobbs v L.S.W.R. (1875) LR 10 Q.B. 111, C.A. However, damages are not awarded for vexation or disappointment unless the contract was specifically meant to provide enjoyment (e.g. a package holiday contract: Jarvis v. Swan Tours Ltd. [1973] QB 233 (CA)) or to give peace of mind (Heywood v. Wellers [1976] QB 446 (CA)): see Bliss v. SETRHA [1985] I.C.R. 700 (CA). These authorities have been followed in IRELAND, see Clark 461. SCOTTISH law seems to be similar to English law, see e.g. Diesen v. Samson 1971 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 49 McBryde, paras. 22.104-22.105. In AUSTRIAN law, damages for pain and suffering may be recovered in both contractual and non-contractual cases (CC § 1325; see also § 1331). General recovery of non-pecuniary losses is unrestricted, see (c) below. In CZECH law damages for pretium doloris are limited (see CC § 444). Under ESTONIAN law non-pecuniary loss is defined primarily as physical and emotional distress and suffering and is generally recoverable (LOA § 128(5)). However, recovery of non-pecuniary loss arising form non-performance of a contractual obligation may only be claimed if the purpose of the obligation was to pursue a non-pecuniary interest and, under the circumstances relating to entry into the contract or to the non-performance, the debtor was aware or should have been aware that non-performance could cause non-pecuniary loss (LOA § 134(1)). A special rule on package travel contracts provides for non-pecuniary damages for wasted holiday (LOA § 877(2)).

(c) Limited recovery for non-pecuniary loss

13. ITALIAN, GERMAN, DANISH, FINNISH, GREEK, POLISH and DUTCH law will only allow damages for non-pecuniary loss if this is provided for by statute; see, e.g. GERMAN CC § 253(1); Treitel, Remedies § 157. The ITALIAN CC art. 2059 limits recovery in non-contractual cases to situations where the defendant's conduct amounts to a criminal offence, which excludes non-pecuniary damages for non-performance of contractual obligations (see Cian & Trabucchi arts. 1223 and 2059; Mari in Antoniolli – Veneziano, Principles of European Contract Law and Italian Law – A Commentary, 443 ff and Gazzoni, Manuale di diritto privato, 641 ff). In GERMANY the rule in CC § 253(2) on non-pecuniary damages for bodily harm and false imprisonment applies to both contractual and non-contractual liability, but not where the claim was contractual only. Additionally, CC § 651 f entitles a customer to a reasonable compensation for a wasted holiday where a supplier of travel facilities through breaking the contract has prevented or seriously prejudiced the customer's journey, and the Equal Treatment Act §§ 15(2), 21(2) sent. 3 provides for a reasonable compensation in cases of discrimination. In AUSTRIA, an influential writer has argued that all types of non-pecuniary loss may be recovered if there has been gross negligence: F. Bydlinski JBlJbl 1965, 173, 237. The state of the law is, however, that non-pecuniary loss is generally – and despite CC § 1323 – only compensated if this is expressly provided by statute (see CC §§ 1325 and 1330). The courts have recently expanded the possibility of claiming damages for non-pecuniary loss in the case of death also for relatives and close friends (see OGH 16 June 1994, ZVR 1995/46 if relatives need medical treatment for the shock after notice of the death - Schockschaden; OGH 16 May 2001, ZVR 2001/73 for "normal" grief after the death of a close relative in cases of gross negligence - Trauerschaden). In DENMARK and the NETHERLANDS non-pecuniary damages are mostly available in cases of non-contractual liability but the rules such as CC art. 6:106 and Danish Damages Act 1984 §§ 3 and 26 may in certain cases also apply to contractual liability; see on DUTCH law CC arts. 6:95 and 6:106, and on DANISH law, Vinding Kruse 345 ff; similarly SWEDISH law, see Hellner and Radetzki, Skadeståndsrätt, 366 and FINNISH law, see Taxell, Skadestånd 183. On GREEK law, see CC art. 299 (only for non-contractual liability and where personality rights have been infringed) and Ligeropoulos, Erm.AK art. vol. II/1 299 nos. 2-4, 8 (1949), who criticizes the existing rule, cf. also Stathopoulos, in Georgiadis and Stathopoulos, art. 299 nos. 4-7, Stathopoulos, Obligations, § 8 nos. 64-68. Equally this is seen in POLISH law, where recovery for non-pecuniary loss can be claimed only in cases of non-contractual liability when personality rights have been infringed (CC arts. 445 and 448). This strict limitation is being criticized by writers (see M. Safjan, Naprawienie krzywdy niemajątkowej w ramach odpowiedzialności ex contractu [in:] Odpowiedzialność cywilna. Księga pamiątkowa ku czci Profesora Adama Szpunara [Ed. M. Pyziak-Szafnicka], Kraków 2004, pp. 255-280). It seems that a general admission of recovery of non-pecuniary loss in contract would require a legislative change. The same is true in SLOVENIAN law, see LOA §§ 178–185. CZECH law recognise regulated damages for pretium doloris but damages for pretium affectionis are excluded (Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová, p. 545).

V. Future loss

14. All the legal systems allow damages for loss which will occur after the day damages are assessed provided the loss is not too remote. Such loss may follow from the death of a breadwinner (spouse or parent) or personal disablement, where recoverable as contract damages, and from loss of future profit. See for instance CISG art. 74 and, on the indemnity which the commercial agent whose contract with the principal has been ended may claim for future commissions, art. 17 of the Council Directive of 18 December 1986 (86/653 EC). In some legal systems damages are awarded even if the loss is to some extent speculative. Under AUSTRIAN law, recoverability of loss of future profits is, according to CC §§ 1324, 1325 and 1331, dependent on the degree of fault: lost profits may only be recovered if the injury is attributable to the debtor's intentional or grossly negligent act. However, the dependants of a person who has been killed may claim compensation for loss of support from the person who caused the death irrespective of the degree of fault. In AUSTRIA a future loss as described in the rule is treated as positiver Schaden and is compensated, because the high degree of expectation already constitutes a value that is recoverable. This is to be distinguished from entgangener Gewinn which is a value the party suffering from the damage might have achieved if the damaging event had not occurred. Whether such a loss is compensated depends on the degree of fault (see CC §§ 1323, 1324). Admittedly it is very often not easy to draw a clear distinction (see Koziol/Welser II, 13th ed., 304).

15. For the rules on delay see HUNGARIAN CC § 299. Under paragraph (1) the debtor must reimburse the creditor for damages caused by the debtor's delay, unless the debtor is able to prove that the debtor has acted in the manner that can generally be expected in the given situation in order to prevent such delay. (exculpation). Under paragraph (2) if the debtor is unable to offer any reasonable excuse for the delay, the debtor is liable for all loss caused by the delay, unless the debtor is able to prove that such loss would have occurred regardless. In relation to monetary obligations, under CC § 301(4) creditors are entitled to demand compensation for losses in excess of the default interest. Under CC § 303(1) a creditor must reimburse the debtor for losses originating from the creditor's delay, unless the creditor can prove that the creditor has acted in the manner that can generally be expected in the given situation in order to prevent the default. Under CC § 303(2) an creditor, irrespective of whether the fault is excused (a) must reimburse the expenses originating from debtor's responsible custody (b) bears the risk of the destruction, loss, or damage of a thing as if the performance had been duly accepted and (c) is not entitled to any interest for the duration of the default. In the case of non-conformity, under CC § 310, apart from guarantee rights, the creditor is entitled to demand compensation for loss resulting from lack of conformity under the rules on delict. Under CC § 312(1) if performance has become impossible for a reason for which neither of the parties is liable, the contract is extinguished. The party gaining knowledge of the impossibility of performance should immediately notify the other party thereof. The party failing to notify is liable for any resulting loss. Under paragraph (2) of that article if performance has become impossible for a reason for which the debtor is liable, the creditor may demand damages for non-performance. Under paragraph (3) if performance has become impossible for a reason for which the creditor is liable, the debtor is relieved of the obligation and is entitled to demand compensation for resulting loss. Under CC § 318(1) the provisions on delictual liability are applied to liability for non-performance of contractual obligations and to the extent of damages, with the difference that such damages may not be reduced, unless otherwise prescribed by legal regulation.

16. See generally Treitel, Remedies, Chapter IV.

III.–3:702: General measure of damages

The general measure of damages for loss caused by non-performance of an obligation is such sum as will put the creditor as nearly as possible into the position in which the creditor would have been if the obligation had been duly performed. Such damages cover loss which the creditor has suffered and gain of which the creditor has been deprived.

COMMENTS

A. Scope of Article

The Article applies only to the measure of damages for loss caused by non-performance of an obligation. It does not therefore apply to damages for loss caused by other conduct, however, reprehensible it may be and even if it amounts to a clear breach of some general duty, such as the duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. In such cases, any remedy for breach of the duty will depend on the provision creating the duty. For example II.–7:204 (Liability for loss caused by reliance on incorrect information) provides that a party who has concluded a contract in reasonable reliance on incorrect information given by the other party in the course of negotiations has a right to damages for loss suffered as a result if the provider of the information believed the information to be incorrect or had no reasonable grounds for believing it to be correct. Here the damages are not designed to put the party in the position which would have prevailed if the information had been correct but rather in the position which would have prevailed if no contract had been concluded in reliance on the information. Similarly II.–7:214 (Damages for loss) provides that damages for loss suffered as a result of being induced to conclude a contract by mistake, fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation should generally be such as to place the creditor as nearly as possible in the position in which the creditor would have been if the contract had not been concluded.

B. Nature of interest protected

This Article combines the widely accepted "expectation interest" basis of damages for non-performance of an obligation and the traditional rule of "damnum emergens" and "lucrum cessans" of Roman law, namely that the creditor is entitled to compensation of such amount as will provide the value of the defeated expectation. In a contract for the sale of goods or supply of services this is usually measured by the difference between the contract price and the market or current price; but where the creditor has made a cover transaction then in the conditions set out in III.–3:706 (Substitute transaction) the creditor can elect to claim the difference between the contract price and the cover price. The sums recoverable as general damages embrace both expenditure incurred and gains not made. Damages under this Article are not intended to provide restitution of benefits received; this remedy may however be available on termination of a contract in the circumstances described in III.–3:510 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) .

Illustration 1

S sells a car to B for €5,000, warranting that it is an X model. In fact it is an S model, an older version the market value of which is €1,500 less than the value of an X model. The contract price is not as such relevant to the computation of damages. S is entitled to damages of €1,500, the difference between the value of the car as warranted and its value as delivered.

C. Other loss

In addition to the primary claim for loss of what was due (that is, the loss which any creditor would be likely to suffer from the non-performance) the creditor can recover for foreseeable loss resulting from the particular circumstances. Such loss is sometimes termed "consequential loss".

Illustration 2
B buys a washing machine in a sale at a special price of €200. The normal cost is €300. Because of a serious defect in the machine, garments put into it for washing, worth €50, are ruined. On rejecting the machine B is entitled to recover not only the price paid and €100 for loss of bargain but also the sum of €50 for consequential loss.

The damages recoverable may include a sum to represent interest upon the amount of the loss from the date at which the loss was incurred to the date of payment.

D. Computation of losses and gains

The creditor must bring into account in reduction of damages any compensating gains which offset the loss; only the balance, the net loss, is recoverable. Similarly, in computing gains of which the creditor has been deprived, the cost which would have been incurred in making those gains is a compensating saving which must be deducted to produce a net gain. Compensating gains typically arise as the result of a cover transaction concluded by the creditor. But it is for the debtor to show that the transaction generating the gains was indeed a substitute transaction, as opposed to a transaction concluded independently of the default. A compensating saving occurs where the future performance from which the creditor has been discharged as the result of the non-performance would have involved the creditor in expenditure.

Illustration 3
O, a construction company which owns a piece of equipment for which it has no immediate need, enters into an agreement to lease the equipment to H for a year at a rental of €1000 a month. After three months, O terminates the lease and repossesses the equipment because of H's default in payment of the rent. Two months later, O succeeds in re-letting the equipment for seven months at a rent of €1200 a month. O is entitled to the rent due and unpaid at the time it terminated the original lease and to damages for loss of future rental income, but its claim for the two months' loss of rent after termination, i.e. €2000, is reduced by €1400, the additional rental it will receive over the remaining 7 months of the original agreement.

Illustration 4
S, a commodity dealer, contracts to sell to B 50 tonnes of soybean meal at a price of €300,000 a tonne for delivery on 1st August. On that date, when the price of soybean meal has fallen to €250,000 a tonne, B fails to take up and pay for the meal. A week later S sells 50 tonnes of soybean meal to C at €375,000 a tonne. Even if the market price rule (that is to say the rule that, in the case of goods of a kind available on a market, the normal measure of damages is taken to be the difference between contract price and market price) did not apply, S would not have to bring into account in its claim against B the extra profit on its sale to C, in the absence of evidence that its transaction was a substitute for the contract with B.

E. "Unless otherwise provided"

The measure of damages set out in the Article applies only unless otherwise provided. We have already seen that some of these model rules provide for other measures of damages, typically damages designed to place a person in the position which would have prevailed in the absence of acting in reliance on something. The particular rules mentioned above in Comment A do not relate to damages for non-performance of an obligation. Nonetheless it is perfectly conceivable that a rule relating to a particular kind of obligation could provide for a special measure of damages. This possibility is left open by the Article.

NOTES

I. Expectation interest

1. The legal systems seem to agree that the general measure of damages should be such as to put the creditor into the position which would have existed if the debtor's contractual obligations had been duly performed. In ENGLISH law this measure of damages has come to be called the expectation interest (see Fuller & Perdue (1936) 46 Yale L.J. 52), in GERMANY and AUSTRIA (see e.g. Koziol/Welser II, 13th ed., 308) "positives Interesse" or "Erfüllungsinteresse", in CZECH REPUBLIC "to co poškozenému ušlo», e.g. profit lost by the injured party, see CC § 442.1. It is contrasted with the reliance interest which aims at putting the creditor into the position which would have existed if the contract had not been concluded (German "Vertrauensinteresse"). On this distinction see in DENMARK, Gomard, Obligationsret II 143 ff; ENGLAND, Treitel, Remedies, § 82, and on the expectation interest Robinson v. Harman (1848) 1 Ex. 850, 855; SCOTLAND, McBryde paras. 22.92-22.930; FINLAND, Aurejärvi 132-136; GERMANY, Schlechtriem and Schmidt-Kessel, Schuldrecht, Allgemeiner Teil[6], 144 et seq.; AUSTRIA, Kozoil, I 34; ITALY, Visintini 196; SWEDEN, Ramberg. Köplagen 112, 649 and Herre, Ersättningar, 301. In FRENCH law writers are generally unfamiliar with the distinction, see Treitel, Remedies § 89. But in SPAIN, it is increasingly accepted (Díez Picazo II, 683). Under POLISH law this distinction is widely accepted: it derives from the very nature of damages, that the measure should put the creditor into the position in which the creditor would have been if the obligation had been duly performed. This distinction is also accepted in SLOVENIAN law (Plavšak in Juhart/Plavšak, 225). The distinction is also made in ESTONIAN legal doctrine (e.g. Varul et al (-Sein) § 127 no. 4.4.) and court practice (Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 21 October 2003, civil matter no. 3-2-1-106-03). In PORTUGAL, the measure of damages (positive or negative interest) when cumulated with termination is a controversial matter. The majority of authors and court decisions consider only the negative interest (see v.g. Telles, 463 f, Varela, II 109, Costa, 976, Leitão, II 267 f) . A minority, though with reflexes in case law, argue for a positive interest (see Vaz Serra, 204 ff, Machado, 175 ff, Prata, 479 ff).

II. Loss and gain

2. That damages generally may cover both actual loss suffered and lost gain is expressly provided in FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CC art. 1149, (under French law, judges have a "pouvoir souverain d'appréciation" in the evaluation the amount of the damages, i.e.: there is no control by the Cour de cassation), GREEK CC art. 298, GERMAN CC § 252, ITALIAN CC art. 1223, POLISH CC art. 361 § 2, DUTCH CC art. 6:96, ESTONIAN LOA § 128(2), PORTUGUESE CC art. 564(1), CZECH law

("actual damages and profit lost", see CC art. 442.1; Ccom art. 379) and SPANISH CC art. 1106; see also CISG art. 74. SLOVAK CC § 442(1) provides in general terms that the compensation shall include compensation for what the damaged party lost, but the scope of the loss is disputable. SCOTTISH law does not presently allow recovery of the contract-breaker's gain: Teacher v. Calder (1899) 1 F. (H.L.) 39; McBryde, para. 22.94. The same is true in SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 243. In AUSTRIA compensation for loss and gain is dependent on the degree of fault unless the gain the creditor has been deprived of was to be expected with certainty (see CC §§ 1323 and 1324).

3 The legal systems seem to agree that damages are not awarded if there has been a gain for the defaulting debtor but no loss to the creditor, save that in ENGLISH law "restitutionary damages" exceeding the creditors' loss may be recoverable in exceptional circumstances. They have been awarded particularly when the defendant acted deliberately to make a profit and the creditor, though not suffering any provable loss, had a legitimate interest in preventing the debtor from so doing: Attorney-General v. Blake [2001] 1 AC 268; see Chitty on Contracts, paras. 26-022 ff. Nor are punitive damages awarded.

III. Consequential loss

4. Damages for loss due to personal injury and damage to property (other than the thing contracted for) are allowed in most of the legal systems, see for ENGLAND, McGregor, Damages §§ 57 ff; for SCOTLAND, McBryde, para. 22.114; for GERMANY, CC §§ 280(1), 241(2) and for POLAND see T. Dybowski, System Prawa Cywilnego (vol. III, part 1), pp. 217-221. However, under AUSTRIAN law recovery of "loss of profits" in addition to "positive damage" (loss suffered) is, according to CC §§ 1323, 1324, provided only if the party responsible is to blame for gross negligence (see CC §§ 1323, 1324). Except for personal injury, the principle of non-cumul in ESTONIAN law provides that damage arising from the non-performance of a contractual obligation, if the objective of the contractual obligation was other than to prevent the damage for which compensation is claimed, can only be recovered under rules of delictual liability, i.e. including requirement of fault ((LOA §§ 127(2), 1044(2)). According to the Roman precedents, SPANISH CC art. 1486 grants an action for compensation of consequential loss only in case of fraud of the seller. However, case law has totally overcome this limitation (see TS 19 April 1928, Colecc. Legisl. N. 53; TS 8 November 1997, RAJ (1997), 7891). ITALIAN case law allows the aggrieved party the possibility to recover also indirect damages falling within the scope of the regular consequences of non-performance according to a probability and reasonableness test (Cass. 6 March 1997, no. 2009 in Giust. Civ. Mass. 1997 and Cass. 9 May 2000, no. 5913 in Giust. Civ. Mass 2000).

5. In CZECH law compensation for personal injury is not considered as damages stricto sensu. Under the special civil rule (CC § 13), an individual has a right to an elimination of the consequences of an unjustified interference in the right of personality and only if this appears insufficient, will the individual concerned acquire a right to monetary compensation for detriment suffered.

IV. Loss to be offset by gains

6. It seems to be universally accepted that loss should be offset by the gains which the creditor has made due to the non-performance, see on ENGLISH and GERMAN law Schlechtriem and Schmidt-Kessel, Schuldrecht, Allgemeiner Teil[6], 164 et seq.; SCOTTISH law, McBryde, para. 22.55; DANISH law, Bryde Andersen and Lookofsky 255; FINNISH law, Sevon-Wilhelmsson and Koskelo, 87; FRENCH law, Cass.req. 1

January 1927, D.H.27.65; ITALIAN law, Cass. 5 April 1990 no. 2802 in Mass. Foro It. 1990; GREEK law, Stathopoulos, Georgiadis and Stathopoulos, arts. 297-298 nos. 87-111; POLISH law, T. Dybowski, System Prawa Cywilnego (t. III, part 1), pp. 303-305; PORTUGUESE law, Telles 392 and Costa, Obrigações 722 f; BELGIAN law, Ronse, nos. 519 ff; DUTCH CC art. 6:100; ESTONIAN LOA § 127(5); CZECH law (see for instance CC § 442, compensation provided for actual damages) and SPANISH law, Supreme Court 17 February 1925, 19 November 1928, 20 June 1953, 13 May 1965 (Alabaladejo, II, 1, § 33.3). AUSTRIAN law reaches virtually the same results but distinguishes cases where the application of the rule would not be justified, e.g. in the case of an increased obligation of the father to pay maintenance if his child was hurt in a traffic accident; see Wilburg, JherJB 82, 76 ss. For SLOVENIAN law see LOA § 243(3).

V. Reliance interest

7. Some laws allow the creditor to claim reliance interest instead of expectation interest. This is possible under DANISH law where the creditor can claim it on terminating the contractual relationship, even though thereby put into a better position than if the contract had been performed, see Gomard, Obligationsret II 196 ff. For the position in AUSTRIAN law see Koziol/Welser II, 13th ed., nos. 308 and 323 et seq. GREECE has a specific provision permitting equitable damages. The position in SWEDISH law is unresolved, see Herre, Ersättningar 305. In GERMANY the creditor may claim expenses wasted for a frustrated purpose instead of performance interest, see CC § 284; this claim does not depend on a termination of the contractual relationship but is to be seen as a way to calculate the measure damages.

8. ENGLISH law allows recovery of the reliance interest but this cannot put the creditor in a better position than if the contract had been performed, see Treitel, Remedies § 94. Thus expenditures which are wasted can be recovered as reliance interest, but if these expenditures would not have been recouped if the contract had been performed they cannot be recovered, for this would put the creditor into a better position: C. & P. Haulage Ltd. v. Middleton [1983] 1 WLR 1461. For SCOTTISH law see Macgregor and McBryde, para. 22.94.

9. See generally Treitel, Remedies §§ 75-107.

III.–3:703: Foreseeability

The debtor in an obligation which arises from a contract or other juridical act is liable only for loss which the debtor foresaw or could reasonably be expected to have foreseen at the time when the obligation was incurred as a likely result of the non-performance, unless the non-performance was intentional, reckless or grossly negligent.

COMMENTS

A. Scope of Article

This Article applies only to obligations voluntarily incurred by contract or other juridical act. In such cases the debtor at the time of incurring the obligation has an opportunity to restrict liability in relation to foreseeable losses but not in relation to unforeseeable losses. This consideration does not apply to obligations which arise by operation of law.

The Article also does not apply where the default was intentional, reckless or grossly negligent. In such cases it seems more reasonable to place the risk of a non-foreseeable loss on the debtor rather than on the innocent creditor. A person is reckless if the person knows of an obvious and serious risk of proceeding in a certain way but nonetheless voluntarily proceeds to act without caring whether or not the risk materialises; there is gross negligence if a person is guilty of a profound failure to take such care as is self-evidently required in the circumstances. See Annex 1.

Where the Article does not apply, the normal rules on causation will determine the extent of the debtor's liability.

Not all the laws of the Member States limit damages by a rule of foreseeability; some, for example, use a criterion of "adequate causation". However, the results are usually rather similar to those obtained by employing the foreseeability test, which has been adopted by international conventions such as the CISG (art 74). Cases of intentional, reckless or grossly negligent non-performance are often not expressly excluded from the rule in the national laws, but in practice the courts may well reach this result and the limitation seems a fair one.

B. Foreseeable consequences of failure to perform

The Article sets out the principle by which liability for loss caused by non-performance of a voluntary obligation is limited to what the debtor foresaw or could reasonably be expected to have foreseen, at the time when the obligation was incurred, as the likely consequence of the failure to perform. However, as noted above, the last part of the Article provides a special rule for the case where the default was intentional, reckless or grossly negligent.

B, a stamp dealer, contracts to buy from S for €10,000 a set of stamps, to be delivered to B on 1st June. S fails to deliver the stamps, which on 1st June have a market value of €12,000. The failure is not, however, intentional, reckless or grossly negligent. Because of S's non-performance of the obligation, B is unable to fulfil a contract to resell the collection to T for €25,000. S, though aware that B required the stamps for resale, was not aware that B would resell the stamps as a collection. B is entitled to recover as damages the sum of €2,000, being the difference between the market value of the stamps on 1st June and the sale price. S is not liable for the remaining €13,000 of B's loss, which S could not reasonably have foreseen at the time of contracting to sell the stamps to B.

Illustration 2
Company S sells an animal food compound to B for feeding to pigs. B does not tell A for what breed of pigs the food is required. S negligently supplies a batch of the compound which contains a mild toxin known to cause discomfort to pigs but no serious harm. B's pigs are, however, of an unusual breed which is peculiarly sensitive to the toxin and after being fed with the compound many of the pigs die. S is not liable for the loss since it could not reasonably have foreseen it.

C. Exception for breach which is intentional, reckless or grossly negligent

Although in general the debtor is liable only for loss which the debtor foresaw or could reasonably be expected to have foreseen at the time of the contract, the last part of this Article lays down a special rule in cases of intentional or reckless failure in performance or gross negligence. In this case the damages for which the debtor is liable are not limited by the foreseeability rule and the full damage has to be compensated, even if unforeseeable.

Illustration 3
A contracts with B to construct and erect stands for a major exhibition at which leading electronic firms will display their equipment, hiring the stands from B. A week before the exhibition is due to open A demands a substantial increase in the contract sum. B refuses to pay, pointing out that A's failure to complete the remaining stands will not only cost B revenue but expose B to heavy liability to an exhibitor, C, which intended to use the exhibition to launch a major new product. A nevertheless withdraws its workforce, with the result that C's stand is not ready in time and C claims substantial compensation from B. A's breach being intentional and with knowledge of the likely consequences, the court has to award B an indemnity in respect of its liability to C, even though A could not reasonably have foreseen the magnitude of such liability at the time it made its contract with B. The same may be done even if A was not aware of the serious consequences for B of the intentional breach.

I. Foreseeability

1. As in the Article, ENGLISH law limits liability to foreseeable losses. The rule was stated in Hadley v. Baxendale (1854) 9 Ex. 431 (Court of Exchequer). The defaulting party is liable for loss actually foreseen or which a reasonable person in the same position ought to have foreseen when the contract was made. If a seller of machinery wrongfully delays delivery with the result that the buyer is unable to reap the profits from using the machinery, the buyer may recover the profits, which in the normal course of things would have been made on the machinery. However, the buyer cannot recover the profit which could have been earned on some exceptionally lucrative contracts of which the seller knew nothing, see Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. [1949] 2 KB 528 (CA). See on English law, Treitel, Contracts, 20-083–20-093. This limitation to the foreseeable loss, which has been adopted in CISG art. 74, must be seen in light of the strict contract liability in English law and in CISG. On CISG see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schwenzer) CISG[4], art. 74 no. 74.

2. This foreseeability test is also provided in FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law, see CC art. 1150. In Belgium and France the test is applied broadly: only the possibility of the particular kind of damage needs to have been foreseeable, see respectively Cass., 23 February 1928, Pas. 85 and Cass.com. 1965, D. 1965.449. For regulation corresponding to the present Article see ESTONIAN LOA § 127(3).

3. IRISH, SCOTTISH and DANISH laws are similar to English law, see on Danish law, Gomard, Obligationsret II 179 ff; on Irish law Clark 543 ff; and on Scottish law, McBryde, paras. 22.56-22.90.

4. SPANISH and ITALIAN laws are similar to French law, see Spanish CC art. 1107 (Carrasco, Comentarios, 710 ff) and on Italian CC arts. 1223 and 1225, Visintini 209. There is a similar provision in the SLOVENIAN LOA § 243(1).

5. The foreseeability test is also applied in CZECH commercial law. Compensation is provided for damnum emergens and lucrum cessans but only for damage which the debtor at the inception of the obligation envisaged as a possible result of the breach of obligation. Compensation is provided also for damage which could have been envisaged taking into account the facts of which the debtor was aware or ought to have been aware on taking all due ordinary care (see Ccom art. 379). Nevertheless, in the Czech Republic this principle limiting the liability to foreseeable damages is not generally recognised by civil law where compensation covers the whole actual damage but the civil judge can operate a reasonable reduction of compensation for reasons which merit special consideration (see CC §§ 420, 442, 450).

6. Under SLOVAK law liability is not limited to foreseeable losses, but the court will reduce damages for reasons worthy of special respect. In deciding on the reduction, the court particularly takes account of how the damage arose and of the personal and economic position of the individual who caused the damage; the court also takes account of the position of the injured party. However, a reduction is not admissible if the damage was caused intentionally (CC § 450).

II. "Immediate and direct" consequences

7. In addition to the foreseeability test of art.1150, FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1151 provides that liability for damages is limited to losses which are the "immediate and direct" consequences of the non-performance. It has been questioned whether this additional test adds anything to the foreseeability test, see Treitel, Remedies §§ 140 and 141. In Belgium it is held to add nothing, Cass. 24 June 1977, Pas. 1087. On ITALIAN law see Visintini, Trattato breve della responsabilità civile. Fatti illeciti. Indampimento. Danno risarcibile, 699 ff; Franzoni, Trattato della responsabilità civile. Il danno risarcibile, 18 ff; Monateri, Le fonti delle obbligazioni. La responsabilità civile, 144 ff. In SPANISH CC art. 1107: although the distinction between foreseeability and “directness” of the damages is expressly laid down in the legal provision, case law has not evolved any consequences from it.

III. The principle of "adequate causation"

8. GERMAN law has rejected the foreseeability test and applies instead the theory of "adequate causation". The loss must have been caused by the non-performance and only such kinds of loss as occur in the ordinary course of things are recoverable. However, if there is causation the principle will make the defaulting party liable if the default appreciably increased the possibility of the loss that in fact occurred. In determining whether this was the case the court will apply the standard of an experienced observer at the time of the non-performance.

9. The rule puts the creditor in a better position than under the foreseeability test, as the experienced observer may foresee more than a reasonable person would have at the time the contract was made. The German rule must be seen in the light of the fault principle governing German contract law. On German law, Faust, Die Vorhersehbarkeit des Schadens gemäß Art. 74 Satz 2 UN-Kaufrecht, 1996 and Schlechtriem, ROW 1988, 505 et seq.

10. GREEK and (semble) PORTUGUESE laws seem to follow German law. See on Greek law Ligeropoulos, Pref. to arts. 297-300 nos. 44-46a, 49-50, 53 and Stathopoulos in Georgiadis and Stathopoulos, arts. 297-298 nos. 51-56; on PORTUGUESE law, Varela I. Also 898 ff. AUSTRIAN law applies the test of adequate causation esp. with losses incurred with third parties (see Koziol/Welser II, 13th ed., 311 Koziol, 140); SLOVAK law (CC § 441) and SWEDISH law (see Rodhe, Obligationsrätt 121) also resemble German law. FINNISH law also uses "adequate causation" but in practice elements of foreseeability appear, see Taxell, Skadestånd 178 and Hemmo. SWEDISH and FINNISH laws are also similar to English Law, even if the basis is derived from the principle of adequate causation, see Herre, Ersättningar, 321.

11. POLISH law applies the concept of "normal consequences" (CC art. 361 § 1), which corresponds to the rule of "adequate causation". The debtor is liable for damages resulting from normal consequences of the non-performance, irrespective of the foreseeability of the damage caused to the creditor.

11. The ESTONIAN LOA § 127(2) excludes compensation to the extent that prevention of damage was not the purpose of the obligation or provision due to the non-performance of which the compensation obligation arose (Schutzzwecktheorie known in German dogmatics, see also Varul et al (-Sein) § 127 no. 2). LOA § 127(4) additionally prescribes that a person shall compensate for damage only if the circumstances on which the liability of the person is based and the damage caused are related in such a manner that the damage is a consequence of the circumstances (causation).

IV. "Imputability"

12. DUTCH law applies an imputability test, see CC art. 6:98. Damages can only be recovered for loss which is related to the event which made the debtor liable in such a way that the loss, having regard to its kind and that of the liability, can be imputed to the debtor as a consequence of the event.

V. Intentional non-performance

13. In FRENCH, BELGIAN and ITALIAN law the foreseeability requirement - but not the "directness" requirement - is excluded in case of intentional non-performance (dol - dolo), see French and Belgian CCs arts. 1150 and 1151 and Italian CC art. 1225. In French law gross negligence is regarded as dol; case law also excludes the foreseeability requirement when there is a "faute lourde". On the contrary Italian case law holds that a grossly negligent non-performance cannot be considered equivalent to an intentional non-performance (Cass. 9 February 1956, no. 399 in Rep. Gen. Giur. It. 1956 and Cass. 10 December 1956, no. 4398 in Rep. Gen. Giur. It. 1956). In the same more restrictive sense is BELGIAN case law, see Cass. 18 May 1987, R.W. 1988-89, 1124. SPANISH CC art. 1107(2) is similar to French CC art. 1150 (see Pantaléon, (ADC 1991) 1019-1091 and (1993) 1719-1745). Similarly to the Article, the foreseeability requirement is excluded in case damage is caused intentionally or due to gross negligence under ESTONIAN LOA § 127(3).

14. Under AUSTRIAN law the degree of fault affects the extent of damage to be recovered, since loss of profit is only compensated in the case of gross negligence and intentional wrongdoing, as well as the method of computation (whether based on objective or on subjective criteria).

15. In POLISH law intentional non-performance by itself does not influence the computation method or the scope of liability. The debtor's intentional non-performance may lead to liability even for damages which are not "normal consequences" of the non-performance (compare CC art. 361 § 1) only where the debtor's actions or omissions were taken in order to harm the aggrieved party (cum animo nocendi). The requirement of "non-performance cum animo nocendi" goes further than the French notion of "l'inexécution dolosive".

16. The degree of the debtor's fault is not taken into account as a general rule for the purpose of awarding damages in ENGLAND, GERMANY, IRELAND or SCOTLAND, see Treitel, Remedies, §§ 123-126; McBryde, para. 22.95.

VI. Certainty

17. The systems generally require a sufficient degree of "certainty" of loss in order to award damages, but this is not to be taken literally. In BELGIUM, ENGLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY and SCOTLAND the courts have awarded damages for loss of future profit, which is not always "certain" (for Belgium: Ronse, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 104.1). Damages for the loss of a chance, e.g. to win a beauty contest, have also been awarded, see the English case of Chaplin v. Hicks [1911] 2 KB 786 and, on SCOTTISH law, Hogg and McBryde, paras. 22.78-22.79. See for Belgium Cass. 5 June 2008, stating expressly that the loss of chance is in itself a damage in proportion to the chance that the damage would not have been caused without the non-performance, thus in fact accepting proportional causality (although formulated in terms of damage instead of causality). The GREEK CC art. 298 sentence 2 provides for the recovery of lost profit which probably could have been made in the ordinary course of events or according to the special circumstances.

18. Under ITALIAN law CC art. 1226 provides that if the damages cannot be proved precisely, they are awarded by the judge on an equitable basis (see Gazzoni, Manuale di diritto privato, 641 ff and Bianca, La responsabilità, 165 ff).

19. Under POLISH law the courts require a "reasonable degree of certainty" or "sufficient degree of probability" – see Supreme Court's judgments of October 3rd 1979 (SN 3.10.1979 r., OSNIC 1980, No 9, text 164), of November 11th 1977 (SN 11.11.1977 r., OSNIC 1978, No 9, text 161).

20. See generally Treitel, Remedies, Chapter IV.

III.–3:704: Loss attributable to creditor

The debtor is not liable for loss suffered by the creditor to the extent that the creditor contributed to the non-performance or its effects.

COMMENTS

A. Loss caused by unreasonable action or inaction

This Article embodies the principle that a creditor should not recover damages to the extent that the loss is caused by the creditor's own unreasonable behaviour. It embraces two distinct situations. The first is where the creditor's conduct was a partial cause of the non-performance; the second, where the creditor's conduct, though not in any way responsible for the non-performance itself, exacerbated its loss-producing effects. A third situation, where the loss resulting from the non-performance could have been reduced or extinguished by appropriate steps in mitigation, is covered by the next Article.

B. Conduct contributing to the non-performance

To the extent that the creditor contributed to the non-performance by act or omission the creditor cannot recover the resulting loss. This may be regarded as a particular application of the general rule set out in III.–3:101 (Remedies available) paragraph (3).

Illustration 1
B orders a computer system from S which is to be specially designed to allow B to send to prospective property buyers details of houses coming on to the market which appear to meet their requirements. The computer system fails to operate properly, due partly to a design defect and partly to the fact that B's instructions to S were incomplete. B's loss is irrecoverable to the extent that it results from B's own inadequate instructions.

C. Conduct contributing to the loss-producing effects of non-performance

Where the creditor, though not in any way responsible for the non-performance, exacerbates its adverse effects damages cannot be recovered for the additional loss which results.

Illustration 2
A leases a computer which under the terms of the contract is to be ready for use in England where the voltage is 240v. The computer supplied is capable of operating on various voltages and, contrary to the terms of the contract, is actually set for 110v. A prominent sign pasted on the screen warns the user to check the voltage setting before use. A ignores this and switches on without checking. The computer is extensively damaged and repairs will cost A £1,500. The court may take the view that the loss was at least half A's fault and award only £750 damages.

NOTES

1. See the Notes to the following Article.

III.–3:705: Reduction of loss

(1) The debtor is not liable for loss suffered by the creditor to the extent that the creditor could have reduced the loss by taking reasonable steps.

(2) The creditor is entitled to recover any expenses reasonably incurred in attempting to reduce the loss.

COMMENTS

A. Failure to mitigate loss

Even where the creditor has not contributed either to the non-performance or to its effects, the creditor cannot recover for loss which would have been avoided if the creditor had taken reasonable steps to do so. The failure to mitigate loss may arise either because the creditor incurs unnecessary or unreasonable expenditure or because the creditor fails to take reasonable steps which would result in reduction of loss or in offsetting gains.

Illustration 1
B buys an old car from S for €750. S warrants that the car is in good running order. B discovers that it will cost €1,500 to put the car into good running order, and has this work done although similar cars in good condition are available for €800. B's damages will be limited to €800; the extra amount represents an expenditure which was quite disproportionate to the value of the car as repaired (The result might be different if there were some good reason for B to have repairs done, e.g., the car was unique in that it had once belonged to General de Gaulle).

C hires a camper van for a holiday in Portugal. When C comes to collect the camper van, the car hire company says that it has made a mistake in bookings and no van is available from it, but it has managed to find another company which has a van available at a higher price. Even if C unreasonably ignores this and abandons the holiday, damages should be limited to the loss which would have been suffered if C had acted reasonably in taking the substitute van, namely the difference in cost between the vans and compensation for inconvenience in having to collect the replacement.

The creditor will not necessarily be expected to take steps to mitigate the loss immediately on learning of the debtor’s non-performance; the outcome will depend on whether the creditor’s actions are reasonable in the circumstances.

O engages B, a builder, to come within 24 hours to repair the roof of O's house, which is leaking and causing damage. B does not come within the 24 hours but assures O that the work will be done the next day. It is reasonable for O to wait until the day after before calling in another builder, and O may claim damages resulting from this period of delay; but it may not be reasonable to wait any longer and if O does so O may not recover damages for the resulting additional loss.

The creditor is only expected to take action which is reasonable, or to refrain from action which is unreasonable, in the circumstances. The creditor need not, for example, act in a disreputable way just to reduce the debtor's liability.

D buys goods from E in order to resell them to F. The goods supplied by E are not of proper quality. Although under the terms of its contract with F, D could require F to take the goods without a price reduction, this would be unreasonable in the light of their long-standing business relationship and D gives F a reduction of price. D may recover the amount by which it reduced the price as damages from E.

The principle applies also when there is anticipated non-performance, e.g., when the debtor has announced that the obligation will not be performed when the time comes. The creditor should not incur further expenditure needlessly and should take steps to reduce the loss.

K contracts to build a yacht to L's special design. L has a sudden change of mind and repudiates the contract. If K has done little work on the yacht and would not be able to find a ready buyer for such a unique design of boat, it is reasonable to expect K to stop work; K may recover the cost of the work done to date and the loss of anticipated profit. If, on the other hand, K has done most of the work and can find another buyer at a reasonable price, then K may be expected to complete the boat and resell it. K will be entitled to damages of the difference between the original contract price and the resale price, plus the incidental costs of arranging the resale.

C. Expenses incurred in mitigating loss

Frequently the creditor will have to incur some further expenditure in order to mitigate the loss. This incidental expenditure is also recoverable provided it is reasonable.

Illustration 6
X agrees to buy Y's chalet, which Y had advertised widely. Later X repudiates the contract. Y decides to make a cover transaction. In order to resell the house she has to advertise it again. She is entitled to the reasonable cost of the further advertising as well as to the difference between the price X had agreed to pay and the price for which the chalet was ultimately sold.

D. Reasonable attempts to mitigate which in fact increase the loss

Sometimes a party may take what at the time appears to be a reasonable step to reduce the loss but in fact increases it. The full loss suffered is recoverable.

Illustration 7
G enters a long term supply contract to buy oil from H; deliveries are to commence in six months' time. Three months later oil prices rise rapidly because of a threatened war in the Gulf and H repudiates the contract. G quickly terminates and enters a substitute contract with J at the price then being quoted for delivery three months later. By the time the date for delivery comes the threat of war has receded and G could have bought the oil for the original contract price. G acted reasonably in entering the substitute contract and is entitled to damages based on the difference between the original contract price and the price paid to J.

E. Loss reduced by steps going beyond what could reasonably be expected

Sometimes a creditor will take a step which reduces the loss but which goes beyond what could reasonably be expected. The reduction in loss will still be taken into account, as the creditor is entitled only to damages for actual loss.

NOTES

Notes to this and preceding Article.

I. Loss caused by creditor

(a) Different treatment of loss caused by creditor and "mitigation"

1. Some legal systems treat the creditor's contributory negligence and "duty" to mitigate loss differently. FRENCH cases, which mostly have dealt with non-contractual liability, have admitted that in contracts also contributory negligence by the creditor may reduce the claim for damages. The creditor's act will constitute a cause of exoneration even if it does not constitute force majeure: Civ.1, 31 January 1973, D.1973.149, note Schmelk; see Malaurie and Aynès, Obligations, no. 833. French law does not know mitigation as such, but some similar results may be obtained by the application of the general rule about fault. See Cass.civ. 1, 29 April 1981, JCP 1982, 19730 where damages were reduced, as it was a "fault" of the creditor not to avoid loss due to the negligent non-performance of the debtor, and Paris, 7 January 1924 DP 24.1.143 where the court would not permit the creditor to let the loss grow without notifying the debtor so that the supply of defective goods could be stopped. See also on leases CC art. 1760. Such a result could also be obtained on the basis of the obligation, for both parties, to perform the contract in good faith (Malaurie, Aynès, Stoffel-Munck, no. 963). However, French law is reluctant to impose duties on the creditor. The position is similar in POLISH law, where there is no provision on the creditor's duty to mitigate the loss. According to the general provision of CC art. 362, if the person who sustained a loss contributed towards the occurrence or the extent of the loss, the damages that can be claimed are subject to reduction. This rule is applied in contract law when the creditor contributed towards the loss caused by the debtor's non-performance (see Supreme Court's judgment of November 28th 1974 (SN 28 November 1974, OSNCP 1975, text 133): however there is no general legal duty to mitigate the loss. On SPANISH law, Supreme Court 1960, 15 November 1994 (see Bercovitz, CCJC 1995 § 550; and Díez Picazo, II, § 89) and TS 28 January 2000, CCJC 53, Fernández [también Oliva Blázquez, RdP 5/2000, pp. 203-220].TS 28 January 2000, RAJ 2000/454. On DANISH law see Gomard, Obligationsret II, 177 (duty to mitigate) and 178 (contributory negligence). In SLOVAK law the general provision of CC § 441 applies - if the damage was caused partly by the intention or negligence of the injured party, the injured party must bear a proportionate share; if the damage was caused exclusively by the injured party's intention or negligence, the injured party must bear the loss.
2. In ENGLISH law "contributory negligence" will generally either be no defence to a claim in contract or, on the theory that the loss was not caused by the breach, will lead to no compensation at all. However, a reduction of damages may be allowed in certain cases where the debtor was under a concurrent duty of care in tort and the plaintiff also failed to act carefully, see Treitel, Contract, 20-105–20-112. The creditor's failure to mitigate may lead to a reduction of the damages: ibid., 881-886. The same rule is laid down in CISG art. 77. Furthermore, CISG art. 80 provides that a party may not rely on the failure of the other party to perform, to the extent that such failure was caused by the first party's act or omission. It has been convincingly argued that this rule may be extended by way of the interpretation by analogy rule provided in art. 7(2) so as to allow reduction of damages in case of the creditor's "contribution" to the non-performance, see Bianca and Bonell (-Tallon), art. 80 note 2.5 p. 598, but see v. Caemmerer and Schlechtriem (-Stoll), 677.

3. In SCOTTISH law, mitigation is recognised as a general principle (McBryde, paras. 22.37-22.55), but the creditor's contributory negligence may only be pleaded in breach of contract cases when the breach itself consists in the other party's actionable negligence (whether in contract or delict): McBryde, paras. 22.32-22.36; MacQueen & Thomson, paras. 6.42-6.44; Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act 1945, ss. 1, 4 and 5 (application to Scotland). In IRELAND there is a duty to mitigate the loss, as in England. Furthermore, Civil Liability Act 1961 ss. 2 and 34(1) allow the court to reduce the damages by reason of the defendant's contributory negligence. Similarly in CZECH commercial law, a duty to prevent or mitigate the loss is treated separately from contributory negligence (see Ccom arts. 384 and 376).

(b) Contributory negligence and "duty" to mitigate loss treated alike.

4. Several systems treat the creditor's contributory negligence and "duty" to mitigate the loss on an equal footing. Contributory negligence and failure to mitigate may lead the court to reduce or to disallow the claim for damages. This is the position in GERMANY, see CC § 254(1) dealing with contributory negligence and § 254(2) with the failure to mitigate the loss. For similar regulation in ESTONIAN law, see LOA § 139(1)-(2). The ITALIAN CC has similar provisions in art. 1227(1) treating contributory negligence and in art. 1227(2) dealing with avoidance of loss, see Gorla, which in recent decisions has been extended to cover mitigation of loss: see e.g. Cass. 3 March 1983, no. 1594 in Giust. civ., 1984, I c. 3156. See also AUSTRIAN CC § 1304 and GREEK CC art. 300, covering both contribution to the damage and mitigation of damage, CZECH Civil law (CC §§ 417 and 441) and DUTCH CC art. 6:101; Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht nos. 448 ff, 453. The same is the position in the SLOVENIAN LOA § 243(4). Contributory negligence is treated in the PORTUGUESE CC art. 570 and the "duty" to mitigate may be imposed upon the creditor by way of an analogy of CC art. 570, or under the rule on abuse of right. In BELGIAN law mitigation is treated as a sub-species of contributory negligence, Cass. 14 May 1992; Ronse no. 460 ff; Kruithof, RCJB 1989, 12 ff. It is mentioned as a separate duty only in the Insurance Contracts Act of 25 June 1992, art. 20. The SPANISH CC has no express provision on this topic. However, doctrine seems to consider mitigation as a sub-species of contributory negligence or mora creditoris, Díez-Picazo 733 ff. Recent SPAINSH court decisions support this point of view (TS 14 May 2003, RAJ (2003), 4749; TS 23 May 2005 RAJ (2005) 6364; in fact, the duty to mitigate has become in Spanish case Law the most important application of the "foreseeability" doctrine. In FINLAND SGA § 70 provides an express duty to mitigate the loss. This is seen as connected to the general principle of contributory negligence, Sevón, Wilhelmsson and Koskelo, 94.

II. Expenses incurred

5. The legal systems allow the creditor to recover expenses reasonably incurred in attempts to avoid or mitigate the loss. In the CZECH REPUBLIC, reasonable expenses can be reimbursed and only to the extent of the total sum of the averted damage (CC § 419). The reimbursement can never overrun it (see Jehlička, Švestka, Škárová, p. 492). In some other countries expenses are to be reimbursed even if they increased the total loss, provided they were reasonable. This is the law in AUSTRIA, see e.g. Ehrenzweig (-Mayrhofer), 309; BELGIUM, see esp. Insurance Contracts Act of 25 June 1992 art. 52; DENMARK, see Nørager-Nielsen, 410; ITALY, Cass. 28 April 1988, no. 3209, Archivio civile 1988, 1054, Cian and Trabucchi, art. 1227, 964; GERMANY, BGH 15 November 1978, BGHZ 70, 39 and BGH 1 April 1993, BGHZ 122, 172, 179; ENGLAND, McGregor, Damages §§; SCOTLAND, McBryde, para. 22.44; the NETHERLANDS, CC art. 6:96(2)(a); ESTONIA, LOA § 128(3); SWEDEN, see Ramberg, Köplagen 649 ff. In GREECE the rule is based upon the rule on adequate causation in CC art. 300, or on the benevolent intervention rule in CC art. 736, and in PORTUGAL on the rule in CC art. 566(2) on full compensation. The right to recover expenses incurred is implicit in CISG art. 77, see also art. 74.

6. See generally Treitel, Remedies, §§ 145 ff.

III.–3:706: Substitute transaction

A creditor who has terminated a contractual relationship in whole or in part under Section 5 and has made a substitute transaction within a reasonable time and in a reasonable manner may , in so far as entitled to damages, recover the difference between the value of what would have been payable under the terminated relationship and the value of what is payable under the substitute transaction, as well as damages for any further loss.

COMMENTS

A. Cover transactions

It is often appropriate to measure the creditor's loss by the cost of procuring a substitute performance. Where the creditor has terminated for fundamental non-performance and has made a reasonable cover transaction, this Article provides that the difference between the value of the terminated relationship and the value of the substitute transaction is recoverable. In many cases the comparison will be a simple comparison between prices. The debtor may also be liable for any further loss which the creditor has suffered, e.g. the cost of arranging a cover transaction.

> O agrees to allow H the use of its art gallery for an exhibition at a fee of €1,000. Shortly before the exhibition is to take place O informs H that the gallery will not after all be available. H terminates and succeeds in obtaining the use of a nearby gallery of similar size and quality for a fee of €1,500. H is entitled to damages of €500 representing the amount by which the cost of the cover transaction exceeds the contract price, as well as damages for any reasonable expenses (e.g. changing the address on leaflets and posters).

The rule is not, however, stated in terms of a simple comparison of prices. This could lead to misunderstandings in contracts of some duration like lease contracts. Rent may be agreed as an amount per day, per month etc., while the lease period may be much longer or indefinite. Rent may be payable in advance or in arrears. A mere comparison of the agreed rent under the two contracts will not directly indicate the loss suffered by termination of the contractual relationship and its replacement by a substitute relationship. What must be compared are the values of what would have been payable under the terminated relationship and the value of what is payable under the substitute transaction. The values would normally have to be calculated as at the time of the substitute transaction. They would normally be established by means of a cash flow analysis.

The use of value rather than raw price enables comparisons to be made between different types of contract. For example, a substitute transaction resulting from termination for fundamental non-performance of the lessor’s obligations under a contract for lease is not always a new lease contract. In the circumstances it may be necessary, or at least more practical and reasonable, to buy goods serving the same purposes as those for which the leased goods were intended. The value of what would have been payable under the lease contract must be compared with the value of what is payable under the sales contract (in practice a comparison of net present values of costs if the expected income is unchanged).

The rule applies both where the party terminating the relationship is the paying party (e.g. a buyer or lessee who has to pay more to get equivalent goods) and where the terminating party is the party receiving payment (e.g. a seller or lessor who has to accept a lower amount from a new buyer or lessee).

B. Alternative transaction must be a reasonable substitute

The creditor cannot recover the difference between what was due under the terminated relationship and what is due under the alternative transaction if the alternative transaction is so different from the original transaction in value or kind as not to be a reasonable substitute.

Illustration 2
O supplies a small car on hire to H for three weeks at a rent of €1000 a week. The car breaks down at the end of the first week while H is on holiday, and as no other small car is available H terminates the contractual relationship with O and hires a large luxury car from another firm for the remaining two weeks at a rent of €5000 a week. H's damages for extra rental charges will be restricted to the additional cost, if any, of hiring the nearest available equivalent of the original car in size and value.

C. Creditor must be entitled to damages

This Article is not intended to provide an independent ground of liability which overrides the normal rules on damages. If the creditor is not entitled to damages, or is entitled to only restricted damages because for example of a contractual limitation on the amount recoverable, then these restrictions cannot be avoided simply by making a cover transaction.

Illustration 3
A contract provides that on termination by either party for any reason the other will not be liable for any loss caused by non-performance of obligations falling due for performance after the time when termination takes effect. This provision cannot be avoided simply by the making of a cover transaction.

1. The assessment of damages on the basis of a cover transaction is possible in all the legal systems; however, in some of them it is subject to restrictions.
2. A general rule on cover transactions is found in the FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1144 on the creditor's faculté de remplacement. This in principle must be ordered by the court but French usages have allowed creditors to do it by themselves in commercial transactions. Belgian case law has accepted the same even in non-commercial cases provided the non-performance was sufficiently fundamental (van Ommeslaghe, R.C.J.B. 1986, nos. 98-100). In the other legal systems, where the cover transaction is a "self help" remedy, the rules are found in provisions on sales, see DANISH SGA §§ 25, 30(2) and 45; FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs § 68; GERMAN BGH 15 November 1978, BGHZ 70, 39 and BGH 1 April 1993, BGHZ 122, 172, 179; Ccom § 376(3) and AUSTRIAN Ccom § 376(3) sent. 2 (applicable to commercial sales but extended in practice, which is, however, not undisputed in AUSTRIA, see Ch. Rabl, Schadenersatz wegen Nichterfüllung, 87 s); the DUTCH CC art. 7:37; and ITALIAN CC arts. 1515 and 1516. CISG art. 75 is similar to the Article and so are GREEK and SPANISH case law: see respectively

A.P. 1137/1990, EEN 58 (1991) 444-445 and TS 27 October 1992, RAJ (1992) 8363; TS 14 May 2003, RAJ (2003) 4749 and Carrasco, Comentario, 694 ff. The ESTONIAN LOA § 135(1), as a general provision does not limit, similarly to the Article, the possibility to recover the difference between the contract price and the price of the substitute transaction as well as damages for further loss for contracts of sale. In CZECH law the substitute-transaction rule can be found only in the Ccom (art. 385 generally and art. 469 specifically in the context of the sale of goods). Within the scope of the CC any conclusions on the question have to be deduced from the general prevention duty, but there is no particular experience yet).

3. The POLISH CC art. 479 provides that in contracts with performance defined only generically the creditor may – in case of the debtor‘s unexcused delay – purchase the same amount of goods of the same type and quality at the debtor’s expense or may demand from the debtor the payment of their value. In both the above cases entering a “cover transaction” does not affect the creditor’s claim for damages. For obligations consisting in actions or omissions (not in delivery of goods) – see CC art. 480 (generally court authorization required for substitute performance at the debtor’s expense, except urgent cases - § 3).

4. The DUTCH CC, ESTONIAN LOA, BELGIAN case law, the FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs and CISG require that the transaction is a reasonable one. The DANISH, GERMAN and ITALIAN provisions contain procedural rules; in Italy these have restricted the use of the cover transactions, see Cass., 14 July 1956, no. 2670 and 18 June 1957, no. 2313 in Mass.Foro.It. 1956 and 1957. In SLOVENIAN law a rule on cover purchase is developed from the rule on the duty to mitigate in the LOA § 243(4).

5. ENGLISH law does not specifically adopt the "cover price" as a means of measuring the damages. However, where there is no market for the performance, and a current price cannot be established English courts will treat the cover price as a strong evidence of the amount of loss, see Beale, Remedies 196-197. SCOTTISH law is similar see: McBryde, paras. 22.107-22.110. SLOVAK law also does not adopt the cover price as a means of measuring the damages.

6. See generally, Treitel, Remedies, §§ 102 ff; Honnold, §§ 409-415.

III.–3:707: Current price

Where the creditor has terminated a contractual relationship in whole or in part under Section 5 and has not made a substitute transaction but there is a current price for the performance, the creditor may, in so far as entitled to damages, recover the difference between the contract price and the price current at the time of termination as well as damages for any further loss.

COMMENTS

Damages measured by current price

In so far as the cost of substitute performance fairly measures the shortfall in the value of the debtor's performance it is recoverable as such whether or not the creditor actually incurs the expenditure.

> Illustration
> S agrees to sell 50 tons of coffee to company B at €1,800 a ton for delivery on 1st July. S fails to deliver the coffee. In the circumstances this is a fundamental non-performance. B terminates. The market price on 1st July is €2,000 a ton. B is entitled to damages of €10,000 (i.e. 50 x 200 = 10,000) even if it does not make a substitute purchase on the market.

Again, as in the preceding Article, it should be noted that this rule presupposes that the creditor is entitled to damages. It is a way of quantifying damages, not an independent ground of liability.

This Article represents a commonly accepted principle, although the formulations sometimes differ as to the date by reference to which the current price should be calculated

NOTES

I. Current price as a measure of loss

1. This "abstract" way of assessing the amount of loss is used in all the legal systems. The relevant provisions are mostly found in the provisions on sales, see DANISH Sales Act §§ 25, 30(1) and 45; DUTCH CC art. 7:36; FINNISH and SWEDISH SGAs § 69; GERMAN Ccom § 376(2) (as to the discussions on the question of generalising this rule see MünchKomm (-Emmerich) BGB[5], Pref. to § 281 no. 46 et seq.; normally only a business but not a consumer may calculate damages on an “abstract” basis, the main exceptions are cases of damaged cars); and AUSTRIAN Ccom § 376(1) as well as AUSTRIAN CC § 1332(2); ITALIAN CC art. 1518; U.K. Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 50(3), (for SCOTLAND see McBryde, paras. 22.108-22.110); and s. 51(3); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 470; and in IRELAND see Forde, § 1.207. A provision similar to the Article is found in CISG art. 76. Similar, but not limited to contracts of sale, is the ESTONIAN LOA § 139(2).
2. Though not provided in the legislation, the assessment of damages on the basis of the current price is admitted in FRANCE, BELGIUM, SLOVAKIA and in the NETHERLANDS, where it is covered by the general clause in CC art. 6:97 under which the court evaluates the damages in the manner best corresponding to its nature.

The assessment is also admitted in SPAIN (TS 27 March 1974, 30 January 1976, 31 March 1977, 14 November 1977, 28 February 1978; see (Vicent Chuliá, II, 106; see also Díez Picazo, II, 683-684 and Carrasco, Comentario, 670) and in GREECE with respect to commercial transactions, Ligeropoulos, in Erm.AK II/1, art. 298 nos. 23-29, 83-86 (1949). Under POLISH law there is a rule of a "concrete" (not "abstract") assessment of damages, which should correspond to the loss actually suffered by the creditor. Still, there is a possibility of adopting current prices as a basis for the computation of damages in these cases, where this kind of "abstract" assessment reflects the creditor's actual loss and in those where the assessment of the loss actually suffered would be impossible or would meet excessive difficulties.

II. Time of assessment

3. In CISG art. 76 and the FINNISH and SWEDISH SGA, the ESTONIAN LOA and the CZECH Ccom the current price is generally that at the time of termination. In several other laws it is, however, the price at the time when performance was due, see UNITED KINGDOM SGA s. 51(3); IRELAND, see Forde § 1.206; ITALIAN CC art. 1518; GERMAN and AUSTRIAN Ccom § 376(2) and AUSTRIAN UGB § 376(1); DANISH Sales Act § 25; and SPANISH Ccom arts. 329, 363 and 371 (see Vicent Chuliá, II, 106). The AUSTRIAN CC § 1332, however, talks of the value at the time when the loss occurs.

III.–3:708: Interest on late payments

(1) If payment of a sum of money is delayed, whether or not the non-performance is excused, the creditor is entitled to interest on that sum from the time when payment is due to the time of payment at the average commercial bank short-term lending rate to prime borrowers prevailing for the currency of payment at the place where payment is due.

(2) The creditor may in addition recover damages for any further loss.

COMMENTS

A. Purposes

This Article provides for interest and damages on failure to pay money by the date at which payment is due. This is the result reached in the laws of the Member States, though there are significant differences in detail.

B. Interest

Paragraph (1) confers a general right to interest when payment of a sum of money is delayed. The question of interest on interest, or capitalisation of interest, is dealt with in the next Article and so, by implication, is not covered here.

Interest is not a species of ordinary damages. Therefore the general rules on damages do not apply. Interest is owed whether or not non-payment is excused. Also, the creditor is entitled to it without regard to any question whether the creditor has taken reasonable steps to mitigate the loss.

The rate of interest is fixed by reference to the average commercial bank short-term lending rate. This rate applies also in the case of a long delay of payment since the creditor at the due date cannot know how long the debtor will delay payment. Since interest rates differ, the lending rate for the currency of payment (III.–2:109 (Currency of payment)) at the due place of payment (III.–2:101 (Place of performance)) has been selected because this is the best yardstick for assessing the creditor's loss. Unless otherwise agreed, interest is to be paid in the same currency and at the same place as the principal sum. The parties are free to exclude or modify paragraph (1) e.g. by fixing the rate of default interest and/or its currency in their contract.

C. Additional damages

Paragraph (2) makes it clear that the creditor's remedy for non-payment or delay in payment is not limited to interest. It extends to additional and other loss recoverable within the limits laid down by the general provisions on damages. This might include, for example, loss of profit on a transaction which the creditor would have concluded with a third party had the money been paid when due; a fall in the internal value of the money, through inflation, between the due date and the actual date of payment, so far as this fall is not compensated by interest under paragraph (1); and, where the money of payment is not the money of account, loss on exchange. However, in this last case the creditor has the option of proceeding instead under III.–2:109 (Currency of payment) paragraph (3).

Illustration 1
A agrees to pay B €50,000 if B will vacate A's property and find alternative accommodation. B moves out of the property but A fails to pay the agreed sum. In consequence B, who as A knew intended to use the payment to buy a house from C, has to negotiate with C to leave part of the purchase price outstanding on mortgage at interest. B is entitled to sue A for the interest and legal costs reasonably incurred.

Illustration 2
C agrees to lend €200,000 to D to enable D to purchase a business at a price equal to that sum from E. Under the contract of sale, the terms of which are known to C, time of payment is fundamental and any delay entitles E to terminate. At the last moment C refuses to advance the money and D is unable to obtain alternative funds in time. E terminates and sells his business to F for €300,000, its true value. D is entitled to damages from C for the loss of the contractual rights.

Illustration 3
S in London agrees to sell goods to B in Hamburg at a price of US$ 100,000 payable in London 28 days after shipment. The goods are duly shipped to B, who is three months late in paying the price. During this period the value of the US dollar in relation to the pound sterling (the currency in which S normally conducts his business) depreciates by 20 per cent. Assuming that these consequences of delay in payment could reasonably have been foreseen by B at the time of the contract, S is entitled to recover US$ 20,000 damages from B, in addition to interest, for the loss on exchange.

I. Duty to pay interest

1. A statutory duty to pay interest exists under several international conventions and in all continental European countries; for references see note 2 below. CISG also recognizes this obligation (arts. 78, 84(1)). Contrary to all other conventions and statutes, CISG does not, however, fix a rate of interest because it proved impossible to agree upon a standard: the discount rate was thought to be inappropriate for measuring credit costs; nor could agreement be reached on whether the credit costs in the seller's or the buyer's country were to be selected. See however UNIDROIT art. 7.4.9. For commercial relationships and public procurement contracts the Late Payment Directive 2000/35/EC provides for a claim for interest on a high and flexible rate in cases of late payment, see Gebauer and Wiedmann (-Schmidt-Kessel), Zahlungszeit und Verzug, nos. 1 et seq. and no. 42.

2. ENGLISH law did not until recently impose, in general, a statutory or common law obligation to pay interest upon default or damages for the late payment of money (President of India v. La Pintada Cia. Navegacion SA [1985] AC 104 (HL)). These rules have been much criticised; before the President of India case the English Law Commission had proposed the introduction of statutory interest on contractual obligations to pay money (Report on Interest, No. 88, Cmnd 7229, 1978). The rule has recently been changed for commercial debts by the Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998; and in Sempra Metals (formerly Metallgesellschaft Ltd) Ltd. v. IRC [2007] UKHL 34; [2007] 3 WLR 354 the House of Lords has said that a creditor who suffers a foreseeable loss as the result of money being paid late is entitled to damages In any case, if proceedings have been commenced the court has a discretion to award interest: Administration of Justice Act 1982, amending the Supreme Court Act 1981. The 1998 Act also applies in SCOTLAND (McBryde, paras. 22.131-22.135). SCOTTISH law in general allows damages for failure to pay money only where the debtor has knowledge of the special consequences of the failure (McBryde, paras. 22.133-22.137).

3. In IRELAND, although a court can order a contractual debtor to pay interest from the date of judgment, and a creditor who has served notice claiming interest on a defaulting debtor can have interest from the date of demand (Debtors (Ireland) Act 1840 s. 53), there is equally no general duty on a defaulting debtor to pay interest on the unpaid sum for the period of delay: see Clark, 467.

II. Normal rates

4. The rates of statutory interest and the methods of computing them vary considerably.

(a) Fixed rate

5. The traditional method is to fix a statutory rate; it varies between 10 and 2,5 percent.

4%: AUSTRIAN CC § 1000(1).

5%: GERMAN Ccom § 352(1) (but in case of delay in the sense of CC § 286 the higher flexible rate for delay applies);

2,5 %: ITALIAN CC arts. 1224(1), 1284 (as amended in 2003);

6%: the Geneva Conventions on Bills of Exchange of 1930 art. 48(2) and on Cheques of 1931 art. 45(1);

(b) Flexible rates

6. In recent years many countries have introduced flexible interest rates. The methods of determining the rate vary considerably. The Late Payment Directive (2000/35/EC) provides for a flexible minimum rate for commercial relationships and public procurement contracts, see art. 3(1)(d); this minimum rate is the sum of the interest rate applied by the European Central Bank to its most recent main refinancing operation carried out before the first calendar day of the half-year in question, plus at least seven percentage points, unless otherwise specified in the contract. For Member States which do not participate in the Euro, the reference rate is the equivalent rate set by its national central bank. In both cases, the minimum rates applies for six months respectively.

7. DENMARK adds 7% to the reference rate, to be fixed biannually by the Bank of Denmark as the official discount rate (Consolidated Law on Interests of 1 4 September, 2002 § 5) The Minister of Justice may increase but not decrease the 7% rate. In FINLAND the Act on interest, as amended 3 March 1995, prescribes different rates: if there is an agreed rate of interest on the debt, the interest for delay is 4% above the agreed interest rate, in other cases the interest for delay is 7% (in certain cases 4%) above an official reference rate determined by the Bank of Finland. SWEDEN adds 8% to the official discount rate and, when time for payment has not been fixed in advance, allows a grace period of 30 days after notice that interest will be charged. In FRANCE the rate is the arithmetical average of the last twelve monthly figures of the official discount rate (Law of 11 July 1975 art. 1, as am. by Law of 23 June 1989); two months after a judicial condemnation to pay, that rate is increased by 5% (Law of 11 July 1985 arts. 1-2). The GERMAN §§ 288(1), 247 fix the rate of 8% above the reference rate drawn from the European Central Bank refinance operations; in contracts, which have at least one consumer as a party the rate is 5% above the reference rate. Greek law distinguishes between interest by agreement and interest imposed by law (legal interest). The most important instance of legal interest is default interest. The upper limit of both agreed interest and legal interest is determined by law (GREEK CC art. 293), and today, through delegation of the law, by the Council of Ministers. According to the Resolution 1/14.1.2000 of the Council of Ministers, the upper limit of the agreed interest is 5% above the rate of interest charged by the central bank for financing credit institutions against state funds given as pledge, while the upper limit of the legal interest is 2% above the upper limit of the agreed interest. Note also that, according to art. 3 § 2 of the law 2842/2000, references to interest rates defined by the Bank of Greece are replaced by rates defined by the European Central Bank. By application of the above, the rate of legal interest is fixed at the time of writing (October 2005) at 10% and that of the agreed interest at 8%. In ESTONIA the interest rate on late payments is 7% above the last interest rate applicable to the main refinancing operations of the European Central Bank before 1 January or 1 July of each year (LOA §§ 113(1), 94(1)). AUSTRIAN commercial law (UGB § 352) adds 8% to the basic lending rate. In SLOVENIA an interest rate for non-performance of monetary payments is 8% added to the ECB interest rate for the operations of main refinancing. In the second half of 2007 this represents a 12% interest rate for non-performance of monetary obligations. This is regulated by art. 1 of the Act on Prescribed Interest Rate. In the CZECH REPUBLIC legal interest in the case of civil delayed performance is fixed at double the official discount rate (CC § 517.2 and relating regulation, especially nař. vl. č. 142/1994 Sb., art. 1). For some special cases, such as lease of flats, a different legal daily penalty rate exists (0,25%, see CC § 697).

8. In other countries, the interest rate is fixed (and amended) annually by the government (LUXEMBOURG: Law 22 February 1984; the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:120; POLAND: CC art. 481 § 2, art. 359 § 3 – see Order of the Council of Ministers of January 4th 2005 on the Level of Statutory Rate (Rozporządzenie RM z 04.01.2005 r. w sprawie określenia wysokości odsetek ustawowych) § 1; PORTUGAL: CC art. 559(1), Ccom art. 102(2); SPAIN: CC art. 1108 and Law of 29 June 1984 arts. 1 and 2.) In BELGIUM an Act of 30 June 1970, as amended in 1986, allows the rate to be fixed by Royal Decree; it is now 7 %.

9. SLOVAK law distinguishes between two interest rates – a commercial interest rate in commercial relations and an interest rate in other legal relations. The commercial interest rate is fixed biannually at the official discount rate increased by 10% (Ccom art. 369(1)). There are two kinds of other interest rates (CC § 517(2)) – interest for delay and a penalty for delay (e.g. delay in paying the rent for a flat). Both of them are fixed by regulation of the Ministry of Justice (Regulation N. 87/1995 O.J.). The rate of interest for delay is fixed at double the official discount rate. The penalty for delay is 0,25% of the debt for every day of delay but at least 25 Slovak crowns for every month of delay.

III. Higher contractual rates

10. In some countries if there is a contractual interest rate that is higher than the statutory rate, the higher rate is applied to the time after default (AUSTRIAN CC § 1000(1) limited by the provisions on usury within the meaning of CC § 879(4) and others); DANISH law, see note 2(b) above, § 6; ITALIAN CC art. 1224(1) sentence 2; the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:119(3); GERMANY CC § 288(3); ESTONIAN LOA § 113(1) sentence 3; POLISH CC art. 481(2); PORTUGUESE CC art. 806(2)); SLOVAK Ccom art. 369(1); CZECH Commercial law, Ccom art. 369.1); GREEK Introductory law to the CC art. 109(1) sent. 3. SPANISH CC art. 1108; also see CCP art. 576 establishing higher, punitive rate; SWEDISH Interest Act § 1. In GERMANY, in contrast, the Federal Supreme Court has expressly refused to apply such a rule because it might give a windfall profit to the creditor if the market rate is much lower at the time of default. A bank is merely entitled to the average market rate for its various types of credits and, if the bank cannot establish this, to the market rate for its cheapest type of credit (BGH 8 October 1991, BGHZ 115, 268, 269 f, 271 f). In SLOVENIA a contractual interest higher than the statutory rate may be agreed. However, this should not exceed the statutory rate by more then half (i.e. 18% instead of 12%). See LOA § 377.

IV. Loss in addition to interest

11. Loss in addition to interest may be claimed in most countries by virtue of the general rules on damages but lost profits and loss through inflation cannot always be recovered. See DENMARK (Gomard, Obligationsret II 190); FINLAND (Wilhelmsson & Sevón 156; Aurejärvi & Hemmo 82); FRENCH CC art. 1153(4); GERMAN CC § 288(4); GREEK CC art. 345 sent. 2; ESTONIAN LOA § 113(5), subject to claim for reduction of the amount of penalty interest, if grossly excessive (LOA §§ 113(8), 162); ITALIAN CC art. 1224(2), except if the parties had fixed the rate of interest for default in the contract, to which add case law establishing presumptive loss depending on the qualities and conditions of the creditor's economic category (Cass. Sez. Unite 5 April 1986, no. 2368 in Foro It. 1986, I, c. 1265; Galgano, Diritto civile e commerciale, I, 98 ff and Trabucchi, Istituzioni di diritto civile, 689 ff); SWEDEN (Ramberg, Köplagen 568); SPANISH law, TS 28 November 1983, 6 May 1988, (Albaladejo II, 1, § 33.3*)*. The possibility is not recognised in BELGIUM, see CC art. 1153, except for losses caused by devaluation of foreign currency. In CZECH law the principle is that the right of creditor to compensation for loss is not affected (CC § 517 and § 519) but compensation for loss can only be claimed if it is not covered by interest or legal penalty rate (CC § 519 in fine). This is another application of a general rule of restitutio in integrum (see notes above).

12. The AUSTRIAN CC § 1333 provides for virtually the same rule as the present Article. Additional loss can be claimed besides the interest. For the rate CC § 1333 refers to CC § 1000.

13. Under POLISH law further loss may be claimed according to the general rules on damages without any other limitations or conditions – CC art. 481 § 3.

14. Under SLOVAK law the creditor's right to compensation for damage caused by the debtor's default is not affected; however, in case of default with performance of a pecuniary debt, such compensation can be claimed only if it is not covered by the default interest or default charge (CC § 518).

15. Further loss may be recovered in ENGLAND (Sempra Metals (formerly Metallgesellschaft Ltd) Ltd. v. IRC [2007] UKHL 34; [2007] 3 WLR 354, supra note 2); in SCOTLAND (McBryde, para. 22.89) and in FRANCE (Civ. 1, 21 June 1989, Bull, I. no. 251); and the position is thought to be the same in IRELAND.

16. In contrast, additional damages may not be claimed in the NETHERLANDS (except in the special case mentioned in Notes on Article III.–2:109 (Currency of payment) paragraph (3); and in PORTUGAL (under CC art. 806(3) additional damages might be claimed only in case of a delict or strict liability).

17. Under ESTONIAN law, if the debtor is excused for non-performance, the interest for delay is only recoverable if the parties to the relationship are engaged in economic or professional activities (LOA § 105 sent. 2). Estonian law has opted for the solution, that a penalty for late payment may not be required for a delay in the payment of interest. Agreements which derogate from such requirement to the detriment of the debtor are void (LOA § 113(6)).

18. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 301(1) in respect of a monetary debt, the debtor, unless otherwise provided by law, must pay an annual interest at the central bank base rate in effect on the last day preceding the calendar half-year to which it pertains, even if the debt is otherwise free of interest. The obligation to pay interest is effective even if the debtor's default is excused. Under CC § 301(2) if, on the basis of a legal regulation or contract, any interest is due to the creditor up to the date of default, the debtor, unless otherwise provided by law, is liable to pay additional interest as of the due date at a rate equal to one-third of the central bank base rate in effect on the last day preceding the calendar half-year to which it pertains, and the combined amount of these is no less than the interest specified in paragraph (1). Under CC § 301(3) the court may reduce the rate of the default interest if the interest fixed by parties is excessive. Under CC § 301(4) creditors are entitled to demand compensation for losses in excess of the default interest. Under CC § 301/A the provisions on interest for late payment apply to economic organisations with some exceptions. Interest for late payment is calculated by reference to the central bank base rate in effect on the last day preceding the calendar half-year to which it pertains, plus seven per cent.

19. See generally Treitel, Remedies, §§ 159-162.

III.–3:709: When interest to be added to capital

(1) Interest payable according to the preceding Article is added to the outstanding capital every 12 months.

(2) Paragraph (1) of this Article does not apply if the parties have provided for interest upon delay in payment.

COMMENTS

A. Notion

Simple interest (whether contractual or legal) does not affect the capital upon which it is calculated: the capital remains unaltered. If, however, a capitalisation of interest (or compound interest) has been agreed or is imposed by law or custom, the interest which has fallen due during the agreed period (rest period) and has remained unpaid, is added to the capital. Therefore, during the second rest period, since more capital is bearing interest, the amount of interest will increase, and so on.

Illustration 1
Bank B has extended to L a credit of €10,000 due to be repaid on 31 December 2000. No payment is made. If the parties had not agreed upon delay interest, Article 9:508(1) applies: it is assumed that the interest rate according to this provision is 10% per year. Consequently, on 1 January 2002, an unpaid delay interest of €1000 will be added to the capital of €10,000, increasing it to €11,000; and on 1 January 2003, an amount of €1100 will be added, increasing the capital to €12,100; etc.

B. Scope of application

The Article applies as a remedy for delayed payment of interest. But the capitalisation of interest may, of course, be agreed upon for contractual obligations in the absence of any question of delayed payment. An important example is the capitalisation of interest on positive or negative balances of a current account. Contractual arrangements of this type are not affected by the present rule.

In the laws of many Member States, compound interest is payable only when the parties have so agreed or in other limited circumstances. However it is generally acknowledged that when there has been a delay in the payment of money, an award of simple interest to the creditor will seldom be adequate compensation. The delay will normally cause the creditor a loss in one of two ways. If the creditor needs the money for other purposes, it will have to borrow to cover the temporary shortfall, and it will almost certainly have to pay compound rates to the lender. If it did not have an immediate need for the money, it would have been able to invest it at compound rates. Therefore it seems sensible to adopt a general rule that default interest may be compounded at an appropriate interval.

C. Justifications

The Article confers upon the creditor of an interest bearing monetary debt, after the debtor has failed to pay interest which has fallen due, a right to capitalisation of interest. This is justified by the fact that interest earned by the creditor of a monetary obligation is an asset. Delay in its payment deprives the creditor of a due benefit as much as delay in the payment of the capital itself. Moreover, delay in payment often has a highly detrimental effect upon creditors, especially smaller business enterprises which may be driven into bankruptcy. There is therefore, both at Community level and in several member states, a clear tendency to provide a sanction for late payments. The capitalisation of interest is an effective sanction because of its gradually increasing effect.

D. Party agreement on delay interest

The Article provides, in accordance with general principle, that the general rule on the capitalisation of interest does not apply where the parties have agreed, explicitly or implicitly, upon the payment of delay interest. The fact that the parties have addressed themselves to the question of interest means that it is up to them to provide for capitalisation if they so wish.

Illustration 2
The parties agree on interest of 7 % p.a. "until payment". This clause covers both credit interest and delay interest. The capitalisation of the delay interest is excluded by the second sentence of the Article.

E. Computation of time

In order to determine the beginning of the rest period of twelve months, one has to look to the terms regulating the obligation to pay interest. Unless the parties have agreed upon that time, it must be determined according to applicable legal rules. Reference may be made to III.–2:102 (Time of performance) and to III.–3:708 (Interest on late payments). So far as other aspects of the computation of time are concerned reference may be made to the Annex.

F. Relation to damages

The obligation to pay interest upon delay in payment is functionally equivalent to an obligation to pay damages. The interest can be regarded as a form of abstract damages, although it is not ordinary damages. (See Comment B to the preceding Article.) The capitalisation of interest has the advantage of extending this remedy. Consequently, the scope of application of III.–3:708 (Interest on late payments) paragraph (2) (additional damages for loss caused by delay in payment of money, so far as not covered by interest) will be further narrowed since the creditor need not and cannot claim damages for any loss which is already compensated by the payment of interest.

However, the creditor is entitled to any additional damages not so compensated. But the amount of such damages and the sometimes difficult task of proving them will, generally speaking, be much restricted if and in so far as capitalisation of interest is allowed.

G. Consumer protection

The national rules on consumer protection, especially on consumer credit, such as those based upon the relevant EC-Directive of 1986, have, of course, preference. The Directive itself does not deal with capitalisation of interest.

NOTES

I. General

1. Due to the differing impact of religious and ideological conceptions, the national rules on interest for delayed payment of interest vary considerably. Six major justifications are recognized: remedy provided by law as a legal form of compensation; unilateral demand; judicial action; express agreement; current account; and usage.

II. Legal form of compensation

2. In the NETHERLANDS, capitalisation of interest is the only statutory compensation for delayed payment of interest (CC art. 6:119(2)). This provision must be understood as an extension of a corresponding rule providing that (simple) statutory interest is the only remedy for delayed payment of a sum of money (art. 6:119(1)). The parties may agree upon a higher rate of interest (art. 6:119(3)). Under Dutch law, therefore, the creditor cannot claim compensation for that portion of the damage due to delayed payment of interest which is not covered already by interest on that interest when capitalised. The same is true for SLOVENIAN law. See LOA § 380.

3. In FINLAND (Wilhelmsson and Sevón, 73) and SCOTLAND (Wilson, 132 and McBryde, paras. 22.138-22.139), if the capital has been repaid but not interest due, interest starts to run on the unpaid interest. Under ENGLISH law, compound interest (or capitalisation of interest) may now be awarded by way of damages: see Sempra Metals (formerly Metallgesellschaft Ltd) Ltd. v. IRC [2007] UKHL 34; [2007] 3 WLR 354, (the actual decision was that an unjust enrichment claim arising from tax being paid too early should be valued with reference to compound interest which the defendant would have had to pay to borrow an equivalent amount of money to that which had been received from the taxpayer). Compound interest may also be awarded in equity at the courts' discretion where money has been obtained by fraud or where it has been withheld or misapplied by a fiduciary (cf. President of India v. La Pintada Cia. Navigacion SA [1985] AC 104, 116). The Law Commission has recommended that the courts be given a general discretion to award compound interest: Report No. 287, Pre-judgment Interest on Debts and Damages (2005). Claimants should be allowed to ask for compound interest instead of the interest that would otherwise be available as of right under the Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998 (which as amended implements Directive 2000/35).

III. Unilateral demand

4. In BELGIUM, the provision of CC art. 1154 requiring a judicial action by the creditor (as in France and Luxembourg, see the following paragraph) has in recent years been interpreted broadly as authorising also an extrajudicial demand by the creditor. However, this demand cannot be made until, as required by CC art. 1154, one year has passed since the interest fell due (Cass. 28 March 1994, Pasicrisie 1994.I.317 at 321-322).

IV. Judicial action

5. In several other countries the creditor may obtain capitalisation of interest by unilateral, although formalized, action. This unilateral right must be based upon an implied basic legal obligation of the debtor and therefore appears to be related to the Dutch system of capitalisation of interest as a legal form of compensation for delayed payment of interest. However, the detailed requirements for exercising this right differ considerably, both from Dutch law and among the Romanic countries.

6. Closest to the Dutch and the Belgian system is PORTUGUESE law since the creditor need merely request a judicial notification of the debtor demanding capitalisation of interest that has fallen due or will fall due (CC art. 560(1)).

7. According to the AUSTRIAN CC § 1000(2) capitalisation of interest can (apart from agreement, see below) be claimed after having brought an action for the outstanding interest. In AUSTRIA, FRANCE, LUXEMBOURG, GREECE, POLAND, ITALY and apparently also in SCOTLAND the creditor must bring an action against the debtor for payment of capitalised or compound interest. However, the requirements vary considerably from country to country. In AUSTRIA (Law on interest of 1868 § 3(1)(b)) and in SPAIN (CC art. 1109(1)), capitalised interest can be demanded as of the date of the action and at the statutory rate (although in Austria an agreed rate will prevail over the statutory rate).

8. Many countries require that interest must have been due for at least one year (FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 1154; GREECE: CC art. 296 (1)); PORTUGAL: CC art. 560(2)). In ITALY generally and in GREECE for debts among merchants, the period is reduced to six months (Italy: CC art. 1283 and Resolution of Interministerial Committee on Credits and Savings of 9 February 2000 (Banca, Borsa e Titoli di Credito 2000, I, 439) art. 5; Greece: CCIA art. 111(2)).

9. However, the French and Luxembourg legal provision is interpreted differently in these countries. In Luxembourg, CC art. 1154 is understood narrowly as requiring a new action for every successive year because the creditor cannot demand capitalised interest pro futuro (Luxembourg: Cass. 10 April 1908, Pas.Lux. VIII 148). By contrast, in France action may be brought for successive future maturities (Cass.com. 20 October 1992, Bull.civ. IV no. 332; Cass.civ. 18 February 1998, Bull.civ. III no. 42).

10. In POLAND interest on interest may be demanded only from the moment of filing an action for the "primary" interest (CC art. 482 § 1). Compound interest can be demanded pro futuro, but only for the time after bringing the action.

V. Agreement of the parties

11. An agreement of the parties is recognised everywhere, although subject to various restrictions. In some countries, the parties are free to agree on capitalisation of interest (for AUSTRIA see CC § 1000(2), Law on interest of 1868 § 3(1)(a); DENMARK, Gomard, II 189; FINLAND, Wilhelmsson and Sevón, 74; the NETHERLANDS, Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 525; SPAIN, Díez-Picazo II, 287; ENGLAND, Chitty on Contracts, no. 38-253; Mann, 70); SCOTLAND, principle of freedom of contract.

12. Other countries admit agreement on capitalisation of interest but only after interest has fallen due. This is the only condition in GERMANY (CC § 248(1), but credit institutions are exempted, (2)), POLAND (CC art. 482 § 1, but long term loans made by credit institutions are exempt, CC art. 482 § 2) and SPAIN (Ccom art. 317). In FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG, as well as in ITALY and GREECE, agreement is only permitted after one year has elapsed since interest had fallen due: thus both the requirements and even the sources are the same as indicated for these countries in Note 4. In ITALY generally and in GREECE for debts among merchants, the period is reduced to six months (Italy: CC art. 1283; Greece: CCIA art. 111(2)). Italy has recently forbidden agreements on capitalised interest for financing contracts providing for repayment by instalments, except if repayments have to be paid into a current account. By contrast, contracts for advance payments may provide for capitalising of the interest falling due at the end of the period of advance payments (Interministerial Committee on Credits and Savings, Resolution of 9 February 2000 (Banca, Borsa e Titoli di Credito 2000 I 439) arts. 3-4). Italy has also recently introduced an innovative special transparency rule for agreements on capitalised interest in credit and savings contracts. These must indicate the agreed rest period and the interest rate. If the rest period is shorter than one year, the effective interest rate, taking into account the effect of the capitalisation, must be indicated. Clauses on the capitalisation of interest are invalid, unless specifically approved by the customer in writing (Resolution cited above art. 6).

VI. Current account

13. Current accounts, being based upon agreement, are everywhere recognized as an implied justification of capitalisation of interest, but without the restrictions mentioned above. Whenever a balance is struck, any interest covered, whether credit or debt interest, is integrated with the capital and bears interest thereafter. In GERMANY and AUSTRIA as well as GREECE and ITALY there are express statutory provisions on capitalisation (Germany and Austria: Ccom § 355(1); Greece: CCIA art. 112(1); Italy: Resolution of the Interministerial Committee on Credits and Savings 9 February 2000 (Banca, Borsa e Titoli di Credito 2000 I 439) art. 2). In most other countries, case law has established the special situation of current accounts (FRANCE: Cass.com. 11 January 1984, Bull.civ. IV no. 15; BELGIUM: Cass. 27 February 1930, Pas. 1930 I 129 (134); LUXEMBOURG: Cour supérieure 13 March 1934, Pas. Lux. XIII 240 (244); Cour d'appel 27 February 1986, Bulletin Droit et Banque 1986 no. 9 p. 76; ENGLAND: National Bank of Greece v. Pinios Shipping Company No. 1, [1990] 1 AC 637 (HL) at 683 ff; for ITALY Cass. 30 May 1989, no. 2644, Foro It. 1989, I, 3127; cf. also Cian-Trabucchi (-Zaccaria) art. 1283 no. IV, art. 1825 no. II).

14. In Italy it has been specified that within each current account the rest periods for the capitalisation of credit and debit interests must be the same. Further, it was thought necessary to specify that after closing of the current account the final balance may produce interest, if so agreed, but any post-closing interest cannot be capitalised (Resolution of 9 February 2000, cited above, art. 2(2) and (3)).

VII. Usage

15. Usage as a separate source of allowing capitalisation of interest is in some countries expressly recognized, even if it deviates from statutory provisions (ITALY, CC art. 1283; PORTUGAL, CC art. 560(3); cf. also for ENGLAND the National Bank of Greece case, cited above). Usage as a justification for capitalisation of interest is also recognized in DENMARK Bryde Andersen and Lookofsky, 110 f) and SWEDEN (Walin, 255).

16. The ITALIAN Supreme Court had held in several decisions that there is a fixed usage on capitalisation of interest in the relations between credit institutions and their customers (basic decision: Cass. 15 December 1981, no. 6631, Riv.dir.comm. 1982, II, 89; cf. also Cass. 30 May 1989, cited in note 5 above). When in 1999 the Court retreated from this line of decisions (cf. especially Cass. 16 March 1999, Banca e Borsa 1999, II, 389), the legislator immediately intervened and, by a legislative decree, validated contract clauses on capitalisation of interest. This governmental decree was in turn declared to be unconstitutional as being in violation of the enabling law (Const. Court 17 October 2000, Giurisprudenza Commerciale 2001, II, 179). Thus, in effect, the case law of the Supreme Court since 1999 governs again but the issue is still hotly debated by writers.

17. The standard practice in relation to current accounts (see note 6 above) is but one example, although a prominent one, of a usage.

18. Under SLOVAK law there are no special provisions on the capitalisation of interest, but the usage and coherent case law do not allow the capitalisation of interest for delay. The same holds true for CZECH law (see Supreme Court 35 Odo 101/2002), but different arrangements by the parties are not excluded.

III.–3:710: Interest in commercial contracts

(1) If a business delays the payment of a price due under a contract for the supply of goods, other assets or services without being excused under III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment), interest is due at the rate specified in paragraph (4), unless a higher interest rate is applicable.

(2) Interest at the rate specified in paragraph (4) starts to run on the day which follows the date or the end of the period for payment provided in the contract. If there is no such date or period, interest at that rate starts to run:

(a) 30 days after the date when the debtor receives the invoice or an equivalent request for payment; or

(b) 30 days after the date of receipt of the goods or services, if the date under (a) is earlier or uncertain, or if it is uncertain whether the debtor has received an invoice or equivalent request for payment.

(3) If conformity of goods or services to the contract is to be ascertained by way of acceptance or verification, the 30 day period under paragraph (2) (b) starts to run on the date of acceptance or verification.

(4) The interest rate for delayed payment is the interest rate applied by the European Central Bank to its most recent main refinancing operation carried out before the first calendar day of the half-year in question ("the reference rate"), plus seven percentage points. For the currency of a Member State which is not participating in the third stage of economic and monetary union, the reference rate is the equivalent rate set by its national central bank.

(5) The creditor may in addition recover damages for any further loss.

III.–3:711: Unfair terms relating to interest

(1) A term whereby a business pays interest from a date later than that specified in the preceding Article paragraph (2) (a) and (b) and paragraph (3), or at a rate lower than that specified in paragraph (4), is not binding to the extent that this would be unfair.

(2) A term whereby a debtor is allowed to pay the price for goods, other assets or services later than the time when interest starts to run under the preceding Article paragraph (2) (a) and (b) and paragraph (3) does not deprive the creditor of interest to the extent that this would be unfair.

(3) Something is unfair for the purposes of this Article if it grossly deviates from good commercial practice, contrary to good faith and fair dealing.

III.–3:712: Stipulated payment for non-performance

(1) Where the terms regulating an obligation provide that a debtor who fails to perform the obligation is to pay a specified sum to the creditor for such non-performance, the creditor is entitled to that sum irrespective of the actual loss.

(2) However, despite any provision to the contrary, the sum so specified in a contract or other juridical act may be reduced to a reasonable amount where it is grossly excessive in relation to the loss resulting from the non-performance and the other circumstances.

COMMENTS

A. Stipulation as to payment for non-performance binding

It is common for the parties to a contract to specify a sum to be paid for non-performance, with a view to avoiding the difficulty, delay and expense involved in proving the amount of loss in a claim for unliquidated damages. Such a term may also prompt the debtor to perform voluntarily, when the penalty is heavy. To perform is then cheaper than paying the penalty. Paragraph (1) gives effect to such a provision, so that except as provided by paragraph (2) the court must disregard the loss actually suffered by the creditor and must award neither more nor less than the sum fixed by the contract. It follows that the creditor is under no obligation to prove any loss. The terms regulating a non-contractual obligation may also provide for a stipulated payment to be made by the debtor in the event of non-performance.

B agrees to build a house for A and to complete it by April 1st. The contract provides that for every week's delay in completion B is to pay A the sum of € 200. B completes the house on April 29th. A is entitled to €800 as agreed damages, whether his actual loss (e.g., the cost of renting alternative accommodation during the four week period of delay) is greater or less than that sum.

Illustration 2
A agrees to sell a house to B and obtains a deposit of 20 per cent of the price to secure B's performance of the contract. B refuses to complete the transaction. A may forfeit the deposit.

Where, however, the contract specifies merely the minimum sum payable by the debtor, the creditor may recover a higher figure if the loss exceeds the minimum sum. In this case the creditor may elect to sue for damages at large instead of invoking the provision for agreed damages.

The treatment of “agreed damages” clauses varies from one legal system to another. Some systems admit them provided that the damages are not substantially greater than the loss that a non-performance is likely to cause, and strike down stipulations for substantially more than that amount as unenforceable “penalties”. Others accept that the parties may agree on a penal sum but give the court power to reduce it in some circumstances. As it seems generally to be agreed that there is nothing wrong with the parties agreeing a penalty for non-performance provided that they are fully aware of what they are doing and it does not operate unfairly, the rules take the approach that penalties may be agreed but the court should have power to reduce them when necessary.

B. Court's power to reduce grossly excessive stipulations

To allow the parties to a contract complete freedom to fix the sum payable for non-performance may lead to abuse. If there is a gross disparity between the specified sum and the actual loss suffered by the creditor the court may reduce the sum even if at the time of the contract it seemed reasonable. Since the purpose is to control only those stipulations which are abusive in their effect, the court's reducing power is exercisable only where it is clear that the stipulated sum substantially exceeds the actual loss. This power of the court has a limit: it should respect the intention of the parties to deter default and therefore should not reduce the award to the actual loss. The court has to fix an intermediate figure.

> A supplies equipment to B on lease for five years at a rent of €50,000 a year. The agreement provides that in the event of termination because of default by B in performing its obligations B is to pay A by way of agreed damages a sum equal to 80% of the future rentals. In the light of circumstances existing at the time of the contract this stipulation is not unreasonable. After a year A terminates because of B's default in payment. As the result of an unexpected increase in the demand for the type of equipment in question A, having secured the return of the equipment, is able to re-let it at twice the rent payable under the original lease. The court may reduce the agreed damages payable so as to take account of this fact.

The power to reduce the stipulated sum also applies to sums specified in unilateral juridical acts, where similar considerations apply. It does not, however, apply to sums stipulated by rules of law. It would be inappropriate to allow courts to modify such sums if the relevant rule of law has not provided for the possibility of such modification.

C. "Excessive" sum

In deciding whether the stipulated sum is excessive the court should have regard to the relationship between that sum and the loss actually suffered by the creditor, as opposed to the loss legally recoverable taking account of the foreseeability principle. On the other hand, the computation of actual loss should take into account that element of the loss which has been caused by the unreasonable behaviour of the creditor, e.g. in failing to take reasonable steps in mitigation of loss.

D. Genuine options not covered

The Article does not apply to a genuine option to pay a sum of money instead of performing a non-monetary obligation, since the Article deals with non-performance, not with alternative obligations or methods of performance (forfait clause, "clause de dédit").

NOTES

I. Stipulated payment clause valid

1. The laws of most European countries will enforce a stipulation in a contract under which the debtor undertakes to pay a fixed sum of money in the event of non-performance. The stipulated payment clause will be enforced whether its purpose was to coerce the debtor to perform the principal obligation (penalty clause) or to serve as a pre-estimate of the loss suffered by the creditor in case of non-performance (liquidated damages clause). See also UNIDROIT art. 7.4.1

2. Many civil codes confirm the validity of stipulated payment clauses either expressly or impliedly, see AUSTRIAN CC § 1336(1); BELGIAN CC arts. 1152 and 1229; FRENCH CC arts. 1152 (as amended in 1975 and 1985) and 1229; LUXEMBOURG CC arts. 1152 and 1226 ff. (as amended in 1987); GERMAN CC §§ 339-345; GREEK CC art. 405(2); ITALIAN CC arts. 1382-1384; NETHERLANDS CC arts. 6:91-6:94; POLISH CC arts. 483-484; PORTUGUESE CC art. 810(1); SLOVAK CC §§ 544-545; ESTONIAN LOA §§ 158-163 and SPANISH CC art. 1152. The same holds true of DANISH law, see Gomard, Obligationsret II 236 ff; FINNISH law (see Taxell, Avtal och rättsskydd 441) and SWEDISH law (see Ramberg, Avtalsrätt 309). Only an express clause on stipulated payment is valid in SLOVENIAN law. See LOA § 247. The legal rate of interest for delay is binding under CZECH CC, which obliges the creditor to apply a legal rate (CC § 517.2) but another rate of interest for delay can be agreed in case of commercial debts (Ccom art. 369.1).

3. Unless otherwise agreed the stipulated payment is not payable if the non-performance is excused, see expressly DUTCH CC art. 6:92(3); GREEK CC art. 405(1); ESTONIAN LOA § 160 and by implication LUXEMBOURG CC arts. 1152 and 1226 ff. (as amended in 1987); GERMAN CC §§ 339, 286(4). In CZECH law the interest of delay is a form or legal compensation for loss and at the same time a sanction for conduct violating a legally protected principle of fair business (see Ccom art. 265 and decision PP 10/1997). So in some cases of excused non-performance, the debtor is never obliged to pay interest for delay (for instance in case of mora creditoris, see CC §§ 520 and 522 or in cases when the performance became impossible, see CC § 575.1 applicable also to commercial relationships). In POLISH law the above rule is accepted as a consequence of CC art. 471. On the other hand, and subject to the rules on reduction, see note 5 below, the stipulated payment is due irrespective of whether the creditor suffered any loss, and irrespective of how great the loss was.

II. Stipulated payment replaces damages

4. In most European systems the stipulated payment replaces the damages for non-performance which the creditor would have recovered. This means that the creditor cannot claim damages instead of the stipulated payment. Nor can the creditor claim damages in addition to the stipulated payment, unless, as provided in the ITALIAN CC art. 1382(1); POLISH CC art. 484 § 1; PORTUGUESE CC art. 811(2) and (3); SLOVAK CC § 545(2) and SPANISH CC art. 1153, the parties have agreed on such payment. In AUSTRIAN law, damages over and above the stipulated sum may be claimed according to CC § 1336(3). However, in the case of consumer contracts this needs to be individually negotiated to be enforceable. in respect of commercial transactions (4. EVHGB art. 8 no. 3). The same is true for SLOVENIAN law (LOA § 253). By contrast, under GERMAN law the creditor may claim damages for non-performance or improper performance in addition to stipulated payment (CC §§ 340(2), 341(2)). If payment is stipulated for a failure to perform properly (as opposed to a performance which is not tendered), the creditor is entitled to claim both performance and the agreed payment (CC § 341(1)). In CZECH REBLIC a principle is that the creditor may demand interest and damages but the law specifies that the creditor of a monetary debt has right to damages only if there are not covered by legal interest or legal penalty for delay (see CC § 519 and Ccom art. 369.2). These latter rules also apply in GREECE, see CC arts. 406(2) and 407 sentence 2; and in ESTONIA, see LOA §§ 159, 161. In ITALY a payment stipulated for delay in performance may be recovered together with a claim for performance, see CC art.

1383. The same rule is applied in POLISH law, although it is not stated expressly, but appears from CC art. 477 § 1. In FINNISH and DANISH law the solution depends on the interpretation of the term; see Aurejärvi, 151 and Gomard, Obligationsrett II, 237.

III. Reduction

5. Under several systems the court may reduce the stipulated payment if it is manifestly excessive, see AUSTRIAN CC § 1336(2); DANISH, FINNISH and SWEDISH Contracts Acts § 36; SLOVENIAN LOA § 252; DUTCH CC art. 6:94; ITALIAN CC art. 1384 (older case law limiting the application of this provision to an express request by the non-performing party (see Cass. 23 November 1990, no. 11282 in Giust. Civ. Mass. 1990 and Magazzù, Clausola penale, 195 ff) was overruled by more recent decisions stating that the power of reduction may be exercised ex officio but the interested party must give evidence of the disproportion between the value of the contract and the amount of the penalty (see Cass. 23 May 2003, no. 8188 in Giust. Civ. Mass. 2003 and Gazzoni, Manuale di diritto privato, 647 ff); FRENCH and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1152(2); POLISH CC art. 484 § 2; GREEK CC art. 409, even if the parties have agreed otherwise; ESTONIAN LOA § 162 (mandatory in favour of debtor); and GERMAN CC § 343. However in the CZECH REPUBLIC, GERMANY and AUSTRIA a payment stipulated in contracts between merchants cannot be reduced, see Ccom § 348 and Czech Ccom art. 369.1 as commented by Štenglová, Plíva, Tomsa, pp. 1041-1042). At first sight the same rule appears to apply in BELGIUM, see CC art. 1152, which is not restricted to merchants. In GERMANY, however, the payment may be set aside or modified under the general clause of good faith or the rules on unfair terms (CC §§ 242, 307 et seq.) if it would be unconscionable to enforce it, see Baumbach and Hopt, HGB, § 348 no. 5 et seq. Under CZECH commercial law, the right to interest for delay is protected only if it is not qualified in a particular case by a judge as contrary to the principle of fair dealing (see Ccom art. 265 and decision cited in Sou R NS 4/2001, p. 116). And in BELGIUM the Supreme Court has held that if a stipulated payment is so excessive in relation to the loss which was foreseeable at the time the contract was made that it loses its function as a pre-estimate of the loss suffered and becomes a mere private penalty, it should be set aside as violating public policy, see Cass 24 November 1972, R.C.J.B. 1973 302. Even if this is not the case, the stipulated payment may still be reduced if it is manifestly unreasonable at the moment of non-performance, see law of 23 November 1998, in effect confirming Cass. 18 February 1988, Arr. Cass. 1987-88, 790 no. 375; T.B.H./R.D.C. 1988, 636 note Dirix. Under the SPANISH CC art. 1154 the court may reduce payment to an equitable amount if the principal obligation has been performed partly or irregularly. Under POLISH law the stipulated penalty may be reduced by the court on the demand of the debtor if the obligation has been performed in a substantial part or if the stipulated sum is excessive in amount (CC art. 484 § 2). In PORTUGAL reduction is also possible; however, in a decision of the Supreme Court it has been held that the payment may only be reduced if it was stipulated as a pre-estimate of the loss suffered and not if it was made to coerce the defaulting party to perform the principal obligation, see on STJ 3 November 1983, Pinto Monteiro, 474 ff. Conversely, in a decision of the DUTCH Supreme Court, it has been held that the payment may not be reduced if it was stipulated as a pre-estimate of the loss suffered (See HR 3 December 2004, RvdW 2004, 119). See also: UNIDROIT art. 7.4.13(2). In SLOVAKIA reduction is possible only in commercial legal relations (Ccom art. 301). Reduction in other legal relations is impossible, but the court may declare a stipulation as contra bonos mores (contrary to good morals). In such case the creditor may claim damages.

IV. Penalty clauses and liquidated damages clauses

6. In ENGLISH and IRISH law stipulated payment clauses are divided into penalty and liquidated damages clauses. The former are invalid, the latter are valid. Penalty clauses are clauses stipulated "in terrorem" in order to coerce the debtor to perform the principal obligation. Liquidated damages clauses are clauses by which an attempt is made to pre-estimate the loss suffered by a breach of contract. The latter clauses cannot be modified. A clause will be regarded as a penalty clause if it is extravagant and unconscionable in amount in comparison with the greatest loss that could be proved to follow from such a breach, see Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. Ltd v. New Garage and Motor Co. Ltd. [1915] AC 79, 87 (HL). A stipulation is a liquidated damages clause if the circumstances were such that an accurate or precise pre-estimate of the loss was impossible and the stipulated payment was a genuine attempt to make a pre-estimate of the loss, ibid. SCOTTISH law is the same (McBryde, paras. 22.146-22.185); a clause has been upheld when precise assessment of damages was not possible: Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co. Ltd. v. Castaneda (1904) 7 F 77 (HL). The Scottish Law Commission has proposed reforms which would bring Scottish law into line with the above Article (Report on Penalty Clauses (Scot. Law Com. No. 171, 1999).

7. Penalty clause are valid under CZECH commercial law but a disproportionably high penalty may be reduced by judge (see Ccom art. 301).

V. Clauses setting a sum less than the likely loss

8. On clauses which though drafted as penalty or liquidated damages clauses in effect limit the liability of the non-performing party, see notes to Article III.–3:105 (Term excluding or restricting remedies), above.

VI. General

9. See generally ICC Guide to Penalty and Liquidated Damages Clauses no. 478; Fontaine, Contrats, 127-170; Treitel, Remedies, §§ 164-181.

10. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 246(1) a debtor may undertake to pay a certain sum of money in the event of non-performance of the contractual obligations (liquidated damages). A clause stipulating liquidated damages is valid only if in writing. Any provision for interest on liquidated damages is void. Under CC § 246(2) the creditor is entitled to demand payment of liquidated damages even if the creditor sustains no damage, and is entitled to damages for any loss suffered in excess of the liquidated damages as well as other rights resulting from the non-performance. The creditor is entitled, in accordance with the relevant regulations, to demand compensation for damage caused by the non-performance, even if the creditor has not enforced the claim for liquidated damages. Under CC § 246(3) enforcement of liquidated damages stipulated for non-performance precludes any demand for performance. Payment of liquidated damages stipulated for late performance and lack of conformity does not provide an exemption from performance. Under § 247(1) excessive liquidated damages can be reduced by a court. Under § 247(2) the provisions on default interest are applied to default penalties for late payment of cash debts. Under § 247(3) liquidated damages stipulated as security for a claim that cannot be judicially enforced cannot be enforced in a court of law.

III.–3:713: Currency by which damages to be measured

Damages are to be measured by the currency which most appropriately reflects the creditor's loss.

COMMENTS

A. General remarks

Exchange rates between individual currencies are subject to more or less heavy fluctuations. Consequently, the question in which currency damages have to be measured is relevant. Over or under-compensation must be avoided by fixing damages measured by reference to the correct currency. This provision fixes the currency in which damages are to be measured. Technically speaking, the currency of account for damages is laid down.

By contrast, III.–2:109 (Currency of payment) deals in a general way with the currency of payment. If damages (or interest) have arisen in a currency other than the local currency of the place of payment, any conversion into the latter currency is governed by that Article.

Measurement of damages by reference to the most appropriate currency is not yet accepted in all Member States but it seems to be the modern tendency

B. Purpose

Since damages have the purpose of putting the creditor into the same position as if there had been performance (III.–3:702 (General measure of damages)) they have to be expressed in the currency which is most appropriate to achieve that result. Damages therefore should not automatically be measured in the local currency of the court; in most countries judgments in foreign currency are allowed. Even if they are not allowed, but the damages had arisen in a foreign currency and are measured in that currency, the conversion into the local currency at current exchange rates will lead to an appropriate result.

C. Explanation

In view of the vast variety of the facts of international commercial intercourse, the currency of the damages which is most appropriate to compensate the creditor cannot generally be determined with precision. In many cases it will be the contractual currency of account. But where this is not the currency which the creditor had to utilize in order to make good the loss, e.g. by making a cover transaction, the latter currency may be more appropriate, especially if the creditor utilizes the currency of the creditor’s home country for this purpose. Generally this will be the currency in which the creditor makes business deals.

> Illustration 1
> Japanese machine manufacturer C has made a contract for delivery of certain machinery with French importer F. F wrongfully cancels the contract. C's damages have arisen in Japanese yen.

However, the factors may be different.

Illustration 2
As in Illustration 1, but C is an internationally active company stipulating that payments for its export sales are to be made on a US-Dollar bank account in New York. C's lost profits are to be calculated in US dollars.

It is also possible for loss to arise in several currencies.

D. Derived claims

Where a party is entitled to interest, such interest is usually measured and payable in the same currency as the principal. This is so in particular where the interest is expressed as a percentage of the principal sum.

The same is true if the amount of damages is fixed in a contract as a percentage of the price.

Illustration 3
In a construction contract, the parties have agreed on a penalty of 1% of the price for every week of default in completion of the construction, the price being expressed in Euros. The penalty will be due in Euros as well.

E. Autonomy of the parties

Of course, the parties to a contract are free to fix the currency of damages or interest by reference to any currency they like.

NOTES

I. Case law

1. The Article follows the modern ENGLISH and SCOTTISH rule on the currency of damages, which has been developed in The Despina R. & the Folias [1979] A.C. 685 (H.L.) (see also Goode, Commercial Law, 1133; Goode, Payment Obligations, 136 ff; McBryde, para. 24.44). Also in some GERMAN and ITALIAN cases it has been accepted by the courts that a foreign currency may reflect the creditor's loss more appropriately (Germany: especially CA Hamburg 7 December 1978, VersR 1979, 833; Italy: Cass. 6 June 1981 no. 3656, Mass. Foro It. 1981; see also Trib. Udine 24 December 1987, Foro It. 1989, I, 1618). However, in Germany the BGH still accepts that damages may be awarded in the German currency provided that the debtor does not object (BGH 9 February 1977, WM 1977, 478, 479; BGH 10 July 1954, BGHZ 14, 212, 217). In FRANCE, judgment is mostly given in the French currency, but as the tendency is to use the rate of exchange of the date of payment for the conversion (see Réponse Ministerielle no. 949, JCP 1982, IV, 166; Derrida, no. 919 ff; Chartier, no. 442) the result is practically the same as in case of a proper foreign currency judgment. In SPAIN a decision of the Tribunal Supremo (TS 26 November 1987) has calculated damages in foreign currency but converted to the Spanish currency according to the official rate of exchange of the day of the definitive judgment. The same holds true in GREECE under CC art. 291 which, however, focuses on the official rate of exchange at the date of payment. Claims for damages in foreign currency are accepted by the courts in AUSTRIA (see e.g. CA Wien 8 July 1987, REDOK 12.624). ; the relevant time for converting is the time when the obligation is due (see e.g. Ehrenzweig (-Mayrhofer) Schuldrecht AT, 49-53).

2. Under DUTCH CC art. 6:121 when, pursuant to an obligation, payment must be made in a currency other than that of the country where the payment must be made, the debtor is entitled to pay in the currency of the place of payment. There is a similar rule under the ESTONIAN LOA § 93(3).

II. Legal writers

3. The position of legal writers in Europe appears not to be uniform. Whereas in ITALY judgments awarding damages in foreign currency have been criticized (Ascarelli 416, Campeis & De Pauli 412 ff), there is support for awarding damages in foreign currency not only in ENGLAND and in BELGIUM (Fallon, Annal. dr. Liège 33 (1988) 77-89; Niyonzima 206 ff nos. 233, 214 no. 239), but also in GERMANY, where some authors advocate a more careful analysis of the currency of the loss and propose following either the very wide English formula (Alberts, NJW 1989, 609, 612; idem, Währungsschwankungen 48 f, 135, 137, 166) or, more precisely, recommend the creditor's currency (von Hoffmann 125-141) or the currency of the assets of the creditor (Remien, RabelsZ 53 (1989) 245-292). See also in GREECE Kallimopoulos 130-138, 350-375. In SPAIN, traditional doctrinal analysis and case law (TS 7 November 1957, 6 April 1963) favoured payment in the national currency but more recent scholarship would allow the debtor the choice: Paz-Ares.

4. In POLISH law there is no corresponding regulation or coherent case law, but under Polish law a principle corresponding to the Article should be applied. Polish courts can calculate and award damages in the currency in which the loss was suffered or which reflects the creditor’s loss. In SLOVAKIA there are no provisions, but the courts may award damages in foreign currency only if the party is a foreigner or if the defending party has an account in foreign currency (CCP § 155 (2)).

III. Currency of the contract

5. It is sometimes thought that damages for breach of contract should be measured in the currency of account of the contract (Staudinger (-K. Schmidt) § 244 no. 17), but such a rule is not accepted in ENGLISH practice (see The Despina R and the Folias, ibid. 700-701) and also disputed in GERMANY (see Remien, RabelsZ 53 (1989) 245, 276-280: only where contractual claims for damages take the place of a contractual claim for the price). Under CZECH commercial law, in international relationships the debtor is expressly obliged to pay damages in an agreed currency or in the currency of the place of payment (see Ccom art. 731 and commentary by Štenglová, Plíva, Tomsa to Ccom art. 744). See also UNIDROIT art. 7.4.12.

CHAPTER 4: PLURALITY OF DEBTORS AND CREDITORS

Section 1: Plurality of debtors

III.–4:101: Scope of Section

This Section applies where two or more debtors are bound to perform one obligation.

COMMENTS

Section 1 of this Chapter is not intended to cover all cases of plurality of debtors. It deals only with those cases which call for regulation because of their practical importance or theoretical difficulty. So, it does not cover, for example, multiple obligations arising from a number of different contracts concluded in order to meet a single objective, such as orders given by a trader to several suppliers to satisfy the needs of the trader's customers. The fact that several debtors are bound by parallel obligations arising from distinct contracts does not affect the legal nature of each debt. The situation is the same when distinct obligations arise under the same contract. The problems which require resolution arise where there is one obligation with two or more co-debtors and in certain specific cases where two or more debtors are liable under closely related obligations – for example, where they are liable for the same damage. The Article makes it clear that the scope of the Section is confined to such cases. It follows that in subsequent Articles in the Section references to the debtors must be read as references to co-debtors who are within the scope of the Section.

It should be noted that in the case of a contractual obligation the debtors' liability need not arise from one contract. It could, and often does, happen that A is bound under one contract to perform an obligation and B then, by another contract, undertakes to perform the same obligation as a co-debtor. If this is really a security obligation then Book IV.D. on personal securities will be the primary source of rules on the rights and obligations of the parties. The ordinary co-debtorship rules of the present Chapter will apply so far as not inconsistent with the personal security rules. This result is achieved by IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for security purposes) which provides that "A co-debtorship for security purposes is subject to the rules of Parts 1 and 4 and, subsidiarily, to the rules on plurality of debtors".

III.–4:102: Solidary, divided and joint obligations

(1) An obligation is solidary when each debtor is bound to perform the obligation in full and the creditor may require performance from any of them until full performance has been received.

(2) An obligation is divided when each debtor is bound to perform only part of the obligation and the creditor may claim from each debtor only performance of that debtor's part.

(3) An obligation is joint when the debtors are bound to perform the obligation together and the creditor may require performance only from all of them together.

COMMENTS

A. General remarks

The Article deals with three types of plural obligations - solidary obligations, divided obligations and joint obligations. Solidary obligations and divided obligations are known in all legal systems, with variations in terminology and detail, but not all laws expressly recognise joint obligations. Legal systems which do not recognise joint obligations sometimes have a category of "indivisible obligations" which covers much of the same ground. French law gives indivisibility a special role in the law of succession: i.e. a debt which is indivisible, in contrast to a solidary debt, is not divided among the heirs (CC 1217 ff). It goes without saying that the fact that a contract is governed by these rules does not prevent the parties, to the extent permitted by the law of succession, from supplementing a solidarity clause, covered by these rules, with a clause of indivisibility for the purpose of obtaining particular effects in relation to succession.

B. Solidary obligations

Paragraph (1) of the Article defines solidary obligations, which are the plural obligations most frequently encountered in practice. The definition reflects their characteristic features. The creditor can claim the whole performance from any one of the debtors, without being obliged to involve all the debtors or even warn them. The debtor against whom the claim is made cannot compel the creditor to divide the claim.

> Illustration 1
> A lends €10,000 to B and C. The contract contains a clause of solidarity. A can claim repayment of the loan from B or C according to choice.

Having the option of claiming the whole performance from any of the debtors, the creditor is in a position, if that debtor fails to perform, to put into operation right away the various remedies for non-performance provided by these rules. So, the creditor can terminate the contractual relationship in whole or in part if the selected debtor's non-performance of a contractual obligation is fundamental. Similarly, the creditor can withhold performance of reciprocal obligations so long as the selected debtor has not performed or tendered performance. However, the other debtors can perform the obligation in order to put a stop to the termination or the withholding of performance. As this is a case where the other debtors have a legitimate interest in performance the creditor cannot refuse their performance.

C. Divided obligations

Paragraph (2) defines divided obligations. They are distinguished from solidary obligations in that each of the debtors is liable for only part of the performance due. The debtors have separate liability for their own shares. So the creditor cannot claim the whole performance from one of the debtors but must necessarily divide the claim.

Illustration 2
A lends €10,000 to B and C. The contract provides that B must repay €8000 and C €2000. A can claim only the agreed part from each.

The effects of non-performance by one of the debtors on the operation of the creditor's right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligations or to terminate for fundamental non-performance are very different in this case. Non-performance by one of the debtors leads, in principle, only to partial termination. Where a contract gives rise to divided obligations the situation falls within the rules on termination for fundamental non-performance in relation to obligations which are to be performed in separate parts or are otherwise divisible. Similarly, the creditor may not, as a general rule, withhold performance except partially. Where, however, the performance due by the creditor is indivisible, the debtors having only a joint right, the withholding will necessarily be total.

Three farmers, A, B and C, order twelve sacks of winter wheat seed from a producer, D, for a price of €9000. The contract provides that each buyer is liable only for a one-third share (€3000). A becomes insolvent. D could terminate only the obligations relating to A's share.

Illustration 4
Two farmers, A and B, order an agricultural machine from a manufacturer, C. The contract provides that the two buyers are to be under separate obligations for the price, payable on delivery. A and B having a joint right against C for delivery of the machine (see Article III.–5:202(3)), C can withhold delivery so long as A does not pay A's part of the price.

D. Joint obligations

Paragraph (3) defines joint obligations, which are characterised by the unitary nature of the obligation binding the several debtors. Joint obligations are more rare in practice. They relate to performances which by their nature have to be rendered in common by several debtors, bound to the creditor by a single contract.

A joint obligation is distinguished from a solidary obligation in that the creditor in a joint obligation can take action only against all the debtors together. It is distinguished from a divided obligation in that the performance due by each debtor is not limited to an independent performance of that debtor's own share of the obligation. The joint obligation is not simply a combination of isolated parts of an obligation. Each of the debtors is obliged to collaborate with the others to provide the common performance.

A recording company enters into a single contract with several musicians who are to play a symphony with a view to making a record. In the event of non-performance, the recording company will have to take action against all the musicians.

The owners of a piece of ground wish to have a house built. If they approach contractors in different trades, asking for a single performance (namely the construction of the house), and if the co-contractors agree to work together to achieve that result, the obligation will be a joint one.

The non-performance of one of the debtors in a joint obligation necessarily has an effect on the obligation as a whole. It follows that the creditor can terminate for fundamental non-performance even if the non-performance is imputable to only one of the debtors. Similarly, the creditor can withhold reciprocal performance totally, even if the failure to give or tender the debtors' performance emanates from only one of the debtors.

NOTES

I. General

1. The Article reproduces the two types of obligations most widely recognised in legal systems, solidary and divided obligations. The main originality is in expressly recognising the joint obligation (not recognised in this form in many systems, see under IV below) and in not providing for certain other types of concurrent obligations frequently found in Europe, namely the indivisible obligation and the obligation in solidum.

2. A number of legal systems deal with indivisibility alongside solidarity: AUSTRIA (CC §§ 890-895); SPAIN (CC arts. 1149-1151 however, there is no explicit extension of the solidarity regime to the joint obligations); FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG (CC arts. 1217-1224, the principle of division of debts among the heirs by operation of law, even where the debts are solidary, being found in art. 1220); GREECE (CC arts. 494-495); ITALY (CC arts. 1316-1320); the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:6(2)); PORTUGAL (CC art. 535); and the CZECH REPUBLIC (CC §§ 511 ff). The GERMAN CC § 431 also mentions indivisible obligations as giving rise to solidary liability. This is also the position of CZECH law (see CC § 511.1). Under POLISH law debtors bound to perform an indivisible obligation are liable for rendering the performance as solidary debtors (i.e. they are not solidary debtors as such but their obligations are as those of solidary ones). In addition, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, debtors bound to perform a divisible obligation are liable as solidary debtors, if the reciprocal obligation of the creditor is indivisible (Polish CC art. 380). Some of the texts cited above mention natural indivisibility and conventional indivisibility. However, indivisibility does not seem to be the object of any special developments in the NORDIC countries or in ENGLAND, IRELAND or SCOTLAND. The SLOVENIAN law is familiar with solidary, joint and divided obligations.

3. In CZECH law, solidarity may be presumed: the Ccom presumes solidarity of debtors in commercial relations, if there is doubt about the character of the obligation (Ccom art. 293). Also Czech civil law recognises that solidarity may be not only expressly stipulated or agreed but also implied because is stated that the solidary obligation may be stipulated by legal provisions, found by a court decision, agreed between the parties or it can follow from the nature of the performance (see CC § 511.1).

4. FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG laws recognise an obligation in solidum, in relation to jointly caused damage, which differs from an ordinary solidary obligation. This obligation in solidum has developed in the law on non-contractual liability for damage in order to compensate the fact that solidarity is not presumed. French judges may declare obligations in solidum (See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], no. 1261). The obligation in solidum does not have the secondary effects of a normal solidary obligation under these laws, such as the fact that a formal notice given to one of the debtors is deemed to be equally effective in relation to the others. These secondary effects (which have no equivalent in these rules) flow from the idea of a community of interests which is supposed to unite solidary debtors and which is generally absent when the same damage is caused by several persons.

5. According to SLOVAK law an indivisible obligation of several debtors is treated as a solidary obligation unless a legal regulation stipulates or parties agree otherwise, or if it follows from the nature of the performance that it has to be rendered by joint activity of all debtors. (Lazar, OPH II, 21) As for an indivisible performance to two or more creditors, the debtor is entitled to perform to any of the creditors unless the parties agreed on something else. The debt is discharged by performance to one of the creditors. However, the debtor does not have to perform to one creditor without the consent of the other creditors.

II. Solidary obligations

6. Most European codes recognise solidarity and give a definition similar to that in the Article: see: the GERMAN CC §§ 421 ff; the AUSTRIAN CC § 891; the SPANISH CC art. 1137; the CC's of FRANCE, BELGIUM AND LUXEMBOURG arts. 1200 ff; the GREEK CC art. 481; the ITALIAN CC arts. 1292 ff; the NETHERLANDS CC arts. 6:1 ff; the PORTUGUESE CC art. 512; the ESTONIAN LOA § 65(1); the CZECH CC §§ 511 and 514; the SLOVENIAN LOA §§ 395–405; the POLISH CC arts. 366-367 (which provide separately for solidarity of debtors and solidarity of creditors); the SLOVAK CC §§ 511 and 513 (which provide separately for solidarity of debtors and solidarity of creditors). In the NORDIC countries, doctrine adopts the same definition and the uniform Nordic Promissory Note Act (PNA) (DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN) makes use of it see § 2. In ENGLISH law, the category of "joint and several" debts corresponds to solidary obligations (Chitty on Contracts I[29], chap. 17). The Article does not contain a precise equivalent to the English "joint liability", under which all the joint debtors must be sued, and on the death of one liability passes to the survivors, but performance by any one of the joint debtors discharges them all: see Chitty on Contracts I[29], nos. 17-009–17-015). In IRISH law solidary obligations, described as in solidum, are expressly regulated by Part 3 of the Civil Liability Act 1961 which deals with liability to make reparation for damage caused by several persons. The rules are very similar to those in the text. SCOTTISH law also recognises solidary obligations, using the terms "joint and several" or in solidum to describe them (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], no. 3.13).

III. Divided obligations

7. Divided obligations, known by various terms, are the rule where there is no presumption of solidarity. It is sometimes even presumed that in any case of plurality of debtors the obligation is divided: see e.g. the SPANISH CC art. 1138 and the POLISH CC art. 379 § 1. The idea of separate liability is often linked with that of divided or divisible obligations. The national texts either define the divisible obligation by reference to the indivisible obligation (e.g. the FRENCH CC art. 1217) or refer to it as a notion on its own (GERMAN CC § 420; AUSTRIAN CC § 889; GREEK CC art. 480; ITALIAN CC art. 1314; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:6(1)); ESTONIAN LOA § 63(1); the POLISH CC art. 379 § 2: the performance is deemed divisible, if it can be rendered partially without essentially changing the object or value); and SLOVENIAN LOA § 393 (the obligation is divisible if what is owed can be divided and performed in parts that have the same quality as the total). Slovenian law presumes solidarity of divided obligations for commercial contracts, unless otherwise agreed (see LOA § 394). There is not an express regulation of divided obligations in CZECH law. The notion of divided obligation ("dílčí závazek") was created by reasoning a contrario mainly on the basis of CC § 511: a divided obligation is a common obligation which is not considered solidary by the legislator, by a judge or by an agreement between the parties (see the provision of CC § 511 and its commentary by Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 639).

8. According to the SLOVAK legal literature a performance is commonly regarded as divisible if the object of the performance is technically and legally divisible (Lazar, OPH II, 20). In FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG the principle of division of debts among the heirs by operation of law, even where the debts are solidary, is found in CC art. 1220.

IV. Joint obligations

9. The notion of the joint obligation is unknown in most national laws. Its effects partly overlap those of the obligation which is indivisible by nature. It is found however in GERMAN doctrine and case law (see Staudinger (-Noack), BGB [2005], Pref. to § 420 nos. 24 et seq.) and it is codified in ESTONIAN law (LOA § 64) in terms corresponding to paragraph (3) of the above Article. The concept is also found in AUSTRIAN law, see Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger (-Bydlinski), ABGB[2], § 890 no. 4. ITALIAN doctrine also speaks of the indivisible obligation to be performed collectively (Bianca, Diritto civile IV, 767-771). In SLOVENIAN law the concept of joint obligations is known from family law where there is joint property of spouses consisting of rights and obligations. It is therefore clear that such a concept does exist in Slovenian law. It is also regulated in the LOA § 416 with analogous application of rule on solidarity. In CZECH law the concept of joint obligation (and joint performance) can be found in commercial law (Ccom art. 295 for commentary see Štenglová/Plíva/Tomsa, Commercial Code[11], 977). A concept near to joint obligation appears also in the CZECH CC § 145 which deals with the property of spouses (see expressions joint performance of an obligation, joint liability) but it does not give the creditor a right to joint performance and the concept of joint obligation of spouses is unanimously analysed as a solidary obligation within the meaning of the Article (see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 418).

10. The HUNGARIAN CC § 334 provides as follows. (1) If an obligation is owed by several persons or can be claimed by several persons and this obligation is divisible, each debtor owes only that debtor's own share, and each creditor may claim only that creditor's due share, unless provided otherwise by legal regulation. In case of doubt, the share of the debtors or creditors is equal. (2) If an obligation is indivisible, performance can be demanded from any or all of the debtors. (3) If several persons are entitled to an indivisible obligation, it must be performed into the hands of all of them. Any of the creditors may require the object of the obligation to be deposited in court for the benefit of all of them.

III.–4:103: When different types of obligation arise

(1) Whether an obligation is solidary, divided or joint depends on the terms regulating the obligation.

(2) If the terms do not determine the question, the liability of two or more debtors to perform the same obligation is solidary. Liability is solidary in particular where two or more persons are liable for the same damage.

(3) The fact that the debtors are not liable on the same terms or grounds does not prevent solidarity.

COMMENTS

A. General

This article sets out the situations where the different types of plural obligation arise. The basic rule is that the character of an obligation depends on the terms of the contract or other juridical act or rule of law giving rise to the obligation.

B. Default rule of solidarity

Often the terms regulating the obligation will not say whether it is solidary, divided or joint. In some cases that will not be a problem; the nature of the obligation or the circumstances of the case may provide an answer. It will almost always be obvious from the nature of the obligation or the circumstances when an obligation is joint. For example, a contract with 28 street entertainers for the construction of a human pyramid containing them all gives rise by its very nature to a joint obligation. Sometimes the circumstances will indicate that an obligation is to be a divided one.

> Illustration 1
> A and B order, by one contract, a fixed quantity of fuel to be delivered to different tanks. The reason for the combined order is to benefit from a reduction in price. Their obligation to pay will be a divided one if the contract provides that each is to be liable for only half the price. The same result will follow if the parties have agreed that the supplier will send separate bills to A and B, that being a tacit indication that the parties wished to provide for a divided obligation.

In many cases, however, it will not be clear whether an obligation is solidary or divided. If A and B bind themselves to pay X €1000 and it is obvious that X is to receive no more than €1000 it is not clear whether the obligation is solidary or divided. It is necessary to have a default rule.

The laws of the Member States have different approaches on this question. However, the solidary obligation is clearly better from the creditor's point of view and can perhaps be said to be the natural interpretation of provisions providing for plural liability for one obligation. If A and B say "We oblige ourselves to pay X €1000 but only €1000 in total is due" then that can reasonably be read as meaning that each is bound to pay the full amount provided that the total payable to X is only €1000. If they want to provide that each is liable for a part then they should say so. The same applies, although perhaps with less force, to obligations arising by operation of law. Paragraph (2) therefore provides for a default rule of solidary liability when there are two or more debtors but one single obligation. It is justified because the natural implication from the fact that A and B are both bound, without any qualification, to perform the same obligation is that each is bound to perform in full if called upon to do so.

Several friends conclude a contract with a landlord for the rent of a holiday villa in the south of France. The landlord can claim the whole rent from one of the tenants under the rule in paragraph (2).

Illustration 3
Several students come across a holiday chalet in the mountains and occupy it for two weeks without permission. They are liable under the law on unjustified enrichment to pay an equivalent of rent. Their liability will be solidary.

C. Solidarity when several persons liable for same damage

Paragraph (2) provides, in order to protect the victim of damage caused by several people, that the obligation of reparation arising out of damage is solidary. The victim can therefore claim reparation for the harm from any one of those responsible for it. This solidarity applies whatever the nature of the responsibility in question. One of those responsible could be bound contractually, the other non-contractually. (On recourse between the co-debtors, see III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors))

Illustration 4
A, an employer, and B, an employee, are bound by a contract of employment containing a lawful restrictive covenant. C employs B with full knowledge that this violates the contract. B and C will be solidarily liable to A. B is contractually liable for breach of the restrictive covenant and C is liable for wrongfully inducing the breach of contract.

D. Debtors not liable on same terms or grounds

Paragraph (3) deals with the case where the conditions required for solidarity are fulfilled but the liability of one or more of the debtors is subject to a qualification, such as a condition or a time limit. The existence of this qualification does not prevent solidarity. The same rule applies when the liability of one of the debtors, but not others, is backed by a security.

Illustration 5
A, B and C borrow funds to buy a building from D. B's liability is subject to the condition that a purchaser can be found for B's present house within a year. This condition affecting B's liability does not prevent the debt of A, B and C from being solidary. Similarly, the solidary character of the obligation is not excluded if A's debt is secured and the debts of B and C are unsecured.

More generally, the fact that the debtors are not liable on the same terms or grounds does not prevent solidarity. For example, one might be liable as a debtor and the other as a security provider (see e.g. IV.G.–2:105 (Solidary liability of security provider) or one might be directly liable and the other vicariously liable (see e.g. VI.–6:105 (Solidary liability).

I. Presumption of solidarity in contractual obligations

1. National solutions are diverse and can be classified in three categories. First, GERMAN law (CC § 427); ITALIAN law (CC art. 1294, except in succession matters); ESTONIAN law (LOA § 65(2)-(4)); SLOVAK law (Ccom art. 293 applies to commercial relationships); and the NORDIC countries have a general presumption of solidarity in the circumstances indicated in the paragraph. For AUSTRIA see Ehrenzweig and Ehrenzweig, System II(1)[3], 100; Secondly, in some countries, such as: GREECE (CC art. 480); the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:6(1)); SCOTLAND (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], no. 3.13); SPAIN (CC arts. 1137 and 1138); SLOVAKIA (CC § 511(1)); and POLAND (CC art. 369), solidarity in contractual obligations is not presumed and there is therefore no solidarity unless it is provided for. However, in commercial debts (mainly, guarantees), case law in SPAIN has established that solidarity is the residual rule (Carrasco Perrera/Cordero Lobato/Marín Lopéz, Derechos de Garantía, 78). Thirdly, some legal systems distinguish between civil obligations, where solidarity is not presumed, and commercial obligations, where it is presumed. (See e.g. FRENCH and BELGIAN CC art. 1202, which can be displaced – and is widely displaced – by commercial custom; CZECH law where a general civil law principle is that unless otherwise provided the obligation is divided (unanimous interpretation of CC § 511) but the Ccom presumes - for a similar obligation - the solidarity of the debtors (Ccom art. 293); PORTUGUESE CC art. 513 and Ccom art. 100 and SLOVENIAN LOA § 394).

2. In ENGLISH law the question is one of interpretation of the contract (Treitel, The Law of Contract[11], nos. 13-002-13-003). In FRANCE, it has been suggested that the exception mentioned above (solidarity) has - and should - become the principle. In practice, solidary obligations are commonly used, either as a result of a legal disposition (solidary obligations are founded on the notion of common interests, common liability or credit protection) or a contractual stipulation

II. Solidarity between joint wrongdoers

3. Solidarity between those responsible for the same harm is very widely recognised. See e.g. the GERMAN CC § 840(1); the AUSTRIAN CC §§ 1301-1304; the SPANISH Criminal Code art. 116 and various civil regulations (i.e. on hunting activities, building undertakings, etc.); the GREEK CC arts. 926-927; the IRISH Civil Liability Act 1961 ss. 11(1), 12(1) and 21; the ITALIAN CC art. 2055(1); the NETHERLANDS CC art. 601; the PORTUGUESE CC arts. 497(1) and 507(1); the ENGLISH Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978 s. 1(1); the SCOTTISH Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1940 s. 3(1); the ESTONIAN LOA § 137(1); the CZECH CC § 438.1; the POLISH CC art. 441; and the SLOVAK CC § 438 (If the damage is caused by several wrongdoers, they are liable jointly and severally. In special cases, however, the court may decide that those who caused the damage are liable individually according to their participation in causing it.). Liability in solidum between those responsible for the same harm is recognised by case law in FRANCE, BELGIUM (Cass. 10 July 1952, Arr.Cass. 1952, 650), LUXEMBOURG and DENMARK, see Gomard, Obligationsret IV, 35. The sharing of the liability for reparation among those responsible is done in different ways in different countries.

III. Debtors not liable on same terms

4. The solution adopted in paragraph (3) is very generally admitted, if not in the texts of national laws, at least in the doctrine. See e.g. the SPANISH CC art. 1140; the FRENCH CC art. 1201; the ITALIAN CC art. 1293; the PORTUGUESE CC art. 512(2); the CZECH CC §§ 438.2 and 511.2 and the POLISH CC art. 368. For ENGLISH law see Chitty on Contracts I[29], nos. 17-029–17-030.

III.–4:104: Liability under divided obligations

Debtors bound by a divided obligation are liable in equal shares.

COMMENTS

This Article provides a default rule which comes into play when the share of a divided obligation for which each debtor is liable cannot be otherwise established. The rule in III – 4:103 (When different types of obligations arise) paragraph (2) makes divided obligations more rare, which limits the scope of the present rule in practice.

Illustration
A and B undertake to repay a sum of €10,000 to C. The contract contains a clause excluding solidarity between the debtors. A and B will each have to repay €5000.

NOTES

1. This rule is often provided by the texts of national laws. See e.g. the GERMAN CC § 420; the AUSTRIAN CC § 889; the SPANISH CC art. 1138; the GREEK CC art. 480; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:6(1); the PORTUGUESE CC art. 534; SLOVAK CC § 512, Ccom art. 294; CZECH CC §§ 511(2) and 512, Ccom art. 294 in fine; ESTONIAN LOA § 63(1); SLOVENIAN LOA § 393(2); and the POLISH CC art. 379 § 1. In other countries doctrine admits the rule without difficulty: SCOTLAND: Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], no. 3.13. There does not appear to be a presumption in ENGLISH law.
2. In FRANCE, plural obligations, whether passive or active, are in principle divided (obligations conjointes), in the absence of solidarity (legal, contractual or customary) or of the application of the concept of obligation in solidum or of indivisibility (objective - which may derive from the nature of things (CC art. 1121 - or subjective). Each debtor is liable only for that debtor's share of the obligation, normally in equal shares (parts viriles), and the creditor may only claim such share from each. The creditor bears the risk of a co-debtor's insolvency. It may be noted that solidary obligations may become divided obligations as CC art. 1120 contains a special rule by which heirs to the debtor are liable, not in equal shares, but as determined by their succession rights, even if solidarity was stipulated (See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 1181 nos. 1242 et seq.). However, the principle of divided obligations is limited in scope since joint obligations are common practice in contract law and solidarity is presumed in commercial contracts by virtue of commercial usages. The position is the same in BELGIUM (van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, 542).

III.–4:105: Joint obligations: special rule when money claimed for non-performance

Notwithstanding III.–4:102 (Solidary, divided and joint obligations) paragraph (3), when money is claimed for non-performance of a joint obligation, the debtors have solidary liability for payment to the creditor.

COMMENTS

This provision states clearly the principle (found in some laws) that the debtors of a joint obligation have, in any case when money is claimed for total or partial non-performance, a solidary responsibility towards the creditor. It follows that the creditor can claim damages from any one of the debtors. Two considerations justify this rule. First, it is an extension of the principle of the joint obligation. The debtors being liable collectively, it is logical that they should assume full responsibility in the event of non-performance due to the acts of one of them. Secondly, the obligation to pay damages, unlike the primary obligation to perform, is divided since it consists of a right to a sum of money. It is therefore capable of being satisfied by one of the debtors alone. It follows that each debtor should be held liable for the whole.

Debtors who performed their part or who were prepared to do so will often have remedies for non-performance of contractual obligations against the debtor who was responsible for the non-performance, at least if this debtor is not excused from performing. This will enable them to claim damages to cover the whole of the loss which they have suffered. In certain cases the damages could exceed the sum which the non-performing debtor was due to pay to the creditor.

A contracts with B, a firm of masons and plumbers, and C, a carpenter, for the construction of a country cottage. B and C undertake a joint obligation to A of collective performance and corresponding obligations to each other. B does its work but C does not. In any proceedings by A for damages, B cannot avail itself of the fact that it has done its part of the work. On the other hand, B can avail itself of that fact in the context of its remedies against C.

Illustration 2
A recording company enters into a single contract with several musicians who are to play a symphony with a view to making a record. This is a joint obligation. The musicians also incur mutual contractual obligations to each other. One of the musicians does not turn up. As the recording cannot proceed without all the musicians being present, those who are present and ready to perform on the agreed day cannot plead, in any subsequent action against them by the creditor, that they were ready to play. But they will be able to found on that fact in the context of an action for damages brought by them against the musician who failed to turn up.

NOTES

1. As the notion of the joint obligation is not used in most laws there is little to be found on its operation. The rule of the Article is found, however, in most laws in relation to indivisible obligations. See above. GERMAN jurisprudence is divided on this question. The BGH has held that the debtors are solidarily liable in case of non-performance (BGH 18 October 1951, LM § 278 no. 2/3). On the other hand, the BAG has held that only the debtor responsible for the non-performance is liable to the creditor (BAG 24 April 1974, BAGE 26, 130). The same rule is to be found in the SLOVENIAN LOA § 416. In SLOVAK law there is no explicit regulation corresponding to the Article. Similarly, the CZECH CC does not have a comparable provision, but the same result will usually follow from the "nature of the performance", which is one of the statutory causes giving rise to solidarity (CC § 511). Nevertheless, the same construction is also possible on the basis of CC § 512.1 and Ccom art. 293 ff. Each qualification depends on the circumstances of the individual case. Solidary liability as prescribed by the Article is supported by ESTONIAN writers (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Käerdi), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 64, no. 4.3). In ENGLISH law, where two or more debtors have joined together to promise to perform one obligation (joint liability), each is liable for the performance of the whole promise. In this situation, all debtors must generally be joined as defendants to the action (Kendall v. Hamilton (1879) 4 App. Cas. 504, 544 (HL)) (Halsbury's Laws of England IX[4], no. 1080). However, payment by one debtor discharges the other's obligation. If liability is solidary ("joint and several"), which arises when two or more persons join together to promise to perform an obligation and also promise to perform individually, payment by one will discharge the other (Halsbury's Laws of England IX[4] , no. 1079).

2. In SCOTTISH law, where joint debtors have an obligation to do a particular act other than the payment of money, non-performance will mean that each debtor is liable for the whole amount awarded as damages, with a right of relief against the co-debtor for its share (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], no. 3.13). Under POLISH law, the general principle applies that solidary debtors remain fully liable until the creditor is fully satisfied (CC art. 366 § 2).

3. In SPANISH law liability for damages for non-performance of a joint obligation, regulated in the CC art. 1150 arises from the moment that one of the debtors fails to perform. The other debtors, who want to fulfil their part of the obligation are obliged to pay only their respective shares of the damages, while the debtor who failed to perform is obliged to satisfy all the lucrum cesans and damnum emergens created. The CC provision does not specify if the secondary obligation (payment of the damages) is regarded as divided or rather solidary. However, the Supreme Court takes the view that the joint obligation after the non-performance is transformed into a divided one, when there is an impossibility of in natura performance (TS 19 February 1959, RJ 1959/486; TS 10 October 1995, RJ 1995/8254). In SPANISH law a joint obligation can never be created when the performance is divisible; according to the CC art. 1138. If performance is divisible the obligation is divided, unless solidarity is stipulated in the terms of the obligation. Therefore the liability of the debtors of a joint obligation when the creditor claims money for the non-performance will never be solidary in Spanish law (except for the case when the solidarity of this secondary obligation is explicitly established), but divided, because of the divisible nature of the object of claim.

4. In FRANCE, the notion of joint obligations is not found in legal provisions: the principle is divided obligations (CC art. 1220), and the exception is solidary obligations.

5. The basic rule in SWEDISH law is the same as in the Article, see SKL chap. 6 § 4, expressing a general principle of Swedish law.

III.–4:106: Apportionment between solidary debtors

(1) As between themselves, solidary debtors are liable in equal shares.

(2) If two or more debtors have solidary liability for the same damage, their share of liability as between themselves is equal unless different shares of liability are more appropriate having regard to all the circumstances of the case and in particular to fault or to the extent to which a source of danger for which one of them was responsible contributed to the occurrence or extent of the damage.

COMMENTS

A. Default rule of equality

In providing a default rule of equal sharing, paragraph (1) adopts a natural and logical rule in line with III.–4:104 (Liability under divided obligations).

Illustration 1
A lends €10,000 to B and C. The contract contains a clause of solidarity. If B has paid the €10,000 to the creditor, B will be able to reclaim €5000 from C.

The rule of equal sharing is laid down only as a general rule. Unequal sharing may result from an express or implied provision of the contract or other juridical act or from the rule of law regulating the obligation .

Illustration 2
A and B order from C, by a contract including a clause of solidarity, a fixed quantity of fuel to be delivered into two tanks of different volume. 10,000 litres are to be delivered to A and 5000 to B. C claims payment from A who pays the whole amount. A will have a right of recourse against B but there is in the circumstances an implied provision of the contract that this will be only for the price of 5000 litres.

Illustration 3
D lends €60,000 to A, B and C who are made solidarily liable. A is to receive €30,000. B and C are to receive €15,000 each. A pays the whole amount and can reclaim a share from B and C but again there is in the circumstances an implied provision of the contract that A can reclaim from each of B and C only the amount of their part of the loan, namely €15,000, and not €20,000.

B. Rule for cases of damage

Paragraph (2) contains a special rule for cases of solidary liability resulting from causing the same damage, a matter which is treated rather differently in the various laws. The starting point is equal liability as between the solidary debtors but this applies only if another method of sharing is not more appropriate in the circumstances having regard in particular to fault or to the extent to which a source of danger for which one of them was responsible contributed to the occurrence or extent of the damage.

Illustration 4
Three companies are liable for loss caused to another company by unfair competition consisting of the release of products on to the market. The three companies are not equally at fault. They submit their dispute to arbitration. The arbitrator could apportion the liability between them according to the degree of seriousness of their respective wrongdoing.

NOTES

I. Presumption of equality

1. A presumption, or default rule, of equal shares is contained in some civil codes. See e.g. the GERMAN CC § 426(1); the AUSTRIAN CC § 896; the FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs art. 1213; the GREEK CC art. 487; the ITALIAN CC art. 1298; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:1; the ESTONIAN LOA § 69(1); the PORTUGUESE CC art. 516; the SLOVAK CC § 511(2); the SLOVENIAN LOA § 405; the CZECH CC § 511.2; and the POLISH CC art. 376 § 1. Elsewhere it is recognised by doctrine. See, e.g. for ENGLISH law, Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 17-027 and for SCOTTISH law Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], no. 3.14. The presumption does not exist in IRISH law.

II. Wrongful damage

2. The sharing of liability for damages between those responsible for the same damage is done in different ways in different legal systems. Sometimes it is done according to the degree of seriousness of the wrongdoing of those involved. This is the case, for example, in FRENCH jurisprudence; under the DANISH Law on Damages for Wrongful Acts § 25; under the GREEK CC art. 926 and under the POLISH CC art. 441 § 2, but in non-contractual matters only. Elsewhere causal participation is what matters. See the GERMAN CC § 254; the AUSTRIAN CC § 1302 if that is determinable, otherwise there is solidary liability; the ITALIAN CC art. 2055(2) and (3); and SPANISH jurisprudence. According to the ESTONIAN LOA § 137(2), in such cases liability is divided taking into account all the circumstances, in particular the gravity of the non-performance (or the unlawful character of other conduct) and the degree of risk borne by each person. Finally, under the ENGLISH Civil Liability Contribution Act 1978 s. 2, and the SCOTTISH Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1940 s. 3(1) the matter is left to the discretion of the judge: see Chitty on Contracts, no. 17-034. It is the same in IRISH law under s. 21(2) of the Civil Liability Act 1961. In CZECH law, the principle of solidarity is applied between wrongdoers and equal liability is presumed (CC § 438.1) but the provision establishes the judge's power to divide the liability according to the proportionate share of the blame for causing the damage (see CC § 438.2 and Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 538). According to the SLOVAK CC § 439 the person who is liable for damages solidarily with others, settles with them according to their respective participations in causing the damage.

3. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 338(1) persons under solidary liability owe their obligations in equal shares, unless their legal relationship implies otherwise. If a co-debtor has performed in excess of that debtor's own obligation, there is a right to reimbursement from the other co-debtors up to the value of their share of the claim. Under CC § 338(2) none of the debtors may refer to an advantage against the others that they have received from the creditor. Under CC § 338(3) security rights held by the creditor pass to the debtor who has effected performance to the creditor, if that debtor is entitled to demand reimbursement from the other debtors.

III.–4:107: Recourse between solidary debtors

(1) A solidary debtor who has performed more than that debtor's share has a right to recover the excess from any of the other debtors to the extent of each debtor's unperformed share, together with a share of any costs reasonably incurred.

(2) A solidary debtor to whom paragraph (1) applies may also, subject to any prior right and interest of the creditor, exercise the rights and actions of the creditor, including any supporting security rights, to recover the excess from any of the other debtors to the extent of each debtor's unperformed share.

(3) If a solidary debtor who has performed more than that debtor's share is unable, despite all reasonable efforts, to recover contribution from another solidary debtor, the share of the others, including the one who has performed, is increased proportionally.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article gives the solidary debtor who has paid or performed more than that debtor's share a right of recourse against the co-debtors to the extent that they, or any of them, have not paid or performed their shares. The Article does not give a right of recourse before performance. However, the co-debtors are bound by the general duty of good faith which may, in certain situations, oblige them to contribute to the settlement of the debt before it has been satisfied by the debtor who is pursued by the creditor.

This Article should be read along with the following three Articles.

B. Personal right of recourse

Paragraph (1) deals with the debtor's personal action, generally recognised by national laws on the basis of mandate, benevolent intervention in another's affairs (negotiorum gestio) or unjustified enrichment. The text makes it clear that costs reasonably incurred can be added to the principal claimed.

C. Subrogatory recourse

Paragraph (2) allows the solidary debtor to exercise, in the context of the right of recourse, the rights and actions of the creditor. The rule therefore recognises what is known in a number of national systems as subrogatory recourse, by virtue of which the debtor who has performed more than a proper share benefits from securities obtained by the creditor. The debtor can choose the most advantageous course of action. The Article makes it clear, however, that the exercise of this right of subrogatory recourse must not prejudice the creditor. Such prejudice might occur because of a potential competition between the creditor who has not yet been fully paid and the debtor subrogated to the creditor's rights. The rule gives effect to the adage that subrogation should not operate against the subrogated person - "nemo contra se subrogare censetur".

Illustration 1

Bank A agrees to a loan of €200,000 to a customer, B. The loan is secured by a real security and by a solidary obligation undertaken by C. C pays €150,000 for which C is subrogated to A. B being insolvent, the building subject to the real security is sold for €100,000, to be shared between A and C. By virtue of the rule in paragraph (2), the exercise by C as paying solidary debtor of the rights and actions of the creditor cannot prejudice A, the creditor, who will take €50,000. Without this rule the price might have been shared proportionately between the two holders of the real security, ranking equally - that is, €25,000 for A and €75,000 for C. A would then have lost €25,000.

D. Effect of inability to recover

Paragraph (3) contains a rule based on equitable considerations and commonly recognised. The risk of non-payment by one of the solidary debtors should be shared proportionally among the solvent debtors. The burden of the risk should not depend on which debtor the creditor chooses to pursue.

Illustration 2
A, B and C are under a solidary obligation to repay a sum of €12,000, A being liable for €6000, and B and C for €3000 each. The creditor claims the full amount from A who pays the full €12,000. B is insolvent. The shares of the two solvent debtors, A and C, are then increased in proportion to their respective shares. The ratio of A's share to C's share is 2:1. So, of the €3000 due by B, €2000 is apportioned to A and €1000 to C, which increases A's share to €8000 and C's to €4000.

I. Personal right of recourse

1. This right of recourse is often provided for by national statutes, even if they do not always mention reasonable costs. See e.g. the GERMAN CC § 426(1); the AUSTRIAN CC § 896; the NORDIC Promissory Notes Acts § 2(2); the SPANISH CC art. 1145(2); the FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs art. 1214; the ITALIAN CC art. 1299(1); the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:10; the PORTUGUESE CC art. 524, the CZECH CC §§ 511.2, 511.3 and 439; the SLOVENIAN LOA § 404; and the POLISH CC art. 376 § 1. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the right of recourse depends partly on statute and partly on case law. See the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1940 s. 3 (applying to joint wrongdoers) and the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978 (applying to liability for damages): both statutes give the courts considerable discretion. For rights of relief in SCOTTISH common law see Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], no. 3.14. For IRELAND see the Civil Liability Act 1981. In GREECE the right of recourse is admitted by doctrine. The SLOVAK CC § 511(3) provides that a debtor who pays the whole debt may require a reimbursement from the others according to their shares.

II. Subrogatory recourse

2. The right of subrogatory recourse is mentioned in many national laws - the GERMAN CC § 426(2); the AUSTRIAN CC § 896; the SPANISH CC art. 1210(3); the FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs arts. 1251(3) and 1252(2) which mentions also that the subrogation cannot prejudice the creditor; the GREEK CC art. 488; the ITALIAN CC art. 1203(1) no. 3; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:12(1) and the ESTONIAN LOA § 69(2) (see also LOA § 167). It is also known in ENGLISH law and IRISH law (Civil Liability Act 1981). In AUSTRIA, however, securities assign automatically only to the extent that the paying debtor has performed more than obliged to in the internal relationship between the co-debtors (see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 140; OGH 25 April 2001, JBl 2001, 647). This subrogation can be deduced from the CZECH CC § 511.3.

III. Effect of failure to recover

3. The rule in paragraph (3) is very widely adopted. See the GERMAN CC § 426(1) sentence 2; the AUSTRIAN CC § 896 sentence 2 and OGH 17 February 1954, SZ 27/35; the SPANISH CC art. 1145; the FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs art. 1214(2); the GREEK CC art. 487(2); the ITALIAN CC art. 1299(2); the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:13; the PORTUGUESE CC art. 526; ESTONIAN LOA § 69(6); and the POLISH CC art. 376 § 2. The CZECH CC § 511.3 provides the same rule but without mention of "all reasonable efforts". The NORDIC and IRISH laws are similar. In English law the amount of contribution is the amount of the debt divided by the number of co-debtors who remain solvent Chitty on Contracts, no. 17-027. In SCOTTISH law the principles on unjustified enrichment could be used to reach the same kind of result in any case not covered by the statutes mentioned above. SLOVAK law CC § 511(3) provides that the share of any debtor who cannot pay is divided equally among all the others.

III.–4:108: Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations

(1) Performance or set-off by a solidary debtor or set-off by the creditor against one solidary debtor discharges the other debtors in relation to the creditor to the extent of the performance or set-off.

(2) Merger of debts between a solidary debtor and the creditor discharges the other debtors only for the share of the debtor concerned.

COMMENTS

A. Effect of performance or set-off

The rule in paragraph (1) is the consequence of the extinction of the obligation by performance or by some equivalent, such as set-off. This has a discharging effect in relation to the creditor to the extent of the performance made or amount set off, subject of course to the right of recourse of the debtor who has performed. In the event of bankruptcy it will be necessary to take account in appropriate cases of any restrictive rules of the applicable bankruptcy law.

Illustration 1
A lends €2,500,000 to B, C and D who are associates in a financial group. B becomes a creditor of A for €500,000 and gives notice of set-off. The solidary debt will be reduced to €2,000,000. The set-off will benefit the other debtors.

B. Effect of merger

The rule in paragraph (2) will apply where, for example, one of the debtors inherits from the creditor or there is an amalgamation of debtor and creditor companies. Where merger of debts (confusio) operates between the creditor and one of the debtors, the whole of the debt borne by the other debtors is reduced by the amount affected. If one of those debtors is insolvent, that debtor's share must be borne by all the debtors including the one concerned by the confusio, in application of the principle of III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) paragraph (3).

Illustration 2
A is creditor of a solidary debt of €12,000 owed by B, C and D in equal shares. Following on an amalgamation, B becomes entitled to A's right. The right acquired by B is extinguished in relation to B by the operation of merger of debts (confusio), but subsists in relation to C and D to the amount of €8000. If C is insolvent, B and D must bear C's share by virtue of III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) paragraph (3). B will be able to claim €6000 from D (4000 plus 2000).

1. So far as payment or other performance is concerned, the rules under discussion flow from the very definition of solidarity. Set-off is normally treated as a form of payment. See the GERMAN CC § 422(1); the AUSTRIAN CC § 896; the NORDIC Promissory Note Act § 2; the SPANISH CC art. 1143(1); the GREEK CC art. 483; the ITALIAN CC art. 1302; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:7(2); the PORTUGUESE CC art. 523; SLOVAK CC § 511(1) (if one debtor pays, the others are discharged); the POLISH

CC art. 366 § 1 ("the satisfaction of the claim of the creditor by one debtor releases the other solidary debtors"); and the ESTONIAN LOA § 67(1); the HUNGARIAN CC § 337(1). The BELGIAN and FRENCH CC art. 1294(3) a contrario (A solidary debtor cannot invoke set-off between its debt and a debt of the creditor against another solidary debtor) (see van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, 552). ENGLISH law is to the same effect (Owen v. Wilkinson (1858) 5 CB (N.S.) 526) as is IRISH law (Civil Liability Act 1961 ss. 16 and 17). The same effect is evident in FRENCH law (see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 1193, no. 1254). However, the position is more complex because of the special nature of set-off or compensation which, in principle, operates automatically. (See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 1330, no. 1405). In CZECH law the rule is different. Under CC § 559.1 a debt is extinguished by performance. Some other legal reasons of extinction of the obligation do not automatically affect all co-debtors: this is the case with impossibility of performance or release (see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 641). But if the obligation becomes extinct by setting-off of mutual claims (even of only one debtor), the obligation of the other solidary debtors becomes extinct simultaneously (the rule is based on CC § 580 as commented by Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9]). In SLOVENIAN law a set-off affecting one solidary debtor has no effect on other solidary debtors, but these have a right to accept the set-off. See LOA § 399.

2. Merger of debts (confusio) is not always mentioned in the texts of national laws but the solution can be deduced from the other types of extinction of the obligation provided for. See the SPANISH CC art. 1142; the FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs art. 1209; and the ITALIAN CC art. 1303. In CZECH law merger brings about the extinction of the obligation only in relation to the debtor concerned. The rule is derived from CC § 584 as commented by Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9]). The GERMAN CC § 425(2) and GREEK CC art. 486 refer expressly to merger of debts as one of the events which does not affect the other debtors. Although there is no express wording to that effect, ESTONIAN LOA § 68(3) most probably covers the question similarly. For SCOTTISH law on confusio see Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], nos. 3.39-40. According to SLOVAK legal literature merger of debts discharges the other debtors only for the share of the debtor concerned (Lazar, OPH II, 16).

III.–4:109: Release or settlement in solidary obligations

(1) When the creditor releases, or reaches a settlement with, one solidary debtor, the other debtors are discharged of liability for the share of that debtor.

(2) As between solidary debtors, the debtor who is discharged from that debtor's share is discharged only to the extent of the share at the time of the discharge and not from any supplementary share for which that debtor may subsequently become liable under III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) paragraph (3).

(3) When the debtors have solidary liability for the same damage the discharge under paragraph (1) extends only so far as is necessary to prevent the creditor from recovering more than full reparation and the other debtors retain their rights of recourse against the released or settling debtor to the extent of that debtor's unperformed share.

COMMENTS

A. Effect of release or settlement

Few systems deal in full with the effects of both release and settlement. The rule in paragraph (1) is the same as for merger of debts under III.–4:108 (Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations) paragraph (2). It is equally appropriate in the present context. There is nothing to prevent a release or settlement from discharging the other debtors completely but there is no need to provide specifically for that. It can be done under the normal rules on renunciations of rights by unilateral juridical acts or contracts for the benefit of third parties.

B. Effect on later liability for supplementary share

It is fair that the discharged debtor should nonetheless bear any appropriate supplementary burden (under III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) paragraph (3)) due to the insolvency of one of the other debtors.

Illustration

A has agreed to a commercial lease in favour of a partnership, the partners B, C and D being, under the applicable law, solidarily liable for the partnership debts. Arrears of €60,000 mount up. A releases B. C and D remain bound but only for €40,000. If D turns out to be insolvent, B will be bound to pay €10,000 in spite of the release.

C. Special rule for liability for same damage

Paragraph (3) contains a special rule for the case where two or more debtors have solidary liability for the same damage. The normal solution under paragraph (1) could give rise to potential injustice in cases of liability for damage. Why should the fact that the victim has settled with one of the wrongdoers for 50% of that wrongdoer's proper share (something which may have been done for good reasons, such as the inadequacy of that wrongdoer's insurance cover) deprive the victim of the right to recover from the others the full balance of the reparation due?

NOTES

1. Few national laws expressly cover both release and settlement. It is everywhere admitted that the rules apply only in the absence of an expression of intention on the matter by the creditor who releases the debt or by those who have agreed the settlement. See the GERMAN CC § 423 (for the release of debt: according to the case law a settlement has, in principle, no effect on those who are not parties to it); the AUSTRIAN CC § 894 and case law (release of one debtor does not affect the position of the others, and according to CC § 896 sentence 3 the remaining debtors still have a right of recourse against the released debtor); the SPANISH CC art. 1143(1) (release of debt); the FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs art. 1285 (release of debt: case law since Cass. req. 3 December 1906, S. 07.1.269, admits that a settlement applies to the other co-debtors when it is favourable to them, by an effect of representation); the GREEK CC art. 484 (release of debt); the ITALIAN CC arts. 1301 (release of debt) and 1304 (settlement: this does not benefit the other co-debtors except if they declare that they wish to benefit from it); the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:14 (release of debt). See also the PORTUGUESE CC art. 864(1). In ENGLISH law a release of one of the debtors releases all the debtors as joint and joint and several liability creates just one obligation, which would now be discharged. It is different with a simple "covenant not to sue" which leaves the creditor's rights against the other debtors intact (Chitty on Contracts, no. 17-017). IRISH law is substantially the same as the rules in the Article (Civil Liability Act 1981 s. 17(1) and (2). In SCOTTISH law a distinction is drawn between ordinary co-debtors and security providers (co-cautioners). In the latter case a release of one releases all, Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act 1856 s. 9. In the case of ordinary co-debtors a release of one leaves the others liable for their shares but discharges them of liability for the share of the released debtor (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], no. 3.17). In POLISH law, release from debt or waiver of the solidary liability by the creditor in respect of one of the solidary debtors has no effect on the co-debtors (CC art. 373). The same holds generally true under ESTONIAN law (LOA § 66(1)). Other solidary debtors are released from the obligation only if by agreement the creditor expressly waives the claim against all of the solidary debtors (LOA § 66(2) sentence 1). It is provided that a solidary debtor may, on behalf of the other solidary debtors, accept a proposal from the creditor that the creditor will waive the claim against all the solidary debtors free of charge (LOA § 66(2) sentence 2). In SLOVENIAN law a release of one solidary debtor has the same effect against all, unless it was expressly provided that such a release was only of this individual. See LOA § 397. Under the CZECH law, the creditor may conclude an agreement (the written form is necessary under sanction of invalidity) with the debtor and waive the right or mitigate the debt. This affects neither the obligations of the remaining debtors to the creditor, nor the apportionment between them. The obligation of the discharged debtor as against the remaining debtors continues to exist. The same applies to impossibility of performance, which affects one of the debtors (CC §§ 575 ff). The Czech CC only implicitly accepts the effect on later liability for a supplementary share (CC § 511.3). The proposed special rule for liability for the same damage is not accepted by the CC. In SLOVAK legal literature it is said that release or settlement concerning only one solidary debtor has no effects on the other debtors. The creditor retains the right to demand the performance from the remaining debtors (Lazar, OPH II, 16).

III.–4:110: Effect of judgment in solidary obligations

A decision by a court as to the liability to the creditor of one solidary debtor does not affect:

(a) the liability to the creditor of the other solidary debtors; or

(b) the rights of recourse between the solidary debtors under III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors).

COMMENTS

A. Effect of court decision as to liability of one debtor on liability of others

Under these rules the reference to a court extends to arbitrators. See Annex 1. It is also appropriate to bear in mind the provisions on good faith and fair dealing given the risk of a fraudulent collusion between the creditor and one of the debtors to adversely affect the others.

National laws adopt different solutions to the problem of a court decision as to the liability of one debtor - no effects on the other debtors; full effects in favour of, but not against, the other debtors. These rules opt for the solution whereby the decision has no effects on the other debtors who were not parties to it. The idea of reciprocal representation is rejected. Each debtor should be free to make maximum use of that debtor's own defensive resources. There will be no res judicata effect except in relation to those who were parties to the litigation.

B. Effect of court decision as to liability of one debtor on rights of recourse

The rule in sub-paragraph (b) is intended primarily to clarify the effects of a court decision that one debtor is not liable in relation to the rights of recourse which the other debtors have. The rule on the absence of wider effects of the court decision applies here also. The other debtors retain their rights of recourse. Of course, a decision by a court that one debtor is liable does not prevent that debtor from exercising the right of recourse against the others: this situation too is covered by sub-paragraph (b).

1. National laws are divided on the question regulated by this Article.
2. Under some laws a court decision on one debtor's liability has no effect on the co-debtors. This is the case under GERMAN law (CC § 425(2), AUSTRIAN case law (see Rummel (-Gamerith), ABGB I[3], § 894, no. 10); the GREEK CC art. 486; and NORDIC doctrine. From the CZECH regulation it does not follow that a decision by a court as to the liability to the creditor of one solidary debtor should affect the liability to the creditor of the other solidary debtors or the rights of recourse between the solidary debtors (see commentary by Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 640 ff). The same would follow in SLOVENIAN doctrine without express provision in the LOA. In ENGLISH law a judgment against one debtor does not bar an action against the others, (Chitty on Contracts, no. 17-016) but there is no discussion of the effect of a judgment in favour of one of the debtors. The position is the same in SCOTLAND (Wilson, Scottish Law of Debt[2], 320-321). For IRISH law see (Civil Liability Act 1981 s. 18). The SPANISH CC art. 1252(3) used to provide that a court judgment had full effect in relation to the co-debtors who were not parties to it, but this rule has been abrogated by the new Procedural Civil Law and the common opinion now is that the judgment does not extend to other co-debtors. According to SLOVAK legal literature a court decision concerning one debtor has no effect on other solidary debtors who are not parties to the court decision (Lazar, OPH II, 16). In SCOTTISH law a creditor who had not been fully paid (even after suing one co-debtor) would continue to have rights against the other debtors (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 11.22).

3. In other laws such effect is only partial. See the ITALIAN CC art. 1306 (there is absence of effect in principle but the other debtors can plead the decision against the creditor, except when it is based on reasons personal to the debtor party to it). PORTUGUESE law is similar (CC art. 522). FRENCH case law considers on the other hand that the decision is pleadable against the other debtors except in the case of fraudulent collusion or if the debtor against whom the decision is pleaded can take advantage of a personal defence or exception. According to POLISH law, one of the characteristics of solidarity is that in certain cases it brings in effects in favour of the other debtors. Accordingly, a judgment rendered in favour of one of the solidary debtors releases the co-debtors, if defences common to all debtors have been considered (CC art. 375 § 2).

III.–4:111: Prescription in solidary obligations

Prescription of the creditor's right to performance against one solidary debtor does not affect:

(a) the liability to the creditor of the other solidary debtors; or

(b) the rights of recourse between the solidary debtors under III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors).

COMMENTS

This Article deals with a matter which is treated differently in the various laws. Under sub-paragraph (a) the effect of prescription is personal to the debtor concerned and does not affect the liability of the other debtors to the creditor. There is no reason why the other debtors should benefit from the prescription of the claim against one debtor when the claims against them have not prescribed. This rule fits in well with the way prescription operates under these rules: it does not extinguish the claim automatically but merely gives the debtor a right to refuse performance. It follows from the principle of paragraph (a) that anything – such as judicial proceedings against one debtor - which suspends the running of the prescription period against one debtor will not affect the liability of the others. Prescription may run against them even if its running is suspended against the one involved in the litigation.

Sub-paragraph (b) is justified primarily by the need to protect a debtor (not the one whose debt has prescribed) who has paid more than that debtor's share. Such a debtor should not be deprived, by the creditor's inaction, of the right of recourse against the debtor whose debt has prescribed. Sub-paragraph (b) also protects the debtor whose debt has prescribed but who nonetheless pays. As prescription under these rules does not extinguish the obligation it follows that such a debtor is fulfilling an existing obligation and is entitled to any available right of recourse against the co-debtors.

Illustration

A has lent €20,000 to B and C, who are solidary debtors. After 3 years the claim against B has prescribed but, because C has acknowledged the claim, the period of prescription against C has not yet expired. At this stage A cannot compel B to pay but can proceed against C for the whole amount. By virtue of the rule in paragraph (2), if C pays the whole amount C will be able to reclaim €10,000 from B.

NOTES

I. Effect of prescription of claim against one debtor on liability of other debtors

1. The solutions in national laws are contradictory, reflecting to some extent the different ways in which prescription or limitation of actions operates in the system concerned. In favour of the absence of effects on other debtors are: the GERMAN CC § 425(2); AUSTRIAN law (solution deduced from CC § 894, see Ehrenzweig and Ehrenzweig, System II(1)^{3}, 104); the GREEK CC art. 486; the ESTONIAN LOA § 68(3); the PORTUGUESE CC art. 521; SLOVENIAN LOA § 403. DANISH law is also to this effect; see Gomard, Obligationsret IV 63; as is ENGLISH law (Limitation Act 1980 s. 31(6)). According to SLOVAK legal literature prescription of the creditor's right to performance against one solidary debtor has no effects on other solidary debtors (Lazar, OPH II, 16). For SWEDISH law see the Limitations Act (1981:130) § 9. According to that rule, where several persons are bound jointly and severally for the same debt and the debt is barred by the expiry of the limitation period in relation to one such person, each and every one of the other persons is liable only in respect of his or her own share. See also Lindskog, Preskription, 516 et seq. In favour of full effect are SCOTTISH law (Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1983 s. 6); SPANISH law (CC art. 1974); FINNISH law (Decree on Prescription of 9 November 1868); FRENCH and BELGIAN case law and doctrine (van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, 551); and ITALIAN doctrine, Bianca, Diritto civile IV, 732-733, but see Cass. 9 April 2001, no. 5262, in Giust. Civ. 2002, I, 3242.

II. Effect of prescription of claim against one debtor on right of recourse

2. GERMAN case law is to the same effect as the rule in sub-paragragh (b) (RG 16 November 1908, RGZ 69, 422 ff). See the ITALIAN CC art. 1310(3) on the waiver of prescription, but also Cass. 28 March 2001, no. 4507, in Giust. Civ. Mass. 2001, 612, where prescription of the creditor's right to performance may affect the rights of recourse between the solidary debtors and the PORTUGUESE CC art. 521. In ENGLAND contribution can be claimed from a debtor who has ceased to be liable: for debts, see Chitty on Contracts, no. 17-027 and, where the liability is for damage, Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978 s. 1(2). The NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:11(3) has a special rule. A debtor against whom recourse by way of contribution is sought can take advantage of the prescription of the creditor's claim only if, at the time when the obligation to contribute arose, both that debtor and the one who claims contribution could have pleaded prescription against the creditor.

3. From both the Czech and POLISH regulation it does not follow that rights of recourse between the solidary debtors should be affected (see respectively commentary by Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 639 ff and Sychowicz, 109). According to the general principle expressed in the POLISH CC art. 376 § 1, the contents of the legal relationship among the solidary debtors are decisive for whether and to what extent they have rights of recourse.).

4. ESTONIAN law states that generally the limitation period for the right of recourse expires at the time when the claim of the creditor against solidary debtor against whom the right of recourse is exercised would prescribe (LOA § 70(1)). However, this period is prolonged up to six month as of the date on which the solidary debtor performed the obligation (LOA § 70(2)), unless the solidary debtor performs the obligation after the limitation period for the claim against the debtor or the solidary debtor against whom the debtor exercises the right of recourse has expired (LOA § 70(3)).

III.–4:112: Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations

(1) A solidary debtor may invoke against the creditor any defence which another solidary debtor can invoke, other than a defence personal to that other debtor. Invoking the defence has no effect with regard to the other solidary debtors.

(2) A debtor from whom contribution is claimed may invoke against the claimant any personal defence that that debtor could have invoked against the creditor.

COMMENTS

Paragraph (1) recognises the traditional distinction between defences inherent in the debt itself and defences personal to each of the debtors. Only defences of the first type can be pleaded by all the debtors. Personal defences are exclusive to the debtors concerned.

Defences inherent in the debt are those, such as illegality or non-compliance with a formal requirement, which flow from the contract itself. Personal defences are those, such as lack of free consent or incapacity, which relate only to the personal position of one of the debtors. Indeed, the possibility of avoiding the contract for a defect in consent is necessarily personal to the person whose consent was affected.

A, B and C borrow €50,000 from D at a rate of interest of 12%. The contract is in French. C, who does not speak French, is subject to an error producing a lack of true consent. B, if pursued by the creditor, cannot take advantage of this.

Paragraph (2) provides that personal defences can be pleaded against a debtor who claims a contribution from a co-debtor, whether the recourse is by personal action (III –4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) paragraph (1)) or based on subrogation (III.–4:107 paragraph (2)).

The facts are as in Illustration 1. B, having paid the whole amount to D, now seeks recourse against C. C can found on the lack of true consent to defeat B's claim.

I. Invoking defences against creditor

1. The distinction between personal defences and defences inherent in the debt is a general one, subject to some nuances. The general rule may sometimes be modified by special provision for certain types of defence (such as prescription or res judicata). The distinction is found in the GERMAN CC §§ 422-425; the ESTONIAN LOA § 67(2); the AUSTRIAN CC § 894; the SPANISH CC art. 1148; the FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs art. 1208 (which also creates a third category of exceptions "purely personal", on this concept see François, Les Obligations, no. 204); the GREEK CC art. 486 (which mentions certain exceptions operating subjectively); the ITALIAN CC art. 1297; the PORTUGUESE CC art. 514(1); and the POLISH CC art. 375 § 1. The distinction is taken for granted in ENGLISH law (see Treitel, The Law of Contract[11], no. 13-011) and SCOTTISH law (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 11.19) and is also used in IRISH law. The second sentence of paragraph (1) regulates a matter which is sometimes unregulated, and a matter of dispute, in national systems. ESTONIAN LOA § 67(3) provides for a duty to invoke a defence inherent in the debt under the threat of losing the right of recourse to the extent by which the solidary obligation would have diminished as a result of such defence, subject to the actual or constructive knowledge of the circumstances underlying the defence.

2. Under CZECH regulation, objections regarding the common base of the obligation (for instance invalidity of the agreement, extinction of the obligation by performance) may be raised by any of the co-debtors. If the objection is justified, the obligation is extinguished with effect on all co-debtors. In addition to such common objections, any of the co-debtors may raise special objections, which have reference only to that debtor's own obligation (the maturity of the debt, release from the debt or prescription of action). The same position is taken in SLOVAK law, where there is no explicit regulation corresponding to the Article.

II. Invoking defences against other debtors exercising right of recourse

3. The rule in paragraph (2) is not expressed in a general form in national laws (but see the PORTUGUESE CC art. 525) where one finds only particular applications of it. There is generally, however, nothing to cast doubt on it. In SPANISH law, CC art. 1840 laid down this rule for a particular kind of co-obligation. See also the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:11 (slightly different).

4. In the CZECH REPUBLIC the objection of prescription may be raised only by each co-debtor separately without legal effects for all co-debtors. Under CC § 580, which governs set-off, only the claim of the debtor invoking the right of set-off may be set off.

Section 2: Plurality of creditors

III.–4:201: Scope of section

This Section applies where two or more creditors have a right to performance under one obligation.

COMMENTS

This Section is not intended to cover all cases where there is a plurality of creditors. It does not deal with an accumulation of rights arising out of multiple contracts concluded by several creditors with one person, such as customers who order merchandise from one dealer. The existence of such parallel contracts does not affect their legal nature.

Plurality of creditors is not a topic which is dealt with explicitly in the laws of all the Member States, but it is sufficiently important that it is useful to set out a clear system of rules.

III.–4:202: Solidary, divided and joint rights

(1) A right to performance is solidary when any of the creditors may require full performance from the debtor and the debtor may perform to any of the creditors.

(2) A right to performance is divided when each creditor may require performance only of that creditor's share and the debtor owes each creditor only that creditor's share.

(3) A right to performance is joint when any creditor may require performance only for the benefit of all the creditors and the debtor must perform to all the creditors.

COMMENTS

A. General

The typology of plural rights to performance follows that of plural obligations (III.–4:102 (Solidary, divided and joint obligations). Solidary rights, divided rights and joint rights are thus, broadly speaking, the converse of solidary, divided and joint obligations. The following Articles in this Chapter are not, however, a simple reflection of the Articles on a plurality of debtors.

B. Solidary rights

Solidarity of rights is comparatively rare. It is not the default rule under this Chapter. See the following Article. Because of the risks inherent in solidarity of rights (notably, that one creditor may claim and squander the whole funds) it would not be appropriate as the default rule. For the same reason, solidarity of rights is rarely stipulated for by the parties. It is, however, frequently encountered in relation to bank accounts, particularly joint accounts where the holders are solidary creditors of the bank.

The definition of solidary rights given here reflects their characteristic features. Each creditor can obtain from the debtor the totality of the debt without the debtor being able to plead that it should be divided. Reciprocally, the debtor can make payment of the whole debt to one of the creditors, at the debtor's choice, thereby being discharged in relation to all the creditors. The debtor retains this choice even when faced with demands from all or any of the creditors.

In the event of non-performance by the debtor in the face of a claim by one of the creditors, the creditor can put in operation the various remedies for non-performance provided by these rules, without any obligation to act in concert with the other creditors. So, the creditor can terminate for fundamental non-performance, if there is substantial non-performance by the debtor. Similarly, the creditor can withhold performance of reciprocal obligations until the debtor performs or tenders performance.

C. Divided rights

Divided rights are the most frequent in practice. It follows that the relative practical importance of the different categories of plurality is different in the case of rights and obligations.

D. Joint rights

Joint rights arise when the performance is indivisible and when it can be rendered only for the benefit of all the creditors. A common field of application for joint rights is that of joint and indivisible bank accounts. Another is contracts concluded by the title holders of property held jointly and indivisibly, as may happen, depending on the applicable law, under the law of trusts or succession.

It is of the essence of joint rights that their exercise is in the hands of all the creditors. It is conceivable; however, that one of the creditors may have received a mandate or authority from the others to receive the funds or performance due.

Illustration 1
A and B, members of a partnership or society which does not have legal personality, open a joint bank account as such members. They are joint creditors of the bank.

Illustration 2
A engages a married couple as caretakers and makes a caretakers' apartment available to them. Each is a joint creditor of the right to the tenancy.

Illustration 3
A group of friends hire a car with a driver for a joint excursion. The driver's performance can only be rendered for the benefit of the whole group, the members being accordingly creditors of a joint claim.

Where the debtor, in a case of joint rights, does not perform the obligation, the question arises whether the creditors must act in concert against the debtor or whether it is sufficient for one of them to act for the benefit of all. The Article, in providing that "any creditor can require performance only for the benefit of all", facilitates recovery and allows the creditors to avoid the paralysis which would otherwise result from the inaction of one of their number.

Illustration 4
A is the debtor in relation to a joint claim held by B and C. The debt is due but has not been paid. C can sue A for payment of the debt to both creditors.

Non-performance by the debtor in the case of joint rights necessarily affects the whole of the contract. The nature of the rights, and corresponding obligation, makes a termination or suspension by only one or some of the creditors inconceivable. All the creditors will have to act together to terminate for fundamental non-performance or to withhold performance of reciprocal obligations.

Illustration 5
The facts are as in Illustration 3. The driver does not turn up on the agreed date. The group of friends want to recover the money paid in advance. They will have to give notice of termination jointly to the debtor or authorise one of them to give notice on behalf of all.

NOTES

I. General

1. Plurality of creditors is not always dealt with in national laws (as is the case in SCOTLAND (but see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 11.24 for discussion) and IRELAND) and is sometimes covered by reference to the regulation of plurality of debtors. For instance this is position of the CZECH law (CC §§ 512-515). The notion of joint rights does not exist in most national laws, otherwise than in doctrine. GERMAN law provides for it expressly (CC § 432(1)) as does ESTONIAN LOA § 72. The same may be said about CZECH civil law where a concept of joint rights can be observed as a counterpart of the notion of joint obligation at least in CC § 145 which deals with the property of spouses, including a particular form of rights and obligations which could be analysed as an intermediary category like the solidary obligation. Nevertheless this particular concept has to be analysed as a solidary right corresponding to the meaning of the Article (see commentary to CC § 145 by Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 418 and abovementioned notes about joint obligation). But a special commercial rule (Ccom art. 296) provides that if a debtor has concurrent obligations towards several creditors for an indivisible performance, any of these creditors may require this performance, unless the law or contract provides otherwise (see notes about joint obligation). Some other laws have the notion of indivisibility on the creditors' side, the rules being similar to those of the joint obligation. There are references to this type of indivisibility in the ITALIAN CC arts. 1314-1320; the GREEK CC art. 495 and the AUSTRIAN CC §§ 891, 892 and 895. ENGLISH law (see Treitel, The Law of Contract[11], nos. 13-020-13-034) recognises that creditors may be joint rather than separate ("several") but the effects of joint entitlement are different from solidary entitlement under these rules, for example a release of one of the joint creditors discharges the entire debt. It seems that promises made to a number of persons jointly and severally are treated for all purposes as several (Treitel, The Law of Contract[11], no. 13-020). In SLOVAK law plurality of creditors is dealt with in CC § 512(1) (divisible performance), § 512(2) (indivisible performance) and § 513 (solidary performance). In SCOTTISH law the question of a plurality of creditors is not expressly regulated and is not much discussed in the literature. The principle of freedom of contract means, however, that the parties can create the types of legal relationships mentioned in the Article. Everything depends on the interpretation of the terms regulating the obligation. In BELGIAN law, doctrine distinguishes between the obligational question of the relationship between the creditors and the debtor on the one hand and the proprietary question of ownership of the right on the other hand. The answer to the first question depends in principle on the answer to the second, but is not identical. The internal relationship between the creditors is first of all a question of property law: are the different creditor's co-owners or not, and if so, in which form of co-ownership (joint ownership or mere co-ownership). If the right is not indivisible and does not form part of a joint ownership or an estate, it is automatically divided in separate rights. In the obligational relationship with the debtor, separate creditors can act separately, joint owners and owners of indivisible rights can in principle act only jointly, but the law or a juridical act can grant one of the co-owners the authority to act for all of them, and such authority can also have been be stipulated by the debtor in its own interest. If the creditors can only act jointly, this corresponds to the joint right of this Section, if one has authority to act on behalf of all, this corresponds to the solidary right of this Section. A special rule is found in CC art. 1220 (with exceptions in CC art. 1221), which provides that the debtor of a deceased person can split up its debt over the heirs in proportion to their share of "saisine", despite the fact that these heirs are still joint owners (as follows from CC art. 832). It can also be stipulated that the debtor may only pay to one specific co-owner and not to the other ones (see CC art. 1277 II).

II. Solidary rights

2. The elements of the definition and governing rules in this paragraph are to be found in a certain number of codes. See e.g. GERMAN CC § 428; the SPANISH CC arts. 1137-1143; AUSTRIAN CC § 891; the CC's of FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG arts. 1197 and 1198; the GREEK CC arts. 489-493; the ITALIAN CC arts. 1292-1310 (each article dealing successively with active and passive solidarity); the CZECH CC § 513; the ESTONIAN LOA § 73; the PORTUGUESE CC arts. 512(1) and 528(1); and the SLOVAK CC § 513 (if the debtor is obliged to an equal performance to two or more creditors who are jointly and severally entitled vis-à-vis that debtor according to law, to a judicial decision or to an agreement, any of the creditors may ask for the whole performance and the debtor must perform the whole debt to the first creditor to ask for the performance). There is also reference to solidary rights in the NORDIC laws (Gomard, Obligationsret IV, 14-16 and SLOVENIAN LOA § 406). It is uncertain whether ENGLISH law recognises solidary rights as a distinct juridical category; it (Treitel, The Law of Contract[11], no. 13-020).

III. Divided rights

3. As it is the background norm, sometimes even built on a presumption of divisibility (PORTUGUESE CC art. 513; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:15), the divided right of co-creditors is not always defined in the national codes. See, however; the ITALIAN CC art. 1316; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:15; the PORTUGUESE CC art. 534; the CZECH CC § 512.1; AUSTRIAN CC § 891; and the POLISH CC art. 375 § 1. The GERMAN CC envisages the existence of the divisible right without defining it (cf. CC § 420, but it is irrelevant from a practical perspective, see Staudinger (-Schmidt-Kessel), Eckpfeiler des Zivilrechts [2008], 293 et seq.), and similarly under ESTONIAN law (LOA § 71). Note also the provisions of the FRENCH CC arts. 1220 and 1221 on divisibility by operation of law between heirs. In the SLOVAK CC § 512(1) there are rules governing performance of divisible debts to more creditors, however the provision contains no definition of the divisible right.

IV. Joint rights

4. The category of joint rights, as distinct from indivisible rights, is directly known in GERMAN and ESTONIAN law. For BELGIAN law, see note 1 above. For the CZECH law see above commentary to CC § 145 by Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 418 and also notes about joint obligations. AUSTRIAN law addresses joint rights in CC § 890 sentence 2). In other laws, reference may be made to the rules on indivisibility. The reference to such rules is sometimes made expressly: the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:16.

5. For HUNGARIAN law see CC § 334, discussed in the Notes to III.–4:102 (Solidary, divided and joint obligations). In addition, under CC § 335(1) if a right is held by several creditors in such a manner that each is entitled to demand the entire performance but the debtor is bound to a single performance (solidary right), the obligation to each creditor ceases to exist if any of them is satisfied. Under CC § 335(2) each creditor is affected by anything done by any of them in relation to the right, particularly a notice of termination, a warning, and the exercise of a right to choose. Under CC § 335(3) aright does not lapse in respect of any of the creditors until the conditions of the period of limitation have materialised in respect of all of them. Under CC § 335(4) if any of the creditors raises a legal action for performance, the debtor may refuse performance to the other creditors, without being exempted thereby from the legal consequences of default, until the non-appealable conclusion of the action. Under § 336 creditors are entitled to equal shares of a claim, unless their legal relationship suggests otherwise.

III.–4:203: When different types of right arise

(1) Whether a right to performance is solidary, divided or communal depends on the terms regulating the right.

(2) If the terms do not determine the question, the right of co-creditors is divided.

COMMENTS

This Article sets out the default rule for plurality of creditors. As noted above, the rule is different from that applying to a plurality of debtors. There solidarity is the default rule. However, that would be dangerous for creditors because any one of them could claim performance to the prejudice of the others. So the default rule for creditors is that their right is divided. This regime will apply unless the terms regulating the right (typically the terms of a contract) provide otherwise or the nature of the right itself, or the relationship between the creditors, indicates otherwise.

NOTES

1. It is a settled rule under ESTONIAN law that unless the law or a transaction provides otherwise, the right of co-creditors is divided (osanõue), see LOA § 71. In SCOTLAND this result would probably follow from the application of the rules on interpretation: in a case of doubt there would be a preference for the result which would be in accordance with reasonable expectations and which would be less onerous for the debtor rather than more onerous. In ENGLAND there is a statutory presumption that rights under a deed are divided: Law of Property Act 1925 s. 81, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[11], no. 13-020.
2. In the SPANISH CC the default rule is that the right of the co-creditors is divided (CC art. 1138). It is the same in BELGIAN law (Cass. 10 May 1979, Arr.Cass. 1978-79, 2080; van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, 542), unless it is indivisible by nature or forms part of a joint property or estate. Also under GERMAN law the default rule is that the rights are divided if they are divisible, CC § 420, but divisibility rarely occurs.

III.–4:204: Apportionment in cases of divided rights

In the case of divided rights the creditors have equal shares.

COMMENTS

This provision is the counterpart of the rule applying in the case of a plurality of debtors. The general rule laid down in the Article may be displaced by contrary provision in the terms regulating the right.

Illustration
A and B lend €10,000 to C. In the absence of any special provision, C owes €5000 to each of the creditors. Conceivably, however, a term in the contract might provide for a different apportionment because, for example, of a debt owed by one of the creditors to the other.

NOTES

1. This rule is sometimes expressed. See the GERMAN CC § 420; the GREEK CC art. 480; the ITALIAN CC art. 1298; the PORTUGUESE CC art. 534; the ESTONIAN LOA § 71; the SLOVAK CC § 512(1); the SLOVENIAN LOA § 1004(1); the CZECH CC § 512.1 and the POLISH CC art. 379 § 1. It is not contested. In SCOTLAND the result would be reached by applying the rules on interpretation. In ENGLISH law, where a debtor only makes one promise to two or more debtors to pay them a sum of money it is important to know whether the promise was made to the creditors jointly or separately. The general rule is that if they are joint creditors, payment to one discharges the debt but this may be varied by the contract. In contrast, payment to just one of a number of separate creditors "does not discharge the whole debt since each is separately entitled to their share." (Treitel, The Law of Contract[12], nos. 13-030-13-031). How much is owed to each seems to be a matter of interpretation of the relevant agreement(s). In SWEDEN, the basic rule is probably the same as in the Article, see Partnership and Non-registered Partnership Act (1980:1102) chap. 4 § 5(2) and Rodhe, Obligationsrätt, 151 et seq.
2. The SPANISH CC art. 1138 not only provides a presumption that the obligation is divided, but also that the creditors or debtors have equal shares in it. Any of those presumptions may be displaced by a contrary provision in the terms regulating the right. According to the Supreme Court, the unequal parts may result also from the interpretation of the obligation, for example, in case of a civil liability for an offence (TS 26 October 2002, RJ 2002/9183).
3. In FRANCE and BELGIUM, the default rule in the case of plurality of creditors is that the right is divided and each creditor can claim payment of an equal share (See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 1182, nos. 1243, 1182). The default rule does not apply where the right forms part of a joint property or estate. However, in case of succession, the authority of each creditor to receive payment is in proportion to the part for which they are "saisi" as representative of the deceased (FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs art. 1220 with exceptions in CCs art. 1221).

III.–4:205: Difficulties of performing in cases of joint rights

If one of the creditors who have joint rights to performance refuses to accept, or is unable to receive, the performance, the debtor may obtain discharge from the obligation by depositing the property or money with a third party according to III.–2:111 (Property not accepted) or III.–2:112 (Money not accepted).

COMMENTS

This rule is intended to protect the debtor who, without it, could not obtain an effective discharge if one of the creditors refused, or was unable, to receive the performance. It will be remembered that the debtor must render the performance to the creditors together. Because of the rule in the present Article the debtor will, in case of difficulty caused by this requirement, be able to put into operation the measures provided for by III.–2:111 (Property not accepted) or III.–2:112 (Money not accepted).

Illustration
A and B buy a second hand car from C, the contract making it clear that they have a joint claim. B is hospitalised and, because of his condition, is not able to receive the performance or give a mandate to A. C wants to deliver the car at the agreed time. C cannot deliver the car for the sole benefit of A, because A and B have a joint claim. C will be able to deposit the car with a third party for the benefit of A and B according to the rules laid down in III.–2:111 (Property not accepted).

NOTES

1. GERMAN law has a rule comparable to the Article (CC § 432(1) sent. 2). ESTONIAN LOA § 72(3) implies that each of the joint creditors may require performance of the obligation, "including the deposit or sale of the thing owed", only for the benefit of all the joint creditors. A similar rule is provided in POLISH law regarding the execution of an indivisible claim. When there are several creditors entitled to an indivisible claim, each of them may require performance of the entire claim. However, in case of opposition on the part of even one creditor, the debtor must perform to all the creditors jointly or deposit the object of the claim with the court (CC art. 381). SLOVAK law provides for a similar rule regarding indivisible performance (CC § 512(2)). The indivisible debt could be discharged by performing it to one of the creditors. However the debtor does not have to perform to one of the creditors without the consent of other creditors. Unless all joint creditors agree on the performance, the debtor may deposit the debt in court. CZECH law is the same (CC § 512.2 in fine).
2. In other laws a similar result can be obtained by applying the general mechanisms of deposit (in this type of situation) and consignation. A right of deposit is also mentioned in the AUSTRIAN CC § 890 last sentence.
3. There is no regulation of this matter in ENGLISH or SCOTTISH law.
4. The SPANISH CC art. 1139 provides that when there are several creditors with joint rights and one of them refuses to accept the performance, the debtor will get a discharge only when the debtor consigns the property, because this article requires a collective participation of all the creditors in order to cause a legal effect on the obligation, therefore the debtor may not fulfil in any other way. Although the creditor cannot be forced to accept the performance, the creditor has to facilitate the obtaining of a discharge by the debtor, as the debtor should not remain eternally bound by the obligation in spite of wanting to perform it (Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II[3], 132). CC art. 1176 sets forth a general principle that forbids the creditor to refuse the performance offered by the debtor when there is no justified reason. Facing the unjustified refusal, the debtor will obtain a discharge by judicial consignment of the property, in accordance with the CC art. 1178. The previous refusal is not needed when the creditor is legally absent or unable to receive the performance at the place and time agreed.

5. In FRANCE, there is no rule comparable to this Article. In the case of indivisible obligations, a similar result can be obtained by applying the general mechanisms of deposit (in this type of situation) and consignation. Where the creditor refuses, or is unable, to receive the performance, the debtor, may make an offre réelle to the creditor (by way of huissier) and, upon refusal of the offer by the creditor, consign the payment or the offered goods in the Caisse des Dépôts et Consignations pursuant to CC arts. 1257 and 1258. The effect of this offre réelle is to discharge the debtor. In the case of indivisible obligations, an offre réelle by the debtor is not required since the creditor of the price of the sale of a building cannot receive the full price alone (Civ 2è, 16 February 1972: D. 1972. 638). CC art. 1264 together with Ccom art. L. 133-4 provide that if the creditor refuses to receive the goods, the debtor must request the creditor to take delivery and, upon a failure to do so, may be authorized by a court to deposit the goods in a place other than the place of delivery. These provisions only apply to money debts and goods, not to obligations to do (T. civ. Lille, 7 June 1905: DP 1906, 5, p. 15).

III.–4:206: Apportionment in cases of solidary rights

(1) In the case of solidary rights the creditors have equal shares.

(2) A creditor who has received more than that creditor's share has an obligation to transfer the excess to the other creditors to the extent of their respective shares.

COMMENTS

Paragraph (1) is the counterpart of the rule on apportionment between solidary debtors. Like that rule, it is only a default rule. The terms constituting the solidarity will generally specify the share due to each of the creditors. In the absence of such provision, sharing will be in equal parts.

Paragraph (2) lays down an understandable rule. A creditor who has received more than that creditor's share obviously cannot be allowed to keep the excess. It must be handed over to the other creditors.

Illustration
A and B are solidary creditors of C for an amount of €10,000. C pays €10,000 to B. A has a right of recourse against B for €5000.

NOTES

1. The rule in paragraph (1) is not found in many of the national laws, but it follows from the parallelism with the rules on passive solidarity. It is found, however, in the GERMAN CC § 430; the SPANISH CC art. 1143(1); the GREEK CC art. 493; the ITALIAN CC art. 1298; the PORTUGUESE CC arts. 516 and 533; the ESTONIAN LOA § 75(1); and the POLISH CC art. 378. The basic rule is probably the same in SWEDISH law, cf. Partnership and Non-registered Partnership Act (1980:1102) chap. 4 § 5 and Rodhe, Obligationsrätt, 150 et seq. The AUSTRIAN CC § 895, however, contains the opposite presumption that in the absence of an agreement the creditor who received payment has no obligation towards the other solidary creditors.
2. The CZECH CC specifies explicitly that any of the creditors may demand only its own share (§ 512.1) and that only the relationship between the solidary creditors determines, whether one of the creditors, who received the whole performance, has obligations to the other creditors or not (CC § 515.1).
3. According to the SLOVAK CC § 515 the relationship between the joint creditors determines whether the creditor who received the whole performance that could have been asked by any of the creditors has any duty vis-à-vis the other creditors. The same rule applies if a joint creditor received more than that creditor's share.
4. In SCOTLAND the rule in paragraph (1) would follow, in the absence of any indication to the contrary in the terms regulating the obligation, from an application of the rules on interpretation. The rule in paragraph (2) would follow from an application of the rules on unjustified enrichment. In BELGIUM, the internal relationship between solidary creditors is first of all a question of property law. In the absence of any terms of the internal relationship governing the question, the default rule will as in this Article follow from a parallel to the rules on passive solidarity.

5. In FRANCE, a similar rule is found in the secondary obligations of solidarity, either passive or active, amongst which is the principle that the creditor who receives full or partial payment is exposed to the right of recourse of the other creditors to the extent of their rights to performance (See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 1184, no. 1246).

6. ENGLISH law seems not to recognise solidary creditorship, see above.

III.–4:207: Regime of solidary rights

(1) A release granted to the debtor by one of the solidary creditors has no effect on the other solidary creditors.

(2) The rules of III.–4:108 (Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations), III.–4:110 (Effect of judgment in solidary obligations), III.–4:111 (Prescription in solidary obligations) and III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations) paragraph (1) apply, with appropriate adaptations, to solidary rights to performance.

COMMENTS

A. Release by one solidary creditor

Under paragraph (1) a release of the debt agreed to by one of the solidary creditors has no effect on the other creditors. This rule is different from the rule provided above for the case of solidary obligations (III.–4:109 (Release or settlement in solidary obligations)). It means in effect that one creditor cannot dispose of the right to performance to the detriment of the other or others.

> Illustration 1
> A and B are solidary creditors of C for the amount of €10,000. A grants a total release to C, who is therefore discharged in relation to A. A will no longer therefore be able to sue for recovery of the money. B remains creditor of C for the whole amount of €10,000.

The rule envisages only the release of the debt, as opposed to a settlement. A settlement, in so far as it provides for partial payment, will come under the rules on payment (see paragraph (2) read with III.–4:108 (Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations) paragraph (1)) and, in so far as it involves a release, will come under the rule of the present paragraph.

> A and B are solidary creditors of C for an amount of €10,000. A sues C and, in the course of the proceedings, concludes a settlement providing for a release of half the debt on payment of the other half. In accordance with the settlement C pays €5000 to A. The settlement cannot be pleaded against B who has the right to sue C. However, because of the partial payment which has been made, B can claim only €5000 (III.–4:207 (Regime of solidary rights) paragraph (2) read with III.–4:108 (Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations) paragraph (1)).

B. Application of certain rules for solidary obligations

The form of paragraph (2) is explained by the parallelism between plurality of debtors and plurality of creditors. It avoids a repetition of the relevant rules provided for the case of a plurality of debtors. The following consequences ensue.

By virtue of the application of III–4:108(Performance, set-off and merger in solidary obligations) paragraph (1) both the payment of the debt and the operation of set-off between the debt due by the debtor and one of the rights discharge the debtor in relation to the co-creditors. It is the same in the case of merger (confusio): the debt is extinguished, but the debtor who has thus become creditor is exposed to the right of recourse of the other creditors, as provided by III.–4:206 (Apportionment in case of solidary rights) paragraph (2).

Illustration 3
A and B are solidary creditors of C for an amount of €10,000. B dies and C, his sole heir, succeeds. A will be able to claim €5000 from C, the new co-creditor.

In the same way, by virtue of III.–4:110 (Effect of judgment in solidary obligations), a court decision has effect only between the parties to the litigation.

Under III.–4:111 (Prescription in solidary obligations) paragraph (1), as applied to solidary rights, when one of the rights has prescribed, the other creditors keep their rights. Under paragraph (2) of that Article the creditor whose right has prescribed can nonetheless exercise a right of recourse (under III.–4:206 (Apportionment in cases of solidary rights) paragraph (2)) against a creditor who has received more than a due share of the right.

Illustration 4
A and B are solidary creditors of C for an amount of €10,000. B's claim has prescribed but A's has not. A can proceed against C and recover the whole of the sum. B can then exercise a right of recourse against A to the extent of €5000.

Finally, by virtue of III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations) paragraph (1) the debtor can plead against the creditor any defences, personal or inherent in the debt, apart from any defences personal to another of the solidary creditors.

Illustration 5
A and B are solidary creditors of C for €10,000. C can argue against A that the contract giving rise to the rights is ineffective by reason of its illegality, as it relates to a matter which cannot be the object of a lawful contract. This would be a defence inherent in the debt.

Illustration 6
A joint bank account is opened in the names of A and B. B is legally incapable of contracting by reason of mental incapacity. A wants to make a withdrawal. The Bank cannot plead the incapacity of B against A. This is a personal defence which can be invoked only in the Bank's relations with B.

Paragraph (2) of III.–4:112 (Opposability of other defences in solidary obligations) is not applied by analogy to solidary rights. The creditor who has received full payment, the debtor being thereby discharged, is exposed to the right of recourse of the co-creditors without being able to plead against them the defences which the debtor could have used against them. The sharing of the amount due under the obligation should be regulated exclusively by the terms regulating the right of the solidary creditors.

A and B are solidary creditors of C for an amount of €10,000. A sues C who pays €10,000. C could have pleaded a vice of consent against B. A will have to pay over €5000 to B, without being able to invoke the vice of consent which C could have pled against B.

NOTES

I. Release by one solidary creditor

1. The rule in this paragraph is different from that of several legal systems which, in the case of a release by one of the solidary creditors, come down expressly in favour of a partial reduction of the claim. See the FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs art. 1198(2); the GREEK CC art. 491(1); the ITALIAN CC art. 1301(2); the PORTUGUESE CC art. 864(3); as well as SLOVENIAN LOA § 409. For settlements, see the ITALIAN CC art. 1304 (according to which a settlement between one of the creditors and the debtor has effect against the other creditors only if they declare that they want to benefit from it). In the absence of express provisions, other laws adopt the solution of a partial reduction by analogy with passive solidarity. POLISH law provides that the release of the debtor by one of the creditors entitled to an indivisible performance has no effect in respect of the other creditors (CC art. 382 § 1). Provision similar to paragraph 1 of the Article can be found in the ESTONIAN LOA § 74; however this is equivalent to the rule (different from CFR) applied for solidary debtors (LOA § 66(1)), see also notes to Article 4:109). In the SPANISH CC, arts. 1143 and 1146: a release granted by one creditor extinguishes also the claim of the other creditors, regardless of whether the release was addressed to one or to all the debtors; one creditor may release the debtor of the whole obligation as well as only of the internal part of this debtor. Nevertheless it is difficult to reconcile these provisions with the general rule (CC art. 1141) according to which no creditor is empowered to take steps that harm the others creditors' positions. In AUSTRIA, however, the state of the law is the same as in the Article. Release by one creditor does not affect the position of the other creditors (see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 139). There is no special disposition in CZECH law. Nevertheless the general rule is that an agreement reached has legal effects only on the relationship of the debtor and creditor who concluded it (CC § 574 as generally construed and interpreted by Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 740). The position is the same in SCOTTISH law. In ENGLISH law, the release of a debtor by one joint creditor discharges the debt. Where there are a number of creditors entitled to payment separately and one of these creditors releases the debtor then only the share of the grantor is released (Treitel, The Law of Contract[12], nos. 13-028–13-029). English law seems not to recognise solidary creditorship, see above. In SLOVAK law there is no special regulation of the matter treated in the Article.

II. Application of certain rules for solidary obligations

2. The technique of legislation by reference to the rules on passive solidarity is found in a number of laws. See the GERMAN CC § 429(3) (the second paragraph of this article being devoted to merger); the SPANISH CC art. 1137. Others deal together with active and passive solidarity (the ITALIAN CC arts. 1300-1306) or have distinct rules (the GREEK CC arts. 491 and 492; the PORTUGUESE CC arts. 532, 869, 530 and 514(2)); and the ESTONIAN LOA §§ 66, 68, 73 and 74. In the absence of express rules, the rules on passive solidarity will probably be applied by analogy. In addition the SPANISH CC provides in art. 1141 that each co-creditor can act for the benefit of the others but not to their detriment. AUSTRIAN law, on the other hands, contains separate provisions for solidary creditors (see CC §§ 891, 892, 895 and the above notes).

CHAPTER 5: CHANGE OF PARTIES

Section 1: Assignment of rights

Sub-section 1: General

III.–5:101: Scope of section

(1) This Section applies to the assignment, by a contract or other juridical act, of a right to performance of an obligation.

(2) It does not apply to the transfer of a financial instrument or investment security where such transfer is required to be by entry in a register maintained by or for the issuer or where there are other requirements for transfer or restrictions on transfer.

COMMENTS

A. The topics covered by the Chapter

The Chapter covers three topics – an assignment of the right to performance to a person who becomes the new creditor; a change of debtor by the substitution of a new debtor for the existing debtor; and the transfer to another person of the entire contractual position, rights and obligations, of one party to a contract. These topics are related to each other; they all involve a change in the parties to a legal relationship; but they are also different in important respects.

An assignment of a right to performance, often a right to the payment of money, does not involve any transfer of the assignor's obligations. The debtor's own rights continue to lie solely against the assignor. Since an assignment does not involve the release of either of the parties to a contract, it does not require the consent of the debtor unless the underlying contract so provides. Assignment is therefore to be distinguished from the situation where a third party is substituted for the debtor, who is released from liability completely or incompletely, an arrangement requiring the assent of all three parties (see Section 2 of this Chapter. It is also to be distinguished from the situation where a third party is substituted completely for one of the contracting parties, taking over both rights and obligations. This also requires the assent of all three parties (see Section 3 of this Chapter).

B. The topics covered by Section 1

Section 1 applies only to assignments by a contract or other juridical act. It does not apply to transfers of rights by operation of law – for example, on death or bankruptcy. It is common to find statutory provisions to the effect that on the amalgamation or re-organisation of certain organisations or bodies, or on the transfer of businesses, rights and obligations are transferred by operation of law to the new entity. The Section does not apply to such cases. Nor does it apply to the transfer of rights by mere delivery of a document of title or other such document.

The Section applies only to assignments of rights to performance of an obligation. This covers contractual and non-contractual rights to performance, such as rights to payment under a unilateral undertaking, or rights to the payment of damages for non-performance of a contract, or rights under the law on unjustified enrichment to have an enrichment reversed by the payment of money or transfer of property. In practice, rights of various types are often intermingled and it would be inconvenient and unjustifiable to have one set of rules applying to the assignment of rights to performance of obligations under a contract and other rules applying to the assignment of other closely related rights to performance.

Rights to performance include rights to the payment of debts already payable or becoming payable in the future and rights to non-monetary performance such as the construction of buildings, the delivery of goods, and the provision of services. Rights to the performance of negative obligations, such as obligations not to compete within a certain area for a certain time, are also covered. However, the general limitations on the intended scope of these rules must be kept in mind. They are not intended to apply to public law rights and obligations. For example, the law conferring a right to certain social security payments may well provide that the right to the payments is not transferable. Nor is the Section intended to apply to family law rights and obligations

C. Financial instruments and investment securities

Although the holder of a bond or stock in the nature of a registered financial instrument or investment security will have a right to payment against the issuer, such instruments or securities differ in important respects from ordinary rights governed by the law of obligations. Their transfer will be governed by special rules, generally involving an entry in the issuer's register. They are therefore excluded from the scope of this Chapter.

D. Negotiable instruments

Under the general provisions on the scope of these rules (I.–1:101 (Intended field of application)) bills of exchange and other negotiable instruments are excluded. This is of particular relevance in the present context. Although a bill of exchange or other negotiable instrument may set up a series of contractual relationships, the transfer of rights under a negotiable instrument is usually effected by delivery, with any necessary endorsement, not by assignment. Since the obligation of the party or parties liable on the instrument is to pay the current holder, who may not be the original payee, there is no requirement of notice of the transfer as there would be for an assignment; and a debtor who pays an assignee who is not the holder of the instrument remains liable to the holder. Moreover, negotiable instruments are by their nature governed by distinct rules which in various respects differ sharply from those applicable to assignments. For example, a person taking a negotiable instrument for value and without notice of any defect in the transferor's title is not affected by such a defect or by defences that would have been available against the transferor, whereas an assignee takes subject to these matters.

While negotiable instruments as such are outside the scope of these rules, this does not necessarily preclude an assignment of the underlying right to payment. This is most likely to occur in a global assignment of assets which does not involve the delivery of negotiable instruments. Where a right to payment embodied in a negotiable instrument is assigned, negotiable instruments law will usually give the holder of the instrument priority over the assignee. This also is a matter not covered by the present Chapter.

E. Importance of assignment

Rights to payment or other performance of obligations represent a major tradable asset. They can be sold outright, as in the typical factoring transaction, or assigned by way of security for a loan or other obligation. The purpose of Section 1 of this Chapter is to set out principles and rules which are designed to facilitate the assignment of rights, whether individually or in bulk, whilst at the same time ensuring that the debtor's rights are not prejudiced by the assignment.

NOTES

1. This Section covers the assignment of both monetary and non-monetary rights. It is therefore somewhat broader than the UN Convention on the Assignment of Receivables in International Trade (hereafter the UN Convention), which by its nature is confined to certain rights to payment of money (art. 2).
2. It is common for the transfer of financial and negotiable instruments to be governed by special rules. For example, in SLOVAKIA the contractual assignment of monetary and non-monetary claims is governed by CC §§ 524 et seq., whereas the transfer of financial and negotiable instruments is regulated separately (cf. Act no. 566/2001 §§ 19 et seq. as amended - Securities Act). Similarly, in SPANISH law, the regulations on the transfer of financial instruments are excluded from the general assignment provisions in the CC and contained in the Securities Market Law and the different Company Laws. GERMAN law provides for a subsidiary application to such transfers, see CC § 413.

III.–5:102: Definitions

(1) An "assignment" of a right is the transfer of the right from one person (the "assignor") to another person (the "assignee").

(2) An "act of assignment" is a contract or other juridical act which is intended to effect a transfer of the right.

(3) Where part of a right is assigned, any reference in this Section to a right includes a reference to the assigned part of the right.

Definitions

This Article introduces the key terms of "assignment", "act of assignment", "assignor", and "assignee".

An "assignment" of a right is defined as a transfer of the right from one person to another person. The preceding Article has already made it clear, however, that the rules in this Section are limited to voluntary transfers – that is, transfers by a contract or other juridical act. They do not apply to the transfer of rights by operation of law (for example by way of legal subrogation). The purpose of the transfer does not matter. It may be to give effect to an agreement to sell. It may be to give effect to a legal obligation to assign arising from some other source, such as a statute. It may be gratuitous. It may be for purposes of security or a trust. However, in the last two cases there are special rules elsewhere in these rules which have priority. The present Section will apply only subsidiarily in so far as a matter is not regulated by those special rules. See the following Article.

The "assignor" is the creditor who transfers the right. The "assignee" is the person to whom it is transferred.

An "act of assignment" is defined as a contract or other juridical act which is intended to effect a transfer of the right. In many cases the contract or other juridical act will actually effect the transfer. But there can be situations where, for one reason or another, the contract or other juridical act fails to achieve its purpose. For example, the right may be non-assignable by law. Or the person purporting to assign the right may not be the creditor. This is why it is defined in terms of what is intended rather than in terms of what is achieved.

The "act of assignment" (i.e. the contract or other juridical act which is intended to effect the transfer and which may actually effect the transfer) must be distinguished from the assignment itself – the transfer of the right from the assignor to the assignee – the result of an effective act of assignment. The act of assignment must also be distinguished from the underlying obligation to assign, if there is one. An act of assignment will often derive from an agreement to assign. In some cases an agreement to assign is separate from and prior to the act of assignment and governs the wider business transaction or relationship of which the assignment will form part. In such cases the act of assignment may be a very simple unilateral act which contains no express undertakings or supplementary provisions at all. In other cases the agreement and the act of assignment may be embodied in a single contract document. The formation and validity of acts of assignment are governed by the general provisions on contracts and other juridical acts and not by this Chapter.

In these rules a valid agreement for an immediate assignment (or equivalent juridical act) suffices to effect the assignment if the other requirements of III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) are met, and (unlike in some of the Member States' laws) there is no principle of abstraction. Thus if the agreement to assign (or juridical act) is invalid, there will not be an effective assignment.

"Right" includes part of right. In some cases, but not in all, a right can be assigned in part (See III.–5:107 (Assignability in part)). Paragraph (3) is inserted purely for drafting purposes – to avoid the need for constant repetition of "right or part of the right".

1. In most European legal systems a consensual assignment is considered to be based on agreement and is dependent on the validity of the agreement. However, GERMAN law, GREEK law, ESTONIAN law and SWISS law adopt a principle of abstraction by which the assignment is considered to be independent of the agreement to assign, so that a defect in the latter does not necessarily affect the validity of the assignment, though in most cases it will. (see for GERMANY BGH NedJurW 1959, 498, 499)Since SCOTTISH law follows the abstraction principle in general, it is thought, in the absence of direct authority that this also applies in assignments (Reid, The Law of Property in Scotland, no. 612; see further ibid, nos. 652-658; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 12.06-12.08. It may be noted that in Scotland the term "assignation" is used, but in these Notes, for the sake of consistency, this will be referred to as "assignment".) See, for a comparative treatment, Kötz, Rights of Third Parties, no. 67, reproduced in Zweigert and Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative law[3], 446; for a Franco-German comparison, Cashin-Ritaine; for GERMAN law Staudinger (-Busche), BGB [2005], Pref. to §§ 398 ff, nos. 20-25; for GREEK law A.P. 481/1960, NoB 1961, 227; 946/2002 ChrID B/2002, 689; EllDik 44 (2003) 1355; 826/2001 EllDik 43 (2002) 731; CA Athens 459/1993 NoB 42 (1994), 206. In ENGLISH law a completed assignment of an existing right, as opposed to a mere agreement to assign or an assignment of a future right, is treated as a transfer of property and accordingly is not required to fulfil the conditions of a valid contract, such as consideration: Holt v. Heatherfield Trust Ltd. [1942] 2 KB 1, 5; Chitty on Contracts, nos. 20-018, 20-027; Goode, Commercial Law[3], 680-681.
2. The AUSTRIAN CC § 1392 describes assignment as a form of novation by substitution of a new creditor; the transfer, however, does not impose liability on the debtor and must not deteriorate the debtor's position (1395). In the BELGIAN, LUXEMBOURG and FRENCH CCs the provisions relating to consensual assignments are contained in the chapter on sales but extend to assignments based upon another relationship. Doctrine, however, treats the assignment as a matter of property law in the first place. In addition Title II of Book 4 of the FRENCH CC and BELGIAN CC arts. 2075 ff include provisions covering the pledge of rights. Similarly GERMAN law distinguishes between the assignment of rights, which is governed by the general rules on contract (CC §§ 398 ff) and pledge, which is governed by the rules on property law (CC §§ 1273 ff). The same holds true for ESTONIAN law (LOA §§ 164 ff and LPA §§ 314 ff respectively). The rules governing the consensual assignment of rights (cessioni di crediti) in ITALIAN law are laid down in CC arts. 1260-1267, in statute no. 52, 21 February 1991 and, about securitization, in statute no.

130, 30 April 1999. The LUXEMBOURG CC deals with the assignment of rights in arts. 1689-1691 and 1295. The original provisions were modified in important respects by the Loi of 21 December 1994 to relax the legal requirements. The SLOVENIAN LOA deals with assignment in §§ 417–426. Although regulated in the LOA, an assignment is considered to be a real contract in causal relationship to the obligatory contract (e.g. sale of the right). CZECH legal provisions relating to assignment of rights can be found mainly in the CC §§ 524-530, see also commentary by Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 663-672. Some special commercial rules applicable to assignment of rights can be found in Ccom art. 477).

3. In the NETHERLANDS the provision on assignment in CC art. 3:94 forms part of the general rules on transfer of ownership (CC arts. 3:83 ff). Dutch law considers a full transfer of fiduciary ownership to be void (on the basis of CC art. 3:84(3), as interpreted by HR 19 May 1995, NedJur 1996, 119), but recognises two forms of pledge of rights. The first is the normal pledge, which is considered possessory in character and for the creation of which it is necessary that the pledge be in writing signed by the assignor and that notice be given to the debtor: CC arts. 3:236(2), 3:94, 3:98. The second is the so-called 'silent' (or non-possessory) pledge, which does not depend on notice to the debtor but must be contained in a writing which is either authenticated by a duly authorised person (e.g. a notary) or has the date of its signature certified by a tax authority and the fact of certification entered in a register which is not open to the public. PORTUGUESE law treats the assignment of rights to performance as falling within the law of obligations, distinguishing between transfers (CC arts. 577 ff) and pledges (CC arts. 679 ff). Both outright assignments and assignments by way of security are covered by the NORDIC Uniform Promissory Notes Acts (DANISH PNA 1938, FINNISH PNA 1947, SWEDISH PNA 1936), parts of which apply even to the assignment of non-documentary, non-negotiable rights: Björn, 107. On DANISH law see Gomard, Obligationsret III, chap. 18 and Bo von Eyben a.o. chap. 12.

4. Under POLISH law, the assignment of rights to performance falls within the law of obligations; it is considered a contract between the creditor and a third party (assignee). The assignment is shaped as an agreement based on causa, see: CC art. 510 ("The contract of sale, barter, donation or any other contract which obliges transfer of the claim transfer the claim to the assignee, unless a special provision provides otherwise or the parties have agreed otherwise. If the conclusion of the contract of assignment takes place in the course of the performance of an obligation arising from a contract previously concluded and obliging transfer of the claim, from a bequest, from unjustified enrichment or from another occurrence, the validity of the contract of assignment depends on the existence of that obligation.")

5. In SPANISH law, the assignment of rights to performance is regulated as a form of the sale contract. Notwithstanding, it is widely admitted that the assignment may be supported in other contractual cases. The assignment is dependent on its cause (it is not an abstract disposition), is not subject to any special form and brings about the transfer of property as from the day of perfection, without any kind of formality or notification to the debtor. See TS 6 October 2004, RAJ (2004) 5986 and Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Pantaleón), Código Civil I, 1019 ff.

6. Being a part of the provisions on change of subjects of obligations, in SLOVAKIA, the right to performance can be assigned to a different subject through a contract between the creditor (assignor) and a third party, without the need of the debtor's consent pursuant to CC § 524. This includes also the commercial legal relations. On the basis of general rules on obligations (CC § 495), assignment is on principle a causal contract. The assignment of rights for purposes of security is regulated separately (CC § 554). However, the general rules on assignment of claims apply as to the requirements for the assignment (in particular the written form of such contract).

III.–5:103: Priority of provisions on proprietary securities and trusts

(1) In relation to assignments for purposes of security, the provisions of Book IX apply and have priority over the provisions in this Chapter.

(2) In relation to assignments for purposes of a trust, or to or from a trust, the provisions of Book X apply and have priority over the provisions in this Chapter.

COMMENTS

This Article serves as a reminder that there are special rules in other Books on proprietary securities and on trusts and that, in so far as there is any conflict, those rules will take priority over the rules of the present Chapter. Subject to that priority the rules of the present Chapter apply to assignments for any purpose.

NOTES

1. In SLOVAKIA, the provisions on assignment of rights are used also for assignments for purposes of security. Although there are no rules on trust, detailed provisions on fiduciary transfers of rights for purposes of security are provided for in the CC §§ 553-553e , which would prevail in cases of conflict. The same holds true for GERMAN law, where, however, some particular rules were developed to amend the rules on assignment for the purpose of security; the handling of both types of assignment differs in cases of insolvency, cf. Insolvency Act §§ 47, 51 no. 1. For trusts see the special rule in Insolvency Act § 47 (on “personal rights” which would include most trust relationships).
2. In SPAIN, the basic rules on proprietary securities are in the CC arts. 1857 ff. Although the problem of priority of application has provoked discussions, it seems that it depends on the will of the parties and on the terms of the specific obligation whether the assignment provisions or the security provisions should have priority. Due to the limitations of the formalistic approach, a functional approach should prevail; therefore, the application of potentially overlapping rules of law should depend on the intention and the purposes the parties seek in giving and taking security. Regarding trust, the SPANISH CC only regulates it in a testamentary framework (CC arts. 781-786).

Sub-section 2: Requirements for assignment

III.–5:104: Basic requirements

(1) The requirements for an assignment of a right to performance are that:

(a) the right exists;
(b) the right is assignable;
(c) the person purporting to assign the right has the right or authority to transfer it;
(d) the assignee is entitled as against the assignor to the transfer by virtue of a contract or other juridical act, a court order or a rule of law; and
(e) there is a valid act of assignment of the right.

(2) The entitlement referred to in paragraph (1)(d) need not precede the act of assignment.

(3) The same contract or other juridical act may operate as the conferment of an entitlement and as the act of assignment.

(4) Neither notice to the debtor nor the consent of the debtor to the assignment is required.

COMMENTS

A. The basic requirements

Paragraph (1) sets out the basic requirements for an assignment of a right – that is to say, for an actual transfer. An act of assignment may be wider in scope. It may relate to rights which do not yet exist, or which are not yet assignable (e.g. because the debtor has not yet consented in a case where such consent is required) or which have not yet been acquired by the granter. This Article is not concerned with what an act of assignment may cover but with the requirements for an actual assignment. The several ingredients are elaborated in subsequent Articles. The time when an assignment takes place is covered in III.–5:114 (When assignment takes place).

B. The existence of the right

The right must exist before it can be transferred. This is obvious. It is mentioned in paragraph (1)(a) only to point up the contrast between the actual assignment – the transfer – and the act of assignment. See III.–5:106 (Future and unspecified rights) and III.

–5:114 (When assignment takes place).

C. The assignability of the right

The right must be assignable at the time when the transfer is to take place. On assignability, see III.–5:105 (Assignability: general rule). An act of assignment can relate to an unassignable right and the transfer will then take place if and when the right becomes assignable, assuming all other requirements are met. See III.–5:114 (When assignment takes place).

D. Right or authority to assign

The person purporting to assign the right must have the right or authority to assign. Again this requirement has to be satisfied at the time when the transfer is to take place. Normally the creditor will be the person making the assignment but the formula used in paragraph (1)(c) covers cases where the creditor acts through a representative and also cases where some other person is authorised by law to effect an assignment. For example, the law on the financial consequences of divorce may provide that a spouse may be ordered by a court to assign certain rights to the other spouse. If the spouse refuses to assign, a clerk of court may be authorised to effect the assignment on behalf of the recalcitrant spouse. See further III.–5:111 (Right or authority to assign).

E. Assignee's entitlement

Paragraph (1)(d) answers a question which was left unanswered in the Principles of European Contract Law. It adopts the same solution as is adopted in Book VIII for the transfer of corporeal movables. The assignee must be entitled as against the assignor by virtue of a contract or other juridical act, court order or rule of law to the transfer of the right in question. This is of particular significance if the contract conferring the entitlement (for example, a contract of sale of the right) is void or avoided. The assignment then falls. See III.–5:118 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation).

F. Valid act of assignment

An entitlement is not enough. A person might be entitled under, say, a contract or a court order to an assignment at some point in the future but that will not by itself effect a transfer. There will in that situation have to be a separate act of assignment to effect the transfer. Of course, as already noted, the juridical act conferring the entitlement may itself operate as an immediate act of assignment. There will then be no need for a separate act of assignment.

G. No requirement of preceding underlying obligation or entitlement

In most cases an assignment will be made because of an underlying obligation to make it. However, this is not an essential requirement under the present Article. A person can transfer a right to another even if not obliged to do so, and it does not matter whether there never has been an obligation or whether there has been an obligation which has come to an end before the assignment. This is made clear by paragraph (2) which expresses the same idea from the other point of view – that of entitlement. The assignee must be entitled to the transfer but the entitlement can arise from the act of assignment itself: there does not need to be a preceding entitlement.

The effects of the invalidity or termination of the underlying obligation (if any) are regulated by III.–5:118 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation).

H. No need for separate act of assignment

Paragraph (3) makes it clear that there does not need to be a separate act of assignment – that is, an act of assignment separate from a contract or other juridical act giving rise to the assignee's entitlement. The contract or other juridical act which creates the entitlement to the transfer may itself, and very often will itself, operate as the act of assignment. The policy here is the same as in relation to the transfer of goods under Book VIII. An "abstract" system, drawing a clear distinction between the obligatory and the transferring aspect of, say, a contract for sale, is not adopted. It will be a question of interpretation whether a contract containing an undertaking to assign is to be construed as operating as an act of assignment or as requiring a separate later act of assignment.

I. Notice to debtor not a constitutive requirement

Paragraph (4) makes it clear that notice to the debtor is not required to effect the transfer of the right from the assignor to the assignee. However, as will be seen later, notice to the debtor plays a significant role in identifying a point in time after which the debtor is not discharged by paying to the assignor.

In some legal systems an assignment of a right is not validly constituted unless and until notice of the assignment has been given to the debtor or some other overt act performed, such as entry of the assignment in the assignor's accounting records. Failing such notice or equivalent act the assignment (i.e. the transfer of the right) is of no effect. The person attempting to assign the right remains the creditor.

There are two reasons for the approach adopted in the Article. The first relates to the question whether the notice requirement serves any useful purpose. Notice to the debtor is not equivalent to public notice (for example, by registration), since it is visible only to the debtor. While a requirement of notice may help to prevent a collusive ante-dating of an assignment made, for example, to overcome insolvency rules governing unfair preference, the date of an assignment is rarely in question and can usually be established by other means. The second, and more important, reason for omitting notice as a constitutive requirement is that it is inimical to modern receivables financing, which involves acts of assignment relating to a continuous stream of receivables arising from both present and future contracts. In the nature of things, future debtors cannot normally be identified at the time of the act of assignment. Moreover, in recent years there has been a sharp movement, particularly in factoring operations, from notification to non-notification financing, also known as invoice discounting, in order to avoid disturbing relations between the assignor-supplier and its customer, the debtor, and to allow the assignor to collect in the debts on behalf of the assignee. The use of non-notification financing depends heavily on the validity of the transfer of the debts from assignor to assignee. Accordingly any requirement of notice to the debtor as a constitutive element of the assignment could seriously undermine receivables financing generally and non-notification financing in particular.

J. Consent of debtor not normally required

Paragraph (4) also makes it clear that the consent of the debtor is not required for an assignment. There are, however, some cases where the consent of the debtor will have effects on the consequences of an assignment. One example is where there is a contractual prohibition of assignment. This will not make the right unassignable but, unless the debtor consents, it will preserve the debtor’s right to pay the assignor and obtain a good discharge by so doing. (See III.–5:108 (Assignability: effect of contractual prohibition) paragraphs (2) and (4)(a)).

NOTES

1. Because national systems differ in their approach to assignment they also differ as to the requirements. In countries, such as GERMANY, where property law is characterised by the abstraction principle, this will also apply to assignments. In others, transfer of property is generally “causal” and the same applies to assignments of rights (see e.g. for AUSTRIA, Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 116 ff). See the Notes to III.–5:102 (Definitions).

2. On formal requirements for an act of assignment, see the Notes to III.–5:110 (Act of assignment: formation and validity).

3. In FRANCE, and BELGIUM, where transfer of property is in principle not-abstract and consensual and even implied in the underlying contract for assignment (see the model of para (3) of the Article), the assignment is regulated in the CC in association with the contract most frequently underlying it, namely the sale. In Belgium, contemporary doctrine rejects the treatment by the CC and now clearly distinguishes the proprietary aspect from the underlying contract, which can be of any type, though the rule stands that 1° the act of assignment can be merely consensual (CC art. 1690 I) and 2° parties having contracted an assignment are presumed to have fulfilled also the act of assignment (general rule on transfer of property in CC art. 1138). Notice to the debtor is not required for the transfer of property, but for the obligational effects vis-à-vis the debtor (CC art. 1690 II) and/or in relation to bona fide acquirers (CC art. 1690 III and IV, see infra art. II-5:121). Belgian law on assignment in general thus exactly corresponds to III-5:104. BELGIAN law does not recognise a "security ownership" in rights of performance other than financial instruments. If the right is not a financial instrument, it is either an outright assignment (whether fiduciary or not) or a pledge (charge) (Cass. 17 October 1996, Foyer culturel de Sart-Tilman, RW 1996-97, 1395 obs M.E. Storme). In FRANCE, an assignment of a right is treated as a sale of rights, only with a different terminology (CC arts. 1689-1695 refer to "transport de la créance"). The general rules on contracts and other juridical acts apply to it, unless it is of a type to which some special rule applies. It follows from these general rules that an act of assignment is subject to the general requirements of consent, capacity, object and causa. It need not normally be in writing and is not subject to any other requirement as to form (except for transfer of capital shares, which requires a writing under CC art. 1865). It is governed by the general rules of proof by which a writing is required for transfer of rights whose value is above an amount fixed by decree (CC art. 1341). However, acts of assignment differ from other contracts transferring property in that they also create a legal relationship (lien de droit) and in that the debtor must be informed of the assignment by way of notice (CC art. 1690). It is worth noting that the debtor's consent is not required for validity (See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 1217, nos. 1277 et seq.). It is worth noting also that acts of assignment which are not subject to notification (signification) have developed significantly in such cases as assignment of "negotiable" rights, assignment of professional rights to bank and credit institutions by a mere bordereau (law Dailly of 2 January 1981: CMF art. L. 313-33) and assignment for purposes of security (law of 23 December 1988: CMF arts. L. 214-1 f): See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 1217, no. 1297 et seq.).

4. In the NETHERLANDS notice to the debtor is required in order for the assignment to have any effect (CC art. 3:94), though sustained criticism of this rule seems likely to lead to a change in the law. See also ITALIAN CC art. 1262(1). In GREEK law (see Stathopoulos, nos. 203-206) the requirements for a valid assignment are: 1. a contract between the assignor and the assignee (CC art. 455) and 2. the assignability of the claim (CC arts. 464-466 lay down when the claim is unassignable). The assignment contract is without further formality valid between the parties, but for the assignee to acquire the claim against the debtor and third parties, there must be notification of the assignment to the debtor (CC art. 460). In SCOTLAND notification to the debtor is required before the assignment takes effect as a transfer of the right (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 12.83-12.100). CZECH positive law is generally in accordance with the content of the Article. See CC § 524 as commented by Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 663-666. The contractual model is used and causa is required (see CC §§ 524.2 and 495). However, if the assignment is to affect the debtor notification to the debtor is required; the notification must be made without undue delay (see commentary by Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 664 and CC § 526.1). In SLOVAKIA and POLAND, neither the consent of the debtor (respectively SLOVAK CC § 524(1) and POLISH CC art. 509 § 1) nor notification to the debtor are a prerequisite for a valid assignment. However, the assignor is obliged to notify the debtor about the assignment. Under SLOVAKIAN law, if the assignor does not notify and if the assignee does not inform the debtor, the assignment will not affect the debtor (see CC § 526(1)). In POLISH law, until the assignor informs the debtor about the assignment, the debtor is discharged by performing to the assignor, unless the debtor knew about the assignment at the time of the performance (CC art. 512).

5. ESTONIAN law and legal doctrine agree on the requirements for an effective assignment similarly to the present Article (LOA § 164; Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Käerdi), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 164, no. 4.2). Generally neither notice to the debtor nor consent of the debtor is required. In order to protect the debtor, it is provided that if at the time of performance of the obligation to an assignor, the debtor is not and does not need to be aware of the assignment, the debtor is deemed to have performed the obligation for the benefit of the correct person (LOA § 169(1)).

6. In the SPANISH CC assignment is regulated only in the framework of the sale contract (CC arts. 1526-1536) but those rules are applicable to all assignable rights (Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II[3], 217). The requirements of a valid assignment by the creditor are in SPANISH law the same as expressed in the commented article: CC art. 1112 provides that all the rights acquired via obligation are able to be transferred, except for when there is a contrary provision established by the parties or when such assignment is contrary to law; e.g. in the CC the right to alimony (CC art. 151(1)) or a future inheritance (CC art. 1271(2)) are non-transferable rights. It is obvious that the transferred right has to exist and the person who is assigning must have a title to transfer it (CC art. 1529: the seller is liable for the veritas nomini of the assignment). There is no requirement of notifying the debtor and the debtor's consent is not needed (Bercovitz, Comentarios: CC 1527).

7. In ENGLISH law a simple act of assignment, which may be merely an informal notification to the assignee that the right is assigned, or an instruction to the debtor to pay the assignee, suffices to effect an assignment in equity: see Chitty on Contracts, no. 19-021. If the assignment is of a future right, an agreement supported by consideration may be required: Chitty on Contracts, nos. 19-027 et seq. A legal assignment, which will enable the assignee to sue in the assignee's own name, requires formalities under the Law of Property Act 1925 s. 136: see Chitty on Contracts, nos. 19-006 et seq. See generally Chitty on Contracts, chap. 19.

8. In HUNGARY the CC § 328 provides as follows. (1) A creditor is entitled to transfer the right to another person by contract (assignment). (2) Rights which are of a personal nature and rights whose assignment is not permitted by legal regulation cannot be assigned. (3) The debtor must be notified of an assignment; the debtor is entitled to tender performance to the assignor before notification. (4) If the debtor is notified by the assignor, the debtor is allowed to tender performance only to the new creditor (assignee) after notification; in the case of notification by the assignee, the debtor is entitled to demand certification of the assignment. In the absence of certification, the debtor is entitled to tender performance to the person claiming to be the assignee solely at the debtor's own risk. Under CC § 329(1) an assignee is subrogated to the original creditor through the assignment, and security rights also pass to the assignee. Under CC § 329(2) notification of the debtor regarding assignment suspends the period of limitation. Under CC § 329(3) a debtor is entitled to invoke against the assignee defences and rights of set-off on the legal grounds prevailing at the time of notification. Under CC § 330(1) the assignor is liable as a security provider for the performance of the debtor's obligation to the assignee, up to the value of the consideration received in return for the assignment, unless the assignor has assigned the right to the assignee expressly as a non-guaranteed right or has otherwise excluded liability. CC § 330(2) provides that otherwise the provisions on contracts of sale apply to assignments for consideration, while the provisions on donations apply to gratuitous assignments. Under CC § 331 if a right is transferred to another person on the basis of a legal regulation or official order, unless otherwise prescribed therein, the provisions on assignment are applied. In such a case, the liability of the previous creditor as a security provider is maintained only if so prescribed by a specific provision.

III.–5:105: Assignability: general rule

(1) All rights to performance are assignable except where otherwise provided by law.

(2) A right to performance which is by law accessory to another right is not assignable separately from that right.

COMMENTS

A. The general rule of assignability

The general rule is that all rights to performance of an obligation are assignable. This is, however, subject to any rules of law which limit or prohibit assignment. For example, III.–5:109 (Assignability: rights personal to the creditor) provides that certain rights of a personal nature are not assignable. There may also be restrictions in national laws.

> Illustration 1
> H, a private individual, purports to assign all his future income and assets to A as security for a loan. Proceedings are brought in England to enforce payment. Under English law the assignment is void as contrary to public policy in that its effect is to deprive the assignor of all means of livelihood. This overriding rule of English law will displace the general rule of assignability.

There will often be mandatory rules to the effect that certain types of accessory rights cannot be transferred separately but only along with the main right.

B. Effect of contractual prohibition of assignment

The effect of a contractual prohibition of assignment is dealt with in III.–5:108 (Assignability: effect of contractual prohibition).

C. Existing rights to future performance

The rights which can be assigned need not be immediately exigible. A right to a payment at some time in the future can be assigned and this applies even if the payment still has to be earned.

> Illustration 2
> A company, C, has entered into a contract with E to construct a factory, payment to be made in stages against architects' certificates. C may validly assign its rights to future payment although these are dependent on its execution of the contract works.

D. Conditional rights

A conditional right can be assigned. The assignee will take it subject to the condition.

E. Accessory rights

An accessory right is not assignable separately from the right to which it is accessory. The typical example of an accessory right is a security right of a type which is dependent on the primary right. It is for other branches of the law to decide which rights are accessory and which are not.

1. All European legal systems recognise the assignability of rights under existing contracts, though with exceptions, for example, where the assignment would be against public policy or where the rights are personal to the creditor: Kötz, Rights of Third Parties, nos. 68 ff. A global assignment of future debts by an individual will in most systems be considered contrary to public policy in that it deprives the assignor of future livelihood. Also considered against public policy in many jurisdictions are the assignment of salaries of public officers, such as judges, and the assignment of disputed rights. The Article requires effect to be given to any overriding mandatory rules.
2. In CZECH law the first rule is exactly and expressly the same. The assignment of civil as well as of commercial rights is still possible if not otherwise agreed between assignor and the debtor (CC § 525.2). In relation to a separate assignment of a right to performance which is by law accessory to another right, there is no such express provision but the applicable effective rule is the same, because by assignment of a right the appurtenances and all rights attached are ex lege transferred to the assignee (CC § 524.2).
3. Under ESTONIAN law claims for maintenance, claims for compensation for damage arising from a bodily injury or the death of a person may be assigned only if counter-performance of equal economic value is received in exchange for the assignment (LOA § 166(1)).
4. The DUTCH CC expresses the first rule but adds that the assignability of a right to performance may also be excluded by a contract concluded by the debtor and the creditor (art. 3:83). The same rules apply under GERMAN law and follow from CC § 398, see Staudinger (-Busche), BGB [2005], § 398, nos. 34 et seq. For several exceptions see the notes to the following articles.
5. In SCOTLAND the general principle is the assignability of any right to performance of an obligation, except where otherwise provided, as in paragraph (1) of the Article. Apart from statutory provisions on such matters as social security benefits, the main exceptions to the rule on assignability are alimentary provisions and rights strictly personal to the creditor. See McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 12.14-12.39; Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], nos. 8.16 and 33:01.
6. For the exceptions from the general rule of assignability in SLOVAK law, see especially CC § 525 and CCP §§ 317 and 319 (i.e. rights to performance that become extinguished with the death of the debtor at the latest, or rights the substance of which would be changed by the assignment, or rights which could not be subject to execution). Although any regulation of separate assignment of accessory rights is lacking, security rights cannot be assigned by their nature. It is however apparently possible to assign the right to performance without its appurtenances (cf. Judgment of the Supreme Court 4 Obo 210/01; Supreme Court's declaratory judgment Obpj 2/99).
7. The SPANISH CC art. 1112 provides that all the rights acquired via obligation are transferable, except when there is a contrary provision established by the parties or when such transfer is contrary to law. There is no express provision about separate assignment of an accessory right, but as the CC art. 1528 considers that when the principal right is assigned, the accessory rights are assigned as well (because of the impossibility of separating those rights), it is logical that a separate assignment of an accessory right is not possible in Spanish law (Navarro Pérez, La cesión de créditos, 114). That is also the rule when a right is transferred by the means of a subrogation (CC art. 1212).

8. In FRENCH and BELGIAN law the general rule is that all rights to performance of an obligation are assignable, including monetary and non-monetary obligations, conditional rights and, contrary to the present article, disputed rights. However, the assignability of rights is subject to legal exceptions such as for rights to aliment or social benefits, salaries and in insolvency law. The effect of a contractual prohibition of assignment is expressly recognized in France by statutory law (Law NRE of 15 May 2001). See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, 1217, no. 1278).

9. In ENGLISH law, generally rights are assignable unless they are personal, assignment is forbidden by statute or the contract under which the right arises declares the right to be non-assignable, though in the last case the assignment may still be effective as between assignor and assignee. See Chitty on Contracts, nos. 19-042—19-056.

10. Under POLISH law the assignability of a right to performance may be excluded by statutory law, a contract, or the nature of obligation (CC art. 509 § 1).

11. In GREEK LAW (see Stathopoulos, no. 206) a right to performance is unassignable: (1) when the right is not subject to attachment (CC art. 464); (2) the right, by reason of the nature of the performance, is personal to a particular creditor (CC art. 465), e.g. a claim for the performance of a certain task where the personal factor is predominant (such as provision of confidential services) and (3) when the creditor and the debtor have agreed on its unassignability (CC art. 466).

III.–5:106: Future and unspecified rights

(1) A future right to performance may be the subject of an act of assignment but the transfer of the right depends on its coming into existence and being identifiable as the right to which the act of assignment relates.

(2) A number of rights to performance may be assigned without individual specification if, at the time when the assignment is to take place in relation to them, they are identifiable as rights to which the act of assignment relates.

COMMENTS

A. Future rights

Difficulty has been experienced with the assignment of future rights – that is, rights which do not yet exist as opposed to rights which exist but which are subject to a time restriction or a condition. Future rights might, for example, be rights under contracts which have not yet been concluded. There is a concern about the economic effects on the assignor of parting with future assets and possible means of subsistence and a perception that an act of assignment requires specificity of subject-matter at the time of its making, coupled with notification to, or acceptance by, the debtor which is often impossible in the case of future rights. But the commercial importance of receivables financing (i.e. the provision of finance through the purchase of, or loans on the security of, rights to payment and other rights to performance) and the impracticability of requiring rights to be individually specified or determinable at the time of the act of assignment have led to an increasingly general acceptance that an act of assignment can cover future rights and that the rights will then be transferred without the need for any new act of transfer once they come into existence. At the international level this is manifested by the 1988 UNIDROIT Convention on International Factoring and the UN Convention on Assignment of Receivables in International Trade. Under Article 5 of the former it suffices that the rights are identifiable to the assignment at the time they come into existence.

The present Article makes it clear that an act of assignment may relate to future rights. However, the actual transfer depends on the right coming into existence and being identifiable as the right covered by the act of assignment. No further act of assignment is required. The identifiability criterion need not be satisfied when the right comes into existence but must be satisfied before the right will be transferred.

> C, a credit card issuer, obtains a large loan from its bank, B, and agrees to assign to B its future rights against cardholders to a value not exceeding the amount of the loan. While this agreement is perfectly valid as a contract, it cannot effect a transfer, since it does not provide the means by which the assigned rights can be identified.

B. Rights not individually specified

Paragraph (2) makes it clear that there can be an assignment of a bundle of rights, the individual rights not being separately identified. This facility is important in practice. However, the rights must be capable of identification as covered by the act of assignment at the time when the assignment is to take place in relation to them.

Illustration 2
S, a company supplying timber to timber merchants, enters into a factoring agreement with F, a factoring company, by which S assigns to F by way of sale all its existing and future rights to payment arising under sale contracts made or to be made with S's customers carrying on business in the United Kingdom. This can validly effect assignments, since in relation to any future right it can be ascertained at the time it comes into existence whether it falls within the factoring agreement as a receivable due from a United Kingdom customer of S.

Illustration 3
S, a furniture manufacturer, supplies furniture to retail shops and department stores. S agrees to sell to F, a factoring company, such of its existing and future rights to payment as are listed in schedules from time to time sent by S to F. There can be effective assignments as to all rights so listed.

1. The assignment of rights under future contracts has long been recognised in ENGLISH and IRISH laws, which require identifiability but not specificity: Goode, Commercial Law[3], 676-677. Similarly in SCOTTISH law a future right is assignable but must be defined: see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 12.31. The same position is taken in the UNIDROIT Convention art. 9(1)(b)). However, under ENGLISH law a statutory assignment (which enables the assignee to sue in the assignee's own name) is confined to the assignment of existing rights of which notice is given to the debtor. Many jurisdictions have tended to be hostile to the assignment of rights under future contracts, partly on the ground of want of specificity and the fact that the rights cannot be "determined" at the time of the assignment, partly, in some cases, because of the legal rule that an assignment of rights is not complete until notice has been given to the debtor or the assignment has been accepted by the debtor, which of course requires that the debtor is identifiable. Though a number of systems now accept the principle of assignability of rights under future contracts, there is divergence as to the time at which the determinability of the right is required to be satisfied. In some systems it is sufficient if the rights are determinable at the time they come into existence.
2. This is the position under AUSTRIAN LAW (OGH EvBl 1969/15; JBl 1984, 85; SZ 61/74; 18 April 1974, JBl 1975, 654; OGH 4 March 1982, SZ 55/32 170; for the assignment of a bundle of rights, which is valid if the single obligations are determinable, see OGH 26 June 2001, ecolex 2001, 907) and the same is true of GERMAN law as regards transfers (Kötz, Rights of Third Parties, no. 82; Staudinger (-Busche), BGB [2005], § 398, nos. 53 and 63) even if they take place for security purposes (Staudinger (-Busche), BGB [2005], § 398, nos. 60 et seq.) but not as regards pledges (see CC § 1280). The same is true for PORTUGUESE law (see Brito, Factoring, 54; Cristas, Transmissão Contratual do Direito de Crédito, 313 f; Leitão, Cessão de Créditos (2005), 428 f). In other systems the rule that the right must be determinable at the time of the assignment is retained, either expressly or through a requirement of notification to the debtor or identifiability of the debtor as a condition of validity of the assignment. This is the position in SCOTTISH law (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 12.30-12.31), DUTCH law (CC art. 3:84(2)) and probably LUXEMBOURG law, as regards ordinary pledges. In BELGIAN law, the assignment of future rights is possible but will only take effect when the right comes into existence. One has to distinguish 1° the underlying contract, 2° the act of assignment, and the effect. The contract can relate to any future right which can be defined, the act of assignment to any rights which can be identified, the effect to any existing right. However, a right which has already arisen from a contractual or non-contractual relationship is not seen as a future but as an existing right (e.g. future rent due under a contract of lease) and an assignment will thus have immediate effect. The position of CZECH doctrine is not certainly determined (see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 663-664) and, at present, there is no very established jurisprudence on this question. The ESTONIAN LOA § 165 requires the right to be sufficiently defined "at the time of the assignment". As actual transfer, i.e. assignment, depends on the right coming into existence, this is understood as the requirement that the rights should be sufficiently defined at the time they come into existence (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Käerdi), Võlaõigusseadus I § 165, nos. 3.2, 3.3.).

3. FRENCH law does not in principle recognise the assignment of rights under future contracts (see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1178, but in the case of assignments to a bank or other credit institution the Loi Dailly of 2 January 1981 allows delivery of a memorandum (bordereau) identifying the accounts transferred which can include accounts from future operations where the amount of the debt and the identity of the debtor have not yet been determined. (art. 1). A similar rule exists in DUTCH law in relation to a 'silent' pledge (CC art. 3:239(1), and see Verhagen and Rongen, chap. 4) but for ordinary pledges the requirement of notification to the debtor limits the possibility of assignment of future rights. In ITALY the prevailing view is that only rights arising out of existing contracts (including rights payable in the future) may be assigned (Bianca, Diritto civile IV, 589; Perlingieri, Cessione dei crediti, 7 ff. See also Cass. 90/4040). However, there is a special regime for factoring (Law no. 52 of 21 February 1991 art. 3) which permits the assignment to the factor of rights under future contracts. See Bassi, Factoring. In POLISH law there is no statutory provision in regards to the assignment of future rights. However, such possibility is admitted by the doctrine and judiciary (e.g. Supreme Court 2 July 2004, II CK 409/03, Pr. Bankowe 2005/6/5; Supreme Court 30 January 2003, V CKN 345/01, OSNC 2004/4/65). A contract of assignment of a future right has to specify a relationship from which the future right will arise. On DANISH law on the assignment of pay not yet earned, of damages for personal injury and loss of dependency not yet awarded, see Notes to III.–5.109 (Assignability: rights personal to the creditor).

4. In SPANISH law, and even though some previous doubts existed as to the time when proprietary effects were produced (see for a summary Garcia Vicente, CCJC 2005, 1099 ff], the TS 6 November 2006 finally has admitted the global assignment of future rights as a proprietary device.

5. Also in SLOVAKIA, there is no explicit legal regulation of the assignment of future rights, but it is recognised by legal doctrine and practice. CC § 151c(2), which enables the parties to put in pledge future or conditional rights, can be used by way of analogy. A similar scheme is known in the suretyship guarantee in commercial relations (Ccom art. 304(2)).

6. According to the prevailing view in doctrine and jurisprudence in GREECE the subject of an assignment can be a future right to performance but the transfer of the right depends on the identification of the right as far as its object and extent are concerned at the time of its coming into existence (see in Georgiadis and Stathopoulos (-Kritikos), art. 455 no. 49; Karakostas, Interpretation of Civil Code, art. 455, § 1599.24; A.P. 1471/2000 EllDni 2001, 701. See also the recent monography of Georgiades, The assignment of future receivables).

III.–5:107: Assignability in part

(1) A right to performance of a monetary obligation may be assigned in part.

(2) A right to performance of a non-monetary obligation may be assigned in part only if:

(a) the debtor consents to the assignment; or

(b) the right is divisible and the assignment does not render the obligation significantly more burdensome.

(3) Where a right is assigned in part the assignor is liable to the debtor for any increased costs which the debtor thereby incurs.

COMMENTS

A. General

The creditor may not wish to assign the whole right but only such part as is necessary to achieve the commercial purpose of the assignment. For example, a company wishing to borrow €30 million from its bank on the security of a debt of €200 million owed to it by a third party may want to assign to the bank only such part of the debt as will provide the bank with adequate security for the loan. Similarly, a wholesaler who has contracted to buy a quantity of fungible goods to be delivered in two separate consignments to be separately paid for and who has orders from two sub-buyers, each for half the total quantity, may wish to assign the right to the first consignment to one sub-buyer and the right to the second to the other.

Whether a right may be assigned in part depends partly on whether it is a right to performance of a monetary obligation or a non-monetary obligation.

(i) Rights to money

Paragraph (1) provides that a right to performance of a monetary obligation may be assigned in part. Partial assignment of a right to the payment of money does not usually lead to any practical difficulties, though it may expose the debtor to increased costs, which under paragraph (3) the debtor would be entitled to recover (see Comment B).

Illustration 1

L lends B €10,000. L can assign to A the right to €4,000 forming part of the €10,000. If B incurs additional bank charges as the result of having to make two separate payments B is entitled to recover these from L or set them off against the liability to L.

(ii) Rights other than to money

Where the right is to performance of a non-monetary obligation the considerations are rather different. In the case of a non-monetary right it would often be unfair to the debtor to require a division of the performance, for this would change the relationship between performance and counter-performance in a manner which could prove detrimental to the debtor and could lead to problems if the assignee wished to terminate for fundamental non-performance. Accordingly, paragraph (2) of the Article provides that a right to performance of a non-monetary obligation may, unless the debtor consents to the assignment, be assigned in part only if the right is divisible and the assignment does not render the obligation significantly more burdensome.

Illustration 2
S contracts to sell 100 computers to B, delivery to be made to B in Hamburg in four instalments of 25 computers each. B can assign to A the right to delivery in Hamburg of one, two or three instalments, but cannot assign the right to delivery of part of an instalment, for this would require S to divide the performance of an obligation which by its terms is indivisible as to each instalment. It might also, depending on the facts, render the obligation significantly more burdensome to S.

Illustration 3
F engages C to build a factory, including a tool shed, for €20 million, payable in stage payments against architects' certificates. If F sells the tool shed to A for €50,000 while retaining the rest of the factory, F cannot assign to A its rights under the contract as regards the tool shed, because the contract is an entire contract under which C's performance is indivisible.

Illustration 4
The facts are as in Illustration 3 except that the contract allocates a separate price to the tool shed and stipulates that this is to become payable on completion of its construction. On selling the tool shed F can assign its rights relating to the construction of the tool shed.

B. Security or other accessory rights

Assignment of part of a right in conformity with this Article carries with it a transfer of a pro rata share of any security rights or other accessory rights securing performance of the debtor's obligations (III.–5:115 (Rights transferred to assignee) and obliges the assignor to transfer to the assignee a pro rata share of all transferable independent rights (III.–5:112 (Undertakings by assignor) paragraph (6)).

C. Protection of the debtor

From the debtor's perspective partial assignments have the disadvantage of bringing exposure to the expense and inconvenience of multiple rights. The debtor is already protected to some extent by the provision in paragraph (2) to the effect that a non-monetary right, even if of a divisible nature, cannot be assigned without the debtor's consent if that would render the obligation significantly more burdensome to the debtor. Paragraph (3) of the Article gives further protection by providing that where a right is assigned in part the assignor is liable to the debtor for any increased costs which the debtor thereby incurs.

A risk arises where the right as a whole is disputed, in which event the debtor, having pleaded and called evidence in one case, would face the burden of doing so all over again in subsequent proceedings, with the danger of conflicting decisions, the debtor's defence being upheld in one case and rejected in another. For these types of case the debtor's protection must be found in the applicable procedural law.

NOTES

1. Divisible rights are assignable under the laws of most Member States of the European Union. In ITALIAN CC partial assignment of credits is provided for in art. 1260(2). There is no special statutory rule for partial assignments under DUTCH law, but partial assignments have been explicitly recognised in case law: see HR 19 December 1997, Ned. Jur. 1998, 690 (Zuidgeest/Furness) and further Verhagen & Rongen chap. 8. The situation is the same in CZECH and POLISH law where there is no express provision comparable to the Article but the existing possibility of "partial assignment" is not controversial (see respectively Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 664 and Mojak, p. 1038). There is no explicit statutory rule allowing partial assignment under GREEK law, but the possibility is inferred from CC art. 456, which regulates the obligations of the assignor regarding the handing over of the documents proving the right. Under CC art. 456(2), if part of the right is assigned, certified copies of such documents are to be handed over to the assignee in lieu of the originals. Also, scholars state that assignment of part of a right is possible, provided that the right is divisible: Stathopoulos, Law of Obligations, § 27, no. 9; Filios, § 88A. In AUSTRIA the possibility of assigning parts of a right is recognised if it is a monetary obligation (see OGH 17 March 1987, SZ 60/46) or another divisible obligation (see Schwimann (-Heidinger), ABGB VI[3], § 1393 no. 3). None of these countries appears to have a particular rule for the protection of the debtor of the kind embodied in this Article, though German scholars have argued for such a rule, deriving from the principle of good faith (see Staudinger (-Busche), BGB [2005], § 398 no. 46) and GREEK law is understood to require that the assignment should not be detrimental to the debtor: Georgiadis 409, no. 16; Georgiadis and Stathopoulos (-Kritikos), art. 455, nos. 44-45. Similar arguments have been made in PORTUGAL (Cristas, Transmissão Contratual do Direito de Crédito, 219). There is no regulation of assignability in part in SLOVAK law; although disputable, partial assignments are widely recognised by the courts (see e.g. Judgement of the Supreme Court 4 Obo 210/01; Supreme Court's declaratory judgement Obpj 2/99 - assignment of ancillary accessories to a claim). In SCOTTISH law, the assignability of divisible parts of a right to performance of an obligation is recognised (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 12.33). In ENGLISH law there cannot be a legal assignment of part of a debt, but an equitable assignment is possible. See Chitty on Contracts, no. 19-014.

2. No specific rules are provided on the partial assignability of a right in the SPANISH CC. However, regarding monetary obligations, as they are by nature divisible, a partial assignment is always possible. When the obligation is non-monetary, it is usually considered that it is not assignable in part either because of the impossibility of dividing the object of the obligation, or because assigning it in part without the debtor's consent would make the obligation more burdensome for the debtor. (For discussion see Navarro Pérez, La cesión de créditos en el derecho civil español, 352).

3. In FRANCE, transfer of rights may be partial, in which case the assignor and the assignee (or the assignees) may receive payment depending on the circumstances and unless otherwise agreed by the parties, without any right of preference for the assignor (See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 1128, no. 1290).

III.–5:108: Assignability: effect of contractual prohibition

(1) A contractual prohibition of, or restriction on, the assignment of a right does not affect the assignability of the right.

(2) However, where a right is assigned in breach of such a prohibition or restriction:

(a) the debtor may perform in favour of the assignor and is discharged by so doing; and
(b) the debtor retains all rights of set-off against the assignor as if the right had not been assigned.

(3) Paragraph (2) does not apply if:

(a) the debtor has consented to the assignment;
(b) the debtor has caused the assignee to believe on reasonable grounds that there was no such prohibition or restriction; or
(c) the assigned right is a right to payment for the provision of goods or services.

(4) The fact that a right is assignable notwithstanding a contractual prohibition or restriction does not affect the assignor's liability to the debtor for any breach of the prohibition or restriction.

COMMENTS

A. Conflicting interests

Where a contract contains a clause prohibiting the creditor from assigning rights under it two conflicting interests immediately come into play.

One interest is respect for freedom of contract and party autonomy. A contractual prohibition should in principle be respected. The debtor may have good commercial reasons for inserting a no-assignment clause. In the first place, the debtor may not want to have to deal with an unknown creditor who may be more severe than the assignor. Secondly, the debtor may wish to avoid the risk of overlooking the notice of assignment and paying the assignor, in which event there would be a risk of having to make a payment or give other performance a second time, to the assignee. Thirdly, a debtor who expects to have continued mutual dealings with the creditor will wish to preserve the right of set-off, a right which would be cut off as regards cross-rights arising after receipt of notice of assignment. Fourthly, the assignee may be incorporated or have its principal place of business in a jurisdiction whose legal or tax regime is unfavourable to the transaction. There is, therefore, an argument for saying that an assignment in breach of a no-assignment clause should be ineffective, whether the contract contains an outright prohibition or restricts the creditor’s right to assign, e.g. by requiring the debtor’s consent.

The other relevant interest is in the free alienability of assets. Rights to performance of obligations, particularly monetary obligations, are important assets. The marketability of monetary rights is of enormous practical and economic importance. In relation to the transfer of movables it is a widely accepted principle, adopted also in these rules, that contractual prohibitions or restrictions do not affect transferability. The market in monetary rights is no less important today than the market in movables.

The laws of the Member States differ in the effect they give to anti-assignment clauses.

B. Balancing the interests

There are various ways in which the interests in freedom of contract and the interest in the alienability of assets can be balanced. One way, adopted in the UNIDROIT Principles (art. 9.1.9) and to a more limited extent in the Principles of European Contract Law (art. 11:301) is to distinguish between monetary rights, or some monetary rights, and other rights and to allow the first to be more freely assignable than the second, in spite of a contractual prohibition. However, such a distinction, especially if limited to certain types of monetary rights (such as in PECL "future rights to the payment of money") risks giving inadequate weight to the interest in alienability, which is not confined to certain categories of monetary rights or even exclusively to monetary rights.

The present Article adopts two techniques to balance the interests, one applying to assignments in general and the other only to assignments of trade receivables (see para (3)(c) and Comment C below). The general technique is to allow the right to be transferable (thus recognising fully the interest in alienability) while providing that the debtor can obtain a good discharge by performing to the assignor (even although the assignor is no longer the creditor). The debtor also preserves full rights of set-off against the assignor as if the right had not been assigned. This does not affect the debtor's right under III.–5:116 (Effect on defences and rights of set-off) to invoke certain defences and rights of set-off against the assignee if the debtor chooses to pay the assignee and not the assignor. The debtor can also recover damages from the assignor for any loss caused by breach of the restriction or prohibition, although in practice such loss is likely to be minimal if the debtor is allowed to continue to perform in favour of the assignor. The debtor's interests are therefore protected and the principle of freedom of contract is respected so far as is possible consistent with not restricting alienability. The rules for the protection of the debtor do not prevent the debtor from consenting to, or acquiescing in, the assignment and paying the assignee, should the debtor wish to do so. The debtor is permitted, but not obliged, to pay the assignor. The notion that the debtor can obtain a good discharge by paying someone who is not the creditor is perhaps strange at first sight but it is not unfamiliar in this context. It is widely recognised, for example, that a debtor who has not been notified of an assignment and does not know of it can obtain a good discharge by paying the assignor. This is the position under these rules also (see III.–5:119 (Performance to person who is not the creditor)).

A practical advantage of the solution adopted here is that the assignee becomes the holder of the right as soon as the assignment takes effect and, as a result, is protected from the assignor's creditors so long as the right continues to exist. Once the debtor pays the assignor and is discharged the assignee can recover the proceeds from the assignor on the basis of unjustified enrichment. The assignor has been enriched by receiving a payment which discharges the debtor and therefore causes the assignee to suffer a corresponding disadvantage. The question of priority in the proceeds after the right is extinguished by performance is dealt with in a later Article (III.–5:122 (Competition between assignee and assignor receiving proceeds)) in a way similar to that employed in article 24 of the United Nations Convention on the Assignment of Receivables in International Trade. The assignee's claim to the proceeds has priority over competing claims, such as the claims of the assignor's creditors, so long as the proceeds are separately identifiable in the assignee's funds. There is a particular need to protect the assignee in this situation because the assignee cannot obtain protection in the normal way by notifying the debtor. The assignee is helpless to prevent the debtor from paying the assignor. The fact that the debtor is allowed to pay the assignor and thus obtain some benefit from the contractual prohibition should not prejudice any more than is necessary the position of the assignee in relation to the assignor and the assignor's creditors.

C. Exceptions to rule that debtor can perform to assignor

The general rule stated in paragraph (2) is for the protection of the debtor. There is therefore no need for it if the debtor has consented to the assignment and no justification for it if the debtor has misled the assignee into believing that there is no prohibition or restriction. Exceptions for these situations are provided in paragraph (3)(a) and (b).

A further exception is provided in paragraph (3)(c). This applies a special rule for "trade receivables", a rule which is not found in the laws of the Member States but which has been adopted in a number of international conventions and also throughout much of North America. It is justified by a different consideration – the interest in enabling "trade receivables" to be used a source of finance. In this case too the assignment is completely effective and the debtor who has been notified of the assignment must pay the assignee. This exception is particularly necessary where the assignment relates to a continuing stream of future debts, for example, by a supplier to a factor under a factoring agreement. In this type of arrangement it is manifestly impossible to expect the factor to scrutinise the individual contracts, which may run into hundreds, in order to see whether these contain a provision against assignment. Even where, as will usually be the case, the contract is a standard-term contract which does not embody such a provision, the assignee who examines one such contract cannot be sure that the assignor will not at some stage change the terms without notification. So paragraph (3)(c) allows the assignment to take effect where it is an assignment of a right to payment for the provision of goods or services. In accordance with the normal rule, the debtor can invoke against the assignee the defences and rights of set-off allowed by III.–5:116 (Effect on defences and rights of set-off). This exception is confined to the assignment of rights to the payment of money for the provision of goods or services; for it is in the field of receivables financing that the no-assignment clause typically creates problems. The exception in paragraph (3)(c) represents a response to commercial needs which is steadily gaining acceptance. See, for example, the American Uniform Commercial Code, Revised Article 9, section 9-406(d); the 1988 UNIDROIT Convention on International Factoring, Article 6(1); and the UN Convention on the Assignment of Receivables in International Trade (2001), Article 9.

D. Right may be non-assignable for another reason

The Article deals only with the effect of a contractual prohibition or restriction on assignment. It is only such a prohibition or restriction which is denied effect by paragraph (1). If the right is non-assignable by law for another reason it will remain non-assignable. For example, a right may be non-assignable by virtue of the following Article on the ground that performance would be so personal to the creditor that the debtor could not reasonably be expected to render performance to anyone else. The rule in paragraph (1) would not render such a non-assignable right assignable merely because it had been reinforced by a contractual prohibition.

E. Assignor remains liable to debtor for non-performance of obligation

The overriding of contractual prohibitions or restrictions do not affect the assignor's liability to the debtor for non-performance of the obligation not to assign, a point made clear by paragraph (4).

F. Assignments in security

Paragraphs (2) and (3) of this Article do not apply to assignments in security of rights to the payment of money. See IX.–2:301 (Encumbrances of right to payment of money).

NOTES

1. The effect of a no-assignment clause on the assignee's rights against the debtor differs from country to country. Under the ITALIAN CC art. 1260(2), a no-assignment clause is ineffective as between assignee and debtor unless it is proved that the assignee knew of the clause at the time of the assignment, and the position is similar under GREEK law, CC art. 466(2) (though with a different allocation of the burden of proof), and PORTUGUESE law: CC art. 577(2). The ESTONIAN LOA § 166(2)-(3) clearly states that a no-assignment clause has no effect towards other persons. Under SPANISH law a prohibition against assignment is generally considered to be of no effect against an assignee except where the assignee acts in bad faith (Díez-Picazo II, 813), but some authors consider that even an assignee who took the right without knowledge of the no-assignment clause cannot assert the right against the debtor unless the latter consented to the assignment (Pantaleón, Comentario, 1023*)*. The case law affords as unique precedent the TS 26 September 2002, which implicitly grants efficacy to the prohibition of assignment [Commentary by Veiga Copo, Revista Derecho Bancario Bursátil 91 (2003) 281 ff and by Cruz Moreno, CCJC 63 (2003), pp. 915 ff]. The position in ENGLISH law is thought to be that an assignment is effective as between assignor and assignee despite a prohibition on assignment: see Chitty on Contracts, no. 19-045. In one case it was held that an assignment in breach of a prohibition against assignment was wholly void (Helstan Securities Ltd. v. Hertfordshire County Council [1978] 3 All ER 262), but since the case concerned only the question whether the assignee could recover from the debtor the ruling went beyond what was necessary for the decision, and a subsequent comment on the case suggesting that the debtor could not validly prohibit the assignor from disposing of the sums paid to it by the debtor (Goode, "Inalienable Rights?") received sympathetic consideration by the House of Lords in Linden Gardens Trust Ltd. v. Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd. [1994] 1 AC 85, 104, though it was not found necessary to decide the point. Subsequent cases have held that an anti-assignment clause does not prevent the assignor holding any proceeds received from the debtor on trust for the assignee, and if the debtor has not paid it may be that the assignee can force the assignor to sue on the assignee's behalf. See Don King Productions Inc v Warren [2001] Chap. 291; Barbados Trust Co. v. Bank of Zambia [2007] EWCA Civ 148, [2007] 1 Lloyd's Rep 495. However, it is likely that the debtor may refuse to recognise a prohibited assignment and can rely on set-offs that arose even after it had been notified. There is no exception for receivables in English law but one was recommended by the Law Commission in its Report on Company Security Interests (Law Com 296, 2005), para. 6.73. In SCOTLAND no-assignment clauses are held effective: James Scott Ltd. v. Apollo Engineering Ltd. 2000 SC 228; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 12.38. NORDIC law fully recognises the validity and effectiveness of a no-assignment clause vis-à-vis the debtor (Ussing, Aftaler 229), as does DUTCH law (CC art. 3:83(2)) except in the rare case where the debtor led the assignee to believe that the right was assignable and the assignee relied in good faith and reasonably on the debtor's statement or other conduct (CC art. 3:36). In FRANCE, it has been held that, since the assignee is not a party to the contract containing the no-assignment clause, the assignee is not bound by such clause and can obtain payment from the debtor: Cass.com. 21 November 2000, D. 2001, p. 123, obs. Valérie Avena-Robardet). However, the principle of the validity of a no-assignment clause and the effect of a contractual prohibition of assignment is expressly recognized in a statute enacted on 15 May 2001 (Law NRE "sur les nouvelles régulations économiques"). See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 1218, no. 1278. LUXEMBOURG law has no express provision corresponding to the present Article. In POLAND, some authors maintain that a no-assignment clause is effective towards other persons even if they act in good faith (see: Czachórski, Zobowiązania, 360). Undoubtedly, as provided in CC art. 514 with respect to claims verified in writing, the prohibition of assignment is effective towards an assignee acting in bad faith. In SLOVENIA a no-assignment clause prevents assignment in civil law relationships even against the third party. In commercial relationships such a clause has no effect. See LOA § 417(2) and (3). The basic rule under GERMAN law is the effectivness of a no-assignment clause, see CC § 399. But Ccom § 354a establishes a particular rule for monetary claims under commercial contracts, which remain assignable; but the debtor is protected as in III.–5:108(2). In SLOVAKIA, a contractual prohibition of assignment is detrimental for a valid assignment of rights pursuant to CC § 525(1) ("It is impossible to assign a claim in breach of a contractual prohibition"). This would affect also an assignee in good faith.

2. In AUSTRIA the rules on contractual prohibitions of assignment have recently been changed. The new CC § 1396a provides that with monetary obligations between parties who are not consumers a contractual prohibition of an assignment is only valid if it has been individually negotiated and does not considerably worsen the position of the creditor. Besides that the prohibition is only of relative effect: if the right is transferred despite a prohibition the transfer is still effective even if the assignee knew of the prohibition and without the assignee becoming liable towards the debtor (see CC § 1396a(3)). CC § 1396a is, however, not applicable if the obligation is non-monetary or if a consumer is involved. In such cases it is – in parts – still argued that a contractual prohibition of assignment has an absolute effect (see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 119). Under AUSTRIAN law there also exist statutory prohibitions of assignment (e.g. CC §§ 1070, 1074, ConsProtA § 12, EO § 293(2)). In CZECH law there is express legal provision stating that an assignment is not possible if it would violate an agreement made with the debtor (CC § 525.2).

3. In so far as the Article denies effect to no-assignment clauses in assignments of receivables it follows the approach first taken in what is now section 9–401(1)(b) of the AMERICAN UCC and in art. 6(1) of the UNIDROIT Factoring Convention. A similar approach is also to be found in many of the Canadian Personal Property Security Acts (e.g. Saskatchewan PPSA 1993 s. 41(9)). BELGIAN doctrine now clearly distinguishes the question of the validity of the no-assignment clause under the law of obligations from the effect of the clause in relation to the debtor and under property law. As a right to performance has no other existence than its "immaterial" existence between creditor and debtor, any restriction validly contracted between creditor and debtor will automatically and necessarily have effect erga omnes. A no-assignment clause will however be simply invalid, also between the parties, if the party who stipulated it has no legitimate interest in doing so. Stricter rules will apply to the validity of such clauses relating to shares in companies. The rule of para (4) is therefor an impossibility under Belgian law: either the clause is invalid, also between the parties, or it is effective erga omnes, subject only to the protection of an assignee as under para (2) (a) and (b) of the Article.

III.–5:109: Assignability: rights personal to the creditor

(1) A right is not assignable if it is a right to a performance which the debtor, by reason of the nature of the performance or the relationship between the debtor and the creditor, could not reasonably be required to render to anyone except that creditor.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply if the debtor has consented to the assignment.

COMMENTS

A. Rights personal to the creditor

In a sense, every assignment of a right changes the debtor's position in some degree. The debtor has to perform in favour of a different person, and that person may have a more stringent attitude towards enforcement of rights than the original creditor. That by itself is not a sufficient consideration to prevent the assignment.

There are, however, rights which by the nature of the subject-matter or the relationship between the parties are personal to the creditor, so that it would be unfair to expose the debtor to an obligation to perform to an assignee. Different legal systems have different formulations of the principle underlying this conception. Under some the rule is stated as being that rights to performance under personal contracts, or contracts for personal services, are not assignable; in others that a right cannot be assigned if this would significantly alter the nature or content of the performance or render counter-performance less likely. All these formulations would appear to be encompassed by the rule embodied in this Article, since they all presuppose that the identity of the original creditor is important to the debtor. The typical example given of an assignment that would materially increase the burden or risk on the debtor is one which relates to the assignment of rights under an insurance policy covering goods which the assignor is selling to the assignee. Since the personal character of the insured is material to the insurer's risk, to allow an assignment would be to expose the insurer to a risk of a kind different from that which it had agreed to accept. This is a factor indicating that the benefits of the insurance policy are intended to be personal to the insured.

> Illustration
> P agrees to publish a book W is writing. An act of assignment by P to A of P's right to call for the book from W is not effective to assign the right, since the character and reputation of the publishing house are matters of importance to an author and the publisher cannot be changed without the author’s consent.

An employer's right to performance under a contract of employment also falls into the category of non-assignable rights, since for both parties the relationship is a personal one which does not in principle permit substitution of a new party as creditor without the consent of the other party to the contract.

Where an act of assignment is ineffective to transfer the right because of the present Article the intended assignee will normally have the right to recover damages from the intending assignor for non-performance of the obligation to assign.

B. Mandatory rules

Independently of this and the preceding Article, overriding mandatory rules may render a purported assignment ineffective.

NOTES

1. In GERMAN law a right cannot be assigned if the effect would be to alter the substance of the debtor's performance (CC § 399) or if the right is personal to the creditor. The position is similar under BELGIAN, FRENCH, LUXEMBOURG, GREEK (see GREEK CC art. 465), ESTONIAN, SLOVENIAN (LOA § 417(1)) and DUTCH law. Similarly ITALIAN CC art. 1260(1) expressly excludes the assignability of rights which are of a strictly personal character such as alimony rights (CC art. 447(1)). These are considered to include rights where performance in favour of the particular creditor is of importance to the debtor, such as rights under an insurance policy or a contract of employment ENGLISH law too does not recognise the validity of an assignment of rights personal to the creditor, e.g. the benefit of an author's contract to write a book or the assignment of a motor insurance policy: Treitel, The Law of Contract[11], nos. 15-051–15-057. SCOTTISH law is the same: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 12.36-12.41; cf discussion in Anderson paras. 2.34-2.46. DANISH law does not allow assignment of wages and salary not yet earned and of claims for damages for personal injury and loss of dependency, which have not yet been awarded or recognised, see von Eyben a.o. 39 ff. POLISH law provides that a claim cannot be assigned if this would be inconsistent with the nature of the obligation, CC art. 509(1) (e.g. where the nature of the performance is such that it is personal to the creditor). In AUSTRIA (deriving from CC § 1393 second sentence) the right to m personal work and services under an employment contract or the employee's right to holidays are not assignable (see Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger (-Neumayr), ABGB[2], § 1393, no 3). Under the CZECH CC (§ 525(1)) firstly an assignment is not possible if the right of comes to an end no later than upon the creditor's death or if the content of the right would be changed by a substitution of the creditor and secondly there is expressly added that it is not possible to assign a receivable if it cannot be made subject to the execution of a judgment. SLOVAK law is to the same effect (CC § 525(1)). The restriction relating to a possible change of content of the right, according to case law, is applicable only to rights to performance which are by their nature personal to the creditor and the assignment of which might prejudice the debtor's position (See Judgment of the Supreme Court 4 Obo 210/01).
2. Strictly personal rights are non-transferable in SPANISH law, due to their special character intuitu personae. Although the CC does not have an express rule on the matter, this result may be inferred from the legal nature of assignment which is not compatible with any change of the legal content of the contract (Navarro Pérez, p. 110). An example of a personal right that is not assignable is a right to aliment, except when it is overdue and the right to sue is assigned (CC art. 151(1)). The debtor's consent may validate an assignment of a right only when the personal character does not stem from a legal provision (otherwise, the credit is non-transferable by the CC art. 1112), but either from the terms of the obligation or from the non-fungible nature of the performance to be made.

III.–5:110: Act of assignment: formation and validity

(1) Subject to paragraphs (2) and (3), the rules of Book II on the formation and validity of contracts and other juridical acts apply to acts of assignment.

(2) The rules of Book IV.I on the formation and validity of contracts of donation apply to gratuitous acts of assignment.

(3) The rules of Book IX on the formation and validity of security agreements apply to acts of assignment for purposes of security.

COMMENTS

A. Application of general rules

An act of assignment will be a contract or other juridical act. The general rules on contracts and other juridical acts apply to it, unless it is of a type to which some special rule applies. It follows from these general rules that an act of assignment need not normally be in writing and is not subject to any other requirement as to form. It may be proved by any means, including witnesses. In practice, contracts or other juridical acts by which rights are assigned are almost invariably in writing but there is no need to embody this as a general legal requirement. Later Articles give adequate protection to the debtor.

B. Gratuitous assignments

The policy considerations which justify special rules for the formation and validity of contracts of donation (to be dealt with in the later Part IV.I on Gratuitous Contracts) also justify such a requirement for gratuitous assignments. Paragraph (2) therefore applies the donation rules by reference.

C. Assignments for purposes of security

The same applies to assignments for purposes of security. The special rules for security agreements (to be dealt with in the later Book on Proprietary Securities) are therefore applied.

NOTES

1. The UN Convention has no substantive rule but provides in art. 8 that an assignment is valid as to form if it meets the formal requirements either of the law of the State in which the assignor is located or of the applicable law by virtue of rules of private international law. The UNIDROIT Factoring Convention does not prescribe any formal requirements for the assignment of receivables but is confined to assignments of which notice in writing is to be given to the debtor. The laws of most countries of the European Union do not have formal requirements for the validity of a non-gratuitous act of assignment of rights as between assignor and assignee. These countries include AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, ENGLAND, GERMANY (where it does not depend on non-gratuitousness), GREECE, ITALY, LUXEMBOURG, PORTUGAL, SCOTLAND, SLOVENIA, SPAIN and the NORDIC countries. In the NETHERLANDS an assignment and a pledge are always required to be in writing signed by the assignor (CC arts. 3:94 and 3:236(2)). For the creation of a ‘silent’, or non-possessory, pledge of rights either the written instrument must be officially authenticated (e.g. by a notary) or, if it is not, the date of its creation must be officially certified. POLISH law does not require a special form for the validity of the assignment. However, if a right is verified in writing, its assignment must also be verified in writing (CC art. 511). The same is generally true for ESTONIAN law, as LOA § 11(3) states that if a contract must be entered into in a specific form, agreements on assignment of rights arising from the contract must also be entered into in such form unless otherwise provided by law or the contract (applicable to act of assignment (see Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Käerdi), § 164, no. 4.2.1. c)). For assignments for purposes of security, the format which can be reproduced in writing is required (LPA § 315(2^1)). In AUSTRIA – similarly to the rule in this Article – it depends on the contract that is the title for the assignment which requirements have to be met (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II^{13}, 120). In CZECH law the assignment needs to be done in writing (see above). Writing is also required in SLOVAKIA, pursuant to CC § 524(1).

III.–5:111: Right or authority to assign

The requirement of right or authority in III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) paragraph (1)(c) need not be satisfied at the time of the act of assignment but has to be satisfied at the time the assignment is to take place.

COMMENTS

Even if there is an existing, assignable right and a valid act of assignment there will be no transfer of the right if the person purporting to assign it by the act of assignment has no right or authority to do so. See III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) paragraph (1)(c). Normally only the creditor will be in a position to assign the right, whether acting personally or through a representative, but there may be cases where some other person is authorised by law to assign the right.

This Article makes it clear that the requirement of right or authority to assign need not be satisfied at the time of the act of assignment but must be satisfied at the time the assignment is to take place. A person can grant an act of assignment of a right yet to be acquired but the actual transfer of the right will not take place until it is acquired.

1. This rule may be said to follow from the very nature of assignment as a transfer of the creditor's right to performance. It is normally taken for granted.
2. There are no specific provisions on entitlement to assign a right in the SLOVAK law. Therefore general civil law rules will apply, which means that only the creditor (even through a representative) may assign the right to performance.
2. In SPANISH law, the creditor is the only person authorised to assign a right, whether directly or by the means of any legal representation, due to the creditor's liability for the veritas nomini of the right (CC art. 1529). The assignor must have a legal title in order to assign a credit, but since it is legal to assign future rights, this title may arise a posteriori, when the right comes into the existence (see note on III.–5:114 (When assignment takes place)).

Sub-section 3: Undertakings by assignor

III.–5:112: Undertakings by assignor

(1) The undertakings in paragraphs (2) to (6) are included in the act of assignment unless the act of assignment or the circumstances indicate otherwise.

(2) The assignor undertakes that:

(a) the assigned right exists or will exist at the time when the assignment is to take effect;
(b) the assignor is entitled to assign the right or will be so entitled at the time when the assignment is to take effect.
(c) the debtor has no defences against an assertion of the right;
(d) the right will not be affected by any right of set-off available as between the assignor and the debtor; and
(e) the right has not been the subject of a prior assignment to another assignee and is not subject to any right in security in favour of any other person or to any other incumbrance.

(3) The assignor undertakes that any terms of a contract or other juridical act which have been disclosed to the assignee as terms regulating the right have not been modified and are not affected by any undisclosed agreement as to their meaning or effect which would be prejudicial to the assignee.

(4) The assignor undertakes that the terms of any contract or other juridical act from which the right arises will not be modified without the consent of the assignee unless the modification is provided for in the act of assignment or is one which is made in good faith and is of a nature to which the assignee could not reasonably object.

(5) The assignor undertakes not to conclude or grant any subsequent act of assignment of the same right which could lead to another person obtaining priority over the assignee.

(6) The assignor undertakes to transfer to the assignee, or to take such steps as are necessary to complete the transfer of, all transferable rights intended to secure the performance which are not already transferred by the assignment, and to transfer the proceeds of any non-transferable rights intended to secure the performance.

(7) The assignor does not represent that the debtor has, or will have, the ability to pay.

COMMENTS

A. General

A contract or other juridical act by which a right is assigned will normally impose obligations on the person assigning the right. The most basic obligation will be to assign the right in accordance with the contract or other juridical act.

Contracts or other juridical acts assigning rights frequently contain undertakings (warranties) by the assignor designed to ensure that the assignee acquires the benefit of the bargain. Often these are restricted to warranties as to the assignor's legal rights against the debtor and undertakings to perform any further acts necessary to perfect the assignee's title. Sometimes such undertakings go further and provide that if the debtor defaults the assignor will be liable for performance or will repurchase the assigned rights. In the absence of such a provision the normal rule is that the assignor incurs no liability for the debtor's non-performance. See paragraph (7).

In the absence of express provision in the contract or other juridical act of assignment the default rules relevant to the particular type of transaction may come into play. For example, if the right has been sold the default rules on the obligations of the seller and buyer will come into play. If the right has been donated the default rules applying to contracts of donation will come into play, and similarly if the right has been assigned in security. However, these background default rules may not cover every situation and it can be difficult to apply rules drafted primarily for corporeal movables to assignments of rights to performance. So, to fill any gaps and for the convenience of the user the present Article contains a set of implied undertakings which apply to any assignment unless otherwise provided. Such undertakings are found in many laws; in others they are often the subject of express provisions in the contract to assign. The undertakings by the assignor set out in the Article are designed to protect the assignee in the event that the assigned rights prove legally worthless or are subordinate to the interests of a prior party or are reduced in value by a modification of the contract under which they arise.

B. Existence and enforceability of right and entitlement to assign

Paragraph (2) of the Article imports undertakings that the right exists or will exist at the time when the assignment is to take effect, that the assignor is entitled to assign the right or will be so entitled at the time when the assignment is to take effect and that the right will not be subject to defences or rights of set-off against the assignor.

C assigns to X by way of sale a batch of debts due from D. Subsequently C purports to assign the same debts to A by way of security for a loan. C thereby commits a breach of the undertaking to A that C is entitled to assign the right.

C assigns to A a purported claim against D for the price of goods said to have been sold and delivered under a contract of sale. No such contract was ever made. C is liable to A for breach of the undertaking as to the existence of the claim.

Illustration 3
C assigns to A a purported claim against D for the price of goods sold and delivered under a contract of sale. When A sues D for non-payment of the price D successfully defends the claim on the ground that the goods were never delivered. C is liable to A for breach of the undertaking that D has no defence to the claim.

Illustration 4
C assigns to A all C's rights under a consumer credit agreement entered into by C as creditor with the debtor, D. C failed to comply with a statutory requirement that the agreement should state the annual percentage rate of charge for the credit. The statute provides that in such a case the agreement is unenforceable by C, though not by D. A can sue C for breach of the implied undertaking that D has no defences against an assertion of the right.

C. The existence of the right of set-off constitutes a breach of C's implied undertaking to A.

However, the undertaking is not broken by the existence of rights of set-off that do not affect the assignee, for example, set-off in respect of cross-claims by the debtor against the assignor arising from dealings between them after the debtor's receipt of notice of assignment (see III.–5:116 (Effect on defences and rights of set-off). Moreover, the undertaking does not cover the assignee's inability to obtain performance because the debtor absconds or becomes bankrupt.

C. Freedom from prior rights

Paragraph (2)(e) imports an undertaking that the claim has not previously been assigned or made subject to a security interest or any other encumbrance. The undertaking is not limited to freedom from consensual security interests; it also applies to security interests or other incumbrances created by law.

D. Protection of assignee’s reliance on terms

The interpretation and effect of a contract depends in large measure on the intention of the parties. This could be dangerous for an assignee. The parties might have agreed that a term which has one apparent meaning should have some quite different meaning. As between themselves the true meaning will prevail. The assignee can have no better right than the assignor. So the assignee could also be affected by the secret agreement between the original parties. Paragraph (3) therefore imports an undertaking by the assignor that any terms of a contract or other juridical act which have been disclosed to the assignee as terms regulating the right have not been modified and are not subject to any undisclosed agreement as to their meaning or effect which would be prejudicial to the assignee.

After the assignment has taken effect the assignor is no longer the creditor and would no longer be able to modify the terms regulating the right unless the act of assignment so provides. Modification of the content of the assigned right and the corresponding obligation would be a matter for the debtor and the assignee as the new parties to that legal relationship. Of course, other terms of the contract between the assignor and the debtor could still be modified by agreement between them, provided they did not alter the terms regulating the assigned right.

In some cases an assignment of a contractual right will leave the assignor with no room to modify the contract from which the right arises. The assignor may have performed fully under the contract and may have assigned a simple right to payment. In relation to that right the assignee is the new creditor. Any modification of the amount to be paid or the time of payment would be a matter for agreement between creditor and debtor, that is to say between the assignee and the debtor. In other cases, however, the contract between the assignor and the debtor may remain in effect for many purposes between these two parties. For example, the assignor may still be obliged to perform under it. Clearly a modification of the contract agreed between the assignor and the debtor could indirectly affect the assignee’s right. In principle, once contractual rights have been assigned it should not be open to the assignor and the debtor to agree on modifications to the contract under which they arise, unless the assignment agreement so provides or the assignee consents to the modification. This is the main rule under paragraph (4). However, a strict adherence to this principle would cause considerable commercial inconvenience, particularly where the assignment relates to rights under an executory contract involving continuous performance on the part of the assignor, such as a construction contract. For example, in the course of performance of a construction contract circumstances may arise where the parties find it necessary to agree on a variation outside the contractual variation provisions, as where additional work is required that could not have been reasonably anticipated. Again, the modification may be of a part of the contract which has no relevance to the assigned rights. Accordingly the last part of paragraph (4) permits modifications without the assignee's consent where these are made in good faith and are not modifications to which the assignee could reasonably object.

C, a building contractor, agrees with D, a bank, to construct a vault for the storage of securities and other valuables belonging to D's customers. Soon afterwards D sells its banking business to E, to whom D assigns its rights under the building contract. In the course of construction it is discovered that a stream, the existence of which is not shown on any drawings relating to the site, flows directly under the floor of the vault and that to prevent the entry of water it is necessary to install an underground pump at considerable additional expense to pump away the water. Though this does not fall within the variation clause of the contract the architect nevertheless considers the installation of the pump unavoidable if the vault is not to be rendered unusable and issues the requisite order to the contractor, indicating that the cost of the pump and labour will be an addition to the contract price. This modification is binding on E even though made without E's consent.

E. No subsequent act which could destroy assignee's priority

The implied undertaking in paragraph (5) – that the assignor will not conclude or grant any subsequent act of assignment of the same right which could lead to another person obtaining priority over the assignee – is necessary because of the later Article which, as between successive apparent assignees of the same right, gives priority to the one who notifies the debtor first. In the absence of such a provision the first assignee would be left without a remedy. The assignor would not be liable for non-performance of the obligation to assign because the debtor would actually have assigned the right and the assignee would have obtained it. The assignee would then however have lost the right because of the operation of the rule on priority. It is obviously right in such circumstances that there should be a remedy against the assignor who has placed the second "assignee" in a position to obtain priority by notification.

F. Transfer of certain security rights

The general rule is that supporting security rights pass with the assignment to the assignee, in so far as they are transferable. They do not require separate assignment. See III.–5:115 (Rights transferred to assignee) paragraph (1). However, there may be situations where something needs to be done by the assignor to effect or complete the transfer. The undertaking in paragraph (5) obliges the assignor to do what is necessary for that purpose. The obligation can be excluded by agreement and applies only to security rights which are transferable. For example, an independent personal security on first demand will normally not be transferable (see IV.G.–3:108 (Transfer of security right)).The assignor can, however, be required to transfer the proceeds (see UCP art. 49).

G. No undertaking that debtor has ability to pay

Paragraph (7) makes it clear that unless otherwise agreed between the assignor and the assignee, the assignor does not undertake that the debtor has, or will have, the ability to pay.

This is to counter any arguments that in the case of a sale or security agreement the assigned right would not be fit for its purpose if the debtor could not pay.

H. Other obligations

This Article is not exhaustive of the obligations to the assignee which may be imposed on an assignor. In particular, while it does not import any undertaking that the assignor has no knowledge of any matters casting doubt on the debtor's ability to pay, the general duty to act in accordance with the requirements of good faith and fair dealing may require disclosure of matters known to the assignor indicating that the debtor may be insolvent.

NOTES

1. Provisions similar to those of the Article are contained in the UN Convention art. 14 and in the Unidroit Principles art. 9.1.15. GERMAN law applies the rules of the CC governing warranties on a sale as amended by some particular rules, see CC §§ 401-403. Similar warranties are to be found in PORTUGUESE law (CC arts. 587, 892 ff, 957 ff; Varela II 330 ff Lima & Varela 602 ff), ITALIAN law (CC art. 1266), and DUTCH law in respect of a silent pledge (CC art. 3:239(2)) and a sale or swap of rights (CC arts. 7:47, 7:17). In FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law, such rules will apply where the underlying contract is a sales contract (see CCs arts. 1693 and 1694); if the underlying relationship is a different one, different rules may apply. Similar rules are applicable in CZECH law but there is no such express provision (see notes above and CC mainly the § 524 as commented by Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 663-666 and the authoritative general literature, for instance D. Hendrych under headword “postoupení pohledávky” and CC § 527). Section 41 of the FINNISH and SWEDISH Sale of Goods Acts can be interpreted in this way, while under section 9 of the NORDIC PNA the seller of a right warrants its existence and validity. The UN Convention and ESTONIAN law draw no distinction in this regard between assignments for value and gratuitous assignments; most other codes confine the warranties to assignments for value (the same is true for SLOVENIAN law), while under GERMAN law the rules on donation apply as amended by CC §§ 401-403. Under SPANISH law the assignor warrants the existence and legitimacy of the right at the time of the assignment (CC art. 1529) but as a rule gives no further warranties, though if to the knowledge of the assignor and unknown to the assignee the debtor was insolvent at the time of assignment the assignor is liable for the debtor’s default. There appear to be no reported cases in ENGLISH law concerning implied warranties in an assignment, nor is the question discussed in the contract textbooks. This may be because of the common practice of including express warranty provisions in assignment contracts. AUSTRIAN law (CC § 1397) provides that if the assignment is made for consideration the assignor undertakes that the right exists and that payment will be paid on the due date, though liability is limited to what the assignor received from the assignee for the assignment. Liability of the assignor is excluded with assignments that are based on a contract of donation (CC § 1397 first sentence) as well as for incumbrances which can be seen in the public books or for coincidental circumstances or circumstances that fall within the sphere of the assignee (CC § 1398). According to POLISH law the assignor warrants to the assignee that the right exists and is due to the assignor. The assignor is liable for the solvency of the debtor at the time of the assignment only if this liability is assumed (CC art. 516). In ESTONIAN law, in relation to the underlying obligation to assign, relevant questions are covered by sales law (LOA § 208(3): the provisions concerning the sale of things apply to the sale of rights and other objects unless otherwise provided by law and if this is not contrary to the nature of the object: the seller of a right must allow the purchaser to acquire the right which is the object of the contract of sale), or by the rules on donation (LOA §§ 259 ff) or factoring (LOA §§ 256 ff). In SCOTTISH law the assignor, where the assignment is for onerous cause, gives implied warrandice that the right assigned is due and the title to assign good, possibly also securing against its own actions that might hurt the assignee's right (Stair Memorial Encyclopaedia, vol. 15, para. 862). In SLOVAKIA, in case of assignment for value, the assignor would be liable to the assignee if the assignee did not take over as creditor of the right, or if the debtor performed lawfully to the assignor, or if the assigned right was wholly or partly extinguished due to rights of the debtor against the assignor (e.g. set-off) - see CC § 527(1). However, the assignor warrants the enforceability of the claim to the amount of obtained value, only due to a written contract with the assignee. This liability extinguishes if the assignee does not enforce the claim without undue delay (CC § 527(2)).

Sub-section 4: Effects of assignment

III.–5:113: New creditor

As soon as the assignment takes place the assignor ceases to be the creditor and the assignee becomes the creditor in relation to the right assigned.

COMMENTS

Once an outright assignment (as opposed to an assignment in security) takes effect the assignee becomes the creditor. The assignor will no longer be the creditor and will therefore not have the right to assign the right to anyone else. The right will not be the assignor's to assign. (If the assignment is by way of security, the assignor has the right to assign further, but that right is correspondingly limited in that there is no right to make a second assignment that will take priority over the first one. Assignments by way of security will be governed by Book IX.) However, a purported second assignment will not be completely ineffective, and in certain circumstances may even take priority over the first one. The rule is that where an assignor has made successive purported assignments, and the second "assignee" did not know of the earlier assignment at the time of the second purported assignment, priority goes to the assignee who first gives notice to the debtor. (See III.–5:121 (Competition between successive assignees). This is an exception to the nemo dat principle.)

The assignee becomes the creditor in relation to the right assigned – not in relation to some greater or lesser right. The right remains the same before and after the assignment. If, for example, it was a conditional right in the hands of the assignor it remains a conditional right in the hands of the assignee.

> In June a football club X concludes a contract with Y for the provision by Y of stewarding services at a football match which will take place in November (if the team qualifies). The contract provides for an advance payment to be made on 15 October. The contract also provides that all the rights and obligations under it are subject to the resolutive condition that they are to cease to have effect if the team fails to qualify. In August Y assigns its rights to payment under the contract to Z. In September the team fails to qualify. Z has no right to the advance payment due to be made in October. That right was subject to a resolutive condition and has now come to an end. The assignment cannot convert a conditional right into an unconditional right.

It goes without saying that the assignment of a right to performance does not make the assignee the debtor in any corresponding obligation or subject the assignee to any obligation which by law falls on the assignor.

> X sells and assigns to Y a right to a payment under a contract with B. The payment is to be made by B in advance of performance by X. It is to be returned if X does not perform. B is notified of the assignment and makes an advance payment to Y. X does not perform. X has assigned only the right to the payment. X's obligation to repay the amount of the payment has not been transferred. B has a right to repayment from X, not Y.

The above two examples show the importance of careful analysis in cases involving advance payments. In Illustration 1, for example, the position would be the same as in Illustration 2 if the team had failed to qualify after the advance payment had been made on 15 October. The obligation to pay and the corresponding right would have been extinguished by the payment. The right would no longer have been subject to a resolutive condition, although other rights and obligations under the contract would be. Any obligation to repay would have to be based on an implied term of the contract or on the rules regulating the effects of the termination or extinction of rights and obligations. The rules on unjustified enrichment would not apply because the extinction of the relevant rights and obligations would not be retrospective and the payment was not affected by any error or other vitiating factor. Whether the obligation to repay is based on an implied term of the contract or an independent rule of law, it would originally have been an obligation on Y, the assignor, to the debtor and would not have been transferred or extinguished by the assignment of the right.

The general result, that the assignee becomes the new creditor in relation to the right assigned but is not subject to any obligations to repay which fall on the assignor, is important for commercial purposes and particularly for receivables financing. The United Nations Convention on the Assignment of Receivables in International Trade contains a provision (Article 21) to make it clear that failure by the assignor to perform the original contract does not entitle the debtor to recover from the assignee a sum paid by the debtor to the assignor or the assignee.

It will be remembered that "right" is defined earlier as including a part of a right. (III.–5:101(Scope of section) paragraph (3)).

NOTES

1. This generally follows from the nature of an assignment, without being expressly stated in the laws. This is the case in GREECE, see Stathopoulos, nos. 203 and 207. In POLAND it is recognised in case law that as a result of the assignment, all rights of the creditor are passed on to the assignee and the legal relationship itself does not get changed (see: Supreme Court 5 September 2001, I CKN 379/00, Lex no. 52661). Similarly in the SLOVAK judicature: cf. e.g. Judgment of the Supreme Court of SR 1 Cdo 73/2000. There is no such express provision in CZECH law but this non-controversial general rule is easily construed on the basis of the CC § 524 (see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 663-666 and D. Hendrych). In SCOTLAND it is a basic rule that the assignment places the assignee in the shoes of the assignor (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], no. 33.07). An effective assignation is said to deprive the assignor of a title to sue in respect of what has been assigned, and to give it to the assignee (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 12.79). The analysis in ENGLISH law is different, but the result is much the same in that the debtor is obliged to pay the assignor until notified of the assignment, when the debtor becomes obliged to pay the assignee.
2. In SPAIN according to the legal nature of assignment as a true titulus transferendi (CC art. 1526), the effect of an assignment is not to create a limited right or a kind of condominium or participation in the assigned claim, but to transfer the whole ownership, without any right of redemption. That is why there is no need to put forward any special rule.

3. In FRANCE, once the assignment takes effect, the assignee becomes the new creditor. However, assignments subject to the form requirement of CC art. 1690 will only be "opposable" to the debtor once notice is given to the debtor, either by way of signification or by way of acceptation in an authenticated deed (acte authentique), which does not require the consent of the debtor. See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 1219, nos. 1279 et seq. In the case of successive assignments, the rule laid down by art. 1690 is strictly applied : the assignee who first gives notice to the debtor will be deemed the creditor, unless fraud is established (when the assignee was aware of the earlier assignment at the date of the purported second assignment). See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 1219, nos. 1286 et seq.

4. In BELGIUM, as soon as the requirements for assignment are met, the assignee will be the creditor in relation to anyone except the debtor (art. 1690 II), and subject to the application of the principle of confidence (CC arts. 1240 and 1690 IV).

III.–5:114: When assignment takes place

(1) An assignment takes place when the requirements of III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) are satisfied, or at such later time as the act of assignment may provide.

(2) However, an assignment of a right which was a future right at the time of the act of assignment is regarded as having taken place when all requirements other than those dependent on the existence of the right were satisfied.

(3) Where the requirements of III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) are satisfied in relation to successive acts of assignment at the same time, the earliest act of assignment takes effect unless it provides otherwise.

COMMENTS

This Article deals with the time an assignment takes place. Again it has to be read along with III.–5:121 (Competition between successive assignees).

A. Assignment of an existing, assignable right by the creditor

Where the right exists and is assignable at the time of an act of assignment by the creditor, the assignment normally takes effect immediately upon conclusion of the contract by which it is assigned or, in the case of an assignment by a unilateral juridical act, at the time when that act is made. (Under the rules in Book II a unilateral juridical act is not made until it is communicated to the person affected by it, in this case the assignee). Of course, this will not apply if the act of assignment itself provides for a later time. It is not necessary that an assigned right to money has become payable; it suffices that it exists as a present right, exigible in the future (debitum in praesenti, solvendum in futuro).

Illustration 1
On May 1st C enters into a contract with O to construct a factory at a price of €2 million, payment to be made in instalments against architects' certificates. On June 1st C assigns its rights to A. The first certificate is issued on August 12th. The assignment takes effect on June 1st.

B. Other cases

In other cases the assignment normally takes effect as soon as the requirements are satisfied, unless the act of assignment provides otherwise. If, for example, the right is not in existence or is not assignable at the time of the act of assignment, the assignment will take place when it comes into existence or becomes assignable, unless otherwise provided. Similarly, if the person granting an act of assignment of an existing right is not the creditor, the assignment will take place when that person acquires the right and becomes the creditor, unless otherwise provided.

Illustration 2
S, a timber supplier, enters into a factoring agreement with F by which S agrees to offer for sale to F monthly batches of rights to payment arising from sales of timber to S's customers. The agreement provides for the sale to take effect as regards any such receivables when the offer relating to them is accepted by F. A batch of receivables is offered to F on May 15th and accepted on May 20th. The assignment of those receivables takes effect on May 20th because that was what was agreed in the act of assignment.

C. Special rule for future rights

The main policy reason behind the rule in paragraph (2) is that in the case of an act of assignment of future rights, the assignee, who will very often have paid for the rights, should be preferred to the creditors of the assignor. Solutions to achieve this policy objective are widely adopted. It follows from the earlier rules that there will be no assignment at all if the future right never comes into existence. The effect of the present provision is that once it has come into existence the assignment can be retrospectively regarded as having taken place when all the other requirements were satisfied. Normally that will mean that the right will be deemed to have been transferred at the time of the act of assignment.

D. Requirements satisfied simultaneously

Paragraph (3) deals with a situation which could arise when a person purports to assign the same right to successive assignees. If the right is not yet in existence or is not yet assignable or if the granter is not yet the creditor, the requirements for an effective assignment could be satisfied simultaneously for all the assignees. Paragraph (2) provides that in such a case the assignments are treated as being made in the same order as the acts of assignment, unless one of the acts provides that it is only to have effect at some later date (which would be unlikely).

Illustration 3
On September 1st X, a property developer, assigns to Bank Y all its rights under contracts of sale to be entered into in the future with purchasers of the properties currently in course of construction. On October 1st X assigns the same rights to Bank Z. The development is completed the following year and X sells one of the properties to P on 10th August of that year. The assignment of X's right to the price is dependent on the sale but thereupon takes effect in relation to Bank Y, which had the earlier act of assignment.

NOTES

1. Paragraph (1) is in line with art. 10 of the UN Convention (although differently expressed) and also reflects those national laws which recognise the assignment of rights under future contracts. See Kötz, Rights of Third Parties, no. 104. Such rights are treated as nascent at the time of the contract to assign. In AUSTRIA and POLAND the assignment of a future right is conditional on the coming into existence of that right, see respectively OGH 6 October 1984, JBl 1984, 85 Koziol and SN 19 September 1997, III CZP 45/97, OSNC 1998/2/22). The principles expressed in paragraphs (2) and (3) of the Article are accepted also under ESTONIAN law (see Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Käerdi), § 165, nos. 3.3., 4.4) and GERMAN law (see Staudinger (-Busche), BGB [2005], § 398 nos. 63 et seq.). In SLOVAKIA, the effect of a valid contract of assignment would be subject to a suspensive condition that the assigned right would have to come into existence (cf. CC § 36 cl. 2 and also the Judgment of the Supreme Court of SR 1 Cdo 73/2000). In SCOTLAND, as noted above, intimation to the debtor is necessary to complete the assignee's right but if that right is a future right the assignment will become effectual only when it vests in the assignor, Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], no. 33.01. Future rights are said to vest by accretion. In the factoring of debts in Scottish practice there may be a further or corroborative assignment once the debt exists. See McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 12.31, 12.91. In ENGLISH law there may be an effective legal assignment of future rights under an existing contract, Chitty on Contracts, no. 19-008; assignment of rights under future contracts is possible in equity, though an agreement supported by consideration may be necessary: see Chitty on Contracts, nos. 19-028 ff.

2. On the subject-matter of the present rule there are two distinct problems in SPANISH law. Firstly, there is the question of the time when the assignee acquires a property right in the assigned claim when the claim did not exist at the time when the agreement to assign was reached. The question is highly disputed, specially where the assignor becomes bankrupt and the trustee seeks to retain the assigned right for the estate. Unfortunately, there is no prevalent opinion at present, and the case law is undecided. Secondly, who gets priority where there were multiple assignments? Most scholars suggest that the assignee who first gives notice to the debtor has the prior ranking. Although a highly pragmatic proposal, probably this approach is inconsistent with the rule governing property rights in claims (cfr, Pantaleón, Comentario, p. 1021).

3. In FRANCE, an act of assignment has the same effects as a contract transferring property, with the appropriate adaptations in relation to the fact that it also creates a legal relationship. Where the right exists and is assignable at the time of an act of assignment by the creditor, the assignment normally takes effect immediately upon conclusion of the contract by which the right is assigned in accordance with the solo consensus principle, except for assignments for purposes of securities (ordonnance of 24 June 2004: Ccom art. L. 228-1). Where the rights do not exist at the time of an act of assignment, the assignment takes effect provided that such rights are likely to come into existence and are sufficiently identifiable (Civ. 1ère, 20 March 2001). It has been held that rights under a future contract may not be assigned whereas merely potential rights are assignable provided that the contract was concluded (Com; 15 January 1973). See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[9], 1217, no. 1278. For BELGIUM, see the notes under III-5:106.

4. CZECH law conforms with paragraph (1) and paragraph (2), see Knappová (-Dvořák) Civil Law, II, 114; in case of para. (3), there is no express statutory provision and little experience on the subject, however, it can be assumed that even though each of the successive acts of assignment is effective between its parties, as a practical matter it is important which one is notified to the debtor first (as the notification is the moment when any act of assignment becomes effective for the debtor, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 941). Similar rules applicable to future rights can be found also outside the CC and Ccom, for instance in the legal regulation of future transactions (futures).

III.–5:115: Rights transferred to assignee

(1) The assignment of a right to performance transfers to the assignee not only the primary right but also all accessory rights and transferable supporting security rights.

(2) Where the assignment of a right to performance of a contractual obligation is associated with the substitution of the assignee as debtor in respect of any obligation owed by the assignor under the same contract, this Article takes effect subject to III.–5:302 (Transfer of contractual position).

COMMENTS

A. Transfer of primary right

The first effect of an assignment is to transfer the primary right to performance itself. This follows from the definition of an assignment as a transfer. The assignee becomes the new holder of the right, the new creditor, as soon as the assignment takes effect. However, there are later provisions which enable the debtor to obtain a discharge by paying the assignor in good faith at any time prior to the receipt of a notice of assignment. The assignee who does not give notice to the debtor is also liable to be replaced as the new creditor by a second purported assignee who gives notice to the debtor first: see III.–5:121 (Competition between successive assignees).

B. Transfer of remedies

An assignment of a right carries with it by implication a transfer of the assignor's right to damages and default interest for future non-performance. This follows from the fact that the assignee is now the holder of the right. Whether the assignment also transfers any rights accrued for past non-performance depends on the terms of the act of assignment.

C. Transfer of accessory rights and supporting security rights

An assignment also operates to transfer all accessory rights (or in the case of a partial assignment a pro rata share of those rights) such as contractual rights to interest or rights to call for earlier payment or otherwise modify terms. It transfers accessory rights securing the debtor's performance, for example, dependent personal securities and forms of proprietary security which are considered accessory to the right so as to be discharged when the right is satisfied. In many legal systems the transfer of accessory rights is considered so inherent in an assignment that it cannot be excluded by agreement, for the effect would be to leave the assignor with security for a right no longer vested in the assignor, with the result that neither assignor nor assignee would be able to enforce the security.

However, there are also rights which, though intended to secure performance, are not in terms accessory in character. These supporting security rights are also transferred unless, of course, they are by their nature non-transferable. The policy here is the same as in relation to subrogation in the case of a plurality of debtors or security providers (see III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) paragraph (2) and IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider’s rights after performance) paragraph (3). There is no reason why a former creditor (the assignor) should retain a security right the exercise of which would merely constitute an unjustifiable enrichment.

D. Assignment of rights and substitution of assignee as debtor

Where the assignment of rights is associated with an agreement by which the assignee also assumes responsibility, in place of the assignor, for payment of rights incurred by the assignor to the debtor, this Article takes effect subject to III.–5:302 (Transfer of contractual position). That Article is designed to ensure that the assignee cannot obtain the benefit of the rights assigned before effectively assuming the burdens taken over from the assignor, this requiring the assent of the other party to the contract.

NOTES

1. This Article reflects the law in most jurisdictions: Kötz, Rights of Third Parties, no. 91. Paragraph (1) produces the effect stated in most of the European codes or doctrines, namely that accessory rights pass without the need for a separate act of transfer. In AUSTRIA it is considered implicit in CC §§ 1393, 1394: see OGH SZ 60/46; ÖRZ 1992/26, OGH 23 February 1993, RdW 1993, 362 (different in the case of pledges, see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 387). In CZECH law the same is stated by CC § 524(1) (see also above). The position is similar in BELGIUM (CC art. 1692; van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, 574); the NORDIC countries; FRANCE (CC art. 1692 and Loi Dailly art. 4(3)); GERMANY (CC §§ 398, 401), GREECE (CC art. 458; see Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Kritikos), art. 458; Agallopoulou, 298; Athens Court of Appeals 459/1993, NoB 42 [1994] 206 at 207); ITALY (CC art. 1263(1)), LUXEMBOURG (CC art. 1692), the NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 6:142 and 3:82), ESTONIAN LOA § 167, PORTUGAL (CC art. 482), SLOVENIA (LOA § 421(1)) and SPAIN (CC art. 1528). The rule provided in paragraph (1) is also reflected in POLISH law (CC art. 509 § 2: "together with the claim, all rights connected therewith pass to the assignee, in particular rights to overdue interest"). There does not appear to be a rule to this effect in ENGLISH law. In SCOTTISH law an assignment carries all rights accessory to the assigned right: Anderson paras. 2.01-2.21. The SLOVAK CC similarly provides that the assignment of a right transfers also the ancillary rights (e.g. default interest) and all rights connected therewith (CC § 524(2)). The legal doctrine includes in this category also the accessory securities. It is explicitly stated in commercial relations regarding suretyship guarantees (§ 307 cl. 3 OBZ). However, there are exceptions in case law, stating that a separate contract (suretyship guarantee) cannot be transferred without the consent of the party to the contract, as it might alter the content of the obligation significantly (see Judgment of the Supreme Court of SR 2 Obo 155/04 - 156/04).

III.–5:116: Effect on defences and rights of set-off

(1) The debtor may invoke against the assignee all substantive and procedural defences to a claim based on the assigned right which the debtor could have invoked against the assignor.

(2) The debtor may not, however, invoke a defence against the assignee:

(a) if the debtor has caused the assignee to believe that there was no such defence; or
(b) if the defence is based on breach by the assignor of a prohibition or restriction on assignment.

(3) The debtor may invoke against the assignee all rights of set-off which would have been available against the assignor in respect of rights against the assignor:

(a) existing at the time when the debtor could no longer obtain a discharge by performing to the assignor; or
(b) closely connected with the assigned right.

COMMENTS

A. Defences

This Article assumes the existence of a valid assignment. If the purported assignment has not taken place (e.g. because the act of assignment is void or ineffective to effect a transfer) the debtor has no obligation to pay or otherwise perform in favour of the purported assignee.

A widely accepted principle, and that adopted in this Article, is that the assignee cannot stand in any better position than the assignor. Accordingly the assignee acquires the rights subject to all defences which the debtor could have asserted against the assignor, and this is so whether the grounds of defence arose before or after the notice of assignment. For this purpose, "defences" includes procedural defences.

Illustration 1
S sells and delivers goods to B and then assigns the seller’s rights to A. The goods do not conform to the contract of sale. If A claims the price B has the same defences against A as would have been available against S. So B may be able to terminate for fundamental non-performance and refuse to pay the price to A. Alternatively B can retain them and claim a reduction of the price.

Illustration 2
S contracts to sell goods to B, delivery to be made in one month's time. S then assigns the seller’s rights to A but fails to deliver the goods. B can refuse to pay the price to A.

Illustration 3
S agrees to sell goods to B, and then assigns the seller’s rights to A. The contract contains a provision that all disputes are to be referred to arbitration. There is a dispute as to the quality of the goods and B refuses to pay A the price. A sues B to recover the price. B is entitled to ask that the dispute be referred to arbitration in accordance with the contract.

B. Assignee incurs no positive contractual liability

The assignee incurs no positive contractual liability to the debtor for non-performance by the assignor. All the debtor can do is to rely on that non-performance as a defence to the assignee's right and to make a separate claim against the assignor.

C. Restrictions

Paragraph (2) contains two restrictions on the debtor's general right to invoke against the assignee any defence which could have been invoked against the assignor. The first - that the debtor cannot invoke a defence if the debtor has led the assignee to believe that there was no such defence - can be regarded as a special application of the principle of good faith and fair dealing in the exercise of rights, remedies and defences. The second – that the debtor cannot invoke any defence based on breach by the assignor of a no-assignment clause - is designed to prevent the rules on no-assignment clauses from being defeated indirectly. The debtor must be prevented from withholding performance from the assignee, or terminating for fundamental non-performance and pleading the fact of termination against the assignee, if the ground for withholding or termination is simply a breach by the assignor of a no-assignment clause.

D. Right of set-off

General. Somewhat different rules apply to set-off. It is generally accepted that the debtor should be allowed to exercise against the assignee the same right of set-off (if any) as the debtor could have invoked against the assignor in respect of cross-rights which exist at the time of receipt of the notice of assignment. In cases where no notice of assignment is given the relevant cut off time should be the time when the debtor can no longer obtain a discharge by performing to the assignor.

Illustration 4
C, who is owed €100,000 by O for the cost of building works, assigns the rights under the building contract to A, who gives notice of the assignment to O. Subsequently O lends C €40,000 under a loan agreement which is unconnected with the building contract. O cannot set off the right for repayment of the loan against the liability to A.

S sells machinery to B at a price of €1 million payable by five annual instalments of €200,000. By a separate contract S agrees to service the equipment for a period of five years. S assigns all S's rights under these contracts to A. In a claim by A for non-payment of an instalment B can set off a cross-right for damages for loss suffered as the result of S's breach of the servicing contract.

Unmatured obligations. It is not necessary to the right of set-off that the relevant cross-right should have matured at the time of the debtor's receipt of notice of assignment; it suffices that it is in being as a debitum in praesenti, solvendum in futuro. If the rule were otherwise, a debtor's potential right to set off against the creditor a cross-right due to mature at the same time as the creditor's right would be extinguished by the creditor's assignment of the creditor's right, contrary to the fundamental principle that an assignment should not prejudice the debtor. However, under the rules on set-off it is necessary that the cross-right should have matured by the time the debtor is called upon to give performance of the assigned right, for the debtor is not entitled to use set-off to accelerate the cross-right. Once the debtor has received a notice of assignment or is otherwise precluded from obtaining a discharge by performing to the assignor, it would be unfair to the assignee and contrary to principle to allow the assignee's interest to be reduced or extinguished as the result of the debtor setting off independent rights arising from new dealings between the debtor and the assignor. Where, however, those new rights are closely connected with the assigned right, it is reasonable that the assignee should take subject to them.

Illustration 6
In June S supplies goods to B at the price of €10,000, payment to be made on or before 31st December. In August B lends S €4,000 under a loan agreement which requires the loan to be repaid by 1st November. In October S assigns to A the debt of €10,000 due from B, and A gives notice of the assignment to B immediately afterwards and requires B to pay the €10,000 on or before 31st December. B can set off the loan of €4,000 which will by then have become repayable, and it is irrelevant that it had not become repayable when B received the notice of assignment from A.

Illustration 7
The facts are as in Illustration 6 except that the loan of €4,000 is not repayable until 1st February in the following year. On 15th January in that year, following B's failure to pay A the €10,000, A makes demand for payment of that sum. B cannot set off the loan of €4,000, since this has not yet become repayable.

NOTES

1. The principle that the assignee acquires rights subject to all defences which the debtor could have asserted against the assignor is common to all European legal systems and reflects the policy that the debtor should not be prejudiced by the assignment (Kötz, Rights of Third Parties, no. 97). However, legal systems differ as to whether the grounds of defence must exist, either actually or potentially, at the timeof the assignment coming into effect. This is a requirement in FRANCE (CC art. 1690); LUXEMBOURG (CC art. 1690); GERMANY (CC § 404); GREECE (CC art. 463(1)); BELGIUM (Cornelis, Handboek para. 335; van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, 575 – "existence" is broadly understood: e.g. the right to suspend performance until the other party performs is seen as arising with the obligation itself and thus necessarily existing at the time of notice even if there is not yet any actual non-performance by the assignor, Cass. 13 September 1973, RCJB 1974, 352 obs. M.L. STENGERS; Cass. 27 September 1984, RW 1984-85, 2699; Cass. 28 January 2005, no. C.04.0035N, VTB-VAB t. ABB, RW 2006-2007, 476); SLOVAKIA (CC § 529); and PORTUGAL (CC art. 585). and probably also in DENMARK see on PNA § 27, Ussing Alm. Del 219; and SCOTLAND (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 12.68). The rule can be construed in CZECH law from the CC §§ 526(1) and 528, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 668 and 670. In ENGLISH law, the debtor may rely on defences connected to the contract but may only set off other claims if they arose before the debtor was notified of the assignment: see Chitty on Contracts, no. 19-069. In most other systems, and under art. 20(1) of the UN Convention, it is immaterial whether the ground of defence arises before or after the receipt of notice of assignment. In AUSTRIA CC § 1396 stipulates that the assignment cannot worsen the position of the debtor and that the debtor has against the assignee all defences available against the assignor. Following the principle that a person cannot transfer more rights that that person actually has, defences can be relied on only as far as they exist at the time when the assignment takes place (OGH 4 April 1978, SZ 51/38; Lukas, Zession, 154; a different opinion that all remedies that exist up to the time of notice are available is supported by Rummel (-Ertl), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1396 no. 1).

2. The right of set-off is more complex. In some systems the right of set-off is excluded altogether if the assignment has been perfected by acceptance by the debtor, as opposed to notification, unless the debtor in signifying acceptance reserves the right of set-off. This is the position in FRANCE (CC art. 1295, but abolished in BELGIUM), LUXEMBOURG (CC art. 1295 and the DUTCH CC art. 6:130), ITALY (CC art. 1248(1); Cass. 15 October 1997, no. 4416; Cass. 1980, no. 1484) and SPAIN (CC art. 1198). In most systems the availability of set-off depends on whether the debtor's right against the assignor is closely connected to the assigned right or is an independent right. In the former case set-off is available even in respect of a right arising after receipt of notice of assignment; in the latter case it is restricted to rights that have matured prior to such receipt (though under art. 4(2) of the Loi Dailly in FRENCH law the relevant date is the date of the assignment) and to rights accrued but not matured at the time of receipt provided that these have matured at the time of the assignee's demand for payment (e.g. LUXEMBOURG CC art. 1295 and the DUTCH CC art. 6:130). Thus under BELGIAN law, set-off by the debtor with a right against the assignee is only possible if (a) the requirements for set-off were met before the notification or (b) the rights are closely connected (the latter rule with some exceptions in case of transfer of contract, See Cass. 26 June 2003, RW 2003-2004, 1419 critical obs. M. de Theije "Compensatie na cessie" = Rev.not.b. 2003, 620 =TBH 2004, 476 critical obs. I. Peeters). See Kötz, Rights of Third Parties, no. 98. GERMAN law upholds all set-off situations and even protects the debtor's reliance on future opportunities for set-off, see CC § 406. Under POLISH law, the debtor may set up against the assignee all defences which the debtor had against the assignor at the time of learning of the assignment (CC art. 513). As stated by the case law, the debtor can set up the defences related to the relationship between the assignor and the assignee, and in particular can question the causa of the assignment (see: Supreme Court 19 February 1998, III CKN 387/97, OSNC 1998/10/162). In addition, the debtor may set-off against the assigned claim any claim the debtor has against the assignor, even though that claim has become due after the debtor learned of the assignment; however, this does not apply where the claim against the assignor became due later than the assigned claim (CC art. 513). Pursuant to SLOVAK CC § 529 cl. 1 the debtor's defences that could have been invoked against the claim at the time of assignment, are retained by the debtor. The debtor may invoke against the assignee all rights of set-off the debtor had against the assignor at the time of the notification about the assignment by the assignor, or adequate averment by the assignee, if reported to the assignee without undue delay. This applies to unmatured claims as well (CC § 529(2)).There is no special regulation for rights of set-off closely connected to the claim. Also according to GREEK law (CC art. 463(2) on set-off) a cross-right which the debtor had against the assignor, at the time of the notification, may, even though not due, be asserted in set-off against the assignee, if it became due not later than the right that has been assigned. For AUSTRIA the principles mentioned above also apply in the case of set-off. In SLOVENIAN law the debtor has against the assignee all valid counter-claims available against the assignor, regardless of notification. See LOA § 421(2).

3. The Nordic PNA § 28 provides: "The debtor is entitled to invoke against the assignee a valid counter-claim on the assignor unless the debtor acquired the counter-claim after the time he had obtained knowledge or surmise of the assignment. If the counter-claim was due after that time and later than the debt fell due it cannot be invoked against the assignee." However it is generally held that a connected counter-claim against the assignor may be set off even if it was acquired after the claim was assigned and the assignment had been notified to the debtor, see Ussing. Alm Del 350.

4. Under ESTONIAN law grounds of defence must exist at the time of the assignment (LOA § 171(1), corresponds to GERMAN CC § 404), which is not dependent on receipt of the notice. Defences on the ground of effectiveness of the assignment (e.g. infringement of form requirements) are considered to be defences against the purported assignee (see Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 21 April 2005, civil matter no. 3-2-1-35-05). The debtor may not invoke a defence against the assignee based on a no-assignment clause in their contract (LOA § 171(2)). The debtor has also a right to set off a claim against the assignor against the claim of the assignee unless: 1) the debtor has acquired the claim from a third party and, at the time of acquiring the claim, the debtor knew or should have known of the assignment; or 2) the claim against the assignor falls due later than the assigned claim and after the debtor became or should have become aware of the assignment (LOA § 171(3), closely corresponds to GERMAN CC § 406).

III.–5:117: Effect on place of performance

(1) Where the assigned right relates to an obligation to pay money at a particular place, the assignee may require payment at any place within the same country or, if that country is a Member State of the European Union, at any place within the European Union, but the assignor is liable to the debtor for any increased costs which the debtor incurs by reason of any change in the place of performance.

(2) Where the assigned right relates to a non-monetary obligation to be performed at a particular place, the assignee may not require performance at any other place.

COMMENTS

A. Effect of assignment on place of performance of money obligation

Where the debtor has to pay the creditor at the latter's place of business or by transfer to the creditor's bank account an assignment of the right necessarily involves a change in the place of performance. Within a given country the place of payment is usually of little significance, since most payments of any significance are made by inter-bank transfer, and it is as easy for the debtor to arrange payment to the assignee's account as to the assignor's account. Rather different considerations may apply where the place of payment is changed to one in a different country. Apart from increased costs, which the debtor is entitled to recover from the assignor under paragraph (1) of this Article, the debtor may be affected by currency controls, increased transfer risks and the need to allow greater time for the transfer to be effected. Hence the general rule stated in paragraph (1) that the assignee may not require payment in a country different from that of the place where payment is due. However, this rule is modified where the original place of payment is in a Member State of the European Union, in which case the assignee may require payment to be made either in that State or in any other Member State. In effect, the European Union is treated as a single country for the purpose of paragraph (1) of this Article. This reflects the concept of the European Union as a single market and the advent of the European Monetary Union and the Euro as the obligatory common currency of Member States of the EMU. This rule goes beyond what is found in any of the national laws but is convenient in the context of a single market.

Illustration 1
S in Hamburg sells goods to B in Paris, payment to be made by inter-bank transfer to the credit of S's account with its bank in Hamburg. S assigns the debt to A in Milan. On giving notice of the assignment A can require B to make payment to the credit of A's account in Milan.

Illustration 2
The facts are as in Illustration 1 except that S is in New York and B is required to make payment to S in New York. A, the assignee in Milan, can require B to pay anywhere in the United States but not in any other country.

B. Place of performance of non-monetary obligations cannot be changed

Non-monetary obligations raise quite different considerations, since a change to a new place of performance even within the same country may fundamentally alter the nature of the obligation. For example, where there is a contractual obligation to ship goods f.o.b. Southampton, the place of shipment is an essential term of the contract and the obligation ought not, by reason of an assignment, to be converted into an obligation to ship f.o.b.

Liverpool. Accordingly paragraph (2) provides that the assignee of a right to the performance of a non-monetary obligation cannot change the place of the debtor's performance.

1. An assignment of a monetary right almost invariably entails a change in the place of performance of the debtor, namely to the assignee's place of business or into the assignee's bank account instead of the place of business or bank account of the assignor. It is indeed inherent in the assignability of monetary rights that the assignee can require payment to be made to it instead of to the assignor. Accordingly while most legal systems do not appear to have an express rule concerning payment to the assignee it is generally accepted that, at least so long as payment is to be made within the same country, the assignee can require such payment to its location, though the assignor may be liable for any increased costs incurred by the debtor. NORDIC law is one of the few laws to make express provision to this effect in § 3 of the NORDIC PNA. In GREECE doctrinal opinions are divided, some taking the view that the debtor remains entitled to pay at the assignor's domicile (e.g. Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Kritikos), art. 455, no. 60) while others argue for the domicile of the assignee (Georgiades, 421, note 57). GERMAN law imposes on the creditor who changes domicile the increased cost or risk of remittance (CC § 270(3)) and this rule is also found in DUTCH law (CC arts. 6:116-117); SLOVAK law regarding commercial legal relations (CC § 337 cl. 2); and ESTONIAN law LOA § 85(3). CZECH Ccom art. 337.2 and in art. 57 of the Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG) is considered to be applicable by analogy to assignments. Some writers on CISG argue against the analogy, but the better view is that to insist on the debtor's right to pay at the original place of payment is inconsistent with the assignability of the right. In AUSTRIA it should follow from CC § 1396 that the place of performance does not change. It seems that under the SLOVENIAN law the assignee would not have a right to demand from the debtor anything that would put the debtor in a worse position than before the assignment. This is clearly provided in the LOA § 421(1). The rule in para. (2) of the Article would also be the position in SCOTTISH and ENGLISH law in accordance with the general principle that the assignee cannot acquire any right which the assignor did not have. CZECH CC does not have any express provision on the issue and legal writers insist on the strict position that the assignee cannot unilaterally designate another place of performance than originally agreed (Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 936).
2. POLISH law provides a general statutory rule regarding the place of performance, which can also be applied to assignments. In general, a monetary performance is to be effected at the place of residence or business of the creditor at the time of the performance. If the creditor has changed the place of residence or business after the creation of the obligation, the creditor must bear the additional costs of transfer (CC art. 454). As to the non-monetary performance, if its place has not been indicated and does not follow from the nature of the obligation, the performance is to be effected at the place of the debtor's residence or place of business at the time of the creation of the obligation. In SCOTTISH law the general rule is that payment should be made at the place of business of the creditor, who will be the assignee if there has been an intimated assignation (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 24.19).
3. The SPANISH CC does not distinguish between monetary and non-monetary obligations regarding to the place of performance. The CC art. 1171 states that the place of performance of any obligation is the one indicated in the terms of the contract, or, in its default, the debtor's residence. A change of the place of performance requires an agreement between the parties, explicit or tacit. Furthermore, the debtor's situation must not get worse due to the assignment, therefore the debtor may oppose to the assignee any exceptions which could have been opposed to the assignor (Navarro Pérez, 352).

4. In FRANCE and BELGIUM, no similar rule expressly exists, probably because of the rules on place of performance providing that the normal place of performance is the debtor's place for monetary obligations and the place where the goods lie in other obligations to deliver.

III.–5:118: Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation

(1) This Article applies where the assignee's entitlement for the purposes of III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) paragraph (1)(d) arises from a contract or other juridical act (the underlying contract or other juridical act) whether or not it is followed by a separate act of assignment for the purposes of paragraph (1)(e) of that Article.

(2) Where the underlying contract or other juridical act is void from the beginning, no assignment takes place.

(3) Where, after an assignment has taken place, the underlying contract or other juridical act is avoided under Book II, Chapter 7, the right is treated as never having passed to the assignee (retroactive effect on assignment).

(4) Where, after an assignment has taken place, the underlying contract or other juridical act is withdrawn in the sense of Book II, Chapter 5, or the contractual relationship is terminated under any rule of Book III, or a donation is revoked in the sense of Book IV, Chapter 4, there is no retroactive effect on the assignment.

(5) This Article does not affect any right to recover based on other provisions of these model rules.

COMMENTS

A. Introduction

This Article had no equivalent in the Principles of European Contract Law. Those Principles deliberately left open the question here addressed, on the view that it fell to be resolved in the context of the transfer of movables generally. Now the question has been resolved for the purposes of Book VIII on the transfer of corporeal movables. It has been decided that where the underlying contract or other source of entitlement to a transfer is void or avoided then the transfer falls away also. There is no transfer. For the sake of consistency the same approach is adopted here.

The typical case of the application of the Article will be where there is a sale of a right to payment followed by notification to the debtor that the right has been assigned. Notification is not necessary for an effective assignment, but it produces the practical effect that the debtor is likely to pay the assignee. Then it becomes clear that the sale contract was void, or has been avoided. The effect of the present Article is that the assignment is regarded as never having taken place. It will normally be up to the assignor to notify the debtor of this situation, thus ensuring that the debtor would no longer be in good faith in paying the purported assignee and would no longer obtain a good discharge by so doing. See III.–5:119 (Performance to person who is not the creditor).

B. Contract or other juridical act

The Article does not apply where the entitlement derives from a court order or rule of law. In those cases, although it is possible that the order or rule might turn out to be invalid, this is very much less likely than in the case of a private law juridical act and the consequences can be left to the rules governing the source of obligation in question.

C. Invalidity of underlying contract or act

Paragraphs (2) and (3) contain the key rule. If the underlying contract or other juridical act is void or is avoided then there is no assignment in so far as entitlement derives from that contract or other juridical act. However, it is possible that there will be a separate entitlement by virtue of a later contract or other juridical act. Nothing in the Article prevents an assignment from taking place by virtue of such a later entitlement.

Illustration 1

X concludes a contract with Y whereby X will gratuitously assign a right to Y in a year's time. The contract is void because X is under the age of legal capacity for juridical acts. A year later X is no longer under the age of legal capacity. X knows the contract is void and that he is under no obligation to assign the right but decides to assign it anyway. X executes a formal document of assignment in favour of Y and mentions that he is aware of the invalidity of the earlier contract. The assignment is not based on the earlier contract. There is a separate juridical act of assignment which in itself confers entitlement on Y.

D. Termination, withdrawal or revocation

Paragraph (4) deals with the situation where the underlying contract or other juridical act is valid but where the relationship resulting from it is brought to an end, whether by withdrawal under Book II or by termination under Book III or by revocation of a donation under Book IV. In these situations there is no retrospective effect on any assignment which has already taken place. Restitution may sometimes be required but this will depend on the rules affecting the relevant situation and there would have to be a re-assignment of the right. It would not revert automatically.

Illustration 2

A contract between X and Y contains a provision (one among many in a complicated agreement) obliging X in exchange for payment to assign certain rights to Y. Payment is made and X assigns the rights. After some time it becomes clear that there has been a fundamental non-performance by Y of other obligations under the contract. X terminates the contractual relationship. The assignment is not automatically affected. Whether there will have to be a re-assignment of the rights and a repayment of the price paid for them will depend on whether this part of the performances due under the contract is divisible. See III.–3:510 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) and III.–3:511 (When restitution not required).

If restitution is required under other provisions (for example, those just cited) then the present Article does not affect the right to it. This is made clear by paragraph (4).

E. No need to regulate assignment subject to condition or time limit

It is not necessary to regulate specifically the situation where an assignment is made subject to a condition or time limit. If the condition or time limit is suspensive the situation is clearly covered by III.–5:114 (When assignment takes place) paragraph (1) which specifies that the assignment takes place when the requirements for an assignment are satisfied "or at such later time as the act of assignment may provide". If all the other requirements for an assignment are met then the assignment will simply take effect when the condition is fulfilled or the specified time arrives.

If the condition is resolutive (or if the assignment is subject to a resolutive time limit) then the transaction can be analysed simply as two assignments. The existing creditor assigns now and the assignee agrees to re-assign when the time arrives or the condition is fulfilled. It would be a question of interpretation whether the agreement to re-assign operated as an act of assignment itself or required a separate later act of assignment. If it fell to be interpreted as operating as an act of assignment, with delayed effect, there would be no need for a separate act of assignment when the time arrives or the condition is fulfilled. See III.–5: 104 (Basic requirements) paragraph (3).

1. The question of the effect of some defect of, or some event affecting, an underlying obligation on a transfer of property made on the basis of that obligation is one which has divided legal systems. Reference should be made to the Notes on III-5:102 (in particular, note 1) and III-5:104 and to the Notes on the equivalent Article in Book VIII (VIII.–2:202) where the matter is fully discussed.

Sub-section 5: Protection of debtor

III.–5:119: Performance to person who is not the creditor

(1) The debtor is discharged by performing to the assignor so long as the debtor has not received a notice of assignment from either the assignor or the assignee and does not know that the assignor is no longer entitled to receive performance.

(2) Notwithstanding that the person identified as the assignee in a notice of assignment received from the assignor is not the creditor, the debtor is discharged by performing in good faith to that person.

(3) Notwithstanding that the person identified as the assignee in a notice of assignment received from a person claiming to be the assignee is not the creditor, the debtor is discharged by performing to that person if the creditor has caused the debtor reasonably and in good faith to believe that the right has been assigned to that person.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article sets out the ways in which the debtor can obtain a discharge when the right has been assigned. It is in addition to the special rules in III.–5:108 (Assignability: effect of contractual prohibition) allowing the debtor, subject to certain exceptions, to obtain a good discharge by paying the assignor where the assignment has taken place in breach of a contractual prohibition or restriction. It is clearly necessary to have provisions for the protection of the debtor if notice to the debtor is not a requirement for an effective assignment. The debtor must be given the means of knowing to whom performance is to be made (a matter developed further in the next Article) and must be protected if performance has been made in good faith to the wrong person.

B. Performance to creditor

It goes without saying that the debtor will always be discharged by performing to the person who is for the time being the creditor. Performance to the creditor extinguishes the obligation.

C. Performance to assignor before receipt of notice of assignment

Paragraph (1) provides that the debtor is discharged by performing to the assignor so long as the debtor has not received a notice of assignment from either the assignor or the assignee and does not know that the assignor is no longer entitled to receive payment. The debtor would not necessarily lose this protection merely because the debtor knew from some other source that the right had been assigned. It is not uncommon for a right to be assigned but for the understanding between assignor and assignee to be that the assignment will not be notified and that the assignee will continue to receive payments.

There is no requirement that the notice of assignment must be in any particular form. However, the next Article enables the debtor to request adequate proof of the assignment in any case of doubt and to withhold performance until it is provided. The notice may be given either by the assignor or by the assignee, but in the latter case the next Article enables the debtor to request the assignee to provide reliable evidence of the making of the assignment.

The law on unjustified enrichment protects the assignee in any case where the debtor obtains a discharge under this provision by performing to the assignor. The debtor will have paid to a person who is no longer the creditor. The assignor is enriched without legal justification. The assignee suffers a corresponding disadvantage because the assignee can no longer recover from the debtor. So the assignee can recover from the assignor whatever has been paid or transferred by the debtor in performance of the obligation. This right is supplemented by the limited provision in III.–5:122 (Competition between assignee and assignor receiving proceeds) giving the assignee priority over the proceeds so long as they remain separately identifiable in the assets of the assignor.

D. Performance to person identified as assignee in notice of assignment

Where the debtor receives a notice of the assignment from the assignor the debtor should be entitled to rely on it and to obtain a discharge by performing in good faith to the person named as assignee in it. This is provided for by paragraph (2). The debtor would not be in good faith if there was reason to suppose that the notice of assignment was sent by a fraudster. The debtor would also not be in good faith if the debtor knew that the assignment was ineffective because the right was non-assignable by law. In cases of genuine doubt the debtor could request further particulars or evidence under the following Article and in the meantime withhold performance.

Paragraph (3) deals with the situation where a notice of assignment is received from a person claiming to be the assignee. Here there is an obvious risk of fraud. Anybody could send such a notice. Accordingly the requirements for the debtor to obtain a discharge by paying the person identified in the notice as the assignee are more strict. The debtor must have been given cause by the creditor to believe reasonably and in good faith that the person claiming to be the assignee is in fact the new creditor. To obtain protection the debtor should request reliable evidence of the assignment to the purported assignee under paragraph (3) of the following Article and in the meantime can withhold performance.

If the debtor does obtain a good discharge by virtue of the provisions of this Article the law on unjustified enrichment again comes into play. The debtor has obtained a discharge by performing to the wrong person. The person wrongly identified as the assignee has been enriched without legal justification. The assignor has suffered a corresponding disadvantage because no longer able to recover from the debtor. So the assignor can recover from the supposed assignee under the law on unjustified enrichment.

NOTES

I. General

1. All systems agree that a debtor who has no knowledge of the assignment obtains a good discharge by giving performance to the assignor, whilst a debtor who has been notified in accordance with the requisite formalities or (in most jurisdictions) has accepted the assignment must perform in favour of the assignee. In most legal systems all that the notice need state is that an identified right has been assigned.

2. Difficulties arise where notice is given to the debtor but is defective or where no notice is given but the debtor acquires knowledge of the assignment from other sources and in either case has not accepted the assignment.

II. Debtor's knowledge of assignment

3. In most systems the debtor's knowledge of the assignment, even without notification, precludes the debtor from performing in favour of the assignor, for this is seen as contrary to good faith. However, in SCOTTISH law mere knowledge does not preclude the debtor from performing in favour of the assignor (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 12.93; discussion in Anderson, paras. 6.21 et seq.), so that in effect until intimation is received the debtor has the choice whether to give performance to the assignor or the assignee. This is true also in NORDIC law (PNA § 29) and in the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:37). The position in BELGIAN law is controversial, some authors taking the position that mere knowledge of the assignment does not preclude the debtor from performing in favour of the assignor (Dirix, nos. 15–11; Cornelis, Handboek, no. 335), while others (e.g. Herbots, no. 309) consider that a debtor who performs in favour of the assignor after knowledge of the assignment is necessarily acting in bad faith. The text of CC art. 1690 provides that the debtor who is notified is only bound by the assignment when the debtor recognises it, which means that the debtor is not bound to perform to the assignee; the reason is that an assignee who has not notified leaves an auhority to collect with the assignor. In GREEK law before notification occurs, the debtor may and is obliged to make payment to the assignor and such payment releases the debtor (see CC art. 461); after notification the debtor is relieved only if payment is made to the assignee (see Stathopoulos, no. 205). The notification is not subject to a certain form but can be made by the assignor or the assignee to the debtor orally, in writing, judicially or extrajudicially, expressly or indirectly (see Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Kritikos), art. 460, no. 15; Stathopoulos, Law of Obligations, § 27. no. 28). Also in GREECE it is debatable whether mere knowledge of the assignment precludes the debtor from performing in favour of the assignor. According to the prevailing view, however, a debtor who is aware of the assignment though there was no notification, and who is asked by the assignor to pay the debt, has the right to refuse payment, if the invocation of the right deriving from CC art. 461 would have the character of an obvious abuse of right (CC art. 281; see Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Kritikos), art. 461, no. 6). It has even been proposed (Stathopoulos, Law of Obligations, § 27, no. 28) that the knowledge of the debtor about the assignment of the claim through another source should equal notification. In SLOVAKIA, the good faith principle does not come into play in this regard. Without notification by the assignor or averment by the assignee, the debtor is discharged by performing in favour of the assignor (CC § 526(1)). In CZECH law also (CC § 526.2) and POLISH law (CC art. 512) the rule is that until the assignor notifies the debtor, or until the assignee proves the fact of the assignment to the debtor, the debtor may still perform in favour of the assignor (see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 668 and Mojak, p. 1062)

4. The majority of European Union legal systems favour the rule by which the debtor is entitled to act on mere knowledge of the assignment to perform in favour of the assignee but cannot any longer give performance to the assignor. This is the position in ITALY (CC art. 1264(2)); AUSTRIA (CC § 1365); GERMANY (CC § 407(1)); NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:37); the NORDIC countries (PNA § 29); SLOVENIA (LOA § 419); ENGLAND (Tolhurst v. Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (1900) Ltd. [1902] 2 KB 660, 668); ESTONIAN LOA § 169(1); PORTUGAL (CC art. 583(1)) and, according to one theory, BELGIUM (see note 3 above) and LUXEMBOURG (CC art. 1691). In several countries this result is reached by the application of the principle that a debtor acting in good faith is to be protected: this is, for example, the case in SPANISH law, CC art. 1164.

5. In FRANCE, as long as the assignor has not notified the debtor of the assignment, performance in favour of the former creditor is effective as against the assignee, unless the debtor knew of the assignment at the time of the performance (see Bénabent, Les obligations, 11è éd., p. 521, no. 728). Until notification the assignment of a right is not effective against the debtor and the debtor cannot invoke it. Moreover, the assignee may not normally request performance from the debtor. However, it has been recently held that the assignee may request payment by the debtor provided that such payment does not affect third parties' rights (Com., 28 September 2004, Bull. Civ., IV, no. 173). On the other hand, once the debtor is notified, the debtor is bound to perform in favour of the assignee and may invoke the defences and rights of set-off that the debtor had against the assignor, in accordance with the principle that assignment of right must not alter the debtor's situation.

III. Competing demands

6. All the systems surveyed possess a rule of some kind for the protection of the debtor faced with competing demands. See the Notes to III.–5:121.

III.–5:120: Adequate proof of assignment

(1) A debtor who believes on reasonable grounds that the right has been assigned but who has not received a notice of assignment, may request the person who is believed to have assigned the right to provide a notice of assignment or a confirmation that the right has not been assigned or that the assignor is still entitled to receive payment.

(2) A debtor who has received a notice of assignment which is not in textual form on a durable medium or which does not give adequate information about the assigned right or the name and address of the assignee may request the person giving the notice to provide a new notice which satisfies these requirements.

(3) A debtor who has received a notice of assignment from the assignee but not from the assignor may request the assignee to provide reliable evidence of the assignment. Reliable evidence includes, but is not limited to, any statement in textual form on a durable medium emanating from the assignor indicating that the right has been assigned.

(4) A debtor who has made a request under this Article may withhold performance until the request is met.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article is designed to protect a debtor in various situations of uncertainty.

B. Assignment but no notice

The first situation in which the debtor needs protection is where the debtor has reason to believe that there has been an assignment but has not received any notice of assignment. In such a case the debtor cannot safely perform to the assignee and indeed may not even know who the assignee is. However, the debtor may fear that performance to the assignor might also be unsafe. Paragraph (1) enables the debtor to ask the assignor to clarify the situation by providing a notice of assignment or a confirmation that the right has not been assigned or that the assignor is still entitled to receive payment. Until the position is clarified the debtor can withhold performance. The debtor would, however, not be able to rely on this right if acting contrary to the requirements of good faith and fair dealing – for example, if the debtor did not believe that the right had been assigned and was just adopting a delaying tactic.

Illustration 1
C assigns to A a right to payment by D. Neither C nor A gives notice of the assignment but D learns of it from another source. If D is confident that the right has been assigned to A then D may pay A and will be discharged. If D is not confident then D can ask C to clarify the position and in the meantime may withhold payment.

C. Inadequate or unclear notice

The next situation where the debtor needs protection is where a notice of assignment has been received but it is not in textual form or does not give enough information to enable the debtor to be able to perform to the assignee. In such a case the debtor may, under paragraph (2), ask the person who gave the notice to provide a new notice in textual form which contains adequate information. Again the debtor may withhold performance until the request is met. Again the debtor would not be able to rely on this right if acting contrary to the requirements of good faith and fair dealing.

D. Notice received from assignee

The notice may be in textual form and adequate on its face. However, if it is given by the assignee the debtor may have reason to doubt whether it is genuine. Paragraph (3) enables the debtor to ask the assignee to provide reliable evidence of the making of the assignment. This would include any document emanating from the assignor and indicating that the assignment has taken place. The debtor is entitled to withhold performance until the evidence is furnished.

Illustration 2
C orally assigns to A a debt due from D. A gives notice of the assignment to D but fails to respond when D requests evidence of the assignment. D may either pay A, in which case D obtains a discharge from liability, or withhold performance until A has provided reliable evidence of the making of the assignment.

When debtor bound to perform in favour of assignee

1. Most systems seek to protect the debtor by a rule to the effect that a debtor cannot be compelled to give performance to the assignee unless the debtor has received notice in writing (sometimes reinforced by further formalities for the notice) or has accepted the assignment. So while the debtor may be able to obtain a good discharge by performing in favour of the assignee after receiving a defective notice or merely in reliance on knowledge of the assignment acquired from other sources, the debtor cannot be compelled to give such performance, see for GERMAN law CC §§ 410, 409. Exceptions, in which the debtor's knowledge is equated with notice for all purposes, are PORTUGUESE law (Lima & Varela 602 ff, Cristas, Transmissão Contratual do Direito de Crédito, 190 ff) and SPAIN (Díez-Picazo II, 815-816), under which a debtor acquiring knowledge of the assignment must give performance to the assignee even in the absence of notification. For GREECE see the note under the previous article. It is generally assumed that under ENGLISH law s. 136 of the Law of Property Act 1925 has the effect that an assignee cannot sue in its own name alone, but as a mere equitable assignee must join the assignor as claimant, unless the assignment was in writing signed by or on behalf of the assignor and written notice of assignment has been given to the debtor. Nevertheless a debtor who has acquired knowledge of the assignment cannot safely pay the assignor; and the question whether an equitable assignee is precluded from suing in its own name alone remains unsettled and may depend on whether the requirement to join the assignor is considered a rule of substantive law or merely a rule of practice: Furmston para. 6.273. According to POLISH law, as long as the assignor has not notified the debtor of the assignment, performance in favour of the former creditor is effective as against the assignee, unless the debtor knew of the assignment at the time of the performance (CC art. 512). The provisions of this Article generally correspond to the rule under the ESTONIAN LOA § 172. The AUSTRIAN CC § 1395 stipulates that notwithstanding an assignment the debtor can perform in favour of the old creditor if not given notice of the assignment. Notice can be given by both the assignor and the assignee, although this view was lately subject to criticism arguing that notice should only come from the former. Although not mentioned in the wording of the provision the debtor is under a "duty"

(not an obligation) to enquire about the lawfulness of the assignment if the debtor has reason to doubt this - e.g. if given notice twice and the notices are contradictory (see Schwimann (-Heidinger), ABGB VI[3], § 1395 no. 5). In BELGIUM, it is disputed whether notice of assignment can be given by the assignee without proof of consent of the assignor; however, the debtor who has reasonable doubts about the owner of the right can invoke the exceptio dubii to refuse payment to either party. In order not to have to pay interest, payment will have to be deposited (Comp. CA Antwerp 13 December 2001, TBH 2002, 466; CA Antwerp 13 December 2001, TBH 2002, 470).

2. The NORDIC PNA § 31(1) provides that the assignment is not valid against the creditors of the assignor unless the debtor has been notified of the assignment by the assignor or the assignee. DUTCH law not only provides as the main rule for assignment that it is not valid unless the debtor has been notified but also that the debtor may require a certified summary of the act of assignment (CC art. 3:94). DANISH law requires the assignment to be clear and visible but provides no form, see Gomard, Obligationsret III, 85 ff. In SCOTTISH law (for which see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 12.83-12.100) intimation of an assignment must be made to the debtor by either the assignee or the assignor to perfect the assignee's rights; intimation regulates preference amongst assignments, with an unintimated assignment being effective only between the parties to it. Intimation may take various forms but the debtor's knowledge of the assignment is generally not enough unless the debtor was a party to the assignment itself.

3. In SLOVAKIA, notification by the assignor need not be in writing. In such case the debtor is not entitled to demand proof of the assignment (CC § 526(2)). The assignee has to sufficiently aver the assignment to the debtor. The rule is the same in CZECH law (CC § 526(2)) which also provides that until the debtor is notified of the assignment, or until the assignee proves the assignment to the debtor, the debtor is discharged by rendering performance to the assignor (CC § 526.1).

4. In FRANCE, no similar rule expressly exists.

Sub-section 6: Priority rules

III.–5:121: Competition between successive assignees

(1) Where there are successive purported assignments by the same person of the same right to performance the purported assignee whose assignment is first notified to the debtor has priority over any earlier assignee if at the time of the later assignment the assignee under that assignment neither knew nor could reasonably be expected to have known of the earlier assignment.

(2) The debtor is discharged by paying the first to notify even if aware of competing demands.

COMMENTS

A. General effects

The assignor may have purported to assign the same right to two or more assignees, whether dishonestly or inadvertently. There may also be honest and open successive assignments in security where the first assignment is for a debt substantially below the value of the assigned rights, so that there is scope for one or more further assignments. Assignments by way of security are governed by the Book on Proprietary Securities.

The first general effect of this Article is to displace as between the successive purported assignees the normal rule, which would apply by virtue of the preceding Articles, that the first assignment to take effect would result in the right being transferred to the assignee under that assignment. The assignor would then have no right to assign so that subsequent purported assignees would take nothing. The effect of this Article is that in this special situation the normal rule is replaced by a rule giving priority according to the time of notification to the debtor. The effect of giving priority to a particular assignment (if it is an absolute assignment and not one in security) is that the competing interest is extinguished.

This rule applies only as between the successive purported assignees. In a question between an assignee and creditors of the assignor, the assignee takes the assigned right as soon as the assignment is effective: notification is irrelevant. It might be thought that this combination of rules could lead to an inescapable circle of priorities.

> C assigns a right to A1 who does not notify the debtor. C's creditor, X, then attaches the right in C's hands. C then assigns the right to A2 who immediately notifies the debtor. It looks as if A1 has priority over X, who has priority over A2, who has priority over A1 and so on in a circle.

However, the answer is that X gets nothing. X merely attempts to attach something which is not there. The attachment is completely ineffectual. X has no priority over anyone. X was too late. A2 takes the right and becomes the new creditor. A1 has a claim against C for breach of the undertaking not to grant a subsequent act of assignment which could lead to another person obtaining priority (III.–5:112 (Undertakings by assignor).

There could also be a competition between the second purported assignee who has notified the debtor and a person, such as an attaching creditor or an assignee, deriving right from the first assignee who has not notified the debtor. However, any such person deriving right from the first assignee would take the right as it is – in essence as a right inherently liable to be defeated until the assignment is notified. For this reason the Compilation and Redaction Team considered it unnecessary to add some such words as "and any person deriving right from such an earlier assignee" immediately after "earlier assignee" in paragraph (1).

The second general effect is that the debtor will be discharged by paying the first purported assignee to notify even if the debtor is aware of the competing demands and even if the first to notify was aware, or could reasonably be expected to have been aware, of the earlier assignment. The debtor cannot be expected to investigate questions of good faith on the part of successive purported assignees. The earlier purported assignee will not have a right to recover from the one who is the first to notify (assuming that the notification is made in good faith and in ignorance of the prior assignment) because, by virtue of this Article, the one who is the first to notify is in this situation regarded as the assignee. The debtor will have paid to the true creditor. The earlier purported assignee will have a remedy against the assignor for breach of the implied undertaking not to conclude or grant a subsequent act of assignment which could lead to another person obtaining priority. If, however, the first notifier knew or ought to have known of the earlier assignment then the earlier assignee will be able to recover from the first notifier on principles of unjustified enrichment. In that situation the debtor will have obtained a discharge by paying a person who was not the creditor.

B. The first-to-notify rule

Legal systems differ in their approach to competing assignments. In some systems the principle nemo dat quod non habet is applied. Having made the first assignment, the creditor has nothing left to assign. Accordingly the second assignment is ineffective, and while the debtor obtains a good discharge by giving performance to the second assignee without knowledge of the first assignment, the second assignee is required to account to the first assignee for any performance received. Other legal systems give priority to the second assignee who neither knew nor ought to have known of the prior assignment if the second assignee's assignment is the first to be notified to the debtor (whether by that assignee or by the assignor). This latter approach is that adopted here. It reflects two distinct ideas. The first is that giving notice of assignment in good faith is the closest equivalent to the acquiring of possession in good faith, which is a recognised method of obtaining priority in the case of corporeal movables. The second is that an intending assignee, before giving value, can ask the debtor whether the debtor has received any prior notice of assignment. If the first assignee has failed to give such a notice the second assignee should be entitled to assume that there is no earlier assignment, unless the second assignee has acquired knowledge of the earlier assignment in some other way or ought to have known of the earlier assignment, e.g. because it had been registered in a public register.

Illustration 2
S assigns to A1 a right to payment from D and then purports to assign the same right to A2, who is the first to give notice of assignment to D. If A2 neither knew nor ought to have known of the prior assignment at the time of taking A2's own assignment, A2 has priority. This is the case whether the assignments or either of them were outright transfers or were transfers by way of security only. However, if the assignment to A2 is outright, A1's rights are not merely subordinated but extinguished.

C. Neither party notifies

Where neither party has given notice of assignment, the ordinary rule qui prior est tempore potior est jure applies. However, the priority of the first assignee is provisional only, being liable to be displaced if the second assignee, being unaware of the earlier assignment, gives notice of assignment before such a notice has been given by the first assignee.

D. Assignments in security

This Article does not apply to assignments in security of rights to the payment of money. See IX.–2:301 (Encumbrances of right to payment of money). It is inconsistent with the registration system for such security.

NOTES

1. Paragraph (1) of this Article represents the majority rule in European legal systems, albeit with certain variations in detail. It is the rule found in ENGLAND (Dearle v. Hall (1828) 3 Russ. 1), BELGIUM (CC art. 1690 III), FRANCE (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1189), NORDIC countries (under the PNA § 31(2)), GREECE (Stathopoulos, Law of Obligations, § 27, no. 131, ITALY (CC art. 1265(1)), PORTUGAL (CC art. 584), SLOVENIA (LOA § 420). In FRANCE, once the debtor is notified, the assignor's creditors may still request an order of attachment on the assigned right. If a right has been successively assigned by an unscrupulous assignor, the successive assignee, if it first gives notice to the debtor, takes priority over the earlier assignee, unless a fraudulent collusion is established (Cass.com., 19 march 1980, Bull. Civ., IV, n°137: held that the mere knowledge of the earlier assignment by the successive assignee does not amount to fraudulent collusion ; see Bénabent, Les obligations, 11è éd., p. 522, n°729). The debtor is discharged by paying the first assignee to notify even if aware of the competing demands. By contrast AUSTRIAN law (OGH 13 July 1981, SZ 54/104; OGH 11 July 1985, JBl 1986, 235; OGH 27 April 1995, JBl 1996, 251); ESTONIAN law (LOA § 164(3)); POLISH and GERMAN law give priority to the first assignee, this being a corollary of the principle in those jurisdictions that a second assignment is devoid of legal effect (Staudinger (-Busche), BGB [2005], § 408 no. 2); but the debtor's reliance is protected under CC § 408, which may include the case of a first notice in favour of the second assignee unless the debtor knows of the first assignment. In the NETHERLANDS an assignment is ineffective without notification. It follows that the priority question arises only if both or all the competing assignees have given notice. In that event priority goes to the first assignee in accordance with the principle nemo dat quod non habet. The position is the same in SCOTLAND (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 12.83(2), 12.87-12.90; Wilson, Scottish Law of Debt[2], no. 27.5(a)). In SPANISH law there is no rule on this matter; scholars propose the application of the first in time rule, but granting the debtor the privilege of discharging by paying in good faith to the assignee in respect of whom the notification was made (Pantaleón, Comentarios, 1021-1022). In CZECH law the first notification seems easily to prevail by application of prior tempore potior jure and having regard to the above mentioned provision of the CC art. 526(1). This principle applies in SLOVAKIA, as well, although notification is not needed. Only the first assignment is valid, but according to the general provisions on fulfilment of obligations (CC § 562), the debtor in good faith would obtain discharge by paying to the first to submit the creditor's warrant of entitlement (e.g. the contract itself). Subsequent relations would be governed by the law of unjustified enrichment.

III.–5:122: Competition between assignee and assignor receiving proceeds

Where the debtor is discharged under III.–5:108 (Assignability: effect of contractual prohibition) paragraph (2)(a) or III.–5:119 (Performance to person who is not the creditor) paragraph (1), the assignee's right against the assignor to the proceeds has priority over the right of a competing claimant so long as the proceeds are held by the assignor and are reasonably identifiable from the other assets of the assignor.

COMMENTS

In the two situations mentioned in the Article the assignor receives proceeds which are rightfully due to the assignee but the debtor obtains a good discharge. The assignee has a right against the assignor to the proceeds based on unjustified enrichment but that is merely a right to performance of an obligation and would confer no priority over other creditors of the assignor. The present Article confers a very limited, and generally rather temporary, priority over the other creditors. It applies only so long as the proceeds paid to the assignor are held by the assignor and can be identified as separate from the assignor's other assets.

NOTES

1. The solution adopted here is similar to that employed in article 24 of the United Nations Convention on the Assignment of Receivables in International Trade. The assignee's claim to the proceeds has priority over competing claims, such as the claims of the assignor's creditors, so long as the proceeds are separately identifiable in the assignee's funds. Under BELGIAN law, in the case of payment of money, the assignee is an unsecured creditor of the assignor and has no priority, unless the payment was made on a separate account.
2. GERMAN law, in contrast, only provides for an obligatory remedy under the rules of unjustified enrichment, see CC § 816(2).

Section 2: Substitution and addition of debtors

III.–5:201: Scope

This Section applies only to the substitution or addition of a new debtor by agreement.

COMMENTS

The rules in this Section are not intended to apply to transfers of obligations by operation of law – for example, under special laws providing for rights and obligations to be transferred automatically when businesses are transferred or when one public body is succeeded by another.

The rules in this Section apply to obligations generally and not only to monetary obligations or contractual obligations.

The question of which parties must agree is regulated by the later articles in the Section.

III.–5:202: Types of substitution or addition

(1) A new debtor may be substituted or added:

(a) in such a way that the original debtor is discharged (complete substitution of new debtor);

(b) in such a way that the original debtor is retained as a debtor in case the new debtor does not perform properly (incomplete substitution of new debtor); or

(c) in such a way that the original debtor and the new debtor have solidary liability (addition of new debtor).

(2) If it is clear that there is a new debtor but not clear what type of substitution or addition was intended, the original debtor and the new debtor have solidary liability.

COMMENTS

A. Introduction

The rules on the substitution or addition of debtors in this Section are designed to enable parties to achieve results, while maintaining a legal relationship in existence, which they could also achieve by bringing it to an end and starting afresh. This will often save time and energy and avoid the risks of opening up for renegotiation issues already satisfactorily settled. Although the rules in this Section are not confined to contractual relationships, it is in relation to such relationships that they will find their main application: they reflect the policy of favouring contractual security and stability which underlies many of these model rules.

There will often be situations where it is necessary or desirable to change the debtor in a contractual relationship. In many such cases the reason will be a change of legal personality without any change of economic functioning. An individual trader, or a partnership, becomes a company. A company is restructured and parts of its business hived off to a subsidiary. A public body is replaced by another public body. An office-holder without a separate legal personality is succeeded by a new holder of the office. Some such situations will be regulated by special laws providing for the automatic transfer of the ownership of assets and of rights and obligations. Such special laws are not affected by this Section. In many situations involving a change in legal personality without a change in economic functioning what is required is not just the transfer of obligations but the transfer of an entire contractual position – rights and obligations. This is regulated by the following Section but the rules on substitution of debtors are there incorporated by reference. There may also, however, be cases where no transfer of rights is required but just the taking over of an obligation or the addition of a new debtor. The debtor may have already received everything due under a contract and may be left only with an obligation to perform. In simple cases, such as for example the delivery of an item which has already been paid for, all that may be required if the debtor cannot easily perform personally will be for the debtor to delegate performance to a third party. This can be done under III.–2:106 (Performance entrusted to another). The debtor will remain liable under the contract. There is no change of parties. The creditor will not usually be entitled to refuse performance by the delegated person (III.–2:107 (Performance by a third person)). However, there may be cases where, for all sorts of possible reasons, the debtor or the creditor or the third party wishes the obligation to be taken over by the third party with the effect of discharging the debtor, wholly or partly, or at least with the effect of making the third party an additional debtor under the contract. This could be done by a termination of the original contractual relationship by agreement between the debtor and creditor followed by the conclusion of a new contract between the creditor and the new debtor, or with both the original debtor and the new debtor. The rules in this Section enable it to be done more directly by keeping the existing relationship and simply replacing or adding a debtor.

B. The three techniques

Paragraph (1) of the present Article sets out three ways in which there can be a new debtor in a legal relationship, the relationship remaining otherwise unchanged. The first technique is complete substitution. The new debtor completely replaces the old, who is discharged. This is the converse of assignment. The second technique is incomplete substitution. The new debtor replaces the old, but the substitution is not complete so long as the new debtor has not performed the obligation. Until then the original debtor is retained as a subsidiary debtor in case the new debtor does not perform. The third technique is the addition of a new debtor. The original debtor is not discharged at all but the creditor gains another debtor, both debtors having solidary liability.

The key feature of the legal techniques regulated in this Section is that the legal relationship is preserved – with a change in parties on the debtor's side – rather than destroyed. Of course, if the parties to a contract prefer to tear up the contract and start again with a new one, they are free to do so.

In regulating these three types of situation the model rules go beyond the Principles of European Contract Law, which regulated only what is here called complete substitution. The extension was agreed in principle at the last meeting of the Study Group in Athens in June 2008. The decision reflected a view long held by some members of the Study Group that the PECL rules were incomplete. It also reflected the fact that many national systems regulate different types of substitution or addition of a new debtor and that the Unidroit Principles of International Commercial Contacts of 2004 do the same (see arts. 9.2.1 to 9.2.8). The Study Group gave the Compilation and Redaction Team authority to expand the PECL rules broadly on the policy lines of the Unidroit Principles. In carrying out this remit the Compilation and Redaction Team has had regard to the need to use DCFR concepts and terminology and to try to ensure coherence with the rest of the model rules.

C. Terminology

The terminology used – complete substitution of new debtor, incomplete substitution of new debtor, addition of a new debtor – is new. Traditional terms such as delegation or expromission or assumption of debt, or variants of them, have been deliberately avoided because of the danger that they might carry unwanted conceptual baggage with them and in accordance with the general policy of using neutral descriptive language whenever possible.

D. No formal requirements

In accordance with the general approach of these model rules no formal requirements are laid down for the substitution or addition of a new debtor.

E. Negotiating history irrelevant

Under this Article it does not matter how the change of parties was negotiated. Any one of the three parties – creditor, original debtor or new debtor – may take the initiative and may carry things forward by contacting either or both of the other two. Often it will be the original debtor who takes the initiative and negotiates with the new debtor with the objective of being relieved of the obligation. Sometimes the new debtor will make an offer to the creditor to take over the obligation, perhaps as a bargaining counter to obtain some benefit from the creditor in return. Or the creditor may initiate the process, perhaps because of worries about the debtor's ability to perform. The process does not matter. What matters is the outcome – what the parties decide to do. As the creditor's consent is always required before a new debtor can be substituted the creditor will always be able to veto complete or incomplete substitution.

F. Default rule

It may happen that the creditor simply accepts a new debtor but does not make it clear which technique is being employed. For this situation, paragraph (2) provides that the addition of a new debtor, with both debtors having solidary liability, is the default rule. The reason for this is that the technique least damaging to the creditor ought to be preferred in case of doubt. The discharge of a debtor ought not to be readily presumed.

NOTES

I. "Cumulative" and "discharging" assumption of debt

1. Many European civil codes deal expressly with two types of assumption of debt. In the first type the debtor continues to be bound, with the third person collaterally stepping in as an additional debtor (cumulative assumption of debt). In the second type the original debtor is released from the debt and fully replaced by the new debtor (discharging or privative assumption of debt). See e.g. the AUSTRIAN CC §§ 1405, 1406; the GERMAN CC §§ 414-418 and Staudinger (-Rieble), BGB [2005], § 414 nos. 22 et seq.; the GREEK CC arts. 471, 477; the ITALIAN CC arts. 1268-1273; the SLOVAK CC § 531 cl. 1 and 2; and the PORTUGUESE CC art. 595(2). The FRENCH CC clearly recognises the possibility of a cumulative assumption of debt in CC art. 1275. On cumulative assumption of debt in SPANISH law, see Díez-Picazo II 4th edn 852. In POLISH law, see: Czachórski, Zobowiązania, 8th ed., 370-371. Under the ESTONIAN LOA § 178, a cumulative assumption of debt (or "joining in obligation") creates a solidary obligation; if the purpose of the joining in obligation is to provide additional security for the debt (no personal economic interest in debt); generally the provisions of personal security (LOA §§ 142 ff) apply mutatis mutandis. For a general historical and comparative survey, see Adame Martínez, Asunción de Deuda en Derecho Civil (Comares, Granada, 1996).

2. In the NETHERLANDS, the CC art. 6:155 deals only with a "transfer of a debt from the debtor to a third person" with the effect, if the creditor declares approval, of substituting the new debtor for the original debtor. BELGIAN law like the proposed article distinguishes basically three types of situations, each with at least two variations:

   a) cases where the old debtor is fully discharged, the new debtor either taking up an independent debt (novation) or substituted for the old debtor in the same debt (liberating assumption of debt) (see CC arts. 1271 and 1276)

   b) delegatio solvendi (CC art. 1275), where the new debtor becomes the primary debtor and the old debtor remains bound as a subsidiary debtor; the delegation can be either dependent delegation, in which case the new debtor takes up the same debt, or independent delegation, in which case the new debtor takes up an independent debt (compare the latter case with the independent guarantees in Book IV G Chapter 3, differing however form the delegatio solvendi as the guarantor is normally the subsidiary debtor and not the primary debtor)

c) cases where an additional debtor takes up either exactly the same debt (solidary liability) or a concurrent debt.

3. The distinction between cumulative and discharging assumption of a debt is also recognised in non-codified systems. In SCOTLAND, for example, the original debtor will be released by delegation only if this is the creditor's clear intention. There is a presumption against release. (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], no. 3.38*)*

II. Formal requirements

4. The codifications dealing expressly with the substitution of a new debtor for the original debtor do not generally lay down any formal requirements. This is true, for example, of GERMAN law: if, however, the contract from which the transferred debt arises required a special form, the same requirements are applicable for the agreement for the replacement of debtor (Staudinger (-Rieble), BGB [2005], § 414 nos. 57 et seq.). Form requirements are constructed in a similar way under ESTONIAN law (LOA § 11(3)). Under POLISH law, the contract for the assumption of a debt is void unless concluded in writing. The same requirement applies to the consent of the creditor (CC art. 522). In CZECH law the contract for the assumption of a debt needs also to be made in writing but it is not required for the consent of the creditor (CC art. 531.2 and Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 672). In SLOVAK law, written form is required for the contract of assumption (CC § 531(3)), unlike the form of the creditor's consent in case of the "discharging" assumption of the debt (see Judgments of the Supreme Court of SR 5 Obo 167/2001; 4 Obo 138/95; 4 Obo 163/95).

III. Distinctions between different types of agreement

5. In all legal systems providing express rules on the substitution of a new debtor for the original debtor such substitution may be arranged in different ways: either by an agreement between the creditor and the third party to which the original debtor may or may not have to agree; or by an agreement between the original and the new debtor to which the creditor consents. Everywhere, the creditor's consent is mandatory for the release of the original debtor, but systems differ on the question whether the debtor's consent is necessary to create the effects of substitution.

6. The GERMAN CC provides two rules for the creation of an assumption of debt: § 414 concerns the agreement between the creditor and the third person stepping in as the new debtor to which neither the co-operation nor consent of the original debtor is required (see BAG 20 March 2002, NJOZ 2002, 365 and Staudinger (-Rieble), BGB [2005], § 414 no. 25; such a juridical act is seen as a contract in favor of the creditor as a third party, which opens for the creditor a right to reject, see Schlechtriem and Schmidt-Kessel, Schuldrecht Allgemeiner Teil[6], no. 820); and § 415 provides for the practically more important agreement between the debtor and the person who is to replace the debtor. This needs approval by the creditor to have the effect of replacing the debtor (see Staudinger (-Rieble), BGB [2005], § 414 nos. 41 et seq.). For equivalent provisions under ESTONIAN law, see LOA § 175(1) and (2) accordingly. In case the contract between the debtor and the third party faces refusal by the creditor, the debtor is deemed to have the right to require timely satisfaction of the creditor's claim from the transferee of the obligation (LOA § 175(4).

7. Under AUSTRIAN law, CC § 1405 provides for the case in which the debtor and the third person agree to have the debt transferred to the latter and states that the creditor's assent is necessary to replace the debtor, whereas CC § 1406(1) provides for the assumption of a debt by agreement between the third party and the creditor, which does not need the debtor's consent to be valid. CC § 1406(2), however, supposes that such an assumption rather counts as a cumulative one. The regulation in the SLOVENIAN law (LOA § 427) is the same.

8. In FRENCH law CC art. 1274 deals with the situation where the agreement is between the creditor and the third party. It provides that a novation by substitution of the new debtor can operate without the concurrence of the first debtor. Art. 1275 deals with delegation, by which the debtor finds another debtor who undertakes an obligation to the creditor. This does not release the original debtor by novation unless the creditor expressly declared that discharge was intended. A cession de dette may result from an agreement between the original debtor, the new debtor and the creditor (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1306). Basically the same rules apply under BELGIAN law.

9. Under the PORTUGUESE CC art. 595(1) a debt may be transferred either by a contract between the original and the new debtor, which the creditor ratifies, or by a contract between the new debtor and the creditor to which the original debtor may or may not consent. A similar solution is provided by the GREEK CC art. 471: a bilateral agreement between the creditor and a third person willing to assume the debt is deemed to be sufficient for replacing the original debtor who may not necessarily become part of this agreement.

10. Under DANISH law the agreement of the creditor, the debtor and the third person is generally required but the creditor may approve of a substitution in advance (see Gomard, Obligationsret III, 143 ff). In the ITALIAN CC, arts. 1268-1271 deal with cumulative delegation (delegazione cumulativa, where the debtor assigns to the creditor a new debtor who undertakes an obligation to the creditor) and art. 1272 deals with expromission (espromissione, where the third party, without delegation by the debtor, assumes the debt). In both cases the original debtor is not released unless the creditor expressly grants a release. Art. 1273 deals with assumption of debt (accollo) by an agreement between the debtor and the third person to which the creditor may adhere. Accollo is considered as a contract in favour of a third person (see Cass. 7/8/1941, n. 2776, Foro It., I, 916 but, for a contrary opinion, Cass. 28/9/1971, n. 2663, Giur. It., 1971, I, 1, 302). The adhesion of the creditor imports the release of the original debtor only if this constitutes an express condition of the agreement or if the creditor expressly grants a release. (See generally, Bianca, 665-666; Mancini, 512; Gazzoni, 618; see also Cass. 7/7/1976, n. 2525, in Foro It. 1977, I, 708; Cass. 21/2/1983, n. 6935, Giust.civ. 1983, 2376).

11. Under ENGLISH and IRISH law a substitution by novation requires the assent of all three parties.

12. According to POLISH law, if the assumption takes place by a contract between the creditor and the third party, and the debtor has refused consent, the contract is deemed not to have been concluded (CC art. 521(1)). On the other hand, in the case of an assumption of a debt by a contract between the debtor and the third party, the refusal by the creditor results in the person who under the contract was to assume the debt being bound to indemnify the debtor against the creditor's requiring the debtor to effect performance (CC art. 521(2)). The consent of the creditor is ineffective if the creditor did not know that the person assuming the debt was insolvent (CC art. 519(2)(ii)).

13. In SLOVAKIA, the assumption of debts is concluded through a contract between the debtor and a third party that will replace the debtor's contractual position, if the creditor consents. This can be done towards either party to the contract (CC §531(1)), and the creditor may agree in advance or subsequently (see Judgment of the Supreme Court of SR 5 Obo 167/2001). If, however, the contract is concluded between the creditor and a third party, the third party becomes a debtor together with the original debtor (CC § 531(2)).

III.–5:203: Consent of creditor

(1) The consent of the creditor is required for the substitution of a new debtor, whether complete or incomplete.

(2) The consent of the creditor to the substitution of a new debtor may be given in advance. In such a case the substitution takes effect only when the creditor is given notice by the new debtor of the agreement between the new and the original debtor.

(3) The consent of the creditor is not required for the addition of a new debtor but the creditor, by notice to the new debtor, can reject the right conferred against the new debtor if that is done without undue delay after being informed of the right and before it has been expressly or impliedly accepted. On such rejection the right is treated as never having been conferred.

COMMENTS

A. Consent of creditor required for complete or incomplete substitution

It is clearly essential that the creditor should have to consent to the complete substitution of an existing debtor by a new debtor. The existing debtor may be solvent and reliable: the proposed new debtor may be insolvent or unreliable. The same applies, although with less force, to incomplete substitution. Here the creditor retains the original debtor but only in a subsidiary capacity. There is no reason to force such a downgrading of the original debtor on an unwilling creditor who may not wish to have the trouble of proceeding first against an unsatisfactory new debtor.

Where consent is required it need not be given expressly, but it must be definite and unequivocal. It should not be lightly accepted that consent has been given. The policy should be the same as that underlying II.–4:204 (Acceptance) paragraph (2) – "Silence or inactivity does not in itself amount to acceptance". As long as the creditor's assent has not been declared, an agreement between the original and the new debtor cannot have the effect that the debtor is replaced by the third party.

> A has borrowed €100,000 from Bank B. Shortly thereafter C buys something from A for a price of €120,000 and agrees with A to take over, in part payment, A's debt to Bank B thereby replacing A as debtor. B declares its assent to this agreement. As a result, C is substituted for A as debtor to B.

If the creditor does not assent to an agreement between the original debtor and the third person whereby the third person is to take over the obligation, the agreement has legal effects only between the debtor and that person. This does not mean, however, that the third person automatically joins the debtor in the obligation to the creditor, so as to give the creditor a right to require performance from either. Whether the creditor acquires a right against the third person will depend primarily on the terms of the contract between the debtor and that person. It is perfectly possible for them to agree that the third person is to be added as a debtor, if the creditor will not agree to a substitution, but whether or not that is the effect of the agreement will depend on its terms.

B. Consent may be given in advance

Paragraph (2) makes it clear that assent may be given in advance by the creditor. In this case, the substitution will take effect only when the creditor is given notice of the agreement between the new and the original debtor. Since the creditor must know whether and when the substitution will take effect, the requirement of notice is not limited to cases where the new debtor has not yet been identified at the time of the advance assent.

> Illustration 2
> A is about to sell a building to C, but urgently needs a loan from Bank B. A asks Bank B to agree in advance to C taking over responsibility for repayment of the loan after the conclusion of the contract for the sale of the building. B agrees. C later agrees also and notifies B accordingly. As from the moment when the notice reaches B, C is substituted for A as the debtor.

The legal analysis of the advance consent situation is that the indication of advance consent by the creditor is the equivalent of an offer to the third party to accept the third party as the new debtor. The notification to the creditor is the equivalent of the communication of an acceptance of this offer. A contract therefore results. There is no need to regard the indication of advance consent as an actual offer or the third party's act as an actual acceptance because the process of conclusion of a contract need not be analysed into offer and acceptance (II.–4:211 (Contracts not concluded through offer and acceptance). Notice may be given by any appropriate means (I.–1:109 (Notice) paragraph (2)). There is no need for any particular form. For example, if the obligation involves payment by instalments and if the new debtor sends a letter with a first payment saying "Having now taken over this debt, I enclose payment for the current month" that would be a sufficient notification.

It is important that there should be a contract because it is this contract which insulates the creditor from any defects in the agreement between the original debtor and the new debtor (see III.–5:205 (Effects of complete substitution on defences, set-off and security rights) paragraph (3) and III.–5:207 (Effects of incomplete substitution) paragraph (1)).

C. Consent of creditor not required for addition of new debtor

The consent of the creditor is not, however, required for the addition of a new debtor. The creditor loses nothing by such an addition. The principle of solidary liability means that, although the creditor has the advantage of an additional debtor, the creditor can simply ignore the new debtor if so inclined and proceed against the original debtor as if nothing had happened. However, as anyone can refuse a benefit, the creditor has the right to reject the right conferred against the new debtor if this is done promptly. The approach taken here – that the agreement of the creditor is not required but that the creditor has a right to reject - is consistent with the approach taken elsewhere in the model rules (see II.–4:303 (Right or benefit may be rejected) and II.–9:303 (Rejection or revocation of benefit).

NOTES

1. In all European legal systems the consent of the creditor is necessary before the debtor can be replaced. Some provide expressly for the giving of consent in advance. Some provide that a new debtor can be added without the consent of the creditor. The details and the terminology vary. See the Notes to the preceding Article.

III.–5:204: Complete substitution

A third person may undertake with the agreement of the creditor and the original debtor to be completely substituted as debtor, with the effect that the original debtor is discharged.

COMMENTS

A. Scope

This Article deals only with the complete substitution of a new debtor for the original debtor, with the effect of discharging the original debtor. Later Articles deal with incomplete substitution and the addition of a new debtor.

B. The concept of complete substitution

It is a widely accepted principle that a person (the "third person" or "new debtor") may accept the debt of another person (the "debtor" or "original debtor"), thereby being substituted for the debtor.

An agreement between the third person and the debtor cannot by itself have the effect of discharging the debtor from the obligation to the creditor. To achieve that result the creditor has to consent to the substitution.

C. Relationship to other concepts

Assignment. Substitution is to some extent the antithesis of assignment. Assignment results in a new creditor. Substitution results in a new debtor. Assignment, however, does not require the agreement of the debtor, whereas substitution requires the agreement of all three parties.

Novation. "Novation" is used in different senses in different legal systems. Generally it means the replacement of a contract by a new contract, perhaps between the same parties but perhaps with a change of debtor. Substitution under the present Article, on the other hand, involves a change in the debtor, the contract (if the obligation is a contractual one) remaining in force and unchanged in other respects. It is this preservation of as much as possible of the contractual relationship which is the key distinction between substitution and novation. Novation remains possible as a technique under the model rules but is not specifically regulated. It is left to the principle of party autonomy. The parties to a contract can always agree to bring the relationship to an end. They, or one of them and another party, can freely conclude a new contract.

Stipulation in favour of a third party. In the case of a stipulation in favour of a third party the focus of attention is the contract between the two original parties and the right or benefit conferred on the third party. In the case of the substitution of a new debtor the focus of attention is not the contract between the creditor and the new debtor nor the benefit conferred on the original debtor but rather the original contract and the change in the parties to it by the replacement of the original debtor. The standpoint from which the legal arrangements are viewed is different. Moreover, all three parties must agree to a substitution (even if it is actually beneficial to one or more of them) but a third party beneficiary need not agree to the acquisition of a right under a contract between two other parties.

Performance by a third person. The rules in III.–2:106 (Performance entrusted to another) and III.–2:107 (Performance by a third person) do not involve a change of debtor. They involve performance by a third party, who does not become a party to the contractual relationship between the debtor and the creditor.

Methods of payment. The rule in III.–2:108 (Method of payment) to the effect that a creditor who accepts a cheque or other order to pay or a promise to pay is presumed to do so only on condition that it will be honoured and that the creditor may not enforce the original obligation to pay unless the order or payment is not honoured is closely akin to a substitution of a new debtor subject to a resolutive condition. However, the rules of this Section are not intended to apply to bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes and other negotiable instruments (I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(d)) and are subject to any special rules relating to such matters as payment by credit or debit cards.

D. Importance of creditor's agreement and new debtor's agreement

The preceding Article and indeed the opening words of paragraph (1) of this Article make it clear that the creditor's agreement to the substitution is essential. Often the substitution will be based on an initial agreement between the debtor and the third person, to which the creditor's assent is required if the debtor is to be discharged.

It is obvious, too, that the agreement of the new debtor must be required before an obligation can be imposed on the new debtor by a private arrangement.

E. Debtor's agreement also required

The question whether the debtor's agreement to a substitution should always be required is more controversial and more difficult. There is no uniform answer in the different European legal systems or international instruments.

Under the PECL art. 12:101 the agreement of the debtor was always required. This rule has been criticised. See e.g. Adame-Martínez in The Principles of European Contract Law Part III (Vaquer ed., 2005) at pp. 253-258. Under the Unidroit Principles of Uniform Commercial Law the consent of the original debtor is not required (art. 9.2.1(b)) although it is noted in Comment 6 to art. 9.2.5 that that debtor cannot be forced to accept the benefit of the substitution and can refuse to be discharged by the agreement between the creditor and the new debtor.

These model rules follow the PECL approach. The reason for doing so is that the replacement of a debtor by a new debtor cannot safely be regarded as the conferring of a simple unqualified benefit on the original debtor. There may be cases, such as those involving the provision of a service, where the debtor has a strong and legitimate interest in performing the obligation. The debtor's reputation could be affected if the debtor is summarily replaced by another service provider even if – perhaps particularly if - the debtor is paid in full. The debtor may wish to perform in order to keep a skilled workforce employed and to be able to attract future work. The debtor may have concluded ancillary contracts with others, such as suppliers and carriers, to enable the work to be done and may not wish to be forced to try to unravel these contracts. Moreover, even if in theory the debtor's rights are unaffected, in practice things might not be so clear. The rights may be conditional on certain events which the debtor may have a proper interest in continuing to control. In sum, the debtor often has an interest in the security and stability of the contractual relationship and should not be deprived of that interest without consent.

It is true that in the case of a simple obligation to pay, where all other obligations under the contract have already been performed, the debtor may have no interest in not being replaced. It would be possible to frame the rules so as to distinguish between the case where the debtor has an interest in effecting or controlling performance (or in not being replaced) and the case where the debtor has no such interest. However, that would lead to a more complicated set of rules for the achievement of no significant practical advantage. In the "pure benefit" cases the debtor would be very likely to agree to the substitution. Moreover, the debtor would still have to be given the option of promptly rejecting the benefit, in accordance with the general principal that a benefit cannot be forced on a party. The difference between being required to agree and having a right of prompt rejection is significant, and is rightly reflected in other rules, but is not significant enough in the present context to warrant increased complexity. Finally, if the debtor does not agree to the substitution in such a pure benefit case it would still be open to the creditor to accept payment from the third party, with the effect that the debtor would be discharged and the creditor would be liable to the debtor for any loss caused by the acceptance (III.–2:107 (Performance by a third person) paragraph (3). This would not amount to the substitution of a new debtor but it means that the creditor would not be prejudiced by the debtor's refusal if the third party is still willing to pay and the debtor would not be harmed by the payment.

In some situations a refusal by the debtor to agree to a substitution desired by the creditor would not do the debtor much good in the longer term. The creditor might have the right to terminate the contractual relationship unilaterally. (See e.g. for services IV.C.–2:111 (Client's right to terminate).) However, that would bring into operation the rules on termination, which are designed to achieve a fair result for both parties. If the termination was unjustified the debtor would be entitled to damages.

In short, requiring the debtor's consent to a substitution is safer and simpler, more in accordance with the principle of contractual security, and not harmful to the interests of any of the parties involved.

F. Matters left to implication

The Article does not provide expressly for the substitution of a new debtor in relation to only part of the obligations under the contract. This, however, is not excluded by the Article and if the obligations are divisible, substitution may take place in relation to any part of them identifiable as a separate obligation. As the creditor must agree to the substitution there is no need for any equivalent of the special protection afforded by III.–5:107 (Assignability in part) in the case of partial assignments.

NOTES

Wide recognition of concept

1. The underlying concept of substituting a new debtor for the original debtor is widely recognised in national legal systems but terminology varies.

2. In the civil codes of AUSTRIA (CC §§ 1405-1410); GERMANY (CC §§ 414-418); PORTUGAL (CC arts. 595-600); ESTONIA (LOA §§ 175-177); SLOVAKIA (CC §§ 531-532); the CZECH REPUBLIC (CC arts. 531-534); SLOVENIA (LOA arts. 427–431); and the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:155-158) there are express rules under headings denoting the assumption, or taking over, of debts. Under GREEK law too (CC art. 471) a third party may assume the debt and thereby release the debtor. Assumption of debt" is an expressly acknowledged concept (Ph. Christodoulou, in Kerameus/Kozyris,118.) In these systems assumption of debt is distinguished from novation.

3. Many European systems mention the substitution of a new debtor under the heading of novation, although in some countries doctrine may also recognise a separate concept of assumption of debt without novation. The FRENCH CC, for example, provides (art. 1271(2)) that one of the ways in which novation may operate is when a new debtor is substituted for the original debtor, who is discharged by the creditor. Doctrine has also, however, developed a concept of cession de dette. (See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1305. Note, however, that some authors show scepticism in accepting this concept. Cf. Malaurie & Aynès no. 310; Aubert, no.1.) For BELGIAN law, see the Note under III-5:202, The ITALIAN CC regards the situation where a new debtor is substituted for the original one who is released as a type of novation (subjective novation, art. 1235). The SPANISH CC, under the general heading of novation, provides in art. 1203(2) that an obligation may be modified by substituting another person for the debtor. The term asunción [without extinctive novation] de deuda is also, however, well-known in case law and literature (See TS 29 April 2005, RAJ (2005), 4550, TS 16 March 2006, RAJ (2006), 5724). In ENGLISH and IRISH law novation covers the replacement of one contract by another, with a third person being substituted for one of the existing parties (Treitel, The Law of Contract[11], no. 15-077; Chitty on Contracts, nos. 19-085-19-087). In FINLAND the substitution of a new debtor for the original debtor is usually shortly mentioned under the general heading of novation: see Bärlund, Nybergh, Petrell 216; Aurjärvi & Hemmo 179: n. In SCOTLAND the term delegation is used to describe the substitution of a new debtor for the original debtor, the original debtor being discharged. This is sometimes, however, regarded as a sub-head of novation. See McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 25.21-25.28. There are presumptions against novation and delegation (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 25.24). See further Anderson paras. 3.02-3.19.

4. In DANISH law, debitorskifte means "change of debtors". Functionally, this concept corresponds to substitution of a new debtor (see Gomard, Obligationsret III, 143-156). In SWEDEN the substitution of a new debtor for the original debtor is recognised and is distinguished from novation. That would require an animus novandi which is not at hand when the debt in essence remains the same (Rodhe, Obligationsrätt, 639 ff).

5. In POLISH law, substitution of a new debtor is provided under the heading of "Change of debtor" and is called "assumption of debt" (CC art. 519). It is distinguished from novatio (i.e. an agreement according to which the debtor undertakes with the consent of the creditor to effect another performance, or even the same performance but based on a different legal ground, CC art. 506(1)).

III.–5:205: Effects of complete substitution on defences, set-off and security rights

(1) The new debtor may invoke against the creditor all defences which the original debtor could have invoked against the creditor.

(2) The new debtor may not exercise against the creditor any right of set-off available to the original debtor against the creditor.

(3) The new debtor cannot invoke against the creditor any rights or defences arising from the relationship between the new debtor and the original debtor.

(4) The discharge of the original debtor also extends to any personal or proprietary security provided by the original debtor to the creditor for the performance of the obligation, unless the security is over an asset which is transferred to the new debtor as part of a transaction between the original and the new debtor.

(5) Upon discharge of the original debtor, a security granted by any person other than the new debtor for the performance of the obligation is released, unless that other person agrees that it should continue to be available to the creditor.

COMMENTS

A. General effect of complete substitution

The general effect of complete substitution follows from earlier Articles. The original debtor is replaced and discharged. The mere transfer of the obligation to a new debtor does not change the content of the obligation. In contrast to "novation", in its traditional meaning within the civil law tradition, the content of the obligation is not affected by the substitution of a new debtor for the original debtor but remains unchanged. This goes for such matters as the place and time for performance. What is transferred to the new debtor is the original obligation with the same content and accessory rights (for instance, the right to interest) as existed before.

However, any personal or proprietary security for the performance of the obligation granted by a person other than the new debtor is released upon the discharge of the original debtor. If, however, the person having granted the security agrees that it should not be affected by the change in the person of the debtor, the security will remain effective.

Substitution will not transfer to the new debtor any rights which the original debtor had under other ancillary contracts, such as contracts concluded with third parties to facilitate the debtor's performance. It is possible, although probably unlikely, that under such an ancillary contract the third party has incurred an obligation not only towards the original debtor but also towards any person later substituted for the original debtor in the principal contract. Whether that is so will depend on the terms of the contract with the third party as interpreted. If it is so, and the obligation turns out to be more burdensome in relation to the new debtor than it would have been in relation to the original debtor then the third party must nevertheless perform the obligation undertaken. That is a risk which the third party took.

Accessory rights which the creditor may have against the debtor remain available to the creditor and are not affected by the substitution. If the new debtor had granted a security to the creditor before agreeing to be substituted as debtor, that security will continue to be available to the creditor, who may also take advantage of any additional security provided by the new debtor on or after that time.

B. Defences stemming from the original relationship

The substitution of a new debtor for the original debtor means that the new debtor is put into the same legal position as the original debtor. The new debtor may therefore set up all the substantive and procedural defences against the creditor which the original debtor would have had under the original relationship with the creditor. This applies, for example, with regard to the defence of prescription.

The crucial moment for setting up a defence is the moment of conclusion of the agreement by which the new debtor is substituted for the original debtor. All the objections the original debtor might have been able to raise prior to this time, or based on events which had taken place by this time, may be raised by the new debtor. Defences that became available to the original debtor at a time when the substitution had already been effected cannot be raised by the new debtor.

The new debtor cannot, however, use a right held by the original debtor against the creditor in order to effect set-off. That is not strictly a defence and is something outside the original relationship. For the sake of clarity, this point (which was made in Comment D to art. 12:102 the Principles of European Contract Law but not in the article itself) is expressed in paragraph (2). It is also expressly made in the Unidroit Principles (art. 9.2.7).

The rule that the new debtor can invoke the defences available to the original debtor is implicitly limited to use pertaining to the obligation taken over. In particular, this rule will not apply whenever the new debtor has accepted an obligation that existed independently from the original obligation.

C. Defences stemming from the relationship between the original debtor and the new debtor

Paragraph (3) makes it clear that the creditor is not affected by any rights or defences which the third person may derive from that person's relationship with the debtor. Even a defect in an agreement for substitution between the original debtor and the new debtor that would make it void or voidable does not change the position of the new debtor in relation to the creditor. The creditor is entitled to proceed against the new debtor even if the creditor knew or could reasonably be expected to have known that the relationship between the original debtor and the new debtor is defective because it lacks consent of the parties, or is of such a kind as would allow the new debtor to raise a defence against the original debtor. The substitution is to this extent regarded as being independent of defects in the underlying relationship between the original debtor and the new debtor. The policy is to protect the creditor. If the creditor has a valid contract with the new debtor whereby the new debtor takes over the obligation of the original debtor, the creditor should not be concerned with defects in the legal relationship between the original debtor and the new debtor. It should be noted, however, that if there is no actual contract between the creditor and the new debtor but just a third party right under a contract between the original debtor and the new debtor a different rule applies and defences under that contract may be asserted against the creditor who is the third party beneficiary. See II.–9:302 (Rights, remedies and defences) paragraph (b).

Illustration 1

A sells to C an alleged original piece of medieval Chinese art for €20,000 and agrees with C that in exchange C should be substituted for A as debtor of Bank B. Upon notification by A, Bank B contacts C and agrees with C that C will take over the debt. B knows nothing of the underlying sale transaction. Soon thereafter it becomes evident that A – who has meanwhile gone bankrupt – had sold a fake to C. This does not affect the substitution.

If, however, the new debtor's agreement with the original debtor was vitiated by mistake or fraud or some other vice of consent and if that in turn caused the agreement between the new debtor and the creditor to be concluded in mistake then the new debtor may be able to avoid the latter agreement and thereby escape liability. This will be the case, in particular, if the creditor caused the mistake, or knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the mistake and left the new debtor in error contrary to good faith and fair dealing, or made the same mistake. See II.–7:201 (Mistake).

The facts are as in Illustration 1 but B knows that A has defrauded C and remains silent, contrary to good faith and fair dealing, in order to have a new debtor substituted for A who is known to be verging on insolvency. C can avoid the contract with B and escape liability for the debt.

The application of the rules on the involvement of third parties in vitiated consent (II.–7:208 (Third persons) may also enable the new debtor to escape liability by avoiding the contract with the creditor. This is discussed in the following Comment.

D. Defences stemming from the relationship between the creditor and the new debtor

It follows from general principles, and does not need to be stated in the Article, that the new debtor can use any defences arising from the contract with the creditor. If, for example, the creditor has by fraudulent means induced the new debtor to take over the obligation there can be no doubt that the new creditor could avoid the contract. It would be the same if there were such a mistake as to justify avoidance. It should be noted in this connection that if the original debtor was, with the creditor's assent, involved in the making of the contract, as might often be the case, and induced the new debtor's agreement by causing a mistake or by fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation, then remedies for the induced vitiation of consent are available against the creditor as if the behaviour in question had been that of the creditor (II.–7:208 (Third persons) paragraph (1)). Indeed this will also sometimes be the result if the creditor merely knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation by the original debtor, even if the original debtor did not have the creditor's assent to be involved in the making of the contract between the creditor and the new debtor (III.–7:208 paragraph (2)).

Similarly, the creditor could avoid the contract with the new debtor if the new debtor had fraudulently induced the creditor to conclude it and thereby lose the obligation of the original debtor.

E. Discharge of the original debtor and of third persons with regard to security rights

Under paragraph (4) the original debtor who has granted a security for the performance of the obligation is generally discharged with regard to that security, as soon as the substitution takes effect. Under paragraph (5), any third person who has granted a security for the performance of the obligation by the original debtor is also, as a rule, released. These rules are to be found in a clear majority of European legal systems.

There are however exceptions to these rules. With regard to a security provided by the original debtor the rule does not apply to any security over an asset which is transferred as part of a transaction between the original debtor and the third person stepping in as new debtor. This may have practical importance in the case of a reservation of title clause in respect of goods, for which part of the price had been owed to the creditor by the original debtor.

With regard to a personal or proprietary security granted by any other person for the performance of the obligation, this other person may agree to the continuation of the security in favour of the creditor, but will be released in the absence of any such agreement.

NOTES

1. In BELGIAN law, it is first of all a question of interpretation whether the substitution of a debtor is a mere substitution (in which case the same rule applies as in the Article) or a novation (in which case the new debtor owes a fully indpenden debt, only determined by the relationship between the creditor and the new debtor), but the first type is presumed (art. 1273 CC). In GERMAN law (CC §§ 417 and 418) the third person is allowed to raise defences against the creditor which arise from the legal relationship between the creditor and the third person. As a consequence of the separation of the obligating from the disposing part of a substitution, the third person cannot, however, raise any defences against the creditor resulting from the obligating relationship to the debtor, but solely defences arising from the disposing contract. The third person is not allowed to use a right of the debtor to effect set-off (see CC § 417(1) sent. 2 and cf. Staudinger (-Rieble), BGB [2005], § 417 no. 29)) The CC § 418 states that, in a case of assumption of debt, accessory security interests expire when the debtor changes (Staudinger (-Rieble), BGB [2005], § 418 no. 1). Only if the person providing security consents to the change of debtor does the security remain, CC § 418(1) sent. 3. The same rule is applicable to non-accessory security interests, because the policy of CC § 418 is to protect the person providing security from being liable to an unknown debtor (Staudinger (-Rieble), BGB [2005], § 418 no. 12); ESTONIAN law is similar (LOA §§ 176, 177).
2. In GREEK law CC arts. 473, 474 and 475 correspond to paragraphs (1), (3) and (4) of the Article.
3. According to the AUSTRIAN CC § 1407(2), existing rights with respect to the claim are, as a rule, not affected by the change in the person of the debtor. However, Austrian law is the same as paragraph (4) of the Article in that the second sentence of CC § 1407(2) makes the continuation of sureties and pledges by a third person dependent on that person's consent; and similar to paragraph (1) in that the new debtor may invoke, according to CC § 1407(1), all defences that the original debtor would have had against the creditor (see OGH 21 September 1982, SZ 55/132). The position is the same in SLOVENIAN law (see LOA arts. 428–431).
4. Under SPANISH law there is no problem with the possibility of raising defences based on the relationship between the creditor and the new debtor but there is some uncertainty about other defences and securities (Díez-Picazo II, 848 - 849). There is no case law available.

5. In ITALY, in the case of espromissione, the third person cannot set up against the creditor defences connected with the third person's relationship with the original debtor (CC art. 1272(2)) but may raise against the creditor all the defences which the original debtor could have raised against the creditor unless such defences are personal to the original debtor or are derived from acts subsequent to the expromission. According to CC art. 1272(3), the third person cannot exercise against the creditor a right to set-off which might have been exercised by the original debtor, even if the requirements for set-off were satisfied before the expromission. A similar position can be found in art. 598 of the PORTUGUESE CC. In ITALY, in the case of accollo, the third person is, in every case, bound to the creditor who adhered to the stipulation up to the limits within which the third person assumed the debt, and can set up against the creditor the defences founded on the contract on the basis of which the assumption took place: CC art. 1273(3). So far as security rights are concerned, the CC art. 1275 provides that in all cases where the creditor releases the original debtor all guarantees attached to the right are extinguished unless the person who furnished them agrees specifically to continue them.

6. As a consequence of the rule in DANISH law that a change of persons in a contractual relationship is not to affect adversely any of the persons involved, the new debtor may set up against the creditor all defences which the original debtor could have used against the creditor. A registered mortgage is generally unaffected by a transfer of ownership of the immovable property unless otherwise agreed between the original debtor and the mortgagee.

7. Under SWEDISH law, whether any security given by the original debtor or another person remains effective, depends upon their agreement.

8. Since under the laws of ENGLAND and IRELAND any debt created by the contract is extinguished on novation it follows that accessory rights given by the debtor, such as security for the debt, are also extinguished except where they are over an asset transferred to the new debtor, who will take the asset subject to the security. Novation may also have the unintended consequence of releasing a surety to the original contract unless the surety's consent is obtained or the terms of the guarantee preserve the surety's liability in the event of a novation. In SCOTLAND the release of the original debtor will also release a cautioner for the original debt or the original debtor, Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], no. 3.37. See also McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 25.27.

9. In POLAND, the new debtor may not set up against the creditor any defences arising from a legal relation existing between the new debtor and the former debtor; this, however, does not apply to defences of which the creditor knew (CC art. 524(2)). The new debtor is entitled against the creditor to any defences to which the former debtor was entitled, except for the defence of set-off against a claim of the former debtor (CC art. 524(1)). The rule provided in para. (4) of the present Article is expressed in the POLISH CC art. 525.

10. In SLOVAKIA, the content of the obligation does not change after the assumption of the debt, except for the securities, as in para. (4) of the present Article (see CC § 532). The defences can be invoked by the creditor in the same way as para. (1) provides, pursuant to CC § 531(4). Although without express statutory statement, the rights between the former and the new debtor, may not be invoked against the creditor, if not agreed otherwise. CZECH law is identical (see CC §§ 531 and 532).

11. In FRANCE, in the case of pure delegation or delegation by novation, the new debtor cannot raise the rights of defence arising out of the legal relationship between the original debtor and the creditor, unless the latter knew of the defects vitiating the original debt, which would amount to fraud. The new debtor may, however, set up against the creditor the defence of nullity. In contrast with pure delegation, simple delegation means the addition, not the substitution, of the new debtor. The creditor may pursue two debtors and the new debtor may not raise any defences arising out of the relationship between the original debtor and the creditor, it being the causa of the new debtor's obligation. (See Bénabent, Les obligations, 11è ed., p. 540, n° 755).

III.–5:206: Incomplete substitution

A third person may agree with the creditor and with the original debtor to be incompletely substituted as debtor, with the effect that the original debtor is retained as a debtor in case the original debtor does not perform properly.

COMMENTS

Incomplete substitution is not so potentially dangerous for the creditor as complete substitution because the original debtor is retained as a fall back. Nonetheless the creditor is affected The liability of the original debtor is reduced to a subsidiary liability. The creditor may have the trouble and expense of proceeding first against the new debtor. If the new debtor seems likely to be unsatisfactory and the original debtor is entirely satisfactory the creditor may prefer to refuse to agree to even an incomplete substitution. The original debtor and the new debtor may then, if they wish, proceed to add the new debtor as an additional debtor with solidary liability.

The position of the original debtor may also be seriously affected by an incomplete substitution. The original debtor may wish to perform the obligation personally and not be reduced to, in effect, the role of a provider of security for someone else's performance. For this reason the solution here is the same as in relation to complete substitution.

NOTES

The inclusion of this type of incomplete substitution in the model rules was inspired by the Unidroit Principles of International Commercial Contracts, art. 9.2.5.

III.–5:207: Effects of incomplete substitution

(1) The effects of an incomplete substitution on defences and set-off are the same as the effects of a complete substitution.

(2) To the extent that the original debtor is not discharged, any personal or proprietary security provided for the performance of that debtor's obligations is unaffected by the substitution.

(3) So far as not inconsistent with paragraphs (1) and (2) the liability of the original debtor is governed by the rules on the liability of a provider of dependent personal security with subsidiary liability.

COMMENTS

In so far as the new debtor takes over the obligation, the position in relation to the defences and rights which the new debtor can invoke against the creditor is the same as for a complete substitution. This is provided for by paragraph (1).

The position in relation to personal or proprietary security rights is, however, different. The original debtor is not discharged but retains a subsidiary liability which may come into full effect in the event of non-performance by the new debtor. There is no reason therefore to deprive the creditor of the benefit of any security provided for the performance of the original debtor's obligation. It will generally be much less likely than before the substitution that the security will be called upon but that is only to the advantage of the security provider. It will be noted that the security does not become a security for performance by the new debtor: it remains unaffected by the substitution and therefore is merely security for the performance of the original debtor's obligation.

Paragraph (3) deals with the subsidiary nature of the original debtor's liability. In effect the original debtor has become a provider of a dependent personal security with subsidiary liability. The rules of Book IV, Chapter 3, Section 2 are therefore applied. The effect is that the creditor, in order to preserve full rights against the original debtor, is required to proceed first against the new debtor (IV.G.–2:106 (Subsidiary liability of security provider). The creditor must also observe certain notification requirements (IV.G.–2:107 (Requirement of notification by creditor)). The creditor's rights against the original debtor may also be reduced if the creditor's conduct has adversely affected the original debtor's rights of relief against the new debtor (IV.G.–2:110 (Reduction of creditor's rights)). If the original debtor performs the obligation the original debtor will have rights to reimbursement against the new debtor and is subrogated to the creditor's rights against the new debtor (IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance).

Paragraph (3) is only a default rule. It could be modified by agreement between the parties affected by the relevant rights and obligations. In particular, as the original debtor is not someone who is assuming a new liability, but someone whose full liability is being reduced to a subsidiary liability, the new debtor and the original debtor might well wish to agree that the original debtor would have no recourse if the original debtor performs. Similarly, the creditor might be prepared to agree to a downgrading of the liability of the original debtor only if the creditor retained stronger rights against the original debtor than provided by the default rules. But it is useful to have a system of default rules in place

For the position relating to defences and set-off, see the Notes to III.-5:205 (Effects of complete substitution on defences, set-off and security rights). For the position relating to the liability of the provider of a dependent personal security, see the Notes to Book IV.G, Chapter 2. In BELGIAN law, a delegatio solvendi is equally presumed not to create an independent debt: the delegated debtor is presumed to have engaged itself merely to the existing debt ("dependant delegation"). However, many cases of delegatio solvendi create by their nature or given the circumstances an independent debt, e.g. when a negotiable instrument is issued (e.g. a bill of exchange) or in the case of credit cards, etc. ("independent delegation"). Transfer of money is also analysed as a form of delegatio solvendi, by which the bank of the beneficiary takes up an independent debt.

III.–5:208: Addition of new debtor

A third person may agree with the debtor to be added as a debtor, with the effect that the original debtor and the new debtor have solidary liability.

COMMENTS

Unlike complete or incomplete substitution, the addition of a new debtor does not discharge the original debtor. Both debtors have solidary liability. As the creditor is not prejudiced, the creditor's consent is not required. However, in accordance with the principle that a person cannot be compelled to accept a benefit, or apparent benefit, the creditor may reject the right against the additional debtor if this is done promptly after learning of it. See III.–5:203 (Consent of creditor).

The consent of the original debtor is, however, required. The reason is that the addition changes the original debtor's position. The debtor is locked into a set of rules on solidary liability which the debtor may not wish to be locked into. The debtor loses an element of control over the performance of the obligation and becomes a party to a legal relationship with a person not of the debtor's choice. The arguments are similar to the arguments for requiring the consent of the debtor to the substitution of a new debtor. The addition of a new debtor with solidary liability is not necessarily a pure benefit for the original debtor and, particularly in the case of non-monetary obligations, may have disadvantages. If a new debtor is to be brought into the relationship the original debtor ought to have a say on that and on the terms regulating the relationship between the two debtors. The underlying principle is that of party autonomy. A person should be able to choose with whom to enter into a legal relationship and on what terms. In some cases, such as assignment of rights, this principle gives way to the principle of the free marketability of assets, but with important qualifications for the protection of the debtor. There is no such countervailing principle in the present context.

What happens if the creditor and the third person want the third person to become an additional debtor but the original debtor refuses consent? There are several options. If the purpose is the provision of a personal security there is nothing to prevent the third person from providing such a security, without the consent of the debtor, by a contract with the creditor or by a unilateral undertaking in accordance with the rules in Part IV.G. (see IV.G.–1:103 (Creditor's acceptance). If the third person simply wants to pay the debtor's debt this can be done under III.–2:107 (Performance by a third person). There is also nothing to stop the creditor and the new debtor from concluding a contract whereby the new debtor undertakes to pay a sum equal to the amount of the original debtor's debt and the creditor undertakes, on receipt of payment, to release the original debtor. None of these techniques involves a change in the parties to the original contractual relationship.

The default rule for solidary liability is that the debtors are, as between themselves, liable in equal shares (III.–4:106 (Apportionment between solidary debtors)) but this can be changed by agreement between the debtors. It does not affect the creditor.

NOTES

1. The technique of cumulative assumption of debt is well known in European legal systems. The details, however, vary. See the Notes to III.–5:202 (Types of substitution or addition).

III.–5:209: Effects of addition of new debtor

(1) Where there is a contract between the new debtor and the creditor, or a separate unilateral juridical act by the new debtor in favour of the creditor, whereby the new debtor is added as a debtor, the new debtor cannot invoke against the creditor any rights or defences arising from the relationship between the new debtor and the original debtor. Where there is no such contract or unilateral juridical act the new debtor can invoke against the creditor any ground of invalidity affecting the agreement with the original debtor.

(2) So far as not inconsistent with paragraph (1), the rules of Book III, Chapter 4, Section 1 (Plurality of debtors) apply.

COMMENTS

The general effect of the addition of a new debtor, without any discharge of the original debtor and without any agreement that the original debtor is to have only subsidiary liability, is that the new debtor and the original debtor have solidary liability. This is provided for by paragraph (2). The rules on solidary liability already regulate the effect on defences arising out of the debtor-creditor relationship and set-off. So there is no need for rules on these topics. It is also unnecessary to have a rule to the effect that any personal or proprietary security provided for the performance of the original debtor's obligations is unaffected by the addition of the new debtor because that follows anyway from the fact that the original debtor is not replaced or discharged and remains fully liable.

Although the consent of the creditor is not required for the addition of a new debtor there may be cases where the new debtor concludes a separate contract with the creditor assuming liability as an additional debtor. There may also be a simple unilateral undertaking to that effect. The first sentence of paragraph (1) deals with the position where there is such a separate contract or undertaking. It is to the same effect as paragraph (3) of III.–5:205 (Effects of complete substitution on defences, set-off and security rights). The basic idea is that the creditor's right under that contract or undertaking is regarded as insulated from the background agreement between the original debtor and the new debtor. Reference may be made to Comment C on that Article. As noted in that Comment there may, however, be cases where a vice of consent affecting the contract between the new debtor and the original debtor will indirectly enable the new debtor to avoid the contract with the creditor on the ground of mistake, particularly if the creditor has been involved in the causing of the mistake or in allowing the contract to be concluded in mistake. This follows from an application of II.–7:201 (Mistake) and II.–7:208 (Third persons). These provisions will also apply if there is simply a unilateral juridical act by which the new debtor assumes liability (II.–7:101 (Scope) paragraph (3)).

The second sentence of paragraph (1) is included because the preceding Article envisages that there may be cases where the mere agreement between the original debtor and the new debtor is sufficient to bring in the new debtor with solidary liability. In such cases there is no separate contract or juridical act in favour of the creditor. There is nothing to insulate the creditor from questions relating to the validity of the contract between the new debtor and the original debtor. It seems reasonable therefore to allow the new debtor to rely against the creditor on any ground of invalidity affecting the contract with the original debtor, such as fraud, mistake, threats or coercion. This will not place the creditor in any worse position than the creditor was in before the addition of the new debtor as the original debtor remains undischarged and will become again solely liable. The rule in the second sentence of paragraph (1) is consistent with the approach taken in the provisions on stipulations in favour of a third party (II.–9:302 (Rights, remedies and defences) paragraph (b) – "the contracting party may assert against the third party all defences which the contracting party could assert against the other party to the contract".

The default rule on solidary liability is that, as between themselves, the co-debtors are liable in equal shares (III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors)). This can be varied by agreement between the co-debtors. It does not affect the creditor, who always remains free to claim full performance form either debtor.

NOTES

1. For the position relating to defences and set-off, see the Notes to III.-5:205 (Effects of complete substitution on defences, set-off and secuirty rights). For the position relating to the liability of solidary debtors, see the Notes to Book III, Chapter 4, Section 1 (Plurality of debtors).

Section 3: Transfer of contractual position

III.–5:301: Scope

This Section applies only to transfers by agreement.

COMMENTS

The rules in this Section apply only to transfers by agreement and not to transfers by operation of law under special rules on such matters as the transfer of undertakings or changes in public bodies.

III.–5:302: Transfer of contractual position

(1) A party to a contractual relationship may agree with a third person, with the consent of the other party to the contractual relationship, that that person is to be substituted as a party to the relationship.

(2) The consent of the other party may be given in advance. In such a case the transfer takes effect only when that party is given notice of it.

(3) To the extent that the substitution of the third person involves a transfer of rights, the provisions of Section 1 of this Chapter on the assignment of rights apply; to the extent that obligations are transferred, the provisions of Section 2 of this Chapter on the substitution of a new debtor apply.

COMMENTS

A. General remarks

Whereas an assignment is limited to the transfer of rights to performance and a substitution of a new debtor for the original debtor concerns only a change in the person owing a debt, the present article deals with the transfer of the entirety of contractual rights and obligations from a contracting party to a third person. Given that contracts of long duration, and take-overs or amalgamations of businesses, are common, the rules on transfer of an entire contract are of great practical importance. The preceding article makes it clear that these rules will be displaced by any special rules on transfer by operation of law.

Agreements for the transfer of an entire contractual position are often concluded with regard to tenancy agreements, loan arrangements, labour contracts and other types of contract of long duration. Some situations are regulated by special rules. Book IV.B. on the lease of goods contains a special rule to the effect that a change in the ownership of the goods results in the new owner becoming a party to the lease; the former owner remains subsidiarily liable for non-performance of the obligations under the contract as a personal security provider (IV.B.–7:101 (Change in ownership and substitution of lessor).

The transfer of an entire contractual position must not be confused with novation. Novation implies the extinction of the old contractual relationship and the constitution of a new one with a different object or a different source, whereas in a transfer of the entire contractual position the relationship remains the same. The contractual bond is the same, but it is transferred from the first party to the incoming third party.

B. Substitution of a party in respect of the entire contractual relationship

Either party to a contract can, with the necessary consent of the other, substitute a third person in the entire relationship arising from a contract, so that the third person assumes both the benefit and the burden of the contract in place of the first party. The third person takes over both the first party's rights to performance and the first party's contractual obligations to perform.

Illustration

A concludes a contract for the construction of a prefabricated house with Company B for a certain price and pays a first instalment. B becomes bankrupt soon thereafter.

Provided A agrees, Company C may step into the contractual relationship in place of B with all the contractual rights and obligations which were previously B's.

C. The importance of the other party's assent

For the introduction of a new party to the relationship the consent of the existing other party is necessary. This consent may be given in advance, a situation which is common and important in practice.

If the other party does not consent, the transfer has no effect. Neither obligations nor rights will be transferred. Of course it would then often be possible for the first party (a) to assign rights to the third party (which would not require the other party's consent) and (b) to entrust the performance of duties to the other party. But the latter would only be effective in accordance with III.–2:106 (Performance entrusted to another) and the original party would remain responsible for proper performance of the obligations.

D. Applicability of rules on assignment of rights and substitution of new debtor

A transfer of the contract is more than a mere combination of assignment of rights and transfer of obligations. It is a uniform transaction, transferring a whole structure of rights, obligations, legal positions, and duties, which can appropriately be regarded as more than a mere combination of single acts transferring rights and obligations. In practice, however, the most important result of such a transaction is the transfer of all contractual rights including collateral ones, as well as the acceptance of all contractual obligations by the incoming party. It follows from the application of the rules on the substitution of a new debtor that the transfer may take the form of a complete substitution (with the original debtor being discharged) or an incomplete substitution (with the original debtor remaining subsidiarily liable). It has already been noted that the latter solution is the one which has been chosen in the case of a lease of goods where the ownership changes. (IV.B.–7:101 (Change in ownership and substitution of lessor)).

The situation where the parties wish the outgoing party to remain solidarily liable for the obligations under a contract is not dealt with in this Article. There would not be a true transfer in such a case. The parties would however be free to adopt such a solution if they so wished.

NOTES

I. Provisions in recent codifications

1. The transfer of an entire contractual position is expressly acknowledged in some recent codes. See e.g. the ITALIAN CC arts. 1406–1410; the PORTUGUESE CC arts. 424–427; the ESTONIAN LOA § 179; the SLOVENIAN LOA arts. 122–124;and the DUTCH CC art. 6.159 (discussed in Asser-Hartkamp I, nos. 610-612.
2. Under the ITALIAN CC art. 1406 "each party can substitute for himself a third person in the relationships arising from a contract for mutual counter-performances, if these have not yet taken place, provided that the other party consents thereto". It is a multilateral contract, and the consent of the three parties involved is essential. (See Cass. 14 May 1962, n. 999, in Giust.civ. 1962, I 1906; Cass. 18 October 1971, no. 2929 in Riv. Notar. 1972, 278). Art. 1408(1) and (2) of the ITALIAN CC states that, as the transfer becomes effective, the transferor is released from the obligations to the original contracting party, unless the latter refuses to release the transferor. Art. 1409 empowers the original contracting party to raise against the transferee all defences arising out of the contract, (for instance a defence based upon non-performance) but not those based on other relationships with the transferor, unless the contracting party expressly reserved a right thereto on consenting to the transfer. According to a certain doctrinal opinion the transferee acquires every right arising from the contract, save the right to avoidance and rescission (Fusaro 249; for a contrary opinion see Galgano 121).

3. In PORTUGUESE law the transmissão da posição contratual is expressly acknowledged by CC arts. 424–427. This concept is essentially the same as what is provided for in the present Article, although the express provision of a rule similar to paragraph (2) is not considered necessary in Portuguese law. It is the predominant opinion that the transfer of a whole contractual position cannot be seen as a mere accumulation of transfers of rights and duties (see Varela II 415 ff.; Pinto 387 ff.). Under the CC art. 427 the remaining party may raise against the transferee all the defences which might have been raised against the transferor. However, the defence of set-off that is available in the context of assignment may not be raised in the case of a transfer of a whole contractual position (see Varela II 406).

4. Under the ESTONIAN LOA § 179 a party to a contract may, with the consent of the other party, transfer the party's rights and obligations arising from the contract to a third party on the basis of a contract entered into with the third party (assumption of the debt). This transaction is seen as a transfer of an entire contractual position, substitution of the party to a contract, with a core element being assumption of debt (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Käerdi), § 179, no. 1, 4.1.1). Upon assumption of a contract, all rights and obligations arising from the contract are deemed to have transferred to the new party to the contract (LOA § 179(2)), except for the obligations that have fallen due before the assumption of the contract, while these are personal obligations of the former party, no longer related to the contract (Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 17 January 2005, civil matters no. 3-2-1-163-04). The provisions of assignment of rights and assumption of obligation apply mutatis mutandis to the assumption of contracts.

II. Concept acknowledged by practitioners and doctrine

5. In those countries lacking a statutory provision on the matter, the possibility of transferring a party's contractual position as a whole is nonetheless generally recognised.

6. Thus, in AUSTRIA the transfer of an entire contractual position is conceived, by courts and writers, as a uniform transaction requiring the agreement of all the three parties involved; see e.g. OGH 10 January 1984, JBl 1986, 131 (note Krejci); OGH 10 May 1988, JBl 1988, 720; OGH 17 January 1990, JBl 1990, 717; Bydlinski; Koziol 137; Krejci; Schima 319.

7. The GERMAN CC does not expressly provide for a transfer of the entire contractual position of a party apart from special cases of transfers of undertakings or of a flat, see CC §§ 566 et seq., 613a. Nevertheless, the concept is acknowledged as a general concept by the Federal Court; cf. BGH 27 November 1985, BGHZ 96, 302, see Staudinger (-Rieble), BGB [2005], § 414 nos. 93 et seq. The uniform concept of transfer of the whole contractual position is needed to terminate the relationship to the original contracting party in its entirety. This solution cannot be achieved by a mere assumption of debt, since certain rights the original debtor may unilaterally exercise remain intact, such as the right to avoid or terminate.

8. In FRENCH and BELGIAN law, in the absence of an express provision in the CC, the traditional doctrinal position was to see a transfer of a party's contractual position as a mere combination of an assignment and a cession of debt. In FRENCH law, it has become the dominant opinion that it is the transfer of the entirety of rights and duties stemming from the original contract. (See Aynès, Cession; Malaurie & Aynès no. 510; Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1310; cf. Cass.civ. I, 12 December 1982, Bull. civ. I, no. 360). Unless otherwise provided for by a specific text, the Cour de Cassation makes the former party's agreement a requirement and accepts that the agreement may be given in advance in the first contract. (Cass.com., 6.5.1997, Bull. civ. IV, N° 117, note Mazeaud, Rép. Defrénois 1997, 977; note Mazeaud, D. 1997, 588; note Billiau and Jamin, Rev.trim.dr.civ. 1997, 936, Note Mestre. See also Cass.com., 6.5.1997, Bull. civ. IV, no. 118 and Aynès, Cession de contrat : nouvelles precisions sur le role du cédé, D. 1998, chron. 25 ff). BELGIAN law sticks to the more traditional approach and distinguishes the imperfect transfer of contract, under which the transferor remains liable for the debts towards the other party, and which can take place even without the consent of the other party, and the perfect transfer of contract, which requires the consent of the other party or an express statutory provision. Such provisions are found e.g. for transfer of some types of leases by the lessee, of insurance contracts by an insurance company, etc.

9. There is a similar situation under SPANISH law. Although it was once a matter of discussion whether, given that the CC contains no provision, a contractual relationship as a whole could be transferred; today the predominant view is in favour of such a possibility, arguing on the basis of CC art. 1255 (freedom of contract; Díez-Picazo II, 842-843; TS 6 November 2006, RAJ 2006/9425). Some special Acts contemplate the possibility (insurance contracts, labour contracts, leases).

10. No express provision on the transfer of an entire contractual position can be found in the GREEK CC. Nevertheless, the combination of an assignment of the rights arising from a contract and the substitution of a new debtor is acknowledged by the writers (see Papantoniou; ErmAK Sourlas art. 455 no. 3; Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Kritikos), art. 455 no. 39) and the Courts: (see A.P. 1002/1991; EllDik 33 (1992) 829; 1369/1993, ibid. 36 (1995) 304, at 306; 681/1995, NoB 45 (1997) 607, at 606-607; 734/1998 EllDik 39 (1998) 1589; 479/2001 EEN 2002, 575.

11. In SCOTTISH law the notion of the transfer of an entire contractual position is recognised. It is called assignation of the contract. The consent of the other contracting party is required if the transferor is to be released from liability. Many of the cases are concerned with determining whether the advance consent of the other contracting party can be inferred. (See McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 12.33-12.41; Anderson paras. 3.28-3.37.)

12. No general statutory provisions on transfer of a contractual position exist under DANISH law but the problems are discussed in the context of the sale of an enterprise. Basically, the position is similar to that provided by the present Article. All three parties must agree to the transfer. There are, however, exceptions provided by a number of statutory provisions, and even by customary rules. Thus, if a newspaper or other periodical is transferred the subscribers will immediately get a right against the new owner, whereas the old owner remains liable until the contract with the subscribers could have been terminated by notice (see Gomard, Obligationsret III, 155).

13. With regard to FINNISH law the Article corresponds with doctrinal thinking.

14. Under SWEDISH law, an agreement between the original parties and the new party is required to create the effects of a transfer of an entire contractual relationship. Clauses permitting a person to substitute as a new party a legal entity within the same group of companies as the original party (often with the replaced party remaining as guarantor) are frequently contained in contracts. Unless otherwise agreed, the new party assumes all the rights and obligations of the original party (in accordance with the main principle on assignment as expressed in sec. 27 of the 1936 Act on Promissory Notes: Lag [1936:81] om skuldebrev); cf. Supreme Court, NedJurA 1997 p.886 concerning an arbitration clause; "special circumstances", however, may bar the substituted party from invoking the clause against the remaining party (see Ramberg, Stockholm Arbitration Report 1999:1 p. 26).

15. ENGLISH law deals with the transfer of an entire contractual position under the heading of novation (Chitty on Contracts, nos. 19-085-19-087*)*. It is important in relation to the amalgamation of companies, business take-overs, the commodity markets, credit card transactions and in other contexts. In theory, however, novation results in a new contract. The possibility of novation is often provided for contractually in advance.

16. In general, POLISH law does not recognise the transfer of an entire contractual relationship (i.e. mutual rights and obligations) in one juridical act. Only by way of exception, some statutory rules provide that a third party enters into an existing contractual relationship and undertakes rights and obligations of the former party to a contract (e.g. lease – CC arts. 678, 691; contract of sale of future farm products – CC arts. 625, 626).

17. Similarly, in SLOVAK law, there is no express rule on the transfer of the entire contractual position other than those described in the notes to earlier articles. There is, however, no legal hindrance to such agreements: they would have to meet the requirements for an assignment as well as for the assumption of a debt. A specific regulation of such a situation is known in certain types of contracts (e.g. sale of business under CC §§ 476–488 – with concrete rights and obligations that may differ from the general provisions on assignment).

18. Under CZECH law also, it is recognized that the transfer of an entire contractual position can be achieved by a combination of the rules on the assignment of a right and the rules on the substitution of a new debtor, see Holub (-Eliáš), Civil Code, II, 816.

Section 4: Transfer of rights and obligations on agent's insolvency

III.–5:401: Principal's option to take over rights in case of agent's insolvency

(1) This Article applies where an agent has concluded a contract with a third party on the instructions of and on behalf of a principal but has done so in such a way that the agent, and not the principal, is a party to the contract.

(2) If the agent becomes insolvent the principal may by notice to the third party and to the agent take over the rights of the agent under the contract in relation to the third party.

(3) The third party may invoke against the principal any defence which the third party could have invoked against the agent and has all the other protections which would be available if the rights had been voluntarily assigned by the agent to the principal.

COMMENTS

A. Situations covered

This Article applies where an agent has concluded a contract with a third party on the instructions of and on behalf of a principal but has done so in such a way that the agent, and not the principal, is a party to the contract. This can happen in two ways. First, the agent may be acting under a mandate for indirect representation. This is defined as a mandate under which the agent is to act in the agent's own name or otherwise in such a way as not to indicate an intention to affect the principal's legal position (IV.D.–1:102 (Definitions) paragraph (1)(e). The third party with whom the agent contracts may or may not know that the agent is acting for a principal: the important point is that the agent contracts in such a way as not to bind the principal. Secondly, the agent may be acting under a mandate for direct representation (where the agent is authorised to act as the principal's representative and to bind the principal directly) but may in fact, although having authority to bind the principal, contract in such a way as not to bind the principal. (See II.–6:106 (Representative acting in own name). The agent may, for example, simply not disclose the fact that there is a principal. The key point for the application of the present Article is therefore not whether the agent is a direct representative or an indirect representative but simply whether the agent in fact contracts in such a way as to bind the agent but not principal. The Article applies in such cases and only in such cases.

B. Purpose of provision

The purpose of the provision is to enable the principal to step in when the agent is insolvent and take over the agent's rights under the contract. Those rights, although held by the agent, are regarded as being earmarked for the principal from the beginning. It is almost as if they are held in trust for the principal. It would be unfair to enable a principal to take over the rights under the contract without the obligations. So the third party is given a counter-option by the following article whereby the third party can exercise the third party's rights under the contract against the principal instead of the agent.

C. History of the provision

This provision has had a chequered history. The Principles of European Contract Law had a set of articles in its Chapter 3 (Authority of Agents) dealing with indirect representation. The agent in this situation was called the intermediary. The articles gave the principal an option to take over the intermediary's rights not only in the case of the intermediary's insolvency but also, if the intermediary "commits a fundamental non-performance towards the principal or if prior to the time for performance it is clear that there will be a fundamental non-performance" (PECL Art. 3:302). The third party was given a similar (but not identical) right if the intermediary became insolvent or committed a fundamental non-performance towards the third party or if it was clear that there would be such a fundamental non-performance (PECL Art. 3:303).

The Study Group, having considered criticisms of the PECL provisions by stakeholders and others, decided to limit the provisions to the case of the agent's insolvency and to limit the third party's right to a sort of counter-option to be exercised only if the principal opted to take over the agent's rights. It was considered that the question of non-performance of the agent's obligation to the principal was a matter entirely between principal and agent and should not expose the third party to a change of creditor. One practical consideration was that it could be difficult for the third party to know whether there had in fact been a fundamental non-performance of an obligation owed by the agent to the principal. The third party could therefore be exposed to great uncertainty about which party had the right to demand performance. In this respect the situation was different from assignment. If the agent was not insolvent there was no reason why the principal should not be left to seek a remedy against the agent with whom the principal had chosen to contract. In the converse situation it was considered that there was no justification for, in effect, enabling a third party, who had been content to contract with the agent alone, to bring in the principal as a sort of security provider if things began to go wrong. This argument was thought to be particularly strong if the third party had not even known that there was a principal.

D. Location of provision

The provision, along with the following article on the third party's counter-option, proved rather difficult to place. Its former location in the PECL Chapter on the authority of agents had been rightly criticised. To locate it in a Chapter on representation in a Book on contracts and other juridical acts would have been open to even stronger criticism. To locate it in the Part of Book IV dealing with mandate contracts would have been inappropriate as only a small part of it (the right to obtain the third party's name) had anything to do with the internal relationship between principal and agent. The essence of the provision is a right to bring about a change of party to the contract. It was therefore decided to place it here.

E. Obtaining name and address of third party

The principal may not know who the third party is. However, under the rules on mandate contracts the principal has a right to obtain the name and address of the third party from the agent on demand (IV.D.–3:403 (Communication of identity of third party).

F. The principal's option

The principal's option to take over the rights under the contract is exercisable only in the event of the agent's insolvency. "Insolvency" is not defined but a functional rather than a technical approach would be appropriate, given that the model rules are intended to have a uniform application across different legal systems (see I.–1:102 (Interpretation and development) paragraph (3)(a)). This would suggest that the test should be whether the agent's financial position is such that the agent is unable to meet the agent's debts. The duty to exercise rights in accordance with good faith and fair dealing would suggest that the principal would have to give the third party credible evidence of this state of affairs (see III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing)). In practice this would mean that there would have to be some overt indication of insolvency.

The option is exercisable by notice to both the third party and the agent, both of whom have an interest in knowing when the principal takes over the rights under the contract. The transfer will take place at earliest when the second notice reaches the addressee but the notice might fix a later time (see I.–1:109 (Notice) paragraph (3)) .

G. Defences and protections for third party

Paragraph (3) enables the third party may invoke against the principal any defence which the third party could have invoked against the agent and gives the third party all the other protections which would be available if the rights had been voluntarily assigned by the agent to the principal. The first part is self-explanatory. The second part means, for example, that the principal could not take over a right to performance of such a personal nature that the third party could not reasonably be required to render kit to anyone except the agent (III.–5:109 (Assignability: rights personal to the creditor). Similarly, if the agent has concluded one contract on behalf of many principals the third party would be protected against having the obligation made significantly more burdensome by a need to perform in parts (III.–5:107 (Assignability in part).

NOTES

1. These Notes to this and the following Article deal only with the situation where the agent has contracted in such a way as not to bind the principal, but only the agent.
2. The Geneva Convention on Agency of 1983 provides in art. 13(2)(a) that the principal can take over the agent's rights if the agent "fails to fulfil or is not in a position to fulfil his obligations to the principal".
3. In the NETHERLANDS under CC art. 7:420 the principal can assume the agent's rights under the main contract, if the agent does not perform the obligations towards the principal or goes bankrupt or if the third person does not perform its obligations.
4. BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law provide that in the case of the agent's bankruptcy the principal is entitled to proceed directly against the third party, but may claim only any outstanding part of the purchase price of the goods which the agent had sold on the principal's behalf (Belgium: New Bankruptcy Code of 1997 art. 103(2); Luxembourg: Ccom art. 567(2)).
5. If a DANISH or SWEDISH commission agent has acted in the course of business (handelskommission), the principal may claim directly from the third party if the latter has failed to fulfil its obligations in due time or the commission agent has failed to render due accounts or has acted fraudulently against the principal or has been adjudged bankrupt (Commission Agents Act § 57(2)).
6. In ITALY and PORTUGAL the principal is generally entitled to exercise the agent's rights arising from the execution of the mandate against third persons (Italy: CC art. 1705(2)(sent. 2); Portugal: CC art. 1181(2)).
7. In FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, the principal may sue the third party by an action oblique (CC art. 1166). If the agent fails to proceed against the third party, the principal may exercise the agent's rights, but may not acquire the results of that action personally since such an action is for the benefit of the agent (Cass.civ. 16 June 1903, D.P. 1903.I.454; Cour Paris 12 June 1946, D. 1947.I.112). In general, many French legal writers are in favour of direct relations and corresponding direct actions between the principal and the third party if the agent is a commission agent (Starck 164 ff.; Ripert/Roblot no. 2635, 2672. The courts, however, explicitly disallow such actions (France: Cass.civ. 20 July 1871, D.P. 1871.I.232; Luxembourg: Cour Supérieure de Justice 19 March 1920, Pas. 11, 84).

8. The undisclosed principal doctrine of ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law enables the principal to sue the third party without any conditions. A similar rule applies in DENMARK and SWEDEN when a commission agent is not acting in the course of business (i.e., in a civilkommission). The principal may then proceed against the third party at any time (Commission Agents Act § 57(1)).

III.–5:402: Third party's counter-option

Where the principal has taken over the rights of the agent under the preceding Article, the third party may by notice to the principal and the agent opt to exercise against the principal the rights which the third party has against the agent, subject to any defences which the agent has against the third party.

COMMENTS

The idea underlying this provision is that if the principal chooses to take over the rights under the contract by a unilateral act which, unlike a voluntary assignment by the agent, would not be even potentially challengeable by the agent's creditors, the principal should be prepared to take over the obligations under the contract as well. It would not be sufficient to rely on the argument that the third party could withhold performance to the principal until the agent performed. The third party may have already performed and may then discover that a remedy (e.g. a claim for damages for non-conformity) needs to be exercised against the other party to the transaction. The reason for giving the third party a counter-option, rather than simply limiting the principal's option to one to take over both rights and obligations, is that there may be rare cases where the third party might prefer to keep the agent as debtor.

If the third party brings in the principal as debtor under the contract between the third party and the agent (the principal having already opted to take over the agent's rights under that contract) the principal may invoke against the third party any defences which the agent would have had against the third party. This does not, of course, affect any defences which the principal might have against the agent under the mandate contract, if for example the agent claimed remuneration under that contract. It is unnecessary to provide for this.

NOTES

1. Some systems give the third party an independent right to bring in the principal as debtor under the contract with the third party, rather than just giving the third party a counter-option exercisable only if the principal chooses to take over the rights. This is the position, for example, under the Geneva Convention on Agency: the third party's right to sue the principal is admitted under the same conditions as the corresponding right of the principal to sue the third party (art. 13(2)(b).
2. In the NETHERLANDS the third party may exercise the agent's rights against the principal in case of the agent's bankruptcy or non-performance (CC art. 7:421(1)).
3. Under SPANISH commercial law the third party may be entitled to sue the principal in a very specific situation, namely if a factor, who according to Ccom art. 284 should act in the principal's name, did in fact act in the factor's own name (Ccom art. 287).
4. A similar, but more general rule prevails in FRANCE. Indirect representation is treated as a special case of simulation (prête-nom, cf. CC art. 1321). If the third party acquires knowledge of the fact that the agent, its contracting party, was acting on behalf of a principal, it may bring a declaratory action for a judicial statement of simulation (action en déclaration de simulation). On the strength of such a judicial decision, the third party has the choice either to rely on the hidden contract and sue the principal or, on the other hand, sue the agent on the basis of the "simulated" contract. The third party may not act against both the agent and the principal. By contrast, the principal may not proceed directly against the third party on the basis of the dissimulated act. This is not the interpretation given to BELGIAN law which does not treat indirect representation, including prëte-nom, as a form of simulation, at least not in the law of obligations (different questions may arise under property law). The view taken is that the agent is indeed engaging itself into an obligation towards the other party; thus there is no simulation at all (See P.A. Foriers, "Observations sur le contrat de prête-nom et la théorie des extensions de faillite", JT 1980, 417 ff.; M.E. Storme, "De bescherming van de wederpartij en van het dwingend recht bij middellijke vertegenwoordiging, m.b. naamlening, in het burgerlijk procesrecht, en de betwistbare verwoording daarvan in de cassatiearresten van 25 november 1993", Proces & bewijs 1994, 53). The third party has the contracting party it has contracted with and has in general no right against the principal.

5. Under the undisclosed principal doctrine of ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law, the third party may sue the principal without any preconditions. Therefore the third party has the choice to proceed against either the principal or the agent.

6. In DENMARK and SWEDEN, in general the third party may not proceed against the principal.

CHAPTER 6: SET-OFF AND MERGER

Section 1: Set-off

III.–6:101: Definition and scope

(1) "Set-off" is the process by which a person may use a right to performance held against another person to extinguish in whole or in part an obligation owed to that person.

(2) This Chapter does not apply to set-off in insolvency.

COMMENTS

A. Nature of set-off

The idea underlying set-off is a very simple one. If A owes B a certain amount and if B owes A the same amount, and if both debts are due, then either party can opt to have the rights, and corresponding obligations, cancel each other out. It is then not necessary for A to pay B, and for B to pay A the same amount. Some refinements are necessary, and are developed in the following rules, but that is the basic idea.

In these rules set-off is regarded as a matter of substantive law rather than as a purely procedural device. If the requirements for set-off are met, and if set-off has been declared, the obligations confronting each other are extinguished. Thus, if either of the parties subsequently sues the other, the action will have to be dismissed as unfounded since the right on which it is based no longer exists. There is one exception to this rule which is spelt out in III.–6:103 (Unascertained rights).

If a debtor declares set-off in the course of legal proceedings, it will have to be determined, under the rules of civil procedure applicable to the proceedings, whether such a plea is admissible. If it is, the set-off is immediately effective on the level of substantive law and the fact that the obligations have been extinguished has to be taken into account in deciding the dispute (unless III.–6:103 (Unascertained rights) applies). If it is not, the debtor may still assert the right outside the proceedings.

B. Insolvency set-off

The rules in this chapter are not intended to deal with set-off in insolvency. Special rules provided by the applicable national insolvency laws prevail.

NOTES

I. Nature of set-off

1. Set-off may be regarded as a purely procedural device or as a matter of substantive law. This Chapter follows the latter approach, which prevails among the continental European legal systems (e.g. AUSTRIA). The Chapter also follows the general approach in providing for a uniform, rather than fragmented, regime of set-off. They thereby reflect a development which is also occurring in ENGLISH law. The traditional English distinction between statutory and equitable set-off (both of them originally procedural devices) has been considerably reduced as the equitable rules will prevail; significantly, however, a strong body of opinion now favours the substantive nature of equitable set-off (cf. Derham § 4.29 ff.[NB (3rd ed, 2003) – HB]). It is thus brought into line with insolvency set-off and set-off by agreement which are both, undoubtedly, substantive in nature. The modern approach recognises that equitable set-off is based on notions of fairness and natural justice (cf. McCracken 53 ff, 62 ff. [NB 2nd ed, 1998) – HB]) which ties in well with the underlying rationale traditionally advanced for set-off in continental jurisprudence: if A sues B for an amount which A is bound to pay B then A is acting in contravention of the precepts of good faith (dolo petit qui petit quod statim redditurus est - whoever claims what will have to be given back immediately, claims fraudulently): Windscheid & Kipp § 349, 2. In the development of continental jurisprudence, too, there has been a shift from a fragmented towards a uniform approach to set-off which has implied a shift from procedure to substance; see Zimmermann, FS Medicus, 710 ff.

II. Insolvency set-off

2. Most legal systems have special rules dealing with insolvency set-off. However, they are usually part of that country's insolvency regime: ENGLAND: Insolvency Act 1986, s. 323 on which see Goode, Credit and Security §§ 7-75 ff. and Derham §§ 6.01 ff.; IRELAND: Bankruptcy Act 1988 and, in case of insolvency of companies, Companies Act 1963 (esp. s. 284); SCOTLAND: "balancing accounts in bankruptcy": McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 25.60 ff; Wilson, Scottish Law of Debt[2], no. 13.10; GERMANY: Insolvenzordnung §§ 94 ff.; FRANCE: art. 25 de la loi du 26 juillet 2005 de sauvegarde des entreprises,; ITALY: art. 56 legge fallimentare, on which see Perlingieri, Estinzione 315 ff.; Inzitari, Effetti del fallimento, 159 ff; AUSTRIA: Ausgleichsordnung §§ 19 ss ff. and Konkursordnung §§ 19 ss ff on which see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1439, no 8-11 and Dullinger 307 ss ff.; SWEDEN: chap. 5, §§ 15–17 konkurslag (1987); DENMARK: Konkurslov (1997) §§ 42-45; FINLAND: §§ 33, 33a and 34 konkurssisääntö (konkursstadga) (1868); SPAIN, art. 58 Insolvency Law; GREECE: Ccom art. 537; PORTUGAL: art. 99 Código da Insolvência e da Recuperação das Empresas (Insolvency Code, 2003); art. 283 (2) Código dos Valores Mobiliários (Securities Code, 1999); SLOVENIA Act on Forced Settlement, Bankruptcy and Liquidation art. 39; for LUXEMBOURG, however, see art. 455 code de commerce; ESTONIAN Bankruptcy Act § 99 (creditor should have the right to set off before the declaration of bankruptcy); CZECH Insolvency Act § 140; and for POLAND, arts. 93-96 of Law on Bankruptcy and Rehabilitation (Prawo upadłościowe i naprawcze) dated 28th of February 2003. Set-off cannot be opposed to the insolvent estate when the requirements for set-off were not met at the commencement of the insolvency procedure (Insolvency Act, art. 58). There is an EU-regulation on insolvency proceedings (No. 1346/2000 of 29 May 2000, OJ L 160, 30 June 2000, 1 ff.) art. 6 of which provides that the opening of insolvency proceedings does not affect the right of creditors to demand the set-off of their rights against the rights of the debtor, where such a set-off is permitted by the law applicable to the insolvent debtor's right. Also in the legal system of SLOVAKIA there are special rules of insolvency. In BELGIAN law, there are no special rules for set-off in insolvency and it is rather a question of property law: a party can no longer extinguish its obligation by set-off when the other party is no longer entitled to receive performance because of rights one or more third parties have acquired in the right of the other party, whether by assignment, pledge, seizure by creditors or otherwise.

However, set-off is still possible against a closely connected right because of the reciprocal character of those obligations (set-off being a kind of liquidation of the right to suspend performance).

III.–6:102: Requirements for set-off

If two parties owe each other obligations of the same kind, either party may set off that party's right against the other party's right, if and to the extent that, at the time of set-off:

(a) the performance of the first party is due or, even if it is not due, the first party can oblige the other party to accept performance;

(b) the performance of the other party is due; and

(c) each party has authority to dispose of that party's right for the purpose of the set-off.

COMMENTS

A. Requirements for set-off

Mutuality. The rights must exist between the same parties. This requirement is expressed in the opening words of the Article – "If two parties owe each other obligations…". There must, in the traditional formulation, be concursus debiti et crediti. So, for example, a security provider who has a personal right against the creditor cannot set off that right against the creditor's right against the main debtor. It follows from the requirement of mutuality that there can be no set-off between a debt owed by a person (P) as an individual and one due to that person as a representative. P owes the first debt but the other debt is owed, not to P, but to the principal on whose behalf P is acting. Similarly, a right held by a person as an individual could not be used to effect set-off against a right owed to a company in which that person is a majority shareholder and managing director, even if it is for all practical purposes a one-person company.

There is one exception to the rule of mutuality. Where a right has been assigned, the debtor can assert against the assignee certain rights of set-off which would have been available to the debtor against the assignor. This is expressly allowed by a provision in the rules on assignment (III.–5:116 (Effect on defences and rights of set-off) paragraph (3)). It is justified by the need to protect the debtor.

Obligations of the same kind. Both obligations must be of the same kind: a money right can be set off only against a money right, a right for the delivery of grain only against a right for the delivery of grain of the same kind. Set-off usually relates to monetary obligations; the prime example of non-monetary obligations, to which set-off may be relevant today, are securities, whether certificated or dematerialised. Whether rights are of the same kind depends on their state at the time that notice of set-off is given. Set-off concerning foreign currency debts - the most important practical question in this context - is dealt with in III.–6:104 (Foreign currency set-off).

Right of party declaring set-off due. Since set-off constitutes a form of enforcement of the cross-right (i.e. the right of the party declaring set-off), the cross-right has to be enforceable. Thus, it has to be due, the other party must not be able to raise a defence, and the cross-right must not relate to a naturalis obligatio (i.e. an obligation which is not enforceable but which allows the recipient to retain performance once it has been effected). However, as far as prescription of the cross-right is concerned, see III.–7:503 (Effect on set-off).

A has a right against B for €100 which arises from the sale of kitchen equipment and which has become due on 10 October. B wishes to effect set-off with a right against A.

B's right (i.e. the cross-right) is based on a loan, repayment of which is due on 20 October. Before 20 October B may not declare set-off. After 20 October B may still not effect set-off if A has a defence against B's right. The same applies if B tries to set off an unenforceable right such as, in some legal systems, one arising from gambling.

Party declaring set-off entitled to oblige other party to accept performance. The normal situation where set-off is possible is where both rights are due. This is the situation referred to in the opening words of paragraph (a). However, the right against the person declaring set-off does not necessarily have to be due; it is sufficient that the person declaring set-off can oblige the other party to accept performance. For as soon as a debtor may thrust performance on the creditor (which may be long before the right falls due) there is no reason not to allow the debtor to declare set-off. This rule has to be read with III.–2:103 (Early performance) which allows a creditor to reject an offer of early performance only if the early performance would cause the creditor unreasonable prejudice. A debtor who is not yet entitled to effect performance, however, may not declare set-off.

A has a right against B, due on 10 October. B has a right against A, due on 10 September. While A is not entitled to declare set-off before 10 October, B may do so as from 10 September, provided that B is entitled to render performance in favour of A as from that date.

A has invested a sum of €10,000 with B, the money being repayable on 10 October. The parties have fixed an interest rate of 10 %. A still owes B €10,000 arising from a contract of sale concerning B's car. B had transferred the car on 1 August and on the same day A's obligation to effect payment had become due. Nevertheless, B may not give notice of set-off before 10 October since A may decline to receive back the sum invested with B before 10 October.

Authority to dispose. This requirement relates not to the question of the performance as such (for example, whether it is due) but rather to the availability or disposability of the rights used to effect set-off. It means, for example, that a right which is the object of an attachment order so that it is frozen in the hands of the debtor cannot be used for set-off. It also means that a right held by a trustee as a trustee cannot be used for set off against a right held against the trustee in a personal capacity. The trustee would not normally be entitled to make use of the trust fund to settle personal debts. Some aspects of set-off will be specially regulated by the Book on Trusts but the rules will reflect this general principle that a trustee may dispose of trust assets for trust purposes but not for personal purposes (see X.–6:109 (Obligation not to obtain unauthorised enrichment or advantage) paragraph (2) and X–10:302 (Set-off)). Another consequence of this requirement is that a person who is a joint creditor could not use the jointly held right to effect set-off against a right held against that person. A solidary creditor could, however, do so because each solidary creditor can exercise the right alone. A creditor with a divided right could use that creditor's part of the right, but only that part, for the purposes of set-off. See III.–4:202 (Solidary, divided and joint rights).

The restriction works both ways, both at the declaring end and the receiving end, even if the receiving party takes no active role. It may, of course, be qualified by specific rules on particular types of restrictions on disposability, such as the rules on attachment by creditors, a matter which is not covered in these model rules.

In the Principles of European Contract Law this requirement was not expressly spelled out. Instead of paragraphs (a) and (c) of the present Article there was in the English text just one requirement – that the party declaring set-off was "entitled to effect performance". Comment B(4) to Article 13:101 explained that this was intended to cover not only the situation where the party was entitled to "thrust performance on the creditor", even if it was early performance, but also the situation where "the debtor may no longer perform because the principal claim has become subject to an order of attachment". It was not obvious from the text of the Article, however, that these two situations were covered. Accordingly the present Article attempts to spell out the intended effect more clearly.

B. Unascertained cross-right

It is not always a requirement for set-off that the cross-right is ascertained as to its existence or its value; see the rule in III.–6:103 (Unascertained rights).

C. Obligations to be performed at different places

Set-off is not excluded by the fact that the obligations have to be performed at different places (e.g. loan repayable at the lender's place of business to be set off against a right to payment of a purchase price which has to be paid at the seller's place of business. Allowing set-off in this type of situation is unlikely to cause any prejudice to the creditor of the principal right.

NOTES

I. Mutuality

1. It is generally recognised that the creditor of the one right has to be the debtor of the other, and vice versa (requirement of mutuality, concursus debiti et crediti, réciprocité, Wechselseitigkeit); FRANCE: CC art. 1289 and Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1297; BELGIUM: CC art. 1289 and Cornelis, Algemene theorie 869; LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 1289; GERMANY: CC § 387 and Gernhuber 233 ff; ITALY: CC art. 1241 and Perlingieri, Estinzione, 259 ff; the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:127(2) and Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I, n. 533; SPAIN: CC art. 1195; PORTUGAL: CC art. 847, no. 1; Varela II, 200 ff; AUSTRIA: CC §§ 1438, 1441, Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 102 101 and Dullinger, Handbuch der Aufrechnung, 5 ss ff; GREECE: CC art. 440; SLOVENIA LOA art. 311; SCOTLAND: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 25.47 ff. and Wilson, Scottish Law of Debt[2], no. 13.4; SWEDEN: Lindskog, Kvittning 43; DENMARK: Gomard, Obligationsret III, 189; FINLAND: Aurejärvi and Hemmo, 187 ff, POLAND CC art.498 § 1 and ESTONIA LOA § 197(1) (see Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 24 October 2006, civil matter no 3-2-1-93-06 on the possibility of set off between holder of the pledge claiming the enforcement and the owner of the property, who has a claim against the holder of the pledge). The DUTCH CC has specifically added a provision according to which the right of compensation does not exist with reference to a debt and a right falling into estates which are distinct from each other (CC art. 6:127(3); on which, see Parlementaire Geschiedenis 491). In ENGLAND, the underlying idea is often expressed by stating that the rights must exist between the same parties and in the same right; see, e.g., Goode, Credit and Security § 7-44 [3rd ed, 2003]. For IRELAND, see Murdoch's Dict. 722. The right of set-off was conferred by s. 27(3) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Act 1877 and by s. 284 of the Companies Act 1963. See Frawley v. Governor and Company of Bank of Ireland [1975] IR 376; In re Fredericks Inns Ltd. [1994] ILRM 387. In general Ireland follows the common law position.

2. Concerning protection of a debtor whose creditor has assigned the right to a third party, see the Notes to III.–5:116 (Effect on defences and rights of set-off).

3. In SLOVAKIA regulation of the set-off process is a matter of substantive law in the CC. There are also some specific provisions in the Ccom. There is no legal definition of setting off, but its character can be derived from CC § 580: "If the creditor and the debtor have mutual receivables whose performances are of the same kind, they become extinct by setting off against each other if they cover each other and if one of the parties expresses its will to the setting-off to the other party. The discharge occurs at the moment when the receivables capable to be set off met each other."

4. CZECH law is identical, but there are some exceptions to the mutuality principle: the debtor may set-off against the assignee receivables, which the debtor had at the moment when notified of the assignment, (CC § 529(2)), the surety may set-off the debtor's receivables against the creditor (CC § 548(2)), etc.

II. Obligations of the same kind

5. All legal systems agree in principle that both rights must be of the same kind; GERMANY: CC § 387 and Gernhuber 236 ff.: ITALY: CC art. 1243(1) and Perlingieri, Estinzione 295 ff; the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:127(2) and Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I n. 534; SPAIN: CC art. 1196(2); PORTUGAL: CC art. 847, n.1-b; Varela II, 205 f; AUSTRIA: CC §§ 1438, 1440, Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1440, no. 1 and Dullinger 77 ss ff; GREECE: CC art. 440; SCOTLAND: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 25.42 f; SWEDEN: Lindskog, Kvittning 43; DENMARK: Gomard, Obligationsret III, 184; FINLAND: Aurejärvi & Hemmo 185; SLOVENIA LOA art. 311 POLAND CC art.498(1); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 580; and ESTONIA LOA § 197(1). For FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG CC art. 1291 lays down the same principle but adds that uncontested payments in crops and commodities whose price is regulated by market lists may be set off against sums which are liquid and enforceable. According to Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1298 this innovation by the drafters of the code civil, the reasonableness and advisability of which is far from obvious, does not appear to have been much applied. ENGLISH law confines set-off to money debts which is explicable in view of the exceptional nature of specific performance. Moreover, it reflects economic realities in that, in other countries too, set-off usually relates to money debts. Although IRELAND generally follows the common law, there seems to be no Irish authority or any rational reason why set-off should be confined to money debts.

III. Cross-claim enforceable

6. All legal systems accept that the cross-claim has to be enforceable; ENGLAND: Derham 27 f; SCOTLAND: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 25.45 ff; Wilson, Scottish Law of Debt[2], no. 13.5; FRANCE: CC art.1291(1) and Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1300; BELGIUM; CC art. 1291(1) and Cornelis, Algemene theorie n. 673; LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 1291(1); GERMANY: CC §§ 387, 390(1) [see now § 215 since 1 January 2002] and Gernhuber 247 ff; ITALY: CC art. 1343(1) and Bianca, Diritto civile IV, 485; Perlingieri, Estinzione, 297 ff; the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:127(2) and Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I, n. 536; SPAIN: CC art. 1196(3)(4); PORTUGAL: CC art. 847, n.1-a and Varela II, 204 ff; SLOVENIA: LOA art. 311 and Juhart in Juhart/Plavšak, 391; AUSTRIA: CC § 1439, Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 103 102, Dullinger, 82 et seq.; GREECE: CC art. 440; SWEDEN: Lindskog, Kvittning 43; DENMARK: Gomard, Obligationsret III, 185; FINLAND: Aurejärvi and Hemmo 185 ff; POLAND CC art.498(1); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 581(2) (unless agreed otherwise); and ESTONIA LOA § 197(1).

IV. Party entitled to perform may declare set-off

7. Also, it is widely recognised that the principal right does not have to be enforceable; it is sufficient that the person giving notice is entitled to perform; GERMANY: CC § 387 and Gernhuber 252 ff; the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 127(2) and Parlementaire Geschiedenis 492; AUSTRIA: Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1439, no. 7; PORTUGAL: Varela II, 207 ff.; GREECE: Stathopoulos, Law of Obligations § 24, no. 42, fn. 68 (against the wording of CC art. 440); SWEDEN: Lindskog, Kvittning 43; DENMARK: Gomard, Obligationsret III, 185; FINLAND: Aurejärvi & Hemmo 185 ff; and ESTONIA LOA § 197(1). According to ENGLISH and IRISH law, the principal right has to be enforceable; this is a natural consequence of the – traditionally – procedural nature of set-off in those legal systems. The laws of FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG also require both rights to be exigible (CC art. 1291(1)); cf. also ITALY: CC art. 1243(1) and Perlingieri, Estinzione, 297 ff; for a different approach see Nappi, Contributo, 15 ff; SPAIN: CC art. 1196(3)); SLOVENIA LOA art. 312 and POLAND CC art 498(1). This follows from the ipso iure effect of set-off: none of the rights can be labelled principal right or cross-claim. French and Belgian courts, however, often reach the same result as German law by means of compensation facultative: the party exposed to a right which has not yet become due may renounce the legal protection arising from the lack of exigibility (see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1312). In AUSTRIA, both rights, also the principle one, have to be due (CC § 1439; see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1439, no. 7); the only exception is where the debtor of the principle right is entitled to early performance.

8. In SLOVAKIA the requirements of mutuality, obligations of the same kind, and an expression of will (declaration of set-off) are given in CC § 580 (see previous notes. On the question of enforceability § 581(1) provides that the setting-off is also not admissible against a receivable that can not be affected by enforcement of a decision. A receivable which is not yet due can be set – off , but only against a receivable which is also not due. “A receivable that is not yet due cannot be set off against a due receivable.” There are special provisions in the Ccom. Under Ccom § 358 only such debts as may be asserted in court can be mutually set-off. The fact, that a debt (claim) is statute-barred (i.e. that the term of prescription has run out), does not prevent its set-off if the prescription only occurred after the time when the claims became mutually applicable for being included in the set-off. Under Ccom § 359 a mature claim cannot be set off against an immature claim, unless it concerns a claim against a debtor who is unable to fulfil the payment obligations. Under Ccom § 360 a claim may also be included in the set-off when it is not due only because the maturity of the debtor’s obligation has been deferred by the creditor at the debtor’s request, without otherwise amending the obligation.

9. CZECH law is identical. However, it is disputed if a mature receivable can be set-off against an immature one, and if so, when the compensated receivables cease to exist (at the time of the act of compensation, or at the time of maturity of the so far immature receivable), for details see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 1036.

V. Obligations to be performed at different places

10. It is generally accepted that set-off is not excluded by the fact that performance of the two obligations has to occur at different places. A number of legal systems, however, grant the creditor of the principal right a right to recover damages for any loss suffered as a result of not receiving performance or not being able to make performance at the right place; FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 1296; GERMANY: CC § 391; ITALY: CC art. 1245; the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:138; SPAIN: CC art. 1199; PORTUGAL: CC art. 852; GREECE: CC art. 446; DENMARK: Ussing, Alm. Del. 324; cf. also Dullinger 80 ff; Wood 24–31 ff; ESTONIA LOA § 199; and POLISH CC art. 500.

III.–6:103: Unascertained rights

(1) A debtor may not set off a right which is unascertained as to its existence or value unless the set-off will not prejudice the interests of the creditor.

(2) Where the rights of both parties arise from the same legal relationship it is presumed that the creditor's interests will not be prejudiced.

COMMENTS

A. The options

There is an obvious danger that a debtor may protract legal proceedings by invoking set-off on account of a dubious cross-right such as one which cannot easily be proved or the existence of which is as yet uncertain, and there is thus the necessity of affording some protection to the creditor. This can be done in one of three ways.

Cross-right has to be ascertained. The fact that the cross-right is ascertained ("liquidity") could be elevated to a further substantive requirement of set-off. But this would go too far. There may be cases where set-off would not prejudice the other party and would be entirely appropriate. It may, for example, be clear that the value of the cross-right will be ascertained within the period which legal proceedings involving the principal right will take anyway. Or it may be certain that the cross-right exceeds the value of the principal right. A substantive requirement of liquidity, without any discretion on the part of the judge, would inhibit unnecessarily the possibility of set-off.

Cross-right need not be ascertained. Alternatively, a legal system may take the view that, on the level of substantive law, set-off is not prevented by the fact that the cross-right is unascertained. For practical reasons such a solution would normally be accompanied by provisions requiring the judge to refuse to consider set-off if this would unduly protract the proceedings. Typically, therefore, there would be a procedural provision allowing the judge to deal separately with principal right and cross-right and to give a provisional judgment on the principal right. But this solution would appear to be awkward, and somewhat impractical, in that a creditor who wants to enforce the provisional judgment would run the risk that this step may later turn out not to have been based on a valid title, with the consequence that the creditor might have to repay the amount obtained and pay damages. The creditor, in other words, does not really have a secure and useful title yet - a point which is hardly likely to prompt the debtor to tender payment.

Judicial discretion. The Article therefore adopts a third approach which can, essentially, be regarded as a compromise between the first two. If the cross-right cannot be readily ascertained, the judge is empowered to adjudicate upon the principal right without taking account of the set-off declared by the debtor, provided that the principal right is otherwise ready for adjudication. The judge is thus given a discretion and will have to take account of all the circumstances of the case, such as the probable duration of the proceedings concerning both principal right and cross-right, or the effect of a delay on the creditor. In the exercise of this discretion, the judge will, however, have to distinguish two cases.

(a) If principal right and cross-right arise from the same legal relationship, the judge will not normally deal only with the principal right but will deal also with the cross-right and consider the issue of set-off. The Article establishes a factual presumption that the interests of the creditor of the principal right are not normally prejudiced in this situation.

(b) If principal right and cross-right do not arise from the same relationship, the decision will normally go the other way: Commercial predictability and fairness demand that a party who has an ascertained right should not be held up in pursuing this right. If the judge decides to adjudicate upon the principal right, the judgment is not merely of a provisional nature. The decision rests solely on the merits of the creditor's claim which the judge regards as being unaffected by the declaration of set-off. As a result, the declaration of set-off must be regarded as ineffective. The debtor's right will therefore have to be pursued independently.

B. Right to withhold performance

The problems analysed above do not arise in situations where the debtor can make use of a right to withhold performance in terms. In these cases the (principal) right is not ready for adjudication.

NOTES

I. "Liquidity" as a requirement for set-off

1. FRENCH and BELGIAN law as well as the law of LUXEMBOURG regard liquidité as a substantive requirement of set-off which, moreover, applies not only to the cross-claim but also to the principal right (CC art. 1291, on which see, for France, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1299 and Kegel, Aufrechnung 160 ff, and for BELGIUM, Cornelis, Algemene theorie n. 672). The same is true for ITALY, see CC art. 1243 (on the interpretation of which cf. Perlingieri, Estinzione 293 ff; for a different approach see Di Prisco 321; for the meaning of liquidity according to the prevailing case law, cf. Cass. Sez. Lav, 18 October 2002, n. 14818, Rep. For. It. 2002, Voce Obbligazioni, n. 72; Cass.Civ. 22 April 1998, n. 4073, Rep. For. It. 2002, Voce Obbligazioni n. 51). This must be seen against the background of the ipso iure effect of set-off in French law: unless the principal right and the cross-claim are easily ascertainable it would be impossible to say whether, and to what extent, they have been discharged. But the requirement of liquidité also gives rise to a number of problems, so that in French and Belgian practice it has been modified considerably. On the one hand, the judge is granted some leeway in determining whether the right is sufficiently certain in order to be treated as liquid and thus capable of being taken into account for purposes of set-off. This is also the view taken in ITALY by the majority of legal writers and rare case law, although it may cause some overlapping between compensazione legale and compensazione giudiziale: see Perlingieri, Estinzione, 293; Cantillo, Le obbligazioni, Vol. II, 964; Dalbosco, Della compensazione giudiziale, 762 ff; as to case law, see Trib. Livorno, 27 November 1999, Corr. Giur. 2001, 1092 ff; Cass. 3 giugno 1991, n. 6237, Giur.it. 1992, I 882). On the other hand, and more importantly, the device of compensation judiciaire may be resorted to, provided the defendant asserts the cross claim by way of cross-action (demande reconventionelle). The legal nature of compensation judiciaire is disputed, but since the judge may decide to deal with both actions at one and the same time, and to give judgment for the balance, it has at least the practical effect of set-off. On compensation judiciaire, see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1410 Kegel, Aufrechnung 10 f.; Cornelis, Algemene theorie n. 680; Kruithof, de Ly, Bocken & de Temmerman 711; for ITALY, where it must however be distinguished between cross-action (domanda riconvenzionale) and compensazione giudiziale, Perlingieri, Estinzione, 312 ff. Despite the fact that set-off does not take effect ipso iure in SCOTLAND, there is nonetheless a requirement of liquidity under the Compensation Act 1592: the debt to be used for set-off must be certain in amount, presently payable and not disputed: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 25.45 ff; Wilson, Scottish Law of Debt[2], no. 13.5. In SPAIN, art. 1196(4) CC requires the claim to be liquid. However that must be understood in the sense that until the liquidity requirement is satisfied the claims are not offset. It does not mean that a party cannot go to court to get a decision making liquid a claim not yet liquid: from the time of the judgment, the claims are offset, even though they were not offset at the time one of the counterparties sued for set- off.

2. According to ENGLISH law, claim and cross-claim must be liquidated or ascertained at the time of pleading (Hanak v. Green [1958] 2 All ER 151 at 145; Stooke v. Taylor [1880] 5 QBD 569, 575). However, this only applies to statutory set-off (i.e. in situations where claim and cross-claim arise from unconnected transactions). For IRELAND, see Walek v. Seafield Gentex [1978] I.R. 167. The position is generally as for England.

II. The procedural approach

3. Even in France, therefore, the emphasis has shifted from substantive law to procedure. The path towards a procedural solution (mapped out by Justinian and the Glossators and subscribed to by the Pandectist authors; see Dernburg 554 ff.) has been followed in GERMANY by the draftsmen of the CC. Liquidity of the cross-claim is not a requirement for set-off (see von Kübel 1092; the same view is usually advocated today, in spite of CC § 1439, for AUSTRIAN law: see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 102; Dullinger 90 ss for both set-off in civil proceedings (see the explicit rule of AUSTRIAN CCP § 381(3)) and set-off by notice. ff; Reiterer 38 ff; for a comparative evaluation, see Kegel, Aufrechnung 158 ss. ff). The draftsmen of the GERMAN CC could refer to two provisions in the Civil Procedure Act (which have been preserved, essentially unchanged, until today) according to which the Court may decide to deal separately with principal claim and cross-claim (as long as both do not arise from the same legal relationship) and that a provisional judgment may be given, under these circumstances, concerning the principal claim (CCP §§ 145(3), 302). There is also no requirement that the cross-claim be ascertained in FINLAND: Halila & Ylöstalo 58 ff and in PORTUGAL: CC art. 847, n. 3; and for POLAND CC art. 498(1). For SLOVENIA CCP arts. 319, 324, 337 and 348. See also Ude, Civilno procesno pravo, 227. The ESTONIAN LOA § 200(4), similarly to the German CC § 390, provides for a rule that a party requesting set-off cannot set off a claim against which the other party may set up defences. The general line of argumentation follows German example, as CCP § 450 provides for a similar procedural approach (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Käerdi), § 200, no. 2, 3.4). Application of the LOA § 200(4) is in court practice limited to the defences which partly or completely excludes the cross-claim, see Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decisions from 24 October 2006, civil matter no 3-2-1-93-06 and from 27 March 2007 no 3-2-1-18-07. For the CZECH REPUBLIC, no requirements as to the ascertainability or liquidity of the rights subject to set-off are stipulated (and neither have they been developed in the case law).

III. Judicial discretion

4. A compromise approach is adopted in the NETHERLANDS: the judge may adjudicate upon the claim without taking account of the set-off declared by the defendant, if it cannot easily be determined whether that defence is well founded, and if the claim is otherwise ready for adjudication: CC art. 6:136, on which see Parlementaire Geschiedenis 509 f. and Asser-Hartkamp Verbintenissenrecht I, nn. 550 ff. The solution proposed in the present article is also accepted by GREEK doctrine: see Balis 442 ff.; Georgiadis 497; Filios, § 76 Γ, Δ II. DANISH law does not require liquidity as a condition for substantive law but the courts will not allow set-off if it prejudices the interests of the other party (see §§ 249(2) and Code of Procedure 253). It is uncertain whether there is a presumption that the other party's interest will not be prejudiced if both rights arise from the same legal relationship In the case reported in Ugeskrift for Retsvaesen 1970, 599. The Supreme Court held that a landlord had been entitled to evict the tenant for not having paid rent even though the tenant claimed to have paid more than the required rent and to be entitled to repayment of some of the rent. The tenant's claim for repayment was held to have been so uncertain that the bailiff had been entitled to evict him. In IRISH law the judge is given an over-arching discretion, if the plaintiff applies before the trial (Sheehan v. National Bank [1937] IR 783), to refuse the defendant permission to use a set-off or counter-claim if it cannot be conveniently disposed of in the pending action, or ought not to be allowed for special reasons. See also Rohan Construction Ltd. v. Antigen Ltd. [1989] ILRM 783. In SLOVAKIA there are no special provisions about this question.

III.–6:104: Foreign currency set-off

Where parties owe each other money in different currencies, each party may set off that party's right against the other party's right, unless the parties have agreed that the party declaring set-off is to pay exclusively in a specified currency.

COMMENTS

A. Set-off not prevented

It is doubtful whether debts in different currencies are "of the same kind" and whether they may thus be set off against each other. The present Article takes its lead from Art. 8 (6) of the EU-Regulation on the Introduction of the Euro, no. 974/98/EC of 3 May 1998 (OJEC 1998, 139/1) which came into force on 1 January 1999. In terms of this regulation, the Euro has become the uniform denomination for those countries that have joined the monetary union. For a transitional period (until 31 December 2001) the former national currencies were regarded as sub-units of the Euro. As a result, set-off was no longer prevented, within the Euro-zone, as a result of the fact that the obligations were expressed in different currencies. This should also be the rule with respect to other currencies. It is in line with the modern view increasingly adopted in the national legal systems since it facilitates set-off without unduly prejudicing the reasonable interests of the creditor of the principal right. The free availability of foreign currency set-off may possibly encourage speculation on fluctuation of the money markets. However, this very fact will normally induce the party most likely to lose out as a result of such fluctuation to give notice of set-off as soon as possible. Since 1 January 2002 the issue of conversion no longer arises within the Euro-zone.

Illustration
A has to pay B a sum of £10,000 for the delivery of a machine. Payment is due on 10 October. On 20 October a right of A against B for payment of €40,000 arising under a loan agreement becomes due. As from 20 October (i.e. the due date of the cross-right), A may effect set-off by giving notice of set-off to B.

B. Exchange rate

Article 8(6) of the Euro Regulation states that any conversion has to be effected "at the conversion rates". "Conversion rate" is defined in Article 1 of the Regulation as "the irrevocably fixed conversion rate adopted for the currency of each participating Member State by the Council according to Article 109 l (4) first sentence (now Art. 123(4) first sentence) of the EC-Treaty". As far as other currencies are concerned, the rate of exchange to be applied should be the unified rate if there is such rate; if not, it should be the buying rate for the currency of the right against which set-off is declared.

NOTES

1. A straightforward solution was the one traditionally adopted in ENGLISH law where foreign currency debts were always converted to pounds sterling at the rate of exchange of the date when they fell due. In the 1975 case of Miliangos v. George Frank (Textiles) Ltd. [1976] AC 443, however, it was held that an English court may give judgment for a sum of money expressed in a foreign currency and that conversion will normally take place at the date when the Court authorises enforcement of the judgment in pounds sterling: Derham, §§ 5.74-5.77. This applies to statutory set-off; the position with regard to equitable set-off still appears to be unclear: Derham, § 5.77 on foreign currency debts in the context of set-off in general. IRISH law generally follows English law on this matter. Contrary to England, Ireland has however joined the monetary union within which the problem no longer arises. SCOTTISH law follows Miliangos: see Commerzbank Aktiengesellschaft v. Large 1977 SC 375. According to the prevailing opinion in GERMAN law, debts in foreign and domestic currency are never "of the same nature". Set-off can consequently only be effected if the parties have so agreed: see, e.g., MünchKomm (- Schlüter), BGB, § 387 no. 32, unless the debtor may also perform in domestic currency under CC § 244. The same view is held in PORTUGAL: Varela, II, 205. There are good reasons for regarding this view as outdated: Gernhuber, 238 ff. (conversion at the date of set-off). FRENCH and BELGIAN legal writers incline towards accepting set-off of debts in different currencies, except where they are not convertible: Malaurie & Aynès no. 123 (for France) and Cornelis, Algemene theorie n. 671 (for Belgium); for the NETHERLANDS, see CC art. 6:129(3) and Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I, n. 534; for ITALY, the possibility of setting off rights in different currencies implicitly results from the rules on payment of pecuniary obligations (CC arts. 1278 ff. see also Bianca, Diritto civile IV, 483, and Cass.civ. 26 aprile 1991, n. 4562, in Foro It., 1991, I, 1151); for AUSTRIA, see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1440, no. 2 (set-off concerning debts in foreign currencies is possible, unless effective payment (Effektivzahlung) has been agreed upon); for GREECE, see Stathopoulos, Law of Obligations, § 24, no. 42, fn. 68 (obligations in different currencies are "of the same kind" and they may therefore be set-off against each other, provided they can be converted to the same currency); for DENMARK, see Gomard, Obligationsret III, 184 (set-off permissible also when the rights are payable in different currencies; an exception is possibly made when one of the currencies is not convertible see PNA §7); for FINLAND see Aurejärvi & Hemmo 185 (claims in different currencies are not regarded to be of the same kind; however, according to art. 7 of the Promissory Notes Act, the debtor may choose to pay a debt in the currency of the place where payment is due – unless there is an agreement to the contrary – and a debtor who has this choice may also use it in the case of set-off); for ESTONIA, see LOA § 197(3) (monetary claims expressed in different currencies may be set off at a freely developed exchange rate calculated as at the date of set-off at the place of business of the party requesting set-off); for a comparative survey, see Wood 24–34. On the legal nature of a foreign currency debt, see Staudinger (-K. Schmidt) § 244, nos. 11 ff; Grothe, 558 ff.; Dullinger, 78 ff. Under POLISH law it is acceptable to set-off a claim expressed in Polish currency with a cross-claim expressed in a foreign currency – see K. Zawada [in] Kodeks cywilny. Komentarz. Tom 1. [ed. K. Pietrzykowski], Warsaw 2004, p. 1270, 1271, see also Supreme Court's judgments of November 16th 2000 (III CZP 39/00, OSN 2001, No 7-8. text 98) and of 11 January 2001 (V CKN 1840/00, OSN 2001, No 7-8, text 114). In SLOVENIAN law no set-off is allowed in cases with a cross-claim expressed in a foreign currency, unless this foreign currency is just a measure of value, see Juhart in Juhart/Plavšak, 391. In SLOVAKIA, this question is provided for only in the OBZ (§362). Pecuniary rights, denominated in different currencies, can only be set off if such currencies are freely convertible. The set-off is accomplished according to the valid median rate of exchange on the day on which the rights became applicable for the set-off. The set-off is accomplished according to the rate of exchange applicable in the place of the registered office, the business, or the residence of the party that manifested the will to set off the rights. Also in CZECH law a set-off of rights denominated in different currencies is regulated for commercial relationships only. Outside of this scope it may be disputed if the receivables are of the same kind and thus compensatable, see Štenglová/Plíva/Tomsa, Commercial Code[11], 1097.

2. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1196.2, in order to proceed to set-off, both rights should be monetary or, if fungible, of the same kind. If the monetary rights are configured in different currencies, set-off is possible as well, unless one of the parties expresses a special interest and preference for one of the currencies (R. Bercovitz (ed.) Comentario; art. 1196).

III.–6:105: Set-off by notice

Set-off is effected by notice to the other party.

COMMENTS

A. The requirement of notice

An informal, unilateral, extrajudicial declaration to the other party is sufficient to declare set-off. If the matter subsequently comes to court, the judgment has a merely declaratory effect: it does not bring about the set-off but merely confirms that it has been brought about. Since a declaration of set-off has the effect of discharging the two obligations as far as they are coextensive (III.–6:107 (Effect of set-off)), it has a direct impact on the legal relationship between the parties. Like other such unilateral rights to alter a legal relationship it cannot be subjected to a condition or time clause (dies). Thus, in particular, it is not possible for a debtor, if all requirements for set-off are met, to declare set-off as from some future date (deferred set-off). On the other hand, however, a debtor whose right is not yet due may declare set-off, but such declaration only takes effect when the right has become due (declaring set-off early).

B. Set-off by agreement

It goes without saying that the parties may, alternatively, effect set-off by agreement. This follows from the general recognition of freedom of contract. In the case of set-off by agreement the parties may derogate from the normal requirements for set-off. Usually, in fact, the parties resort to set-off by agreement if one or other of the normal requirements for set-off is not met. An agreement for a current account implies that the debits and credits will be set off against each other at each balancing of the account.

NOTES

I. Set-off by notice and automatic set-off

1. Since the days of the Glossators two different approaches have been vying with each other in continental Europe (see Zimmermann, Obligations 760 ff.). The one takes its cue from texts like Inst. IV, 6, 30 (…ut actiones ipso iure minuant, ... that the actions should be automatically reduced), the other is based on texts which appear to indicate that set-off has to be raised, or declared. This difference is still reflected in modern legal systems.

2. The first approach finds its clearest expression in the FRENCH CC art. 1290: as soon as two obligations capable of being set off against each other confront each other, both of them are extinguished ipso iure. French courts and legal writers have not, however, found it practical to implement this regime in its most literal and uncompromising form. In reality, the principle set out in art. 1290 is contradicted by other texts (CC arts. 1294, 1295 al. 1, 1299) ; it has not been maintained in the French Avant-projet de réforme du droit des obligations et de la prescription. Set-off is only held to be effective if the defendant raises it in court: see, e.g., Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1311. Strictly speaking, therefore, the automatic discharge of the two obligations confronting each other is subject to a requirement that the defence of set-off be pleaded in court. This regime has also been adopted in LUXEMBOURG and ITALY (CC art. 1242(1)). SCOTLAND is similar but not identical: set-off must be pleaded in court and sustained by judgment before it has effect (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 25.53; Wilson, Scottish Law of Debt[2], no. 13.6). The IRISH approach appears to be similar. See Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Act. s.27(3) and the Rules of Supreme Courts 0.12 R.7. To raise a set-off of deduction a tenant, in an action by the landlord for rent, must give notice to the landlord (see Deale 42). BELGIAN writers sometimes stick to the literal approach of CC art. 1290, but other writers and the court practice follow the same approach as the French.

3. In SPAIN a controversial point relating to the meaning of CC art. 1202 has been resolved by distinguishing between the "trigger" of set-off and the time from which the effect of set-off runs. If parties do not activate set-off, their obligations remain unchanged and the court cannot dismiss a claim founded on them. However, once the parties activate set-off, the rights and obligations are regarded as extinguished as from the time the set-off requirements were met.

4. The second of the approaches mentioned above has found its way into the GERMAN Civil Code: set-off has to be asserted by an extrajudicial, informal and unilateral declaration to the other party (CC § 388, and see von Kübel 1075 ff). It has been followed in AUSTRIAN law (in spite of the fact that CC § 1438 would appears to endorse the ipso iure effect of set-off; see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 103 102 ff; Dullinger 96 ss ff), in GREECE (CC art. 441, on which see Stathopoulos, Law of Obligations, § 24, nos. 47-52, in PORTUGAL (CC art. 848, n. 1, and see Varela II, 214 ff.); SLOVENIA (LOA art. 312); in the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:127, on which see Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I, n. 530) and in ESTONIA (LOA § 198). It also enjoys widespread support in ITALY (Perlingieri, Estinzione 278 ss. Di Prisco, Estinzione, 327; as to case law, Cass. 16 July 2003, n. 11146, in Giur. It. 2004, 1380) and SPANISH law (Díez-Picazo II, 554 ff). SWEDISH, DANISH and FINNISH law also require notice (Lindskog, Kvittning 533 ff., 526 ff; Gomard, Obligationsret III, 182 and 184; Aurejärvi & Hemmo 183), and so does POLISH law: pursuant to CC art. 499, a set-off is effected by a notice made to the other party and has retroactive force from the moment set-off became possible.). Similarly for the CZECH law: "manifestation of the intent to set-off by one party to the other" (CC § 580).

II. Set-off by agreement

5. All legal systems allow set-off by agreement (contractual set-off); ENGLAND (and, following English law, IRELAND): Derham §§ 16.01; SCOTLAND: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 25.53; Wilson, Scottish Law of Debt[2], no. 13.6; GERMANY Gernhuber 326 ff.; AUSTRIA: Dullinger 259 ss ff, Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1438, nos. 31 ff; GREECE: Georgiadis 493, Stathopoulos, Law of Obligations, § 24, no. 26; DENMARK: Gomard III, 219; SPAIN: Díez-Picazo II, 538; Rojo Ajuria 58 f.; Supreme Court, TS 14.6.1971; 7.6.1983; 2.2.1989; ESTONIA: Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Käerdi), § 198, no. 4, PORTUGAL: Varela II, 227 f; comparative overview in Wood 24-43 ff. Cf. also the comprehensive monograph by Berger. On compensation conventionelle, or facultative, in FRANCE, see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1312; and see also art. 1241 of the Avant-projet de réforme du droit des obligations et de la prescrition; in BELGIUM, see Cornelis, Algemene theorie nn. 681-685; in LUXEMBOURG, see Cour d'Appel of 17 March 1999, Pas. Lux., vol. 31, 129. For ITALY, see CC art. 1252 (compensazione volontaria) and Perlingieri, Regolamento compensativo, in Riv. dir. comm. 1974, 75 ff. For POLAND see W.Czachórski et al, Zobowiązania. Zarys wykładu, Warszawa 2004, p. 355. On set-off in current account relationships see Wood 3–1 ff.

(ENGLAND); Berger 173, 285 ff. (GERMANY); CC art. 6:140; LOA §§ 203-205 (ESTONIA); Parlementaire Geschiedenis 517 ff (NETHERLANDS) and Wood 24–36 ff (comparative). In the CZECH REPUBLIC (CC § 581(3) and Ccom § 364) all rights to performance may be subject to set-off on the basis of an agreement, even those which cannot be set-off unilaterally – rights to damages for injury to health, statute-barred rights, unenforceable rights etc.).

6. In SLOVAK law, as an alternative to set-off by a unilateral, extrajudicial declaration, the parties may effect set-off by agreement. In some categories of receivables set-off can be effected only by agreement: § 581(1,2,3): (1) The setting-off is inadmissible against a receivable to compensation of damage caused to health unless the case is a mutual receivable of compensation of damage of the same kind. The setting-off is also not admissible against a receivable that cannot be affected by enforcement of a decision. (2) Statute-barred receivables, receivables not enforceable before court and receivables from deposits cannot be set off. A receivable that is not yet due cannot be set off against a due receivable. (3) On the basis of the parties' agreement, also the receivables mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 2 may be settled by setting off. And §364 provides: “Any mutual claims may be included in the set-off if so agreed by the parties.” And there is a special provision in Ccom § 361: A party, which on the basis of a contract with another party keeps the other party’s current or deposit account, may utilise the pecuniary means in the account only to set off a mutual claim towards the holder of the account according to the contract concerning the keeping of such accounts.

III.–6:106: Two or more rights and obligations

(1) Where the party giving notice of set-off has two or more rights against the other party, the notice is effective only if it identifies the right to which it relates.

(2) Where the party giving notice of set-off has to perform two or more obligations towards the other party, the rules on imputation of performance apply with appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

The party giving notice of set-off may have two or more rights against the other party, or may be exposed to two or more rights of that party, or both. Where the party giving notice has two or more rights, that party has to identify the right, or rights, to which the notice of set-off relates. If this is not done, the notice of set-off is invalid for being insufficiently specific. However, it is not necessary expressly to identify the right, or rights, to which the notice of set-off relates; the intention of the party giving notice of set-off may be inferred from the context or circumstances. If no such intention may be inferred, it must be the party giving notice of set-off who has to bear the risk of uncertainty. Set-off constitutes a form of enforcement of the cross-right and a creditor who has several rights against a debtor must always be sufficiently specific as to which of the rights is being enforced.

Illustration 1
A has three rights for €30 each against B. B has a right for €300 against A. All rights are enforceable. A gives notice of set-off. A has to identify the right to which the notice of set-off relates. If this is not done, the notice of set-off is invalid.

Where the party giving notice of set-off is exposed to two or more rights of the other party, the party giving notice is in the position of a debtor making a payment which could be imputed to one or more obligations. Since giving notice of set-off is a means of discharging an obligation, the rules on imputation of performances should apply with appropriate modifications. This means that the determination by the party declaring set-off is normally decisive. If that party fails to determine to which of the obligations the notice of set-off relates, the other party may make the determination. Failing determination by either party, the normal default rules come into operation. In a number of national legal systems, the party receiving the notice of set-off is given the right to object, without undue delay, to the determination made by the party giving notice of set-off, provided the objecting party is in a position to give notice of set-off. This rule is based on the consideration that the issue of imputation, in the context of set-off, should not depend on which of the parties happens to give notice of set-off first. The provision in the present Article, on the other hand, is based on the desire to encourage set-off.

The situation is the same as in Illustration 1, but B gives notice of set-off. B may determine which of A's three rights is discharged. If B fails to make such determination, A may within a reasonable time make such determination and inform B of the choice. Failing that, the criteria provided in III.–2:110 (Imputation of performance) paragraph (4) apply in the sequence indicated in that Article.

NOTES

1. The regime prevailing most widely in Europe can be summarised as follows: If either of the parties has several rights suitable for set-off, the party giving notice of set-off may determine which of these rights are to be set off against each other. If no such specification is given, or if the other party objects without undue delay, the general rules relating to appropriation of performance apply with appropriate modifications; GERMANY CC § 396; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:137 and see Parlementaire Geschiedenis 512 ff.; AUSTRIA Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1438, no. 17; GREECE CC art. 452; SCOTLAND Wilson, Scottish Law of Debt[2], no. 13.6; PORTUGAL CC art. 855; ESTONIA LOA § 201; and POLAND CC art. 451 in connection with CC art. 503. In legal systems where set-off operates automatically, the first part of this proposition does not, of course, apply and the rules relating to the imputation of performance (with appropriate modifications) apply immediately; FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 1297; ITALY: CC art. 1249; SPAIN: CC art. 1201. For AUSTRIA and the applicability of CC §§ 1415, 1416 see Dullinger, 167 ss. In SLOVAKIA, there are no special provisions, but rules can be deduced from the general provisions about juridical acts: CC § 37 provides that a juridical act must be done in a free way, seriously, definitely and intelligibly; otherwise, it is invalid. Under CZECH law, the party must unambiguously identify the rights to be set-off, otherwise the set-off is not effective (see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 1031).

III.–6:107: Effect of set-off

Set-off extinguishes the obligations, as far as they are coextensive, as from the time of notice.

COMMENTS

A. No retrospective effect

Set-off does not operate retrospectively. It merely has prospective effect: it is effective as from the moment when all substantive requirements for set-off have been met and when the notice of set-off has become effective. Generally speaking, therefore, the situation has to be evaluated as if both obligations had been performed at the moment when set-off was declared. This has the following consequences.

B. Interest

Interest (on both obligations) runs until set-off has been declared. It may therefore be advantageous to the party paying the higher rate of interest to declare set-off on becoming aware of this possibility.

C. Delay in Payment

Concerning delay in payment, the position is as follows. If B under a contract of sale has to pay A a sum of €100,000 on 10 October and fails to pay on that date, B would normally have failed to perform without excuse. A has the option of claiming performance, of claiming damages or, if the non-performance is regarded as fundamental in the circumstances, of terminating for fundamental non-performance. If B fails to declare a set-off or only subsequently becomes aware of the fact that there is a right against A for the same amount, this does not condone B's breach on 10 October.

D. Agreed payment for non-performance

Whether an agreed payment for non-performance has become due from a party who has not exercised the right to give notice of set-off, depends on the interpretation of the relevant clause. Normally, the agreed sum will have to be paid.

Illustration 1
A has to pay back a sum of €10,000, which he had borrowed from B, by 10 October. The parties have agreed that A has to pay an extra amount of €2000 if he fails to return the money by that date. On 1 September A inherits from his aunt C a right of €30,000 against B. He only realises that on 20 December and declares set-off. Since A has failed to make payment on 10 October, B may right the agreed sum of €2000.

E. Payment made after set-off

If payment is made after set-off has been declared it may be reclaimed under the rules on unjustified enrichment since it is payment of what is not due (i.e. there has been a performance without legal ground). If it was made before the declaration of set-off, it has had the effect of extinguishing the obligation and thereby removing the mutuality requirement for set-off. Thus, there is no particular problem about restitution.

F. Prescription of cross-right

On the effect of prescription on the right to declare set-off, see III.–7:503 (Effect on set-off).

G. Extinction only as far as the obligations are coextensive

Set-off extinguishes the obligations only as far as they are coextensive. This means, as far as monetary obligations are concerned, that they are extinguished only to the extent of the smaller one.

Illustration 2
A has a right of €10,000 against B, B has a right of €5000 against A. Notice of set-off by either A or B leads to the result that A's obligation is extinguished entirely, whereas B still owes A €5000.

H. Set-off of part of the cross right

The party declaring set-off may set off only part of the right against the other party. The obligation corresponding to the remaining part of the right will then not be extinguished.

NOTES

I. Automatic effect and retrospectivity

1. Wherever set-off is effective ipso iure (BELGIUM, LUXEMBOURG, and SPAIN), it operates although the parties have no knowledge of it. But even most legal systems which require a notice of set-off attribute retrospective effect to that notice: set-off has the effect that the rights, as far as they are coextensive, are deemed to have been discharged at the moment at which, being suitable for set-off, they first confronted each other. This is the rule adopted in GERMANY (CC § 389), AUSTRIA (Dullinger 147 ss 96 ff.), GREECE (CC art. 441), SLOVENIA (LOA art. 312(2)) the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:129 and Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I, n. 538); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 580; and PORTUGAL (CC art. 854 and Varela II, 224 ff). The position is the same in ITALY where set-off extinguishes both obligations "dal giorno della loro coesistenza" (provided that set-off is raised by a party vis-à-vis the other one) (CC art. 1242(1)). In SLOVAKIA, the CC § 580 provides that the discharge occurs at the moment when the relevant receivables capable to be set off meet each other. Set-off in SCOTLAND (which must be pleaded in court and sustained by judgment before it has effect) also operates retrospectively: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, no. 25.54; Wilson, Scottish Law of Debt[2], no. 13.6. In POLAND the declaration of set-off has retrospective force from the moment set-off became possible (CC art.499). The same holds true also under ESTONIAN law, but with the qualification that if interest has already been paid on one or both of the claims, the set-off has retroactive effect only for the last period for which interest was paid (LOA § 197(2)).
2. Both approaches largely lead to the same practical results. Thus, in particular, it is generally accepted that interest no longer accrues (and where it has been paid it may be reclaimed by means of the condictio indebiti; but cf., for the NETHERLANDS, CC art. 6:129(2)), that neither party can be held to have been in delay (mora debitoris), and that conventional penalties have not become exactable; GERMANY: Gernhuber 309 ff.; ITALY: Dalbosco, La compensazione per atto unilaterale, 365 ff.; the NETHERLANDS: Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I, n. 538 and also CC art. 6:134; AUSTRIA: Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1438, nos. 14, 15. CZECH REPUBLIC: Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 1033.

3. Where a debtor has paid the debt even though it had already been discharged by way of set-off, according to FRENCH and BELGIAN law and the law of LUXEMBOURG the debtor is granted the condictio indebiti only if there was a just cause for not knowing of the claim on account of which the obligation had been discharged (CC art. 1299). In GERMANY, the question has for a long time been disputed (see, e.g., Dernburg 587 ff.); the prevailing view today is that a person who has paid without realising that notice of set-off could have been given cannot make a successful unjustified enrichment claim (Gernhuber 288 ff; for AUSTRIA, see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1438, n. 15 who, however, records a number of dissenting authors; for ITALY, see Di Prisco, Estinzione 324; Perlingieri, Estinzione, 379; cf. also the discussion by Dullinger 162 ff.). In SPAIN, modern writers maintain that a debtor who has paid without realising that there is an enforceable claim against the creditor cannot take advantage of the condictio indebiti (in spite of the fact that CC art. 1202 seems to adopt the ipso iure effect of set-off): Díez-Picazo II, 554.

II. Prospective effect

4. The only legal systems in Western Europe which rely on an informal declaration of set-off but which do not attribute retrospective effect to it are the Nordic ones; for SWEDEN, see Lindskog, Kvittning 533 ff, 526 f; for DENMARK, see Gomard, Obligationsret III, 207; for FINLAND, see Aurejärvi & Hemmo 183. Somewhat surprisingly, in view of this, Swedish and Finnish law also know a rule which mirrors CC § 390(2) [see now § 215 since 1 Jan. 2002] ("Prescription does not exclude set-off, if the claim barred by prescription had not prescribed at the time at which it could have been set-off against the other claim"): Preskriptionslag § 10; Decree on Prescription 1868 § 5. It does not correspond with the general prospective effect of set-off in Swedish law and is therefore the subject of criticism: Lindskog, Kvittning 115 ff; for DENMARK, see Gomard, Obligationsret III, 207. However, for rights arising from the same legal relationship set-off, in certain respects, operates retrospectively. Interest will not accrue from the moment when the two rights could have been set off against each other; also set-off is not excluded if the cross-claim had prescribed before the notice of set-off was given; see Supreme Court, Ugeskrift for Retsvaesen 1956, 598; Gomard, Obligationsret III, 207. ENGLISH (and probably also IRISH) law also merely attributes prospective effect to set-off: it takes effect on and from the date of judgment. In GERMANY and AUSTRIA, retrospectivity has recently come in for criticism: see P. Bydlinski, AcP (1996) 196, 281 ff; Dullinger 174 ss ff, 182 ss ff; Zimmermann, Fs. Medicus 721 ff. It is not based on convincing rational arguments but rather constitutes an unreflected continuation of a thinking pattern of the ius commune, based upon Justinian's obscure pronouncements on the ipso iure effect of set-off (Inst. IV, 6, 30; cf. also C. 4, 31, 14; and see Zimmermann, FS Medicus 724; Pichonnaz, (2000) 68 TR 541 ff. Prospectivity appears to be the more natural rule and leads to entirely satisfactory results. In SLOVAKIA, the extent of set-off is regulated in CC § 580, see previous notes. The discharge occurs at the moment when the rights which are capable of being set off meet each other.

III.–6:108: Exclusion of right of set-off

Set-off cannot be effected:

(a) where it is excluded by agreement;

(b) against a right to the extent that that right is not capable of attachment; and

(c) against a right arising from an intentional wrongful act.

A. Exclusion by agreement

Following the general principle of freedom of contract, the right of set-off may be excluded by agreement, subject to the normal limitations on private autonomy (e.g. the rules dealing with unfair standard terms). For example, a contract between a lawyer and a bank might ring-fence the lawyer's client accounts with a bank so as to prevent set-off by the bank against the lawyer's personal debts to the bank. It is a question of interpretation whether an agreement to exclude set-off refers only to rights arising from a specific legal relationship or to all rights between the parties.

B. Right not capable of attachment

Set-off should not deprive a person of rights (such as those for maintenance or wages) which provide a minimum level of subsistence. The simplest, most appropriate and most comprehensive way of dealing with this issue is to prohibit set-off to the extent that the principal right is not capable of attachment. Whether, and to what extent, the principal right is capable of attachment is decided by the law applicable to that issue.

C. Right arising from an intentional wrongful act

A creditor who is unable to collect what is due may be tempted to resort to self-help. The usual textbook example of a disappointed creditor feeling free to assault the debtor (secure in the knowledge that he will be able to set off his unpaid right against the debtor's right for damages) may not appear to be practically relevant. More realistic is the situation where the creditor holds some object belonging to the debtor and proceeds wrongfully to sell that object in order to satisfy the debt out of the proceeds. In those legal systems which do not allow the attachment of rights arising from delict, sub-paragraph (b) of the Article would already have the effect of excluding set-off.

D. Liability for unpaid calls

In some national legal systems it is regarded as desirable to prohibit contributories to a company from setting off the company's debt to them against their liability for unpaid calls. Such a rule serves to safeguard the interest of the company's creditors in the undiminished capital fund of the company but belongs in company law rather than in the general rules on set-off.

NOTES

I. Exclusion by agreement

1. It is recognised everywhere that set-off may be excluded by contract; ENGLAND: Derham § 5.78 ff.; IRELAND: Hegarty & Sons Ltd. v. Royal Liver Friendly Society [1985] IR 524; SCOTLAND: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 25.53 and 25.56, Wilson para. 13.6; FRANCE: François, Les Obligations, Régime Général, n° 79; Cornelis, Algemene theorie n. 678 (p. 879 bottom); LUXEMBOURG: Cour d´Appel, 1 October 1963, Pas. Lux. vol. 19, 209; GERMANY: Gernhuber 274 ff.; ITALY: Bianca, Diritto civile IV, 491; NETHERLANDS: Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I, n. 531; AUSTRIA: Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 105 103; Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1440, no. 29 ss; there are, however, certain restrictions on the exclusion of set-off by agreement, if a consumer is involved (see ConsProtA § 6(1) no 8 , n. 29; Scotland: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 25.57 f; SWEDEN: Lindskog, Kvittning 303 f.; DENMARK: Gomard, Obligationsret III, 196 (exceptions apply with regard to leases of land and consumer contracts where the tenant's and the consumer's right to set-off cannot be excluded); FINLAND: Aurejärvi & Hemmo 192; and the CZECH REPUBLIC: Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 1035. According to the GREEK CC art. 450(2) the debtor may waive in advance – even unilaterally – the right of set-off. Although not expressly regulated in the SLOVENIAN LOA this is recognised by doctrine and case law, see Juhart in Juhart/Plavšak, 409.

II. Claim not capable of attachment

2. Nearly all legal systems also ensure that set-off should not be allowed to deprive a person of rights which provide a minimum level of subsistence; FRANCE and BELGIUM: CC art. 1293, n. 3, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1302 (for France) and Cornelis, Algemene theorie n. 674 (for Belgium); GERMANY CC § 394 and Gernhuber 261 ff.; ITALY CC art. 1246, n. 3 and Bianca, Diritto civile IV, 489 ff; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:135(a) and Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht n. 552; SLOVENIA LOA art. 316(1); SPAIN: CC art. 1200(2); POLAND CC art. 505; PORTUGAL: CC art. 853, n.1-b (except where both rights are not capable of attachment); AUSTRIA: Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 105 103 and Dullinger 121 ss ff.; GREECE CC art. 451; SWEDEN Lindskog, Kvittning 247 ff., 283; DENMARK Gomard, Obligationsret III, 196; FINLAND: Aurejärvi & Hemmo 192 ff; ESTONIA: LOA § 200(1) 2); concerning ENGLISH (and probably IRISH) law, see Wood 12–04 ff; and the CZECH REPUBLIC: CC § 581(1).

III. Claim arising from a wilful delict

3. The rule concerning wilful delicts (dating back to C. 4, 31, 14, 2; on which see Dernburg 511 ff.) is found, in some form or other, in many legal systems. The FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs contain a fairly literal version of the Roman rule: set-off may not take place as far as concerns a claim for restitution of an object of which the owner was unlawfully deprived: CC art. 1293, n. 1 and Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1302; cf. also for ITALY CC art. 1246, n. 1; and, for AUSTRIA, CC § 1440. The GERMAN CC has generalised the underlying idea: set-off is not permissible against a right arising from a wilful delict: CC § 393 and Gernhuber 259 ff.; rules along the same, or very similar, lines can be found in the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:135(b)); POLAND: CC art. 505; PORTUGAL (CC art. 853, n.1-a); GREECE (CC art. 450(1)); ESTONIA (LOA § 200(1) 1)); SLOVENIAN LOA art.

316(3); SWEDEN (Lindskog, Kvittning 258 ff.) and FINLAND (Supreme Court 1969 II 90 and 1995: 196). ENGLISH and IRISH law do not have this rule; but see Wood 12–127 ff for certain "latent expressions" of it. The CZECH CC refers to “delicts causing damage to health” (which of course need not be wilful): CC § 581(1) provides that rights to damages for injury to health cannot be unilaterally set-off, unless the cross-right is of the same kind.

IV. Liability for unpaid calls

4. Most legal systems prohibit contributories to a company from setting off the company’s debt to them against their liability for unpaid calls, though there are a number of differences in detail. But this is widely seen to be a matter of company law. For ENGLAND: Wood 12–127 ff and Derham § 8.50 ff; for GERMANY: Gernhuber 270 ff; for AUSTRIA: Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1440, no. 28; for ITALY: Nappi, Contributo, 136 ff.

V. Other exceptions

5. In POLAND (CC art.505), set-off cannot be effected with respect to claims for providing means of subsistence or claims in respect of which set-off is excluded by specific regulations. Similar restrictions can be found in ESTONIAN law (LOA § 200(1) 1) and 3); additionally, claims for compensation for damage arising from bodily injury or the death of a person cannot be set off (LOA § 200(1) 1)). Also, LOA § 202 prohibits set off by the party who has to perform a contractual obligation for the benefit of a third party (with an exception for insurance contracts in LOA § 456). In SPAIN CC art. 1200 bars setting off debts arising out of deposit or gratuitous loan (comodato). In SLOVENIA the LOA art. 316(5) bars setting off claims arising from the statutory maintenance right. In SLOVAKIA, an exclusion is given in CC § 581 according to which: (1) set-off is inadmissible against a right to compensation for damage caused to health unless the other right is to compensation for damage of the same kind. Set-off is also not admissible against a right which cannot be affected by enforcement of a decision. CZECH law in addition excludes the unilateral set-off of rights which cannot be asserted in court (e.g. rights to winnings from unlicensed bets and games) and bank deposits (CC § 581(2); funds in a current or deposit account may be subject to a set-off by the bank only against reciprocal rights which arose under the bank account contract (Ccom § 361).

Section 2: Merger of debts

III.–6:201: Extinction of obligations by merger

(1) An obligation is extinguished if the same person becomes debtor and creditor in the same capacity.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not, however, apply if the effect would be to deprive a third person of a right.

COMMENTS

Paragraph (1) contains a widely recognised rule of evident utility. If the same person becomes debtor and creditor in the same capacity the relevant obligation is extinguished. Paragraph (2) provides an exception to this rule where the effect of extinction by merger would be to deprive a third person of a right.

NOTES

1. SCOTTISH law has a doctrine of confusio extinguishing obligations (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, nos. 25.30-25.31). ENGLISH law also recognises that an obligation may be extinguished if the obligation and the corresponding right become vested in the same person: See Halsbury's Laws of England IX(1)[4], no. 1065.
2. According to the SPANISH CC art. 1192 a right is extinguished when the debtor and creditor merge, irrespective of how this happens. Sureties also can rely on this extinction (art. 1193). The same applies under the SLOVENIAN LOA art. 328. According to DUTCH the same rules apply with minor exceptions (art. 6:160).
3. The AUSTRIAN CC § 1445 also provides that the obligation generally ceases to exist when debtor and creditor merge. This does not apply when the debtor inherits the property of the creditor, as the right is then a right of the assets of the deceased. But also in the vice versa situation that the creditor becomes the heir of the debtor, the former can ask for the separation of the assets which in consequence does not lead to the extinction of the obligation. The third exception regards rights that are registered in the public books. These continue to exist (see CC § 1446).
4. The ESTONIAN LOA § 186(3) recognizes merger as a basis for extinction of a debt. LOA § 206(1) sent. 2 further specifies that extinction does not result from the merger if the person has legitimate interest in the continuation of the debt. If a pledge or other real right is established with regard to a claim, the claim remains in force with regard to the pledgee or the person holding the real right regardless of merger (with the result that the pledgee has become a creditor of the claim), LOA § 206(3). Regulation of merger does not apply to claims arising from securities (LOA § 206(4)).
5. According to GREEK Law, CC art. 453, an obligation is extinguished by merger when the capacities of the creditor and debtor have been united in the same person. The obligation revives when this union ceases to exist (for examples, see Stathopoulos, no. 243). However, rights of a third person on the extinguished right (such as pledge or usufruct of the right) are maintained (see Stathopoulos, Law of Obligations, § 24, no 57).

6. In SLOVAKIA if the right and obligation merge in one person in any way, the right and obligation are extinguished unless an act stipulates otherwise. (CC § 584)

7. Under FRENCH and BELGIAN law, the right is also extinguished when the debtor and the creditor in the same legal relationship merge in one and the same person (CC art. 1300). Such mergers occur with respect to physical persons, particularly in successions, but with respect also to legal persons as in the case of mergers of companies. The extinction of the obligation brings about the extinction of its accessories, including securities, as provided by CC art. 1301 ("the merger which affects the principal debtor extends to its guarantors"). In the case of plurality of creditors or of debtors, the extinction may only be partial in so far as the merger only affects one of them. It may be emphasised that legal authors regard merger more as a form of paralysis or parenthesis than of complete extinction of the obligation (See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[11], 1338, no. 1414).

8. For CZECH law, see CC § 584: the merger applies strictly in every case when one person acquires the positions of both debtor and creditor.

9. In HUNGARY under CC § 322 an obligation is extinguished if the same person becomes the debtor and the creditor. Extinction does not affect the rights and obligations of third persons.

CHAPTER 7: PRESCRIPTION

Section 1: General provision

III.–7:101: Rights subject to prescription

A right to performance of an obligation is subject to prescription by the expiry of a period of time in accordance with the rules in this Chapter.

COMMENTS

A. Terminology and meaning of prescription

In traditional civilian terminology the term "prescription" comprehends (i) the acquisition of title to property as a result of the lapse of time ("acquisitive prescription") and (ii) the loss of a right as a result of the lapse of time ("extinctive prescription"). Predominantly, however, the combination of both types of prescription under one doctrinal umbrella is no longer regarded as helpful since they are largely governed by different rules. This Chapter deals only with the latter type of prescription. The term "extinctive" prescription, however, is incorrect in the present context because, under the rules set out in this Chapter, the right is not extinguished. It continues to exist but the debtor is granted a right to refuse performance; see III.–7:501 (General effect) paragraph (1). More appropriate, though not very descriptive, is the terminology of Scottish law ("negative prescription"). An alternative would be "liberative prescription". Another possibility would be "limitation of rights", i.e., a transposition into terms of substantive law of the English concept of "limitation of actions". For the sake of simplicity and since these rules do not deal with acquisitive prescription the term "prescription" is generally used without any qualifying adjective.

In the Articles the term “prescription” refers to the legal effect on the right of the lapse of time. Prescription occurs at a precise moment. The term “period of prescription” refers to the period on the expiry of which prescription occurs.

B. Prescription of rights to performance

Central to the institution of prescription is the notion of a right to performance of an obligation. Prescription is thus conceived as an institution of substantive law: because of the lapse of time the debtor is entitled to refuse performance. If the debtor does so, the creditor effectively loses the right to demand performance. As a result, of course, the creditor can no longer pursue the right in court. But prescription does not only limit the right to bring an action: it bars the actual right to receive performance. Thus, for instance, where a debtor invokes prescription against a demand to pay, and where all requirements for prescription are met, the debtor is no longer delaying payment and therefore no longer suffers the consequences attaching to non-performance of an obligation.

Since prescription applies only to rights to performance of an obligation, it does not affect a party's right to give notice of avoidance, to terminate for fundamental non-performance, or to affect a legal relationship in any other way. The specific rules governing such rights generally require them to be exercised within a reasonable time. (On such special time limits, see also D, below.)

C. Right to withhold performance and right to reduce the price

The right to withhold performance is also not subject to prescription. This means that the right to withhold performance is still available even if the prescription period for the right on which it is based has run out.

> Illustration
> A has sold a car to B. The car has to be delivered on 10 October 1996, the purchase price has to be paid on 10 December of the same year. The prescription period for both rights is three years. After three years, B has still not received the car. If B sues A for the car after 10 October, A can raise the defence of prescription. If A, in turn, sues B for the purchase price on 10 November, B may exercise the right to withhold performance; it remains unaffected by the prescription of B's own right against A. After 10 December, B can raise the defence of prescription against A's claim.

The right to reduce the price is also not subject to prescription. If a party, as a result of having accepted a performance not conforming to a contract, has such a right of reduction, it may be exercised when the other party demands payment. The right to payment itself, of course, is subject to the normal rules of prescription. If the party entitled to reduce the price has already paid a sum exceeding the reduced price, the excess may be recovered from the other party. This right to payment of the overpaid amount is subject to the normal rules of prescription.

D. Range of application

This Chapter applies not only to contractual rights but also to other rights to performance. It would be unjustifiable in theory, and productive of difficulty and inconvenience in practice (see the Comments to III.–7:201 (General period)) to apply the rules on prescription only to some rights to performance. On the other hand, it does not appear to be advisable to cover other types of asset or right, such as property rights or the right to marry or the right to be an heir or executor. Here we are often dealing with the protection of absolute rights (such as the right of ownership). If they were subject to prescription, this would entail a considerable, and arguably unjustifiable, qualification of the absolute right. Thus, it may be maintained that rights arising from absolute rights should only perish with the absolute right itself. Also, within the law of property there will have to be a careful co-ordination with the law of acquisitive prescription, or usucaption. At the same time, the law on rights to performance of obligations is a sufficiently broad and distinct area of the law to warrant a special set of rules. The comparative evidence points in the same direction: most modern prescription regimes apply, expressly or at least effectively, to the law of obligations.

These rules contain a number of time limits (e.g. for acceptance; for a notice of avoidance; for a notice of termination for non-performance; and for the right to seek specific performance). These time limits do not constitute prescription periods. However, some of the rules contained in this Chapter (e.g. III.–7:303 (Suspension in case of impediment beyond creditor's control)) express policies which are also relevant in assessing whether an acceptance has been declared, or a notice of avoidance or of termination has been given, or specific performance has been sought, within a reasonable time from the moment set out in the relevant provisions.

The rules contained in this Chapter do not rule out the possibility that a party may be barred from pursuing a right even before the period of prescription has run out. This may be the case if the party has engendered reasonable reliance in the other party that the right would no longer be pursued and if the decision to pursue the right would therefore constitute a breach of the principle of good faith and fair dealing.

E. Underlying policy considerations

Prescription is based, essentially, on three policy considerations. (1) Protection must be granted to a debtor who, in view of the "obfuscating power of time" (Windscheid and Kipp, § 105 (p. 544)), finds it increasingly difficult to defend an action. (2) Lapse of time demonstrates an indifference of the creditor towards the right which, in turn, may engender a reasonable reliance in the debtor that no claim will be pursued. (3) Prescription prevents long drawn-out litigation about claims which have become stale. Thus, prescription aims, in a very special way, at legal certainty. Even well-founded claims may be defeated, but that is the necessary price a legal system has to pay for the benefits of prescription. The need for legal certainty must, however, be balanced against the reasonable interests of the creditor. Since prescription can effectively amount to an act of expropriation, the creditor must have had a fair chance of pursuing the claim. This consideration is taken account of, particularly, by the suspension ground provided in III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance)

In spite of its potential for causing harsh results in individual cases, prescription is generally regarded as an indispensable feature of a modern legal system.

NOTES

I. General

1. All European legal systems recognise that rights and obligations can be affected by the lapse of time. On the history of the law of prescription, see Coing I, 183 ff; Coing II, 280 ff; Johnston para. 1.13 ff; Oetker 12 ff.

II. Substantive or procedural?

2. The functional equivalent to liberative prescription in ENGLISH and IRISH law is limitation of actions. This is procedural in nature: limitation does not affect the right but merely the ability to pursue that right in court. This approach is by no means alien to the civilian tradition, and indeed there are still conflicting texts and views in some jurisdictions, but the prevailing doctrine today in most continental European countries is that prescription is a matter of substantive law and that the obligation itself is extinguished. See e.g. Marty & Raynaud, Obligations II, nn. 341 ff.; Ferid & Sonnenberger (1 C 246); Spiro, Begrenzung § 241; Storme, in: Hondius 47. In SCOTTISH law prescription extinguishes obligations but a limitation system like that of England has been introduced in respect of personal injuries cases (Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973; see Johnston, passim).). Lipstein (n. 29) has noted that prescription in all modern European legal systems contains elements both of substantive and procedural law; cf. also Staudinger(-Peters) § 194, n. 4. In POLAND, the obligation which is subject to prescription does not extinguish, but it can no longer be brought up in a court action, unless the debtor has waived the right to rely on prescription (CC 117 § 2). Also, a debtor who performs an obligation after it has prescribed cannot claim back as undue anything supplied by virtue of the performance.

Under ESTONIAN law, prescription is a matter of substantive law, creating a right to refuse to perform the obligation after expiry of the period of prescription (GPCCA §§ 142(1), 143); the obligation itself is not extinguished. In CZECH law both procedural prescription (prescription stricto sensu) and substantive prescription (preclusion) are recognized (CC art. 100.1 and art. 583). The same holds true for ITALY (see arts. 2934 and 2940 CC, as well as the discussion in Vitucci, 27 ff. PORTUGUESE law knows another institution (caducity, "caducidade", CC arts. 328 ff), which is similar to the English limitation of actions, but the distinction between prescription and caducity is not always clear (Fernandes, Teoria geral do direito civil, II, 661 ff). In practice, caducity applies when a legal rule, without reference to prescription, establishes a time limit for exercising a right (CC art. 298, 2). Caducity is not subject to suspension or interruption (CC art. 328). According to the SLOVAK CC § 100(1) the obligation subject to prescription is not extinguished. However the right cannot be adjudicated upon by a court if the debtor raises an objection based on prescription once the right has prescribed. Performing voluntarily the prescribed obligation does not give rise to an unjustified enrichment.

3. The UNCITRAL Convention on the Limitation Period in the International Sale of Goods (in force 1 August 1988 but only ratified so far by 17 states, none belonging to the European Union) attempts "to sit on the fence": Smit, (1975) 23 AJCL 339; cf. also Boele-Woelki 112 ff. It uses the term "limitation" but talks of "claims" which can no longer be exercised. The qualification of prescription as substantive or procedural used to be important for private international law but the Rome Convention on the Law Applicable to Contractual Obligations has come down in favour of a substantive characterisation (art. 10(1)(d)). See also Chapter 10 of the UNIDROIT Principles and Bonell, Limitation Periods, 520 ff)

III. Prescription of rights but not defences etc

4. Prescription of defences raises difficult problems doctrinally. Under the ius commune, defences were widely regarded as not being subject to prescription. This principle is still accepted in a number of jurisdictions; see for FRANCE, Ferid & Sonnenberger 1 C 249; for BELGIUM, Storme, in: Hondius 44; for GREECE CC art. 273; for POLAND (CC 117§1 - pecuniary claims subject to prescription). The same applies under the SLOVENIAN LOA art. 335(1). The position is, essentially, the same in ENGLAND as a result of the fact that only the remedy and not the right is barred. Most legal systems do not have a general rule, but some have specific provisions in terms of which defences may, under certain circumstances, survive prescription of the right on which they are based. See Spiro, Begrenzung § 215; for ITALY, see Cass. Sez. III 28.7.1987, n. 6542, in Giust. civ. 1988, I, 456; more recently, Cass. Sez. II 5.5.2003 no. 6755 and the discussion in Vitucci 63 ff. Sometimes a distinction is drawn between independent defences and defences based upon a right (for SPAIN, see TS 12.3.1965; Diéz-Picazo & Gullón Ballesteros, 467). Independent defences are not subject to prescription: others are. For GERMANY, see Münchener Kommentar (-von Feldmann) § 194, n. 24. Generally on prescription of defences (and the effect of prescription of rights on defences), see Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 215 ff, 540.

5. The matter of most practical relevance appears to be the right to withhold performance (cf. Article 9:201 PECL). For GERMANY, see CC § 215; for PORTUGAL, see CC art. 430; for DENMARK, see Gomard, Obligationsret III, 232; for the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:56; for AUSTRIA see Dullinger, Handbuch der Aufrechnung, 165 s (regarding set-off).

IV. Range of application

6. Most national laws give rules on prescription a wide application. The GERMAN rules relating to liberative prescription (CC §§ 195 ff) are based on the notion of Anspruchsverjährung and cover a much wider ground than the law of obligations. For criticism, see Peters & Zimmermann 186, 287 and Zimmermann/Leenen/Mansel/Ernst, 2001 JZ 684, 693. Similarly to German law, the ESTONIAN notion of aegumine (GPCCA § 142ff.) covers the right to require performance of an act or omission from another person (claim) irrespective of the basis of the claim (i.e. incl. claims based on property law, family law and succession law). The ITALIAN CC art. 2934 refers to the extinction of rights, without any qualification, but arts. 948(3) and 533(2) exempt rei vindicatio and hereditatis petitio from prescription. The situation in SLOVENIAN law is the same as in Italian law. The PORTUGUESE prescription rules apply not only to obligations but, in principle, to any right (CC art. 298(1)). According to the AUSTRIAN CC § 1451, prescription leads to the loss of a "right" but the exceptions provided in §§ 1458 ss ff make it clear that prescription effectively relates to rights based on an obligation. The long negative prescription (20 years) in SCOTTISH law applies to all rights and obligations that have become enforceable but there is a list of imprescriptible rights and obligations as well as special regimes for defective products and personal injuries and death (Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 ss. 7, 17, 22A-22D, Sch.3); in addition its short negative prescription (5 years) applies to a limited group of obligations, including those arising from breach of contract, non-contractual liability for damage (unless for personal injuries or death, where, as noted above, a limitation system operates) unjustified enrichment and negotiorum gestio (1973 Act, s. 6 and Sch.1). In the NETHERLANDS, the CC arts. 3:306 ff refers to rechtsvorderingen; on which concept see Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I, nn. 638 ff.; the same is true of BELGIUM, see CC arts. 2262 and 2262bis and Claeys, 1998-99 R.W. 386 f. Generally, see Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 334 ff. For DENMARK, see Danske Lov art. 5.14.4, which refers to "instruments of debt", but which applies to all claims not covered by the numerous exceptions provided in the Act no 274 of 22 Dec. 1908, which applies to ‘claims ‘(fordringer). In SPANISH CC art. 1930, prescription extents to any right and action.

7. Regarding the range of application, the SLOVAK law refers to all property rights (except for rights of ownership) being subject to prescription (CC § 100(2)). In commercial relationships (Ccom § 387(2)) all rights arising from contractual relationships are subject to prescription, with the exception of the right to cancel a contract concluded for an indefinite period of time.

V. Underlying policy considerations

8. For a discussion of underlying policy considerations, see Savigny, 267 ff.; Story, no. 576; English Law Commission Consultation Paper No. 151 on Limitation of Actions, 11 ff.; Andrews, (1998) 57 Camb.L.J. 590; Johnston, paras. 1.40 ff; Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 3 ff.; Staudinger(-Peters), BGB, Pref. to §§ 194 ff, nos. 5 ff; Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I n. 653; Loubser, 22 ff; Zimmermann, 2000 JZ 853 ff.

Section 2: Periods of prescription and their commencement

III.–7:201: General period

The general period of prescription is three years.

COMMENTS

A prescription regime has to be as simple, straightforward and uniform as possible. This is why the Chapter lay down a general period of prescription covering all rights to performance of an obligation.

A. The argument for uniformity

One of the functions of the law of prescription is to prevent costly and long-drawn out law-suits (ut sit finis litium). It would therefore be intolerable if the prescription rules themselves gave rise to excessive litigation on the question whether or not prescription had occurred in a particular case. Wherever a rule lays down a period of prescription for a specific type of right, it is necessary to define that type of right. The concepts used in any such definition, however, are open to interpretation. At the same time, any type of right described in one provision will be bordering on other rules providing for different periods of prescription. Every creditor against whom the shorter of the two periods has run out will thus be tempted to argue that the right falls under the provision with the longer period, and the courts will then have to determine where exactly the line between the two provisions must be drawn. If one of the prescription rules is regarded as objectionable, there is the added danger that courts and legal writers may be tempted to distort the concepts used in these rules and to redefine the borderline between, for instance, different types of contract from the point of view of prescription rather than from a general perspective.

Moreover, there do not appear to be any general criteria which would be both sufficiently clear and convincing to provide a basis for a differentiated prescription regime, at least not within the law of obligations. Thus, one might want to subject rights arising from everyday transactions, or of a petty nature, to shorter periods of prescription than complex or extraordinary rights. But it is impossible to draw a plausible borderline and to define this borderline in precise statutory terms. Another potential point of reference might be the professional position of the creditor or debtor. But any regulation based on it would either be very casuistic and in permanent danger of being outdated, or too abstract and general (and thus open to conflicting interpretation). Moreover, any such differentiation would only appear to make sense as far as the right to performance under a contract and possibly also a right to damages for breach of contract are concerned. It is much less convincing for other rights arising ex lege, with the handling of which even a professional person often has little experience.

The most common criterion employed in the context of differentiated periods of prescription is the (legal) nature of the right. But this criterion, too, does not ultimately appear to be suitable. Whether or not prescription has occurred is a question which often has to be determined at a time when the legal position between the parties is unclear. It may be doubtful whether a contract is valid. The creditor does not, therefore, know whether there is a right to specific performance, to damages, or to redress of unjustified enrichment. Or a contract may lie on the borderline between sale and lease, or sale and the contract for work, or the contract for work and the contract of service. Or the creditor's right to damages may be based on contract or on the fact that damage has been caused by another in a non-contractual situation or on culpa in contrahendo, wherever that may fit in. Hardly any right within the law of obligations can be dealt with in isolation. This interconnectedness is of particular relevance with regard to the law of prescription – with the result, inter alia, that differentiated periods of prescription tend to lead to inconsistencies in result and evaluation.

Thus, for instance, rights to reversal of an unjustified enrichment arising as a result of the invalidity of a contract should not prescribe within a longer period than contractual rights to specific performance: the "obfuscating power of time" hits the debtor as hard in the one case as in the other. At the same time, it would be inadvisable to differentiate between contractual restitution rights and those based on unjustified enrichment, or between the different types of unjustified enrichment rights. Unjustified enrichment, moreover, is frequently an alternative to benevolent intervention (negotiorum gestio). Also, there is so often a concurrence between rights based on unjustified enrichment and rights based on damage caused by another in a non-contractual situation that they should be subject to the same prescription regime. Rights of the latter type are so closely related to culpa in contrahendo (fault in the process of contracting) or to contractual rights for consequential loss that no distinction should be drawn here either; and rights to damages for non-performance should not, at any rate, be subject to a longer period of prescription than the right to specific performance in view of the aggravated problems of proof. In this way nearly all important types of right are interconnected with each other. This is also the reason why the prescription rules should not be tailored specifically to contractual rights. If prescription rules are to conform to the general policy objectives mentioned in the Comments to III.–7:101 (Rights subject to prescription), they cannot attempt to provide the best possible regime for each individual type of right but must be applicable as broadly as possible. In particular, they have to take account of the need for clarity, certainty and predictability which is jeopardised by any unnecessary complexity. Thus, on balance, it is better to have a regime that does not suit all rights equally well than one that makes it difficult for debtors as well as creditors to assess their position and adjust their behaviour accordingly.

It is also not advisable to lay down (as some codifications do) a special rule for rights to periodical performances. The range of such rights is difficult to define. Moreover, the need for a special rule has to be evaluated against the background of a very long general period of prescription (e.g. thirty years). In the Chapter, however, the general period is only three years.

The general period laid down in the Chapter covers all rights to performance of obligations. It has been pointed out above that any differentiation within this area of the law may easily lead to inconsistency and distortion. Rights of a different nature arising in other areas of the law (especially property law, family law and succession) are not covered by this Chapter.

B. International trends

If we look at the development of the law of prescription, at new enactments and drafts proposed, over the past hundred years we find (i) a trend towards shorter periods of prescription and (ii) a trend towards uniform periods of prescription. And while modern European legal systems still recognise a large variety of periods, ranging from six months to thirty years, more and more rights in more and more countries are subject to a prescription period of between two and six years; and there is a growing conviction that the general period should be somewhere between these poles. To a certain extent the choice is arbitrary. But if a third international trend is also kept in mind, namely the increasing recognition of the discoverability criterion (see III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance)), a period closer to the lower rather than the upper end of this spectrum should be chosen. For as long as a legal system makes sure that the period of prescription does not run against a creditor who does not know, and cannot reasonably know, of the claim, it may expect the creditor to act reasonably expeditiously. Three years is the period provided in an important act of European legislation - the Product Liability Directive (85/374/EWG) art. 10 - and it appears to be more and more accepted as a general standard within EU legislation.

NOTES

I. Criticism of unnecessary complexity

1. Unnecessary complexity in prescription rules has been widely criticised: see Spiro, Begrenzung § 259; Hondius, in: Hondius, 15 ff; Loubser 24. Similar criticism has been made in ENGLAND and in FRANCE: see Law Commission Consultation Paper on Limitation of Actions, 241 ff; Bénabent 123 ff. The BELGIAN Constitutional Court has even held that inconsistencies, based on widely diverging periods of prescription, may constitute an act of unconstitutional discrimination: see M.E. Storme, (1997) 5 ERPL 82 ff.; Claeys, 1998-99 R.W. 379 ff. ; since then, many prescription periods have come under scrutiny by the Constitutional Court and several divergencies have been declared unconstitutional. But cf. also Andrews, (1998) 57 Camb.L.J. 596.

II. Long general periods: complex regimes

2. A number of European legal systems have long general periods coupled with many different shorter periods for special situations, leading to complex regimes. The general prescription period in the GREEK CC is twenty years (art. 249) but for many important rights the code lays down much shorter periods; cf., e.g., arts. 250, 554, 937). The ITALIAN CC has a general prescription period of ten years but recognises shorter periods for a whole range of important rights (arts. 2946 - 2956). There is a twenty year period, however, for certain property rights; see CC arts. 954(4), 970, 1014 no. 1, 1073 (see Roselli – Vitucci, 471 ff). In the NETHERLANDS there is a general twenty year period (CC art. 3:306) but this is only nominally the general period. Effectively the general period is the five year period prescribed in arts. 3:307 (performance of a contractual obligation), 3:308 (payments of interest, liferents, dividends, etc.), 3:309 (unjustified enrichment), 3:310 (damages) and 3:311 (right of action to set aside a contract for failure to perform or a right of action to correct such failure). Under the PORTUGUESE CC, the general period of prescription is twenty years (art. 309) but a number of shorter periods are recognised (e.g. five years in art. 310). For extra-contractual liability for damage and unjustified enrichment a three-year period applies (arts. 498, 482). Before the reform of the law on prescription (17 June 2008), the FRENCH CC had a general prescription period of thirty years. For many situations, however, a ten year period applied, in particular for obligations involving merchants (Ccom art. 189 bis), for certain actions against a contractor (CC art. 2270) and for actions based on extra-contractual liability (CC art. 2270-1, since the law of 5 July 1985); cf. also the law of 10 July 2000, art. 30, al. 3, concerning liability for sales at public auctions. The CC also recognised various shorter periods (five, three and two years, one year, six months: arts. 2271 ff) Under the new law on prescription, the general period of prescription is 5 years (new CC art. 2224). Although one of the objectives of the reform was to reduce specific periods of prescription, many of them have been maintained, either in the CC (arts. 2225, 2226, 2227) or outside the Code in other codes or statutes. On the other hand, the specific periods of CC arts. 2271-22278 have disappeared. The position in LUXEMBOURG is essentially the same as the pre-2008 French law, but for actions based on extra-contractual liability the general period of thirty years still applies. Under the AUSTRIAN CC (1811) the general period of prescription is thirty years, but there are numerous shorter periods, mainly of three years (for criticism, see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 226 ss 200). SPAIN has a general period of fifteen years (CC art. 1964 in fine (1889). Nonetheless there are several special prescription periods (thirty, twenty, six, five, three years and one year under the CC arts. 1963-1968 and five, four, three and two years, one year and six months under the Ccom arts. 945-954). In DANISH law there is a general period of twenty years (art. 5.14.4 Danske Lov of 1683), but the Law no. 274 of 22 December 1908 provides a period of five years for many common claims, such as claims arising from sale of goods and services, leases, interest and from non-contractual relationships (torts and conditio indebiti). Also, in CATALONIA there is a general period ten years and any shorter periods for especial rights (arts. 121-20 to 121-22 First Law of the Catalonian CC 2003).

III. The trend towards shorter periods and simpler regimes

3. In FRANCE, the new law on prescription has a 5 year period, with shorter periods for many situations, notably for the benefit of consumers (2 years, art. L 137-2 C. Cons.) The French law on prescription also creates a long stop period of 20 years. This long stop period starts on the day the right arises, while the normal 5 year delay starts on the day the holder of a right knew or ought to have known the facts which enable the right to be exercised. In some situations enunciated by CC art. 2232 al. 1, this long stop period does not apply.

4. SWEDEN has a ten year period (Preskriptionslag (1981:130) § 11): a shorter period of three years, however, applies with some exceptions for the benefit of consumers. FINLAND also has a ten year period (Prescription Decree of 1868 § 1) but a number of shorter periods in special legislation (such as, e.g., the Insurance Act of 1994). BELGIUM, since the law of 10 June 1998, now has five years for rights to damages arising from extra-contractual liability and ten years for all other personal rights (art. 2262 bis § 1; for criticism of this differentiation between rights arising from contractual and extra-contractual liability see, however, Claeys, 1998-99 R.W. 391 ff. and Claessens & Counye 83 ff.). However, a number of special periods have been retained, e.g. the ten year period of CC art. 2270.

4. Under the POLISH CC the general prescription period is ten years (CC art. 118). However, the same provision states that a period of three years applies to rights to periodical payments as well as rights relating to economic activity, unless a special provision provides for a shorter period (e.g.: contract for performing a specified task or work – two years CC art. 646, contract of lease – one year CC art. 677, contract of loan for use – one year CC art. 719, mandate – two years CC art. 751, extra-contractual liability – three years CC art. 442, product liability - three years 449[8]).

5. SCOTLAND used to have a general twenty year period and numerous shorter periods for special situations but the Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 subjected the vast majority of rights within the law of obligations to a five year prescriptive period (s. 6 with schedule 1). There is a long stop period of 20 years. A three year limitation period applies to personal injuries actions and to actions for defamation (ss. 17, 18 and 18A). The ENGLISH Limitation Act 1980 recognises a period of six years for actions on tort or "simple contract" but shorter periods apply to actions for personal injuries (three years), negligent latent damage (three years), product liability (three years) and defamation and malicious falsehood (one year) (Limitation Act 1980 ss. 2, 5, 4A, 11, 11A, 12, 14A). IRISH law has six years for "simple contracts" and three years for tort actions and actions for personal injuries arising out of a breach of contract: Statute of Limitations Act 1957 s. 11.

6. Under the SLOVAK law the general prescription period stipulated in the CC § 101 is three years. Special provisions provide for longer or shorter periods (CC § 106 compensation of damage, CC § 107 unjustified enrichment, CC § 108 rights from transport, CC § 109 rights corresponding to an easements, CC § 110 rights established by judgment, rights acknowledged by the debtor in writing). According to the Ccom art. 397, the general period of prescription in commercial relationships is four years. CZECH law is the same.

7. Since the reform of the law of obligations in 2002 the GERMAN CC provides for a general prescription period of three years (CC § 195), starting at the end of the year in which the right comes into existence and the creditor becomes aware or should become aware of the facts giving rise to the right and the identity of the debtor (CC § 199). This general prescription period is limited by a maximum period of ten or thirty years (CC § 199(2)-(4)). Furthermore there are special prescription periods of six months (CC § 548) and two, five, ten and thirty years (CC §§ 438, 634a, 196, 197).

8. Under ESTONIAN law, as to the period of prescription, three categories are differentiated. Firstly, the prescription period for rights arising from transaction is generally three years (GPCCA § 146(1)). Secondly, for rights arising from law like rights arising from delictual damage (GPCCA § 150(1)) or unjustified enrichment (GPCCA § 151(1)) the prescription period is generally three years subject to a maximum period of ten years (GPCCA §§ 150(1), 151(1)). For other rights to performance arising from law the period of prescription is ten years as from the moment when the right falls due (GPCCA § 149). A third category comprises special prescription periods (for rights to performance within the law of obligations) of six month (e.g. LOA §§ 338(1), 395 (1)-(2)), one year (e.g. LOA §§ 690, 802(1)), five years (e.g. GPCCA § 146(2)-(3), LOA § 771), ten years (e.g. GPCCA §§ 146(4)-(5), 149, 157 (3), LOA § 475(2) or thirty years (for rights established by judgment, GPCCA § 157(1)), often along with special regimes as to the commencement of the term. Also, rights based on property law, family law and succession law have special regimes (GPCCA § 155).

9. The UNCITRAL Convention (1974) has a four year period for rights arising from an international sale of goods. As far as the development of a general, uniform standard in European Community legislation is concerned, see von Bar I, n. 395. The UNIDROIT Principles (art. 10.2(1)) provide for a three year period whose commencement depends on the creditor’s actual or constructive knowledge of its claim (see Bonell, Limitation Periods, 523).

10. The English Law Commission has recommended a uniform limitation period of three years (Law Commission Report No 270, Limitation of Actions).

11. The general prescription period in SLOVENIAN law is five years (LOA art. 346) with various special periods from three months to ten years at most.

12. In HUNGARY under CC § 324(1) the period of limitation for rights to performance is five years, unless otherwise prescribed by law. Under paragraph (2) of that article if the principal right prescribes, all of the dependent collateral rights also fall. The principal right is not affected when independent collateral rights prescribe. Under paragraph (3) the prescription of a right does not prevent satisfaction from a pledge which secures it. Under CC § 325(1) a prescribed right may not be enforced in court. Under CC § 325(2) parties may agree on a shorter period of prescription but the agreement is valid only if in writing. If the period of prescription is shorter than one year, the parties are entitled to extend it, by an agreement in writing, to a maximum of one year; otherwise, an agreement on the extension of a period of limitation is void. Under CC § 326(1) the period of prescription commences upon the due date of the right. Under CC § 326(2) if the creditor is unable to enforce a right for an excusable reason, the right remains enforceable within one year from the time when the reason is eliminated or, in respect of a period of prescription of one year or less, within three months, even if the period has already elapsed or there is less than one year or less than three months, respectively, remaining. This provision also applies if the creditor has granted a respite for performance after expiration. Under CC § 327(1) a period of prescription is suspended by a written notice requiring performance, the judicial enforcement of the right, the amendment of a right by agreement (inclusive of composition), and the acknowledgment of a debt by the debtor. Under CC § 327 (2) the period of prescription recommences after suspension or following the non-appealable outcome of a suspension proceeding. Under CC § 327(3) if a writ of execution is issued in the course of a suspension proceeding, the period of prescription is suspended only by the acts of enforcement.

III.–7:202: Period for a right established by legal proceedings

(1) The period of prescription for a right established by judgment is ten years.

(2) The same applies to a right established by an arbitral award or other instrument which is enforceable as if it were a judgment.

COMMENTS

A. The need for a special period

This is the only special prescription period provided in this Chapter. It cuts off any potential doctrinal discussion as to the effect of the judgment on the original right. (Does it continue to exist, or is it replaced by a new right?) The period applicable in this case has to be substantially longer than the general period laid down in III.–7:201 (General period). A right established by judgment is as firmly and securely established as is possible and is thus much less affected by the "obfuscating power of time" than other rights. Moreover, the creditor has made it abundantly clear that the right is seriously pursued; the debtor knows that payment is still required. And finally, the legal dispute between the parties has been resolved. It does not create a source of uncertainty or a danger to the public interest. To the contrary: it would create unnecessary costs, and thus be more injurious to the public interest, if a short prescription period were to force the creditor at regular intervals to attempt an act of execution which, in view of the debtor's financial position, is known to be futile. The law of prescription here, as always, should prevent, not encourage or even engender, litigation.

Once again, of course, there is something arbitrary in fixing a specific period. But ten years would appear to be a reasonable choice in view of the fact that it is the period most frequently found, or proposed, in modern legislation.

Admittedly, the introduction of a special period for rights established by judgment is in conflict with the general quest for uniformity. But we are dealing here with a clearly distinguishable type of right which does not interfere with any others covered by this Chapter. The general reasons militating against a differentiated regime do not apply in this case.

B. Nature of the period; declaratory judgments

The ten year period proposed is a normal prescription period which is subject to the general rules. The one issue that merits special consideration is when it starts to run: see the provision in III.–7:203 (Commencement); cf. also the provisions on renewal of prescription in III.–7:401 (Renewal by acknowledgement) and III.–7:402 ((Renewal by attempted execution).

A declaratory judgment is sufficient for the purposes of the present Article, as long as it establishes the right and not only one of its prerequisites.

C. Other instruments

It cannot be specified in this Chapter which other instruments obtained by the creditor can have the effect of triggering the ten year period. The relevant criterion is whether they are regarded as enforceable as if they were a judgment. A court-approved settlement of the dispute between the parties could be one example. Private instruments are also covered as long as they do not require a formal act by a court before they can be enforced but may be enforced directly. Arbitral awards are mentioned because of their general recognition and practical importance.

NOTES

I. Special period

1. Most codes have a special rule on prescription of a right established by legal proceedings. The period is normally a long one: it used to be thirty years in FRANCE (Cass.soc., 7 October 1981, Bull. civ. V, n. 764); under the new law of prescription (June 17 2008) it is 10 years when the right is established by a "titre exécutoire", AUSTRIA (see Mader/Janisch in Schwimann, ABGB VI, 3rd ed., § 1478 no. 22; Rummel (-Schubert), ABGB II(3)3, § 1487, no. 7) and GERMANY (CC § 197(1), no.3; twenty years in GREECE (CC art. 268(1)), ESTONIA (GPCCA § 157(1)); PORTUGAL (CC art. 311(1)), the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 3:234), DENMARK (see § 1(2) Law no. 274 of 22 December 1908 in conjunction with art. 5.14.4 Danske Lov), and SCOTLAND (Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 s.7 and Sch. 1, para. 2(a)); twelve years in IRELAND (Statute of Limitations Act 1957 s.6(a)); and ten years in ITALY (CC art. 2953 applicable, however, only to final judgments with respect to the rights for which a statute of limitation shorter than ten years is provided, not to declaratory or constitutive judgments); SWEDEN (Preskriptionslag (1981:130) § 7); FINLAND (Prescription Decree § 1); SLOVAKIA (CC § 110(1) applicable to final judgments of a court or other authority) ; and ten years in the CZECH REPUBLIC (CC § 110(1) applicable to courts, arbitral bodies and any other authorities competent to adjudicate upon the right). In BELGIAN law, the matter is disputed; some authors write that the 10 year period always applies, but the statute has no specific rule for the actio iudicati, from which it is deduced by others that the applicable prescription period depends on the type of right (see esp. CC art. 2262*bis*). In POLAND, a right recognised by a final judgment of a court or of any other authority entrusted with the adjudication of particular actions or by an award of arbitrators, as well as a right recognised by an agreement concluded before the court or before arbitrators, is subject to prescription after ten years, even though the period of prescription for a given type of right is shorter (CC 125§1). SLOVENIAN law is the same, see LOA art. 356. Only the (ENGLISH) Limitation Act 1980 recognises a shorter period (six years, s.24). Obviously, in a number of systems the period chosen for the prescription of rights established by a judgment is the general prescription period; but in other systems the long period is an exception to shorter general periods.

II. The effect of a judgment on the original right

2. For doctrinal discussion of the effect of a judgment on the original right see, as far as the pre-codification ius commune is concerned, Windscheid and Kipp, § 129, n. 3; for echoes of this debate in SCOTLAND, see Johnston, para. 6.43 ff.; cf. also Spiro, Begrenzung § 162.

III. Periodical payments falling due in the future

3. GERMAN, AUSTRIAN, CZECH, PORTUGUESE and POLISH laws recognise one exception to the long prescription period for rights established by judgment. In AUSTRIA (Mader/Janisch in Schwimann, ABGB VI, 3rd ed., § 1478 no 25) Austria (Rummel (-Schubert), ABGB II(3)3, § 1478, no. 7) a period of three years applies for periodical payments falling due after the date of the judgment. In PORTUGAL a period of five years applies in such cases and in POLAND a period of three years (CC 125§1). Also in the CZECH REPUBLIC a three-year period applies (CC § 110(3)). The GERMAN code provides for an application of the general prescription period (CC § 197(2)). Similarly under ESTONIAN law, see GPCCA § 157(4). The DUTCH and BELGIAN codes have a rule according to which "payments to be made annually or more frequently pursuant to a decision are prescribed in five years": Dutch CC art. 3:324(3); Belgian CC art. 2277. The FRENCH code had a similar rule to the Dutch code (French CC art. 2277) but it has disappeared with the new law since the normal period of prescription is now 5 years. See also Spiro, Begrenzung, § 164 with references to SWISS case law and literature. This special rule is intended to protect the debtor: it may be burdensome to keep receipts for thirty years. But it must be remembered that the period proposed in the present Chapter is ten, not thirty years. In SPAIN, periodical payments are as a rule subject to a five year period.

4. In SLOVAK law there is no exception to the ten-year prescription period regarding individual instalments into which the performance was divided. Nevertheless periodical payments falling due after the court decision became final (in Slovak CC referring to “repeated performance”) are prescribed in a three years period (see CC § 110(2)(3)). Periodical payments finally awarded (falling due prior to the final judgement) become prescribed within ten years.

IV. Other instruments

5. Concerning other instruments, to which the ten year period applies, see for GERMANY: CC § 197(1), no.4, 5; for ITALY: Roselli-Vitucci, 588 ff; for GREECE, Full Bench of A.P. 30/1987, EllDik 28 (1987) 1444 (1445) (relating to an order of payment). In IRELAND the twelve-year period of the Statute of Limitations Act 1957 s.6(a) (cf. note 1, above) does not apply to arbitration awards: the general period of six years applies. In AUSTRIA an acknowledgement (konstitutives Anerkenntnis) as well as a settlement (Vergleich) also fall under the long prescription period of 30 years (see Rummel (-Bydlinski), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1478, no. 6). For SLOVAKIA and CZECH REPUBLIC see CC § 110(1) (rights acknowledged by the debtor in writing).

III.–7:203: Commencement

(1) The general period of prescription begins to run from the time when the debtor has to effect performance or, in the case of a right to damages, from the time of the act which gives rise to the right.

(2) Where the debtor is under a continuing obligation to do or refrain from doing something, the general period of prescription begins to run with each breach of the obligation.

(3) The period of prescription set out in III.–7:202 (Period for a right established by legal proceedings) begins to run from the time when the judgment or arbitral award obtains the effect of res judicata, or the other instrument becomes enforceable, though not before the debtor has to effect performance.

COMMENTS

A. General rule

As a rule, the period of prescription should run only against a creditor who has the possibility of enforcing the right in court, or of starting arbitration proceedings. For it is in the course of these proceedings that the merits of the case will be investigated. The running of the period is suspended as long as the proceedings last (see III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings)). A right can, however, only be pursued in court, or before an arbitration tribunal, when it has become due - that is, when the debtor has to effect performance. The concept of the time when a party has to effect performance is widely known and relevant in many other situations.

Illustration 1
A and B have agreed that A has to pay the purchase price for a car delivered to B on 10 October. The time for A's performance is determinable from the contract: it is 10 October. The period of prescription starts to run against B on that day.

Illustration 2
A has, by mistake, transferred a sum of money to C rather than to B. From the moment when he receives the transfer, C is under an obligation to retransfer the money; this obligation is based on unjustified enrichment. The period of prescription relating to A's right to the retransfer starts to run on that day.

B. Rights to damages

There is, however, one situation which requires special consideration. A right to payment of damages for harm caused by another is generally due as soon as the right comes into being. But it comes into being only when all requirements of the rule imposing liability have been met. One of them will often be the occurrence of damage; and damage will sometimes only occur many years after the act giving rise to liability (for example, infringement of somebody else's bodily integrity, or rights to property) has been committed. Thus, it may be uncertain for a number of years whether a person has a right to damages based on an act infringing their rights. Moreover, it may be difficult to determine whether all rights to damages arising as a consequence of the act have to be subjected to the same prescription regime, or whether there may be completely unexpected, latent consequences in relation to which prescription should only start to run once they have become apparent. Pure economic loss cases also present special problems in the application of a rule that focuses on the occurrence of damage. Thus, it appears advisable not to make commencement of the period of prescription dependent upon the occurrence of damage. The period of prescription, therefore, begins to run when all the other requirements for the right to damages have been met, i.e. at the moment when the relevant act has been committed (or at the moment when the non-performance of an obligation has occurred). This rule does not cause hardship to the claimant, since the period does not run, according to III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance), as long as the claimant does not know, and cannot reasonably know, about any latent damage. Thus, it is practically relevant only for the calculation of what is usually described as the "long-stop", and what is in this Chapter expressed as the maximum period to which the period of prescription can be extended (III.–7:307 (Maximum length of period)). Here, however, an easily ascertainable date is required to counterbalance the uncertainty necessarily associated with the discoverability criterion. This date can only be the commission of the act which gives rise to the right to damages. The specific advantage of the rule proposed here is that it provides, effectively, one and the same point of departure for the general prescription period and the "long-stop".

A has been injured, on 1 October 1976, in a car accident for which B has been responsible. A appears to have suffered only light injuries (a bruise, or a mild concussion). In the summer of 1981, however, it turns out that an inner organ has been seriously affected. The three year prescription period would begin to run from 1 October 1976 but for the fact that it is suspended as long as A did not know, and could not reasonably know, about the latent consequences of the accident, i.e., in this case, presumably sometime in the summer of 1981 (III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance). If the latent consequences should have become apparent only in December 2006, A's right would have been prescribed in view of the fact that the period of prescription cannot be extended beyond a total period of thirty years (III.–7:307 (Maximum length of period)).

The same considerations apply to other rights to damages. The period of prescription of a right to damages for non-performance of an obligation runs from the date of non-performance, the period of prescription of a right to damages for culpa in contrahendo from the moment when the other party breaks off negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing.

C. Obligation to refrain from doing something

Prescription relates to rights to performance of obligations (III.–7:101 (Rights subject to prescription)). This covers cases where a party is under an obligation to refrain from doing something. When does the period of prescription begin to run in these cases? The due date cannot be the appropriate moment since the creditor's right is due even before the debtor has infringed the obligation. Yet, before such infringement has occurred, the creditor does not normally have any reason to sue the debtor so as to stop the period of prescription from running. Prescription problems can only arise where the debtor's obligation extends over some period of time, i.e. in the case of a continuing obligation to refrain from doing something. Here it appears to be appropriate for the period of prescription to commence, not once and for all with the first act of contravention, but with each new act of contravention.

Illustration 4
A has a studio in which he occasionally produces CD's of famous pianists. On 10 October, he plans to produce a CD with Alfred Brendel playing Schubert. B, A's neighbour, is busy with noisy building operations to his house in the course of the month of October. A obtains an undertaking from B to stop these building operations for 10 October. Nevertheless, B carries on with them on that day. Here we do not have specific prescription problems. Before 10 October, a period of prescription cannot start; after 10 October, compliance has become impossible and A can only claim damages. The right to damages is subject to the normal rules of prescription.

Illustration 5
A is a former employee of B, an insurance company in Hamburg. She is under an obligation not to sell any insurance policies on her own account for the next three years in Hamburg. On 20 March, she sells some policies in a small suburb still belonging to the state of Hamburg. On 20 October, however, she sets up her own insurance agency right in the centre of Hamburg. Concerning the infringement on 20 March, the period of prescription begins to run on that day; concerning the one on 20 October, a new period begins to run on 20 October. This is justified in view of the fact that B may have refrained from taking steps which would have had the effect of extending or even recommencing the period of prescription, not because it wanted to condone any infringement of A's obligation, but merely because the first infringement was not sufficiently serious to warrant the cost and trouble of taking such steps.

The same problem may arise where the debtor is under a continuing obligation to do something.

Illustration 6
D, the owner of a dairy, has agreed to deliver 20 cans of milk to a restaurant in the neighbourhood every morning. As long as D complies with this obligation, the owner of the restaurant has no reason to sue him. He may, quite legitimately, not even want to sue him when occasionally less than the 20 cans are delivered or when, due to momentary difficulties that D may have with his own suppliers, he does not deliver at all for a day or two. That should not, however, prevent him from bringing an action against D if the latter, four years later, decides no longer to honour his obligation.

D. Rights established by legal proceedings

Here the choice would seem to be between the date of judgment and the date when that judgment becomes final (i.e. when an appeal is not, or no longer, possible). The second of these alternatives is the one more often found in existing legislation. It commends itself for reasons which will become apparent when the closely related question of the effect of legal proceedings upon a period of prescription is considered (see III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings)). In order to cover all types of appeal that may possibly be brought against a judgment, paragraph (2) refers to the moment when the effect of res judicata is obtained.

If a declaratory judgment establishes an obligation on the part of the debtor to make periodic payments in the future, the period of prescription concerning each of these payments only starts to run when it falls due (see the clause starting with the words "though not" in paragraph (2)).

In the case of arbitral awards the relevant moment may also be described as the moment when the effect of res judicata is obtained. For other instruments, however, the period of prescription begins to run when they become enforceable (III.–7:203 ((Commencement) paragraph (3); enforceability, after all, is the characteristic that justifies placing these instruments on a par with a judgment (III.–7:202 (Period for a right established by legal proceedings) paragraph (2)).

NOTES

I. General rule

1. The moment when the right becomes enforceable is widely used to commence the period of prescription: for AUSTRIA, CC § 1478 second sentence; for ITALY, CC art. 2935; for PORTUGAL, CC art. 306; for BELGIUM, Claessens & Counye 84; for SCOTLAND, Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973, ss.6, 7 and 11; Johnston para. 4.06 ff; for DENMARK, § 3 Law no. 274 of 22 December 1908 (but under Danske Lov art. 4.14.4 the period begins when the obligation comes into existence); for SLOVENIA LOA art. 336; for SPAIN, CC art. 1969 and for the Catalonia Law, art. 121-23 First Law of the Catalonian Civil Code); for the NETHERLANDS, CC art. 3:307 (claims for performance of a contractual obligation); for ESTONIA, GPCCA § 147(1) for rights arising from transaction (with the exception that the period of prescription for rights to payment of remuneration agreed upon, and rights to performance of recurring obligations or a maintenance obligation exceptionally commence as of the end of the year when the right falls due (GPCCA § 147 (3), § 154). In FINLAND prescription begins to run when the obligation is created (see Prescription Decree § 1); in SWEDEN when the right arises (Preskriptionslag (1981:130) § 2). According to GREEK law (CC art. 251), the right must have come into being and become enforceable. See further Spiro, Begrenzung § 26; Koopmann 45 ff; Loubser 48 ff. The ENGLISH Limitation Act 1980 refers to the date of accrual of the cause of action (cf., e.g., ss. 2 and 5). This is the moment "when a potential plaintiff first has a right to succeed in an action against a potential defendant" (Preston & Newsom 8; cf. also Dannemann, Karatzenis & Thomas, (1991) 55 RabelsZ 702). IRISH law is the same (Statute of Limitations Act 1957 s. 11(1)). Art. 9 of the UNCITRAL Convention refers to "the date when the claim accrues".
2. According to POLISH law, the period of prescription begins on the day on which the right is enforceable. If the right arises only upon the carrying out of a particular act by the claimant, the period of prescription begins on the day on which it would have become enforceable if the claimant had carried out the act on the earliest possible date (CC art. 120 § 1).
3. According to SLOVAK CC § 101 the prescription period starts running from the day when the right could be exercised for the first time. As for rights that are to be asserted at first with an individual or a legal entity, the prescription period starts running from the day when the right was asserted in this way. According to the Ccom § 391 with regard to rights enforceable before a court, the period of prescription begins to run on the day it was possible to assert the right before a court, unless it is otherwise provided. With regard to rights concerning performance of an act in law (transaction), the period of prescription begins to run on the day it was possible to perform the act in law (applicable to commercial relationships). CZECH law is the same.
4. In FRANCE, the starting point of the prescription period was not specified in the texts of the CC. Judges have used the adage contra non valentem agere non currit praescriptio and the period of prescription runs only against a creditor who has the possibility of enforcing the right in courts. Under the new law on prescription (June 17, 2008), the starting point of the prescription period of personal and real rights is the date at which the creditor knew or should have known of the facts giving rise to the rights. However, this "floating" starting point is limited by the long stop period (see below). It is also subject to some specific exceptions.

II. Rights to damages

5. Rights to damages present problems for all legal systems which regard due date or accrual of the cause of action as relevant for commencement of prescription (see: Law Commission Consultation Paper on Limitation of Actions, 30 ff). This is why there is a growing reliance on the discoverability criterion; for GERMANY CC § 199(1); and for ESTONIA GPCCA § 150(1) for delictual rights. However, the long-stop is usually counted from the moment when the wrongful act is committed; see e.g. GERMANY CC § 199(2) and (3), 1, no.2; AUSTRIA Rummel (-Schubert), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1487, no. 7; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 3:310, BELGIUM CC art. 2262bis and ESTONIA: GPCCA §§ 150(3), § 153(2. For POLAND, see: CC 442. In SCOTLAND, however, the long stop runs from enforceability (Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973, s.7). In SPAIN there is a special rule (the prescription period starts when the claimant is aware of the damage) for actions in delict, and other special rules have been set up in case law for continuous damages (see Reglero, R. Bercovitz (edit.) Comentarios, pp. 2258 ff). SLOVENIAN law is similar with a three year period from the moment when the damage and the identity of the perpetrator are known, a five years period from the moment when the damage occurred and a criminal law period if longer then the civil law one for damages suffered by intentional criminal offences. See LOA arts. 352-353. In AUSTRIA the prescription period is 3 years from knowledge of the damage as well as the person causing the damage. A claim can, however, not be initiated after 30 years from the cause of action (see CC § 1489). The long prescription period also applies in the case that the action is sanctioned with 15 (or more) years of prison.

6. SLOVAK law (CC § 106) provides a two year prescription period for rights to compensation for damage. The period runs from the day when the injured person learned of the damage and of the person liable. The right to compensation for damage prescribes no later than in three years and as for damages caused by intention, in ten years from the day when the event causing the damage occurred. The three years or ten years prescription period does not apply to damages to health. For commercial relationships it is provided that the prescription period of rights to damages expires no later than ten years from the day when a breach of duty occurred (Ccom § 398). CZECH law is the same; a special provision applies to damage caused by bribery – the period of three years starts from the day of becoming aware of the damage, and the long-stop of ten years starts from the day when the corrupt conduct occurred (CC § 106(3)).

7. In FRANCE, the new law on prescription provides for a 10-year prescription period for "actions en responsabilité " for a personal injury. The delay runs from the day the original or aggravated damage is "consolidated". The prescription period is extended to 20 years in the case of injuries resulting from torture or other barbaric acts and sexual violence against minors. There is no long stop period in those cases (art. 2232 al. 2).

III. Obligation to refrain from doing something

8. The GERMAN code contains a special rule concerning obligations to refrain from doing something: subject to CC § 199(1), no.2 prescription runs from each contravention (see CC § 199(5); Staudinger(-Peters) § 199, n. 71, 76). For similar regulation under ESTONIAN law, see GPCCA § 147(1) sent. 2. German authors have argued for an analogous application of this rule to cases where the debtor is under a continuing obligation to act: see Münchener Kommentar (Grothe) § 198, n. 11; but cf. Staudinger (-Peters) § 199, n. 75 (arguing that this follows anyway). Other legal systems reach similar conclusions by arguing from general principle; see Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I n. 664; Spiro, Begrenzung § 48 f.; for DENMARK, see Ussing, Alm. Del. 399 and 407 (prescription runs from each act of non-compliance). In POLAND, the period of prescription of rights to a forbearance begins on the day on which the debtor contravened the obligation (CC 120 § 2).

9. The SLOVAK Ccom § 392(1) provides that if the relationship of obligation involves the duty to desist from a certain activity, the period of prescription begins to run as of the day the duty was breached. The same holds true for the CZECH Ccom.

IV. Rights established by legal proceedings

10. Prescription of a right established by judgment starts to run at the date of judgment in the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 3:324(1)) and AUSTRIA (see Mader/Janisch in Schwimann, ABGB VI, 3rd ed., § 1478 no 22 ss). Rummel (-Schubert), ABGB II(3)[3], § 1478, no. 7; cf. also Spiro, Begrenzung § 162. Prescription starts to run at the date when the judgment becomes final in GERMANY (CC § 201);ITALY (CC art. 2953, see Roselli-Vitucci, 486 ff.); GREECE (CC art. 268, first sentence); ESTONIA (GPCCA § 157 (2)) and SWEDEN (Preskriptionslag (1981:130) § 7). Under s.24(1) of the ENGLISH Limitation Act 1980 the limitation period for actions on a judgment starts from the date when the judgment becomes enforceable. The same applies under s.6(a) of the IRISH Statute of Limitations Act 1957. This appears to be too restrictive since it excludes declaratory judgments; see Spiro, Begrenzung § 133; Staudinger(-Peters) § 197, n.24, n.5. According to the SLOVAK CC § 110(1) prescription of a right established by judgment starts to run at the date when the liable party was to perform according to the decision (date specified therein or if no such day is specified, on the day when the court decision became final and conclusive) and the same applies for CZECH law.

V. Special commencement dates

11. Some codes have special commencement dates for certain situations - e.g. GREECE: CC art. 252; for comparative discussion, see Spiro, Begrenzung § 35; Loubser 54 ff.). The need for such special commencement dates has, however, been doubted: see Peters & Zimmermann 245 ff; Spiro, Begrenzung § 125. Cf. also Staudinger(-Peters) § 198, nn. 7 ff.

12. For SLOVAK law special commencement dates apply for rights following from insurance (prescription period starts running after the lapse of one year after the insurance event CC § 104), as for rights of the lawful heir to demand surrendering the inheritance (prescription period starts running from the moment when the decision finishing the inheritance proceedings became final and conclusive CC § 105). For special commencement dates in commercial relationships see Ccom §§ 392–396.

13. Also CZECH law sets forth a wide range of special commencement dates (especially in commercial matters). E.g. prescription of the obligation to reverse an unjustified enrichment is constructed similarly to prescription of the obligation to pay damages: there are two prescription periods, first of which is two years and starts to run from the date on which the entitled person became aware of the unjustified enrichment and of who is enriched, and the second one is three years, or ten years in case of deliberate enrichment, and runs from the date on which the unjustified enrichment occurred (CC § 107).

Section 3: Extension of period

III.–7:301: Suspension in case of ignorance

The running of the period of prescription is suspended as long as the creditor does not know of, and could not reasonably be expected to know of:

(a) the identity of the debtor; or

(b) the facts giving rise to the right including, in the case of a right to damages, the type of damage.

COMMENTS

A. Terminology

Civilian legal systems traditionally distinguish between "interruption" and "suspension" of a period of prescription. If the period of prescription is interrupted, the time which has elapsed before the interrupting event is not taken into account: the period of prescription begins to run afresh. Suspension of the period of prescription, on the other hand, has the effect that the period during which prescription is suspended is not counted in calculating the period of prescription: when the cause of suspension ends, it is therefore the old prescription period that continues to run its course (unless the period of prescription had not even started to run in which case it only starts to run after the cause of suspension has ended). Suspension thus extends a given period of prescription. Another device that has the effect of extending the period of prescription is postponement of its expiry. Here the period of prescription runs its course but is only completed after the expiry of a certain extra period. The Chapter uses these three techniques but does not use the word “interruption”, which can be misleading. Instead the Chapter uses the term “renewal” to cover the case where a new period begins to run on the happening of some event. Thus, the systematic exposition for Sections 3 and 4 is as follows. The period of prescription can be (i) extended (Section 3) or (ii) renewed, so that a new period begins to run (Section 4). An extension may occur by way of (a) a suspension of the running of the period or (b) a postponement of its expiry. It should be noted that the running of a period of prescription can be suspended whether or not it has already started. A renewal may be triggered by an acknowledgement by the debtor or, in the case of the ten year period, by an attempt at execution by the creditor.

B. The argument for a general discoverability criterion

Prescription can effectively amount to an act of expropriation: a right is an asset of the creditor which loses its value if it can no longer be pursued in court. This is justifiable only if the creditor has previously had a fair chance of pursuing the claim. So, in the first place, the creditor must have known about the right or, at least, ought reasonably to have known about it. The importance of a discoverability criterion is accentuated, if (as under the Chapter) the general prescription period is comparatively short. Whereas the short period, and the institution of prescription of rights as such, are largely intended to protect the debtor, the discoverability criterion provides the necessary counterbalance to take account of the creditor's reasonable interests. This is increasingly recognised today. Not surprisingly, the rise of the discoverability criterion has been closely related to the general tendency towards shorter prescription periods. More precisely, there has been a trend towards (i) taking account of the creditor's ignorance with regard to a growing range of rights while (ii) reducing the inherent potential of this consideration for delaying the course of prescription by moving from lack of knowledge towards a test of reasonable discoverability. The Chapter reflect these developments.

Essentially, there is a fundamental choice to be made. If discoverability applies across the board, a uniform three year period is acceptable. If, however, the uncertainty necessarily associated with a discoverability criterion is regarded as sufficiently serious to make the running of prescription dependent merely on objective criteria, the consequence is necessarily a differentiated system of prescription periods. But there is a very wide consensus that not all types of rights can be subjected to an objective regime: the prescription of non-contractual rights to compensation for damage caused by another must depend on knowledge (or reasonable possibility to acquire knowledge). It is, however, precisely with regard to such rights (and, more specifically, those arising from personal injury) that the discoverability criterion is particularly important. The other type of situation where a creditor will often be unaware of the right is non-performance of a contractual obligation. Non-contractual rights for damages and rights for damages based on non-performance of a contractual obligation can be closely related; the one right is often an alternative for the other. If it is unfair in the one case for the right to prescribe before the creditor knew or reasonably could have known of it, it is equally unfair in the other. Once, however, a legal system is prepared to swallow the subjective criterion with regard to rights to damages it might as well, given the interconnectedness of rights within the law of obligations, accept it across the board. The price to be paid in terms of legal uncertainty is not considerable. For, to mention some prominent types of rights, the parties to a contract will normally know when their contract has been concluded and when they are entitled to demand (specific) performance of the obligations arising under it. Also, they will usually be aware whether the contract has been avoided with the result that they may claim a reversal of any enrichment conferred, particularly under a system that makes avoidance for error, or fear, or fraud dependent on notice to the other party. And certain rights to reversal of unjustified enrichment based on unauthorised use of a person’s assets are too close to non-contractual rights to compensation for damage caused by another to justify a different treatment.

C. What has to be discoverable?

What, precisely, must the creditor's lack of knowledge relate to? It seems to be widely agreed that the facts giving rise to the right and the identity of the debtor are the two key issues.

> Illustration 1
> In the course of the early morning of 10 October 1994, A crashes his car into B's car which was parked in front of B's house. Since A fears public prosecution for drunken driving, he drives away from the scene of the accident. Nobody has observed the accident. Early in 1998, and in the course of a pub crawl, A boasts about what has happened that night. One of the persons present relates the story to B who now wants to sue A for damages. The running of the period of prescription (which would normally have begun on 10 October 1994) was suspended until B had heard about A's involvement in the accident. Before that time, he did not know and could not reasonably have known about the identity of his debtor.

In addition, a significance test is sometimes recommended: the running of the period of prescription is also suspended as long as the claimant did not know, and could not reasonably know, that the right is significant. This test is designed to prevent an apparently trivial injury triggering the prescription period for unexpected, serious consequences arising from the injury at a later stage. These concerns are also reflected in the development of the case law of a number of countries. Another, related, problem arises in cases where the victim of an accident is aware, at first, of having suffered, for instance, damage to property and only later becomes aware of an injury to health as a result of the accident. Both types of cases are covered by the words "type of damage" in clause (b).

Illustration 2
On his way home from a football match one November, A is beaten up by supporters of another team. He has a laceration on his forehead which, at first, bleeds heavily but can quite easily be dressed. He therefore decides not to take action against those who have beaten him up. Only eleven months later, in the following October, does he become aware of the fact that he has picked up internal injuries of a much more serious nature. The period of prescription starts to run from that time in October.

Illustration 3
A is severely injured in a brawl in the course of which B has hit his head with a club. As a result of this, A's eyesight is diminished by 40 %. Four years later, A becomes completely blind. It can be established that this is a late result of B hitting A's head. Running of the period of prescription for the damage resulting from blindness (as opposed to the loss of 40 % of his eyesight) is suspended until A has become blind (unless that consequence was reasonably foreseeable at the date of the injury).

D. Ignorance as a ground for suspending the running of the period of prescription

The period of prescription should not run while the creditor is unaware of the right and cannot reasonably be expected to be aware of it. It might appear natural to link the discoverability criterion to the commencement of the period of prescription. This is not the approach adopted here. The starting date remains the moment when the debtor has to effect performance, but the running of the period of prescription is suspended until the creditor becomes aware of the right or could reasonably be expected to be aware of it. This means that normally the period of prescription does not start to run until the moment of reasonable discoverability; it is, in other words, a case of an "initial" suspension. Matters are different, where the creditor's ignorance is not an initial one; this may be the case when either the creditor or the debtor dies and either the new creditor does not know that the right has been inherited or the old creditor cannot reasonably find out who is the new debtor.

Ignorance as a ground of suspension of the running of the period of prescription (as opposed to knowledge as the criterion for commencement of the period) has the following advantages. (i) Even if discoverability were to determine commencement of the period of prescription, it would also have to be required that the obligation has come into existence and that performance is due. (ii) That the period of prescription should not run against a creditor who cannot reasonably be expected to be aware of the right is one specific emanation of a much wider idea: a right must not prescribe if it is impossible for the creditor to pursue it (agere non valenti non currit praescriptio). This is why the period of prescription does not run in cases of vis major and why the expiry of the period of prescription is postponed if the creditor is legally incompetent and does not have a legal representative. These (and other) impediments are taken into account by extending the period of prescription. It does not matter whether the impediment already existed at the time of commencement of the period of prescription. Thus, it would appear to be systematically more satisfactory to deal with the discoverability issue under the same heading. (iii) A creditor who brings an action against the debtor has to establish the requirements on which the right is based. That the right has not prescribed is not one of these requirements. Prescription is a defence. If it is invoked by the debtor, it is the debtor who has to establish the requirements of that defence. The central requirement, of course, is that the period of prescription applicable to the right has elapsed. That depends on the date of commencement. If that were the date of discoverability, the debtor would, in many cases, face an unreasonably difficult task. For whether the damage to the creditor's house, the injury to the creditor's body, the consequences flowing from defective delivery, etc. were reasonably discoverable, or whether the creditor perhaps even had positive knowledge, are matters within the creditor's sphere and largely removed from the debtor's range of perception. Also, by and large, and considering the full range of rights, the creditor will normally know about the right at the time it falls due. That, exceptionally, this was not so, is a matter to be raised, and established to the satisfaction of the court, by the creditor. This would come out more clearly if discoverability were not to be made a requirement for commencement of the period of prescription but if the fact that the creditor could not reasonably be expected to be aware of the right were to give rise to an extension of the period of prescription: for it would, according to general principle, normally be for the creditor to prove that the running of the period of prescription was suspended, or that the period was otherwise extended. (iv) This way of proceeding also considerably simplifies the structure of the prescription regime, for it dispenses with the need to lay down a separate "long-stop" period running from a date different to that for the "normal" period of prescription and subject to specific regulation concerning extension, renewal, etc. It merely has to be stated that the period of prescription cannot be extended to a period longer than ten (or thirty) years (see III.–7:307 (Maximum length of period)).

I. Terminology

1. On the traditional distinction between interruption and suspension of prescription, see Windscheid & Kipp §§ 108 f.; Mugdan I, 523; Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 69 ff., 127 ff. For definitions, see, for GERMANY, CC §§ 205, 217; for GREECE, CC arts. 257, 270; for AUSTRIA, CC §§ 1494 ss. 1497. GERMAN law now uses the term "renewal" instead of "interruption" (CC § 212); for a definition of "suspension" see CC § 209.

2. Suspension of prescription is a well known device: see, for FRANCE, 2230 CC, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CC arts. 2251; for AUSTRIA: CC §§ 1494 ff.; see for GERMANY: CC §§ 203 ff; for GREECE: CC arts. 255 ff; for ITALY: CC arts. 2941–2942; for ESTONIA GPCCA §§ 160 ff; and for the CZECH REPUBLIC: CC § 112, 113, Commercial Code § 402 et seq. The idea of postponing the expiry of the period of prescription is generally more recent but has gained ground: we find it in AUSTRIA, CZECH REPUBLIC, ESTONIA, GERMANY and GREECE. See: Mugdan I, 528; Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 87 ff.; Zimmermann/Leenen/Mansel/Ernst, 2001 JZ 684, 695 ff. In the NETHERLANDS this idea has completely replaced suspension: see CC arts. 3:320 f; Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I n. 682; Koopmann 83 ff.

3. Suspension of commencement of prescription (Anlaufhemmung) is a notion familiar in a number of countries; see for GERMANY CC § 207; for GREECE: CC art. 256; for ITALY: CC art. 2941 for a number of examples). Cf. also the BELGIAN rule of art. 2262bis § 1 II, the DANISH suspension rule in case of ignorance (sub 2. in fine) and AUSTRIAN CC § 1494 for minors or individuals with mental incapability if they have no representative.). In the CZECH REPUBLIC this concept applies to rights of or against persons who must have a statutory representative and do not have any, rights between statutory representatives and minors or other represented persons, and rights between spouses (see CC § 113, 114).

4. POLISH law provides for suspension of the prescription period in case of: (1) claims of children against their parents – while parental authority continues, (2) claims of persons not possessing full capacity for legal acts against persons performing guardianship or curatorship – while such persons are guardians or curators, (3) claims of one spouse against the other – while the marriage lasts (CC art. 121). A suspension of prescription operates in various situations in SLOVENIAN law. One of them is for damages (LOA art. 352(1)); others for claims between spouses while the marriage lasts, parental authority, curatorship or guardianship, etc. See LOA arts. 358–363.

5. Apart from some special provisions, SPANISH law does not recognise the suspension technique.

6. According to the SLOVAK law suspension of the prescription period applies as for rights between legal representatives on one side and minor children on the other, as for rights between legal representatives on one side and other represented persons on the other side and in case of rights between spouses (CC § 114).

II. The rise of the discoverability criterion

6. The reform of the law of obligations in the GERMAN CC introduced a discoverability criterion for the general prescription period; prescription starts at the end of the year in which the right comes into existence and the creditor becomes aware or should become aware of the facts giving rise to the right and the identity of the debtor (CC § 199(1)). In FRANCE, the new law on prescription (June 17, 2008) has the following starting point for all “personal and real actions” (except as otherwise expressly provided for by the legislator) : the date at which the creditor knew or should have known of the facts giving rise to the rights CC art. 2224). The GREEK code recognises a subjective criterion only for reparation for wrongful conduct: the injured party has to have had knowledge of the injury and of the identity of the person bound to make compensation (CC art. 937). In AUSTRIA (CC § 1489) no distinction is made between contractual and non-contractual rights (Mader/Janisch in Schwimann, ABGB VI, 3rd ed., § 1489 no 2; Rummel (-Schubert), ABGB II(3)3, § 1489, no. 2). The SWISS code requires knowledge with regard to rights to damages for wrongful conduct and actions based on unjustified enrichment (OR arts. 60(1), 67(1)). The same holds true for ESTONIAN law, see GPCCA §§ 150(1), 151(1), 153(1) and note 7 to Article III.-7:201 above. In the NETHERLANDS knowledge is required in the case of unjustified enrichment rights, rights to damages and rights "to set aside a contract for failure to perform it or to correct such failure" (CC arts. 3:309, 310, 311). According to the ENGLISH Limitation Act 1980 knowledge matters in actions for personal injuries or death, for latent damage in the tort of negligence, and products liability (see ss.11, 11A, 12, 14, 14A); and the Law Commission report (No 270, 2001) recommended that for limitation periods in general (the “core regime”) the period should start to run from the date of knowledge. In IRELAND the Statute of Limitations (Amendment) Act 1991 provided that in the case of personal injuries arising from breach of duty (tortious, contractual or statutory) the injured party has three years to bring an action from the date on which the cause of action accrued or the date of knowledge (if later) of the person injured. SCOTLAND has a discoverability test for latent damage and personal injuries and a knowledge test for defamation (Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 ss.11 (3), 17, 18, 18A; Johnston, para. 4.17 ff). In BELGIUM, there has been doubt about the constitutionality of short prescription periods, "unless prescription runs only from the moment at which the damage manifests itself" (M.E. Storme, (1997) 5 ERPL 88; cf. also Claeys, 1998-99

R.W. 381); the discovery rule was introduced in the Statute itself in 1998 for non-contractual liability (art. 2262bis § 1 II). There was also doubt in IRELAND, before the Statute of Limitations (Amendment) Act 1991, about the constitutionality of a regime which had the effect of depriving a person of a property right even when the person was ignorant of having it. These doubts persist in relation to certain breaches of contract which are still subject to the rule that time runs from the date of accrual of the action. See Morgan v. Park Developments Ltd. [1983] I.L.R.M. 156; Heagerty v. O'Loughren [1990] ILR 148; Brady & Kerr 59 ff.

7. In POLISH law knowledge of the injury and of the identity of the person liable is a criterion for claims based on non-contractual liability for damage (CC art. 442) and product liability claims (CC art. 449[8]). CC art. 442: "A claim to have damage caused by an illicit act repaired is subject to prescription of three years from the day on which the injured person learned of the damage and of the person liable. In any case the claim is subject to prescription ten years from the day on which the event which caused the damage occurred."

8. For the SLOVAK law knowledge of damage and of the person liable is a subjective criterion for claims on compensation of damage (CC § 106(1)), accordingly, knowledge of the unjustified enrichment and of the enriched person is a criterion for claims on unjustified enrichment (CC § 107(1)). This is the same in CZECH law.

9. Under SPANISH law, it is disputed whether knowledge or discoverability is relevant in relation to rights based on liability for wrongful conduct: TS 10.10.1977 as opposed to TS 11.11.1968; cf. Díez-Picazo & Gullón Ballesteros I, 472. Under arts. 121-23 of the First Law of the Catalonian CC, prescription runs as from the time the holder of the claim may reasonably know the circumstances that support the claim and the person to whom it should be addressed. Under art. 498(2) of the PORTUGUESE CC prescription commences when the occurrence of damage is known by the injured person, even if the identity of the debtor and the extent of the damage are unknown. For ITALY, see CC art. 2941, n. 8: if a debtor has fraudulently concealed the existence of the debt, prescription is suspended until the fraud has been discovered. In DENMARK prescription under the Law no. 274 of 22 December 1908 (5 years) is suspended if the creditor did not know and could not reasonably have known of the right or the residence of the debtor (§ 3). However, suspension does not operate as regards the 20 year period provided in Danske Lov 5.14.4 see Gomard, Obigationsret III, 242. In FINLAND the provision concerning the ten year period of prescription for rights based on liability for a wrongful act is interpreted to mean ten years from when the consequence of the act became clear; see Routamo & Ståhlberg 345. Under the new BELGIAN law of 10 June 1998 the date of discoverability determines the commencement of the five-year prescription period for such rights (CC art. 2262 bis, § 1(2)). SWEDISH law, however, does not recognise the creditor's ignorance as a ground for extending the period of prescription (except for product liability).

10. Discoverability is the emerging general standard in European Community legislation on prescription, see von Bar I, n. 395. Cf. further Zimmermann, 2000 JZ 861 ff. (comparative), but also Andrews, (1998) 57 Camb.L.J. 589 ff. (criticising the English Law Commission's proposal to extend the discoverability criterion).

III. Significance test

11. In ENGLAND, the three year period for personal injury rights will not start to run until the claimant knows that the injury is significant; and similarly for latent damage: Limitation Act 1980, ss.14(1), 14A(7). There is a similar rule in the IRISH Statute of Limitations (Amendment) Act 1991 s.2(1). Other systems may reach similar results by the way in which the courts interpreted a knowledge requirement for claims for damages (see, e.g., for GERMANY, the discussion and references in Staudinger(-Peters) § 199, n. 35, 45).

IV. Onus of proof

12. On questions of onus of proof, in the present context, see Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 359 f.; Staudinger(-Peters) § 199, n. 60; Loubser 112; Law Commission Consultation Paper on Limitation of Actions, 398.

III.–7:302: Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings

(1) The running of the period of prescription is suspended from the time when judicial proceedings to assert the right are begun.

(2) Suspension lasts until a decision has been made which has the effect of res judicata, or until the case has been otherwise disposed of. Where the proceedings end within the last six months of the prescription period without a decision on the merits, the period of prescription does not expire before six months have passed after the time when the proceedings ended.

(3) These provisions apply, with appropriate adaptations, to arbitration proceedings, to mediation proceedings, to proceedings whereby an issue between two parties is referred to a third party for a binding decision and to all other proceedings initiated with the aim of obtaining a decision relating to the right.

(4) Mediation proceedings mean structured proceedings whereby two or more parties to a dispute attempt to reach an agreement on the settlement of their dispute with the assistance of a mediator.

COMMENTS

A. The options

A creditor who institutes an action to assert the right does what the law of prescription expects: the creditor takes the initiative to bring about an authoritative resolution of the dispute. It would be manifestly unfair if the period of prescription were to continue to run while judicial proceedings are pending. The debtor is now able to raise whatever other defence there may be and knows that the creditor is not treating the incident as closed. The proceedings prevent the right from becoming stale.

In this situation a legal system can do one of three things. It can determine (1) that the period of prescription ceases to run; or (2) that it is "interrupted" or renewed, with the effect that it starts to run afresh or (3) that its running is suspended as long as legal proceedings are pending.

Cessation of period of prescription. The first option (cessation) is the one following most naturally from a concept of a limitation of actions. It does not commend itself for rules of private law for it either leaves open the question of what happens when the legal proceedings have ended without a decision on the merits of the case, or it has to deal with this situation by way of a somewhat artificial fiction.

Interruption or renewal of period of prescription. The second option (interruption or renewal) is the solution traditionally adopted in Roman-law based legal systems. There is, however, something odd in the idea that the bringing of an action should renew rather than merely suspend the period of prescription. For by instituting an action the creditor sets in motion the court proceedings which last until a decision is given or until the case has been otherwise disposed of. Thus, we are not, as in other cases of renewal, dealing with a momentary event which could not sensibly extend the original prescription period, but with a continuing process. At the end of this process, there is normally clarity about the merits of the claim. And if there is not, there is no reason to have the entire period of prescription run afresh. Those legal systems subscribing to the interruption approach normally either specify how long the "interruption" lasts, or regard every act by any of the parties to the proceedings, and by the court, as a new cause of interruption. Both solutions are unsatisfactory. In particular, they lead to unnecessary complexities as well as undesirable practical consequences in cases where the proceedings have ended without a decision on the merits of the claim. Even an action that is dismissed without consideration of the merits (because it has been brought before a court lacking jurisdiction or because it is procedurally defective in other ways) has to have some effect on the running of the period of prescription because: (a) the creditor cannot always avoid the defect; (b) it would be impracticable to investigate in every individual case whether the creditor can be blamed for proceeding; and (c) the creditor has, after all, demonstrated a determination to pursue the claim. Legal systems subscribing to the interruption option can only come to one of two conclusions in this situation: the period of prescription is interrupted (which would go too far); or it is not interrupted after all (which not only entails clumsy fictions but is also practically unsatisfactory for the reason just mentioned).

Suspension of running of period of prescription. The preferable solution, therefore, is the third option: the running of the period of prescription is suspended while the legal proceedings last. If these proceedings lead to a judgment on the merits of the claim, there are two possibilities. Either the claimant succeeds in which case the right is now established by legal proceedings and thus subject to the prescription period of III.–7:202 (Period for a right established by judicial proceedings). Or the action is dismissed and it is now authoritatively settled that there is no right that could be subject to prescription. Where the proceedings end without a decision on the merits (because the action is procedurally defective, or because it has subsequently been withdrawn), the creditor has what remains of the old period of prescription to bring a new action. This is exactly what is required, subject to the special situation mentioned in the following Comment. In particular, no certainty as to the substance of the right has been achieved which might justify the setting in motion of an entirely new period of prescription under headings (i) and (iii) of the policy considerations mentioned in Comment E to III.–7:101 (Rights subject to prescription).

B. Details of implementation

Special attention has to be paid to the claimant whose action is dismissed, for procedural reasons, at a time when only very little of the old period of prescription is left. Here it may be regarded as reasonable to fix a minimum period which the claimant should have for taking action after suspension has ended. This is achieved by the second sentence of paragraph (2), which gives the creditor a minimum of six months after the proceedings have ended without a decision on the merits.

When suspension begins depends on what is regarded, under the applicable law, as an appropriate act to commence a lawsuit. Suspension lasts until a decision has been passed which is final in the sense of having the effect of res judicata, or until the case has been otherwise disposed of. Conveniently, therefore, if the judgment has been in favour of the claimant, the period of prescription of the right based on the judgment should also only start at that moment (see III.–7:203 (Commencement) paragraph (3)) and not when judgment is given. The latter approach would appear to be related to the view, rejected above, that every event within the legal proceedings, including the judgment itself, constitutes a cause of interruption.

Illustration
A has a right against B which is due on 15 March 2004. On 1 March 2007, A commences judicial proceedings on this right before the regional court in Regensburg. On 10 October 2007, the court passes a decision dismissing the right for lack of jurisdiction: the action should have been brought before the local court in Regensburg. On the same day, A waives the right to appeal. The running of the period of prescription was suspended between 1 March (the date when judicial proceedings were begun) and 10 October 2007 (the date when the decision of the regional court obtained the effect of res judicata). As a result, A now has another fourteen days to commence legal proceedings before the local court in Regensburg.

Normally, the claimant will bring an action with the aim of obtaining a title to start execution. However, an application for a declaratory judgment establishing the right is sufficient for the purposes of suspending the running of the period of prescription: just as the declaratory judgment itself is sufficient to warrant application of the special regime provided in III.–7:202 (Period for a right established by judicial proceedings).

C. Other proceedings

The rules applicable to judicial proceedings also apply to other proceedings, as long as these proceedings aim at procuring a binding decision on or relating to the right in question. Details depend on the applicable law. Arbitration proceedings are specifically mentioned because of their general recognition and practical importance. The general rule, as far as the commencement of arbitration proceedings are concerned, has to be that the creditor must have done everything in the creditor's power to start them. In the case of private instruments which may be enforced directly (see Comment C to III.–7:202 (Period for a right established by judicial proceedings)) it must be left to interpretation when the proceedings are begun. Mediation proceedings are also specifically mentioned because they are becoming increasingly important in relation to civil and commercial disputes. The policy expressed in the Article, and the definition of mediation proceedings, reflects the provisions of the Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council of 21 May 2008 on certain aspects of mediation in civil and commercial matters (see arts. 3 and 8). The reference to proceedings whereby an issue between two parties is referred to a third party for a binding decision is meant to cover cases such as those where a third party has to fix a price or some other term left open for external decision. The reference to all other proceedings initiated with the aim of obtaining a decision relating to the right is intended to cover all forms of alternative dispute resolution even if they do not fall within any of the named types.

NOTES

I. Limitation period ceases to run

1. In ENGLISH law, the limitation period ceases to run when the creditor commences proceedings against the debtor (McGee 2.001 ff.; [NB (4th ed, 2003) but new edition imminent; citation remains correct in 4th ed – HB]; Law Commission Consultation Paper on Limitation of Actions 164). This is also the approach adopted in IRELAND and by the UNCITRAL Convention: art. 13. On the problem of procedural delays, see, for English law, McGee 355 ff. In GERMANY the period of prescription is suspended from the time when judicial proceedings on the right are begun (CC § 204(1)); the suspension ends six months after the end of the proceedings (CC § 204(2); see Zimmermann, in: Koller/ Roth/ Zimmermann, Schuldrechtsmodernisierungsgesetz 2002 (2002), pp. 31 f.). In ESTONIA, the period of prescription is suspended for the time of judicial proceedings (GPCCA § 160(1)) with the general effect of suspension being that the period for prescription should not expire earlier than two months after termination of suspension (GPCCA § 168(2), i.e. upon entry into force of the court decision (GPCCA § 160(3)) or, in case of suspension of a court proceeding, three years after the last procedural act is performed by the parties or the court (GPCCA § 160(4)). Under art. 14 of the UNCITRAL Convention, the limitation period is "deemed to have continued to run" where legal proceedings end without a decision binding on the merits of the claim but the creditor has an extra year if, when the proceedings end, the limitation period has expired or has less than one year to run. For criticism, see Smit (1975) 23 AJCL 342. ff.

II. Prescription is interrupted

2. Commencement of judicial proceedings has the effect of interrupting prescription in FRANCE (2241 CC), BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG (CC art. 2244); AUSTRIA (CC § 1497); SPAIN (CC art. 1973; Ccom art. 944(1)); PORTUGAL (CC art. 323); GREECE (CC art. 261); SWITZERLAND (OR art. 138); ITALY (CC art. 2943); the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 3:316); SCOTLAND (Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 ss.6, 7 and 9 and Johnston para. 5.04 ff.); SLOVENIA (LOA arts. 365 and 369) and SWEDEN (Preskriptionslag (1981-130) § 7). In DENMARK prescription under Law no. 274 of 22 December 1908 is interrupted if the creditor brings a legal action and without unnecessary delay pursues that action to obtain judgment, settlement or other judicial decree (§ 2). There are no such rules for prescription under art. 5.14.4 of the Danske Lov since here a fresh prescription period begins to run again after a reminder by the creditor. The situation in FINLAND is the same as with regard to prescription under the Danske Lov. Reminder (skriftlig erinran) also triggers a fresh prescription period according to SWEDISH law (§§ 5 f Preskriptionslag (1981:130)). In POLAND, the period of prescription is interrupted by any action before a court or any other authority entrusted with the adjudication or enforcement of particular claims or before arbitrators, brought for the purpose of vindication, declaration or protection of the right (CC 123 § 1(1)).

3. According to the SLOVAK law if the creditor pursues the right before a court or other competent authority during the prescription period, the prescription period stops running from the moment of commencement of the proceedings. This rule also applies to a finally and conclusively awarded right where enforcement of the decision is applied for before a court or other authority (CC § 112). CZECH law is identical; more detailed rules can be found in the Ccom: if a right has been asserted in judicial or arbitral proceedings as a counterclaim, the prescription in relation to this right is regarded to have ceased to run on the day of commencement of the proceedings, on the assumption that the claim and the counterclaim are related to the same contract [...] (Ccom§ 404(1)).

4. For rules on how long the "interruption" lasts, see; the Greek CC art. 261; the ITALIAN CC art. 2945. Under the Austrian CC § 1497 interruption lasts as long as the judicial proceedings are "properly continued". Every act by any of the parties to the proceedings, and by the court, is regarded as a new cause of interruption under the Swiss OR art. 138; cf. also Spiro, Begrenzung § 147; for Scottish law, see Johnston para. 5.40. According to POLISH law, where prescription has been interrupted by an action brought before a court, arbitrators or any other authority, it does not begin anew until the proceedings have been terminated. After every interruption of the periods of prescription it begins to run anew (see: CC art. 124).

5. Under the SLOVAK CC § 112 the prescription period does not run during the proceedings subject to the proviso that the creditor properly continues the commenced proceedings. The same holds true for CZECH law.

III. Procedurally defective actions; withdrawal of action

6. Under the new GERMAN law (CC § 204) the running of the prescription period is suspended even if the action is procedurally defective; even an action before a court lacking jurisdiction suspends prescription (Staudinger(-Peters) § 204, n. 24 ff.). Under AUSTRIAN law (CC § 1497, 2) filing a claim is a reason for interruption but only an action meeting all procedural requirements interrupts prescription. The same is true in SLOVENIAN law (LOA art. 366). In FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG (CC art. 2246) also an action before a court without jurisdiction interrupts prescription. In ITALIAN law (CC art. 2943(3)) too, interruption is effective even if the judge lacks jurisdiction; the same applies to an action which is otherwise defective as long as it can be regarded as an act placing the debtor in default (see Roselli-Vitucci, 535 ff.).

7. In the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 3:316(2)), if the action is dismissed, commencement of the proceedings interrupts prescription only if within six months after the end of the first proceeding another action is instituted and this latter action is granted. For GREECE, cf. also CC art. 263; A.P. 1267/1995, EllDik 38 (1997) 838. In Greece and the Netherlands an action that is subsequently withdrawn is usually treated in the same way as a procedurally defective action; see Spiro, Begrenzung § 142 with references. Under art. 944(2) of the SPANISH Ccom prescription is deemed not to have been interrupted if the decision is not favourable to the claimant or if the action is withdrawn. SWISS law attributes the effect of interruption only to actions which result in a decision on the merits of the case and gets into difficulties where the claimant withdraws the action; see Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 139 ff. These problems are largely obviated by "downgrading" the effects of judicial proceedings from interruption to suspension.

8. In SLOVAK law bringing a procedurally defective action or an action which is otherwise defective (assuming that the defects are removable) has the same effect of interruption of the prescription period as for non-defective actions (see Supreme Court judgement (NS SR) R 46/2000). In case of stay of proceedings due to withdrawal of the action, commencement of such proceedings do not interrupt prescription (see Supreme Court judgement R 103/2001). Conclusions for CZECH law are very similar; in particular: if the creditor does not continue properly in the proceedings, i.e. the proceedings are finished without a decision on the merits, the prescription is regarded as never having been suspended (see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 443).

IV. Legal proceedings remain in abeyance

9. Some laws provide for the case where the legal proceedings remain in abeyance because the claimant fails to pursue them further; see, for GERMANY, CC § 204(2), 2, 3; for GREECE, CC art. 261; for ITALY, CC art. 2945(3); for ESTONIA, GPCCA § 160(4); for the CZECH REPUBLIC, Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 444; Supreme Court 2 Cdon 302/97; for SLOVAKIA, CC § 112 and, for a comparative discussion, Spiro, Begrenzung § 147. However, a regulation of this situation appears to be dispensable since, if the claimant fails to advance the proceedings the defendant may normally be expected to take steps to have the action dismissed; see Spiro, Begrenzung § 147 (n. 16); Staudinger(-Peters) § 204, n. 122, 125 ff. Details, of course, depend on the applicable procedural law. SLOVAK law provides that the interruption of prescription requires the “proper continuing of the commenced proceedings”.

V. Extra time

10. The minimum period for a claimant to bring another action where the proceedings have ended without a decision on the merits of the right varies: sixty days (SWITZERLAND: OR art. 139; two months in (ESTONIA: GPCCA § 168(2); six months (GERMANY: CC § 204(2); GREECE: CC art. 263(2); the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:316(2)); one year (art. 14(2) UNCITRAL Convention) and the CZECH REPUBLIC for commercial matters: CC § 405(2)).

VI. When does prescription cease to run?

11. Prescription is interrupted (in GERMANY suspended, CC § 204(1)) from the moment when judicial proceedings are begun. The precise date will depend on the applicable procedural law. See the comparative observations in (1979) 10 UNCITRAL Yearbook 159. For AUSTRIA see Mader/Janisch in Schwimann, ABGB VI, 3rd ed., § 1497 no 10. In SLOVAK law suspension is triggered by delivering the petition for commencement of the proceedings (Civil Procedure Code § 79) or by issuing a ruling on commencement of the proceedings without a petition (Civil Procedure Code § 81).

VII. Declaratory judgment

12. An action for a declaratory judgment may suspend or interrupt prescription: see, for GERMANY, CC § 204(1), no.1; for ESTONIA, GPCCA § 160(1); comparative: Spiro, Begrenzung § 133. For AUSTRIA see Mader/Janisch in Schwimann, ABGB VI, 3rd ed., § 1497 no. 12. For the CZECH REPUBLIC, see Commercial Code § 402 (but the opposite conclusion is held in non-commercial matters, see Supreme Court 29 Odo 565/2001).

VIII. Other proceedings

13. Prescription may also be suspended or interrupted while arbitration or other similar proceedings are pending: see, for GERMANY, CC § 204(1), no.11; for SWITZERLAND, OR art. 135, no. 2; for GREECE: CC art. 269; for ITALY: CC art. 2943(4); for PORTUGAL: CC art. 324; for SCOTLAND: Johnston para. 5.07 f.; for ESTONIA: GPCCA § 161; for SLOVAKIA CC § 112 (court or other competent authority), Ccom § 403; for the CZECH REPUBLIC: Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 443 and Ccom § 403; UNCITRAL Convention art. 14; Unidroit Principles art. 10.7 (Alternative dispute resolution). Some of these provisions specifically regulate the moment from which prescription ceases to run: see e.g. UNCITRAL Convention art. 14. Conciliation proceedings are especially mentioned as suspending prescription in the GERMAN CC § 204(1), nos.4, 8, 11 and the ESTONIAN GPCCA § 167(3).

III.–7:303: Suspension in case of impediment beyond creditor's control

(1) The running of the period of prescription is suspended as long as the creditor is prevented from pursuing proceedings to assert the right by an impediment which is beyond the creditor's control and which the creditor could not reasonably have been expected to avoid or overcome.

(2) Paragraph (1) applies only if the impediment arises, or subsists, within the last six months of the prescription period.

(3) Where the duration or nature of the impediment is such that it would be unreasonable to expect the creditor to take proceedings to assert the right within the part of the period of prescription which has still to run after the suspension comes to an end, the period of prescription does not expire before six months have passed after the time when the impediment was removed.

(4) In this Article an impediment includes a psychological impediment.

COMMENTS

The creditor must have a fair chance of pursuing the claim: otherwise prescription would operate unduly harshly. The creditor can hardly, however, be reproached for not pursuing a proceedings when not able to do so: agere non valenti non currit praescriptio. Also, it must be remembered that while the short general period of prescription set out in III.–7:201 (General period) accommodates the reasonable interests of the debtor, the rules concerning commencement and suspension of the period of prescription have to be tilted in favour of the creditor. Moreover, it would seem incongruous to protect a creditor who does not know about the right and not one who is unable to pursue proceedings to assert it. There is, however, no compelling reason to extend the period of prescription if the impediment preventing the institution of an action has ceased to exist well before the end of the prescription period. Thus, it would normally appear to be quite sufficient to extend the period of prescription by the amount of time for which the creditor was prevented, within the last six months of the prescription period, from pursuing proceedings to assert the right.

Illustration 1
B has a right for €100,000 against A, which has fallen due on 10 March 2002. On 1 January 2003 B's holiday resort in Austria is cut off from the outside world by a huge avalanche. Only two weeks later are communications restored and is he able to leave the resort. Prescription of A's right occurs on 10 March 2005. The period is not extended since although A was prevented from claiming his money for two weeks in 2003 on account of an impediment beyond his control, he still had more than two years after that event to pursue his claim.

Illustration 2
The facts are as above but B is cut off between 25 August and 6 September 2004. Prescription of the right only occurs on 16 March 2005 since the impediment prevented B from exercising his right for six days within the last six months of the prescription period.

Illustration 3
The facts are as above but B is cut off between 20 and 23 January 2005. Prescription of the right occurs on 14 March 2005 since B was prevented from exercising his right for four days within the last six months of the prescription period.

Illustration 4
The facts are as above but B is cut off between 6 and 14 March 2005. Prescription of the right occurs on 18 March 2005. B was prevented from exercising his right for nine days due to an impediment arising within the last six months of the prescription period. Suspension began on 6 March and ended on 14 March. But what was suspended was the running of the original prescription period which, but for the suspension, would have run out on 10 March. Thus, it is only the remaining four days of that period that run after the end of the suspension.

The above examples relate to impediments of short duration and of such a nature that there is no good reason to give the creditor any further concession than the suspension of the running of the period. There may however be impediments of such a duration or nature that it would be unreasonable to cut off the creditor's rights within a very short time after the impediment is removed. To deal with such cases paragraph (3) postpones the expiry of the period of prescription until six months after the impediment is removed.

X is abducted and held in an unknown location by the abductors, without any means of communication with the outside world, for over a year. The abduction took place two weeks before a right to payment was due to be rendered unenforceable by the expiry of the three-year period of prescription. In these circumstances it would not be sufficient to give X two weeks to start proceedings after being released. The period of prescription will not expire until six months after the time of release.

The formula chosen to define the range of impediments leading to suspension of the running of the period of prescription ties in with III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment); the comments to that provision apply.

The reference to psychological impediments in paragraph (4) is intended to cover cases such as those where childhood victims of sexual or other abuse are psychologically unable to express or act upon the abuse until a very much later date. In such cases expert evidence would be required in order to establish that the impediment really was beyond the person's control.

NOTES

I. Suspension for vis major

1. Some codes have rules suspending prescription where it is factually impossible for the creditor to pursue the claim. In GERMANY, the creditor must have been prevented from exercising the right as a result of vis major (höhere Gewalt) (CC § 206), "cessation of the administration of justice" being an example. The same is valid for SLOVENIAN law (LOA art. 360). GREEK law (CC art. 255, 1) is virtually identical and so is PORTUGUESE law (CC art. 321). Also art. 121-15 of the First Law of the Catalonian Civil Code upholds the suspension of the running of the prescription period due to force majeure, and so does ESTONIAN GPCCA § 163. The UNCITRAL Convention takes account of "a circumstance which is beyond the control of the creditor and which he could neither avoid or overcome" (art. 21). The SWISS code has a rule (OR art. 134, no. 6), suspending prescription as long as a claim cannot be asserted before a Swiss court. The interpretation of this rule is disputed (see Spiro, Begrenzung § 72; Peters & Zimmermann 271). For AUSTRIA, see CC § 1496 (regarding cases of military service, war, epidemics …). Under POLISH law, the prescription is suspended in relation to any claims where due to force majeure the entitled person is prevented from bringing them before a court or any other authority. The suspension lasts for the period while the hindrance continues (CC art. 121(4)).

II. Codes without such suspension ground

2. Other codes have no equivalent rule (for the NETHERLANDS, cf. Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I n. 684) or one which only covers a very special situation (for ITALY, see CC art. 2942: claims against unemancipated minors, persons under disability due to insanity, members of the armed forces, and related persons, in time of war; for SPAIN, see art. 955 Ccom: prescription can be suspended by the Government in cases of war, health disasters or revolution; the CC does not contain an equivalent rule). Presumably, the courts have recourse to the exceptio doli or comparable devices in appropriate cases: see Spiro, Fs Müller-Freienfels, 624. In FRANCE, the draftsmen of the code civil adopted only specific grounds of suspension and made it clear that these grounds were to be exhaustive (CC art. 2251). Nonetheless, the courts have drawn upon the old maxim of the Roman-Canon common law agere non valenti non currit praescriptio (which was supposed to have been abolished) in order to establish suspension of prescription in cases of impossibilité absolue d'agir (see Ferid & Sonnenberger 1 C 224 who comment that the courts have decided essentially contrary to the text of the law; the same view is expressed by Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1396). The new law codifies this and article 2234 now states that prescription does not run or is suspended in cases of “impossibilité d’agir par suite d’un empêchement resultant de la loi, de la convention ou de la force majeure”. BELGIAN case law has accepted suspension of prescription in cases where the claimant is prevented by law from exercising the rights in question (see Storme, in: Hondius 69) but otherwise has continued to hold that the statutory grounds for suspension are exhaustive. In ITALIAN law, the agere non valenti rule is still occasionally relied upon though only to justify application by analogy of a specific ground of suspension, e.g. in cases of a pactum de non petendo (cf. Roselli-Vitucci 510 ff.). ENGLISH, and IRISH law do not recognise vis major as a ground of suspension. Neither does SCOTTISH law. There are also no rules concerning the effect of vis major on prescription in SWEDISH, DANISH or FINNISH law. In CZECH and SLOVAK law there is no regulation concerning suspension of prescription due to vis major.

III. Only the last part of the period is relevant

3. The codes and statutes suspending prescription in cases of vis major, etc., tend to confine the effect of this rule in a similar, though not identical, manner to the one set out in the Article. According to GERMAN, ESTONIAN and GREEK law (CC § 206, GPCCA § 163, CC art. 255, 1), prescription is only suspended for as long as the creditor is prevented from pursuing the claim as a result of vis major within the last six months of the prescription period. Thus, the maximum period for which suspension may be suspended is six months. PORTUGAL has a period of three months (CC art. 321). Art. 21 of the UNCITRAL Convention extends the limitation period "so as not to expire before the expiration of one year from the date on which the relevant circumstance ceased to exist" (for comment, see (1979) 10 UNCITRAL Yearbook 164). Effectively, therefore, the creditor is granted a minimum period of one year to pursue the claim. But most impediments covered by the present rule will only last for a short while. It appears to be disproportionate in such cases to grant the creditor a full period of one year (or even six months) after the impediment has fallen away. There is no restriction period in POLISH law, the suspension lasts as long as the creditor is prevented from exercising the right. AUSTRIAN CC § 1496 does not mention this requirement.

III.–7:304: Postponement of expiry in case of negotiations

If the parties negotiate about the right, or about circumstances from which a claim relating to the right might arise, the period of prescription does not expire before one year has passed since the last communication made in the negotiations.

COMMENTS

Negotiations between the parties to reach a settlement out of court deserve to be encouraged. They should not have to be carried out under the pressure of an impending prescription of the claim. Nor should negotiations be allowed to constitute a trap for the creditor. A debtor who starts negotiating and who thus prevents the creditor from bringing an action should not later be allowed to refuse performance by invoking the time that has elapsed during those negotiations. Ultimately, the present provision has to be regarded as a special manifestation of the principle of good faith and fair dealing.

In order to minimise the effect of negotiations on prescription it is sufficient to postpone the expiry of the period of prescription rather than suspend its running (on the difference, see Comment A to III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance)). Once negotiations have failed, the creditor does not need more than a reasonable minimum period to decide whether to pursue the claim in court.

> A has a right to €20,000 against B. The right falls due on 10 October 2004. Between 10 October 2004 and 10 March 2005, negotiations are pending between A and B about whether the right exists. Prescription occurs on 10 October 2007; the period is not extended as a result of the negotiations.
> The facts are as above, but the negotiations take place between 20 December 2006 and 5 May 2007. The period of prescription is only completed on 5 May 2008 (one year after the end of negotiations).
> The facts are as above, but the negotiations take place between 1 September 2007 and 15 May 2008. Prescription occurs on 15 May 2009 (one year after the end of negotiations).

The term "negotiations" has to be interpreted widely. It covers any exchange of opinion which may reasonably lead the creditor to believe that the claim has not been finally rejected by the debtor. Conciliation proceedings, which appear to be of growing importance with regard, e.g., to medical malpractice suits in some countries, should also be taken as covered by the term negotiations.

The Chapter does not establish any formal requirements to clarify when the period during which prescription is delayed begins or ends. However, a debtor would be well advised to try to establish clearly when negotiations have broken down since, in accordance with general principle, it is the debtor who has to prove that negotiations have broken down. The general rules on when a notice or other communication takes effect may be relevant in this connection: the last communication in the negotiations will normally be regarded as made only when it reaches the addressee.

NOTES

I. Negotiations as a statutory ground of suspension

1. The reform of the law of obligations in the GERMAN CC widened the rule of the former CC § 852(2) to a general rule: Under CC § 203 the running of the prescription period is suspended as long as the parties negotiate in relation to the claim or the facts constituting the claim. The claim cannot become time-barred until three months after the end of the suspension have expired (see Zimmermann, in: Koller/Roth/Zimmermann, Schuldrechtsmodernisierungs-gesetz 2002 (2002), pp. 33 f.); Spiro, Begrenzung § 108. The prescription period is suspended on a similar basis under ESTONIAN law (GPCCA § 167(1)), with the general effect of suspension being that the period for prescription should not expire earlier than two months after suspension has expired (GPCCA § 168(2)). On the contrary, the reform of the law of prescription in the FRENCH CC does not include negotiations among the various causes of suspension, while mediation and conciliation do constitute causes of suspension (CC art. 2238), with the general effect that prescription starts again, for a time which cannot be less than 6 months after the mediation or conciliation is finished.

2. In GREEK law, prescription is suspended as long as the debtor fraudulently dissuades the creditor from pursuing the claim within the last six months of the prescription period (CC art. 255 sent. 2). This rule was applied by the Areios Pagos in the case of negotiations (13/1989, EllDik 31 (1990), 1235 (1236)). In ITALY it has been held that prescription is suspended from the moment when a settlement out of court is reached until the final judgment invalidating that settlement (cf. Roselli-Vitucci 516). This is a situation similar to suspension as a result of negotiations. The principle behind the ruling appears to be that prescription does not run against a person who is unable to bring an action.

II. Other approaches

3. Most of the other legal systems do not have a provision of this kind, but only very few of them are happy to allow the debtor "to negotiate himself into limitation" (see the report on NORWEGIAN law to case study 20, Prescription I, in Zimmermann & Whittaker 504). Most want to help the creditor somehow. According to DANISH law, if the debtor has embarked upon serious negotiations, prescription is suspended until these negotiations have broken down; see Gomard, Obligationsret III, 239. As far as SWITZERLAND is concerned, Spiro, Begrenzung (§ 108) takes prescription to be suspended during negotiations even without a statutory basis. In other countries we find extended interpretations of the notions of acknowledgement and waiver; the use of equitable doctrines like promissory estoppel or personal bar; or resort to the general notion of good faith, to the doctrine of abuse of right or to the exceptio doli (for details, see the country reports for GREECE, AUSTRIA, FRANCE, BELGIUM, SPAIN, ITALY, the NETHERLANDS, ENGLAND, IRELAND, SCOTLAND and the NORDIC COUNTRIES to case 20, as well as the comparative observations at the end of case 21, in Zimmermann & Whittaker 493 ff., 530 f.). For the case law in the NETHERLANDS cf. also Koopmann 72 ff. In IRELAND the courts, on the basis of their equitable jurisdiction, may stop a party from pleading limitation if it appears that there was a representation (express or implied) by one of the parties that a suspension would occur during the negotiations; see Brady & Kerr 171 ff. In SWEDISH law, negotiations would normally constitute a "reminder" which triggers a new ten year period according to Preskriptionslag (1981:130) §§ 5 ff. CZECH law does not recognize negotiations as a cause for suspension of the prescription, but pleading of prescription may be judged as contrary to good morals and thus inadmissible in certain situations (CC § 3(1) and Constitutional Court I ÚS 643/04).

4. Under POLISH law, there is no specific provision relating to negotiations, but a broad interpretation of the rule on acknowledgement of the claim by the person against whom it is made may be applied. Such acknowledgement causes the interruption of the period of prescription (CC art. 123 § 1(2)). See: Supreme Court judgment of September 19, 2002 (II CKN 1312/00, OSNC 2003/12/168), where it was found that when the debtor requests the creditor to accept the performance of an obligation in instalments and to exempt him from payment of interest for late performance, it can be deemed an acknowledgment of the claim even though the proposed agreement was finally not concluded between the parties. In SLOVAK law there is no specific regulation of postponement of expiry of the prescription period in case of negotiations.

III. A form requirement?

5. An argument against a rule suspending prescription in case of negotiations is that it can lead to uncertainty. When does suspension start and end? (See Preston & Newsom 146). A form requirement has sometimes been suggested to meet this objection: suspension begins if one of the parties requests negotiations in writing, and ends if one of them refuses, in writing, to continue to negotiate (see Peters & Zimmermann 320 f.) The reform of the law of obligations in the GERMAN CC (see CC § 203) did not follow this suggestion (see BT-Drucksache 14/6040, p.112). This argument has restrained the French legislator from admitting that negotiations can be a cause of suspension, although this had been recommended by Malaurie in the Avant projet de réforme du droit des obligations et de la prescription (art. 2264 Avant-projet).

III.–7:305: Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity

(1) If a person subject to an incapacity is without a representative, the period of prescription of a right held by or against that person does not expire before one year has passed after either the incapacity has ended or a representative has been appointed.

(2) The period of prescription of rights between a person subject to an incapacity and that person's representative does not expire before one year has passed after either the incapacity has ended or a new representative has been appointed.

COMMENTS

A. The options

The principle that prescription does not run against a person who is unable to bring an action also requires prescription not to run against a creditor who is subject to an incapacity. The paradigmatic example is the minor who is unable because of minority to pursue a claim in court. Some legal systems, therefore, have a general rule to the effect that prescription does not run against a minor. Arguably, however, it overshoots the mark. For a minor normally has a legal representative (such as a parent or guardian) capable of bringing proceedings on his or her behalf. It is arguable, therefore, that the minor only requires protection where there is no such representative.

B. The general approach

The choice between these two approaches is not an easy one. On balance, however, commercial certainty would appear to be too gravely jeopardised if a person exposed to a claim by a minor had to wait at least until the minor had reached the age of majority plus three years. The interests of the minor cannot in this respect prevail against those of the third party, since the legal system may reasonably proceed from the assumption that the parent or guardian has a responsibility to look after the interests of the minor. This is particularly obvious in the case of rights other than those for compensation for personal injuries, such as contractual rights. If the adult representative fails to act in the appropriate manner this is a risk that the minor should bear, subject to rights against the representative. Moreover, the minor can be protected at least to the extent that expiry of the period of prescription of the minor's rights against the representative can be postponed until a reasonable time after the minor reaches the age of majority.

C. Person under disability without a representative

The Article specifies the situations in which protection is required. The effect of the first paragraph is confined to the situation where the minor or other person subject to an incapacity is without a representative. Two additional points have to be noted. (i) Protection of the person subject to an incapacity only appears to be necessary if the lack of representation existed within the last year of the prescription period, as long as the law makes sure that a reasonable period is available after either the incapacity or the lack of representation has been removed. Lack of representation, therefore, does not suspend the running of the prescription period but merely postpones its expiry. (ii) The rule works both ways, i.e. it also affects rights against the person subject to an incapacity. Though not impossible, it is often not easy for the creditor of a person subject to an incapacity who lacks a representative to pursue a claim. Thus, it appears to be equitable to grant such a creditor the same protection as is granted to the person subject to the incapacity.

D. Rights between person subject to an incapacity and the representative

The second paragraph supplements the first. If, as far as third parties are concerned, a minor (for example) has to bear the consequences of the representative's failure to act, the minor must at least be able to sue the representative for damages. This the minor can normally only do on attaining the age of majority. Once again, however, it is unnecessary to suspend prescription. It is sufficient that a reasonable period is available for bringing an action after reaching the age of majority. Once again, it is equitable to make the rule work both ways.

E. Personal injuries

In some countries, sexual abuse of children has given rise to civil litigation. Here the law may arguably rely on the representative adult to take whatever action is appropriate, where the person abusing the child is an unrelated stranger. Where the person abusing the child is the parent, postponing the expiry of the period of prescription of all rights between child and parent would help, at least to a certain extent. However, the minor will often have repressed the traumatic childhood experience and may need considerable time to break down the psychological barriers preventing acknowledgement of what has happened. Thus, it may be more appropriate in these cases to suspend the running of, rather than to postpone the expiry of, the period of prescription. See III.–7:303 (Suspension in case of impediment beyond creditor’s control) paragraph (3). Moreover, there have been cases where the child is abused by another family member with whom the parent connives or whom he or she does not want to sue for other reasons. Here it might also be appropriate to introduce a rule suspending prescription – either of the rights against the third party or at least against the parent. However, this does not seem to be the place for such specialised rules, which raise difficult and emotive issues. If the rules in the Chapter are considered inadequate for this special situation, the matter would be best dealt with by special laws relating to this matter.

F. Rights between spouses

Another related matter may be mentioned here, although it is not a question of incapacity. In a number of codes, rights between spouses are subjected to the same regime as rights between children and their parents or guardians: prescription is suspended as long as the marriage persists. The common denominator is the family tie which constitutes, in the old-fashioned language of the draftsmen of the CC, a relationship of piety requiring utmost care and protection. But such a rule appears hardly defensible today. It leads to problems being swept under the carpet rather than solved. The death of one of the spouses should not enable the other to surprise disagreeable heirs by presenting them with rights which would normally have prescribed many years ago. Nor should divorce provide the trigger for settling old scores. Marriage would then have had the effect of removing protection against stale claims: a result which may well be regarded as discriminatory. If, on the other hand, one were to regard the rationale underlying suspension concerning rights between spouses as sound, it is difficult to see why the rule should not be generalised so as to cover other closely related persons living in a common household. However, delimitation of its range of application would then become an intricate exercise which would inevitably jeopardise legal certainty. The only special rule that is required is the one concerning rights between persons under a disability and their representatives, and it is based on a different rationale: not on the close personal ties existing between these persons but on the impossibility of action by the person under the disability.

G. Adults subject to an incapacity

The previous remarks have often focused on the minor. Of course, they apply with appropriate modifications also to persons who lack the capacity to pursue claims because they are of unsound mind.

NOTES

I. Prescription not running against persons subject to an incapacity

1. In FRANCE, BELGIUM, LUXEMBOURG, ENGLAND, IRELAND, SLOVENIA and SCOTLAND prescription does not run against persons subject to an incapacity: see, for FRANCE CC art. 2235 (see also 2236 which extends the rule to spouses and partners engaged in a PACS) see, for the other two countries, CC art. 2252 first part; the English Limitation Act 1980 s. 28; the Irish Statute of Limitations Act 1957 s. 49; the Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 s.6(4)(b) and Johnston, para. 6.130 ff. For exceptions to this general rule, see the French CC art. 2235, second part; the complex regulation in the English Limitation Act 1980 ss. 28, 28A. The Law Commission has recommended that the normal three-year period should not run against a person subject to mental incapacity, but in certain situations the claim may be barred after ten years: see Report No 270 on Limitation of Actions para. 3.133.). Though originally suppressed in art. 1932 SPANISH CC, the "contra non valentem agere non currit praescripto" rule has been included in the First Law of the Catalonian CC. In SLOVENIAN law, however, the prescription expires only two years after the attainment of full age or the time when a person is appointed as a curator or guardian. See LOA art. 362.

II. Person subject to an incapacity without a representative

2. Protection is granted to a person subject to an incapacity, but without a representative, according to AUSTRIAN (CC § 1494); GERMAN (CC § 210); GREEK (CC art. 258(2)); PORTUGUESE (CC art. 320); ITALIAN law (CC art. 2942(1)); ESTONIAN law (GPCCA § 165); CZECH law (CC § 113); and POLISH law (CC art. 122). At the same time, these codes generally suspend the prescription of rights of the person under disability against the representative as long as the disability lasts: CC art. § 1495; CC § 207(1), 2, no.2-5, 3; Greek CC art. 256; Portuguese CC art. 320; Italian CC art. 2941, nos. 2-4; Estonian GPCCA § 164(2)-(3) and the CZECH CC § 114. For similar rules, see for SWITZERLAND OR art. 134, nos. 1 and 2, for the NETHERLANDS, CC art. 3:321(1) under (b); for FRANCE CC art. 475; generally, see Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 75 f.

3. For the shift in continental legal development from taking account of the legal disability as such towards balancing the interest of the minor against those of the debtor, see Mugdan I, 528; Peters & Zimmermann 128. In SWITZERLAND and the NETHERLANDS the codes do not contain any provision suspending the prescription of a minor's rights (except in so far as these rights are against the representative). For details, and circumventions, see Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 95 ff., 106. In SPANISH law prescription runs to the disadvantage even of persons subject to incapacity, who are left to their remedy against the "representative whose negligence has caused the prescription" (CC art. 1932).

4. In GERMANY lack of representation does not suspend the running of the prescription period but merely postpones its expiry for six months; CC § 210. For the similar rule in GREECE, see CC art. 258(2). Similarly, under POLISH law, the period of prescription against a person not possessing full capacity for legal acts does not terminate until two years have elapsed from the day on which legal representation was established or on which the grounds for such establishment ceased. If the period of prescription is less than two years, it is counted from the day on which legal representation was established or from the day on which the ground for such establishment ceased (CC art. 122). The Italian rule is different in that prescription is suspended for the period during which the person under disability lacks representation and for six months following the appointment of such representative or the termination of the disability: CC art. 2942. Under ESTONIAN law, lack of representation does suspend the running of the prescription and also postpones its expiry for a minimum of six months after expiry of suspension; GPCCA § 165.

5. Under the German CC § 210 prescription is suspended for and against the person under a disability who lacks representation. For ITALY see CC art. 2942; for ESTONIA see GPCCA § 165(1).

III. Claims between person under disability and representative

6. Prescription of rights between a person under a disability and his or her representative is normally extended by way of suspension rather than postponement of the expiry of the period of prescription; AUSTRIA CC § 1495; GERMANY CC § 207(1), 2, no.2-5, 3; GREECE CC art. 256, nos. 2 and 3; SWITZERLAND OR art. 134, nos. 1 and 2; ITALY CC art. 2941, nos. 2-4; PORTUGAL CC art. 318, b; CC-KE § 213; POLAND CC 121(2); ESTONIA GPCCA § 164(2)-(3); for FRANCE, see Taisne, Jurisclasseur civil, arts. 2251-2259, n. 14; for the CZECH REPUBLIC, see CC § 114. Contra: the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:321(1) under (b); Staudinger (-Peters) § 204, n. 3.

7. SLOVAK law provides that prescription of rights between a legal representative on one side and represented persons on the other (involving persons under disability as well) neither starts running nor goes on running unless the right is to the payment of interest or to a repeated performance (CC § 114). CZECH law is the same.

IV. Personal injuries

8. On prescription in cases involving sexual abuse of children, see Hondius 9 f; On prescription in cases involving sexual abuse of children, see Hondius 9 f; Law Commission Report No 270 on Limitation of Actions paras 4.23-4.33; the NETHERLANDS HR, 23 October 1998 and 25 June 1999, Ned. Jur. 2000, 15/16; and the IRISH Statute of Limitations (Amendment) Act 2000; the NETHERLANDS HR, 23 October 1998 and 25 June 1999, Ned. Jur. 2000, 15/16; GERMANY: CC § 208; and the IRISH Statute of Limitations (Amendment) Act 2000. In POLAND, generally, prescription of claims of children against their parents is suspended for the period when parental authority lasts (CC 121(1)).

V. Claims between spouses

9. Claims between spouses are suspended, as long as the marriage persists, in FRANCE (2236, extending it to partners in a registered partnership), BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG (CC art. 2253); AUSTRIA (CC § 1495); GERMANY (CC § 207(1), 1; for a spirited attack on the rule, see Staudinger(-Peters) § 207, n. 2); GREECE (CC art. 256); PORTUGAL (CC art. 318, a); SWITZERLAND (OR art. 134, no. 3); ITALY (CC art. 2941, no. 1 and Constitutional Court, 19.2.1976, n. 35 in Giust.civ. 1976, III, 131); the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 3:321(1) under (a)); ESTONIA (GPCCA § 164 (1)); POLAND: CC 121(3); and the CZECH REPUBLIC: CC § 114.

Generally, see Spiro, Begrenzung § 74 and FS Bosch, 975 ff. In Germany the same rule applies to (registered) civil partners (CC § 207(1), 2, no.1).

10. SLOVAK law provides that prescription of rights between spouses (as long as the marriage persist) neither starts running nor goes on running unless the matter relates to the payment of interest or a repeated performance (CC § 114).

III.–7:306: Postponement of expiry: deceased's estate

Where the creditor or debtor has died, the period of prescription of a right held by or against the deceased's estate does not expire before one year has passed after the right can be enforced by or against an heir, or by or against a representative of the estate.

COMMENTS

When a person has died it can happen, at least under some succession regimes prevailing in Europe, that the estate is without a personal representative, or heir, who can sue or be sued for rights by or against the estate. It is reasonable in such a case to postpone expiry of the period of prescription on the model established for persons subject to an incapacity (III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity)). The situations are very similar, and so is the underlying rationale that prescription does not run against a person who is unable to bring an action. This applies to rights by and against the estate.

NOTES

1. The rule can be found in GERMAN law: CC § 211 but the minimum period is six months rather than one year. The rule has not given rise to problems and its wisdom has never been questioned. Few other legal systems, however, contain the same or a similar rule. See, however, for GREECE, CC art. 259 and for PORTUGAL, CC art. 321. In SWITZERLAND, the general provision of OR art. 134, no. 6 – concerning rights which the creditor is unable to pursue before a Swiss court - appears to be applied in appropriate cases: see Spiro, Begrenzung § 72 (158 f.). The codes in BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG (CC art. 2258(2)) and SPAIN (CC art. 1934) even specifically state that prescription is not suspended (cf. Díez-Picazo & Gullón Ballesteros I, 471). In FRANCE, art. 2237 CC states that prescription does not run or is suspended in relation to the rights of an heir against the deceased's estate. The ENGLISH Limitation Act 1980 provides in s.11(5) that where an injured person dies before the three-year period has elapsed, the relevant period is three years from the date of death or from the date of the personal representative's knowledge of the facts, whichever is later. There is a similar rule in SCOTLAND: Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 s.18. For IRELAND, see s.9 of the Civil Liability Act 1961. AUSTRIA, POLAND and the NETHERLANDS have no equivalent rule. Under ESTONIAN law, the period of prescription for a claim which is part of an estate or directed against an estate is suspended until the time when the successor accepts the estate or bankruptcy is declared with regard to the estate or an administrator is appointed to exercise custody over the estate and its expiry is postponed for a minimum of six months after the ending of the suspension (GPCCA § 166). In SLOVAKIA and the CZECH REPUBLIC there is no regulation comparable to the Article.

III.–7:307: Maximum length of period

The period of prescription cannot be extended, by suspension of its running or postponement of its expiry under this Chapter, to more than ten years or, in case of rights to damages for personal injuries, to more than thirty years. This does not apply to suspension under III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings).

COMMENTS

A. Uniformity or differentiation?

The Chapter establish a core regime of a short period of prescription (three years according to III.–7:201 (General period) but, because of the rule on reasonable discoverability (III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance)), prescription may nonetheless be postponed for decades. But prescription should not be deferred indefinitely: at some stage, the parties must be able to treat the incident as indubitably closed. A maximum period after which no claim may be brought, regardless of the creditor's knowledge, appears to be necessary as a counterbalance to the discoverability principle. It is required in terms of all three policy considerations referred to above (Comment E to III.–7:101 (Rights subject to prescription)) which underlie the law of prescription. This is increasingly recognised internationally. The question is how long this maximum period should be. Once again, we observe an international trend – though not an entirely unequivocal one – towards a shorter period. But this shorter period often only applies to rights which do not involve personal injuries. Thus, taking account of the more modern codifications and reform proposals, there appear, once again, to be two fundamental options: differentiation or uniformity.

Differentiation would have to be along the line of rights to damages for personal injuries versus other rights. Most situations which have been specified as being particularly problematic (sexual abuse of children, asbestosis, medical malpractice) fall into the category of rights to damages for personal injuries. The reasons for treating them differently are that there is often a long latency period and that life, health and the bodily integrity in general are particularly valuable objects of legal protection: personal injuries are generally regarded as more serious than property damage or economic harm. For the latter even a short long-stop of ten years is very widely regarded as sufficient. There should also be no objection to subjecting other types of rights (such as rights for specific performance, or rights for the reversal of unjustified enrichment) to a ten year long-stop. For personal injuries, a long-stop of thirty years is widely regarded as appropriate. Finally, the distinction between rights to damages for personal injuries and other rights appears to be comparatively straightforward. Personal injuries are all injuries to the bodily integrity of a person. All rights arising from such injury (including, for instance, psychiatric injury and compensation for pain and suffering) are covered by the thirty-year period.

Alternatively, one might try to find a compromise solution which accommodates both rights to damages for personal injuries and other rights while not providing a perfect solution to either of them. The arguments for this option are as follows. (i) Even a thirty year period will not provide a perfect solution for rights to damages for personal injuries since there will still be cases where the creditor did not know about the claim. (ii) An incident might cause both personal injury and damage to property. For example, a defective machine explodes and damages the purchaser's health and property. Or asbestos is used in the process of renovating a house; after some years, the owner contracts asbestos-related cancer and has to undergo expensive treatment; at the same time, the house has to be pulled down. If it is possible, after all those years, to prove who was responsible for using asbestos, and that the presence of asbestos in the house has caused the owner's disease, it is hard to see why the owner should be able to pursue rights based on injury to health but not rights based on damage to property: if the one is established, so is the other. (iii) It is as difficult for the debtor to mount a defence after twenty or thirty years in an action for damages for personal injuries as it is in an action concerning damage to property. The obfuscating power of time does not distinguish between different types of rights. Witnesses die, the debtor's memory fades and vital documents are lost. Once again, it must be remembered that we usually only see the hardship involved for a creditor who is barred by prescription although able, even after the lapse of many years, to establish the claim; and that we tend to forget about the many cases in which a prescription regime prevents unjustified claims from being pursued. (iv) One important source of rights based on personal injuries is defective products. Here we have a general long-stop (for personal injuries and damage to property) in all member states of the EU as a result of the Product Liability Directive; and it was the relatively short period of ten years which was regarded as sufficient in this situation. (This period even starts to run when the producer has brought the defective product into circulation!).

On balance, it has been decided to follow the first of these approaches and to adopt the distinction between rights based on personal injuries (long-stop of thirty years) and other rights (long-stop of ten years). However, within the framework of the Chapter, this long-stop is not, as it is usually perceived, a prescription period. This is due to the fact that discoverability is not the moment of commencement of the period of prescription. Commencement is defined in III.–7:203 (Commencement), a provision which is of general application. The running of the period of prescription is merely suspended as long as the creditor does not know, and could not reasonably know, of the facts giving rise to the right and of the identity of the debtor. Thus, the long-stop becomes in fact a rule on the maximum effect of extension of the period of prescription. As a result, we do not have two prescription periods for one and the same claim, running side by side with each other; instead, we have a uniform regime of one period of three years which may be extended to a maximum length of ten (or thirty) years. It goes without saying that the ten (or thirty) years must be counted from the time laid down in III.–7:203.

Any specially extended period for environmental damage must be left to special legislation.

B. Range of application

Obviously, the maximum period applies to suspension in case of ignorance. If the special need for legal certainty in this field of law is kept in mind, however, it has to apply as broadly as possible. Only reasons inherent in the nature of things should override this final date. Such reasons are apparent only in one situation: suspension in case of judicial proceedings (III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings)). One cannot expect more of the creditor than to attempt to establish the right by judicial proceedings. How long these proceedings take is very largely a matter the creditor cannot control. Everything is now under way to remove the existing uncertainty and it would clearly be inequitable if the creditor could be trapped by prescription in this situation.

Apart from III.–7:302 (Suspension in case of judicial and other proceedings), the maximum period laid down in the present Article applies to all grounds of suspension or postponement of expiry provided for in these Chapter, and also in situations where two or more of them apply to the same claim. It therefore provides a limit to the operation of III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance), III–7:303 (Suspension in case of impediment beyond creditor's control), III.–7:304 (Postponement of expiry in case of negotiations), III.–7:305 (Postponement of expiry in case of incapacity) and III.–7:306 (Postponement of expiry: deceased's estate). For extension of prescription by way of agreement, see III.–7:601 (Agreements concerning prescription).

Illustration
On 10 March 2004, A observes some cracks in his house which was built by B a few years earlier. A investigates the matter and discovers (i) that the cracks are due to a defect in the foundations of the house, (ii) that B was responsible for that defect and (iii) that expensive repairs are necessary to prevent further deterioration. On the assumption that the moment triggering the period of prescription for A's right to damages for non-performance by B of B's contractual obligation (i.e. the moment of the defective performance) was 1 March 1996, the running of the period was suspended until 10 March 2004. If A and B now start to negotiate about the claim, the period of prescription can be further extended in terms of III.–7:304 (Postponement of expiry in case of negotiations), but not beyond 1 March 2006.

C. Fraus omnia corrumpit (fraud unravels all)?

In a number of countries, we find a general rule in terms of which the running of the period of prescription is suspended if the debtor fraudulently (or deliberately) conceals the existence of the right. Such a rule, however, appears to be unnecessary in view of the fact that the running of the period is suspended anyway, as long as the creditor does not know, and could not reasonably know, about the right. The only question of practical relevance is whether fraud (as opposed to mere ignorance) should override the long-stop. But even in this respect a special rule would do more harm than good. Whether the debtor, under certain circumstances, may be barred from raising the defence of prescription is a question of a general and complex nature which defies reduction to a simple and straightforward formula. A legal system that recognises an overriding requirement of good faith will not, in principle, deny such a possibility. Raising the defence of prescription is subject to the requirements of good faith and fair dealing. A person has a duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing in, among other things, defending a remedy for non-performance of an obligation. Breach of the duty may preclude the person from relying on a defence which would otherwise have been available. Of course, it must be taken into account that prescription rules are geared specifically towards bringing about a state of legal certainty (even at the expense of individual justice) and therefore must not be interfered with lightly. Moreover, even here the lapse of time cannot be considered entirely irrelevant since, after many years have passed, it becomes increasingly difficult and unproductive to argue about whether there has been fraudulent concealment or not. Still, however, the good faith issue can arise. But if it does, it does not do so only in a clearly definable category of cases which can be grouped under the heading of fraudulent concealment of the claim. Force and fear can be equally relevant. And even in cases where there has been neither fraud, nor force, nor fear, a debtor may in certain situations be barred from invoking prescription: particularly where the debtor has promised not to do so.

NOTES

I. General

1. The GREEK CC art. 937(1) 2) provides for a long-stop of twenty years (from the moment when the wrongful act was committed and a short period of five years running from the moment of knowledge. The SWISS code has ten years in the two situations where it requires knowledge (OR art. 60(1), 67(1)). The NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 3:309, 310, 311) and SCOTLAND (Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 s.7) have long-stops of twenty years. A challenge to the consistency of the twenty-year period with the European Convention on Human Rights failed in the Scottish courts: K v Gilmartin's Executrix 2002 S.C. 602, affirmed 2004 S.C. 784 (child abuse case brought by adult victim 40+ years after the events in question). The ENGLISH Limitation Act 1980 recognises two exceptional long-stops of ten and fifteen years (ss.11A and 14A, relating to actions in negligence for latent damage and product liability). The GERMAN CC distinguishes between claims for damages for personal injury (CC § 199(2)), other claims for damages (CC § 199(3)) and claims other than for damages (CC § 199(4)): claims for damages because of personal injury have a long-stop of thirty years running from the moment when the wrongful act was committed; other claims for damages become time-barred ten years after they have come into existence or thirty years after the wrongful act was committed; the earlier being decisive. Claims other than for damages have a long-stop of ten years. The English Law Commission has recommended a solution based on a ten year long-stop applicable to all actions other than those for personal injury for which there should be no limit (Law Commission Report No 270 on Limitation of Actions). The new BELGIAN law has a long-stop of twenty years (applicable to all rights for damages for a wrongful act: art. 2226 bis § 1 al. 2; for details, see Claeys, 1998-99 R.W. 388 ff.). However, contrary to III-7:307, the long stop can also be interrupted/renewed and suspended: only the discovery rule does not apply to it. Generally, see Storme, in: Hondius, 58 (who regards the combination of two periods as the only balanced solution); Law Commission Consultation Paper on Limitation of Actions, 284 ff; Spiro, Begrenzung § 42; Zimmermann, 2000 JZ 863 f; cf. also the approach adopted in the Product Liability Directive, arts. 10 ff. (three and ten years) and art. 17 of the Convention on civil liability for damage resulting from activities dangerous to the environment (three and ten years). POLISH law, as regards non-contractual liability, has a long-stop of ten years from the moment when the wrongful act occurred (or in case of product liability – when the product was put into circulation); and the short period of three years from the moment of knowledge of the damage and the person liable (CC art. 442 and CC art. 449^8). In ESTONIA, along with the general period of three years with the commencement subject to discoverability, a long-stop of ten years applies to rights to delictual damages and to redress of unjustified enrichment (GPCCA § 150(3), § 151(2) and long-stop period of thirty years to claims arising from acts causing death, bodily injury or damage to health or deprivation of liberty (GPCCA § 153). On the other hand, neither the SOUTH AFRICAN Prescription Act or the QUEBEC CC recognise a long-stop. In FRANCE, the new law provides for a 20-year long-stop period (art. 2232).However, some exceptions are provided for in art. 2232 al. 2. Among these exceptions, there is a general one for personal injury, for which there is not only an extended delay (10 years from the date of the "consolidation" of the initial or aggravated damage) but no long stop period. The special responsibility regime for liability for defective products also has a long-stop period of 10 years starting from the date the defective product has been put into circulation combined with a three-year prescription period for damages starting from the date the claimant knew or should have known of the damage, defect and the producer's identity (CC art. 1386-16, law of 18 May 1998). IRELAND also does not have a long-stop (except in the Liability for Defective Products Act 1991 and with regard to actions for recovery of money charged on land; see Brady & Kerr, 34) but recognises a general discretion inhering in the courts to dismiss proceedings on the basis of inordinate or inexcusable delay in their prosecution. This has the effect of providing the judiciary with a long-stop which can trump the extended limitation period provided by the discoverability rule introduced by the Statute of Limitations (Amendment) Act 1991. For discussion, see Loubser 37; Deslauriers, in: Hondius, 300.

2. As for rights to compensation for damage and rights to reversal of unjustified enrichment, the SLOVAK law (CC 106(2), 107(2)) has a long-stop of three years (ten years for intentionally caused damage) from the moment of occurrence of the event from which the damage arose. For commercial relationships the total period of prescription may not exceed a period of 10 years from the date when it first began to run (Ccom § 408(1)). CZECH law is identical.

3. In general, under the SPANISH CC a suspension of a prescription period is not allowed (only the interruption, after which the time begins to run again). Therefore, there are no provisions about a maximum period of the prescription's suspension.

II. Personal injuries claims

4. For a comparative assessment of the cases where a comparatively short long-stop may be problematic see Hondius 9 ff. The ENGLISH Law Commission has recommended that there should there should be no long-stop on personal injury claims (Law Commission Report No 270 on Limitation of Actions, para 3.107); the GERMAN code (CC § 199(2)) specifically lists life, health, bodily integrity and freedom as the relevant objects of legal protection. Freedom is included on the ground that unlawful deprivation of liberty may lead to psychological damage which only manifests itself much later: Abschlußbericht 76. In the FRENCH CC, there is an extended delay for personal injury (10 years from the date of the "consolidation" of the initial or aggravated damage) and no long stop period (2232 al. 2). In the NETHERLANDS since 2004, rights to damages for personal injury or death can prescribe only if five years have elapsed since the day following the one on which the claimant has become aware of both the damage and the person responsible for the damage (Article 3:310 (5)). In the preceding period in which such a right prescribed in any case by the lapse of twenty (or thirty) years since the event which caused the damage the Hoge Raad had already decided that this twenty-year long stop laid down in CC art. 3:310 could be set aside under exceptional circumstances: HR 28 April 2000, Ned. Jur. 2000, 430/431. Both cases concerned a special type of cancer caused by exposure to asbestos; the incubation period is normally between twenty and forty years. The Court based its ruling on CC art. 6:2 (according to which any rule based on the law, general usage or a legal act is not applicable as far as it is, under the circumstances, inappropriate according to the precepts of good faith). The cases have given rise to considerable comment, both favourable (e.g. Hondius, 2000 NTBR 275) and unfavourable (e.g. van Schaick, 2000 WPNR 6414). For an assessment of the former situation cf. also Hartlief, 2001 NTBR 58 ff. Under the ITALIAN law, see CC art. 2947, applicable unless the tort is also a crime (where the longer prescription for the crime is applicable) and art. 125 Codice del Consumo, d.lgs. September 6, 2005 no. 206.

5. In SLOVAK law the long-stop rule of three years (ten years for damage caused intentionally) does not apply to damage to health (CC § 106(2) in fine). The same holds true for CZECH law.

III. Fraud

6. Prescription is suspended on the ground of fraudulent conduct by the debtor (e.g. concealment, dissuasion) under the ITALIAN CC (art. 2941, no. 8; Roselli-Vitucci 513 ff); the GREEK CC art. 255, 2; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 3:321 (1)(f); the ENGLISH Limitation Act 1980 s. 32(1)(b) the IRISH Statute of Limitations Act 1957 s.71(1); and the SCOTTISH Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 s.6(4)(a)(i). The codes in FRANCE, BELGIUM, AUSTRIA, GERMANY, SWITZERLAND and QUEBEC do not have a general provision of this kind but for special provisions relating to certain short prescription periods see CC §§ 438(3), 634a(3). For comparative observations, see Spiro, Begrenzung § 82. CZECH CC operates with a more general category of "intentionally caused damage" and in this respect prolongs the long-stop from three to ten years (for damage caused by bribery even the short-stop is prolonged: from two to three years), see § 106(2)(3).

7. Should fraud override the long-stop? For a positive answer, see the ENGLISH Law Commission's Consultation Paper on Limitation of Actions 304 ff.; for a negative one, from the point of view of BELGIAN law, see Claeys, 1998-99 R.W. 397 ff. On the question of whether the long-stop may be disapplied, under certain circumstances, on the basis of good faith, see the DUTCH decisions, referred to in note 2, above.

Section 4: Renewal of period

III.–7:401: Renewal by acknowledgement

(1) If the debtor acknowledges the right, vis-à-vis the creditor, by part payment, payment of interest, giving of security, or in any other manner, a new period of prescription begins to run.

(2) The new period is the general period of prescription, regardless of whether the right was originally subject to the general period of prescription or the ten year period under III.–7:202 (Period for a right established by legal proceedings). In the latter case, however, this Article does not operate so as to shorten the ten year period.

COMMENTS

A. Terminology

This Article deals with what, in civilian legal systems, would traditionally have been called "interruption", which means that the time which has elapsed before the interrupting event is not taken into account. Prescription begins to run afresh. In spite of its near universal acceptance, however, the term "interruption" (based on the interruptio temporis of the Roman sources) is awkward and misleading. The Article therefore talks of renewal of the period. The essence of the concept is that a new period of prescription begins to run.

Obviously, renewal is a radical interference with the period of prescription, compared to suspension of its running and postponement of its expiry. It is justified only in two cases: acknowledgement of the right by the debtor (covered by the present Article) and acts of execution effected by, or on the application of, the creditor (III.–7:402 (Renewal by attempted execution)).

B. Acknowledgement

A debtor who acknowledges the right does not require the protection granted by prescription. Protection must, on the other hand, be granted to the creditor who may rely on the debtor's acknowledgement and refrain from instituting an action. The creditor's inactivity in this situation no longer carries the same weight, particularly in relation to any expectation on the part of the debtor that the matter is regarded as closed. Also, the debtor's acknowledgement reduces any uncertainty surrounding the claim. The only sensible way in which the law can take account of such acknowledgement is by starting a new period of prescription. Acknowledgement is a momentary event which cannot merely have a suspensive effect.

Some legal systems require the acknowledgement to be in writing. The argument for this solution is that it promotes legal certainty. Most European codifications, however, regard an informal acknowledgement (which may be either express or implied) as sufficient. Of course, it may sometimes be difficult to interpret the debtor's conduct but these difficulties can be resolved, as with all declarations or other conduct which may have legal relevance, by having recourse to the general rules of interpretation. Moreover, even a written statement by the debtor will often be open to various interpretations. The general trend in contract law has certainly been towards informality and though we are not dealing here with a contractual declaration there is no reason to regard an acknowledgement as sufficiently serious, or special, or inherently precarious, to warrant the introduction of a form requirement. In none of the countries that recognise informal acknowledgements has the position been regarded as unsatisfactory.

Legal certainty is safeguarded sufficiently if the law requires acknowledgement of the right to the creditor. The latter cannot reasonably rely on an acknowledgement to a third party. This might well be based on considerations arising from the relationship between debtor and third party and is not sufficient evidence of any clear recognition of obligation towards the creditor.

Obvious examples of an acknowledgement by conduct are part payment, payment of interest, or the giving of security.

Illustration 1
A owes B €400. B's obligation to pay that sum is due on 10 October 2005. On 5 October 2008, B pays part of the sum and confirms that he will pay the remainder as soon as he is able to. As a result, on 5 October 2008 a new three year period starts to run for the remaining debt.

Illustration 2
A has been injured in a car accident caused by B. He has had expenses for hospitalization and medical bills amounting to €10,000 which he now claims from B. B's insurance is only willing to pay €5000. B therefore sends a cheque for €5000 stating that this is the whole amount he is prepared to pay. There is no renewal of prescription concerning the remaining €5000 since B has not acknowledged A's right so far as that amount is concerned.

The rule in the present Article also applies to a right established by judgment. However, acknowledgement of this right by the debtor does not set in motion a new ten year period. It is now the general period of three years that starts to run, though not so as to shorten the ten year period laid down in III.–7:201(General period) which is already running.

Illustration 3
A owes B €20,000. The right has been established by judgment which has become final on 10 October 1999. Four years later A acknowledges the right by part payment. Prescription still occurs on 10 October 2009.

Illustration 4
The facts are as above but the acknowledgement takes place on 10 March 2008. On that date a new period of three years starts to run.

NOTES

1. Whether an acknowledgement should have the effect of interrupting prescription was disputed under the ius commune (see Peters & Zimmermann 130, with references) but is generally accepted today; see for FRANCE CC 2240, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 2248; for AUSTRIA: CC § 1497; for GREECE: CC art. 260; for ITALY: CC art. 2944; for SPAIN: CC art. 1973; for PORTUGAL: CC art. 325; for the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:318; for POLAND: CC art. 123(1)(sent. 2); for SLOVENIA: LOA art. 364; for SCOTLAND: Prescription and Limitation

(Scotland) Act 1973 ss. 6, 7 and 10; Johnston para. 5.66 ff; DENMARK: Law no. 274 of 22 December 1908 § 2. 2d sentence and Danske Lov 5.14.4, see Gomard, Obligationsret III, 234 f; for SWEDEN Preskriptionslag (1981:130) § 5; UNCITRAL Convention art. 20; for ENGLAND: Limitation Act 1980 ss.29 ff (though not for all rights); the GERMAN code (CC § 212(1), no.1) (which now uses the term "renewal" of the prescription period); ESTONIAN GPCCA § 158; Law Commission Consultation Paper on Limitation of Actions 308 ff (recommending an extension of the present regime to all rights).

2. An acknowledgement in writing is required in England and according to the UNCITRAL Convention (see the references above), but the other laws just mentioned do not establish any form requirement. Some of them specifically state that the acknowledgement can be implicit (Austrian CC § 1497, Portuguese CC art. 325) and others mention part payment, payment of interest or the giving of security as typical cases implying an acknowledgement (CC § 212(1), no.1). The UNCITRAL Convention recognises an exception from the form requirement in cases of payment of interest or part payment "if it can reasonably be inferred from such payment or performance that the debtor acknowledges that obligation". English and Scottish law put part payment on a par with an acknowledgement in writing. Scottish law, apart from a written statement, also holds "such performance by or on behalf of the debtor towards implement of the obligation as clearly indicates that the obligation still subsists" to be an acknowledgement. According to POLISH law, acknowledgement of the claim takes place in every case of an explicit statement or any other conduct of the debtor towards the creditor which unequivocally shows that the debtor acknowledges the claim as existing (see: Supreme Court Judgment, SN March 7, 2003, I CKN 11/01, Lex nr: 83834).

3. The legal nature of an acknowledgement is explored by Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 151 ff.; Staudinger (-Peters) BGB, § 212, no. 6 ff.

4. Acknowledgement must be made to the creditor in GERMANY (CC § 212(1), no.1) and PORTUGAL (CC art. 325). The same is recognised, though not specifically stated, in the law of the NETHERLANDS (Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I n. 680). ENGLISH law, SCOTTISH law and the UNCITRAL Convention also require acknowledgement to the creditor. Generally, see Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 153. The same conclusion applies for CZECH law, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 439.

5. In DENMARK prescription under art. 5.14.4 Danske Lov (but not under the Law no. 274 of 22 December 1908) begins to run again after any reminder by the creditor of the debt of which the debtor gets notice. Such a reminder need not be in the form of a legal action or in writing. Under § 2 of the 1908 Law an acknowledgement, which need not be in any form, makes the 5 year prescription period run again. For renewal of prescription in FINLAND a reminder in any form is sufficient. An acknowledgement in any form has the same effect. This applies to prescription under § 1 of the Prescription Decree. Under special prescription provisions the institution of legal proceedings may be required.

6. According to SLOVAK law if the debtor acknowledges the right in writing as for its title and sum, a new ten year period of prescription begins to run from the day when it came to the acknowledgement or if a performance period was mentioned in the acknowledgement, the new prescription period starts running from the lapse of this performance period (CC § 110 (1)). For commercial relationships payment of interest and partial performance of the obligation are considered as acknowledgement of the obligation (Ccom § 407(2)(3). CZECH law is identical (for non-commercial relationships, the acknowledgement must always be executed in writing).

III.–7:402: Renewal by attempted execution

The ten year period of prescription laid down in III.–7:202 (Period for a right established by legal proceedings) begins to run again with each reasonable attempt at execution undertaken by the creditor.

COMMENTS

If the creditor has obtained a judgment that has become enforceable, or any other instrument which is enforceable under the law under which it was made, the right based on such judgment, or other instrument, is also subject to prescription, though it is now the long ten year period laid down in III.–7:202 (Period for a right established by legal proceedings) that applies. As a result, the creditor's right can, once again, be threatened by prescription. The only way for the creditor to prevent this from happening (apart from extracting an acknowledgement from the debtor) is to attempt an act of execution. Such an act of execution will normally be of a momentary character and cannot, if it is to have any beneficial effect for the creditor, merely constitute a ground for suspending the running of the period or postponing its expiry. Also, the creditor has formally made clear that the right is insisted on. The act of execution therefore has to have the effect of starting a new period of prescription.

Normally, the attempt at execution will be effected on the application of the creditor by a court or public official. It is then sufficient that the creditor has made the application, as long as such application is not invalid or is not withdrawn before the act of execution has been attempted.

NOTES

1. For renewal of prescription as a consequence of acts of execution, see, for GERMANY, CC § 212(1), no.2 for ITALY: CC art. 2943(4); for GREECE: CC art. 264; for FRANCE and BELGIUM, CC art. 2244; for SLOVENIA: LOA art. 365; for SCOTLAND: Johnston para. 5.55; and for ESTONIA: GPCCA § 159. For POLAND: CC art. 123(1)(sent. 1); the act of execution interrupts the period of prescription and as a result it begins to run anew. Implicitly also CC art. 3:316 (for the NETHERLANDS) and many other laws. See generally Spiro, Begrenzung §134; Abschlußbericht, 80 ff. On acts of execution which are invalid for lack of one of their general requirements, and withdrawal of the application for execution, see CC § 212(2) and (3); and, generally, Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 134, 139 ff. In CZECH law, the execution proceedings do not renew but only suspend the prescription period (CC § 112).
2. In SLOVAK law there is no express regulation comparable to the Article. According to CC § 112 in fine the act of execution of a finally and conclusively awarded right has the consequence of suspending the running of the period of prescription while the legal proceedings last.
3. In SPANISH law, the general prescription period of the obligations created ex novo by a judgment is a fifteen year period and the dies a quo is the day when the judgment becomes final. Although the creditor loses the right to a judicial execution of the final judgment when the period of five years expires (according to art. 518 of the Civil Procedure Law), the material content of the action does not prescribe until the prescription period expires.

Section 5: Effects of prescription

III.–7:501: General effect

(1) After expiry of the period of prescription the debtor is entitled to refuse performance.

(2) Whatever has been paid or transferred by the debtor in performance of the obligation may not be reclaimed merely because the period of prescription had expired.

COMMENTS

A. "Weak" effect of prescription

Even if a legal system looks at prescription as a matter of substantive law (as the rules in this Chapter do; see the Comment B to III.–7:101 (Rights subject to prescription)), it has two options. Once the period of prescription has run out, the right may be held to have ceased to exist (strong effect of prescription); or the debtor may merely be granted a right to refuse performance (i.e. prescription constitutes a defence on the level of substantive law; weak effect). A debtor who has paid in spite of prescription having occurred, has paid with legal ground according to the latter approach and should be unable to recover; whereas the debtor should be able to recover as having paid without legal ground according to the former approach. This consequence, however, is not normally drawn by legal systems subscribing to the strong effect of prescription. Nor do all of them, as might be thought logical, regard prescription as a matter which must be taken into account ex officio by the court. Effectively, therefore, it is the weak effect of prescription that has been gaining ground internationally. This is not surprising. The weak effect is more appropriate in view of the aims pursued by the law of prescription. There is no reason for a legal system to foist protection on a debtor who is willing to pay and who can thus be taken to acknowledge the obligation to do so; and the public interest (ut sit finis litium) is not adversely affected if a debtor is allowed to pay, even after the period of prescription has run out. On the contrary, it would be detrimental to the public peace if the debtor were allowed to reclaim the payment made. Once payment has been made, even after prescription has occurred, the matter must be regarded as settled. While any prescription regime will inevitably result in creditors being unable to pursue even entirely valid claims, the law should not endorse this consequence where it is unnecessary in terms of the underlying policy objectives.

According to paragraph (1), the debtor is therefore given a right to refuse performance (a peremptory defence). This means that prescription does not operate ipso iure. It also means that the obligation continues to exist.

Whatever has been paid or transferred by way of performance may not be reclaimed merely because the period of prescription has expired. It may be reclaimed for other reasons - for example, if the debtor has performed under the reservation that the right had not prescribed or if the creditor had fraudulently induced the debtor to believe that the right had not prescribed.

Whether the debtor knew about the fact that prescription had occurred or not is irrelevant. The debtor who did not know that prescription had occurred still cannot recover what has been paid or transferred. The debtor who knew that prescription had occurred has still paid in discharge of an existing obligation and can, therefore, not be taken to have made a gift (a conclusion which could be of importance in relation to, for example, claims by disadvantaged creditors).

The Chapter does not deal with the effect of prescription on security, whether real or personal.

B. Defence of prescription inadmissible

As has been pointed out already (see Comment C to III.–7:307 (Maximum length of period)) raising the defence of prescription can, under certain circumstances, be inadmissible because it constitutes an breach of the duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. This is the case, for instance, where the debtor has prevented the creditor from pursuing the right in good time, particularly where the debtor has waived the right to raise the defence of prescription. The question is of considerable practical relevance for those legal systems which prohibit agreements rendering prescription more difficult. Since they also usually regard a unilateral waiver as invalid, they can only help the creditor by having recourse to the general good faith provision. In view of the more liberal regime adopted in this Chapter (III.–7:601 (Agreements concerning prescription)) the problem is largely obviated: a waiver is no longer objectionable merely on account of the fact that the parties would not have been allowed to render prescription more difficult. Moreover, it is reasonable to assume that there will usually have been a tacit agreement. Nevertheless, the problem can still arise under the present Chapter, particularly in personal injury cases where the debtor waives the right to invoke prescription shortly before the end of the thirty year maximum period provided in III.–7:307 and III.–7:601. Here the debtor will be barred from invoking the defence of prescription for the period that he or she has delayed enforcement of the right.

After prescription has occurred, the debtor is entitled to waive the right of invoking the defence of prescription, either by way of agreement with the creditor or unilaterally: after all, the right still exists and the waiver merely has the effect of removing the possibility of preventing it from being enforced.

NOTES

I. The effect of prescription on the right

1. In SCOTLAND prescription has the effect of extinguishing the obligation in question: Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 ss.8A, 6, 7; and see Johnston. According to the civil codes of FRANCE (CC 2219), and LUXEMBOURG (CC art. 2223 on which see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1042), ITALY (CC arts. 2934, 2938) and SPAIN (CC, art. 1930(2) and see Díez-Picazo & Gullón Ballesteros I, 467) prescription also extinguishes the obligation; nevertheless, the court cannot take note of this fact ex officio: prescription has to be pleaded as a defence (in FRANCE, see CC 2247). Cf. also for AUSTRIA CC §§ 1449, 1451, 1479, 1501. In GERMAN law, the defendant is granted a right to refuse performance; the obligation is not extinguished but continues to exist: CC § 214(1) and Staudinger(-Peters) § 214, nn. 34 ff; for BELGIAN law (despite the literal text of CC art. 2219) Cass. 22 september 1986, Arr.Cass. 1986-87, 88; Cass. 14 May 1992, Arr.Cass. 1991-92, 856 = Pas. 1992 I 798; van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, 645. Cf. also, for GREEK law, CC art. 272(1); for the NETHERLANDS, Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I n. 655; for PORTUGUESE law, CC arts. 303 ff; for DANISH law, Gomard, Obligationsret

III, 231 and Ussing, Alm. Del. 384; for SLOVENIAN law, LOA art. 335 and Kranjc in Juhart/Plavšak, 445; for SWEDISH law, Lindskog, Preskription, 320 ff.; for FINNISH law, Aurejärvi & Hemmo 222; for ESTONIAN law, GPCCA § 142(1); and for POLISH law, CC art. 117 § 2. The latter approach is supported by Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 226 ff; 241, 244; Loubser 14 ff; and Zimmermann, 2000 JZ 855 ff. For the arguments advanced in favour of it by the draftsmen of the CC and still valid today, see Peters & Zimmermann 136. In ENGLAND, expiry of the limitation period operates to bar the remedy, rather than extinguish the right (see Law Commission Consultation Paper on Limitation of Actions 162 ff, 393 ff). The position in IRELAND is the same. According to art. 24 of the UNCITRAL Convention, expiration of the limitation period "is taken into consideration in any legal proceedings only if invoked by a party to such proceedings".

2. According to SLOVAK law prescription has the effect of granting the debtor the right to refuse performance. There is no effect of extinguishing the obligation. Expiry of the prescription period in connection with the debtor's objection leads to continuation of obligation's existence as an obligatio naturalis (Lazar, OPH I, 202). CZECH doctrine is similar: the right persists but is deprived of its enforceability (see Knappová (Knapp, Knappová) Civil Law, I, 241). The court may not advise the defendant about the possibility of pleading the prescription, even if it is evident that the prescription period has elapsed (see Švestka/Jehličkа/Škárová, OZ[9], 419).

3. What remains of the obligation after prescription has occurred is often described as a naturalis obligatio, both in legal systems which, in principle, proceed from the assumption that the obligation is extinguished and in those which hold that the obligation continues to exist: cf., e.g., Malaurie & Aynès n. 157; Staudinger(-Peters) § 214 n. 34; Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I n. 657; Lindskog, Preskription, 320 ff.; Spiro, Begrenzung § 244. But it has also, correctly, been noted that the use of such terminology is not very helpful in view of the fact that, at any rate, we are not dealing with a naturalis obligatio in the historical sense of the word: after all, the creditor's right is perfectly enforceable (as long as prescription is not invoked).

II. "Presumptive" prescription

4. The civil codes of BELGIUM, LUXEMBOURG, ITALY and PORTUGAL recognise various short periods the expiry of which merely gives rise to a presumption that the obligation has been discharged: In France, the presumptive prescriptions which were formerly in CC arts. 2271 ff (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1376) have been abolished de facto by the reform which reduces the general delay from 30 to 5 years; for Italy, CC arts. 2954 ff.; for Portugal, CC arts. 316 ff. Such a presumption provides only an imperfect protection against unjustified claims and therefore always requires, in addition, a proper prescription regime. If the general prescription period is brief, an additional presumptive prescription would render the law in this area unnecessarily complex. For criticism, see Spiro, Begrenzung § 246; Peters & Zimmermann 263 ff.; Loubser 9 ff.

III. Exclusion of right based on unjustified enrichment

5. It is very widely recognised that what has been performed in order to discharge a right cannot be reclaimed merely because the period of prescription has expired: see, for FRANCE, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations, no. 1403; for SPAIN, Pantaléon, Prescripción 5009; for PORTUGAL: CC art. 304(2); for AUSTRIA: CC 1432; for GERMANY: CC § 214(2); for SWITZERLAND: OR art. 63(2); for GREECE: CC art. 272(2); for ITALY: CC art. 2940; for DENMARK: Gomard, Obligationsret III, 231 and Ussing, Alm. Del. 384; for FINLAND: Aurejärvi & Hemmo 222; art. 26

UNCITRAL Convention; Spiro, Begrenzung § 232 ff; for ESTONIA: LOA § 1028(2) 2); for SLOVAKIA CC § 455(1) (receipt of a prescribed debt is not considered unjustified enrichment); for the CZECH REPUBLIC: CC § 455(1) and Ccom § 389; and for POLAND: CC 411(3). The exclusion of this right has also been recognised in art. 121-9 of the First Law of the Catalonian CC.

IV. Good faith and waiver

6. For the effect of good faith on the application of the prescription regime and, particularly, the way of taking into consideration a waiver which the debtor has declared before prescription has run out, see Spiro, Begrenzung § 343; Staudinger (-Peters) § 214, nn. 17 ff., 20 ff.; and the country reports for GERMANY, GREECE, AUSTRIA, FRANCE, BELGIUM, SPAIN, ITALY, the NETHERLANDS, ENGLAND, IRELAND, SCOTLAND, DENMARK, SWEDEN and FINLAND to case study 21 (Prescription II) in Zimmermann & Whittaker 508 ff. Cf. also Storme, in: Hondius, 70 ff. For ESTONIA, see GPCCA § 145(3).

6. Waiver of the right to invoke prescription after prescription has occurred is possible: see, for FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, CC art. 2220; for GREECE: CC art. 276; for ITALY: CC art. 2937; for PORTUGAL: CC art. 302; for GERMANY: Staudinger(-Peters) § 214, nn. 28 ff; for the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:322(2); Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I nn. 659 ff.; Koopmann 95 ff; ;for the CZECH REPUBLIC: Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 419; and for a comparative survey: Spiro, Begrenzung § 343; Loubser 150 ff

III.–7:502: Effect on ancillary rights

The period of prescription for a right to payment of interest, and other rights of an ancillary nature, expires not later than the period for the principal right.

COMMENTS

Prescription occurs to prevent litigation about stale rights, both in the public interest and in order to protect the debtor. This policy would be undermined if the creditor could still sue the debtor for interest that may have become due on a right for which the period of prescription has run out; for the debtor, in order to mount a defence, might then be forced to go into the merits of the principal right itself. The same considerations apply to other rights of an ancillary nature, such as those for emoluments and costs. Hence the need for a rule that such rights prescribe with the principal claim, even if the prescription period applicable to them has not yet expired.

NOTES

1. The rule is found in GERMANY (CC § 217); GREECE (CC art. 274); SCOTLAND (Johnston 4.101(3)); SLOVENIA (LOA art. 344); POLAND (SN 26 January 2005, III CZP 42/04, OSNC 2005/9/149); SWITZERLAND (OR art. 133); the UNCITRAL Convention (art. 27, confined to interest). See also, for the NETHERLANDS, CC art. 3:312; for ITALY, Trabucchi 524; for DENMARK, Gomard, Obligationsret III, 232; for SWEDEN, Preskriptionslag (1981:130) § 8 and Lindskog, Preskription, 330, 341 ff; and for ESTONIA, GPCCA § 144. The rule may be said to be "generally recognised today" (Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 59, 236). For details as to the range of rights covered, see Staudinger(-Peters) § 224, nos. 6 ff. SLOVAK law provides that the prescription of a lien does not expire before the prescription of the secured receivable does (CC § 100(2)). In CZECH law the question is subject to discussion; at present it seems that the position that the prescription of interest rights runs independently is gaining more ground, see Štenglová/Plíva/Tomsa, Commercial Code[11], 1120.
2. In SPANISH law, the prescription of the main right implies the prescription of the ancillary rights, according to the rule of accesorium sequitur principale. The Supreme Court confirms that no payment of interest may be required when the main right has expired due to prescription (TS 30 December 1999, RAJ 1999/9753).

III.–7:503: Effect on set-off

A right in relation to which the period of prescription has expired may nonetheless be set off, unless the debtor has invoked prescription previously or does so within two months of notification of set-off.

COMMENTS

A right that is prescribed can no longer be enforced. But it may still provide a valid basis for a right of set-off. A number of codifications contain rules to the effect that the right of set-off is not excluded by the prescription of the cross-claim, provided it could have been set off against the principal right at a time when it was not prescribed. The policy of these rules is to preserve a right of set-off that has once accrued, even though set-off has not been declared at that stage. It does not, however, fit in well with the policy considerations underlying the law of prescription. The "obfuscating power of time" affects the creditor's right in the same way, whether it is pursued by way of action or used to effect set-off. In both cases the debtor needs protection. In both cases it would run counter to the public interest if a stale right could become the object of litigation. Set-off, under the scheme of these rules, does not operate retrospectively. This simplifies matters, for we merely have to look at the moment when set-off is declared. Obviously, considering the policy of the law of prescription, it cannot be declared where the debtor (of the cross-claim) has previously invoked prescription. But since the debtor has no reason to invoke prescription unless the creditor asserts a right (whether by way of bringing an action or by declaring set-off), the debtor will have to be granted a reasonable period, after receipt of notice of set-off, to raise the defence of prescription. If the debtor fails to do so, the set-off is effective: after all, the right continues to exist in spite of the prescription period having run out.

Illustration

A has sold B a car for €15,000. The car is delivered to B on 1 October 2005. On the same day A's right to receive the purchase price falls due. In September 2007 the car is involved in an accident caused by a defect in the brakes for which A was responsible. B suffers damage to the extent of €17,000. The period of prescription of B's right against A started to run on 1 October 2005 (the day of non-performance) but its running was suspended so long as B was unaware of the defect (until September 2007). If B sues A for damages before 1 October 2008, A can set off his own right for the purchase price. He may do so even when he is sued after 1 October provided B does not invoke prescription within two months of having received notice of set-off.

NOTES

1. The right of set-off is not excluded by the prescription of the cross-claim, provided it could have been set off against the principal claim at a time when it was not prescribed: see, for GERMANY: CC § 215; GREECE: CC art. 443; PORTUGAL: CC art. 850; SWITZERLAND: OR art. 120(3) and Spiro, Begrenzung § 216; the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:131(1); UNCITRAL Convention art. 25(2). For AUSTRIA, see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 106 (but see the objections raised by Dullinger 165 ss); for SCOTLAND, see Wilson, Scottish Law of Debt[2], no. 13.6; Johnston 4.101(1); for ESTONIA: LOA § 200(2); and for POLAND: CC 502. For SLOVENIA there is no express rule in the LOA but due to the retrospective effect of set-off (art. 312(2)) the solution should be the same. The rule tries to take account of the retrospective effect of the declaration of set-off; obviously, it is unnecessary in a legal system where set-off operates ipso iure; but cf. for ITALY CC art. 1242 which specifically spells out that set-off is excluded only if prescription was completed on the date on which the two debts began to coexist. For SPAIN, see Pantaléon, Prescripción 5009. As far as legal systems are concerned which neither attribute ipso iure effect to set-off, nor retrospective effect to a declaration of set-off, see Wood 13-18 ff (ENGLAND); Ussing, Alm. Del. 384 (DENMARK); Prescription Decree § 5 (FINLAND); Preskriptionslag (1981:130) § 10 (SWEDEN). According to the SLOVAK CC § 581(2) prescribed receivables cannot be set off.

2. The CZECH CC contains the same provision but the question of expiration of the prescription is assessed backwards as to the date when the compensated rights first confronted each other (i.e. the time of the act of the set-off is of no relevance here), see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 1036. Ccom§ 388(2) puts the matter more clearly: the entitled party may set-off its right even after the lapse of the limitation period, if both rights pertain to the same contract [...], or if the right could have been compensated prior to the expiry of its limitation period against a claim asserted by the other party.

Section 6: Modification by agreement

III.–7:601: Agreements concerning prescription

(1) The requirements for prescription may be modified by agreement between the parties, in particular by either shortening or lengthening the periods of prescription.

(2) The period of prescription may not, however, be reduced to less than one year or extended to more than thirty years after the time of commencement set out in III.–7:203 (Commencement).

COMMENTS

A. Agreements rendering prescription more difficult

The parties may wish to contract out of the prescription regime. This can happen in a number of ways. They may want to extend or shorten the period of prescription applicable to the right; they may want to change the date when the period begins to run; they may want to add to, or subtract from, the list of grounds of suspension, and so on. Agreements rendering prescription more difficult are generally considered to be more objectionable than agreements facilitating prescription. These objections are usually based upon the public interest which the prescription of rights is intended to serve. It must, however, be remembered that the prescription of rights predominantly serves to protect the debtor and that, where the debtor renounces such protection, private autonomy may well be seen to prevail over the public interest. Also, the general prescription periods applying in countries objecting to agreements rendering prescription more difficult are comparatively long (ten, twenty, or thirty years) so that a further lengthening may indeed be problematic; much more problematic, at any rate, than where there is a short general prescription period. Widely, therefore, agreements lengthening the period are specifically admitted, where the period is, exceptionally, a short one. Contractual warranties concerning latent defects in buildings or goods can have that effect and provide an obvious and practically important example. Equally, it tends to be accepted that the prohibition does not affect agreements which indirectly render prescription more difficult, such as agreements postponing the due date of a claim, or pacta de non petendo (agreements allowing additional time for performance). However, it is not easy to see why the parties should not be able to postpone the commencement of the period of prescription as such if they can postpone the due date of the claim. Moreover, these subtle distinctions provide ample opportunity for effectively circumventing the prohibition. These problems are obviated by abandoning the prohibition.

This appears all the more desirable under a system of prescription such as the one proposed in this Chapter. Party autonomy provides the necessary counterbalance to (i) the short general prescription period of three years and (ii) the uniformity of the regime in general. Neither the three year period nor a number of the other rules fit all types of rights and all imaginable situations equally well. The parties must be free to devise a more appropriate regime, as long as they observe the general limitations placed on freedom of contract. The rules in this Chapter rest on a delicate balancing of interests and it must be recognised that a reasonable balance could conceivably be achieved in an entirely different way. The parties to a contract may, for example, quite reasonably regard suspension in case of ignorance as a source of uncertainty and they may wish to balance the exclusion of this rule by providing for a longer period.

B. Restrictions

Two provisos have to be made. (i) Standard contract terms interfering with the prescription regime must be scrutinised particularly carefully. The rules on unfair contract terms provide the necessary tool. (ii) Public interest does not require a prescription regime to be mandatory: party autonomy may, to a large extent, prevail. The public interest is not adversely affected if a right prescribes in seven rather than three years; not sufficiently adversely affected, at any rate, to override the decision of a debtor to waive this protection by agreement with the creditor. The debtor should not, however, be able to agree upon a period of fifty, or one hundred, years since that would effectively exclude the right from prescription. This is why the present Article provides that prescription cannot be extended by agreement beyond a period of thirty years. Thirty years constitute the longest period envisaged in this Chapter under exceptional circumstances (maximum period of extension in cases of personal injuries rights: III.–7:307 (Maximum length of period)) and one which is, at present, still applicable as a general period in a number of member states. The thirty years are to be counted from the general time of commencement of prescription, as laid down in III.–7:203 (Commencement).

C. Agreements facilitating prescription

What has been said above applies with even greater force to agreements facilitating prescription. They are much more widely recognised even today; moreover, they do not conflict with the public interest based policy concerns underlying the law of prescription. Nonetheless it has been regarded as equitable also to fix a minimum limit for party autonomy. This limit is a period of one year. It applies even to individually negotiated agreements between professional parties.

NOTES

I. Prescription regime mandatory

1. There is a considerable divergence of views as to whether it is possible for the parties to contract out of the prescription regime by lengthening or shortening the prescription period, by providing for different starting dates, by introducing additional, or opting out of existing, grounds of suspension and so on. Some systems are particularly strict in this regard and prohibit agreements either way. See the SWISS OR art. 129; the GREEK CC art. 275; the ITALIAN CC art. 2936; the PORTUGUESE CC art. 300; and cf. also, most recently, the QUEBEC CC art. 2884. Under POLISH law, the period of prescription cannot be shortened or lengthened by an agreement or a unilateral act (CC art. 119). However, a person against whom the claim is due can waive the right to rely on prescription. Nevertheless, such a waiver cannot be made before the lapse of the period of prescription (CC art. 117 § 2). The situation is exactly the same in SLOVENIAN law (LOA arts. 340–341). The UNCITRAL Convention, too, regards its prescription regime as mandatory: art. 22 ("The limitation period cannot be modified or affected by any declaration or agreement between the parties …"). There are two exceptions, the one permitting the debtor at any time during the running of the period to extend it by a declaration in writing to the creditor, the other sanctioning, under certain circumstances, a clause in the contract of sale, in terms of which arbitral proceedings are to be commenced within a shorter period of limitation than that prescribed by the Convention.
2. According to the SLOVAK Ccom § 401 the party against whom a right is becoming prescribed may extend the time of prescription by means of a written statement issued to the other party, even repeatedly; however, the total period of prescription may not exceed a period of 10 years from the date when it first began to run (applicable only to commercial relationships). The Slovak CC regards the prescription regime as mandatory. CZECH law is the same; it can be added that the Civil Code regime enables repeated acknowledgements of a right, each of which prolongs the limitation period by ten years, with no upper limit for the entire prescription period (see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 440) However the debtor may not undertake an obligation to acknowledge the right.

II. Prescription regime unilaterally mandatory

3. A number of legal systems allow the parties to facilitate prescription, especially by providing for a period that is shorter than the statutory one, while they refuse to recognise agreements rendering prescription more difficult, particularly by extending the statutory period. In these countries the prescription regime is thus of a unilaterally mandatory character: see, for AUSTRIA: CC § 1502 (it is not possible to waive prescription or to prolong the prescription period; a shortening of the prescription period, however, is possible within the limits of good faith and fair dealing); for FRANCE: before the reform of 2008: Ferid & Sonnenberger 1 C 254 ff; for the NETHERLANDS: Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I n. 678; for DENMARK: Gomard, Obligationsret III, 233; for FINLAND: Halila & Ylöstalo 103 ff. This may also be the position in This may also be the position in SCOTTISH law: see Johnston para. 4.05 (who, however, comments that the meaning of the relevant section - s.13 - of the Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 is unclear). There is no particular experience with the agreed shortening of the limitation period in CZECH law; from the mandatory character of the entire regulation it can be, however, assumed that such shortening is not possible.

4. However, where the prescription period is, exceptionally, a very short one, agreements lengthening it are permitted: for SWITZERLAND, see Spiro, Begrenzung § 345. Contractual warranties are thus permitted even if they have, as they often do, the effect of lengthening the period of prescription: see Spiro, Begrenzung § 346. Agreements which indirectly render prescription more difficult (e.g. agreements postponing the due date of a right, or pacta de non petendo) are permissible (for details, see Spiro, Begrenzung § 344).

III. Recognition of agreements both ways

5. The French 2008 reform has recognised agreements both ways: parties can either shorten or make longer the prescription period (CC 2254 al. 1), besides, they are allowed to add to the causes of suspension or interruption (CC art. 2254 al. 2). However, this freedom is limited in several ways: no less than one year and no more than ten years. Besides, in some specific situation where the parties are not on an equal footing, this freedom totally disappears. This is notably the case in respect to consumers (C Cons art. L 137-1). This is also true for a whole series of actions which concern debts payable every year or on shorter periods (CC 2254 alinea 2). Finally the ENGLISH Law Commission recommends recognition, in principle, of agreements both ways: Law Commission Report No 270 on Limitation of Actions, para. 3.175 (subject to safeguards). This seems to tie in with the legal position prevailing in England today (see Law Commission Consultation Paper, 389). However, the German Reform Commission proposes a limit of thirty years (to be calculated from the statutory commencement of prescription): BGB-KE § 220, 3. Equally, in BELGIAN law, prescription can be lengthened by agreement, with a maximum of 30 years; it can be shortened by agreement unless contrary to good faith (see Storme, in: Hondius, 71 ff); SPANISH law also appears to allow, in principle, recognition of agreements both ways. For agreements facilitating prescription, see: Díez-Picazo & Gullón Ballesteros I, 468. Agreements rendering prescription more difficult by extending the period of prescription are also valid, except when they render the right unprescriptable (Díez-Picazo & Gullón Ballesteros I, 468). Agreements to prolong or to shorten the general period are also valid under art. 121-3 of the First Law of the Catalonian CC, with some limitations. According to SWEDISH law, agreements prolonging or shortening prescription are valid in principle, though they are subject to the general rule that unreasonable contract terms may be set aside or modified in terms of the Contracts Act § 36 (Lindskog, Preskription, 582 ff). The same applies under DANISH law to agreements shortening the prescription period, see Gomard Obligationsret III, 233. Similarly, under ESTONAN law, shortening or prolonging (maximum up to ten years) of the prescription period by agreement is generally allowed (GPCCA § 145(1),(2)), subject to an unfairness test in the case of standard terms (LOA § 42(3) 9).

IV. Agreements facilitating prescription

6. Agreements facilitating prescription promote the policy concerns underlying the law of prescription even more effectively than the normal regime; see, e.g., Zimmermann, in: Jayme, 188; Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht I n. 687. Even such agreements are regarded as undesirable by Spiro, Begrenzung §§ 347 ff (who, however, also points out that the parties are free to limit their rights in other ways; considerable problems of delimitation can ensue).

BOOK IV

SPECIFIC CONTRACTS AND THE RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS ARISING FROM THEM

PART A. SALES

CHAPTER 1: SCOPE AND DEFINITIONS

Section 1: Scope

IV.A.–1:101: Contracts covered

(1) This Part of Book IV applies to contracts for the sale of goods and associated consumer guarantees.

(2) It applies with appropriate adaptations to:

(a) contracts for the sale of electricity;

(b) contracts for the sale of stocks, shares, investment securities and negotiable instruments;

(c) contracts for the sale of other forms of incorporeal property, including rights to the performance of obligations, industrial and intellectual property rights and other transferable rights;

(d) contracts conferring, in exchange for a price, rights in information or data, including software and databases;

(e) contracts for the barter of goods or any of the other assets mentioned above.

(3) It does not apply to contracts for the sale or barter of immovable property or rights in immovable property.

COMMENTS

A. Main application: contracts for the sale of goods

This Part of Book IV applies primarily to contracts for the sale of goods. It is not concerned with the formation, validity or interpretation of such contracts. Such questions are left to the general rules in Book II. It is concerned mainly with the effects of such contracts on the rights and obligations of the parties. There are good reasons for giving special attention to the rights and obligations of the parties under contracts for the sale of goods. Not only has the contract for the sale of goods served as the paradigm for contracts in general, but it is also probably the most common contract, and certainly the most common consumer contract, that there is. In fact, sales come in all shapes and sizes: ranging from the purchase of the daily newspaper at the news-stand or the groceries in the supermarket, through to the purchase of a new car and to commodity sales on highly specialised markets. Moreover, there are many mixed transactions that contain a certain element of sale, such as distribution contracts or all sorts of manufacturing contracts.

A "contract for sale" is defined in IV.A.–1:202 (Contract for sale). The term "goods" is defined in Annex 1 as follows.

> "Goods" means corporeal movables. It includes ships, vessels, hovercraft or aircraft, space objects, animals, liquids and gases.

For future goods, see also IV.A.–1:201 (Goods).

B. Application with appropriate adaptations

According to IV.A.–1:201 (Goods) goods are defined as 'corporeal movables'. The sale of other types of property or assets involves different problems that are not regulated by this Part. Moreover, sales contracts dealing with any of the assets listed in paragraph (2) may not be subject to all the rules contained in these rules, e.g. conformity requirements in respect of shares sold. Therefore paragraph (2) provides that the rules in this Part may be applied to sales of certain types of assets provided that appropriate adaptations are made (see Comment C). This formula is used because the nature and the huge variety of transactions falling under this extended scope of application make it virtually impossible to provide an exhaustive list of which rules apply and which do not.

It should be noted that the extension of the scope provided by paragraph (2) is not restricted to sales contracts as it also applies to certain contracts which are very similar to sale. It applies to contracts conferring rights in information or data which are functionally equivalent to sale but are not technically contracts for "sale" because no ownership is transferred (paragraph (2)(d)). It also applies to contracts for barter (paragraph (2) (e)) whether relating to goods or to the other assets mentioned in the paragraph (e.g. exchanging electricity for gas).

C. Other assets

The types of assets listed in paragraph (2) have in common that they are, at least to a certain extent, incorporeal (cf. the reference to other forms of incorporeal property in (c)). By selling shares, for instance, one sells a bundle of rights. There may not be any transfer at all of a paper certificate. Indeed with the increase in the electronic issuing of shares, paper certificates are much less common than formerly. Likewise, a standard computer program can be downloaded directly without involving a durable medium such as a CD.

The list in this Article is exhaustive and contains the following assets:

Electricity. Taking the European and national trends towards the further deregulation of energy markets into account, these rules also apply to the sale of electricity, albeit subject to appropriate adaptations. One of the practical problems is the fact that energy does not possess a material aspect, which can, however, be remedied by measuring the amount of use (electric energy, heat). It should be noted that gas, steam and oil, already fall under the definition of "goods" in Annex 1.

Stocks, shares, investment securities and negotiable instruments. These rules do not apply directly to sales of shares, investment securities and negotiable instruments because, again, many of them are inappropriate for such direct application. When shares are sold to a buyer there is normally, for example, no undertaking that the shares will be fit for the buyer's purpose (such as a high income yield), even if the buyer's purpose is indeed known to the seller. Nonetheless, other rules may be applied with appropriate adaptations. It does not matter whether a few shares or a majority of shares are sold. Since the latter type of transaction may result in the sale of a controlling interest in a company, the transfer of the shares actually also results in the sale of the enterprise. These rules may therefore also be applied, indirectly and with appropriate adaptations, to the sale of enterprises.

Other forms of incorporeal property. The rules in this Part of Book IV apply with appropriate adaptations to contracts for the sale of other forms of incorporeal property, including rights to the performance of obligations, industrial and intellectual property rights and other transferable rights. The reason for this broad provision lies in the fact that it is virtually impossible to provide a list of proprietary, transferable rights that can be sold under the different legal systems. Examples of such rights are: security rights; split-property rights; usufructs; pledges; co-operative rights; mortgages; debt claims; an inheritance or parts thereof; rights in immaterial goods, such as patent rights; rights arising from the registration of trademarks; and rights to the performance of obligations generally.

Information and data (including software). Paragraph (2)(c) applies the rules of this Part of Book IV "with appropriate adaptations" to contracts conferring, in exchange for a price, rights in information or data, including software and databases. The reason for using this form of words rather than the simple "sale" is that the definition of a contract for sale requires an undertaking to transfer ownership (see IV.A.–1:202 (Contract for sale). There may be no such undertaking in the types of contracts under consideration. Of course, these rules may sometimes be applied to an outright sale of software or proprietary information, namely when the intellectual property rights are sold. Generally, however, although it is common to speak of 'selling' or 'buying' software, in fact the 'buyer' is often merely given a licence to use the software. In such a case, there is no transfer of ownership, and hence these rules are not directly applicable. Nonetheless, some of the underlying principles of the rules may be relevant to such transactions. For example, the rules on conformity may provide a useful guideline as to what obligations the 'seller' of software should be subject to. In one respect, however, 'sales' of software are covered directly by the rules. Many types of equipment are now wholly or partly controlled by microprocessors which are an integral part of the equipment. These microprocessors are in turn controlled by pre-loaded software. This 'embedded' software (for example, the programmes that control the electronic ignition of a car or its braking system) is simply treated as part of the goods for the purposes of these rules. While the sale of personal data is restricted due to data protection rules established by European Directives and other standards, it cannot be overlooked that information and data are 'sold' on a daily basis. The crucial point is to draw the borderline between the mere sale of information as opposed to the supply of information under a specific service contract. In some cases the distinction may be difficult to draw. In practice, this question of qualification is not of great importance as regards conformity, since the obligations of the seller or the service provider will be similar. Besides, if there is a deviation in substance between the regulation of sales and services, the solution used in Part IV.C on Services Contracts can still be applied if it is more appropriate, since the sales rules may be applied with appropriate adaptations concerning this kind of contract.

The rules in this Part may be applied to the sale of standardised information, i.e. information already available and not custom-made: for instance, the sale of an electronic version of case law decisions on Lexis.

D. Immovable property

These rules do not apply to the sale of immovable property (paragraph (3)) or rights in such property. As a consequence, rights in land, buildings or other immovable property do not fall within their scope.

E. Relationship with Books I to III

The rules in Books I to III serve as the general part of the law applicable to sales transactions. Thus, issues of general contract law – such as formation, validity, effects etc. – have to be resolved by applying the provisions of Book II. The rules on the performance of obligations in general, including those of a seller or buyer, and on the remedies for non-performance of obligations in general will be found in Book III. Some of these rules are, however, modified or supplemented by the rules in this Part.

F. Consumer goods guarantees

Chapter 6 applies to consumer goods guarantees. The Chapter is included in this Part because of its close association with contracts for the sale of goods.

G. Freedom of contract

Although it goes to the nature of the provisions, rather than their scope, it may be appropriate to comment at the outset of this Part that most of the rules in it are default rules which can be varied by the parties. The basic rule contained in II.–1:102 (Party autonomy) is that parties are free to make a contract and to determine its contents, subject to any applicable mandatory rules. Therefore the parties are, in principle, free to exclude, amend, modify, or otherwise derogate from the rules in this Part.

However, some of the rules are, for the greater protection of consumers, declared to be mandatory. A non-binding instrument cannot, of course, make anything mandatory. So this is just an indication to any legislature thinking of making use of these model rules that consideration should be given to making the relevant rules mandatory.

Under two specific derogation provisions, any contractual term or agreement concluded with the seller, before a lack of conformity is brought to the seller's attention, which directly or indirectly waives or restricts the buyer's rights is not binding on the consumer: IV.A.–2:309 (Limits on derogation from conformity rights in a consumer contract for sale) and IV.A.–4:101 (Limits on derogation from remedies for non-conformity in a consumer contract for sale). This means that the parties are only free to deviate from the relevant provisions after the buyer has notified the seller of the lack of conformity. It is not possible to deviate in advance from the regime provided in these rules, unless the buyer is granted more far-reaching rights than provided in the relevant articles. It has to be noted that the mandatory rules of the present rules are merely relatively mandatory, i.e. the parties are still free to derogate from them to the benefit of the buyer. It is not sufficient that the buyer is granted more protection in an overall view: that is extending some rights, while limiting others.

Under other Articles, such as IV.A.–5:103 (Passing of risk in a consumer contract for sale), IV.A.–6:103 (Guarantee document), IV.A.–6:107 (Burden of proof) and IV.A.–6:108 (Prolongation of the guarantee period), the parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of the Article or derogate from or vary its effects. This is a limitation which leads to similar results as the technique mentioned in the preceding paragraph. Under IV.A.–6:102 (Binding nature of the guarantee) certain formal requirements restricting the validity of the guarantee are not binding on the consumer. Under some Articles in Chapter 6, on the other hand, it is made clear that an exclusion or limitation of the scope of the guarantee in certain respects is possible but has to be clearly set out in the guarantee document in order to be effective, cf. IV.A.–6:105 (Guarantee limited to specific parts) and IV.A.–6:106 (Exclusion or limitation of the guarantor's liability). In addition, the comments to the relevant Articles will provide examples of their scope.

Derogation covers both direct and indirect derogation. Cases of direct derogation will include excluding a given rule in the sales contract or in standard terms. Cases of indirect derogation will include providing a lesser right than the one provided for in the relevant rule or otherwise varying the rule to the detriment of the consumer. It is important to remember that even terms which do not exclude the application of a mandatory rule, or derogate from or vary its effects may amount to unfair contract terms and, for that reason may not be binding on the consumer (see Book II, Chapter 9, Section 4).

A term of a contract for sale which purports to derogate from a mandatory rule to the detriment of the consumer, for example by contracting out of such a provision, will be void – that is, automatically of no effect from the beginning (see the definition of "void" in the Annex of definitions). As a consequence, the consumer is provided with the right laid down in the relevant provision, the protection of which the seller tried to circumvent.

NOTES

I. Overview of the rules relating to sales law

1. Since sale is such a fundamental contract, it is regulated as a specific contract in all the systems. The mode of regulation however differs under the various systems.
2. Under most systems, the sales rules can be found in the Civil Code (AUSTRIA CC §§ 1053-1089; BELGIUM CC arts. 1582-1701; CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 588-627; FRANCE CC arts. 1582-1701; GERMANY CC §§ 433-479; GREECE; HUNGARY CC §§ 365-377; ITALY CC arts. 1470-1547; LATVIA CC arts. 2002-2090; LITHUANIA; NETHERLANDS CC Book 7, Title 1, Sections 1-7; POLAND CC arts. 535-602; PORTUGAL CC arts. 874-938; SLOVAKIA CC §§ 588-610; SPAIN CC arts. 1445-1537). Similarly, in ESTONIA the sales regulation can be found in the extensive LOA §§ 208-237 and in SLOVENIA in the LOA arts. 435-506. Under some of these systems, a considerable amount of rules applicable to sales can be found among the general rules for contracts (cf. HUNGARY CC §§ 277-311/A; CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 499-510) where in particular the rules on lack of conformity and defective performance are generalised for all contracts for consideration.
3. Under other systems, the sales regulation can be found in a free-standing Sale of Goods Act (DENMARK Købeloven (KBL); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act; FINLAND Kauppalaki (KL); NORWAY Kjøpsloven (Kjl); SWEDEN Köplagen (KöpL)). This approach can also be found in the CISG and the Consumer Sales Directive dealing exclusively with commercial and consumer sales respectively.

4. These general rules are, at times, supplemented by specific rules relating to commercial sales law (AUSTRIA Ccom §§ 373 ff (Handelskauf); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom arts. 409-475 (more detailed in comparison with the regulations in CC, including sale of an enterprise arts. 476-488a); GERMANY Ccom §§ 373 ff (Handelskauf); PORTUGAL Ccom §§ 463-476; SLOVAKIA Ccom arts. 409-496; SPAIN Ccom arts. 325-345).

5. In addition, all the systems have specific rules relating to consumer sales. On the one hand, these provisions can be contained in a separate Code or Act (AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act (Konsumentenschutzgesetz) §§ 8, 9, 9a and 9b*;* FINLAND Consumer Protection Act (Kuluttajansuojalaki); FRANCE Consumer Code (Code de la consummation) in particular arts. L. 211-1-17; GREECE Consumer Protection Act; ITALY Consumer Code (Codice del Consumo); LATVIA Consumer Protection Act; NORWAY Consumer Sales Act (Forbrukerkjopsloven); POLAND Consumer Sales Act; PORTUGAL Consumer Protection Act; SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act §§ 36-37č; SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act (Konsumentköplagen)). Under SPANISH law there are several Acts dealing with consumer sales: Consumer Sales Act 23/2003, Consumer Protection Act (Ley 26/1984), Retail Trade Act (Ley 7/1996) and Instalments Sales Act (Ley 28/1998). Most of these rules have been consolidated in the Consumer Protection Act (Real Decreto Legislativo 1/2007) in a single updated legal text. On the other hand, under a number of systems rules dealing specifically with consumer sales can also be found blended in with the general rules on sales (BELGIUM CC arts. 1649bis- 1649octies; CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 52-65 and 612-627; DENMARK Sales Act §§ 72-86; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 48A to 48F; ESTONIA LOA §§ 208-237; GERMANY CC §§ 474-479; LITHUANIA CC arts. 6.392-6.401; NETHERLANDS all through CC Book 7, Title 1, Sections 1-7; SLOVAKIA CC §§ 52-60, 588-610 and 612-627). Under HUNGARIAN law, since the rules on defective performance and liability for defective performance are generalised for all contracts for consideration, the rules dealing with consumer sales also appear as special rules for consumer contracts among the general rules on defective performance.

II. Definition of sale

6. See notes to IV.A.–1:202 (Contract for sale)

III. Analogous application to other contracts

7. In all systems, the statutory provisions on sale are applied by analogy to other contracts, under which one can distinguish between three main scenarios.

8. First, certain nominate contracts follow the rules on sales as such, for instance barter contracts and (certain) contracts for the manufacture or production of goods.

9. Second, the sales law provisions can be applied by analogy to both nominate contracts that fail to deal with a specific problem, and to innominate contracts, that is contracts that are not regulated as such. Such analogous application can take various forms. Under CZECH and SLOVAK law CC §§ 491 there is a general provision stating: “Obligations arise especially from contracts which are expressly governed by this Code; however, they may also arise from other contracts not governed by this Code (CC § 51) and from mixed contracts comprising elements of different types of contracts.” Moreover, the regime of unregulated contracts is laid down in CC §§ 491(2): ”With regard to obligations arising from contracts not governed by this Code, it shall be necessary to apply the provisions of this Code which govern obligations most closely approximating to those contracts, unless the contract itself provides otherwise". Under AUSTRIA CC §§ 932 ff; HUNGARIAN law CC §§ 277-311/A a considerable number of rules applicable to sales can be found among the general rules for contracts, most importantly the rules on lack of conformity and defective performance are generalised for all contracts for consideration.

10. Third, the sales law provisions can be used as a source of general principles of contract law, which are then applicable to all kinds of contracts. This approach is typical of the NORDIC COUNTRIES, where the provisions in the Sales Acts to a certain extent are regarded as statutory specifications of non-statutory general contract law. For instance under FINNISH law, the general principles in the Sales Act such as the concept of termination of contract for breach, the right to withhold payment and the concept of anticipated breach are applicable to nearly all contracts (see Aurejärvi and Hemmo, Velvoiteoikeuden Oppikirja, 89 and 93).

11. In particular, the following contracts borrow from sales law: hire-purchase contracts (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Supply of Goods (Implied Terms) Act 1973); supply and hire contracts (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982); 'kaufähnliche Verträge' (GERMANY Hoeren and Martinek, Systematischer Kommentar zum Kaufrecht, para. 34); applicability to contracts with a partial donational character and contracts for the transfer of property in exchange for the debt (LITHUANIA CC art. 6.436); delivery (POLAND CC art. 612); precontracted deliveries of agricultural products (POLAND CC art. 621); contracts for specific work (POLAND CC art. 638); sales on commission (SPAIN, De la Cuesta Rute, Contratos Mercantiles I, 228 and 236) and contracts for the supply of electricity (SPAIN, De la Cuesta Rute, Contratos Mercantiles, I, 228 and 236).

IV. Mixed contracts

12. Certain typical mixed contracts have been addressed by statutory provisions or by case law. Prominent amongst them is the contract for the production or manufacture of goods to be sold where there is an element of services and one of sales. See the Notes to the following Article.

13. When looking at a mixed contract, i.e. a contract that combines an element of sale with, typically, an element of services, there are basically three possibilities to establish the applicable rules.

14. First, one can merely apply one regime to the whole contract, usually the dominant part of the transaction, that is, the type of contract most akin to the overall transaction (the so-called theory of absorption). Such an approach can be found under the CISG art. 3(2) establishing that the sales regulation does not apply to contracts in which the preponderant part of the obligation of the party who furnishes the goods consists of the supply of labour or other services. A similar regulation can be found under a number of other systems (CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 410(1); ESTONIA LOA § 208(2); FINLAND SGA § 2(2); LITHUANIA; NORWAY SGA § 2(2); SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 410; SWEDEN SGA § 2(2)). Under AUSTRIAN law CC § 1055 contains a similar provision concerning barter contracts. Under AUSTRIAN law CC § 1055 contains a similar provision concerning barter contracts. Under NORDIC law, while interpreting the norm at issue, first the fact whether one single contract or two separate contracts are at issue is to be considered. In case it has been ascertained that there is only one contract at issue, it remains to consider what "a preponderant part of the obligations" means. For this purpose, many circumstances are to be taken into account. By way of an example, if the required work demands specific expertise or the employment of particular equipment, this is to be regarded as representing a preponderant part of the obligations. In this case, a service contract is at issue which falls outside the scope of application of the Sales Act. In the case where the components are easily changeable e.g., the service consists of changing the wheels of a car, the service is not preponderant; thus, in this latter case there is a sales contract (FINLAND Routamo and Ramberg, Kauppalain Kommentaari, 26-27; SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 151 f). Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law whether a mixed contract falls within the scope of the Sale of Goods Act depends upon the facts of each case; however, most mixed contracts have been interpreted by the courts as consisting of a single contract of sale, with a subsidiary arrangement that if the buyer delivers the other goods to the seller, an agreed allowance will be made against the price, Benjamin (-Sealy), Sale of Goods[6], § 1-039; see e.g. G. J. Dawson (Clapham) Ltd. v. H. & G. Dutfield [1936] 2 All ER 232. Alternatively, a mixed contract may be interpreted as a pair of reciprocal contracts of sale with a set-off of prices. Many transactions involve the supply of both goods and services, sometimes known as contracts for work and materials. Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law such contracts will be held to be sales if the substance of the contract is the ultimate result, services if it is the skill and labour of the supplier; for example, painting a portrait (Robinson v. Graves [1935] 1 KB 579), repairing another person's property with the replacement and installation of parts (Lee v. Griffin (1861) 1 B & S 272, 121 ER 716), manufacturing goods to another's orders (Cammell Laird & Co. Ltd. v. Manganese Bronze & Brass Co. Ltd. [1934] AC 402), installing additional goods on another's property, serving a meal in a restaurant (Lockett v. A. & M. Charles Ltd. [1938] 4 All ER 170). Under SPANISH law, the absorption principle has been explicitly adopted for contracts entered into by Public Sector bodies (Ley 30/2007 art. 12).

15. Second, one can combine the rules for the different parts of the contract, thus breaking down the transaction into different elements (so-called theory of cumulation: AUSTRIA; NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:215).

16. Third, one can apply the general law of obligations without falling back on rules for specific contracts (CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 491(3); HUNGARY BH 1982. 201; SLOVAKIA CC § 491(3); SPAIN for the contract of "cesión de suelo por obra" (Ruda González, El contrato de cesión de suelo por obra, 94)). Under CZECH law this for instance applies to leasing contracts (cf. Bejček/Eliáš/Raban, Kurz obchodního práva[3], 286; PP 11/2001, 29 and PR 6/2004, 231).

17. Under many systems there is no consistent policy in qualifying a mixed contract, but the different theories are combined (BELGIUM; FRANCE; GERMANY; SPAIN, HUNGARY). In FRANCE sometimes a distributive qualification is chosen, and then a contract is partly a sale and partly another contract (Cass.civ. III, 16 March 1977, Bull.civ. III, no. 131, sale of a nuclear plant to be built, this contract is partly a sale, partly a construction contract). But most of the time case law opts for an exclusive qualification of the contract, then applying the rules of the preponderant contract. However, the preponderant contract is defined in a particular way: case law has ruled that a contract shall be qualified as a contract for service and not a sale when it concerns the transfer of property of a thing to be manufactured according to specifications required to satisfy the particular needs of the client and not things having specifications determined in advance (see e.g. Cass.civ. I, 14 December 1999, Bull.civ. I, no. 340). In GERMANY both theories are present, the theory of absorption as well as the theory of cumulation. The former was in particular applied by the Reichsgericht before 1945. The latter is the majority opinion for leasing contracts, where sales and lease meet (see e.g. Medicus, Bürgerliches Recht[20], 236 f). In HUNGARY legal authors and court decisions often use the expressions 'mixed contract' and 'atypical contract', but the distinction between these two expressions is rather blurred. Mixed contract could refer to a contract made up of elements of different regulated contracts, such as a financial lease. Atypical contract could refer to a contract where only the general law of contracts can be applied without falling back on the rules for specific contracts. But courts sometimes use the two expressions interchangeably, as if they meant the same. So all that can be said is that courts use both the method of breaking down the transaction into its various components and the method of relying on the general law of contracts. No clear theoretical background is available (see Miskolczi Bodnár, Gazdaság és Jog 1/1997, 3-11). In SPAIN there is no unique theoretical approach. Courts customarily apply sale or lease rules to leasing contracts, but not as cumulative rules (Parra Lucán, Aranzadi civil 2006, 2223). The "cumulative approach" is also applied in mixed transactions, as the negotium mixtum cum donatione, as well as in contracts to transfer immoveable assets to be made in the future. In particular, the cumulative approach (sale and agency) is sometimes used for the characterisation of contracts such as distributorship (TS 14 February 1997, RAJ 1997 no. 1418) and in the contract to transfer an immoveable in exchange for the transferee's support during the rest of the life of the transferor (TS 1 July 1982, RAJ 1982 no. 4213). When the regulation of one contract is said to "absorb" the whole contractual relationship, this normally happens because of the existence of some kind of simulation in the transaction.

18. Other combinations are also possible, see for instance sales contracts combined with the obligation to maintain the goods by the seller (LITHUANIA CC art. 6.156). A sales contract may also be combined with a contract for exclusive distributorship. Here the sales rules will be applied to the sales contract integrated in the overall contract (SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 147). Under ITALIAN case law a contract of sale with exclusivity is a mixture of sales and mandate, sales and agency, or sales and supply. However, it seems more appropriate to consider the concession of sales as an atypical contract, which is characterized by a realization of an integrated form of distribution of goods of a wide consumption (Bianca, La vendita e la permuta, 43).

V. Electricity

19. Generally, the sale of electricity falls within the scope of general sales law under most systems (AUSTRIA electricity is deemed to be incorporeal, see Products Liability Act § 4 and Consumer Protection Act § 15(1); CZECH REPUBLIC elements (natural energy powers) are deemed things; ENGLAND Bridge, Sale of Goods, 28; ESTONIA LOA § 208(3); FRANCE Crim., 8 January 1958: JCP éd. G 1958, II, 10546, with note H. Delpech; GERMANY CC § 453; GREECE cf. CFI Thessaloniki 1580/1998 8 Arm 1998, 929; HUNGARY CC § 94(2), if there is no legal provision to the contrary, the rules of ownership shall apply appropriately to money, securities and natural resources; LITHUANIA special provisions for the sale of various kinds of energy in CC arts. 6.383-391; POLAND CC art. 555; PORTUGAL RP 31-1-1994; SCOTLAND "The sale of water, gas, electricity and the like is competent at common law and semble under the Act." (Gow, Mercantile and Industrial Law of Scotland, 81, citing the Scottish judge Lord Guest in Longhurst v. Guildford Water Board [1961] 3 All ER 545 (HL), 549); SLOVENIA Property Code art. 15).

20. Under some systems, the provisions on the sale of goods apply by analogy to the sale of electricity (GERMANY CC § 453, NORWAY Ot. prp. no. 80 1987-1988 and Krüger, Norsk Kjøpsrett[4], 6). Similarly in the NETHERLANDS, where the rules on sales are either applied directly or at least by way of analogy (the prevailing opinion in the legal literature does not consider electricity as a thing as it would not be considered a good of a 'physical' nature; cf. Loos, De energieleveringsovereenkomst, 51-56).

21. In SWEDEN a contract for the distribution of electricity will rather constitute a service contract, and is not regarded as a sale, since it is argued that electricity is not corporeal (cf. Ramberg, Köplagen, 137). See also SPAIN where the provisions on sale are applied to supply contracts in so far as they are not opposed to the nature of the contract of supply (De la Cuesta Rute, Contratos Mercantiles, I, 228: legal literature traditionally considers the contract of supply as a variety of sales contracts; see also TS 10 March 1994, RAJ 1994 no. 1734, TS 23 May 2002, RAJ 2002 no. 7158.

22. In some countries, the sale of electricity is regulated by public law (BELGIUM Flemish region: Vlaams elektriciteitsdecreet, Brussels region: Elektriciteitsordonnantie, Walloon region: Décret relative à l' organisation du marché regional de l' électricité; FINLAND Electricity Market Act (Sähkömarkkinalaki); LATVIA Electricity Market Act; SPAIN Electricity Market Act 1997). This private-public divide may be due to the fact that the utilities have been privatised across Europe, whereby the private law of sale is thus potentially much more relevant in this area, whether involving suppliers inter se or in dealing with customers (cf. ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, but see the explanation for FINLAND, where the reason for the exclusion of electricity from the Sale of Goods Act lies in the fact that the supply of electricity, despite the broad meaning of the term of movable property (irtain omaisuus), is mainly considered as a service contract. According to the general view, in the case of electricity, the concept of transfer (luovutus) is lacking; see also SPAIN).

23. Under some systems, the sale of electricity is not regarded as a consumer sale in accordance with Consumer Sales Directive art. 1(2)(b) (FRANCE Consumer Code art. L.211-2(2); SWEDEN cf. Prop 2001/02:134, 24; SPAIN ConsProtA art. 115(2)). In the NETHERLANDS, however, since the liberalisation of the market for the supply of electricity and gas in 2004, such supply to a consumer is explicitly recognised as a consumer sales contract (CC art. 7:5(1)).

VI. Software

24. The problem with the sale of software is to determine what is actually being sold. While some systems seem to consider software as 'goods' without further qualification others grapple with the distinction between the transfer of the actual medium containing the software, such as a disk, and the transfer of the right to use the software, which belongs to the realm of intellectual property.

25. Under some systems software is simply considered to be 'goods' (AUSTRIA Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 144, fn. 5; GREECE; LATVIA; LITHUANIA). Also in GERMANY the BGH has applied the provisions on the sale of goods to software, see BGH 18 October 1989, BGHZ 109, 97. Indirectly, this same approach has been consecrated by the SPANISH Supreme Court (TS 12 December 1988, CCJC 18/1988, pp. 1063 ff, annotated by Delgado).

26. While the 'sale' of software, as a rule, does not fall under the scope of the Sales Act in the NORDIC COUNTRIES, since it is a transfer of the right to use software assigned by way of licensing contracts, the respective Acts may, however, apply if software is sold together with hardware (FINLAND Routamo and Ramberg, Kauppalain Kommentaari, 15; NORWAY cf. Ot. prp. no. 44 2001-2002, 57; SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 138). However, this provides that such a transaction is considered to entail a proper transfer (FINLAND Routamo and Ramberg, Kauppalain Kommentaari, 15). Similarly in the NETHERLANDS, software is not considered to be a 'thing', but at least in cases of simple standard software, which can be considered forming a union with the disk or CD-Rom sold, the provisions on the sale of goods ultimately will apply, see Asser-Hijma (2001), no. 196. In case standard software is downloaded from the Internet, the sales regulation is to be applied by way of analogy, Asser-Hijma (2001), no. 203.

27. Under other systems like in FRANCE the transfer of software is considered to be only a licensing of software rather than a sale, although this distinction might not always be clear-cut (see Le Tourneau, JCP 1982, I no. 3078). However, the Cour de cassation applied the guarantee for hidden defects to a computer disk infected with a virus, thus qualifying the contract as a sale (Cass.civ. I, 25 November 1997, Bull.civ. IV, no. 308; JCP 1998,853 note Gross; RTD civ 1998, 386 obs. Jourdain.). This led an author to consider that the contract for providing standard software can be characterised as a sale (Huet, De la "vente" de logiciel, 799 ff contra, Girot, User Protection in IT Contracts, 162 ff). Similarly in BELGIUM, the distinction is not clear (qualification as a sale: Tilleman and Verbeke, Bijzondere overeenkomsten in kort bestek, 234; Kh. Brussels 25 February 2000, AJT 1999-00, 843 ; Liege 19 February 2002, T. Aann. 2003, 133; Rb Brussels 2 May 1088, D.I.T. 1990, vol. 1, 47; Kh. Kortrijk 23 June 2003, TGR-TWVR 2004, vol. 4, 286; Kh. Turnhout 18 March 1996, Turnh. Rechtsl. 1995-96, 147; qualification as licence: Dirix and Van Oevelen (-Taeymans), Bijzondere overeenkomsten). In principle, rights conferred by copyright cannot be transferred inter vivos under HUNGARIAN law, they can only be the object of a license contract. However an exception has been made for economic rights related to software (Copyright Act art. 58(3)), database (Copyright Act art. 61(2)), motion picture works (Copyright Act art. 66(1)) and works ordered for advertising (Copyright Act art. 63(1)). Rights related to copyright (neighbouring rights and rights conferred by sui generis database protection) and industrial property rights are also transferable).

28. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND there are conflicting cases on this issue. In St. Albans City & District Council v. International Computers Ltd. [1996] 4 All ER 481 (CA) it was held that a supply of a disk carrying software is either a sale or a supply of goods [the defendants delivered software to the claimants via a disk which was taken to their premises for the purpose of loading the software and then taken away; it was held that there was no sale of the software but merely a licence to use it]. In Beta Computers (Europe) Ltd v Adobe Systems (Europe) Ltd 1996 SLT 604 Lord Penrose held in the Outer House of the Court of Session that the supply of proprietary software for a price was a single contract sui generis and not a sale of goods, though it contained elements of contracts such as sales of goods and the granting of licences. On these authorities, the downloading of software from the Internet would appear not to be a sale of goods in either system.

VII. Rights and receivables and industrial or other intellectual property rights

29. The majority of the systems have a general regime of sales law that comprises the sale of goods, immovables and rights. As a consequence, the sale of rights is governed by the general rules. When it comes to rights, they need to be transferable (CZECH REPUBLIC rights must be property values; similarly NETHERLANDS, cf. CC arts. 3:6 and 7:47; SLOVAKIA CC § 118; SLOVENIA), which excludes purely personal rights (LITHUANIA). In POLAND sales covers shares, transferable proprietary rights and rights on immaterial goods (Radwański (-Katner), System Prawa Prywatnego VII^2, 42). In ESTONIA any right (including non-transferable rights) can be the object of a sales contract, if the right is not transferable the seller would merely commit a non-performance. Also in SPAIN, the contract of sale may have as its object every corporeal and incorporeal asset (Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II(2)^3, p. 17).

30. Since the NORDIC COUNTRIES use a wide definition of goods that also covers incorporeal property, such as sales of stock-options, shares, bonds, intellectual property rights, licences, rights of use, patent rights, trademark rights fall within the application of the respective Sales Act (cf. SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 136 f). It is however important to keep in mind that this only holds true for the transfer of existing rights, and not their coming into being. In FINLAND, the application of the Sales Act has given rise to discussion; the prevailing view is that the Act is also applicable to purchase of shares agreements (e.g. KKO 1992:158). A narrower approach is found in consumer sales, where the scope of application is limited to corporeal goods (FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 1(1); SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 1(1)).

31. Under HUNGARIAN law the rules on ownership are made applicable to securities (both certificated and uncertificated – or dematerialised – securities), as if they were things and as a result securities can also be the object of a sales contract, CC § 94(2).

32. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the sale of incorporeal rights, such as intellectual property rights, rights of action, and contractual rights, will not be subject to the Sale of Goods Act. A prohibition upon assignation in a contract will generally be given effect so as to invalidate any purported transaction in breach of the prohibition (Linden Gardens Trust Ltd v. Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd [1994] 1 AC 85; James Scott Ltd. v Apollo Engineering Ltd. 2000 SC 228).

33. In FRANCE, the transfer of intellectual property rights is governed by general sales law and specific provisions of the Intellectual Property Code, Code de la propriété intellectuelle (for copyright, droit d'auteur: arts. L. 131-1 ff; for patents: arts. L. 613-8 ff).

34. In BELGIUM the transfer of industrial property rights is considered a licence of these rights rather than a sale (van Hoof, Overdracht van intellectuele rechten en voorwerp van zekerheden, 119-170) The same principle applies in SPAIN for intellectual property rights (see Bercovitz, Manual de propiedad intelectual).

IX. Immovable property

36. See Notes to IV.A.–1:201 (Goods).

X. Mandatory provisions in consumer sales law

37. In all systems, special rules relating to consumer sales are mandatory. The most common approach is to declare them mandatory as such, i.e. the entire set of rules (Consumer Sales Directive art. 7(1); AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 2(1); BELGIUM CC art. 1649octies; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 2(3); FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 2; FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-17; ITALY Consumer Code art. 134(1): LITHUANIA CC art. 6.350; NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 3; POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 11; SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act § 37č; SPAIN, ConsProtA art. 10; SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 3(1)). Under ESTONIAN law it is provided that under a consumer sale the provisions that govern the parties' liability in the case of non-performance (both in sales law and in general contract law) are mandatory and no deviations to the detriment of the consumer are allowed, LOA § 237(1). Under SWEDISH law it is expressly pointed out in the preparatory works that it is not sufficient to establish in an overall view whether the contract grants the consumer equal or better protection than by law (Prop 1989/90:89).

38. Under other systems, the sales regulation contains a list of which rules are declared mandatory in favour of the consumer (DENMARK SGA § 1(2); GERMANY CC § 475). A similar approach is to indicate in each specific article if the regulation is mandatory in consumer sales as is the case under HUNGARIAN law.

39. In the NETHERLANDS parties may not derogate from certain rules to the detriment of the consumer, whereas they may derogate to the detriment of the consumer from others, but not by means of standard contract terms (CC art. 7:6(1) and (2)). For a similar 'targeted' approach, see also ENGLAND and SCOTLAND where the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act relating to the seller's implied undertakings as to the conformity of goods with the description or sample, and as to their quality and fitness for any particular purpose, are mandatory in consumer sales (Unfair Contract Terms Act arts. 6(2) and 20(2)).

40. Given that there are indirect ways to restrict or exclude the rights of consumers, certain clauses are tackled specifically, see for instance BELGIUM with regard to clauses implying that the consumer was aware of any lack of conformity of the consumer goods existing at the time the contract was concluded, CC art. 1649octies.

41. Party autonomy may be limited by a general fairness rule, such as promulgated in FINLAND and SWEDEN (Contracts Act § 36). Moreover, certain (general) provisions can be declared mandatory as such. Provisions relating to the seller's implied undertakings as to title are mandatory in all sales (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 6(1)). In SLOVAKIA certain rules within commercial obligations are rendered mandatory, Ccom art. 263. This applies to Ccom art. 444 requiring a written form if the property in goods is to be transferred earlier, Ccom arts. 458 and 459 dealing with passing of the risk in certain situations, Ccom arts. 477, 478, 479(2), 480, 481, 483(3) and 488 dealing with the sale of an enterprise and Ccom art. 493 concerning the sale of a rented thing.

IV.A.–1:102: Goods to be manufactured or produced

A contract under which one party undertakes, for a price, to manufacture or produce goods for the other party and to transfer their ownership to the other party is to be considered as primarily a contract for the sale of the goods.

COMMENTS

A. General

Many contracts involve the seller producing or manufacturing the goods before their ownership can be passed to the buyer in exchange for a price. If there is no undertaking to construct, but it just incidentally happens that the seller will construct the goods before selling them, then there is a pure contract of sale and this Article will not apply. It applies only where under the contract one party actually "undertakes" to manufacture or produce the goods. Under the rule in this Article such a contract is to be considered as primarily one of sale of the goods. It does not matter that the goods do not exist at the time when the contract is concluded. These rules apply to a sale of future goods (see IV.A.–1:201 (Goods). This applies whether the goods are to be mass-produced or are to be custom-built to an agreed design, like a ship.

There are two parties involved in such a transaction: the party who orders the goods to be manufactured or produced and who undertakes (either expressly or impliedly) to buy them, and the party who undertakes to manufacture or produce them and then transfer their ownership to the first party. Their contract contains two elements, that of the actual manufacture or production of the goods, and that of the transfer of ownership of these goods for a price. While the former part of the transaction may be considered a service contract, the second part, i.e. the transfer of goods for a price, may well be qualified as a proper sales contract. In fact, the only difference with the majority of sales of typically mass-produced goods is that the manufacturing process has yet to take place. It is the combination of this process with the subsequent 'sale' that gives rise to problems of qualification.

This is but one example of a "mixed contract" combining elements of two or more specific types of contract. This Article must therefore be read, and is designed to be read, along with the general rules on mixed contracts in Book II.

B. The rules on mixed contracts

The normal rule under II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts) is that the rules applicable to each relevant category apply, with any appropriate adaptations, to the corresponding part of the mixed contract and the rights and obligations arising from it. This will often be relevant for contracts which contain provisions for the sale of goods plus something les. For example, if a contract provides for the sale of machinery and for an after-sale maintenance service for a number of years, the sale part would be governed by the rules in this Part of Book IV and the maintenance part would be governed by the rules in the Services Part of Book IV. In the absence of any special provision for contracts providing for goods to be manufactured or produced for a person and then sold to that person, the same general rule would apply: the services rules would apply to the services part and the sales rules to the sales part. Experience has shown, however, that it is more convenient to regard most such contracts as sales contracts, particularly in the case of an order for the production and sale of standard mass-produced items where the ordering party has no input into the manufacturing process. As pointed out above, such contracts are functionally just like ordinary sales contracts except that the goods are yet to be made instead of already made. So there is a special rule under II.–1:107 for cases where (as here) "a rule provides that a mixed contract is to be regarded as falling primarily within one category". In such a case the rules applicable to the primary category apply to the contract and the rights and obligations arising from it. However, rules applicable to any elements of the contract falling within another category apply with any appropriate adaptations so far as is necessary to regulate those elements and provided that they do not conflict with the rules applicable to the primary category.

What this means in the present context is that in a case where the service element in a contract for the manufacture and sale of goods is pronounced – for example, where a prototype or unique item is being constructed under the active direction of the party ordering it – the rules of Part IV.C on Services could be applied with any appropriate adaptations to the services part of the contract. This is necessary, or at least highly desirable, because in some such contracts the services part may last for years and involve many difficulties. There is every reason to apply the normal services rules to the solution of such difficulties in the absence of provision in the contract itself. In any case of conflict, however, the sales rules would prevail. Conflict is likely only at the end of the process when the rules on conformity might differ slightly. It is reasonable to allow the sales rules to prevail at this stage because ultimately what the party wants is to get conforming goods just as in any other case of sale.

There is a further provision in II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts) paragraph (5) which preserves the application of any mandatory rules. So all the mandatory consumer protection rules in this Part would apply notwithstanding the mixed nature of the contract. This is essential because otherwise it would be too easy to escape from these protective rules by qualifying a contract as sale plus something else.

It does not matter who supplied the materials, provided that there was an obligation to transfer ownership of the goods, once made, to the party ordering the goods. This means that a contract under which one party is to supply materials (or most of them) and the other is to construct something out of them (acquiring ownership of the new thing in the process) and then transfer the ownership of the new thing to the ordering party is primarily one of sale. The sales rules on conformity, notification of non-conformity, passing of risk and remedies will apply. The construction rules would apply only in an incidental and subsidiary way so far as was necessary to regulate the construction part of the contract.

> A company orders uniforms to be made for its employees. Whether the company supplies none of the materials, or some (say only the buttons and emblems) or all of the materials, is irrelevant. If the tailor becomes the owner of the finished uniforms and transfers that ownership to the company (as would generally be the case) the rules of this Part of Book IV apply, although the services rules may apply in a subsidiary way to the manufacturing stage (for example, if the company gave directions for a change in the work as it proceeded).

Of course, if the company supplied all the materials and the contract provided that the ownership of the materials at all stages up to and including the finishing of the uniforms was to remain with the company and was not to pass to the tailor then this would not be a contract for sale at all but simply a contract for the provision of a service. The important question is what has to be done under the contract, not who may have supplied the materials. In some cases the contract may provide for the sale of a very valuable item, even if the raw materials supplied by the maker were not of great value. The purchaser of such an item is entitled to expect that the sales rules on delivery, conformity and so on will apply.

Illustration 2
A, a famous artist, contracts with B, a wealthy merchant, to paint his portrait and transfer the ownership of the finished painting to him. This falls under the present Article. Once the portrait is made the sales rules will apply. The services rules will apply subsidiarily to the painting stage of the performance.

In practice it will generally make little difference whether the case is one which falls within this Part or within the rules on construction or processing in Part IV.C. In most cases the obligations of the seller and the constructor or processor will be similar.

C. Consumer transactions

Under the Consumer Sales Directive (Directive 1999/44/EC) art. 1(4) contracts for the supply of consumer goods to be manufactured or produced are deemed to be contracts of sale for the purpose of the Directive. It does not matter who supplies the materials or a substantial part of the materials. The present Article follows the same approach (and not just for consumer transactions) but introduces an element of flexibility by using the word "primarily" and thereby allowing the services rules to apply subsidiarily where necessary. As noted above (Comment B) the sales rules prevail in case of conflict and mandatory consumer protection rules are expressly preserved.

There is a slight blurring of the distinction between consumer contracts for sale and services in IV.A.–2:304 (Incorrect installation under a consumer contract for sale) paragraph (a), which treats the incorrect installation of goods by the seller or under the seller's responsibility – no doubt a service – as a lack of conformity of the goods as such (see Comment B to that Article).

D. Price can be a global one

It is not necessary under this Article to find a part of the price which applies to the transfer of ownership as opposed to the carrying out of the construction or manufacturing service or to allocate a part of the price to the transfer. The price can be a global one. The contract will still be primarily one of sale and primarily regulated by these rules.

E. Immovables not covered

The Article applies only in relation to "goods". Accordingly, contracts for the construction and sale of buildings or other immovables, arguably the most important consumer contracts when it comes to construction, fall outside the scope of this Part.

F. Repair or maintenance not covered

It must also be kept in mind that this Article applies only to contracts under which there is an undertaking both to produce or manufacture goods and to transfer their ownership. This therefore excludes contracts for the repair or maintenance of goods from its scope.

Illustration 3
The parties enter into a contract for the repair of a car engine. The mechanic takes the engine apart and rebuilds it using some of the existing parts and some new parts obtained from the manufacturer. This is either a pure services contract or (depending on whether there is an actual undertaking to sell any of the parts as opposed to a mere understanding that ownership will pass by accession) a mixed contract for services and sale. In either case it is not governed by the present rule. It will be entirely or predominantly regulated by the services rules (see II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts) paragraph (3)(b)).

NOTES

I. General regulation of contracts for the supply of goods to be manufactured or produced

1. This contract has been expressly addressed in many systems, typically by extending the scope of the rules on sales to certain mixed contracts (CISG art. 3; CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 410; DENMARK SGA § 2; FINLAND SGA § 2; GERMANY CC § 651; LATVIA CC art. 2214; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.306; NORWAY SGA § 2(1); SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 410; SWEDEN SGA § 2). In POLAND the Supreme Court ruled that the subject of a contract of sale may also be a thing that does not exist at the moment of the conclusion of the contract, but it is to be produced by the seller (Judgment of the Supreme Court of 18 March 1998, I CKN 576/97, unpublished). The scope of these rules is typically restricted to the manufacture or production of goods, as opposed to the construction of a building other then structures on land or in water, either expressly, e.g. in the NORDIC COUNTRIES (SGA § 2(1)) or by virtue of the wording in other systems. In GERMAN law, however, the new rule in CC § 651 also includes buildings that are only temporarily attached to real property (Scheinbestandteile CC § 95), machines that are constructed specifically for the needs of one company and where the intellectual work is predominant, goods that are first manufactured but then integrated into a building such as a kitchen or stairs that are made especially for one particular house, etc. (cf. Metzger, AcP 204 (2004), 231 ff).
2. In addition, such transactions include a qualification addressing the dual nature of the obligations undertaken by the seller, i.e. the sale and the service elements. As a result, the contract follows sales law, unless the buyer undertakes to supply a substantial part of the materials necessary for the manufacture or production (CISG art. 3(1); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 410(1); ESTONIA LOA § 208(2); FINLAND SGA § 2(1); NORWAY SGA § 2(1); SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 410(1); SWEDEN SGA § 2(1)). Under DANISH law it is merely provided that such contracts are regarded as a sale if the seller also provides the material necessary for the production, SGA § 2(1). Moreover, under many systems, there is also a more general qualification in that the contract is not regarded as a sale if the preponderant part of the obligations of the party who furnishes the goods consists of the supply of labour or other services.
3. Under other systems there is a specific provision dealing with only certain aspects of sales law, especially the issue of liability for lack of conformity (GREECE CC art. 562; SLOVENIA LOA § 100). Clauses of the latter nature pursue the same aim as legislators, who attempt to align this aspect of liability across the board of supply contracts in general (cf. AUSTRIA see Jeloschek, ERPL 9/2001, 168 and ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, where most contracts involving the supply of goods in the UK now have the same rules with regard to the seller's liability for the goods thanks to the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 Part I, extended to Scotland by the Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994).

4. Outside the realm of consumer sales law, certain systems do not have a specific contract for the supply of goods to be manufactured or produced. There, the transaction is qualified as either a sale or a contract for services. In this respect, there are several possibilities. First, the parties themselves have to determine the nature of the transaction (CZECH REPUBLIC cf. CC § 588 (sales contract) and CC § 631 (contract for work) in contrast to Ccom art. 410; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Robinson v. Graves [1935] 1 K.B. 579: where the parties themselves have not determined the nature of a contract, the court will look to the substance of the contract to determine whether or not it is a contract of sale or a contract for services, for example, in one case a contract to build a ship was held to be a sale, although at the same time having some of the characteristics of a construction contract, Hyundai Heavy Industries Co. Ltd. v Papadopoulos [1980] 1 WLR 1129. Second, the Courts have to decide on the qualification of a mixed contract (AUSTRIA CC § 1166 for cases of doubt; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 233; BELGIUM Gent 19 July 1882, Pas. belge 1882, 384; Ghent 4 January 1892, Pand. Pér. 1892, no. 603; Ghent 22 July 1904, Pas. belge 1905, II, 291; Liege 13 December 1949, RCJB 1951, 97; Ghent 11 May 1953, RW 1953-54, 742; Bergen 2 March 1992, JLMB 1992, 1262; Liege 4 June 1992, JLMB 1992, 1292; Liege 29 January 1999, RGDC 2000, 313. Kh. Liege 25 June 1997, TBH 1997, 655; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Robinson v Graves [1935] 1 K.B. 579, HUNGARY (only in cases of doubt, otherwise a service contract); ITALY CC art. 1655 ff; SLOVENIA LOA § 620 (cases of doubt). In SPAIN when the contractor also undertakes an obligation to supply the material (CC art. 1588) it is controversial whether the contract should be regarded as a sales contract, as a contract for work or as a mix between those two. According to the majority of court decisions, such a contract is to be deemed a construction contract, not a sale (TS 27 March 1981, RAJ 1981 no. 1077; TS 20 July 1995, RAJ 1995 no. 6194), which is of importance for the remedies for lack of conformity. The rule is the contrary, in the case of consumer sales (ConsProtA art. 115). Other minor services or changes to be made in the sold asset do not deprive the contract of its qualification as a contract of sale (TS 17 December 1928, Col.Leg.Esp. 1928, p. 651). In FRANCE, case law now consistently rules that a contract shall be qualified as a contract for service when it concerns the transfer of property of a thing to be manufactured according to specifications required to satisfy the particular needs of the client and that the contract is for sale when the thing is manufactured according to specifications determined in advance by the seller (see e.g. Cass.civ. I, 14 December 1999, Bull.civ. I, no. 340).

II. Consumer sales

5. The Consumer Sales Directive art. 1(4) introduces the notion of contracts for the supply of goods to be manufactured or produced into consumer sales contracts. It is important to note, however, that it is irrelevant for this qualification under this provision whether or not the transaction includes a preponderant element of services or which party provides the material. As a consequence, consumer sales law may apply to contracts that have traditionally been treated as contracts for services rather than sales. The ways of implementing this provision in the Member States vary greatly.

6. Under some systems the sales provisions now apply whether the supply of labour constitutes the preponderant part of the contract or not (NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 2(1); BELGIUM CC art. 1649bis § 3). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, the provisions of the Consumer Sales Directive have been extended to contracts involving both goods and work by virtue of amendments made to the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982. The same applies under SPANISH law, Consumer Sales Act art. 2.

7. Under other systems the consumer may now use both sales provisions and provisions regulating contract for work. In the NETHERLANDS the rules on contracts for work may apply in addition to the sales rules (CC art. 7:5(4)). The provision further regulates that in case of conflict between the consumer sales rules and the rules on the contract for work, the former rules prevail (Bijl. H.TK. 2000-2001, 27809, no. 3, 13). Under SWEDISH law, certain of the provisions from the Consumer Services Act may now be applied in addition to the sales rules in order not to reduce the amount of consumer protection. Where the party ordering the goods undertakes to supply a substantial part of the necessary materials, the Consumer Sales Act § 2(1) prescribes that §§ 4(1), 6 and 7 of the Consumer Services Act apply in addition (these provisions mainly concern the seller's obligation to perform in a professional manner and to advise the consumer against ordering services unfavourable to him). In ESTONIA most of the contracts referred to in Consumer Sales Directive art. 1(4) would be treated as consumer sales, LOA § 208(2) and (4). However, contracts by which the buyer undertakes to supply a substantial part of the materials or contracts where the preponderant part of the obligation of the party who furnishes the goods consists in the supply of labour or other services are treated as a services contract, LOA § 208(2), and fall under the scope of the contract for works. This does not create problems in respect of the Consumer Sales Directive as the regulation of contracts for work contains specific provisions regarding consumer services, LOA § 635(4) that corresponds to the specific provisions regarding consumer sales, derived from the Consumer Sales Directive.

8. Under some systems, Consumer Sales Directive art. 1(4) has not been specifically implemented (CZECH REPUBLIC; HUNGARY; POLAND; SLOVENIA). However, under SLOVENIAN law, since the Consumer Protection Act applies the sales law regime, modelled after the Consumer Sales Directive, by analogy also to contracts for services, the level of consumer protection is satisfied. The same applies to AUSTRIAN and HUNGARIAN law, since the transposition of the Consumer Sales Directive took place through the amendment of the general provisions on defective performance, applicable to all contracts for consideration. As pointed out under I. above, this resulted to the abandonment of the previous, specific conformity regime for contracts of work in AUSTRIA.

Section 2: Definitions

IV.A.–1:201: Goods

In this Part of Book IV:

(a) the word "goods" includes goods which at the time of the conclusion of the contract do not yet exist; and

(b) references to goods, other than in IV.A.–1:101 (Contracts covered) itself, are to be taken as referring also to the other assets mentioned in paragraph (2) of that Article.

COMMENTS

A. Goods

Because the term "goods" is used not only in this Part but also elsewhere in these model rules it is not defined here but in the general list of definitions in Annex 1. The definition is quite short.

> "Goods" means corporeal movables. It includes ships, vessels, hovercraft or aircraft, space objects, animals, liquids and gases.

The present Article makes it clear that future goods are covered in the present Part and that references to "goods" are to be taken as covering also the other assets mentioned in the first Article. This avoids the constant repetition of phrases such as "goods and other relevant assets".

B. Corporeal movables

The basic meaning of "goods" is corporeal movables. It follows that land, buildings and other types of immovable property fall outside the ambit of the rules in this Part. This is expedient, given the complex and often diverging issues related to the sale of land, buildings or other immovable property throughout Europe. Sales of immovable property are in several systems regulated separately from sales of goods. Moreover, there are often formal requirements for the validity of a contract for the sale of land or other immovable property.

The second sentence of the definition of "goods" in Annex 1 lists certain specific items as being included within the concept of goods. This is to make it sufficiently clear that they, while falling outside the scope of some domestic and international sales laws, are deemed to be goods for the purposes of the present rules. These objects are the following.

Ships, vessels, hovercraft or aircraft and space objects. These objects have been excluded from the CISG in order to avoid questions of interpretation as to which ships, vessels (hovercraft) or aircraft are subject to the CISG, especially in view of the fact that the relevant place of registration might not be known at the time of the sale. However, they fall within the scope of the present rules, as they are clearly corporeal movables, notwithstanding the fact that their transfer may require certain formalities, such as registration.

Animals. During the last few decades, the legal status of animals, and in particular their protection, has been discussed and subsequently improved throughout Europe. As a result, many legal systems have adopted legislation to address the legal status of animals, such as rules relating to the trade in endangered species, mistreatment and health or hygiene requirements. While animals may therefore be considered to be something different from regular 'goods', contracts for the sale of animals nonetheless follow the same rules as any regular sales contract.

Liquids and gases. There is no doubt that liquids and gases fall under the scope of sales rules when packaged or otherwise contained, e.g. water in bottles or gas in canisters. However, this may be more controversial when it comes to contracts for the supply of liquids and gases via pipes. While such contracts certainly contain an element of sale in respect of the amount actually supplied, they may also involve a certain element of services, such as maintenance provisions. Notwithstanding this, the present rules apply to the actual sale part of the contract.

> In the wake of the privatisation programme of the municipality, A concludes a contract with W, a local water company, for the supply of fresh mountain spring water through the public water pipe grid. Due to a faulty filter in the reservoir, the water remains visibly dirty, and thus undrinkable, for two days. Chapter 4 of this Part answers the question of which remedies are available to A.

It should be noted that a contract to permit one party to extract liquids or gases from the land of another will not be a contract of sale within these rules.

C. Future goods

According to sub-paragraph (a) of the present Article, the term "goods" includes so-called future goods for the purposes of this Part. Therefore parties are free to conclude a valid sales contract concerning goods that are not yet in existence.

> Illustration 2
> At the beginning of spring, A, the owner of an orchard, sells the current year's future harvest to B, the local farming co-operative. Whether the contract is for the quantity of crop that A anticipates, but is subject to defeasance to the extent that there is a shortfall, or whether it is for whatever quantity is produced, it is still a contract of sale within these rules.

This solution ensures that, while future goods may have a distinct legal character in some national legal systems, they are not treated any differently from other goods. It is important to note that IV.A.–1:102 (Goods to be manufactured or produced) already addresses an important example of a contract dealing with future goods, i.e. goods which are still to be manufactured or produced.

However, a contract under which one party agrees to pay the full price even if no goods are produced is not a contract of sale within these rules.

Illustration 3
At the beginning of spring, A, the owner of an orchard, sells the current year's future harvest to B, the local farming co-operative. If B agrees to pay the full price whatever quantity is produced, in other words to buy the mere chance of A producing a harvest this year rather than the actual produce, a different type of contract comes into being.

This illustration makes it clear that it is ultimately the contract that will decide whether the buyer has to pay the price irrespective of the contingency occurring, i.e. the question of the goods coming into existence.

D. Goods extra commercium

Under many systems there are things that are extra commercium, which may not be sold at all. Examples of this are parts of the human body: cells, body parts, organs etc. These rules do not deal with such issues; they must be regulated by national law. However, it cannot be overlooked that some body parts, for instance hair, can generally be sold and a contract for the sale of such parts will fall under these rules.

NOTES

I. Object of sale in general

1. Under some systems, everything that is in commerce can be subject to a sale, unless prohibited by particular laws (BELGIUM and FRANCE CC arts. 1128 and 1598; HUNGARY CC § 365(2); LATVIA CC art. 2005).
2. Many systems refer to 'things' as the object of sale (AUSTRIA CC § 1053; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 118(1); GERMANY CC § 433; ITALY CC art. 1470, also covering the transfer of other limited property rights than ownership; LITHUANIA; NETHERLANDS CC art. 3:2; PORTUGAL CC art. 874; SLOVAKIA CC § 118; SPAIN CC arts. 1271-1273, 1445 and 1526 ff). Many systems have a general regime of sales law that applies to a wide range of objects, such as goods, immovables and rights either expressly or impliedly (AUSTRIA CC § 285; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 118(1); GREECE CC arts. 513 and 947; LITHUANIA; PORTUGAL; SLOVAKIA CC § 118; SLOVENIA LOA § 435; SPAIN).
3. Under some systems, the definition of sale refers to 'things', including both movable and immovable property, but not including rights. However, the rules on contract of sale are expressly made applicable to the sale of rights as well (ESTONIA LOA § 208(3); GERMANY CC § 453; POLAND CC art. 555; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:47, SPAIN CC art. 1526). The property law notion of 'things' on the other hand may differ as to its scope under the national systems, cf. the Principles on Transfer of Movable Property.
4. Other systems have a more limited scope of the sales rules. ENGLAND and SCOTLAND have a (statutory) sales law that is restricted to the sale of goods including all personal chattels other than things in action and money, and in SCOTLAND all corporeal movables except money, Sale of Goods Act s. 61(1)). Corporeal movables are in essence any corporeal thing which does not comprise land or is not part of land (which includes things such as buildings that accede to land). 'Goods' in both ENGLAND and SCOTLAND 'includes emblements, industrial growing crops, and things attached to or forming part of the land which are agreed to be severed before sale or under the contract of sale, Sale of Goods Act s. 61(1). In ENGLISH law emblements are growing crops sown by a tenant for life which his personal representatives have the right to take after his death; they are personal property. In SCOTLAND industrial growing crops are those crops requiring annual seed and labour (so not including trees): Paul v. Cuthbertson (1840) 2 D 1286. In the NORDIC COUNTRIES, the sales regulation does not include the sale of immovables, cf. under II.

5. Under some systems the commercial or consumer regime has a narrower scope than under general sales law. Specific regimes dealing with commercial sales are typically restricted to the sale of goods, understood as corporeal movables (CISG art. 2; AUSTRIA Ccom § 373; CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 409; SPAIN Ccom art. 325). Under SPANISH law, however, the TS judgments of 15-3-94 and 26-11-87 broadened the scope of Ccom art. 325 to incorporeal goods (securities). Also rights like patents, trademarks or intellectual property rights may be the object of a commercial sale (Lefebre, Memento Práctico, 54)). Also under consumer sales some systems restrict the scope of application of the consumer regulation to corporeal movables (Consumer Sales Directive art. 1(2)(b); ESTONIA LOA § 208(4); FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 1(1); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 1(1); SPAIN Consumer Sales Act art. 2; SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 1(1))

II. Sale of immovable property

6. Under most systems the general regime of sales law also covers the sale of immovable property, cf. under I. Immovable property follows the same rules on the sale of goods. However, the sale of immovables typically requires special formalities, such as a contract in writing and registration in the land register.

7. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, however, there are distinct regimes for the sale of immovables, which fall under the common law (for the SCOTTISH law of sale as it applies to immovables, see Stair, The Laws of Scotland XX, paras. 903-921). A similar situation can be found in the NORDIC COUNTRIES where the Sales Acts do not apply to the sale of immovable property (DENMARK SGA § 1a(1); FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 1(1)). Here, the sale of immovable (real) property is generally covered by separate statutes (FINLAND the Land Code (Maakari); NORWAY the Sale of Real Property Act (Lov om avhending av fast eigendom/Avhendingslova (Avhl)); and SWEDEN the Land Code (Jordabalken (JB)). Under DANISH law, the sale of immovable property is an unregulated area where general contractual principles apply, or the Sales Act applies by way of analogy (DENMARK Lookofsky, Køb, 41). In FINLAND, however, the concept of movable property is rather wide and heterogeneous, by way of example both ancient monuments and space objects are considered movable property. In addition, the sale of real property is considered to refer only to the sale of buildings owned by the same owner together with the land on which these are fixed (see e.g. Routamo and Ramberg, Kauppalain Kommentaari, 13). This is based upon the principle that the buildings are considered as movable property if ownership of buildings is disjointed from ownership of the ground (see Kartio, Esineoikeuden Perusteet, 92). However, under the SGA § 1(3), the conveyance of a building or fixed installation or structure built on the land of a third person, if the right to use the land is transferred simultaneously, are excluded from the scope of application of the Sale of Goods Act. In SWEDEN, the definition of movable property in the Sales Act covers all kinds of property falling outside the scope of the Land Code, which means that the latter is used e contrario to establish the borderline between the two categories (see Ramberg, Köplagen, 134). In SPAIN, the sale of built flats and business premises is subject to particular rules as to the liability arising out of hidden defects and non-conforming delivery (Construction Regulation Act 1999 art. 17).

III. Ships, vessels, aircraft and hovercraft

8. In most systems, ships, vessels, aircraft and hovercraft are treated as 'goods' or 'movables', and thus follow the rules on the sale of goods (CZECH REPUBLIC; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND; ESTONIA; FINLAND; FRANCE; LATVIA; NORWAY; POLAND; SLOVAKIA; SLOVENIA; SPAIN, SWEDEN). In contrast, under a few systems their sale is governed by the rules on the sale of immovables (GERMANY CC § 452; LITHUANIA CC art. 1.98). However, in GERMANY the sale of immovables largely follows the same regime as movables, with the main exception of the limitation periods.

9. As for the classification of the different vessels, see ENGLAND and SCOTLAND: Ships, which in the UK include every description of vessel used in navigation (Merchant Shipping Act 1995 art. 313(1)), are goods; but vessels whose only method of propulsion is oars are not ships (in ENGLAND see Ferguson v. Hutchinson (1870-71) LR 6 QB 280; The CS Butler (No. 2) (1872-75) LR 4 A & E 238; Edwards v. Quickenden [1939] P 261; in SCOTLAND, see Cathcart v. Holland 1681 Mor 8471; McConnachie v. Geddes 1918 SC 391). Aircraft, too, are goods (Halsbury's Laws of England, II(3), para. 694; Stair, The Laws of Scotland XX, para. 394), as are also seaplanes. A hovercraft, being a vehicle designed to be supported when in motion wholly or partly by air expelled from the vehicle to form a cushion of which the boundaries include the ground, water or other surface beneath the vehicle, is part aircraft, part ship but is generally not treated as an aircraft (see the Hovercraft Act 1968 as amended; Civil Aviation Act 1982, art. 100); such a machine is nonetheless a good.

10. Typically, ships, vessels, aircraft and hovercraft are, for the purpose of transfer of ownership, subject to a special registration regime that is similar to that of the land register (e.g. in ENGLAND; ESTONIA (in respect of ships only); FINLAND; LATVIA; SLOVENIA; SWEDEN).

IV. Specific rules for the sale of animals

11. Animals are generally considered goods and, thus, follow the respective rules on sales law. Similarly in POLAND where animals are not considered to be goods but are treated as goods, and as such can be the subject of a sales contract (Act on protection of animals non 21.8.1997, Dz. U. no. 11, poz. 724 with amendments). In GERMANY a number of issues surrounding the sale of animals have been discussed by the courts. For a landmark decision, see BGH 29 March 2006, NJW 2006, 2250 ff. On the question of when animals are second-hand concerning the different prescription periods applicable (cf. Brückner and Böhme, MDR 2002, 1406 ff). AUSTRIAN law contains a specific regime for certain types of defects in certain livestock, which deals with the presumption and time of non-conformity (see CC §§ 924 to 927). In SPANISH law the only particular rules refer to the remedies in case of hidden defects (CC arts. 1491 ff).

12. The sale of (dead) animals may be subject to a host of public law regulations. Moreover, there are laws on the protection of animals that may restrict trade, or the conditions for the sale of animals (cf. BELGIUM Dierenwelzijnwet of 14/08/1986: according to article 10 it is possible to impose conditions upon the marketability of animals with a view to protecting them and ensuring their welfare. These conditions may simply concern the age of the animals, the identification, the information to the buyer, the guarantees to the buyer and connected documents, the preventive medical treatment, the packing and the offer and exhibition for the trading. Article 12 states that it is forbidden to trade dogs and cats on the public road as well as in markets, exhibitions and similar places as well as at the buyer's place, unless the initiative was taken by the buyer. That ban could be expanded to other species of animals; CZECH REPUBLIC Act no. 246/1992 Sb., on the protection of animals against mistreatment, Act no. 243/1997 Sb., on administrative torts of breeders and penal offences, Act no. 449/2001 Sb, on hunting; FINLAND The Animal Protection Act (Eläinsuojelulaki) and the Decree on the Transportation of Animals (Asetus eläinten kuljetuksesta) provide special rules for transportation; SLOVAKIA Act no. 39/2007 Z.z.).

V. Specific rules for the sale of human body parts

13. Ever since the abolition of slavery, humans cannot be the object of a sale contract as they are considered res extra commercium (FRANCE; BELGIUM; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND: the institution of slavery is not recognised Sommersett, The Case of James (1771-72) 20 St Tr 1; Knight v. Wedderburn (1778) Mor 14545; GERMANY against "Gute Sitten").

14. The same holds true for the transfer of organs, organic tissue and cells, as it may not occur with a view to making profits, i.e. as a commercial transaction. Under FRENCH law, it is generally provided that the human body and its elements cannot be subject to a patrimonial right, CC art. 16-1. Under other systems more specific regulation can be found on this issue (cf. BELGIUM art. 4 of the Act concerning the removal and transplantation of organs (Wet betreffende het wegnemen en transplanteren van organen) and art. 5 of the Act concerning scientific research on embryos in vitro (Wet betreffende het onderzoek op embryo's in vitro); CZECH REPUBLIC Transplantation Act; ENGLAND Human Tissue Act 2004: it is an offence to make or receive payment for transfer of material containing human cells; ESTONIA Act on Transplantation of Organs and Tissues art. 3; FINLAND Act on the Medical Use of Organs and Tissues (Laki ihmisen elimien ja kudoksien lääketieteellisestä käytöstä) art. 18; GERMANY Transplantation Act (Transplantationsgesetz) of 1997; HUNGARY Act CLIV of 1997 on Health Protection art. 207(1); LITHUANIA CC art. 2.25; SCOTLAND Human Tissue (Scotland) Act 2006: offence to give or receive award for supply of human body part; SPAIN Transplantation Act 30/1979 (Ley de extracción y transplante de órganos) art. 1; SWEDEN Transplantation Act (Lag om transplantation m.m.) art. 15).

15. This situation may, however, be different when it comes to other body parts, such as blood and blood derivatives (BELGIUM Act concerning blood and blood derivatives of human origin (Wet betreffende bloed en bloederivaten van menselijke oorsprong) art. 5 states that the removal of blood and blood derivatives is only permitted with voluntary non-paid donors and with their approval; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND no authority on the status of blood when it is bought and sold, but see in the USA Perlmutter v. Beth David Hospital (1954) 123 NE (2nd) 792; in Canada ter Neuzen v. Korn (1993) 103 DLR 473; in Australia E v. Australian Red Cross Society (1991-92) 105 ALR 53; PQ v. Australian Red Cross Society [1992] 1 VR 19; ESTONIA blood may be sold upon donor's consent, Blood Act art. 10; SWEDEN Transplantation Act art. 15(2)). In GERMANY the transfer of blood falls under the Arzneimittelgesetz. In POLAND it is treated as res extra commercium (Transplantation Act art. 18).

16. See also the sale of hair, breast milk and teeth (SWEDEN Transplantation Act art. 15(2)). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND skeletons and hair are presumably goods (Bridge, Sale of Goods, 28-29). Under POLISH law such parts are claimed to be goods after they are removed (Radwański (-Katner), System Prawa Prywatnego VII^2, 36).

VI. The sale of future goods

17. Generally, it is possible to sell goods that do not exist at the time of the conclusion of the contract. Some systems contain specific provisions allowing for such type of sales (BELGIUM and FRANCE CC art. 1130; ESTONIA LOA § 208(1); ITALY CC art. 1472; SPAIN CC art. 1271, but lacking further regulation). The peculiarity of such a sale of future goods lies in the fact that property is not transferred upon the conclusion of the contract. Under most other systems the sale of future goods is not specifically regulated, since property generally only passes at a later period in time when the goods have already come into existence, cf. further the Principles on Transfer of Movable Property.

18. In general, a sale of 'future goods' can take different forms. First, the seller has to manufacture or produce the goods (see IV.A.–1:102 (Goods to be manufactured or produced) above). Second, the seller still has to acquire the goods sold (cf. ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 5(1)). Third, the buyer's acquisition may depend on a contingency which may or may not occur (cf. ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 5(2)). This latter case of buying an expectation can be divided into two sub-species (cf. SLOVENIA Cigoj, Insititucije obligacij[2], 25; LATVIA CC art. 2009).

19. On the one hand, the sale of future goods may be concluded under the implied condition that they will come into existence (so-called emptio rei speratae), such as the sale of an unborn calf (AUSTRIA CC §§ 1065 and 1275; BELGIUM and FRANCE CC art. 1181; FINLAND Routamo and Ramberg, Kauppalain Kommentaari, 10; GERMANY CC § 158; HUNGARY Kisfaludi, Az adásvételi szerződés[2], 68; POLAND Bieniek (-author) I[6], 9; SPAIN CC art. 1271 and Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Instituciones II, 207). In this case, the buyer has to pay for what he will eventually receive.

20. On the other hand, the sale of future goods may be concluded without this condition (so-called emptio spei); thus, the buyer has to pay the agreed price irrespective of whether he receives anything at all, i.e. independent from the question of the goods coming into existence at all (AUSTRIA CC § 1276; CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA CC § 595; GERMANY CC § 453 and Jauernig (-Berger) BGB[12], § 433, no. 12; HUNGARY Kisfaludi, Az adásvételi szerződés, 68; POLAND Bieniek (-author) I[6], 9). Obviously, the distinction between these two variants largely depends on the contract of sale, in particular the obligation undertaken by the buyer.

IV.A.–1:202: Contract for sale

A contract for the "sale" of goods is a contract under which one party, the seller, undertakes to another party, the buyer, to transfer the ownership of the goods to the buyer, or to a third person, either immediately on conclusion of the contract or at some future time, and the buyer undertakes to pay the price.

COMMENTS

A. Definition of sale

The definition of a contract for the sale of goods is rather short and simple, as it merely addresses the main obligations of the parties, i.e. the transfer of ownership on the part of the seller and the payment of the price on the part of the buyer. This definition reflects the essence of the contract for the sale of goods: the transfer of ownership from the seller to the buyer, or a third party, for a price. The CISG and the Consumer Sales Directive as instruments of international sales law do not contain such a definition. In contrast, most national sales laws do contain a definition and it seems appropriate to include one in the present rules. The term "goods" is defined in Annex 1, as supplemented for present purposes by IV.A.–1:201 (Goods).

B. Parties to the sales contract

Normally, a sales contract involves two parties, the seller and the buyer, who are defined by their main obligations. Accordingly, the seller undertakes to transfer the ownership of goods, whereas the buyer undertakes to pay the price. The present rules apply regardless of whether the parties are professionals or consumers. For consumer contracts for sale (see IV.A.–1:204 (Consumer contract for sale)), the general provisions are sometimes modified. Sometimes, third persons are involved in a sales transaction, for instance a carrier transporting the goods, another party already holding the goods to be sold, or someone to whom delivery is to be made. Where necessary, the present rules have taken into account such involvement by third persons (e.g. IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery), IV.A.–2:204 (Carriage of the goods), IV.A.–2:303 (Statements by third parties), IV.A.–5:203: (Goods sold in transit), IV.A.–6:101 (Definition of a consumer goods guarantee)).

C. Obligation to transfer ownership

The main obligation on the part of the seller is to transfer ownership of the goods. The definition of the contract for the sale of goods covers only the full transfer of ownership. The present rules do not apply to contracts under which the transferee is to receive only a lesser right, such as the right to use goods under a lease. However, the subsequent sale of such a right, and also of any split property right, may fall under IV.A.–1:101 (Contracts covered) paragraph (2)(c).

By including both cases in which the seller is to transfer ownership immediately and those in which ownership is to be transferred at some future time, paragraph (2) ensures, first of all, that the present rules apply both to sales transactions where ownership passes immediately on conclusion of the contract, for instance at supermarkets, petrol stations or other self-service stores, and to sales transactions where this is not the case, for instance when the contract concerns the sale of goods that are not yet in existence or contains a retention of ownership clause.

This definition has a second point. The present rules do not govern the issue of when ownership of the goods passes between seller and buyer. This is left to be determined by the rules of Book VIII on the Acquisition and Loss of Ownership in Movables.

The seller may have to transfer ownership in the goods either to the buyer or to a third person (e.g. in the case of ordering flowers to be delivered to someone else). The reference to "a third person" in this Article makes clear that both transactions are covered by the present rules.

D. Obligation to pay the price

The main obligation on the part of the buyer is the payment of the price, which is elaborated in Chapter 3, Section 2 (Payment of the price). The payment of the price does not have to coincide with the transfer of the ownership of the goods. Therefore sales contracts where the buyer may have to pay the full price some time after the delivery of the goods, for instance in consumer credit agreements, are also covered by these rules.

NOTES

1. Under most systems there is an explicit statutory definition of sale or sales contract (AUSTRIA CC § 1053; BELGIUM CC art. 1582(1); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 588; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 2(1); ESTONIA LOA § 208(1); FRANCE CC art. 1582(1); GREECE CC art. 513; HUNGARY CC § 365(1); LATVIA CC art. 2002; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.305; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:1; PORTUGAL CC art. 874; SPAIN CC art. 1445). Some systems also provide an explicit definition of consumer sale (ESTONIA LOA § 208(4); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:5.
2. While the necessary elements of a sale follow from the provisions dealing with the main obligations of the parties in some systems (GERMANY CC § 433; POLAND CC art. 535; SLOVAKIA CC § 588 and Ccom art. 409; SLOVENIA LOA § 435), others fail to provide for such a legal definition at all, thus leaving the definition to legal literature (CISG; Consumer Sales Directive and the NORDIC COUNTRIES).
3. These statutory or doctrinal definitions spell out the obligations which are typical of a sale, i.e. the main obligations of the parties. On the one hand, the seller is obliged to deliver, which is, at times, complemented or equated to the transfer of property (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 2(1); FINLAND Routamo and Ramberg, Kauppalain Kommentaari, 5 and 295-302; FRANCE CC art. 1582(1); GREECE CC art. 513; HUNGARY CC § 365(1); ITALY CC art. 1470; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.305; NORWAY Krüger, Norsk kjøpsrett[4], 1*;* POLAND CC art. 535; PORTUGAL CC art. 874; SPAIN CC arts. 1445, 1461 and 1474; though in the SPANISH literature it is still highly controversial whether the seller has a true duty to transfer the property (Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II(2), pp. 12-13); SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 125), cf. also the Notes to IV.A.–2:101 (Overview of obligations of the seller). On the other hand, the buyer is obliged to pay the price; in some definitions, the buyer is also obliged to take delivery (CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 588; ESTONIA LOA § 208(1); HUNGARY CC art. 365(1); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.305; POLAND CC art. 535; SPAIN CC arts. 1445 and 1500), cf. further the Notes to IV.A.–3:101 (Main obligations of the buyer).

4. Notwithstanding the fact that the essence of a sale is the transfer of property (which is also reflected by some definitions), the majority of the systems separate the contractual from the property aspects of a sale, cf. here particularly the CISG, which specifically points out that the Convention is not concerned with the effect which the contract may have on the property in the goods sold (CISG art. 4(b)). A similar approach is taken for instance under ESTONIAN and NORDIC law (cf. for SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 158). Under FRENCH and BELGIAN law where property passes upon the conclusion of the contract, the transfer of property is a consequence of the contract and not an element of its definition (CC art. 1583).

5. However, some interweave these two aspects (AUSTRIA CC § 1053 [definition: a sale is also a title for the transfer of property]; ITALY CC arts. 1376, 1465 and 1470). Under HUNGARIAN law the definition of sale reflects that the essence of a sale is the transfer of property, but the property aspects of the sale (which is only the causa of a transfer of property) are only partly dealt with in the chapter on sales, part of the rules applicable can be found in the part of the CC dealing with property law (CC §§ 117-119). Under SPANISH law CC art. 609 states that the transfer of property requires both a kind of contract with adequate causa transferendi and the effective or constructive delivery of the thing; this rule does not apply to incorporeal things, especially to rights to performance, in which mere consent suffices.

IV.A.–1:203: Contract for barter

(1) A contract for the "barter" of goods is a contract under which each party undertakes to transfer the ownership of goods, either immediately on conclusion of the contract or at some future time, in return for the transfer of ownership of other goods.

(2) Each party is considered to be the buyer with respect to the goods to be received and the seller with respect to the goods or assets to be transferred.

COMMENTS

A. General

The essence of a contract for the sale of goods is the transfer of ownership of goods for the payment of a price. However, there are also contracts where goods are not exchanged for money, but for other goods.

Such barter transactions are quite similar to sales contracts, as both deal with the transfer of ownership of goods from one party to the other in exchange for a counter-performance. Therefore this Article extends the scope of the present rules to barter contracts, thus reflecting the majority of the national sales laws.

There are two parties involved in such a transaction, who both act as buyer and seller at the same time. This is made clear by paragraph (2), which considers each party to be the buyer with respect to the performance to be received, and the seller in respect of the performance to be effected.

B. Application with appropriate adaptations

It is in the nature of barter contracts that certain provisions of the present rules do not apply. This is already taken into account by IV.A.–1:101 (Contracts covered) paragraph (2)(e), which declares that these rules are applicable with appropriate adaptations. In essence, this restriction relates to the provisions concerning the price (see Chapter 3, Section 2) and connected issues, such as the buyer's remedy of a price reduction.

C. Mixed contracts of sale and barter

A pure contract for barter involves no money, as goods are exchanged for goods. However, barter and sale contracts may be mixed: A contract may contain elements of both.

Illustration 2
A buys from a mobile phone seller the latest mobile phone. The seller informs him that, in a few weeks time, a new model will be on the market with an integrated camera. A can exchange the mobile phone for this new model if he is willing to pay an extra charge of 15 Euro. In this case we can speak of a contract with a preponderant barter element but also with a sale element.

Illustration 3
A contract under which an old car is traded in when a new car is bought is a typical example of a mixed contract for sale and barter. If there is indeed only one contract (which there need not be, as the parties could choose to conclude two separate contracts for sale and use set-off to reduce the price payable for the new car) then it is a contract with an element of sale, because the seller of the new care undertakes to transfer ownership of it and the buyer undertakes to pay a price, albeit a reduced price. However, there is also an element of barter in so far as each party undertakes to transfer ownership of a car in exchange for a transfer of ownership of the other car, albeit that the buyer of the new car has to pay a reduced price as well.

A contract of the type mentioned in either of these Illustrations will be a mixed contract within the meaning of II.–1:107 (Mixed contracts). There is a sale element and a barter element. So the sale rules will apply to the sale part and the barter rules to the barter part. (If one element is so preponderant and the other so minor that it would be unreasonable not to regard the contract as falling primarily within one category, then the rules applicable to the primary category will be primarily applicable and the other rules will apply only in a subsidiary and subordinate way and only so far as necessary to regulate the minor element (see II.–1:107 paragraphs (3)(b) and (4)). However, by declaring the present rules applicable to barter contracts, the question of qualifying such mixed contracts or assessing the preponderance of their respective parts, loses its significance. The sale rules and the barter rules are the same for all practical purposes. By the same token, it is ensured that, as long as there is counter-performance (i.e. a price to be paid or goods to be exchanged), contracts for the transfer of ownership in goods follow the same rules.

NOTES

I. Barter [exchange] contracts

1. With the exception of ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, the rules relating to barter contracts follow statutory sales law. The underlying idea seems to be that the consideration paid in return for the goods sold may also be other than money. This is, by and large, achieved by a general clause declaring the sales rules also applicable to barter contracts, unless they are incompatible; such as rules on the purchase price (AUSTRIA CC § 1045; BELGIUM CC art. 1707; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 611; DENMARK SGA § 2(2); ESTONIA LOA § 254; FRANCE CC art. 1707; FINLAND SGA § 1(2); GERMANY CC § 480; GREECE CC art. 573; HUNGARY CC § 378; ITALY CC arts. 1552 (notion of barter contract) and 1555 (application of the norms on the contract of sale to barter contracts); LATVIA CC art. 2092; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.432; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:50; NORWAY SGA § 1(2) and Consumer Sales Act § 1(5); POLAND CC art. 604; PORTUGAL RP, 14-1-1982: CJ, 1982, IV, 202; SLOVAKIA CC § 611; SLOVENIA LOA § 529; in SPAIN CC arts. 1446 and 1541; SWEDEN SGA § 1(2)). However under SPANISH law there are also three specific rules for barter contracts (CC arts. 1538 to 1540).
2. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, barter contracts do not fall within the scope of the Sale of Goods Act. ENGLISH law recognises the contract of barter or exchange as distinct from sale, as does SCOTS law. In the latter barter may apply to both goods (see Stair, The Laws of Scotland XX, paras. 899-902) and land (where it is usually known as ‘excambion’ – see further Stair, The Laws of Scotland XX, para. 922). It has been held in SCOTLAND that a ‘trade-in’ of an old car in part-exchange for a new one, the remainder of the price being paid in money, is a sale rather than a barter (Sneddon v. Durant 1982 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 39; compare in ENGLAND Aldridge v. Johnson (1857) 7 E & B 885, 119 ER 1476). Under SCOTTISH common law a contracting party warrants against latent defects in the movable delivered (Ballantyne

v. Durant 1983 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 38); risk passes at the time of the conclusion of the contract (Widenmeyer v. Burn Stewart & Co. Ltd. 1967 SC 85); and property is transferred upon delivery (Smith, (1974) 48 TulLRev, 1029). Following the Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 applies to contracts of barter under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law, meaning that the statutory implied terms on the quality or fitness of the goods exchanged are now used rather than the former common law implied warranties. There is, however, 'a distinct shortage of authority' in ENGLISH law on the transfer of property and risk in barter contracts (Bridge, Sale of Goods, 63).

II. Trade-in of used goods

3. A special form of barter is where the buyer trades in old goods for a part of the purchase price, particularly concerning motor vehicles. Under AUSTRIAN law this is considered to be one or two contracts, most cases depending on the interpretation of the contract. Under SCOTTISH law it has been held that so far as the new vehicle is concerned the transaction is a sale rather than a barter, even if the amount allowed for the 'old' vehicle does not fall far short of that of the new one (Sneddon v. Durant 1982 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 39; cf Ballantyne v. Durant 1983 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 38). In ENGLAND a contract for the exchange of 52 bullocks for 100 quarters of barley, the difference in value to be made up in money, was treated as a sale (Aldridge v. Johnson (1857) 7 E & B 885, 119 ER 1476). There is controversy under GERMAN law as to how to treat the trade-in of old goods, in particular old cars. Clearly, there is only one contract. According to the BGH, the consumer primarily owes the (full) purchase price but is entitled to replace parts of it by trading in his old car (BGH 18 January 1967, BGHZ 46, 338). Consequently, if the consumer's car is destroyed or stolen before he could hand it over, the consumer owes the full purchase price. This has been criticised in academic writing because this view disadvantages the purchaser who never wanted to pay the full price. Authors favour a mixed contract of sale and barter where the consumer is entitled to replace the old car with money since the trader has no interest in the car (e.g. Medicus, Bürgerliches Recht[20], 522 f).

IV.A.–1:204: Consumer contract for sale

For the purpose of this Part of Book IV, a consumer contract for sale is a contract for sale in which the seller is a business and the buyer is a consumer.

COMMENTS

A. Consumer contracts for sale

The present rules start from the idea of a uniform regime for all kinds of sales transactions, complemented by specific rules for consumer contracts for sale, i.e. when a business seller is selling goods to a consumer buyer.

The qualification of a contract as a consumer contract for sale has several consequences for the application of the present rules. First, certain provisions apply exclusively to consumer transactions, while others are excluded for consumer purposes (for an overview, see Comment D). Secondly, some rules are declared to be mandatory when the contract is a consumer contract for sale. By doing this, the present rules ensure a high level of consumer protection similar to that established by European consumer law. The main purpose of the rules protecting consumers is to protect a party who may be regarded as the weaker party in the transaction involved.

By virtue of IV.A.–1:101 (Contracts covered) paragraph (2) the rules in this Part apply with appropriate adaptations to certain contracts going beyond sale of goods. It follows that the present Article applies with appropriate adaptations to consumer contracts for barter, and to consumer contracts for sale or barter relating to the assets other than "goods" mentioned in that paragraph. Thus the present rules have a wider scope of application than the Consumer Sales Directive. Also in so far as a contract for the manufacture or production of goods and their sale to the person ordering them is a contract for sale (see IV.A.–1:102 (Goods to be manufactured or produced) it will be a consumer contract for sale if the ordering party is a consumer and the mandatory consumer protection rules will apply.

B. The notion of unitary sales law

As pointed out above, the present rules have been drafted as a uniform set of rules covering the entire spectrum of sales transactions from the manufacturer to the retailers down to the final consumers.

This approach of regulating commercial and consumer transactions within one regime has advantages. First, it presents a more coherent and concise set of solutions than a fragmented approach with different rules for different types of sale contract and with the attendant risk of duplication and unnecessary inconsistencies. Secondly, it reflects the fact that consumer contracts for sale and commercial sales may be viewed as being inter-linked, since consumer transactions often constitute the bottom end of the chain of distribution, which aims to bring goods from the manufacturers to the end-users.

The present rules have not produced a completely separate body of rules for commercial sales, i.e. those involving only businesses. Most rules have a general application, with some additional rules and some deletions for consumer contracts for sale. There are several reasons for this policy choice. First, the regulatory trend in Europe seems to be heading towards a mere dichotomy between consumer and non-consumer contracts for sale. Secondly, there is in practice almost as great a diversity within commercial sales as there is between commercial and consumer contracts for sale. This is because some commercial transactions have developed into a specialised field with separate rules and marketplaces, such as the commodity trade. Thirdly, commercial parties rely heavily on standard contracts and terms when doing business, such as the Incoterms, which address issues which are specific to commercial transactions.

One Article, however, (IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity)) applies only to contracts between businesses. This is because it is designed particularly for purely commercial sales.

C. Notion of consumer and business

The notions of a "consumer" and a "business" are used elsewhere in these model rules and not only in the Part. Accordingly they are defined in Annex 1. The definitions are as follows.

> A "consumer" means any natural person who is acting primarily for purposes which are not related to his or her trade, business or profession.
> "Business" means any natural or legal person, irrespective of whether publicly or privately owned, who is acting for purposes relating to the person's self-employed trade, work or profession, even if the person does not intend to make a profit in the course of the activity.

The definitions of consumer and business used here reflect the common features of the definitions offered by various European consumer protection instruments.

Concerning the consumer definition, there are, in principle, two ways of describing the purpose of a natural person's actions. The purpose could either be that the natural person acts for personal, family or household use (i.e. a positive description) or that he or she acts for purposes which are outside his or her trade, business or profession (i.e. a negative description). In most cases, but not always, both ways of describing the purpose will lead to the same result. An example is when the natural person concludes a contract of sale in his or her own name and where the purpose is that the goods should be used by a non-profit organisation of which the person is a member. In this case the purpose is outside the buyer's trade, business or profession, but the transaction has not been made for personal, family or household use. In order to include such situations in the definition, thus enabling natural persons worthy of protection to be also protected in borderline cases, the negative description has been opted for under these rules. The decisive factor ought to be whether or not the natural person is acting outside his or her professional sphere.

Such a negative definition also covers cases where the purpose of the transaction is to earn the natural person a profit, e.g. where the purchase of goods is made with a purpose of making a profit. However, if the purpose is to immediately resell the goods, the transaction could be regarded as having been made within the person's trade or business if he or she carries out several such transactions during a relatively short period of time. The main reason for including such cases is that the natural person, as long as not acting to a greater extent within his or her professional sphere, should be protected as a consumer as the reasons for protecting consumers as such are equally valid in this case. The approach chosen here is therefore that a transaction should be regarded as a consumer transaction if the natural person has acted primarily outside his or her trade, business or profession.

> Illustration 1
> A buys a yacht from a professional seller of boats at a marina. His purpose is to use the yacht during most weekends and during at least three weeks of the summer vacation with family and friends. However, he will also allow people to lease or hire the yacht for a couple of weeks every year to help finance its purchase. He estimates that he will use the yacht for approximately 80% of the time for private purposes. As he is acting primarily outside his business, the rules regulating consumer contracts for sale will apply.
> B buys a laptop computer from a computer store. His purpose is to use the computer in his business as an engineering consultant. However, he will also use the computer for reading newspapers on the internet, his private e-mail, listening to music and watching films while commuting. He estimates that he will use the computer for approximately 20% of the time for private purposes. As he is not acting primarily outside his business, the rules regulating consumer contracts for sale will not apply.
> C buys tiles for the roof of her house, where 60% of the floor space is used for private purposes and 40% for business purposes (her law practice where she and her secretary spend most of their days). As she is acting primarily outside her business, the rules regulating consumer contracts for sale will apply.

A complicated question is whether the consumer definition contains or should contain a requirement that the consumer's purpose with regard to the transaction or act should be apparent to the professional as a requirement for the consumer protection rules to apply or if it is sufficient that the consumer had such a purpose concerning the transaction regardless of the knowledge of the professional. Under these rules the more consumer-friendly subjective approach is opted for in that the rules protecting consumers should be applicable regardless of whether the professional had knowledge of the consumer's purposes concerning the transaction. However, not explicitly addressing the question in the black-letter rule leaves room for the national courts and for the European Court of Justice to apply some flexibility depending upon the circumstances of the particular case.

As for the definition of the other party, "the business", it is evident from the definitions provided in the EC Directives that a "business" (or a "professional") could be a natural or legal person. It is appropriate to include also natural persons in the definition as long as they are acting for business purposes. One reason for this is that the way a person has chosen to organise the business should not be decisive when deciding whether or not the rules protecting the other party, i.e. the consumer, should be applicable. The important factor should therefore be whether the party is doing something on a more regular basis and for the purpose of earning money. The transaction or act in which the natural or legal person participates could either be described positively, i.e. as being for business purposes, or negatively, e.g. as being not for personal, family or household purposes. For a standard definition, the positive approach is chosen as it is of some importance that the specific rules protecting the other party are applicable only when the person is in fact acting as a professional or business person and therefore knows or ought to have known that there are specific risks involved as the transaction is regulated by mandatory rules protecting the other party. Therefore, these rules should not apply in those borderline cases where the person is acting otherwise than for personal, family or household purposes, but not for business purposes.

In some cases, the natural or legal person could be acting both within and outside a trade, business or profession, i.e. the act or transaction could comprise elements or connecting factors from both spheres. As there is a risk that the consumer might believe that he or she is protected by mandatory consumer regulations when dealing with a person who at least to some extent is acting professionally in the field involved, the threshold should be rather low. Another reason for a relatively low threshold is that the consumer in these transactions is typically less informed than the other party. The main alternative here is therefore that the rules should be applicable as soon as the business or professional element is not negligible. It is for this reason that the word "primarily" is not used in the definition of a "business" as it is in the definition of a "consumer".

> Illustration 4
> A, the seller, and B, a consumer, conclude a contract for the sale of a boat. A owns a business selling and manufacturing yachts. The boat sold is of the kind produced by A's company and it is also situated at the company's premises where it is inspected by B. The boat is however owned by A personally and he makes B aware of the fact that since he has financed the boat by private means he will therefore be named as the seller in the contract. However, the boat has been used inter alia for demonstration purposes at trade fairs. B also receives information concerning the boat printed on the company letterhead. In such a case it can be said that A is acting (to some extent) for purposes relating to his trade and the transaction is therefore a consumer contract for sale.

Moreover, a business seller should not be able to circumvent mandatory consumer protection rules by claiming that the goods are being sold on behalf of somebody else when, in reality, it is the business which bears the economic risk.

Finally, a profit motive is not essential for there to be a "business". The definition says "even if the person does not intend to make a profit in the course of the activity". A person may, for example, carry on a trade with the intention of breaking even while indulging an interest; or a person might carry on a trade with the intention of making a loss to offset against income for tax purposes. There would still be a "business" within the definition used here.

D. Protection of small businesses etc.

According to the European legislation the consumer should be a natural person. Since the beginning of the trend in rules giving consumers protection there have been arguments in favour of also protecting a wider category of persons. A major concern might in some cases be what should be done with small businesses, non-profit organisations and other legal persons which are in a weak position. In many respects they are in the same position as consumers as they usually do not have expertise concerning many issues. The difficulty is where to draw the line between legal persons worthy of protection and other legal persons. An attempt has been continually made to draw a precise line between these two categories. Should it be the number of employees that is decisive? The assets of the company? The turnover? The non-profit status of the legal entity? One or several of the mentioned criteria together with a description of the entity as a weaker party in the transaction in question? The problems seem to be insurmountable. At least, one could not find a formula which is applicable to all types of transactions or acts. Each possible solution will seem more or less arbitrary, where it is very difficult to provide convincing reasons for the substantive rules chosen. Therefore, these rules refrain from including special protection for small businesses and similar enterprises.

E. Consumer protection under the present rules

The present rules contain far-reaching protection for consumers.

First, some provisions apply exclusively to consumer contracts for sale: IV.A.–2:304 (Incorrect installation under a consumer contract for sale), IV.A.–2:308 (Relevant time for establishing conformity) paragraph (2), IV.A.–4:201 (Termination by consumer for lack of conformity), IV.A.–5:103 (Passing of risk in a consumer contract for sale) paragraph (1) and Chapter 6. These provisions provide the consumer with additional, more favourable rights than under the general regime.

Secondly, some provisions have been excluded for consumer purposes: IV.A.–4:301 (Examination of the goods), Chapter 5, Section 2 (excluded by IV.A.–5:103 (Passing of risk in a consumer contract for sale) paragraph (3)). These provisions are excluded as they are considered to be too harsh an obligation for the consumer or for being in conflict with a provision applying exclusively under consumer contracts for sale.

Thirdly, some rules are declared mandatory in consumer contracts for sale. For further information about mandatory rules under consumer contracts for sale and a list of the mandatory rules, cf. Comment B to the following Article.

Throughout these rules, the Comments to the relevant Articles will explain why and how the specific needs of the consumer-buyer have been taken into account.

F. Protection of parties other than consumer buyers

As pointed out in Comment A, the present rules deal only with a specific constellation of the parties acting in different capacities, i.e. the consumer contract for sale, by protecting the consumer buyer vis-à-vis a professional seller. However, these rules, subject to one exception, do not contain any rules protecting non-professional sellers, i.e. ‘consumers’ selling goods (whether to a business or to another ‘consumer’). It cannot be overlooked that, while such a seller may have little knowledge of doing business, he or she still has to meet the same standards as a professional seller, which are often tailored to the requirements of trade and commerce.

Since this general regime is therefore rather commercially oriented and, thus, may be harsh on the seller, it has been considered necessary to protect the non-professional seller from a possibly high level of liability in the case of damages (see IV.A.–4:202: Limitation of liability for damages for non-business sellers). Conversely, business sellers are considered to take this risk as part-and-parcel of their trade or profession.

NOTES

I. Overview of the rules on consumer sale

1. All the systems have specific rules relating to consumer sales. On the one hand, these provisions can be contained in a separate Consumer Code or Act. Such an instrument may aim at protecting consumers generally, thus not only applying to sales contracts, complementing the general legislation (AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act; FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chaps. 5 and 6; FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-1 – L. 211-18; GREECE Consumer Protection Act; ITALY Consumer Code arts. 50-61 and 128-135; LATVIA Consumer Protection Act; POLAND Consumer Sales Act; PORTUGAL Consumer Protection Act; SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act; SPAIN, ConsProtA of 2007, Book II. Moreover, under SPANISH law additional consumer protection can also be found in the Act on retail trade art. 1.2, and the Act on the sale of movables in instalments arts. 1 and 4.

2. Under a few systems a general free-standing Consumer Sales Act has been enacted (NORWAY Forbrukerkjopsloven (Forkjl); SWEDEN Konsumentköplagen (KKL)).

3. On the other hand, rules dealing specifically with consumer sales can also be found blended in with the general sales regulation (BELGIUM CC arts. 1649bis -1649octies; CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 612-627; DENMARK SGA §§ 72 ff; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act Part VA; ESTONIA LOA Chapter 11, Section 1; GERMANY CC §§ 474 ff; LITHUANIA CC arts. 6.392-6.401; NETHERLANDS CC Book 7, Title 1, Sections 1-7; SLOVAKIA CC §§ 612-627 and separately in §§ 52-62 and 588-610). Similarly under HUNGARIAN law, where a special regulation on consumer sale can be found blended in with the rules on defective performance which are generalised for all contracts for consideration. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND see also separate legislation giving consumers greater protection against the seller, in particular: Supply of Goods (Implied Terms) Act 1973; Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977; Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982; Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994; and Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002.

4. Under those systems where there is a separate regime regulating consumer sales, the question arises as to the relationship with the general sales regulation. Under some systems the consumer regime will generally prevail. This is for instance the case under NORDIC law where it is expressly laid down that the Sales Act does not apply if the Consumer Sales Act is applicable (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 4). Also in SPAIN the Consumer Sales Act prevails over the rules of hidden defects. According to the legal literature the specific rules for consumers also prevail over the general rules of breach of contract, Morales Moreno, ADC 2003, 1625 and Fenoy Picón, El sistema de protección del comprador, 149-187. In POLAND the consumer is not allowed to invoke the general sales rules, in so far as the problem is regulated by the Consumer Sales Act (art. 1(4)). In the NETHERLANDS, after the implementation of the Consumer Sales Directive, the specific rules for consumer sales derogate from the general remedies regime, sometimes to the detriment of consumers as the consumer's right to termination and damages may be more restrictive than the non-consumer's right thereto (cf. Mon. NBW B-65b (Loos), no. 27).

5. Under other systems, the consumer may generally choose between the general sales regime and the consumer regime (BELGIUM CC art. 1649quinquies; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act Part VA; FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-13; ITALY Consumer Code art. 135). The same applies under CZECH law where CC § 612 establishes that the consumer regulation in §§ 613 to 627 shall apply in addition to the general provisions on contracts of sale.

6. Under some systems the consumer regime has a more narrow scope than under the general sales regime and is typically limited to the sale of corporeal movables.

II. Difference in substance to the general sales regime

7. Whereas the general sales regulation mainly contains default rules, the special consumer provisions are generally mandatory. Under some systems, there is little or no deviation in substance between the general regulation and the consumer regulation, basically most of the deviation is a result of the implementation of the Consumer Sales Directive. For instance under GERMAN law there are only few rules which are exclusively applicable to consumer sales: the reversed burden of proof (CC § 476); retailer redress (CC § 478) and guarantees (CC § 477). Under AUSTRIAN law the Consumer Protection Act contains few references to consumer sales, special rules are scarce (§§ 8, 9, 9a: specific warranty provisions; § 9b: commercial guarantees; § 15: long-term supply contracts; § 16: instalment sale; § 17). Under DUTCH law there is also a specific regime as regards damages in case of product liability (CC art. 7:24) and a specific provision on retailer redress (CC art. 7:25). Moreover, under some systems there are specific provisions pertaining to risk (ESTONIA LOA § 214(5); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:11), delivery at the consumer's home address (ESTONIA LOA § 215(3); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:13) and payment in advance (ESTONIA LOA § 213(4); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:26). Under SLOVENIAN law the most important difference in substance are the time-limits for the seller's liability, which are considerably shorter in general sales law (6 months for 'hidden' defects, LOA § 462). In SPANISH law, the differences refer basically to the remedies for non-conforming delivery, the prescription rules and the mandatory duty to provide consumers with an after-sale maintenance service.

8. Under other systems, the differences are more significant. Under FINNISH law the consumer's liability for damages is more limited than under the general regulation (Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 28 and chap. 9 § 30). Moreover, the notice of defects is subject to different rules (Consumer Protection Act chaps. 5 and 9). Under SWEDISH law the provisions on remedies are to a certain extent more favourable to the consumer than under the general legislation (cf. Consumer Sales Act §§ 26-32). Moreover, the consumer is not under a general duty to examine the goods, and the rules on notification are more favourable to the consumer (Consumer Sales Act § 23(1)). Finally, the risk regulation is more favourable to the consumer, since risk passes only after the goods have actually come into the consumer's possession (Consumer Sales Act §§ 6 and 8). Under CZECH law notice of lack of conformity is subject to different rules (CC §§ 625-627), the remedies for lack of conformity (CC §§ 616-622) are more favourable to the consumer than under the general legislation and the time limit for the seller's liability is considerably longer.

9. Under some systems, the new consumer sales regime has been modelled more or less in accordance with the Consumer Sales Directive (BELGIUM; FRANCE; POLAND; SPAIN) without modification to the general sales regime. Here, there may be considerable deviation between the two different regimes both concerning the remedies available and the applicable time-limits and notification requirements. Under BELGIAN law there is a new unified concept of conformity which is only applicable to consumer sales. The provisions on remedies are to a certain extent more favourable to the consumer than under the general legislation: the priority of a free repair and replacement of the goods, secondary character of the remedies of price reduction and termination of the contractual relationship. Moreover, the time-limits under consumer sales follow the Consumer Sales Directive. Under SPANISH law the regulation of damages is more favourable in consumer sales. In non-consumer sales, damages are only available in case of bad faith by the seller (see CC art. 1486 II); in consumer sales the general remedy of damages is available (Disposición Adicional II Consumer Sales Statute 23/2003); it is also noteworthy that, at least implicitly, it is only in consumer contracts that the purchaser is granted a right to specific performance. In POLAND many aspects of the general regulation are seen as more consumer friendly than the rules generated by the implementation of the Consumer Sales Directive. Under the general sales rules there is no hierarchy of remedies in the case of a non-consumer sale, notification is to take place within one month from the discovery of the defect (CC art. 563(1)), the buyer is to inspect the things bought in certain circumstances (CC art. 563), the rights to warranty for physical defects expires after the lapsing of one year from the time of releasing the thing to the buyer (three years in the case of a building) (CC art. 568).

III. Definition of 'consumer'

10. There are several EC Directives that define the term 'consumer'. Their wording, however, differs somewhat. The starting point has been the definition in the Doorstep-Selling Directive, where the consumer is defined as 'a natural person who […] is acting for purposes which can be regarded as outside his trade or profession.' (Directive 85/577/EEC art. 2). The Consumer Credit Directive contains an identical definition (Directive 87/102/EEC art. 1(2), amended by Directive 90/88/EEC). In the Unfair Contract Terms Directive, the consumer is defined as 'a natural person who […] is acting for purposes which are outside his trade, business or profession' (Directive 93/13/EEC art. 2(b)). The same definition is used in the Distant Sale Directive (Directive 97/7/EC art. 2(2)) and in the Consumer Sales Directive (Directive 1999/44/EC art 1(2)(a), see also E-Commerce Directive art. 2(e) (Directive 2000/31/EC). The only difference between this definition and the previous one is that the unfair contract terms directive and the distance contracts directive are also applicable if the person is acting outside his 'business'. The Timeshare Directive (Directive 94/47/EC art. 2) defines the 'purchaser' as a person who is 'acting in transactions […] for purposes which may be regarded as being outside his professional capacity', whereas the Price Indication Directive (Directive 98/6/EC art. 2(e)) defines the consumer as a 'natural person who buys a product for purposes that do not fall within the sphere of his commercial or professional capacity'. Two common features in the consumer definitions are that the consumer is a natural person and that the purpose should be outside some kind of business, commercial or trade activity. The consumer notion has been interpreted rather narrowly by the European Court of Justice when dealing with the substantive acquis (see e.g. Criminal proceedings against Patrice Di Pinto, ECJ 14 March 1991, C-361/89, ECR 1991, I-1189 and Bayerische Hypotheken- und Wechselbank AG v. Edgard Dietzinger, ECJ 17 March 1998, C-45/96, ECR 1998, I-1199, both dealing with the doorstep-selling directive).

11. Under the CISG there is no actual definition of a consumer. However, art. 2(a) establishes that the Convention does not apply to goods bought for personal, family or household use, unless the seller, at any time before or after the conclusion of the contract, neither knew or ought to have known that the goods were bought for any such use.

12. The EC definitions are reflected under the different national systems, where the majority use a general definition of consumer (AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 1(1); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 52(3); ENGLAND Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 12(1); ESTONIA LOA § 34; FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 1 § 4; GERMANY CC § 13; GREECE Consumer Protection Act art. 1(4)(a); HUNGARY CC § 685 d); ITALY Consumer Code art. 3(1)(a); LATVIA Consumer Protection Act art. 1(3); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:5(1); POLAND CC art. 22; PORTUGAL Consumer Protection Act art. 2; SCOTLAND Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 25(1); SLOVAKIA CC § 52(3); SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act § 1; SPAIN ConsProtA art. 3.

13. Other countries use a definition specifically for consumer sales (BELGIUM CC art. 1649bis § 2 1; DENMARK SGA § 4a; LITHUANIA CC art. 1.39; NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 1(3); SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 1(4)).

14. In FRANCE there is no general definition of consumer, but case law has extended the definition given by the provisions on démarchage (Consumer Code art. L. 121-22). A consumer is a contracting party that enters into a contract that is not in direct relation with its professional activity (for unfair contract terms, Cass.civ. I, 3 and 30 January 1996, Bull.civ. I, no. 9 and 55, JCP 1996.II.22654, note Leveneur; D. 1996, 228, note Paisant).

15. It is interesting to note that in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND it is also required for dealing as a consumer that the goods are of a type ordinarily supplied for private use or consumption (Sale of Goods Act s. 61(1) by reference to Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 12(1) [ENGLAND] and art. 25(1) [SCOTLAND]). R. & B. Customs Brokers Co. Ltd. v. United Dominions Trust Ltd. [1988] 1 WLR 321 (CA), it was held that a person does not buy "in the course of a business" within the meaning of the Unfair Contract Terms Act if the purchase is not integral to their business, unless there is a sufficient degree of regularity of similar purchases (claimant customs brokers were not buying in the course of a business when they purchased a car). Compare the somewhat disjunctive case of Stevenson v. Rogers [1999] QB 1028 (CA), in which it was held that goods sold by a business (a fisherman selling a trawler) are as a matter of course sales in the course of a business within the meaning of Sale of Goods Act s. 14 (term of satisfactory quality implied in contracts where the seller sells in the course of a business) (see generally, Bradgate and White, Commercial Law[3], § 2.6.4.2). In AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 1(5) extends the ambit by including the activities of certain associations. Under SPANISH law the key term is 'final user'. Thus, when the buyer acts with the intention to bring goods, products or services purchased on the market, it is not to be considered as a consumer transaction. Also a person who buys goods, products or services to give them to somebody else is a consumer if he does not have the intention to bring them on to the market.

16. Under GERMAN case law there have been some cases where businesses try to circumvent the transaction being classified as a consumer sale. For instance, a contract clause in which the purchaser confirms that he is a trader was deemed irrelevant once the trader is aware that the buyer is a consumer (AG Zeven, 19 December 2002, DAR 2003, 379). However, in a case where a consumer claimed to be a trader because the seller did not wish to sell to consumers the buyer lost his consumer rights (BGH 22 December 2004, NJW 2005, 1045, see also Halfmeier, GPR 2005, 184 ff).

IV. Definition of 'professional'

17. The definition of the term professional differs between different EC Directives. The starting point has been the definition in the doorstep-selling directive, where a professional is defined as "a natural or legal person who, for the transaction in question, acts in his commercial or professional capacity, and anyone acting in the name or on behalf of a professional" (art. 2). Similar definitions could be found in the distance contracts directive, where the professional is defined as a person who is "acting in his commercial or professional capacity" (art. 2(3)). In the price indication directive, we find a definition stating that the professional is a person who sells or offers for sale products "which fall within his commercial or professional activity" (art. 2(d)). The definitions in the consumer credit directive, the unfair contract terms directive and the consumer sales directive are very similar. Thus, in the consumer credit directive, the professional is a person who grants credit "in the course of his trade, business or profession" and in the consumer sales directive he is a person who sells consumer goods "in the course of his trade, business or profession". In the Unfair Contract Terms Directive, the professional is instead a person who is "acting for purposes relating to his trade, business or profession" with the addition "whether publicly owned or privately owned" (Directive 93/13/EEC art. 2(c)).

18. Also under the national systems there are similar definitions of the professional party: AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 1(1); BELGIUM CC art. 1649bis § 2; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 53(2); DENMARK Consumer Sales Act § 4a; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 61(1); FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 1 § 5; GERMANY CC § 14; GREECE Consumer Protection Act art. 1(3); HUNGARY CC § 685 e) (implicit in the definition of consumer contract); LATVIA Consumer Protection Act art. 1(5); LITHUANIA CC art. 1.39; NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 1(2); POLAND CC art. 563(2); PORTUGAL Ccom art. 2; SLOVAKIA CC § 52(2); SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act art. 1; SPAIN Consumer Sales Act art. 1; SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act art. 1(4).

19. Under FRENCH law a non-professional is systematically assimilated with a consumer. If a party is not a consumer it is necessarily a professional, therefore a professional is the contracting party that enters into a contract that has a direct relation with his professional activity.

20. More concretely, for somebody to be regarded as a professional seller under SWEDISH law, it normally suffices that he has performed more than some occasional commission or sales transactions. It is not even necessary that it aims to make a profit (for this issue cf. also GERMAN law, BGH 29 March 2006, NJW 2006, 2250 ff). For the Consumer Sales Act to be applicable it is irrelevant whether the goods sold are of the kind normally sold by the businessman. The Act will for instance also apply if a grocery store sells its old computers and office equipment. It will however not be applicable if the seller sells his private furniture or car (see further Herre, Konsumentköplagen[2], 66 f). A similar result has been attained under GERMAN law in a case where a dentist sold her private second-hand car. She was deemed not to be a trader since she had no special knowledge of cars (LG Frankfurt, 7 April 2004, NJW-RR 2004, 1208). Under ENGLISH law, however, to be in the course of a business, habitual dealing in the type of goods sold is not required (Stevenson v. Rogers [1999] QB 1028). A closing-down sale is a sale in the course of a business (Buchanan-Jardine v. Hamilink 1983 SLT 149). Under SLOVENIAN law a 'business' is defined as a legal or natural person, who is "engaged in a profitable activity" regardless of its legal form or ownership; it is not necessary that the contract should fall within its activity, Consumer Protection Act § 1(3). Included are also institutions and other organizations and natural persons which supply goods or services to consumers.

21. Under some systems the transaction is classified as a consumer sale even if the seller is not a businessman, but the sale is effected on behalf of the seller by somebody who is qualified as a businessman. In such cases, the seller and the businessman are jointly liable to the buyer for the seller's obligation under the Act (DENMARK SGA § 4a(2); SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 1(2)). Also under ENGLISH law a consumer sale includes a sale by a person who in the course of a business is acting as the agent of another person except where the other person is not selling in the course of a business and either the buyer knows that or reasonable steps have been taken to bring it to his notice (Sale of Goods Act s. 14(5); cf. Boyter v. Thomson [1995] 2 AC 628).

22. Under GERMAN law there have been instances where traders in second-hand cars present themselves not as the actual seller, but rather as agents acting for private sellers in order to circumvent the mandatory consumer protection. This matter was dealt with by the BGH in 2005. In general, the construction is legitimate and takes the sale outside the scope of the consumer sales provisions. However, in the individual case, consumer sales law provisions may be circumvented. The relevant criterion is the economic risk of the sale. If the trader guarantees the private seller of the car a fixed sum that is deducted from the purchase price for the new car, the trader is the true seller of the car. If, instead, the economic risk lies with the previous owner of the old car, the latter is the true seller (BGH 26 January 2005, NJW 2005, 1039–41 and OLG Stuttgart 19 May 2004, NJW 2004, 2169–71).

CHAPTER 2: OBLIGATIONS OF THE SELLER

Section 1: Overview

IV.A.–2:101: Overview of obligations of the seller

The seller must:

(a) transfer the ownership of the goods;
(b) deliver the goods;
(c) transfer such documents representing or relating to the goods as may be required by the contract; and
(d) ensure that the goods conform to the contract.

COMMENTS

A. Main obligations of the seller

This Article provides an overview of the main obligations which the seller assumes under a sales contract, some of which are elaborated in the following Sections of this Chapter. This short list is not meant to be a chronological account of the performance of the obligations under a contract for sale.

However, it follows from the general principle of party autonomy that the parties are free to regulate the content of their obligations. Therefore the seller may not, on the one hand, be subject to all the obligations set out in this Article. The seller may not, for instance, be under an obligation to deliver the goods, as they are already in the buyer's possession. On the other hand, the seller may also have to comply with a number of other obligations arising from the particular agreement between the parties (e.g. an obligation to provide training in the use of the machinery delivered), from commercial usage or from other provisions contained in the present rules.

B. Obligation to transfer ownership

The obligation to transfer ownership is essential to the very notion of a sales contract; if the parties contract out of this obligation, their contract can generally not be considered to be a contract for the sale of goods.

The issue of when the transfer of ownership will take place, and what separate steps, if any, must be taken to effect the transfer are addressed in Book VIII on the Acquisition and Loss of Ownership in Movables. The present rules only deal with obligational issues. They require the seller to transfer ownership of the goods either immediately upon the conclusion of the contract or at some future time (see above IV.A.–1:202 (Contract for sale)).

It may be possible that the seller has to transfer ownership to a person other than the opposing party in the sales contract, as is also reflected in the definition in IV.A.–1:202 (Contract for sale).

Illustration 1
A, situated in the Netherlands, orders flowers from Fleurop to be delivered to his girlfriend, currently working in Poland. Here, the flower seller has to deliver the flowers to a third party, who will also become the owner of the goods.

C. Obligation to deliver the goods

The seller is typically under an obligation to deliver the goods to the buyer. This important obligation is spelled out in greater detail in IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery), which also makes it clear that the seller may have to deliver the goods to a party other than the buyer.

However, there are cases where the seller may not have to deliver the goods at all, as the goods are already in the buyer's possession or they are to remain in the seller's possession. In these cases, the obligation to deliver under IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery) does not apply either (as it has been expressly or impliedly derogated from), or it is an obligation that is immediately performed (for example, the seller is treated as having delivered the goods which are still in the seller's possession but are held for the buyer).

A has borrowed machinery for planting trees from his neighbour B. After the expiry of the period of use, A wants to buy the machine from B. The parties agree on a price, which A pays in cash.

Illustration 3
A agrees to sell her student books to B, who will come to the university to take the same course next year. Since B does not yet have a place to live while A has rented her room over the summer, they agree that A will store the books until the start of the new academic year.

It should be noted that the details of such a constructive delivery for the transfer of ownership are also left to Book VIII on the Acquisition and Loss of Ownership in Movables (e.g. the requirements for either the traditio brevi manu or the constitutum possessorium, or the question of what constitutes possession).

D. Obligation to transfer documents

The contract may require the seller to transfer documents representing or relating to the goods. Documents representing the goods serve an important purpose, as the seller can sometimes actually perform the obligation to deliver the goods by merely transferring the documents representing them (see IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery) paragraph (1)). The seller may also be under an obligation to deliver the goods to a carrier and then deliver the shipping documents to the buyer. If the goods are already in transit when they are sold, the seller's only delivery obligation may be to deliver the documents to the buyer (a 'documentary sale'). Documents relating to the goods may for instance be documents primarily relating to the use and proper function of the goods, which are significant for the performance of the sale.

Given the rapid changes on the documents market, the present rules do not provide a list of relevant documents. However, all kinds of documents may be covered, such as bills of lading, insurance policies, export licences, receipts of payment of customs duties, manuals, certificates, instructions, trade descriptions or reviews. The transfer of documents encompasses more than just the handing over of the relevant documents. The seller may, for instance, also send them by electronic means or by fax. The seller's obligation may include taking steps to ensure the validity of the documents representing the goods, e.g. signatures, endorsements and other formalities.

Even if nothing has been expressly agreed, under IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging) sub-paragraph (e) the seller may have to transfer certain documents relating to the goods, such as installation or other instructions.

E. Obligation to ensure conformity with the contract

Section 3 of the present Chapter elaborates the seller's obligation to deliver goods which conform to the contract in every way. It should be pointed out, however, that the reference in (c) under this Article does not refer only to IV.A.–2:301 (Conformity with the contract), but also to the further provisions in Section 3 addressing various other aspects of conformity, such as IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging), IV.A.–2:304 (Incorrect installation in a consumer contract for sale) and IV.A.–2:305 (Third party rights or claims in general).

In this context, it is therefore important to note that the present rules start from a wide notion of conformity, which may give rise to the remedies for lack of conformity in Chapter 4, Section 2.

F. Remedies for the buyer

If the seller fails to perform any of the obligations under the contract, the buyer is entitled to the remedies set out in Book III, Chapter 3, as slightly modified by Chapter 4 of the present rules.

G. Relationship with Book II

Book II contains rules addressing the contents and effects of contracts in Chapter 9, and these may clarify what becomes part of a contract. Thus, they may also influence the seller's obligations under the contract. In particular, regard must be had to II.–9:101 (Terms of a contract), II.–9:102 (Certain pre-contractual statements regarded as contract terms), and II.–9:108 (Quality). However, the rules in this Chapter can be considered as more sales-specific applications of the general Articles just mentioned.

NOTES

I. Obligation to transfer ownership

1. As already pointed out in the Notes to IV.A.–1:202 (Contract for sale) the transfer of ownership is an essential obligation under a sales contract. Under a number of systems, this obligation is expressly included in the sales definition or in other provisions (CISG art. 30; AUSTRIA CC § 1053; BELGIUM CC art. 1583; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 2(1); ESTONIA LOA § 208(1); GERMANY CC § 433(1); HUNGARY CC § 365(1); ITALY CC art. 1470; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:9(1); POLAND CC art. 535; SLOVENIA LOA § 435(1)). This also applies to CZECH and SLOVAK commercial sales (Ccom art. 409(1)). Under other systems it can be derived from other obligations or rights, such as the obligation to deliver (CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 588; LATVIA CC art. 2033;

SLOVAKIA CC § 588) or the obligation to warrant that the goods are free from any third party rights or claims (FINLAND SGA § 41; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.231; NORWAY SGA § 41 and Consumer Sales Act § 15(2)(g); SWEDEN SGA § 41).

2. Under FRENCH law the seller is under two mains obligations: to deliver the thing and to guarantee it, CC art. 1603. The transfer of property is therefore not an obligation of the seller but a legal effect of the contract (CC art. 1583). Similarly, in SPAIN the seller is, following Roman Law, under a duty to deliver and to ensure peaceful possession. Some authors therefore argue that the CC does not answer the question of whether the seller is also obliged to transfer ownership in the goods (cf. García Goyena, Código Civil Español, 1851; Navarro Pérez, La compraventa civil, 428). Other legal authors argue in favour of such an obligation (Diez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema, 285; Lacruz Berdejo and Rivero Hernández, Elementos II(2), 6; Morales Moreno, La modernización del Derecho de obligaciones, 38), which has also been confirmed in jurisprudence (TS 1 December 1986, RAJ 1986/7189, TS 20 October 1990, RAJ 1990/8029 .

3. While the details relating to the transfer of ownership are typically found in the property law regulation, some systems contain sales-specific rules (cf. for commercial sales in SLOVAKIA Ccom arts. 443-446). In consumer sales in the CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA, ownership passes at the time of the delivery ('taking over') of the goods. In distance selling, ownership passes at the time of the delivery ('taking over') of the goods to the buyer at the place of delivery determined by the buyer. In a self-service sale, ownership passes at the time of payment for the goods chosen (CC § 614(3)).

4. Under some systems it is explicitly provided that in addition to the property over a thing some other right may be transferred (ESTONIA LOA §§ 217(2)1) and 218(4); ITALY CC art. 1470).

5. For third party claims or rights, cf. the Notes to IV.A.–2:305 (Third party rights or claims in general) and IV.A.–2:306 (Third party rights or claims based on industrial property or other intellectual property). For the regulation of retention of title clauses, cf. Book IX on Proprietary Security in Movable Assets.

6. The rules in this Part do not, as a rule, deal with issues related to property law; for such matters see Book VIII on the Acquisition and Loss of Ownership of Goods.

II. Obligation to deliver the goods

7. In all systems, the seller is under the (main) obligation to deliver the goods (CISG art. 30; AUSTRIA CC §§ 1061 and 1047; BELGIUM CC arts. 1603-1604; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 588; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 27; ESTONIA LOA §§ 208(1) and 209; FRANCE CC arts. 1604 ff; GERMANY CC § 433(1); HUNGARY CC § 365(1); ITALY CC art. 1476; LATVIA CC art. 2027; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.317; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:9(1); POLAND CC art. 535; SLOVAKIA CC § 588 and Ccom art. 409; SLOVENIA LOA § 435(1); SPAIN CC art. 1461). In the NORDIC COUNTRIES, this obligation is implied in the provision giving the buyer the right to demand performance and terminate the contract if the seller fails to deliver (DENMARK SGA § 21; FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 22).

8. As a rule, the seller has to hand over the goods, including parts thereof and accessories thereto (AUSTRIA Bestandteile und Zugehör; BELGIUM and FRANCE CC art. 1615: accessories and all that is designed for their permanent use; SPAIN CC arts. 1097, 1468; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 121(1); ESTONIA Act on the General Part of the Civil Code § 57(3) (it is presumed that an obligation to transfer title to certain goods also encompasses the accessories thereto); ITALY CC art. 1477(2) and (3); LATVIA CC art. 2027; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.317; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:9(2); POLAND (component parts CC art. 47, appurtenances CC art. 52) at the right time (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 29(5)): demand or tender of delivery may be treated as ineffectual unless it is made at a reasonable hour at the right place, and the goods are in the state in which they were when the contract was concluded.

9. The seller can, however, also deliver by passing control to the buyer as the owner, for instance by transferring documents or keys. The parties' obligations are typically concurrent conditions; thus, the seller may refuse to deliver the object of sale if the buyer fails to pay the purchase price on time.

III. Obligation to transfer documents

10. There are two major categories of documents. Firstly, documents representing the goods, such as a bill of lading, where the seller's failure to deliver them will mean that the buyer cannot take over the goods. Secondly, there are documents related to the goods, such as vehicle registration papers which undoubtedly belong to the goods. If the seller fails to transfer such documents, the buyer can still take over the goods.

11. Under many systems the obligation to hand over documents is not concretely regulated. However, under a number of systems, such an obligation is expressly regulated (CISG art. 30; CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 417; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 29(4) and 47; ESTONIA LOA § 211; FRANCE CC art. 1615, cf. e.g. Com. 8 November 1972, Bull.civ. IV, no. 277 (the seller of a car shall deliver the related administrative documents); HUNGARY CC § 367; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.318; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:9(1); POLAND CC art. 546; SLOVAKIA Ccom arts. 411 and 417-419; SLOVENIA LOA §§ 447(2) and 448(1)).

12. Generally, there is no clear differentiation between different types of documents under the existing regulations. For instance under the CISG, the seller is obliged to hand over any documents relating to the goods, art. 30. Under some systems it is regulated that the seller is obliged to hand over documents to the buyer that are needed for taking over and using the goods, as well as all other documents stipulated in the contract (CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 417; ESTONIA LOA § 211; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:9(1); SLOVAKIA Ccom arts. 411 and 417). Under SLOVENIAN law, however, a clear distinction is made where the seller is deemed to have delivered the goods, when he has handed over to the buyer the goods or the document, by which the goods can be taken over (LOA § 447(2)). Thus, it is a seller's main obligation to hand over these documents. As regards documents related to the goods it is provided that the seller must (in the absence of a different agreement) deliver the goods together with all the accessories (LOA § 448(1)). Under LITHUANIAN law, the seller is bound to surrender to the buyer related documents and titles of ownership in his possession, where required by the contract or by the CC. If the seller himself needs the above documents for enforcing other rights not related to the goods sold, the seller is bound to deliver to the buyer copies of the documents validated in the established manner. If the seller fails to transfer these documents, the buyer may, pursuant to CC art. 6.235, fix a reasonable time-limit and, after the expiry thereof, have the right to refuse acceptance of the goods, unless otherwise provided by the contract. In POLAND the seller is obliged to give to the buyer any necessary explanations concerning the legal and factual relationship pertaining to the thing sold and to deliver the documents in his possession pertaining to that thing. If the content of such document also pertains to other things, the seller is obliged to deliver a certified excerpt from that document (CC art. 546(1)). In SPAIN the obligation to deliver certain goods comprises the obligation to provide all the accessories, even when these are not mentioned (CC art. 1097). Pursuant to a decision of the TS 4 January 1989 (RAJ 1989 no. 92), for an effective juridical delivery to take place, the seller has to deliver to the buyer the title of property and all documents which are necessary to make the transmission of the right efficient and its inscription in the correspondent registry.

13. Documents representing the goods certainly play an important role in the delivery of goods. Generally, such documents representing the goods are undefined; in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the Factors Act 1889 art. 1(4) (extended to Scotland by the Factors (Scotland) Act 1890) lists various documents to be classed as such (bills of lading, dock warrants, warehousekeeper's certificates, warrants or orders for delivery of goods, any other document used in the ordinary course of business as proof of possession, control, or authorisation of possessor to transfer or receive goods represented by the document). It appears to mean any document which at least provides evidence that the holder is entitled to claim the property specified therein, but does not include vehicle registration documents. In ESTONIA LOA § 211(1) provides for the delivery of the documents necessary for taking the goods into possession, using them as well as the documents necessary for the disposal over the goods. The notions of 'possession' and 'disposal' refer to any documents of title such as the bills of lading, warehouse receipts or similar transport documents; the failure to deliver such documents would amount to the non-performance of the entire agreement. Documents necessary for use refer to a wide variety of documents from vehicle registration documents to the manuals and instructions for use, the obligation to transfer such documents will be judged under the conformity requirements and will not amount to a non-performance of the entire agreement.

14. The obligation to deliver documents related to the goods sold (e.g. vehicle registration papers), is usually considered as a secondary obligation (AUSTRIA; CZECH REPUBLIC; GERMANY Handkommentar-BGB[2] (-Saenger), § 433, no. 11; NETHERLANDS, CC art. 7:9(1); NORWAY; SLOVAKIA CC § 617) with regard to manuals in consumer sales. In SLOVENIA, the seller is obliged to hand over all accessories according to LOA § 448(1), including documents relating to the goods. The jurisprudence has however not been uniform as to when the delivery of the documents (i.e. accessories) represent a secondary obligation (and its non-performance does not constitute a non-performance of the entire obligation) and when it could be said that delivered goods without the documents cannot be considered to have been delivered at all. Under SPANISH law the obligation to provide the buyer with the documents related to the goods is considered accessory to the main obligation of delivery (TS 19 April 2007, RAJ 2007 no. 2072, TS 22 March 1993, RAJ 1993 no. 2529, TS 4 January 1989, RAJ 1989 no. 92) In the NETHERLANDS, CC art. 7:9(1) explicitly requires the seller not only to deliver the goods that were sold, but also any accessories and other things associated with the goods that were sold. Under many systems the obligation to transfer documents will probably be judged under the conformity requirements.

IV. Further obligations of the seller

15. In addition to the three main obligations of the seller (transfer of ownership, delivery of the goods and conformity), the seller may be under further obligations stipulated in the various sales laws.

16. The seller may be obliged to preserve the goods, cf. CISG art. 85. Similar provisions can be found under NORDIC law (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 72). In the CZECH REPUBLIC, the seller has all the rights and duties of a depositary until delivery, if the buyer acquires ownership before that moment (CC § 590 referring to § 749(1) [including the obligation to insure the goods if this is customary]; see also SPAIN CC art. 1094: obligation to preserve the goods).

17. Certain information requirements may also be imposed on the seller. The seller has to inform the consumer of special regulations or instructions relating to the use of goods (CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA CC § 617). Similarly, the seller may have to give advice (e.g. instructions as to use) or warnings of any danger under (AUSTRIA Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 146) or to inform the buyer about the important properties of the goods, including any rights and claims which third parties may have (HUNGARY CC § 367).

Section 2: Delivery of the goods

IV.A.–2:201: Delivery

(1) The seller fulfils the obligation to deliver by making the goods, or where it is agreed that the seller need only deliver documents representing the goods, the documents, available to the buyer.

(2) If the contract involves carriage of the goods by a carrier or series of carriers, the seller fulfils the obligation to deliver by handing over the goods to the first carrier for transmission to the buyer and by transferring to the buyer any document necessary to enable the buyer to take over the goods from the carrier holding the goods.

(3) In this Article, any reference to the buyer includes a third person to whom delivery is to be made in accordance with the contract.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article elaborates the seller's obligation to deliver the goods, which is typical of a sales contract (but see IV.A.–2:101 (Overview of obligations of the seller) Comment C for cases where the seller may actually not need to deliver the goods at all). Unless agreed otherwise, the main principle is that the seller is obliged to make the goods available to the buyer. If the parties' agreement involves documents representing the goods, the same principle applies to those documents. Paragraph (2) addresses the important case in which the goods are to be sent by a carrier to the buyer.

The point in time for delivery is important in many respects. In many cases, the risk concerning the goods will pass at the same time. This is for instance the case where carriage is involved, cf. paragraphs (2) and (4) of this Article and IV.A.–5:202 (Carriage of the goods) paragraph (3). Moreover, the requirement to examine the goods under IV.A.–4:301 (Examination of the goods) will mostly arise upon delivery.

B. Functional definition of delivery

Paragraph (1) provides a functional definition of the seller's obligation to deliver, the purpose being that the seller must make the goods, or documents representing them, available to the buyer. While this will normally result in the transfer of physical control over the goods, there may be cases where the transfer of physical control does not apply, for instance because such a transfer, though possible, has not been envisaged by the parties, since the goods are to remain with the seller or because the nature of the goods renders such a transfer impossible. (This latter case will however normally mainly apply to immovable property). In such cases, the seller can make the goods available to the buyer in other ways (see also Comment C).

Illustration 1
A sells a horse to B. The parties agree that the horse is to remain in A's stable, since B has no stable, and that B will pay for A's care of the horse each month.

At the same time, this broad functional definition of delivery ('making available') also makes sure that the seller can deliver assets other than goods, which fall under the scope of the present rules by virtue of IV.A.–1:101 (Contracts covered) paragraph (2). This applies especially to incorporeal property, such as certain rights.

C. Different modes of delivery

As pointed out in Comment B, the functional definition of delivery in paragraph (1) allows for different ways to comply with the obligation to deliver the goods. Above all, it is the contract that ultimately answers the question of how the seller has to deliver the goods. The seller may, for instance, be required to deliver in a certain way; likewise, the contract may give the seller different options for delivery.

While it is therefore virtually impossible to spell out all possible variants in the rule on delivery, it may help to provide a few examples of different methods of delivery.

The seller may deliver the goods by transferring physical control to the buyer. Unless the parties have agreed otherwise, the buyer has to pick up the goods at the seller's place of business or residence (see IV.A.–2:202 (Place and time for delivery) Comment B) and the seller's obligation will be to make them available there. The seller can also hand over keys to the goods, for instance car keys or the keys to a warehouse where the goods are located. This variant also covers other means to allow the buyer to take control of the goods, e.g. the seller can provide the buyer with an access code to the goods. However, the parties may also have agreed that the seller is to transport the goods to the buyer (cf. illustration 4); in such a case the seller will make the goods available by delivering the goods to the buyer at the buyer's residence or place of business.

It is also possible for the seller to deliver without the transfer of immediate physical control to the buyer. This is the case where the seller is to make the goods available at a place other than the seller's place of business (cf. also IV.A.–5:201 (Goods placed at buyer's disposal) paragraph (2)). The parties can agree that the seller has to make the goods ready for collection by the buyer at a designated place, at which the seller will have left them.

> A, a retailer, sells goods to B. They agree that the goods will be made available to B at a certain date directly at the place of production, a factory, which is close to B's place of business. A has fulfilled the obligation to deliver as soon as the goods are made available to the buyer at the agreed place.

Thirdly, as envisaged in paragraph (1), the seller can fulfil the obligation to deliver by transferring documents representing the goods to the buyer.

> Illustration 3
> A and B conclude a contract for goods that are already in transit. The seller performs the obligation to deliver by handing over the bill of lading to the buyer.

Since these documents embody the goods, their transfer is sufficient to deliver the goods as such. As a result, the buyer, while not having received the goods as yet, obtains the necessary means to demand the goods from the person who is in possession of them. This mode of delivery plays an important role when the goods are subject to carriage (see Comment D below). The seller can also take other measures to enable the buyer to obtain the goods from a third person, for instance by instructing this person to release the goods (e.g. by e-mail, fax, telephone). In the context of delivery by means of documents, it should be noted that only documents representing the goods are of relevance.

D. Carriage of goods

This Article provides for a specific rule on delivery if the parties agree that the goods are to be carried from the seller to the buyer by a third party carrier. According to paragraph (2), the seller delivers by handing over the goods to the carrier, and by transferring to the buyer any document necessary to take over the goods from the carrier. This method of delivery reflects the important role that documents play in international commercial sales transactions, which frequently involve the carriage of goods.

Where the goods are to be carried by a series of carriers the seller fulfils the obligation to deliver by handing the goods over to the first carrier for transmission to the buyer and by transferring the relevant documents to the buyer. Those documents should enable the buyer to take over the goods from the carrier holding the goods.

It should be noted that the rule on delivery in the case of carriage only applies if an independent carrier transports the goods. Therefore it does not cover cases where the seller's or the buyer's own employees undertake the carriage of the goods.

> Illustration 4
> A and B conclude a contract for the sale of building materials. The parties agree that the materials will be directly transported to B's building site. Transportation is organised by one of A's employees. The seller is deemed to have fulfilled the obligation to deliver only when the goods are handed over to B or one of B's employees at the building site.

Finally, it should be pointed out that the parties may naturally agree that the seller's obligation to deliver is fulfilled at a later point in time even if a carrier is involved.

E. Delivery to persons other than the buyer

This Article starts from the assumption that the seller has to deliver the goods to the buyer. However, the parties are free to agree otherwise as is made clear in paragraph (3). It may be possible that the goods are either not destined for the buyer at all, for instance if the buyer has bought raw materials for a subsidiary, or are not to be directly delivered to the buyer, for instance in the case of an interim storage at a warehouse.

In such a case, the rules in this Article apply to the other person as if that person were the buyer. Therefore the seller complies with the obligation to deliver the goods by making them available to the person indicated in the contract.

F. Consumer contract for sale

This Article is only of a default nature and does not contain any special consumer protective elements. However, it should be kept in mind that under a consumer contract for sale, the risk passes only upon handing over the goods to the buyer in the event of carriage (see IV.A.–5:103 (Passing of risk in a consumer contract for sale) Comment C).

NOTES

I. Modalities of delivery in general

1. As pointed out above (Notes to IV.A.–2:101 (Overview of obligations of the seller)), the seller is obliged to deliver the goods under all systems. By and large, one can distinguish between actual and constructive delivery; the former being physical delivery of the goods, and constructive delivery being the passing of control over the goods to the buyer as the owner (for this distinction, see BELGIUM CC arts. 1605-1606; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Adams/Atiyah/MacQueen, Sale of Goods[11], 129-131; Stair, The Laws of Scotland XX, para. 860; SPAIN CC arts. 1462-1464).
2. The notion of delivery is not elaborated in great detail, if at all, in the different sales laws. On the one hand, it can be defined as the voluntary transfer of possession between the parties (see the definition in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 61(1); similarly in BELGIUM and FRANCE CC art. 1604; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.317; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:9(2); POLAND CC arts. 348-351; SLOVENIA implied in the notion of delivery, see Cigoj, Komentar, 1403). Moreover, under SLOVENIAN law it is expressly provided that the seller as a rule performs his obligation to deliver by handing over the goods or documents, which enable the goods to be taken over, LOA § 447(2). On the other hand, some sales laws merely state that the goods have to be placed at the buyer's disposal (cf. CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 412(2); ESTONIA LOA § 209(1); FINLAND SGA § 6(1); SPAIN CC art. 1462, NORWAY SGA § 6; SWEDEN SGA § 6(2)).
3. Under some systems there are explicit regulations on the delivery of incorporeal rights. The seller delivers rights by either handing over the titles to them or by the use that the buyer makes of them with the consent of the seller (see BELGIUM and FRANCE CC art. 1607). This is also the case in SPAIN in the absence of the granting of a public deed (CC art. 1464 with reference to art. 1462(2)). In POLAND the transfer of a receivable debt from a bearer document takes place by the transfer of that document. The transfer of ownership in such document requires its release (CC arts. 517 and 921).
4. Under some systems it is expressly regulated that the seller also can deliver the goods to a third person presenting the buyer's confirmation that he is entitled to accept delivery (CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 562; SLOVAKIA CC § 562). This does however not apply if the seller knows that this person is not entitled to do so.
5. For the carriage of goods, cf. IV.A.–2:204 (Carriage of the goods) and IV.A.–5:202 (Carriage of the goods).

II. Constructive delivery

6. The low level of detail in national sales laws concerning delivery in general holds even more true for constructive delivery, which covers cases of delivery by the transfer of documents of title (see below for so-called documentary sales in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND), the handing over of keys (expressly BELGIUM CC art. 1606 and FRANCE CC art. 1605), and by consent (SPAIN CC art. 1463) (as opposed to a real act; for the notion of tradición ficticia in SPAIN, see TS 18 February 1995, RAJ 1995/882, 1 July 1995, RAJ 1995/5421 and 31 May 1996, RAJ 1996/3866 'all the acts, whatever kind, that show in a conclusive way that the seller has delivered the good to the buyer, which gets the disposal over the good in a real, absolute and unique manner, with an evident intention of the parties to do so'. This last category of delivery by consent reflects the Roman (property) law notions of traditio brevi manu, longa manu and constitutum possessorium, which have in common that the goods are not transferred at all, but rather remain where they were located upon sale (for more detail, see the Principles on Transfer of Movable Property). Under HUNGARIAN law, delivery can take place – beyond actual delivery – in any form which makes it undoubtable (apparent) that the control over the thing has been transferred (CC § 117(2)). In the CZECH REPUBLIC legal writing also establish that delivery could also mean taking over accessories of the goods; for instance keys, documents (e.g. certificate of car registration) (cf. Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Jehlička), Občanský zákoník[9], 464).

7. As just pointed out, the goods can also be delivered by means of transferring documents, such as bills of lading. These so-called documentary sales are important in practice (ITALY CC art. 1527-1530; SPAIN CC art. 1464). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, the obligations of the seller with regard to the actual delivery of the goods apply mutatis mutandis to the delivery of documents. According to the Sale of Goods Act s. 29(4), where the goods are at the time of the sale in the possession of a third party, there is no delivery by the seller to the buyer unless and until the third party acknowledges to the buyer that he holds the goods on his behalf (known as attornment in ENGLISH law). The sub-section goes on to provide that this does not affect the operation of the issue or transfer of any document of title to the goods, and it has been argued for SCOTS law that in a normal commercial case there will always be a document of title involved; hence delivery may be effected even though the third party holder has made no acknowledgement to the buyer (Reid, The law of Property in Scotland, para. 620). Constructive delivery also includes the symbolical delivery of bills of lading representing the goods specified therein.

IV.A.–2:202: Place and time for delivery

(1) The place and time for delivery are determined by III.–2:101 (Place of performance) and III.–2:102 (Time of performance) as modified by this Article.

(2) If the performance of the obligation to deliver requires the transfer of documents representing the goods, the seller must transfer them at such a time and place and in such a form as is required by the contract.

(3) If in a consumer contract for sale the contract involves carriage of goods by a carrier or a series of carriers and the consumer is given a time for delivery, the goods must be received from the last carrier or made available for collection from that carrier by that time.

COMMENTS

A. General

The seller performs the obligation to deliver only if delivery is made at the right place and time. In the absence of an agreement between the parties, the general rules on performance in III.–2:101 (Place of performance) and III.–2:102 (Time of performance) apply. However, paragraph (2) introduces a special rule for the transfer of documents representing the goods.

B. Place and time for delivery

According to III.–2:101 (Place of performance), the seller has to deliver at the place fixed by or determinable from the sales contract. If the contract remains silent on this point, the seller has to deliver at the seller's place of business or, in the absence of such a place, at the seller's habitual residence. Thus, the default rule on the place for delivery is that the buyer has to pick up the goods from the seller's place of business or residence.

According to III.–2:102 (Time of performance), the seller has to deliver at the time, or within the period, fixed by or determinable from the sales contract. In the absence of such an agreement, the seller has to deliver within a reasonable time after the conclusion of the sales contract.

C. Transfer of documents representing the goods

The seller may sometimes be able to effect delivery by transferring documents representing the goods, see IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery) paragraph (1). In such a case, the seller must transfer such documents at the place and time and in the form required by the contract. This rule is so framed as to cover the transfer of documents to parties other than the buyer (cf. IV.A.–2:201 paragraph (3)).

D. Remedies of the buyer in the event of late delivery

If the seller is late in delivering, the buyer may resort to the remedies set out in Book III, Chapter 3. Conversely, if the seller delivers too early, the buyer may take or refuse delivery in accordance with IV.A.–3:105 (Early delivery and delivery of excess quantity) paragraph (1).

NOTES

I. Place for delivery

1. For delivery to be effective, the seller also has to deliver at the right place and at the right time. While the parties are, as a rule, free to agree on the place and time for delivery, all systems contain default rules in that regard.

2. The main rule as regards the place of delivery is that the seller has to put the goods at the buyer's disposal at the seller's place of business or residence (CISG art. 31(c); AUSTRIA CC § 905; BELGIUM CC art. 1609 (in fact repeating CC art. 1247); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 567(1); DENMARK SGA § 9(1); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 29; ESTONIA LOA § 85(2) 4); FINLAND SGA § 6(1); GERMANY CC § 269(1); HUNGARY CC § 278(1); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.318(3); NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:41; NORWAY SGA § 6; POLAND CC art. 454; SLOVAKIA CC § 567; SLOVENIA LOA § 451(1); SPAIN CC art. 1171; SWEDEN SGA § 6(1)). A similar result is mostly reached under BELGIAN and FRENCH law where it is provided that the place of delivery is the place where the thing was situated at the time of the sale, CC art. 1609.

3. However, this general rule that the buyer has to collect the goods from the seller may be subject to a few exceptions. To start with, if the parties at the time of the conclusion of the contract knew that the (specific) goods, or the (specific) stock from which the goods were to be drawn, were at a particular place (such as the place of production), the goods are to be placed at the buyer's disposal at that particular place (CISG art. 31(b); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 412(2); DENMARK SGA § 9(2); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 29; ESTONIA LOA § 85(2) 2) and 3); FINLAND SGA § 6(1); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.318(2); NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:41; NORWAY SGA § 6(1); SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 412; SLOVENIA LOA art. 451(2); SWEDEN SGA § 6(1)).

4. Moreover, under NORDIC law when the parties have agreed that the goods are to be brought to the buyer at the same place or within the same area to which the seller normally undertakes to bring such goods (local sale), the delivery is made when the goods are received by the buyer at that place (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 7(1)). A similar provision can be found under DANISH law (SGA § 11).

5. Under some systems there is also a specific regulation for the delivery of documents. The seller has to hand over the documents needed for taking over the goods at the place of payment (if the delivery is to take place at the time of payment), or at the seat, place of business or residential address of the buyer (CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 419). Other documents must be handed over at the stipulated time and place, otherwise at the place of delivery (CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 418(1)). Under ESTONIAN law, the seller is under the general obligation to deliver the documents necessary for taking over the goods or for their possession and use or for disposal over the goods together with the goods, LOA § 211(1)). If the goods are to be transported, the documents have to be delivered to the buyer's place of business or residential address, unless the documents are to be handed over against the payment of the purchase price in which case their delivery has to take place at the place of payment, LOA § 211(2).

6. If the goods are to be transported to the buyer and the parties have not agreed on a place of delivery, the goods are generally delivered when they are handed over to the carrier, cf. the Notes under IV.A.–2:204 (Carriage of the goods). Finally, there is some further deviation in consumer sales law (cf. under IV.).

II. Time of delivery

7. In the absence of an agreement as to the time for delivery, different default rules apply under the different systems. Under the majority of systems, the seller has to put the goods at the buyer's disposal within a reasonable time after the conclusion of the contract (CISG art. 33(c); PECL art. 7:102(3); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 29(3); ESTONIA LOA § 82(3); FINLAND SGA § 9(1); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.319; NORWAY SGA § 9; SLOVENIA LOA § 450; SWEDEN SGA § 9(1)). Under other systems delivery must be made without undue delay after the conclusion of the contract (AUSTRIA CC § 904; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 591; NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:38; SLOVAKIA CC § 591) or immediately (GERMANY CC § 271(1)). Under CZECH law, for the interpretation of the term 'undue delay' the nature of the contract and specific circumstances under which it was concluded are decisive; in dubio, parties have to fulfil their mutual duties simultaneously and as soon as possible (cf. Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Jehlička), Občanský zákoník[9], 884-5).

8. While BELGIUM, FRANCE and SPAIN do not have a general default rule to that effect, a similar result is achieved by means of the interpretation of the circumstances. In SPAIN, the time for delivery is linked to the buyer's obligation to pay the price, but neither obligation is subject to any special time limit, unless the contract provides otherwise (CC art. 1500). In contrast, the seller has, as a default rule, to deliver within 24 hours after the contract is concluded in commercial sales pursuant to Ccom art. 337.

9. Under some systems, delivery is to be effected upon demand by the buyer, unless the circumstances indicate otherwise. Under DANISH law, if it cannot be deduced from the circumstances that delivery shall be effected as soon as possible, it shall be effected upon request by the buyer, Sales Act. § 12. Under HUNGARIAN law the seller must put the goods at the buyer's disposal at the time determinable from the intended purpose of the performance, CC § 298, otherwise the obligor is to effect performance when the time necessary for the preparation of the performance has elapsed but at the latest upon the demand of the obligee, CC § 280(2). Similarly under POLISH law: if the time-limit for the performance is not specified and does not follow from the nature of obligation, the performance is to take place immediately upon demand (CC art. 455).

10. Under DANISH law SGA § 13 lays down that if the parties have established a time span within which the seller may deliver the goods; it is up to the seller to choose the time for delivery within this period, unless the circumstances indicate that the time span has been determined to the benefit of the buyer.

III. Cost of delivery

11. Under many systems there are also default rules relating to the costs of delivery. Under all systems the general rule is that seller is to bear the costs (AUSTRIA (commercial sales) EVHGB § 8 no. 19; ESTONIA LOA § 215(1); FRANCE CC art. 1606; GERMANY CC § 448; POLAND CC art. 547(1); SPAIN CC art. 1465 and Ccom art. 338). Under some systems it is further specified which kinds of costs the seller must bear. Under POLISH law this in particular includes the cost of measuring or weighing the thing, its packaging, insurance for the time of the transportation and the costs of the transportation (CC art. 547(1)). Under ESTONIAN law the seller has to bear the costs of delivery, including the cost of measuring or weighing and the transportation cost to the place of delivery (i.e. to the place where the risk passes to the buyer), LOA § 215(1).

12. On the other hand, if the goods are to be sent to a place other than the place where performance is due, such costs are borne by the buyer (ESTONIA LOA § 215(2); GERMANY CC § 448; POLAND CC art. 547(2)).

13. Under FRENCH law it is explicitly provided that the costs of taking delivery are for the buyer, CC art. 1606.

IV. Deviating consumer regulation

14. Under some systems, there are deviating rules when it comes to consumer sales. In the CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA, the seller may be obliged to deliver the goods, because of their nature, to a place determined by the buyer (CC § 614(1)). Under some systems delivery takes place under a consumer sale when the goods come into the buyer's possession even if the goods are to be transported to the buyer by an independent carrier (FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 3(2); HUNGARY CC § 278(2); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:13; NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 7; SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 6). However, in the NETHERLANDS the parties may derogate from this provision by individual agreement, CC art. 7:6(2). Under NORWEGIAN law the goods have to be delivered to the buyer if they were sold without any connection to the seller's place of business, Consumer Sales Act § 5(1)). Under FRENCH law, the seller is obliged to specify the time within which he undertakes to deliver the goods. If he does not deliver within seven days after the delay has elapsed, the buyer can withdraw from the contract (Consumer Code art. L. 114-1).

IV.A.–2:203: Cure in case of early delivery

(1) If the seller has delivered goods before the time for delivery, the seller may, up to that time, deliver any missing part or make up any deficiency in the quantity of the goods delivered, or deliver goods in replacement of any non-conforming goods delivered or otherwise remedy any lack of conformity in the goods delivered, provided that the exercise of this right does not cause the buyer unreasonable inconvenience or unreasonable expense.

(2) If the seller has transferred documents before the time required by the contract, the seller may, up to that time, cure any lack of conformity in the documents, provided that the exercise of this right does not cause the buyer unreasonable inconvenience or unreasonable expense.

(3) This Article does not preclude the buyer from claiming damages, in accordance with Book III, Chapter 3, Section 7 (Damages and interest), for any loss not remedied by the seller's cure.

COMMENTS

A. General

In the case of early delivery, this Article allows the seller a qualified right to rectify any lack of conformity, be it in the goods or in the documents, up until the due date for delivery. It is important to note that this right to cure does not allow the seller to deliver the goods earlier than agreed. Instead, if the seller tenders delivery before the due date (i.e. the original date for delivery agreed between the parties) the buyer has a right to either refuse or accept delivery under IV.A.–3:105 (Early delivery and delivery of excess quantity) paragraph (1). The present cure provision applies only if the buyer has accepted the goods.

The rationale behind this rule is that the seller is not yet in breach of the obligation. This follows from the presumption that the seller is only obliged to ensure that the goods are in conformity from the point in time when the performance is actually due. The seller may therefore remedy any shortcoming in the goods up until the due date for delivery, which, technically speaking, cannot yet be considered as a lack of conformity. The buyer's interests are protected in two ways. On the one hand, the buyer does not, as a rule, have to accept early delivery by the seller. The seller, on the other hand, is limited in the right to rectify any lack of conformity, since doing so must not cause unreasonable inconvenience or expense to the buyer. Finally, it should be noted that, in practice, it will be rather rare for the seller to deliver early. The impact of this rule is therefore likely to remain limited.

B. The seller's right to cure before the time for delivery

By and large, the seller may cure any shortcoming in the early delivery, provided that doing so does not cause the buyer unreasonable inconvenience or expense (for this condition, see Comment C). The different possibilities for rectification in this Article correspond to the buyer's remedies for a lack of conformity.

In addition, paragraph (2) enables the seller to rectify any lack of conformity in the documents up until the time agreed in the contract.

C. Unreasonable inconvenience or expense

The seller may exercise the right to rectify under this Article only if this does not cause the buyer unreasonable inconvenience or unreasonable expense, for instance by delivering the missing parts bit by bit or by interrupting the buyer's business by sending a technician to repair a machine that does not conform, but is still working at a time when the buyer needs to use the machine.

In order to establish what amounts to unreasonable inconvenience or expense, regard is to be had to the definition of "reasonable" in Annex 1.

> What is "reasonable" is to be objectively ascertained, having regard to the nature and purpose of what is being done, to the circumstances of the case and to any relevant usages and practices.

Accordingly, the circumstances of the case will have to be considered in deciding the standards of unreasonableness. Apart from pure economic qualifications, also criteria such as time, transportation, logistics and storage have to be taken into account.

D. Buyer's remedies

The seller has not yet failed to perform the obligation to ensure that the goods are in conformity with the contract in the case of early delivery. Thus, the buyer cannot exercise rights in respect of lack of conformity under Chapter 4 until the due date for delivery. The buyer may, however, refuse to take delivery altogether according to IV.A.–3:105 (Early delivery and delivery of excess quantity) paragraph (1).

However, under paragraph (3) the buyer is not precluded from claiming damages for any loss not remedied by the seller's rectification. Such loss might include inconvenience or expense which are not sufficient to bar the seller's right to cure.

E. Relationship with Book III

Book III, Chapter 3, Section 2 contains provisions on cure by the debtor of a non-conforming performance. One of those provisions is that "The debtor may make a new and conforming tender if that can be done within the time allowed for performance" (III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules) paragraph (1).

The reason behind the present Article is that III.–3:202 paragraph (1) does not address cases where the buyer has actually accepted the goods tendered by the seller, which may well turn out not to be in conformity with the contract. The present Article has to be read in the context of IV.A.–3:105 (Early delivery and delivery of excess quantity) paragraph (1), which gives the buyer the opportunity to either reject or accept the goods. If the buyer chooses to accept the goods, the seller has several possibilities to cure a lack of conformity in the goods. By making sure that the seller may only exercise the rights if they do not cause the buyer unreasonable inconvenience or expense, the buyer's interests are taken into account. In contrast, the rule in III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules) paragraph (1) still applies if the buyer has not accepted the goods, which the buyer is entitled to do according to IV.A.–3:105 (Early delivery and delivery of excess quantity) paragraph (1).

NOTES

Cure in the case of early delivery

1. Under most systems this is an unregulated issue. This especially applies to those systems where a cure is allowed also after the time for delivery has expired.

2. However, under some systems where there is no right to cure or the general right to cure is subject to many restrictions this special situation is regulated (CISG art. 37; PECL art. 8:104; DENMARK SGA § 49). For this right to cure to apply it is required that the cure does not cause the buyer unreasonable inconvenience or expense (CISG art. 37) or that the cure clearly does not cause the buyer any cost or inconvenience (DENMARK SGA § 49). Under ENGLISH law if the buyer has rejected non-conforming goods, and time remains for the seller to make a new conforming tender, then the seller may elect to do so: Borrowman, Phillips & Co. v. Free & Hollis (1878) 4 QBD 500, affirmed in The "Kanchenjunga" [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep 391 (HL). However, it is disputed whether such a right can persist where the confidence of the buyer has been destroyed (see Adhar, LMCLQ 1990, 364). There is no decision directly in point in SCOTLAND, but the developing idea of 'remediable breach' giving a supplier a right to cure a defective performance is consistent with these English cases (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, 20-122 et seq.). In POLAND (for non-consumers) if the buyer wants to renounce the contract, the seller may immediately exchange the defective thing for a thing free from defects or immediately remove the defects. However, the seller loses this entitlement if the thing has already been exchanged by the seller or has been repaired, unless the defects are not substantial (CC art. 560(1)). Under CZECH commercial sales, if the seller has delivered earlier then agreed upon, with the consent of the buyer, he has a right to cure until the agreed time for delivery (Ccom art. 426). Moreover, Ccom art. 418 provides that if the seller hands over documents prior to the stipulated time, he may, up to that time, revise any faults in the documents, provided that the exercise of this right does not cause the buyer unreasonable inconveniences or expense.

3. There is no particular rule on this point in SPANISH law. However, the good faith requirements may lead to a conclusion similar to the one laid down in this article. Where the debtor will not suffer any delay (CC art. 1101), there is no basis to blame the seller for having delivered a non-conforming good, when there is still time to cure, provided that the purchaser did not suffer any relevant change of position following the early performance.

IV.A.–2:204: Carriage of the goods

(1) If the contract requires the seller to arrange for carriage of the goods, the seller must make such contracts as are necessary for carriage to the place fixed by means of transportation appropriate in the circumstances and according to the usual terms for such transportation.

(2) If the seller, in accordance with the contract, hands over the goods to a carrier and if the goods are not clearly identified to the contract by markings on the goods, by shipping documents or otherwise, the seller must give the buyer notice of the consignment specifying the goods.

(3) If the contract does not require the seller to effect insurance in respect of the carriage of the goods, the seller must, at the buyer's request, provide the buyer with all available information necessary to enable the buyer to effect such insurance.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article sets outs various obligations on the part of the seller where the goods are to be carried from the seller to the buyer (or to another agreed person) by a third party carrier. It is important to note that it does not answer the question of who has to arrange for the carriage of the goods, which ultimately depends on the agreement between the parties.

The notion of carriage of goods does not cover cases where the seller's or buyer's own employees undertake to transport the goods to the buyer (cf. IV.A.–5:202 (Carriage of the goods) Comment C).

B. Seller's obligations in the case of carriage

If the parties have agreed on the carriage of the goods, the seller has to undertake a number of obligations or duties in addition to the obligation to deliver, which already requires the seller to hand over the goods to the carrier and to transfer to the buyer any documents representing the goods. Accordingly, the seller has to:

i) make the necessary and appropriate contracts for the carriage of the goods, if obliged to arrange for carriage (paragraph (1));

ii) issue and provide the buyer with a notice of consignment for the dispatch of goods that are not clearly identified to the contract (paragraph (2)); and

iii) allow the buyer, upon request, to take out insurance for the goods unless the seller is to insure the goods (paragraph (3)).

While these obligations of the seller mostly concern international commercial sales involving cross-border carriage, they may also apply to other transactions where the parties agree that the seller is bound to arrange for carriage.

C. Remedies of the buyer

If the seller fails to fulfil the obligations set out in this Article the buyer may resort to the normal remedies contained in Book III.

In the case of paragraph (2), the buyer also benefits from IV.A.–5:102 (Time when risk passes) paragraph (2), as risk does not pass before the goods are duly identified to the contract.

D. Consumer contract for sale

It should be noted that under IV.A.–5:103 (Passing of risk in a consumer contract for sale) paragraph (1) the general rule under a consumer contract for sale is that the risk does not pass to the consumer until the goods are actually taken over. This means that the goods will travel at the risk of the seller. Hence, paragraph (3) of this Article will be of limited importance in consumer contracts for sale since it will generally be in the seller's interest to arrange for insurance, since any loss of or damage to the goods before they reach the consumer will be the seller's responsibility.

NOTES

Obligations relating to the carriage of goods

1. Where the seller is authorised or required to send the goods to the buyer, unless otherwise agreed, delivery of the goods to a carrier (whether named by the buyer or not) for the purpose of transmission to the buyer is prima facie deemed to be a delivery of the goods to the buyer (CISG art. 31(a); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 594 and Ccom art. 412(1); DENMARK SGA § 10; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 32(1); FINLAND SGA § 7(2); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.318(2); NORWAY SGA § 7(2); POLAND CC art. 544(1); SLOVENIA LOA art. 452; SWEDEN SGA § 7(2)). The same principle applies in commercial sales under some systems. This is the case in SLOVAKIA for example (Ccom art. 412). In SPANISH commercial law, unless the contract provides otherwise, the seller complies with the duty to deliver by handing the goods over to the carrier (Supreme Court Judgments 17 October 1984, RAJ 1984/4969, 3 March 1997, RAJ 1997/1638).
2. Under some systems there are also default rules regarding the quality required for the transportation. If the seller is bound to arrange for the carriage of the goods this must be done by means of transportation which is appropriate in the circumstances and according to the usual terms for such transportation (CISG art. 32(2); ESTONIA LOA § 210(2); FINLAND SGA § 8; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.373; NORWAY SGA § 8; SLOVENIA LOA § 453; SWEDEN SGA § 8). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, the seller must make such a contract with the carrier on behalf of the buyer as may be reasonable having regard to the nature of the goods and the other circumstances of the case. If the seller omits to do so, and the goods are lost or damaged in the course of transit, the buyer may decline to treat the delivery to the carrier as a delivery to himself or hold the seller responsible in damages, Sale of Goods Act s. 32(2). A similar rule applies under ESTONIAN law, LOA § 210(2).
3. Under a few systems, the seller must give the buyer a special notice of specification of the goods. If the seller is to hand over the goods to a carrier and if the goods are not clearly identified to the contract by markings on the goods, by shipping documents or otherwise, the seller must give the buyer notice of the consignment specifying the goods (CISG art. 32(1); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 413; ESTONIA LOA § 210(1); NORWAY SGA § 8(3) and Consumer Sales Act § 8(3)).

4. Under some systems there is a regulation concerning insurance for the goods during carriage. If the seller is not bound to effect insurance in respect of the carriage of the goods, the seller must, upon the buyer's request, provide the buyer with all available information necessary to enable the buyer to effect such insurance (CISG art. 32(3); ESTONIA LOA § 210(3); NORWAY SGA § 8(2) and Consumer Sales Act § 8(3)). Where the goods are sent by the seller to the buyer by a route involving sea transit, under certain circumstances where it is usual to insure, then the seller must give such notice to the buyer as may enable him to insure the goods during their sea transit, and if he does not do so, then the assets are at his risk during such sea transit (Sale of Goods Act § 32(3); this section might be extendable by analogy to other forms of transport, cf. Benjamin (-Guest), Sale of Goods[6], § 6-017). Also in LITHUANIA the contract may give rise to an obligation to insure the goods, CC art. 6.316. In POLAND if the goods are to be sent to a place which is not the place of performance, the buyer must bear the costs of the insurance (CC art. 547).

Section 3: Conformity of the goods

IV.A.–2:301: Conformity with the contract

The goods do not conform with the contract unless they:

(a) are of the quantity, quality and description required by the contract;
(b) are contained or packaged in the manner required by the contract;
(c) are supplied along with any accessories, installation instructions or other instructions required by the contract; and
(d) comply with the remaining Articles of this Section.

COMMENTS

A. General

One of the most important obligations in sales law is that the seller has to ensure that the goods sold are in conformity with the contract (see IV.A.–2:101 (Overview of obligations of the seller)). This Section elaborates the meaning of conformity. From the outset, it is important to note that this obligation is separate from the seller's obligation to deliver the goods. Most importantly, a non-performance of the seller's obligation to deliver (late delivery or no delivery at all) triggers the general remedies regime under Book III. However, a non-performance of the conformity obligation is followed by a separate remedies regime under Chapter 4 of this Part, which addresses particular problems linked to non-conforming goods.

Moreover, even if the seller may not have to deliver the goods at all, the obligation to ensure the conformity of the goods still applies.

> Illustration 1
> A has rented a TV set from B. B agrees that A can buy the set outright. If A exercises the right to buy, B's obligation to ensure that the goods conform to the contract applies even though the TV set does not have to be physically delivered to A because A already has it.

B. Agreed conformity: the obligation to ensure that the goods are in conformity with the contract

Above all, this Article emphasises the significance of the parties' agreement by referring to what is "required by the contract". Sub-paragraphs (a) to (c) spell out different features of conformity, which make it clear that the goods must be of the right quantity, quality and, description; must be contained or packaged in the right way; and must be supplied along with possible accessories and instructions.

Finally, sub-paragraph (d) contains an important reference to the remaining Articles of this Section, which makes it clear that the central provision of the present Article is complemented by further provisions addressing various other aspects of conformity, such as IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging), IV.A.–2:304 (Incorrect installation in a consumer contract for sale) and IV.A.–2:305 (Third party rights or claims in general).

C. Quantity, quality and description

Under (a) the seller has to ensure that the goods are of the quantity, quality and description required by the contract. The first aspect of conformity mentioned here, i.e. that of quantity, covers two different scenarios.

First, the seller may deliver less than was agreed upon, e.g. only 400 tyres instead of 500. This shortcoming is qualified as a lack of conformity. Consequently, the buyer may exercise the remedies contained in Chapter 4, Section 2. However, this does not apply if the seller fails to deliver any goods at all. Such non-performance (which may be late performance or delay, or total non-performance) is considered to be a non-performance of the obligation to deliver the goods and follows a different remedial regime (see Book III, Chapter 3 on Remedies for Non-performance).

> A agrees to sell 500 edible snails, packed in boxes, to B, but delivers only 400. The rules on lack of conformity apply. This case is a clear example of the rationale behind the concise nature of the notion of conformity. It does not make a difference in the applicable regime whether A delivers 500 snails, of which 100 are of the wrong quality, or 500 of the wrong quality.

Secondly, the seller may deliver more than was agreed upon, e.g. 550 tyres instead of 500. IV.A.–3:105 (Early delivery and delivery of excess quantity) addresses this special case by setting out the buyer's rights: if the seller delivers an excess quantity the buyer can either refuse to take, or take, delivery of the amount exceeding the quantity agreed upon. In the latter case, the buyer has to pay for the excess amount.

D. Conformity includes incidental matters

As shown by (b) and (c), the notion of conformity includes certain incidental aspects of the goods. The core goods may be flawless in their own right, while something else renders them not in conformity with the contract. The parties may, for instance, have agreed to package the goods in a special way, to deliver instruction manuals or to supply a repair kit with a car. A seller who fails to perform such obligations has failed to deliver goods conforming to the contract.

Such additional, extraneous features of conformity pose no problem under the present Article, since the parties have agreed on them. They are required by the contract. While these cases could arguably be solved by relying on the description of the goods under (a), for instance that selling a car includes a spare tyre and a repair kit, the express mention is designed to raise awareness of what the seller may also have to supply in addition to the core goods themselves.

However, these extraneous features of conformity play an important role under IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging). This idea of extending conformity beyond the core goods as such has even been carried further by IV.A.–2:304 (Incorrect installation in a consumer contract for sale) for consumer transactions, as the seller can also be held responsible for the incorrect installation of otherwise flawless goods.

E. The aliud

Some legal systems differentiate between defective goods and goods that are something completely different from what the parties had agreed upon, the so-called aliud. The present rules reject this idea. As a result, the notion of conformity applies to all goods, regardless of whether they may deviate substantially from what was agreed upon. If entirely different goods are supplied the buyer can still resort to the remedies for lack of conformity set out in Chapter 4 Section 2.

Illustration 3
A and B conclude a sale concerning red wine from a certain area in Italy. A delivers (a) white wine, (b) red wine from Spain and (c) red wine vinegar. All these deliveries deviate from the contract; arguably they constitute an altogether different performance. Instead of attempting to resolve the question of what can still be seen as a defective performance, and what is an aliud, these cases fall – beyond doubt – under the heading of lack of conformity

F. Remedies of the buyer

If the seller does not perform the obligation under this Article, the buyer can resort to the remedies set out in Chapter 4, Section 2 (subject, in some cases, to certain requirements such as examination and notification).

NOTES

I. The principle of conformity with the contract (Overview)

1. Under the international instruments, CISG art. 35 and Consumer Sales Directive art. 2 establish the uniform principle of conformity with the contract. While the idea, i.e. that the seller has to ensure that the goods delivered are in conformity with the contract in every way, is recognised in general, there are various ways to reach a similar, if not the same, result, which are reflected by a wide range of different notions.

2. To start with, there are systems that closely follow the spirit – but not necessarily the terminology – of the CISG and the Consumer Sales Directive (GERMANY CC § 434(1); ESTONIA LOA § 217(1); FINLAND SGA § 17(1); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.327; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:17(1) and (2); NORWAY SGA § 17; SWEDEN SGA § 17(1)). This does not come as a surprise, since these systems have borrowed heavily from the CISG in reforming their sales laws, without necessarily throwing overboard their traditional labels (cf. the traditional notions of mangel in NORWAY; fel in SWEDEN and Sachmangel in GERMANY). This choice of terminology has been criticised in the legal literature in SWEDEN, since it can lead to the incorrect conclusion that the goods must be objectively defective in order for the provisions to apply (Ramberg and Herre, Allmän köprätt[2], 79, suggest the expression that the goods do not conform with the contract (icke är avtalsenlig) as an improvement).

3. Other countries have developed distinct regimes of liability under sales law, which achieve results similar to the notion of conformity contained in the CISG and the Consumer Sales Directive. On the one hand, there are systems with a more general liability (warranty) regime for defective performance that applies to a range of contracts for consideration, thus extending beyond sales contracts (AUSTRIA (Gewährleistung) CC § 922 ff; CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 499-510; HUNGARY CC §§ 277 and 305-311/A; SLOVAKIA CC §§ 499-510; SLOVENIA (jamčevanje) LOA § 100). In AUSTRIA, these rules are valid for all types of contracts for consideration (entgeltliche Verträge); whereas the legal warranty is quite restricted in respect of contracts without consideration (unentgeltliche Verträge, see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 63). This general warranty regime is typically reflected by the notions of material and legal defects (see, for instance, SLOVENIA LOA §§ 458 ff and 488). In addition, specific provisions complement and modify this general regime in favour of (certain) sales contracts. Further rules on conformity can also be found in commercial law (cf. SLOVAKIA Ccom arts. 420 f and arts. 433-435 for legal defects).

4. On the other hand, there are systems with a narrower, sales-specific system of liability (DENMARK SGA §§ 42 ff; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 13(1); GREECE CC arts. 534 and 535; LATVIA CC arts. 1612-1615; POLAND CC art. 556 warranty for (material and legal) defects; PORTUGAL CC art. 913 ff). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, any failure to comply with the terms of a contract, whether express or implied, constitutes a breach of contract. Sale of Goods Act s. 13(1) provides, in cases of a sale of goods by description, an implied term that the goods will correspond to that description. A sale by description is one where the description used delimits the nature of the goods sold: Beale v. Taylor [1967] 1 WLR 1193; Border Harvesters Ltd. v. Edwards Engineering (Perth) Ltd. 1985 SLT 128. A sale will not be by description where the description did not sufficiently influence the decision to purchase the goods so as to become a term of the contract: Harlingdon & Leinster Enterprises Ltd. v. Christopher Hull Fine Art Ltd. [1991] 1 QB 564. Descriptive words which do not concern the nature of the goods sold may nonetheless amount to an actionable misrepresentation (see for instance T. & J. Harrison v. Knowles & Foster [1918] 1 KB 608) or extend to the quality of the goods, addressed in Sale of Goods Act art. 14(2), by the implied term as to the reasonable quality of the goods (which have to be of 'satisfactory quality' if the seller sells in the course of a business). In LATVIA, the seller is liable not only for discrepancies he knew of but failed to indicate, but also for hidden ones CC arts. 1612-1615. In GREECE, liability in sales law is structured in terms of real defects that nullify or substantially diminish the value or the usefulness of the thing (CC art. 534) and a lack of agreed qualities (CC art. 535); in order to determine whether the goods are free from real defects or possess the agreed qualities one should apply a combined test of objective and subjective criteria, the latter stemming from the specific agreement between the parties and their justified expectations. Similarly, the regime of the sale of defective assets in PORTUGAL consists of immanent defects of the asset so that it does not conform to the qualities expected by the buyer. The defect can either be subjectively assessed (the parties agreed on certain qualities of the asset, the seller assures the qualities of the asset; cf. STJ 3 March 1998, CJ (STJ), 1999, I, 107) or objectively when the parties did not establish in the contract the specific purpose of the sold asset (cf. STJ 23 March 1976, BolMinJus 255, 133). In the latter case, conformity of the asset is assessed by fitness for the normal purpose of assets of the same category (CC art. 913(2); cf. STJ 5 December 1967, BolMinJus 172, 230; Calvão da Silva, Compra e venda de coisas defeituosas[4], 130; Romano Martinez, Direito das obrigações[2], 130 ff; Romano Martinez, Cumprimento Defeituoso, 163 ff; Braga, Contrato de Compra e Venda). In POLAND CC art. 556(1) the seller is liable for three categories of physical defects: (1) defects which reduce the value or utility of the thing with respect to the purpose stipulated in the contract or resulting from the circumstances or the destination of the thing, (2) if the thing does not have the properties which the seller assured the buyer, or (3) if the thing was released to the buyer in an incomplete condition (warranty for legal defects).

5. Finally, there is a group of systems that rely on a distinction between, roughly speaking, hidden defects and non-conforming delivery. Common to those systems is often that the distinction between the different categories of defects is not always clear, but at the same time it is extremely important as, depending on the nature of the defect, different remedies and limitation periods apply.

6. Under FRENCH and BELGIAN law a distinction has to be made between hidden defects (garantie des vices cachés/ vrijwaring voor verborgen gebreken pursuant to CC arts. 1641 ff) and non-conforming delivery (défaut de délivrance conforme/ niet-conforme levering according to CC art. 1604). This distinction stems from the French CC, where art. 1603 states that the seller is under two obligations: the obligations to deliver and to guarantee the thing he sells. But while these obligations of the seller were initially simple, the interpretation of these articles by the Cour de cassation has completely changed the regime which is applicable to the buyer. The FRENCH Cour de cassation ruled that there is a hidden defect when the goods are not fit for their destined use (see for instance Cass.civ. I, 16 June 1993, Bull.civ. I, no. 224; D. 1994, 546, with note Th. Clay). In contrast, non-conforming delivery is based on a difference between the goods promised and the goods delivered. For example: the delivery is not in conformity when the ship sold is not as powerful (in terms of speed) as promised (Cass.com. 27 April 1979, Bull.civ. IV, no. 132); there is a hidden defect when the car sold rusts (Cass.civ. I, 4 July 1995, Bull.civ. I, no. 302). It is important to keep in mind that this distinction is not chronological, since the lack of conformity concerning delivery does not necessarily show up before the delivery and the buyer is not obliged to notice this defect when he takes delivery. The BELGIAN regulation of a guarantee against hidden defects has largely been developed by the case law of the BELGIAN Cour de Cassation. The seller's guarantee against hidden defects only exists under strict conditions. The thing sold must be affected by an intrinsic or a functional defect that is hidden and serious and that at least was already latently present at the moment the contract of sale was entered into. By judgments of the Cour de Cassation of 18 November 1971 (AC 1972, 274) and 17 May 1984 (AC 1983-84, 1205) a broad functional interpretation of the concept of 'defect' is used. It is thus possible that the thing in itself is perfect and shows no structural or intrinsic defect, but that it is unfit for the desired purpose. This functional interpretation of the concept of a defect is applicable to a condition that the seller knew about concerning the purpose of the thing because either the buyer informed him of the purpose or it concerns the usual application of the thing, or because the seller has suggested the purpose in the advertisement before or at the moment when the contract was entered into.

7. A somewhat similar system can be found in SPAIN where the seller is obliged to deliver the object of sale with the characteristics it had at the time the contract was concluded, including the fruits of the good as of that moment onwards (CC art. 1468), as well as all other stipulations agreed upon in the contract (CC art. 1469(1)). The seller is also obliged to guarantee the legal and peaceful possession of the good (CC arts. 1474 ff), and that the goods do not have hidden burdens (CC art. 1483) and hidden deficiencies (CC art. 1484) that render them unsuitable for the purposes for which assets of the same type would ordinarily be used (see also for commercial sales Ccom arts. 336 and 342). Some authors disagree with this variety of regimes and think that it would be better to apply a uniform regime (see Morales Moreno, ADC 2003, 1616 f). See also the proposal of the Project for reform of the civil code , which follows Professor Morales's thoughts ("Propuesta de Anteproyecto de ley de modificación del código civil en materia de compraventa" and Fenoy Picón, CCJC (68) 2005, 509-556). Nevertheless, in court practice the rules concerning hidden defects and their remedies have become obsolete. In fact, courts mainly resort to the flexible category of "aliud" with the purpose both of encompassing in the vendor's guarantee a wider range of duties and of improving the useless set of old remedies laid down in the Civil Code (see Fenoy Picón, Falta de conformidad, pp. 79 ff and Carrasco Perera, ZEuP 2006, pp. 552 ff).

8. In ITALY three different categories of defects are distinguished: warranty for defects (CC art. 1490 garanzia per vizi); lack of essential qualities (CC art. 1497 mancanza di qualità); and aliud pro alio. Defects affect the good in a way that it is no longer suitable for the use for which it was intended or its value is notably lowered, whereas goods lack essential qualities where such qualities are considered essential for the use for which they were intended or when these qualities were specifically promised to the buyer (for aliud pro alio, see 3 below).

9. The systems which have retained their previous regime of liability have often introduced a separate regime for non-conformity under consumer sales in order to implement the Consumer Sales Directive (BELGIUM CC art. 1649ter §§ 1 ff; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 616; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 48F, which refers to "[…] a breach of an express term of the contract or of a term implied by section 13, 14 or 15 […]"; FRANCE Consumer Code arts. L. 211-1 ff; ITALY Consumer Code arts. 128-135; LATVIA Consumer Protection Act arts. 13-16 and 27-30; POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 4; SLOVAKIA CC § 616; SPAIN ConsProtA arts. 114 ff. However, it should be noted that in the CZECH REPUBLIC there was already an existing consumer sales regime applicable to goods sold in stores which was changed by the implementation of the Consumer Sales Directive (cf. CC §§ 616-627).

10. The other systems rely on the general regime also for consumer sales. As for non-conformity, only a few provisions deviate from the general regime, generally provisions included in order to implement the Consumer Sales Directive, such as the seller's liability for public statements. Moreover, the consumer sales regime is mostly mandatory in favour of the consumer.

II. Relationship to other instances of non-performance, in particular delay

11. Notwithstanding the introduction of a uniform concept of conformity, the traditional distinction between delay in delivery and defects in the goods was maintained in the NORDIC COUNTRIES (a 'breach of contract' on the part of the seller can be qualified as tavaran luovutuksen viivästys/ forsinkelse/ dröjsmål (embracing both delayed performance and non-performance), tavarassa oleva virhe /mangel/ fel (lack of conformity), or oikeudellinen virhe/ rettsmangel/ rättsligt fel (defects of title) (DENMARK; FINLAND; NORWAY; SWEDEN). This is also true for GERMANY where delay falls under a separate regime (a sub-type of breach) in CC §§ 280(1) and (2) and 286. Similarly in the NETHERLANDS (cf. CC arts. 6:81 ff) and POLAND (CC art. 491) where to a certain extent the difference between delayed performance, defect and defect of title exists.

12. As already pointed out at 1. above, this distinction remains of the utmost importance in some countries, notably in systems having two, or more, completely separate regimes such as BELGIUM, FRANCE, ITALY and SPAIN. To a certain extent, the same holds true for AUSTRIA and SLOVENIA, where the seller's liability is based on different forms of breach (defective performance, non-performance, impossibility, breach of secondary duties). In SLOVENIA, for instance, the liability (warranty) regime for defective performance (jamčevanje) differs considerably from liability for non-performance (neizpolnitev, LOA § 103). As it is difficult to separate them (especially 'peius' from 'aliud') the theory (Juhart and Plavšak (-Juhart), Obligacijski zakonik II, 361) leaves the decision up to the creditor (buyer) – he can reject a defective performance (regard it as a non-performance) or accept it and claim warranty rights.

13. Also under other systems, there may be a differentiation between different types of breach of contract to a limited extent. For instance, although ESTONIAN contract law generally does not distinguish between defective performance, non-performance and delay as any breach entitles the other party to remedies under the general contract law rules (LOA §§ 100-107) the provisions of sales law contain certain specific rules regarding the seller's liability for defective performance (LOA §§ 217-227) which amend the general rules on contractual liability whereas the liability for non-performance and delay is covered with general liability rules only.

III. The notion of 'aliud'

14. In the majority of systems, the notion of 'aliud pro alio', i.e. a delivery of goods different from what was agreed upon, does not constitute a separate ground for liability in sales law. Under some systems this is made clear by express reference (GERMANY CC § 434(3); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:17(3)). In the NORDIC COUNTRIES, such a breach can either be qualified as lack of conformity or late/non-performance (for FINLAND, see Routamo and Ramberg, Kauppalain Kommentaari, 140 f; in SWEDEN such an incorrect delivery is normally considered to be a mistake, in which case the seller has failed to perform the contract and will be held liable for non-performance. However, if the seller intended to perform the contract through such a delivery, and hence there was no mistake involved, this will always fall under the provisions regarding non-conformity, see Ramberg, Köplagen, 265 f). Similarly in GERMANY there has been much debate as to whether all aliuds are aliuds in the terms of CC § 434(3) which is favoured by the majority of legal authors (see e.g. Lettl, JuS 2002, 868 f; Musielak, NJW 2003, 89 ff), or whether some are so different (delivery of red wine instead of a horse, example borrowed from Medicus, Bürgerliches Recht[20], 200) that this simply constitutes non-performance. Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law, however, many such cases would constitute a case of non-correspondence with description under Sale of Goods Act s. 13. Typically, such deliveries fall under the respective regimes relating to lack of 'conformity' in the widest meaning. Another interpretation is offered by the CZECH REPUBLIC, where the delivery of something completely different is either seen as a proposal to amend the sales contract, or as a lack of conformity. Under CZECH commercial sales an aliud is always considered to be a lack of conformity (Ccom art. 412). Under non-commercial sales an aliud is either a proposal to amend the contract or a lack of conformity, depending upon the reaction of buyer (cf. Knappová, Civil Law II[3], 103-104).

15. In contrast, in AUSTRIA, ITALY, SLOVENIA and SPAIN it is necessary to distinguish the delivery of an aliud from other breaches by the seller. The basic idea is that the seller, by delivering something completely different (i.e. an aliud) than what was agreed upon, does in fact not deliver at all, and is, thus, in default (SLOVENIA Cigoj, Komentar, 1439. In SPAIN, in Supreme Court Judgments (TS 23 March 1985, RAJ 1985 no. 1500, TS 6 April 1989, RAJ 1989 no. 2994) this concept has been broadly construed, so as to qualify as "aliud" any lack of conformity going "beyond the customary imperfections", Fenoy Picón, Falta de conformidad, pp. 223). As a consequence, the rules on non-performance apply, which differ from the otherwise applicable regime of seller's liability in various ways. In AUSTRIA, the main difference are the time-limits within which the buyer has to bring his claim and for commercial sales the notice requirement in Ccom § 378; it is interesting to note that this issue has arguably become less pressing with the prolongation of the former short period of limitation of warranty claims (cf. the similar situation in GERMANY where the aliud has ceased to exist as a legal institution). In SLOVENIA the seller is automatically in delay, i.e. the buyer is not required to notify the seller. In addition, he can decide between claiming specific performance, termination of the contract and claiming damages (LOA § 103). In ITALY and SPAIN, both the time-limits and the applicable remedies are different. In ITALY CC art. 1497 governs cases of lack of quality of the goods, withdrawal from the contract is governed by the general rules of cancellation laid down in CC art. 1453, provided, however, that the lack of quality exceeds the normal tolerance limits set up by customs. However, the time-limits for withdrawing from the contract are the same as provided in CC art. 1495, i.e., the buyer is obliged to notify the seller within 8 days after becoming aware of the defects and, in any case, within one year after the delivery of the goods. In SPAIN, the buyer is protected by CC arts. 1101 and 1124; when it comes to the time-limits for the actions, the TS has maintained a flexible position since both the period of 15 years under CC art. 1964, i.e. the general prescription period for personal actions, and the period of six months under CC art. 1490, i.e. the time-limit for hidden defects, do not seem appropriate. This does not mean, however, that buyer can remain passive upon the discovery of a deficiency (see Morales Moreno, ADC 2003, 1617 and 1625 and Fenoy Picón, Falta de conformidad, and for consumer sales see Fenoy Picón, El sistema de protección del comprador, 179 ff). Similarly under HUNGARIAN law, if the seller delivers something other than what was agreed upon (aliud), the rules on late performance will apply (see Kisfaludi, Az adásvételi szerződés, 181).

16. Given the legal consequences attached to the delivery of an aliud, the issue of delimitation is of the utmost importance. However, it is fair to say that the question of what constitutes an aliud is complicated and can often only be answered on a case by case basis (a detailed overview for AUSTRIA is provided by Straube (-Kramer), HGB I^2, §§ 377, 378, nos. 58 ff). In ITALY the aliud pro alio has been defined as the 'most macroscopic non-performance of the vendor' (Cass. 13 February 1973 no. 452, Racc.Dec.Cass. 1972-82, voce Vendita, c. 9776 no. 39), which may, nonetheless, be very difficult to distinguish from a case of lack of qualities of the goods (Intersimone, Giur.mer. 1995, 1, 753-754). The traditional doctrine distinguishes two different cases of aliud pro alio. In a strict sense, aliud pro alio is a case of the delivery of a completely different good. In a broader sense, aliud can be detected when the goods delivered belong to a different genus from what was agreed upon. The first case is clearly recognisable by the buyer. While in the second one, the situation is more complicated. The goods belonging to a different genus may both be regarded as a case of lack of quality or of aliud pro alio. That is why case law has provided for a further criterion permitting a distinction. The good has to belong to a different genus and not to be in a condition to solve an economic-social function to which it is devoted (Valentina, Diritto e giurisprudenza 1997, 207-229; for an overview of the case law on the issue, see Bin, La vendita II, IV). In SLOVENIA some writers argue in a similar direction, as the distinction should be based on the causa of the contract, i.e. the question of whether the purpose of the contract can be achieved (Cigoj, Komentar, 412), which is akin to the concept of fundamental breach in the CISG. Others, however, argue in favour of leaving a decision for the system of sanctions (non-performance, defective performance) up to the creditor (buyer) – since the buyer cannot be forced to accept defective delivery and claim warranty rights, he can reject it (regard it as non-performance) or accept it and claim warranty rights (Juhart and Plavšak (-Juhart), Obligacijski zakonik II, 361). In SPAIN, the TS has distinguished between two types of aliud: when the goods have characteristics that are opposed to the ones agreed upon (prestación diversa sustancial), and when the goods cannot be used for the purpose desired by the buyer (prestación diversa funcional). Since it is not easy to differentiate between the aliud and hidden defects, most of the doctrine is in favour of broadening the scope of aliud pro alio to cases where the object of the sale suffers from very important defects which render it of no use for the buyer (cf. Rodrigo Bercovitz, CCJC 1 § 125, CCJC 2 § 60, CCJC 8 § 199 and CCJC 14 § 369; Albaladejo (-Carrasco), Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales XV(1), 394 ff; Orti Vallejo, Los defectos de la cosa en la compraventa civil y mercantil, 52; De la Cuesta Rute, Contratos Mercantiles, I, 169-171).

17. Finally, LITHUANIA uses a somewhat different concept: if the goods do not conform to the range provided in the contract, CC art. 6.332 provides that the buyer has the right to refuse delivery and payment or, if payment has already been made, to demand restoration of the price paid, unless the contract provides otherwise.

IV. Restricted liability for lack of conformity in sales 'as is'

18. Various countries restrict the seller's liability in the case where the parties have agreed that the goods are sold 'as is' (AUSTRIA (Pausch und Bogen) CC § 930; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 501; FINLAND SGA § 19; SWEDEN (befintligt skick) SGA § 19 and Consumer Sales Act § 17, which also applies to second-hand goods purchased at auctions). In AUSTRIA, such a sale is defined as the sale of goods without having counted, measured, or weighed them; whereas in LATVIA, when selling a rural land unit or a commercial, manufacturing or other business 'as is', everything is to be considered sold which is located there at the time of closing the purchase and is used for the benefit and ease of the farm or business, was needed or used by the vendor, was his reserve or property.

19. The NORDIC COUNTRIES set forth certain minimum requirements which the goods have to meet even if they are sold 'as is'. (1) If the goods have been sold subject to an 'as is' clause or a similar general reservation concerning their quality the goods are, nevertheless, to be considered defective if: (1) (i) the goods do not conform with information relating to their characteristics or use which was given by the seller before the conclusion of the contract and (ii) the information can be presumed to have had an effect on the contract; (2) (i) the seller has, before the conclusion of the contract, failed to disclose to the buyer facts relating to the properties or the use of the goods which the seller could not have been unaware of and which the buyer reasonably could expect to be informed about and (ii) the failure to disclose the facts can be presumed to have had an effect on the contract; or (3) the goods are in essentially poorer condition than the buyer could reasonably expect taking into account the price and other circumstances (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 19(1)). Under NORDIC consumer sales, the goods are moreover regarded as non-conforming notwithstanding being sold 'as is', if they are in a worse condition than the buyer could reasonably have presumed, considering the price and other circumstances (FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 14; NORWAY and SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 17). The provision has been criticised as superfluous since it only leaves room for a very slight difference between goods sold 'as is' and goods sold without such a limitation clause. However, such a clause may still lower the expectations of the buyer as to the quality and condition of the goods (see Håstad, Den nya köprätten[5], 243). Basically, the same applies for the NETHERLANDS under the general rule of CC art. 7:17(2). Under CZECH law CC § 618 contains a similar rule for the sale of sub-standard goods in consumer sales. Accordingly, goods with flaws that do not prevent use for the specified purpose, must be sold at a lower price than the market price for sound goods.

In addition, the seller has to inform the buyer about the nature of the goods, unless it is already obvious from the nature of the sale.

20. In FRANCE, on the other hand, CC art. 1643 provides that the parties can agree to exclude the seller's liability for hidden defects. However, case law has restricted this possibility to contracts between professionals in the same field of competence (see e.g. Com. 6 November 1978, JCP 1979.II.19178 note J. Ghestin) and contracts between non-professionals (Cass.civ. III, 12 November 1975, Bull.civ. III, no. 330). In POLAND parties may exclude liability for warranty (CC art. 558(1)), which is however ineffective if the seller insidiously conceals the defect from the buyer (CC art. 558(2)).

IV.A.–2:302: Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging

The goods must:

(a) be fit for any particular purpose made known to the seller at the time of the conclusion of the contract, except where the circumstances show that the buyer did not rely, or that it was unreasonable for the buyer to rely, on the seller's skill and judgement;

(b) be fit for the purposes for which goods of the same description would ordinarily be used;

(c) possess the qualities of goods which the seller held out to the buyer as a sample or model;

(d) be contained or packaged in the manner usual for such goods or, where there is no such manner, in a manner adequate to preserve and protect the goods;

(e) be supplied along with such accessories, installation instructions or other instructions as the buyer may reasonably expect to receive; and

(f) possess such qualities and performance capabilities as the buyer may reasonably expect.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article, together with IV.A.–2:303 (Statements by third persons), ensures that unless the parties have agreed otherwise, the goods have to live up to certain standards and expectations. The obligations under this article reflect what the buyer will normally expect.

The Article lays down various criteria for establishing conformity, and hence a lack of conformity. These criteria are default rules, as the parties are free to agree upon different standards in their contract. Nonetheless, they serve an important purpose by clarifying what conformity normally entails ('The goods must'). In fact, this wording seems slightly more straightforward than that of either the CISG, which stipulates when the goods do not conform to the contract ('goods do not conform […] unless'), or the Consumer Sales Directive, which sets out presumptions of conformity ('goods are presumed to be in conformity […] if they'). Notwithstanding these differences in drafting, the result remains the same in so far as the goods, unless the contract provides otherwise, are supposed to live up to certain standards and expectations, i.e. the minimum requirements laid down in sub-paragraphs (a) to (f).

The Article gives an indication as to what the notion of conformity entails, and, by doing so, can clarify vague statements, such as references to general quality standards. Conversely, if the seller wants to exclude the application of one of the requirements in (a) to (f), this will have to be addressed in the sales contract (see Illustration 2 below). In this way, even though the parties are free to agree on a different standard of conformity, these implied requirements may therefore influence the application of IV.A.–2:301 (Conformity with the contract).

A particularly important factor is how the goods have been described. The buyer is entitled to goods that will, for instance, be fit for the purposes for which goods of that description are ordinarily used. Thus goods sold as food for people must normally be at least fit for human consumption, shoes must be fit for wearing and motor cars must be roadworthy. But if the seller's description of what is offered for sale makes it clear that the goods are sub-standard, then the goods only have to be fit for the purpose for which such sub-standard goods would commonly be used.

Illustration 1
A car dealer offers a used car for sale to a private motorist. The car has been involved in an accident and there is a major problem with the chassis which results in the car being unsafe. The car is not fit for the purpose for which cars are normally used and does not conform to the contract.

Illustration 2
The seller sells the car as a 'write-off' and 'for parts only'. The defect in the chassis does not prevent the car conforming to the contract, since it was described as not fit to drive.

In a non-consumer case the parties are in any event free to derogate from these rules. Thus the seller of the written-off car could in principle achieve the same result simply by excluding the application of the present Article paragraph (b) – although that would be a less transparent way of proceeding and would run more risk of a challenge under Book II, Chapter 9, Section 4. Even where the seller uses a description such as " scrap car, for parts only" , the goods must still be fit for the purposes for which goods of that description would normally be used. Thus if the dealer sells what is described as a 'written-off 2003 Peugeot, for parts only' and in fact the original parts that are useable have already been stripped out and replaced by worn-out parts taken from other cars, the goods are not in conformity with the contract. They are not fit for use in the way described as a source of parts.

It will be seen that the same principles apply to the other aspects of conformity. Thus if the seller shows the buyer a sample of, say, a computer that is for sale in a sealed box, and the computer shown is in perfect working order, then the actual computer supplied must be of the same standard. If, in contrast, the seller shows the buyer an obviously dysfunctional computer, the goods supplied need not be any better. (If the seller shows the buyer a new computer but says that the one supplied will not be in the same condition, the first computer is not being held out as a sample.)

This holds equally true for consumer contracts for sale, albeit with an important caveat in IV.A.–2:309 (Limits on derogation from conformity rights in a consumer contract for sale). In a consumer contract for sale the rights given by this Article cannot be excluded or restricted. This does not mean that a seller cannot sell a written-off car to a consumer without incurring liability for non-conformity. What it does mean is that the seller must ensure that the car is described as just what it is - a 'write-off, good for parts only' - rather than relying on some clause which the consumer may not read or may not understand. For the question of a derogation from these implied requirements under consumer contracts for sale, see further IV.A.–2:309 Comment B.

B. Default requirements of conformity

The different requirements of this Article constitute default rules; therefore the parties are in principle free to agree to modify or exclude, or otherwise to deviate from them. One can distinguish six basic aspects of conformity, which apply in a cumulative manner:

Fitness for purpose. The fitness for purpose issue is dealt with in (a) and (b). To start with the more general statement, the goods sold have to be fit for their ordinary purposes, i.e. the ones for which goods of that description are commonly used. Moreover, the goods may also have to be fit for a certain particular purpose, such as an uncommon application or use of goods. However, in such a case the seller is liable only if two conditions are met. First, the buyer must have made the particular purpose known when concluding the contract. Secondly, the buyer must have relied on the seller's expertise and it must have been reasonable to do so.

> A buys a notebook computer from B. If it fails to perform its normal task, that is work in an office environment, it is not in conformity. If it will work in the office but A uses the notebook for an unusual application, e.g. his research in a rainforest, where it fails to work, B can only be held responsible if he made this particular purpose known to the seller. The seller can still escape liability if he can show that the buyer could not (reasonably) have relied on his skill and judgement, for instance as the notebook was sold in bulk in a supermarket.

Sample or model. Reference to a sample or model is regulated by (c) as a special instance of the seller's description. In essence, this rule relates to specific information given to the buyer before the conclusion of the contract. In other words, the buyer can rely on the fact that the delivered goods will show the same qualities as the samples or models upon which the decision to purchase was made.

Packaging. The proper packaging for the goods is dealt with in (d). The seller has to package the goods in the manner usual for such goods, and if there is no such usual manner, has to package them in a way adequate to preserve and protect the goods. This distinction suggests that certain standards or usages in commerce prevail over the rationale of the rule, i.e. making sure that goods are not unnecessarily exposed to damage. Even though such a rule has an obvious application in commercial cases – as proper containment and packaging may prove essential for handling the goods – it may also play a role in other settings, such as consumer contracts for sale or transactions between private parties. The latter have become even more relevant with the increase in distance sales, especially those concluded via the Internet.

Accessories. The seller may have to deliver certain accessories, for instance a spare tyre and a repair kit together with a car. Obviously, these items could be sold separately, but should be covered by the conformity obligation if it is customary that they are included in the price and if the buyer can therefore reasonably expect them.

Instructions. Installation or other instructions are, according to (e), part of the conformity standard if the buyer can reasonably expect to receive them. Naturally, parties can agree to deliver goods with instructions; this obligation is then already governed by IV.A.–2:301 (Conformity with the contract) sub-paragraph (c). However, the rule in (e) takes into account the fact that certain goods are so complicated that the buyer may need instructions to use them. As a result, these instructions are considered to be part of the goods by way of implication. It depends on the circumstances whether the buyer can indeed expect instructions, but this would often be the case concerning technical equipment. In the case of brown or white goods, the consumer will expect instructions as to their use. Under sub-paragraph (e) there is no requirement as to the language or languages in which the instructions should be written. No practicable solution was found in order to safeguard that the buyer actually understands the instructions. Nevertheless, it can be required that the language has a link to either the buyer or the seller, the place where the sales contract was concluded or the language in which it was concluded.

A consumer buys a sewing-machine in a normal shop in an EU Member State. When he arrives home he discovers that the instructions are only provided in Chinese. This is clearly not what he may reasonably expect and hence the buyer will be entitled to claim remedies for non-conformity.

Buyer's reasonable expectations. The general quality standard is regulated in (f), as the goods have to show certain qualities and performance capabilities, which depend on the buyer's expectations. This rule is very important as it emphasises the buyer's point of view by introducing the buyer's expectations as a separate, stand-alone implied requirement which the goods have to meet. Having said that, it should be noted that the expectations on the part of the buyer are already implicit in the previous sub-paragraphs, but (f) functions as a general sweep-up rule, since it goes beyond what is already covered in the rest of the provision. However, it should be pointed out that not all subjective expectations of a buyer which are unknown to the seller should have an influence on the question of conformity, even if they are reasonable. In particular, there may be different opinions on what is reasonable with regard to performance capabilities: what may be regarded as excellent performance capacities in one country (shoes lasting only one year), may be seen as poor quality in another. Ultimately, what the buyer may reasonably expect under this paragraph will have to be decided by the Courts.

In evaluating the buyer's expectations, regard must be had to what one can expect from certain comparable goods (cf. the similar issue under art. 6 of the Product Liability Directive, which, inter alia, refers to 'the presentation of the goods' and 'the use to which it could reasonably be expected that the product would be put'). Some general examples may be where advertising creates expectations or where the goods are fit for their purpose but are not of a high enough general quality. More concretely, sub-paragraph (f) could be used, for instance, in relation to durability expectations for goods sold as sub-standard or for second-hand goods. Particularly under consumer contracts for sale, the buyer's reasonable expectations could also relate to after-sales services or the availability of spare parts. Also the expectations could concern the origin of a certain product.

A buys a yacht from B. A has assumed that the boat has been produced in a certain country like all the previous ones of this type. However, it turns out that the keel was constructed in another country, a fact which gives the yacht a lower market value. The yacht is not in conformity with the contract since it does not live up to the buyer's reasonable expectations.

NOTES

I. (Implied) criteria for establishing lack of conformity

1. The criteria contained in the present Article have been inspired by both CISG art. 35(2) and Consumer Sales Directive art. 2(2); the comparative notes below will examine in how far these rules are also reflected by the various national sales laws. In this context, it will not come as a surprise that both the systems influenced by the CISG (see e.g. ESTONIA LOA § 217(2); FINLAND SGA § 17(2); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:17(2)-(4); NORWAY SGA § 17 and Consumer Sales Act §§ 15-18; SWEDEN SGA § 17(2)) and the rules on consumer sales tend to show a somewhat greater level of detail than traditional concepts.

II. Fitness for normal purpose

2. All systems contain rules on the goods' fitness for purpose, albeit not necessarily laid down explicitly for all kinds of sales transactions. It is generally required that the goods must be fit for their normal purpose (CISG art. 35(2)(a); Consumer Sales Directive art. 2(2)(c); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 616(1)(d); ESTONIA LOA § 217(2)2); FINLAND SGA § 17(2)(1) and Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 12(1); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 14(2B); GERMANY CC § 434(1) no. 2; HUNGARY CC § 277(1); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.333; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:17(2); NORWAY SGA § 17(2)(a) and Consumer Sales Act § 15(2)(a); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 4(3); SLOVAKIA CC § 496(1); SLOVENIA LOA § 459(1); SWEDEN SGA § 17(2)(1) and Consumer Sales Act § 16). A slightly different wording, although to the same effect, is used in AUSTRIA and the CZECH REPUBLIC, which refers to the fitness for use according to the nature [and purpose] of the contract or the express specification/agreement of the parties (AUSTRIA CC § 922(1); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 499; POLAND (non-consumer sales) CC art. 556(1)). Under some systems this normal purpose is further specified. CISG art. 35(2)(a) speaks of the purpose for which goods of the same description would ordinarily be used; a similar rule has been adopted in ESTONIA (CC § 217(2)2)). Under GERMAN law the goods must be of the quality which is customary for goods of the same kind and which the buyer could expect for those kinds of goods, CC § 434(1)(2)); see also under AUSTRIAN law (CC § 922). The same principle is applied in ESTONIA as a general contract law rule (LOA § 77(1)) although the general quality test would only be relevant if the goods are found to be fit for the purpose within the meaning of sales law (LOA § 217(2)2)). Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law the goods must be fit for all the purposes for which goods of the kind in question are commonly supplied, Sale of Goods Act s. 14(2B)).

3. Certain systems introduce a(n) (explicit) fitness for purpose test in relation to commercial sales (CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 420; quantity, quality, workmanship and packaging of goods) or consumer sales (BELGIUM CC art. 1649ter § 1; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 616; DENMARK SGA § 75a(2); LATVIA Consumer Protection Act art. 14(1) no. 1 and 2; SLOVAKIA CC § 616).

4. In other systems, fitness for purpose is implied in the traditional notions of liability in sales law. In BELGIUM, a broad functional interpretation of the concept of 'defect' is used in case law. It is possible that the goods as such are perfect and show no structural or intrinsic defect, but that they are unfit for the desired purpose. This functional interpretation of the concept of defect is applicable on condition that the seller knew about the purpose of the thing because it concerns the usual application of the goods (Cass. 18 November 1971, A.C. 1972, 274; Cass. 17 May 1984, A.C. 1983-84, 1205; Antwerp 20 September 1995, RW 1997-98, 880; Ghent 18 February 1994, RW 1995-96, 1238; Ghent 21 November 1996, RW 1997-98, 823; Brussels 5 June 1996, Res Jur. Imm. 1996, 122; Bergen 13 October 1997, JT 1998, 183, Rb Turnhout 19 January 1995, Turnh. Rechtsl. 1995-06, 146; Ghent 26 June 1997, RW 1998-99, 543). The FRENCH Cour de cassation ruled that there is a hidden defect (CC art. 1641) when the goods are not fit for their destined use (see for instance Cass.civ. I, 16 June 1993, Bull.civ. I, no.224; D. 1994, 546, with note Th. Clay). In ITALY, the criterion of the essential qualities for the intended use under CC art. 1497 implies an evaluation of fitness for purpose of the good: essential qualities are those attributes as to the material, structure and measure that permit the utilisation of the good for its purpose. The goods have to present those properties necessary for an utilisation which is normally satisfactory (App Trieste 28 July 1961, in Rep.Giur.it., 1961, Vendita, no. 124). In PORTUGAL, the goods sold are considered defective if they have a defect that reduces their value or renders them unfit for their purpose, or if they do not have the qualities assured by the seller (CC arts. 905 and 913). If the purpose is not expressed in the contract, the normal purpose for that category is considered (CC art. 913(2); cf. Romano Martinez, Direito das obrigações[2], 131; Calvão da Silva, Compra e venda de coisas defeituosas[1], 42; STJ 23 March 1976, BolMinJus 255, 133; STJ 26 July 1977, BolMinJus 269, 152; RE 12 December 1996, CJ 20, 5, 273). However, if the qualities of the thing were expressed in the contract, the case is one of non-performance of the contract, and its consequences (termination, exceptio inadimpleti contractu) apply, not avoidability out of fraud/mistake (STJ 2 March 1995, BolMinJus 445, 445; RP 5 May 1997, CJ 1997, 3, 179. Romano Martinez, Cumprimento Defeituoso, 125 disagrees, arguing that termination should be the remedy in all cases, not avoidability). In SPAIN, the suitability for purpose test is enshrined in the rules on the guarantee against hidden defects (saneamiento por vicios ocultos), which state that hidden defects must render the goods unfit for the intended use to such an extent that, if the purchaser had known of such defects, he would not have bought the item or would have paid a lower price for it. In the absence of an agreement on the use of the good, it is to be understood that the good is bought for the use normally given to it in accordance with its nature and with the activity of the buyer (TS 31 January 1970, RAJ 1970 no. 370 and Diez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II, 306).

III. Fitness for particular purpose

5. In addition, it is required that the goods are fit for any particular purposes not necessarily being part of the normal use of the goods under certain preconditions. The regulations in this respect differ between the different systems. Under many systems the goods must be fit for any particular purpose made known to the seller at the time of the conclusion of the contract (CISG art. 35(2)(b); Consumer Sales Directive art. 2(2)(b); ESTONIA LOA § 217(2)2); FINLAND SGA § 17(2)(2), (Supreme Court Case KKO 1991:153) and the Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 12(2); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.333; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:17(2); NORWAY SGA § 17(b) and Consumer Sales Act § 15(c); POLAND CC art. 556(1) and Consumer Sales Act art. 4(2); SWEDEN SGA § 17(2)(2) and Consumer Sales Act § 16(2) no. 2). Under other systems a corresponding regulation is only to be found under consumer sales (BELGIUM CC art. 1649ter § 1; DENMARK SGA art. 75a(2); LATVIA Consumer Protection Act art. 14(1) no. 3; SPAIN Consumer Sales Act art. 1(c)). Under LATVIAN law it is further expressly established that such a purpose can be directly or indirectly communicated to the seller when entering into the contract (Consumer Protection Act art. 14(1) no. 3). Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law there is a similar regulation if the seller is a professional and the buyer, expressly or by implication, makes known any particular purpose for which the goods are being bought, so that there is an implied term that the goods supplied under the contract are reasonably fit for that purpose, Sale of Goods Act s. 14(3)). Buyers who intend to use goods for unusual purposes must make these explicit or the seller will not be in breach if the goods are inappropriate for the unusual purpose (Slater v. Finning Ltd. [1997] AC 473). In FRANCE the guarantee against hidden defects does not only concern the fitness of the good with its normal purpose, but also the fitness with the purpose agreed by the parties. Such is the case concerning an old vehicle sold for collection purposes, where the buyer cannot later complain that its circulation is prohibited (Cass.civ. I, 24 November 1993, Bull.civ. III, no. 347).

6. Some systems focus more on the seller's actual knowledge of the particular purpose. Under SLOVENIAN law LOA § 459(2) establishes that there is a material defect if the goods lack the properties necessary for special use, intended by the buyer, of which the seller was aware or could not have been unaware. Similarly under BELGIAN case law the functional interpretation of the concept of defect is applicable on condition that the seller knew about the purpose of the thing because the buyer had disclosed the purpose to him.

7. Under other systems such a particular purpose has to be based on a promise by the seller. In ITALY CC art. 1497 the seller has to deliver goods that possess the quality promised to the buyer. The promise of certain qualities may be based on an explicit request by the buyer or on a specific offer by the seller when he declares, for instance, that the good possesses certain specific advantages (e.g. as to productivity, composition, age, originality, novelty of the model, etc.). The promise of certain qualities may be explicit or tacit (for an example of the liability of a seller for the delivery of a 'used' good instead of a new one, see Cass. 3 August 2001, no. 10728, in I contratti 2001, with note Romeo, 177-180). A tacit promise is for instance one which derives from the indication of an atypical or particular function of the good which exceeds the limits of a normal destination of the good. The seller is then obliged to hand over goods which present the qualities which are necessary in order to realise that function.

8. Other systems still rely on the contract in this case. Under GERMAN law CC § 434(1)(1) the relevant provision merely says that the goods must be fit for the purpose provided by the contract. Similarly under AUSTRIAN law CC § 922(1) which refers to the application or use according to the express specification. In SPANISH law the priority of the agreed and special purpose is largely accepted (see TS 3 March 2000, RAJ 2000 no. 1308, and Morales in Commentary Civil Code by the Ministry of Justice, 1991, II, p. 956).

9. Under the systems where a notice will bind the seller as to the particular purpose, there are some exceptions as to this rule. This applies where the circumstances show that the buyer did not rely, or that it was unreasonable for the buyer to rely, on the seller's skill and judgement (CISG art. 35(2)(b); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 14(3); ESTONIA LOA § 217(2) 2); FINLAND SGA § 17(2)(2); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:17(2) and (5); NORWAY SGA § 17(b) and Consumer Sales Act § 15(c); SWEDEN SGA § 17(2)(ii)). Also under LATVIAN consumer sales, Consumer Protection Act art. 14(1) no. 3, there is a similar exception in cases where the seller could not comprehend such a specific purposes at the time of the conclusion of the contract and the consumer had no valid reason to rely on the competence and judgement of the seller. Under the Consumer Sales Directive art. 2(2)(b) the seller is only liable for a particular purpose made known to him, which he has accepted. An identical restriction can be found under SPANISH consumer sales (ConsProtA art. 116(c)). Similarly under DANISH law if the seller is only liable for any particular purpose if he has confirmed the buyer's expectations (SGA art. 75(a)(2)).

IV. Sample/model

10. The majority of the systems contain a provision relating to a sale based on a sample or model (CISG art. 35(2)(c); Consumer Sales Directive art. 2(2)(a); AUSTRIA CC § 922(1) and for commercial sales EVHGB § 8 no. 17; BELGIUM CC art. 1649bis § 1 [consumer sales]; CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 420(3); DENMARK SGA § 75a(2); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 15; ESTONIA LOA § 226; FINLAND SGA § 17(2) no. 3 and Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 12 no. 3; ITALY CC art. 1522; HUNGARY CC § 277(1); LATVIA Consumer Protection Act art. 14(1) no. 4; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.333; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:17(4); NORWAY SGA § 17(2)(c) and Consumer Sales Act § 15(2)(d); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 4(2) and Supreme Court Ruling of 10 December 1985, OSNCP 1986, poz. 181; PORTUGAL CC art. 919 and Ccom art. 469; SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 420(3); SLOVENIA LOA § 459 no. 4; SPAIN Ccom art. 327, and in consumer sales, ConsProtA art. 116(a); SWEDEN SGA § 17 no. 3 and Consumer Sales Act § 16(2) no. 3).

11. Under GERMAN law a concrete provision is lacking. According to the legislator, samples and models are included in the agreed quality in CC § 434. However, it has been criticised by academics that this has not been made more transparent in the law (see e.g. Gsell, JZ 2001, 66). As a rule, the goods sold must conform to the sample given prior to the purchase, subject to a few exceptions. To start with, the samples may only have been supplied by way of indication (NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:17(4)) or solely for the purpose of information (SLOVENIA LOA § 459 no. 4). This is similar in ITALY CC art. 1522(2) and ESTONIA LOA § 221(2) if the samples were aimed at determining the quality of the goods in an approximate way; termination of the contract is only possible to the extent that the lack of conformity is particularly relevant. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the seller may only be liable if the lack of conformity would not have been apparent on a reasonable examination of the sample (Sale of Goods Act s. 15(1) and (2)). Under HUNGARIAN law CC § 372 the seller is liable for any hidden defects even if those were also present in the sample; if the buyer fails to present the sample, he must prove that the thing does not correspond to the sample.

12. While the failure to conform with a sample usually gives rise to the remedies for lack of conformity, a distinction is made in SLOVENIA LOA § 518: in commercial contracts, this is deemed a non-performance (delay), but a material defect (lack of conformity) in all other contracts.

V. Packaging

13. Express rules on packaging can be found under a number of systems (DENMARK SGA § 75a(2); ESTONIA LOA § 217(2) 5); FINLAND SGA § 17 (2) no. 4 and Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 12 no. 4; LATVIA Consumer Protection Act art. 14(1) no. 5; LITHUANIA CC arts. 6.342-6.343; POLAND CC art. 545; NORWAY SGA § 17(2)(d) and Consumer Sales Act § 15(2)(e); SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act § 36; SWEDEN SGA § 17 no. 4 and Consumer Sales Act § 16(2) no. 4). Under CZECH law there is also a general provision regulating which party carries the expenses of packaging (CC § 593). Moreover, such rules can be found under commercial sales law in some systems (CISG art. 35(2)(d); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 420(4); SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 420(4); SLOVENIA General Usances for Merchandise no. 79 (Splošne uzance za blagovni promet, 1954)).

14. In other systems, such an obligation of the seller may be implied, either based on the contract or on trade usage (AUSTRIA; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 29(6): seller obliged to put goods in a "deliverable state", which may imply packaging; NETHERLANDS Asser (-Hijma), Bijzondere Overeenkomsten I[6], no. 322). The same applies under CZECH non-commercial and non-consumer sales. Under GERMAN law it is uncertain whether inappropriate packaging is a defect under sales law or a breach of an ancillary duty that comes under the general (and different) regime of breach of contract. Although the former solution has been supported in legal literature (see Grundmann, ERPL 9/2001, 250; Brüggemeier, WM 2002, 1378), no reference was included in CC § 434 and thus such an approach is not very likely to be followed by the courts.

15. In the absence of an agreement, the goods have to be packaged in a manner that is usual, or where there is no usage to that effect, in a an adequate way to protect and preserve the goods (CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 420(4); ESTONIA LOA § 217(2) 5); SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 420(4); SLOVENIA Usance no. 79). In the NORDIC COUNTRIES the goods are to be packaged in a manner that is usual or in another acceptable way, if packaging is necessary in order to preserve or protect the goods (FINLAND; NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 17(2) no. 4). Under SLOVENIAN consumer sales the seller is obliged to ensure adequate packaging (Consumer Protection Act § 36). LITHUANIAN law contains quite detailed rules on the seller's obligation to deliver goods in containers or packaged: Where the contract provides no requirements regarding the containers and packaging of goods, the goods are to be delivered packaged in the manner customary for such goods, whereas in cases where the containers and packaging may be varied, the goods are bound to be packaged in such a manner or in such containers which would ensure the fitness of the type of goods during storage or carriage under normal conditions. Where mandatory requirements regarding containers or packaging are established by laws or other legal acts, the seller-businessman is bound to deliver items of goods to the buyer in containers or packaging which conform to the requirements set by laws or other legal acts. Where the seller, in breach of his obligation, delivers to the buyer items of goods not packaged or not in containers or in unsuitable containers, the buyer may refuse to accept them and demand that the seller packages the items of goods or deliver them in containers, unless otherwise provided by the contract or determined by the nature of the obligation or goods, unless the contract provides otherwise (CC arts. 6.342-6.343). Under POLISH law CC art. 545(1) the mode of the release and the receipt of the thing sold is to ensure its integrity and safety; in particular, the method of packing and transportation must correspond to the properties of the thing.

VI. Accessories and instructions

16. Conformity rules relating to accessories and instructions are fairly rarely found. When it comes to accessories, this seems to boil down to the question of what forms part of the goods. As was already shown above (see the Notes to IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery), the obligation to deliver may cover more than just the goods per se, as the seller has to hand over the goods including parts thereof (cf. AUSTRIA Bestandteile und Zugehör; BELGIUM CC art. 1615 accessories and all that is designed for their permanent use; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.317; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:9(1); POLAND CC art. 52; SLOVENIA LOA § 448(1); SPAIN CC art. 1097).

17. In respect of instructions, concrete regulations can be found under NORDIC consumer sales, establishing that the goods must be accompanied by the necessary information about installation, construction, use, maintenance and conservation of the goods (FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 12a(2); NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 16(1)(d); SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 16(1)). In POLAND CC art. 546(2) lays down that the seller is to attach an instruction for use if that is necessary for the proper use of the thing in accordance with its destination. Under a consumer sale, the seller is moreover obliged to release to the buyer instructions as to use, maintenance and other documents required by specific rules of law (Consumer Sales Act art. 3(5)). Such information should be provided in Polish, or, as long as the type of information allows it, in a commonly understood graphical form (art. 3(6)). Under ESTONIAN law the instructions necessary for the use of the goods form a part of the documents that the seller has to deliver together with the goods (LOA § 211(1)). Furthermore, LOA § 217(1) provides that non-conformity of the documents is to be treated as non-conformity of the goods.

18. It is also possible to argue that the absence of instructions may constitute a lack of conformity, see for instance ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, where the absence of such, or misleading or incomplete instructions, might render the goods of unsatisfactory quality or unfit for a purpose made known by the buyer (Sale of Goods Act s. 14(2) and (3)). The same applies in the NETHERLANDS under the general rule in CC art. 7:17(2), as the goods may then not have the qualities the buyer expects under the contract.

19. Another approach can be found in CZECH and SLOVAKIAN consumer sales, where CC § 617 requires the seller to inform the buyer about special regulations (instructions), especially if the use is explained in the instructions or is regulated by technical standards, unless such regulations are generally known. If the seller fails to comply with this duty he must compensate the buyer for any damage. Moreover, under CZECH consumer sales art. 10(2) of the Consumer Protection Act requires that instructions have to be provided in Czech.

20. The situation under GERMAN law is unclear when it comes to a lack of or incorrect instructions. The courts have applied: breach of an ancillary duty (BGH 5 April 1967, BGHZ 47, 312 – this would now be CC § 280(1)); non-conformity (OLG Frankfurt NJW 1987, 3206) and partial non-performance (BGH 4 November 1992, NJW 1993, 461).

VII. Reasonable expectations of the buyer (in particular with respect to the general quality standard)

21. The Consumer Sales Directive has introduced a general quality standard in art. 2(2)(d), which requires the goods to show the qualities and performance that the consumer can reasonably expect. In most countries there is now such a general standard of reasonable expectations under consumer sales (BELGIUM CC art. 1649ter § 1; ESTONIA LOA § 217(2) no. 6; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 616(2); DENMARK SGA § 75a(2); FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 12(5); LATVIA Consumer Protection Act art. 14(1) no. 1; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:17(2); NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 15(2)(b); SPAIN ConsProtA art. 116(d) SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 16(3) no. 3). Similarly under SLOVENIAN law, where according to the case law the standard of tacitly agreed properties are influenced by the buyer's expectations (cf. VS Ljubljana sodba I Cp 2087/98 from 6 October 1999).

22. According to the SWEDISH preparatory works the provision is to apply when the usability and quality of the goods deviates in a considerable way from the consumer's presumptions on which he has based his judgement at the time of concluding the contract (Prop 1989/90:89, 100). This prerequisite has primarily been applied to goods sold as substandard as for requirements of durability (cf. ARN 1992/93 ref. 54 and ARN 1993/94 ref. 48). Furthermore, the provision has been applied to the sale of second-hand cars, for instance in ARN 1995/96 ref. 54 (a car was considered not to conform to the contract because it had had 13 former owners, whereas the seller had stated that there had been only one). In another case, the HD found a sailing boat not to be in conformity with the contract, since the buyer justifiably expected the boat to have been produced in Scandinavia. However, it turned out that the hull was constructed in Poland, a fact which gave the boat a lower market value (NJA 2001, 155; cf. Herre, JT 2001/02, 120 ff).

23. Moreover, under some systems the goods shall correspond to the durability and other characteristics which the consumer may ordinarily expect in the purchase of such goods (FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 12(5); NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 15(2)(b)). Also under DANISH Consumer Sales Act § 75a(2) contains an express reference to durability.

24. On the other hand, the buyer's expectations as to the general quality have been incorporated in traditional notions, rather as an autonomous aspect of conformity (cf. AUSTRIA CC § 922(2); GERMANY CC § 434(1) no. 2). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, Sale of Goods Act s. 14(2) implies a term in consumer sales contracts that goods must be of satisfactory quality. This refers to 'the standard that a reasonable person would regard as satisfactory', taking into account any description of the goods, the price (if relevant) and all the other relevant circumstances (Sale of Goods Act s. 14(2A)). The price will not always be a relevant consideration, as there may be some cases where the quality expected bears no relationship to the price. In Sale of Goods Act s. 14(2B) a non-exhaustive list is provided of matters concerning the quality of goods which may be relevant in appropriate cases, namely "(a) fitness for all the purposes for which goods of the kind in question are commonly supplied, (b) appearance and finish, (c) freedom from minor defects, (d) safety, and (e) durability." Whether any particular matter is relevant depends upon the case. Thus there was held to be no expectation of durability in relation to a second-hand car of five years of age, with 80,000 miles on the clock: Thain v. Anniesland Trade Centre 1997 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 102.

25. Without doubt, the reasonable expectations of the buyer play an important role in assessing the (lack of) conformity of goods generally also outside consumer sales, as has already been shown in the notes above. In particular, this holds true for the fitness for purpose test when establishing the normal purpose or use of goods (LITHUANIA CC art. 6.333; CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 410(2); SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 420(2)). Similarly under SPANISH law CC art. 1484 where case law has adopted a mixed approach between an objective standard, i.e. normal expectations regarding the same type of products, and a more subjective one, i.e. particular expectations on the part of the buyer, see TS 31 January 1970, RAJ 1970 no. 370, TS 3 March 2000, RAJ 2000 no. 1308, Morales, Comentarios al CC, Ministerio de Justicia, II, 1991, p. 956. In the NETHERLANDS, the buyer's reasonable expectations have long since been the most important criterion for establishing conformity under CC art. 7:17(2). What the buyer can reasonably expect, depends on 'the circumstances of the case'. Relevant is therefore whether the good was new or second-hand, a branded product or of an unknown origin, damaged or (outwardly) intact, the price (high or low, both in absolute figures as well as relatively), the type of business where the good was sold (a regular store or at a market), etc. (cf. Mon. NBW B65a (Wessels, Koop: algemeen, no. 43). In ESTONIA the law and court practice distinguish between reasonable expectations regarding the fitness for use (LOA § 217(2) no. 2) and the quality of the goods (LOA § 77(1) and, in case of consumer sales, LOA § 217(2) no. 6. Under LOA §§ 77(1) and 217(2) no. 6 the goods must be of the quality customary for goods of the same kind, taking into account the circumstances of the case. In the case of second-hand goods the question is therefore whether the goods sold have defects that comparable used goods of the same age usually do not have (NC CC 3-2-1-32-00). However, the question whether the goods are of a customary quality is relevant only if the goods are 'fit for the purpose'; in case the goods do not pass the fitness test, the non-conformity exists irrespective of whether comparable goods have similar defects (NC CC 3-2-1-115-04).

26. However, the most far-reaching example of a trend towards a more subjective test of conformity can be found in SWEDEN, which has a sweep-up clause for general sales law comparable to that of the present Article subparagraph (f). Pursuant to SGA § 17(3), goods do not conform if they 'in any other way deviate from what the buyer reasonably could expect'. This paragraph mainly serves as a clarification that the provisions in § 17(1) and (2) are not exhaustive (see Ramberg, Köplagen, 259); the legislator left the scope of this article to the courts to decide in which concrete cases the provision is to apply (Prop 1988/89:76, 87). While this rule is restricted to consumer sales in FINLAND and NORWAY, it may, according to legal doctrine, also play a role in general sales law (for NORWAY, the HD has considered the rule of the buyer's reasonable expectations to also exist in judge-made law (cf. Ot. prp. no. 44 2001-2002, 165 and Rt 1988, 774).

27. Instead of referring to the buyer's reasonable expectations, several systems traditionally provide for default rules concerning the level of quality of the goods to be delivered. With respect to the sale of generic goods (of which there may be various grades) the goods must be of an average kind and quality (AUSTRIA Ccom § 360 (this is applied by analogy to regular sales, see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II, 26)); fair merchandise (BELGIUM CC art. 1246); normal mid-range quality (CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA CC § 496; SLOVENIA LOA § 286(1)); average quality, which results from an evaluation of the functionality, utility and value of the goods (ITALY CC art. 1178); the creditor may not demand superior quality, and the debtor cannot deliver inferior quality (SPAIN CC art. 1167). However, under SLOVENIAN law if the purpose of their use was known to the seller, he must deliver goods of appropriate quality (LOA § 286(2)). Moreover, under CZECH consumer sales, the Consumer Protection Act art. 3(b) provides that the goods must be of 'usual quality'.

VIII. Further aspects

28. In addition to the requirements set out above, there are other provisions relating to the issue of conformity.

29. To start with, some countries stipulate that the goods have to be in accordance with public requirements (CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 616(2) and Consumer Protection Act art. 3(b); ESTONIA LOA § 217(2) no. 3; FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 12(6); NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 15(f); SLOVAKIA CC § 616; SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 18(1)). This does not apply if the buyer intended to use the goods for a purpose where the said requirement is of no significance (FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 12(6); NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 15(f)). Under SWEDISH law there is an explicit reference to the Product Security Act (produktsäkerhetslagen) and the Marketing Act (marknadsföringslagen) or other similar provisions (Consumer Sales Act § 18(1)). In FRANCE, Consumer Code art. L. 212-1 provides that the goods sold must conform with public regulations related to security and health. Under SLOVENIAN law the provision defining material defects refers also to 'prescribed' properties/qualities (LOA § 459(3)).

30. The seller may also be under a duty to inform the buyer. Under some systems this is expressly regulated for consumer sales. Under SWEDISH and NORWEGIAN consumer sales the seller must inform the consumer about such circumstances concerning the qualities and usage of the goods that were known or should have been known to him that the consumer could reasonably have expected to be informed, on the assumption that this lack of information can be presumed to have influenced the contract. If the seller fails to do so, the goods are considered not to conform to the contract (NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 16(1)(b); SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act

§ 16(3)). Similarly under DANISH consumer sales where the seller is obliged to inform the buyer about circumstances which might influence the buyer's assessment of the goods which he knew or should have known (SGA § 76(1)). Under LITHUANIAN consumer sales the seller is bound to provide the buyer with the necessary, accurate and comprehensive information about the goods offered for sale, indicating on their labels or otherwise: their price (inclusive of all taxes and charges), quality, method of use and safety, warranty period, period of fitness for use as well as other qualities of the goods and characteristics of their use, having regard to the type of goods, their purpose, the personality of the consumer and the requirements of the retail trade (CC art. 6.353). In the CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA CC § 618 establishes that the seller must inform the buyer when selling sub-standard goods about the existence and the nature of the defect, unless it is already obvious from the nature of the sale. Under CZECH consumer sales the seller must also 'clearly warn' the buyer about the existence of defects or that the good is second-hand or otherwise limited in its use (Consumer Protection Act art. 10(6). Under other systems a duty to inform the buyer might arise under the general law of obligations. Under GERMAN law this would be an ancillary obligation under CC § 241(2), thus a breach would fall under CC § 280(1), not under the specific sales law regime. In ESTONIA the seller has no general contractual duty to inform the buyer as it is the buyer's duty to furnish himself with information regarding the goods. However, such duty to inform could arise under the general rules governing the pre-contractual duties of the parties under LOA § 14(2). The breach of pre-contractual duties entitles the buyer to the same remedies as the breach of the contractual duties. In art. 60 of the SPANISH ConsProtA, a person selling to a consumer buyer is subject to a far-reaching duty of disclosure and accurate information.

IV.A.–2:303: Statements by third persons

The goods must possess the qualities and performance capabilities held out in any statement on the specific characteristics of the goods made about them by a person in earlier links of the business chain, the producer or the producer's representative which forms part of the terms of the contract by virtue of II.–9:102 (Certain pre-contractual statements regarded as contract terms).

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article addresses the question of whether and to what extent the seller becomes bound by statements relating to the goods made by third persons. Such statements are very influential, as buyers may often trust more in advertisements and brand literature than in the expertise of a given retailer. On the one hand, this rule relates to the notion of agreed conformity of IV.A.–2:301 (Conformity with the contract), as it determines the seller's contractual liability for statements made by others. On the other hand, it also deals with the buyer's expectations under IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging), in that statements by third parties may also give rise to expectations as to the qualities and performance capabilities of the goods. Thus, under IV.A.–2:302(f), such statements may also be taken into account when assessing the reasonable expectations of the buyer.

B. Relationship to Book II

The Article refers to II.–9:102 (Certain pre-contractual statements regarded as contract terms). It is included here as a reminder. Reference is made to the Comments on that Article.

NOTES

Liability for (public) statements by third persons

1. While the seller may be held liable for his own statements in respect of the conformity of the goods, liability for statements from third persons is not generally accepted (for a more general view of contract law, see the Notes to II.–9:102 (Certain pre-contractual statements regarded as contract terms).
2. This has however changed in respect of consumer sales with the advent of the Consumer Sales Directive art. 2(2) and (4), which has introduced a liability of the seller for public statements made by third parties. Thus the same applies for consumer sales in all systems (AUSTRIA CC § 922(2); BELGIUM CC art. 1649ter § 1 no. 4; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 616(2)(b) and (c); DENMARK SGA § 76(1); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 14(2D)-(2F); ESTONIA LOA § 217(2) no. 6; FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 13; FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-6; GERMANY CC § 434(1); HUNGARY CC § 277(1)(b) and (2); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:18(1); NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 16(2); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 4(4); SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act § 37(3); SPAIN ConsProtA art. 116(1)(d); SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 19(2)).
3. Under a few systems, the seller's liability for statements made by third persons is not restricted to consumer sales (AUSTRIA CC § 922(2); FINLAND SGA § 18; GERMANY CC § 434(1); NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 18(2)).

4. Typically, the seller's liability for such statements is limited in several ways. Under the Consumer Sales Directive the seller is not bound by public statements if he: i) shows that he was not, and could not reasonably have been aware of the statement in question; ii) shows that by the time of the conclusion of the contract the statement had been corrected; or iii) shows that the decision to buy the consumer goods could not have been influenced by the statement. Under most systems, similar exceptions to the seller's liability are provided (AUSTRIA CC § 922(2); BELGIUM CC art. 1649ter § 2; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act art. 14(2D)-(2F); ESTONIA LOA § 217(3); FINLAND SGA § 18(3); GERMANY CC § 434(1); HUNGARY CC § 277(2); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:18(1); NORWAY SGA § 18(3); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 5; SPAIN ConsProtA art. 116.1 d); SWEDEN SGA § 18(3) and Consumer Sales Act § 19(3)). Under NORWEGIAN consumer sales, however, it is irrelevant whether the seller was aware of the statement or not (Consumer Sales Act § 16(1)(c)). Under the SLOVENIAN Consumer Protection Act, the seller has no possibility to exempt himself from liability.

IV.A.–2:304: Incorrect installation under a consumer contract for sale

Where goods supplied under a consumer contract for sale are incorrectly installed, any lack of conformity resulting from the incorrect installation is regarded as a lack of conformity of the goods if:

(a) the goods were installed by the seller or under the seller's responsibility; or
(b) the goods were intended to be installed by the consumer and the incorrect installation was due to a shortcoming in the installation instructions.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article addresses incorrect installation as a special case of lack of conformity in a consumer contract for sale. The Consumer Sales Directive has introduced this special instance of the seller's liability, which actually covers two different scenarios: incorrect installation by the seller or under the seller's responsibility and incorrect self-installation by the buyer. In both cases, the buyer may resort to the remedies for lack of conformity set out in Chapter 4, Section 2.

B. Incorrect installation by the seller or under the seller's responsibility

The parties can agree that the seller will install the goods sold to the buyer. Such a sales contract actually also contains a certain element of services, i.e. the installation work undertaken by the seller. Instead of splitting the transaction into a sales part and a services part, under the present rule a lack of conformity resulting from an incorrect installation is qualified as a lack of conformity of the goods. If the goods do not conform to the contract after the installation, it does not matter whether they were initially unfit or whether something went wrong during the installation.

Illustration 1
A buys a kitchen from B, a business selling kitchen furniture. B delivers the kitchen to A's home, where it is subsequently installed by B's workers. After the installation, the buyer notices scratches on one of the doors. Whether or not the scratches were initially on the door or were caused during installation, the seller will be liable for lack of conformity.

Illustration 2
The facts are the same as in illustration 1 but the installation has been poorly done in that the work-surfaces are not level and the doors and drawers in the units do not close properly. The seller will be liable for lack of conformity.

The aim of the article is to protect the buyer against the situation where the goods are damaged during the installation or simply do not function properly as a result of the installation.

For the purposes of (a), it does not matter whether the seller has actually carried out the installation personally, since a contracting party who delegates performance to another remains responsible for the performance (see III.–2:106 (Performance entrusted to another).

Illustration 3
The facts are the same as in illustration 1, but B has entrusted the installation work to C an independent joiner and cabinet-maker.

C. Incorrect installation by the consumer

Frequently, consumers buy goods that are intended for self-installation (i.e. installation by the buyer in person), typical examples being furniture bought in flat-pack form. If the consumer fails to install the goods correctly, the seller will be liable for the resulting lack of conformity of the goods provided two conditions are met: first, the goods have to be intended to be installed by the consumer; and, Secondly, the installation went wrong due to shortcomings in the installation instructions.

Illustration 4
A buys a TV table at a department store. After assembling the table according to the enclosed instructions, he puts his TV on the table. After two days, the table collapses as the instructions failed to make it clear which of the different screws provided should be used to fasten the legs and the consumer used the wrong ones.

Illustration 5
A buys a computer from B. Even after hours of careful reading of the extensive manual, he does not manage to install the computer correctly. This case, albeit an example of an 'overflow' of information, still qualifies as a shortcoming in the installation instructions, if a reasonable user would not have been able to comprehend the instructions.

In fact, it does not matter whether the buyer actually carried out the wrong installation, as long as these two criteria are met. In other words, any person failing in the assembly on behalf of the buyer, such as a friend or neighbour, can give rise to the seller's liability under this rule. This even applies if the buyer has charged a professional with the assembly, because the buyer would otherwise be worse off than if he or she had tried personally to do the assembly.

Illustration 6
A buys a sink at a 'Do-It-Yourself' store, which can be installed without professional help. A asks B, a professional plumber, to help him, since A is notoriously impractical. However, due to some major flaw in the installation instructions even B does not manage to install the sink properly.

As for the question whether the seller is under an obligation to provide installation instructions in the first place cf. IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging) sub-paragraph (e).

C. Remedies of the buyer

In the two cases of incorrect installation covered by the Article, the consumer can resort to all the remedies set out in Chapter 4, Section 2. This may, at least in some cases, lead to the seller having to fix the lack of conformity at the buyer's residence. While this consequence may seem harsh, the present rule serves as an incentive for sellers to provide correct installation instructions. In other cases it might be sufficient that the seller provides the buyer with correct installation instructions.

NOTES

Incorrect installation

1. The Consumer Sales Directive has introduced a special instance of lack of conformity, the incorrect installation of goods under art. 2(5). In that regard, two situations are distinguished: first, the contract of sale includes installation of the goods by the seller or under his responsibility by the buyer; and, second, the goods sold are intended for self-assembly by the buyer, the so-called IKEA clause. However, both alternatives have the same legal consequences, as the seller is liable for a lack of conformity if the installation is not carried out correctly (without the goods necessarily showing a lack of conformity as such).

2. The majority of systems have implemented the Consumer Sales Directive by introducing a rule for consumer sales addressing both types of installations (AUSTRIA Consumer Protection Act § 9a; BELGIUM CC art. 1649ter § 4; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 623; ESTONIA LOA § 217(5); FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 12(a); FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-4; HUNGARY CC § 305(2); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.363; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:18(3); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 6; SPAIN ConsProtA art. 116(2); SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act §§ 16(1) and 16a). Under GERMAN law, the scope of application of the regulation is not limited to consumer sales (CC § 434(2)).

3. Other countries do not have such an (explicit) rule. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, faulty instructions which render installation by the consumer defective would be likely to render the goods of unsatisfactory quality in terms of Sale of Goods Act s. 14(2), or unfit for a purpose made known by the buyer in terms of s. 14(3). In contrast, a contract under which a party, at the time of contracting, agrees not just to supply goods but also to install them in the buyer's premises is not a sale of goods contract. It is, rather, a contract for the supply of goods and services, and as such is governed by the terms of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982. If the goods supplied under such a contract were defective, this would constitute a breach of the term implied by SGSA art. 11D(2), which requires goods supplied under such a contract to be of a satisfactory quality. If, on the other hand, it was the installation itself which was defective, this might well be a breach of a duty implied at common law that the services provided will be carried out with reasonable care by the supplier (or his workmen). In NORWAY, it is argued, in the absence of a specific rule, that if the seller is under a contractual duty also to install the goods, he will be liable for any non-conformity resulting from incorrect installation under the general conformity rule of SGA § 17(1) and Consumer Sales Act § 15(1). Lastly, the result would probably be the same in SLOVENIA, since the seller may be liable for lack of conformity if he either fails to supply any or faulty installation instructions resulting in the goods being unfit for normal or specific use (material defect).

IV.A.–2:305: Third party rights or claims in general

The goods must be free from any right or reasonably well founded claim of a third party. However, if such a right or claim is based on industrial property or other intellectual property, the seller's obligation is governed by the following Article.

COMMENTS

See the Comments on the following Article.

NOTES

I. Third party rights

1. As a rule, the seller has to make sure that the goods are not subject to third party rights or claims. In the majority of the systems, this aspect of conformity (in a broad sense) is referred to as liability for legal defects or defects of title (CISG art. 41; AUSTRIA (Rechtsmangel) CC §§ 304 and 305; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 499; ESTONIA LOA § 217(2) no. 4; GERMANY CC § 435; FINLAND SGA § 41(1); HUNGARY CC §§ 369 and 370; LATVIA CC arts. 1593(1) and 2010; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.321; NETHERLANDS CC arts. 7:15-16; NORWAY SGA § 41(1) and Consumer Sales Act § 15(2)(g); POLAND CC art. 556(2); PORTUGAL CC arts. 905 and 907; SLOVAKIA CC § 499 [see also CC §§ 500(2) and 503] and Ccom arts. 433-435; SLOVENIA LOA § 488; SWEDEN SGA § 41(1) and Consumer Sales Act § 21a). The seller is, however, not liable if the buyer has accepted the encumbrances on the goods (there is some discussion in the NETHERLANDS as to how such an acceptance can take place, for instance implied or 'all in one', cf. Parl. Gesch. Boek 7, 114-115; Asser (-Hijma), Bijzondere Overeenkomsten I[6], nos. 277-279).
2. Under NORDIC law the seller is liable for a legal defect even though the claim is contested if a third party presents a reasonable ground for its claim (FINLAND and SWEDEN SGA § 41(3)), or if the claim is not evidently groundless (NORWAY SGA § 41(3) and Consumer Sales Act § 15(2)(g)).
3. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, Sale of Goods Act s. 12(1) and (2) implies that contracts of sale contain implied terms that (i) the seller has the right to sell the goods, and (ii) that the goods are free, and will remain so until the time when ownership is to pass, from any charge or encumbrance not disclosed to the buyer, and that the buyer will enjoy quiet possession of the goods (save to the extent that he is disturbed by the rights of any person having a charge or encumbrance that was disclosed). In practice, the second implied term is unlikely to be pleaded very often, as securities over movable property depend for the most part upon possession by the security holder: once possession is lost, so is the security, thus limiting the rights of third persons. This is similar to LITHUANIA, where the seller, under CC art. 6.321, is bound to discharge the goods of all pledges (hypothecs) irrespective of the registration of the pledge or hypothec, unless the buyer, after he has been given notice by the seller of the encumbrances, agrees to buy the goods. The seller is also bound to warrant the buyer that the delivered good has not been seized and is not an object of a legal action, also that the seller has not been deprived of the right to dispose of the good or that there are no encumbrances.

4. In other countries, the seller's liability for legal defects is designed as a special regime in the event of the eviction of the goods (BELGIUM CC arts. 1626-1640; FRANCE (garantie d'éviction) CC arts. 1626-1640; ITALY CC art. 1481 [but see also art. 1482 for other legal defects]; SPAIN (saneamiento por evicción) CC arts. 1475-1483). Under BELGIAN and FRENCH law, the basic idea is that the seller has to guarantee the peaceful possession of the goods sold, which covers the seller's own acts and third party claims. The action based on a guarantee against eviction is regarded as an accessory right of the goods sold, which passes together with the ownership to later recipients. It does not matter if the seller acts in good or bad faith, as he will always be liable even if he did not know of the reason for eviction. The buyer who is sued by a third party and wants to be indemnified may summon the seller to the action. The buyer can also prefer to only defend himself against the third party and, in case he loses, submit a claim against the seller. A guarantee against eviction ceases, however, when the buyer has lost a judgment in the final instance, or which can no longer be appealed, without having summoned his seller, if the latter proves that there were grounds which were sufficient to defeat the claim (CC art. 1640). The same is true for the SPANISH law (CC arts. 1475, 1480 ff and Durán Rivacoba, Evicción y saneamiento, pp. 157 ff). In ITALY, a distinction is made between cases of eviction under CC art. 1481 and cases of an actual impairment of the transferred right due to the existence of a bond on the good under CC art. 1482. Eviction, intended as a third party's definitive assessment of a right to the good, may be complete (CC art. 1483) or only partial (CC art. 1484). While the buyer is entitled to remedies only to the extent that he was not aware of third party rights, his awareness is not relevant in the event of eviction (Cass. 17 June 1955, no. 1878, Rep.Foro it., 1955, voce Vendita, col. 1438, nos. 158-160; Cass. 11 May 1984, no. 2890, Rep.Foro it., 1984, voce Vendita, col. 3187, no. 47; Cass. 7 April 1986, no. 2398, Rep.Foro it., 1987, voce Vendita, col. 3553, no. 61).

5. Under the eviction regime, the seller is liable if the disturbance has been realized, i.e. if the buyer has lost a right (BELGIUM; ITALY de Martini, Nov.Dig.it 1957, vol. IV, 1050 ff; Rubino, La compravendita, 650 ff). In SPAIN, the purchaser must be deprived of all or part of the purchased item by a final court judgment based on a right existing prior to the purchase, CC art. 1475. However, that does not mean that the buyer is deprived of the right to sue the third party and the vendor jointly ("inverse eviction", Durán Rivacoba, Evicción y saneamiento, p. 302 and TS 7 June 1995, RAJ 1995 no. 4630 and TS 10 December 1996, RAJ 1996 no. 9191).

II. Differences with the conformity regime in general

6. Under most systems the regime applicable to a legal defect mainly follows the general rules on material defects. Under some systems the general time-limits do not apply to legal defects (CISG art. 43; FINLAND SGA § 41; NORWAY SGA § 41(1); SLOVENIA LOA §§ 488-495; SWEDEN SGA § 41). Under POLISH law the time-limit concerning legal defects only expires after the lapse of one year from the time when the buyer learned about the defect. If the buyer learned about the defect only as a result of a third party suit, the time runs from the day on which the decision delivered in the dispute with the third party has acquired legal force (CC art. 576(1)). Similarly under AUSTRIAN law, where actual knowledge is used as the starting point for the time-limits (CC § 933(1)).

7. Under SLOVENIAN law the primary sanction is specific performance (the buyer may, after or with notification of the defect, demand that the seller releases the goods of such rights or delivers substitute (generic) goods, LOA § 489). If his demands are not met, he can terminate the contract or reduce the price, in case of full eviction the contract is terminated ex lege (LOA § 490). In the NETHERLANDS, the buyer may claim specific performance, requiring the seller to remove the legal defect. This remedy is restricted, however, to cases where the seller may reasonably comply therewith (CC art. 7:20). If this is not the case, the buyer will have to resort to termination or damages. Also under NORDIC law there are some differences between the two regimes. Firstly, the seller is strictly liable for damages if there was an existing legal defect at hand at the time of the conclusion of the contract of which the buyer neither knew nor should have known (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 41(2)). Furthermore, the buyer may invoke his right to remedies for non-conformity against the seller due to a legal defect if a third party claims that he has property rights in the goods and there are probable reasons for this assertion (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 41(3)). The buyer is moreover under no obligation to examine the goods concerning legal defects (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 41(1)).

8. Under FRENCH and SPANISH law, however, there is a completely separate regime of eviction with remedies (FRANCE CC arts. 1626-1640; SPAIN CC arts. 1475-1483 for legal defects and CC arts. 1484 ff for hidden defects). In fact, though, in Spain the eviction regime consists only – apart from procedural rules - in the singularity of the remedy left to the buyer: the buyer may claim full compensation, including the actual value of the deprived asset; other consequential damages are only reimbursed in case of bad faith (CC art. 1478).

IV.A.–2:306: Third party rights or claims based on industrial property or other intellectual property

(1) The goods must be free from any right or claim of a third party which is based on industrial property or other intellectual property and of which at the time of the conclusion of the contract the seller knew or could reasonably be expected to have known.

(2) However, paragraph (1) does not apply where the right or claim results from the seller's compliance with technical drawings, designs, formulae or other such specifications furnished by the buyer.

COMMENTS

A. Relation to the notion of conformity

This and the preceding Article make it clear that the notion of conformity covers so-called legal defects as well as material or corporeal shortcomings. The wording of IV.A.–2:301 (Conformity with the contract) sub-paragraph (d), which requires the goods to 'comply with the remaining Articles of this Section', embraces these rules in the notion of conformity. As a result, the rules on conformity, subject to one exception in IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity) paragraph (4), do not distinguish between legal and material defects.

B. Third party rights or claims in general

According to IV.A.–2:305 (Third party rights or claims in general), the seller has to ensure that the goods are free from any right or claim of a third party.

> Illustration 1
> B buys a car from S. A couple of days later he is contacted by C who claims that he has bought the car from S two weeks ago and presents the sales contract. B can claim that S should rectify this situation; otherwise B may terminate the contractual relationship.

In this context, it is important to note that a claim is not synonymous with a right. A "claim" is a demand for something based on the assertion of a right. (See the Annex of definitions.) The article makes it clear that in the present context the claim must be reasonably well-founded to affect the goods. A totally and obviously unfounded claim would not attach to or affect the goods in any way.

In addition, it should be noted that the rules of this Part also apply, with appropriate adaptations, to the sale of rights, some of which are by definition split, or rather derived, from another right. Naturally, the existence of such a 'mother' right does not qualify as a third party right under this Article. An appropriate adaptation is here called for.

C. Third party rights or claims based on industrial property or other intellectual property

While the preceding Article addresses third party rights and claims in general, the present Article introduces a special regime for third party rights or claims based on industrial property or other intellectual property. Basically, these regimes differ in two respects. First, the seller is not strictly liable for such rights, if the seller did know and could not reasonably be expected to have known of their existence (see paragraph (1)). In essence, this is a deviation from the usually strict standard of liability for other types of lack of conformity under the present rules. And, secondly, the seller can escape liability for third party rights or claims based on industrial property or other intellectual property, if they stem from the buyer's sphere. Basically, this exception relates to contracts for the sale of goods which the seller has manufactured or produced to the buyer's order. If the seller has complied with specifications furnished by the buyer, the seller is not held responsible for any rights or claims of a third party. In this article it is not necessary that the claim should be reasonably well-founded. If the seller knows of an unfounded claim the seller should inform the buyer of that. If the seller does not know of the claim and it is not reasonably well-founded it is unlikely that the seller could reasonably be expected to know of it.

NOTES

Industrial or other intellectual property

1. This provision is inspired by CISG art. 42. Only in commercial sales in the CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA this issue addressed (Ccom art. 433(2)). Accordingly, the goods are in non-conformity as a consequence of existing industrial or other intellectual property rights of third persons, firstly, if these rights are protected in the country where the seller has his seat, place of business or residential address. Secondly, there is a lack of conformity if these rights are protected in the country where the buyer has his seat, place of business or residential address and the seller knew or should have known about these rights at the time of concluding the contract. Thirdly, the lack of conformity appears if these rights are protected in the country where the goods were to be resold or used and the seller knew about this resale or usage at the time of the conclusion of the contract.
2. Under all other systems this is an unregulated situation and hence the general regime set out in IV.A.–2:305 (Third party rights or claims in general) applies (expressly in NORWAY SGA § 41(4); similarly in FINLAND; GERMANY; LITHUANIA; NETHERLANDS). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the case law indicates that where a third party has an intellectual property claim which entitles him to restrain the sale of the goods, this means that the seller has no 'right to sell the goods' under Sale of Goods Act s. 12(1), and will be in breach of this section if a sale is attempted: Niblett Ltd. v. Confectioners' Materials Co. Ltd. [1921] 3 KB 387. It is interesting to note that the SWEDISH legislator decided not to adapt the rule of CISG art. 42 since it was considered to be too seller-friendly (Ramberg, Köplagen, 77 f).
3. In FRANCE, the sale of counterfeit goods is void considering that the goods are not marketable according to CC art. 1598 (Com. 24 September 2003, Bull.civ. IV, no. 147; D. 2003, 2683 note Caron). Consequently the buyer can obtain the restitution of the price paid and damages on the basis of general tort law.
4. In SPAIN there is no particular provision as to intellectual property rights causing eviction. However, it is understood that the scope of application of the CC art. 1475 (according to which the buyer has to be deprived "by operation of a contrary right existing before the sale") encompasses also intellectual property rights belonging to third parties, where such rights make impossible the fruitful and peaceful possession of the thing sold (cf. Durán Rivacoba, Evicción y saneamiento, p. 121).

IV.A.–2:307: Buyer's knowledge of lack of conformity

(1) The seller is not liable under IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging), IV.A.–2:305 (Third party rights or claims in general) or IV.A.–2:306 (Third party rights or claims based on industrial property or other intellectual property) if, at the time of the conclusion of the contract, the buyer knew or could reasonably be assumed to have known of the lack of conformity.

(2) The seller is not liable under IV.A.–2:304 (Incorrect installation in a consumer contract for sale) sub-paragraph (b) if, at the time of the conclusion of the contract, the buyer knew or could reasonably be assumed to have known of the shortcoming in the installation instructions.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article makes it clear that the buyer cannot rely on any lack of conformity of which he knew or should have known when concluding the contract. In effect, this provision introduces a certain restriction as to the scope of the seller's liability by making sure that certain defects do not amount to a lack of conformity. It therefore balances the otherwise strict liability of the seller under the present rules.

The rationale of this Article is to maintain the equilibrium of the contract. That is to say that a buyer, who knew of a lack of conformity, should have taken that fact into account when deciding whether to buy the goods.

In a way, this provision is the other side of the coin of the buyer's reasonable expectations, which feature so prominently in IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging). There, the seller is held liable for reasonable expectations on the part of the buyer in respect of properties of the goods to be sold. By the same token, the buyer may have negative expectations, i.e. may actually know of the lack of conformity of the goods.

The case of incorrect installation under a consumer contract for sale is covered separately in paragraph (2) because in such a case the buyer could not possibly know of the defective installation at the time of conclusion of the contract. The buyer could, however, have known that installation instructions were defective.

> Illustration 1
> A is interested in buying a glass shower curtain for her bathroom in flat-pack form and identifies an apparently attractive model. The sales person says however "I don't recommend that one because the installation instructions are hopelessly inadequate." B replies "Don't worry. I am good at working out these things and have fitted similar ones before."

In this case the seller would not be liable under IV.A.–2:304 (Incorrect installation in a consumer contract for sale) sub-paragraph (b) even if A does install the goods incorrectly as a result of the inadequacy of the instructions.

B. Knowledge on the part of the buyer

Obviously, it will be quite difficult to establish that the buyer had knowledge about the lack of conformity of the goods upon the conclusion of the contract. In this context, one question features prominently in sales law: to what extent does the buyer have to examine the goods before concluding the contract? Under the present rules, the buyer is not obliged to examine the goods before purchase. The buyer will only have no remedy if the buyer actually knew of the non-conformity or, when actual knowledge cannot be proved, if it can reasonably be assumed that the buyer must have known (for example, because the buyer inspected the goods closely and the non-conformity was evident).

This Article differs in two important respects from IV.A.–4:301 (Examination of the goods). First, the present Article does not cut off remedies that the buyer could otherwise have resorted to, as it already rules out a lack of conformity as the possible trigger for the remedial process. Secondly, it applies at an earlier stage, namely at the time of the conclusion of the contract (as opposed to the time of delivery under IV.A.–4:301). The Article is without prejudice to other potentially relevant rules in Book II relating to the invalidity of a contract on such grounds as mistake, fraud, and duress.

C. Exceptions

It will be noted that the Article is limited to liability under the specified default rules. It does not apply to liability under the express terms of the contract. In such a case the contract will apply according to its terms. Thus, if the goods have certain shortcomings at the time of the conclusion of the contract, but the parties, expressly or impliedly, agree that the seller is to remedy those shortcomings before the time of delivery, the seller is not exempted from liability under this provision. Similarly, if the parties have expressly agreed upon certain features, then the buyer can expect that the seller will provide these features upon delivery, even if they were lacking at the time of concluding the contract.

> Illustration 2
> A informs B, a car dealer, that he wants to buy a roadworthy car. B accepts this requirement. They inspect a vehicle prior to concluding the deal. The car in question still has heavily used tyres, which render the car unroadworthy. The buyer notices this fact but still agrees to purchase the car on the agreed condition as to roadworthiness. The seller is not exempted from liability by the buyer's knowledge, since the buyer can expect that the seller will remedy the defect, i.e. by fitting new tyres before delivery.

At the end of the day, the relationship between the parties' agreement and the buyer's knowledge of certain defects will have to be solved through contract interpretation. Important features here will be whether it was reasonable for the buyer to expect that the seller would remedy the defect before delivery. Also the contract price can provide an indication as to which standards the buyer can expect to be met.

This Article does not apply to IV.A.–2:303 (Statements by third persons) because the relevant provision in II.–9:102 (Certain pre-contractual statements regarded as contract terms) already contains a separate, quite similar restriction in paragraph (2).

D. Consumer contract for sale

While the requirements in this Article depend upon the circumstances of each case, consumer transactions should generally be treated with more caution. Above all, the question of when the consumer could be assumed to have known of the lack of conformity is to be judged with the benefit of doubt. However, the consumer may still have to notice obvious shortcomings.

NOTES

I. Knowledge of the buyer at the time of the conclusion of the contract

1. While the liability of the seller for lack of conformity is in principle strict (i.e. it is irrelevant whether he is to blame for any defect in the goods), all systems acknowledge that the seller cannot be held liable for lack of conformity of which the buyer knew, or ought to have known, upon the conclusion of the contract (CISG art. 35(3); Consumer Sales Directive art. 2(3); AUSTRIA CC § 928; BELGIUM CC art. 1642; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 500(1); ESTONIA LOA § 218(4); FINLAND SGA § 20(1) and Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 12(4); FRANCE CC art. 1642; GERMANY CC § 442(1); GREECE CC arts. 536 and 537; HUNGARY CC § 305/A(1); ITALY CC art. 1491 and Consumer Code art. 129(3); LATVIA CC art. 1613; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:17(5); NORWAY SGA § 20(1) and Consumer Sales Act § 16(3); POLAND CC art. 557 and Consumer Sales Act art. 7: SLOVAKIA CC § 500 and Ccom arts. 424 [qualities] and 433 [legal defects]; SLOVENIA LOA § 460(1); and ConsProtA art. 116(3); SWEDEN SGA § 20(1)).

2. Instead of having an express rule excluding the seller's liability, in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the knowledge of the buyer at the time of the contract's conclusion that the goods were defective, including by virtue of the fact that they lacked adequate instructions, would prevent the goods being deemed of unsatisfactory quality if the seller had drawn the buyer's attention to these defects (Sale of Goods Act s. 14(2C)(a)). A similar result can be achieved in consumer sales law in SWEDEN, where the legislator has decided not to incorporate a general rule on the knowledge of the buyer, fearing that such a rule could be misinterpreted in cases where the consumer knew about a certain quality of the goods, but did not realise the importance thereof for the usage of the goods (see Herre, Konsumentköplagen[2], 270 f). The same principle can, however, also be derived from Consumer Sales Act § 16(1) since the goods are in conformity with the contract because individual party agreements overrule the general presumptions regarding when goods are not in conformity. Cf. also the NETHERLANDS where the rule introduced by the Consumer Sales Directive is criticized for its unclear relation to the reasonable expectation test of CC art. 17(2), see Asser (-Hijma), Bijzondere Overeenkomsten I[6], no. 358. Under PORTUGUESE consumer sale the Consumer Protection Act art. 12 initially provided that the seller could not be liable for lack of conformity of which the buyer was previously informed or clarified. This Article was however changed in 2003 to provide that the consumer always have the right to compensation regardless of the fact that he knew about the lack of conformity prior to the conclusion of the contract.

3. Under some systems there is a special regulation if the seller has acted fraudulently or given an express guarantee of conformity. If the buyer, due to gross negligence, did not know about the lack of conformity, or if the defect was obvious, the seller may still be held liable if he has fraudulently concealed the defect (AUSTRIA CC § 928; GERMANY CC § 442(1); GREECE CC art. 537 and A.P.1259/1991 EEN 1993, 64).

Moreover, the seller will still be liable if he has given an express promise of conformity (AUSTRIA CC § 928; GERMANY CC § 442(1); GREECE CC art. 537; SLOVAKIA CC §§ 500 f; SLOVENIA LOA § 460(3)).

4. Moreover, the Consumer Sales Directive art. 2(3) provides that the seller is not liable if the lack of conformity has its origin in materials supplied by the buyer. The HUNGARIAN regulation also provides that the obligor (seller) is not liable for a lack of conformity which has its origin in materials supplied by the obligee (buyer), provided that the obligor informed the obligee of the defectiveness of the supplied materials (CC § 305/A(1)).

5. In the NETHERLANDS, it is undisputed that if the seller has accepted that certain defects that were apparent at the time of the conclusion of the contract would be remedied, he may not rely on the buyer's knowledge that these qualities were not (yet) there. In this respect, the buyer's reasonable expectations, based on the seller's acknowledgement, lead to the goods not being in conformity if the defects are not remedied after all (cf. CC art. 7:17(2)). In ENGLAND, there is doubt as to whether a buyer who has accepted faulty goods on the faith of a verbal but non-contractual undertaking by the seller that these will be repaired can plead that the goods are not of satisfactory quality if a repair is not effected: see R. & B. Customs Brokers Co. Ltd. v. United Dominions Trust Ltd. [1988] 1 WLR 321. However, in SCOTS law, whether or not the goods would be deemed to be of unsatisfactory quality, such an undertaking would be enforceable as a unilateral promise (on this issue of a cure promised by the seller, see also SWEDEN Prop 1988/89:76, 94).

II. Pre-contractual duty to examine

6. Generally, there is no express regulation under the different systems of a pre-contractual duty to examine the goods. However, under many systems the buyer may still be under such an indirect obligation, since the seller is not liable for obvious defects which are present at the time of the conclusion of the contract. Most systems address this issue indirectly by referring to the type of lack of conformity for which the seller is not liable (AUSTRIA 'evident'; CZECH REPUBLIC 'evident' (cf. Knappová, Civil Law II[3], 106); ITALY 'using ordinary diligence' (e.g. employed in Consumer Code art. 129(4a)); LATVIA 'least attention should be paid'; SLOVENIA LOA § 460(2) 'diligent person with the average knowledge and experience of a person of the same occupation or profession would note such during an ordinary inspection of the goods'). According to the SPANISH CC art. 1484, the seller incurs no liability where the defects were "to hand" or ought to be deemed "manifest"; nor is the seller liable when the buyer is an "expert" in the relevant business. It is still undecided whether this restriction also applies to eviction liability. In fact, the majority of recorded cases relate to sales of land encumbered with zoning restrictions (see Supreme Court Judgment 17 November 2006, CCJC 75 § 2007, pp. 1221 ff, and note by Díaz Martínez).

7. Under other systems, buyers are not obliged to examine the goods before purchase, but, if they do, they should take care in examining them, for any defect which they ought to have discovered by virtue of the examination which they undertake cannot be taken into account when considering whether the goods are in conformity (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 14(2C)(b); ESTONIA LOA § 218(4) and NC CC 3-2-1-50-06; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.337, which refers to the contract or to usage). If the buyer has examined the goods before the conclusion of the contract, or without good reason has failed to comply with the seller's invitation to examine them he cannot make a claim for lack of conformity for what he should have noticed at the examination, unless the seller has acted against good faith (DENMARK

SGA § 47; FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 20(2)). The same applies in respect of the inspection of samples prior to the purchase (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 14(2C)(c); FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 20(3)).

8. For the requirement to examine the goods upon delivery, cf. IV.A.–4:301 (Examination of the goods) under I.

IV.A.–2:308: Relevant time for establishing conformity

(1) The seller is liable for any lack of conformity which exists at the time when the risk passes to the buyer, even if the lack of conformity becomes apparent only after that time.

(2) In a consumer contract for sale, any lack of conformity which becomes apparent within six months of the time when risk passes to the buyer is presumed to have existed at that time unless this is incompatible with the nature of the goods or the nature of the lack of conformity.

(3) In a case governed by IV.A.–2:304 (Incorrect installation under a consumer contract for sale) any reference in paragraphs (1) or (2) to the time when risk passes to the buyer is to be read as a reference to the time when the installation is complete.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article defines the time when conformity, or a lack of conformity, is to be established for the purpose of the seller's liability for lack of conformity. In this context, there are two different questions. First, at what point in time does a lack of conformity have to be in existence in order to give the buyer a remedy? And, Secondly, when does it have to become apparent to the buyer? While the answer to the second question can be found in Chapter 4, Section 3 (Requirements of examination and notification), this Article contains the answer to the first question. In essence, the relevant point in time is normally determined by the passing of risk, but this has to be modified for cases governed by the rules on incorrect installation. Paragraph (2) contains a presumption as to the existence of a lack of conformity in favour of consumers.

B. Existence of the lack of conformity

As a rule, the seller is only liable for a lack of conformity which existed at the time when the risk passed. This rule is justified on various grounds. First, the passing of the risk means that the goods have left the seller's sphere of influence, in accordance with the main rule in IV.A.–5:102 (Time when risk passes) paragraph (1), so that the seller can no longer control them. It would therefore be unfair to burden the seller with liability for a lack of conformity emerging in respect of goods that are outside the seller's control. Secondly, this rule ensures that the buyer assumes the risk of payment, as defined in IV.A.–5:101 (Effect of passing of risk), together with the risk of lack of conformity.

> Illustration 1
> A sells cattle to B. After five months the animals start to show the first signs of a serious disease. The seller can be held liable only if the defect, that is the disease, was present at the time when the risk passed. If the cattle have only been infected in B's cowshed and, hence, after delivery, the seller is not responsible.

Generally, the risk will pass when the buyer takes over the goods, or should have taken them over, or when the goods are handed over to the first carrier (see the rules in Chapter 5). However, under a consumer contract for sale, the risk generally does not pass until the buyer actually takes over the goods (cf. IV.A.–5:103 (Passing of risk in a consumer contract for sale)). It follows from the passing of risk choice as the relevant point in time that, in the exceptional case where risk passes before actual delivery, the lack of conformity may also have to be in existence before the buyer actually takes charge of the goods (see IV.A.–5:201 (Goods placed at buyer's disposal), IV.A.–5:202 (Carriage of the goods) and IV.A.–5:203 (Goods sold in transit)).

Illustration 2
The facts are the same as in the previous illustration. If the risk passes before handing over the cattle, for instance due to default on the part of the buyer, and the cattle were subsequently infected by a virus without fault on the part of A, B has no claim despite the fact that the infection took place on A's farm.

C. Reversal of burden of proof in a consumer contract for sale

The general rule is that the buyer has to prove that the lack of conformity existed when the risk passed, which will often be rather difficult to establish. In order to facilitate this task, paragraph (2) lays down a short-term reversal of the burden of proof in favour of consumers: any lack of conformity becoming apparent within the first six months after the passing of the risk is presumed to have existed at that time. Under IV.A.–5:103 (Passing of risk in a consumer contract for sale)), risk passes when the consumer takes over the goods. In essence, this rule resembles a product guarantee, albeit that the seller can still rebut this presumption.

Illustration 3
B, a consumer, buys a washing machine from A, a white-goods dealer. After four months it stops working due to a short circuit. The defect in the wiring is presumed to have existed at the time of the passing of the risk – i.e. when the buyer got the machine. It is up to the seller to prove that this was not the case.

As a consequence of paragraph (2), the consumer buyer has an incentive to lodge a complaint early, as the buyer will then be exempted from the difficult issue of proof. By the same token, a consumer buyer may want to check the goods for lack of conformity, even though under no duty to do so (cf. IV.A.–4:301 (Examination of the goods) paragraph (4)).

This presumption applies unless it is incompatible with the nature of either the goods or the lack of conformity.

Illustration 4
A buys a cat from a pet shop. After 2 months of apparent good health the animal develops and then dies of a viral infection. Since the virus in question has an incubation period of just two weeks, and has very obvious symptoms, the presumption has no effect, as it is not compatible with the nature of the lack of conformity.

Illustration 5
A consumer cannot rely on the presumption when cheap straw sandals disintegrate after a long summer outdoors. This is an example of usual wear and tear of goods due to the nature of those goods.

D. Incorrect installation cases

Paragraph (3) has a special rule for cases where a consumer claims that the seller is liable for a lack of conformity under IV.A.–2:304 (Incorrect installation under a consumer contract for sale). It is obvious that in such a case the time when any lack of conformity has to be assessed cannot be the time when risk passes in relation to the goods themselves (which will generally be prior to their installation). So paragraph (3) provides that in such a case the lack of conformity has to exist at the time when the installation is complete. The presumption in paragraph (2) still applies but with this time as the starting point.

NOTES

I. Point in time of the existence of lack of conformity

1. As a rule, the seller is only liable for a lack of conformity that existed upon the passing of risk (this is, however, different in the realm of the commercial guarantee, see Chapter 6).

2. In the majority of the systems, the relevant rules on conformity refer to the passing of risk (CISG art. 36(1); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 425(1); ESTONIA LOA § 218; FINLAND SGA § 21(1) and Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 15(1); FRANCE Cass.civ. III, 9 February 1965, Bull.civ. III, no. 103; GERMANY CC § 434; GREECE CC art. 534; HUNGARY CC §§ 279(2) and 305(1); NETHERLANDS cf. Parl. Gesch. Boek 7, 118; Asser (-Hijma), Bijzondere Overeenkomsten I[6], no. 332 and HR 2 April 1999, NedJur 1999, 585 (Van den Broek and Van Dael); NORWAY SGA § 21(1) and Consumer Sales Act § 18(1); POLAND CC art. 559; PORTUGAL CC arts. 796 ff ex vi art. 918; SLOVAKIA CC § 499 and Ccom § 425(1); SLOVENIA LOA § 458(1). In SPAIN, the relevant defect has to exist "at the time of the perfection of the sale" (CC art. 1488), that is the time at which the risk pass to the buyer (CC art. 1452); in consumer sales, though, arts. 114 and 123 of the ConsProtA, extend the seller's liability up to the time of delivery. A few systems refer directly to the moment of delivery (AUSTRIA CC § 924; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 14; SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 20). Similarly under HUNGARIAN law CC § 305(1), which refers to the 'time of performance' which obviously means performance by the obligor (seller), i.e. delivery. Since CC § 279(2) establishes that "the risk passes to the other contracting party with the performance" the result will be the same. The same applies under CZECH non-commercial sales, which refers to 'time of performance' in CC § 499, meaning the time of delivery by the seller and of taking delivery by the buyer (cf. Knappová, Civil Law II[3], 106). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, the difference in approach between the time of passing of the risk in Sale of Goods Act s. 20 and that of supply raises problems for cases where risk passes before supply. In such cases, it is generally asserted that the buyer takes the risk of any non-conformity after the passing of risk which is not due to the fault of the seller, although there is no statutory authority for this view (see Adams/Atiyah/MacQueen, Sale of Goods[11], 147 f; Goode, Commercial Law[3], 328, note 153).

3. In contrast, in many systems where a distinction is made between hidden defects and non-conforming delivery, hidden defects must have been in existence upon the conclusion of the contract (BELGIUM; ITALY; LATVIA Consumer Protection Act art. 13(2) and (3); SPAIN CC arts. 1488 and 1452 and TS 31-01-1970). However, under ITALIAN consumer sales no such distinction is made (Consumer Code art. 130(1)).

4. Notwithstanding the fact that the lack of conformity must have been in existence upon delivery (or the conclusion of the contract when it comes to hidden defects), it is acknowledged that lack of conformity does not have to have 'matured', thus extending the liability of the seller. Under some systems this is explicitly indicated in that the seller is liable even if the lack of conformity becomes apparent only after the passing of the risk (CISG art. 36(1); ESTONIA LOA § 218(1); FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 36(1)). Under other systems, this principle is not expressly provided in the legal provisions (AUSTRIA: e.g. a defect that can be traced back to another defect, cf. Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[10], 71 f; ITALY: it is sufficient that its 'cause' pre-exists the conclusion of the contract; POLAND: the defects arose from a cause which was earlier inherent in the thing sold, see CC art. 559).

5. Moreover, the seller is liable if the goods deteriorate after the passing of risk/delivery, if the deterioration is due to an act or omission by the seller (CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 623 (consumer sales); ESTONIA LOA § 218(3); FINLAND SGA § 21(2); NORWAY SGA § 21(2) and Consumer Sales Act § 18(3); SWEDEN SGA § 21(2) and Consumer Sales Act § 20(3)). Such a situation may occur if the seller under the contract is also to install the goods at the buyer's place of business or home, and thereby damages the goods, or if a consumer damages the goods after delivery due to incorrect instructions provided by the seller concerning the usage of the goods, (SWEDEN Prop 1989/90:89, 109)).

6. Cf. also IV.A.–5:102 (Time when risk passes).

II. Burden of proof (consumer – other sales)

7. The six-month presumption contained in Consumer Sales Directive art. 5(3) has been implemented in all systems for consumer sales (AUSTRIA CC § 924; BELGIUM CC art. 1649quarter § 4; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 616(4); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 48A(3) and (4); ESTONIA LOA § 218(2); FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 15(2); FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-7; GERMANY CC § 476; HUNGARY CC § 305/A(2); ITALY Consumer Code art. 132(3); NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:18(2); NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 18(2); POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 4(1); SLOVAKIA CC § 508; SLOVENIA Consumer Protection Act art. 37b; SPAIN, ConsProtA art. 123; SWEDEN Consumer Sales Act § 20a).

8. In some countries this issue has already been considered in a number of judgments. In GERMANY the BGH held that it is clear that the burden of proof only relates to the time aspect but not to the defect as such. In the case at hand, a belt in an engine had torn. The consumer claimed that the belt had been defective, whereas the trader claimed that a mistake by the consumer – changing into a lower gear at high speed – was responsible for the defect. The court held that the consumer had to prove that the belt had been defective as such before CC § 476 could apply (BGH 2 June 2004, ZIP 2004, 1368–70; this has been strongly criticised in academic literature, see Looschelders and Benzenberg, VersR 2005, 231 ff). A similar case also concerning a six-year old second-hand car was brought before the Swedish Board of Consumer Complaints (ARN). Three months after the delivery of the car, a strap broke, causing the engine to fail. The Board firstly established that the nature of the non-conformity was not such that it had been caused by the buyer and that no other circumstances concerning the nature of the non-conformity had been put forward which rebutted the six-month presumption. The Board further stated that the strap in question could be considered a detail of consumption. However, it could not definitely be said that a strap of this kind would necessarily break within six months of delivery, as is for instance the case with perishables. The seller was therefore ordered to compensate the buyer for the costs of repair (ARN 2002-8731, of 3 June 2003). In addition to this case, the ARN decided five further cases in plenum concerning the application of the six-month presumption for defects in used cars in March 2004. In three out of these five, the Board ruled in favour of the buyer. In two of them, the decisive fact was that the defect appearing was not a normal result of wear and tear for a car of that age (ARN 2003-4989, of 3 March 2004 (gearbox failure in an eight-year-old car) and ARN 2003-5348, of 3 March 2004 (radiator failure in an eight-year-old car)). In the third case, the seller had not acted professionally by neglecting to change a strap, while performing other repairs (ARN 2003-4343, of 3 March 2004 (engine breaking down in a 15-year-old car)). In the two cases where the seller was not found liable, this was based upon different grounds. In one case, the car had, according to the contract, been sold as a 'repair object', and the seller was therefore not found liable (ARN 2003-5093, of 3 March 2004 (breakdown of an imported, 11-year-old car)). In the last case, the lack of conformity was per se not considered to be a normal result of wear and tear for a car of that age. The seller, however, was successful in rebutting the six-month presumption, by arguing that the car had been tested by an independent expert prior to the sale, and no such damage had been found. Therefore, the Board concluded that the defect had appeared after delivery (ARN 2003-4991, of 3 March 2004).

9. Outside of consumer sales and the ambit of Consumer Sales Directive art. 5(3) (which merely refers to the existence of the defect), the general rules on evidence apply. As a consequence, the buyer needs to prove both the defect and the fact that it already existed upon purchasing the goods. Since this may lead to difficulties, the burden of proof may, in certain cases, be on the seller instead (see NORWAY Rt 1998, 774 in which it is also stated that if none of the parties fulfil their duty to prove their cases, the seller may sometimes, depending on the circumstances of the case, have to bear the burden of proof, and Ot. prp. no. 44 2001-2002, 87). In SWEDEN it is argued that it should be considered sufficient if, after an evaluation of the circumstances, it is more probable that the defect existed at the time of delivery (cf. NJA 1991, 481, which, however, concerned services). A lack of durability is often the most probable cause of a defect, when the goods deteriorate within their normal life-span. Therefore it can be said that there is an existing legal presumption that the seller is responsible for such non-conformity (Håstad, Den nya köprätten[5], 94 f). See also BELGIUM, where there is a presumption that, if the normal use of the goods is not disputed, the defect existed prior to conclusion of the contract (Brussels 5 June 1996, Res Jur. Imm. 1996, 122; Liege 12 November 1997, JLMB 1998, 624; Brussels 21 January 1993, RW 1994-95, 820; Ghent 1 February 1995, AJT 1995-96, 168 Tilleman and Verbeke, Bijzondere overeenkomsten in kort bestek, 60; de Page and Masson, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge IV(1), 282). Under CZECH law the general regime of civil procedure applies (Civil Procedure Code art. 120). Therefore the burden of proof that: (a) the goods did not meet the specifications set out in the guarantee document or in associated advertisements; is on the claimant (buyer), and (b) any failure of or damage to the goods is due to misuse, mistreatment, accident, failure to maintain, or other cause for which the guarantor is not responsible is on the guarantor. In SPANISH law a general presumption of the pre-existence of the defect has been developed only in the context of sales of buildings (cf. TS 25 January 1999, RAJ 1999 no. 4560).

IV.A.–2:309: Limits on derogation from conformity rights in a consumer contract for sale

In a consumer contract for sale, any contractual term or agreement concluded with the seller before a lack of conformity is brought to the seller's attention which directly or indirectly waives or restricts the rights resulting from the seller's obligation to ensure that the goods conform to the contract is not binding on the consumer.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article attempts to set out the limits of derogation for consumer contracts for sale concerning the conformity requirements in this Chapter. In doing so, it is complemented by IV.A.–4:101 (Limits on derogation from remedies for non-conformity in a consumer contract for sale), which has a similar provision for the consumer's remedies for lack of conformity.

B. Derogation from the conformity rules in a consumer contract for sale

In a consumer contract for sale, the buyer's rights under Section 3 of this Chapter in respect of the seller's obligation to ensure that the goods conform to the contract cannot be waived or restricted by the seller before the consumer notifies the seller of the defect. After that moment in time, the parties are free to agree upon other solutions than envisaged in this Chapter. Thus, this Article prevents the seller from restricting the rights of a consumer beforehand, for instance in standard terms.

This provision has the effect that all the rules exclusively applicable to consumer contracts for sale, for instance IV.A.–2:304 (Incorrect installation in a consumer contract for sale) and IV.A.–2:308 (Relevant time for establishing conformity) paragraph (2) cannot be derogated from, unless in the (unlikely) event that the consumer is granted more far-reaching rights. Moreover, generally the provisions common to consumer and other sales will have the same effect, for instance IV.A.–2:305 (Third party rights or claims in general) and IV.A.–2:308 (Relevant time for establishing conformity) paragraph (1).

However, IV.A.–2:301 (Conformity with the contract) and IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging) are the rules that raise the most difficult questions as to how far the parties can deviate from what is laid down in these rules. The problem is that these Articles are strongly connected to the individual agreement between the parties. On the one hand, the parties should for instance be able to conclude a contract for the sale of goods that are not fit for their ordinary purpose. This should only be possible, however, where there is a special reason or this is clearly indicated in the description of the goods, for instance that they are substandard or second hand. In order for the seller to exclude the application of the requirement in IV.A.–2:302 paragraph (b) that the goods must be fit for the purpose for which goods of the same description would ordinarily be used this limitation must be clearly indicated in the contract (cf. also Comment A to that Article).

Illustration 1

A, a car dealer, sells a car to B, a consumer. The car has been severely damaged in an accident, but B intends to use it for spare parts only. It is clear that the car is not fit for driving on roads, the ordinary purpose for which cars are used. The seller will nevertheless not be liable under IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging) paragraph (b) if it is clearly stated that the car is sold as a 'write-off' and 'for parts only'.

On the other hand, the seller will generally not be able to exclude the scope of IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging) without a special reason, particularly in the case of new goods which are not sold as substandard. Even in the case of durable second-hand goods like cars, the seller may not rely on a general description such as a 'wreck' or 'kit car' if the other circumstances, such as the price or the fact that the car is still being driven on public roads, indicate otherwise.

Moreover, the seller should not be able to exclude the elements in IV.A.–2:302 (Fitness for purpose, qualities, packaging) through standard terms. Normally, an individual agreement will be necessary. At the end of the day, the question to which extent the parties under a consumer contract for sale may exclude the scope of IV.A.–2:302 beforehand will depend on the concrete case and will ultimately have to be resolved by means of a case-by-case analysis of the circumstances.

NOTES

Exclusion or limitation of the seller's liability

1. Due to the implementation of the Consumer Sales Directive, the rules regarding the conformity of the goods are mandatory in all Member States under consumer sales (cf. Consumer Sales Directive art. 7(1)).
2. Under non-consumer sales, most regulations relating to sales law are generally of a default nature. However, under some systems the seller's possibility to restrict his liability within the area of non-conformity and remedies is restricted by law. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the implied undertakings as to the conformity of goods with their description or sample, and as to their quality and fitness for any particular purpose can be excluded or restricted only in so far as is reasonable (ENGLAND Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 6(3) and SCOTLAND Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 20(2)). In FRANCE, the question of the exclusion of liability is answered according to the different degrees of 'specialty' of the parties to a sales contract. While terms modifying the legal guarantee scheme are possible between professionals of the same speciality, this is not possible in the event of a professional buyer which is not as specialised as the seller in the thing sold (see e.g. Cass.com. 29 January 1974, Bull.civ. IV, no. 39, D. 1974, 268; JCP 1974.II.17852. In this case the contract of sale for a ship included a limitation of the guarantee and it was determined that the term was not valid because the buyer, a shipowner, had a different speciality than the builder). On the other hand, the conditions of validity of contractual terms concerning the obligation of a conforming delivery are different between professionals: the limitation clauses are valid between professionals, even if they have a different speciality (Cass.civ. I, 20 December 1988, Bull.civ. I, no. 11; Cass.civ. I, 24 November 1993, JCP 1994.II.22334, note L. Leveneur).
3. Under several systems, the seller's knowledge of the lack of conformity will restrict him from excluding liability. In BELGIUM (CC art. 1643) and ITALY, agreements that exclude or limit the rights of the buyer with regard to defective goods are not legitimate if the seller acted in bad faith, i.e. if he knew that the goods were defective. Under BELGIAN law bad faith is not presumed, thus the burden of proof of the seller's knowledge of the defect rests with the buyer. However a professional seller is presumed to have known the defects in the sold thing. In that way he cannot refer to clauses in the contract that exclude or limit the rights of the buyer in the case of defective goods. The professional can only produce evidence to the contrary by proving that his ignorance was invincible and that the defect was untraceable (Cass. 4 May 1939, Pas. belge 1939, 223; Cass. 15 June 1989, A.C. 1988-89, 1233; Cass. 17 May 1984, A.C. 1983-84, 1205; Cass. 7 December 1990, A.C. 1990-91, 391; Cass. 19 September 1997, A.C. 1997, 840; Brussels 21 January 1993, RW 1994-95, 820; Antwerp 20 September 1995, RW 1997-98, 880; Liege 12 November 1997, JLMB 1998, 624; de Page and Masson, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge IV(1), 285). The seller cannot rely upon an agreement limiting or excluding the buyer's rights due to non-conforming goods if he has fraudulently concealed the lack of conformity (ESTONIA LOA § 221(2) and GERMANY CC § 444) or has undertaken to guarantee the quality of the goods (GERMANY CC § 444). Under SLOVENIAN law, too, the parties are free to limit or exclude the seller's liability for defects, except where the seller was aware of the defect and where the seller has imposed the clause "using his predominant position" (LOA § 466). Similarly in POLAND the parties may extend, limit or exclude the liability for warranty (CC art. 558(1)), however such exclusion or limitation is ineffective if the seller insidiously concealed the defect from the buyer (CC art. 558(2)). Moreover, in such a situation, the seller may often not rely upon any notification periods or time-limits. Under the SPANISH CC (art. 1485 II), a waiver of the buyer's rights is effective, unless the seller was aware of the existence of the lack of conformity.

4. In some systems, the seller is not liable for a minor lack of conformity (LATVIA CC art. 1613) or insignificant discrepancies that do not affect the use of the item (SLOVENIA LOA § 458(3)).

CHAPTER 3: OBLIGATIONS OF THE BUYER

IV.A.–3:101: Main obligations of the buyer

The buyer must:

(a) pay the price;
(b) take delivery of the goods; and
(c) take over documents representing or relating to the goods as may be required by the contract.

COMMENTS

A. Main obligations of the buyer

This Article lists three obligations of the buyer that are typically found in sales transactions. They correspond to the main obligations of the seller set out in Chapter 2. The parties are, of course, free to regulate the content of their obligations, in accordance with II.–1:102 (Party autonomy). So a buyer may not be subject to all the obligations set out in this Article and may have other obligations. Most obviously, many sales do not involve documents and so the contract will not require the buyer to take delivery of such documents. But even in a non-documentary sale, the buyer may not be under an obligation to take delivery of the goods, as they may already be held by the buyer or it may have been agreed that they should remain in the seller's possession (cf. the corresponding issue for the seller's obligation to deliver in IV.A.–2:101 (Overview of obligations of the seller) Comment C). Besides, even where the contract requires the seller to deliver the goods, the buyer may not have to do anything to "take" delivery.

> M, a local dairy, offers free delivery of fresh milk to its customers in the vicinity. The milk is delivered in bottles, which are left at the buyers' premises, i.e. in front of the door. The dairy performs its obligation to deliver the goods by merely placing the bottles on the doormat, and there is no corresponding obligation on the buyer to actually take charge of the goods.

In addition, the buyer may also have to comply with a number of obligations arising from the particular agreement between the parties. There may, for example, be an obligation to allow the seller to have access to premises in order to install the goods or an obligation to pay export duties or to bear the cost of chartering a vessel. Additional obligations for the buyer will almost always be involved in mixed contracts, such as a contract for the sale of machinery and the provision of training in its operation.

B. Obligation to pay the price

The obligation to pay the price is essential for a sales contract in the strict sense. However, if parties agree to exchange goods for other goods, the present rules also apply to such a barter contract, see IV.A.–1:203 (Contract for barter).

The present rules do not contain provisions relating to the determination of the price, since such rules are already contained in Book II. See II.–9:104 (Determination of price), II.–9:105

(Unilateral determination by a party), II.–9:106 (Determination by a third person) and II.–9:107 (Reference to a non-existent factor). Nor do they contain provisions on the place and time for payment, the currency of payment or the formalities of payment since those matters are regulated in Book III. See III.–2:101 (Place of performance), III.–2:102 (Time of performance), III.–2:109 (Currency of payment) and III.–2:113 (Costs and formalities of performance). However, there is here one additional rule relating to the payment of the price: IV.A.–3:103 (Price fixed by weight).

If the buyer refuses to pay the price, the seller may sue for the price. However, the right to do so is qualified by III.–3:301 (Enforcement of monetary obligations) paragraph (2). If it is clear that the buyer does not want the goods, the seller cannot sue for the price if the seller could have arranged a substitute transaction without significant effort or expense, or performance would be unreasonable in the circumstances. If the seller cannot sue for the price, the seller will terminate the contractual relationship and sue for damages for the loss suffered as a result of the buyer's non-performance.

C. Obligation to take delivery of the goods

The present Article, and the more detailed provisions in Section 3, make it clear that the buyer is under an obligation to take delivery of the goods. It is important to note that this is a genuine obligation of the buyer, that is to say, that the buyer's failure to take delivery of the goods gives rise to remedies on the part of the seller.

Therefore the present rules do not embrace the idea of taking delivery as a soft obligation, which merely results in mora creditoris rather than an enforceable right to performance by the seller.

In practice, the seller's right to force the buyer to take delivery will seldom arise. To start with, a buyer who has actually paid the price will be unlikely to refuse to take delivery. The seller will only need to force the buyer to also take delivery in exceptional situations, for instance if the maintenance of the goods is expensive or if the goods take up too much storage space. Moreover, the seller will have extensive rights to deposit the goods at another place or to sell the property elsewhere, according to III.–2:111 (Property not accepted). If the buyer also refuses to pay the price the seller will probably first sue for the price (cf. Comment B). Finally, it has already been pointed out in Comment A above that the contract may not require the buyer to take delivery at all.

D. Obligation to take delivery of the documents

The contract may require the seller to transfer documents to the buyer. Basically, there are two groups of documents: those representing the goods; and those relating to the goods. Again, the contract has to answer the question of whether the buyer is under an obligation to take delivery of such documents.

E. Remedies of the seller

If the buyer fails to perform the obligations under the contract, the seller is entitled to the normal remedies for non-performance of an obligation.

NOTES

I. Determination of price

1. Under all systems, the buyer is obliged to pay the price. If no price has been agreed upon and the parties have not made any concrete indication as to how to calculate the price, there are two main approaches under the different systems. Firstly, the contract is regarded as void, or secondly the contract is still valid and it is presumed that the parties have agreed upon a reasonable price or a market price, etc.

2. Under the first group of systems the contract is void or it is considered that there is no contract at all if no price has been agreed upon (AUSTRIA CC § 1054; BELGIUM CC art. 1591; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 588; FRANCE CC art. 1591; GERMANY Hoeren and Martinek, Systematischer Kommentar zum Kaufrecht, 28; POLAND SN of 28 April 1988, OSPiKA no. 7-12 poz. 342, Korzan w glosie do uchwały SN of 05 February 1992, III CZP 134/92, Glosa 1994, no. 5, poz. 81; SLOVAKIA CC §§ 588 and 589; SLOVENIA LOA § 442(1); SPAIN CC arts. 1271, 1445, 1447-1449 and 1450). Nevertheless, this approach may be more or less strict. For instance, under POLISH law it is established that if it follows from the circumstances that the parties had in mind the price which is usual in relationships of a given kind, it is to be deemed, in case of doubt, that they meant the price at the place and time where and when the thing was to be released to the buyer (CC art. 536(2)). Also under CZECH law the price can be determined in various ways. It can be based on existing expertise (NS ČSR 3 Cz 8/86) but when there is no existing expertise at the time of the conclusion of the contract, the contract (legal act) is void and null due to vagueness (NS ČR 22 Cdo 1625/2002: this judgment overruled earlier case-law of NS ČSR 3 Cz 8/86). Moreover, the contracting parties can agree that the price will be determined by a third person; it is however not possible to agree that the price will be solely determined by one party (Knappová, Civil Law II[3], 171). Furthermore, under commercial law, the price is sufficiently determined when the contracting parties agree upon a maximum price limit and the concrete price is determined by the seller within this scope (NS ČR 29 Odo 503/2001). Finally under commercial sales, the contracting parties may during the negotiations express their intent to conclude the contract without determining the price and in such a case the seller may demand payment of the price for which identical or comparable goods were sold at the time when the contract was concluded under contractual terms similar to those contained in the contract (Ccom art. 448(2)).

3. Under the other systems the contract is still valid. Different approaches can be found as to how to determine the price. The parties are presumed to have agreed upon a reasonable price (PECL Art. 6:104; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 8(2); ESTONIA LOA § 28; FINLAND SGA § 45 and the Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 23; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:4; NORWAY SGA § 45 and Consumer Sales Act § 37(1); SWEDEN SGA § 45 and Consumer Sales Act § 35) or the market price (CISG art. 55; GREECE CC art. 530; LATVIA CC art. 2018; LITHUANIA). Under LATVIAN law, it is explicitly established that if the purchase was made at the market price, it is to be assumed that the average price at the location and time of concluding the contract was meant. But if there are no market prices at that location, the market prices of the nearest place of commerce is to be taken as a basis. Where price indexes exist, the price is to be determined according to the same (CC art. 2018). The determination of the market price may be entrusted to an indicated third person or, if one is not indicated, to the fair views of an objective specialist. The decision of a third person commits both parties, assuming that the price indicated is not unfair (CC art. 2019).

4. It may also generally be up to the seller to determine the price (CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom arts. 409(2) and 448(2); DENMARK SGA § 5; GERMANY CC § 316; GREECE CC art. 379; ITALY CC art. 1474) or only under commercial sales (SLOVAKIA Ccom arts. 409(2) and 448(2); SLOVENIA LOA § 442(2) and (3)). However, the seller's power is often limited in one way or another. Accordingly, the price requested for may not be unreasonable (DENMARK SGA § 5; GERMANY CC § 315) or the seller can only ask a purchase price for which the same or comparable goods would be sold at the time of the conclusion of the contract, under similar contractual conditions (SLOVAKIA Ccom arts. 409(2) and 448(2); SLOVENIA LOA § 442(2)). If there is no customary price, an appropriate price is applicable. The appropriate price is the daily price at the time of the conclusion of the contract; if this cannot be determined, the court determines the price considering all the circumstances of the case (SLOVENIA LOA § 442(2) and (3)). Under ITALIAN law it is presumed that the price is the habitual price charged by the seller. As a final choice, the price may be determined by a third party appointed by the competent tribunal (CC art. 1474).

5. Under SWEDISH law the HD has established that if one party alleges that a fixed price has been agreed upon, generally the burden of proof rests upon him in this respect (NJA 2001, 177).

6. The buyer is bound by the price in the invoice received unless he notifies the seller within a reasonable time that he does not accept it, or unless a lower price was expressly or implicitly agreed upon or the price required is unreasonable (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 47).

7. Finally, in NORWEGIAN consumer sales Consumer Sales Act § 37(3) establishes that the seller cannot claim a fee for issuing and dispatching an invoice in addition to the purchase price unless this follows clearly from the contract.

II. Time of payment

8. If the contract remains silent as to the time for payment, the different national systems provide different solutions.

9. The most common approach, based on either general contract law or a sales-specific regulation, is that the payment is due at the time of the delivery of the goods (CISG art. 58(1); BELGIUM CC art. 1651; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 28; FRANCE CC art. 1651; ITALY CC art. 1498(2); LATVIA CC art. 2033; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.39; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:26(2); POLAND CC art. 488; SLOVENIA LOA § 496(2); SPAIN CC art. 1500(2) and Ccom art. 339).

10. The payment may instead be linked to the conclusion of the contract. The time of payment is the time of the conclusion of the sales contract (GREECE CC art. 323) or the payment is due within a reasonable period of time after the conclusion of the contract (PECL art. 7:102). The parties may also be obliged to render performance without undue delay (CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA CC § 591) or immediately (GERMANY CC § 271(1)). Under some systems the buyer must pay upon demand by the seller (AUSTRIA CC § 904; CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom § 340(2); DENMARK SGA § 12; FINLAND SGA § 49(1) and the Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 24; NORWAY SGA § 49(1) and Consumer Sales Act § 38(1) and (2); SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 340(2); SWEDEN SGA § 49(1) and Consumer Sales Act § 36). However, even under those systems not principally linking the obligation to pay with the delivery, delivery and payment are mostly regarded as concurrent conditions, thus giving either party the right to refuse to perform unless the other party performs at the same time (cf. e.g. CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 560; GREECE CC art. 374). Similarly, it may also be established that the buyer does not have to pay the price before the goods are delivered (CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 591; FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 49(1)).

11. Under some systems, the buyer is generally not bound to pay the price until he has had an opportunity to examine the goods (CISG art. 58(3); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 591; ESTONIA LOA § 213(3); FINLAND SGA § 49(2) and the ConsProtA chap. 5 § 24(2); NORWAY SGA § 49(2); POLAND CC art. 544(2); SLOVAKIA CC § 591; SWEDEN SGA § 49(2)).

12. In NORWEGIAN consumer sales, Consumer Sales Act § 38(3) establishes that contract clauses obliging the buyer to pay the purchase price at a certain point in time regardless of whether or not the seller delivers the goods in due time are not binding on the consumer. Under ESTONIAN law, a clause requiring the buyer to make a prepayment in excess of 50% of the purchase price is not binding in consumer sales (LOA § 213(4)).

III. Place of payment

13. Generally, the place of performance is presumed to be the debtor's place of business, residence etc., unless the parties have agreed otherwise. For monetary performance, on the other hand, this is only exceptionally the rule. Hence, the place of payment varies under the different systems. Either the place of payment is the seller's or the buyer's place of business, residence etc., or the place of payment is the place of delivery.

14. The most common approach is that unless otherwise agreed the payment is to take place at the seller's place of business, residence etc. (PECL art. 7:101(a); CISG art. 57(1)(a); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 567(2) (only in the case of payment through bank or by a post service); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND by virtue of mercantile custom; GERMANY CC § 270(1); ESTONIA LOA § 85(2)1); GREECE CC art. 321; FINLAND SGA § 48(1); POLAND CC art. 454; NORWAY SGA § 48(1); SLOVAKIA CC § 567 and Ccom art. 335; SLOVENIA LOA §§ 295 and 496; SWEDEN SGA § 48(1)). Under ITALIAN law CC art. 1498(3) establishes that in case the price is not due at the moment of the delivery, the buyer can effect payment at the domicile of the seller.

15. Under a few systems the payment is to take place at the buyer's place of business or residence (AUSTRIA CC § 905(2); CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA CC § 567(1) and Ccom arts. 337(1) and 339(2)). In other words, the debtor, i.e. the buyer, has to send the money to the creditor, i.e. the seller. In principle, the place of performance remains the place of the debtor; he has performed if he transferred the money. However, under AUSTRIAN law this rule is slightly modified in that the buyer bears the risk and costs for sending the money (CC § 905(2)).

16. Moreover, under some systems it is established that under a sales contract, unless otherwise agreed upon, the payment takes place where the delivery is to be made (BELGIUM CC art. 1651; FRANCE CC art. 1651; ITALY CC art. 1498(2); LATVIA CC art. 2033; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.314; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:26(2); SPAIN CC art. 1500(2) and TS 15 March 1994, RAJ 1994/1983, TS 12 December 1997, RAJ 1997/8759, TS 18 February 1998, RAJ 1998/876). The same applies if the payment is to be made against the handing over of the goods or of the documents (CISG art. 57(1); ESTONIA LOA § 213(2)).

IV. Formalities of payment

17. Under most systems, no such specific regulation is provided for: see e.g. Sale of Goods Act 1979 for ENGLAND and SCOTLAND. Such an obligation may however be derived from the principle of good faith under many systems.

18. Under the CISG art. 54 it is established that the buyer's obligation to pay the price includes taking such steps and complying with such formalities as may be required under the contract or any laws and regulations to enable payment to be made. Under NORDIC law it is provided that the buyer's obligation to pay the price also includes the duty to accept a bill of exchange and furnish a letter of credit, a bank guarantee or other security according to the contract, or to take such measures which are necessary to enable payment (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 48(2)). Under DUTCH law CC art. 6:46 establishes that when a creditor accepts a cheque, an order of payment or other document offered to him by way of payment, it is presumed he does so under reservation of rights in case the payment does not take place. In ESTONIAN law the general provisions regarding the performance of monetary obligations (LOA § 91(1)), lays down that if the parties do not agree otherwise, any such obligation can be performed by making a payment in cash. If the creditor (the buyer) has a current account in a country where the monetary obligation is to be performed, the payment can be made by a wire transfer to that account, LOA § 91(2)). In POLAND the payment is effectively made if the seller receives cash or a transfer of money is recognised on his account. An order of payment as such does not constitute actual payment until the money is transferred to the account of the buyer (Judgement of the Supreme Court of 4 January 1995; III CZP 164/94, OSNIC 1995, poz. 62).

19. In SPAIN there is no rule on this point. However, as the obligation to perform (on the part both of the seller and of the buyer) is one of result (obligación de resultado), it is clear that the debtor has to take every measure necessary for the price to reach the vendor.

V. Obligation to take delivery

20. See Notes under IV.A.–3:104 (Taking delivery).

IV.A.–3:102: Determination of form, measurement or other features

(1) If under the contract the buyer is to specify the form, measurement or other features of the goods, or the time or manner of their delivery, and fails to make such specification either within the time agreed upon or within a reasonable time after receipt of a request from the seller, the seller may, without prejudice to any other rights, make the specification in accordance with any requirements of the buyer that may be known to the seller.

(2) A seller who makes such a specification must inform the buyer of the details of the specification and must fix a reasonable time within which the buyer may make a different specification. If, after receipt of such a communication, the buyer fails to do so within the time so fixed, the specification made by the seller is binding.

COMMENTS

A. General

The parties can agree upon the conclusion of the contract that the buyer has to make certain specifications relating to the goods to be sold. In principle, it is up to the buyer to make these specifications, which then become part of the standard of conformity. If the buyer fails to do so, however, the seller has a right to make the choice instead. Not only does this rule allow the seller to crystallise the contractual obligations under the contract in respect of delivery and conformity, but it also minimises the buyer's opportunities to avoid or delay performance of the buyer's obligations by failing to make the necessary specifications.

B. The seller's right to make specifications

The starting point for this Article is an agreement between the parties that allows the buyer to specify certain features of the goods, or the time or manner of their delivery, after the conclusion of the contract.

> Illustration 1
> B agrees to buy a car from S, to be delivered a month later. B is to specify the type of tyres she wants within a week. After a week, B has not contacted the seller, and S writes to the buyer to specify that the car will be delivered with standard tyres, and requests B to inform him within ten days if she does not agree with the choice. B does not reply. The seller's choice is then binding.

> Illustration 2
> S has sold a certain quantity of copper to be delivered over a period of three years in quarterly instalments to B. The buyer is to specify the quantity of every quarterly instalment by 'delivery orders' four weeks in advance. After a year B fails to do so. S may then make the specification in accordance with the procedure under this Article.

If the buyer fails to make the specifications, either within the time agreed upon or upon the request of the seller, the seller has a right to make the specification subject to certain requirements. First, the seller has to take into account any known requirements of the buyer, e.g. the intended use of the goods. Secondly, the seller has to follow the procedure set out in paragraph (2). Accordingly, the seller has to inform the buyer of the specification and provide a possibility to make a different choice. Then the buyer has some time to react, after the expiry of which the seller's choice becomes binding.

In addition to the right of specification, this Article makes it clear that the seller may also exercise any other rights, for instance claiming damages for any loss caused by the delay.

C. Consumer contract for sale

It is important to point out that the parties must have reached a binding agreement in the first place, in order for this Article to apply. In many cases, particularly a consumer contract for sale, the failure to agree on an important question, for instance the colour of a new car, will mean that there is no contract at all.

D. Relationship with Book III

The present Article, which reflects the CISG, is more specific than the rule in III.–2:105 (Alternative obligations or methods of performance) and displaces that rule to the extent of any inconsistency. (See I.–1:102 (Interpretation and development) paragraph (5) – special rule prevails over general rule.) It offers more safeguards to the buyer. According to III.–2:105 paragraph (2), the right to choose passes immediately to the seller if the delay in making a choice is fundamental; otherwise the seller is obliged first to give a notice determining an additional period of reasonable length in which the buyer must choose, before the right to choose passes to the seller.

NOTES

The seller's right to make specifications

1. Under most systems there is no corresponding regulation to the seller's right to make specifications: see e.g. Sale of Goods Act 1979 for ENGLAND and SCOTLAND. However, under a number of systems a sales-specific right to make specifications can be found (CISG art. 65; FINLAND SGA § 60; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:31; NORWAY SGA § 60; POLAND CC art. 549; SLOVENIA LOA § 519; SWEDEN SGA § 60). Under a few systems such a right may only be found under commercial sales (AUSTRIA Ccom § 375; CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 452; GERMANY Ccom § 375; SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 452). Under GREEK law this issue is regulated on a general level in CC art. 309.
2. Under a few systems specification may also be made by the court in such a situation (ESTONIA LOA § 26; GREECE CC art. 371).
3. In SPANISH law, CC art. 1452 III places the risk on the buyer from the time when specification is made in the case of a generic sale. Although the rule is silent as to the party competent to make this specification, scholars agree that the seller has this power, as a default rule (cf. López, Comentario del CC, Ministerio de Justicia, II, p. 898), and this opinion is strongly grounded in commercial sales (see Ccom art. 334.2). Were this power to be granted to the buyer in the contract, and if the buyer failed to carry out the specification, the rule states that the risk passes to the delaying party, but it remains dubious whether the power to individualise the sale shifts to the seller.

IV.A.–3:103: Price fixed by weight

If the price is fixed according to the weight of the goods, in case of doubt it is to be determined by the net weight.

COMMENTS

The parties may agree that the buyer has to pay a price based on the weight of the goods. In this case, the question is what constitutes the weight and, thus, the price due. The default rule is that weight refers to net weight.

Illustration 1
A Dutch supermarket chain concludes an agreement with a Greek farming co-operative for the delivery of original feta cheese from Greece during a period of one year. The parties agree on a price per kilo; the cheese is shipped in dark plastic boxes filled with a salty liquid to keep the Feta cheese fresh. It follows from this Article that the Dutch buyer, unless agreed otherwise, need pay only for the cheese, and not for the liquid and the packaging.

The reference to the agreement between the parties emphasises the subordinate role of the net-weight rule. Since it is a mere default rule, the parties are free to agree otherwise.

NOTES

Net weight price

1. If the price is fixed according to the weight of the goods, in case of doubt it is to be determined by the net weight. This principle is established under a number of systems (CISG art. 56; DENMARK SGA § 8; ESTONIA LOA § 213(1); FINLAND SGA § 46(2); HUNGARY CC § 366(2); ITALY Bianca, La vendita e la permuta, 319; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.313; NORWAY SGA § 46(2) and Consumer Sales Act § 37(2); SWEDEN SGA § 46(2)). The same applies to commercial sales under some systems (AUSTRIA and GERMANY Ccom § 380). Under SLOVENIAN law, this is an established trade usage under commercial sales (Splošne uzance za blagovni promet (General usances for merchandise), 1954, no. 160). There is no such rule in SCOTTISH law.
2. In SPAIN there is neither a rule on, nor a constructive general approach to, this issue. The diversity of situations and the existence of particular usages for different kinds of goods make the lack of a default rule reasonable.

IV.A.–3:104: Taking delivery

The buyer fulfils the obligation to take delivery by:

(a) doing all the acts which could reasonably be expected in order to enable the seller to perform the obligation to deliver; and

(b) taking over the goods, or the documents representing the goods, as required by the contract.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article requires the buyer to co-operate with the seller to enable delivery to be made and to actually take over the goods or documents. Thus, the notion of taking delivery is broader than the actual term may suggest. The rule is, like other rules not declared to be mandatory, a default rule. The contract may make other provision for the taking of delivery.

The buyer's obligation to take delivery is framed as an obligation that the seller, in principle, can enforce. However, as already noted, the buyer may not have to take any further steps in order to comply with the obligations under the contract. To start with, the goods may already be in the buyer's possession or it may have been agreed that they should remain in the seller's possession. Besides, the contract may not require the buyer to take the goods from the seller upon delivery, either because the seller merely has to deposit the goods at the buyer's premises (see Illustration 1 below), or because the seller has to deliver the goods to a third person. In either case, however, the buyer may still have to facilitate delivery by the seller (see Comment B).

B. Enabling the seller to deliver

According to sub-paragraph (a), the buyer must enable the seller to perform the obligation to deliver. In the default rule case where the seller's obligation to deliver is performed merely by making the goods available to the buyer at the seller's place of business (cf. IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery) paragraph (1)) this paragraph is not relevant; the buyer's obligation is to take the goods under sub-paragraph (b). However, where the contract provides for the seller to deliver in some other way, for example by bringing the goods to the buyer's premises, sub-paragraph (a) is crucial. The buyer is obliged to co-operate with the seller by taking such action as can reasonably be expected to enable the seller to deliver. This may include the designation of the precise place to which the seller should send the goods or having personnel ready to receive the goods. Likewise, the buyer may be obliged to co-operate in times of civil strife, special border controls, and the control of epidemics etc. In such cases, the buyer has to inform the seller of any special problems and of the required formalities to transfer the goods.

Sub-paragraph (a) also imposes obligations on the part of the buyer in cases where the buyer does not have to take charge of the goods or documents (see Comment A). Thus, the seller can force the buyer to co-operate in performing the obligation to deliver the goods.

The parties may agree that the seller, a quarry, has to deliver a quantity of marble tiles by delivering them to the construction site operated by the buyer, a building constructor. In this case, the seller delivers the goods by a unilateral act, which does not require the buyer to take delivery. However, the buyer still has to co-operate with the seller with a view to enabling him to make the delivery, by telling him where the premises are and the times at which they are accessible.

C. Taking over the goods or the documents

The buyer's obligation to take over the goods or documents under sub-paragraph (b) corresponds to the functional definition of delivery in IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery) paragraph (1), which requires the seller to make the goods available to the buyer, something which can be achieved by different methods (for examples, see IV.A.–2:201 Comment C).

By and large, the buyer's obligation to take delivery mirrors the seller's obligation to deliver. Accordingly, taking over can mean different things. To start with, both parties interact directly: the seller hands over the goods, or keys, which the buyer takes over, i.e. by assuming physical control of the goods. If the seller does not hand over the goods, but otherwise makes them available to the buyer (for example, by preparing the goods for collection at a factory), the buyer takes over by collecting the goods made available by the seller. Finally, the seller can transfer the documents representing the goods, which the buyer may have to take over.

In all these cases, the seller performs the obligation to deliver as the buyer takes over the goods or documents from the seller. However, taking over the goods by the buyer does not necessarily coincide with delivery by the seller. The parties may, for instance, agree that the buyer does not have to collect the goods placed at the buyer's disposal. Moreover, the seller can deliver by taking other measures to enable the buyer to take over the goods from a third party; thus, the buyer eventually takes over the goods from that party. The same holds true in the case of the carriage of the goods under IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery) paragraph (2).

D. Failure to take over the goods or documents

If, under this Article, the buyer fails to take delivery at the place and time determined by IV.A.–2:202 (Place and time for delivery), the seller can exercise the normal remedies for non-performance of an obligation. In practice, the seller will sue the buyer for the purchase price rather than for not taking delivery, unless the right to recover the price is excluded by III.–3:301 (Enforcement of monetary obligations) paragraph (2). The buyer will normally take over the goods for which payment has been made. If the buyer fails to do so the seller may dispose of the goods under III.–2:111 (Property not accepted). This means that the seller can either deposit or sell the goods subject to a notification procedure. Another important consequence is the fact that, in a non-consumer contract, the risk passes to the buyer according to IV.A.–5:201 (Goods placed at buyer's disposal). If the goods are lost or damaged during the period of delay, the buyer still has to pay the full price.

This obligation also applies to contracts involving the carriage of goods where delivery is made in accordance with IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery) paragraph (2): first, the buyer has to take charge of the documents representing the goods from the seller, and, secondly, the buyer has to take charge of the goods delivered by the carrier. This second obligation can be justified as follows. The seller, when concluding a contract with a carrier, has an interest in the buyer taking over the goods from the carrier, as the seller may otherwise be liable to the carrier for freight and demurrage.

NOTES

I. Enforceability of the obligation to take delivery

1. Under most systems the buyer has an express or implied duty to take over the goods. However, there are great differences as to the consequences of the buyer's breach under the different systems, mainly as to the question of whether the seller can ask for specific performance or termination. Nevertheless, one should not forget that in practice the differences will be minor under the different systems, since generally the seller will prefer to ask for the price and not for the buyer to take delivery.

2. Under some systems the buyer's obligation to take delivery is regarded as a main obligation, which the seller generally can enforce through a court order if the buyer fails to take over the goods (CISG art. 62; BELGIUM CC art. 1184; ESTONIA LOA § 208(1); FRANCE CC art. 1657; GERMANY CC § 433(2); HUNGARY CC § 365(1); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.346) or under commercial sales only (CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 453). In ENGLAND, while the seller cannot compel the buyer to take delivery by specific performance, he is entitled to damages for non-acceptance of the goods (Sale of Goods Act s. 37(1)). The same provision applies in SCOTLAND, where specific performance would probably also be refused because damages would be considered an adequate remedy. Under HUNGARIAN law where the buyer fails to take delivery of the goods without a legitimate reason, amounting to breach of contract, the seller may elect between the remedies available in case of late performance by the obligee (mora creditoris) and those available in case of supervening impossibility of performance (see Kisfaludi, Az adásvételi szerződés[2], 160).

3. Under other systems, the main obligation of the buyer is considered to be the payment of the purchase price. Hence, the buyer's obligation to take over the goods cannot generally be enforced by the seller (AUSTRIA CC § 1062; Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II, 57; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 522; FINLAND SGA § 51(2); NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:58; NORWAY SGA § 51(2); POLAND, Radwański (-Katner), System Prawa Prywatnego VII[2], 91; SLOVENIA Cigoj, Komentar, 1524; SWEDEN SGA § 51(2)). The buyer's refusal to take over the goods nevertheless results in unfavourable consequences for him, the main one being that he will bear the risk for the goods. In SPAIN the main obligation of the buyer is considered to be the payment of the purchase price (CC art. 1500) but where the buyer does not take delivery, rules of mora credendi are applied; taking up the sold asset is not a duty, but a "burden". The seller is not entitled to specific performance of a so called "duty to take delivery", but only to fulfil the seller's own obligation through judicial deposit of the goods (legal consignation), or to rescission (CC art. 1176 and Ccom art. 332).

4. Under some systems it is unclear whether the buyer's duty to take delivery is enforceable or not (GREECE; ITALY Bianca, La vendita e la permuta, 432).

II. Termination due to refusal to take delivery

5. Under a number of systems, the seller may terminate the contract if the buyer refuses to take over the goods. Ending the contract takes place automatically and without summons, to the benefit of the seller, after the expiration of the time agreed for collecting the goods (BELGIUM and FRANCE CC art. 1657). Under SLOVENIAN law the seller may terminate the contract if the buyer refuses to take delivery and the seller has reason to believe that the buyer is not going to pay the price (LOA § 499(2)). Under some systems the seller may terminate the contract if he has fixed an additional reasonable period of time within which the buyer must take over the goods and the buyer does not take over within this time (ESTONIA LOA § 116(2) 5; GERMANY CC § 323(1)). Under NORDIC law, the seller may only terminate the contract if he has a special interest in getting rid of the goods (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 55(2) no 2.) This can for example be the case if the object of sale is a house to be demolished, leftover building material from a building site, goods from a warehouse that has to be emptied, or toxic industrial waste from the seller's business sold for recycling (SWEDEN Prop 1988/89, 167 f). For commercial sales, this rule is explicitly set out in the SPANISH Ccom art. 332.

IV.A.–3:105: Early delivery and delivery of excess quantity

(1) If the seller delivers all or part of the goods before the time fixed, the buyer may take delivery or, except where acceptance of the tender would not unreasonably prejudice the buyer's interests, refuse to take delivery.

(2) If the seller delivers a quantity of goods greater than that provided for by the contract, the buyer may retain or refuse the excess quantity.

(3) If the buyer retains the excess quantity it is regarded as having been supplied under the contract and must be paid for at the contractual rate.

(4) In a consumer contract for sale paragraph (3) does not apply if the buyer believes on reasonable grounds that the seller has delivered the excess quantity intentionally and without error, knowing that it had not been ordered. In such a case the rules on unsolicited goods apply.

COMMENTS

A. Scope

It is already clear that the buyer is under an obligation to take delivery. This Article, however, addresses two special situations: the seller may deliver too early or too much. In both cases, the question arises whether, and to what extent, the buyer is also under an obligation to take delivery of the goods tendered early or the excess quantity.

While this Article establishes a right of the buyer to refuse or take delivery, it also relates to the buyer's obligation to take delivery (as the buyer may, for instance, have to accept the early tender by the seller where the buyer's interests are not unreasonably prejudiced). Moreover, paragraph (3) creates an obligation for the buyer to pay for any excess quantity accepted.

This regulation does not apply in the opposite situations where the seller delivers late or a lesser quantity than agreed upon. For cases where the seller delivers late the general regime in Book III on remedies for non-performance of obligations applies. Where the seller delivers a lesser quantity than agreed upon this will be a non-conformity and the buyer will have the remedies in Book III as modified in Chapter 4 of this Part.

B. Early delivery

There may be cases where the seller delivers all or part of the goods too early. Here, the buyer has a choice (paragraph (1)). On the one hand, the buyer can take delivery, which will allow the seller a right to cure any lack of conformity up until the due date of delivery according to IV.A.–2:203 (Cure in case of early delivery). On the other hand, the buyer can refuse to take delivery; in which case the seller has to deliver once again at the time agreed. This right of refusal is, however, subject to an important restriction, since the buyer must not refuse early delivery if doing so would not unreasonably prejudice the buyer's interests.

Illustration 1
C, a building contractor, orders a set of steel pipes to be delivered to his construction site at noon. If the seller delivers the materials at 10 am, C must not refuse delivery. This may, however, be different if the seller delivers a day earlier or if the construction site is bustling with activity which prevents the buyer from taking delivery at that time.

C. Excess quantity

There may be cases where the seller delivers more than was agreed upon. Here, the buyer can chose between two possibilities. On the one hand, the buyer can refuse delivery of the excess quantity (paragraph (2), which merely confirms what would be the case in any event). On the other hand, the buyer can choose to take delivery of all or part of the excessive amount. Doing so can be considered as a new offer of conforming goods that goes beyond the initial contract. As a consequence, the buyer also has to pay for the excess amount accepted at the contractual rate (see paragraph (3)).

> Illustration 2
> A, a restaurant owner, buys 10,000 serviettes from S. Upon delivery, it turns out that S has delivered 12,000 instead. According to paragraph (2), A can either refuse the extra 2,000 (and take delivery of the agreed amount), or take delivery of all or part of the excess amount and pay at the contractual rate.

The delivery of an excess quantity falls under the ambit of lack of conformity (cf. IV.A.–2:301 (Conformity with the contract) sub-paragraph (a)). Nevertheless, it should be pointed out that this provision constitutes a special regulation in the case of excess delivery, thus overriding the seller's right to cure under III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules). The seller is thus not permitted to cure the lack of conformity through taking back the excess quantity (which the seller might want to do if prices have unexpectedly risen). It is up to the buyer to decide whether to retain or refuse the excess quantity. The decision would have to be made within a reasonable time. The buyer could lose the right to retain the goods unless the seller was notified of the non-conformity within a reasonable time. See III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing) and, for non-consumer cases, III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity) and IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity).

D. Relationship with rule on early performance in Book III

The general rule in III.–2:103 (Early performance) paragraph (1) establishes the right to decline an early tender, which applies unless the early performance "would not cause the creditor unreasonable prejudice". Paragraph (2) makes it clear that acceptance of early performance does not affect the time fixed for the performance by the creditor of any reciprocal obligation.

The present rule can be considered an extension of this general rule in several respects. First, it also provides explicitly for the buyer's right to accept early delivery. Secondly, it addresses cases of excess quantity. And, finally, it sets out the buyer's obligation to pay for an extra delivery, corresponding to the right to accept it.

NOTES

I. Early delivery

1. If the seller delivers too early the buyer may take delivery or refuse to take delivery (CISG art. 52(1); HUNGARY CC § 282(2); SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 464). Nevertheless, the buyer may still be under an obligation to take care of the goods as part of his duty to preserve the goods in the case of goods which are to be transported to the buyer. Hence, if goods dispatched to the buyer have been placed at his disposal at their destination and he exercises the right to reject them, he must take possession on behalf of the seller, provided that this can be done without the payment of the price and without unreasonable inconvenience or unreasonable expense. This provision does not apply if the seller or a person authorised to take charge of the goods on his behalf is present at the destination (CISG art. 86; FINLAND and SWEDEN SGA § 73(2)).

2. Under other systems, specific regulation of this situation is found under general contract law. Under HUNGARIAN law the obligor (seller) is entitled to perform his obligations under the contract (i.e. to tender delivery) before the time fixed in the contract only if the buyer consents to the premature performance (CC § 282(2)). If the buyer did not consent, he is still under an obligation to take care of the goods – at the expense and risk of the seller. In the NETHERLANDS, a fixed time in a contract is presumed to protect only the debtor to the obligation, allowing him to perform earlier if he sees fit (cf. CC art. 6:39(1)). This implies that the buyer would not be entitled to refuse to take delivery without being in default. Similarly under SLOVENIAN general contract law the debtor may perform before the time of performance, if the time has been agreed upon "solely in the interest of the debtor" (LOA § 290(1)). The debtor has to notify the creditor of his intent. He is not entitled to perform at an 'inappropriate' time. In all other cases, the creditor can refuse an early performance or accept it; in the latter case he can reserve the right to damages (LOA § 290(2)). ESTONIAN contract law contains a general provision according to which the creditor (the buyer) can refuse to accept early performance only if it has a valid ground for refusal (LOA § 84(1)). Under CZECH commercial law Ccom art. 342 provides regulation regarding time of performance determined to one party's advantage. Firstly, where the time of performance is determined to the advantage of debtor, the creditor is not entitled to demand performance of the obligation prior to this time; the debtor, however, may perform his obligation earlier than at the determined time. Secondly, where the time is determined to the advantage of creditor the previous rule applies vice versa. Thirdly, where the time of performance is determined to the advantage of both parties, the creditor may not demand performance of the obligation, and the debtor may not perform the obligation earlier than at the determined time. Based on case-law, earlier performance (delivery) does not change the contracted time of performance of the obligation (NS ČR 29 Odo 114/2003).

3. Under SPANISH and POLISH law this issue is not specifically regulated. Nevertheless, in SPAIN the time of delivery is presumed to be for the benefit of both parties (CC art. 1127). Consequently, it could be said that the buyer can refuse to take early delivery.

II. Right to refuse excess quantity

4. Generally, it is up to the buyer to decide whether he wants to accept or refuse the excess quantity. Under some systems this is expressly provided (CISG art. 52(2); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 442(1); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.330; SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 442(1); SLOVENIA LOA § 473). It might also follow from general contract law or general legal principles (BELGIUM; SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 464). Similarly under HUNGARIAN law where this can be implied from general rules that the excess quantity constitutes a new offer and the buyer can refuse delivery or take it and pay for it at the contractual rate. The literature does not deal with the problem. In SPAIN if the buyer keeps excess goods, general rules of interpretation apply as to the existence and scope of an implied contract. Under GERMAN law legal literature qualifies excess quantity as non-performance (Hoeren and Martinek, Systematischer Kommentar zum Kaufrecht, § 434 (102)).

5. Under ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law, the buyer is entitled to reject the whole delivery under certain conditions. The buyer may accept the goods included in the contract and reject the rest, or he may, if the excess is more than trivial, reject the whole (Sale of Goods Act s. 30(2)(A) and (D)). In ENGLAND the right to reject the whole under consumer sales applies whether or not the deviation is trivial (Sale of Goods Act s. 30(2A)).

6. Under some systems, this situation is regulated more elaborately. In LITHUANIA the buyer must give notice to the seller within the time-limit specified by laws or in the contract or, where there is no fixed time-limit, within a reasonable time. If, upon receipt of the buyer's notice, the seller fails to notify, within a reasonable time, further actions that should be taken, the buyer has the right to take delivery of all goods or refuse to take the excess quantity, unless otherwise provided in the contract (CC art. 6.330). Under SLOVENIAN law the buyer may refuse the excess quantity within an appropriate time. If he fails to do so in a commercial sales contract, he must pay the same price for the exceeding quantity. If the buyer refuses to take the excess quantity, the seller is liable for damages (LOA § 473(1) and (2)).

III. Determination of the price for the excess quantity

7. The buyer must pay for the exceeding quantity at the contract rate (CISG art. 52(2); CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom art. 442(2); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 30(3); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.330; SLOVAKIA Ccom art. 442(2); SLOVENIA LOA § 473(1)). In applying the general regulation for determining the price, the same result is reached under NORDIC law (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 45(1)).

CHAPTER 4: REMEDIES

Section 1: Limits on derogation

IV.A.–4:101: Limits on derogation from remedies for non-conformity in a consumer contract for sale

In a consumer contract for sale, any contractual term or agreement concluded with the seller before a lack of conformity is brought to the seller's attention which directly or indirectly waives or restricts the remedies of the buyer provided in Book III, Chapter 3 (Remedies for Non-performance), as modified in this Chapter, in respect of the lack of conformity is not binding on the consumer.

COMMENTS

A. Scope of Chapter

The starting point for the rules in this Chapter is that, in the event of the non-performance of any obligation by either party under the contract, the aggrieved party may resort to the remedies contained in Book III, Chapter 3 for non-performance of an obligation. However, the Chapter provides a few sales-specific rules on remedies which deviate from the general regime.

B. Changes to the regime of remedies provided by Book III

There are not many deviations from the rules on remedies contained in Book III, Chapter 3. Those rules are generally suitable for application to non-performance of obligations under a contract for sale. Some of the deviations are designed to provide greater protection for consumers who are sold defective goods. Others are designed to provide greater certainty and speed of action in relation to defective goods in commercial sales.

Section 1 contains only one modification of the general remedial regime. Its effect is to limit, in relation to a consumer contract for sale, the parties' freedom to derogate from the normal rules on remedies for non-conformity.

Section 2 contains two sales-specific rules on a buyer's remedies for lack of conformity. One extends the right of a consumer buyer to terminate the contractual relationship for non-performance. The other limits the liability of a consumer seller in certain situations.

Finally, Section 3 contains a special regime concerning the buyer's duty of examination and notification in relation to a lack of conformity. It is not applicable to consumer contracts for sale and is designed to increase certainty in commercial sales by ensuring that defects are notified promptly and that sellers know within a certain time whether they are going to be exposed to claims of non-conformity.

C. Derogation

This Article attempts to set out the limits of derogation for consumer sales concerning the buyer's remedies for non-conformity. It is complemented by IV.A.–2:309 (Limits on derogation from conformity rights in a consumer contract for sale), which sets out a similar provision for the conformity of the goods. The Article is one of the exceptions to the general principle of freedom of contract.

To have mandatory protection in favour of the consumer regarding remedies follows the approach of the Consumer Sales Directive. Moreover, the consumer will generally only negotiate on the price of the goods and not concerning which remedies will be available when there is a lack of conformity in the goods.

In a consumer sale, the buyer's rights under Book III, as slightly modified by this Chapter, in respect of the lack of conformity cannot be waived or restricted by agreement with the seller before the consumer notifies the seller of the defect. After that time, the parties are free to agree upon other solutions than those envisaged in this Chapter. For instance, the buyer, even if a consumer, should be able to agree to pay part of the cost of a repair which under the normal rules the seller would be bound to provide free of charge (cf. III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations)) paragraph (2). Such an agreement would, however, not be possible before the buyer notifies the seller of the lack of conformity.

This Article prevents the seller from restricting the remedies of a consumer buyer for non-conformity beforehand, for instance in standard terms. For example, the seller cannot exclude in advance the consumer's right to damages, price reduction or termination if the normal requirements for them are fulfilled.

NOTES

I. General vs. sales-specific remedies of the buyer

1. The dividing line between sales law and other areas of the law, notably the general law of obligations, is sometimes difficult to determine. In some countries, the Civil Code provides a general remedies regime for non-performance (BELGIUM CC art. 1184; CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 507, 517 and 522; ESTONIA LOA §§ 100-118; HUNGARY CC §§ 298-318; ITALY CC arts. 1218, 1453 and 2930; NETHERLANDS CC arts. 6:74 ff and 6:265 ff; POLAND CC arts. 471-497; SLOVAKIA CC § 507; SLOVENIA LOA §§ 101-111 et al.; SPAIN CC arts. 1124 and 1101 ff) and/or for delivery which is not in conformity (BELGIUM CC arts. 1610-1611 (which in fact repeat the general principle stipulated in CC art. 1184(2)); FRANCE CC arts. 1610-1611, providing for a choice between specific performance and termination and a general right to damages). AUSTRIAN law has a general regime for non-performance with respect to contracts where goods are exchanged for a price (see §§ 922 ff, the so-called Gewährleistung). On the one hand, this regime is more specific than a general system of non-performance in that it distinguishes between different types of non-performance rather than using one unified system/notion of non-performance. It is, on the other hand, broader than just sales law as it applies also to contracts for works, barter etc. Other systems provide no general regime, only sales-specific rules (NORDIC COUNTRIES; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND).

2. The systems which provide for a general remedies regime normally additionally provide for sales-specific rules. Under some systems, the different regimes provide for concurring rules. Here, the buyer may choose between the general rules and sales-specific regulation (SLOVENIA Juhart and Plavšak (-Juhart), Obligacijski zakonik II, 361; In SPAIN specific rules should have to be applied first, but jurisprudence has extended the general rules by the doctrine of aliud pro alio, leaving the special rules to be applied only in marginal cases, and mainly to dismiss the claim as being out of time; in cases relating to sales of built flats and premises, the specific rules have become totally inapplicable in practice; (BELGIUM; GREECE A.P.662/1991 EEN 1992, 373). In ITALY, on the other hand, the remedies for the two regimes have been merged through case law (see e.g. Cass.civ. 26 April 1991 no. 4564) and legal literature (see e.g. Bianca, Diritto Civile V, 41). In other systems some rules (notably termination and damages) are dealt with on a general level whereas others (notably repair and replacement) are dealt with in the sales sections (CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 507, 517 and 522 (general regime) and § 597 (sales regime); ESTONIA LOA § 222; GERMANY CC §§ 439 and 441; NETHERLANDS CC arts. 7:20-22 and 7:24-25; SLOVAKIA CC § 597). In POLAND, the sales-specific rules are complemented by the general rules on non-performance.

3. Under AUSTRIAN and HUNGARIAN law, however, there is only a general regulation on non-conformity applicable for all contracts for consideration. Under HUNGARIAN law only the rules for legal non-conformity are sales-specific (CC §§ 369-370).

4. Cf. further the Notes to IV.A.–4:201 (Termination by consumer for lack of conformity) for the sales-specific remedies for lack of conformity.

II. Overview of remedies for the seller

5. If the buyer fails to pay the price the seller has several remedies available.

6. To start with, the seller has a right to ask for performance, that is payment of the price (CISG art. 62; PECL art. 9:101; AUSTRIA CC § 918(1); BELGIUM CC art. 1184; CZECH REPUBLIC Ccom arts. 366 and 453; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 49; ESTONIA LOA § 108(1); FINLAND SGA §§ 51 and 52; GERMANY CC § 433(2); LATVIA CC art. 1587; NETHERLANDS CC art. 3:296; NORWAY SGA § 51; SLOVAKIA Ccom arts. 366 and 453; SLOVENIA LOA § 496; SPAIN CC arts. 1101 ff, 1096 and 1124; SWEDEN SGA § 51).

7. The parties' obligations are typically concurrent conditions; thus, unless agreed otherwise, the seller may refuse to deliver the object of sale if the buyer fails to pay the purchase price on time (AUSTRIA CC § 1062; BELGIUM CC art. 1612; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 591; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 28; ESTONIA LOA § 111; FINLAND SGA § 10; FRANCE CC arts. 1612-1613; GERMANY CC § 320; LATVIA CC art. 2033; NORWAY SGA § 10; POLAND CC art. 488(2); SLOVAKIA CC § 591; SLOVENIA LOA § 455; SWEDEN SGA § 10). Under some systems this follows from the applicability of the general rules of contract law (NETHERLANDS cf. CC art. 6:262; SPAIN CC art. 1466).

8. The seller may also ask for damages (CISG arts. 74-77; AUSTRIA CC § 918(1); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 519 and Ccom art. 367; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 37(1); ESTONIA LOA § 115; FINLAND SGA §§ 51 and 57; GERMANY CC §§ 433(2), 280(1); LATVIA CC art. 1779; NETHERLANDS CC arts. 6:74 ff; NORWAY SGA § 51; POLAND CC art. 491(1); SLOVAKIA CC § 519 and Ccom arts. 367 and 368; SLOVENIA LOA §§ 239(2), 378 and 380; SPAIN CC art. 1101; SWEDEN SGA § 51).

9. Finally, the seller may ask for termination (CISG art. 64; AUSTRIA CC § 918(1); BELGIUM CC arts. 1184 and 1654, CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 517(1); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 48; ESTONIA LOA § 116; FINLAND SGA §§ 51, 54 and 55; FRANCE CC art. 1654; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.345; NETHERLANDS CC arts. 6:265 ff and for consumer sale CC art. 7:22; NORWAY SGA § 51; POLAND CC art. 491(1); SLOVAKIA CC § 517(1) and Ccom art. 367; SLOVENIA LOA § 103; SPAIN CC arts. 1101, 1124 and 1503-1506; SWEDEN SGA § 51).

10. Under many systems the seller may only terminate if the seller has fixed an additional reasonable period for performance, and the buyer does not pay within that period (CISG art. 64(1)(b); AUSTRIA CC § 918(1); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 517(1); ESTONIA LOA § 116(2) 5); FINLAND SGA § 54(2); GERMANY CC § 323(1); NORWAY SGA § 54(2); POLAND CC art. 491(1); SLOVAKIA CC § 517(1); SWEDEN SGA § 54(2)). Under some systems the same holds true unless there was a fixed period for performance or the buyer has unambiguously indicated that he would not perform his obligation (NETHERLANDS CC arts. 6:81-83; SLOVENIA LOA §§ 105 and 106). Under other systems the court is given the power to determine an additional time for performance (FRANCE CC art. 1655; SPAIN CC art. 1124(3)).

11. The gravity of the breach is also influential under some systems. The seller may terminate if the delay constitutes a fundamental breach of contract (CISG art. 64(1)(a); BELGIUM CFI Brussels 27 September 1996, Res Jur. Imm. 1997, 177; CFI Ypres 27 June 1995, AJT 1995-96, 4, Antwerp 3 June 1998, Limb. Rechtsl. 1998, 223; Bergen 23 November 1994, JT 1995, 321; ESTONIA LOA § 116(1); FINLAND SGA § 54(1); FRANCE Cass.civ. I, 4 January 1995, Bull.civ. I, no. 14; D. 1995, 405; NORWAY SGA § 54(1); SPAIN CC art. 1124 and case law requiring a "breach that frustrates the purpose of the contract" (see Carrasco Perera, ZEuP 2006, pp. 552 ff; SWEDEN SGA § 54(1)). Under ENGLISH law the refusal to pay the price must be material. In SCOTLAND a court warrant is preferred (Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], § 128).

12. The seller may also be barred from terminating if the goods have already come into the buyer's possession. If so, the seller may only terminate the contract if he has reserved the right to do so or if the buyer rejects the goods (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 54(4)). Similarly under AUSTRIAN commercial sales, if the seller has handed over the goods and deferred payment he cannot terminate the contract (EVHGB § 8 no. 21).

13. Under some systems, however, the seller's right of termination is more generous under sales law than according to general contract law for sales concerning specific goods. Thus the termination of the contract takes place automatically and without summons, to the benefit of the seller, after the expiration of the time agreed for payment (BELGIUM and FRANCE CC art. 1657). Concerning movable goods that need not be registered to constitute transfer of property, which is still in the same condition as when delivered to the buyer and neither 6 weeks have elapsed since the claim for payment became due nor 60 days have elapsed since delivery, in the NETHERLANDS the seller may exercise the specific right of revindication under CC arts. 7:39 ff, provided that the requirements to terminate the contract under CC art. 6:265 have been met; specific provisions protecting a subsequent buyer's rights apply, preventing the execution of the right in such a situation.

14. In SPAIN there are special provisions for specific types of sale. In instalment sales of goods the Instalment Sales Act 1998 art. 11 requires non-performance of at least two instalments before there can be rescission. Under CC art. 1504, the seller may not have the sale of an immovable terminated for the mere failure to meet the agreed time for performance, and the buyer is entitled to pay in so far the seller has not served a notarial or judicial notice of termination.

III. Exclusion or limitation of the seller's liability

15. Under all systems the regulation of remedies under consumer sales is mandatory in favour of the consumer as a result of the requirements in Consumer Sales Directive art. 7(1).

16. However, some systems provide for more specific regulations with respect to remedies. For instance, under GERMAN law, even though the remedies regulation in general is mandatory in favour of the consumer (CC § 475(1)), this does not apply to the right to damages (CC § 475(3)). Similarly under SWEDISH law, the parties may agree that the seller's obligation to pay damages shall not extend to losses in commercial activities (Consumer Sales Act § 32(3)).

17. Under a few systems any clause purporting to alter the order of remedies provided (first repair or replacement, then a price reduction or termination) to the detriment of the consumer is null and void in consumer contracts (ESTONIA LOA § 237(1); FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-17; HUNGARY CC § 306(5)). In the NETHERLANDS it is unclear whether such a derogation would be null and void, or merely avoidable, which under CC art. 3:40 would be the normal consequence of derogations to the detriment of a protected party, but difficult to reconcile with the Consumer Sales Directive (cf. Mon. NBW B-65b (Loos), no. 3). Under BELGIAN law, legal literature accepts clauses that set the hierarchy of remedies aside and leave the choice of remedies up to the consumer. Clauses which alter the order of remedies set forth in consumer sales law and limit the choice of remedies of the consumer are, however, not accepted.

18. In SPAIN, waiver of remedies is allowed, unless the debtor was aware of the lack of conformity or there was some fraud in the non-performance (CC arts. 1102 and 1485).

Section 2: Modifications of buyer's remedies for lack of conformity

IV.A.–4:201: Termination by consumer for lack of conformity.

In a consumer contract for sale, the buyer may terminate the contractual relationship for non-performance under Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5 (Termination) in the case of any lack of conformity, unless the lack of conformity is minor.

COMMENTS

A. Normal remedies of buyer for non-conformity

This section contains two modifications of the buyer's normal remedies under Book II, Chapter 3. Both relate to remedies for non-conformity – i.e. where the goods do not conform to the contract. Other types of non-performance on the part of the seller, such as delayed performance or no delivery at all, fall under the general regime of remedies for non-performance of obligations in Book III, Chapter 3.

There are some general restrictions on the availability of remedies. For example, Book III, Chapter 3, Section 2 has provisions on cure of a non-conforming performance by the person who is bound to perform – in this case the seller. The effect is to introduce a certain hierarchy of responses by the buyer into the remedial structure: the buyer must normally first give the seller an opportunity to cure the non-conformity before resorting to any remedy other than a temporary withholding of payment. Book III also has an Article (III.–3:107: Failure to notify non-conformity) which for non-consumer cases requires the person entitled to performance – in this case the buyer – to notify the other party within a reasonable time of a lack of conformity if remedies for the non-conformity are to be retained. For commercial sales this is supplemented by IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity) of the present Chapter. It must also be borne in mind that the general rule in III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing) may have the effect of precluding a buyer, whether or not a consumer, from exercising a remedy which would otherwise be available. For example, if a buyer inexcusably failed to notify the seller of a defect for an altogether unreasonable length of time with the effect that the seller was seriously prejudiced by the delay then, quite apart from the specific rules on notification, the buyer might be precluded by the general rule on good faith and fair dealing from founding on the non-conformity.

B. Overview of buyer's remedies for lack of conformity

The first Article of Section 2 provides an overview of the remedies available to the buyer, subject to the qualifications noted above, in the case of a lack of conformity. It does so by referring to the applicable remedies under Book III, Chapter 3, while making it clear that in a few respects these remedies may be modified by the present Chapter. In the context of a contract for sale the available remedies are as follows.

Remedying the lack of conformity. The buyer may, subject to the restrictions noted above (and particularly the provision on first allowing the creditor an opportunity to cure the non-conformity voluntarily), enforce performance by having the seller ordered to remedy the lack of conformity free of charge by repair or replacement. The details of this right are elaborated in III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations), which contains certain restrictions on the availability of the remedy. The choice between repair or replacement is the seller's.

Withholding performance. In the event of a lack of conformity, the buyer can withhold performance under III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation). This remedy does not by itself cure, or provide compensation for, the lack of conformity. It rather serves as a means of exerting pressure in order to obtain other remedies. The buyer can refuse to pay until the non-conformity is remedied. This remedy can be used even if the seller has been given an opportunity to cure the non-conformity (see III.–3:204 (Consequences of allowing debtor opportunity to cure) paragraph (1).

Termination of the contractual relationship. The buyer may, subject to the restrictions noted above, terminate the contractual relationship with the seller under the rules in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5 (Termination). The effect is that if there is a fundamental non-performance, or a reasonably anticipated fundamental non-performance, by the seller of the latter's obligations under the sales contract the buyer can escape from the contract, refuse to pay and safely buy the goods elsewhere without any fear that the seller will insist on the buyer taking delivery and paying for the goods. This right is extended for consumers by IV.A.–4:201 (Termination by consumer for lack of conformity) so that in a consumer contract for sale the buyer may terminate for any non-conformity unless the lack of conformity is minor. This is a very considerable relaxation in favour of consumers of the normal requirement that a non-performance be fundamental. It is also possible that the buyer merely terminates part of the contractual relationship in accordance with III.–3:506 (Scope of right to terminate).

Price reduction. The buyer is entitled to a price reduction, again subject to the restrictions noted above, The details of this remedy are elaborated in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 6.

Damages. The buyer may, again subject to the restrictions noted above, claim damages for the lack of conformity. In this context, it is important to note that the buyer may always claim damages for any loss not remedied by the seller's cure (see expressly III.–3:204 (Consequences of allowing debtor opportunity to cure) paragraph (3).

C. Extended right to terminate

The present Article extends the right of a consumer buyer to terminate the contractual relationship with the seller. Normally under Book III, Chapter 3 only a fundamental non-performance (defined in the Annex of definitions) would justify termination. This Article enables the consumer buyer to terminate for any lack of conformity, provided it is not minor.

While this may seem rather drastic, it should not be overlooked that the provisions on the seller's right to cure mean that the buyer can generally not terminate immediately (see III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules) and III.–3:204 (Consequences of allowing debtor opportunity to cure)).

Generally, it can be said that the threshold for a minor lack of conformity is below that of a fundamental lack of conformity. A minor lack of conformity constitutes a lack of conformity of slight importance, or a defect which is relatively small in relation to the overall value of the product. It should be presumed that small scratches and other purely cosmetic defects are normally considered to be minor. Furthermore, minor malfunctions in technical equipment that are of no major importance to the buyer should generally not give rise to termination. As a rule, it must be determined in each individual case how the value or the usability is influenced through the lack of conformity in question. If the usability is influenced in a major way, the criterion for termination is fulfilled even if the lack of conformity only constitutes a marginal reduction in the value. A fact speaking against a more than minor lack of conformity is when the usability can be restored through minor efforts. Generally, a per se less important lack of conformity will become non-minor if it is difficult to remedy. Finally, the fact that the seller has without valid reasons refused to remedy the lack of conformity under III.–3:202 (Cure by debtor: general rules) might influence the question of whether or not the lack of conformity is minor, since the seller has then already been given an opportunity to avoid the termination of the contractual relationship.

NOTES

I. Specific remedies for lack of conformity of the goods

1. Many countries provide a specific regime for the remedies for non-conforming goods (i.e. defective performance), as opposed to the remedies for non or late delivery (AUSTRIA CC §§ 922-933b; CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 507 (general contract law) and 597 (sales contract); DENMARK SGA §§ 42 ff; FINLAND SGA §§ 30-40; GERMANY CC § 437; GREECE CC arts. 540 ff; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.334; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:21-24; NORWAY SGA §§ 30 ff; POLAND CC arts. 560-576, SLOVENIA LOA § 468; SPAIN CC arts. 1101, 1486; SWEDEN SGA §§ 30 ff).

2. Some countries differentiate between non-conforming delivery, which is sanctioned under general contract law, and a guarantee against hidden defects, which is a sales-specific regime. For these two regimes different remedies apply (BELGIUM and FRANCE CC arts. 1610-1611 (non-conforming delivery) and 1644-1647 (guarantee against hidden defects); ITALY CC art. 1492; SPAIN CC art. 1486(1)). However, in ITALY, with regard to the relation between general sales law and consumer sales law the remedies for the two regimes have been merged by Consumer Code art. 135, bridging CC art. 1492 and Consumer Code art. 130.

3. In contrast, under other systems there is a uniform remedies regime (PECL; CISG; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND; ESTONIA). However, also under those systems there is still differentiation in some respect between different types of non-performance. For instance, under ENGLISH law Sale of Goods Act s. 51 speaks of damages for non-delivery, while SGA s. 53 speaks of a remedy for breach of warranty. Under the CISG it is indicated that some remedies only apply ”if the goods do not conform to the contract”, namely in the case of repair, replacement and a price reduction (arts. 46(2) and (3) and 50). The situation is similar under ESTONIAN law as the uniform remedies regime is modified in sales law, mainly by introducing specific rules regarding the application of remedies and specific remedies such as the claim for specific performance through repair or replacement or a price reduction (LOA §§ 222 and 224) for the case where the goods do not conform to the contract.

4. Under some systems there is special consumer regulation concerning remedies for non-conforming goods. Due to the implementation of the Consumer Sales Directive, many Member States have chosen to enact a free-standing remedies regime exclusively applicable to consumer sales of non-conforming goods (BELGIUM CC art. 1649quinquies; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 622; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act Part VA; FRANCE Consumer Code arts. L. 211-9 ff; ITALY Consumer Code art. 130; POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 8; SPAIN ConsProtA arts. 116 ff).

5. Special regulation under commercial sales in this respect only exists under CZECH law where there is a free-standing remedies regime for commercial sales under Ccom arts. 365-369. Under CZECH commercial sales non-conformity is only a special case of default, as opposed to non-conformity under the civil code which constitutes a special regime for defective goods (Bejček/Eliáš/Raban, Kurz obchodního práva[3], 106; Knappová, Civil Law II[3], 102). In the SPANISH Commercial Code arts. 336, 342, there is a special regime of remedies for lack of conformity: basically, the originality lies in shortening the time available for claims and in imposing on the buyer a strong duty to check the goods before or immediately after delivery.

II. Withholding performance

6. Under some systems this right is regulated sales-specifically (FINLAND SGA § 42 and Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 17; NORWAY SGA § 42 and Consumer Sales Act § 28; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.208; SPAIN CC arts. 1466, 1502; SWEDEN SGA § 42 and Consumer Sales Act § 25). On the other hand, such a right may also be regulated on a general level (PECL art. 9:201; CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 560 and Ccom art. 326; ESTONIA LOA § 111; HUNGARY CC § 306(4); NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:262; POLAND CC art. 488(2); SLOVAKIA CC § 560; SLOVENIA LOA § 101). Under FRENCH law, there is such an explicit right for the seller, which is however considered to be a general contract law rule (CC arts. 1612-1613).

7. In some countries there is an implied (or legal) right to withhold performance (BELGIUM the general legal principle exception non adimpleti contractus; ENGLAND Treitel, 759; SCOTLAND McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, 20-47 and 20-62 f); SPAIN implied in CC arts. 1100 in fine and 1124), Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 692).

III. Price reduction

8. Most systems provide for a general right to a price reduction (Consumer Sales Directive art. 3(2); CISG art. 50; PECL Art. 9:401(1); AUSTRIA CC § 932(4); BELGIUM CC art. 1644 and (for consumer sales) art. 1649quinquies; CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 507 and 597(1) and (for consumer sales) § 622; DENMARK SGA §§ 42 and 43(1); ESTONIA LOA §§ 112 (general remedy) and 224 (sales-specific particulars concerning a price reduction); FINLAND SGA § 38 and the Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 19; FRANCE CC art. 1644; GERMANY CC § 441(1); HUNGARY CC § 306(1) b); ITALY CC art. 1492(1); LATVIA CC art. 1625; LITHUANIA CC art. 6.334; NORWAY SGA § 38; POLAND CC art. 560(1) and Consumer Sales Act art. 8(4); SLOVAKIA CC §§ 507 and 597; SLOVENIA LOA §§ 468(1) and 478; SPAIN CC art. 1486; SWEDEN SGA § 38 and Consumer Sales Act § 28).

9. Under some systems the remedy of a price reduction is only available in consumer sales (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 48C; NETHERLANDS CC art. 7:22(1)(b)). Nevertheless, under ENGLISH law Sale of Goods Act s. 53(3)) a similar calculation of damages is laid down: "the difference between the value of the goods at the time of delivery to the buyer and the value they would have had if they had fulfilled the warranty". Under DUTCH law the same result can be achieved through a partial termination of the contract, which leads to the acceptance of a lower quality or quantity in exchange for a price reduction (CC arts. 6:265 and 6:270).

10. Under a number of systems some exceptions are established regarding the right to a price reduction. In some systems there is no right to a price reduction for auction sales (ESTONIA LOA § 224); FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 37(2)). Under LATVIAN law CC arts. 1618 and 1619 the buyer has no right to a price reduction after one year has passed from the conclusion of the contract or when a specific guarantee was given. In GERMANY the buyer must give the seller an additional reasonable period for performance before he may resort to a price reduction (CC § 441).

11. Under some systems, the mode of calculation is explicitly regulated. In line with the CISG it is prescribed that the price is to be reduced in the same proportion as the value of the goods actually delivered had at the time of delivery compared to the value that conforming goods would have at that time (CISG art. 50; PECL art. 9:401(1); ESTONIA LOA § 112(1); FINLAND SGA § 38; NETHERLANDS CC arts. 6:270 and 7:22(1); NORWAY SGA § 38; POLAND CC art. 560(3); SPAIN CC art. 1486 in fine and ConsProtA art. 122. Other systems provide for a similar solution, save for the fact that the time of the conclusion of the contract is decisive for the calculation (GERMANY CC § 441(1); SLOVENIA LOA § 478). Additionally, under some systems it is added that the price reduction is to be calculated on a discretionary basis if this is necessary (ESTONIA § 112(1); GERMANY CC § 441(3)).

12. Other systems provide for an appropriate or adequate reduction (Consumer Sales Directive art. 3(2); BELGIUM CC art. 1644; CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 507 and 597(1) and (in consumer sales) § 622; ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 48C(1)(a); HUNGARY CC § 306(1) b)) or a proportionate reduction (DENMARK SGA §§ 42 and 43(1)). Under POLISH law CC art. 560(3) the reduction is to be made in proportion to the value of the goods if they would be free from defects, taking into account the existing defects. In LATVIA the purpose of demanding a price reduction for the item is to reduce the price or obtain another counteracting performance to an extent to which less would have been paid or performed concerning the item, had the discrepancies been known (CC art. 1625). Under HUNGARIAN law the basis of the price reduction has to be the purchase price bargained for and not the real value of the goods at the time of the conclusion of the contract. Moreover, the case law clarifies that a price reduction does not mean a reimbursement of the repair costs, though the repair costs can be taken into account when calculating the amount of the reduction (BH 1988. 182. and BH 1995. 212.).

IV. Damages

13. Under many systems, there is sales-specific regulation of the buyer's right to damages (CISG arts. 74 ff; BELGIUM CC art. 1645; DENMARK SGA §§ 42(2) and 43(3); ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Sale of Goods Act s. 48E(6), 51(1), 52(3), and 53(1)(b); ESTONIA LOA § 225 (amending the general regulation in § 115); FINLAND SGA § 40; FRANCE CC arts. 1611 and 1645; ITALY CC art. 1494; NORWAY SGA § 40; SLOVENIA LOA § 468(2) and (3); SPAIN CC arts. 1486(2), 1487 and 1488(2); SWEDEN SGA § 40 and Consumer Sales Act art. 30). Nevertheless, in SPAIN the restrictive special rule (that only a seller who knows of the hidden defects is liable in damages) has become obsolete since the beginning of the past century (TS 6 May 1911, jur. Civ. T. 121, no. 53.

14. Under other systems, the right to obtain damages is regulated under the general law of obligations (AUSTRIA § 933a; CZECH REPUBLIC CC §§ 510 and 600; ESTONIA LOA § 115; GERMANY CC §§ 280 and 281; NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:74 ff. However, in the NETHERLANDS, a specific provision applies in the case of damages in consumer sales where the damage falls under the regulation of product liability (CC arts. 6:185 ff). In that case, the seller is normally excluded from liability (CC art. 7:24(2)).

V. Termination by buyer

15. Under consumer sales the standard for termination deviates from the general regime in some systems. The consumer may then terminate unless the lack of conformity is minor (Consumer Sales Directive art. 3(6); BELGIUM CC art. 1649quinquies; FINLAND Consumer Protection Act chap. 5 § 19; FRANCE Consumer Code art. L. 211-10(5); NORWAY Consumer Sales Act § 32; POLAND Consumer Sales Act art. 8(4); SPAIN ConsProtA art. 121. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND the consumer's right to termination is not limited at all in relation to the gravity of the lack of conformity. In ESTONIA LOA § 223(2) provides that in the case of a consumer sale a fundamental non-performance may, in addition to general provisions, occur if a replacement or repair results in unreasonable inconvenience to the buyer.

IV.A.–4:202: Limitation of liability for damages of non-business sellers

(1) If the seller is a natural person acting for purposes not related to that person's trade, business or profession, the buyer is not entitled to damages for lack of conformity exceeding the contract price.

(2) The seller is not entitled to rely on paragraph (1) if the lack of conformity relates to facts of which the seller, at the time when the risk passed to the buyer, knew or could reasonably be expected to have known and which the seller did not disclose to the buyer before that time.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article limits the liability of non-professional sellers by capping the amount of (contractual) damages due. This limitation only applies in the event of a lack of conformity, as is made clear by the location and the wording of the rule. It therefore introduces a separate rule for sales law, which may be more favourable to the seller than the normal criterion of III.–3:703 (Foreseeability). While this Article will predominantly apply in the case of a sale between two private persons, it also covers the case of a private person selling to a business.

B. Non-professional seller

The definition of the non-professional seller runs parallel to that of a consumer under Annex 1. Accordingly, this Article applies to a natural person not acting to any extent for purposes related to that person's trade, business or profession. In contrast, it does not matter in which capacity the buyer buys the goods. The buyer can therefore be another private person, i.e. a 'consumer', or a business.

C. Damages limited to the amount of the contract price

In order to protect the non-professional seller against excessive claims for damages, the amount of damages is limited to the contract price. This cap on damages can be justified as follows. A far-reaching obligation to pay damages may become excessively onerous to a private seller, sometimes even disrupting the whole financial situation. This is especially true in the, albeit rare, situation where a non-professional seller sells goods to a business, where the seller could, in theory, face a far-reaching claim for damages.

> Illustration 1
> Two private persons conclude a sales contract for a second-hand caravan. The buyer, B, tells the seller that he is buying the caravan for travelling from Sweden to Spain for the European football championship. Unfortunately, the caravan breaks down in Germany, after having successfully crossed the bridge and Denmark. The amount of damages could for instance include the repair of the caravan itself, accommodation, alternative transportation to Spain or compensation for tickets that could not be used etc. However, since the seller is not a professional, he will at a maximum be liable for damages equal to the contract price.

Therefore it has been decided to restrain the non-professional seller's obligation to pay damages exceeding the contract price. Even if such a fixed standard may sometimes be inflexible, it was preferred to have a clear-cut rule rather than an open standard. In this way a private party will always know the exact extent of the risk taken, in contrast to having other standards like, for instance, the costs for repair.

Arguably, the arguments brought forward above also apply in respect of a delay in delivery. However, it should be kept in mind that any seller should know whether it is possible to deliver on time, whereas a seller may not envisage the consequences of a lack of conformity.

D. Exception

The cap on damages is subject to an important restriction in paragraph (2), which has a similar function as IV.A.–4:304 (Seller's knowledge of lack of conformity). In both cases, the seller is not entitled to rely on the protective rules, if the seller knew or should have known of the lack of conformity and did not communicate it to the buyer. In such situations, the seller is not worthy of the extra protection offered in paragraph (1).

Illustration 2
The facts are the same as in illustration 1. If the seller already knew about the defectiveness of the caravan without telling the buyer, he will be liable for damages in the normal way even if they exceed the contract price.

NOTES

Protection of the non-professional seller against excessive remedies

1. Under most systems there is no such explicit protection for the non-professional seller against excessive damages (e.g. SCOTLAND). In FRENCH law, however, a non-professional seller who did not know of the defects in the goods, is only obliged to return the price received after termination and compensate the costs related to the contract paid by the buyer. No additional damages can be awarded (CC art. 1646). The position is similar under the general law on sales in SPAIN (CC art. 1486), although this rule no longer makes sense except for consumer sellers.
2. Moreover, NORDIC law provides a possibility to adjust the amount of damages if the sum is unreasonable regarding the breaching party's possibilities to foresee and prevent the damage as well as with regard to the other circumstances at hand (FINLAND, NORWAY and SWEDEN SGA § 70(2)). An adjustment can especially be applicable where the seller is a private person and the buyer a professional suffering considerable loss (cf. SWEDEN Ramberg, Köplagen, 700)). The adjustment represents a specific application of the general principle of fairness in NORDIC contract law. Under DUTCH law the non-professional status of the seller may play a role when the court is asked to mitigate the damages under CC art. 6:109. However, courts are required to apply this instrument restrictively (Asser (-Hartkamp), Verbintenissenrecht I[11], no. 494).

Section 3: Requirements of examination and notification

IV.A.–4:301: Examination of the goods

(1) The buyer should examine the goods, or cause them to be examined, within as short a period as is reasonable in the circumstances. Failure to do so may result in the buyer losing, under III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity) as supplemented by IV.A.–4:302 (Notification of lack of conformity), the right to rely on the lack of conformity.

(2) If the contract involves carriage of the goods, examination may be deferred until after the goods have arrived at their destination.

(3) If the goods are redirected in transit, or redispatched by the buyer before the buyer has had a reasonable opportunity to examine them, and at the time of the conclusion of the contract the seller knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the possibility of such redirection or redispatch, examination may be deferred until after the goods have arrived at the new destination.

(4) This Article does not apply to a consumer contract for sale.
